

La vie et l'œuvre du compositeur autrichien Joseph Anton Bruckner (1875-1885)

AB 74 : 1875

12 janvier 1875 : « Il ne me reste plus maintenant que le Conservatoire pour subsister, ce qui serait insuffisant pour n'importe qui. Il a fallu que j'emprunte de l'argent en septembre dernier, et encore plus récemment pour ne pas mourir de faim. Personne ne me vient en aide. Heureusement, des gens de l'extérieur m'ont demandé de leurs donner des leçons. Sans cette opportunité, j'étais résigné à quêter. J'aimerais me rendre à l'étranger pour me dénicher un poste permanent mais vers qui pourrais-je me tourner ? Il serait si facile pour mes ennemis de me chasser du Conservatoire et je suis si surpris qu'ils ne l'aient pas encore fait. Je suis malheureux ; je n'ai plus de joie de vivre. Tous ces efforts ont mené absolument nulle part. J'aimerais tant récupérer mon ancien poste à Linz ou encore retourner en Angleterre. Voilà ma situation. Mais que puis-je donc faire ? » (Anton Bruckner, 51 ans.)

Puis, par miracle (ou le plus heureux des hasards) , August Göllerich, père, est élu comme député Libéral au Parlement autrichien. Il va développer des liens étroits avec le Ministre de l'instruction publique, Karl Ritter von Stremayr. C'est à la demande de celui-ci qu'Anton Bruckner expédiera une 3e (et ultime) lettre à la faculté de musique de l'Université de Vienne afin d'obtenir un poste d'assistant professeur (non rémunéré) d'harmonie et de contrepoint. Elle va finalement porter ses fruits ! Une directive provenant des instances supérieures viendra changer la donne. À l'unanimité, ni le corps professoral ni Eduard Hanslick ne s'objectent à cette nomination.

August Göllerich, père

Homme politique allemand, le nationaliste August Göllerich, père, est né le 2 juillet 1819 à Piacenza, en Italie. Il grandit dans une famille de la classe moyenne de la capitale de Haute-Autriche, Linz ; plus précisément, au 16 de la « Baumbachstraße » . Une plaque commémorative nous rappelle son passage dans cette demeure. Son épouse Maria, née Nowotny (1818-1889) , est aussi originaire de Linz.

Personnalité engagée aux idées progressistes, il se joint à l'Association littéraire des auteurs libéraux de Wels. Il devient président-secrétaire du Conseil municipal et contribue à la formation de l'Union des pompiers de Haute Autriche. Son successeur comme maire, John Schauer Welser (1884-1904) , prendra la relève dans ce dossier.

Par la suite, August Göllerich, père, est élu au Conseil Impérial du « Land » (« Landtag » ou parlement provincial) puis au Parlement national (« Reichstag ») comme député du Parti Libéral en plus d'être le leader en chambre pour sa région, la Haute-Autriche. Le chef du gouvernement est à ce moment le prince Adolf von Auersperg. Göllerich, père, va développer des liens étroits avec le Ministre de l'instruction publique, Karl Ritter von Stremayr. À partir de 1875, ce tandem aidera grandement la situation viennoise d'Anton Bruckner. En plus de siéger au « Landtag » et au « Reichstag » , August Göllerich, père, s'est impliqué dans la Société chorale masculine (« Männergesangverein ») de Wels et l'Association des chanteurs Salzbourgeois de Haute-Autriche (« Oberösterreichisch-salzburgischer Sängerbund ») . Bruckner était depuis fort longtemps un musicien apprécié pour son rôle dans la vie culturelle de Wels.

Restreindre le pouvoir du Clergé était une façon indirecte de critiquer l'absolutisme, les Libéraux au parlement autrichien se sont efforcés de veiller à ce que la Constitution ait préséance juridique sur le Concordat. Le leader Libéral en Chambre, August Göllerich (père) , dira en 1869 : « Éloignons-nous du Concordat et finissons-en avec ce déni de toutes nos libertés et nos droits ! » .

August Göllerich, père, meurt dans le village de Wels, le 23 août 1883.

La Vienne de Bruckner dans les années 1870

(Doctor Andrea Harrandt, Music Collection, Austrian National Library.)

« It is all too late. To run-up debts diligently and, then, enjoy the fruits of my diligence and lament the stupidity of my move to Vienna in a debtor's prison - that could be my ultimate fate. I have lost 1,000 Schillings in annual income and, as yet, there has been nothing to compensate for it, not even a grant. I am not able to have my 4th Symphony copied. » (1)

These are the words Bruckner wrote to Moritz von Mayfeld, on 13th February 1875. Only one day later, on 14th February 1875, Bruckner made the 1st sketch for the 2nd movement of his 5th Symphony. Why was Bruckner in such a deep depression ? What was his situation in Vienna ? And what happened around Bruckner ? Was he aware of what was going on, did he really live in his time, in Vienna ?

Bruckner moved to Vienna in 1868, to follow Simon Sechter as a professor of harmony and counterpoint at the Vienna Conservatory. From 1870 to 1874, he also worked as a teaching assistant in piano, organ, and theory at the Teacher Training Institute of Saint-Anna. In 1875, he became the Court Organist « apparent » which meant unpaid - then vice-archivist and 2nd singing teacher of the boy choristers in the « Hofmusikkapelle » . In 1878, he finally he became a member of the « Kapelle » . (2)

When Bruckner settled in Vienna, the city had changed a lot since his 1st journeys to the capital. The « compromise » with Hungary, in 1867, resulted in the establishment of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. And Vienna was the absolute centre of it, a capital with about 600,000 inhabitants. It was a new era of political and economical Liberalism which was only interrupted by the stock-market crash, in 1873. In 1859, the Emperor gave his consent for the « regulation and improvement of the residence and capital of the Empire » . This began with the removal of the main-parts of the city walls and, at the end of the 1860's, the new « Ringstraße » was ready to use. The « Ringstraße » was also a symbol of the rise of the middle-classes and economic prosperity. Important public buildings like the town-hall, government offices and museums, and also distinctive private palaces were built.

It is notable that Bruckner lived for some years also on the « Ringstraße » . In 1876, he moved from his 1st Viennese apartment to the so-called « Heinrichhof » , which was situated in front of the Opera House. Planned by Theophil Hansen, it was typical of the so-called « Ringstraße » style. In 1877, Bruckner moved on to another apartment in the house of his student Anton von Ölzelt-Newin, near « Schottenring » and in front of the « Ringtheater » . In both flats, he lived on the top-floor with a grand view.

Of interest in this context are, of course, the buildings in which the musical life of the city took place. The old Opera House, the so-called « Kärntnertheater » (which was situated where, today, you can find the Hôtel Sacher) had become too small, especially for the performances of Richard Wagner Operas. A new building was opened near the old, in 1869. Until this time, Vienna had no great concert-hall. In 1870, the building of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » was opened as a new and important concert-hall. So, the expanding city of Vienna had the chance to become the musical capital of Europe.

« How much Bruckner would have imbibed of the cultural atmosphere in Vienna is uncertain », writes Doctor Crawford Howie in his biography. (3) We always have to remember that Bruckner had free entrance to the concerts and to the Opera House, as he wrote to Johann Baptist Schiedermayr in December 1868. But it is a big question how often he made use of this privilege. Before he came to Vienna, he wrote that he could improve his musical awareness by « hearing music of high-quality in Vienna ». (4)

And Moritz von Mayfeld wrote to Bruckner : (5)

« I am very envious of the many beautiful things you are able to hear in Vienna, in contrast to the very meagre fare which is served here », by which he meant in Linz.

The year when Bruckner started his 5th Symphony was full of remarkable events in the cultural life of Vienna. What follows is a survey of some significant happenings in Vienna, from winter 1874-1875 until spring 1878, when Bruckner finished his new Symphony.

21 February 1875 : Richard Wagner arrived in Vienna to stay for some weeks. He arranged concerts for his planned Festival in Bayreuth and conducted 3 concerts in Vienna, on 1st and 15th March, and on 6th May. For the 1st time, the public could hear parts of « Götterdämmerung » such as scenes from the 1st Act, Siegfried's Journey to the Rhine, Siegfried's Death and the Funeral March, and the last scene of the 3rd Act with Amalie Friedrich-Materna and Franz Glatz. Did Bruckner hear this concert which was called « the biggest cultural event of 1875 » ? (6) But not everybody in Vienna appreciated Wagner. The satirical paper « Der Floh » (The Flea) wrote :

« It is over, this terrible week, in which Richard Wagner reigned over the musical life in Vienna. »

On 3rd March, Bruckner made the 1st sketch of the 1st movement of the 5th Symphony and, the next day, he was invited to a « soirée » at Josef Standthartner's apartment where Wagner and Josef Rubinstein gave a recital of the 3rd Act of « Götterdämmerung » .

Only a few days later, Karl Goldmark's « Königin von Saba » (Queen of Saba) had its world-premiere in Vienna, on 10th March 1875. It was a great success, although « it played 4 hours ». (7)

Eduard Hanslick wrote : (8)

« From Meyerbeer and Wagner, he acquired the emotion in singing, the mass-effects, the splendour of the Orchestra, but, also, the excess of all these 3 things. »

In March 1875, Anton Rubinstein again came to Vienna, to give 3 concerts as a pianist. Bruckner had met him in Munich, in 1865, for the performance of « Tristan und Isolde » . Did they meet now again in Vienna ? Some years before, in December 1871, when Rubinstein was conductor of the concerts of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , he performed Franz Liszt's Oratorio « Christus » , in the composer's presence with Bruckner as organist. Once Bruckner said about Rubinstein as a pianist, that he was « the greatest artist since Wagner's death » . (9) As a composer, Rubinstein was « too conservative » for Bruckner, which means that he totally avoided the new orientation. (10)

On 8th April, Franz Liszt, coming from Budapest, arrived in Vienna to stay here for some days « en route » to Weimar via Munich. 10 days later, on 18th April 1875, Johannes Brahms made his farewell appearance as conductor of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » concerts, with the 1st performance of the Oratorio « Odysseus » by Max Bruch. The same day, Bruckner started the composition of the Trio of the 5th Symphony.

On 1st July, Bruckner was nominated as a vice-archivist and, on 12th July, he made another attempt to secure a lectureship at the University. (13) During the summer, he also tried a new approach to promote his music. In a letter to the Vienna Philharmonic, on 1st August, he wrote that he had finished his 4th Symphony some months ago, and that he had had the opportunity to hear only one of his Symphonies, the 2nd, in Vienna. Now, he proposed to the Orchestra his 3rd Symphony, dedicated to Richard Wagner. He also mentioned Wagner's and Liszt's opinions of the work. In the autumn, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra played the 3rd Symphony in a so-called « Novitätenprobe » (Rehearsal of New Works) , but it failed.

On 23rd October 1875, Hans Richter conducted the 1st performance of Georges Bizet's « Carmen » , in Vienna (it was also the 1st performance in a German-speaking country) and, on 1st November, Richard Wagner came again to Vienna where he heard the next-day a performance of Verdi's « Missa da Requiem » now conducted by Hans Richter, and attended also some performances in the Opera House : « Carmen » , « Die Königin von Saba » , « Die Afrikanerin » and « Die Zauberflöte » . (14)

Wagner's « Tannhäuser » was performed for the 1st time in the « Paris version » of 1861, on 22nd November. A revival of « Lohengrin » followed on 15th December. Eduard Hanslick was the only one to comment that it was unpardonable not to honour François-Adrien Boieldieu for his 100th birthday, on 16 December.

On 20th February 1876, Bruckner conducted his 2nd Symphony in the 3rd « Gesellschaftskonzert » of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Eduard Hanslick wrote about the performance : (15)

« Each movement was applauded without opposition ; at the end, however, when an enthusiastic faction in the hall carried its clapping and shouting to an excess and kept starting-up again, the other part of the audience protested loudly and hissed repeatedly. »

On 1st March, Wagner arrived in Vienna again for a short visit to conduct his « Lohengrin » , 1 day later.

In March 1876, Camille Sains-Saëns, on his Austrian tour, gave several concerts in Vienna, also performing his « Danse macabre » , on 19th March, which « electrified the public » , according to a newspaper report. (16)

On 24th April 1876, Bruckner gave his inaugural lecture at the University and, on 29th April, he proposed himself to Constantin Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst for the position as a vice-conductor of the « Hofkapelle » .

On 16th May 1876, Bruckner finished the Finale of the 5th Symphony and, 2 days later, he completed his thorough check of the movement. The same day, a revival of Giuseppe Verdi's « Ernani » was performed at the Opera House.

In August, Bruckner went to Bayreuth to see the new « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , afterwards, he spent his holiday in Saint-Florian. In Bayreuth, he got to know Wilhelm Tappert, a music-critic from Berlin, who wanted to promote Bruckner's music.

In October, Bruckner wrote to him : (17)

« And so, I have lived in Vienna since 1868, bitterly regretting that I moved here as I do not have any support, recognition or means of subsistence. »

This reminds us of what Bruckner wrote to Moritz von Mayfeld, in February 1875. But Bruckner's situation in Vienna was not so bad as he always used to complain. Having grown-up in modest circumstances, he always struggled for financial security.

Concert life was going on. In October 1876, Pablo de Sarasate came to Vienna to give 2 successful concerts in Vienna. On 17th December 1876, Johannes Brahms conducted his 1st Symphony which received a very indifferent welcome from the public and the critic. Brahms was unable to live-up to the expectations which had been put on him. (18) On 31st December 1876, Bruckner finished his chorus, « Das hohe Lied » .

On 5th March 1877, the 1st performance of Wagner's « Die Walküre » , in Vienna, took place in the presence of the Emperor, etc. , but with many deleted passages which made the Opera difficult to understand. On 11th March, Bruckner attended the 3rd performance of this Opera.

He marked this event also in his personal calendar : (19)

« Sonntag 11. Marz, Migräne ganzer Tag und Walküre. »

(Sunday, 11 March, migraine the whole-day and « Walküre » .)

This is one of the very few cultural events we can fix in Bruckner's life.

On 27th September, there was once again a « Novitätenprobe » (Rehearsal of New Works) of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra.

Bruckner noted in his personal calendar : (20)

(Thursday, the 27 September 1877, 3rd rejection of my « Wagner Symphony » No. 3.)

Once again, the Symphony had failed.

On 28th October, Johann Herbeck died, and nobody felt greater loss than Bruckner. He considered Herbeck to be his only real friend and his enthusiastic pioneer whom he now had lost. It was Herbeck who planned to perform the 3rd Symphony. Under his direction, perhaps, the Symphony would have won more success.

The performance of the 3rd Symphony, on 16th December 1877, with the « Gesellschafts-Orchester » under Bruckner's direction, was a « débâcle ». The composer's interpretation and the work's length contributed fundamentally to its rejection. (21)

Eduard Hanslick wrote :

« Instead of a critique, therefore, we would rather simply confess that we have not understood his gigantic Symphony. »

The 1st 3 movements seemed to have been fairly well-received, but the audience began to drift-out during the Finale.

Hanslick reported :

« Even before Bruckner raised the baton, part of the audience began to stream-out of the hall and this exodus assumed ever great proportions after each movement, so that the Finale, which exceeded all its predecessors in oddities, was only experienced to the very end by a small number of hardy adventurers. »

Only a few friends like Gustav Mahler, Josef Schalk and Rudolf Krzyzanowski remained in the concert-hall. In August Göllerich's opinion, it was the public who failed, and not Bruckner. But it was also after this concert that the music-publisher Theodor Rättig offered to print the Symphony. He did so, and the 3rd Symphony was the 1st work of Bruckner to be published in Vienna.

Only 2 weeks later, on 30th December 1877, Johannes Brahms' 2nd Symphony, on its 1st performance by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Hans Richter, did not win a « great, general success », and Hanslick wrote that it was not the best of farewells to the year 1877.

We can also read in the press that :

« The applause was in inverse proportion to the worth of the novelty. »

At this time, Brahms, who had also taken-up residence in Vienna, in 1868, was, in contrast to Bruckner, a composer who had already « arrived ». He lived as an independent professional composer with the financial security of royalties from his music-publisher Simrock, and soon played a leading role in Vienna's musical life. (22)

There is no comment by Bruckner about Brahms and his music during this period, neither in his letters nor in his personal calendar, and Brahms also did not mention Bruckner very often. It is amazing to think that 2 composers, who were living in the same city for more than 25 years, had so little contact. They both had in common the fact that neither was married which, in the social climate of the time, was only possible in such a big city as Vienna.

According to a « résumé » in the « Illustrierte Wiener Extrablatt », on 1st January 1878 :

« It was a bad year for Symphonies. Too many of them came-out of the repertory of our concert institutions, so many failed. »

On the same day, Bruckner began to compose the Adagio of the 5th Symphony which he completed only 3 days later.

On 24th January 1878, « Das Rheingold » was the next part of the « Ring » to be performed in Vienna. On 1st February, Bruckner was announced a real member (« wirkliches Mitglied ») of the « Hofkapelle ». In April, Franz Liszt came to Vienna and played through the 5th, making favourable comments which Bruckner relayed to Richard Wagner in May.

As he had with the 3rd Symphony, in 1874, Bruckner once again gave an order to the painter and writer Josef Maria Kaiser, in Linz, for the dedication page for the 5th Symphony.

(Josef Maria established a correspondence with Anton Bruckner. The Linz calligrapher was also a friend of Adalbert Stifter.)

On 13th October 1878, Bruckner thanked Kaiser in enthusiastic words : (23)

« I have just now seen your newest great Masterwork for the 1st time. I was filled, once again, with astonishment and, at the same time, indescribable joy which moved me to the very heart. I cannot find any words to describe this display of colossal splendour. Magnificent, magnificent ! »

Bruckner signed the dedication score on 4th November 1878 which was the Saint-Day of Karl Borromaus and the Name-Day of Karl von Stremayr, the dedicatee of the 5th Symphony. (24)

A few days later, on 9th November, the 3rd part of Richard Wagner's « Ring », « Siegfried », was performed for the 1st time in Vienna. Especially in « Siegfried », we know about some music that touched Bruckner deeply, for example when Siegfried dreams of his mother or the scene with the woodbird.

In December 1878, Bruckner once again wrote to music-critic Wilhelm Tappert : (25)

« I learned recently that Liszt had made complimentary remarks about my 5th Symphony and other current works of mine, not only to Hohenlohe but also to people in Rome. »

On 15th December 1878, the 2nd performance of Johannes Brahms's 1st Symphony took place, but it did not give « unalloyed pleasure » . (26)

With the performance of « Götterdämmerung », on 14th February 1879, the « Ring » was completed in Vienna. The 1st performance of the « Ring » tetralogy took place in May 1879 and was called the greatest cultural event in Vienna, in that year.

Josef Maria Kaiser

The painter and writer Josef Maria Kaiser was born on 01/02/1824 in Kremsmünster, Upper-Austria ; and died on 05/06/1893 in Linz. He was the son of engraver Georg Kaiser (1781-1874) . He studied at the Vienna Academy of Fine-Arts. In 1848, he started to teach art at the Linz secondary school (« Gymnasium ») . In 1853, he exhibited his works at the Art Association of Upper-Austria. In 1867, he was elected its secretary and, in 1874, Board member.

In 1880, he was named curator of the Museum Francisco-Carolinum (Upper-Austrian Provincial Museum) in Linz. (He even elaborated an architecture plan for the erection of a new building.)

In 1892, Kaiser became Board member of the Imperial and Royal Central Council Commission for research and conservation of art and historical monuments. He was a talented draftsman with remarkable delicacy and exactness, particularly in the field of historic-topographic reproductions. He was recognized as a top-calligrapher during his lifetime. As a writer, he also published a book on the History of Upper-Austria.

14 février 1875 - 4 janvier 1878 : WAB 105 - Symphonie n° 5 « Die Katholische » en si bémol majeur pour 2 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 2 clarinettes, 2 bassons, 4 cors, 3 trompettes, 3 trombones, 1 tuba (ajouté en 1877) , timbales, les cordes. Écrite dans une période des plus sombres de l'existence d'Anton Bruckner. Il commence l'Adagio le 14 février 1875. La Ire ébauche de l'ensemble de la Symphonie est achevée le 16 mai 1876. Mais, en août 1877, il relit 3 fois de suite le Finale, reprend le 1er mouvement et révisé l'Adagio. Ce n'est que le 4 janvier 1878 que la 5e Symphonie est terminée. Durée approximative : de 75 à 80 minutes.

Cette composition culmine d'audace combinatoire et elle est sans doute la plus Classique des Symphonies du compositeur qu'il a désigné lui-même comme son : « chef-d'œuvre de contrepoint » à cause de la performance du Finale. La compréhension de cette Symphonie ne nécessite, a priori, aucune analyse. En effet, il suffit de se laisser transporter par la foi inébranlable qui semble se dégager d'une telle musique. Bruckner surnommait d'ailleurs cette œuvre « la Fantastique ». Ce surnom n'a pas été retenu à la postérité.

L'œuvre comprend 2 versions successives ...

Version originale de 1876 :

Dans ces concepts originaux (de février 1875 à mai 1877, Vienne) , la Symphonie est sans tuba et les instruments à cordes jouent un rôle plus important. Le tempo des introductions lentes des 1er et 4e mouvements et du 2e mouvement est noté « alla breve » , c'est-à-dire notablement plus rapide que dans la version de 1878.

En 1997, une Ire tentative de reconstruction des concepts originaux du Finale (Édition Carragan) a été enregistrée par Shunsaku Tsutsumi.

En 2008, Takanobu Kawasaki a tenté de reconstituer les concepts originaux (1875-1877) à partir des manuscrits Mus.Hs.19.477 et Mus.Hs.3162 de la Bibliothèque Nationale d'Autriche. Ces concepts ont été enregistrés par Akira Naito.

Selon John F. Berky :

Version de 1876 :

Création à Vienne, le 20 avril 1878, dans une version pour 2 pianos.

Contrairement à d'autres Symphonies de Bruckner, la 5e n'a connu qu'une seule version interprétée par son élève, le chef d'orchestre et disciple Franz Schalk.

Révision et arrangement de Franz Schalk en 1878 :

2 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 2 clarinettes en si bémol, 2 bassons, 4 cors (2 en fa et 2 en mi bémol) , 3 trompettes en do, 3 trombones, 1 tuba, timbales et cordes.

Franz Schalk va remanier l'œuvre de 1892 à 1894 en pratiquant d'énormes coupures. Elle servira de base à l'édition Ludwig Döblinger.

Création à Graz, le 8 (9) avril 1894, avec Franz Schalk au pupitre.

En décembre 1895, une autre édition de la version Schalk est exécutée à Budapest, sous la direction du chef d'orchestre autrichien Ferdinand Löwe. Il faudra attendre jusqu'en 1935 pour obtenir la version authentique de la Symphonie.

La Symphonie est en 4 mouvements : Adagio, Allegro moderato - Adagio : sehr langsam - Scherzo : molto vivace - Finale : Adagio, allegro moderato.

Le mouvement de tête est le seul de l'œuvre Symphonique de Bruckner à comporter une introduction lente. La partie principale est un mouvement de sonate bien structuré avec une exposition, un développement et une ré-exposition. La tonalité de l'ensemble est symétrique ; les mouvements extrêmes sont en si bémol majeur et les 2 mouvements du milieu en ré mineur. Le rythme du second mouvement en triolets contraste avec les duolets du thème émis par le hautbois. Enfin, le dernier mouvement est une combinaison grandiose d'une sonate fuguée avec la reprise de thèmes mélangés avec des motifs isolés de tous les mouvements.

Soudain, on frémit au fortissimo unisono des fanfares de l'orchestre à peu près dans son ensemble. Quand le choral déploie toutes ses forces commence l'Allegro introduit par le trémolo des cordes : les violons bourdonnent ; clarinettes, altos et violoncelles hésitent puis lancent à l'unisson leur cri qui évolue vers un tutti : c'est le 1er thème. Mais cette force recule devant le choral des cordes aux modulations suaves : c'est le second thème. Un 3e thème est donné à la flûte, à la clarinette et au hautbois expressivo. Une lutte intérieure s'instaure et le choral des instruments à vent (déjà entendu dans l'introduction) décide de l'issue du combat. À la reprise, les différents thèmes représentés défilent intacts. Les pizzicati solennels aux basses entendus à l'introduction marquent le début de la partie finale de ce mouvement où les fanfares de l'introduction et le 1er thème s'en donnent à cœur joie.

Adagio : sehr langsam (ré mineur) - Le 2e mouvement est en forme de lied (ABA'B'A") . Le 1er groupe thématique offre aux bois à vent un chant simple, religieux et désolé, sous-tendu par un accompagnement aux cordes en pizzicato, qui est suivi par une descente en 7es. Le 2e groupe thématique est une sorte de marche religieuse que les violons jouent largo assai sur la corde de sol. Lors de la dernière partie, la reprise du 1er groupe thématique est interrompue à 2 reprises par une « échelle céleste » que le compositeur reprendra dans la Coda de la version 1880 de la 4e Symphonie.

Scherzo : molto vivace (ré mineur) - On peut l'appeler tout simplement bal champêtre ; le ton mineur invite à la méditation. Les cordes transforment rapidement le rythme de l'Adagio en un rythme de danse. Ce que les bois donnent à l'unisson et en antithèse présentent une consonance peu engageante, malgré le crescendo qui tente de forcer l'atmosphère. Une valse lente (propre à l'Autriche) , confiée aux 1ers et seconds violons molto piu lent réussit à créer un meilleur climat. Puis, on écoute alternativement la danse rapide et cette valse ; la danse perd de plus en plus sa mélancolie pour devenir joyeuse et la valse lente s'évanouit. Le trio (allegretto) se présente comme une agréable danse à roulades malgré les dissonances du cor.

Finale : Adagio, allegro moderato - Il répète l'introduction mais des appels de clarinettes, brefs et inquiétants s'entendent au loin. Les instruments à vent engagent les 1ers contacts, une courte citation du début de l'Adagio y fait suite (second mouvement) ; dans les basses, des cordes gronde un thème d'attaque construit comme une fugue. Les violons y opposent un second motif d'où naît un épisode semblable à la Siegfried-Idyll de Richard Wagner. Brusquement, le thème de l'attaque s'élance en un unisson puissant soutenu par les cordes puis est repoussé. Un choral allegro assai misterioso ouvre le somptueux développement, une fantaisie fuguée dans laquelle le choral s'oppose au thème d'attaque. Après une courte reprise à la fin de laquelle réapparaît le thème initial du 1er mouvement, une imposante Coda reprend le choral avec en contrepoint le thème d'attaque et le thème initial.

Anton Bruckner composa la Symphonie n° 5 en si bémol majeur à une période difficile de sa vie, et l'œuvre semble avoir été poursuivie par la malchance. Mis à part la 9e qui resta inachevée, ce fut la seule Symphonie de son cru qu'il n'entendit jamais exécuter par un orchestre, bien qu'en 1887, plus de 10 ans après son achèvement, il en entendit une version pour 2 pianos interprétée par Josef Schalk et Franz Zottmann, à Vienne. La seule exécution orchestrale qui eût lieu de son vivant, fut donnée à Graz en 1894, sous la baguette de son élève Franz Schalk, mais le compositeur était déjà trop malade pour y assister. Ce fut d'ailleurs Schalk qui en supervisa la 1^{re} édition, en 1896, peu avant la mort de Bruckner, probablement alors trop malade pour s'opposer aux modifications apportées par Schalk : la ré-orchestration radicale de nombreux passages (allant même jusqu'à incorporer, à la fin, un orchestre de cuivres en coulisse !) ainsi que des coupures trahissant le même manque d'égards (par exemple, la suppression de 122 mesures au milieu du Finale) . La 1^{re} exécution à Vienne (dans la version de Schalk, comme de bien entendu) , eut lieu en 1898 sous la direction de Ferdinand Löwe, et fut assez bien accueillie. L'œuvre entra peu à peu au répertoire, mais il fallut attendre 1937 pour que la partition authentique de Bruckner soit publiée, dans l'édition de Robert Haas. (L'édition ultérieure réalisée par Leopold Nowak, en 1951, est essentiellement la ré-édition de celle de Haas.) De nos jours, la 5^e est considérée comme une des plus grandes réussites Symphoniques de Bruckner, son intensité d'expression et le caractère grandiose de son architecture la plaçant sur un pied d'égalité avec les 3 dernières Symphonies (les nos. 7, 8 et 9) du compositeur.

Bruckner entama la composition de sa 5^e Symphonie en février 1875, peu après avoir ébauché sa 4^e Symphonie, dite « Romantique » . Il commença par la composition du 2^e mouvement, Adagio. Le compositeur était alors dans une situation difficile et déprimante. Il regrettait profondément d'avoir quitté Linz pour venir s'installer à Vienne, la capitale si raffinée de l'Empire, où il avait des difficultés à s'intégrer socialement et où il ne parvenait guère, semble-t-il, à susciter de l'attention pour sa musique. Il était aussi fort tourmenté par un procès intenté contre lui par 2 de ses élèves féminines, à qui il avait enseigné le piano et qui l'accusaient d'avoir eu un comportement offensant à leur égard (la chose semble avoir été due à un malentendu : Bruckner devait finalement être disculpé par le tribunal) . Il ne pouvait donc plus enseigner le piano qu'à des élèves masculins, mais son poste de professeur de piano dans un séminaire viennois était de toute façon sur le point d'être supprimé. Réduit à son maigre salaire d'enseignant au « Konservatorium » de Vienne, il fut forcé d'emprunter de l'argent. Ses lettres de l'époque montrent qu'il était déprimé, et il se pourrait fort que le thème retentissant au hautbois entendu dans l'Adagio, probablement la 1^{re} idée qu'il esquissa pour l'œuvre, ait la force d'un cri intime venu du fond du cœur.

La Symphonie fut achevée dans sa totalité, en mai 1876, mais cette version originale est perdue. Cependant, Bruckner se livra à une révision partielle de l'œuvre pendant les 2 années qui suivirent, et en rédigea une nouvelle partition : c'est cette partition de 1878 qui demeure l'unique source de la musique. À la différence des Symphonies nos. 1 à 4, il n'existe donc pas plusieurs versions rivales de la Symphonie n° 5, dans lesquelles la substance musicale elle-même varie. Bruckner dédia l'œuvre à Karl Ritter von Stremayr, qui était alors le Ministre de l'instruction publique de l'Empire austro-hongrois au sein du gouvernement formé par le prince Adolf von Auersperg.

Toutes les Symphonies de Bruckner sont imposantes et l'épithète de « monumentales » intervient naturellement dans toute discussion s'y rapportant. Cependant, la 5^e est encore plus vaste que toute autre Symphonie antérieurement écrite par Bruckner et, de surcroît, dans cette œuvre, la disposition du matériau, l'ampleur des formes données aux 4 mouvements et la façon dont le compositeur utilise l'orchestre, tout mérite d'être qualifié d'architectural. Pareille à une gigantesque cathédrale Gothique, l'œuvre semble dominer ses auditeurs par son immensité et donne l'impression d'être bâtie avec la solidité d'un roc. Tels les voûtes, les entrelacs et la disposition régulière des grandes masses de pierre d'une cathédrale, cette Symphonie est celle qui montre, au plus haut point, la souveraine Maîtrise du contrepoint possédée par Bruckner, particulièrement dans les textures essentiellement polyphoniques des 3 1^{ers} mouvements et la massive fugue avec choral formant le corps principal du Finale. Bien que ce soit sous une forme orchestrale absolument authentique, nous entendons ici toute la longue expérience de l'art du contrepoint acquise par Bruckner en sa qualité d'organiste d'église virtuose.

La 5e est également unique à d'autres égards. Le Finale fugué est le seul Finale Symphonique du genre, trouvé chez Bruckner. De plus, il est évident que Bruckner se soucia à un degré peu habituel de créer une unité au sein des mouvements de l'œuvre. Le Finale non seulement débute par les thèmes des 3 mouvements précédents et inclut à son apogée un rappel cyclique d'un thème du 1er mouvement, mais le 1er mouvement et le Finale (qui sont tous les 2 en si bémol majeur) débute aussi sur la même musique, tandis que le 2e et le 3e mouvements (tous les 2 en ré mineur) débute par le même motif d'accompagnement en triolet, aux cordes : créant ainsi une sorte d'arc « thématique-tonal » .

Finalement, la Symphonie n° 5 est la seule Symphonie de Bruckner à débute par une véritable introduction, plutôt que par quelques mesures de prélude préparant à ce qui va venir, comme c'est le cas dans la plupart de ses autres Symphonies. Marquée Adagio, cette introduction débute par le jeu pizzicato d'une contrebasse descendant de plus en plus vers le grave avant de remonter, tandis que violons et altos font fleurir des harmonies révérencieuses plus à l'aigu. Soudain, une idée fortissimo, jouée à l'unisson par tout l'orchestre, se dresse convulsivement, mais les harmonies sévères et majestueuses du chœur des cuivres au grand complet viennent s'y opposer. Ces 2 éléments sont répétés. Le tempo, qui s'accélère en même temps qu'apparaît une remarquable figure de notes pointées, redevient Adagio pour faire entendre une 3e exposition paroxystique du passage aux cuivres, cette fois exécuté par tout l'orchestre. Cette introduction vraiment peu habituelle opérant la juxtaposition difficile de plusieurs idées opposées qui semblent se fixer l'air revêché, suggère déjà les qualités architecturales de l'œuvre tout entière et se termine par des échanges rappelant des cris d'oiseau, entre cor et flûte solistes.

Le mouvement principal, Allegro, commence alors avec un thème agité aux violons et aux violoncelles. Passant à la dominante (fa) , Bruckner expose ensuite un long thème plein d'anxiété au violon sur un accompagnement joué pizzicato rappelant l'ouverture même du mouvement. Un thème plus chaleureux et plus lyrique apparaît en ré bémol aux bois, puis une figure ostinato, jouée fortissimo, monte de la contrebasse et domine le puissant tutti orchestral qui s'ensuit. Cette vaste exposition se termine en fa, et le développement commence par un retour de la musique de l'Introduction, une fois de plus Adagio, mais maintenant en ut majeur avec la musique pour violons / altos fleurissant aux cors et accompagnée par la contrebasse jouant pizzicato. Les idées s'opposant de façon si dramatique se font à nouveau entendre combinées au 1er sujet de l'Allegro, puis le développement se poursuit de façon merveilleusement dramatique en faisant s'entrelacer le matériau de l'Introduction avec celui de l'exposition. Ceci amène à une récapitulation tout aussi dramatique dans laquelle les relations tonales et les rapports entre les différents éléments se trouvent radicalement repensés, puis la Coda débute par l'idée pizzicato initiale du mouvement qui a été accélérée pour atteindre le tempo d'Allegro. La tonalité de si bémol majeur, dans laquelle le mouvement a débuté, ne se trouve pleinement et irrévocablement établie que lors des dernières mesures empreintes d'une assurance sereine, bien que colossale.

Si l'atmosphère caractérisant les mouvements lents de Bruckner tend à être Romantique, élégiaque ou pieuse, le 2e mouvement Adagio de la Symphonie n° 5 s'avère, pendant la majeure partie de sa durée, austère, renfermé et énigmatique. Il adopte une forme simple : 2 sections contrastées, qui sont toutes les 2 répétées avec des modifications, la 1re revenant une fois de plus pour former sommet et Coda. À l'instar du 1er mouvement, l'Adagio débute par un motif pizzicato ; mais celui-ci, avec ses 6 triolets égaux par mesure, crée un mystérieux rythme concomitant avec la mesure à 2/2 du thème au hautbois joué dolce, mélodie pathétique d'une subtilité exquise. Froide, grise et interrogatrice, cette musique tissée avec une extrême complexité se trouve soudain équilibrée par la chaleureuse tonalité d'ut majeur de la section contrastante, dont la mélodie principale généralement chantante, quasi-hymnique, est entamée par les cordes au grand complet. La 1re section survient une seconde fois pour créer un sommet retentissant, après quoi la mélodie aux cordes fait une seconde apparition ravissante, en ré. Une chatoyante figuration au violon entoure la dernière apparition de la section principale, qui, après avoir atteint un grand moment d'éloquence, s'évanouit de façon plutôt sinistre, mourant sur des pizzicati qui ne causent plus de rythmes concomitants.

Le Scherzo, donnant l'impression d'être doté d'une force musculaire énorme, annonce le mouvement Rondo-Burlesque de la 9e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler par sa dextérité contrapuntique et son élan rythmique. Il s'agit néanmoins, comme pour tous les Scherzos de Bruckner, d'une forme sonate en miniature. La rapide danse à 3/4 aux cordes jouant staccato sur laquelle elle débute, est en fait une transformation du lent accompagnement pizzicato de l'Adagio. Le 1er sujet, aux bois, est empreint d'une sorte d'élan froid et insouciant ; le second, légèrement plus lent, est un « Ländler » autrichien, une valse joyeuse, quoique lente et lourde, débutée par les cordes. Les 2 sujets se trouvent développés au cours d'une danse échevelée qui culmine avec des répétitions triomphantes de l'accord de ré majeur. Le Trio, écrit dans le même tempo, débute alors en si bémol, d'abord aux bois, obstinément ponctué par le cor. Cette danse bucolique constitue une musique changeante, quasi-Mendelssohnienne, malgré une brutale interruption du trombone peu avant la fin. Vient ensuite la reprise littérale du Scherzo.

Comme le 1er mouvement, le Finale est pourvu d'une introduction Adagio. Et d'ailleurs, comme mentionné plus haut, il s'ouvre exactement sur la même musique que celle sur laquelle la Symphonie a débuté. Cette introduction, tout comme celle du 1er mouvement, juxtapose des idées contrastantes, mais ces idées sont les thèmes principaux des 1er et 2e mouvements. Elles sont passées en revue, mais jugées inadéquates (Bruckner emprunta sans doute l'idée au début du finale de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven) : chacune se trouve accueillie puis renvoyée par une seule petite phrase interrogatrice de 6 notes exécutée par la clarinette soliste descendant d'une octave avant de remonter à nouveau. Après la réapparition du thème pathétique au hautbois du 2e mouvement, 2 clarinettes à l'unisson font entendre la phrase de 6 notes, qui s'avère aussitôt être le motif d'ouverture d'un sujet de fugue coriace débutant aux violoncelles et aux contrebasses. Le mouvement principal repose cependant sur une fusion de la fugue avec la forme sonate, et le sujet de la fugue, qui est présenté avec une exposition de fugue complète, correspond au 1er sujet de la forme sonate.

L'exposition fuguée s'interrompt, et un thème lyrique (non fugué) en ré bémol (le second sujet du mouvement) est annoncé par les violons. Une transition orageuse, fondée sur la figure descendant d'une octave, amène à un grandiose choral de cuivres, dont les cordes font entendre le doux écho, après quoi la 1re partie du mouvement se termine dans une atmosphère séraphique, avec cordes et timbales jouant pianissimo. La section de développement commence alors, il s'agit d'une double fugue complètement résolue, dont le thème du choral, maintenant dépouillé de toute harmonie aux cuivres, fournit le 1er thème, tandis que le sujet incisif dérivé de la figure à 6 notes en constitue le

La fugue est développée avec une Maîtrise du contrepoint et un instinct dramatique prodigieux. À son paroxysme, l'orchestre tout entier joue les 2 sujets combinés, et ceci s'avère aussi être un début de récapitulation. Le thème lyrique revient en fa, à nouveau suivi par la transition orageuse, au sein de laquelle nous entendons maintenant le 1er sujet du 1er mouvement de la Symphonie : autre moyen inattendu par lequel Bruckner cimente tout l'édifice pour lui donner une conception « auto-cohérente » semblant se réfléchir. Dans la Coda, la musique enfle irrésistiblement s'appuyant sur le 1er sujet de la fugue, tandis que d'autres idées lui sont opposées jusqu'à ce que le puissant choral entre en majestueuse augmentation complètement harmonisé pour les cuivres et accompagné par les rythmes du 1er sujet, afin de clôturer l'argument Symphonique de Bruckner en termes si glorieux et, semble-t-il, si inéluctables qu'aucune opposition ne pourrait être tolérée.

Fils d'instituteur, Anton Bruckner naît à Ansfelden, une paisible bourgade rurale de la Haute-Autriche, dans une petite maison proche de l'église du village. Le jeune garçon vit ses Ires émotions musicales en accompagnant son père, également organiste et sacristain, au monastère de Saint-Florian, dans la commune voisine. Au son des grandes orgues de l'abbaye, au pied desquelles sa dépouille repose aujourd'hui, l'enfant nourrit une profonde ferveur religieuse qui imprènera toute son œuvre.

À l'âge de 16 ans, à la question du choix de son futur métier, il répond laconiquement :

Pour compléter ses maigres appointements d'instituteur, il joue du violon pour des noces et des kermesses, découvrant ainsi la richesse de la musique populaire autrichienne, dont certains accents se retrouveront dans les Scherzos de ses Symphonies à venir, notamment la 5e. Dans les années 1860, le musicien, devenu organiste professionnel, compose des pièces religieuses et rencontre Richard Wagner, qui devient un ami fidèle.

Bruckner est alors à un moment charnière de sa vie d'artiste : il cherche à exprimer toute sa foi, non plus seulement dans la musique sacrée, mais par le biais d'un moyen d'expression autre, a priori profane, celui de la Symphonie. La création de sa Ire Symphonie en ut mineur, toute de contraste et d'audaces formelles et harmoniques, remporte un succès mitigé, le musicien étant certes estimé (on compare ses talents d'improvisateur à ceux de Jean-Sébastien Bach) , mais le compositeur étant encore incompris.

En 1868, Bruckner est appelé à Vienne pour être professeur au Conservatoire et organiste à la Cour Impériale. Arrivé dans la capitale, le musicien, au comportement maladroit et à l'accent rural, fait l'objet de railleries, sa piété démonstrative et sa tendance à une humilité excessive accentuant son aspect marginal. Malgré cela, il parvient à se faire une place au sein de la société viennoise, obtenant une chaire à l'Université en 1875 et même un titre de Docteur « honoris causa » en 1891. En dépit des critiques acerbes d'Eduard Hanslick et de l'inimitié affichée de Johannes Brahms, le compositeur peut compter sur de fidèles disciples, au 1er rang desquels Hugo Wolf et Gustav Mahler.

Bruckner, qui fut longtemps en proie au doute, est désormais sûr de sa vocation et de la tâche qu'il s'est fixée : celle de l'édification d'un monument symphonique, véritable cathédrale musicale, dans laquelle il pourra exprimer son ardent mysticisme, mais aussi la véhémence de passions inabouties, lui qui, toute sa vie, cherchera sans jamais y parvenir à fonder un foyer.

La 5e Symphonie, esquissée dès 1875, mais achevée seulement en 1878, ne fut, contrairement aux autres, que très peu remaniée. Bruckner, malade, n'assistera pas à sa création le 8 avril 1894 dans une version abrégée, et mourra sans jamais l'avoir entendue en concert. L'œuvre ne sera donnée dans son intégralité qu'en 1935, à Munich.

Outre l'élan religieux, les conflits intérieurs qui habitent le compositeur sont également perceptibles dans sa musique, ce qui fit dire à Gustave Kars :

« On ne saurait imaginer qu'une œuvre d'une telle portée et d'une telle complexité ait pu être le fruit d'une vie béate, d'où la lutte et le doute auraient été absents. »

Constituée de 4 mouvements, la Symphonie n° 5 s'ouvre par une longue introduction lente, dont plusieurs éléments thématiques se retrouveront dans le reste de l'œuvre, ce qui lui confère une unité formelle et motivique. Un thème de choral joué par les cuivres se dégage, chatoyant, illuminant le discours. L'utilisation de 3 thèmes dans l'Allegro qui suit, donne des effets de contrastes saisissants, où là encore, toute la complexité de la vie intérieure du musicien transparait. L'influence de la musique d'orgue est prégnante, l'orchestration reflétant les jeux mêmes de l'instrument. L'utilisation caractéristique des silences, qui ponctuent et aèrent le discours, peut également rappeler l'écriture pour orgue, qui doit s'accommoder de l'acoustique des églises.

Dans l'Adagio, construit autour de 2 thèmes, les contrastes, toujours présents, accentuent la force discursive, faisant alterner des passages sereins avec des moments plus douloureux. Le Scherzo, lié à l'Adagio précédent d'un point de vue tonal et thématique, a des réminiscences de « Ländler ». Enfin, le Finale fait entendre une double fugue, témoignant du génie contrapuntique du compositeur, qui disait lui-même de cette Symphonie qu'elle était ce qu'il a « fait de mieux en matière de contrepoint » .

Véritable « hymne profane » à la foi, cette œuvre est une pierre indispensable à l'édifice symphonique voulu par Bruckner, à cette église sonore qui chante l'universel plus encore que le sacré.

Par suite d'une courte absence, j'ai dû manquer un récital de Rislér, une séance du Quatuor Halir, où l'on a entendu une œuvre inédite de Felix Weingartner, et encore d'autres choses intéressantes. Mais j'ai pu rentrer à temps pour le second concert Nikisch, où l'on donnait, pour la 1re fois à Berlin, la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner. Elle est presque inconnue. Il y a 4 ans, Schalk l'a fait jouer à Gratz, et Löwe à Budapest. On ne connaît guère d'autre exécution de cette œuvre, qui est encore plus difficile et compliquée que la 7e Symphonie du même Maître, que Dupuis fut seul, je crois, à monter en pays latin. Dans sa 5e Symphonie, Bruckner n'emploie l'orchestre bayreuthien qu'au Finale. À ce moment, l'effet est irrésistible.

L'œuvre est très longue et d'une surcharge contrapuntique à dérouter les plus attentifs. L'exposition de la 1re partie prend un certain temps, par la variété et le nombre des thèmes, qui sont ensuite travaillés avec un art inouï. Tout de suite, on reconnaît le faire, la griffe nerveuse du vieux Maître. Un thème choral des cuivres bref et scandé, une phrase qui n'est que la décomposition de l'accord parfait et se revêt d'une noblesse simple, puis des dessins obstinés, obsédants. Puis, l'enchevêtrement se poursuit sans relâche, avec des trouvailles, des rapprochements imprévus de sonorités et d'harmonies, jusqu'à la péroraison, qui a une belle allure héroïque.

L'Adagio, en mesure ternaire avec un chant de hautbois de rythme binaire, commence comme du Brahms. Mais chez Bruckner, la période est plus courte et toujours rénovée. Les violons chantent sur la 4e corde un thème élégiaque, comme Bruckner seul en trouve. Le Scherzo se relie à l'Adagio directement, le thème d'entrée est le même, pris en mouvement rapide. Le fond du Scherzo est le vieux cadre de Haydn et de Mozart. L'intérêt repose dans le détail du contrepoint, qui s'entrelace parmi les phrases mélodieuses. Le Finale échappe à une description. C'est énorme, effrayant de dimensions, de mise en œuvre, de difficultés maîtrisées. Il y a une double fugue entamée par les gros instruments, puis poursuivie dans un réseau de contre chant et thèmes déjà entendus. Ensuite, vient un choral de cuivre, proche parent du thème du Graal de « Parsifal », à part l'harmonisation chromatique. Les périodes fuguées et déclamées alternent en progression jusqu'à l'entrée du second orchestre formé de 4 cors, 3 trompettes, 3 trombones et un basse tuba. C'est absolument grandiose quand la masse métallique attaque le choral tandis que les gros instruments de l'orchestre chevauchent et que tous les thèmes s'éparpillent aux voix supérieures.

C'est une belle œuvre ; elle ne s'adresse certes pas au grand public. Même pour nombre d'auditeurs sensitifs et d'intellect ouvert, elle a quelque chose d'abstrus, d'énigmatique. Je reconnais volontiers que la musique de Bruckner manque d'effusion. Au moment suprême, où l'on désirerait quelque chose d'éperdu, d'inviabile, où l'on souhaiterait le coup d'aile de Beethoven ou le torrent mélodique de Wagner, le froid et mesuré Bruckner se reprend, coupe court et, avec une ingéniosité inlassable, nous entraîne vers d'autres voies. On ne peut planer, savourer ; il faut encore entendre, non pas, comme on voudrait, avec l'oreille de l'esprit, mais analyser les merveilles savantes qui sont offertes sans relâche.

L'âme de l'auteur était poétique, comme son faire était souverain. Et son œuvre est rarement poétique au sens touchant, sentimental. Il rappelle Leconte de Lisle qui entraîne, sans être lui-même entraîné. Le malentendu entre l'auditeur froissé, irrité et le compositeur impassible provient peut-être de ce que Bruckner a pris le terme Symphonie au sens strict du mot. Son œuvre est presque incompatible avec une exégèse, un parallélisme littéraire. Ce n'est pas un poème Symphonique où l'auditeur se forge des visions chimériques que l'œuvre exécutée vient renforcer après les avoir suggérées.

L'œuvre de Bruckner n'est que la combinaison souvent géniale des sons et des thèmes. Ses moyens, ses expressions sont volontairement limitées. Mais ses compositions, dans leur dénudation voulue, ont leur beauté spéciale, comme l'eau forte, qui n'utilise que du noir et du blanc, et est susceptible d'expression si profonde. La musique de Bruckner n'est pas pour faire rêvasser les maladifs ; elle est pour la joie des musiciens. Merci à Nikisch d'avoir monté cette œuvre ardue, qui n'a guère été comprise et n'a eu que peu de succès. L'exécution était excellente sans atteindre la perfection, ce qui me paraît impossible avec une partition pareille.

Le soliste était Burmester, le violoniste national allemand. Il a joué un peu faux d'abord, puis juste, puis bien le Concerto de Beethoven. Grand succès. Il y avait encore au programme une Symphonie de Mendelssohn. Nous n'y sommes pas restés. Après la commotion produite par Bruckner, la musique de Mendelssohn n'aurait été qu'agitation dans le vide.

Le passage de Richard Wagner à Vienne au printemps de 1875 attise l'hostilité et l'acharnement de ses adversaires, avec Eduard Hanslick en tête, envers le timide compositeur de Symphonies. Faire l'éloge de sa musique alerte les autorités conservatrices qui redoublent de cruauté grâce à leurs campagnes intensives de dénigrement. Ainsi, les conditions de vie de Bruckner étaient devenues critiques. Citons une de ses lettres, rédigée en janvier : « Il est impossible de subsister avec seulement mon revenu en tant que professeur conférencier au Conservatoire. Je dois toujours emprunter de l'argent sinon c'est la famine. Personne ne propose de m'aider. Le Ministre de l'éducation me fait des promesses, mais il n'y a jamais rien de concret. Si ce n'était du support des quelques étrangers qui étudient avec moi, je serais obligé de mendier. Si j'avais su qu'une si terrible situation m'attendait à Vienne, aucun pouvoir terrestre ne serait parvenu à me faire venir ici. Oh, combien je serais heureux de retourner à mon ancien poste à Linz ! » .

Le chef Benjamin Zander parle de la 5e Symphonie

Bruckner's 5th Symphony was completed in May 1876 and slightly retouched in 1878. It was first printed in a butchered revision from Franz Schalk, in 1896. The authentic final manuscript eventually was published in a 1936 edition by Robert Haas, which differs little from the later one produced by Leopold Nowak. The 5th is the first unconditional success of Bruckner's maturity, and its colossal last movement was described by conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler as « the most majestic Finale » in the entire orchestral literature. In my view, the Fifth is one of Bruckner's greatest Masterpieces, along with the mighty 8th and the unfinished 9th. Those 3 works are the main reasons why I regard Bruckner as the finest Austro-German Symphonist after Beethoven.

A press release quotes Zander :

« In working on the Bruckner 5th, I became aware of how close his music is to Schubert. I avoided the very slow tempi that have become common in contemporary interpretations and emphasized the sprightly, forward moving urgency of the music. »

Zander's up-front candor is apt : this work can seem pretentious and over-blown when stretched past the 80 minute mark. As noted in reviewing Furtwängler's live Bruckner (« Fanfare » magazine, No. 32, page 4) , my favourite historic 5ths are the urgent 1942 Furtwängler / Berlin Philharmonic (68 min 50 sec) and the wonderfully inflected 1963 Schuricht / Vienna Philharmonic (76 min 05 sec) , a live reading that I hope will be re-issued by « DGG » . However, both of those are mono recordings of a work that craves to be heard in stereo.

Of the various historic stereo accounts lasting less than 80 minutes, my preference is the warmly lyrical 1975 Kempe / Munich Philharmonic (74 min 50 sec) , once on a 2 disc « Odyssey » LP set (regrettably, I missed the deleted CD transfers from « Acanta » and « Scribendum ») . A « guilty pleasure » indulgence in the 5th (it was my « imprint » version, back in the LP days) is the 1958 Jochum / Bavarian Radio (76 min 52 sec) , which is available in a 9 disc Bruckner CD-set (« DGG ») . Jochum had great rapport with the Bavarian Orchestra he founded in 1949, and the string playing is very rhapsodic. However, Jochum's extreme tempo fluctuations lack the internal logic of Furtwängler and the subtler rubato of Schuricht. In a throwback to the discredited Schalk edition, an additional brass band of « 11 Apostles ») (4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones and 1 bass tuba) is heard in the Finale's coda. The effect is stunning but, in so doing, Jochum slows down the tempo by about 30 %, which simply undermines the cumulative momentum that Bruckner surely intended.

To that list of personal favorites, I must now add this quite remarkable new reading from Behjamin Zander and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, which strikes me as the very finest 5th of the digital era. The recorded sound is terrific, with an enormous dynamic range set against a completely silent background (for hardcore audiophiles, a separate SACD release is also available) . With utmost fidelity to the score's dynamic markings, Zander delivers a well-executed reading that captures all the lilting moods of this challenging work. The playing isn't absolutely perfect (there are 1 or 2 imprecise moments in the strings and a couple of less than optimally balanced brass chords in the Finale) but those amount to little more than minor defects in a grand Master painting. At any rate, perfection is an unachievable goal in a work of such vast scope (although a few recordings out there are perfectly dull) .

What truly cinches the indispensability of this set is its 80 minute bonus discussion disc. I suspect that some jaded collectors will now roll their eyes and think : « Oh boy, just what I need : a musical appreciation disc ! » . If you are one of them, please think again. I can tell you without hesitation that what Zander delivers here is the most profoundly insightful and utterly illuminating discussion of any Classical Masterpiece, in my experience. He is, above all, a superb communicator whose enthusiasm is altogether contagious. Because the 5th is often noted for its « cathedral sound » and lofty architecture, Zander uses the extended metaphor of an actual cathedral's floor plan in discussing each movement of the work (a handy fold-out diagram is included with the booklet notes) . I've been listening to this music for more than 40 years and will freely admit that Zander provided epiphanies for me, at every turn. Zander also quotes extensively from World War I letters that his father wrote as a German soldier stationed on the Russian front (he happened to have a pocket score of the 5th with him that was a birthday gift from the senior Zander's own parents) . This discussion disc also utilizes many illustrations taken from the recording and also from Zander himself on piano. Be prepared for some deeply moving moments.

WAB 105 (1875-1876) : Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major (« Die Katholische ») . 1876 : 1st concept ; revised in 1878.

(Anton Bruckner)

Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 in B-flat stands at the fulcrum of his Symphonic output. Among his most intellectually daunting creations, the 5th has never attained the popularity of the 4th or 7th Symphonies, and its complexity proved a barrier to performance during the composer's lifetime. It was given only twice, and then never as Bruckner intended.

As is typical of the composer's works, Bruckner's 5th was the product of a lengthy gestation. Work began on the great Adagio on February 14, 1875 ; then came the opening movement and Scherzo, with the monumental Finale reaching completion in May 1877. Even then, however, Bruckner was not satisfied, and he was not finished with his modifications until January 4, 1878. He dedicated the work to Carl von Stremeyr, Austria's enlightened and sympathetic Minister for education and culture, who had been instrumental in helping Bruckner secure a professorship at Vienna University.

This is the only Bruckner Symphony to begin with a slow introduction, and the opening motif is heard again at the start of the Finale. The devotional atmosphere of the outset leads to an Allegro of raw power ; its ostinato dotted-rhythm figure eventually gives way to a more subdued secondary idea, beginning with pizzicato strings. Dialogue between horn and flute heralds the development section, though again the relentlessness of the dotted motif becomes obsessive. It even continues to dominate the colossal Coda.

The oboe begins the languid, deeply eloquent Adagio, against a triplet accompaniment from pizzicato lower strings. The rhythmic connection between this supporting device and the beginning of the 1st movement Allegro only becomes clear when the 2nd theme arrives, cast in rich, deep harmonies for full strings. As the movement continues, the 2 thematic groups are reviewed in turn, as Bruckner explores their contrapuntal possibilities to the fullest. Most of the Scherzo's material has already been heard previously in the Symphony, and the links with the pizzicato opening of the slow movement, now presented at a much faster tempo and now played arco (with the bow) , soon become apparent. The Trio section affords effective contrast, and brings a shift in key from D minor to the Symphony's home key of B-flat.

Many commentators discuss the influence of the Finale of Beethoven's « Choral » Symphony upon the last movement of Bruckner's 5th, though, in fact, the resemblances hardly extend beyond the opening of the movement. Whereas Beethoven reviews themes from earlier in his work, and then dismisses them, the germinal thematic idea of Bruckner's Finale derives clearly enough from the major themes that have gone before. What follows is an extraordinarily masterful display of contrapuntal skill ; this Sonata movement also contains an astounding double fugue, though 3 distinct main ideas are present. The last of these, a nobly expansive chorale for full brass returns to crown the mighty resolution of the Symphony, in its unforgettably powerful Coda.

The Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major (WAB 105) of Anton Bruckner was written in 1875-1876, with a few minor changes over the next few years. It was 1st performed in public on 2 pianos by Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann on 20 April 1887, at the « Bösendorfersaal », in Vienna. The 1st orchestral performance was conducted by Franz Schalk, in Graz, on 8 April 1894. (Bruckner was sick and unable to attend : he never heard this Symphony performed by an Orchestra) . It was dedicated to Karl Ritter von Stremayr, Minister of education in the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

The Symphony is sometimes referred to as the « Tragic », « Church of Faith », or « Pizzicato » Symphony.

The Symphony was written at a time of much trouble and disillusionment during the composer's life, a Court suit (from which he was exonerated) , a reduction in salary. It is not outwardly a work of storm and stress, but it is a piece of « working out » , one of his most contrapuntally intricate works.

The Symphony requires an instrumentation of one pair each flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, with 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones and 1 bass tuba along with timpani and strings. Also note that, in its original form, the Symphony was scored without a tuba. This was added in 1878, at the same time that Bruckner added a tuba to the 2nd version of the Symphony No. 4.

The Symphony is in 4 movements :

1. Introduction (Adagio) - Allegro in B-flat major.

2. Adagio. Sehr langsam in D minor.

3. Scherzo. Molto vivace in D minor.

4. Finale (Adagio) - Allegro moderato in B-flat major.

Movements 1, 2 and 4 begin with pizzicato strings, hence the nickname « Pizzicato » . The pizzicato figures are symmetrical, in the sense that the outer movements share one figure while the middle movements share a different figure.

The work begins with a majestic slow introduction, which progresses into a main movement in Sonata form whose opening theme in B-flat hints also at G-flat. Like much of Bruckner's music, the exposition of this movement has 3 main key regions instead of the usual 2.

The main material of the slow movement and Scherzo are very similar, heard of course at different tempos and launching different developments.

The Finale opens in the same way as the 1st movement, but veers-off soon to gradually introduce new material which becomes the source of the themes of the Allegro moderato, another Sonata form which contains in its course fugal and chorale sections of elaborate counterpoint.

The Symphony is the only one of Bruckner's 9 that begins with a slow introduction. However, all the others except the Symphony No. 1 begin with sections that are like introductions « in tempo », easing into the main material like the opening of Beethoven's 9th.

The 1876 version is still unpublished.

In 1997, a 1st attempt of reconstruction of the 1876 version, by including in the Finale music from the « 1876 1st Concept » (Edited by William Carragan) , was recorded by Shunsaku Tsutsumi with the Shunyukai Symphony Orchestra.

In 2008, Takanobu Kawasaki was able to assemble the original concepts (1875-1877) of the Symphony from manuscripts Mus.Hs.19.477 & Mus.Hs.3162 of the Austrian National Library. These original concepts have been recorded by Akira Naito with the Tokyo New City Orchestra.

As commented by John F. Berky :

« It is the best available CD to present some of Bruckner's earlier thoughts for this massive Symphony. »

In its « Original Concepts », the Symphony is scored without a bass tuba and more prominence is given to the string instruments. The tempo of the Adagio introduction of movements 1 and 4, and that of movement 2 are scored « Alla breve » , i.e. , notably faster than in the 1878 version.

1876 Version (Haas « Vorlagenbericht » [partial treatment]) .

1878 Version (Haas, Nowak) .

Leopold Nowak, in 1951 :

« It was through the unforgettable performances under Franz Schalk's baton that the divine inspirations of this lone Titan of music (for that is the vision that the 5th conjures-up) came to uplift the hearts of all mankind. Surely, it is from some lonely eminence that these deeply moving utterances make their tremendous impact upon this world of ours, in all its infinite variety. This Symphony reveals the utmost technical Mastery of form, structure, and instrumentation. For all who have ever set foot in the mighty edifice of its polyphony, its melodic wealth, and its chorale, it remains an unforgettable experience. »

Circa 1890 Version ([Schalk]) .

The 1876 version was composed in the autograph score, now Mus.Hs. 19477, but Bruckner revised the autograph in several phases, in 1877 and early in 1878. Based on the autograph, it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to disentangle the earliest version of the score ; thus, the 1876 version remains unpublished, although Robert Haas gave a partial treatment of this version in his « Vorlagenbericht » . One part of the 1876 version that can be re-constructed is the beginning of the Finale Coda, leading-up to the final chorale. Aaron Snyder and William Carragan have created a demonstration of this section of the score based on details given in the Haas « Vorlagenbericht » .

The 1878 version (the version that is almost always performed today) can be constructed from the autograph and from the copy score Bruckner presented to Karl von Stremayr (minister of education in the Austro-Hungarian Empire) to whom the Symphony was dedicated. According to William Carragan, the differences between the 1876 and 1878 scores are similar in scale to the differences between the 1866 and 1877 versions of the 1st.

Another copy score, Mus.Hs. 36693, has been found recently, and it contains a few revisions in Bruckner's hand-made, most likely, in the late 1880's or early 1890's. Although this manuscript is un-published, some of Bruckner's modifications in Mus.Hs. 36693 can be found in the 1st printing, published in 1896.

The 1896 edition differs considerably from Bruckner's 1878 version. With the exception of Bruckner's revisions taken from Mus.Hs. 36693, there is reasonable evidence that nearly all other revisions in the 1st printing were made by Franz Schalk prior to the Symphony's premiere in Graz, in 1894. Unfortunately, the « Stichvorlage » , which could show more definitively the extent of Bruckner's involvement, is not extant. Since the 1st printing includes Bruckner's revisions in Mus.Hs. 36693, I list it as an edition of the « circa » 1890 version with modifications by Schalk.

The relations between the sources for the 5th (the autograph Mus.Hs. 19477, the copy score Mus.Hs. 36693, and the 1st edition of 1896 containing substantial revisions by Franz Schalk) are exactly echoed in the sources for the F minor Mass : in addition to the autograph score Mus.Hs. 2105, there is a copy score Mus.Hs. 6015 in which Bruckner entered a few revisions sometime during the years 1890 through 1893. The 1st printing of 1894 includes these changes along with substantial revisions by Josef Schalk. Robert Haas based his edition of the F minor Mass on Mus.Hs. 2105, and Leopold Nowak based his edition on Mus.Hs. 6015.

Bruckner's 5th Symphony : « Original Concepts »

(Edited by Takanobu Kawasaki.)

Anton Bruckner completed the 1st Version of the Symphony No. 5, on May 16, 1876. He completed the 2nd Version, on January 4, 1878. The only autograph (Mus.Hs.19.477) is in the Austrian National Library and has been compiled from 2 different manuscripts :

Ist Movement + Adagio (Group A) .

Scherzo + Finale (Group B) .

Group B has the dates belonging to Version 1 and Version 2 but Group A only has Version 2. In Group A and Group B, the pen that Bruckner used is different. The hand-writing in Group A is thin while the hand-writing of Group B is bold and powerful. Due to a different pen being used in Group B, it is possible to determine what belongs in Version 1 and Version 2. Most of the material in Group B before corrections, thus, belongs in Version 1. However, this is not possible in Group A, so, the only movements wherein we can see Bruckner's 1st concepts are the Scherzo and Finale (Group B) . Due to a different pen being used in Group B, it is often possible to determine what belongs in Version 1 and Version 2, but it is not always completely clear. Bruckner occasionally scratched-out with a razor the one to be corrected and wrote over it. Moreover, he often revised a passage 2 or 3 times. Therefore, it is very difficult to be certain which version belongs to which written section.

I edited my « Original Concepts » with these guidelines : I only used Mus.Hs.19.477 and Mus.Hs.3162 in the Austrian National Library (« ÖNB ») . I did not use other sources except those original materials listed above, but only quoted « viel » at Adagio, bar 163, from Leopold Nowak's « Revisionsbericht » , page 81. (Bruckner added it in the hand-writing copy of Mus.Hs.36.693 in « ÖNB » . It appears in new Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs' Edition, too.) I used this because « ÖNB » « viel » is the original conception of Bruckner, not a later one. I returned all shortened bars and expanded bars to their original form, and I restored those places retouched by Bruckner as much as possible. I deleted the bass tuba and adjusted other brass instruments suitably.

From this score, one part of Bruckner's original concepts can be examined. The major advantage of this score is to obtain the sound of the string instruments that Bruckner originally intended, as this was of major importance to the composer. Today's performances are dominated by the brass instruments. Adding a bass tuba to the Symphony No. 5 is similar to the practice of adding cymbals to the Symphony No. 7.

My edition has been presented as the closest adaptation of what Bruckner's « Original Concepts » of the Symphony No. 5 would be. Like some of Robert Haas' work, it is an amalgamated edition which uses more than 1 version to bring together a unified and musically pleasing edition. In my case, I have amalgamated 2 versions, in an effort to keep this lost version alive. It brings to the listener segments of Bruckner's early work on the Symphony No. 5 that would otherwise never be heard.

(Takanobu Kawasaki, August 2009.)

Referencing the CD booklet of NAITO Bruckner 5th Symphony :

Pages 1-2 : My explanation

Outline of the last paragraph (page 2 ; lines 21-28) :

Robert Haas faithfully reproduced the Autograph. However, I have one comment :

He disregarded the time signatures for change by Bruckner's own in the Adagio. In all cases, Bruckner returned to 4/4, not « alla breve » from 6/4 (or lined 12/8) . With this, a contradiction erupts. Maybe, various discussions might exist about this contradiction. Franz Schalk solved these problems by uniting all rhythm to 4/4 and 6/4.

Pages 3-6 : Directionality of performance by Maestro Naito

He achieved 2 points by this performance :

Performance method of period.

The tempo of « alla breve » in the Adagio.

The essay is the explanation of them.

The outline of this essay is published in the following TBJ :

Page 7 (verso) : 4 music examples for « alla breve » tempo of the Adagio by Naito.

Example 1 : At the beginning of the « Original Version » , perhaps, parentheses of « Sehr langsam » are unnecessary. « Alla breve » : The baton is shaken twice, in 1 bar.

Example 2 : At the beginning of the 1st Edition (Franz Schalk) , the Adagio is exact instead of « Sehr langsam » . 6/4 : The baton is shaken 6 times, in 1 bar.

Example 3 : The B section (bar 31-) is the same tempo as « alla breve » . There are no « alla breve » marks in all the editions but everybody can read « alla breve » with Robert Haas and Leopold Nowak.

Example 4 : Bruckner's instruction at bar 163. In German, it says : It is necessary to perform the melody by the same rhythm sense as « alla breve » , till then. However, the tempo should be made slower.

The 1878 version is the version normally performed. It exists in editions by Robert Haas (published 1935) and Leopold Nowak (published 1951) which are almost identical.

The 1896 1st published version, which was also the version heard at the work's premiere, was edited by Franz Schalk.

It is unclear exactly how much of the difference between the 1878 and 1896 versions was due to Bruckner and how much to Schalk, but it is generally agreed that most of the changes were unapproved by Bruckner and inauthentic. Schalk generally made Bruckner's music sound more Wagnerian, mainly by means of re-orchestration. The most obvious differences occur in the Coda of the Finale. In the last few pages, Schalk adds triangle and cymbals, and an offstage brass band. Schalk also made several cuts, mostly in the Finale.

The only recordings of this version are by Hans Knappertsbusch, Leon Botstein and Takeo Noguchi, together with the recording premiere of the Scherzo by Dol Dauber. All other recordings are of 1878 version in either the Robert Haas or Leopold Nowak edition.

Original version composed from February 1875 to May 1876. The later revision was made on the same score, so it is not possible to recover this original version, although Robert Haas provided some indications to this effect.

1878 version : A thorough revision was concluded in November 1878. The Robert Haas (1935) and Leopold Nowak (1952) editions of this version don't present any significant difference between them.

Revised version made in 1892-1894 by Franz Schalk and employed in the 1st performance of the work in Graz, on April 8, 1894. It was published in 1896 by Ludwig Döblinger (1st Edition of the work) . Bruckner had very little to do with this revision, that introduces large cuts especially in the Finale.

Anton Bruckner composed his Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major at a difficult time in his life and it seemed dogged by ill luck. Apart from his unfinished 9th, it was the only one of his Symphonies which Bruckner never heard performed by an orchestra, though in 1887, more than a decade after its completion, he did hear it played in a version for 2 pianos by Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann in Vienna. The sole orchestral performance in his lifetime took place in Graz, in 1894, under the baton of his pupil Franz Schalk, but the composer was too ill to attend. Schalk supervised its 1st publication in 1896, shortly before Bruckner's death, and Bruckner was presumably too ill to protest at Schalk's drastic re-orchestration of many passages (introducing an off-stage brass band at the end !) and equally insensitive cuts - 122 bars removed from the middle of the Finale, for instance. The 1st Viennese performance (of Schalk's version) occurred in 1898 under Ferdinand Löwe, and was fairly well received ; the work slowly made its way into the repertoire, but Bruckner's authentic score was not published until 1937, in an edition by Robert Haas. (The later, 1951 edition by Leopold Nowak is essentially a re-publication of Haas.) Nowadays, the 5th is regarded as one of Bruckner's supreme Symphonic achievements, ranking with the last 3 Symphonies (7, 8, 9) for intensity of expression and « grandeur » of architecture.

Bruckner began writing the 5th Symphony in February 1875, soon after he had drafted his 4th Symphony, the « Romantic » . He began by composing the Adagio 2nd movement. He was currently in difficult and depressing circumstances. He much regretted his move from Linz to the sophisticated Imperial capital, Vienna, where he found it hard to fit-in socially and seemed unable to attract much attention to his music. He was anxious, too, about a legal action that had been brought against him by 2 female piano pupils who felt he had behaved insultingly towards them (this seems to have been the result of misunderstandings - Bruckner would eventually be exonerated by the court) . He had, thus, been limited to male piano pupils and this piano-teaching job, at a Viennese seminary, was, in any case, about to be abolished ; reduced to his meagre teaching salary from the Vienna « Konservatorium » , he was forced to borrow money. His correspondence of the time shows him in low spirits, and the plangent oboe theme of the Adagio, probably the 1st idea he drafted for the work, may well have the force of a personal cry from the depths.

The whole Symphony was completed by May 1876, but that original version is lost ; Bruckner revised the work, to some extent, over the next 2 years, writing a new score, and it is this 1878 score which remains the sole source for the music. Symphony No. 5, therefore, unlike Symphonies Nos. 1 to 4, does not exist in a number of competing versions in which the actual musical substance varies. Bruckner dedicated the work to Karl Ritter von Stremayr, who was then Minister of Public Instruction (Minister of Education) for the Austro-Hungarian Empire in the government of Prince Adolf von Auersperg.

All Bruckner's Symphonies are large, and the epithet « monumental » arises naturally in any discussion of them. But the 5th is larger than any Symphony Bruckner had written before and, in it, his disposition of his materials, the broad forms of the 4 movements and the way that he uses the orchestra all deserve, in addition, to be described as architectural. Like a huge Gothic cathedral, the work appears to tower above its listeners and to be built with a rock-like solidity. As in the vaulting, inter-weaving and rhythmic disposition of the great stone masses of a cathedral, this is the Symphony which shows at its most intense Bruckner's sovereign Mastery of counterpoint, in the predominantly polyphonic textures of the 1st 3 movements and in the massive fugue with chorale which forms the bulk of the Finale. Here (though in wholly authentic orchestral guise) , we hear the long experience Bruckner had gained in the contrapuntal arts as a virtuoso church organist.

The 5th is also unique in other ways. The fugal Finale is Bruckner's only Symphonic Finale of this kind. Moreover, Bruckner was clearly concerned in this Symphony, to an unusual degree, with securing unity among the movements. Not only does the Finale begin by quoting the themes of the 3 preceding movements, and include a cyclic recall of a 1st movement theme at its climax, but the 1st movement and Finale (which are both in B-flat major) begin with the same music, while the 2nd and 3rd movements (which are both in D minor) begin with the same accompanimental triplet figure in the strings - creating a kind of tonal-thematic « arch-form » .

Finally, Symphony No. 5 is the only Symphony by Bruckner to open with a formal introduction, rather than (as in most of his other Symphonies) a few prelude, scene-setting bars. Marked Adagio, this introduction begins with a steady falling, then rising pizzicato bass, above which violins and violas open-out into reverential harmony. A sudden fortissimo unison idea rears-up convulsively on full orchestra, only to be countered by stern, majestic harmony in the full brass choir. These 2 elements are repeated. The tempo quickens, with a prominent dotted-note figure, then reverts to Adagio for a 3rd, climactic statement of the brass passage, this time on full orchestra. This highly-unusual introduction, with several opposing ideas frowning at each other in stark juxtaposition, already suggests the architectural qualities of the whole work, and it concludes with bird-like calls exchanged between solo horn and flute.

The main Allegro movement now sets in with a restless theme on violins and cellos. Moving to the dominant, F, Bruckner next expounds a long, anxious violin theme against a pizzicato accompaniment recalling the movement's very opening. A warmer and more lyrical theme appears in D-flat on the woodwind, and a fortissimo ostinato figure arises from the bass and takes command of the powerful orchestral tutti that ensues. This large exposition closes in F, and the development begins with the music of the Introduction returning, once more Adagio, but now in C major and with the violin / viola music flowering on the horns above the pizzicato bass. The dramatically opposed ideas are heard again in combination with the 1st subject of the Allegro, and the materials of both introduction and exposition are then intertwined as the development continues in magnificently dramatic fashion. This drives to an equally dramatic recapitulation in which the tonal relations and connexions of the various constituents are drastically re-thought, and then the Coda opens with the movement's initial pizzicato idea speeded-up to Allegro tempo. The tonic B-flat major, in which the movement had opened, is not fully and unequivocally established until the serenely but massively confident closing bars.

The mood of Bruckner's slow movements tends to be Romantic, elegiac or devotional ; but the Adagio 2nd movement of Symphony No. 5 is for much of its length austere, withdrawn, enigmatic. The form of the movement is simple : 2 contrasted sections, both repeated with modifications, the 1st recurring, yet, another time to form both climax and Coda. Like the 1st movement, the Adagio begins with a pizzicato pattern - but this, in 6 even triplets to a bar, creates a mysterious cross-rhythm with the 2/2 time of the dolce oboe theme, a melody of exquisite pathetic refinement. Cold, grey, and questing, this intricately woven music is suddenly balanced by the warm C major of the contrasting section, its broadly singing, almost hymn-like main melody led-off by the full strings. The 2nd occurrence of the 1st section creates a sonorous climax, after which the string melody makes a beautiful 2nd appearance, in D. Shimmering violin figuration enfolds the last appearance of the main section, which after reaching an expressive high-point fades-out rather sinisterly, dying away over pizzicati that no longer cause cross-rhythms.

The Scherzo gives the impression of enormous muscular strength, and in its contrapuntal dexterity and rhythmic impulse foreshadows the Rondo-Burleske movement of Gustav Mahler's 9th Symphony. It is, however, like all Bruckner's Scherzos, a miniature sonata-form. The fast 3/4 dance in staccato strings, which opens it, is, in fact, a transformation of the Adagio's slow pizzicato accompaniment. The 1st subject, on woodwind, has a kind of cold insouciant « élan » ; the 2nd, slightly slower, is an Austrian « Ländler » , a gay but slow heavy waltz, led-off by the strings. Both subjects are developed in a wild dance that climaxes in triumphant repetitions of the chord of D major. The Trio, in the same tempo, then begins in B-flat, at 1st on woodwinds obstinately punctuated by horn. This bucolic dance is whimsical, almost Mendelssohnian music, despite a rough interruption from the trombone shortly before the end. The Scherzo is then reprised verbatim.

Like the 1st movement, the Finale has an Adagio introduction - and, indeed, as mentioned above, it opens with the exact same music as that with which the Symphony began. Just as the introduction to the 1st movement juxtaposes contrasting ideas, so does this one : but the ideas are the principal themes of the 1st and 2nd movements. These are passed in review and found wanting (Bruckner, no doubt, got this idea from the start of the Finale of Beethoven's 9th Symphony) : each is greeted and dismissed by a single quizzical 6 note phrase from a solo clarinet, falling an octave and, then, rising again. After the reappearance of the pathetic oboe theme from the 2nd movement, 2 clarinets in unison give-out this 6 note phrase, which forthwith reveals itself as the opening figure in a hard-bitten fugue subject that starts-up in cellos and basses. The main movement, however, is a fusion of fugue with sonata-form, and the fugue-subject, which is presented in a full fugal exposition, corresponds to the sonata 1st subject.

The fugal exposition breaks-off, and a (non-fugal) lyric theme in D-flat (the movement's 2nd subject) is announced by the violins. A tempestuous transition, based on the falling-octave figure, leads to a grandiose brass chorale, softly echoed by strings, after which the 1st part of the movement closes seraphically on pianissimo strings and timpani. The development section then begins, and proves to be a fully worked-out double fugue in which the chorale theme, shorn now of its brass harmony, is the 1st theme, while the trenchant subject derived from the 6 note figure is the 2nd.

The fugue is developed with staggering contrapuntal skill and dramatic instinct. At its climax, the 2 subjects are combined by full orchestra, and this proves also to be the beginning of a recapitulation. The lyrical theme returns in F, followed, again, by the stormy transition, within which we now hear the 1st subject from the Symphony's 1st movement - another unexpected means by which Bruckner binds the whole edifice into a self-consistent and self-reflecting design. In the Coda, the music builds-up irresistibly on the basis of the 1st fugue subject, with other ideas played-off against it, until the mighty chorale strides in, in majestic augmentation, fully harmonised on the brass, against the rhythms of the 1st subject, to clinch Bruckner's Symphonic argument in terms so glorious and so seemingly inevitable that they can brook no opposition.

Anton Bruckner composed his 5th Symphony between 14 February 1875 and 16 May 1876, only to revise it between May 1877 and 4 January 1878 ; he continued to make sporadic changes to it through 1887. Despite all that, in the case of this Symphony, and, in contrast to the 1st 4 and the 8th of his numbered Symphonies, there is only one version that issued from Bruckner's pen. Bruckner heard it only once and, then, only in a 2 piano arrangement by Josef Schalk (1857-1900) . This provisional premiere, as it were, took place in Vienna, on 20 April 1887 - with Schalk and Franz Zottmann (1858-1909) as pianists - and was received with enthusiasm by the public. Because of the work's difficulty and length, its accession into the orchestral repertoire remained out of the question for quite some time. As it was, Bruckner allowed the performance of Schalk's arrangement only after several grueling rehearsals, and the memoirs of Friedrich Klose (1862-1942) , who attended them, strikingly contradict the typical image of Bruckner as a timid, modest person who could be easily persuaded to act against his own interests. The arrangement Schalk prepared for this concert has been lost, but probably corresponded to Bruckner's own (and final) version of the work.

It was only in 1894 that the 5th Symphony appeared for the 1st time in an orchestra concert, namely in Graz, where Josef Schalk's younger brother Franz (1863-1931) , also a Bruckner pupil, was music-director of the « Theater am Stadtpark » there. In the mammoth Bruckner biography that appeared between 1922 and 1937 - begun by August Göllerich junior (1859-1923) , and largely the product of Max Auer (1880-1962) - Auer reports that Schalk added a choir of brass at the end of the Finale because the regular brass players « were physically no longer able to project the hitherto unimaginable intensifications toward the end of the Finale » . According to Auer, Bruckner approved of the addition himself, which is possible, although documentary evidence to this effect does not exist. It is also impossible to determine whether, during the preparation of the premiere, Schalk made the numerous additional changes to the score that appeared in its 1st printing. In any case, the premiere of the 5th Symphony, on 9 April 1894, was a huge success, with « jubilant applause that would not end » after each movement. A gratifying confirmation for a composer who lay near death, in Vienna, and a great honour for a provincial city - but not quite the beginning of a triumphal procession through the world's concert halls. In the following year, Ferdinand Löwe (1863-1925) conducted the work in Budapest, where it « remained quite uncomprehended » , quite possibly further evidence that Bruckner's musical world was hardly a universal one.

Only upon the overwhelming success of a performance in Vienna by the Kaim Orchestra of Munich (the predecessor of the Munich Philharmonic) under Ferdinand Löwe's direction, on 1 March 1898, did the 5th Symphony set firm foot in the musical world of German-speaking Europe. To be sure, the 4th, 7th, 8th, and 9th Symphonies remained the ones most performed but, from that point on, the 5th Symphony did not lack for significant performances. 3 years later, it even received its 1st American performance (in Boston, on 27 September 1901) and, in 1931, Bruno Walter began his life-long occupation with the Symphonies of Bruckner by stepping-in, on behalf of Franz Schalk who had taken ill, to conduct this Symphony at the « Salzburger Festspiele » .

Prior to the 1st performance of the original version of the 5th Symphony by the Vienna Philharmonic, on 28 October 1935 - the conductor was Siegmund von Hausegger (1872-1948) who, 3 years earlier, had demonstrated, for the 1st time, the artistic superiority of Bruckner's own versions by performing the original version of the 9th Symphony - the Schalk version remained the only available one in print. In 1896, 2 years after its premiere, the Schalk version was published by Ludwig Döblinger in Vienna, 1st in an arrangement for piano, 4 hands (D. 2062, by his brother Josef) and, shortly thereafter, in orchestral score (D. 2080) . Later piano arrangements, also published by Döblinger - for piano, 2 hands by August Stradal (1860-1930) , 1903 ; for 2 pianos, 8 hands by Heinrich von Bocklet (1850-1926) , also 1903 - were also based on Schalk's version.

Compared with Bruckner's own version of the Symphony, Schalk's proves to have frequent and form-disfiguring cuts - most catastrophically in the Finale, the length of which is reduced by almost 25 %. Many passages were re-orchestrated and, in extreme cases (e.g. , at the beginning of the Finale) , even recomposed. In contrast to the version of the 9th Symphony produced by Ferdinand Löwe, or the one of the 4th Symphony by Löwe and Franz Schalk, the latter's work on the 5th Symphony does not seem to follow any particular desire to « Wagnerize » Bruckner's sound world. In fact, the alterations often seem to be simply unmotivated, except perhaps by a desire to simplify the work. This process of simplification affects not just its length and complexity but its affective world as well. Consider the concluding peroration of the Finale : Bruckner conceived it as a chorale prelude in which the weight of the brass is balanced by string parts that, in their lively figurations, add an astonishing lightness, even weightlessness, to the overall impression. Here, as so often in Bruckner, one recognizes him as a true inheritor of the Franz Schubert legacy. Bass tuba and low-string contribute a hint of march character, but their dotted anapests are held in check by the dotted dactyls in the woodwinds. This singularly proficient balancing act (which, unfortunately, escapes the notice of most of the conductors of the work) is flatted over in the Schalk version until only the march remains, and served-up with the coarsest martial trappings (piccolo trills, extra percussion) besides.

Why, then, re-introduce this by no means authentic and, in part artistically miscarried version, to public attention ? One justification should be convincing to all reasonable observers : even though the Schalk version is authentic, it was still the true and only experience of the work that the listening public had for more than 40 years. To wish it away would be an inhuman act of history cleansing. Recently, other voices in the musical world have found other reasons to not only save it from obscurity but even to promote it. We now know, for instance, that Bruckner did not always accept the changes made by Ferdinand Löwe and the Schalk brothers with reluctance, and that the ideal versions of several works of Bruckner's will, forever, remain mirages. But more ominously : several of the representatives of the Brucknerian « ad fontes » movement were motivated by German nationalist cultural-political attitudes, and worse ones besides ; and we now know, beyond all doubt, as Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt observes, that critical editions of Bruckner's music were produced, in part, in order to cleanse them (so to speak) of the influence of « hyper-cultivated city dwellers » , to use Max Auer's turn of phrase, by which he meant : « Jews » . (One should also admit that, even in the « critical editions » of the Bruckner Society, editorial decisions were made according to judgments motivated by personal taste ; the version of the 8th Symphony by Robert Haas (1886-1960) is probably the most notable example of this. A shame, because Haas' intrusions are, for the most part, musically sensible ones. In any case, the 2 critical editions of this 5th Symphony - by Haas (1935) and the post-War edition (1951) by Leopold Nowak (1904-1991) - are nearly perfectly identical. It should go without saying that Bruckner is hardly guilty of the misuse of his music long after his death, and one should also admit that not every proponent of textual authenticity was a German nationalist or a Nazi. Striving for authenticity was, after all, a leading characteristic of modernism. To regard a performance of the Schalk version as a kind of « denazification » (as James Östreich does, in a 1995 essay in the « New York Times ») is, to put it mildly, perverse ; and Bryan Gilliams's suggestion that the Schalk version moves Bruckner's thought world away from Richard Wagner and toward Franz Schubert is, at best, an act of revisionism for revisionism's sake.

Recordings of the Schalk version of the 5th Symphony are easy enough to find. In contrast to other conductors, Hans Knappertsbusch (1888-1965) always held fast to the inauthentic versions of the Symphonies, and 2 of his performances are artistically particularly noteworthy : a 1956 studio recording for « Decca » with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (re-edited on CD, in 1995, as « Decca » : 448 582) , and a concert performance, from 19 March 1959, with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra (released by several companies, but best heard on « Music & Arts » : 1028, 1998 ; or « Music & Arts » : 1105, 2002) . In the digital era, the American conductor, musicologist, promoter of out-of-the-way repertoire and College President Leon Botstein has recorded, in 1998, the Schalk version of the 5th Symphony with the London Philharmonic Orchestra (on « Telarc » : 80509) .

Anton Bruckner composed his 5th Symphony, between 1875 and 1878. During this period, in the face of stern opposition from Eduard Hanslick, he was vying for and eventually appointed to a post as lecturer in harmony and counterpoint at the University of Vienna. It has been speculated that his particular concern with these learned musical matters at this time explains the often extreme contrapuntal textures in the Symphony - especially, the massive double fugue of the Finale.

Bruckner only heard his 5th Symphony performed on 2 pianos. He was too sick to attend the orchestral premiere under the baton of his student, Franz Schalk, in Graz on 8 April, 1894. For the performance Schalk had prepared a much abbreviated new score with a massive re-orchestration including the addition of an extra brass ensemble to accompany the chorale in the Coda of the last movement. This score was printed by Ludwig Döblinger, in 1896, and remained in use until 1935 when Robert Haas published the « Original Version » as it is preserved in the autograph manuscript. Because the editors of the new score were able to demonstrate that Bruckner was not involved in preparations for 1896 edition, the 5th Symphony was held-up as conclusive evidence that the manuscript versions more accurately represented Bruckner's intentions and were, therefore, far superior to the 1st prints. Even though, as research has since shown, the evidence is not nearly so conclusive for many of his other works, the new edition of the 5th Symphony served as a prototype of the « pure » Bruckner score. By extension, according to Christa Brüstle, it became a musical symbol of uncontaminated « innate (German) artistic genius » perfectly suited for National-Socialist propaganda of the 1930's. The new score was performed after the consecration ceremony in Regensburg, in 1937, and again, that same year, at the closing of the Nazi Party convention. Schalk's version has all but disappeared.

At least, one major conductor, Hans Knappertsbusch, refused to learn the work any other way, continuing to perform the Schalk version until his death, in 1965. Referring to the Finale which he heard only in this version, the music-critic Theodor Helm wrote :

« Not Bach, not Beethoven, not Wagner had such an inspiration. It is as though the genius of these 3 Masters has been remolded into a new artistic personality which could be none other than Anton Bruckner. »

Anton Bruckner komponierte seine Sinfonie Nr. 5 B-Dur in einem schwierigen Lebensabschnitt, und das Werk schien, vom Pech verfolgt zu werden. Von seiner unvollendeten Neunten abgesehen, war die Fünfte die einzige seiner Sinfonien, die er nie in einer Orchesteraufführung erlebte, und erst 1887, mehr als ein Jahrzehnt nach der Vollendung, wohnte er in Wien einer ersten Darbietung bei - und auch dann nur in einer Fassung für zwei Klaviere, mit Josef Schalk und Franz Zottmann. Die einzige Orchesteraufführung zu seinen Lebzeiten fand 1894 in Graz unter der Leitung seines Schülers Franz Schalk statt, doch inzwischen war die Gesundheit des Komponisten so stark angegriffen, daß er dem Konzert fernbleiben mußte. Auch versagten ihm wohl die Kräfte, um die drastischen Eingriffe Schalks in die Partitur zu verhindern, und die von diesem besorgte Erstausgabe im Jahre 1896, kurz vor Bruckners Tod, wurde durch die unangemessene Neuorchestrierung vieler Passagen (zum Schluß mit einem getrennten Bläserchor hinter der Bühne !) und ebenso ungebührliche Kürzungen (etwa die Streichung von 122 Takten in der Mitte des Finales) entstellt. Die erste Wiener Aufführung (natürlich in der Fassung Schalks) folgte 1898 unter der Leitung Ferdinand Löwes und wurde wohlwollend aufgenommen ; mit der Zeit setzte sich das Werk im Repertoire durch, obwohl die authentische Partitur Bruckners, von Robert Haas redigiert, erst 1937 veröffentlicht wurde. (Die Version Leopold Nowaks von 1951 ist wenig mehr als eine Neuauflage der Haas-Ausgabe.) Heute gilt die Fünfte als eine der herausragenden sinfonischen Leistungen Bruckners, seinen letzten drei Sinfonien (Nr. 7-9) in der Intensität des Ausdrucks und der Erhabenheit ihrer Architektur

Nicht lange nach Abschluß der Urfassung seiner vierten Sinfonie, der Romantischen, nahm Bruckner im Februar 1875 die Arbeit an seiner Fünften auf. Er begann mit dem Adagio, dem zweiten Satz. Die Umstände waren schwierig und deprimierend. Sein Übersiedeln von Linz nach Wien bedauerte er inzwischen als Torheit, denn in der kultivierten Hauptstadt der Donaumonarchie hatte er es schwer, sich gesellschaftlich einzufügen und mit seiner Musik Anklang zu finden. Zudem entnervte es ihn, daß ihn zwei Klavierschülerinnen wegen beleidigenden Verhaltens angezeigt hatten (allem Anschein nach ein Missverständnis - Bruckner wurde später vor Gericht freigesprochen) . Seine Kontakte waren deshalb auf männliche Klavierschüler beschränkt, und zudem stand ihm die Streichung seiner Hilfslehrerstelle an einer Wiener Lehrerbildungsanstalt bevor ; auf sein mageres Salär vom Wiener Konservatorium reduziert, war er gezwungen, sich zu verschulden. Seine Briefe aus dieser Zeit stehen im Zeichen der Depression, und das klagende Oboenthema des Adagios, wahrscheinlich als erste Idee für das Werk zu Papier gebracht, mag sehr wohl ein Schrei aus tiefer Not gewesen sein.

Im Mai 1876 lag die Sinfonie bereits vollständig vor, obwohl diese Originalfassung heute verschollen ist ; Bruckner unterzog das Werk über die nächsten zwei Jahre hinweg einer Überarbeitung, deren Resultat (die Partitur von 1878) uns als einzige Quelle erhalten ist. Die Sinfonie Nr. 5 wirft also im Gegensatz zu den Sinfonien Nr. 1-4 das Dilemma rivalisierender Fassungen mit unterschiedlicher musikalischer Substanz nicht auf. Bruckner widmete das Werk dem damaligen Minister für Cultus und Unterricht, Karl Ritter von Stremayr, in der österreichischen Regierung des Fürsten Adolf von Auersperg.

Alle Sinfonien Bruckners sind mächtig, sodass sich bei jeder Betrachtung das Attribut « monumental » geradezu aufdrängt. Aber die Fünfte ist mächtiger als alle seine vorherigen Sinfonien, und der Verarbeitung ihrer Mittel, der ausladenden Gestaltung der vier Sätze und der Nutzung der Orchesterkräfte verdankt sie auch den Begriff « architektonisch » . Wie eine riesige gotische Kathedrale scheint sich das Werk über seinen Hörern zu erheben, felsenfest erbaut. So wie die Wölbungen, Verflechtungen und rhythmischen Gefüge der überwältigenden Steinmassen einer Kathedrale bringt diese Sinfonie auf intensivste Weise Bruckners meisterhafte Beherrschung des Kontrapunkt zum Ausdruck - ob in den überwiegend polyphonen Strukturen der ersten drei Sätze oder der massiven Fuge mit Choral, die den Hauptteil des Finales bildet. Hier vermittelt uns Bruckner in durch und durch authentischem Orchestergewand seine lange Erfahrung in der Kontrapunktkunst eines Orgelvirtuosen.

Die Fünfte ist auch in anderer Hinsicht bemerkenswert. Das Fugenfinale ist Bruckners einziger sinfonischer Finalsatz dieser Art. Überdies war Bruckner bei dieser Sinfonie mit besonderer Sorgfalt auf die Geschlossenheit der Sätze bedacht. Nicht nur beginnt das Finale damit, daß es die Themen der drei vorausgegangenen Sätze zitiert und auf seinem Höhepunkt ein Thema des Kopfsatzes in sich steigert, sondern durch die Ecksätze (beide in B-Dur) mit der gleichen musikalischen Anfangsbehandlung und die Mittelsätze (beide in D-Moll) mit der gleichen begleitenden Triolenfigur der Streicher wird ein fester Rahmen geschaffen, eine (wenn man so will) tonal-thematische Bogenstruktur.

Nicht zuletzt ist die Fünfte die einzige Bruckner-Sinfonie mit einer formalen Einleitung, während man von seinen Sinfonien sonst nur einige präludische Takte gewohnt ist. Unter der Bezeichnung Adagio beginnt diese Einleitung mit einem gleichmäßig ab- und aufsteigenden Basspizzicato, über dem sich Violinen und Bratschen in ehrfurchtsvoller Harmonie offenbaren. Plötzlich konstatiert das volle Orchester fortissimo und konvulsiv ein Unisonothema, dem der Blechbläserchor geschlossen mit strenger, majestätischer Harmonie entgegentritt. Diese beiden Elemente werden wiederholt. Das Tempo beschleunigt sich mit einer markanten, punktierten Figur, bevor es sich zum ursprünglichen Adagio beruhigt und die Blechbläserpassage (nun durch das volle Orchester) ihre dritte, gewichtigste Erklärung findet. Diese höchst ungewöhnliche Einleitung, mit ihren verschiedenen widersprüchlichen Themen in krasser Gegenüberstellung, lässt bereits die architektonischen Qualitäten des Gesamtwerks erkennen und klingt mit Vogelrufen zwischen Solohorn und Flöte aus.

Nun beginnt der eigentliche Allegro-Satz mit einem unruhigen Thema auf den Violinen und Cellos. Bruckner wechselt nach F-Dur, zur Dominante, und legt ein langes, banges Violinthema mit einer Pizzicato-Begleitung dar, die an den Anfang des Satzes erinnert. Ein wärmeres, lyrischeres Thema erklingt in Des-Dur bei den Holzbläsern, und fortissimo erhebt sich eine ostinate Bassfigur, um das folgende mächtige Orchestertutti zu bestimmen. Diese große Exposition schließt in F-Dur, und die Durchführung beginnt mit der Wiederaufnahme der Einleitungsmusik, wobei die Violin- und Bratschenstimmen (erneut Adagio) diesmal in C-Dur von den Hörnern über dem Basspizzicato vorgetragen werden. Die dramatisch kontrastierenden Themen erklingen erneut in Verbindung mit dem Hauptthema des Allegros, und dann werden die Gedanken sowohl der Einleitung als auch der Exposition eingeflochten, während die Durchführung auf herrlich fesselnde Weise voranschreitet. Hieraus ergibt sich eine ebenso dramatische Reprise, in der die tonalen Beziehungen und Verbindungen der verschiedenen Elemente von Grund auf neu durchdacht werden, bevor die Koda mit dem anfänglichen, nun zum Allegro beschleunigten Pizzicatothema einsetzt. Die vollständige Rückkehr zur Tonika B-Dur, in der dieser Satz begonnen hatte, wird erst mit den erhabenen, triumphalen Schlußakkorden unmissverständlich deklamiert.

Die langsamen Sätze Bruckners sind in der Regel romantisch, elegisch oder andächtig gestimmt ; im Gegensatz dazu gibt sich das Adagio der Fünften als zweiter Satz über weite Strecken enthaltsam, verschlossen, enigmatisch. Der Satz hat eine schlichte Form : zwei kontrastierende Sektionen, die beide mit Modifikationen wiederholt werden, wobei der erste Abschnitt dann noch einmal aufgegriffen wird, um Höhepunkt und Koda zu bilden. Ebenso wie der Kopfsatz beginnt auch das Adagio mit einem Pizzicatoschema, das jedoch mit seinen sechs gleichen Triolen pro Takt einen mysteriösen Gegenrhythmus zu dem 2 / 2-Takt des dolce gespielten Oboenthemas erzeugt, einer exquisiten, ergreifenden und vergeistigten Melodie. Kalt, grau und forschend begegnet diese kunstvoll gewirkte Musik plötzlich dem warmen C-Dur der Kontrastsektion, deren weitherzig singendes, nahezu hymnisches Hauptthema von der vollen Streichergruppe eingeleitet wird. Der Wiederauftritt der ersten Sektion bildet einen klangvollen Höhepunkt, dem sich das Streicherthema noch einmal wunderschön in D-Dur anschließt. Schimmernde Violinfiguren umschließen das letzte Erscheinen der Hauptsektion, die nach einer expressiven Krönung unheilvoll ausklingt, während die untermalenden Pizzicati ihren Gegenrhythmus aufgeben.

Das Scherzo vermittelt den Eindruck kraftvoller Stärke und lässt in kontrapunktischer Gewandheit und rhythmischem Trieb bereits die Rondo-Burleske von Gustav Mahlers Neunter vorausahnen. Wie bei all seinen Scherzos folgt Bruckner aber auch hier der Form eines Miniaturhauptsatzes. Das von den Holzbläsern vorgetragene Hauptthema hat einen gewissen kalten, sorglosen Elan ; das etwas langsamer gehaltene Nebenthema ist ein österreichischer Ländler, ein munterer aber schwerer Walzer, angeführt von den Streichern. Beide Themen entwickeln sich in einem wilden Tanz, der auf seinem Gipfel mit einem wiederholten D-Dur-Akkord triumphiert. Unter Anleitung der hartnäckig vom Horn akzentuierten Holzbläser präsentiert sich daraufhin im selben Tempo das Trio in B-Dur. Dieser bukolische Tanz erinnert in seiner Launigkeit an Mendelssohn, obwohl er kurz vor dem Ende von der Posaune barsch unterbrochen wird. Es folgt eine genaue Rekapitulation des Scherzos.

Ebenso wie der Kopfsatz weist auch das Finale eine Adagio-Einleitung auf - und wie bereits erwähnt, greift es die Anfangsmusik der Sinfonie getreu auf. Dem Beispiel der Einleitung zum Kopfsatz folgend, werden auch hier gegensätzliche Themen miteinander konfrontiert, wobei es sich in diesem Fall um die Hauptthemen der ersten beiden Sätze handelt. Der Stoff wird untersucht und für unzulänglich befunden (Bruckner orientiert sich dabei zweifellos am Beginn des Finales von Beethovens Neunter) : Jedes Thema wird von der Soloklarinette mit einer zweifelnden Sechsen-Phrasen-Phrase, die um eine Oktave abfällt und wieder aufsteigt, zunächst begrüßt, dann aber abgelehnt. Nach dem Wiederauftritt des ergreifenden Oboenthemas aus dem zweiten Satz stimmen zwei Klarinetten unisono diese Sechsen-Phrasen-Phrase an, die sich nunmehr als die Eröffnungsfigur eines nachhaltigen, aus den Cellos und Kontrabässen aufsteigenden Fugenthemas erweist. Der Hauptsatz ist jedoch eine Fusion aus Fugen- und Sonatenform, und das Fugenthema, das in einer vollen Fugenexposition vorgestellt wird, entspricht dem Hauptthema des Sonatensatzes.

Die Fugenexposition bricht ab, und ein (nicht-fugales) lyrisches Thema in Des-Dur (das Nebenthema des Satzes) wird von den Violinen vorgetragen. Eine stürmische Überleitung, basierend auf der abfallenden Oktavenfigur, führt zu einem grandiosen Blechbläserchoral, der von den Streichern weich wiederholt wird ; danach bringen die Streicher und Pauken auf engelhafte Weise den ersten Teil des Satzes pianissimo zum Abschluß. Die folgende Durchführung erweist sich als vollentwickelte Doppelfuge, in der das Choralthema (nun von der Blechbläserharmonie befreit) als Hauptthema auftritt, während das pointierte, aus der Sechsen-Phrasen-Figur abgeleitete Motiv die Rolle des Nebenthemas übernimmt.

Die Fuge ist mit erstaunlichem kontrapunktischen Geschick und dramatischen Instinkt ausgearbeitet. Auf ihrem Höhepunkt verbinden sich die beiden Themen im vollen Orchester, und dieser Moment markiert auch den Beginn einer Reprise. Das lyrische Thema kehrt in F-Dur zurück, abermals gefolgt von einer stürmischen Überleitung, aus der wir jetzt das Hauptthema des Kopfsatzes heraushören - ein weiterer unerwarteter Kunstgriff, mit dem Bruckner die Gesamtstruktur zu einer in sich schlüssigen und reflektierenden Konstruktion bindet. In der Koda baut sich die Musik auf der Basis des ersten Fugenthemas unaufhaltsam auf, von anderen Ideen ergänzt und konfrontiert, bis der mächtige Choral (majestätisch vergrößert und im Blech voll harmonisiert) über den Rhythmen des Hauptthemas ertönt, um die sinfonische Argumentation Bruckners auf derart glorreiche und zwingende Weise abzusichern, daß kein Widerspruch möglich ist.

Anton Bruckner hat seine Fünfte Symphonie zwischen 14. Februar 1875 und 16. Mai 1876 komponiert, zwischen Mai 1877 und 4. Januar 1878 umgearbeitet, und bis 1887 sporadisch weiter geändert. Trotzdem liegt in diesem Fall (und im Gegensatz zu den ersten vier und der achten seiner nummerierten Symphonien) nur eine einzige von Bruckner stammende Fassung vor. Bruckner hat sie nur einmal gehört, und zwar in einer Bearbeitung für zwei Klaviere von Josef Schalk (1857-1900). Diese sozusagen vorläufige Uraufführung fand am 20. April 1887 in Wien vor einem begeisterten Publikum statt, gespielt haben Josef Schalk und Franz Zottmann (1858-1909). Wegen der Länge und Schwierigkeit der Symphonie stand ihre Aufnahme ins Orchesterprogramm noch lange danach in Frage. So erlaubte der Komponist die öffentliche Aufführung von Schalks Bearbeitung erst nach vielen langwierigen Proben, und die Erinnerungen von Friedrich Klose (1862-1942), der dieser beiwohnte, widersprechen auf erstaunliche Weise dem typischen Bild von Bruckner als schüchternem, bescheidenen Menschen, der sich leicht gegen die eigenen Interessen überreden ließ. Die Bearbeitung, die Schalk für dieses Konzert fertigstellte, gilt heute als verschollen, entsprach aber wohl Bruckners eigener, endgültiger Fassung des Werks.

Erst 1894 erklang die Fünfte Symphonie zum ersten Mal in einem Orchesterkonzert, und zwar in Graz, wo Josef Schalks jüngerer Bruder Franz (1863-1931), ebenfalls ein Schüler Bruckners, Kapellmeister des Grazer « Theaters am Stadtpark » war. In der 1922 von August Göllerich Junior (1859-1923) begonnenen, weitgehend von Max Auer (1880-1962) verfassten und 1937 abgeschlossene Mammutbiografie des Komponisten berichtet Auer, Schalk habe am Ende des Finale einen zusätzlichen Bläserchor einsetzen lassen, weil die übrigen Bläser « gegen Schluss des Finale physisch nicht mehr imstande waren, die unerhörten Steigerungen herauszubringen ». Bruckner habe sogar (so Auer) seine Einwilligung dazu gegeben. Das ist durchaus möglich, es fehlen freilich entsprechende Beweise. Es lässt sich auch nicht feststellen, ob Schalk schon während der Vorbereitung auf die Uraufführung die zahlreichen weiteren Änderungen unternahm, die im Erstdruck der Partitur erscheinen. Auf jeden Fall erlebte die Uraufführung der Fünften Symphonie am 9. April 1894 einen großartigen Erfolg, mit « jubelndem, nicht endenwollendem Beifall » nach jedem Satz. Eine erfreuliche Bestätigung für einen Komponisten, der in Wien sterbensnah lag, und eine große Ehre für eine Provinzstadt - aber nicht gerade der Anfang eines Siegeszugs durch die Konzertsäle der Welt. Im folgenden Jahr dirigierte Ferdinand Löwe (1863-1925) das Werk in Budapest, wo es « ziemlich unverstanden blieb », möglicherweise ein weiterer Beweis dafür, daß damals Bruckners musikalisches Welt alles andere als universell galt.

Erst beim überwältigenden Erfolg einer Aufführung des Münchner Kaim-Orchesters (dem Vorgänger der heutigen Münchner Philharmoniker) unter der Leitung von Löwe in Wien am 1. März 1898 hat die Fünfte Symphonie in der deutschsprachigen Musikwelt richtig Fuß gefaßt. Zwar blieben die Vierte, Siebte, Achte, und Neunte Symphonien die meistgespielten, aber es fehlte seitdem nicht an bedeutenden Aufführungen. Drei Jahre später wurde die Fünfte Symphonie in den USA zum ersten Mal aufgeführt (27. September 1901, Boston), und 1931 hat Bruno Walter mit diesem Werk seine lebenslange Beschäftigung mit den Symphonien Bruckners begonnen, als er bei den Salzburger Festspielen für den erkrankten Franz Schalk einsprang.

Bis zur Uraufführung der Originalfassung am 28. Oktober 1935 durch die Wiener Philharmoniker - dirigiert hat Sigmund von Hausegger (1872-1948), der drei Jahre vorher mit seiner Uraufführung der Originalfassung der Neunten Symphonie zum ersten Mal die künstlerische Überlegenheit von Bruckners eigenen Fassungen bewies - blieb die Schalk-Fassung der einzig erhältliche Druck der Fünften Symphonie. Zwei Jahre nach deren Uraufführung, also 1896, erschien sie bei Döblinger in Wien, anfangs in einer Bearbeitung für Klavier vierhändig (D. 2062, von seinem Bruder Josef) und kurz darauf in Partitur (D. 2080). Späteren, sowohl bei Döblinger erschienenen Klavierfassungen - für Klavier zweihändig von August Stradal (1860-1930), 1903; für zwei Klaviere zu acht Händen von Heinrich von Bocklet (1850-1926) , 1903 - liegt auch die Schalk-Fassung der Symphonie zugrunde.

Verglichen mit Bruckners eigener Fassung der Symphonie erweist die von Schalk zahlreiche, oft formverstümmelnde Kürzungen - am katastrophalsten im Finale, das insgesamt um etwa ein Viertel gekürzt wurde. Viele Stellen wurden uninstrumentiert und in extremen Fällen (zum Beispiel am Anfang des Finale) sogar umkomponiert. Im Gegensatz zu der Fassung der Neunten Symphonie von Ferdinand Löwe oder der Vierten Symphonie von Löwe und Franz Schalk scheint die Arbeit des Letzteren an der Fünften Symphonie nicht auf dem Wunsch zu beruhen, Bruckners Klangwelt zu « wagnerisieren ». Oft kommen die Änderungen einfach nur unmotiviert daher, es sei denn, es sei Absicht gewesen, das Werk zu vereinfachen. Dieser Vereinfachungsprozess betrifft nicht nur seine Länge und Komplexität, sondern auch deren Affektwelt. Man betrachte zum Beispiel den kunst-voll weitschweifenden Schluss des Finale. Bruckner hat ihn als Choralvorspiel konzipiert, in dem das Gewicht der Bläser ausgeglichen wird durch Streicherpartien, deren Belebtheit eine erstaunliche Leichtigkeit (wenn nicht gar Gewichtslosigkeit) beitragen - auch hier, wie sonst so oft, erweist sich Bruckner als wahrer Erbe Schuberts. Basstuba und tiefe Streicher spenden zwar einen Hauch vom Marsch, aber ihre punktierten Anapäste werden durch die punktierten Daktylen der Holzbläser in Schach gehalten. Dieser seltsam gekonnte (und leider von den wenigsten Dirigenten überhaupt wahrgenommene) Balanceakt wird in der Schalk-Fassung plattgewälzt, bis nur der Marsch übrigbleibt, wobei auch die größten Marscheffekte (Pikkolotriller, zusätzliches Schalzeug) nicht fehlen.

Warum also diese weder authentische noch künstlerisch gelungene Fassung wieder an die Öffentlichkeit bringen ? Auch wenn die Fassung unecht ist, war sie für das Publikum für mehr als 40 Jahre das echte und einzige Erlebnis des Werks. Die Schalk-Fassung ist schlicht nicht wegzudenken ohne eine Leugnung der Musikgeschichte. In neuerer Zeit haben andere Stimmen in der Musikwelt Gründe ganz anderer Art gefunden, diese Fassung nicht nur vor der Vergessenheit zu bewahren, sondern gar zu pflegen. Wir wissen zum Beispiel heute, daß Bruckner die Änderungen von Ferdinand Löwe und den Gebrüdern Schalk nicht immer nur widerwillig akzeptierte, und bei manch einem Werk Bruckners wird die ideale Fassung immer eine Fata Morgana bleiben. Aber noch verhängnisvoller : Viele der Vertreter der Brucknerschen ad fontes-Bewegung wurden von deutschnationalen und (noch) zweifelhafteren kulturpolitischen Einstellungen motiviert, und es steht jetzt ausser Zweifel, wie Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt beobachtet, daß die Veröffentlichung von kritischen Ausgaben zum Teil geschah, um Bruckners Werke vom Einfluss « überkultivierter Städtler » (Max Auer) - sprich Juden - zu bereinigen. (Man muß zugeben, daß auch in der « kritischen Ausgaben » der Bruckner-gesellschaft oft nach persönlichem Gutdünken entschieden wurde ; die Fassung der Achten Symphonie von Robert Haas (1886-1960) ist wohl das hervorstechendste Beispiel dafür - was schade ist, denn seine Eingriffe sind meistens musikalisch sinnvoll. Die zwei kritischen Ausgaben dieser Fünften Symphonie - von Robert Haas (1935) und die Nachkriegsausgabe (1951) durch seinen Nachfolger Leopold Nowak (1904-1991) - stehen jedoch in nahezu vollkommener Übereinstimmung. Selbst-verständlich ist Bruckner selbst keineswegs schuld daran, daß sein Werk lange nach seinem Tod missbraucht wurde, und freilich war nicht jeder Verfechter der Authentizität entweder Deutschnationaler oder Nazi, galt doch die Suche nach Authentizität als eines der Hauptcharakteristiken des Modernismus überhaupt. Eine Aufführung der Schalk-Fassung als eine Art « Entnazifizierung » zu charakterisieren (wie James Oestreich in einer 1995 erschienenen Kritik in der « New York Times » schreibt) ist, gelinde gesagt, widersinnig ; und Bryan Gilliams Hinweis, die Schalk-Fassung rückt Bruckners Gedankenwelt weg von Wagner und in die Nähe von Schubert, ist bestenfalls Revisionismus um des Revisionismus willen.

Aufnahmen von der Schalk-Fassung der Fünften Symphonie sind leicht genug zu finden. In Gegensatz zu anderen Dirigenten hat Hans Knappertsbusch (1888-1965) immer an den unauthentischen Fassungen der Symphonien festgehalten, und zwei von seinen Aufführungen zeichnen sich künstlerisch besonders aus : eine Studioaufnahme für Decca aus dem Jahre 1956 mit den Wiener Philharmonikern (jüngstens auf CD : Decca 448 581, 1995) und eine Konzertaufnahme vom 19. März 1959 mit den Münchner Philharmonikern (von mehreren Firmen in Handel gebracht ; qualitätsmässig am besten auf Music and Arts 1028, 1998 ; und Music and Arts 1105, 2002) . In der Digital-Ära hat der amerikanische Dirigent, Musikwissenschaftler, Verfechter ausgefallener Orchesterwerke und Universitätspräsident Leon Botstein die Schalk-Fassung der Fünften Symphonie mit dem London Philharmonic Orchestra aufgenommen (Telarc 80509, 1998) .

Yet, another Bruckner 5th ? Not exactly. The performance, which has its own distinction, comes with an 80 minute bonus disc of unusual quality and interest. Not since the halcyon days of Antony Hopkins « Talking About Music » has there been a commentary as lucid, as approachable and, yet, as musically satisfying as this.

Devised by Zander and his co-producer David Saint-George, it is a multi-faceted essay. Mapping the Symphony has pride of place and is superbly done. It also thrives on a rich array of music examples tucked with consummate skill in, around and beneath the narrative.

Another distinctive touch is his breathing new life into the old cathedral analogy. The CD comes with a foldaway leaflet. On one side is a cathedral floor plan, on the other the structure of the 5th Symphony laid over that same plan. Nor does Zander stop there. His profound and often moving remarks on time, space, spiritual struggle and spiritual renewal grow naturally out of this.

His trump card is his father, Walter Zander, who died in 1993, at the age of 95. In the summer of 1918, while fighting on the Russian front, Walter was sent a score of Bruckner's 5th Symphony by his mother. His letters home with their comments on what the music meant to him have only recently reappeared. These, too, have been woven into the narrative, and very remarkable they are.

Despite his father's urging, Zander did not study the Symphony until he was past 60. Antony Hopkins once said that some of his best scripts were written on works he knew little about before writing. Zander seems to have been similarly blessed, creating a remarkable narrative and complementing it with a performance of great lucidity and drive. If the finely geared playing seems a touch lightweight in places, turning-up the level of the beautifully judged Watford Coliseum recording helps bulk out the vertical dimension.

The work, which is in 4 movements, was written in 1875 and 1876. Bruckner revised it again, in 1878, but never heard the work performed by an Orchestra. It was published in 1896 with the help of Franz Schalk, who conducted the 1st performance. For the published version, large sections were re-orchestrated, the last movement was cut extensively, and a brass choir was added at the end to strengthen the closing bars. At the 1st performance, the added brass were off-stage, but the score explicitly calls for the new brass choir to be « behind the Orchestra on a raised platform ». Either the off-stage placement did not work or there was no room. Some Bruckner devotees may wince at this version, but I believe it makes a fantastic case for the work. In this version, the work should be heard more often and recorded.

The 1st movement is nominally in B-flat major. This can be said because the 1st movement may be one of the most interesting and powerful experiments in the relationship of harmony to the conventions of Symphonic 1st movement Sonata form. The work has a slow introduction (the only one of its kind in Bruckner), which resists a firm tonality and drifts through G-flat into A until the Allegro. But even in the Allegro, tonality always seems to shift, together with wonderful new thematic and rhythmic materials and periodic breaks in the surface continuity. C major, F minor, E major, G minor, B-flat minor, E-flat major-among others - all are explored as this grand, nearly improvisatory harmonic journey makes its way to its massive end, which asserts the B-flat major. This movement is one of the most innovative in the 19th Century literature and bears the marks of Bruckner's genius in using harmonic colour and unexpected relationships to frame the emotionally powerful but intricate and subtle musical structure, in which the matter of a defining tonality is challenged.

The 2nd movement is in D minor and is marked by a lyrical clarity achieved; in part, by simple cross rhythms. The 2nd subject is in C major. Bruckner's melodic genius is evident throughout. The closing bars are particularly notable with the D pedal in the timpani and the quiet close in D major. The 3rd movement Scherzo is in D minor and is typical Bruckner. There is a slower 2nd theme, reminiscent of the Austrian « Ländler » dance. The transition to the Trio, which is not in 3/4 time, is an example of Bruckner's harmonic usage. The F-sharp of a D major triad becomes used as a G-flat. The audience hears the same sustained note from one context immediately become the basis of another unrelated context without warning. In this movement, particularly the Trio, Bruckner's humor and his relationship to Franz Schubert and the 18th Century are audible.

The last movement, after the introduction, is built around the writing of fugues. There is also a stunning chorale. Throughout this massive, multi-subject contrapuntal movement (even in this shorter form), Bruckner's dramatic sense and sonic imagination are breathtaking. For the listener, there will always be 2 outstanding aspects: the constant influence of the sound of the pipe organ on Bruckner's use of the Orchestra and the utterly original attitude to the creation of musical continuities. A majestic structure is built around blocks of sound, closely interrelated musical ideas, and carefully organized counterpoint - all placed in discrete and harmonically unexpected sequences. Bruckner creates his own sense of time and, therefore, the inner journey for the listener, it is likely that the essence of that journey, for Bruckner, was the celebration of faith and a sense of awe; and the expression of the variety and majesty of God's creation through sound.

Franz Schalk apparently carried-out his own revision in 1892-1893, in anticipation of performing the work in Graz. Despite his efforts, the work's monumental difficulty required a postponement of the premiere to permit another 6 months of rehearsals. By the time of the 1st performance, on April 9, 1894, Bruckner was too ill to attend. Several elements of Schalk's revision undoubtedly reflect the exigencies of prospective performance with his provincial theatre band. Despite the trials, reports of the premiere's success gratified the ailing composer, who wrote to Schalk, on April 12 :

« I should like to express my deep admiration for your extraordinary artistry and my everlasting gratitude for all you have done for me. You will undoubtedly go on to win the fame you so richly deserve. May God bless you, noble artist and man of genius that you are. Please convey my sincere thanks and profound admiration to the highly-esteemed management and all the excellent performers. Words fail to describe my disappointment at being unable to attend. »

With these words of praise ringing in his ears, it is hardly surprising that Schalk elected to use his revision as basis for the published edition. Schalk later stated that he received Bruckner's specific permission for the augmented brass in the final chorale. This addition is a masterful arrangement, using the (by then, fatigued) orchestral brass to mark the rhythm, while a fresh section of 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, and tuba carries the chorale tune.

Other retouchings Schalk made in the revision arose from a different motivation - his attempt to expand the tonal palette of Bruckner's woodcut-like scoring. We, therefore, hear such oddities as string material handed over to the clarinets (bars 156-159 in the opening movement) , or the piccolo piercing through the orchestral fabric (bars 199 and 482, same movement) . Thematic re-configurings such as the complete inversion of the string figures, at letter G in the opening movement, are merely inexplicable. The substantial cut in the Scherzo reprise also tends to upset the balance between movements. In the absence of documented evidence to the contrary, we must assume that Bruckner never saw these changes until the score was published, shortly before his death.

Bruckner 5th Symphony revised by Franz Schalk

(Takeo Noguchi)

The reviser of the 5th Symphony, Franz Schalk (1863-1931) , was born in Vienna, and was one of Bruckner's favourite pupils along with his brother Josef Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe (who revised the 4th and 9th Symphonies) . Bruckner's 5th Symphony was substantially completed by 1878. Franz Schalk, a conductor of the Opera House in Graz, did not decide to play this Symphony until 1893. He made a number of revisions in Bruckner's original, in order to perform it for a premiere in 1894. The Haas-Nowak edition, which was published later, was also based on the foregoing original, and is in wide use at present.

Let's talk about the organization of musical instruments in the 5th Symphony. In the revised edition, a 3rd flute (and a piccolo played by the player of the 3rd flute) and a contra fagott are added to the wood instrument section. In the coda of the 4th movement, the separate choral-theme is splendidly played by another group of brass instruments (i.e. , 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, and 1 tuba) and metal percussion (1 cymbal and 1 triangle) .

The overall orchestration has been extensively varied. Further, designation for time and tempo have been also modified or added. Especially, what surprise us is that a total of 100 or more bars have been boldly deleted from the 4th movement. Thus, some people consider that the recapitulation indispensable in the Sonata form is substantially ignored in the revised edition.

Bruckner died in 1896, 2 years after the premiere using the revised edition, and Schalk's revised edition was also published in 1896, in Vienna. The original edition under Robert Haas's revision was 1st published in 1937. Schalk's revised edition has not been used except for by a few conductors (e.g. , Hans Knappertsbusch) since the publication of Haas original edition. At present, Schalk's revised edition is widely considered as being a result of the meddling of one of the composer's pupils.

However, this point of view seems rather incomprehensible to me. This is because I do not think that Schalk revised the composition poorly. Particularly, when I listened to the Coda in the 4th movement, I thought that Schalk's revised edition was much better than the original edition. In the Coda, the number of brass instruments is doubled compared with that in the original edition. This enables the chorales and the fine accompaniment motif to be equally emphasized in a tolerant manner. I was not satisfied with the original edition in which the foregoing elements were no more vivid or clearer than those in the revised edition. Thus, I had been frustrated until I heard the record based on the revised edition. According to Leopold Nowak, Bruckner himself agreed to Schalk's request to increase the number of brass instruments, which I think very reasonable. The 4th movement ends with continuous B-flat major tonic sounds which are not in unison as in the original edition. I am so delighted with this that I want to shout :

With respect to my foregoing opinion, those who are very enthusiastic about the original edition would contend that the revised edition is not Bruckner's but Schalk's. However, such insistence does not surprise me at all.

I wonder whether it is possible to prove that the original on which the Haas-Nowak original edition was based was actually completely finished by Bruckner alone. No one can prove that Bruckner finished it without being affected by the opinions of others. Further, there are more highly-acclaimed composers whose compositions that have been arranged by other musicians are evaluated than their originals. Why is not this applicable to Bruckner ?

I would like to insist that both the original edition and the revised edition be played and evaluated. This broad-minded view has not originated from a scholarly interest in searching for the pure-bloodedness of the original, but from the following 2 reasons.

One reason is the historical implication of Schalk's revised edition. It should be noted that Bruckner's 5th Symphony, based on only the revised edition, was in circulation for about 40 years prior to the publication of the original edition in the 1930's. The conductors who were active in the 1st half of the 20th Century played the 5th Symphony based on Schalk's revised edition and were influenced by this edition. This is a historical fact, regardless of the quality of the revised edition. I cannot help but conclude that it is unreasonable and unnatural that at present, the 5th Symphony is mainly being played based on the original edition.

The other reason is related to the musical importance of Schalk's revised edition. Reviewing the scores vertically, i.e., in view of sounds, the revised edition is not as strong as the original edition but is soft and elegant as a whole. This is because very careful consideration is given to balancing respective musical instruments. For instance, this is clearly proved by the strong sounds produced in the « arpeggio » in the introduction of the 1st movement. Linear brass instruments such as trumpets and trombones are moderate while wood instruments and strings are conspicuous. When the brass instruments are used, their number is reduced, or their dynamics are reduced compared with the other instruments. In the famous fugue of the 4th movement, the main voice is specified to be played « forte » while the other voices are specified to be played « mezzo-forte ». In Schalk's revised edition, brass instruments are added to the wood instruments so as to play a part which is played by either wood instruments or brass in the original edition (e.g., in the part where the choral main-theme is 1st played in the 4th movement). Further, wood instruments accompany strings (e.g., at the beginning of the 1st movement). In other words, Schalk revised the original so as not to make the sounds monotonous.

When reviewing the composition horizontally, the following features are noted : instruments are deliberately changed in long phrases (e.g., the 1st theme in the 2nd movement), and the combination of instruments is changed when repeating a motif. We can say that Schalk revised the original to make the composition more colourful than the original edition. It is new and fresh for the timpani to be played with a motif rhythm as well as with tremolo. Time and tempo are finely varied in accordance with the concept of the composition. For instance, in the 2nd theme of the 1st movement ; 2/2 time is changed to 4/4 time. At the beginning of the 2nd movement in place of 2/2 time, 4/6 time is used for strings, and 4/4 time is used for wind instruments. In the 2nd theme, all the instruments are in 4/4 time so as to be at a slow tempo.

Franz Schalk's revised edition is very interesting in view of the arrangement. It may be criticized in view of the essence of Bruckner's music as believed by a number of Bruckner enthusiasts, but it is very well-organized in view of the orchestration. Some of Schalk's time and tempo requirements are frequently employed when the 5th Symphony is played according to the original edition. This proves that Schalk's revision is justified in that respect.

In other words, Schalk's revised edition features score which is made such that the Symphony can be effectively played by Orchestras. Therefore, I ask that you frankly listen to the revised edition without pre-conception and prejudice.

It is often said that the essence of Bruckner's sounds were deeply influenced by the sounds of organ. If so, it would be better to play his compositions using the organ. When an Orchestra is intending to play the composition, a score which is thoroughly revised for the Orchestra cannot be ignored. In this respect, we can consider that the revised edition improved it rather than changed it for the worse.

The extensive deletion of the 4th movement may be unacceptable to those who consider that the original edition is the ultimate standard. A number of researchers as well as Leopold Nowak have pointed-out that the deletion of the recapitulation of the 1st and 2nd themes has destroyed the Sonata form of the 4th movement.

However, it is also considered that since the appropriately arranged Coda repeats the main-themes (except for the 2nd theme) a number of times, Schalk might have thought that the Coda resembles the recapitulation. I myself do not think that the 4th movement in Schalk's revised edition is insufficient or poor in terms of form. In fact, I believe that the exposition, the development and the magnificent Coda constitute an excellent 3 part form. Whether or not, it is in the Sonata form, the 4th movement impresses us as if a number of rivulets gradually merge into one large river.

The foregoing comments are simply my personal views on Schalk's revised edition of Bruckner's 5th Symphony. But it is certain that Schalk intended to revise Bruckner's original for his Master's good. It is very difficult for me to believe that Schalk, who was musically and emotionally influenced by his Master, would have dared to make meaningless revisions while his Master had been alive. Perhaps, we should ask ourselves whether or not we understand Bruckner better than Schalk, at that time.

In any case, we should make efforts so that compositions are frequently played and reviewed on the basis of both of the original editions and the revised editions. This is not limited to Bruckner's 5th Symphony. This publication is intended to promote thinking along those lines.

The Japanese 1st performance of the Bruckner's 5th Symphony revised by Schalk was in July 1996, in Tokyo (Furtwängler Institute Tokyo Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Takeo Noguchi) , the live-recording CD of that day was produced (SEELENKLANG : SEK-1) and, in 1998, Leon Botstein recorded this edition for CD with the London Philharmonic Orchestra (TELARC : 80599) . I hope that these performances might be a symptom for the re-evaluation of the Schalk's edition.

I owe this publication to many people. In particular, I express my gratitude to Doctor Günther Brosche and Mrs. Elisabeth Wagner of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek Musiksammlung » , in Vienna, for supplying copies of the 1st edition (Ludwig Doblinger Verlag, 1896) and for the permission to reprint this for the 1st time in Japan.

Karl Ritter von Stremayr

Dédiée à l'un de ses protecteurs à qui il doit sa nomination à l'Université de Vienne : Karl Ritter von Stremayr, personnalité politique autrichienne et Ministre de l'éducation. Il sera ministre-président d'Autriche, du 15 février au 12 août 1879.

Né le 30 octobre 1832 à Graz, Karl Ritter von Stremayr, y étudie le droit puis entre au service du gouvernement. Par la suite, il devient procureur-général et doctorant à l'Université. En 1848-1849, il est fait membre du Parlement de Francfort. En 1868, il est nommé conseiller au Ministère de l'intérieur. De 1870 à 1879, il est nommé Ministre de l'instruction publique alors qu'il entraînera l'abrogation du Concordat de 1855. Il est nommé 9e ministre-président à la tête du conseil de Cisleithanie, après son départ du ministère d'Auersperg en 1879. Il entre au cabinet de son successeur Eduard Taaffe (le 11e vicomte Taaffe et 10e ministre-président de Cisleithanie) comme Ministre de la Justice mais démissionne en 1880. Il siégea à la Chambre autrichienne des Lords en 1889. Il sera nommé vice-président de la Cour suprême d'Autriche avant de succéder à Anton von Schmerling comme président, après sa démission en 1891. Stremayr prendra sa retraite en 1899. Il meurt le 22 juin 1904 à Pottschach.

The Austrian statesman Karl Ritter von Stremayr was born on 30 October 1832 in Graz and died on 22 June 1904 in Pottschach. He served as the 9th Minister-President of Cisleithania.

Stremayr studied law in Graz. He entered the government service and, subsequently, was Attorney-General and docent at the University.

In 1848-1849, he was a member of the Frankfurt Parliament. In 1868, he was appointed councilor in the Ministry of the Interior and, in 1870-1879, was Minister of Public Instruction when he brought about the repeal of the Concordat of 1855. President of the council as the 9th Minister-President of Cisleithania after the going-out of the Auersperg ministry, in 1879. Afterwards, he entered the cabinet of his successor Eduard Taaffe, 11th Viscount Taaffe, 10th Minister-President of Cisleithania, as Minister of Justice, but resigned in 1880. He then was appointed vice-president of the Austrian Supreme Court before succeeding Anton von Schmerling as president after Schmerling's resignation, in 1891.

He retired in 1899. He was called to a seat in the Austrian House of Lords, in 1889.

Karl Ritter von Stremayr (geboren 30. Oktober 1823 in Graz ; gestorben 22. Juni 1904 Pottschach, Niederösterreich) war ein österreichischer Politiker, mehrmaliger Minister sowie Ministerpräsident Cisleithaniens, des kaiserlichen Teils Österreich-Ungarns und Präsident des Obersten Gerichtshofes.

Carl Borromäus Anton Franz Seraph Ritter von Stremayr war Mitglied der adeligen Familie Stremayr und war der Sohn des oberösterreichischen Militär-Feldapothekers Franz-Josef von Stremayr (1793-1843) und dessen Ehefrau Caroline, geborene Rieger (1800-1880) .

Er wurde als erstes von neun Kindern in Graz geboren, wo er auch seine Kinderjahre verbrachte. Als sein Vater 1832 befördert und nach Mantua versetzt wurde und die gesamte Familie dorthin übersiedelte, blieb er im Alter von zehn Jahren bei seinen Großeltern in Graz zurück und besuchte weiterhin das Grazer Gymnasium.

Durch die Beförderung seines Großvaters mit folgender Versetzung nach Görtschach / Klagenfurt besuchte er für ein Jahr die sechste Klasse des Klagenfurter Gymnasiums. Als 1839 sein Großvater starb, übersiedelte seine Großmutter mit ihm wieder zurück nach Graz, wo er die Matura ablegte.

Als Übergang zum Universitätsstudium begann er in Wien mit philosophischen Studien, lernte Italienisch, Französisch und Englisch, später auch Slowenisch und Serbokroatisch und las mit gleichgestimmten Kommilitonen römische und griechische Klassiker.

1841 begann er das Studium der Rechtswissenschaften an der rechts- und staatswissenschaftlichen Fakultät der Universität Graz, da er gemäß einem Wunsch seiner Eltern keine Karriere beim Militär anstreben sollte.

Als 1843 sein Vater und seine Großmutter verstarben, hatte er als ältester Sohn die Erhaltung der Großfamilie zu übernehmen, indem er während seines Studiums Privatunterricht erteilte. Eine seiner Schülerinnen war Bertha Hope, die später seine Frau werden sollte.

Im Herbst 1845 schloß er seine juristischen Studien in Graz ab.

1845 begann er die einjährige Zivil- und Kriminalpraxis beim Magistrat Graz und legte im gleichen Jahr die Rechtsreferendarprüfung in Deutsch und Italienisch beim Appellationsgericht in Klagenfurt mit Auszeichnung ab. Dadurch erfolgte bereits 1846 die Promotion zum « Doctor juris utriusque » und nach beendeter Richteramtspraxis trat er als unbesoldeter Konzeptionspraktikant bei der Kaiserlich-Königlich Finanzprokuratur in Graz ein und wurde am 9. November 1846 in den Staatsdienst übernommen. 1846 absolvierte er die Richteramtsprüfung für Deutsch und Italienisch beim Appellationsgericht in Klagenfurt mit Auszeichnung.

Im Zuge der Märzrevolution wurde er als Jurist ohne sein Mitwirken in der « Grazer Zeitung » für die Wahlen zur Frankfurter Nationalversammlung in Frankfurt vorgeschlagen, hatte zu diesem Zeitpunkt aber nur wenige politische Ambitionen. Als er 1848 in Kindberg in einem Rednerwettbewerb seine im Vergleich zu anderen Rednern gemäßigten und realistischen Ziele vortrug, wurde er zum Abgeordneten der Nationalversammlung gewählt und sofort nach Frankfurt entsandt. In Frankfurt wohnte er den letzten Sitzungen des Vorparlaments und den Vorbesprechungen zur Eröffnung der Nationalversammlung bei. Als jüngstes Mitglied der Versammlung und Jugendschriftführer hat er in der Frankfurter Paulskirche als erster die Rednertribüne betreten, um die Begrüßungsadresse des alten Bundestages an die neue Nationalversammlung zu verlesen. Auf der Suche nach Abgeordneten, die seine Ansichten teilten, schloß er sich dem Württemberger Hof, der liberalen Mitte, an.

Der rege Briefverkehr zwischen ihm und seiner zukünftigen Frau war die Basis für die spätere Eheschließung und schildert seine Begeisterungen und Enttäuschungen als Abgeordneter in Frankfurt. In dieser politischen Atmosphäre, deren Überschwänglichkeit und naive Unkenntnis der politischen Realitäten seiner Jugend entsprach, war er als einer von 586 Abgeordneten ambitioniert tätig, erkannte jedoch sehr bald die Unmöglichkeit der Durchsetzung seiner liberalen Hoffnungen. Als die österreichischen Abgeordneten im April 1849 abberufen wurden, kehrte ein enttäuschter und ernüchterter Stremayr 1849 nach Graz zurück.

Als ehemaliger liberaler Frankfurter Abgeordneter beziehungsweise Revolutionär bekam er das schlecht besoldete Amt eines Konzeptionspraktikanten der steirischen Kammerprokuratur. Erst 1850 wurde durch die Ernennung zum Staatsanwalts-Substituten die finanzielle Basis für eine mögliche Ehe geschaffen, die er am 17. Juni 1850 im Grazer Dom mit Bertha Hope einging. Aus dieser Ehe stammen ein Sohn und fünf Töchter :

Bertha, heiratet 1873 Emil Ritter von Hardt (6 Kinder : Ihren beiden Söhnen wurde die Namensvereinigung « Hardt-Stremayr » genehmigt) .

Anna, im Alter von acht Jahren verstorben.

Antonie, verheiratet mit Premierleutnant Richard Lüders (3 Kinder) , verstarb bei der Geburt des 2. Kindes.

Maria, heiratet nach dem plötzlichen Tod ihrer älteren Schwester Antonie 1878 ihren Schwager Leutnant Richard Lüders (nochmals 3 Kinder) .

Karl, im ersten Lebensjahr verstorben.

Caroline, verheiratet mit Johann Edler von Schemua (kinderlose Ehe) .

Nachdem Stremayr das Amt des öffentlichen Anklägers im Rahmen einer von ihm nicht akzeptierten Verfassung zu führen hatte, waren die reaktionären Vorgesetzten mit Stremayrs Amtsführung nicht zufrieden und er wurde bei jeder Gelegenheit zurückgesetzt. Nachdem drei seiner Brüder die militärische Laufbahn eingeschlagen hatten und seine Schwestern durch Handarbeit zum Haushalte beitrugen, hatte er sich nur mehr um die eigene Familie zu kümmern.

Somit habilitierte er sich als Privatdozent für römisches Recht an der Universität Graz und war als Mitarbeiter, später auch unter Pseudonym als Redakteur, bei der Grazer Zeitung journalistisch tätig.

1860 erkrankten er und seine älteren Töchter Bertha, Anna und Antonie lebensgefährlich an Typhus, was die ganze Familie erneut in große finanzielle Not brachte. Schlimmer waren aber der Tod einer Tochter, wie auch den Tod der Magd und der Wärterin.

Aufgrund der Februarverfassung des Jahres 1861 wurden Wahlen für den Steiermärkischen Landtag ausgeschrieben, zu denen er, noch durch die Krankheit geschwächt, ohne sein Zutun als Kandidat für die Stadt Graz aufgestellt wurde. Er wurde zum Landtagsabgeordneten für die Grazer Vorstädte gewählt und saß die folgenden 18 Jahre im Landtag, darunter neun Jahre als Landesausschuss-Mitglied.

Mit einem Male war er die materiellen Sorgen los und konnte ein neues Arbeitsfeld beginnen, indem er weniger politische als organisatorische und administrative Verbesserungen in der landschaftlichen Verwaltung sowie in den staatlichen Gesundheits- und Bildungsanstalten durchsetzen konnte. Deshalb wurde ihm auch die Leitung der Unterrichtsanstalten des Landes, der Technischen Hochschule am Joanneum und der Landes-Oberrealschule übertragen. Den vielfachen Beschäftigungen als Landesausschuss-Mitglied, Staatsanwalts-Substituten, Zivilreferenten des Landesgerichtes, Privatdozent, Direktionsmitglied der I. steirischen Sparkasse und Staatsprüfungskommissär standen Freud und Leid in der Familie gegenüber : 1863 gebar ihm Bertha ein Zwillingsspaar, aber der Sohn starb nach wenigen Monaten. Dieser Schicksalsschlag lag schwer auf seiner Frau, der ab diesen Zeitpunkt trotz kräftigem Gesundheitszustand die Hände und Füße den Dienst versagten und sie in den Rollstuhl brachten.

Seine administrative Begabungen im steiermärkischen Landtag und in diversen Landesausschüssen blieben nicht verborgen, deswegen wurde er 1868 durch Carl Giskra als Ministerialrat ins Ministerium des Innern berufen.

Dort wurde ihm von Leopold Hasner von Artha im Zuge der Regierungsbildung das Amt des Ministers für Kultus und Unterricht angeboten, das er am 1. Februar 1870 auch annahm. Aber bereits nach wenigen Monaten wurde am 12. April 1870 das Ministerium Hasner (und mit ihm Stremayr) entlassen. Ihm wurde auf seinen Wunsch eine Hofratsstelle am Obersten Gerichts- und Cassationshof gewährt.

Im gleichen Jahr übersiedelte seine Familie, bestehend aus vier Töchtern und seiner Frau, nach Wien.

Überraschend wurde er vom Steiermärkischen Landtag als Abgeordneter des Abgeordnetenhauses in den Wiener Reichsrat entsandt, in dem er sich der Deutschliberalen Partei anschloss.

Bereits am 30. Juni 1870 erfolgte Stremayrs erneute Ernennung zum Minister für Kultus und Unterricht nach Zusicherung des Ministeriums Potocki, die Verfassung nicht anzutasten und ihm in den Fragen seines Ressorts freie Hand zu lassen.

Stremayr trat in Hinblick auf die Verkündung des Dogmas über die Unfehlbarkeit des Papstes für die Aufhebung des Konkordates vom 5. November 1855 ein. Da sich Potocki aber aus religiösen Gründen weigerte, die Vorlage ins Parlament zu bringen, wurde im Kronrat vom 30. Juli 1870 in Anwesenheit des österreichischen Botschafters beim Heiligen Stuhl das Konkordat durch kaiserliches Handschreiben für hinfällig erklärt und der Außenminister mit der formellen Aufhebung beauftragt. Der Kaiser erteilte Stremayr am gleichen Tag den Auftrag, die infolge dieser Änderung nötigen Gesetzesvorlagen für den Reichsrat vorzubereiten.

Am 4. Februar 1871 wurde Stremayr auf seinen Wunsch enthoben und nahm seine Tätigkeit als Hofrat am Obersten Gerichtshof wieder auf.

Nach den Ministerien Potocki, Hohenwart und Holzgethan wurde innerhalb kurzer Zeit das Ministerium Auersperg berufen. Nach Mitarbeit beim Regierungsprogramm erfolgte am 25. November 1871 Stremayrs erneute Ernennung zum Minister für Kultus und Unterricht, welches Amt er diesmal bis zum 12. August 1879 innehatte.

Unter seiner Amtsführung entwickelten sich und andere die Universitäten in Prag und Wien rasch weiter und es wurde eine neue Universität in Czernowitz errichtet. Die Universität Prag wurde noch nicht in eine deutsche und tschechische Universität geteilt und in Wien wurde das Institut für Paläontologie gegründet.

Über sein Verhältnis als Minister zu seinen politischen Freunden meinte Stremayr :

« Das Parteileben bringt es mit sich, daß gar oft nicht das Wohl des Staates, sondern leidiges Parteiinteresse die

Haltung der Abgeordneten im Parlamente bestimmt. Ein Minister aber kann und darf nie und nimmer einer Partei auf diesem Wege folgen. Er muß auch dieser gegenüber seine volle Unabhängigkeit, die Freiheit seiner gewissenhaften Überzeugung wahren, und diese wird nicht selten in seinem Verhältnis zur Krone durch Gründe bestimmt, die er auch seinen Freunden nicht offenbaren kann. »

Die Regelung des Verhältnisses zwischen Staat und Kirche mit weiterer interkonfessioneller Gesetzgebung, der Kulturkampf in Deutschland, der auch für die österreichischen Liberalen große Bedeutung hatte, die Klostersetze und andere brachten oft harte Kämpfe mit sich, die Stremayr so beschrieb :

Daß ihm seine Prinzipien wichtiger waren, als das Amt des Ministers unbedingt zu behalten, kommt auch bei folgendem zum Ausdruck :

Familiär konnte er sich 1873 über die Hochzeiten seiner zwei ältesten Töchter freuen, mußte aber 1876 den Tod einer Tochter bei der Geburt ihres zweiten Kindes miterleben. 1878 heiratete seine dritte Tochter den Witwer nach staatlichem und kirchlichen Dispens vom bestehenden Ehehindernis der Schwägerschaft.

Der Versuch, 1879 mit der Verfassungspartei ein neues Ministerium zu bilden, dem er wieder als Minister für Kultus und Unterricht angehören sollte, misslang und brachte das Ende des Ministeriums Auersperg. Stattdessen wurde Stremayr als Senior der übrigen Minister vom Kaiser die Aufgabe übertragen, als Vorsitzender das Kabinett zu führen. Von 15. Februar bis 12. August 1879 amtierte er als Ministerpräsident der österreichischen Reichshälfte Österreich-Ungarns. Das Ministerium Stremayr sollte jedoch nur als Übergangsregierung bis zum Abschluß der geplanten Reichsratswahlen dienen.

Am 12. August 1879 kam es zur Ernennung zum Justizminister, mit gleichzeitiger Leitung des Ministeriums für Kultus und Unterricht. Das Verhältnis des Ministeriums Taaffe zur Verfassungspartei gestaltete sich immer schwieriger und jeder Schritt zur Versöhnung der widerstrebenden Elemente wurde abgelehnt.

Somit war er zwei Jahre lang Minister für Kultus und Unterricht und gleichzeitig Justizminister. Als solcher erließ er gemeinsam mit dem für die Verwaltungsbehörden zuständigen Taaffe im April 1880 für die Kronländer Böhmen und Mähren je eine Sprachenverordnung zur von Kommentatoren so genannten äußeren Amtssprache, mit dem Ziel, den Tschechen mehr Recht auf ihre Muttersprache im Verkehr mit Verwaltung und Justiz zu geben (die Kundmachung erfolgte in den beiden Landesgesetzblättern) . Demnach sollte die Sprache der Eingabe oder des Vorsprechenden für die Erledigung maßgebend sein. Stremayr schrieb dazu :

Zur weiteren Behandlung der Sprachenfrage in den böhmischen Ländern siehe Badenische Sprachenverordnung.

Nachdem er die Staatsgeschäfte immer weniger mit seinen Idealen vereinbaren konnte, reichte er mehrere Bitten um Enthebung ein, bis ihnen vom Kaiser am 16. Februar 1880 (Kultus und Unterricht) und am 26. Juni 1880 (Justiz) entsprochen wurde.

Der Ernennung zum 2. Präsidenten des Obersten Gerichts- und Cassationshofes am 29. Juni 1880 folgte ein frostiger Empfang von Seite des ersten Präsidenten von Schmerling, da Graf Taaffe diesen vor der kaiserlichen Ernennung nicht formell um seine Zustimmung ersucht hatte. Innerhalb eines Jahres wurde daraus aber ein sehr freundschaftliches Verhältnis.

1889 wurde Stremayr vom Kaiser zum lebenslänglichen Mitglied des Herrenhauses des Reichsrats ernannt.

Die Ernennung zum ersten Präsidenten des Obersten Gerichtshofes folgte 1891, und 1893 ernannte ihn der Kaiser auf Antrag von Erzherzog Rainer zum Stellvertreter im Kuratorium der Kaiserlichen Akademie der Wissenschaften mit bald darauf folgender Ehrenmitgliedschaft.

Ein schwerer Ohnmachtsanfall, dem eine längere Krankheit folgte, überraschte Stremayr im Frühjahr 1898 in einer Sitzung des Gerichtshofes. Aus Besorgnis über die Weiterentwicklung seiner Heimat und über seinen Gesundheitszustand, der es nicht mehr zuließ, das Amt so auszuüben wie gewohnt, ersuchte er um Versetzung in den Ruhestand, dem der Kaiser mit persönlichem Schreiben nachkam.

Im Frühjahr 1899 fesselte ein schwerer Gichtanfall Stremayr durch Monate an Bett und Zimmer und beraubte ihn des Gebrauches seiner Glieder.

Stremayr hat als Widmung seines Manuskriptes Erinnerungen aus dem Leben. Seinen Kindern und Enkeln erzählt im Jahr 1899 schreiben laßen :

eigenen Selbst zu streben. Darin mögen sie jene Befriedigung finden, welche die Welt mit allen äußeren Glanz und blendenden Ehren nicht zu gewähren vermag. »

Am 22. Juni 1904 verstarb er im 82. Lebensjahr in Pottschach in Niederösterreich.

Stremayr war der Träger zahlreicher Orden wie des Sankt-Stefans-Ordens, des Großkreuzes des Österreichischen Leopold-Ordens oder des Kaiserlich-Königlich Ordens der Eisernen Krone I. Klasse.

Anton Bruckner widmete seinem Förderer Stremayr 1876 die 5. Sinfonie.

In Graz wurde im Zuge der Erneuerung des Doktordiploms durch die Karl-Franzens-Universität, 1871 die « Stremayrgasse » nach ihm benannt. Vermutlich stand dies auch im Zusammenhang damit, daß er als Minister für Kultus und Unterricht den Neubau der Universität auf stadtsseitigen Teilen des Stadtparks vorschlug, womit die Regierung vom Grundsatz der unbebaut zu bleibenden Liegenschaft abwich.

Franz Schalk

Le chef d'orchestre autrichien Franz Schalk est né le 27 mai 1863 à Vienne et est mort le 3 septembre 1931 à Etlach, Reichenau an der Rax (une commune du district de Neunkirchen en Basse-Autriche) . À partir de 1900, il fut « Kapellmeister » de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne. Entre 1904 et 1921, il fut à la tête de la Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde de Vienne. De 1918 à 1929, il devint directeur musical de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne (entre 1919 et 1924, il partagea ce poste avec Richard Strauß) . Schalk donna la première de l'Opéra de Richard Strauß « La Femme sans ombre » en 1919. Plus tard, Schalk fut impliqué dans la création du Festival de Salzbourg.

La célèbre phrase : « Chaque Théâtre est un asile de fous, mais un Opéra est une maison d'incurables. » provient de lui.

Franz Schalk étudia sous la tutelle de Bruckner. Aujourd'hui, il est surtout connu pour son travail de révision des Symphonies du Maître. Il exécuta la première de la 5e Symphonie en avril 1894, mais dans une version affligée de nombreux changements et coupures, la plupart effectués sans doute sans l'approbation du compositeur, déjà trop faible pour se déplacer à Graz. La version de Schalk fut cependant la 1re à être publiée et la seule à être jouée pendant près de 40 ans. Schalk influença aussi Bruckner dans les révisions de ses 3e, 7e et 8e Symphonies. Dans chaque cas, la version influencée par Schalk fut la 1re version publiée. Alors que beaucoup de critiques ont attaqué Schalk pour ses altérations souvent malheureuses des versions originales des œuvres de Bruckner, d'autres ont rappelé le grand rôle qu'il a joué pour les populariser. Le chef d'orchestre Leon Botstein est un fervent admirateur des versions de Schalk.

Franz Schalk s'impliqua aussi dans la préparation de la 1re édition publiée de la 10e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler, et fut encore accusé d'avoir trafiqué la partition.

Certains des enregistrements de Franz Schalk comme chef d'orchestre ont été préservés et sont disponibles en CD.

The Austrian conductor Franz Schalk was born on 27 May 1863 in Vienna and died on 3 September 1931 in Edlach, Reichenau an der Rax (a market town in Lower-Austria) . From 1918 to 1929, he was director of the Vienna State Opera, a post he held jointly with Richard Strauß, from 1919 to 1924. He was later involved in the establishment of the Salzburg Festival.

He studied under composer Anton Bruckner. From 1900, he was 1st « Kapellmeister » of the Vienna Court Opera (« Hofoper ») . Between 1904 and 1921, he was head of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna. In 1918, he became director of the Vienna State Opera (« Staatsoper ») : successor to the « Hofoper ») but, from 1919, shared the directorship with Richard Strauß, with the well-known composer considered « blatantly (though unofficially) , the ' greater equal ' of the pair » (despite Schalk's recorded renditions of the Beethoven and Schubert 8th Symphonies virtually as distinguished as Strauß' versions of the last 3 Mozart Symphonies, Beethoven's 5th & 7th, and some of the best-known German Overtures) . Tensions resulting from unclear division of responsibility between the 2 men eventually led to Strauß's resignation.

Schalk's most famous quote is :

« Every theatre is an insane asylum, but an Opera theatre is the ward for the incurables. »

Today, he is best-known for his association with Anton Bruckner. He gave the premiere of Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 in 1894, but with numerous cuts and alterations thought by most authorities to have been made without Bruckner's approval. (The composer was too ill to attend the premiere.) Schalk's version of the 5th Symphony was the one chosen for 1st publication, and was the only version heard by audiences for almost 40 years. While many critics have attacked him for his alterations of the original versions of many of Bruckner's most important Symphonies, others credit him for popularizing great works which might otherwise have remained unknown. Present-day conductor Leon Botstein is a prominent advocate of Schalk's versions of Bruckner's music, as was Hans Knappertsbusch.

Schalk was also involved in the early publication of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 10. Schalk gave the premiere of Richard Strauß's Opera « Die Frau ohne Schatten » , in 1919.

He died in 1931, aged 68. Some of his work as a conductor has been preserved and is available on CD. Schalk's elder brother Joseph was also a prominent conductor and musician.

Franz Schalk (geboren 27. Mai 1863 in Wien ; gestorben 3. September 1931 in Edlach, Gemeinde Reichenau an der Rax, Niederösterreich) war ein österreichischer Dirigent.

Im Jahr 1900 wurde Schalk I. Kapellmeister der Wiener Hofoper. Von 1904 bis 1921 leitete er die Konzerte der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. 1909 bis 1919 war er Lehrer an der Wiener Musikakademie und in den Jahren von 1918 bis 1929 Direktor der Wiener Staatsoper. Von 1919 bis 1924 teilte er sich diesen Posten mit dem Komponisten Richard Strauß. Diese Zeit gilt als Blütezeit der Staatsoper. Schalk war maßgeblich an der Gründung der Salzburger Festspiele beteiligt, außerdem hatte er einen Posten als Dirigent an der Wiener Hofburgkapelle inne.

Franz Schalk war, wie sein älterer Bruder Joseph ein Schüler von Anton Bruckner. Zwar trug er wesentlich dazu bei, Bruckners Symphonien bekanntzumachen, jedoch muß einschränkend erwähnt werden, daß er diese Werke, oft in Gemeinschaftsarbeit mit seinem Bruder und / oder Ferdinand Löwe, für seine Aufführung stark bearbeitete und nicht selten vollkommen entstellte. Markantestes Beispiel ist hier Bruckners 5. Symphonie, deren Uraufführung Schalk 1894 in Graz leitete. Er strich in ihrem Finalsatz über 100 Takte und instrumentierte den verbleibenden Rest, wie die anderen Symphoniesätze auch, völlig neu. In dieser Fassung wurde das Werk schließlich veröffentlicht. Erst in den 1930er Jahren konnte der Musikwissenschaftler Robert Haas die Originalfassungen der fünften wie auch der anderen bearbeiteten Bruckner-Symphonien veröffentlichen. Die Fassungen der Brüder Schalk und Ferdinand Löwes fielen der Vergessenheit anheim.

Schalk wohnte eine Zeit lang im 13. Wiener Gemeindebezirk, Hietzing, in der Eißlergasse 26. 1935 wurde in der Nähe der Franz-Schalk-Platz nach ihm benannt. Seit 1963 verleihen die Wiener Philharmoniker die Franz-Schalk-Medaille in Gold.

L'admiration sans bornes de Bruckner pour Richard Wagner (de même que ses tentatives répétées pour obtenir un poste à l'Université) transforme Eduard Hanslick et ses disciples (les critiques Max Kalbeck et Gustav Dömpke) en adversaires vicieux et redoutables.

Heureusement, le chef d'orchestre Hans Richter (un ancien protégé de Richard Wagner) sera nommé directeur musical à Vienne, en cette même année 1875. Il défendra la cause de la musique progressive allemande.

Max Kalbeck

L'écrivain allemand, critique musical et traducteur Max Kalbeck (pseudonyme : « Jeremias Deutlich ») est né le 4 janvier 1850, à Breslau, et est mort le 4 mai 1921, à Vienne. Il est aussi connu sous le pseudonyme de « Jeremias Deutlich » .

En 1861, Max Kalbeck deviendra un des petits-chanteurs de Breslau sous la direction de Leopold Damrosch puis, en 1867, choriste. De 1860 jusqu'à l'obtention de son diplôme, en 1869, il fréquentera le lycée à Sainte-Marie Madeleine de Breslau. À la demande de son père, il ira étudier le droit à Wrocław. En 1872, il fait des études de philologie et de philosophie à l'Université de Munich et des études musicales à l'École Royale de Munich auprès de Joseph Rheinberger (composition), Franz Wüllner (chant choral et lecture de partitions orchestrales) et Joseph Walter (violon). De retour à Breslau, en 1874, il devient 1er critique artistique et musical pour le « Schlesischen Zeitung » puis pour le « Breslauer Zeitung » puis directeur adjoint du Musée des Beaux-arts de Silésie, à Wrocław. En 1880, sur la recommandation du critique Eduard Hanslick, il travaillera comme journaliste pour le « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung ». De 1883 à 1890, il se retrouvera au journal « Die Presse » et, à partir de 1886 jusqu'à sa mort, au « Neue Wiener Tageblatt ». Il deviendra l'un des critiques les plus influents de l'Autriche et sera, comme Hanslick, un farouche opposant à la musique de la Nouvelle école allemande avec, à sa tête, les Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner et Hugo Wolf.

Max Kalbeck (tout comme l'avait fait Hanslick avant lui) deviendra un ami proche de Johannes Brahms et un supporteur inconditionnel de sa musique. Il fera sa rencontre en 1874. De 1904 à 1914, il rédigera une vaste biographie du compositeur en 8 volumes. Kalbeck a également publié la correspondance de Brahms (1918) et des recueils du poète Gottfried Keller et de l'écrivain Paul Heyse.

En plus de la traduction de divers livrets d'Opéra (Tchaïkovski, Smetana, Verdi, Puccini), Max Kalbeck en écrira de nouveaux pour 2 Opéras de Mozart : « Bastien et Bastienne » et « La Finta Giardiniera ». Il révisera le « Don Giovanni » et « Le Nozze di Figaro » dans le cadre des productions de Gustav Mahler à l'Opéra de Vienne. Kalbeck a également écrit les paroles poétiques des chansons retrouvées dans l'Opérette « Jabuka » de Johann Strauß fils. Ses propres poèmes seront mis en musique par son ami Brahms : 1 des 6 Lieder, Opus 86 (« Nachtwandler ») et 1 des 5 Lieder, Opus 104 (« Letztes Glück »), pour chœur mixte à cappella.

En 1925, on nommera le 18^e arrondissement de Vienne en son honneur : le Kalbeckgasse.

The German writer, critic and translator Max Kalbeck (Pseudonym : « Jeremias Deutlich ») was born on 4 January 1850 in Breslau and died on 4 May 1921 in Vienna. He became one of the most influential critics in Austria and was bitterly opposed to the music of Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Hugo Wolf.

Kalbeck studied music in Munich. In 1875, he became the music-critic for the « Schlesische Zeitung » and assistant director of the Breslau Museum. He came to Vienna, in 1880, on the invitation of Eduard Hanslick, 1st as critic of the « Allgemeine Zeitung » and then, from 1886 till his death, of the « Neue Wiener Tagblatt ».

Kalbeck was a close friend and partisan of Johannes Brahms. Kalbeck's principal achievement was his 8 volume biography of that composer, published from 1904 to 1914, which has never been translated into English. Kalbeck also edited several volumes of Brahms's correspondence and, in 1918, the letters of the poets Gottfried Keller and Paul Heyse, as well as publishing 2 collections of his own music reviews.

Kalbeck wrote new libretti for Mozart's « Bastien und Bastienne » and « La finta giardiniera » ; and he revised those of « Don Giovanni » and « The Marriage of Figaro » for Gustav Mahler's productions at the Vienna « Hofoper » . In addition, he supplied lyrics for the songs in the Operetta « Jabuka » by Johann Strauß junior, the dialogue and plot being the work of Gustav Davis.

Kalbeck also wrote poetry and Johannes Brahms set a few of his verses to music as songs.

He died aged 71.

Max Kalbeck (geboren 4. Januar 1850 in Breslau ; gestorben 4. Mai 1921 in Wien) war ein deutscher Musikschriftsteller, Musikkritiker und Übersetzer.

Max Kalbeck (er schrieb auch unter dem Pseudonym « Jeremias Deutlich ») wurde 1861 Sängerknabe in Breslau unter Leopold Damrosch und 1867 Kirchensänger. Von 1860 bis zum Abitur im Jahre 1869 besuchte er das Gymnasium zu Sankt Maria Magdalena in seiner Heimatstadt. Auf Wunsch des Vaters studierte er anschließend Rechtswissenschaften in Breslau. 1872 wechselte er an die Universität München, belegte dort die Fächer Philologie und Philosophie und studierte an der königlichen Musikschule in München bei Joseph Rheinberger (Komposition) , bei Franz Wüllner (Chorgesang, Orchesterspiel Partiturlesen) und bei Josef Walter (Violine) . Zurück in Breslau war er ab 1874 zunächst Kunst- und Musikkritiker bei der Schlesischen Zeitung, dann bei der Breslauer Zeitung und anschließend Direktionsassistent am Schlesischen Museum für bildende Künste in Breslau. 1880 kam Kalbeck auf Empfehlung von Eduard Hanslick nach Wien, zunächst als Kritiker bei der Wiener Allgemeinen Zeitung, der Presse (1883-1890) und von 1886 bis zu seinem Tode beim Neuen Wiener Tagblatt. Er wurde zu einem der einflussreichsten Kritiker in Österreich und war, wie Hanslick, ein heftiger Gegner der Musik von Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner und Hugo Wolf, deren Werke damals der Neudeutschen Schule zugeordnet wurden.

Andererseits wurde Kalbeck, wiederum wie Hanslick, ein enger Freund und Parteigänger von Brahms, den er 1874 kennengelernt hatte. Als wichtigste Leistung gilt seine 1904 bis 1914 veröffentlichte umfangreiche Biographie dieses Komponisten, die bis heute eine wesentliche musikhistorische Quelle darstellt, ungeachtet einiger zeitgebundener Fehler und der teils sehr subjektiv gefärbten Darstellungen. Kalbeck veröffentlichte außerdem mehrere Bände des Brahms'schen Briefwechsels, daneben 1918 Briefe der Dichter Gottfried Keller und Paul Heyse, weiterhin zwei Sammlungen eigener Kritiken.

Neben der Übersetzung von Opernlibretti insbesondere von Tschaikowski, Verdi, Puccini und Smetana verfasste Kalbeck neue Libretti und andere für Mozarts Bastien und Bastienne und La Finta Giardiniera ; weiterhin revidierte er für Gustav Mahlers Produktionen an der Wiener Hofoper diejenigen von Don Giovanni und Le Nozze di Figaro. Kalbeck steuerte außerdem Gedichte für die Lieder in der Operette Jabuka von Johann Strauß (Sohn) bei. Zwei von Kalbecks eigenen Gedichten wurden von Brahms vertont (das Klavierlied Nachtwandler, Opus 86 ; 3 sowie Letztes Glück, Opus 104 ; 3 für gemischten Chor a cappella) .

Max Kalbecks Sohn ist der Schauspieler und Regisseur Paul Kalbeck.

Im Jahr 1925 wurde in Wien Währing (18. Bezirk) die Kalbeckgasse nach ihm benannt.

Karl Kraus äußerte sich in seiner satirischen Zeitschrift Fackel über Kalbeck auf seine Weise :

« Er hat einige dürftige lyrische Gedichte geschrieben und einige schon wieder verschollene Operettentexte geliefert, hat fremdländische Opern angeblich ins Deutsche übertragen - Alois Obrist führt in seinen in Leßmann's Musikzeitung (Berlin-Charlottenburg) über " schlechtes Operndeutsch " veröffentlichten Aufsätzen unter den abschreckendsten Beispielen eine erkleckliche Anzahl aus Kalbeck's Feder an - , hat eine ehrfurchtlose " Bearbeitung " des Don Juan gewagt, hat wohl auch einigen Musikunterricht genossen und wurde, da er weder zum Dichter noch zum Musiker taugte, Zeitungskritiker für Literatur und Musik. Als solcher trat er in die Reihe der Wiener Beckmesser, die sich von jenem Wagner's bloß dadurch unterscheiden, daß sie oft nicht einmal die Tabulatur kennen, pflanzte die Anschauungen seines Förderers Hanslick fort, hängt sich, um nicht die Überfuhr zur Unsterblichkeit zu versäumen, an die Frackschöbe Johannes Brahms' und schien gewillt, alles, was neben diesem in Tönen zu empfinden wagte, einer Rache, einer Laune, einem Spaß zu opfern. Denn in diese Wiener Grundstimmung, die ein großes Kunstwerk bedenkenlos für einen kleinen Witz hingibt, hat sich der Breslauer Philister vortrefflich eingelebt. »

Le critique musical Gustav Dömpke est né en 1853 à Barten, en Prusse orientale, et est mort en 1923 à Königsberg i Preußen. Il fut pendant des décennies le plus influent de sa profession dans la capitale de la Prusse orientale. Dans les années 1870, Dömpke amorce sa carrière comme critique musical au « Königsberg Allgemeine Zeitung » . En 1884, il quitte la Prusse orientale pour se rendre à Vienne où il sera accepté dans le « Cercle » des Eduard Hanslick et Johannes Brahms. Sous leur influence, il deviendra rapidement un adversaire farouche de la nouvelle École allemande. Dans le « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » , il soutient Brahms et les Classiques viennois et pourfend Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, Hans Pfitzner, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauß, et, surtout, Anton Bruckner (dont il va cependant vanter le Quintette à cordes en fa majeur) . En 1897, il retournera à Königsberg pour se joindre au « Hartung'sche Zeitung » parce que Königsberg est devenu une ville totalement conquise par la musique de Johannes Brahms. Dömpke sera victime de l'inflation économique après la Première Guerre mondiale.

Gustav Dömpke (geboren 1853 in Barten, Ostpreußen ; gestorben 1923 in Königsberg i Preußen) war über Jahrzehnte der einflussreichste Musikkritiker in Ostpreußens Provinzialhauptstadt.

In den 1870er Jahren begann Dömpke als Musikkritiker bei der Königsberger Allgemeinen Zeitung. 1884 ging er von Ostpreußen nach Wien, wo er in den Kreis um Eduard Hanslick aufgenommen wurde und Johannes Brahms kennenlernte. Unter dessen Einfluss wurde er zum entschiedenen Gegner der Neudeutschen Schule. In der Wiener Allgemeinen Zeitung engagierte er sich so entschieden für Brahms und die Wiener Klassik wie gegen Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, Hans Pfitzner, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauß und vor allem Anton Bruckner, dessen F-Dur Streichquintett er allerdings rühmte. 1897 kehrte er nach Königsberg zurück und schrieb für die Hartung'sche Zeitung. Nicht zuletzt durch Dömpke wurde Königsberg zur « Brahms-Stadt » .

Dömpke verarmte in der Inflation nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg.

Autour du printemps 1875 : A copy of the score of the 1874 version of the 4th Symphony is made.

1875 : Unsuccessful attempts by Bruckner to have his 1874 version of the 4th Symphony performed.

1er juillet 1875 : Bruckner est nommé vice-archiviste à la « Hofmusikkapelle » et second chef de chœur des petits-chanteurs de Vienne.

Juillet 1875 : Anton Bruckner est nommé Maître conférencier d'harmonie et de contrepoint (sans salaire) à l'Université de Vienne. Il demande à ce que soit ajouté l'enseignement de la théorie musicale au curriculum de sa chaire en musique en tant que professeur d'harmonie et de contrepoint à l'Université de Vienne.

Après maintes sollicitations auprès du Ministère, et sans se préoccuper de ce qu'il s'aliénait définitivement son collègue Eduard Hanslick en marchant par trop sur ses brisées, il obtint en effet, en 1875, la création à son profit (mais, au début, sans émoluments) d'une chaire de musique en théorie musicale ouverte aux étudiants du doctorat en philosophie, où se succédèrent durant 20 années les futurs grands noms de la pensée viennoise et pas seulement des musiciens.

Bruckner's biographer, Alfred Orel, reported that, when Bruckner was a lecturer in music theory at the University of Vienna, in the late 1870's, he applied for a professorship in music theory. The decision of the committee that was given the task of evaluating Bruckner's credentials in music theory rejected his application. When one of the professors sought to defend Bruckner by explaining what was involved in the aesthetics of the art of music, a member of the search committee countered with the remark that Bruckner probably had not even kept abreast of the newest research on acoustics provided by Hermann von Helmholtz's « Tonempfindungen » (On the Sensations of tone) , which was required reading for music students at the University.

Alfred Orel. « Anton Bruckner. Das Werk. Die Künstler. Die Zeit » , Vienna / Leipzig (1925) ; page 143. Orel was « Privatdozent » for music history at the University of Vienna, in 1925.

In the 19th Century, Hermann von Helmholtz put acoustics on an entirely new footing. The science of sounds, he argued, had to clarify, first and foremost, how sound was perceived, rather than merely investigate vibrating bodies that happened to be audible but were not different in any respect from other vibrations. His own study of auditory perception, however, went well beyond investigating the physiological process of hearing. The title of his book, « Tonempfindungen » ; « On the Sensations of Tone as a Physiological Basis for the Theory of Music » (1863) , even promised to revolutionize music theory. In the introduction, he stated that his aim was to « connect the boundaries of 2 sciences, which, although drawn toward each other by many natural affinities, have hitherto remained practically distinct - I mean the boundaries of physical and physiological acoustics on the one side ; and of musical science and esthetics on the other » .

L'archiduchesse Marie-Valérie de Vienne

1875 : Iers contacts d'Anton Bruckner avec la jeune archiduchesse Marie-Valérie de Vienne.

À partir de 1875 : Bruckner trouve une pitié en l'archiduchesse Marie-Valérie ; grâce à elle, on lui a, malgré toutes les oppositions, accordé un cours d'harmonie de 2 heures le lundi soir à l'Université, dans cette même salle où les mardis, jeudis et samedis professe le redoutable Eduard Hanslick.

Après la naissance de l'archiduc héritier Rodolphe en 1858, l'Impératrice s'éloigne de la Cour pour raison de santé. Ayant pris fait et cause pour les Hongrois, elle se réconcilie avec l'Empereur puis, après la création de la double monarchie et leur couronnement à Budapest, lui propose de concevoir un autre enfant (1867) . La souveraine souhaite ardemment un fils qui deviendrait un roi pour la Hongrie. Ce sera une fille. L'Impératrice et reine, défiant la tradition Impériale, donne à cette enfant, en hommage à la Hongrie, un prénom inusité dans les familles royales : Marie-Valérie (Valéria est le nom de la région de Budapest) .

Née en Hongrie, à Ofen (Budapest) , la petite archiduchesse, « l'enfant de la Hongrie » , était le 4e enfant du couple Impérial. Elle était la préférée de sa mère, la Kedvesem (c'est-à-dire : l'unique, en hongrois) , la seule de ses enfants que l'Impératrice eût désirée. Elle est née 10 ans après ses aînés, après le couronnement à Budapest et la création de la double monarchie en 1867. Ce fait a suggéré à quelques-uns que Marie-Valérie n'était pas la fille de l'Empereur et roi, mais du Comte Andrassy, mentor de l'Impératrice et reine. La rumeur mourra avec le temps, tant la ressemblance physique entre Marie-Valérie et son père s'accroît avec les années.

Issue de la maison de Habsbourg-Lorraine, Marie-Valérie est la 3e et dernière fille de l'Empereur François-Joseph Ier d'Autriche et de l'Impératrice Elisabeth d'Autriche (née duchesse Elisabeth en Bavière) . Elle est la sœur cadette de l'archiduc Rodolphe et de l'archiduchesse Gisèle.

Elle a 4 ans quand meurt sa terrible mais affectueuse grand-mère l'archiduchesse Sophie et quand sa sœur Gisèle, âgée de 16 ans, est fiancée (puis mariée l'année suivante) à un cousin, le prince Léopold de Bavière.

Adolescente, elle souffre des taquineries de son frère, l'archiduc Rodolphe, un tant soit peu jaloux de la préférence qu'accorde sa mère à sa plus jeune enfant (la seule qu'elle ait vraiment désirée) .

« Fille de la Hongrie » , l'archiduchesse ne partageait pas avec sa mère l'amour de ce pays. Elle souffrit également de l'amour possessif de l'Impératrice.

1875 : Anton Bruckner est nommé second Maître de chant et vice-archiviste à la Chapelle de la Cour (« Hofkapelle »)

Malgré sa Maîtrise incontestée de l'orgue, on rapporte que Bruckner n'a pas toujours accompagné les célébrations liturgiques d'une manière acceptable aux yeux de ses Supérieurs. Ils lui ont souvent reproché un jeu sans lustre qui faisait appel à de simples accompagnements. Cette position ne lui a jamais pris beaucoup de son temps. Peut-être était-il plus intéressé par l'improvisation que l'interprétation stricte des pièces au programme. Lorsque Josef Hellmesberger succéda à Johann Herbeck comme « Hofkapellmeister » , Bruckner devra se résigner à accompagner la Messe de la bénédiction de l'après-midi. Il n'était pas autorisé à jouer lors des grandes Messes. Bruckner présentera occasionnellement à la Chapelle de la Cour ses propres compositions lors de récitals. Tout au long des ses années viennoises, la « Hofkapelle » ne sera pas un terreau propice à la musique moderne.

Un sale tour des étudiants

1875 : Un groupe d'étudiants décida de se payer la tête du professeur Bruckner ... le célèbre célibataire endurci. Ils lui demandèrent la permission de se présenter à son appartement pour lui faire une surprise. La « surprise » s'est avéré être une prostituée notoire de Vienne. Bruckner n'a pas dit un seul mot. Il traversa la pièce et s'agenouilla devant son prie-Dieu. Au-dessus du crucifix se trouvait une image cachée par un petit rideau de couleur verte. Se levant debout, il le tira et se tint en silence devant les étudiants. L'image était celle de sa défunte mère (de qui il avait hérité la foi ardente) exposée dans son cercueil. (Maria Theresia Helm est décédée d'une maladie pulmonaire, le 11 novembre 1860, à sa résidence du 70 « Schmiedhaus » - la maison du forgeron - à Ebelsberg. Son cercueil, qui se trouvait originalement au cimetière d'Ebelsberg, sera relocalisé en 1924 pour se retrouver aux côtés de son mari, Anton « sénior » , dans la cour de l'église paroissiale d'Ansfelden.)

Bien qu'Anton Bruckner dut donner des cours de violon et de chant à ses enfants de chœur en plus de ses heures d'enseignement normal, il sut s'arranger pour donner des cours privés à ses élèves de piano. Parmi ses élèves, l'on peut compter les 3 enfants du notaire Marböck, la fille du magistrat diocésain de Saint-Florian, Georg Ruckensteiner et Aloisia (Louise) Bogner, la fille aînée de son ancien Maître de chant Michaël Bogner.

Krems an der Donau

1875 : Anton Bruckner s'exécute sur l'orgue des frères Mauracher (Josef et Matthäus) de la « Stadtpfarrkirche » de Krems an der Donau.

« Krems an der Donau » est situé au bout de la vallée de Wachau. Le village borde les localités de Stratzing, Langenlois, Rohrendorf bei Krems, Gedersdorf, Traismauer, Nußdorf ob der Traisen, Paudorf, Furth bei Göttweig, Mautern an der Donau, Dürnstein et Senftenberg.

La Ire mention faite de Krems date de l'an 995 par Otton III. On a retrouvé sur ce site la tombe d'un enfant datant de plus de 27,000 ans. Il s'agit de la plus ancienne sépulture découverte en Autriche.

Aux XIe et XIIe siècles, la localité de Chremis (comme on l'appelait alors) était presque aussi grande que celle de Vienne.

Un don de l'Empereur Henri II permit la mise en chantier d'une Ire église, en 1014. La base de la tour-sud qui a survécu nous rappelle l'existence d'une Basilique Romane (avec une tour basse) construite au début du 12e siècle. Ce n'est seulement qu'en 1178 que l'on y associera le nom de Sankt Veit (Vitus) . La nouvelle église paroissiale de Krems est l'un des symboles de la victoire des catholiques au moment de la Contre-Réforme. L'intérieur date du 18e siècle. Le 1er peintre, dessinateur et graveur du style Baroque tardif autrichien, Martin Johann Schmidt (surnommé « Krems » parce que natif de l'endroit) exécutera les 5 fresques qui ornent le plafond.

Krems est le producteur principal de « Marillenschnaps » , une « eau de vie » d'abricot.

Melk et son abbaye

Anton Bruckner se rendra souvent à la ville abbatiale de Melk pour renouer avec son ancien collègue de Saint-Florian, le notaire Josef Marböck (de même que son épouse Marie) . Quant à elles, les 3 filles les plus âgées auront la chance de recevoir des leçons privées de piano du Maître, sur son Bösendorfer de concert, un héritage provenant de son ami et bienfaiteur Franz Sailer, l'ancien secrétaire du monastère. On peut trouver une plaque commémorative (en souvenir des visites couvrant la période 1875-1876) près d'une des fenêtres située au second palier de la maison portant le numéro 12 de la « Hauptstraße » . La basilique est une des Ires destination de pèlerinage en Autriche pour des raisons obscures de guérisons miraculeuses.

(Voir WAB 124/1/2/3 (1853-1855) : « Drei Kleines, Vortrags-Stück » , 3 petites études pour piano 4 mains (No.1 en sol majeur de 1853 ; n° 2 sol majeur de 1854 ; n° 3 fa majeur de 1855) . Ces pièces d'apprentissage du piano, faciles à jouer, furent composées lors des leçons privées.

La « Wienerstraße » de Melk mène à la « Rathausplatz » , la place centrale joliment restaurée qui tire son nom de l'Hôtel de ville (« Rathaus ») construit en 1575. La façade fut réaménagée il y a plus de 150 ans. Sa porte d'entrée très élaborée, en bois et en cuivre, représente le point d'attraction de l'édifice.

La fontaine du marché, appelée « Kolomanbrunnen », est un don de l'abbaye. Elle se trouve au centre de la « Rathausplatz ». Une statue de Saint-Coloman trône au sommet.

Avant que la route principale n'atteigne la « Rathausplatz », on peut également apercevoir une plaque commémorative du grand compositeur autrichien, Anton Bruckner.

L'école de l'abbaye de Melk (« Stiftsgymnasium Melk ») est un Gymnasium privé qui se trouve être la plus ancienne école d'Autriche. L'école est située dans la célèbre abbaye de Melk.

Le grand-orgue de l'église abbatiale de Melk est l'œuvre du facteur viennois Gottfried Sonnholz. Il subit, en 1929, des détériorations consécutives à des remaniements. Mais en 1970, le facteur Gregor Hradetzky, de Krems, construisit un orgue à sommier entièrement mécanique (3 claviers, 45 registres, 3,280 tuyaux) qui répond parfaitement aux données acoustiques de l'église.

La salle la plus impressionnante de l'abbaye Baroque de Melk est l'église abbatiale. D'après la volonté de l'abbé et de la communauté des moines, elle devait rendre clairement visible la fonction religieuse de la construction entière ainsi que son orientation vers Dieu. L'inscription située au-dessus du porche de Saint-Benoît dans la 1^{re} cour du monastère (« ABSIT GLORIARI NISI IN CRUCE » : loin de moi la pensée de glorifier autre chose que de la croix) est un leitmotiv qui nous transporte jusqu'à l'église.

Les moines envisagèrent simplement une « Baroquisation » de l'église abbatiale. Mais à partir de 1701, à l'instigation de l'abbé Berthold Dietmayr, l'église fut complètement reconstruite, d'après les plans de Jakob Prandtauer. L'abbé réussit à engager les Maîtres les plus importants pour la décoration intérieure : Antonio Beduzzi (architecture d'intérieur, esquisses pour les fresques) ; Johann Michaël Rottmayr (fresques, tableaux d'autel) ; Paul Troger (tableaux d'autel) ; Giuseppe Galli-Bibiena (plans pour la chaire et le Maître-autel) ; Lorenzo Mattielli (plans pour les sculptures) ; et Peter Widerin (sculptures) .

Sur l'autel latéral à gauche, un sarcophage contient les ossements de Saint-Coloman. L'autel latéral à droite est consacré à Saint-Benoît, mais le sarcophage est vide.

Depuis plus de 1,000 ans, Melk est un centre culturel et spirituel en Autriche, d'abord comme château fort de la famille Babenberg et, depuis 1089, comme abbaye bénédictine fondée par le margrave Léopold II. Dès le XII^e siècle, une école est rattachée à l'abbaye et des manuscrits précieux ont été rassemblés et rédigés dans la bibliothèque. Au cours de l'histoire du monastère, des membres du couvent de Melk ont aussi laissé d'importantes traces dans les domaines des sciences naturelles, des lettres et de la musique. Au XV^e siècle, l'abbaye fut le point de départ d'une des réformes monastiques les plus importantes du Moyen-âge, « la Réforme de Melk » et entretint d'étroits rapports avec les humanistes de l'Université de Vienne.

Une expression visible de l'importance de l'abbaye dans l'âge Baroque et de la position exceptionnelle de son abbé d'alors, Berthold Dietmayr, est la magnifique construction Baroque, érigée entre 1702 et 1736 d'après les plans de Jakob Prandtauer à laquelle participèrent quelques-uns des artistes les plus connus de l'époque.

En 996, le nom d'« Ostarrîchi » (Autriche) fut mentionné pour la 1re fois dans un document officiel. Ce petit territoire va devenir un énorme Empire. Melk demeurera toujours un centre spirituel et culturel du pays.

Le margrave Léopold Ier de Babenberg reçut comme fief la région qui est maintenant le Sud-Ouest du land de Basse-Autriche. Le château fort de Melk devint sa résidence principale et ses successeurs acquirent des reliques et des trésors précieux. En 1089, le margrave Léopold II fonda le monastère en donnant le château fort à des moines bénédictins provenant de Lambach (Haute-Autriche) . Depuis ce temps, sans aucune interruption, des moines bénédictins vivent et exercent leurs activités en observant la Règle de Saint-Benoît. Dès le XIIe siècle, une école est rattachée au monastère, et, dans la bibliothèque, des manuscrits précieux furent écrits et rassemblés. Au XVe siècle, l'abbaye fut le point de départ d'une des réformes les plus importantes du Moyen-âge, la « Réforme de Melk » et entretint d'étroits rapports avec les humanistes de l'Université de Vienne.

Une expression visible de l'importance de l'abbaye durant la période Baroque et de la position exceptionnelle de son abbé d'alors, Berthold Dietmayr, est la magnifique construction Baroque, érigée entre 1702 et 1736 d'après les plans de Jakob Prandtauer, à laquelle participèrent quelques-uns des artistes les plus connus de l'époque : J. M. Rottmayr, P. Troger, L. Mattielli, A. Beduzzi, J. W. Bergl, P. Widerin. Au XVIIIe siècle, les moines de Melk laissèrent, entre autres, aussi d'importantes traces dans les domaines de l'histoire ou de la musique : les pères Anselm Schramb, Bernhard Pez, Marian Paradeiser, Maximilian Stadler.

Même si l'abbaye de Melk échappa au sort de la fermeture sous l'Empereur Joseph II (1780-1790) , de nombreuses ordonnances Impériales changèrent la vie au monastère. Des « abbés commandataires » furent désignés par l'Empereur ; le séminaire abbatial fut fermé par ordre Impérial et l'école abbatiale fut transférée à Sankt Pölten. À cause de la nouvelle organisation des paroisses sous Joseph II, le nombre des paroisses relevant de l'abbaye de Melk s'accrût à 27, ce qui fut une lourde charge pour les moines parce que certains durent quitter le monastère pour travailler dans les paroisses.

Les guerres napoléoniennes ainsi que l'abolition du système féodal, en 1848, comportèrent de grandes restructurations économiques et difficultés pour l'abbaye. Au XIXe siècle, les moines réalisèrent la 1re restauration intégrale des bâtiments abbatiaux depuis la reconstruction Baroque et l'école ainsi que le pensionnat furent agrandis. Vers 1900, le monastère fut pourvu d'un système de canalisation moderne, d'électricité et de nouvelles conduites d'eau.

De nouveau, les deux Guerres Mondiales entraînèrent de graves problèmes pour l'abbaye. Aux difficultés économiques provoquées par l'inflation s'ajouta, après l'« Anschluß » en 1938, le danger constant de la fermeture du monastère par les Nationaux-Socialistes ; les moines risquaient d'être arrêtés. L'école des bénédictins fut fermée et on réquisitionna une grande partie des bâtiments abbaciaux pour y installer une école secondaire publique.

Du 21 avril 1944 jusqu'à l'évacuation du 15 avril 1945 se trouvait à Melk, sur le site de la caserne Freiherr-von-Birago, un camp de concentration, extension du camp de Mauthausen. 5,000 personnes environ y perdirent la vie pendant son année d'existence. Il n'en reste aujourd'hui que le crématorium, en tant que mémorial.

Lors des travaux de réparation en 1947, rendus nécessaires à cause des dommages provoqués par des éclats d'obus, la coupole va prendre feu.

L'abbaye a été fondée en 1089 lorsque la famille Babenberg décida de déplacer sa capitale. 2 tours, seuls vestiges du château des Babenberg, peuvent encore être vues.

L'abbaye de Melk est une célèbre abbaye bénédictine de Basse-Autriche, faisant partie de la congrégation bénédictine d'Autriche. Située dans la région de Wachau, elle surplombe la ville de Melk, et le Danube. Bien que l'abbaye ait été fondée au XI^e siècle, les bâtiments actuels datent de l'époque Baroque, ils sont l'œuvre de l'architecte Jakob Prandtauer. Après sa mort, en 1726, les travaux sont achevés d'après ses plans par son élève Franz Munggenast. L'École de l'abbaye de Melk est située en l'Abbaye.

Melk doit son nom à la rivière Medjilica (rivière frontalière, en slave) , et est mentionné pour la 1^{re} fois dans un document officiel en 831. Après les guerres menées par Charlemagne contre les Avars, les territoires de l'Est, dont Melk faisait partie, furent administrés par un Comte des Marches. C'est approximativement à cette période que l'on éleva un château fort sur le rocher surplombant le Danube.

Après la bataille du Lechfeld en l'an 955, Othon le Grand remit à Luitpold, de la famille des Babenberg, les anciens territoires de l'Est. En 996, cette Marche est désignée pour la 1^{re} fois sous le nom de Ostarrichi.

Le château fort de Melk était la possession du Comte bavarois Sizo. À l'occasion d'une rivalité entre le duc de Bavière Henri le Querelleur et l'Empereur Othon II, Sizo se rangea aux côtés du Querelleur. Léopold I^{er} de Babenberg prit parti pour l'Empereur, défit Sizo et prit possession du château de Melk, qui devint sa résidence.

Les étroites relations établies entre les Babenberg et les religieux de Melk sont attestées par différents objets d'art et de dévotion qui sont encore en possession de l'abbaye ; par exemple, une relique de la Vraie Croix, offerte par le margrave Adalbert, ou un petit autel portatif de Swanhilde, l'épouse d'Ernest le Valeureux. Le 13 octobre 1014, Henri I^{er} fit transporter à Melk la dépouille mortelle de Saint-Colman, un fils de roi irlandais, mort en martyr (alors qu'il se rendait en croisade en Terre Sainte, il fut pris pour un espion et capturé à Stockerau près de Vienne, puis pendu) . Le 21 mars 1089, Léopold II appela à Melk des Bénédictins de Lambach, en remplacement des Chanoines du chapitre qui y étaient depuis plusieurs décennies. Plus tard, Léopold III attribua au monastère, par une lettre de donation de 1113, des terres situées aux confins de l'ancienne Marche de l'Est, ainsi que très certainement le château des Babenberg à Melk.

Après que Vienne eut été choisie comme nouvelle résidence des Babenberg, Melk perdit quelque peu les faveurs du souverain, mais le monastère prit un essor rapide et parvint à un grand épanouissement intellectuel et culturel. C'est alors que furent créés une école monastique (mentionnée en 1160) et un atelier de copistes.

Le 14 août 1297 se déclara dans le monastère un terrible incendie qui détruisit presque tous les bâtiments. Grâce aux efforts considérables de l'abbé Ulrich II (1306-1324), il fut possible de reconstruire l'église et les locaux d'habitation, mais on ne parvint pas à rétablir véritablement la situation d'origine. À cela vinrent s'ajouter la peste et les mauvaises récoltes.

Le Concile de Constance (1414-1418) avait décidé de réformer les monastères. Nikolaus Seyringer von Matzen, un moine autrichien formé à Subiaco, fut désigné par Albrecht V pour introduire la réforme dans les abbayes du duché d'Autriche. Melk fut choisie pour point de départ de la réforme et Nikolaus Seyringer fut nommé abbé. Le monastère devint bientôt un modèle de discipline régulière, et le nombre de vocations augmenta. Melk fut chargé de l'inspection, ses conventuels furent nommés abbés dans différents monastères d'Autriche et d'Allemagne du sud. Une grande partie des « manuscrits de Melk » date de cette période.

Comme la Réforme protestante se propageait et que, surtout, le danger turc grandissait, la vie intellectuelle du monastère allait en s'affaiblissant. Melk dut aux interventions des souverains de ne pas disparaître définitivement. L'impulsion qui devait conduire au redressement fut le fait d'un groupe d'Allemands du sud qui entrèrent à Melk après avoir reçu une formation dans les écoles jésuites de leur pays d'origine. En dépit de la Guerre de Trente Ans et de la menace constante que faisaient peser les Turcs, la situation économique se rétablit complètement. Peu à peu, les abbés créèrent les bases financières qui rendirent possibles les grandioses transformations à l'époque du Baroque.

Le 18 novembre 1700 fut élu un jeune abbé de 30 ans, Berthold Dietmayr, qui sut trouver les moyens pour imposer ses idées, malgré les résistances de sa propre communauté. Avec détermination, il se mit à la transformation du monastère, après avoir trouvé en Jakob Prandtauer, architecte de Sankt Polten, un partenaire d'un génie égal au sien. En 40 ans à peine, l'abbaye prit sa forme actuelle. Les artistes Baroques les plus importants d'Autriche y ont mis tout leur talent. À peine achevé, le monastère fut très gravement endommagé par un incendie. L'abbé Berthold mourut peu après. Les travaux furent achevés pendant le ministère de l'abbé Adrian Pliemel. À la mort de Prandtauer, c'est Josef Munggenast qui prit la direction des chantiers. Parallèlement, le monastère connut un renouveau de sa vie intellectuelle et artistique.

Comme tous les courants intellectuels, la philosophie des Lumières ne gagna l'Autriche qu'assez lentement et sous forme édulcorée, mais son influence n'en fut que plus longue. Sous Joseph II (1780-1790) cependant, les idées nouvelles s'imposèrent rapidement. Un décret Impérial imposa aux religieux de passer par le séminaire général de Vienne, où ils recevaient une éducation conforme à l'esprit du siècle. Le monastère échappa à la fermeture, mais eut à supporter de nouvelles servitudes.

Si de nombreux décrets de Joseph II furent rapportés après sa mort, l'esprit jéséphiste n'en persista pas moins jusqu'à l'époque actuelle. Les guerres napoléoniennes et les rétrocessions forcées de terres après la révolution de 1848 entraînent d'importantes charges financières et restructurations économiques. Malgré cela, sous l'abbé Wilhelm Eder (1838-1866), la rénovation devenue urgente de l'ensemble Baroque, ainsi que la création d'un nouveau lycée, furent menées à bien.

Le portail d'entrée

Le visiteur pénètre dans les bâtiments abbaciaux en passant entre 2 imposants bastions, celui du sud fut élevé en 1650 pour servir de fortification, le bastion nord fut édifié par Jakob Prandtauer dans le but d'équilibrer la perspective. 2 statues sur haut piédestal représentent Saint-Léopold et Saint-Colman. Après avoir passé le porche d'entrée octogonal surmonté d'une coupole ouverte, on accède à la 1re cour. Sur la droite, on aperçoit l'une des 2 tours appelées « tours des Babenberg », qui font partie de l'ancien système de fortification.

La façade Est

Elle est dominée par une réplique de la Croix de Melk, qui fait partie du trésor de l'abbaye. L'inscription au fronton rappelle, au plan théologique, la valeur relative de toute grandeur et de toute gloire : « Absit gloriari nisi in cruce » (que par la Croix seule, soit la gloire) . Au-dessus du portail en plein-cintre, se trouve un petit balcon depuis lequel l'abbé saluait ses hôtes, au-dessous figurent les armoiries de l'abbaye, 2 clés d'or croisées sur fond d'azur. On reconnaît, sur 2 petits socles, les 2 Princes des Apôtres, Pierre et Paul, les saints patrons de l'église.

La cour du prélat

Le visiteur passe sous le porche Saint-Benoit (« Benediktihalle ») et se retrouve dans la cour du prélat, à la fois élégante et majestueuse. Le regard se pose d'emblée sur la coupole de l'église et sur les 2 tours qui la flanquent. La fontaine, formée au XVIIIe siècle, a été installée ici au début du XIXe siècle.

L'escalier et la galerie des Empereurs

L'escalier des Empereurs conduit à l'aile d'apparat de l'abbaye et aux appartements Impériaux. Un groupe d'allégorie accompagne un cartouche portant l'inscription « Constantia et Fortitudine » (avec persévérance et bravoure) , devise de l'Empereur Charles VI qui entretint des relations amicales avec la maison et sous le règne duquel eut lieu l'édification de Melk. La partie supérieure de l'escalier en particulier témoigne de la sensibilité et du goût de l'artiste, ainsi que de son sens très sûr des proportions. L'escalier mène au 1er étage à l'aile des Empereurs. Sur le palier, 2 grands portraits de l'Impératrice Marie-Thérèse et de son époux, François III de Lorraine, évoquent la période de construction de cette partie de la maison. Aux murs du couloir des Empereurs s'aligne une série complète des portraits des souverains autrichiens. Les appartements Impériaux ont été, en grande partie, transformés en musée.

La terrasse

Une imposante terrasse dégage la vue sur la façade de l'église. C'est cette solution architecturale qui différencie Melk d'édifices semblables de la période Baroque et qui, malgré les formes Baroques, met en relief son caractère sacré. L'église domine nettement l'ensemble des bâtiments abbaciaux, avec ses tours et avec sa vaste coupole octogonale reconstruites par Josef Munggenast après l'incendie de 1738.

La bibliothèque

La fresque du plafond, peinte par Paul Troger (1731-1732), représente une allégorie de la Foi, elle est le pendant thématique de la Salle de Marbre (« Marmorsaal ») qui met en scène la Sagesse humaine. Autour du personnage central (une femme soutenant dans une main le « Livre aux Sept Sceaux » et « l'Agneau de l'Apocalypse », et s'appuyant de l'autre sur un écu au motif de l'Esprit-Saint sous forme de colombe), évoluent des groupes distincts représentant les 4 vertus cardinales : la sagesse, l'équité, la force et la tempérance. Les statues en bois symbolisent les 4 facultés : le droit, la médecine, la philosophie et la théologie. Le globe terrestre et la sphère céleste sont de Vincenzo Coronelli (1670).

La bibliothèque de l'abbaye de Melk renferme environ 85,000 volumes, 1,200 manuscrits du IX^e au XV^e siècles, 800 manuscrits des XVII^e et XVIII^e siècles, et 850 incunables. Les manuscrits et incunables les plus intéressants sont exposés sous verre.

Les fresques

Les fresques des voûtes de la nef et des bas-côtés sont l'œuvre du maître salzbourgeois Johann Michael Rottmayr. La travée centrale est consacrée à Saint-Benoît, entouré d'allégories représentant la lutte contre le Mal. Sur l'arc avant (le dernier panneau), on distingue une colombe, l'âme de Sainte-Scholastique qui précède dans le ciel celle de son frère Saint-Benoît. Dans la dernière travée, le Saint dans la gloire de Dieu : il a retrouvé sa jeunesse, ainsi qu'aimait à se le représenter l'imagination populaire, et il entre dans la joie du Seigneur.

Ils sont, avec les tribunes, l'œuvre du décorateur de théâtre Antonio Beduzzi, qui leur donna la forme de chapelles. L'ornementation de chacune des chapelles s'inspire de la vie du Saint auquel l'autel est consacré. Les 2 autels du fond sont consacrés à Saint Sébastien, à droite, et à Saint Nicolas, à gauche (peintures de Paul Troger 1746). Les deux suivants ont pour saints patrons, à droite, Saint-Jean Baptiste (M. Rottmayr, 1727) et, à gauche, l'archange Saint-Michel (M. Rottmayr, 1723). Le 3^e autel latéral de droite est appelé autel de Saint-Léopold, le tableau d'autel traite plusieurs scènes inspirées de la tradition de l'abbaye : Léopold I^{er} fait venir à Melk une communauté de chanoines, Léopold II des Bénédictins, Léopold III étend sur Melk une main protectrice. Cette peinture sur cuivre est l'œuvre de Georg Bachmann, 1650. L'autel opposé représente une Adoration des Mages (M. Rottmayr, 1723). La chaire fut réalisée par un sculpteur de Sankt Pölten, Peter Widerin, sur des esquisses d'Antonio Galli-Bibiena. Les autels du transept, d'Antonio Beduzzi, ont leur inspiration propre. L'autel de droite est consacré à Saint-Benoît. Le groupe pictural représente la mort du Saint au milieu de ses compagnons. À la pointe de l'obélisque, un ange attend l'âme de Saint-Benoît. L'autel latéral de gauche renferme dans un sarcophage les ossements de Saint-Colman. La statue représente le Saint en vêtements de pèlerin, sa prière s'élève jusqu'au ciel. La veilleuse indique que l'autel de Saint-Colman est aussi l'autel du Saint-Sacrement.

Le Maître-autel et la coupole

Les créateurs de la période Baroque s'attachaient, à travers leurs œuvres, à concrétiser une idée. Leur rôle était de trouver la formule architecturale la mieux adaptée à l'idée directrice énoncée par le Maître-d'œuvre. Le sanctuaire et la coupole de l'église abbatiale de Melk illustrent cette démarche. Au-dessus du tabernacle se trouve une tiare. Elle renvoie au Christ, la tête de l'Église, et, en même temps, aux 2 personnages qui se tiennent directement au-dessus du tabernacle : Saint-Pierre, le chef visible de l'Église, et Saint-Paul. Les statues placées à leur droite et à leur gauche représentent des prophètes de l'Ancien Testament, les annonciateurs des 2 Princes de l'Église. Pierre et Paul se séparent avant leur martyre. L'inscription dans le cartouche est un commentaire de leur vie : « Sans juste combat, il n'y a pas de victoire. » . C'est Dieu le Père qui leur remet la couronne de gloire. La croix, signe de victoire, domine l'ensemble. Le thème ainsi traité est celui de l'Église combattante et triomphante. L'homme est considéré respectivement sous les 2 aspects temporel et spirituel. À gauche, devant Dieu le Père, on voit la remarquable statue de Moïse, guide temporel du peuple de Dieu, il désigne du doigt la Table des 10 Commandements. Cette idée se prolonge dans la décoration de la voûte. Un ange présente la loi de Dieu à un souverain. Au-dessus d'eux flotte l'ancien drapeau Impérial, bannière de la puissance temporelle. Sur les arcs du chœur se trouvent, à hauteur de la corniche, des emblèmes de la sphère terrestre : épées, hallebardes, lances. Cette idée se développe encore sur le pilier d'appui est de la coupole, et passe en diagonale sur le pilier ouest. De manière analogue, on trouve de l'autre côté, à la droite de Dieu le Père, Aaron, le guide spirituel du peuple élu, et derrière lui, dans la fresque du plafond, le « zelus christianus » apparaissant à l'Église, au-dessus, le voile de Sainte-Véronique tient lieu de bannière à la sphère spirituelle. L'idée se prolonge sur les arcs doubleaux du chœur et sur les piliers diagonalement opposés du transept. Le thème principal se déploie en un puissant final dans la fresque de la coupole : autour de la Sainte-Trinité évoluent les Saints rattachés à Melk et à l'ordre bénédictin.

La réalisation de l'autel est due à Antonio Beduzzi, les fresques de l'église sont de Michaël Rottmayr, les statues de Peter Widerin (1733) .

26 août 1875 : Anton Bruckner gives another organ recital in the parish church of Steyr, which again left a deep impression. His concluding improvisation on Georg Friedrich Händel's « Halleluja » elicited rapturous applause. The « several friends » mentioned in the review no doubt included Georg Arminger, the parish priest, who was presumably already playing host to Bruckner in the rectory. The hospitality extended to Bruckner, there, was precious to the composer : as a committed Catholic cultivating a close, life-long relationship with clerics and the life of the Church, he found a congenial environment there that enabled him to concentrate on his work. At the same time, he was able to relax on excursions organized by his friends and to sample the down-to-earth « pub fare » on offer in Steyr and its environs.

The 42 year old Johannes Brahms becomes the most important member of the Austrian Commission for the Conferring of Artists' Scholarships.

The 64 year old Franz Liszt is appointed president of the New Hungarian Academy of Music, in Budapest.

The 32 year old Hans Richter becomes conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, until 1898.

The 28 year old Robert Fuchs obtains a job teaching harmony at the Vienna Conservatory, which he will hold until 1912.

10 septembre 1875 : The 15 year old Gustav Mahler goes to live in Vienna and begins his studies at the Conservatory, studying with :

Julius Epstein : piano (Mahler's major) .

Robert Fuchs : harmony.

Franz Krenn : composition.

Although not actually a pupil of Bruckner, Mahler admires Bruckner's music, attends his lectures, and develops a friendship that will last until Bruckner's death.

2 of Mahler's classmates and closest friends are Hugo Wolf, a talented composer of lieder, and Hans Rott, gifted son of a famous actor, and Bruckner's favourite pupil. All of them fall heavily under the spell of Richard Wagner.

19 septembre 1875 : Bruckner apporte des coupures à la 2e Symphonie.

Mi-octobre à mi-décembre : The 62 year old Richard Wagner visits Vienna and attends Hans Richter's productions of « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » .

The son of a friend of Adolf von Zemlinsky moves in with the family and brings his piano. The 4 year old Alex is fascinated with the instrument, shows musical talent, and begins taking piano lessons.

25 octobre 1875 : The 45 year old Hans von Bülow tours America, and gives the premiere of Tchaikovsky's 1st Piano Concerto in Boston « Symphony Hall » .

17 novembre 1875 (10h45) : Outside the stage-door of the Vienna Opera House, wherein a rehearsal of « Tannhäuser » is in progress, Hugo Wolf (aged 15) meets Richard Wagner (aged 62) for the 1st time :

« With a truly religious awe, I gazed upon this great Master of Tone. » (Hugo Wolf)

Bruckner est approuvé par le ministère de la Culture comme initialement (jusqu'en 1880) un conférencier non rémunéré dans l'harmonie et le contrepoint à l'Université de Vienne.

18 novembre 1875 : Grâce à l'intervention du député Libéral de Haute-Autriche au Parlement, August Göllerich, père, auprès du Ministre de l'éducation, Karl Ritter von Stremayr, Anton Bruckner (51 ans) est finalement accepté à l'Université de Vienne. Cette nomination en tant qu'assistant professeur d'harmonie et de contrepoint ne signifie pas pour l'instant une augmentation de revenus (il sera rénuméré dans ses fonctions qu'à partir de 1880) mais elle lui permet d'élargir son cercle d'influence ; ce qui semble lui avoir apporté une grande satisfaction. Sa présentation inaugurale comme Maître-conférencier aura lieu le 24 avril 1876.

Ses vieux habits défraîchis, son mouchoir rouge, son large chapeau et son sens de l'humour sauront charmer les étudiants. L'icône du rebelle original face à la conformité viennoise. Ceux-ci voyaient sous le masque du villageois provincial, le visage d'un véritable génie.

Le désir de Bruckner d'aider et de partager ses connaissances musicales avec de jeunes élèves montre sa nature communicative, son altruisme et sa convivialité. Pas beaucoup de grands compositeurs avant lui ont fait preuve d'un tel dévouement.

19 novembre 1875 : Inauguration du nouvel orgue (du facteur Mauracher) à l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian.

22 novembre 1875 : Jour de première de la nouvelle production de l'Opéra « Tannhäuser » (la version de Paris) de Richard Wagner dirigée à Vienne par le chef Hans Richter ; le tout sous la supervision du compositeur.

15 décembre 1875 : Jour de première de la nouvelle production de l'Opéra « Lohengrin » de Richard Wagner dirigée à Vienne par le chef Hans Richter ; le tout sous la supervision du compositeur.

In Paris, Frédéric Triébert produces his « Système 6 » oboe, which is essentially the same as the most commonly used oboes of the present time. This completes the evolution of the modern orchestral woodwind section which had begun with the release of Theobald Böhm's flute, in 1832.

L'Alliance avec l'Allemagne et la crise balkanique (1876-1878)

La naissance, en 1871, de l'Empire Allemand conduisit les Habsbourg à ré-orienter leur politique extérieure vers les Balkans. L'intention du Ministre des Affaires étrangères, le Comte hongrois Gyula Andrassy, était de préserver le « statu quo ». Adoptant une attitude amicale envers l'Allemagne, Andrassy promit que l'Autriche-Hongrie n'interviendrait pas dans les affaires internes à son voisin germanique. En échange, l'Allemagne soutiendrait les tentatives de limiter l'influence de la Russie dans le sud-est de l'Europe. Quand la Russie défait les Ottomans en 1878, l'Autriche-Hongrie, soutenue par l'Allemagne et la Grande-Bretagne, intervint pour empêcher les Russes de s'emparer des toutes les possessions Ottomanes en Europe. C'est le Congrès de Berlin (juin 1878) qui limita les acquisitions russes ; il permit également à l'Autriche-Hongrie d'administrer les ex-provinces ottomanes de Bosnie et d'Herzégovine (occupées puis annexées) . Ce fut la dernière campagne victorieuse de l'armée austro-hongroise.

En 1879, l'Allemagne et l'Autriche-Hongrie signèrent un pacte d'alliance défensive contre la Russie auquel se joignit l'Italie en 1882, formant ainsi la Triple Alliance. Dès sa conception, cette alliance (qui aurait du, selon la Double Monarchie, maintenir la position internationale de l'Autriche-Hongrie) fut dominée par l'Allemagne, laquelle subordonna la Double Monarchie à ses propres intérêts politiques et diplomatiques. Le coup d'État à Belgrade (en 1903) et la création de la Triple Entente (France, Grande-Bretagne et Russie) achevèrent de polariser la situation diplomatique en Europe.

La Serbie, devenue indépendante de l'Empire Ottoman au Congrès de Berlin, devint un « satellite » de l'Autriche-Hongrie jusqu'en 1903, lorsque de nouveaux dirigeants arrivés au pouvoir tentèrent de fédérer tous les Slaves du Sud (yougoslaves) de la monarchie habsbourgeoise, incluant la Bosnie-Herzégovine, en un grand État serbe. Mais, en 1908, après une révolution en Bosnie, au cœur de l'Empire Ottoman, l'Autriche-Hongrie annexa les 2 provinces, mettant l'Europe devant le fait accompli. Les serbes, soutenus par son nouvel allié russe, protestèrent avec véhémence. Il fallut tout le poids de l'Allemagne pour qu'une guerre généralisée soit alors évitée. Cependant, la Serbie sortie victorieuse des guerres balkaniques (1912-1913) et agrandit son territoire d'une partie de la Macédoine aux dépens de la Bulgarie. Les dirigeants austro-hongrois se convainquirent que la guerre avec la Serbie était devenue inévitable.

Anton Bruckner demande à devenir professeur avec salaire. Ce qui lui sera refusé. (C'est seulement à partir de 1878 qu'on lui accordera une modeste rémunération qui, avec ce qu'il gagne au Conservatoire, va lui permettre de sortir définitivement de la pauvreté.)

Excédé et déçu, Bruckner écrira la même année :

« Même si j'habite Vienne depuis 1868, je continue à regretter d'y être venu parce que le support, la reconnaissance et les moyens de subsistance continuent à manquer. »

Fort dans l'adversité, Bruckner amorcera une période d'intenses révisions comme celles des 3e et 5e Symphonies, des 3 grandes Messes et il composera même un nouveau Finale pour sa 4e Symphonie.

5 janvier 1876 : The 57 year old Franz von Suppé produces his Operetta, « Fatinitza » , at the Carltheater in Vienna. It proves to be a huge success, running for more than 100 performances, with the March « Vorwärts mit frischem Muth » , proving a particular hit. The Opera, as a whole, is no longer in the popular repertory, but the Overture is performed as a stand-alone piece.

« Fatinitza » will also run in London and Paris in the next few years.

14 février 1876 : In America, Alexander Graham Bell and Elisha Gray both file their papers at the Patent Office for the invention of the telephone ; Bell beating Gray by just a few hours.

20 février 1876 : Ire représentation à Vienne de la version de 1875-1876 de la 2e Symphonie, sous la direction du compositeur.

2 mars 1876 : Richard Wagner visits Vienna, for the last time, to conduct his Opera, « Lohengrin » . Gustav Mahler finds himself next to Wagner in the coat-room, after a concert, but is too shy to speak to him.

Sometime during 1876 : Gustav Mahler, 15 or 16 years old, composes his earliest surviving piece, the 1st movement of a Piano Quartet in A minor. At the end of his 1st year at the Vienna Conservatory, he wins 2 1st prizes from the Conservatory : one for piano with his playing of a Franz Schubert Sonata ; and one for composition with a Quintet movement. (There is much confusion about Mahler's early Quartets and Quintets : only the Piano Quartet movement has survived intact, and references to Quintets may, in fact, concern this movement.)

Hans Rott's father (a famous comic actor in Vienna) dies. He was crippled in 1874 by a stage accident. He leaves the 17 year old, orphaned and broke. His teacher Anton Bruckner allows Rott to continue his studies at the Vienna Conservatory, free of charge.

Autour du printemps 1876 : Bruckner revises his autograph score. A 2nd copy of the score of the 1874 version of the 4th Symphony is made.

24 avril 1876 : Lors de l'allocution d'ouverture qui se tient dans l'auditorium de la faculté de musique de l'Université de Vienne, le professeur Anton Bruckner, 51 ans, reçoit une ovation monstre de la part de tous les étudiants présents. Elle va durer plusieurs minutes. Une absence remarquée, celle du professeur d'histoire de la musique, Eduard Hanslick.

Il s'exprime d'un ton inspiré à la tribune devant la jeune génération qui embrasse avec tant d'enthousiasme sa cause. Bruckner se plaira à surnommer affectueusement ses élèves et ses admirateurs à l'Université : ses « Gaudeamuses » :

« Gentleman, just as it is the task of any branch of science to order and sift its material according to laws and rules, so the science of music, if I may called it that, as dissected its entire substance down to its very atoms and grouped its elements according to certain laws thus creating a theoretical structure which could also be termed the architecture of music. In my lectures, I shall endeavour to further understanding by precise exposition and to give life to the dry bones of theory by graphic examples bearing un mind the words of Gœthe : " All theory is grey but green the golden tree of life. " . »

Lors de sa Ire conférence à Iéna, le grand poète allemand Friedrich von Schiller a énoncé cette maxime : « Toutes les théories sont grises. Le vert représente l'arbre doré de la vie. » .

Au départ, ils demandaient à ses étudiants de respecter les règles établies par la tradition alors que les audacieux changements de tonalité de ses Symphonies représentaient des innovations radicales.

Les attaques soutenues des critiques viennois envers les compositions de Bruckner amèneront les élèves à se regrouper derrière leur Maître bien-aimé : c'était là son seul espoir. Ils vont lui permettre d'étendre son influence dans la capitale et à l'étranger.

29 avril 1876 : Anton Bruckner writes to Lord Chamberlain Prince Constantin Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, requesting appointment to the vacant position of assistant music-director of the Vienna « Hofkapelle » . He will not be successful.

16 mai 1876 : La 5e Symphonie est terminée (pour le moment) .

Amis et ennemis de Bruckner

During his life time, Bruckner was considered to have been something of a fool by a good many of his contemporaries. Sketches and anecdotes by his pupils, peers, friends and confidantes abound in descriptions of everything from his eccentric manner of dress and rustic accent to his idiosyncratic personal habits. These reminiscences range from the rather cruel, through the bewildered, to those of awed admiration. Johannes Brahms thought him a « poor, deluded person » who wrote « Symphonic boa constrictors » , which, no doubt to Brahms's mind, squeezed the life out of their audiences. The vitriolic and influential pro-Brahms, anti-Wagner critic, Eduard Hanslick was similarly visceral in his condemnation of Bruckner and his work, describing his 3rd Symphony as « A vision of Beethoven's 9th becoming friendly with Wagner's « Valkyries » , and finishing-up trampled under their hooves. » . The conductor Felix Weingartner recalled being soured to Bruckner at Wagner's grave, shortly after the great composer's death, due to Bruckner relating the success of his latest Symphony, in loud, seemingly disrespectful tones.

On a slightly brighter note, his sometime pupil, the violinist Fritz Kreisler found him to be « a man without guile » , who had 2 sets of coordinates in his life : « music and religion » . Other contemporaneous figures and devoted acolytes recall Bruckner as having a « great child like soul » , living « in a world totally foreign to us » or in a florid passage from another pupil, Friedrich Klose, that the devout Roman Catholic Bruckner believed in « the omnipotence, wisdom and benevolence of his God and the promise of a better life after death » . Larger personalities of the day add their weight to the issue, including Gustav Mahler, who had never been an actual pupil of Bruckner's : Bruckner had an untainted happiness, which at times was youthful, almost child like, as well as an inherently trusting nature. Thus, despite the large gap between us, we had a friendly relationship. And so I may, with more right than most, call myself his « pupil » , and I will always do this in grateful admiration.

Guido Adler (1855-1941) : Austrian musicologist and teacher who was one of the founders of modern musicology. Born in Moravia (currently, Ivancice, Czech Republic) . A pupil of Anton Bruckner.

August Wilhelm Ambros : The Austrian composer and music historian (of Czech descent) was born on 17 November 1816 at Mýto, Rokycany District, Bohemia, and died on 28 June 1876, in Vienna. His father was a cultured man, and his mother was the sister of Raphael Georg Kiesewetter (1773-1850) , the musical archaeologist and collector. Ambros studied at the University of Prague and was well-educated in music and the arts, which were his abiding passion. He was, however, destined for the law and an official career in the Austrian civil service, and he occupied various important posts under the Ministry of justice, music being an avocation.

From 1850 onwards, he became well-known as a critic and essay-writer, and, in 1860, he began working on his « magnum opus » , his « History of Music » , which was published at intervals from 1862 in 5 volumes, the last 2 (1878, 1882) being edited and completed by Otto Kade and Wilhelm Langhans.

August Wilhelm Ambros was professor of the history of music at Prague, from 1869 to 1871. Also in Prague, he seated on the Board of governors in the Prague Royal Conservatory. By 1872, he was living in Vienna and was employed by the Department of Justice as an officer and by Prince Rudolf's family as his tutor. Through his work in Vienna, he was given leave of absence for half the year, in order to let him travel the world to collect musical information to include in his « History of Music » book. He was an excellent pianist, and the author of numerous compositions somewhat reminiscent of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Ambros died at the age of 59.

Julius Bayer : Austrian organist and Choir-Master in Steyr. A son of Julia Bayer (1862-1921) and a friend of Anton Bruckner. Wrote memoirs about him.

Baron Hans Guido von Bülow (January 8, 1830 - February 12, 1894) was a German conductor, virtuoso pianist, and composer of the Romantic era. One of the most famous conductors of the 19th Century, his activity was critical for establishing the successes of several major composers of the time, especially Richard Wagner and Johannes Brahms. Along with Carl Tausig, Bülow was perhaps the most prominent of the early students of Hungarian virtuoso pianist, conductor and composer Franz Liszt. He became acquainted with and eventually married Liszt's daughter Cosima, who later left him for Wagner. Noted for his interpretation of the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, he was one of the earliest European musicians to tour the United States.

Felix Otto Dessooff (1835-1892) : Conductor at Vienna Opera and Vienna Philharmonic (1860-1875) . He was critical of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies.

Ignaz Dorn (1830-1872) : Austrian composer, violinist and conductor. Kapellmeister of the Linz Stadttheater. Encouraged Anton Bruckner to write Symphonies and to study works by Richard Wagner, Hector Berlioz and Franz Liszt.

Friedrich Eckstein (born on 17 February 1861 in Perchtoldsdorf, Lower-Austria - died on 10 November 1939 in Vienna) : A brilliant Austrian philosopher, theosophist, polymath, mathematician and chemist, he was also a passionate music lover. He cultivated a wide circle of acquaintance amongst the leading thinkers, writers and musicians of Vienna. (He was a friend and temporary co-worker of Sigmund Freud.) Eckstein produced multiple books on Bruckner including some « recollections » .

August Göllerich, Junior. (1859-1923) : A pupil and friend of Anton Bruckner. He wrote a major biography with the assistance of Max Auer entitled : « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffenbild. » (1922) .

Robert Haas (1886-1960) : Musicologist, conductor and composer born in Prague. Noted editor of Anton Bruckner scores besides Leopold Nowak. The director of the music section of the Austrian National Library in Vienna.

Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904) : Music critic of Vienna born in Prague. Promoted neo-Classical music of Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms. Often launched vicious attacks on Anton Bruckner's work. Major leader of opposition to the Wagnerian faction. Studied law in Prague and received a doctorate from the University of Vienna (1849) .Worked at Ministry of Finance and Education. Music critic for the Viennese newspaper, « Wiener Zeitung » , « Die Presse » , « Neue Freie Press » . Lecturer at University of Vienna from 1856 to 1896. His best-known book is the « The Beautiful in Music » .

Josef Hellmesberger, Senior. (3 November 1828 - 24 October 1893) : Austrian violinist, conductor, and composer born in Vienna, he was the son of musician and pedagogue, Georg Hellmesberger, Senior (1800-1873) , was taught violin by his father at the Vienna Conservatoire. Hellmesberger hails from a family of notable musicians including : brother, Georg Junior (1830-1852) ; son, Josef Junior (1855-1907) ; and son Ferdinand (1863-1940) .

In 1851, Hellmesberger became violin professor at the Vienna Conservatory, artistic director and conductor of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » concerts as well as director of the Vienna Conservatory. After the division of the 2 roles, in 1859, he remained director of the Conservatory, while Johann Herbeck became conductor of the concerts. In 1849, Hellmesberger founded the Hellmesberger Quartet. Later his son, Josef Junior, joined playing 2nd violin. He surrendered leadership and 1st chair to Josef Junior, in 1887. In 1860, he became concert Master of the Court Opera Orchestra and took on various other positions in Vienna's music life. He was professor until 1877, but continued on as director until his death in Vienna.

Josef Hellmesberger, Junior : Austrian composer, violinist and conductor Josef « Pepi » Hellmesberger, Junior was born on 9 April 1855. He was the son of violinist and conductor Josef Hellmesberger, Senior (1828-1893) , who was his 1st teacher. Among his family of notable musicians include : grandfather, Georg, Senior (1800-1873) ; uncle, Georg, Junior (1830-1852) ; and brother, Ferdinand (1863-1940) .

In 1875, Josef « Pepi » Hellmesberger became a member of his father's Hellmesberger Quartet, while, in 1887, he became leader. In 1878, Hellmesberger became solo violinist of the Vienna Court Chapel and professor at the Vienna Conservatory. In 1890, he was the 1st « Hofkapellmeister » at the Vienna Court Opera, and, from 1901 to 1903, he was principal conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic. In 1904-1905, he was « Kapellmeister » at the « Stuttgarter Hoftheater » . His compositions include 22 Operettas, 6 Ballets, dance music and lieder. Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, died in Vienna on 26 April 1907, at the age of 52.

Theodor (Otto) Helm (born on April 9, 1843, in Vienna, and died December 25, 1920, in Vienna) was an Austrian music-critic and writer. His parents, Doctor Julius Helm (1813-1844) and Julie Freiin von Forstern, had married a year earlier, in 1842. Theodor was their only child. Julius Helm died when Theodor was only 1 year old. His mother remarried Karl Müller (1813-1868) , a prominent music-critic from « nobility » , who was largely responsible for introducing young Theodor to Vienna's musical events and salons. Theodor's mother died when he was 15, leaving Theodor in the care of Julius's uncle, Friedrich Draths Schmidt, who was friends of Robert and Clara Schumann.

Johann (von) Herbeck (1831-1877) : An Austrian friend and most ardent supporter of Anton Bruckner. Conductor at Gesellschaftskonzerte (1859) . Professor at the Vienna Conservatory. The director of the Court Opera (1870) . In 1865, he discovered the original score of Franz Schubert's Unfinished Symphony. In 1876, he conducted Johannes Brahms' 1st Symphony. Herbeck was scheduled to conduct the première of Anton Bruckner's 3rd Symphony in 1877. But Herbeck's sudden death forced the composer to conduct the premiere himself.

Carl Hrubý (1869-1940) : An Austrian pupil of Anton Bruckner. Writer on music. Wrote recollections of Anton Bruckner :

« Meine Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » (1901) , Er. Franz Schalk Verlag, Wien.

Fritz Kreisler (1875-1962) : A pupil of Anton Bruckner and a famous violinist.

Felix von Kraus (1870-1937) : Married to American contralto Adrienne von Kraus-Osborne. Felix von Kraus studied with Anton Bruckner. He wrote memoirs about the composer. The couple lived in Munich (1908-1935) where they both were vocal teachers. Felix was an early interpreter of the works of Johannes Brahms.

Hermann Levi (1839-1900) : A German conductor. Born in Giessen, the son of a Jewish Rabbi. Attended Conservatory in Leipzig. Conducted at Rotterdam, Karlsruhe and Munich. Conducted première of Wagner's « Parsifal » in 1882 and revived Mozart's Così fan tutte in 1890. Conducted some of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies such as the 7th. Anton Bruckner worshipped Levi as his Musical Father but it is often mentioned that Levi's rejection of the original version of Bruckner's 8th Symphony caused grave depression for the composer.

Ferdinand Löwe (1865-1925) : An Austrian conductor who was a pupil of Anton Bruckner. He was one of the main popularizers of Bruckner's Symphonies. He would sometimes persuade the composer to rearrange his music in order to make it more palatable to the public. In the case of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9, Löwe himself made significant changes (by editing and publishing) to the harmony, orchestration, phrasing and dynamics before the posthumous première in February 1903. Bruckner's original conception of the Symphony was not heard until 1932 when it was revived by Siegmund von Hausegger, Löwe's successor at Munich. The Symphony is today performed without Löwe's changes.

Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) : Born in Kaliste, Bohemia. Currently, Ivancice, Czech Republic. A pupil of Anton Bruckner. Conductor, symphonist and lieder composer.

Anton Meißner (1855-1932) : An Austrian pupil of Anton Bruckner. Worked as a private secretary of Anton Bruckner in his late years. Wrote recollections of the composer.

Felix Mottl (1856-1911) : Austrian conductor and composer born in Unter Sankt Veit (today Hietzing, Vienna) . His date of birth has been reported variously as 29 July, 24 August, and 29 August. A pupil of Anton Bruckner. Considered as the Wagnerian conductor. Conducted at Bayreuth, in 1876, and the Opera « Tristan und Isolde » , in 1886.

Arthur Nikisch (1855-1922) : A Hungarian conductor. A student of Anton Bruckner at the Conservatory. He conducted the Leipzig Opera, the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, the Budapest Opera, the Boston Symphony, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, the London Philharmonic Orchestra and the Philharmonic Orchestra in Hamburg. Conducted the premiere of Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony in Leipzig, on 30 December 1884.

Leopold Nowak (1904-1991) : Austrian musicologist. A student of Robert Haas. Noted editor of Anton Bruckner scores besides Robert Haas. The director of the music section of the Austrian National Library in Vienna (after Haas) .

Max von Oberleithner (1868-1935) : A pupil of Anton Bruckner. Wrote memoirs about the composer.

Hans Richter or János Richter (born on 4 April 1843 - died on 5 December 1916) : An Austrian-Hungarian Orchestral and Operatic conductor born in Raab (in Hungarian : Győr) , Kingdom of Hungary, in the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Hans Rott (1 August 1858 - 25 June 1884) Hans Rott was an Austrian composer. His music is little known today, though, he received high praise in his time from the likes of Gustav Mahler and Anton Bruckner.

Franz Schalk (1863-1931) : Austrian pupil of Anton Bruckner who often edited and performed his work.

Josef Schalk (1857-1901) : Austrian pupil of Anton Bruckner who often edited and performed his work.

August Stradal (born 17 May 1860 in Teplice, Bohemia - died on 13 March 1930 in Krásná Lipa) : Bohemian pianist and music teacher. A student of Anton Bruckner, he made solo piano arrangements of that composer's Symphonies Nos. 1, 2, 5, 6, and 8. His pianistic credentials included studies with both Theodor Leschetizky and Franz Liszt. He received the Czechoslovak State Award, in 1928.

Cosima Wagner (1837-1930) : Born in Bellagio, Lombardy. Daughter of the Hungarian composer Franz Liszt (1811-1886) , the wife of the German Operatic composer Richard Wagner (1813-1883) and the ex-wife of the German conductor Hans von Bülow (1830-1894) . The director of the Bayreuth Festival, from 1883 to 1908.

Rudolf Weinwurm (born in 1835 at Schaidldorf on the Thaja, Lower-Austria - died in 1911 in Vienna) : Austrian jurist, vocal-music composer, musicologist and choir leader. Weinwurm studied law at University of Vienna, but he turned to study music. He won the 1st prize at the Festival of the Choral Societies of Upper-Austria and Salzburg, in 1865.

Hugo Wolf (1868-1903) : Born in Windischgraz, Austria. Currently, Slovenj Gradec, Slovenia. A pupil of Anton Bruckner and a composer of German Lied.

Autres élèves d'Anton Bruckner au Conservatoire (I)

De ce Maître qui entretenait avec eux des relations quasi familiales, la plupart de ses étudiants garderont un souvenir impérissable, l'honorant de multiples façons dans leurs écrits. Certains, comme Gustav Mahler, suivirent ses conférences à la fois au Conservatoire et à l'Université. Bruckner eut, en outre, des élèves privés ; et un Hugo Wolf devait plaider pour lui avec acharnement dans le « Wiener Salonblatt », et se réclamer de lui sans jamais avoir pris ses leçons. Le terme de « Seconde école viennoise » doit donc s'appliquer, non pas au groupe de Schœnberg (qui sera la « 3e ») mais à celui constitué par Anton Bruckner et ses 2 principaux héritiers Hugo Wolf et Gustav Mahler, avec aussi quelques autres noms, comme par exemple Franz Schmidt et Guido Adler. Malgré de grandes divergences de pensée et de style, des affinités musicales frappantes les liaient sur le plan de l'écriture et même de certaines citations explicites ; et l'on ne saurait trop souligner l'antériorité de Bruckner dans les conquêtes de forme et de langage qui allaient marquer la fin du siècle et aboutir à l'éclatement du monde tonal.

Hugo Wolf, élève, compositeur et critique musical à ses heures avait publié un article retentissant au sujet de son professeur. Les 2 génies n'ont cependant jamais développé de liens intimes. La grande différence d'âge y était pour beaucoup. Mais Bruckner adorait le jeune et fougueux créateur. Il avait sa musique en haute estime. Il en sera de même pour Wolf.

L'élève Hugo Wolf

Quant à son œuvre, elle est à l'univers du lied ce que celle de Richard Wagner est à l'univers de l'Opéra : un rocher incontournable.

Hugo Wolf : compositeur autrichien, qui donnait les plus belles espérances, auteur de nombreux Lieder, d'un Opéra : Le Corrégidor (joué avec succès à Graz) , depuis quelques années mort à la vie intellectuelle et interné dans un asile d'aliénés des environs de Vienne.

Introduction

Le centenaire de la mort d'Hugo Wolf en 2003 semblait passer inaperçu au milieu de toutes les autres commémorations. La discrétion qui entoure l'œuvre et la vie de ce compositeur, du moins dans les régions non germanophones, nous prive d'une musique certes ardue mais d'une grande qualité artistique.

La majeure partie du catalogue d'Opus de Hugo Wolf est composée de lieder, un genre qu'il porta à un sommet de perfection. En s'éloignant du modèle d'essence plus populaire pratiqué avant lui par Franz Schubert et Robert Schumann, Wolf impose une connaissance approfondie de la langue allemande, représentant par là un obstacle à la perception instantanée de l'adéquation entre le texte et la musique. Cet élément explique pour une large part la place peu importante tenue par l'œuvre de Hugo Wolf dans la programmation des concerts ainsi que dans le répertoire discographique. Surnommé le « Wagner du lied » à cause de la communauté de langage et des affinités naturelles entretenues avec le Maître de Bayreuth, Wolf conçoit ses lieder comme des Poèmes symphoniques miniatures dans lesquels l'esprit du poème se trouve magnifié. Une osmose se crée entre la musique du langage et le langage musical, générant à la fois les intervalles et le rythme, permettant ainsi à l'auditeur de pénétrer très profondément dans l'univers du poète. Grâce à une sensibilité extraordinaire, Wolf réussit à capter et à transposer en sons les plus infimes variations de l'âme humaine.

Mais l'œuvre ne doit pas faire oublier l'homme qui en fut l'auteur et son destin tragique, celui d'un vrai héros Romantique. La personnalité d'Hugo Wolf se devine peu au travers de son œuvre tant il considérait que l'homme doit tout sacrifier à cette dernière. « L'homme n'est que l'instrument de l'œuvre » .

Sa correspondance avec sa famille et ses amis permet de tracer de lui, le portrait d'un homme tour à tour exalté et déprimé, doutant de lui-même ou au contraire faisant preuve d'un orgueil démesuré. Profondément humain dans ses contradictions, Hugo Wolf fut reconnu en son temps comme un génie de la musique et apprécié aussi bien par les spécialistes que par un vaste public. Dans « Vienne au crépuscule » , l'auteur Arthur Schnitzler fait allusion à la beauté du lied « Auf ein altes Bild » . Il est rare de voir un écrivain rendre ainsi hommage à un musicien contemporain, témoignant de la notoriété acquise par l'œuvre de ce dernier en ce XIXe siècle finissant. Cette gloire recherchée, enfin atteinte, Wolf en eut-il conscience alors qu'il entraît progressivement dans les ténèbres de la folie ?

Études musicales et lers conflits

Hugo Wolf naît à Windischgraz, actuellement Slovenjgradec, en Slovénie, le 13 mars 1860. Il apprend le piano et le violon avec son père, Philipp Wolf, et participe aux petits concerts familiaux grâce auxquels, il découvre l'Opéra italien. Il est courant dans ces réunions d'interpréter au piano des pots-pourris d'airs d'Opéra de Bellini ou de Donizetti. Voici donc ses lres émotions musicales. Son père ayant remarqué ses dons musicaux, Hugo est confié à Sebastian Weixler avec lequel il travaille le piano et approfondit ses connaissances de la théorie musicale.

Après un parcours scolaire difficile, Hugo réalise enfin son rêve d'entreprendre une carrière musicale.

En 1875, il entre au Conservatoire de Vienne où il étudie le piano avec Wilhelm Schenner, l'harmonie avec Robert Fuchs et la composition avec Franz Krenn. Il a pour condisciple Gustav Mahler et découvre, à la même époque, la musique de Richard Wagner qui faisait figure d'avant-garde à Vienne. C'est une véritable révélation pour Hugo Wolf dont le tempérament exalté le pousse à rencontrer Wagner pour lui présenter ses lres compositions et à se convertir aux doctrines du Maître. Parmi ses lers essais, figurent des pièces pour piano, un Concerto pour violon et des lieder (DW7187 - DW7161) .

En 1877, soit après 2 ans de Conservatoire, le jeune rebelle de 17 ans quitte sa classe de composition, trouvant trop académique l'enseignement de Franz Krenn. Cette insolence entraînera automatiquement son expulsion. Il dira même au directeur qu'il sentait qu'il perdait son temps comme étudiant, ce qui lui faisait oublier tout ce qu'il avait déjà appris.

Wolf ne s'inscira à aucune autre institution. Il va décider de prendre le chemin de l'autodidacte, mais à quel prix !

Le Scherzo et le Rondo Final pour grand orchestre (DW7021) sont les seuls mouvements achevés de la Symphonie qu'il entreprit d'écrire dans les années 1876-1877. On y trouve, à côté de l'influence notoire de modèles antérieurs, toute la fougue de sa période de maturité associée à une belle Maîtrise du travail thématique. À la même époque, il commence la composition d'un quatuor à cordes (DW7039) qu'il achèvera en 1884. Cette pièce en 4 mouvements portant le sous-titre « Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren » possède un grand souffle lyrique même si l'influence de Richard Wagner y est très perceptible, notamment dans la 3e partie.

Les témoignages concernant les étrangetés du caractère d'Hugo Wolf ne manquent pas. Ils tracent le portrait d'un être en proie à un monde intérieur contradictoire l'entraînant successivement vers des sommets d'exaltation pour s'effondrer peu après dans des gouffres de mélancolie et de doutes. Cette instabilité se manifeste tout d'abord dans les nombreux déménagements qu'effectua le compositeur tout au long de sa vie.

Hugo Wolf donne des leçons privés aux enfants et commence à composer avec plus de régularité. Il trouve un soutien auprès des parents des enfants auxquels il enseigne la musique et les portes commencent à s'ouvrir devant lui. C'est ainsi, qu'en 1879, il rencontre Johannes Brahms et lui soumet certaines de ses compositions. Le contact avec le compositeur nordique n'est pas bon, Hugo Wolf le qualifie dans une des lettres écrites à ses parents de « pédant nordique ». Cette antipathie pour la personne du compositeur ne se démentira jamais. La même année, Wolf fait la connaissance de Mélanie Köchert, l'épouse d'un bijoutier de la cour de Vienne qui deviendra son amie, sa protectrice autant que sa confidente. Les contacts et les amitiés souvent orageuses que Wolf a su établir dans le milieu de la bourgeoisie viennoise élargissent son univers, lui assurant des vacances au grand air pendant les mois d'été, lui permettant de découvrir la littérature étrangère et lui procurant à l'occasion un emploi ou une retraite pour composer à son aise. C'est ainsi que, en 1881, il est engagé comme chef de chœurs au Théâtre municipal de Salzbourg puis comme « Kapellmeister » en second. Son manque de compétence en tant que chef d'orchestre met un terme à son contrat ; cette expérience ne semble pas l'avoir affecté, il retourne à Vienne et retrouve la vie musicale ardente de la grande ville.

Lors du Festival de Bayreuth, en 1882, Hugo Wolf réussit à dénicher de l'argent pour assister à « Parsifal » à 2 reprises. Il est apparu accablé : « Colossal ! La plus inspirée et la plus sublime création de Wagner. ». Il a réitéré ce point de vue dans une carte postale adressée de Bayreuth, en 1883 : « Parsifal est sans doute, et de loin, la plus belle et la plus sublime composition du monde de l'Art. »

Maturité précoce : du « Quatuor » à « Penthésilée »

À côté d'études qu'il écourtera volontairement dès 1877 (il n'aura pas moins obtenu plusieurs récompenses), les 1res années viennoises sont surtout marquées par la découverte émerveillée du monde musical contemporain « avancé », et d'abord de Richard Wagner, que Wolf approche personnellement dès décembre 1875. C'est l'Opéra qui cristallise à cette époque toutes ses émotions il en entreprend d'ailleurs un lui-même, « König Alboin », dont quelques esquisses ont été conservées. Mais l'œuvre la plus originale des années de Conservatoire est de très loin la Symphonie dont seuls les 2 mouvements terminaux nous sont parvenus (ils ont été publiés sous le titre « Scherzo und Finale für grosses Orchester »), mais qui fut à l'époque menée à bien sous 2 formes différentes. Le Scherzo, notamment, contient déjà des trouvailles très remarquables (le modèle privilégié de Wolf était alors Hector Berlioz).

Menant déjà une vie déréglée, il se satisfait de modestes leçons, et n'occupera que pendant quelques mois, fin 1881, l'emploi de chef de chœur au Théâtre de Salzbourg, sous la direction de Karl Muck. C'est un échec qui portera plus tard ses fruits, car, non seulement il détermine l'ambition de Wolf de s'imposer un jour au théâtre, mais il contribue à lui montrer sa voie, celle du style comique, et à l'éloigner du drame wagnérien.

De sa passion orageuse pour la jeune Valentine (« Wally ») Franck, nièce d'un professeur au Collège de France, à qui il a d'abord donné quelques leçons de piano, émergent 6 Chœurs sacrés d'après Eichendorff (1881). L'écho s'en fait entendre aussi dans l'œuvre majeure de ces années de maturité précoce, le vaste Quatuor à cordes en « ré » mineur, qui portera en suscription ces mots tirés du « Faust » de Goethe : « Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren ! » (Ce ne sera là que le 1er de multiples renoncements !). De dimension beethovénienne (mais le souffle lyrique doit autant à Franz Schubert qu'à Wagner), ce Quatuor, entrepris dès 1878, mais terminé seulement en 1884, sera reconnu dès sa création en février 1903, à la veille de la mort du compositeur, comme une partition prophétique qui influencera notamment 2 des principaux admirateurs de Wolf : Max Reger et Arnold Schœnberg.

Il semble bien que Wolf était sur le point de réaliser la percée qu'il recherchait. Mais le jeune enflammé allait encore au-devant d'une déconvenue avec l'œuvre unique qu'il allait laisser pour l'orchestre, et qui est aussi le legs fondamental de cette 1re partie de sa vie créatrice : l'ambitieux Poème symphonique « Penthésilée », entrepris à l'instigation de Franz Liszt, en 1883, et terminé 2 ans plus tard. Présentée en 1886, lors d'une séance de lecture à vue des « nouveautés » par la Philharmonie de Vienne, l'œuvre devait y être tournée en dérision par le chef conservateur Hans Richter, furieux de voir Wolf, le critique du « Wiener Salonblatt », déchirer à belles dents la musique de « Maître Brahms ». Il est temps aujourd'hui de reconnaître enfin combien « Penthésilée » non seulement surclasse ses modèles lisztien, mais se situe au-delà de toutes les futures productions similaires d'un Richard Strauss : et cela, grâce à la seule connaissance que Wolf pouvait avoir déjà de la Symphonie brucknérienne par les 2 ouvrages de son grand aîné (les Symphonies n° 3 et n° 4) qu'il avait déjà entendus.

Si le propos dramatique (ici, le schéma fourni par Heinrich von Kleist) est traduit avec un surprenant réalisme, l'œuvre de Wolf répond en effet, de surcroît, à une structure Symphonique dont l'unité interne, cimentée par l'intervalle de seconde mineure qui gouverne tous les thèmes, n'est pas moins parfaite que celle qu'on rencontre chez Bruckner, à la même époque. Il s'agit, en fait, du trait d'union historique entre les poèmes symphoniques de Liszt et le « Pelléas et Mélisande » d'Arnold Schœnberg !

Les compositions réalisées par Wolf, de 1878 à 1887, témoignent de sa part d'une grande recherche dans l'expression. Il écrit successivement : « Sechs geistliche Lieder » , pour chœur mixte, a cappella, sur des textes de Joseph von Eichendorff (1881) ; un Quatuor à cordes en ré mineur, avec en épigraphe cette maxime, qui résume à elle seule toute une vie : « Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren » (Prive-toi, tu dois te priver) de 1878 à 1884 ; « Penthesilée » , poème symphonique d'après un drame de Kleist (1883-1885) ; Intermezzo (1886) , pour quatuor à cordes ; Sérénade italienne (version pour quatuor, 1887 ; version pour petit orchestre à cordes, 1892) .

Il est important de noter que les 2 axes essentiels de l'expressivité du compositeur, qui ne s'épanouira véritablement que dans ses lieder, sont déjà en place : la voie intérieure, religieuse (« Sechs geistliche Lieder ») , voire mystique, présente dans chacun de ses recueils jusqu'au dernier (les 3 « Michelangelo Lieder » , en 1897) , et son attirance vers le Sud, qui trouvera dans l' « Italienisches Liederbuch » son expression accomplie.

Retraçant le destin d'une héroïne quasi wagnérienne (à la fois Brünnhilde, Kundry et Isolde) , la seule pièce d'orchestre de Wolf, « Penthesilée, a été commencée peu avant que Wolf ne devînt le critique musical du « Wiener Salonblatt » . Cette activité, qu'il exerce avec passion de 1884 à 1887, si elle lui laisse trop peu de disponibilité pour composer, lui permet pourtant de préciser ses goûts. Il s'élève contre l'adulation dont Johannes Brahms (qui a malgré lui réuni sur son nom les forces de la « réaction » musicale) est l'objet ; il se fait l'apôtre de Franz Liszt et d'Hector Berlioz et dénonce le conservatisme des programmes du Philharmonique, le laisser-aller des chanteurs d'Opéra : en un mot, il s'élève contre la « Schlamperei » ambiante (routine et désordre) , qui va trouver au tournant du siècle son adversaire le plus féroce en Gustav Mahler.

Le Poème symphonique « Penthésilée » est la seule œuvre symphonique pour grand orchestre du compositeur autrichien Hugo Wolf (1860-1903) , si l'on excepte les esquisses précoces, détruites puis rassemblées, d'une Symphonie datant de 1876-1877.

La pièce s'inspire de la tragédie du même nom de Heinrich von Kleist. Elle dépeint les actions de « Penthésilée » , reine des Amazones, qui, tour à tour, combat à Troie, rêve d'amour, et meurt de haine et de passion. Elle fut composée entre 1883 et 1885, et comporte 3 parties :

Départ des Amazones pour Troie.

Le Rêve de Penthésilée lors de la fête de la Rose.

Combats, passions, folie, destruction.

L'œuvre se retrouva au centre d'une polémique, née des critiques proférées par Hugo Wolf, placé sous l'influence de

Richard Wagner et d'Anton Bruckner, contre Johannes Brahms. Wolf fut, dès lors, la cible des admirateurs fervents de Brahms. Le chef Hans Richter accepta de jouer l'œuvre avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, le 15 octobre 1886.

À ce moment précis, Richter interrompit l'exécution et dit, sous les rires des musiciens :

« Messieurs, je ne voudrais pas insister pour vous faire jouer cette pièce jusqu'à la fin ; je voulais seulement que vous entendiez mieux ce que peut composer l'homme qui a osé écrire de telles choses contre notre Maître Brahms. »

Cette scène a contribué à jeter l'œuvre dans l'oubli, et elle reste rarement jouée encore aujourd'hui, bien que les spécialistes la reconnaissent comme un des sommets de la forme du poème symphonique, dépassant pour certains celle de Richard Strauß, du point de vue de l'instrumentation et de la puissance d'évocation, et annonçant l'écriture de Gustav Mahler.

Rarement jouée, « Penthésilée » a été encore plus rarement enregistré. Le chef Daniel Barenboïm l'a gravé sur étiquette Erato, avec l'Orchestre de Paris ; Otmar Suitner sur étiquette Berlin Classics, avec la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin ; et finalement, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau sur étiquette EMI Classics, avec l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Stuttgart.

Hugo Wolf was possessed by a preternatural musical responsiveness that placed him at the forefront of all song-writers. But the 1st manifestation of this power is not in the early lieder, which are interesting mainly because they are by the future composer of the « Mörike Liederbuch », but in the Symphonic poem « Penthesilea », completed when he was 25 and inspired by Heinrich von Kleist's play. Music is the optimum medium for « Penthesilea » for Kleist's conception is thrown at so high a pitch as to be almost unperformable. Wolf and Kleist were kindred spirits, both seized, tormented, and goaded by genius to works suffused with an aura of the archetypal and eternal. Worn out by the struggle, Kleist committed suicide at 34, in 1811. Wolf went mad in the fall of 1897, in his 37th year. In Kleist's « Penthesilea », tension escalates line-by-line unfolding the tale of the Amazon queen who wreaks havoc on both sides of the Trojan war as she stalks Achilles to capture and carry him away to become her lover at the sisterhood's « Feast of Roses ». A concussion after a fall from her horse fosters her illusion that she has conquered as the unarmed Achilles, enamored of this woman « half Goddess, half Fury », approaches. When, amid their love talk, it becomes clear that Achilles intends to make her his captive, madness overtakes her and she brings him down with her bow, then savages his body with her teeth, like a raging tigress. The recognition scene, as she grasps what she has done, rivals anything from antiquity. Goethe was horrified. But the young Wolf was obsessed with « Penthesilea », carrying it with him everywhere and regaling his friends with it. As one of them recalled, « His hands trembled when he read only a few lines from it, his eyes shone and, as if in sight of a higher and brighter realm, whose doors had sprung open before him, he appeared as if transfigured. ». Wolf began sketching the music, in 1883, and completed the full-score, in 1885. The Symphonic poem is in 3 parts : « Departure of the Amazons for Troy », an uncannily stirring, nocturnal march ; « Penthesilea's Dream of the Festival of Roses », throbbingly impassioned love music for the imagined union of the Queen with Achilles ; and « Combats, Passions, Madness, Annihilation », an extended movement developing the themes of the previous 2. Less concise than Richard Strauß' « Don Juan », but more richly inspired and moving, Wolf's « Penthesilea » is Romanticism's belated swan song.

Critique musical au « Wiener Salonblatt »

Dans le but de faire éditer ses lieder (DW7147), Wolf demande l'appui du critique Eduard Hanslick, ami de Johannes Brahms et défenseur de la tradition que celui-ci représente. Les affinités avérées d'Hugo Wolf avec Richard Wagner, représentant de la nouvelle tendance aux côtés de Franz Liszt, ne sont pas de nature à disposer favorablement le critique. De plus, lorsqu'en 1883 Hugo Wolf est engagé comme chroniqueur musical au « Wiener Salonblatt » grâce à l'appui des Köchert, les violentes critiques qu'il écrit à l'encontre de la musique de Johannes Brahms lui valent de nombreuses inimitiés, Eduard Hanslick en tête. Ce poste de critique musical, qu'il occupera jusqu'en 1887, lui assure une sécurité matérielle propice à la composition. Le contraste entre le ton plutôt élégant du journal et la virulence des billets du jeune compositeur est frappant. Pourtant, ces diatribes révèlent une grande lucidité de jugement et un esprit d'analyse perçant qui lui vaudront un vif succès auprès des lecteurs. Reconnaisant l'importance de compositeurs tels que Jean-Sébastien Bach et Georg Friedrich Händel, il prend la défense de l'œuvre de Frédéric Chopin peu appréciée dans les pays germaniques. Confronté à la lutte des clans opposant, à Vienne, les conservateurs et l'avant-garde, Wolf prend parti pour Franz Liszt et Richard Wagner, décriant la musique italienne si admirée à cette époque.

À la même époque, Wolf commence à travailler à « Penthesilea » (DW7021), un Poème symphonique d'après le drame de Heinrich von Kleist (1777-1811), dans un style qui évoque les pages de Franz Liszt et d'Hector Berlioz.

La partition se divise en 3 parties : un mouvement initial tumultueux mettant les trompettes et les cors à l'écart de la masse orchestrale s'enchaîne avec une partie élégiaque pour aboutir à un final paroxystique. Le caractère narratif de la musique, opposé à la complexité de sa construction, recevra un mauvais accueil de la part du chef d'orchestre Hans Richter lors de la 1re lecture de l'œuvre à la Société Philharmonique de Vienne en 1885. Hugo Wolf qui assistait à la lecture, caché dans la salle, en fut ulcéré et mena la vie dure à Richter en écrivant quelques articles incendiaires.

Le 24 avril 1887, Hugo Wolf présente sa démission à la direction du « Wiener Salonblatt » afin de se consacrer entièrement à la composition. Il continue cependant à donner des leçons en attendant de pouvoir vivre de ses œuvres. Entre le 2 et le 4 mai de cette année, est composée la Sérénade italienne (DW7040), page légère et bien enlevée pour Quatuor à cordes qui sera adaptée pour petit orchestre en 1892 (DW1084). Une datation si précise des Opus du compositeur est rendue possible par la rigueur avec laquelle il inscrivait lui-même la date de composition sur ses manuscrits.

Cette année 1887 est marquée par 2 événements qui vont toucher profondément le compositeur : la mort de son père qui lui cause beaucoup de chagrin et l'édition de 2 volumes de lieder chez Emil Wetzler. Ces 2 événements dissemblables agissent-ils comme un déclencheur ? Une page se tourne dans sa vie et Hugo Wolf entre en possession de la Maîtrise totale de son art.

Dès le début de l'année 1888, apparaît le style de la maturité. Il n'y a donc pas chez lui d'évolution progressive vers un sommet mais une éruption brutale, à la fois de l'inspiration créatrice et du langage personnel. Pendant cette phase active qui s'étend jusqu'à l'année 1897, Wolf va connaître des pics de créativité suivis de périodes de stérilité et de dépression profonde. Ses lettres témoignent de ses doutes, de ses angoisses face à l'inspiration qui s'empare de lui comme une fièvre et l'amènent à penser qu'il est atteint de folie.

En cette période très féconde naissent les « Möricke Lieder » (DW7311) , les « Eichendorff Lieder » (DW7106) , les « Goethe Lieder » (DW7272) soit plus de 124 lieder avec accompagnement de piano dans le courant d'une année. 2 lieder sont créés à Vienne avec succès. Un concert consacré aux « Möricke Lieder » à la « Wagner-Verein » de Vienne est, lui aussi, une réussite, ce succès tant recherché ne quittera désormais plus Hugo Wolf. C'est enfin la reconnaissance. Les tournées de concerts aussi bien en Autriche qu'en Allemagne vont se succéder, consolidant ainsi les bases de sa notoriété.

Désireux de s'illustrer dans un genre qui recueillait un enthousiasme unanime au XIXe siècle, Hugo Wolf se met en quête d'un livret pour la composition d'un Opéra. C'est une entreprise de longue haleine tant les exigences du compositeur en matière de texte sont grandes.

L'année suivante est consacrée à l'achèvement des « Goethe Lieder » ainsi qu'à l'édition, après révision, des « Möricke Lieder » et des « Eichendorff Lieder » . En 11 mois, voilà composée la moitié de son œuvre. Le succès de ses lieder, qui ne cesse de croître, entraîne des tensions au sein de la « Wagner Verein » . Des clans s'y opposent. À la fin de l'année 1889, Wolf commence la composition du « Spanisches Liederbuch » (DW7405) contenant 10 lieder sur des sujets religieux et 34 lieder sur des thèmes profanes. Cet ensemble ne sera terminé que dans le courant de l'année 1890. En effet, au début de cette année, Hugo Wolf connaît une panne d'inspiration qui l'affecte profondément et fait renaître ses doutes. Il profite néanmoins de ce passage à vide pour orchestrer certains lieder et se consacrer à l'édition des « Goethe Lieder » . Il reçoit la reconnaissance des professionnels sous forme d'études critiques de son œuvre. L'éditeur Schott de Mayence s'intéresse à son travail, autre témoignage du succès qu'engendre son travail. La seconde partie de cette année est plus féconde : il termine le « Spanisches Liederbuch » , commence l'« Italienische Liederbuch » (DW7440) et crée le cycle des « Keller Lieder » (DW7107) ainsi que « Elfenlied » (DW7084) pour soprano, chœur féminin et orchestre. Un voyage en Allemagne lui permet de nouer de nouvelles relations, notamment avec Engelbert Humperdinck (1854-1921) . À Mannheim, il fait créer la cantate « Christnacht » (DW7084) pour voix solistes, chœur mixte et orchestre mais l'inspiration qui l'habite, en ce début de l'année 1891, fait place à la dépression et au silence. Ce nouveau passage à vide se double d'ennuis de santé et d'insomnies, troubles qui altèrent profondément son caractère. C'est ainsi qu'ayant décidé d'accompagner lui-même au piano les chanteurs lors des concerts consacrés à ses lieder, il se montre irascible, ne supportant aucune hésitation, aucune défaillance et manifestant violemment en public sa réprobation. La critique, malgré ses excentricités, reste élogieuse allant jusqu'à parler d'un « nouveau printemps du lied » et ce, de Berlin jusqu'à Vienne.

Les 22 lieder de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch » sont édités chez Schott, à la fin de l'année 1892.

Le lied : une production volcanique

L'échec de « Penthésilée », conséquence directe des prises de position de son auteur en faveur des « musiciens de l'avenir » contre le formalisme qui règne en Maître à Vienne sous la férule de Johannes Brahms et de Eduard Hanslick, a donc sonné le glas de l'ambition de Symphoniste de Hugo Wolf qui, d'ailleurs, abandonnera dès l'année suivante (1887) sa chronique au « Wiener Salonblatt ». Après être retourné momentanément à la musique de chambre avec l'Intermezzo en mi bémol (1886) puis surtout la célèbre Sérénade italienne (mai 1887, instrumentée en 1892), Wolf a la joie de voir paraître ses Iers cahiers de lieder imprimés, qui rencontrent un succès immédiat (1887). Ceci explique la véritable explosion à laquelle on assiste, dès l'année 1888, où voient le jour près d'une centaine de lieder géniaux, répartis en 3 grands recueils sur des vers respectivement d'Eduard Mörike (53), de Joseph von Eichendorff (13), de Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (25). Et les 2 années suivantes voient la poursuite du même effort, selon un rythme il est vrai moins soutenu, avec un second ensemble de 26 poèmes de Goethe, puis, entre octobre 1889 et avril 1890, le « Spanisches Liederbuch » (en 2 volets également). Celui-ci sera lui-même suivi du 1er des 2 recueils de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch », créé en 2 étapes, à 1 an de distance, fin 1890 et fin 1891.

Les intervalles représentent autant de silences douloureux, de crises d'impuissance dont la correspondance du musicien porte l'empreinte tragique. Au contraire, il est porté par sa propre création à des enthousiasmes parfois délirants, mais où l'émotion rejoint la terreur, ce qui donne la mesure du désordre qui s'installe dès cette époque en lui, et dont on sait aujourd'hui l'origine syphilitique (la contamination remonterait à 1877 déjà).

Des pages chorales ou scéniques de commande complètent la moisson de ces années décisives : « Christnacht », petit Oratorio de Noël d'après August von Platen (décembre 1886 - mai 1889) ; « Das Fest auf Solhaug », musique pour le drame de Henrik Ibsen (fin 1890-1891), créé au « Burgtheater » le 12 novembre 1891 et repris en concert quelques mois plus tard (et en édition posthume).

La réputation d'Hugo Wolf s'est donc établie, déjà de son vivant, essentiellement par les grands cycles de lieder dont la composition est ramassée sur une brève période de 4 années. Il s'y ajoutera, en 1896, le second recueil de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch » et des poèmes d'auteurs divers dominés par les 3 admirables « Michelangelo Lieder », son chant du cygne.

Romain Rolland, et à sa suite la plupart des biographes du compositeur, en ont conclu un peu hâtivement que toute la création de Wolf se circonscrivait à ces quelques années centrales. C'est là une vue totalement erronée, dont ce qui a été dit plus haut fait déjà justice. Mais il est commode de qualifier Wolf de « Wagner du lied » comme on a qualifié Bruckner de « Wagner de la Symphonie » ; et il reste vrai que cette forme a connu en lui son plus grand représentant après Franz Schubert.

Il n'est pas moins vrai que le compositeur lui-même fut irrité de se voir confiné à ce qu'il qualifiait de « petite forme », et ne cessa, durant les 2 grandes décennies de sa vie créatrice, d'ambitionner des réussites de 1er plan dans les genres « nobles ». Nous en avons déjà vu 2 exemples avec le Quatuor et « Penthésilée » ; c'est encore le cas de l'œuvre clé, et guère moins malchanceuse, qu'est le « Der Corregidor ».

Le sommet de l'Opéra-Comique allemand

L'insuccès du « Der Corregidor » a couramment été mis au compte de la prétendue absence de sens scénique du compositeur : l'œuvre tiendrait davantage du recueil de lieder orchestraux (au demeurant admirables) que de l'ouvrage de théâtre. Or, il s'agit de tout autre chose. En fait, l'aspect négatif de la pièce tient uniquement à la définition du caractère du héros, personnage grotesque (l'exact contraire de « Carmen ») que très peu d'interprètes savent « faire passer ». Reste qu'au terme d'une histoire longue et riche (voir notamment Lortzing, Cornelius, Goetz), le « Der Corregidor » pourrait bien représenter la véritable apogée de l'Opéra-Comique allemand, c'est-à-dire de pièces vraiment comiques mais dont la signification dépasse le simple comique. Si Wolf a retenu la leçon de Richard Wagner, il l'a, selon Pierre Balascheff, transposée en caractérisant chaque personnage par un rythme propre. Bref, loin des mauvais « mélôs » du style de « La Tosca », c'est bien plutôt vers un chef-d'œuvre comme « Falstaff » qu'il faut se tourner pour établir un parallèle.

« Der Corregidor » : un essai dans le monde de l'Opéra

Lieu : un village en Andalousie, en 1804.

Synopsis : La femme du meunier Lukas souhaite guérir son mari d'une jalousie malade. Elle feint de répondre aux avances du « Corregidor » pour obtenir un poste pour son neveu. Mais le « Corregidor » s'aperçoit du manège et décide de se venger de Fraskita.

Composé en 1895, Wolf va le réviser en 1897. Ire édition : C. F. Peters.

Tiré par Rosa von Mayreder du roman de Pedro de Alarcón « le Tricorne », « Der Corregidor » (littéralement, le Magistrat) est entrepris fiévreusement au printemps de 1895, terminé dans l'année même et créé avec un indéniable succès le 7 juin 1896 au « Nationaltheater » de Mannheim, sous la baguette de Hugo Rohr.

Solistes lors de la première :

Don Eugenio de Zuniga, le « Corregidor », interprété par le ténor bouffe Hans Rüdiger.

Juan Lopez, interprété par la basse Georg Döring.

Pedro, son secrétaire, interprété par le ténor Anton Friedrich Erl.

Tonuelo, le huissier, une voix de basse.

Repela, son serviteur, interprété par la basse Karl Marx.

Tio Lukas, le meunier, interprété par le baryton Joachim Kromer.

Un voisin, une voix de ténor.

Donna Mercedes, la femme du « Corregidor » , interprétée par la soprano Anna Sorger.

Frasquita, la femme du meunier, interprétée par la mezzo-soprano Helene Hohenleiter.

Duenna, la gouvernante, interprétée par la contralto Helene Seubert-Hansen.

Manuela, une voix de mezzo-soprano.

« Der Corregidor » sera encore repris une fois à Strasbourg, du vivant de Wolf. Après sa mort, l'Opéra va tomber très vite ; il ne fera que des apparitions sporadiques sur les scènes germaniques et trouvera cependant en Bruno Walter un défenseur enthousiaste, un chef qui le comprit vraiment dans son essence. ...

Toujours en quête d'un livret d'Opéra, Hugo Wolf consacra l'année 1893 à lire les écrits de philosophes et à apprendre le français pour élargir ses connaissances littéraires. Ces activités l'aident à faire face à la stérilité qui le désespère. À l'occasion d'un voyage à Berlin en compagnie d'Anton Bruckner en 1894, il rencontre Richard Strauß dont il n'apprécie pas la musique tout en estimant l'homme. Les tournées de concerts de cette année améliorent son état d'esprit et sa santé. Le succès est toujours au rendez-vous.

À la fin de cette année, il fait son entrée dans le fief des conservateurs : « Elfenlied » et « Feuerreiter » (DW7084) sont créés dans leur version chorale à la Société des Amis de la Musique. Il y reçoit un très bon accueil même de la part du critique Edouard Hanslick.

Enfin, en 1895, le livret d'un Opéra est trouvé. Il s'agit d'une adaptation d'une nouvelle de Pedro de Alarcón « le Tricorne » effectuée par Rosa Mayreder. Pour mener ce projet à bien, Hugo Wolf reçoit une pension de 1.500 marks réunis par ses amis. Le travail sur l'Opéra est rapide : entre le 13 mars et 29 décembre, Wolf réalisera la version pour piano et son orchestration. Il termine la tâche dans un état de transe lui faisant entrevoir un succès planétaire. Cependant, le parcours sera encore ardu jusqu'à la présentation de l'œuvre au public. Les Théâtres de Berlin, de Vienne et de Prague refusent la pièce, les uns après les autres. Enfin, le Théâtre national de Mannheim accepte de mettre l'œuvre en répétition. Hugo Wolf fournit encore un travail acharné pour corriger l'orchestration et superviser les répétitions, ce qui ne va pas sans heurts. La création de « Der Corregidor » aura lieu à Mannheim, en 1896, avec un succès mitigé. Hugo Wolf, lui-même, semble absent et manifeste une étrange indifférence lors de la représentation. Il perd les 200 marks reçus en honoraires.

De plus, l'année 1896 voit se créer à Berlin la « Wolf-Verein » , Société qui organise des concerts et concourt à faire connaître le travail du compositeur. Le second volume de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch » voit le jour dans la même foulée créatrice que l'Opéra. Mais à la fin du mois d'août, un médecin, consulté pour un trouble bénin, constate la fixité de la pupille. C'est le début de la paralysie généralisée, symptôme de la syphilis contractée avant l'âge de 20 ans et qui sera cause de sa mort, 7 ans plus tard, en 1903.

Synopsis

The Corregidor Don Eugenio de Zuniga has designs on Frasquita, the charming wife of the miller Lukas. Frasquita and Lukas make fun of the old lecher who swears vengeance furiously. He goes to the mayor, informing his wife that he will spend the night in the town hall. The mayor does him the favour of ordering Lukas there, too, and while he is on the way to the town hall, Don Eugenio approaches Frasquita undisturbed. But once more his plan fails. When Frasquita, who does not let herself be bribed by her nephew's appointment as Court secretary, hurries away indignantly, he makes himself comfortable in the miller's bed. Still sure of his success, he orders his servant to get Frasquita back. In the meantime, Lukas has seen through the conspiracy and has escaped from the town hall. At home, he finds the Corregidor's clothes in front of the bedroom, believes what he sees and sets out to recoup himself with the Corregidora for the alleged infidelity of Frasquita. Don Eugenio, who, lacking his own clothes, takes on the miller's ones, is surprised by the returning Frasquita and the judge who are looking for Lukas in the mill. Frasquita senses Lukas's designs, and all hurry to the Corregidor's house. There the Corregidora gives her judge a good « talking to », and the miller and his wife become reconciled and embrace each other.

Acte I

Scene 1 : Tio Lukas is picking grapes and preparing his millyard for the arrival of an unnamed Bishop and conversing with a neighbor. The neighbor taunts Lukas, saying that the only reason people show him any favour is because he has such a pretty wife. Lukas shrugs off the comment. The neighbor leaves, and Lukas climbs-up into an arbor to continue his preparations.

Scene 2 : Frasquita enters the yard and sets the table while singing to herself. Lukas surprises her from the arbor and teases her about the affections of the Corregidor, magistrate of the province in which they live. Lukas spies the Corregidor approaching with Repela, his servant, and goes back into hiding in order to spy on the old man's conversation.

Scene 3 : Repela enters, taking a pinch of snuff and sneezing violently. Frasquita tells him that Lukas is asleep, which Repela is interested to know. He runs off to tell his Master that Frasquita is apparently alone.

Scene 4 : The Corregidor approaches Frasquita, who flirts with him and dances a fandango. He is afraid that her dancing might wake Lukas. She threatens to wake Lukas (with the song « In dem Schatten meiner Locken » from the « Spanisches Liederbuch ») , but relents when the Corregidor urges her not to. The Corregidor is so taken by Frasquita that he is dumbstruck for a moment. He begins to woo her, and she seizes the opportunity to press for a favour she has obviously already requested many times : the appointment of her nephew as Court notary in the nearby town of Estella. The Corregidor refuses, and his advances become ever more ardent. In his passion, he loses his balance and crashes to the ground. Lukas takes this cue to reveal himself. The couple ridicules the old man, who, realizing that Lukas has heard the entire exchange, childishly vows his revenge. Frasquita offers him some grapes in order to placate him, but he hesitates.

Scene 5 : Repela, who has also been watching the entire scene, enters, intending to reprimand Frasquita for her behaviour. He is interrupted by the sound of the Bishop's arrival in the distance. Lukas and Frasquita rush off to finish their preparations, while the Corregidor sends Repela off to set his revenge plan in motion. The Bishop approaches amid an onstage brass fanfare.

Scene 1 : In the kitchen at the millhouse, Lukas and Frasquita are eating dinner and discussing, 1st teasingly, then passionately, how happy they are together. They are interrupted by a knock at the door. It is Tonuelo, one of the Alkalde's servants, coming under the banner of the « rule of law ». He is very, very drunk.

Scene 2 : Tonuelo summons Lukas to the Alkalde, the local mayor. Lukas says he will go in the morning, but Tonuelo insists that he come immediately. Frasquita wishes to accompany him, but Tonuelo again relays that he is to summon Lukas only. The 2 men exit, leaving Frasquita alone.

Scene 3 : Frasquita begins to tidy-up the dishes. She then sits down to her spinning wheel and muses to herself about Tonuelo's summons. From outside, she hears a sudden shout for help. Thinking it is Lukas, she rushes to the door, only to discover that it is the Corregidor, who has fallen into the millstream.

Scene 4 : The Corregidor enters the house, soaking wet from the stream. Frasquita becomes angry, realizing at once what the Corregidor has intended all along. He attempts to bribe Frasquita into bed with her nephew's appointment, and when she refuses, he threatens her with a pistol. She in turn pulls out a blunderbuss, at which point the Corregidor is so overcome with fright that he becomes faint. He asks her to call Repela.

Scene 5 : Repela enters to tend to the Corregidor, while Frasquita prepares to leave on the pretense of summoning a doctor from town. In reality, she leaves to find Lukas and to inform the Corregidora of what her husband is up to.

Scene 6 : The Corregidor removes his wet clothes, instructing Repela to hang them by the fire to dry. Realizing that Frasquita is no longer there, he sends Repela off to intercept her before she reaches town. The Corregidor, alone, sings to himself about the strange behaviour of women.

At this point, the curtain drops, and the orchestra plays some brief scene-change music.

Scene 7 : The Alkalde and his servants Manuela and Pedro are drinking together. Lukas and Tonuelo enter through a rear door.

Scene 8 : The revelers drink to Lukas, even though he is clearly not in the mood to be trifled with. Lukas tricks the group into a drinking game, then pretends to go to sleep on a bench. The drunken servants go off to find their own beds.

Scene 9 : Lukas, enraged, gets-up and escapes out of the window.

Scene 10 : After a few moments, Manuela enters the room to ask Lukas to hire her away from the Alkalde. Realizing that Lukas is no longer there, she rouses the rest of the household.

Scene 11 : Pedro and Tonuelo join Manuela, and the 3 reluctantly go out to search for Lukas.

Scene 1 : Frasquita makes her way to the Alcalde's house to find Lukas. Unbeknownst to either, Lukas passes her on his way back to the mill. She speaks to herself nervously. Repela enters, but Frasquita does not notice him yet.

Scene 2 : Repela reveals himself. He mocks Frasquita, and she yells at him. They decide to go off together in search of Lukas. This is followed by another episode of scene-change music.

Scene 3 : Lukas arrives back at the mill. He notices the Corregidor's clothes still hanging by the fire and the notary appointment on the table, and jumps to the obvious conclusion. Grabbing the blunderbuss, he creeps towards the bedroom door. Seeing the Corregidor asleep on the bed, Lukas berates himself quietly in a fit of humiliation and jealousy. Suddenly realizing that the Corregidor also has a pretty wife, he forms his own plan for vengeance. Donning the Corregidor's clothes and laughing, Lukas heads for the Corregidor's house.

Scene 4 : The Corregidor, awoken by Lukas, cautiously comes out of the bedroom. Vexed that his own clothes have apparently been stolen, he puts on those that Lukas left behind. The Alcalde enters with Frasquita, Tonuelo and Repela, but they do not yet notice the Corregidor, who tries to slip back into the bedroom.

Scene 5 : The Alcalde notices the Corregidor, but thinking he is Lukas, orders Tonuelo to apprehend him. Tonuelo knocks the Corregidor to the ground, but the group quickly realizes their mistake. After Repela divines Lukas's intent in stealing the Corregidor's clothes, everyone agrees to head off to the Corregidor's house.

Scene 1 : In front of the Corregidor's house, a night watchman announces 5:30 AM.

Scene 2 : The Corregidor, Frasquita, Repela, Tonuelo and the Alcalde arrive at the Corregidor's house. They knock, but there is no reply. Repela, making light of the situation, pretends that he is serenading the house by faking the sound of a guitar. Finally, the Duenna wakes-up and comes to the window. The Corregidor announces his presence, but the Duenna does not believe him, saying that the lord of the house is already home. Realizing who that must be, Frasquita despairs that Lukas did indeed think her unfaithful. The Corregidor does not understand what is going on.

Scene 3 : A troop of officers and servants bursts out of the gate and start to beat the party. They try to run away and explain their presence at the same time. The chorus of soldiers sings confusedly. The Corregidor still does not understand what is going on.

Scene 4 : Donna Mercedes, the Corregidora, appears in the plaza. Although she has already sized-up the situation, she continues to treat her husband as if he were Lukas. The Corregidor, finally realizing what is going on, attempts to blame Frasquita for everything that has happened, but his wife does not let him get away with it.

Scene 5 : Lukas enters, still dressed in the Corregidor's clothes and imitating the Corregidor's mannerisms. After everyone's true identity is revealed, the characters recap the story and explain what happened when Lukas arrived in disguise at the Corregidor's house (Hugo Wolf cut most of this section in his 1897 revision) . Lukas and Frasquita are reconciled, and the Corregidor gives way, realizing that he has been bested. The ensemble thanks the Corregidora with respect and gratitude for her benevolent intervention.

The South of Europe possessed an almost mystical fascination for Hugo Wolf, representing directness, primal passion, and Nietzsche's call to « Mediterraneanize music » . The largely anonymous folk verse of Spain and Italy, translated by Paul Heyse and Emanuel Geibel, served as a Mediterranean focus in the Spanish and Italian song-books, whose composition occupied him from 1889 to 1891, and, again, in 1896 for the 2nd half of the Italian Songbook. Given that so many of those songs are richly compact of character and situation, it was inevitable that Wolf (making slow headway with his lieder in winning recognition as a composer) would wish to leap to fame at once by exploring the world of the songs in the extended form of an Opera. Finding a suitable libretto became a bedevilment, but the scenes Wolf wished to project seemed to him implicit in the works of Spanish writer Pedro de Alarcón (1833-1891) . Wolf pressed a friend, the modestly talented amateur Rosa Mayreder, to adapt Alarcón's novel « The 3 Cornered Hat » and, overlooking her libretto's weaknesses, composed « Der Corregidor » at white heat in 1895. Its production in Mannheim, the following year, produced only a « succès d'estime » , but lured Wolf to attempt to surpass himself. With the « Italienisches Liederbuch » completed, he pressed Mayreder to adapt Alarcón's « El Niño de la bola » . Her attempts proving unsatisfactory, friends introduced Wolf to Moritz Hörnes, a history professor at Vienna University, whose quickly worked adaptation was surprisingly able. Wolf was ecstatic, declaring, « Shakespeare himself could not have formed the subject matter more dramatically and at the same time poetically than Hörnes has done, and that's that ! » . On July 29, 1897, Wolf set to work feverishly composing « Manuel Venegas » . Despite interruptions, the Opera's opening began to take shape as Wolf's swings from manic gaiety to irascibility became more pronounced. In mid- September, his boast that he had been appointed director of the Vienna Court Opera, and had sacked the current director, Gustav Mahler, signaled the onset of madness. Inviting his friends to hear his new Opera and congratulate him, on September 20, he played through the 50 completed pages of vocal score, blissful, raving, and wholly insane, as his friends clustered around him in stunned misery (a scene famously adapted by Thomas Mann in his novel « Doktor Faustus » of 1947) . Wolf's polished fragment introduces characters and motifs without reaching the great dramatic moments that had tempted him, though the opening Spring Chorus is one of the freshest, most evocative, and inspired in his entire œuvre.

Derniers projets et la fin

L'année de la création de l'Opéra fut aussi, on l'a dit, celle des derniers grands lieder. Parmi les expressions ultimes de l'art de Wolf, une place à part doit être réservée, outre aux « Michelangelo » , au « Morgengesang » de Robert Reinick (1805-1852) , dont il donnera l'an plus tard, alors qu'il se trouvera déjà à l'hospice du Docteur Wilhelm Svetlin, une admirable adaptation chorale sous le titre de « Morgenhymnus » (décembre 1897) . Mais le grand projet de cette année tragique demeure celui du second Opéra, « Manuel Venegas » , tiré d'une autre pièce d'Alarcón, « El Niño de la bola » » . La musique du 1er acte est esquissée au cours de l'été de 1897, dans un enthousiasme semblable à celui qui vit naître l'œuvre précédente. Mais celle-ci sera brutalement interrompue par une crise précipitée par l'emploi d'alcool comme stimulant, et occasionnée le 20 septembre 1897 par une visite à Gustav Mahler.

Ce dernier ayant promis à son ancien condisciple de monter le « Der Corregidor » , Wolf est en effet ulcéré par ses atermoiements, et entre tout à coup dans une grande excitation qui dégénère rapidement et justifie son internement. Après 2 mois passés dans un isolement complet, il peut reprendre une certaine activité, tente de développer sa Sérénade italienne et d'en entreprendre une autre, qui demeurera embryonnaire. Il quitte l'hospice fin janvier 1898, et passera une année calme, menant une vie végétative, voyageant avec des amis, en particulier en Italie. Un matin d'octobre, il tentera de se noyer dans le « Traunsee » , et devra être à nouveau et définitivement interné à Vienne, où il survivra encore près de 5 années. Une pneumonie le délivrera enfin le 22 février 1903, et il sera inhumé auprès de Ludwig van Beethoven et de Franz Schubert.

La folie et la mort

Plus que jamais, ses amis sont là pour l'entourer et lui offrir des conditions de travail optimales. Il a enfin un appartement où il peut se sentir chez lui. Il y corrige les épreuves du second volume de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch » et y compose 2 lieder sur des poèmes de Lord Byron ainsi que « Morgenstimmung » d'après Robert Reinick (GC2433)

Début 1897, Wolf est à nouveau en quête d'un livret d'Opéra. Il se tourne vers un texte de Pedro de Alarcón extrait de « El Niño de la bola » . Toujours en proie à la fièvre du travail, il compose les « Michel-Angelo Lieder » (DW77176) et commence l'élaboration de ce nouvel Opéra baptisé « Manuel Venegas » (DW7075) . Le texte du livret pose problème et Wolf demande à plusieurs auteurs de l'aménager. La partition est élaborée jusqu'à la 5e scène du 1er acte dans un style proche des « Michel-Angelo Lieder » . Hugo Wolf prévoit une orchestration légère, dans le style de Mozart. Cet Opéra restera inachevé.

Vienne aussi reconnaît son talent et voit la fondation d'une « Hugo-Wolf-Verein » à Vienne, Société qui lui apportera un soutien considérable pendant ses années d'internement par l'organisation de concerts et ce, jusqu'en 1905. La nomination de Gustav Mahler à l'Opéra de Vienne fait espérer à Wolf d'y faire monter son Opéra. La fatigue due aux insomnies entrave son travail. Il décide d'avoir recours à l'alcool pour se stimuler. C'est dans un véritable état de transe qu'il travaille à son Opéra. Au mois de septembre 1897, son comportement devient aberrant, il délire pendant une journée entière, imaginant qu'il a été nommé directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne. Ce sont ses amis qui décident de son internement à l'asile du docteur Wilhelm Svetlin où il est admis le 21 septembre.

Pendant plus de 2 mois, Hugo Wolf y poursuit ses délires mégalomaniaques, se prenant, tour à tour, pour Richard Wagner et pour Gustav Mahler. Ses lettres témoignent des pensées qui l'habitent mais aussi de la conscience qu'il a de son état. Il se sent trahi par ses amis et veut changer de vie. À la fin de l'année 1897, il retravaille et compose une 2^e Sérénade italienne faisant appel au thème de « Funiculi, Funicula » .

En janvier 1898, Wolf quitte l'asile pour un voyage en Italie avec Mélanie Köchert. Cette rémission lui permet de superviser l'édition des « Michel-Angelo Lieder » . En octobre, alors qu'il séjourne chez des amis au bord du lac de Traum, il tente de se suicider en se jetant dans les eaux du lac. Il demande à être interné à nouveau. C'est ainsi qu'il sera placé à la « Landesirrenanstalt » à Vienne, une donation de l'Empereur François-Joseph ainsi que les bénéfices engrangés par la « Hugo-Wolf-Verein » assurant les frais de la pension. Les moments de lucidité pendant lesquels il est capable de se promener, de jouer du piano ou d'écrire se font de plus en plus rares au fil des mois qui passent. Des accès de fureur, des crises d'angoisse abominables, la perte progressive de son identité et surtout la paralysie menant à la perte totale du langage deviennent son lot quotidien. Mélanie Köchert et ses amis ne l'abandonnent pas, se relayant à son chevet jusqu'au 22 février 1903 où il meurt des suites d'une inflammation pulmonaire. Il est enterré au cimetière central de Vienne dans la partie réservée aux compositeurs.

Dans la majorité de ses lieder, Franz Schubert (qui sera suivi en cela par Johannes Brahms et par Richard Strauß) s'inspirait d'un certain état d'âme ou d'un climat régnant dans le texte choisi, et ne se souciait pas forcément de suivre dans le détail l'expression verbale que le poète avait donnée à ses sentiments. Cela lui permettait de traiter avec un égal bonheur des textes de grands auteurs ou de poètes de second ordre : il cherchait une réalité spirituelle ou affective derrière les paroles. Cependant, certaines de ses œuvres tardives ouvraient aussi une autre voie : celle qui consiste à suivre méticuleusement la diction du poète, en négligeant, s'il le faut, les contraintes de construction régnant dans la musique instrumentale. Les exemples les mieux connus sont les 6 lieder sur des textes de Heinrich Heine qui font partie du « Schwanengesang » . Là, il cherche la réalité à travers les paroles. Cette méthode mène à Hugo Wolf et au « Sprechgesang » d'Arnold Schönberg, tandis que chez Robert Schumann, on peut constater une manière d'équilibre entre les 2 conceptions.

Hugo Wolf s'inscrit donc résolument dans cette seconde filière, et ce, dès le début. Déjà, le 1^{er} recueil (« Liederstrauß » , 1878, textes de Heine) porte le titre « Gedichte » (poèmes) et non pas celui de « Lieder » , indiquant ainsi que l'essentiel pour lui est la parole. Et, sur les 70 lieder posthumes publiés ou ré-édités par la « Hugo-Wolf-Gesellschaft » , qui représentent des œuvres de jeunesse non jugées dignes de publication par le compositeur, il ne se trouve que 4 textes de poètes inconnus et 14 de poètes mineurs. Nous connaissons aussi la méthode de travail de Wolf : il lisait plusieurs fois à haute voix le poème choisi, puis se couchait et composait le lied en se réveillant.

On sait qu'une caractéristique de la musique post-Beethovénienne est le rétrécissement de la cellule génératrice accompagné d'un élargissement de la forme (voir « Penthésilée ») . Ce double phénomène s'observe dans la production mélodique de Wolf. Si l'on compare, par exemple, sa version du lied de « Mignon Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt » avec celle de Schubert (D. 877/4) , on constate que Wolf établit le climat psychologique par un motif de 4 notes, tandis que, dans l'ensemble, sa partition (57 mesures) est plus étendue que celle de Schubert (46 mesures) . Cette technique libère la voix chantée de tout souci de la phrase musicale, et lui permet de reproduire la moindre inflexion de la voix parlée. Ceci ne veut pas dire que Wolf reste l'esclave de ses poètes : il se permet des entorses à la prosodie (syllabes faibles sur une note élevée) , mais elles sont rares et toujours dictées par un souci d'expressivité.

Du rythme, il fait le même usage que ses devanciers, notamment pour constituer un décor sonore comme le galop d'un cheval. Mais le chromatisme hérité de Wagner lui permet un jeu harmonique infiniment plus varié que chez les anciens. La tonalité est rarement établie d'emblée ; et si un accord parfait ouvre le discours, il est aussitôt quitté pour ne revenir qu'à bon escient : ainsi par exemple dans le prélude de « Gebet » (Mörike, n° 28) où, intervenant après des chromatismes troubles (l'inquiétude de l'âme avant la prière) , il fait l'effet d'un rayon de soleil pénétrant dans une cathédrale du haut de la coupole.

Hugo Wolf pratique l'art de la miniature qu'est le lied à une époque où les grandes formes comme les Symphonies de Gustav Mahler et d'Anton Bruckner semblent être devenues la norme de composition. D'autres compositeurs Romantiques s'y étaient déjà essayés avec succès : Franz Schubert et Robert Schumann qui furent sources d'inspiration pour les débuts de Wolf. Cependant, ce dernier envisage la forme d'une manière toute personnelle.

Dès le titre, tout est dit : « Poèmes de ... pour voix et piano mis en musique par Hugo Wolf. » . Le texte, dans son contenu sémantique comme dans sa syntaxe, est son objet principal de préoccupation. La poésie est la source même de la musique. Il s'agit ici de capturer la pensée profonde du poète et de lui donner une existence sonore. Sa méthode de travail consiste à lire le texte à voix haute jusqu'à ce que la mélodie émerge d'elle-même de la phrase, génératrice des intervalles et du rythme. La courbe du chant acquiert une forme singulière, donnant naissance à une déclamation lyrique nouvelle : le recitativo arioso. Le piano est mis sur un pied d'égalité avec la voix : il prépare l'atmosphère de la pièce par un prélude et la prolonge par un postlude. Son rôle est capital dans la réalisation d'ensemble, non pas un simple accompagnement mais un partenaire du chant.

Hugo Wolf trouve une solution inédite pour chaque émotion exprimée par le poète, réalisant ainsi des portraits d'une surprenante véracité. Son écriture devient, à elle seule, un langage traduisant le réalisme psychologique des personnages. Ainsi, le chromatisme traduit les mouvements subtils de l'âme humaine, ce chromatisme poussé à sa limite extrême conduit à une dissolution de la tonalité, saisissant le côté pathologique d'un personnage comme c'est le cas dans les 3 « Harfenspieler » extraits des « Gœthe-Lieder » . On trouve dans l'ensemble de ses lieder, aussi bien dans la ligne vocale que dans l'accompagnement, des formules symboliques équivalentes aux leitmotifs des Opéras de Richard Wagner. La complexité du résultat final est bien éloignée de la forme traditionnelle du lied. Ce sont les écoutes successives qui dévoilent progressivement les plans du compositeur, s'imbriquant les uns dans les autres telles des poupées russes.

La grande époque du lied, on l'a dit, débute chez Hugo Wolf par sa découverte de Mörike. Cet engouement ne laisse pas de surprendre à l're vue. Eduard Mörike (1804-1875) , pasteur paisible d'une petite ville provinciale de la Souabe, est considéré comme le poète du repos de l'âme, du sage contentement, de l'humour quelque peu désabusé. Le bouillonnant Wolf, qui dans d'autres circonstances préférait un auteur aussi explosif que Kleist, que venait-il faire dans cette galère ? Soupçonnait-il la lave qui couvait sous la surface de calme apparence et qui se devine à travers quelques poèmes tels que « Peregrina » ? Fut-il attiré par l'étonnante diversité de ces poésies ? Toujours est-il que, dans Mörike, Wolf a donné le meilleur de lui-même ; et si l'on jouait au jeu de l'île déserte, c'est le volume Mörike qu'il faudrait choisir. Non pas que les autres compositions soient de qualité inférieure, loin de là. Mais le volume Mörike est le plus complet.

Tout s'y trouve. Du sentiment religieux le plus intériorisé (« Gebet » ; « Schlafendes Jesuskind » ; « Auf eine Christblume ») jusqu'à l'humour le plus débridé (« Zur Warnung » ; « Abschied » , où l'on notera, dans le postlude, l'emploi original d'une valse viennoise qui accompagne la chute du critique dans l'escalier) , rien d'humain n'est absent de ces poèmes. Le charme goguenard (« Elfenlied ») côtoie le drame halluciné (« Der Feuerreiter » , dont Wolf donnera aussi, en 1892, une version pour chœur et orchestre) .

Joseph von Eichendorff (1788-1857) est surtout populaire comme chantre de la fameuse « Wanderlust » (protestation écologiste avant la lettre, de l'âme allemande contre la vie réglementée de l'industrialisation récente) . Il semble que ce soit ce côté contestataire qui ait surtout attiré Hugo Wolf. Les chants nostalgiques, les rêves d'un passé à jamais disparu, qui ont tant séduit Robert Schumann, sont chez Wolf en minorité (« Nachtzauber » ; « Heimweh ») . La plupart de ses lieder chantent, sur un ton fort rythmé et quelque peu désinvolte, le défi aux valeurs courantes de la société. Ce sont les marginaux, soldats, marins, aventuriers, musiciens ou poètes indifférents à l'argent, aux honneurs, au succès, qui ont ici droit à la parole. Comme une fleur isolée dans un jardin sauvage, s'élève le seul vrai chant d'amour du recueil, le merveilleux « Verschwiegene Liebe » .

Des différentes phases que parcourut Goethe au cours de sa longue vie (1749-1832) , la 1re, de style galant, « anacréontique » , n'intéressait pas Wolf. De la seconde, celle du bouillonnant poète du « Sturm und Drang » , révolution littéraire et contestation sociale des années 1770, le musicien n'a retenu que 3 hymnes : « Prometheus » , « Ganymed » et « Grenzen der Menschheit » , où, en doublant Schubert, il s'y oppose. Les lieder de Wolf font donc presque tous appel à la grande maturité du poète. On y respire un air de sagesse ironique, de détachement, d'une existence en dehors de la mêlée. Les tons tragiques ne sont certes pas absents : les chants de Mignon et du « Harfenspieler » (Harpiste) sont ce que Goethe a écrit de plus désespéré. Mais ces paroles ont attiré d'autres compositeurs également (Schubert, Schumann) .

L'originalité de Wolf réside plutôt dans la recherche délibérée de l'humour, trait pourtant peu caractéristique de Goethe (« Der Rattenfänger » ; « Ritter Kurts Brautfahrt » ; « Gutmann und Gutweib » ; « Epiphantias ») .

Quant au second volume, il est presque entièrement consacré aux poèmes du « West-östliche Divan » , recueil de textes que Goethe, sexagénaire, écrivit sous la double impulsion d'un nouvel amour et de la poésie persane qu'il venait de découvrir. Mais Wolf écarte les poèmes passionnés et se concentre sur des chants en éloge à la boisson, ou sur d'autres où Goethe joue avec l'amour plutôt qu'il n'aime vraiment. À 7 ans de son effondrement, Wolf se comporte ici en homme rangé et sage. On notera qu'il évite cette fois les textes déjà illustrés par d'autres.

Les grands recueils

Le recueil des « Möricke-Lieder », 53 poèmes d'Eduard Möricke (16 février 1888 - 26 novembre 1888) rassemble des textes d'essence Romantique où se mêlent réalisme et visions d'un monde merveilleux.

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Auf ein altes Bild » (DW7310) .

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Erwartung » (DW7106) .

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Harfenspieler I » (DB8541) .

« Spanisches Liederbuch », 44 poèmes espagnols des XVIe et XVIIe siècles, traduits en allemand (28 octobre 1889 - 27 avril 1890) , reflètent le goût pour le pittoresque et l'exotique qui a marqué le déclin du Romantisme aussi bien en Allemagne qu'en Angleterre et ailleurs en Europe. Le recueil édité place, au début, les lieder sur des textes religieux, les faisant suivre par des lieder aux textes profanes, pour la plupart des poèmes d'amour. Il n'y a pas d'allusion folklorique dans la musique de Wolf, basée sur le climat poétique.

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Wer sein holdes Lieb verloren » (DW7405) .

« Italienisches Liederbuch I », 22 poèmes italiens anonymes (25 septembre 1890 - 23 décembre 1891) comprennent un grand nombre de poèmes d'amour dont la traduction en allemand ne réussit pas à rendre le caractère léger et enlevé de la verve méditerranéenne. La musique de Wolf, faisant abstraction de la brièveté du texte ou de ses faiblesses, atteint une liberté d'expression inégalée jusqu'alors. Le mélange du genre populaire et de la facture savante est pour beaucoup dans la réussite de cette œuvre.

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Mein Liebster singt am Haus » (DW7443) .

S'il fallait n'en écouter qu'un seul : « Wie soll ich fröhlich sein » (DW7456) .

3 poèmes de Robert Reinick et 4 poèmes de Heinrich Heine, William Shakespeare et George Gordon (Lord) Byron. Ces 2 recueils furent publiés en 1897 et rassemblent des lieder composés à diverses époques.

Les recueils « méditerranéens »

Les 2 recueils suivants sont consacrés à des poèmes étrangers, traduits par 2 poètes de seconde zone, Paul Heyse et Emanuel von Geibel. Le « Spanisches Liederbuch » (Chants espagnols, 1889-1890) comporte une partie de chants sacrés et une partie de chants profanes. Les chants sacrés commencent en hymne à Marie, à laquelle sont consacrés les 3 lers ; puis, nous assistons à la naissance de Jésus, saluons l'enfant merveilleux, qui nous conduit doucement vers le Sauveur martyrisé. Le ton est simple, les harmonies moins chromatiques que dans la plupart des autres compositions ; la profonde religiosité de Wolf, qui ne s'était guère exprimée depuis Mörike, revient ici à la surface.

Les chants profanes, quant à eux, se caractérisent par un délicieux climat entre larmes et sourire, tout à fait particulier à ce recueil, et qui ne se trouve guère exprimé ailleurs avec pareil bonheur. C'est mi-amusés, mi-attendris que nous assistons aux déboires de tel amoureux trop timide (« Wer sein holdes Lieb verloren ») , ou de tel autre auquel les œillades de la belle promettent le bonheur, tandis que le geste de son doigt lui ôte tout espoir (« Seltsam ist Juanas Weise » ; « Auf dem grünen Balkon mein Mädchen ») .

Dans l' « Italienisches Liederbuch » (Chants italiens, 1890-1891 et 1896) , un des thèmes auxquels Wolf est particulièrement attentif est la dispute entre amoureux. 2 merveilleux lieder chantent la réconciliation : « Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen et Nun lass uns Frieden schliessen » ; d'autres nous mènent au milieu de la bataille, dont le ton taquin laisse cependant prévoir un dénouement heureux (« Du sagst mir ... » ; « Nein, junger Herr » ; « Wer rief dich denn ? ») . 2 seulement sont d'une teneur vraiment dramatique : « Hofärtig seid ihr, schönes Kind » (où l'amant malheureux claque la porte avec un accord dissonant) , et « Was soll der Zorn mein Schatz » .

Les lieder non compris dans ces recueils mais publiés par Wolf de son vivant sont réunis sous le titre « Lieder nach verschiedenen Dichtern » (d'après différents poètes) . En dehors du ravissant « Mausfallen-Sprüchlein » (encore Mörike !) et des 6 poèmes d'après Gottfried Keller, les mieux connus sont les 3 lieder d'après Michel-Ange, lourds de tristesse et de mélancolie.

Sommaires

Le compositeur autrichien d'ascendance slovène Hugo Filipp Jakob Wolf, dit Hugo Wolf, est né le 13 mars 1860 à Windischgrätz, un arrière-poste styrien, province de l'Empire austro-hongrois (aujourd'hui : Slovenj Gradec, en Slovénie) , enclave de langue allemande en territoire slovène. Il va mourir le 22 février 1903, à Vienne.

Wolf était le second fils du tanneur de la ville, le marchand de peaux Philipp Wolf, un musicien amateur qui se délassait volontiers d'un métier qu'il n'avait pas choisi en grattant du violon. Jusqu'en 1869, Hugo Wolf fréquenta l'école du village, cependant que son père, dont il se sentait assez proche, lui enseignait quelques rudiments de musique (le piano et le violon) . Ses années de lycée d'abord au pensionnat de l'abbaye Saint-Paul du Lavanttal, puis à Graz et Marbourg, révèlent déjà un caractère instable. Il semble que le jeune Hugo ait délibérément saboté ses études à partir de 1875 afin d'être envoyé (contre le gré de son père, cette fois) au Conservatoire de Vienne. À 15 ans, le jeune homme s'installe à Vienne, ville qu'il ne quittera plus, excepté pour de courts voyages professionnels en Allemagne à partir de 1890, et pour un voyage en Italie qu'il effectuera en 1898 pour raison de santé.

Hugo Wolf est l'un des 2 principaux émules d'Anton Bruckner, avec Gustav Mahler, son contemporain exact.

Son père, d'ascendance allemande, dut reprendre l'entreprise paternelle de tannerie, mais conservera sa vie durant la nostalgie d'une vocation artistique (il aurait souhaité être architecte) . Sa mère, née Katharina Nussbaumer (germanisation de l'original slovène « Orchovnik ») , de souche paysanne, avait aussi du sang italien. Tout le tempérament artistique du futur compositeur est déjà déterminé par la fusion de ces atavismes, fusion éminemment caractéristique du creuset viennois à l'époque où Hugo Wolf va faire toute sa carrière.

Après des études secondaires « cahotantes » , il découvre les grands Classiques viennois, qui nourrissent sa passion exclusive pour la musique. Les Iers essais de composition, dès la 14e année, sont destinés au piano ; le lied fait bientôt son apparition ; si bien qu'en arrivant à Vienne pour s'inscrire au Conservatoire à la rentrée de 1875, le jeune homme peut entrer d'emblée en seconde année de composition.

Vienne, creuset culturel d'une richesse inouïe, a toujours su attirer les grands musiciens : Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Brahms, Bruckner, Mahler, Schönberg, pour ne citer que les plus connus ; et surtout, les retenir. Aucun d'entre eux n'y eut la vie facile, aucun n'y fut reconnu de son vivant à sa juste valeur (et tous s'en plaignirent) , mais pas un seul ne songea sérieusement à la quitter.

Hugo Wolf recevra au Conservatoire l'enseignement de Wilhelm Schenner (piano) , Robert Fuchs (harmonie et composition) , puis Franz Krenn. Il étudie en même temps que Gustav Mahler, son condisciple. Wolf fréquente assidûment l'Opéra ; il voit tout le répertoire et en connaît tous les rôles par cœur. Il découvrira la musique de Richard Wagner, une révélation capitale qui l'amènera à rencontrer ce dernier pour lui présenter quelques-uns de ses Iers essais musicaux. La Sonate, Opus 1, les Variations, Opus 2, les Lieder, Opus 3 datent en effet de cette période. Cependant, aucun signe ne permet de caractériser encore son futur style.

En 1876, Wolf compose son 1er Opéra, « König Alboin, roi des Lombards » . En 1877, il sera renvoyé du Conservatoire de Vienne pour indiscipline.

En 1879, il rencontre Johannes Brahms pour lui présenter ses compositions : le contact entre les 2 hommes n'est pas bon, et l'antipathie de Wolf envers Brahms, qu'il qualifie de « pédant nordique » , ne se démentira pas par la suite. Il est vrai que l'esthétique de Brahms, qui marque un retour à un certain Classicisme, est très différente de celles de Richard Wagner et de Franz Liszt.

Nommé second chef d'orchestre à Salzbourg en 1881, Hugo Wolf est poussé à quitter ce poste au bout de quelques mois. Entre 1884 et 1887, il est critique musical pour le « Salonblatt » , une revue viennoise importante dans les cercles musicaux de l'époque. Il y affiche un virulent parti pris pour Wagner et Liszt, contre des choses aussi différentes que la musique de Brahms ou celle des compositeurs italiens du XIXe siècle, très prisée à l'époque.

En 1884, il travaille sur son unique Symphonie ainsi que sur son Quatuor à cordes en ré mineur (dont seuls le Scherzo et le Finale sont complétés) .

À partir de 1887, il se consacre entièrement aux études et à la composition, dans une succession de phases d'intense création et de périodes d'abattement total. Son poème Symphonique, « Penthésilée », n'est pas accueilli avec le succès qu'il espérait.

En 1888, son séjour à la Villa Perchtoldsdorf, près de Vienne, s'avère particulièrement fécond, puisqu'il y produit plus de la moitié de son œuvre qui se veut déséquilibré et indécision tonale, charnière entre le Romantisme et le XXe siècle.

Wolf, digne successeur de Franz Schubert dans l'art du lied, qu'il conçoit comme des poèmes symphoniques miniatures, porta le lied à des sommets de raffinement et de complexité jamais atteints et réussit une saisissante fusion de la poésie et de la musique dans ses presque 300 lieder. Wolf mit en musique les textes des grands poètes allemands comme Mörike, Eichendorff et Goethe. Ses livres de lieder espagnols (1891) et italiens (2 volumes, 1891 et 1896) rassemblent des poèmes allemands sur des thèmes espagnols et italiens. Hormis les lieder, Wolf a aussi écrit pour Quatuor à cordes (1879-1880), une Sérénade italienne (1892), et un Opéra, « Der Corregidor » (Le Gouverneur, 1895).

Hugo Wolf marque incontestablement un stade décisif dans l'évolution du Romantisme finissant, vers le XXe siècle atonal, voire l'École de Vienne. Modulations rapides, dissonances, structure totalement libre (détestée par Mahler qui trouvait ses lieder « informes »), Hugo Wolf tomba dans des oreilles illustres dès le début du XXe siècle : les 7 Premiers lieder d'Alban Berg (« Sieben frühe Lieder ») l'évoquent fortement, tandis que les lieder d'Arnold Schönberg, qui lui aussi faisait grand cas de Wolf, sont à l'époque nettement en retrait harmoniquement sur lui.

Curieusement, et contrairement à une idée répandue, l'admiration sans borne (voire le culte) qu'Hugo Wolf vouait à Richard Wagner ne se retrouve que très superficiellement dans ses lieder, et encore moins dans sa trop rare musique Symphonique : enchaînements harmoniques, sonorité, accords, forme, rien ou presque n'évoque le Maître saxon dans ces poèmes concentrés, excepté une certaine liberté de structure et une forte variation tonale au sein d'une même pièce. L'harmonie de Hugo Wolf est, à la fois, très Classique et très personnelle, et l'on pourrait presque se réjouir de ce qu'il a en somme assez mal compris son idole, contrairement à Arnold Schönberg.

De plus, la littérature pianistique de Richard Wagner, pour qui le piano n'était qu'un instrument de travail et de plaisir, est quasi inexistante, alors qu'Hugo Wolf est l'un des 3 grands du lied, et donc également un grand du piano : Robert Schumann et Franz Schubert, avec Johannes Brahms, ayant mis la barre très haute.

Hugo Wolf a aussi innové dans la technique même du lied. D'ailleurs, à l'appellation de lied, Hugo Wolf préfère « Gedichte für Singstimme und Klavier » (Poèmes pour voix et piano). Pour ses « Gedichte », il s'est tourné vers des poètes déjà un peu anciens, comme Goethe (la figure tutélaire de la littérature allemande à la charnière des XVIIIe et XIXe siècles), Mörike, Eichendorff, Heinrich Heine ou encore Gottfried Keller, tous poètes du XIXe siècle.

Les thèmes sont le plus souvent l'amour, la nature et la religion.

Sa conception du déroulement vocal donne naissance à une forme de ligne mélodique nouvelle dans le lied : le recitativo arioso (c'est-à-dire une déclamation chantée qui évite de devenir un air véritable, et emprunte donc aux 2 types d'écriture : celle du récitatif et celle de l'air proprement dit) :

Il se détourne parfois de la courbe mélodique pour adopter un débit vocal récitatif et s'oppose donc aux grands compositeurs du lied Romantique. La fluidité mélodique reste donc limitée.

En général, la mélodie va à la voix et le piano accompagne, mais Wolf inverse cette généralité.

Par ailleurs, il respecte la durée ordinaire du lied (environ 3 minutes, bien qu'il n'y ait aucune règle à ce sujet) .

Hugo Wolf est resté mal connu en France jusqu'aux années 1970, comme Max Reger : le lied allemand, pour les Français, s'appelait Robert Schumann et Franz Schubert. Jusqu'à ce que de grands interprètes comme Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Edith Mathis, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau ou Peter Schreier enregistrent les lieder de Hugo Wolf et le mettent au niveau qu'il mérite, à savoir, aux côtés de ses 2 prédécesseurs, à une place de « Prince du lied » .

Ernst Decsey écrit : « La vie de Wolf ressemble à un de ses lieder : courte introduction, toute en lutte, explosion, décharge du cœur en une cantilène brûlante, chute dans un épilogue muet : un drame sur une page d'imprimerie. »

Hugo Wolf est un des grands Maîtres du lied. Il compose plus de 300 chants dans la grande tradition de Franz Schubert et de Robert Schumann. Sa musique, influencée par Richard Wagner, marque toute une génération : Gustav Mahler et la Seconde École de Vienne pourront alors entraîner le genre du lied vers d'autres voies nouvelles. Considéré comme un compositeur secondaire par ses pairs et de nombreux musicologues, il faut aujourd'hui lui rendre sa véritable place dans l'histoire de la musique occidentale : la 1^{re}.

Hugo Wolf est né le 13 mars 1860 à Windischgraz. Son père exerçant le métier de tanneur garde toujours la nostalgie d'une vocation artistique (il aurait souhaité devenir architecte) . Jusqu'en 1869, Hugo fréquente l'école du village et apprend ses premiers préceptes musicaux de son père. Plus tard, les années de lycée révèle un Hugo Wolf instable si bien qu'en 1875 il s'installe à Vienne pour y parfaire ses études de musique, sans le consentement de son père. C'est de cette période que datent ses 1^{res} compositions : Sonate pour piano, Opus 1, Variations, Opus 2, Lieder, Opus 3 ; musique encore trop impersonnelle pour y voir un style.

Hugo Wolf ne quittera jamais la ville de Vienne, exception faite pour quelques voyages professionnels en Allemagne (dont Berlin, en compagnie de son Maître Anton Bruckner) à partir de 1890. Condisciple de Gustav Mahler au Conservatoire de Vienne, Wolf fréquente les milieux musicaux et s'attarde particulièrement sur l'Opéra : il connaît tous les rôles et musiques par cœur. L'Opéra devient pour lui un élément primordial, surtout lorsqu'il fait la découverte de Richard Wagner. Il entreprend même une œuvre, « König Alboin » , dont quelques esquisses ont pu être conservées. Cependant, l'œuvre la plus originale de ces années de Conservatoire reste une Symphonie dont seuls les 2 mouvements terminaux nous sont parvenus (« Scherzo und Finale für grosses Orchester ») . L'écriture orchestrale de Wolf révèle alors une forte influence du Symphonisme berliozien.

Hugo Wolf est toujours instable et quitte le Conservatoire en 1877, bien qu'émerveillé du monde musical contemporain. Il mène alors une vie faite de leçons et occupe un poste de chef de chœur au Théâtre de Salzbourg (sous la direction de Karl Muck) pendant quelques mois. Cette expérience fut bénéfique pour le jeune homme qui découvre le style comique et s'éloigne du style wagnérien.

À partir de cette période, sa musique se divise en 2 périodes. La 1^{re} (1877-1887) révèle un artiste à la recherche de lui-même, s'essayant à différents genres musicaux comme le Quatuor (Quatuor en ré mineur, 1877-1884) , l'Intermezzo (1886) , la sérénade (Sérénade italienne, 1887) , un Poème symphonique (« Penthésilée » , 1883-1885) et, bien évidemment, divers lieder.

Le Quatuor à cordes reconstruit la veille de sa mort, en 1903, est considéré comme une partition prophétique et influence notamment 2 de ses plus fervents admirateurs : Max Reger et Arnold Schönberg. Quant à son Poème symphonique « Penthésilée » , il est convenu de dire aujourd'hui qu'il surclasse le modèle instauré par Franz Liszt et se situe au-delà des productions d'un Richard Strauß. Cette œuvre est un fait un pont entre les Poèmes symphoniques de Franz Liszt et le « Pelléas et Mélisande » d'Arnold Schönberg. Pourtant, cette œuvre fut un échec à sa création car elle rejetait le formalisme et le traditionalisme prôné par Johannes Brahms et Eduard Hanslick. Conséquence logique pour Wolf, il abandonne tout rêve de musique Symphonique.

À partir de 1884, Hugo Wolf se tourne vers la critique et devient le critique musical attitré du « Wiener Salonblatt » . Cette nouvelle activité, dans laquelle il se jette à corps perdu, lui laisse peu de temps pour composer mais précise davantage ses goûts musicaux. Il tourne le dos à Brahms, glorifie Liszt et Berlioz et dénonce le conservatisme de nombreux musiciens et orchestres. Il s'indigne de « tant de routine et de désordre » à une époque où le nouveau directeur de l'Opéra, Gustav Mahler, devient son adversaire le plus féroce. Il met à un terme, en 1887, à cette activité d'écrivain.

À la fin de cette 1^{re} période, les renseignements biographiques sur Wolf sont confus et peu précis. Tout ce que l'on sait vraiment, c'est qu'il contracta la syphilis vers 1884 qui allait l'emporter une vingtaine d'années plus tard. Un tournant majeur de sa vie se produisit avec la mort de son père, en 1887. À la fin de cette année-là, Wolf a la chance de voir paraître ses lieder imprimés et qui vont déjà de leurs succès. Wolf n'a alors qu'une seule certitude : il lui faut persévérer dans cette voie.

Entre la tradition de Franz Schubert, les avancées de Robert Schumann et le modèle wagnérien, Wolf devait trouver sa place. Cette partie était loin d'être gagnée et son caractère instable et renonceur aurait pu mettre fin à ce projet.

Wolf évite de mettre en musique des poèmes déjà utilisés par d'autres ; s'il les utilise, c'est qu'il est sûr de pouvoir apporter davantage au poète que les musiciens précédents. Comme Schumann, Wolf est un homme empli de références culturelles et de signes littéraires. Il se met alors au service du poème. Durant ses concerts, il prend même l'habitude de lire le poème à ses auditeurs avant de leur faire entendre la musique.

Tous ses lieder composés à partir de 1888 sont conçus en cycle. Des centaines de lieder voient le jour en 1888, répartis en 3 grands recueils, sur des vers de Goethe, Mörike (qui devient « son » poète de prédilection) et Eichendorff. Chaque cycle est dédié à un seul poète. Les 2 années suivantes, le rythme est moins soutenu avec un ensemble de 26 poèmes de Goethe puis, entre octobre 1889 et avril 1890, le « Spanisches Liederbuch ». Ces recueils sont suivis de l'« Italienisches Liederbuch » (1890-1891).

Hugo Wolf avait sa façon bien à lui de composer : il mûrissait d'abord les poèmes choisis par ses soins puis se mettait au travail, composant de manière continue, noircissant ses cahiers de jets musicaux ininterrompus (il écrivait parfois plus d'un lied par jour) sans la moindre ébauche ni la plus petite rature.

Si chaque cycle ou cahier de lieder comporte des caractéristiques propres liées au poète qu'il sert, on décèle des éléments récurrents dans sa musique : une écriture « durchkomponiert » (composé de bout en bout) sans redites et remplissage. Le piano devient l'expression de l'idée ou de l'image suggérée dans le texte, son langage différent pour chaque lied, original. En comparaison, le piano de Wolf est l'orchestre de Wagner. D'où ce surnom de « Wagner du lied » qu'on l'affuble rapidement, ce qui irrite passablement le compositeur que l'on cantonne entièrement à la petite forme du lied.

En réaction à ce confinement forcé de la part des critiques et musiciens, Wolf se jette dans la composition de « Der Corregidor » (le Magistrat) en février 1895. Terminé dans l'année, l'ouvrage a tout de suite un succès retentissant à sa création à Mannheim, le 7 juin 1896. Malgré tout, l'œuvre tombe vite dans l'oubli. Wolf retourne alors aux lieder et compose ses dernières grandes œuvres vocales. La folie ne tarde pas à se déclarer. Il écrit les 3 « Michel-Angelo Lieder », son chant du cygne en quelque sorte, avant d'être interné en septembre 1897. Sa vie créatrice s'achève ici et se révèle être l'une des plus courtes que l'on connaisse.

Hugo Wolf profite néanmoins de quelques périodes de rémissions mais, en 1899, c'en est fini de lui sur le plan cérébral. Après d'atroces souffrances et une paralysie totale, Hugo Wolf s'éteint d'une pneumonie à l'asile, le 22 février 1903. Il est enterré aux côtés de Franz Schubert et de Ludwig van Beethoven au cimetière principal de Vienne.

Hugo Wolf (textes anglais)

Hugo Wolf (1868-1903) : Born in Windischgraz, Austria. Currently, Slovenj Gradec, Slovenia. A pupil of Anton Bruckner and a composer of German Lied.

Hugo Wolf (born on 13 March 1868 - died on 22 February 1903) was an Austrian composer of Slovene origin, particularly noted for his art songs, or lieder. He brought to this form a concentrated expressive intensity which was unique in late-Romantic music, somewhat related to that of the 2nd Viennese School in concision but diverging greatly in technique.

Though, he had several bursts of extraordinary productivity, particularly in 1888 and 1889, depression frequently interrupted his creative periods, and his last composition was written in 1898, before he suffered a mental collapse caused by syphilis.

The Austrian composer Hugo (Filipp Jakob) Wolf was born on 13 March 1860 in Windischgraz, Styria (now, Slovenj Gradec, Yugoslavia) and died on 22 February 1903 in Vienna. He intensified the expressive vocabulary of the lied to a pitch never since surpassed. By his musical sensitivity to poetic values and meanings, which he embodied in each separate aspect of song (vocal declamation, keyboard technique, harmonic nuance) , he was able, like Franz Schubert before him, to condense the dramatic intensity of Opera into the song form.

Formative years (1860-1883)

Hugo Wolf was born in a German-speaking enclave of a Slovene region. His mother Katharina (1824-1903) was of Slovene yeoman stock (her paternal grandfather's name was Orehovnik, which he changed to its German equivalent Nussbaumer ; her maternal grandfather's name was Stank, or Stanko) . According to a family tradition, she also had some Italian antecedents. She was strong-willed and energetic, 4 years older than her husband Philipp Wolf, whom she married in 1852. His family was German in origin ; he inherited the leather business established in Windischgraz in the 18th Century by his grandfather Maximilian. Philipp Wolf (1828-1887) was a gifted musician who taught himself the piano, violin, flute, harp and guitar. His trenchant and colourful letters reveal him as the thwarted artist, moody and introspective. These gifts and temperament seem to have been inherited by Hugo, the 4th of 6 children (2 others died in infancy) . As he later recorded appreciatively, he was given piano and violin lessons by his father at a very early age. At the village primary school, from 1865 to 1869, he was taught the piano and theory by Sebastian Weixler, who also played the viola in the Wolf household orchestra (Philipp 1st violin, Hugo 2nd, brother Max cello, an uncle as horn player) .

In 1868, Hugo saw his 1st Opera (Donizetti's « Belisario ») , which made an overwhelming impression. In September 1870, he was sent to the regional secondary school in Graz (where he was remembered as speaking German with a Slovene accent) but left after only 1 term with the general report « wholly unsatisfactory » , though with some praise for his musical gifts. In September 1871, he began 2 years as a boarder at the Benedictine abbey of Saint-Paul, where he excelled as a musician, playing the violin and organ for school services and the piano in a trio (with a repertory including Italian and French Opera arrangements) . But he lagged at the compulsory Latin ; and, in the autumn of 1873, he was transferred to the secondary school at Marburg (now Maribor, Yugoslavia) . There, he absorbed the Classical repertory in score or performance, including Beethoven and Haydn Symphonies in piano duet arrangement. But again, he left after only 2 years. His wilful and passionate nature spurned compromise ; he had time and energy only for music. His father received 2 placatory dedications, that of Opus 1, a Piano Sonata begun in April 1875, and that of the Variations, Opus 2. It was decided that Wolf should go and live with an aunt in Vienna that September and study at the Vienna Conservatory.

At 1st, all went well. He studied the piano with Wilhelm Schenner and harmony and composition, 1st with Robert Fuchs and, then, with the strict and pedantic Franz Krenn. He made many friends, including the young Gustav Mahler. The 1st fruits were an unfinished Violin Concerto (in piano score) and more Piano Sonatas, as well as songs and choruses. Now, Wolf began regular Opera-going : Giacomo Meyerbeer's « Les Huguenots » was a special favourite. But his deepest devotion was reserved for Richard Wagner, then (November 1875) in Vienna for performances of « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » . Wolf attended both, and became (as he told his dismayed parents) a dedicated Wagnerian ; a term then synonymous with avant-garde turbulence. In December, he visited Wagner, bringing his piano pieces, which he explained were in the style of Mozart. Wagner was indulgent and affable ; he gravely agreed that it was best to model oneself on the Classics, and counselled patience and practice. When he next went to Vienna, he said, he would look forward to being shown larger-scale works.

This encounter inspired Wolf, always a passionate hero-worshipper and famished for encouragement. He duly attempted larger-scale works, notably a Lenau setting for accompanied male-voice chorus, « Die Stimme des Kindes » . But the part-writing went awry, a blemish pointed-out by Hans Richter, then director of the Vienna Opera, whom Wolf had also buttonholed and blandished. Technical shortcomings recur in further choruses written in 1876 ; but in one Gœthe setting, « Mailed » , the contours of coming Mastery are discernible in rhythmic verve and harmonic vitality. Also from this period date orchestral essays (an arrangement of the « Moonlight » Sonata) , various chamber music fragments and sketches and a piano « Rondo capriccioso » which later became a Symphonic Finale. No doubt many of these were set as academic exercises, but their style testifies to a growing independence. Soon, Wolf was again in conflict with authority. In later life, he would explain that he resigned from the Conservatory in protest at its entrenched conservatism. But he was also officially dismissed for « breach of discipline » ; and his cause was not helped by the prank of a fellow student who sent the director a threatening letter, signed « Hugo Wolf » . By March 1877, Wolf was home again in disgrace.

There, he worked on a Symphony and composed the earliest song that he thought worthy of publication, « Morgentau » . He was allowed back to Vienna, in November, to earn his own living as a music teacher. On the journey, he lost the score of his Symphony. That start was symptomatic. Wolf never had the teacher's gift or temperament. His talents needed (and his charm secured) the patronage of generous households, such as those of the actor Ludwig Gabillon and Sigmund Freud's early collaborator, Josef Breuer.

Wolf was already known in other cultured circles, notably that of the composer Adalbert von Goldschmidt (which included the critics Gustav Schönaich and Hans Paumgartner, and the conductor Felix Mottl) . They adopted the young Wolf, took him to concerts and Operas, lent him books, music and money. But this fostering may also have proved fatal. For it was Goldschmidt who (according to Alma Mahler) took Wolf to a brothel ; and there is no doubt that Wolf's insanity, in 1897, and death, in 1903, were among the sequelæ of a syphilitic infection assignable with fair certainty to 1878. It was then, as members of the Gabillon and Breuer families later recalled, that he began to avoid their dinner tables and their company (eating only such food as could be conveyed direct to the mouth, and refusing to travel in the same railway carriage as his hosts) . Such conduct then seemed merely eccentric or boorish ; but Doctor Breuer later came to believe that it was founded on medical advice and consideration for others.

The phase of sexual initiation and stimulus was also a time of spontaneous song-writing, the 1st signs of an intuitive mode of creativity that would later characterize Wolf's greatest work. Early in 1878, he was in love with Vally Franck, a relative of the Lang family, who were among his most generous benefactors. He later said that, in that year, he had written « at least one good song every day ». This seems exaggerated (unless the works were atypically destroyed) ; but it testifies to a wealth of feeling in that year. Romantic love and « Weltschmerz » are explicit in the choice of 1877-1878 song texts from such sources as Heine, Lenau, Chamisso, Rückert, Hoffmann von Fallersleben and Goethe's « Faust » .

After the Schumannesque Heine settings of May and June 1878, a new and agonized note is sounded in the « Faust » setting of « Gretchen vor dem Andachtsbild der Mater Dolorosa » , begun on 22 August. The confession of sin and prayer for forgiveness, novel and uncharacteristic themes in Wolf, are expressed in anguished chromatics. He next wrote settings of gloomy and life-abnegating texts (also, perhaps, related to the inevitable if temporary separation from Vally Franck) , closely followed by the 1st movement of the D minor String Quartet with its outbursts of impassioned declamation. The Grave introduction is prefixed by the words « Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren » (You must renounce, renounce.) , spoken by « Faust » when sealing his pact with the Devil and renouncing human life and love. Both this movement and the Scherzo (« Resolut ») bear the date : January 1879.

It was no doubt in a dejected mood that Wolf had called on Johannes Brahms, early in that year. He was kindly received and given the same advice as Richard Wagner's, namely to extend his musical horizons. From the blunt Brahms, this seemed an affront, especially when coupled with the suggestion of counterpoint lessons from Martin Gustav Nottebohm. The fee was well beyond Wolf's means ; and the idea was dismissed as « north German pedantry » . This note of antipathy soon swelled to an enduring diapason. As in George Bernard Shaw's contemporary London, the younger musicians tended to brand Brahms as reactionary and hail Wagner as progressive. Wolf's immediate circle, a Bohemian fraternity comparable to the 1st Schubertians, were all fanatical Wagnerites, following their Master to the point of becoming vegetarians - as Wolf did for 1 year or 2, partly also perhaps because that diet was cheaper. His meagre earnings were eked-out by parcels of food and clothes sent from home. He was constantly changing lodgings (on occasion sharing with Gustav Mahler, with whom he had remained on affable terms) in search of seclusion or economy. Life was hard, but intellectually and socially formative. Goldschmidt and Schönaich, in particular, continued to be generous with help and introductions : the circle of Wolf's friends and admirers gradually widened. In April 1879, he 1st met Melanie Köchert (« née » Lang) , who later became his mistress and protectress. Her sister Henriette and her brother Edmund Lang also became close friends. Meanwhile, Wolf's love for their quasi-cousin Vally Franck was rekindled ; but the 2 were separated most of that year by her absence on holiday. Wolf's letters and music are alike passionate, as 3 « Lenau » songs testify. But his penury and misfortune kept the lovers parted if not estranged. His patterns of cyclic mood swing and unpredictably sporadic creativity were already clearly delineated. By 1880, his depression and illness were both apparently abating. Sweetness and serenity return to the song music, especially in « Erwartung » and « Die Nacht » , 2 « Eichendorff » settings inscribed to Vally and thought worthy of publication in the later song-book. The slow movement of the D minor Quartet, begun in July, has overtones of healing (recalling Beethoven's « Heiliger Dankgesang ») and redemption that suggest a mood of regeneration and thanksgiving, enhanced by an idyllic summer holiday in Mayerling. There, Wolf's mature song-writing style continued its slow burgeoning, nurtured by studies and transcriptions of Richard Wagner. 2 paraphrases (of « Die Meistersinger » and « Die Walküre ») , probably made at this time, were presented to the lawyer Joseph Heitzes, another of Wolf's benefactors. His Mayerling home was rented to the Preyss family, who willingly agreed to look after Wolf and give him the tranquillity and independence he needed. By now, he was sufficiently recovered to take his meals « en famille » . His high spirits and manifest genius captivated not only the Preyss family but their own summer visitors, including the Werners, especially the 7 year old Heinrich, who became wholly devoted to Wolf and later served his cause well as editor, critic and biographer.

Summertime in Mayerling, then and later, brought-out the radiant side of Wolf's nature, including his love of children and of the countryside. His small stocky figure, fair hair, and dark brown eyes fitfully lit by hilarity, were well described by a later friend, Edmund Hellmer, who added that to know him really well one had to hear him laugh and see him in the open air. But the sunshine regularly faded, and a darker side supervened ; then, the Wolfian moods turned 1st to a daunting wildness of speech and mien and thence, sometimes, to snapping and snarling, even at his devoted benefactors.

Before Wolf's 21st birthday, Vally Franck had broken off their attachment and returned to her native France. Despair resounded in the « Sechs geistliche Lieder » , choruses to words by « Eichendorff » ; again, secular human feeling was presented in the guise of spiritual agony. As ever, when wounded Wolf sought refuge in Windischgraz, composing a further « Eichendorff » song of soulful separation, « In der Fremde I » . Once again, he was helped by the devoted Goldschmidt, who, in November 1881, found him a post as 2nd conductor at Salzburg. As before, Wolf's musicianship was applauded but there were jarring personal notes. He resented the trivial tedium of Operetta rehearsal and quarrelled violently with the director. Again, he left under a cloud ; early in 1882, he was back in Vienna. His unhappy father compared himself, with some justice, to a « Sisyphus » forever doomed to push the same heavy stone uphill and behold it rolling ineluctably back, this time perhaps with crushing and fatal effect. For a time, father and son were estranged. Wolf, though contrite, was helpless to govern the forces that determined his life and fate. It was apparently early in this year that he was conscripted for a short time into military service, then compulsory at 20. For unknown reasons, whether the influence of friends, or his own ill-health, or unstable temperament, or small stature (5 feet, 11 inches) , he was neither called-up, in 1880, nor long retained, in 1882. His diary records this as the year of a « terrible moral hangover » . But, as usual, the arid tracts were diversified by occasional oases, including the « Mörike » setting of « Mausfallensprüchelein » , the fruit of another summer spent with the Preyss and Werner families, in Mayerling. There was a further remission, in late- 1882 and early- 1883, with a group of generally serene and sunny « Reinick » and « Eichendorff » songs. This time, when the darker mood returned, composition continued. It was as if 2 strands (bright and dark ; lyric and dramatic ; simple and complex ; Schumannian and Wagnerian) were beginning to interweave in a new and essentially Wolfian pattern. His tense and dramatic Justinus Kerner setting « Zur Ruh, zur Ruh » of June 1883 may have been his threnody on the death of Wagner 4 months earlier. In August, he saw « Parsifal » in Bayreuth ; then, again, he was at a standstill.

Years of uncertainty (1883-1887)

What trail Wolf should now follow was in no way clear to him or his family or friends. Eduard Hanslick had admired his songs, and thought them worth publishing. But first Schott, and then Breitkopf rejected them, though in affable terms. Perhaps, he was not destined to be a song-writer after all ? At this impasse came his 3rd encounter with a great composer, this time Franz Liszt, at a meeting (again engineered by the faithful Goldschmidt) in April 1883. Although impressed with the songs Wolf showed him, which included « Die Spinnerin » , Liszt (like Richard Wagner and Johannes Brahms) counselled further composition in the larger forms. This again chimed with Wolf's own mood. That winter, he had drafted the libretto of a Spanish Opera. Now, he instantly began work on a Symphonic poem based on Heinrich von Kleist's « Penthesilea » , a drama which (like « Faust » , and perhaps for the same reason) had long been an obsession of his ; its theme is the injuries inflicted by women on men through sexual passion. In Lisztian style, it seeks to develop and integrate small-scale motifs into the orchestral tone-poem frame. Wolf went again to Bayreuth for « Parsifal » ; he spent an agreeable holiday in Rinnbach visiting the Köcherts. But then, the tides of inspiration again receded, leaving a barren and featureless shore. He found a new friend and admirer, the writer Hermann Bahr. But, by the end of 1883, another depressive phase had set in. There are more sad stories of recrimination and parting, offence given and taken. Wolf quarrelled with his friends the Breuers because of his immoderate language about women. He stormed-out of the hospitable house of the industrialist Fritz Flesch because his host passed him a pear on a toothpick not a trifling matter to a sensitive and fastidious syphilitic who had scrupulously spent his infectious phase in enforced isolation.

The outbursts and estrangements of these and later years have to be viewed in the perspective of Wolf's artistic frustration, his mental and physical case history and the enduring love and solicitude shown by faithful friends. Supreme among them was Melanie Köchert, whom Wolf had been teaching and adoring since 1881. Her husband Heinrich Köchert was the Vienna Court jeweller, and had influential friends. Under his ægis, Wolf was appointed music-critic of the fashionable Sunday « Wiener Salonblatt » . But there was nothing merely modish in Wolf's writing or in his readership, the new and growing public for music criticism fostered by Eduard Hanslick yet left dissatisfied by the latter's intransigent anti-Wagnerism. Into this vacuum, Wolf rushed headlong. Notoriously, he did Richard Wagner more than justice, and Johannes Brahms less. But it would be wrong to see his outspoken critiques as merely partisan or their anti-Brahmsian thrust as merely retaliatory. They are not only a literate and lively mirror of the age ; they have a special interest for the Wagner scholar, for there can hardly have been anyone at the time who was more articulately knowledgeable about the Operas. Above all, they afford significant insights into Wolf's own creative mind.

The 3 year spell of criticism was useful as a vocation and a discipline, but it inhibited composition. Although Wolf took a long summer holiday in each of the 3 years 1884 to 1886, his comparative quietude was not matched by comparable peace of mind. The sardonic turbulence of his prose is well matched in his only song of this period, the « Mörike » setting « Die Tochter der Heide » , written during a sojourn with the Köcherts at Rinnbach, in July 1884. It was probably at this time that he and Melanie Köchert avowed their mutual love. The last movement of the D minor Quartet was also sketched in the same summer. Some fragmentary sketches for another Kleist play, « Prinz Friedrich von Homburg » , about the conflicts between love and duty, convention and temperament, date from August, when Wolf was visiting his sister Modesta and her husband Josef Straßer at Oblarn ; this time, love is a saving grace, not the destructive force of « Penthesilea » . On an outing with Straßer, Wolf met the folk-poet and singer Johann Kain, and was entranced by his songs. By October 1884, Wolf was back in Vienna writing reviews and vainly striving to arrange performances or publication of his own works. He resolved to devote the coming summer to completing, for submission to the Philharmonic Orchestra, his « Penthesilea » and « Prinz Friedrich von Homburg » music. The latter remained fragmentary, but, in September, he called on Richter with the score of « Penthesilea » and was promised a trial later that year. Wolf felt that he was at last gaining a foothold, and, indeed, he had been making a name for himself as a critic. Sadly, it was a hated name. Among those Wolf had mauled was Sigismund Bachrich, whose pretensions as an Opera composer had been pointedly deflated. But Bachrich was the viola player of the famed Rosé Quartet ; so Wolf was naive in submitting his D minor Quartet to them for a hearing. It was returned with a woundingly worded note signed by Bachrich on behalf of his colleagues. Worse still, « Penthesilea » was put on trial in every sense. Its rehearsal on 15 October 1885 was (whether or not with conductor Hans Richter's connivance) a fiasco. Bachrich was in the orchestra, and Richter made some disparaging remarks (which Wolf overheard) about people who dared to criticize so great a Master as Brahms. Such comments were wholly predictable and unsurprising. It was Wolf's turn to be lacerated. His critiques continued with unabated vigour ; but his own music was aborted or stillborn. It was not until October 1886 while on holiday with the Straßers (now living at Murau) after some embarrassing contretemps, including a grave eye injury sustained while playing with the children's toys, that he completed his next viable work, the Intermezzo in E-flat, for string quartet. At the turn of the year, he began work on « Christnacht » , a setting of August von Platen for soloists, chorus and orchestra. Wolf himself described it as uniting 2 aspects of the Christ child : naive and child-like, yet conquering and redemptive. Again, the impulse seems intuitively self-expressive. Similarly, all 3 songs of 1886 (« Der König bei der Krönung » , « Der Soldat Biterolf ») and the 1st 3 of 1887 (« Wächterlied auf der Wartburg » , « Wanderers Nachtlied » , « Beherzigung ») have texts relating to various aspects of staunchness and resolution in the face of adversity. At last, the music affirms a confident sense of purpose and vocation. Finally, in 1887, Wolf attained a new plateau near the summit of Mastery. The impetus was provided by a change of route from subjectivity towards the sonorous re-creation of imaginative literature, a concept frequently cited by Wolf the critic as a touchstone of excellence. So it proved for Wolf the composer. From March to May 1887, he was inspired by the vitality of Eichendorff's poetry about lightness in love (« Der Soldat I ») or the bewitching power of women (« Die Kleine » , « Die Zigeunerin » , « Waldmädchen ») and of nature (« Nachtzauber ») . Between these last 2 songs, he composed the highly-original « Italienische Serenade » for string quartet (2-4 May) . Its relaxed and amused irony may also have owed its conception to Eichendorff, whose novella « Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts » offers many a textual correspondence with Wolf's life and music and includes an Italian serenade.

There could now be no further doubt in Wolf's mind about the fact of his gift, though its actual nature remained unclear to him. He had written his 1st Masterpiece, and his last critique. At that moment, his father was suddenly taken ill, and died on 9 May, thus, being denied his son's later triumphs but spared the final tragedy. Hugo, summoned by telegram, was a solace at the end, but then became himself inconsolable. Hardly another word was written or another note composed in that year. He needed affectionate support and encouragement ; a mainstay had gone. Help came from Friedrich Eckstein, whose library and conversation had enriched and influenced the young Wolf in his earlier Vienna days and who now performed the further signal service of persuading a publisher (perhaps, with some financial inducement) to bring-out 2 volumes of Wolf's songs. From among his manuscripts of many years, Wolf selected 6 women's songs and 6 for male-voice, to be inscribed respectively to his mother and to his father's memory. The project induced a tumultuous creative euphoria.

Mastery and fame (1888-1897)

Hugo Wolf instinctively sought solitude. His friends the Werners offered him the use of their summer holiday home in Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna. He took with him the poems of his favourite « Mörike », whose lyrics had no doubt been germinating in his musical mind for many years. Now came a sudden spontaneous flowering of song music that in its profusion and variety matched the Franz Schubert of 1814-1815 and the Robert Schumann of 1840-1841. The biographical parallels with the latter are especially clear. Wolf too had just emerged from some years of activity as a critic and was celebrating a long-lasting love-affair (by 1888, Wolf and Melanie Köchert were lovers, though they could meet only with difficulty and by stealth) . Wolf too found himself moving in the song medium with a new and surprising assurance (with characteristic irony, he compared the process to the final undoing of a frequently and frustratingly fumbled button) . Finally, he too was disconcerted by the violence of his musical creativity, though overjoyed by its profusion. On 22 February, for example, he wrote to Edmund Lang : « I have just put a new song on to paper (“ Der Knabe und das Immllein ”) . A song for the gods, let me tell you ! My cheeks are glowing with excitement like molten iron ; and this state of inspiration is more a delicious torment to me than an unalloyed pleasure. » . But that was only a beginning. Far finer songs grew and proliferated, at the rate of 2 or even 3 a day. Again to Edmund Lang, on the same day : « Hardly was my letter despatched than I took-up my “ Mörike ” and wrote another song (“ Jägerlied ”) . P.S. : I have succeeded in a 3rd song, and how ! (“ Ein Stündlein wohl vor Tag ”) . This is an eventful day. »

A month later, he was still composing at the same pitch and writing in the same strain. To Josef Straßer, March 23 : « I'm working at 1,000 horsepower from early morning until late at night, without respite. What I am now putting on to paper, dear friend, is also being written for posterity. They are Masterpieces. When I tell you that (despite several unavoidable visits to Vienna) I have, since 22 February, written 25 songs, each better than the last, about which connoisseurs agree that there has been nothing like them since Schubert, Schumann, you'll readily gather what kind of songs they are. » . Earlier, Wolf had written modestly to Edmund Lang : « I wonder what the future may hold in store for me ? This question torments me, perturbs and preoccupies me waking or sleeping. Am I called ? Or, perhaps, even chosen ? » . By March, he knew. By mid- May (after 43 songs) , he needed rest. He took a holiday with the Straßers ; he visited Bayreuth. In September, the spate of song resumed. This time, Wolf sought sanctuary with the Eckstein family at Unterach, where he wrote (again, perhaps, using some earlier ideas) 13 « Eichendorff » settings. Then « Mörike » settings resumed with another 9 in the 1st fortnight of October, including some with a deep spiritual content (Wolf had again been much moved by « Parsifal ») . Then, came a return to Vienna, and an outburst even more sustained than ever. By 13 February 1889, Wolf had finished the 51 songs of the « Gœthe » song-book, except for one incomplete sketch (« Die Spröde ») which dissatisfied him and was later re-composed.

Again, the connoisseurs could recognize Masterpieces, this time directly challenging comparison with the « Gœthe » settings of Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann. The word soon spread from old friends to new converts. It was only on 2 March 1888 that any Wolf song had been publicly performed (by Rosa Papier, Hans Paumgartner's wife) . By 23 March, Wolf was playing and singing his latest « Mörike » settings to the « Wagner-Verein » .

Among its more influential members, Josef Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe, both professors at the Conservatory, were powerfully impressed. So was the tenor Ferdinand Jäger (who had sung « Parsifal » at Bayreuth) when, on 8 November, he heard 3 of the « Mörike » songs from a soprano of the Vienna Opera accompanied by Schalk. Jäger was soon to Wolf as Vogl was to Schubert, a life-long devotee and partner. Their Wolf concert, on 15 December, was the composer's 1st public appearance as an accompanist. This and subsequent recitals were received with acclaim.

In May 1889, Wolf returned to Perchtoldsdorf with his mind still ringing with plaudits. The prospect of public success again focussed his attention on large-scale forms, both Operatic and orchestral. (2 settings from « A Midsummer Night's Dream » date from this month as well as 2 orchestrations of songs from the « Mörike » volume, which had meanwhile been published.) After summer holiday visits to Bayreuth and to his mother in Windischgraz, Wolf returned to Perchtoldsdorf at the end of October 1889 and instantly began work on his Spanish song-book. Thoughts of Opera often suggested Spain or Italy to his mind (from this summer also dates the draft of a few dreamy bars of String Quartet music intended as a slow movement for the « Italienische Serenade ») . This impulse, together with his established penchant for characterization and description, his strong sense of national feeling and local colour, and a mood of mysticism perhaps induced or fostered by the Bayreuth visits, led to a choice of translations from the Spanish by Paul Heyse and Emanuel Geibel (a source earlier used by both Schumann and Brahms) . By April 1890, the 44 Spanish songs (including translations from Camoens, Cervantes, Lope de Vega and others, as well as anonymous lyrics) were completed. Meanwhile, the thrust towards stage-music continued : a sketched theme of December 1889 is headed « Introduction to Hamlet » . 2 more « Reinick » settings (one with orchestra on a patriotic theme) and 6 « Keller » songs in June 1890 (again, including characterization and mysticism) bring to an end this great creative period, in which 174 songs, including many acknowledged masterpieces, had been composed within 2 and a half years.

Meanwhile, the reverberations of Wolf's fame were spreading outside Austria. The 1st critical article was by Heinrich Rauchberg, an early friend ; his « Neue Lieder und Gesänge » (about the « Mörike » and « Eichendorff » song-books) appeared in the November / December issue of the « Osterreichisch-ungarische Revue » . Far more influential, however, was Josef Schalk's « Neue Lieder, neues Leben » in the « Münchener allgemeine Zeitung » for 22 January 1890. This gave rise to widespread interest and correspondence. Wolf heard from the Tübingen music-director, Emil Kauffmann (whose father had been a friend of Mörike's) , and the Mannheim judge, Oskar Grohe. Both became close friends. Gustave Schur of the « Wagner-Verein » was able to negotiate with the well-established firm of Schott in Mainz to supplement or replace the small Viennese publishers Wetzler (already on the point of bankruptcy) and Lacom.

Within Austria, Jäger had given another very successful Wolf recital to the « Graz Wagner-Verein » on 12 April. It was heard by Heinrich Potpeschnigg, a dentist and amateur pianist, who soon became a close friend and helper. In Vienna, Wolf's name was steadily gaining ground, but also meeting some resistance. Richard Heuberger recalled a talk with Johannes Brahms and Hans Richter, in November 1890, about « the Wagnerians and in particular Hugo Wolf, whom they now praised as a great song-writer, the inventor of the “ Symphonic song ”, whereas Schubert, Schumann and Brahms are said to have written songs as if with guitar accompaniment » . The partisan note is clear ; and there was some resentment even within the Wagner Societies. But the general reaction was favourable ; and this wave of recognition carried Wolf to a further crest of enthusiasm for Opera. In 1890, with his mind very much on Spanish themes, he had been offered a libretto on Alarcon's « El sombrero de tres picos » , by the feminist and journalist Rosa Mayreder. This was rejected, together with other suggestions such as « The Tempest » and « the story of Pocahontas » (proposal and counter-proposal between Wolf and the poet Detlev von Liliencron, whose attention had been drawn to Wolf by Josef Schalk, and who composed a verse-eulogy of the songs) . Among other topics mooted,

« the life of Buddha » and « the Golden Ass of Apuleius » might be said to typify Wolf's contrasting spiritual and secular aspects. But when he received a commission from the « Burgtheater » to compose incidental music for a production of Henryk Ibsen's « The Feast at Solhaug » , Wolf's zest sharply diminished. He found the assigned task irksome and uncongenial ; he was dilatory and uninspired ; he scored for too large an orchestra ; and his procrastination delayed the opening night until 21 November 1891, when the reception was lukewarm. His recalcitrance was enhanced by some fresh song inspiration from Paul Heyse's polished translations of anonymous Italian poems in a courtly style and tradition dating from the 16th Century or earlier (hardly folk-poems, as is sometimes claimed) . 7 such settings were completed in October and November 1890 despite the distraction of another visit to Germany to complete the negotiations with Schott. On his itinerary, Wolf met the Jewish conductor Hermann Levi and the singer Eugen Gura in Munich and called on his new friends Emil Kauffmann and Oskar Grohe.

But now, bodily and mental exhaustion supervened, with some ominous signs. Apart from the Henryk Ibsen commission and the orchestration of a « Mörike » song, Wolf was barren for most of 1891. The tedium of inactivity was alleviated by a further visit to Germany to hear « Christnacht » under conductor Felix Weingartner, at Mannheim. There, he met Engelbert Humperdinck, who as Schott's reader had recommended Wolf's songs ; but they did not take-up the option on « Christnacht » , in which Wolf could recognize defective scoring. A depressive phase ensued. He suffered from insomnia and malaise ; he despaired of writing another note. But, at the end of December, he composed (or, perhaps, completed) another 15 Italian songs, again full of Masterly invention. Then, darkness fell again, more impenetrable than ever. The long fallow period was again put to good use in tours and concerts in Germany.

The 1st Wolf recital in Berlin, on 3 March 1892, with the local tenor Grahl (replacing the indisposed Jäger) and the mezzo-soprano Friedrike Mayer, was enthusiastically received, though it was not a financial success. Wolf made many new friends including his patron Baron Lipperheide, the chorus Master Siegfried Ochs, the critic Richard Sternfeld (who wrote his laudatory article « Tin neuer Liedesfraling' » on 12 March) , the Opera singer Emilie Herzog-Welti (who gave a successful Wolf recital on 12 April) and the librettist Richard Genée. As a suitable Opera text for Wolf, he recommended Alarcon's « El niño de la bola » , translated into German as « Manuel Venegas » . This project preoccupied Wolf to the last.

On his return from Berlin, Wolf again fell victim to the feverish throat inflammation (no doubt a symptom of secondary syphilis) to which he had been prone since 1891. He was cared for, as so often, by the Köcherts. Perhaps, it was the presence of Melanie, his shy and reticent mistress (who was never seen among the social circle of Wolf's musical friends) , that prompted him to orchestrate his great song on the theme of covert and illicit love, « Geh, Geliebter, geh jetzt » , from the Spanish song-book. He scored the « Italienische Serenade » for small orchestra, with some slight but perplexing thematic changes ; he sporadically sketched or planned some additional movements. Otherwise, he was barren and listless. In the 3 years 1892 to 1894, he wrote not a single note of viable original music. As before, he sought distraction in continued travel and concert tours. Thus, in January 1894, he attended a very successful performance of his Shakespeare « Elfenlied » and the choral version of his « Mörike » song « Der Feuerreiter » under the direction of Siegfried Ochs, in Berlin. On the same programme was the « Te Deum » of Bruckner, also present in person ; he and Wolf were on affable terms. In Mannheim, Wolf met another disciple and benefactor, the barrister and amateur tenor Hugo Faißt of Stuttgart. In Darmstadt, he became infatuated with the soprano Frieda Zerny of the Mainz Opera, and formed wild plans of emigrating with her to the United States. This brief liaison somehow became known to Melanie Köchert, to her distress and Wolf's embarrassment. He renewed his allegiance to her ; and the summer months of 1894 were spent 1st at her country home in Traunkirchen, and, later, with the Lipperheides near Brixlegg in the Tyrol.

With the success of Engelbert Humperdinck's « Hänsel und Gretel » in December, Wolf's Opera fever reached a new crisis. The Alarcon story of the « 3 Cornered Hat » began to dominate his mind. He rejected a version prepared by Franz Schaumann, chairman of the « Wagner-Verein » and enthused instead over the previously despised libretto of Rosa Mayreder, entitled « Der Corregidor » . Its merits are disputable ; but this text indubitably now began to fertilize Wolf's long-dormant creative genius. As before, there was a period of winter gestation followed by springtime labour. Early in April 1895, Wolf again sought solitude in Perchtoldsdorf. There the « Mörike » drama was re-enacted : he began to compose daily, from dawn to dusk. In May, he left for the more comfortable Lipperheide Château, in Brixlegg. By 9 July, the whole 4 Act Opera was complete in piano score ; the orchestration occupied the rest of the year. The Opera was offered, unsuccessfully, to Vienna, Berlin and Prague and was eventually accepted (with some help from Grohe) for performance at Mannheim. The rehearsals were prolonged and tense because of inaccuracies in the copied parts and fluctuations in Wolf's own mental state ; he continued to be plagued by insomnia. The 1st performance (7 June 1896) under Hugo Röhr was a great success, with curtain calls for the composer, but the enthusiasm abated in later performances, with the gradual departure of Wolf's friends and admirers ; the Opera has still not reached the general repertory or the wider public.

Meanwhile, Wolf, in a further access of creative fervour, returned to Perchtoldsdorf and composed (or completed) the final section of the Italian song-book, with 24 songs in the 5 weeks, between 25 March and 30 April. He, then, returned to Vienna to occupy (for the 1st time in his life) his own home. Ever since his arrival there, he had been living either in penury or else as a guest. The Köcherts had always been generous ; the Lipperheides and Grohe had provided a stipend ; now, Faißt and other friends found and furnished a flat in the Schwindgasse. There, for most of 1896 and the beginning of 1897, he revised (with the devoted help of Potpeschnigg) the score and parts of « Der Corregidor » , influenced inter alia by Johann Fuchs, « Kapellmeister » of the Vienna Opera, who advised that revisions (notably a cut in the last act) were mandatory. In autumn 1896, he wrote 2 settings of « Byron » and one of « Reinick » .

Breakdown and terminal illness (1897-1903)

In March 1897, Wolf composed his last songs, to sonnets by Michel-Angelo in German translation : the Christmas gift of Paul Müller, the founder of the Berlin « Hugo-Wolf-Verein » . In April 1897, a Vienna « Wolf-Verein » was inaugurated by the university professor Michaël Haberlandt, a staunch support in Wolf's declining years. Meanwhile, Wolf had pursued his plans for a 2nd Alarcon Opera on the story of « Manuel Venegas » .

The theme is sexual jealousy and revenge, as in « Der Corregidor » , but with dark overtones of violence and tragedy. Perhaps, Wolf's mind in its depressive phase was reverting to a febrile subjectivism. The « Michel-Angelo » songs, fine though they are, have evident personal application. By 1897, Wolf was clearly a very sick man, whose always unpredictable behaviour was now causing distress and alarm. A medical examination, in the previous year, had disclosed (though the knowledge was withheld from Wolf himself) a characteristic loss of pupillary reflex, symptomatic of the incipient general paralysis of tertiary syphilis. Nevertheless, he was again ready to compose at fever-heat. A « Manuel Venegas » libretto prepared by Rosa Mayreder was summarily rejected. Moritz Hoernes (a colleague of Michaël Haberlandt) produced an alternative version which seemed to the sick Wolf to have a truly Shakespearean quality. In September 1897, he was again sequestered in his apartment working from dawn to dusk on the new Opera. He completed some 60 pages of piano score in 3 weeks ; then, his mind gave way. He claimed to have been appointed director of the Vienna Opera ; thenceforth, only his own works (mostly unfinished or unwritten) would he performed. No doubt his madness took this turn because of a recent visit from his old friend Gustav Mahler, who had just been appointed Opera « Kapellmeister » and who, according to Wolf, had promised to do his utmost to stage « Der Corregidor » in the coming season. The stress of the ensuing excitement, or perhaps, the disappointment of a later change of plan, finally unhinged Wolf's already wrenched reason. He called a meeting of his sympathizers, played them his « Venegas » fragments, told them of his new appointment and his plans for dismissing Mahler and taking-over. He was removed under restraint to the asylum of Doctor Wilhelm Svetlin. His letters announce grandiose plans for world tours of his own Operas with the support of the Weimar Theatre. His overheated brain boiled over with insipid music. Some remission ensued and he was discharged on 24 January 1898. He paid inconsequential and disconsolate visits to various resorts and centres (including Semmering, Graz, Cilli and Trieste) accompanied by his sister and the devoted Melanie Köchert. On 6 March, he returned to Vienna, to a new home in the Mühlgasse. That summer, he stayed with the Köcherts at Traunkirchen. In October, he was seized by another gust of madness and tried to drown himself in the Traunsee. He entered the Lower-Austrian provincial asylum in Vienna, on 4 October 1898. There, his sufferings were alleviated by the love and loyalty of Melanie, whose frequent and regular visits continued unflinchingly until the day of his death on 22 February 1903. Then, she gave way to remorse and a slow melancholy. On 21 March 1906, she fell to her death from the 4th floor window of her Vienna home.

Wolf inscribed all his song manuscripts to her, as the one who understood him and his music best of all. She lies in the family grave at Hietzing. He is buried in the Vienna Central Cemetery beside Franz Schubert and Ludwig van Beethoven.

Early vocal works

At 1st, Wolf had little inkling of his goal. He was even misdirected by his own refractory temperament and a preoccupation with large-scale forms. As compensation, his extremes of mood commanded an analogously wide range of expression, while his obsession with Opera concentrated his mind on musical techniques of characterization and atmosphere. Further, his self-willed and poetic nature constrained him to voice and keyboard rather than to such social or academic disciplines as chamber music or orchestration. So his strengths were early if unwittingly bent towards the compression of large-scale forms and ideas into the lyric frame. The essences of grand Opera, tone-poem and expressive Symphony (as exemplified by Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt and Anton Bruckner : Wolf's 3 most admired Masters) were to be distilled and concentrated into song.

Lines themselves are keenly expressive of poetic stress, cadence and significance. From the 1st Wolf's word-setting has recitative inflections with touches of cadential pointing and plain-chant repetition, perhaps, not uninfluenced by his background of church school and choir. This thrust towards verbal expressiveness led him to explore choral writing for mixed or male-voice chorus, accompanied or « a cappella », at the same time as the earliest songs. Linear independence and significance are sometimes taken to the point of ungrammatical overlapping (e.g. , in « Die Stimme des Kindes » , 1876) . There are also deliberate contrasts of texture, for example, of solo with half-chorus (« Grablied » , 1876) or full chorus (« Letzte Bitte » from the « Sechs geistliche Lieder » , 1881 : the culmination of Wolf's work in this genre) . Here too, the basic idea is a quasi-dramatic presentation ; voices in 3 and 4 parts are used as accompanimental background for a solo-voice, again with effects of isolation and contrast. One corollary is that the piano part of a song can be quasi-vocal ; and this is another highly-original and fertile source of expressive effect. Even the earliest songs (e.g. , « Du bist wie eine Blume » , 1876) can show traces of the 4 part (almost 4 voice) texture that later became a staple style - as acknowledged by Wolf himself ; a letter to Melanie Köchert of 7 July 1897 announces the discovery that the piano part of « Führ mich, Kind, nach Bethlehem » is in effect a 4 part chorus. This texture too may reflect the early environment of the boy organist ; it appears electively in songs of devotion, whether sacred (as in that example) or secular. Another possible influence was Robert Franz, who acknowledged his own indebtedness to the Protestant chorale. Any early imprinting would have been strongly reinforced by the strict grounding in 4 part harmony that Wolf received at the Vienna Conservatory, and, then, by the simultaneous impact of Richard Wagner's Operas. Even without Wagner, Wolf's own bold linear independence of melody would have led him to poignant discords, striking modulations and fluctuating tonalities, as well as to effects of counterpoint and canon and other such melodic interplay whether between voice and accompaniment or within the 4 part keyboard texture.

Not surprisingly, Wolf's early attempts to cultivate what he later called « the infertile ground of absolute music » (« Musikalische Kritiken » , page 50) proved fruitless or « abortive » . Even his native ground of musico-poetic expression had to be prepared by deep reading. « Goethe » and « Heine » lyrics led him to their settings in Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann and, thence, to a study of expressive techniques in piano music as well as song-writing. Wolf experimented by crossing all these strains into new hybrids. Thus, his « Heine » setting « Wenn ich in deine Augen seh » (1876) has a piano part derived from a Schubert « Impromptu » , while « Ich stand in dunkeln Träumen » (1878) uses the Brahmsian device of a vocal line related to the piano theme by augmentation or diminution. But the main influence was Schumann. Wolf's early works for piano (sonatas and variations) soon yielded place to Schumannesque genre pieces (« Humoreske » , 1877) . At the same time, he was composing equally Schumannesque piano songs, that is, a lyric piano solo the melody of which serves as vocal line. This style proved quickly viable, as in « Morgentau » (1877) , the earliest song Wolf adjudged worthy of publication. Yet, the influence was sometimes inhibiting. Thus, a marginal note on the unfinished manuscript of « Was soll ich sagen ? » (1878 ; a « Chamisso » text also set by Schumann) reads « Zu viel Schumannisch ; deshalb nicht vollendet » . The essential lesson was soon learnt, by Wolf as by Schumann : the addition of a declamatory vocal line to an independent piano part yields a new stock of expressive device. For example, the piano can depict a convivial scene, the protagonist's isolation from which is expressed in the voice part (« Sie haben heut Abend Gesellschaft » , 1878 ; see Schumann's « Das ist ein Flöten and Geigen ») .

At first, all these devices tended to be used for their own sake, or for self-expressive purposes. But, gradually, they served to illustrate and enact a poetic mood. For example, in « In der Fremde I » (1881) , the contrasting melodic lines in voice and piano enhance the poet's theme of separation, as in some forms of Operatic duet. The task of distilling an Operatic essence into voice and keyboard was dramatically eased by the techniques of piano reduction used by Karl Klindworth and others, in their vocal scores of Wagner Operas. Wolf's own Wagner paraphrases (around 1880) presage the piano parts of his later songs, both in their part-writing and in their transcription of orchestral effects such as string runs or tremolandos. He could also call upon the melodic and harmonic vocabulary of French or Italian Opera, or the popular styles of folk-song or student song, all familiar to him from his own early music-making. Further, even the early songs already show abundant evidence of an innate and developing capacity for inventing vivid motivic equivalents for poetic ideas and using them constructionally, in the Schubertian lied tradition, as the building-blocks of the song form.

But these apprenticeship years were far richer in promise and potential than in actual achievement. By Wolf's own stringent but not unjust criteria, only a dozen of the 100 odd songs he wrote before 1887 were worth publishing. There is of course much to admire, as in the « Reinick » and « Eichendorff » songs of 1882-1883 ; but the early works tend to be fallible both in form (e.g. , the over-emphatic postlude of « Andenken ») and in content (sometimes obviously derivative) . Such flaws can be traced to a failure of objective concern for the poem as such. The outpouring of personal emotion often fails to fit easily into the miniature form. Wolf was more likely to succeed in larger-scale instrumental music, where the link with words, though still vital, was not a criterion of excellence. In this respect too, he had much to learn which would later be of service to him as a song-writer.

Instrumental works

These are brilliant conceptions rather than finished works of art, and hence present difficulties of appreciation, evaluation and performance. The 1st was the D minor String Quartet, begun in 1878. Wolf had recently contracted syphilis ; his score bears the Faustian epigraph « Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren » , which the opening motifs seem to declaim. The Beethoven influence is so manifest (e.g. , « Große Fugein » : the powerful leaps and dissonance of the histrionic Grave introduction, and the « Allegro assai vivace ma serio » of the F minor String Quartet, Opus 95, in the Scherzo, marked « Resolut ») and so unusual (it recurs only in the 1888 « Mörike » song « Der Genesene an die Hoffnung » , significantly about recovery from mortal sickness) as to suggest that this too is a consciously expressive device. It is as if Beethoven were being deliberately invoked, as another Faustian archetype of the suffering hero. (The claim, now largely discounted, that Beethoven was syphilitic would have been a recent talking-point among musicians in Vienna.) Wolf's lyrical slow movement (dated 1880) begins with a Wagnerian symbol of redemption, an overt homage to the « pardon » motif in « Tannhäuser » , as if the work were further designed as a Pilgrimage through despair by way of faith and fortitude to final recuperation. On that assumption, the much lighter last movement of 1884, with its touches of ironic insouciance, is musically anti-climactic, yet, humanly convincing. The music was written as the experience was lived. By that time, Wolf was 24 and had regained his composure and (as he thought) his health. On this autobiographical interpretation, the right order of movements in performance would be the logical time-sequence : Grave - Leidenschaftlich bewegt ; Resolut ; Adagio ; and Sehr lebhaft (not, as in earlier editions, with the 2nd and 3rd movements transposed) . Thus, considered, this extended and complex work has the unity and novelty which, as absolute music, it might be held to lack. On any analysis, the genuine (if sporadic) power and expressiveness of its thematic details are undeniable.

The composition of this String Quartet overlapped with the even more ambitious orchestral work « Penthesilea », begun in 1883, which also displays, though in differing proportions, the same admixture of derivation, self-expression, originality and poetic inspiration. This time, the last of those qualities is paramount, and the music verges on greatness. There is ample testimony to Wolf's obsession with Heinrich von Kleist's drama of the Amazon queen who leads her warrior-maidens to Troy, becomes enamoured, yet jealous, of Achilles and, finally, avenges her subjection to him, in both love and war, by inciting her war-hounds to tear him to shreds. Under the smooth Classical surface of Kleist's blank verse rages an erotic turbulence. The appeal to subconscious motive anticipates Sigmund Freud. Wolf, at the time, still had reason to be preoccupied with the idea of male vulnerability to the traumata of love. His scoring, including 4 horns, 4 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 tuba and 1 harp as well as a full complement of wind, strings and percussion, aims to re-create the epic scale of the conflict, as well as the heroic stature of protagonist and antagonist. The music creates panorama (extremes of orchestral pitch and dynamics, with antiphonal trumpets on each side of the orchestra, like battle signals) as well as character, situation and emotion (motifs for the passionate « Penthesilea », the noble Achilles, war marches, love-feasts and snarling hounds, interspersed with pleading recitative) .

Wolf had given much thought to the structural problems of the tone-poem. He ardently admired the Symphonic poems of Franz Liszt, who had inspired this work both by personal suggestion and by example. Wolf felt (« Kritiken » , page 52) that unity in this new genre was to be attained by deriving form as well as content from the poetic source. It is not immediately clear how this end is best subserved by Wolf's chosen structure. The 2 short preludes (« Departure of the Amazons for Troy » ; « Penthesilea's Dream of the Love-festival ») presumably depict the dual nature of the heroine, ferocious yet tender ; their contrasting motifs derive from the same basic theme. There follows a long final development section (« Conflicts, Passions, Madness and Destruction ») in which all the themes are freely metamorphosed, developed and confronted so as to present the elements of the drama both collectively as mood-painting and consecutively as narrative. The work may, thus, be considered as an Opera without words, condensed into an Overture. Against the background of Kleist's drama reenacted in Wolf's imagination, the music can appear not only powerful but profound. Otherwise, its construction may seem diffuse and even obscure (for example, the main-theme of the last movement is not heard in its entirety until bar 832) , and its instrumentation (as Wolf himself came to acknowledge) not wholly secure. These factors could account for its rejection in both rehearsal and repertory and also help to explain, if not extenuate, the prodigious and unauthorized cuts imposed by its 1st editors.

Much the same characteristics might have been predicted of Wolf's projected incidental music to Kleist's better-known drama « Prinz Friedrich von Homburg » , where the conflict lies among love, duty and individual self-fulfilment, which again were questions much in Wolf's mind at the time. This music remained fragmentary ; but the « Penthesilea » patterns are, again, discernible in the completed work « Christnacht » for soloists, chorus and orchestra. Here, Wolf (as he wrote to Oskar Grohe, on 26 February 1891) aimed to symbolize the duality of the Incarnation : innocent child, triumphant hero. Again, there may be some element of subconscious self-portraiture ; little enough of such searching themes can be inferred from August von Platen's poem about the night of the Nativity, with its chorus of angels and shepherds. Wolf adds a chorus of believers, for good measure. The handling of such large choral and orchestral forces (the latter much the same as for « Penthesilea » , but with the percussion scaled down to timpani only) is rather beyond Wolf's technical competence (again, as he later conceded) , despite his natural flair for orchestration ; the published score contains revisions by Max Reger and F. Foll. The formal structure, however, is clearer than in « Penthesilea » because the words provide the necessary frame of reference. The music is again highly-original in conception ; and this time, the Lisztian or Wagnerian influences are better assimilated. The work is Wolfian in its colourful interweaving of solemnity and simplicity. The latter is effectively symbolized by a traditional carol melody, recalled from a provincial boyhood, which is scored and presented with a lightness of touch that suggests a corresponding lightness of mood. By 1886, when the main thematic material of « Christnacht » was conceived, the sombre canvasses of Wolf's creative imagination were being replaced by bright miniatures, beginning with the Intermezzo in E-h for string quartet. Its main-theme had been sketched in 1882 and left to germinate in a sunnier climate of mood. In summer 1886, it grew into a rondo with episodes and varied re-statements all so cunningly derived from the main-theme as to suggest different aspects of the same characters linked by dialogue or colloquy with a hint of dance-measure. Nothing is known of any literary background, though a verbal source would seem « prima facie » plausible. The effect is of expressive music written to an unknown programme ; one clue is Wolf's later reference to his « Humoristisches Intermezzo » . A comparison with his contemporary song-writing suggests « Mörike » as a possible source for this slight but spirited and engaging piece.

The next instrumental work, also for String Quartet, was the Serenade in G (later called by Wolf « an Italian Serenade » ; letter to Emil Kauffmann of 2 April 1892) . With this work, Wolf at last attained expressive if not formal Mastery. As with the Intermezzo, there is no avowed literary source. But the « Italienische Serenade » (2-4 May 1887) was composed during a phase of « Eichendorff » settings (7 March - 24 May) . It is thematically related to the 1st of them, « Der Soldat I » , about love for a lady who lives in a castle. The « Eichendorff » novella « Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts » has that same theme ; central to its plot is an Italian serenade. The novella contains a lyric (« Heimweh ») which Wolf had certainly set by the following year, and perhaps sketched at this time. Its hero is a young musician, a violinist, who leaves his country home and his grumbling father, to seek his fortune. He soon charms everyone with his gifts, or antagonizes them with his inconsequence. Wolf could hardly have found a more congenial or compelling self-portrait in all German literature. The novella also contains a serenade played by a small orchestra, for which Wolf later arranged his work. The original String Quartet, however, is preferable in the transparent lightness and delicacy of its texture ; and though it is not without technical problems (e.g. , of ensemble at the required tempo) , the string writing is far more relaxed and assured than in the early D minor Quartet. The Serenade too, like the other instrumental works, is novel in both content and form. Its rather diffusely episodic rondo structure with ironic quasi-recitative passages gently parodying Romantic love, again in conformity with the « Eichendorff » style, suggests an unspecified programme. Again, there is a strong sense of motivic writing deliberately presented and developed so as to suggest character (the dominance of the solo violin) , speech (the recitative passages) , colloquy (the duetting melodies) , scene-painting (the conspiratorial assembling and tuning in the prelude) , gesture (the sweeping fiddle flourishes) and instrumentation (the thrumming guitar imitations) . It may not be coincidence that Wolf's own description (to Oskar Grohe, on 28 June 1890) of the kind of Opera he would one day wish to write (the strumming of guitars, sighs of love, moonlit nights, champagne banquets) is closely paralleled in « Eichendorff » 's « Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts » (Chapter 8) . This, in turn, may account for Wolf's 10 year preoccupation with the arrangement and development of his « Italienische Serenade » music, in close parallel to his preoccupation with Opera.

In 1887, this dramatic lyricism brings Wolf's music in the Serenade and the « Eichendorff » settings on to a new and high-plateau close to the summit of song-writing. The upward thrust may have 2 sources of impetus. 1st, the music seems to derive directly from words and ideas without any serious subjective intervention. 2nd (and, perhaps, the point is related) , Wolf's 2 basic creative moods merge into a balanced integration. They may be described as gravity and levity or (as in « Christnacht ») sublimity and naivety ; their tutelary deities are Richard Wagner and Robert Schumann. The early songs had tended to one extreme or the other, sombre or sparkling (compare « Ein Grab with Mädchen mit dem roten Mündchen » , both 1876, or « Zur Ruh, zur Ruh ! » , 1883, with « Mausfallensprüchlein » , 1882) . A similar dichotomy is discernible in the instrumental music where the contrasts of mood are linked by monothematic techniques which later appear in the songs. The polarities are separately exemplified in « Wo wird einst and Gesellenlied » , both written on 24 January 1888. Thus, these 2 strong currents converge only 3 weeks before the « Mörike » song outburst.

Mature songs

Wolf's « Mörike » songs were above all original. All the contemporary critiques had the word « new » in their titles : new springtime, new life, new songs. Wolf himself wrote of the novel aspects of his musical language. Yet, he did not define them ; and the evidence suggests that their essential originality was not wholly grasped, perhaps not even by their creator, much of whose song-writing is manifestly in the main lied tradition. He and his audiences felt that he was continuing the line of Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann, without radical departure. Wolf himself thought it worth pointing-out (letter to Emil Kauffmann, on 21 May 1890) that even his boldest harmonies were justifiable by reference to accepted theory. Much of his mature work uses folk or popular song. His well-known solicitude for the choice and treatment of words is, by no means, invariable and in any event represents a difference of degree rather than kind from the practice of his predecessors. Well over half his texts have no pretension to poetic greatness or even excellence. Even the rest can be treated cavalierly : thus the accentuation can go astray (e.g. , « Leibrösslein » in « Der Gärtner ») and the subtler declamatory effects are quite often 2nd thoughts inserted at proof-stage. « Er ist » 's has repeated phrases and « Das verlassene Mägdlein » uses an unauthentic text, no doubt under the influence of Schumann in both instances. On occasion, Wolf could repeat a whole strophe without textual justification (« Benedeit die sel'ge Mutter ») or tacitly omit one (« Geh, Geliebter, geh jetzt ») . He could embellish his texts with his own insertions or inventions (« Die Zigeunerin ») or simply mistranscribe them (there are several textual errors in the manuscripts or even in the 1st editions) . He could deliberately add a new meaning unintended by the poet (« Wer rief dich denn ») . Even his practice of calling his song-books « Gedichte von Eichendorff » , « Mörike » or « Gœthe » was anticipated and, perhaps, prompted by Robert Schumann. The same applies to his choice of translations, for example, from the Spanish. Finally, Wolf's notable spontaneity of composition was hardly different in kind from that of, say, Schubert in 1815 and Schumann in 1840. All 3 composers no doubt planned and sketched beforehand and revised afterwards.

Nevertheless, Wolf was original, and in 4 main ways. 1st, he seems to have planned in advance the contents of each volume (e.g. , the Spanish song-book : letter of 12 November 1889 to his sister Käthe) , rather as if the artistic unity is not the poem as such but the song-book considered as representative of the poet or source. 2ndly, it was his practice to preface a performance of each song by a recital of the text : the words were separately acknowledged as a vital part of the artwork's content as well as its form. 3rdly, Wolf was reluctant to set a poem which he considered had already been successfully composed : a view which pre-supposes that a musical setting is more like a translation or objective critique than a personal commentary. His song-books are, thus, perhaps designed as anthologies, as homage, and also as critiques or translations. They make no sense, have no being, apart from the text which has breathed its life and essence into the music. 4thly, this essence is dramatic.

It follows that Wolf's art is a means of framing, embodying, presenting, enacting, the life of words. As a corollary, the piano has a more important role than with previous song-writers ; and melody does not necessarily predominate. It is in this sense that Wolf compressed Wagnerian music-drama, leitmotif, orchestra and declamation into voice and keyboard. Perhaps, it was this feeling of historical mission that led to his life-long obsession with large-scale composition even though the appropriate forms and techniques were among his own acknowledged weaknesses. He even felt himself stifled by Richard Wagner - with whom he was never in serious contention. He began to resent the title of song-writer. At the very moment when his true genius was 1st revealed to himself and the world, he could still write (letter to Josef Straßer, on 28 March 1888) : « For the moment, they are admittedly only songs. » . On the very day when that inspiration had at last begun, he could still be preoccupied (to Edmund Lang, on 22 February 1888) with extemporizing a comic Opera at the keyboard. Even with 3 great song-books completed, he could still lament (to Oskar Grohe, on 1 June 1891) : « I'm beginning to think that I have reached the end of my life. I can't go on writing songs for another 30 years. » . Next (again to Grohe, on 12 October 1891) comes the astoundingly anguished cry : « I really and truly shudder at the thought of my songs. The flattering recognition as " song-writer " disturbs me down to the very depths of my soul. What does it signify but the reproach that songs are all I ever write, that I am Master of what is only a small-scale genre ? » . Finally, Wolf's eventual madness took the form of, and was probably provoked by, a megalomaniac obsession with Operatic composition and performance.

There are, perhaps, 3 main reasons for this fixation. Songs were still generally held to be an inferior art form ; Wolf as an expressive composer craved the maximal audiences attainable only through Opera and Symphony ; his genius was, in fact, for dramatic music, though in a condensed form. No wonder he aggregated his songs into composite volumes comprehensive enough to yield extended recitals and programmes of planned contrasts, with at least a potential appeal to a mass audience. Further, each major song-book contains linking motifs designed to relate the single songs to a larger conceptual scheme, as with « Eichendorff » songs 9-10, « Mörike » songs 2-3, « Goethe » songs 39-40, Spanish sacred songs 8-10, Italian songs 42-43.

The song-book is, thus, itself the large-scale dramatic form. With the 20 « Eichendorff » songs (mentioned 1st because nearly half of them were written before 1888) , Wolf lifted the curtain on his singing theatre of the imagination. There everything is made of music : construction, action, character, plot and sub-plot, narrative, gesture, mime, dance and song, costume, scenery, and even stage properties and effects, including lighting. Piano preludes set the scene or delineate character. The songs are conceived as « tableaux vivants » viewed through the proscenium arch of the song form. As Wolf told Emil Kauffmann, he always imagined a background to each of his songs, and the examples he gave (the goddess sitting on a reef in the moonlight, playing her harp, in « Gesang Weylas » ; a chorus of wise men joining in the refrain of « Cophtisches Lied I ») go well beyond anything described in the text. So his submission to poetry was far from slavish. Yet, the verse does in fact give each song a formal framework which the instrumental music is sometimes felt to lack. In a sense therefore, Wolf's structural sense has certain defects which the poetry is called upon to redress. On the other hand, the musical response is so varied and flexible that Wolf might as justly be hailed as a Master of form. The poems are more often strophic than their settings, which strive towards free evolution and development. Even in strophic song, unchanged repetition is rare ; more typically the melody, for example, is varied to highlight a particular word, such as « süßer'in Um Mitternacht » . Unity is usually attained by the main factor common to music and poetry, namely rhythm. This may reflect either the metre or the theme of the poem : thus, in « Jägerlied » , the rare trochaic pentameter appears as 5/4 time, while in « Fußreise » the piano maintains a steady walking rhythm.

A repeated rhythmic figure may suggest an obsessive character or gesture (« Rat einer Alten ; Mühevoll komm ich und beladen ») while changes of basic rhythm serve to imply (as it were by modulation) a change of mood or meaning (« Agnes ; Grenzen der Menschheit ») . A piano melody or figuration may suggest words by its rhythmic shape (postlude to « Komm, Liebchen, komm !) . Regular piano rhythms can provide a patterned lattice for vocal melodies to curve and stray around, anticipating certain words or syllables, lingering over others, with the effect of a written-out rubato (e.g. , « stumm » or « heilig » in « An die Geliebte ») , whether, as there, to enhance the poetic meaning or, as often in the Italian songs, to create a new one. Occasionally too, Wolf would prolong a word that especially pleased him (e.g. , « geflügelt » in « Die ihr schwebet ») . Such devices are to be distinguished from their Operatic or Wagnerian counterparts. The Wolfian vocal line conveys a current of poetic feeling, deriving character from verbal inflection and not vice-versa. His melodies vary from complex nuance to straightforward singability in folk or popular style, as the context requires. The counterpoints of voice against piano, already noted in the earlier songs, are greatly developed from 1888 onwards. A typical example is « Lied eines Verliebten » , where the isolated left-hand melody is a symbol of separation. This image is further intensified in such songs as « Mein Liebster singt am Haus » , where the independence of the piano part embodies the excluded lover. Thus Wolf could create not only decor (by distinguishing foreground from background) but also dramatic irony (by presenting 2 different levels of involvement simultaneously, as in « Bei einer Trauung ») . Autonomy in the piano part also permits a quasi- Symphonic motivic development reflecting the changing moods of a poem (« Auf einer Wanderung ; Im Frühling ») . Piano interludes can link contrasting sections of a song and so suggest continuous action, whether in narrative or ballad forms (« Ritter Kurts Brautfahrt ») or, more rarely, in lyric modes (e.g. , in « Fussreise » , where a modulating piano interlude leads back to the original theme) .

Similarly, Wolf's harmonic usages are attuned to his texts, whether as single words or whole poems. An example of the former is at « froh und traurig » in « Alles endet, was entstehet » , where a major and a minor inflection speak respectively of joy and sorrow. Again, augmented 5ths mean increasing intensity (« Das verlassene Magdlein ») even to the point of parody (« Nimmersatte Liebe ») , while 2nd inversions at cadence points give an impression of peroration (« da bin' in Wohl denk ich oft ») . But such short-range or local effects are comparatively rare. More generally, Wolf's harmonic procedures provide a framework isomorphic with that of the poem, within which particular aspects can be highlighted ; for example, successive mediant modulations convey the idea of increasing lightness, as in « In der Frühe » and « Morgenstimmung » . This is the sense in which it was important for Wolf that his harmonic language should remain, as he said, traditional. He needed chromaticism and dissonance in order to create new expressive intensity. At the same time, the constraints of his song form require such effects to be readily relatable (whether in terms of affinity or contrast) to some recognizable tonal centre. Thus, the modal harmony of « Auf ein altes Bild » sets that song apart from the rest of the « Mörike » volume and from contemporary music generally ; the music is as it were seen, like the poem, through a haze of time. Within that song, the single acute dissonance at « Kreuzes Stamm » throws that phrase into high-relief, again in parallel with the poetry. Conversely, chromatics or dissonance can be relieved by touches of diatonic harmony (as in « Mir ward gesagt » , among many examples) yielding effects of relaxation from tension, or simplicity within complexity. More specifically, the introduction or recurrence of the tonic major can be delayed, so that its eventual arrival brings a sensation of repose and fulfilment (« Wir haben beide lange Zeit geschwiegen ») ; or the major form of a minor tonic can restate an idea in a brighter mode (« Ob der Koran von Ewigkeit sei ? ») . Such contrasts and juxtapositions are the essence of Wolf's song-writing, as of his mentor Robert Schumann's. Among the corollaries are personal verbal associations with certain keys. Thus, in Wolf extreme flat or sharp keys express nervous tension, in contrast with the bluff plainness of C major (« Gesellenlied ») ; the A major suggests springtime (« Frühling übers Jahr ») , and so on. Of course, there are exceptions ; but such associations, usual in all song-writing, are especially manifest and significant in Wolf, and a study of them is relevant to interpretation and performance (e.g. , the desirability of transposition) .

Such effects shade into overt musical depiction, at which Wolf was also adept. Examples abound, ranging from imaginative embroidery to frank onomatopoeia. Widely spaced chords suggest hollowness and reverberation (« Der Feuerreiter ») ; upward chromatic runs and bare 5ths convey disappearance into thin air (« Der Rattenfänger ») ; glissandos and other flourishes depict extravagant gesture (« Der Schreckenberger ») ; « acciaccaturas » mean laughter (« Rat einer Alten ») . There is a lute in « Nachruf » , a harp in « Gesang Weylas » , a violin in « Wie lange schon » , a guitar in the Spanish and serenading songs. One hears a spinning-wheel in « Die Spinnerin » , gunfire in « Unfall » or « Der Jäger » , a carillon in « Zum neuen Jahre » or « Sankt Nepomuks Vorabend » , whips in « Gesellenlied » and « Selbstgeständnis » , a donkey's bray in « Lied des transferierten Zettel » , birdsong in « Das Vöglein » , bees in « Der Knabe und das Immelein » , horses' hooves in « Der Gärtner » and, perhaps, « Auf einer Wanderung » , and so on.

In all this, a major share of expression inevitably falls to the pianist, not only in the ballad tradition of pictorial interludes, in which Wolf was no doubt influenced by Ferdinand Löwe, but also in the newer vein of grandiloquent quasi-orchestral device found in Richard Wagner transcriptions. The piano equivalents of string « tremolandos » express a pulsating intensity or a rapport with the moods of Nature (the thunder in « Prometheus » or « Der Jäger ») . In general, the upper reaches of the piano symbolize lofty thoughts, spiritual aspirations, the starry sky (« An die Geliebte ») , while the low notes of the left-hand sound out the depths of darkness or despair (« Neue Liebe ») . Such symbolism is in the lied tradition of Franz Schubert. Wolf's allusions are further enriched by directly Wagnerian resonances, sometimes deliberate (the affectionate allusions to « Die Meistersinger » in « Gesellenlied ») , sometimes perhaps less so. An example of the latter is « Die Geister am Mummelsee » , where the poem speaks of a funeral procession (« Totengeleit ») ; and the piano part is evocative of the cortege of « Titirel » (« Geleiten wir ») in « Parsifal » . But far more characteristic and ubiquitous is the new-minted motif, again usually entrusted to the piano part, which serves both to express a poetic idea (e.g. , sadness, love, isolation, mystery, freedom, sleep, among many others) and to create musical structure.

Examples are manifold ; none is wholly typical ; each belongs inseparably to its context. The following illustration exemplifies not only the Wolfian motif but also perhaps a connection between his creative inspiration and his personal experience. For many years, he suffered from insomnia ; and poetry about solitary wakefulness and movement at night evoked a definable though varied musical response. A repeated figuration in the piano right-hand is underlined by a left-hand theme in single notes. This motif 1st appears in the « Körner Ständchen » of 1877. The opening words describe the silence of the night ; lovers' thoughts alone are awake. At the following idea of being surrounded by nocturnal phantoms (« mich umschleichen ... nächtliche Gespenster ») the left-hand single notes surround the repeated right-hand chords, on both sides. In the 1888 song « Auf eine Christblume I » , « Mörike » 's description of deer grazing at twilight evokes the analogue shown in example 1.

The same music, decorated and transposed an octave higher, later depicts the activities of an elf at midnight. In « Gutmann und Gutweib » , this motivic idea recurs at the words « Im Bette liegen beide nun » . The old-folk are lying in bed, deliberately keeping awake. In « Lied eines Verliebten » , the whole song is about staying awake at night ; the entire piano part assumes the basic shape described. The same is true of « Alle gingen, Herz, zur Ruh » . The association persists in Act 2 of « Der Corregidor » (1895) as « Frasquita » keeps her nocturnal vigil (scene 3) or as « Manuela » gropes her way in the dark (scene 10) . The same « Gestalt » underlies each example. By such means (characteristic of the lied) , Wolf could express a wide-ranging diversity of mood, scene and character. Human feeling is symbolized either directly or through images of external nature (the so-called « pathetic fallacy ») .

This is also the essence of Wolf's 1st source of inspiration, « Eichendorff » , whose works contain all the necessary elements of scenes and characters (soldiers, sailors, students, musicians) with their good or bad humour or fortune and their happy or unhappy loves, whether for God, man, nature or fatherland. Wolf's selection from these texts is, perhaps intentionally, more broadly representative than the nature- or love-poems already set by Robert Schumann. A further constraint was Wolf's determination not to use poems which had already, in his view, been definitively set to music. « Mörike » 's complex quasi-symbolic style and imagery needed a correspondingly advanced musical language ; so Wolf's settings had few precedents and no rivals. His choice was accordingly unfettered ; but again, it concentrated on themes of people and places conceived as actors and scenes. The difference is one of degree : « Mörike » 's characters and landscapes are drawn with far more depth and definition than « Eichendorff » 's (whose art Wolf later came to regard as somewhat superficial ; see his letter to Emil Kauffmann of 7 March 1894) . In particular, the themes of humour, both broad and sophisticated, and the super-natural, whether in the context of orthodox religion or of fairy-tale and folklore, are far more fully developed in the « Mörike » songs. The music is correspondingly more intense and diversified, for example with evocations of folk-song (« Das verlassene Mägdlein ») and other popular strains (student song in « Nimmersatte Liebe » ; Viennese waltz in « Abschied ») . Styles and forms are more ambitious and panoramic, with Wagnerian as well as Schumannesque components, especially in religious songs (« Karwoche » ; « Wo find ich Trost ») . Some of the piano accompaniments seem orchestral in range and scope (« Neue Liebe » ; « Der Feuerreiter ») . Elsewhere, themes and structures are designed to convey a sense of movement through vistas both spatial (« Auf einer Wanderung ») and temporal (« In der Frühe ») .

This sense of extended musical frontiers and horizons is even more manifest in the « Gœthe » settings. The lyric style is just as intense (« Blumengruß » ; « Gleich and Gleich ») ; but the ballad style has become more diffuse (« Ritter Kurts Brautfahrt ») and the piano writing even grander in conception (« Prometheus » ; « Mignon » : « Kennst du das Land ») . Further, « Goethe » 's poem offers a new rich source of quasi-dramatic background and effect. Both « Eichendorff » and « Mörike » had incorporated their lyrics into their novels ; Wolf set several such examples. But these poems are separable entities, whereas the interspersed lyrics in « Goethe » 's « Wilhelm Meister » are integrally related to plot and character, so that Wolf's music designedly sets context as well as text. Much the same is true of the « Westöstlicher Divan » poems. The characters of « Hatem » and « Suleika » are not merely costume parts assumed by the poet and his mistress ; they also inhabit a whole secondary world, a notional Orient peopled with other characters from cup-bearers to sultans. From that world, it is no great journey to the Spanish song-book, which not only contains fine poetry (e.g. , by Cervantes, Lope de Vega and Camoens) in skilled translation (by Paul Heyse and Emanuel Geibel) but also offers the elements of national character and local colour that Wolf increasingly needed for his musico-dramatic projections.

In consequence, his own musical style is again in transition. Wolf had now exhausted German poetry of the necessary quality and quantity, and the translations to which he turned were no longer, despite their technical excellence, the source of direct verbal inspiration. With the Spanish song-book, therefore, it is not the lyric as such but its substructure of ideas and concepts that serves as the foundation for musical setting. The result (already foreshadowed by some of the « Westöstlicher Divan » songs, such as « Was in der Schenke waren heute ») was a new autonomy for the composer, who now became less dependent on an intuitive response to poetry. Wolf the partial poet was gradually supplanted by Wolf the complete musician. Rhythmical motifs, dance patterns, accompaniment figures, recurrent refrains, formal structures, begin to dominate the musical expression. Folk-music, nature studies, humorous songs, ballads, all disappear. The themes and styles that persist in the Spanish volume are the religious (the 1st 10 songs) and the erotic (almost all the rest) ; and these become more personal and more intense.

The 6 « Keller » songs of 1890 revert to the earlier themes of character study and psychology, with occasional symbolic allusions to nature (as in « Wandl ich in dem Morgentau ») : here, as before, poetry is the main source of inspiration. But, in these songs, Wolf was working against the grain of his own development, which may account for the sometimes perceptible effort entailed in their composition. With the Italian song-book, begun at the end of the same year, the established trend was resumed with increasing momentum. All the lyrics are anonymous ; all have the same translator, Paul Heyse (as compared with only about 2/3 of the Spanish song-book, in each respect) . Wolf was now confronted with a polished and uniform poetic style with no creative personality of its own ; the lyrics were, thus, a blank page on which to inscribe his own knowledge of human feeling. There are no religious themes as such ; all the poems are in some sense love songs. In consequence, the style becomes totally unified and integral. Previous song-books had contained the separately identifiable strains described above as Wagnerian and Schumannesque. This still applies in part to the Spanish volume (thus « Bedeckt mich mit Blumenis » , Tristanesque, while the lighter songs, as well as the textual source as a whole, recall Robert Schumann's Spanish vein) . In the Italian songs, all such sources merge into Wolf's basic 4 part style. The forms are further concentrated by the brevity and metrical pattern of the lyrics. Here, Wolf finally succeeded in compressing the universal picture into the miniature frame ; so these songs are the epitome of his art.

Wolf may well have sketched, in 1890, many more of them than he then completed. The Italian settings of 1896 maintain the same style ; perhaps not all were newly-composed in that year. The manuscripts of 2 of them, « Gesegnet sei das Grün » and « O wär dein Haus durchsichtig » , bear the marginal annotations « Phönix Nummer 1 » and « Phönix Nummer 2 » respectively, suggesting that these at least were new inspirations. Other late-songs however seem lacking in fresh invention. Thus, the « Michel-Angelo » songs of 1897, though they contain much fine music, are in part palpably indebted to earlier songs (compare, for example, the postlude of « Fühlt meine Seele » with those of « Peregrina » I and II) ; texts and treatment alike suggest that, despite the ostensible character-drawing, Wolf was reverting to the self-expressive subjectivism of his early songs. His mental breakdown and terminal illness (1897-1903) were only 6 months away.

Wolf completed some 20 separate song orchestrations as well as 2 for incorporation in « Der Corregidor » . The form is intermediate between what might be called the compressed Opera of his song-books and the expanded song-books of his Operas. The hybrid has not proved fertile : the works are rarely performed. Yet, Wolf himself thought them important ; and most of them date from 1890, one of his most prolific song-writing years. Their purpose was not only to reach a wider public but also to deploy even greater expressive power and device, whether to broaden the scene-painting (e.g. , the thunder and lightning effects in « Prometheus ») or to brighten the sound-painting (e.g. , the chromatic runs in « Der Rattenfänger ») . But Wolf also invoked the orchestra for depth of feeling. Thus, even the tiny but intense lyric by Lenau, Scheideblick (1876-1877 ?) , was sketched in an orchestral version. Similarly, « Gesang Weylas » remains lyrical in conception even when scored : its added horn counterpoints aim at enhanced intensity. But, in general, Wolf's aim was to convert his miniatures into oil paintings suitable for wider exhibition, whether in the concert-hall or (in his own works) the Opera House. The transition is perhaps most convincing in static « tableaux » such as « Prometheus » or « Auf ein alter Bild » . Where motion is to be depicted, the heavier textures tend to slow down the action : thus, in « Der Feuerreiter » , the articulation of added voices both choral and orchestral, at the required speed, presents grave problems of ensemble. Similarly, the grace and fire of the « Italienische Serenade » are harder to achieve in the orchestral version.

Stage-music

Analogous difficulties inhere in Wolf's stage-music. The brilliant pictorial writing of his 1st completed work of incidental music, the « Elfenlied » (a setting of « You spotted snakes » from « A Midsummer Night's Dream » , in German translation) , aroused acclaim at its 1st performance, about which Wolf wrote (to Emil Kauffmann, on 11 January 1894) that the orchestration « so glittered and glowed in moonbeams that you could forget to hear for sheer seeing » . The Henryk Ibsen play « The Feast at Solhaug » (again in German translation, as « Das Fest auf Solhaug ») presented fewer opportunities for quasi-visual effects, and the music was commissioned in an otherwise fallow phase ; but the processional entrances and choruses are typically evocative. Whatever the quality of Wolf's invention, his stage-music, like his song orchestrations, suggests the deliberate extension or enlargement of a smaller-scale original inspiration.

The Operas are no different. As Wolf told Potpeschnigg (on 9 July 1895) , the piano score as it stood served as the orchestral sketch for « Der Corregidor » . Further, the Wagnerian texture and scoring (Wolf's orchestra is larger than that of « Die Meistersinger » , without which, as he wrote to Rosa Mayreder, on 1 June 1895, his « Corregidor » music could not have been written) are possibly too inspissated for the sunny mood and « milieu » of the well-known story « El sombrero de tres picos ». Wolf told Ferdinand Löwe that Georges Bizet's task in « Carmen » was far easier because of the comparative lack of orchestral polyphony ; and, perhaps, a lighter texture would have worn better. In Wolf's treatment, the « 3 Cornered hat » is not only a symbol of universal authority but also has overtones of the eternal triangle (for instance, when the power of the « Corregidor » 's motif is heard dominating that of the supposedly cuckolded « Tio Lukas ») . Wolf's well-documented obsession with themes of sexual jealousy and tension, which darken to stark tragedy in « Manuel Venegas » , may well have been highly-personal in origin. The motivic techniques of « Der Corregidor » seem to reflect that obsession in their insistent repetition. The Wolfian lied motif inevitably becomes obtrusive when used as a Wagnerian leitmotif, serving narrative and dramatic ends as well as the lyric purposes for which it was designed. Thus the 5 note « Tio Lukas » theme is heard nearly 100 times in Act I, serving variously as character study, stage-direction, cross-reference or general background. It is relevant that Wolf himself, in rehearsal, took little interest in stage-craft or decor : even in the Operas, his musical world remains that of inward imagination rather than visual presentation. It is, thus, not surprising that the dramatic structure of « Der Corregidor » has been much criticized, and with some plausibility : for example, most of Act 4 is recapitulation of themes and events already familiar. Nor is the musical material always of the finest, perhaps, partly by design (e.g. , the Alcalde's banal motif may be intended as character-drawing) , partly because not all the libretto was equally inspiring, and partly because of Wolf's deteriorating health.

Such objections have far more force when levelled at the 600 bar fragment of « Manuel Venegas » than at the completed « Der Corregidor » . But the latter is rarely performed, and has never belonged to the standard Opera repertory. It has been excluded because of disparity rather than inferiority ; and it might more rationally be regarded as a success in a new genre than as a failure in an old one. Thus, the often striking discrepancy (to which Frank Walker has drawn attention) between the characters as embodied in the music and as observed on the stage becomes both meaningful and effective when considered as a Wolfian equivalent for dramatic irony. The musical style too is novel. As always, it derives from the German text, and is hence less complex and intense than the generality of Wolf's song-writing. The prototypes are the 2 songs orchestrated specially for inclusion (« In dem Schatten meiner Locken » ; « Herz, verzage nicht geschwind ») in a sweetened but refreshing dilution of the lighter Spanish song-book essence. Whatever the defects of dramatic structure, each separate scene has a song-like vividness of invention.

There are thus grounds for supposing that Wolf, had he lived, might have evolved new forms intermediate between song and Opera. Both his Operas are based on short-stories ; he could profitably have continued his exploration of « Eichendorff » , « Mörike » and « Gøthe » by quasi-dramatic presentations of their novellas for voices with piano solo or duet or with chamber orchestra ; « Der Corregidor » too might prove viable in such a guise. Conversely, Wolf might have extended his Spanish or Italian songs on similar lines, benefiting from the example already set by Robert Schumann (e.g. , in his Opus 138) . Alternatively, Wolf might have returned to song-books inspired by the dramatic or plastic qualities of original German poetry (by Rainer Maria Rilke, for example) , although in the light of Wolf's known views and traceable development this seems less plausible.

Critical writings

Wolf as a critic shared with his contemporary Bernard Shaw the deliberately provocative and partisan stance of the standard-bearer. Both were notoriously fervent advocates of Richard Wagner and browbeaters of Johannes Brahms ; both have lasting value as the spokesmen and interpreters of their own musical times and trends. Prose was not a creative medium for Wolf, and he resisted republication of his reviews on the ground of their stylistic shortcomings. But his writing has enough of the trenchancy and immediacy of his music to render it readable and often memorable, affording further insights, both for him and his readers, into the nature of his art. Ist, regular reviewing and concert-going gave him much-needed discipline and experience, as well as a new understanding of the nature of language and its relation to music, including his own. His critiques reveal inter-alia his own attitudes and criteria. Style and content alike are indebted to Robert Schumann, whose conception of music as mood- or scene-painting (« Seelengemälde » or « Tongemälde ») Wolf wholeheartedly endorsed and adopted. Wolf envisaged music as essentially a transitive mode of expression using symbolic equivalents for human thought and feeling, whether directly or as, reflected in external nature. Both these latter aspects unite in Wolf's intuitive depiction of music in terms of organic life and growth. For him, absolute music was a waste ground choked with academic works like weeds. He hated any hint of the cerebral or the contrived (as in fugues and pedal points) . Bodily malfunction or discomfort are recurrent metaphors for musical unacceptability. The following (on Brahms's 1st Piano Concerto) is typical : « The air that blows through this composition is so icy, dank and foggy that it could easily freeze your heart up and snatch your breath away ; you could catch a cold from it. Unhealthy stuff ! » . Good music, however (including some by Brahms, such as the G major Sextet) , is as regularly compared with nature, springtime, fresh fountains of healing and many another such symbol of wholesome emotive life.

Further detailed criteria are inferable from other obiter dicta. Wolf had a deep sense of commitment to his own time and place, his own society, class and nationhood (German rather than Austrian) . He manifested a passionate concern for human values, as vested not only in individuals but in the whole nexus of social function and inter-relation. The musical equivalent is Opera, especially Richard Wagner and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Wolf's criticism fastens on all aspects of stage spectacle and presentation considered as parts of the total musical artwork : action, costume, gesture, speech and stage-effects. Every page testifies to the visualizing and dramatizing mind at work in his own song-writing, in a ceaseless quest for vividness and immediacy of effect. His ancillary absorption in language is evidenced by his unselfconscious recourse to metaphor and quotation from modern and Classical literature. Finally, Wolf's critical insight into his own expressive mode of music is predictably penetrative ; thus, he noted (« Kritiken » , page 52) that the forms and contents of the greatest Symphonic poems (those of Franz Liszt, in this context) are, no less than their thematic material, derived from the literary works that inspired them.

That « aperçu » defines Wolf's own achievement. It was his mission, as he saw it, to compose in a new musical language expressing the closest imaginable relation to words and their gamut of visual, auditory or other symbolism. In this endeavour, his declared aim was truth to life ; as he wrote to Emil Kauffmann (on 5 June 1890) : « For me, the sovereign principle in art is rigorous, harsh and inexorable truth, truth to the point of cruelty. » . Here is the link between his 4 years as a music-critic and his lifetime as an artist. He expressed the truth about the human condition as he apprehended it, as keenly and as stringently as he could. It was his assigned task (letter to Heinrich Kaspar Schmid, on 14 June 1891) to cultivate that gift to the furthest limit of his powers. When he could no longer compose, as he told Rosa Mayreder, he was fit only for the dung-heap.

His sense of purpose and mission gave Hugo Wolf's life and art their fierce concentration, their characteristic burning intensity of expression. His vision was limited by its close focus on those points where words and music intersect or coincide. But within that specialized lyric field, he has claims not only to greatness but to supremacy.

Hugo Wolf was born in Windischgrätz (now Slovenj Gradec, Slovenia), then a part of the Austrian Empire. From his maternal side, he was related to Herbert von Karajan. He spent most of his life in Vienna, becoming a representative of "New German" trend in lieder, a trend which followed from the expressive, chromatic and dramatic musical innovations of Richard Wagner.

A child prodigy, Wolf was taught piano and violin by his father beginning at the age of 4, and once in primary school studied piano and music theory with Sebastian Weixler. Subjects other than music failed to hold his interest; he was dismissed from the 1st secondary school he attended as being "wholly inadequate", left another over his difficulties in the compulsory Latin studies, and after a falling out with a professor who commented on his "damned music", quit the last. From there, he went to the Vienna Conservatory much to his father's disappointment, who had hoped his son would not try to make his living from music. Once again, however, he was dismissed for "breach of discipline", although the often rebellious Wolf would claim he quit in frustration over the school's conservatism.

After 8 months with his family, he returned to Vienna to teach music. Though, his fiery temperament was not ideally suited to teaching, Wolf's musical gifts, as well as his personal charm, earned him attention and patronage. Support of benefactors allowed him to make a living as a composer, and a daughter of one of his greatest benefactors inspired him to write, Vally ("Valentine") Franck, his 1st love, with whom he was involved for 3 years. During their relationship, hints of his mature style would become evident in his Lieder. Wolf was prone to depression and wide mood swings, which would affect him all through his life. When Franck left him just before his 21st birthday, he was despondent. He returned home, although his family relationships were also strained; his father was still convinced his son was a never do well. His brief and undistinguished tenure as 2nd Kapellmeister at Salzburg only reinforced this opinion: Wolf had neither the temperament, the conducting technique nor the affinity for the decidedly non-Wagnerian repertoire to be successful, and within a year had again returned to Vienna to teach in much the same circumstances as before.

Wagner's death in February 1883 was another deeply moving event in the life of the young composer. The song "Zur Ruh, zur Ruh" was composed shortly afterward and is considered to be the best of his early works; it is speculated that it was intended as an elegy for Wagner. Wolf often despaired of his own future in the ensuing years, in a world from which his idol had departed, leaving tremendous footsteps to follow and no guidance on how to do so. This left him often extremely temperamental, alienating friends and patrons, although his charm helped him retain them more than his actions merited. His songs had meanwhile caught the attention of Franz Liszt, whom he respected greatly, and who like Wolf's previous mentors advised him to pursue larger forms; advice he this time followed with the symphonic tone-poem Penthesilea. His activities as a critic began to pick up. He was merciless in his criticism of the inferior works he saw taking over the musical atmosphere of the time ; those of Anton Rubinstein, he considered particularly odious. But he was as fervent in his support of Franz Liszt, Franz Schubert and Frédéric Chopin, whose genius he recognized. Known as " Wild Wolf " for the intensity and expressive strength of his convictions, his vitriol made him some enemies. He composed little during this time, and what he did write he couldn't get performed ; the Rosé Quartet (led by Vienna Philharmonic concert Master Arnold Rosé) would not even look at his D minor Quartet after it was picked apart in a column, and the premiere of « Penthesilea » was met by the Vienna Philharmonic, when they tried it out under their celebrated conservative conductor Hans Richter, with nothing but derision for ' the man who had dared to criticize " Meister Brahms " ' as Richter himself caustically put it.

Wolf abandoned his activities as a critic in 1887 and began composing once more ; perhaps not unexpectedly, the 1st songs he wrote after his compositional hiatus (to poems by Gœthe, Joseph von Eichendorff and Joseph Viktor von Scheffel) emphasized themes of strength and resolution under adversity. Shortly thereafter, he completed the terse, witty one movement Italian Serenade for string quartet which is regarded as one of the finest examples of his mature instrumental compositional style. Only a week later, his father died, leaving him devastated, and he did not compose for the remainder of the year.

1888 and 1889 proved to be amazingly productive years for Wolf, and a turning point in his career. After the publication of a dozen of his songs late the preceding year, Wolf once again desired to return to composing, and travelled to the vacation home of the Werners (family friends whom Wolf had known since childhood) in Perchtoldsdorf (a short train ride from Vienna) , to escape and compose in solitude. Here he composed the Mörrike-Lieder at a frenzied pace. A short break, and a change of house, this time to the vacation home of more longtime friends, the Ecksteins, and the Eichendorff-Lieder followed, then the 51 Gœthe-Lieder, spilling into 1889. After a summer holiday, the Spanisches Liederbuch was begun in October 1889 ; though, Spanish flavoured compositions were in fashion in the day, Wolf sought out poems that had been neglected by other composers.

Wolf himself saw the merit of these compositions immediately, raving to friends that they were the best things he had yet composed (it was with the aid and urging of several of the more influential of them that the works were initially published) . It was now that the world outside Vienna would recognize Wolf as well. Tenor Ferdinand Jäger, whom Wolf had heard in « Parsifal » during his brief summer break from composing, was present at one of the 1st concerts of the Mörrike works and quickly became a champion of his music, performing a recital of only Wolf and Beethoven in December 1888. His works were praised in reviews, including one in the Münchener Allgemeine Zeitung, a widely read German newspaper.

The recognition was not always positive ; Brahms's adherents, still smarting from Wolf's merciless reviews, returned the favour when they would have anything to do with him at all. Brahms's biographer Max Kalbeck ridiculed Wolf for his immature writing and odd tonalities ; another composer refused to share a program with him, while Amalie Materna, a Wagnerian singer, had to cancel her Wolf recital when allegedly faced with the threat of being on the critics' black list if she went on.

Only a few more settings were completed in 1891 before Wolf's mental and physical health once again took a downturn at the end of the year ; exhaustion from his prolific past few years combined with the effects of syphilis and his depressive temperament caused him to stop composing for the next several years. Continuing concerts of his works in Austria and Germany spread his growing fame ; even Brahms and the critics who had previously reviled Wolf gave favourable reviews. However, Wolf was consumed with depression, which stopped him from writing which only left him more depressed. He completed orchestrations of previous works, but new compositions were not forthcoming, and certainly not the opera which he was now fixated on composing, still convinced that success in the larger forms was the mark of compositional greatness.

Wolf had scornfully rejected the libretto to Der Corregidor when it was 1st presented to him in 1890, but his determination to compose an opera blinded him to its faults upon 2nd glance. Based on The 3 Cornered Hat, by Pedro Antonio de Alarcón, the darkly humorous story about an adulterous love triangle is one that Wolf could identify with : he had been in love with Melanie Köchert, married to his friend Heinrich Köchert, for several years. It is speculated that their romance began in earnest in 1884, when Wolf accompanied the Köcherts on holiday ; though Heinrich discovered the affair in 1893, he remained Wolf's patron and Melanie's husband. The opera was completed in 9 months and was initially met with success, but Wolf's musical setting could not compensate for the weakness of the text, and it was doomed to failure ; it has not yet been successfully revived.

Wolf's last concert appearance, which included his early champion Jäger, was in February 1897. Shortly thereafter, Wolf slipped into syphilitic insanity, with only occasional spells of well being. He left 60 pages of an unfinished opera, Manuel Venegas, in 1897, in a desperate attempt to finish before he lost his mind completely ; after mid 1899, he could make no music at all and once even tried to drown himself, after which he was placed in a Vienna asylum at his own insistence. Melanie visited him faithfully during his decline until his death on 22 February 1903, but her unfaithfulness to her husband tortured her and she killed herself in 1906.

The more one learns of the history of great artists, the more one is struck by the immense amount of sadness their lives enclose. Not only are they subjected to the trials and disappointments of ordinary life which affect them more cruelly through their greater sensitiveness but their surroundings are like a desert because they are 20, 30, 50, or even 100's of years in advance of their contemporaries ; and they are often condemned to despairing efforts not to conquer the world but to live.

These highly-strung natures are rarely able to keep-up this incessant struggle for very long, and the finest genius may have to reckon with illness and misery and even premature death. And yet, there were people like Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Robert Schumann and Carl Maria von Weber who were happy in spite of everything because they had been able to keep their soul's health and the joy of creation until the end ; and though their bodies were worn out with fatigue and privation, a light was kept burning which sent its rays far into the darkness of their night. There are worse destinies ; and Beethoven, though he was poor, shut-up within himself, and deceived in his affections, was far from being the most unhappy of men. In his case, he possessed nothing but himself ; but he possessed himself truly and reigned over the world that was within him ; and no other Empire could even be compared with that of his vast imagination, which stretched like a great expanse of sky where tempests raged. Until his last day, the old Prometheus in him, though fettered by a miserable body, preserved his iron force unbroken. When dying during a storm, his last gesture was one of revolt ; in his agony, he raised himself on his bed and shook his fist at the sky. And so, he fell struck down by a single blow in the thick of the fight.

But what shall be said of those who die little by little, who outlive themselves and watch the slow decay of their souls ?

Such was the fate of Hugo Wolf, whose tragic destiny has assured him a place apart in the hell of great musicians.

He was born at Windischgraz in Styria, March 13, 1860. He was the 4th son of a carrier-musician, like old « Veit Bach », the baker-musician, and Franz-Joseph Haydn's father, the wheelwright-musician. Philipp Wolf played the violin, the guitar, and the piano and used to have little Quintet parties at his house, in which he played the 1st violin, Hugo the 2nd violin, Hugo's brother the violoncello, an uncle the horn, and a friend the tenor violin. The musical taste of the country was not properly German. Wolf was a Catholic, and his taste was not formed, like that of most German musicians, by books of chorales. Besides that, in Styria, they were fond of playing the old Italian Operas of Rossini, Bellini, and Donizetti. Later on, Wolf used to like to think that he had a few drops of Latin blood in his veins ; and, all his life, he had a predilection for the great French musicians.

His term of apprenticeship was not marked by anything brilliant. He went from one school to another without being kept long anywhere. And yet, he was not a worthless lad, but he was always reserved, little caring to be intimate with others, and passionately devoted to music. His father naturally did not want him to take-up music as a profession, and he had the same struggles that Hector Berlioz had. Finally, he succeeded in getting permission from his family to go to Vienna, and he entered the Conservatory there, in 1875. But he was not any the happier for it, and, at the end of 2 years, he was sent away for being unruly.

What was to be done ? His family was ruined, for a fire had demolished their little possessions. He felt the silent reproaches of his father already weighing upon him for he loved his father dearly and remembered the sacrifices the latter had made for him. He did not wish to return to his own province ; indeed, he could not return that would have been death. It was necessary that this boy of 17 should find some means of earning a livelihood and be able to instruct himself, at the same time. After his expulsion from the Conservatory, he attended no other school ; he taught himself. And he taught himself wonderfully, but at what a cost ! The suffering he went through from that time until he was 30, the enormous amount of energy he had to expend, in order to live and cultivate the fine spirit of poetry that was within him, all this effort and toil was without doubt the cause of his unhappy death. He had a burning thirst for knowledge and a fever for work which made him sometimes forget the necessity for eating and drinking.

Hugo Wolf had a great admiration for Gœthe and was infatuated by Heinrich von Kleist, whom he rather resembles both in his gifts and in his life ; he was an enthusiast about Franz Grillparzer and Christian Friedrich Hebbe at a time when they were but little appreciated ; and he was one of the 1st Germans to discover the worth of Eduard Mörike, whom, later on, he made popular in Germany. Besides this, he read English and French writers. He liked François Rabelais and was partial to Claude Tillier, the French novelist of the provinces, whose Uncle Benjamin has given pleasure to so many German provincial families by bringing before them, as Wolf said, the vision of their own little world and helping them by his own jovial good humor to bear their troubles with a smiling face. And so, little Wolf, with hardly enough to eat, found the means of learning both French and English, in order better to appreciate the thoughts of foreign artists.

In music, he learned a great deal from his friend Josef Schalk, a professor at the Vienna Conservatory ; but, like Hector Berlioz, he got most of his education from the libraries and spent months in reading the scores of the great Masters. Not having a piano, he used to carry Beethoven's Sonatas to the « Prater » Park, in Vienna, and study them on a bench in the open air. He soaked himself in the Classics in Bach and Beethoven, and the German Masters of the lied, Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann. He was one of the young Germans who was passionately fond of Hector Berlioz, and it is due to Hugo Wolf that France was afterward honoured in the possession of this great artist, whom French critics, whether of the school of Giacomo Meyerbeer, Richard Wagner, César Franck, or Claude Debussy, have never understood. He was also early a friend of old Anton Bruckner, whose music we do not know in France, neither his 9 Symphonies, nor his « Te Deum » , nor his Masses, nor his cantatas, nor anything else of his fertile work. Bruckner had a sweet and modest character and an endearing, if rather childish, personality. He was somewhat crushed all his life by the Brahms Party ; but, like Franck in France, he gathered round him new and original talent to fight the academic art of his time.

But of all these influences, the strongest was that of Richard Wagner. Wagner came to Vienna, in 1875, to conduct « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » . There was then among the younger people a fever of enthusiasm similar to that which « Werther » had caused a Century before. Wolf saw Wagner. He tells us about it in his letters to his parents. I shall quote his own words, and though they make one smile, one loves the impulsive devotion of his youth ; and they make one feel, too, that a man who inspires such an affection, and who can do so much good by a little sympathy, is to blame when he does not befriend others above all if he has suffered, like Wagner, from loneliness and the want of a helping hand. You must remember that this letter was written by a boy of 15.

« I have been to guess whom ? to the Master, Richard Wagner ! Now, I will tell you all about it just as it happened. I will copy the words down exactly as I wrote them in my notebook.

« On Thursday, December 9, at half-past ten, I saw Richard Wagner for the 2nd time at the Hotel Imperial, where I stayed for half an hour on the staircase awaiting his arrival. (I knew that, on that day, he would conduct the last rehearsal of his « Lohengrin » .) At last, the Master came down from the 2nd floor, and I bowed to him respectfully while he was, yet, some distance from me. He thanked me in a very friendly way. As he neared the door, I sprang forward and opened it for him, upon which he looked fixedly at me for a few seconds and, then, went on his way to the rehearsal at the Opera. I ran as fast as I could, and arrived there sooner than Richard Wagner did in his cab. I bowed to him again, and I wanted to open the door of his cab for him ; but as I could not get it open, the coachman jumped down from his seat and did it for me. Wagner said something to the coachman. I think it was about me. I wanted to follow him into the theater, but they would not let me pass.

« I often used to wait for him at the Hotel Imperial ; and on this occasion, I made the acquaintance of the manager of the hotel, who promised that he would interest himself on my behalf. Who was more delighted than I when he told me that on the following Saturday afternoon, December 11, I was to come and find him, so that he could introduce me to Madame Cosima's maid and Richard Wagner's valet ! I arrived at the appointed hour. The visit to the Lady's maid was very short. I was advised to come the following day, Sunday, December 12, at 2 o'clock. I arrived at the right hour but found the maid and the valet and the manager still at table. Then, I went with the maid to the Master's rooms, where I waited for about a quarter of an hour until he came. At last, Wagner appeared in company with Cosima and Goldmark. I bowed to Cosima, very respectfully, but she evidently did not think it worth while to honour me with a single glance. Wagner was going into his room without paying any attention to me when the maid said to him in a beseeching voice : Herr Wagner, it is a young musician who wishes to speak to you ; he has been waiting for you a long time. »

« He then came-out of his room, looked at me, and said : " I have seen you before, I think. You are ...". »

« Probably, he wanted to say, " You are a fool. ". »

« He went in front of me and opened the door of the reception room, which was furnished in truly royal style. In the middle of the room was a couch covered in velvet and silk. Wagner himself was wrapped in a long velvet mantle bordered with fur. »

« When I was inside the room, he asked me what I wanted. »

Here Hugo Wolf, to excite the curiosity of his parents, broke-off his story and put : « To be continued in my next... » .

In his next letter, he continues :

« I said to him : " Highly-honoured Master, for a long time, I have wanted to hear an opinion on my compositions, and it would be ..." . »

« Here, the Master interrupted me and said : " My dear child, I cannot give you an opinion of your compositions ; I have far too little time ; I can't even get my own letters written. I understand nothing at all about music. ". » (« Ich verstehe gar nichts von der Musik. »)

« I asked the Master whether I should ever be able really to do anything, and he said to me : " When I was your age and composing music, no one could tell me then whether I should ever do anything great. You could, at most, play me your compositions on the piano ; but I have no time to hear them. When you are older, and when you have composed bigger works, and if, by chance, I return to Vienna, you shall show me what you have done. But that is no use now ; I cannot give you an opinion of them yet. ". »

« When I told that Master that I took the Classics as models, he said : " Good, good. One can't be original at Ist. " And he laughed, and then said, " I wish you, dear friend, much happiness in your career. Go on working steadily, and if I come back to Vienna, show me your compositions. ". »

« Upon that, I left the Master, profoundly moved and impressed. »

Hugo Wolf and Richard Wagner did not see each other again. But Wolf fought unceasingly on Wagner's behalf. He went several times to Bayreuth though he had no personal intercourse with the Wagner family ; but he met Franz Liszt, who, with his usual goodness, wrote him a kind letter about a composition that he had sent him, and showed him what alterations to make in it.

Conductor Felix Mottl and the composer Adalbert de Goldschmidt were the Ist friends to aid him in his years of misery, by finding him some music pupils. He taught music to little children of 7 and 8 years old, but he was a poor teacher and found giving lessons was a martyrdom. The money, he earned hardly served to feed him, and he ate only once a day, Heaven knows how. To comfort himself he read Christian Friedrich Hebbel's Life ; and, for a time, he thought of going to America. In 1881, Goldschmidt got him the post of 2nd Kapellmeister at the Salzburg Theater. It was his business to rehearse the choruses for the Operettas of Johann Strauß and Karl Millöcker. He did his work conscientiously but in deadly weariness ; and he lacked the necessary power of making his authority felt. He did not stay long in this post and came back to Vienna.

Since 1875, Wolf had been writing music : lieder, sonatas, Symphonies, Quartets, and, already, his lieder held the most important place. He also composed, in 1883, a Symphonic poem on the « Penthesilea » of his friend Heinrich von Kleist.

In 1884, Wolf succeeded in getting a post as musical critic. But on what a paper ! It was the « Wiener Salonblatt » , a mundane journal filled with articles on sport and fashion news. One would have said that this little barbarian was put there for a wager. His articles from 1884 to 1887 are full of life and humor. He upholds the great Classic Masters in them : Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven and Wagner ; he defends Hector Berlioz ; he scourges the modern Italians, whose success at Vienna was simply scandalous ; he braks lances for Anton Bruckner and begins a bold campaign against Johannes Brahms. It was not that he disliked or had any prejudice against Johannes Brahms ; he took a delight in some of his works, especially his chamber music, but he found fault with his Symphonies and was shocked by the carelessness of the declamation in his lieder and, in general, could not bear his want of originality and power, and found him lacking in joy and fullness of life. Above all, he struck him as being the head of a party that was spitefully opposed to Richard Wagner and Anton Bruckner and all innovators. For all that was retrograde in music in Vienna and all that was the enemy of liberty and progress in art and criticism was giving Brahms its detestable support by gathering itself about him and spreading his fame abroad ; and, though Brahms was really far above his party as an artist and a man, he had not the courage to break away from it.

Brahms read Wolf's articles, but his attacks did not seem to stir his apathy. The « Brahmins » , however, never forgave Wolf. One of his bitterest enemies was Hans von Billow, who found anti-Brahmism « the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost which shall not be forgiven » . Some years later, when Hugo Wolf succeeded in getting his own compositions played, he had to submit to criticisms like that of Max Kalbeck, one of the leaders of « Brahmsism » at Vienna :

« Herr Wolf has lately, as a reporter, raised an irresistible laugh in musical circles. So someone suggested he had better devote himself to composition. The last products of his muse show that this well-meant advice was bad. He ought to go back to reporting. »

An orchestral Society in Vienna gave Wolf's « Penthesilea » a trial reading ; and it was rehearsed, in disregard of all good taste, amid shouts of laughter. When it was finished, the conductor said : « Gentlemen, I ask your pardon for having allowed this piece to be played to the end ; but I wanted to know what manner of man it is that dares to write such things about the Master, Brahms. » .

Wolf got a little respite from his miseries by staying a few weeks in his own country with his brother-in-law, Straßer, an inspector of taxes. He took with him his books, his poets, and began to set them to music.

Wolf was now 27 years old and had as yet published nothing. The years of 1887 and 1888 were the most critical ones of his life. In 1887, he lost his father whom he loved so much, and that loss, like so many of his other misfortunes, gave fresh impulse to his energies. The same year, a generous friend called Eckstein published his 1st collection of lieder. Wolf, up to that time, had been smothered, but this publication stirred the life in him and was the means of unloosing his genius. Settled at Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna, in February 1888, in absolute peace, he wrote in three months 53 lieder to the words of Eduard Mörike, the pastor-poet of Swabia who died in 1875, and who, misunderstood and laughed at during his lifetime, is now covered with honour and universally popular in Germany. Wolf composed his songs in a state of exalted joy and almost fright at the sudden discovery of his creative power.

In a letter to Doctor Heinrich Werner, he says :

« It is now 7 o'clock in the evening, and I am so happy oh, happier than the happiest of kings. Another new lied ! If you could hear what is going on in my heart ! The devil would carry you away with pleasure ! »

« Another 2 new lieder ! There is one that sounds so horribly strange that it frightens me. There is nothing like it in existence. Heaven help the unfortunate people who will one day hear it ! »

« If you could only hear the last lied I have just composed, you would have only one desire left to die. Your happy, happy Wolf. »

Wolf had hardly finished the « Mörike Lieder » when he began a series of lieder on poems of Gœthe. In 3 months (December 1888 to February 1889) , he had written all the « Gœthe Liederbuch » , 51 lieder, some of which are, like « Prometheus » , big dramatic scenes.

The same year, while still at Perchtoldsdorf, after having published a volume of « Eichendorff Lieder » , he became absorbed in a new cycle, the « Spanisches Liederbuch » , on Spanish poems translated by Paul Heyse. He wrote these 44 songs in the same ecstasy of gladness :

« What I write now, I write for the future. Since Schubert and Schumann, there has been nothing like it ! »

In 1890, 2 months after he had finished the « Spanisches Liederbuch » , he composed another cycle of lieder on poems called « Alten Weisen » , by the great Swiss writer Gottfried Keller. And lastly, in the same year, he began his « Italienisches Liederbuch » , on Italian poems, translated by Emanuel Geibel ; and Paul Heyse.

And then, then there was silence.

The history of Wolf is one of the most extraordinary in the history of art and gives one a better glimpse of the mysteries of genius than most histories do.

Let us make a little résumé. Hugo Wolf, at 28 years old, had written practically nothing. From 1888 to 1890, he wrote, one after another, in a kind of fever, 53 « Mörike Lieder » , 51 « Gøethe Lieder » , 44 Spanish lieder, 17 « Eichendorff Lieder » , a dozen « Keller Lieder » , and the 1st Italian lieder that is about 200 lieder, each one having its own admirable individuality.

And then, the music stops. The spring has dried-up. Wolf in great anguish wrote despairing letters to his friends. To Oskar Grohe, on May 2, 1891, he wrote :

« I have given-up all idea of composing. Heaven knows how things will finish. Pray for my poor soul. »

And to Doctor Hermann Wette on August 13, 1891, he says :

« For the last 4 months, I have been suffering from a sort of mental consumption, which makes me think very seriously of quitting this world forever. Only those who truly live should live at all. I have been for some time like one who is dead. I only wish it were an apparent death ; but I am really dead and buried though the power to control my body gives me a seeming life. It is my inmost, my only desire, that the flesh may quickly follow the spirit that has already passed. For the past 15 days, I have been living at Traunkirchen, the pearl of Traunsee. All the comforts that a man could wish for are here to make my life happy peace, solitude, beautiful scenery, invigorating air, and everything that could suit the tastes of a hermit like myself. And yet and yet, my friend, I am the most miserable creature on earth. Everything around me breathes peace and happiness, everything throbs with life and fulfills its functions. I alone, oh God ! I alone live like a beast that is deaf and senseless. Even reading hardly serves to distract me now though I bury myself in books in my despair. As for composition, that is finished ; I can no longer bring to mind the meaning of a harmony or a melody, and I almost begin to doubt if the compositions that bear my name are really mine. Good God ! What is the use of all this fame ? What is the good of these great aims if misery is all that lies at the end of it ? »

« Heaven gives a man complete genius or no genius at all. Hell has given me everything by halves. »

« O unhappy man, how true, how true it is ! In the flower of your life, you went to hell ; into the evil jaws of destiny, you threw the delusive present and yourself with it. O Kleist ! »

Suddenly, at Dobling on November 29, 1891, the stream of Wolf's genius flowed again, and he wrote 15 Italian lieder, sometimes several in 1 day. In December, it stopped again ; and, this time, for 5 years. These Italian melodies show, however, no trace of any effort nor a greater tension of mind than is shown in his preceding works. On the contrary, they have the air of being the simplest and most natural work that Wolf ever did. But the matter is of no real consequence, for when Wolf's genius was not stirring within him he was useless. He wished to write 33 Italian lieder, but he had to stop after the 20nd, and, in 1891, he published 1 volume only of the « Italienisches Liederbuch ». The 2nd volume was completed in 1 month, 5 years later, in 1896.

One may imagine the tortures that this solitary man suffered. His only happiness was in creation, and he saw his life cease without any apparent cause for years at a time, and his genius come and go, and return for an instant, and then go again. Each time, he must have wondered anxiously if it had gone forever, or how long it would be before it came back again. In letters to Emil Kaufmann, on August 6, 1891, and April 26, 1893, Wolf says :

« You ask me for news of my Opera. Good Heavens ! I should be content if I could write the tiniest little Liedchen. And an Opera, now ? I firmly believe that it is all over with me. I could as well speak Chinese as compose anything. It is horrible. What I suffer from this inaction, I cannot tell you. I should like to hang myself. »

To Hugo Faißt, he wrote on June 21, 1894 :

« You ask me the cause of my great depression of spirit and would pour balm on my wounds. Ah yes, if only you could ! But no herb grows that could cure my sickness ; only a god could help me. If you can give me back my inspiration and wake-up the familiar spirit that is asleep in me and let him possess me anew, I will call you a god and raise altars to your name. My cry is to gods and not to men ; the gods alone are fit to pronounce my fate. But, however it may end, even if the worst comes, I will bear it, yes, even if no ray of sunshine lightens my life again. And with that, we will once for all turn the page and have done with this dark chapter of my life. »

This letter (and it is not the only one) recalls the melancholy stoicism of Beethoven's letters and shows us sorrows that even the unhappy Beethoven did not know. And yet, how can we tell ? Perhaps, Beethoven, too, suffered similar anguish in the sad days that followed 1815, before the last Sonatas, the Missa solemnis, and the 9th Symphony had awakened to life in him.

In March 1895, Hugo Wolf lived once more and, in 3 months, had written the piano score of « Der Corregidor ». For many years, he had been attracted toward the stage, and especially toward light Opera. Enthusiast though he was for Richard Wagner's work, he had declared openly that it was time for musicians to free themselves from the Wagnerian « Musik-Drama ». He knew his own gifts and did not aspire to take Wagner's place. When one of his friends offered him a subject for an Opera taken from a legend about Buddha, he declined it, saying that the world did not yet understand the meaning of Buddha's doctrines and that he had no wish to give humanity a fresh headache. In a letter to Oskar Grohe, on June 28, 1890, he says :

« Wagner has, by and through his art, accomplished such a mighty work of liberation that we may rejoice to think that it is quite useless for us to storm the skies since he has conquered them for us. It is much wiser to seek out a pleasant nook in this lovely heaven. I want to find a little place there for myself, not in a desert with water and locusts and wild honey but in a merry company of primitive beings, among the tinkling of guitars, the sighs of love, the moonlight, in short, in a quite ordinary « Opéra-comique » without any rescuing specter of Schopenhauerian philosophy in the background. »

After having sought the libretto of an Opera from the whole world, from poets ancient and modern, from William Shakespeare, from his friend Detlev von Liliencron, and after having tried to write one himself, he finally took that of Rosa Mayreder, an adaptation of a Spanish novelette of Don Pedro de Alarcón. This was « Der Corregidor » , which, after having been refused by other Theaters, was played in June 1896 at Mannheim. The work was not a success in spite of its musical qualities ; the poor libretto helped in its failure.

But the main thing was that Wolf's creative genius had returned. In April 1896, he wrote straight away the 22 songs of the 2nd volume of the « Italienisches Liederbuch » . At Christmas, his friend Paul Müller sent him some of Michel-Angelo's poems, translated into German by Walter Robert-Tornow ; and Wolf, deeply moved by their beauty, decided at once to devote a whole volume of lieder to them. In 1897, he composed the 1st 3 melodies. At the same time, he was also working at a new Opera, « Manuel Venegas » , a poem by Moritz Hoernes, written after the style of Alarcón. He seemed full of strength and happiness and confidence in his renewed health. Müller was speaking to him of the premature death of Franz Schubert, and Wolf replied, « A man is not taken away before he has said all he has to say. » .

He worked furiously, « like a steam engine » , as he said, and was so absorbed in the composition of « Manuel Venegas » (September 1897) that he went without rest and hardly had time to take necessary food. In a fortnight, he had written 50 pages of the pianoforte score, as well as the motifs for the whole work, and the music of half the 1st Act.

Then madness came. On September 20, he was seized while he was working at the great recitative of « Manuel Venegas » in the 1st Act.

Wolf was taken to Doctor Wilhelm Svetlin's private hospital in Vienna and remained there until January 1898. Happily, he had devoted friends who took care of him and made-up for the indifference of the public ; for what he had earned himself would not have enabled him even to die in peace. When Schott, the publisher, sent him in October 1895 his royalties for the editions of his lieder of Mörike, Gœthe, Eichendorff, Keller, Spanish poetry, and the 1st volume of Italian poetry, their total for 5 years came to 86 Marks and 35 Pfennigs ! And Schott calmly added that he had not expected so good a result. So it was Wolf's friends, and especially Hugo Faißt, who not only saved him from misery by their unobtrusive and often secret generosity but spared him the horror of destitution in his last misfortunes.

Wolf recovered his reason and was sent, in February 1898, for a voyage to Trieste and Venetia to complete his cure and prevent him from thinking of work. The precaution was unnecessary ; for he says in a letter to Hugo Faißt, written in the same month :

« There is no need for you to trouble yourself or fear that I shall overdo things. A real distaste for work has taken possession of me, and I believe I shall never write another note. My unfinished Opera has no more interest for me, and music altogether is hateful. You see what my kind friends have done for me ! I cannot think how I shall be able to exist in this state. Ah, happy Swabian ! One may well envy you. Greet your beautiful country for me, and be warmly greeted yourself by your unhappy and worn-out friend, Hugo Wolf. »

When he returned to Vienna, however, Wolf seemed to be a little better and had apparently regained his health and cheerfulness. But to his own astonishment, he had become, as he says in a letter to Faißt, a quiet, sedate, and silent man, who wished more and more to be alone. He did not compose anything fresh but revised his « Michel-Angelo Lieder » and had them published. He made plans for the winter and rejoiced in the thought of passing it in the country near Gmunden, « in perfect quiet, undisturbed, and living only for art » . In his last letter to Faißt, September 17, 1898, Hugo Wolf says :

« I am quite well again now, and have no more need of any cures. You would need them more than I. »

Then came a fresh seizure of madness, and this time all was finished.

In the autumn of 1898, Hugo Wolf was taken to an asylum at Vienna. At first, he was able to receive a few visits and to enjoy a little music by playing duets with the director of the establishment, who was himself a musician and a great admirer of Wolf's works. He was even able, in the spring, to take a few walks out of doors with his friends and an attendant. But he was beginning not to recognize things or people or even himself. « Yes » , he would say, sighing, « if only I were Hugo Wolf ! » . From the middle of 1899, his malady grew rapidly worse, and general paralysis followed. At the beginning of 1900, his speech was affected, and, finally, in August 1901, all his body. At the beginning of 1902, all hope was given-up by the doctors ; but his heart was still sound, and the unhappy man dragged out his life for another year. He died on February 22, 1903, of peri-pneumonia.

Hugo Wolf was given a magnificent funeral which was attended by all the people who had done nothing for him while he was alive. The Austrian State, the town of Vienna, his native town Windischgraz, the Conservatory that had expelled him, the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » who had been so long unfriendly to his works, the Opera house that had been closed to him, the singers that had scorned him, the critics that had scoffed at him ; they were all there. They sang one of his saddest melodies, « Resignation » , a setting of a poem of Eichendorff's, and a chorale by his old friend Anton Bruckner, who had died several years before him. His faithful friends, Faißt, at the head of them, took care to have a monument erected to his memory near those of Beethoven and Schubert, at the Vienna central cemetery.

Such was his life, cut short at 37 years of age, for one cannot count the 5 years of complete madness. There are not many examples in the art world of so terrible a fate. Nietzsche's misfortune is nowhere beside this, for Nietzsche's madness was, to a certain extent, productive and caused his genius to flash out in a way that it never would have done if his mind had been balanced and his health perfect. Hugo Wolf's madness meant prostration. But one may see how, even in the space of 37 years, his life was strangely parceled out. For he did not really begin his creative work until he was 27 years old ; and, as from 1890 to 1895, he was condemned to 5 years' silence, the sum total of his real life, his productive life, is only 4 or 5 years. But, in those few years, he got more out of life than the greater part of artists do in a long career, and, in his work, he left the imprint of a personality that no one could forget after once having known it.

Hugo Wolf's work consists chiefly, as we have already seen, of lieder ; and these lieder are characterized by the application to lyrical music of principles established by Richard Wagner in the domain of drama. That does not mean he imitated Wagner. One finds, here and there in Wolf's music, Wagnerian forms, just as elsewhere there are evident reminiscences of Hector Berlioz. It is the inevitable mark of his time, and each great artist in his turn contributes his share to the enrichment of the language that belongs to us all. But the real Wagnerism of Wolf is not made-up of these unconscious resemblances ; it lies in his determination to make poetry the inspiration of music. « To show, above all, » ,Wolf wrote to Engelbert Humperdinck in 1890, « that poetry is the true source of my music. » .

When a man is both a poet and a musician, like Wagner, it is natural that his poetry and music should harmonize perfectly. But when it is a matter of translating the soul of other poets into music, special gifts of mental subtlety and an abounding sympathy are needed. These gifts were possessed by Wolf in high degree. No musician has more keenly savored and appreciated the poets. « He was » , said one of his critics, G. Kühl, « Germany's greatest psychologist in music since Mozart. » . There was nothing labored about his psychology. Wolf was incapable of setting to music poetry that he did not really love. He used to have the poetry, he wished to translate, read over to him several times, or, in the evening, he would read it aloud to himself. If he felt very stirred by it, he lived apart with it, and thought about it, and soaked himself in its atmosphere ; then, he went to sleep, and, the next morning, he was able to write the lied straight away. But some poems seemed to sleep in him for years and then would suddenly awake in him in a musical form. On these occasions, he would cry out with happiness. « Do you know » , he wrote to Paul Müller, « I simply shouted with joy. » . Müller said he was like an old hen after it had laid an egg.

Hugo Wolf never chose commonplace poems for his music which is more than can be said of Franz Schubert or Robert Schumann. He did not use anything written by contemporary poets although he was in sympathy with some them, such as Detlev von Liliencron, who hoped very much to be translated into music by him. But he could not do it ; he could not use anything in the work of a great poet unless he became so intimate with it that it seemed to be a part of him.

What strikes one also in the lieder is the importance of the pianoforte accompaniment and its independence of the voice. Sometimes, the voice and the pianoforte express the contrast that so often exists between the words and the thought of the poem ; at other times, they express 2 personalities, as in his setting of Gœthe's « Prometheus » , where the accompaniment represents « Zeus » sending out his thunderbolts and the voice interprets Titan ; or again, he may depict, as in the setting of Eichendorff's Serenade, a student in love in the accompaniment, while the song is the voice of an old man who is listening to it and thinking of his youth. But, in whatever he is describing, the piano-forte and the voice always have their own individuality. You cannot take anything away from his lieder without spoiling the whole ; and it is especially so with his instrumental passages, which give us the beginning and end of his emotion and which circle round it and sum it up. The musical form, following closely the poetic form, is extremely varied. It may sometimes express a fugitive thought, a brief record of a poetic impression or some little action, or it may be a great epic or dramatic picture. Paul Müller remarks that Wolf put more into a poem than the poet himself as in the « Italienisches Liederbuch » . It is the worst reproach they can make about him, and it is not an ordinary one. Wolf excelled especially in setting poems which accorded with his own tragic fate, as if he had some presentiment of it. No one has better expressed the anguish of a troubled and despairing soul, such as we find in the old harp player in Wilhelm Meister, or the splendid nihilism of certain poems of Michel-Angelo.

Of all his collections of lieder, the 53 « Gedichte von Eduard Mörike, komponiert für eine Singstimme and Klavier » (1888) , the 1st published, is the most popular. It gained many friends for Wolf, not so much among artists (who are always in the minority) as among those critics who are the best and most disinterested of all the homely, honest people who do not make a profession of art but enjoy it as their spiritual daily bread. There are a number of these people in Germany, whose hard lives are beautified by their love of music. Wolf found these friends in all parts, but he found most of them in Swabia. At Stuttgart, at Mannheim, at Darmstadt, and in the country round about these towns, he became very popular ; the only popular musician since Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann. All classes of society united in loving him. « His lieder » , says Ernst Décsey, « are on the pianos of even the poorest houses, by the side of Schubert's lieder » . Stuttgart became for Wolf, as he said himself, a 2nd home. He owes this popularity, which is without parallel in Swabia, to the people's passionate love of lieder and, above all, of the poetry of Mörike, the Swabian pastor who lives again in Wolf's songs. Wolf has set to music a quarter of Mörike's poems, he has brought Mörike into his own, and given him one of the 1st places among German poets. Such was really his intention, and he said so when he had a portrait of Mörike put on the title page of the songs. Whether the reading of his poetry acted as a balm to Wolf's inquiet spirit or whether he became conscious of his genius for the 1st time when he expressed this poetry in music, I do not know ; but he felt deep gratitude toward it and wished to show it by beginning the 1st volume with that fine and rather Beethoven-like song, « Der Genesende an die Hoffnung » (The Convalescent's Ode to Hope) .

The 51 lieder of the « Gœthe Liederbuch » (1888-1889) were composed in groups : the « Wilhelm Meister Lieder » , the « Divan (Suleika) Lieder » ... Wolf even tried to identify himself with the poet's line of thought ; and, in this, we often find him in rivalry with Franz Schubert. He avoided using the poems in which he thought Schubert had exactly conveyed the poet's meaning, as in « Geheimnis and An Schwager Kronos » ; but he told Paul Müller that there were times when Schubert did not understand Gœthe at all because he concerned himself with translating their general lyrical thought rather than with showing the real nature of Gœthe's characters. The peculiar interest of Wolf's lieder is that he gives each poetic figure its individual character. The « Harpist and « Mignon » are traced with marvelous insight and restraint ; and, in some passages, Wolf shows that he had rediscovered « Gœthe » 's art of presenting a whole world of sadness in a single word. The serenity of a great soul soars over the chaos of passions.

The « Spanisches Liederbuch nach Heyse and Geibel » (1889-1890) had already inspired Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Peter Cornelius, and others. But none had tried to give it its rough and sensual character. Paul Müller shows how Schumann, especially, robbed the poems of their true nature. Not only did he invest them with his own sentimentalism, but he calmly arranged poems of the most marked individual character to be sung by 4 voices, which makes them quite absurd ; and worse than this, he changed the words and their sense when they stood in his way. Wolf, on the contrary, steeped himself in this melancholy and voluptuous world and would not let anything draw him from it ; and out of it, he produced, as he himself said proudly, some Masterpieces. The 10 religious songs, that come at the beginning of the collection, suggest the delusions of mysticism and weep tears of blood ; they are distressing to the ear and mind alike, for they are the passionate expression of a faith that puts itself on the rack. By the side of them, one finds smiling visions of the « Holy Family » which recall Esteban Murillo. The 34 folk songs are brilliant, restless, whimsical, and wonderfully varied in form. Each represents a different subject, a personality drawn with incisive strokes, and the whole collection overflows with life. It is said that the « Spanisches Liederbuch » is to Wolf's work what « Tristan und Isolde » is to Wagner's work.

The « Italienisches Liederbuch » (1890-1896) is quite different. The character of the songs is very restrained, and Wolf's genius here approached a Classic clearness of form. He was always seeking to simplify his musical language and said that if he wrote anything more, he wished it to be like Mozart's writings. These lieder contain nothing that is not absolutely essential to their subject ; so the melodies are very short and are dramatic rather than lyrical. Wolf gave them an important place in his work : « I consider them », he wrote to Emil Kaufmann, « the most original and perfect of my compositions » .

As for the « Michel-Angelo Gedichten » (1897) , they were interrupted by the outbreak of his malady, and he had time to write only 4, of which he suppressed one. Their associations are pathetic when one remembers the tragic time at which they were composed ; and, by a sort of prophetic instinct, they exhale heaviness of spirit and mournful pride. The 2nd melody is perhaps more beautiful than anything else Wolf wrote ; it is truly his death song :

« Alles endet, was entstehet. Alles, alles rings vergehet. »

And it is a dead man that sings :

« Menschen waren wir fa auch, Froh and traurig, so wie Ihr. Und nun sind wir leblos hier, Sind nur Erde, wie Ihr sehet. »

At the moment he was writing this song, in the short respite he had from his illness, he himself was nearly a dead man.

As soon as Wolf was really dead, his genius was recognized all over Germany. His sufferings provoked an almost excessive reaction in his favour. « Hugo-Wolf-Verein » were founded everywhere ; and today, we have publications, collections of letters, souvenirs, and biographies in abundance. It is a case of who can cry loudest that he always understood the genius of the unhappy artist and work himself into the greatest fury against his traducers.

Hugo Wolf : under the spell of Richard Wagner

1882 was the year of the premiere of « Parsifal » by Richard Wagner. Hugo Wolf, who had resumed the life of a Bohemian, had the ardent wish to hear « Parsifal » in Bayreuth. He succeeded in getting a complimentary ticket, friends contributed to the costs of the trip and the accomodation, and Wagner's music filled him again with great enthusiasm.

As convinced Wagnerian, Wagner was also vegetarian at that time. In a Viennese vegetarian restaurant, he became acquainted with Friedrich Eckstein, a private student of Anton Bruckner. He was fascinated by Eckstein's encyclopedic knowledge. The discussions on « Parsifal » , German and Spanish mysticism, Free-masonry and vegetarianism went often on till dawn.

When Richard Wagner made the turn to vegetarianism, Friedrich Eckstein and those around him quickly followed suit. Eckstein also headed-up a group of Pythagoreans that dressed in all cotton gowns year round, sporting shoulder-length hair and long beards. Eckstein was active in the so-called « Pernersdorfer » circle, a group that followed the writings of Wagner and Friedrich Nietzsche and included, among others, Viktor Adler, Gustav Mahler, and at one time, Hugo Wolf. According to occult historian James Webb (1985, pages 44-45; 62) , Rudolf Steiner was a frequent visitor at the Café Griensteidl, where the Wagnerians, vegetarians, Pythagoreans, poets, and artists went to converse and often times, argue.

Also, the friendship with the Köchert family (from now on, Hugo Wolf sought and found refuge in their house at « Neue Markt » , in Vienna, when troubles necessitated it) proved to be an essential support. After a long creative pause, he composed in December 1882 series of lieder, for the most part adapted from poems by Joseph von Eichendorff and Robert Reinick. In January 1883, Wolf submitted them to Eduard Hanslick, the mighty and feared Viennese music reviewer, and he received a friendly, but noncommittal answer.

Hugo Wolf was fascinated by Heinrich von Kleist's « Penthesilea » in a particular way. He carried the book around with him like a breviary and quoted long passages with pleasure. He planned to make « Penthesilea » the theme of a Symphonic poem, but, at Ist, Wolf did not feel-up to the demands of this subject. Early in 1884, he dropped the attempt to set it to music to try his hand at new and completely different profession : as music reviewer.

The reviewer (1884-1887)

It was due to the influence of the Köchert family that Wolf was employed with the « Wiener Salonblatt » , a high-circulation weekly paper. The firm of Köchert had business relations with the paper through its numerous advertisements as court jeweler. The « Salonblatt » saw itself as the mirror of the Viennese society, covered the balls of the season, events world of the nobility and provided light entertainment. At Ist, Wolf's vehement (uttered in an uncompromising tone) siding with Richard Wagner's and Franz Liszt's music, his attacks on the conservatism of the Philharmonic programs and on the taste of the Viennese Opera public, finally, his verbal invectives against Johannes Brahms, who was highly-esteemed in Vienna, had an upsetting and disturbing affect. But soon, violent verbal reactions drew the attention of large circles to the paper. In the cafés, it passed from hand to hand, it was discussed and read by the Wagnerians with pleasure and by their enemies with anger. The « wild Wolf » from The « Salonblatt » became a Viennese institution.

Hugo Wolf should soon pay for his uncompromising attacks in the « Salonblatt », which were impeding his way as composer in Vienna. In 1885, he submitted his String Quartet in D minor (« Entbehren sollst du, sollst entbehren ») to the Rosé Quartet for a 1st performance and, after a while, he was called upon sarcastically to fetch the manuscript at the doorman of the Court Opera. At 1st, he seemed to have more luck with his Symphonic poem « Penthesilea », which was accepted by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra for a test rehearsal, on October 15th 1886. Although it was regarded as a rule that the composer was not allowed to attend the test rehearsal of his work, Wolf succeeded in entering the hall and listening. The orchestra decided against the performance of the work. Even days later, Wolf was beside himself with indignation at the treatment of « Penthesilea » by conductor Hans Richter, who said to the orchestra : « Gentlemen, I would not let you play the piece out - but I wanted to see the man who dared to write about Master Brahms like that. » .

The great lieder cycles (1888-1889)

In April 1887, Hugo Wolf retired from the post as critic. From May 2nd to May 4th, he composed the « Italian Serenade » for String Quartet. This creative phase was interrupted by a hard blow : Wolf's father died on May 9th. « In memory of my dearest father. » , he dedicated 6 lieder adapted from texts by Joseph Viktor von Scheffel, Eduard Mörike, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe and Justinus Kerner, which were published in 1888 with Friedrich Eckstein's help by the « Wiener Musikverlag Wetzler » . These lieder excited the interest of the young conductor Franz Schalk, whose brother Josef became soon Wolf's most engaged protagonist.

« In winter 1888, have caught on after a long hunting around. In the quickest succession composed Mörike, Eichendorff and Goethe. » In this way, Hugo Wolf characterized himself in retrospect the beginning of the most creative phase of his life, from which his most noted works derived. In January 1888, he set at 1st « Wo wird einst » by Heinrich Heine and « Gesellenlied » by Robert Reinick to music at the country house of the Werner family in Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna, like for getting himself in the right frame of mind. The setting to music of 43 poems by Eduard Mörike followed in the short period from February 16th to May 18th. He composed often 2 or 3 poems a day.

Proud consciousness of the own rank within the history of music filled the letter to Josef Straßer dated March 23rd : « What I am composing now, dear friend, I compose it already for the posterity too. They are masterworks. » . A similar frenzy of production happened again, from September 1888 to February 1889. On the banks of the Traunsee, the « Eichendorff Lieder » of earlier creative phases were enlarged with new settings to music to a volume of 20 lieder, which was dedicated to the brothers Franz and Josef Schalk.

In October 1888, Hugo Wolf composed another 9 « Mörike Lieder » . With a 53rd lied, the « Mörike » volume was closed on a visit in Perchtoldsdorf. In the meantime, Wolf dealt feverishly with the composition of poems by Gøthe. From October 27th to February 12th 1889, he set 50 texts by Gøthe to music. A circle of friends became familiar with each newest creation. The students under Anton Bruckner, Friedrich Eckstein and Ferdinand Løwe belonged to them and the Schalk brothers as well.

On the way to international fame : « Italienisches Liederbuch » (1889-1891)

In the Viennese Academic Wagner Association, Josef Schalk, since 1887, its artistic manager, started an active publicity campaign for Wolf. Improvised performances of works by Hugo Wolf at the meetings on Thursday evening became frequent events. Schalk supported Wolf so in such a marked manner that some members began to grumble about the « Wolf-gorge » and asked mockingly for renaming the association into « Wolf-association » .

On January 22nd, 1890, the « Münchner Allgemeine Zeitung » published an item on Hugo Wolf, which made him well-known in the circles of musicians in South Germany : « Neue Lieder, neues Leben » . Its author, Josef Schalk, presented the « Mørike Lieder » by Wolf. After praising highly the Swabian poet, he pointed out the kindred lied style of the composer sympathizing the poetry down to the last detail. Furthermore, Wolf could not be blamed for taking Richard Wagner as an example and his conversion of these stylistic means was free of any imitation. Through the item, Wolf won important friends in South Germany, among others Emil Kauffmann from Tøbingen and Oskar Grohe, a judge from Mannheim. On September 25th, 1890, Wolf began to compose the « Italienisches Liederbuch » . But at 1st, he composed only 4 lieder, because he paid a visit to his new friends in Germany in October.

Delighted about the interest his works had met in Germany, Hugo Wolf composed another 3 lieder of the « Italienisches Liederbuch » in Døbling, but interrupted this work, because the « Burgtheater » charged him with the composition of the music for Ibsen's drama « Das Fest auf Solhaug » . The creative crisis of the coming years cast their shadows before them. Without inspiration, Wolf strove with the commissioned work till February 1891. The performance did take place in November, but an essential part of the music fell a prey to radical cuts. A feverish working phase set in once again. From November 29th on, Wolf composed another 15 parts of the « Italienisches Liederbuch » within only 25 days. But now began a harrowing period of creative sterility, which ended only in April 1895.

The inner compulsion to compose, for Hugo Wolf an essential to creation, did not turn-up again. The composer had to make do with revisions of own earlier works, for example, the instrumentation of the « Italienisches Liederbuch » for small orchestra or the ballad « Der Feuerreiter » for choir and full orchestra. The time of creative barrenness was filled with traveling. In March 1892, Wolf went to Berlin to a Wolf lieder recital, which scored a success with the public and the press. The acquaintance of the conductor Siegfried Ochs turned out to be valuable. 2 years later, he helped Wolf's orchestrated lieder achieve the breakthrough. Richard Genée gave him advice in a question, which occupied Wolf's mind for a long time : the search for an appropriate matter for an Opera. Genée called his attention to the subject of « Manuel Venegas » by Alarcón.

After trips through Germany, to the Köcherts family on the banks of the Traunsee and to Count von Lipperheide in Tyrol, Wolf returned exhausted to Vienna. The health of his nerves has seriously deteriorated. Friedrich Eckstein noticed the sometimes paranoid behavior of his friend : Wolf talked (shouting and cursing) to himself and tore-out the hair of the beard.

« Der Corregidor » and « Manuel Venegas » (1895-1896)

Hugo Wolf's year-long search for an appropriate Opera text ended early in 1895. He spoke with delight on the libretto « Der Corregidor » by Rosa Mayreder, based on the novella « Der Dreispitz » by Pedro de Alarcón. It was the result of a sudden change of opinion, because this libretto was already know to him. He had refused it categorically at the first reading.

Financial worries were removed by an annual subvention by Count Lipperheide and some other friends. Now, Wolf could devote himself totally to the composition of his 1st stage work. The task caused a new creative phase in him. On March 12th, he began to compose, within 4 months, he finished the piano score and, within another 5 months, he wrote the whole partition. After vain attempts to stage the work in Vienna or Prague, it was performed for the 1st time at the Mannheim National Theater. The première on May 17th, 1896, scored a success with the public. However, the composer could hardly be persuaded to thank for the applause, because numerous details of the performance displeased him. « Der Corregidor » , one of the few examples of an amusing German Opera after Richard Wagner, could not win through as repertory work in the sequel. Weaknesses of text were held responsible for that, but also Wolf's tendency to emphasize lyric passages to the disadvantage of the dramatic course. In March 1897, Wolf composed his last lieder, 3 sonnets by Michel-Angelo. In the meantime, Rose Mayreder had begun to convert Alarcón's novella « Manuel Venegas » into an Opera libretto. Wolf was enthusiastic again about the draft, but the friends advised him against the setting to music. Moritz Hoernes wrote a new book, which turned-out to his greatest satisfaction. On July 1897, he began to compose the spring choir of the Opera. In all, he wrote 50 pages of the piano score till September. Then, Wolf fell a prey to his tragic illness. « Manuel Venegas » remained a fragment.

Breakdown (1897)

Hugo Wolf expected of Gustav Mahler, who was appointed as conductor in May 1897 and, from September on, as director of the Vienna Court Opera, the support of his works, in particular the performance of his « Der Corregidor » . A conversation with Mahler, who had already acceded to his office as provisional director of the Opera, unleashed the catastrophe. Mahler spoke disparagingly about Wolf's Opera and was doubtful about the possibility of an early performance. Wolf left the director's office extremely agitated and embittered. The delusion fixed itself in his mind that he himself was the new director of the Opera and that he could remove by dismissing Mahler the last obstacle to the performance of his « Der Corregidor » in Vienna.

Hugo Wolf's loss of reality became apparent to the friends, when he played them parts of « Manuel Venegas » on September 20th. He maintained being the director of the Viennese Opera House and began to distribute posts and jobs.

They brought him in his apartment in Vienna and let him go on thinking that he would be brought to the Controller the next day. In actual fact, the ordered carriage took him to Doctor Wilhelm Svetlin's mental home in the 3rd district. In the sanatorium, his megalomania and his persecution mania subsided at last. He instrumented 2 lieder from the « Spanisches Liederbuch » and dealt with additions to « Penthesilea » and « Italienische Serenade ». He thought that he was cured, when he was discharged on January 24th, 1898.

In May, Hugo Wolf moved to Traunkirchen, where another tragic incident happened. Wolf made a suicide attempt in the Traunsee. Realizing his own psychic situation, he asked now himself for internment. He was admitted to the Lower-Austrian Provincial lunatic asylum in Vienna. The Viennese Hugo Wolf Association by means of payments by the friends from Austria and Germany, but also by the Austrian Emperor and the Ministry of Culture and Education provided for Wolf's keep.

Tragic epilogue (1898-1903)

At the Provincial lunatic asylum, Hugo Wolf's state deteriorated at last. Phases of total absence of mind and delusions came by turns. Wolf raved in delirium about Johannes Brahms and his fear that his body will be dismembered. Early in 1899, there was a change for the better again. He was visited by friends and a piano was made available to him in his room. Short drives with friends interrupted the dismal monotony of the daily round at the home.

But after the summer 1899, his state made drives and the occupation with music impossible. The progression of the illness brought new delusions about. Wolf refused to eat and could only sleep by means of drugs. Paralytic symptoms grew worse. His hand-writing became illegible. Difficulties to speak set in and, sometimes, he was totally incapable of speaking. On February 22nd, 1903, Wolf died of pneumonia. He received a tomb of honour at the « Wiener Zentralfriedhof » (central cemetery of Vienna) close to tombs of Ludwig van Beethoven and Franz Schubert. The gravestone by Edmund Hellmer was formally unveiled in October 1904.

Hugo Wolf's reputation as the wild man of late- 19th Century song, « Der wilde Wolf », is borne out by many incidents in his life. He was thrown out of the Vienna Conservatory at the age of 17 for telling the director that he felt his time as a music student was making him forget more than he learnt. The critic Max Graf, in his memoirs of « fin de siècle » Vienna, characterised Wolf as a hero for the next generation of music students : « Hugo Wolf belonged to us and we belonged to him. We stared at the pale man who stood in the standing room section of the Opera house just like ourselves, while Brahms sat in a box like God sitting on the clouds. ». Yet, Wolf's position outside Vienna's musical establishment was not entirely by choice. When the young composer last came to Vienna, in 1875, from the small-town of Windischgraz in Lower-Styria, he and his father were passionate that he should progress from his obscure origins to a place at the centre of Vienna's musical life. On the occasion of Richard Wagner's visit to the Austrian capital, in 1875, Wolf followed his carriage wherever it went and stood in the lobby of the Master's hotel until he was allowed to show him his songs. As Wolf said : « I conceived an irresistible inclination towards Richard Wagner, without having yet formed any conception of his music. » ; it was enough that this man had the reputation of being the greatest Opera composer of all. The polemics that surrounded Wagner's cause (his battles with the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick and other Brahmsians) clearly enhanced his status in Wolf's eyes. But such polemics did not prevent him from seeking an interview with Brahms too, in 1879. Unfortunately, Brahms did not like Wolf or his songs, and suggested the young man should go back to the drawing board and arrange counterpoint lessons forthwith.

Hugo Wolf's search for musical sponsors continued through most of his life. He was obsessed with the need to find a sphere of action, an outlet for his creative impulses that could make a mark on those around him. Such anxieties were undeniably heightened by his natural tendency towards song, which was seen as an ephemeral art, partly tarnished by its associations with bourgeois domesticity or « salon style » decadence. In his student years, Wolf sketched parts of 2 Symphonies and a Violin Concerto, and, in 1880, he began work on a String quartet in D minor (completed in 1884) . However, these creative experiences were nothing compared with the flow of songs which came from his pen, in 1878. Most of these were settings of texts from Heinrich Heine's « Buch der Lieder » , the choice of poet and musical style bringing Wolf close to Robert Schumann. He later disowned such derivativeness, as well as the subjective associations of the songs with his early love-affair with Vally Franck. With his mature Lieder, Wolf talked of being « an objective lyricist » , and of following what he called his « duty to the poet » . He felt it was his task to convince audiences of the « true content » of a poetic text by every possible musical means. He would often quote the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche's thoughts on the purpose of art : « truth, relentless truth - truth till it hurts » . Like Wagner, Wolf saw poetry as the proper object of his musical eloquence, the end that motivated and justified all his explorations. Yet, there was a crucial difference between them. Wagner wrote his own texts to his music dramas, so that in a circular fashion « Wagner, the musician » could always prompt « Wagner, the poet » . Wolf welcomed a rather different æsthetic discipline, accepting the « otherness » of the poet as a way of opening his music to constant re-evaluation.

A New Approach to Song

Most enthusiasts for German Lieder would agree that Hugo Wolf's radical ways of approaching poetry have successfully heightened our perceptions of song. However, our appreciation of the clarity and effectiveness of his artistic vision is sometimes clouded by the fact that Wolf seemed so little in control of his life and circumstances. After being expelled from the Conservatory, Wolf accepted the dubious patronage of Adalbert von Goldschmidt, a dilettante composer and noted socialite. Wolf openly voiced his contempt for Goldschmidt's over-heated Lisztian style of music, but, in the difficult decade from 1877, he relied on him financially as he drifted from lodging to lodging and eked out a living giving music lessons. The young composer received much intellectual stimulation from Goldschmidt and his circle, but their influence did little to settle his musical or social habits. It was at this time that Wolf contracted the syphilis that led to madness, in 1897. His only experience of regular employment was as music-critic to the « Wiener Salonblatt » , from 1884 to 1887. In his reviewing, Wolf intended to make a significant contribution to the critical debates of his time, little realising that his passionate attacks on Johannes Brahms, as a composer of a « dead-tired fantasy » , were hardly appropriate for a fashionable Sunday newspaper. He also underestimated the extent of the backlash such reviews would bring upon himself. In 1886, the famous conductor Hans Richter agreed to a public play-through of Wolf's ambitious Symphonic poem « Penthesilea » . It seemed that Wolf was about to achieve the breakthrough he was seeking. Yet, in the event, Richter made no effort to control the orchestra as it mangled the difficult score, and instead said loud enough for everyone to hear : « And that is the man who dares to criticise Brahms ! » .

It was fortunate for Wolf that his hounding by Richter and other establishment figures came to win him the unequivocal support of the Viennese Wagner Society, which could offer him venues for the regular performance of his songs. Wolf enjoyed the enthusiastic reception of such an audience, and the fruitful artistic partnerships that began to develop with the Wagnerian tenor Ferdinand Jäger and with the Society's director, the pianist and critic Josef Schalk. However, he also realised that much of the support was prompted by concern for Wagner rather than for himself. The Viennese Wagnerians were anxious that Wagner should be seen to have left a group of composers to follow in his wake, otherwise it would be difficult to call his art the « music of the future ». Schalk believed Wolf's music could be presented as a « healthy bloom from the Master's stem », but this approach caused inevitable conflict. In 1889, Wolf walked-out of the Wagner Society after one of his songs became the occasion for a pan-German nationalistic demonstration, declaring :

« Vanity and inordinate ambition will not catch me by the forelock again. Let each seek to win through on his own account. So let us have no more apostles ! »

At this point in his life, Wolf had every reason for self-confidence. His Mörike song-book was just about to be published, including 53 settings of this relatively little-known mid- 19th Century poet. The volume created a sensation in circles far beyond Vienna. The famous Bayreuth Wagnerian, Baron Hans von Wolzogen, announced his astonishment at the songs' depth and variety, saying they swung from « the cheerfully teasing, simple robust tunes of German folksong, to the strains of the Romantic ballad full of ghostly horrors and elfish apparitions up to the heights of hymn and into the depths of mysticism ». The Mörike songs were likened to music dramas in miniature or even to Symphonic poems, with their declamatory vocal lines, motivic characterisation and quasi-orchestral piano textures. Some critics deplored these innovations as the end of song, but others welcomed Wolf as the « Wagner of the Lied ». He certainly made uninhibited use of Tristanesque harmonies, but their treatment was not always straightforwardly Wagnerian. His setting of « An den Schlaf » (To Sleep) ends with a quotation from the final bars of Isolde's « Liebestod », yet one hardly recognises the reference because Wolf weaves it into a much more delicate motivic fabric. The song traces its path from « darkness » to « light » through a careful network of harmonic progressions, which move in precise sequence from dissonance to resolution. Wolf once insisted that all his progressions, however radical, could be explained within the « strict laws of harmony ». The Mörike song-book was a landmark for Wolf, not only in its exploration of the language of Wagnerian chromaticism, but also in asserting his independence from any uncritical discipleship.

The speed with which Wolf completed the Mörike songs, from February to November 1888, shows a remarkable release of creative energy. It overflowed into the Eichendorff and Gœthe song-books of 1888 and 1889. Eichendorff is another poet closely connected with Robert Schumann, but on this occasion Wolf chose poems that invited him to paint character portraits, rather than subjective moods as beloved by Schumann. Wolf's approach to the Gœthe song-book was also consciously critical. He included many of Gœthe's more abstract and philosophical poems, ones that had previously been thought beyond the scope of song-composers ; as well as reworking poems famously set by Franz Schubert, such as « Prometheus », « Ganymed », and the Wilhelm Meister lyrics. Some Wagnerians attacked Wolf for looking back to Gœthe ; they argued that he should be turning to radical poets of his own generation. Yet, Wolf was often surprisingly scathing about contemporary writers. He said the novels of Dostoyevsky were like « a hundred thousand fools speaking at once » . Goethe was even more merciless in condemning stylistic innovation if he felt it was pursued for its own sake. He believed lyrical impulses should be subjected to formal discipline, even if this meant suppressing a certain Romantic immediacy. In his lyrics from the novel « The Apprenticeship of Wilhelm Meister » , the « Harper » and « Mignon » are heard voicing their frustration at what cannot be said, and so opening-up whole new areas of feeling and experience. It was this paradox that invigorated Wolf's own approach to the Lied. In his Goethe settings, he largely avoided the tuneful lyricism that Schubert excelled in, and instead offered an abstract play of rhythmic textures and sharply delineated forms. Yet, Wolf made the formal restrictions bring a new kind of expressive intensity to his lyrics, one that aimed beyond simpler Romantic evocations of mood.

For Wolf then, radical innovation and conservatism tended to go hand in hand, a trait that confused his critics even while it intrigued and captivated his audiences. Commentators had the most problems understanding the step he took after the Goethe song-book, since he immediately began setting what has been called « a series of rather flat lyrics » from the « Spanisches Liederbuch » of Paul Heyse and Emanuel Geibel. Although some of the poems are by great Spanish authors, Wolf's shift to dealing with German translations raises important questions. Inevitably, there is not the same sense of poetic imperative at work in these settings as there was when Wolf was responding to Mörike or Goethe. And yet, Wolf still surrounded the formal details of his Spanish songs (their characteristic refrains and rhyming patterns) with a sense of heightened significance. It was as if, by this stage in his song-writing, Wolf had internalised his « duty to the poet » and made an accepted virtue out of keeping tightly within the dimensions of his genre.

In 1888, Friedrich Nietzsche wrote, « today musical integrity is only possible in what is small » , a motto that might have been written especially for Wolf. Song had become his distinctive battleground, in a way that does not apply to any other 19th Century composer. And yet, there is evidence that, from 1890, Wolf became increasingly dissatisfied with his specialist image. During the heady days of the Mörike songs, Wolf told his friends he was always sketching out Operatic scenes at the piano and thinking about possible Opera libretti ; usually on Spanish subjects. The Spanish obsession reflected his admiration for Georges Bizet's Opera « Carmen » , except that Wolf intended to write a comic Opera not a tragedy. He was aiming at a big popular success on the scale of Engelbert Humperdinck's « Hänsel und Gretel » , or the verismo Operas of Leoncavallo and Mascagni. Some would say his megalomania knew no bounds. However, there were serious issues at stake with Wolf's Operatic ambitions that bear on his complex relationship to Wagner. In 1890, he wrote to a friend : « Wagner's excesses degrade one into a worm. However, you must not think that I have suddenly joined the anti-Wagnerians, an event which I have earnestly to guard against, if only to justify my own artistic existence. » . In life, Wolf could not afford to sever the links, but, in art, his need to assert a separate dramatic vision became increasingly urgent. Wolf knew the kind of Opera he wanted to write, an ordinary Opera about ordinary people ; « without the sombre world-redeeming spectre of a Schopenhauerian philosophy in the background » . It took him 5 years to settle on a libretto, Rosa Mayreder's adaptation of Alarcon's novel « El Sombrero de tres picos » (The 3 Cornered Hat) . And when he finally began work in 1895, his theatrical inexperience showed-up at every stage of the compositional process. However, despite its shortcomings, there is still enough dramatic substance in Wolf's « Der Corregidor » to underline his distinctive view of character and plot. In Wolf's Opera, there are no larger-than-life heroes making momentous decisions for good or ill. Most of the dialogue remains conversational in tone, while the characters seem to change almost entirely according to circumstance in a disturbingly realistic fashion. It is hard to judge whether such a shifting view of personality would have been convincing to his audiences if Wolf's stage techniques had been better. His 2nd Opera, « Manuel Venegas » (based on Alarcon's novel « El Niño de la bola ») , was unfortunately left unfinished in 1897. One brave critic blamed « Der Corregidor » 's lack of success on the performers rather than the composer's ineptitude. He claimed that « the German stage, under the sway of Wagner, was not yet free enough for such high-flying spirituality » , a spirituality which he identified with Nietzsche's call for a new « Joyful Knowledge » .

Few would agree with such exalted claims for Wolf's Opera. But perhaps, the references to Nietzsche's « Gaya Scienza » might help us appreciate the significance of the Italian song-book which Wolf composed before and after « Der Corregidor » . Even compared with the Spanish songs, the length of each song is much reduced, and the poet's glance is redirected to the smallest and most incidental details ; the turn of a woman's head, a word idly dropped into conversation. These details become magnified, but they also hold their place in the ordinary things of life. Musically, Wolf builds his patterns out of ornamental details of rhythm or harmony that seem almost too transient to sustain the forms that grow out of them. Whilst the patterns capture our imagination they often leave little impression behind. One is reminded of the words in the last of Wolf's 3 « Michel-Angelo Lieder » , the final song he was to write. The poet feels a glimmer of light in his soul even though he cannot grasp where it has come from, and he asks if it is just a passing sound or dream. The answer of the final verse might seem disappointing ; it is the light that comes from gazing into his beloved's eyes. Wolf leaves us with another trifle, not a philosophical statement on the nature of eternity. However, by drawing our attention to the power of the present moment the composer captures one of the glories of song, and reveals once more how it can take us into the most elusive realms of human experience.

Think turn of the 20th Century Vienna. Think the last flowering of Habsburg Imperial certainties. Then, think of the darker, doomed currents surging just beneath its surface. Now, think artistic creativity. Think music, and the chances are, a Century on, that the 1st person you think of is Gustav Mahler.

And there, in a nutshell, we have Hugo Wolf's problem. The living Mahler was Hugo Wolf's nemesis when they both inhabited the fiercely competitive artistic world of « fin de siècle » Vienna. And the dead Mahler still haunts Wolf's reputation now, days before the Centenary of Wolf's own death. While Mahler's extraordinary Symphonies fill the largest halls, Wolf's no less extraordinary songs still belong mainly to the connoisseur.

Almost none of this was, or is, Mahler's fault. But Mahler and Wolf made the same career, at the same time, in the same place. Their lives intersected at many key moments and their reputations have danced in a kind of extended counterpoint ever since. But it is Mahler who won the prizes, then and now. And that, then and now, is Wolf's tragedy.

Gustav Mahler and Hugo Wolf were almost exact contemporaries, born just 4 months apart, in 1860. They came from similar modest social backgrounds in the provinces of the Austrian Empire : Mahler's in Bohemia, Wolf's in Styria. Artistically, their lives were both formed by the influence of Richard Wagner.

Their early careers marched in lock-step. Both arrived in Vienna in 1875 and enrolled in the Vienna Conservatory at the precocious age of 15. Both studied harmony in the same class. Mahler lasted longer than the always impatient and disrespectful Wolf but, even after Wolf's expulsion in 1877, the 2 remained close.

By 1879, Mahler and Wolf were sharing a garret, along with Mahler's friend Rudolf Krzyzanowski, in a Classic Viennese « la Bohême » existence. They wrote their earliest music in one another's company. They scabbled pennies from teaching to attend the Opera together. Mahler and Wolf are even said to have shared a bed, though there is no suggestion of a sexual relationship. But it was probably at around this time that Wolf contracted the syphilis that was eventually to kill him.

Within a year, though, Mahler and Wolf drifted apart. Mahler left Vienna to pursue his conducting career. Wolf stayed, turning to music criticism for a living. Away from one another, the 2 each matured as composers. But it was Wolf's songs, rather than Mahler's orchestral works, that were 1st to win critical acclaim, both in Vienna and beyond.

Indeed, by the time Mahler returned to Vienna, in 1897, to take-up the most prestigious post in Viennese music, director of the Court Opera, Wolf was probably the better known composer. But Wolf's composing career was already at an end. His last completed songs date from March 1897, and, although he continued to work on his unfinished Opera « Manuel Venegas » , his body and mind were on the verge of collapse. And it was Mahler who triggered it.

Gustav Mahler's appointment to the Opera had fired Hugo Wolf's hopes that his Opera « Der Corregidor » would now at last receive a performance of which Wolf was convinced it was worthy. He went to see Mahler to press his case. Their meetings were friendly. Mahler showed some interest, though whether it was as much interest as Wolf immediately assumed is unclear.

What is clear, though, is that Wolf's visit to Mahler in his office at the Opera, in May 1897, was the breaking point for Wolf's sanity. Seeing the score of Anton Rubinstein's Opera « The Demon » on Mahler's desk, Wolf became angry. He denounced Rubinstein's work. Mahler responded with some critical comments about « Der Corregidor » , and expressed doubts about whether it would be performed in Vienna. This argument was, as Wolf's biographer Frank Walker calls it, « the spark that had kindled a conflagration in his brain and brought on the long threatened insanity » .

Hugo Wolf began to tell people in his circle that he, not Mahler, had been appointed as director of the Vienna Opera. The delusion rapidly became obsessive. Some stories have Wolf standing on the « Ringstraße » proclaiming himself the rightful director to passing pedestrians. On one occasion, Wolf gathered his friends together and walked at high-speed to the house of the singer Hermann Winkelmann, ordering Winkelmann to come and rehearse « Manuel Venegas » . The next day, playing his new Opera to his friends at the piano, Wolf announced that he would fire both Mahler and Winkelmann.

By the end of the year, Hugo Wolf was in an asylum. A brief respite in 1898 (during which he visited Trieste, where, for the 1st and only time in his life, he saw the sea) proved illusory. In October that year, he tried to drown himself and was found huddled and soaking in a nearby wood. Wolf was returned to an asylum in the Vienna suburbs. His memory began to fail. His delusions grew worse. In early 1900, he began to suffer severe paralysis. After a long series of terrible illnesses and great suffering, he died on February 22, 1903, a victim of what the Victorians called : « the wound that will never heal » .

Hugo Wolf's death was one of the most protracted, miserable and bitter in the history of music. But, even in the poignancy of his death, Wolf has been transcended by Gustav Mahler. To the 20th Century, it is Mahler's incurable illness (the cancer from which he died in Vienna, in 1911) that has become the emblem of Viennese corruption and decline, the stuff of legend, of sentiment and of the big screen treatment.

It is, of course, a false rivalry. But it is historically important, if nothing else, to realise that what we tend to think of as Gustav Mahler's Vienna can, in a very real sense, be more truly described as Hugo Wolf's Vienna. Wolf was the archetype. If you are looking for a great doomed Viennese composer, a great dark emotional spirit, a man living-out his life in the shadow of the disease that would kill him in a world that would outlive him only by a handful of years, then Wolf is just as much your man as Mahler.

Hugo Wolf's death certainly spoke powerfully to the Vienna of his time. In a move that would have surprised but pleased him, he was allocated a so-called « grave of honour » in Vienna's central cemetery, only yards away from Ludwig van Beethoven and Franz Schubert. Streets were named after him. Memorial tablets were unveiled to him. Wolf's death also triggered an immense outburst of performances of his music. Even « Der Corregidor » was widely performed for a while. Most significantly of all, singers began to include his work regularly in their recitals. In the year of his death, Wolf's surviving relatives were able to sell the copyright on his music to Peters for 260,000 Marks, a considerable sum.

If Hugo Wolf lives on somewhat in Mahler's shadow today, this is perhaps in part because the form that he made his own (the song) no longer occupies the central place in music-making that it did in Wolf's own lifetime and in the pre-1914 Germanic cultural tradition. Today, audiences prefer big statements, cathartic effects and emotional exhibitionism. Thanks to the stereo, they can now accommodate such displays in their own living rooms, in their cars, and even in their headsets.

Yet, it would be the greatest insult of all to Hugo Wolf to imagine, because he was a minituarist and not a big-canvas man, that he was anything less than a completely intense artist. No one, not Frédéric Chopin, not Anton Webern, put more into such small forms as he did. « Auch kleine Dinge » (also little things, as the 1st line of the 1st song of the Italian Song Book puts it) can express the rigorous truths that Wolf saw as the great principle of his art. You can be as wrung-out and haunted by a performance of a song like « Ganymed » as you can by a performance of « Das Lied von der Erde » . In the 1930's, Walter Legge tried to capture Wolf's work on disc, prompting his wife Elisabeth Schwarzkopf to call him « the best thing that ever happened to Hugo Wolf » ; though some would say that she deserved that accolade. « The 1st and last requisite in the performance of Wolf » , wrote Legge, « is vividness of imagination, freedom from the silly delusion that music is a gentlemanly calling, complete lack of our natural racial inhibition about the fear of showing one's emotions in public. Wolf was a man who suffered. For the interpreter then to do justice to Wolf he must cast off the shackles of repression and live in an intellectual and emotional world, keener, more alive, more vital, more impassioned than his everyday life. He must transplant himself into a new world and a new world for every song. » .

Wolf, Hugo (Filipp Jakob) (born in Windischgraz, 1860 ; died in Vienna, 1903) . Austrian composer. Taught rudiments of music by his father, a leather-dealer. Entered Vienna Conservatory in 1875 (fellow-pupil of Gustav Mahler) . Expelled in 1877 (unjustly) and made bare living by teaching. Performed as 2nd conductor (répétiteur) at Salzburg Theatre in 1881, but gave-up after 3 months. Music critic in Vienna from 1883 to 1887, making enemies by his fanatical praise of Wagner and dislike of Brahms. From 1888, when he discovered the poetry of Mörike, poured out dozens of songs, including the Spanish Songbook, in which the art of the Lied reached one of its most sophisticated and intricately-wrought stages, with the piano part no longer simple accessory but an integral part of the song. The concentrated characterization of each song is unequalled in Lieder, demanding the utmost artistry from the performers, psychological as well as vocal and instrumental. For 3 years, from 1892 to 1894, Wolf wrote nothing except the orchestral arrangement of the Italian Serenade, but his fame gradually spread and in Berlin a « Hugo Wolf Society » was founded. Even Vienna began to capitulate, late in 1894. In 1895, he wrote an Opera based on « The 3 Cornered Hat » which he called « Der Corregidor » . In the spring of 1896, he wrote the 24 songs of the Italian Songbook (Volume II) . In 1897, he began his Michel-Angelo settings and a 2nd opera, « Manuel Venegas » . But in the autumn, his mind gave way, the outcome of venereal disease, and he was taken to an asylum. Though he seemed to be « cured » in 1898, he tried to drown himself in October of that year and spent his last years insane in a mental hospital.

Principal Works :

Operas : « Der Corregidor » (1895) ; « Manuel Venegas » (1897, incomplete) .

Orchestral : « Penthesilea » , Symphonic poem (1883) ; « Italienische Serenade » (1892, Orchestral Work based on String Quartet, composed in 1887) .

Chamber music : String Quartet in D minor (1879-1880) ; Serenade in G for String Quartet (1887 ; arrangement for String Orchestra in 1892 as « Italienische Serenade » , Italian Serenade) .

Choral : 6 « Eichendorff Lieder » , unaccessible (1881) ; « Christ-Nacht » for soloists, choir and orchestra (1886-1889) ; « Elfenlied » (You spotted snakes, from « A Midsummer Night's Dream ») for soprano, choir and orchestra (circa 1890, arrangement from song for voice and piano, 1888, but not same as « Elfenlied » in « Mörike-Lieder ») ; « Der Feuerreiter » (The Fire Rider : Mörike song from 1888, arrangement for choir and orchestra, 1892) ; « Dem Vaterland » (song for voice and piano from 1888, arrangement for male choir and orchestra, 1888-1891) .

Songs : (mostly with piano accompaniment, but some with orchestra) : 12 « Lieder aus der Jugendzeit » (1877-1878) ; 6 Songs for Woman's Voice ; 6 Poems of Scheffel, Mörike, Goethe, and Kerner ; 4 Poems of Heine, Shakespeare, and Byron ; 6 Poems by Gottfried Keller ; 3 Ibsen Songs ; 3 Poems by Reinick (1877-1887) ; 53 « Mörike-Lieder » (1888) ;

20 « Eichendorff-Lieder » (1880-1888) ; 51 « Gœthe-Lieder » (including « Mignon Lieder ») (1888-1889) ; « Spanisches Liederbuch » (44 songs) (1889-1890) ; « Italienisches Liederbuch » ,Volume I (22 songs) (1890-1891) ; « Italienisches Liederbuch » ,Volume II (24 songs) (1896) ; 3 Poems by Michel-Angelo (1897) . Among the best-loved Wolf songs (selectively chosen) are : « An die Geliebte » ; « Abschied » ; « Anakreons Grab » ; « Begegnung » ; « Denk es, O Seele » ; « Einsame » ; « Elfenlied » ; « Der Feuerreiter » ; « Gebet » ; « Gesang Weylas » ; « Heimweh » ; « Im Frühling » ; « In dem Schatten meiner Locken » ; « Jägerlied » ; « Kennst du das Land ? » ; « Lebewohl » ; « Schlafendes Jesuskind » ; « Der Tambour » ; « Verborgenheit » ; « Das verlassene Mägdlein » .

The South of Europe possessed an almost mystical fascination for Hugo Wolf, representing directness, primal passion, and Nietzsche's call to « Mediterraneanize music » . The largely anonymous folk verse of Spain and Italy, translated by Paul Heyse and Emanuel Geibel, served as a Mediterranean focus in the Spanish and Italian song-books, whose composition occupied him from 1889 to 1891, and, again, in 1896 for the 2nd half of the Italian Songbook. Given that so many of those songs are richly compact of character and situation, it was inevitable that Wolf (making slow headway with his lieder in winning recognition as a composer) would wish to leap to fame at once by exploring the world of the songs in the extended form of an Opera. Finding a suitable libretto became a bedevilment, but the scenes Wolf wished to project seemed to him implicit in the works of Spanish writer Pedro de Alarcón (1833-1891) . Wolf pressed a friend, the modestly talented amateur Rosa Mayreder, to adapt Alarcón's novel The « 3 Cornered Hat » and, overlooking her libretto's weaknesses, composed « Der Corregidor » at white heat in 1895. Its production in Mannheim, the following year, produced only a « succès d'estime » , but lured Wolf to attempt to surpass himself. With the Italienisches Liederbuch completed, he pressed Mayreder to adapt Alarcón's « El Niño de la bola » . Her attempts proving unsatisfactory, friends introduced Wolf to Moritz Hörnes, a history professor at Vienna University, whose quickly worked adaptation was surprisingly able. Wolf was ecstatic, declaring, « Shakespeare himself could not have formed the subject matter more dramatically and at the same time poetically than Hörnes has done, and that's that ! » . On July 29, 1897, Wolf set to work feverishly composing « Manuel Venegas » . Despite interruptions, the Opera's opening began to take shape as Wolf's swings from manic gaiety to irascibility became more pronounced. In mid-September, his boast that he had been appointed director of the Vienna Court Opera, and had sacked the current director, Gustav Mahler, signaled the onset of madness. Inviting his friends to hear his new Opera and congratulate him, on September 20, he played through the 50 completed pages of vocal score, blissful, raving, and wholly insane, as his friends clustered around him in stunned misery (a scene famously adapted by Thomas Mann in his novel « Doktor Faustus » (1947) . Wolf's polished fragment introduces characters and motifs without reaching the great dramatic moments that had tempted him, though the opening Spring Chorus is one of the freshest, most evocative, and inspired in his entire œuvre.

Wolf is buried in the Zentralfriedhof (Central Cemetery) in Vienna, along with many other notable composers.

Wolf's greatest musical influence was Richard Wagner, who, in an encounter after Wolf 1st came to the Vienna

Conservatory, encouraged the young composer to persist in composing and to attempt larger scale works, cementing Wolf's desire to emulate his musical idol. His antipathy to Johannes Brahms was fueled equally by his devotion to Wagner's musical radicalism and his loathing of Brahms' musical conservatism.

He is best-known by his lieder, his temperament and inclination leading him to more intimate, subjective and terse musical utterances. Although, he initially believed that mastering the larger forms was the hallmark of a great composer (a belief his early mentors reinforced), the smaller scale of the art song proved to provide an ideal creative outlet for his musical expression and came to be regarded as the genre best suited to his peculiar genius. Wolf's lieder are noted for compressing expansive musical ideas and depth of feeling, fed by his skill at finding the just right musical setting for the poetry that inspired him. Though, Wolf himself was obsessed with the idea that to compose only short forms was to be 2nd rate, his organization of lyrics of particular poets (Goethe; Mörike; Eichendorff; Heyse & von Geibel in the Spanish and Italian song-books) into semi cyclical anthologies, finding connections between texts not explicitly intended by the poets he set and his conceptions of individual songs as dramatic works in miniature, mark him as a talented dramatist despite having written only one not particularly successful opera, Der Corregidor.

Early in his career, Wolf modelled his lieder after those of Franz Schubert and Robert Schumann, particularly in the period around his relationship with Vally Franck; in fact, they were good enough imitations to pass off as the real thing, which he once attempted, though his cover was blown too soon. It is speculated that his choice of lieder texts in the earlier years, largely dealing with sin and anguish, were partly influenced by his contraction of syphilis. His love for Vally, not fully requited, inspired highly-chromatic and philosophical lieder that could be regarded as successors to Wagner's Wesendonck Lieder cycle. Others were as distant from those in mood as possible; light hearted and humorous. The rarely heard symphonic poem Penthesilea is tempestuous and highly-coloured as well. Although Wolf admired Liszt, who had encouraged him to complete the work, he felt Liszt's own music too dry and academic and strove for colour and passion.

1888 marked a turning point in his style as well as his career, with the Mörike, Eichendorff and Goethe sets drawing him away from Franz Schubert's simpler, more diatonic lyricism and into "Wölferl's own howl". Mörike, in particular, drew out and complemented Wolf's musical gifts, the variety of subjects suiting Wolf's tailoring of music to text, his dark sense of humor matching Wolf's own, his insight and imagery demanding a wider variety of compositional techniques and command of text painting to portray. In his later works, he relied less on the text to give him his musical framework and more on his pure musical ideas themselves; the later Spanish and Italian songs reflect this move toward "absolute music".

Wolf wrote hundreds of lieder, 3 operas, incidental music, choral music, as well as some rarely heard orchestral, chamber and piano music. His most famous instrumental piece is the Italian Serenade (1887), originally for string quartet and later transcribed for orchestra, which marked the beginning of his mature style.

Wolf was famous for his use of tonality to reinforce meaning. Concentrating on 2 tonal areas to musically depict ambiguity and conflict in the text became a hallmark of his style, resolving only when appropriate to the meaning of the song. His chosen texts were often full of anguish and inability to find resolution, and thus so too was the tonality wandering, unable to return to the home key. Use of deceptive cadences, chromaticism, dissonance, and chromatic mediant obscure the harmonic destination for as long as the psychological tension is sustained. His formal structure as well reflected the texts being set, and he wrote almost none of the straight forward strophic songs favoured by his contemporaries, instead building the form around the nature of the work.

The composer Hugo Wolf brought the 19th Century German lied, or art song, to its highest point of development.

Wolf studied at the Vienna Conservatory (1875-1877) but had a moody and irascible temperament and was expelled from the Conservatory following his outspoken criticism of his Masters. In 1875, he met the composer Richard Wagner, from whom he received encouragement. He met Johannes Brahms in 1879, and, from him, also he received encouragement and the urging to broaden his musical focus and his career. He was also a friend of Gustav Mahler as a young man. In the late- 1870's, Wolf apparently contracted the syphilis that was to cripple and kill him. In the repeated relapses of the disease, Wolf would enter deep depressions and was unable to compose, but, during remissions, he was radiant and highly-inspired. In 1883, Wolf became music-critic of the « Wiener Salonblatt » ; his weekly reviews provide considerable insight into the Viennese musical world of his day.

His early songs include settings of poems by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Nikolaus Lenau, Heinrich Heine, and Joseph von Eichendorff. In 1883, he began his Symphonic poem « Penthesilea » , based on the tragedy by Heinrich von Kleist. From 1888 onward, he composed a vast number of songs on poems of Goethe, Eduard Friedrich Mörike, and others. The « Spanisches Liederbuch » (Spanish Songbook) , on poems of Paul Johann Ludwig von Heyse and Emanuel von Geibel, appeared in 1891, followed by the « Italienisches Liederbuch » (part 1, 1892 ; part 2, 1896) . Other song cycles were on poems of Henrik Ibsen and Michelangelo. His 1st Opera, « Der Corregidor » (1895 ; composed on a story by Pedro Antonio de Alarcón) , was a failure when it was produced at Mannheim in 1896 ; a revised version was produced at Strasbourg, in 1898. His 2nd opera, « Manuel Venegas » , also after Alarcón, remained unfinished.

Hugo Wolf's reputation as a song composer resulted in the formation in his lifetime of Wolf Societies in Berlin and Vienna. Yet, the meagre income he derived from his work compelled him to rely on the generosity of his friends. In 1897, ostensibly following upon a rebuke from Gustav Mahler but actually on account of growing signs of insanity and general paresis, he was confined to a mental home. He was temporarily discharged in 1898, but, soon afterward, he unsuccessfully attempted to commit suicide, and, in October 1898, he requested to be placed in an asylum in Vienna.

Hugo Wolf wrote about 300 songs, many published posthumously. Of his 1st 100 (from his early years) , he only counted a handful worthwhile. But his output in the mature years was supremely original, in the finest tradition of the German lied. Wolf excelled at creating vocal melodic lines that express every emotional nuance of a given poetic text. The atmosphere of his songs ranges from tender love lyrics to satirical humour to deeply felt spiritual suffering. The vocal melodic line is subtly combined with strikingly original harmonies in the piano accompaniment, resulting in Wolf's remarkable fusion of music and speech. His instrumental works were more interesting for their underlying ideas than for their execution ; they included the Italian Serenade for orchestra (1892 ; a transcription of the serenade for string quartet of 1887) .

The Hugo Wolf Society of Vienna (« Hugo Wolf-Verein Wien ») began on the collecting and systematic sorting of Hugo Wolf's unpublished works as early as 1900. Most of the works were in print by 1905, though the publishers in some instances made incisive changes in accordance with the spirit of the time. Some works, such as the Intermezzo, the « Scherzo and Finale » , and most of the youthful composer's songs, were not considered worthy of publication.

In 1933, the « Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (IBG) founded the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » for the express purpose of publishing the Bruckner Complete Edition. Under the general editorship of Robert Haas, plans were also made for a Hugo Wolf complete edition ; « Penthesilea » was given its 1st critical edition, and the « Scherzo and Finale » and numerous early songs were published for the 1st time. The War, however, prevented further progress towards a complete edition.

The Hugo Wolf Complete Edition (1956-1998)

1956 saw the foundation of the « Internationale Hugo Wolf Gesellschaft, Wien » (International Hugo Wolf Society, Vienna) with the principal aim of « publishing and disseminating the critical complete edition of the works of Hugo Wolf in the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna. Hans Jancik was appointed General Editor. 1960, the 100th anniversary year of the composer's birth, was marked with the publication of the chamber music works (W XV) ; in the years that followed, Hans Jancik published volume after volume of further works. The realization of the complete edition has been considerably facilitated by the fact of the majority of Wolf manuscripts being held in Viennese collections, with only a small (and increasingly small) percentage being in collections outside Vienna or owned privately. In 1991, the 85 year old Hans Jancik passed on the General Editorship to Leopold Spitzer. Spitzer produced the still outstanding volumes, notably the score, vocal score, libretto and critical report of « Der Corregidor » , and incorporated critical reports into the earlier volumes of the Complete Edition. In 1998, with the publication of the orchestral fragments (« Fragmente für Orchester W XVII/3 ») , he was able to bring the Complete Edition to a provisional conclusion.

The qualification « provisional » is necessary because it has (not for lack of effort) not proved possible to find the manuscripts either of Wolf's « Fantasy on Lortzing's Czar und Zimmermann » or of the « Walzerfinale aus Hans Heiling » (both for piano solo) . Wolf sketches do furthermore occasionally turn-up in antiquarian and auction catalogues, so that a supplementary volume of paralipomena maybe published a number of years hence. Given, however, that this matter only affects peripheral items, the Hugo Wolf Critical Complete Edition may rightly be claimed to have reached its completion.

Chronology of the Hugo Wolf Complete Edition

La Société Hugo Wolf

The solid middle-class edifice opposite the « Donnerbrunnen » fountain, in Vienna, came into the possession of the violin virtuoso and composer, Josef Mayseder (1789-1863) , in 1848. His son-in-law, Alexander Köchert, would open a jeweler's shop there, in 1851, which still exists. Köchert's services as a goldsmith were much in demand. He created, for example, the « Iffland Ring » and a baton for Richard Strauß ; while leading his own quartet as a musician. His sons Heinrich (1854-1908) and Theodor (1859-1937) continued the professional and musical traditions set by their father. Both were benefactors of Hugo Wolf and Theodor became President of the Viennese Concert House Society. Heinrich Köchert wed Melanie Lang, in 1878. Their daughter, Hilde, would marry the son of uncle Paul Wittgenstein, Doctor Karl Paul Wittgenstein. They would separate in 1927 but she would continue to live in the house of her father-in-law, at « Salesianergasse » 7. Melanie's younger sister, Henriette, would marry into the family of Baron von Schey, in the 1880's.

Theodor Köchert's 1st wife was Marie Lang (1858-1934) , whom Rosa Mayreder would introduce to the circle around the Association of Austrian Women, the leading organization of middle-class feminists in « Old Vienna » . She would become a committed member of that illustrious group, which included such figures as Auguste von Littrow-Bischoff, Auguste Fickert and Marianne Hainisch. From 1899 to 1903, she would edit its publication « Womens' Documents » . Like her 2nd husband, Edmund Lang (who was the brother-in-law of Theodor Köchert) , a close friend of Hermann Bahr ; Peter Altenberg ; Friedrich Eckstein ; Rudolf Steiner ; Stefan Großmann, Egon Friedell ; as well as Adolf and Lina Loos. Her commitment on behalf of the middle-class women's movement (which differed from working-class feminism with respect to crucial issue of work, the « bourgeois » ladies hoping to escape gilded confinement in their palais, their proletarian counter-parts seeking to have the curse of badly paid, long hours of toil lifted from them) , as well as her friendship with people in that circle, ceased upon the suicide of her eldest son, in 1904, at the age of 19. He had taken his life on account of an unfortunate attachment to Lina Loos. We find the tragic event recorded in Hugo von Hofmannsthal's notebooks and it figures centrally in Arthur Schnitzler's mini-drama, « The Word ».

Marie Lang's 2nd son, Erwin, was a painter and friend of Heimito von Doderer. Her daughter-in-law was the famous dancer, Grete Wiesenthal.

All of the Langs and the Köcherts had already, for decades, collectively adopted the composer Hugo Wolf (1860-1903) , who commemorated them in the 1st of the 24 songs to poems by Paul Heyse in his 2nd book of Italian songs, « I no longer eat my bread dry. » .

The composer was always a welcome guest at the Köcherts' : on « Neuer Markt » , in their Döbling home at No. 68 « Billrothstraße » (« Hirschengasse ») , at their country homes in Rinnbach or Traunkirchen. He withdrew to the « Hôtel Bellevue » , in Grinzing, with the Langs, Eckstein and Mayreder in the summer. Sigmund Freud, whose patient Emma Eckstein was, would completely interpret a dream here for the 1st time, on the 24th of July 1895. Edmund Lang's study at No. 9 « Belvederegasse » would regularly be Wolf's place of lodging. His continually changing apartments in the 4th district's « Mühlgasse » , « Schleifmühlgasse » , « Mozartgasse » , « Wiedner Hauptstraße » , and « Schwindgasse » would be provided and paid for by the Lang and Köchert families. He also obtained his position as music-critic for the « Wiener Salonblatt » through the influence of the Köcherts, who were influential advertisers. The whole of Hugo Wolf's life's work, his songs to texts by Mörike, Eichendorff and Goethe, his Italian and Spanish Songbooks, his Michelangelo Poems, none of them would have been possible without the benefaction of Heinrich and Melanie Köchert. He dedicated the manuscripts of his songs to her. She stood by his side some 20 years long, as his biographer, Erik Werba, reports. She nursed him in the clinic and, then, brought the patient on leave from the hospital to Italy to recuperate. She was there when he attempted suicide at the Traunsee and she ended-up visiting him, 3 times a week, in the insane asylum. She, herself, committed suicide 3 years after his death.

Hugo Wolf's patrons also included Sigmund Freud's collaborator, Josef Breuer, Friedrich Eckstein, Adalbert von Goldschmidt, the civil servant, who would later himself become a typographer, Rudolf von Larisch, the conductor Ferdinand Löwe, the musician Natalie Bauer-Lechner and the ethnologist Michæl Haberlandt. He did not spare them his German-nationalist mouthings, to which they only luke-warmly responded. Wolf had warmly endorsed Richard Wagner's fanatical campaigns against Jews, Johannes Brahms and eating meat. Anti-semitism was stock-in-trade :

« What should one say, when one has been deprived of Wagner's Operas for a whole month and Meyerbeer is played 3 times a week ? Are we in Palestine or in a German city ? » , he once cried.

So, it would be that that the Wagner Society, the Wolf Society and the Styrian « Tonkünstler » Society would appear at his burial at the side of Haberlandt. Yet, according to Erik Werba, in the year of his death, interest in Wolf on the part of music-lovers seemed to be on the rise. He seemed to be accepted into the pantheon of German-Styrian musical heroes with streets named after him and plaques heaped upon his honour. His family would receive some 260,000 Marks for the rights to his works. In the course of the « aryanization » of objects of cultural value parts of Hugo Wolf's Estate was incorporated into the municipal collections, in 1939. In March 1940, the Nazi municipal administration would plan a memorial to the composer and organize a large Hugo Wolf exhibition.

L'élève Hans Rott

1875 to 1879 : Hans Rott had been a member of the Viennese Academic Wagner Society.

Le compositeur autrichien Hans Rott est né le 1er août 1858 dans le 15e arrondissement de Vienne et est mort le 25 juin 1884 dans un asile d'aliénés. Musicien méconnu souvent comparé à Anton Bruckner et Gustav Mahler, son existence tragique autant que sa belle Symphonie en mi majeur ne peuvent manquer d'impressionner.

Hans Rott est issu de l'union entre Karl-Matthias Rott et la chanteuse et comédienne Maria-Rosalie Lutz. Au cours de sa scolarité (malgré n'avoir reçu aucune aide financière) , il révèle des dispositions musicales qui le conduisent à s'inscrire au Conservatoire de Vienne de 1874 à 1877. Il y étudie notamment l'harmonie avec Hermann Graedener ; le contrepoint et la composition avec Franz Krenn (tout comme son confrère Gustav Mahler) ; le piano avec Leopold Landskron et Josef Dachs ; et l'orgue (aux côtés de Franz Schmidt.) avec le célèbre compositeur Anton Bruckner qui l'estime beaucoup. Pendant ses études musicales au Conservatoire de Vienne, Rott partagera brièvement une chambre aux côtés de ses collègues Gustav Mahler et de Rudolf Krzyzanowski.

Au Conservatoire, Hans Rott compose intensément. De 1878 à 1880, il écrit une Symphonie en mi majeur qui impressionne par sa Maîtrise orchestrale et ses qualités mélodiques autant que par ses citations wagnériennes à peine dissimulées. Il décide de soumettre le 1er mouvement lors d'un concours de composition. L'ensemble du jury est fort ironique devant l'œuvre sauf pour le professeur Bruckner qui encourage son élève.

Parce que son élève préféré Hans Rott était soumis aux critiques malveillantes du jury, Anton Bruckner décidera de mettre son pied à terre.

Carl Hrubý relate l'événement du mois de juillet 1878 qui s'est déroulé au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») : « À la fin, un rire méprisant a été entendu en provenance de la chaise du " Merker " (porte-drapeau) , oh pardon, du président des " examinateurs " . C'est à ce moment que l'habituellement timide Bruckner se leva d'un coup et cria des mots enflammés aux « Merkers » (porte-drapeaux) situés loin devant lui : " Messieurs, ne riez pas de cet homme de qui vous entendrez encore de grandes choses ! » .

L'œuvre soumise par Hans Rott qui a provoqué le mépris de ces « Messieurs » n'est pas mentionnée dans le compte-rendu de Hrubý. Il s'agissait probablement du 1er mouvement de la Symphonie en mi majeur du jeune compositeur : une œuvre qui, plus d'un siècle après avoir été écrite, a connu une renaissance inattendue. C'est à ce moment que le grand public fera la découverte dans les années 1980 d'un certain « Rott » .

Une profonde amitié s'installera entre le noble professeur Bruckner et son talentueux élève Rott. Lors des concerts symphoniques, le Maître de Saint-Florian préférera aller se placer debout à ses côtés, derrière, dans la section populaire, que de se retrouver seul, assis à sa place d'honneur.

Un jour, Hans Rott va interrompre la rédaction d'une lettre adressée à son condisciple du Conservatoire, Rudolf Krzyzanowski. Il fera mention dans la lettre que Bruckner était venu frapper à sa porte pour exprimer sa consternation de ne pas le voir plus souvent à la brasserie local. (Helmut Kreysing, 1998.)

Hans Rott échoue à faire jouer la Symphonie en mi majeur par le chef Hans Richter. Il va ensuite la présenter au jugement de Johannes Brahms, Eduard Hanslick et Karl Goldmark afin de pouvoir bénéficier d'une bourse d'État. Nouvel échec. Brahms n'a pas aimé le fait que son rival Bruckner a exercé une grande influence sur les élèves du Conservatoire : il voit dans la Symphonie autant de « belles choses que d'éléments banals ou dépourvus de sens » . Il va dire à Rott qu'il n'a aucun talent et qu'il devrait plutôt renoncer à la musique. C'est le même Brahms qui traitera les Symphonies de Bruckner de « Boa constricteurs Symphoniques ! » et « d'escroquerie qui sera oubliée dans 1 ou 2 années » .

En 1877, il reçoit son diplôme de la classe d'orgue avec tous les honneurs. Durant cette période, Hans Rott était également organiste de l'église paroissiale « Maria Treu » à Vienne. Anton Bruckner déclare que Rott est un très bon interprète de Jean-Sébastien Bach et qu'il improvise à merveille. Tout un compliment provenant du plus grand des improvisateurs de son temps. Outre l'influence de Bruckner, Hans Rott découvre l'œuvre de Richard Wagner lors du Festival inaugural de Bayreuth, tenu au mois d'août 1876.

Les démarches de Hans Rott pour l'obtention d'un poste d'organiste aux monastères de Saint-Florian (1878) et de Klosterneuburg se sont avérées vaines ; il en sera de même pour l'église Saint-Michel et l'église Votive de Vienne. Son professeur Anton Bruckner va tenter de lui venir en aide en rédigeant des lettres de recommandation.

L'une d'entre elles se trouve aujourd'hui à la Fondation Hans Rott :

« Le signataire de cette lettre considère que ce fut un grande joie d'avoir fait la rencontre, au cours de ses études au Conservatoire, de Hans Rott en tant que Disciple de l'art. Son immense talent, sa diligence, son caractère pur et, dernier mais non le moindre, sa prestation comme musicien, en particulier à l'orgue, donnent lieu aux plus grands espoirs. » (Anton Bruckner)

Rott prend un nouveau départ ; malheureusement, le fragile compositeur ne possédait pas la force de caractère de son collègue Gustav Mahler. Les 2 collègues du Conservatoire avaient eu une dispute homérique sur la question de savoir s'il fallait manger du rôti (Rott) ou se contenter de fromage (Mahler) lorsque l'on composait. Mais leur estime réciproque n'en fut nullement affectée.

Rott a en vue un emploi de directeur de la musique ou de chef de chœur d'une chorale à Mulhouse, en Alsace, mais il ne veut pas renoncer à faire jouer sa Symphonie. Le 14 octobre, il joue son œuvre devant le chef Hans Richter. Le 21, ses amis l'accompagnent au train de Mulhouse. Lors d'un arrêt à Linz, il entend des coups frappés aux murs de sa chambre. Le 22 ou le 23, il continue son voyage. Sa santé mentale se détériore rapidement. Dans le train, un voyageur s'apprête à allumer son cigare, Rott dégaine son revolver et menace l'homme parce qu'il craint que Brahms n'ait rempli le train de dynamite !

Le 23 octobre, Rott est emmené à la clinique psychiatrique de l'Hôpital général de Vienne, « dans un état de confusion totale » : « folie hallucinatoire » et « délire de persécution », selon le diagnostic des médecins. Son destin est scellé. Les grands espoirs et les attentes de ses amis, collègues et professeurs sont devenus graduellement « une affaire du passé ». Au mois de février 1881, après une 1^{re} tentative de suicide, il est transféré à l'asile d'aliénés du « Land » de Basse-Autriche. Rott va continuer à composer à l'intérieur des murs.

Rott, à qui l'on demandait s'il se souvenait de Gustav Mahler, répondit : « Certainement, certainement, Mahler est un génie. » (Citation d'après les notes de son ami, Joseph Seemüller.)

Plus tard, il développera progressivement une profonde dépression qui l'amènera à détruire certaines de ses compositions dont le Sextuor à cordes. Le 25 juin 1884, après plusieurs tentatives de suicide, Hans Rott (n'ayant pas encore atteint l'âge de 26 ans), décède de la tuberculose ou d'un cancer des poumons (son acte de décès mentionne : « Lungenkrank », maladie des poumons) .

Les funérailles de Hans Rott eurent lieu, le 28 juin 1884, à la « Zentralfriedhof » de Vienne (groupe n° 23 ; rangée n° 2 ; lot n° 59) . Son Maître bien-aimé, Anton Bruckner, arriva tôt et passa beaucoup de temps, seul, auprès du cercueil de son protégé. L'on vit Bruckner pleurer amèrement lors de l'enterrement. Il déclarera sans détour que le traitement cruel et déplacé de Brahms envers ce talent prometteur, déjà suffisamment isolé, était en grande partie responsable de la tragédie.

L'ami de Hans Rott, Friedrich Löhr (le père de la publiciste Maja Löhr) se verra forcer de faire un véritable exercice d'équilibre dans ses commentaires :

« Je crois que Brahms a fait cette réprimande au " débutant " , qui commençait par la mise en œuvre des plus grands moyens d'expression de son art, dans une louable intention pédagogique ; il ne pouvait rien faire d'autre à partir des expériences et des convictions que lui avaient forgées son évolution artistique et son être propre et je crois qu'il a commis là une véritable injustice artistique. Mais à ce moment là, c'était peu avant le début de la maladie, il n'était plus possible de sauver Rott, il avait succombé à son terrible destin : sa maladie, provoquée par de tout autres facteurs psychiques et émotionnels, se préparait déjà depuis longtemps. » (Friedrich Löhr, « Die Musik » , 1903-1904.)

malgré le jugement négatif de Johannes Brahms.)

Seulement une partie de la prophétie d'Anton Bruckner va se réaliser de son vivant. Comme étudiant du Conservatoire, Hans Rott avait réussi à gagner la reconnaissance d'Anton Bruckner comme compositeur et, au cours de ses Ires années à Vienne, l'admiration d'un petit mais très sélect groupe d'amis auquel appartenait Gustav Mahler et Rudolf Krzyzanowski.

Pendant près de 100 ans, le nom et l'œuvre de Hans Rott tombent dans l'oubli, avant la redécouverte de la Symphonie en mi majeur dans les archives de la Bibliothèque nationale autrichienne à la fin des années 1980.

À propos de Rott, Gustav Mahler aurait déclaré à Nathalie Bauer-Lechner :

« Ce que la musique a perdu avec lui est incommensurable : son génie s'envole tellement haut, déjà dans sa Ire Symphonie, qu'il a écrite lorsqu'il était un jeune homme de 20 ans et qui fait de lui (le mot n'est pas trop fort) le fondateur de la Symphonie nouvelle, comme je la comprends. Mais ce qu'il voulait n'est pas encore atteint véritablement. C'est comme si quelqu'un lançait quelque chose de toutes ses forces mais, parce qu'il est encore maladroit, n'atteint pas vraiment son but. Mais je sais où il voulait arriver. Oui, il est si proche de ce qui m'est le plus personnel que lui et moi apparaissons comme 2 fruits du même arbre, issus du même sol, nourris du même air. J'aurais pu retirer énormément de lui et peut-être aurions nous, ensemble, d'une certaine manière exploité à fond le contenu de ces temps nouveaux qui étaient en train d'éclorre pour la musique. » (« Mémoires » de Nathalie Bauer-Lechner.)

...

À la fin des années 1980, le musicologue Paul W. Banks découvrait, dans les archives de la Bibliothèque nationale autrichienne, la partition de la Symphonie en mi majeur de Hans Rott. Il donna à l'œuvre l'aspect requis pour une interprétation et s'employa à la présenter au public. Il rendit ainsi un incontestable service au monde de la musique en faisant surgir des tréfonds de l'histoire une œuvre digne d'intérêt, qui méritait à tout le moins d'être entendue par les passionnés de musique Romantique.

Mais les réactions des cercles d'experts furent étonnantes. Cette œuvre, révélatrice d'un talent certain, écrite par un compositeur qui avait alors 20 ans, suscita l'émerveillement général. Il était manifeste que l'on venait enfin de découvrir la poule qui avait pondu l'œuf de Colomb. Subitement, le jeune Hans Rott était sacré père de la Symphonie nouvelle et le grand Gustav Mahler, le contemporain de l'avenir, le pionnier de la musique moderne, était démasqué comme un plagiaire qui s'était servi sans scrupules de l'œuvre de son compagnon de collège, de 2 ans son aîné. Dans cette logique, on alla jusqu'à prétendre qu'il fallait ré-écrire toute l'histoire de la musique.

Les années ont passé. Les vagues se sont apaisées. Quelques esprits éclairés se sont sans doute souvenus que « Das klagende Lied » (le Chant plaintif) n'était pas plus jeune mais au moins contemporain, voire un peu plus ancien que la Symphonie de Rott qui avait déclenché ce bel enthousiasme, et qu'il comprenait beaucoup plus d'éléments indiscutablement « mahlériens » . On en est donc arrivé à se dire qu'il serait temps de réparer les dégâts causés par une euphorie passagère en ayant une vision des choses à la fois plus circonspecte et plus globale.

Nous disposons maintenant d'un matériel suffisant : à côté de nombreux articles, 2 livres ont été publiés sur le phénomène Hans Rott. Nous retiendrons surtout la compilation éditée par Uwe Harten, publiée en 2000, qui comprend une biographie, des lettres, des notes et des documents provenant de la succession de Maja Löhr (1888-1964) . Cet ouvrage est particulièrement intéressant parce qu'il présente des faits, qu'il ne tombe pas dans le piège de conclusions hâtives et parfois incorrectes et qu'il nous permet également de pénétrer derrière les murs de l'asile de fous du « Land » de Basse-Autriche, où le malheureux Hans Rott devait passer le reste d'une vie qui avait commencé sous des auspices, certes chaotiques, mais néanmoins favorables.

Hans Rott est né le 1er août 1858 dans le 15e district (« Bezirk ») de Vienne. Il était le fils du comédien Carl Mathias Rott (Roth) et de la chanteuse et comédienne Maria Rosalia Lutz. Le mariage de ses parents ne put avoir lieu qu'après le décès de la 1re épouse de son père, en 1860. Ce mariage fut célébré en octobre 1862. Entre-temps, la famille s'était agrandie d'un autre fils, Karl, né le 20 décembre 1860 et qui fut inscrit aux registres comme fils naturel du grand-duc Wilhelm. Ce nonobstant, papa Rott reconnut les 2 demi-frères comme fils légitimes. Au début de l'année 1863, les 4 membres de la famille portèrent enfin le même patronyme.

La scolarité de Hans Rott suivit la voie traditionnelle. La situation financière était satisfaisante et il n'y avait aucune raison pour ne pas encourager des dispositions musicales précoces. Au cours du semestre d'hiver 1874-1875, Hans s'inscrivit au Conservatoire de musique de Vienne où il fut bientôt exempté des frais de scolarité pendant toute une année. Ensuite, il obtiendra une bourse. Il étudia l'harmonie avec Hermann Grädener et le piano avec Leopold Landskron. Il suivit également les cours d'orgue d'Anton Bruckner, qui l'estimait beaucoup et qui lui délivrera un certificat élogieux en 1880.

Entre-temps, la situation familiale s'était fortement détériorée. Sa mère mourut en 1872 et, en avril 1875, son père fut victime d'un accident sur scène qui l'empêcha de poursuivre ses activités de comédien. Il décéda des suites de cet accident, en février 1876. Hans Rott dut travailler temporairement comme employé de bureau. Malgré cette situation difficile, il put continuer ses études, reçut 2 Prix d'honneur du Conservatoire et obtint un emploi plus conforme à sa nature, celui d'organiste du « Josefstädter Kirchenmusikverein » , assorti d'un logement gratuit.

Pendant ce temps, le catalogue de ses œuvres ne cessait de s'enrichir. Le 1er grand produit de l'époque du Conservatoire fut une Symphonie en la bémol majeur pour orchestre à cordes (1874-1875) , suivie d'un Finale Symphonique, d'une Overture d'Hamlet, d'une Overture de « Julius Cæsar » et d'une Suite pour orchestre. En outre, Rott écrivit des partitions pour chœurs sacrés et profanes ainsi que quelques lieder. Il composa les débuts d'un Oratorio. En novembre 1878, il demanda à être relevé de ses fonctions d'organiste, qu'il quitta muni d'une recommandation détaillée. Il s'attela alors au remaniement de sa Symphonie en mi majeur, dont il avait présenté le 1er mouvement au Concours de composition du Conservatoire, en juillet de la même année. Malgré la recommandation d'Anton Bruckner, Hans Rott, seul élève à terminer les cours, n'obtiendra aucun prix. Pourtant, son diplôme atteste qu'il a terminé avec grand fruit les « cours de l'école de composition » .

Les années 1879-1980 sont marquées par de petits voyages, des excursions, un « grand amour » (le seul et unique de sa vie) et l'achèvement de la Symphonie. Le « Pastorales Vorspiel » (Prologue pastoral) commencé en 1877 est terminé. Une 2e Symphonie voit le jour. Il écrit un Sextuor pour cordes (I) . Au début septembre, Hans Rott tente vainement de convaincre le chef Hans Richter de faire interpréter sa Ire Symphonie. 2 semaines plus tard, il rend visite à Johannes Brahms qui doit décider, avec Eduard Hanslick et Karl Goldmark, de l'attribution d'une bourse d'État. Brahms doute que la Symphonie soit de Rott, car « à côté de tant de belles choses, il y a à nouveau tellement d'éléments banals ou dépourvus de sens dans la composition que celle-ci ne peut certainement pas être de la main de Rott » . Rott prend un nouveau départ. Il a en vue un emploi de directeur de la musique ou de chef de chœur d'une chorale à Mulhouse, en Alsace, mais il ne veut pas renoncer à faire jouer sa Symphonie. Le 14 octobre, il joue son œuvre devant Hans Richter. Le 21, ses amis l'accompagnent au train de Mulhouse. Lors d'un arrêt à Linz, il entend des coups frappés aux murs de sa chambre. Le 22 ou le 23, il continue son voyage. Dans le train, un voyageur s'apprête à allumer son cigare, Rott dégaine son revolver et menace l'homme parce qu'il craint que Brahms n'ait rempli le train de dynamite ! Le 23 octobre, il est emmené à la clinique psychiatrique de l'Hôpital général de Vienne, « dans un état de confusion totale » . Son destin est scellé. Au début de l'année 1881, après une Ire tentative de suicide, il est interné à l'asile de fous du « Land » de Basse-Autriche où il meurt, le 25 juin 1884. Il n'avait pas encore 26 ans.

À la décharge du personnel soignant, il faut reconnaître que Hans Rott a « tenu » relativement longtemps dans cette institution. Robert Schumann n'avait survécu que 2 ans et 5 mois à Ethenich et le séjour de Friedrich Hölderlin à la clinique « Autenrieth » de Tübingen aurait certainement été encore plus bref s'il n'avait pas été transporté à temps dans la demeure du menuisier Zimmer. Qui aurait voulu porter le masque d' « Autenrieth » , qui devait empêcher les pensionnaires de crier et qui, selon les descriptions, ressemblait à s'y méprendre à la muselière d'Hannibal Lecter (2) ? Qui, sinon un psychopathe, pourrait supporter, ne fût-ce qu'un jour, cet instrument inhumain ?

Il me semble nécessaire de faire un bref retour en arrière pour bien se rendre compte de l'état des connaissances en psychiatrie dans les années 1880. « La classification des maladies mentales n'est jusqu'à présent pas à faire sur une base anatomique » , lisons-nous dans l'Encyclopédie la plus moderne de cette époque. À la même entrée, nous apprenons encore que par « maladies mentales » , il faut entendre ces maladies qui se manifestent par « des dérangements dans le domaine des impressions sensorielles, de l'imagination, de la volonté ou des actes » . Tous les modèles s'accordent à dire que « les hallucinations, la folie et le délire de la persécution » sont fondamentalement incurables, tandis que la psychiatrie se laisse qualifier (sans rougir) de « médecine de l'âme » . Tout écart par rapport à la norme, même le simple fait de se sentir une vocation, peut être diagnostiqué comme maladif et être traité, en conséquence, par des « barrages » . Tout surmenage du cerveau, toute excitation intense de l'esprit et du cœur doivent être évités, par contre, il faut être particulièrement attentif à la formation et à l'exercice des forces corporelles : il faut toujours, autant que possible, travailler sur les circonstances extérieures les plus simples, les plus ordonnées, « tenir les excitations passionnées à l'écart, habituer à la soumission aux circonstances objectives données » .

Les extraits ci-dessus, qui ressemblent à une caricature, sont tirés de la 4e édition du « Meyers' Konversations » (lexique) , qui fut mis sur le marché 4 ans après le départ de Hans Rott pour un autre monde. Nous y trouvons les principes de traitement d'une clique qui (impermeable à toute connaissance pratique) a depuis toujours licence de maintenir le statu quo, de veiller à « la soumission à des circonstances objectives données », qu'il s'agisse de sociaux-démocrates ou d'artistes « atteints de la folie des grandeurs ». Le goulag était partout. (3)

Ceci ne veut évidemment pas dire qu'il faille considérer comme « normal » le comportement de quelqu'un qui tente d'empêcher un fumeur de goûter à son plaisir en le menaçant d'une arme. Mais le manque de discernement qui caractérise la corporation des « plombiers de l'âme », comme ils se définissent eux-mêmes, est manifeste dans le cas du malheureux Hans Rott. Que se serait-il passé si quelques amis avaient emmené le compositeur, profondément désorienté, en Styrie, dans le « Salzkammergut », par exemple ; s'ils avaient mis à sa disposition un piano, une pile de papier de musique, quelques stères de bois et une hache, pour lui donner la possibilité de se livrer à des activités intellectuelles et physiques dans un environnement paisible ? Mais non, entouré de malades mentaux, véritables et imaginaires, il n'avait plus qu'à « devenir cinglé », comme Robert Schumann avant lui.

La situation de Rott est effrayante pour 2 raisons : d'abord, la complaisance avec laquelle la littérature a colporté les soi-disant diagnostics et ensuite, la suffisance de ceux qui ont posé ces diagnostics en ne s'intéressant qu'aux symptômes, jamais à ce qui a pu les déclencher. Pourtant, ceci serait vraiment intéressant. Comment se fait-il que nous retrouvions le nom de Johannes Brahms associé aussi bien à Robert Schumann qu'à Hans Rott et à Hugo Wolf ? Est-ce seulement un hasard biographique ? Anton Bruckner était probablement d'un autre avis, lui qui, devant le cercueil de son élève préféré Rott, fit à son concurrent local, Brahms, de tels reproches que l'ami de Rott, Friedrich Löhr (le père de la publiciste Maja Löhr, évoquée ci-dessus) s'est vu forcé de faire un véritable exercice d'équilibre dans ses commentaires :

Mais cette périlleuse tentative d'explication devait rester sans lendemain. D'une part, Löhr n'en dit pas plus sur ces « tout autres facteurs » et, d'autre part, il n'a pas tenu compte de l'environnement. Cet environnement dans lequel un Heinrich von Herzogenberg s'est débattu pendant des années pour tenter d'être reconnu ; dans lequel un Max Bruch devait s'entendre demander d'où il tenait une si jolie partition et duquel une Ethel Smyth (à la personnalité nettement plus coriace que Hans Rott ou Robert Schumann) n'a pas brossé un tableau particulièrement flatteur. N'oublions pas le chef Hans Richter, l'ami de Johannes Brahms, qui a complètement dénigré le poème symphonique « Penthesilée » du condisciple Hugo Wolf, parce que celui-ci, dans sa jeunesse, avait osé critiquer le grand Brahms !

Notre propos n'est pas de chercher la petite bête en ce qui concerne Brahms, ses œuvres sont là. Mais force est de constater que Wolf et Rott, tout comme Gustav Mahler, étaient des élèves d'Anton Bruckner et qu'ils n'entraient pas dans le droit fil d'un Classicisme qui acquiesçait au maintien du « statu quo ». En tout état de cause, on pourrait se rallier à l'hypothèse élégante que toute cette affaire n'est rien d'autre que la perpétuation d'une méprise, en d'autres termes, que Brahms n'a pas compris le sens des banalités qui abondent dans la partition symphonique de Rott. Nous aurions ainsi trouvé une porte de sortie acceptable, qui permettrait également de prendre l'œuvre de Mahler à témoin : combien de temps a-t-il fallu avant que les substances disparates de ses œuvres soient reconnues pour ce qu'elles sont réellement - des parties de ces mondes que, selon sa vision, les Symphonies devaient être ?

Il y a quelques décennies encore, beaucoup d'observateurs achoppaient là où soufflent les belles trompettes, là où « Frère Jacques » chemine dans la marche funèbre et où le « Coucou » est mort en tombant, car ils étaient partis pour apprendre à la banalité à marcher droit. Le devoir de la citation, de l'allusion, de la « silhouette » thématique, avec laquelle on ne fait que pressentir ce qui pourrait apparaître derrière les contours - tout cela restait aussi voilé au regard des sévères gardiens de l'ordre que l'apport le plus important de Robert Schumann, que l'on peut qualifier sans exagération de père de la composition musico-littéraire. Celui qui n'est pas à même d'entendre dans le 1er thème du Concerto pour piano les paroles de Florestan, « In des Lebens Frühlingstagen », de suivre les multiples transformations de la construction rythmique presque obsessionnelle à travers toute l'œuvre ou, au moins, de reconnaître « la Marseillaise » dans le Carnaval de Vienne, aura bien du mal avec la plus grande partie du répertoire Romantique tardif, que ce soit Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky, Gustav Mahler, Hans Rott, ou même Johannes Brahms. Celui-ci aurait été idiot de ne pas reconnaître immédiatement le miroir que le jeune élève de son rival lui tendait le 16 ou le 17 septembre 1880 : une carte du monde symphonique au 19e siècle, sur laquelle lui aussi, le Viennois d'élection originaire du nord de l'Allemagne, figurait, parmi beaucoup d'autres « Grands » du passé et du présent.

Il est vrai que Hans Rott, avec ses avances « inconvenantes », avait introduit le loup dans la bergerie et, dans sa remarquable naïveté, marché sur les pieds de quelqu'un qui n'aimait vraiment pas cela : comme on le verra à propos du Finale de la Symphonie. Dans sa recherche d'une musique universelle, il n'avait visiblement pas réfléchi à ce dans quoi il s'embarquait. Chercher, dans une même composition, à réconcilier les antipodes viennois, Brahms et Bruckner, et y glisser quelques pierres d'achoppement comme Richard Wagner et Robert Schumann ne pouvait être ressenti que comme une manifestation de sa « folie des grandeurs » .

Mettons-nous à la place d'un auditeur de l'époque et essayons d'imaginer ce qu'il a ressenti lorsqu'il a entendu dans le 1er mouvement les « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » ou lorsque l'emploi intensif du triangle a irrésistiblement évoqué la Symphonie du printemps, sans parler des réminiscences de « Lohengrin » ou de « l'Or du Rhin », que Brahms, « l'anti-Wagner n° 1 », n'aurait pas pu ignorer. Le 2e mouvement ne lui rend pas la vie plus facile avec l'apparition d'un motif Schumannien récurrent, qui était clairement associé à « Clara » et que Brahms connaissait d'ailleurs parfaitement (voir le début de sa 3e Symphonie) . Hans Rott ne se contente pas d'une unique citation, non, il répète le motif quelques minutes plus tard pour être certain que « n'importe quel imbécile » l'entende ; certainement sans savoir quelle corde sensible il touchait ainsi.

Et dans le Finale, il se surpasse ! Après avoir passé en revue les événements précédents, tout à fait dans le sens de la 5e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner, il choisit (intentionnellement ?) une mélodie à tout le moins provocatrice : la proximité avec le thème du Finale de la 1re Symphonie de Johannes Brahms est tellement évidente que l'expert a peut-être même dû croire qu'on se payait sa tête. Les répétitions n'ont pas dû arranger les choses, et lorsque le compositeur fait finalement entrer Brahms avec les dieux dans le « Walhalla », aucun doute sur sa santé mentale n'est plus permis : Hans Rott avait succombé à la folie primaire dont sont atteints surtout les jeunes individus de 17 à 25 ans ou chez les plus âgés, les femmes entre 40 et 50 ans.

Aux yeux de Gustav Mahler, le condisciple de Rott, les choses se présentent tout autrement. Les 2 étudiants avaient eu une dispute homérique sur la question de savoir s'il fallait manger du rôti (Rott) ou se contenter de fromage (Mahler) lorsque l'on composait. Mais leur estime réciproque n'en fut nullement affectée. À l'asile d'aliénés, Rott, à qui l'on demandait s'il se souvenait de Mahler, répondit : « Certainement, certainement, Mahler est un génie. » (Citation d'après les notes de son ami, Joseph Seemüller.) Et Mahler devait dire : « Ce que la musique a perdu avec lui est incommensurable : son génie s'envole tellement haut, déjà dans sa 1^{re} Symphonie, qu'il a écrite lorsqu'il était un jeune homme de 20 ans et qui fait de lui (le mot n'est pas trop fort) le fondateur de la Symphonie nouvelle, comme je la comprends. Mais ce qu'il voulait n'est pas encore atteint véritablement. C'est comme si quelqu'un lançait quelque chose de toutes ses forces mais, parce qu'il est encore maladroit, n'atteint pas vraiment son but. Mais je sais où il voulait arriver. Oui, il est si proche de ce qui m'est le plus personnel que lui et moi apparaissions comme 2 fruits du même arbre, issus du même sol, nourris du même air. J'aurais pu retirer énormément de lui et peut-être aurions-nous, ensemble, d'une certaine manière exploité à fond le contenu de ces temps nouveaux qui étaient en train d'éclorre pour la musique. » (Gustav Mahler, dans les « Mémoires » de Nathalie Bauer-Lechner.)

Nous savons que Gustav Mahler a découvert très tôt la Symphonie en mi majeur. Joseph Seemüller annonça à son pauvre ami Rott, à qui il rendait visite le soir de Noël de l'année 1882, que son ancien condisciple avait récemment joué son œuvre en cercle privé. Quelle influence cette partition a-t-elle eu sur la propre évolution de Mahler, quel rôle a-t-elle joué dans son œuvre symphonique ? Une remise en question globale de l'histoire de la musique n'est certainement pas la réponse. Il serait beaucoup plus profitable de se mettre d'accord sur les rapports que l'on veut rechercher. Le sens indiscutable de la citation et de l'allusion, chez l'un comme chez l'autre, est un signe fondamental de cette parenté intellectuelle soulignée par Mahler. Des éléments comme l'appel des cors dans le 2^e mouvement de la Symphonie en mi majeur indiquent un lien plus étroit, tout comme le début du mouvement conclusif, dans lequel se prépare sans contrainte « le monde intermédiaire » du Finale de la Symphonie dite « Résurrection » avec son chant d'oiseau et « le Crieur dans le désert ». La liberté d'utilisation des formes traditionnelles est commune aux 2 compositeurs. Toutefois, Rott structure sa Symphonie en une progression temporelle, la durée d'exécution des mouvements augmente de façon continue jusqu'au poème symphonique final, qui dure 20 minutes et fait basculer le déroulement dans l'incommensurable : ce genre de conception très concrète ne se retrouve pas chez Mahler. Pourtant, chez l'un comme chez l'autre, le symbole du « statu quo » se disloque et nous ne pouvons nous empêcher de penser à cet aphorisme ambivalent de Robert Schumann, d'après lequel la forme est le récipient de l'esprit. Le conservatisme interprétera cette phrase au sens où la créativité doit se fondre dans la cruche d'argile pré-fabriquée, mais l'esprit qui va de l'avant soit se façonne ses propres récipients, pour les remplir ensuite, soit les crée au fur et à mesure qu'il progresse. C'est ainsi que Schumann a pu écrire son Carnaval ou sa Fantaisie, qui, d'un point de vue formel, n'est rien d'autre qu'une immense « Sonate au clair de lune » au déroulement inversé, en 3 poèmes symphoniques. Ainsi, Gustav Mahler a pu aller jusqu'à retourner l'intérieur vers l'extérieur dans sa 9^e Symphonie, et Hans Rott a écrit son chef-d'œuvre quasi en forme de spirale. (4)

Si le Scherzo qui vient en 3^e lieu n'a jusqu'ici pas été touché, c'est qu'il y avait une bonne raison. Car ici, le compositeur « au rôti » et le compositeur « au fromage » s'y rencontrent d'une façon tellement intime que l'on pourrait se laisser aller à supposer que Mahler a « refilé » à son « pote » non seulement quelques idées mais un tas de partitions travaillées. Il a intégré celles-ci dans le Scherzo de sa propre Ire Symphonie, après que Rott, pour les raisons évoquées ci-dessus, n'en ait plus eu besoin.

Évidemment, les choses sont allées tout autrement. Le 3e mouvement de la Symphonie en mi majeur est antérieur de quelque 8 années à son pendant mahlérien et, sans le moindre doute, son con-sanguin. Au-delà des concordances souvent quasi-littérales, il serait bien plus intéressant de se demander pourquoi Mahler fait suivre son Scherzo « à la Rott » d'une marche funèbre et pourquoi aussi l'éclat du 3e mouvement de la 2e Symphonie emprunte les « mots » de Rott. Le plus grand Maître de la citation raffinée (après Schumann) aurait-il érigé un monument au « Titan » pour le faire participer ensuite à la « Résurrection » ? N'oublions pas que ses partitions ne sont pas moins riches en relations que les romans du pionnier Arno Schmidt. Il faut toujours supposer que les apparences sont trompeuses. Qui, jusqu'à aujourd'hui, aurait découvert ce que la Ire sonate des Centone de Paganini avait à faire au début de la 5e Symphonie ? Pourquoi la Sonate dit « la Tempête » de Beethoven et l'Ouverture « Manfred » de Schumann déboulent-elles dans le 1er mouvement de la 6e ou pourquoi le 1er mouvement de la 3e commence-t-il par le lied « Ich hab' mich ergeben », qui se présente comme une silhouette du 1er thème du Finale de la 1e Symphonie de Johannes Brahms ?

Celui qui vise une « Symphonie universelle » doit foncer - et ne rien exclure. Ce principe prétendument si naïf ouvre les portes à la Symphonie nouvelle. Un univers rempli de musique, de signes et de concepts s'ouvre ; tout entre en relation avec tout, devient comme un « jeu des perles de verre » ; mais la décision sur la primauté de la poule par rapport à l'œuf devient subitement hors de propos. Inopinément, le temps et l'espace se retrouvent côte à côte, rien ne les relie (comment se fait-il que Mahler ait emporté la 3e Symphonie de Charles Ives dans ses bagages pour son dernier voyage vers le Vieux-Monde ? C'est maintenant que cela devient intéressant, sans que l'on ait besoin de s'abriter derrière la conception du temps comme perpétuelle simultanéité (« Kugelgestalt der Zeit ») d'un Bernd Alois Zimmermann.

Contrairement à la Symphonie en mi majeur, le « Pastorales Vorspiel » (1877-1880) de Hans Rott a été surestimé. On perçoit bien dans la partition quelques éléments « mahlériens » mais l'œuvre, dans son ensemble, nous entraîne dans une autre direction : le fugato semble l'œuvre de l'école contrapuntique d'Anton Bruckner et il serait particulièrement risqué d'interpréter cette fugue comme une fuite devant l'orage que Ludwig van Beethoven, dans sa « Pastorale », fait éclater au-dessus de la « réunion joyeuse et intime des paysans ». Si on le veut vraiment, on trouvera vers la fin de cette belle peinture d'atmosphère une préfiguration du compositeur Max Reger. Mais celui-ci était, du moins en paroles, davantage tourné vers Johannes Brahms, c'est pourquoi on ne devrait pas donner trop de poids à cette anticipation. On risquerait ainsi de masquer le fait qu'un des grands talents du 19e siècle a été broyé par les meules du « statu quo » et que Hans Rott a payé de sa vie et de sa créativité des allégations de « folie des grandeurs » et de « délire de la persécution ».

Ses œuvres sont toutes composées pendant les années de formation au Conservatoire :

Symphonie en la bémol majeur pour orchestre à cordes (1874-1875) .

3 Préludes.

Suite pour orchestre.

Quatuor à cordes.

Symphonie en mi majeur (1878-1880) .

Basée sur d'imposants chorals brucknériens, cette Symphonie possède un souffle et une emphase qui l'ont fait comparer à la Ire Symphonie de Gustav Mahler (notamment son 3e mouvement) , pourtant postérieure.

Les interprétations très différentes de Dennis Russell Davies avec l'Orchestre de la Radio de Vienne (solennel) et Sebastian Weigle avec l'Orchestre de la Radio de Munich (dynamique) sont toutes 2 recommandables.

À la fin des années 1980, le musicologue Paul W. Banks découvrait, dans les archives de la Bibliothèque nationale autrichienne, la partition de la Symphonie en mi majeur de Hans Rott. Il donna à l'œuvre l'aspect requis pour une interprétation et s'employa à la présenter au public. Il rendit ainsi un incontestable service au monde de la musique en faisant surgir des tréfonds de l'histoire une œuvre digne d'intérêt, qui méritait à tout le moins d'être entendue par les passionnés de musique Romantique.

Mais les réactions des cercles d'experts furent étonnantes. Cette œuvre, révélatrice d'un talent certain, écrite par un compositeur qui avait alors 20 ans, suscita l'émerveillement général. Il était manifeste que l'on venait enfin de découvrir la poule qui avait pondu l'œuf de Colomb. Subitement, le jeune Hans Rott était sacré père de la Symphonie nouvelle et le grand Gustav Mahler, le contemporain de l'avenir, le pionnier de la musique moderne, était démasqué comme un plagiaire qui s'était servi sans scrupules de l'œuvre de son compagnon de collège, de 2 ans son aîné. Dans cette logique, on alla jusqu'à prétendre qu'il fallait ré-écrire toute l'histoire de la musique.

Les années ont passé. Les vagues se sont apaisées. Quelques esprits éclairés se sont sans doute souvenus que « Das klagende Lied » (le Chant de la plainte) n'était pas plus jeune mais au moins contemporain, voire un peu plus ancien que la Symphonie de Rott qui avait déclenché ce bel enthousiasme, et qu'il comprenait beaucoup plus d'éléments indiscutablement « mahlériens ». On en est donc arrivé à se dire qu'il serait temps de réparer les dégâts causés par une euphorie passagère en ayant une vision des choses à la fois plus circonspecte et plus globale.

Nous disposons maintenant d'un matériel suffisant : à côté de nombreux articles, 2 livres ont été publiés sur le phénomène Hans Rott. Nous retiendrons surtout la compilation éditée par Uwe Harten, publiée en 2000, qui comprend une biographie, des lettres, des notes et des documents provenant de la succession de Maja Loehr (1888-1964). Cet ouvrage est particulièrement intéressant parce qu'il présente des faits, qu'il ne tombe pas dans le piège de conclusions hâtives et parfois incorrectes et qu'il nous permet également de pénétrer derrière les murs de l'asile de fous du « Land » de Basse-Autriche, où le malheureux Hans Rott devait passer le reste d'une vie qui avait commencé sous des auspices certes chaotiques mais néanmoins favorables.

Hans Rott est né le 1er août 1858 dans le 15^e district (Bezirk) de Vienne. Il était le fils du comédien Carl Mathias Rott (Roth) et de la chanteuse et comédienne Maria Rosalia Lutz. Le mariage de ses parents ne put avoir lieu qu'après le décès de la 1^{re} épouse de son père, en 1860. Ce mariage fut célébré en octobre 1862. Entre-temps, la famille s'était agrandie d'un autre fils, Karl, né le 20 décembre 1860 et qui fut inscrit aux registres comme fils naturel du grand-duc Wilhelm. Ce nonobstant, papa Rott reconnut les 2 demi-frères comme fils légitimes. Au début de l'année 1863, les 4 membres de la famille portèrent enfin le même patronyme.

La scolarité de Hans Rott suivit la voie traditionnelle. La situation financière était satisfaisante et il n'y avait aucune raison pour ne pas encourager des dispositions musicales précoces. Au cours du semestre d'hiver 1874-1875, Hans s'inscrivit au Conservatoire de musique de Vienne où il fut bientôt exempté des frais de scolarité pendant toute une année. Ensuite, il obtiendra une bourse. Il étudia l'harmonie avec Hermann Grädener et le piano avec Leopold Landskron. Il suivit également les cours d'orgue d'Anton Bruckner, qui l'estimait beaucoup et qui lui délivrera un certificat élogieux en 1880.

Entre-temps, la situation familiale s'était fortement détériorée. Sa mère mourut en 1872 et, en avril 1875, son père fut victime d'un accident sur scène qui l'empêcha de poursuivre ses activités de comédien. Il décéda des suites de cet accident, en février 1876. Hans Rott dut travailler temporairement comme employé de bureau. Malgré cette situation difficile, il put continuer ses études, reçut 2 prix d'honneur du Conservatoire et obtint un emploi plus conforme à sa nature, celui d'organiste du « Josefstädter Kirchenmusikverein » , assorti d'un logement gratuit.

Pendant ce temps, le catalogue de ses œuvres ne cessait de s'enrichir. Le 1er grand produit de l'époque du Conservatoire fut une Symphonie en la bémol majeur pour orchestre à cordes (1874-1875) , suivie d'un Finale symphonique, d'une Overture sur « Hamlet » , d'une Overture sur « Julius Cäsar » et d'une Suite pour orchestre. En outre, Rott écrivit des partitions pour chœurs sacrés et profanes ainsi que quelques lieder. Il composa les débuts d'un Oratorio. En novembre 1878, il demanda à être relevé de ses fonctions d'organiste, qu'il quitta muni d'une recommandation détaillée. Il s'attela alors au remaniement de sa Symphonie en mi majeur, dont il avait présenté le 1er mouvement au concours de composition du Conservatoire, en juillet de la même année - malgré la recommandation d'Anton Bruckner, Rott, seul élève à terminer les cours, n'obtiendra aucun prix. Pourtant, son diplôme atteste qu'il a terminé avec grand fruit les « cours de l'école de composition » .

Les années 1879-1880 sont marquées par de petits voyages, des excursions, un « grand amour » (le seul et unique de sa vie) et l'achèvement de la Symphonie. Le « Pastorales Vorspiel » (Prologue pastoral) , commencé en 1877, est terminé. Une 2e Symphonie voit le jour. Il écrit un Sextuor pour cordes (1) . Au début septembre, Hans Rott tente vainement de convaincre Hans Richter de faire interpréter sa 1re Symphonie. 2 semaines plus tard, il rend visite à Johannes Brahms qui doit décider, avec Eduard Hanslick et Karl Goldmark, de l'attribution d'une bourse d'État. Brahms doute que la Symphonie soit de Rott, car « à côté de tant de belles choses, il y a à nouveau tellement d'éléments banals ou dépourvus de sens dans la composition que celle-ci ne peut certainement pas être de la main de Rott » . Rott prend un nouveau départ. Il a en vue un emploi de directeur de la musique ou de chef de chœur d'une chorale à Mulhouse, en Alsace, mais il ne veut pas renoncer à faire jouer sa Symphonie. Le 14 octobre, il joue son œuvre devant Hans Richter. Le 21, ses amis l'accompagnent au train de Mulhouse. Lors d'un arrêt à Linz, il entend des coups frappés aux murs de sa chambre. Le 22 ou le 23, il continue son voyage. Dans le train, un voyageur s'apprête à allumer son cigare, Rott dégaine son revolver et menace l'homme parce qu'il craint que Brahms n'ait rempli le train de dynamite. Le 23 octobre, il est emmené à la clinique psychiatrique de l'Hôpital général de Vienne, « dans un état de confusion totale » . Son destin est scellé. Au début de l'année 1881, après une 1re tentative de suicide, il est interné à l'asile de fous du « Land » de Basse-Autriche où il meurt, le 25 juin 1884. Il n'avait pas encore 26 ans.

À la décharge du personnel soignant, il faut reconnaître que Hans Rott a « tenu » relativement longtemps dans cette institution. Robert Schumann n'avait survécu que 2 ans et 5 mois à Enderich et le séjour de Friedrich Hölderlin à la clinique « Autenrieth » de Tübingen aurait certainement été encore plus bref s'il n'avait pas été transporté à temps dans la demeure du menuisier Zimmer. Qui aurait voulu porter le masque d'Autenrieth, qui devait empêcher les pensionnaires de crier et qui, selon les descriptions, ressemblait à s'y méprendre à la muselière d'Hannibal Lecter (2) ? Qui, sinon un psychopathe, pourrait supporter, ne fût-ce qu'un jour, cet instrument inhumain ?

Il me semble nécessaire de faire un bref retour en arrière pour bien se rendre compte de l'état des connaissances en psychiatrie dans les années 1880. « La classification des maladies mentales n'est, jusqu'à présent, pas à faire sur une base anatomique » , lisons-nous dans l'Encyclopédie la plus moderne de cette époque. À la même entrée, nous apprenons encore que par « maladies mentales, il faut entendre ces maladies qui se manifestent par des dérangements dans le domaine des impressions sensorielles, de l'imagination, de la volonté ou des actes » . Tous les modèles s'accordent à dire que « les hallucinations, la folie et le délire de la persécution » sont fondamentalement incurables, tandis que la psychiatrie se laisse qualifier (sans rougir) de « médecine de l'âme ». Tout écart par rapport à la norme, même le simple fait de se sentir une vocation, peut être diagnostiqué comme maladif et être traité, en conséquence, par des « barrages ». « Tout surmenage du cerveau, toute excitation intense de l'esprit et du cœur doivent être évités, par contre, il faut être particulièrement attentif à la formation et à l'exercice des forces corporelles : il faut toujours, autant que possible, travailler sur les circonstances extérieures les plus simples, les plus ordonnées, tenir les excitations passionnées à l'écart, habituer à la soumission aux circonstances objectives données » .

Les extraits ci-dessus, qui ressemblent à une caricature, sont tirés de la 4e édition par Joseph Meyers du « Konversations - Lexikon », qui fut mis sur le marché 4 ans après le départ de Hans Rott pour un autre monde. Nous y trouvons les principes de traitement d'une clique qui (imperméable à toute connaissance pratique) a depuis toujours licence de maintenir le statu quo, de veiller à « la soumission à des circonstances objectives données », qu'il s'agisse de Sociaux-Démocrates ou d'artistes « atteints de la folie des grandeurs ». Le goulag était partout (3) .

(Le « Meyers Konversations-Lexikon » est un très important ouvrage encyclopédique en langue allemande traitant de tous les sujets et qui, aux XIXe et XXe siècles. Il a fait l'objet de plusieurs éditions dues au « Bibliographisches Institut ». Son nom vient de son fondateur, Joseph Meyer. Depuis 1986, l'édition est assurée par l'Encyclopédie Brockhaus après la fusion en 1984 de « Brockhaus-Verlag » et du « Bibliographisches Institut » en « Bibliographisches Institut & Friedrich Arnold Brockhaus » .)

Ceci ne veut évidemment pas dire qu'il faille considérer comme « normal » le comportement de quelqu'un qui tente d'empêcher un fumeur de goûter à son plaisir en le menaçant d'une arme. Mais le manque de discernement qui caractérise la corporation des « plombiers de l'âme », comme ils se définissent eux-mêmes, est manifeste dans le cas du malheureux Hans Rott. Que se serait-il passé si quelques amis avaient emmené le compositeur, profondément désorienté, en Styrie, dans le Salzkammergut, par exemple ; s'ils avaient mis à sa disposition un piano, une pile de papier de musique, quelques stères de bois et une hache, pour lui donner la possibilité de se livrer à des activités intellectuelles et physiques dans un environnement paisible ? Mais non, entouré de malades mentaux, véritables et imaginaires, il n'avait plus qu'à « devenir cinglé », comme Robert Schumann avant lui.

La situation de Rott est effrayante pour 2 raisons : d'abord, la complaisance avec laquelle la littérature a colporté les soi-disant diagnostics et ensuite, la suffisance de ceux qui ont posé ces diagnostics en ne s'intéressant qu'aux symptômes, jamais à ce qui a pu les déclencher. Pourtant, ceci serait vraiment intéressant. Comment se fait-il que nous retrouvions le nom de Brahms associé aussi bien à Robert Schumann qu'à Hans Rott et à Hugo Wolf ? Est-ce seulement un hasard biographique ? Anton Bruckner était probablement d'un autre avis, lui qui, devant le cercueil de son élève préféré Rott, fit à son concurrent local, Brahms, de tels reproches que l'ami de Rott, Friedrich Loehr (le père de la publiciste Maja Loehr évoquée ci-dessus) s'est vu forcé de faire un véritable exercice d'équilibre dans ses commentaires :

expériences et des convictions que lui avaient forgées son évolution artistique et son être propre et je crois qu'il a commis là une véritable injustice artistique. Mais à ce moment là, c'était peu avant le début de la maladie, il n'était plus possible de sauver Rott, il avait succombé à son terrible destin : sa maladie, provoquée par de tout autres facteurs psychiques et émotionnels, se préparait déjà depuis longtemps. » (Friedrich Loehr, « Die Musik », 1903-1904.)

Mais cette périlleuse tentative d'explication devait rester sans lendemain. D'une part, Loehr n'en dit pas plus sur ces « tout autres facteurs » et, d'autre part, il n'a pas tenu compte de l'environnement. Cet environnement dans lequel un Heinrich von Herzogenberg s'est débattu pendant des années pour tenter d'être reconnu ; dans lequel un Max Bruch devait s'entendre demander d'où il tenait une si jolie partition et duquel une Ethel Smyth (à la personnalité nettement plus coriace que Rott ou Schumann) n'a pas brossé un tableau particulièrement flatteur. N'oublions pas Hans Richter, l'ami de Brahms, qui a complètement dénigré le poème symphonique « Penthesilea » de Hugo Wolf, parce que celui-ci, dans sa jeunesse, avait osé critiquer le grand Brahms !

Notre propos n'est pas de chercher la petite bête en ce qui concerne Brahms, ses œuvres sont là. Mais force est de constater que Wolf et Rott étaient des élèves d'Anton Bruckner (tout comme Gustav Mahler qui était un de ses disciples) et qu'ils n'entraient pas dans le droit fil d'un Classicisme qui flirtait avec le maintien du statu quo. En tout état de cause, on pourrait se rallier à l'hypothèse élégante que toute cette affaire n'est rien d'autre que la perpétuation d'une méprise, en d'autres termes, que Brahms n'a pas compris le sens des banalités qui abondent dans la partition symphonique de Rott. Nous aurions ainsi trouvé une porte de sortie acceptable, qui permettrait également de prendre l'œuvre de Mahler à témoin : combien de temps a-t-il fallu avant que les substances disparates de ses œuvres soient reconnues pour ce qu'elles sont réellement - des parties de ces mondes que, selon sa vision, les symphonies devaient être ?

Il y a quelques décennies encore, beaucoup d'observateurs achoppaient là où soufflent les belles trompettes, là où « Frère Jacques » chemine dans la marche funèbre et où le Coucou est mort en tombant, car ils étaient partis pour apprendre à la banalité à marcher droit. Le devoir de la citation, de l'allusion, de la « silhouette » thématique, avec laquelle on ne fait que pressentir ce qui pourrait apparaître derrière les contours - tout cela restait aussi voilé au regard des sévères gardiens de l'ordre que l'apport le plus important de Robert Schumann, que l'on peut qualifier sans exagération de père de la composition musico-littéraire. Celui qui n'est pas à même d'entendre dans le 1er thème du Concerto pour piano les paroles de Florestan, « In des Lebens Frühlingstagen », de suivre les multiples transformations de la construction rythmique presque obsessionnelle à travers toute l'œuvre ou, au moins, de reconnaître « la Marseillaise » dans le Carnaval de Vienne, aura bien du mal avec la plus grande partie du répertoire Romantique tardif, que ce soit Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky, Gustav Mahler, Hans Rott - ou même Johannes Brahms. Celui-ci aurait été idiot de ne pas reconnaître immédiatement le miroir que le jeune élève de son rival lui tendait le 16 ou le 17 septembre 1880 - une carte du monde symphonique au XIXe siècle, sur laquelle lui aussi, le Viennois d'élection originaire du nord de l'Allemagne, figurait, parmi beaucoup d'autres Grands du passé et du présent.

Il est vrai que Hans Rott, avec ses avances « inconvenantes », avait introduit le loup dans la bergerie et, dans sa remarquable naïveté, marché sur les pieds de quelqu'un qui n'aimait vraiment pas cela - comme on le verra à propos du Finale de la Symphonie. Dans sa recherche d'une musique universelle, il n'avait visiblement pas réfléchi à ce dans quoi il s'embarquait. Chercher, dans une même composition, à réconcilier les antipodes viennois, Brahms et Bruckner, et y glisser quelques pierres d'achoppement comme Wagner et Schumann ne pouvait être ressenti que comme une manifestation de sa « folie des grandeurs » .

Mettons-nous à la place d'un auditeur de l'époque et essayons d'imaginer ce qu'il a ressenti lorsqu'il a entendu dans le 1er mouvement les « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » (à peu près à la 5e minute) ou lorsque l'emploi intensif du triangle a irrésistiblement évoqué la « Symphonie du Printemps » , sans parler des réminiscences de « Lohengrin » ou de « l'Or du Rhin » , que Brahms, l'anti-Wagner numéro 1, n'aurait pas pu ignorer. Le 2e mouvement ne lui rend pas la vie plus facile avec l'apparition (vers 1 min 40) d'un motif schumannien récurrent, qui était clairement associé à « Clara » et que Brahms connaissait d'ailleurs parfaitement (voir le début de sa 3e Symphonie) . Hans Rott ne se contente pas d'une unique citation, non, il répète le motif quelques minutes plus tard (vers 4 min 30) pour être certain que « n'importe quel imbécile » l'entende - certainement sans savoir quelle corde sensible il touchait ainsi.

Et dans le Finale, il se surpasse ! Après avoir passé en revue les événements précédents, tout à fait dans le sens de la 5e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner, il choisit (intentionnellement ?) une mélodie à tout le moins provocatrice : la proximité avec le thème du Finale de la 1re Symphonie de Johannes Brahms est tellement évidente (vers 4 min 40) que l'expert a peut-être même dû croire qu'on se payait sa tête. Les répétitions (vers 8 min 20 et 12 min 25) n'ont pas dû arranger les choses, et lorsque le compositeur fait finalement entrer Brahms avec les dieux dans le « Walhalla » , aucun doute sur sa santé mentale n'est plus permis : Hans Rott avait succombé à la folie primaire dont sont atteints surtout les jeunes individus de 17 à 25 ans ou, chez les plus âgés, les femmes entre 40 et 50 ans.

Et Mahler devait dire :

« Ce que la musique a perdu avec lui est incommensurable : son génie s'envole tellement haut, déjà dans sa 1re Symphonie, qu'il a écrite lorsqu'il était un jeune homme de 20 ans et qui fait de lui (le mot n'est pas trop fort) le fondateur de la Symphonie nouvelle, comme je la comprends. Mais ce qu'il voulait n'est pas encore atteint véritablement. C'est comme si quelqu'un lançait quelque chose de toutes ses forces mais, parce qu'il est encore maladroit, n'atteint pas vraiment son but. Mais je sais où il voulait arriver. Oui, il est si proche de ce qui m'est le plus personnel que lui et moi apparaissons comme 2 fruits du même arbre, issus du même sol, nourris du même air. J'aurais pu retirer énormément de lui et peut-être aurions-nous, ensemble, d'une certaine manière exploité à fond le contenu de ces temps nouveaux qui étaient en train d'éclorre pour la musique. » (Gustav Mahler, dans les « Mémoires » de Nathalie Bauer-Lechner.)

Nous savons que Gustav Mahler a découvert très tôt la Symphonie en mi majeur. Joseph Seemüller annonça à son pauvre ami Rott, à qui il rendait visite le soir de Noël de l'année 1882, que son ancien condisciple avait récemment joué son œuvre en cercle privé. Quelle influence cette partition a-t-elle eu sur la propre évolution de Mahler, quel rôle a-t-elle joué dans son œuvre symphonique ? Une remise en question globale de l'histoire de la musique n'est certainement pas la réponse. Il serait beaucoup plus profitable de se mettre d'accord sur les rapports que l'on veut rechercher. Le sens indiscutable de la citation et de l'allusion, chez l'un comme chez l'autre, est un signe fondamental de cette parenté intellectuelle soulignée par Mahler. Des éléments comme l'appel des cors dans le 2e mouvement de la Symphonie en mi majeur indiquent un lien plus étroit, tout comme le début du mouvement conclusif, dans lequel se prépare sans contrainte « le monde intermédiaire » du Finale de la Symphonie dite « Résurrection » avec son chant d'oiseau et « le Crieur dans le désert ». La liberté d'utilisation des formes traditionnelles est commune aux 2 compositeurs. Toutefois, Rott structure sa Symphonie en une progression temporelle, la durée d'exécution des mouvements augmente de façon continue jusqu'au poème symphonique final, qui dure 20 minutes et fait basculer le déroulement dans l'incommensurable - ce genre de conception très concrète ne se retrouve pas chez Mahler. Pourtant, chez l'un comme chez l'autre, le symbole du statu quo se disloque et nous ne pouvons nous empêcher de penser à cet aphorisme ambivalent de Robert Schumann, d'après lequel la forme est le récipient de l'esprit. Le conservatisme interprétera cette phrase au sens où la créativité doit se fondre dans la cruche d'argile pré-fabriquée, mais l'esprit qui va de l'avant soit se façonne ses propres récipients, pour les remplir ensuite, soit les crée au fur et à mesure qu'il progresse. C'est ainsi que Schumann a pu écrire son « Carnaval » ou sa Fantaisie, qui, d'un point de vue formel, n'est rien d'autre qu'une immense Sonate au clair de lune au déroulement inversé, en 3 poèmes symphoniques. Ainsi, Gustav Mahler a pu aller jusqu'à retourner l'intérieur vers l'extérieur dans sa 9e Symphonie, et Hans Rott a écrit son chef-d'œuvre quasi en forme de spirale (4) .

Si le Scherzo qui vient en 3e lieu n'a jusqu'ici pas été touché, c'est qu'il y avait une bonne raison. Car ici, le compositeur « au rôti » et le compositeur « au fromage » s'y rencontrent d'une façon tellement intime que l'on pourrait se laisser aller à supposer que Mahler a « refilé » à son « pote » non seulement quelques idées mais un tas de partitions travaillées. Il a intégré celles-ci dans le Scherzo de sa propre 1re Symphonie, après que Rott, pour les raisons évoquées ci-dessus, n'en ait plus eu besoin.

Évidemment, les choses sont allées tout autrement. Le 3e mouvement de la Symphonie en mi majeur est antérieur de quelque 8 ans à son pendant mahlérien et, sans le moindre doute, son consanguin. Au-delà des concordances souvent quasi littérales, il serait bien plus intéressant de se demander pourquoi Mahler fait suivre son Scherzo « à la Rott » d'une marche funèbre et pourquoi aussi l'éclat du 3e mouvement de la 2e Symphonie emprunte les « mots » de Rott. Le plus grand Maître de la citation raffinée (après Schumann) aurait-il érigé un monument au « Titan » pour le faire participer ensuite à la « Résurrection » ? N'oublions pas que ses partitions ne sont pas moins riches en relations que les romans du pionnier Arno Schmidt. Il faut toujours supposer que les apparences sont trompeuses. Qui, jusqu'à aujourd'hui, aurait découvert ce que la 1re Sonate des « Centone » de Niccolò Paganini avait à faire au début de la 5e Symphonie ? Pourquoi la Sonate « la Tempête » de Beethoven et l'Ouverture « Manfred » de Schumann déboulent-elles dans le 1er mouvement de la 6e ou pourquoi le 1er mouvement de la 3e commence-t-il par le lied « Ich hab' mich ergeben », qui se présente comme une silhouette du 1er thème du Finale de la 1re Symphonie de Brahms ?

Celui qui vise une « Symphonie universelle » doit foncer - et ne rien exclure. Ce principe prétendument si naïf ouvre les portes à la Symphonie nouvelle. Un univers rempli de musique, de signes et de concepts s'ouvre ; tout entre en relation avec tout, devient comme un « jeu des perles de verre » - mais la décision sur la primauté de la poule par rapport à l'œuf devient subitement hors de propos. Inopinément, le temps et l'espace se retrouvent côte à côte, rien ne les relie (comment se fait-il que Mahler ait emporté la 3e Symphonie de Charles Ives dans ses bagages pour son dernier voyage vers le vieux monde ? C'est maintenant que cela devient intéressant, sans que l'on ait besoin de s'abriter derrière la conception du temps comme perpétuelle simultanéité (« Kugelgestalt der Zeit ») d'un Bernd Alois Zimmermann.

Contrairement à la Symphonie en mi majeur, le « Pastorales Vorspiel » (1877-1880) de Hans Rott a été surestimé. On perçoit bien dans la partition quelques éléments « mahlériens » mais l'œuvre, dans son ensemble, nous entraîne dans une autre direction - le Fugato semble l'œuvre de l'école contrapuntique de Bruckner et il serait particulièrement risqué d'interpréter cette fugue comme une fuite devant l'orage que Ludwig van Beethoven, dans sa « Pastorale », fait éclater au-dessus de la « réunion joyeuse et intime des paysans ». Si on le veut vraiment, on trouvera vers la fin de cette belle peinture d'atmosphère une préfiguration de Max Reger. Mais celui-ci était, du moins en paroles, davantage tourné vers Brahms, c'est pourquoi on ne devrait pas donner trop de poids à cette anticipation. On risquerait ainsi de masquer le fait qu'un des grands talents du XIXe siècle a été broyé par les meules du statu quo et que Hans Rott a payé de sa vie et de sa créativité des allégations de « folie des grandeurs » et de « délire de la persécution » .

(1) La Symphonie resta à l'état de fragment. Le Sextuor sera détruit par Rott, peu de temps avant sa mort.

(2) Le « Silence des Agneaux », avec Anthony Hopkins et Jodie Foster (USA, 1990) .

On 10 June 1877, Josef Seiberl, Anton Bruckner's successor as organist of Saint-Florian, died. 4 days later, Bruckner wrote to his friend Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) , chorus Master of the cathedral choir, recommending one of his pupils for the vacant post :

« May I give my warmest recommendation to Hans Rott, a graduate of the Organ School at the Conservatory. The son of the late-actor at the “ Theater an der Wien ”, he is an excellent musician, very pleasant and modest, very “ moral ”, plays Bach outstandingly and improvises astonishingly well for an 18 year old.

You will never find a “ better ” young man. He has been my “ best ” pupil, up to now. He studied Counterpoint with Krenn, who also likes him very much, and also Composition. He is now organist at the Piarist church in “ Josefstadt ” (in Vienna) . He and I would both be very grateful. But I do not want in the least to anticipate your decision. »

From : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke, Briefe Band I : 1852-1886 » , edited by Andrea Harrandt and Otto Schneider, Vienna (1998) ; page 174.

Rott did not get the job and, indeed, his short career reads like a series of set-backs. Born in Vienna, in 1858, Hans Rott was, as Bruckner comments, the son of an actor. His mother died early, in 1872, and when his father died 4 years later, Rott was left without any means of support. He was obliged to suspend his studies and take an office job but was able to resume his education when the Vienna Conservatory remitted the fees for the remainder of his course. In June 1876, he graduated from Bruckner’s organ-class with distinction, winning the 1st prize and a medal.

In the meantime, Rott had started to compose and, in 1878, he took part in a composers' competition at the Conservatory. Bruckner’s pupil, Carl Hrubý, recalls what happened next :

« At the end, scornful laughter was heard from the “ Marker's chair ” - sorry, the examiners' table. Thereupon, the normally so timid Bruckner rose and cried the flaming words to the “ Markers ” down there :

“ Do not laugh, gentlemen, you will hear great things of this man yet ! ” »

In 1880, things came to a head, on the positive side, Rott completed his Symphony and other works, including the « Pastoral Prelude » , composed a String Sextet and began a 2nd Symphony, but when he sought performances for his music, he met only with further rebuffs. He played the Symphony to Hans Richter, twice, without result, and also brought it to Johannes Brahms, who together with Eduard Bamsick and the composer Karl Goldmark was responsible for awarding a State scholarship. Rott was turned-down, once again. Brahms even doubted that Rott could be the author of the Symphony, because « together, with such beauty, there was also such triviality and nonsense that the former could not stem from Rott » . He advised Rott to give-up composing altogether.

In the meantime, Rott had resigned from his « Josefstadt » organist position after being falsely accused of stealing from the church archives. Unable to get work in Austria, he was obliged to accept a post in the Alsatian town of Mulhouse (Mühlhausen) , part of the German « Reich » , since 1870. While stopping-over in Linz, Rott was disturbed by the sound of knocking on the walls of his hotel-room. The next day, back on the train, he pulled a revolver on a man who wanted to light a cigar, claiming that Brahms had loaded the train with dynamite. He was taken-off the train at the border station of Simbach and, on 23 October, he was admitted to a psychiatric clinic « in a completely confused state » . 1 year later, a diagnosis recorded « hallucinatory insanity, persecution mania-recovery no longer to be expected » . Ironically, Rott did get his State scholarship but, by that time, he had been in a mental hospital for 6 months.

At 1st, Rott was able to see his friends, but his condition soon deteriorated. In 1882, he attempted suicide and, on 25 June 1884, he died (from either lung cancer or tuberculosis) . The great future" Bruckner had predicted for him was not to be, and instead Rott seemed fated to be a footnote in biographies of Bruckner and Mahler: a talented figure, no doubt, but one who had fallen by the wayside too early to realise whatever potential he may have had.

Hans Rott remained a footnote until 1980, when the musicologist Paul Banks unearthed the manuscript of his Symphony in E in the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library. It immediately became clear that the Symphony was a remarkable work, conceived on a large-scale, and also a very original one, despite the obvious influence of Richard Wagner.

But what will strike the modern listener most is that there are moments, brief but unmistakable, which look forward to the Symphonies of Gustav Mahler, specifically Nos. 1, 3, 5 and 7. Isolated moments in Rott's slow-movement (placed 2nd) anticipate the Finale of Mahler's 3rd Symphony, while the 1st bars of the main Scherzo-theme of Mahler's 1st resemble the opening bars of the main-theme of Rott's Scherzo. Later in the same movement, there are disconcerting pre-echoes of the Scherzo of Mahler's 5th. The wind colloquy at the start of the Finale of Rott's Symphony looks forward to the 1st « Nachtmusik » of Mahler's 7th Symphony, while the handling of texture later in the movement (and, in particular, the use of a pedal-point) foreshadows the Finale of Mahler's 5th.

Mahler's « Rott quotations » , if one may use the term, are all the more striking because they arise organically from contexts which are entirely different from those in which they appear in Rott. The resemblances cannot be coincidence ; but are they homages, appropriations, or unconscious borrowings ? This may have been material which Mahler had absorbed at an early age through his friendship with Rott - and absorbed so completely that it had become a natural part of his musical language. This is all the more likely as Rott's music is, otherwise, not at all like Mahler's - either in thematic content or in style. Mahler paid the most generous tribute to Rott's memory in a letter to Natalie Bauer-Lechner :

« It is completely impossible to estimate what music has lost in him. His 1st Symphony soars to such heights of genius that it makes him (without exaggeration) the founder of the " New Symphony " as I understand it. »

To complicate matters further, Rott himself shows the influence of the (Germanic) music of his time. One cannot deny that the Symphony's opening owes a debt to the Wagner of « Lohengrin » and « Rheingold » . The E major close is almost a quotation from « Die Walküre » (Rott had attended the 1st Bayreuth Festival, in 1876) . Bruckner's monumental style also left its mark, while the broad theme of the Finale owes something to the 1st Symphony of Johannes Brahms. But, in the last analysis, what is most remarkable is the sheer originality and creative vitality of so much of Rott's work. The harmony is rich, the orchestration imaginative. It doesn't all come-off ; the brass scoring is often too heavy, the triangle is over-used, and the work's form is also far from clear, as though swamped by the wealth of material. The last movement is the longest, the loudest and also the weakest. But here, too, a remark of Mahler's is relevant :

« It is true that he (Rott) has not yet fully-realized his aims here. It is like someone taking a run for the longest possible throw and not quite hitting the mark. But I know what he was driving at. »

The end-result is a work of promise rather than fulfillment. It may not be great music, but it is music by a potentially great composer. No one can say for sure what Rott would have amounted to. Composers evolve at different times and in different ways. If one compares Rott's Symphony to the music Bruckner completed in his 22nd year (some settings of « Tantum ergo », a Prelude for organ, and the « Festlied » for male-choir), Rott certainly seems the more advanced and, indeed, the more promising composer. But one wonders if Bruckner's isolation, which allowed him to mature in his own time, did not protect him from being overwhelmed by the conflicting whirl of stimuli to be found in Rott's Symphony. One should also consider a work completed, at about the same time, by another 22 year old : Mahler's « Das klagende Lied ». This may not be entirely mature, but never for one moment does it sound like anybody other than Mahler, even if the openings to the 1st 2 sections both look as though they should be indebted to Siegfried.

1st performance of the « Pastoral Prelude for Orchestra » by Hans Rott.

As his favourite student Hans Rott was at stake, Anton Bruckner put his foot down. Carl Hrubý relates an occurrence at the Conservatoire of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Society of the Friends of Music) in July 1878 : « At the end, a scornful laughter was heard from the « Merker » chair, sorry, the examiners' table. Thereupon, the otherwise so timid Bruckner rose and cried the flaming words to the « Merkers » down there : « Do not laugh, gentlemen, of this man you will hear great things yet ! » . Which of Hans Rott's works caused the gentlemen's scorn is not mentioned in the account ; most probably, it was the 1st movement of the young composer's Symphony in E major, a work which, more than 100 years after it had been written, experienced an unexpected renaissance and confronted the general public with the hitherto almost unknown name of « Rott » .

However, only part of Anton Bruckner's prophesy was to come true. When on June 25, 1884, the just 26 year old Hans Rott, patient of the Provincial Lunatic Asylum of Lower-Austria, died of tuberculosis, the great hopes and expectations his friends had entertained of him, had been a matter of the past for some time already. Almost 4 years lasted the tragic epilogue of the musician's life who had been suffering from « hallucinatory insanity and persecution mania » and had been given-up by the physicians. As a student of the Vienna Conservatoire, he had gained Anton Bruckner's recognition and as a composer and the admiration of a small, however select, circle of friends to which also Gustav Mahler belonged during his early years in Vienna.

« Mahler » is the keyword essential for Rott's rediscovery during the 1980's. Again, the initiative had to come « from outside » : In the course of his archival studies of Gustav Mahler's youth and his Viennese circle of friends, the English musicologist Paul W. Banks also looked into Hans Rott's artistic estate which is kept in the Music Collections of the Austrian National Library, since 1950.

The manuscript of the Symphony in E major aroused his interest, not least because of the extraordinary praise which Gustav Mahler expressed to Natalie Bauer-Lechner :

« It is completely impossible to estimate what music has lost in him. His genius soars to such heights even in his 1st Symphony, written at the age of 20, and which makes him (without exaggeration) the founder of the " New Symphony " as I understand it. He, however, did not reach entirely what he wanted. It is as if someone swings back to throw as far as he can and, still clumsy, does not quite hit the goal. Yet, I know what he is aiming at. Yes, he is so related to my very own that he and I seem to me like 2 fruits from the same tree, brought forth by the same soil, nourished by the same air. He could have been so infinitely much to me and perhaps the 2 of us together would have fairly exhausted the content of this New Age which was dawning for music. »

It seems as if Gustav Mahler, at that time (the summer of 1900) , had taken into consideration a performance of the Symphony which, for what reasons ever, did not come off. The work continued to lie dormant in drawers and archives until Paul W. Banks produced the material for a performance and initiated the 1st performance on March 4, 1989, with Gerhard Samuel conducting the in Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. It was met with great and international response ; shortly afterwards, Hans Rott's Symphony was to be heard also in Paris, London and Vienna. Almost unanimously, the reviews noted a number of striking reminiscences of Gustav Mahler in this work (or better anticipations, for the Symphony had been written many years prior to Mahler's First Symphony) . « Mahler's " 0 " Symphony or Rott's 1st ? » , asked Wolfgang Fuhrmann in the « Standard » , on the occasion of the Viennese 1st performance by the Vienna Symphony Orchestra with Carlos Kalmar conducting on March 4, 1990, and, in summing up, he wrote : « Inevitably, this leads to the assumption that the fellow students Rott and Mahler must have entertained an intimate exchange of musical ideas. »

It may be a similar case with the work which now, 120 years after it had been written, will be performed for the 1st time : the « Pastoral Prelude for Orchestra » , finished in 1880, that is shortly after the completion of the 1st Symphony. The Rott biography does reveal almost nothing about the « Pastoral Prelude » , the more curious we may be whether the phenomenon of the « anticipated Mahler » will be heard in this work, too, the score of which promises well in this respect. Above all, the nature scene, determined by bird call and sustained tones, with which Mahler's 1st Symphony begins, seems to be a reminiscence of some parts of the « Pastoral Prelude » which (in contrast to the Symphony) was not intended to be presented to an examining jury. Thus the composer's imagination experienced no limitations at all with regard to sound and form. The question suggests itself : « What kind of relationship existed between Rott and Mahler ? Did the musical relationship really correspond with a congeniality of their characters ? » .

An answer, however an extremely subjective one, has a the friend of Hans Rott's youth, Heinrich Krzyzanowski, who, in his written reminiscences, recalls the relationship with Gustav Mahler : « By the way, there was no real friendship between Rott and Mahler - although they saw a lot of each other. » . Indeed, no statement by Hans Rott has been handed down to us which points to a closer friendship with Mahler. Besides, Mahler must have withdrawn himself after 1878 from the circle of musical friends who regularly met in Rott's room at the « Piaristen » monastery during 1877 and 1878. But Rott's tragic fate and the greatly individual character of his music seem to have left a deep impression in the colleague, his junior by just 2 years, which (thinking of his remarks to Natalie Bauer-Lechner) remained vivid for decades and, in a way, made Mahler remember Rott as a symbol of failure.

Attempts, abandoned hopes : this is the motto of Rott's short life.

Born on August 1, 1858, as son of the actor Carl Mathias Rott, the boy 1st attended the Academic Secondary School and, afterwards, a commercial school for 2 years. Only then, he must have realized his talent for music, as, from 1874 on, he studied at the Conservatoire of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (organ with Anton Bruckner, harmony with Hermann Grädener, composition with Franz Krenn) . Richard Wagner, the idol of the circle around Bruckner, enthralled him, too : in 1875, Hans Rott became a member of the Viennese Academic Wagner Society ; in 1876, he attended the 1st Bayreuth Festival. During the next 2 years, he was employed as organist at the « Josefstadt » Church Music Society and lived in the « Piaristen » monastery, in very poor circumstances. He resigned as organist in 1878. In the same year, he finished his studies at the Conservatory, and, then, a 2 years' search for a permanent position began which was determined by repeated failures.

Hans Rott negotiations with Saint-Florian and Klosterneuburg were in vain and so were his applications at the Saint-Michaël Church and the Votiv Church in Vienna. His teacher Anton Bruckner helped with letters of recommendation ; one of them survived in the Hans Rott Estate : « The signer of this letter deems it a great pleasure to confirm that he got to know Hans Rott during his studies at the Conservatory as a disciple of art who, due to his excellent talents, his diligence and pure character and, last but not least, his performance as a musician, especially at the organ, gives rise to the greatest hopes. » .

An emotional attachment to his home-town and a romance kept Hans Rott tied to Vienna, however, it was becoming more and more clear that his future did not lie there. Yet, despite all the pecuniary worries and the struggle for existence, the years until 1880 had also been a creative period ; not only the Symphony in E major was written during that time but also (simultaneously) the « Pastoral Prelude » and the String Quartet in C minor (a highly-advanced composition) . Hans Rott competed for the Beethoven Prize and the State scholarship for musicians and, in 1880, he presented his Symphony and the « Pastoral Prelude » to the Ministry of Education. Furthermore, he considered visits to the Jury members, one of them was Johannes Brahms, appropriate. His visit to Brahms must have been a traumatic experience for the young composer whose extreme nervousness already pointed towards a psychical crisis. As Rott told his friends afterwards, Brahms flatly refused the Symphony and added : « It could not possibly have been composed by himself. » .

Furthermore, the imminent farewell to Vienna also meant a grave strain for Rott, for a half-hearted application for a position as director of the Alsatian choir association « Concordia » had met with success ; Rott had to take-up the employment and, at the end of October 1880, he departed from Vienna. On the train, disaster struck. With his revolver, Hans Rott threatened a fellow traveller who wanted to light a cigar and said that Johannes Brahms had had the train filled with dynamite. He was brought back to Vienna and committed to the Psychiatric Clinic of the General Hospital. For the rest of his short and tragic life, he remained behind the walls of psychiatric asylums.

It may sound cynical to call such a fate « more interesting » in retrospect than a well-ordered « normal » biography. Certainly, this alone does not justify the interest in his posthumous compositions, of course ; these have to legitimate themselves in concerts by their own immanent qualities. The Symphony in E major has already stood the public test which is still in store for the « Pastoral Prelude » . Certainly, there is one thing or 2 to be said about the score : it had been conceived as a broadly constructed Crescendo and divides into a Prelude and a Fugue, it shows a clever chamber musical instrumentation and proves the composer's imagination as to counterpoint. Yet, only the real sound event will prove whether the essential will be a success. Which would be the discovery of a work which we experience as a direct musical event, not only in the sense of a late « rehabilitation » of Hans Rott.

The Austrian composer and organist Hans Rott was born on 1 August 1858 in Brauhirschgrund, a suburb of Vienna, and died on 25 June 1884. His music is little-known today, though he received high praise, in his time, from the likes of Gustav Mahler and Anton Bruckner.

His mother Maria Rosalia (1840-1872, maiden name : Lutz) was an actress and singer. His father Carl Mathias Rott (real name : Roth, born in 1807 and married in 1862) was a famous comic actor in Vienna who was crippled, in 1874, by a stage accident which led to his death 2 years later.

Hans was left alone to continue his studies at the Conservatory. Fortunately, both his skill and financial need were recognized and he was excused from paying tuition. While studying, he briefly roomed with Gustav Mahler and Rudolf Krzyzanowski. He studied piano with Leopold Landskron and Josef Dachs, harmony with Hermann Grädener and counterpoint and composition (like Mahler) with Franz Krenn.

He studied organ with Bruckner, starting in 1874, and graduating from Bruckner's organ class, in 1877, with honors. Bruckner said that Rott played Johann Sebastian Bach very well, and even improvised wonderfully (a high compliment since Bruckner himself was a great improviser) . Rott was also influenced by the works of Richard Wagner, and even attended the very 1st Bayreuth Festival in 1876.

During that time, Rott was also organist at the Piarist church « Maria Treu » , in Vienna. For the final year of his studies, in 1878, Rott submitted the 1st movement of his Symphony in E major to a composition contest. The jury (except Bruckner) was very derisive of the work. After completing the Symphony, in 1880, Rott showed the work to both Johannes Brahms and Hans Richter, in order to get it played. His efforts failed. Brahms did not like the fact that Bruckner exerted great influence on the Conservatory students, and even told Rott that he had no talent whatsoever and that he should give-up music. Unfortunately, Rott lacked Mahler's inner resolve, and whereas Mahler was able to overcome many of the obstacles in his life, Rott was brought down by mental illness. The Symphony has been recorded by « BIS » , « Acousence » , « Hyperion » , « Ondine » and « RCA » . Hans Rott also wrote a Symphony for string orchestra in A-flat major, in 3 movements, (1874-1875) , and a String Quartet in C minor, a student work in 5 movements. They have both been recorded on the « Acousence Records » label (ACO-CD 20205) , in 2005.

Rott's mind snapped in October 1880, whilst on a train journey. He was reported to have threatened another passenger with a revolver, claiming that Brahms had filled the train with dynamite. Rott was committed to a mental hospital, in 1881, where despite a brief recovery, he sank into depression. By the end of 1883, a diagnosis recorded : « hallucinatory insanity, persecution mania ; recovery no longer to be expected » . He died of tuberculosis, in 1884, aged only 25. Many well-wishers, including his old Master Anton Bruckner, attended Rott's funeral at the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna.

Gustav Mahler wrote of Rott :

« A musician of genius who died unrecognized and in want on the very threshold of his career. What music has lost in him cannot be estimated. Such is the height to which his genius soars in his Symphony (in E major) , which he wrote as 20 year old youth and makes him the Founder of the “ New Symphony ”, as I see it. To be sure, what he wanted is not quite what he achieved. But I know where he aims. Indeed, he is so near to my inmost self that he and I seem to me like 2 fruits from the same tree which the same soil has produced and the same air nourished. He could have meant infinitely much to me and, perhaps, the 2 of us would have well-nigh exhausted the content of new time which was breaking-out for music. »

Thanks to Rott's friends, some of his music manuscripts have survived in the music collection of Vienna's national library. This includes Rott's Symphony in E major, and sketches for a 2nd Symphony that was never finished. The completed Symphony is remarkable in the way it anticipates some of Mahler's musical characteristics. In particular, the 3rd movement is unnervingly close to Mahler. The Finale includes references to Brahms's 1st Symphony. Mahler also spoke well of Rott's Lieder, of which all 8 surviving complete songs have been performed in concert, since 2002, and 4 sung by Dominik Wörner were recorded, in 2009, on the Ars label. We also know of a Sextet, which Mahler never heard and has also been lost. In his last years, Rott wrote a lot of music, only to destroy what he wrote soon after writing it, saying it was worthless.

Bruckner and Mahler were the 1st to recognise Rott's talent. Mahler himself included references to Rott's work in his own music. However, in the 20th century, Rott's work was largely forgotten ; and only in 1989 was Rott's Symphony in E major finally premiered by the Cincinnati Philharmonia Orchestra under Gerhard Samuel, in a performing edition prepared by Paul W. Banks. A CD recording followed.

Other recordings of the Symphony have since been issued, and other Rott works have been occasionally revived, including his « Julius Cæsar » Overture, « Pastoral » Overture and Prelude for Orchestra.

In April 1877, the not yet 19 year old Hans Rott was already working on his 3rd theatre-related composition, « A Prelude to “ Julius Cæsar ” » .

A few months before, on November 29, 1876, Rott had begun the fair copy of his « Hamlet » Overture the 1st drafts of which date back to July of the same year. But, after some pages, the score breaks-off although the draft for piano seems to be complete.

In parallel, he is working on an Opera, from summer to autumn 1876. With a degree of certainty the title « Her(r)mannsschlacht » refers to Kleist's drama of the same title. Presumably, Rott's only Opera project seems to have got stuck, however, at an early stage already, for just a few fragmentary notes have come down to us.

There is no hint when exactly the work on « A Prelude to “ Julius Cæsar ” » did begin. The 1st date mentioned in this context is : April 10, 1877. As this date is written down on the 1st page of the score, it can be assumed that Rott had concerned himself with this work earlier, the more so as already 20 days later the last of the 18 score pages, dated April 30, 1877, is reached. We do not know when Rott wrote the fair copy of the score and the single parts. Anyway, « A Prelude to “ Julius Cæsar ” » is his 1st completely finished work of music for the theatre we know and, after the Prelude for Orchestra (finished on November 7, 1876) , presumably Rott's 2nd complete work for a Symphony Orchestra, in general. And it is already here that we discover composition techniques which he is to use and refine later in his Symphony No. 1 in E major. Even the beginning of the main-theme of the Symphony could have been developed from the « Cæsar » theme as from bar 10 on.

Less than 2 months later, he begins to take notes for the forth and last work with a direct context to the theatre. Later, Rott deleted this context on purpose. The original title, « A Prelude to “ Elsbeth ” » , was altered into « Pastoral Prelude » , in June 1880. Presumably, Rott wanted to submit this Prelude for the State scholarship along with the Symphony and a String Sextet.

At a 1st glance, it may be amazing that Rott should have concerned himself with the music-theatre at such an early stage but it, soon, becomes clear that this genre literally must have pressed itself upon him for Hans Rott grew-up in the world of the theatre. His father, Carl Mathias Rott, was a famous actor and singing comedian, his mother, Maria Rosalia Lutz, a likewise recognized actress and singer. Add to this, Rott held Wagner in great veneration. From 1875 to 1879, Rott had been a member of the Viennese Academic Wagner Society and, in August 1876, he attended the 1st Bayreuth Festival (together with Anton Bruckner and others) . Already on March 2, 1876, he had attended a performance of « Lohengrin » , in Vienna, with Wagner conducting.

So much for a sketchy outline of Rott's affinity for the music-theatre. There may be several reasons why he chose the aforementioned dramas. There had been 9 performances of William Shakespeare's « Julius Cæsar » , between September 25 and October 5, 1875, at the « Theater an der Wien » , and 99 performances at the « Burgtheater » , between May 27, 1850 and June 2, 1912. The play « Her(r)mannsschlacht » was performed 11 times, between October 15 and 27, 1875, at the « Theater an der Wien » . Evidently, this work belonged to Rott's library. It is also known that Rott owned Shakespeare editions so that he may have had also « Hamlet » and « Julius Cæsar » . Only « Elsbeth » could not be definitely allocated so far.

With regard to Richard Wagner, there is one characteristic in Rott's music for the theatre. They are his only works for Orchestra in that time in which Rott uses a tuba. He returns to this instrument, only later on, in a set of parts of his Symphony No. 1 in E major. Rott may have known and appreciated the use of the tuba in Wagner's works.

An autograph score survived, and so did an autograph score copy (partly with substantial alterations) , autograph single parts as well as copies of the string parts, partly with autograph entries ; all of them are kept in the music collections of the Austrian National Library.

The Songs exist !

A decade after Rott's songs hit the concert-hall, numerous references still say he destroyed them all and that Mahler, who did indeed find Rott's lieder « strange and extraordinary » , regretted Rott carried these in his head rather than writing them down. (This originates from Mahler books by Natalie Baucher-Lechner and Henry-Louis de La Grange written before rediscovery of the songs.)

What's missing ?

Rott continued to compose after being confined from 1880 up until towards his death, in 1884, but his work became confused, sketchy and poor in quality, and he destroyed much though not all of it. Accounts seem muddled about what exactly Rott (just before going mad) had sent to the copyist along with his Symphony for the purpose of submission for the Beethoven competition and a state stipend. There are mentions of the String Sextet and « Pastorales Vorspiel » but, additionally, he had 2 songs copied anyway : « Der Sanger » (the most important complete song we still have) and the « Pied Piper Ballad » . We do have the copyist's full-score of the Pastoral plays but only autographs of these 2 songs, of which the Ballad lacks the words that obviously once existed. Rott destroyed the Sextet in the asylum but we do have Sketches for Song Melodies that he wrote there.

It seems plausible to conclude that the entire Rott collection (which, of course, also includes 8 now recorded orchestral works, and many choral pieces - none recorded) that Fritz Lohr deposited in the Austrian National Library was sourced both from what Rott left behind him in the asylum when he died and from material held externally. Moreover, when it comes to the songs (listed on the Hans Rott website, with original and translated lyrics) , that we have fewer than Rott wrote before or after 1880, and that some we do have were once more complete than what has come down to us. This frustrates full evaluation of Rott's music, for instance, the Hans Rott website comments that the incomplete song « Winterlied » reveals « impressionistic tendencies years ahead of Debussy and Ravel » .

The residual Rott song collection

There are 19 lieder (plus some sketches) but for 11 the scores are incomplete. All the remaining 8 all have been performed since 2002 (premiered in concert, 126 years after composition) . 4 of these are recorded on the new CD. Three of the 8 complete songs are for female voices.

Rott's literary sources

Rott drew on 3 poets and the complete songs divide equally between 2 : Goethe and Vincenc Zusner (apparently, a popular but mediocre and most likely morbid poet later used by Alexander von Zemlinsky, in 1892, and Franz Schreker, in 1899) .

Goethe's « Der Sänger » is about a wandering minstrel's dignity and Franz Schubert set exactly the same words in his D. 149 (from 1815) but in a completely different musical style. Hugo Wolf was to use it in 1888 too, 8 years after Rott. Similarly, Rott used Goethe's « Wander's Nacht » , 12 years before Wolf, but both used « Abendglöcklein » that same year, 1876.

Rott's favourite for his incomplete 1880 lieder was Julius Wolff, whose 1876 poem had just been made into an Opera by Viktor Ernst Nessler, in 1879, whilst Rott used this poem in composing 3 songs as part of an envisaged « Pied Piper » of Hamelin lieder set.

Fitting the songs into the timeline

Rott's surviving songs are from 1876-1880 and mostly very early. (There are lost Mahler songs and a couple of his fragments, from this period, before the 1st extant Mahler song that dates from 1880.) 10 of the 19 songs are dated, a further 2 have been allocated assumed dates, and all but 1 of the 8 complete songs have dates : 5 from 1876 and 1 each from 1877 and 1880.

Early period

5 songs are from 1876 (the 3 dated are all on the CD ; 2 more are assumed to be from 1876) . This was Rott's 3rd year at the Vienna Conservatory (when 2 of the greatest song-writers, Mahler and Wolf were his classmates) . These songs were written after Wagner's Vienna concerts of 1875 and before the « Ring » cycle was stamped on all Rott's orchestral work (except his earlier Symphony for String Orchestra) following his attending its premiere at the 1st Bayreuth Festival, in 1876.

2 Songs are dated from 1877 (but 1 of these is incomplete) , before Rott's Symphony 1st movement was rejected by the Vienna Conservatory competition finals jury, in 1878.

Late-period

5 songs (1 on the CD ; the other 4 are incomplete) are dated from 1880, from what could be called the mature period of the then 22 year old composer ! These songs are sandwiched between Rott falling for Louise Löhr (sister of Fritz) and completing his Symphony dedicated to her, shortly before his mental collapse. « Der Sänger » , which is on the CD, is the sole example we have of performable mature Rott Lieder.

...

Hans Rott grew-up in « Brauhirschengrund » , in Vienna. His early family life was problematic. Rott's mother, Christine, died when he was only 2 years old. His father Karl Mathias was a famous comedy actor at the « Theater an der Wien » , who had turned to acting after a brief career in music, including a stint as an appointed organist. As an actor, Karl won distinguished honours and awards, including the prestigious « Goldene Verdienstkreuz mit der Kron » .

Hans Rott was Karl's child from the 2nd marriage, together with his brother Karl. There were also several half siblings from the 1st marriage. Karl's 3rd wife, the actress Maria Lutz, was 30 years younger than her husband. She died, aged 33, in 1872.

Hans Rott displayed the signs of genius early in life, showing multi-faceted talent. He attended high-school and, later, a commercial business school, from which he graduated with highest recommendations. He began his Symphony for strings in 1874, the same year he entered the Vienna Conservatory as a student.

At the Conservatory, Hans Rott took organ classes with Anton Bruckner. He excelled, achieving 1st grade each year, and winning 1st prize in the organ competitions of the 2nd and 3rd years.

Anton Bruckner was so impressed with his student that he wrote him a glowing recommendation as an organist to Saint-Florian's monastery, in 1878. A notable friendship had developed between Bruckner and his favourite student, causing Bruckner stand with him in the « cheap » ranks, rather than sit at his place of honour, during performances which they attended together. Rott interrupts one letter to Rudolf Krzyżanowski, stating that Bruckner had just come to his door to express his consternation at not seeing more of him at the local pub. (Helmut Kreysing, 1998)

Other studies of Hans Rott include piano with Leopold Landskron. Although he received 1st grade and won a 1st prize in 1875, Rudolf Krzyżanowski reports that both Rott and Bruckner remained questionable piano players, their instrument clearly being the organ.

Hans Rott's harmony studies began in 1874-1875 with Herman Graedner, and counterpoint was studied with Franz Krenn (1875-1876) . His friends Mahler and Krzyżanowski studied alongside him, but it was Rott who was considered to be the most talented of his circle. The friendship Mahler / Rott was significant, Mahler having spoken about Rott as an important personal and professional influence on him. On one occasion, Mahler's mother remarked to her son that Rott was the more talented composer of the 2.

In 1876-1877, Hans Rott took his final examinations in organ, but began experiencing problems on a personal level. Always a conscientious student, who prided himself in attaining top grades and the approval of his family, Rott's life was dealt a severe financial and emotional blow with the death of his father in 1876, leaving him orphaned at age 18.

The loss of his father meant severe financial loss for Rott. Following the stage accident of his father, in 1874, the Rott family fortune went into steep decline. After the death of his father, Rott was left destitute. According to Rudolf Krzyzanowski, he suffered hunger in these years. In only a few short years, he had gone from being the well-respected son of a famous actor to becoming a destitute, struggling orphan.

The Conservatory, recognising Hans Rott's talent and hardship, exempted him from fees in his 2nd year, and awarded him a free place for his 3rd and 4th year.

In 1876, Hans Rott was forced to take-up a badly paid post as organist with the « Piaristen » Monastery in Vienna, as he was also supporting his younger brother, Karl. Rott lived mainly of cheap sausages, called « Extrawurst » , and suffered from the hostile attitude of the prior. In 1878, he was wrongly accused of theft of a score by the monks, and resigned in outrage. Although this accusation was later cleared, Rott remained deeply wounded by what he sensed was a deep betrayal.

Personal notes of this time show Hans Rott to be a soft personality devoid of ill-will toward anyone, but with a deep need for love and acceptance. His friends and musical acquaintances from the « Akademischer Wagnerverein » gave him this in his early years. He joined there in 1876, the « Verein » including such notable names as Gustav Mahler and Hugo Wolf.

Hans Rott was unwilling to align himself with the streams of his time, and stood alone as an individualist. He admired and studied the music of Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner and Richard Wagner, refusing to choose one to the exclusion of the others. Elements of all 3 are reflected in his music, most of which has been preserved and which ranges from Symphonies to chamber music and songs.

As his finances declined, disappointment in his fellow men mounted after a betrayal by his close friend, Rudolf Krzyzanowski. Hans Rott withdrew more into himself and his music. Financially, he was supported mainly by Friedrich Seemueller, with whom he spent a serene last vacation, in 1880, in rural Lower-Austria

Hans Rott was ashamed at being financed by Seemueller, which is shown in his notes. In early 1880, he suffered emotionally on 3 counts : his lack of immediate family, the rejection of his art and, finally, and unhappy love-affair.

Not much is known as present about the love-affair which remains a crucial missing link to Hans Rott's story. His notes indicate that he fell in love with a woman named Louise, who either rejected him or initially loved him back but was promised to someone else and then forced to reject him. All notes so far indicate that Rott was a virgin at the time of his death, loyal to Louise, for whom he wrote the Symphony in E major.

His financial situation and shame forced Hans Rott to accept a post outside Vienna. He was offered a position as Choir-Master in « Muehlhausen » (Mullhouse) in Alsace but, in 1880, made a last ditch effort to remain in Vienna.

Vienna was extremely important to Hans Rott, who had grown-up there and had no family to return to once he left.

Also, Vienna was Louise's home-town, and he clearly hoped to stay close to her. Rott believed that he had to « save » Louise from an unhappy, possibly forced marriage she was about to enter into.

His plan was to win the Beethoven Prize competition with his Symphony in E major, and, to further this aim, he visited Johannes Brahms, in 1880. Alluding to the similar elements found in the Finale of Hans Rott's Symphony to his own C minor Symphony, Brahms harshly stated that Rott could not have possibly written the work himself and told the young composer that he had no talent whatsoever. During the competition, the Symphony was laughed at by the jury, which included Karl Goldmark and Johannes Brahms. Anton Bruckner was incensed at its members, predicting that « You will hear great things, yet, from this young man ! » .

Shaken, but encouraged by Bruckner not to give in, Hans Rott wrote a pleading letter to conductor Hans Richter, outlining his despair at the prospect of leaving Vienna. He expressed the hope that Richter would include the Symphony in the programme of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and thus enable him to find an alternative income.

Hans Richter met with Hans Rott after several delays, on October 14, 1880, and expressed himself favourably about the Symphony, encouraging Rott to keep composing. But he was not willing to incorporate this early work in the programme of the Philharmonic.

Hans Rott must have become convinced that Johannes Brahms was conspiring against him, jealous of his talents as a musician. Forced to accept the posting at Mullhouse, on the train, there, Rott used his pistol to keep a fellow passenger from lighting a cigar because, « Brahms had fixed the train with dynamite ! » . He was taken to the « Landesirrenanstalt » (insane asylum) , where he was interned as a patient of the lowest, non-paying class, and died of tuberculosis within 3 and a half years, on June 25, 1884.

Little is known of Hans Rott's time at the clinic, except that he kept composing and that he was visited by his friends. He had applied for a State stipend prior to leaving Vienna, but had not heard back from the board. Now, too late, the stipend was awarded to him. A surviving letter of Hans Rott from the asylum to the music-director of Mullhouse where he officially renounces the post as choir director, expresses his hope of getting well again and of being able to stay in Vienna.

Hans Rott's funeral on June 28, 1884, at the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna was attended by Anton Bruckner, who arrived early and spent a significant amount of time alone with the coffin of his young friend. At the funeral itself, Bruckner was seen crying, and stated openly that Brahms' uncalled-for, harsh treatment of an already isolated young composer was to blame for his demise.

Austrian composer Hans Rott (1858-1884) . While at the Vienna Conservatory, Rott became friends with fellow students Anton Krisper, Rudolf Krzyzanowski, Gustav Mahler and Hugo Wolf. Parenthetically, with the exception of Mahler, the other 3 musicians associated with Rott later became insane, a seemingly unusual coincidence. After graduating from the Conservatory, Rott completed his best-known work, the Symphony in E major. He showed it to Johannes Brahms who pronounced it worthless and suggested that the aspiring musician seek another profession. Depressed and increasingly confused, Rott accepted the job of organist and Choir-Master in Mühlhausen, Germany. Traveling to his new post, he tried to stop a fellow passenger from lighting a cigar, raving that Brahms had booby-trapped the train with dynamite. The psychotic composer was committed to a Viennese asylum, where he continued to compose sporadically. Mahler's wife Alma related : « He used the sheets of music-paper he had written on for a very different purpose and said with a grin of delight : " That's all the works of man are worth. " » . The 25 year old Rott died from tuberculosis 2 years after his commitment.

Hans Rott was born on August 1, 1858, in « Brauhirschgrund » , a sub-urban parish of Vienna (today, Vienna 15) as illegitimate son of the actor Carl Mathias Rott (real name : Roth) and the singer and actress Maria Rosalia Lutz. After his parents had married, his father legitimized him in 1863.

From 1874 to 1878, he studied at the Conservatory for Music and Performing Arts of the Society of the Friends of Music in Vienna : piano with Leopold Landskron, organ with Anton Bruckner, harmony with Hermann Grädener and composition with Franz Krenn (together with Gustav Mahler and others) .

In 1876, Hans Rott, a member of the Viennese Academic Wagner Society, attended the 1st Bayreuth Festival. From 1876 to 1878, he was employed as organist at the « Piaristen » Church (Maria Treu) in Vienna with lodgings in the « Piaristen » Monastery. His rooms became the meeting point for numerous fellow students and friends, among them the musicians Rudolf Krzyzanowski, Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, the philologist and archaeologist Friedrich Löwy (as from 1887, Löhr) as well as the scholar of German philology Joseph Seemüller.

Still during his musical studies, Hans Rott became an orphan in 1876. Anton Bruckner tried in vain to find a post as organist in Saint-Florian monastery. In Klosterneuburg for his « favourite student » . From 1878 on, Rott made a living by giving private music lessons and he received financial support from his friends.

When, in September 1880, he presented his 1st Symphony to Johannes Brahms, a member of the jury deciding on the grant of a State scholarship Rott had applied for, he met with a harsh rebuff by Anton Bruckner's antipode. And yet, another of his hopes was doomed : Court Opera conductor, Hans Richter, although showing an interest in a performance of the Symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, was reluctant to commit himself.

In October 1880, chain of unfortunate accidents exerting a heavy psychic strain on Hans Rott caused an already lurking insanity to break out. During a train ride to Mulhouse, in the Alsace, where he had accepted a position as music-director and Choir-Master, he pointed a pistol at a fellow traveller to prevent him from lighting a cigar. The reason for his conduct he gave was that Johannes Brahms had had the carriage filled with dynamite !

In February 1881, Hans Rott was transferred from the Psychiatric Hospital of the General Hospital in Vienna to the Provincial Lunatic Asylum of Lower-Austria. The diagnosis was : insanity, hallucinatory persecution mania. He continued composing at the asylum, later on, however, he gradually developed a deep depression and destroyed some of his compositions. Following several attempts of suicide, he finally died of tuberculosis on June 25, 1884 ; not yet 26 years old.

Like Rikard Nordraak and Guillaume Lekeu, Hans Rott is one of the most painful « could have been » cases in the music of the 19th Century. Highly-talented (Bruckner had great hopes about him) , his Symphony, both in thematic content and compositional techniques, anticipates Gustav Mahler, whose 1st Symphony it predated by 8 years. Rott's mother died in his 2nd year of life. His father, an actor, suffered an accident in 1874 and died 2 years later, leaving the young music student without financial support. He could continue his studies only because the Conservatory, in recognition of his talent, waived the fees for the last 3 years. Rott graduated, aged 19, from Bruckner's organ class with the highest honors. He continued his composition studies at the Conservatory where he was a classmate of Mahler, who wrote about him :

« His innermost nature is so much akin to mine that he and I are like 2 fruits of the same tree. »

At the end of the course, Rott submitted, for the final composition contest, a Symphonic movement that would become the 1st of his Symphony in E major. He was not successful with the conservative jury, and his work was not even graded. He persevered and completed the Symphony in mid-1880. The work makes clear his admiration for both Richard Wagner and Johannes Brahms. Rott wanted to remain in Vienna but he could not find work as a musician there. He tried to persuade Hans Richter, conductor of the Philharmonic Concerts, to perform the Symphony. Although Richter's attitude was sympathetic, he declined to play the work. Rott visited Brahms, in September 1880, to show him the Symphony. Brahms rejected it and hurt him deeply. He had no alternative than accepting a position as organist in Mühlhausen. It is unclear whether the stress or the deprivations he had to endure were the triggering factor, but the fact is that, aged 22, he developed what was diagnosed as « hallucinatory insanity » , in 1881. He was committed to an asylum where he rapidly deteriorated physically and died of tuberculosis in 1884. Apart from the Symphony, he left several orchestral pieces, songs, a String Quartet, and a String Quintet.

The music world began to take an interest in Hans Rott, in 1989, following the world premiere of his Symphony No. 1 in E major, completed in 1880, and rediscovered by Paul W. Banks. The Symphony's 1st movement had not been a success in a composition contest, in 1878, despite Anton Bruckner's dissenting vote. In the remarkably mature work of a 21 year old, we hear besides reminiscences of Wagner, Bruckner and Brahms also well-known themes from Mahler's oeuvre which was conceived only years later.

Mahler who was familiar with the Symphony and (as can be proved) had access to Rott's musical estate acknowledged the composer who had sunken into oblivion as « the founder of the New Symphony ... as I understand it » . In the end, however, he refrained from performing Rott's Symphony with the Viennese Philharmonic Orchestra.

Rott's œuvre does go far beyond this Symphony, the more so as he might have begun composing already before 1874. Of about 80 compositions (part of them are only drafts) , about 25 have come-down to us in a performable state. Some works, among them a String Sextet and essential parts of his 2nd Symphony, had been almost completely destroyed by Rott. All known compositions are kept in the Music Collections of the Austrian National Library in Vienna. In the meantime, almost all performable works have been edited and published.

Although Rott had been clearly influenced by his teacher Anton Bruckner on the one hand, and by Richard Wagner's music on the other hand, he succeeds in creating music that is his very own, part of which is definitely ahead of its time. Thus especially the 1st part of the « Pastoral Prelude » and the « Winter Song » reveal impressionistic tendencies - years ahead of Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel. The double fugue of the « Pastoral Prelude » sounds like an anticipation of Max Reger's music.

Up to now, besides the Symphony No. 1 in E major which is being performed very often in Europe and the United States, the Symphony for string orchestra, the « Pastoral Prelude » , the Prelude to « Julius Cæsar » , the String Quartet in C minor and other chamber music, lieder and choral works had their world premiere. The premiere of the Suite in E major took place in 2005.

So far, the Symphony No. 1, the « Pastoral Prelude » , the « Orchestral Prelude » , the Prelude to « Julius Cæsar » and the String Quartet in C minor are recorded on CD.

Unfortunately, Hans Rott never had any chance to exert a direct influence upon the music of his time. But anyone comparing his Symphony No. 1 in E major with Mahler's (considerably later written) Symphonies and considering that Mahler was familiar with Rott's 1st work, comes to recognize that Rott's ideas have been propagated and advanced by Gustav Mahler's œuvre. Thus Rott is being considered a link between Bruckner and Mahler.

Musicology has already begun to deal with Hans Rott's music and his relationship with Gustav Mahler. The research work is, however, still in its early stages. For it is not only his Symphony No. 1 in E major which holds quite a number of surprises such as themes which surface years later in Gustav Mahler's Symphonies. Other works (« Pastoral Prelude » , « Winter Song ») reveal impressionistic tendencies - long before the 1st impressionistic creations by Claude Debussy or Maurice Ravel. Some parts of the « Pastoral Prelude » also reminds the listener of Max Reger's works for orchestra composed decades later.

Gradually, the musically interested general public is realizing that Rott's music is a true gain not only from a musicological point of view. Thus the number of the annual performances of his 1st Symphony is increasing ; the « Pastoral Prelude » , too, can be heard more often in the concert halls now. And more and more of his works experience their 1st performance - after more than 100 years.

Hans Rott (geboren 1. August 1858 in Brauhirschen, heute zu Wien ; gestorben 25. Juni 1884 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Komponist und Organist.

Rott war der außereheliche Sohn des seinerzeit berühmten Wiener Schauspielers Karl Mathias Rott, der seine Karriere 1874 auf Grund eines Bühnenunfalls aufgeben mußte und 1876 starb. Trotz seiner finanziell schlechten Lage (seine Mutter, die seit 1862 mit K. M. Rott verheiratete Sängerin und Schauspielerin Maria Rosalia, geborene Lutz, war bereits 1872 verstorben) konnte Rott am Wiener Konservatorium studieren und wurde Orgel- und Lieblingsschüler von Anton Bruckner, der seine Fähigkeiten hoch schätzte. Außerdem gehörten Franz Krenn (Komposition) , Hermann Grädener (Harmonielehre) und Leopold Landskron (Klavier) zu seinen Lehrern.

In seiner Kompositionsklasse am Wiener Konservatorium waren folgende Personen eingeschrieben : Mathilde Kralik, Gustav Mahler, Rudolf Krzyzanowski, Rudolf Pichler, Katharina Haus und Ernst Ludwig. Als am 2. Juli 1878 der Concours für Komposition stattfand, wurden alle hier genannten Musikstudenten geprüft. Alle Teilnehmer bekamen Preise, nur Hans Rotts Concours-Arbeit, der erste Satz seiner Symphonie, blieb ohne Preis. Nach Bruckners Erzählung soll die Prüfungskommission bei Anhörung der Symphonie höhnisch gelacht haben. Bruckner soll daraufhin aufgestanden sein und gesagt haben :

Rott schied ohne Diplom und Medaille aus der Kompositionsschule. Sein Abgangszeugnis bekundet allerdings, daß er die Prüfung in Komposition mit vorzüglichem Erfolg bestanden hatte.

1876 bis 1878 hatte Rott eine Organistenstelle an der Piaristenkirche in Wien, widmete sich dann (neben Privatstunden) ganz der Komposition, vor allem seiner Sinfonie in E-Dur. Dieses Hauptwerk wurde jedoch von Johannes Brahms negativ beurteilt und eine Aufführung von dem interessierten Dirigenten Hans Richter aus Zeitgründen zurückgestellt. Als auch ein Antrag auf Gewährung eines staatlichen Stipendiums abgelehnt wurde, verließ Rott 1880 Wien, um eine Stelle als Chorleiter in Mülhausen anzutreten. Bei der Abreise dorthin manifestierte sich seine schwere psychische Krankheit - seinerzeit als « halluzinatorischer Irrsinn und Verfolgungswahn » bezeichnet. Der Abschied von Wien bedeutete offenbar eine derart schwere Belastung, daß es im Zug zur persönlichen Katastrophe kam. Rott bedrohte einen Mitreisenden mit dem Revolver, als der sich eine Zigarre anzünden wollte, weil Brahms den Zug mit Dynamit habe füllen lassen. Rott wurde nach Wien zurückgebracht und dort zunächst in die Psychiatrische Klinik, 1881 in die Niederösterreichische Landes-Irrenanstalt eingewiesen. Den Rest seines kurzen Lebens verbrachte er dort, empfing Besuche seiner Freunde, komponierte noch fallweise, vernichtete aber auch viele seiner Werke. Er verstarb 1884 an Tuberkulose. Hugo Wolf soll Brahms den Mörder Rotts genannt haben.

Hans Rott wurde auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof begraben. Das Grab liegt in der Gruppe 23, Reihe 2, Platz Nummer 59. Es wurde zwischenzeitlich neu vergeben und führt heute die Namen « Schwarz / Sahara ». Eine zusätzlich angebrachte Gedenktafel weist auf Hans Rott hin.

Rotts Symphonie in E-Dur, wie seine anderen Werke seit 1950 in der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek verwahrt, wurde in den 1980er Jahren in einer Bearbeitung von Paul W. Banks veröffentlicht und 1989 in Cincinnati, Ohio in den USA vom Cincinnati Philharmonia Orchestra uraufgeführt. Es ist ein modern anmutendes Werk, das Elemente der Symphonien Gustav Mahlers antizipiert sowie durch sein (insbesondere in den Ecksätzen) organistisches Orchestrierungsverfahren stark an Bruckner erinnert.

Die Komposition entstand gleichzeitig mit der ersten Fassung von Mahlers Kantate Das klagende Lied und neun Jahre vor der Uraufführung von dessen erster Sinfonie. Mahler war Rotts Mitschüler in der Kompositionsklasse von Krenn ; er kannte und schätzte Rotts Werk und stellte es (den Erinnerungen von Natalie Bauer-Lechner zufolge) bewusst und anerkennend in einen Zusammenhang mit seinem eigenen Schaffen. Sämtliche Kompositionen Rotts sind nachgelassene, zu Lebzeiten unveröffentlichte Werke. Während Mahler seine Studien- beziehungsweise Jugendwerke in reiferen Jahren tilgen oder bearbeiten konnte, hatte Hans Rott diese Möglichkeit vor der nachfolgenden Rezeption nicht.

Hans Rott wurde am 1. August 1858 in Brauhirschgrund (heute Wien XV.) als außerehelicher Sohn des Schauspielers und Gesangskomikers Carl Mathias Rott (eigentlich Roth) und der Sängerin und Schauspielerin Maria Rosalia Lutz geboren. Nach der Heirat der Eltern wurde er 1863 von seinem Vater legitimiert.

Von 1874 bis 1878 studierte er am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien, und zwar Klavier bei Leopold Landskron, Orgel bei Anton Bruckner, Harmonielehre bei Hermann Grädener und Komposition bei Franz Krenn (zusammen und andere mit Gustav Mahler) .

Rott war schon 1876 während seiner musikalischen Ausbildung verwaist. Anton Bruckner versuchte vergeblich, seinen « Lieblingsschüler » als Organist nach Sankt Florian beziehungsweise Klosterneuburg zu vermitteln. Seit 1878 lebte Rott von Privatmusikunterricht und von Zuwendungen seiner Freunde.

Als er im September 1880 Johannes Brahms, einem Kuratoriumsmitglied des angestrebten Staatsstipendiums, seine 1. Symphonie vorlegte, empfing er eine herbe Abfuhr des Bruckner-Antipoden. Aber auch eine andere Hoffnung Rotts schien sich zu zerschlagen : Der an einer Aufführung der Symphonie mit den Wiener Philharmonikern interessierte Hofopernkapellmeister Hans Richter wollte sich nicht festlegen.

Eine Verkettung verschiedener weiterer Rott psychisch stark belastender Umstände führte im Oktober 1880 auf der Fahrt nach Mülhausen / Elsass, wohin er als Musikdirektor und Chorleiter engagiert worden war, zum Ausbruch des bereits latent vorhanden gewesenen Wahnsinns : Er hinderte mit gezückter Pistole einen Mitreisenden daran, sich eine Zigarre anzuzünden. Er begründete dies damit, daß Brahms den Waggon mit Dynamit habe füllen lassen.

Rott wurde von der Psychiatrischen Klinik des Allgemeinen Krankenhauses in Wien im Februar 1881 in die Niederösterreichische Landes-Irren-Anstalt überstellt ; die Diagnose lautete : Verrücktheit, halluzinatorischer Verfolgungswahn. Zwar komponierte er auch dort weiter, versank aber später immer mehr in tiefe Traurigkeit und vernichtete etliche seiner Kompositionen. Schließlich verstarb er nach mehreren Selbstmordversuchen am 25. Juni 1884 mit noch nicht einmal 26 Jahren an Tuberkulose.

Zur Uraufführung des « Pastoralen Vorspiels für Orchester » von Hans Rott.

Da es um seinen Lieblingsschüler Hans Rott ging, wurde Anton Bruckner energisch. Carl Hrubý berichtet über einen Vorfall am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde im Juli 1878 :

« Am Schlusse ertönte vom Merkerstuhle - pardon, vom Prüfungstische her - höhnisches Lachen. Da erhob sich der sonst so ängstliche Bruckner und rief den " Merkern " da unten die flammenden Worte entgegen : " Lachen Sie nicht, meine Herren, von dem Manne werden Sie noch Großes hören ! " »

Welches Werk Rotts die Herren des Konservatoriums zum Spott reizte, wird in dem Bericht nicht gesagt ; es handelte sich (mit großer Wahrscheinlichkeit) um den ersten Satz der E-Dur Symphonie des jungen Komponisten, eines Werkes, das mehr als hundert Jahre nach seiner Entstehung eine unvermutete Renaissance erlebte und eine breite Öffentlichkeit mit dem bisher so gut wie unbekanntem Namen « Rott » konfrontierte.

Anton Bruckners Prophezeiung konnte sich freilich nur zum Teil erfüllen. Als am 25. Juni 1884 der kaum sechszwanzigjährige Hans Rott, Patient der niederösterreichischen Landesirrenanstalt, an Tuberkulose starb, gehörten die hochgespannten Hoffnungen und Erwartungen, die seine Freunde in ihn gesetzt hatten, bereits seit geraumer Zeit der Vergangenheit an. Fast vier Jahre lang hatte der tragische Lebensepilog des von den Ärzten aufgegebenen, an « halluzinatorischem Irrsinn und Verfolgungswahn » erkrankten Musikers gedauert, der als Schüler des Konservatoriums die Anerkennung Anton Bruckners, als Komponist die Bewunderung eines kleinen, aber erlesenen Freundeskreises erregt hatte, eines Kreises, dem während seiner frühen Wiener Jahre auch Gustav Mahler angehörte.

Mit dem Namen Mahler ist das Stichwort gefallen, das die Wiederentdeckung Rotts während der achtziger Jahre unseres Jahrhunderts wesentlich bestimmte. Wieder einmal mußte der Anstoß « von außen » kommen : Der englische Musikwissenschaftler Paul W. Banks befaßte sich im Zuge seiner archivalischen Studien zur Jugend Gustav Mahlers und dessen Wiener Freundeskreis auch mit Hans Rotts künstlerischem Nachlaß, der sich seit 1950 in der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek befindet. Das Manuskript der Symphonie in E-Dur erregte sein Interesse, nicht zuletzt wegen des außergewöhnlichen Lobes, das Gustav Mahler diesem Werk viele Jahre nach dem Tod des Jugendfreundes gegenüber Natalie Bauer-Lechner gezollt hatte :

« Was die Musik an ihm verloren hat, ist gar nicht zu ermessen : zu solchem Fluge erhebt sich sein Genius schon in dieser Ersten Symphonie, die er als zwanzigjähriger Jüngling schrieb und die ihn - es ist nicht zu viel gesagt - zum Begründer der neuen Symphonie macht, wie ich sie verstehe. Allerdings ist das, was er wollte, noch nicht ganz erreicht. Es ist, wie wenn einer zu weitestem Wurf ausholt und, noch ungeschickt, nicht völlig ans Ziel hintrifft. Doch ich weiß, wohin er zielt. Ja, er ist meinem Eigensten so verwandt, daß er und ich mir wie zwei Früchte von demselben Baum erscheinen, die derselbe Boden gezeugt, die gleiche Luft genährt hat. An ihm hätte ich unendlich viel haben können und vielleicht hätten wir zwei zusammen den Inhalt dieser neuen Zeit, die für die Musik anbrach, einigermaßen erschöpft. »

Es scheint, daß Mahler zu dieser Zeit (im Sommer 1900) eine Aufführung der Symphonie ins Auge faßte, zu der es jedoch, aus welchen Gründen auch immer, nicht kam. Das Werk schlummerte weiterhin in Schubladen und Archiven, bis Paul W. Banks das Aufführungsmaterial herstellte und die Uraufführung (4. März 1989) in Cincinnati unter Gerhard Samuel initiierte. Das Echo war groß und international ; kurze Zeit später konnte man Rotts Symphonie auch in Paris, London und Wien hören. Fast gleichlautend vermerkte die Kritik bei diesem Werk eine Reihe von auffallenden Mahler-Anklängen, besser gesagt -Antizipationen, da die Symphonie viele Jahre vor Mahlers symphonischem Erstling entstanden war. « Mahlers Nullte oder Rotts Erste ? » fragte anlässlich der Wiener Erstaufführung durch die Wiener Symphoniker unter Carlos Kalmar am 4. März 1990 Wolfgang Fuhrmann im « Standard » und zog das Resümee :

Ähnlich dürften die Dinge bei dem Werk liegen, das nun (immerhin bereits 120 Jahre nach seiner Entstehung) seine Uraufführung erleben wird : dem « Pastoralen Vorspiel für Orchester », beendet 1880, also kurz nach Fertigstellung der Ersten Symphonie. Zum « Pastoralen Vorspiel » ist der biographischen Rott-Literatur so gut wie nichts zu entnehmen ; umso gespannter darf man sein, ob sich das Phänomen des « vorweggenommenen Mahler » auch in der Klanggestalt dieses Werkes kundtun wird, dessen Partitur aus solchem Blickwinkel einiges verspricht. Vor allem die von Vogellauten und Haltetönen bestimmte Naturszene am Beginn von Mahlers Erster erscheint als Reminiszenz mancher Stellen des « Pastoralen Vorspiels », das (im Gegensatz zur Symphonie) nicht zur Präsentation vor einer Prüfungskommission gedacht war, wodurch der klanglichen und formalen Phantasie des Komponisten keinerlei Schranken auferlegt wurden. Und so drängt sich die Frage auf : Welche Beziehung bestand zwischen Rott und Mahler ? Entsprechend der musikalischen Verwandtschaft tatsächlich eine Gleichgestimmtheit der Charaktere ?

Eine (allerdings äußerst subjektive) Antwort gab Rotts Jugendfreund Heinrich Krzyżanowski, der in seinen schriftlichen Erinnerungen über die Beziehung zu Mahler festhält :

Tatsächlich ist auch keine Aussage Rotts überliefert, die auf eine engere Freundschaft mit Mahler hindeutet ; auch dürfte sich Mahler aus dem Musiker-Freundeskreis, der sich in den Jahren 1877 und 1878 regelmäßig in Rotts Zimmer im Piaristenkloster traf, nach 1878 zurückgezogen haben. Rotts tragisches Schicksal und der sehr individuelle Gestus seiner Musik scheinen auf den um nur zwei Jahre jüngeren Kollegen aber einen tiefen Eindruck gemacht haben, der (man denke an die Bemerkung gegenüber Natalie Bauer-Lechner) über Jahrzehnte hinweg lebendig blieb und Rott in Mahlers Denken gewissermaßen zu einer Symbolfigur des Scheiterns machte.

Anläufe, enttäuschte Hoffnungen : unter diesem Motto steht Rotts kurzer Lebensweg. Am 1. August 1858 als Sohn des Schauspielers Carl Matthias Rott geboren, absolvierte der Knabe zunächst das Akademische Gymnasium und zwei Jahre einer Handelslehranstalt. Erst dann dürfte ihm die Berufung zur Musik klar geworden sein ; ab 1874 studierte er am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (Orgel bei Bruckner, Harmonielehre bei Grädener, Komposition bei Krenn) . Wagner, der Abgott des Bruckner-Kreises, zog auch ihn in seinen Bann : 1875 trat Rott dem Wiener akademischen Wagner-Verein bei, 1876 besuchte er die ersten Bayreuther Festspiele. Während der folgenden zwei Jahre war er (unter sehr kärglichen Lebensverhältnissen) Organist des Josefstädter Kirchenmusikvereins und lebte im Piaristenkloster. Die Organistenstelle gab er 1878 auf, im gleichen Jahr beendete er seine Studien am Konservatorium, und nun begann eine zweijährige, von wiederholten Mißerfolgen bestimmte Suche nach einer festen Anstellung.

Seine Unterhandlungen mit Sankt Florian und Klosterneuburg blieben ebenso vergeblich wie seine Bewerbungen an der Michaeler- und Votivkirche in Wien. Bruckner half mit Empfehlungsschreiben; eines blieb im Rott-Nachlaß erhalten :

Gefühlsbetonte Ortsgebundenheit und eine Liebesbeziehung fesselten Rott an Wien, doch immer klarer erwies es sich, daß er hier keine Zukunft hatte. Allerdings waren die Jahre bis 1880 bei aller Sorge um das materielle Überleben auch eine schöpferische Phase ; nicht nur die Symphonie in E-Dur entstand in diesem Zeitraum, sondern auch (parallel dazu) das « Pastorale Vorspiel » und das (kompositorisch höchst avancierte) Streichquartett in C-Moll. Rott bewarb sich um den Beethoven-Preis und das Staatsstipendium für Musiker und reichte 1880 die Symphonie und das « Pastorale Vorspiel » im Unterrichtsministerium ein, weiters schienen ihm Besuche bei den Mitgliedern der Preiskommission angebracht, der auch Johannes Brahms angehörte. Der Besuch bei Brahms dürfte für den jungen Komponisten, dessen hochgradige Nervosität bereits eine psychische Krise ankündigte, ein traumatisches Erlebnis gewesen sein. Brahms habe sich, wie Rott danach seinen Freunden berichtete, schroff ablehnend über die Symphonie geäußert und hinzugefügt, « das könne er unmöglich selbst gemacht haben » .

Eine schwere Belastung bedeutete für Rott zudem der bevorstehende Abschied von Wien, denn eine halbherzig abgegebene Bewerbung um die Position des Leiters der elsässischen Chorvereinigung « Concordia » hatte Erfolg gehabt

; Rott mußte die Stellung antreten und reiste Ende Oktober 1880 von Wien ab. Im Zug kam es zur Katastrophe. Rott bedrohte einen Mitreisenden, der sich eine Zigarre anzünden wollte, mit dem Revolver : Brahms habe den Zug mit Dynamit füllen lassen. Er wurde nach Wien zurückgebracht und in die Psychiatrische Klinik des Allgemeinen Krankenhauses eingewiesen. Den Rest seines kurzen, tragischen Lebens verbrachte er hinter den Mauern psychiatrischer Anstalten.

Es mag zynisch anmuten, ein solches Lebensschicksal im Rückblick als « interessanter » zu klassifizieren als eine wohlgeordnete, « normale » Biographie. Sicherlich rechtfertigt es nicht eo ipso das Interesse an den hinterlassenen Kompositionen ; diese müssen sich im Konzertbetrieb durch ihre eigenen, immanenten Qualitäten legitimieren. Die Symphonie in E-Dur hat die Prüfung durch die Öffentlichkeit bereits bestanden, dem « Pastoralen Vorspiel » steht sie noch bevor. Sicherlich läßt sich einiges aufgrund der Partitur über das Werk sagen : daß es als breit angelegtes Crescendo konzipiert ist, sich in ein Präludium und eine Fuge gliedert, kammermusikalisch-raffinierte Instrumentation zeigt und Zeugnis für die kontrapunktische Phantasie seines Schöpfers ablegt. Doch erst das reale Klangereignis wird erweisen, ob das Eigentliche gelungen ist. Und das wäre die Entdeckung eines Werkes, das uns als unmittelbares musikalisches Erlebnis begegnet, nicht nur im Sinne einer späten « Ehrenrettung » Hans Rotts.

L'élève Rudolf Krzyzanowski

Heinrich Krzyzanowski (1855-1933) : écrivain autrichien et frère de Rudolf. Un ami proche de Gustav Mahler dans sa jeunesse. Il étudie la philologie allemande à l'Université de Vienne avant de se rendre à Starnberg, près de Munich, en 1883.

Rudolf Krzyzanowski : Violoniste, pianiste, organiste et chef d'orchestre né le 5 avril 1859 (ou 1862) à Eger (Cheb) , en République tchèque, et mort le 20 juin 1911, à Graz, en Autriche. Il fut l'élève d'Anton Bruckner au Conservatoire de Vienne. De plus, il fera partie de la classe de composition de 3e année du professeur Franz Krenn. Lors du concert de création du Quatuor avec piano de Gustav Mahler, on entendra également l'Adagio pour Sextuor à cordes de Rudolf Krzyzanowski. Les 2 pièces recevront d'ailleurs un prix.

L'amitié de Gustav Mahler avec les frères Krzyzanowski datait de leur prime jeunesse ; elle était considérée chaleureuse et intime. Mahler entreprit quelques excursions en forêt et en montagne en leur compagnie. Gustav et Rudolf partageaient les mêmes intérêts et les mêmes ambitions.

Après avoir quitté le Conservatoire, Rudolf Krzyzanowski va occuper différents postes. Pendant quelques années, la correspondance de Mahler fera souvent référence à la carrière de Rudolf. Mahler était toujours prêt à le conseiller ou à user de son influence lorsque cela était nécessaire. Il va d'ailleurs suggérer à l'agent de Rudolf que son protégé puisse continuer à remplir ses fonctions à Cassell malgré le déménagement à Leipzig.

Au moins jusque dans les années 1890, les lettres démontrent que Mahler est demeuré en contact avec ces 2 compagnons. Heinrich Krzyzanowski va un jour écrire à Mahler pour lui suggérer un projet d'Opéra mais il semble qu'il n'y eut pas de suite.

De 1891 à 1895, Rudolf Krzyżanowski succèdera à Prague à Karl Muck, comme chef principal du « Neues Deutsches Theater » (Nouveau Théâtre Allemand) . Le 16 décembre 1894, il va diriger la première de l'Opéra-comique en 3 actes « Donna Diana » du compositeur tchèque Emil von Reznicek. Selon les dires de ce dernier, citées dans le livre « Künstler plaudern » , l'œuvre est devenue non seulement un franc-succès mais un succès mondial. (D'autres productions auront lieu dans plusieurs Théâtres allemands.) Son Ouverture, qui a rapidement passé dans le répertoire des salles de concert (il en existe d'ailleurs plusieurs enregistrements) , possède à l'origine une histoire assez tumultueuse. Le directeur de la Maison lui a mentionné, 1 jour avant la première : « Il est vraiment regrettable que cet Opéra ne possède pas d'Ouverture, ne pourriez-vous pas en écrire une ? » . « Je suis resté debout toute la nuit à composer. J'avais 24 ans à l'époque ! » .

Le livret de « Donna Diana » , écrit par le compositeur, est basé sur une traduction allemande de Carl August West (« Joseph Schreyvogel ») intitulée « Donna Diana oder Stolz und Liebe » de la comédie espagnole « El desdén con el desdén » de Agustín Moreto y Cavana.

Rudol Krzyżanowski sera le principal responsable de l'intronisation du compositeur Emil von Reznicek dans une Société professionnelle qui va exister jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale à Prague : la « Gesellschaft zur Förderung deutscher Wissenschaft, Kunst und Literatur » .

En 1896, après son séjour à Prague, Rudolf et son épouse, la soprano Ida Doxat (1867-?) , s'en vont rejoindre Gustav Mahler à Hambourg où Krzyżanowski deviendra son assistant-chef à l'Opéra. Selon la correspondance de Justine Mahler à Ernestine Löhr, une tension considérable va s'installer entre les 2 musiciens durant cette période.

En 1898, Rudolf Krzyżanowski devient le directeur musical du « Hoftheater » de Weimar ; il conservera ce poste jusqu'en 1907. Krzyżanowski sera responsable de la programmation du « Donna Diana » de Reznicek.

Le Théâtre national allemand (« Deutsches Nationaltheater ») est un théâtre de Weimar créé en 1791 et appelé jusqu'en 1918 le théâtre de la Cour grand-ducale (« Großherzogliches Hoftheater ») .

Sa renommée a été établie par Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, qui fut son 1er intendant, de 1791 à 1817, et y collabora pendant plusieurs années avec Friedrich Schiller. Au XIXe siècle, l'établissement compta parmi ses directeurs musicaux Franz Liszt, qui y créa notamment l'Opéra « Lohengrin » de Richard Wagner, en 1850, et Richard Strauß, qui y créa notamment son Poème symphonique « Don Juan » , en 1889, et l'Opéra « Hänsel und Gretel » d'Engelbert Humperdinck, en 1893.

Le théâtre est également l'un des lieux de mémoire de la démocratie allemande, ayant accueilli en 1919 les séances de l'Assemblée nationale constituante et vu l'adoption de la nouvelle constitution de l'Allemagne républicaine, qui sera appelée plus tard pour cette raison : « République de Weimar » .

Le bâtiment actuel a été construit en 1906 par Max Littmann, l'intérieur ayant été reconstruit en 1946-1948.

Comme ses condisciples du Conservatoire, Hans Rott et Hugo Wolf, Rudolf Krzyżanowski va mourir fou, le 21 juin 1911, seulement quelques semaines après le décès de son collègue et ami d'enfance, Gustav Mahler.

Profession : Conductor.

Residences : Cheb (Eger) , Vienna, Prague.

His brother was Heinrich Krzyżanowski (1855-1933) .

Both brothers were close friends of Hans Rott (1858-1884) and Gustav Mahler.

Relation to Gustav Mahler : Close friend.

Correspondence with Mahler : Yes.

Married to : Ida Doxat (born in 1867) .

Died insane : 20 June 1911, in Graz, Austria (only few weeks after Mahler's own death) .

Studied violin, piano, organ and composition at the « Conservatorium » in Vienna (1872-1876) together with Gustav Mahler and member of Professor Franz Krenn's 3rd year composition class. At the same concert in which Gustav Mahler's prize-winning Scherzo for piano quintet was played, an Adagio for string sextet by Rudolf Krzyżanowski was performed : it too, was awarded a prize.

9 December 1876 : Rudolf Krzyżanowski and Gustav Mahler gave a concert in Jihlava (Iglau) , at the Hotel Czap, Nos. 15/1696 Zizkova street (Johann's « Platz » No. 50/51) .

July 1883 : During a holiday trip to the Fichtel mountains and Wundsiedel (birth-place of Jean Paul ; 1763-1825) , Gustav Mahler stayed at the parents' house of his friends Heinrich and Rudolf Krzyżanowski, at No. 460 Provaznicka Street, in Cheb.

A musical event of major importance in Mahler's Viennese years was his discovery of Richard Wagner's Opera « Götterdämmerung » , which he experienced in the company of 2 close friends, Hugo Wolf and Rudolf Krzyżanowski (Alma Mahler is the source of the well-known story of their expulsion from lodgings as a result of a vigorous performance of the Trio which ends Act II) .

Krzyżanowski also studied at the « Conservatorium » of Prague. After leaving the « Conservatorium » , he seems to have held a number of conducting appointments, the most of which were in Prague where he succeeded Karl Muck as Ist conductor, from 1892 to 1895, and Weimar where he was « Hofkapellmeister » , from 1898 to 1907. Mahler's early friendship with the Krzyżanowski brothers was warm and intimate. He had interests and ambitions in common with Rudolf, and his holiday plans on occasions included both brothers. His correspondence for some years makes frequent reference to Rudolf's career and he was always ready to advise, or use his influence on his friend's behalf, where such was required. He suggested to his agent, for instance, that Rudolf should fill his post at Kassel when he moved on to Leipzig. Until the 1890's, at least, his letters show that he kept in touch with these companions of his youth. At one stage, Heinrich wrote to Mahler suggesting an Operatic project, but it appears that nothing came of the idea. They did Alpine walking together. Rudolf worked as « Kapellmeister » in Halle an der Saale, Elberfeld, Munich, Prague and Hamburg. He worked in Hamburg with Gustav Mahler, from 1892 to 1897. He worked in Weimar, from 1898 to 1907. In November 1899, he performed Gustav Mahler's completion of « Die Drei Pintos » . Rudolf Krzyżanowski worked with Mahler in preparing the piano-duet version of Bruckner's Symphony No. 3.

Rudolf Krzyżanowski succeeded Karl Muck in 1892 as Ist conductor at the « Neues Deutsches Theater » (Prague German Theater) . He conducted there the premiere of « Donna Diana » on December 16, 1894. In the composer's words written for the book « Künstler plaudern » , the work became not only a great success, but even a world success. And the Overture, which indeed passed into the repertoire of the concert halls, had a tumultuous story of origin. Initially, that is to say, there was to come from me its Overture, but the manager suggested one day before the premiere, « It is truly unfortunate that this Opera has no Overture - could you not still write one ? » I sat-up all night and composed it. I was 24 years old back then ! » Krzyżanowski figures prominently in Reznicek's induction into a professional Society that existed until the end of the Second World War in Prague : the « Gesellschaft zur Förderung deutscher Wissenschaft, Kunst und Literatur » . After Prague, Krzyżanowski became an assistant to Gustav Mahler at the Hamburg Opera. From 1898 through 1907, he was Ist conductor at the Weimar Theater where he would conduct that theater's production of « Donna Diana » .

« Donna Diana » is a comic opera in 3 acts by Emil von Reznicek. The libretto, written by the composer, is based on a German translation by Carl August West (« Joseph Schreyvogel ») titled « Donna Diana oder Stolz und Liebe » of the Spanish comedy « El desdén con el desdén » by Agustín Moreto y Cavana. It was Ist performed on 16 December 1894 at the Neues Deutsches Theater in Prague. The Opera was successful in its day, with productions in several German theatres, but currently is rarely performed ; its Overture, however, has often been recorded and is sometimes heard in the concert-hall.

The Austrian late- Romantic composer of Czech ancestry Emil Nikolaus Freiherr von Reznicek was born on 4 May 1860 in Vienna and died on 2 August 1945 in Berlin. (Ferdinand von Reznicek was his half-brother.) He studied law and music simultaneously in Graz. He did not finish his law degree, but continued to study music, his teacher being Wilhelm Mayer (pseudonym : W. A. Rémy) . Subsequently, he conducted at the theater in Graz, in Berlin and a few other places. From 1886 to 1894, he was « Kapellmeister » of the 88th Infantry of Prague, and it was here that he saw his greatest triumph with the premiere of « Donna Diana » (16 December 1894) . In the spring of 1902, he settled in Berlin, touring to Russia and England from time to time. When the Nazi Party came to power in 1933, Reznicek tried not to become involved, but stayed in Berlin.

Emil von Reznicek was a personal friend of Richard Strauß. However, the relation between the 2 seems to have been an ambivalent one. Reznicek's Symphonic poem « Schlemihl » (1912) can be seen as a direct parody of Strauß' « A Hero's Life ». The use of (often sarcastic) humor is a feature of much of Reznicek's music, from the jibbering Blaubart in the Opera « Ritter Blaubart » through the sardonic Dance around the « Golden Calf from Der Sieger » (1913) to the expressionist Tarantella last movement of his Dance Symphony No. 5 (1925). This « Eulenspiegel » (a reference to the literary prankster, « Till Eulenspiegel ») frequently got him into trouble in a world that was unaccustomed to the use of humour in music and art.

Today, Reznicek is mainly remembered for the Overture to his Opera « Donna Diana », composed in 1894. The Overture is a popular stand-alone piece at Symphonic concerts and it served as the theme for the American radio (1947-1955) series « Challenge of the Yukon », which later migrated to the TV series (1955-1958) « Sergeant Preston of the Yukon ». It was also used in the 1950's on the BBC's « Children's Hour » by Stephen King-Hall for his talks on current affairs.

WAB manquant : « Symphonisches Präludium »

WAB missing (1875-1876) : « Symphonisches Präludium » ; Symphonic prelude in C minor for orchestra (« Studien Partitur ») . Doubtful authorship. Orchestrated by Albrecht Gürsching.

Orchestersatz in C-Moll nach der Niederschrift des Bruckner-Schülers Rudolf Krzyzanowski aus dem Jahr 1876 mit dem Schriftzug von « Anton Bruckner » ; mit Faksimile-Wiedergabe des Autographs.

DOBLI 12104, Ludwig Döblinger Musikverlag.

Co-authors : Wolfgang Hittl and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

Henri-Louis de la Grange's marathon biography of Gustav Mahler makes no mention of this work. In addition to the fact that the music as found in the Austrian National Library was a piano reduction, Albrecht Gürsching had to undertake the task of re-orchestrating it to how he believed it might have sounded like in that format. In addition to sounding like a combination of Mahler and Bruckner, it has a bit of the sound of early Richard Strauß, particularly from the era before the tone poems, such as his 4 movement work, « Aus Italien » at least from the texture of Gürsching's re-orchestration. The overall flow of the work takes on the sound of a Bruckner Symphony composed around 1876. It could be an abandoned attempt for a movement to one of his early Symphonies, or another attempt at a stand-alone work similar to his obscure Overture in G minor.

The Symphonic Prelude for orchestra functions much like the Organ Prelude that would herald the start of a festive liturgical service. Here, it serves as a tuneful and exciting « Introit » to the dramatic lyricism of the Mass in F minor.

The « Symphonisches Präludium » in C minor (of 1876) has a curious, and convoluted, history tied to the Estate of Rudolf Krzyżanowski (1859-1911) , who, along with Gustav Mahler, was a pupil of Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory, in the mid-1870's. After World War II, the manuscript we know as the « Symphonic Prelude » was found among the items belonging to the Estate of Krzyżanowski. The manuscript is a hand-written orchestral score of 43 pages, bearing the inscription « Rudolf Krzyżanowski copied. 1876 » on the 1st page, and, on the last page, in large, blue letters, « von Anton Bruckner » . In 1948-1949, copies of the work were given to leading Bruckner scholars for their examination. Some of these experts, such as Max Auer and conductor Volkmar Andreae, viewed the attribution to Bruckner positively, and Andreae agreed to conduct the premiere with the Vienna Philharmonic. Unfortunately, the members of the Orchestra, all of whom were very familiar with Bruckner's Symphonies, voted their expert opinion as against Bruckner's authorship and refused the premiere. A 3rd scholar, Leopold Nowak, the « editor in chief » of the official « Complete Edition of the Works » of Anton Bruckner, was asked to render his judgment. Although, he never did express a clear « ja » or « nein » , he chose not to include it in the « Complete Edition » .

Although scholars to this day disagree about the likelihood that some or all of the music of this « Symphonisches Präludium » originates with Bruckner, what we do have is a performing edition of a Symphonic work of somewhat mysterious origins that seems to have originated in the circle of Bruckner's students in the 1870's. In fact, much of its interest derives from the mystery of who might have composed it.

1875-1876 : WAB manquant : « Symphonisches Präludium » (« Studien Partitur ») , prélude Symphonique en do mineur pour orchestre. Cette œuvre, qui est souvent attribuée à Gustav Mahler ou à Rudolf Krzyżanowski, un autre élève de Bruckner, est, selon le musicologue Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, de la plume de Bruckner. Il ressort clairement de son analyse stylistique que le matériel musical de ce mouvement Symphonique, en forme d'ouverture, est bien de Bruckner, notamment car certains de ses éléments rappellent les précédentes 2e et 3e Symphonies, ainsi que les esquisses de la Symphonie en si bémol majeur de 1869, et la réapparition fuguée du 2e motif rappelle le 1er motif du Finale de la contemporaine 5e Symphonie, tandis que d'autres préfigurent même des éléments de la 9e Symphonie, que personne ne pouvait déjà connaître en 1876. Fac-similé et partition édités par Wolfgang Hittl et Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs : Ludwig Döblinger Musikverlag, Vienne (2002) ; DOBLI 12104 - STP 704, ISMN 012-18981-7. Albrecht Gürsching en a fait une orchestration.

« Le 15 et le 16 mars 1981, l'Orchestre RIAS de Berlin-Ouest a donné, sous la direction de Lawrence Foster, la 1re audition d'un " Prélude Symphonique ", orchestré par le musicologue hambourgeois Albrecht Gürsching. Renseignements pris auprès de ce dernier, il s'agissait de l'orchestration d'un manuscrit appartenant à la " Nationalbibliothek " de Vienne et dont la page-titre porte la mention suivante : " Prélude Symphonique, d'après la copie d'un élève de Bruckner, Rudolf Krzyżanowski, de l'année 1876, censément d'Anton Bruckner. Transcription pour piano d'après la partition d'orchestre de Heinrich Tschuppik. ". Au bas de la page a été ajoutée la note suivante : " Pourrait-il s'agir d'un travail de Gustav Mahler, réalisé pour un examen ? Krzyżanowski a collaboré avec Mahler à la transcription pour piano à 4 mains de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner (2e version) ". On perd alors la trace de la partition que Tschuppik

a transcrite. Son manuscrit comprend 8 feuillets à 16 portées, dont une double-page servant de couverture, et 3 pages blanches. Certains passages sont notés sur 3 portées, avec quelques indications concernant l'orchestration originale. L'ensemble est composé de 292 mesures et le tempo indiqué est " nicht zu rasch " (pas trop vif) . Le morceau commence par le thème suivant des basses, accompagné par un ostinato typiquement brucknérien. »

Le Prélude symphonique : composé par Bruckner ?

Le « Symphonisches Präludium » est en quelque sorte un mystère. S'il n'est pas de Gustav Mahler, il émane certes de Vienne, à l'époque où il était étudiant. Il fut découvert à la fin des années 1970 à la Bibliothèque nationale d'Autriche : une transcription pour piano d'un certain Heinrich Tschuppik, faite au départ de ce que la page-titre décrit comme une partition : « de l'année 1876 ; attribuée à Anton Bruckner ; copiée par son élève Rudolf Krzyżanowski » . Les sonorités et le style du Prélude portent fortement, certes, la marque de Bruckner et nullement celle de Richard Wagner. Toutefois, certaines particularités structurelles ont conduit des musicologues à le considérer plutôt comme l'œuvre d'un compositeur plus jeune, inspiré par Bruckner. Comme Rudolf Krzyżanowski était un compagnon d'étude de Mahler et un ami proche qui cultivait pour lui une grande admiration, on fut très tenté de ne voir là qu'une composition qui daterait des années où Mahler était étudiant et qui se serait perdue. Le mystère ne sera peut-être jamais éclairci. On sait que les œuvres plus tardives de Mahler et la Symphonie de Hans Rott, un autre compagnon d'étude, étaient thématiquement très proches. On pourrait donc raisonnablement supposer qu'il existait, à la fin des années 1870, une communauté assez profonde de style et même de conceptions musicales au sein du cercle de Mahler, dont les membres étaient influencés et inspirés l'un par l'autre. Mahler, très certainement, a eu connaissance et est identifié à ce mouvement symphonique largement méditatif, même s'il ne l'a pas lui-même composé. Si vraiment il s'agit d'une œuvre inconnue d'Anton Bruckner, le fait de la retrouver sous forme d'une copie autographe d'un ami de Mahler lui confère une valeur exemplaire d'autant plus grande quant au type de musique sur lequel ils se penchaient et dont naîtrait le style personnel du plus éminent de leur collègue. (Albrecht Gürsching en réalisera l'orchestration.)

Krzyżanowski a collaboré avec Mahler à la transcription pour piano à 4 mains de la 3^e Symphonie de Bruckner (2^e version) ". On perd alors la trace de la partition que Tschuppik a transcrite. Son manuscrit comprend 8 feuillets à 16 portées, dont une double-page servant de couverture, et 3 pages blanches. Certains passages sont notés sur 3 portées, avec quelques indications concernant l'orchestration originale. L'ensemble est composé de 292 mesures et le tempo indiqué est « nicht zu rasch » (pas trop vif) . Le morceau commence par le thème suivant des basses, accompagné par un ostinato typiquement brucknérien. »

The « Symphonisches Präludium » (Symphonic Prelude) in C minor is an orchestral composition by Anton Bruckner or his entourage, composed in 1876. The work was discovered shortly after World War II. Heinrich Tschuppik, who found the orchestral score of the work in the Estate of Bruckner's pupil Rudolf Krzyżanowski, attributed the authorship to Bruckner. 30 years later, Mahler scholar Paul Banks, who knew only a 4 stave reduction of the work, attributed the work to Mahler and requested its orchestration. Based on the original orchestral score, it seems likely that the work was at least sketched by Bruckner, possibly as an exercise in orchestration for Krzyżanowski.

After World War II, Heinrich Tschuppik discovered a 43 page long manuscript of an unknown Overture-like Symphonic movement in C minor in the Estate of his uncle, Rudolf Krzyżanowski. The manuscript carried the inscription : « Rudolf Krzyżanowski cop. 1876 » , on the 1st page ; and, on the last page, in large blue letters : « von Anton Bruckner » (by Anton Bruckner) .

Krzyżanowski was a pupil of Anton Bruckner, who, together with Gustav Mahler, prepared in 1877 the piano transcription of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony. Tschuppik reported his finding in the « Schweizerische Musikzeitung » and in the « Süddeutsche Zeitung » , prepared a clean copy of the score and hand-written orchestral parts, and arranged also a 4 stave « particello » of it. A copy of the manuscript was also made for storing in the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » .

Tschuppik showed the piece to experts on Bruckner, Max Auer and Franz Gräßlinger, and conductor Volkmar Andreae. Andreae agreed to perform this unknown « Sinfonisches Präludium » with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. However, the performance, which had been planned for 23 January 1949 did not take place, because Leopold Nowak, who was asked for expertise, had not been able to come to a final conclusion about the authorship. The premiere was performed later by the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra under Fritz Rieger, on 7 September 1949.

Shortly afterwards, Tschuppik died and his clean copy, hand-written orchestral parts, and a photocopy of the 4 stave « particello » remained stored in the archive of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. The photocopy of the original manuscript remained in Nowak's possession and was returned to the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek », after his death in May 1991. Nowak had not included the « Symphonisches Präludium » in Bruckner's « Gesamtausgabe » because he still doubted its authorship.

Tschuppik had also given a copy of his own « particello » arrangement of the « Präludium » to Gertrud Staub-Schlöpfer, in Zürich. After studying the piece, Staub-Schlöpfer wrote on top of the « particello » :

« Könnte das nicht eine Arbeit für Prüfung von Gustav Mahler sein ? Krzyzanowski gab den Klavierauszug zur dritten Symphonie Bruckners (2. Fassung) heraus mit Mahler zusammen. »

« Could this perhaps be composed by Gustav Mahler for his examination ? Krzyzanowski edited the piano arrangement of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony (2nd version) together with Mahler. »

On 7 September 1949, on the same day as the 1st performance of the « Präludium » in Munich, she gave the « particello » to the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » .

30 years later, Mahler's scholar Paul Banks discovered in the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » the « particello » annotated by Staub-Schlöpfer and, following her suggestion, assumed that the piece could indeed be one of the lost works that Mahler had composed during his time at the Vienna Conservatory. Since the « particello » was the only source he knew, Banks asked Albrecht Gürsching to complement the instrumentation. This « reconstruction » was 1st performed by the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra under Lawrence Foster, on 15 March 1981, as « “ Symphonisches Präludium ” by Gustav Mahler » and, later, recorded as such by Neeme Järvi in 1992.

The truth came to the light in 1985 when Wolfgang Hiltl discovered the documents stored in the archive of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. He bought Krzyzanowski's original manuscript from Tschuppik's family and let it be published. Nevertheless, not everyone became convinced that the piece was originated by Bruckner, and so, the « controversial » piece remained rarely performed. The original orchestration was performed 1st by Gerhard Samuel with the Cincinnati Philharmonic Orchestra, in March 1997 ; and, in 2010, by Baldur Brönnimann with the BBC National Orchestra of Wales, and Markus Stenz with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam, respectively. A recording of these 3 performances has been placed in the Bruckner archive.

In 2008, Wolfgang Hiltl died unexpectedly and Krzyzanowski's original manuscript of the « Symphonic Prelude » ended -up on the garbage slope of his apartment.

Wolfgang Hiltl, who undertook a meticulous examination of the 293 bar long manuscript in the light of Bruckner's contemporary pieces, came to the conclusion that the most likely assumption would be that Bruckner had given a score to Krzyzanowski, perhaps as an exercise in instrumentation. It seemed clear that the entire musical substance was by Bruckner himself, most likely as an « emerging autograph score », with all string parts, some important lines for woodwind and brass, and perhaps, a few passages already entirely completed.

Krzyżanowski's copy is laid-out only for Bruckner's typical orchestra of double woodwind, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, timpani, and strings - the orchestration used by Bruckner from his 5th Symphony, composed in 1875-1876, and revised in 1877-1878.

The 1st theme, which contains the core of the main-themes of the 1st Symphony and 2nd Symphony in C minor, is repeated in tutti (bar 43) , leading into a dark chorale (bar 59) , pre-shadowing the structure of that from the Finale of the 9th Symphony, and even a significant epilogue (bar 73) , which is used later in the development (bar 160) .

The 2nd theme (bar 87) reflects ideas of the 3rd Symphony and the « Miserere » of the D minor Mass.

The closing-theme is an energetic trumpet call with a repeated minor 9th, as at the beginning of the Adagio from the 9th Symphony, which is also pre-shadowing the end of its 1st movement.

The 2nd part (bar 148) brings 2 elements from the main-theme in variants, leading into a threefold outburst of it in the dominant (bar 195) ; tonic (bar 201) ; and sub-dominant (bar 207) . The recapitulation of the 2nd theme is a fugato (bar 221) with a development section, which again reflects the 3rd Symphony (bars 249) , leading into a climax, in which both 1st and 2nd themes appear simultaneously (bar 267) .

The rather short Coda is merely a final cadence with almost no thematic material left, only reflecting the closing-theme, as a repeated chain of minor 2nds. One may assume that this elaboration by Krzyżanowski, which sounds rather provisional, may have been filled-up later with more concise motivic derivations.

It seems, indeed, clear from Hiltl's stylistic examination that the musical material itself is all Bruckner's, because some of these ideas even anticipate some music from the 9th Symphony, composed some 25 years later, which nobody can have known already in 1876. In all, this « Symphonic Prelude » constitutes an extremely advanced, « experimental » Sonata-movement, with a dramatic, almost radical 2nd part combining development, recapitulation and Coda to a unified and radical 2nd part. The musical language and structure anticipate much of Bruckner's last composition, the Symphonic choral work « Helgoland » (1893) .

Henri-Louis de la Grange's marathon biography of Gustav Mahler makes no mention of this work. In addition to the fact that the music as found in the Austrian National Library was a piano reduction, Albrecht Gürsching had to undertake the task of re-orchestrating it to how he believed it might have sounded like in that format. In addition to sounding like a combination of Mahler and Bruckner, it has a bit of the sound of early Richard Strauß, particularly from the era before the tone poems, such as his 4 movement work, « Aus Italien » at least from the texture of Gürsching's re-orchestration. The overall flow of the work takes on the sound of a Bruckner Symphony composed around 1876. It could be an abandoned attempt for a movement to one of his early Symphonies, or another attempt at a stand-alone work similar to his obscure Overture in G minor.

The Symphonic Prelude for orchestra functions much like the organ prelude that would herald the start of a festive liturgical service. Here, it serves as a tuneful and exciting « Introit » to the dramatic lyricism of the Mass in F minor.

The « Symphonisches Präludium » in C minor (of 1876) has a curious, and convoluted, history tied to the Estate of Rudolf Krzyzanowski (1859-1911) , who, along with Gustav Mahler, was a pupil of Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory in the mid-1870's. After World War II, the manuscript we know as the Symphonic Prelude was found among the items belonging to the Estate of Krzyzanowski. The manuscript is a hand-written orchestral score of 43 pages, bearing the inscription « Rudolf Krzyzanowski copied. 1876 » on the 1st page, and, on the last page, in large, blue letters, « von Anton Bruckner » . In 1948-1949, copies of the work were given to leading Bruckner scholars for their examination. Some of these experts, such as Max Auer and conductor Volkmar Andreae, viewed the attribution to Bruckner positively, and Andreae agreed to conduct the premiere with the Vienna Philharmonic. Unfortunately, the members of the Orchestra, all of whom were very familiar with Bruckner's Symphonies, voted their expert opinion as against Bruckner's authorship and refused the premiere. A 3rd scholar, Leopold Nowak, the « editor in chief » of the official Complete Edition of the Works of Anton Bruckner, was asked to render his judgment. Although, he never did express a clear « ja » or « nein » , he chose not to include it in the Complete Edition.

Although scholars to this day disagree about the likelihood that some or all of the music of this « Symphonisches Präludium » originates with Bruckner, what we do have is a performing edition of a Symphonic work of somewhat mysterious origins that seems to have originated in the circle of Bruckner's students in the 1870's. In fact, much of its interest derives from the mystery of who might have composed it.

The history of this Overture-like Symphonic movement in C minor of 293 bars length, ascribed to Anton Bruckner, is most curious : after the Second World War, the Viennese composer Heinrich Tschuppik discovered an unknown music manuscript in the Estate of his uncle, the composer Rudolf Krzyzanowski (born on 5 April 1859 ; died on 21 June 1911) . He was a pupil of Anton Bruckner and is known to Brucknerians because he, together with Gustav Mahler, prepared the piano arrangement of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony. The manuscript constitutes an orchestral score of 43 pages, bearing the inscription « Rudolf Krzyzanowski cop. 1876 » on the 1st page, and on the last page, in large, blue letters, « von Anton Bruckner » . Tschuppik immediately reported in public about his finding (« Ein neu aufgefundenes Werk Anton Bruckners » , in : « Schweizerische Musikzeitung » , No. 88, 1948 ; page 391 - « Bruckners Sinfonisches Präludium » , in : « Süddeutsche Zeitung » , 8 September 1949) .

He also prepared his own, clean copy of the score, copied-out orchestral parts, and also arranged a 4 stave « partitello » of the movement in 2 copies. Tschuppik had also shown the piece to Bruckner scholars Max Auer and Franz Gräßlinger, and to the Swiss conductor Volkmar Andreae as well. Their opinion on Bruckner's authorship was positive, and Andreae agreed to give the 1st performance of the piece (meanwhile entitled : « Sinfonisches Präludium » by Tschuppik) with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on 23 January 1949.

This performance, however, did not take place, as reported by Helmut Albert Fiechtner (« Verhinderte Bruckner-Uraufführung » , in : « Die Osterreichische Furche » , Vienna, 29 January 1949) :

The members of the Vienna Philharmonic voted against Bruckner as the likely composer of the piece, and Leopold Nowak, who had been asked for his expertise in due course, was not able to come to a final result and asked the Orchestra to publish a note that he « couldn't yet finish the examination ». Indeed, on 3 January 1949, Tschuppik had given Krzyżanowski's manuscript to the Music Collection of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » (Austrian National Library) , where a photocopy was made, the manuscript returned to him thereafter. Finally, the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra under Fritz Rieger gave the premiere of the piece on 7 September 1949. Shortly after this 1st performance, Tschuppik died in 1950, and the public and scientific debate about the piece ended. Tschuppik's clean copy, his hand-written orchestral parts, and a photocopy of the 4 stave « partitello » remained sleeping in the drawers of the archive of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. The original piece was never performed again subsequently. Krzyżanowski's original manuscript remained in the possession of his descendants until the late- 1980's. The photocopy of it was never entered in the inventory at the Music Collection of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » . Instead, Nowak kept it in his private possession. It was found amongst his Estate and returned to the Music Collection only after his death in May 1991. Nowak also never published the expert opinion he had been asked for in 1949. This had some strange and remarkable consequences.

In 1948, Tschuppik had given some of the manuscripts of songs composed by his uncle as well as another copy of his own partitello arrangement of the « Präludium » to a Mrs. Gertrud Staub-Schlöpfer, in Zürich. She studied the piece and came to a strange conclusion, which she wrote on top of the « partitello » herself :

« Könnte das nicht eine Arbeit für Prüfung von Gustav Mahler sein ? Krzyżanowski gab den Klavierauszug zur dritten Symphonie Bruckners (2. Fassung) heraus mit Mahler zusammen. »

(Could this, perhaps, have been composed by Gustav Mahler for his examination ?)

Krzyżanowski edited the piano arrangement of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony (2nd version) together with Mahler. On 7 September 1949 (half a year after Leopold Nowak had made the photocopy of the original score and, strangely, on the very day of the 1st and, since then, only performance of the « Präludium » , in Munich) , she gave all this material which she had received from Tschuppik to the Music Collection of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » , perhaps, with the positive intention to contribute to the solution of the question who actually composed the piece which Krzyżanowski copied.

The « Sleeping Beauty » remained behind the thorns for 30 years. Then, the Mahler scholar Paul Banks discovered the « Partitello » from the possession of Mrs. Staub-Schlöpfer in the Music Collection of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » and published an article in due course (« An Early Symphonic Prelude by Mahler ? » , in : « 19th Century Music » , Volume 3, 1979 ; page 141ff) . Nowak never returned the photocopy of the score to the Music Collection ; Krzyżanowski's original manuscript was, at that time, still in private possession. Banks didn't even know anything about the 1st performance in 1949 (and, certainly, not about the existence of the full-material in the Archive of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra !) . So, he assumed the « Partitello » to be the only source for the piece and finally followed the suggestion of Mrs. Staub-Schlöpfer, arguing that the piece could be indeed one of the numerous lost works which Gustav Mahler had composed during his time at the Vienna Conservatory. Hence, a « lost piece by Gustav Mahler » was « re-discovered », and since the « Particello » was the only known source, Berlin composer Albrecht Gürsching was asked to make the movement performable and complement the instrumentation. This « reconstruction » was 1st performed by the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra under Lawrence Foster (on 15 March 1981) as : « “ Symphonisches Präludium ” by Gustav Mahler » .

It was only thanks to the German « Kapellmeister » Wolfgang Hittl (Niedernhausen) that the truth came to the light in 1985, when he published a lengthy study on the piece, which he had discovered in the archive of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra (« Ein vergessenes, unerkanntes Werk Anton Bruckners ? » , in : « Studien zur Musikwissenschaft / Beihefte der Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » , Volume 36, Tutzing, 1985) . Unfortunately, this truth seems to have been unwanted : his article was largely ignored by musicology ; the « Mahlerization » was subsequently recorded (prominently, by Neeme Järvi for the « Chandos » label) and published by Sikorski, Berlin, where it remains in the catalogue as Mahler's piece, occasionally performed as such. The time and effort Hittl put into a campaign for the original is remarkable : he published not only further articles, he also bought Krzyzanowski's original manuscript in the 1990's from Tschuppik's family, examined and edited it. Since 2002, the music has been available from Doblinger, Vienna. The full-size score contains both a fac-simile of Krzyzanowski's manuscript as well as a modern edition ; the parts are available on hire. Nevertheless, and strangely, the piece remains un-performed to this day (2006) !

This is hard to understand. On the one hand, one may argue we have only Krzyzanowski's copy and his word that this music was composed by Bruckner. Documentary research gave no further evidence ; no further manuscripts from Bruckner's own hand survive, and also, in his letters and private annotations, nothing is to be found about it. (An explanation for this may be that Bruckner, before he moved into the Belvedere, in July 1895, had asked his devout secretary, Anton Meißner, to burn various old papers, obviously including many discarded music manuscripts.) On the other hand, it seemed to be no problem for many conductors and writers to accept the piece as allegedly by Mahler, in its 2nd hand orchestration by Albrecht Gürsching, and even pepped-up with some untypical, special instruments (piccolo, double-bassoon, harp, cymbal) . Krzyzanowski's copy is laid-out only for Bruckner's typical orchestra of double woodwind, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass-tuba, timpani, and strings.

Wolfgang Hittl undertook a meticulous examination of the manuscript and analysis of the music in the mirror of Bruckner's contemporary pieces. He came finally to the conclusion that the most likely assumption would be that Bruckner had given a score to Krzyzanowski which he may have already abandoned at the time of its gestation - perhaps, as an exercise in instrumentation. From stylistic comparison and analysis, it seems to be clear that, at least, the entire musical substance is by Bruckner himself, most likely in the 1st stage of the « emerging autograph score » , containing all string parts, some important lines for woodwind and brass, perhaps also, a few passages being already entirely complete - very similar to what survived from the Finale of the 9th Symphony. (Wolfgang Hittl. « Einsichten zu einer Musik im Jahrhundertschlaf » , in : « Studien & Berichte, Mitteilungsblatt Band 63 der Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft, December 2004 ; pages 13-16) . Krzyzanowski, then, completed the instrumentation. His copy also contains some annotations possibly from Bruckner's own hand, and some further from another. unknown person. (The playing indications are obviously not by Bruckner, all very enthusiastically youthful, up to « ffff » that Bruckner never

There is not enough room in a short essay for a detailed description of the music. However, it seems clear from Hiltl's stylistic examination that the musical material itself is indeed all Bruckner's and, in particular, because some of these ideas even anticipate some music from the 9th Symphony, which certainly nobody can have known already in 1876 ! The form is quite unique : all 3 themes are merely lyrical (as later, in the 1st movement of the 7th Symphony) . The 1st theme contains the core of the main-themes of the 1st Symphony and 2nd Symphony in C minor, as well as allusions to Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » , which Bruckner may have known from the piano score of 1865, or some orchestral extracts given in concerts in Vienna, in 1872. (He 1st heard the entire « Walküre » in Bayreuth, in August 1876, which may suggest the « Präludium » could be the composer's reaction to the « Ring » experience. But this would leave only very little time for the conception and abandoning of it, and it being given to Krzyżanowski for copying, all in late-1876.) The soft 1st theme, as is typical for Bruckner, is repeated in full « tutti » (bar 43) , leading into a dark chorale (bar 59, foreshadowing the structure of the chorale-theme from the Finale of the 9th Symphony) , and even a significant epilogue (bar 73) , to be used further in the development (bar 160) . The 2nd theme (bar 87) reflects some ideas of the 3rd Symphony, in particular, the famous « Miserere » of the D minor Mass as well. The closing-theme is an energetic trumpet call with a repeated, remarkable minor 9th, as at the beginning of the Adagio from the 9th Symphony, also foreshadowing the trumpets at the end of the 1st movement of this work composed some 25 years later. The 2nd part (bar 148) brings 2 elements from the main-theme in variants, similar as in the 1st movement of the 9th, leading into a threefold outburst of it in the dominant (bar 195) ; tonic (bar 201) ; and sub-dominant (bar 207) . The recapitulation of the 2nd theme is in fact a fugue (bar 221) , with a development section which, again, reflects the 3rd Symphony (bar 249ff) , leading into a climax, in which both 1st and 2nd themes appear simultaneously (bar 267) . The rather short Coda is merely a final cadence with almost no thematic material left, only reflecting the earlier 3rd theme, not as a minor 9th, but as a repeated chain of minor 2nds (one may assume that this elaboration by Krzyżanowski, which sounds rather provisional, may have been filled-up later with more concise motivic derivations, as tried-out by Albrecht Gürsching in his unnecessary arrangement of the score) .

It is impossible to know exactly for which purpose this short, serious movement was originally written. Due to stylistic similarities with compositions of that period, a likely assumption would be that it was conceived already in 1875 or 1876, at a time when Bruckner undertook various efforts to improve his financial situation and to push his own career. An official occasion for introducing such a piece might have been Bruckner's new post at the Vienna University (1875) ; the inauguration of the new « Mauracher » organ in Saint-Florian, on 19 November 1875 ; or the concert in which Bruckner himself conducted, again, the now-revised 2nd Symphony in C minor on 20 February 1876.

The score includes the bass tuba, which Bruckner did not use before his 5th Symphony (composed in 1875-1876 ; and revised in 1877-1878) . The 1st critical edition includes some revisions by Wolfgang Hiltl, in particular a more Brucknerian layout of playing indications and a correction of the most obvious shortcomings of Krzyżanowski's score. Since the edition contains both Krzyżanowski's score and the modern transcription, the editor found it unnecessary to include a « Critical Commentary » , which would only list all the differences that could be more easily taken from comparing it directly with the manuscript. Unfortunately, the edition does not provide much information, except a short preface by the editor. His early essay from 1985 is not widely available. A new, comprehensive and generally available study on the entire topic would be most welcome.

In all, this « Symphonic Prelude » constitutes an extremely advanced, « experimental » Sonata-movement, with a dramatic, almost radical 2nd part combining development, recapitulation and Coda in a unified and radical « zweite Abtheilung » . The musical language and structure, the dramatic sweep anticipates much of Bruckner's last composition, the Symphonic choral work « Helgoland » from 1893. The musical quality of the score as surviving in Krzyzanowski's copy would deserve attention, performance and recording even if we had no hint at all that it might possibly be from Bruckner (note that Krzyzanowski, himself, never wrote something of a comparable originality) . It is hard to understand why the beauty continues to sleep till this day.

This is hard to understand. On the one hand, one may argue we have only Krzyżanowski's copy and his word that this music was composed by Anton Bruckner. Documentary research gave no further evidence ; no further manuscripts from Bruckner's own hand survive, and also in his letters and private annotations nothing is to be found about it. (An explanation for this may be that Bruckner, before he moved into the Belvedere « Kustodenstöckl » , in July 1895, had asked his secretary Anton Meissner to burn various old papers, obviously including many discarded music manuscripts.) On the other hand, it seemed to be no problem for many conductors and writers to accept the piece as allegedly by Mahler, in its « 2nd hand orchestration » by Albrecht Gürsching, and even pepped-up with some untypical, special instruments (piccolo, double bassoon, harp, cymbal) . Krzyżanowski's copy is laid out only for Bruckner's typical orchestra of double woodwind, 4 horns, 2 trumpets, 3 trombones, 1 bass tuba, timpani, and strings.

Wolfgang Hiltl undertook a meticulous examination of the manuscript and analysis of the music in the mirror of Anton Bruckner's contemporary pieces. He came finally to the conclusion that the most likely assumption would be that Bruckner had given a score to Krzyżanowski which he may have already abandoned at the time of its gestation ; perhaps, as an exercise in instrumentation. From stylistic comparison and analysis, it seems to be clear that at least the entire musical substance is by Bruckner himself, most likely in the 1st stage of the « emerging autograph score » , containing all string parts, some important lines for woodwind and brass, perhaps also, a few passages being already entirely complete : very similar to what survived from the Finale of the 9th Symphony. (Wolfgang Hiltl : « Einsichten zu einer Musik im Jahrhundertschlaf » , in : Studien & Berichte, Mitteilungsblatt, Nummer 63 der IBG, December 2004, page 13 to 16) . Krzyżanowski then completed the instrumentation. His copy also contains some annotations possibly from Bruckner's own hand, and some further from another, unknown person. (The playing indications are obviously not by Bruckner, all very enthusiastically youthful, up to ffff, that Bruckner never used.)

There is not enough room in a short essay for a detailed description of the music. However, it seems clear from Hiltl's stylistic examination that the musical material itself is indeed all Bruckner's, and, in particular, because some of these ideas even anticipate some music from the 9th Symphony, which certainly nobody can have known already in 1876 ! The form is quite unique : all 3 themes are merely lyrical (as later in the 1st movement of the 7th Symphony) . The 1st theme contains the core of the main-themes of the 1st and 2nd Symphony in C minor, as well as allusions to Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » , which Bruckner may have known from the piano score of 1865, or some orchestral extracts given in concerts in Vienna, in 1872. (He 1st heard the entire « Walküre » in Bayreuth, in August 1876, which may suggest the « Präludium » could be the composer's reaction to the « Ring » experience. But this would leave only very little time for the conception and abandoning of it, and it being given to Krzyżanowski for copying, all in late 1876.) The soft 1st theme is, as being typical for Bruckner, repeated in full tutti (bar 43) , leading into a dark chorale (bar 59, pre-shadowing the structure of the chorale theme from the Finale of the 9th Symphony) , and even a significant epilogue (bar 73) , further to be used in the development (bar 160) . The 2nd theme (bar 87) reflects some ideas of the 3rd Symphony, and in particular the famous miserere of the D minor Mass as well. The closing theme is an energetic trumpet call with a repeated, remarkable minor 9th, as at the beginning of the Adagio from the 9th Symphony, also pre-shadowing the trumpets at the end of the 1st movement of this work to be composed some 25 years later. The 2nd part (bar 148) brings 2 elements from the main-theme in variants, similar as in the 1st movement of the 9th, leading into a threefold outburst of it in the dominant (bar 195) , tonic (bar 201) and sub-dominant (bar 207) . The recapitulation of the 2nd theme is in fact a fugue (born 221) , with a development section which again reflects the 3rd Symphony (bar 249ff) , leading into a climax, in which both 1st and 2nd themes appear simultaneously (bar 267) . The rather short Coda is merely a final cadence with almost no thematic material left, only reflecting the earlier 3rd theme, but not as a minor 9th, but a repeated chain of minor 2nds (one may assume that this elaboration by Rudolf Krzyzanowski, which sounds rather provisional, may have been filled-up later with more concise motivic derivations, as tried out by Albrecht Gürsching, in his unnecessary arrangement of the score) .

It is impossible to know exactly for which purpose this short, serious movement was originally written. Due to stylistic similarities with compositions of that period, a likely assumption would be that it was conceived already in 1875 or 1876, at a time when Bruckner undertook various efforts to improve his financial situation and to push his own career. An official occasion for introducing such a piece might have been Bruckner's new post at the Vienna University (1875) , the inauguration of the new Mauracher organ in Saint-Florian (19 November 1875) , or the concert, in which Bruckner himself conducted again the now-revised 2nd Symphony in C minor (20 February 1876) .

The score includes the bass tuba, which Bruckner did not use before his 5th Symphony (composed in 1875-1876, and revised in 1877-1878) . The 1st critical edition includes some revisions by Wolfgang Hittl, in particular a more Brucknerian layout of playing indications and a correction of the most obvious shortcomings of Rudolf Krzyzanowski's score. Since the edition contains both Krzyzanowski's score and the modern transcription, the editor found it unnecessary to include a « Critical Commentary » , which would only list all the differences which could be more easily taken from comparing it directly with the manuscript. Unfortunately, the edition does not provide much information, except a short preface by the editor. His early essay from 1985 is not widely available. A new, comprehensive and generally available study on the entire topic would be most welcome.

In all, this Symphonic Prelude constitutes an extremely advanced, « experimentak sonata movement, with a dramatic, almost radical 2nd part combining development, recapitulation and Coda to a unified and radical " zweite Abtheilung " » . The musical language and structure, the dramatic sweep anticipates much of Anton Bruckner's last composition, the Symphonic choral work « Helgoland » (1893) . The musical quality of the score as surviving in Krzyzanowski's copy would deserve attention, performance and recording even if we had no hint at all that it might possibly be from Bruckner (note that Krzyzanowski himself never wrote something of a comparable originality) . It is hard to understand why the beauty continues to sleep till this day.

Postscriptum 2010 : In 2008, Wolfgang Hittl died unexpectedly in a hospital in Wiesbaden, Germany. Nobody cared for his assets, and, in November 2008, his apartment was finally cleared by the municipality of his last residence, Niedernhausen. The mysterious, valuable manuscript of the Symphonic Prelude ended on a garbage slope.

Les condisciples du jeune Mahler

The Vienna Conservatory was already a well-respected institution in the city's musical life even before Gustav Mahler began his studies there in September 1875. It was neither a municipal nor a State-run institution but a private college managed by the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde », the city's most important musical institution based on private initiative, its magnificent building containing what remains one of the finest concert halls in the world indeed, the Viennese themselves claim that the « Musikvereinssaal » has no equal. Situated near the « Karlsplatz » and within a stone's throw of the « Ringstraße », the « Musikverein » had been designed by Theophil von Hansen, one of the leading architects of the « Ringstraße », and, 3 years in the building, had been officially opened in 1870, the Conservatory being housed in one of its wings. Although it received financial support from the privy purse, it was essentially a private organization, and like all Conservatories of every period, it employed a whole range of teachers, some of them better than others. It had been founded as long ago as 1821, when its 1st director had been Antonio Salieri, no less, but it was not until 1909 that it acquired the status of a State-run institution, thereby becoming the forerunner of today's University of Music and the Performing Arts. The Vienna Conservatory was not quite as highly-regarded as its counterpart in Leipzig, which, at this date, was arguably the world's finest Music College, but it still had a whole series of famous teachers on its books. Its director was the violinist and conductor Josef Hellmesberger Senior, whose pupils included Leopold Auer and Arthur Nikisch and who was famous for his wit. Although he accused his professor of harmony, Robert Fuchs, of plagiarism, Fuchs was evidently a good teacher whose pupils numbered not only Mahler himself but also Franz Schreker, Alexander Zemlinsky (an early rival of Mahler's for the hand of Alma Schindler), Jean Sibelius and Franz Schmidt.

Julius Epstein (the man who officially discovered and fostered Mahler's talent) was the best-known of the Conservatory's piano teachers but, however good he may have been, it was his misfortune that there was an even better piano teacher working in Vienna at this time, albeit only privately, Theodor Leschetitzky, whose pupils included Ignacy Paderewski and Artur Schnabel. The institute's principal composition teacher was Franz Krenn, who also taught Mahler but whom history has judged unfavourably, his views and methods being criticized for being too backward-looking. It seems as if the more liberal Fuchs whom history has judged unfavourably, his views and methods being criticized for being too backward-looking. It seems as if the more liberal Fuchs introduced greater compositional contraband into his harmony classes than was officially permitted. Anton Bruckner, finally, gave organ lessons at the Conservatory in addition to his classes at the University.

Leaving aside Gustav Mahler's 3 month stint as conductor in Bad Hall during the summer of 1880, his 1st continuous stay in Vienna lasted 6 years, from September 1875 to the summer of 1881, at which point he took-up a post in Laibach (Ljubljana). This 6 year period, between the ages of 15 and 21, is a decisive phase in the life of any artist and, indeed, of any individual. Unfortunately, these are also the worst-documented years in Mahler's life, so that we have no choice but to attempt to reconstruct them on the basis of other, disparate sources. There were, in fact, 2 phases to Mahler's education in Vienna, each of them associated with a different circle of friends. The 1st such circle, and the more intimate of the 2, was made-up of Mahler's fellow pupils from the Conservatory and provided him with a specifically musical stimulus, whereas the 2nd was more important in terms of his general outlook on the world and resulted from his contacts with the circles associated with Siegfried Lipiner and Engelbert Pernerstorfer.

Gustav Mahler's circle of friends at the Conservatory initially consisted of no more than 4 or 5 individuals, some of them more interesting than others, but, all in all, a good indication of Mahler's ability to attract important people of his own age. The individuals in question were Anton Krisper, Rudolf Krzyzanowski and, to a lesser extent, his brother Heinrich, Hans Rott and Hugo Wolf. It is also possible that Mahler briefly made the acquaintance of the mezzo-soprano Rosa Papier at this time. She later became a well-known member of the Vienna Court Opera and, following her early retirement on health grounds, a distinguished singing teacher whose pupils numbered Anna von Mildenburg. She also exerted considerable influence on Vienna's musical scene, helping in no small way to bring about Mahler's appointment as director of the Court Opera. The wife of the pianist Hans Paumgartner, she was the mother of Bernhard Paumgartner, later to become well-known as a Mozart scholar and as president of the Salzburg Festival. For a time, this group of friends was very small, an unsurprising state of affairs as Mahler was looking for something like a substitute family in the city. Julius Epstein took considerable interest in the boy and could play the part of a fatherly friend, but he inevitably had little time for the lad from Igla, quite apart from his understandable reluctance to show undue preference for any one particular student. Of greater importance were friends of Mahler's own age : Hugo Wolf was born in the same year as Mahler, Hans Rott was 2 years older, Anton Krisper 3 years older, and Rudolf Krzyzanowski a year older. In comparison to today's State-run Colleges of Music, the Vienna Conservatory was a tiny institution, so that students of different ages very soon met on its various courses.

Anton Krisper came from Laibach, where he had been born into a well-to-do family of businessmen. He matriculated at the Conservatory in 1876 but remained there for only 2 years before moving to Leipzig and enrolling at the city's University, where he read musicology. He is said to have written an Opera during his youth, but no such work has come down to us. He was more successful academically, his dissertation on « Art Music in Terms of its Origins, Development and Consequences » being praised by one of the leading figures of the, as yet, young discipline of musicology, Hugo Riemann. The multi-talented Krisper later studied mining and worked as an engineer. He died in a sanatorium near Graz, in 1914, evidently as the result of some venereal disease, and was buried in Laibach. His friendship with Mahler is documented in a series of important letters written between 1878 and 1880, but, thereafter, the 2 friends lost contact. It seems that Krisper also played the cello, with Wolf as his accompanist.

Gustav Mahler was closer to the brothers Rudolf and Heinrich Krzyzanowski than he was to Krisper. The younger of the 2 brothers, Rudolf, died, like Mahler, in 1911, only a few weeks after his friend. He was evidently highly-gifted as a musician, equally talented not only as a violinist and pianist but also as an organist and as a composer. The close links between Rudolf Krzyzanowski and Gustav Mahler were reciprocal, and the 2 men's paths frequently crossed in later life. Mahler did much to help his older friend, especially when the latter's career as a conductor got-off to a shaky start. The Krzyzanowski family came from Eger. Rudolf is elder brother, Heinrich, was born in 1855 and was enrolled not at the Conservatory but at the University, from where he graduated in German Studies in 1877, his teacher being the eminent Germanist Richard Heinzel. After teaching in a series of grammar schools, he married and moved to Germany, working as a freelance writer in Starnberg, Munich and Berlin. His short story « Im Bruch » was published in 1885. He later moved back to Vienna, where he worked as a private tutor, for a time supported by Mahler, and lectured on literary topics. By the 1920's he was living in the Tyrol. During Mahler's early years in Vienna, the Krzyzanowski brothers appear to have been his closest friends.

The 2 composers among Mahler's early friends are far more fascinating figures than Anton Krisper and the Krzyzanowskis - fascinating but also problematical. When Hans Rott's Symphony in E major of 1878-1880 received its 1st performance in Cincinnati, in 1889, more than a Century after it had been written, the event was little short of a sensation. Experts and (following further performances and some gramophone recordings) the public at large recognized that this hour-long Symphony, the final movement of which alone lasts almost 25 minutes, is a key work in the evolution of the « New Symphony », representing, as it does, an attempt to make a fresh start in the field of the Symphony that was then being tilled by Anton Bruckner and Johannes Brahms. The most famous exponent of this new style was none other than Gustav Mahler himself, and it is to him, in fact, that we owe the term « New Symphony ». Even at a 1st hearing, it was obvious to many listeners that there were astonishing similarities between the musical language of Rott's one and only Symphony and that of Mahler's 1st, which was not composed until 1885-1888, in other words, at least 5 years later than Rott's work. It also gave pause for thought that Rott and Mahler studied at the Vienna Conservatory at exactly the same time. A remark that Mahler made about Rott to Natalie Bauer-Lechner now received greater attention. Mahler had taken the score of Rott's Symphony with him on holiday during the summer of 1900 in order to see whether it was worth performing at one of the Vienna Philharmonic's concerts :

« What music has lost in him is immeasurable. His 1st Symphony, written when he was a young man of 20, already soars to such heights of genius that it makes him (without exaggeration) the founder of the " New Symphony " as I understand it. It is true that he has not yet fully realized his aims here. It is like someone taking a run for the longest possible throw and not quite hitting the mark. But I know what he is driving at. His innermost nature is so much akin to mine that he and I are like 2 fruits from the same tree, produced by the same soil, nourished by the same air. We would have had an infinite amount in common. Perhaps, we 2 might have gone some way together towards exhausting the possibilities of this new age that was then dawning in music. »

Gustav Mahler also mentions a number of anecdotes about Rott's activities as organist at the Piarist Monastery in Vienna, where he played for a pittance in return for free accommodation. Mahler remembered seeing a string of sausages hanging on a nail in his room, like a kind of a wreath. He would eat them, one by one, in order to appease his hunger. He ostensibly lost his post when the monks accused him of stealing their books.

Hans Rott was born in Vienna in 1858 ; the son of an actor. He enrolled at the Conservatory in 1874, a year before Gustav Mahler, and studied the organ with Anton Bruckner, harmony with Hermann Grädener rather than Robert Fuchs and composition with Franz Krenn. Like so many others, Rott was introduced to Richard Wagner by Bruckner and, in this way, became a member of the Vienna Academic Wagner Society about which I shall shortly have more to say. He also attended the 1st Bayreuth Festival in 1876. Bruckner held Rott in high-regard and was deeply shaken by his early death, in 1884. It is reported that he spontaneously took-up the cudzels for Rott managed to obtain an audience with Wagner, who was then staying at the Hotel Imperial, a meeting on which he reported with great enthusiasm in a long letter to his parents, even if Wagner politely but firmly declined his invitation to look at his compositions. Wolf became a life-long Wagnerian, taking over his hero's anti-Semitism, in addition to his æsthetic ideals. Mahler, too, became an inveterate Wagnerian but did not share his idols anti-Semitism, although he could certainly have done so in the form of Jewish self-hatred. As we shall later have cause to note, it is a remarkable fact that he never once mentions Wagner's anti-Semitism, even though he was not unaware of the anti-Jewish sentiments that were rampant at this time and of which he was a principal victim. The cult of Wagner played an important role in Vienna's cultural life, leaving a mark on Mahler that went far beyond mere questions of musical taste.

Richard Wagner had been a frequent visitor to Vienna, not least at the time of the 1848 revolution, when the city had been a hotbed of unrest. Strangely enough, it was Johann Strauß who introduced Wagner's music to Viennese audiences when he conducted excerpts from « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » at a concert, in 1853. From then on, Wagner's works were a staple of the repertory, provoking the same violent responses for and against them as those found throughout the rest of the world of music. The 1st performance of « Lohengrin » at the Kärntnerthor-Theater, in 1858, helped to consolidate Wagner's reputation in the city in spite of the embittered resistance of the critic Eduard Hanslick, who had begun his career as a Wagnerian only to become his most powerful and intransigent adversary. There were also plans to give the 1st performance of « Tristan und Isolde » at the Vienna Court Opera, in 1861, but, in the event they came to nothing, and it was not until 4 years later that the work was finally unveiled in Munich. Conversely, the concerts that the composer organized in Vienna to replace the aborted premiere proved immensely successful but could not prevent Wagner, who had temporarily found refuge at Penzing, in the city's suburbs, from having to flee Vienna in March 1864 in order to escape from his creditors. From Vienna, he travelled to Stuttgart, where he was finally tracked down by an emissary of King Ludwig of Bavaria, who invited him to Munich, an unsuspected high-point in his career that was not, however, to last. Quite apart from events such as these, Richard Wagner was from then on a regular talking point in æsthetic and even political discussions in Vienna. By 1875, when Gustav Mahler and Hugo Wolf arrived in the city, a critical point had been reached in these discussions, leading in part to Wagner's breakthrough in the capital, for between March and May, the composer had conducted 3 concerts of his own works in the city, followed in the autumn of that year by a return visit to superintend productions of « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » at the Court Opera. (It was on this occasion that Wolf called on Wagner.) It was the Court Opera's new director, Franz Launer, who had made it possible for Wagner to be crowned the new King of Opera in Vienna, after all the botched opportunities of the past. True, Launer was no Wagnerian, but he knew the merits and drawing power of Wagner's Operas and was firmly resolved to help them achieve their breakthrough at the Court Opera, an aim in which he and his successor, the conductor Wilhelm Jahn, were successful. By 1883-1884, all the composer's works from « Rienzi » onwards were in the Court Opera repertory, while the house's principal conductor, Hans Richter, was closely associated with Bayreuth. Singers from the Court Opera also appeared on Bayreuth's Green Hill.

It was against this background that Hugo Wolf and Gustav Mahler grew-up, Mahler's later cultivation of a sparer production style and his reassessment of Wagner's music during his period as director being inconceivable without this phase from 1875 to 1883. But Wagner's works were also explosive in terms of musical politics. Johannes Brahms had moved to Vienna, in 1862, and taken over the running of the city's « Singakademie », finally settling there in 1868 and becoming artistic director of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde », from 1875 to 1878. (It was in this capacity that he sat on various committees and competition juries.) A late developer, Brahms had yet to complete his 1st Symphony, but thanks to his great choral works, his 1st Piano Concerto, Alto Rhapsody, lieder, chamber works and piano music, he was the most famous composer then living in Vienna, a European figure who, although a native of Hamburg, was already being claimed by the Austrians. Brahms was also regarded as a « conservative » composer and, hence, as one of the figure heads of the Party that opposed the « musicians of the future », as members of the New German School were often called. This antagonism had come to the fore at the latest by 1860, when a Berlin newspaper published a declaration by a handful of signatories informing the world that they could « only deplore and condemn, as contrary to the most fundamental essence of music, the products of the leaders and disciples of the so-called New German School ». Among the protest's signatories were Brahms himself and his friend Joseph Joachim, the most famous German violinist of his day. Only a short time earlier, a whole series of musicians and music-critics under Franz Liszt's organizational and intellectual aegis had coined the term « New German School » with reference to themselves, going on to form an Association which, from 1861, was known as the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein ». They viewed themselves as the Party of progress and felt that they could overcome the hegemony of Viennese Classicism only by abandoning traditional Sonata form and Symphonic form in the conservative sense of those terms and by espousing new forms of expression, namely, the Wagnerian music-drama and programme music. (The Symphonic poem played an important role here, and it is no accident that Hector Berlioz and his « Symphonie fantastique » were much touted by Liszt.)

Richard Wagner was a great deal more controversial than Berlioz, so that, after 1860, an individual's attitude to Wagner helped to clarify his or her position : progressives were expected to revere Wagner, Liszt and Berlioz, while reactionaries were convinced of the unsurpassable greatness of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Robert Schumann, and they composed in the style of Brahms. (This is a highly-abbreviated and simplified account of a complex situation.) As a naive child of his age, Anton Bruckner was involuntarily caught in the crossfire, his idolatrous admiration for Richard Wagner and use of multiple trombones instantly aligning him with the New German School, without leaving any scope for a more subtle analysis of his music. In Vienna, Eduard Hanslick and Ludwig Speidel, the city's 2 most powerful critics, lent their weight to the « Brahmins », as Brahms' supporters were called, their interventions invariably proving intelligent, witty and effective.

Until the mid-1870's, it seemed unlikely that Richard Wagner would ever gain a foothold in the Austrian capital, a state of affairs apparently confirmed by the unfortunate events of the last 20 or 30 years. But the situation then changed, the Wagnerians having a great advantage over their adversaries : at least, to the extent that they were musically inclined, all who regarded themselves as progressive, whether socially, politically or morally, and all who felt that they were still young or at least behaved as if they were must necessarily side with the New Germans and, hence, with Wagner. As a venomous music-critic, Hugo Wolf lost no opportunity to unleash torrents of abuse on Brahms, summing-up the positions of the 2 armies on the occasion of an all-Liszt concert : « On the one hand, youth, intelligence, idealism, judgement, enthusiasm, conviction ; on the other, obtuseness, frivolity, lack of principles, ignorance and arrogance. ». It was as simple as that. Many other young music enthusiasts adopted an equally « black and white » view of the situation, and this is certainly true of Gustav Mahler, who can scarcely have heard a note of Wagner's music in Iglau. He soon became one of Wagner's most fanatical followers, and we may well be right in assuming that it was in this way that he became friendly with Hugo Wolf or, more accurately, became Wolf's ally in matters Wagnerian. In her memoirs, Alma Mahler has given a colourfully embroidered account of the lives led by Mahler, Wolf and Rudolf Krzyzanowski in the room that they rented together. All 3, she writes, were sensitive to noise. When one of them was composing and needed to use the piano, the others had to wander the streets and, on one occasion, even sleep outside on a bench in the « Ringstraße » . They are also said to have played through « Götterdämmerung » from the vocal score (this was no doubt around the time of the 1st performances of the work in Vienna, in February 1879) and to have made such a noise singing and playing the 2nd « Act Vengeance Trio » for Brünnhilde, Gunther and Hagen that they were given immediate notice to quit.

There was also an institutional side to the Wagnerian enthusiasms of Vienna's young musicians : it was known as the Viennese Academic Wagner Society and was founded in 1872 by Guido Adler, later to make a name for himself as a musicologist and as one of Mahler's most unquestioning supporters, and by the 16 year old Felix Mottl, later a distinguished Wagner conductor. They were reacting to the fact that in keeping with its name, the Conservatory did not include Wagner's music in its syllabus. Indeed, it could hardly have done so, given the influential Brahms's aversion to Wagner. (Conversely, Wagner felt only an irrational loathing of Brahms. On the one occasion when Friedrich Nietzsche brought a Brahms score with him to Wagner's home in Bayreuth, he was greeted with open contempt.)

Social maladroitness falls on the benign side of Anton Bruckner's fame, in Vienna, as an antipode to the cosmopolitan establishment. There were also darker implications. For example, he allowed himself to serve as the honorary chairman of a New Academic Wagner Society (a different one than that to which Guido Adler and Gustav Mahler once held memberships) . This New Wagner Society had in its bylaws the explicit prohibition of Jews as members.

But the Wagnerian enthusiasm of Vienna's young musicians also had a distinctly political aspect to it. Criticism of Wagner came above all from the liberal camp, not least on account of his anti-Semitism, while that same anti-Semitism made him all the more popular with certain of his supporters, among whom we must unfortunately number Hugo Wolf. These same supporters also held Pan-German ideas which, in terms of Party politics, inevitably implied allegiance to the German nationalist Party. It was not necessary, of course, for all who harboured German nationalist beliefs in Austria to become Wagnerians, but Austria's Wagnerians necessarily thought in terms of German nationalism, Gustav Mahler himself later being one of the few exceptions. German nationalist views had evolved in the wake of the German Confederation and the Frankfurt National Assembly of 1848-1849 and implied a Pan-German Empire under Austrian rule. Following Prussia's victory in the war of 1866 and the establishment of a German « Reich » without Austria, German nationalist attitudes became radicalized in Austria. After 1871, the majority of those who held such beliefs no longer demanded that Austria be incorporated into the German « Reich » as this would have been tantamount to acknowledging Prussian hegemony and the end of Austria as an independent nation. Rather, they believed in the overwhelming superiority of all things German in matters of language, culture and national sentiment within the multi-racial dual monarchy, with the result that they looked down with contempt on other sections of the population who spoke different languages and who were felt to be racially different. In turn, their contempt was bound-up with political attempts to express this sense of superiority on a political and constitutional level. For the German nationalists, there could never be any question of reconciliation with the Magyars or even with the Czechs.

By the end of the 1870's, Georg von Schönerer had worked his way up to the position of leader of the German national movement, and, by 1882, he had formulated a programme in Linz with Guido Adler and Engelbert Pernerstorfer, both of whom went on to become prominent Social Democrats and whom we shall meet again as members of Siegfried Lipiner's circle of friends, which also included Gustav Mahler. But when Schönerer began to promote anti-Semitism as an essential doctrine of the German national movement, he lost increasing numbers of supporters, a development that turned the German Nationalists, some of whom called themselves « Pan-Germans », into a Right-wing Party. It is clear that although Mahler, unlike Otto Weininger, never became a Jewish anti-Semite, he sympathized with German national ideas, at least for a time. Wagner was the musical and political hero of all young Austrians with German national views. In their eyes, his music and his music dramas were a superior, ultra-modern art form, in addition to which they were German in the sense that Wagner himself had defined that term, most notably in his essay, « What is German ? ». Elsewhere, in his series of articles « Religion and Art », Wagner advocated vegetarianism, which Wolf and Mahler both espoused for a time. But Mahler may ultimately have found the German nationalism and anti-Semitism of the Viennese Academic Wagner Society too much to stomach, for it is clear from surviving documents that, by 1879, he had already resigned his membership as part of a concerted action that also included Anton Krisper, Rudolf Krzyżanowski and Hans Rott, but not Hugo Wolf, who remained true to his beliefs until the end of his life.

It is no disrespect to Hans Rott to argue that Hugo Wolf was the most important composer whom Mahler encountered prior to Richard Strauß. As with Strauß, relations between the 2 men remained problematical, but in Wolf's case, they additionally ended on a shrilly discordant note. Does this suggest that Mahler was incapable of accepting compositional greatness in anyone other than himself ? In the case of Wolf, there is something to be said for this claim, whereas with Strauß, we know that he ungrudgingly recognized the importance of a work like « Salome », no doubt in part because he himself no longer had any ambitions in the field of Opera. Although Wolf was still describing Mahler as his « friend » in a letter that he wrote to his parents in 1879, the 1st cracks in his relations with him may already have appeared in the autumn of that year when the 2 of them discussed their plans for an Opera on the subject of « Rübzahl », a legendary giant from the « Riesengebirge » on the boundary between Silesia and Bohemia. It seems that they failed to reach an agreement on the subject. According to Mahler's version of events, as recounted by Natalie Bauer-Lechner, Wolf had told him about his plans for an Opera, to which Mahler had responded by insisting that the subject could be treated only as a comedy. True, Wolf's only completed Opera, « Der Corregidor », is a « comic » Opera, although the humour has never managed to achieve its desired effect with every section of its audience. But with the best will in the world, Wolf was incapable of imagining « Rübzahl » as a subject for a comedy. Fired by the conversation, Mahler, however, spent the next week committing a libretto to paper. When the 2 friends next met - and it is significant that in discussing these events with Natalie, Mahler referred not to « my friend » but to « your friend », Mahler asked Wolf how he was getting on with « Rübzahl ». Wolf reported that he had found some interesting material in the library, whereupon Mahler triumphantly drew his finished libretto from his pocket, causing Wolf to fly into a rage and declare that « Rübzahl » was now dead to him as an Opera. From the summer of 1880 onwards, there is no real trace of any further contact between the 2 composers. Mahler had, in any case, left Vienna, whereas Wolf remained in the city. No letters appear to have passed between them. Alma Mahler claims that the 2 men later met by chance in Bayreuth and walked past each other with no more than a cool word of greeting, but we have no means of knowing whether this account is correct. That their relations left a deeper mark on both parties than this pitiful end to their contacts might otherwise suggest emerges from a number of other pieces of evidence.

Hugo Wolf's nervous breakdown as the result of a syphilitic infection appears to have been triggered by a meeting with Gustav Mahler, in September 1897, nearly 20 years later. (This statement of fact implies no apportionment of blame.) Mahler was already running the Vienna State Opera as Wilhelm Jahn's representative and had expressed an interest in « Der Corregidor ». Almost certainly, he saw the difficulties involved in staging what remains a problematic piece, but he also recognized the merits of Wolf's hugely ambitious Opera and felt an obligation to his former friend. But when Wolf called on him in the hope that a production could quickly be mounted, Mahler was obliged to put him off, arguing that the House's schedule, for which he was not responsible, prevented the piece from being staged in the foreseeable future. (The work had received its 1st performance in Mannheim, in June 1896, only months after its completion.) Wolf had pinned all his hopes on Mahler and found it impossible to accept his reasons for not staging the work. In addition, it seems that the 2 men argued over Anton Rubinstein's Opera, « The Demon », which Mahler may well have held in higher regard than « Der Corregidor ». As Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau has pointed-out in his « life of the composer », Wolf was already in an agitated state of mind caused by his incipient paralysis when he turned-up in Mahler's office at the Court Opera, on 18 September 1897. Mahler was evidently forced to draw his attention to the works shortcomings, and the 2 men parted on a note of acrimony. Alma claimed that, as soon as he was outside, Wolf started to shout that he was Mahler and director of the Vienna Opera, whereupon he was restrained on the « Ringstraße », but her account appears to be exaggerated. More reliable witnesses state that Wolf hurried to Mahler's rooms in the « Auenbruggergasse » claiming that he was director of the Vienna Opera and demanding admittance from the cook, who slammed the door in his face. He then invited his closest friends to his rooms to play through his latest Opera, « Manuel Venegas », for them. As he was doing so, he started to cry uncontrollably in a scene that Thomas Mann took over in describing Adrian Leverkühns breakdown in « Doktor Faustus ». Wolf then delivered himself of a prepared speech directed at the staff of the Court Opera, taking tremendous delight in showing Mahler the door. According to an alternative account, Wolf went to see the tenor Hermann Winckmann and, likewise, declared that he was the Court Operas new director. Winkelmann retorted that this title belonged to Mahler, whereupon Wolf mysteriously whispered that he had « already got rid of Mahler ». The day after these events, Wolf was taken by friends to a private psychiatric hospital under the pretext that, as the Court Opera's new director, he had to be introduced to the Lord Chamberlain. « So you're playing games with me. », Wolf presciently told his doctors when they admitted him to the clinic.

Gustav Mahler, too, was not unaffected by these events. In his reminiscences of the composer, the writer on music Professor Doctor Ernst Décsey (significantly enough, Hugo Wolf's 1st major biographer) recalls visiting Mahler's country retreat at Maiernigg, on the Wörthersee. As a keen champion of Wolf, Décsey naturally brought the conversation round to his idol, who at this date, around 1900, was still alive, immured in a psychiatric institution in Vienna. Décsey was understandably taken aback when in no uncertain terms Mahler questioned whether Wolf 3 songs, including « Weylas Gesang », had any artistic merit. He claimed not to be able to find in them any of the basic rules of composition, namely, the statement of a theme and its working-out. A song, he insisted, should be characterized by singing and by music, not by the word-setting, which is, of course, paramount in Wolf. Mahler grew increasingly agitated, striking his open palm with his fist and refusing to calm down. Décsey left under the clear and no doubt correct impression that « Wolf was a sore point with him » .

In Vienna, Gustav Mahler's main subject was the piano, which he studied, of course, with his paternal patron Julius Epstein. The same register gives no indication of Mahler's subsidiary subjects, but we know that he studied harmony with Robert Fuchs and counterpoint and composition with Franz Krenn. (We should not forget that, at the same time, Mahler was attempting to complete his course as an external pupil at the Iglau Grammar School.) But the University's records also show that, when he completed his studies at the end of the 1877-1878 academic year, Mahler's main subject was no longer the piano but composition, which he had been studying with Krenn. It is unclear why he changed courses in September 1877, but it cannot have been because of his inadequacies as a pianist for in the competition held in 1876, he won 1st prize for his performance of a Schubert sonata. A few days later, on 1 July 1876, he also won the 1st prize in composition for the opening movement of a quartet with piano. There is no indication that he fell out with Julius Epstein, and so his decision to change courses was presumably a reflection of his increasingly apparent interest in composition.

And with whom did Mahler study conducting? The answer is simple: with no one, for at this date, conducting was not taught at any Conservatory or College of Music. When Peter Heyworth once asked Otto Klemperer how a conductor learnt to conduct, Klemperer replied: « What one can teach and what one can learn is so minimal that I could explain it to you in a minute. ». And George Bernard Shaw's famous comment, in « Man and Superman », that, « He who can, does. He who cannot, teaches. », could also be applied to conducting. The most gifted of Gustav Mahler's « disciples », Bruno Walter, who was a whole generation younger than his mentor, studied conducting at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, but this was in 1890, by which date such courses were gradually being set-up. They eventually included all the canonical aspects of the discipline that remain part of such courses even now: continuo, score-reading, the ability to play from a full-score, the theory of musical form, composition and instrumentation. Otherwise, young conductors learnt their trade almost in passing by means of chorus and orchestral rehearsals with Conservatory orchestras, accompanying singers and, most important of all, attending concerts given by the leading conductors of their day - Walter's great model was Hans von Bülow. Mahler managed to achieve all this without attending a class in conducting, just as Walter would have done. Conductors acquired the tools of their trade not only by watching the great conductors of their age, which in Mahler's case meant Hans von Bülow, Artur Nikisch, Richard Strauß and, to a lesser extent, the somewhat stolid Hans Richter, but also, and above all, by gaining practical experience in the provinces. The young Mahler could hone his skills on the screeching violins and croaking bassoons in Bad Hall and Laibach, where technical shortcomings in his stick technique were not so immediately apparent and could quickly be remedied. By the time that he arrived in Kassel at the age of 23, he was already fully proficient as a conductor, documentary evidence from this period leaving us in no doubt on the matter: here was a conductor who measured everything by the standards of the works that he was interpreting. Driving not only his « comrades in arms » but also any refractory adversaries in the orchestra to the very limits of their often modest abilities, persuading them to go along with him, however reluctantly, and sweeping his audience along with him. There is no doubt, too, that, from 1st to last, he felt a sense of profound inadequacy in the face of the great works by other composers, a feeling that frequently left him terminally depressed.

Financially speaking, Gustav Mahler was better off than many of his fellow pupils. (Given their youth, the word « pupil » seems more fitting here than « student ».) In financing his studies, he even demonstrated considerable astuteness, just as, at a later date, the otherworldly Mahler could show great cunning in monetary matters. It emerges from a request that he made for financial help during his 2nd year at the Conservatory and that refers back to an alleged application from the previous academic year that he had told the authorities that his family was starving and had asked for half his school fees to be remitted, leaving them with a bill of only 60 Florins, which could be paid in instalments : « My father is not in a position to support me, still less to pay my school fees. » . To put it mildly, this was less than the truth. 4 years earlier, Bernhard Mahler had bought one of the better houses in Iglau and was clearly in a position to finance his son's studies, but, presumably, he had no wish to do so as he was still not convinced that his investment in a career in music would ever pay for itself. On this occasion, the application was successful, no doubt in part because Julius Epstein added a note, guaranteeing that the fees that had not been remitted would be paid in full. Like many of the other pupils at the Conservatory, Mahler also earned some extra money by giving piano lessons - not only the subject at which he himself was best but also the one most sought after by the sons and daughters of the upper-middle classes. According to Mahler's childhood friend Theodor Fischer, who was currently studying law at the University of Vienna, Mahler was also well regarded as an accompanist and worked with young singers and violinists in need of a pianist. That he additionally performed in the « Bosendorfersaal » suggests that he also accompanied established artists. On one occasion, at least, the dreaminess that we recall from his days in Iglau must have reasserted itself as we find a Polish violinist having to stamp his foot to remind his accompanist of his duties.

But there was also an incident that may well be related to Hugo Wolf's enforced departure from the Conservatory at some date during the 1876-1877 academic year. According to the latest writings on Wolf, the Conservatory's director, Josef Hellmesberger, received a letter that contained an unequivocal threat on his life and that was signed « Hugo Wolf » . Wolf was apparently not responsible for the letter (a prank from a colleague) , but when he went to see Hellmesberger and tried to defend himself, the director is said to have screamed at him : « I want nothing more to do with you. You are no longer attached to the Conservatory. » . It is more than possible that Wolf, who was even smaller than Mahler and barely 5 feet 1 inch in height but as vicious as a terrier, refused to be intimidated but expressed his anger in no uncertain terms, an anger that is fully understandable if the signature was indeed forged. (On the other hand, such was Wolf's character that it is entirely possible that he was the author of the letter.) This seems to be the only plausible explanation for a remarkable letter that Gustav Mahler wrote to Josef Hellmesberger. Undated, it contains nothing that would allow us to place it in any wider context, but, perhaps, it was the result of a spontaneous gesture of solidarity over which Mahler had then had 2nd thoughts :

« I very much regret my overhasty decision and make so bold as to ask you to ignore my ill-considered action and allow me to return to the Conservatory. I shall endeavour to deserve this favour by my unremitting hard work and by satisfying not only you yourself, Herr Director, but the other teachers, too. »

The 2 prizes that Mahler won during his 1st year at the Conservatory were a considerable boost to his self-esteem, and, on 12 September 1876, when he was still only 16, he organized a benefit concert at the Hotel Czup in his native Iglau, the beneficiary being the local grammar school where he was still a pupil ; the gesture was no doubt much appreciated. Mahler did not appear on his own but brought with him 2 violinists from the Vienna Court Opera Orchestra, Eugen Grünberg and August Siebert, and his friend and fellow student, Rudolf Krzyzanowski, who played the viola. The programme was a demanding one and shows that Mahler could now rely on his technique as a pianist, for Schubert's « Wanderer Fantasy » is a technically challenging piece, as are the Frédéric Chopin « Ballades » , one of which he also played on this occasion. But the concert additionally featured 2 of his own works, a lost Violin Sonata and a Quartet with piano, or possibly, only a single movement from such a piece, in which case it may have been his 1st surviving composition, a movement headed « Not too fast » . Resolutely' and dating from 1876-1877.

Although Gustav Mahler's 1st year at the Conservatory may have been successful, his 2nd year clearly turned-out to be more problematical. For the 1st time in his life, Mahler appears to have undergone a kind of crisis, albeit one whose nature and causes remain a mystery. This was presumably the year in which he abandoned his studies, only to resume them very soon afterwards, while his admissions register also reveals certain irregularities in his studies. On the one hand, he was allowed to continue his classes at the Iglau Grammar School, while on the other, he had difficulties with his course in counterpoint. While winning another 1st prize for the piano, he performed poorly in counterpoint, arriving late for the examination that he was required to resit, failing to complete the exercise and being unable to submit any course work, a failure that he attempted to cover-up by submitting what his examiners dismissed as the « 1st part of a fictitious piece » , with the result that they refused to allow him to compete for the composition prize. It was around this time, too, that Mahler failed his school-leaving examination in Iglau, passing it only at the 2nd attempt. In a priceless letter that he wrote to Julius Epstein and that relates specifically to these events and to Mahler's embarrassing set-back in Iglau, we see the 1st instance of his stylistic grasp of Romantic irony in the sense understood by August Wilhelm Schlegel and Jean Paul - the latter, an author for whom Mahler retained a life-long affection. To the multifarious demands that were being placed on the 17 year old youth and that included the attractions of the big city, Wagnerism and the evenings that he spent at the Opera, the piano lessons that he was giving and his duties as an accompanist and, finally, his workload at the Conservatory and the classes that he was concurrently following at the grammar school in Iglau, Mahler reacted not with despair but with irony :

Your « Well-Tempered Highness » will excuse me if I modulate from the gentle Adagio of my feelings through the dissonance of my anger to a wild Finale, which is to be played moltissimo rubato. (Mahler is alluding here to his Piano Quartet of 1876, the 1st movement of which includes the performance marking « moltissimo rubato and impassioned » towards the end.) The fact is that my entry in the leavers' concert here in Iglau was a few bars too late or, rather, I arrived a few days too late so that I have not been able to take the examination and have had to put it off for 2 months. None the less, I hope to complete the homework that you set me for the vacation and to do so, moreover, to your complete satisfaction. »

For a 17 year old, this is a remarkably polished letter demonstrating a real satirical wit, so that it is easy to understand why, according to a number of his friends, Mahler, for a time, considered a career as a writer rather than as a musician. But, just as we saw with his letter complaining about his father's alleged poverty, young Mahler was not over-punctilious about the truth : he had not arrived too late for his examination in Iglau but had simply failed it, a point he clearly preferred not to disclose to his revered teacher. Although we should not attach too much importance to this, we shall have repeated occasions to note that, whereas Mahler applied only the strictest moral standards to himself and others and that he generally came-up to those standards, he was willing, for tactical reasons, to play fast and loose with the truth and to manipulate facts and figures, the better to achieve his desired goals.

Before examining the rest of Gustav Mahler's period of study in Vienna, about which we know so little, and before taking a closer look at the circle around Siegfried Lipiner, we must take another step back and consider Mahler against the background not only of Richard Wagner and Johannes Brahms but also of Brahms and Anton Bruckner, for it was these 3 composers (together with Johann Strauß, of course) who dominated the musical world of Vienna in the 1870's and who impregnated the air that Mahler and his friends breathed. We have already given a brief account of the battle lines between the Wagnerians and the « Brahmins » . On the one hand was progress, the « new » and an æsthetic outlook bound-up with expression, on the other, reaction, the « old » and a formal æsthetic culled from Eduard Hanslick's opusculum « On the Beautiful in Music » . (The fact that Hanslick was Wagner's most bitter critic helped even the most slow-witted observer to see the situation clearly.)

We are now more familiar with the world in which the 15 year old distiller's son from Iglau found himself in 1875. It would be foolish to assume that from his 1st day in the city, Mahler conquered cultural Vienna and felt at home in every corner of this vast city. Rather, we should imagine a young boy from a town of nearly 20,000 inhabitants finding himself in a city with a population that had just passed the 1,000,000 mark ; until then, the largest city he had known was Prague, an experience he had found profoundly disturbing. The term « culture shock » is entirely appropriate here. We do not know all the details of Mahler's life during this period (with a few exceptions, his surviving letters do not predate 1879) but certain conclusions are none the less possible. According to the matriculation register of the « Conservatory for Music and the Performing Arts of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » and music-drama, the party of reaction sought to perpetuate the Beethovenian form of the Symphony, chamber music and lieder of a kind that had been traditional since the late- 18th and early 19th Centuries. The allegedly academic and dry-as-dust Brahms had many friends, especially among the older generation, but he also had many enemies, most of whom belonged to a younger generation. It was left to Arnold Schönberg, in his 1933 lecture « Brahms, the Progressive » , to point-out that the « Wagner - Brahms » alternative was not, in fact, a genuine one and that it was more sensible to speak of « Brahms and Wagner » :

« It is the purpose of this essay to prove that Brahms, the classicist, the academician, was a great innovator in the realm of musical language, that, in fact, he was a great progressive. Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß had been the 1st to clarify these concepts. They had both been educated in the traditional as well as in the progressive, in the Brahmsian as well as in the Wagnerian philosophy of art. Their example helped us to realize that there was as much organizational order, if not pedantry in Wagner as there was daring courage, if not even bizarre fantasy in Brahms. »

And Arnold Schönberg goes on to demonstrate by means of a series of detailed examples that Johannes Brahms's music contains a vast amount of intricate motivic writing, but also a marked economy in his handling of complex material coupled with clear logic and imagination. Without eschewing beauty and emotion, Brahms had shown the creative forces that could be unleashed by his detailed treatment of the musical material, by wrestling with ideas and with that material and by the technique of « developing variation » that may strike the listener as a conceptual process. Brahms « the progressive » ushered in a period of progress in the direction of an absolute musical language that Schönberg himself claimed finally to have put into practice.

On the other hand, there was Anton Bruckner. Or perhaps, it would be more accurate to describe Bruckner as occupying a place apart, for the opposing camp was home to Richard Wagner and the « New Germans » . Johannes Brahms had no time for Bruckner and even less understanding, notoriously dismissing his works as « Symphonic boa constrictors » . To the extent that Vienna's critics were almost all on the side of Brahms rather than that of Wagner and the New Germans (although this dualism was less marked among the general public) , Bruckner, who had dedicated his 3rd Symphony to Wagner, was misinterpreted as a Wagnerian and showered with scorn and contempt. Gustav Mahler himself was present when the 3rd Symphony was given its 1st performance in Vienna, on 16 December 1877, and saw Bruckner suffer one of the worst set-backs of his career. He was not only the composer of the work but was also obliged to conduct it, when the planned conductor, Johann Herbeck, for some years the director of the Court Opera and the principal conductor of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » 's concerts, had died unexpectedly, in October of that year. The 1st performance of the 3rd Symphony turned-out to be a disaster, the audience laughing and shouting protests, before leaving the hall in droves during the work's final movement, a « Farewell Symphony » of a kind hardly envisaged by Franz-Joseph Haydn. « Let me out » , a tearful Bruckner is reported to have exclaimed, « people don't want to know about me » . In his review of the performance, Eduard Hanslick made no attempt to spare the composer's feelings :

« The Symphony sounded as if Beethoven's 9th had been crossed with Wagner's " Die Walküre " and, then, been trampled underfoot. »

Some 2 years later, an arrangement of the Wagner-Symphony for 2 pianos was published. It was the work of Gustav Mahler and Rudolf Krzyżanowski, who had received the commission at some date during 1878. It was a great honour for a barely 18 year old youth, and the 1st time that his name had appeared on a piece of music. Mahler and Krzyżanowski were among the youngest and, at the same time, the closest admirers of Anton Bruckner, a point that Mahler himself repeatedly emphasized. In a letter probably written in 1902, he dated his contacts with Bruckner to the years between 1875 and 1881, in other words, the exact period when he was studying in Vienna. He insisted that, in spite of claims to the contrary, he had never been a « pupil » of Bruckner but was « one of his most enthusiastic admirers and publicists » . In comments that were not intended for public consumption, conversely, we find a more critical attitude to Bruckner on Mahler's part. In around 1900, he told Natalie Bauer-Lechner fairly bluntly :

« If it were up to me, I should scarcely perform any Bruckner at the Philharmonic concerts, which are so limited in scope and intended only for the best : one really cannot expect an audience to listen to these scraps of music and appalling absurdities, for all that they are often interrupted by divine ideas and themes. »

And when Mahler heard the 9th Symphony in Salzburg, in August 1906, he wrote to Alma :

« The work is the last word in absurdity. Salzburg was a-tremble with enthusiasm. It was a kind of musical midday snack in Bavarian style. »

If Mahler adopted an increasingly critical view of Anton Bruckner that we could sum-up as « wonderful themes inartistically developed » , then his attitude to Johannes Brahms and his music changed from austere reserve to great respect, while falling short of genuine enthusiasm. As a Wagnerian and an advocate of Bruckner's music, Mahler was the born enemy of Brahms or, at least, he should have been. But this was not the case. In later years, when Brahms was already an old man, the 2 composers grew closer as human beings, Mahler frequently visiting the older man at his summer retreat at Bad Ischl. Although he assured Natalie Bauer-Lechner that these visits were of limited appeal as they failed to provide him with any intellectual or professional stimulus, he justified them by claiming that the elderly composer was anxious to avoid all intellectual exertion that did not flow directly into his work. But Mahler's respect for Brahms' music increased as he grew older. From an early date, he concentrated on the Symphony to the virtual exclusion of all other genres, tending to the « Brahmin » camp in his rejection of the Symphonic poem and music drama, for all that he felt a spiritual affinity with the former, at least in his 1st 2 Symphonies, whereas his commitment to the latter went no further than performing such works in the Opera House. It would never have occurred to him to write a Violin Concerto, and when he heard a performance of the Brahms Concerto in Berlin with the composer's friend Joseph Joachim as the soloist, he almost literally exploded with anger : « How can anyone write anything as ante-diluvian as a Violin Concerto ? » , he asked Natalie. « It's Zarathustra's tight-rope walker flogging himself to death and ready to be buried. » And yet, as Arnold Schönberg indicated, Mahler was able to be both a Wagnerian and a Brahmsian, at one and the same time, no doubt because, like Schönberg, he recognized the progressive features in Brahms' music, a point that emerges with particular clarity from a comparison between Bruckner and Brahms that took place (presumably in the early 1890's) within the context of a discussion with his brother Otto. Otto argued simplistically that, with Bruckner, the content was greater, whereas, with Brahms, the form was more perfect. Mahler countered this by insisting that :

« In order to judge a work, you have to look at it as a whole. And, in this respect, Brahms is indisputably the greater of the 2, with his extraordinarily compact compositions which aren't at all obvious, but reveal greater depth and richness of content, the more you enter into them. And think of his immense productivity, which is also part of the total picture of an artist ! With Bruckner, certainly, you are carried away by the magnificence and wealth of his inventiveness, but, at the same time, you are repeatedly disturbed by fragmentary character, which breaks the spell. I can permit myself to say this, because you know how deeply I revere Bruckner in spite of it, and I shall always do whatever is in my power to have his works played and heard. »

But, as principal conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic, Gustav Mahler exercised this power only hesitantly and without any real sense of inner conviction.

Gustav Mahler's intellectual curiosity, which he retained throughout his life, extended far beyond the world of music. His father's example as a « Coachman-scholar » , the Classical authors in the family's bookcase and his knowledge of history, literature and philosophy, which he picked-up at school alongside all the cramming, sometimes putting down unintentional roots, all exercised his young mind. The Conservatory could offer no counterpart to this or provide him with any intellectual stimulus as it was too much of a training ground for future musicians, with too narrow a syllabus. Mahler had scarcely passed his school-leaving examination, albeit at the 2nd attempt, when his intellectual energy drove him to the city's University, where he enrolled in September 1877 at the age of 17. During his 1st term there, it was mainly German language and literature that he studied ; interestingly, he read Middle-High German language and literature with Richard Heinzel, later adding courses in philosophy, history and the history of music. It appears, too, that he studied harmony with Anton Bruckner, although this was later deleted from his University records. As an institution, the University of Vienna enjoyed a considerable reputation, although the lecturers in the courses that Mahler attended were not necessarily adept at firing the young hothead's interests. At all events, Mahler was already following completely different courses by his 2nd term : Classical sculpture, the history of Dutch painting and the « philosophy of the history of philosophy » , which he studied with Franz Brentano, who was the nephew of the poet Clemens Brentano and, arguably, Vienna's leading teacher in the field of the humanities. And yet, here too, Mahler's appetite was evidently not whetted, for he failed to register for any course at all for what would have been his 3rd term at the University. Instead, he took a year off, resuming his course only in the autumn of 1879, when he read archaeology, European history of the Napoleonic Age and the « history of music since the death of Beethoven » . In this last-named subject, his teacher was none other than Eduard Hanslick, who had founded the tradition of musicology in Vienna, occupying a chair that was still called, « Aesthetics and the History of Music » , and that was later to be filled by Mahler's friend and champion Guido Adler.

The very choice of subjects that Mahler studied indicates the wide range of his interests, while also attesting to the fact that the University and the subjects on offer there ultimately failed to satisfy him. His intellectual energy needed to find other outlets and open other valves. His closest friends at the Conservatory were shortly joined by 2 further groups of acquaintances, the 1st of which was Vienna's Literary Club, an organization concerned with everything not directly bound-up with music and, as such, likely to be of interest to a young reader like Mahler. Friends such as Rudolf Krzyzanowski, Hans Rott and Hugo Wolf had been interested only in music, whereas the Literary Club consisted of 3 young people closely associated with Mahler's Moravian homeland : his cousin Gustav Frank, who was attending the Academy of Fine-Arts in Vienna and whom Theodor Fischer described as an « engraver » ; Theodor Fischer, who was the son of Iglau's director of music and, later, the well-heeled president of the District Court and who has left us such a colourful account of Mahler's childhood ; and, finally, Emil Freund, who on leaving the Iglau Grammar School was similarly studying law at the University of Vienna and who was to remain Mahler's confidant and lawyer until his death. Unfortunately, we have absolutely no idea what literary topics the « Iglau Four » discussed. In his reminiscences, Fischer reports only that « at our meetings, there were debates on literary questions and the issues of the day ; they generally ended in our walking the streets for half the night, when, in a spirit of Romantic effusiveness, we would abandon ourselves to the spell cast on us by the wonderful moonlit buildings of old Vienna » .

If the Literary Club was a loose continuation of the literary enthusiasms of grammar-school pupils fired by Romantic interests, the 2nd circle in which Mahler found himself (probably, from the autumn of 1879) was of incomparably greater importance, affecting the whole of the rest of his life. Certainly, it was more important than the University and, intellectually speaking, more important than his friends at the Conservatory. This was the « Pernerstorfer Circle » , a group that, in Mahler's case, could also be called the Lipiner circle. Mahler was a member of it, on and off until 1883, when he finally left Vienna to take-up his post in Olmütz. These 3 years and the circle itself were the most crucial of all in terms of Mahler's literary and philosophical formation and his whole outlook on life, so that a lengthy excursus is more than justified, not least because Lipiner was of tremendous importance in Mahler's life, 1st in the years leading up to the breach following his marriage to Alma Schindler, and, again, in the final years of Mahler's life. (The fact that Alma Schindler was born in the autumn of 1879, at the very time that Mahler was becoming involved in the « Lipiner Circle » , also serves to underline the generation gap between Mahler and his wife.)

The history of the « Lipiner Circle » predates Mahler's entry into it, beginning, as it does, in March 1867, when a group of grammar-school pupils from the « Schottengymnasium » in Vienna formed an association that called itself the Telyn Society, its fine-sounding name inspired by the word for an ostensibly Celtic form of harp played by the old bards of Britain : the Ossianic fabrications of James Macpherson had not yet entirely lost their impact. The members of the Telyn Society were interested not only in literary history but also in politics, their name implying that they were picking-up a tradition that was Germanic in its wider sense. In doing so, they were emphatically not appealing to the Nibelung myth, which Richard Wagner was then in the process of reviving. (The 1st performance of his « Ring » had yet to take place.) Wilhelm Jordan's epic version was only just starting to appear in print and had found only a small audience in Austria. If the pupils at the « Schottengymnasium » knew about the « Nibelungenlied », it was because one of their teachers, Hugo Mareta, was an enthusiastic champion of the poem. However powerful Wagner's impact may have been on Vienna's young academics and intellectuals some 10 years later, there must have been some other point for them to latch on to in the 1870's. Celtic culture was thus a kind of preparation for the « Nibelungenlied ». But the idea of German nationalism was none the less a driving force behind the formation of this club. Austria had just been defeated by Prussia, making a Pan-German solution no more than a distant prospect, so that the increasingly apparent attempts to revive Celtic national feeling in Britain, in the years around the middle of the Century, evidently encouraged a similar movement in Austria. The founder members of the Telyn Society were all destined to play important roles in Austrian society and history, but they were also important for Mahler. They included Victor Adler, the son of a wealthy Jewish businessman, Salomon Adler, who had come to Vienna from Prague and who later became one of Austria's leading Social-Democrats ; Max von Gruber, the son of one of the pioneers of otology and later a famous hygienist who conducted important research in the field of typhoid infections ; and Heinrich Friedjung, who went on to become a historian and a central figure in the Austrian German National Party, only to find himself excluded from it on account of his Jewish descent and additionally discredited as a historian for not checking the reliability of historical sources that turned-out to be inauthentic. Last but not least was Engelbert Pernerstorfer. Unlike his fellow pupils, he came from a poor background and was the son of a tailor. Together with Adler, he went on to found the Austrian Social Democratic Party. 1st, however, he became a German Nationalist, an affiliation that followed naturally from his membership of the Telyn Society. It needs to be emphasized, however, that these young German nationalists had not yet signed-up to an anti-Semitic agenda, not least because such a move would have been problematic in view of Adler's and Friedjung's Jewish origins. The Telyn Society came to reflect a very special blend of Germanocentric and German national thinking, Socialist fantasies, sympathy with the Paris Commune and solidarity with the fate of the emerging proletariat. This mixture of nationalism and socialism, both of which were still in their infancy, inevitably led most members of the Telyn Society to embrace German national ideas, only Pernerstorfer and Adler going on to espouse the cause of social democracy. If social democracy in Austria was always more nationalistic than in Germany, it was because of these origins.

By the time that the members of the Telyn Society had left school and gone on to University, their adolescent infatuation with Celtic and Germanic Romanticism had waned, and the Welsh Telyn soon lost its significance. All its members were considerably older than Mahler, Adler having been born in 1852, Pernerstorfer in 1850. But they all remained in close contact and, in 1872, founded a « Reading Society of Viennese German Students » ; with the emphasis on « German ». With the exception of the usual student Societies, this was the most important student organization in Vienna in the 1870's, and certainly the most intellectually influential. One of the few University professors to exert any authority over this small group of student intellectuals was Lorenz von Stein, whose brilliant writings straddled the disparate disciplines of economics, politics and sociology, and included Socialism and Communism in Present-Day France and a handbook on sociology. Adler and Pernerstorfer played leading roles in the « Reading Society » , which soon evolved into far more than a mere continuation of the Telyn Society under another name. By 1874, Adler was its librarian and Pernerstorfer its secretary. Its members discussed not only the theories of Charles Darwin but also the philosophy of Arthur Schopenhauer, debating the differences between them on the basis of a sensationalist tract of the time, Carl von Rokitansky's « The Solidarity of All Animal Life » . Adler's diaries contain lengthy notes teeming with concepts such as « fellow suffering » , « world suffering » and « weltenschmerz » ; it comes as no surprise to learn that, only a few years later, many of these young people felt drawn to Richard Wagner and to his religion of compassion as expressed in some of his late essays such as « Religion and Art » of 1880 and in « Parsifal » . It is also clear why Mahler, too, should have been attracted to this group. Thanks not least to the additional influence of Fyodor Dostoyevsky, Mahler subscribed all his life to a personal religion of compassion. Socialism, German nationalism and the interest in compassion and solidarity that predisposed a number of these students to pin their colours to the Social Democratic mast led them far away from the liberal spirit that still dominated the age but whose roots were already cankered. In this way, the « Reading Society » came within the purview of the authorities and, at the end of 1878, was disbanded as politically suspect. From this point of view, it was entirely logical that its members, including, at a later date, Mahler too, should have stumbled across the writings of Friedrich Nietzsche and done so, moreover, at an exceptionally early date.

We need to remember that Nietzsche's 1st full-length publication, « The Birth of Tragedy » , had 1st appeared in 1872 and that it had met with little interest except in specialist circles and among Wagnerians. It says much for the perceptiveness of Vienna's student population that one of their number, Josef Ehrlich, had already made contact with Nietzsche by April 1876 and expressed his enthusiasm for the philosopher's « Untimely Meditations » , the 4th and final one of which, « Richard Wagner in Bayreuth » , was about to appear. The main members of the « Reading Society » had been very much waiting for Nietzsche, even though he was neither a German nationalist nor a writer noted for a particular interest in the religion of compassion, but his radical philosophy was now struggling to emerge from the cocoon of his « Untimely Meditations » . Vienna's students must have made a 2nd attempt to get in touch with Nietzsche the following year for, in June 1877, we find Erwin Rohde writing to the philosopher and mentioning a student whom he had met in Vienna and who had introduced himself as a member of what Rohde called the « Nietzsche Society of Vienna » . The student, Rohde claimed, had sent Nietzsche a copy of a book titled, « Prometheus Unbound » , the very title of which was a flattering tribute to the Basel Professor of Classical Philology, for the title page of « The Birth of Tragedy » had included a vignette depicting the unbound « Prometheus » . Nietzsche received the book only after some delay, for it had been sent to his mother's home in Naumburg and, only from there, was it forwarded to the philosopher, who was currently on holiday at Rosenlaubad. But his reaction on finally reading it was entirely positive, and in his reply we find him telling Rohde that the poem had provided him with « a day of true celebration » and that its author must be a veritable « genius » . The name of this genius was Siegfried Lipiner.

Le « disciple » Gustav Mahler

Le talent musical du jeune Gustav Mahler est devenu manifeste tôt.

1866 : Le chef d'orchestre du Théâtre de Jihlava (« Iglau ») , Franz Viktorin, lui donne régulièrement des leçons de piano. Mahler a alors 6 ans.

1869 : Johannes Bosch devient le professeur de piano de Mahler. Bosch et Viktorin offraient à leur école de musique de Jihlava des cours de piano et de violon. De toute évidence, ils n'épargneront aucun effort pour faire de l'enfant un grand virtuose.

Octobre 1870 : À 10 ans, Mahler donne son 1er récital de piano en public, au Théâtre municipal de Jihlava. La presse locale parle alors d'un « futur virtuose du piano » et confirme que la prestation du « fils d'un homme d'affaires local, d'origine israélite » est couronnée d'un « grand et honorable succès » . (Déjà, avant ce concert, on rapporte que Mahler donnaient des leçons de piano à d'autres enfants.) Bernhard Mahler (1827-1889) voulait offrir à son fils une meilleure éducation scolaire et aspirait le présenter à des cercles musicaux ; ce qui pourrait s'avérer bénéfique pour son développement.

Mahler et son ami d'enfance, Josef Steiner (1857-1913) , fréquentent ensemble l'école secondaire de Jihlava.

1875 : Gustav Mahler, maintenant âgé de 15 ans, fait la connaissance de Gustav Schwarz, un notable local qui est parent avec le père de Josef Steiner. Il est impressionné la virtuosité du jeune pianiste. Il deviendra son 1er professeur attiré. Schwarz va convaincre les parents du talent musical de leur fils et offre de lui ouvrir les portes du Conservatoire de Vienne grâce à son contact avec le professeur de piano, Julius Epstein (1832-1926) .

Été 1875 : Mahler à l'idée d'écrire à Jihlava un Opéra, Ernst duc de Souabe (« Herzog Ernst von Schwaben ») , sur un texte de son camarade de classe, Josef Steiner (peu de temps auparavant, le frère de Gustav, Ernst Mahler, venait de mourir) .

10 septembre 1875 : Mahler est envoyé à Vienne pour parfaire sa formation au Conservatoire.

20 septembre 1875 : Mahler est admis au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Konservatorium für Musik und darstellende Kunst der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») avec l'appréciation : « musicien-né » ; 2 mois après son 15e anniversaire.

Juin 1876 : À sa 1re année de Conservatoire, Mahler remporte le 1er prix d'interprétation dans la catégorie « piano » en programmant un extrait d'une Sonate de Franz Schubert.

Juillet 1876 : Mahler remporte le 1er prix de composition avec le 1er mouvement de son Quatuor avec piano en la mineur. L'œuvre sera présentée à nouveau lors d'un concert à Jihlava, le 12 septembre.

31 juillet 1876 : Lors d'un concert (réussi) à Jihlava, Mahler interprète sa Sonate pour violon et piano (aujourd'hui perdue) en compagnie de son collègue de classe, Richard Schraml. L'œuvre sera connue de plusieurs de ses collègues.

1877 : Mahler est maintenant admis à l'Université de Vienne. Il étudie diverses disciplines mais pas la direction d'orchestre (qui n'y sera enseignée qu'à partir de 1909) : le piano aux côtés de Julius Epstein (un soutien de poids et un ami personnel de Johannes Brahms) ; l'harmonie aux côtés de Robert Fuchs (1847-1927) ; et la composition et le contrepoint aux côtés de Franz Krenn. Epstein va recommander son talentueux élève comme professeur de piano. Il confiera plus tard à Mahler son propre fils, Richard, qui deviendra pianiste de concert. Mahler s'absentait souvent du Conservatoire pour aller assister à ses cours à l'école secondaire de Jihlava.

Plus tard, Robert Fuchs aimera raconter que Mahler était compétent en tout et que ses condisciples le percevaient comme « un nouveau Schubert » .

Mahler partage la chambre d'Hans Rott et est aussi condisciple avec Hugo Wolf, Rudolf Krzyzanowski et Arnold Rosé. Son caractère entier se manifeste déjà. Il complète sa formation en classes d'harmonie et de composition. Mahler compose de nombreuses œuvres de musique de chambre et d'orchestre qu'il détruira par la suite.

18 mars 1878 : Mahler rédige le texte du « Das Klagende Lied » , basé sur 2 contes :

Un conte de Bechstein (1801-1860) , éponyme, dans le « Neues deutsches Märchenbuch » (1856) apparenté à « Der singende Knochen » (l'Os chantant) : conte n° 28 de « Kinder- und Hausmärchen » des frères Grimm.

1877-1878 : Mahler amorce un second projet d'Opéra pour voix et orchestre qui sera également inachevé, « les Argonautes » (« Die Argonauten ») , sur un livret (utilisant la forme stylistique du « stabreim ») qu'il élabore conjointement avec Josef Steiner (d'après « Das goldene Vlies » de Franz Seraphicus Grillparzer, 1791-1872) où les personnages de Jason et de Médée sont mis en évidence. L'imaginaire du jeune compositeur était alors influencé par les mythes fort prétentieux en vogue dans un Romantisme finissant qui auront leurs moments de gloire lors des Iers Festivals de Bayreuth.

Été 1878 : Poussé par son père, Mahler obtient (enfin) son certificat de fin d'études secondaires (baccalauréat) à Jihlava (Iglau) .

Juillet 1878 : Mahler achève brillamment ses études musicales. Il réussit son examen final pour l'obtention du diplôme. Son Quatuor avec piano (aujourd'hui perdu) lui permet de remporter le 1er prix de composition. Mahler lui-même était au piano lors du récital. Parmi les 4 autres élèves, citons le violoncelliste Eduard Rosé (Rosenblum) , le frère-aîné du célèbre 1er violon de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, Arnold Rosé. Les relations avec les frères Rosé deviendront encore plus intimes : la sœur de Mahler, Justine, va épouser Arnold Rosé et son autre sœur, Emma, le violoncelliste Eduard.

Mahler n'obtiendra pas la prestigieuse Médaille d'argent dont étaient récompensés les meilleurs étudiants au sortir du Conservatoire. Il y en aura 9 au total. Mahler avait alors soumis, au Prix Beethoven, l'Ouverture (Prélude) de son Opéra « les Argonautes » .

Son Opéra féérique « Růbezahel » (« Krakonoš ») (1879-1883) est un autre projet inachevé, aujourd'hui perdu. Seul le manuscrit du livret a subsisté.

« Rübezahl » : Oper in fünf Verwandlungen mit einem Vorspiel.

Nur der unvollständige Entwurf zu einem Textbuch est überlièfert, die erste Fassung. Zu einer weiteren kompositorischen Bearbeitung gibt es zwar ausreichende Indizien, doch ist dazu bisher nichts genaueres bekannt geworden.

Entstehung : Herbst 1879 bis 1883, und in kleineren Arbeitsphasen bis 1890, und darüber hinaus.

« Rübezahl » est un être fantastique ou géant des monts des Géants, qui peut prendre des apparences différentes, dont celle d'un moine, d'un mineur, d'un chasseur sauvage ou d'une souche d'arbre. Représenté pour la 1re fois en 1564, il n'est pas antérieur au XVe siècle. Son nom véritable est Seigneur de la montagne, « Rübezahl » n'est qu'un sobriquet péjoratif, dont l'étymologie n'est pas claire. Le mot pourrait venir du vieux haut-allemand, du moyen haut-allemand ou du tchègue, et signifierait tempête sauvage ou démon à queue.

L'objet d'une discorde entre Hugo Wolf et Gustav Mahler fut d'ailleurs la légende du personnage des monts de Silésie, « Rübezahl », qui fait quelques apparitions chez les frères Grimm ou E. T. A. Hoffmann et prend diverses formes pour défendre le Bien contre le Mal et se venger de ceux qui l'ont moqué. Wolf découvre le 1er cette légende pour en faire un drame musical ; ce à quoi Mahler répond que le sujet ne peut être exploité qu'à des fins humoristiques. Il s'ensuit que le 1er livret est achevé en 8 jours par Mahler alors que celui de Wolf n'est pas encore commencé. Colère de Wolf. Mais on doit à Natalie Bauer-Lechner de nous éclairer sur ce qui sépare Wolf de Mahler et son projet d'Opéra féérique, un « Märchenspiel » travaillé durant l'hiver 1879 puis abandonné. « Chez Mahler, la parodie, le grotesque à la Hoffmann se sont exprimés totalement dans le sujet de " Rübezahl ", alors que la nature rêveuse et Romantique de Wolf n'avait vu là, sans doute, que du merveilleux. » Mais n'est-ce pas l'un des propres du conte que de faire passer le récit par un enchantement libérateur qui conjure la détresse que le mythe, expression que refoule l'ironie mahlérienne, fait peser sur l'humanité ? »

Natalie écrit dans ses mémoires :

Gustav Mahler m'a raconté de la façon la plus vivante la légende de son livret « Rübezahl », dont la mise en musique est restée malheureusement interrompue, à peine commencée. « Et sais-tu, comment je suis tombé dessus ? Hugo Wolf, ton ami, m'a dit un jour qu'il avait trouvé la substance d'un drame musical et qu'il voulait effectuer des recherches sur ce sujet à la " Hofbibliothek ". Comme il m'a dit, en réponse à mes questions, qu'il s'agissait de " Rübezahl ", je lui ai répondu qu'il ne devait le traiter que par l'humour. Il ne voulait rien savoir. Mais moi, sans penser que je pouvais lui porter tort, attiré par ma propre compréhension du sujet, suis allé à la maison, je m'y suis mis, et j'ai complété en 8 jours mon " Rübezahl ". Ensuite je suis allé voir Wolf et je lui ai demandé où il en était avec son drame, s'il l'avait déjà terminé. " Je n'ai pas encore commencé, mais j'ai trouvé de jolies choses là-dessus en bibliothèque ! " " Ah bon ? Eh bien, moi, j'ai déjà fini le mien. ", et je l'ai sorti de mon sac. »

« Wolf s'est mis en rage, et toutes mes tentatives pour le tranquilliser, de même que mon conseil de traiter le sujet d'une façon complètement différente, ont échoué ; il m'a déclaré, plein de dépit, qu'il n'en ferait plus un mot. »

« Je lui ai quand même fait lire mon texte ainsi qu'à un autre camarade. Il ne rencontrait leur approbation qu'en partie. Je ne sais pas qu'est-ce qu'ils en pensaient d'autre. Quand je m'en souviens à présent, il contenait beaucoup de rudesses et de lacunes, que j'aurais polies et comblées si je l'avais mis en musique. Mais celui qui jetterait un œil à cette forme imparfaite, qui a quand même le sens musical et qui cherche le ton d'une expression pleinement vivante, pourrait peut-être en obtenir quelque chose. »

« Et tu ne veux plus le continuer ? N'est-ce pas tout à fait dommage ? »

« Non, cela ne me serait plus possible aujourd'hui. Je me suis trop éloigné de ma disposition d'alors. »

Cet épisode est déjà significatif du caractère très ombrageux de Hugo Wolf.

1878-1879 : Début pour Mahler des études de philosophie allemande (Schopenhauer, Nietzsche) , d'histoire et d'histoire de la musique à l'Université de Vienne. Il se lie d'amitié avec le professeur Anton Bruckner en suivant, en parallèle, ses conférences très courues. Il va devenir, dans une certaine mesure, « son disciple » . (Bruckner enseignait l'harmonie et le contrepoint au Conservatoire depuis 1868 et donnait des conférences sur les mêmes sujets l'Université de Vienne depuis 1875-1876.)

S'il n'a jamais été « officiellement et en pratique » l'élève d'Anton Bruckner (l'homologue de Franz Krenn au Conservatoire) , Mahler va entretenir avec lui une relation d'estime et de compréhension mutuelle.

Un biographe avance l'anecdote suivante : Bruckner estimait tellement le jeune Mahler qu'ils descendaient côte à côte les escaliers sur plusieurs étages de l'Université de Vienne avant de se dire au revoir une fois arrivés au rez-de-chaussée.

Plus tard, Gustav Mahler déclarera explicitement n'avoir jamais été son élève bien qu'il aime se considérer comme le successeur direct du grand Symphoniste : Mahler surnommait ce digne professeur et conférencier : « le Précurseur ! » .

Ainsi, Bruckner va lui offrir le manuscrit de sa 3e Symphonie. Il faut reconnaître que Mahler s'était trouvé lié, à 2 reprises au moins, au sort de celle-ci : lorsqu'un public moqueur (et rapidement déserteur) accueillit froidement la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner, le 16 décembre 1877, Gustav et d'autres étudiants (parmi lesquels Rudolf Krzyzanowski) allèrent quant à eux jusqu'à transcrire l'œuvre pour piano. De même, c'est Mahler qui réussit, dans un 1er temps, à persuader Bruckner de ne pas céder sous la pression de ses collègues qui lui conseillaient « d'adapter » sa 3e Symphonie aux exigences malicieuses du public.

16 décembre 1877 : « Ce fut un moment déchirant de voir Bruckner, à la fin du concert, récupérer sa musique, seul sur le podium. Les musiciens du Philharmonique ayant déguerpi dès les dernières mesures. »

On comptait à peine une dizaine de personnes au parterre qui continuaient à rire et à chahuter, criant : « da capo » et « bis » . Une poignée de fidèles élèves (environ 25) dont un Gustav Mahler âgé de 17 ans (et son condisciple Rudolf Krzyzanowski) se sont précipités en direction du Maître au cœur brisé, tentant en vain de lui remonter le moral avec des paroles consolatrices. « Laissez-moi seul, je veux quitter ce lieu. Les Viennois ne veulent pas entendre mes œuvres. » s'écria-t-il.

Un critique témoin de la scène parla de ce « petit groupe d'hardis aventuriers » . Au même moment, l'éditeur Theodor Rättig (un des rares qui soit resté) s'approcha (tel un ange venu du ciel) pour encenser la nouvelle pièce. Bruckner regarda avec incrédulité cet homme étrange qui osa afficher tant de courage à un moment aussi dramatique. Il se dit même prêt à risquer de la publier à ses propres frais (3,000 Florins ou « Gulden ») . Selon le biographe August Göllerich, Bruckner recevra, en 1885, une somme de 150 Florins (« Gulden ») à titre de redevances.

Afin de lui rendre hommage en guise de consolation, Gustav Mahler et son confrère (étudiant et chambreur) Rudolf Krzyzanowski préparèrent un arrangement pour piano « 4 mains » de la 3e Symphonie qui sera publié l'année suivante. Cet arrangement est une réalisation de 1er plan, fidèle à la partition. Gustav Mahler se chargera de traduire (de manière efficace mais avec une certaine retenue) les 1er, 2e et 3e mouvements. Tandis que Rudolf Krzyzanowski réalisera la transcription du Finale ajoutant un peu plus de couleur et d'espièglerie.

Dans une lettre adressée à ce Maître qu'il admirait tant, Mahler lui assure que l'un de ses principaux objectifs dans sa carrière sera de tout faire pour diffuser sa musique afin qu'il soit enfin reconnu à sa juste valeur.

1879 : Composition de la 1re grande œuvre de Gustav Mahler - « Das Klagende Lied » (le Chant plaintif) .

L'athlétique Mahler va entreprendre, à maintes reprises, de longues randonnées pédestres en nature.

Début été 1880 : Mahler planifie d'accompagner Anton Krisper et les frères Krzyzanowski (Rudolf et Heinrich) lors d'un long périple à travers la forêt Bohémienne et les monts Fichtel pour finalement faire escale à Bayreuth puis assister à une représentation du célèbre « Jeu de la Passion du Christ » au village d'Oberammergau (montée tous les 10 ans et d'une durée de 6 heures) en Haute-Bavière. Ce projet tombera à l'eau lorsque Mahler sera nommé à Bad Hall, en juin. Bien plus tard, Mahler aura l'occasion d'assister au Festival de Bayreuth mais ne visitera jamais Oberammergau au bord de la rivière Ammer, dans l'Ammertal.

...

Heinrich Krzyzanowski was a writer who studied at the Vienna University. His brother, Rudolf, was a student at the Vienna Conservatory and a member of professor Franz Krenn's 3rd year composition class. At the same concert in which Gustav Mahler's prize-winning « Schema » of his Quartet with Piano was played, an Adagio for String Sextet by Rudolf Krzyzanowski was also performed : it, too, was awarded a prize.

The date of Krzyzanowski's birth is uncertain. After leaving the Conservatory, he seems to have held a number of conducting appointments, the most important of which were at Prague, where he succeeded Karl Muck as 1st conductor from 1891 to 1895, and Weimar, where he was Hofkapellmeister from 1898 to 1907. He died in 1911, only a few weeks later than Mahler.

Mahler's early friendship with the Krzyzanowski brothers was warm and intimate. He had interest and ambitions in common with Rudolf ; and his holiday plans on occasions included both brothers. His correspondence for some years makes frequent reference to Rudolf's career and he was always ready to advise, or use his influence on his friend's behalf, where such was required. He suggested to his agent, for instance, that Rudolf should fill his post at Cassell when he moved on to Leipzig.) Until the 1890's, at least, his letters show that he kept in touch with these companions of his youth. At one stage, Heinrich Krzyzanowski wrote to Mahler suggesting an Operatic project, but it appears that nothing came of the idea.

Juin 1880 : Mahler accède à son 1er poste, celui de « Kapellmeister » au « Kurtheater » de Bad Hall, au nord de l'Autriche.

Novembre 1880 : Complétion (avant d'avoir atteint l'âge de 20 ans) du « Das Klagende Lied » sous le titre de « Märchen in drei Abtheilungen » (un conte en 3 parties) ; Mahler considère cette pièce comme son Opus 1 :

« Waldmärchen » (Conte de la Forêt) : Une jeune reine repousse tous ses prétendants. Elle n'épousera que celui qui lui rapportera de la forêt certaine fleur rouge. 2 frères se mettent en quête : l'aîné est dur et violent, le cadet tendre et doux. C'est le plus jeune qui trouve la fleur ; il la fixe à son chapeau, s'étend sous un saule, et s'endort. Son frère survient, lui passe son épée au travers du corps, et s'empare de la fleur.

« Der Spielmann » (le Ménestrel) : Un ménestrier vient à passer près du saule où gît sous les feuilles le squelette du jeune homme assassiné. Un os traîne au sol, le ménestrier le ramasse, et en façonne une flûte. Lorsqu'il la porte à sa bouche, la flûte se met d'elle-même à chanter, et à raconter l'horrible histoire.

Composition : 1879-1880.

Révisions : 1883, 1898.

Durée : 70 minutes.

Création : 17 février 1901, sous la direction du compositeur.

Version originale :

Solistes : soprano, alto, ténor, baryton - soprano garçon, alto garçon.

Chœur mixte.

Orchestre principal : 3 flûtes, 2 piccolos, 2 hautbois, 1 cor anglais, 3 clarinettes, 3 bassons, 4 cors, 4 trompettes, 3 trombones, 2 tubas basse, timbales, percussions (1 triangle, cymbales, 1 tam-tam, i.e. gong asiatique, 1 grosse caisse) , 6 harpes, cordes.

Orchestre au loin (« Fernorchester ») : 3 flûtes, 4 clarinettes, 3 bassons, 4 bugles, 2 cornets, timbales, percussions.

Version révisée de 1898 :

Solistes : soprano, alto, ténor - soprano garçon ad libitum.

Chœur mixte.

Orchestre principal : 3 flûtes, un piccolo, 3 clarinettes, 3 hautbois, 1 cor anglais, 3 bassons, 4 cors, 4 trompettes, 3 trombones, 1 tuba basse, timbales, percussions (1 triangle, cymbales, 1 tam-tam, 1 grosse caisse) , 2 harpes, cordes.

Orchestre au loin : 3 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 4 clarinettes, 4 cors, 2 trompettes, timbales, 1 triangle, cymbales, 1 triangle.

1881 : Mahler se présente à nouveau au Prix (concours) Beethoven de la Société des Amis de la Musique de Vienne (le « Musikverein ») , avec, cette fois-ci, un Opéra complet, le « Das Klagende Lied » , dont il fera plus tard une cantate profane. Malgré une Maîtrise précoce de l'instrumentation et du traitement de la voix, rien n'y fait. Dès le 1er examen, l'œuvre est écartée.

Le jury de la « vieille garde » , comprenant les Johannes Brahms, Eduard Hanslick, Josef Hellmesberger, Hans Richter et Karl Goldmark, accorde cette fois le prix au Concerto pour piano en si bémol mineur de Robert Fuchs, le respectable professeur de théorie musicale de Mahler au Conservatoire de Vienne, au catalogue bien fourni, mais dont le temps, contrairement à celui de Mahler, semble définitivement révolu.

Le second prix ira au professeur Viktor Emmerich Ritter von Herzfeld (1856, Poszony, Hongrie - 20 février 1919, Budapest, Hongrie) .

Mahler tente sans succès de présenter l'œuvre à plusieurs autres concours. L'échec le persuade de se tourner vers la direction d'orchestre.

Mahler entreprend une 1^{re} révision de son « Das Klagende Lied » en 1883 : élimination de la 1^{re} partie, suppression de l'orchestre lointain dans les 2^e et 3^e parties, réduction du nombre des solistes de 11 à 4, du nombre de harpes de 6 à 2. Ce n'est qu'en 1898 que Mahler, alors directeur du « Hofoper » à Vienne, trouva un éditeur. Mahler retravailla l'œuvre avant édition, y ré-incluant l'orchestre lointain dans la 3^e partie.

The subject of the Beethoven Prize gives rise to a host of chronological problems. It was 1st broached by Gustav Mahler himself, in a conversation with Natalie Bauer-Lechner in April 1898 :

« Had the jury of the Conservatoire, which included Brahms, Goldmark, Hanslick, and Richter, given me at that time the Beethoven Prize of 600 Austrian Florins for the " Klagende Lied " my whole life would have taken a different turn. I was just working on " Rübezahl ", would not have had to go to Laibach (Ljubljana) and would thus possibly have been spared my whole cursed Operatic career. Instead, however, Herr Herzfeld got the 1st composition prize, and Rott and I went empty-handed. Rott despaired and died soon afterwards insane, and I was (and shall always remain) condemned to the hell of theatrical life. »

Gustav Mahler's bitterness at the routine of the Opera House is characteristic. But can the blame for his enforced pursuit of a career as a conductor be placed all that squarely on the shoulders of the prize committee ? Mahler himself, in this excited and indignant outburst, seems to have overlooked that the 1st step on his primrose path was taken at Bad Hall in 1880, not at Ljubljana in 1881 ; and none was more assiduous in searching for new conducting posts than the young « Kapellmeister » of Bad Hall. It does seem that Mahler attempts to make the incident bear the responsibility for too many wrongs, real or fanciful : not only for his own « hell » , but for poor Rott's lunacy. There is surely a whiff of imaginary persecution here ?

The jury, moreover, though not inappropriately described by Gabriel Engel as « a stone wall of musical Classicism » (otherwise his treatment of this event is dangerously romanticized) , at a later period were not entirely indifferent or hostile to Mahler's status as a musician. By 1896, his relations with Brahms were more cordial, a fact that he might have recalled in 1898. (In view of Brahms's doubtless aggressive inspection of « Das klagende Lied » , his comment after seeing the manuscripts of Mahler's 2nd Symphony, in the summer of 1896, is of particular interest : « It is not wholly intelligible to me why Richard Strauß is proclaimed music's Revolutionary ; I find that Mahler is King of the Revolutionaries. ») Even Eduard Hanslick was to write a not unappreciative notice of some of Mahler's songs with orchestra when they were performed in Vienna in 1900 ; and, in 1896 and 1897, the aid of Karl Goldmark (1830-1915) was sought by those to have Mahler appointed to the Vienna Opera. Perhaps it was only Hans Richter (1843-1916) , whom Mahler dislodged from Vienna's Opera House (to Manchester's and England's advantage) who failed by later word or deed to modify the unfavourable verdict pronounced upon « Das klagende Lied » when its composer and the members of the jury were all younger men. In London, in 1898 (?) , Hans Richter « unburdened his heart » to Ferruccio Busoni about Mahler :

« I say, I was sorry not to be in Vienna when you played, but I heard that Mahler gave you a lesson at the rehearsal. That puts the lid on it. He can't stand any soloists because he has got no routine and can't conduct at sight ; but a conductor ought to be able to do that just as much as a pianist-come. »

There is, of course, no question that « Das klagende Lied » was rejected by the Beethoven Prize committee, nor that Mahler was anxious, having completed the piece, to score a success with it. In the same letter that he announced the end of his labours, he wrote : « My next aim : to bring about its performance by any means that I can think of. » An obvious means to that end was to try for the Beethoven Prize which, if won, would have brought welcome publicity, financial gain, and doubtless the chance of the cantata's performance.

The Prize itself was a comparatively recent institution. It had been established by the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in 1875 and was offered yearly to present and past pupils of the Conservatoire. The problem that confronts us here is one of chronology : in (or for) which year did Mahler submit « Das klagende Lied » to the committee ?

Gustav Mahler, we know, had his score ready by 1 November 1880. He declared to Natalie Bauer-Lechner that the award would have spared him the necessity of the appointment at Ljubljana, whence Mahler proceeded in the winter of 1881.

What was the situation of the committee between these 2 outside dates ? We know that they sat on 6 December 1880, to consider their decision for that year, but it appears that, « as before » , they were unable to reach an agreement as to whom the Prize should be awarded. Instead, an amendment to the rules was suggested that would open the Prize to wider competition.

It seems scarcely possible that Mahler could have put « Das klagende Lied » before this December. There were but 5 weeks between his date of completion and the final session of the committee ; and even if the rules did not exclude so last-minute a submission, it is hard to imagine that the jury could have found time to circulate the score among themselves. Moreover, no award was made, a fact which would contradict Mahler's aggrieved statement that Herr Herzfeld carried off the 1st composition prize. »

The probability that Mahler was concerned in this session of the Beethoven Prize committee seems slight. If he was not, however, then almost certainly the journey to Ljubljana cannot be attributed to the jury's adverse decision. The award for the next year, 1881, was made at a meeting of 15 December, by which date Mahler must be presumed to have commenced work in Yugoslavia. In addition, this later jury date would seem to preclude Hans Rott from participation, since it is thought that he died in 1881 ; it is known he ended his days in an asylum and it is hardly credible that the blow of failing to win the competition should have resulted in his committal to an asylum and death within 2 weeks. Mahler's introduction of Rott into the context of the Beethoven Prize is a most dubious proceeding. That he was possibly concerned with one prize or another for which Mahler too was a competitor is more than probable ; confused anecdotes suggest as much ; and we have, by no means, the amount of documentation that is desirable to place or dismiss often vague asides. Mahler himself provides the strongest reason for viewing the addition of Rott as a product of both his muddle-headedness and his anxiety to find a scapegoat, deep-dyed in villainy, for his initiation as a conductor. In 1898, to Natalie Bauer-Lechner, he implied that Rott's madness was the fault of the jury : « Rott despaired and died soon afterwards insane. » . But what do we find when we read the very letter in which Mahler announced the completion of his cantata, on 1 November 1880, before there was any possibility of the Beethoven Prize committee playing any sort of active role in the matter ? Neither more nor less than the sad fact that, « My friend Hans Rott has gone mad ! And I fear the same will befall Krisper. » So Rott was already mad, according to Mahler, at a time when the competition was not an issue, a time that fits the probability of his death in 1881 and supports my conjecture that Mahler was mistaken in supposing Rott to have been a candidate for the Beethoven Prize for which « Das klagende Lied » was entered.

If nothing else, this confusion about Rott must warn us not to accept Gustav Mahler's or Natalie Bauer-Lechner's testaments without caution. In other respects, too, details in Mahler's statement are not confirmed by the archives of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » think we may assume that it was in 1881 that Mahler submitted his cantata for the prize, in which case the operative session of the committee would be that of 15 December 1881. It is true that Herzfeld was not the winner on this occasion ; Robert Fuchs was ironically, one of Mahler's professors ! But a work by Viktor Emmerich Ritter von Herzfeld (1856-1928) was specified as « prize-worthy » (along with an Overture by H. Fink) , and it may well have been that Mahler simply mis-remembered him as the prize-winner. 2 considerations may have reinforced his mistake : Herzfeld actually did win the Beethoven Prize in 1884, and he had left the Conservatoire in 1880 with a 1st prize for composition (it is noticeable that Mahler spoke of his winning the « 1st composition prize ») . It could be, then, that all these memories of a prize-winning composer were telescoped into one, and Herzfeld promoted from an honourable mention to 1st place. There can be no likelihood that « Das klagende Lied » was submitted as late as 1884, when Herzfeld was the winner in 1882 and 1883 it seems that again no award was made - and, thus, we are obliged to choose the year singled out by circumstantial evidence. In 1881, Herzfeld at least makes an appearance ; and he was to be the next winner, an event that doubtless would have brought him Mahler's renewed and perhaps hostile attention.

Then, there is the jury. Its personnel, in 1881, partly coincides with Mahler's memory. Brahms was on it, Richter, and Goldmark ; but the records make no mention of Hanslick. The archives are sometimes unreliable ; possibly Hanslick's name was omitted in error. If not, then Mahler's memory was playing him false, stimulated perhaps by an unconscious desire to portray Hanslick in an overtly hostile role, whose antagonism, in fact, he strongly suspected (and resented) but had no real evidence of: the unconscious will create facts of its own to meet an emotional need.

If the adverse judgment of 15 December 1881 had gone in Mahler's favour, perhaps, he would have broken off his engagement at Ljubljana and not returned there in the new year ; perhaps, it would have meant that he would not have had to undertake his next conducting job, at Olmütz, late in 1882 or early in 1883 ; and it was, in a very real sense, from Olmütz onwards that the continuous tyranny of conducting began. Mahler might have had some reason to feel bitter if he thought that a success with the Beethoven Prize could have spared him the years of toil that Olmütz initiated.

1886 : Gustav Mahler va présenter le Scherzo de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner au public de Prague.

À Hambourg, il va donner la 3e Symphonie (cette fois dans son intégralité) de même que la Messe en ré mineur et le « Te Deum » .

Avril 1892 : Au sujet du concert, Mahler mentionnera dans une lettre adressée au Maître de Saint-Florian que ses « structures puissantes » et ses « idées élevées » avaient profondément impressionné le public.

1900 : Mahler va interpréter le Scherzo de la 4e Symphonie (dite « Romantique ») de Bruckner lors de l'Exposition universelle qui se tient à Paris.

17 février 1901 : Mahler dirige pour la 1re fois son œuvre, en 2 parties. Elle trouva peu d'écho auprès de la critique, même si elle souleva l'enthousiasme du jeune Alban Berg.

La partition originale parvint par voie d'héritage à la sœur de Mahler, Justine, puis au fils de celle-ci, Alfred Rosé. Ce dernier dirigea la 1re exécution de la 1re partie, « Waldmärchen », en 1934, à Brünn (Brno, aujourd'hui en République tchèque) . En 1935, il combina cette 1re partie avec la version révisée de 1898 créée par Mahler en 1901, aboutissant ainsi à une version hybride en 3 parties. Il ne publia pas le reste de la partition originale, qu'il finit par vendre en 1969 au collectionneur James M. Osburn, lequel en fit don à l'Université de Yale.

Il y a donc 3 versions de l'œuvre :

Version 1898, en 2 parties, 1re exécution en 1901 par Mahler à Vienne.

Version hybride en 3 parties, avec ré-introduction du « Waldmärchen » original et les « Der Spielmann » et « Hochzeitsstück » de 1898, exécution par Pierre Boulez en 1970, à Londres.

Version originale intégrale, en 3 parties, édition critique de Reinhold Kubik publiée en 1997, exécution la même année par Kent Nagano à Hambourg.

1909 : Mahler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner à Carnegie Hall, à la tête de l'Orchestre de New York.

1910 : Geste de générosité des plus honorables de la part de Gustav Mahler ; afin de permettre la publication de l'intégralité des œuvres d'Anton Bruckner par une maison d'édition viennoise, son contrat stipule qu'une somme de 50,000 couronnes soit retirée de son compte personnel suite aux profits engendrés par la publication de ses propres œuvres.

Alma Mahler mentionnera dans ses Mémoires que son mari a donné un cycle Bruckner durant ses années passées aux États-Unis.

Gustav Mahler first came to the capital as a 15-year-old music student, a star turn in his native Iglau in Moravia, but a rough distiller's son in the cosmopolitan world of Vienna of 1875. This was a Vienna that helped shape Mahler and many other young men like him. « A most peculiar attitude of hedonistic pessimism, joyful skepticism touching on morbid sophistication, became the dominant trait in Vienna's intellectual climate », wrote fellow musician, Ernst Křenek (who briefly married Mahler's daughter, Anna) of Vienna at the time. For the impressionable Mahler, the city must have seemed like one giant candy shop of musical goodies : this was the city of the music-critic Eduard Hanslick and the no-holds-barred battle between composers Johannes Brahms and Anton Bruckner, the latter of whom became a life-long friend of the much younger Mahler.

Mahler enrolled at the prestigious Vienna Conservatory, in the fall of 1875, and remained there for 3 years, studying piano with his mentor Julius Epstein, harmony with Robert Fuchs and composition with Franz Krenn. The Conservatory, attached to the Society of the Friends of Music and its concert-hall, the « Musikverein », was founded by Antonio Salieri, famous now not for his incredible musical output, but for his intense competition with Mozart. In Mahler's day, the director was Josef Hellmesberger, an archetypal Viennese who wore make-up and a wig that fooled no one in a desperate effort to appear younger than his 50 years ; his Franz-Josef mutton-chop whiskers also belied this attempt. Opinionated and autocratic, Hellmesberger was said to have 3 dislikes : his successor as leader of the Vienna Philharmonic, nearsighted people (!) , and Jews.

Mahler managed to irritate the Conservatory director not because he was a Jew, but because he, Mahler, did not suffer fools gladly. Even in his student days, Mahler was known for his self-confidence bordering on arrogance. He often let his instructors know what he thought of them and cut classes when he had better things to do. Though Mahler was an accomplished pianist, by his 2nd year at the Conservatory, he had decided that he would never be a professional on that instrument. Hearing the great pianists of his day in Vienna, such as Franz Liszt and Anton Rubinstein, convinced him of this. Thus, he focused his attention instead on composition, winning Conservatory prizes each year of his attendance. Though he failed twice to win the prestigious Beethoven Prize, his 2nd attempt witnessed a remarkable submission : « Das klagende Lied » .

But, in many ways, it was his life outside of the classroom that was most defining for Mahler. He was roommate for a time with future Master of the lied, Hugo Wolf. Other fellow students included Rudolf Krzyzanowski, Anton Krisper, and the enigmatic Hans Rott, who died young and left behind a small body of work that only began to achieve international recognition in the 1990's. Mahler felt that the unfortunate Rott was the most talented of them all. It was during these Vienna years that Mahler also became friends with the Rosenblum brothers, who later changed their name to Rosé. Arnold and Eduard, accomplished musicians, later became Mahler's brothers-in-law (much to the disgust of Mahler, it might be added, who did not want to lose the domestic comfort his sisters provided him as a bachelor) .

Graduating from the Conservatory, in 1878, Mahler stayed on in Vienna another 2 years, sporadically attending University courses. These years, however, are not as well documented as are his Conservatory years. In a way, these 18 or so months are mysteriously void of historical documentation : « Mahler's la vie bohème days » . It is known that he was under the thrall of Richard Wagner in these years and became a member of a strongly nationalistic student organization whose other members included influential left-wing politicians such as Victor Adler, founder of the Austrian Social-Democratic Party. Mahler and his cohorts reveled in a rather odd mixture of Wagnerian « Gesamtkunst » , Nietzschean philosophy, socialism, vegetarianism, and pan-Germanism. But maddeningly (for the researcher) little is known of his day-to-day activities.

Except for a brief sojourn in Prague, in 1871, Gustav Mahler's formal schooling took place in Iglau. Among aspiring urban Jewish families eager to acquire secular German culture, music education was indispensable. Gustav, who showed early aptitude, made his public debut as a pianist at age 10, in Iglau. By 1873, Mahler was playing serious virtuoso piano music, including Sigismond Thalberg's « Fantasia and Variations on Themes from Norma » . A career in music appeared plausible and promising. At age 15, Mahler enrolled in the Vienna Conservatory, primarily to study with the legendary piano teacher (and friend of Johannes Brahms) Julius Epstein.

The years Mahler studied in Vienna, the 2nd half of the 1870's, were politically and culturally decisive for more than his generation. The physical transformation of the city that began with the creation of the « Ringstraße » in the 1850's was well under way. But the financial crash of 1873 brought the liberal boom years of the 1860's to a sudden halt and ushered in an era of stagnation that would last until the mid-1890's. During those 2 long decades, the beginnings of an anti-liberal and anti-capitalist political populism, including outspoken anti-Semitism, began to develop. By the late- 1870's, the most visible and prominent minority in Vienna were the Jews, who exceeded their proper demographic proportion in terms of enrollment in the Vienna University and the Conservatory. Throughout the years Mahler lived in Vienna, the city remained a magnet for people from within the multi-ethnic Empire, even in times of financial distress. Vienna was city of newcomers. By 1900, only a small proportion of residents in Vienna had been born in the city.

By 1875, Johannes Brahms had established himself as a major cultural influence and a force to be reckoned with in the city's musical life. Vienna boasted a great new Opera House, a new concert-hall (the « Musikverein ») , piano manufacturers, publishers, innumerable choral Societies, a fine orchestra, several concert series, and the most prominent citizen-based association dedicated to music on the continent of Europe, the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , an organization that sponsored the Conservatory. Brahms had just stepped down as director of the « Gesellschaft's » concert series the year Mahler arrived as a student. Brahms did not teach, but he sat on the governing board of the « Gesellschaft » and his allies dominated the Conservatory faculty. He and his circle were seen as part of a liberal, tolerant, philo-Semitic elite in the city.

Yet, by 1875, Richard Wagner's popularity as prophet of a persuasive progressive vision of the link between art and life had reached new heights. That year, Wagner, who had lived in Vienna briefly in the early 1860's, returned to the city in triumph to give a series of concerts and conduct one performance of « Lohengrin » at the Vienna Opera. The students and the faculty at the Conservatory became profoundly engaged in the culture wars of the mid-1870's, most of which involved a reaction to Wagner's music and Wagnerian ideas. Among the key beliefs associated with Wagner was German cultural chauvinism. Mahler's classmates and friends were Wagnerian enthusiasts. They included the composers Hugo Wolf and Hans Rott (whose early Symphony influenced Mahler and who was a favourite of Anton Bruckner, with whom Mahler did not study at the Conservatory) and the conductor Rudolf Krzyzanowski (a friend with whom Mahler produced his 1st publication, a piano version of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony) .

Gustav Mahler distinguished himself quickly, winning prizes his 1st year in piano performance and composition. His earliest ambition, like others of his generation, was to follow in Richard Wagner's path and compose for the stage. The young Wagnerians in Vienna were partial to Bruckner and were reserved, if not overtly hostile (as Hugo Wolf was) toward Johannes Brahms. Despite Mahler's relative coolness to Brahms, the older composer did not take offense and later helped bring him back to Vienna, having been impressed with the younger man (in particular a performance of Mozart's « Don Giovanni ») during Mahler's tenure in the 1880's at the Opera House in Budapest.

In 1877, Gustav Mahler, having passed his secondary school examinations, took courses at the Vienna University, focusing on Art history, literature, and philosophy, and he made close friends among non-musicians. Early in his Conservatory career, his ambitions had turned away from a concert career as pianist to that of a composer. Although he did not win the coveted the Beethoven Prize at the Conservatory in 1878, the year he finished his studies, he did win a 1st prize in composition with his Quartet with piano. He worked on large-scale projects, including « Das klagende Lied » , a work for chorus, soloists, and orchestra he completed and later revised, and a never-realized fairy tale Opera « Růbezahel » (Rapunzel) . During this time, he also played concerts at his boyhood home in Iglau.

Bernhard Mahler was supportive of his son's ambitions for a music career, and agreed that the boy should try for a place at the Vienna Conservatory. The young Mahler was auditioned by the renowned pianist Julius Epstein, and accepted for 1875-1876. He made good progress in his piano studies with Epstein and won prizes at the end of each of his 1st 2 years. For his final year, 1877-1878, he concentrated on composition and harmony under Robert Fuchs and Franz Krenn. Few of Mahler's student compositions have survived ; most were abandoned when he became dissatisfied with them. He destroyed a Symphonic movement prepared for an end-of-term competition, after its scornful rejection by the autocratic director Josef Hellmesberger on the grounds of copying errors. Mahler may have gained his 1st conducting experience with the Conservatory's student orchestra, in rehearsals and performances, although it appears that his main role in this orchestra was as a percussionist.

Among Mahler's fellow students at the Conservatory was the future song composer Hugo Wolf, with whom he formed a close friendship. Wolf was unable to submit to the strict disciplines of the Conservatory and was expelled. Mahler, while sometimes rebellious, avoided the same fate only by writing a penitent letter to Hellmesberger. He attended occasional lectures by Anton Bruckner and, though never formally his pupil, was influenced by him. On 16 December 1877, he attended the disastrous premiere of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, at which the composer was shouted down, and most of the audience walked out. Mahler and other sympathetic students later prepared a piano version of the Symphony, which they presented to Bruckner. Along with many music students of his generation, Mahler fell under the spell of Richard Wagner, though his chief interest was the sound of the music rather than the staging. It is not known whether he saw any of Wagner's operas during his student years.

Gustav Mahler left the Conservatory in 1878 with a diploma but without the prestigious Silver Medal given for outstanding achievement. He then enrolled at the University of Vienna (he had, at Bernhard's insistence, sat and with difficulty passed the « matura », or entrance examination) and followed courses which reflected his developing interests in literature and philosophy. After leaving the University in 1879, Mahler made some money as a piano teacher, continued to compose, and, in 1880, finished a dramatic cantata, « Das klagende Lied » (The Song of Lamentation) . This, his 1st substantial composition, shows traces of Wagnerian and Brucknerian influences, yet includes many musical elements which musicologist Deryck Cooke describes as « pure Mahler » . Its 1st performance was delayed until 1901, when it was presented in a revised, shortened form.

Gustav Mahler developed interests in German philosophy, and was introduced by his friend Siegfried Lipiner to the works of Arthur Schopenhauer, Friedrich Nietzsche, Gustav Fechner and Hermann Lotze. These thinkers continued to influence Mahler and his music long after his student days were over. Mahler's biographer Jonathan Carr says that the composer's head was « not only full of the sound of Bohemian bands, trumpet calls and marches, Bruckner chorales and Schubert sonatas. It was also throbbing with the problems of philosophy and metaphysics he had thrashed out, above all, with Lipiner » .

As a result of Gustav Mahler's « not so good » grades in school, his father sent him to audition at the Vienna Conservatory.

In 1875, Gustav Mahler was accepted to the Vienna Conservatory. During his 3 years there, he initially focused on piano but later switched to composition, becoming an admirer of Richard Wagner and Anton Bruckner. 2 years later, he began attending lectures at the University of Vienna, where he further explored Wagner's ideas, as well as the philosophy of Nietzsche and the political ideals of socialism. At the same time, Mahler began conducting and teaching piano to support himself. Mahler graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1878. The work he composed for graduation was a Scherzo for piano quintet, which unfortunately, along with other early works, has been lost, including work on an Opera called « Rubezahl » for which we still have the libretto. The composer Hugo Wolf, who also had wanted to set an Opera on this subject, was irked at Mahler for using it himself.

Gustav Mahler later claimed to have « learned nothing » at the German « Gymnasium » (High-School) in Iglau. That remark was made tongue-in-cheek although it is a fact that he tended to dream over his books and picked-up more outside the classroom than inside it. Also nearby was the Municipal Theatre, accomplished (or at least ambitious) enough to put on Operas like Mozart's « Don Giovanni » and Bellini's « Norma » .

The 10 year old Mahler, as a local paper called him, gave his 1st reported piano recital there and won an ovation despite the ropy instrument on which he had to play. By that time, he was already something of a veteran.

In Ledeč, little Gustav discovers his grandfather's piano in an attic, and, in this piano, we come upon another legendary story sworn by all the participants to be true. Little Gustav, goes the story, climbs to the edge of an attic shelf ledge and senses the presence of a piano whose keyboard he cannot see but can touch and feel. In a small space of time, Gustav pecks-out a tune, to the amazement of all, and grandfather Abraham orders the piano carted back to Jihlava for Gustav. Thus begins the legendary career of a musician.

After grandfather's death, 2 years later, Gustav Mahler loved to come back to Ledeč to visit aunts and uncles and admire the big house on the square, where his grandmother still lived. After Ernst's death, he returned at 16 and 17 to travel there with his friend Rudolf Krzyzanowski and visit his cousins the Freischbergers.

He had 1st begun thumping on a dusty old piano he found as an adventurous little boy in his maternal grandparents' attic in Ledeč. The next day, the instrument was trundled round to Gustav's home by ox-cart and, from then on, he never looked back. More musical input came from the local Roman Catholic church of Saint-James (« Jakobskirche ») . Although Jewish, Mahler was allowed to sing in the choir there and had some private lessons in harmony from the Choir-Master, Heinrich Fischer.

Around the corner from the Theatre was a barracks from which Mahler must 1st have heard the sound of trumpet calls and marches. Perhaps, he even saw troops setting off for the slaughter at Koniggratz or the wounded returning with the Prussians at their heels. At any rate from very early on, martial music filled him with mingled fascination and fright. When he was about 3, he trotted out of the house, dressed only in his shirt, and clutching an accordion, and was drawn away Pied Piper-like by a passing military band. He got lost and by-standers agreed to take him home only when he played them the tune he had heard from the soldiers. Around the same time, his fine ear won Mahler a less admiring audience at the newly built synagogue (razed by the Nazis in 1939) . Vexed by what struck him as the ugly noise made by the congregation, he bawled for silence and, to his mother's horror, broke into his favourite street song : a ditty partly in polka rhythm about a wayfarer dancing wildly at an inn. Meanwhile, he was beginning to compose. His 1st known piece was a polka preceded by a funeral march.

Bernhard Mahler who had encouraged Gustav to pursue the piano, no doubt hoping his son would become a money-spinning virtuoso, and who later let him study at the Vienna Conservatory, though evidently not helping him much to pay the fees. When young Gustav was mistreated by a family with whom he had been sent to stay in Prague, a wrathful Bernhard descended, packed his son's things and took him straight home. He had unwittingly got Gustav into the jam in the 1st place, but he acted with typical dispatch once he heard what was going on.

From his father Mahler inherited, among other things, voracious ambition and unshakeable will. If he had not he would probably have got little further in life than conductor of the Iglau choral Society. Like his father too, he was not squeamish in his methods. At 6 or 7, he was already giving piano lessons for about 5 crowns an hour and boxing his pupils sharply on the ears whenever they played a wrong note. Later as a piano accompanist, he gave warning kicks to the victim employed to turn the pages of his score. The page-turner decided to kick back. « You Schweinehund », shouted Mahler when the piece was over.

Gustav Mahler had already passed out of the Vienna Conservatory. 4 years earlier, in 1875, he was still pining to go there and looking for allies who would help persuade a doubtful Bernhard. He struck gold with Gustav Schwarz, manager of an Estate in Morawan, north of Iglau, who heard Gustav play the piano and said he should study music. Knowing that an Estate manager was just the kind of person his father would listen to, Mahler wrote Schwarz a letter which, for a 15 year old, was a Masterpiece of diplomacy. Couched in the politest terms, Mahler said his « dear father » was hesitating to agree to « our plan » because he feared Gustav would neglect his academic work and get into bad company if he went to Vienna.

Bernhard took Mahler to Vienna to seek expert advice from Julius Epstein, professor of piano at the Conservatory. Epstein is said to have come out of lectures, heard Mahler play for 5 minutes at most and announced, « “ Herr ” Mahler, your son is a born musician ... I could not be wrong. » . It is an engaging tale told by Epstein himself, albeit nearly 4 decades later when he was nearly 80. The other version comes from Schwarz who says he took Mahler to see Epstein at Baden, near Vienna. According to Schwarz, the professor was not at all impressed by Mahler's pianistic skill but recognized his talent when the boy finally played some pieces of his own.

Gustav Mahler enrolled at the Conservatory on 10th September, 2 months after his 15th birthday.

One would think, the student Mahler must have haunted the Court Opera which he was to take over in triumph 2 decades later. But what evidence there is, including accounts that when he took-up conducting he had to learn many Operas from scratch, suggests that his attendance in those early years was infrequent. This is sometimes put down to his chronic lack of cash and it is true that he rarely had the price of a square meal. He was constantly on the move from one dingy lodging to another, absent-mindedly leaving behind items of clothing in each - much to the despair of his mother who warned that he would soon have nothing left to wear. Trying to help out, Bernhard sent a green coat so comically oversized that it trailed along the ground when Mahler put it on. Still, most of Mahler's Conservatory friends were just as poor but they somehow got to the Opera all the same. Hugo Wolf, for instance, spent much of his student life queuing for entry to the « Vierte Galerie » (the Gods) and writing ecstatic letters home, especially about his idol Richard Wagner.

« The Master of Bayreuth » had visited Vienna sporadically since 1832, running-up huge debts which helps explain why he did not come more often. His revolutionary music, abrasive personality and trenchant writings about art and life divided the city into warring factions. Symptomatically, Wagner had scored a hit in Vienna, in 1861, with « Lohengrin » but his later and (to his critics) abominably discordant « Tristan und Isolde » had been abandoned there as unplayable after more than 70 rehearsals. In 1875, when he was back again to conduct concerts and supervise the production of « Tannhäuser », the battle over him was, if anything, fiercer than ever. The contras, grouped around the venerable Johannes Brahms, included the critic Eduard Hanslick, lampooned by Wagner as the pedantic Beckmesser in « Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg » , and much of the old guard at the Conservatory. The pros included Anton Bruckner, somewhat oddly as he was a humbly devout composer and teacher ill-suited to any kind of earthly conflict, and several music students - especially Hugo Wolf. When Wagner was in town, Wolf hung around for hours so that he could open the carriage door for the great man as he left his hotel for the Opera. Wolf then raced along the « Ring » to be on the spot to open the door again when Wagner arrived.

Gustav Mahler did not waste his time on gestures like that although he too fell under Wagner's spell, sometimes with painful results. When he, Wolf and another music student, Rudolf Krzyzanowski, began to bawl part of « Gotterdammerung » at the digs they shared, a furious landlady pushed them out into the street and locked the door behind them. Still, that show of enthusiasm for Wagner's music does not prove that Mahler was keen to see Wagner's works, or anyone else's, in the Opera House, especially not in static, unimaginative productions at least as common then as now. Even when Mahler attended or conducted Symphony concerts, there was generally a yawning gulf between what he heard and what his inner ear told him was in the score. In the Opera House, the gap was wider still - between what he believed the music expressed and what he witnessed on stage. That helps explain his life-long exasperation with the Opera business in general and why, after a couple of early efforts, he wrote no more works in the genre. Wagner felt much the same as Mahler about conventional Opera Houses but he drew a different conclusion, creating the Bayreuth Festival Theatre to give, at least, his own works the staging and acoustic he felt they deserved.

There is a triple irony here. Mahler despised much about Opera but conducted it, not least Wagner, supremely well. Bayreuth was one theatre he really did admire but, because of the anti-Semitism of Wagner's widow Cosima, he never conducted there. Moreover, whatever skills Mahler may have learned in his 3 years at the Vienna Conservatory, conducting was not among them. There was still no course for it in those days although orchestras had grown much larger and scores more complicated. Conductors simply emerged thanks to their wide musical knowledge, leadership qualities and, when they could get it, practice. There was a Conservatory Orchestra in which Mahler played the percussion but there is no record that he took-up the baton. If he did, evidently the result was not thought worth a mention.

So what did Mahler learn ? Not as much as he should have done, according to Guido Adler, 5 years older than Mahler and a close but critical friend for more than 3 decades. Curiously, although Adler was highly-musical and came from a Jewish family in Iglau, he and Mahler did not meet until both were in Vienna. Adler had already passed through the Conservatory when Mahler entered it, but he stayed on in town studying music history at the University. Sometime in the 2nd half of the 1870's, the paths of the 2 fellow Iglauites crossed. Adler writes that although Mahler « had good teachers in piano playing and harmony, his introduction to the higher theoretical subjects (counterpoint and composition) was anything but profound and purposeful. His talent had to overcome this defective education and only years later ... could Mahler remedy these deficiencies. »

Harsh though that view sounds, Guido Adler was never a man to overstate his case. Certainly, Mahler thought little of most of the Conservatory staff and made that plain. His harmony teacher, Robert Fuchs, was a composer of pleasant orchestral serenades who later remarked with some perplexity that Mahler played truant and, yet, knew everything counterpoint Mahler learned (or, according to Adler, did not learn) from Franz Krenn, a dry disciplinarian whose deadly dull tuition helped persuade Wolf to abandon his Conservatory studies prematurely. Mahler announced he was dropping out too but, more purposeful than the explosive Wolf, he soon wrote a grovelling letter to the director, Josef Hellmesberger, begging for re-instatement. Hellmesberger agreed but Mahler can hardly have recalled him with affection. Although leader of a fine String Quartet which Mahler surely heard and admired, the director was a choleric anti-Semite. When Mahler made copy errors in the score of a Symphony he had written for performance by the Conservatory Orchestra, Hellmesberger hurled the manuscript to the ground and refused to conduct it even when the mistakes had been corrected. Mahler promptly composed a piano suite instead. « Since it was a much weaker and more superficial work » , he noted later, « it won a prize while my good things were all rejected by the worthy judges » .

Only 2 of Mahler's teachers really impressed him. One was that same Professor Julius Epstein, elegant pianist and publisher of Franz Schubert's piano works, who had recommended him for the Conservatory and who soon became his mentor and friend. When Mahler had to write to the Conservatory's governors asking to be let off all tuition fees, Epstein added a postscript offering to guarantee half the sums due. He also helped out by finding piano pupils, including his own son, for his impoverished student. Mahler was duly grateful. Long after he had left the Conservatory, he still wrote back to his Old Master telling him his career was going well and, wryly, that he was just as arrogant as ever.

Under Epstein's watchful eye, Mahler became a fine player, carrying off the top piano prize in his 1st year with a performance of part of a Schubert Sonata. Could he have made his career as a concert pianist ? 4 piano rolls, he recorded in 1905, of excerpts from his songs and Symphonies, the only aural evidence we have of Mahler the interpreter, raise doubts. Indispensable though the recordings are, above all as a guide to the tempo : he wanted, they are rather sloppily played. No doubt, Mahler, by then, was out of practice. In any case, it is a boon that he took the conducting road instead. Without that long experience wrestling with often recalcitrant players in many different halls, his orchestration would surely have been less expert.

The other teacher to impress Mahler was Anton Bruckner, albeit through example not instruction. So much folklore has grown-up about the ties between the 2 that it is not easy to get at the truth. For instance, Mahler and Bruckner were absurdly bracketed together for decades mainly because they both wrote 9 big Symphonies (even that is not quite true) widely thought not worth playing. Alma claims in her memoirs that Mahler gave a complete Bruckner cycle in the United States, but he only conducted 3 of the Symphonies anywhere (plus once, a single movement : the Scherzo of the « Romantic » 4th) . One biographer writes that Mahler religiously attended all Bruckner's lectures, another that his attendance was sporadic, yet, another that Bruckner thought so much of his young pupil that he always walked with him down several flights of stairs when saying goodbye.

Mahler said flatly, in a letter written in 1902, that, « I was never a pupil of Bruckner's ; this rumour must have arisen from the fact that I was continually seen about with him in my earlier days in Vienna, and that I was certainly one of his most enthusiastic admirers and publicists. Indeed, I believe at that time I was the only one there was, apart from my friend (Rudolf) Krzyzanowski. » Here Mahler's recollection is partly at fault. Bruckner had many keen followers, at least among the students. For them, he was both an eminent Master and, although he was already in his 50's, a naive but agreeable companion. On the one hand, he was instructor in harmony and counterpoint at both the Conservatory and Vienna University, as well as a genius in improvising at the organ. On the other, he liked little better than to stump off in his baggy old trousers for a chat over a few beers, or to stand at concerts with young people rather than sit with his prim and proper peers.

Bruckner showed Mahler that even a composer who venerated Richard Wagner could still find fulfilment writing Symphonies, which Wagner had soon abandoned. Perhaps, the near-Wagnerian scale on which Bruckner built his works influenced Mahler too. Apart from that, the 2 had little in common. Mahler's orchestral palette is far more varied than Bruckner's, or indeed almost anyone else's. With Bruckner, melody generally dominates, with Mahler development. Although Mahler, like Bruckner, uses folk-dance (especially « Ländler ») and chorale themes, he tends to set them in a context which casts doubt on the simple joy they express. For Mahler, peace of mind is never attainable for long ; for Bruckner, it usually seems secure - though not quite always. The massive discord which climaxes the Adagio of Bruckner's unfinished 9th Symphony, his last, matches almost anything in Mahler for desolation.

No wonder even Bruckner's faith wavered at times. On 16th December 1877, he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic in the 1st performance of his 3rd Symphony. It was a fiasco for him and a bitter but salutary lesson for Mahler. The Orchestra, which had rejected Bruckner's 1st Symphony as « wild » and his 2nd as « nonsense », hardly put its heart into the premiere of the 3rd. Whistling and jeering soon erupted, especially from the anti-Wagnerites. Gradually, the hall emptied. At the end, only a few dozen students were left, among them Mahler who had seen Josef Hellmesberger joining in the jeers. Soon afterwards, Mahler presented a grateful Bruckner with a piano-duet version which he had made of the ill-fated 3rd, possibly with Rudolf Krzyżanowski's help. According to Alma Mahler, he later used part of his own royalties to help promote Bruckner's work, though proof of this is lacking. At any rate, from that December night at the latest, he can have had no illusions about what the world, especially the « music capital » Vienna, could throw at a composer determined to go his own way.

That lesson alone surely did not decide Mahler's future course but it must have weighed heavily. He wanted to compose but vividly saw the danger of trying to subsist on that alone. A career at the piano seemed too restrictive. He was not a born teacher although, much later, he was offered, and refused, the directorship of the Conservatory. That left the supremely taxing compromise solution he finally adopted until his death : conducting to earn his keep and « part-time » composing, usually in his summer holidays. Later, Mahler claimed that had he won the coveted Beethoven Prize with his cantata « Das klagende Lied » (The Song of Lament) when he was just 21, he would never have got caught on the conducting treadmill. Perhaps, he really believed that. More likely, the « Bernhard » in him meant he was too practical and ambitious to risk working for reward only in heaven. Bruckner could do that, but then, he generally seemed certain that heaven really existed. In any case, a jury which included Johannes Brahms and Josef Hellmesberger awarded the Beethoven Prize to Mahler's harmony teacher, Robert Fuchs. « Das klagende Lied » did not even take 2nd or 3rd place.

It was not least that steel in Mahler which marked him out from his student friends. Hugo Wolf, with Franz Schubert perhaps the greatest of all song-writers, felt Mahler had stolen his idea for an enchanting Opera called « Rubezahl » and broke with him for many years. He finally died insane. So did Hans Rott, said by Mahler to be as gifted as himself, soon after being advised by the grumpy Brahms to give-up composing. So did Anton Krisper, who wrote music and wrote about it but was not really happy doing either. Of those Conservatory comrades who did make their way, Rudolf Krzyzanowski became conductor in Weimar (after an uneasy spell sharing duties with Mahler in Hamburg) , Guido Adler developed into Austria's most distinguished musicologist and Arnold Rosé became leader of the Vienna Philharmonic, subsequently marrying Mahler's eldest sister, Justine. But none of them showed Mahler's drive, even ruthlessness.

It would be easy to end this account of the 1st Vienna years there. Apart from a fragment of a Piano Quartet and a few songs, none of Mahler's music before « Das klagende Lied » has survived ; indeed, Mahler claims he never finished the works he began in those days because he so quickly became dissatisfied with them. After passing out of the Conservatory, in 1878, with a diploma (but without one of the coveted Silver Medals for exceptional achievement won by 9 of his fellow graduates) , he went on to study at the University. Evidently, he did not learn much there, later admitting he only attended the « Vienna woods » with any regularity. Finally, in 1880, an agent called Gustav Lewy signed him up and found him his 1st job. It was a summer one conducting bits and scraps, as well as setting-up music stands and stacking chairs, before dozy guests in an Austrian provincial spa called Bad Hall. Mahler had grave doubts whether to take Lewy's offer, desperate though he was for cash, but wise old Julius Epstein advised him to do so at once because « you'll very soon work your way up » . That forecast proved more accurate than even Epstein can have expected.

Before leaving Vienna, however, Mahler became involved with a strange character called Siegfried Lipiner who had a big, probably decisive, influence on him. This part of Mahler's story is often skirted, partly because it seems to have little directly to do with music, partly because even in German-speaking countries Lipiner's name is not widely known nowadays. But back in the late- 1870's, Lipiner, a Jew from Galicia in the far east of the Habsburg Empire and only 4 years older than Mahler, was already being spoken of as a prodigiously gifted poet and dramatist. Friedrich Nietzsche and Richard Wagner, no less, were among his early admirers. His eloquence was legendary. Although stunted like a gnome, he at once caught the attention of any gathering with his hypnotic eyes and intense rhetoric. Mahler was not easily impressed by his contemporaries and, when he was around, the spotlight rarely fell on others. Lipiner was an exception. In his letters, Mahler usually referred to him as « dearest Siegfried » and expressed boundless enthusiasm for his work. Apart from a break of several years after Mahler's marriage, the 2 remained in close contact for the rest of their lives and died within months of one another. Significantly, Alma, who resented most of her husband's old friends, particularly the closest ones, reserved special venom for Lipiner.

It is not clear when the 2 1st met but it was probably around 1878 at a meeting of one or other of those hodgepodge bands of German nationalists and socialists, Wagnerians and literary buffs, vegetarians and « bon vivants » typical of Vienna in that era. One such group, hundreds strong, was the « Leseverein der deutschen Studenten » (Reading Society of German Students) which aimed to « preserve the German character » of the Vienna University. Another, more select, was the « Pernerstorfer Circle » (named after its socialist founder Engelbert Pernerstorfer) , which exalted German culture and sought the unity of all German-speaking peoples. In such circles, talented Jews like Lipiner and Mahler, drawn both by the finest products of the German mind and, by a simple desire to belong, seemed more German than the Germans. At one gathering when those present sang « Deutschland, Deutschland über alles » reportedly to a particularly fiery march tune, it was Mahler who pounded out the piano accompaniment. One of those singing along on that occasion was another Jewish friend of Mahler's called Victor Adler (no relation to Guido) . Adler later even made common cause with Georg von Schönerer, one of Adolf Hitler's early heroes, before breaking with extreme nationalism and founding the Austrian Social Democratic Party.

For Mahler, the political element in all this ran only skin-deep. Decades later when he was, in principle, an « establishment figure » as director of the Vienna Opera, he did vote for Victor Adler and even briefly joined in a workers' May Day demonstration ; but that is all that is known (and probably all there is to know) about his post-student involvement with politics. Nor did he stick very long to the modish vegetarianism prescribed (though not adopted) by Richard Wagner in his « Religion und Kunst » (Religion and Art) to achieve « a thorough-going regeneration of the human race » . Although Mahler often joined Adler, Lipiner and others at a gloomy cellar-restaurant in Vienna to dine on spinach and the like, we find him, some years later, in Budapest tucking into knucklebone and horseradish sauce.

If that had been the sum of Mahler's non-musical activity in those days it would be worth no more than a wry smile. But it was very probably at that stage in Vienna, not more than a decade later in Hamburg as is often assumed, that Mahler 1st came to grips with German philosophy. His later letters and the accounts of those close to him show how intensely he studied not just works by famous thinkers like Arthur Schopenhauer and Friedrich Nietzsche, but also those by relatively obscure ones like Gustav Theodor Fechner (1801-1887) and Rudolf Hermann Lotze (1817-1881) , who both sought a synthesis between science and metaphysics. In all likelihood, it was Lipiner who back in the late-1870's either 1st fired Mahler's interest in these writers or, at least, acted as a major catalyst. After all, by the time he met Mahler, Lipiner had already written a major work on Schopenhauer, he had studied under Fechner in Leipzig and he personally knew Nietzsche who called him « a veritable genius » . That background and Lipiner's fervour must have made a deep impression on the young musician, with his hitherto largely undirected fascination for literature and ideas.

To point to Mahler's interest in philosophy is one thing, to show it had an influence on his approach to music quite another. He did not need Schopenhauer to tell him that music was the highest of the arts, though no doubt he was happy to have his own view confirmed from so renowned a source. Superficially, Nietzsche's impact is easier to show, though Mahler eventually rejected Nietzsche who had the effrontery to turn bitterly against Wagner. Mahler used a Nietzsche text from « Also Sprach Zarathustra » (Thus Spake Zarathustra) in his 3rd Symphony and, even briefly, dubbed the whole work, after Nietzsche, « Die frohliche Wissenschaft » (The Joyful Science) . The Symphony's brutal contrasts, from a percussive free-for-all at the start to a concluding rapt Adagio, he explained in part as frenzied nature under the god Pan finally being refined into the world of the spirit. Here too, Nietzsche is close : the Nietzsche of « Die Geburt der Tragodie » (The Birth of Tragedy) who sought to show that great art emerges only through a fusion of the ecstatic, « Dionysiac » world and the calm « Apollonian » one.

True though that is, it does not get to the heart of the matter. What really absorbed Mahler was not this or that theory about art, let alone finding a handy text for his song-Symphonies. Something much more vital was involved. As he later wrote in a bid to explain what was at stake in his « Resurrection » Symphony : « What did you live for ?

Why did you suffer ? Is it only a vast terrifying joke ? We have to answer those questions somehow if we are to go on living - indeed, even if we are only to go on dying ! » .

Nietzsche gave an answer of a kind with his doctrine of « eternal recurrence » ; namely that everything in history comes round again in vast cycles and hence that we should only live in a way we are willing to see repeated for ever. Fechner, for whom stones and plants as well as animals had souls, took another view of immortality. For him, mankind passed through 3 stages : the lowest an unbroken sleep until birth ; the next, earthly life, an uneasy alternation of sleeping and waking ; and the highest an eternal awakening through death, which was really a 2nd birth. Schopenhauer, a keen student of oriental religion, saw salvation from the world he detested in an ascetic self-denial much like the Buddhist ideal of Nirvana. A similar notion mightily impressed Richard Wagner too. In a letter to Franz Liszt, in 1855, Wagner extolled the Buddhist view that living creatures went on being reborn, and their souls refined, until they caused no more pain to others. « How sublime and uniquely satisfying is this teaching » , wrote Wagner, « in contrast to the Christian-Judaic dogma according to which each human being ... merely has to behave himself in the eyes of the church through the short space of his life on earth, in order to lead an extremely easy life for the rest of eternity » . Time after time, Wagner toyed with the idea of an Opera on the Buddha, but he never got round to it.

That Mahler imbibed much of this is clear, not least from comments he made to Richard Specht, his biographer. « We will all return. » , Mahler said. « Our life only has sense if it is shot through with this certainty and it is wholly unimportant whether in a later reincarnation we recall an earlier one. What counts is not the individual and his memory ... but only that great movement towards perfection, that purification which progresses with each reincarnation. That is why I have to live ethically, to spare my Self a part of the road when it returns. » .

Did Mahler believe those remarks and similar ones he made at other times ? He desperately wanted to. But he never stopped looking for further evidence, whether in the latest discoveries in the natural sciences (he kept in close contact for years with the distinguished physicist Arnold Berliner) , in the dialogue between Ivan and Alyosha on the existence of God in The Brothers Karamazov or in Gœthe's speculation about redemption and rebirth. Most of all, he sought for proof through his own work. « Gœthe said immortal things on this subject. » , Mahler noted once during a talk about man's role in the cosmos. « What I want to say I am naturally only able to express fully in music ... That is what has been given to me and for that I will be called to account. »

That does not mean Mahler's works are simply potted Schopenhauer, Nietzsche and Co. set to music ; that we can identify this or that philosophical proposition as we can, say, the baby's howl or the mother's tantrum in Richard Strauß's tone-poem « Sinfonia Domestica » . But all Mahler's Symphonies, including « Das Lied von der Erde » , are attacks from different angles on the biggest issues man faces, the meaning of life and the paradox of death. Sometimes, the assault is explicit, as in the « Resurrection » Symphony or in the 8th with its setting of the last scene of Gœthe's « Faust » . Sometimes, it is implicit, as in the non-vocal 5th Symphony which begins with a funeral march and struggles through to a joyful chorale even Bruckner would have been proud of. It is even implicit in Mahler's decision, after early flirtation with Opera and chamber music, to express himself almost entirely in Symphonic form. Only the Symphony offered him the scale and structure to seek in music what his favourite thinkers expressed in words. That, he then enlarged the scale and almost burst the structure is testimony, not to love of gigantism for its own sake, but to the intensity of the search.

When Mahler, aged not quite 20, left Vienna for that dismal little job in Bad Hall, his head was not only full of the sound of folk-song and Bohemian bands, trumpet calls and marches, Anton Bruckner chorales and Franz Schubert sonatas. It was also throbbing with the problems of philosophy and metaphysics he had thrashed out, above all, with Siegfried Lipiner. That too helped form Mahler the composer.

The « Century » refers roughly to the period from 1803 to 1908 (Beethoven's « Eroica » to Arnold Schœnberg's 1st atonal pieces) , and the entire period covered in detail, from the French Revolution to World War I, corresponds surprisingly closely to the « long 19th Century » defined by historian Eric Hobsbawm. Most of the events take place during the reigns of Napoleon and the Habsburg Emperors. This work is not strictly limited to descriptions of musical life in Vienna - because of the important role it played in the arts during the Romantic period (including many of the events that occurred in Paris) . In particular, Liszt had little association with Vienna but was too important to leave-out.

* The likelihood that Mahler intended mean-tone tuning to be used for his Symphonies, at least partly, based on the possibility of his familiarity with the teachings of Josef Petzval on 31-edo during Mahler's stay at the University of Vienna, and on his later remarks to Schœnberg lamenting that « European music, in giving-up Mean-tone tuning, had suffered a great loss » .

* Mahler's possible re-use of material from his abandoned Opera project, « Růbezahl » , in his Symphonic Poem (1st Symphony) , and the likelihood that his original conception of the piece was as a 4 movement work without the « Blumine » movement, and that adding « Blumine » was an afterthought over which he changed his mind back and forth, several times.

* The influence the success of Richard Strauß's early Symphony in F minor had on Mahler, just before the latter completed his Symphonic Poem (1st Symphony) .

* The possibility that what later became the base layer of Mahler's 1893 « Hamburg » manuscript of « Titan » (1st Symphony) , was originally written-out in 1891 as a « Stichvorlage » (engraver's model) of what he was still calling a Symphonic Poem, now, with the title, « From the Life of a Lonely One » , in hopes of getting it published by Schott, and that, in this form, it was again a 4 movement work that did not include the « Blumine » movement.

* The influence Johannes Brahms had on Mahler, at several various times, as their personal friendship deepened. This relates to some of Mahler's important early compositional decisions (concerning Mahler's 1st and 2nd Symphonies) as well as his habit of secluding himself in the country during the summer to compose.

* The influence Shohei Tanaka's pseudo-just-intonation (really 53-edo) « Enharmonium » may have had on Anton Bruckner's harmonic experiments in his 9th Symphony.

* The possibility that Eduard Hanslick's death, in August 1904, may have been the catalyst for Mahler to end his 6th Symphony as a « tragedy » - the only one of his Symphonies which does so.

* The « program » of Mahler's 7th, influenced by Mahler's fascination with the program of Richard Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » .

* The influence Schönberg had on Mahler before the latter composed the 3rd, 5th, and 1st movements (in that order) of his 7th Symphony during the summer of 1905, and the influence this Mahler piece, in turn, had on Schönberg when he wrote his « Kammer-symphonie » , the following spring and summer.

* The influence Anton Webern had on Schönberg, in the fall of 1905, when the latter was composing his 1st Quartet and Webern brought his single-movement String Quartet to Schönberg for his composition lessons.

* The possibility that Mahler's comment about « being too old to have the ears for Schönberg's music » and the argument that the 2 of them had about « klangfarbenmelodie » , were connected to Mahler's possible loss of high-frequency hearing from his listening to large Orchestras, every day.

* The possibility that the opening of « Das Lied von der Erde » was Mahler's rendering in music of the horrible wheezing he heard, as his 5 year old daughter Maria lay dying after her tracheotomy (as documented in Alma's book) .

* The possible influence Scott Joplin may have had on Mahler while they both lived in New York, from 1907 to 1911 (reflected in a motive and harmonic progression very typical of a Joplin rag-time near the end of Mahler's 10th Symphony and, possibly also, in the irregular meters of the 2nd movement of the same Symphony) .

* The possibility that the sonic inspiration for the dissonant 9 note chord at the climax of the 1st and last movements of Mahler's 10th Symphony may have been the sound of the Orchestra tuning-up before a performance, because of the long-held « A » and the seemingly random dissonance of the chords, and because of the way the chord 1st builds-up in sections, then, after another held « A » , the whole Orchestra plays the dissonance.

* The possibility that Schönberg knew of Mahler's association since childhood of the popular Viennese tune « Ach, du lieber Augustin » with tragedy, because of Schönberg's use of this tune in his 2nd Quartet.

* The experimentation with micro-tones by Schönberg and Webern, in 1909, leading to the development of « Sprechstimme » (speech-voice) , the following year.

* The influence of Willi von Möllendorf on Alois Hába and Ivan Wycschnegradsky to adopt the use of quarter-tones.

Quatuor avec piano

The Piano Quartet in A minor (also referred to as the Piano Quartet Movement in A minor) is an early work of Gustav Mahler, the intended 1st movement of a Piano Quartet that was apparently never completed. It is the only surviving piece of chamber music without voice composed by Mahler.

Gustav Mahler began work on the Piano Quartet towards the end of his 1st year at the Vienna Conservatory, when he was around 15 or 16 years of age. The piece had its 1st performance on July 10, 1876, at the Conservatory with Mahler at the piano, but it is unclear from surviving documentation whether the quartet was complete at this time. In several letters, Mahler mentions a quartet or quintet, but there is no clear reference to this piano quartet. Following this performance, the work was performed at the home of Doctor Theodor Billroth, who was a close friend of Johannes Brahms. The final known performance of the Quartet in the 19th Century was at Iglau on September 12, 1876, with Mahler again at the piano ; it was performed along with a violin sonata by Mahler that has not survived.

It appears that, at one point, Mahler wished to publish the Quartet, as the surviving manuscript, which includes 24 bars of a Scherzo for piano quartet written in G minor, bears the stamp of the publisher Theodor Rättig ; it has been theorized that Mahler sent the work to him, but he rejected it.

Following the rediscovery of the manuscript by Mahler's widow, Alma Mahler, in the 1960's, the work was premiered in the United States on January 12, 1964, in New York City by Peter Serkin and the Galimir Quartet. 4 years later, it was performed in the United Kingdom on June 1, 1968, at the Purcell Room, London, by the Nemet Ensemble.

The new Critical Edition of the complete works of Gustav Mahler, published by Universal-Edition features what for most musicians will be an unfamiliar, early chamber work : his Piano Quartet in A minor, written in 1876 while he was a student at the Vienna Music Academy.

It is Mahler's only extant chamber work.

The work was performed during the year it was composed with great success, presumably by fellow students at the home of Doctor Theodore Billroth, famous as Johannes Brahms' friend and champion. But it did not appear in print until 1973, 62 years after Mahler's death, when it was published by Hans Sikorsky and edited by Peter Ruzicka. The recent Universal-Edition includes the results of the latest Mahler scholarship, in German : a biographical introduction, a critical report on the sources, and a long commentary detailing the ambiguities, errors, and mistakes in the manuscript that were corrected by Universal's editors. Reproductions of several manuscript pages show corrections (some illegible) , ink blots, and other markings (Mahler ran into trouble at the Academy about his sloppy manuscripts) .

The piano quartet (which surfaced in popular culture last year when it was used prominently in the soundtrack to Martin Scorsese's film adaptation of « Shutter Island ») consists of a complete 1st movement and the beginning of a Scherzo in the surprisingly distant key of G minor. In 1988, the Kuhmo Chamber Music Festival commissioned Alfred Schnittke to develop this fragment into a whole movement. Not surprisingly, the finished Scherzo sounds more like Schnittke than Mahler.

The Piano Quartet has remained a rarely heard oddity among Mahler's œuvre.

Gustav Mahler probably wrote the Piano Quartet (for piano, violin, viola, and cello) early in his 2nd year at the Academy, between 1876 and 1877. It betrays its origin as a student work mostly in some harmonic timidity, staying fairly close to the home key and often returning to it. Also, Mahler's modulations lack their later boldness and frequently proceed by way of that all-purpose route, the diminished chord.

Formally, rhythmically, and contrapuntally, however, the Piano Quartet is remarkably sophisticated. In traditional Sonata form, with a repeated exposition, development, and reprise, its basic material consists of 3 themes, which are skillfully developed individually and in combination in the long middle-section. The 1st 2 are in A minor, but the 2nd begins to explore other tonalities with chromatic progressions in the bass and the melody.

The 1st theme, stated in the bass, is somber and austere : a broad melody in long notes, opening with the leap of a 7th. The 2nd theme features an ascending scale in 8ths and quarters, the 3rd a descending scale. Halfway through the development, Mahler introduces another theme in a contrasting dotted-8th and 16th rhythm that picks-up the leap of the opening. It is the accompanying figures that create and increase tension and intensity : the initial cushion of repeated quarter triplets turns into 8ths, then triplets, and finally cascading arpeggios in 16ths. Along the way, the triplets are combined with the 8ths and 16ths, generating a sense of drive and urgency.

As had become customary at the time, Mahler wrote his instructions in German, beginning in the 1st theme with « not too fast » and « with passion » , the latter written under the theme in the bass line, then heightened to « very passionately » . The 2nd theme is marked « decisively » , without a tempo change. The most « Mahlerian » marking heads a brief, chromatically convoluted violin cadenza that ushers in the Coda : « uncommonly rubato and passionate » , a phrase Mahler used in a letter to Julius Epstein, in July 1877, explaining that he had got back to Iglau a few days too late for his matriculation and that it would have to be postponed.

Perhaps, the most striking feature of this work by the then 16 year old composer is that the Quartet does not seem derivative or unduly influenced by any specific style, past or present, even though its almost unremitting passionate intensity puts it squarely in the German Romantic tradition. Neither, however, does it seem to foreshadow the characteristics of Mahler's own mature style. The work is well structured and proportioned, and there is no trace of the formal, sonic, or emotional excesses of his later works.

Though his later orchestral scores are heavily marked, in this case Mahler left a great deal to the judgment and discretion of the performers. Evidently expecting them to find the appropriate level of sound and intensity through the texture, the curve of the melodies, and the emotional content of the music, he did not include even the most basic dynamics. Sikorski's editors tried to remedy this by adding their own copious dynamics in brackets, some subtle, some extreme, ranging all the way from triple forte to triple piano. All these have been removed from the new Universal-Edition. The only colour change that Mahler demands occurs shortly before the recapitulation, where he briefly instructs the strings to use mutes.

It is fairly clear that Mahler was more comfortable writing for piano than for strings, and that, like many pianist-composers, he tended to misjudge instrumental balances, leaving it up to the players to make the necessary adjustments. The piano part is full of heavy chords and octaves, and often doubles one or more of the string lines. On the other hand, Mahler does not treat it soloistically, but passes the melodic lines around in close imitation or multiple counterpoint, saving string unisons for the most sonorous climactic passages - the entire Coda is based on a tonic pedal point ; the ending fades away on a pizzicato.

Gustav Mahler entra au Conservatoire de Vienne en 1875. À cette époque, il avait déjà composé plusieurs lieder et pièces de musique de chambre. Citons Henry-Louis de La Grange dans son ouvrage monumental :

« Sans doute, durant sa seconde année au Conservatoire, Mahler partage-t-il pendant 2 mois une chambre avec Hugo Wolf et Rudolf Krzyzanowski. Tous 3 vivent alors en bonne intelligence et se jouent mutuellement leurs œuvres récentes. Wolf semble même avoir alors considéré ses lieder inférieurs à ceux de ses 2 amis. En une nuit, Mahler compose là au piano, un mouvement de Quatuor pour un concours du Conservatoire, tandis que les 2 autres sont contraints d'aller dormir dehors sur les bancs du " Ring ". Mahler compose néanmoins sans cesse, pour le Conservatoire et aussi pour lui-même. Seuls de courts fragments ont subsisté de cette époque : un mouvement de Quatuor avec piano de 1876, un début de Scherzo pour la même combinaison et 2 fragments de Lieder. La page de titre de ce mouvement de Quatuor porte : Clavier Quartett ; Erster Satz : Gustav Mahler ; 1876. Au-dessous du titre figure l'estampille de l'éditeur de musique Theodor Rättig, ce qui semble indiquer que Mahler lui avait soumis l'ouvrage en 1878, année où Rättig publie l'arrangement à 4 mains de la 3e Symphonie de Anton Bruckner. Comme pour beaucoup d'autres manuscrits de jeunesse, Mahler a laissé courir sa plume dans les marges et sur la page de titre ; de même que celles des esquisses de " Das Klagende Lied ", elles sont couvertes de griffonnages et d'arabesques complexes. »

Le 1er mouvement et le Scherzo inachevé ont été publiés en 1973 par Peter Ruzicka, aux éditions Sikorski de Hambourg.

Le fait que le 1er mouvement et les esquisses du Scherzo aient figuré dans le même classeur semble indiquer qu'il s'agissait de 2 parties du même ouvrage. Pourtant, il paraît inhabituel, pour un élève de Conservatoire, de composer un Scherzo en sol mineur pour une œuvre en la mineur. Dans le 1er mouvement, la graphie est nette. Seules les 3 dernières pages trahissent la hâte du compositeur. Pour les dernières mesures, la main gauche du pianiste exécute un long trémolo sur la tonique, au-dessus duquel le jeune homme a griffonné à la hâte le mot « Orgelpunkt » (point d'orgue) .

Les modèles évidents du musicien, pour cet exercice d'école sont Robert Schumann et Johannes Brahms, ce qui n'a rien de bien surprenant puisque Julius Epstein, son Maître au Conservatoire, a été l'un des Iers interprètes de la musique de piano et de chambre de Brahms et que Franz Krenn et Robert Fuchs, professeurs de composition et d'écriture, sont bien connus pour leur fidélité à la tradition.

Toutes les pièces de jeunesse de Gustav Mahler, lieder ou musique de chambre, ont été perdues ou détruites. Il ne reste que quelques fragments d'œuvres, soigneusement conservés par les archivistes des bibliothèques Mahler à Paris et à Vienne.

Louis de La Grange remonte aux sources : « À la mort d'Alma (l'épouse de Mahler) , 2 esquisses manuscrites et n'appartenant à aucune œuvre connue de Mahler étaient comprises dans sa collection. Elles se trouvent aujourd'hui, l'une à la Pierpont Morgan Library de New York et l'autre à la " Stadtbibliothek " de Vienne. Elles ont toutes 2 été examinées dans les années 1920 par Alban Berg qui a rédigé à leur sujet une page manuscrite confirmant qu'elles n'appartenaient à aucune œuvre connue. Selon lui, les chiffres au crayon bleu semblaient avoir été écrits à la fin de la vie de Mahler, qui paraissait donc avoir eu l'intention de se resservir de ces esquisses à une date ultérieure. D'après Susan Filler, qui a étudié de près l'écriture, ainsi que le papier utilisé, les 2 esquisses dateraient en fait des environs de 1900, et il s'agit de Particelle, chacune comprenant de nombreuses variantes de certains passages. La Ire esquisse, pour un Presto en sol majeur (Mahler exprime dans une note l'intention de transposer le tout en fa) comprend 3 feuillets. »

Bruckner et Mahler

Gustav Mahler au sujet d'Anton Bruckner :

« Je ne fus jamais un élève de Bruckner. Cette rumeur fort répandue est attribuable au fait que l'on me voyait régulièrement à ses côtés lorsque j'étudiais à Vienne : j'étais alors l'un de ses plus grands admirateurs. Je crois bien que mon ami Rudolf Krzyzanowski y était également. Cela se situait entre 1875 et 1881.

Mon engagement envers lui a subsisté jusqu'à l'achèvement de sa 7e Symphonie. Je me souviendrai toujours avec plaisir d'un beau matin, lors d'un cours à l'Université de Vienne, il m'a appelé en classe et, au grand étonnement de mes collègues, il m'a joué le merveilleux thème de l'Adagio sur un très vieux piano. Malgré la grande différence d'âge qui nous sépare, Bruckner était toujours à notre disposition : heureux, jeune de cœur et enfantin. La confiance qu'il manifestait à mon endroit a transformé notre relation en véritable amitié. En tenant compte des épreuves et des tribulations qu'il a vécues, il était tout naturel qu'il ait de l'influence sur mon développement personnel, en tant qu'homme et en tant qu'artiste. En fait, je pense avoir plus le droit de me faire appeler son disciple que beaucoup d'autres. Je lui ferai toujours honneur dans le respect et la gratitude. »

When Gustav Mahler moved to Hamburg, in 1891, to conduct at the Opera House there, he was able to fulfil his « aim » to assist Bruckner's « glorious art to the triumph it deserves » through performances of the « Te Deum »

(twice) ; the D minor Mass ; and the 3rd Symphony. Mahler, it appears, while in Hamburg, was still in affectionate touch with Bruckner, to whom he addressed a letter on the day after the « Te Deum » 's performance. The 1st sentence of the letter (which begins with « Honoured Master and Friend ! ») seems to confirm the fact that Mahler had something of a sensitive conscience about his Bruckner performances, that the elder composer had been restive :

« At last, I am so fortunate as to be able to write you that I have performed a work of yours. Yesterday (Good Friday) , I conducted your splendid and powerful “ Te Deum ”. Not only the whole public, but also the performers were most deeply moved by the mighty architecture and the truly noble ideas. »

Mahler continues, after describing the public's profound response :

« Bruckner has now made his triumphal entrance into Hamburg. »

A Bruckner disciple, Carl Wilhelm Zinne, living in Hamburg, wrote to his Master about the performance in the Municipal Theatre « under “ Kapellmeister ” Mahler's inspired leadership » :

« As I found-out from personal association with Mahler, he is a true admirer of your works. While Mozart's “ Requiem ” (doubtless because it was presented with nervous haste) did not make any very great impression, your work was positively enkindling, particularly because of its final chorus, moving with irresistible force. »

From Hamburg, Mahler moved to Vienna, in 1897 ; the year before, Bruckner had died there, thus this link was finally snapped. Nonetheless, Mahler's appointment, during his 1st years in Vienna, as conductor of the Opera Orchestra's Philharmonic concerts meant that he had an Orchestra (the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, as it is today) at his disposal, and he was not backward in attempting to gain a hearing for Bruckner's Symphonies - no easy task, since Bruckner was not a popular composer and Mahler himself, as a conductor, was not particularly popular with the Orchestra. With the Vienna Orchestra, Mahler performed the 6th Symphony, on 26 February 1899 ; though it was the work's 1st complete performance (the middle-movements had been played, in 1883, under conductor Wilhelm Jahn) , Mahler did not spare the Symphony substantial cuts, surgery which Brucknerians still feel disinclined to forgive. In more favourable circumstances, perhaps, Mahler might have respected Bruckner's « Urtext » ; but his attitude towards the inviolability of original versions was, in any case, strangely inconsistent : for example, he insisted on Wagner without cuts in Vienna but was willing to restore the excisions in America. His fidgety approach to other composer's instrumentation (and his own) is, of course, notorious ; indeed, it is hard not to believe that his Bruckner performances did not include some of his famous touchings-up. The cuts in the Symphony No. 6 (and they seem to have been extensive) must be deplored ; on the other hand, judgment of any of Mahler's exploits as a conductor is always complicated by the fact that he was also a composer, and inclined to re-create, to re-compose, as it were, according to his own image, a process sometimes beneficial, sometimes dubious in effect. At the very least, it appears that Mahler's performances of Bruckner were coloured by the revisionary and « improving » ideas of the Master's editors and pupils current at this time. Mahler, in some respects, was unexpectedly entangled with the artistic assumptions of his period.

In 1900 and 1901, Mahler was responsible for further Bruckner performances ; he conducted the Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5, in Vienna, and the Scherzo from the 4th in the « Trocadero » , in Paris, on 21 June 1900, when the Orchestra visited the French capital as part of the World Exhibition (« Exposition universelle ») ; this brave gesture must have been one of the 1st occasions, if not the 1st, when Bruckner's music travelled outside Austria or Germany. Thereafter, Mahler's connection with the Vienna Orchestra ceased (as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, that is) , and though he continued to lead a busy life as a conductor in the concert-hall, the loss of an Orchestra of which he was artistic director inevitably brought with it a certain loss of freedom. The possibility of pioneering was restricted by the taste in programmes of the agency extending the invitations, and resistances to Bruckner's music, during the early years of the 20th Century, were still influential in many quarters.

There was, of course, similarly active opposition to Mahler's music but, in relation to his own works, Mahler, as a conductor, stood in a naturally favourable position. It was not until some years later, when Mahler was working in America and (significantly enough) , once again, in possession of his own Orchestra, that he was able to resume his championing of Bruckner's « glorious art » .

In 1908, in New York, he « gave performances of all Bruckner's Symphonies, one after the other, although they had a very bad press » .

Mahler's work on Bruckner's behalf did not cease there. In 1910, Universal-Edition, the Viennese publishers, had taken into their catalogue Mahler's 1st 4 Symphonies. Mahler, though about to receive the not insubstantial royalties due to him for these works, agreed to forgo his profits in order to help Universal-Edition publish and publicize the Symphonies of Bruckner.

Alma Mahler comments :

« He thought it only right that he should sacrifice his profits for another 15 years, out of love of Bruckner, without of course receiving, or expecting, a penny from the sale of Bruckner's works. This was a great sacrifice to make to Bruckner's memory and shows how deeply he revered him. »

Mahler's financial generosity was a marked aspect of his character ; it is illustrated, at its best, in his relation with Arnold Schœnberg, in an incident that belongs to this same year.

She writes :

« Mahler's love of Bruckner was life-long and, despite Mahler's revaluation of 1904, which I have already quoted, I see no serious grounds on which Mahler's attachment to Bruckner may be challenged. What he wrote on the title-page of his copy of the " Te Deum " - he deleted the customary vocal and instrumental specification and substituted :
" For the tongues of angels, heaven-blest, chastened hearts, and souls purified in the fire ! " , must be given as much weight as his more critical utterance. »

There is doubtless a paradox here, as in many of Mahler's judgments. But, then, there is something altogether paradoxical about Mahler's friendship with Anton Bruckner, a friendship whose common centre of interest was, as Ernst Křenek suggests, a common enthusiasm for Wagner, while « the mutual attraction between Jewish intellectuality and endemic “ naïveté ” is also a peculiarly Austrian phenomenon » . One may well wonder, along with Křenek, « with what feelings the elder musician looked upon the nervous, talkative Jewish boy from Bohemia » ; but the brief history of their personal association contains, in fact, the basic constituents of their musical relation : some common ground, and certainly a major degree of genius in either case - and, for the rest, profound « contrasts » that are, nonetheless, strangely complementary. It was the complementary nature of the relation that enabled 2 composers, in many respects so opposed to work with equal success within the same medium, to sustain, despite intense differences in character and procedure, a great Symphonic tradition for a further 44 years, from the date of Bruckner's Symphony No. 1 to the date of Mahler's Symphony No. 10, an extension that maintained the status of the Viennese Symphony until the 1st decade of the 20th Century.

An anecdote of Paul Stefan's rounds-off the account :

« When the Viennese made an appeal for contributions for a Bruckner Memorial (Viktor Tilgner's monument) , and the Director of the Opera was asked to sign the petition, he refused and said to the Orchestra :

“ Let us play his music instead. Amongst people who would hear nothing of Bruckner whilst he was alive, and stood in his way, is no place for me. ” »

Gustav Mahler's recorded views of Johannes Brahms show in some detail that he was far less committed to an extreme antagonism than was his friend Hugo Wolf ; he maintained, in fact, a mid-stream position that would doubtless have excited Wolf's wrath. Wolf, of course, had not only artistic but personal motives for his vitriolic opposition to Brahms. But Wolf was an exceptional figure, and Mahler, with his often ambivalent attitude towards Brahms and Bruckner, is more truly representative of a climate of opinion more blurred at the edges than the history books would have us believe : that is, it is doubtful if the Wagner case, with its dependent feud between the disciples of Brahms and Bruckner, was as sharply defined in partisanship as appears at this distance in time. Julius Epstein, for example, Mahler's piano teacher, was an intimate member of the Brahms circle, and yet, he was generous in his encouragement of his rebellious (and Wagnerian) young pupil. Josef Hellmesberger « senior » , the director of the Vienna « Conservatoire » , to take another instance, was no less closely involved in the circle, and yet, though he exclaimed : « This is Beethoven's heir. » , upon playing in Brahms's Piano Quartets (Opus 25 and Opus 26) , he was not prevented from commissioning Bruckner's String Quintet (WAB 112) nor aiding in the grant of Bruckner's matriculation.

The purpose of this brief digression is no more than to suggest that the background to Mahler's wavering judgments was itself far from being etched in black and white, that while his loyalty to Wagner was unshakable, he retained a good deal of flexibility in his response to the « Hie Brahms, hie Bruckner ! » affair : such conditioning as existed in his case, was artistic rather than dogmatic, and dogma was the portion of the principals in the dispute - their disciples, perhaps uneasily and not always overtly, though perhaps more sensibly, kept more open minds.

The flexibility that Mahler displayed in a conversation about Brahms and Bruckner with his brother Otto, noted down by Natalie Bauer-Lechner in 1893, would most certainly have appalled Wolf had he heard of it, especially so in view of the conclusion Mahler reaches in his 2nd sentence. We have already sufficient evidence of the momentary significance of Mahler's judgments (it does not diminish their interest) and there is no reason to take this longish utterance as a final evaluation ; indeed, by 1904, having worked through Brahms, Mahler had « fallen-back on Bruckner again » ; he decided then that they were « An odd-pair of second-raters. The one was “ in the casting ladle ” (“ Peer Gynt ”) too long ; the other has not been there at all. » Mahler's conversation of 1893 (Bruckner was still alive, and Mahler closes his remarks with an assertion that he would do what was in his power to gain the senior composer a hearing, who, in his lifetime, had not enjoyed his proper reward) neatly carries us on to a consideration of the 2 composers' singular friendship.

Mahler said :

« In order to judge a composer's “ œuvre ”, you have to view it in its entirety. If you do so (in the case of Brahms and Bruckner) , there is no doubt that Brahms emerges as the greater of the 2, with his extremely well-rounded compositions which, incidentally, are in no way obvious, but disclose their depth and wealth in proportion as you delve into them - not to speak of his enormous fertility which, after all, you have to take into account when considering an artist's work as a whole. True, you are carried away by the greatness and wealth of Bruckner's invention but, every now and again, you are disturbed and carried back, as it were, by its piece-meal character. »

Mahler's relation to Anton Bruckner, with whom he is so often thoughtlessly coupled as a composer of similar character, is a complex one. Apart from his views on Bruckner's music, we have to consider Mahler's approach to his eminent predecessor as composer and conductor, and define his personal friendship with Bruckner, which was at its strongest during Mahler's student years. Bruckner's musical influence on Mahler can remain to be discussed as and when it arises in the course of examining Mahler's own works. His efforts on Bruckner's behalf as a conductor and his youthful friendship with the 54 year old Master, who had already completed his Symphony No. 5, may be treated here.

It is necessary, 1st, to trace a few of the steps that led Bruckner to Vienna. It was from Linz, at whose Cathedral he was 1st organist, that Bruckner travelled to Vienna in 1861 to take the « Conservatoire » 's final examination that would make him « eligible for appointments as a teacher of harmony and counterpoint at Conservatories throughout the Monarchy » . Josef Hellmesberger « senior » , director of the « Conservatoire » during Mahler's studentship, was one of the examiners of Bruckner's powers of improvisation at the organ, an ultimate test that occurred in November and after the triumphant completion of which Bruckner received his long-sought-for diploma. Stimulated by his success, he made various attempts to secure a position of wider influence and greater responsibility, but it was not until 1868, after many failures and hesitations, that he finally gained an appointment in Vienna, as successor to his old teacher, Simon Sechter (1788-1867) , at the « Conservatoire » . As professor of harmony, counterpoint and organ, Bruckner assumed his new duties on 1 October 1868.

Mahler was not to arrive at the « Conservatoire » for another 7 years, and Bruckner, meanwhile, was again agitating (he had commenced in 1867) for an appointment at Vienna University. Since his candidature was opposed by Eduard Hanslick, some years passed before Bruckner won his objective. He was appointed (unpaid !) lecturer in harmony and counterpoint at the University and « seems to have begun his lectures on the 24th of April 1876, although there is no absolute certainty about the date. Bruckner continued activities in both institutions for many years, retiring from the « Conservatoire » only in 1891 and delivering his last lecture at the University in November 1894.

We are fortunate in possessing a letter of Mahler's (perhaps prompted by the currency of the myth that he was Bruckner's pupils) in which he states very plainly how he himself regarded his friendship with Bruckner. It could scarcely be clearer in its refutation :

« I was never a pupil of Bruckner. The world thinks I studied with him because, in my student days in Vienna, I was so often in his company and was reckoned among his 1st disciples. In fact, I believe that, at one time, my friend (Rudolf) Krzyzanowski and I were his sole followers. In spite of the great difference in age between us, Bruckner's happy disposition and his child-like, trusting nature rendered our relationship one of open friendship. Naturally, the realization and understanding of his ideals which I, then, arrived at cannot have been without influence upon my course as artist and man. Hence, I believe I am, perhaps, more justified than most others in calling myself his pupil and I shall always do so with deep gratitude. »

Mahler, in this document, while mentioning a most singular feature of his relation to Bruckner, « the great difference in age » between them (when Mahler was 17, and Bruckner 53) makes no specific reference to attendance at the latter's lectures at the University or elsewhere. We must discount the probability of Mahler coming into contact with Bruckner at the « Conservatoire », though he must certainly have been aware of Bruckner's presence and, perhaps, been intrigued by what he heard from friends who were in the great man's classes - from Hans Rott, for instance, who was enrolled as an organ pupil of Bruckner's for the year 1876-1877. But the 1st impressions of the great composer may have been like those of Carl Flesch and his colleagues :

« Among the teachers I used to meet in the corridors of the Institute, Anton Bruckner must be mentioned 1st ; with his incredibly wide pants, he then seemed to us students a ridiculous figure. »

Though there may be no « absolute certainty » of the date when Bruckner commenced his lectures at the University, there can be no doubt that he was firmly installed there by 1877, the year in which Mahler enrolled as an auditor of various courses. We have no decisive information of Mahler's attendance at, or reaction to, any University classes but for Bruckner's and, even here, commentators are cautious : Paul Stefan, for example, writes that :

« There is little doubt that Mahler attended Bruckner's lectures. »

At the other end of the biographical scale, Stefan's cautious assessment has become « attended religiously » - while Alma Mahler, who offers some Bruckner anecdotes presumably related by her husband, mentions nothing of the older composer's University activities and confines herself, indeed, to the somewhat ambiguous statement that Bruckner « was not, strictly speaking, Mahler's teacher ». Guido Adler fills-out the scant amount of documentation relevant to this topic by asserting that Mahler's visits to Bruckner's harmony (not counterpoint !) classes were « sporadic » and belong to 1878, the year in which Mahler's « more intimate association » with Bruckner developed. It may well have been in 1878, then, that Bruckner always entered his lecture-room in Mahler's company and, likewise, quitted it - or so, Stefan recounts, although he does not reconcile his « always » with his former hesitant speculation. But while it may have been that 1878 was the period of Mahler's most intense friendship with Bruckner, there was already an event in 1877 that brought them close together, out of which, almost certainly, flowed the warm association of subsequent months.

On Sunday 16 December 1877, Bruckner himself conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in the 1st performance of his Symphony No. 3 (in a revised version - the original had been found « unplayable ») . The premiere proved to be a complete disaster. The audience thinned away during the performance and, at the end, there were hardly more than 10 people left at the « parterre » . Worse still, open laughter marred the proceedings, in which Hellmesberger, true to his markedly ambivalent attitude to Bruckner's music, set an unfortunate example.

In the standing places, however, was a group of 10 to 20 young Bruckner enthusiasts, most of them his pupils, who, at the Symphony's end attempted to console the depressed composer. Among them was Mahler, for whom the whole affair must have been a lesson in Viennese musical politics. Though Bruckner's inexpert conducting may have been a draw-back, the real reasons for the catastrophe were quite extraneous to the quality of the music or the character of its execution. The fiasco was primarily the result of the feud between the Wagner party and their opponents ; a secondary factor was the hostility of the Orchestra. With the latter, Mahler, in later years, was himself to come into conflict ; his own path to success, however, though it did not run smoothly, never encountered a humiliation so crushing as this premiere. His music, at least, kept his audiences in their seats, whatever their resistances.

Bruckner, at 1st, gave way to despair. He said :

« Leave me alone. People don't want to have anything to do with me. »

But among those present at the « débâcle » , and impressed by the work nevertheless, was the music-publisher, Theodor Rättig, owner of the publishing-house « Bussjager & Rättig » , who offered to take the work into his catalogue. Not only a score and parts appeared, but also a piano-duet version, the preparation of which was entrusted to Mahler : he was aided in his task by his friend Rudolf Krzyzanowski (who was also present at the ill-starred premiere) and his piano professor, Julius Epstein, who supervised the reduction. This 4 handed edition of the Symphony, « one, of the 1st piano-duet arrangements of Bruckner's Symphonies » , was published in 1878 ; it was Mahler's 1st publication. Already, it seems, Mahler's unbending idealism guided his approach to his work.

Paul Stefan writes :

« His piano score follows the orchestral one exactly, and attempts to keep the various parts in the characteristic pitch of the instruments, even at the expense of not being easily playable. »

We may assume that, out of the dismal premiere of Bruckner's Symphony, an occasion for the demonstration of sympathies no less than antipathies, blossomed the composer's sincere regard for his younger colleague. That Mahler was invited to undertake the piano-duet arrangement is proof of it ; and, up to 1878, the various stories recorded may be assigned. Alma Mahler relates that when Mahler took Bruckner his reduction of the Symphony's 1st movement, « Bruckner was childishly pleased and said with a roguish smile : “ Now, I shan't need the Schalks any more ! ” »

The brothers Schalk, Franz (1863-1931) and Josef (1857-1901) , were Bruckner pupils and ardent disciples whose agreed, enforced, or arbitrary revisions of the composer's scores (like Ferdinand Löwe's) have perpetrated an almost insoluble textual confusion. Mrs. Mahler's perhaps exaggerated claim that the Schalk brothers, at this time, « made all the piano scores of his Symphonies » lends point to Bruckner's comment. Since Josef was Mahler's senior by 3 years, and Bruckner apparently welcomed the younger man's assistance, there is no reason to register surprise at the youthfulness of Bruckner's circle - though it is hard, indeed, to imagine the need fulfilled by the, then, 15 year old Franz.

Mahler, we are told, « used often to foregather with Bruckner at midday. Bruckner stood the beer and Mahler had to pay for his own rolls ; but as he generally had no money, he had to make his midday meal on beer alone. Bruckner was always surrounded by large numbers of young musicians, to whom he talked with child-like unrestraint. But if there were Jews present, he always (if he had occasion to say anything about Jews) gave them the courtesy title of the « Honourable Israelites » (« die Herren Israeliten ») . This suggests a convivial artistic and personal relationship, heightened, no doubt, by mutual interest in work-in-progress on the duet arrangement ; so friendly an atmosphere provides a background against which the amiable entry into and exit from the lecture-room « à deux » (together) , seems natural rather than legendary, and even promotes belief in Stefan's tale that « when Mahler had visited him at his house, the far elder Bruckner insisted upon conducting the young man down the 4 flights of stairs, hat in hand » . Bruckner's exaggerated courtesies are, of course, notorious. Into that very category falls the gift which Bruckner presented to Mahler in appreciation of his efforts (as an arranger) nothing less than the autograph of the 3rd Symphony's 2nd version. Bruckner's gesture, a characteristically unrealistic reward for services rendered, neatly rounds off the piano-duet episode and pays its own tribute to the warmth of these 2 oddly-assorted men's association. It is probable, indeed, that Bruckner was « very fond » of Mahler, as Alma Mahler states.

We have seen something of Mahler's later views of Bruckner's music. While it appears that Bruckner played « various compositions of his, old and new » to his young colleague, there is no record of Mahler seeking Bruckner's judgment on his youthful pieces or works he had composed up to 1896, the year of Bruckner's death. Though Mahler was in touch with Bruckner in the 1890's, it is not likely that the latter was familiar with Mahler's developments as a composer. Thus, we have no pronouncements from Bruckner upon Mahler's music - which would certainly have been of considerable interest : only the general colour of his attitude at this early period, that he regarded Mahler « as a young man of promise » , that he « always spoke of Mahler with the greatest respect » .

Mahler's later relation to Bruckner's music was twofold : he was involved with it as both conductor and composer. The extent and nature of Bruckner's musical influence (some general stylistic and formal parallels are obvious and have been wildly over-stressed, while subtler relations have been over-looked) will be dealt with as and when they arise in regard to specific works of Mahler's wherein Bruckner's influence is a factor to be taken into account. As a conductor, and eventual patron, of Bruckner's works, Mahler's record is a reasonably generous one that may be dispatched forthwith.

Ernst Křenek has written that :

« Mahler manifested his esteem for Bruckner actively as soon as he could, by including Bruckner's compositions in the programs of his concerts. »

What may have been the earliest instance of his promotion of Bruckner's music was a performance, in Prague, in April 1886 (when Mahler was conducting at the « Landestheater ») , of the Scherzo from Symphony No. 3, in a programme that included some of Mahler's own songs and works by Mozart and Wagner. It was about this time that Mahler wrote to Bruckner :

« I know you are angry at me, but I have not altogether deserved it, for tossed about on the tide of life I still regard you with the deep affection and reverence of old. It is one of the aims of my life to help your glorious art to the triumph it deserves. »

Mahler's tossing about « on the tide of life » obviously refers to the conducting engagements he had undertaken since 1880, engagements that successively and with a growing intensity must have disrupted the continuity of his connection with musical life in Vienna and his Viennese friends. Mahler's admission, « I know you are angry at me » , suggests a lack of contact between him and his old friend, even that Bruckner was disappointed, perhaps even resentful that the younger man was not doing more on his behalf. When Mahler moved to Hamburg, in 1891, to conduct at the Opera House there, he was able to fulfil his « aim » to assist Bruckner's « glorious art to the triumph it deserves » through performances of the « Te Deum » (twice) , the Mass in D minor, and the Symphony No. 3. Mahler, it appears, while in Hamburg, was still in affectionate touch with Bruckner, to whom he addressed a letter on the day after the « Te Deum » 's performance. The 1st sentence of the letter (which begins with « Honoured Master and Friend ! ») seems to confirm the fact that Mahler had something of a sensitive conscience about his Bruckner performances, that the elder composer had been restive :

« At last, I am so fortunate as to be able to write you that I have performed a work of yours. Yesterday (Good Friday) , I conducted your splendid and powerful “ Te Deum ”. Not only the whole public, but also the performers were most deeply moved by the mighty architecture and the truly noble ideas. »

Mahler continues after describing the public's profound response :

« Bruckner has now made his triumphal entrance into Hamburg. »

A Bruckner disciple, Wilhelm Zinne, living in Hamburg, wrote to his Master about the performance in the Municipal Theatre « under “ Kapellmeister ” Mahler's inspired leadership » :

« As I found-out from personal association with Mahler, he is a true admirer of your works. While Mozart's “ Requiem ” (doubtless because it was presented with nervous haste) did not make any very great impression, your work was

In more favourable circumstances, perhaps, Mahler might have respected Bruckner's « Urtext » ; but his attitude towards the inviolability of original versions was, in any case, strangely inconsistent : for example, he insisted on Wagner without cuts in Vienna but was willing to restore the excisions in America. His fidgety approach to other composer's instrumentation (and his own) is, of course, notorious ; indeed, it is hard not to believe that his Bruckner performances did not include some of his famous touchings-up. The cuts in Symphony No. 6 (and they seem to have been extensive) must be deplored ; on the other hand, judgment of any of Mahler's exploits as a conductor is always complicated by the fact that he was also a composer, and inclined to re-create, to re-compose, as it were, according to his own image, a process sometimes beneficial, sometimes dubious in effect. At the very least, it appears that Mahler's performances of Bruckner were coloured by the revisionary and « improving » ideas of the Master's editors and pupils current at this time. Mahler, in some respects, was unexpectedly entangled with the artistic assumptions of his period.

In 1900 and 1901, Mahler was responsible for further Bruckner performances ; he conducted Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5 in Vienna, and the Scherzo from the 4th in the « Trocadero » in Paris, on 21 June 1900, when the Vienna Orchestra visited the French capital as part of the World Exhibition ; this brave gesture must have been one of the 1st occasions, if not « the » 1st, when Bruckner's music travelled outside Austria or Germany. Thereafter, Mahler's connection with the Vienna Orchestra ceased (as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, that is) , and though he continued to lead a busy life as a conductor in the concert-hall, the loss of an Orchestra of which he was artistic director inevitably brought with it a certain loss of freedom. The possibility of pioneering was restricted by the taste in programmes of the agency extending the invitations, and resistances to Bruckner's music during the early years of the 20th Century were still influential in many quarters. There was, of course, similarly active opposition to Mahler's music, but in relation to his own works Mahler, as a conductor, stood in a naturally favourable position. It was not until some years later, when Mahler was working in America and (significantly enough) , once again in possession of his own Orchestra, that he was able to resume his championing of Bruckner's « glorious art » : in 1908, in New York, he « gave performances of all Bruckner's Symphonies one after the other, although they had a very bad press » .

Mahler's work on Bruckner's behalf did not cease there. In 1910, Universal-Edition, the Viennese publishers, had taken into their catalogue Mahler's 1st 4 Symphonies. Mahler, though about to receive the not insubstantial royalties due to him for these works, agreed to forgo his profits in order to help Universal-Edition publish and publicize the Symphonies of Bruckner.

Alma Mahler comments :

« He thought it only right that he should sacrifice his profits for another 15 years out of love of Bruckner, without of course receiving, or expecting, a penny from the sale of Bruckner's works. This was a great sacrifice to make to Bruckner's memory and shows how deeply he revered him. »

Mahler's financial generosity was a marked aspect of his character ; it is illustrated at its best in his relation with Arnold Schönberg, in an incident that belongs to this same year.

Alma Mahler writes :

« Mahler's love of Bruckner was lifelong » writes Alma ; and despite Mahler's re-evaluation of 1904, I see no serious grounds on which Mahler's attachment to Bruckner may be challenged. What he wrote on the title-page of his copy of the « Te Deum » (he deleted the customary vocal and instrumental specification and substituted : « For the tongues of angels, heaven-blest, chastened hearts, and souls purified in the fire ! ») must be given as much weight as his more critical utterance. There is doubtless a paradox here, as in many of Mahler's judgments. But, then, there is something altogether paradoxical about Mahler's friendship with Anton Bruckner, a friendship whose common centre of interest was, as Křenek suggests, a common enthusiasm for Wagner, while « the mutual attraction between Jewish intellectuality and endemic " naïveté " is also a peculiarly Austrian phenomenon » . One may well wonder, along with Křenek, « with what feelings the elder musician looked upon the nervous, talkative Jewish boy from Bohemia » ; but the brief history of their personal association contains, in fact, the basic constituents of their musical relation : some common ground, and certainly a major degree of genius in either case - and, for the rest, profound « contrasts » that are nonetheless strangely complementary. It was the complementary nature of the relation that enabled 2 composers in many respects so opposed to work with equal success within the same medium, to sustain, despite intense differences in character and procedure, a great Symphonic tradition for a time 44 years, from the date of Bruckner's Symphony No. 1 to the date of Mahler's Symphony No. 10, an extension that maintained the status of the Viennese Symphony until the 1st decade of the 20th Century.

An anecdote of Paul Stefan's rounds-off the account :

« When the Viennese made an appeal for contributions for a Bruckner Memorial (Viktor Tilgner's monument) , and the Director of the Opera was asked to sign the petition, he refused and said to the Orchestra : " Let us play his music instead. Amongst people who would hear nothing of Bruckner whilst he was alive, and stood in his way, is no place for me." »

Bruckner et Mahler vus par Bruno Walter

Throughout its 10 years of existence, the Bruckner Society of America has striven manfully and efficiently in behalf of Bruckner and Mahler. Therefore, in connection with its decennial retrospect, I gladly respond to its plea for an expression concerning these Masters. To combine propaganda for Bruckner and Mahler into a single plan is to express the conviction that the success of the one helps the other's cause, that they belong side by side because of their artistic kinship.

I should not have agreed to write about Bruckner and Mahler did I not regard that little word « and » highly-pertinent. Its appropriateness is borne-out by Mahler's own words. I often heard him call Bruckner his forerunner, asserting that his own creations followed the trail blazed by his senior Master. Of course, that was over 40 years ago, in the days of Mahler's 2nd, the Symphony which, more vividly than all his other works, reveals his affinity with Bruckner. Yet, from the 3rd Symphony on, his development was marked by an ever increasing deviation from Bruckner's course. I cannot recall Mahler making the same remark during later years. Nevertheless, down to his latest works, we meet with occasional features which might be called Brucknerian. Thus it is worth while attaining a clear idea of the nature and degree of their relationship.

Much has been written concerning Bruckner. To the literature on Mahler, I myself have contributed a book. Yet (as far as I know) , a comparative study of Bruckner and Mahler is still to be made. Therefore, I shall attempt in these comments to measure their relationship, to thrash-out the features which unite and separate them. We shall find them alike in many important respects, but different, even opposite, in others of not less consequence. We shall find them so related, that understanding the one includes a certain degree of access to the other ; yet so different, that affection for the one may seem consistent with total inaccessibility to the other. Certainly, to understand and love both requires a very complex musical disposition and an unusually broad spiritual span. My comparison cannot limit itself to details of actual musical creation. The spiritual sources of their works, the personalities of both Masters, are vital to the theme of our survey, not merely because they are more amenable to words than music itself, but because the light they shed upon the music is indispensable in an essay striving for knowledge. To demonstrate really and clearly the relationships between these composers' works, there is only one way : through performances. Renouncing for once this (to me) most agreeable method, resorting to words, though aware that no bridge leads straight from them to music, I must also seek to approach my subject indirectly. The mystic connection between the inner life of a composer and his music makes it possible to discover his soul in his work. Understanding his heart lays bare an inner path to his music. Hence, I hope a discussion of the individualities of both Masters will enable me to fill in some of the gaps inevitable to an essay on their works alone.

Anton Bruckner

What Joins Them

9 Symphonies composed by Bruckner, as well as Mahler, in the course of about 30 years, constitute the chief product of their creative power. The nature of the themes, developments, combinations, is (in keeping with their creator's nature) truly Symphonic. Remarkable coincidences in the periodic progress of their work are the decisive step from the 3rd to the 4th and the change of style between the 4th and 5th Symphonies. The 4th of each opens a new field of expression scarcely glimpsed in his previous works. A warm, Romantic light rises over Bruckner's hitherto heroic tone world ; a tender fairy tale like idyll soothes Mahler's tempestuous heart. For both, the 5th, with its intensification of the polyphonic style, inaugurates the period of mature Mastery. The laconic idiom of restraint, the art of mere suggestion, involving economy of means and form, is not theirs. Only in a number of his songs do we find Mahler's contradictory nature Master of this style too. Otherwise, both share in common the urge to yield their entire beings symphonically through unrestrained expression in huge dimensions. Their Symphonies resemble each other also in the special significance of the Finale in the total architecture. Broadly spun, essentially diatonic themes and a counterpoint directly joined to the Classical tradition characterize both. To be sure, Mahler's later polyphony trod more complex, daring, and highly-individual paths. To both (and to them alone) , the church chorale comes as naturally as the Austrian « Ländler » . The utmost solemnity and folk-like joviality constitute the opposite poles in both their natures. They are linked with the Classicists, the way leads through Franz Schubert. Their association is strengthened, among other things, by the fundamentals of their harmony, their style of cadence and (all their deviations notwithstanding) their fondness for symmetry and regular periodic structure. Even the later Mahler, no matter to what regions his formal and harmonic boldness led him, maintained clear periodic structure and a firm tonal foundation. Both revel in broadly built climaxes, in long sustained tensions, whose release requires overwhelming sonorous dynamics.

In their gay or lyric moments, we often meet with a typically Austrian charm recalling Franz Schubert, though in Mahler's case it is frequently mixed with a Bohemian-Moravian flavour. Above all, however, Mahler and Bruckner are (though in different ways) religious beings. An essential part of their musical inspiration wells from this devotional depth. It is a main source of their thematic wealth, swaying an all important field of expression in their works ; it produces the high watermark of their musical surf. The tonal idiom of both is devoid of eroticism. Often inclined to pathos, powerful tragedy, and emotional extremes of utterance, they attain climaxes of high ecstasy. Clear sunshine and blue sky seldom appear in the wholly un-Mediterranean atmosphere of their music. « Romantic » was the name Bruckner gave his 4th. In a related sense, we find Mahler's earlier work Romantic, aside from his un-Brucknerian diabolism. Yet, in the later works of both, the Romantic note is rarely sounded. Highly-characteristic seems to me one negative manifestation of their relationship. Moved by their tremendous experience of Richard Wagner to an undying faith in his art, they show (aside from a slight influence over Bruckner's instrumentation) no Wagnerian traces in their work, or at most, so few, that the impression of their complete independence is in no wise affected thereby. Their individuality was of so sturdy a nature (astonishing in that epoch of musical history) that despite the open ear, open heart, and unreserved sympathy they lent the Wagnerian siren song, they did not succumb to it. Of course, being essentially Symphonists, they were equal to the threat of the dramatist against their self-determination, for the inspirational sources of their creation, as well as their native urge toward formal construction, differed fundamentally from his. Neither of them felt drawn to the stage, a phenomenon particularly remarkable in the case of Mahler, whose reproductive genius for the Opera, expressed through incomparable interpretations, opened new paths in that field, actually instituting a tradition. 2 abortive attempts of his early youth are his sole original contributions to the theater. Otherwise, he never wrote for the stage, unless we include his arrangement of Weber's « 3 Pintos » .

Like Bruckner, he took root in absolute music, save when he drew his inspiration from poetry, as in his songs. Yet, was his work really rooted in absolute music ? Is his 1st Symphony (originally named « Titan » after Jean Paul's novel) with its « Funeral March in the manner of Callot » , are the 2nd and 4th with their vocal movements, the 3rd with its (later) suppressed subtitles, genuine Symphonic music in the Bruckner sense ? Indubitably, Mahler's music differs from Bruckner's in the degree of absoluteness intended. It was induced and influenced by more specific imagery, fantasy, and thought than Bruckner's music, which rose from less tangible, darker spiritual depths. But does this really involve an essential difference ? Is not Beethoven's « Pastorale » , despite the « Scene at the Brook » , « Rustic Festival » , and « Storm » , absolute Symphonic music, its lesser absolute intention notwithstanding ? Let us conjure-up the basic process of musical creation. The composer suddenly has a musical idea. Where there existed apparently nothing before, save perhaps a mood, an image, there is, all at once, music. A theme is present, a motive. Now, the shaping hand of the composer grasps it, unfolding and guiding its trend. Fresh ideas come streaming in. Whether or not more definite imagery plays a role in the creative process, the decisive factors governing the result remain the « grace » of basic musical creation and the power of Symphonic construction. That « grace » and that power were granted Mahler, as well as Bruckner. Therefore, despite the thoughts and visions that influenced his creation, he also took root in absolute music.

After all, do we know whether Bruckner, or for that matter even Mozart was not visited by imagery and thoughts during the creative process, or, whether many of their ideas, looming-up out of the subconscious, did not take turnings over some conscious path, thereby acquiring more vivid coloring and more subjective character ? In Gœthe's « Elective Affinities » , the image of Otilie fills Eduard's eyes during a conjugal meeting with his wife Charlotte, while the latter beholds the captain's image. Though, the off-spring of this union bore external traces of these wandering visions, it was nevertheless the child of Eduard and Charlotte, sprung from their natural union. Deep mystery surrounds the genesis and pure music may result, despite the influence of extra musical ideas upon the act of generation. Yet, if the composer's intention is really descriptive, i.e. , if he makes the music the means of portraying an idea or image, then, of course, he has himself blocked the path to pure music. To Mahler as well as Bruckner music never was the means of expressing something, but rather the end itself. He never disregarded its inherent principles for the sake of expression. It was the element in which both Masters lived, impelled by their nature toward Symphonic construction. Mahler's enchanted creative night was filled with violently changing dream forms ; Bruckner's was dominated by a single lofty vision. Since Bruckner (so far as I know) had, until his death in 1896, acquired no acquaintance with Mahler's work, whereas the latter was well versed in Bruckner's art, it remains to be considered whether it was not this influence, acting only upon the younger composer, that aroused the impression of the kinship felt by Mahler himself. Without a certain relationship, however, no influence can be exerted. Moreover, Mahler's individual tonal language reveals no sign of dependence, whether similarity or reminiscence. Yet, we find in one of his main works, the 2nd, indications of a deeper, essential kinship and meet with occasional « Bruckner » characteristics down to Mahler's very last creations. Nevertheless, he was as little dependent upon Bruckner as Brahms upon Schumann, many of whose « characteristics » haunt the work of Brahms. To both Bruckner and Mahler may be applied the « Faust » verdict concerning Byron - Euphorion : to each of them was granted « a song his very own » , i.e. : originality.

What Divides Them

Bruckner's 9 Symphonies are purely instrumental works. Mahler, on the other hand, enlists words and the human voice for his 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 8th. Besides the Symphonies, Bruckner composed 3 Masses, the « Te Deum » , the 150th Psalm, smaller devotional vocal works, and (to my knowledge) 2 male choruses. Of all entirely different stamp was Mahler's non Symphonic creation. He wrote « Das Klagende Lied » , set to his own narrative poem ; the 4 part song cycle « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » , the words also by himself ; songs with piano accompaniment and with verses from « Des Knaben Wunderhorn » ; during a later period, orchestral songs set to poems by Friedrich Rückert, among them the « Kindertotenlieder » cycle ; and, finally, his most personal confession, « Das Lied von der Erde » , with verses by the Chinese poet Li-Tai-Po. We see Bruckner, therefore, aside from his Symphonies, concentrated almost entirely upon Sacred texts, while Mahler is inspired by highly-varied fields of poetic expression. In his Symphonies, « Das Urlicht » from « Des Knaben Wunderhorn » and Klopstock's « Resurrection Ode » furnished him with the solemn affirmative close of his 2nd, Nietzsche's « Midnight » yielded the questing, foreboding 4th movement and verses from « Des Knaben Wunderhorn » , the answering 5th movement of the 3rd. From the same collection, Mahler chose a poem of child-like faith to give symbolical expression to his own hope of celestial life. In the 8th, the hymn « Veni Creator Spiritus » and the closing scenes of « Faust » constitute his confessions of faith. Thus, the record of his vocal creations is, at the same time, a clue to the story of his heart. It tells of his struggles toward God, through discovery and renewed quest, through ever higher intuitions and loftier yearnings. Yet, over this dominant note, the « Ostinato » of his life, resound many other tones, defined by accompanying verses : Love and death, lansquet life and a spectral world, the joy of life and its woe, humor and despair, savage defiance and final resignation, all these find individual and convincing expression in his musical eloquence. If I wished to present the difference between the 2 Masters in the shortest imaginable formula, I would say (conscious of the exaggeration of such a summary) : at bottom, Bruckner's spirit was repose, Mahler's unrest. With Bruckner, the most impassioned movement has a foundation of certainty ; not even Mahler's inmost depths remain undisturbed. Bruckner's scope of expression is unlimited, though it has but few main subdivisions ; with Mahler these are prodigal in number, embracing all lights and shades of a weird diabolism, a humorous buffoonery, even resorting to the eccentric and banal, besides countless expressive nuances ranging from child-like tenderness to chaotic eruption. His heartfelt, folk like themes are as Mahlerian as his sardonic cacophonies, whose lightning apparitions render all the darker the night of his musical landscape. Mahler's noble peace and solemnity, his lofty transfiguration are the fruits of conquest ; with Bruckner, they are innate gifts. Bruckner's musical message stems from the sphere of the Saints ; in Mahler speaks the impassioned prophet. He is ever renewing the battle, ending in mild resignation, while Bruckner's tone world radiates unshakable, consoling affirmation. We find, as already stated, the inexhaustible wealth of the Bruckner music spread over a correspondingly boundless, though in itself not highly-varied realm of expression, for which the 2 verbal directions, « feierlich » (solemnly) and « innig » (heart felt) , most often employed by him, almost sufficed, were it not for the richly differentiated scherzi that remind us of the wealth of the humoristic external ornaments of impressive Gothic cathedrals. Even Bruckner's Orchestra undergoes scarcely any change. With the 7th, he adds the Wagnerian tubas, in the 8th the harp, but he does not alter his instrumental methods as such. Beginning with the 5th, the character of his harmony and polyphony no longer varies, though (to be sure) it is sufficiently rich and inspired to require no change.

Mahler renewed himself « from head to toe » with each Symphony : the 1st, his « Werther » , as I once named it ; the 2nd, a kind of « Requiem » ; the 3rd, which one might be tempted to call a pantheistic hymn ; the 4th, a fairy tale idyll. From the 5th to the 7th, imagery and ideas yield to absolute musical intentions. Even though each of these 3 Symphonies has its own individual atmosphere, they stand considerably closer to each other in style and general content than the widely separated 1st 4. They share in common a musically more complex, polyphonically more profound idiom, richer in combinations, imparting a new, stronger impression of Mahler's varied emotional life. The human voice is the main instrument in the 8th. A magnificent, specifically choral polyphony determines the style of the hymn like 1st movement, while in the « Faust » scenes, the composer adapts his musical idiom to the Gæthe word and the demands of lyric singableness, through a sort of simplification. In « Das Lied von der Erde » , we meet with still another Mahler, inaugurating a 3rd creative period, with a new manner of composition and orchestration. On this highest plane is born the 9th, the mighty Symphonic presentation of the spiritual sphere of « Das Lied von der Erde ». The sketches toward a 10th bring to a sudden end this sharply defined course of creative evolution, the outstanding feature of which was its rich differentiation. This applies also (as already stated) to his instrumentation. An inborn, extremely delicate sense of sound, an ear open to orchestral possibilities lead, at the beck of expression and clarity, to unique Mastery over the Orchestra. From wealth of colour and charm of sound to an objective exposition of his increasingly complex polyphony, this is the path Mahler's orchestral technique, changed and intensified by the increasing demands of each work, had to travel. Each orchestral song, from the very earliest, reveals an individual instrumental combination, mainly of an amazing economy. The Symphonies, with the exception of the 4th, are inhabited by orchestral masses over which an unbounded tonal fantasy holds sway. In contrast to Bruckner, he was compelled to struggle ceaselessly for the solution of orchestral problems, increasing with each new work. In this respect, he always felt himself, as he complained to me, « a beginner ». The great stress in Bruckner's music rests upon the idea, in Mahler's upon the Symphonic elaboration of the idea involving processes of forming and transforming which in the course of years scaled the highest peaks of constructive power. It is characteristic of the difference between the 2 composers that their opponents attack the form in Bruckner's, the substance in Mahler's work. I can understand these objections to some extent without, however, acquiescing in them. From Heinrich Schenker comes this charming thought : that « even a little bouquet of flowers requires some order (guiding lines) to make it possible for the eye to encompass it at a glance », i.e. , to see it as a bouquet. « Form » is such order, premeditated, organic association, complete, strict unity. Our Classic literature contains matchless examples of organic unity. Yet, we have art works of undoubtedly highest value (I mention Goethe's « Faust » as the most significant instance) the genesis of which resisted this strict organic unity of form, gaining more in richness thereby than they lost in lucidity. I confess that, for many years, despite my love for Bruckner's tonal language and his wonderful melodies, despite my happiness in his inspirations, I felt somewhat confused by his apparent formlessness, his unrestrained, luxurious prodigality. This confusion disappeared as soon as I began performing him. Without difficulty, I achieved that identification with his work which is the foundation of every authentic and apparently authentic interpretation. Now, since I have long felt deeply at home in his realm, since his form no longer seems strange to me, I believe that access to him is open to everyone who approaches him with the awe due a true creator. His super dimensions, his surrender to every fresh inspiration and new, interesting turning, sometimes not drawn with compelling musical logic from what has gone before, nor united to what follows, his abrupt pauses and resumptions : all this may just as well indicate a defect in constructive power as an individual concept of Symphony. Even though, he may not follow a strictly planned path to his goal, he takes us over ways strewn with abundant riches, affording us views of constantly varying delight. Mahler's striving for form succeeded in bringing transparent unity to the huge dimensions of his Symphonies. His was a conscious effort towards order. All his singularities of mood, his excesses of passions, his outpourings of the heart are seized and united according to a plan dictated by his sovereign sense of form. He once told me that, because of the pressure of time (his duties as director left him only the summer months for composing) , he may perhaps not have been, at times, sufficiently critical of the quality of an idea, but that he had never permitted himself the slightest leniency in the matter of form. Yet, the objection to his thematic art finds no corroboration in this confession, for that objection refers, as far as I know, only to so-called « banalities », i.e. , intentional ironic turns, meant to be humorous and dependent for acceptance or rejection upon the listener's capacity for humor. It is not in these that Mahler perceived a deficient quality. He referred to a few transitional lyrics in later works, which struck him as perhaps not select enough, though they would scarcely disturb anyone's enjoyment of the gigantic whole.

The relative beauty of themes and the value of musical ideas cannot be a subject for discussion. I limit myself to the declaration that, after life-long occupation with his works, Mahler's musical substance seems to me essentially music, powerful and individual throughout, beautiful when he strives for beauty, graceful when he strives for charm, melancholy when for sorrow. In short, it was truly the material suited to the rearing of such mighty structures, and worthy of the sublime feelings it served to express. Mahler was, like Bruckner, the bearer of a transcendental mission, a spiritual sage and guide, Master of an inspired tonal language enriched and enhanced by himself. The tongues of both had, like that of Isaiah, been touched and consecrated by the fiery coal of the altar of the Lord and the threefold « Sanctus » of the seraphim was the inmost meaning of their message. (Gustav Mahler)

The Personalities

The favour of personal acquaintance with Bruckner was not granted me, but that Vienna, into the musical life of which I entered as a young conductor, was still full of the most lively memories of him. I came in touch with « Bruckner circles », which abundantly supplemented Mahler's narratives of his own Bruckner experiences. I gathered from reports of pupils and friends of the Master, from numerous anecdotes, so vivid a picture of his personality, his atmosphere, his mode of life, his conversation, his habits and eccentricities, that I feel as if I had known him thoroughly. One drastic difference between Bruckner and Mahler struck me even then : no feature in Bruckner's personal make-up reflected the greatness and sublimity of his music, while Mahler's person was in full harmony with his work. What a contrast in the very appearance of the 2 Masters ! Gustav Mahler's lean figure, his narrow, longish face, the unusually high, sloping forehead beneath jet black hair, eyes which betrayed the inner flame, the ascetic mouth, his strange, irregular gait (these impressed one as the incarnation of the diabolical conductor Johann Kreisler, the famed musical self) reflecting creation of the poet Ernst Theodor Amadeus (E.T.A.) Hoffmann. Anton Bruckner's short, corpulent, comfortable figure, his quiet, easy manner contrast as strongly as possible with such Romantic appearance. But upon the drab body is set the head of a Roman Cæsar, which might be described as majestic, were it not for the touch of meekness and shyness about the eyes and mouth, giving the lie to tide commanding brow and nose. As might be expected from their contrasting exteriors, the 2 men themselves differed. Bruckner was a retiring, awkward, childishly « naïve » being, whose almost primitive ingenuousness and simplicity was mixed with a generous portion of rustic cunning. He spoke the unrefined Upper-Austrian dialect of the provincial and remained the countryman in appearance, clothing, speech, and carriage till the end, even though he lived in Vienna, a world metropolis, for decades. His conversation never betrayed reading, whether literature or poetry, nor any interest in scientific matters. The broad domains of the intellectual did not attract him. Unless music was the topic, he turned his conversation to the narrow vicissitudes and happenings of everyday existence. Nevertheless, his personality must have been attractive, for almost all reports agree upon the peculiar fascination exerted by his « naïveté », piety, homely simplicity, and modesty, bordering at times on servility, as borne-out by many of his letters. I explain this attractive power of his strange personality to myself as due to the radiance of his lofty, godly soul, the splendor of his musical genius glimmering through his unpretending homeliness. If his presence could hardly be felt as « interesting », it was heart warming, yet, uplifting.

It was entirely otherwise with Mahler, who was as impressive in life as in his works. Wherever he appeared his exciting personality swayed everything. In his presence, the most secure became insecure. His fascinating conversation was alive with an amazingly wide culture reflecting a world of intellectual interests and an uncommon capacity for swift, keen thinking and expression. Nothing of importance ever thought, accomplished, or created by man was foreign to him. His philosophically trained mind, his fiery soul grasped and assimilated the rich, nourishing intellectual diet without which so Faustian a being could not exist, yet, which could as little satiate or appease him as it had « Faust » . A firm consciousness of God that knew no wavering filled Bruckner's heart. His deep piety, his faithful Catholicism dominated his life, even though it is rather his work that reveals the true greatness of his faith and his relationship to God. Not only his Masses, his « Te Deum » , his devotional choral works, but his Symphonies also (and these before all) sprang from this fundamental religious feeling that swayed Bruckner's entire spirit. He did not have to struggle toward God ; he believed. Mahler sought God. He searched in himself, in Nature, in the messages of poets and thinkers. He strove for steadfastness while he swung between assurance and doubt. Midst the thousand fold, often chaotic impressions of world and life, he tried to find the ruling prime thought, the transcendental meaning. From his Faustian urge for knowledge, from his commotion by the misery of life, from his presentiment of ultimate harmony stemmed the spiritual agitation which poured from him in the shape of music. Change characterized Mahler's life ; constancy Bruckner's. In a certain sense, this is also true of their work. Bruckner sang of his God and for his God, Who ever and unalterably occupied his soul. Mahler struggled toward Him. Not constancy, but change ruled his inner life, hence also his music.

Thus, their work and their nature were in many respects akin, in many at variance. Yet, both belong to that wide, august circle of friends who never abandon us to languish in grief or solitude, but offer us solace in all pain. Theirs is a precious legacy that for all time belongs to us. Those friends are always present. Their spirits dwell in our book chests, music cabinets, in our memory, at our beck and call day and night. Our 2 Masters have long since been received into this circle because they continue the work which the great musicians of the past have left. Great was the difference between the 2, as I have shown ; but conjure-up one and the other is not very distant. Along with Bruckner's music (aside from the described more concrete connections) , there vibrates a secret Mahlerian undertone, just as in Mahler's work some intangible element is reminiscent of Bruckner. From this intuition of their transcendental kinship, it is clearly permissible to speak of « Bruckner and Mahler » ; therefore, it is possible that, despite the differences in their natures, despite the very incompatibility of important features of their work, my unqualified and unlimited love can belong to them both.

Alfred Mathis-Rosenzweig, « Gustav Mahler : New Insights into his Life, Times and Work » , translation, annotation and commentary by Jeremy Barham (Guildhall School of Music and Drama / Ashgate, 2007) . The relevant section covers pages 131 to 150.

This torso contains an account of Mahler's apprentice years in which Mathis-Rosenzweig offered a sharply critical, and, in some ways, penetrating, appraisal of Haas's Bruckner project. His basic position was that the 1st Bruckner collected works edition could not be understood outside of the larger context of Nazi cultural and musical propaganda. He emphasized the importance of the Nazis' determination to claim Bruckner as a German composer as part of a larger mission to subsume Austria's cultural and musical development into a larger narrative of « greater Germany » . Mathis-Rosenzweig also contended that Haas's edition was driven in part by a strong desire to claim the copyright of the Bruckner Symphonies away from Universal-Edition, a firm long despised by the Nazi movement, and whose Bruckner publications had received direct financial support from Mahler.

Mahler book gives interesting account of Bruckner's publications

(By John F. Berky)

I recently read an interesting book on Gustav Mahler written by Alfred Mathis-Rosenzweig (1897-1948) . His manuscript for this book, started in 1933 was thought to have been lost but was discovered at the Guildhall School, in 1997, and translated into English, in 2003. In the book, entitled « Gustav Mahler, New Insights into His Life and Work » , the author devotes a large section to Mahler's relationship with Bruckner and his dedication to performing his teacher's music. Further, Mathis-Rosenzweig describes how Mahler pressured Emil Hertzka, the founder of Universal-Edition, to buy-up all the publication rights to Bruckner's Symphonies since they were owned by several smaller publishing firms and recent mergers had made it next to impossible to get any of Bruckner's scores re-printed. Mahler even went so far as to contribute the royalties from his 1st 4 Symphonies to cover the cost of the re-publication of Bruckner's Symphonies which were becoming increasingly scarce. The author, then, delves into the National-Socialist's campaign against Universal-Edition and their condemnation of Bruckner's 1st published editions. Finally, he levels intense criticism at Robert Haas citing that as the editor of the new Bruckner-Edition, Haas should have prepared a detailed analysis of the preparation of Bruckner's scores for publication to help determine exactly what Bruckner had done and how the assistance by his associates and conductors were suggested and incorporated into the published editions. Instead, the author accuses Haas of becoming a public prosecutor of Bruckner's associates in his effort to discredit all of the 1st published editions. It is a fascinating analysis and a highly-recommended book.

Alfred Mathis-Rosenzweig (1897-1948) was a Viennese musicologist and critic who studied at the Universities of Budapest and Vienna. From 1933, he embarked on producing a large-scale study of Gustav Mahler but, at the time of his death, the manuscript was left unfinished. Although it was presumed lost until 1997, the unfinished typescript, written in German, had been deposited in the library of the Guildhall School of Music & Drama. In 2003, the School's Research Centre commissioned Jeremy Barham to prepare the 1st published edition of this important work, and his annotations and commentary add invaluable material to his translation of this historic document. Biographical material is used as a loose framework and platform for Mathis-Rosenzweig's profound examination of the environment within which Mahler's earlier music was embedded. This is an environment in which Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Hugo Wolf feature prominently, and in which Mahler's music is viewed from the wider perspective of 19th Century German cultural domination and the subsequent rise of political extremism in the form of Hitlerite fascism.

Alfred Rosenzweig (born on 21 August 1897 in Vienna ; died on 11 December 1948 in London) was a Viennese musicologist and critic who studied at the Universities of Budapest and Vienna (1918-1924) . His doctoral dissertation of 1923 « On the Historical Development of Richard Strauß's Music-Dramas » (« Zur Entwicklungsgeschichte des Richard Strauß'schen Musikdramas ») was examined by Guido Adler and Robert Lach. His work as a critic was undertaken mostly for « Der Wiener Tag » and it was in this paper that he published the article « How Mahler Planned his " 8th " » . The 1st Hand-written Sketch (« Wie Gustav Mahler seine " Achte " plante. Die erste handschriftliche Skizze ») which included a fac-simile of Mahler's little-known 4 movement design of the 8th Symphony and his personal dedication of it to his wife. This article marked the beginnings of Rosenzweig's work towards the production of a large-scale study of the composer. However, his subsequent flight from Austria during the regime of the 3rd « Reich » to England (where he went under the name of Alfred Mathis and began writing for « Music & Letters ») , combined with cardiac medical problems, prevented him from bringing his monumental plans to complete fruition. The typescript was left unfinished, although a substantial amount of the material had been committed to paper and, shortly before his death, Rosenzweig was known to have been in correspondence with Josef Bohuslav Færster (1859-1951) , the Czech composer and close friend of Mahler during his Hamburg and Vienna years, in order to elicit further information for the study. In a recent article by Vladimír Karbusický, a leading authority on Rosenzweig, the typescript is presumed to have been lost. Rosenzweig 1st met the pianist Edith Vogel (born on 1 December 1912 ; died on 15 January 1992) at a recital she gave in Vienna, at the age of 14. They later became lovers and fled Austria for England, separately, in the late- 1930's. Vogel taught at the Guildhall School of Music & Drama, in London (henceforth, Guildhall School) , from this time until shortly before her death. A substantial part of Vogel's Estate was bequeathed to the Guildhall School after the death of her husband, Herbert Jeffrey, in 1997. It was at this point that the « lost » typescript came to light. A draft English translation of the type-written text had been undertaken in close collaboration with Vogel by her acquaintance Laura Wallace, during the 1960's, and this is also to be found in the Rosenzweig collection. A brief report on the typescript together with some short, newly-translated, extracts were published by Herta Blaukopf of the « Internationale Gustav Mahler Gesellschaft » in : « News About Mahler Research » .With the exception of this, no part of the typescript has been publicly disseminated.

Translator's Note

While certain aspects of Rosenzweig's occasionally awkward style have been « improved » , some of his stylistic idiosyncrasies, such as beginning sentences with « And » , and a degree of repetitive phraseology, have been retained. With the exception of surnames, passages underlined by Rosenzweig are presented here in italics. All notes are editorial unless otherwise marked. Words or phrases that are of dubious or ambiguous meaning are translated, with the original German placed in square brackets immediately after. Rosenzweig consistently uses the terms « alldeutsch » and « großdeutsch » , which have been translated here as « pan-German » and « great-German » , respectively. Rosenzweig perceived the latter as an Austrian movement that included Georg von Schönerer and his followers, and effectively acted as an affiliate to Prussian pan-Germanism. To all intents and purposes, these terms define the same ideologies separated only by geographical boundaries.

Given both the difficulties of undertaking archival research in the years surrounding the Second World War and the, then, undeveloped state of Mahler scholarship, the impact of the purely biographical elements of Mathis Rosenzweig's study (which did not, in any case, progress very far) has now diminished, and some of his findings have been superseded in the work of later generations of writers (primarily, Henry-Louis de La Grange's multi-volume biography) . However, despite the declared intent of the 1st volume of the study to chart the life of the composer and, in view of the author's highly-charged political disposition, these biographical elements do not form the main content of the Introduction and initial Chapters of the text. Here, such material is instead used as a loose framework and platform for Mathis-Rosenzweig's profound examination of the late- 19th and turn-of-the-Century political and cultural environment within which Mahler's music was embedded. This is an environment in which Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Hugo Wolf feature prominently, and in which Mahler's music is viewed from the wider perspective of 19th Century German cultural domination and the subsequent rise of political extremism in the form of Hitlerite Fascism.

It is in these contexts, for example, that the nuances of the Mahler - Wagner relationship are examined by Mathis-Rosenzweig in the « Introduction and Attempt to Set-Out the Problem » by setting Mahler's early Wagner veneration against the later propagandist Bayreuth myths disseminated by Cosima Wagner, which contributed to her opposition to Mahler's appointment at the Vienna « Hofoper » . Further topics addressed in the Introduction include (i) the rarely discussed but related possibility of viewing Mahler as anti-Wagnerian rather than as epigone ; (ii) a critical assessment of the mid-Century condition of Mahler research and of the National-Socialists' « scholarly » reception of his music ; (iii) the historical placement of his music in a specifically Austrian, as opposed to German, Symphonic lineage ; (iv) an examination of the political developments of the Austro-Hungarian Empire in which Mahler grew-up ; (v) a subtle pre-Adornian reference to the applicability of the programme music aesthetic to Mahler's Symphonies ; (vi) a discussion of Arnold Schönberg's « Harmonielehre » as one of the earliest and greatest monuments constructed to Mahler ; and (vii) an assessment of the reasons for Mahler's unpopular reception in pre-War western Europe. Some of these ideas are taken-up and developed further in the 1st 2 chapters of the study. For example, the latter part of Chapter 1 (« The Bohemian homeland. Kalischt — Iglau ») deals with Mahler's profound spiritual and musical affiliation with the distinct, non-German culture of eastern Europe. It assesses Mahler's relationship with Bohemian-Moravian folk-music and with the music of Bedřich Smetana, Antonín Dvořák and Josef Bohuslav Fěrster - issues that have received only sporadic attention in the literature on the composer. It also confirms the hitherto unknown fact that, in 1901-1902, Mahler made extensive, albeit unfulfilled, plans to perform Dvořák's Opera « Rusalka » , in Vienna. The Rosenzweig Collection at the GSMD also contains copies of 7 previously unpublished letters addressed by, or on behalf of, Mahler to Dvořák, between May 1901 and May 1902, on this subject.

Chapter 2 (« Apprentice Years in Vienna (1875-1879) and their Aftermath ») is the most extensive section of the study in terms of both the depth of discussion and the range of topics addressed. These include (i) details of Mahler's early musical experiences as a boy in Iglau, including a letter from Mahler's father to Gustav Schwarz regarding his prospective study at the Vienna « Conservatoire » , which has not previously been published in the literature on the composer ; (ii) an account of the troubled relationship between Mahler and Wolf ; (iii) an analysis of the historical context and structural elements of the separate Austrian Symphonic lineage broached in the Introduction ; (iv) the influence of National-Socialist music propaganda on early British Mahler reception ; (v) the politicizing of the « New German School » through the force of Wagnerism ; (vi) the consequent ideological distortion of the music and figure of Bruckner ; (vii) associated difficulties pertaining to the early publication of Bruckner's Symphonies ; and (viii) the status of conductors' alterations to Bruckner's scores in performance. Other topics include discussion of the Wolf - Bruckner and Mahler - Bruckner relationships.

While Chapters 3 (« In the Lowlands of Day-to-Day Operatic Life ; 1880-1883 ») and 4 (« Kassel ; 1883-1885 ») contain a smaller quantity of material, the former includes substantial digressions on the political and racial aspects of Wagner's prose writings and an intriguing ideological comparison of Wagner and Verdi as a back-cloth to the outlook of the young Mahler. The latter Chapter includes brief discussions of the Brucknerian influence on Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » and 1st Symphony, and of the relation between Song and Symphony, together with a little-known review of the 1885 Kassel Music Festival directed by Mahler, which appeared in the short-lived journal « Parsifal » and which has not previously been published in the Mahler literature.

It is a matter of great regret, of course, that Mathis-Rosenzweig did not live long enough to complement the historical and cultural study presented in the extant typescript with the more detailed and specific musical analysis promised in subsequent Chapters. In addition to the biography (which, according to the author, was itself to be divided into 2 volumes : 1860-1897 and 1897-1911) , the 2nd of which would have included an analysis of his Operatic reforms in Vienna, and both of which would have discussed the works in systematic, chronological fashion - Mathis-Rosenzweig intended to devote separate Chapters, at the end of the 2nd volume, to (i) a study of Mahler's Symphonic structuring processes ; (ii) an examination of practical issues in the interpretation of the Symphonies with reference to the work of contemporary conductors such as Bruno Walter and Otto Klemperer ; and (iii) what would have been one of the earliest critiques of National-Socialist theories of « degenerate art » .

Nevertheless, the unique distinction of Mathis-Rosenzweig's typescript is due to the fact that it is over 50 years old and was written by an Austrian exile in England at a particularly momentous time in the history of the 20th Century, yet, during the nadir of the global understanding and exposure of Mahler's music. The provocative nature of its cultural critique of « great-German Imperialism » and National-Socialist thinking, so rare in the literature on Mahler, is both disconcerting and compelling. It can be seen from the above description and in the following translation that, despite its incomplete condition, the text is valuable not only for its wide-range of incisive cultural, historical and political insights, but also for its own status as a historical document. It offers intriguing interpretations of the reception history and cultural lineages of Mahler's and Bruckner's music, and contributes a highly-politicized dimension to the development of Mahler scholarship located chronologically between the personal testimony of early writers and subsequent objectivised theoretical and interpretative approaches. It should be noted, for example, that Mathis Rosenzweig's Foreword and Introduction were completed a mere 3 months after the conclusion of the War in Europe.

Mathis-Rosenzweig's uncommon and « untimely » awareness in 1945 of the historical, social and cultural importance of Mahler's music can be seen in retrospect to have been courageous, astute and, in fact, particularly well timed. Developments in the global political and social landscape during the subsequent half-Century nurtured cultural sensibilities in such a way that his remarkable predictions of the fate of Mahler's works have been vindicated to an extent that even he could scarcely have imagined.

Rosenzweig's text will, therefore, be of significant interest to scholars of Mahler, Wagner, Bruckner, Wolf, « fin-de-siècle » music in general, the political dimensions of musical historiography, 20th Century reception history in the arts (particularly that of the Austro-German musical repertoire) , the æsthetics of National-Socialist thinking, and the wider cultural politics of late- 19th to mid- 20th Century Europe.

At precisely the same time as the great factional struggles around Richard Wagner were raging most violently in Vienna, when the politico-cultural centre of gravity had shifted from Vienna to Berlin and Wagner's music had engulfed the Austrian world like a storm flood burying the proud edifice of Vienna's great 18th Century Operatic tradition, and when Hector Berlioz and Franz Liszt stood at their most dazzling in the public spotlight as the renewers and creators of a new Symphonic art form, the activities of Bruckner had begun in the tranquillity of the Upper-Austrian countryside, far away from the tumult of the wider-world.

It had taken decades for the hitherto unrealized new Symphonic « Will to Form », heralded so promisingly in the work of Franz Schubert, to be given a new lease of life by an Austrian musician who was exactly 3 and a half years old when Schubert died. 1 and a half years later, it transpired that, in the tiny hamlet of Ansfelden, Anton Bruckner's birthplace, the 5 year old boy was called to the death-bed of the 77 year old local priest because he wanted, once more, to bless the one « whose truthfulness and sensitivity (“ Ergriffensein ”) before God deserved his special praise », the « one chosen from the large number of children in the village ». Then, the school teacher's son from Ansfelden, who was already accompanying the singing in the local church at the age of 11, made his ascent to choir boy in the Benedictine Abbey of Saint-Florian, to school teacher, to organist, and to composition pupil of the famous music theorist Simon Sechter, in Vienna, whose instruction Bruckner enjoyed for a full 6 years until he had himself attained an unparalleled virtuosity in the command of counterpoint and fugal composition. He was 36 years old and held the respected position of Cathedral organist in Linz but was not yet aware of his vocation. During this time, he became acquainted with the score of Richard Wagner's « Tannhäuser » through Otto Kitzler, conductor at the Municipal Theatre in Linz, and this was an overwhelming experience for a man who, until then, had heard almost nothing but church music. Now, he realized that, though he was a Master on the organ and in counterpoint, he would have to become a student, once again, in order to study the Classical Masters, composition and orchestration. After 2 years of further study, the final obstacles that had barred the way to the full-development of his genius were overcome and, at the age of 40, Bruckner wrote his 1st great Masterpiece, the Mass in D minor, composed for the consecration of the New Cathedral (« Neuer Dom ») in Linz and 1st performed there, on 20 November 1864, under his personal direction. Later, Bruckner conducted the work again, in the concert-hall, after which only a few more performances took place in church. The next performance was given exactly 29 years later, on 31 March 1893, in a concert-hall - this time, in Hamburg, and conducted by Gustav Mahler.

After the Mass, however, Bruckner began to wrestle compositionally with Symphonic form and, between 1865 and his death in 1896, his 9 great Symphonies appeared, although he did not live to finish the last of these, completing only the 1st 3 movements of this mighty work and leaving sketches of the Finale.

How did it come about, then, that Bruckner the Upper-Austrian rustic, recumbent in his own special world of organ sounds and Eucharistic splendour, and who had humbly devoted himself to music in order to lend elaborate expression to his feelings of intense mystical inspiration in the face of God, was dragged into the party struggles of a Romantic age completely alien to him to such a degree that arguments continually raged about his life's work as a Symphonist, which, re-inforced with every new intervention, created a Bruckner controversy that has lasted until the present day ? The event that apparently brought this about began in the summer of 1865 when Bruckner travelled to Munich to attend the 1st performance of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde », which was to take place on 15 May. Since the premiere had to be postponed until 10 June, however, Bruckner had the opportunity to come into contact with Wagner and Hans von Bülow. By that time, he had completed the 1st 2 movements of his Symphony in C minor and he took the manuscript to Munich with him to continue the work, during which, according to his own assertion, as a result of studying Wagner's music he « felt like a chained dog which had broken free ». The deep love and humblest reverence felt for Wagner by Bruckner and expressed in touchingly naive ways declared itself, thus. But despite every encouragement, he could not yet be persuaded to meet Wagner face to face and he would never have dared to show Wagner the manuscript of his Symphony. Nevertheless, according to his biographer August Göllerich, Bruckner played the 2 completed movements and the Scherzo of the Symphony, written during this time in Munich, to Hans von Bülow who was completely astonished by the music of this completely unknown talent. Several times, he exclaimed :

« How magnificent ! » , and then : « How daring of you ! This is so dramatic ! » whereupon Bruckner merely said :

« It's of no consequence. » (« Dös is' ganz gleich. »)

According to Göllerich, Wagner came in straight after this, and, as Bülow excitedly reported his impressions, said :

« You must show it to me too. »

But the horrified Bruckner refused to do this, later commenting that he did not dare to play Wagner his Symphony.

Von Bülow's favourable opinion of Bruckner's musical abilities appears to have made an impression on Wagner. For when Bruckner, who additionally held the post of director of the Linz Choral Society « Frohsinn » , approached Wagner, some years later, with the request to have a work of his for male choir performed at a great Festival concert given by the Society, Wagner replied in a very cordial letter, on 31 January 1868, pointing-out that although a work for male voices was hard to find amongst his « œuvre » , since Bruckner had informed him that the Festival concert included Orchestra and a female choir :

« I believe I can draw your attention to something very appropriate : the final chorus of my latest dramatic work, " Die Meistersinger ". The score of the 3rd Act should be ready by now, so that you may be able to obtain at least a proof-sheet of this final chorus. I look forward with pleasure to further information. I warmly reciprocate your kind sentiments and remain respectfully your faithful,

Richard Wagner »

The « Frohsinn » Choral Society gave the premiere of the final chorus of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » in the Festival concert that took place on 4 April 1868 - that is, 3 months before the premiere of the whole work in Munich, on 21 June ; and, from that day on, Bruckner was considered a favourite of the Master by the Austrian Wagner Party and, in particular, by the Wagner Societies. After that, Bruckner's cause became the concern of all Wagnerian organizations and, accordingly, opposition to Bruckner became the battle-cry of the conservative faction that had set Brahms up as a rival king on the escutcheon.

It was then that the misrepresentation and ideological distortion of Bruckner, the man and the musician, began - something that he had to put-up with from friends as well as from opponents. The misrepresentation on the part of Eduard Hanslick, who described Bruckner's works as « giant Symphonic serpents » in one of his articles, or on the part of Johannes Brahms who coined the phrase « Bruckner swindle » (« Bruckner-Schwindel ») was no worse than the misrepresentation on the part of one of his oldest students and disciples, Josef Schalk, who wrote a Nordic mythological commentary to the 8th Symphony. All tried to account for him, in terms of some kind of dependence on different aspects of his environment : on Wagner or on a fusty clericalism to which he had been subjected during a youth spent in lowly positions within the provincial world of an Upper-Austria dominated by episcopal rule. There was hardly anyone who tried to experience and understand Bruckner from the point of view of his « independence » from the cultural mindset of his Romantic surroundings. At best, those closest to him recognized, as the saying went, that the Holy-Trinity for Bruckner consisted of the loving God, his patron the Bishop of Linz, and Richard Wagner. They knew that, for Bruckner, Wagner was above all the great innovator of musical language whose harmony and orchestral palette he made his own. The majority nevertheless believed that this was an end in itself, and did not see that Bruckner took-up the Romantic musical language of his time only in order to master it technically and to create something new from his profoundly individual artistic sensibility, something that, at the same time, represented « the fulfilment and the surpassing of Romantic artistic principles » . Even in the periods between his laborious work, when the man who could only fully express himself in his music indulged in relaxed conversation with his students and followers mostly about his compositions, some of his innocent remarks contributed to the misunderstandings that attached themselves to his name and his work. For example, when he described the famous horn motif at the beginning of his 4th Symphony in E-flat major as the solemn call with which the New Year was heralded from the tower in mediæval Linz, such a remark circulated all the way to the opposing camp. Then, the claim was repeatedly made that his Symphonies were an incoherent combination of Wagnerian tone-paintings - bombastic, extravagant and not even fulfilling the most basic demands of structure and design.

Even by this time, only very few (and the young Mahler may certainly be counted amongst this close circle of chosen ones) were able to see clearly that the principle of realistic tone-painting that played such a significant role in Wagner's music-dramas and in the programme music of Hector Berlioz and Franz Liszt, could offer no conclusive answer to Bruckner, the Symphonist, and that, on the contrary, « Bruckner's main strength was the architectonic element : the formal design of his Symphonies » . For though Wagner's nature motifs, set above an undercurrent of delicate string tremolos, are a characteristic feature of Bruckner's Symphonic themes, and though Bruckner's orchestral palette, in part, contains Wagnerian sound effects, these are only isolated aspects of a Symphonic practice that drew the source of its power from 2 quite different worlds : the world of organ sonorities filling the domes of the 2 Baroque churches of Saint-Florian and Linz, so intimately bound-up with Bruckner's life ; one moment with gentle atmospheric tones, the next with majestic peals ; and the world of the « Austrian country-side » pulsating with the torrid, earthbound life of its people in sturdy, native dance rhythms but also replete with that magical lyricism whose mood found its immortal expression in the music of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert.

As Schubert's successor, Bruckner imparted to music something of great significance and profundity out of this Austrian world : « an architectonic development of the post-Classical Symphony » , which Beethoven himself had already foreshadowed in the formal experiments of his 9th, and to which Schubert's work had pointed the way with prophetic genius. It was Bruckner's destiny and vocation to travel further down this path and to open it up more and more through his intensive struggle from one work to the next, until Mahler was able to continue along it and lead across into the border regions where the music of the post-Romantic era ebbed away.

Therefore, alongside the post-Classical Symphony's 2 lines of development as interpreted by Paul Bekker, who traced these connections for the 1st time in his book, « Gustav Mahlers Sinfonien » (1921) , the Leipzig circle of « middle-German Symphonists » : Mendelssohn, Schumann and Brahms ; and the Weimar circle of « New German programme Symphonists » centred on Liszt. A 3rd line of development emerges that, alone, took-up the problem of furthering the architectonic development of the post-Classical Symphony and offered a decisive solution : the « Austrian Finale-Symphonists : Schubert, Bruckner and Mahler » .

... from the spiritual revival, following the wars of freedom against Napoleon and foreign domination by the French. In fact, for many the radical artistic nature of the « New German School » allowed German nationalism to continue to appear in a favourable light even at a time when it had long since lost all radical qualities in the « German misery » following the defeat of the 1848 Revolution, and had become the principal basis for reactionary Prussian-Hohenzollern Imperialism. The struggles for and against Richard Wagner and the « New German School » that took place during Mahler's youth, in an Austria up-rooted by national conflicts, must be viewed in this light : it was a battle for and against the artistic ambassadors of a Prussian Imperialism, which was vastly strengthened after the victorious war of conquest against France, viewed the decaying Habsburg Empire as its sphere of influence, and was passionately celebrated by the great-Germans and by the Pan-German politician Georg Ritter von Schönerer's « Free from Rome » movement. They considered the Habsburgs no longer capable of maintaining the German « Master race's » vulnerable position of supremacy over those other peoples of the Dual Monarchy who were awakening into national self-awareness and who were, in turn, vehemently opposed by the Liberal « bourgeoisie » who had secured useful economic positions for themselves during the period of rapid Capitalist expansion in Austro-Hungary. The degree to which these Party struggles involved the erection of artificial barriers not only is shown by the large number of Wagner disciples amongst the circles of « radical » Austrian Jews who unreservedly recognized the genius as well as the artistic and politico-cultural revolutionary in him (long after he had become a renegade and had devoted himself to Heinrich Gotthard von Treitschke (nationalist German historian, political writer and National Liberal member of the « Reichstag » during the time of the German Empire) and to the racial doctrine of Count Joseph Arthur de Gobineau) but, also, is demonstrated by the identification of the Austrian Symphonist Anton Bruckner with the affairs of the Wagner Party and the « New German School » .

The 15 year old Gustav Mahler, then, was officially enrolled in autumn 1875 as a student at the Vienna « Conservatoire » of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » which, since 1851, had been under the directorship of Josef Hellmesberger. According to the institution's register, Mahler had the following teachers in his principal subjects :

Professor Julius Epstein (piano) ; Professor Robert Fuchs (harmony) ; and Professor Theodor Krenn (counterpoint and composition) . The extraordinary talents of the new student seemed to have been recognized, at once. For, passing over the preliminary classes, Mahler was admitted into Epstein's 1st piano instruction class and, alongside harmony tuition, he received lessons in counterpoint and composition straight away, which was not normal institutional procedure. Mahler must already have produced work of his own whose standard led to such high-estimation of his abilities. Of these teachers, Mahler seems to have been closest to Epstein, for the published letters contain 2 very affectionate ones to this man : one, undated, from Iglau, which must be from 1877, since he mentions passing his matriculation at the school, there. Mahler informs Epstein that he arrived in Iglau several days too late for the end of term, so that he had to postpone his leaving examination until the autumn. He nevertheless hoped to carry-out the holiday task set by Epstein to his full satisfaction. The letter opens with the following words, which indicate the truly cordial relationship that existed between teacher and pupil :

« My dear and revered Master,

You cannot imagine the joy that your esteemed letter has given me ; I really do not know what to say in gratitude for so much kindness. But, even if I were to write page after page in the attempt to express my thanks, it would not amount to anything but : “ How I very like you. ” Let me assure you, this is not just empty talk, but something I really and truly mean. »

Mahler stayed in correspondence with Epstein, long after leaving the « Conservatoire » . For example, he wrote to him from Kassel about the great music Festival he was directing, at the end of his term as conductor, in nearby Münden, asking him to make information about the Festival known in Vienna. Epstein often spoke about his student Mahler, and made no secret of his preference for him. There was also no doubt that Mahler's extraordinary piano playing, which caused a sensation wherever he went, bore eloquent witness to Epstein's teaching abilities. After 1 year at the « Conservatoire » , Mahler won the 1st prize in piano playing at the « end of year » concert for his performance of the 1st movement of Franz Schubert's Sonata in A minor (probably, the Opus 42 - 0845) and, in his 2nd year, again a 1st prize for his performance of Robert Schumann's « Humoreske » . In 1884, Mahler himself admitted to his friend Friedrich Löhr (1859-1924) that, 5 or 6 years earlier, he had certainly been a more able pianist. Löhr described in detail Mahler's piano playing when the composer visited him in Perchtoldsdorf, in 1884 :

« 2 things occupied the foreground in those days, in Perchtoldsdorf : our walks and music, many hours of music. The windows of my room, on the 1st floor of the “ Eder-Haus ” on the market place, were kept closed, despite the summer heat, and, yet, there were always people standing outside, listening.

How few people there are today who know what it meant then to hear Mahler at the piano ! I have never before or since heard such de-materialization of the human, the technical process. Mahler rose inexpressibly above what his hands did. He could never have given an account of how he achieved what he did ; every thought of technical difficulty was utterly cancelled-out ; all was disembodied, purely contemplative, passionately and spiritually concentrated on all that, without conscious physical contact, passed from the keys into his being. In a way, all his own comprehending it with the energy and accomplishment of genius, bringing-out every nuance, every shade of expression, he caused the music to ring-out with all the force with which it had gushed forth from the soul of its creator. In Beethoven's Sonata Opus 111 (No. 32) , for instance, the storm at the beginning broke-out in a terrible " mæstoso ", shatteringly intense, with a wild ferocity such as I have never heard again ; and, similarly, the Finale faded-out, pure, utterly luminous, in loveliest beauty, softly and softlier still, from closest touch with this earth out into eternity.

Yet, what can words convey of how his playing affected one ? I am simply awed by the exalted happiness that was granted to me thinking back now to what Mahler gave me, the sole listener, in those years : all Beethoven's Sonatas, Bach's " Wohltemperiertes Klavier ", and many another work of that most beloved Master, and yet more, such as, one unforgettable afternoon in the long-house next to the " Karlskirche " (in Vienna) , where Mahler was lodging at the time, the whole of Beethoven's " Missa solemnis " played right through without a break. Not long after this, Mahler lost interest in playing the piano and, particularly, works written for the piano, since he had become accustomed to mastering the Orchestra, in that same way. But anyone who, in those early days, heard him at the piano, in the truest sense of the word reproducing the music, understood him, and what he could do, and his early destiny as a conductor.

We have far less accurate information about Mahler's beginnings as a composer. Teachers and fellow students alike were full of admiration for the wealth of ideas in the compositions of Mahler's youth, most of which he destroyed himself. Of these early works, the Scherzo of a Piano Quintet and a Violin Sonata were performed in public, in « end of term » concerts at the « Conservatoire » . The Scherzo of the Piano Quintet, played at the end of the 1875-1876 academic year, won Mahler the 1st prize for composition. In the following year, while he took part again in the piano competition and, as already mentioned, won 1st prize for his performance of the Schumann « Humoreske » , he declined to enter the composition competition. In his 3rd and final year, 1877-1878, he withdrew from the piano competition but took part in the composition competition. The fact that, on this occasion, his Violin Sonata was played, one of his earlier and weaker student works, was not Mahler's fault but happened entirely against his will.

This incident, whose background was revealed for the 1st time in Natalie Bauer-Lechner's interesting book, « Recollections of Gustav Mahler » , sheds a very clear light on his apprentice years at the Vienna « Conservatoire » and how the young Mahler stamped his personality on his relationship with teachers and fellow students. Having said before that both teachers and fellow students were full of admiration for the wealth of ideas in Mahler's youthful compositions which he, himself, thought little of and destroyed, it must be added that the main reason for this admiration was the fact that he attended the « Conservatoire » classes in harmony, counterpoint and composition with Professors Fuchs and Krenn only very irregularly and, yet, always had brilliant command of all these subjects.

« Mahler always played truant and, yet, there was nothing he couldn't do. » , said Fuchs when questioned by Alma Mahler.

It was unanimously reported in all contemporary sources that Mahler was called « the new Schubert » by all his colleagues.

Mahler was reproached for taking passages differently from the usual practice, he used to retort impatiently :

« What is called tradition is usually an excuse for slovenliness (“ Schlämperei ”) . »

Of course, he did not mean the « tradition » that emerges from the style of an artwork and is necessary for its interpretation, but rather the entrenched interpretations and « clichés » resulting from the indifference and slovenliness of everyday activity to which the musical « lovers of routine » (« Routiniers ») and the public had grown unthinkingly accustomed.

It would be wrong, however, to suppose that poverty completely prevented the young Mahler and his 2 room-mates from attending musical events. After all, there were the reduced student tickets available for a few « Kreuzer » that enabled students of the University, the technical « Hochschule » and the « Conservatoire » to visit the standing-room area or the fourth gallery of the Vienna Hofoper, and the « Conservatoire » additionally received free tickets that it could distribute for almost all musical events. A trip to the Opera was nonetheless a great occasion in the life of the 3 young music students. Alma Mahler reports in her memoirs how the 3 discovered Richard Wagner’s « Götterdämmerung » together and, drunk with passion in their room after the performance, they burst into the trio of Günther, Brünnhilde and Hagen. It was such an almighty din that the enraged landlady gave them notice on the spot and would not budge until they had packed their belongings and vacated the room.

The early friendship between Mahler and Wolf had a tragic ending. The 1st seeds of discord sprang from an artistic proposal that Wolf talked-over with Mahler. Wolf had the idea, long before Engelbert Humperdinck composed « Hänsel und Gretel » , of writing a fairy-tale Opera. They discussed this in detail, mulling over numerous subjects and, finally, deciding that a setting of the fairy-tale « Rübezahl » would be most suitable. Mahler was so enthusiastic about the idea that he drafted a scenario that same evening, even completing a libretto, which he showed Wolf straight away. But Wolf had had a different idea altogether : he considered the plan for such a fairy-tale Opera to be his exclusive intellectual property and felt cheated by Mahler’s action. He also had begun work on « Rübezahl » , in the meantime, but, now, the idea had been spoilt for him. He gave it up, while Mahler continued working on it, until by 1882, he had set most of the text, though he was never to finish it. Almost all the Mahler literature agrees that, together with the manuscripts of his other juvenilia, including the Piano Quintet, Violin Sonata, the Operas « Herzog Ernst von Schwaben » and « Die Argonauten » (whose text was drawn-up in alliterative verse) , the « Nordic Symphony » and other sketches for orchestral works, « Rübezahl » was destroyed on Mahler’s instructions. However, Alma Mahler reports in her memoirs that Mahler’s sister, Justine, secretly preserved the manuscript of « Rübezahl » and, once out of curiosity, even showed it to the stage-designer Alfred Roller, Mahler’s closest collaborator at the Vienna Opera. When Roller casually remarked :

« “ Justi ” gave me a youthful work of Mahler’s to read yesterday » , Mahler was deeply shocked and very embarrassed that Roller, so scrupulous in artistic matters, had managed to see one of the early works that he, himself, had disowned. This led to a serious dispute between brother and sister. Justine swore that she had burned the manuscript in the presence of her husband, Arnold Rosé, but Mahler would not believe her and threatened to leave for America without saying goodbye to her. Shortly before Mahler’s departure for New York, in 1908, Justine admitted to her sister-in-law, Alma, that she had not burned the « Rübezahl » manuscript, but had « sent it after him the moment he had left (for Bremen) » where he would find it waiting for him, before boarding the ship at Cuxhaven. Whether Mahler received the manuscript in this way, or whether he destroyed it, or preserved it after all, is not reported in Alma's memoirs. There can be no doubt, however, that, even in later years, Mahler must have thought something of his libretto for « Rübezahl » for, in spring 1896, he wrote to his composer and musicologist friend Max Marschalk (music correspondent for the « Vossische Zeitung » since 1895, whose Operas « In Flammen » , « Lobetanz » and « Wichtelchen » interested Mahler) that he would bring the libretto of his early Opera « Rübezahl » with him, on his next trip to Berlin. At the time, Marschalk was looking for suitable material for a fairy-tale Opera, but could not warm to Mahler's text, not that the latter thought badly of this :

« Do not waste another thought on poor “ Rübezahl ” » , wrote Mahler to Marschalk, in May 1896 :

« I have quite grown-out of him, by now. It was just one of those momentary impulses that caused me to look it out from among my papers for you. I can quite imagine that you (coming to it with a fresh eye) also cannot warm-up to that flight of youthful fancy. »

The correspondence with Marschalk, incidentally, reveals a characteristic of Mahler's that was to have a decisive effect on the relationship with his early friend Wolf : his inability to approve completely of a musical work without being in profound spiritual harmony with the personality of its creator. The uncompromising honesty and integrity displayed by Mahler here is remarkable. He was not afraid of explaining in a completely straight forward manner to the powerful music-critic, a keen supporter of Mahler as composer, what was wrong with his Operas ; he wanted to stimulate and improve him through his criticism. And when Marschalk, who fully appreciated this, once wrote to Mahler that he should not be concerned that any criticism of his, however negative, could change anything in his own positive opinion of Mahler's music, the latter admitted the following in a letter from Hamburg, dated 24 April 1896 :

« Dear Friend,

In haste, another emendation ! From the very beginning, I assumed that any adverse criticism of your work on my part would not alter your opinion of my ability ! And this being so, I should never have hesitated (whatever the risk) to open my mind to you with complete candour. But, believe me, as a man of greater experience : a close relationship between 2 people is endangered in the long-run if one of them has to take a negative, i.e. “ uncomprehending ”, attitude to the other's work. For what, basically, does “ I do not like it ” mean other than “ I do not understand it ” ?

That Mahler offered the « Rübezahl » text to his friend Marschalk may, perhaps, have been an unconscious reaction to the experience of losing Wolf's friendship over the same work. In fact, Wolf had never forgiven him for appropriating the « Rübezahl » idea. The friendship between Mahler and Wolf gradually cooled, not least because of Wolf's eccentric, over-excitabile nature, but also no doubt because of his increasing sympathy for the great-German and anti-Semitic Wagner movement. Yet, one cannot reproach Wolf for having brushed Mahler aside in the face of the anti-Semites. There were things that united them, over and above all, that divided them : their boundless enthusiasm for Wagner and their deep love of Bruckner, whom Wolf got to know personally, a few years later, than Mahler. It was somewhat symbolic when, after a separation of several years, the 2 former friends met each other on the Festival hill, in Bayreuth, before the performance of « Parsifal », passing each other with but a curt greeting. Memories of Wolf during his student years in Vienna, nevertheless, remained fresh for Mahler many years later in terms of the latter's remark that he would only give-up his independence and accept a post « when he was appointed God of the Southern Zones ». Bruno Walter reported in his book of recollections that, during Mahler's period at the Hamburg Theatre, he inexpressibly longed for « his familiar Vienna and its incomparable musical climate ». When the door-bell rang, he often used to call-out :

« Here comes my appointment as the God of the Southern Zones ! »

That was in 1895 and it would take another 2 years for his wish to be fulfilled.

To begin with, Wolf enthusiastically welcomed Mahler's appointment at the Vienna « Hofoper », on artistic and personal grounds, and had great hopes for it. Just 3 weeks after the famous « Lohengrin » performance, on 11 May 1897 (Mahler's 1st appearance on the podium of the Vienna Opera), Wolf reported to his mother in a letter of 4 June 1897 that his Opera « Der Corregidor » would certainly be performed in the coming season. Wolf wrote :

« Today, I received explicit assurance from the new conductor Mahler (an old friend of mine) . He is now all-powerful at the Vienna Opera. He, himself, is going to rehearse and conduct my work, which is all the more acceptable to me because Mahler is more capable than anyone else of familiarizing himself with my artistic intentions. »

Early in the new season, after the summer holidays, when Mahler conducted the complete « Ring » cycle for the 1st time - an event that sent the whole of Vienna into raptures, and even had to be recognized by the Austrian Wagner faction (mobilized against Mahler by Hans Richter because, unlike Richter, he no longer permitted the cuts that were usually made in Vienna) - Wolf wrote an enthusiastic critique in the « Wiener Salonblatt » of 25 August 1897, saying amongst other things :

« Here, as in the whole of the “ Ring ”, we were allowed to hear what we have never heard before and had already given-up on, other than seeing in the score. »

Wolf expressed similar enthusiasm about Mahler's performance as conductor of the « Ring » tetralogy in a letter to Paul Müller of 1 September 1897, in which he prophesied that the Viennese performances of Wagner's works would soon become the model for all other Opera Houses, and that one had Mahler to thank for all this because he had truly put an end to the old sloppy routine.

The final break between Wolf and Mahler that took place just a few weeks later, in all probability on 16 or 17 September 1897, was therefore all the more tragically affecting. While he was in the middle of working on his 2nd Opera, « Manuel Venegas », Wolf sent a letter on 15 September to his friend Michæl Haberlandt in which he described his creative fervour in high-flown language already bordering on insanity, and asked for his immediate visit so that he could play him the new work. Haberlandt found Wolf in a disturbing state of extreme excitation. To please Wolf, he promised to arrange a party on one of the coming Sundays at friends of theirs, in Mödling, where he could play the music of « Manuel Venegas » , for the 1st time, to a group of his closest associates.

Either on the same day or the day after, Wolf presented himself to Mahler at the « Hofoper » in this intense and clearly highly-agitated mood. Mahler welcomed his former friend and room-mate into his office. Never did the contrasts between the 2 stand-out more markedly and alarmingly : Mahler having risen brilliantly to reach the height of his achievements and career ; and Wolf, pale and emaciated with a crazed look in his eye. What, then, actually transpired between the 2 great artists (both as, yet, unknown composers struggling for recognition) has been reported in various conflicting versions depending on whether the source in question represents Wolf's or Mahler's viewpoint. Of course, it was chiefly Wolf's friends, filled with excessive hatred for Mahler, who strove in words and print to blame him for Wolf's outbreak of madness. Since Wolf was no longer in a position to care for himself after the onset of his brain condition, which was quickly revealed to be paralysis, his friends, having founded the « Hugo Wolf Society » in 1895, in Vienna, paid for his maintenance in an asylum and looked after the interests of his works. The treasurer of the « Hugo Wolf Society » , which was closely connected to the Wagner Society, was the well-known jeweller Theodor Köchert at whose Estate, « Puchschacher » near Traunkirchen, Wolf had often stayed. Köchert was a radical great-German and anti-Semite who would later exercise a disastrous influence in Republican Austria on the transformation of the Vienna « Concert-Hall Society » (« Mener Konzerthausgesellschaft » , of which he was president) into a cleverly disguised illegal Nazi organization. One can imagine the kind of smear campaign that was carried-out on the part of the « Hugo Wolf Society » against Mahler, the Opera director.

In his book, « Der Hugo Wolf-Verein in Wien » , Heinrich Werner described as follows how the last meeting between Mahler and the already deranged composer is supposed to have gone according to Wolf's information :

« In the middle of his work on “ Manuel Venegas ”, that is, in a typical state of creative excitement, Wolf looked for Mahler in the “ Hofoper ” and found the score of Rubinstein's “ Dämon ” , lying open on his desk. The 2 of them fell into an argument about the merits of this Opera, during which Mahler appears to have made some “ less-than-complimentary ” remarks about “ Corregidor ” , casting serious doubt on a performance in the immediate future. Extremely agitated by this latest disappointment, an embittered Wolf left the Director's office, and that horrifically insane idea which was never to leave hold of him stuck its iron claws into his vengeful mind : he, himself, had become the director of the Opera and would drive Mahler away in disgrace. »

... opposition to his work at the Opera, but also led to Wolf universally going down in history as a martyr, as a victim of the Opera director Mahler who drove him to insanity. This has always been viewed in the various publications purely from the standpoint of the Wolf party.

Conclusive proof that Alma Mahler's account is not only credible but, also, the only correct and feasible one is shown by new material on the mentally ill Hugo Wolf published by Robert Hernried in the January 1940 and January 1945 issues of the American music journal, « The Musical Quarterly » . For the sake of brevity, we will refer to the 2nd of the 2 studies, which appeared in this journal under the title, « Hugo Wolf's “ 4 Operas ” » , with Unpublished Letters from Hugo Wolf, Rosa Mayreder and Oskar Grohe. Hernried remarked, by way of introduction, that although we regard

Wolf songs above all as the most valuable and characteristic part of his output, he nevertheless clung fanatically to his Operatic plans, the 1st performance of his Opera « Der Corregidor » in Mannheim, on 7 June 1896, representing for him the high-point of his compositional career. Herfried then continued :

« Basing my account on unpublished letters, I have described in some detail (in the January 1940 issue of “ The Musical Quarterly ”) how passionate, how arrogant, and therefore unrestrained, the fervid artist’s behaviour was on the occasion of the Opera’s premiere. It was not as a petitioner that he approached Director (Intendant) Bassermann ; instead (with his friend Judge Oskar Grohe always acting as intermediary) , he insisted on his rights in a way that is truly astounding. Thus, on April 26, 1896, he wrote to Grohe :

“ If the work is not definitely to be performed on May 22, but only on 31 May, I shall not appear at the premiere. I wish to be notified before May 12. ” »

The demand, so emphatically expressed by Hugo Wolf, that his Opera had to be performed on 22 May without fail and not a mere 9 days later, is connected to the fact that the birthday of his beloved Richard Wagner fell on 22 May. Without regard for whether this was compatible with the technical preparations for the premiere of the Opera, Wolf entrusted his go-between with a dictatorial demand to the director of the Mannheim Theatre that was simply impossible to fulfil. « Der Corregidor » could be staged neither on 22 May nor even on the date proposed by the Theatre (31 May) , but only on 7 June. Fortunately, Oskar Grohe seems to have recognized that, passing on Wolf completely unjustified demand to the Intendant Bassermann, would have led to its certain rejection and, perhaps, even to a serious conflict with the management of the Mannheim Theatre. So, he intervened and managed to pacify the composer who, even then, was no longer in complete control of his senses.

1 year later, in September 1897, when Wolf stood face to face with Mahler in the director’s office in the Vienna Opera, the situation was essentially the same, only the favourable conditions that, in Mannheim, had led to an amicable settlement of the matter were lacking : the mental illness, diagnosed long before by an ophthalmologist who was removing a small grain of coal dust from Wolf’s eye, had meanwhile progressed ; friends who could, perhaps, have calmed him down were not present ; furthermore, Mahler was not just some theatre director unknown to him in a distant town like Mannheim but a former friend of his youth and, also, a composer himself, so that an element of jealousy was involved which, according to Max Auer in his biography of Bruckner, dogged Wolf even in his relationship with the old Master he loved. It is, therefore, a tendentious falsifying of the facts on the part of Heinrich Werner and the Wolf faction not to admit openly that, right at the beginning of the conversation, Wolf imperiously made the unrealistic and quite unreasonable demand for an « immediate » performance of « Der Corregidor » at the Vienna Opera.

At this point, the relations between Mahler and Wolf need to be examined in more detail because, as previously mentioned in connection with Marschall, they show a certain side of Mahler’s nature that was strongly marked from his earliest youth until the end of his life : « his uncompromising integrity in matters of artistic conviction » . Just as he was able unhesitatingly to sacrifice the performance of his early Symphony by the « Conservatoire » student Orchestra, because the favouring of his own work over what he considered to be the better and more valuable work of his fellow student and friend, Hans Rott, seemed to him unfair (something that he even dared say openly to director Hellmesberger) , so equally he could not, against his better judgement, perform a work such as Wolf's « Der Corregidor » , which he thought weak, at a time when a bad failure would jeopardize his substantial and far-reaching plans for reform of the Opera. It has already been suggested that the human dimension played a specific part in this. Certainly, he was an old friend of Wolf's, and Wolf was well aware of this. But he knew Wolf « too well » . He was the complete opposite to Hugo Wolf - as song composer and as Symphonist. Just as Mahler privately rejected Wolf's Opera « Der Corregidor » , so he also rejected his songs in spite of their magnificent qualities, because their basic formal principles did not correspond with his own. If Wolf called his song-books « little Operas » when they consisted entirely of settings of a single poet's work, then, his Opera « Der Corregidor » was not stage-music but a song-book full of exquisite melodic flowerings. As lyricists, both Wolf and Mahler took Franz Schubert as their starting-point. They each chose a particular type of Schubert song as their compositional model, extending it and taking it to its highest-level of perfection : Wolf took the type of « declamatory » song in which the voice is completely subordinated to speech rhythms while the essential musical content is determined by the colouristic formulation of the accompaniment ; Mahler took the « through-composed » song that had already been significantly developed by Robert Schumann, and now, in his hands, was expanded into the Symphonic. In contrast to Wolf's, his melodic writing is not primarily adapted to the accents of speech but grows-out of the changing moods and emotional content of the poetry.

The human and ideological opposition between Hugo Wolf and Gustav Mahler is revealed most clearly in their attitude towards Anton Bruckner, then, a teacher at the Vienna « Conservatoire » and still the subject of controversy as a composer. Mahler was already a member of Bruckner's closest circle as a « Conservatoire » student in the mid-1870's, while Wolf first met him, in 1884, at the Feast of « Corpus Christi » , in Klosterneuburg. From January of that year, Wolf had begun to produce his famous music-criticisms in the « Wiener Salonblatt » and, on 28 December 1884, his first impassioned critique appeared of a semi-public concert in which Ferdinand Löwe and Josef Schalk performed parts of Bruckner's Symphonies as a piano duet. Although Wolf expressly highlights Bruckner's originality and inventiveness, and compares the wealth of his imagination and the quality of his inspiration with George Crabbe, even William Shakespeare, he could not help but comment on the lack of continuity and the « formlessness of the development » which meant that the consistently « glorious ideas » did not support that masterful kind of structure that was admired so much in Beethoven.

From then on, however, fanfare upon fanfare for Bruckner issued from Wolf's pen in the « Salonblatt » , together with simultaneous unrestrained attacks on Johannes Brahms. Wolf promoted Bruckner as representative of the « New German School » centred around Richard Wagner and Franz Liszt, in the same way that the Wagner Society tirelessly promoted the works of Bruckner and Wolf in its meetings, particularly from 1887, when Bruckner's student Josef Schalk took-over as its director. About the time that Wolf began to write about Bruckner, at the end of 1884, the latter enjoyed a conspicuously favourable turn in his fortunes through his first great success : the first performance in Leipzig of his 7th Symphony under the direction of his student, Arthur Nikisch. Now, the spell had been broken ; Wolf could bang the drum for the Bruckner movement all the more effectively. He was richly-rewarded for this by Bruckner, to whom he regularly played his latest songs, and who was one of the first to recognize Wolf's genius.

« Where the devil did you get these chords from ? » , the old Master cried admiringly on hearing the trilled 6/5 chord in the introduction to Wolf's song, « Seemanns Abschied » , for the 1st time.

The world of Romantic harmony through which Bruckner's creative path threaded its way, approaching from far distances and leading to distant horizons, was the area in which Wolf could truly come close to the great Symphonist. Whether he was completely open to the innermost mysteries of Bruckner's Symphonic world is a question that remains to be answered in spite of Wolf's passionate enthusiasm and his unswerving loyalty to him. It is known that Wolf « felt slighted » , according to Max Auer, when Bruckner finally began to have some success with his works. This may have contributed to the opinion of Ernst Kurth, the greatest and most profound musicological interpreter of Bruckner, who states, in a footnote to his monumental study, that :

« Hugo Wolf, always over-excited, could not help muddying his friendship with Bruckner. »

Anton Bruckner's relationship with Gustav Mahler was quite different. The son of the Jewish distiller who left Iglau, in 1875, to go to the Vienna « Conservatoire » where Bruckner was teaching (although he was not to become his student) seems to have come into personal contact with the Master very quickly. So writes Guido Adler, a member of Bruckner's closest circle of students and the 1st systematic biographer of Mahler, who describes the far-reaching historical significance of the friendship between the old Master and the young « Conservatoire » student, calling Bruckner : Mahler's « adopted mentor » . In her memoirs, Alma Mahler also includes important new material on Mahler's attitude towards Bruckner, shedding further light on this relationship.

Mahler arrived in Vienna in the same year that Richard Wagner conducted the Vienna Philharmonic and, personally brought to the Orchestra's attention, the extraordinary qualities of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, of which he was the dedicatee. Despite or perhaps precisely because of these qualities, the Philharmonic had twice rejected the work as « unplayable » . The great Bruckner devotee, Johann von Herbeck, attempted to revise this judgment. Having fallen-out with the Philharmonic and the « Hofoper » after working there for 5 years as director, worn down by intrigues and the incessant witch-hunt, and finally being forced to resign, Herbeck had returned to his former post as concert director of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » : the man whom Bruckner had begged to bring him from Linz to Vienna so that he might gain a position as teacher at the « Conservatoire » and be able to devote time to composing, had, now himself, been treated cruelly by fate. Not realizing his vocation as composer until he had reached a ripe age and concerned that he might never be able to complete his immense life's task, Bruckner, the cathedral organist in Linz, addressed an emotional plea for help to the, then, director Herbeck :

« I place my fate and my future in your hands. From the bottom of my heart, I beg you to save me, or else, I am lost. »

And Herbeck procured for him the post occupied by the « Conservatoire » 's eminent composition teacher, Simon Sechter, who had recently died. Now, almost a decade later, Herbeck, the formerly triumphant conductor, was himself fulfilling the profoundly hopeless destiny of Austrian musicians in Vienna : capital of a collapsing Empire that was riven by national struggles. He became doubly aware of the tragedy of Bruckner, a composer who had already completed his 4th and 5th Symphonies, without the 3rd even having been performed on account of its dedication to Wagner. Every avenue was barred to Bruckner because Eduard Hanslick, powerful music-critic of the « Neue freie Presse », avid Wagner opponent and spokesman for the conservative music camp centred around Brahms, saw him as Wagner's shadow. But Herbeck, a former pupil at the monastery of Heiligenkreuz, was better able to recognize that Bruckner stood, outside and above, the contemporary factional in-fighting into which he had been born ; he accepted the 3rd Symphony, outlawed and ostracized by the Philharmonic, into his « Gesellschaft » Concert series. However, fate again was not on Bruckner's side. His supporter Herbeck died, and when the work was due to be performed in 1877, there was no conductor in the whole of Vienna, the great city of music, brave enough to conduct a concert containing the 1st performance of the 3rd Symphony. Bruckner, himself, had to take to the conducting podium to look after his woebegotten child and, with the derision of the performers during rehearsal, the scene was set for the only case of a composer's martyrdom in the whole of recent music history. As the Symphony took shape for the 1st time, in real instrumental sound, the peals of laughter ringing-out from the players' desks struck Bruckner full in the face. When the composer stopped the music and tried to make himself understood to the Orchestra, witty remarks began to be muttered and the high-spirited antics escalated. Then, came the notorious performance in the Great Hall of the « Musikverein » with the audience's organized « mass-exodus » during the Finale, which actually consisted of the noisy departure of the Brahmsians followed by the public, because it was fashionable for the Liberal « bourgeoisie » to favour Brahms against Bruckner - something that Hanslick ...

... described his particularly curious experience of hearing 2 movements from Gustav Mahler's 6th Symphony and « a » Symphony by Anton Bruckner at the famous Dresden « Hofkapelle » concerts. (The nature of this description indicates unequivocally that he was dealing with Bruckner's 5th Symphony !) Thoroughly good natured and full of youthful freshness, the Englishman Arnold Bax reported that, apart from the « heavenly length » of the Symphony (meant ironically of course) , he had no other recollection of the work except the Finale. This recollection is described as follows :

« The Finale was cast in the shape of a formidably dull fugue and, as it showed signs of approaching its peroration, I thought to myself that, seldom or never, had I heard any Orchestra pile-up such a prodigious volume of sound. It was at this precise moment that an army corps of brass instruments, which must have been crouching furtively behind the percussion, arose in their might and weighed in over the top with a Chorale, probably intended by the pious composer as an invocation to “ Der alte deutsche Gott ” » .

To emphasize this all the more, in the original English text of his memoirs, Bax uses the actual German words « Der alte deutsche Gott » in quotation marks. He called Mahler an « eccentric, long-winded, muddle-headed and, yet, always interesting composer » and described his music as follows :

« The restless perversity of the very individual orchestration excited me tremendously. I marvelled at the strange juxtaposition of the driest “ Kapellmeisterlich ” formulas and heart-wrung melodies and harmonies which might have been the outpouring of a Promethean grief. And those gawky Scherzos, interminable “ Ländlers ”, with knobs on (and indeed, spikes !) . These works of the oddly laboriously minded Jew are still a matter for squabbling amongst amateurs of the art, and I doubt if they will ever be fully understood, or even whether the composer himself had any vision in continuity of what he was driving at. »

It should be stressed that Bax's memoirs, from which these citations are taken, were published in 1943, and so, were presumably written in 1942 (in any case, in the middle of the War against Adolf Hitler's Fascist Germany) and that we are dealing here with the statements of a notable English composer in the exalted position of « Master of the King's Music » whom one certainly cannot accuse of unpatriotic « Germanophilia » . Nevertheless, the effect of National-Socialist music propaganda, as it developed from the earlier great-German annexing technique, was so strong that even an intelligent and well-meaning Englishman such as Bax unconsciously came under its influence and spoke its language without giving a thought to the fact that Bruckner and Mahler embody the quintessence of an « Austrian » musical culture whose innermost substance is often diametrically opposed to Imperial Germany's and, in any case, is completely independent of it.

One can, therefore, see how even widely accessible and verifiable facts of music history can easily be falsified and concealed, let alone such a minute biographical detail as the amicable relationship between Bruckner, a composer often misunderstood even by his own followers, and the « Conservatoire » student Gustav Mahler. How significant was it that, as some books pointed-out, Mahler was often to be seen dining with Bruckner and his students in the back rooms of certain Viennese restaurants ; that the Master mostly appeared at his University lectures in the company of the young Mahler and left again with him ? It was also striking that, among the countless Bruckner anecdotes in circulation, one never heard Ernst Décsey's report of how Bruckner would discuss the Jewish question with his students (who needless to say were under the powerful influence of Richard Wagner's writings, especially « Das Judentum in der Musik ») and out of consideration for Mahler and several other Jewish students present would always refer to Jews as the « Honourable Israelites » .

For the fact that the deeply religious Catholic Bruckner could never be anti-Semitic suited neither his German nationalist followers in the Wagner Society nor his Brahms-loving opponents from the Liberal camp who particularly wanted to view him, and attack him, as a chauvinistic Wagnerian.

Several other inconspicuous accompanying circumstances have not been properly considered, and this may have contributed to the deliberate obscuring of the relationship between Bruckner and the young Mahler. As mentioned previously, Mahler was recognized among the « Conservatoire » students as one of the greatest compositional talents, and this had even led to his nickname « the new Schubert » . With the exception of his piano professor Julius Epstein, his relations with his teachers were very lax : he distinguished himself in lessons with professors Robert Fuchs and Theodor Krenn through frequent absence, although as Fuchs remarked :

« There was nothing he couldn't do in the theoretical subjects. »

On the other hand, there was Mahler's particularly close friendship with the young Hans Rott, a pupil of Bruckner who had a similarly marked talent for composition. The young Mahler was probably introduced to Bruckner by Rott. His relationship with Bruckner must have begun in his very 1st years at the Vienna « Conservatoire » , otherwise, he would not have been found among the small group of supportive and comforting disciples surrounding Bruckner in his deep despair after the 1st performance of the 3rd Symphony, in the empty hall of the « Musikverein ». And, besides, Bruckner must already have been on particularly close terms with Mahler, at that time, and must have been convinced of the latter's extraordinary gifts to have conferred upon him the distinction of preparing the 4 hand piano transcription of the 3rd Symphony for publication by Theodor Rättig. Piano versions of the Master's Symphonies had hitherto been the exclusive privilege of his own students, in particular, the brothers Josef and Franz Schalk, later joined by a 3rd Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe. These 3 individuals formed Bruckner's closest « body-guard » ; they were always around him, trying to make themselves useful to him (a man who lived only for his music) occasionally tyrannizing him over material matters and jealously guarding his every step in their youthful devotion.

There can be little doubt that the distinction Bruckner bestowed on Mahler in assigning to him the completion of the piano edition was felt as a snub by the Master's « body-guard » and aroused considerable jealousy towards the « Jewish intruder ». Based on Mahler's own information, Alma Mahler describes this in her memoirs as follows :

« Bruckner had 2 pupils who made all the piano scores of his Symphonies but seem to have bullied and tormented him. They were 2 brothers called Schalk. Bruckner was very fond of Mahler and entrusted the piano duet edition of his 3rd Symphony to him. When Mahler brought him the 1st movement, Bruckner was childishly pleased and said with a roguish smile : “ Now, I shan't need the Schalks any more ! ” This saying became a household word with us and was dragged-in on all possible, and impossible, occasions. »

In those early days, Mahler used often to foregather with Bruckner at midday. Bruckner stood the beer and Mahler had to pay for his own rolls ; but as he generally had no money, he had to make his midday meal on beer alone. Bruckner was always surrounded by large numbers of young musicians, to whom he talked with child-like unrestraint. But if there were Jews present, he always (if he had occasion to say anything about Jews) gave them the courtesy title of « the Honourable Israelites » .

However, in view of the course of Mahler's development, Bruckner's friendly attitude towards the young composer must be attributed with, yet, further significance. In the private conversations between him and the Master (and Guido Adler has confirmed that Mahler made frequent visits to Bruckner's apartment on Hessgasse) , Bruckner's works were certainly the main topic. In his profound isolation in the vast city where he felt like an outsider at a time when his music was still very much doubted, Bruckner had a particular fondness for anyone he presumed not only to be enthusiastic about his music but also to have a deeper understanding of it. This was certainly the case with his own students, the Schalk brothers and Löwe. But theirs was merely the understanding of sound, practical musicians. With the young Mahler, who was already recognized, at the time, as an extraordinary compositional talent without having written a single work that truly bore the stamp of genius, Bruckner stood before an « as yet unknown » creative musician who was destined to be the only one of his era to continue Bruckner's artistic heritage as a Symphonist.

We do not know exactly what took place in the conversations between Bruckner and the « Conservatoire » student, Mahler. We do not know whether the Master opened-up completely to the young musician, whether as a mystic who strove for the redeeming, all-encompassing God in his music, he seized upon words, for once, to introduce a disciple to the innermost substance of his Symphonic conception, or whether from the beginning there existed in the young Mahler a special understanding of Bruckner's new kind of Symphonic practice that was mistaken by his contemporaries and by several subsequent generations for an artistic defect. Whatever the case, Mahler's artistic development clearly showed that, at some point, he recognized the true significance of Bruckner's unique Symphonic technique as a new Symphonic « Will to Form » (« Formwille ») to which was assigned not only the creation of wide-ranging architectonic connections between the individual parts of a movement (one part compellingly preparing another and allowing what follows to grow organically out of what has gone before) but, also, the formation of a new overall coherence between the individual movements of a Symphony.

Wherein lay the historical significance of Bruckner's new Symphonic « Will to Form » ? We must realize that, within the development of the Classical Symphony from lesser Masters in Vienna and Mannheim, and only a few years after being raised to the height of universal musical perfection by the 1st of the great Viennese Masters, Franz-Josef Haydn, potent forces began to bring about a process of gradual change in its construction. In the case of Mozart and Haydn, the main weight of the Symphony lay in the 1st movement with its Sonata-form structure and the organization of its thematic material ; then, the 2nd, slow movement brought lyrical relaxation ; the 3rd provided lively contrast, originally in the form of minuet dance rhythms but, later, extensively re-developed and transformed by Beethoven into the Scherzo ; and the 4th movement, Finale, brought the Symphony to a joyous conclusion initially in Rondo-form. However, it was already clear from Mozart's last Symphonies that such an excess of weight attached to the Sonata-form construction of the 1st movement must have been felt by composers as a constraint. For in his « Jupiter » Symphony in C major, Mozart reduced the traditional predominance of the 1st movement and increased the Finale's significance through the unusually bold and novel combination of Sonata-form and fugue. Built on no fewer than 5 themes, the Finale's fugue unfolds before us as a Sonata movement, and Mozart crowns his work with unrivalled Mastery through this entirely unique structure.

Standing-out even more sharply and unambiguously was Beethoven's attempt to confer heightened importance on the Symphonic Finale. This re-organization of the Symphonic form was no doubt associated with those new compositional ideas inspired by the ethical ideals of the French Revolution, which Beethoven was the 1st to articulate. He no longer wrote his Symphonies for the music-rooms of princes' palaces, but for a mass audience united by the idea of democracy, for a newly-forming « bourgeois » society. This demanded a re-orientation of the Symphony as an art form. The stereotypical character and succession of the old 4 types of movements were being questioned. Almost all of Beethoven's Symphonies formulated a new solution to this problem. In the 3rd Symphony, the « Eroica », but also in the 5th and 7th Symphonies, it was already quite clear that Beethoven was striving for a new type of Finale by creating concluding movements for these works that formed the crowning apotheosis of the Symphony as a whole.

Beethoven also made far-reaching changes to the character of the other movements. However, as his then little-understood Piano Sonatas and String Quartets clearly demonstrated, he was also aware that the entire progression of the 4 Symphonic movements had to undergo a radical transformation so that, thematically, the individual movements were organically unified. In one instance, towards the end of his life, Beethoven highlighted this problem with demonstrable clarity, pursuing a solution that revealed itself in the form of a musico-poetic idea : this was the Finale of his 9th Symphony in which he used the human voice for the 1st time, in the context of an instrumental Symphony.

Shortly before the entry of the 1st bass solo summoning the orchestral instruments to intone mankind's « Hymn of Joy » and one must remember that the text of Schiller's poem (altered purely for reasons of censorship) read « Freedom, bright spark of divinity, Daughter of Elysium » (« Freiheit, schöner Götterfunken, Tochter aus Elysium ») - Beethoven unexpectedly has the themes from the preceding movements parade past.

There was only one composer in the whole of Europe at this time, Franz Schubert, still in the prime of youth and, yet, already marked by death, who recognized the problem of the Finale posed by Beethoven and who ...

... arguments that are fully corroborated in Ernst Kurth's comprehensive analysis of Bruckner's Finale technique and in his individual descriptions of the Master's 9 final movements. Alfred Orel's attitude towards the separate Austrian development of the post-Classical Symphony is noteworthy. He sees the line of development from Schubert to Bruckner as a complete antithesis to the Romantic culture of Schumann and Brahms. The Austrian Symphonists Schubert and Bruckner were prototypes of a popular / national and nature-like (« volkstümlich-naturhaften ») trend and, therefore, their music was completely bound-up with the character of the Austrian landscape. This leads to the question of Mahler's Austrian identity (« Österreichertum »). Mahler was certainly an Austrian but not in the same sense as the school teachers' sons Schubert, from the Viennese suburb of Lichtenthal, or Bruckner, from the Upper-Austrian village of Ansfelden.

« Mahler is an Austrian, but the house of the merchant from Kalischt stood in a different relationship to the people from that of the school Master's house in Ansfelden or the Lichtenthal school house in the Viennese suburbs. »

To begin with, therefore, in his attitude towards nationality (« Volkstum »), Mahler was far more like the highly-educated intellectuals Schumann and Brahms for whom folk-music was only material they occasionally made use of in order to imbue it with their individuality. However, even here, Mahler fundamentally differentiated himself from Schumann and Brahms and, ultimately, this had a decisive effect on his inclusion among Austrian Symphonists. Orel formulated these subtle, ostensibly rather hair-splitting distinctions as follows in the above-cited passage from his Bruckner volume :

« Mahler approaches the people from the outside but, thanks to his greater adaptability, he manages to identify more closely with them ; his longing for nature allows him to eavesdrop on the peculiarities of the people, which those other artists did not recognize at the time because of their different personal attitudes, or which they did not want to perceive as the purpose of their art ; for Schumann and Brahms seek the sensitive, the warm-hearted, the ideal in the people ; Mahler, in addition to this, grasps the coarse, the realistic, the worldly. »

Although it is possible to read into Alfred Orel's statements a disguised kowtowing to the National-Socialist ideology of racial anti-Semitism, it should nevertheless be made clear that he emphatically supports Mahler in his subsequent discussions, illuminating the historical interconnections between his development and Bruckner's with great objectivity. He vigorously rejects the view, developed at some length in the great-German-orientated music literature, that the significance of Mahler's music rested only on the ever-present aura surrounding his fascinating personality as a conductor. He had become convinced of this on 2 occasions : in November 1907, when he heard Mahler's famous performance of the 2nd Symphony with which he bade farewell to the Viennese public ; and, on 12 September 1910, at the 1st performance of the 8th Symphony, in Munich. And, in a forceful polemic, Orel revealed the deficiencies of the earlier Bruckner biographer Rudolf Louis, who characterized Mahler's 2nd Symphony as follows in his essay « Deutsche Musik der Neuzeit » (German Music of Recent Times) :

« To take this Symphony seriously in the fullest sense of the word requires lack of certainty in the most basic functions of artistic judgement : in distinguishing the genuine from the counterfeit ; and this is only possible on the basis of complete artistic blindness or the total corruption of ones " perceptual instincts " . »

In his monumental Bruckner volume, Ernst Kurth affectionately described Mahler's conductorial support for his deeply revered Master Bruckner and, naturally, also addressed the influence of Bruckner's Symphonic practice on Mahler as a composer. What he says about this was framed by his well-known conception of « Bruckner's remoteness » (« Fernstand ») . If the Romantic spirit forged ahead, isolated in time and within unknown expanses, reflecting the past in the new and in the individual self ; if Romanticism was very much « an age of conflicts, of tragedy, of the unredeemable, one that had lapsed into world-weariness » , then, Bruckner was « a spirit of timeless tranquillity » . Kurth defined this as « the primal repose of the mystic who exists in a state not of the phenomenal world but who nevertheless feels all its movements from the depths of his world-view and is, therefore, almost incomprehensible to all those caught-up in it, despite embracing all their experiences » . This also distinguished Bruckner from other Romantics, who set their sights on the unreal and the fantastic, on alien worlds and horizons beyond their own confines :

« These wanted to go into the distance, " but he was in the distance " . In his tranquil existence, he was, in fact, opposed to the endless all-consuming desire and restless activity of the developing times.

He was like one submerged, but not so much that he sank into an isolation and eternity outside of his own time ; from the outset, he remained rooted in his origins and, from there, met the incoming tide of the times. Yet, unlike virtually all other artists, he remained detached from the world. He was not consumed by the surrounding world of Romanticism. He was conditioned by, and thrust against, his time ; he was the consummation of Romanticism and, at the same time, its conqueror, in the way that these always co-exist. Bruckner must be viewed not in terms of his dependencies but " in terms of his independence " , and the manner in which he strode-out against his surroundings. To be at peace with Bruckner or to distort him, these are the only possibilities. »

With this conception of the Bruckner phenomenon, Kurth examines the influence of his music on the following generation of composers and concludes that many of Bruckner's technical features were adopted and developed by the three greatest musicians of the neo-Romantic (« neuromantische ») era : Gustav Mahler, Max Reger and Richard Strauß. A substantial gulf, nevertheless, separated them all from Bruckner's world, for each one of them was completely caught-up in the relentless headlong development of their times. Bruckner did, indeed, lie nearest to Mahler, a member, of course, of his most intimate circle, whose rise Bruckner was able to follow closely until his appointment to the directorship of the Vienna « Hofoper » . But Mahler's was a thoroughly Romantic nature, all fierce determination and tragic inner-turmoil.

It should also be noted that Mahler had written a considerable number of songs as well as his 1st 3 Symphonies during Bruckner's lifetime but was still virtually unknown as a composer, and that there is also absolutely no indication in the entire extant literature as to whether he showed Bruckner his works and what he might have thought about them. It is well-known, however, that, in the summer of 1896, Johannes Brahms expressed the wish through a mutual friend to become acquainted with the score of Mahler's 2nd Symphony. This happened a few months before Bruckner's death. According to Ludwig Karpath's memoirs, Brahms' opinion of the Symphony was as follows :

« It is not at all clear to me why Richard Strauß is hailed as the revolutionary in music : I consider that Mahler is the king of these revolutionaries. »

However, one should not forget that Bruckner had been seriously ill for a considerable period and was preoccupied at that time with only a single thought : to complete his life's work. Natalie Bauer-Lechner reports in her memoirs that Mahler visited the old Master regularly and that, on leaving, Bruckner « not only unfailingly accompanied him to the door of the flat but would then embark on the stairs with him, making his way down from the 3rd floor, through the 2nd and 1st until, finally, they were at the bottom, insisting on honouring his guest in this way. » On his penultimate visit, he found Bruckner in a great deal of suffering. He was presumably writing the Finale of his 9th Symphony at this time, ...

Anton Bruckner's works had long been out of print and could not be reprinted due to peculiarly complicated circumstances of legal ownership. Although Bruckner only twice received a publisher's fee during a lifetime's work (50 « Gulden » and 150 « Gulden ») , and was happy when any firm was prepared to print one of his works, the rights of ownership and sale of Bruckner's works changed hands many times partly as a result of monopolization amongst music businesses and the buying-up of smaller firms by larger ones. So, it transpired that works by Bruckner were often in the hands of 2 or 3 publishing firms at the same time, with the owner of the rights, from whom agencies expected payment for the placing and marketing of the works, themselves hampering distribution because they would not commit themselves to print material at their own cost but rather expected to share the costs with their partners since they shared the profits. For example, Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, of which Gustav Mahler made a 4 hand piano reduction, had been published in 1878 in its 1st printed version by the firm of « Röttig & Bösendorfer » . In a contract, dating from 13 July 1901, this firm sold the joint copyright to the publishers Universal-Edition, which had been founded by the merging of several smaller music-dealers in that same year. This large publishing-house, accordingly, had the right to include the Symphony in its catalogue and to sell it, although it had to pass on the revenue from the ownership rights to « Röttig & Bösendorfer » . « Röttig & Bösendorfer » , then, sold their entire enterprise to the publishing-house « Schlesinger-Lienau » , in Berlin, which, thus, also acquired the ownership rights to the 3rd Symphony (together, with the « Te Deum » , which had earlier been published for the 1st time by « Röttig & Bösendorfer ») , and while Universal-Edition retained the copyright, it was not in a position to reprint material for performance without the agreement of the new owners. Yet, more complicated were the publication terms of the 1st, 2nd, 4th and 6th Symphonies, as well as some works for male chorus that the Master only managed to get printed in 1892, 4 years before his death, and, then, only by the music printers « Josef Eberle & Co. », in Vienna, who were not themselves a publishing-house and, therefore, handed over the works on commission to the firm of « Carl Haslinger ». Several years later, « Eberle & Co. » merged to become a joint-stock company, « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. » which, in practical terms, meant a change of ownership. The expensive printing plates of Bruckner's works ended-up in a basement where they lay unused for nearly 2 decades. In the meantime, the firm « Haslinger », which owned the commission rights for the above-mentioned works, was also bought by « Schlesinger-Lienau », in Berlin, and set-up as their Vienna branch. With that, Bruckner's 8th Symphony, previously published for the 1st time whole publishing firms, such as « Albert J. Guttmann », who had Bruckner's works on their books. This amalgamation of Bruckner's works by Universal-Edition was completed when a contract was signed on 21 June 1910 with « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. » to transfer the complete rights of those works formerly printed by « Eberle & Co. » to Universal-Edition. At the same time, Universal-Edition purchased Mahler's 1st 4 Symphonies from « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. ».

Since Emil Hertzka knew that Mahler, the idealistic instigator of the new Bruckner edition, was not immediately dependent on royalties from his works because of his current conducting activities in America, he felt able to ask him for certain further practical support. As Alma Mahler reports in her memoirs, he visited Mahler in Toblach, during the summer of 1910, to pass-on the welcome news that he had acquired his 1st 4 Symphonies from « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. » for Universal-Edition. The 4 Symphonies, printed at a cost of 50,000 « Kronen » ($ 10,000), were almost beginning to show profit : only 2,500 « Kronen » were still outstanding. Now, Hertzka had fulfilled Mahler's dearest wish by acquiring all Bruckner's works in one go, in preparation for the new edition. What Hertzka expected from Mahler in return, and the way in which the latter received this proposal, is described by Alma as follows :

« Hertzka went on to ask Mahler to forgo his profits until a 2nd sum of 50,000 had been earned, on the grounds that Universal-Edition would like to take-over the works of Bruckner also, and advertise them at great expense. »

Mahler agreed, at once. He thought it only right that he should sacrifice his profits for another 15 years, out of love of Bruckner, without of course receiving, or expecting, a penny from the sale of Bruckner's works. This was a great sacrifice to make to Bruckner's memory and shows how deeply he revered him. Alma cited 2 further small matters of interest that shed light on Mahler's attitude towards Bruckner :

« Mahler's love of Bruckner was life-long. He gave performances of all his Symphonies, one after the other in New York, although they had a very bad press. In Vienna, he proclaimed his merits as a matter of course.

On the title-page of his copy of Bruckner's " Te Deum ", he crossed-out the words : " For solo voices, chorus and orchestra, organ ' ad libitum ' ", and wrote :

" For the tongues of angels, heaven-blest, chastened hearts, and souls purified in the fire ! " »

A letter from Mahler, dated 16 April 1892, was found in Bruckner's Estate in which he reports to the Master, as follows, on the performance he had given of the « Te Deum » the day before, in Hamburg :

« The “ participants ” as well as the entire “ audience ” were most profoundly moved by its powerful structure and truly sublime conception and, at the end of the performance, I experienced what I consider to be the greatest triumph of a work : the audience remained silent and motionless in their seats, and only when the conductor and the performers began to leave their places did the thundering applause burst forth. »

This portion of the letter is cited in the monograph, « Anton Bruckner, sein Leben und Werk » , by Max Auer, the collaborator of August Göllerich whom Bruckner, himself, appointed as his official biographer. It is one of the few places in this extensive, otherwise extremely valuable book, where the author does justice to the activities of Mahler in serving Bruckner's music - at least, indirectly through quotation, evidently so as not to have to use his own words.

The 1st performance of the Mass in D minor, conducted by Mahler in Hamburg, on 31 March 1893, was specifically hailed by Ernst Kurth as the « reclaiming of the work for the concert-hall » . The Mass had been performed only once, outside the « Alter Dom » in Linz, « 29 » years earlier under Bruckner. Nevertheless, it is recorded in Max Auer's « Bruckner » volume, in a dry and insignificant way, in relation to other events apparently of far more importance to the author, giving a clear illustration of the embarrassed and resentful attitude of the Austrian Bruckner movement's leading personalities towards Mahler. The passage reads :

« The spring of 1893 saw the performance of the 3rd Symphony in Munich under Hermann Levi, who also went on to give a deeply moving performance of the work in Berlin, in October. Further performances took place of the “ Te Deum ” in Hamburg, Dusseldorf ; and of the Mass in D in Hamburg under Gustav Mahler ; and, in Steyr, under the Master's student, Franz Bayer who, from then on, performed the work regularly during the Easter Sunday service. »

Mahler's pioneering work carried-out on behalf of Bruckner through performing all 9 Symphonies in numerous American cities received no mention at all in Auer's book. Instead, he describes the 1st complete performance of the 6th Symphony, on 26 February 1899, in a Vienna Philharmonic concert under Mahler as « barbarically cut » on account of a few deletions, although he had to concede the « almost universal public and critical success of the work » .

Mahler, had already discussed the problem of cuts and instrumental re-touchings in Bruckner's Symphonies in an article in the « Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft » and, similarly, a few years later in his book of 1925, the Viennese musicologist Alfred Orel advocated publishing a « Complete Critical Edition » of Bruckner's works that would also contain detailed notes and commentaries on the variants between the different versions of each work.

Thus, when the customary period of copyright expired 30 years after Bruckner's death, the time came for the implementation of such a « Critical Edition » and for the opening-up of the manuscripts in the Vienna National Library containing the hitherto unknown original versions of the Symphonies. The scene was, then, set for posterity to pass judgement on a bygone but chronologically very close musical era, some of whose protagonists were still alive or only very recently dead.

It was clear that the scholarly preparation of a « Complete Critical Edition » of Bruckner's works had 1st of all to be placed in the hands of the director of the Vienna National Library's music collection, Robert Haas, who was officially responsible for making the manuscripts of the Master's Estate accessible. He also formally took charge of the publication, initially together with Orel, whose 1st undertaking was to edit the original version of the unfinished 9th Symphony using all the hand-written sketch material.

It had long been known that the printed version of this unfinished work consisted of a revision of Bruckner's score by Ferdinand Löwe, the conductor of the 1st performance. No one knew how far-reaching his revision was until the publication of the original manuscript by Orel. With the other completed Symphonies, however, it was much more difficult to determine how far the divergences between the original versions and the Universal-Edition printed versions were down to Bruckner himself (who was, of course, known to have re-worked almost all of his works several times) or how much these alterations derived from the « restructurings » of conductors who made cuts and instrumental retouchings on their own initiative. A 3rd possibility was that these cuts and instrumental retouchings had been suggested to Bruckner by conductors and by his students and friends, that he was eventually persuaded to accept them, and that through this they were carried over into the printed editions.

The task of the editors was accordingly to clarify the process by which Bruckner's Symphonies came to print, and to ascertain whether the manuscripts to be published were conveyed directly to the printing office by Bruckner, whether he personally corrected the proofs and signed them off, and whether these corrections had been carried-out accurately.

In view of the fact that Bruckner entrusted the 1st publication of his Symphonies to various small firms, some of whom no longer existed, in most cases nothing concrete could be ascertained about the publication process. Only with those works published by Josef Eberle or its successor Waldheim-Eberle was it established in a statement from the former head of the firm's engraving department, Josef Venantius von Wöß, that he personally collected from Bruckner's apartment the manuscripts intended for printing and brought them to the printing office. He also took the proofs to Bruckner, collected them again after they had been corrected by the Master, and personally checked that the corrections were carried-out to the highest-level of accuracy. Evidence that the proof corrections were exclusively made in Bruckner's hand could obviously not be produced because corrected proofs were never preserved.

Yet, in his highly-informative study « Anton Bruckner and the Process of Musical Creation » published in the American music journal « The Musical Quarterly » (Volume 24, No. 3, 1937) , Egon Wellesz reports that Bruckner's friend and student, Friedrich Eckstein, informed him, in 1937, that he possessed the proofs of Bruckner's String Quintet. Eckstein explained that Bruckner's innumerable hand-written corrections to the proofs conclusively established how little the Master considered a composition completely finished even when he submitted the manuscript for printing.

It was also part of the task of the « Complete Critical Edition » 's editor to make accessible all available contemporary sources and, thereby, to establish how Bruckner's conductors and friends arrived at the cuts and instrumental retouchings that they recommended to him as appropriate. It was as much a question of judgement as of scientific accuracy both to ascertain the purely technical divergences between original and printed versions, and to examine the æsthetic and historical reasons why individual conductors made certain alterations or rather suggested them to the Master and asked for his approval. It was all a matter of the spirit in which the editor of the « Critical Edition » carried-out the investigation as to whether the pioneering work of the 1st Bruckner conductors, Josef and Franz Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, Arthur Nikisch, Hermann Levi, August Göllerich, Hans Richter and Gustav Mahler was analyzed as a temporary phenomenon of music history or whether the editor felt himself to be a public prosecutor appointed by posterity to have Bruckner's friends and champions tried and convicted of the falsification of his work.

Robert Haas, the director of the music collection in the Vienna National Library and editor of the « Critical Edition », chose the latter path. It did not seem at all satisfactory to him that insight into Bruckner's creative working practice should be offered in unproblematic scholarly terms through the « Complete Critical Edition » by publishing the various drafts, sketches and versions of a work. From the very beginning, « the most important thing seemed to him the discrediting of Universal-Edition's hitherto unanimously accepted printed versions », and their elimination from concert usage, in favour of the original versions of the Symphonies in the process of being published. The discrediting of Universal-Edition's printed versions, however, necessitated a polemical attitude towards the 1st conductors of Bruckner's works who had emerged from his close circle of friends and students, and who, according to Haas' theory, made adaptations and cuts in the 1st performances of the Symphonies that were accepted into the printed versions but misrepresented Bruckner's original artistic intentions.

The question of why, if the alterations suggested by his conductors did not correspond with his actual artistic intentions, Bruckner then accepted them into the printed editions of his Symphonies, was answered by Robert Haas with reference to the Master's overly modest nature and submissive inclinations, which led him to be persuaded, indeed almost coerced, by his students and friends, to carry-out these alterations ; that is, if such alterations in the printing of the scores had not been undertaken by a 3rd party without the Master's knowledge or approval.

Before Haas went public with these outrageous accusations (directed, above all, towards Ferdinand Löwe and his revision of the unfinished 9th Symphony, but, in a wider sense also, towards Franz Schalk, Arthur Nikisch, Hermann Levi and the other conductors of 1st performances of the Symphonies) , he and the representatives of the Bruckner movement who were launching the « Complete Critical Edition » tried to enlist Franz Schalk to conduct the premiere of the original version of the 9th Symphony, which had meanwhile been published.

An attempt was made, therefore, to induce one of the last great Bruckner conductors, from the Master's circle of friends, publicly to acknowledge the validity of the original versions and, thereby, to discredit Universal-Edition's printed editions. This attempt failed. Franz Schalk categorically refused to direct the proposed premiere because, as he explained, he considered performances of the 1st versions of Bruckner's Symphonies to be a serious offence against the Master who left them unpublished, not without good reason and never submitted his Symphonies for printing without thoroughly revising the 1st versions of the scores, often, 2 or 3 times.

After that, the instigators of the « Complete Critical Edition » turned to the Austrian conductor Siegmund von Hausegger, then working in Munich, who gave a private performance of the original version of the 9th Symphony edited by Alfred Orel.

.. role in the arguments surrounding attempts to institute the original versions. Hardly anyone knew that efforts had been going on, since the 1920's, to found an international association of all Bruckner supporters, which was to secure the financial means to restore and maintain the famous Bruckner organ left to decay in the Collegiate Church of Saint-Florian. The architects of the plan were the University professor Ernst Kurth (from Berne) , who pointed-out, right from the beginning, that the Society would have to be an international one ; Max Auer (from Vöcklabruck) , Franz Gräßlinger (from Linz) , Karl Grunsky (from Stuttgart) and Franz Moißl, director of the church music department of the Klosterneuburg foundation, near Vienna. This group, chiefly made-up of officials from the « Austrian Bruckner League » set-up after the First World War, made contact with the « Berlin Bruckner Society » , founded earlier by Arthur Nikisch, and invited them to join the proposed international organization. A joint conference took place in the monastery of Saint-Florian, on 4 November 1925, under the chairmanship of the abbot Vinzenz Hartl, during which the decision to found an « International Bruckner Society » was formally registered.

The next step was to form groups in different countries. These were established in Switzerland, France and even in the United States, where a Bruckner Society was founded on 5 January 1931, its journal « Chord and Discord » dedicated to supporting Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. It was evident, however, that the principal interest in Bruckner remained in Austria and in the German « Reich » . Prior to Adolf Hitler's assumption of power, on 30 January 1933, 2 major organizations, the « Upper-Austrian Bruckner League » and the « Bruckner League for Vienna and Lower-Austria » had been founded in Austria, whilst in Germany, 4 great Societies emerged : the « Württemberg Bruckner League » , the « Baden Bruckner League » , the « Westphalian Bruckner League » and the « Rhineland Bruckner League » , along with a dense network of local groups in Munich, Hamburg, Berlin and numerous other German cities. To this was added the « Bruckner Community for the Cultivation of Sacred Music » , in Munich.

On 9 October 1927, all these separate groups, the overwhelming majority of which were situated on Imperial German soil, were amalgamated into 1 vast organization called the « Bruckner Society » . This amalgamation resulted from a meeting in the Book-Trade House, in Leipzig, which had come about because the Leipzig publishers « Breitkopf & Härtel » had declared itself ready to take-over the preparation of the « Complete Critical Edition » of Bruckner's works.

The Imperial German predominance in this « Bruckner Society » was so overwhelming that Austrian institutions, above all the National Library in Vienna, owner of all the manuscripts in Bruckner's Estate, could not consent ...

Additional treasurers of the « International Bruckner Society » are Doctor Benno Filser (from Augsburg) ; and the manager of the Leipzig Office, Doctor Karl Krieser.

These arrangements were confirmed at a meeting held on 2 December 1928, in the Augsburg Town Hall, and put before a plenary assembly of members convened on 17 February 1929, in Vienna, which approved and ratified the necessary changes to the Society's constitution. The following individuals were elected to the governing body of the « International Bruckner Society », which had its headquarters on I « Buckerstraße », at the old Vienna University (editorial office of the « Weiner Zeitung ») and described itself in the 1st paragraph of its statutes as « non-political, non-denominational, international » :

The Honorary President :

« Generalmusikdirektor » Professor Franz Schalk, from Vienna (who died on 3 September 1931 and exerted no practical influence on the Society's affairs but, in fact, later adopted an extremely sceptical attitude towards it) .

The Presidents :

Professor Max Auer, from Vienna-Vöcklabruck : Colleague of the conductor August Göllerich, who was appointed by Bruckner as his biographer and whose unfinished multi-volume biography of the composer was completed by Auer after his death)

Professor Walter Braunfels : Director of the « Hochschule für Musik » , in Cologne.

University Professor Doctor Ernst Kurth, from Berne.

The Secretaries :

Government Councillor Professor Franz Moißl, from Vienna-Klosterneuburg.

Prelate Doctor Franz Xaver Münch, from Cologne.

The Treasurers :

Doctor Benno Filser, from Augsburg

Doctor Karl Krieser, from Leipzig : Manager of the Leipzig Office.

Engineer Robert Furreg : Manager of the Vienna Office.

When one surveys this list of functionaries, which included several eminent individuals, and when one reads the highly-respectable aims of the Society outlined in the statutes, it becomes clear that an organizational apparatus was set-up under the cloak of internationalism and of reverence for a great musical Master who lived and worked in Austria, whose funding was nevertheless supplied by Imperial German capital (from the Filser publishing-house, in Augsburg, working anonymously in the background) . As a result of this, while 2 Viennese musicologists found work as editors of the « New Complete Edition » , at the same time, a position was created for an Imperial German publishing concern in Austria that was able to develop extreme ...

... which was advanced by Robert Haas, Bruckner was intellectually violated and compelled against his better judgement and conscience by friends and students (principally, conductors of the 1st performances of his symphonies such as Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk, Arthur Nikisch and others) to accept, into the printed editions, those cuts and instrumental retouchings carried-out by these conductors, on practical grounds. Thus, the « true Bruckner » , to be found only in the scores of the original versions, had not been heard at all, until now.

The way in which Haas supported the « falsification theory » in the introductions and commentaries of the « Complete Critical Edition » and in his other verbal and written statements, all too obviously trying to construct a « criminal musical case around Anton Bruckner » , contrasts so strongly with the scrupulousness and wealth of information in his other musicological works that one cannot possibly mistake his role as an illicit, clandestine agent of National-Socialist propaganda. It is scarcely credible that he would, otherwise, have neglected to examine more closely the personal relationships between Bruckner and his friends and the various conductors of his 1st performances as they appear in several contemporaneous sources (particularly, the correspondence between Bruckner and his conductors relating to questions of cuts and alterations) and that he would have overlooked the conclusions arising from this, in his historical-critical introductions and commentaries to the « Complete Critical Edition » . Instead, Haas attempted to represent each divergence between the original and printed versions as an act of sacrilege committed against Bruckner's music by his conductors and friends who had imposed their will on the old Master. The huge intellectual energy with which Bruckner pursued his goal of complete Mastery, fulfilling his intentions whether initially as an organist, later as a composer of counterpoint and fugues, or finally as a Symphonist, demonstrates that it is unacceptable to portray him as a weakling who was not in full possession of his mental powers. And, in fact, several letters show that conductors from among Bruckner's circle of students such as Arthur Nikisch and Franz Schalk took great pains to come to an understanding with the Master about every detail of the 1st performances they were directing. This was the case both with the insertion of the cymbal crash in the Adagio of the 7th Symphony for which Nikisch obtained the Master's consent through the mediation of Josef Schalk, and with the disposition of the Chorale passage for separate wind group in the close of the 5th Symphony's Finale for which Franz Schalk had the express permission of Bruckner. On the other hand, an exchange of letters between Bruckner and Hermann Levi, who much to Bruckner's annoyance had initially refused to conduct a performance of the 8th Symphony, in Munich, shows that the Master took to heart the famous conductor's criticism and immediately began an extensive revision of the score of the 8th Symphony, as he informed Levi, in a letter of 20 October 1887, writing :

« I will do whatever is possible to the best of my knowledge and conscience. »

In a further letter of 27 February 1888, Bruckner reported on the progress of this revision of the 8th Symphony with the words :

« It looks different already. »

It is significant that this material containing important arguments against Haas' falsification theory and refuting the assumption that Bruckner's conductors and students exerted pressure on him or that he acted under any coercion when deciding to revise and alter his scores for printing, was published by none other than Alfred Orel, co-editor of the « Complete Critical Edition », in his seminal study, « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner » (Original work and revisions by Bruckner), though only after Haas had succeeded in forcing Orel out and appropriating the sole editorship of the « Complete Critical Edition » for himself.

Whether this repudiation of Haas' falsification theory was merely an act of personal revenge on Orel's part for his unprofessional treatment at the hands of Haas, or whether, as a musicologist, he believed he could no longer be responsible for advocating something that had nothing to do with scholarship but had revealed itself simply National-Socialist propaganda, need not be more he brazen anti-Austrian propaganda with which the ... the 2 International Bruckner Festivals of 1936 and 1937, held in Linz and Upper-Austria, demonstrated that Orel had every reason to recoil from the political consequences of continuing involvement with the campaign for Bruckner's original versions. On these occasions, the principal slogan of this large-scale, organized whispering campaign ran :

« The true Bruckner has never existed in Austria at all, but only a falsified distortion (" Zerrbild ") of his music has been heard. The true Bruckner, who was never at home in the former Austria, has been discovered and brought to light only through National-Socialism. »

It was in this sense that « the official annexing of Anton Bruckner by Fascist great-Germany » followed in summer 1937, on the occasion of the unveiling of the Bruckner bust in the « Walhalla » Temple, in Regensburg, at which Adolf Hitler personally gave the Festival speech. Just as the « true Bruckner » was, then, openly celebrated as the discovery of the 3rd « Reich » and assigned his place of honour among German musical heroes by the « Führer » and « Reich » Chancellor, so National-Socialist propaganda laid its cards on the table : the « Musicological Publishers », in Vienna, received a subsidy of 100,000 RMarks from the government of the German « Reich » for the further publication of the « Complete Critical Edition » of Bruckner's works.

The ceremony at the « Walhalla », in Regensburg, was the culminating point of the distortion to which the Bruckner phenomenon had been subjected at the hands of posterity. In complete contrast to the monstrous clamour of this political propaganda, which ended-up with the annexation of the Austrian Symphonist Bruckner by the 3rd « Reich » and the granting of a 100,000 « Reichsmark » subsidy to the « Musicological Publishers », by the Hitler regime, stood « Gustav Mahler's secret act of devotion » whereby, 27 years earlier, in summer 1910, he allowed his 1st 4 Symphonies, in which he had continued the Master's artistic heritage, to be used as security for 50,000 « Kronen », making it possible for Universal-Edition to produce a new edition of the printed versions of Bruckner's Symphonies.

Imagine if one of the few « cognoscenti » had been called as chief witness to explain the publication process of Bruckner's Symphonies before the « tribunal » of posterity, and had had the courage to counter-act the feelings of hatred fanned by the propaganda of triumphant Hitlerite Fascism - towards those guilty of an alleged falsification of the Master's music with a clear admission of Mahler's great act of devotion ! If only, for example, Josef Venantius von Wöb, director of the music department of « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. » who had been admitted to the board of Universal-Edition and who was fully conversant with all the transactions shared by both firms, had openly declared :

« We should not be in a position today to sit in judgement over whether Bruckner was justified in re-working his Symphonies as often as he thought fit, or the extent to which he accepted advice from his disciples and 1st conductors and accepted their proposed cuts and instrumental retouchings into the printed editions of his works, if the pioneering work of these early conductors and disciples had not prevailed in the face of a world of hostility and lack of understanding. With complete faith in their mission and in difficult conditions, with Orchestras that were still barely equal to the technical demands of this new Symphonic style, they repeatedly performed Bruckner's works until their fame gradually spread across Europe and new artists took-up their cause. The fact that this was possible, that the chain of performances did not break and Bruckner's work did not fall into oblivion when the 1st editions of the Symphonies had long been out of print and, due to a peculiar combination of circumstances, material could no longer be reprinted, can be put-down to the act of devotion of one of the Master's followers who, in 1893, in Hamburg reclaimed for the concert-hall the Mass in D minor, not given since its 1st concert performance in Linz, under Bruckner himself ; who, in 1899, conducted the 1st " complete " performance of the 6th Symphony, albeit with cuts - in a concert of the Vienna Philharmonic ; and who, finally, despite vigorous opposition, gave 1st performances of all Bruckner's Symphonies in America : Gustav Mahler. He made possible the new edition of Bruckner's Symphonies on which all the more recent cultivation of the composer depended, by renouncing the royalties from his 1st 4 Symphonies. »

But neither Wöb nor the composer Friedrich Klose, a survivor from Bruckner's most intimate circle who had been called to Vienna to give his opinion on whether a 3rd party could have had a hand in the printing of Bruckner's manuscripts, dared to speak-up, let alone throw into the debate (alongside Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk and Arthur Nikisch) the name Gustav Mahler, which appeared on the list of composers outlawed by National-Socialism. Nothing more stood in the way of the annexing of the « true » Bruckner by the 3rd « Reich » , of his nomination as « German hero of music » . And thousands of grateful Bruckner supporters looked to the « Reich » in whose « Walhalla » the « Führer » had personally unveiled the bust of their Master. « The blow against the separate Austrian development of the post-Classical Symphony, so disagreeable to great-German ideology, had succeeded. »

L'élève August Göllerich, fils

Le pianiste, chef d'orchestre et musicologue, l'autrichien August Göllerich, fils, est né le 2 juillet 1859 au 16 de la « Baumbachstraße » , à Linz. (Une plaque commémorative nous rappelle son passage dans cette demeure.) Il fréquente l'école primaire catholique de Wels, en Haute-Autriche. Son talent musical est apparu évident dès le début de sa scolarité. Il s'intéresse au piano à l'âge de 9 ans. En 1868, le jeune garçon de 11 ans reçoit ses 1res leçons officielles de piano d'un certain monsieur Oberhuber de Wels. Il joue même en public en plus de rédiger des préfaces pour certains ouvrages sur la musique.

En 1869, il fait la connaissance à Wels du compositeur Anton Bruckner par l'entremise de son père.

August Göllerich, fils, fait ses études secondaires au Collège (« Realschule » ou Lycée) pour garçons de Linz, situé sur la « Baumbachstraße » où il obtient son baccalauréat. Durant ce séjour, il est pensionnaire chez Rudolf Ritter d'Hoyer puis chez les sœurs Anna et Eleonore Löffler. Son professeur de musique est August Wieck qui est originaire de Rostock, une localité du nord de l'Allemagne. Les mercredis soirs, il se rend dans le quartier d'Urfahrner pour jouer du piano à 4 mains aux côtés de Ludovika Rohr avec qui il se lie d'amitié.

En 1873, alors qu'il n'a que 14 ans, il s'enthousiasme pour les écrits et la musique de Richard Wagner ; il voulait lui-même devenir un musicien professionnel. La même année, il se produit sur scène comme pianiste lors d'un concert de charité donné à Wels ; il obtient alors son 1er véritable succès. Mais son père qui connaissait le destin dramatique de nombreux artistes va rapidement refroidir ses ardeurs dans le but de le protéger de la misère. (Le compositeur Anton Bruckner, pour ne nommer que lui, va solliciter son aide, en 1875, en raison de ses nombreux soucis d'argent.)

Mathématicien-né, Göllerich, fils, va donc devoir passer son examen d'entrée au département technique de l'Université de Vienne afin de poursuivre des études plus poussées. Il reçoit une bourse au montant de 60 Florins (« Gulden ») qui va l'aider à subvenir à ses besoins durant le semestre d'été de 1878. En 1882, il assiste pour la 1re fois au Festival de Bayreuth.

Suite au décès de son père, survenu le 23 août 1883 à Wels, August Göllerich, fils, interrompt ses études universitaires en mathématiques pour se consacrer entièrement à l'étude de la musique. Il s'attarde aux œuvres de Robert Schumann, de Johannes Brahms, au traité d'harmonie de Richard Wagner et à l'orchestration moderne d'Hector Berlioz. Il sera particulièrement attiré par un essai sur Anton Bruckner, paru en 1884 (provenant de la plume de l'un de ses tout lers critiques) , qui témoigne de l'importance de la grande écriture Symphonique. Il deviendra l'un de ses fervents admirateurs.

August Göllerich, fils, dira au sujet de cette période viennoise :

« D'abord passionné exclusivement par les œuvres de Brahms et de Schumann, j'ai séjourné à Vienne pour étudier la composition auprès d'Anton Bruckner et devenir un membre de la Société académique Wagner (" Akademischer Wagnerverein ") . Je me suis alors lié d'amitié avec Hugo Wolf. Mes goûts artistiques ont évolué lorsque j'ai fait la rencontre de Franz Liszt, un musicien doté d'une très grande spiritualité. »

August Göllerich, fils, reçoit une formation de piano de Toni Raab qui le présente à Franz Liszt, à Bayreuth. Ce dernier reconnaît immédiatement ses talents aussi bien musical et littéraire. Il devient, en 1884, son compagnon de voyage, son secrétaire personnel et l'un de ses élèves de piano à l'Université de Vienne. De Vienne jusqu'en Russie, Göllerich, fils, remporte un immense succès comme pianiste de talent et interprète privilégié de Franz Liszt.

La fille de Franz Liszt, Cosima Wagner, lui exprime ses sentiments dans une lettre :

« Cher Monsieur Göllerich, ce fut pour moi un immense plaisir d'avoir eu la chance de vous rencontrer. À l'heure solennelle de la mort, soyez assuré que j'aurai à mes côtés un de vos ouvrages : un livre traitant de musique ou un témoignage personnel. »

Après le décès de Liszt, survenu le 31 juillet 1886 à Bayreuth, August Göllerich, fils, devient critique musical à Vienne. Dans sa lutte face à Eduard Hanslick, il défend avec énergie les nouvelles tendances musicales, plus particulièrement les œuvres de Richard Wagner et d'Anton Bruckner.

Le Maître de Saint-Florian voue beaucoup d'estime à son élève. Il lui demande de devenir son secrétaire personnel et son biographe officiel. Dans une lettre datée de 1885, Bruckner s'adresse à lui en ces termes :

« Mon cher biographe. »

En 1891, il écrit :

« Bien sûr, vous êtes mon biographe dûment qualifié et autorisé. »

Göllerich, fils, poursuivra avec vigueur le travail de recherche plusieurs années après la mort du compositeur.

August Göllerich, fils, occupe une place privilégiée chez les biographes brucknériens de la Ire heure. Homme idéaliste et désintéressé, il a consacré des décennies à préparer l'œuvre qu'il devait écrire. Il suscite certainement notre sympathie. Conscient de la grande responsabilité qui lui incombe, il commence à amasser du matériel, effectue des voyages à caractère didactique à la recherche d'information pour éventuellement rencontrer des témoins oculaires, sans jamais négliger les détails (à prime abord sans importance) qui pourrait lui servir dans un avenir rapproché.

Très attaché à sa ville natale, August Göllerich, fils, décide de retourner vivre à Linz.

Son engagement va faire de cette ville un carrefour musical et culturel majeur. Göllerich sera le 1er à diriger à Linz les grandes œuvres de Franz Liszt et d'Anton Bruckner. Au cours de son règne comme chef d'orchestre, il emploie des musiciens et des chanteurs locaux.

De 1890 à 1896, Göllerich occupe le poste de direction de l'École de musique « Ramann-Volckmann » à Nuremberg (« Nürnberger Ramann-Volkmannsche Musik Schule »), secondé par son épouse Gisela de Pászthory-Voigt (1858-1946) ; une autre élève de Franz Liszt, mère du compositeur Casimir de Pászthory. La réputation de Göllerich, fils, ira jusqu'à atteindre Fürth, Erlangen et Ansbach. Lors de son départ de Nuremberg, il confie les rennes de l'institution à son épouse.

Généalogie : Père → August, sénior (1819-1883) ; Mère → Maria Nowotny (1818-1889) ; Fils → August, junior, épouse à Budapest, en 1895 → Gisela (1858-1946) pianiste, fille de Alfred Voigt et de Maria Juretich, qui est divorcée de Janos de Pászthory de Rosza ; 3 enfants → Casimir de Pászthory (né en 1886), violoniste, compositeur et professeur → Gisela de Pászthory (1882-1955), pianiste → Palma de Pászthory (1884-1958), violoniste virtuose et professeur.

Du jour de la mort d'Anton Bruckner, le 11 octobre 1896, jusqu'à son propre décès, le 16 mars 1923, August Göllerich, fils, injectera à la ville de Linz une impulsion nouvelle comme directeur administratif et artistique du Conservatoire (« Musikverein ») - qui compte 500 élèves en 1896 - et comme « Kapellmeister » du « Schubert Sängerbund ». Il sera aussi le fondateur d'une Société Anton Bruckner (« Bruckner-Verein ») qui permettra de mieux faire connaître les grandes compositions du Maître (et celles de Franz Liszt) souvent lors de Ires exécutions avec la participation de musiciens et de chanteurs locaux dans le cadre de Festivals populaires.

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur Bernhard Paumgartner a joué sous la baguette d'August Göllerich, fils :

« Il a été l'instigateur de Festivals aussi uniques qu'extraordinaires. Personne depuis n'a dirigé cette musique avec autant d'amour ! »

Le successeur de Göllerich, fils, au Conservatoire sera Wilhelm Jerger (1902-1978) , un membre du Parti national-socialiste.

En 1922, soit 1 an avant son décès, August Göllerich, fils (cet ancien élève du Maître de Saint-Florian) , appelle à la création d'une Maison Bruckner (« Brucknerhaus ») à Linz. Son Journal personnel composé de plusieurs agendas (dans lequel il a immortalisé ses souvenirs de Franz Liszt) se trouve aujourd'hui aux archives de l'Université privée Anton Bruckner pour la musique, le théâtre et la danse (« Die Bruckner Privatuniversität für Musik, Schauspiel und Tanz ») sis au 18 de la « Wildbergstraße » , 4040 (+43 732 70100030) . La salle de concert a été nommée en son honneur : « Göllerich-Saal » .

Il s'agit de l'une des 4 Universités de la capitale Haute-Autrichienne. Elle est située dans le quartier d'Urfahr, au nord du Danube. Elle est accréditée comme « Université privée » en février 2004 et, de nouveau, en 2009. De 1932 à 2004, cette institution était connue sous le nom de Conservatoire Bruckner de Linz (même si le compositeur n'a jamais été élu directeur) . Ses racines remontent à 1823, et même à 1799 alors que Franz Xaver Glöggel, père (1764-1839) , un ami de Ludwig van Beethoven et de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart instaure une Ire école de musique.

La « Göllerichstraße » parcourt l'arrondissement linzois de Froschberg.

August Göllerich, fils, aura travaillé sur le mandat que lui a confié son « Ménestrel de Dieu » - « Deutsche Michel » , Anton Bruckner : recueillir du matériel en vue de la rédaction d'une biographie complète sur sa vie mais aussi sur l'analyse en profondeur de ses œuvres. Le résultat était attendu avec impatience mais l'homme n'arrivait pas à mettre un terme au travail de ratissage. À sa mort, il laisse derrière lui d'impressionnantes piles de notes qui demeurent, malgré tout, une référence essentielle (seulement une très petite quantité de manuscrits furent achevés) . Son collègue et ami, Max Auer, saura prendre la relève, retardant de plusieurs années sa propre monographie sur Anton Bruckner (en plus d'autres projets de publication) . Des 9 volumes qui composent la monumentale biographie, August Göllerich, fils, n'est responsable que du 1er.

Le tandem « Göllerich et Auer » aura tenté de faire comprendre les œuvres d'Anton Bruckner à travers les expériences personnelles du musicien. Ainsi, les déceptions amoureuses l'amèneront à composer occasionnellement des chansons élégiaques. Les événements heureux se métamorphosent en mélodies en liesse. Les douleurs trouveront leur expression dans les sections mélancoliques des Messes croyant profondément que la souffrance n'était pas veine.

August Göllerich junior (1859-1923) : Pianist, conductor, teacher, music-editor, Bruckner's official biographer, and a great devotee of Bruckner's music. He became Director of the the « Linzer Musikverein » , in 1896. His father August, Senior (1819-1883) , was Munciple Secretary in Wels, Imperial Deputy, and member of the Board of Directors of the Upper-Austrian Salzburger Singing Society. He had been a pupil of Franz Liszt (1811-1886) and acted as his last secretary.

After his schooling in Linz, August Göllerich, Junior, studied composition with Anton Bruckner in Vienna, and piano with Franz Liszt, working also as the latter's secretary, 1884-1886. He worked as a music-critic and advocate for Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, and Anton Bruckner in Vienna. In 1890, on the recommendation of Cosima Wagner, he took-over the « Ramann-Volkman'sche Musikschule » , in Nuremberg, establishing branches in Erlangen, Fürth, and Ansbach. In 1896, he returned to Linz, where he became conductor of the « Musikverein » and director of the « Musikverein-Musikschule » (later named, « Bruckner-Konservatorium ») . His wife, Gisela Pásthory-Voigt, also a Liszt pupil, took-over the music direction of the Nuremberg schools at his death.

Furthermore, a biography of Bruckner written by Max Auer in response to Rudolf Louis' work, which was completed by 1908 but not published until 1923. When August Göllerich died, in 1922, Auer published the chapters concerning Bruckner's early life that Göllerich had completed as Volume I of « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens - und Schaffensbild » .

Of the many works on music written by August Göllerich, the most important one was the 4 volume on Anton Bruckner. « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens - und Schaffensbild » , completed by Max Auer (1922, 1928, 1932, 1937) .

A 4 volume comprehensive biography of Bruckner (published 1922-1937) based on materials collected by August Göllerich was edited by his collaborator Max Auer (1880-1962) .

Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner : Sein Leben und Werk » . With plates. Including portraits, fac-simili and music, 19 cm ; Amalthea - Bücherei Verlag, Zürich - Leipzig - Wien (1923) - Amalthea, Wien (1966) .

Volumes 2 to 4 edited and completed by Max Auer (1880-1962) « Nach dessen Tod ergänzt und herausgegeben von Max Auer » - ISBN : 3764920963, 9783764920968.

« Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens - und Schaffensbild ; von August Göllerich Junior (1859-1923) und Max Auer » (in 1935) , Gustav Bosse, Regensburg (1938) ; 9 volumes. Reprint of the 1922-1938 edition (1974) .

The earliest book length biography of Bruckner, however, was by Rudolf Louis in 1905 (« Anton Bruckner », G. Müller-Verlag, München, 1905) . Louis' report concerning Bruckner's youthful engagement with the town of Steyr mentions the great organ and the friendliness of Bruckner's reception there.

August Göllerich (2 Juli 1859 in Linz ; gestorben 16 März 1923 in Ebenda) war ein österreichischer Pianist, Dirigent und Musikschriftsteller.

Der Sohn des Welser Stadtsekretärs und späteren Reichsrats und Landtagsabgeordneten August Göllerich und dessen Gattin Maria, geborene Nowotny, wuchs in gutbürgerlichen Verhältnissen in der Linzer Baumbachstraße 16 auf. Eine Gedenktafel an diesem Haus weist auf seinen Aufenthaltsort hin. Sein Vater war Mitglied eines liberalen Schriftsteller und Literatenvereines in Wels. Der von Haus aus katholisch erzogene Göllerich besuchte nach der Trivialschule in Wels die Linzer Realschule, die er mit der Matura abschloß. Hier wohnte er vorerst bei Rudolf Ritter von Hoyer, später bei den Schwestern Anna und Eleonore Löffler. 1868 erhielt er seinen ersten Klavierunterricht in Wels durch einen Herrn Oberhuber und später bei dem ursprünglich aus Rostock stammenden Linzer Musiklehrer August Wieck. Mittwochsabends traf er sich dort mit der mit ihm befreundeten Urfahrerin Ludovika Rohr zum vierhändigen Klavierspiel.

Mit den Schriften Richard Wagners befasste er sich bereits als Vierzehnjähriger im Jahr 1873. In diesem Jahr trat er in Wels bei einem Wohltätigkeitskonzert auf, wobei er einen ersten Erfolg erntete. Allerdings war er bereits seit seinem elften Lebensjahr in Wels öffentlich aufgetreten und hatte auch schon Einführungen in musikalische Werke geschrieben.

Nach bestandener Matura begann der hervorragende Mathematiker ein Studium an der Technischen Hochschule in Wien, wo er ein Mittellosigkeitszeugnis vorlegte und ein Stipendium für das Sommersemester 1878 in Höhe von 60 Gulden gewährt bekam. Seinen Wunsch, das Technikstudium abbrechen zu dürfen, um sich ganz der musikalischen Theorie und Praxis zu widmen, wurde seitens des Vaters abschlägig beschieden, wohl weil dieser aus eigener Anschauung das Los vieler Künstler kannte. Niemand Geringerer als Anton Bruckner hatte Göllerichs Vater schon um Hilfe gebeten, und er wollte derlei finanzielle Sorgen seinem Sohn wohl ersparen. Durch seinen Vater lernte August Göllerich schon früh Bruckner kennen, da diese miteinander gut befreundet waren. Nach dem Tod seines Vaters im Jahre 1883 wendete er sich vom technischen Studium ab und zur Gänze der Musik zu. Er begann sich eingehend mit Robert Schumanns und Johannes Brahmsens Werken sowie mit Richard Wagners Harmonik und Hector Berlioz' Instrumentationskunst zu befassen.

Göllerich arbeitete als Sekretär für Anton Bruckner und für Franz Liszt, dessen Klavierschüler er an der Universität Wien seit 1884 war. Nach Liszts Tod 1886 arbeitete er als Musikkritiker in Wien. Von 1890 bis 1896 war er Leiter der Ramann-Volckmann'schen Musikschule in Nürnberg. Das Amt des Direktors der Linzer Musikvereinsschule übte er von 1896 bis zu seinem Tod im Jahr 1923 aus, wodurch er auch künstlerischer Leiter der Musikvereinskonzerte sowie Chormeister des « Sängerbundes » war. Durch sein Engagement wurde Linz zu einer Musikstadt ersten Ranges ; er führte die wichtigsten Werke von Liszt und Bruckner erstmals in Linz auf. Während seiner Tätigkeit als Dirigent arbeitete er nur mit heimischen Musikern und Sängern. Göllerich war mit Gisela Pászthory-Voigt, ebenfalls eine Liszt-Schülerin und Mutter des Komponisten Casimir von Pászthory, verheiratet.

Bereits im Jahr 1922 forderte Göllerich die Errichtung eines Brucknerhauses.

Die Anton Bruckner Privatuniversität ist im Besitz seiner Tagebücher, in denen seine Erinnerungen an Liszt festgehalten sind.

Musiker August Göllerich Junior (1859-1923) feiert just im Kulturhauptstadtjahr von Linz seinen 150. Geburtstag. Umso mehr passt er wunderbar ins Klangbild von Linz.

August Göllerich kam am 2 Juli 1859 zur Welt. Sein Vater, August senior, schickte den Filius in die Realschule. Dort entwickelte sich der Junior zum herausragenden Mathematiker, der als Neunjähriger erstmals Klavierunterricht erhielt. Später inskribierte August junior auf Drängen des Herrn Papa an der Technischen Universität Wien. August junior befasste sich jedoch schon sehr früh mit den Schriften Richard Wagners, ja, die Musik nahm ihn gefangen.

Sein Vater jedoch blieb hart und verwehrte es ihm, zur Musik zu wechseln, da er selbst viele brotlose Künstler dieser Zeit kannte. Darunter beispielsweise auch Anton Bruckner, der seinerzeit noch nicht berühmte Gottesmusikant aus Sankt Florian bei Linz. Als der Vater jedoch starb, wechselte August junior doch ins Musikfach, er wurde Sekretär von Anton Bruckner und Franz Liszt, dessen Klavierschüler er 1884 an der Wiener Universität wurde. Zu seiner Wiener Zeit meinte er später :

« Als exklusiver Schumann und Brahms Enthusiast war ich nach Wien gekommen, als Schüler Anton Bruckners, als Mitarbeiter des Wagner-Museums und als Freund Hugo Wolfs war ich in meinen künstlerischen Anschauungen gereift, als mich das Kennenlernen des Liszt'schen Schaffens in tiefster Seele traf. »

Ab dem Jahre 1890 wirkte August Göllerich in Nürnberg, wo er die Ramann-Volkmar'sche Musikschule leitete, sein musikpädagogisches Wirken begann und dirigierte. Auch die Liebe fürs's Leben fand er in Gisela von Paszthory, eine Vorzeige-Klavierschülerin von Franz Liszt. Den im Sterben liegenden Komponisten betreute August Göllerich zuvor bis 1886 in Bayreuth.

Darauf die Tochter von Franz Liszt, Cosima Wagner, in einem Brief an ihn :

« Es ist mir eine Freude gewesen, lieber Herr Göllerich, Ihnen das Andenken zu übereichen. Und wenn mir anderes gelassen worden wäre, so seien Sie versichert, daß ich Ihnen, der Sie mit mir die feierliche Stunde der Befreiung (Anmerkung Todesstunde) bewahrten, sei es ein Buch, sei es ein Notenheft oder sonstiges Intimes zugedacht hätte. »

Aus « Anhänglichkeit an meine Vaterstadt » kehrte August Göllerich anno 1896 nach Linz zurück und wurde hier Direktor des Linzer Musikvereins, künstlerischer Leiter der Musikvereinskonzerte und Chorleiter des « Sängerbundes Frohsinn ». Nach dem Tod Anton Bruckners regte er die Gründung einer Stiftung an, « aus welcher die regelmäßige Aufführung aller großen Werke des Meisters in volkstümlichen Festkonzerten des Musikvereins sichergestellt werden sollte ». In Wahrheit entstanden nach dem Ableben von August Göllerich die « Bruckner Gesellschaft » und der « Bruckner Bund » .

Der Dirigent brachte viele Werke von Franz Liszt und Anton Bruckner zur Erstaufführung. Linz avancierte damit zur Musikstadt allererster Güte. Dazu der Dirigent und Komponist Bernhard Paumgartner, der unter Göllerichs Stabführung musizierte :

« Es hat damals unter ihm einzigartige und unwiederholbare Musikfeste gegeben. Der edle Göllerich hat in Linz so liebevoll dirigiert wie kein anderer. »

Die heutige Bruckner-Universität besitzt die Göllerich-Tagebücher, in denen er seine Erinnerungen an Franz Liszt verewigte. Heute erinnert an August Göllerich eine Gedenktafel auf seinem Geburtshaus in der Baumbachstraße 16, sowie die « Göllerichstraße » am Froschberg und der Göllerich-Saal in der Bruckner-Uni in Linz an den großen Künstler von einst.

Grabstätten Bedeutender Persönlichkeiten (1924) : Urnenhain Urfahr (2/84) - Stadtteil : Hartmayrsiedlung.

August Göllerich wurde 1859 in Linz geboren, besuchte die Realschule und studierte Mathematik und Physik in Wien, wandte sich aber mehr der Musik zu und wurde Schüler und Freund von Franz Liszt, dessen Sekretär er 1884 wurde. Enge Verbindungen bestanden auch mit Anton Bruckner. Von 1890 bis 1896 war August Göllerich Leiter der Ramanschen Musikschule in Nürnberg und anschließend bis 1923 Direktor der Musikvereinsschule in Linz und damit auch künstlerischer Leiter der Musikvereinskonzerte sowie Chorleiter des « Sängerbundes ». Linz wurde durch Göllerich zur Musikstadt ersten Ranges. Er organisierte 1910 das erste oberösterreichische Musikfest, das dem Schaffen Anton Bruckners gewidmet war.

Während seiner Dirigententätigkeit in Linz arbeitete er ausschließlich mit heimischen Musikern und Sängern, von denen das dreißig Mann starke Theaterorchester eine Kerntruppe bildete, aber zu den Symphonieorchestern ergänzt werden mußte und dann bis zu 150 Mann stark war. August Göllerich starb 1923 in Linz.

Eine Gedenktafel befindet sich seit 1973 an seinem Geburtshaus an der Baumbachstraße.

L'élève Guido Adler

Le musicologue autrichien Guido Adler est né le 1er novembre 1855 à Eibenschütz, en Moravie (alors possession de l'Empire austro-hongois ; aujourd'hui Ivančice, en République tchèque) et est mort le 15 février 1941 à Vienne.

Sa famille s'installe à Vienne en 1864. 4 ans plus tard, le jeune Guido commence à étudier la théorie de la musique et la composition au Conservatoire de Vienne auprès d'Anton Bruckner. Se destinant à une carrière juridique, Adler entreprend parallèlement des études de droit à l'Université de Vienne, où il obtient son doctorat en 1878. À l'Université, il donne, en 1875 et 1876, une série de conférences sur la Tétralogie de Richard Wagner ; celles-ci seront publiées en 1904 à Leipzig : « Richard Wagner : Vorlesungen gehalten an der Universität zu Wien » . Il fonde, avec le chef Felix Mottl notamment, l' « Akademischer Wagnerverein » (la Société académique Wagner) .

Influencé par les travaux des grands historiens de la musique de l'époque, Adler abandonne le droit et soutient, en 1880, une thèse de doctorat consacrée à la musique occidentale avant 1600 (« Die historischen Grundclassen der christlich-abendländischen Musik bis 1600 ») , qu'il complète, l'année suivante, par une étude sur l'histoire de l'harmonie (« Studie zur Geschichte der Harmonie ») . Avec Philipp Spitta et Friedrich Chrysander, Guido Adler fonde, en 1884, la revue trimestrielle de musicologie « Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft » . L'année suivante, il est nommé professeur d'histoire de la musique à l'Université allemande de Prague.

En 1888, il propose au gouvernement autrichien de publier une édition des grandes œuvres musicales autrichiennes. Ce projet aboutit à la création de « Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » (Monuments de la musique en Autriche) , dont 83 volumes seront édités sous sa direction de 1894 à 1938.

En 1892, Guido Adler est chargé de l'organisation de la section musique de l'Exposition internationale de musique et de théâtre de Vienne. En 1898, il succède à Eduard Hanslick comme professeur d'histoire de la musique à l'Université de Vienne.

Élève d'Anton Bruckner et du chef Otto Dessoff au Conservatoire de Vienne, Guido Adler se destina néanmoins au droit avant de s'orienter vers la musique, et plus spécialement son histoire. En 1884, il fonda avec Chrysander et Spitta la revue « Vierteljahrsschrift für Musikwissenschaft » , et, en 1885, fut nommé professeur de musicologie à l'Université allemande de Prague. Succédant à Eduard Hanslick, il enseigna à l'Université de Vienne (1898-1927) et en fonda l'Institut de musicologie (« Musikwissenschaftliches Institut ») , qui devint un modèle pour de nombreux pays. Dès leur fondation, il fut l'éditeur des « Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » (1894-1938) , vaste entreprise d'édition de la musique autrichienne du passé (toujours poursuivie aujourd'hui) , dont il assumait lui-même plusieurs volumes, et de leur revue musicologique d'accompagnement « Studien zur Musikwissenschaft » (1913-1938) . Il attachait surtout son nom à la critique stylistique : en témoigne son ouvrage « Der Stil in der Musik » (1911) . On lui doit aussi « Methode der Musikgeschichte » (1919) , un livre sur son ami Gustav Mahler (1916) et « Wollen und Wirken » (autobiographie, 1935) . En 1924, il édita « Handbuch der Musikgeschichte » , dont il avait rédigé lui-même les chapitres « Périodes de l'histoire de la musique » , « L'École classique viennoise » et « Généralités sur l'époque moderne » . Il organisa les célébrations des centennaires de la mort de Franz-Joseph Haydn et de Ludwig van Beethoven (en 1909 et en 1927) , et, après ces dernières, participa activement à la fondation de la Société internationale de musicologie, dont il devint Président d'honneur. À l'occupation de l'Autriche (1938) , il dut cesser toute activité.

The Bohemian-Austrian musicologist, teacher and writer Guido Adler was born on 1 November 1855 in Eibenschütz, Moravia, Austrian Empire Ivančice (now Ivančice, Czech Republic) ; and died on 15 February 1941 in Vienna. He was of the founders of modern musicology.

His father Joachim, a physician, died of typhoid fever in 1857. Joachim contracted the illness from a patient, and therefore told his wife Franciska to « never allow any of the children to become a doctor » .

Adler studied at the University of Vienna and, at the same time (1868-1874) , the Vienna Conservatory of Music where he studied piano (main subject) and music theory and composition under Anton Bruckner and Otto Dessoff. He received an arts diploma from the Conservatory, in 1874. In 1878, he graduated from University of Vienna as doctor of jurisprudence and, in 1880, as doctor of philosophy. His dissertation, « Die Grundklassen der Christlich-Abendländischen Musik bis 1600 » (The Chief Divisions of Western Church Music, up to 1600) , was reprinted in the « Allgemeine Musikzeitung » .

In 1883, Adler became lecturer in musicology at University of Vienna, on which occasion he wrote « Eine Studie zur Geschichte der Harmonie » (An Essay on the History of Harmony) , published in the « Sitzungsberichte der Philosophisch-Historischen Klasse der Wiener Academie der Wissenschaften » , in 1881.

In 1884, he founded (with Friedrich Chrysander and Philipp Spitta) the « Vierteljahresschrift für Musikwissenschaft » (Musicology Quarterly) . Adler provided the 1st article of the 1st issue, « Umfang, Methode und Ziel der Musikwissenschaft » (The Scope, Method, and Aim of Musicology) , in 1885, which not only constitutes the 1st attempt at a comprehensive description of the study of music, but also famously divides the discipline into 2 sub-disciplines, « historische Musikwissenschaft » (historical musicology) and « systematische Musikwissenschaft » (systematic musicology) . In Adler's article, systematic musicology included « Musikologie » or « vergleichende Musikwissenschaft » (comparative musicology) , which later became an independent discipline (ethnomusicology) . Although these subfields do not exactly line-up with current practice, they are roughly maintained in modern European musicology and roughly correspond to the North American the division of musicology into music history (often called « musicology ») , music theory, and ethnomusicology.

In 1885, he was called to the newly established German University of Prague, Bohemia, as ordinary professor of the history and theory of music and, in 1898, in the same capacity, to the University of Vienna, where he succeeded Eduard Hanslick. His students at the « Musikwissenschaftliches Institut » included Anton Webern and composer Karel Navrátil.

In 1886, he published « Die Wiederholung und Nachahmung in der Mehrstimmigkeit » ; in 1888, « Ein Satz eines Unbekannten Beethovenischen Klavierkonzerts » . In 1892-1893, he edited a selection of musical compositions of the Emperors Ferdinand III, Leopold I, and Joseph I (2 volumes) . Between 1894 and 1938, he was editor of the « Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » , a seminal publication in music history.

Adler was one of the founders of musicology as a discipline (« Musikwissenschaft ») . He was also among the 1st scholars in music to recognize the relevance of socio-cultural factors to music (« Musiksoziologie ») , thereby providing a broader context for æsthetic criticism which, with biography, had been the primary focus of 19th Century music scholarship. Empirical study was for him the most important part of the discipline. His own emphasis was on the music of Austria, specifically the music of the « 1st Viennese School » : Haydn, Mozart and their contemporaries.

Guido Adler's family moved to Vienna in 1864 and, 4 years later, he began to study music theory and composition with Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory. Intending to pursue a career in law, Adler studied at the Vienna University, receiving a doctoral degree in 1878. During this period, he gave a series of lectures on Richard Wagner at the University (later published as « Richard Wagner » , in 1904) and, in cooperation with the conductor Felix Mottl, established the « Akademischer Wagnerverein » (Academic Wagner Society) .

Influenced by the writings of outstanding contemporaries in the field of music history, Adler abandoned law ; he wrote a dissertation on Western music before 1600 and was awarded a Ph.D. in 1880. 2 years later, he became a lecturer and completed a work on the history of harmony. In collaboration with Philipp Spitta and Karl Franz Friedrich Chrysander, Adler founded the « Viertel-jahresschrift für Musikwissenschaft » (Quarterly of Musicology) , in 1884. The following year, he was appointed professor of the history of music at the German University at Prague.

In 1888, he recommended that the Austrian government publish an edition of great Austrian music. This project came into being as the « Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich » (Monuments of Music in Austria) , and Adler was its general editor, from 1894 to 1938 ; producing 83 volumes in the series.

In 1892, Adler became organizer of the music section of the International Music and Theatre Exhibition in Vienna. In 1898, Adler was named professor of music history at the Vienna University, where he founded an institute devoted to musicological research. His lectures were popular and were attended by students from throughout Europe. A considerable number of his pupils later attained fame as composers or musicologists. In addition to music history, Adler's interests extended to contemporary music ; he developed a close friendship with Gustav Mahler, about whom he published a book, in 1916, and he also admired the work of Arnold Schönberg.

As one of the earliest musicologists, Adler articulated the major principles and methods of the new discipline as it was taking form in the late- 19th Century ; he was the 1st music historian to emphasize style criticism in research. His attitudes and procedures are evident in the « Handbuch der Musikgeschichte » (Handbook of Music History) , of which he became the editor, in 1924.

A scholar, writer, critic, and founder of the field of Musicology, Guido Adler was an important figure in international music circles for nearly 50 years.

Born in Eibenschutz, Moravia, in 1855, Adler studied music theory and composition at the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , the Vienna Conservatory. Graduated in 1875, Adler decided against a career as a composer and instead studied law. He received his law degree, in 1878. A practicing attorney for 3 brief months, Adler decided music was his true love and returned to school at the University of Vienna where he received his Ph.D. , in 1880. Adler taught in Prague and at the University of Vienna until his retirement, in 1927.

As a teacher Adler's impact was enormous. In addition to the many students who went on to become important musicologists in their own right, he founded « Quarterly for Musicology » , created scholarly Festivals on Haydn and Beethoven, published numerous authoritative works of musicology and began publishing « Monuments of Music in Austria » : a work he edited for 44 years.

The Guido Adler Collection, MS No. 769, consists of 74 boxes of documents ranging from correspondence with all the major figures in music of his day to clippings of concert reviews.

The Guido Adler Collection is a singular, extremely rich source of information for the history of music and the field of musicology for a period of nearly 5 decades. The collection is primarily in German.

Guido Adler (geboren 1. November 1855 in Eibenschütz, Mähren ; gestorben 15. Februar 1941 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Musikwissenschaftler. Er gilt als Begründer der Wiener Musikwissenschaft.

Guido Adler war der Sohn eines Arztes. Nach dessen frühem Tode (1856) zog die Mutter mit ihren sechs unversorgten Kindern nach Iglau, wo Adler die Volksschule besuchte und ersten Klavierunterricht erhielt. Eine kaiserliche Gnadenpension und die Unterstützung der Verwandten ermöglichten der Familie den Lebensunterhalt. 1864 kam er nach Wien, wo er ab September 1869 das Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien besuchte. Seine Lehrer waren Wilhelm Schenner und Josef Dachs (Klavier), Anton Bruckner in Harmonielehre (als Nebenfach) und Otto Dessoff (Theorie und Komposition). Nach dem Abitur im Jahre 1873 studierte er zusätzlich Jura, das er 1878 mit der Promotion beendete. Er arbeitete jedoch nur drei Monate als Rechtsanwalt. Im Juni 1874 machte er am Konservatorium sein Pianistendiplom. Zunächst entschied er sich jedoch gegen eine Karriere als Komponist.

Mit seinen Mitschülern am Konservatorium Arthur Nikisch und Felix Mottl überreichte er Richard Wagner einen Ehrenpokal. Als Wortführer der Konservatoristen hielt er eine Ansprache an Franz Liszt. Adler war Mitbegründer des Akademischen Wagnervereins und hielt als solcher 1875-1876 einen Zyklus von Vorträgen zur Einführung in den Ring des Nibelungen. Durch die Arbeiten von August Wilhelm Ambros, Friedrich Chrysander, Otto Jahn und Philipp Spitta wurden seine musikhistorischen Neigungen geweckt und nach kurzer Praxis am Wiener Handelsgericht wandte er sich ganz der Musikwissenschaft zu. Bei seinem Studium förderte ihn der Wiener Ordinarius Eduard Hanslick.

1888 regte er mit einer Denkschrift über die Herausgabe von Monumenta historiae musices auf internationaler Basis an, neben Denkmäler-Publikationen auch Dokumente und Quellschriften historischer und theoretischer Art zu edieren. Sie wurde zunächst auf die Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich begrenzt, die seit 1894 unter Adlers Leitung in 83 Bänden bis 1938 ununterbrochen erschienen. 1892 organisierte er die musikhistorische Abteilung der Internationalen Musik- und Theaterausstellung in Wien und veranlasste die österreichische Regierung zum Ankauf der Trienter Codices.

Das von ihm gegründete Musikhistorische Institut Wien wurde zum Mittelpunkt der österreichischen Musikforschung. Die 1913-1938 als Beihefte der Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich jährlich erscheinenden Studien zur Musikwissenschaft brachten wertvolle Abhandlungen aus Adlers Schule. Er organisierte die internationalen musikwissenschaftlichen Kongresse zu Haydn (1909) und der Beethoven-Zentenarfeier (1927) in Wien.

1927 gab er die Anregung zur Gründung der Internationalen Gesellschaft für Musikwissenschaft mit dem Sitz in Basel, als deren Ehrenpräsident er bis zu seinem Tode fungierte. Im gleichen Jahre trat er vom Lehramt zurück, behielt jedoch die Leitung der Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich bei, bis ihm 1938 die publizistische Tätigkeit versagt wurde. Seine wertvolle Bibliothek wurde nach seinem Tode auf Betreiben seines undankbaren Schülers Erich Schenk beschlagnahmt und ohne Entschädigung der Erben den von ihm begründeten Seminaren zugewiesen.

Guido Adler wurde von der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde zum Ehrenmitglied ernannt. 1938 wurde die Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien faktisch aufgelöst, erst unter kommissarische Leitung gestellt und dann unter Beibehaltung des Namens der Wiener Staatstheater- und Bühnenakademie eingegliedert. Während der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus erfolgte aufgrund antisemitischer Einstellung eine Aberkennung der Ehrenmitgliedschaft. Adler wurde zusätzlich in Herbert Gerigks Lexikon der Juden in der Musik diskriminiert und dort mit einem bewusst falschen Todesdatum eingetragen (14. Dezember 1933) . Seit der Wiedererrichtung der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien 1945 wird Guido Adler (wie auch Bruno Walter, Karl Goldmark und andere) wieder als Ehrenmitglied geführt.

Im März 1941 ließ seine Tochter ihn in aller Stille beisetzen, 1980 erfolgte die Umbettung aus einem gewöhnlichen Urnenfeld in ein Ehrengrab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Gruppe 32 C, Nummer 51) . 1998 waren in der Ausstellung « 100 Jahre Institut für Musikwissenschaft der Universität Wien » Guido Adler zwei eigene Vitrinen von der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien gewidmet worden.

Sein Sohn Achim Adler emigrierte bereits früher in die USA. Seine Tochter Melanie Karoline Adler wurde im Mai 1942 von Wien nach Minsk deportiert und am 26. Mai 1942 im Vernichtungslager Maly Trostinez ermordet.

Guido Adler war ein ruhiger Zeitgenosse. So jedenfalls muß Gustav Mahler ihn empfunden haben. Mahler soll über ihn gesagt haben : « Wenn ich allein sein will, gehe ich mit Guido Adler spazieren. » .

1919 : Veröffentlichung des Buches « Methode der Musikgeschichte » . Hier stellte er seine « Methode » vor, die lange Zeit die Entwicklung der « historischen » Musikwissenschaft beeinflusste.

1924 : Veröffentlichung des « Handbuch(s) der Musikgeschichte » , im Zusammenwirken mit zahlreichen Fachkollegen.

1927 : Organisation der Beethoven- Zentenarfeier. Wie die Haydn- Zentenarfeier 1909 war die Beethoven- Zentenarfeier ein kulturelles Großereignis im damaligen Wien.

1935 : Autobiographie « Wollen und Wirken » .

1938 : Mit dem Einmarsch der Deutschen am 12. März 1938 nach Österreich wurden Adler, aufgrund der am 15. September 1935 erlassenen Nürnberger Gesetze, die staatsbürgerlichen Grundrechte automatisch aberkannt. Da er Jude war, wurde ihm auch die publizistische Tätigkeit untersagt. Mit einem Schreiben an Kardinal Innitzer zog er sich von der Präsidentschaft der « Denkmäler » (Der Tonkunst in Österreich - DTÖ) zurück. Wegen seiner großen internationalen Bekanntheit wurden sein Leben und seine Wohnung bis zu seinem Ableben verschont. Jedoch wurde er gezwungen, den Rest seines Lebens in seiner Villa in der Lannerstraße in Hausarrest zu verbringen.

1941 : Adler sollte deportiert werden. Durch verschiedene Interventionen, und andere durch Gutachten von Erich Schenk und Rechtsanwalt Adolf Leischner, wurde die Deportation verhindert.

14. Februar 1941 : Gestorben in Wien. Bestattung im Wiener Krematorium. Die Urne wurde später (Datum unbekannt) in ein Ehrengrab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof überführt. Nach seinem Tod wurde seine Privatbibliothek ohne Entschädigung beschlagnahmt.

Glücklicherweise wurde die Bibliothek nicht vernichtet, sondern dem Musikwissenschaftlichen Seminar (dem ehemals von ihm begründeten Musikhistorischen Institut) zugewiesen. Sein Sohn Achim war bereits früher in die USA emigriert. Seine Tochter Melitta wurde nach seinem Tode in Theresienstadt ermordet.

L'élève Guido Peters

Le pianiste et compositeur styrien Guido Peters est né le 29 novembre 1866 à Graz et est mort le 11 janvier 1937 à Vienne. De 1875 à 1882, il étudie au Conservatoire de Vienne auprès de Wilhelm Schenner, Julius Epstein (piano) ; et de Franz Krenn (théorie musicale) . En 1889, il devient l'élève de Anton Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne. Puis, il poursuit une double carrière comme pianiste et compositeur. Il effectue de nombreuses tournées de concerts, n'oubliant jamais d'ajouter des œuvres de Jean-Sébastien Bach au répertoire Classique et Romantique. En 1926, il obtient un poste titulaire de professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne.

Son style (qui puise chez Ludwig van Beethoven et Franz Schubert) se veut une médiation entre la musique de Brahms et de Bruckner. Il écrit dans tous les genres (on compte, entre autres, 3 Symphonies) . En 1921 et 1926, 2 de ses Opus symphoniques sont programmées par l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Vienne. Issues pour la plupart de l'idiome du Romantisme finissant, ses œuvres connaissent un succès considérable au cours des 3 Ires décennies du 20e siècle. Malheureusement, elles ont disparu depuis.

Dimanche, 8 décembre 1929 (à 16h30) : Concert à la grande salle du « Musikverein » de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne dirigé par Martin Spörr avec, comme soliste invité, le pianiste Guido Peters.

Au programme :

Ludwig van Beethoven : Symphonie n° 4 en si bémol majeur, Opus 60.

Ludwig van Beethoven : Concerto n° 4 en sol majeur pour piano et orchestre, Opus 58.

(Extrait)

Ludwig van Beethoven : Symphonie n° 5 en ut mineur, Opus 67.

Peters est inhumé au cimetière central de Vienne (« Wiener Zentralfriedhof ») .

Une plaque commémorative orne sa maison du 3 de la « Hartiggasse » , à Graz.

The Styrian pianist and composer Guido Peters was born on 29 November 1866 in Graz and died on 11 January 1937 in Vienna. From 1875 to 1882, he studied at the Vienna Conservatory under Wilhelm Schenner, Julius Epstein (piano) ; and Franz Krenn (music theory) . In 1889, he became a student of Anton Bruckner at the University of Vienna.

The Symphonic form initiated by Anton Bruckner symbolizes the summum of Austrian instrumental music. The assimilation of the Beethoven tradition plus the acquaintings with the Wagner-Liszt movement fed Bruckner's imagination to the eternal fountain of traditional folk-music. He has made school ; let's only mention Gustav Mahler and Guido Peters. But did Bruckner also exercise some influence on his favourite student, Hugo Wolf ? Wilhelm Mauke believes so :

« The Romantic mysticism of Hugo Wolf originates from the religious world of his teacher, Bruckner. He overcame all the showers of death through the positive power of supernatural faith by worshipping the genuflection before eternity, the majestic tongue roar of his Chorales. »

From 1897 to 1901, Peters studied with piano teacher Erich Wolf Degner at the « Musikverein » of Styria. He lived in Munich from 1901 to 1903 ; and, mainly in Vienna, from 1905.

He pursued a dual career as a pianist and composer. He made numerous concert tours, playing the works of Johann Sebastian Bach alongside the Classical and Romantic repertoire. In 1921 and 1926, 2 of his Symphonic works were performed by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1926, he obtained a professorship at the Vienna Conservatory. He composed in most genres and his works (influenced by Beethoven and Schubert) are essentially written in the late-Romantic idiom which makes him a mediator between Johannes Brahms and Anton Bruckner. They enjoyed considerable success during the 1st 3 decades of the 20th Century but, sadly, have disappeared since then. Guido Peters is buried in the Central Cemetery (« Wiener Zentralfriedhof ») .

A sketch-book of Ludwig van Beethoven's, probably that for the year 1809, has been found by « Herr » Guido Peters, of Berlin, among his father's papers. It contains the draft for the Concerto in E-flat and the « Choral Fantasie » , and the sketch for a patriotic song, which he never finished.

Filling for an indisposed Oskar Nedhal, young Bruno Walter presided over the 1st Viennese performance of Guido Peters' Symphony No. 2 in E minor, played by the « Tonkünstler Orchester » , on February 3, 1910. (Before, Ferdinand Löwe conducted the 1st and 4th movements.)

Guido Peters' 2nd String Quartet, which dates from 1910, must be considered a very noteworthy work. The 1st movement, « Allegro con brio, poco patetico » , has a dramatic and highly-effective main-theme which is full of passion. Still more striking is the lyrical 2nd subject. The following, deeply felt « Andante sostenuto » has the character of a lament but there is also lighter middle-section. This is a magnificent and very poetic movement. The 3rd movement, « Sehr rasch und deutlich » , is a spirited Scherzo, which along the way, in a muted section, becomes highly-atmospheric. There is also a contrasting Trio with a lovely melody. The Finale begins with a recitative introduction, « Sostenuto » , in which the main-theme appears again, but this time in the major. The main section, « Allegro con brio » is both tonally attractive finely written.

The performance of a Peters' String Quartet by the Gottesmann Quartet, in 1922, is mentioned in « The Musical Times » and in the singing-class circular (issue of 1 December 1922) . However, this one seems to have been performed earlier still (in 1911) by the Fitzner Quartet ; description as « No. 2 » may reflect, perhaps, the order of composition (unlikely though, since the A major was composed in 1911-1912) but not that of publication or premiere. (No. 2 seems, at least, to have been premiered slightly before No.1, and the 2 published almost simultaneously in 1918.)

From the Autobiography of Lincoln Steffens (Volume I)

... He found somewhere and brought home one day Guido Peters, an Austrian student of music, who swept us into his enthusiasm and made us also students of music. Leipzig was a music center, and Guido knew everybody and everything in that distinct and devoted world. He got all the concert programs long in advance, gave us lectures on each composer and his work, illustrated. Sitting at his piano, he would pull a piece to pieces, playing it analytically and then straight through, with comments, explanations, and criticism. The weekly event was the « Gewandhaus » concert, on Monday nights. Guido brought home the next program Tuesday and, day by day, he would work with us to make us familiar with it, till on Friday, we all went together to the last private rehearsal to which music students were admitted ; on Saturday, we heard the public rehearsal ; and, on Monday night, we were quite ready to appreciate the finished concert. And so, with all the other good music given in Leipzig that winter : we had it over and over till we knew it, inside and out ; harmoniously and mathematically, sensually, scientifically, and artistically.

In return for our interest in his subject, Guido Peters took some in our subjects. He heard a lecture with us, now and then, went with us to the art galleries of Dresden and Berlin. He did not care much for the science and the history of art and ethics. He preferred art for art's sake, art's and love's. For he was in love, not with any girl in Leipzig, but with many girls at home, in Austria. He wrote love-letters to his several sweethearts whom he loved - « all » , he said, « equally. I pour-out my whole heart to the one I am writing to, turn to the next, and I pour-out my whole heart to her » . And he always wanted to read us the last 2 or 3 of those letters ; and he did, till I stopped him one day.

« No » , I protested, « don't read it. Play it on the piano. »

He looked uncomprehending a moment, then saw the point, leaped to the piano, and he played the letters. He played them all after that and, finally, by way of an experiment in applied psychology, I got him to play a letter he was full of, before he wrote it. The effect astonished him. He didn't have to write it. « Nay » , he exclaimed, « I can't write it now. » Of course not. When he played a love-letter, he was a lover in love, he poured forth his whole heart to us and, after the orgy of it, there was nothing for him or for us to do but go down to the river, take a boat, and row slowly, softly, sentimentally up the river, the pretty little river under the trees and, in the silence of our hearts, listen to the nightingales.

A serious matter for me, these debauches. To Johann, it was merely music ; to Guido himself, it was art and love ; that's all. The Germans are sentimental idiots when drunk like that. But we, Americans, are a practical race. When we are moved, we are moved to action. If we get drunk, we want to break something. I broke an engagement and married.

Guido and his music and his love for his remote girls were not alone to blame for my conduct. The coming of spring at the wrong time (right after the winter) had something to do with it ; and, then, there were Wundt's lectures and the hard scientific spirit of the experimental laboratory. « We want facts, nothing but facts » , he used to declare. The laboratory where we sought the facts and measured them by machinery was a graveyard where the old idealism walked as a dreadful ghost and philosophical thinking was a sin. One day when the good old professor was looking over us and our works, his one seeing eye fell upon William James' great book on psychology, just out. Wundt had almost blinded himself by the abuse of his eyes in experimentation ; he had but one tiny spot in one retina that could see. He picked-up James, fixed his one spot on the 1st page and beginning, at once, to read, started-off like a somnambulist for the door.

Then, he remembered, turned, and asked my indulgence. « Sis erlauben ? » When I « allowed » , he went on reading and walking into his own room. The next morning, he came back, laid the book on my table, and thanked me.

« You have read it ? » I asked, astonished.

« All night long » , he answered. « Word for word, every word. »

And his familiars told me afterward that this was literally true. He had sat down with the book when he got it from me, read it word by word, as he had to with his eye-spot, and finished it the moment he returned it to me. As he was about to leave it with me, I stopped him with a question :What about it ?

« Well, and - ? » I said. (« Na, und - »)

« It is literature, it is beautiful » , he stammered, « but it is not psychology » .

Against this, I always like to put a story Wundt's assistant, Külpe, told us after a visit to the neighboring University of Jena to see the aged philosopher Erdmann, whose history of philosophy, in some 10 volumes, we all had read and studied. They had a warm, friendly talk, the old scholar and the young scientist, all about the old philosophers and their systems. But when Külpe tried to draw him out on Wundt and the newer school, Erdmann shook his head, declaring that he could not understand the modern men.

« In my day » , he explained, « we used to ask the everlasting question :“ What is man ? ” And you - nowadays, you answer it, saying, “ He was an ape. ” » (« Er war ein Aff. »)

And, yet, Wundt had a philosophy, and not only of facts ; no, and not only of theories, either. He said that theories were only aids to experiment, which was the test. He taught and I learned from him the discipline, the caution, and the method of the experimental procedure of modern science. But Wundt, in practice, had established facts, he thought, by this method, and he built upon them conclusions which formed a system of philosophy written into several volumes. With an ethics, too, it was all complete. Well, we knew it. It was under attack at the time. Some fresh, young men were challenging, with facts, with experimentally determined data, some of the very foundations of Wundt's psychology, which, in turn, was the basis of Wundt's philosophy. We were working, for the truth, of course, but also we were fighting, and when we got results which confirmed Wundt we were glad, and when we got results that seemed to support the enemy ...

Some of us were looking over the laboratory records of an American student who had stood high with the Professor and, therefore, with us all. He had gone home, taken a professorship, and was holding high our colours. He became afterward one of the leading men in American science and education. His student papers were models of neatness, and as we looked we saw that they were a Masterpiece of caution, wisdom, and mathematical labor. The records of his experiment showed that he got, at 1st, results which would have given aid and comfort to the enemy and confounded one of Wundt's most axiomatic premises. He must have suffered, that promising young student ; it was his thesis for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy, which he needed for his career at home ; he must have thought, as a psychologist, that Wundt might have been reluctant to crown a discovery which would require the old philosopher to recast his philosophy and rewrite the published volumes of his lifework. The budding psychologist solved the ethical problem before him by deciding to alter his results, and his papers showed how he did this, by changing the figures item by item, experiment by experiment, so as to make the curve of his averages come-out for instead of against our school. After a few minutes of silent admiration of the mathematical feat performed on the papers before us, we buried sadly these remains of a great sacrifice to loyalty, to the school spirit, and to practical ethics.

Ethics ! There was no foundation in (experimental) psychology for a science of ethics ; not that I could find. There might be some day, when psychology itself is scientific. All I got-out of my year of German psychology was a lead into biology, on the one hand, and into sociology, on the other, a curiosity to hear and see what the French thought they knew about such matters and, best of all, a training in the experimental method. I decided to go to Paris for a year at the Sorbonne, and I began to change my subject from ethics to morals, from what ought to be done to what is done, and why. Lightly, I say this now, but to me, in the spring of 1891, the conflict of ideas and emotions was a crisis that weighed heavily on me. I had lost time. I had lost myself.

There is no made road across the sciences. To pursue an inquiry from one of them through others into another is like trying to travel cross-country in England without returning to London. The sciences are laid out within perpendicular lines. The physicists, chemists, biologists, and astronomers now are making tracks across their fields but, in my day, they also were fenced in, each man to his own « Fach » . My difficulties and my sense of defeat put me in a state of mind where Johann and his art, Guido Peters and his music and his loves, the river and the nightingales and the spring, and, yes, the baker girl and the « Mädel » in the back-room and the funny old landlady (with the regrets of all of them, and their laughter) all these were an inspiration to me to go and make love myself to a pretty American girl who sat behind me, at Wundt's lectures. It was unethical, but I did it, and it was good for some 19 years.

Guido Peters, Komponist und Pianist : geboren Graz, 29.11.1866 ; gestorben Wien, 11.01.1937. Sohn des Geologen und Mediziners Karl F. Peters ; absolvieren 1875-1882 das Wiener Konservatorium als Schüler von Wilhelm Schenner und Julius Epstein und Franz Krenn (Komposition) . Peters lebte 1901-1903 in München, ab 1905 vor allem in Wien, wo er 1926 den Professor Titel erhielt und von wo aus er als Konzertpianist viele Reisen unternahm ; in seinem Repertoire fanden sich zahlreiche Werke Johann Sebastian Bachs, die zu jener Zeit noch kaum wieder entdeckt worden waren, und der Wiener Klassiker und Romantiker. Als Komponist pflegte Peters eine klassizist. Manier, die ihn, von Ludwig van Beethoven und Franz Schubert ausgehend, als Vermittler zwischen Johannes Brahms und Anton Bruckner ausweist. Noch zu seinen Lebzeiten konstituierte sich in Wien für kurze Zeit eine Guido Peters Gemeinde.

L'élève Josef Vockner

Compositeur et organiste autrichien, le docteur Josef Vockner est né le 18 (ou 21) mars 1842 à Ebensee, en Haute-Autriche, et est mort le 11 septembre 1906 à Vienne. Son grand-père, Franz-Josef von Vockner (25 août 1778 - 18 mars 1814) , passera toute sa vie à Ebensee comme enseignant. Joseph Vockner reçoit localement des leçons de violon de l'instituteur Franz Steininger. À partir de 1858, il travaille comme commis dans une saline de Bad Ischl. À partir de 1860, il donne des leçons de piano et, plus tard, reprend son poste d'organiste à l'église paroissiale de Bad Ischl. Vers 1870, il va déménager à Vienne. Il deviendra organiste adjoint à l'église Saint-Augustin (Vienne, I) et à la « Altlerchenfelder Pfarrkirche » (Vienne, VII) . De 1876 à 1888, Josef Vockner est un élève privé (en théorie musicale) d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'avérera un proche confident pour le Maître de Saint-Florian. De 1890 à 1906, Vockner va enseigner au Conservatoire de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Société des Amis de la Musique) . En 1894, il sera nommé professeur d'orgue puis remplacera Bruckner, lors du décès de ce dernier. Josef Vockner aura parmi ses élèves : Matej Hubad, Rudolf Knarr, Carl Lafite, Ellen Pancera, Robert Pensch et Karl Wiesmann.

The Austrian composer and organist Josef Vockner was born on 18 (or 21) March 1842 in Ebensee, Upper-Austria ; and died on 11 September 1906 in Vienna. He was a pupil of Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory. He replaced him after his death (in October 1896) as organ teacher there. His students included : Matej Hubad, Rudolf Knarr, Carl Lafite, Ellen Pancera, Robert Pensch and Karl Wiesmann.

Piano Quintet in B-flat major, Opus 70 (1906) , for 2 violins, viola, violoncello and piano. Ist publication in 1914.

Josef Vockner (geboren 18. auch 21. März 1842 in Ebensee, Oberösterreich ; gestorben 11. September 1906 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Organist und Komponist.

Vockner war ein Schüler Anton Bruckners. Er war Orgellehrer am Wiener Konservatorium.

Urgroßvater Josef Vockner und Großvater Franz Vockner (geboren 25. August 1778 in Ebensee, Oberösterreich ; gestorben 18. März 1814 ebenda) waren Lehrer in Ebensee gewesen, Vockner selbst erhielt Violinunterricht vom Ebenseer Schullehrer Franz Steininger und arbeitete zunächst ab 1858 als Schreiber in der Saline Bad Ischl. Ab 1860 gab er nebenbei Klavierunterricht, später übernahm er das Organistenamt an der Ischler Pfarrkirche. Circa 1870 erfolgte seine Übersiedelung nach Wien, wo er und andere Organist an Sankt Augustin (Wien I) sowie an der Altlerchenfelder Kirche (Wien VII) war und Anton Bruckners privater Theorieschüler wurde (1876-1888) ; das größtenteils erhaltene

Unterrichtsmaterial stellt eine wertvolle Quelle für Bruckners Tätigkeit als Lehrer dar. 1890-1906 unterrichtete Vockner (jahrzehntelang enger Vertrauter Bruckners) in dessen Nachfolge Orgel am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (Professor, 1894) . Seine Kammer- und Kirchenmusik wurde häufig aufgeführt, gefördert vor allem durch Josef Hellmesberger Senior und Julius Epstein. Zu Vockners Schülern zählten Matej Hubad, Rudolf Knarr, Carl Lafite, Ellen Pancera, Robert Pensch und Karl Wiesmann.

Sein Vater, Josef Vockner (1806-1860) , war Rechnungsführer in der Saline und spielte Geige und Orgel Pflichtschule in Ebensee. 16jährig ist Josef Vockner junior Schreiberlehrling im Salinendienst er verläßt den Salinendienst und gibt privat Musikstunden, schon vor seinem Dienst als Organist in Ischl entstehen Kompositionen. 1871 Übersiedlung nach Wien, Organist an der Hofpfarrkirche Sankt Augustin und Altlerchenfeld. 1875 Verehelichung mit Sidonie Schönberger. Der sehr glücklichen Ehe Entstammen vier Kinder. 1876 Studium am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde bei Anton Bruckner in Wien. 1890 Nachfolger Anton Bruckners als Professor für Orgel am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde 1894 Verleihung des Tittels « Professor am Conservatorium » (der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde) .

Vockner war auch Komponist, es existiert ein umfangreiches Werkverzeichnis (Opus 1-112) . Der Schwerpunkt seiner kompositorischen Tätigkeit lag in der Kammermusik mit verschiedenen Besetzungen, er schrieb aber auch Messen (etwa : Messe in F-Dur) und viele Orgelwerke. Sein größtes und umfangreichstes Opus ist das Oratorium « Das jüngste Gericht » .

Der Ebenseer Kirchenchor singt in der Weihnachtszeit ein « Tantum ergo » als dessen Schöpfer Vockner genannt wird. (Nach Leopold Spitzer muß es sich um eine Jugendlkomposition handeln, er bezweifelt Vockners Autorschaft.)

Ellen Pancera

La pianiste autrichienne Ellen Pancera est née le 15 août 1875 à Vienne, de parents italiens. Elle devient l'élève, au Conservatoire de Vienne, du pianiste Julius Epstein et de l'organiste Josef Vockner. Elle étudiera avec Bernhard Stavenhagen, à Weimar. En 1888, elle fera ses débuts en public à l'âge de 13 ans. Elle effectuera de nombreuses tournées dans toute l'Europe. Elle aura du succès particulièrement en Angleterre. Ellen Pancera va mourir le 10 mai 1932, à Bad Ischl. Elle n'était âgée que de 56 ans.

La musique de chambre et la musique d'église de Josef Vockner seront fréquemment jouées grâce au support et à l'implication de Josef Hellmesberger et de Julius Epstein.

Œuvres :

Oratorio « Le Jugement Dernier » (1897) , créée par le « Wiener Singverein » .

Sonate pour violon en ré majeur, Opus 4.

Quatuor avec piano en ut, Opus 6.

Quintette avec piano, Opus 70.

Lieder, Messes et Pièces pour orgue.

...

The Austrian pianist and musician (of Italian parentage) Ellen Pancera was born on 15 August 1875 in Vienna. She was placed under the tutelage of the pianist Julius Epstein and the organist Josef Vockner at the Vienna Conservatory, and studied under Bernhard Stavenhagen at Weimar. She made her public debut at the age of 13 (in 1888) and toured widely throughout Europe, being especially successful in England. Ellen Pancera died on 10 May 1932 at Bad Ischl, aged 56.

Ellen Pancera : geboren 15. August 1876 in Wien ; gestorben 10. Mai 1932 in Bad Ischl (Oberösterreich) , Pianistin. Über ihre Verwandtschaftsverhältnisse berichtet der « Musical Standard » 1898 :

« There is french blood in her (Gabriele Pancera's) veins, for her paternal grandmother, Madame Marie Pancera (née Clary) , was a native of Marseilles and was a niece of Julie, Marie and Desidère Clary, the 1st of whom married Napoleon's brother, Josef, afterwards King of Spain, and Desidère espoused General Bernadotte, subsequently Charles XIV of Sweden. Mademoiselle Pancera's mother is said to be German, but of that we cannot speak with any certainty. »

Ihr Vater war vermutlich italienischer Herkunft (gestorben um 1885) . Ihre Mutter organisierte die musikalische Ausbildung Gabriele Panceras und begleitete sie auf ihren Kunstreisen. Laut Ehrlich richtete sie « den ganzen Zweck ihres Daseins auf die Ausbildung des talentvollen Kindes » (Ehrlich, Seite 266) . Gabriele Pancera erhielt eine erste musikalische Ausbildung am « Privat-Oberlyzeum der Mädchenlehr- und Erziehungsanstalt Hanausek-Stonner » (Ariadne : Frauen in Bewegung, zit. nach Mayer, Seite 63) in Wien. Anschließend studierte sie am Wiener Konservatorium bei Julius Epstein (1832-1926 ; Unterricht dort vermutlich vor 1889) und besuchte um 1889 in Weimar Kurse bei Bernhard Stavenhagen (1862-1914) . Zurück in Wien, erhielt sie bei Theodor Leschetitzky (1830-1915) Klavierunterricht und wurde von Josef Vockner (1842-1906) in Musiktheorie ausgebildet. Nach eigenen Angaben erhielt sie zudem Unterricht bei weiteren LehrerInnen :

« Indeed, after my 1st childish debut (December 1888) , I was so serious-minded and so desirous of really being something beyond the mediocre, that I retired into my shell once more, and worked very hard under other Masters for 3 or 4 years. » (The Musical Standard, 1898, page 360.)

Undaten (vor 1898) . Brustbild eines unbekanntes Künstlers.

Im Dezember 1898 heiratete sie Adolf Max Blüthner (1861-1919) , den ältesten der drei das Erwachsenenalter erreichenden leiblichen Söhne des Klavierfabrikanten Julius Blüthner :

« The wedding was fixed to coincide with the celebration of the production of the 50,000th piano. » (Monthly Musical Record, 1898, page 225.)

Bis zur Scheidung im Jahr 1910 wohnte das Ehepaar in Leipzig. In zweiter Ehe lebte Gabriele Pancera anschließend mit Johannes Krill (1884-1946) ebenfalls in Leipzig. Seit 1924 war sie mit Wilhelm Walter Ernst Haenel verheiratet.

Im Dezember 1888 debütierte Gabriele Pancera in Wien, und schon Anfang 1889 unternahm sie eine erste Kunstreise, « wobei sie Graz, Berlin, Leipzig, Nürnberg berührte, und immer wieder in Wien auftrat » (Ehrlich, Seite 266) . Es folgten teilweise ausgedehnte Konzertreisen durch Österreich und Deutschland (beides 1892) , Russland (1895, 1897) , Skandinavien (1895) , Italien (vor 1897) , Spanien (vor 1897) , Frankreich und England (1897, 1898, 1899) . Häufige Ziele waren und andere Berlin (1889, 1893, 1896, 1920, 1924, 1926) , Wien (1888-1894, 1897) , Leipzig (1889, 1894, 1897, 1899) , Moskau (1895, 1897) , Petersburg (1895, 1897) , München (1896, 1897) , Wiesbaden (1896, 1897) , London (1897-1899) und Belfast (1897) .

Am 12. November 1893 spielte sie unter der Leitung von Hans Richter bei den philharmonischen Konzerten in Wien das Klavierkonzert Nr. 2 in B-Dur von Johannes Brahms. In einem Interview räumt die Pianistin diesem Konzert rückblickend eine große Bedeutung ein :

« In 1893, I played at the Richter Philharmonic Concerts in Vienna and, of this fact, I am very proud, for it was a

Wesentlich größere Aufmerksamkeit erregte sie in der Presse hingegen Ende 1896 durch den Vortrag dreier Klavierkonzerte an demselben Abend : In Begleitung des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters trug sie hintereinander Griegs Klavierkonzert in A-Moll, Opus 16, Chopins 1. Klavierkonzert in E-Moll, Opus 11, und das 2. Klavierkonzert von Liszt in A-Dur vor :

« " Prachtvolle " Kritiken aus dem Inland, besonders aber aus dem Ausland, waren ihr vorausgeeilt, aber aus deren Ueberschwenglichkeit war nicht recht zu ersehen, ob dieselben nicht etwa durch die vorteilhafte Erscheinung der Pianistin beeinflusst worden waren : denn in der That trägt diese ein gut Teil zur Verangenehmerung der ganzen Konzertszenarie in einem Pancera-Konzert bei ! Als aber die junge Walküre munter und fest in die Tasten griff und ihnen gar wundersamen Klang teils abzwang, teils entlockte, gesellte sich zur persönlichen Sympathie der Zuhörer künstlerische Hochachtung - mehr noch : Fräulein Pancera versteht sogar vermöge ihres musikalischen Temperamentes die seltene Gabe zu " zünden ", - war doch das sie begleitende Philharmonische Orchester gegen sonst kaum wiederzuerkennen ! Das erste (Konzert : Grieg in A-Moll) lag und gelang ihr am besten. Wie unglaublich matt dagegen hatte es kürzlich der weltreisende Pianist (Albert) Friedenthal gespielt ! Famose Pedal-Effekte vermag Fräulein Pancera (doch nicht etwa unbewusst ?) durch langes Aushalten zuweilen anzubringen. Ihre Technik ist ausserordentlich, wohlgepaart sind Geläufigkeit und Kraft. (Bei den Bass-Kraftstellen etwas weniger Pedalgebrauch wäre empfehlenswert.) Und darauf verläßt sich Fräulein Pancera mutig. Ihre Vorträge haben dadurch etwas Frisches, Herzhaftes, selbst ein bisschen (sic) Danebengreifen würde man ihr gern verzeihen, aber dazu kommt es bei ihr überhaupt nicht. Sie mußte zwei Zugaben gewähren, darunter eine Rhapsodie von Liszt - nach drei solchen Klavierkonzerten ! Alle Achtung vor dieser Ausdauer und Nervenfrische. » (Bock, 1896, Seite 376.)

Der Schwerpunkt ihres musikalischen Wirkens zwischen Frühjahr 1897 und Frühjahr 1899 läßt sich in England ausmachen. Schon zu Beginn war es ihr durch die Konzertagentur Cavour möglich, in der renommierten, bis zu 2000 ZuhörerInnen fassenden Saint-James' Hall in London zu konzertieren : Ihr Debüt erfolgte dort 1897 mit einer Serie von drei Recitals am 20. Mai, 3. und 30. Juni, stieß jedoch bei dem Rezensenten des « Musical Standard » auf Kritik :

« The touch is hard and unsympathetic, and she is too prone to come down upon the keyboard with what may be called a crash. » (The Musical Standard, 1897, page 351.)

Auch der abermalige Vortrag der drei genannten Klavierkonzerte in der Saint-James' Hall am 10. November 1897 unter Leitung von Hamish McCunn konnte nicht gänzlich überzeugen :

« Her interpretations were somewhat cold in expression, but were intelligently and clearly phrased and possessed all necessary brilliancy. » (Athenæum, 1897, page 680.)

Allerdings schildert der Rezensent der Zeitschrift « The Sketch » , mit welcher Leichtigkeit sie das anspruchsvolle und umfangreiche Programm bestritt :

« When the excellent band mopped its brow and gasped in exhaustion, the lady rose from her instrument as fresh as possible. » (The Sketch, 1898.)

Im Oktober desselben Jahres debütierte sie mit großem Erfolg in Belfast mit Chopins Konzert in E-Moll :

« Yet, with amazing ease, she can produce whatever expression may be demanded, and execute passages of the utmost intricacy and difficulty. Her style is refinement itself and, as she sat before the keyboard, she unrolled before an enraptured audience the beauties of a work of one of the most divinely-gifted and individual performers. At the close of the Concerto, there was a most enthusiastic outburst. » (The Belfast Newsletter, 23 October 1897.)

Weitere Konzerte folgten und andere in der Saint-James' Hall (2. und 10. Juni 1898) , bei den Philharmonic Concerts (26. Mai 1898) , in der Victoria Hall im Rahmen des Leeds Musical Evening (8. November 1898) und bei den Saturday Popular Concerts (12. November 1898) . Zudem konzertierte sie vor der Königin im Schloß Balmoral (13. , 14. und 15. Juni 1898) und, ebenfalls vor der Königin, in Windsor (18. November 1898) .

Nach ihrer Rückkehr aus England gab Gabriele Pancera 1899 ihr Debut im Leipziger Gewandhaus mit Schumanns Klavierkonzert, Frühlingsrauschen von Glinka-Balakirew, der 12. Ungarischen Rhapsodie von Liszt und dem Nachtfalter von Johann Strauß II in der Bearbeitung von Tausig :

« Ihrem Temperament angemessen, fasste Frau Blüthner-Pancera das Schumann'sche Concert mit kräftigeren Händen, als die Tradition es will, an, aber nach dem erspielten mächtigen Beifall zu schliessen hat sie dem Werke mit ihrer stark subjectiven Auffassung zu einer viel bedeutenderen Wirkung verholfen, als manche weniger feurige Kunstschwester mit all ihrer heilig gehaltenen Tradition. Dagegen wohl Allen zu Danke und Genuss hat unsere neueste musikalische Berühmtheit die übrigen Stücke gespielt, in deren Vortrag sich natürliche Grazie und eine Virtuosität, die wirklich Fangball mit allen technischen Schwierigkeiten spielt, harmonisch vereinigten, sodass der Applaus kein Ende nehmen wollte und nur durch eine Zugabe, die schon oben angeführte Tausig'sche Transscription (sic) , beschwichtigt werden konnte. » (FritzschMW 1899, Seite 692 f.)

Vielleicht ursächlich fallen Heirat und Karriereende von Gabriele Pancera zeitlich zusammen, so daß sich nach derzeitigem Forschungsstand das Gewandhauskonzert als vorerst letzter Auftritt der Virtuosin darstellt.

In einem Brief, dem anscheinend der Versuch eines Engagements vorausgegangen ist, antwortet die Pianistin am 11. Januar 1900 der Schriftstellerin, Pazifistin und späteren Friedensnobelpreisträgerin Bertha von Suttner :

« Es fällt mir wahrhaft schwer, der gewinnendsten Liebenswürdigkeit mit einem " nein " entgegnetreten zu müßen (aber liebste, verehrteste Baronin) das wäre alles leicht zu Arrangieren, wenn nicht die Reise selbst zu machen wäre, wozu man doch, wenn man verheiratet ist, schwerer kommt als früher. Außerdem wollen wir im Frühjahr nach Paris (dann spiele ich in London) nun will mein Mann nicht noch eine dritte Reise einfügen lassen. » (UNOG Library BvS/14/154-3/1.)

Weitere Informationen zu dem von Gabriele Pancera angekündigten Konzert in London oder einem Aufenthalt in Paris lassen sich nicht finden.

Erst seit den 1920er Jahren sind wieder Konzerte überliefert : Am 6. April 1920 ist in der Berliner Singakademie ein Auftritt nachgewiesen, gefolgt von einem Robert-Schumann-Abend am 15. Oktober 1924 im Berliner Voxsaal. Ende März 1929 spielte Gabriele Pancera die Uraufführung von Ernst Kreneks 2. Klaviersonate, Opus 59, im Rahmen eines Klavierabends in Berlin.

In vielen Rezensionen erscheinen « Kraft » und « Männlichkeit » als wiederkehrende Topoi. Der Rezensent der « Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik » fühlt sich beispielsweise 1889 bei einem Konzert in Leipzig durch den « kraftvollen Anschlag » (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, 1889, Seite 540.) und aufgrund der « energischen, fast männlichen Auffassung und Beherrschung der Technik an die Claviertitanin → Sophie Menter. » (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, 1889, Seite 540.) erinnert. Angesichts dieser Eigenschaften äußert sich der Redakteur der « Neuen Berliner Musikzeitung » August Ludwig hingegen abfällig und frauenfeindlich :

« Wie unbedacht ! Beinahe hätte ich geschrieben : Für eine Dame spielt Fräulein Pancera grossartig ! Aber da ich nicht möchte, daß mir eine Emancipirte das " für eine Dame " als Verkleinerung ihres Geschlechts auslege und zur Rache eine Dynamitbombe in die Redaktion werfe, will ich das lieber nicht gesagt haben ! Und auch das wäre noch gefährlich, wollte man sagen : sie spielte fast wie ein Mann ! Eine Pianistin soll eine echte Pianistin sein und bleiben - jedes in seiner Art ! Fräulein Pancera spielt mir fast ein bischen zu männlich, und auch ihre Programme sind nicht die richtige Pianistinnen-Toilette, in denen sie sich ungehindert bewegen kann. » (Bock, 1896, Seite 386.)

Dem widerspricht der Rezensent der « Neuen Musik-Zeitung » :

« Beginnt sie zu spielen, so spielt sie für sich. Die anderen dürfen zuhören, weil sie schon einmal da sind. Sofort frappiert ihr wundervoll weicher Anschlag, der dem Instrument die süßesten, sanftesten Klänge abschmeichelt. Das Staccato hat sie zu glitzernder Zierlichkeit herausgearbeitet und im Pianissimo der Kantilene, in der singenden Taste, enthüllt sie den klangschönsten Empfindungsreichtum. Ihr Triller ist von einer ganz eigenen Energie der Exaktheit und sie läßt ihn bis zum ff mächtig anschwellen. Im lyrischen Ausdruck hält sie sich fern von zerfließender Thränenseligkeit. Was ihr Gemüt bewegt, sagen die weißen Fingerspitzen den Tasten. Andere machen zum Dolmetsch ihrer zartesten und heimlichsten Gefühle die - Füße und das Pedal. Einige Kritiker haben sie unzutreffend mit der Menter verglichen. Das Dämonische und die ungebändigte Leidenschaft sind ihrem ausgeglichenen Naturell nicht gemäß. Brutale pianistische Anfälle braucht man bei ihr nie zu befürchten, wohl aber hat man hin und wieder die Empfindung, daß doch die Künstlerin ihr vornehmes Maßhalten fallen lassen und uns mit einer Ueberschuß von frei werdender Kraft, mit einem großartigen Allzuviel erobern möchte. » (NMZ, 1897, Seite 195.)

Mit dem Tod von Max Hesse 1907 wurde Gabriele Pancera Alleinerbin des Leipziger Max Hesse Verlags. Während ihrer Leitung des Verlags erschienen unter anderem 1909 die Festschrift zum 60. Geburtstag Hugo Riemanns, der bis zu seinem Tod 1926 Lektor des Verlags war, und die Neuausgaben des Musiklexikons von Hugo Riemann. Im Jahr 1911 wurde ihr Mann, Johannes Krill, Mitinhaber, 1923 übernahm er die Verlagsleitung.

Richard Wagner's artistic center at Bayreuth is completed and has its grand opening with the 33 year old Hans Richter conducting the 1st complete performance of Wagner's mammoth « Der Ring des Nibelungen », spread over 4 evenings. The whole endeavor is dedicated to the realization of Wagner's ideas of the « Gesamtkunstwerk » (Total Artwork) .

Le Festival de Bayreuth

En 1871, Richard Wagner choisit la petite ville de Bayreuth pour accueillir sa nouvelle salle d'Opéra. Les Wagner s'y rendirent l'année suivante : on posa la 1re pierre du « Festspielhaus » (Palais des Festivals) . Afin de rassembler les fonds pour la construction, le compositeur entreprit une tournée de concerts à travers l'Allemagne, et diverses associations de soutien furent créées dans plusieurs villes. Il fallut cependant attendre une donation du roi Louis II de Bavière, en 1874, pour que l'argent nécessaire fût enfin rassemblé. Un peu plus tard dans l'année, les Wagner emménagèrent à Bayreuth dans une Villa que Richard surnomma « Wahnfried » .

Bayreuth est pour la 1e fois évoquée dans des documents en 1194. Les historiens pensent que la ville fut fondée vers le milieu du XIIe siècle. En 1604, la ville devient résidence des margraves de la principauté de Brandebourg-Bayreuth jusqu'en 1769. Fille du roi de Prusse Frédéric-Guillaume 1er, la princesse Wilhelmine devait devenir reine d'Angleterre par le jeu des mariages entre grandes familles. Mais l'affaire traîne et elle est contrainte par son père d'épouser le margrave Frédéric de Brandebourg-Bayreuth. Au XVIIIe siècle, des travaux majeurs transforment la ville considérablement. En 1792 elle devient une province de la Prusse. De 1806 à 1810 elle est occupée par les Français. Depuis 1810 elle fait partie de la Bavière.

Les répétitions préliminaires, pour la création de l'Anneau du Nibelung, eurent lieu à Bayreuth en 1875. Elles furent suivies, en 1876 de 3 cycles de répétitions normales, du 3 juin au 12 juillet, puis du 14 au 26 juillet, et enfin, du 29 juillet au 4 août. Du 6 au 9 août, eurent lieu les répétitions générales en présence du roi Louis II de Bavière.

Fin août : Bruckner va assister à la 3e représentation du « Ring » . Il fera alors la rencontre du critique musical (progressif) berlinois, Wilhelm Tappert.

Bruckner et Wagner en profitent pour discuter, encore une fois, de la 3e Symphonie. Ce qui résultera sans doute en une possible simplification de la partition afin d'augmenter les chances d'une future exécution auprès du Philharmonique de Vienne.

Le Festival inaugural de Bayreuth, tenu du 13 au 17 août 1876, se veut un phénomène social et culturel. On y présentera la 1^{re} représentation complète de L'Anneau du Nibelung. Bayreuth accueille pour l'occasion les Empereurs Guillaume 1^{er} d'Allemagne et Pierre II du Brésil, ainsi que Louis II de Bavière qui garde sa visite secrète (probablement pour ne pas rencontrer l'Empereur Guillaume), et de nombreux artistes comme les compositeurs Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Edvard Grieg, Augusta Holmès, Franz Servais, Vincent d'Indy, Camille Saint-Saëns, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski et Charles-Marie Widor ; sans oublier Friedrich Nietzsche et Léon Tolstoï. D'un point de vue artistique, ce Festival fut un succès remarquable. Tchaïkovski, qui y avait assisté en tant que correspondant russe, écrit : « Ce qui s'est passé à Bayreuth restera dans la mémoire de nos petits enfants et de leur descendance. ». Le Festival est cependant un désastre financier absolu, ce qui pousse Richard Wagner à abandonner l'idée d'un 2^e événement l'été suivant et à donner une série de concerts à Londres pour lever des fonds et réduire le déficit. Les 1^{res} années seront difficiles et le Festival ne pourra se maintenir que grâce à des subventions de l'État et de wagnériens, au 1^{er} rang desquels Louis II de Bavière. Un 2^e Festival a lieu en 1882, pour la création de « Parsifal » le 26 juillet.

Dès le début, les chefs d'orchestre et les chanteurs les plus talentueux du monde viennent à Bayreuth, certains sans cachet. Hans Richter dirige l'Anneau de 1876, avec comme assistant le jeune Engelbert Humperdinck, un familier des Wagner. En 1882, en dépit de son anti-sémitisme avéré, Richard Wagner choisit pour la création de « Parsifal » le chef juif Hermann Levi ; celui-ci reviendra régulièrement au pupitre du « Festspielhaus » pendant les 2 décennies suivantes. Le chef Felix Mottl, qui sert le Festival de 1876 à 1901, dirige l'entrée au répertoire de « Tristan und Isolde », en 1886.

L'anti-sémitisme de Richard Wagner a donné lieu à une abondante littérature polémique, largement alimentée tant par la récupération de sa musique par le régime National-Socialiste que par l'amitié de l'épouse de son fils Siegfried, Winnifred, avec le chancelier Adolf Hitler.

Cet aspect de la personnalité de Wagner n'a rien d'exceptionnel : ces discours, comme les préjugés raciaux en général, sont courants. Mais ces thèses sont déjà combattues : Nietzsche, par exemple, se brouille avec Wagner, en partie pour ses opinions anti-sémites. L'anti-sémitisme est un débat central à l'époque, y compris aux yeux mêmes de nombreux intellectuels juifs. Entre pogrom et assimilation, les discussions entre penseurs juifs font rage.

Le 1^{er} essai de Wagner, le plus controversé, est « Le judaïsme dans la musique », publié en 1850 dans la revue « Die neue Zeitschrift für Musik » sous le pseudonyme de « K. Freigedenk » (libre pensée). Wagner s'était donné pour but d'expliquer la prétendue « aversion populaire » envers la musique des compositeurs juifs tels que Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy ou Giacomo Meyerbeer. Il écrit notamment que le peuple allemand était « repoussé » par les Juifs en raison « de leur aspect et de leur comportement d'étrangers ». Ses descriptions sont éloquentes : les Juifs « sont des anomalies de la nature » jasant « de leurs voix grinçantes, couinantes et bourdonnantes ».

Wagner prétendait que les musiciens juifs, n'étant pas en relation avec l'esprit authentique du peuple allemand, ne pouvaient qu'écrire une musique artificielle, sans aucune profondeur, et rabâcher la vraie musique à la manière des perroquets. La 1^{re} publication de l'article attira peu l'attention. Cependant, après que Wagner l'eut publié de nouveau, en 1869, sous la forme d'un pamphlet signé de son véritable nom, de vives protestations s'élevèrent dans le public d'une représentation des « Maîtres Chanteurs » .

En dépit de ses écrits anti-sémites, Wagner eut plusieurs amis juifs qu'il semblait beaucoup aimer. Le plus représentatif d'entre eux est le chef d'orchestre Hermann Levi, un Juif pratiquant que Wagner désigna pour diriger la 1^{re} représentation de « Parsifal » . Le compositeur souhaita d'abord que Levi se fit baptiser (sans doute en raison du contenu religieux de cet Opéra) , mais il dut finalement abandonner cette exigence.

Cependant, lorsqu'il analyse le détail des péripéties de cette valse hésitation telles que les rapporte Carl Glasenapp, Theodor W. Adorno, dans son « Essai sur Wagner » , résume en ces termes ce que cet épisode relève, selon lui, du côté « démoniaque » de Wagner :

« Une envie sadique d'humilier Hermann Levi, une humeur conciliante et sentimentale et surtout la volonté de s'attacher affectivement le maltraité se réunissent dans la casuistique du comportement de Wagner. »

Le chef Hermann Levi maintint toutefois des relations très amicales avec Richard Wagner et fut sollicité, à ses funérailles, pour porter son cercueil. Un autre de ces amis fut Joseph Rubinstein.

Tout au long de sa vie, dans ses conversations, dans ses écrits, Richard Wagner n'a cessé d'émettre des opinions violemment « anti-judaïque » . Accusant fréquemment les Juifs (et en particulier, les musiciens juifs) d'être des étrangers nuisibles à l'Allemagne, il souhaitait leur expulsion ou leur assimilation à la culture germanique. Certains érudits n'ont pas craint d'affirmer que ses Opéras contiennent des messages anti-sémites cachés, mais cette thèse est contestée. Elles ne se fondent pas sur des préjugés raciaux mais sur le reproche adressés aux Juifs de demeurer juifs et donc de n'être pas allemands. Cet anti-judaïsme est donc fort différent de l'anti-sémitisme qui repose sur des distinctions raciales. Wagner préconise l'assimilation des Juifs à la culture germanique. L'assimilation est aussi sujet de débat entre les intellectuels juifs.

Wagner a également attaqué les Juifs dans d'autres essais. Dans « Qu'est-ce qui est allemand ? » (1879) , il écrit par exemple :

« Les Juifs tiennent le travail intellectuel allemand entre leurs mains. Nous pouvons ainsi constater un odieux travestissement de l'esprit allemand, présenté aujourd'hui à ce peuple comme étant sa prétendue ressemblance. Il est à craindre qu'avant longtemps la nation prenne ce simulacre pour le reflet de son image. Alors, quelques-unes des plus belles dispositions de la race humaine s'éteindraient, peut-être à tout jamais. »

Notons enfin que l'anti-sémitisme de Wagner n'est quasiment pas évoqué, dans ses abondants écrits, par son plus fervent admirateur, le viennois Arnold Schönberg (1874-1951) , le fils de commerçants juifs convertis. Schönberg ré-embrassa la foi judaïque dans les années 1930.

Eut égard à cette ambiguïté, les œuvres de Wagner ne sont pas représentées en public dans l'état moderne d'Israël (largement fondée à l'origine par des Juifs d'Europe centrale imprégnés de civilisation germanique) , où, par ailleurs, la musique de Wagner est couramment diffusée par des stations de radio ou des chaînes de télévision d'État, sans susciter plus de scandale qu'à New York, Paris ou Berlin. Jusqu'à présent, toutes les tentatives de représentation publique (notamment par le pianiste et chef d'orchestre Daniel Barenboim qui a dirigé le prélude de « Tristan und Isolde » à Tel Aviv, en 2001) ont déclenché les plus vives protestations, certains auditeurs ayant même quitté la salle au cours du 20e siècle. Ce n'est qu'au cours des dernières années que de nombreux Israéliens ont soutenu qu'il est possible d'apprécier son talent musical, sans que cela n'implique l'acceptation de ces idées politiques ou sociales. En 2010, un avocat israélien mélomane, Jonathan Livny, fonde une « Société wagnérienne israélienne » afin de mettre fin au boycottage des œuvres du compositeur dans son pays.

Le Festival de Bayreuth (« Bayreuther Festspiele ») est un Festival d'Opéra fondé en 1876 par Richard Wagner et consacré à l'exécution de ses 10 principaux Opéras. Il se tient chaque été au Palais des Festivals (« Festspielhaus ») de Bayreuth, en Bavière, un Théâtre conçu par Wagner pour pouvoir réaliser sa conception particulière de l'ouvrage lyrique comme « œuvre d'art totale » .

Il s'agit de l'un des Festivals de musique Classique les plus prestigieux au monde, qui attire chaque année sur la « Colline verte » (appelée aussi « Colline sacrée » par les wagnérophiles français) , des passionnés dont beaucoup ont dû parfois attendre jusqu'à 11 années pour obtenir des places, la demande étant plus de 10 fois supérieure à l'offre. Ce succès, qui pourrait paraître surprenant pour un Festival n'ayant à son répertoire que 10 Opéras inlassablement remis sur le métier, s'explique par le très haut niveau des partitions et des interprètes (chanteurs, chœurs et instrumentistes) , une complexité et une richesse philosophique des livrets qui permettent une grande créativité et une diversité des mises-en-scène, le scandale qui a accompagné certaines productions des 3 dernières décennies, le prestige d'un lieu conçu par Wagner lui-même, la véritable passion (qui confine parfois au fanatisme) dont son œuvre est l'objet, le contexte historique (Louis II de Bavière) et l'existence dans de nombreuses villes à travers le monde, de cercles wagnérophiles, fervents et actifs soutiens du Festival dès l'origine.

Le Festival de Bayreuth est né de la volonté de Richard Wagner de créer un lieu et un mode de production susceptibles de réaliser sa conception d'un « Opéra de l'avenir » conçu comme une « œuvre d'art totale » (« Gesamtkunstwerk ») .

Wagner cherchait également à assurer son indépendance financière et artistique. Une brouille avec son protecteur et mécène, le roi Louis II de Bavière, provoqua sa disgrâce et son départ de Munich, où il avait d'abord songé à installer son Festival. Il envisagea de le fixer à Nuremberg, ville qu'il avait honorée dans son Opéra « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » . Cependant, sur le conseil du chef d'orchestre Hans Richter, il s'intéressa à la ville de Bayreuth, en Franconie, qui réunissait 3 grands avantages :

Un Théâtre réputé, l'Opéra des Margraves (« Markgräfliches Opernhaus ») , construit entre 1745 et 1748, dont la taille et la bonne acoustique étaient supposées pouvoir convenir à ses projets.

Une localisation hors des régions dans lesquelles il avait cédé ses droits sur les représentations de ses œuvres, en 1864, en raison de difficultés financières.

L'absence de réelle vie culturelle susceptible de faire concurrence à la Maîtrise artistique qu'il recherchait, ce qui l'assurait que son Festival serait le principal événement culturel de la ville.

En avril 1870, Richard Wagner et sa femme, Cosima, se rendent à Bayreuth. Ils sont déçus par leur visite de l'Opéra, conçu pour des formations Baroques et inadapté aux mises-en-scène complexes et aux grands orchestres requis par une production wagnérienne. Cependant, la municipalité se déclare prête à aider Wagner à construire un Théâtre entièrement nouveau, et la date du 1er Festival est fixée à 1873. Ayant échoué au printemps 1871 à convaincre le Chancelier Impérial Otto von Bismarck de financer ses projets, Wagner entame une tournée de concerts à travers l'Allemagne. Il lance également une souscription publique dont le résultat est cependant décevant. Pour financer son futur Festival et son Théâtre, Wagner, sur la suggestion de son admirateur et ami Emil Heckel, encourage la création d'un certain nombre de « Sociétés Wagner » censées participer à la souscription. Il s'en crée notamment à Leipzig, Berlin et Vienne.

Il apparaît cependant clair à la fin de l'année 1872 que Wagner a échoué à lever les fonds nécessaires à l'organisation d'un Festival, malgré l'aide des Sociétés qui insistent sur son statut de musicien de l'Allemagne nouvelle. Un nouvel appel à Bismarck en août 1873 échoue. En dernier ressort, Wagner fait appel à son ancien mécène Louis de Bavière qui, malgré leur querelle passée, lui fait don en janvier 1874 de 100,000 thalers.

La 1re pierre du « Festspielhaus » , conçu d'après un plan de Gottfried Semper, est posée le 22 mai 1872. Le 1er Festival, prévu pour 1875, doit finalement être repoussé à 1876. Il doit voir la 1re représentation intégrale de la tétralogie « l'Anneau du Nibelung » , les 2 1ers Opéras ayant été créés précédemment à Munich sur l'insistance de Louis II, et les 2 derniers étant donnés en création mondiale.

Le 1er Festival à l'été 1876, pour la 1re représentation complète de « l'Anneau du Nibelung » , du 13 au 17 août, est un phénomène social et culturel. Bayreuth accueille les Empereurs Guillaume 1er d'Allemagne et Pierre II du Brésil, ainsi que Louis II de Bavière qui garde sa visite secrète (probablement pour ne pas rencontrer l'Empereur) , et de nombreux artistes comme les compositeurs Anton Bruckner, Edvard Grieg, Franz Liszt, Camille Saint-Saëns, Franz Servais et Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski. Grand succès artistique, le Festival est cependant un désastre financier, ce qui pousse Wagner à abandonner l'idée d'une 2e session l'été suivant et à donner une série de concerts à Londres pour lever des fonds. Les 1res années seront difficiles et le Festival ne pourra se maintenir que grâce à des subventions de l'État et de wagnériens, au 1er rang desquels Louis II de Bavière. Un 2e Festival a lieu en 1882, pour la création de « Parsifal » le 26 juillet.

cachet. Le chef Hans Richter dirige « l'Anneau » de 1876, avec comme assistant le jeune Engelbert Humperdinck, un familier des Wagner. En 1882, en dépit de son anti-sémitisme avéré, Wagner choisit pour la création de « Parsifal » le chef juif Hermann Levi ; celui-ci reviendra régulièrement au pupitre du « Festspielhaus » pendant les 2 décennies suivantes. Felix Mottl, qui sert le Festival de 1876 à 1901, dirige l'entrée au répertoire de « Tristan und Isolde » en 1886.

Après la mort de Richard Wagner en 1883, Cosima, bientôt aidée par leur fils Siegfried, s'attache à maintenir le Festival et le programme sur un rythme bi-annuel. Elle le dirige de 1883 à 1908, date à laquelle Siegfried lui succède, mais elle reste l'âme du Palais des Festivals jusqu'à sa mort en 1930. Siegfried ne lui survit que de quelques mois.

Cosima fait du Festival une célébration du culte de son défunt mari. Les productions (mises-en-scène, décors et costumes) sont conservées en l'état et programmées Festival après Festival. Jusqu'aux années 1920, la parole du Maître est loi sur la Colline sacrée, jusqu'à son insistance sur l'utilisation de vrais animaux sur la scène, des oies avec Fricka, un crapaud pour Alberich, des corbeaux avec Wotan, un ours avec Siegfried ; cependant, le dragon de l'Acte II de « Siegfried » est traditionnellement un faux. Les Filles du Rhin, dans le 1er tableau de « l'Or du Rhin », sont montrées « nageant » grâce à un système de câbles attachés au plafond.

Cosima œuvre également à faire respecter le privilège de 30 ans obtenu par le Festival pour « Parsifal ». Elle ne peut cependant empêcher le Metropolitan Opera de New York de le monter dès 1903, mais bannira (« excommuniera » , diront certains) du Festival les chanteurs qui braveront son interdiction d'une représentation hors du « Festspielhaus ». « Parsifal » tombe dans le domaine public en 1912.

Dans les années 1920, Winnifred Wagner, épouse de Siegfried Wagner et directrice du Festival à partir de 1930, rencontre Adolf Hitler dont elle devient une amie personnelle et un soutien convaincu. Hitler est dès cette époque un intime de la famille Wagner, au point que les enfants le surnomment « oncle Wolf » et que des rumeurs de mariage avec Winnifred, veuve depuis 1930, courent en 1933, après son accession au poste de chancelier du « Reich ». C'est grâce à son soutien que le Festival peut se maintenir pendant le 3e « Reich » et, selon Winnifred, conserver son « indépendance artistique » ; Hitler assiste d'ailleurs à des représentations auxquelles participent des artistes juifs ou étrangers, longtemps après qu'ils ont été bannis des autres Théâtres allemands. Hitler montre tant d'admiration pour Wagner et tant de vénération envers sa famille et son Festival qu'il écrit à la demande de Winnifred au chef d'orchestre italien Arturo Toscanini, pourtant un anti-fasciste résolu, pour le prier de prendre la tête du Festival, ce que Toscanini refusa.

Les années 1930 voient cependant un renouvellement artistique pour le Festival. Les décors et costumes de « Parsifal », inchangés depuis la création en 1882, étaient si détériorés que la sécurité des représentations n'était plus assurée et que Winnifred décide, en 1933, de monter une production entièrement nouvelle. Malgré les protestations de Toscanini, Richard Strauß et de certains membres de la famille Wagner, Winnifred, avec l'approbation de Hitler, engage l'intendant de l'Opéra d'État de Berlin, Hans Tietjen, pour une nouvelle production en 1934, dans des décors d'Alfred Roller et d'Emil Preetorius. Tietjen et Preetorius réaliseront les autres productions de cette décennie, à l'exception du « Parsifal » de 1937 dont les décors étaient signés par le jeune Wieland Wagner, fils-aîné de Winnifred.

Écrin du célèbre Festival, le « Festspielhaus », inauguré en 1876, est toujours dirigé par des descendants du compositeur allemand. Mythique, marquée par l'Histoire, cette scène vit, depuis plus d'un siècle, au rythme des passions d'héritiers qui se déchirent allègrement.

Chaque été, quelques milliers de « smokings » et de robes du soir gravissent la « colline Verte » du Bürgerreuth pour se rendre au « Festspielhaus » de Bayreuth. Le sobre bâtiment de brique rouge abrite une salle rectangulaire dépouillée, garnie de 30 gradins circulaires, étagés en forte pente, où prennent place 1,925 fidèles. À 16 heures tapant, les lourdes portes de bois se referment. Suivent 4 heures de spectacle, dans une atmosphère d'étuve, malgré une prétendue climatisation et l'arrosage du toit pendant les 2 longs entractes d'une heure. Le rituel wagnérien ressemble à un chemin de croix.

Incroyable mais vrai : le seul Théâtre au monde conçu par un compositeur pour n'y représenter que ses œuvres est toujours dirigé par ses descendants. Depuis 1951, l'un des petits-fils de Richard, Wolfgang, règne d'une main de fer sur le « Festspielhaus ». Comme le firent son frère, Wieland, sa mère, Winifred, son père, Siegfried et sa grand-mère Cosima. Pourvu du statut de « directeur à vie », l'autocratique Wolfgang (81 ans) n'aurait éventuellement accepté de céder sa place qu'à sa seconde épouse, Gutrun (56 ans), et à leur fille, Katharina (23 ans), passionnée de théâtre. Pourtant, les 24 membres du conseil de direction de la Fondation Richard-Wagner, composé de représentants de la famille, de la ville de Bayreuth, du gouvernement fédéral, du « Land » de Bavière et des « Amis » de Bayreuth, décident de désigner sa fille, Eva Wagner-Pasquier, née d'un 1er mariage, pour lui succéder en septembre 2002. Wolfgang, lui, s'obstine à répéter que sa succession n'est pas ouverte. Un choix d'autant plus difficile à avaler qu'un gouffre d'hostilité sépare Wolfgang et Eva (55 ans), qui fut son bras-droit au Festival dans les années 1960-1970, avant d'en être brutalement chassée. Après plusieurs mois d'hésitations et de silence, Eva a finalement annoncé qu'elle renonçait à cette nomination, sans commentaire. Bayreuth baigne plus que jamais dans le drame familial. Une famille qui s'entre-déchire, par livres interposés. « Nous sommes les Atrides », ironise Nike Wagner, l'une des cousines d'Eva, qui est aussi candidate à la succession de son oncle. Pour comprendre la tragédie wagnérienne, il faut revenir à son fondateur.

C'est le 26 juillet 1835 que Richard Wagner, alors jeune chef d'orchestre au Théâtre de Magdebourg, fait étape à Bayreuth, petite ville de Franconie, au nord de Nuremberg. Wagner écrira plus tard dans son autobiographie que « l'arrivée à Bayreuth, éclairé de façon charmante par le soleil couchant, me fit une impression qui se grava durablement dans ma mémoire ». Pourtant, il faudra attendre 1870 pour que le musicien repense à Bayreuth, presque par hasard. Depuis une vingtaine d'années, il était convaincu que son génie et la nouveauté de ses œuvres ne pouvaient s'accommoder d'un vulgaire théâtre à l'italienne, où la bonne société passait plus de temps à s'observer de loge en loge qu'à regarder le spectacle. Il rêvait d'un amphithéâtre circulaire où « rien ne vient troubler la vision qui se dirige de la place vers la scène », d'une salle plongée dans l'obscurité et d'un orchestre caché dans une fosse à moitié couverte, pour que sa « musique mystérieuse pareille aux vapeurs qui émanent du sein sacré de Gaia, sous le trône de la Pythie, se dégage, comme un pur esprit, de l'abîme mystique ».

Après des projets avortés à Zürich et à Munich, il jette finalement son dévolu sur la colline de Bayreuth, pour y construire son « Walhalla ». Le 22 mai 1872, jour de ses 59 ans, Wagner fête la pose de la 1^{re} pierre du « Festspielhaus » en dirigeant au Théâtre des Margraves la 9^e Symphonie de Beethoven, seule partition non wagnérienne tolérée par la suite dans le Saint des saints. Il lui reste simplement à achever de composer sa Tétralogie et à trouver le financement de son Théâtre. Le plus généreux des donateurs sera, encore une fois, son cher Louis II de Bavière, qui participe pour un tiers au montant des travaux et qui, dans la foulée, lui offre de quoi édifier sa pompeuse demeure, Wahnfried (la Paix des illusions). Le 13 août 1876, « l'Or du Rhin » s'ouvre pour la 1^{re} fois de l'« abîme mystique », devant l'Empereur de Prusse, Guillaume 1^{er} ; l'Empereur du Brésil, Pierre II ; un aréopage de princes, de grands-ducs et de compositeurs célèbres (Grieg, Tchaïkovski, Saint-Saëns, Bruckner...) . Tous découvrent une acoustique qui est, depuis, restée unique au monde. En raison de la disposition particulière de la fosse, aucune note ne parvient au spectateur sans avoir été réfléchi par le plafond et les murs latéraux, produisant ainsi une fascinante fusion sonore qui réalise le rêve wagnérien de « mélodie infinie » .

Ce Festival inaugural, qui présente la Tétralogie à 3 reprises, est diversement apprécié. « L'œuvre grandiose d'un artiste grandiose » pour les uns ; « une scandaleuse ineptie qui n'a rien de commun avec le peuple allemand » pour les autres. Wagner, lui-même, est affligé par l'esthétique conventionnelle des spectacles, qui ne sera pourtant remise en question que dans les années 1950, par son petit-fils Wieland.

Devant les casques ailés, les armures et les boucliers, le compositeur s'écrie :

« Après avoir créé l'Orchestre invisible, j'aimerais aussi inventer le Théâtre invisible ! »

L'énorme déficit de ces 1^{res} représentations engendre la fermeture du Théâtre. Il ne rouvrira qu'en 1882, pour la création de « Parsifal », et il faudra attendre 1896 pour y revoir la Tétralogie. Qu'importe : « Parsifal » suffira à édifier le mythe de Bayreuth. Wagner obtient du roi Louis II l'engagement que son ultime œuvre, baptisée « Bühnenweihfestspiel » (Festival scénique sacré), soit réservée à Bayreuth pendant une période de 30 ans après sa mort. Le jour de la première, il demande au public de ne pas applaudir à la fin des 2^{es} Actes. Du coup, celui-ci restera aussi silencieux à l'issue du dernier. Pendant des dizaines d'années, cette tradition, née d'une méprise, sera respectée. On applaudit un divertissement, pas une messe. Quelques mois plus tard (le 13 février 1883), Wagner meurt à Venise. Sa veuve, Cosima, lui survivra 47 ans. Jusqu'en 1906, elle sera la gardienne jalouse et autoritaire du Saint-Graal, transformant le temple en mausolée. Peu à peu, les autres Opéras de Wagner y sont admis (à l'exception des 3 œuvres de jeunesse, considérées comme indignes du lieu). Depuis 1936, le Festival de Bayreuth est devenu annuel et présente 7 ouvrages chaque été, pour un total de 30 représentations.

En 1891, l'écrivain Romain Rolland fait à son tour le pèlerinage à Bayreuth :

« On se croirait à Lourdes. Le 3^e Acte de « Parsifal » est le 5^e Évangile. Ce n'est vraiment plus du théâtre, ce n'est plus de l'art, c'est de la religion, et comme Dieu même. »

L'unique fils de « Dieu », Siegfried (qui porte le nom de l'intrépide héros de la Tétralogie) , a 37 ans lorsqu'il prend la relève de sa mère. Compositeur, chef d'orchestre et metteur en scène, il préserve à son tour l'héritage et la tradition, en écartant soigneusement ses 2 véritables soeurs, Isolde et Eva (il a aussi 2 demi-soeurs, nées du 1er mariage de Cosima avec Hans von Bülow) . L'aînée, Isolde, a eu la fâcheuse idée d'épouser un chef d'orchestre suisse, Franz Beidler, qui risque de faire de l'ombre à Siegfried. Franz est bientôt chassé de Bayreuth par Cosima. Pour se venger, Isolde réclame alors sa part d'héritage. Cosima refuse en prétendant qu'Isolde est, en réalité, la fille de son 1er mari. Nul ne saura jamais la vérité, mais Isolde perd son procès en paternité et meurt de la tuberculose, en 1919, abandonnée par sa famille et son mari. En 1908, la cadette, Eva, s'unit à un « ami de maman » , Houston Stewart Chamberlain, théoricien de la suprématie de la race aryenne. Installés à Bayreuth, ils s'enorgueillissent d'accueillir Adolf Hitler, en 1923, à la veille du « Putsch de la Brasserie » raté de Munich. Malgré la naissance d'un fils adultérin, des rumeurs commencent à courir sur l'homosexualité de Siegfried. En 1915, il se décide donc à convoler en justes noces avec une orpheline anglaise de 18 ans, Winifred Williams. Elle aura le bon goût de lui offrir 4 enfants : Wieland, Friedelind, Wolfgang et Verena.

De son côté, Siegfried ne cache pas son nationalisme :

En 1930, c'est pourtant lui qui a l'audace de laisser, pour la 1re fois, la fosse du « Walhalla » à un chef non-germanique, et de surcroît anti-fasciste, Arturo Toscanini. Les chanteurs juifs y sont aussi les bienvenus. Surprenantes contradictions que l'on rencontrait déjà chez son père.

Alors que Richard écrivait, en 1881, à Louis II de Bavière :

« Je juge la race judaïque l'ennemi naturel de l'humanité pure et de tout de ce qu'il y a de noble en elle. »

Il confia l'année suivante au chef juif Hermann Levi, fils de rabbin, le soin de créer son « Festival scénique sacré » , pourtant fortement teinté de christianisme. Et Levi, devenu ami de Cosima, sera le seul à diriger « Parsifal » jusqu'en 1894.

Revenons à Winifred, qui s'est prise de sympathie pour Adolf Hitler. Dès 1923, elle se porte garante, auprès de la section locale du Parti nazi, « de la force et de la pureté morales de cet homme, auquel la maison Wahnfried s'engage à rester fidèle dans les mauvais comme dans les bons jours » . Toute la famille Wagner tiendra cette promesse, à l'exception de Friedelind, l'une des filles de Siegfried et de Winifred, qui, dès sa majorité, s'exile à New York pour fustiger l'Allemagne nazie et ceux qui ont dévoyé l'esprit de Bayreuth. Hitler, lui, devient un ami et un habitué de Wahnfried. Les enfants adorent Adolf, surnommé affectueusement « Oncle Wolf » (Oncle Loup : loup étant l'un des noms donnés par Wagner à Wotan, le souverain des dieux du « Walhalla ») . Le dictateur chérit Bayreuth, où « a été forgée l'épée spirituelle avec laquelle nous luttons aujourd'hui » . En 1930, Cosima s'éteint, suivie 4 mois plus tard par Siegfried, qui a pris soin d'organiser sa succession. Winifred hérite de tous ses biens, à condition de ne jamais se remarier. Le partage entre les 4 enfants ne pourra se faire qu'après la mort de leur mère. Il leur faudra beaucoup de patience : Winifred survivra un demi-siècle à son époux.

Voici donc encore une veuve à la barre du Festival de Bayreuth. Mais, cette fois, elle n'a que 33 ans. Elle nomme Heinz Tietjen directeur artistique du Festival. Celui qui dirige aussi 2 Opéras à Berlin s'installe à Wahnfried, devenant le tuteur des enfants de Siegfried et le « petit canard » de Winifred. Dès sa prise de pouvoir, en 1933, Hitler place le Festival sous sa protection personnelle. Le 28 mai 1933, Arturo Toscanini, déjà jaloux des prérogatives accordées à son confrère Wilhelm Furtwängler, a eu la sagesse de décliner l'invitation de Winifred. Il ne remettra jamais les pieds à Bayreuth ni en Allemagne. En 1936, Bayreuth devient « Reichsfestspiele » (Festival du « Reich »), puis, en 1940, « Kriegsfestspiele » (Festival de guerre), destiné en priorité aux combattants en permission. Pendant ce temps, la benjamine, Verena, s'est installée sur le lac de Constance avec un dignitaire nazi. Ses 2 frères, Wieland et Wolfgang, ont chacun épousé une danseuse et attendent leur tour.

Le « Festspielhaus » ferme ses portes en 1945, avec la débâcle allemande. D'abord classée comme activiste nazie, Winifred sort presque indemne de son procès en dénazification. Grâce au témoignage d'une pianiste juive attestant que Winifred a sauvé la vie d'un grand nombre de personnes promises à l'extermination, cette « suiviste de la 3e catégorie » se voit simplement reprocher « d'avoir jeté dans la balance au profit de Hitler un des plus illustres noms de l'histoire mondiale de la culture ».

Le président allemand Walter Scheel n'a-t-il pas déclaré, lors du Centenaire du Festival :

« L'histoire de Bayreuth fait partie de l'histoire allemande. Ses erreurs ont été les erreurs de notre nation. »

Avant d'ajouter :

« Peut-on reprocher à Wagner que Hitler l'ait aimé ? Hitler aimait aussi les montagnes et les chiens de berger. Ce n'est pas une raison pour en vouloir aux montagnes et aux chiens de berger. »

On peut, en revanche, reprocher aux descendants de Wagner d'avoir tant aimé Hitler. Jusqu'à sa mort, en 1980, Winifred ne reniera jamais son amitié passée avec Hitler, tout en revendiquant son apolitisme.

En 1949, interdite de toute activité pendant 30 mois, elle a décidé de passer le flambeau à ses 2 fils, Wieland et Wolfgang, qui ne tarderont pas à la mettre totalement à l'index. Pendant quelques mois, la ville et le gouvernement bavarois ont bien envisagé de séparer le destin de Bayreuth de celui des Wagner, en déclarant l'héritage wagnérien « bien national ». Mais que faire d'un Bayreuth « déwagnérisé » ? Friedelind, sollicitée pour réfléchir sur l'avenir, a fini par renoncer. Le Nouveau Bayreuth est donc confié aux 2 petits-fils de Richard Wagner : Wieland l'artiste, et Wolfgang l'organisateur. Le « Parsifal » qui marque la ré-ouverture du Festival, en 1951, est une véritable révolution artistique. Wieland a éliminé tout le fatras de la tradition, au profit d'un espace dépouillé et géométrique. Les productions plus conventionnelles de Wolfgang mettent du baume au coeur des fidèles wagnériens. Mais la jalousie ne cesse de croître entre les 2 frères, au point que, dès 1955, Wolfgang quitte Wahnfried.

Nouveau coup dur pour Bayreuth : en 1966, Wieland est emporté par un cancer du poumon, à 49 ans. À l'exception du « Ring » du Centenaire, signée par Pierre Boulez et Patrice Chéreau, le Festival, dirigé par Wolfgang, va désormais se complaire dans une honnête médiocrité. En 1973, la famille Wagner et l'État allemand décident de mettre en place une fondation de droit privé, désormais propriétaire du « Festspielhaus », qui nomme et rétribue le directeur du Festival, choisi en priorité dans le clan Wagner. Homme d'affaires avisé, Wolfgang a monnayé ces concessions contre beaucoup de « Marks » et un poste de « directeur à vie ». Aujourd'hui, certains des 12 arrière-petits-enfants du compositeur se déchirent pour sa succession. Nike, l'intellectuelle, fille de Wieland, propose d'élargir le répertoire à des compositeurs contemporains et de jouer hors les murs. Avant de jeter (provisoirement) l'éponge, Eva, plus pragmatique, a fait valoir ses compétences incontestées de conseillère artistique au Festival d'Aix-en-Provence et au « Metropolitan Opera » de New York. Le Festival de Bayreuth doit-il rester dédié à l'œuvre wagnérien et continuer à être dirigé par les descendants de Richard ? Pour y répondre, on méditera ces paroles de Walter Scheel :

« Nous avons appris que se soumettre sans conditions à un homme, à une œuvre, à une nation conduit à l'abîme. »

Petite ville de Haute-Franconie dans le nord de l'État de Bavière, célèbre pour son Festival exclusivement consacré aux œuvres de Richard Wagner.

Provisoirement banni de Bavière en 1865, las des intrigues de cour et de la surveillance jalouse que son protecteur Louis II exerçait sur lui, Wagner renonça au projet, lancé en 1864 par ce souverain, de construire à Munich un théâtre destiné aux représentations de « l'Anneau du Nibelung », mais non à ce rêve, qu'il caressait depuis longtemps, d'un théâtre bien à lui, où ses œuvres pourraient être jouées d'une manière parfaite. Il se mit en quête. Bayreuth retint son attention : il s'y dressait un théâtre, l'Opéra des Margraves, à l'acoustique réputée et dont la scène était l'une des plus vastes d'Allemagne. À l'examen, cet édifice, qu'il visita en avril 1871, ne lui convint pas. Mais la compréhension qu'il rencontra à Bayreuth le décida : c'est là qu'il édifierait son Théâtre des Festivals (« Festspielhaus »), spécialement destiné à servir de cadre aux représentations solennelles de « l'Anneau », œuvre dont les dimensions et le caractère exigeaient, selon lui, des conditions d'exécution totalement différentes de celles d'un Opéra traditionnel.

L'ambitieux projet de Wagner était celui d'une véritable école où les interprètes, par le biais de l'étude de ses ouvrages, apprendraient les fondements du théâtre lyrique moderne : avènement d'acteurs-chanteurs se substituant aux « gosiers » sacrifiant tout à « la » note, restauration de la conception initiatique du spectacle que Wagner croyait déceler dans la tragédie grecque.

C'est dans cette perspective que, reprenant les principes qu'en accord avec lui l'architecte Gottfried Semper avait posés pour le projet de Munich, Wagner conçut un bâtiment aux caractéristiques révolutionnaires (quoique inspirées, pour certains traits, du théâtre de Riga où il avait travaillé dans sa jeunesse) : une salle d'environ 1,800 places en amphithéâtre, sans loges ni baignoires, étagée sur trente gradins, avec une visibilité parfaite pour tous les spectateurs ; un orchestre profondément enfoncé dans une fosse de 6 gradins, recouverte aux 3 quarts par 2 auvents de bois mince dont l'un, du côté de la scène, fait office de « proscenium » , créant une fausse perspective qui trompe le spectateur sur la taille réelle des décors et même des personnages.

Le fait de cacher l'orchestre répondait à 2 préoccupations : d'abord, en supprimant cette source de lumière qui d'ordinaire s'interpose entre le public et le plateau, concentrer l'attention du spectateur sur le déroulement scénique ; ensuite, obtenir un son d'orchestre décanté, limpide, mal localisé, presque mystérieux, qui, jaillissant de l'invisible « abîme mystique » , enveloppe idéalement les voix sans les masquer. À l'atmosphère sérieuse, fervente, ainsi recherchée, contribuent également l'austérité de la salle, sans dorure, sans ornement (elle était d'ailleurs considérée par Wagner comme provisoire ; les fonds disponibles avaient été utilisés en priorité pour créer un équipement scénique parfait, considéré, lui, comme définitif) , l'inconfort des rudimentaires sièges de bois et le fait, nouveau pour l'époque, que la salle était plongée dans l'obscurité durant les représentations.

L'école ne vit pas le jour, mais, dans l'édifice bâti grâce à la vente de cartes de patronage et, surtout, à une ultime et décisive aide de Louis II, le rideau se leva sur « l'Or du Rhin » , inaugurant un « Anneau du Nibelung » complet, en août 1876. L'événement, à la fois politique et artistique (Guillaume II et l'Empereur du Brésil y côtoyaient Franz Liszt, Anton Bruckner, Léon Tolstoï, Camille Saint-Saëns, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski) , connut un succès rendu relatif par le déficit, qui interdit d'annoncer la date du Festival suivant, et par l'indifférence du public d'Opéra traditionnel. Le wagnérisme, pourtant, s'institutionnalisa cette année-là ; Nietzsche, voyant son ami accaparé par les associations « d'amateurs de bière, de peaux de bête et de Wagner » , fuit Bayreuth à l'arrivée des Iers « pèlerins » .

6 ans plus tard, la création de « Parsifal » (1882) fut accueillie avec déférence ; mais la mort de Wagner (1883) menaça la survie de Bayreuth. « Parsifal » fut joué en 1883 et 1884, mais des Festivals isolés, arrachés au destin, n'avaient créé ni une habitude ni une tradition. Cosima Wagner décida alors d'assumer l'héritage. Entourée d'une extraordinaire équipe de chefs d'orchestre (Hans Richter, Hermann Levi, Felix Mottl) , elle présenta à tour de rôle l'ensemble des œuvres principales du Maître, du « Vaisseau fantôme » à « Parsifal » . Avec l'aide de son fils Siegfried (1869-1930) et d'un conseiller musical, Julius Kniese, elle fit de Bayreuth une institution où, conception radicalement neuve, mise en scène et chant comptaient autant l'un que l'autre. Longtemps, on accusa Cosima d'avoir favorisé la naissance d'une « race de hurleurs » (George Bernard Shaw) . Mais de grandes voix, comme Rosa Sucher, étaient alors aussi rares qu'aujourd'hui. Il est vrai cependant que Cosima, qui estimait honorer les chanteurs en les engageant et les payait fort peu (pratique qui s'est maintenue à Bayreuth jusqu'à nos jours) , ne craignit jamais de sacrifier la beauté vocale sur l'autel de l'articulation « wagnérienne » obligatoire qu'elle avait instituée, déclamation inspirée du théâtre parlé. Soumis à ce style dont ils ne pouvaient enfreindre la moindre règle sous peine d'expulsion, les vedettes du Bayreuth de l'époque, Erick Schmedes, Ernest van Dyck, Theodor Bertram, Ellen Gulbranson, purent sembler au public des voix moins « belles » que leurs rivaux Leo Slezak, Jacques Urlus, Emil Fischer, Lillian Nordica, Felia Litvinne, qui chantaient librement Wagner dans les autres théâtres. Assurément, l'intégrité de la fidélité de Cosima à certaines volontés réelles, ou supposées, de Wagner ôta aux chanteurs toute spontanéité, toute imagination, et supprima sur le plan scénique toute possibilité d'innovation.

En 1907, Cosima abandonna la direction du Festival à Siegfried. Celui-ci se contenta, jusqu'à la Première Guerre, de maintenir les méthodes instaurées par sa mère. Après le conflit, il eut grand mérite à réunir les fonds nécessaires pour la reprise, qui eut lieu en 1924. Cette période se caractérise par la création d'une régie des éclairages, la simplification des décors et l'utilisation de projections, un style plus naturaliste et psychologique dans la direction d'acteurs, bref, un heureux compromis entre les théories d'Adolphe Appia, que Cosima avait formellement rejetées et qu'il n'osa suivre totalement, et la tradition. Des chefs comme Karl Muck et Michael Balling, des chanteurs comme Nanny Larsen-Todsen et le chef des chœurs Hugo Rüdell l'aidèrent à maintenir une haute-qualité musicale et vocale. Les nouvelles productions de « Tristan et Isolde » (1927) et « Tannhäuser » (1930), qu'il mit en scène, furent critiquées par les passésistes, mais furent dans l'ensemble très admirées. Siegfried mourut en 1930, laissant à sa femme Winifred (1897-1979), depuis longtemps son assistante, un Festival d'une tenue exemplaire, où pourrait briller la nouvelle génération de chanteurs wagnériens exceptionnels qui atteignait alors son apogée : Frida Leider, Alexander Kipnis, Friedrich Schorr, Lauritz Melchior, Lotte Lehmann, Emanuel List.

Or, Bayreuth allait beaucoup changer. À mesure que l'Allemagne tombait sous la coupe du National-Socialisme, de très nombreux artistes, imitant Arturo Toscanini dont la rupture avec Bayreuth (1933) fut éclatante, prenaient le chemin de l'exil. On ne trouva bientôt plus au Festival que des chefs appréciés ou tolérés par le régime (Karl Elmendorff, Franz von Hoesslin, Wilhelm Furtwängler) et des chanteurs « protégés » : Max Lorenz, Franz Völker, Maria Müller, Margarete Klose, Jaro Prohaska, Ludwig Hofmann, Josef von Manowarda, Rudolf Bockelmann. Tous étaient, au demeurant, de remarquables acteurs-chanteurs, membres pour la plupart de l'Opéra de Berlin dont le directeur, le chef d'orchestre et metteur en scène Heinz Tietjen (1881-1967), assura à partir de 1933 la direction artistique du Festival. Avec l'aide du décorateur Emil Preetorius et du chef éclairagiste Paul Eberhardt, Tietjen créa un monde de symboles, d'archétypes, plus proche des réalisations ultérieures de Wieland et Wolfgang Wagner que du style de Siegfried. Toutefois, à travers cette forme nouvelle, Tietjen présenta un « message » de plus en plus ouvertement nationaliste. Adolf Hitler lui-même demeura relativement discret en raison de la sympathie aveugle, mais sincère, que lui vouait Winifred mais Bayreuth était bel et bien devenu un temple culturel nazi, et si Germaine Lubin se flatte d'y avoir chanté Isolde en 1939, une Kirsten Flagstad préféra rejoindre au « Metropolitan Opera House » de New York tous les grands chanteurs exilés.

La Deuxième Guerre mondiale limita l'activité du Festival, l'écroulement du « Reich » l'interrompit en 1944. Touchée par la dénazification, Winifred dut céder la direction à 2 de ses enfants, Wieland (1917-1966) et Wolfgang (1919). En 1951, le théâtre rouvrit ses portes. Une production, mise en scène par Wieland, de « Parsifal », qui fit scandale avant de devenir unanimement admirée au fil des années, inaugurerait l'ère du « nouveau Bayreuth ». Les 2 frères s'attachèrent à définir un style de scénographie systématiquement épuré, jouant de la lumière et de la couleur pour fouiller le sens profond des œuvres. Wieland se montra symboliste et rigoureux, Wolfgang plus humain, plus coloré. Les productions les plus remarquées furent celles de Wieland (« Tristan et Isolde », 1952 et 1962 ; « les Maîtres-chanteurs », 1956 ; « l'Anneau du Nibelung », 1965) ; elles furent, à leur tour, violemment combattues par les passésistes, mais vite admises et même saluées comme des exemples, des jalons dans l'histoire du théâtre ; ces visions décapantes amorçaient une réflexion idéologique qui allait bien au-delà du simple renouvellement de style. Un tel travail, décisif pour l'avenir de l'art lyrique, ne fut possible qu'avec la fidèle collaboration des chefs d'orchestre Hans Knappertsbusch, Wolfgang Sawallisch, Karl Böhm, André Cluytens, Josef Keilberth, Rudolf Kempe, des chanteurs Wolfgang Windgassen, Hans Hotter, Leonie Rysanek, Gustav Neidlinger, Josef Greindl, Astrid Varnay, Martha Mödl, Birgit Nilsson, Anja Silja, et du chef des chœurs Wilhelm Pitz.

Wieland mourut en 1966, année où, appelé par lui, Pierre Boulez dirigeait son 1er « Parsifal ». Wolfgang a, depuis, assumé seul la responsabilité suprême. Brisant heureusement le rêve de certains de transformer Bayreuth en « musée Wieland », il a, tout en poursuivant ses propres recherches, ouvert le « Festspielhaus » à des metteurs en scène aussi divers qu'August Everding (« le Vaisseau fantôme », 1969 ; « Tristan et Isolde », 1974), Götz Friedrich (« Tannhäuser », 1972 ; « Lohengrin », 1979), Patrice Chéreau (« l'Anneau du Nibelung », 1976), Harry Kupfer (« le Vaisseau fantôme », 1978 ; « Parsifal », 1982). En même temps, il a renouvelé les distributions en appelant des chanteurs (René Kollo, Peter Hofmann, Gwyneth Jones, Franz Mazura, Heinz Zednick) ne répondant pas aux critères de puissance vocale que l'on associait au chant wagnérien depuis quelques dizaines d'années, mais capables d'affronter les exigences actuelles de la recherche et de la sincérité théâtrales. Ainsi, Bayreuth demeure-t-il, comme à ses origines, un lieu d'avant-garde, un phare du théâtre contemporain. Wolfgang a confié à Norbert Balatsch la difficile succession de Wilhelm Pitz, à la tête des chœurs (qui sont une élite recrutée essentiellement dans les théâtres allemands, ainsi qu'à l'étranger), et mis l'Orchestre (qui est une sélection de musiciens des Orchestres d'Opéra et de Radio des 2 Allemagnes) entre les mains de personnalités aussi exigeantes et aux conceptions wagnériennes aussi peu sclérosées que Pierre Boulez, Carlos Kleiber, Colin Davis ou Silvio Varviso. Wolfgang, en accord avec sa mère, a définitivement assuré l'avenir du Festival en suscitant la création, en 1973, d'une Fondation Richard Wagner (« Richard Wagner Stiftung Bayreuth »), qui, légataire des biens matériels et spirituels de la famille Wagner, est chargée de les gérer. Cette fondation regroupe la République fédérale d'Allemagne, l'État de Bavière, la Fondation régionale bavaroise, le district de Haute-Franconie, la Fondation de Haute-Franconie, la ville de Bayreuth, la Société des amis de Bayreuth et les membres de la famille Wagner. Il a, enfin, développé les Rencontres internationales pour la jeunesse, nées en 1951, qui organisent, parallèlement au Festival, des séminaires, des conférences, des ateliers de jeunes interprètes.

Le succès du doyen des Festivals ne se dément pas et s'est élargi aux dimensions du monde grâce à une intelligente collaboration avec la radio, le disque et, plus récemment, l'audio-visuel.

Le Nouveau Bayreuth

Le nouveau Bayreuth (« Neubayreuth » ou « neues Bayreuth ») est le surnom du profond renouvellement que connut dans les années 1950 et 1960 le Festival de Bayreuth sous l'influence de Wieland Wagner, co-directeur du Festival avec son frère Wolfgang.

Les mises-en-scène visaient à trouver le sens profond de chaque œuvre en l'extirpant de tout contexte historique ou politique, et rejetaient le style traditionnel (littéral, réaliste et naturaliste) en ce qu'il prenait le parti de symboliser et d'évoquer plutôt que de figurer. Les personnages, conçus comme des symboles plutôt que comme des pseudo-humains, sont au cœur d'une action universelle et intemporelle qui permet de multiples lectures.

Le renouveau opéré par les petits-fils du compositeur naît dans l'opprobre qui frappe, après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, le Festival de Bayreuth et la famille Wagner. Le Festival a pleinement participé à la politique culturelle du régime nazi, sous le haut-patronage d'Adolf Hitler lui-même, intime de la famille. D'une certaine manière, c'est également la méfiance manifestée envers un compositeur à l'antisémitisme avéré, adulé par Hitler et utilisé jusqu'à plus soif par les Nazis, qui déteint sur le lieu qu'il a conçu pour la célébration de ses propres œuvres.

Le Festival rouvre en 1951, 6 ans après la fin de la Guerre, l'année du 70^e anniversaire de sa création. Il a été pris en main par les petits-fils du compositeur, Wieland et Wolfgang Wagner. Leur mère Winifred, la belle-fille du compositeur et directrice depuis 1930, renonce à tout rôle sur la colline sacrée ; elle vivra jusqu'en 1980, sans manifester le moindre remords quant à la cordiale relation qu'elle entretenait avec le « Führer ». Ses 2 fils vont s'attacher à dissocier les ouvrages de Wagner d'un certain nationalisme allemand et l'abstraire de toute lecture politique.

À cela s'ajoute une conscience aiguë de la nécessité de sortir les ouvrages de la vision traditionnelle dont Bayreuth s'était fait la spécialité, bien qu'un 1^{er} rafraîchissement soit déjà advenu pendant la période nazie, sous l'impulsion de Winifred et avec la bénédiction d'Hitler. L'influence d'Adolphe Appia, aussi, est déterminante. Cette volonté, jugée radicale, heurtera une partie du public, à qui Wieland répondra en 1963 qu'« on ne peut pas vivre dans un musée, même si c'est celui de mon grand-père ».

Le 29 juillet 1951, la ré-ouverture du Festival constitue « le plus important événement lyrique germanique depuis la création de "Wozzeck" à Berlin, en décembre 1925. » (Frederic Spotts)

Le 1^{er} Festival voit bouleversée la conception de la mise-en-scène héritée du XIX^e siècle, et renvoie au musée les décors au caractère littéral caractéristique de l'ancien style wagnérien. Wieland fait évoluer ses personnages sur de grandes plages monocolores stylisant le lieu, le contexte, l'atmosphère, ou l'état d'esprit des personnages ; ainsi, le rocher de l'Acte III du « Siegfried » de 1951 est réduit à un sol de pierre claire et un immense ciel bleu. Dans certaines productions, le décor même est remplacé par l'obscurité et le vide : aucune forêt sacrée dans l'Acte I du « Parsifal » de 1951, aucun château dans l'Acte III du « Tristan » de 1952, mais une noirceur qui projette sur tout l'espace scénique le désespoir de d'Amfortas et de Tristan et la progression en eux du mal.

La nouveauté tient non seulement à ce qu'on voit, mais aussi à ce qu'on en voit plus, car toute ce qui est jugé inutile est supprimé, pour permettre au spectateur de se consacrer sur l'essentiel, c'est-à-dire le chant et l'action. Dans le « Parsifal » du 1^{er} soir, pas de cygne, pas de temple, pas de château, pas de fleurs pour les filles-fleurs, etc. Des costumes simples et intemporels remplacent les peaux d'animaux et les braies issus des mythes germaniques, et montrent l'universalité du message et l'appartenance des personnages à l'humanité entière. Ce dépouillement culmine lors du duo d'amour du « Tristan » de 1952, lorsque les 2 amants chantent au milieu d'un infini bleu-noir d'où seules émergent leurs têtes.

Un élément récurrent de cette époque est, au centre de la scène, un vaste cercle (ou plutôt, pour des raisons de perspective, d'une ellipse), autour et sur lequel se concentre le déroulement de l'action. On trouve de bons exemples dans « l'Anneau du Nibelung » de 1951 (où la forme symbolise également l'anneau) ou à l'Acte I du « Parsifal » de cette même année. Wieland, influencé par le théoricien de la mise-en-scène, Adolphe Appia, utilise également la lumière comme un élément de mise-en-scène, que ce soit pour rendre l'atmosphère d'un lieu ou pour lier musique et drame à travers la couleur.

Au milieu des années 1950, les principes évoluent en direction de l'idée d'un espace imaginaire (« geistiger Raum »), structuré et tourné vers le public. Certains éléments s'inspirent de la tragédie grecque - une source importante chez Wagner, lecteur d'Eschyle et qui a arrangé la salle du Palais des Festivals de Bayreuth avec des gradins en demi-cercle, dans le style antique. Les costumes des dieux de « l'Anneau » de 1951 montraient déjà cette direction, ce qui contribue à « dé-germaniser » visuellement les ouvrages. Mais c'est le traitement des chœurs dans le « Tannhäuser » de 1954 et le « Lohengrin » de 1958 qui portent une plus grande nouveauté : ils évoquent le chœur grec qui, en un vaste ensemble face au public, entoure et commente l'action.

Dans les années 1960, la volonté de laisser au spectateur la liberté de voir fera préférer à l'abstraction l'utilisation de formes symboliques et ambiguës qui peuvent, comme des taches de Hermann Rorschach, être interprétées de différentes manières, ouvrant ainsi tout le potentiel psychologique des ouvrages. Dans son célèbre « Tristan » de 1962, l'espace scénique n'est occupé que par d'étranges et hauts monolithes. Dans l'Acte II, une forme verticale d'une dizaine de mètres de haut, au sommet incliné et percé de 2 larges trous d'où tombent 2 traînées sombres. Une pierre tombale ? un symbole phallique ? l'épée de Marke ? la surveillance de Bragäne ? une chouette ? De même, à l'Acte II de son « Siegfried » de 1965, une structure d'apparence végétale formant une fresque de larges trous, et pouvant suggérer des racines, les alvéoles d'une ruche, des terriers.

Wieland Wagner a mis-en-scène tous les grands Opéras de son grand-père au moins une fois, de la ré-ouverture de 1951 jusqu'à sa mort en 1966 :

1951 : « Parsifal » .

1951 : « L'Anneau du Nibelung » .

1952 : « Tristan et Isolde » .

1954 : « Tannhäuser » .

1956 : « Les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » .

1958 : « Lohengrin » .

1959 : « Le Vaisseau fantôme » .

1961 : « Tannhäuser » .

1962 : « Tristan et Isolde » .

1963 : « Les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » .

1965 : « L'Anneau du Nibelung » .

Wolfgang a également signé 4 mises-en-scène pendant cette période, dans un style qui, s'il s'inscrit dans les principes de son frère, est généralement considéré comme plus sage ou moins inspiré.

1953 : « Lohengrin » .

1955 : « Le Vaisseau fantôme » .

1957 : « Tristan et Isolde » .

1960 : « L'Anneau du Nibelung » .

La mise-en-scène des « Maîtres-chanteurs » par Rudolf Hartmann en 1951, reprise en 1952 seulement, ne peut être liée au nouveau Bayreuth : Wieland a préféré se concentrer pour la ré-ouverture sur « Parsifal » et le « Ring » , et n'a consenti à une 3e production dans le style traditionnel qu'afin de faire une courte transition avec les anciens Festivals.

L'application des principes de Wieland Wagner afin de dégager les Opéras de la dimension historique et politique dans laquelle les avaient enfermés 7 décennies de mises-en-scène « respectant les œuvres du Maître » a été vécue comme un bouleversement, et à ce titre diversement appréciée. Une partie des critiques et du public, dès le début, accueille favorablement les mises-en-scène de Wieland, et s'y rallie avec parfois quelques réticences.

Cependant, une partie plus traditionaliste du public vivra la volonté de dépoussiérage comme une profanation, et l'universalisation comme un reniement. À chaque nouvelle production, les « révisions » sont critiquées : la scène de « Lohengrin » n'est plus à Anvers, Heinrich n'y est plus Empereur ; aucun marin à l'Acte I de « Tristan » ; aucun jardin pour les filles-fleurs ; etc. En particulier, en 1956, la production des « Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » , surnommée « Les Maîtres-chanteurs sans Nuremberg » , en raison de l'absence de toute figuration de la ville dans les décors des Actes II et III, a suscité les lres huées de l'histoire du Festival, et l'ire des traditionalistes, qui comparèrent les gradins de la scène du concours, rangés avec un dénivelé relativement élevé, à un amphithéâtre d'université.

Autre scandale célèbre, celui de « Tannhäuser » en 1961. Plus que la mise-en-scène, la Bacchanale très suggestive de Maurice Béjart et, surtout, la présence d'une chanteuse noire, Grace Bumbry, qui chanta Vénus, provoquèrent de très vives réactions du public (« Une “ négresse ” à Bayreuth ! ») .

Le travail de Wieland Wagner n'a cependant aucun caractère radical ou subversif : il faut y voir une volonté d'atteindre le sens profond, le message même de chaque ouvrage au-delà du détail ou de l'anecdotique, et d'être en ce sens plus « fidèle » à l'œuvre wagnérienne que ceux qui s'en sont servis à des fins de propagande politique. Il rencontre du reste un succès européen, et dirige d'autres productions wagnériennes dans de grandes maisons d'Opéra, où il contribue à faire prendre conscience qu'une page s'est tournée dans l'histoire du théâtre lyrique.

The Bayreuth Festival (« Bayreuther Festspiele ») is a music Festival held annually in Bayreuth, Germany, at which performances of Operas by the 19th Century German composer, Richard Wagner, are presented. Wagner, himself, conceived and promoted the idea of a special Festival to showcase his own works, in particular, his monumental cycle « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and « Parsifal » .

Performances take place in a specially designed theatre, the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » .Wagner personally supervised the design and construction of the theatre, which contained many architectural innovations to accommodate the huge orchestras for which Wagner wrote as well as the composer's particular vision about the staging of his works. The Festival has become a pilgrimage destination for Wagner enthusiasts, who often must wait years to obtain tickets.

The origins of the Festival itself lie rooted in Richard Wagner's interest in establishing his financial independence. A souring of the relationship with his patron, Ludwig II of Bavaria, led to his expulsion from Munich, where he had originally intended to launch the Festival. Wagner next considered Nuremberg, which would have re-inforced the thematic significance of works such as « Die Meistersinger » . On the advice of Hans Richter, however, the focus fell upon Bayreuth which enjoyed 3 distinct advantages.

1st, the town boasted a splendid venue : the « Markgräfliches Opernhaus » built for Margrave Frederick and his wife, Friederike Sophie Wilhelmine (sister of Frederick the Great) , in 1747. With its ample capacity and strong acoustics, the Opera House was a good match for Wagner's vision. 2nd, the town of Bayreuth found itself outside of regions where Wagner no longer owned the rights to the performance of his own works, which he had sold-off in 1864, in order to alleviate pressing financial concerns. Finally, the town had no cultural life that could offer competition to Wagner's own artistic dominance. The Festival, once launched, would be the dominant feature of Bayreuth's cultural landscape.

In April 1870, Wagner and his wife Cosima visited Bayreuth. On inspection, the Opera House proved to be inadequate. It was built to accommodate the Baroque Orchestras of the 18th Century and was, therefore, unsuited for the complex stagings and large Orchestras that Wagner's Operas required. Nonetheless, the « Burgermeisters » proved open to assisting Wagner with the construction of an entirely new theatre and the Festival was planned to launch in 1873. After a fruitless meeting, in the spring of 1871, with the German Chancellor Otto von Bismarck to obtain funds, Wagner embarked on a fund-raising tour across Germany, including Leipzig and Frankfurt.

An initial public subscription proved disappointing until Wagner, at the suggestion of his friend and admirer Emil Heckel, launched a number of Wagner Societies to increase participation in the Festival's subscription. Societies were established, among other places, in Leipzig, Berlin and Vienna.

Despite making direct appeals based on Wagner's role as a composer of the new German « Reich » , the Societies and other fundraising channels were well-short of the needed sum, by the end of 1872. Wagner made another appeal to Bismarck, in August 1873, and was again denied.

Desperate, Wagner turned to his former patron, Ludwig II, who reluctantly agreed to help. In January 1874, Ludwig granted 100,000 Thaler and construction on the theatre, designed by architect Gottfried Semper, started shortly thereafter. A planned 1875 debut was postponed for 1 year due to construction and other delays.

Since its opening, in 1876, the Bayreuth Festival has been a socio-cultural phenomenon. The inauguration took place on 13 August 1876, with a performance of « Das Rheingold ». Present at this unique musical event were « Kaiser » Wilhelm, Dom Pedro II of Brazil, King Ludwig (who attended in secret, probably to avoid the « Kaiser »), and other members of the nobility, as well as the philosopher Friedrich Nietzsche who committed much effort to helping his then good friend Wagner establish the Festival, and such accomplished composers as Anton Bruckner, Edvard Grieg, Pyotr Tchaïkovsky, Franz Liszt, and the young Arthur Foote.

Artistically, the Festival was a success. (« Something has taken place at Bayreuth which our grandchildren and their children will still remember »), wrote Tchaïkovsky, attending the Festival as a Russian correspondent.) Financially, however, the Festival was a disaster and did not begin to make money until several years later. Wagner abandoned his original plan to hold a 2nd Festival the following year, and travelled to London to conduct a series of concerts in an attempt to make-up for the deficit. Although the Festival was plagued by financial problems in its early years, it survived through State intervention and the continued support of influential Wagnerians, including King Ludwig II of Bavaria.

From its inception, the Festival has attracted leading conductors and singers, many of whom performed without pay. Among these was Hans Richter, who conducted the premiere of the « Ring » Cycle, in 1876. Another was the talented conductor Hermann Levi, who was personally chosen by Richard Wagner to conduct the debut of « Parsifal », in 1882, with the assistance of the young Engelbert Humperdinck.

Following Wagner's death, his widow Cosima continued running the Festival at 1 or, more frequently, 2 year intervals. She gradually introduced the remaining Operas which complete the Bayreuth canon of Wagner's last 10 completed Operas. Levi, the son of a Jewish rabbi, remained the Festival's principal conductor for the next 2 decades. Felix Mottl, who was involved with the Festival, from 1876 to 1901, conducted « Tristan und Isolde » there, in 1886. Until the 1920's, performances were strictly in accordance with the traditions established under King Ludwig's patronage. Not a note was « cut » from any of the enormous scores ; no concessions were made to the limits of human patience on the part of the audiences. Cosima Wagner preserved the productions of « Parsifal » and « Der Ring des Nibelungen » just as they had been in Wagner's day, defending any proposed changes with appeals to her son, Siegfried :

« Was this not how Papa did it, in 1876 ? »

After Cosima's retirement, in 1906, Siegfried Wagner took-over management of the Festival, introducing new staging and performance styles. His early death, in 1930, left the Festival in the hands of his English-born wife Winifred Wagner, with Heinz Tietjen as artistic director.

In the 1920's, well before the rise of the Nazi Party, Winifred Wagner became a strong supporter and close personal friend of Adolf Hitler ; her correspondence with Hitler has never been released by the Wagner family. She and other Festival leaders were members of Nazi chief ideologue Alfred Rosenberg's « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , which actively suppressed modernist music and works by « degenerate » artists. The Festival maintained some artistic independence under the 3rd « Reich » . Ironically, Hitler attended performances that included Jewish and foreign singers, long after they had been banned from all other venues across Germany (including the « heldentenor » Max Lorenz, married to a well-known Jewish woman) . Winifred's influence with Hitler was so strong that Hitler even wrote a letter (at her behest) to anti-Fascist Italian conductor Arturo Toscanini, begging him to lead the Festival. Toscanini refused. From 1933 to 1942, the Festival was conducted principally by Karl Elmendorff.

It was under the 3rd « Reich » that the Festival made its 1st break from tradition, abandoning the deteriorating 19th Century sets created by Richard Wagner. Many protested at the changes, including prominent conductors such as Toscanini and Richard Strauß, and even some members of the Wagner family. In their view, any change to the Festival was a profanation against « the Master » (Wagner) . Nevertheless, Hitler approved of the changes, thus paving the way for more innovations in the decades to come.

During the War, the Festival was turned-over to the Nazi Party, which continued to sponsor Operas for wounded soldiers returning from the front. These soldiers were forced to attend lectures on Wagner before the performances, and most found the Festival to be tedious. However, as « guests of the “ Führer ” » , none complained.

During the 1970's, Winifred Wagner was repeatedly petitioned to install a memorial to the Jewish singers at the Bayreuth Festival who had been murdered in concentration camps. A plaque was finally installed honouring Otilie Metzger-Lattermann and Henriette Gottlieb after Winifred's death.

2/3 of the town of Bayreuth was destroyed by Allied bombing in the final days of World War II, though the theatre itself was undamaged. Following the War, Winifred Wagner was sentenced to probation by a War Court for her support of the Nazi Party. The Court also banned her from administration of the Bayreuth Festival and its assets, which fell eventually to her 2 sons, Wolfgang and Wieland.

During American occupation of the region after World War II, the theatre was used for army recreation and religious services for American soldiers. Only popular concerts and mixed entertainment were allowed : comedy, dancing, acrobatics and, then, only « Die Fledermaus » was staged. When the Festival House was handed-over to the city of Bayreuth, in 1946, it was used for concerts of the Bayreuth Symphony Orchestra and the performances of such Operas as « Fidelio » , « Tiefland » , « Madama Butterfly » and « La Traviata » . And talks about re-opening of the Wagnerian Festival started. Finally, it re-opened with the performance by the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra under conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler of Beethoven's 9th Symphony, on 29 July 1951, followed by the 1st post-War premiere of Wagner's Opera, « Parsifal » .

Under the direction of Wieland Wagner, the « New Bayreuth » ushered in an era that was no less than revolutionary. Gone were the elaborate naturalistic sets, replaced with minimalist modern productions. In comparison, the pre-War changes seemed tame. For the 1st time in its history, the Bayreuth audience booed at the end of productions. Wieland was particularly derided for his 1956 production of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg ». Stripped of its pageantry, conservatives viewed the breaking of this « sacred German tradition » as an outrage.

Wieland defended the changes as an attempt to create an « invisible stage » that would allow the audience to experience the full psychosocial aspects of the drama without the baggage and distraction of elaborate set-designs. Others have speculated that by stripping Wagner's works of their Germanic and historic elements, Wieland was attempting to distance Bayreuth from its nationalistic past and create productions with universal appeal. Over time, many critics came to appreciate the unique beauty of Wieland's re-interpretation of his grandfather's works.

Wieland's innovative productions invited comparison to Wolfgang's, which critics unanimously found to be uninspired. If Wieland's productions were radical, Wolfgang's were regressive. Although still minimalist in approach, Wolfgang resurrected much of the naturalistic and Romantic elements of pre-War productions. Thus, when Wieland died prematurely from lung cancer, in 1966, many wondered if Bayreuth had a future. They began to question Bayreuth's primacy among German Opera Houses, and some suggested that more interesting productions were being staged elsewhere.

Around this time (1955) , in order to broaden its audience, the whole Bayreuth Festival company conducted performances in Paris and Barcelona, performing « Parsifal » , « Die Walküre » and « Tristan und Isolde » .

In 1973, faced with overwhelming criticism and family infighting, the Bayreuth Festival and its assets were transferred to a newly created Richard Wagner Foundation. The board of directors included members of the Wagner family and others appointed by the State. As chairman, Wolfgang Wagner remained in charge of administration of the Festival.

While Wolfgang Wagner continued to administer the Festival, beginning in the 1970's, production was handled by a number of new directors in what Wolfgang called : « Werkstatt Bayreuth » (Bayreuth Workshop) . The idea was to turn the Festival into an opportunity for directors to experiment with new methods for presenting the Operas. The change came-out of necessity, as it was impossible for Wolfgang to both administer and direct the Festival. It also provided an opportunity for Bayreuth to renew itself with each production, rather than continue to present the same Operas in the same way, year after year. Ingmar Bergman, who famously made a film version in Swedish of Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » , turned-down an invitation to direct the Festival.

The most sensational production in « Werkstatt Bayreuth » was the Centennial « Ring » Cycle under the direction of French director Patrice Chéreau. Chereau used an updated 19th Century setting that followed the interpretation of George Bernard Shaw who saw the « Ring » as a social commentary on the exploitation of the working-class by wealthy 19th Century capitalists.

The audience reaction was split between those who saw the production as an offence and those who considered it the best « Ring » Cycle ever produced. The ensuing conflict, short only of outright riot, between supporters and detractors was unprecedented in the history of the Festival. The performances, and the performers, however, were without dispute some of the best seen in the world of Opera.

Le « Festspielhaus »

C'est afin d'être en mesure d'offrir de ses œuvres (de l'Anneau du Nibelung, en 1er lieu) des représentations modèles, c'est-à-dire conformes à ses intentions, dans un cadre adapté, que Richard Wagner songe très tôt à l'édification d'un Théâtre d'un genre nouveau. En fait, dès l'époque où, Maître de chapelle de la Cour à Dresde (1843-1849), il ne cesse de se battre pour réformer de fond en comble le théâtre traditionnel.

Mais c'est en 1863 qu'il exprime pleinement ses idées dans la Préface à la 1re Édition de L'Anneau du Nibelung ; idées qu'il reprend une fois encore, lorsqu'en 1870 il écrit à son ami, mécène et protecteur Louis II de Bavière : « Il est clair que je devrais disposer de mon propre théâtre pour représenter mes œuvres, qui ne se sont retrouvées rejetées dans le genre " Opéra " que par le plus grand des hasards. »

Il est nécessaire de rappeler qu'à l'époque de Wagner, le théâtre d'Opéra est conçu la plupart du temps sur le modèle du « théâtre à l'italienne » : lieu où le public se rend essentiellement pour se montrer et s'observer. Du reste, on oublie trop souvent que l'une des 1res innovations apportées par Wagner fut d'exiger que les lumières soient éteintes dans la salle durant la représentation.

Richard Wagner entend donc offrir à son « Ring » un cadre qui diffère, du tout au tout, des théâtres traditionnels par :

« Ici, j'enferme un secret ;
Qu'il y demeure de longs siècles:
Tant que cette pierre le recèlera,
Il se manifestera au monde ! »

L'extrême dépouillement du bâtiment, en briques rouges et en bois. Sur le plan du Théâtre réalisé par Otto Brückwald, on trouve cette annotation, de la main de Wagner : « Enlevez toutes les décorations ! » .

L'absence de foyer, au sens habituel du terme. Il se résume ici à un espace situé sous la salle.

La disposition de la salle. Pas de loges se regardant l'une l'autre, mais une sorte d'amphithéâtre grec, très pentu, plongeant vers la scène.

La fosse orchestrale est rendue invisible par 2 mantelets en bois.

Le plafond du « Festspielhaus » est peint dans les tons de jaune, d'ocre et de bleu. Il figure le « velum » rayonnant que l'on tirait au-dessus des gradins, dans les théâtres de l'Antiquité, afin de protéger les spectateurs du soleil. Cette décoration voulue par Richard Wagner suggère évidemment la parenté de son œuvre avec la Tragédie grecque, que l'on retrouve, par ailleurs, sur le sgraffite qui se situe sur la façade de la Villa « Wahnfried » .

L'ensemble est destiné à favoriser la « fusion » des spectateurs en un tout, par-delà les classes sociales (les spectateurs sont tous logés à la même enseigne, sur les gradins !) , et à focaliser l'attention de chacun sur le déroulement de l'action dramatique, sans que rien ne vienne distraire son attention (à l'époque de Wagner, les musiciens accordaient leurs instruments avant d'entrer dans la fosse orchestrale, et les techniciens étaient munis de chaussons spéciaux afin que nul ne puisse percevoir le bruit de leurs déplacements en coulisses) .

Voulu par Richard Wagner comme lieu de représentations modèles de ses œuvres, le « Festspielhaus » n'est ni une « institution officielle » , ni un « atelier expérimental » .

Le « Festspielhaus » , dans l'esprit de Richard Wagner, est une part intégrante de son œuvre. Il s'agit donc, en ce sens, d'une véritable « œuvre d'art » .

À l'opposé du théâtre Brechtien, le théâtre Wagnérien doit être le lieu de l'illusion portée à son plus haut degré : une sorte de cinéma en 3D avant l'heure.

Et tout concourt, dans le « Festspielhaus » , à créer une telle illusion : l'acoustique unique de la salle, la nuit quasi totale dans laquelle est plongée le spectateur (du temps de Wagner, les lumières demeuraient ordinairement allumées durant les représentations) , l'invisibilité de la fosse orchestrale (une pièce avait même été prévue par Wagner, destinée à permettre aux musiciens d'accorder leurs instruments, avant d'entrer dans la fosse) , le dispositif scénique, enfin, mis en œuvre par des techniciens chaussés de pantoufles, de manière à éviter tout bruit incongru.

La salle, qui peut accueillir 1,800 spectateurs, est constituée de 30 gradins qui montent en forte pente depuis la fosse orchestrale. L'amphithéâtre ainsi créé, en forme de triangle dont le sommet se trouve au centre de la scène, s'inscrit dans le plan rectangulaire de la salle grâce aux 6 pans de murs qui se détachent progressivement de la paroi latérale. Terminés par une colonne de style corynthienne, ces 6 pans de murs animent les parois qui, sans cela, eussent paru fort nues et ont également une fonction acoustique. À l'arrière, l'amphithéâtre est fermé par des loges et une galerie.

Le plancher porte des sièges cannés, à l'origine, à armature en bois, sans accoudoirs. Le cadre de la scène est lui aussi en bois, peint en gris, comme le rideau de scène, qui s'ouvre à la grecque, c'est-à-dire depuis le centre jusqu'au manteau d'arlequin.

Si le 1er Festival de Bayreuth fut un immense succès artistique, ce fut aussi un désastre financier ; de sorte que, du vivant de Richard Wagner, le « Festspielhaus » ne put rouvrir ses portes qu'une seule fois, en 1882, pour la création de « Parsifal » .

Après l'immense éclosion Symphonique des Ires années viennoises, et aussitôt avant le Quintette à cordes, Anton Bruckner produit une nouvelle série de ces petites pièces si caractéristiques, dont il emprunte les textes à un autre poète amateur avec qui il s'est lié d'amitié : le médecin militaire de Salzbourg Heinrich Wallmann (1827-1898) , qui écrit sous le pseudonyme de Heinrich von der Mattig.

The Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » (Festival Theatre) dedicated solely to the performance of Operas by the 19th Century German composer Richard Wagner. It is the venue for the annual Bayreuth Festival, for which it was specifically conceived and built. Its official name is « Richard-Wagner-Festspielhaus » .

Wagner adapted the design of the « Festspielhaus » from an unrealized project by Gottfried Semper for an Opera House in Munich, without the architect's permission, and supervised its construction. Ludwig II of Bavaria provided the primary funding for the construction. The foundation stone was laid on 22 May 1872, on Wagner's 59th birthday. The building was 1st opened for the premiere of the complete 4 Opera cycle of « Der Ring des Nibelungen » (The Ring of the Nibelung) , from 13 to 17 August 1876.

Only the entry façade exhibits the typical late- 19th Century ornamentation, while the remainder of the exterior is modest and shows mostly undecorated bricks. The interior is mainly wood and has a reverberation time of 1.55 seconds. The « Festspielhaus » is a carpenter's building ; in fact, it is the largest free standing timber structure ever erected. Unlike the traditional Opera House design with several tiers of seating in a horse-shoe shaped auditorium, the « Festspielhaus » 's seats are arranged in a single steeply-shaped wedge, with no galleries or boxes. This is also known as continental seating. Many contemporary movie theatres have adopted this style of seating, which gives every seat an equal and uninterrupted view of the stage. The capacity of the « Festspielhaus » is 1,925 and has a volume of 10,000 cubic metres.

The « Festspielhaus » features a double proscenium, which gives the audience the illusion that the stage is further away than it actually is. The double proscenium and the recessed Orchestra pit create (in Wagner's term) a « mystic gulf » between the audience and the stage. This gives a dream-like character to performances, and provides a physical re-inforcement of the mythic content of most of Wagner's Operas. The architecture of the « Festpielhaus » accomplished many of Wagner's goals and ideals for the performances of his Operas including an improvement on the sound, feel, and overall look of the production.

The « Festpielhaus » was originally planned to open in 1873 but, by that time, Wagner had barely raised enough money to put-up the walls of his theatre. He began to raise money by travelling and putting-on concerts in various cities and countries throughout Europe. Even after Ludwig began funding the project, Wagner had to continue putting on concerts to keep the building project financially afloat. The tours were very taxing on Wagner's health and would eventually be a key-element to his death later-on, in 1883.

A significant feature of the « Festspielhaus » is its unusual Orchestra pit. It is recessed under the stage and covered by a hood, so that the Orchestra is completely invisible to the audience. This feature was a central preoccupation for Wagner, since it made the audience concentrate on the drama on-stage, rather than the distracting motion of the conductor and musicians. The design also corrected the balance of volume between singers and Orchestra, creating ideal acoustics for Wagner's Operas, which are the only Operas performed at the « Festspielhaus ». However, this arrangement has also made it the most challenging to conduct in, even for the world's best conductors. Not only is the crowded pit enveloped in darkness, but the acoustic reverberation makes it difficult to synchronize the Orchestra with the singers. Conductors must, therefore, retrain themselves to ignore cues from singers.

The Orchestra layout deployed at Bayreuth is unusual in 3 ways :

The 1st violins are positioned on the right-hand side of the conductor instead of their usual place on the left side. This is in all likelihood because of the way the sound is intended to be directed towards the stage rather than directly on the audience. This way the sound has a more direct line from the 1st violins to the back of the stage where it can be then reflected to the audience.

The rest of the Orchestra is located directly under the stage. This makes communication with the conductor vital as most of the players are unable to see or hear the singers, but creates the huge, rich sounds Wagner sought to compose.

The « Festspielhaus » remains the venue of the annual Bayreuth Festival, during which Wagner's later Operas, such as the « Ring » cycle and « Parsifal », are given on a repertory basis.

Été ou automne de 1876 au 15 novembre 1877 : Bruckner quitte son logis, l'appartement n° 10 au 2e palier du n° 41 de la « Währingerstraße », dans le 9e arrondissement, pour aménager au dernier étage de la « Heinrichshof », sis au n° 3 de la « Opernring » dans le 1er arrondissement.

Septembre 1876 : The Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert persuades the conductor Benjamin Bilse to perform the 4th Symphony in Berlin. (Bruckner sends Bilse a score and a set of orchestral parts.)

The 18 year old Hans Rott studies composition at the Vienna Conservatory with Franz Krenn during the 1876 school year and the next. He is, thus, a classmate of Gustav Mahler, and they become good friends. (Donald Mitchell, 1995 ; page 296.)

15 septembre 1876 : Bruno Walter Schlesinger is born in a Berlin slum, to Jewish parents. (He will later drop his last name and be known as Bruno Walter) .

The 12 year old Richard Strauß writes his 1st orchestral piece, a « Festmarsch » (Festival March) in E-flat. It will be published 5 years later (1881) with financial help from an uncle as : Strauß's Opus 1.

19 septembre 1876 : Letter from Anton Bruckner to the Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert informing him that the copying of the 1874 version of the 4th Symphony has just now been completed.

1er octobre 1876 : Anton Bruckner sends a copy of the score of the 1874 version of the 4th Symphony to the Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert, in the hope that Benjamin Bilse and his Orchestra will perform it.

12 octobre 1876 : Anton Bruckner writes to the Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert, declaring his intention to thoroughly revise the 4th Symphony before any performance. He engages Tappert's efforts to recover the score and parts from Bilse (without success) .

Letter from Bruckner to Wilhelm Tappert, in Berlin :

« I have become entirely convinced that my 4th Symphony urgently needs fundamental re-working. There are, for example, in the Adagio overly difficult, unplayable violin figures and, here and there, the instrumentation is too ornate and too unsettled. »

(« Ich bin zur vollen Überzeugung gelangt, daß meine 4. romantische Sinfonie einer gründlichen Umarbeitung dringen bedarf. Es sind zum Beispiel im Adagio zu schwierige, unspielbare Violinfiguren, die Instrumentation hie und da zu überladen und zu unruhig. »)

4 novembre 1876 : After 20 years of work, the 43 year old Johannes Brahms finally completes and premieres his 1st Symphony. It is conducted by the composer's friend, Felix Otto Dessoff, in Karlsruhe, then, in the Grand Duchy of Baden.

Upholders of the Classical tradition immediately proclaim it as the « 10th » , a not-very-subtle reference to its worthiness as a successor to Beethoven's great 9th Symphony.

Thanks mainly to the Viennese critic Eduard Hanslick, who is a good friend of Brahms, the musical game of the day is to declare yourself either a Brahmsian or a Wagnerian, the 2 factions supposedly being exact opposites in terms of style, technique, and philosophy. Brahms repeatedly claims to be « the best of the Wagnerites » : the composer of the « New German School » whose work he really criticizes is Franz Liszt.

Despite a life-long admiration of Richard Wagner, Gustav Mahler's later friendship with Johannes Brahms will balance his artistic views quite a bit. Alexander von Zemlinsky, after his successful efforts at combining his admiration of these 2 composers in his own work and, then, Arnold Schönberg (who both begin as Brahmsians and, later, come to admire Wagner) will be the 1st to fully reconcile this dilemma.

Eduard Hanslick writes a long article praising the 10 year old Ferruccio Busoni's talents as a pianist and composer. The Busoni family moves to Graz, Austria.

6 décembre 1876 : Letter from Anton Bruckner to the Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert, requesting some minor changes in the Andante of the 1874 version of the 4th Symphony.

WAB 74

31 décembre 1876 : WAB 74 - « Das hohe Lied » (le Cantique des cantiques) 1re version, lied (84 mesures) en la majeur pour 2 ténors, 1 baryton, 1 chœur masculin à 8 voix (2 chœurs à 4 voix) a cappella. Composé à Vienne sur le texte allemand « Im Tale rauscht die Mühle und stört des Wand'ers Lied » (le bruit du moulin perturbe la chant du voyageur errant dans la vallée) de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) . Le chœur d'hommes imite, à bouche fermée, le bruissement des eaux du moulin.

Exécution d'un extrait, le 10 décembre 1879, à Vienne. Exécution intégrale, le 13 mars 1906, à Vienne.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXIII/2, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Angela Pachovsky - Anton Reinhaller, Vienne (2001) ; « Weltliche Chorwerke » , pages 109-116.

C'est en raison des difficultés vocales que contient la partition que Bruckner écrira vers 1879 une 2e version accompagnée d'un effectif instrumental.

Im Tale rauscht die Mühle und stört des Wandrers Lied,
Bis er durch Waldesdunkel hinauf die Berge flieht.
Und immer ferner rauschet die Mühle tief im Tal.
Und immer kräft'ger schallet des Liedes Widerhall.
Die Höhe ist erklommen, jetzt ist das Lied allein
Und schwimmt auf luft'gen Wellen ins Abendrot hinein.

Just after Christmas, Johannes Brahms did something that implied he might be settling-down in life. He took his 1st apartment in Vienna : 2 rooms on the 4th floor (considered 3rd floor in Austria) at No. 4 « Karlsgasse » . While that represented a step up from the hotels he had inhabited for years in the city, it hardly seemed a suitable place for someone like himself. It was a plain stone building like any number of others in Vienna, next to the looming Baroque dome of the « Karlskirche » . The big windows of the living-room looked past the church to the plaza and little « Resselpark » , and the River « Wien » . Just beyond the river, lay the « Musikverein » , home of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » . A short stroll over the Elizabeth Bridge brought him to the horse-drawn street-cars of the « Ringstraße » ; a 10 minute walk at the brisk Brahms-pace took him past the « Hofoper » to the « Kärntnerstraße » and then the middle of town, or with a turn east, to the trees and « cafés » of the « Stadtpark » . Beyond the plaza of Saint-Stephen's Cathedral, the woods and amusements of the « Prater » spread north of the city, below the Danube.

A practical apartment, then, actually in sight of his place of employment, but, when all was said and done, hardly adequate for a famous artist. The painter Hans Makart, whose neo-Rococo kitsch was now the rage of the city, had a house decked-out like a Turkish harem, a riot of palms, peacocks, and wall-hangings, dripping with « objets d'art » . That, or as close as means allowed, was the way famous artists and their « nouveaux riches » admirers lived in Vienna (Richard Wagner was a great admirer of Makart and his lifestyle) . Max Kalbeck wrote that Brahms' place looked like the apartment of a student, a minor civil servant, a salesman just starting in trade. One entered the building on « Karlsgasse » through a plain-door from the street, crossed a vestibule past French windows opening to the garden, and ascended winding stone stairs. At apartment No. 8, there was an old-fashioned iron bell-pull that jangled loudly in Brahms' living-room. Landlady « Frau » Vogl would open the door on a narrow hall leading past her kitchen, and visitors entered the apartment through Brahms' bedroom.

In 1877, Brahms rented a 3rd attached room but, for the 1st years, he had only the bedroom and living-room, both small and plain though sunny, the larger holding his piano and stacks of books and music. (Most of his library stayed in Hamburg until he got the 3rd room.) There was no bath. The furniture, scanty and shabby, was provided by « Frau » Vogl, and later (and somewhat less shabbily) by her successor, « Frau » Truxa. His landladies took care of his mending and house-keeping.

1877 : Anton Bruckner decides to revise the 4th Symphony when conductor Benjamin Bilse is preparing a performance in Berlin. Consequently, the composer instructs Bilse to return the score and the orchestral parts. Bruckner decides to make the 3rd version of the 3rd Symphony against the young Gustav Mahler's counsel.

12 janvier 1877 : Bruckner demande, sans succès, au ministère de la Culture un salaire fixe comme enseignant à l'Université.

5 mars 1877 : Vienna premiere of Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » .

1877 : Richard Wagner s'attèle à son dernier Opéra, « Parsifal » . La composition lui en prit 4 ans, durant lesquels il écrivit également une série d'essais réactionnaires sur la religion et l'art. Il mit la dernière main à « Parsifal » en janvier 1882, et le fit représenter lors du second Festival de Bayreuth. Pendant l'Acte 3 de la 16e et dernière représentation, le 29 août, le chef Hermann Levi fut victime d'une indisposition. Wagner entra discrètement dans la fosse d'orchestre, prit la baguette et dirigea l'œuvre jusqu'à son terme.

Mars 1877 : The 17 year old Hugo Wolf is dismissed from the Vienna Conservatory for breaking the rules. He also visits a brothel and contracts syphilis, which will ultimately lead to his insanity decades later.

22 mars 1877 : Anton Bruckner postule comme organiste à l'église de l'ancien monastère jésuite « Am Hof » (« Kirche am Hof ») . Mais cette demande sera rejetée.

L'église se trouve à 2 pas du « Restauration Zur Goldenen Kugel » (Restaurant « Au Ballon d'Or ») : le restaurant préféré d'Anton Bruckner à Vienne, situé au 11 de la « Platz Am Hof » . En 1882, on démolit le vieil édifice pour faire place à un tout nouveau (le « Türkenkugel Haus ») . Fort heureusement, le fameux restaurant, situé au rez-de-chaussée, va survivre à cette mutation. Le compositeur y déguste sa bière favorite, la « Pilsner » , et son plat favori : le rôti de porc accompagné de choucroute.

Voici la lettre de présentation de Bruckner :

Vienne, (1) le 22 / 3 (mars) 1877.

Monsieur,

Très honoré par votre aimable requête, je me permets de vous fournir quelques notices sur ma modeste personne. (2)

Anton Bruckner, organiste de la Cour royale et impériale, (3) lecteur à l'Université royale et impériale (4) , professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne. (5)

Né en 1824 à Ansfelden, en Haute-Autriche. De 1855 à 1861, j'ai étudié la théorie musicale, en particulier le contrepoint, chez Sechter (6) à Vienne. Puis, jusqu'en 1863, la composition chez Kitzler (7) (originaire de Leipzig) à Linz.

Jusqu'en 1855, (8) organiste de la collégiale de Saint-Florian, (9) puis, de là jusqu'en 1868, organiste de la cathédrale de Linz (10) . Et depuis octobre 1868 (après le décès de Sechter) , j'exerce mes fonctions actuelles auxquelles j'ai été nommé.

En 1869, j'ai été invité à un concours d'orgue à Nancy (11) et j'y ai donné des récitals pendant 2 jours. Par suite du succès prodigieux, j'ai dû me rendre de là à Paris (12) où, devant les plus grands Maîtres, (13) j'ai improvisé sur un thème donné, notamment à Notre-Dame. Le succès et aussi la critique furent tels que, de toute ma vie, je n'oublierai jamais les marques d'honneur qui me furent prodiguées. En 1871, je fus choisi pour participer aux récitals d'orgue organisés à l'Albert Hall de Londres où je me produisis 6 fois avec un succès extraordinaire. Après quoi, j'ai encore donné 5 récitals au Crystal Palace, toujours avec le même succès. (14) Les journaux anglais du 1er septembre 1871, par exemple le « Morning Advertiser », le « Daily News », etc, commentent mon jeu, notamment les improvisations, de la manière la plus élogieuse.

En matière de composition, j'ai écrit 3 grandes Messes (15) et 5 Symphonies, (16) outre de nombreuses œuvres moins ambitieuses. (17)

La 3e Symphonie en ré mineur est dédiée à Richard Wagner (18) qui m'a honoré de son appréciation la plus flatteuse. (De même, Liszt, (19) Herbeck, (20) Hellmesberger, (21) etc. et le public pour ce qui est de la Symphonie en ré mineur (n° 2), laquelle a été exécutée 2 fois à Vienne. (22) (Malheureusement, des conditions et des circonstances fâcheuses ont inspiré à la critique, du moins à une partie de celle-ci, des commentaires plus défavorables à mon égard.) (Hans Richter (23) s'enthousiasme à présent pour ma 3e Symphonie et il fera l'impossible pour l'exécuter l'année prochaine.) (24)

Respectueusement, Anton Bruckner.

Annotations

(1) C'est en octobre 1868, à l'âge de 44 ans, que le compositeur et organiste autrichien Anton Bruckner (Ansfelden, près de Linz, 4.09.1824 ; Vienne, 11.10.1896) s'est fixé à Vienne où il vient d'être nommé professeur au Conservatoire (note 4) . Il y restera jusqu'à la fin de sa vie. Au cours de la 1re moitié de l'année 1877, Bruckner est occupé à remanier ses 3e et 5e Symphonies.

(2) Cette lettre constitue un véritable « curriculum vitæ » et doit sans doute être mise en parallèle avec une lettre semblable datée du 7 janvier 1877 adressée au gouvernement du « Land » de Basse-Autriche : Bruckner y expose les grandes étapes de sa carrière musicale au moment où il pose sa candidature au poste de chef d'orchestre de la Cour. Bruckner cherche à améliorer sa situation financière.

(3) En 1869, Bruckner a obtenu le poste d'organiste de la Cour impériale et royale de Vienne dirigée par Herbeck depuis 1886.

(4) Depuis le mois de novembre 1875, Bruckner enseigne l'harmonie et le contrepoint à l'Université de Vienne. Cet enseignement se donne à l'époque à titre gracieux et ce n'est qu'en 1877 qu'un salaire lui est attribué.

(5) Par un décret daté du 6 juillet 1868, Bruckner est nommé professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne. Il entre en fonctions le 1er octobre comme professeur de basse continue et de contrepoint, succédant ainsi à Simon Sechter (1788-1867). De plus, il est également le 1er titulaire de la classe d'orgue nouvellement créée.

(6) Alors qu'il était en poste à Linz, Bruckner, âgé de 31 ans déjà, s'était rendu à Vienne en juillet 1855 pour demander à Simon Sechter, professeur de contrepoint et de basse continue au Conservatoire depuis 1851, de lui donner des leçons privées. À la lecture de la « Missa solemnis » composée par Bruckner à Saint-Florian en 1854, Sechter fut impressionné et accepta. Pendant 6 ans, Bruckner suivit ses cours par correspondance, se rendant une fois par année auprès du Maître pour un examen de contrôle. En 1861, ses études seront reconnues par un diplôme délivré par le Conservatoire de Vienne.

(8) Le 1er chiffre « 5 » est souligné ; vraisemblablement par une autre main qui a ajouté dans la marge : « 6 ? ». Cet ajout, datant de la fin du XIXe ou du début du XXe siècle, est dû au fait que Bruckner expose les différentes étapes de sa carrière professionnelle, non dans un ordre chronologique mais selon l'importance des différents postes occupés, ce qui suscite chez le lecteur un doute quant à la succession des événements.

(9) C'est en 1848 que Bruckner avait obtenu le poste d'organiste provisoire à Saint-Florian, en Haute-Autriche. 3 ans plus tard, il en reçoit le titre officiel qu'il conserve jusqu'en 1855. Ce 1er poste d'organiste constitue pour Bruckner une véritable reconnaissance de son talent musical alors que, jusque-là, il avait été instituteur.

(10) Quittant Saint-Florian, Bruckner s'installe à Linz en décembre 1855 où il a obtenu, sur concours, le poste d'organiste de la cathédrale qu'il occupera pendant 13 ans. Pendant ce séjour à Linz, Bruckner a connu la période la plus active de sa vie : tout en exerçant ses fonctions officielles d'organiste, Bruckner perfectionne sa technique d'organiste, suit les cours par correspondance de Sechter, donne également des leçons de piano et participe comme choriste, puis comme « Kapellmeister » du Liedertafel (orphéon ou société chorale) de la ville.

(11) C'est en tant que représentant autrichien que Bruckner a été invité à participer, à la fin du mois d'avril 1869, à un concours d'orgue à Nancy à l'occasion de l'inauguration du nouvel orgue de la Basilique de Saint-Epvre. Celui-ci provient des ateliers parisiens de la Maison « Merklin et Schütze », firme qui avait obtenu une Médaille d'or à l'Exposition universelle de 1867, à Paris. Les 28 et 29 avril à Nancy, Bruckner donne 2 concerts où son talent d'improvisateur est grandement apprécié. Le « Journal de la Meurthe et des Vosges » du 1er mai 1869 estime que le compositeur autrichien est un des organistes les plus doués de sa génération.

(12) À la suite à son succès à Nancy, Bruckner fut invité par la firme « Merklin et Schütze » à se rendre à Paris pour y donner un concert dans ses établissements du boulevard Montparnasse. Bruckner eut également l'occasion d'improviser sur le nouvel orgue de Notre-Dame construit par le facteur Cavallé-Coll, en présence des compositeurs César Franck, Camille Saint-Saëns, Charles Gounod, Ambroise Thomas et Daniel François Esprit Auber.

(13) Note du traducteur : on lit « von » dans l'original, mais sans doute faut-il lire « vor » .

(14) C'est en août 1871 que se confirme à Londres la réputation européenne de Bruckner en tant que virtuose et improvisateur de grand talent sur l'orgue. D'une part, il y eut le concours d'orgue organisé au Royal Albert Hall de Londres dans le cadre de l'Exposition universelle. D'autre part, Bruckner fut invité à donner une série de récitals sur l'orgue du Crystal Palace : ses improvisations sur le « God save the King » ainsi que ses larges développements sur des thèmes de Jean-Sébastien Bach, Georg Friedrich Händel et Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy suscitèrent l'enthousiasme du public et des spécialistes.

(15) Bruckner ne cite ici que ses 3 dernières Messes : soit la Messe en ré mineur n° 1, la Messe en mi mineur n° 2 et la Messe en fa mineur n° 3. Toutes 3 composées à Linz entre 1864 et 1867. Les 2 Ires ont été exécutées respectivement en 1864 et 1869 tandis que la 3e a été créée à Vienne en 1872. Or, en 1877, 4 autres Messes, 1 « Missa solemnis », 3 « Requiem » et 1 « Magnificat » figurent déjà parmi les œuvres sacrées de Bruckner.

(16) Ici aussi, Bruckner ne veut mentionner que ses 5 dernières Symphonies (les numéros 1 à 5) alors qu'avant celle qui porte le n° 1, il en a composé 2 autres. Après 1879, Bruckner composera encore 4 autres Symphonies.

(17) Le catalogue des œuvres de Bruckner comprend également de nombreuses œuvres sacrées, des œuvres chorales, de la musique de chambre et des pièces pour orgue seul et piano seul.

(18) La Ire version de la Symphonie n° 3 en ré mineur fut achevée à Vienne en décembre 1873, mais elle n'y sera exécutée pour la Ire fois (dans sa 2e version) que le 16 décembre 1877. Sous la baguette du compositeur, cette Ire exécution sera catastrophique, notamment à cause de l'opposition de certains musiciens de l'Orchestre philharmonique. C'est en septembre 1873 que Bruckner rend visite à Richard Wagner à Bayreuth pour lui montrer ses Symphonies nos. 2 et 3. Impressionné par la Symphonie n° 3, Wagner en accepta la dédicace. C'est la raison pour laquelle cette Symphonie porte le nom de « Wagner-Sinfonie ». Dans le monde musical de Vienne de l'époque, cette Symphonie opposa davantage encore les partisans de Wagner à ceux de Brahms. On surnomma d'ailleurs Bruckner : « le Wagner des Symphonies » .

(19) Bruckner dédiera plus tard à Franz Liszt sa Symphonie n° 2 en do mineur.

(20) Maître de la chapelle musicale de la Cour impériale de Vienne, le compositeur et chef d'orchestre Johann Herbeck (1831-1877) est une personnalité imposante de la vie musicale viennoise après 1850. Professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne depuis 1858, il dirige aussi la chorale et les concerts de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ». De 1870 à 1875, il fut aussi co-directeur de l'Opéra. C'est grâce à Herbeck que Bruckner a obtenu ses postes au Conservatoire et à la chapelle musicale. En 1869, Herbeck était également intervenu pour que Bruckner obtienne une bourse du Gouvernement lui permettant de se consacrer à la composition. Bruckner sera fortement affecté par la mort de Herbeck, survenue prématurément le 28 octobre 1877.

(21) Le violoniste et chef d'orchestre Josef Hellmesberger (1828-1893) est le directeur du Conservatoire de Vienne et le « Konzertmeister » à l'Opéra. En 1849, il a fondé un Quatuor à cordes qui porte son nom et qui est considéré comme le plus important de Vienne à l'époque. Il fait entendre non seulement des œuvres Classiques de Ludwig van Beethoven et de Franz Schubert mais aussi des œuvres contemporaines de Johannes Brahms et d'Anton Bruckner.

(22) La 2e Symphonie en do mineur, composée à Vienne entre octobre 1871 et juillet 1872, fut créée à Vienne le 26 octobre 1873 sous la baguette du compositeur. Une 2e exécution pour laquelle Bruckner, à la demande de Johann Herbeck, effectua plusieurs modifications, eut lieu le 20 février 1876.

(23) Pour Hans Richter : voir la note n° 1 de la lettre n° 244. Depuis 1875, Hans Richter est le nouveau chef d'orchestre de l'Opéra de la cour de Vienne. En même temps, il prend la direction des concerts du Philharmonique.

(24) Ce n'est pas Hans Richter, mais bien plutôt Bruckner lui-même qui dirigera la création de la Symphonie n° 3 (se référer à la note n° 18) . En revanche, Richter sera au pupitre lors de la création de la Symphonie n° 4, le 20 février 1881 ; du « Te Deum » , le 10 janvier 1886 ; et de la Symphonie n° 8, le 18 décembre 1892.

« Kirche am Hof »

La chapelle de la « Hofburg » (« Schweizerhof » ,Vienne 1010) se trouve dans la partie la plus ancienne du palais Impérial de Vienne. Elle fut mentionnée pour la 1re fois en 1296. L'édifice Gothique d'origine subit d'importantes transformations au cours des siècles suivants. La chapelle de la « Hofburg » correspond encore à l'idéal de la Cour, tant sur le plan de l'architecture qu'en ce qui concerne les sculptures.

Le côté sud-est du monastère des Jésuites possède une ancienne façade Gothique qui fut réaménagée dans le style Baroque suite à un incendie. La nef Gothique extrêmement large est bordée de colonnes blanches surmontées de dorure. En 1806, un héraut du Roi annonça dans cette église la fin du Saint-Empire Romain qui fut sous le règne des Habsbourgs pendant environ 500 ans. La « Mariensäule » (colonne de la Vierge Marie) située au centre de la place publique date de 1667.

L'intérieur de la chapelle est décoré de sculptures de grande valeur. La clef finement travaillée des voûtes présente des sculptures du Christ qui bénit, de la Vierge à l'enfant, de l'évangéliste Saint-Jean et de l'ange Gabriel. La salle est entourée de colonnes à baldaquins comportant des sculptures de Saints en bois colorés aux vêtements fortement plissés du XVIe siècle. La statue de la Vierge, placée au-dessus de l'autel latéral de gauche, correspond au type de la « belle Madone ». Le tableau de l'autel latéral de droite, représentant les noces de Sainte-Catherine et l'Enfant-Jésus, fut réalisé au XIXe siècle par Hubert Maurer, professeur à l'Académie. L'intérieur de la chapelle de la « Hofburg » est fortement marqué par les galeries et oratoires rajoutés à partir du XVIe siècle.

En dépit de son caractère éphémère, la chapelle de la Cour Impériale des Habsbourg à Vienne était un ensemble très renommé avec un retentissement bien au-delà de son existence. Créée en 1498 par l'Empereur Maximilien Ier, elle compte parmi ses membres les plus grands musiciens de l'époque : Heinrich Isaac et Ludwig Senfl comme Maître de chapelle et l'organiste Paul Hofhaimer. Or, en 1520, l'année suivant la mort de Maximilien, son successeur Charles Quint dissout la chapelle. Ludwig Senfl, son directeur congédié, entre au service du duc de Bavière et crée à Munich une chapelle selon le modèle Impérial à Vienne. Senfl, tout en restant flou concernant ses convictions religieuses, se lie d'amitié avec Martin Luther pour qui il compose un motet. Son successeur, Ludwig Daser, doit quitter son poste après sa conversion au protestantisme, et le duc Albrecht V nomme, en 1563, Roland de Lassus à la tête de la chapelle, inaugurant ainsi la période la plus prestigieuse de la chapelle.

Cette institution, d'abord à Vienne puis à Munich, reflète parfaitement les profondes mutations qui se sont opérées pendant le XVIe siècle en Allemagne : la montée de la puissance de l'Empire germanique et la Réforme protestante.

Anton Bruckner a toujours gardé un lien privilégié avec le monastère de Kremsmünster. Lors de la célébration commémorant le 1,100e anniversaire de l'institution, le 18 août 1877, le compositeur se fera un devoir d'être présent. Il renouera également avec son ami de longue date, le père Raffael « Oddo » Loidol. Bruckner a souvent touché l'orgue « Matthäus Mauracher » de 1878 (sa facture Baroque datait de 1680) , soit dans un contexte de culte ou soit dans un contexte de récital. En 1883, il passera une bonne partie de l'année comme invité spécial du monastère.

Avec près de 10,000 titres, les archives musicales de la bibliothèque de Kremsmünster représentent l'une des institutions les plus riches et les plus importantes du genre. Elle détient quelques manuscrits précieux de Bruckner. Entre autres, la Ire version du « Te Deum » (WAB 45) en plus d'esquisses d'œuvres du début comme la cantate patriotique « Germanenzug » (WAB 70) , l'Ouverture en sol mineur (WAB 98) et la « Symphonie d'étude » (« 00 ») (WAB 99) .

Septembre 1877 : The 55 year old Joachim Raff becomes a teacher and administrator at the Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt-am-Main, Germany.

Septembre 1877 : The 17 year old Gustav Mahler enters the University of Vienna. He drops his piano studies, to concentrate on composition. Near the end of the year, with his friend Rudolf Krzyzanowski's help, he makes a piano-duet arrangement of Anton Bruckner's 3rd Symphony. It is the 1st of many of Mahler's work to be published and, also, the 1st work by Bruckner to appear in print.

During Gustav Mahler's attendance at the University of Vienna, Josef Petzval is teaching his students about « 31edo » and « mean-tone » , and demonstrating instruments he has had constructed in those tunings. Decades later, Mahler's remarks to Arnold Schönberg indicate that he was familiar enough with « mean-tone » to complain about its replacement with « 12edo » .

It is possible that even as late as the early 20th Century, great composers like Gustav Mahler, who studied a 31-note equal temperament advocated by Josef Petzval at the University of Vienna, and who later remarked to Arnold Schönberg that, « European music, in giving-up “ Mean-tone ” tuning, has suffered a great loss » , may have preferred unequal temperaments for performances of their music.

At the end of the 19th Century, with only a few exceptions, Europe, and places colonized by European countries, were the only cultural areas whose music was characterized by the use of harmony. A clearly-defined system had been established whereby one particular note was felt to be the central, primary note over all the others, and a piece would be said to be « in the key of » that note. This type of music is referred to as « tonal » .

After several Centuries (1500-1900) of this, a few bold composers began writing music which did not give a single note primacy. The 2 earliest significant examples were Charles Ives, in America (notably, his « Unanswered Question » , composed originally in 1906) ; and Arnold Schönberg, in Vienna (Schönberg and Ives were born within about a month of each other) .

The 1st truly atonal pieces were Schönberg's 2nd Quartet 4th movement, 3 Piano Pieces, and song-cycle « Book of the Hanging Gardens » , all written in 1908. Ives's work could really be characterized more as « polytonal » , while Schönberg preferred the term « pan-tonal » for the pieces he composed which disregarded traditional ideas about tonality.

It was Schönberg's belated but extreme admiration for Gustav Mahler's work and ideals, not to mention Mahler's selfless support, that encouraged Schönberg to be true to himself, stick to his radical inspirations, and not be swayed by criticism ; he also learned from Mahler the importance of a polyphonic mode of composition, something that stayed with Schönberg the rest of his life.

Apparently, Schönberg's student Anton Webern was the one who really stimulated Schönberg into giving full rein to his most progressive tendencies and into finally abandoning traditional concepts of tonality. The pivotal period, when all this really began to emerge, was the summer of 1905.

Here is a detailed chronology, centered mainly around Mahler's life, with several decades of background sketched in, and the years after World War I as an epilog. The « Century » in the title refers roughly to the period 1803-1908 (Beethoven's « Eroica » to Schönberg's 1st atonal pieces) , and the entire period covered in detail, from the French Revolution to World War I, corresponds surprisingly closely to the « long 19th Century » defined by historian Eric Hobsbawm. Most of the events take place during the reigns of Napoléon and the Habsburg Emperors. This work is not strictly limited to descriptions of musical life in Vienna - because of the important role it played in the arts during the Romantic period, I inevitably had to include many of the events that occurred in Paris. In particular, Franz Liszt had little association with Vienna but was too important to leave-out.

Micro-tonality anecdotes :

The likelihood that Gustav Mahler intended « Mean-tone » tuning to be used for his Symphonies, at least partly, based on the possibility of his familiarity with the teachings of Josef Petzval on « 31-edo » during Mahler's stay at the University of Vienna, and on his later remarks to Schönberg lamenting that :

« European music, in giving-up “ Mean-tone ” tuning, had suffered a great loss. »

Mahler's possible re-use of material from his abandoned Opera project, « Rübzahl », in his Symphonic Poem (1st Symphony), and the likelihood that his original conception of the piece was as a 4 movement work without the « Blumine » movement, and that adding « Blumine » was an afterthought over which he changed his mind back and forth several times.

The influence the success of Richard Strauß's early Symphony in F minor had on Mahler just before the latter completed his Symphonic Poem (1st Symphony).

The possibility that what later became the base layer of Mahler's 1893 « Hamburg » manuscript of « Titan » (1st Symphony), was originally written-out in 1891 as a « Stichvorlage » (Engraver's Model) of what he was still calling a Symphonic Poem, now with the title « From the Life of a Lonely One », in hopes of getting it published by Schott, and that, in this form, it was again a 4 movement work that did not include the « Blumine » movement.

The influence Johannes Brahms had on Mahler at several various times as their personal friendship deepened. This relates to some of Mahler's important early compositional decisions (concerning Mahler's 1st and 2nd Symphonies) as well as his habit of secluding himself in the country during the summer to compose.

The influence Shohei Tanaka's pseudo-just-intonation (really 53-edo) « Enharmonium » may have had on Bruckner's harmonic experiments in his 9th Symphony.

The possibility that Viennese music-critic Eduard Hanslick's death, in August 1904, may have been the catalyst for Mahler to end his 6th Symphony as a tragedy - the only one of his Symphonies which does so.

The « program » of Mahler's 7th, influenced by Mahler's fascination with the program of Richard Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica ».

The influence Arnold Schönberg had on Gustav Mahler before the latter composed the 3rd, 5th, and 1st movements (in that order) of his 7th Symphony during the summer of 1905, and the influence this Mahler piece, in turn, had on Schönberg when he wrote his « Kammer-symphonie » the following spring and summer.

The influence Anton Webern had on Arnold Schönberg, in the fall of 1905, when the latter was composing his 1st Quartet and Webern brought his single-movement String Quartet to Schönberg for his composition lessons.

The possibility that Mahler's comment about « being too old to have the ears for Schönberg's music » and the argument that the 2 of them had about « klangfarbenmelodie », were connected to Mahler's possible loss of high-frequency hearing from his listening to large Orchestras, every day.

The possibility that the opening of « Das Lied von der Erde » was Mahler's rendering in music of the horrible wheezing he heard as his 5 year old daughter Maria lay dying after her tracheotomy (as documented in Alma's book).

The possible influence Scott Joplin may have had on Gustav Mahler while they both lived in New York from 1907 to 1911 (reflected in a motive and harmonic progression very typical of a Joplin rag-time near the end of Mahler's 10th Symphony and, possibly also, in the irregular meters of the 2nd movement of the same Symphony) .

The possibility that the sonic inspiration for the dissonant 9 note chord at the climax of the 1st and last movements of Mahler's 10th Symphony may have been the sound of the Orchestra tuning-up before a performance, because of the long-held « A » and the seemingly random dissonance of the chords, and because of the way the chord 1st builds-up in sections, then, after another held « A » , the whole Orchestra plays the dissonance.

The possibility that Arnold Schönberg knew of Mahler's association since childhood of the popular Viennese tune « Ach, du lieber Augustin » with tragedy, because of Schönberg's use of this tune in his 2nd Quartet.

The experimentation with micro-tones by Schönberg and Webern, in 1909, leading to the development of « sprechstimme » (speech-voice) , the following year.

The influence of Willi von Möllendorf on Aloïs Hába and Ivan Wycshnegradsky to adopt the use of quarter-tones.

15 septembre 1877 : « The Feast of the 7 Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin » is an occasion that traditionally centred on the famous Franz Xaver Chrismann organ. Bruckner takes part in a performance of a Mass composed by Moritz Brosig.

That Bruckner is staying in Steyr « yet again » , as the report in the paper puts it, is incontrovertible evidence of past visits. At that time, he was already a highly-welcome visitor with a great number of acquaintances among the convivial circles of the various musical Societies.

27 septembre 1877 : Le Philharmonique de Vienne joue pour Bruckner quelques extraits de la nouvelle mouture de la 3e Symphonie ; la séance permettra au compositeur d'apporter d'autres modifications.

1er octobre 1877 : Gustav Mahler (aged 17) begins his studies at the University of Vienna. He attends the harmony lectures of professor Anton Bruckner (aged 53) .

Octobre 1877 : L'architecte autrichien docteur Anton von Ölzelt (1817-1875) , qui fut un auditeur attentif aux conférences de Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne, assiste à un concert du compositeur donné au monastère de Klosterneuburg. Il fut tellement impressionné par sa musique, qu'il lui offre gratuitement un appartement au 4e étage du « Wohnhaus » , sis au 7 « Heßgasse » et 5 « Schottenring » (aujourd'hui appelé : l'Hôtel de France) . Ainsi, le Maître de Saint-Florian pourra enfin quitter l'appartement exigu du « Heinrichshof » (sis au 1-5 « Opernring » sur la « Ringstraße ») . Il va demeurer au « Wohnhaus » jusqu'à la fin de l'été 1895. Durant cette période, il composa la plupart de ses œuvres les plus célèbres.

Cet immense édifice, construit en 1872, est une co-réalisation des architectes Franz Fröhlich et Anton von Ölzelt lui-même.

Ainsi donc, le 15 novembre 1877, Bruckner quittera volontiers le « Heinrichhof » .

12 octobre 1877 : Letter of Bruckner to Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert :

« I have become entirely convinced that my 4th Symphony urgently needs fundamental re-working. There are, for example, in the Adagio overly difficult, unplayable violin figures and, here and there, the instrumentation is too ornate and too unsettled. »

19 octobre 1877 : WAB 81 - « Nachruf » (nécrologie) , cantate funèbre (51 mesures) en do mineur pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) et orgue. Composée sur le texte allemand « Vereint bist, Töneheld und Meister, mit jener hehren Schar der Geister » de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) . Écrite à la mort du fidèle ami linzois, Josef (Eduard) Seiberl né en 1836, organiste, chanteur et « Kapellmeister » à l'église Sainte-Marie de Polsenz (Sankt Marienkirchen an der Polsenz) . Entre 1843 et 1847, Seiberl sera assistant professeur à Hörsching. Il fut souvent témoin des conversations entre le jeune Anton Bruckner et son cousin, le compositeur Johann Baptist (von) Weiß. Seiberl s'était alors lié d'amitié durant sa période de formation en tant qu'enseignant.

Création à l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian, le 28 octobre 1877, lors de la cérémonie commémorative (chantée par le Liedertafel « Frohsinn » de Linz) au disparu. « Nachruf » reçut, par la suite, un nouveau texte de l'écrivain, poète et journaliste August Seuffert, intitulé « Trösterin Musik » (WAB 88) .

19 octobre 1877 : WAB 88 - « Trösterin Musik » (musique consolatrice) , cantate profane en do mineur pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) et orgue. Composée à Vienne sur 2 versets de « Musik ! Du herrliches Gebilde, voll hoher Macht, voll süßer Milde » (musique ! admirable structure, pleine de puissance élévatrice, pleine de douceur apaisante) de l'écrivain, poète et journaliste August Seuffert (1844-1904) . Dédiée à son ami organiste décédé, Josef (Eduard) Seiberl, qui lui succéda comme titulaire de Saint-Florian. Création à Saint-Florian, le 28 octobre 1877. Création à Vienne, le 11 avril 1886.

Josef Seiberl meurt le 10 juin 1877 à Karlsbad (aujourd'hui, Karlovy Vary) ; il était, depuis le 1er janvier 1856, le successeur de Bruckner en tant qu'organiste à Saint-Florian. Le 28 octobre 1877, une plaque commémorative, en souvenir des morts de l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian, a été dévoilée. Pour la partie musicale de cette fête du souvenir, il y avait, au programme, une représentation du chœur d'hommes « Nachruf » (WAB 81) avec Bruckner au grand orgue. Bruckner avait décrit cette composition pour son ami décédé, le 19 octobre 1877. Le texte avait été rédigé par Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du Docteur Heinrich Wallmann, médecin militaire de Salzbourg) . La représentation fut réalisée par l'association des chœurs d'hommes le « Sängerbund » , dirigé par Max Brava. L'ami et collègue de Bruckner à Vienne, Rudolf Weinwurm, demanda à August Seuffert, rédacteur du « Wiener Zeitung » , de rédiger un nouveau texte sur la musique de Bruckner - un exemple supplémentaire de recyclage de la part du compositeur. Telle une musique consolatrice, la composition fut présentée pour la 1re fois, le 11 avril 1886, dans la salle du « Musikverein » de Vienne, par la « Wiener Akademischer Gesangverein » , sous la direction de Rudolf Weinwurm.

Ré-édition en 1886 du « Nachruf » (WAB 81) ; à l'initiative de Rudolf Weinwurm, August Seuffert composera un nouveau texte sur la même musique.

Musik, du himmlisches Gebilde !
Voll hoher Macht, voll süßer Milde,
Wir fühlen doppelt tief dein Walten
Wenn uns ein Leid das Herz gespalten.
Der Schmerzenswogen wirres Drängen,
Es glättet sich vor deinen Klängen,
Besänftigt all die Fluten ziehen
Ins weite Meer der Harmonien.
Wie Orgelton, wie Meereswogen
Kommt dann der Trost ins Herz gezogen
Und stillt der Seele wildes Sehnen
Und löst das Weh in milde Tränen.

Musik, du himmlisches Gebilde !
Voll hoher Macht, voll süßer Milde,
Du pochst noch in den tiefsten Schmerzen
Mit leisem Finger an die Herzen.
Und wenn die Seele, gramgebrochen,
Kein Wort mehr hört, das Trost gesprochen,
Wenn längst verstummt die stillen Klagen
Im Leid, das tränenlos getragen :
Dann fühlt das Herz in Orgeltönen
Ein hehres, himmlisches Versöhnen
Und findet in dem Klang der Lieder
Den letzten Trost, die Tränen wieder.

August Seuffert écrira également les paroles pour la valse « Myrthensträusse » ou « Myrthenblüthen » (Bourgeons de Myrtes) , Opus 395, et la Polka française « Burschenwanderung » (Promenade des compagnons) , Opus 389, du compositeur Johann Strauß.

28 octobre 1877 :

« Nachruf » (WAB 81) for male chorus and organ by Anton Bruckner, to words of Heinrich von der Mattig, is performed for the 1st time, for the unveiling of a memorial plaque at the monastery of Saint-Florian. For the occasion, the composer plays the church organ.

Anton Bruckner dirige pour la dernière fois le Liedertafel (orphéon) « Frohsinn » et le « Sängerbund » de Linz lors d'un concert commémoratif qui a lieu au monastère de Saint-Florian. Le même jour, son ami le chef d'orchestre Johann Herbeck meurt prématurément des suites d'une pneumonie.

Décès prématuré de Johann von Herbeck

28 octobre 1877 : Mort prématurée du chef d'orchestre Johann Herbeck à l'âge de 45 ans, 10 mois et 3 jours, des suites d'une pneumonie. Bruckner, son célèbre protégé, sera fortement secoué par ce tragique événement. Herbeck restera dans la mémoire des Viennois pour avoir été celui qui a donné la 1^{re} exécution de la Symphonie dite « Inachevée » de Franz Schubert, à la « Musikvereinsaal » , en 1865. Le chef donnera aussi, en 1^{re} audition à Vienne, les 3 1^{ers} mouvements du « Requiem allemand » de Johannes Brahms, le 1^{er} décembre 1867.

Johann Herbeck (1831-1877) s'était joint au « Wiener Männergesang-Verein » en 1852. Il en devint le chef en 1856. Il agira comme chef d'orchestre « honoraire » jusqu'à sa mort prématurée, le 28 octobre 1877. Il composa plus d'une centaine d'œuvres pour chœur d'hommes (tant « a cappella » qu'avec accompagnement) dont la plupart était basée sur la poésie lyrique allemande. La moitié de sa production pour chœur d'hommes seul (soit environ 36 Opus) témoigne de sa pleine Maîtrise dans une variété de styles et de formes, étalonnée sur 25 ans de carrière. Herbeck a écrit pour chœur à 4 parties (TTBB) , augmentée à l'occasion de voix solistes dans certaines pièces. Ses œuvres vont du folklore (utilisant la forme strophique et l'harmonie diatonique) jusqu'à l'expression dramatique à partir d'un texte (utilisant alors un chromatisme d'un seul souffle ou issu de strophes modifiées) .

Johann von Herbeck (1831-1877) fut un compositeur surdoué que la postérité ne retint guère. Il était pourtant au fait de la vie musicale de son époque : « Herbeck dirigea le 17 décembre 1865 la 1re exécution de l' « Inachevée » de Franz Schubert. Il intégra aussi les Messes de Schubert dans le répertoire de la chapelle de la Cour ; fit paraître, en 1865, la 1re édition intégrale des œuvres pour chœur de Schubert. Ami de Franz Liszt, Herbeck défendit Richard Wagner et Giuseppe Verdi à l'Opéra de la Cour ; soutint Karl Goldmark. C'est également par son entremise que l'organiste de la cathédrale de Linz, Anton Bruckner, obtint en 1868 les postes d'organiste à la Cour de Vienne. » . Auteur notamment d'une soixantaine de compositions pour chœur d'hommes, de chants chorals, de 7 Messes, de musique de scène et de 4 Symphonies, Johann von Herbeck mourut à l'âge de 45 ans à peine.

La musique inspirée de Herbeck est véritablement de belle facture. Elle puise aux sources de plusieurs influences, sans jamais se départir d'un style propre : « C'est justement dans son caractère de " tête de Janus " que réside notamment l'attrait de la 4e Symphonie, oubliée à tort. Il réside dans sa manière d'allier tradition et innovation, écriture Baroque, légèreté Mendelssohnienne et gravité Brucknérienne, et, non en dernier lieu, dans la combinaison de l'orchestre avec l'orgue que, du point de vue de l'année 1877, l'on ne peut qualifier autrement que d'audacieuse. » . Une véritable révélation !

L'œuvre en mi mineur pour chœur, orgue et orchestre (1 flûte, 1 hautbois, clarinettes, bassons en la, cors en mi et en si, timbales et cordes) est en 6 parties :

Kyrie (Sostenuto quasi Adagio - Poco più animato) .

Gloria (Allegro maestoso) .

Credo (Maestoso quasi Andante assai tenuto) .

Sanctus (Andante religioso) .

Benedictus (Andante un poco moto) .

Agnus Dei (Adagio ma non troppo) .

A rare chance to hear Herbeck's Great Mass at Bad Kissingen

(Ken Ward, 9 September 2014.)

Bad Kissingen is a very attractive spa town, still very active as a place of convalescence and cure. Like many such places, it affords a variety of opportunities for entertainment to enhance the life of the inmates of its many sanatoriums and, for the tourists, drawn to the beauty of the town and its surroundings. It boasts a splendidly beautiful concert-hall, the « Regentenbau » (Regency Building) , with a bright acoustic, the venue for concerts and Festivals throughout the year. This concert, part of the Ebrach Summer of Music, was packed-out, even though the main work was the nowadays almost totally unknown Great Mass in E minor by Johann Ritter von Herbeck.

The name of Herbeck is known to us, if at all, as the man who rediscovered and 1st performed Franz Schubert's « Unfinished Symphony » , and as a promoter of Anton Bruckner and his music, scheduled to conduct the 1st performance of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony - but, whilst rehearsing Beethoven's 9th a few weeks before, collapsed and died of pneumonia at the age of 46. Bruckner, then, found himself obliged to conduct his Symphony's premiere : one of the biggest disasters of his life. Herbeck had been a very active conductor and composer, bringing 1st performances of Richard Wagner and Giuseppe Verdi to Vienna, and composing choral works, Songs, String Quartets, Masses, Symphonies, stage-works and much else. His Great Mass in E minor was well-received at its 1st performance in 1866, regarded as the most significant such work since Schubert.

The work opens with unaccompanied basses intoning « Kyrie eleison », thereafter, the other voices join, and the music builds with gently moulded phrases in the choir and melancholy accompanying phrases from horn and woodwind. The whole section comes to a passionate climax before fading away to leave the impression of a beautifully shaped and proportioned movement. It is a striking beginning, and the Mass also has a very moving ending as the plea for peace (« Dona nobis pacem ») dies away beneath a breath-taking descending flute solo. The « Agnus Dei » had also built to a passionate climax fortissimo climax at « misere nobis » underpinned by a sudden drum roll - very dramatic, though not with the unsettling power of the military music that invades the « Agnus Dei » of Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » .

The movements between that haunting opening and the melancholy close were similarly well-crafted with many impressive moments : a strong fugue in the « Gloria, at Cum sancto spiritus », the parts and the machinations of which Gerd Schaller and his performers brought-out with remarkable clarity ; the succinct account of Christ's life in the « Credo », from « Et incarnatus est » to his crucifixion and burial, was wonderfully evocative, the soft words of the choir given special atmosphere by sustained notes on woodwind and horn. The Munich Philharmonic Choir had been magnificent throughout, each section strong and well-matched with the others. There are no soloists in this work, so it is for the choir to carry the full narrative of the Mass, and they provided choral singing of the highest-quality, for which much credit must go to Andreas Herrmann who was responsible for the choral rehearsals.

The performance was greeted with enthusiastic applause, and it was certainly very interesting to hear this work composed at the same time as Bruckner's 3 great Masses. There is something in Bruckner's compositions that speaks with a wilder, more passionate voice, always extending the emotional boundaries to the limits that the form will sustain ; Herbeck's Mass is somewhat more restrained, less modern, maybe a little too comfortable, but always well-crafted and beautiful to listen to. There is cause for much gratitude to Gerd Schaller and the Ebrach Summer of Music, and to Bavarian Radio, that they gave us the very rare chance to hear this work. It would be equally interesting to investigate other works by this now almost forgotten composer : especially, the Symphony No. 4 for orchestra and organ, and the « Symphonic Variations », given special mention in the programme notes.

Herbeck : « Orgelsymphonie »

Symphonie n° 4 (avec orgue) en ré mineur :

Praeludium. Andante con moto - Maestoso.

Andante

Scherzo. Allegro moderato - Grazioso - Quasi Allegretto.

Finale. Allegro maestoso - Molto moderato.

Johann von Herbeck partage le sort des nombreux musiciens qui ont marqué la vie musicale de leur époque, sans que leurs infatigables efforts leur eussent valu une place durable dans l'histoire de la musique. Pourtant, ce n'est pas seulement pour un certain intérêt historique que sa musique mérite d'être reconsidérée. Compositeur de bon aloi aux capacités techniques considérables, il se posait des problèmes d'écriture jusqu'alors irrésolus pour aboutir à des solutions originales.

Plus d'une fois, Johann von Herbeck a fait valoir son autorité dans la vie musicale de Vienne pour promouvoir les œuvres de compositeurs oubliés ou négligés à tort. Ayant reçu, en mai 1865, des mains d'Anselm Hüttenbrenner, camarade d'études de Franz Schubert, la partition de la Symphonie en si mineur, il dirigea le 17 décembre de la même année la 1^{re} exécution de l'« Inachevée ». Il intégra aussi les Messes de Schubert dans le répertoire de la Chapelle de la Cour, fit paraître, en 1865, la 1^{re} édition intégrale des chœurs de Schubert et contribua, en 1872, de manière décisive à l'édification du monument à Schubert.

Herbeck était un ami de Franz Liszt, il défendit Richard Wagner et Giuseppe Verdi à l'Opéra de la Cour, soutint Karl Goldmark, et ce fut par son entremise que l'organiste à la cathédrale de Linz, Anton Bruckner, obtint en 1868 les postes d'organiste à la Cour de Vienne et de professeur de théorie de l'harmonie, de contrepoint et d'orgue au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique. Il fut parmi les 1^{ers} à reconnaître l'importance colossale de la création symphonique de Bruckner et ne cessa pas, sa vie durant, de s'engager pour le compositeur Haut-Autrichien. En février 1867 déjà, Herbeck dirigea la 1^{re} audition viennoise de la Messe en ré mineur de Bruckner dans la Chapelle du Château de la cour (« Hofburgkapelle »), et, en 1876, il aida Bruckner à créer la 2^e version de sa 2^e Symphonie dans le cadre de la série de concerts renommée de la Société des Amis de la Musique. Le nom de Herbeck est lié pourtant d'une manière presque tragique à la 1^{re} audition de la 3^e Symphonie de Bruckner. L'œuvre ayant été refusée par les musiciens du Philharmonique, le 27 septembre 1877, Herbeck s'était spontanément déclaré prêt à diriger la Symphonie dans le cadre des concerts de la Société. La date fixée pour la 1^{re} exécution était le 16 décembre 1877. La mort surprenante de Herbeck, en octobre 1877, faisant échouer ce plan, ce fut Bruckner lui-même qui dirigea la 1^{re} audition de sa Symphonie qui, pour lui, devait finir dans un désastre.

À côté de ses nombreuses obligations, Johann von Herbeck trouva néanmoins le temps de composer. Le travail filait sous ses doigts, ainsi laissa-t-il une vaste production comprenant plus de 60 compositions pour chœur d'hommes, des chants chorals, 7 Messes, des musiques de spectacle ainsi que 4 Symphonies et plusieurs œuvres orchestrales. À côté de cela, il s'intéressa vivement à la peinture, s'était constitué une petite collection de tableaux et compta parmi les promoteurs de Hans Makart, un peintre viennois connu pour ses tableaux monumentaux.

Bien que Herbeck s'employa, en tant que chef d'orchestre, à défendre l'avant-garde des compositeurs de son temps, ses compositions à lui s'orientent plutôt vers le style conservateur de l'école Romantique. Cela vaut de même pour sa 4^e Symphonie écrite en été 1877 à Mödling près de Vienne. Les esquisses sont du déroulement de la création : « L'œuvre est écrite avec accompagnement pour orgue, instrument qu'il aimait tant. L'œuvre est parmi les meilleures de Herbeck ; sans doute la plus magnifique parmi ses œuvres orchestrales. On peut vraiment dire qu'il l'a écrite avec son cœur et son sang. Ses nerfs furent tendus à l'extrême, ses poulx tremblèrent, pendant plusieurs jours, il ne prit presque point de nourriture, même pendant le temps bref qu'il voua, le soir, à sa récréation, il ne trouva guère de repos, et le sommeil le fuit. Quand il avait fini, il dit à sa femme : " Marie, je t'assure, si cette Symphonie n'aura pas de succès, je vais abandonner la composition ! " » .

Herbeck écrivit la Symphonie pour le grand-orgue du facteur Ladegast, inauguré en 1873, dans la Salle dorée du bâtiment de la Société des Amis de la Musique de Vienne. Non sans orgueil, il voyait dans son œuvre la Ire Symphonie à combiner l'orgue avec l'orchestre ; 9 ans avant la célèbre Symphonie avec orgue du français Camille Saint-Saëns. La Ire audition avait été prévue pour l'automne 1877, le Philharmonique ayant approuvé la Symphonie de leur chef d'orchestre après une lecture sous la direction du compositeur. Pourtant, l'œuvre ne connût sa création publique que le 25 novembre 1877, peu de semaines après la mort de Herbeck, sous la direction de Hans Richter.

Suite à des circonstances défavorables, l'œuvre sombre et grave ne put cependant pas obtenir de succès auprès du public viennois et tomba rapidement en oubli. C'était dû, sans doute au moins partiellement, à la structure insolite de la Symphonie. Sa disposition formelle adopte, en effet, le modèle Classique en 4 mouvements, et même la disposition des tonalités se montre extrêmement traditionnelle, avec les mouvements externes dans la tonique de ré mineur, l'Andante au relatif clément de fa majeur et le Scherzo à la dominante de la majeur. Seuls les mouvements 2 à 4 correspondent pourtant aux proportions Classiques de la répartition des tempos. Le 1er mouvement n'est pas un mouvement d'introduction vif et largement conçu tel qu'on l'attendrait d'une Symphonie écrite en 1877, mais un prélude, en grande partie en écriture canonique, dont l'âpre harmonie et le mouvement à pas graves et tranquilles à la manière d'un choral produisent un effet de sévérité archaïque. Ainsi, cette pièce se présente-t-elle quasiment comme la version orchestrée d'un arrangement de choral de Bach. L'Andante et le Scherzo adoptant une forme en arche tripartite (A-B-A) , le Scherzo renonce cependant au Trio au sens usuel. Le Finale s'ouvre enfin par un thème de 8 mesures au fortissimo énoncé à l'orgue et aux vents auquel les cordes à l'unisson opposent un contrepoint énergique. À partir de ce matériau se développe une grande fugue strictement élaborée qui est interrompue, à 3 reprises, par de brefs intermèdes ponctués d'accords où les cordes et les vents, soutenus par l'orgue, sont opposés les uns aux autres dans une structure dialoguante. La Symphonie renonce donc entièrement à la forme de sonate (« Sonatenhauptsatzform ») - cette même forme qui, avec ses thèmes conçus en vue du contraste et sa partie de développement thématique, avait permis l'évolution triomphale de la Symphonie du milieu du XVIIIe siècle jusque tard dans le XXe siècle. Choissant pour les mouvements externes de sa Symphonie d'orgue la forme de prélude et fugue, Herbeck, grand admirateur de Bach, fait par contre recours à de structures qui comptent pratiquement parmi les archétypes de l'univers formel Baroque, et qui furent employées surtout dans les grandes œuvres d'orgue de Jean-Sébastien Bach.

À cela s'opposent toujours de nouveau des passages qui font plutôt penser à Anton Bruckner, compositeur du Romantisme tardif que Herbeck avait tellement encouragé, et notamment, à ses Ires Symphonies. Tel en est le cas, par exemple, pour le crescendo massif à la fin du prélude, avec ces accents rythmiques martialement martelés par la timbale, ou pour les mouvements croissants en forme de vague et les surfaces sonores structurées par les formules d'accompagnement des violons dans la partie médiane de l'Andante. L'instrumentation rappelle, par contre, le plein Romantisme d'un Schumann ou d'un Mendelssohn. C'est surtout le Scherzo étendu qui reprend le ton de Mendelssohn. Dans un clair la majeur, il expose ses thèmes vifs, rythmiquement marquants et d'une instrumentation aérienne. C'est seulement dans la Coda que le mouvement prend un élan énergique, montant jusqu'au fortissimo - pour s'évanouir ensuite avec une légèreté de lutin. On comprend très bien qu'ici, dans le Scherzo, Herbeck ait complètement renoncé à l'orgue. Dans cette « attitude curieuse du Scherzo en lui-même gracieux par rapport aux 3 autres mouvements massifs est profondément graves », Ludwig, le fils de Herbeck, voyait un « défaut de la Symphonie ». À son avis, ce « morceau aérien » « trancha un peu trop sur les autres mouvements ». Au fait, le Scherzo forme un contraste bienvenu avec ces « 3 mouvements massifs et profondément graves » (Ludwig Herbeck), ce qui en fait un élément dramaturgique pratiquement indispensable de la Symphonie.

Pour remédier au fait que ces contrastes puissent paraître comme une incohérence stylistique, Herbeck se sert d'une technique d'écriture utilisée déjà par Beethoven dans sa 5e Symphonie d'une manière exemplaire et que les Symphonistes du XIXe siècle devaient adopter comme un principe de grande importance : la dérivation des thèmes, même dans des œuvres symphoniques de plus grandes dimensions, d'un seul noyau motivique. Ici, ce noyau est constitué d'une figuration diatonique de 4 tons qui ouvre le prélude. Il réapparaît, sous forme modifiée, au début de l'Andante, devient élément de construction dans la partie médiane, plus mouvementée du même mouvement et se retrouve enfin, rythmiquement raccourci, dans le thème de la fugue finale. De plus, la partie médiane plus calme du Scherzo fait recours à la mélodique des mesures initiales du mouvement.

C'est justement dans son caractère de « tête de Janus » que réside l'attrait de cette Symphonie, oubliée à tort. Il réside dans sa manière d'allier tradition et innovation, écriture Baroque, légèreté Mendelssohnienne et gravité Brucknérienne, et non en dernier lieu dans la combinaison de l'orchestre avec l'orgue que, du point de vue de l'année 1877, l'on ne peut qualifier autrement qu'audacieuse.

Johann von Herbeck passe les mois d'été 1875 en Haute Autriche. Du 1er juillet au 3 août, il fait séjour à Bad Ischl où il compose, 2 ans avant la Symphonie d'orgue, ses Variations symphoniques en fa majeur. L'esquisse est achevée le 22 juillet, l'élaboration s'effectue en août. Déjà au programme du 2e concert d'abonnement du Philharmonique de Vienne dans la nouvelle saison, le 28 novembre 1875, l'œuvre connaît sa création publique sous la direction du compositeur. Le fils de Herbeck, Ludwig, s'en souviendra plus tard : « L'œuvre trouva un accueil très favorable auprès du public, ce à quoi l'on pouvait bien s'attendre, comme également auprès de la critique, à peu près sans exception. »

Le critique August Wilhelm Ambros célébra les Variations symphoniques avec un enthousiasme particulier : « Des œuvres de ce genre assurent à Herbeck sa place parmi les meilleurs compositeurs de musique instrumentale de notre temps. » . Qu'elles fassent leur chemin, et qu'il les mène bientôt au-delà de la ville de Vienne jusqu'aux contrées plus éloignées du monde musical. C'est que circule en elles toujours le vrai sang viennois, le sang de cette École viennoise glorifiée qui a donné au monde musical, avec Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven et Schubert, une étoile quadruple dont la splendeur ne s'éteindra jamais. Au fait, c'est la splendeur des grands temps révolus que Herbeck évoque ici, comme il l'évoquera dans la Symphonie d'orgue. Le n° 6 des Variations symphoniques est réservé à la discipline royale de l'écriture polyphonique, soit, au double contrepoint strictement observé qui consiste à 2 voix autonomes s'accompagnant l'une l'autre. La partie médiane de cet Allegretto, un trio avec les bois évoquant une idylle bucolique et les basses jouant des bourdons en quinte, y forme un beau contraste. De même, il importe beaucoup à Herbeck d'intégrer dans ses Variations symphoniques la combinaison Baroque de prélude (XI) et fugue (XII) , au point de la mettre à la fin du cycle entier.

Au flux tranquille du thème nettement caractérisé par la syncope combinée à un saut d'octave vers le haut s'enchaînent pourtant aussi des variations où, comme dans la 4e Symphonie, se manifestent les influences des 2 courants principaux dans la musique du XIXe siècle tardif. Ainsi Ludwig, le fils de Herbeck, n'établit-il pas seulement le lien avec le Finale de la Symphonie « Héroïque » de Beethoven, mais aussi avec Robert Schumann et ses Études symphoniques, cycle de variations pour le piano auquel les variations de Herbeck doivent bien plus que le seul titre. Dans les variations n° 5 et n° 7, l'instrumentation et l'expression trahissent plutôt l'influence de Johannes Brahms qui, 2 ans auparavant, avait achevé ses Variations Haydn. Le dédicataire des Variations symphoniques de Herbeck n'est par ailleurs nul autre qu'Eduard Hanslick, ami de Brahms et pape de la critique résidant à Vienne. Dans le Scherzo (X) , le modèle qui s'impose à tous égards est par contre celui d'Anton Bruckner, compositeur énergiquement combattu par le même Hanslick. Cette variation richement articulée (à côté du Finale, le Scherzo est la variation la plus longue du cycle) se montre inspirée, dans le Scherzo, par les danses folkloriques pétillantes de la Haute-Autriche et, dans le Trio, par le « Ländler » plus commode, présentant en outre des surfaces sonores rythmiquement structurées au plein orchestre. Seule la fin, qui clot l'œuvre en expirant tout doucement, ne possède pas d'équivalent chez Bruckner. Avec ses Variations symphoniques, Johann von Herbeck a créé un cycle dont les mouvements puisent non seulement dans différentes époques leur inspiration stylistique, mais prennent aussi chacun un caractère bien individuel, comme par exemple l'Allegro moderato avec son mouvement enjoué de double croches marchants (III) , la Canzonetta Romantique rêveuse, l'Adagio mélancolique avec sa partie médiane enjouée, le Scherzino ludique et plein d'humour ou bien l'Andante grave et solennel (IX) . Et pourtant, elles forment dans leur ensemble un tout symphonique dont la cohérence est engendrée par le thème qui transparait partout. Ainsi, les Variations symphoniques constituent-elles, avec la Symphonie d'orgue, l'ouvrage symphonique principal de Herbeck.

15 novembre 1877 : Révision de la 2e Symphonie par Bruckner ; ce qui mènera à la seconde version.

« Wohnhaus » (7 « Heßgasse » / 5 « Schottenring »)

15 novembre 1877 : Anton Bruckner quitte le « Heinrichhof » sis au 1-5 « Opernring » sur la « Ringstraße » pour emménager pas très loin, dans un nouvel appartement situé au 4e étage du « Wohnhaus » , un édifice résidentiel donnant sur 2 rues : 7 de la « Heßgasse » / 5 de « Schottenring » dans le 1er arrondissement, juste en face du Théâtre du « Ring » . Le site se trouve également à proximité de la « Votivkirche » . Typiquement viennois (plus spacieux que confortable car le mobilier était désuet) , il comprend 2 pièces et est offert pour une somme ridicule (plus symbolique qu'autre chose) par le propriétaire de l'immeuble, un jeune admirateur du musicien (il assiste à ses conférences à l'Université) si honoré de l'accueillir sous son toit : l'architecte et philosophe docteur Anton von Ölzelt-Newin (1817-1875) , marié à Amalie (Amy) Edle von Wieser. Bruckner y restera jusqu'en juillet 1895. Une plaque commémorative créée par Robert Ullmann et offerte, le 4 septembre 1924, par le « Wiener Schubertbund » (Association chorale masculine Schubert de Vienne) orne la façade. Le bâtiment abrite aujourd'hui l'Hôtel de France qui dispose d'une suite appelée la « Suite Bruckner » . Était-ce à cet endroit précis où Bruckner vivait réellement ? Cela reste à déterminer ...

On « Heßgasse 7 » , Bruckner was, at best, tempestuously served by « Frau » Kachelmayer. It was lucky she didn't spank him. He was her unending vexation and she didn't mind saying so, loudly. She couldn't bear the chaos in his bedroom. She was tired of the snuff-stained ink-blotted litter in the other chambers. Every 2 weeks, she had to threaten to quit if the « Herr » Professor didn't stop throwing stacks of note sheets on top of his slippers.

Anton Ölzelt, auch Anton Ölzelt der Ältere, (geboren 7. Juni 1817 in Inzersdorf ; gestorben 12. Oktober 1875 in Mauer bei Wien) war ein österreichischer Baumeister.

Ölzelt war unter anderem ab 1844 in der südmährischen Stadt Znaim Baumeister. 1846 kehrte er als Stadtbaumeister nach Wien zurück, wo er das Bürgerrecht erhielt. 1850 wurde er zum Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofbaumeister ernannt und im Jahr 1867 erfolgte die Nobilitierung zum Ritter von Nevin.

1875 wurde die Ölzeltgasse im 3. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Landstraße nach ihm benannt.

Seinem Sohn gleichen Namens, ein Professor für Philosophie, wurde die 6. Symphonie von Bruckner gewidmet.

...

Anton Ölzelt wurde 1817 als Sohn eines Wirtschaftsmeiers in Inzersdorf (heute ein Teil von Wien 23) geboren. Über seine Ausbildung weiß man leider nichts, man kann vermuten, daß er eine Maurerausbildung absolvierte, wahrscheinlich in Wien. 1839 war er als Baumeister in Herotitz, Mähren (heute Heroltice, Czechoslovakia) registriert, dann 1844-1846 in Znaim, Mähren (Znojmo, Czechoslovakia) tätig. 1847 wurde Ölzelt in die Wiener Baumeisterinnung aufgenommen und er konnte gleich als konzessionierter Stadtbaumeister seine Karriere beginnen. Bald wurde er einer der führenden Baumeister Wiens und sowohl in der Zeit des Neoabsolutismus als auch in der Ringstraßenzeit konnte er wichtige Bauten ausführen.

Vor der Stadterweiterung von 1858 wurden in den Vorstädten weite Gebiete mit neuangelegten Straßenzügen verbaut : Das besondere Augenmerk Ölzelts galt dem Kauf von mehreren zusammenhängenden Bauparzellen und der Errichtung von Wohnhäusern in Form einer gesamten Blockverbauung, wobei er auch für eine einheitliche Fassadengestaltung der Häusergruppe sorgte. Einige von diesen sind heute unter Ensembleschutz gestellt (zum Beispiel die Häusergruppe Wien 3, Am Heumarkt / Ölzeltgasse, 1852-1858) .

Ölzelt wirkte jedoch nicht nur als Bauspekulant, sondern er führte auch wichtige öffentliche Bauaufträge (wie die ehemalige Franz-Josephs-Kaserne am Stubentor) aus. Er wurde für seine Tätigkeit mit einer Reihe allerhöchster Anerkennungen und Auszeichnungen belohnt : 1850 erhielt er den Hofbaumeistertitel, 1866 wurde er in den Ritterstand und 1867 in den Adelsstand mit dem Prädikat von Newin (Neuwien) erhoben.

Schon als sehr reicher Mann ließ sich Ölzelt um 1860 in Mauer (heute Wien 23) nieder, wo er sich am Bau einer Wasserleitung und anderer Einrichtungen beteiligte und 1864-1871 als Obmann des Komitees für die Verschönerung des Ortes wirkte. Weiters spendete er das Armenhaus in der heutigen Speisingerstraße 232. Bemerkenswert war seine Kunstsammlung, die hauptsächlich Bilder (zum Beispiel von Hans Makart) enthielt und sich in den Räumlichkeiten seines Hauses in der Schottengasse 10 befand. Die Sammlung wurde nach seinem Tod 1879 versteigert.

In Mauer befindet sich auch die Familiengruft, die von Franz Fröhlich (mit dem Ölzelt oft zusammenarbeitete) in Form eines Mausoleums geplant und 1876 realisiert wurde. Anton Ölzelt starb im 59. Lebensjahr in Mauer.

Stellenwert

Der Lebensweg von Anton Ölzelt ist eine Erfolgsgeschichte, wie sie aus heutiger Sicht kaum mehr vorstellbar ist : als einfacher Baumeister gelang es ihm, im Wien des Vormärz und vor allem nach 1848 zu einer führenden Persönlichkeit für die Stadtentwicklung aufzusteigen. Die Tatsache, daß die Stadt ab dem Vormärz ein kontinuierliches Wachstum und eine darauffolgende enorme Bautätigkeit erlebte, bedeutete für Leute wie Anton Ölzelt oder auch Leopold Mayr eine einmalige Gelegenheit, dank guter Beziehungen und ökonomischem Spürsinn, städtebauliche Veränderungen (wie etwa die Auflösung von Militärarealen) zu nutzen und von erfolgreichen Bauspekulationen zu profitieren. Das ist beispielsweise der Fall bei der bekannten Häusergruppe in der Ölzeltgasse (Wien 3) : die Auflösung des Mehlmagazins auf dem ehemaligen Landstraßer Glacis bei der bereits nicht mehr existierenden Heumarktkaserne führte zu einer Lizitation des etwa 4600 Quadratmeter großen Areals. 1852 erwarb Ölzelt diese Grundstücke und errichtete darauf acht Miethäuser.

In einer ähnlichen Weise operierte er während des großen Baubooms anlässlich der Realisierung des Ringstraßenprojekts : Er war einer der ersten Parzellenkäufer und führte (mit Franz Fröhlich) die Häusergruppe zwischen Operngasse und Schillerplatz aus. Kennzeichnend war immer die gesamte Blockverbauung mit einer homogenen Fassadengestaltung. Die Fassaden zeigen die typischen additiven Fensterreihungen mit kleinteiligem Dekor des romantischen Historismus, teilweise kombiniert mit Elementen des englischen Tudor-Stils.

Einige Jahre später realisierte Ölzelt (immer mit Franz Fröhlich) den Baublock zwischen Schottenring und Maria-Theresien-Straße : der Modus operandi war dasselbe, hier sind aber die Bauformen dem Strenghistorismus verbunden.

Ölzelt spielte jedoch nicht nur als Bauunternehmer eine wichtige Rolle in der Ära der ersten Stadterweiterung : er war Mitglied in der Beurteilungskommission für die « Concursausschreibung zur Erlangung eines Grundplanes », welche zur Realisierung des Ringstraßenprojekts führte, und richtete sich gegen das Monopol der Ziegelproduktion, um die gesamte Bautätigkeit zu fördern.

The « Hanuschhof » (the Hanusch Court)

The « Hanuschhof » is a house typical of the Viennese « Gründerzeit » and was built between 1862 and 1863 as an adjoining building of the Albrecht House (now, the Albertina Museum) by the Master builder Anton Ölzelt, according to the plans of the architect Anton Hefft. These days, the offices of various arts and culture enterprises are situated within the Court. The Vienna State Opera Museum is also housed within the « Hanuschhof » .

The 8 « Volksoper » apartments are located within the so-called « Stöcklgebäude » (outbuilding) of the inner courtyard. These apartments vary in size and are all located on the 3rd (and highest) floor.

The « Hanuschhof » is located between the Vienna State Opera and the Castle Garden, near to the Hôtel Sacher and the « Kärtner Straße » and within easy reach of public transport.

The « Volksoper » apartments are leased to the stars of Operas, Operettas and musicals for 10 months of the year. In July and August, you can rent the apartments for a length of time ranging from 3 days to the full 2 months. The apartments are situated just meters away from the Vienna State Opera, in a quiet central courtyard - in the heart of Vienna. Alongside the town centre, the following main sights and attractions are within walking distance : the Castle Gardens ; the Albertina ; the « Kärtner Straße » ; the « Hofburg » Palace ; the Historical Art Museum and Natural History Museum.

L'Hôtel de France

L'Hôtel de France a été construit sur la « Ringstraße » , du côté de la rue « Schottenring » , en 1872, par les architectes Franz Fröhlich et Anton Ölzelt. 1 an plus tard, en 1873, l'Exposition universelle fut organisée à Vienne. Pour exprimer sa vocation internationale, cet établissement a été nommé Hôtel de France, comble du chic et de l'élégance à l'époque.

En octobre 1876, l'architecte Ölzelt assista à un concert d'Anton Bruckner au monastère de Klosterneuburg. Il fut tellement impressionné par sa musique, qu'il lui offrit un appartement à l'Hôtel de France pour quitter son appartement exigü du « Heinrichshof ». Bruckner accepta avec joie et y séjournera jusqu'à la fin de l'été 1895. Durant cette période, il composa la plupart de ses œuvres les plus célèbres.

...

L'exclusif Hôtel de France (un 5 étoiles, construit en 1872) se trouve au 3 « Schottenring », sur cette même « Ringstraße ». La cathédrale Saint-Étienne, le « Hofburg », l'École espagnole d'équitation (« Spanische Hofreitschule ») et le « Wiener Staatsoper » sont à une distance de marche de l'Hôtel.

L'Hôtel de France est un établissement haut de gamme situé au bord du prestigieux « Ring », le boulevard qui encercle le centre-ville de Vienne. Cet Hôtel de luxe moderne offre de nombreux équipements et facilités ainsi qu'un restaurant réputé. Une adresse idéale pour se reposer à proximité des principaux centres d'intérêt de la capitale autrichienne.

Ouvert toute l'année, l'Hôtel de France, membre du groupe hôtelier autrichien Austria Trend, qui comprend également l'Hôtel Bellevue à Vienne, peut accueillir 350 clients au maximum.

Rénové pour la dernière fois en 2007, l'Hôtel de France abrite 194 chambres réparties dans un bel immeuble de style viennois de 6 étages, desservi par un ascenseur spacieux et élégant, dont le sol est recouvert de moquette. L'intérieur est superbe : escalier magistral, dorures, lustres, statues et peintures apportent un indéniable cachet à la décoration.

Pourvues d'un sol en moquette, les chambres de l'Hôtel de France sont spacieuses (30 mètres carrés) et très bien décorées.

L'Hôtel de France abrite un superbe restaurant, à la décoration élégante : moquette bleue, lustres, miroirs, tableaux et portraits, sans oublier le buste de l'impératrice Marie-Thérèse, constituent le cadre agréable de vos repas : une délicieuse cuisine viennoise et internationale à la carte accompagnée d'excellents vins.

L'exclusif Hôtel de France propose un confort moderne et un charme typiquement viennois, au cœur de Vienne, sur la célèbre « Ringstraße ».

De nombreux sites touristiques, comme la cathédrale Saint-Étienne et le Palais impérial de la « Hofburg », sont facilement accessibles à pied en quelques minutes. Situé sur l'un des plus beaux boulevards du monde, cet hôtel est très bien desservi par les transports publics. La station de métro « Schottentor » (ligne U2) se trouve à seulement 50 mètres.

Pour votre confort, les mini-bars, qui sont remplis tous les jours, et la connexion haut-débit à Internet sont disponibles gratuitement dans toutes les chambres. L'Hôtel de France dispose également d'un centre de remise en forme mis gratuitement à votre disposition, 24 heures sur 24.

Savourez une cuisine viennoise et française traditionnelle dans le Restaurant n° 3. Durant l'été, vous pourrez également profiter de la terrasse du café qui donne sur la rue. Un riche petit déjeuner buffet est servi à l'étage supérieur du restaurant. Des spécialités japonaises sont proposées dans le Daihachi Sushi Bar. L'élégant Atrium Bar est un point de rencontre élégant à tout moment de la journée. Un pianiste joue une agréable musique, afin de proposer une atmosphère relaxante jusqu'au soir.

Ein neuer Tagungsort für die Präsidentenkonferenz des AÖWB. Viele Jahre lud der Auslandsösterreicher-Weltbund zur jährlich stattfindenden Präsidentenkonferenz in das Palais Auersperg ein. Dieses Mal findet die Konferenz an einem anderen Ort, im « Hôtel de France », 1010 Wien, Schottenring 3, einem Hotel mit bemerkenswerter Geschichte, statt.

Das Hotel ist Teil eines Gebäudekomplexes, der 1872 von den Architekten Franz Fröhlich (1824-1889) und Doktor Anton Ölzelt Ritter von Nevin (1817-1875) errichtet wurde. Fröhlichs Handschrift als Ringstraßenarchitekt ist unübersehbar, er setzte dabei auf Elemente der in Wien verbreiteten Neorenaissance. So tritt die Fassade des Hotelgebäudes mit steingequaderten Seitenrisaliten und additiven Giebelfenstern mit Riesenpilastern leicht hervor und ist durch seichte Beletagebalkons geprägt. Als 1993 die historischen Fenster durch Kunststoffenster ausgetauscht wurden, gingen die Karyatidhermen, die im Mezzanin und der Attika die breiteren Fenster zerteilten, verloren. Sie waren für die Ringstraßenarchitektur typische Stilelemente. Auch sonst wurden in der Folge Umbauten durchgeführt : 1986-1988 entstanden Konferenzräume, Restaurants sowie durch den Dachgeschoßausbau zusätzliche Gästezimmer. Durch die Überdachung des Innenhofes mit einer Stahl-Glas-Konstruktion entstand das Atrium mit der Atriumbar.

Wechselvolle Geschichte

Aber zurück zum Beginn : Ein Jahr nach der Eröffnung, anlässlich der Wiener Weltausstellung 1873, wurde dem Hotel der Name « Hotel des France » gegeben. Der erste Eigentümer war die 1873 gegründete Wiener Lombard- und Escompte-Bank, die im Erdgeschoß ihre erste Filiale eröffnete. 1917 kam die Hotel de France GmbH in den Besitz der Familie Gisela, Ella und Ernst Herzog. Diese richtete in den 1920er Jahren im Erdgeschoß nicht nur einen Restaurant- und Kaffeehausbetrieb, sondern im Tiefparterre auch ein kleines Theater ein. Hier wurde 1932 das von Ödön von Horvath und Lukas Kristl geschaffene, auf einem realen Gerichtsfall beruhende, Drama « Glaube, Liebe, Hoffnung. Ein kleiner Totentanz in fünf Bildern » erstmals aufgeführt. 1938 wurde die Familie Herzog von den Nationalsozialisten des Hotels beraubt, Adolf Knorr, Mitglied der NSDAP, erwarb es. Im Verlauf des Zweiten Weltkriegs zum Kriegslazarett geworden, übernahm 1945 die französische Besatzungsmacht das Hotel. 1947 kaufte es Norbert Wachtel und schenkte es in der Folge seinen Töchtern, deren Ehemänner Ernst Stock und Kurt Horowitz es fortführten. 1972 wurde das «

Hôtel de France » von der « Austria Hotels International Betriebs GmbH » erworben.

Heimstatt für einen großen Tonkünstler

Auf den Dramatiker Ödön von Horvath wurde verwiesen, auf Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) und seinen Bezug zum « Hôtel de France » darf nicht vergessen werden. Im Oktober 1876 war Doktor Anton Ölzelt Ritter von Nevin von einem Konzert Anton Bruckners in Klosterneuburg so beeindruckt, daß er beschloss, den Komponisten aus seiner engen Wohnung im Heinrichshof (heute Opernringhof) zu befreien und ihm ein Appartement im « Hôtel de France » anzubieten. Bruckner nahm an und blieb bis zum Sommer 1895 im Hotel. Zum Dank widmete er seine 6. Symphonie in A-Dur dem Ehepaar Ölzelt.

Das « Hôtel de France » versteht sich als exklusives Innenstadthotel, seine hier nur in Stichworten angerissene Geschichte unterstreicht diese Exklusivität allemal.

Im Jahre 1872, wurde am Schottenring das Hotel de France von den beiden Baumeistern Franz Fröhlich und Anton Ölzelt erbaut. Ein Jahr später, 1873, fand in Wien eine Weltausstellung statt. Um internationales Flair zu vermitteln, nannte man das neue Hotel « de France », was damals als besonders chic und elegant empfunden wurde.

Im Oktober 1876 hörte Baumeister Ölzelt ein Konzert von Anton Bruckner im Stift Klosterneuburg und war von seinem Spiel so beeindruckt daß er beschloß, Bruckner aus seiner engen Wohnung im Heinrichshof zu befreien und bot ihm ein Appartement im Hotel de France an. Anton Bruckner nahm dankend an und blieb im Hotel de France bis zum Sommer 1895. Während dieser Zeit komponierte er die bekanntesten seiner Werke.

Mit dem zweiten Weltkrieg brach auch für das Hotel de France eine traurige Zeit an, das Hotel wurde zum Kriegslazarett. Nach Ende des Krieges besetzten die alliierten Streitkräfte Wien und die Stadt wurde in vier Zonen aufgeteilt. Das Hotel de France lag im französischen Sektor und wurde von den Franzosen bis Oktober 1955 als Hauptquartier verwendet.

Im Laufe der Jahre wurde das Hotel ausgebaut und wechselte mehrmals die Besitzer. Seit 1972 befindet es sich im Besitz der Austria Hotels International, die weitere Hotels in Wien, Baden, Eisenstadt, Prag und Brünn betreibt.

In den Jahren 1986-1988 genoß das Hotel großzügige Renovierungs- und Umbauarbeiten, erhielt 3 Konferenzräume, 2 Restaurants, sowie durch den Dachgeschoßausbau zusätzliche Gästezimmer. Durch die Überdachung des Innenhofes mit einer Stahl-Glas-Konstruktion entstand das Atrium.

Das Hotel de France, freut sich, 130 Jahre nach Eröffnung, seine vielen internationalen Gäste mit modernstem Hotelkomfort und Wiener Charme zu verwöhnen.

« Wiener Schubertbund »

In November 1863, Franz Mair (the later director and Choir-Master) founded the « Lehrersängerchor Schubertbund », a teacher's choir. In the following year, the choir first appeared in public. Due to changing its name into « Schubertbund » (since 1922, « Wiener Schubertbund ») and opening the organization to everyone, the choir was able to gain more members. In 1935, there were 500 choir singers and they gave a concert in Rome for pope Pius IX.

Before World War II, notable choir Masters conducted the « Wiener Schubertbund ». Franz Mair, Adolf Kirchl, Doctor Anton von Webern, Viktor Keldorfer and Doctor Reinhold Schmid formed the choir to become one of the most remarkable men's choirs in the German speaking countries. After 1945, Viktor Keldorfer, Doctor Hans Gillesberger, Professor Leo Lehner, Professor Heinrich Gattermeyer, Professor Franz Gerstacker and, since 2001, Professor Fritz Brucker have prolonged this tradition.

Besides the care for the Opus of Franz Schubert, which has always been one of the choir's main concerns, the choir also has a wide repertoire from spiritual music to pieces for men's choir of the Romantic period up to Austrian and international folk songs and contemporary compositions.

Special opportunities to perform the Opus of Schubert are the annual concerts held at Schubert's birth place, the « Schubertiaden » .

Well-known composers such as Richard Strauß, Wilhelm Kienzl and Franz Lehár dedicated major works to the « Wiener Schubertbund ». This tradition was continued by first night performances of contemporary composers, like Karl Etti and Heinrich Gattermeyer.

The « Wiener Schubertbund » is also a founding member of the « Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft » and is performing and having its headquarters in their premises since their foundation. These premises form a beautiful and traditional forum for the performances. They are also home for a big collection of manuscripts and personal things of Schubert (the most important things are in care of the « Musiksammlung der Stadt Wien » and the « Wien Museum ») and other composers as well as presents of the choirs with which the « Wiener Schubertbund » has relations to all over the world. A collection of documents since the foundation in 1863 up to date is historical interesting.

For the honour of the « Wiener Schubertbund », many well-known artists, scientists and politicians were and are proud of being its honorary members, like Franz Grillparzer, Anton Bruckner, Peter Rosegger, Ottokar Kernstock, Wilhelm Kienzl, Richard Strauß, Ignaz Seipel, Karl Seitz, Helmut Zilk, Franz Lehár, Julius Patzak.

The « Wiener Schubertbund » has not only performed on radio and television, but has also recorded several compact discs, which reflect the choir's work.

Wiener Schubertbund : Männergesangverein. Gegründet als Lehrersängerchor Schubertbund am 14.11.1863 im Gasthaus « Zur neuen Welt » (Wien I, Ecke Kärntner Straße / Bösendorferstraße ; 1963 Gedenktafel enthüllt) von Franz Mair. Der Chor war zunächst als Sektion dem Lehrerverein Die Volksschule angegliedert, dem auch seine 86 Gründungsmitglieder angehörten. Die Bezugnahme auf Franz Schubert erfolgte aufgrund von dessen Abstammung aus einer Lehrerfamilie beziehungsweise dessen kurzer Tätigkeit als Lehrer. 1870-1871 spaltete sich der Chor vom Verein Die Volksschule ab (die Statuten des Vereins hatten eine Aufnahme von nicht dem Lehrerstand angehörenden Sängern unmöglich gemacht) und nahm den Namen Schubertbund an. 1922 wurde - infolge der Bildung anderer Schubertbünde in Österreich (zum Beispiel Graz, Brünn) und Deutschland - der Vereinsname auf Wiener Schubertbund geändert, der bis heute (2005) beibehalten wurde. Vereinssitz und Probenlokal befinden sich seit 1918 im Wiener Konzerthaus, der Wahlspruch lautet seit der Gründung : « Dem Wissen treu, im Liede frei » (Text : Josef Stadler ; Musik : Georg Ernst) . Der Wiener Schubertbund ist seit 1863 Mitglied des Niederösterreichischen Sängerbundes.

Die Pflege der Werke Schuberts, die auch in den Satzungen festgehalten wurden, stand zunächst im Vordergrund. So wurde bereits bei der Gründungsversammlung als erster Chor Die Nacht (D. 983c) gesungen (neben Johannes Wenzeslaus Kalliwodas Das deutsche Lied) , anlässlich des ersten öffentlichen Auftritts am 02.02.1864 in der Augustinerkirche (Wien I) sang man die Deutsche Messe (D. 872) . Der Pflege der Schubertschen Werke widmen sich vor allem die auf Anregung von Adolf Kirchl als musikalische Veranstaltungen wieder begründeten Schubertiaden. Die erste fand am 18.12.1901 statt, 1926 konnte bereits die 50. gefeiert werden. Auch heute noch veranstaltet der Wiener Schubertbund jährlich Schubertiaden, meist in Schuberts Geburtshaus in Wien IX. Der Verein zählte immer zu den stimmstärksten Männergesangvereinen des deutschen Sprachraums. Bei der ersten Chorprobe (21.11.1863) waren 132 Sänger anwesend, beim 1.000. Konzert am 19.02.1924 wirkten rund 400 Sänger mit. Als künstlerische Glanzzeit gelten die Jahre 1927-1928, als dem Verein neben 500 Sängern auch ein Damen- und Knabenchor (organisiert vom damaligen 2. Chorleiter Ferdinand Großmann) zur Verfügung standen. Die große Zahl der Mitglieder brachte es mit sich, daß mehrere so genannt Tischgesellschaften gegründet wurden, die durch regelmäßige Zusammenkünfte und heitere Veranstaltungen wesentlich zur Geselligkeitspflege beitrugen (zum Beispiel Saglgesellschaft, Kirchl-Runde, Schubertkneipe, Hofrat Jaksch-Gesellschaft, Keldorfer-Runde) . Von musikalischer Bedeutung waren hingegen die Gesangquartette (zum Beispiel 1891-1907 das Sæser-Quartett, benannt nach dem langjährigen Vorstand und Tenorsolisten Ferdinand Leopold Sæser ; ab 1894 das Puhm-Quartett, benannt nach dem I. Tenor Leopold Puhm ; ab 1899 das Andreß-Quartett, benannt nach dem I. Bassisten August Andreß) und kleinen Instrumentalensembles (und andere Streichquartette) , die mit ihren Auftritten bei musikalischen Veranstaltungen des Wiener Schubertbundes zur Hebung des künstlerischen Niveaus beitrugen und eine abwechslungsreiche Programmgestaltung ermöglichten. Um 1900 bestand auch ein Hausorchester (Orchestervereine) , jedoch arbeitete der Wiener Schubertbund im Laufe seines Bestehens regelmäßig mit dem Hofopernorchester, dem Orchester des Wiener Konzertvereins, den Wiener Philharmonikern, den Wiener Symphonikern und dem Niederösterreichischen Tonkünstlerorchester zusammen.

Der Wiener Schubertbund unternahm seit seiner Gründung eine fast unüberschaubare Zahl an Sängerfahrten und Konzertreisen in die ganze Welt, auch an nahezu allen großen Sängerfesten nahm er teil (erstmalig am I. Bundesfest des Niederösterreichischen Sängerbundes 1864) . Die erste Sängerfahrt führte 1865 nach Gmunden / Oberösterreich, die erste ins Ausland erfolgte 1884 nach Süddeutschland. Hervorzuheben sind weiters und andere ein Auftritt bei der Pariser Weltausstellung 1900 vor 4.000 Zuhörern, ein Konzert am 09.06.1906 in Brünn vor 16.000 Zuhörern, die

Mitwirkung bei der der Eröffnung der Wiener Urania am 06.06.1910, die Teilnahme am 10. Deutschen Sängerbundesfest in Wien 1928 und ein Konzert vor Papst Pius XI. in Rom 1935. Zahlreiche namhafte Komponisten widmeten dem Wiener Schubertbund Werke, zu nennen wären hier und andere Thomas Koschat, Wilhelm Kienzl (Wach' auf, mein Volk ! , Uraufführung 28.12.1903) , Carl Lafite, Richard Strauß (Die Tageszeiten, Uraufführung 21.7.1928 ; Durch Einsamkeiten, Uraufführung 01.04.1939) , Hans Wagner-Schönkirch, Rudolf Weinwurm, Max Ritter von Weinzierl und Richard Wickenhauser. Strauß hatte bereits am 08.12.1922 die österreichische Eigenmächtig Abwesend seines Bardengesangsdurch den Wiener Schubertbund geleitet. 1925 trat Julius Patzak dem Wiener Schubertbund bei, mehrere wissenschaftliche Abhandlungen von Otto Erich Deutsch erschienen im Verlag des Wiener Schubertbundes.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg erfolgte die Wiederaufnahme des Vereinslebens mit der ersten Mitgliederversammlung am 13.07.1945 und der ersten Chorprobe im Februar 1946 (80 Sänger) . In den folgenden Jahren erfolgte ein steter Aufstieg des Vereins, es kam wie schon vor dem Krieg zur Zusammenarbeit mit bedeutenden Künstlern und zu Uraufführungen beziehungsweise Eigenmächtig Abwesenden von Werken Zoltán Kodálys, Ernst Tittels, Alfred Uhls, Peter Warlocks, der Vereinschormeister und anderer Komponisten. Im Jubiläumsjahr 1963 zählte der Chor 164 Mitglieder und konnte bereits 1.960 öffentliche Aufführungen vorweisen. Im Rahmen der Wiener Festwochen 1983 wurde die 120. Schubertiade abgehalten, 1985 schlossen sich die Sänger des Engelsbergbundes Wien (1889 gegründet als Kaufmännischer Sängerkhor) dem Wiener Schubertbund an. 1988 gehörten dem Verein 70 aktive Mitglieder an. Trotz Nachwuchsproblems zählt der Wiener Schubertbund derzeit (2005) mit rund 50 aktiven Mitgliedern noch immer neben dem Wiener Männergesang-Verein und dem Männergesangverein Atzgersdorf (Wien XXIII) zu den stimmkräftigsten reinen Männergesangvereinen Wiens. Die Konzertreisen führten den Verein in den letzten Jahren auch vermehrt ins fremdsprachige Ausland (USA 1999, China 2001, Syrien 2002, Brasilien 2006) . Neben der Pflege klassischer Werke für Männergesang finden sich nunmehr auch Bearbeitungen moderner Stücke (aus dem Bereich Musical und Rock und Pop) im Repertoire, richtungweisend ist hier die letzte CD (2003) mit dem Titel Von Bach bis Beatles. Der Wiener Schubertbund besitzt neben den Nachlässen von Franz Mair und Ernst Schmid heute noch Autographe und andere von Franz Schubert und Richard Strauß.

Als künstlerische Leiter des Wiener Schubertbund fungierten seit der Gründung : Franz Mair (1863-1890) ; Ernst Schmid (1890-1891 ; 2. Chormeister 1863-1890 und 1891-1895) ; Adolf Kirchl (1891-1916) ; Ferdinand Rebay (1916-1920) ; Hermann von Schmeidel (1920-1921) ; Anton von Webern (1921-1922) ; Viktor Keldorfer (1922-1938 und 1946-1951) ; Otto Nurrer (1938-1940) ; Reinhold Schmid (1940-1945) ; Hans Gillesberger (1951-1954) ; Leo Lehner (1954-1963) ; Heinrich Gattermeyer (1963-1973) ; Kurt Kettner (1974-1976) und Franz Gerstacker (1976-2000) . Unter den Vereinsvorständen ragen neben Mair (administrativer Leiter 1863-1866) noch Franz Bobies (1866-1892) ; August Fetzmann (1892-1902) ; Josef A. Jaksch (1902-1921) ; Ferdinand Leopold Sæser (1921-1936) und Ernst Meithner (1936-1938 und 1946-1956) hervor. Derzeit (2007) stehen dem Wiener Schubertbund Wolfgang Schuster, Kurt Heiß und Gerhard Seidl als Vorstände sowie Fritz Brucker (seit 2000) und Christine Aichberger (seit 2003) als Chormeister vor.

Anton Bruckner sera nommé membre honoraire des 2 Sociétés Wagner de Vienne : l'une antisémite ; et l'autre, non.

Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne

Avec le temps, la capitale de la musique deviendra de plus en plus réceptive aux idées brucknériennes. Le conservatisme intransigeant, mené par Eduard Hanslick, était confronté au modernisme allemand. À l' « Akademischer Wagnerverein » (Société académique Richard Wagner), le Maître de Saint-Florian est devenu une espèce de « cause célèbre ».

Les Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, August Göllerich, Ferdinand Löwe de même que les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, deviendront ses plus ardents défenseurs. Ils feront souvent la promotion de sa musique en organisant plusieurs concerts.

August Göllerich, Ernst Décsey, Guido Adler, Rudolf Louis et Auguste Stradal, tous des élèves de Bruckner, développeront une réputation enviable en tant que musicologues et écrivains sur la musique.

De 1884 à 1893, Viktor Boller (1853-1904), juge à la Cour d'appel autrichienne, agira comme président de la Société académique Wagner.

Les Cercles wagnériens

Le 1er juin 1871, un fervent ami de Richard Wagner, Monsieur Carl Heckel, de Mannheim, avait réuni, dans sa ville, une société de Wagnéristes, qui s'appela « Wagner-Verein », et fut le premier cercle Wagnérien.

L'exemple fut assidûment suivi. Le pianiste Karl Tausig, avec Monsieur Carl Heckel, se signala dans ce mouvement. Munich, dès 1871, et, en 1872, Mayence, Dresde, Buda-Pesth, Bruxelles, Bayreuth, Cologne, Darmstadt, Ratisbonne, New-York, Prague, Vienne, Berlin eurent leurs cercles Wagnériens ; puis, successivement, toutes les principales villes, et jusque des bourgades. Quelques villes, même, comme Vienne et Berlin, en eurent plusieurs, des Sociétés Académiques Wagner, des Unions Wagnériennes.

Les cercles Wagnériens restèrent indépendants les uns des autres ; leur influence n'en fut pas moins grande : ils aidèrent à la diffusion des idées wagnériennes, et, par l'agitation qu'ils instituèrent, ils contribuèrent, puissamment, à exalter le nom de Richard Wagner, et, suivant ses projets, ils servirent, efficacement, au succès de l'entreprise de Bayreuth.

C'est encore aux cercles wagnériens, qui existent toujours, isolément, dans leurs villes, qu'on dut, en 1883, l'établissement définitif de l'Association Wagnérienne Universelle.

L'Association

L'Assemblée générale de Nuremberg décida, en effet, qu'en une seule grande association seraient réunies toutes les forces isolées de la famille wagnérienne. Les statuts furent élaborés selon le projet des délégués Viennois, dont le rôle fut important, en cette Assemblée : ce fut la cohésion et l'élargissement des institutions wagnériennes, depuis 1871, une sorte de nouveau patronat, plus large, plus complet. Les 3 assemblées générales, tenues, depuis lors, le 29 juillet 1883 et le 22 juillet 1884, à Bayreuth, et, le 10 avril 1885, à Munich, fixèrent (définitivement) , le caractère de cette association qui, aujourd'hui, est en pleine vigueur.

L'Association wagnérienne a pour objet, premièrement, réunir en une œuvre commune tous les Wagnéristes ; secondement, propager et développer les idées wagnériennes ; enfin, assurer le maintien perpétuel des représentations-modèles de Bayreuth.

L'Association, d'abord, est largement ouverte ; les conditions d'admission ont été rendues aussi faciles que possible ; les membres de l'association paient une cotisation annuelle de 5 francs. Des ressources pécuniaires étant nécessaires à l'Association, elle a préféré les obtenir du concours d'un grand nombre d'adhérents, donnant chacun, une somme minime, à laquelle ils peuvent joindre, d'ailleurs, des donations particulières.

Ensuite, la propagation des idées wagnériennes est faite, en tous pays, par les membres de l'Association, encouragés par l'Association, avec une égale libéralité. Des cercles wagnériens, et des publications wagnériennes, puis des exécutions fragmentaires ou totales des œuvres du Maître, des conférences sont organisées pour répandre cette agitation, grâce à laquelle le nom du Maître est mieux connu, et son œuvre mieux étudiée, mieux comprise.

Enfin, si l'union spirituelle des Wagnéristes est, par le fait même de l'Association, et si, à la propagande wagnérienne, de notables efforts sont consacrés, l'objet le plus marqué de l'Association est le maintien des représentations de Festivals. L'appui de l'Association à l'entreprise de Bayreuth est, d'abord, un appui moral, considérable : mais il sera, aussi, un appui matériel. En effet, l'Association vient d'établir, le 10 avril 1885, le 1er essai d'une institution spéciale, et qui sera, plus tard, nécessairement, agrandie et perfectionnée, le « Richard Wagner Stiftung » (la Fondation Richard Wagner) . La Fondation, exclusivement consacrée au maintien de l'œuvre de Bayreuth, est composée d'un capital dû, en partie, aux revenus de l'Association (60 % des revenus totaux annuels) , et, en partie, à des donations particulières. Les revenus de la Fondation sont répartis, 2/5 à l'acquisition de places aux représentations, devant être données, 1/5 à des bourses de voyages à Bayreuth, et le reste à un fonds de réserve. La Fondation est administrée par un comité, comprenant le représentant de la famille Wagner, le maire de Bayreuth, le président de l'Association, et quelques délégués. Déjà, d'ailleurs, des bourses de voyages et des places aux représentations de Bayreuth, ont été données, en 1883 et en 1884, spécialement par l'Association, à des artistes et amateurs, de toutes les nations.

C'est donc, toujours, Bayreuth qui est le centre du Wagnérisme, et l'œuvre de Bayreuth, faite la plus large et la plus universelle - le but dernier de tous les efforts.

L'Association, pour la facilité des relations, se subdivise en agences locales et en comités locaux, et tient, comme il a été dit, des assemblées générales, annuelles. Elle est dirigée par un comité central de 9 membres, élus par l'assemblée générale. Son siège est, actuellement, à Munich.

Le président honoraire est Franz Liszt ; et les membres du Comité sont :

le Baron Karl d'Ostini et le Comte de Sporck, présidents ; Messieurs Sachs et Porges, secrétaires ; Schmid, trésorier ; et Hermann Levi, chef d'orchestre de Munich ; Oskar Merz ; le Baron Hans de Wolzogen ; Franz de Fischer ; Max Ritter de Schmædel ; et Franz Seitz. Le représentant à Paris est Monsieur Houston Stewart Chamberlain ; à Bruxelles, Monsieur Henri La Fontaine ; à Londres, Monsieur Benjamin Lewis Moseley.

En Décembre 1884, après 1 an et demi d'existence, l'Association wagnérienne était représentée dans 400 villes, et avait, environ, 5,000 membres disséminés par toutes les parties de la terre.

L'activité publique et professionnelle de Henri La Fontaine (1854-1943) à la fois avocat, homme politique, bibliographe, auteur, alpiniste et musicien (ami de Richard Wagner, il traduit « la Walkyrie ») permet de comprendre que La Fontaine a eu une vie bien remplie, conduite par des idées et des actions que connaissent parfaitement les enseignants documentalistes : le partage, l'autonomie, l'épanouissement, le respect et la reconnaissance des personnes.

Les Festivals de Bayreuth ont été continuées, après la mort du Maître, selon le vœu de la famille, grâce à l'énergie et au dévouement de leur administrateur, Monsieur Adolf Groß, l'exécuteur testamentaire de Wagner, qui, après avoir été pour lui l'ami pratique, indispensable et sûr, a su, après sa mort, vaincre toutes difficultés, et a rendu les représentations de 1883 et de 1884 plus parfaites encore que celles de 1882.

« Parsifal » fut représenté 12 fois, du 18 au 30 juillet 1883 ; et 10 fois, du 21 juillet au 8 août 1884. L'interprétation était, à peu près, la même ; mais les principaux rôles n'étaient plus distribués qu'en double. La mise en scène avait été très améliorée. Le prix des places fut diminué de 30 Marks à 20. Quant au succès, il fut chaque année, plus marqué.

Ces représentations seront suivies, en l'été de 1886, par la reprise des représentations de « Parsifal » et l'inauguration, au « Festspielhaus », des représentations de « Tristan et Isolde » .

L'histoire résumée de l'œuvre de Bayreuth étant arrivée à sa fin, il reste à rapprocher de l'œuvre exécutée, l'œuvre rêvée par Richard Wagner ; à examiner ce qui a et ce qui n'a pas été fait, et ce qui pouvait ou ne pouvait pas l'être - à voir comment l'œuvre actuelle réalise l'idée du Maître.

L'Association Wagner de Hongrie a été fondé, parmi les Ires du monde, en 1872, par Ödön Mihalovich, le comte Albert Apponyi et le chef d'orchestre János (Hans) Richter Elle avait alors pour but, en dehors de faire la connaissance de la musique wagnérienne, d'émettre des « billets de construction » pour aider à réaliser le « Festspielhaus » à Bayreuth. Son principal objectif était et est toujours de faire connaître, d'approfondir et de soigner l'art musical de Wagner.

The International Association of Wagner Societies (« Der Richard-Wagner-Verband International eingetragener Verein », also known as « Der RWVI ») is an affiliation of Wagner Societies (« Richard Wagner-Verband ») that promotes interest and research into the works of Richard Wagner, raises funds for scholarships for young music students, singers, and instrumentalists, and supports the annual Bayreuth Festival. It also sponsors symposia, holds singing competitions for Wagnerian voices, and issues awards for stage direction and stagings of Wagner's Operas. The association is a non-profit organization.

The 1st Richard Wagner Society was launched in Mannheim (Germany) , in 1871, 1 year after the premiere of the German composer's Opera « Die Walküre » (The Valkyrie) , in Munich. The brainchild of Wagner's longtime friend, the music-publisher Emil Heckel, the 1st Society was a simple, locally-conceived venue for celebrating Wagner's music. In the wake of Wagner's difficulties in securing interest in the public subscription for his future Bayreuth Festival, Heckel suggested to the composer that he sponsor additional Societies to help secure support. Wagner embraced the idea enthusiastically and, by 1872, Societies had been established in Vienna, Berlin, Leipzig and London - the latter founded by Edward Dannreuther (1844-1905) , the author of « Richard Wagner : His Tendencies and Theories » , published in 1873.

Richard Wagner's dream, as described in a letter written in 1882, was that his Bayreuth Festival would be free for everyone to attend, however, this was never possible because of the extremely high costs to organize and produce it. Nonetheless, based on Wagner's desires, Societies refocused their efforts and began making it possible for promising talented musicians to attend. Public interest in supporting subscriptions to fund scholarships was initially tepid but, from 1919 forward, the number of Societies increased steadily.

The 1st important performances of Bruckner's Symphonic works took place in the Viennese Academic Wagner Society.

Founded in 1873, the Viennese Society, like its model in Germany, aimed to promote and disseminate the works of Richard Wagner. Numerous pupils and students of Bruckner belonged to it. Apart from Wagner's works, it also advocated those of Franz Liszt, Hugo Wolf, and Anton Bruckner. In the so-called « Internal Evenings » and weekly meetings of the Society, Bruckner's Symphonies were performed in arrangements for piano (2 or 4 hands) mostly in the « Bösendorfer-Saal » , or in the small hall of the « Musikverein » . The pianists, in charge at these events, were : Hans Paumgartner, Felix Mottl, Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann, and Ferdinand Löwe.

Later, the Society also organized full performances of the Symphonies in the « Musikvereinssaal » , under the direction of Hans Richter.

Richter (1843-1916) ought to be reckoned one of the most outstanding interpreters of Bruckner's music. He was one of the regular conductors at the Bayreuth Festival and conducted all of Bruckner's Symphonies, up to the 5th and 6th, in the composer's lifetime, not only in Vienna but also abroad.

Bruckner himself joined the Society after his return from Bayreuth, in October 1873, and remained a member to the end of his life. In 1885, he was made an honorary member.

At the end of the 1880's, a few members left for political and ideological reasons.

In 1890, they founded the « New Richard Wagner Society » with an outlook that was fundamentally German nationalist and anti-Semitic. In this Society, too, piano performances of Bruckner's works took place.

...

In a lecture delivered to the « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » , Franz Schalk criticized artistic careerism, taking aim at technically proficient but uninspired orchestral performances and at institutions of music education that emphasized mechanical skills at the expense of spiritual understanding :

« It may, after all, have even been an impediment to the appreciation of Bruckner that his music is more German than anything else that we have had, until now, in purely instrumental music. To be sure, not more German than Bach or Beethoven in so far as their basic character and that of their work is concerned, but more German in the form of expression.

Noting that Richard Wagner had made many Germans conscious of themselves as a people for the 1st time, Schalk asserted that many others continued to be alienated from the German spirit and concluded that Bruckner's power must seem like shapelessness to them ; his warmth-like childish ingenuousness. For the most un-German thing about us is precisely our artistic activity. To be German means, as our Master splendidly explained : to do a thing for its own sake. »

Schalk dwelt upon Bruckner's « German » artistic idealism ; he did not refer to the « Other » of German. Indeed, the « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » , the original audience for his address, included many Jews. This organization, which Theodor Helm likened, in 189, to « a miniature Bayreuth for Bruckner » , declined to support the anti-Semitic politics that began to pose a serious threat to Viennese Liberalism, in the 1880's.

According to the critic Josef Stolzing, the Society went so far as to force-out members like himself « who reminded the directorate whether, in a subtle or blunt manner, that Wagner was an anti-Semite until the end of his life » . Still, a covert anti-Semitism can be discerned in the reviews of so eminent and steadfast an associate as Hans Paumgartner, for as Stolzing's remark suggests, anti-Semitism was an inevitable part of the Wagnerian world-view. As is well-known, this often took the form of rejecting cultural traits considered « Jewish » , but accepting as « German » Jews who did not exhibit the objectionable traits : an ambiguous formulation that allowed for Jewish Wagnerites.

A group of young Wagnerites with a number of Jews in prominent positions had, in fact, envisioned and developed the emotional or « sharper-key » style of politics that later became a powerful tool of the anti-Semites. Under Engelbert Pernerstorfer's leadership, these Wagnerian idealists had espoused radical social reform and extreme German nationalism.

Pernerstorfer's circle initially backed Georg Ritter von Schönerer as their representative in Parliament, but that his fanatical anti-Semitism caused many of his followers, including Pernerstorfer himself, in June 1883, to fall away.

Schönerer eventually lost his right to participate in politics for 5 years after he and some associates assaulted the staff of the « Neues Wiener Tagblatt », in 1888, for issuing a premature report of the German « Kaiser »'s death. Following Schönerer's disgrace, the government cracked down on German-nationalist groups, and most of the Pan-Germans transferred their support, for the time being, to the candidates of the emerging Christian-Social Party.

Inquisitiveness and a fascination with the past were the target of Richard Wagner's attacks on Jews, whom he saw as reaching back into history, in order to compensate for a lack of originality. Yet, it was also the steady dominance of Jewish musicologists and thinkers that would further divide the Austro-German house between musical progressives and conservatives. On the one side, there was Eduard Hanslick and Heinrich Schenker, who held to the ideals of Classical sobriety and balance, along with the scholar Guido Adler, who chose to classify Wagner as a conservative, in stark contrast to the prevalent view of the time. The critic Robert Hirschfeld, a virtual contemporary of Adler, was seen by many as the leader of Vienna's anti-Mahler press. Nevertheless, Hirschfeld singled-out Anton Bruckner, rather than Johannes Brahms, as the culmination of abstract musical purity. It was the pupils and followers of these scholars and writers who would not only solidify Jewish support for musical tradition, but also provide a basis for progressive thinking. With Karl Goldmark, Robert Hirschfeld, Guido Adler and Julius Korngold, we see the dogmatic lines held by Hanslick rendered meaningless, as a new generation of Jews see in Wagner a composer who was not predominantly an anti-Semite but rather an artist who redefined the purpose of music. This conflict was made poignantly clear in the creation of 2 Richard Wagner Societies, in Vienna :

The Vienna Academic Wagner Society (« Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein ») was co-founded by Guido Adler.

And the competing New Wagner Society (« Neuer Richard-Wagner-Verein »), of which Anton Bruckner was made honorary president, that explicitly excluded Jews.

It was in this spirit of music, renewing its very purpose, that Karl Weigl, Alexander Zemlinsky and Arnold Schönberg founded the Society of Creative Musicians (« Vereinigung schaffender Tonkünstler »), in 1904, with Gustav Mahler as honorary president. In 1907, Mahler would defend Schönberg against hisses and boos at the premiere of the latter's 1st String Quartet, Opus 7, in the « Bösendorfersaal », while admitting privately that he was not sure what the music meant.

Guido Adler's invocations of chauvinistic rhetoric might be dismissed as a reflection of his youthful involvement with the Reading Society for German Students and the Viennese Academic Wagner Society. After all, his association with these groups preceded the publication of these essays by nearly a decade. The Reading Society was an organization dedicated to advancing an openly « graffdeutsch » cultural agenda in deliberate contradistinction to the supra-national vision of Austrian identity cultivated by Habsburg officialdom. The Wagner Society was, likewise, deeply concerned with national questions and with Wagner's contributions to the discourse on German cultural identity, in particular. In its early years, that Society published, in each of its annual reports, a single essay by one of its members addressing an issue of pressing concern for the organization as a whole. And in each of its 1st 3 years of operation, its featured essay considered Wagner's positions on German cultural nationhood. In its 1st annual report (1873), the Society published « Richard Wagner and the National Idea », in which the future gymnasium : teacher Adalbert Horawitz recounted Wagner's emerging consciousness of his German heritage during his years in Paris. The report for the following year featured the essay, « Richard Wagner and German Art », in which the architect Camillo Sitte argued that Wagner's music dramas had effected the « revival » (« Wiederbelebung ») and « re-awakening » (« Erwachen ») of German art by casting themes and images of German mythology in a modern guise. And, in 1875, Baron Hans von Wolzogen, in « German Folk Poetry as Foundation for a National Festival », described Wagner's Bayreuth Festival as a phenomenon equivalent, in its nation-building potential, to the political unification of Germany under Otto von Bismarck. Wolzogen argued that :

« The Festival is an echo of the victorious period of 1870 and 1871 in that it celebrates and portrays a united and energetic expression of the national spirit (“ Nationalgeist ”) and a powerful awareness of its nature and effects. »

Though Guido Adler was not among the authors of the essays published in these reports, he was, as a guiding member of the Society, certainly privy to the discussions from which they arose.

But while we might be tempted to account for Adler's lectures on Mozart, Bach, and Händel, by emphasizing his early associations with a figure like Wolzogen, we must remember that those lectures were written long after he had ceased active participation in both the Reading Society and the Wagner Society.

« Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein »

Am 02.02.1873 behördlich genehmigter Verein, der im Allgemeinen die Förderung der Reformbestrebungen Richard Wagners und im Speziellen die Aufführung von dessen Ring des Nibelungen in Bayreuth, Deutschland, im Auge hatte. Obwohl sich bereits 1871 ein Wagner Verein in Wien konstituiert hatte (1876 aufgelöst), der im Prinzip dieselben Ziele verfolgte, kam es 1872 zu einem Gründungsaufwurf für den Akademischer Wagner-Verein (Gründungsversammlung am 10.11.1872) durch Karl Goldmark, Johann von Herbeck, Otto Dessoff, Johann Hellmesberger der Ältere, G. Schönaich, Josef Standhartner und J. Lewinsky. Die Vereinsmitglieder rekrutierten sich vor allem aus dem Bürgertum und der Studentenschaft, wobei einige Mitglieder auch in führenden Funktionen in der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien beziehungsweise später in der Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft tätig waren. 1901 zählte man 227 ordentliche, 138 unterstützende und 20 Ehrenmitglieder. Zur Erreichung des Vereinszwecks wurden Konzerte (Bösendorfersaal, kleiner Musikvereinssaal), interne Musikabende und Vorträge veranstaltet, 1881 erfolgte die Gründung eines Vereinschors. Nach der erfolgreichen Und Andere des gesamten Rings (1876) erfolgte (1879) eine Neuorientierung des Vereins samt einer Statutenänderung, 1883 eine weitere Neugestaltung als Zweigverein des in Nürnberg, Deutschland, gegründeten Allgemeinen Richard Wagner Vereins. Vermehrt wurden nun auch die Werke Franz Liszts, Anton Bruckners (ab 1879) und Hugo Wolfs (ab 1887-1888) gepflegt, jedoch gelangten vereinzelt auch Kompositionen von Orlando di Lasso und Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina sowie aus dem Barock und der Wiener Klassik zur Aufführung. Ab 1898 finden sich weiters Namen wie Richard Strauß, Christian Sinding, Ludwig Thuille, Hans Pfitzner und Joseph Marx auf den Konzertprogrammen. Der Verein konnte in den 1880er Jahren jährlich zwischen 1.100 und 1.600 florin zur Unterstützung nach Bayreuth senden, später waren es dann meist rund 1.000 florin. Ab 1884 organisierte man Fahrten zu den Bayreuther Festspielen in Sonderzügen. Der Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein wurde 1939 durch die nationalsozialistischen Machthaber aufgelöst, sein Vermögen und Archiv ging an die Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. Als Nachfolgevereinigungen wurden 1951 der Richard Wagner Verband und die Österreichische Gesellschaft der Freunde von Bayreuth ins Leben gerufen, erstere besteht heute (2006) noch.

Als künstlerische Leiter des Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Vereins fungierten und andere Felix Mottl (1873-1880) , Johann Paumgartner (1880-1881) , Eduard Schütt (1881-1887) , Josef Schalk (ab 1887) und F. Foll (um 1902) . Prominente Mitglieder des Vereins waren und andere Anton Bruckner (ab 1873, 1885 Ehrenmitglied) , Gustav Mahler (1877-1879) , Hans Rott (1875-1879) , Guido Adler (1873-1875) und Ludwig Bösendorfer (Ehrenmitglied) .

When Ignaz Bösendorfer founded the company, in 1828, he was dedicated to the idea of creating the best piano instruments possible, no matter how long it took. His son, Ludwig, continued to pursue this vision.

The piano-maker Ludwig Bösendorfer was a keen traveller. He not only personally accompanied many artists, but also delivered his instruments in almost all the major concert halls of Europe. This, of course, developed lifetime friendships. Bösendorfer was recognized as a great benefactor not only in Vienna, but also in all artistic circles and cultural communities. His correspondence with Franz Liszt is famous ; Johannes Brahms was one of his personal friends ; Anton Bruckner and Johann Strauß received special awards at the plant piano-showroom, situated on « Graf-Starhemberg-Gasse 14 » .

« The perfection of a “ Bösendorfer ” exceeds my most ideal expectations. » (Franz Liszt)

« To my esteemed friend, the most perfect tarot player, the great Ludwig Bösendorfer, with pleasant memories. »

(Johann Strauß, 1897)

The « Requiem » (WAB 39) was written to memorialize Franz Sailer (Bruckner's brother Ignaz's godfather) , the notary of the Saint-Florian monastery, who bequeathed Bruckner his « Bösendorfer » grand piano (plus 1 harmonium, 1 small table and few chairs) . It seems that Sailer bought it during an exhibition held in a country house in Linz, in 1848. The « Requiem » was premiered on September 15, 1849, 1 year after Sailer's death.

Bösendorfer thought seriously of creating a railroad « Klaviersalonwagen » for travelling artists (complete with sleeping spaces and wings) .

In 1872, piano-maker Ludwig Bösendorfer (patron of the arts and one of the most colorful and original of Viennese personalities at the time) opened a new recital hall in the « Palais Liechtenstein » (on the site now occupied by the « Hochhaus » (skyscraper) , at 6-8 « Herrengasse ») . Its superb acoustics and its size (it seated just under 600 persons) made it an ideal venue for piano and song recitals, as well as for chamber music concerts, and many distinguished artists performed there, during the next 40 years. It opened on 19 November 1872 with a recital by Hans von Bülow ; the last chamber music concert was given there by the Rosé Quartet, on 9 November 1913. The building was demolished, soon afterward.

Johannes Brahms knew Ludwig Bösendorfer very well, not least because Bösendorfer, like himself, took a lively interest in the « Wiener Tonkünstlerverein » . Brahms was also very familiar with the recital hall. To cite just 3 memorable events, it was there, on 5 April 1892, that he was enchanted by Alice Barbi's rendition of his songs ; it was also there that he accompanied her, at her farewell concert on 21 December 1893 (in March 1898, she would sing a number of his songs, there, for the benefit of the Brahms Monument Fund) ; and it was at the « Bösendorfer-Saal » that he had one of his rare meetings with Franz Liszt, on the occasion of Bülow's all-Brahms recital, on 2 February 1882. According to Max Kalbeck (in 1876) , Brahms often listened to concerts at the « Bösendorfer-Saal » from a seat placed for him in an attic, which he could reach and leave without being observed.

When the Viennese architect Adolf Loos (1870-1933) published « Das Mysterium der Akustik » (The Mystery of Acoustics) , as a newspaper article in January 1912, he pleaded for the preservation of Vienna's « Bösendorfer » Hall from the standpoint that a reconstruction elsewhere would never reproduce the acoustic qualities of this concert-hall on « Herrengasse, 6 » , in Vienna's city center :

« I was asked whether the “ Bösendorfer-Saal ” should be preserved. I presume what prompted the question was the idea that reverence for the past demands we should not demolish a hall that has played such an important role in the musical history of Vienna. But it is not a question of reverence for the past, it is a question of acoustics. »

In 1872, Ludwig Bösendorfer, piano-maker, patron of the arts, and one of the most colorful and original of Viennese personalities at the time, had taken over the equestrian stables of the « Palais Liechtenstein » and had converted the riding-school into a concert-hall of nearly 600 seats. The discipline of architectural acoustics did not yet exist as such and was more of a trial-and-error approach, at 1st.

Bösendorfer himself (wearing his inimitable top-hat while riding a pony and listening to his friend shout from the other end of the hall) decided on the position of new interior walls and, during construction, moved the rear wall 3 times, until the acoustics satisfied his ear. The large windows, that remained over the newly added wooden siding in the hall, were reminiscent of the previous life of the building ; while the hall itself was not spectacular, its dimensions and surfaces were chosen with care.

The concert-hall, in the converted riding stable, gained a reputation as an outstanding venue and, at the time, even became Vienna's most popular concert-hall. It was praised for « its beautiful simplicity, which made a “ very intimate, yet, noble impression ” and contributed to the “ inner collection of listeners ” ». Accounts of the time pleaded that the hall was of the same significance as Vienna's « Großer Musikvereinssaal », yet, exceeded its acoustics. The success of this daring challenge to one of Europe's prime concert halls might have been the result of subjective judgment ; however, the list of musicians who performed in the « Bösendorfer » Hall reads like the « Who's Who » of the European music scene of the time, among them :

Pianists Anton Rubinstein, Franz Liszt, Moriz Rosenthal, Eugène d'Albert, Johannes Brahms, Ignaz Jan Paderewski, Bruno Walter, Teresa Carreño, Emil von Sauer, Artur Schnabel, Ernst von Dohnanyi, Béla Bartók, and Edvard Grieg.

Violinists Pablo de Sarasate and Georg Hellmesberger.

Composers Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Hugo Wolf, Max Reger, Gustav Mahler, and Richard Strauß.

And many more.

In « The Mystery of Acoustics », an enthusiastic plea for the conservation of the concert-hall, Loos expressed his skepticism over the new science of architectural acoustics. It was a wide-spread belief, at the time, that the acoustic performance of a space could not be calculated or predicted, because music was not a technical discipline but rather an art form. At the turn of the 19th Century, physical acoustics were not integrated into architectural practice - if at all, acoustics were determined empirically. The idea that reverberation time could be calculated with a formula, based on dimensions and surfaces of a space, must have seemed to many a modern fashion rather than a law of nature :

« Until now, every new hall has had poor acoustics. Have our ears changed ? No, it is the material the hall is made from that has changed. For 40 years, the material has absorbed good music and has been impregnated with the sound of the Philharmonic and the voices of our singers. There are mysterious changes in molecular structure which, until now, have only been observed in the wood violins are made of. »

According to Loos, the building material and its tuning, over time, are essential to the acoustic performance of any space - therefore, mere copies of the geometry of famous concert halls must be doomed to fail.

In Loos' reasoning, the high-quality of music to which those walls were exposed, over the course of time, was responsible for the outstanding acoustic performance. He believed that, like the wooden body of a string instrument, a concert-hall can never sound perfect from « Day 1 » ; the depth of the walls of a concert-hall « soak-up » (or « absorb ») the music being played and are « impregnated » by the singing voices, over time. He suggested « mysterious changes in molecular structure » that defied scientific explanations (until today) . In the case of Vienna's « Bösendorfer » Hall, music resounded on masonry walls under the heavily loaded floor slab of the library above, with no need of adjustments by sound absorbers. When Loos praised the acoustic performance from the depth of the bare walls, he over-looked the fact that the « Bösendorfer » Hall was said to perform at its best when 2/3's occupied, which equals the absorbing body surface of 400 people in the audience.

Up to its closing, in 1913, piano-maker Ludwig Bösendorfer also headed the 2nd most important concert-hall in Vienna, located in the « Palais Liechtenstein » 's former riding stables on « Herrengasse, 6-8 » , in the 1st District. The « Herrengasse » used to consist almost exclusively of noble palaces, though some were lost during the course of time. One of the Liechtenstein palaces, located at « Herrengasse 8 » , housed the famous « Bösendorfer-Konzertsaal » , a concert-hall established in 1872. The palace was ripped down and replaced by a modernistic high-rise building, in 1913.

« Bösendorfer » Hall, acclaimed for its good acoustics and with a seating capacity of just under 600 persons, was inaugurated on 19 November 1872 by one of the great pianists of his time, Hans von Bülow. All the top names in the concert world around the turn of the 19th Century performed in that hall. Over 4,500 concerts were performed.

The most brilliant names of the time are heard repeatedly in the « Bösendorfer-Saal » :

Eugène d'Albert, Wilhelm Backhaus, Béla Bartók, Johannes Brahms, Ferruccio Busoni, Teresa Carreño, Ernst von Dohnányi, Julius Epstein, Edvard Grieg, Alfred Grünfeld, Josef Hellmesberger Junior, Georg Hellmesberger, Wilhelm Kienzl, Fritz Kreisler, Frederic Lamond, Theodor Leschitzky, Franz Liszt, Ferdinand Löwe, Gustav Mahler, Sophie Menter, Felix Mottl, Ignaz Jan Paderewski, Hans Paumgartner, Max Reger, Peter Rosegger, Moritz Rosenthal, Anton Rubinstein, Arthur Rubinstein, Pablo de Sarasate, Emil von Sauer, Josef Schalk, Artur Schnabel, Richard Strauß, Bruno Walter, Richard Wagner, Felix von Weingartner, Hugo Wolf, Franz Zottmann. Also, the Brussels String Quartet and the Dohnanyi-Marteau-Hugo Beckner Trio.

The importance that the hall had throughout Ludwig Bösendorfer's lifetime was signified in the fact that he retained his position as head of « Bösendorfer » Hall after selling the family business to banker Carl Hutterstraße, in 1909 - Bösendorfer himself had no off-spring. The demolition of the complex, in 1913, due to construction activities was hard on him personally. The piano-building genius died a few years later, in May of 1919.

Ignaz Bösendorfer was born in Vienna, on 28 July 1796, just as the Archduchy of Austria, one of the most important states within the Holy Roman Empire, was undergoing dramatic changes. By this time, Vienna had already been established as the centre of the musical world influenced by the music of Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert all who lived during his lifetime.

Bösendorfer grew-up and prospered in a Vienna that remained the center of the Habsburg Monarchy and, later, the capital of the Austrian Empire. He was the son of a Master carpenter and, in time, he studied at the Academy of Fine-Arts, a school well-regarded for its education of painters, sculptors and architects. Ignaz gradually became respected for his musicality and technical competence and, as such in 1815, was sent to the work for the well-known piano builder Joseph Brodmann (born in 1763 ; died on 13 May 1848) .

Brodmann began his career in the carpentry trade then, in 1783, came to Vienna to work as an apprentice of the well-known piano builder Frederick Hoffmann. So, Ignaz would represent, at least, a 3rd generation of experienced craftsmen making pianos and organs. Working for the Brodmann company, since age 19, he learned about the trade and about it's business aspects. After more than a dozen years working there, with 500 « Gulden » , Ignaz acquired Brodmann's workshops and the « Bösendorfer » piano company was established on 25 July 1828.

Under Ignaz leadership, the company developed many innovations that put the « Bösendorfer » name on the world map of musical instruments makers and, later, on the fore-front of piano technology.

Ignaz became acquainted with an even larger circle of world-class pianists and conductors including Anton Bruckner, Johann Strauß, Richard Strauß, Arnold Schönberg, and Gustav Mahler. But it was composer and pianist Ferruccio Busoni who suggested Bösendorfer to develop what would become the « Imperial Bösendorfer » piano.

Pianists who came to reply on his pianos included Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Anton Rubinstein and Hans von Bülow.

Bösendorfer became a benefactor of new and coming talent, and pianists become friends and customers of Bösendorfer. By the mid- 1800's, the company had outgrown its original location and construction of a new facility in Vienna commenced. But Ignaz would not live to see it completed as he died on 14 April 1859, in Vienna.

The firm « Bösendorfer » was founded, in 1828, by Ignaz Bösendorfer (1796-1859) . Franz Liszt's approval of its instruments brought it international fame and, in 1830, the firm was granted the title « Kaiserlicher und Königlicher Hof- und Kammerklavierverfertiger » (Imperial and Royal Court and Chamber Piano Manufacturer) . Ignaz's son, Ludwig Bösendorfer (1835-1919) , took-over the business in 1859, bringing the company to its highest point of achievement with the distinctive Viennese action of its (largely grand) pianos, and resisting the mass-production methods of other manufacturers.

...

Ignaz son, Ludwig Bösendorfer, was born on 28 July 1835, in Vienna. Ludwig came to work for his father after studying from 1850 to 1852 at the Imperial-Royal Polytechnic Institute (now, the « Wiener Polytechnischen Institut ») , one of the major Universities in Vienna. After the death of his father, in 1859, Ludwig headed the operations just as the new Schottentor factory came on line. Notable improvements to piano technology continued to be developed including, in 1859, the design of improved piano action mechanism that permitted a higher speed of the hammer head. Bösendorfer introduced the cast iron frame and overstrung scale (cross-stringing) that contribute significantly to the brilliant and, yet, supple « Bösendorfer » sound. By 1866, Ludwig was earning the formal appreciation of the monarchy with titles including « Supplier of the Court » (« Hoflieferantentitel ») . The « Bösendorfer » pianos earned high acclaim at World Fairs and, soon, the Russian Tsar and the Japanese Emperor Meiji owned « Bösendorfer » pianos.

...

In 1860, the firm moved to its new factory on the « Türkenstraße » , in the 9th district of Vienna (« Alsergrund ») , which had a concert-hall attached. But the « Bösendorfer » piano factory soon became too small.

In 1870, the business is moved again. The manufacturing side is relocated in a new factory building (which is still being used today) on « Graf-Starhemberg-Gasse 14 » , in Vienna's 4th District (« Wieden » , 1040 Wien) .

The retail side (office and showrooms) are moved to the center of the city, in the 1st district (« Innere Stadt ») , at the « Palais Liechtenstein » on « Herrengasse 6 » .

In 1870, Bösendorfer expanded to even larger production facilities that remain as current headquarters at « Graf-Starhemberg-Gasse, 14 » , in Vienna. In 1872, a concert by Hans von Bülow inaugurated the original « Bösendorfer » Hall, a concert-hall that became famous for its excellent acoustics that would be visited by many famous artists until it was demolished, in 1913.

...

Because he loves horses, Ludwig Bösendorfer (patron of the arts and one of the most colorful and original of Viennese personalities at the time) often visits the riding-school of Prince Liechtenstein where he notices that the walls of the academy have remarkable acoustics. This awareness, together with his profound musical interests, motivates him to persuade Prince Liechtenstein that in the interests of music and the arts the riding-school should and could become a concert-hall. Through personal interviews, Bösendorfer succeeds in overcoming the Prince's basic objections.

In 1872, the conversion into a concert-hall is accomplished. Hans von Bülow has the honour of inaugurating the « Bösendorfer-Saal » with a piano recital, on November 19, 1872.

In 1889, the 1st winner of the « Bösendorfer » Piano Competition was awarded a premium piano, a traditional competition that continues to this day !

As foreseen by Ludwig, the excellent acoustics of the « Bösendorfer » Hall creates immense excitement. It will be Vienna's most highly-prized halls for solo recitals and chamber music, until its demolition in 1913, to make way for a larger building project. During this time, more than 4,500 concerts take place.

Ludwig Bösendorfer, along with his concert grands, travels with Franz Liszt and Anton Rubinstein, on many of their tours. During the long train rides, the 3 often play cards. Once, Bösendorfer cannot accompany them because he is ill and confined to bed. Using the ace-of-hearts as a postcard, Liszt and Rubinstein send get-well wishes. His request for a private railway car, with music and sleeping rooms for travelling artists, is refused by the directors of Austrian State Railroad.

1869 : The Conservatory of the Society of Friends of Music moves to new quarters in Vienna, and Bösendorfer presents 14 new grand pianos to the school. Also, every year, the most talented graduate of the piano-class is given a new grand piano, free ! In the form of a competition that takes place every 2 years, this tradition lives on today.

During these years, Ludwig Bösendorfer is known as one of the most colorful and original of Viennese personalities. He is a true promoter of Viennese musical life. All Vienna knows him with his inimitable top-hat. The caricaturists like him very much !

Ludwig Bösendorfer is not only one of the most respected citizens of Vienna, but also an extremely popular figure. His leisure hours are devoted to horses and coach-driving in the « Prater » but, on the « Praterstern » , he regularly leaves his coach and drives with a cab to the office :

« It is not proper for a piano-maker to drive in a coach about the city like a cavalier ! »

The « Bösendorfer » piano gains the respect of every artists on the continent. Custom made instruments are manufactured for the Court of the Emperor Franz-Josef I, the Imperial Country Residence at Bad Ischl, for the Empress Elisabeth, and for many Austrian archduchesses and archdukes ; for the Empress Eugénie of France, the Emperor of Japan, the Tsar of Russia, and other prominent personalities.

For the time being, Vienna's musical world is divided. The « Traditionalists » , who are against Richard Wagner, oppose the « New-Germans » (who are pro-Wagner) . Anton Bruckner and Johannes Brahms, who adopted Vienna as their home, become involved in the argument, and they stand in opposite camps.

The 1st important performances of Bruckner's Symphonic works took place in the Viennese Academic Wagner Society (« Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein ») , co-founded in 1873 by Guido Adler.

In their so-called « Internal Evenings » and weekly meetings, Bruckner's Symphonies are performed in arrangements for piano (2 or 4 hands) mostly in the « Bösendorfer-Saal » . The pianists, in charge at these events, were :

Hans Paumgartner, Felix Mottl, Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann, and Ferdinand Löwe.

1909 : Ludwig Bösendorfer, who has no direct descendents, is looking for a successor to take-over the firm. He sells the business to his friend Carl Hutterstraßer who continues on in the same spirit. During the years 1913-1914, just before World War I, production reaches a new high. 434 instruments leave the factory. In 1913, the firm is struck a heavy blow. The « Bösendorfer-Saal » must be torn down to make way for a large project. In farewell concerts, the Viennese public takes sad leave of the popular concert-hall. All attempts to retain it failed and, on October 5, 1912, the last concert season opens, featuring d'Albert, Backhaus, Busoni, the Brussels String Quartet, Dohnanyi-Marteau-Hugo Beckner Trio, Grünfeld, Lamond, von Sauer, and many other notable artists. On May 2, 1913, the Rosé-Quartet performs Beethoven's String Quartet in F Major ; Schubert's String Quintet in C Major ; and Michael Haydn's « Variations on the National Anthem » . As the last tones die, the public withdraws in silence and the doors of « Bösendorfer Hall » are closed forever.

« In my own day, we acted no more rationally when the so-called “ Bösendorfer-Saal ” was torn down. In itself, that little concert-hall, which was reserved exclusively for chamber music, was a modest building, not suggesting any great artistic distinction. It had been Prince Liechtenstein's riding-school, and was adapted for musical purposes only by the addition of interior boarding, without any ostentation. But it had the resonance of an old violin, and it was a sacred place to music-lovers because Chopin and Brahms, Liszt and Rubinstein had given recitals there, and many of the famous quartets had 1st performed in this hall. And now, it was to make way for a new purpose-built concert-hall ; such a thing was beyond the understanding of those of us who had spent many memorable hours there. When the last bars of Beethoven died away, played better than ever by the Rosé Quartet, none of the audience left their seats. We shouted and applauded, some of the women were sobbing with emotion, no one was willing to admit that this was goodbye. The lights in the hall were extinguished to clear us out of the place. Still none of the four or five hundred people present left their seats. We stayed for half-an-hour, an hour, as if our presence could save the sacred hall by force. »

(Stefan Zweig, « The World of Yesterday »)

The firm acquires new offices in the « Musikverein » Building, in the heart of Vienna's music quarter.

The First World War takes its toll. Production sinks to 136 instruments during the 1st year of the War. The War and the destruction of his beloved concert-hall are too much for Ludwig Bösendorfer. He dies in 1919. In his will, Bösendorfer directs that his body was to be driven to cemetery on a simple piano-carriage and buried, in perfect silence, before the notice of his death is published. Only Carl Hutterstraßer, the vice-president of the « Society of Friends of Music » , Doctor Ernst Kraus, and Bösendorfer's personal attendants are to be present at the burial. There are to be no flowers, wreaths, announcements of death, funeral speeches. Even the gravestone has to bear nothing more than the name, « Ludwig » , and the year of his death. As heir to his property, he leaves a foundation entitled :

« Ludwig Bösendorfer Foundation of the Society of Friends of Music of Vienna »

The revenue from this is to enable the Society to « permanently and ideally support and promote music » .

Unfortunately, the subsequent destruction of the Austrian Crown makes this sensitive gesture ineffective.

Der Bösendorfersaal war ein von 1872 bis 1913 im Palais Liechtenstein (1. Bezirk, ehemals Herrengasse 6-8) bestehender Konzertsaal in Wien.

Ludwig Bösendorfer eröffnete 1872 durch die Umgestaltung der fürstlichen Reitschule den Konzertsaal im Palais und übernahm in der Folge auch dessen Leitung. Der eher schmucklose Saal bot 588 Personen Platz und wurde wegen seiner hervorragenden Akustik sehr geschätzt. Er galt zu seiner Zeit als einer der wichtigsten Konzertsäle von Wien. Das Eröffnungskonzert am 19. November 1872 wurde von Hans von Bülow bestritten, weitere berühmte hier auftretende Künstler waren und andere

Eugène d'Albert, Wilhelm Backhaus, Béla Bartók, Johannes Brahms, Ferruccio Busoni, Teresa Carreño, Ernst von Dohnányi, Julius Epstein, Edvard Grieg, Alfred Grünfeld, Josef Hellmesberger Junior, Georg Hellmesberger, Wilhelm Kienzl, Fritz Kreisler, Frederic Lamond, Theodor Leschitzky, Franz Liszt, Ferdinand Löwe, Gustav Mahler, Sophie Menter, Felix Mottl, Ignaz Jan Paderewski, Hans Paumgartner, Max Reger, Peter Rosegger, Moritz Rosenthal, Anton Rubinstein, Arthur Rubinstein, Pablo de Sarasate, Emil von Sauer, Josef Schalk, Artur Schnabel, Richard Strauß, Bruno Walter, Richard Wagner, Felix von Weingartner, Hugo Wolf, Franz Zottmann. Bis zur Schließung mit einem Konzert des Rosé-Quartetts am 9. November 1913 wurden hier etwa 4.500 Konzerte gegeben.

Das Palais wurde in der Folgezeit abgerissen, um den Baugrund kommerziell verwerten zu können. Das Areal blieb allerdings fast zwei Jahrzehnte unverbaut, erst ab 1931 wurde darauf das Hochhaus Herrengasse errichtet. Am Gebäude erinnert eine Gedenktafel an den ehemaligen Standort des Bösendorfersaales.

Stefan Zweig beschreibt in seinen Memoiren « Die Welt von Gestern » in bewegenden Worten das letzte Konzert und den emotionalen Abschied der Musikenthusiasten von « ihrem » Saal :

(Stefan Zweig, « Die Welt von Gestern »)

Im selben Jahr wurden die Konzertsäle des Wiener Musikvereins fertiggestellt. Bösendorfer spendete der Gesellschaft vierzehn seiner Flügel. Dafür wurde er zum Ehrenmitglied ernannt und später in die Direktion berufen. Die Straße vor dem Musikvereinsgebäude heißt heute Bösendorferstraße.

Seine Erzeugnisse zeigte Bösendorfer mit großem Erfolg auf mehreren Weltausstellungen. Er galt seither als bester Klavierfabrikant Österreichs. Er belieferte nicht nur den österreichischen Hof in Wien und die Residenz in Bad Ischl, sondern auch den russischen Zaren und den japanischen Meiji-Kaiserhof. 1871 bezog er eine größere Produktionsstätte und verlegte den Verkauf in das damalige Palais Liechtenstein an der Herrengasse, dessen Reitschule er in den 1872 mit einem Konzert von Hans von Bülow eingeweihten Bösendorfer Saal umwandelte. Der Bösendorfer Saal war für seine hervorragende Akustik bekannt, hier spielten zahlreiche bekannte Künstler auf Bösendorfer-Flügeln.

Obwohl er zweimal verheiratet war, hatte Ludwig Bösendorfer keine Nachkommen. 1909 verkaufte er das Unternehmen an einen seiner Freunde, den Bankier Karl Hutterstraße, der im Jahre 1910 den Kaiserlich und Königlich Hof- und Kammerlieferantentitel erhielt.

Der Abriss des Palais Liechtenstein und der Säle sowie der Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges belasteten die Gesundheit Bösendorfers. Er starb 1919 kurz nach Ende des Krieges. Ludwig Bösendorfer ruht in einem ehrenhalber gewidmeten Grab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (17B-I-10) .

In seinem Todesjahr 1919 wurde in Wien Innere Stadt (1. Bezirk) die Bösendorferstraße nach ihm benannt.

« Immer wieder ertappten wir uns nach dem Abbruch des Bösendorfer-Saales, daß wir in Gedanken durch den dunklen Torbogen gingen, über dem, von zwei bescheidenen Glühlampen erhellt, in kleinen Goldbuchstaben das Wort ‚Bösendorfer‘ zu lesen war. »

Die « Welt von gestern » , festgehalten von Max Graf, dem großen, noblen Connaisseur der Wiener Musik. In seinem Erinnerungsbuch « Jede Stunde war erfüllt » setzt Graf dem « alten Bösendorfer » ein Denkmal.

Dieses Geschlecht ging 1914 unter. Der Abbruch des Bösendorfer-Saals war ein Fanal dafür.

Mit dem Aufstieg der Klavierproduktion und der großen Anzahl von in Wien ansässigen Klavierbauern entstanden auch zahlreiche Konzertsäle, sogenannt Klaviersalons (Bösendorfer, Haslinger, Schweighofer, Streicher) . Der 1872 eröffnete

Bösendorfersaal (Wien I, Herrngasse, in der ehemaligen Reitschule des Palais Liechtenstein) stand bis 1913 vor allem für Kammermusikproduktionen zur Verfügung und zeichnete sich durch eine außerordentliche Akustik aus.

Um 1443 kaufte Christoph von Liechtenstein auf dem Gebiet zwischen dem Michaelerplatz und der Wallnerstrasse ein Haus und vergrößerte dies bald durch weitere Zukäufe in der Nachbarschaft. Die Gebäude blieben in Liechtenstein'schem Besitz und wurden im 17. Jahrhundert abermals erweitert durch Zukäufe. Um 1792 wurde Josef Hardtmuth von Fürst Alois Liechtenstein beauftragt, den Gebäudekomplex zu einem einzigen Palast umzubauen. Es war ein spektakuläres Gebäude mit 17 Fensterachsen. Im Palais befand sich eine große Bibliothek, welche in ganz Wien als eine der beachtenswertesten galt. Eine weitere Besonderheit im Palais Liechtenstein war der Bösendorfer Saal, zu welchem der Klavierbauer Ludwig Bösendorfer um 1842 die Liechtenstein'sche Reitschule umbauen liess. Namhafte Komponisten gaben hier ihre Konzerte.

Im Jahre 1912 wurde der Palastkomplex abgerissen, und das Grundstück lag über 20 Jahre als klaffendes Loch im Stadtbild da. Erst in den 30er Jahren entstand darauf das Hochhaus an der Herrngasse, ein unattraktives Bauwerk, welches damals jedoch eine absolute Neuheit in Wien darstellte.

An der geplanten Baustelle des Hochhauses Herrngasse befand sich bis zu dessen Abriss 1913 ein Palais der Familie Liechtenstein, dessen angrenzende Reitschule 1872 in den berühmten Bösendorfer Konzertsaal umgebaut wurde (eine Plakette, angebracht an der Ecke des Hochhauses zur Fahngasse, erinnert noch heute daran) .

So kam es, daß die musikkaffinen und den alten Stadtkern liebenden Wiener skeptisch bis traurig waren, als der Liechtensteinsche Besitz am 10. April 1913 an ein Konsortium, bestehend aus der Österreichischen Aktiengesellschaft für Bauunternehmungen und der Österreichischen Credit-Anstalt für Handel und Gewerbe, verkauft und erste Pläne über die Errichtung eines modernen, luxuriösen Hotels öffentlich wurden.

Besonders schwer fiel den Wienern der Abschied vom erwähnten Bösendorfer Konzertsaal, welcher wegen seiner berühmten Akustik in den wenigen Jahrzehnten seines Bestehens zu einem der musikalischen Zentren Wiens wurde. Das letzte Konzert fand am 2. Mai 1913 statt und wurde von dem Schriftsteller Stefan Zweig in seinem Erinnerungswerk « Die Welt von Gestern » ausführlich und wehmutsvoll beschrieben :

Ludwig Bösendorfer, am 10. April 1835 als Ignaz' älterer Sohn geboren, ausgebildet nicht nur im väterlichen Betrieb, sondern auch in der kommerziellen und technischen Abteilung des Kaiserlich-Königlich Polytechnischen Institutes, übernahm 1859 die Klavierfabrik.

1860 fand der Umzug statt. Im neuen Fabrikgebäude befand sich auch ein Konzertsaal für 200 Personen. Im gleichen Jahr erhielt Bösendorfer ein Patent für eine von ihm erfundene Klaviermechanik, 1862 stellte Bösendorfer seinen privilegierten « Patentflügel » in London aus und erhielt prompt eine Auszeichnung. 1867 gelang ihm bei der Weltausstellung in Paris allein schon aufgrund der prachtvollen äußeren Gestaltung seiner Flügel ein so großer Erfolg, daß sich Kaiserin Elisabeth, selbst Besitzerin eines eigens für sie geschaffenen Flügels im « Ringstraßenstil », entschloss, Kaiserin Eugenie einen von Theophil Hansen entworfenen Flügel zum Geschenk zu machen.

Die Pariser Weltausstellung brachte Bösendorfer Weltruf ein und das Unternehmen expandierte. Hongkong, Rio, Stockholm, Japan (der Tenno, der japanische Kaiser, erhielt von Österreich 1869 einen Bösendorfer - Flügel geschenkt, der sich bis heute im kaiserlichen Schloß in Tokyo befindet) waren die Verkaufsstationen und neuen Geschäftsbeziehungen.

Die alte Fabrik war wieder zu klein geworden. Im Jahr 1870 kaufte Bösendorfer das bereits bestehende Gebäude in der Graf-Starhembergasse 14 im vierten Bezirk Wiens. Das Büro und die Ausstellungsräume zogen in die Innenstadt Wiens, in das Palais Liechtenstein in der Herrengasse Nummer 6. In diesem Palais hatte auch Ludwig Bösendorfer seine Privatwohnung.

Weil er Pferde liebte, besuchte Ludwig Bösendorfer oft die Reitschule des Fürsten Liechtenstein, und er bemerkte, daß einer der Pferdeställe eine erstaunlich gute Akustik hatte. Dieses Bewusstsein zusammen mit seinen profunden musikalischen Fähigkeiten veranlassten ihn, den Fürsten zu überreden, den Stall der Musik und Kunst zu widmen und so wurde ein Konzertsaal daraus, der 1872 fertig gestellt wurde.

Hans von Bülow, Liszts Schwiegersohn, eröffnete den Bösendorfer-Saal am 19. November 1872 mit einem Konzert. Wie von Bösendorfer vorgesehen, erregte die hervorragende Akustik der Halle ungeheure Aufmerksamkeit und wurde für mehr als 40 Jahre der meist frequentierte Saal für Kammermusik in Wien. Während dieser Zeit fanden rund 4.000 Konzerte in der Halle statt.

Die Liste der Namen der Künstler, die dort auftraten, ist bis heute ein « Who is who » der Konzertwelt um die Jahrhundertwende : Franz Liszt, Pablo de Sarasate, Ferruccio Busoni, Ignacy Paderewski, Johannes Brahms, Max Reger, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler und viele andere bekannte Künstler. Leider wurde im Mai 1913 das ganze Palais Liechtenstein abgerissen, auch die Halle - und « toute Vienne » trauerte.

Während dieser Zeit reiste Ludwig Bösendorfer gemeinsam mit seinem Konzertflügel und begleitete viele Pianisten wie Franz Liszt und Anton Rubinstein auf ihren Tourneen. Sein Antrag für einen privaten Eisenbahnwaggon mit Musik- und Schlafräumen für Künstler, wurde von den Direktoren der kaiserlichen Staatsbahn zurückgewiesen.

Im Jahre 1869 ist das Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Wiener Musikfreunde in das berühmte Gebäude des jetzigen Musikvereins am Karlsplatz umgezogen. Bösendorfer spendete 14 neue Flügel an die Gesellschaft. Von diesem Zeitpunkt an wurde er ein lebenslanges Mitglied des Board of Directors der Gesellschaft, ein Grund dafür, daß im Jahr 1913 Ludwig Bösendorfer den so genannten Stadtsalon im Musikverein eröffnete. Im Jahre 1873, anlässlich der Weltausstellung in Wien, wurde Bösendorfer durch den Besuch des Kaisers Franz-Josef geehrt. Die jährliche Produktion seiner Klaviere erhöhte sich auf 288, was die absolute Spitze in dieser Zeit in Österreich darstellte. Im Jahr 1883 hat das Klavier Nummer 10.000 das Werk verlassen, zu den Kunden dieser Zeit zählten Kaiserin Elisabeth, Zar Nikolaus II. von Russland, die Erzherzöge Eugen und Rudolf, die Töchter des Kaisers Gisela und Valerie, Fürstin Pauline von Metternich, und und und.

In der Folge gehörte es zum Prestige der neureichen Bürgerschicht, die es sich leisten konnte, nach hochadeligem Vorbild einen Bösendorfer zu besitzen.

In diesen Jahren wurde Ludwig Bösendorfer als eine der buntesten und originellsten Persönlichkeiten des alten Wien berühmt. Er wurde zu einem wahren Promoter des Wiener Musiklebens. Alle Wiener kannten ihn, mit seinem unnachahmlichen Hut und seinem gelben Mantel. Er war nicht nur einer der angesehensten Bürger Wiens, sondern auch eine äußerst populäre Figur. Seine Klaviere gewannen mittlerweile den Respekt jedes Künstlers auf dem Kontinent. Zum Beispiel wünschte Johannes Brahms immer eines seiner Klaviere während seiner Sommer-Aufführungen in ganz Österreich, und Johann Strauß kaufte einen Bösendorfer für seine Wiener Wohnung in der Praterstraße, das man auch heute noch in seinem Museum bewundern kann. Gustav Mahler wurde von Bösendorfer während seiner Studienjahre in Wien mit einem kostenlosen Flügel unterstützt.

Obwohl zweimal verheiratet, hatte Bösendorfer keine Kinder. Seine Ehefrauen starben vor ihm und so beschloss er, die Fabrik im Jahre 1909 an seinen privaten Freund Carl Hutterstraßer zu verkaufen. Dieser war Bankier, kein Klavierbauer, sondern ein Mensch, der alles Notwendige wusste, um die Ideen von Ludwig Bösendorfer in den Bereichen Marketing fortzusetzen und die hohe Qualität der Instrumente aufrecht zu erhalten.

Der Ausbruch des ersten Weltkrieges, die Demolierung seines Saales, das ständige Alleinsein veranlassten Bösendorfer 1914, sein Testament zu schreiben, in dem er neben großzügigen Spenden an Künstler, Institutionen und seinem Personal, den gesamten Nachlaß der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde vermachte. Er bestimmte, ohne Pomp und Aufwand auf einem Klavierwagen zum Zentralfriedhof gefahren zu werden und seinen Tod bis zu seinem Begräbnis geheim zu halten.

Am 9. Mai 1919 war es dann soweit. Er wurde in aller Stille beigesetzt, mit Ausnahme der Familie Hutterstraßer und des Direktors der « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Wien, Doktor Ernst Kraus, war niemand anwesend, auch gab es keine Blumen und Reden. Auf seinem Grabstein standen nur der Name Ludwig Bösendorfer und seine Jahreszahlen. Mit der Umbettung in ein Ehrengrab der Stadt Wien wurde diesem seinen letzten Wunsch dann nicht mehr Rechnung getragen.

Am 25. Juli 1828 erhielt Ignaz Bösendorfer (unter der Gewerbeverleihungsnummer 225 669) das Recht, sich in Wien als Bürger niederzulassen, als Klaviermachermeister tätig zu sein und Steuern zu zahlen.

Diese nüchterne Erlaubnis steht am Beginn einer großen und glanzvollen Geschichte eines Hauses, das nicht nur mit der musikalischen Entwicklung Wiens im 19. und 20. Jahrhundert aufs engste verbunden ist, sondern auch als einziger Klavierbaubetrieb ununterbrochen bis auf den heutigen Tag die Wiener Klavierbautradition hochhält, fortführt und weiterentwickelt.

Ignaz Bösendorfer, 1794 in Wien als Sohn eines Tischlermeisters geboren, verbrachte seine Lehrjahre in der Firma des damals sehr bekannten Klavierbauers Joseph Brodmann (1763-1848). Hier profilierte er sich rasch, bereits 1815 bekam er von der Wiener Akademie der Bildenden Künste den ersten Preis Ornamentalzeichnung verliehen. Dies ist umso bemerkenswerter, wenn man bedenkt, daß zur gleichen Zeit in Wien die großen Klavierbauer Nanette und Johann Andreas Streicher, Johann Schantz, Anton Walter, Conrad Graf und Michael Schweighofer wirkten, also große Konkurrenten von Joseph Brodmann.

Qualität setzt sich durch : 1828 übernahm Bösendorfer mit einem Startkapital von 500 Gulden den Betrieb, hinterließ Brodmann doch bei seinem Tod im Jahr 1848 125.000 Gulden. Klaviere waren zur Biedermeierzeit besonders als Hausmusikinstrumente gefragt, die Kaiserstadt Wien galt als eines der hervorragenden Zentren des europäischen Klavierbaues, und so wundert es nicht, daß zu Zeiten der beginnenden Selbstständigkeit Bösendorfers 387 Personen in Wien im Klavierbau beschäftigt waren.

Von anfänglich vier Instrumenten Jahresproduktion steigerte Bösendorfer bis etwa 1835 die Produktion bereits auf 200. Das nachweislich älteste Instrument aus dieser Anfangszeit ist die Opusnummer 4, ein Tafelklavier, das sich heute in der Sammlung Alter Musikinstrumente im Kunsthistorischen Museum zu Wien in der Hofburg befindet und in der Ausstellung zu sehen ist.

1839 war ein großes Jahr für die junge Klavierfabrik : Bösendorfers Klaviere erhielten die Goldmedaille der Industrieausstellung in Wien, Ignaz selbst wurde durch Dekret Kaiser Ferdinands I. « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofklavierverfertiger » , ein Titel, der vorher noch keinem österreichischen Klavierbauer zuteil wurde.

Dieser Titel förderte das Geschäft : die Exporte Bösendorferscher Klaviere steigerten sich, Länder wie Deutschland, England, Italien, Russland, Brasilien und Ägypten, um nur einige zu nennen, waren Abnehmer des immer bekannter werdenden Produktes. Die Stückzahl der erzeugten Instrumente wuchs bis Ende 1850 auf mehr als 3.000.

1842 gelang Ignaz Bösendorfer auch der Durchbruch auf dem Konzertpodium : Anton Rubinstein spielte anlässlich einer Konzertreihe im alten Musikvereinsaal in den Wiener Tuchlauben sein erstes Konzert auf einem Stein-Flügel, der aber in der Presse schlechte Kritiken erhielt. Er wechselte dann auf ein Bösendorfer-Klavier, das in den Zeitungen höchste Lob ob seiner « Gleichmäßigkeit der Tonqualität und kräftigen Bass » errang. 1845 bekam Bösendorfer die zweite Goldmedaille bei der Wiener Industrieausstellung, der Export wurde weiter verstärkt, und Ignaz Bösendorfer unternahm seine ersten Geschäftsreisen. Dazu kam, daß neben der niedrigen Preisgestaltung der Wiener Klavierbauer im allgemeinen im Verhältnis zu den ausländischen Firmen wie Érard, Pleyel oder Pape auch bereits (und das nicht nur bei Bösendorfer) sich die Sitte durchsetzte, in den Ausstellungsalons der Klavierfabriken Konzerte zu veranstalten, eine kluge Sache, die den Bekanntheitsgrad der Instrumente rasch erhöhte.

Außerdem darf nicht übersehen werden, daß eine persönliche Freundschaft Ignaz Bösendorfers Flügel sehr stark promovierte : 1838 hielt ein solches Instrument dank seiner massiven Bauweise dem für alle damaligen Klaviere zerstörerischen Virtuosenpiel des jungen Franz Liszt stand. Daraus entwickelte sich eine Freundschaft Liszts zum Hause Bösendorfer, die auch von Ludwig Bösendorfer, dem Sohn Ignaz' und eigentlichen Genie im Wiener Klavierbau, geschickt fortgeführt wurde.

1853 wurde Ignaz Bösendorfer in den Vorstand der Akademie der Tonkunst in Wien gewählt, 1857 begann er mit dem Neubau seiner Klavierfabrik nach neuesten industriellen Gesichtspunkten in Wien-Alsergrund, und 1858 erneuerte Kaiser Franz Joseph den Titel des « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hof-Kammer-Pianoforte-Verfertigers » . Doch Ignaz erlebte die Einweihung der neuen Fabrik nicht mehr, er starb 1859 und hinterließ ein beachtliches Vermögen von mehr als 145.000 Gulden.

Ludwig Bösendorfer, am 10. April 1835 als Ignaz' älterer Sohn geboren, ausgebildet nicht nur im väterlichen Betrieb, sondern auch in der kommerziellen und technischen Abteilung des Kaiserlich-Königlich Polytechnischen Institutes, übernahm ab diesem Zeitpunkt die Klavierfabrik. 1860 fand der Umzug statt. Im neuen Fabriksgebäude befand sich auch ein Konzertsaal für 200 Personen. Im gleichen Jahr erhielt Bösendorfer ein Patent für eine von ihm erfundene Klaviermechanik, 1862 stellte Bösendorfer seinen privilegierten « Patentflügel » in London aus und erhielt prompt eine Auszeichnung. 1867 gelang ihm bei der Weltausstellung in Paris allein schon aufgrund der prachtvollen äußeren Gestaltung seiner Flügel ein so großer Erfolg, daß sich Kaiserin Elisabeth, selbst Besitzerin eines eigens für sie geschaffenen Flügels im « Ringstraßenstil » , entschloss, Kaiserin Eugenie einen von Theophil Hansen entworfenen Flügel zum Geschenk zu machen. Die Pariser Weltausstellung brachte Bösendorfer Weltruf ein, schrieb doch die « Wiener Morgenpost » im September 1867 :

« Bösendorfers Ruf, bisher ein europäischer, ist nun zum Weltruf geworden, denn selbst die Amerikaner blicken mit Neid auf die Wiener Flügel Bösendorfers, deren Kraft eine siegreichere ist: die der Anmuth. »

Bösendorfer expandierte. Hongkong, Rio, Stockholm, Japan (der Tenno erhielt von Österreich 1869 einen Bösendorfer-Flügel geschenkt, der sich bis heute im kaiserlichen Schloß in Tokyo befindet) waren die Verkaufsstationen und neuen Geschäftsbeziehungen.

Doch auch in Österreich baute Bösendorfer seine Vorrangstellung aus : 1869 schenkte er der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien, die ihr neues Haus mit dem Goldenen-Saal am Karlsplatz bezog, 14 Flügel, was ihm prompt die Direktions- und Ehrenmitgliedschaft dieser ehrwürdigen Institution einbrachte. Die alte Produktionsstätte wurde langsam zu klein, und 1870 zog die Klavierfabrik erneut um : im Gebäude Graf Starhembergasse 14 auf der Wieden fand Bösendorfer einen geeigneten Platz zum Bau seiner Flügel. Dieser Gebäudekomplex aus dem 18. Jahrhundert, dessen frühere Bestimmung (ob Kloster oder Spital, Pferdestall oder Infirmerie) nicht mehr eruiert werden kann, ist bis heute Sitz der Geschäftsleitung, des Verkaufs, der Verwaltung, des technischen Services, des Bösendorfer-Saales, des Klaviersalons und der Studios des Hauses.

Die damaligen Verkaufsräume lagen allerdings in der Herrengasse 6, eine der ersten Adressen Wiens, und zwar im alten Palais Liechtenstein. In diesem Palais wohnte Bösendorfer auch selbst. 1872 bekam er die Genehmigung, in den ehemaligen Reitställen des Palais (Bösendorfer war ein großer Pferdefreund, seine Ausritte und Kutschenfahrten im Wiener Prater sind berühmt gewesen und wurden auch bildnerisch festgehalten) einen großen Konzertsaal zu eröffnen. Dieser alte Bösendorfer-Saal stellte neben dem Musikverein bis zum Abbruch des Palais Liechtenstein 1913 den besten Saal für Kammermusik dar. Die Liste der Namen der Künstler, die dort auftraten, ist bis heute ein « Who is who » der Konzertwelt um die Jahrhundertwende :

Hans von Bülow, Liszts Schwiegersohn, eröffnete den Saal am 19. November 1872. Es folgten in den nächsten 40 Jahren Klavierabende, Kammermusik- und Liederabende von Anton Rubinstein, Sophie Menter ; Pablo de Sarasate, Ferruccio Busoni, Franz Liszt, Theodor Leschitzky, Moritz Rosenthal, es las Peter Rosegger, Eugen d'Albert gab dort 1886 sein Wien-Debut, Fritz Kreisler, das Rosé-Quartett (dessen letzter Abend im zum Abbruch bestimmten Bösendorfer-Saal am 2. Mai 1913 unter dem Titel stand : « Muss es sein ? Es muß sein ! ») ; Ignaz Jan Paderewski, der ständiger Gast im Bösendorfer-Saal wurde, Hugo Wolf, Emil von Sauer, Gustav Mahler, Artur Schnabel, Ernst von Dohnanyi, Max Reger, Arthur Rubinstein, Wilhelm Kienzl, Richard Strauß, Wilhelm Backhaus - die Liste ließe sich endlos fortsetzen. Alle diese Künstler trugen natürlich den Ruhm der Bösendorferschen Klaviere in alle Welt.

Dazu kommt, daß Ludwig Bösendorfer eine rege Reisetätigkeit entwickelte, bei der er viele Künstler nicht nur persönlich begleitete, sondern ihnen auch seine Klaviere in fast alle großen Konzertsäle Europas lieferte. Daraus entwickelten sich natürlich Freundschaften, die ein Leben lang hielten und (über da normale Maß geschäftlicher Promotion hinaus) Verbindungen brachten, die Bösendorfer als Mensch in ein Licht rückten, das ihn nicht nur in Wien, sondern auch in allen Künstlerkreisen als großen Wohltäter und Kulturträger bekannt werden ließ. Sein Briefwechsel mit Franz Liszt ist berühmt, Brahms zählte zu seinen Freunden, Anton Bruckner und Johann Strauß bekamen Sonderpreise beim Klavierkauf, und Bösendorfer dachte ernstlich daran, einen Klaviersalonwagen bei der Eisenbahn für reisende Künstler mit Schlafstatt und Flügel bauen zu lassen. Auch existiert noch jene Herz-As-Karte, auf der die Skatspieler Franz Liszt und Anton Rubinstein dem erkrankten Bösendorfer von einer Konzertreise Grüße schrieben.

Bei der Wiener Weltausstellung 1873 wurde Bösendorfer die Ehre des Besuches Kaiser Franz-Josefs zuteil - mit einer Jahresproduktion von 288 Instrumenten erreichte das Unternehmen damals eine Spitzenposition. Bösendorfer-Flügel gingen mittlerweile in alle Welt, und die Wirtschaftskrise von 1873 konnte nur kurzfristig den steilen Aufstieg hemmen. Bereits 1882 stand Bösendorfer mit 322 verkauften Klavieren einsam an der Spitze aller Klavierbauer der Monarchie. Im Jahr 1883 wurde der 10.000. Bösendorfer fertig gestellt, und es lässt sich klar ablesen, wie begehrt die Instrumente waren, wenn man den Kundenkreis betrachtet, den Bösendorfer zu dieser Zeit belieferte : Kaiserin Elisabeth, Fürstin Pauline Metternich, die Erzherzoginnen Stephanie und Valerie, die allein vier Bösendorfer, Erzherzog Eugen, Katharina Schratt, Russlands Zar Nikolaus II. , der japanische Tenno, - in der Folge gehörte es zum Prestige der neureichen

Bürgerschicht, die es sich leisten konnte, aus Wien im Ringstraßenstil eine gewaltige Baustelle zu machen, nach hochadeligem Vorbild einen Bösendorfer zu besitzen.

In steter Sorge um die Qualität seiner Flügel verbesserte Bösendorfer in nicht zu unterschätzender Zusammenarbeit mit seinen Fabrikdirektoren Franz Berger und dessen Sohn Carl Georg die Mechanik, erhielt diverse Patente für das von ihm erfundene « Wiener System » und schuf auf Anregung des Komponisten Ferruccio Busoni um 1900 einen Konzertflügel mit vollen acht Oktaven und einer Länge von 290 centimeter. Dieses Modell ist bis heute das Flaggschiff der Firma und erlangte unter dem Namen « Imperial » Weltruhm. Der enorme Tonumfang dieses Instrumentes veranlasste Komponisten wie Busoni, Dohnanyi und Bartók, zu eigenen Werken, die nur auf dem Imperial zu authentischer Ausführung gelangen können.

So schaffte es Ludwig Bösendorfer, daß aus einem Familiennamen ein Markenname wurde, der eigentlich bis heute ein Synonym ist für den Wiener Klavierbau, egal, welche Zeitläufte und Besitzerwechsel die Firma traf.

Hochbetagt, kinderlos, « allein auf der Welt » , wie er zu sagen pflegte (er war zweimal verheiratet und überlebte beide Ehefrauen) sah sich Kommerzialrat Bösendorfer nach einem Käufer für seine Klavierfabrik um. Er fand diesen in seinem alten Freund und Bankier Carl Hutterstraßer, der im März 1909 das Unternehmen übernahm, Bösendorfer aber bat, ihm seinen « Rat und wertvolle Unterstützung angedeihen zu lassen » . Auch behielt Bösendorfer den Saal in der Herrengasse, der bis 1913 bestand.

Der Ausbruch des ersten Weltkrieges, die Demolierung seines Saales, das ständige Alleinsein veranlassten Bösendorfer 1914, sein Testament zu schreiben, in dem er neben großzügigen Spenden an Künstler, Institutionen und seinem Personal, den gesamten Nachlaß der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde vermachte. Er bestimmte, ohne Pomp und Aufwand auf einem Klavierwagen zum Zentralfriedhof gefahren zu werden und seinen Tod bis zu seinem Begräbnis geheim zu halten.

Am 9. Mai 1919 war es dann soweit. Er wurde in aller Stille beigesetzt, auf seinem Grabstein stand nur der Namen Ludwig Bösendorfer und seine Jahreszahlen. Mit der Umbettung in ein Ehrengrab der Stadt Wien wurde diesem seinen letzten Wunsch dann nicht mehr Rechnung getragen.

Carl Hutterstraßer (1863-1942) übersiedelte nach Abbruch des Hauses Herrengasse 6 mit den Verkaufsräumen in den Musikverein, wo sich unter der Adresse Bösendorferstraße 12 der Stadtsalon der Firma bis auf den heutigen Tag befindet. Der erste Weltkrieg, das Ende der Monarchie, die Weltwirtschaftskrise brachten zwar Einbußen bei den Produktionszahlen, doch gelang es Carl Hutterstraßer immer wieder, neue Märkte zu erschließen und das Händlernetz zu vergrößern. 1922 entstand die große Londoner Vertretung bei Wigmores Pianos, 1927 gewann der Bösendorfer-Flügel den Grand Prix in Genf, und 1928 feierte das Unternehmen das hundertjährige Bestehen. 1931 wurde die Klavierfabrik Bösendorfer in eine Offene Handelsgesellschaft umgewandelt, die es den beiden Söhnen Carl Hutterstrassers, Alexander und Wolfgang gestattete, ins Geschäft als Mitgesellschafter einzusteigen.

Alexander und Wolfgang Hutterstraßer waren (im Gegensatz zu ihrem Vater) Klavierbauer, die ihr Handwerk sowohl in der väterlichen Firma als auch im Ausland erlernten und vervollkommneten. Auch sie hatten wichtige Funktionen und Tätigkeiten im Wiener Musikleben inne, eine Tradition, die von Ignaz und Ludwig Bösendorfer übernommen wurde.

Le Palais Liechtenstein

The entailed residence of the Liechtenstein family, on « Herrengasse », a palace that had been erected during the Baroque age, was adapted and extended during the regime of Prince Alois I von Liechtenstein (1759-1805) by the architects Joseph Meißl the Elder (1730-1790) and his nephew Joseph Hardtmuth, in the early classicistic style between 1788 and 1792. Besides the library, as one of the jewels of its interior, the palace also contained the administrative offices of the princely estates and, from 1846, a casino for the nobility. In 1872, at the instigation of Ludwig Bösendorfer, the former riding-school was converted into a concert-hall known as the « Bösendorfer » Hall whose outstanding acoustics were highly-prized by world-famous pianists such as Franz Liszt, Arthur Rubinstein and Julius Epstein.

After the Liechtenstein City Palace, on « Bankgasse », was modernised in the mid- 19th Century, the princely family gradually lost interest in the palace, on « Herrengasse ». It was eventually sold, in 1913, and completely demolished 1 year later. Between 1931 and 1933, Vienna's 1st multi-storeyed building was erected on the site.

« Großer Ehrbar-Saal »

The « Großer Ehrbar-Saal » concert-hall was built in 1867, in the heart of Vienna (4th District) , by the piano manufacturer Friedrich Ehrbar, in place of an old concert-hall that had grown too small. It became one of the most important places for music recitals soon after its establishment. Its architect, Julius Schrittwieser, took his inspiration for the design of the hall from the style of the Italian High-Renaissance. It belonged to the manufacturer « Ehrbar » and played an important role in the Viennese concert life around the turn of the 19th Century. It had a long history of music events and concerts.

Some of the finest composers and musicians of the age have graced this stage repeatedly which include names such as :

Pietro Mascagni, Ignaz Brüll, Josef Hellmesberger, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Max Reger, Bruno Walter, Leo Slezak, among others.

On 17 February 1901, Gustav Mahler created the cantata « Das klagende Lied » in the « Großer Ehrbar-Saal » .

On 14 January 1910, Arnold Schœnberg premiered the 1st section of « Gurre-Lieder » along with other of his compositions.

Concert series by well-known musicians also took place, such as « Musik der Gegenwart » founded by Paul Amadeus Pisk, Friedrich Wildgans, Marcel Rubin and Ernst Bachrich.

Concerts by the eminent musicians Joseph Joachim and Anton Rubinstein were offered before the First World War. During the War, the concert-hall fell into disrepair and was even used as a make-shift hospital.

After being damaged in World War II, the hall was reconstructed to its old historic appearance and opened for the public, on 30 October 1946, with a festive gala concert with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under conductor Rudolf Moralt.

Over the past, the hall regained momentum as a prime events venue after many reconstructions and repair works.

The concert-hall gained full regularity in the year 2005 and, since then, has hosted many concerts and stage performances by leading Austrian as well as international artists and musicians. The « Ehrbar-Saal » is rich in history and unforgettable concerts.

...

Friedrich Ehrbar was born on 26th April 1827 in Hildesheim, Germany, and died on 23rd February 1905 in Hart bei Gloggnitz, Lower-Austria. On his way towards becoming one of the most significant piano manufacturers, he went to Vienna, in 1848, and worked in the workshop of the piano-maker Eduard Seuffert. After the latter's death, in 1855, Friedrich married Seuffert's widow and took-over the business. He, then, led this important family tradition of piano and organ-making under his own name and handed the directorship over to his son, Friedrich Ehrbar, Junior, in 1898. Under both his and Seuffert's leadership, the piano firm became one of the best-known in the world, in which a certain Heinrich Steinweg (Henry Steinway) also worked as a trainee and later became world famous.

Eduard Seuffert's son, Martin, created the upright-standing hammer piano, which acquired the fetching title « giraffe grand » due to its curious outer appearance, amongst other inventions. Friedrich Ehrbar, meanwhile, was the 1st Austrian piano-maker to use the cast-iron frame.

In 1876, the « Großer Ehrbar-Saal » concert-hall was constructed, on « Mühlgasse 30 », by the piano manufacturer Friedrich Erhbar in order to replace an auditorium for music which had become too old and small for its purpose. The architect, Julius Schrittwieser, was guided by the architectural style of the Italian High-Renaissance. This performance venue, in the heart of « Wieden » (4th District), quickly became a musical hub of the city of Vienna with its ideal acoustic. Alongside the Great Hall of the « Musikverein », this hall was the only other in Vienna which was exclusively dedicated to concert performance, since the « Brahms Hall » of the « Musikverein » was originally intended for tuition purposes. The building acquired its present-day form when the gallery was added, in 1911.

The Prayner Conservatory for Music and Dramatic Arts, one of the most historically significant conservatories in Vienna, was founded as a music school, in 1905, by the music teacher Eugenie Patonay. In 1911 the institute was relocated to today's premises within « Mühlgasse, 28-30 » in the 4th District. This location, which had formerly housed the « Ehrbar » piano company, was the property of Kurt Steinitz. A lively starting period followed with a large intake of students, who soon became outstanding graduates of the Lutwak-Patonay Conservatory.

Kurt Steinitz was the proprietor of « Mühlgasse, 28-30 » , until 1938. When Austria was annexed by the German « Reich » that same year, Kurt Steinitz fled to South America and the premises were then « Aryanised » by Stefan Lehner, a trusted lawyer to the « Gestapo » . As of 1939, the Conservatory lodged within the premises was also « Aryanised » by Professors Karl and Margarethe Prayner, a wedded couple on the governing council.

The teaching rooms of the Conservatory, including the famous former concert-hall of the « Ehrbar » piano firm which had played a vital role in the Viennese concert culture, at the turn of the 19th Century, functioned as store-rooms during the First and Second World Wars and, subsequently, served as a factory location and warehouse. After World War II, the premises of the Conservatory were restored to their original form. The nondescript whitewashing was removed and the historically valuable gilts were revealed, once more. In November 1946, the « Großer Ehrbar-Saal » was re-opened with a celebratory concert by the Vienna Philharmonic under the conductorship of Rudolf Moralt. From that point on, the concert-hall and its adjoining premises could, once again, be used for their original tuition and performance purposes.

The « Aryanisation » was acknowledged by the Courts after 1945, and the restoration and financial compensation were carried-out by the Viennese Commission for Restitution.

Ehrbar Saal ist ein Juwel des 19. Jahrhunderts, das noch weitestgehend im Originalzustand erhalten ist.

Im Jahr 1876 ließ Friedrich Ehrbar in der Mühlgasse 30, im 4. Bezirk in Wien den Ehrbarsaal an der Stelle eines alten, zu klein gewordenen Saales im Palais Ehrbar, einem Gründerzeithaus mit reich verzierter Fassade, errichten. Architekt Julius Schrittwieser orientierte sich am Baustil der italienischen Hochrenaissance. Schnell wurde der akustisch ideale Aufführungsort im Herzen von Wieden zu einem musikalischen Zentrum der Stadt.

Der Ehrbar Saal wurde im Jahre 1876 von dem Klavierfabrikanten Friedrich Ehrbar in der Mühlgasse 30, 1040 Wien errichtet. Er war damals neben dem großen Musikvereinssaal (der Brahms Saal war ursprünglich als Unterrichtsraum konzipiert) der einzige ausschließlich Konzertzwecken gewidmete Saal in Wien. 1911 wurde die Galerie zugebaut und der Saal bekam seine heutige Form.

In diesem Konzertsaal konzertierten die verschiedensten Künstler und andere Pietro Mascagni, Ignaz Brüll, Josef Hellmesberger, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Max Reger.

Gustav Mahler brachte im Ehrbarsaal Das klagende Lied zur Uraufführung.

Auch der erste Teil von Arnold Schoenbergs « Gurre-Liedern » fand hier am 14. Januar 1910 gemeinsam mit anderen Werken des Komponisten seine Uraufführung.

Der Saal war vor dem ersten Weltkrieg Ort von Konzerten so bedeutender Musiker wie Joseph Joachim und Anton Rubinstein.

1934 bis 1938 fanden hier die mit Marcel Rubin verbundenen « Konzerte Musik der Gegenwart » statt.

Während des Ersten Weltkrieges wurden die Ehrbarsäle als Vorratsräume benützt und dienten anschließend als Fabrikslokalitäten und Magazine. Im Jahre 1937 wurde der Saal notdürftig adaptiert und in bescheidenem Rahmen in den Wiener Konzertbetrieb eingegliedert. Im Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde er allerdings wieder als Magazin in Verwendung genommen. Direktor Prayner hat den Saal auf seine Kosten nun renovieren lassen. Die unscheinbaren Übertünchungen wurden entfernt und die alten Stuckvergoldungen wieder freigelegt.

Der berühmte ehemalige Konzertsaal der Klavierfirma Ehrbar in der Mühlgasse 28, der um die Jahrhundertwende im Wiener Konzertleben (ähnlich wie der seither verschwundene Bösendorfersaal) eine bedeutende Rolle spielte, ist jetzt in seiner alten Form wiederhergestellt worden und soll im 30. Oktober 1946 mit einem Festkonzert der Wiener Philharmoniker der Öffentlichkeit übergeben werden.

Nach dem zweiten Weltkrieg und einer zwischenzeitlichen Umfunktionierung als Tischlerei beziehungsweise Lazarett wurde der 400-500 Personen fassende und in den Originalzustand rückversetzte Ehrbarsaal durch ein Konzert der Wiener Philharmoniker unter Rudolf Moralt wiedereröffnet.

Seit damals hat der Saal eine wechselvolle Geschichte durchgemacht: er diente während des ersten Weltkrieges als Lazarett und war Lager einer Tischlerei, bis er 30.10.1946 mit einem Konzert der Wiener Philharmoniker unter Rudolf Moralt feierlich wiedereröffnet und seiner ursprünglichen Bestimmung wieder übergeben wurde.

Heute wird der Ehrbarsaal vor allem durch Konzerte und Veranstaltungen des Prayner Konservatorium, aber auch häufig durch externe Veranstalter genutzt.

In den folgenden zwanzig Jahren fanden hier zahlreiche Konzerte statt. Dann jedoch geriet diese stimmungsvolle « Location » mehr und mehr aus dem Blickfeld der Öffentlichkeit.

In den letzten 30 Jahren wurde es um den Ehrbar-Saal jedoch etwas ruhiger.

Palais Ehrbar

4. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Wieden, Mühlgasse 28.

Über einer gequadrerten Sockelzone mit Rundbogenfenster erhebt sich eine reich mit Neorenaissance-motiven geschmückte Fassade. Ein flacher üppig verzierter Mittelrisalit wird seitlich von Pilastern mit korinthischen Kapitellen begrenzt. Über dem Rundbogenportal wird ein kreisbogenförmiger Balkon mit schönem Schmiedeeisengitter von Konsolen und einem Muschelmotiv getragen. Eine Widmungsinschriftentafel befindet sich unter dem durchgehenden Zahnschnittfries über dem ein von Greifen gehaltenes Wappen angebracht ist. Die Fenster haben abwechselnd Dreiecksgiebel oder Segmentbogengiebel mit stilisiertem Muscheldekorelement oder Putzrahmen mit Masken. Das Palais umfasst auch das angrenzende Eckhaus Nummer 30 und 30a das von Ferdinand Berehinak errichtet wurde. Die Fassade ist durch mehrere über drei Geschosse durchgehende Erker und Putzfelder gegliedert. Die abgefaste Hausecke ist mit einem Pyramidendach mit Helm und halbrunden Giebeln akzentuiert. Der zweigeschossige große Konzertsaal, auch unter dem Namen Ehrbar-Saal bekannt, wurde von Julius Schrittwieser 1877 errichtet und ist durch korinthische Riesepilaster und Kandelabersäulen gegliedert. Auf der Stirnseite zwischen Hermenpilaster befindet sich ein Portraitmedaillon von Kaiser Franz-Josef.

Décembre 1877 : Johannes Brahms meets the 36 year old Antonín Dvořák for the 1st time. From then on, he will be a strong supporter of his work.

Vienne était encore une ville obstinément anti-progressiste et anti-Wagner. Tout juste avant la première, un Bruckner frustré écrira à un ami Berlinois :

« Je ne présenterai plus une de mes œuvres à notre Philharmonique, cette dernière ayant rejeté mes offres à plusieurs reprises. » .

Les répétitions de la 3e Symphonie à Vienne étaient un prélude à la soirée fatidique elle-même. Bruckner n'avait jamais réussi à développer une relation amicale avec le « Wiener Philharmoniker », n'étant pas un véritable chef d'orchestre. Un plaisantin de la phalange avait même sarcastiquement surnommé la 2e Symphonie la « Pausen-Sinfonie » (Symphonie des silences) et ce au grand dam du compositeur. La partition fut finalement déclarée « injouable » par les musiciens. Malgré les échos favorables lors du concert du 1er octobre 1873, l'offre de dédicace du Maître de Saint-Florian demeurera sans réponse.

Lorsqu'en 1875, ce même Philharmonique aura sous les yeux la partition de la 3e Symphonie. Ils seront encore moins impressionnés par rapport à la précédente et resteront sur leur position durant les répétitions en la déclarant « injouable ». D'entrée de jeu, la dédicace assez pompeuse du « disciple » Bruckner envers le « Maître de Bayreuth » envenimera la situation.

La 3e Symphonie est la « Symphonie Wagner » de Bruckner, clairement présentée comme telle sur les pages de titre de toutes les partitions manuscrites du compositeur, qui a magnifiquement fait ressortir, de sa plus belle calligraphie, le nom de « Wagner » .

Un des amis du compositeur, Theodor Rättig, le propriétaire de la maison d'édition Bußjäger & Rättig, a assisté à la plupart des répétitions de la 3e (la 2e version, avec des coupures) .

Il écrit :

« Le spectacle était pitoyable et scandaleux. De voir les jeunes musiciens de l'Orchestre se moquer éperdument de la direction incertaine du vieil homme. Bruckner ne savait pas comment mener à bien son œuvre et il dut se borner à donner le tempo comme une vulgaire marionnette. »

Anton Bruckner ne deviendra jamais un chef d'orchestre exceptionnel. À vrai dire, il sera reconnu comme étant à peine compétent, voire médiocre (n'ayant pas ce don naturel de la direction) . Il y a un monde de différence entre la technique du chef d'orchestre et celle du chef de chœur. Le meilleur chef de chœur n'est pas nécessairement un bon chef d'orchestre. Bruckner était un bon chef de chœur, sans plus.

As the Symphony took shape for the 1st time, in real instrumental sound, the peals of laughter ringing-out from the Philharmonic players' desks struck Bruckner full in the face. When the composer stopped the music and tried to make himself understood to the Orchestra, witty remarks began to be muttered and the high-spirited antics escalated.

Une rumeur assez révélatrice circulait à Vienne à propos de ses qualités en tant que chef d'orchestre. Lors de la répétition d'une de ses Symphonies, Bruckner (soulevant la baguette) hésitait à donner le temps fort de la 1re mesure. Après avoir patienté quelques secondes, le 1er violon finit par lui demander de procéder. Ce à quoi, Bruckner répondit : « Je n'oserais jamais commencer avant vous. » . Sans pouvoir confirmer la véracité de l'anecdote, cela nous donne une image assez représentative de la personnalité du compositeur.

Le contexte de la soirée ne se prêtait pas du tout à une telle humiliation. La plupart des spectateurs ayant acheté leurs billets en prévision d'un « concert d'adieu » en hommage au directeur musical de l'Orchestre de la Cour, Josef Hellmesberger « sénior » .

C'est en grande partie grâce aux efforts de riches et puissants admirateurs de Bruckner (et l'intervention d'un influent Ministre) que le Philharmonique de Vienne dut se résigner à jouer la 3e Symphonie ; œuvre qu'il avait jugé « injouable » lors des répétitions. Le concert s'avérera être un désastre complet, principalement en raison de l'ambivalence, voire l'hostilité des musiciens. Il s'agira, sans doute, d'un des événements les plus tristes de l'histoire de la musique.

La 1^{re} exécution de la Symphonie n° 3 en ré mineur sera donnée à Vienne le 16 décembre 1877 par Bruckner, forcé de prendre la relève du défunt Herbeck. (Bruckner ne sera pas en mesure de maîtriser le niveau de difficulté technique de sa propre composition.) Le public avide ne lui était pas favorable au départ, suspicieux à l'idée que Richard Wagner avait approuvé l'œuvre au programme et que le compositeur lui vouait une admiration « sans borne », voire exagérée.

La partition qui sera utilisée le soir du concert représente en fait la 3^e révision de la Symphonie (qui sera publiée en 1878, sans toutefois incorporer l'Adagio de 1876) .

Il faut rappeler que lors du passage de Richard Wagner à Vienne, au printemps de 1875 (qui attisera l'hostilité et l'acharnement de ses adversaires, avec Eduard Hanslick en tête) , le Maître avait dit à Bruckner, en l'embrassant, en arrivant à la gare : « Cette Symphonie doit être exécutée ! » . Puis, se tournant vers les gens rassemblés sur le quai, il ajouta :

« Voici Bruckner. C'est mon homme ! »

Ces remarques étaient plutôt inhabituel de la part de Wagner, dont le manque d'intérêt pour les œuvres de ses contemporains, même ceux de son ami intime Franz Liszt, était notoire. (Il est réaliste de penser que Bruckner était devenu son « faire-valoir » .) Cette éloge va alerter les autorités conservatrices qui redoubleront de cruauté grâce à des campagnes intensives de dénigrement. Beaucoup de rumeurs et de potins « typiquement viennois » sur cette nouvelle et intrigante Symphonie allaient circuler dans les cafés. Même les pro-Wagner n'étaient pas assez puissants pour éviter la catastrophe.

Richard Wagner aurait promis à Bruckner d'assurer la pérennité de ses œuvres en lui donnant sa bénédiction. Ce dernier écrira à un ami :

« Il a pris ma main et dit : Comptez sur moi, je vais exécuter vos Symphonies et le reste de vos œuvres. »

Le concert s'avérera long et pénible. Les détracteurs étaient en fort plus grand nombre que les supporters. La nouvelle salle de concert du « Musikverein » sur la « Karlsplatz » (inaugurée le 6 janvier 1870) avait commencé à se vider avant même que Bruckner ne prenne le relais de la seconde partie. Dès les 1^{res} mesures, le directeur du Conservatoire Josef Hellmesberger éclata de rire. Rapidement, un autre collègue fit de même. Là dessus, les étudiants se mirent à faire des singeries. Ensuite, le public se mit à rire et à siffler, exprimant leur désapprobation. Bientôt, des spectateurs se levèrent pour quitter abruptement la salle ; ce qui se reproduira après chacun des mouvements (au lieu des applaudissements nourris comme c'était la coutume au 19^e siècle) . Arrivé au Finale, on assiste au départ bruyant des supporters de Brahms suivi du public car c'était la coutume chez la « bourgeoisie » Libérale de favoriser Brahms au détriment de Bruckner. Les protestataires indignés avancèrent que la cause de la musique venait de recevoir une immense gifle de la part de ce Bruckner et ce dans la « métropole sacrée de la culture » .

The audience organized a « mass-exodus » during the Finale of the 3rd Symphony, which actually consisted of the noisy departure of the Brahmsians followed by the public, because it was fashionable for the Liberal « bourgeoisie » to favour Brahms against Bruckner.

« Ce fut un moment déchirant de voir Bruckner, à la fin du concert, récupérer sa musique, seul sur le podium. Les musiciens du Philharmonique ayant déguerpi dès les dernières mesures. »

On comptait à peine une dizaine de personnes au parterre qui continuaient à rire et à chahuter, criant : « da capo » et « bis ». Une poignée de fidèles élèves (environ 25) dont un Gustav Mahler âgé de 17 ans (et son condisciple Rudolf Krzyzanowski) se sont précipités en direction du Maître, en larmes et au cœur brisé, tentant en vain de lui remonter le moral avec des paroles consolatrices. « Laissez-moi seul, je veux quitter ce lieu. Les Viennois ne veulent pas entendre mes œuvres. » s'écria-t-il.

Un critique témoin de la scène parla de ce « petit groupe d'hardis aventuriers ». Au même moment, l'éditeur Theodor Rättig (un des rares qui soit resté) s'approcha (tel un ange venu du ciel) pour encenser la nouvelle pièce. Bruckner regarda avec incrédulité cet homme étrange qui osa afficher tant de courage à un moment aussi dramatique. Il se dit même prêt à risquer de la publier à ses propres frais (3,000 Florins ou « Gulden »). Selon le biographe August Göllerich, Bruckner recevra, en 1885, une somme de 150 Florins (« Gulden ») à titre de redevances.

Afin de lui rendre hommage en guise de consolation, Gustav Mahler et son confrère (étudiant et chambreur) Rudolf Krzyzanowski préparèrent un arrangement pour piano « 4 mains » de la 3e Symphonie qui sera publié l'année suivante. Cet arrangement est une réalisation de 1er plan, fidèle à la partition. Gustav Mahler se chargera de traduire (de manière efficace mais avec une certaine retenue) les 1er, 2e et 3e mouvements. Tandis que Rudolf Krzyzanowski réalisera la transcription du Finale ajoutant un peu plus de couleur et d'espièglerie.

Même s'il n'a jamais été (en pratique) un véritable élève d'Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler a entretenu avec l'homme une relation d'estime et de compréhension mutuelle. D'ailleurs, le jeune Mahler surnommait ce digne professeur et conférencier : « le Précurseur ! » .

Dans un 1er temps, le jeune Mahler réussit à persuader Bruckner de ne pas céder sous la pression de ses proches admirateurs qui lui conseillaient « d'adapter » sa 3e Symphonie aux exigences malicieuses du public.

Ainsi, Bruckner va lui offrir le manuscrit de sa 3e Symphonie. Il faut reconnaître que Mahler s'était trouvé lié, à 2 reprises au moins, au sort de celle-ci : lorsqu'un public moqueur (et rapidement déserteur) accueillit froidement la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner, le 16 décembre 1877, Gustav et d'autres étudiants (parmi lesquels Rudolf Krzyzanowski) allèrent quant à eux jusqu'à transcrire l'œuvre pour piano. De même, c'est Mahler qui réussit, dans un 1er temps, à persuader Bruckner de ne pas céder sous la pression de ses collègues qui lui conseillaient « d'adapter » sa 3e Symphonie aux exigences malicieuses du public.

30 décembre 1877 : Hans Richter and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra give the world-premiere of Johannes Brahms's 2nd Symphony.

AB 77 : 1878

Janvier 1878 : « Neu Januar 1878 », on the title-page of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony.

3 janvier 1878 : Anton Bruckner devient membre permanent de la « Hofkapelle » où il travaillait déjà en tant qu'organiste honoraire depuis 1868, c'est-à-dire sans aucune rémunération. Il recevra dorénavant un salaire annuel de 800 Florins (« Gulden ») .

Anton Bruckner révisé ses 3e, 4e et 5e Symphonies, en plus d'amorcer la composition du Quintette à cordes.

4 janvier 1878 : La 5e Symphonie est définitivement terminée.

13 janvier 1878 : WAB 57 - « Abendzauber » (magie du soir) , cantate profane (82 mesures) en sol bémol majeur pour voix soliste (ténor ou baryton) , 3 voix de jodel (yodleurs) - ou 3 voix féminines distantes - , chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) et quatuor de cors. Composée à Vienne sur le texte allemand « Der See träumt zwischen Felsen, es flüstert sanft der Hain » (Le lac est en train de rêver entre les rochers, il chuchote doucement au bosquet) de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) . La pièce est dédiée à son ami et mécène de Steyr, l'homme d'affaires Karl Almeroth.

« Abendzauber » has a number of points-in-common with « Das hohe Lied » . The text is another short poem by Heinrich von der Mattig, and the unusual scoring includes a humming choir. Bruckner completed this composition, shortly after the disastrous Viennese premiere of the 3rd Symphony.

Despite the performance problems created by the humming choir in « Das hohe Lied » , Bruckner apparently remained intrigued by this novel sound. In this, his 2nd work to incorporate a humming choir, he did, however, simplify the music. Throughout « Abendzauber » , the chorus hums long notes or simple moving passages until the final section, but the advanced harmonic usage still creates substantial difficulties for the singers.

According to Franz Xaver Bayer (another of Bruckner's Steyr friends) , the yodelling parts were intended for female voices and were modelled on the « Rhinemaidens » ' music of Richard Wagner's « Ring » . Anton Bruckner appears to have chosen the key of G-flat major and frequent tranquil pedal points deliberately to suggest a Romantic moonlit seascape with the « magical sound of songs » drifting upwards.

Heinrich von der Mattig's poem is descriptive and atmospheric, and, unlike « Das hohe Lied » , is almost completely devoid of physical action.

To the best of our knowledge « Abendzauber » was never performed during Bruckner's lifetime, perhaps, because of the difficulty of coordinating the Alpine yodelers with the traditional male chorus. It was composed in Vienna, in 1878. Special vocal effects were not uncommon in the 19th Century male chorus literature, particularly in the nature songs. Nevertheless, the use of yodelers is somewhat of a curiosity.

...

The contact with Karl Almeroth was close enough for Bruckner to dedicate to him the romantically inspired male-voice « Abendzauber » , WAB 57, which was completed in 1878. The scoring is remarkable for the resulting tone colour : it is set for a solo tenor (or solo baritone) , 3 distant female voices (« yodler voices ») and 4 horns. This choir piece brings into play the « other » side of the composer of Symphonies and sacred music ; the side that links him to the contemporary scene of musical Societies and was responsible, in no small degree, for his popularity.

Bruckner est intervenu au niveau du texte de la 1^{re} partie du lied mais le chef de chœur autrichien Viktor Keldorfer (1873-1959) a dû réduire le niveau de difficulté que cela imposait aux chanteurs.

Der See träumt zwischen Felsen,
Es flüstert sanft der Hain.
Den Bergeshain beleuchtet
Des Mondes Silberschein.
Und aus dem Waldesdunkel

Hallt Nachtigallensang,
Und von dem See weh'n Lieder
Mit zauberhaftem Klang.
Ich saß am Seegestade,
Vertieft in süßen Traum ;
Da träumte ich zu schweben
Empor zum Himmelsraum.
Wer könnte je vergessen
Den wonnevollen Ort !
Noch tief im Herzen klingen
Die Zaubertöne fort.

...

The lake is dreaming between the cliffs,
Gently the grove whispers.

The mountain side is lit
By the silvery shine of the moon.

And from the darkness of the forest
Sounds the nightingale's song.

And from the lake songs drift over
With magic-like sound.

I was sitting at the shore of the lake
Absorbed in a sweet dream ;

When I dreamed I was floating
Up to the sphere of Heaven.

Who could ever forget this blissful place !
Deep in the heart.

The magic tones still sound.

15 janvier 1878 : In New Jersey, America, the phonograph is invented and patented by Thomas Edison, enabling actual sounds to be recorded. The 1st model uses a vertically vibrating needle to inscribe a groove in a sheet of tin foil wrapped around a cardboard cylinder. The design is very similar to that described the previous year by Charles Cros but, apparently, Edison and Cros were unaware of each other's work.

18 janvier 1878 : Anton Bruckner begins to revise his 4th Symphony.

19 janvier 1878 : Anton Bruckner, âgé de 53 ans, est nommé musicien à part entière de l'Orchestre de la Chapelle Impériale (« Hofmusikkapelle ») de Vienne. Sa position d'organiste (« Hoforganist ») sera dorénavant rénumérée.

(Bruckner aura également l'occasion de diriger les petits-chanteurs de Vienne à la Chapelle Impériale.)

24 janvier 1878 : Vienna premiere of Richard Wagner's Opera, « Das Rheingold » .

30 janvier 1878 : Date at end of the Coda of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony.

1 février 1878 : Officialisation de la nomination d'Anton Bruckner à la Chapelle Impériale (« Hofmusikkapelle ») de Vienne.

3 mars 1878 : Bulgaria becomes independent from the Ottoman Empire. Montenegro also becomes independent.

Début de 1878 : In Russia, the 37 year old Piotr Ilitch Tchaikovsky completes his Symphony No. 4.

In England, James Starley changes the indirect-drive transmission on his « Salvo » tricycle from one using treadles to one which uses a chain and sprockets, anticipating a major design change to the bicycle.

WAB 46

30 mars 1878 : WAB 46 - « Tota pulchra es, Maria » (tu es toute belle, Marie) , antienne de l'Immaculée-Conception, dans le mode Phrygien, pour voix de ténor (ou baryton) , chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB, divisi) et orgue ad libitum. Livret : prière catholique datant du 4e siècle. Composé à Vienne pour la célébration du 25e anniversaire de Franz-Josef Rüdiger en tant qu'évêque de Linz. Création à la vieille cathédrale (« Alter Dom ») , le 4 juin 1878, sous la direction du chef Johann Baptist Burgstaller. La 1re version en concert sera donnée le 17 mars 1910 sous la direction du chef E. Thomas.

Tota pulchra es, Maria,
Et macula originalis non est in te.
Tu gloria Jerusalem, tu laetitia Israel.
Tu honorificentia populi nostri.
Tu advocata peccatorum.
O Maria. Virgo prudentissima.
Mater clementissima. Ora pro nobis.
Intercede pro nobis ad Dominum Jesum Christum.

...

Tu es toute belle, Marie, et la faute originelle n'est point en toi.
Ton vêtement est blanc comme neige, et ton visage pareil au soleil.
Tu es toute belle, Marie, et la faute originelle n'est point en toi.
Toi, la gloire de Jérusalem, toi la joie d'Israël, toi qui es l'honneur de notre peuple.
Tu es toute belle, Marie.

« Tota pulchra es » est une prière catholique dédiée à la Vierge Marie. C'est l'abrègement de la formule latine « Tota pulchra es, Maria » . Ce chant est très ancien. Il vient du XIVe siècle et son auteur est anonyme. On trouve les paroles « Tota pulchra es » dans le Cantique des cantiques : « Tu es toute belle, mon amie, et en toi il n'y a point de défaut. » (Ct 4:7) .

Gaspar van Weerbeke, Alexandre Agricola, Heinrich Isaac, Hans Judenkünig, Giovanni Antonio Rigatti, Adrian Willaert, Nicolas Gombert, Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina, Anton Bruckner et Charles Gounod ont tous chanté ce vers.

Francesco Guerrero a composé une version personnelle. Maurice Duruflé, compositeur français, aimait spécialement faire jouer le « Tota pulchra es » .

La Congrégation des Servantes du Saint-Cœur de Marie, fondée en 1845, utilise le « Tota pulchra es » dans son sceau.

Printemps de 1878 : The 19 year old Hans Rott begins composing the 1st movement of his Symphony in E major, to be presented upon completion of his composition course with Franz Krenn, at the end of the school year. On July 2, Rott presents this movement at a composition competition, and is ridiculed by all, except Anton Bruckner. The main criticism is that the work sounds « too Wagnerian » . This will lead Rott to quote the main-theme of the Finale of Brahms's 1st Symphony in the last movement of his own Symphony.

Avril 1878 : The 17 year old Gustav Mahler completes the poem which will form the text of his Cantata, « Das Klagende Lied » (The Sorrowful Song) .

Juin à septembre 1878 : Duration of composition of the 1878 version of the 4th Symphony.

4 juin 1878 : A setting of « Tota pulchra es » for tenor, chorus, and organ by Anton Bruckner is performed for the 1st time, at the « Votivkapelle des neuen Doms » , in Linz.

Été 1878 : Gustav Mahler spends most of the summer vacation with his family, in Iglau (now, Jihlava, in the Czech Republic) ; and, part of it, with his friend Emil Freund, in Seelau (now, Želiv, in the Czech Republic) . He will continue to spend part of each summer in Seelau, until 1883.

Juillet 1878 : After his 18th birthday, Gustav Mahler wins a Conservatory prize for the Scherzo of a Piano Quintet (no longer in existence) .

Juillet 1878 : In America, 5 stock-holders buy Thomas Edison's tinfoil phonograph patent for $ 10,000 and a guarantee of 20 % of future profits, creating the « Edison Speaking Phonograph Co. » , which leases-out demonstration rights for promotional purposes. Edison exhibits the machine and a few hundred are sold for use by traveling exhibitors. Many celebrities of the day record their voices, but the tin foil recordings are not durable enough to offer commercial recordings for sale.

12 juillet 1878 : Bruckner termine la composition de son Quintette à cordes (WAB 112) .

13 juillet 1878 : Serbia becomes fully-independent. Now cut-off from the rest of the Ottoman Empire, Bosnia-Herzegovina (capital : Sarajevo) is occupied as a colony by Austria - a step which angers Serb nationalists who had hoped that Serbia would annex Bosnia. Austria engages in large-scale development in Bosnia, determined to make it a showplace of the Empire.

18 juillet 1878 : Composition du graduel « Os Justi » (WAB 30) .

28 juillet 1878 : Composition du Inveni David n° I (WAB 20) .

1er août 1878 : Anton Bruckner begins to compose the « Volksfest » Finale of the 4th Symphony.

28 août 1878 : Création à Saint-Florian du « Os Justi » et du « Inveni David » sous la direction d'Ignaz P. Traumihler, assisté d'Anton Bruckner.

Août - Septembre 1878 : Bruckner commence à travailler sur la 6e Symphonie.

Le peintre autrichien Franz Antoine (1864-1935) fut un élève privé d'Anton Bruckner en 1878. Formé à l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Vienne, il a surtout réalisé des scènes de genre, des thèmes marins ainsi que des motifs de botanique à partir de photographies. Son huile sur panneau, datant de 1910, intitulé « La Statue de la Liberté » (New York) l'a rendu célèbre.

22 août au 21-22 septembre 1878 : Hans Rott stays with his friends, the brothers Rudolf and Heinrich Krzyżanowski, in Eger (then, in the Austro-Hungarian Empire ; now, in Hungary) , and composes the 2nd movement of his Symphony in E major.

The 48 year old Hans von Bülow becomes « Hofkapellmeister » (Court conductor) in Hanover until 1880, when he is forced to leave after fighting with a tenor singing the « Knight of the Swan (“ Schwan ”) » role in Richard Wagner's Opera, « Lohengrin » ; Bülow had called him ... the « Knight of the Swine (“ Schwein ”) » .

Automne 1878 : Pression sur l'éditeur viennois Theodor Rättig pour publier la 2e version de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner.

30 septembre 1878 : The 1st revision of the 4th Symphony is completed (1878 version) .

9 octobre 1878 : Anton Bruckner writes to the Berlin music-critic Wilhelm Tappert ; another unsuccessful attempt to recover score and parts from Benjamin Bilse.

Bruckner recommends both the 2nd and 3rd Symphonies for performance in Berlin. He also refers to the piano arrangements which are to be made of the 2 Symphonies.

Bruckner describes the revised version of his 4th Symphony and announces his intention of replacing the Scherzo with a new « Hunt » Scherzo.

Letter from Bruckner to Wilhelm Tappert, in Berlin :

« I now have re-worked the 4th “ Romantic ” Symphony (movements 1, 2, 4) in completely new, shorter form ; it will now achieve its effect. »

(« Ich habe jetzt die vierte romantische Sinfonie (1. , 2. , 4. Satz) ganz neu und kurz bearbeitet, die dann ihre Wirkung machen wird. »)

Octobre 1878 : Parmi les élèves de Bruckner au Conservatoire de Vienne durant ce semestre d'automne, citons ...

Julius Korngold ; Rudolf Dittrich ; E. Schalk ; Heinrich Peter Vergeiner ; Alfred Zamara ; Anton Meißner (qui deviendra son dernier secrétaire personnel et confident) ; Carl Bernhard Öhn ; Franz Brischar ; Franz Burgarth et Ernst Denhof.

Anton Meißner (1855-1932) , described by biographers August Göllerich and Max Auer as « a devoutly Catholic young man » , becomes a pupil of Anton Bruckner during the 1878-1879 academic year at the Vienna Conservatory.

Julius Korngold

Le pianiste, compositeur, librettiste, écrivain, avocat et critique musical autrichien de renom, le docteur Julius (Leopold) Korngold est né le 24 décembre 1860 dans la capitale Brno (Brünn) , en Moravie du Sud ; et est mort le 25 septembre 1945 à Los Angeles, en Californie.

Père ambitieux et très protecteur, Julius a eu 2 fils de son épouse Josefina (« née » Witrofski, 1874-1958) : le musicien Hans Robert (en l'honneur de Schumann) Korngold (1892-1965) ; et le pianiste, compositeur et chef d'orchestre Erich Wolfgang (en l'honneur de Mozart) Korngold (1897-1957) , avec qui il a publié des œuvres sous le pseudonyme de Paul Schott.

Fils de Simon et de Rosa Korngold, le jeune Julius grandit à Brno, la capitale de la Moravie, dans une famille modeste qui n'est pas particulièrement intéressé par la musique. À l'école secondaire (« Gymnasium ») , il trace sa propre voie par l'apprentissage de la musique et de la littérature. Son diplôme mentionne « excellent » dans toutes les matières, et « très bien » en « langue allemande » . Pianiste amateur de talent, il prend des leçons de piano et assiste à des Opéras, des Opérettes et des pièces de théâtre au « Deutsche Theater » local.

Compositeur frustré, Julius Korngold s'inscrit à temps partiel (citons, entre autres, la session d'automne 1878) au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique de Vienne (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien ») . Il travaille la théorie musicale et l'harmonie auprès des professeurs Franz Krenn et Anton Bruckner ; il est aussi l'étudiant du directeur Josef Hellmesberger. Parmi ses confrères de classe, mentionnons Hugo Wolf et Franz Schalk.

La vie culturelle de la capitale autrichienne offre à Korngold la possibilité de fréquenter la « Hofoper » , le « Musikverein » et le « Burgtheater » .

Dans ses mémoires, Julius évoque les rencontres en privé à la brasserie, après les heures de classes, en compagnie de son Maître Bruckner qui a la fâcheuse habitude de s'embarquer dans l'un de ses monologues fleuve, au grand dam de l'élève. À une occasion, Korngold ose endosser l'instrumentation d'Antonín Dvořák. Ce à quoi Bruckner réplique :

« Peignez une paire de saucisses en vert ou en bleu, si vous le voulez - n'est-ce pas toujours une paire de saucisses ? »

Une version plus élégante de cette boutade, critique du timbre, est énoncée par Gustav Mahler en conversation avec son frère Otto :

« L'instrumentation de la “ Pathétique ” de Tchaïkovski n'est pas plus signifiante qu'une toupie rouge vif qui n'attire plus l'attention, une fois immobilisée. »

Korngold étudie le droit (et la philosophie) à l'Université de Vienne, de 1881 à 1887, tout en poursuivant, en parallèle, ses études musicales au Conservatoire. Il obtient son doctorat en droit en 1887, après avoir passé les examens du Ministère avec brio. Il amorce alors une carrière d'avocat à Brno. Mais il y passe la majeure partie de son temps comme critique musical et éditeur. Il collabore avec les différents journaux de la ville : le « Brünnner Morgenpost », le « Tagesboten für Mähren und Schlesien » et le « Brünnner Sonntagszeitung » .

Son essai faisant l'éloge de la musique de Johannes Brahms vient à l'attention de l'ami proche de ce dernier, Eduard Hanslick, l'influent critique musical du plus important journal viennois de langue allemande, le « Neue Freie Presse » . Julius Korngold devient, par conséquent, son « protégé » (et il va se lier d'amitié avec Brahms) . Dès 1901, la famille Korngold quitte Brno pour venir s'installer à Vienne (Theodor Herzl va alors prendre la relève dans la capitale de Moravie.)

D'abord assistant au directeur du « Neue Freie Presse » , il est responsable en 1902 de la section culturelle. Il succède à Hanslick, suite à son décès en 1904. Jusqu'en 1934, Korngold cumule la fonction de rédacteur musical.

À la fois conservateur (Brahmsien) et actuel (Wagnérien) , Julius Korngold est considéré le meilleur critique de Vienne au début du XXe siècle, à l'époque où cette ville est considérée comme la capitale de la musique Classique en Europe. Il se distingue notamment en défendant l'œuvre de Gustav Mahler, qui a de la peine à se faire reconnaître comme compositeur. Il fait aussi la promotion de Bruno Walter et de Richard Strauß.

De nature cosmopolitaine, Korngold visite, en 1900, l'Exposition universelle de Paris. Il pourra notamment y entendre « la Damoiselle élue » de Claude Debussy ; sa critique sera la Ire à paraître dans un journal de langue allemande. Cependant, il s'inquiète de l'évolution d'une certaine musique allemande. Il sera farouchement opposé à la nouvelle voie tracé par Arnold Schœnberg et ses disciples de la Seconde École de Vienne (Alban Berg, Anton Webern, etc.) .

Julius est le père du compositeur Erich Wolfgang Korngold et l'auteur du livret de l'Opéra composé par celui-ci : « Die tote Stadt » (la Ville morte) . Il l'a écrit sous le pseudonyme de Paul Schott.

Enfant prodige, Erich Wolfgang est pourvu de dons stupéfiants : à 5 ans, il joue à 4 mains avec son père, reçoit les Ires notions d'harmonie ; à 7, il compose des valse et de petites mélodies (1905-1907) . Présenté à Gustav Mahler dès 1906, celui-ci s'écrie, médusé : « Un génie, un génie ! » (aux dires d'Alma) . Dans l'impossibilité de le prendre pour élève, étant lui-même prêt à partir aux États-Unis, Mahler le recommande à Alexander von Zemlinsky qui devient son professeur (1909-1911) .

À l'âge de 12 ans, le garçon compose un Trio avec piano et un ballet en 2 actes, « Der Schneemann » (Le bonhomme de neige) , qui est orchestré par son professeur Zemlinsky et créé à l'Opéra de Vienne, pour la fête de l'Empereur Franz-Josef, le 4 octobre 1910, sous la direction de Franz Schalk. Le succès est complet pour le prodige de 13 ans, et le public s'étonne de sa maturité et du raffinement musical dont il fait preuve. Même Richard Strauß, après avoir étudié les 3 œuvres publiées à titre privée par Julius, est stupéfait et l'écrit dans une lettre :

« Le 1er sentiment qui vous envahit est la peur et la crainte qu'un génie si précoce ne puisse se développer d'une manière aussi normale qu'on le souhaiterait sincèrement pour lui. Cette sûreté du style, cette Maîtrise de la forme, cette individualité de l'expression (particulièrement dans sa Sonate) , ces harmonies - tout cela a de quoi nous étonner. »

Les critiques persistantes de Julius Korngold contre le laxisme du directeur de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne, Richard Strauß, prennent rapidement une envergure nationale. Les absences répétées du célèbre compositeur et chef d'orchestre sont trop souvent à l'ordre du jour des réunions du conseil d'administration. Les activités de Strauß en tant que chef-invité vont mener à sa (1re) démission, en 1924. Ce qui nuit temporairement à la relation entre Strauß et Erich Wolfgang Korngold.

Suite à l' « Anschluß » de 1938, la famille Korngold émigre aux États-Unis, où le fils, Erich Wolfgang, s'est déjà installé dès 1936. Bien que Julius ait réussi à sauver un certain nombre de manuscrits, la grande majorité des esquisses et des manuscrits autographes de son fils furent laissés derrière.

1945 marque un important tournant dans la vie d'Erich Wolfgang Korngold. Son père Julius qui n'a jamais été à l'aise à Los Angeles et qui n'a jamais approuvé la décision de son fils de se concentrer exclusivement sur la composition de musique de film meurt, déçu et aigri, le 25 septembre à Hollywood, en Californie, des suites d'une longue maladie. Dès lors, les efforts infructueux d'Erich Wolfgang de remonter ses Opéras en Europe de même que de présenter ses nouvelles œuvres orchestrales au concert laissent un goût amer.

Depuis 1995, une rue dans le « Penzing » (le 14e arrondissement de Vienne) porte le nom de Julius Korngold : la « Korngoldgasse » .

Doctor Julius Leopold Korngold was a controversial figure - Jewish, a conservative figure (who abhorred atonalism and the whole Second Viennese School) , and possessor of an acid-tipped pen in a city rife with intellectual and political ferment and rivalries and an undercurrent of anti-Semitism, Doctor Korngold made his share of enemies with his influence.

Occupation : Austrian music-critic at the « Neue Freie Presse » of Vienna (1902-1934) .

Birthdate : 24 December 1860.

Birthplace : Brno (Brünn) , South Moravia, Czech Republic.

Death : 25 September 1945, in Los Angeles, California.

Son of Simon Korngold and Rosa Korngold.

Husband of Josefine Korngold (« née » Witrofski, 1874-1958) .

Father of Hanns Robert Korngold and Erich Wolfgang Korngold.

Collaborated with his son Erich Wolfgang on the libretto of the Opera « Die tote Stadt » under joint pseudonym : « Paul Schott » .

The young Julius grew-up in Brno, the capital of Moravia, in a family who was not interested in music. In high-school (« Gymnasium ») , he found his own way in learning about music and literature. His diploma mentioned « excellent » in all fields, and « very well » in « German » . A talented amateur pianist, he took piano lessons and saw the early Operas, Operettas and Plays at the local « Deutsche Theater » .

A frustrated composer, Julius Korngold left Moravia to study part-time (starting with the autumn session of 1878) at the Conservatory of the Society of Friends of Music (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») with professors Franz Krenn and Anton Bruckner (in music theory and harmony) , but also with director Josef Hellmesberger. His fellow students included Hugo Wolf and Franz Schalk. The cultural life of the Austrian capital offered Korngold the chance to go to the « Hofoper » , the « Musikverein » and the « Burgtheater » .

Korngold's memoirs recall private meetings with Anton Bruckner in a beer hall after class, where the professor would carry forth a monologue, often to his student's dismay. When Korngold defended Antonín Dvořák's instrumentation, Bruckner proclaimed :

« Paint a pair of sausages green and blue if you like - isn't it still a pair of sausages ? »

(A more elegant version of this same bias against timbre is Gustav Mahler's comment, in a conversation with his brother, that Tchaïkovsky's instrumentation in the « Pathétique » is no more substantial than a coloured top that ceases to fascinate, once it is no longer spinning.)

From 1881 to 1887, Korngold studied at the Law Faculty of the Vienna University (where he also studied philosophy) . He received his doctorate in 1887, after passing the State examinations with flying colours.

A career in music was out of the question for Julius Korngold, whose family entertained intentions of a respectable livelihood for their son. Back in Brno, Julius started to practice law but, in compensation for his thwarted desires, he spent most of his time as music-critic for the « Brünnener Morgenpost » , the « Tagesboten für Mähren und Schlesien » and the « Brünnener Sonntagszeitung » .

As a young critic and admirer of Johannes Brahms, Korngold had attracted Eduard Hanslick's attention after defending a performance of the 4th Symphony in an essay. Korngold's sympathies are, yet, another example of the false dichotomy history has drawn between Wagnerians and Brahmsians. As a youth, Korngold met with friends, each week, to discuss and analyze Wagner, and his enthusiasm did not wane even as he discovered the music of Brahms.

Korngold befriended the critic and spent time with Brahms during a visit to Vienna. Hanslick was chief music-critic at the most important German-language newspaper « Neue Freie Presse » , and Julius became his « protégé » ; being named his assistant by the 1890's (succeeding Theodor Herzl) . Upon Hanslick's death, in 1904, he assumed his post. Now a noted music-critic, reviewer and front-page feuilletons writer, he was regarded as the top critic in Vienna in the early 20th Century, when that city was viewed as the centre of Classical music.

According to his memoirs, Julius Korngold's move to Vienna with his family, in 1901, was prompted by public ridicule after his critical review of an Opera singer. This allowed him to promote his son's career in that musical capital must have been equally enticing ; indeed, parallels were drawn between the young Erich Wolfgang Korngold (who became one of the leading Hollywood film score composers of his generation) and Mozart, promoted by his father.

Julius named both of his sons after favourite composers : the elder son, Hanns Robert, was named in Schumann's honour ; and Erich's middle-name, Wolfgang, was a tribute to Mozart. In Erich's case, this decision proved portentous. The child showed prodigious musical ability before the age of 6, when his sense of pitch and startling understanding of harmony compelled Julius to engage a relative for piano lessons. It soon became clear that Erich had extraordinary talent as a pianist, improvised brilliantly, and remembered everything he heard or played.

He is most notable for championing the works of Gustav Mahler at a time when many did not think much of him. He was the father of composer Erich Wolfgang Korngold, for whom he wrote (under the pseudonym : Paul Schott) the libretto of the Opera « Die tote Stadt » .

Cosmopolitan in taste, Korngold traveled to the Paris World Exposition of 1900 where he heard Claude Debussy's « la Damaiseille élue » , and he claimed to have been the 1st critic to review Debussy for a German-language newspaper. But he became suspicious of new developments in music. He promoted the careers of Gustav Mahler, Bruno Walter and Richard Strauß but firmly opposed, above all, Arnold Schönberg and the Second Viennese School (Alban Berg, Anton Webern ...) .

Julius Korngold's persistent criticism of the leadership of Richard Strauß as director of the Vienna State Opera became a nation-wide affair. The allegations of the music-critic of the « Neue Freie Presse » against the famous composer and conductor were too often the topic of discussion during the meetings of the board of administrators. The constant traveling of Strauß as guest-conductor contributed to his early resignation, in 1924. It damaged temporarily the relationship between Strauß and Erich Wolfgang Korngold.

One calling-card of 1902, from Julius Korngold to Heinrich Schenker, survived.

In 1906, Heinrich Schenker included Julius Korngold in the list of recipients of a complimentary copy of his « Harmonielehre » .

Being the son of the main music-critic in the most important city for Classical music, and also one of the greatest composing prodigies in music history, was another cute twist of fate for Erich Korngold. Julius Korngold didn't trust his potential bias at 1st and sought the opinion of 40 leading critics everywhere, except Vienna, to judge his 11 year old son's ballet piano score to « The Snowman » . The responses ranged from baffled enthusiasm to bewilderment. One critic in Budapest was so enthused, that he went public with his « finding » - and, before long (against the will of « Papa » Korngold) , « The Snowman » was given a big premiere in a gala performance honoring the Emperor Franz-Josef's Name-Day, on October 4th, 1910.

Julius and his wife, Josefine, had 2 sons. Erich Wolfgang Korngold, the 2nd son, was reportedly beating time with a spoon by the age of 3, and playing basic melodies at age 5. Hanslick himself had referred to him as the « little Mozart » , and the boy seemed to rise to the occasion by starting to compose at the age of 6. The elder Korngold brought his son, at age 8, to see Gustav Mahler, who, after pronouncing him a « genius » (in the words of Alma Mahler) , strongly encouraged the father to continue his son's training and recommended that he study with Alexander von Zemlinsky.

Born in 1897, in Brno, Erich Wolfgang Korngold spent his early years growing-up in Vienna where his father had become one of the leading music-critics of his day : taking-over from the legendary critic Eduard Hanslick at the « Neue Freie Presse » . Erich showed incredible musical precocity. Recognition of his incredible gifts came when father Julius took him to play his Cantata named « Gold » to Gustav Mahler at his apartment on « Auenbruggergasse » . Mahler was one of the greatest and most influential musicians of his day as Director of the Royal Opera in Vienna and an internationally celebrated conductor and composer. Julius Korngold described the meeting in his memoirs : a meeting that took place in June 1906 when Erich was 9 years old. Performing the entire piece from memory, Mahler avidly read the score :

« He began to pace hastily to and fro in the curious limping rhythm peculiar to him when he was excited. He kept exclaiming : “ A genius ! A genius ! ” - in ever more strident tones. The melodic structure, formative power and revolutionary sense of harmony had strongly impressed him. “ Send the boy to Zemlinsky ”, he advised me with mounting urgency. “ No Conservatory ! No drill ! He will learn everything he needs to know from Zemlinsky during free give and take of creative instruction. ” »

Luigi Korngold (Erich Wolfgang Korngold, page 11) describes Erich Wolfgang attending the dress rehearsal of the new production of « The Magic Flute » with his father, in June 1900. Mahler, at the podium, made such an impression on him that, for the rest of his life, he remembered details of the rehearsal, including the tempos and the instructions Mahler gave the singers. In an article published in the « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift » , in 1967, on the occasion of Korngold's 70th birthday, Bruno Walter relates that he knew « only too well » the pianistic and compositional talents of the boy - living, as he did, in the same building as, and directly above, the Korngolds, he had had ample opportunity to hear Erich Wolfgang practise and play « for hours on end » .

In order to understand Erich Korngold's situation as a composer in Vienna, it is essential to have a grasp of just how dominant a figure his father Julius was. Chief music-critic for the « Neue Freie Presse » and successor to Eduard Hanslick, he commanded not just the most important position in Viennese music criticism, he was the arbiter of what was good and bad : in essence, he was the pope of musical taste. Not quite able to speak « ex-cathedra » , perhaps, his word carried weight, so much weight indeed, that his opinions could make artistic life in Vienna impossible for all those arousing his ire. In that sense, Julius Korngold not only shaped the musical life of Vienna but also of Berlin - to which all those who could not get a leg on the ground in hostile Vienna, duly fled.

It is one of the most beautiful ironies in music criticism that there were never before nor ever after Classical music-critics who prepared themselves more diligently for their reviews than Eduard Hanslick and Julius Korngold. Both were more than knowledgeable about music, music theory, and the work they were going to review. Whenever possible, every new work was played through - several times on the piano and painstakingly analyzed before being reviewed. Yet, despite this profundity and seriousness in preparation and self-perception, neither Hanslick or Korngold nor most of their erudite contemporaries were (amid much very perceptive criticism) able to overcome polemical and ideologically tainted attacks on what they thought « should not be » . Those of Hanslick's judgments that now seem ill-considered (Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto, Richard Wagner's music, etc.) are more famous than his ample insight. Julius Korngold loved everything that was in any way related to Gustav Mahler and, otherwise, more or less hated everything that Hanslick would not have liked either.

In 1912, Heinrich Schenker wrote of a campaign by the pianists Leopold Godowsky, Moriz Rosenthal, and Theodor Leschetitzky against Julius Korngold's criticisms, this campaign being related to the body that Schenker himself tried to set-up, the Organization of Creative and Performing Artists. Schenker once included him disparagingly among the « ranks of those noble hermeneuticists » (14 January 1918) . As a regular reader of the « Neue Freie Presse » , Schenker often commented in his diary and in correspondence, usually acidly, on Korngold's pronouncements. Hellmut Federhofer remarks that Schenker « was against music journalism. He knew some of its Viennese representatives, such as Max Graf and Robert Hirschfeld, personally, others, such as Julius Korngold, against whom he repeatedly expressed negative opinions, only from their newspaper articles and reviews. »

Korngold fled Austria, in 1938, at the time of the Nazi « Anschluß » , emigrating to the United States.

Julius Korngold and Gustav Mahler

It was therefore no surprise that Jews and former Jews were bound by circumstance to keep to their own clubs, « cafés » and circles. The limitations imposed by Viennese society were more than compensated for by their presence within the media : newspapers from across the political spectrum such as « Das neue Wiener Tagblatt » , « Die Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » and « Die Arbeiter Zeitung » were all Jewish-owned and run. But it was the powerful « Neue Freie Presse » that ultimately dominated. It represented a paper with balanced, objective and fair reportage that was produced, published and largely written by secular Jews and read by nearly everyone within the educated classes and the highest reaches of government. The « Neue Freie Presse » predictably became a target not only for anti-Semites but, also, for ultra-conservatives on the right and for Social-Democrats and Communists on the left. It was respectful of the monarchy, but unsentimental as soon as it was replaced by a Republic. During the years that Theodor Herzl was editor of its cultural pages, it never once allowed any coverage of Zionism. With Julius Korngold, its primary music-critic from 1904, it became Gustav Mahler's most important supporter and the voice of a younger, self-confident, Jewish musical « élite » .

The biographical parallels between Gustav Mahler and Julius Korngold are quite surprising : both were German-speaking Jewish Moravians born in 1860, in what is today part of the Czech Republic. Both grew-up in aspirational families where the father's income was earned from the sale of spirits. This allowed money and opportunities for the children that the parents were unable to enjoy. In his memoirs, Korngold mentions on more than one occasion the good fortune of growing-up during the years of Liberalism. Like Mahler, he spent time studying with Anton Bruckner while a student in Vienna, which brought him closer to understanding Richard Wagner. Korngold makes little direct reference to his own Jewish origins, but anecdotal accounts from his grandchildren Ernst and George (sons of the composer Erich Wolfgang Korngold) give the impression that though Jewish under Nazi racial law (and perceived as Jewish) , the Korngolds could hardly have been more secular. This was noticeably different from Mahler's family.

The Austrian musician and musicologist Michaël Haber in « Das Jüdische bei Gustav Mahler » offers a very clear picture of Mahler's religious background. We know that Mahler's great-grandfather Abraham Mahler (1720-1800) was a cantor who would have observed strict religious laws. Haber even offers circumstantial evidence suggesting that he may have been Hassidic. Abraham's grandson Bernard (Baruch) Mahler was Gustav's father. Though probably fully assimilated, as can be deduced from accounts and photographs of the time, there is reason to believe that Bernard was, by no means, secular. He and Gustav participated in Jewish holy services, and Bernard was even elected to the educational committee of the Jewish community - not something that would have been possible for a secular Jew in the relatively rural community of Iglau, in 1878. Bernard was also close to the local cantor who stood as godparent to Gustav's sister Justine. This historic background offers enough circumstantial evidence to suggest that Gustav probably celebrated his « Bar Mitzvah » in common with other boys from traditional Jewish families when he was 13. Preparation for that would have required intensive study of liturgical Hebrew and sacred texts.

There is nothing in Julius Korngold's memoirs to suggest that he enjoyed a similar religious upbringing, though the customs of the time may have dictated a minimal adherence. Such adherence would most likely have been a good deal less in the Moravian capital city of Brünn than in rural communities such as Iglau. Haber goes on to quote correspondence between the young Mahler and his family indicating his consciousness as a Jew. As late as 1886, he writes to his sister Justine that she shouldn't worry about him taking a conducting post in Leipzig as even there « one could find synagogues ». Later, Gustav and his siblings would show considerable diligence at putting cultural space between their adult lives and their provincial, religious upbringing while nevertheless making casual references to « the holidays » which could only have been in reference to traditional Jewish Festivals. The Mahlers were obviously from the provinces, but they were not un-sophisticated and they certainly did not belong to one of the communities of bearded, kaftan-wearing Jews of Eastern Europe. Indeed, the pull to German culture probably motivated Bernard to move to German-speaking Iglau, in Moravia, from Czech-speaking Kalischt in Bohemia (where Gustav was born) , as soon as the « October Diploma » of 1860 lifted restrictions on the movements of Jews within these 2 provinces. Later, Alma Mahler makes it clear that her husband never tried to hide his Jewish origins - she was often irritated that he appeared to go-out of his way to draw attention to them.

Julius Korngold, on the other hand, moved seamlessly within the circles of law and journalism where religious confession played no role and he was beholden to no appointing aristocrat. Along with countless other prominent Jews of his generation, including Mahler, he saw no contradiction in being both a Moravian Jew and a German Nationalist, and his earliest articles and reviews were published in the Pan-German Czech paper, « Der treue Eckart ». Eduard Hanslick was alerted to Julius Korngold by Johannes Brahms, who had read a Korngold review in the Moravian press. Initial meetings led to a formal invitation to join the « Neue Freie Presse » from the cultural editor Theodor Herzl, in 1901.

This anti-feudal, capitalistic and secular-Liberal newspaper had been founded in 1848 as « Die Presse ». In 1861, Karl Marx was its London correspondent. In 1864, the editorial staff set-up a new paper that was purchased by Max Friedlander and Michaël Étienne and, henceforth, called : « Die Neue Freie Presse ». The paper benefited from the slow but steady trend of Liberalism that began by defining the separation of administrative powers and haltingly allowed a trickle of widening enfranchisement. One of the most important of these acts was the so-called « February Patent » of 1861, which replaced the « October Diploma » of 1860. Both reforms would come to fruition in the biggest victory of all championed by the paper : the December Constitution of 1867, which began the process of wider emancipation of Jews and brought about a more balanced exercise of powers between Emperor and Parliament. The paper suffered a loss of prestige with the role it played in the disastrous stock-market « Krach » of 1873 but, under the stewardship of Eduard Bacher and Moritz Benedikt (both of whom were also German-speaking Jews from Moravia) , it became the German-language equivalent of the « London Times » and one of the dominant newspapers in Europe. Benedikt eventually was able to buy-out Bacher, and his son Ernst took command of the paper in 1920. At the turn of the Century, it employed 80 to 100 foreign correspondents and the maxim of the day was that it was « impossible to rule the country against the will of the “ Neue Freie Presse ” ». The coup of an interview with Otto Bismarck, which appeared in the paper in 1892, elevated it beyond all other German-language media, and Benedikt was the only journalist the Emperor Franz-Josef would deign to meet.

The influence that the « Neue Freie Presse » and its editor wielded can be further inferred from the attacks by the brilliant Viennese satirist Karl Kraus. In his epic « tragedy in 5 Acts with prologue and epilogue » entitled « Die Letzten Tage der Menschheit », Kraus refers to Benedikt as « Lord of the Hyenas » and ruthlessly parodies both

Julius Korngold and his son, the prodigy Erich Wolfgang. In Kraus's periodical « Die Fackel » , he continuously attacked both paper and editor, once writing that, for Benedikt, « there was no wickedness that he would not represent for money and no value that out of idealism he would not betray » . Kraus's response to an offer made by the « Neue Freie Presse » to become one of its principal feuilletonists, in 1899, was printed in « Die Fackel » :

« There are 2 marvellous things in this world : either to be part of the “ Neue Freie Presse ”, or to loathe it. I never for a moment doubted which I would choose. »

The paper boasted a starry array of contributing politicians and essayists. David Lloyd George wrote an article for the paper, in 1914, arguing against armaments and, after 1918, he continued right through the 1920's , as a regular contributor. Winston Churchill is quoted in an article published by the paper, in 1913, also denouncing current armament policies and, incredibly, Churchill himself wrote an article published during the War, in October 1917. He was a frequent contributor until 1938. Julius Korngold, with his doctorate in law and as a fiercely secular Jew, was a perfect fit for the environment of « Die Neue Freie Presse » . He remained its principal writer on musical matters until Ernst Benedikt was forced to sell his shares, in 1934, to the Austro-Fascist government that had ruled Austria since March 1933. In 1938, after the « Anschluß » and owing to its largely Jewish staff, the Nazis had the paper closed down. By the time of Julius Korngold's departure, in 1934, he had long ceased to be the defender of Mahler's brand of Modernism and had been denounced by the President of the International Society of Contemporary Music, Edward Dent, as modern music's most « formidable enemy » ; a quote Korngold gleefully includes in his memoirs.

According to his memoirs, Julius Korngold's relationship with Gustav Mahler had been cordial ever since his « Neue Freie Presse » article following the Vienna premiere of the 5th Symphony, in December 1905. The open-minded or, at least, moderate position which he, unlike his colleagues, had adopted with regard to the 6th, strengthened their growing friendship, and Mahler began to meet him in « cafés » or at their respective homes. In one of his articles, Korngold dubbed the 6th, the « Hammerblow Symphony » , and the appellation « pleased Mahler, who was amused at the idea of being a demonic Haydn » . « Thus, I explicitly diagnosed the satanic character of this annihilating music » , wrote Korngold. And Mahler responded in a postcard :

« What sort of “ satanic ” thoughts might one have while listening to my new Symphony ?! If you can attract these demons to Essen, I will greet them with joy. »

It was, therefore, only natural that Korngold should turn to Mahler for advice about his son's musical education.

And so, one fine morning in June 1906, I made the pilgrimage to Mahler's apartment in the « Auenbruggergasse » with my little composer, who was practically invisible underneath his straw hat. Erich played his Cantata. He played from memory, as he would always do, even with his most complicated scores Mahler stood by the piano, manuscript in hand, and followed the score. But not for long : soon, he began striding up and down in the room, with the hobbling rhythm he fell into when he was excited. « A genius ! » , he exclaimed from time to time. The melody, power, and revolutionary sense of harmony had so strongly affected him. « Take the lad to Zemlinsky » , he urged. « Above all, no Conservatory, no drill ! In private lessons with Zemlinsky, he will learn everything he needs. » Mahler's advice was soon followed and Erich Wolfgang became Zemlinsky's pupil. Some years later, he visited Mahler again, and played to him several of his new compositions.

Notes

Korngold, who died in Hollywood, was born in Brno, Moravia. Artur Schnabel greatly admired Erich Wolfgang's 2nd Piano Sonata (1908) and played it all over Europe. Erich's Pantomime, « Der Schneemann » , was put on at the « Hofoper » , in 1910. In 1912, the prodigious maturity of his 1st 2 orchestral works, the « Schauspiel » Overture (Opus 4, 1911) and the « Sinfonietta » (Opus 5) , won the enthusiasm of Richard Strauß. Giacomo Puccini later publically praised Korngold's 1st Opera, « Violanta » (Opus 8, 1916) . In 1920, he composed his Masterpiece, « Die tote Stadt » , which opened simultaneously in Hamburg and Cologne but, subsequently, never again achieved the same degree of success. After teaching at the Vienna « Staatsakademie » , Erich Wolfgang emigrated in 1934 to Hollywood where he wrote a number of Lieder, instrumental and orchestral works, but devoted himself mainly to writing film music.

Julius Korngold was referring to Franz-Josef Haydn's « Drumroll » Symphony. Obviously, the article in question was published before the Essen premiere, and Korngold either attended the Philharmonic's sight-reading or Mahler played him the Symphony on the piano.

« Julius Korngold's grandson informed me that Mahler's letters to Korngold had disappeared during the War. » (Henry-Louis de La Grange)

There is an element of doubt about this date, given that it has been changed to « 1907 » (by whom ?) in the only existing partial edition of Julius Korngold's memoirs (in English) . Erich Wolfgang says himself, in an article published for Zemlinsky's 50th anniversary, that he was 11 years old (i.e. 1908) at the time of his 1st lessons, which argues in favour of the corrected date. Nonetheless 1906, the date in Julius Korngold's manuscript, appears slightly more probable for 2 reasons. Erich Wolfgang began working with Zemlinsky, 1 year after the interview with Mahler, and this work continued for 2 years, that is to say, until 1909, when Zemlinsky effectively left Vienna for Mannheim (before moving to Prague, in 1910) . Beside which, in 1907, Mahler, preparing to resign from the Opera, would have been in less of a frame of mind to receive a child prodigy composer (see : Ernest Wolfgang Korngold. « Das Vorbild meiner jungen Jahre » , in : « Der Auftakt » , Prague, 14 October 1921) . The date of June 1906 is continued by Brendan G. Carroll in his biography of Erich Wolfgang.

This Cantata, for solos, chorus, and piano, which Erich Wolfgang had composed in his father's absence, was entitled « Gold » and based on a text written by a schoolmate.

Luzi Korngold (Erich Wolfgang Korngold, page 11) describes Erich Wolfgang attending the dress rehearsal of the new production of « The Magic Flute » with his father, in June 1900. Mahler, at the podium, made such an impression on him that, for the rest of his life, he remembered details of the rehearsal, including the tempos and the instructions Mahler gave the singers. In an article published in the « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift », in 1967, on the occasion of Korngold's 70th birthday, Bruno Walter relates that he knew « only too well » the pianistic and compositional talents of the boy - living, as he did, in the same building as, and directly above, the Korngolds, he had had ample opportunity to hear Erich Wolfgang practise and play « for hours on end » .

Julius Korngold : « Neue Freie Presse » (6 November 1909)

Among Gustav Mahler's most influential supporters was the music-critic for the « Neue Freie Presse » , Julius Korngold. He left Moravia to study law at the University of Vienna and music at the Vienna Conservatory. His memoirs recall private meetings with Anton Bruckner in a beer hall after class, where the professor would carry forth a monologue, often to his student's dismay. When Korngold defended Antonín Dvořák's instrumentation, Bruckner proclaimed :

« Paint a pair of sausages green and blue if you like - isn't it still a pair of sausages ? »

(A more elegant version of this same bias against timbre is Gustav Mahler's comment, in a conversation with his brother, that Tchaïkovsky's instrumentation in the « Pathétique » is no more substantial than a coloured top that ceases to fascinate, once it is no longer spinning.)

Returning to Moravia, Korngold practiced law and worked for the « Brünnener Tagesbote » . As a young critic and admirer of Johannes Brahms, Korngold had attracted Eduard Hanslick's attention after defending a performance of the 4th Symphony. Korngold befriended the critic and spent time with the composer during a visit to Vienna. Korngold's sympathies are, yet, another example of the false dichotomy history has drawn between Wagnerians and Brahmsians. As a youth, Korngold met with friends, each week, to discuss and analyze Wagner, and his enthusiasm did not wane even as he discovered the music of Brahms. Brought onto the staff of the « Neue Freie Presse » by Hanslick, Korngold subsequently became the lead-critic and remained in this post, into the 1930's.

According to his memoirs, Julius Korngold's move to Vienna was prompted by public ridicule after his critical review of an Opera singer. The opportunity the move presented to promote his son's career in that musical capital must have been equally enticing ; indeed, parallels were drawn between the young Erich Wolfgang Korngold (who became one of the leading Hollywood film score composers of his generation) and Mozart, promoted by his father. Cosmopolitan in taste, Korngold traveled to the Paris World Exposition of 1900 where he heard Claude Debussy's « la Damoiselle élue » , and he claimed to have been the 1st critic to review Debussy for a German-language newspaper. A few years later, however, Korngold became suspicious of new developments in music, above all, the work of Arnold Schœnberg. Korngold fled Austria, in 1938, at the time of the Nazi « Anschluß » , emigrating to the United States.

Korngold developed cordial relations with Gustav Mahler following his favourable review of the 5th Symphony. At a time when most critics viciously attacked the composer's 6th Symphony, Korngold took its innovations and developments seriously. From that point on, the 2 had a friendly relationship, meeting regularly at a « café » or at Mahler's house. The 7th Symphony, which had received a resounding endorsement in Prague, from local critics as well as those traveling from Vienna, did not win such warm approval from Korngold. But neither did Korngold need to defend the work, as he had the 5th and 6th Symphonies ; Mahler was, by this point, living in New York and did not require the support of the German-language press. When the 7th Symphony was performed in Vienna, in 1930, Korngold recast part of his original 1909 feuilleton into a more positive review, in part to uphold Mahler as a favourable alternative to the radical « experiments » of Arnold Schœnberg and Paul Dukas.

Julius Leopold Korngold (zusammen mit seinem Sohn Erich Wolfgang Korngold auch unter dem Pseudonym Paul Schott ; geboren 24. Dezember 1860 in Brünn / Mähren, Österreich-Ungarn (heute Brno, Tschechische Republik) ; gestorben 25. September 1945 in Hollywood (Los Angeles, California) war ein österreichischer Musikkritiker, Pianist, Komponist, Librettist, Schriftsteller und Anwalt.

Korngold wurde als älterer Sohn eines jüdischen Kaufmanns geboren (der jüngere war Eduard Korngold, Theaterschauspieler und Schriftsteller, 1863-1939) . Von 1881 bis 1887 studierte er Rechtswissenschaften an der Universität Wien und promovierte dort zum Doktor der Rechte (Doktor juris) . Daneben studierte er am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde unter Franz Krenn und Anton Bruckner Musiktheorie und Harmonielehre. Nach seiner Rückkehr nach Brünn absolvierte Korngold sein Rechtspraktikum. Gleichzeitig arbeitete er als Musikkritiker beim Tagesboten in Brünn. Aus seiner Ehe mit Josefine Witrofski gingen zwei Söhne hervor, der Musiker Hans Robert Korngold (1892-1965) und der Pianist, Komponist und Dirigent Erich Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957) , mit dem Julius Korngold gemeinsame Werke unter dem Pseudonym Paul Schott veröffentlichte. 1901 ließ sich die Familie wieder in Wien nieder. 1902 wurde er auf Johannes Brahms' Empfehlung an die Neue Freie Presse berufen, der er zuerst als Redakteur des Feuilletons, ab 1904 bis 1934 als Musikreferent angehörte. Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich flüchtete die Familie in die USA, wohin sein Sohn bereits 1936 emigriert war.

Im Jahr 1955 wurde in Wien Penzing (14. Bezirk) die Korngoldgasse nach ihm benannt.

Julius Korngold, Sohn eines jüdischen Kaufmanns und Bruder des Schauspielers, Kabarettisten und Schriftstellers Eduard Kornau (1861-1939) , studierte 1881 bis 1887 Rechtswissenschaft an der Universität Wien, wo er 1887 zum Doktor der Rechte (Doktor juris) promoviert wurde. Daneben studierte er Harmonielehre und Musiktheorie am Wiener Konservatorium bei Franz Krenn (1816-1897) und Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) . Korngold heiratete Josefine Witrofsky (1874-1958) , mit der er zwei Kinder hatte : Hans Robert Korngold (1892-1965) , später ein Musiker, und Erich Wolfgang Korngold (1897-1957) , später Komponist, Dirigent und Pianist.

1887 kehrte Julius Korngold nach Brünn zurück, wo er sein Rechtspraktikum absolvierte und bis 1901 als Musikkritiker bei der Zeitung « Tagesbote » (Brünn) arbeitete.

1901 ließ sich Julius Korngold endgültig in Wien nieder, wo er 1902 bis 1934 der Redaktion der « Neuen Freien

Presse » (Wien) angehörte : zunächst als Redakteur des Feuilletons, seit 1904 als Musikreferent.

1938 flüchtete das Ehepaar Korngold in die USA, wohin sein Sohn Erich Wolfgang Korngold bereits 1936 emigriert war, und ließen sich in Hollywood (California) nieder.

Julius Korngold gehörte zum Kreis um Vinzenz Ritter von Miller zu Aichholz (1827-1913) , einem Hauptaktionär der « Marienthaler und Trumauer Actien-Spinn-Fabriks-Gesellschaft » . Auch zum letzten Besitzer der Textilfabrik Marienthal hatte er engen Kontakt : Er und sein Sohn Erich Wolfgang Korngold verkehrten im Kreis der Kunstmäzenin Jenny Mautner (1856-1938) und deren Mann, dem Großindustriellen Isidor Mautner (1852-1930) , welcher seit 1925 auch Besitzer der Textilfabrik Marienthal war.

Julius Korngold gilt heute als bedeutender Vertreter der österreichischen Musikkritik im ersten Drittel des 20. Jahrhunderts.

In einem musikalisch eher desinteressierten Haushalt aufgewachsen, mußte der Gymnasiast Julius Korngold seinen eigenen Weg zur Musik und Literatur finden, nahm Klavierunterricht und lernte im Deutschen Haus in Brünn früh Opern, Operetten und Schauspiele kennen. Das Abiturzeugnis zeigte in allen Fächern « vorzüglich » sowie ein « ausgezeichnet » in « Deutscher Sprache » . An der Wiener Juridischen Fakultät inskribiert, studierte Korngold auch Philosophie, darüber hinaus Musik am Konservatorium bei Anton Bruckner und Josef Hellmesberger. Mit der Hofoper, den Konzerten im Musikverein und dem Burgtheater bot die Großstadt Wien dem Studenten rege kulturelle Abwechslung. Den mit Auszeichnung bestandenen Staatsprüfungen folgte eine Advokatenlaufbahn in Brünn, der Hauptstadt Mährens.

Erste Musikkritiken veröffentlichte Korngold in der « Brünnener Morgenpost » , dem « Tagesboten für Mähren und Schlesien » , einer von ihm gegründeten « Brünnener Sonntagszeitung » und einer Wochenschrift des « Deutschen Klubs » . Ein Brahms-Feuilleton erweckte die Aufmerksamkeit des Wiener Kritiker-Papstes Eduard Hanslick von der liberalen, auch international angesehenen « Neuen Freien Presse » . Hanslick vermittelte Korngold ein Treffen mit Johannes Brahms und bot ihm wenig später eine Anstellung als Kritiker in seinem Ressort an.

Inzwischen mit Josefine Witrofsky verheiratet und mit zwei Söhnen beschenkt - Hans Robert (nach Schumann, 1892) und Erich Wolfgang (nach Mozart, 1897) - , übersiedelte Korngold 1901 nach Wien und trat nach nur kurzer juristischer Tätigkeit 1902 in das Musikreferat der « Neuen Freien Presse » als Assistent Hanslicks ein, dessen Nachfolger er 1904 wurde. Die Ausübung seines Rechtsanwalt-Berufes beendete Korngold hierdurch formal. In den nächsten drei Jahrzehnten war seine Position als erster Chef-Musikkritiker Wiens unangefochten. Er setzte sich für Künstler wie Gustav Mahler, Bruno Walter und Richard Strauß ein, verhielt sich aber zeitlebens der Zweiten Wiener Schule gegenüber ablehnend. Als bedeutendster Musikkritiker im ersten Drittel des 20. Jahrhunderts war Korngold in der Musikwelt nicht unumstritten ; man kann sogar sagen, daß die Zahl seiner Feinde größer war als die seiner Freunde, was zahlreiche Prozesse dokumentieren (Julius Korngold, 1991, Seite 144 ff.) . Darüber hinaus blieb seine Rolle als Förderer seines Sohnes Erich Wolfgang Korngold strittig, der als eines der seltenen komponierenden Wunderkinder weltweit Erstaunen hervorrief und große Erfolge verzeichnete. So führten Künstler wie der Pianist Moriz Rosenthal negative Konzertkritiken Korngolds gern darauf zurück, daß sie selbst eben nicht Werke des Kritikersohnes aufführten. Korngold verteidigte sich stets mit dem Argument, daß berühmte Künstler wie Fritz Kreisler die Werke seines Sohnes weltweit aufführten, gar « Korngold-Wochen » veranstalteten. So versuchte er einen neutralen Weg einzuschlagen, indem er die Uraufführungen der Werke seines Sohnes möglichst nicht nach Wien vergab und die Kritiken über dessen Konzerte in Wien von seinen Kollegen Ernst Decsey (1879-1941) und Josef Reitler (1883-1948) schreiben ließ. Korngolds Libretti zu Werken seines Sohnes, so die zum « Ring des Polykrates », Opus 7, und zur « Die Toten Stadt », Opus 12, veröffentlichte er zudem ohne Namensnennung.

Überregionale Beachtung fand Julius Korngolds hartnäckige Kritik an der Amtsführung von Richard Strauß als Direktor der Wiener Staatsoper. Die Vorwürfe, der berühmte, von Korngold hochgeschätzte Komponist und Dirigent setze die eigenen Werke zu oft auf den Spielplan und sei ständig auf Gastreisen, trugen 1924 zu Richard Strauß' vorzeitiger Demission bei und beschädigten vorübergehend auch das vertrauensvolle Verhältnis seines Sohnes zu Strauß, der ihm Vorbild und Förderer war.

Bis 1934 konnte Ernst Benedikt (1882-1973), der Verleger der « Neuen Freien Presse », Julius Korngold wie auch dessen Kollegen Raoul Auernheimer (1876-1948), Felix Salten (1869-1945) und Stefan Zweig (1881-1942) stets freie Hand lassen und sich uneingeschränkt hinter seine Feuilletonisten stellen. Der Verkauf des Blattes an das austrofaschistische Regime (Österreichische Nationalbibliothek / BlumesbergerS 2002, Band. I, Artikel Ernst Benedikt) hatte die sofortige Pensionierung Korngolds zur Folge. So gewarnt und auf die Rolle des Managers seines immer öfter in Hollywood wirkenden Sohnes beschränkt, verfolgte Korngold insbesondere mit Blick auf seine eigene jüdische Herkunft die politische Entwicklung Österreichs umso aufmerksamer, bereitete die Emigration strategisch vor und verließ Wien sofort nach dem « Anschluß » mit Frau und Enkelkind Ernst mit dem Ziel USA. Sohn Hans (Hanns, John) Korngold, inzwischen umtriebiger Jazzmusiker und Bandleader, folgte im März 1940 über Italien in die USA.

In Kalifornien gab es für deutschsprachige Kritiker nichts zu tun. Freundschaften wie die mit Bruno Walter und Alma Mahler-Werfel wurden gepflegt, eine zaghafte Annäherung an Arnold Schönberg versucht. Regelmäßige Besuche in den Warner Brothers Studios bei seinem Sohn Erich Wolfgang Korngold bewirkten zumindest eine Versöhnung des Kritikers mit der ihm ungewohnten neuen Kunstform Filmmusik und die erfolgreiche Empfehlung, der Sohn möge sich die Rechte an den von ihm in den Filmmusiken verwendeten musikalischen Themen für spätere Konzertkompositionen sichern.

Die erfolglos bleibenden Bemühungen seines Sohnes Erich Wolfgang Korngold, nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs mit seinen Opern auf die Bühnen und mit seinen (vorwiegend neuen) Orchesterwerken in die Konzertsäle zurückzukehren, erlebte Julius Korngold nicht mehr. Enttäuscht und verbittert starb er am 25. September 1945 in Hollywood (California) .

Erich Wolfgang Korngold

Erich Wolfgang Korngold was a child prodigy, a remarkable interwar talent in the musical life of German-speaking Europe, and in his later years, one of the most famous figures in Hollywood's musical establishment. He is remembered today through his many movie scores, but also for his Operatic and instrumental music.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold, one of the most celebrated composing prodigies of all time and a pioneer in the development of the classical Hollywood film score, was born in Brünn, Moravia, on May 29, 1897, the 2nd son of Julius Korngold and Josephine Witrofsky. The family moved to Vienna in 1901 and, in 1904, Julius succeeded his mentor, Eduard Hanslick, as chief music-critic for the highly-influential daily publication, « Neue Freie Presse », a position he held until 1934.

Korngold's remarkable talents were evident from the outset. At the age of 3, he could beat time with a wooden kitchen spoon ; by 5, he was picking-out tunes from Mozart's « Don Giovanni » at the piano and joining his father for informal recitals of 2 and 4 hand duets and, in his 6th year, he was jotting down musical ideas in a small notebook. A distant relative gave him additional keyboard lessons, but it quickly became apparent to Julius that the boy needed more systematic training, and so he sent him to Robert Fuchs, a composer, conductor, and professor of music at the Vienna Conservatory.

During this period, Korngold learned theory, counterpoint and analysis, and the handful of pieces he turned-out at this time are a clear indication of Fuchs' more traditional approach to teaching. In June 1906, Erich played several of his works for Gustav Mahler, who, upon hearing « Gold », a cantata for solo voices, chorus, and piano, promptly declared the boy a genius and recommended that he avoid the rigors of academia altogether and study instead with Alexander von Zemlinsky, known throughout the city as a composer and pedagogue, and as the principal conductor at the « Wiener Volksoper » .

The lessons, which started in mid-1907 and lasted until the summer of 1911, when Zemlinsky left Vienna to assume the Directorship of the « Deutsches Landestheater » in Prague, provided Korngold with a solid grounding in harmony, form, voice-leading and orchestration, as well as the opportunity to improve his already impressive keyboard skills. In addition to a number of works for solo piano, including 2 large-scale Sonatas, a suite of 6 character studies based on scenes from Cervantes' « Don Quixote », and 7 fairy tale pictures inspired by children's stories, Erich also wrote his 1st chamber composition, an ambitious 4 movement Piano Trio. In April 1910, a 4 hand arrangement of his ballet « Der Schneemann » (The Snowman) was presented at a charity gala in Vienna ; that October, Felix Weingartner conducted Zemlinsky's orchestrated version at the « Hofoper » . The premiere was an unqualified success, and the piece soon appeared on some 30 stages in Austria and Germany.

Before long, many of Europe's greatest talents were championing Korngold's music. In April 1910, Bruno Walter, Arnold Rosé, and Friedrich Buxbaum gave the Viennese premiere of the Piano Trio, Opus I ; the following year, his « Schauspiel-Ouverture » , Opus 4, received its debut performance in Leipzig, with Arthur Nikisch conducting the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, and Artur Schnabel introduced the massive Piano Sonata No. 2, Opus 2, to Berlin audiences. In the fall of 1913, Schnabel joined Carl Flesch for the premiere of the Sonata in G major for Violin and Piano, Opus 6, and the Vienna Philharmonic played the « Sinfonietta » in B major, Opus 5, under the baton of Weingartner.

Korngold completed his 1st Opera, a 1 Act domestic comedy entitled « Der Ring des Polykrates » (The Ring of Polykrates) , in the spring of 1914. The work was too short for a single evening's entertainment, so, in order to prevent it from being coupled with an unsuitable partner, the composer provided a companion piece, « Violanta » , a 1 Act tragedy set in 15th Century Venice and based on a libretto by the playwright and novelist Hans Müller, an acquaintance of Julius' from Brünn and a frequent contributor to the « Neue Freie Presse » . Both Operas premiered at the Munich « Hoftheater » , in March 1916, with Bruno Walter conducting ; the double-bill was repeated less than a month later in Vienna, with Selma Kurz and Alfred Piccaver in Polykrates, and Maria Jeritza as the ill-fated heroine in Violanta. In an instant the 19 year old composer had established himself as one of the leading figures in contemporary German Opera.

The First World War had relatively little impact on Korngold's creative endeavors. Although he was drafted into the army in 1916, he escaped active duty when a doctor recognized him and exempted him from service on the front lines. Instead, he maintained the company's archives, led the regimental band, and gave concerts and recitals of his own music to help raise money for the Austrian War Relief Fund. 2 of his finest instrumental compositions, the String Sextet in D major, Opus 10, and the incidental music for a production of « Much Ado about Nothing » , date from this period, as does his best-known and most successful work for the stage, « Die tote Stadt » (The Dead City) , a 3 Act Opera based on « Bruges la Morte » by the Belgian symbolist novelist Georges Rodenbach. After simultaneous premieres in Hamburg (where Korngold served as music-director) and Cologne, on December 4th, 1920, it moved on to even greater success in Vienna the following year, where Maria Jeritza sang the dual roles of Marie and Marietta. In November 1921, « Die tote Stadt » became the 1st German Opera to be mounted at the New York Metropolitan Opera after the War.

During the early 1920's, Korngold wrote songs, chamber pieces and, in response to a commission from Austrian virtuoso Paul Wittgenstein, who had lost his right arm in the War, a single-movement Concerto for piano left-hand and orchestra. His desire to get married and raise a family eventually led him to explore more lucrative artistic ventures. Much to his father's dismay, he concentrated on adapting and conducting the largely-forgotten Operettas of Johann Strauß, Junior ; Korngold's arrangements and re-orchestrations of « Eine Nacht in Venedig » (A Night in Venice ; 1923) and « Cagliostro in Wien » (Cagliostro in Vienna ; 1927) helped spark renewed interest in Strauß' music shortly afterwards. Korngold's 4th, and largest Opera, « Das Wunder der Heliane » (The Miracle of Heliane) occupied him throughout the mid- 1920's. Although it enjoyed a moderate success in Hamburg, in 1927, Heliane failed to win over audiences in Vienna and Berlin, most of whom expected another « Die tote Stadt » . Several backstage intrigues and a public row between Julius and supporters of Ernst Křenek's jazz-infused « Jonny spielt auf » also damaged the Opera's reputation, but Korngold always regarded Heliane as his Masterpiece.

In 1929, Korngold began a long and very productive association with the famed Austrian producer and director Max

Reinhardt, who invited him to collaborate on a new production of « Die Fledermaus » in Berlin. The 2 men had known each other for several years, and Korngold had previously declined a request from Reinhardt to supply music for a production of Schiller's « Turandot », on the grounds that Puccini's Opera of the same name was set to premiere, but this new partnership allowed the composer an opportunity to revisit an Operetta he loved greatly. He and Reinhardt teamed-up again, in 1931, on « Die schöne Helena », a German-language version of Jacques Offenbach's « la Belle Hélène », for which Korngold composed an Overture.

With the Nazi ascendancy in the early 1930's, Reinhardt fled Europe, eventually ending-up in California. In 1934, he asked Korngold to Hollywood to take part in a film adaptation of Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » for Warner Bros. Studios. The worsening political climate in Europe, and the gradual disappearance of a market for his concert and stage works as a result, provided Korngold with an excuse to accept the invitation, and in the fall of that year, he and his wife, Luzi, sailed for the United States. Korngold set about arranging Felix Mendelssohn's incidental music, incorporating other pieces by the composer into the score, and in some cases, writing new, stylistically appropriate passages to link one cue to the next. He later described how after writing various musical sections out, recording them, and then playing them back on the set, he would « conduct the actor in order to make him speak his lines in the required rhythm », a novel approach that most certainly stemmed from his years of experience in the theater.

Over the next 4 years, Korngold traveled regularly between California and Vienna. In addition to writing the scores for « Captain Blood », « Anthony Adverse », « Another Dawn », and « the Prince and the Pauper », and contributing music to « Give us This Night », « Rose of the Rancho », and « The Green Pastures », he continued working on his 5th Opera, « Die Kathrin ». In January 1938, executives at Warner Bros. Studios cabled Korngold, offering him the score to « The Adventures of Robin Hood ». Since « Die Kathrin » was scheduled to premiere that March, he initially declined, but the director of the State Opera urged him to take the assignment. Shortly after arriving back in Hollywood, Korngold received the news that Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg had met with Adolf Hitler at Berchtesgaden ; on March 13, the Nazis annexed Austria (« Anschluß ») . The remaining members of his family, including his oldest son, Ernst, his parents, and his in-laws, managed to escape Vienna at the last possible moment. Within 2 weeks, the Nazis had seized all of his property. Although Julius had rescued a number of manuscripts, the vast majority of the composer's sketches and autographs were left behind. Luckily, 2 representatives from the publishing house of Josef Weinberger broke into the Korngold home, retrieved these items, and packaged them up for shipment to America.

Korngold vowed to abstain from writing anything for the concert-hall or Opera house as long as Hitler, « that monster in Europe », remained in power, choosing instead to support his family (as well as those displaced by the ravages of War and the organizations devoted to their assistance) through the money he made as a film composer. In a career at Warner Bros. Studios that lasted from 1934 to 1946, he penned a total of 18 original scores, far fewer than, for instance, fellow composer Max Steiner, who routinely produced at least that many in a single year, and he won 2 Academy Awards. In his unique contract with the studio, Korngold set strict limits on the number of scores he would write (no more than 2 in a 12 month period) and he asked to be able to turn-down any project he decided was unsuitable. He also demanded, and was given, the right to reuse any of the music as he saw fit, provided it was not in conjunction with another motion picture, a clause that proved especially beneficial as he sought to revive his career after the War.

Korngold's influence as a film composer cannot be overemphasized ; indeed, he played a significant role in establishing the grammar and syntax of the so-called Classical Hollywood film score at precisely the moment when its conventions were being formulated. Along with Steiner, he helped codify the use of clearly identifiable themes for characters, locations and situations, but unlike his colleague, Korngold employed subtle processes of thematic development as a way of drawing attention to relationships between individuals and the dramatic context in which they find themselves. Korngold also refined the practice of placing music just underneath the actor's speaking voice so that dialogue was always audible, and he specified which instruments would be most effective given that voice's distinct intonation. Lastly, Korngold's intimate knowledge of orchestral textures helped standardize the sound of Hollywood film scores. Working with such gifted orchestrators as Hugo Friedhofer and Ray Heindorf, who were able to translate his instructions perfectly, he created a striking aural complement to the visual imagery on the screen, one which greatly influenced a later generation of composers, including John Williams and James Horner.

1945 marked an important turning-point in Korngold's life. His father, who had never been entirely comfortable in Los Angeles, and who had never approved of Erich's decision to focus exclusively on film composition, died after a lengthy illness. The War in Europe also drew to an end. Korngold himself had grown increasingly disillusioned with Hollywood and with the kinds of pictures he was being given, and he was eager to return to writing music for the concert-hall and the stage. In December 1944, he gave his wife the manuscript for a 3d String Quartet ; the following year, largely due to requests from Bronisław Huberman, Korngold began revising a Concerto for violin and orchestra that he had started in the late- 1930's, a work that Jascha Heifetz would premiere in Saint-Louis, in 1947, and record commercially in 1953. In 1946, he also enlarged a Cello Concerto he wrote for the film « Deception » into a larger, single movement piece, and this was performed in Los Angeles and subsequently published as his Opus 37.

Like most of his fellow « émigrés » , Korngold longed for the day when he could return to Europe. The Vienna he and his family finally saw in May 1949 was substantially different from the city they left a little over a decade before. Although reconstruction efforts were well underway, many of the buildings that had been reduced to rubble as a result of the massive Allied bombings, in March 1945, were still in ruins, including the Opera House. Family and friends had either left of their own accord or were victims of the Holocaust ; a few who stayed even resented Korngold for « sitting-out » the War, in California. Moreover, a small cadre of Nazi sympathizers continued to occupy key social and cultural positions in Austria and Germany, and they were determined to prevent Jewish exiles from renewing their pre-War lives and careers.

Despite all of this, Korngold remained upbeat about his prospects. In January 1950, conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler gave the premiere of the Symphonic Serenade for Strings, Opus 39, and the following month, the composer accompanied mezzo-soprano Rosette Anday in a performance of the 5 Songs for middle-voice and piano, Opus 38. Arrangements were also under way to stage « Die Kathrin » , and the State Opera had agreed to mount « Die tote Stadt » . Buoyed by what he thought were positive signs of a belated come-back, Korngold began writing his next major piece, a 4 movement Symphony.

Unfortunately, this optimism proved to be premature. The production of « Die Kathrin », which had been postponed until October due to a strike, was not well-received. Critics complained that the Opera was old-fashioned and that Korngold's brand of overt lyricism was no longer relevant. In addition, the planned performance of « Die tote Stadt » was cancelled because of scheduling problems and artistic differences. Finally, adding insult to injury, a special concert of his music, organized by the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna, in April 1951, was poorly attended, and his former German publishers, Bernhard Schott, Söhne, showed scant interest in reissuing any of the concert or stage works. Once he had been the talk of the town ; now, Korngold felt that he had been forgotten. He decided it was time to take his family back to California.

The director William Dieterle contacted Korngold in 1953, asking him about working on a film biography of Richard Wagner that was to be shot in and around Munich. He had been at Warner Bros. Studios in the 1930's, but Korngold accepted the offer largely out of a sense of responsibility to Wagner's music, which he feared would be subjected to the worst treatment. The project also gave him an excuse to be in Europe for the Viennese premiere of his Symphony in F-sharp, Opus 40, in October 1954. The piece was under-rehearsed and Korngold pleaded that the performance be called-off. While critical reaction was generally favourable, the composer was not satisfied. Sadly, he would not live to hear it played again.

In the remaining years of his life, Korngold began working on a 2nd Symphony and considered writing another Opera, this one based on Franz Grillparzer's « Das Kloster bei Sandomir », but neither project was completed. In October 1956, he suffered a major stroke, and he died on November 29, 1957, at the age of 60.

Over the last 3 decades, Korngold's music for the concert-hall, the Opera house, and the silver-screen has experienced a significant renaissance, thanks not only to the tireless efforts of his youngest son, George, who worked as a recording producer up until his death in 1987, but also to the extensive research efforts of Brendan Carroll, the composer's principal biographer. Almost all of Korngold's extant instrumental, orchestral and vocal works are available on compact disc, several of his most important pieces are regularly programmed around the world, and his film scores have enjoyed a renewed interest.

Few musical figures in the 20th Century, absent involvement with the Adolf Hitler regime, or some catastrophic health crisis, led careers as exalted and successful at one end, as lucrative in their center, and as tragic at their end as Erich Wolfgang Korngold. Exalted in some Viennese circles before the age of 10 as a 2nd Mozart, he outlived that premature media stardom to become a respected serious composer and a notably successful composer of Opera. His name evoked the best that melodic, tonal music had to offer in the 1920's and 1930's - and, then, he found his way to Hollywood, and the welcoming arms of Warner Bros. Studios, and became the most important composer ever to make a home and career in the movie capital.

Korngold was born in Brünn, the capital of Moravia (now, Brno in Czechoslovakia) in the Austro-Hungarian Empire on May 29, 1897. He was the son of Doctor Julius Korngold, who was one of the most influential music-critics in Vienna. The elder Korngold was a controversial figure - Jewish, a conservative figure (who abhorred atonalism and the whole Second Viennese School) , and possessor of an acid-tipped pen in a city rife with intellectual and political ferment and rivalries and an undercurrent of anti-Semitism, Doctor Korngold made his share of enemies with his influence. Julius Korngold (1860-1945) was, himself, a frustrated composer who had studied part-time at the Vienna Conservatory even as he prepared for a legal career - his harmony teacher was Anton Bruckner and his fellow students included Hugo Wolf and Franz Schalk. A career in music was out of the question for Julius Korngold, whose family entertained intentions of a respectable livelihood for their son - in compensation for his thwarted desires, he began writing music criticism in Brünn, and managed to endear himself to Eduard Hanslick, then the most influential critic in Vienna. Korngold became a « protégé » of Hanslick's, his assistant by the 1890's (by which time he and his wife Josefine had 2 sons) and, ultimately, his successor. Erich Wolfgang Korngold, the 2nd son, was reportedly beating time with a spoon by the age of 3, and playing basic melodies at age 5. Hanslick himself had referred to him as the « little Mozart » , and the boy seemed to rise to the occasion by starting to compose at the age of 6. The elder Korngold brought his son, at age 8, to see Gustav Mahler, who, after pronouncing him a « genius » (in the words of Alma Mahler) , strongly encouraged the father to continue his son's training and recommended that he study with Alexander von Zemlinsky.

Within a year, Korngold had written what became his formal Opus 1, a Piano Sonata in D minor and, a year after that, a ballet entitled « The Snowman » . It was during this period of his life, when Korngold was not yet 10 years old, that he even managed to impress the Emperor Franz-Josef with his precocity. Despite a sometimes willful nature and a lack of maturity that made him difficult to deal with, Korngold seemed lead a charmed musical life - when he was 13, his 2nd Piano Sonata was premiered by Artur Schnabel (who kept it in his repertory long after) , and Bruno Walter and Arnold Rosé were 2 of the players who premiered his Piano Trio, Opus 1. Some of the joy that he might have found in these successes was muted by the whisperings of his father's enemies. The elder Korngold was known as a big supporter of his son's career, so much so that it was rumored that he (and not Erich) had written these pieces. Additionally, the father's support led to resentment on the part of members of the music community who, while conceding that the younger Korngold was talented, didn't enjoy the idea that doing anything less than welcoming his music enthusiastically would provoke a negative reaction from the elder Korngold. Depending upon whose accounts one reads, Richard Strauß was either a wholehearted supporter of the boy's career, or intrigued but somewhat wary of his talent.

Korngold's career on the Operatic stage began with a 1 Act piece, « Der Ring des Polykrates » (1914) , which he followed 1 year later with another Operatic work, « Violanta » . Korngold was not yet 20 when he enjoyed acclaim for these 2 works, of which « Violanta » has endured rather longer in the repertory. By that time, the First World War had broken-out, and Korngold was drafted in 1917, but exempted from combat and, instead, made musical director of his regiment. During the next 3 years, the Austro-Hungarian Empire was defeated and dismembered, and the aging Emperor Franz-Josef, who had delighted in his talent as boy, died. Even as his world's axis shifted and his country died and was reborn, Korngold continued working and, in 1920, completed his most celebrated Operatic work, « Die tote Stadt » , which was an immediate hit in Cologne (where it was premiered under the baton of Otto Klemperer) and the rest of the German speaking world and quickly entered the repertory of Covent Garden, in London, and the Metropolitan Opera, in New York. Korngold, by now, had overcome any suggestion of his father's influence as a cover of any lack of quality in his work. He would never entirely overcome the resentment left behind by his father's early assistance, however. Additionally, he was also placed in an awkward position by the increasing controversy of his father's opposition to the 12 tone system of composition.

During the early 1920's, Korngold began a new phase of his musical career when he agreed to prepare a new performing edition of Johann Strauß' Operetta « Eine Nacht in Venedig ». The work had some gorgeous music but had never been a success, mostly owing to its substandard libretto. Korngold revised the libretto, reshaped some of the musical material, and transformed the Operetta into a success, for the 1st time in its 40 year history. Korngold's output of new music during the 1920's included more chamber works, a concert Overture (« Surdam Corda ») , and the Opera « Das Wunder der Heliane ». The latter, premiered in Hamburg on October 7, 1927, was his 1st notable critical failure. In contrast to the rich melodic nature of his earlier works for the Opera house, « Das Wunder der Heliane » was a work steeped in mysticism and a subdued drama. Critics and audiences were disappointed with the work, and it fell-out of the repertory very quickly, although the composer always regarded it as his finest Operatic work. Much more fateful for Korngold was the beginning of his collaboration with theatrical producer Max Reinhardt, in 1929, in a new production of « Die Fledermaus » .

In 1933, Reinhardt brought his stage production of Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » to the Hollywood Bowl, which so impressed executives at Warner Bros. Studios that they engaged the producer to bring it to the screen. He engaged Korngold to arrange the music. What Korngold ended-up doing with « A Midsummer Night's Dream » was similar to the editing he had done on « Eine Nacht in Venedig » . Ideally, Reinhardt wanted to re-use Felix Mendelssohn's music for the movie, but there was not enough of it to underscore a movie running more than 2 hours. Instead, he introduced other Mendelssohn works into the score, as he had with Strauß's music in the Operetta. A « A Midsummer Night's Dream » wasn't a financial success, or even much of an artistic triumph, but Korngold's handling of the music did impress the management at Warner Bros. Ever since 1932, when Max Steiner had revolutionized the notion of scoring sound films, every studio had been looking for its own Steiner - ultimately, Warner Bros. would get the man himself under contract but, in 1933, Korngold fit the bill exactly for the kind of composer for whom they were looking. It is not likely that Jack Warner, the head of the studio, knew or would even have enjoyed Korngold's Operatic or concert works. Like most of the moguls, he was a self-made man of limited education and very narrow experience outside of business, none of it involving serious music. But Korngold's was a name that carried a great deal of respect he had done more with the music for « A Midsummer Night's Dream » than anyone had expected, and more than any Warner Bros. movie (other than the studio's musicals) had done with music since sound had come in. And Warner and his executives liked the music, even if it was Mendelssohn's and not Korngold's own, and the fact that Korngold appreciated the need to work quickly. He was too well-established a composer to be approached in the way that Steiner or his contemporaries, most of them immigrants trying to find security for themselves in America, had been - Korngold was already a success, and had a home in Vienna. In fact, one of his stage works, a pastiche of Johann Strauß music that he had put together into a quasi-biographical narrative called « Waltzes in Vienna » , had already been filmed in England (by no less a director than Alfred Hitchcock, though the director and most scholars regard it as, perhaps, his worst movie) and was making the rounds as a property in Hollywood, where it would ultimately appear as « The Great Waltz » (1937) .

Warner Bros. Studios offered him a 1 year contract, which he turned down. He was later offered a contract with Paramount Studios, through Ernst Lubitsch, to score a musical entitled « Give us this Night ». In the end, between the offers and the counter-offers with which he was presented, Korngold ended-up working on 2 films, simultaneously : « Give us this Night » (1935) for Paramount ; and « Captain Blood » (1935) for Warner Bros. « Captain Blood » delighted both the studio's executives and the movie's large audience. Korngold's music added a richness to the adventure epic's sweeping tale of heroism and triumph over injustice that startled viewers with its inventiveness - the music's presence lent an extra-dimension to the drama, excitement, and beauty of the movie, almost as surely as if it had been shot in Technicolor. In the end, he signed a contract with Warner Bros. that was one of the most generous ever offered a composer in Hollywood. He was free to refuse any project, and to get the 1st choice of any movie on the studio's schedule. Korngold's 3rd score for Warner Bros. was « Anthony Adverse », an epic best-seller that was one of the most ambitious movies in the studio's history. It also won Korngold his 1st Oscar. In between « Captain Blood » and « Anthony Adverse », Korngold wrote and arranged the music for the all-Black cast movie fantasy « Green Pastures ». The studio had not thought the European-born Korngold the natural choice for this film, but he loved working with the script and the spirituals that comprised much of the score.

It was while working on the film that Korngold also revealed something of the naivety in his nature that could be very troubling to those around him - he failed to understand why the Black cast members of the film did not eat in the main studio dining-room, and had to be told about the segregation that existed ; he subsequently declined to eat in the dining-room, embarrassing all of those around him in the process. Yet, that same naive nature about politics and human nature also put him and his family at real risk. Despite his enjoyment of the climate in California and his appreciation of the very high-salary he was paid, Korngold's real desire was to return to the Opera stage in Europe with a triumph. This was to have been « Die Kathrin », which was to be premiered at the Vienna State Opera. Unfortunately, even as the production was in preparation, political events in Europe were making it increasingly clear that Austria would soon join Germany as a locale closed to Jews. Korngold's contract with Warner Bros. had run-out, in 1937, and he returned to Vienna. He had been offered a new contract by the studio, and the chance to score « The Adventures of Robin Hood », the newest costume movie starring Errol Flynn, who had been introduced to American audiences as the star of « Captain Blood ». The composer had looked at the script, however, and turned it down, believing that there movie had too many sword fights and other action scenes, which would distract people from any music that he might compose.

Korngold had hopes as late as the beginning of 1938 that his real future lay in Austria. Luckily for him and his family, reason prevailed. The German troops on the border were an ominous presence, and no one doubted that if the Austrian government did not agree to annexation (which, to its eternal credit, it did not) that Adolf Hitler would carry it out by force. Korngold accepted the offer of the film and the contract, and got his father and the rest of his family out of the country and safely to Hollywood with only days to spare. The score for « Die Kathrin » was smuggled-out of the country after the work was banned by the Hitler government, its pages hidden between the pages of other music manuscripts (the Opera was eventually premiered in Stockholm, a year later, but did not really find an audience of any kind until the 1990's) . Korngold was now in Hollywood for the long haul, and he acquitted himself marvelously - indeed, the « Robin Hood » score that he had not wanted to write earned him his 2nd Oscar. He was looked on with jealousy by some contemporaries, at Warner Bros. and elsewhere, who worked on as many as 6 or 7 feature films a year while Korngold did his 2. Additionally, Korngold was the only composer on the Warner Bros. lot and, perhaps, in all of Hollywood or in the entire world's movie industry, who had sufficient stature and respect that he could go to a director or the head of the editing department and ask for a few extra-seconds of film in a particular scene or shot, to make his music work better. Additionally, his contract required that Korngold's name be credited with its own separate frame in the movie's main titles, and that his name be included in any advertising or promotional materials that mentioned the name of the director.

What made Korngold special, of course, was his music. He described his movie scores as « Operas without words » and, at their best, those scores served the same function that underscoring in an Opera did on the stage, and then some. In this music for « The Sea Hawk » (1940) , for example, he helped elevate the movie to a level of seriousness suggested in the script, but never stated outright - that the Elizabethan struggle against Spain and the Armada was the precedent for the contemporary British resistance to Adolf Hitler's pending invasion ; he even found room to express a subjective appreciation for beauty on the screen, the love theme for Brenda Marshall's heroine being one of the most achingly, passionately, quietly gorgeous pieces of music to appear in a Hollywood film to date ; yet, at the same time, he never lost sight in his music of the movie's costume-adventure nature, or its need for a rousing underscore to the acts of derring-do of Flynn's Captain Geoffrey Thorpe. Korngold's music could be bold and passionate, as in « Kings Row » , or subtle and Romantic, as in the case of « The Constant Nymph » , but it was always polished. It was often difficult to tell where his movie music ended and his concert work began, on those rare occasions where they did overlap - the final movement of his Violin Concerto uses some of the same material found in his score for the 1937 film « The Prince and the Pauper » , but it is not clear which borrowed from which, as their compositions overlapped (though the Concerto did not surface until the 1940's) ; and no one ever complained about the overlap.

Korngold was in Hollywood for a total of 14 years, during which he scored 17 films, 16 of them for Warner Bros. During that 14 years, the 3rd « Reich » came and went, and the world changed, and Hollywood with it. He was grateful for the refuge it had given him and his family, but he wanted to return to Austria. Additionally, there weren't too many movies still being made in Hollywood of the kind that Korngold liked to score - a new, post-War realism was taking-over, which did not lend itself to the kind of dense scoring and melodic richness that were Korngold's « forte » . He left Hollywood in 1947 and returned to Vienna and, thus, began the final, bittersweet chapter in Korngold's life. He discovered that he was either forgotten, ridiculed, or actively resented in the city he had thought of as his home - forgotten by audiences destroyed by 7 years of Nazi rule and 4 years of Allied bombings ; ridiculed by the music intelligentsia, who regarded his tonal music as hopelessly outdated ; and resented by a populace who had endured bombings and starvation (which was still going on) while Korngold and his family had safely exiled themselves to Hollywood and a life of luxury (they overlooked the fact that Korngold and his family would almost certainly have ended-up in concentration camps and also ignoring the idea that anyone but a dedicated Nazi would have refused the guarantee of a good income and a welcoming employer in a city where the sun shined more than 300 days of the year, for the chance to live in a city occupied by goose-stepping soldiers) .

Wilhelm Furtwängler, the most revered conductor in the German-speaking world, tried to pave the way for Korngold's return, conducting the premiere of his Serenade for Strings with the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1950, but the critical reception was cold. A revival of « Die tote Stadt », in Vienna, was announced and then cancelled, and « Die Kathrin », which had never been seen in the city for which its premiere had been intended, was also cancelled. Korngold continued writing and, in 1950, finished his last major concert work : his Symphony. Again, it was neglected in his homeland, even the Symphonic genre, by then regarded as archaic, although it slowly found an audience elsewhere in Europe. He returned to the film world one last time, in 1954, at the behest of director William Dieterle (who had co-directed « A Midsummer Night's Dream ») , to score the movie « Magic Fire » . A rushed dramatization of the life of Richard Wagner, the German-made film's best element was the music, which was summarized in reasonably eloquent fashion, despite the need to heavily edit every piece of music represented (the most extreme example of which was the closing montage, in which « Parsifal » is represented by about 90 seconds of music and footage) .

Korngold's health began to fail in 1957, and he died late that year. At the time of his death, ironically, Lionel Newman had just conducted a modern re-recording of excerpts from some of Korngold's most celebrated movie music. Over the next 15 years, his music would grow in prominence and recognition as the movies for which it had been written, including « Captain Blood » , « The Sea Hawk » , « The Adventures of Robin Hood » , and « Kings Row » , got a new round of exposure on television (Warner Bros. had sold-out its TV rights, in 1955) and in repertory and revival theaters. By the dawn of the 1970's, Korngold's own son, George, now a producer, had prepared a new album of modern re-recordings of his father's best movie music as part of « RCA Victor » 's « Classic Film Scores » series, featuring Charles Gerhardt conducting.

In the decades since that time, new recordings of complete Korngold scores have started appearing with a regularity from a multitude of labels, including « Bay Cities » and « Varèse Sarabande » . Additionally, the rediscovery of Korngold « the film composer » has led to a fresh round of recording of his concert work, as well as new performances - in 1996, John Mauceri conducted the New York Philharmonic in the 1st New York performance ever given of Korngold's Serenade for Strings. For many years, « Die tote Stadt » was virtually alone among extant Korngold works on record, the « RCA Victor » recordings by conductor Erich Leinsdorf having grown-out of a mid-1970's revival of the Opera at the Metropolitan Opera. Rudolph Kempe had recorded the Symphony, in the early 1960's, which bounced in and out of print for decades. It has since been joined in the catalog by at least 2 additional recordings of the Symphony, and much of Korngold's chamber music has now been recorded along with « Die Kathrin » and his other Operas. The result, coinciding with the Korngold Centennial year of 1997, was more of his music becoming available for the hearing than at any time in history, virtually his entire published output of major works.

The Austro-Hungarian composer Erich Wolfgang Korngold (who adopted the American nationality, in 1943) was born on 29 May 1897 in Brno (Brünn) , South Moravia (Czech Republic) ; and died on 29 November 1957 in North Hollywood, California. He was buried at the « Hollywood Forever » Cemetery.

While his late- Romantic compositional style was considered well out of vogue at the time he died, his music has more recently undergone a re-evaluation and a gradual re-awakening of interest. Along with such composers as Max

Steiner and Alfred Newman, he is considered one of the founders of film music. Korngold's 1938 Academy Award for his score to « The Adventures of Robin Hood » marked the 1st time an Oscar was awarded to the composer rather than the head of the studio music department (as had occurred, for example, with Korngold's award-winning score to « Anthony Adverse » , in 1936) .

He was born in a Jewish home in Brünn (Brno) , Austria-Hungary (now, the Czech Republic) , the 2nd son of eminent music-critic Julius Korngold. A child prodigy, Erich played his Cantata entitled « Gold » to Gustav Mahler, in 1909 ; Base on Alma's memoirs, Mahler called him a « musical genius » and recommended study with composer Alexander von Zemlinsky. Richard Strauß also spoke very highly of the youth. At the age of 11, he composed his ballet « Der Schneemann » (The Snowman) , which became a sensation when performed at the Vienna Court Opera, in 1910, including a command performance for Emperor Franz-Josef. This work was followed 1st with a Piano Trio, then, his Piano Sonata No. 2 in E major, which Artur Schnabel played throughout Europe. During his early years, Korngold also made live-recording player piano music rolls for the « Hupfeld DEA » and « Phonola » system and also the « Aeolian Duo-Art » system, which survive today and can be heard.

Korngold wrote his 1st orchestral score, the « Schauspiel » Overture when he was 14. His Sinfonietta appeared the following year, and his 1st 2 Operas, « Der Ring des Polykrates » and « Violanta » , in 1914. He completed his Opera « Die tote Stadt » , which became an international success in 1920, at the age of 23. At this point, Korngold had reached the zenith of his fame as a composer of Opera and concert music. Composers such as Richard Strauß and Giacomo Puccini heaped praise on him, and many famous conductors, soloists and singers added his works to their repertoires. He completed a Concerto for Piano Left-Hand for pianist Paul Wittgenstein, in 1923, and his 4th Opera, « Das Wunder der Heliane » , 4 years later. He also started arranging and conducting Operettas by Johann Strauß II and others while teaching Opera and composition at the Vienna « Staatsakademie » . Korngold was awarded the title professor « honoris causa » by the president of Austria.

Max Reinhardt, with whom Korngold had collaborated on the Operettas « Die Fledermaus » and « la Belle Hélène » , asked the composer to come to Hollywood, in 1934, to adapt Felix Mendelssohn's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » incidental music for his film version of the play. Over the next 4 years, he became a pioneer in composing film scores that have been recognized ever since as Classics of their kind. In 1938, Korngold was conducting Opera in Austria when he was asked by Warner Brothers Studios to return to Hollywood and compose a score for « The Adventures of Robin Hood » (1938) , starring Errol Flynn. He agreed and returned by ship. When, shortly after, he arrived in California, the « Anschluß » took place, the condition of Jews in Austria became very perilous and Korngold stayed in America. Korngold later stated :

« We thought of ourselves as Viennese ; Hitler made us Jewish. »

Korngold later would say the film score of « The Adventures of Robin Hood » saved his life. He won the Academy Award for Best Original Score for the film, and was later nominated for « The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex » (1939) and « The Sea Hawk » (1940) . A Korngold authority wrote :

« Treating each film as an “ Opera without singing ” (each character has his or her own leitmotif) , Korngold created intensely Romantic, richly melodic and contrapuntally intricate scores, the best of which are a cinematic paradigm for the tone poems of Richard Strauß and Franz Liszt. He intended that, when divorced from the moving image, these scores could stand alone in the concert-hall. His style exerted a profound influence on modern film music. »

(Brendan G. Carroll. Erich Wolfgang Korngold, The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians.)

In 1943, Korngold became a naturalized citizen of the United States. The year 1945 became an important turning-point in his life. His father, who had never been entirely comfortable in Los Angeles, and who had never approved of Erich's decision to focus exclusively on film composition, died after a lengthy illness. Around the same time, the War in Europe drew to an end. Korngold himself had grown increasingly disillusioned with Hollywood and with the kinds of pictures he was being given, and he was eager to return to writing music for the concert-hall and the stage. Korngold stopped writing original film scores after 1946. His final score at Warner Bros. was for « Deception » starring Bette Davis, Paul Henreid, and Claude Rains. However, he was asked by « Republic Pictures » to adapt the music of Richard Wagner for a film biography of the composer, released in « Trucolor » , as « Magic Fire » (1955) , directed by William Dieterle from a script by Ewald André Dupont. Korngold also wrote some original music for the film and had an unbilled cameo as the conductor Hans Richter.

After World War II, Korngold continued to write concert music in a rich, chromatic late- Romantic style, with the Violin Concerto among his notable later works.

Despite his achievements, Korngold for years attracted almost no positive critical attention, but considerable critical disdain. Then, in 1972, « RCA Victor » released an LP entitled : « The Sea Hawk » , featuring excerpts from Korngold's film scores performed by the National Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Charles Gerhardt and supervised by the composer's son, George. (This album and other classic film scores by Hollywood composers were later issued by « RCA » on CD, in Dolby Surround Sound.) This was followed by recordings of Korngold's Operas and concert works, which led to performances of his Symphony and Concertos, as well as other compositions.

In 1973, Warner Brothers Studios released special LPs featuring excerpts from the original soundtracks of films scored by Korngold, as well as a rare recording of Korngold playing the main-theme from « Kings Row » on the piano. In addition, a KFWB radio broadcast from 1938 with Korngold conducting the Studio Orchestra in excerpts from « The Adventures of Robin Hood » , narrated by actor Basil Rathbone, was released on LP. In 1975, « Die tote Stadt » was revived to capacity houses in New York.

There have also been a number of new digital recordings of Korngold's film scores, as well as some of his concert works, especially his Violin Concerto and his Symphony. « RCA Victor » was the 1st to record a complete Korngold Opera (in stereo) , in 1975 : « Die tote Stadt » , conducted by Erich Leinsdorf in Germany. In 1980, « CBS Masterworks » recorded the Opera « Violanta » , under the baton of Marek Janowski ; this recording has been re-released by « Sony Classical » , in 2009. In 1993, « Decca » released a recording of « Das Wunder der Heliane » conducted by John Mauceri in their « Entartete Musik » series. Korngold's 2 remaining Operas, « Der Ring des Polykrates » and « Die Kathrin » have both been recorded (in 1996 and 1998, respectively) by the German record label « CPO » . This company also released 4 CDs of Korngold's orchestral works with Werner Andreas Albert conducting the « Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie » . The American conductor-pianist Alexander Frey is currently recording Korngold's complete original piano works for « Koch International Classics » . In 2001, « ArtHaus Musik » released a documentary DVD entitled : « Erich Wolfgang Korngold - The Adventures of a Wunderkind » . Double bass soloist Joel Quarrington recorded a transcription of the « Garden Scene » from Korngold's incidental music to « Much Ado About Nothing » , Opus 11, on his 2008 CD, also entitled : « Garden Scene » . Quarrington won a Juno Award for the album. In 2009, Korngold's Violin Concerto was released on the « Naxos Records » label, along with « Overture to a Drama » , Opus 4, and the concert suite from « Much Ado About Nothing » , performed by the « Orquesta Sinfonica de Mineria » and violinist Philippe Quint.

Further recognition came in the 1990's ; 2 full-scale biographies of him appeared almost simultaneously. One is Jessica Duchen's « Erich Wolfgang Korngold » , in : the « 20th Century Composers » series, Phaidon Press (1996) . The other is Brendan G. Carroll's « Erich Korngold : The Last Prodigy » , Amadeus Press (1997) . Carroll is President of the International Korngold Society. Carroll has released excerpts of acetates with Korngold conducting the Warner Brothers Studio Orchestra in music from his film scores, some possibly taken from KFWB radio broadcasts. In addition, the soundtrack recordings of Korngold conducting some of the film scores have been issued on CDs. On British television, in the 1970's, André Previn conducted 1 movement from the Violin Concerto, and then told the story of the « famous » American music-critic who declared that « Korngold's Violin Concerto is more corn than gold. » . Previn then pointed-out that the critic is no longer remembered whereas Korngold is.

The American Film Institute ranked Korngold's score for « The Adventures of Robin Hood » as No. 11 on their list of the greatest film scores. His scores for the following films were also nominated for the list :

Deception (1946) .

Kings Row (1942) .

Rudolf Dittrich

Le musicien autrichien Rudolf Dittrich est né le 25 avril 1861 à Biala, en Galicie (la partie polonaise de l'Autriche-Hongrie) - aujourd'hui, Bielsko-Biała, en Pologne ; et est mort le 16 janvier 1919 à Vienne. Il fut conseiller étranger au Japon pendant l'ère Meiji. Il contribua à introduire la musique occidentale dans le pays du Soleil-Levant.

Le jeune Rudolf reçoit sa formation de base de son père, Anton Julius Dittrich (1825-1914) , qui était professeur de musique. Le garçon étudie le piano dès l'âge de 5 ans ; le violon à partir de 7 ans ; l'orgue à partir de 9 ans ; et la théorie musicale dès l'âge de 10 ans. À 15 ans, il part étudier à Breslau, où il recevra son diplôme de niveau secondaire. En 1878, il s'inscrit au Conservatoire de musique de Vienne (le « Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») . Il se spécialise dans la Maîtrise du violon avec le directeur Josef Hellmesberger, junior (1855-1907) ; de l'orgue, de l'harmonie, du contrepoint et de la composition avec les professeurs Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) et Franz Krenn (1816-1897) ; et du piano avec le professeur Wilhelm Schenner (1839-1913) .

Dittrich excelle en tant qu'étudiant, recevant les meilleures notes dans toutes les catégories. Il remporte même plusieurs prix. En 1880, il finit 2e dans un concours de violon en interprétant le Concerto en ré mineur de Louis Spohr. En 1882, il remporte le 1er prix d'orgue en jouant la fugue en sol mineur de Jean-Sébastien Bach et le 1er prix de violon en jouant la Chaconne tirée de la Sonate en ré mineur, sans accompagnement. Il fait également partie d'un orchestre symphonique et joue de la musique de chambre avec ses confrères.

Dittrich entretient des relations particulièrement étroites avec Anton Bruckner (celui-ci deviendra l'un de ses nombreux supporters) , mais aussi avec des membres de la famille Hellmesberger. Le frère-cadet de son professeur de violon, Ferdinand (1863-1940) , un violoncelliste, était un de ses camarades de classe. En 1882, ce dernier reçoit, en plus de son diplôme en violon, la médaille d'argent de la « Gesellschaft für Musikfreunde » .

Une fois diplômé, Dittrich continue de jouer de l'orgue et du violon. Il touche l'orgue pour le baron Nathaniel Mayer Anselm « Freiherr » von Rothschild (1836-1905) ; accompagne les services religieux à la synagogue, fort probablement à l'important temple situé sur la « Schmalzhofgasse » (qui sera détruit par les Nazis, en 1938) ; ainsi que dans les diverses églises où le chef Hans Richter (1843-1916) organise des concerts pour chœur avec instruments. Il joue du violon (ou, parfois, de l'alto) avec le Quatuor Hellmesberger lorsque l'ensemble met au programme des œuvres de plus grande taille.

En novembre 1886, Dittrich épouse une chanteuse nommée Petronella Josefina Leopoldine Lammer (née le 15 septembre 1860 et morte le 4 janvier 1891) .

En 1888, l'invitation à se rendre au Japon origine de ses liens avec la famille Hellmesberger. En effet, Josef (senior) le recommande à l'ambassadeur du Japon, sous le gouvernement de Meiji ; il conseille au jeune homme d'accepter la proposition. Par contre, Anton Bruckner n'est pas du tout impressionné. Lorsque Dittrich vient lui dire au revoir, le vieux Maître peut à peine contenir son agitation :

« Quoi, où allez-vous ? Pour le Japon ; le Japon ? Adieu ! »

Bruckner s'est peut-être demandé pourquoi donc, au nom du ciel, Dittrich laissait derrière lui une carrière si prometteuse. Mais la concurrence à Vienne était des plus intenses et l'avenir immédiat n'offrait vraiment rien de bien rassurant. Le gouvernement japonais lui offre ainsi un généreux salaire. Mais grâce à l'insistance de Dittrich et le soutien d'Hellmesberger, on lui accorde le titre de 1er « directeur artistique » de l'École de musique de Tokyo (l'actuelle Université des Arts de Tokyo) : un poste qui, cependant, n'accorde pas de pouvoirs décisionnels.

Dittrich devient ainsi conseiller étranger avec un contrat de 3 ans en poche. Son épouse travaille également dans cette institution. Ils préparent ensemble des spectacles au « Rokumeikan ». Dittrich donne ses cours en anglais, il enseigne le violon, le piano, l'orgue et la théorie et la composition musicale. Il est cependant connu pour être un enseignant très sévère, au point que ses élèves débrayent à une occasion. Néanmoins, beaucoup de ses étudiants vont devenir de grands musiciens.

En 1891, la femme de Dittrich meurt d'une embolie pulmonaire. Au même moment, l'École connaît des difficultés financières car le gouvernement se prépare à la 1^{re} guerre sino-japonaise et retire donc ses subventions. En dépit de toutes ces difficultés, le contrat de Dittrich est renouvelé en 1891, pour 3 ans de plus.

Entre 1891 et 1892, Dittrich commence à fréquenter une joueuse de shamisen et enseignante japonaise, Kiku Mori, avec qui il a un fils hors-mariage nommé Otto Mori. Sa nouvelle compagne l'assiste dans la traduction des paroles et adapte sa musique aux standards japonais telles qu'elles apparaissent dans ses publications de 1894 et 1895.

Dittrich quitte le Japon en août 1894, 1 mois avant l'expiration de son contrat, abandonnant sa conjointe mais en laissant des dispositions visant à fournir un soutien financier à son fils, qui deviendra plus tard violoniste professionnel. Son petit-fils est l'acteur de cinéma Jun Negami.

À son retour, en 1894, il n'est pas évident de se trouver un poste dans la capitale autrichienne mais Dittrich prouve qu'il est toujours un musicien exceptionnel. Très peu de musiciens étrangers (qui ont enseigné au Japon comme lui) en ont fait autant, une fois revenu dans leur pays d'origine. La 1^{re} année, il est actif en tant que violoniste et altiste dans des concerts de musique de chambre. Ainsi, en décembre 1894, il est le second violon lors de 2 concerts du Quatuor Hellmesberger. Il décide cependant de concentrer sa carrière à l'instrument de l'orgue, autant comme interprète que comme professeur (alors qu'il privilégiait le violon, au Japon) .

Le 10 juillet 1900, Dittrich épouse, en seconde noce, Katharina Kriegle.

Il joue de façon régulière à la Chapelle de la Cour impériale. En 1901, il devient l'un des 3 organistes de l'Empereur (il succède ainsi à son mentor, Anton Bruckner, qui fut promu comme 3^e organiste en 1868) . À partir de 1906, il enseigne l'orgue au Conservatoire de Vienne, et est officiellement nommé professeur en 1909.

En plus de sa carrière d'interprète, Dittrich est également actif en tant que président de l'Association Impériale autrichienne de pédagogie musicale. Il dirige plusieurs chorales et est reconnu comme un expert de l'orgue (il sera mandaté principal concepteur du nouvel instrument à être installé dans la salle du « Musikverein ») .

Il continue à composer des œuvres brèves basées sur des mélodies japonaises qu'il a recueillies lors de son séjour au pays du Soleil-Levant. Sa Marche intitulée « Tekona » , créée lors d'une fête musicale au jardin (« garden-party ») se veut un immense succès (la fanfare doit même l'offrir en rappel) . Été 1915, il reçoit la permission de consacrer sa paraphrase du « Kaiserlied » devant le « Kaiser » Franz-Josef.

Lors d'un concert, le 18 octobre 1916, Rudolf Dittrich s'effondre sur scène victime d'un accident vasculaire cérébral. Sans jamais vraiment récupéré, il meurt à Vienne le 16 janvier 1919, à l'âge de 57 ans. Il laisse dans le deuil sa seconde épouse et ses 2 fils.

Sa vie n'est pas sans rappeler l'Opéra « Madama Butterfly » de Giacomo Puccini.

The Austrian musician Rudolf Dittrich was born on 25 April 1861 in Biala, Galicia, the Austrian section of Poland (now, Bielsko-Biała) ; and died on 16 January 1919 in Vienna. He is noted for his role in bringing Western music to Japan during the late- 19th Century.

Young Rudolf received his early training from his father Anton Julius Dittrich (1825-1914) , a music teacher. The boy studied piano from the age of 5 ; violin from age 7 ; organ from age 9 ; and music theory from the age of 10. At the age of 15, he moved to Breslau, where he graduated from high-school. In 1878, he enrolled at the Vienna Conservatory (« Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») , where he studied violin with Josef Hellmesberger, junior (1855-1907) ; organ, harmony, counterpoint and composition with Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) and Franz Krenn (1816-1897) ; and piano with Wilhelm Schenner (1839-1913) .

Bruckner became rapidly a good friend of Dittrich. The Master later became one of his sponsors. He excelled as a student, receiving top-grades in all his subjects and even winning several prizes ; in 1880, he came 2nd in a violin competition with a performance of Louis Spohr's Concerto in D minor and, in 1882, he won 1st prizes on the organ and the violin playing the fugue in G minor by Johann Sebastian Bach and the Chaconne from Bach's unaccompanied Violin Sonata in D minor. Dittrich also participated in an orchestra and played chamber music with his fellow students. He enjoyed particularly close relationships with Bruckner and members of the Hellmesberger family ; his violin teacher's younger brother Ferdinand (1863-1940) , a cellist, was a fellow student. In 1882, he graduated, receiving a Silver medal from the « Gesellschaft für Musikfreunde » with his violin diploma.

After graduation, Dittrich continued to perform on the organ and the violin. He played the organ for Baron Nathaniel Mayer Anselm « Freiherr » von Rothschild (1836-1905) and, for services in a synagogue, possibly the large one on « Schmalzhofgasse » (destroyed by the Nazis, in 1938) , as well as in various churches and at choral concerts conducted by Hans Richter (1843-1916) . He played the violin (or, sometimes, the viola) with the Hellmesberger Quartet when they performed works for larger ensembles. His invitation to Japan resulted from his relationship with the Hellmesbergers ; Josef Hellmesberger, senior, who had recommended him to the Japanese ambassador, advised him to take the job. His other mentor, Bruckner, was not impressed. When Dittrich came to say goodbye, he could hardly contain his agitation :

« What, where are you going ? To Japan - to Japan ? Farewell ! »

Bruckner may well have wondered why, on earth, Dittrich was leaving a promising career behind. Competition in Vienna, however, was stiff and the immediate future promised no vacant position. The Japanese government offered a generous salary, and thanks to Dittrich's insistence and possibly Hellmesberger's backing, he received the title of « artistic director » , a title which, however, did not imply corresponding powers of decision.

In November 1886, Dittrich married a singer named Petronella (nicknamed « Perine ») Josefine Leopoldine Lammer ; born on 15 September 1860 - died on 4 January 1891.

Dittrich was hired by the Meiji government of Japan as a foreign advisor on a 3 year contract and arrived in Tokyo, in 1888, as the 1st Art-Director of the Tokyo School of Music (now, the Tokyo National University of Fine-Arts and Music) . Dittrich and his wife both worked at the school, and also gave performances at the « Rokumeikan » . Dittrich was fluent in English, and also taught his students English conversation along with violin, piano, organ, theory, and composition. However, he was known as a very severe teacher and, at one point, his students marched-out on strike against him. However, many of his students went on to distinguished careers.

Near the end of Dittrich's 1st term, in 1891, his wife died from a pulmonary embolism. Furthermore, the school faced financial difficulties as the government withdrew its support to divert funds for the upcoming 1st Sino-Japanese War. In spite of his school's difficulties, Dittrich's contract was renewed in 1891, for another 3 year period.

Sometime, in 1891 or 1892, Dittrich formed a relationship with a Japanese shamisen performer and instructor, Mori Kiku, with whom he had a son out of wedlock, named Otto Mori. Mori Kiku also assisted Dittrich in translating the lyrics and transposing the music for the Japanese songs which appeared in his 1894 and 1895 publications.

Dittrich left Japan 1 month before the expiration of his contract, in August 1894, abandoning his common-law family, but leaving provisions to provide financial support for his son, who later became a professional violinist. His grandson was the movie actor Jun Negami.

After returning to Vienna, in 1894, Dittrich had to struggle to find a position. In the 1st years after his return, he was active as a violinist and violist in chamber music concerts. Eventually, he secured more stable employment, rising to become, in 1901, one of 3 Hapsburg Court organists. In that role, he was a successor to his mentor Anton Bruckner, appointed Court organist in 1868. In 1906, Dittrich became professor of organ at the Vienna Conservatory. He was a principal designer for the great new organ in the « Musikverein » concert-hall.

On July 10, 1900, Dittrich married his 2nd wife, Katharina Kriegl, who bore him 2 sons.

Dittrich collapsed while performing in a concert, on 18 October 1916, and never fully recovered. He died in Vienna on 16 January 1919.

...

Rudolf Dittrich was recommended to the Japanese ambassador in Vienna (Toda Uchitaka) by Josef Hellmesberger, Senior (1828-1893) , the director of the Vienna Conservatory. Japanese authors make much of the fact that Dittrich was an artist rather than a mere pedagogue and of how the choice reflected Isawa Shūji's high-ambitions for Western music in Japan. Dittrich's credentials were indeed impressive. Born in Biala in what was then the Austrian section of Poland, he received his early training from his father Anton Julius Dittrich (1825-1914) , a music teacher. According to the « curriculum vitae » , he submitted to the Tokyo Academy of Music, he studied piano from the age of 5 ; violin from age 7 ; organ from age 9 ; and music theory from the age of 10. At the age of 15, he moved to Breslau, where he graduated from high-school. In 1878, he enrolled at the Vienna Conservatory (« Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») , where he studied violin with Josef Hellmesberger, junior (1855-1907) ; organ, harmony, counterpoint and composition with Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) and Franz Krenn (1816-1897) ; and piano with Wilhelm Schenner (1839-1913) . He excelled as a student, receiving top-grades in all his subjects and even winning several prizes ; in 1880, he came 2nd in a violin competition with a performance of Louis Spohr's Concerto in D minor and, in 1882, he won 1st prizes on the organ and the violin playing the fugue in G minor by Johann Sebastian Bach and the Chaconne from Bach's unaccompanied Violin Sonata in D minor. Dittrich also participated in an orchestra and played chamber music with his fellow students. He enjoyed particularly close relationships with Bruckner and members of the Hellmesberger family ; his violin teacher's younger brother Ferdinand (1863-1940) , a cellist, was a fellow student. In 1882, he graduated, receiving a Silver medal from the « Gesellschaft für Musikfreunde » with his violin diploma.

After graduation, Dittrich continued to perform on the organ and the violin. He played the organ for Baron Nathaniel Mayer Anselm « Freiherr » von Rothschild (1836-1905) and, for services in a synagogue, possibly the large one on « Schmalzhofgasse » (destroyed by the Nazis, in 1938) , as well as in various churches and at choral concerts conducted by Hans Richter (1843-1916) . He played the violin (or, sometimes, the viola) with the Hellmesberger Quartet when they performed works for larger ensembles. His invitation to Japan resulted from his relationship with the Hellmesbergers ; Josef Hellmesberger, senior, who had recommended him to the Japanese ambassador, advised him to take the job. His other mentor, Bruckner, was not impressed. When Dittrich came to say goodbye, he could hardly contain his agitation :

« What, where are you going ? To Japan - to Japan ? Farewell ! »

Bruckner may well have wondered why, on earth, Dittrich was leaving a promising career behind. Competition in Vienna, however, was stiff and the immediate future promised no vacant position. The Japanese government offered a generous salary, and thanks to Dittrich's insistence and possibly Hellmesberger's backing, he received the title of « artistic director » , a title which, however, did not imply corresponding powers of decision.

Dittrich arrived in Yokohama, on 4 November 1888, together with his wife Perine (« née » Lammer) , whom he had married, in 1886. His contract ran from 1 November 1888 to 1 September 1891, and stipulated that he would teach up to 5 hours per day in violin, harmony, composition and singing. Many of his students became pioneers of Western music. Koda Nobu, one of the 1st to study the violin with Dittrich, described him as an excellent, if strict, teacher. Other students commented on his strictness too. One student even gathered a group of fellow students and planned a strike. Dittrich, he felt, was too harsh and treated them with contempt because of their inability to meet his unrealistically high-standards. No doubt Dittrich was often impatient with his pupils, most of whom had little knowledge of Western music before enrolling at the Academy. His particular brand of sarcasm, delivered in a foreign language, could give rise to misunderstandings ; one student, on being pulled by his ears and told to wash them, took this literally, much to the amusement of his fellow students. He often reduced female students to tears. Nevertheless, by the standards of his day, whether European or Japanese, he does not appear to have been excessively strict, and many also remembered him for his kindness. One can imagine his strictness being tempered with Viennese charm.

Dittrich also set new standards by his performances, playing some of the most virtuoso pieces of the violin repertoire, such as concertos by Henri Vieuxtemps and Louis Spohr. Particular favourites were Spohr's Concerto No. 9 and Beethoven's Romance in 6. His 1st public performance took place in March 1889, when he played a violin solo. In a concert, in May, he accompanied his wife, who sang, on the violin. 1 year later, on 12 May 1890, the Academy's own concert-hall, the « Ségakudo » , was dedicated. It was Japan's 1st purpose-built concert auditorium, providing a venue for the Academy's regular public concerts. During his 6 years in Japan (his contract was extended by another 3 years, in 1891) , he performed in over 50 concerts ; as a soloist, in ensembles with students, colleagues, and foreign amateurs, as a conductor of the Academy's choir, and with touring virtuosos, such as the flautist Adolf Terschlak (1832-1901) , who had studied in Vienna, in 1890 ; Dittrich joined him and his pianist Luisa Schuller for several concerts, including one at the « Rokumeikan » , on 11 March. Besides playing 2 violin solos, Dittrich may well have helped Terschlak acquire scores for the 2 Japanese songs (« Sakura » and « Hanakurabe ») he performed. Terschlak also visited Dittrich at the Tokyo Academy of Music and observed his classes. In an article in the « Japan Weekly Mail » , which appeared in Japanese in « Ongaku zasshi » , Terschlak pronounced himself impressed with the level of musical achievement in Japan and praised Dittrich's work highly.

Dittrich composed and arranged music, partly in response to his employers' expectations. His arrangements include one of Johann Strauß's « Pizzicato Polka » for koto ensemble ; he did not have enough competent violinists to perform the piece in its original version. He also arranged several Japanese pieces for piano, or violin and piano, and composed works based on Japanese melodies. On 15 November 1891, he himself performed « Rakubai » (Falling Plum Blossoms) , arranged for koto, violin and piano. Several of his scores were published by Breitkopf & Hartel, in Leipzig, and Giacomo Puccini may well have used them when he composed the Opera « Madama Butterfly » . Dittrich also composed anthems for official occasions like the proclamation of the Meiji Constitution, on 11 February 1889. In a lecture about Japanese music, given in 1895 and published in 1897, he explained and justified his efforts to harmonize Japanese tunes and adapt them to fit Western stylistic conventions. Dittrich's lecture is a typical example of the condescending attitude towards Japanese music shared by most of his Western contemporaries ; nevertheless, it shows that he, at least, made an effort to study it.

For his violin lessons at the Tokyo Academy of Music, Dittrich compiled his own collection of 69 exercises, some of them based on the tutor by Rode, Kreutzer and Bailliot. It was later revised with his permission by his former students Andō (« née » Koda) Kō and Shimazaki Akatarō , and published in 1924.

Dittrich left Japan, on 1 August 1894, his departure coinciding with the start of the Sino-Japanese War. He received high-honours from the Japanese government and was celebrated in an official « farewell concert » at the Academy, on 1 April 1894, where he played several violin solos. He gave his last public performance at the Academy's graduation concert, in July, when he conducted the choir. Dittrich helped lay the foundations of Western music, not just as something to be taught in schools but as an art to be cultivated and brought to the highest level. Whether (as has been suggested) he is also responsible for the image of Classical music as something terribly serious, to be practised with endurance rather than enjoyment, is open to question. Music in Meiji Japan was a serious business long before Dittrich arrived and, in the early years, many practitioners and listeners probably did not expect to enjoy it. The well-born women who represented the majority of the early violin students at the Academy had their own reasons to emphasize the seriousness of their pursuit ; under no circumstances did they want to be likened to the « geisha » in the pleasure quarters.

Just before his departure, Dittrich deposited at the consulate of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, in Yokohama, a pledge to pay a yearly sum for the education of his illegitimate son by a Japanese mistress, Mori Otto (confusingly named the same as the son of the famous writer Mori Ogai) , which he duly paid until Otto reached maturity. Mori Otto followed in his father's footsteps and became a violinist. He developed a special interest in the training of small children.

Dittrich's own career after his return to Vienna proved that he was, indeed, an outstanding musician ; very few of the foreign musicians who taught in Japan did as well as Dittrich in their home country. He played 2nd Violin in 2 concerts by the Hellmesberger Quartet, in December 1894, but his subsequent career as a performer and teacher centred on the organ rather than the violin - unlike his time in Japan. He played the organ for the Imperial Court, and, in 1901, was officially appointed Court organist. From 1906, he taught organ at the Vienna Conservatory, where he was appointed professor in 1909. Besides performing, he was also active as chairman of the Austrian Imperial Association of Music Pedagogy, as an organ expert and a conductor of several choirs. He continued to compose shorter works, based on the Japanese melodies he had collected. His « Tekona March » , premiered at a musical garden party, found such great acclaim that the band repeated it. He enjoyed success of another kind when he received permission to dedicate his paraphrase of the « Kaiserlied » to the Austrian Emperor, in summer 1915. In 1916, he suffered a stroke during a concert and never recovered his health. He died in 1919, survived by his 2nd wife and 2 sons.

With Dittrich's departure, the Tokyo Academy of Music had to do without an outstanding foreign teacher for several years. The Sino-Japanese War drained government finances. In the rising tide of nationalism, War songs became hugely popular and helped familiarize the general population of Japan with Western musical idioms, but promoting art music at a high-level took a back-seat. Indeed, the continued existence of the Tokyo Academy of Music was debated in parliament and in the media, as early as 1891, and, in June 1893, it lost its independence and became a department of the Higher Normal School. From September, it was headed by Kanō Jigorō, better known as the founder of the Kōdōkan style of judo. It did not become independent again, until April 1899. During this period, Dittrich had no foreign successor.

Rudolf Dittrich was an Austrian musician who served in Japan (1888-1894) during the Meiji period, as a violin and piano teacher and performer. In his position as the 1st Artistic Director of the Tokyo School of Music, he played a key role in bringing knowledge of Western music to Japan. While in Japan, Dittrich had a relationship with a Japanese woman who bore him a son. After returning to Europe, Dittrich published 2 collections consisting of piano arrangements of traditional Japanese songs. He also published other arrangements of Japanese music, as well as original compositions (mainly for organ) .

His arrangements of Japanese songs add the full machinery of late- 19th Century Viennese harmony and counterpoint to the comparatively unadorned original Japanese works. Dittrich, in some cases, includes the lyrics for the songs, in German, English and, sometimes, in (Romanized) Japanese.

Some of the songs in Dittrich's collections appear in Giacomo Puccini's Opera « Madama Butterfly » , and it is highly-likely that Puccini had Dittrich's sheet music in hand as he composed that Opera.

In view of Dittrich's connection to Puccini's Opera, the fact that Dittrich had a Japanese child is fascinating ! After all, Madama Butterfly is about a Westerner in Japan who acquires a Japanese wife and son. However, there is no evidence that Puccini knew about Dittrich's Japanese family.

Dittrich's 1894 song-book contains interesting and colorful artwork from the print shop of T. Hasegawa (長谷川) in Tokyo.

In 1888, Rudolf Dittrich accepted an offer to become the 1st Artistic Director of the Tokyo School of Music, with a 3 year contract expiring on 1 September 1891. The Tokyo School of Music's successor organization is the prestigious Tokyo National University of Fine-Arts and Music.

Dittrich and his wife, « Perine » , traveled to Japan and took-up residence in Tokyo. They both worked at the school, teaching and giving performances. They performed not only at the school, but also at the famous « Rokumeikan » , a large hall in Tokyo whose purpose was to entertain foreigners.

While his musical qualifications were the main reason for Dittrich's selection to head the Tokyo School of Music, another factor was his fluency in English, the main language of instruction at the school. The school's purpose was to teach European Classical music to Japanese students, so the teachers were foreigners. Since the Japanese did not expect the foreign teachers to learn Japanese, they selected a single European language as the standard. Students studied English along with their music lessons. Incidentally, Dittrich did learn some Japanese.

Dittrich taught violin, piano, organ, theory, and composition. And, judging from the success of his students, he was an effective teacher. Many of his students went on to distinguished careers, and he is recognized as an important figure in the musical history of Japan. We know that Dittrich was very strict in the classroom, so much so that students sometimes broke into tears. There is even a report of a student strike. One commentator (Irene Suchy) has called his teaching methods « brutal » . However, his biographer Hiroko Hirasawa has a more sympathetic assessment, saying that while he was very severe during his classes, in other interactions he was an affable man.

Near the end of Dittrich's 1st 3 year term as Director, his wife « Perine » died suddenly from a pulmonary embolism (« Lungeninfarkt ») . Her death was unexpected : only a short time before, « Perine » had sung in a concert. Dittrich took a vacation to deal with his grief and, then, returned to the school which, at that time, was facing serious financial problems. The government was withdrawing financial support, moving funds into the military build-up for the coming War against China.

In spite of his school's financial difficulties, Dittrich's contract was renewed in 1891, for 3 years, to expire on 1 September 1894. He continued the work of instruction, performance, and administration without his Austrian wife at his side. Then, sometime in 1891 or 1892, he formed a relationship with a Japanese woman, Kiku Mori (Mori is the family name) , with whom he had a son Otto Mori, born on 26 August 1893. Kiku Mori was a shamisen performer and instructor, and we can assume that she taught Dittrich the words and music for the Japanese songs, in his 1894 and 1895 collections.

I do not know whether Rudolf Dittrich and Kiku Mori had a formal wedding ceremony, nor whether the pair lived together, or if so, for how long. Nor do I know whether the existence of Dittrich's Japanese family caused or hastened his departure from Japan (he left 1 month before the expiration of his contract) . Here is what we do know. Dittrich's biographer, Hiroko Hirasawa, has seen and transcribed a declaration that Dittrich signed at the Austro-Hungarian Empire's consulate in Yokohama, 3 weeks before his departure from Japan :

« In the records of this Imperial and Royal Consulate, it is hereby confirmed that Professor Rudolf Dittrich has, in this office today, made the following formal declaration :

“ I hereby obligate myself, for the benefit of my illegitimate son Otto, born on 26 August 1893 to Miss Kiku Mori and myself, to make a yearly payment, in advance, of at least sixty (60) Japanese silver Yen to the child's mother. If the above-named Kiku Mori prevents the child from being turned-over to me, should I demand it, this will cancel my obligation. ” »

(Yokohama, 10 July 1894.)

Unfortunately, the final sentence, about turning-over the child, may be transcribed incorrectly from the original handwritten manuscript, because the German wording (« Sollte seinerzeit genannte Mori Kiku sich weigern mir das Kind über mein Verlangen auszufolgen, hört diese meine Verpflichtung auf ») is unidiomatic and ambiguous.

Dittrich thought he might want the child to join him in Austria, at some time in the future - but he wasn't sure. The political and social realities, both in Japan and in Austria, made it inconceivable that Kiku Mori would accompany Dittrich back to Austria. But Dittrich probably thought that there might be a possibility of his son Otto coming to live in Austria when he grew a few years older. Otto grew-up in Japan as a Japanese, with his mother receiving yearly stipends from Dittrich until Otto reached adulthood.

Otto Mori followed in his father's footsteps by becoming a professional violinist. Otto married a woman named Yoshika Miyake, and the couple gave Rudolf Dittrich 3 grandchildren and, at least, 5 great-grandchildren. Otto Mori's eldest son was movie actor Fujio Mori (1923 - 24 October 2005), known professionally as Jun Negami. In addition to appearing in over 30 Japanese movies, Jun Negami played « Mister Seiko » in « Teahouse of the August Moon », starring Marlon Brando and Glenn Ford (1956).

Rudolf Dittrich left Japan forever, on 1 August 1894, aboard a British ship bound for Tacoma, Washington, in the United States. (On this same day, the Sino-Japanese War began.) After reaching Tacoma, Dittrich took a train to Vancouver, British Columbia, Canada and, there, began a trip by train that took him to New York and to a ship bound for Europe. During this trip, Dittrich wrote at least 2 postcards, in Japanese katakana script, to his Japanese wife Kiku Mori. Hiroko Hirasawa in her dissertation (between numbered pages 87 and 88) displays fac-similes of these notes, but provides no translation from the Japanese.

The 1st postcard is postmarked Tacoma, 17 August 1894, and says :

« August 16

My dear Kiku,

I am in Tacoma today. Please don't worry about me - I am not sick, although it was a long voyage. How are you doing ? How is Otto ?

Please take very good care of yourself. I will write a letter to you again, from America.

Take care of yourself,

Dittrich »

The 2nd postcard is postmarked Hamilton, Ontario, Canada, 23 August 1894 :

« Miss Kiku Mori
2 Hongo Yayoi-cho. Tokyo.
Japan

From Niagara Falls

My dear Kiku,

Today, I am at Niagara Falls. I am not sick.

You and Otto, please take care of yourselves,

Dittrich »

What do we learn from these brief messages ? A 1st observation is that the greeting in the cards, « My dear Kiku » (« okikusan ») , shows affection. Also, Dittrich indicates a paternal interest in his son by inquiring about his well-being and wishing him well. Finally, the fact that Dittrich asks questions in his message suggests that he expected replies, and that a prolonged correspondence may have ensued. However, the above messages are, up to now, the only published correspondence between Dittrich and his Japanese family. It would be interesting to learn more about this sad story of a family torn apart by circumstances beyond their control.

After returning to Vienna, in 1894, Dittrich had to struggle at 1st in the musical job market. In the 1st years after his return, he was active as a violinist and violist in chamber music concerts. Eventually, he secured more stable employment, rising to become, in 1901, one of 3 Hapsburg Court organists. In that role, he was a successor to his mentor Anton Bruckner, appointed Court organist in 1868. In 1906, Dittrich became professor of organ at the Vienna Conservatory. He was a principal designer for the great new organ in the « Musikverein » concert-hall.

On 10 July 1900, Dittrich married his 2nd Austrian wife, Katharina Kriegle (born on 9 August 1880 ; died in 1945) . She bore him 2 sons : Oswald Franz Dittrich (4 June 1901 - 10 October 1966) and Rudolf (1903 - ?) .

On 18 October 1916, during a concert at which he was a performer, Dittrich fell to the floor, the victim of a stroke. He never fully recovered, and died in Vienna on 16 January 1919. Dittrich's son Oswald married Maria Anna Girschik (1903-1976) . His other Austrian son, Rudolf, moved to Germany in 1928 ; after that, what became of him is unknown.

The most complete source of information on Rudolf Dittrich is Hiroko Hirasawa's dissertation. This musical biography of Dittrich contains fac-similes of many documents such as concert programs, the contract as director of the Tokyo School of Music, photographs of Dittrich and his students, etc. In her introduction, Hirasawa thanks for their help several Dittrich descendants, including Dittrich's Japanese grandson Fujio Mori (Jun Negami) . Perhaps, it was he who showed her Dittrich's 1894 paternity declaration and the postcards above. Her footnotes for these documents say simply « Privatbesitz » (private property) .

Irene Suchy's earlier dissertation is valuable because it places Dittrich in the context of other German-speaking musicians who worked in Japan. Also notable are some fascinating details about Dittrich's teaching in Japan. (Irene Suchy's personal website irenesuchy.org, should be visited by anyone with an interest in the history of European music in Japan.)

Kunio Hara's Master's thesis is the best place to learn about Rudolf Dittrich's influence on « Madama Butterfly » . Niklaus Gnaedinger is a descendant of Dittrich who has placed valuable information on the Internet about Dittrich's ancestors and descendants.

Rudolf E. Dittrich (geboren 25. April 1861 in Biala, Galizien (heute Bielsko-Biała, Polen) ; gestorben 16. Februar 1919 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Musiker.

Der Österreicher Dittrich lernte seit seiner Kindheit Klavier, Violine und Orgel. Nach seiner Ausbildung in Breslau und am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien, das er 1882 abschloss, gab er Konzerte.

1888 wurde er zum artistischen Direktor an die Musikschule Tokio, die heute zur « Tokyo National University of Fine-Arts and Music » gehört, berufen. 1894 kehrte er nach Österreich zurück, wurde 1901 Hoforganist und 1906 Professor an der Akademie der Tonkunst in Wien.

Rudolf Dittrich war somit der erste arrivierte westliche Musiker in Japan.

Seine Frau Petronilla geborene von Kammer (geboren 15. September 1860 ; gestorben 4. Januar 1891 in Tokyo) war bis zu ihrem frühen Tod ebenfalls an der Musikschule Tokio tätig.

Sein Enkel ist der japanische Schauspieler Jun Negami.

Heinrich Peter Vergeiner

Geschichte des Orchesters und seine Vorläufer von Direktor Magister Thomas Greiner

1882 bis 1919

Laut Angaben in der Sekundärliteratur wurde die « Bludenzer Orchestergesellschaft » 1882 von Hermann Gaßner gegründet. Hermann Gaßner spielte selber Geige, wie ein im Zentralarchiv Getzner, Mutter und Cie erhaltenes Bild zeigt. Gaßner war ein unglaublich engagierter Lokalpolitiker und Musikliebhaber. Er blieb bis 1890 Vorstand der Orchestergesellschaft und verstarb während einer Rede beim Landessängerfest im November 1903 in Bregenz. Eine erhaltene Liste auf einem Schreiben des Vorstandes Hermann Gaßner von 1890 führt (soweit leserlich) folgende Namen an : Georg Croce (?) , Fritz, Johann Gamohn, Anton Hutter, Anton Jehly, J. A. Jehly, Josef Koller, Eduard Lutz, Margreitter, Johann Meier, Reis, Jacob Rief, Josef Sobotka (Dirigent) , Hans Spescha, Fidel Tagwerker. Vorbild für die Orchestergesellschaft waren die Militärmusiken, die damals auch mit Streichern besetzt waren und zum gesellschaftlichen Leben einer Garnisonsstadt beitrugen. Gespielt wurden in erster Linie Märsche, Walzer, Polkas, Pot-pourris, vielleicht auch einmal der eine oder andere Satz aus einer klassischen Sinfonie, der Grundcharakter war aber immer ein unterhaltsamer. Aus schriftlichen Äußerungen Hermann Gaßners ist zu entnehmen, daß er selbst der erste Dirigent der Orchestergesellschaft war, doch dieses Amt dann an den Chorregenten Adolf Schwenk übergeben haben muß. Nach Schwenks Abgang 1886 übte für kurze Zeit Heinrich Peter Vergeiner das Amt aus, mit dem es aber zu einigen Streitigkeiten kam, die in Briefabschriften dokumentiert sind. Von 1887 bis Ende 1888 übernahm der Rheinberger-Schüler Josef Renner, der ein sehr begabter Musiker und Komponist war, über Vermittlung von Rheinberger selbst die Leitung, bevor Josef Sobotka ab Anfang 1889 die Harmoniemusik und Orchestergesellschaft leitete. In diese Zeit fiel auch der Wechsel in der Obmannschaft von Hermann Gaßner auf seinen jüngeren Bruder Guido Gaßner. Von Sobotka sind einige unglaublich sauber geschriebene Partituren erhalten. Auf Josef Sobotka, der bis 1910 in Bludenz wirkte, folgte Wenzel Korb, der ebenfalls neben der Harmoniemusik die Orchestergesellschaft leitete, 1919 aber verstarb. Aus dieser Zeit stammt das derzeit älteste, bekannte Foto der Orchestergesellschaft.

Alfred Zamara

The Austrian composer, pianist and harpist Alfred Zamara was born in 1863 in Vienna and died in 1940, also in Vienna. He was the son of the famous harpist Antonio Zamara.

The Zamaras were a Viennese family of harpists active in the musical life of Croatia, in the 19th Century.

Antonio Zamara was born in Italy (in 1823/1829/1831/1835 ?) but his family moved to Austria ; and he finally died in Vienna, in 1901. Antonio taught Joseph E. Schuëcker's father and uncle, Edmund Schuëcker (1860-1911) , from 1871 to 1877 ; and Heinrich Schuëcker (1867-1913) , from 1878 to 1884.

Like his father, Alfred Zamara became professor of harp at the Vienna Conservatory and solo harpist at the Vienna « Hofoper » ; he also played at the Vienna « Hofburg Theatre » . He and his sister, Theresa, were both taught the harp by their father. Theresa became a member of the Budapest Opera and, later, taught harp at the Vienna Conservatory.

Alfred Zamara was a professor of piano at the Vienna Conservatory and a member of the « Hofkapelle » . Among his pupils in his harp-class was Joseph E. Schuëcker (1886-1938) , from 1900-1901.

Zamara wrote many salon pieces, made transcriptions for the harp, and edited François-Joseph Naderman's « 7 Etudes » , but he essentially turned to Opera compositions. He collaborated with Viktor Léon to produce the Opera « Der Doppelgänger » which was produced at the « Theater am Gärtnerplatz » in Munich, in September 1886.

...

Alfred Zamara (geboren 1863 in Wien ; gestorben 1940 ebenda) war ein österreichischer Komponist und Harfenspieler.

Er war der Sohn des italienischen Musikers Antonio Zamara, der nach Wien gezogen war. Wie sein Vater wurde Alfred Zamara Harfenprofessor am Wiener Konservatorium. Er spielte am Wiener Hofburgtheater. 1886 schrieb er die Operette Der Doppelgänger. Victor Léon lieferte das Libretto. Das Stück wurde in München am Theater am Gärtnerplatz uraufgeführt.

...

Alfred Zamara : Aller Wahrscheinlichkeit nach ein Sohn des berühmten Harfenpielers Anton. Er bildete sich gleichfalls in der Musik aus und wendete sich der Operncomposition zu. Zur Zeit bekleidet er die Professor des Clavierspiels am Conservatorium in Wien und ist Mitglied der Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofmusik-kapelle.

Operetten

Von seinen Operncompositionen sind bisher zur Aufführung gekommen :

« Der Sänger von Palermo » , Operette in 3 Acten. Text von Bernhard Buchbinder (1849-1922) , am Carl-Theater. Cranz Verlag, Hamburg (1888) .

« Der Doppelgänger » , romantische Operette in 3 Acten. Text von Viktor Léon, am München Theater im 1886 ; am Gärtnerplatzim Theater an der Wien im October 1887. Cranz Verlag, Hamburg (circa 1886) .

« Die Königin von Arreja » , Text von Viktor Léon.

« Der Herr Abbé » , Operette in 2 Acten. Text von Viktor Léon und Franz-Josef Brackl, im Theater am Gärtnerplatz in München am 10. August 1889. Cranz Verlag, Hamburg (1889) .

Schuëcker (eigentlich Schuöcker) , Familie

Edmund Schuëcker : geboren 16.11.1860 Wien ; gestorben 09.11.1911 Kreuznach / Preußen (Bad Kreuznach / Deutschland) . Harfenist, Komponist. Studierte 1871-1877 am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde bei Antonio Zamara. Soloharfenist im Amsterdamer Parkorkest (1877-1882) , im Hamburger Parlow Orchester (1882-1883) , in der königlich Staatskapelle Dresden / Deutschland (1883-1884) , im Leipziger Gewandhausorchester (1884-1891, zugleich Lehrer am Leipziger Konservatorium) , danach im von Theodore Thomas neu gegründeten Chicago Orchestra, im Wiener Hofopernorchester (1900-1902, von Gustav Mahler berufen) . 1902 krankheitshalber in Kreuznach, spielte er 1903-1904 im Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, 1904-1909 im Philadelphia Orchestra und 1910 im Orchester der Metropolitan Opera New York / USA. Schuëcker wirkte ferner 1903-1906 an den Wagneraufführungen an der Covent Garden Opera London mit. Seine Mazurka ist bis heute (2005) ein beliebtes Harfenstück.

Preis : Kammervirtuose des Herzogs Ernst von Sachsen-Altenburg (1890) .

Musikwerke :

Salonstücke für Harfe.

Mazurka, Opus 12.

Transkriptionen und andere von Werken Hector Berlioz', Franz Liszts, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts, Carl Maria von Webers.

Lehrwerke :

Etüden.

Orchesterstudien, Bände.

Die bedeutendsten Stellen aus Richard Wagner's Opern, mit genauer Fingersatz- und Pedalbezeichnung, 2 Bände.

Sein Bruder Heinrich Schuëcker : geboren 25.11.1867 Wien ; gestorben 17.04.1913 Boston, Massachusetts / USA. Harfenist. Studierte 1878-1884 ebenfalls bei Antonio Zamara am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. Zuerst beim Hamburger Parlow Orchester, wurde 1885 1. Harfenist beim Boston Symphony Orchestra und lehrte am New England Conservatory in Boston. Auch als Solist tätig.

Sein Sohn Joseph E. Schuëcker : geboren 19.05.1886 Leipzig / Deutschland ; gestorben 09.12.1938 Los Angeles, California / USA. Harfenist. Studierte zunächst bei seinem Vater, 1900-1901 am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde bei Alfred Zamara. 1904-1905 und 1908-1909 Soloharfenist im Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, danach folgte er seinem Vater im Philadelphia Orchestra nach und war 1911-1913 Harfenist der Henry Savage Grand Opera Company in Boston. 1915-1920 lehrte er am Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh / USA. 1926-1930 wieder beim Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

Ernst Denhof

Viennese pianist, teacher and impresario who immigrated from the Swiss-Austrian border to come to live in Edinburgh, in the early years of the 20th Century. As a believer in music, he had organized a variety of events, at home. Once he felt settled in his new post, he began harboring like thoughts. He died on 5 December 1936 in Exeter, Devon (England) .

Son of Samuel Denhof et Franziska Fanny Denhof.

Husband of Gertrude Denhof.

Brother of Heinrich Denhof ; Bertha Teller ; Ludwig Denhof et Friedrich Denhof.

Pupil of pianist, professor and composer Theodor Leschetizki.

Pupil of Anton Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory.

Teacher of composer and conductor Volkmar Andrae (a great Brucknerian) at the « Musikschule Bern » (Bern School of Music) .

By 1910, Ernst Denhof had a plan and how exciting it was ! He had likely attended the historic presentation of Richard Wagner's « Ring » , in English, at Covent Garden in January 1908. Now, he wanted to do the same in Edinburgh as the 1st offering outside of London, and if enough interest was shown, he would present it twice ! It was a grandiose plan for certain, especially for a relative newcomer.

Most local newspapers thought he was daft ! The « Times » took note, on 8 March :

« What makes a remarkable project still more remarkable is that it is due neither to the action of any organized body nor to the whim of a music-loving millionaire, but is entirely the outcome of the energy and enthusiasm of one man, Mister Ernst Denhof, a local musician, whose 1st venture into the ordinarily thorny paths of Operatic speculation this is. Unsupported by any guarantee, and unaided (or unhindered) by a committee, he has worked-out all the details of the scheme himself. Briefly, the idea was to secure the services of all or most, of the singers who had taken part in the English “ Ring ” performances at Covent Garden, to engage the Scottish Orchestra and to entrust the musical direction to Mister Michaël Balling, who, on the recommendation of Doctor Richter, had conducted at the last Bayreuth Festival. Mister Denhof, at the same time announced a number of provisional engagements, indicating the rates of subscriptions. »

4 days later, the Nation said much the same :

« It looks, however, as if the impetus is to come not from London or Birmingham but from Edinburgh. We might have waited to doomsday before any of our ordinary Operatic companies produced the “ Ring of the Nibelung ” on a proper scale. It has been done during the past couple of weeks, in Edinburgh, the motive force being “ Herr ” Ernst Denhof. He has, of course, had incredible difficulties to contend against. Some of them were inevitable ; others might have been avoided if the venture had not aroused, as schemes of this kind always do, the jealousy of people who will do nothing themselves, but are always ready to throw cold water on the plans of more earnest and energetic men. Nor, if report speaks truly, has “ Herr ” Denhof had the support from the press of his own town any man engaged in so fine a work as this should have been able to count upon with confidence. »

To make his scheme more practical, Denhof managed to align himself with the Carl Rosa Company. Their people could be vassals in the « Ring » , together with members of the Edinburgh Choral Union and choirs of both « Messieurs » Kirkhope and Moonie. He could also present « Carmen » , « Faust » , « Don Giovanni » , « Tannhäuser » , « The Merry Wives of Windsor » and « The Marriage of Figaro » , interspersed amongst his « Ring » segments.

Ernst Denhof announced that veterans from the London « Ring » would form the heart of his cast. Amongst the notables : Agnes Nicholls would sing Brünnhilde and the mighty bass Robert Radford would sing Hunding and Fasolt. Through the good offices of the Berlin Opera, both members of the MacLennan family would appear : tenor Francis as Siegmund in « Die Walküre » and as Siegfried, and his wife, Florence Easton, would sing Freia, Sieglinde, the Woodbird in the 1st Cycle and Guttrune. Edna Thornton was a rock solid Erda. Thomas Meux was Alberich, Sydney Russell, Mime and Frederick Austin sang Wotan and, later, The Wanderer. Michaël Balling would conduct the orchestra of 82 musicians. Veteran Emmanuel Christian Hedmond would sing Loge and handle stage direction, and new scenery and costumes created in Germany would complete a mercurial package.

Both cycles emerged as artistic successes with the finances in the blue, slightly. Afterwards, in deep appreciation, Lord Dunedin, Lord Justice General for Scotland, on behalf of the subscribers, presented Michaël Balling with a silver wreath and « Herr » Denhof with a silver tray, saying :

« Altogether, “ Herr ” Denhof’s “ Ring ” fortnight in Edinburgh tempts one to dream pleasant dreams of the future of Opera in this country. »

The small surplus led Ernst Denhof to contemplate a tour of leading provincial cities in the coming autumn. It was a noble start !

Later that year, while Thomas Beecham remained in London wielding his baton, his « Opéra-Comique » Company rolled into Edinburgh for the week of 31 October, early in its 7 month long tour to present a week of « Tales of Hoffmann » and « Die Fledermaus » performances. In « The Evening News » , on 1 November, Beecham was acclaimed as :

« An active patron of British musical artists and composers. He is not a mercenary impresario, but a man who spends money on his Opera schemes, by which the public benefits. »

No doubt Ernst Denhof enjoyed Caroline Hatchard as Olympia in « The Tales of Hoffmann » , recalling her work in his English « Ring » , a few months earlier, « as one of the charming Rhine Maidens » .

With Beecham's forces soaking-up most of the local entertainment budget, Denhof decided to shelve his plans and think of the spring of 1911. And, indeed, he was up and running with a 3 week tour that may have been of modest length but, certainly, was immense in content. He set-out to present a single Cycle of the English « Ring » , 1st in Leeds, during the week of 28 March ; in Manchester, from 3 to 9 April ; and, finally, in Glasgow from 11 to 15 April. They were « firsts » in each case. The cast was a mixture of returnees and newcomers, the most notable absentee being the mellifluous Maclennan.

In « Das Rheingold » , Frederic Austin was back as Wotan ; as was Sydney Russell as Mime ; Charles Knowles as Donner ; Robert Radford as Fasolt ; and Edna Thornton as Erda. Walter Hyde now became Loge ; Charles Victor as Alberich in place of Meux. Toni Seiter sang Fricka replacing Marie Alexander. Fafner was Gaston Sargeant.

In « Die Walküre » , Hyde now sang Siegmund ; Robert Radford powerful again as Hunding ; Austin, once more, was Wotan ; Florence Easton returned as Sieglinde ; Toni Seiter continued as Fricka. Cecilie Gleeson-White sang Brünnhilde in Leeds, but Agnes Nicholls assumed the role in the other cities.

Next, John Coates appeared as Siegfried with Sydney Russell as Mime ; Austin as The Wanderer ; Charles Victor as Alberich ; Gaston Sargeant as Fafner ; and Edna Thornton as Erda. As Brünnhilde, « Madame » Gleeson-White sang in Leeds and Glasgow ; Nicholls, in Manchester.

Finally, to complete the « Ring » , John Coates sang Siegfried in « Götterdämmerung » ; Florence Easton was Guttrune as before ; Gleeson-White led-off in Leeds, as Brünnhilde, but Nicholls sang in the other centres. Gunther, sung in 1910 by Austin, was now interpreted by Charles Tilbury, while Waltraute was repeated by Thornton. Hagen was Charles Knowles. They were a sturdy crew.

Ernst Denhof, now feeling his enterprise was maturing and beginning to turn the corner financially, he announced for 1912 his largest scheme to date. He would present « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , « Der Fliegende Holländer » and « Tristan und Isolde » of Wagner ; Gluck's « Orfeo ed Euridice » ; and as the « pièce de résistance » , Richard Strauß's elaborate shocker, « Elektra » : first in Hull, then in Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow and Edinburgh.

On 26 February, the day he opened in Hull, the country was hit by a national coal strike. For the unlucky impresario, it was yet another blow, the cruelest so far.

A writer for « The Daily Mail » caught-up to Denhof on opening night :

« Generalissimo, you will verily deserve a jaunt in the Riviera after this struggle, I told this kindly, courteous impresario. »

« Ah ! yes. You do not know the rushes and strain of it ! It is not over yet. I find Hull is willing, but tardy. Yes ! Am I not right ? They crowd the theatre after the 1st night or 2. So ? 800 costumes or more have had to be procured for the Opera Festival in Hull, this week. Ships are on the stage, tonight ; a representation of Hell and Heaven another time ; and bullocks, sheep, whippers, and snakes another ! »

Set-backs be damned ! He was committed. Vivid reports in Hull newspapers for the 3 Wagner Operas and « Elektra » provide an inkling of what transpired.

In reviewing the Opening Night, « The Daily Mail » wrote :

« The massive Masterpiece was given without “ cuts ” of any kind, and with a triumphant wealth of detail not found outside Covent Garden, on Gala nights. The dress circle was not quite half full, boxes were taken, the pit was moderately well-filled, and the gallery showed no blank space whatsoever. »

Frederic Austin was benign, sad and sympathy-compelling as Sachs ... throughout the light bloom of Francis Maclennan's characterization as Walther was a delight ... Florence Easton a maidenly Eva, with fresh and ardent tone and dainty by-play ... brilliant, flexible Maurice d'Oisly as David ... but it was conductor Balling who was applauded for his magic.

Ernst Denhof had stinted not at all. A stickler for authenticity, he brought to Hull diverse talents, such as designer and scenic artist, « Herr » Impekovem from Cologne, the chief authority in Germany for costumes and period, to paint the beautiful scenes in Denhof's productions. To re-inforce the chorus in « Meistersinger » , in Leeds and Hull, Denhof hired members of the Leeds Choral Union, to achieve an « exceptionally powerful » result.

As the Flying Dutchman, Charles Knowles sang « the majestic but somber music with unmistakable power » while Maud Perceval Allen offered « all Senta's music with a supreme sense of the dramatic. She never quailed from the cauldron of sound who arose bubbling and shrieking before her, at times. Her voice of power and tragic intensity dominated even “ Herr ” Balling's forces. » Frederick Ranalow interpreted Daland's affecting music.

The next evening, in « Tristan und Isolde » , « “ Madame ” Gleeson-White's eminently intellectual qualities were noticeable, in her womanly Isolda. The duet, “ Night of rapture rest upon us ” afforded “ Madame ” Gleeson-White and Mister Maclennan a matchless opportunity. They made it seem the very delirium of love - an opium-dream, languorous and faint with sweetness. » Miss Toni Seiter, replacing Marie Brema, « was an expert and well-graced Brangana ; though the carrying power of her voice was not on a par with its sweetness and neat production. The sinister Melot had a strong portraiture at the hands of Thomas Meux. »

On 28 February, came the event for which everyone was thirsting, Strauß's « Elektra » , sung for the 1st time in English. Munich-born Fritz Cortolezis, born in on the wings of Strauß's recommendation, was at the podium. Florence Easton was ready in the title role. Marie Brema « was engaged also by wish of Strauß to sing Klytemnestra » but, when her moment came, a severe cold kept her away. Doris Woodall sang.

« The Old Queen (not as given by Miss Doris Woodall) but as in the Germanized version, also is rather too clammy for our tastes - a revolting old sinner, with “sallow, bloated face”. She is covered, over and over, with gems and “Talismans”; her arms are full of armlets, her fingers bristle with rings. The lids of her eyes are larger than is natural, and it seems to cost her an unspeakable effort to keep from falling. » There you have it : streaky and strong, the Teutonic foible for too heavy colouring. Miss Woodall did not wear the snakes, but (aided by the bells in the orchestra) rattled her metal charms instead. She forgot her « disease » and was rather too active.

As this fury-haunted Queen, Miss Woodall was impressive in the required way, and reached a dramatic height when exclaiming through the window bars. « See how she defies me. » Miss Woodall sang with just the right vitality of expression and the similar outburst of anger and triumphant laughter were brilliantly treated.

Florence Easton was virtually perfect in the name part. A born actress, no whit of baleful power was lost, though her voice was thin occasionally. Austin was « impressive » as Orestes ; Edith Evans « a tender and likeable » Chrysothemis and d'Oisly, « the wretched interloper Aegistheus, had little to do but that little is indelible in the memory » .

« Each time applause became more deafening. 5 or 10 minutes had to pass ere the onlookers awoke from the experience and filed-out. We were glad to see the boxes occupied, the circle more than half full, the floor almost filled and the galleries quite so. No single person at the 1st production in English, in Hull, will ever erase the impression. We took a poll of the faces. And very few had an opinion expressed there ! They were still in the throes of the excitement. They had come, some of them, to hear unspeakable things only audacious cacophonies, an epileptic fit in music, a fierce fancy by a Mad Mullah of Harmony with a touch of sadism in it ! They left with the knowledge that, for 2 hours, it had been their privilege to listen to music complicated, indeed, and vehement sometimes beyond ordinary description, lurid, and passionate in colour. But it had also gorgeous suggestions, and some few lovely achievements in the lyric line ! » After the final Opera, « Herr » Denhof and his lieutenants were lauded for bringing « one of the most innovatory productions ever given in the Provinces » .

As the tour progressed, cast changes took place. In Manchester, Cecilie Gleeson-White stepped into the role of Elektra without any previous experience or stage rehearsal. Now recovered, « “Madame” Brema (as Brangana and Klytemnestra) shone again, by reason of intense dramatic qualities ; by sheer intellectual strength, she dominated that wonderful 1st Act of “Tristan” » . Knowles added the role of Kurwenal while Julien Henry excelled as Beckmesser.

In some cases, initial curiosity failed to translate into packed houses later. In Manchester and Liverpool, « Elektra » and « Meistersinger » drew quite well initially, but less so when repeated. In Liverpool, Easton's Elektra « was memorable in its histrionic, as well as its vocal brilliance. Apart from the sensational features of this much-debated Opera, its 2 performances failed to make a favourable impression » .

In Manchester, « The Musical Times » reported on « Orpheus » , drawing attention to one of the country's greatest international stars, a singer supreme at Covent Garden and at the Metropolitan Opera in New York. « “ Madame ” Kirkby Lunn's lyrical powers were known to be very great, yet, their true measure could not fully be realized until one had seen her in Gluck's “ Orfeo ”. » There were visual delights too, « the solemnity of the scene by the tomb of Eurydice (Kate Anderson) surrounded by a grove of stately cypresses, the terror and mystery of Hades, and the bright, spring-like charm of Elysium, were most happily suggested » .

By the time they reached Leeds, the impact of the miners strike was being felt :

« With a restricted train service, and under the financial depression caused by so many businesses closing down, such an undertaking, which extends to some of the provincial towns, is bound to meet with less than it deserves. There were many vacant seats in the Leeds Theatre Royal, last evening at the opening performance of “ Die Meistersinger ”. Indeed, the audience was, by no means, what it should have been even making allowances for the restricted area drawn upon. »

News from the financial area was not good. According to « The Musical Times » , reporting on the Manchester segment in April 1912, said :

« The high-hopes formed of the future of Opera during the recent “ Denhof Operatic Festival ” , conducted by (Michaël) Balling and (Fritz) Cortolezis ; the public support was much less than for the “ Ring ” dramas, a year ago. Gloomy tidings reached us from Hull of a deficit of over 1,000 pounds and the loss of the week's run here cannot have been very much, if any, short of that figure. »

Now, a lesser individual might have called it quits but not « Herr » Denhof. He was not discouraged and began to think of an even longer tour. Getting wind of these plans, Thomas Beecham decided to offer support by loaning a German conductor from his staff, Hans Schilling-Ziemssen, and conducting on occasion, himself. Ernst, still flying high from his artistic achievements, was delighted by the offer and plunged ahead. After all, his robust « Ring » , in Edinburgh, for the 1st time in the provinces ; « Elektra » , the same in Hull ; and Wagner and Strauß galore, in Manchester, Leeds, Newcastle et al. , made for pretty heady stuff. With Beecham, he could expect to augment his laurels, or so he thought. He plunged ahead with planning and gladly assumed leadership of the tour during the autumn of 1913.

This was to be an auspicious event in every way. 27 principal singers supported by a chorus of 100, a ballet of 24 and an 82 piece Orchestra, backed by 10 management and staff. « To cover costs, Denhof had to rely on full-houses everywhere » , which was certainly unrealistic and poor budget practice.

Playing to indifferent-sized audiences, they completed 2 weeks in Birmingham, trying vainly to achieve a debut mood. They moved on to Manchester and gave the 1st week of 2, at which point Denhof realized he was in desperate straits. He was £ 4,000 in arrears ! He decided to stop right there and move to disband the company. When he alerted Beecham, the latter's reaction was predictable. Like the white knight on a charger or the U.S. cavalry galloping to rescue beleaguered settlers, he raced to the scene. That very evening, after the curtain descended on « Der Fliegende Holländer » , he addressed the troops, giving them every hope the enterprise would continue. A week would be needed to sort matters out ; then, they would re-open in Sheffield and continue till after a fortnight in Edinburgh. Beecham turned the reins over to his man of all miracles, Donald Baylis, and 2 accountants, and departed, leaving behind 240 much happier employees, and a disgruntled former colleague.

Before he left, Beecham launched a massive publicity campaign designed to goad the musical fraternity in Sheffield. Assaults in print upon the duty of the citizenry to art and the artist produced the desired effect. A full-house and stony silence greeted Mister Beecham when he arrived to conduct and, afterwards, amidst oceans of applause, there arose cries of exultant derision :

« Well, Tommy Beecham, are we musical ? »

Feeling the gloom of personal failure, Ernst pondered what had gone wrong. Had he bitten off too much in his enthusiasm ? With his earlier experience, why had he foundered in administration? He may well have asked himself why this situation had been allowed to happen at all.

Canny expert that he was now, Beecham would have detected the flaws in Denhof's plan. After all, what kind of new show could expect to fill every seat every night, just to break even? Instead of throwing a hold on the proceedings to make changes, perhaps there was no time, he let it go ahead, thinking (and hoping) the veteran campaigner would pull it off. Ernst was left to sink or swim. When the tour foundered, Beecham was able to rise to the challenge and stage his remarkable revival, to his credit.

Even after he had gone, Ernst Denhof's legacy was being appreciated in Leeds :

« Productions were characterized by “ Herr ” Denhof's invariable thoroughness ; his aim has always been not to consider how much he could dispense with, but how he could make his performances complete. »

Alas, not necessarily a proven way to keep costs in line.

His great dreams dashed, Ernst returned to Edinburgh to spend the rest of his days as a teacher, his original occupation. In retrospect, one wonders if retaining his German name and using « Herr » instead of « Mr. » worked against him as, in 1913, relations between Britain and Germany were deteriorating.

...

Only after 1910, when Thomas Quinlan and Ernst Denhof entered the fray, was the Rosa and Moody-Manners's control of the provincial repertory broken. The newcomers brought many Operas to the country's biggest cities for the 1st time and emphasized their companies' size and ability to perform works previously seen only in the West-End.

Ernst Denhof's original mission was to mount the 1st performances in Edinburgh of « Der Ring » . Although he had long organized concerts in the city, he only ventured into Operatic management, in March 1910, making extensive use of artists from Hans Richter's production at Covent Garden. The scale and financial risk were audacious :

« The circumstances of the production are remarkable and, indeed, may be fairly said to constitute a “ record ” in the history of dramatic speculation in Scotland. An Orchestra of nearly 80, made-up of nearly all the Scottish Orchestra, supplemented by some extra-instrumentalists from Covent Garden, has been engaged. The costumes and the scenery have been specially made for the production in Germany. The cost of the entire production is estimated locally at between £ 8,500 and £ 10,000. What is most remarkable of all, however, is that the production has been worked-out by a local pianoforte teacher, “ Herr ” Ernst Denhof. Unsupported by any guarantee, and unaided by any committee, he has worked-out all the details and, as far as can be judged by appearances, with reasonable prospects of financial success. »

Despite the risks, Denhof was successful, showing that, in favourable circumstances, large-scale operations could pay. Encouraged, he then mounted performances of « Der Ring » in Leeds, Manchester and Glasgow, in spring 1911, and « Elektra » , « Die Meistersinger » , « Tristan und Isolde » , « Der fliegende Holländer » and « Orfeo » , in spring 1912 at Hull, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Glasgow and Edinburgh. In autumn 1913, he undertook his most ambitious project, a provincial tour intended to take in Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, Liverpool, Newcastle, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Glasgow, and a repertory comprising all the Operas above plus « Der Rosenkavalier » , « Pelléas et Mélisande » , and « Die Zauberflöte » . The Denhof troupe numbered over 200, making it the biggest touring Opera company in the country's history, and included an Orchestra of up to 82 drawn from the Scottish, Covent Garden, Beecham and London Symphony Orchestras, a chorus of 90, and ballet of 24 ; Thomas Beecham was one of the 2 conductors.

Unfortunately, Ernst Denhof miscalculated and, within 3 weeks of the tour starting, it collapsed with reported losses of over £ 4,000. Despite previous successes, Denhof was castigated for embarking « recklessly upon an enterprise that he had not the means to carry through » . Opening in Birmingham, on 15 September, cautious optimism that « the fortnight's visit will attract all the patronage it deserves » was tempered by ticket prices being up to 5 times as high as usual. Perhaps, Denhof should have remembered Birmingham's reputation for ambivalent support of Opera, not least after he was unable to mount « Der Ring » there, in 1911. He should also have noted that Quinlan had given the complete cycle for the 1st time just 6 months earlier. Audiences were poor ; the company transferred to Manchester, where attendances were as bad and, before the end of the 1st week, Denhof could not pay all the wages due. On Friday 3 October, the troupe was told that it would cease operations after the 2 Saturday performances and, that evening, Denhof refused to appear before the curtain despite a sympathetic audience. Beecham dashed from London with a promise to rescue the company, and it appeared in Sheffield shortly afterwards and made most of its remaining planned appearances. Beecham was portrayed as a hero in the press but his rash financial commitment renewed tensions with his father, whom he had not consulted. Denhof, chastened and humiliated, disappeared from public sight.

The collapse of the company was the biggest and most high-profile since the difficulties in London in the 1880's ; the sheer size of Denhof's operation had attracted the press, but so too had his enterprise in bringing new Operas to a variety of provincial cities. The episode generated debate regarding the receptivity of non-metropolitan audiences, and to how such large undertakings could be made sustainable. Beecham gave a frank and provocative interview to « The Manchester Guardian » :

« He remarked that “ he had not much opinion of Manchester as a musical city, or indeed ”, he added, sadly, “ of any part of the North of England I have no opinion of any town as a musical centre except London. London, of course, is so huge a place that we are bound to do better, simply because we have 7 millions of population to draw on ”. »

A few weeks later, the rescued company returned to Manchester to much improved attendances ; Beecham declared that :

« After all the terrible things I said 3 weeks ago, I am almost ashamed of appearing before you tonight. I am all the more gratified to say that, judging by our business in Manchester at the present time, it is the best we have done in our tour. »

Beecham re-interpreted these difficulties as a challenge and returned to Manchester during the War years, determined to foster a more consistent appreciation of Opera among its citizens.

Thomas Quinlan's company, which had a slightly smaller total complement of about 160, including an Orchestra of 55, was equally ambitious but more stable and with a different « modus operandi » ; in its short life, it circumnavigated the globe twice and spent more time overseas than in the British Isles. Its home appearances caused considerable interest, however, due to the inclusion of works in its repertory not seen outside London previously, including « La fanciulla del West » and « l'Enfant prodigue » (both in 1911) and « Louise » (in 1912) ; Richard Wagner was also strongly represented and Quinlan gave the 1st performances of « Der Ring » in Liverpool, Birmingham, Dublin and Newcastle, in spring 1913. Although Quinlan was more prudent than Denhof, and always included several standard Operas in his repertory, his focus on overseas touring proved his undoing as the outbreak of War inevitably made foreign travel much more difficult ; Quinlan put his company into receivership, in February 1915.

The aspect of provincial performance hardest to document successfully, as in London, is how audiences saw and heard Operas performed. Theatrical and musical memoirs inevitably focus on the bad, strange, accidental or farcical which, while amusing and sometimes informative, relate the exceptional rather than typical. Contemporaneous press reviews were extensive but often used coded language, leaving ambiguities for the historian.

In London, Thomas Beecham accepted an invitation to act as chief conductor for a tour of Opera, in English, that was being organised by the Edinburgh-based impresario Ernst Denhof. For Beecham, its main attraction was that it offered him the opportunity to conduct his 1st « Ring » . No other British conductor had tackled a complete cycle of Richard Wagner's Tetralogy before. The Swiss-born Denhof was a man of lofty ambitions. In 1910, he had mounted in Edinburgh the 1st complete « Ring » in Britain to be seen outside London, which was sung in English and conducted by Michaël Balling, Bayreuth's « Ring » conductor at the time and Hans Richter's successor at the Hallé Orchestra. In 1911, again with Balling, Denhof toured the « Ring » to Leeds, Manchester and Glasgow, and, in the following year, was responsible for the 1st performances of « Elektra » , in English (it opened in Hull) .

The 1913 tour with Beecham was Denhof's biggest enterprise to date. Lasting 14 weeks, from September to December, it was scheduled to visit Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, Liverpool, Newcastle upon Tyne, Edinburgh, Aberdeen and Glasgow. Beecham was to conduct « Tristan und Isolde » , « Die Meistersinger » , « The Magic Flute » and, at least, 3 cycles of the « Ring » .

The « Ring » was sung in Frederick Jameson's English translation ; « The Magic Flute » in a translation prepared by Edward Dent, with shortened dialogue, for a production at Cambridge, in 1911, that attempted to restore the Opera to its original state. Though not entirely unknown in Britain, the « Flute » had suffered from years of inadequate touring productions that played fast and loose with the piece, both musically and dramatically. It had not been seen at Covent Garden, since 1888, when it received a single performance.

While Hans Schilling-Ziemssen, his assistant at Covent Garden earlier in the year, was to be responsible for the 1st performances outside London of both « Der Rosenkavalier » (given as « The Rose-Bearer » in Alfred Kalisch's translation) and Claude Debussy's « Pelléas et Mélisande » , along with « Der Fliegende Holländer » , « Elektra » and Gluck's « Orpheus and Euridice » . The stage director was another of Beecham's colleagues from Covent Garden, Hermann Gura.

Money seemed to be no object. There was an Orchestra of 65 players drawn from Scotland and London, a good-sized chorus augmented by local choral groups from each of the cities visited, and, for the « Orpheus » performances, a troupe of 24 dancers. Many of the principal singers, among them Agnes Nicholls, Cicely Gleeson-White, Caroline Hatchard, Frederic Austin, Walter Hyde and Frederick Blarney, had performed in Hans Richter's English « Ring » cycles at Covent Garden and Thomas Beecham's 1910 « Opéra-Comique » season. In contrast, the tenor Frank Mullings, who was to enjoy a remarkable success as Tristan, had had virtually no stage experience at all.

The tour began on 18 September with 2 weeks at the Prince of Wales Theatre, in Birmingham. Ernest Newman wrote of the opening night's « Tristan » that Beecham and the Orchestra had provided « by far, the best orchestral playing we have ever had in a Birmingham theatre the wonderful score was given with extraordinary brilliance and eloquence » while, in « The Mastersingers » , « what Beecham's performance lacked in breadth and solidity, it made-up for in vivacity, sensitiveness, and lucidity » . The Birmingham reviewers noted an alarming number of empty seats, particularly in the more expensive parts of the theatre. At the 2nd « Tristan » , on 23 September, there was a very poor house in every department : Denhof, it soon became clear, had made a disastrous miscalculation. His earlier seasons had taken place in the spring. In September, many of Birmingham's citizens had not recovered from the expense of their summer holidays and were in no mood to spend money on the Opera.

At the next venue, the Theatre Royal, in Manchester, the situation was not helped by the fact that the 1st week, there, coincided with the Jewish New Year, which, a letter from a reader in the « Manchester Guardian » pointed-out, meant that, on the Wednesday and Thursday, as well as on the Sabbath, many of the city's Jews, « Liberal patrons of the Opera » , felt compelled to attend the synagogue rather than the theatre. This did not explain, however, why advance bookings for the 2nd week (which was to feature the 1st « Ring » of the tour) were even worse than they were for the 1st. After only 4 days in the city, Denhof announced that his losses, already estimated at £ 4,000 (£ 246,000) , were so great that the Saturday-night performance of « Der Fliegende Holländer » , with Schilling-Ziemssen conducting, would be the last. He could not afford to continue, and was abandoning the tour. The zoo-strong company, faced with the loss of 11 weeks' work, was shocked. The debacle did nothing for Manchester's image. « Well may she hang her head in shame ! » , wrote « The Musical Times » .

Thomas Beecham, in London on the day the news broke, sent a message to the company, asking it to stick together and not leave the city. He said he was returning to Manchester post-haste, and would make a statement after the final « Flying Dutchman » , which, ironically, had attracted the largest audience of the week. At the end of it, cast and conductor were given a long ovation and there were cries of « Denhof ! Denhof ! » in the hope that the unfortunate impresario, for whom there was plenty of sympathy, might make a speech. But he was not to be found, so Charles Knowles, who had sung the part of the Dutchman, spoke in his place. « We cannot condemn “ Herr ” Denhof alone for what has happened » , he said. « It is the British public that has not come forward to our support. I hope, however, that this will not be the end of Opera on a large-scale in the provinces. I am a Yorkshireman (laughter) , and we are all Britishers, and we are not all going under on account of what has happened (cries of “ Bravo ! ” and applause) .

With the curtain finally down, Beecham, with Donald Baylis at his side, told the assembled company that although it was now too late to rescue the 2nd week in Manchester, he would do all he could to resurrect the tour. Much depended, he said, on talks he was holding on the Monday with United Theatres, which controlled the touring circuit. He asked everyone to leave their home addresses, so that they could be contacted as soon as a solution was found, and added that he hoped to meet them again in a week's time at the Lyceum Theatre, in Sheffield. He was heartily cheered.

Questioned by the press, Beecham said that he had no great faith in large-scale Opera outside London, either as an artistic or a financial undertaking when it came to Opera, the provinces were as bad as « the cannibal islands » - but he was concerned for the artists, whose work was endangered, and anxious that the cause of Opera in Britain should not « be allowed to suffer a set-back : he also took the opportunity to poke fun at Manchester for its lack of musical adventurousness. The managing director of United Theatres handed each member of the company a railway ticket and a portion of his or her salary and, the next morning, most of them left, along with all the scenery and costumes, by special train for London, where they were met by a representative of the « Daily Dispatch » . « Mister Beecham » , a member of the Orchestra told him, « is a brick » .

With Joseph still away in the United States, Beecham had to raise the money himself and, as subsequent events would make clear, he borrowed a lot of it. On the Tuesday, Beecham confirmed that the tour would be resumed as promised, though the last 2 venues, Aberdeen and Glasgow, would have to be dropped. Sheffield, which Beecham had attacked 2 years earlier for ignoring his production of « The Tales of Hofmann » , was subjected to a hurricane of publicity. « MISTER THOMAS BEECHAM » , ran an advertisement in the local press, « APPEALS TO THE SPORTING INSTINCTS OF THE SHEFFIELD PUBLIC TO SUPPORT HIM IN HIS GREAT EFFORT » : in a further move, the price of seats in the cheaper parts of the house was reduced. The strategy worked. Though the cost of mounting the Sheffield week was not quite covered, takings at the box-office were £ 4.00 (£ 24,600) more than Baylis had originally estimated. After the final performance of « Die Meistersinger » , Beecham spoke to the audience. The last time he had conducted in Sheffield, he said, « nobody came to hear me (laughter and cries of “ Shame ”) - and I grossly insulted you in the press the next day. Tonight, I take it all back (loud Cheers) » . Beecham, for once out of the shadow of his father, was enjoying himself immensely.

The following week's takings at the Grand Theatre, Leeds, where Beecham at last conducted his 1st « Ring » , showed a small profit, though the technical problems of putting-on a complete cycle under touring conditions within the space of only 5 days defeated even Baylis. Because of the unusual circumstances of the tour, he and the stage-staff had not had an opportunity to handle the « Ring » sets, which were « more or less strange to them » , until the day before the cycle opened. « It is, perhaps, as well to say at once that the mounting, the lighting, and the scenery of the work fell very far short indeed of the standard required by the composer » , wrote « The Times » of the Leeds cycle, « but their very imperfection served to throw the music itself into stronger relief » . « The Yorkshire Post » , reviewing « Götterdämmerung » , found it « hard to pardon the absolute fiasco at the close, when the curtain descended twice before its proper time, or the terrible muddle when the funeral procession was delayed till the bearers had to rush away under a descending cloth which, for some unaccountable reason, represented colossal Egyptian statues ! » . In « A Mingled Chime » , Beecham makes a joke of the premature curtain-falls, but he must have found them extremely galling at the time.

At the next venue, the Shakespeare Theatre, in Liverpool, advance bookings were so disappointing that Beecham cancelled the 2nd week, there, and instead, to everyone's surprise, returned to Manchester, where he conducted his 2nd « Ring » cycle. Samuel Langford, reviewing it for « The Guardian » , found the conducting in « Das Rheingold » « clever, effective and alert rather than imaginative » : but thought that as the week progressed Beecham's conception of the work grew in stature. By « Götterdämmerung » : it had become « broad and sweeping, and one felt as secure of the onward course of the music as if we were listening to it fresh from the well of the composer's imagination. When it came to the singers, Beecham, « apparently, a victim of the strain of the last few weeks did not appear in Liverpool, where the financial loss was “ considerable ” » (« The Liverpool Courier » , 3 November) .

Ernst Denhof Opera Company

The Ernst Denhof Opera Company was short-lived but a significant body formed for the season 1910-1911 by the Viennese pianist (pupil of Theodor Leschetizki) , teacher and impresario Ernst Denhof, a resident of Edinburgh - born in Vienna, in 1862, who died in Exeter, on 5 December 1936.

Denhof organized provincial performances of Richard Wagner's « Ring » (in English) . Michaël Balling conducted the 1st performances in Edinburgh, in 1910, followed in 1911 by tours to Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow, and to these cities, again in 1912, plus Hull and Liverpool.

Ernst Denhof's Company staged at the « Grand Theatre », « for the 1st time in its entirety », in the English Provinces, Richard Wagner's « Ring » Cycle, sung in English, with some of the leading Wagnerians of the day including : Madame Gleeson White, Florence Easton, John Coates, Walter Hyde and Frederick Austin with Michaël Balling conducting a huge Orchestra of 82 musicians drawn from the Scottish and Covent Garden Orchestras.

Repertory, by now, included Richard Strauß's « Elektra » (in English) and Wagner's « Die Meistersinger », with Claude Debussy's « Pelléas et Mélisande » and Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier », added in 1913, in which year the Company ran into financial trouble in Manchester, being rescued and absorbed by Thomas Beecham's Opera Company.

Caroline Hatchard Miss Hatchard is a native of Portsmouth, and was trained at the Royal Academy of Music under Madam Agnes Larkcom. She gained the Melba Prize, amongst other distinctions. She made her 1st appearance in Grand Opera at Covent Garden, in 1907, and there and elsewhere, she has sung important parts in « Hänsel und Gretel », « Faust », « Traviata », « The Tales of Hoffmann », Wagner's « Ring », and other great Operas. She has been engaged by « Herr » Ernst Denhof to sing the role of « Sophie » in Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier », the difficult music of the « Queen of the Night » in Mozart's « The Magic Flute », and as « Eva » in « Die Meistersinger ».

Robert Radford, Agnes Nicholls, Perceval Allen, Marion Beeley, Edith Clegg, Peter Cornelius, Lloyd Chandos, Morgan Kingston, Hans Bechstein, Clarence Whitehill.

Early 1913 (Bristol) : « Der Fliegende Holländer » in a concert version, conducted by Harold Bernard. With :

Robert Radford (Daland) ; Perceval Allen (Senta) ; Charles Knowles (Dutchman) ; Maurice d'Oisly (Erik) .

1913 : Financial fiasco of the Ernst Denhof - Thomas Beecham Tour. Abandoned after « Week One » , in Manchester.

There once was an impresario known as Ernst, and another named Tom. They shared the same dream, had the same focus and both thought Opera should become part of the British scene, perhaps, even that citizens should hum arias, now and then ! No easy task, then or now. Each managed great things but they shared a common fault ... they both lost money. That mattered little to Tom for he had a reserve, but to Ernst, this was a vital concern. In the end, as « Sir Thomas Beecham » , Tom became his country's most hallowed musical force, while « Ernst Denhof » slipped into obscurity.

13 October 1913 (Sheffield) : The Tour resumes.

1913 : The Denhof Opera Company returned to the « Grand Theatre » with a 2nd « Ring » Cycle ; this time conducted by Thomas Beecham.

18, 23 September 1913 (Birmingham) : « Tristan und Isolde » conducted by Thomas Beecham. With :

Robert Radford (King Mark) ; Frank Mullings (Tristan) ; Cicely Gleeson-White (Isolde) ; Lena Maitland (Brangäne) ; Charles Knowles (Kurwenal) .

25 June 1890 : Chamber music recital organized by pianist Ernst Denhof with Max Reichel (violin) , Charles Copland (baritone) , accompanied by George Clutsam (pianist-composer) .

7 July 1890 : Vocal and instrumental concert given by « Herr » Ernst Denhof (piano) with Madame Amy Sherwin (soprano) , Emile de Mlynarski (violin) and « Herr » H. Bast (cello) .

...

Monday, 12 March 1906 at 8 o'clock (Edinburgh) : Concert given by the Brodsky Quartet at Music Hall. The 6th and last chamber concert of the 10th season and the 50th and last of the Ernst Denhof's concerts.

...

9 novembre 1878 :Vienna premiere of Richard Wagner's Opera, « Siegfried » .

The 28 year old Richard Heuberger is engaged as conductor of the Vienna « Singakademie » .

27 novembre 1878 :WAB 54 - « Zur Vermählungsfeier » (lors de votre mariage) - « Zwei Herzen haben sich gefunden » (2 cœurs se sont rencontrés) , cantate (68 mesures) pour les célébrations de mariage en ré majeur pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) . Composée sur des paroles de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) . Dédiée aux nouveaux mariés, l'architecte et philosophe docteur Anton von Ölzelt-Newin (1817-1875) , qui fut un auditeur attentionné lors des conférences de Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne, et Amalie (Amy) Edle von Wieser.

Selon la biographie de August Göllerich et Max Auer, la Société chorale masculine à Klosterneuburg aurait dû chanter cette œuvre à l'occasion du mariage du couple à la « Stiftskirche » mais cela ne s'est pas produit en raison d'obstacles majeurs. En fait, le mariage à Klosterneuburg n'a pas eu lieu car Anton von Ölzelt-Newin était un protestant.

In his years in Vienna (1868-1896) , Bruckner lived at 4 addresses. He owed his flat on the 4th floor of « Heßgasse 7 » (November 1877 until July 1895) to his University student Anton Ölzelt Ritter von Newin (1854-1925) , who paid the rent for Bruckner himself. On the occasion of the marriage between Ölzelt von Newin and Amalie (Amy) Edle von Wieser, Bruckner finished this choral piece, on 27 November 1878. According to the Göllerich / Auer biography, the Male Choral Society in Klosterneuburg « should have performed the wedding choir on the occasion of Ölzelt's marriage in the “ Stiftskirche ”, but this did not come about due to such great difficulties. In actual fact, the wedding in Klosterneuburg did not take place, as Ölzelt was a Protestant » . Nothing is known about the premiere. At the International Bruckner Festival in Linz, a solo performance (by the Hilliard Ensemble) was held on 15 September 1993. This choral piece was only published as a supplement in the yearbook of Klosterneuburg Monastery, in 1910, and was edited in 1921, together with Bruckner's « Ave Regina » (WAB 8) , by Josef Venantius von Wöb at Universal-Edition.

Zwei Herzen haben sich gefunden
Und durch die Ehe sich verbunden.
Gesegnet hat des Priesters Hand
Das Paar, geknüpft das Liebesband.

Hat euch vereint der Geist der Wahrheit,
Habt ihr erfasst die Pflicht der Klarheit,
Dann ist der Ehe Heiligtum
Ein himmlisches Elysium.

So möge euch fürs ganze Leben
Der Himmel Heil und Segen geben,
Auch mein Gebet ruft heute laut :
Gott segne Bräutigam und Braut !

Décembre 1878 : The « Hunt » Scherzo of the 4th Symphony is composed.

9 décembre 1878 : In another letter to Wilhelm Tappert, Anton Bruckner reiterates his recommendation, saying that both Symphonies have been « reserved » for Berlin, in spite of interest shown by conductors elsewhere.

Fin-décembre 1878 : Bruckner, âgé de 54 ans, achève la révision de la 2e Symphonie et termine le nouveau « Scherzo de la Chasse » de la 4e.

Quelque temps après la composition du Quatuor à cordes en do mineur pour 2 violons, 1 alto et 1 violoncelle (WAB 111) , achevé le 7 août 1862, le violoniste Josef Hellmesberger demande à Bruckner d'écrire une œuvre pour son propre ensemble. C'est alors qu'il s'attèle à la composition du Quintette à cordes (WAB 112) qui utilise le schéma mozartien d'un Quatuor avec 1 alto supplémentaire.

WAB 112 : Quintette à cordes

Fin décembre 1878 - 12 juillet 1879 : WAB 112 - Quintette à cordes en fa majeur pour 2 violons, 2 altos et 1 violoncelle. Une commande du violoniste Josef Hellmesberger (le directeur du Conservatoire de Vienne) pour son propre Quatuor. « Dédié à Sa Majesté Royale, le duc Max Emmanuel de Bavière, avec mon plus profond respect. » Ce dernier fera parvenir à Bruckner, en retour, une épingle à cravate sertie de brillants diamants, en signe de remerciement.

Durée approximative : 45 minutes.

Maximilien Emmanuel, duc en Bavière (Maximilian Emanuel, Herzog in Bayern) est né le 7 décembre 1849 à Munich et est décédé le 12 juin 1893 à Feldafing. Fils de Maximilien en Bavière et de Ludovica de Bavière, il était le plus jeune des frères de l'Impératrice Elisabeth d'Autriche, la célèbre « Sissi », et de la duchesse d'Alençon. Il était surnommé « Mapperl » .

Il épousa Amélie de Saxe-Cobourg-Gotha (23 octobre 1848 - 6 mai 1894) , petite-fille du roi des Français Louis-Philippe Ier et sœur du futur tsar Ferdinand Ier de Bulgarie.

Amélie était fiancée au prince Léopold de Bavière mais l'impératrice d'Autriche (« Sissi ») , sœur de Mapperl intervint, proposa à Léopold sa propre fille, l'archiduchesse Gisèle. Léopold choisit ce second parti et Max et Amélie s'unirent. Ce fut une des plus belles histoires d'amour du gotha ; Mapperl mourut prématurément dans sa 44e année d'hémorragies à l'estomac. Amélie ne lui survécut que quelques mois avant de le rejoindre dans la tombe.

Le Quintette à cordes fut commencé en décembre 1878, peu après les révisions des 4e et 5e Symphonies. Bruckner avait alors 54 ans. Il fut achevé en juillet 1879. Josef Hellmesberger, qui commanda l'œuvre, ne fut « pas impressionné » par le Scherzo initial, le trouvant trop compliqué et inapproprié. Il refusa même de le jouer. Comme toujours, le compositeur, anxieux de plaire, fit preuve d'une compréhension presque exagérée et remplaça le mouvement par un nouvel Intermezzo qu'il complètera plusieurs mois plus tard. Des efforts qui ne furent pas récompensés puisque le violoniste Hellmesberger attendit 6 années pour jouer l'œuvre avec le Scherzo décrié ! Tandis que l'Intermezzo devait encore patienter quelques longues années pour être donné à son tour à Vienne, le 23 janvier 1904, par le Quatuor Fitzner.

Il est difficile de comprendre pourquoi Hellmesberger trouva à redire à ce mouvement : ses exécutants connaissaient sans doute les Quatuors de Beethoven, dont certains comportent des parties aussi techniquement et musicalement exigeantes que le Scherzo de Bruckner. L'antipathie de Hellmesberger pour cette œuvre était due plus probablement à sa réticence à manifester publiquement son approbation pour une œuvre qu'il admirait en privé.

Les Ires représentations seront données sans le Finale. D'abord à Cologne, en décembre 1879, par le Quatuor Heckmann. Puis au Wagnerverein de Vienne, le 17 novembre, par le Quatuor Winkler dirigé par Josef Schalk. Son frère Franz, lui, occupera la chaise de second alto pour l'occasion.

(Bien qu'ami et admirateur de Bruckner, Franz Schalk devait plus tard causer tant de dommages à la 5e Symphonie en y faisant des coupures sans goût et en y ajoutant de la musique de son cru.)

En mai 1883, le Winkler donnera la Ire exécution du Quintette avec le Scherzo original et le Finale. En mai 1885, le Quatuor Hellmesberger jouera enfin l'œuvre dans son intégralité ; Scherzo inclus.

Création en privée à Vienne, en novembre 1881, par des élèves et amis du compositeur réunis par Joseph Schalk, sans le Finale tout d'abord, puis en entier, quelques années plus tard.

Création publique à Vienne, le 8 janvier 1885, par le Quatuor Hellmesberger.

In « Jean Sibelius : His Life and Personality » (1938) , Karl Ekman details Sibelius' visit to Vienna. Sibelius recalls :

« Anton Bruckner, I never met personally. But I was present at the original performance of his Sextet. I was sitting quite close to him and had a good opportunity of observing him. A kindly little old man, who seemed rather lost in the world. He was short of stature, but disproportionately stout. The joking Viennese called him " ein Rhinoceros mit Nachtigallenkehle " (a rhinoceros with the throat of a nightingale) »

(Despite Bruckner's bucolic appearance and Sibelius' « lost in the world » reference, he was, by all accounts, quite gregarious. In Linz, he had quite a hectic social life. He joined the Linz Choral Society, « Liedertafel Frohsinn » , as 2nd tenor but he was appointed conductor not long after. It was for them that he composed one of his settings of the « Ave Maria » text ; this one for 7 voices, unaccompanied, with a 3 part women's chorus starting followed by the 4 part men's chorus.)

L'œuvre sera jouée en public à plus de 20 occasions du vivant du compositeur. Même s'il demeure un objet de curiosité dans la production brucknérienne, le Quintette prendra une place solide dans le répertoire de la musique de chambre et n'est si peu connu du public qu'à cause de son arrangement musical et de l'écriture assez peu impressionnante de ses parties.

Gemäßigt - Scherzo Schnell - Andante (Adagio) - Finale. Lebhaft bewegt.

Le 1er mouvement a pu être considéré comme celui qui se prête le plus au moyen d'expression offert par la musique de chambre. Il en a le contrepoint complexe et bondissant et les figures chromatiques, qui seraient perdus dans une structure orchestrale. Il comporte 3 fils thématiques distincts : une large mélodie que l'on entend d'emblée, une figure à notes pointées qui passe d'un instrument à l'autre, et une mélodie qui déploie doucement ses courbes. De courts motifs rythmiques abondent dans l'exposition, qui se termine calmement après son apogée en fa dièse ; le développement a recours à plusieurs de ces courtes figures, et le mouvement se termine fermement en fa majeur.

Le Scherzo a été qualifié à la fois de grotesque et d'aimable : son thème enjoué en ré mineur possède le battement rythmique d'une danse de campagne, bien que par ses modulations et par ses grands bonds il rappelle plutôt une musique plus intime et sophistiquée que celle de l'orchestre de village. Le Trio lyrique est en mi bémol ; le rythme en est plus lent, avec un accompagnement en pizzicato qui lui est propre, et qui évoque une écriture plus Symphonique.

Le sublime Adagio est en sol bémol, et forme le centre émotionnel de toute l'œuvre. Il ne le cède en rien, en profondeur, aux Quatuors tardifs de Beethoven, ni aux mouvements Symphoniques lents de Bruckner lui-même, et il est conçu à une échelle semblable. Ce mouvement pourrait même être pris pour une transcription d'un mouvement Symphonique lent, tant le maniement du matériau thématique montre de confiance. Il comporte 3 épisodes distincts, et le mouvement se termine sur une note de paix profonde et de sérénité.

Dans le Finale, les cordes sont aux prises avec un contrepoint excessivement hardi et une structure orchestrale. Bruckner semble ici écrire un mouvement Symphonique pour cordes seules de la plus grande envergure, et l'effet peut en sembler forcé et peu convaincant. Le mouvement commence en fa mineur avec un second sujet en mi majeur, puis un développement fugué incorpore de brefs motifs pris au matériau thématique principal. La récapitulation fait ressortir la richesse de l'ensemble moyennement lourd avec Maîtrise, et le Quintette se termine, vif et sonore, en fa majeur.

...

Commandé par le violoniste et directeur du Conservatoire de Vienne, Josef Hellmesberger, succédant aux Quintettes de Mozart et de Beethoven plutôt qu'à ceux, avec 2 violoncelles, de Boccherini et de Schubert, le Quintette à cordes de Bruckner fut souvent comparé à ses œuvres orchestrales au point d'être parfois présenté comme une « Symphonie déguisée ». Mais si l'on fait abstraction de ses dimensions et de l'ajout d'un second violon à l'effectif traditionnel du Quatuor (ajout que l'on doit sans doute à Bruckner lui-même), son langage était bel et bien caractéristique de sa formation instrumentale. La façon dont, au cœur du 1er mouvement, le 1er thème réapparaît à découvert à l'alto avant de laisser le 1er violon prendre son envol, le renversement de ce même thème par le violoncelle ainsi que la complexité contrapuntique qui doit une bonne part de son effet à l'homogénéité instrumentale des cordes sont autant d'exemples prouvant que ce Quintette mérite sa place dans le répertoire de la musique de chambre. Et l'on pourrait encore évoquer l'accompagnement du Scherzo semblant finalement autant se chercher que le thème lui-même, se servant des détachés ou des liés comme l'on recourt parfois aux tonalités pour retrouver son chemin. C'est peut-être dans ces modulations inattendues, dans cette structure motivique dont on ne perçoit pas toute la complexité lorsqu'un motif secondaire est projeté en 1re place d'un fugato que se dessine la poésie du Quintette. Une poésie de l'hésitation, du détour et du revirement, annoncée, dès la 1re mesure, par la 3e note du violon, une tierce mineure inattendue qui assombrit brusquement la tonalité principale.

Longtemps, le Quintette en fa majeur fut considéré comme étant la seule contribution de Bruckner au répertoire de la musique de chambre. Mais il y eut également le Quatuor à cordes en ut mineur, achevé en 1862, un « Abendklänge » pour violon et piano de 1866, et quelques pièces pour 3 trombones. Le Quintette, finalement, connut presque autant de difficultés que les autres pièces du Maître (et que les Symphonies notamment) pour s'imposer définitivement.

Un jour, l'immense « Christus » avait été programmé lors d'un Festival de musique. C'est alors que Franz Liszt demanda que son Oratorio soit retiré pour donner l'opportunité à Anton Bruckner (qui était présent) de faire connaître ses propres compositions. Le Quintette à cordes de même que les 1er et 3e mouvements de la Symphonie dite « Romantique » furent joués devant un public élitiste, composé de musiciens et de critiques.

WAB 112 (1878-1879) : String Quintet in F major (with viola) . It was written in 1879 at the request of Josef Hellmesberger, Senior. Dedicated to Duke Max Emanuel of Bavaria. Like Mozart's 6 String Quintets, Bruckner's is scored for 2 violins, 2 violas and 1 cello.

Ist Publication : Gutman, Vienna (1884) .

It is in 4 movements :

Gemäßigt, F major, 3/4.

Scherzo : Schnell, D minor, Trio : Langsamer, E-flat major, both 3/4.

Adagio, G-flat major, common time.

Finale : Lebhaft bewegt, F minor to F major, common time.

At Ist, the Scherzo was 3rd rather than 2nd, as in most of Bruckner's Symphonies.

The idea of Anton Bruckner as a composer of chamber music may seem inconceivable to those given to quick misjudgment. His String Quintet of 1879, his sole mature chamber work, shows that Bruckner was completely at ease and eloquent in the medium. Created between the 5th and 6th Symphonies, the music seems to be striving for orchestral utterance in only a few spots (if that can even be considered a flaw) . Otherwise, the composer completely integrated his characteristic vernacular into the chamber idiom in this concise and well-crafted work.

The main-theme of the Ist movement is more lyrical and searching than a typical Bruckner opening, making the work a cousin to the 7th Symphony, in that regard. The theme is passed from one instrument to the next until a typical Brucknerian octave unison evolves. The 2nd subject is a characteristic « Gesangperiode » , less Austrian in flavour than Bruckner's other music of this type. A leisurely expansive development follows, including Bruckner's favored device of theme inversion. The recapitulation is telescoped, as was the composer's wont in later works, and a characteristic reiterative Coda closes the movement. The Scherzo comes 2nd, as in the last 2 Symphonies, and is quite unlike any other by Bruckner. It combines an elfin spirit with the rhythm of the composer's beloved « Ländler » . The Trio section is, yet, another curiosity for Bruckner ; it is in the style of an old-fashioned minuet, even if the composer's modern modulations peer through the 18th Century framework.

The 3rd movement again seems to inhabit the world of the 7th Symphony, with many of its turns of phrase and cadences recalling the later work's Adagio ; yet, overall, a solid peacefulness diverges from the mournfulness of the 7th's slow movement. The 2nd theme continues this serene and reflective spirit, recalling the corresponding theme in the 3rd Symphony's Adagio. The 2 themes are woven into an elaborate tapestry of development. A gypsy-like descent of 16th notes leads to a more plaintive transformation of the 2nd theme ; the opening is recalled once more before the calm of the lulling Coda. The Finale gives ample proof that conciseness was not beyond Bruckner's capabilities when it suited what he needed to say. The 1st subject is highly-animated and motive-derived rather than thematic. A striking transition which seems to flirt with atonality leads to the 2nd theme, another typical « Gesangsperiode ». The rhythmic 3rd subject features stark, angular counterpoint, anticipating that of the 1st movement of the 6th Symphony. The development is leisurely, focusing on the more lyrical elements of the exposition. There is only the faintest suggestion of a recapitulation, with the earlier themes fleetingly referred to. In the Coda, is there a tendency to break through to an orchestral utterance ? One can hear echoes of the Symphony's final measures. This concluding gesture notwithstanding, the work inspires speculation as to what Bruckner might have accomplished further in the chamber music vein.

The 1st 3 movements were premiered in Vienna, on November 17, 1881, by the Winkler Quartet, with Josef Schalk joining on 2nd viola, in Vienna. The 1st Edition was published in 1884 by Albert J. Gutmann of Vienna, who didn't pay Bruckner any money for it. However, Bruckner made some small adjustments to the piece even after publication. It wasn't until 1885 that the Hellmesberger Quartet played it with Max Mustermann joining on 2nd viola.

Hellmesberger found the Scherzo too difficult, so Bruckner wrote an Intermezzo (WAB 113) in the same key to replace it. In concerts today, however, the original Scherzo is usually used instead of the Intermezzo, and, on recordings, the Intermezzo is usually included as an additional track. Also, the 1st Edition included metronome markings that didn't come from Bruckner, namely : Gemäßigt quarter note = 72 ; Schnell quarter note = 138 ; Adagio quarter note = 56 ; Lebhaft bewegt quarter note = 144.

Duke Emanuel was pleased by the composition and gave Bruckner a diamond pin. In all, there were 23 performances of the Quintet in Bruckner's lifetime.

Bruckner biographer Derek Watson finds the work « by no means a « Symphony for 5 strings » and it never stretches the Quintet medium beyond its capabilities, save perhaps for the last 17 bars of the Finale, where Bruckner is thinking too much in orchestral terms ». Robert Simpson, on the other hand, also finds the 1st movement Coda « a little ludicrously orchestral », but overall « only the Finale of the Quintet is not fully satisfactory as a piece of composition », in his assessment, because « Bruckner is still absorbed in the problem of the Symphonic Finale of his own peculiar stamp, and forgets that the tonal scale of 5 string instruments is unsuitable for such an architecture ».

...

A glance through the catalogue of the works of Anton Bruckner reminds us of his musical upbringing and environment : choral conductor, organist, then (having heard the music of Richard Wagner) Symphonist. His early works include music for military band and for orchestra, though their harmonic conception is firmly rooted in the organ loft. Of his very few pieces of chamber music, an early String Quartet was written as a student exercise for Otto Kitzler, the cellist with the Linz Municipal Theatre from whom Bruckner had taken lessons in composition. It remained undiscovered until long after the composer's death. Some time after its composition, the violinist Josef Hellmesberger asked Bruckner to write a work for his String Quartet ensemble. It was not until 17 years later that Bruckner planned a String Quintet using Mozart's scheme of Quartet with an extra viola.

The Quintet was begun in December 1878, shortly after revisions to the 4th and 5th Symphonies. Bruckner was 54 year old. It was finished in July 1879 and shown to Hellmesberger. He was « not impressed » with the Scherzo and refused to play the work, saying it was too difficult. Bruckner, ever compliant and anxious to please, wrote an Intermezzo which was completed several months later. The 1st performances were given, without the Finale, in Cologne, in December 1879, by the Heckmann Quartet, and by the Winkler Quartet in Vienna, the following November. The Winkler Quartet was led by Josef Schalk and the 2nd viola was played by his brother Franz, who (though a friend and admirer of Bruckner) was later to wreak such havoc on the 5th Symphony by making inartistic cuts and adding music of his own. In May 1883, the Winkler Quartet gave the 1st complete performance with the original Scherzo and the Finale. The Hellmesberger Quartet finally played it (Scherzo and all) , in May 1885.

What of the Quintet's subsequent history ? It was published in 1884 by Albert J. Gutmann and dedicated to Duke Max Emanuel of Bavaria. The Duke sent a diamond tie-pin in return ; Bruckner received nothing from his publisher. The Quintet had over 20 public performances in Bruckner's lifetime, and though it remains something of a curiosity in his total output it has a respectable reputation in the chamber repertoire and is unfamiliar to audiences merely because of its scoring and relatively unspectacular part-writing.

The 1st movement is arguably the most appropriate to the chamber music medium. It has the « feel » of a chamber work, with intricate, leaping counterpoint and chromatic figures that would be lost in an orchestral texture. There are 3 distinct thematic strands : a broad melody heard at the outset, a dotted figure which is passed between various instruments, and a soft curving melody. Short rhythmic motifs abound in the exposition, which ends quietly after a climax in F-sharp ; the development uses several of these short figures and the movement ends firmly in F major.

The Scherzo has been described as both grotesque and endearing. Its jaunty D minor theme has the pulse of a country dance, though the modulations and wide leaps are redolent of a more intimate, sophisticated medium than that of the village band. The lyrical Trio is in E-flat ; it has a slower pulse, with a distinctive pizzicato accompaniment that recalls more Symphonic writing.

It is difficult to see why Hellmesberger found this movement unacceptable. His players must have known the Quartets of Beethoven, some of which have part-writing which is as technically and musically demanding as Bruckner's Scherzo. A more likely reason for his antipathy to the work was his unwillingness to show public approval of Bruckner's work which, privately, he admired.

The sublime Adagio is in G-flat and forms the emotional centre of the whole work. Its effect is as profound as any of Beethoven's Late Quartets or Bruckner's own Symphonic slow movements, and it is conceived on a similar scale. Indeed, the movement might easily be mistaken for a transcription of a Symphonic slow movement, so confident is the handling of thematic material. There are 3 distinct episodes, and the movement ends in a mood of great peace and serenity.

In the Finale, the string players battle with over-adventurous counterpoint and an orchestral texture. Bruckner appears to be writing a towering Symphonic movement for solo strings, and the effect can easily sound strained and unconvincing. The movement begins in F minor with a 2nd subject in E major, and a fugato development incorporates short motifs from the main thematic material. The recapitulation shows masterly use of the richness of the middle-heavy ensemble, and the Quintet ends briskly and sonorously in F major.

...

Bruckner's String Quintet (falling chronologically between his Symphonies Nos. 5 and 6) is not merely one of the most distinguished compositions in his œuvre but, moreover, the Quintet is one of the greatest chamber works of the Late-19th Century.

It is simply a superb work in terms of form and content, on par with late Beethoven, Schubert, and Brahms.

The string writing is extremely assured : this is what we look for in small ensemble string media (trios, quartets, quintets) .

Bruckner's advanced harmonic treatment is akin to Schubert's, but utterly original and individualistic. Bruckner knew Schubert's art via the latter's « Lieder » and « Klavierstücke » .

The heart of the String Quintet is, of course, the great Adagio comparable perhaps to the Adagio of his Symphony No. 7. The majestic vista of his vision combined with the subjective depth of human affection recall the Adagio « Heiliger Dankesang » of Beethoven's late A minor Quartet, while anticipating the expansive Largo « Gebet mit dem leben Gott » of Max Reger's « chef-d'œuvre » , his Sextet.

Review by Hugo Wolf, « Wiener Salonblatt » (10 January 1886) :

« Anton Bruckner's String Quintet is one of those rare artistic phenomena blessed with the capacity to utter a profound secret in a simple, sensible way, in contrast to the usual procedure, much favoured by our modern " Masters ", of clothing simple, everyday thoughts in the enigmatic utterances of oracles.

Bruckner's music flows full-bodied and rich from the clear fountain of a child-like spirit.

One can say with Wagner's Hans Sachs :

“ It sounded so old, and was yet so new. ”

This is thanks to a strong, popular strain that emerges everywhere in his Symphonic compositions, sometimes overtly, sometimes hidden. How charming, for example, is the “ Ländler ”- like Trio of the Quintet ! How well the composer, for all his earthiness, knows how to play the gentleman of distinction, sometimes by a harmonic deviation or a bit of ingenious counterpoint, by a more richly-coloured instrumentation or a surprising inversion of themes, etc.

Never is Bruckner common place or banal, a virtue he shares with Schubert. But neither do Bruckner's compositions ever seem to be contrived. His harmonies are bold and new, and they lend the melody an utterly characteristic finery, a definite physiognomy that impresses itself with adamantine incisiveness upon the listener's sensibility. His thematic invention is the product of an extraordinarily fertile fantasy and a glowing perceptiveness, hence, the lucid imagery of his musical language. »

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt looks closely at the critical responses to the performance of Bruckner's String Quintet by the Hellmesberger Quartet, in his article « The Critics and the Quintet : A Study in Musical Representation » , seeing in their often highly-coloured language not simply « an expression of the division of musical opinion and affiliation in the Viennese musical world between Wagnerians and Brahmsians » but also « one with a distinct social and cultural background that grew increasingly politicized » . In concentrating on the reception of the Quintet, he seeks to make a distinction between features of musical æsthetics and style on the one hand, and polemical and political issues on the other - issues that often become intertwined with purely musical considerations and make it difficult for us to disentangle today. It is also important to remember that, of the dozen or so journalists who contributed reviews of Bruckner's works regularly in the 1880's and early 1890's, only a few were consistently negative in their criticism. Admittedly, Eduard Hanslick, writing in the « Neue freie Presse » , the paper with the largest circulation, Max Kalbeck, also a contributor to the « Neue freie Presse » as well as the « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » and the « Neue Wiener Tagblatt » , and Gustav Dömpke, another contributor to the « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » , had a great influence on the climate of musical opinion and Bruckner's main-concern was that their unduly harsh critical responses to the Quintet would impede not only public reception of the work but also, coming at a time when the 7th Symphony was being recognized as a major Symphonic achievement, the slow but sure onward march to ultimate recognition.

Bruckner Journal Conference in Nottingham (26 April 2003)

Introduction : Genesis and Reception

2 letters (the 1st written to his Berlin friend, Wilhelm Tappert, on 9 December 1878 ; and the 2nd written to Ignaz P. Traumhler, Choir director at Saint-Florian abbey, on 25 July 1879) give precise details of the compositional time-scale of the String Quintet. Bruckner informed Tappert not only that he had completed revision work on his 4th Symphony but also that he had begun work on a String Quintet « which Hellmesberger who, as you know, is very enthusiastic about my works, has repeatedly urged me to compose » . In his letter to Traumihler, in which he enclosed the manuscript of his Motet, « Os justi » , he mentioned that he had finished the work, much to the satisfaction of Josef Hellmesberger, senior :

« Hellmesberger, the Court music-director, is quite beside himself with joy and intends to perform it. He is completely changed and makes a huge fuss of me. » (1)

Dates in the autograph in the Austrian National Library confirm that the work was completed on 12 July 1879 and its 4 movements were written in the order : 1st movement (end of 1878 - beginning of 1879) ; Adagio (March - April 1879) ; Finale (May - June) ; Scherzo. Hellmesberger clearly found the Scherzo too difficult and was not as « overjoyed » as Bruckner made-out. As a result, the composer wrote an alternative 3rd movement : an Intermezzo (the autograph of which is also in the Austrian National Library) , which he completed on 21 December. No alternative Trio was written. This replacement movement seemed to please Hellmesberger even less, and the original Scherzo was re-instated in the 1st edition of the Quintet (Albert J. Gutmann, Vienna, 1884) ; the Intermezzo was published posthumously (Universal-Edition, Vienna, 1913) . Another interesting point concerns the order of the movements. In the original autograph, the copy used for engraving and the parts used by the Hellmesberger Quartet, the slow movement is placed 2nd. But a more satisfactory order of movements, in which the slow movement is placed 3rd, was eventually adopted both in the engraver's copy and the parts, almost certainly with Bruckner's approval. Although Bruckner made some alterations and additions in the engraver's copy, for instance a tempo change in the slow movement (originally, « Andante quasi allegretto ») and some changes in the 2nd subject of the Finale, he did not copy these into the autograph. There are other differences between the autograph and the 1st edition. 2 cuts indicated in the autograph (in the Coda of the 1st movement, bars 245-264 ; in the Scherzo, bars 63-82) were not observed either in the engraver's copy or the 1st edition and can, justifiably, be disregarded. The closing bars of the Finale were amended to provide a more convincing conclusion in the printed version. (2)

Hellmesberger and his Quartet did not perform the work until January 1885. In the meantime, Bruckner carried-out some revision work on his 4th Symphony (including the 1880 Finale) , and composed his 6th (completed on September 1881) and 7th Symphonies (completed on September 1883) , « Te Deum » (completed on March 1884) and some sacred and secular choral works. In November 1881, Josef Schalk, one of the composer's most dedicated pupils, arranged a private performance of the 1st 3 movements of the Quintet in the « Bösendorfer » Hall which received 1 or 2 reviews in the local press, including favourable comments from Theodor Helm. (3) The 1st performance of the complete Quintet was given by the Winkler Quartet, with Franz Schalk playing the 1st viola part, at another private musical evening arranged by the Wagner Society in the « Bösendorfer » Hall, on 7 May 1883. Josef Schalk also made a piano-duet arrangement of the Quintet. (4) Critical reaction to the 1st major public performance (by the Hellmesberger Quartet in the large « Musikverein » Hall, on 8 January 1885) was mixed. We know, of course, that, as far as Bruckner's music was concerned, Viennese critics were usually divided into 2 diametrically opposed camps with 1 or 2 occupying a kind of middle-ground. This is certainly true of the 1st performance reviews. Writing in « Die Presse » , Max Kalbeck described the Quintet as a « mixed sequence of musical hallucinations, an apocalypse in 4 chapters the unravelling of which would require a new subsidiary work » but, at least, conceded that the Adagio came « directly from paradise ... the reflection of an ecstatic vision reaching to the 7th heaven » . (5) Gustav Dömpke, the reviewer for the « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » , adopted the same stance, making a distinction between the muddled structures and harmonic waywardness of the outer-movements and the sustained excellence of the « deeply-felt ensemble writing » in the Adagio. (6) Eduard Hanslick referred to Bruckner as an anarchist, transferring the Wagnerian style to 5 string instruments - « endless melody, freedom from all natural laws of modulation, Wotan's pathos, Mime's will-o'-the-wisp-like humour, and Isolde's intense and self-consuming ecstatic utterances » . (7) Ludwig Speidel's review was, as one would expect from a critic normally favourably disposed towards Bruckner, much more appreciative. He described the working-out of material in the 1st movement as « masterly » although he regretted that the structure was not « more open and pliable » . The Scherzo, however, was a « most interesting and charming » movement and the Adagio « an outpouring of pure song » . (8) Theodor Helm who had already praised the Adagio in his 1881 review and described the Adagio as one of the « noblest, most inspired, most gentle and euphonious pieces that has been written in modern times » when reviewing another performance of the String Quintet by the Winkler Quartet in an « Akademischer Gesangverein » concert, in April 1884, conceded that Bruckner's « masterly creative powers » and « unusual contrapuntal skill » occasionally demanded too much of his listeners, but was convinced nonetheless that the work was « indisputably one of the most important works to have appeared in the realm of modern chamber music » . (9) In an article on the « Quintet » , in the « Bruckner-Jahrbuch » , Gerold Gruber says that it was his 1st hearing of the work in 1881 which « converted » a hitherto sceptical Helm from a « Saul » to a « Paul » in his appreciation of Bruckner's music. (10)

The work itself : a brief analysis

It is interesting that one of the negative points Dömpke makes in his review is that the Quintet, « which is without precedent in chamber music » , can only be directly compared with Bruckner's Symphonies « of which only a small number, not without reason, have become known » . Dömpke's chief complaint, which is clearly expressed earlier in the review, is that the Quintet on the whole is structurally abstruse ; and he finds support for this notion by making a direct comparison with the Symphonies. And when I agree that the Quintet shares several compositional features with the Symphonies, I am stressing the « positive » rather than the negative and drawing attention to the « massive » octave-unison gestures and rich textures one associates with the orchestral works. On the other hand, the time-signature for the 1st movement (3/4) is one which is not found at the same point in any of the Symphonic works. In addition, there are many passages in which Bruckner displays a remarkable awareness of the chamber medium and shows that he is not thinking orchestrally but is concerned more with the give and take of thematic material among the 5 instruments. Each instrument has its own, individual voice but Bruckner is able to blend the different strands into a homogenous whole. I or 2 commentators have made the pertinent point that, by making a conscious decision to use 2 violas rather than 2 cellos, he strengthened the middle-range of the texture and avoided the more « Symphonic » sound of a stronger bass. Bruckner's handling of Sonata-form structure is also different from that encountered in the Symphonies, and clearly shows that it wasn't his intention to write a mini-Symphony or Symphony for chamber music forces ! Comparing the outer-movements of the Quintet with the parallel movements in his Symphonies, Wilhelm Seidel writes :

« In the outer-movements of his Quintet, Bruckner moves away from the monumentality of the Symphony. There is finesse, malleability and suppleness in his style and he leans towards a looser formal structure which is almost fantasia-like at times ; nevertheless, this is achieved without any constriction in the dynamic-range of his musical language or decrease in the organisational level of his form. Bruckner reduces both the internal and external format of his movements. The 1st movement of the 5th Symphony, the Symphony which he composed before the Quintet, has 573 bars and the final movement 541 bars ; the 1st movement of the Quintet is 273 bars long, and the Finale 197 bars long. » (11)

Although this reduction in format is true of the outer-movements, it is certainly not applicable to the « Adagio » 3rd movement, by far the longest movement in the work and one which undoubtedly possesses the depth and breadth of a Symphonic slow movement. (12) There is no doubt that it provides the emotional high-point of the Quintet and, as we have seen, even those who criticized the work as a whole, were moved to recognize its wonderful melodic inventiveness.

Ist Movement

In the 1st movement (« Gemässigt », in F major) , Bruckner stretches the Sonata-form structure by introducing new material towards the end of the exposition (bars 74-98) . (13) Before that, we have a 1st subject group whose secondary material (bars 21-28) , in particular a rhythmical figure 1st heard on the cello, is an essential part of both the 2nd subject group (bars 29-56) and the powerful 3rd subject group (bars 57-73) . The new material in bars 74ff, which is more typical of a Brucknerian 2nd subject, moves from F-sharp major to C major, the key of the dominant one would expect at the end of a Sonata-form exposition. The repeated falling 5ths for 2nd violin (89ff) prepare for the return of the Opening limb of the first subject material at the beginning of the development section (99ff) . After alternating with quasi-improvisatory « ad libitum » phrases for 1st violin and viola, this material is worked contrapuntally in « stretto » and inversion. The descending trills from the 1st subject return in bars 123ff and are combined with the earlier dotted rhythms which are also presented in « stretto » fashion (bars 127-129) . In bars 131-138, Bruckner introduces a more lyrical and « Ländler » - like new theme for 1st violin above the trills and « pizzicato » cello. After more « fugato » treatment of the opening limb (139ff) , another soaring « ad libitum » phrase for 1st violin leads into the recapitulation which follows the same course as the exposition, although it is not an exact repeat. Bars 11-16, for instance, are not re-stated and the 2nd subject material is shortened. On the other hand, the « closing group » (bars 23ff ; cf. bars 74ff in the exposition) , which begins in B major but soon moves to F major, is considerably expanded. In the Coda, which is admittedly almost orchestral, the important rhythmical figure from earlier is particularly prominent in the 2nd violin (bars 241-247) and 2nd viola (bars 265-270) .

2nd Movement

The contrast between 4 bar and 2 bar phrases helps to give the « Scherzo » (« Schnell » , in D minor) great rhythmical vitality which is maintained in a more restrained fashion in the middle-section (bars 35-82) . Bruckner gave some indication of the kind of contrast he wished in this central section when he wrote to Benno Walter, in March 1885 - « Please, do not observe the tempo-marking exactly, but play the 2nd section up to the repeat of the opening-section almost Andante » . (14) Although Bruckner indicated « Langsamer » only for bars 63-82, Leopold Nowak, in his edition of the Quintet in the « Gesamtausgabe », adds « Quasi Andante » in brackets at bar 35 in accordance with Bruckner's instructions to Walter. The main thematic material is provided by the 1st and 2nd violin parts, and Bruckner directs the latter to be « immer hervortretend » (always prominent) in the outer-sections. The 2nd violin also has a primary role in the « Trio » (« Langsamer », E-flat major) . Its Neapolitan key-relationship with the « Scherzo » enables Bruckner to effect a seamless return to the latter.

3rd Movement

In the 1st movement, the close relationship between the 1st and 2nd subject groups is created by a pervasive rhythmical figure. In the slow movement (« Adagio », G-flat major) , the relationship is a melodic one, the falling « Hauptmotiv » of the 1st theme being inverted to produce a rising melody (initially in the viola, bars 37ff.) , which is characterized harmonically by its swing between B-flat major and B-flat minor over an F dominant pedal. Bruckner exploits this relationship in the central-section of the movement. After a shortened re-statement of the 1st subject (bars 67-76) , the « Hauptmotiv » is treated imitatively (bars 77-82) . When it appears in inversion (2nd viola, bars 83-84 ; 1st violin, bars 85-86) , it is but a step to the return of the 2nd subject material (at bar 91) . This is not expanded, but a variant of the « Hauptmotiv » , in both direct and inverted forms, is used as a means of exploring a wide-range of keys and effecting a central climax of great power (bars 103ff.) . The alternative (« ossia ») 1st and 2nd violin parts in the score in bars 107-110 are in accordance with Bruckner's addition to the engraver's copy at this point ; demi-semiquavers would certainly not be practical at an « Andante quasi allegretto » tempo ! Further exploration of the diversified 2nd subject material leads to a broad preparation (« Langsamer. Gemessen » , bars 135-138) for the return of the 1st subject which flows into a valedictory Coda over a G-flat pedal (bars 157 - end) .

Finale

The immediately striking feature of the Finale (« Lebhaft bewegt » , F minor - F major) is the lack of a clearly defined « 1st subject » . Instead, we have 32 bars of preparatory material, 16 over a D-flat pedal (as dominant of G-flat major) and 16 over a C pedal (as potential dominant of F major) which is brought to an abrupt end with a pause mark over the bar-line. What follows is a freely modulating 2nd subject (« Langsamer ») commencing in E major and ending inconclusively over a B pedal in bar 70. In its combination of 2 contrasting melodic ideas (falling and rising 6ths initially in 1st viola ; expansive melody for 1st violin) , it is reminiscent of the 2nd subject in the Finale of the 3rd Symphony. There is also a contrast of 2 different ideas (rising and falling crotchets and triplet quavers) in the quasi-fugal texture of the energetic 3rd subject material (bars 71-86) . After a quieter interlude in which the angular crotchet leaps make prominent appearances in direct and inverted forms in the 2nd viola and cello (bars 87-96) , the triplet quavers (« breit gestrichen immer ») appear in all 5 instruments to produce a « fff » climax on an octave-unison high A-flat (bars 97-108) . After a bar's rest, the 1st viola begins the rising and falling 2nd subject idea on the enharmonic G-sharp. This brief « ppp » interlude is followed by a more restrained re-appearance of the 3rd subject material over a prolonged C harmonic pedal (bars 115-130) . At this point, we recognize some degree of kinship with the preparatory material at the beginning of the movement. After another pause-mark over the bar-line, the 2nd subject material is restated, proceeding from D-flat major to B-flat major via a variety of keys. A semi-tone rise in the bass, B-flat - B natural (bars 157-158) , is followed by the opening material over a C pedal which is now resolved clearly in F major (bars 181 - end) , the tonic key which Bruckner doggedly avoided at the beginning of the movement. (15) The clearest « Symphonic » parallel to this is, of course, the Finale of the 8th Symphony where C minor is not « definitively » reached and confirmed until the Coda of the movement.

Intermezzo

This movement has the same key (D minor) and the same tripartite structure as the « Scherzo » which it replaced initially, but is texturally much less complex and has a much slower tempo (« Moderato ») . In the middle-section, G flat is an important secondary key, and Bruckner exploits the rising harmonic sequence of keys a minor 3rd apart (G-flat [F-sharp] , A - C ; bars 51-76) . In the repeat of the 1st section, he makes further use of the key of G-flat (F-sharp major) before moving-down a major 3rd to D major to effect a powerful cadence. There are 1 or 2 small but unmistakable motivic connections between the « Intermezzo » and the 1st and 3rd movements of the Quintet and the strong emphasis on the key of G-flat is an obvious link with the « Adagio » . On the other hand, it does not provide the same effective contrast in character either with the other movements or with the Trio which Bruckner left unchanged. This is probably the main-reason why the original « Scherzo » was ultimately preferred to the replacement « Intermezzo » . The tempo of the latter is almost the same as that of the « Trio » , and some of its rhythmical gestures are virtually identical.

Conclusion

We tend to measure Bruckner's development as a composer from the early 1860's to the late- 1870's / early 1880's by comparing the fascinating but, as yet, fairly raw attempts at large-scale structure in the early Symphony in F minor (1863) with the more assured architecture of Symphonies Nos. 5-7. No less fascinating and instructive is a consideration of the immense distance travelled between another student work, the String Quartet in C minor (1862) , and the String Quintet in F. The Quintet is tautly constructed throughout, has a final movement which, in its convincing postponement of tonic resolution and closure until the Coda, comes as close as any other 19th Century Sonata-form movement to solving the so-called Finale problem, and is graced with a noble « Adagio » which even Bruckner's most vociferous detractors recognized as being among the finest of its kind.

The 2 different versions of the closing-bars of the Finale are also provided in the Leopold Nowak edition. Margaret Notley discusses the slow-movement of the Quintet in the context of other chamber-music slow-movements of the period, particularly those of Johannes Brahms, in a recent article : « Late-19th Century Chamber Music and the Cult of the Classical Adagio » , in : « 19th Century Music » , xxiii/1 (Summer, 1999) ; pages 33-61. A particularly fruitful comparison can be made with Brahms' String Quintet in F, Opus 88 (1882) , which has the same instrumentation, « videlicet » 2 violins, 2 violas and 1 cello.

1877 stellte Doktor Anton von Ölzelt-Nevin, ein wohlhabender Wiener Bürger und Verehrer von Bruckners Musik, dem Komponisten zu billiger Miete eine komfortable Wohnung zur Verfügung, in der jener bis zu seinem Unzug ins Schloß Belvedere 1895 wohnte. Bruckner war Doktor Ölzelt dafür so dankbar, daß er ihm später die sechste Symphonie widmete. Zuvor schrieb er jedoch als erstes Werk in der neuen Wohnung das Streichquintett in F-Dur, das wie die sechste Symphonie in seiner heiteren Grundstimmung durchaus von den verbesserten Lebensumständen beeinflusst sein könnte und mit dessen Entstehung es folgende Bewandnis hat : Im Gespräch mit dem Komponisten äußerte Josef Hellmesberger senior, erster Geiger der damals wichtigsten Streichquartettvereinigung Wiens, sowie als Direktor des Konservatoriums Bruckners direkter Vorgesetzter, Bruckner könne doch einmal ein Kammermusikwerk komponieren (die frühen Versuche waren ihm natürlich nicht bekannt) . Den vermutlich nicht ganz ernst gemeinten Vorschlag interpretierte Bruckner wohl als dringende Bitte, sah sicherlich auch eine neue Herausforderung darin und begann sofort mit der Arbeit, die ihn von Dezember 1878 bis Juli 1879 beschäftigte. Als er Hellmesberger schließlich das fertige Werk zeigte, war dieser zwar positiv überrascht, allerdings mit bestimmten Einzelheiten wenig zufrieden. Das Scherzo missfiel ihm sogar so sehr, daß er Bruckner bat, einen neuen Satz zu schreiben. Der Bitte kam der Komponist mit der Komposition des Intermezzos nach. Die Uraufführung der ersten drei Sätze fand am 17. November 1881 durch das (durch den Bruckner-Schüler Franz Schalk verstärkte) Winkler-Quartett statt. Das Hellmesberger-Quartett zögerte noch bis zum 8. Januar 1883, ehe es das Werk erstmals komplett öffentlich spielte - übrigens mit dem Scherzo. Das Quintett wurde eines der zu Lebzeiten erfolgreichsten Werke Bruckners. Auch einige seiner Feinde unter den Musikkritikern zollten ihm Anerkennung. Zusammen mit den Streichquintetten von Franz Schubert, Johannes Brahms, Felix Dräseke und Antonín Dvořák bildet das für 2 Violinen, 2 Violen und Violoncello geschriebene Stück den Höhepunkt dieser Kammermusikgattung in der Epoche der Romantik. Die Spieldauer beträgt circa 45 Minuten.

Das Streichquintett profitiert in seiner formalen Gestaltung merklich von den Symphonien, ist jedoch keine « verkappte Symphonie » , wie gelegentlich behauptet wird, sondern ein echt kammermusikalisch erfundenes Werk. Orchestral anmutende Stellen finden sich hier nur wenige ; im Vordergrund steht der feinsinnig gehandhabte Dialog der fünf Streichinstrumente, die völlig gleichberechtigt agieren. Man hat schon zu Lebzeiten des Komponisten die Nähe des Stückes zu den letzten Streichquartetten Ludwig van Beethovens betont. Fraglich ist aber, ob Bruckner selbige zum Zeitpunkt der Komposition bereits kannte.

Der Unterschied zu Bruckners Symphonien zeigt sich schon im ersten Satz (Gemäßigt, in F-Dur) : Er ist deutlich zurückhaltender im Ausdruck und vertauscht den sonst üblichen geraden mit dem $\frac{3}{4}$ -Takt. Außerdem setzt er sofort mit dem Hauptthema ein, ohne vorbereitende Einleitungstakte. Das Thema selbst erinnert auch weniger an die symphonischen Hauptthemen, sondern ist eher den Gesangsthemen der Symphonieecksätze verwandt. Das zweite Thema fällt durch sein prägnantes Kopfmotiv auf. Dieses wird vor Einsatz des dritten Themas zu einer markanten Unisono-Gebärde gesteigert. Das dritte Thema selbst ist das eigentliche Gesangsthema des Satzes. Die Durchführung beschäftigt sich vorrangig mit dem Hauptthema. Auch eine Trillerfigur aus der Überleitung zum zweiten Thema wird für den weiteren Verlauf bedeutend. Die Reprise greift leicht variierend die Themen der Exposition wieder auf. Das dritte Thema bildet den Übergang zur Coda, die auf Motiven des ersten und dritten Themas basiert und feierlich ausklingt.

Wie der Kopfsatz zeigt sich auch das Scherzo (Schnell, in D-Moll, $\frac{3}{4}$ -Takt) gezügelter als in den Symphonien. Es basiert auf drei Themen, die im Mittelteil durchgeführt und anschließend wiederholt werden. Auffällig ist hier die Bevorzugung synkopierter Melodik. Das Thema des dreiteiligen Trios (Langsamer, in Es-Dur, $\frac{3}{4}$ -Takt) ist eine Variante des Scherzo-Hauptgedankens. Nach dem Trio wird das Scherzo Da capo gespielt.

Als bedeutendster Satz des Quintetts gilt das Adagio (in Ges-Dur, 4/4-Takt). « Hätte Anton Bruckner nur den langsamen Satz seines Quintetts geschrieben, so wäre er bereits unsterblich geworden » urteilte der Musikwissenschaftler Wilhelm Altmann. Der Satz basiert auf zwei breit ausgeführten Themenkomplexen. Das Hauptthema, von der ersten Geige vorgestellt, ist gekennzeichnet durch den punktierten Themenkopf und vorrangig absteigende Melodik. Als zweites Thema fungiert eine Violamelodie, die aus der Umkehrung des Hauptgedankens abgeleitet ist. Der durchführungsartige Mittelteil beginnt mit dem Hauptthema, das in seiner Intensität immer mehr gesteigert wird und schließlich zum zweiten Thema überleitet, auf dem sich allmählich der Höhepunkt des Satzes aufbaut, der durch herabstürzende Figuren der Violinen markiert wird. Es folgt eine freie Reprise der beiden Themen in umgekehrter Reihenfolge, in der die Spannung allmählich aufgelöst wird. Ruhig und sanft klingt das Adagio aus.

Im Finale (Lebhaft bewegt, in F-Moll, 4/4-Takt) kommt Bruckner dem Stil seiner Symphonien am nächsten. Sein über einem pochenden Des anhebendes erstes Thema besteht vorwiegend aus einer Achtelbewegung, die erst nach einigen Takten prägnantere Konturen annimmt. Die Melodik des ruhigen Gesangsthemas ist durch Sexten geprägt. Die Durchführung beginnt mit einer Variante des Hauptthemas in großen Intervallsprüngen, die das gewohnte dritte Thema vertritt, allerdings keine in sich abgeschlossene Themenvorstellung erfährt, sondern sofort fugatoartig verarbeitet wird. Der Formabschnitt wird weithin von diesem Gedanken geprägt. Auch treten stellenweise Motive des ersten und zweiten Themas hinzu. Die Reprise läuft spiegelverkehrt ab und beginnt mit dem Gesangsthema. Die Coda wendet sich nach F-Dur und läuft in einen Schluß aus, der dem des ersten Satzes sehr ähnelt.

Der einzeln stehende Quintettsatz Intermezzo in D-Moll (Moderato, $\frac{3}{4}$ -Takt) von 1879 war ursprünglich als nachkomponierter Ersatz für das von Hellmesberger kritisierte Scherzo des Streichquintettes gedacht. Es ist deutlich kürzer als dieses und weist in seinem thematischen Material enge Verwandtschaft zu den Gedanken des Quintett-Finalsatzes auf. Auch hier steht ein Trio (Langsamer) in der Mitte, das allerdings wenig zu den umrahmenden Intermezzo-Teilen kontrastiert. Gelegentlich wird bei Aufführungen des Streichquintettes das Intermezzo zwischen Adagio und Finale eingeschoben.

Maximilien Emmanuel, duc en Bavière (« Maximilian Emanuel, Herzog in Bayern ») est né le 7 décembre 1849 à Munich, dans le Royaume de Bavière, et est décédé le 12 juin 1893 à Feldafing. Fils de Maximilien en Bavière et de Ludovica de Bavière, il était le plus jeune des frères de l'Impératrice Elisabeth d'Autriche, la célèbre « Sissi », duchesse d'Alençon. Il était surnommé « Mapperl » .

Il épouse Amélie de Saxe-Cobourg-Gotha (née le 23 octobre 1848 et décédée le 6 mai 1894) , la petite-fille du roi des Français, Louis-Philippe 1er, et sœur du futur tsar Ferdinand 1er de Bulgarie.

Amélie était fiancée au prince Léopold de Bavière mais l'Impératrice d'Autriche (« Sissi ») , la sœur de « Mapperl » , intervient et propose à Léopold sa propre fille, l'archiduchesse Gisèle. Léopold choisit ce second parti et Max et Amélie s'unirent.

Ce fut une des plus belles histoires d'amour du Gotha ; « Mapperl » meurt prématurément, dans sa 44e année, d'hémorragies à l'estomac. Amélie ne lui survit que quelques mois avant de le rejoindre dans la tombe.

De cette union naquirent :

Siegfried, duc en Bavière (10 juillet 1876 - 12 mars 1952) .

Christophe, duc en Bavière, (22 avril 1879 - 10 juillet 1963) qui épousa Anna Sibig (18 juillet 1874 - 1er janvier 1958) .

Luitpold-Emmanuel, duc en Bavière (30 juin 1890 - 16 janvier 1973) .

La princesse Amalie était promise au prince Leopold de Bavière 1846-1930 qui épousa l'archiduchesse Gisela d'Autriche (fille de l'Impératrice Elisabeth) . Ainsi Max Emanuel (frère d'Elisabeth) put épouser Amalie dont il était follement amoureux.

Duke Maximilian Emanuel in Bavaria (« Maximilian Emanuel, Herzog in Bayern ») was born on 7 December 1849 in Munich, Kingdom of Bavaria ; and died on 12 June 1893, Feldafing, Kingdom of Bavaria. He was a Duke in Bavaria and member of the House of Wittelsbach. Maximilian Emanuel was the 10th and youngest child of Duke Maximilian Joseph in Bavaria and his wife Princess Ludovika of Bavaria. Maximilian Emanuel was the brother of Elisabeth of Bavaria, Empress of Austria and Queen of Hungary.

Title from 7 December 1849 to 12 June 1893 : His Royal Highness Duke Maximilian Emanuel in Bavaria.

Maximilian Emanuel married Princess Amalie of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, 4th child and 2nd eldest daughter of Prince August of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha and his wife Princess Clémentine of Orléans, on 20 September 1875 in Ebenthal, Lower-Austria, Austria-Hungary. Maximilian Emanuel and Amalie had 3 sons :

Duke Siegfried August in Bavaria (born on 10 July 1876 and died on 12 March 1952) .

Duke Christoph Joseph in Bavaria (born on 22 April 1879 and died on 10 July 1963) . He was married to Anna Sibig (born on 18 July 1874 and died on 1 January 1958) .

Duke Luitpold Emanuel in Bavaria (born on 30 June 1890 and died on 16 January 1973) .

...

Maximilian Emanuel in Bayern (geboren 7. Dezember 1849 in München ; gestorben 12. Juni 1893 in Feldafing) stammte aus der Linie der Herzöge in Bayern des Hauses Wittelsbach. Er war bayerischer Offizier, zuletzt Generalleutnant sowie Mitglied des Reichsrats.

Max Emanuel, genannt Mapperl, war ein Sohn von Herzog Max in Bayern (1808-1888) und dessen Frau Ludovika (1808-1892) . Er war das jüngste von zehn Kindern, darunter auch Kaiserin Elisabeth von Österreich-Ungarn (« Sisi ») (1837-1898) .

Max Emanuel hatte eine Leidenschaft für das Militär. Er wurde 1865 Sekondeleutnant im 2. Ulanen-Regiment « König » , nahm 1866 am Krieg gegen Preußen teil. Max Emanuel kam dabei während der Gefechte bei Hünfeld und Hammelburg zum Einsatz. Ab 1867 diente er im 3. Chevaulegers-Regiment « Herzog Karl Theodor » . Mit dem Regiment kämpfte er während des Deutsch-Französischen Krieges bei Wörth, Beaumont, Orléans und der Belagerung von Paris. Von 1873 bis 1874 wurde Max Emanuel an die Kriegsakademie kommandiert. Er absolvierte jedoch nur den I. Lehrgang und verließ die Akademie dann wieder. Anschließend wurde er zum I. Ulanen-Regiment « Kaiser Wilhelm II. , König von Preußen » versetzt und hier 1875 zum Rittmeister befördert. Bereits im Jahr darauf wurde er Major und Eskadronchef im I. Chevaulegers-Regiment « Kaiser Nikolaus von Rußland » . Von dieser Funktion wurde Max Emanuel aus Gesundheitsgründen 1877 entbunden und à la suite des Regiments gestellt. In den kommenden Jahren wurde er jedoch kontinuierlich weiter befördert und schließlich als Generalmajor 1887 zum Kommandeur der Equitations-Anstalt in der Maximilian-II-Kaserne in München ernannt. Seit 1889 war er Generalleutnant. Im Juni 1893 bekam Max Emanuel schwere Magenblutungen, welchen er erlag.

Im Jahre 1875 heiratete Max in Wien Amalie von Sachsen-Coburg und Gotha (1848-1894) . Sie bekamen drei Söhne.

Siegfried August in Bayern (1876-1952) .

Christoph Joseph in Bayern (1879-1963) .

Verheiratet 1924 Frau Anna Sibig (1874-1958) .

Luitpold Emanuel in Bayern (1890-1973) .

Diese Ehe kam mit Hilfe der kaiserlichen Schwester zustande. Da auch Leopold von Bayern an Amalie interessiert war, verkuppelte Elisabeth diesen mit ihrer Tochter Gisela.

AB 78 : 1879

La crise d'Orient (1876-1878) et la démission du cabinet d'Alfred Auersperg (15 février 1879)

Lors de l'été 1875, une révolte éclate en Bosnie-Herzégovine contre les occupants turcs. Avec l'accord de la Russie, le Comte Jules Andrassy, mentor de l'Impératrice et ministre des Affaires étrangères, présente aux diplomates des puissances européennes une proposition envisageant la réforme du système turc. Pendant ce temps, l'insurrection s'étend en avril 1876 aux pays bulgares. Elle est rapidement réprimée de manière cruelle. Suite à ces événements, le 2 juillet 1876, la Serbie et le Monténégro déclarent la guerre à l'Empire ottoman, suscitant l'inquiétude du ministre des Affaires étrangères de l'Empire austro-hongrois, d'Andrassy, et de François-Joseph. Le 15 janvier 1877, les ministres russe et austro-hongrois des Affaires étrangères se retrouvent à Budapest, pour discuter d'une solution. L'Autriche-Hongrie s'engage à respecter une neutralité dans le cas où la guerre éclaterait entre la Russie et la Turquie. En cas de victoire de la Russie, celle-ci récupérerait la Bessarabie du sud et la Monarchie austro-hongroise annexerait une partie de la Bosnie-Herzégovine.

Le 24 avril 1877, devant les revers subis par les Serbes, la Russie se joint au conflit contre les Turcs. Les Russes arrivent aux portes de Constantinople. En décembre 1877, la Russie fait connaître à Vienne qu'elle souhaite agir selon de nouvelles conditions et qu'elle annule les accords précédents du 15 janvier.

Ces événements inquiètent l'Angleterre qui contacte la Monarchie et lui propose une alliance contre la Russie. Andrassy fait tout pour convaincre François-Joseph et les membres du conseil commun d'accepter la proposition anglaise. Il est persuadé que la Monarchie ne doit pas laisser échapper cette occasion qui lui permettrait de régler durablement ses conflits avec les Slaves. Seul le Premier ministre hongrois, Kalman Tisza, le soutient.

L'Angleterre et l'Autriche-Hongrie refusent de reconnaître le traité de paix signé par la Russie et la Turquie, le 3 mars 1878, à San Stefano. Sous leur pression, la Russie accepte l'organisation d'une conférence internationale concernant les Balkans. Le congrès de Berlin débute le 13 juin 1878. Les grandes puissances reconnaissent l'indépendance de la Roumanie, de la Serbie et du Monténégro. Une autonomie est accordée à la Bulgarie. La Monarchie austro-hongroise est autorisée à occuper et gouverner la Bosnie Herzégovine.

Si ce succès redonne confiance à la Monarchie, les Libéraux, pour leur part, redoutent que l'occupation de la Bosnie-Herzégovine ne renforce le poids des Slaves au sein de la Monarchie au détriment de la primauté des Allemands. Par ailleurs, ils n'acceptent pas que la politique étrangère de la Monarchie soit conduite en dehors des assemblées parlementaires. Il est vrai que les textes constitutionnels attribuent la politique extérieure à l'Empereur et à son ministre des Affaires étrangères, mais les Libéraux jouent sur les pouvoirs reconnus au « Reichsrat » en matière de finances. Face à la menace de conflit qui pèse sur la Monarchie, 112 députés Libéraux signent une interpellation. Les Libéraux utilisent ainsi leur pouvoir en matière de budget pour faire échec à la politique étrangère de l'Empereur et de son ministre des Affaires étrangères, Andrassy, qui demande un crédit supplémentaire de 60 millions de Florins (« Gulden ») sans en dévoiler la raison. La majorité des Libéraux de la délégation cisleithane se prononce pour le refus.

Par ailleurs, les Libéraux exigent que le traité de Berlin soit soumis à la ratification parlementaire. Les discussions s'enveniment non pas lors de l'approbation de l'acte final du congrès de Berlin, mais au sujet de l'incorporation du port de Spizza, à la Dalmatie, pays de la couronne cisleithane. La majorité des députés Libéraux réaffirment leur opposition par leur vote négatif. François-Joseph considère l'hostilité déclarée de la majorité des Libéraux à l'occupation de la Bosnie-Herzégovine comme une trahison, d'autant plus qu'elle s'est manifestée dans un contexte international.

La déroute des Libéraux semble s'inscrire dans une phase de non-retour, avec les élections de 1879 ; ils perdent la majorité à la Chambre des députés. Le 15 février 1879, le prince Alfred Auersperg démissionne ; les Libéraux se retrouvent, à présent, dans l'opposition.

Face à leur déroute électorale, le pouvoir Impérial ressent l'utilité de rechercher des alliances politiques auprès de Partis politiques plus stables. Méfiante à l'égard de toute politique Libérale, la Cour fera dorénavant alliance avec les forces conservatrices loyalistes, parmi lesquelles il faut compter les Vieux-Tchèques, restés fidèles à la dynastie.

Cependant, le destin du Libéralisme n'est pas encore définitivement scellé. Il le sera par l'échec électorale lors des élections de 1897. Devant la montée de nouvelles tendances qui commencent à investir le champ politique, à partir de la fin des années 1880, notamment le mouvement du Parti Ouvrier Social-Démocrate et celui des Chrétiens-Sociaux, les Libéraux s'avèrent impuissants.

Les insuccès qu'enregistre le Libéralisme à la fin des 12 années (1867-1879) qui voient son ascension tiennent pour l'essentiel à 4 facteurs. Le 1er concerne la question épineuse des nationalités qui restera ouverte. À quoi il faut ajouter les problèmes sociaux auxquels les Libéraux ont été incapables d'apporter de véritables solutions. Par ailleurs, leur opposition aux visées de François-Joseph d'intervenir en Bosnie-Herzégovine, réticences motivées dans une large mesure par le sentiment presque obsidional qu'éprouvent les Libéraux allemands face à la montée du slavisme redouté, cette résistance donc au projet annexionniste de la Monarchie a fait perdre aux Libéraux leur crédibilité auprès de l'Empereur, qui trouve enfin le prétexte pour rompre son alliance avec eux. Enfin, ce qui semble avoir porté le plus grand préjudice à l'idéologie Libérale, ce sont les dissensions et orientations divergentes au sein même du mouvement Libéral. Outre les différents Partis et Clubs, le manque d'unité quant à un schéma directeur de politique unitaire se vérifie notamment dans l'exemple des autonomistes styriens qui prônent la séparation de la Galicie, de la Bukovine et de la Dalmatie afin de préserver la prépondérance des députés germanophones dans la partie cisleithane de l'Empire.

Vers 1879 : WAB 74 - « Das hohe Lied » (le Cantique des cantiques) 2e version, lied en la majeur pour 2 voix de ténor, 1 voix de baryton, 1 chœur masculin à 8 voix (2 chœurs à 4 voix) a cappella, 2 altos, 2 violoncelles, 1 contrebasse, 4 cors, 3 trombones et 1 tuba. Composé à Vienne sur le texte allemand « Im Tale rauscht die Mühle und stört des Wand'ers Lied » (le bruit du moulin perturbe le chant du voyageur errant dans la vallée) de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) . Le chœur d'hommes imite, à bouche fermée, le bruissement des eaux du moulin.

Exécution d'un extrait, le 10 décembre 1879, à Vienne. Exécution intégrale, le 13 mars 1906, à Vienne.

Im Tale rauscht die Mühle und stört des Wandrers Lied,
Bis er durch Waldesdunkel hinauf die Berge flieht.
Und immer ferner rauschet die Mühle tief im Tal.
Und immer kräft'ger schallet des Liedes Widerhall.
Die Höhe ist erklimmen, jetzt ist das Lied allein
Und schwimmt auf luft'gen Wellen ins Abendrot hinein.

Le château d'Altpernstein

1879 : Anton Bruckner escalade très difficilement la route fort escarpée menant au château d'Altpernstein (Micheldorf) , dans le district de Sankt Veit an der Glan en Carinthie (Haute-Autriche) . Il est en compagnie de ses amis Karl Zeitlinger et Josef Greck. Au bout d'un moment, ceux-ci doivent le transporter (assis sur leurs bras croisés) sur une bonne distance. Bruckner participa à une visite guidée du château, pria avec grande dévotion dans la chapelle et a même « essayé » des cellules étroites du donjon pendant une bonne heure : un geste (morbide) de solidarité, en hommage à la souffrance et à l'agonie des anciens prisonniers.

Le château médiéval d'Altpernstein, lui, a été construit autour de l'an 1000 et documentée dans les années 1160 et 1207. La forteresse a changé de mains plusieurs fois au cours de son histoire, pas nécessairement dans l'intérêt de la population locale. Au 16e siècle, le château a appartenu à une famille protestante qui avait été en contact avec Martin Luther. Aujourd'hui, le château a été rénové à partir de 1946, est un centre pour la jeunesse catholique mais il est ouvert au public.

Adresse : Altpernstein 1, 4563 Micheldorf in Oberösterreich, Autriche. Téléphone :+43 7582 635350.

Au pied du château se trouve le village de « Micheldorf » (Michaël) fut mentionné pour la 1re fois dans l'acte de 1074.

15 mars 1879 : Improvisation à l'orgue de Bruckner lors d'un concert donné au « Wiener Akademisches Gesangverein » (Académie de chant de Vienne) .

« Wiener Akademisches Gesangverein »

1858 gegründeter couleurstudentischer Männergesangverein, seit Jänner 1952 Universitätssängerschaft Barden. Wahlspruch : « Im Denken treu und klar, in Taten frei und stark, im Liede deutsch und wahr ! » Der Wiener Akademisches Gesangverein entwickelte sich aus der 1855 lose zusammengekommenen Gruppe von Studenten, die studentisches Liedgut auf hohem Niveau pflegen wollten (so genannt Juristenliedertafel) , ab 1856 war Rudolf Weinwurm musikalischer Leiter. Wegen des hohen Zuspruches entschloss man sich zur formellen Vereinsgründung einer « akademischen Sängerschaft » mit enger Bindung an die Universität Wien. Die fakultativ-schlagende Verbindung verstand sich in erster Linie als Chorvereinigung innerhalb des Couleurstudententums (erst ab 1899 eigene Waffen und ab 1904 Vollcouleur) . In den späten 1880er und 1890er Jahren war der Wiener Akademisches Gesangverein großdeutsch-national ausgerichtet (siehe Bruckner-Commerz) . 1920 Umbenennung in Wiener Akademische Sängerschaft Ghibellinen. Mit der Verleihung des Titels « Universitäts-Sängerschaft » durch den Senat der Universität Wien erhielt der Wiener Akademisches Gesangverein 1924 seine offizielle Anerkennung durch die Universität Mit der Selbstaflösung aller Studentenverbindungen 1938 ging die Wiener Akademische Sängerschaft Ghibellinen in der Kameradschaft Ulrich von Hutten innerhalb des deutschen Studentenbundes auf ; die Einberufungen der Mitglieder machten größere Aktivitäten jedoch bald unmöglich. 1949 Wiedergründung des Wiener Akademisches Gesangvereins und Fusionierung mit der 1919 gegründeten Wiener technisch-akademischen Sängerschaft Nibelungia ; 1950-1951 wurde wieder mit regelmäßigen Proben begonnen. 1952 Umbenennung in Akademische Sängerschaft Barden (ab 1959 wieder « Universitäts-Sängerschaft ») . Die Barden verstehen sich heute (2006) als liberal-couleurstudentischer Männerchor und pflegen neben allgemeiner Männerchorliteratur vieles andere das studentische Liedgut und die so genannt ieroper.

In England, Henry J. Lawson patents a bicycle design called the « Bicyclette » , which incorporates the chain-and-sprocket indirect-drive transmission which had been introduced in 1878 by James Starley's tricycle, and a much smaller drive wheel which allows the rider to sit much lower near the ground. Its primary defect is that, because of the lower and more rearward seating position, the steering is indirect, employing connecting rods.

WAB 30

18 juillet 1879 : WAB 30 - « Os justi » (la bouche du juste) , graduel (tiré de la Missa de Doctoribus) , dans le mode Lydien, pour chœur à 8 voix a cappella (2 chœurs de 4 voix) à l'unisson (SSAATTBB) . Livret : Psaume 36:30-31 (Vulgate) . L'introit pour l'Ordinaire du confesseur (qui n'est pas un évêque) . Composé à Vienne. Dédié à Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) , le directeur de la musique (organiste et chef de chœur) du monastère de Saint-Florian. Traumihler fut un adepte du Cécilianisme : mouvement puritain ultra-conservateur de renouveau de la musique liturgique dans l'Église, apparu au XIXe siècle, visant à ré-introduire le style choral a cappella de Palestrina.

Le verset « Inveni David » pour voix soliste et orgue fut ajouté le 28 juillet.

Le dernier verset du « Inveni David », ignoré dans la Ire version, sera utilisé pour le « Inveni David » (WAB 20) .

Création à Saint-Florian, le 28 août 1879. Création en concert, le 19 mars 1908, à Vienne sous la direction d'E. Thomas.

La pièce est composée dans le mode Lydien et évite délibérément les dièses et les bémols. Le compositeur limite également son langage tonal à une harmonie triadique simple. Malgré les sévères restrictions qu'il s'est données, Bruckner est parvenu à composer une œuvre extraordinaire, empreinte d'émotion et d'expression. Les Ires mesures font entendre, au sein des voix externes, des sauts d'octave qui créent une ambiance dramatique et une séquence de mise en suspension qui « permet d'exprimer en musique la loi divine ». La pièce se termine par le plain-chant « Alléluia » .

Durée approximative : 4 à 5 1/2 minutes.

Bruckner avait clairement le style du mouvement Cécilianiste à l'esprit lorsqu'il composa ce Motet et reprend le « Psaume 37 » :

Os justi meditabitur sapientiam :
et lingua ejus loquetur judicium.

Lex Dei ejus in corde ipsius :
et non supplantabuntur gressus ejus.
Alleluia.

Inveni David servum meum, oleo sancto meo unxi eum.
Alleluia.

...

La bouche du juste murmure la sagesse,
et sa langue proclame la justice.

La loi de son Dieu est dans son cœur, et ses pas ne faiblissent point. Alléluia.

...

The mouth of the righteous utters wisdom, and his tongue speaks what is just.

The law of his God is in his heart : and his feet do not falter.
Alleluia.

I have found David, my servant ; I have anointed him with my holy oil.
Alleluia.

« Os Justi » (The mouth of the righteous) , WAB 30, is a sacred Motet composed by Anton Bruckner on 18 July 1879. He dedicated it to Ignaz P. Traumihler, Choir-Master of Saint-Florian Abbey. « Os justi » is a Gregorian chant used as gradual of the « Commune Doctorum » and as « introit » of the « Commune Confessoris non Pontificis » .

The text of the Motet is 2 verses of « Psalm 37 » , which is « Psalm 36 » in the « Vulgata » (Psalms 37:30-31) . The text of the added verse is taken from « Psalm 89 » (Psalms 89:20) .

When Traumihler saw the manuscript, he asked :

« Ist's der ganze Text ? » (Is this the whole text ?)

Therefore, Bruckner added to it the extra « Versus-Choral » (verse in the Gregorian mode) « Inveni David » , on 28 July 1879. The 1st performance occurred not as foreseen on Traumihler's Name-Day (31 July 1879) , but 4 weeks later, on 28 August 1879, on the feast of Saint Augustinus.

The work, a 71 bar gradual, is scored in Lydian mode for choir a cappella, and is ending with a 2 bar, unison «

Alleluja » , in Gregorian mode. According to Elisabeth Maier, the melody of the « Alleluja » is a quote of the « Alleluja » of the « introit » , « In medio ecclesiae of the Missa de Doctoribus » . The extra-verse « Inveni David » , which is scored for unison male voices with organ accompaniment, is Bruckner's own composition. Thereafter, the 2 bar « Alleluja » is repeated.

On 2 occasions (bars 9-13 and 51-56) , the choir is divided into 8 voices. The 2nd part on « Et lingua ejus » (bars 16-42) is a fugato without any alteration. The sentence before the « Alleluja » , on « et non supplantabuntur » (bars 65-69) , is sung pianissimo by the soprano, on a sustained tonic chord by the 5 other voices (ATTBB) .

Ignaz P. Traumihler was a fervent supporter of the Cecilian Movement ; it is the reason why Bruckner composed this Motet, in Lydian mode, without any alteration in the key and in the whole score, and with large use of unaltered chords.

The work was 1st edited by Theodor Rättig, in 1886, together with 3 other graduals : « Locus iste » , « Christus factus est » and « Virga Jesse floruit » . In this 1st edition, the extra-verse was not included. The extra-verse was classified by Renate Grasberger as a separate work (« Inveni David » , WAB 20) . The full original setting is put in Band XXI/28 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

Août 1879 : WAB 20 - « Inveni David » (j'ai trouvé David) n° 2, pour chœur mixte à l'unisson et orgue. Dernier verset du « Os justi » (WAB 30) ignoré dans la 1re version. Livret : Psaume 37:30-31. Dédié à Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) , le directeur de la musique (organiste et chef de chœur) du monastère de Saint-Florian. Août 1879 : Gustav Mahler stays with his friend Emil Freund in Seelau (now, Želiv, in the Czech Republic) and, then, returns to Vienna in September.

Août 1879 : The 36 year old Emil Schindler, who is still poor but has become one of the most important 19th Century Austrian painters, marries Anna Bergen, who has just completed her musical training and accepted a job in Leipzig, which she now gives-up. Their daughter, Alma Maria, is born in Vienna on August 31.

28 août 1879 : Creation at Saint-Florian monastery of 2 sacred works by the 54 year old Anton Bruckner (who is attending) under the direction of Ignaz P. Trauttmayr :

« Inveni David » (WAB 20) for unison chorus and organ ; and « Os justi » (WAB 30) for chorus.

The 60 year old Franz Suppé produces his Operetta, « Bocaccio » , in Vienna.

Septembre 1879 : Gustav Mahler lives at « Rennweg 3 » , in Vienna (very close to the location of the apartment he will later keep as Director of the Opera) . Later, in the year, he moves to « Karl-Ludwigstraße 24 » , in Währing (outside Vienna) , and when he leaves in mid-December, Hugo Wolf moves there.

Hugo Wolf tells Gustav Mahler of his novel intention to write a tragic fairy-tale Opera, based on the story of « Rübzahl » . Mahler insists that it could only be treated as a comedy, is inspired by the idea and, a week later, shows Wolf his own libretto for it. Wolf feels that Mahler stole his idea and is infuriated, stops work on his project, and ends their friendship. Mahler will continue to work on the « Rübzahl » project for several years before finally abandoning it and recycling some of its music into later pieces (particularly, in his 1st Symphony) .

Automne 1879 : Impression par l'éditeur Theodor Rättig de Vienne de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner (il s'agit de la 2e version) .

En 1873, la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne joue un rôle important dans la diffusion du nouveau répertoire. Elle favorise non seulement les œuvres de son « Saint-Patron » mais également (par la suite) celles d'Anton Bruckner et de Hugo Wolf. Au fil du temps, Hans Paumgartner, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann et, surtout, Ferdinand Löwe se sont impliqués (soit en tant que pianiste-interprète ou soit en tant qu'arrangeur) dans la réalisation de nombreux concerts « Bruckner » .

WAB 106 : Symphonie n° 6

24 septembre 1879 - 3 septembre 1881 : WAB 106 - Symphonie n° 6 en la majeur pour 2 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 1 clarinette en si bémol, 1 clarinette en la, 2 bassons, 4 cors en fa, 3 trompettes en fa, 3 trombones, 1 tuba, timbales et cordes. Très fier de ses audaces d'écriture, Bruckner la surnomme « Die Keckste » (la plus hardie ou la plus effrontée) . Achevée le 3 septembre 1881, à l'Abbaye de Saint-Florian. Dédiée au couple formé par l'architecte et philosophe docteur Anton von Ölzelt-Newin (1817-1875) , qui fut un auditeur attentionné lors des conférences de Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne, et son épouse dévouée, Amalie (Amy) Edle von Wieser. Ölzelt-Newin, propriétaire de l'immeuble de 4 étages appelé « Wohnhaus », situé au 5, du « Schottenring » et 7, de la « Heßgasse » (juste en face du Théâtre du « Ring ») est un jeune et riche admirateur du musicien, honoré de le loger presque gratuitement. La Symphonie ne fera l'objet d'aucune retouche, d'aucun remords, d'aucune altération ou remaniement.

Création des 2^e et 3^e mouvements de la 6^e Symphonie, les vendredi 11 et dimanche 13 février 1883, données en public lors d'une lecture à vue par Philharmonique de Vienne sous la direction du chef intérimaire Wilhelm Jahn (le prédécesseur de Gustav Mahler à la « Hofoper »). On joua ainsi de prudence face aux critiques (spécialement, Eduard Hanslick) n'offrant que ces 2 mouvements intermédiaires considérés comme moins risqués.

Il faut aussi mentionné qu'il y avait d'autres œuvres au programme tel que rapporté par le biographe de Bruckner, August Göllerich :

« Les 2 mouvements, Adagio et Scherzo, étaient précédés de l'Ouverture Leonore n° 2 de Beethoven ; suivis d'un Concerto pour violoncelle de Karl Anton Florian Eckert et de la 5^e Symphonie en ut mineur de Ludwig Spohr. »

Anton Bruckner n'entendra de façon intégrale sa 6^e Symphonie qu'une seule fois, soit lors d'une répétition générale du Philharmonique de Vienne au « Musikverein », le 13 octobre 1882. L'atmosphère était amicale et empreinte de reconnaissance comme en témoigne une lettre de Bruckner à son proche ami, copiste de Steyr, Leopold Hofmeyer :

« Après avoir rejeté toutes les autres, le Philharmonique a maintenant accepté ma 6^e Symphonie. Lorsque je me suis présenté au chef d'orchestre (soit le directeur de l'Opéra de la Cour) , il m'a confié qu'il comptait parmi mes plus sincères et proches admirateurs. Le Philharmonique y a trouvé une telle satisfaction en la jouant qu'ils m'ont offert une " douche " d'applaudissements suite à l'exécution. »

Parmi les copistes de Bruckner, citons : Karl (Borromäus) Aigner de Saint-Florian (qui fut l'un de ses élèves) ; un certain Carda, de Vienne ; Viktor Christ (qui fut l'un de ses élèves) ; Franz Hlawaczek de Vienne (qui a travaillé à plusieurs reprises pour Franz Schubert et son frère, Ferdinand) ; Leopold Hofmeyer (un ami proche de Steyr et un de ses copistes les plus fiables) ; Johann (Giovanni) Noll (copiste à la « Hofkapelle » de Vienne) ; Karl Paur ; Franz Schimatschek (1812-1877) (altiste à l'Orchestre du Théâtre de Linz ; ami et copiste préféré du Maître) ; et Karl Tenschert qui a travaillé chez Franz Hlawaczek, à Vienne.

(Comme dans le cas de sa 5^e Symphonie, Bruckner n'entreprendra aucune révision exhaustive de l'œuvre.)

Création à Vienne, le 26 février 1899, sous la direction de Gustav Mahler, dans une version légèrement abrégée par des coupures.

En 1901, à Stuttgart, le Bohémien allemand Karl Pohlig sera le 1^{er} chef d'orchestre à offrir « dans son intégralité » la 6^e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Elle avait auparavant été présentée, le 26 février 1899 à Vienne, dans une version abrégée par le chef Gustav Mahler.

Hand-written part of Bruckner's 6th Symphony re-discovered by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs

June 2015 - After Anton Bruckner had finished his 6th Symphony, a set of hand-written parts was copied which were to be used for a read-through of new repertoire by the Vienna Philharmonic (6 October 1882) as well as for the ensuing 1st performance of the Adagio and Scherzo, which was directed by Wilhelm Jahn (11 February 1883) . This set of parts was believed to be entirely lost, as confirmed by Leopold Nowak in his « Critical Report » (1986, page 49) . To his own surprise, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs found a remnant of it in the archive of the Monastery of Saint-Florian : a part for Bassoon I in the hand of a copyist, with autograph annotations, and with the pencil indication « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde Wien » on the 1st page by an anonymous hand. Cohrs' further research in the Archive of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna, then, brought to light the full set of parts, with only the Bassoon I part missing which is today in Saint-Florian. Earlier researchers had overlooked it, perhaps because it is held under the same signature as the dedication copy (XIII 37.730) , but stored at another location in the archive stacks. The set of parts comprises all the wind instruments, timpani, and strings in single copies (except the viola, of which 6 copies survive !) . The copyist responsible has, yet, to be identified. Most of the parts reveal autograph corrections as well as some pencil annotations by orchestral players (added dynamics, etc.) .

Cette œuvre, généralement sereine, conserve constamment un ton très intime. Elle se laisse aller au fil des thèmes et des combinaisons qu'il a le loisir d'improviser longuement sur le grand-orgue de Linz. Bruckner n'aura pas le temps ni la volonté de remodeler, elle est beaucoup plus concise, beaucoup moins élaborée que les autres. C'est en vain que l'on peut y chercher les éclats esthétiques que le compositeur affectionne particulièrement dans toute son œuvre. Sa fraîcheur, sa beauté contemplative et souriante, ses montées lyriques et chaleureuses, en font une Symphonie à part des autres.

La Symphonie est composée en 4 mouvements : Majestoso - Adagio : sehr feierlich - Scherzo : nicht zu schnell - Finale : bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell.

La tonalité du 1er mouvement peut être comparée à une lumière rayonnante car à la reprise on y entend une palette de sonorités éclatantes. Les mouvements médians sont, par contre, bien moins lumineux et comportent, parfois, des couleurs mates. Quant au Finale, après un début dans les tonalités mineures, il fait ressortir le triomphal la majeur.

Majestoso : Les violoncelles et les contrebasses introduisent le 1er thème impérieux (2 blanches, 2 triolets de noires, blanche pointée, noire, blanche) sur fond de rythme ostinato à triolet de croches et croche pointée tandis qu'autour de celui-ci, les violons tracent des figures très décoratives sur un rythme particulièrement heurté. Aussitôt, ce 1er thème progresse et est soutenu par des triolets. Le second thème à la flûte molto piu lente est mélancolique. Enfin, le 3e thème est engendré par l'opposition entre 2 unissons : celui des cordes et celui des bois et cuivres. Le développement reprend le 1er thème en renversement. Il est suivi d'une ré-exposition qui module de la majeur (fa# do# sol#) , son relatif mineur fa dièse mineur puis ré majeur (fa# do#) . Le mouvement se termine par une Coda grandiose dominée par un dialogue entre les cors et les trompettes, dans laquelle le thème initial passe par presque toutes les tonalités.

Adagio : sehr feierlich (très solennel) - Ce mouvement représente les pages émouvantes d'un Bruckner affreusement blessé par la fin de son idylle avec la jeune choriste, Marie Bartl, qui interprétait le rôle mineur de paysanne (avec l'une des « filles d'Israël ») dans la représentation du 22 ou 23 août du « Jeu de la Passion du Christ » , d'une durée de 6 heures, montée tous les 10 ans au village d'Oberammergau.

À l'opposé des mouvements lents de la plupart des autres Symphonies qui sont en forme lied (ABA'B'A"), il est en forme sonate. Les violons font entendre une mélodie immatérielle puis, peu après, le hautbois joue une contre-mélodie magnifique. Un second thème éthéré est ensuite exposé par les cordes. L'exposition se termine par un chant funèbre exposé par les cordes et sous-tendu par les trombones. Après un court développement basé sur le 1er thème et une reprise des 3 thèmes, le mouvement se termine par une Coda dans laquelle le 1er thème est chanté une dernière fois par les cordes.

Scherzo : nicht zu schnell (sans précipitation) - Dans ce mouvement, il adapte de façon très personnel le Romantisme à la manière de Hector Berlioz. Basé sur plusieurs motifs, il est suivi par un court Trio qui offre aux cors et aux cordes l'occasion de s'exprimer en des termes quelque peu lyriques.

Finale : bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell (pas trop rapide) - Le 1er thème confié aux violons se dresse en face de trémolos aux violoncelles et aux contrebasses. Surgissent des fanfares menaçantes aux trompettes et aux cors. Un second thème plus passionné est répété par les violons pendant que la clarinette joue une mélodie. La fin reprend le thème principal de la 1^{re} partie.

Dans le cours des années 1870, Johannes Brahms est une figure dominante de la vie musicale viennoise, contrairement au second qui est pourtant de 10 ans, son aîné. La Symphonie n° 2 d'Anton Bruckner est créée avec succès, en 1873, mais sa 3^e Symphonie est violemment rejetée par l'Orchestre philharmonique, 2 ans plus tard. Ses œuvres sont, depuis, régulièrement passées sous silence. D'une timidité maladive, le musicien est constamment en proie au doute et ne cesse de réviser ses partitions, mal conseillé par ses proches et trop influençable. Ses dons d'organiste sont plus prisés que ses talents de créateur et l'on persiste à ne voir en lui qu'un compositeur d'église. Pire, son admiration pour Richard Wagner lui aliène la majeure partie de la critique viennoise, conservatrice mais influente. Brahms entretient en outre avec lui des relations ambiguës, faites tour à tour d'indifférence, de cruauté ou d'estime. Il dénigre parfois violemment ses talents (« Bruckner, un pauvre nigaud, un malheureux fou que les moines de Saint-Florian ont sur la conscience »), déclare-t-il un jour en faisant allusion au lieu où Bruckner avait reçu sa formation) mais connaît parfaitement ses œuvres et tient à assister à son enterrement bien que gravement malade lui-même.

« Par un curieux caprice du destin, Johannes Brahms et Anton Bruckner sont arrivés à Vienne la même année, en 1868, pour y passer l'essentiel de leur existence. Mais on aurait peine à établir entre eux un parallèle quelconque, hors le goût de la solitude, une certaine rusticité de comportement et le célibat auquel l'un et l'autre se sont tenus. Le Nord-Allemand et l'Autrichien, le libre-penseur et le musicien d'église, le citadin et le provincial, l'homme de culture et l'homme d'instinct, le technicien raffiné et le bâtisseur naïf de cathédrales sonores ne se ressemblent en rien », conclut Henry Louis de La Grange.

La 6^e Symphonie est écrite à une période de transition qui voit le sort du musicien s'améliorer progressivement. À l'approche de la soixantaine, Bruckner peut enfin récolter les fruits de plusieurs années de labeur et goûter une reconnaissance longtemps espérée. Nommé professeur d'harmonie au Conservatoire, il se voit offrir, en 1880, une invitation à diriger sa Messe en ré mineur. Il connaît, l'année suivante, son 1^{er} grand succès avec la création de la 4^e Symphonie puis apprend avec joie que l'éditeur Theodor Rättig accepte de publier sa 3^e Symphonie, la 1^{re} à être éditée. Ces marques d'estime provoquent un nouvel élan créateur : il écrit coup sur coup son Quintette à cordes, le « Te Deum » et la 6^e Symphonie. Esquissée dès l'été 1879, cette dernière est achevée au mois de septembre 1881. Elle ne sera jamais remaniée par Bruckner, ce qui est suffisamment rare pour être noté. Son audition aisée rend en tout cas peu compréhensibles les attaques subies par le compositeur en son temps. La Symphonie est, en effet, de facture Classique et semble plus proche de Beethoven ou de Brahms que de Liszt ou de Wagner.

Le 1^{er} mouvement suit le plan usuel d'un Allegro de sonate : une exposition des thèmes puis un travail de développement dans la partie centrale avant une reprise plus ou moins symétrique. Bruckner élargit les perspectives en proposant 3 groupes thématiques distincts juxtaposés les uns aux autres sans souci de transition. Le 1^{er} thème est de nature sombre et inquiétante ; présenté par les violoncelles et les contrebasses dans le registre grave, il est exposé sur un rythme obstiné des cordes et enrichi de notes étrangères à la tonalité, ce qui lui confère une aura singulière.

Le 2e mouvement est de caractère tour à tour lyrique et contemplatif ; énoncé en mineur par les violons dans un tempo plus lent, il est agrémenté d'une réplique du hautbois puis développé en plusieurs phases jusqu'à son épanouissement dans l'aigu, dans un ton redevenu majeur. Le 3e thème conserve quelques aspects du choral - ces hymnes luthériens entonnés par les fidèles à l'église ; confié aux cuivres, soumis à un labeur constant, il couronne l'exposition en instaurant progressivement un sentiment de plénitude. Le développement central prend l'apparence d'un voyage initiatique où les éléments sont fragmentés, renversés, reformulés, transposés dans différentes tonalités comme s'ils subissaient une série d'épreuves. Soudée au développement et amenée par des modulations brutales, la ré-exposition montre un travail progressif de métamorphose des thèmes, parfois jusqu'à leur complète transfiguration. Ainsi le 1er élément parvient-il à la lumière, dans les dernières mesures, au terme d'une vaste arche de temps où le lyrisme, le sentiment religieux (le choral) et le travail acharné auront joué leur rôle - l'amour, la foi et le labeur menant à la délivrance.

L'Adagio suit le même plan que le 1er mouvement : 3 groupes thématiques de caractères distincts, juxtaposés, repris puis transfigurés par une Coda consolatrice. D'humeur élégiaque, le 1er groupe unit une progression des cordes à un chant endeuillé du hautbois - une plainte qui prendra l'aspect d'un cri de douleur lors de la ré-exposition. Le 2e est fondé sur un contrepoint lyrique des cordes animé par des glissements chromatiques et des irisations harmoniques évoquant les ambiguïtés majeur / mineur du 1er thème. Le 3e est une marche funèbre en mineur, dans un tempo ralenti, qui confère au discours une teinte pessimiste. La forme, symétrique, permet de faire revivre une 2e fois les événements sous un éclairage différent (grâce à l'ajout de courts sommets expressifs et à de subtils changements de couleurs instrumentales) , laissant deviner le passage du temps. Les thèmes, de nature mélodique, sont liés par quelque élément discret - une courte cellule d'intervalle, un rythme, une même courbe mélodique : bien que relevant de sphères émotionnelles différentes, ils paraissent ainsi soudés comme s'ils n'exprimaient que les conflits et les élans du moi.

Le Scherzo marque un retour à la réalité après la rêverie précédente. La forme, à retours, unifie les humeurs tour à tour mystérieuses, dramatiques, épiques ou optimistes au sein d'un ensemble ordonné qui permet de contrôler les émotions, voire de les mettre à distance.

Le Finale, enfin, débute dans des tons nocturnes, sur une mélodie dépressive présentée par les cordes seules. 2 autres thèmes lui succèdent : l'un lyrique, soumis à un travail immédiat de développement ; l'autre, bref et confié au hautbois. Une dialectique raffinée des éléments, où les montées de sève sont contredites par des retombées mélancoliques, précède une Coda monumentale où le thème initial du 1er mouvement est récapitulé après près d'une heure de musique. Ce retour insolite prélude à une apothéose finale qui referme l'œuvre dans un sentiment de grandeur. La Symphonie semble, dès lors, n'avoir été qu'une lente progression vers la lumière, atteignant cet idéal au terme de nombreuses errances, de nombreuses luttes et épreuves. Elle apparaît ainsi comme une métaphore de la vie même de Bruckner mais peut prendre d'autres formes de signification, symboliques, voire métaphysiques.

WAB 106 (1879-1881) : Symphony No. 6 in A major. Premiered in its complete version on February 26, 1899 in Vienna, conducted by Gustav Mahler.

Bruckner composed his 6th Symphony between 1879 and 1881, during the crucial period of his career that saw him rise from a misunderstood and derided outsider to a universally respected musical visionary. He arrived in the worldly and sophisticated Habsburg capital of Vienna from provincial Linz, in 1868, to take over the positions of harmony professor at the Conservatory and Court organist at the « Hofburg ». With his shuffling manner, hillbilly slang and peasant dress, Bruckner was an easy target for ridicule, but his students and a few local musicians quickly came to respect him as a teacher, composer of church music and an almost peerless organist. During his early years in Vienna, Bruckner also fostered ambitions as a Symphonist, though he committed the tactical error of proclaiming himself a devoted follower of the Wagnerian camp, thereby assuring the disdain of the adamant Wagner hater Eduard Hanslick, the powerful critic of the city's « Neue Freie Presse ». Hanslick called Bruckner's music « unnatural », « sickly », « inflated » and « decayed », and intrigued to stop the performance of his works whenever possible. Bruckner justifiably felt that much of the rejection his Symphonies suffered early in his career was attributable to Hanslick's slashing reviews. (When honour and renown finally came to the composer late in life, the Austrian Emperor, Franz-Joseph, asked the old man what he would like more than anything else. Bruckner requested that the Emperor make Hanslick stop saying nasty things about his music.)

Bruckner's greatest fiasco was the premiere of his 3rd Symphony in Vienna, in December 1877. The concert was a disaster. The audience fled en masse during the Finale, so that when the music finished, there were barely 2 dozen people left in the concert-hall. As he accepted the smattering of applause from those who had stayed, the Orchestra sheepishly stole-off the stage. Standing on the podium in his baggy hayseed clothes, dazed, tears streaming down his cheeks, Bruckner was numb to the comfort offered by the faithful few who remained. With no prospects for the performance of his already completed 4th and 5th Symphonies in view, he avoided the form for almost 2 years after his painful experience with the 3rd Symphony, and it was not until September 1879, after he had tested his muse again with the String Quintet during the summer, that he found courage to return to the genre :

« I think : just here, just there, just keep writing ; don't look right, don't look left. I'll be long gone by the time he (Hanslick) understands it. They will call me either a fool or a Master. If that which I write is good, it will remain for posterity. If not, then it will perish. »

It was in such a mood of courageous determination that the 6th Symphony was conceived.

Bruckner worked on the 6th Symphony during the winter of 1879-1880 as much as his duties at the Conservatory and the « Hofburg » and the thorough revision of his 4th Symphony allowed, but he had not completed the opening movement by the time that he left for a visit to his boyhood home of Saint-Florian, in June 1880, following a successful performance of his Mass in D minor, his 1st music heard in Vienna since the debacle of the 3rd Symphony. From Saint-Florian, he passed through Munich on his way to Switzerland, where his organ performances in Geneva, Freiburg, Bern, Zürich and Lucerne were uniformly praised. On his way back to Vienna, he stopped to see the « Passion-Play » in Oberammergau, and there was captivated by one Marie Bartl, a 17 year old girl who played one of the « Daughters of Jerusalem » . Bruckner, aged 56, waited for her after the performance, introduced himself, and spent the evening with her at her aunt's house. They corresponded for a few months, but when Bruckner mooted the possibility of marriage, her letters stopped. This sad infatuation with teenage girls, always handled with rigid propriety and self effacing shyness, occurred several times during Bruckner's lonely life, and seems to have been the result not of any pedophilic impulse but rather of his quest for unsullied purity in his beloved. He never found a wife. Bruckner was further disappointed upon his arrival in Vienna by the news that his application for the post of assistant conductor of a local men's singing Society, the « Wiener Männergesangsverein » , had been rejected. A bothersome ailment that had recently developed in his feet and legs did nothing to raise his spirits. Still, he composed, completing the 1st movement of the 6th Symphony by September 27, 1880 and the Adagio and Scherzo by the beginning of the next year. Shortly thereafter, on February 20, 1881, the 4th Symphony was given its premiere by Hans Richter and the Vienna Philharmonic in what was probably the 1st adequate performance of any of the composer's Symphonies, and it proved to be an immense success, the 1st triumph of Bruckner's life ; he was called to the stage after every movement, and the Scherzo was given as an encore. Bruckner was at long last granted the Viennese recognition that had been denied him since he had arrived nearly a quarter of a Century before. Inspired by his new found notoriety, he completed the draft of the 6th Symphony in June and finished the orchestration of the work in Saint-Florian on September 3rd. He began the Symphony No. 7, the composition that was to win him international renown, just 3 weeks later.

Despite the recent upturn in his fortunes, Bruckner was unable to arrange a performance of the 6th Symphony until the beginning of 1883, when conductor Wilhelm Jahn, Gustav Mahler's predecessor as music-director of the Vienna Court Opera, led the Philharmonic in a reading of the score. Despite his dedication to Bruckner's cause, Jahn was wary of exciting Eduard Hanslick's scorn, and he programmed only the 2nd and 3rd movements on his concert of February 11th. The audience, which included no less a musical personality than Johannes Brahms, received the truncated Symphony with great enthusiasm, but Hanslick, according to a student of Bruckner's named Lamberg : « Sat there, frigid and immobile, like a sphinx. » . The Symphony was 1st heard in its complete version (though, with large cuts) in a performance conducted by Gustav Mahler in Vienna on February 26, 1899, 3 years after the composer's death. Bruckner's original version of the score was finally presented by August Göllerich and the Vienna « Konzertverein » Orchestra, on December 13, 1901.

Though the 6th Symphony has never enjoyed the popularity of most of Bruckner's other Symphonies, it is regarded by many as one of his finest achievements, as Robert Simpson noted in his study of the composer :

« Its themes are of exceptional beauty and plasticity, its harmony is both bold and subtle, its instrumentation is the most imaginative he had yet achieved, and it has, moreover, a Mastery of Classical form that might have impressed even Johannes Brahms. »

One reason often cited for the Symphony's infrequent performances is the difficulty of the 1st movement's rhythmic execution, a characteristic that is evident in the pregnant gestures that open the work : a violin figure in quick repeated notes and an ominous bass theme whose broad triplets are superimposed upon rather than coincident with the ostinato in the upper-strings. Harmonic tension is created immediately at the outset by the ambiguity of the tonality. The woodwinds contribute a new motive in which dotted rhythms feature prominently before the full Orchestra summons a brass driven climax to mark the end of the 1st theme group. The 2nd theme, initiated by the violins, is more lyrical in nature, though, like the earlier music, it, too, is impelled by a complex interplay of rhythms. This section is also capped by a stentorian statement from the full Orchestra before the intensity subsides for the development, begun with a quietly flowing arpeggiated figure in the flute and violins. The main-theme in various transformations, including a thunderous culminating statement, occupies most of the development. A sudden calm overtakes the music and marks the onset of the recapitulation. The events of the exposition are returned in altered versions, and the movement closes with a massive sun bright burst of sound.

The 2nd movement, unusually for Bruckner's Adagios, follows Sonata form. The principal theme, given by the strings, contains 2 simultaneous motives : a broadly striding downward scale in the basses and a hymnal melody in the violins ; the oboe provides a tender commentary. The subsidiary subject is a lovely rising strain in intertwining lines presented by cellos and violins. The expansive development section is largely woven from the 2 components of the main-theme. The last portion of the movement is less a formal recapitulation than a transfiguration of the earlier themes, which are more richly bedecked with accompanimental figurations and more sonorously scored than on their initial presentations. Of this beautiful Adagio, the esteemed English musicologist Sir Donald Tovey wrote :

« Listen to it with reverence ; for the composer meant what he said, and he is speaking of Sacred things. »

The 3rd movement is slower in tempo and somewhat more veiled in expression than the Scherzos of Bruckner's other Symphonies. The duple meter Trio that occupies the middle of the movement, one of the composer's most original inspirations, is built from a singular collection of thematic fragments : a strange leaping figure in the pizzicato strings, an echo of that motive in a Trio of horns, a sustained woodwind strain, and a smooth phrase in the bowed strings. These ideas, given both in alternation and superimposition, create a surprisingly bold contrast with the surrounding Scherzo.

The Finale is not only the emotional but also the thematic summation of the entire work. The movement follows a broadly arched Sonata form which is built from 3 principal elements : the lyrical descending melody posited by the violins at the beginning ; a dainty subsidiary theme whose child like innocence conceals the sophistication of its carefully worked counterpoint ; and an oboe and clarinet motive in dotted rhythms tightly suspended upon 3 adjacent scale steps. Each of these 3 elements is worked into a stentorian climax. The development section, surprisingly brief, is mostly concerned with the woodwind figure that closed the exposition. The recapitulation maintains the Symphony's spacious dimensions (Tovey noted that Bruckner was not « bothered by people who want to catch the last train home ») , and creates a triumphant conclusion by gathering together reminiscences of themes from the earlier movements, most notably a heroic proclamation by the trombones of the subject that opened the work.

Bruckner completed his Symphony No. 6 in A major in September 1881. It was not performed complete during his lifetime, although in February 1883, the 2 middle movements were played by the Vienna Philharmonic. The 1st complete reading, under the young Gustav Mahler, was given on February 26, 1899, but with a number of substantial cuts and other amendments made to the score. Although a work with many fine passages, and a great deal of internal consistency, the 6th has always been regarded as somewhat imperfect ; as Bruckner specialist Georg Tintner put it, it consists of « 3 perfect movements, and one that is somewhat problematic » .

Considering the vast scale of its predecessor, the 6th is a work of comparatively modest proportions ; yet, it is distinguished by richly varied orchestration and hugely contrasted thematic ideas. The opening movement begins with an urgent rhythmic ostinato played by the violins ; the unsettled 1st subject gradually gives way to a secondary theme that is altogether more lyrical in quality. The opening ostinato figure returns frequently and unaltered as the movement progresses, and becomes especially potent at the climax of the development section. During the Coda, trumpets and horns challenge each other antiphonally, as if sounding across vast distances of time and space.

The Adagio which follows is Bruckner's only Symphonic slow movement in conventional Sonata form. The hymn-like F major opening theme suggests reverential awe in an elegiac string threnody, over which the oboe responds plaintively. A 2nd theme lightens the texture, with a richly-hued episode for strings, but particularly impressive is the extended and yearning Coda, after the manner of a funeral march. The Scherzo is perhaps the most fantastical of any to be found among Bruckner's 9 Symphonies ; whereas others are bucolic and rustic in mood, this is demonic and threatening, its fearsome tensions only assuaged during the more relaxed Trio section.

The Finale presents an austere, purposeful idea for the violins, on which the 2nd clarinet comments ; a contrasting lyrical melody follows. The music progresses in urgent style ; a quality emphasised by frequent gestures of harmonic ambiguity, and in a brilliant and virtuosic passage for the violins. When the long-awaited resolution arrives, Bruckner brings back the ostinato rhythm heard at the start of the Symphony, along with its main 1st subject idea, now played by 3 trombones.

Original version composed from September 1879 to September 1881. It was never modified by Bruckner. The Robert Haas (1935) and Leopold Nowak (1952) editions don't present any significant differences.

Slightly revised version by Cyrill Hynais for the publication by Ludwig Döblinger, in 1899 (1st Edition) . Although Hynais work was careful, the final printed text contains many errors and changes introduced by an unknown hand. Another edition of this version, prepared by Josef Venantius von Wöb, was published in 1927.

1881 Version (Haas, Nowak) .

Circa 1894 Version (1899) .

The 2 versions of this Symphony are very similar. The 1st version is based on Bruckner's autograph score, while the 2nd version corresponds to the 1st printing. There are a number of minor alterations in the latter, with the most obvious of these being the repeat of the 2nd part of the Trio, changes in dynamic markings, and a few changes and additions in the orchestration.

The 6th was almost certainly prepared for publication during Bruckner's lifetime. In 1892, Bruckner arranged for the Symphony, along with some other works, to be published by Ludwig Doblinger. By the autumn of 1893, it is known that engraving had not yet begun on the 6th, but this is probably because Doblinger had been busy publishing Symphonies Nos. 1 and 2, the F minor Mass, and the « Psalm 150 ». The 6th was probably prepared for publication sometime around 1894.

The Symphony No. 6 in A major (WAB 106) is a work in 4 movements composed between September 24, 1879 and September 3, 1881 and dedicated to his landlord, the architect and philosopher Doctor Anton von Ölzelt-Newin (1817-1875) . Though, it possesses many characteristic features of a Bruckner Symphony, it differs the most from the rest of his Symphonic repertory. Hans Ferdinand Redlich went so far as to cite the lack of hallmarks of Bruckner's Symphonic compositional style in the 6th Symphony for the somewhat bewildered reaction of supporters and critics alike.

According to musicologist Robert Simpson, though not commonly performed and often thought of as the ugly duckling of Bruckner's Symphonic body of work, the 6th Symphony nonetheless makes an immediate impression of rich and individual expressiveness :

« Its themes are exceptionally beautiful, its harmony has moments of both boldness and subtlety, its instrumentation is the most imaginative Bruckner had yet achieved, and it possesses a Mastery of Classical form that might even have impressed Brahms. »

By the time Bruckner began composing his Symphony No. 6, only 3 of his Symphonies had been performed. The recent premiere of his 3rd Symphony had been nothing short of disastrous, receiving an extremely negative, though not surprising review from Eduard Hanslick, given Hanslick's predilection for the works of Johannes Brahms :

« His artistic intentions are honest, however oddly he employs them. Instead of a critique, therefore, we would rather simply confess that we have not understood his gigantic Symphony. Neither were his poetic intentions clear to us nor could we grasp the purely musical coherence. The composer was greeted with cheering and was consoled with lively applause at the close by a fraction of the audience that stayed to the end. The Finale, which exceeded all its predecessors in oddities, was only experienced to the last extreme by a little host of hardy adventurers. »

The composition of his 4th Symphony marked the beginning of what some refer to as the « Major Tetralogy » , Bruckner's 4 Symphonies composed in major keys. In fact, this tetralogy was part of an entire decade in Bruckner's compositional history devoted to large scale works written in major keys, a fact of note considering that all of his previous Symphonies and foremost choral works were composed in minor keys. The composition of his String Quintet and the 6th Symphony marked the beginning of a new compositional period for Bruckner within the realm of the « Major Tetralogy ». However, the 6th Symphony has extensive ties to the 4th and 5th Symphonies and is considered to have been composed as a reflective, humanistic response to its 2 direct Symphonic predecessors. It has even been dubbed the « Philosophical Symphony » by critics, for this reason.

Bruckner's Symphonies encompass many techniques but the one unwavering hallmark of his Symphonic compositions is a singular formal pattern that underwent very little variation over the course of his Symphonic repertory. In fact, their 4 extended movements are indebted to the structure and thematic treatment in the late works of Beethoven. The only large scale diversion from this stock broke formal scheme in the 6th Symphony is Bruckner's use of Sonata form in the 2nd movement, instead of his usual large scale ternary form.

Thematically speaking, there are 2 distinct varieties of themes in Bruckner's Symphonies. 1st, there are themes that are clearly defined in shape and, then, there are the themes that operate more as motives with a shorter length and a more open ended shape, as is typical of the 6th Symphony. Another characteristic thematic feature of Bruckner's Symphonies is the intimate relationship between the outer 2 movements, though, there is typically more of an emphasis on thematic contrast within the 1st movement. Specifically, the amplification of the exposition of the 1st movement consists of 2 subsidiary themes as well as the primary theme, which are subsequently developed, a technique that is considered uniquely Brucknerian.

Other characteristics that are found in Bruckner's Symphonies (specifically the 6th) include the extensive treatment of the dominant 7th chord as a German 6th chord in a new key, usage of cadences as a decisive factor in daring modulations, the treatment of organ points as pivotal to the harmony and structure, chains of harmonic sequences, and, most notably, extensive use of rhythmic motives, especially the characteristic Bruckner rhythm, a rhythm consisting of 2 4ths and a triple of quarter notes, or vice-versa. This rhythm dominated most of the 4th Symphony and was practically non-existent in the 5th Symphony but becomes nothing short of a driving force in the 6th Symphony ; the metric complexities generated by this unique rhythmic grouping are more pronounced in the 1st movement of the 6th Symphony than in any of Bruckner's other compositions.

The orchestration of the 6th Symphony complies with Bruckner's customary, albeit peculiar techniques. Just as in his other Symphonic works, there are no marks of extreme virtuosity apparent in the score and the lines are straightforward. The 6th Symphony is scored for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, timpani, and string section. Bruckner commonly alternates between solo and tutti sections, as well as layering instruments to provide texture and show different subject groups.

I. Majestoso :

Bruckner labels this movement « Majestoso », not the conventional « Maestoso », probably from his Latin (from « Maiestas » : sovereign power) . The movement, in obvious Sonata form, opens with the characteristic « Bruckner rhythm » played in the violins, though Bruckner is careful to maintain the enigmatic atmosphere by indicating a bowing that keeps the bow on the string and, therefore, prohibits the rhythmic figure from becoming too lively. One then hears the quietly intense main-theme, a paraphrase of the main-theme of Bruckner's 4th Symphony, stated in the low strings and juxtaposed against the pulsating rhythm in the violins.

The key is A major when the 1st theme enters ; however, the mystery is heightened by notes outside the realm of A major tonality that appear in the melodic line, namely the pitches G, B-flat and F, Neapolitan inflexions that will have large scale tonal effects that come to fruition later in the Symphony. The counter-statement of the theme appears (bar 25) in fortissimo, a long established Classical technique that Bruckner had yet to utilize at the beginning of a Symphony.

The 2nd theme group is more complex than the primary theme. The 1st theme of this group is a confident melody in the violins in which Bruckner employs mixed rhythms. The 2nd theme in this group, an expressive, lyrical motif (bar 69) is 1st heard in D major, closely followed by a statement in F major and a richly orchestrated statement in E major, the dominant of the movement's original A major. The 3rd theme of this section, a militaristic statement of the Bruckner rhythm, now appears, followed by modulations ending in the dominant (E major) and segueing into the development section.

The development is shorter and less complex than one usually finds in Bruckner's Symphonic 1st movements ; however, it plays a substantial role in the overall harmonic structure of the movement. From the outset (bar 159) , the violins play an inversion of the main-theme, though the Bruckner rhythm that accompanied it in the exposition is absent. Instead, the development is propelled throughout by the triplet motif that 1st appeared in the 3rd subject of the exposition. Harmonically, the development encompasses a myriad of modulations, abruptly traversing between E-flat major and A major, seemingly signaling the beginning of the recapitulation.

The beginning of the recapitulation is, in fact, a climax, serving as both the end of the development and the beginning of the recapitulation, marking the 1st time in Symphonic literature that this has occurred. If not for this climactic moment, one could have trouble identifying the exact moment of recapitulation as the return of the tonic and the return of the primary theme do not coincide (in fact, there are 15 bars in between the 2 events) . In true Bruckner form, it encompasses a complete restatement of the theme groups from the exposition and is otherwise uneventful, setting the stage for the Coda which Donald Tovey described as one of Bruckner's greatest passages. In the Coda, Bruckner passes through the entire spectrum of tonality, leaving no key unsuggested ; however, he establishes no tonal center except for A major. The opening phrase of the 1st theme appears throughout, joined (bar 345) by the rhythmic motive from the beginning. An exultant final statement of that theme and the completion of a massive plagal cadence signal the end of the 1st movement.

2. Adagio. Sehr feierlich :

The 2nd movement is in obvious Sonata form, the only example of a Sonata structure Adagio in Bruckner's Symphonies. Robert Simpson went so far as to describe the movement as the most perfectly realized slow Sonata design since the Adagio of Beethoven's « Hammerklavier » Sonata. The movement opens with a theme in the strings, a yearning love song that is joined (bar 5) by a mournful lament in the oboe. Simpson points-out that the frequent Neapolitan inflexions of the 1st movement are expanded here, beginning with the B-flat and F in the primary melodic line that make it natural that the movement should be in F major, though the opening initially ambiguously suggests B-flat minor. After a brief transitional passage, there is a modulation to E major that marks the introduction of the 2nd theme, a soaring, untroubled love song (bar 25) .

The 3rd theme (bar 53) is characteristic of a funeral march, combining C minor and A-flat major and providing a somber contrast to the preceding love song. The dotted rhythm in its 1st bar calls to mind the oboe lament from the beginning of the movement. Doernberg described this sad turn to A-flat major as the kind of music Gustav Mahler always wished to achieve, citing Bruckner as anticipatory to Mahler in this respect.

There is a brief developmental section (bar 69) that includes modulation on the primary theme as well as inversions of the oboe lament. There is a recapitulation of all 3 themes (bar 93) though the orchestration is different, with the former violin theme (primary theme) now appearing in the horn and subsequently in the woodwinds. The 2nd theme is recapitulated in its entirety in the tonic followed by a very short reappearance of the 3rd theme.

Finally, a transition over a dominant pedal (a Bruckner hallmark) leads to the Coda that Simpson referred to as the fine drawn consolatory Coda that is one of Bruckner's best. At bar 157, one hears the last statement of the primary theme with the movement ending in its tonic, F major, in a state of « perfect serenity » .

3. Scherzo. Nicht schnell - Trio. Langsam :

The A minor 3rd movement is unlike any other composed by Bruckner ; it is slower than usual and the tense character often associated with his Scherzi is often shadowed and muted, although there are movements of brilliancy. However, the most prominent feature is the lack of a striking Scherzo theme ; instead, one finds 3 contrasting rhythmical motives juxtaposed from the very beginning and united throughout the majority of the movement. Its steady 3/4 time is pervaded, once again, by triplets throughout, often giving the impression of 9/8 and creating a broader sense of movement that is extremely deliberate, especially for a Scherzo movement.

There is a certain degree of harmonic ambiguity throughout, but nothing that compares to the opening of the 1st movement. One of the most fascinating features of the harmonic structure is Bruckner's avoidance of a root position tonic chord for much of the movement. The 1st 20 bars of the movement once again rest on a dominant pedal and when the bass finally moves to the tonic pitch (A) , it is not a root position tonic chord ; instead, it acts as the bottom of a 1st inversion chord of F major (bar 21) .

In the development, one sees the addition of a new motif and harmonically, the section centers around D-flat major, G-flat major, and B-flat minor, all closely related keys but ones that are isolated from the tonic (A minor) . The dominant of A minor is reached (bar 75) and here, the recapitulation begins, once again over a dominant pedal. It is important to note that there has still not been a root chord of A minor. This elusive A minor root chord finally appears at the end of the recapitulation leading into the C major Trio section.

The slow Trio is in the style of a « Ländler », an Austrian folk-dance and, according to Williamson, confirms that in Bruckner's works, the Trio is a place for construction in tone colour as in the moment when horn and pizzicato strings compete on the same rhythmic figure. In fact, this dialogue between pizzicato strings, horn and woodwinds is central to the texture of the whole Trio section. Although the key is C major, there are moments of harmonic ambiguity, as in the preceding movements. At one point (bar 5) , the string point towards D-flat major while the woodwinds attempt to assert A-flat major by quoting the inversion of the main-theme of Bruckner's 5th Symphony that is in A-flat major. The Scherzo returns in its entirety at the end of the Trio, adhering to a typical large scale ternary structure.

4. Finale. Bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell :

Derek Watson characterized the Finale as a steady, organic assertion of A major against its Neapolitan relatives. However, this Sonata form movement begins with a theme in Phrygian A minor that once again stresses Neapolitan relationships with the obvious presence of the flat 6th (the pitch being F natural) . The horns and trumpets interrupt with statements in A major (bar 22) but the theme is undeterred ; 4 bars later, they once again interrupt the theme and, this time, succeed in establishing A major (bar 29) . A 2nd theme in C major eventually appears followed by a 3rd theme (bar 125) that is derived from the oboe lament of the 2nd movement. During the development section, the music continued to modulate through a variety of major keys, including F major, E-flat major and E major until finally returning to the tonic A major (bar 245) , regarded as the start of the recapitulation.

The Coda, once again, encompasses a broad range of keys and juxtaposes the primary theme with the main-theme from the 1st movement. A final massive statement of A major asserts itself (bar 397) seemingly out of nowhere, embodying Bruckner's amazing ability to establish the tonic without a doubt and without the kind of preparation one would normally expect. This movement does not, nor was it intended to have the vast impact of the Finale of Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 but it is infinitely more refined than the Finale of his 4th Symphony. According to Derek Watson, the victorious conclusion of Bruckner's quest for a new and ideal Finale form will be celebrated in his 8th Symphony but the 6th Symphony's development is an eminent and profoundly satisfying landmark on that triumphant march.

The 5th, 6th, and 7th Symphonies represent Bruckner's period of confidence as a composer, and apart from his unfinished 9th Symphony, they are the only Symphonies in which Bruckner did not make extensive revisions. In fact, the 6th Symphony is the only Bruckner Symphony that was exempt from any revisions from the composer himself. However, Gustav Mahler made substantial changes to the score before he conducted the 1899 premiere of the Symphony in its entirety, revisions unsanctioned by Bruckner as they were posthumous.

The 1st published edition of the 6th Symphony also occurred in 1899 and was overseen by pianist Cyrill Hynais, a former student of Bruckner. However, this edition encompassed a few minute changes from Bruckner's original score, namely the repetition of the 2nd half of the Trio in the 3rd movement. The next printed edition came to fruition in 1935, edited by Robert Haas, and is the edition most commonly performed today. In 1951, Leopold Nowak also published an edition that was an exact replication of Bruckner's original 1881 score. The edition performed under the direction of Gustav Mahler, for the premiere, was never published.

Criticism of Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 is similar to the critical response that his preceding Symphonies had received. Whereas Bruckner considered his 6th Symphony to be his « boldest Symphony » , it was not generally held in high-regard. In terms of interpretation, the 6th Symphony has also been the unluckiest, with the vast majority of conductors ignoring Bruckner's specific tempo markings and throwing-off the carefully planned balance of the movements. One reviewer for « The Musical Times » referred to the inner movements of this Symphony as « flawed but attractive enough » and dubbed the outer movements « burdensome » .

Eduard Hanslick, as usual, was without a doubt the harshest critic of them all. He was once quoted as saying, « whom I wish to destroy shall be destroyed » , and Bruckner seems to have been a prime target. After hearing the 1883 performance of the middle movements of the 6th Symphony, Hanslick wrote :

« It has become ever harder for me personally to achieve a proper relationship with these peculiar compositions in which clever, original, and even inspired moments alternate frequently without recognizable connection with barely understandable platitudes, empty and dull patches, stretched-out over such unsparing length as to threaten to run players as well as listeners out of breath. »

Here, Hanslick touched on the most common complaint about Bruckner's Symphonic writing : the seemingly endless journey to a conclusion of musical thought. Dyneley Hussey critiqued the 6th Symphony in a 1957 « Musical Times » review and reached the same conclusions half a Century later, writing :

« Bruckner's most tiresome habit is his way of pulling-up dead at frequent intervals, and then starting the argument all over again. One has the impression that we are traversing a town with innumerable traffic lights, all of which turn red as we approach them. »

Harsh critical reception of the 6th Symphony, as well as his entire body of work, can also be attributed to critical reception of Bruckner as a person. He was a devout Catholic whose religious fervor often had a negative effect on those he encountered. One of his pupils, Franz Schalk, commented that it was the age of moral and spiritual liberalism but also in which Bruckner intruded with his medieval, monasterial concept of humankind and life.

Regardless of the criticisms, both musical and personal, there were some who attempted to find the beauty in Bruckner's 6th Symphony. Donald Tovey wrote that if one clears their mind, not only of prejudice but of wrong points of view, and treats Bruckner's 6th Symphony as a kind of music we have never heard before, there is no doubt that its high quality will strike us at every moment. Still others marvel over the rarity of performances of the 6th Symphony, citing its bright character and key and its plethora of tender, memorable themes as grounds for more widespread acceptance.

Carl Hrubý wrote that Bruckner once said that if he were to speak to Beethoven about bad critiques Beethoven would say :

« My dear Bruckner, don't bother yourself about it. It was no better for me, and the same gentlemen who use me as a stick to beat you with still don't understand my Last Quartets, however much they may pretend to. »

In saying this, Bruckner both acknowledged his bad critiques and maintained hope that his own compositions might, one day, garner the same type of positive reaction that Beethoven's music received from his contemporaries.

...

« Die zwei Sätze (Adagio und Scherzo) aus der neuesten Symphonie von Bruckner ... schwelgen in Erinnerung an Rich. Wagner, in dessen verschiedenen, vorzugsweise aber jüngeren Stilarten. Bruckner wendet den " symphonischen Stil " der Bayreuther " Fest "- , " Weihfest "- und " Bühnenweih-Festspiele " leider nun auch auf die Symphonie selbst an. Im Ganzen hat der wilde Komponist etwas an Zucht gewonnen, aber an Natur verloren. Beim Adagio hielten Interesse und Befremden einander im Publikum noch die Waage, und es ging, wenn auch zögernd, mit. Bei dem ausschließlich durch Seltsamkeit fesselnden Scherzo trennte sich aber (wie der Sportsmann sagen würde) das Roß vom Reiter. Eine kleine Clique schien sich's in den Kopf gesetzt zu haben, die Legitimierung auch dieses Satzes auf revolutionärem Wege zu erzwingen ; vergebene Liebesmüh. »

(Eduard Hanslick im Februar 1883 in der Wiener Neuen Freien Presse.)

Wenn es um den Komponisten Anton Bruckner ging, kannte der Musikkritiker Eduard Hanslick keine Gnade. Ähnlich, wie er Wagners Musikdramen für den Niedergang der Oper verantwortlich machte, so sah er auch in Bruckners Sinfonien eine Gefahr für die « absolute » Instrumentalmusik. Hanslick propagierte das Ideal einer Musik, die nichts anderes ist als « tönend bewegte Form » und die vor allen Dingen nicht von außermusikalischen literarischen Programmen bestimmt wird. Im Kampf gegen das Formprinzip der sinfonische Dichtungen, wie es von der Neudeutschen Schule um Franz Liszt propagiert wurde, hätte der Sinfoniker Anton Bruckner mit seiner traditionalistischen Haltung durchaus auch Hanslicks Mitsstreiter werden können. Aber der Musikkritiker spürte offensichtlich die Zentrifugalkraft, die Bruckners Musik innewohnt : Obwohl der Komponist sich immer bemühte, die klassischen Formkriterien zu erfüllen, sprengt seine Musik allein schon aufgrund der zeitlichen Ausdehnung den Rahmen des damals Üblichen. Bei Anton Bruckner beginnt das sinfonische Prinzip, die « tönend bewegte Form » , sich von innen her aufzulösen.

Bruckners sinfonisches Schaffen hatte also nur wenig gemein mit den Sinfonien eines Schumann, eines Mendelssohn oder Brahms. Und entsprechend endeten die Uraufführungen seiner Sinfonien in aller Regel mit einem Fiasko : Zuhörer verließen während der einzelnen Sätze den Saal, und am Ende gab es Pfiffe und Buhrufe, wenn nicht gar verständnisloses Schweigen. Es waren solche Vorfälle (und nicht, wie häufig zu lesen « Mißgunst und Neid ») , die Bruckners Freunde veranlaßten, den Komponisten zu Umarbeitungen, Neuinstrumentierungen und Kürzungen zu ermuntern.

Die sechste Sinfonie schrieb Anton Bruckner in der Zeit zwischen dem 24. September 1879 und dem 4. September 1881. Es war eine Zeit, da die materiellen Lebensverhältnisse des Komponisten sich konsolidiert hatten. Im Februar 1878 war er zum « wirklichen Mitglied der Wiener Hofkapelle » ernannt worden und kam dadurch zum ersten Male, im Alter von 54 Jahren, in den Genuß eines gesicherten Einkommens. Nach einer schöpferischen Pause von fast fünf Jahren setzte dann 1879 ein neuer Schaffensschub ein, in dessen Zuge auch die sechste Sinfonie entstand. Das Selbstvertrauen, das Bruckner in jener Zeit an den Tag legte, schlug sich auch in seiner Arbeit nieder. Die sechste Sinfonie ist das erste Werk, das Bruckner nach seiner Fertigstellung keiner Überarbeitung mehr unterzog. Er selbst bezeichnete sie als seine « keckste Sinfonie » - und das wohl nicht nur wegen des Wortspiels. Wegen ihrer avantgardistischer Ansätze in der kompositorischen Anlage, wegen der harmonischen und motivischen Kühnheiten wurde die Komposition lange Zeit als reine Schreibtischarbeit zweiten Ranges gewertet und ist auch heute noch eine der am seltensten aufgeführten Sinfonien des Komponisten.

Nach der romantischen vierten Sinfonie und der pathetischen, architektonisch streng gehaltenen Fünften folgt die Sechste in ruhig heiterer Abgeklärtheit. Die Monumentalität der anderen Sinfonien, ihre leidenschaftliche Aufgewühltheit und ihre ekstatischen Entladungen sucht man hier vergeblich. Die sechste Sinfonie erscheint gleichsam als Versuch, die auseinanderstrebenden Tendenzen der beiden vorausgegangenen Sinfonien auszugleichen. Gelegentlich hat man das Werk einen « Lobgesang auf die Schönheit der Erde » genannt und in Anlehnung an Beethovens Sechste Sinfonie als « Bruckners Pastorale » bezeichnet.

1. Satz :

Der Beginn des ersten Satzes ist einer der strahlendsten Sonnenaufgänge der Musik. Übersichtlicher und organischer Aufbau. Ein leises rhythmisches Motiv mit dem bei Bruckner typischen Wechsel von Dreier- und Zweierwerten wandert 41 Takte lang durch alle Streichergruppen. Es bildet den Hintergrund des musikalischen Geschehens. Im zweiten Takt hebt das kraftvoll majestätische Hauptthema an, das schließlich im Pianissimo erlischt. Eine einsame Flöte leitet über zu dem elegisch-sänglichen Seitenthema. Schließlich klingt noch ein drittes, rhythmisch geprägtes Thema an, das von allen Instrumenten in kräftigem Unisono vorgetragen wird. Die Durchführung verarbeitet im Wesentlichen das Hauptthema und die verschiedenen rhythmischen Motive, wobei sich das Stimmengewebe immer mehr verdichtet. Fast unmerklich setzt dann die Reprise ein. Im strahlenden Ausklang der Coda erscheint der Rhythmus des Hauptthemas noch einmal in den Trompeten in derb naiver Abwandlung.

2. Satz : Adagio - « sehr feierlich » .

Der Satz kündigt von zweimal von rauschhaftem Glück und schmerzlichem Verzicht. Er hebt an mit einer Violinkantilene auf der G-Saite. Mildes Licht durchwärmt die ausdrucksvollen Klänge. Immer wieder stockt der melodische Fluß, als wollten die Orchesterinstrumente fragen, wie angesichts der lastenden Schwere es nun weitergehen werde. Bis dann die ersten Violinen eine Trauerprozession anstimmen, begleitet von dem langsamen Marschschritt der Celli und Kontrabässe. Gegen Ende dann strahlt das Hauptthema in hellem D-Dur auf, bis der Satz in samtene Schlußakkorden zur Ruhe kommt.

3. Satz : Scherzo - « ruhig bewegt » .

Bei der Herausgabe der Urfassung schrieb Robert Haas in der Einleitung, daß « die vielen Zusätze für den Zeitablauf, die Stärkeverteilung und den Vortrag einer richtigen Auffassung hinderlich geworden » seien. Die trifft besonders auf das Scherzo zu. Durch falsche dynamische Zeichen wurden Begleitmotive zu Hauptthemen aufgewertet.

Der Satz ist kurz, farbig und phantasievoll. Bruckner entfaltet hier eine Vorahnung impressionistischer Klanggebilde. Es herrscht hier nicht das ansonsten übliche rustikale Auftrumpfen, sondern die Musik wirkt wie eine spukhafte Träumerei, in der Kobolde, Gnommen und andere Geister ihr huschendes Spiel treiben.

4. Satz : « Bewegt, doch nicht zu schnell » .

Die Motive des Finale sind aus dem Material des ersten und des zweiten Satzes abgeleitet. Bruckner beabsichtigte damit wohl eine größere Geschlossenheit des Werkes. Anklänge an Wagner, wie etwa in dem « siegfriedhaften » zweiten Thema zeugen von Bruckners Wagner-Verehrung, aber das Pathos mit seinen kraftvoll strahlenden Siegesfanfaren kann auf Dauer doch nicht überzeugen.

Am 13. Oktober 1882 schrieb Bruckner an seinen Freund Leopold Hofmeyr :

« Die Wiener Philharmoniker haben nun meine 6. Sinfonie angenommen, alle übrigen Sinfonien von anderen Componisten abgelehnt. Die Philharmoniker fanden an dem Werke solches Wohlgefallen, daß sie heftig applaudierten und einen Tusch machten. »

Zur öffentlichen Aufführung drei Monate später gelangten (wohl wegen der Länge des Werks) allerdings nur die beiden Mittelsätze. Ähnlich vernichtend wie Eduard Hanslick beurteilte auch die übrige Musikpresse das Werk. In den Signalen für die musikalische Welt heißt es im Februar 1883 :

Vollständig aufgeführt wurde die sechste Sinfonie erst 1899 nach Bruckners Tod unter Gustav Mahler. Mahler traute der kompositorischen Qualität offensichtlich nicht so recht ; jedenfalls nahm er etliche Kürzungen und Retuschen in der Instrumentation vor. In seiner Originalgestalt erklang das Werk erstmals 1935 durch den Dirigenten Paul van Kempen.

Bruckner schrieb seine 6. Symphonie in einer Phase der persönlichen Konsolidierung. Seine Übersiedlung von der beschaulichen Provinzstadt Linz, wo er sich sein halbes Leben lang auf seine gewaltigen Hauptwerke vorbereitet hatte, in die lebhaftere Hauptstadt des österreichischen Großstaates war geglückt. Er hatte sich sowohl am Konservatorium als auch an der Universität Wiens als Lehrer etablieren können. Als Komponist und konnte er sich, wiewohl umstritten, einer zwar kleinen aber wachsenden Anhängerschaft erfreuen. Im Jahre 1880 hatte er dazu eine große Reise - die größte seines Lebens - getätigt, die ihn nach Bayern - unter anderem zu den Festspielen in Oberammergau - und in die Schweiz geführt hatte. Dabei hatte der Junggeselle, wie sich aus seinem Reisetagebuch ergibt, offenbar den Eindruck, daß er auch bei den Damen Wirkung erzielen konnte. Augenscheinlich im Gefühl einer gefestigten Position machte sich Bruckner im September 1880, fünf Jahre nach seiner letzten Symphonie und obwohl diese weder aufgeführt noch gedruckt war, an ein neues Großwerk der Gattung. Binnen eines Jahres, für Bruckner eine kurze Zeit, entstand so unter Verwendung von Vorarbeiten aus dem Jahre 1879 seine 6. Symphonie. Daß Bruckner mit einem für ihn ungewöhnlichen Selbstbewusstsein an die Arbeit ging, spiegelt sich auch in der Tatsache, daß er hier, anders als bei den meisten anderen seiner Symphonien, keine Notwendigkeit für eine spätere Überarbeitung sah. Er selbst meinte denn auch, die 6. Symphonie sei das « Keckse », was er geschrieben habe.

Das Werk fällt in mancher Hinsicht aus dem Rahmen des symphonischem Gesamtwerkes von Bruckner. Es ist vergleichsweise kurz und wirkt mit Ausnahme des langsamen Satzes eher weltlich. Deutlich wird dies bereits am Anfang. Bruckner verzichtet auf das « mystische » Entwicklungstremolo und beginnt ziemlich unvermittelt sein erhabendes Spiel mit Formen und Motiven. Das Scherzo gilt als das merkwürdigste, welches Bruckner geschrieben hat. Es hat nichts mehr mit einem Tanz zu tun und wirkt mitunter geradezu unheimlich. Auffällig sind in der Symphonie auch die starken dynamischen Kontraste und einige rhythmische Feinheiten (etwa die quasi polyrythmische Behandlung des zweiten Themas im ersten Satz) . Mancher Deuter kam daher zu dem Schluss, daß sich in dieser Komposition nicht metaphysische Spekulationen des Grüblers Bruckner sondern persönliche Erlebnisse niedergeschlagen haben, im zweiten Satz möglicherweise der Besuch in Oberammergau, im ersten und dritten der Eindruck der Schweizer Berge.

Die öffentliche Anerkennung war auch bei diesem Werk Bruckners schleppend. Die Wiener Philharmoniker, die sich seinerzeit erstmals mit Bruckner befassten, haben die Symphonie nach einer « Novitätenprobe » im Oktober 1882 zwar als einziges der seinerzeit gesichteten Werke für aufführens-wert erachtet. Wie Bruckner am 13. Oktober 1882 einem Bekannten mit der Aufforderung schrieb, es weiterzuerzählen, hatten sie an dem Werk « solches Wohlgefallen, daß sie heftig applaudierten und einen Dusch machten » . Außerdem habe ihm der Dirigent, Wilhelm Jahn, als er sich ihm vorstellte, erklärt, daß er einer seiner « innigsten Verehrer » sei. Bei der « Uraufführung » am 12. Februar 1883 wagte man aber nur die Präsentation der beiden Mittelsätze. Der Kritiker Eduard Hanslick schrieb darüber, leider werde der Wagner'sche Stil nun auch auf die Symphonie angewandt. Hätten sich beim Adagio im Publikum Interesse und Befremden noch die Waage gehalten, so sei beim « ausschließlich durch Seltsamkeit fesselnden Scherzo » das Roß vom Reiter getrennt worden. Im Ganzen habe der « wilde Komponist » etwas an Zucht gewonnen, aber an Natur verloren. Der Kritiker Hans Paumgartner meinte, das Scherzo habe auch die begeistertsten Freunde und Schüler des Komponisten in einige Verlegenheit gestürzt. Er attestiert Bruckner aber, daß er « eine hoch bedeutende, das Durchschnittsmaß weit überragende künstlerische Persönlichkeit » sei, « deren Schöpfungen jederzeit das ungeteilte Interesse aller wirklichen Kunstfreunde für sich haben werde » . Die nächste Aufführung der Symphonie fand dennoch erst 1899, drei Jahre nach Bruckners Tod, unter der Leitung von Gustav Mahler, ebenfalls in Wien statt. Auch hier mußte das Werk Kürzungen und zusätzlich instrumentale Veränderungen über sich ergehen lassen. Die erste vollständige Darbietung erfolgte schließlich fast 20 Jahre nach der Fertigstellung des Werkes. Sie fand im Jahre 1901 unter der Leitung von Wilhelm Pohlig in Stuttgart statt, wo, wie es in der anschließenden Kritik hieß, « dieser moderne Symphoniker bereits viel Boden gewonnen hat » .

The Gramophone Choice

« New Philharmonia » Orchestra conducted by Otto Klemperer. « EMI » : 562621-2 - ADD (80 minutes) .

Klemperer's performance is masterly from 1st note to last. It is a performance by turns lofty, tender and serene, but it is, above all, a structurally cogent performance and, within the compass of its steady-treading tempi, an intensely exciting one.

Karl Pohlig

Le chef d'orchestre, pianiste et compositeur Karl Pohlig est né le 10 février 1864 à Teplitz (aujourd'hui, la partie ouest de la République tchèque) , au nord de la Bohême (Empire Austro-Hongrois) et est décédé le 17 juin 1928 à Braunschweig (Brunswick) , en Basse-Saxe. Dans les années 1880, il étudie le violoncelle et le piano à Weimar, en Allemagne. Élève de Franz Liszt, il va le suivre à Budapest puis à Rome. Plus tard, il enseigne à son tour le piano. Pohlig occupe brièvement un poste au Conservatoire Royal de Sondershausen.

À partir de 1897, Karl Pohlig dirige de nombreux orchestres de Théâtre : le Covent Garden de Londres, en 1897 et 1898 ; l'Opéra de Hambourg ; le Théâtre de la Cour de Coburg, en Bavière ; il sera l'assistant de Gustav Mahler au « Staatsoper » de Vienne ; il dirigera aussi à Graz. Pohlig occupera le poste de « Kapellmeister » de l'Orchestre de la Cour de Stuttgart, de 1900 à 1907.

Sur les recommandations des chefs Felix Mottl (1856-1911) de Berlin et Fritz Steinbach (1855-1916) de Cologne, Karl Pohlig sera embauché par le conseil d'administration du Philadelphia Orchestra Association, à l'été de 1907. Il sera à la tête de l'Orchestre jusqu'en 1912. Lorsque Pohlig est devenu officiellement directeur musical, il a demandé et obtenu un ensemble minimum de 80 musiciens (alors que l'on en comptait entre 60 et 65 sous le règne du chef Fritz Scheel, son prédécesseur) . Des musiciens additionnels devront être engagés lors de l'exécution de grandes œuvres symphoniques comme celles du compositeur Hector Berlioz. Bien que les critiques étaient satisfaits des concerts donnés par Pohlig au tout début de son mandat, ils sont rapidement devenus acerbes. Pohlig va obtenir un certain succès en élargissant le répertoire du Philadelphia et en invitant, en 1909, le compositeur Sergei Rachmaninoff à faire ses débuts américains au pupitre. Il s'agira d'une longue et prolifique association. Le public et les musiciens ont toutefois commencé à se retourner contre Pohlig. Ces derniers le considéraient abrasif, distant et froid (ce qui n'est pas rare chez les chefs d'orchestre) . Olga Samaroff, une soliste de l'Orchestre, le considérait « sans saveur et sans inspiration » . Entre autre, la critique new-yorkaise sera d'abord mitigée puis hostile face à ce chef.

Karl Pohlig va remettre sa démission en 1912, en disgrâce, après la révélation qu'il fut impliqué dans une affaire extra-conjugale avec sa secrétaire suédoise. Pohlig va poursuivre l'Orchestre pour bris de contrat puisqu'il lui restait seulement 1 an à faire. Pour faciliter son départ, il gagnera sa cause en recevant son dû pour la saison 1912-1913. Pohlig va conclure sa carrière en retournant en Allemagne. Il sera nommé directeur musical de l'Opéra de la Cour (« Staatstheater ») de « Braunschweig » (Brunswick) , en Basse-Saxe.

Karl Pohlig va miser sur l'interprétation des œuvres de Richard Wagner. En tant que compositeur, il laisse 2 Symphonies, 2 Poèmes symphoniques (dont « Per Aspera, ad Astra » composé à Stuttgart, en 1902) ainsi que des œuvres de genre, des pièces de musique de chambre et de piano.

The German Bohemian pianist, conductor and composer Karl Pohlig was born on 10 February 1864 in Teplitz (Teplice) , Bohemia, Austrian Empire ; and died on 17 June 1928 in Braunschweig (Brunswick) , in Lower-Saxony. He studied cello and piano in Weimar, and later taught piano there.

Pohlig trained as a musician with Franz Liszt, whom he followed to Pest (now part of Budapest) and Rome. He taught for a short period as Court pianist at the Royal Conservatory in Sondershausen and, from 1897 onwards, was a theatre music-director in London, Hamburg, Coburg, Vienna and Graz. He became Court music-director in Stuttgart, in 1900, conducted the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra, from 1907 onwards, and worked at the Hamburg Municipal Theatre, in 1913-1914. From 1914 to 1924, he was general music-director in Brunswick. In particular, Pohlig was known as a Wagnerian interpreter. He composed Symphonies and piano music.

1901 : In Stuttgart, Karl Pohlig became the 1st conductor to perform the complete version of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 6. This Symphony had been performed before in excerpts and in an edited-down version by Gustav Mahler.

1907 : Fritz Scheel dies ; Carl Pohlig is appointed the Orchestra's 2nd conductor.

1909 : Sergei Rachmaninoff is invited to guest conduct the Orchestra ; his appearance at the Academy of Music signals the beginning of a long association between the Philadelphia Orchestra and one of the Century's most beloved composer-pianists.

Pohlig became conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, from 1907 to 1912. He invited Sergei Rachmaninoff to make his American debut with the Orchestra, in 1909. In 1912, he resigned in disgrace after the revelation that he was involved in an extra-marital affair with his Swedish secretary. However, Pohlig also sued the Orchestra for breach of contract, as he had 1 year remaining on his contract at that time. He received a settlement of 1 year's salary. Pohlig concluded his career as conductor of the Braunschweig Court Opera, in Germany, the city in which he died.

In 1907, Karl Pohlig became music-director of the Philadelphia Orchestra and served until 1912. New music he programmed was unpopular with audiences, and revelations that he had an extra-marital affair with his secretary caused outrage. The Orchestra cancelled his contract and gave him a year's salary ($12,000) in severance to avoid a suit from Pohlig alleging a conspiracy to oust him.

Pohlig died on 17 June 1928 in Brunswick.

Karl Pohlig (geboren 10. Februar 1858 in Teplitz, Böhmen ; gestorben 17. Juni 1928 in Braunschweig) war ein aus Nordböhmen stammender deutschsprachiger Pianist und Komponist.

Er betrieb in Weimar Studien am Cello und am Klavier und war Schüler von Franz Liszt, dem er nach Budapest und Rom folgte. Als Hofpianist lehrte Pohlig kurzzeitig am fürstlichen Konservatorium in Sondershausen. Ab 1897 dirigierte er verschiedene Theaterorchester in London (Covent Garden 1897 und 1898) , Hamburg, Coburg (am Hoftheater) , Wien (Vizekapellmeister neben Gustav Mahler an der Hofoper) und Graz (als Kapellmeister) . Von 1900 bis 1907 war er Hofkapellmeister in Stuttgart. 1901 dirigierte er dort Bruckners 6. Sinfonie in ihrer ungekürzten Erstfassung, nachdem Gustav Mahler 1899 das Werk zunächst stark gekürzt zur Aufführung gebracht hatte. 1902 entstand in Stuttgart Pohligs symphonische Dichtung Per Aspera, ad Astra.

Pohlig leitete von 1907 bis 1912 als Dirigent das Philadelphia Orchestra. Er lud 1909 Sergei Rachmaninow zu einem Debüt in den Vereinigten Staaten ein. Nachdem Pohlig 1912 wegen der Enthüllung der außerehelichen Beziehung zu seiner schwedischen Sekretärin beim Publikum in Ungnade gefallen war, trat er von der Leitung des Orchesters in Philadelphia zurück. Da sein Vertrag in Amerika regulär noch ein Jahr gedauert hätte, erstritt er auf gerichtlichem Weg die Zahlung einer dementsprechenden Abfindungssumme. Seit 1913 betätigte sich Pohlig am Hamburger Stadttheater und beendete seine Karriere von 1914 bis 1922 als Generalmusikdirektor des Staatstheaters in Braunschweig.

Seinen künstlerischen Schwerpunkt hatte Pohlig auf die Interpretation von Werken Richard Wagners gelegt. Als Komponist hinterließ Pohlig zwei Symphonien, zwei symphonische Dichtungen sowie einige Werke aus den Gattungen der Kammer- und Klaviermusik.

Johann Evangelist Aichinger (I)

Johann Evangelist Aichinger est le curé de la paroisse de Steyr. Il succède à Georg Armingier (1822-1884) .

Lettre de Johann Evangelist Aichinger adressée au compositeur Anton Bruckner. Elle commence par :

« Très vénérable monsieur le Docteur. »

Le pasteur promet à son cher et vieil ami de longues et apaisantes conversations autour de la fameuse table qui se trouve dans la salle-à-manger du presbytère. Ce lieu si confortable avait déjà été le témoin de tels rencontres en tête-à-tête durant les précédentes vacances estivales du compositeur.

L'année 1884 marque le décès du curé de la paroisse de Steyr, le grand amateur de musique Georg Armingier. L'événement fait tomber le rideau sur de la période initiale d'Anton Bruckner à Steyr.

Surtout entre 1885 et 1895 : Anton Bruckner adorait passer ses vacances estivales au vieux presbytère de la paroisse (« Stadtpfarrhof ») de Steyr en tant qu'invité des curés Georg Armingier (qui était aussi doyen) et Johann Evangelist Aichinger. Le copiste personnel de Bruckner à Steyr était son ami proche, Leopold Hofmeyer.

...

In later years, in Steyr, Bruckner was a welcome guest of the parish priests, Georg Armingier and Josef Aichinger.

In 1884, Georg Armingier's death marked the end of this 1st era in Steyr for Bruckner. On 1 July 1885, he wrote to Armingier's successor, Johann Evangelist Aichinger :

« If I may be so bold, I will take the liberty of asking your Reverence whether I might, in the holidays, sometimes install myself (as a paying guest, of course) in your wonderful rectory ? »

Georg Armingier, the parish priest of Steyr, organized a regular series of chamber music concerts, whose audiences included a young man, Leopold Hofmeyer, who was to play an important role in Anton Bruckner's life. Born in Steyr, in 1855, he had grown-up in the house of an instrument-maker. He regarded Bruckner, the composer and teacher, as the ultimate authority in all matters pertaining to music and he repeatedly sought his advice. Hofmeyer's most urgent need, at the time, was for a training in musical theory, as he was thinking of becoming a professional musician. At Bruckner's mention of the writings of Simon Sechter, he started-out by studying them on his own. Bruckner insisted on the importance of solid foundations, which would involve work with a « proficient instructor » ; he also counted on additional help from Armingier.

Aichinger was no unknown quantity to Bruckner since he had been parochial vicar under Armingier for many years. This letter marks the beginning of the 2nd phase of the « holiday composer » in Steyr, with its clear emphasis on creativity (8th and 9th Symphonies, « Wiener Fassung » (Vienna version) of the 1st Symphony, the revision of the « Requiem » , WAB 39, and « Helgoland » , WAB 71) .

Johann Evangelist Aichinger (II)

Le théologien, pédagogue allemand (et prêtre du monde) Johann Evangelist Aichinger est né (lors d'un tremblement de terre !) le 16 décembre 1805 en Haute-Autriche et est mort le 2 avril 1864 à Linz.

Il étudie la théologie à partir de 1828. Le 1er novembre 1829, il devient professeur à l'Institut des sourds-muets de Vienne. En octobre 1833, il est nommé directeur de l'Institut des sourds-muets de Linz et devient aussi membre du Consistoire sous l'Empire Austro-Hongrois (assemblée impériale et royale de cardinaux convoquée librement par le pape pour le conseiller, débattre de sujets concernant divers aspects de la vie de l'Église ou de l'organisation de la curie) .

Durant son règne, il réussira à renforcer et à développer l'Institution des sourds-muets. D'ailleurs, en 1846, l'on assiste à une expansion majeure dont la création d'une école pour les pensionnaires.

Aichinger devient membre du Conseil municipal de Linz de 1846 à 1861.

En 1861, il est nommé chanoine honoraire.

Aichinger a écrit un article sur la musique catholique dans le « Katholische Blätter ». On peut le consulter dans le volume 4, n° 30, du recueil de l'Association catholique centrale de Linz (« Herausgegeben vom katholischen Centralverein zu Linz ») de l'année 1864.

Affligé par les épreuves que lui a procuré la décennie 1870 à Vienne, il est pertinent de se questionner sur les motifs du départ d'Anton Bruckner de la ville de Linz alors que sa situation était relativement stable et exempte de controverses. Avec le recul, c'est à se demander s'il ne s'est pas trop plaint de ses conditions de vie.

Affecté une bonne partie de sa vie par la pauvreté, Anton Bruckner ne se sentira jamais à l'aise financièrement même lorsque sa situation se sera grandement améliorée dans les dernières années. Son insécurité morbide l'a toujours incité indistinctement à postuler pour les postes laissés vacants.

Analytic approaches to the music of Anton Bruckner : Chromatic 3rd-relations in selected late-compositions

Author : Miguel Javier Ramirez, Ph.D. Dissertation, THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO (2009) , 382 pages.

Abstract

In the works of Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) , chromatic 3rd-relations within chord progressions and tonal regions occupy an important place, and they help to expand the tonal language and enhance the expressive quality of the music. This dissertation offers a historical and analytic examination of the role played by chromatic tertian relations in several Bruckner compositions, written between 1880 and 1890. Focusing on non-functional chord progressions, symmetric divisions of the octave, and the temporary suspension of tonic centrality, the analysis takes into account local levels of harmonic syntax as well as large-scale levels of tonal organization. Given the prominence of these features in the compositions selected for examination, the study draws heavily upon neo-Riemannian transformational theories for the analysis of the music.

The dissertation is divided into 2 parts, the 1st of which presents a critical assessment of the analytic models that have been traditionally utilized in the examination of Bruckner's music, while the 2nd provides an overview of neo-Riemannian theory and applies it to the analysis of selected Bruckner compositions of the 1880's. Chapter 1 offers a « critique » of the hermeneutic perspectives that have been invoked in the analytic and critical discourse on Bruckner's « œuvre ». Given the importance of Sechterian fundamental bass for Bruckner's musical training and for his didactic activities, scholars have applied Simon Sechter's theories to the analysis of his music. Chapter 2 provides an assessment of this analytic strategy by pointing-out specific limitations of the Sechterian system for the examination of chromatic 3rd-relations in Bruckner's music. Chapter 3 addresses the challenges of traditional analytic models « vis-à-vis » Bruckner's harmonic language. Focusing on the handling of chromatic tertian relations, the Chapter discusses some of the difficulties in the application of Roman-numeral, « extended-functional », and Schenkerian approaches to the analysis of Bruckner's works. While Chapter 4 furnishes an overview of neo-Riemannian theory and a discussion of its problematic aspects, Chapter 5 is devoted to the analysis of 4 Bruckner compositions and excerpts : the Coda from the opening movement of the 6th Symphony, the Motet « Ecce sacerdos magnus », and the Adagio and Finale of the 8th Symphony.

La Vienne de Bruckner dans les années 1880

(Doctor Andrea Harrandt, Music Collection, Austrian National Library.)

During the 1880's, what changed in Vienna's cultural life ? From 1880 to 1897, Wilhelm Jahn was director of the Vienna Opera, and was then followed by Gustav Mahler. Jahn was known as a conductor before he came to Vienna. At the Opera House, he offered a wide-spread repertory and promoted works by Richard Wagner. On 4 October 1883, « Tristan und Isolde » was presented for the 1st time in Vienna, after more than 20 years of attempts to have it performed.

It was also Jahn who conducted, on 11 February 1883, 2 movements of Bruckner's 6th Symphony for the 1st time. Bruckner once wrote that Jahn « was one of my greatest admirers ». (27) Placed in the middle of the programme, Bruckner's music got the maximum attention. Eduard Hanslick wrote about an « unusual composition in which ingenious, original and even brilliant details alternate with others which are common-place and difficult to understand ». (28) On the other hand, he appreciated Bruckner also as a man of « integrity and sympathetic personality ». Max Kalbeck also confessed that :

« Bruckner would be one of our leading composers if he was able to give musical realization to his inventive powers and creative energy. » (29)

On the other hand, Kalbeck wished « to be far from the fixture which is able to enjoy such a distorted piece of music » .

The performance and reviews of the 6th Symphony overlapped with Richard Wagner's death, on 13th February, an event which shocked the Wagnerians in Vienna, as well as Bruckner himself who had lost his admired « Meister aller Meister » .

Bruckner had to wait until 1887 to hear his 5th Symphony for the 1st time. From January to April 1887, Josef Schalk worked on the 4 hand version. In March, there were great discussions at « Gause » pub-restaurant between Bruckner and Schalk because of the forthcoming performance.

On 28th March 1887, Bruckner wrote to Schalk : (30)

« I made-up my mind most firmly, yesterday, that I would most resolutely decline with thanks “ all ” performances of my works if they were not preceded by several weeks of “ thorough rehearsal ” - and, moreover, rehearsals in my presence. I ask you, therefore, to be so good as to choose something else in place of my 5th Symphony. But, if it is convenient, please tackle my 5th during April and May, and inform me of the rehearsal dates. I appeal to our long-standing friendship in asking you to comply with my wishes. »

Just 1 day before, on 27th March, « Um Mitternacht » (WAB 90) was performed by the « Wiener Männergesangverein » .

The 1st performance of the 5th Symphony, on 20th April 1887, in a 2 piano version played by Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann, was appreciated : (31)

« After hearing it for the 1st time and, in view of the conscientious, effective and excellent execution of the arrangement for 2 pianos which only anticipates the enrichment of Bruckner's orchestral sound, it remains for a later time to discuss this extremely great and courageous work whose 1st impression is extremely powerful. »

And Theodor Helm argued : (32)

« Schalk and Zottmann performed a noble and honourable task by giving us an insight into the creative mind of our inspired Bruckner. They acted as pioneers in their penetration of the intricate Symphonic textures. »

By the way : on the same day, 20th April, the Opera House performed « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » by Victor Nessler which had been a great success since its 1st Viennese performance, in May 1886. The popular German story represents the German-national movement in Vienna, and Eduard Hanslick wrote : (33)

« The most remarkable thing about this matchless successful Opera is its success. »

In his review of the performance of the 5th, Theodor Helm also considered that the time had not yet come for the Symphony to be properly appreciated in an orchestral performance : (34)

« ... But Bruckner has kept his 5th Symphony hidden away in his work-desk, giving only his most intimate friends a glimpse of the score. And now that we have heard the work, albeit only in a piano transcription, we understand why.

In no other works, perhaps, has the composer allowed his Pegasus to rush headlong and unrestrainedly through the clouds and has been so unconcerned about conventional aims and proportions and the receptive ability of normally endowed listeners. Everything is on a large, enormous scale, but it must be said that there is also a slight degree of the abnormal. This Symphony, which lasts one-and-a-half hours, provides clear evidence of both the virtues and the weaknesses of Bruckner's magnificent talent. Veritable strokes of genius, colossal climactic surges of a kind not found in the works of any other composer living today, and, cheek-by-jowl with these, a sudden break in the thread of musical thought, strange ideas which baffle the listener. »

Concerning everything we have heard before about the musical life in Vienna, we can perhaps understand what Helm thought about Bruckner and his music. Though there were some performances of the 7th Symphony in 1887, for instance in January, in Berlin ; in March, in Dresden ; in April, in Budapest ; and in May, in London, it was to take more time for the composer to be accepted in Vienna.

It was also Helm who wrote about a performance of Franz Liszt's « Faust-Symphony » , in March 1887, a concert which provoked the same negative audience response as a Symphony by Bruckner : (35)

« The time for both Masterpieces has not yet come. »

Mariazell

Dans les années 1880 : Anton Bruckner effectuera de multiples visites à Mariazell pour renouer avec son ancien élève Lorenz Ritter (Laurencius Josephus Ritter) devenu le chef d'orchestre municipal et l'organiste titulaire du « Wiener Orgel » de la Basilique. Aujourd'hui, une plaque commémorative orne la cage d'escalier du 16 de la Wiener Straße. Plus tard, Lorenz Ritter sera promu directeur musical de la ville de Veszprém, en Hongrie. Bâtie sur 5 collines, elle se compose de bâtiments Baroques, de ruelles étroites, de ponts et de quelques moulins.

Fait à noter, Franz-Joseph Haydn viendra consacrer son pèlerinage à Mariazell par l'exécution de 2 de ses Messes à la Basilique : la « Missa in honorem Cellensis Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ » Hob. XXII : 5 de 1766-1773 (connu de Anton Bruckner) et la Missa Cellensis en do majeur (dite « Mariazellermesse » ou seconde « Missa Cellensis ») , Hob. XXII : 8 de 1782.

The « Missa Cellensis in honorem Beatissimæ Virginis Mariæ » in C major by Franz-Joseph Haydn, Hob. XXII : 5, Novello 3, was originally written in 1766, after Haydn was promoted to « Kapellmeister » at Eszterháza following the death of Gregor-Joseph Werner. The original title as it appears on the only surviving fragment of Haydn's autograph score, that has been discovered around 1970 in Budapest, clearly assigns the Mass to the pilgrimage cult of Mariazell, in Styria. Until that discovery, the work was formerly known as « Missa Sanctæ Caecilïæ » , or in German Cäcilienmesse, a title probably attributed to the Mass in the 19th Century. Whether the alternative title refers to a performance of the piece by the Saint-Cecilia's Congregation, a Viennese musician's fraternity, on some Saint-Cecilia's day (22 November) , as has been suggested, remains speculation.

« Mariazellermesse » in C major (« Missa Cellensis » , Hob. XXII : 8) from 1772 : Between 1772 and 1796, Haydn composed only 2 Mass settings, neither of which was written for the Court. One of these was the « Mariazellermesse » of 1782, also known as the 2nd « Missa Cellensis » . While an inscription on the autograph manuscript, « Missa Cellensis Fatta per il Signor Liebe de Kreutzner » , tells us that the work was commissioned by retired military officer Anton Liebe de Kreutzner, the reason it was requested is not as clearly stated. One theory proposes that the « Mariazellermesse » was 1st performed at one of the celebrations commemorating Kreutzner's ennoblement, which had taken place the previous year. Kreutzner was also a member of the Viennese brotherhood responsible for services in honour of the Mariazell pilgrimages, and it is even more likely that he commissioned the piece on behalf of the group. Whatever the specific reason for its composition, the « Mariazellermesse » quickly became one of Haydn's most popular Masses. As Haydn scholar H. C. Landon explains : « It is clear that with this « Missa Cellensis » , he reached, and reached with panache and astonishing vigour, the popular style for which he had been so long and so diligently searching in his instrumental music. » . For this reason, the « Mariazellermesse » is often understood as both the precursor to Haydn's late Masses as well as the culmination of his early efforts in the genre.

One key to the « Mariazellermesse » 's popularity might be the easy way in which Haydn intermingles familiar strategies and elements of Symphonic style. The work displays many ties to tradition : Haydn wrote the work in C major, the key most commonly used in Viennese Mass settings and one he rarely used in his own. Haydn also draws on many standard procedures in the Gloria, switching between choral and solo statements (as was customary) to emphasise important phrases like « Qui tollis peccata mundi, miserere nobis » (Thou that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy on us) . The 1st part of the Credo recalls the « Große Orgelmesse » of the late- 1760's, as the choir, supported by rapid string accompaniment, proceeds through the text in an almost declamatory fashion. Haydn also uses word painting : « Crucifixus » is dramatised with gentle chromaticism, while « sepultus est » (was buried) is dramatised with low notes. The opening of the lyrical Sanctus is even based on a Marian pilgrimage song. Other features of the « Mariazellermesse » are less typical, however, particularly the way in which Haydn uses large scale form. In both the Kyrie and Credo, he creates sonata like structures by recapitulating the opening material. Also unusual is the Benedictus, which Haydn (in a rare instance of self borrowing) based on an aria from his opera « Il mondo della luna » (1777) .

It is believed that the original manuscript was lost in the Eisenstadt fire of 1768, and that when Haydn rewrote the piece from memory, he may also have expanded it. It may have originally consisted of only Kyrie and Gloria, with the other parts added later.

The Mass is scored for vocal soloists, SATB choir, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons, 2 trumpets in C, timpani, strings and organ, the latter supplying figured bass for most of the duration.

Mariazell, située dans la vallée de la Salza, est le sanctuaire Mariale le plus important des alpes styriennes, à 143 kilomètres au nord de Graz. Vers 1480, des pèlerins venus de 16 différents pays ont entrepris un pèlerinage en sa direction. La ville est fondée en 1157 par un moine nommé Magny, qui s'installe pour construire une chapelle. La région aurait auparavant été visitée par les Celtes, les Illyriens, les Romains et les Slaves.

En 1344, la ville est élevée au statut de ville marchande. En 1380, l'église Gothique de la ville est achevée. Les Turcs brûlent l'église et la ville en 1420. Un incendie majeur a eu lieu 1474 et les Turcs reviennent en 1532.

Représentations de miracles sur le petit autel (1512) et le grand autel (1519) de la Basilique par Joanneum, venu de Graz. Fortes participations de la famille Impériale des Habsbourg aux processions sur la Via Sacra en 1632. Le culte des Habsbourg pour la vierge de Mariazell de même que la persistance de la dévotion populaire ont permis au sanctuaire de fêter en 1957 son 8e Centenaire.

En 1683, on craint une nouvelle invasion turque, mais celle-ci ne se produit pas. La ville est marquée par les guerres napoléoniennes et souffre d'une famine en 1816. Mariazell est reconstruite en 1832 après un autre incendie important. Elle est investie par l'Armée rouge lors de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale. En 1948, elle reçoit officiellement le statut de ville et des travaux de restauration sont entrepris.

Anton Bruckner vu par les Viennois

Anton Bruckner, « ce hibou au cri strident », est encore sous-estimé et ridiculisé ; surtout à cause de ses conquêtes féminines infructueuses. Il est toujours en attente d'une percée en tant qu'artiste. Il est maintenant âgé de 56 ans !

4 février 1880 : Another creation in a 4 hand piano arrangement, of a Bruckner Symphony in Vienna is presented.

Once again, Hans Paumgartner and Felix Mottl played the piano parts in their own arrangement of the 2nd and 3rd movements of the 4th Symphony, in the composer's presence. As it was the 1st performance of this work, one critic expressed his desire to « hear it in full orchestral sound » so that he would be able to say more about it.

Anton Bruckner fut d'abord connu à Vienne pour son « originalité » et son aspect physique. Mais il est maintenant reconnu comme compositeur. Un article paru dans l'édition du « Deutsche Zeitung » du 4 février 1880 nous le relate :

« Toute personne qui voit errer sur la rue cet homme corpulent et triomphant, rond comme un ballon, la crâne lumineux parfaitement poli, se rappelle bien involontairement d'une poire géante sur 2 pattes. Au 1er coup d'œil, on associe ce personnage original à un parent de notre archevêque, un voyageur incognito en provenance de la cave d'un cloître, un fils ou un proche de Sainte-Cécile. Hé bien, c'est en effet ce qu'il est ! Son lien avec Sainte-Cécile ne s'arrête pas qu'à la musique ; c'est la seule femme avec qui il a des relations étroites. Sa foi profonde fait de lui un parfait catholique, un Saint immaculé ! Sur la rue, on le remarque de loin à cause de sa démarche oscillante. Lorsqu'il croise un ami, c'est comme s'il venait de découvrir une partie du monde.. Le petit chapeau rond qu'il porte lui cause d'affreux maux de tête, il doit donc se résoudre à le tenir fermement dans sa main. »

It must have hurt him deeply when children in the street ran after him making fun of his old-fashioned, provincial clothing and the large handkerchief protruding from a pocket in his short, rather baggy pants.

Un curieux personnage

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) was born the 1st of 11 children in the village Ansfelden, near Linz, Austria. His father was organist at the local church and, at the age of 4, Bruckner took organ lessons. By the age of 10, Bruckner was deputizing for his father at services. He went on to study musical theory at the age of 11. In spite of this early encouragement, Bruckner developed his skill and reputation slowly and he would be 60 before gaining acclaim with Viennese audiences. At the age of 12, following the death of his father, his mother brought him to the Monastery of Saint-Florian, which young Anton had visited from the age of 10, and begged the Prior to take Anton on as a chorister although he would be considered too old. Bruckner mastered the organ, over a span of 10 years, at the monastery, playing music for the traditional and conservative services. Decades later, he was buried in the monastery's crypt underneath the instrument he adored. At Saint-Florian, Bruckner became known for his improvisational skills on the organ. In later life, he would put these to use during a trip to England. In 1871, at the Royal Albert Hall, London, he performed 6 recitals on the newly built Henry Willis organ impressing audiences with his improvisations on the theme « God save the Queen ». In Vienna, the miasma of the Brahms and Wagner Symphonic style division choked Bruckner's aspirations for his Symphonies. Bruckner's dedication of his 3rd Symphony to his hero Richard Wagner, whom Bruckner referred to as « Master », publicly put him opposition to the Viennese musical establishment.

In 1885, 2 years after Richard Wagner's death, Bruckner memorialized him at an organ concert at the Monastery of Saint-Florian giving those present a demonstration of his improvisational Mastery. The concert was reviewed in the Linz daily newspaper :

« Bruckner's admirers arrived at the Monastery by every possible form of transport (in carriages and carts, by rail and on foot) in order to hear the sublime music which Bruckner was able to coax from the magnificent instrument. Shortly before half past 3, the Monastery chapel filled-up, and, soon, the friendly face of our dear Bruckner appeared at the organ. Bruckner gave an excellent example of one of his world-famous improvisations. Beginning quietly, continually swelling-up until it reached unexpected power, the sounds of the magnificent lamentation on the death of Siegfried from " Götterdämmerung " shook the audience. Bruckner then brought all his genius to bear in a contrapuntal reworking of the piece ; but Siegfried's Lamentation was soon joined by a new and equally sublime, solemn dirge : it was Bruckner's own funeral music from the Adagio of his 7th Symphony, which he wrote in deepest grief on the death of Wagner. Then, the heavens cleared and a lofty intermezzo in the style of Handel sang-out. This jubilant song, which followed the funeral music, was interwoven with a theme from the 8th Symphony. The " Walsungen " and " Siegfried " motifs from the " Ring " returned once again. This time, however, the grief had disappeared, and powerful singing lines resounded in all registers, rushing and rejoicing towards the end of the piece. Bruckner's artistic achievement had stirred us and lifted our spirits powerfully, and it would be hard to express in mere words our thankfulness for what he gave us. »

Stories abound regarding Bruckner's unsophisticated ways and rather bizarre appearance and how those who wanted to see and be seen received them. He was clean-shaven and he could never find a barber who could crop his white hair short enough, at a time, when that was far from fashionable ; compare this with Johannes Brahms's long hair and bushy beard. Bruckner wore curious looking clothes, which certainly made no concession to fashion. Bruckner's physician, Doctor Richard Heller, has left a vivid description of his character as reported in Karl Kobald's « In Memoriam Anton Bruckner » (1924) :

« No one who saw Bruckner could ever forget the impression made by that characteristic head, reminiscent of a cinquecento bust, in combination with his almost comical physique. The resemblance between that striking profile and the head of a Roman Emperor was strengthened by his constant refusal to wear a beard, and, by his habit of cropping his thick, white hair almost to the skull. His body was small and thick-set. His feet were shod in broad, almost rectangular sealskin ankle boots, of which he owned about 30 pairs. Above these, he wore a pair of immensely wide, bag-like trousers. His jackets were of a similar expanse and each one had its own name, so that his faithful housekeeper needed a good memory if she was always to bring the right one. One of them was called " Shaggy " because it was made of thick Loden material ; another was " the Cords " since it was made of worsted ; a 3rd was " the Dandy ", or " the Bobby ", or " Fatty " and so on. Bruckner's hats were also given names. The " Hüadal " (a little hat) was the one he usually wore, a black, broad-brimmed slouch-hat ; his Sunday hat was simply " The Hat " ; while " The Top Hat " was a collapsible Opera hat of prehistoric design, which he put on only for very special ceremonious occasions. The basic principle of his wardrobe was spacious and comfortable - which he carried to grotesque lengths. His way of living was as simple as he himself was, and anyone who saw the Master slurping-up his soup from the bowl would have thought that he was in the company of a farm-hand grown old in honourable service rather than a great composer. »

In « Jean Sibelius : His Life and Personality » (1938) , Karl Ekman details Sibelius' visit to Vienna. Sibelius recalls :

« Anton Bruckner, I never met personally. But I was present at the original performance of his Sextet. I was sitting quite close to him and had a good opportunity of observing him. A kindly little old man, who seemed rather lost in the world. He was short of stature, but disproportionately stout. The joking Viennese called him " ein Rhinoceros mit Nachtigallenkehle " (a rhinoceros with the throat of a nightingale) » (I)

In a letter written after another Bruckner performance, Sibelius shows how intensely he had enjoyed Bruckner's music :

« Yesterday, I heard Bruckner's B major Symphony (5th) and it moved me to tears. For a long time, afterwards, I was completely enraptured. What a strangely profound spirit, formed by religiousness ! And this profound religiousness, we have abolished in our own country as something no longer in harmony with our time. »

I have read a few accounts of the last day of Anton Bruckner's life (Sunday, October 11th, 1896) and the account of his memorial service and I think I like, from his 2nd Sacred Music series for the BBC, Simon Russell Beale's best. It goes something like this :

Bruckner's last day started unexceptionally well. In the morning, he worked on the Finale to the 9th Symphony. In the early afternoon, he went for a stroll in the public gardens of the Belvedere Palace. He returned to the small apartment in the palace, provided for him by the Emperor, where he died. The funeral was held at Vienna's most beautiful church the « Karlskirche » . The church was packed. When Johannes Brahms came to pay his respects an attendant assured him that yes, they could probably squeeze him in but he hesitated and then turned to leave. He was heard to mutter :

« Never mind. Soon, my coffin. »

Once, when Bruckner was asked what he might say to his God if he was required to give an account of his life here on Earth, Bruckner allegedly replied :

« I will present to him the score of some of my work and he will judge me mercifully. »

Another account of his death mentions that :

« On January 12, 1896, Bruckner heard his " Te Deum ". Its performance, in Vienna, having been recommended by no other than Brahms himself, who, at last, seems to have changed his attitude towards the man he had opposed for years. »

This was the last time Bruckner ever heard one of his own works. The very last music he listened to in public was Richard Wagner's « Liebesmahl der Apostel » . And that :

« In accordance with Bruckner's implicit wish, his remains were taken to Saint-Florian where they lie buried under the mighty organ that had been his best friend and into the golden Majesty of which he had on innumerable occasions poured the troubled confessions of his tragic life. » (The Life of Anton Bruckner, Gabriel Engel, page 25.)

(I) Despite Bruckner's bucolic appearance and Sibelius' « lost in the world » reference, he was, by all accounts, quite gregarious. In Linz, he had quite a hectic social life. He joined the Linz Choral Society, « Liedertafel Frohsinn » , as 2nd tenor but he was appointed conductor not long after. It was for them that he composed one of his settings of the « Ave Maria » text ; this one for 7 voices, unaccompanied, with a 3 part women's chorus starting followed by the 4 part men's chorus.

Février - mars 1880 : The 19 year old Gustav Mahler composes 3 Songs of a projected 5, inspired by his love for Josephine Poisl, daughter of the post-Master in his hometown of Iglau :

« Im Lenz » (In Spring) .

« Winterlied » (Winter-song) .

« Maitanz im Grünen » (May-dance in Grünen) .

« Im Lenz » quotes an entire passage from the contemporary « Das Klagende Lied » . « Maitanz im Grünen » will later be renamed « Hans und Grethe » by Mahler and included in his 1st published work, a group of 5 early Songs. It is also re-worked into a vocal quintet in Act 4 of Mahler's « Rubezahl » Opera project, and contains musical motifs which will, years later, be used in both the 1st and Scherzo movements of his 1st Symphony ; the former motif will also become the basis for the 2nd Song (« Ging heut' Morgen übers Feld ») of his « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » .

Unfortunately for Mahler, Josephine's father nips this relationship in the bud, Mahler never composes the last 2 Songs, and Josephine marries someone else soon after.

Mahler, then, resumes work on his Cantata, « Das Klagende Lied » , finishing the « Particello » (short-score) draft of « Der Spielmann » (the Minstrel) , the original Part 2, on March 21. Mahler re-enters the University of Vienna on April 1, and also begins looking for a suitable post as a conductor.

Towards the end of the school year, Mahler tires of his life as an impoverished student and, on May 12, he signs a 5 year contract with the Gustav Löwy (also spelled : Löwi, Lewy, or Levi) , who will remain Mahler's agent until 1890.

Mars 1880 : Advertisement in the « Hofmeister Monatsbericht » for the score and orchestral parts of the 3rd Symphony ; the piano arrangement is not mentioned.

10 mars 1880 : The piano arrangement of the 3rd Symphony is advertised in the « Neue Wiener Zeitschrift für Musik » , No. 17.

Avril 1880 : Josef Schalk's arrangement for piano solo of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony is advertised in the « Hofmeister Monatsbericht » , No. 83.

3 juin 1880 : Hans Rott goes to « Ober-Salmansdorf Nr. 26 » , in Vienna.

5 juin 1880 : Après une exécution réussie de sa Messe en ré mineur à Vienne, Anton Bruckner poursuit la révision de sa 4e Symphonie et l'écriture de sa 6e Symphonie. Il se rend d'abord à Saint-Florian pour amorcer ces vacances estivales. Mais victime d'une sérieuse névrose due au surmenage (dont son échec sentimental face à Marie Bartl, âgée de 17 ans) , Bruckner doit planifier un long périple hors d'Autriche, d'abord à Munich puis en Suisse dans le cadre d'une tournée organistique (Genève, Fribourg, Berne, Zürich et Lucerne) en ne manquant pas de faire escale à Oberammergau pour assister au « Jeu de la Passion » .

5 juin 1880 : The new Finale of the 4th Symphony is completed (1880 version) .

Été 1880 : Gustav Mahler accepts his 1st job as a conductor, a very minor one at the summer theater in « Hall »

(now, « Bad Hall » , in Austria) , but it is the beginning of his meteoric rise to fame as the finest Opera Director of his day. Mahler lives, during this time, in the village of « Pfarrkirchen » , just outside of Hall.

Été 1880 : The 47 year old Johannes Brahms composes his « Academic Festival Overture » for the conferment of his own honorary Ph.D. by Breslau University. This piece is based on a number of student songs that would have been familiar to those in attendance at the time.

The 50 year old Hans von Bülow gets into a quarrel with a tenor at Hanover and quits his job. Bülow, then, becomes « Hofmusikdirektor » (Court music-director) to the Duke of Meiningen, until 1885. He transforms this Orchestra into one of the most famous in Germany, forcing the players to perform from memory, and putting a big emphasis on the works of Johannes Brahms. His innovations include the introduction of the 5 string bass and the pedal timpani.

5 juillet 1880 : Bruckner achève la 2e version de la 4e Symphonie et va travailler le reste de l'année à la 6e Symphonie.

24 juillet 1880 : Hans Rott stay with his friend and patron Joseph Seemüller, in Glashütte.

Fin de juillet 1880 : The 22 year old Hans Rott completes the orchestration of his Symphony in E major (which will only become known in the 1990's) , which exerts a huge influence on Gustav Mahler, who ends-up possessing the score, and who will even quote some of it literally in his own Symphonies, after Rott is dead and forgotten.

The 15 year old Richard Strauß composes a Symphony in D minor and, also, his String Quartet in A major, Opus 2 ; his 1st piece to be published without a subsidy.

Vacances estivales en Suisse

Fin août 1880 : Anton Bruckner part en vacances. Il s'agira des plus grandes jamais entreprises : Oberammergau, Munich, puis en Suisse : Schaffhausen (Schaffhouse) , Genève, Chamonix, Lausanne, Fribourg et Lucerne. Le périple se terminera, le 11 septembre, avec quelques jours passées à Saint-Florian.

Au cours de ce voyage, Bruckner donnera plusieurs récitals d'orgue. Mais son calendrier comportera également des escales dites « académiques » à diverses universités autrichiennes.

Août - septembre 1880 : Partant de Saint-Florian, Anton Bruckner passe par Munich avant de se rendre en Suisse dans le cadre de sa tournée triomphale de concerts d'orgue données à Genève, Fribourg, Berne, Zürich et Lucerne. Il profite de ce voyage de vacances pour visiter plusieurs endroits de villégiatures suisses.

Chapelle de Guillaume Tell à Küßnacht

1er août 1880 : Anton Bruckner visite la chapelle de Guillaume Tell à Küßnacht, une commune suisse du canton de

Schwytz, sur la rive nord du lac de Lucerne.

Situé au cœur de la Suisse, le Chemin Creux (« Hohle Gasse ») qui relie Küßnacht à Immensee est un site historique important. En effet, le Chemin Creux était à l'origine un tronçon de la route Zürich - Zoug - Immensee - Küßnacht - Flüelen - Gothard (axe nord-sud) .

Selon le Livre blanc de Sarnen, Guillaume Tell y aurait abattu d'une flèche Geßler, le bailli des Habsbourg. Selon Ägidius Tschudi, une chapelle fut érigée vers 1530 en souvenir. Celle-ci fut totalement reconstruite en 1638. La chapelle de Tell, dédiée à Sainte-Marguerite, puis aux 14 Saints Auxiliaires, fut ornée en 1760 d'un tableau d'autel de Caspar Wolf. En 1905, Hans Bachmann exécuta la fresque de la mort de Geßler sur la façade et, à l'intérieur, celle de la mort de Tell. Les aménagements routiers de 1822-1823 et de 1882 (élargissement afin de faciliter l'accès à la gare d'Immensee sur la nouvelle ligne du Gothard) modifièrent fortement l'aspect des lieux. Une collecte effectuée en 1934 par des écoliers de toutes les régions de Suisse permit de créer la Fondation Suisse pour la Conservation du Chemin Creux. En 1937, le chemin fut restauré et le trafic motorisé transféré sur une route de contournement.

En 2004 et 2005, la Fondation rénova cet endroit important de la mythologie fédérale. Les chemins ont été rendus accessibles aux chaises roulantes. L'établissement d'un pavillon d'information faisait également partie de l'assainissement de ce lieu historique.

Le Chemin creux (« Hohle Gasse ») est une portion de la route historique située dans le canton de Schwytz. Situé entre Küßnacht am Rigi et Immensee, ce chemin fait partie de la route qui relie Zürich au massif du Saint-Gothard en passant par Zoug et Flüelen.

Selon le livre blanc de Sarnen, c'est sur cette route que Guillaume Tell aurait tué le bailli Hermann Geßler d'une flèche. En l'honneur de cet événement, une chapelle du souvenir appelée chapelle de Tell y est construite dès 1530. Reconstruite en 1638, elle est dédiée à Sainte-Marguerite d'Antioche. En 1905, 2 fresques y sont réalisées par Hans Bachmann, l'une à l'extérieur représentant la mort de Geßler et l'autre à l'intérieur la mort de Tell.

En 1934, une fondation est créée pour assurer la conservation du chemin, menacé par le développement routier de la région. Cette fondation prend en charge la restauration du chemin et le transfert du trafic sur une nouvelle route en 1937.

La chapelle de Tell (« Telskapelle ») est une chapelle située à Sisikon, en Suisse.

La Ire chapelle de Tell fut érigée en 1388, sur le site historique de la Tellsplatte, lieu où, selon la légende, Guillaume Tell aurait sauté du bateau du bailli Geßler pour lui échapper. Sa Ire mention dans la littérature est faite par Heinrich Brennwald au début du XVIe siècle. La chapelle actuelle a été construite entre 1879 et 1880.

La chapelle abrite 4 fresques du peintre bâlois Ernst Stückelberg décrivant 4 événements des mythes fondateurs de la Suisse, à savoir le serment du Grütli, le tir à l'arbalète, le bond de Tell et la mort de Geßler dans le Chemin creux (où une autre chapelle a été dédiée à Guillaume Tell) .

On dit qu'une Ire chapelle fut construite en 1388 au lieu où Guillaume Tell eut échappé du bateau du bailli Geßler. Les plus vieux documents qui parlent d'une chapelle la-bàs datent de 1516-1530.

La chapelle de Guillaume Tell est devenue un lieu de pèlerinage au 16e siècle. La chapelle actuelle fut construite en 1879. 4 fresques du peintre bâlois Ernst Stückelberger montrent les scènes de la légende :

Le bailli Geßler oblige Guillaume Tell à tirer avec son arbalète sur une pomme posée sur la tête de son fils.

Guillaume Tell échappe du bateau du bailli Geßler en le repoussant aux vagues.

L'attentat contre le tyran Geßler.

Le serment des confédérés suisses sur le Grütli.

Chaque vendredi suivant l'Ascension, les Uranais commémorent ce fait par un pèlerinage en bateau. Selon les autorités de la commune de Sisikon, la chapelle, représentée en blanc avec un toit rouge, figure sur les armoiries de la commune.

La « Tellsplatte » (dalle de Tell) est un lieu dit de Suisse, situé sur les berges du lac des 4 Cantons, à 3 kilomètres au sud du village de Sisikon, dans le canton d'Uri. Il s'agit du lieu où, selon le mythe, Guillaume Tell aurait sauté du bateau du bailli Geßler.

Une chapelle, lieu de pèlerinage dès le XVIe siècle, a été érigée sur ce lieu dès 1338 et consacrée à Saint-Sébastien. Elle a été remplacée par l'actuelle chapelle de Tell, construite entre 1879 et 1880. Pendant la construction de cet édifice, la dalle originale a été détruite et remplacée par une construction humaine.

Le personnage de Guillaume Tell

Guillaume Tell (Wilhelm Tell) est un héros de l'indépendance de la Suisse. Figure probablement légendaire, il aurait vécu dans le canton d'Uri au début du XIV^e siècle.

Le bailli Impérial de Schwyz et d'Uri (au service des Habsbourg, qui tentent de réaffirmer leur autorité sur la région), Hermann Geßler, fait ériger un mât surmonté de son chapeau, exigeant que les habitants le saluent comme s'il était effectivement présent. Guillaume Tell passe devant le chapeau en l'ignorant. Geßler le condamne alors à tirer un carreau d'arbalète dans une pomme posée sur la tête de son fils. Par la suite, Tell tue Geßler d'un carreau d'arbalète en plein cœur alors qu'il passait dans le Chemin creux (« Hohle Gasse ») situé entre Küßnacht am Rigi et Immensee.

Le récit a donné lieu à de nombreuses controverses historiques portant sur son authenticité. Aujourd'hui, l'histoire est plutôt tenue comme une légende dont on retrouve des éléments dans la « Gesta Danorum de Saxo Grammaticus ».

Selon le Livre blanc de Sarnen, Guillaume Tell est un ancien mercenaire, retiré dans ses montagnes et un expert dans le maniement de l'arbalète. À l'époque, l'Empereur romain germanique Albert I^{er} (un Habsbourg) cherche à dominer la région d'Uri. Le 25 juillet 1307, le bailli Hermann Geßler fait ériger un poteau sur la place des Tilleuls dans le village d'Altdorf et y accroche son chapeau, obligeant ainsi tous les habitants (sous peine de mort) à se courber devant le couvre-chef. Or, le dimanche 18 novembre 1307, Guillaume Tell passa plusieurs fois devant le poteau coiffé sans faire le geste exigé. Dénoncé, il comparait dès le lendemain devant Geßler. Mis en cause, Tell invoque alors sa simplicité, sa distraction et le fait qu'il ignorait l'importance qu'avait le geste pour le bailli.

Geßler lui ordonne alors de percer d'un carreau d'arbalète une pomme posée sur la tête de l'un de ses propres fils. En cas d'échec, l'arbalétrier sera mis à mort. Malgré ses supplications, le bailli reste intraitable. Guillaume Tell s'exécute et coupe le fruit en 2 sans toucher l'enfant.

Or, Geßler, ayant vu Tell dissimuler un second carreau sous sa chemise, lui en demande la raison. Tell prétend d'abord qu'il s'agit d'une simple habitude. Mais le bailli encourage Tell à parler sincèrement en lui garantissant la vie sauve. Tell répond alors que si le 1^{er} trait avait manqué sa cible, le second aurait été droit au cœur du bailli. Geßler fait arrêter Guillaume Tell sur le champ. On l'enchaîne et confisque son arme. On l'emmène d'abord à Flüelen, où l'on embarque pour Brunnen avant de mener le prisonnier au château du bailli à Küßnacht, où Tell doit finir ses jours dans une tour. Mais, au cours de la traversée du lac des 4 Cantons, une tempête menace la frêle embarcation.

Guillaume Tell, qui connaît le mieux la manœuvre, est chargé d'assurer la conduite de la barque jusqu'au rivage. Arrivé à proximité, il bondit à terre au lieu dit « Tellsplatte », près de Sisikon, et repousse la barque d'un coup de pied. Ce fait est commémoré dans la chapelle de Tell, dont la 1^{re} fut déjà érigée sur le site en 1388. Par la suite, Tell tue le bailli dans le Chemin creux entre Immensee et Küßnacht.

Selon Aegidius Tschudi, cet épisode se produit 2 mois avant « l'incendie des châteaux » (1^{er} janvier 1308), un autre épisode légendaire qui marque la rébellion des Suisses contre les ducs d'Autriche. Selon Tschudi, l'appréciation du tyranicide de Tell est diversement appréciée par les chefs du soulèvement.

Le récit de Tschudi connaît de nombreuses variations. Selon l'une d'entre elles, Guillaume Tell meurt noyé sur ordre de Gebler, selon une autre, c'est sur la « Tellsplatte », juste après avoir débarqué qu'il tue le bailli.

Le mythe emprunte des éléments à l'histoire et à l'imaginaire. On retrouve une légende semblable, l'histoire de Palnatoki chez « Saxo Grammaticus ». Mais selon l'historien suisse Jean-François Bergier, qui lui a consacré un livre : « Guillaume Tell est un héros dont ni moi, ni personne ne peut affirmer en toute conscience ni qu'il a véritablement existé, ni qu'il n'est qu'une figure de légende. »

La naissance littéraire du mythe est mal connue. Le Livre blanc de Sarnen, La Ballade de Tell ou La Chronique d'Etterlin datent de la fin du XVe siècle et du début du XVIe siècle et semblent être originaires des environs du lac des 4 Cantons. Tout semble donc situer le retour de Guillaume Tell d'abord dans son propre pays, où son souvenir avait été déformé, idéalisé, mais pas perdu. Mais ce retour aux sources n'est pas le fruit du hasard. Il vient rappeler à un monde alpin en plein déclin le temps des succès. Le mythe devient générateur de courage dans un moment de crise et de désillusion.

Ce mythe est bientôt annexé par les villes du bas-pays qui sont elles-mêmes partiellement responsables du déclin des régions alpines. Il est amené à assumer 2 fonctions. Une fonction de rassemblement tout d'abord dans une alliance où l'esprit confédéral est menacé par les particularismes politiques, les intérêts économiques et bientôt les divergences confessionnelles. La 2e fonction du mythe est la légitimation morale et politique de la Confédération par rapport à l'Empire dont elle fait encore formellement partie. Le mythe se porte ici au secours d'un idéal d'indépendance.

En 1565, paraît à Bâle « Les Héros de la nation allemande » de Heinrich Pantaleon (1522-1595) . Il y fait apparaître, côte à côte, Guillaume Tell et le tireur danois Toko qu'il a découvert chez « Saxo Grammaticus ». C'est à partir de ce rapprochement que naît, au XVIIIe siècle, et, surtout au XIXe siècle, le doute sur l'authenticité historique du héros national suisse. Au XVIe siècle néanmoins, le mythe triomphe que ce soit en Suisse centrale ou dans les autres cantons de la Confédération.

2 conceptions de Guillaume Tell dominant. Le peuple voit en lui un homme du peuple qui a libéré jadis le pays de l'opresseur. Les classes dirigeantes ont une vision plus politique et voient en lui un rassembleur qui met en évidence la légitimité politique de la Confédération.

Guillaume Tell a, en outre, gardé une neutralité religieuse totale durant cette longue période de querelles confessionnelles. Son image est omniprésente sur les peintures, les gravures et les autres supports. Au XVIIIe siècle, le mythe évolue, Tell devient le rassembleur des esprits, le catalyseur de l'identité nationale et l'éducateur civique. Une mission qu'il exerce durant tout le XIXe siècle et le XXe siècle.

À la fin du XVIIIe siècle, Guillaume Tell devait prendre, bien sûr, la tête du mouvement révolutionnaire en Suisse. Il est en effet l'homme du peuple, le symbole de la liberté contre l'oppression aristocratique. Les révolutionnaires français confisquent le héros : les Jacobins, par exemple, glorifient à travers Tell le tyranicide et justifient la Terreur. Il rentre donc en Suisse, en 1798, dans les bagages des armées françaises. La carrière de Tell s'internationalise avec la publication notamment du drame de Friedrich Schiller qui enrichit l'intrigue par de nombreux ajouts et lui donne une valeur universelle.

Au début du XIXe siècle, Tell est également revendiqué par divers partis politiques et mouvements sociaux, sauf sans doute les conservateurs catholiques revenus au pouvoir lors de la Restauration. En 1835, Joseph Kopp, un savant lucernois, met son érudition au service de son gouvernement « restauré ». Il tente dans un ouvrage très détaillé de mettre en cause la véracité de toutes les légendes. Guillaume Tell retrouve un rôle à sa mesure, en 1848, avec l'avènement de la Constitution et de l'État fédéral, quand se fait sentir le besoin de raffermir l'identité nationale.

Longue fut la dispute des historiens autour de Tell, de l'authenticité des gestes que la tradition lui attribue et des sources, mais ces polémiques n'ont cependant que peu touché la conscience populaire. Malgré leur érudition, les historiens n'ont pas non plus échappé aux préjugés idéologiques, politiques et culturels de leur époque.

Le doute était né au XVIIIe siècle, d'abord dans les cercles du rationalisme critique inspirés par Voltaire. Lui-même avait du reste jugé suspecte l'histoire de Guillaume Tell. En Suisse, le pasteur Freidenberg dénonce publiquement la « fable danoise » (1760), alors que le Lucernois Franz Urs Balthasar publie une Défense de Guillaume Tell qui assure le succès de sa carrière et les remerciements du gouvernement uranais.

Guillaume Tell reste cependant un héros symbole de la lutte pour la liberté : ainsi, la commune française de Château-Guillaume dans l'Indre (aujourd'hui, Lignac) change de nom pour Guillaume-Tell en 1793.

La dispute renaît au XIXe siècle à partir des mêmes arguments. Ce sont les conservateurs catholiques qui attaquent le héros ; les historiens libéraux et radicaux prennent sa défense. Entre temps, la science historique a beaucoup progressé. Influencée par le positivisme, elle rejette tout ce que les documents ne peuvent vérifier matériellement et appelle au verdict des archives. C'est avec une grande rigueur critique que Kopp par exemple tente de démontrer que rien ne permet de confirmer l'authenticité historique de Guillaume Tell. Pour nombre d'historiens de cette période, il ne s'agit que de fables et de légendes.

En tout cas, Guillaume Tell n'a cessé d'exciter les esprits. Il constitue une sorte de référence implicite, toujours présente et à laquelle les Suisses peuvent constamment se référer, encouragés en ceci par la popularité du personnage à l'étranger. Tant que l'authenticité du héros n'était pas mise en doute, le mythe gardait un caractère construit, entretenu et fonctionnel. Tell était le garant de l'indépendance, le défenseur des libertés, le rassembleur du peuple et le porte-parole de valeurs dont les Suisses étaient fiers.

Au XIXe siècle, le mythe change. Le personnage historique se trouve réduit à un personnage de légende. Guillaume Tell est désacralisé, mais la ferveur populaire reste. En 1848, la nouvelle Confédération éprouve un besoin de légitimité et d'identité. Tell devient alors le symbole d'une identité nationale ancestrale. Le mythe reste encore aujourd'hui indéradicable et les Suisses continuent de démontrer une sensibilité attentive et passionnelle envers leur héros, malgré les hésitations des historiens et l'ironie de certains intellectuels. Cela semble confirmer les propos de l'historien suisse

Louis Vuillemin : « Telle légende, accueillie par la nation et devenue partie de son existence, possède plus de valeur morale, et a acquis plus d'importance que bien des faits matériellement constatés. » .

Il n'y a pas de société qui ne procède pas, de temps à autre, à une auto-critique même lorsqu'elle est désabusée et négative, pour proposer d'autres ambitions et un autre idéal. Comme les mythes sont l'expression privilégiée de l'ancien idéal, ils deviennent inévitablement des cibles. Guillaume Tell n'y échappe bien sûr pas et surtout depuis la fin des années 1960. Le mythe paraissant néanmoins indestructible, ce n'est pas par sa négation, mais par son inversion que l'autocritique s'est faite dans la conscience nationale. La version la plus achevée peut-être du mythe inversé et aussi la plus subversive est le Guillaume Tell pour les écoles de Max Frisch.

Le « Jeu de la Passion » à Oberammergau

22-23 août 1880 : À son retour, en direction de Vienne, Anton Bruckner visita le village d'Oberammergau dans l'Ammertal, au bord de la rivière Ammer (dans le District de Garmisch-Partenkirchen, en Haute-Bavière) , dans le cadre de la représentation d'un « Jeu de la Passion du Christ » montée tous les 10 ans et d'une durée de 6 heures.

La réputation de la « Passion » se répandit rapidement et, dès 1880, le nombre de représentations fut porté à 39, ce qui permit d'atteindre le chiffre impressionnant pour l'époque de 100,000 visiteurs avec, parmi eux, l'Autrichien Anton Bruckner. Malgré sa piété bien connue, il se laissa distraire par une jolie petite Bavaroise de 17 ans qui représentait une des filles de Jérusalem. Il alla l'attendre après le spectacle et l'accompagna chez sa tante où elle logeait, s'y attardant jusqu'à 11 heures du soir. Il revint le lendemain, la demanda en mariage en lui donnant un livre de prières et une photo dédicacée avec les mots « à la très chère amie Maria Bartl » . Après une année d'échanges de lettres, les choses en restèrent là mais la jeune paysanne entra dans l'histoire de la musique puisque la plupart des biographes du compositeur retiennent l'anecdote si caractéristique de son comportement.

En 1633, en pleine guerre de 30 Ans, la peste ravage, des mois durant, la ville d'Oberammergau, faisant 84 morts parmi les habitants. Les édiles font alors le serment d'effectuer, tous les 10 ans, un « Jeu de la souffrance, de la mort et de la résurrection de Notre Seigneur Jésus-Christ » , si le « Tout-Puissant » détourne le mal de la cité. L'appel entendu, à la Pentecôte 1634, ils remplissent leur engagement pour la 1re fois, jouant la « Passion » du Christ sur une scène qu'ils installent dans le cimetière au-dessus des tombes des victimes de la peste.

...

Née en 1634 d'un vœu formulé pendant la guerre de Trente Ans à la suite d'une épidémie de peste qui avait fait 80 victimes, la « Passion » d'Oberammergau est relativement récente dans une tradition allemande des « Jeux de la Passion » qui remonte au début du XIIIe siècle. Le texte original est perdu mais une copie de 1662 en est vraisemblablement très proche car 4,000 de ses 4,902 vers proviennent de 2 « Passions » plus anciennes, dont celle de 1566 du célèbre « Meistersinger » d'Augsbourg, Sébastien Wild. Selon le vœu d'Oberammergau, les représentations devaient avoir lieu tous les 10 ans mais, à partir de 1680, elles furent fixées la 1^{re} année de chaque décennie. Des lers éléments musicaux apparaissent sous la forme de chants et de fanfares.

Différents ecclésiastiques, notamment de l'abbaye bénédictine toute proche d'Ettal, participèrent à la rédaction des textes mais, en 1750, une « Passion » entièrement nouvelle de 8,457 vers fut représentée. Intitulée « Passio Nova » ou « Les amères souffrances, la mort victorieuse et la glorieuse résurrection du fils de Dieu incarné », elle était due au moine bénédictin Ferdinand Rosner et comportait des pauses méditatives sous la forme de 7 interludes musicaux et de 3 tableaux vivants avec des références à l'Ancien Testament et une représentation allégorique du mal avec Satan, le péché, la jalousie et la mort. En 1770, toutes les représentations de « Passions » en Bavière se trouvèrent brusquement interdites par le Prince Électeur à cause des libertés ou excès de certaines d'entre elles, notamment la place réservée à l'enfer et à ses habitants ou à des mises en scène du péché plus attrayantes que celles de la vertu. Une nouvelle autorisation ne fut obtenue qu'au début de 1780 grâce à un texte modifié par un autre bénédictin d'Ettal, « Magnus » Knipfelberger, Rosner étant décédé entre-temps. Il était intitulé « Ancien et Nouveau Testament » et, selon la préface, « totalement nettoyé de tout élément choquant ou inconvenant ». Le privilège dont bénéficiait ainsi Oberammergau fut, encore une fois, retiré en septembre 1801 par Maximilian von Montgelas, un Ministre bavarois d'origine française qui sécularisa les biens religieux. Un ancien moine d'Ettal, devenu prêtre de paroisse, le père Othmar Weis, écrivit un nouveau texte en se référant à l'exégèse biblique d'un bénédictin français, Augustin Calmet, dont les œuvres, traduites en allemand, connaissaient un certain succès, mais surtout en citant habilement les publications d'un autre bénédictin, de l'abbaye de Tegernsee cette fois, Heinrich Braun, qui avait été un des instigateurs de l'interdiction de 1770. Nettoyée des aspects trop allégoriques, mythologiques ou légendaires, elle contient de nombreux tableaux vivants, accompagnés d'une musique d'un maître de l'école, compositeur non dénué de talent, puisqu'on le joue encore aujourd'hui, Rochus Dedler. La nouvelle « Passion », intitulée « Das große Opfer auf Golgotha oder Geschichte des Leidens and Sterbens Jesu », reçut directement de l'Électeur Maximilien 1^{er} devenu Roi de Bavière grâce à Napoléon, une autorisation à titre exceptionnel pour 4 représentations, en 1811. Une 5^e eut même lieu durant l'été 1815, en action de grâce pour la chute de Napoléon, présidée par l'anti-clérical Montgelas lui-même, accompagné de son gouvernement.

Après 1820, la « Passion » d'Oberammergau quitta le cimetière pour un théâtre spécialement construit au Nord du village à l'intervention du roi Louis 1^{er} et c'est là que les représentations cessèrent d'être une manifestation essentiellement locale et commencèrent à être connues dans les autres États allemands et même à l'étranger.

De 13,000 en 1830, le nombre de spectateurs passa à 45,000 en 1850. Des récits de spectateurs sont publiés par la presse ou sous forme de livres d'auteurs connus comme Guido Görres, Martin von Deutinger et, plus tard, d'une personnalité aussi en vue que Johann Nepomuk Sepp.

Devenu responsable de la « Passion » de 1850, le nouveau curé d'Oberammergau, Alois Daisenberger, était à la fois théologien, écrivain, dramaturge et historien. Il introduisit des méthodes professionnelles là où régnaient surtout la bonne volonté et la piété et il remania 2 fois le texte de Weis. Divisé en 2 parties de 4 heures chacune, le spectacle comportait 18, plus tard 16 actes et une soixantaine de scènes mais son originalité principale résidait dans 23 tableaux vivants accompagnés d'un chœur mixte de 48 chanteurs. Consacrés à des épisodes de l'Ancien Testament dans leur relation avec le Nouveau, ils réalisent, du point de vue théâtral, une sorte de synthèse du chœur de la tragédie grecque et du choral protestant. Il s'agissait aussi de montrer la duplicité du judaïsme et des Juifs comme adversaires éternels de la bonne nouvelle apportée par Jésus, sauveur de l'humanité. Daisenberger modifia cependant certaines tournures animales de Weis désignant les Juifs comme « race de Vipères » ou « tigres enragés », en leur substituant « race d'assassins » ou « sauvages enragés », ce qui ne rend pas sa « Passion » moins accusatrice pour autant. Le spectacle met, en effet, en évidence l'acharnement des Juifs à obtenir la mort du Christ et combien le christianisme vient sauver l'humanité en remplacement d'un judaïsme présenté comme légaliste et inhumain.

C'est sous cette forme que la « Passion » resta largement inchangée durant plus d'un siècle, car son antijudaïsme et son antisémitisme ne dérangent personne. Même après 1945, même après 1965 et Vatican II.

Les visiteurs d'Oberammergau

Dès le début du XIXe siècle, les visiteurs illustres se sont succédé et, parmi les Iers, Félix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, le petit-fils de la plus illustre figure du judaïsme allemand, Moïse Mendelssohn. Il assiste à la « Passion » d'Oberammergau, le 25 juillet 1830, en compagnie du biographe de Beethoven et compositeur Adolf Bernhard Marx mais, en bons baptisés luthériens, aucun des 2 ne semble avoir réagi comme juif au spectacle, malgré sa brutalité. C'est ce que fera cependant Mendelssohn, 9 mois plus tard, lorsque suivant à Rome les offices des Jeudi et Vendredi Saints, il est irrité par les cris démesurés du Pape dans son homélie, par la prière humiliante pour « les Juifs perfides » et par la cérémonie d'adoration de la Croix avec ses « Impropères » lourdement accusateurs.

Le 14 juillet 1850, la présence à Oberammergau d'Eduard Devrient, le célèbre interprète de la partie du Christ dans la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de 1829, à Berlin, est un petit événement parce que c'est un luthérien notoire qui vient visiter ce haut-lieu du catholicisme. Il va lui consacrer tout un livre très enthousiaste, « Das Passionschauspiel in Oberammergau und seine Bedeutung für die neue Zeit » (Le « Jeu de la Passion » à Oberammergau et sa signification pour les temps nouveaux) dans lequel il décrit le spectacle en détail, soulignant les convergences avec les « Passions » de Bach qu'il connaît mieux que quiconque. Il rassure ses co-religionnaires luthériens qu'Oberammergau « n'est pas un rejeton de l'ultramontanisme ni spécifiquement catholique, mais avant tout profondément biblique ». Il fait aussi le lien avec la tradition largement perdue des spectacles médiévaux, représentatifs d'une unité religieuse germanique ancestrale, ce qui le mène à une conclusion ouvertement nationaliste faisant de la « Passion », « une relique de l'ancienne Allemagne, un trésor de son esprit ». Il appelle de ses vœux « le jour où les populations des différents États allemands se sentiront à nouveau un seul peuple » et le devront, en partie, à la survivance d'Oberammergau. Il ne croyait pas si bien dire puisque ce sera chose faite, 20 ans plus tard.

Parcourant longuement l'Allemagne, durant l'été 1860, Hans Christian Andersen assiste à la « Passion », le 2 juillet, et rencontre le curé Daisenberger qui a, encore une fois, révisé le texte dans un sens plus psychologique et symbolique à la fois, mais aussi avec des éléments légendaires comme le chemin de croix ou le Juif errant. À son retour, Andersen note :

« Tout le spectacle est comme un office religieux où il n'y aurait pas seulement un sermon qu'on écoute mais le drame que l'on voit comme si on était face à la réalité. Visiblement, chacun quitte comblé et imprégné de cette âme aimante qui s'est sacrifiée pour les générations futures. »

Andersen souligne aussi plusieurs fois l'appât de l'argent qui anime Judas et les Juifs.

10 ans plus tard, un autre luthérien, Johannes Brahms, voulut également voir la « Passion » d'Oberammergau qu'il recommanda, dès le mois de mars 1870, dans une lettre à Clara Schumann, mais en juillet, les représentations furent arrêtées à la suite de la guerre franco-prussienne. Franz Liszt eut plus de chance car, venu un peu plus tôt, il put assister à un des derniers spectacles qu'il décrit dans une lettre du 28 juillet à la princesse Carolyne de Sayn-Wittgenstein :

« En tant que représentation scénique, la “ Passion ” est sans aucun doute remarquable, intéressante, curieuse et même édifiante. Certains tableaux vivants, comme ceux du miracle de la manne et de la crucifixion, réunissent plus de 100 personnages costumés et parfaitement immobiles. Un chœur qui apparaît et disparaît à différents moments de la divine tragédie, invite les spectateurs à participer plus intimement au mystère de la Rédemption. »

Liszt loue sans réserve les acteurs mais juge très sévèrement les décors (« qui conviendraient mieux à l'intérieur d'une taverne »), les faiblesses du texte et surtout, la musique « totalement insupportable » de Rochus Dedler. Il conseille même aux musiciens qui voudraient assister à une représentation « de mettre un bon paquet d'ouate dans les oreilles ». Ce sont, en fin de compte, les tableaux vivants qui, selon Liszt, représentent la partie la plus réussie du spectacle, confirmant ainsi d'autres opinions mais celles-ci prisent aussi les chœurs qui les accompagnent.

Après la victoire de la Prusse et la paix signée à Francfort, le 10 mai 1871, Oberammergau organisa 19 représentations qui reçurent la visite de couronnes royales ou princières peu amies de la France comme le prince Édouard d'Angleterre et Louis II de Bavière (dont la mère était une princesse de Prusse) pour lequel on organisa un spectacle privé supplémentaire, le 25 septembre. 2 jours plus tard, il reçut en audience les 10 principaux acteurs auxquels il donna une cuillère en argent, sauf à Judas qui reçut une cuillère en fer blanc.

Une personnalité, le célèbre explorateur et reporter anglais Richard Francis Burton, orientaliste, traducteur (en pleine époque victorienne) du « Kamasutra » et du « Jardin parfumé », était plus habitué au centre de l'Afrique ou même à la Mecque où il se rendit déguisé en arabe, qu'à un spectacle de la « Passion » au fond d'une vallée bavaroise. Il accompagnait son épouse, Isabel, fervente catholique, dans l'intention de publier leurs impressions sous le titre « Oberammergau vu par 4 yeux ». Ne trouvant pas d'éditeur, Richard Francis Burton publia ses souvenirs séparément en 1881 sous le titre, « A Glance at the “ Passion-Play ” », tandis que ceux de son épouse (« The “ Passion-Play ” at Ober-Ammergau ») ne parurent qu'en 1900, 4 ans après sa mort. Auteur très populaire, lu dans tous les milieux sauf les plus guindés, Richard Francis Burton a contribué ainsi à étendre la renommée d'Oberammergau auprès du public anglophone largement non catholique.

En 1890, 40 représentations sur une nouvelle scène, attirèrent 124,000 visiteurs parmi lesquels l'écrivain américain Henry James et George Bernard Shaw qui nous a laissé un récit pittoresque d'un spectacle suivi durant 8 heures sous une pluie battante, sans même pouvoir ouvrir un parapluie. Critique musical volontiers acerbe, Shaw n'apprécia guère la musique de Rochus Dedler qui « dans ses pires moments, emprunte le style des Messes italianisantes de Mozart et Haydn, dans les meilleurs, " La Flûte enchantée " ou " La Création " ». Il lui reproche de plates paraphrases de Louis Spohr et de Mozart, voire des « Pirates of Penzance », l'Opérette de Gilbert et Sullivan créée à Londres, l'année auparavant. Son regard sur les femmes est bien différent de celui d'Anton Bruckner, passant d'une Ire soprano « franchement quelconque » à une contralto « pas particulièrement jolie » pour finir avec une 3e « qui chante obstinément faux et est d'une laideur du diable ». À ce moment, Shaw n'est pas encore l'auteur dramatique qu'il deviendra plus tard mais il fait quelques commentaires sur le spectacle lui-même. Autant l'acteur interprétant le Christ lui paraît raide et sans chaleur (« il pense qu'être divin, c'est éviter d'être humain en étant tout simplement rien du tout »), autant les tableaux vivants lui semblent superbes. Il apprécie les acteurs qui interprètent Caïphe, Pilate et surtout Judas mais il regrette que l'on ait supprimé le diable. Finalement, « seules les dernières scènes produisent un effet saisissant ».

L'écrivain anglais Jerome K. (Klapka) Jerome qui vient de connaître le succès de « 3 hommes dans un bateau », était aussi à Oberammergau en 1890, et ce voyage va lui inspirer une narration humoristique analogue qu'il intitule « Diary of a Pilgrimage ». Bon catholique, il rapporte le spectacle de la « Passion » sans le ridiculiser. Il fait un vif éloge de sa simplicité :

« C'est un Christ qui parle aux cœurs plutôt qu'aux têtes. Il a curieusement pitié de Judas : « Pauvre Judas ! Il aimait Jésus comme tous les autres disciples l'aimaient. C'est seulement par peur de la pauvreté qu'il a trahi Jésus. Il était si pauvre, avait tant besoin d'argent. S'il avait été fortuné, il pourrait tout aussi bien être aujourd'hui Saint-Judas au lieu de Judas, le maudit. »

Parmi les visiteurs de 1900, le rabbin américain Joseph Krauskopf, horrifié de ce qu'il avait vu, le raconta dans des conférences qui prirent une ampleur telle qu'il les publia en 1901 sous la forme d'un livre de 226 pages : « A Rabbi's Impression of the Oberammergau " Passion-Play " ». Il y analyse « ce qu'Oberammergau et les évangiles enseignent », c'est-à-dire, essentiellement, les bonnes raisons de haïr les Juifs.

C'était aussi l'époque de l'affaire Dreyfus et 2 visiteurs catholiques français de renom, Maurice Blondel et Henri Brémond, s.j. se rendirent à Oberammergau, Blondel même 3 fois (1890, 1900 et 1910), lui consacrant plusieurs articles, en particulier dans « La Quinzaine » avec « La Psychologie dramatique du " Mystère de la ' Passion ' " à Oberammergau ». Il collabore aussi à la rédaction entreprise par son frère Georges Blondel d'un guide complet : « Le Drame de la " Passion " à Oberammergau », étude historique et critique avec des renseignements pratiques (1900). De son côté, le père jésuite Henri Brémond fait paraître dans la revue « Études » dont il est directeur un commentaire sur « Oberammergau et le drame de la " Passion " ». Pour Blondel, le « mystère » est à la fois « bienfaisant et fécond ». Il souligne combien « le spectateur est entraîné à participer au drame et aux sentiments qui animent les acteurs ». S'il fait bien allusion à l'approche analytique historique et scientifique des textes bibliques qui est en plein développement à cette époque, c'est pour opposer à cette perception protestante un éloge de la foi et de la simple piété qui animent le spectacle, mais aucune remarque n'est formulée sur son caractère violemment anti-judaïque ou antisémite. Brémond sera ainsi traduit, sans encombre, dans l'Allemagne nazie.

La construction à la fin du XIXe siècle d'une ligne de chemin de fer réunissant Murnau à Oberammergau et son électrification (la Ire d'Allemagne) dès 1905, facilitèrent encore l'accès des visiteurs et l'on en compta, en 1910, pas moins de 223,548, parmi lesquels John Davidson Rockefeller, le comte Ferdinand von Zeppelin, le roi Gustave V de Suède, le ministre anglais Lloyd George, Lion Feuchtwanger à ses débuts comme critique dramatique et le peintre norvégien, Olaf Gulbransson. Richard Strauß vint avec sa femme, son fils et son éditeur, mais en voisin, ayant bâti sa villa à Gannisch-Partenkirchen avec l'argent de son Opéra « Salomé » .

Retardée par la Guerre de 1914-1918, la « Passion » d'Oberammergau ne fut reprise que le 5 mai 1922, en présence du Cardinal Michæl von Faulhaber, archevêque de Munich et de Freising. Les 68 représentations connurent un succès considérable avec 317,518 billets vendus dont le tiers à des visiteurs étrangers et, parmi eux, des personnalités aussi inattendues que Sergueï Prokofiev et Giacomo Puccini. Le compositeur russe, qui avait émigré en 1918, venait de s'installer tout près d'Oberammergau, à Ettal, avec celle qui allait devenir son épouse l'année suivante. Aucun des 2 n'a laissé de commentaire. Le journal de Prokofiev mentionne bien la longueur excessive du spectacle (9 heures) ce qui en dit long de la part d'un homme impatient, habitué à regarder sa montre pour mesurer la durée de chaque chose.

Plus importante et plus enthousiaste était la présence de Eugenio Pacelli, nonce apostolique pour la Bavière avec laquelle il avait signé un 1er concordat en 1924. Il était venu de sa résidence à Munich à bord d'un « Junkers F13 » , un petit avion commercial (4 passagers seulement) , le 1er construit par l'Allemagne au lendemain de la Guerre. Il était piloté par Hans Baur, un aviateur qui deviendra célèbre une dizaine d'années plus tard comme pilote d'un personnage beaucoup moins recommandable. Le Prélat se déclara profondément touché par le spectacle poignant de la « Passion » mais se hâta pour reprendre l'avion avant l'obscurité, le pilote lui ayant proposé de faire le tour du « Zugspitze » .

D'autres visiteurs célèbres se pressèrent encore à Oberammergau, en 1930, comme le physicien Max Planck, l'écrivain indien Rabindranath Tagore et le célèbre théologien, juriste, médecin et philosophe Adolf von Hamack, mais c'était aussi l'auteur protestant mis à l'index et ex-communié pour sa critique de la tradition catholique se séparant du message de l'Évangile. Il mourut quelques jours plus tard, à Heidelberg, et certains y virent un juste châtement. Mais il avait presque 80 ans.

Le romancier et dramaturge anglais John Boynton Priestley fut passablement déçu par une nouvelle mise en scène reflétant l'évolution du théâtre contemporain :

« Ce n'est plus l'accomplissement d'un vœu par de simples paysans ni davantage une représentation théâtrale de 1er ordre. »

En revanche, Max Reinhardt admira, en professionnel, la régie non professionnelle des mouvements de la foule.

Oberammergau sous le Nazisme

Venu assister à la « Passion » en 1930, Henry Ford l'apprécia d'autant plus qu'il était l'auteur d'un pamphlet (« Der internationale Jude ») déjà traduit en allemand et cité par Adolf Hitler dans « Mein Kampf ». Enthousiasmé par le spectacle, il invita Alois Lang, qui avait si bien incarné Jésus comme victime des Juifs, à venir choisir à Munich l'automobile Ford qu'il voulait lui offrir.

Hitler vint également le 21 juillet, accompagné de sa demi-nièce de 22 ans, Geli Raubal, qui mourra dans des conditions mystérieuses, 14 mois plus tard. Josef Gœbbels nota dans son journal :

« J'étais très sceptique en m'y rendant mais je suis content de l'avoir vu, content qu'il existe de telles choses en Allemagne. On doit ramener le peuple aux sources de sa conscience raciale. Alors, il retrouvera sécurité et instinct. La scène avec Pilate donne une parfaite image des Juifs. C'est ainsi qu'ils ont toujours été et le restent jusqu'à aujourd'hui. »

Sans attendre la prochaine échéance décennale de 1940, on décida de commémorer le 3e Centenaire de la « Passion » par de nouvelles représentations en 1934, le spectacle ayant été déclaré « Reichswichtig », c'est-à-dire d'importance nationale par la propagande nazie, ce que Hitler confirmera en saluant la « Passion » comme un événement « coïncidant avec une renaissance allemande qui vient libérer la culture chrétienne de tous les bolchévismes destructeurs ». Ayant nommé un nouveau commissaire au tourisme, il le chargea de présider le Comité de la « Passion ». De magnifiques affiches destinées à l'étranger montraient une croix lumineuse au-dessus d'Oberammergau avec les paroles : « l'Allemagne vous appelle », en d'autres termes, venez voir combien les Allemands sont de bons et braves chrétiens et combien les Juifs sont leurs ennemis.

Hitler était arrivé à Oberammergau, quelques jours avant les élections du 19 août 1934 convoquées à la suite du décès du maréchal Paul von Hindenburg, et cette immersion dans la foule chrétienne et majoritairement allemande ne pouvait que rassurer l'opinion catholique après les récents assassinats du Chancelier Engelbert Dolfuss en Autriche et de quelque 200 opposants ou supposés tels, dont plusieurs dirigeants catholiques, la nuit du 30 juin 1934. Il était accompagné du « Gauleiter » de Bavière, Adolf Wagner, qui venait de doter son « Gau » d'un camp de concentration, à 120 kilomètres d'Oberammergau ; celui de Dachau.

Après le spectacle, Hitler redit combien il était important que la tradition d'Oberammergau soit poursuivie, déclarant notamment que « les 300 ans du “ Jeu de la Passion ” nous apprennent que la fidélité du sang et du sol est la force de résistance de la nation ». Selon les « Propos de table », publiés en 1953, Hitler se serait souvenu d'Oberammergau en disant, le 5 juillet 1942 :

« Le “ Jeu de la Passion ” d'Oberammergau doit continuer car jamais la menace juive n'a été montrée de façon plus convaincante que dans cette illustration de ce qui s'est passé du temps des Romains. On peut y voir à quel point Ponce Pilate est un Romain tellement supérieur par sa race et son intelligence qu'il semble être une sorte de rocher ferme et clair au milieu du pullulement de la vermine juive. »

Venu également assister à une des représentations, le Cardinal von Faulhaber, archevêque de Munich, fut tout aussi satisfait de voir le plus grand spectacle chrétien de son diocèse applaudi par tant de spectateurs dans la minuscule cité couverte de Croix gammées. L'antisémitisme ne pouvait guère le déranger car, si sa prédication avant l'arrivée ou au début du pouvoir des Nazis paraissait hostile à certains aspects de leur idéologie, c'était pour des raisons théologiques et bibliques. Aussi, lorsqu'un journal suisse présenta ses sermons comme une défense des Juifs, son secrétaire envoya aussitôt une rectification, rassurant ainsi Hitler et Goebbels : il ne s'agissait que du judaïsme et non des Juifs. Ayant détesté la République de Weimar, il mettait tous ses espoirs dans le Parti de l'ordre, de la vertu et de la moralité qu'il croyait reconnaître dans le Nazisme, malgré ses crimes évidents.

Après une visite à Berchtesgaden, le 4 novembre 1936, il avait déclaré :

« Le Führer vit incontestablement dans la Foi de Dieu et reconnaît que le christianisme a été l'architecte de la culture occidentale. »

Le Cardinal Faulhaber avait trouvé, en 1934, que la « Passion » d'Oberammergau, avec ses 23 tableaux vivants, convenait parfaitement à l'image que l'Église voulait donner des fondements d'un christianisme issu à la fois du judaïsme et de, la rupture avec celui-ci, aussi octroya-t-il au spectacle le statut de « Missio canonica », c'est-à-dire de représentant reconnu de la doctrine de l'Église. Accordée normalement aux personnes dont les qualités et vertus ont été reconnues convenir à cette fin et, évidemment, en 1er lieu, aux théologiens, cette promotion doctrinale d'un spectacle populaire issu de la piété rurale bavaroise ne, pouvait que surprendre au moment où le contexte politique amplifiait sa dimension antisémite, associant ainsi l'enseignement de l'Église à la propagande nazie. 2 visiteurs de 1934 paraissent aujourd'hui fort imprévus : Jean-Paul Sartre et Simone de Beauvoir qui note avec plus d'imagination que de précision que le hall peut contenir 20,000 spectateurs (au lieu de 5,300, en réalité) . Elle trouve le spectacle passionnant, la musique du XVIIIe siècle plaisante, les acteurs crédibles et compétents « donnant une impression de vérité qui n'a rien à voir avec le réalisme » . Pas un mot sur l'antisémitisme qui est, pourtant, une des clés de voûte du spectacle, surtout à cette époque. Ce flot d'éloges s'achève par des références à Charles Dullin (qui leur avait conseillé d'aller à Oberammergau) et à Bertolt Brecht mais le futur auteur des « Réflexions sur la question juive » qui vient de passer 1 an à l'Institut français de Berlin, semble être resté indifférent aux événements qui se déroulaient sous ses yeux.

1945-1965 : La résistance au changement

Durant l'été 1947, une 1re conférence sur les relations du christianisme avec le judaïsme et les Juifs, après ce qui s'était passé sous le Nazisme, se tint à Seelisberg, en Suisse, en présence de 70 participants dont 23 protestants et 9 catholiques, mais aucun de ceux-ci n'était mandaté par Rome où Pie XII était toujours Pape. Elle s'acheva par l'approbation de 10 résolutions sur les corrections à apporter à l'enseignement de la doctrine chrétienne. 2 d'entre elles concernaient plus spécifiquement les représentations de la « Passion » .

(7e) Éviter de présenter la « Passion » de telle manière que l'odieux de la mise à mort de Jésus retombe sur les Juifs seuls. Ce ne sont pas les Juifs qui en sont responsables. Chez des âmes simples, mues par un amour ardent et une vive compassion pour le Sauveur crucifié, l'horreur qu'ils éprouvent tout naturellement envers les persécuteurs de Jésus peut facilement tourner en une haine généralisée des Juifs de tous les temps, y compris ceux d'aujourd'hui.

(8e) Éviter de rapporter les malédictions scripturaires et le cri d'une foule excitée :

« Que son sang retombe sur nous et sur nos enfants. »

... sans rappeler que ce cri ne saurait prévaloir contre la prière infiniment plus puissante de Jésus :

« Père, pardonnez-leur car ils ne savent pas ce qu'ils font. »

Une reprise de la « Passion » d'Oberammergau ayant été autorisée par les autorités d'occupation, le Cardinal Faulhaber, toujours en place à Munich, confirma en 1949 l'octroi de la « Missio canonica » aux représentations de la « Passion », sans y associer apparemment aucune condition. C'était l'époque de la Ire crise de Berlin et la veille du conflit en Corée, le bolchévisme était toujours là, seuls les judéo-bolchéviques n'étaient plus là. L'hebdomadaire le plus répandu de cette Allemagne d'après-guerre, « Der Spiegel », consacra, le jour de la première de la « Passion », le 18 mai 1950, un long article à Oberammergau sans qu'on puisse se douter que la mort de millions de Juifs dût y changer quoi que ce soit. Effectivement, rien n'était changé. Pour présenter la « Passion » de 1950, on ré-édita le texte d'Henri Brémond déjà publié en allemand, en 1936, mais, cette fois, avec une traduction de « La Psychologie dramatique du “ Mystère de la Passion ” » de Maurice Blondel. Ces textes soulignent les vertus d'une population qui ne vit que pour ses « Passions » et la piété de ceux et celles qui sont appelés à incarner Jésus et Marie. La réalité était sensiblement différente : 60 % des habitants d'Oberammergau avaient été membres du Parti nazi mais une mini-dénazification leur avait rendu bonne conscience, au prix de quelques amendes. C'est donc sans gêne aucune qu'un ancien militant nazi, Anton Preisinger, fut choisi pour interpréter le rôle de Jésus. Il avait renversé, en 1935, la bibliothèque du seul Juif d'Oberammergau, Max-Peter Meyer, pour en extraire les livres à brûler et, après la « Nuit de Cristal », en novembre 1938, il l'avait arrêté et envoyé à Dachau. Tout cela, dans le monde chrétien bavarois, semblait sans importance.

Un autre fervent nazi, Alois Lang, qui avait interprété le Christ en 1930 et 1934, se voyait confier le rôle important du « Prologue » qui, malgré son titre, comportait des commentaires tout au long du spectacle. C'est lui qui interpelle le « peuple égaré, compteur et sans pitié » en ignorant qu'il a entre-temps été anéanti, tandis que la foule clame la parole de Matthieu (27, 25) :

« Sur nous, son sang et sur nos enfants. »

Le directeur du patrimoine artistique de Bavière eut l'idée de montrer, durant la période des représentations, la richesse du catholicisme bavarois en réunissant dans une grande exposition les œuvres d'art populaire inspirées par la « Passion » qui se trouvent dans les églises, couvents, abbayes, musées et autres lieux de la région. Pas moins de 500 œuvres furent ainsi réunies autour du « Groß Gott von Altenstadt », un Jésus crucifié de 3,20 mètres, du XIIe siècle, venant du chœur de la basilique de cette petite cité de la Bavière du Sud. Le président des services du patrimoine déclara :

« Nous devons montrer au monde l'importante contribution que la Bavière a apportée à l'histoire du christianisme. C'est une opportunité quasi politique qu'il faut saisir. »

Cette version dénazifiée de « L'Allemagne vous appelle » de 1934 eut cependant un résultat imprévu car elle mettait en évidence l'abîme qui séparait ces images de la dévotion populaire, dont les Juifs sont le plus souvent absents, du spectacle de la « Passion » accordant une place démesurée à leur démonisation caricaturale. Les sentiments qui accompagnaient la visite de l'exposition étaient en totale contradiction avec ceux brutaux qu'inspirait la « Passion ». Le « Neue Zeitung », principal journal de l'époque, soulignant le manque de dignité de la « Passion » comparativement à l'exposition, écrivit :

« La dignité du “ Groß Gott ” met la “ Passion ” en question. Est-ce le début de la fin ? »

Le « Neue Zeitung » avait été créé au début de l'occupation américaine, les autres journaux étant suspendus. Les plus grands noms de l'antnazisme y collaboraient : Heinrich Böll, Theodor W. Adorno, Heinrich et Thomas Mann, Bertolt Brecht, Erich Kästner, Anna Seghers, Rupert Gießler. Aussi, le 25 septembre 1950, quelques heures à peine après la fin de la dernière représentation, les démolisseurs et les marteaux-piqueurs étaient à pied d'œuvre pour effacer à jamais cette damnée exposition qui avait, par sa seule présence, ébranlé la légitimité d'un spectacle qui rapportait tant de succès, tant d'argent et rappelait si bien le passé.

Lors de la première, 5 mois plus tôt, en présence des hauts-commissaires américain, anglais et français ainsi que du président Theodor Heuß et du Chancelier Konrad Adenauer, seul celui-ci avait trouvé certaines scènes anti-juives excessives et avait commenté :

« Das war zuviel. » (C'était de trop.)

Cela le restera malheureusement longtemps, puisque ce n'est que 50 ans plus tard, le 17 avril 2000, que l'hebdomadaire à grand-tirage, « Der Spiegel », saluera la première d'une « Passion » nouvelle mettant enfin un terme à l'« enseignement du mépris », appelé « Missio canonica », et offert à des millions de spectateurs convaincus d'avoir participé ainsi à un acte de dévotion et de piété.

Les 93 représentations de 1960 restèrent donc pratiquement identiques à celles de 1950 ; c'était toujours Anton Preisinger qui tenait le rôle de Jésus. Le problème de l'antisémitisme avait cependant été soulevé, en particulier aux États-Unis, car depuis qu'Oberammergau avait été rendu directement accessible par chemin de fer en 1899, le public américain n'avait fait qu'augmenter, comportant également des spectateurs d'origine juive qui ne pouvaient qu'être choqués par ce qu'ils voyaient, surtout après 1945. En 1962, le maire d'Oberammergau, Baimund Lang, convoqua un Comité présidé par le secrétaire-général de l'Académie bavaroise des Beaux-arts, le Docteur Clemens Comte Podewil. Également invité, le compositeur Carl Orff qui vivait à Andechs, près du monastère d' Ettal, proposa de mettre en musique la « Passio nova » de Ferdinand Rosner, un très long texte (8,500 lignes) qui avait été joué quelquefois à partir de 1750 avant d'être remplacé, en 1811, par la « Passion » d'Othmar Weis, mais aucune décision ne fut prise, une forte résistance à tout changement étant exprimée par la population et les acteurs des principaux rôles.

Le concile de Vatican II et la déclaration « Nostra Ætate » , promulguée le 28 octobre 1965 par le Pape Paul VI, apportèrent une soudaine actualité au problème de l'antisémitisme, la hiérarchie religieuse étant appelée à intervenir dans un problème qu'elle avait pu éviter jusqu'alors.

...

Since 1634, the Oberammergau « Passion-Play » is performed as a tradition by the inhabitants of the village of Oberammergau, in Upper-Bavaria. It was written by Othmar Weis, Josef Alois Daisenberger, Otto Huber, Christian Stuckl, Rochus Dedler, Eugen Papst, Marcus Zwink, Ingrid H. Shafer, and the inhabitants of Oberammergau, with music by Rochus Dedler. Since its 1st production, it has been performed on open-air stages in the village. The text of the « Play » is a composite of 4 distinct manuscripts dating from the 15th and 16th Centuries.

The « Play » consists in the staging of Jesus' « Passion » , covering the short final period of his life from his visit to Jerusalem and leading to his execution by crucifixion. It has been criticized as being anti-Semitic, but it is the earliest continuous survivor of the age of Christian drama.

In 1633, the residents of Oberammergau vowed that if God spared them from the effects of the bubonic plague ravaging the region, they would produce a play thereafter for all time depicting the life and death of Jesus. The death rate among adults rose from one person per 1,000 per year, in October 1632, to 20 in the month of March 1633. The adult death rate slowly subsided to 1 in the month of July 1633. The villagers believed they were spared after they kept their part of the vow when the « Play » was 1st performed, in 1634. Word spread throughout the region about the « Play » , and it became too expensive to perform every year, so the town decided that every 10 years would be sufficient.

The « Play » is now performed repeatedly over the course of 5 months during every year ending with a zero. 102 performances took place from 15 May until 3 October 2010 and is next scheduled for 2020. The production involves over 2,000 performers, musicians and stage technicians, all residents of the village. The « Play » comprises spoken dramatic text, musical and choral accompaniment and « tableaux vivants » which are scenes from the Old Testament depicted for the audience by motionless actors accompanied by verbal description. These scenes are the basis for the typology, the inter-relationship between the Old and New Testaments, of the « Play » . They include a scene of King Ahasuerus rejecting Vashti in favour of Esther, the brothers selling Joseph into slavery in Egypt, and Moses raising-up the « Nehushtan » (bronze serpent) in the wilderness. Each scene precedes that section of the « Play » that is considered to be prefigured by the scene. The 3 « tableaux » mentioned are presented to the audience as prefiguring Christianity superseding Judaism, Judas selling information on the location of Jesus, and the crucifixion of Jesus.

The evolution of the « Passion-Play » was about the same as that of the « Easter-Play » , originating in the ritual of the Latin Church, which prescribes, among other things, that the Gospel on Good Friday should be sung in parts divided among various persons.

Plot Synopsis

Prelude - The prologue and chorus greet the audience. 2 « tableaux » are presented. In the 1st, Adam and Eve, wearing sheepskins are banished from the Garden of Eden by a winged angel who holds a sword in the form of a flame. Behind the angel stands a burst of gilded rays symbolizing the tree of forbidden fruit. The 2nd living picture traditionally showed a number of girls and smaller children surrounding a cross at center stage. The adoration represents the time, in 1633, when villagers swore their vow before a huge crucifix bearing a 12 foot high Jesus.

Act 1 : Jesus and the Money Changers - Jesus enters Jerusalem atop a donkey to the shouts and exultation's of the people on Palm Sunday. He drives the money changers and traders from the Temple then returns to Bethany.

Act 2 : Conspiracy of the High Council - In the past, this Act began with a « tableau » showing the sons of the patriarch Jacob conspiring to kill Joseph in the Plain of Dothan ; the frieze was deleted from the 1980 presentation. The Act consists of discussions between the traders and Sanhedrin, who agree that Jesus must be arrested to preserve Mosaic law.

Act 3 : Parting at Bethany - 2 « tableaux » presage the action. In the 1st, the young Tobias departs from his parents while the angel Raphael, played by another boy, waits, crook in hand, stage left. In the 2nd, the loving bridesmaid from the Song of Solomon laments the loss of her groom. In the play, Christ is anointed by Mary Magdalene, then takes leave of his mother and friends. Judas is angered by the waste of the spikenard oil.

Act 4 : The Last Journey to Jerusalem - A controversial « tableau » (now deleted) showed Queen Vashti dishonored at the Court of King Ahasuerus. The old queen (Judaism, explains the Prologue) has been displaced by Esther (Christianity) . Jesus sends 2 disciples to secure a Paschal lamb. He enters Jerusalem for the last time and weeps over the fate of the city. Judas contemplates betraying his Master and is tempted by Dathan and other merchants.

Act 5 : The Last Supper - The Passover Seder (or Last Supper) is celebrated in a scene evocative of the famous Leonardo Da Vinci painting. Jesus washes the feet of his disciples and institutes the Mass with wine and thick, brown, leavened bread. 2 « tableaux » show Moses (with rays or horns protruding from his head) , bringing manna and grapes to the people in the wilderness.

Act 6 : The Betrayer - In a « tableau » , Joseph (a boy nude to the waist) is sold by his brothers to the Midianites for 20 pieces of silver. In accompanying action, Judas appears before the Sanhedrin and promises to deliver Jesus for 30 pieces of silver. After his departure, the Pharisees plan at great length the death of Jesus.

Act 7 : Jesus at the Mount of Olives - 2 more Old Testament scenes introduce the soliloquy of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane. The 1st, a « non-sequitur » , which we are told explains that man must earn his food by the sweat of his brow, shows Adam, in sheepskin and assisted by a brood of similarly attired children, drawing a plow across a field. The 2nd freeze more appropriately offers a helmeted Job, surrounded by soldiers stabbing an unsuspecting Amasa in the ribs. Christ agonizes over his fate while his apostles doze. Judas enters with an armed band and betrays Jesus with a kiss.

Act 8 : Jesus before Annas - The Old Testament parallel has Micah slapped on the cheek by Zedekiah, priest of Baal, for daring to predict King Ahab would die in battle. In like manner, Jesus is taken before a waiting, eager Annas and is struck on the face for his insolence. Soldiers also deride Christ as he is led through the streets by a rope.

Act 9 : Condemned by the High Council - 2 more « tableaux » emphasize the humiliation of Christ. In one, the aged Naboth is condemned by false witnesses and is stoned to death by the sons of Jezebel. In the other, Job, sitting atop a dunghill is railed at by his friends, servants, even his wife and children. Meanwhile, Jesus is questioned by Caiaphas about his Messiah-ship and is condemned. A tortured Judas tries to get the Sanhedrin to repeal its verdict. When his efforts prove unsuccessful, he tosses the money back at them and storms off.

Act 10 : Despair of Judas - Judas and all who identify with him are linked with Cain in the opening « tableau » . The battered body of Abel appears at center stage. To the right is Cain, clad in a leopard skin and holding a club in one hand. His other hand is at his brow, attempting to conceal the brand of God. In this short Act, Judas offers a speech of remorse then hangs himself.

Act 11 : Christ before Pilate - Originally, there was a freeze which heralded Christ's 1st appearance before Pilate. The « tableau » of Daniel in the great pillared hall of Darius was deleted from later 20th Century productions. Pilate's interrogation, coupled with news of his wife's dream, convinces the governor that Jesus should be prosecuted by Herod Antipas for lese majesty.

Act 12 : Christ Before Herod - The scene stands without the original living picture which showed a blinded Samson mocked by the Philistines. Herod treats Christ with scorn, demanding a miracle, then sends him back to Pilate, cloaked in a red mantle of royalty. Responding to the urging of the Sanhedrin, Pilate reluctantly agrees to have Jesus scourged. Roman guards beat Jesus and press a crown of thorns into his scalp.

Act 13 : Christ Sentenced to Death on the Cross - 2 graphic pictures showing the presentation of Joseph's bloodied coat to Jacob, and Abraham about to stab Isaac on Mount Moriah have been rejected from contemporary versions of the « Passion » . Retained, however, are « tableaux » which show Joseph riding a sedan chair as vizir of Egypt and another which supposedly represents the scapegoat offering of Yom Kippur. Following the « tableaux » , the stage is swarming with action as priests and Pharisees bring mobs from every direction. Pilate gives Jesus another hearing then offers the people a choice between Jesus and Barabbas. They demand and receive a final judgement on Christ.

Act 14 : The Way of the Cross - The final segment of the « Passion » is introduced by a more sublime image of the Akedah, or binding of Isaac. In this « tableau » , the boy, like Jesus, carries wood on his back as he and Abraham climb Mount Moriah. Another freeze, showing Moses and a bronze serpent intertwined about the cross has been deleted. When the chorus withdraws from the stage, Christ bears his cross to Golgotha. As he passes through the streets, he encounters his mother, Veronica, and Simon of Cyrene. The women of Jerusalem weep for him.

Act 15 : Jesus on Calvary - For the 1st time, the chorus appears in black traditional mourning garb. There is no « tableau » . He is mocked by members of the Sanhedrin and the soldiers and utters his last words. The legs of the criminals are broken. A soldier pierces the side of Christ with a lance and blood gushes forth. Jesus' followers slowly and reverently take down the body and lay it before his mother in a replica of the Pieta. The Sanhedrin insists that guards be posted before the tomb which is to hold Christ's body.

Act 16 : Resurrection and Apotheosis - For the 1st time, action precedes a « tableau » . Roman guards see a light at the tomb. Mary Magdalene and the other women encounter an angel and recite the same lines as Quem Quaeritis. The final « tableau » shows Jesus resplendent in white with his apostles, angels, the Virgin Mary, and Moses. The « Passion » ends with a proclamation by the chorus.

Length and frequency

The Oberammergau production takes place in 1 day, but the running time has varied due to the many revisions that have taken place through the years. In 2010, it had a running time of 5 hours, beginning at 2:30 pm and ending at 10:00 pm, with a meal break. It was staged a total of 102 days and ran from May 15 until October 3 that year. According to a record from 1930, the « Play » then had running time of approximately 7 hours. It started at 8:00 am and ended at 5:00 pm with a meal break. Audiences come from all over the world, often on package tours, the 1st instituted in 1870. Admission fees were 1st charged in 1790. Since 1930, the number of visitors has ranged from 420,000 to 530,000. Most tickets are sold as part of a package with 1 or 2 nights' accommodation.

The « Play » continues to be staged every 10 years, in the final year of each decade - that is, the year whose numeral ends with a zero ; hence, the next performances will be in 2020. However, these regular performances at 10-year intervals have been punctuated with additional performances such as those of 1934 (over and above the regular 1930 schedule) to commemorate the 300-year anniversary of the original vow and, again, in 1984 (over and above the regular performances of 1980 and 1990) in celebration of the 350th anniversary of the 1st performance.

Cancellations

There were at least 2 years in which the scheduled performance did not take place, and one that was post-poned for 2 years :

In 1770, Oberammergau was informed that all « Passion-Plays » in Bavaria had been banned by order of the Ecclesiastical Council of the Elector, Maximilian Joseph, at the behest of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1780, the « Play » was retitled « The Old and New Testament » . The new Elector, Charles Theodore, having been assured that the « Play » was « purged of all objectionable and unseemly matter » approved the performance of the « Play » . By 1830, the Catholic Church succeeded in halting the performance of all other « Passion-Plays » , in Bavaria. Only Oberammergau remained.

The performance scheduled for 1920 was postponed to 1922 due to the economic and political tumult following the First World War.

In 1940, World War II forced the cancellation of the year's scheduled performance not to resume until 1950 (and only after obtaining permission from the American Occupation Authorities) .

The Theater

Oberammergau's original parish church proved to be far too small for performances of the « Passion-Play » , so it was decided to hold the « Play » in the graveyard of the church, before the graves of the villagers who had died in the plague.

The fame of the « Play » must have spread quickly to the surrounding towns and villages for as early as 1674. Records show that seats were to be provided for the audience.

Over the following years, sets and stage mechanics were added to the simple wooden stage structure. By the middle of the 18th Century, it was obvious that the graveyard was also too small and a new venue was found on a field close by; however, the stage had to be specially built every year of the « Play » .

The 1st permanent stage seems to have been built in 1815 to a design by the then-local parish priest. In 1830, he was asked to help build a new, larger stage on the site of the present theatre. When it rained, the audience got wet : umbrellas would have obscured the view of people sitting behind them.

However, in 1890, a new, purpose-built theatre was built and, apart from some of the scenes on the side of the stage, it would have looked much as it does today. It was ready in time for the 1900 performance, with the 6 arched hall capable of holding over 4,000 spectators.

The theatre was enlarged in time for the 1930 and 1934 seasons and, whilst it was considered ugly and uncomfortable, it was praised for its superb acoustics and sight of the stage.

Oberammergau is a « Mysterium » . But the facts, which constitute the « Passion-Play » , are still strangely enough. The origin and the further development of the « Passion-Play » are a part of German history, in political and in artistic regard. This is reflected in the text versions of the « Passion » and, in addition, in the changes of the scenery, the costumes, the music, theatre architecture and the fellow players.

The Oberammergau « Passion-Play » was 1st performed in 1634 and is the result of a vow made by the inhabitants of the village that if God spared them from the effects of the bubonic plague then sweeping the region they would perform a « Passion-Play » every 10 years. The « Play » is now performed in years ending with a zero, as well as in 1934 which was the 300th anniversary and 1984 which was the 350th anniversary (though the 1940 performance was cancelled because of the intervention of the Second World War) . It involves over 2,000 actors, singers, instrumentalists and technicians, all residents of the village.

The Beginning

According to village chronicle from the year 1859, the « Passion-Play » is based on the vow of the « Oberammergauer » in the year 1633, when the plague in the place prevailed :

« In the large disappointment, which had brought the terrible illness over the municipality, finally the superiors of the municipality, the 6 and 12, met and the vow was made to hold the passion tragedy every 10 years and, from this time on, not one more humans died, although still some had the plague characters. »

Contrary to most other Passion Plays, the political municipality was carrier of the Plays, since the vow was already originally carried-out by the chiefs of the municipality. When the plague yielded, they redeemed their promise :

« This probably did not insert the representation of Passion into Oberammergau as new, but did make the regular performance of the same after 10 years each to a duty of the municipality. »

1634 as thanks to God for the rescue the 1st « Passion-Play » was presented by 60 to 70 actors on the cemetery beside the church. The original version of the text of the « Oberammergauer » « Passion-Play » is not delivered. The 1st received libretto originates from the year 1662. The libretto contains the reference, « is wiederumb renoviert » (is renovated) , which permits, on the one hand, the conclusion that it was played since 1634 in this version and only the paper was freted already so it had to be put down again or, on the other hand, this could mean that the text is adapted.

This text, which covers 4,902 verses, is not a new creation, but a compilation from the « Augsburgur Passionsspiel » (2nd half of the 15th Century) , and a reformatory « Passion-Play » of the « Augsburgur Meistersingers » Sebastian Wild. The connection of these 2 texts was proven in a « Carintien » Passion and, in a « Chiemgauer » passion, those were played around the year 1600 and to those the « Oberammergauer » referred to. The 3rd source are probably either a lost or, yet, not proven « Passion-Play » . Maybe it is an older « Oberammergauer » « Resurrection-Play ».

For the 5th repetition of the vow, in the year 1674, they added scenes from the « Weilheimer » « Passion » from the years 1600 and 1615, to the « Oberammergauer » « Play » . Thus, for the 1st time, the devil came into the « Play » , and the figure of the « soul » . For the 1st time also, musical organization is noted in the libretto : « 11 times, they sang ; 10 times, the occurrence of the authority is marked by drums » .

The 6th Passion year was already 6 years later. The passion « was demonstrated in the year 1680 to the Christian people, and, from then on, it remained on the decimals number » . Why is unknown.

The libretto of the Passion of 1720 shows a stage in the style of the time, with large portal and curtain, which permit covered stage changes and which auditorium separates clearly from the stage. In addition, the text version experienced a structuring in Acts and Scenes. Also, language and rhymes were adapted to the style of time. In 1730, beside Satan, additional representatives of hell as allegoric figures of envy, avarice, sin and death were added to the « Play ». The stylistic device of stopping action too living pictures, traditionally to serve Meditation, was also extended.

The Baroque Period

In 1750, the « Oberammergauer » « Passion-Play » was completely recreated and reaches with it its literary zenith. Ferdinand Rosner, « poeta doctus » and professor of the rhetoric at the Academy of Knight's created the « Passio Nova » with the title, « Bitter suffering, winning death and glorious resurrection of the confirmed son of God father introduced to the congregation ». Nearly at the same time, the Epos « Der Messiahs » by Klopstock's was published. Literally, the new Passion is of equal value to Klopstock's Opus. This Passion corresponded stylistically, as well as formally, to the artistic claims and the attitude to life of the Baroque period. The plot, which is based on the New Testament, is subdivided into 9 Acts ; all of them are instigated by a « living picture » .

This form of pictures Rosner adopted from the old Passion and developed them into 18 pre-figurations. With these living pictures, situations were taken from the Old Testament. He creates more than 90 roles which arise partly logically from the New Testament. The figure of the devil and to this provided the allegorical figures of the vice, the stinginess, the envy, the death, the desperation and the sin, he adopts from the old « Play » , however, in contrast to prior, he now let them directly intervene into the « Play » .

Possibly inspired by the « Weilheimer » Passion, Rosner adds to his play a protective mind, the « Genius Passionis » which is accompanied of 6 other protective minds. This group, which is in opposite to the diabolical powers, forms the origin of the today's big choir.

Rosner has written the dialogs as well as chanted texts into cadenced language. These arias and recitatives, whose music has got lost, corresponded to the Italian Opera taste of the time. All in all, the text encloses 8,455 verses. « Oberammergau, up to now only 1 « Passion-Play » under many, became the model for other Passion Plays, for example : Tölz, Freising, Dachau, Kiefersfelden, Oberaudorf, Thiersee and Erl.

Classical and Romantic Periods

In 1830 and 1839, the local government of Oberammergau asked at the government of Upper-Bavaria for the occupation of the vicarage by Josef Alois Daisenberger without success. Finally, in June 1845, Daisenberger was moved from Uffing, where he was since 1832, to Oberammergau. If the 3rd petition was the reason for this success is not sure. The « Oberammergauer » define in it their expectations on Daisenberger quite clearly :

« He will act beneficial as excellent teacher for our children, with his artistic sense on our industry, with apprenticeship and example on our spiritual welfare, and with right dignity on the “ Passion-Play ”. »

Alois Daisenberger was born in 1799, in Oberau, which lies only few kilometres from the cloister of Ettal and also from Oberammergau. From 1804, he visited the lessons with father Otmar Weiss. In October 1812, he inscribed into the High-School of the Royal Netherlands Institute, in Munich, which he concluded in summer 1816. From 1817 to 1820, Daisenberger studied at the Landshuter University, which was strongly influenced by the most stamping figure Johann Michaël Sailer. From 1820, he taught the children in his home-town. In October 1821, he gets the ordination of priests. The « Primiz » Mass took place in Oberau ; father Othmar Weis held the sermon and Rochus Dedler composed the Mass. After different stations in different municipalities in Bavaria, in 1845, he finally achieved his purpose.

« Since my youth, I had a special predilection for Oberammergau. As a child, every year, I fully of longing looked forward to the " Kirchweihe " of Oberammergau ; as a studying youth, I experienced there very pleasant hours ; in my 1st priest's years, it was the last purpose of my wishes in respect on the place of my work : " to become a priest in Oberammergau ". »

The people of Oberammergau entrust him with the direction of the « Passion-Play » and the revision of the text. In 1850, the revision was limited only to cancelations and low linguistic changes.

In 1850, starts a cultural-historical adoption strongly influenced by Martin Deutinger and by the director and theatrical historian Eduard Devrient which sees Oberammergau as a national inheritance of idealised Middle-Ages. At the same time also, critics in artistic regard were being raised. Also, the government of Bavaria demands a treatment of the text. On 21 December 1858, Priest Daisenberger announced to the government that the draught of the passion for 1860 was finished.

The treatment of the passion, in 1860, was strongly stamped by the Classical tragedy and used like these antique elements. Instead of the actualisation, he placed general validity ; instead of realism, he placed sublimity and idealisation ; instead of the political elements, he placed psychological elements. Bound to the spirit of the times of the Romanticism, Daisenberger inserted legendary scenes to the play again : works with a pictorial language, and interprets the Passion drama as a fight between light and darkness. Daisenberger juggles in nearly post-modern manner with literary figures and style elements. He utilizes irony, which was very much popular in the Romanticism. So, he allows to pronounce the opponents of Jesus, over and over again, Christian truth which mean this, actually, in the reverse sense, as for example :

« Only by the death of Jesus of Nazareth, the people of Israel can be saved. » or ...

« His death is our welfare. »

Daisenberger shapes the opponents of Jesus with the character of the followers of Jesus. For example, the High priest Annas becomes like the old men Simeon who sees the long expected Messiah. But Annas' words refer on the luck to see the High-Council united against the enemy Jesus. Daisenberger get inspiration from Gœthe's « Faust » to the desperation scene of Judas after the betrayal of Jesus.

The meeting of Maria and Jesus at the cross Daisenberger creates in the antique form of the Anagnorisis. In the prologues, he reaches to alkäic and sapphic strophic forms.

The construction of the « Passion-Play » shows a contentswise symmetry. The 1st part begins with the crowded scene « Marching in Jerusalem » where everyone is praising Jesus, and leads us up to loneliness in the Mount of Olives and, therefore, the loss of all friends. The 2nd part is stamped by an increase of the enemies of Jesus, up to the scene where the people of Pilatus demand the crucifixion of Jesus. In the middle of these both parts lies the axis of the loneliness. The 3rd part shows the rise of Jesus and, therefore, his independence of the people.

For the Passion Plays, in 1870, Daisenberger tries to give a finally closed form to the « Passion-Play », while he catches the text in German blank verse and writes to the living pictures new prologues in the form of antique ode. However, this whole composition for unknown reasons was never performed. Nevertheless, since that time, the « Play » is called Daisenberger Passion, without consideration of the « Weiss'schen » source material. Otto Huber has proved that, in the version of 1860, still about half of the text were taken-over partly literally, partly basically from Weis.

Daisenberger's work is less those of an artist, rather those of a knowing craftsman :

« I feel that it was a venture exceeding my weak forces to treat the Holy Drama, this legacy of old-German devoutness, because I'm lacking the deeper understanding of the dramatic art, as well as the kind of my education which fell in the clarification period was not in addition provided to maintain that deeply dearly devout sense of the German ancestors in me. Still, this sense was laid in me in my father's house.

However, I do not have imposed myself, I took over the work because it was arranged by authority and no one else was found, with the best wills, in love to my divine Redeemer and in view of a purpose : " the edification of the Christian people ". »

Daisenberger's merit was to form the Passion up-to-date, but the ideas on which the treatment was based had already become outdated. This can be led back, on one hand, on a delay of the South German and Austrian literature in general and, on the other hand, specific limping behind of Oberammergau.

Turn of the 20th Century

The turn of the 20th Century becomes for Oberammergau, in the relation of an advancement of the text, the starting point of a stagnation, more or less lasting till this day, although this text already does not seem to be preserved-worth, at that time. The government of Upper-Bavaria demands for the Passion, in 1890, a reform of the text to lift « the old cultural-historical play on the height of the time and to preserve from a possible fiasco ». In 1886, the government appoints a board, lead by Doctor Johann N. Sepps P. H. (who wrote an important review in 1850) to scrutinize the « Oberammergauer » Passion Plays. This board found the text bad. So, the government suggested to instruct « Geier Wally » - author Wilhelmine von Hillern or ecclesiastical council Carl Etmayer with treatments what is likewise rejected by the « Oberammergauern » . Instead of a revised version, the mutilation of the version of priest Daisenberger begins already in 1890. In 1900, the municipality of Oberammergau region publishes, for the 1st time, a « Offizielles libretto » which the entire text contain. Indeed, not the original text, but the just topical play text. This leads to the fact that the « Daisenberger text defended over and over again » is unknown itself to most « Oberammergauern » till this day. Although there are, as already mentioned, voices which demand an advancement of the text, the voices which suggest « preserve ! » become always louder. Released by the 1st reviews, in particular in 1850, from Martin Deutinger and Eduard Devrient who sees a « valuable relic of early Germany » and « Hort of the German national mind » in the Passion Plays, upper bunting region becomes the myth. The central idea of this myth is the « erfolgreichen struggle around preservation of the own, an identity saved against all menaces » . In 1840-1850, encloses a choice of criticism through upper bunting region already 500 sides.

Till 1900, the number of the newspaper reports has grown in the uncountable. In a bibliography with regard to upper bunting region, only 150 titles are performed about 1900. Beside different forms of documentations also some fictional stories. Under it, also, the best-seller « Der man God boobs of upper bunting region » from Ludwig Ganghofer and from the church on the index sedately « " Am cross ". A Passion novel from upper bunting region » from after upper bunting region there moved « Hermine » of Hillern. In Paris, a story « le Judas d'Oberammergau » from Otto de Schachings appears in 1900 to « the artistic ones and the customs of the fathers to loyal Oberammergauern » Ludwig II let in the colossal crucifixion group chisel which he gives to the « Oberammergauern » , in 1876, in appreciation of the special image given to him of the Passion Plays in 1871. With it, he chisels the leitmotiv which haunts in many heads with regard to upper bunting region in stone.

The turn of the Century is a time of the social and political layout, everything seems threatened. Upper bunting region becomes the symbol of the fight against the setting of the old order. Accordingly, the company list of the Passion Plays of 1900 and 1910 reads, in the eve of the 1st World War : the oil magnate John Davidson Rockefeller, architect August Eiffel, count Zeppelin, Ernst von Possart (director of the Munich Court stage) , Opera singer Adelina Patti, the conductor Felix Mottl. An immense number assembles in upper bunting region, once again, almost all representatives of the European nobility, but also in bishops from all over the world.

The attraction of upper bunting region exercises not only on « Who's who » . Especially for the Americans, upper bunting region became a « Neben myth » , as a substitute to her breaking self-image from the « real New World in which one can throw-off the trammels of the Old and rise to one's full stature of an one » . The dream of moral superiority of America is destroyed by around reaching corruption in the public life more and more. Upper bunting region appears towards the healthy mountain village. The place in request « of humanly perfection : the possibility of life lived with maximum wiseness, happiness, and intensity ; Oberammergau thus came to represent, in a certain way, the idea of a divinely granted 2nd chance for the humanly race » in the course of the world-wide « Vereinnahmung » .

In the upper-bunting region, the most different stereotypes are produced. A very typical one is the fact that rural people created the « Passion-Play » from the religious strength of public feeling. Besides, it overlooked the « Oberammergauer » life of the bourgeois majority who was thrown down because the pre-alpine area has not enough yield and, also, because the upper bunting region has been, traditionally, a boob's village for hundreds of years. The Passion Plays are not the « Play » of the people but the « Play » of renowned authors.

In 1900, a reviewer said :

« The tradition, in the very 1st line, lends value and character to the “ Oberammergauer ” “ Play ”. At the moment, the whole “ Play ” is in extreme danger. »

The reviewer probably grasps the mood with regard to upper bunting region and with regard to the situation in the entire Germany.

Inter-War Period

Due to post-War confusions and the economic problems resulting from it, the « Passion-Play » of 1920 had to be cancelled and can not be retrieved until 1922. Despite a bullish mood and the feeling of a new beginning in Germany, and also in Oberammergau, the struggling for a revised text version of the « Passion-Play » does not succeed. Maybe it's because the newly voted, only 33 year old, director George Johann Lang is more interested in æsthetic than contentwise questions. The rush to the « Play » of 1922 is unexpected high and the incomes accordingly. But the inflation destroys the profit for the most part. Nevertheless, the municipality did decide not to assume 1 of the 7 filming offers, which in-arrived since the beginning of the year 1920, although the offers amount-up to converted 14 billion Marks.

In 1930, Johann George Lang develops a comprehensive new staging. Over the course of that, he sketches a completely new stage and charges the architect and later mayor Raimund Lang to put-up the 1st solidly built stage. In retrospect, Otto Huber comments :

« The style of the stage was modern and, at the same time, " Nazi-like ". The large horizontal line is very impressive, but the gesture of this architecture is nevertheless : " You are small and I am large. " . This is the opposite of the Christian message. It seems as if the religious theological questions became secondarily to art questions. »

That Oberammergau, with this staging, is again at the height of the time, reveals itself at the fact that even directors like Max Reinhardt or Charles Dullin pronounce her admiration :

« At a show in August, a man with pale face, brown-reddish hair and a small moustache on the furrow of the upper-lip sat in the Passion theatre. He carried a trench coat and was accompanied by some men. After the play, his friend Helene Bechstein brought him in the publishing house Lang where he was introduced and invited for tea. The man was called Adolf Hitler. »

4 years later, in 1934, this man already was in power. This year was the tricentennial of the « Oberammergauer » Passion vow, which is why a jubilee play was initiated. Whether and how far Oberammergau defends itself against the pocketing by the new politics of Germany, can be proved hardly today. But one thing is sure : the powerful exploited Oberammergau. The advertisement poster for 1934 shows the mountain-surrounded Passion village from which a cross rises which is flowed round by light. The posters intended for the foreign country must carry by the will of the Imperial propaganda Ministry the label « Germany calling » . Adolf Hitler calls Oberammergau, beside Bayreuth, the exponents of the German cultural life. In the press, the ideological pocketing is continued :

« The 3 Centuries of the « Passion-Play » teach us that the loyalty between blood and ground is the hold strength of all folklore. »

The church positions itself against this kind of pocketing of the Passion Plays by the political rulers and gives the « Missio canonica » , the official teaching competence of the church to Oberammergau.

But also, within the « Passion-Play » , the « new mind » becomes visible : thus Adam is equipped in a living picture with a German spade. Easy delitions prove suddenly clear anti-Semitic statements. For example, the choral text to the living picture « Josef and his brothers » is shortened by the last stanza in which God's rage on the brothers of Josef and his people in general is neutralized :

« He (Jesus) does not come to ruin, from the father's magnificence, all sinners should inherit, mercy, grace and bliss. »

...

The special Jubilee season of the Oberammergau « Passion-Play » , in 1934, marking the 300-year anniversary of the original vow to re-enact Jesus' Passion and Suffering every 10 years, thereafter, was the 1st (and, it turned-out, only) performance after the Nazi regime's rise to power, the year previous. Among other things, the Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda ordered the official poster for the Jubilee season amended to include the message « Deutschland ruft dich ! » (Germany is calling you !) , and the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) scheme's discount-travel programme offered special cut-rate packages to the « Passion-Play » , including rail fare, tickets and accommodations.

Official propaganda described the « Passion-Play » as « peasant drama inspired by the consecrating power of the soil, with Adolf Hitler attending a performance (and wound-up endorsing it wholeheartedly as one with the Greater Anti-Semitic Agenda of the Nazi regime) . An attempt to re-write the « Passion-Play » script to bring it into line with Nazi ideology was rejected, however, by the more conservative element.

After 1934, an order of a revised version of the Passion Plays goes out to the dramatist Leo Weismantel (1888-1964) which is, nevertheless, pulled back again. The propaganda Ministry explained the Plays in preparation for 1940 for « Reichswichtig » (of high importance for the nation) . Nevertheless, the « Passion-Play » of 1940 must be called off because of outbreak of War.

Oberammergau in the Nazi Era : The Fate of a Catholic Village in Hitler's Germany.

Images of Faith : Expressionism, Catholic Folk Art, and the Industrial Revolution.

...

Definitive study of the place of the Nazi regime and its racist ideology in Oberammergau, in which reform movements are ongoing.

Draws on dozens of guidebooks and articles written by European and American visitors to performances of the « Play » , from 1850 to 1950.

Features a richly personal study of a small number of individuals in one village.

Emphasizes the survival of a residual democracy in Oberammergau during the 12 years of the 3rd « Reich » , challenging a prevailing tendency to underestimate German democracy before 1945.

In August 1934, Adolf Hitler attended the world-famous Oberammergau « Passion-Play » , falsely branding the villagers as Nazi ideologues. In fact, the drama reflected traditional interpretations of the biblical narrative, pitting Jewish leaders and crowds against Jesus and his loyal followers. Yet, elite Europeans and Americans flocked to Oberammergau each decade after 1850 to witness the play because actors and audience shared the anti-Semitic messages they read into the Gospel story. Oberammergau's population was split between Hitler's supporters and opponents because some villagers were true believers and others tolerated the Nazi regime's extreme cultural restructuring, while Catholic loyalists resisted efforts to replace their customary practices with Nazified alternatives. All sides united in defending their Centuries-old tradition of dramatizing the Passion. Villagers appeared on stage as children and grew-up hoping to perform major roles as adults, so their entire lives revolved around the play seasons. This commitment nurtured a powerful communal identity in Oberammergau, carving-out maneuvering room for dissent at the margins of Nazi tyranny even by Party members who defied superiors threatening Oberammergau's special interests. Their actions represented an extreme example of the maxim : « All politics is local. » . Drawing on a huge array of records, the book tells the up-close and personal story of a community in crisis, illuminating heart-wrenching decisions made by villagers alternatively wooed and threatened by their Nazi leaders. Biographies bring these everyday Germans to life as complex human beings struggling with the extreme challenges of the Nazi Era.

The Bavarian mountain village of Oberammergau is famous for its decennial « Passion-Play » . The play began as an articulation of the villagers' strong Catholic piety, but in the late- 19th and early 20th Centuries developed into a considerable commercial enterprise. The growth of the « Passion-Play » from a curiosity of village piety into a major tourist attraction encouraged all manner of entrepreneurial behavior and brought the inhabitants of this isolated rural area into close contact with a larger world. Hundreds of thousands of tourists came to see the « Play » , and thousands of temporary workers descended on the village during the « Play » season, some settling permanently in Oberammergau. Adolf Hitler would attend a performance of the play in 1934, later saying that the drama « revealed the muck and mire of Jewry » . But, Helena Waddy argues, it is a mistake to brand Oberammergau as a Nazi stronghold, as has commonly been done. In this book, she uses Oberammergau's unique history to explain why and how genuinely some villagers chose to become Nazis, while others rejected Party membership and defended their Catholic lifestyle. She explores the reasons why both local Nazis and their opponents fought to protect the village's cherished identity against the 3rd « Reich » 's many intrusive demands. On the other hand, she also shows that the « Play » mirrored the Gospel-based anti-Semitism endemic to Western culture. As a local study of the rise of Nazism and the Nazi era, Waddy's work is an important contribution to a growing genre. As a collective biography, it is a fascinating and moving portrait of life at a time when, as Thomas Mann wrote :

« Every day hurled the wildest demands at the heart and brain. »

...

Contemporary scholar James Shapiro writes that :

« Oberammergau is justly celebrated as one of the few places in the world where Theater still matters. »

The Bavarian « Play » began with a vow made in 1633 : villagers would perform the « Passion-Play » every 10 years if God would spare them from the plague which had ravaged neighbouring towns and threatened to consume them. With few exceptions, they have kept their pledge with God, and this devotion had made Oberammergau, a town just south-west of Munich, an international phenomenon.

Oberammergau attracts a capacity crowd of over 400,000 visitors every 10 years (with applications for tickets nearing

4 million) . No expense is spared in its lavish production, but veri-similitude is important for Oberammergau : no make-up or wigs are allowed on stage ; actors must be born in Oberammergau or reside in the city for 20 years before they are eligible to perform ; and, until 1990, female actors had to be under 35 and single.

In 1934, the « Play » gained infamy for the dubious honour of hosting Adolf Hitler as he courted the popular vote for the institution of a new office, « Führer » and Reich Chancellor. Many of the actors in principle roles (excepting Judas) were already Party Nazis, and voting records indicate that almost 90 % of the town's inhabitants favoured Hitler in the general election. In 1942, Hitler would go so far as to claim that the « Play » showed Pilate as a man of « superior race » while the Sanhedrin's call for crucifixion revealed the whole « muck and mire of Jewry » . However, forced to choose between guns and God, Hitler closed the « Play » , in 1940, to build a munitions factory near by.

Picked-up again, in 1950, as a symbol of Allied victory and traditional values, the « Passion-Play » entered the latter half of the 20th Century with a dark cloud hovering over-head. After much negotiation and international cries for reform, the « Play » has undergone massive changes over the past 50 years : gone are the horns on the head-dresses of the Jewish high-priests, though sinister nubs still remain ; the Jewish mob still cries its « blood curse » , though other competing voices clamour for blame ; Judas clutches his money bag, though no longer counts his coins. Controversy remains. Progressives insist they have shifted the entire thrust of the « Play » from a revenge narrative against the Jews to an attempt at bridging the Jesus of history with the Jesus of Christian faith, but critics contend that only the costumes shrouding the anti-Semitism have changed.

The Conrad von Hötendorf Kaserne was built just east of the village in 1935-1937 as a base for the signals detachment (« Gebirgs-Nachrichten-Abteilung Nummer 54 ») of the Mountain Brigade. In October 1943, the barracks were taken over by the Messerschmitt company as a research and development site ; 37 kilometers (23 miles) of tunnels were bored into the neighboring Laber mountain for engine production facilities, and a winter sports hotel was also taken over. In all, Messerschmitt had 500 employees in the design department and about 1,300 more in the factory. At the end of the Second World War, the Messerschmitt design department was visited by both U.S. and British scientific missions, as well as by teams from Bell (who stayed for 5 weeks) and de Havilland. Among the German staff interviewed by the Fedden Mission were Waldemar Voigt, Messerschmitt's chief designer, Hans Hornung, and Joseph Helmschrott.

After the War, the Americans occupied the barracks, renaming it Hawkins Barracks and making it the primary facility of U.S. Army School in Europe ; over the next 3 decades, schools in specialties ranging from military police to nuclear weapons handling were located there. The base reverted to German Army control and its original name in 1974.

NATO School, formerly NATO Weapons Systems School, the alliance's principal training and education facility on the operational level, has been located at Hawkins « Barracks/Hötendorf Kaserne » , since 1953.

Marie Bartl

Bruckner tomba alors en amour avec une jeune choriste de 17 ans faisant partie de la distribution du Jeu de la Passion. Marie Bartl qui interprétait le rôle mineur de paysanne avec l'une des « filles d'Israël » attira les regards de l'homme mûr. Bruckner mêlait, une fois de plus, l'amour terrestre à l'amour divin. Il se présenta à elle après le spectacle en lui offrant un recueil de prières, puis s'enhardit jusqu'à la suivre à la maison. L'homme passa la soirée en sa compagnie de même que la mère de la jeune fille. Il se présenta timidement auprès de la mère dans le but d'amorçer une sorte de médiation :

« Je suis le Professeur Anton Bruckner et je suis organiste. » . (Il n'était pas encore connu comme compositeur.)

Il fit une proposition de mariage qui fut, surprenamment, prise au sérieux. Car il semble bien que Marie Bartl fut réellement tombée amoureuse d'Anton Bruckner. Mais après 3 jours en sa charmante compagnie, le compositeur prude et radin (ne voulant pas être pris à déboursier un second billet « aller-retour ») insista pour reprendre, seul, le chemin en direction de la Suisse. L'idylle assortie d'une correspondance soutenue ne durera que quelques mois tout au plus, vue les circonstances.

(The girl's and her mother's letters, up to June 1881, have survived.)

Les moments de passion avec Marie Bartl se reflète dans le 1er mouvement, extrêmement joyeux, de la 6e Symphonie. L'idylle se rompit lorsque Bruckner alla jusqu'à demander sa main. Cela nous valut cette page sublime qu'est l'Adagio où la résignation se mue en prière, et s'apaise dans une conclusion d'une religieuse sérénité. Marie Bartl apparaîtra sur des photos prises à Marienbad. Le biographe Max Auer avait rejeté l'idée de l'existence d'une telle correspondance alléguant qu'elle fut brûlée immédiatement après la rupture entre Marie et Bruckner. Ce qui s'avéra faux. Les lettres de Bruckner à la mère de Marie Bartl sont aujourd'hui conservés à Saint-Florian. En plus d'une photographie de la jeune femme avec l'inscription :

« À mon amie la plus chère, Marie Bartl. » .

Portraits de femmes ayant appartenu à Bruckner

Tout au long de sa vie, Anton Bruckner tentera de conquérir le cœur de ravissantes jeunes femmes d'origine modeste, qu'elles soient autrichiennes ou allemandes. Citons les noms de :

Margarethe Boucher ; Hedwig Habermann ; Cäcilie Kloppenburg ; Maria Payrleithner (de Steyr ?) ; Magda Preibsch ; Rosa Rabl ; Henriette Sammet ; Aurelie Stolzar ; et Leopoldine Werndl (de Steyr ?) .

...

Extensive material in possession of August Göllerich's grandson, Hugo Rabitsch, was entrusted to the library of the Linz Bruckner Conservatory (in Upper-Austria) .

A number of photographs of different personalities comes from the estate of Anton Bruckner. He received portraits of women with a written dedication, except for one. There are 4 unknown portraits of women, including the unique « unknown » and « unsigned » photograph.

August Göllerich had a very close relationship with Anton Bruckner. Therefore, it is not surprising that he came in possession of these artefacts (9 portraits are classified under the title : « V/I photographs ») . Based on what we know, Göllerich never talked openly about them.

A picture of Mathilde Feßl, as well as other photographs, came into Bruckner's possession. This corresponded to a, then, fashionable taste. He was, however, really close to only very few women. He actually wanted to marry Ida Buhz to whom he became engaged. And, on August 16, 1866, he sent a letter to Linz, asking for the hand of Josefine Lang.

In the literature (for example, the Göllerich and Max Auer biography) , we do not meet more than half of these women's names ; in 2 cases, we are limited to a few vague dependent observations. Due to the nature of the composer's personality, the chapter called « Bruckner and the women » cannot be enriched. Franz Gräßlinger related to Bruckner, only in his later years. But his writings contributed to clarify erroneous affirmations on the Master's circle. Gräßlinger subtle formulations are based on deeply human trusted source coming from credible witnesses so that his statements have great historical weight. He heard stories about « friends, women and girls who Bruckner knew to whom he wrote letters » . About the assertion that Bruckner went through love-affairs, Gräßlinger comments :

« Bruckner never really met the great love in his sentimental affairs. Nor did he live intimate relationships. »

There is a fundamental difference between love adventures (falling for the beauty of a young female) and the « absolute devotion to a wife » . Bruckner's loud letters to different women prove this assertion.

Bruckner is still naïve and rather expresses himself with silly enthusiasm. But his sincerity and his moral attitude cannot be questioned.

« A person ready for total renunciation is a superior mind. For him, earth is actually just a beautiful place, withholding from God's ancestors the still more beautiful sky. »

(Carl Johann Perl, « Christian Music and Anton Bruckner »)

« Unbekannte Frauenbildnisse aus dem Nachlaß von Anton Bruckner »

Article de l'ex-Nazi Wilhelm Jerger (directeur du Conservatoire « Bruckner » de Linz) paru en 1973 dans le « Oberösterreichische Heimatblätter »

Wie bereits mitgeteilt werden konnte, wurden umfangreiche Materialien aus dem Besitz von August Göllerich durch seinen Enkel Hugo Rabitsch der Bibliothek des Bruckner-Konservatoriums des Landes Oberösterreich überantwortet. Diese umfangreichen Materialien bergen auch eine Anzahl von Photographien verschiedener Persönlichkeiten, die aus dem Nachlaß von Anton Bruckner stammen. Darunter befinden sich unbekannte, in der Mehrzahl mit persönlichen Widmungen an Anton Bruckner versehene Frauenbildnisse mit Ausnahme eines einzigen, einer noch nicht identifizierten Photographie. Wir wissen, daß August Göllerich in sehr engen Beziehungen zu Anton Bruckner stand, und es ist daher nicht verwunderlich, daß Göllerich als einer der engsten Vertrauten Anton Bruckners in den Besitz dieser Frauenbildnisse gelangte. Göllerich hat darüber keine Mitteilungen gemacht und hat auch keine Mitteilungen hinterlassen ; wenigstens sind solche bisher noch nicht bekannt geworden.

In der Literatur, zum Beispiel bei Göllerich und bei Max Auer, begegnen wir mehr als der Hälfte dieser Frauennamen nicht ; in zwei Fällen sind wir auf einige wenige, vage Bemerkungen angewiesen. Das Kapitel « Bruckner und die Frauen » kann somit « nicht bereichert » werden, denn in Wirklichkeit gibt es ein solches nicht, und es kann auch ein solches - schon aus dem Wesensgefüge der Brucknerschen Persönlichkeit heraus -, gar nicht geben. Franz Gräßlinger, der Bruckner, wie er schreibt, « nur in seinen späteren Lebensjahren gekannt » hat, hat viel Richtiges zur Aufhellung dieses unseligen und falsch gesehenen Abschnitts aus Bruckners Lebenskreis beigetragen, aber nicht allzuviel Gehör gefunden. Gräßlingers feinsinnige, sorgsame Formulierungen sind uns auch wegen ihres tiefen menschlichen Bezuges eine verlässliche Quelle und legitimieren ihn als einen wahrheitsgetreuen und glaubhaften Zeugen, so daß seine Aussagen historisches Gewicht erhalten. Er lernte « Freunde, Frauen und Mädchen, die Bruckner kannten, denen er Briefe schrieb » persönlich kennen. Im Gegensatz zu der Behauptung, daß sich Bruckner in Liebesabenteuer gestürzt haben soll (was wohl nur auf einer seltsamen Annahme beruhen kann) , muß hiezu das, was Gräßlinger niederschreibt, hierher gesetzt werden :

« Die wirklich große Liebe hat Bruckner nie kennengelernt. Intime Beziehungen, Liebesverhältnisse hatte er niemals. »

Zwischen Liebesabenteuern und der « unbestimmten Sehnsucht nach einer eigenen Frau » , und daran, daß Bruckner das « Schöne am weiblichen Wesen » liebte, ist wohl noch ein Unterschied. Im übrigen : Wer Bruckners lautere Briefe an verschiedene Frauen kennt, wird aus keinem derselben etwas herauslesen können, das den zitierten Textstellen widerspräche. Bei Bruckner handelt es sich doch um naive und eher einfältige Schwärmereien, deren Aufrichtigkeit und sittliche Einstellung unbezweifelbar ist, eben auch dem im Grund einfachen Zuschnitt des Mannes entsprechend. Wie Unterhaltungen mit jungen Mädchen vor sich gingen, ersehen wir aus uns vor kürzester Zeit zugänglich gemachten « Erinnerungen einer Oberösterreicherin / Begegnungen mit Anton Bruckner » von Mathilde Mayr, geborene Feßl*.

(* Diese Erinnerungen stammen aus dem Besitz von Frau Magda Preibsch Neuhofen an der Krems, einer Großnichte von Mathilde Feßl verheiratete Mayr, die sie Herrn Professor Wilhelm Formann zur Veröffentlichung überlassen hat. Ich danke an dieser Stelle Herrn Professor Formann herzlich für die Erlaubnis, aus diesen kurzen Erinnerungen zitieren zu dürfen.)

Die Genannte hielt sich zum Zwecke ihrer musikalischen Ausbildung von 1887 bis 1889 in Wien auf und berichtet in diesen Erinnerungen über ein Konzert, das die damals siebzehnjährige Mathilde Feßl besuchen durfte.

( Nach einer Bleistiftnotiz von unbekannter Hand im Anschluß an den maschinenschriftlichen Text, in den mir Frau Preibsch freundlicherweise Einblick gewährte, heißt es :

« Konzert war am 24. Februar 1889 im Bösendorfersaal in Wien, gespielt wurde die VII. Symphonie von Bruckner unter Hans Richter, Veranstalter war der Wagner Verein. »)

Offenbar in letzter Minute im Saal angelagt, wollte sie sich auf ihren Platz begeben, verirrte sich dabei und « kam endlich zu einer letzten Tür im Gang, die offen stand » . Sie Schreibt :

« In der Suche um ein verstecktes Plätzchen fielen meine Augen auf einen alten Herrn, vorne in einer Ecke. Er war nicht festlich gekleidet, etwas beleibt, glatzköpfig und ungemein vertrauenserweckend. »

« Zu diesem alten Herrn stelle ich mich, da bin ich sicher » , dachte ich mir. Ich ging auf ihn los und stellte mich hinter ihn. Da drehte er sich um, sah mich erstaunt an und sagte :

« Ja, wie kommen denn Sie daher ? »

« Ich weiß so, daß ich nicht hergehöre. Ich habe mich vergangen. Aber ich kann gleich wieder fortgehen. Ich werde schon den richtigen Zuhörerraum finden. »

Da protestierte er lebhaft :

« Na, na, na, bleib'ns nur da, ist mir ganz recht, daß S' da sand. Es fangt a glei an. »

Und wirklich begann das Konzert. Da vergaß ich alles. Meine sonderbare Lage, den alten Herrn, die schwarzen Fracke rundherum - und war nur mehr in der Musik.

Als der erste Satz zu Ende war, drehte sich der alte Herr wieder um und fragte :

« Hats Ihna gfalln ? »

Ich, noch ganz benommen :

« Wunderbar ! Es ist ja von Bruckner ! »

Da sagte er, auf sich deutend :

« Na, das bin ja eh i. »

Ich war sprachlos. Nicht, daß sich meine Phantasie den Bruckner schon irgendwie vorgestellt hätte, - aber daß der alles andere als imponierende, ja fast komische alte Herr der Schöpfer dieser herrlichen Tonwerke sein sollte, das konnte ich mir nicht zusammenreimen. Da begann, wie mir schien, auf Engelsschwingen der zweite Satz ! Und bald sah ich alles in einem anderen Licht und war bis ins Innerste erschüttert, daß ein so einfacher Mensch dazu auserwählt war, uns diese göttliche Musik zu schenken.

In der nächsten Pause plauderte er immer mit mir. Einmal sah er an seiner Kleidung herunter und sagte :

« Grad heut - muß ich wieder so ein altes Gewand anhaben. »

Dann griff er an seinen Hals :

« Der Kragen is mir a wieder viel z' weit - wissen S', i hab's gern bequem. Wann i aber gwußt hätt', daß Sie daher kommen, hätt' i schon was Besseres angezogen. »

Er fragte mich, wie ich heiße, wer ich sei und woher ich komme. Idi sagte, daß ich aus Kremsmünster in Oberösterreich komme, die Tochter des dortigen Rechtsanwaltes Doktor Feßl sei und so weiter.

Er sagte sehr erfreut :

« I bin a aus Oberösterreich. Wann i wieder aussu komm, dann bsuch i Ihna, ganz gwiß. Aber wann S' mir in Wien begegnen, da reden S' mi an. I bitt Ihna, tun S' das. Wissen S', i bin auf der Straßen oft so in Gedanken, daß i kan Menschen bemerk, und da war mir so furchtbar lad, wann i an Ihna so vorbei gang. Wann Ihna mei Nam net einfällt, denken S' an a Bruckn. »

In Wien sah ich ihn nicht mehr. Doch nach zwei Jahren kam er wirklich nach Kremsmünster. Ich war damals schon verlobt. Eines Tages nadl Tisch saß ich im Wohnzimmer am Fensterbrettl und nähte an meiner Ausstattung. Da klopfte es, ein Herr machte die Türe auf und ließ einen anderen respektvoll vorausgehen. Idi erkannte sofort Bruckner. Wie er mich erblickte, rief er erfreut :

« Da is s' ja ! »

Diese etwas sonderbare Begrüßung hat mir später sein Begleiter, der Organist Leitenmayr, erklärt. Bruckner hatte nämlich im Stift, wo er zu Gast angesagt :

« I muß an Bsuch machen. I hab in Wien a Tochter von Doktor Feßl kennengelernt. Die muß i wiedersehn. »

Da lachten die Stiftsherren und sagten :

« Das wird schwer sein. Der Feßl hat 5 Töchter. »

« Das macht nix » , sagte Bruckner, « die Mathilde find i schon außa, die kenn i glei » .

Ich sprang vom Fensterbrettl herunter, ging ihm entgegen und gab ihm die Hand. Er wandte sich zu seinem Begleiter und sagte :

« I dank lhna schön, daß S' mi hergeführt ham. Wann S' wolln, können S' wieder heimgehn. »

Er nahm mit uns den Jausenkaffee, spielte auch lange auf dem Klavier.

Ich mußte während des Spielens neben ihm sitzen. Einmal, bei einer besonders schönen Stelle, wandte er sich zu mir und sagte mir leise :

« Das ist nicht von mir, das haben mir die Engerln vorgesungen. »

Oft erklärte er mir etwas vom Kontrapunkt und den Gesetzen der Harmonielehre und dergleichen, und ich sagte :

« Ich verstehe ja nichts davon. Ja wenn meine Schwester hier wäre. »

Er ließ mich gar nicht ausreden, sondern protestierte gleich lebhaft :

« Na, na, na, ka Schwester ! Sie, das ist mir grad recht, bleibens nur bei mir ! Wissens, wann i mir beim Komponieren was Liebes vorstellen kann, geht es ganz anders. »

Oft hielt er meine Hand und streichelte sie zärtlich.

Da kamen mir kleine Bedenken. Ob ich mir das als Braut von einem fremden Mann gefallen lassen kann ? Ich entzog ihm meine Hand und ging sogar aus dem Zimmer. Mein lieber Vater hatte das beobachtet, kam mir nach und sagte :

« Aber Kind, sei doch nicht kleinlich. Den Bruckner mußst du doch mit einem ganz anderen Maßstab messen als andere Menschen. Daß ein solches Genie durch dich ein paar fröhliche Stunden hatte, wird dir dein Leben lang eine schöne Erinnerung bleiben. »

Ich ging auch gleich wieder ins Klavierzimmer zurück und setzte mich zu ihm. Bruckner hatte in seiner Harmlosigkeit nichts von dem kleinen Intermezzo gemerkt, nahm gleich wieder meine Hand und streichelte sie. Ich sah den Vater an und freute mich. Der Vater nickte mir zu und lächelte auch. Wir machten auch einen Spaziergang über die Hofwiese, die eine schöne Gebirgsaussicht hat. Bruckner hängte sich ein und erzählte mir von seinem Leben in Wien.

Seine Bescheidenheit war übergroß. So sagte er zum Beispiel :

« Daß i komponieren kann, das kommt davon, weil i soviel glernt hab ! Da muß man ja komponieren können ! Aber die jungen Kerle von heute mit etli zwanzig Jahr, wanns a bissel Klavierspieln können, da wollns glei komponieren ! Ja, da wird freili nix draus. »

Allmählich wurde es Abend und er mußte ins Stift zurück. Er nahm Abschied, und mit aufsteigender Wehmut sah ich ihm nach. Mir ahnte, daß ich ihn nicht mehr sehen werde, denn nach wenigen Jahren hatte er seine irdische Heimat mit der himmlischen vertauscht. Mir war er durch seine göttliche Musik immer verbunden gewesen.

Es ist bekannt, daß Bruckner gerne um Photographien in seinem weiblichen Bekanntenkreis warb, und wenn er dann eine solche erhielt, in überschwenglichen Worten seinen Dank aussprach. Auf ähnliche Weise dürfte auch ein Bild von Mathilde Febl wie auch andere Photographien in seinen Besitz gelangt sein. Außerdem entsprach dies einem damaligen modischen Geschmack. Indes, Frauen, denen Bruckner wirklich nahe stand, gibt es nur ganz wenige : allen voran figuriert Ida Buhz, die er tatsächlich heiraten wollte und mit der er sich auch verlobte. Daß er in einem Schreiben (Linz, 16. August 1866) um die Hand Josefine Lang's anhielt, soll hier ausdrücklich vermerkt werden.

Nach Göllicher hat Bruckner Ida Buhz in Berlin, wo er anlässlich der 23. Tonkünstlerversammlung weilte und wobei die Erstaufführung des « Te Deum » stattfand (31. Mai 1891) , kennen gelernt. Ida Buhz, damals Zimmermädchen im Hôtel « Kaiserhof » , in dem Bruckner logierte, übergab ihm vor der Abreise ein Briefchen des Inhalts, ihn heiraten zu wollen. Nachdem Bruckner den Eltern einen Besuch abstattete, hielt er um ihre Hand an. Einer Mitteilung des Sankt Florianer Stiftsorgans Josef Gruber zufolge, sollen sich die Eltern jedoch « ein Jahr Bedenkzeit ausbedungen haben » . Bruckner blieb mit Ida Buhz im brieflichen Verkehr, und zwar bis zu seinem zweiten Aufenthalt in Berlin, im Jänner 1894. Hier sah er Ida Buhz wieder, die im Konzert am 6. Jänner (es fand die Aufführung der 7. Sinfonie statt) neben ihm in der Loge saß. Tags darauf fanden sich Bruckner und Hugo Wolf zur Hauptprobe des Philharmonischen Chores ein und am Abend fand dann im Kreise der Familie die Verlobung mit Ida Buhz statt, die am darauffolgenden Tag im Konzert des Philharmonischen Chores abermals neben Bruckner Platz nahm. Warum es jedoch nicht zur Heirat kam, kann möglicherweise aus einem Brief von Anita Muck, der Gemahlin des Dirigenten Karl Muck, an ihren Mann (Wiesbaden, 20. September 1894) gedeutet werden :

« Das ganze Frühjahr hindurch erwarte ich Ida ; sie ließ sich aber nicht sehen und ich hörte gar nichts von ihr. Ich fürchte daß der Einfluß ihrer Umgebung ein so großer ist, daß das Mädchen sich nicht zum Übertritt (zum Katholizismus) wird entscheiden können. »

Nach Bruckners Tod wurde Ida Buhz Diakonissin.

Wenig später, da Bruckner 1891 Beziehungen zu Ida Buhz aufnahm, die freilich noch keineswegs ernsten Charakter trugen, wurde er mit der achtzehnjährigen Minna Reischl aus Altheim, Oberösterreich, die sich bei Verwandten in Steyr aufhielt, bekannt. Sie erwirkte alsbald bei ihren Eltern eine Einladung Bruckners nach Altheim, der dieser am 5. September 1891 entsprach. Der Aufenthalt währte zwei Tage, während dieser Bruckner um die Hand der jungen

Sängerin warb. Doch bereits am 16. September 1891 (Datumvermerk von Bruckner) traf ein Schreiben Minna Reischls ein, « den mir so schmeichelhaften Antrag nicht annehmen zu können. » Wie Göllicher zu berichten Weiß, muß Bruckner Später nochmals werbend an Minna Reischl herangetreten sein, denn am 12. Oktober 1893 schreibt sie :

« Mein liebster Herr Doktor !

Zwar bringt Ihnen dieses Briefchen noch nicht das bestimmte “ Ja ”, doch hoffe ich, im Laufe der Zeit von meinen Eltern doch die Einwilligung zu erhalten ...

Erfreuen Sie, mein liebster Herr Doktor, wieder einmal durch einige Zeilen, Ihre Sie hochwährende ergebene,

Minna Reischl. »

Im Belvedere in Wien empfing Bruckner noch den Besuch von Minna Reischl und ihre Mutter. Fünf Jahre nach Bruckners Tod (inzwischen nicht glücklich verheiratet) schied auch sie aus dem Leben. Wenn wir den zeitgenössischen Berichten glauben dürfen, muß es sich hier um eine tiefere Beziehung von beiden Seiten gehandelt haben.

Wie eingangs erwähnt, befinden sich in den Materialien von August Göllicher neun Frauenbildnisse aus dem Nachlaß von Anton Bruckner, deren Beschreibung nunmehr hier folgt. Sie sind in der Materialiensammlung unter der provisorischen Sign « V/I Photographien » , eingeordnet.

Es handelt sich hier um eine frühere Aufnahme als die bekannte, zum Beispiel von Abendroth Seite 106 gezeigte. Bruckner nannte sie seinen « lieben Ersatz » , nämlich für Karolins Mutter Josefine Lang, verheiratete Weilnböck, die Bruckners Liebe unerwidert ließ.

Es bleibt in Hinsicht auf die vier unbekanntes Frauenbildnisse sowie der namentlich unbekanntes und unsignierten Photographie weiteren Erhebungen überlassen, hier nähere Daten beizubringen. Vermutlich dürften die Bildnisse Mathilde Feßl, Marie Payrleithner, Minna Reischl und Aurelie Stolar fast oder nahezu unbekannt sein. Abschließend danke ich Herrn Professor Hugo Rabitsch für die Erlaubnis der Erstveröffentlichung dieser unbekanntes Frauenbildnisse aus dem Nachlaß von Anton Bruckner, die der Materialiensammlung August Göllicher zugehören.
