If you are interested in this work, all of the recordings I have discussed above are worth hearing. The Wand is a personal 1st choice, Karajan a close 2nd and an obvious general recommendation. Haitink's « Concertgebouw » series would be an excellent choice for a set of all the Symphonies. All 3 of these recordings use the Roert Haas edition of the score but, if necessary, it is not difficult to follow them with Leopold Nowak's edition, bearing in mind that there are some short extra passages in the Adagio and Finale that will not be in the score. For an authoritative account of the works, Robert Simpson's « The Essence of Bruckner » (originally published in 1967 and updated 10 years later) is unsurpassed but, unfortunately, seems to be out-of-print. Apart from the discography mentioned above, I find the main sites that internet search engines take you to a little disappointing. However, a biography by Gabriel Engel which was originally published in 1940 is worth reading.

I hope I haven't given the impression that my devotion to this Symphony is to the exclusion of the others by this composer - far from it. However, there is no doubt in my mind that it was his greatest completed achievement. The work moves beyond the heights gained in the middle Symphonies into new territory - hence Bruckner struggled again initially but, in the revised version of 1890, he created something quite extraordinary. The unfinished 9th is comparable as far as it goes. Although I do not feel a sense of incompleteness as its great Adagio draws to a close, sketches (and realizations) of the Finale, with which he grappled for about 2 years before his death, show that he was struggling again. We shall never know whether or not he could have excelled the 8th. For me, therefore, this is a musical experience unsurpassed by anything else I have yet heard.

Addendum

To my surprise, quite a few readers included a conductor who was about to perform the work in Sheffield !

1st, I will mention 3 recordings made in the mid-1950's which are therefore contemporaneous with Jascha Horenstein's « Vox » recording mentioned above. Eduard van Beinum's rendition with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra has resurfaced on « Decca ». This is a very decently played, dramatic reading with swift tempi and a reasonable recording. Otto Klemperer's Cologne recording on « Medici Masters » is live but has better sound. As one would expect, Klemperer adopts an objective approach and, interestingly, his tempi are remarkably similar to van Beinum - both versions come in at about 72 minutes. No need to dally much on Carl Schuricht's Stuttgart radio version (on « Hänssler », CD : 93.148). Although the interpretation is admirable enough and I have been impressed with some of the other Schuricht recordings of the period, this one has too many fluffs for repeated listening. Despite the virtues of van Beinum and Klemperer, the Horenstein's version remains the most desirable of the period and it is now much more readily available.

Also from the same era is Herbert von Karajan's « EMI » studio recording. Admirers of the conductor will want to have this version but I am increasingly of the view that his 1988 recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra are finer. I say « recordings » because, in addition to the « DGG » set, Sony has issued a DVD containing a studio performance made in the same month which is very similar but not, I suspect, identical. The visual presentation is a little spartan but the sound has been remastered for surround capability and, in stereo, is better than on most DVDs I have heard. There is a coupling of a live Berlin performance of the 9th symphony dating from 1985, all on a single disc which costs about £ 7. This is an unmissable bargain and a reminder of how great a conductor Karajan was in this repertoire.

2 other conductors with a considerable reputation in Bruckner are Karl Böhm (notably his 4th for « Decca ») and Carlo Maria Giulini (notably his 2nd), both of whom recorded the 8th with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra for « DGG ». The former gives a very solid reading on a mid-price single disc with a notably light touch in the Scherzo. Giulini is more spacious and refined throughout but, perhaps, too beautiful in a work which is meant to have a tough side. I have also seen and heard him conduct this Symphony in a live performance on DVD, from Stockholm, which was the inaugural concert of the World Philharmonic Orchestra but had some reservations there too. To me, Giulini seems more completely convincing in his recordings of the 9th Symphony.

I recently acquired Bernard Haitink's 2005 live « Concertgebouw » performance - a very decent recording in all respects. It's a toss-up between this and his Vienna version but I seem to find myself less moved by Haitink in this particular work over time.

In addition to the above recordings, I have also acquired recordings of the 8th as part of complete sets conducted by Daniel Barenboim, Stanisław Skrowaczewski and Eugen Jochum (his « Dresden Staatskapelle » version on « EMI »). The 1st 2 are decent enough but neither lingers in my memory greatly. The Jochum reading does linger but for the wrong reasons - too many liberties with tempi and surprisingly poor sound for the period and venue. Wilhelm Furtwängler's 1944 live recording with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra has been made available on various labels but sounds most tolerable in a recent remastering by « Music & Arts ». Furtwängler also plays about with the tempi and he uses what is effectively his own edition by making several modifications to Robert Haas. There is some indefinable magic here but it's hardly a mainstream choice.

One curiosity I should mention is the organ transcription made and performed by Lionel Rogg on « BIS » (CD : 946) . It is fascinating to hear the work played on Bruckner's own instrument and it works surprisingly well. Some of Rogg's tempi are as quick as I have heard, particularly the Adagio, but they make sense in this context.

Aside from the Rogg, I have covered 12 additional recordings above and been rather negative about only 2 or 3, perhaps because this is piece I find it hard not to enjoy listening to ! Nevertheless, I don't think any of them displace the version which was at the top of my pile. Since then, I would find it much harder to pick just 1 version. So, I am now going to recommend 3 :

Jascha Horenstein on « Vox » , as my historical choice.

Günter Wand on « RCA » , as a top modern CD version.

And Herbert von Karajan on « Sony » , for a DVD.

Such a Trio won't break the bank but it would give you 3 different but greatly satisfying views of this visionary work.

...

A contemporary critic slated its « nightmarish hang-over style » , but Bruckner's last completed Symphony contains music of sheer, breathtaking magnificence.

Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony is the last he would complete. He never lived to finish his 9th (although he came agonisingly close to completing the Finale, music that's still shamefully little heard in concert halls) , so the 8th is the summation of his Symphonic journey. And what a summit the 8th is ! Bruckner himself said when he finished the work's gigantic, revelatory Finale :

« Hallelujah ! The Finale is the most significant movement of my life. »

Themes from all of the work's huge movements sound together at the end of the Symphony, a moment that burns with what Robert Simpson calls a « blazing calm » . It's the end point of a 75 minute (well, up to 100 minute, if you are conductor Sergiù Celibidache) Symphonic journey, and it's one of the most existentially thrilling experiences a Symphony has ever created. Bruckner's achievement is to make you feel, when you get there, that the whole experience of the piece is contained and transfigured in this crowning coming-together of Symphonic space and time, and that the work's sublime darkneses - like the terrifying abysses of dissonance in the 1st movement, the kind of music that conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler described as Bruckner's « battle of demons » - and its equally transcendent light, like the climax of the slow movement, are simultaneously vindicated and vanquished by the sheer, breathtaking magnificence of this music, the last Symphonic Coda that Bruckner would ever compose.

But Bruckner's journey to the work's 1st performance, by the Vienna Philharmonic in 1892, was as tortuous as the music is (sometimes) serene. He finished a 1st version of the piece, in 1887, and sent it to the conductor Hermann Levi, « my artistic father », who had already conducted the 7th Symphony with huge success in Munich. Levi rejected the piece, saying it was basically unperformable ; Bruckner was wounded, but returned to the piece to effectively recompose it over the next few years. And, instead of the weak-minded naif who never got over people's criticism (as Bruckner is sometimes described) , his revision amounts to a much deeper act of recomposition than simply answering Levi's concerns. The 1st movement ended in 1887 with a major-key triumph ; in 1892, the audience heard instead music that winds down in minor key desolation with a repeated, exhausted, death-rattle of a sigh in the violas. Bruckner himself wrote about this desperate moment, the only time in his life that he composed a Symphonic 1st movement that didn't end with a fanfare of fortissimo power : « this is how it is when one is on his death-bed, and opposite hangs a clock, which, while his life comes to its end, beats on ever steadily : tick, tock, tick, tock » . The other movements were also subtly but profoundly re-calibrated ; the effect is an intensification and sharpening of focus of Bruckner's musical ideas.

So, all should have been set for the greatest night of his life at the premiere. And while the « Musikverein » was full of the great and good, including Johannes Brahms, Hugo Wolf and Johann Strauß, and with Bruckner's partisan supporters out in force, the naysayers were there as well. Brahms thought of Bruckner's works as « Symphonic bo-constrictors » , and the critic Eduard Hanslick (who left before the Symphony's Finale) wrote grudgingly :

« In each of the 4 movements, especially the 1st and 3rd, some interesting passages, flashes of genius, shine through - if only the rest of it was not there ! It is not impossible that the future belongs to this nightmarish hang-over style - a future we, therefore, do not envy ! »

Just as well, he didn't stay till the end, Bruckner thought ; he would only have become « even angrier » .

Today, Bruckner's 8th should still be controversial. This is a piece that is attempting something so extraordinary that if you are not prepared to encounter its expressive demons, or to be shocked and awed by the places Bruckner's imagination takes you, then you are missing-out on the essential experience of the Symphony. If you think of Bruckner only as a creator of Symphonic cathedrals of mindful (or mindless, according to taste) spiritual contemplation, who wields huge chunks of musical material around like an orchestral stone mason with implacable, monumental perfection, then you won't hear the profoundly disturbing drama of what he's really up to. That unsettling darkness is sounded right at the start of this Symphony. Instead of setting-out on a journey in which the outcome is certain, in which everything is its rightful place in the Symphonic, tonal, and structural universe, Bruckner builds his grandest Symphonic edifice on musical quick-sand. The 8th starts with an unstable tremor of a semi-tone in the violas, cellos, and basses, which turns into a snaking, searching, chromatic collection of fragments. It's not so much a theme as a series of atomic musical explorations, and all of them in the wrong key. This is a Symphony « in » C minor and, yet, in the early stages of the 1st movement, that home key is confirmed more by how much Bruckner avoids it instead of how much he inhabits it. You can describe the progress of this whole opening movement in terms of Sonata forms and 2nd and 3rd themes and the other train-spotting jargon of the Symphonic rulebook, but that scarcely relates to the experience of living inside this music, which is what you will feel happens when you hear it. One special moment to listen out for : the cataclysm at the centre of the movement that results in one of the emptiest, most desolate musical landscapes Bruckner, or anyone else, ever conceived : a single flute that somehow survives the onslaught to play a remnant of the orchestral tutti over tolling, funeral tattoos in the trumpets and chromatic sighs in the basses.

All of this intensity invites a search for meaning. Bruckner's music is open to our imaginations, and he even suggested possible interpretations himself for the Symphony. In a letter to the conductor Felix Weingartner, he said that the Scherzo, which comes 2nd in this Symphony (the 1st time Bruckner places the Scherzo before the slow movement in a Symphony) is a portrait of the figure of « German Michaël », a bucolic rustic from German folk-tradition. The somnolent, radiant, harp-haloed Trio section of the Scherzo depicts Michaël dreaming, Bruckner says.

The opening of the Finale is inspired by the Cossacks, as the Russians had recently visited the Austrian Emperor, to whom the 8th is dedicated ; this movement also features « the death march » and, then, (brass) transfiguration. Bruckner doesn't talk about the slow movement, but the Adagio, the 3rd movement, is the huge, generous heart of the Symphony ; a consoling, palpitating dream in D-flat major whose opening is the closest Bruckner ever came to an evocation of the erotic ; yet, that bodily experience is transfigured into a blindingly radiant climax that seems to speak for the universe rather than mere individual figures.

Or maybe that's just me : you will make-up your own mind, because the power of this piece can't be limited by any single interpretation, whether that's Bruckner's words, or the vision a particular conductor has of this Symphony. But, as you listen to that awe-inspiring but intimate, visionary but coherent finale (whose drama again cannot be explicated by the crude pigeon-holes of musical rules and regulations ; instead, its « form » is phenomenological, something you just have to experience) , I think you should hear the darkness as much as the « blazing calm » of the Coda. It's in its acceptance of doubt, darkness, and despair that this Symphony achieves its real glory. Bruckner's 8th is an act of enormous empathetic consolation because it's unafraid to confront and to recognise sublime terror and darkness as well as light. Just like him when he wrote the piece, you need to feel engaged in that « battle of demons » when you're listening.

5 key-recordings

Herbert von Karajan / Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra : Radiant and glorious, but opulently terrifying too.

Wilhelm Furtwängler / Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra : Protean, ever-changing, Symphonic « molten lava » . Bruckner as dæmonic inspiration instead of cosmic consolation.

Staatskapelle Dresden / Eugen Jochum : Jochum's idiosyncratic interpretation, with a remorselessly swift 1st movement, gives a unique shape to his performance.

Munich Philharmonic Orchestra / Sergiù Celibidache : On the face of it, Celibidache's glacial speeds are borderline bonkers - the slow movement alone lasts more than 35 minutes ! But is there a performance that makes you feel space and time are dissolving into each other in the Coda of the Finale as much as this one ? Stick with it and see what you reckon.

Georg Tintner / National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland (1887 version) : Tintner makes the case for the original conception of the 8th : not so much another version as another Symphony.

Bruckner's 8th Symphony : Some Editorial Issues

(Paul Hawkshaw, Yale School of Music.)

In the 1st Act of Wagner's « Siegfried », a mysterious Wanderer lures the hapless dwarf Mime into a game of riddles. Each is required to ask the other 3 questions about the history of the « Ring ». Poor Mime is the only one in the Opera House unaware that the game is rigged. His adversary is none other than Wotan in disguise, the God who caused all the trouble in the 1st place. Not only can the Wanderer respond to all of Mime's questions, he crushes the dwarf with a query that only the God himself can answer : Who can forge the pieces of Siegmund's sword anew after Wotan had shattered it ? Of course, only he who is without fear can accomplish the task - not Mime.

Having worked now on the critical report for Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony for more than 5 years, I have learned to empathize with poor Mime. Only the Gods may be able to answer some of the riddles. Here, I would like to share some preliminary conclusions about the sources - answers to the equivalent of Mime's 3 questions :

Which modern edition of the 1890 score more accurately reflects the surviving manuscripts : Robert Haas or Leopold Nowak ? (1)

What is the music « for later times » that Bruckner recommended the conductor, Felix Weingartner, cut from the Finale ? (2)

How reliable is the 1st edition ? (3)

To begin, a brief recapitulation of the history of the Symphony : Bruckner composed what is now known as the 1st version between the summer of 1884 and August 1887. In September of that year, he sent the score to one of his staunchest supporters, the conductor Hermann Levi, in the hopes of obtaining a 1st performance in Munich. Levi's now famous rejection of the Symphony, in early October of 1887, served as a catalyst for a tortuous series of revisions that resulted in what is now referred to as the 2nd or 1890 version of the Symphony. (4) In 1892, the 1st edition appeared, edited by Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner. It differed from both manuscript scores, although the 1890 version served as its starting-point.

To date, the truly astronomical number (by Bruckner's standards) of 79 primary sources for the Symphony, by far the most for any of his compositions, have been identified in libraries and private collections throughout the world. Undoubtedly, more will be found. At least 5 sources known to have existed during the composer's lifetime have yet to surface. (5) The 1st point to be made here is that, as Dermot Gault alluded in his work on the Adagio, we should forget all traditional notions of clear-cut 1st and 2nd versions of the Symphony. (6) These will be referred to, from here on, as the 1887 and 1890 readings. Bruckner was so zealous, one might even say obsessive, in making his revisions that he left behind hundreds of superseded sketches and score pages in varying states of completion from the entire span of 1884 to 1890. The number of variant readings for the 4 movements is so overwhelming (almost 1,000 pages in all) that we have yet to decide how to deal with them in a practical manner from an editorial perspective.

Perhaps, the most significant contribution of work on the critical report has been the discovery, in private possession, of the earliest copy score of the 1890 reading of the Symphony. The copyist, Viktor Christ, began writing this score on 10 March 1890, the date of the composer's final revision and, with the exception of very minor discrepancies, copied the final reading of the autograph verbatim. Considered in conjunction with autograph materials, with the almost contemporaneous engraver's copy for the 1st edition, and with correspondence of the composer and his students, the newly-found manuscript provides unequivocal answers to the 3 questions posed at the outset.

In the course of making his revisions for the 1890 reading, Bruckner deleted a number of passages in the Adagio and Finale without discarding the bi-folios from the autograph score as he had done with dozens of others. Instead, for reasons as yet to be determined, he left the crossed-out measures in the autograph score. Robert Haas restored most of these deletions in his edition. He also reverted to the orchestration of 1887 in a number of places. Apart from a well-documented personal addition, Haas, in fact, printed a mixture of intermediate stages of the work. By contrast, with 2 notable exceptions to be discussed below, Leopold Nowak's edition contains the reading in the autograph score of 1890 - i.e., without the passages Bruckner had deleted. (7) Nowak's score is undoubtedly closer to Bruckner's final intentions.

The reading in the Nowak score was the one Bruckner sent to Felix Weingartner for a 1st performance that never materialized in Mannheim and the one the composer gave to Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner for printing in 1891. It was this reading to which Bruckner referred in his famous letter of 27 January 1891 to Weingartner (8) :

« Please, shorten the Finale as marked because it would be much too long and is valid only for later times, to be sure, for a circle of friends and aficionados. »

From an editorial perspective, the operative phrase in this passage is « as marked » .

The cuts in question are measures 345-386 and 583-646 of the Finale, both of which in fact are designated as optional readings in the autograph score and the copy in private possession. Dermot Gault pointed-out the 1st of the 2 optional cuts in his study of the Symphony. Otherwise, it has been impossible for modern performers and scholars to identify the cuts because neither Haas nor Nowak included the shorter alternative readings in their editions.

They are found on Folios 144r and 168r of the autograph score in the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library, Mus. Hs. 19.480/4. Both folios (144 is actually the 1st of a bi-folio) were inserted at rehearsal letters Z and Pp, respectively, for the sole purpose of including the alternative shorter readings. At measure 345, Bruckner instructed that rehearsal letter Z should not be played in the abbreviated version and, at 583, partially erased : eliminate rehearsal letter Pp and skip to Uu. At measure 345, Bruckner added a new 4 measure transition with an indication that it led directly to rehearsal letter Aa (measure 387) . The transition will be printed in the critical report. The purpose of these alternate readings is clarified in the newly-found manuscript where Viktor Christ added annotations, presumably at Bruckner's instruction.

At measure 345, he wrote :

« If the cut is taken, skip bi-folios 17 and 18 and go directly to bifolio 19. »

At the end of the cut, before the 4 measure alternative transition leading to measure 386, he wrote :

« When the cut is taken, use the following 4 measures which lead directly to rehearsal letter Aa. And, at measures 580-581 : In cases of extreme necessity, skip from Pp to Uu. »

Finally, a word about the 1st edition : After the « Bruckner-Streit » of the 1930's, the 1st editions more or less disappeared from the corpus of performed Bruckner scores. During the late- 1970's, Manfred Wagner called for their re-evaluation and, in recent years, Thomas Röder, Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt and others have demonstrated that their universal banishment was, in fact, misdirected. (9) With the exception of relatively minor editorial emendations, the printed scores of Symphonies Nos. 3 and 4, for example, contain « bona fide » versions. The same cannot be said for the 1st edition of the 8th. The engraver's score (A178a) , in the Archive of the « Society for the Friends of Music » , in Vienna, was at 1st identical to the autograph and newly-found copy. 2 of its movements were also copied by Viktor Christ. Today, it contains hundreds of additions and changes in the hands of Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner, including cuts to the Finale different from those recommended by the composer, numerous additional tempo indications, and the systematic replacement of Bruckner's block dynamics with terraced crescendi and diminuendi. The only autograph entrance in the entire manuscript is the annotation « I. Satz » on the wrapper of the 1st movement.

Extensive correspondence between the 2 editors survives in the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library. (10) These letters demonstrate that, as in the case of the Mass in F minor and 5th Symphony, the editors conspired to keep most of their alterations secret from Bruckner until it was too late for him to object. The following citation is taken from a letter from Josef Schalk to Max Oberleithner, dated : Vienna, 31 July, 1891.

« Dear Sir :

After a week of the most arduous labour, the score of the Finale (of the 8th Symphony) is finally ready for printing. It was no small chore. The numerous alterations that I perceived as necessary throughout could only be done properly with the most careful attention to detail. You will easily recognize that my objectives were clarity of effect and expression. Moreover, I was fortunate to identify a most appropriate and easily implemented cut (measures 523 to 580) from the last page of bi-folio 24 to rehearsal letter Pp (in place of those designated by the composer who would have made a victim of the 2 most interesting parts of the movement) .With my cut, only a relatively unnecessary crescendo (“ Steigerung ”) and the repetition of the otherwise lengthy chorale-like 2nd group (“ Gesangsperiode ”) are missing.

I assure you that I have made only the most necessary alterations ; much had to remain unchanged, because to do otherwise would have been irresponsible.

If you harbor any doubts, please get in touch.

I was not able to pass your greetings on to Bruckner because, when I went to visit him, his apartment was closed. He had already left. We can both only be happy about that in his best interests. »

And, on August 5th, Franz Schalk cautioned Max Oberleithner :

« Please, only communicate with the publisher about the corrections. If Bruckner has to read from a hand-written score at a rehearsal, all of our good intentions will come to naught, and instead of his thanks, we may earn his wrath. »

Pleas for the revival of the 1st edition have been based upon claims that the spurious additions and deletions reflected contemporary practice, and that Bruckner was aware of what Schalk and Oberleithner were doing. (11) However valuable the additional editorial markings may be as reflections of late-19th Century performance practice, there is no evidence that Bruckner had any knowledge of their presence in his score of the 8th Symphony until after it appeared in print.

Proponents of the 1st prints pointed-out that the student editors were devoted to Bruckner and were in touch with him about their alterations. (12) The Schalk - Oberleithner correspondence indicates that the editors did, indeed, communicate with Bruckner about some of the changes. It also demonstrates that the editors eventually lost patience with what they must have felt was Bruckner's pedantry and began, not only to make changes without consulting him, but also to deliberately conceal them from him. This change in attitude appears to have taken place among the editors over a period of years. As Thomas Röder observed, in the 1889 version of the 3rd Symphony, Franz Schalk and the composer worked hand-in-hand to produce a unique amalgam. A similar process resulted in the 1st edition of the 4th Symphony. The students grew less and less tolerant of the composer's interference through the early 1890's. Eventually, with the Mass in F minor and the 5th and 8th Symphonies, they came to disregard him, all together.

What constitutes a « bona fide » version is a question that, as with so many others about Bruckner's revisions, must be answered once piece at a time. That is perhaps the strongest argument in favour of continuing editorial efforts on the composer's behalf, however many different readings they may turn-up. Completing a critical report for the 8th Symphony will not produce a new definitive reading of the Symphony. It has already turned-up valuable sources that shed new light on editorial issues that have perplexed performers and scholars for generations - answers to Mime's questions so-to-speak. It will reduce misunderstandings, correct editorial errors and, most important, provide a better context for informed discussion. As for unanswerable questions from the Gods (such as why did Bruckner do what he did ?) , when all the sources have been systematically organized and analyzed, we will have some important new information about the genesis of the Symphony, particularly about the years between 1887 and 1889. It is a sad fact that most of the rhetoric about Bruckner's relationship with Hermann Levi, the 1st print and the Nowak / Haas controversy has been generated in an almost total vacuum of published information about the primary sources. With a little luck and a lot more hard work the Critical Report should be able to fill that void.

Notes

(1) The Bruckner Collected Works Edition has published 3 scores of the Symphony : 2 different readings of the 1890 version and 1 of the 1887. « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke : Kritische Gesamtausgabe, viii, VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll (1890) », edited by Robert Haas, Leipzig (1939) ; « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke : Kritische Gesamtausgabe, viii/2, VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll : Fassung von 1890. » , edited by Leopold Nowak, Vienna (1955/1994) ; and « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke : Kritische Gesamtausgabe, viii/1, VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll : Fassung von 1887. » , edited by Leopold Nowak, Vienna (1972/1992) . The present writer is preparing a report on the sources for the Symphony because neither Haas nor Nowak provided a critical apparatus for their editions.

(2) « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke : Kritische Gesamtausgabe, xxiv/2, Briefe, 1887-1896. » , edited by Andrea Harrandt and Otto Schneider (†) , Vienna (2003) ; page 114.

(3) « Anton Bruckner, Achte Symphonie (in C-Moll) für großes Orchester. » , edited by Haslinger-Schlessinger-Lienau, Berlin and Vienna (1892) .

(4) For much of the 20th Century, Hermann Levi's rejection of the Symphony was the subject of a notorious apocryphal anecdote. Levi was alleged to have been afraid to tell the composer that he did not understand the new Symphony and, therefore, could not conduct it. According to the anecdote, he asked their mutual acquaintance, Josef Schalk, to communicate the bad news to Bruckner. Fortunately, Levi's letter of rejection directly to the composer, dated 7 October 1887, has been found and published. (Andrea Harrandt. « Bruckner Briefe » , Band 2 ; page 23.)

(5) Including the score that Bruckner sent to Levi and the parts that were prepared in Mannheim for Felix Weingartner. (Andrea Harrandt. « Bruckner Briefe » , Band 2 ; pages 94 and 120.)

(6) Dermot Gault. « Anton Bruckner Symphony No. 8 Intermediate Adagio : Critical Commentary. » Gault's commentary accompanies an edition of an intermediate version of the Adagio preserved in a copy-score, Austrian National Library Mus. Hs. 34.614.

(7) See : Leopold Nowak. « Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung. » , in : « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift 10/5 » (1955) ; pages 157-158. Dermot Gault. « The 1890 Version of Bruckner's 8th - Haas contra Nowak. » , in : « The Bruckner Journal » , 8/3 (2004) ; pages 17-25. And « For Later Times. » , in : « The Musical Times » , 131/6 (June 1996) ; pages 12-19.

(8) Andrea Harrandt. « Bruckner Briefe », Band 2 ; page 114.

(9) Manfred Wagner. « Der Wandel des Konzepts : Zu den verschiedenen Fassungen von Bruckners Dritter, Vierter und Achter Sinfonie. », Vienna (1980) ; pages 39-52. « Bruckner Sämtliche Werke, 3, Revisionsbericht. », edited by Thomas Röder, Vienna (1997) ; pages 241-245. « Bruckner Sämtliche Werke », 4/3. , edited by Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, Vienna (2004) ; « Vorwort » .

(10) The letters are preserved as : Fonds 32 Oberleithner 168. They have been printed in part, in : Thomas Leibnitz. « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner », Tützing (1988) ; page 276. « Anton Bruckner zum 150. Geburtstag », edited by Franz Grasberger, Vienna (1974) ; page 33. Leopold Nowak. « Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung » ; page 158. They will be included in the forthcoming 2nd edition of Bruckner letters edited by Andrea Harrandt.

(11) Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt. « Symphony No. 8 », Cambridge (2000) ; pages 24-25, 88-90 and 93.

(12) See, for example : Werner Wolff. « Anton Bruckner Rustic Genius. », New York (1942) ; pages 261-262.

8e Symphonie de Bruckner (Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt)

Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony (1890) , one of the great Romantic Symphonies, is a grandly complex Masterpiece. Its critical reception has been fascinatingly contentious. Its music, at once extensive and distilled, directly confronts the problem of the Symphony after Beethoven and after Wagner. This section explores this many-faceted work from several angles. It documents the complicated and often misunderstood history of the Symphony's composition and revision and offers an accessible guide to its musical design. It demonstrates, by means of a study of well-known recordings, how performance styles have evolved in the 20th Century. It also revisits the conventional wisdom about the various versions and editions of the Symphony and comes to some provocative new conclusions.

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt is Assistant Professor of Music at the University of Saint-Thomas, Saint-Paul, Minnesota. He is currently writing a book on Bruckner and musical culture in the decades around 1900.

CAMBRIDGE MUSIC HANDBOOKS

Julian Rushton

The Pitt Building, Trumpington Street, Cambridge, United Kingdom.

The Edinburgh Building, Cambridge CB2 2RU, United Kingdom.

40 West 20th Street, New York, NY 10011-4211, USA.

477 Williamstown Road, Port Melbourne, VIC 3207, Australia.

Ruiz de Alarcón 13, 28014 Madrid, Spain.

Dock House, The Waterfront, Cape Town 8001, South Africa.

<http://www.cambridge.org>

© Cambridge University Press (2004) .

1st published in printed format in 2000.

ISBN 0-511-03588-8 eBook (Adobe Reader) .

ISBN 0-521-63226-9 (hardback) .

ISBN 0-521-63537-3 (paperback) .

For Paula and Sam.

Preface and acknowledgments

A note on editions and terminology

Introduction

Placing the 8th Symphony

The genesis and evolution of the 8th Symphony

The musical design and symphonic agenda of the 8th

The Adagio and the sublime

The 1887 version and the 1890 version

The 1892 edition, authorship, and performance practice

Appendix A : Haas's edition of the 8th Symphony

Appendix B : Textual differences between the Finale in the 1890 version and the 1892 edition

...

Preface and acknowledgments

Scholarly writing about Bruckner typically follows certain well-worn paths ; in particular, it tends to grant great emphasis to the notorious editorial problems that attend this composer's works. This study does undoubtedly devote more attention to text-critical concerns than do most others in the Handbook series, partly because the textual history of the 8th Symphony is complex and important, and partly because modern understanding of it is, as I hope to show, somewhat mistaken.

Editorial issues can, if approached with a critical spirit, open out into regions of broader significance, such as hermeneutics, reception history, and performance practice ; yet, I believe that the « Bruckner Problem » is ordinarily framed too simplistically, and that a reductive concern with textual authenticity has come to loom too large in the imagination of most Brucknerians. For these reasons, some parts of this study, notably Chapters 3 and 4, are deliberately unburdened by text-critical concerns.

Books that are apt for teaching advanced courses on late- 19th Century music are not thick on the ground. I have borne this in mind while writing this study, and will be gratified if it finds use in the classroom. I have tried to provide enough variety amongst the chapters to offer some small methodological range (from critical analysis and reception history, to textual history, with even a hint of the history of ideas in the Chapter on the sublime) for an enterprising teacher to build upon.

I owe great thanks to my wife Paula for her staunch support and help, and for her patience in hearing great gusts of and about the 8th Symphony. Our son Sam was, like Paula, a constant, glowing beacon of light and love.

Many other people earned my gratitude by offering me assistance of various kinds. Laurence Dreyfus generously shared with me the text of a crucial letter from Hetrmann Levi to Anton Bruckner he had uncovered in Munich. Morten Solvik, Derek Scott and Juan Cahis gave me copies of then-unpublished articles. Henry Lea and Lionel Tacchini aided me with some knotty problems of translation. Dermot Gault, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, Paul Hawkshaw, and John Allan Phillips helped me with some details about manuscript sources. Amie McEvoy of The Musical Quarterly responded with courtesy and promptness to an importune request, as did the Music Division of the Library of Congress. Thomas Christensen and David Aldeborgh lent me copies of rare scores. The conductor Georg Tintner shared with me some perceptive thoughts about the different versions of the Symphony. Lani Spahr and Dave Griegel gave me invaluable discographic assistance, as did Mark Kluge. He and William Carragan both read portions of the manuscript and generously shared with me insights and ideas about textual issues and the history of Bruckner performance. I also thank Julian Rushton for his many helpful editorial suggestions, and Penny Souster for suggesting the project to me. Thanks, too, to the Bruckner Gang.

Throughout the course of my work I was thankful to be dealing with a Symphony of such superb depth and complex satisfaction.

My final months of work on the book were supported by a Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities, for which I am grateful.

A note on editions and terminology

4 distinct editions of the 8th Symphony have been published : the 1st published score (Berlin and Vienna : Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau, 1892 - plate number 8288 ; later reprinted by Eulenburg, Peters, and Universal Edition) , Robert Haas's edition (Leipzig : Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, 1939) , and Leopold Nowak's critical editions of Bruckner's 1890 and 1887 versions (Vienna : Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, 1955 and 1972, respectively) .

Nowak's 2 editions are primary. These scores, which are based closely on Bruckner's manuscript scores of the Symphony, are widely accepted by scholars as definitive and are easily available. They are generally identified in this text as simply « the 1887 version » and « the 1890 version » . Nowak's edition of the 1890 version is the central source of the 8th Symphony, and unless otherwise noted, the discussions in this study are based on it.

The edition published in 1939 by Nowak's predecessor, Robert Haas, is not a reasonably faithful representation of either of Bruckner's versions, and is not therefore of primary concern in this study. See Appendix A for a commentary on Haas's edition.

The text of the 8th Symphony contained in the 1892 edition differs in some ways from the text of Bruckner's manuscript score of the 1890 version. It raises special questions, and is discussed in detail in Chapter 6. It is referred to herein as « the 1892 edition » .

Introduction

Meine Achte ist ein Mysterium !

Bruckner's 8th Symphony, the last he completed, embodies the composer's work, with all of its complexities and contradictions, in its late flowering. This Symphony, at once extensive and distilled, has attracted the passionate attention of listeners, musicians, scholars, and critics, yet, it remains fascinatingly inscrutable. Bruckner was correct : the 8th Symphony has proven a mystery. Of all of his Symphonies, it poses the most elaborate questions. Musically, it stands in complex relationship with the Symphonic genre. The grandeur, expressive intensity, and scope of the work directly confront the problem of the Symphony after Beethoven and after Wagner, and with its vaguely articulated program it inhabits the crucial space « between absolute and program music » . (2) In performance, the Symphony has always challenged both interpreters and listeners, and has engendered both exuberant praise and vociferous criticism.

Nowadays to address the 8th Symphony, or indeed any facet of Bruckner's work, critically means inevitably attending to modern traditions of reception. Our perceptions of Bruckner are mediated by the conceptual residue of preceding generations of interpreters ; this is true of any artist, but with Bruckner the situation is particularly acute.

Images of Bruckner as a simple genius, an unwitting mystic, a « Parsifal » -like naïf have long shaped attitudes toward him and his music. His music is also shadowed by a long tradition of negative criticism. In the 19th Century, one important body of opinion decried Bruckner's compositional approach as illogical, incapable of supporting large-scale structures, and thus fundamentally unsuited to the genre of the Symphony.

The charge continues to sound in this Century ; American reception of Bruckner in particular still betrays its traces. Bruckner's music largely does not figure in the American musicological canon, and perhaps because of the great influence of Heinrich Schenker, who frankly disdained Bruckner's music, American music theorists have all but ignored Bruckner. The belief that Bruckner is a « lesser composer » is not uncommon in many academic circles. (3) Although the partiality and mistakenness of these notions are increasingly evident, they are so well entrenched in public consciousness that new interpretations remain dependent on them, if only negatively.

Modern understanding of the musical text of the 8th Symphony is also oddly partial. The compositional history of the Symphony was unusually involved and circuitous, and scholars have both elucidated and obscured the genesis and evolution of the work. On the one hand, Leopold Nowak's publication (in 1972) of the initial version of the Symphony made available a text of signal importance that had been unpublished for more than 80 years. On the other hand, our understanding of the final version of the Symphony has been complicated and indeed clouded by modern editors. The text of the Symphony that was published by Bruckner, in 1892, and which was the only score known and performed for nearly 5 decades, has been entirely abandoned as an inauthentic redaction. While this position is not without some basis in fact, it misconstrues the significance of the 1892 edition and obscures an important historical phase of the Symphony. Finally, the 1st modern edition of the Symphony, edited by Robert Haas in 1939 and successfully promoted as the 1st publication of Bruckner's authentic text, is in reality something quite different. Haas's edition, which has found many partisans, does rely in the main on Bruckner's final manuscript text, but it also contains substantial editorial reworking and conflates parts of 2 distinct versions (see Appendix A) . Bruckner's final manuscript text was not published until 1955.

Clearly, the 8th Symphony invites interpretation, both as musical work and as historical text. This study accepts this invitation by thinking through anew its music, its genesis, its reception, and its various meanings.

Placing the 8th Symphony

In late- 19th Century Vienna, the Symphony was fraught with cultural significance ; it was widely seen as the musical genre, if not the art form, that most directly could, as Paul Bekker later put it, build a « community of feeling » , a process of acute significance in the Habsburg Empire at a time when the old Imperial system was increasingly strained by ethnic, nationalist, and democratic impulses. As a result, music became the focus of great cultural and political energy, and æsthetic judgments of 10 encoded cultural politics ; in particular, Wagner and the « Music of the Future » excited nationalist, Socialist, racist, and aestheticist sentiments and fueled the energies of segments of society, especially youth, alienated by the liberalism and rationalism of the established social order. Bruckner's Symphonies, with their epic grandeur, monumentality, expressive fervor, and harmonic complexity, were widely linked to this Wagnerian ethos and cast as radical counterweights to the concert works of Brahms, who hewed more closely to traditional stylistic canons and, not coincidentally, was solidly entrenched as the composer of the Viennese bourgeois establishment. The critical reception of Bruckner's Symphonies makes it quite clear that, intentionally or not, they antagonized segments of the haute bourgeoisie.

It was in this context that the 8th Symphony received its premiere. The Symphony was the sole work in the Vienna Philharmonic subscription concert conducted by Hans Richter, on 18 December 1892. Bruckner's music had only rarely appeared on the program of a Philharmonic subscription concert. (2) The Philharmonic was a great bastion of bourgeois traditionalism and its regular patrons were generally ill-disposed (culturally and politically as well as musically) toward Bruckner's music. The 8th, which was accompanied by a lengthy explanatory program written by Bruckner's young advocate Josef Schalk, did not go down easily with the Philharmonic subscribers, many of whom left after each movement. Eduard Hanslick, the « éminence grise » of the group, ostentatiously left before the Finale, and his departure was greeted by sarcastic applause from Bruckner's supporters. (Bruckner later said that had Hanslick stayed, he would only have been « even angrier by the end » .) (3) In contrast, the concert generated great interest in other circles (it produced the season's biggest sale of standing room tickets) and the hall held many enthusiasts in addition to the dubious old guard. (4) Brahms attended the concert, as did many prominent supporters of Bruckner, including Hugo Wolf, Johann Strauß, Siegfried Wagner, Crown Princess Stephanie, Archduchess Maria Theresa, and the Bayreuth ideologue Houston Stewart Chamberlain. (The Emperor, to whom the Symphony was dedicated, was off on a hunting trip.)

Previous Viennese performances of Bruckner's Symphonies had invariably provoked energetic disagreement among competing factions of the musical community. An influential segment of Viennese musical opinion headed by Hanslick and Brahms vigorously opposed Bruckner's claim on the Symphonic genre. Bruckner was hailed in other quarters as the herald of a new epoch of the Symphony, and as Beethoven's true heir. The premiere of the 8th Symphony marked a turning point in this conflict. While the concert did not wholly win over Bruckner's antagonists, it did seem to convince them that, if nothing else, Bruckner had finally secured a lasting place as a Symphonist. As Theodor Helm saw it, « the artistic triumph Bruckner celebrated on 18 December belongs among the most brilliant of his fame-filled career, because the tumultuous applause came not only from his friends and admirers, but from the entire public » . (5) One reviewer even suggested that « a breath of reconciliation wafted over the parties that have battled for years for and against Bruckner » . (6) Even Hanslick's famously negative review of the Symphony betrays a hint of placation :

« I found this newest one, as I have found the other Bruckner Symphonies, interesting in detail, but strange as a whole, indeed repellent. The peculiarity of this work consists, to put it briefly, of importing Wagner's dramatic style into the Symphony. In each of the 4 movements, especially the 1st and 3rd, some interesting passages, flashes of genius, shine through - if only the rest of it was not there ! It is not impossible that the future belongs to this nightmarish hangover style - a future we therefore do not envy ! » (7)

Hanslick had a long, difficult, and personal, relationship with Bruckner. In the early 1870's, when Bruckner was still a relatively minor figure, Hanslick wrote favorably of him as organist and church composer, but, in 1874-1875, Hanslick staunchly, and ultimately ineffectively, opposed Bruckner's efforts to obtain a position at the University of Vienna (where Hanslick was on the faculty) . As Bruckner's prestige and international success as a Symphonic composer waxed (and as his Wagnerian affiliations grew clearer) Hanslick's opposition intensified. In the 1880's, he wrote a series of openly antagonistic reviews of Viennese performances of Bruckner's Symphonies. Soon, Hanslick's position became so obvious and the battle-lines so clearly drawn that his criticism became a sort of reverse praise : in 1886, an advertisement for Bruckner's 7th Symphony included not only the expected plaudits from various critics, but also Hanslick's verdict that the work was « unnaturally presumptuous, diseased and pernicious » (« unnatürlich aufgeblasen, krankhaft, und verderblich ») . (8)

By these standards, Hanslick's review of the 8th is not decisively damning. Less than alarm and vituperation, it expresses a rather resigned concession that personal taste aside, Bruckner's star might, for better or worse, be ascendant. Hanslick's « protégé » , Max Kalbeck, also admitted stubborn praise :

« Overall, the Symphony made a surprisingly favourable impression. It surpasses Bruckner's earlier works in clarity of arrangement, lucidity of organization, incisiveness of expression, refinement of detail, and logic of thought, but this in no way means that we should accept it as a model of its genre worthy of imitation. » (9)

Like Hanslick, Kalbeck acknowledged the work's relative merits, but he still suggested that « a 3rd of the expansive score » could well « be thrown overboard » and with his disavowal of the work as a « model » , he betrayed a deeper uneasiness over what the work and its success might portend.

Bruckner's partisans saw the work as a culminating achievement, even, as one critic put it, « unreservedly, the crown of music of our time » . (10) These enthusiasts judged the work by different standards than did Hanslick and Kalbeck ; they were less troubled by the Symphony's novelties of form and style, and more impressed by its expressive intensity and compositional boldness. Many also felt that it embodied a sympathetic « Weltanschauung » . A review published in the Catholic paper « Das Vaterland » , which lauded Bruckner for « blazing a path of conviction » , explicitly rejected classicizing standards of evaluation and directly took issue with the « main charge » leveled at Bruckner, namely « shortcoming of logic in the structure of his works » . « It is not to be denied » , wrote the anonymous reviewer, « that Bruckner's fantasy reaches beyond the established artforms, that some contrasts strike us as overt, that some repetitions appear superfluous. But how do such actions infringe on logic ? This is precisely greatness and sublimity in Symphonic artworks : the Master does indeed find a framework for the new creation of his fantasy in the basic pattern of the old building, but the fresh springs of his creative powers must not seep away into the ruins of rigid artforms. » (11)

Josef Stolzing, writing in the « völkisch » journal « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » , explained the significance of the 8th with words worthy of Bayreuth : « What makes Bruckner so valuable a musician is his unconscious recognition of the true mission of music, namely the direct illustration of the primordial (" urewig ") shaping, destroying, conflicting world-feeling elements (" Welt-Gefühls-Elemente ") . » (12) Hugo Wolf wrote simply, « this Symphony is the work of a giant and surpasses the other Symphonies of the Master in intellectual scope, awesomeness, and greatness. Its success was a complete victory of light over darkness » . (13) This success was measured at least as much by the relatively conciliatory reactions of Bruckner's old nemeses as by the praise of his partisans.

Changing critical criteria

Over the last Century, the critical coordinates by which the 8th Symphony has been located have shifted and shifted again. For the 1st decades of its existence, judgments of the Symphony were still generally framed by the poles established in Bruckner's Vienna. Laudatory responses unreservedly (and usually airily) praised the spiritual depth and expressive strength of the Symphony, often to the edge of hagiolatry : Karl Grunsky wrote that, « in the 8th, strife and struggle emerge with primeval force. One thinks inevitably of Prometheus or Faust. » (14) Negative appraisals carried forward Hanslick's line of criticism and focused on Bruckner's perceived lack of logical coherence and stylistic propriety. Schenker, to take an acute example, found in the 8th a disturbing mixture of thematic inspiration and compositional failure. The Symphony « begins so splendidly, like the beginning of the world » , but soon loses its way as Bruckner is betrayed by his inability « to allow 2 musical thoughts (" Gedanken ") to follow each other properly » . Thus he can only « seek vainly to spin a thought by adding up moments of inspiration » and this « will not achieve unity » . « The individual tone-words (" Tonworte ") follow one another without necessary connection so that the thought admits no inner need for a middle, a beginning, or even an end. » (15) Like Hanslick and Kalbeck, Schenker's severe judgment contained a hint of ethical rebuke. Commenting on the « monotonous, clumsy » 2nd movement Trio, Schenker wrote, « in music, there are not only beautiful and unbeautiful thoughts, but also good and bad » . (16) Schenker concluded, « thought-substance (" Gedankenmaterial ") of worth (of goodness and beauty) is forfeited by such bad presentation. And in this sense, I say, all of Bruckner's works are, despite their entirely singular flights of Symphonic fancy, simply badly written » . (17)

Sustained discussion of the musical substance of the 8th Symphony has always been quite rare, yet, in the 1920's, 2 sympathetic music analysts wrote extended essays on the work. Ernst Kurth discussed the Symphony in depth in his extraordinary study, « Bruckner » . Kurth's exhaustive discussion (which covers 65 pages) cuts an unusual path between technical analysis and metaphorical exegesis ; it traces the entire Symphony with sparing recourse to analytical terminology, or even musical examples, yet, succeeds in explicating the phenomenal progress of the music's unfolding with acute perspicacity. (18) Hugo Leichtentritt wrote an extensive essay on the 8th (which was incorporated into the 3rd and subsequent editions of his « Musikalische Formenlehre ») that was designed to complement Kurth's analysis by detailing the « technical, structural features of the Symphony » not covered in the earlier author's « philosophical, æsthetic » study. (19) Kurth and Leichtentritt differed in their choice of emphasis (Kurth was far more interested in metaphysical symbolism, Leichtentritt more willing to provide detailed harmonic explanation) yet both essays, with their length and detail, respected the ineluctable complexity of Symphonic meaning and resisted the urge to substitute verbal formulas for musical experience.

In the 1930's, the landscape of Bruckner interpretation changed fundamentally. During this decade, the 1st modern collected edition of Bruckner's works, edited by Robert Haas, set-out to present the world, for the 1st time, with the « pure » and « true » texts of Bruckner's music. (20) Haas's version of the 8th Symphony (1939) differed radically from the previously available editions, and was based on questionable philology (see Appendix A) . Also, in the 3rd « Reich » , Anton Bruckner's image and his Symphonies were appropriated as symbols of the Nazi ideal of German Art and, as a result, the « völkisch » tendencies that had long coloured the support Bruckner received in some quarters magnified terribly. In 1939, for example, Haas willfully described the 8th in terms of contemporary cultural politics. He claimed the Symphony as the « transfiguration » of the « deutscher Michel-Mythos » , and suggested that this myth was finally reaching historical reality with the emergence of the « idea of greater Germany » (« der großdeutschen Idee ») . Haas concluded that this aspiration was embodied by the fact that the « restored score (i.e. , his edition) could ring out as a greeting from " Ostmark " (the Nazi term for Austria) precisely in this year » : a transparently political statement a year after the annexation of Austria (and weeks after the occupation of Haas's native Czechoslovakia) .

(21)

After the War, when the ideological complicity of the fascist (and the earlier proto-fascist) Bruckner tradition seemed all too clear, commentators properly recoiled from the legacy of Nazi-era Bruckner criticism, and effectively broke with many of the interpretive approaches that had prevailed in previous decades. (In the process, many early 20th Century connections were also severed and the tradition of Bruckner interpretation cut by the divide of the 1930's.) Partly because of this, the highly-charged, impassioned partisanship that the 8th inspired in its 1st half Century of existence waned. (22) Modern scholars have, with a few notable exceptions, been most comfortable addressing such relatively cool topics as textual criticism and formal analysis while leaving aside the passionate concern 19th Century critics had for the musical value and spiritual significance of Bruckner's Symphonies. In other ways too, modern Bruckner reception exhibits an ahistorical mien. Modern notions of editorial propriety have prompted us to forget all too well the text of the 8th Symphony that was known in Bruckner's time. Current approaches to the performance of Bruckner's works similarly show little concern with history.

We face special problems, then, in placing the 8th Symphony. For various reasons, many latter-day critics and scholars have been tempted to play Bruckner's advocate and treat his music with sympathy so deferential that it courts condescension, and posthumously balance the critical ledger. Bruckner's music often therefore comes to us wrapped in a cloak of historicist piety that paradoxically thwarts the pursuit of more meaningfully historical understanding. To think freshly and critically about the 8th Symphony, or any of his works, requires the diligence, as Adorno wrote of Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » , to « alienate it » , to break through the crust of latter-day reception that « protectively surrounds it » . (23) This can happen only if we are willing to prove our interpretations, and the ideas upon which they rest, against the historical density of the Symphony's musical texts, its reception, and its original ideation.

The genesis and evolution of the 8th Symphony

The arduousness of Bruckner's process of composition and, especially, his habits of revision are legendary ; yet, even by these standards, the 8th Symphony had a long and difficult genesis and evolution. It was revised by the composer and exists in 2 distinct versions (1887 and 1890) ; the circumstances surrounding its revision were unusually complex ; and its path to performance and publication was tortuous. This chapter chronicles the long journey of this Symphony from its initial composition in 1884-1887, through its rejection by Hermann Levi in October 1887, its recomposition by Bruckner in 1889 and 1890, and its performance and publication in 1892.

The composition of the 1st version

The 8th Symphony originated between the summer of 1884 and August 1887, a time when Bruckner's career was reaching high tide. He had recently completed 2 of his most successful and powerful works, the 7th Symphony and the « Te Deum », both of which were published in 1885. While Bruckner was at work on the 8th, the 7th enjoyed a pair of triumphant initial performances in Leipzig, on 30 December 1884, and in Munich, on 10 March 1885, and several subsequent performances in Cologne, Chicago, Hamburg, New York, Amsterdam, Graz, Berlin, London, Dresden, and Budapest, as well as Vienna. The « Te Deum », the 3rd Symphony (at that time, the only other of Bruckner's Symphonies available in print), and the String Quintet were also performed several times during these years. It was during this time of optimism and success that Bruckner set to work on the 8th Symphony. He sketched the 1st movement in August 1884, in the cathedral town of Kremsmünster, during his habitual summer sojourn in Upper-Austria.

The composition, revision, and publication of the 8th Symphony :

Composition of the 1st version : July 1884 through August 1887.

Composition of the 1st movement : Summer 1884.

Composition of the Adagio : November 1884 to February 1885.

Composition of the Scherzo and Finale : 23 July to 16 August 1885.

Orchestration of Scherzo and 1st movement : September - October 1885.

Orchestration of 1st movement and Adagio : February 1886.

Adagio installed as 3rd movement : Summer 1886.

Orchestration of Adagio and Finale : August - September 1886.

Orchestration of Finale is completed : March - April 1887.

Finalization of 1st version and copying of a finished score : July - August 1887.

Hermann Levi's rejection of the 1st version : September - October 1887.

Preparation of the 2nd version : March 1889 to January 1890.

Revision of the Adagio : March to May 1889.

Revision of the Finale : July 1889.

Revision of the Scherzo and Trio : September 1889.

Revision of the 1st movement : November 1889.

Bruckner declares « last note written » : 29 January 1890.

Copy of score prepared by Viktor Christ : February 1890.

Publication and performance : 1890-1892.

Emperor Franz-Josef accepts the dedication of the 8th Symphony : March 1890.

Preparations for Felix Weingartner's planned performance : October 1890 to March 1891.

Preparation of score for publication : Summer 1891.

Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau publishes the full-score : March 1892.

1st performance by the Vienna Philharmonic under Hans Richter : 18 December 1892.

Bruckner's faculty duties at the University of Vienna and the Vienna Conservatory severely limited his compositional activities during the academic year ; thus, like Gustav Mahler a generation later, Bruckner composed primarily during the summer. By late September 1884, when Bruckner returned to Vienna to resume teaching the movement was fully drafted in short score, and, on 23 September, he played through it on the piano for Josef Schalk and Robert Hirsch. (2) The Adagio (which was originally planned as the 2nd movement) was drafted between November 1884 and February 1885, with an interruption for his trip to Leipzig at the end of December to attend the 1st performance of his 7th Symphony. He then left off work on the 8th until the summer.

Bruckner returned to the work with renewed energy upon his arrival in Steyr, in late July 1885. On 7 July 1885, he wrote to Arthur Nikisch that he intended to work « quickly » . (3) He did. He drafted the Scherzo and Trio in the space of only 4 days (23 to 26 July) and immediately began to compose the Finale, which was largely drafted by 1 August and finished later that month. It is remarkable to note that the opening of this movement, which in its final form opens on a harmonically remote F, was 1st conceived, and sketched at some length, beginning on F. (4) The completed draft of the final pages of the Finale is signed : « Steyr, " Stadtpfarrhof " 16 August 1885. A. Bruckner.

Halleluja ! » (5) Later that same day, Bruckner reported enthusiastically to Franz Schalk that « the 8th Symphony is just now finished (but only) in draft (alas) . The Finale is the most significant movement of my life » . (6)

Although extremely few sketch materials from Bruckner's previous works are extant, many drafts and sketches for the 8th Symphony are preserved (the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » alone has more than 30 items containing sketches, drafts, and fragments of the work) . (7) These include not only continuity drafts and compositional scores, but also a number of early sketches, which provide a rare opportunity to glimpse Bruckner's compositional methods. Bruckner devoted considerable effort to exploring the compositional potential of motivic and thematic ideas ; he worked at length, for example, with the main-theme of the Finale, trying-out the theme itself and its bass in various contrapuntal combinations, worked in canon, inverted, in diminution, set in contrary motion variation, and so forth. (8)

Early sketch of the Adagio, December 1884

Nota Bene : Bruckner often did not notate key signatures in his sketches, but rather indicated keys verbally (e.g. , « Des dur » : D major) . This transcription supplies the key signatures Bruckner indicated. The signature for F minor seems to apply as early as measure 5.

Bruckner's 1st sketch of the Adagio is fascinating in this respect ; these 12 measures contain the kernel of much of the completed movement. Some elements are already quite fully formed, notably the opening motive, with its dotted rhythm, chromatic neighbor-note figure, and its juxtaposition of tonic major and tonic minor. The rising 6th is also already present but the scale-wise descent that follows in the final version is here only adumbrated. The 2nd half of the sketch contains a germinal version of the culmination of the opening thematic group. Measures 7 and 8 of the sketch show the rising arpeggio figure (already on A) that was to become measures 15-17 of the finished movement, although in the sketch this figure is more static than it was to become, lacking as it does both the quintuplet turn figure and the conclusive scalar ascent to the high A it later gained. Measures 9-12 of the sketch, on the other hand, are extremely similar to the final text (save for the extraneous B. in measure 12) . This sketch also contains some elements that were to appear subsequently in rather different form and context. The rhythm and contour of measure 5 supplied the motivic basis of the 2nd thematic group of the Adagio (beginning in measure 47 in the 1890 version) , and the dissonant superimposition of D. above the tonic D # / C. that is so important in the finished movement already hovers about the music (measures 5-7) . Here, Bruckner's compositional process works-out from the 1st E in fall ; it was a matter of sorting-out the elements and giving them effective shape, whether that meant simply sharpening them (as with the A major arpeggio) , using them as the basis for a separate thematic section (as with the motive in measure 5 of the sketch) , or developing their tonal and harmonic potential (as with the D/C opposition) .

Bruckner soon began to convert his short-score drafts into a full orchestral score. Between late August and October 1885, he orchestrated the Trio and began to score the Scherzo (which was still the 3rd movement) . He then began the score of the 1st movement, but only reached the middle of the movement (rehearsal K) ,before he broke-off work on the project. In February, he returned to finish the 1st movement and began to orchestrate the Adagio, which was still in place as the 2nd movement. Again, his work was interrupted until August, when, back in Steyr, he completed the score of the Adagio, which was now finally installed as the 3rd movement, and moved on to the Finale. (9) He worked briefly on the orchestration of the Finale in September and October 1886, but soon temporarily stopped. On 16 November 1886, he wrote to Hermann Levi in a mood tinged by resignation and weariness :

« I still don't know when the 8th Symphony will be finished ; after all, I have 7 other Symphonies. » (10)

He returned to the project later that winter ; on 23 February 1887, in a letter to Elisabeth Kietz, he explained why his correspondence had flagged :

« It is the 8th ... So little time to work ! It makes me desperate. » (11)

He finished the score of the Finale on 22 April 1887. (12)

In the summer of 1887, once again back in Upper-Austria, Bruckner reviewed his manuscript one last time and had a copy of the score prepared by Karl (Borromäus) Aigner, one of his local copyists. (13) The copying was finished on 9 August. By then, Bruckner had begun to sketch the 1st movement of his 9th Symphony.

The Levi « affair »

On 4 September 1887, soon after the copy of the score was finished, Bruckner wrote to Hermann Levi in Munich :

« Hallelujah ! The 8th is finally ready and " mein künstlerischer Vater " (my artistic father) must be the 1st to know ... I would like to ask you, noble sir, for the (1st) performance of the 8th. » (14)

Levi responded with interest, and, on 19 September, Bruckner sent him the score. The accompanying note enthused :

« May it find favour ! My joy at the anticipated performance given by your noble, masterful hands is quite indescribable. » (15)

Upon studying the score, however, Levi concluded that he was unable to perform it. Bruckner, understandably deeply dismayed, withdrew from the work for some 18 months, re-worked it, and finally succeeded in having it published and performed in 1892.

The story of Hermann Levi's rejection of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony is customarily told as a tragic tale : the conductor's refusal to perform the Symphony staggers the composer who, with fractured confidence, proceeds to revise not only the work in question but several others over the course of several years. Commonly, these revisions are judged ill-advised and ineffective, and are blamed for diverting Bruckner from further composition of other potentially important works. (Some writers have even mawkishly suggested that, in this way, the Levi « affair » was ultimately responsible for Bruckner's failure to complete his 9th Symphony. (16)

This story needs to be revisited. Not only has our view of Bruckner's personality and biography evolved away from old images of beset genius, but important new evidence (notably Levi's long-lost letter to Bruckner explaining his response to the score) has turned-up recently.

Levi and Bruckner first became acquainted at the Bayreuth Festivals of 1882 and 1884, and, in 1884, Bruckner arranged to have a score of the 7th Symphony sent to the conductor. Levi wrote that, initially, the work « took me aback, then fascinated me, and, finally, I developed tremendous respect for the man who could have created something so unusual and significant » (although, as he later admitted, he long remained rather befuddled by the Finale) . (17)

On 10 March 1885, in Munich, Levi conducted the Symphony, which had received its premiere in Leipzig under Nikisch, in December 1884. This concert was the greatest triumph Bruckner had yet experienced ; he was called to the stage by applause after each movement and the work was received warmly by the Munich press. On the following day, at the « Hoftheater » , Levi indulgently replaced the scheduled Opera, Viktor Nessler's « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » , with Bruckner's beloved « Die Walküre » . Levi further honoured his guest when the performance was over ; he had the brass section play the « Trauermusik » from the Coda of the Adagio of the 7th Symphony, 3 times. (18)

The following day featured a performance, again organized by Levi, of Bruckner's String Quintet.

Levi also aided Bruckner in less direct ways, often making good use of his connections to the Bavarian Court. After performing the 7th Symphony, Levi helped arrange for its publication. Not only did he intercede on Bruckner's behalf to help secure King Ludwig II's acceptance of the dedication but he was instrumental in raising the subvention required by the publisher, Albert Gutmann. In 1886, he worked to secure publication of Bruckner's 4th Symphony (again with Gutmann) , and, again, Levi raised the funds to pay the publisher's fee. In July 1886, Bruckner was awarded the « Ritterkreuz » of the Order of Franz-Josef (which brought with it an annuity of 300 Florins) and, again, Levi's influence was helpful. The primary instigator of this award was Princess Amélie of Bavaria, who had been deeply moved by Levi's performance of Bruckner's « Te Deum » , on 7 April 1886, and was quite taken by Bruckner himself. She expressed her enthusiasm to the conductor, and, in a long letter, Levi endorsed Amélie's assessment of Bruckner's great artistic importance and suggested that he might well merit royal support. (19)

Thus emboldened, she wrote to the Austrian Archduchess Marie Valerie, the youngest daughter of Franz-Josef, who proposed the idea of honoring Bruckner with the « Ritterkreuz » . (20)

Bruckner recognized Levi's role in this award and wrote to him :

« I have received the Order of Franz-Josef and 300 Florins annually ! This is your work, " Herr Hofkapellmeister " ! I know it for certain ! Eternal thanks from the bottom of my heart ! » (21)

Again, Levi offered decisive support for the honorary doctorate awarded to Bruckner by the University of Vienna, in 1891. Asked about Bruckner's significance as a composer, Levi responded with a testimonial that sang Bruckner's praises very boldly :

« Bruckner is, in my view, by far, the most important Symphonist of the post-Beethovenian period. » (22)

Obviously, Levi was a vigorous intercessor or, as Bruckner himself put it, his « noblest benefactor » (« edelsten Gönner ») . (23)

Levi had long been interested in the prospect of Bruckner's 8th Symphony and in light of the tremendous support he had offered Bruckner during the composition of the work, it is little surprise that the composer offered him the 1st performance. Things did not turn-out as either man would have wished. Levi's response to the work is remarkable, both in its musical judgments and for its genuine concern with Bruckner's feelings. He wrote 1st to Josef Schalk :

« Simply put : I cannot find myself in the 8th Symphony and do not have the courage to perform it. The orchestra and the public will, of this I am certain, offer great resistance. I am terribly disappointed ! I've studied it for days and can't make it my own. Far be it from me to pass judgment (it is possible that I'm deluded, that I'm too old or too dumb) but I find the instrumentation impossible and what has especially alarmed me is the great similarity with the 7th ; it virtually copies the form. The beginning of the 1st movement is grandiose, but with the development I don't know where to begin.

And the last movement : it is a closed book to me.

What to do now ! I dread the thought of the effect this report will have on our friend. I can't write to him. Shall I suggest to him that he might hear the working rehearsal here ? In my desperation, I have given the score to a musician here who's a good friend, and he also believes that a performance is impossible. Please write to me immediately about how I should act with Bruckner. When all is done, if he considers mean ass or, what would be worse, a traitor (einen Treulosen) , I can accept it. But I fear worse, that this disappointment will completely crush him. Help me, I don't know what to do ! » (24)

In a letter that is now lost, Schalk advised Levi to write directly to Bruckner, and, on 7 October, Levi did so, pronouncing his opinion of the 8th Symphony and informing the composer that he could not perform it. This letter was unknown for many years (Levi's draft copy of the letter was only recently unearthed in Munich by Laurence Dreyfus - and, in the absence of Schalk's letter to Levi, it was commonly assumed that Levi conveyed his message to Bruckner indirectly through Schalk. Now, we can see that Levi did indeed directly inform Bruckner of his opinion of the work, and that he communicated what was obviously a very painful decision with admirable frankness. (25)

« Dear and revered friend,

For the last 8 days already, I have been occupied with writing you (in my mind) long letters. Never in my life have I found it so difficult to find the right words for what I need to say ! But it can't be put-off any longer ...

So : I find it impossible to perform the 8th in its current form. I just can't make it my own ! As much as the themes are magnificent and direct, their working-out seems to me dubious ; indeed, I consider the orchestration quite impossible. The performance of the 8th in a subscription concert would be a risk which, in your interest, I must not take ... I have pored over the score for hours, yea days, but I have not come closer to the work ... Release me from my promise to perform the work, I would certainly conduct it badly, too, let me put on the Romantic (i.e. , the 4th Symphony) in November ! Write to me soon, whatever it is, but do let me know what you make of these lines, which have taken a lot out of me ! Don't lose your courage, take another look at your work, talk it over with your friends, with Schalk, maybe a reworking can achieve something. Keep me in your good books ! Consider me an ass, I don't mind, but don't think that my feelings for you have changed in any way or could ever do so. » (26)

Levi heard nothing from Bruckner for a week. Understandably worried, he wrote to Schalk on 14 October :

« I wrote to Bruckner, but have not yet received any reply. Has he spoken to you or perhaps shown you my letter ? How has he taken it ? Please, go to see him and let me know how you find him. » (27)

Schalk responded 4 days later with a letter that has spawned more than its share of speculation :

« Your report has understandably hit Professor Bruckner very hard. He feels eternally unlucky and will hear no words of consolation. Your response was expected and was the gentlest way of preventing him from bitter disappointments. I hope that he will soon settle down and undertake a revision of the work at your advice. At the moment, certainly, he had best not work on it, since he is upset and despairs of himself and does not feel capable of anything. However, with his colossal natural power, physical as well as moral, he will be back to it soon. One must let him calm down by himself. In any case, he is indebted to you for your frank evaluation, which saved him from great failure and, even if he cannot see it yet, the time for it will come. » (28)

In just 2 days, Bruckner responded to Levi with a short letter :

« Only now do I have the time to study the matter. I'll do what is possible - to the best of my knowledge and belief. When at last all is done, I will ask you to lead a few rehearsals, at my expense, with your " Hoforchester " before the Princess (Amélie) , whom I will need in this case, as you well know. » (29)

Bruckner's wounded pride is not hard to detect in his curt tone and his grudging acceptance that the work might benefit from further « study » . His residual stubbornness is also evident in his suggestion that he might finance some orchestral rehearsals, presumably in the hope that this might demonstrate to Levi that the Symphony would actually come across effectively in performance. Bruckner was not, as Levi feared (and as many later writers have asserted) , utterly crushed by his friend's negative judgment of the 8th. He was staggered by the blow, yet with his inner resiliency and his great determination, he rallied. By 23 October, he had regained enough self-confidence to question privately Levi's capacity for judgment ; Princess Amélie recorded that Bruckner said to her that :

« Levi, he's a knave (" Schlankl ") . It's hard for him to grasp things, you know. » (30)

It took Bruckner some time to reconcile himself to the need to revise. He looked over the score in late 1887, and, by the end of January 1888, he seems to have accepted that he must revise the work. (31) On 30 January, he wrote to his friend Betty von Mayfeld that « the 8th Symphony is far from done » and needed « major alterations » . (32) and, on 4 February, in a letter to Levi primarily concerned with a planned performance of the 4th Symphony, on 14 April 1888, he mentioned, almost incidentally :

« I certainly have reason to be ashamed of myself, at least this time, because of the 8th. I am an ass. Now, I see things differently. » (33)

The question of why and how Bruckner began to see the 8th differently needs detailed explication, and is the subject of Chapter 5. For the moment, suffice it to say that while Levi's rejection of the Symphony undoubtedly played a decisive part, Bruckner's eventual revision cannot fairly be described as a simplification or mollification of his original conception nor can it reasonably be seen as an attempt to make the score acceptable to Levi or even to other potential performers and listeners. If this was Bruckner's intention, he failed : Levi never did perform the Symphony and, even in its revised version, the work presented prohibitive technical difficulties for many orchestras.

Bruckner's revision

During the winter of 1887-1888, Bruckner had been occupied with the preparation of the final version of the 4th Symphony and its performance by the Vienna Philharmonic, on 22 January 1888, and he spent the remainder of the year working on the final revision of the 3rd Symphony. It was not until 4 March 1889, the very day on which he finished the revision of the 3rd Symphony, that the composer began the actual task of revising the 8th. He began by reworking the Adagio and finished on 8 May. (34) He then turned his attention to the Finale and completed its revision on 31 July 1889. In revising this movement, Bruckner worked directly on his autograph score from 1887, and wrote in changes, crossed-out passages, and inserted new pages as necessary. (35) He next revised the 2nd movement, finishing the Scherzo in Steyr, on 4 September (on his 65th birthday) , and the Trio, which was extensively re-written, on 25 September. (36) (This was the only movement of the revised version that Bruckner wrote-out entirely in his own hand.) In November 1889, back in Vienna, he began work on the 1st movement, and used, as he had with the Adagio, a manuscript of the movement from 1887, from his copist of Steyr Leopold Hofmeyer. (37) The revision of this movement moved more slowly, probably because of the extent of the revisions as well as the demands of Bruckner's teaching. Bruckner noted at the end of the score « last note written » , on 29 January 1890, yet, he continued to tinker with the movement in February. Finally, on 10 March, he signed and dated the score with the remark « entirely finished » and, on 14 March, he ran through the movement one last time. (38) When the composition was complete, Bruckner had 2 clean copies of the score prepared by his copyists. (39)

Dedication and publication

Bruckner long planned to dedicate the 8th to the Emperor ; in his letter to Levi announcing the completion of the 1st version of the 8th (4 September 1887) , he stated that he planned « to request that the Emperor accept the dedication ; then, Richter has promised (since my plan pleases him) to give a performance » in Vienna. (40) When the revised score was ready, Bruckner promptly wrote to Emperor Franz-Josef II requesting permission to dedicate the Symphony to him. (41) Much to Bruckner's satisfaction, the Emperor accepted the dedication and, in addition, volunteered a subvention of 3,000 Florins to defray publication costs. (42) (Again, Levi seems to have been involved behind the scenes. As early as 14 November 1886, he had written to Franz Schalk that Princess Amélie had informed him that the Emperor would pay for the cost of publication.) (43)

Bruckner had always had difficulty getting his work into print. He struggled to find publishers and, when he did, was often displeased with their work. As a result, Bruckner's works were published piecemeal ; he enjoyed nothing like, for example, Brahms's long relationship with Simrock or Verdi's with Ricordi, nor did he make more than token income from his publications. His 3rd Symphony was, unusually, published shortly after its premiere in December 1877. This came about quite fortuitously : Theodor Rättig, a fledgling music-publisher who attended the 1st performance of the Symphony and was among the small group enthused by the work, immediately offered to publish the score. Eventually, he published 2 versions of the 3rd Symphony (1878 and 1890) , the « Te Deum » (1885) , and several smaller choral works.

In the 1880's, the Viennese impresario and publisher Albert J. Gutmann published Bruckner's Quintet (1884) and the 7th and 4th Symphonies (in 1885 and 1889, respectively) , but Bruckner was satisfied with neither Gutmann's terms (he demanded a fee of 1,000 Florins for each of the Symphonies) nor his work, which tended to be sloppy and late. The difficulties Bruckner encountered with Gutmann in preparing the 7th Symphony were great enough that Bruckner resolved never to work with the publisher again. He approached 2 German publishers, Schott (Mainz) and Bote & Bock (Berlin) , with his 4th Symphony, both of whom rejected it, before settling for Gutmann. Bruckner's misgivings about Gutmann proved well-founded. The 1st printing of the 4th Symphony was ridden with so many errors that Bruckner compelled Gutmann to withdraw it and issue a corrected printing. (44)

It was during the composition of the 8th Symphony, therefore, that Bruckner experienced his worst travails with Gutmann, and he never seems to have even considered offering this Symphony to Gutmann. Instead, as soon as Franz-Josef had agreed to accept the dedication, Bruckner immediately began to talk about finding a publisher in Germany. (45) In a letter to Levi, on 28 April 1890, Bruckner asked the conductor to support Bruckner's plan to have Schott publish the 8th. (46) Bruckner held-out hope for Schott as late as March 1891, but, in the end, they did not publish the score. (47) Bruckner did eventually succeed, at least in part, in finding a German publisher. In late 1890, the firm of Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau, which was based in Berlin but had an important branch in Vienna as a result of its incorporation of the Viennese firm of Haslinger in 1875, agreed to publish the Symphony. The score was prepared for publication in mid-1891 ; the proof reading and correction were done by Bruckner's student Max von Oberleithner (1868-1935) , who also seems to have contributed financially. (48) (For example, Oberleithner guaranteed the sale of 200 copies of the 4 hand arrangement of the Symphony and, in exchange, Lienau agreed to let Josef Schalk, and not the house arranger, prepare the score. This total was reached with the aid of Hugo Kaun, a Bruckner devotee and conductor in Milwaukee ! (49) The published score of the 8th Symphony was issued in March 1892, and thus became the only one of Bruckner's Symphonies to be published before it had been performed.

Bringing the Symphony to performance

Just as Bruckner struggled to have his works published, for much of his career he had difficulty in securing performances of his Symphonies, and, by the time of the 8th Symphony, Bruckner's music was only just beginning to win its way on to orchestral programs. The slowness with which Bruckner's works entered the repertory is often ascribed to the conservatism, even philistinism, of orchestral establishments. There is some truth in this charge ; certainly many orchestras were disinclined to perform such « modern » music, especially as part of their subscription concerts, which tended to be dominated by old-guard audiences. (50) Beyond these matters of musical taste, Bruckner's Symphonies presented great technical and practical challenges to orchestras. Concern about audience reaction and the difficulty of the orchestral writing were evident in Levi's response to the 1st version of the 8th Symphony. He wrote that, in his judgment, because of « the possible effect on an audience like my own, the performance of the 8th in a subscription concert would be a risk which, in your interest, I must not take » and found « the orchestration quite impossible » and worried that Bruckner's « sense for beauty and balance and euphony has somewhat suffered. How else could your treatment of the trumpets and tubas (really of the winds in general) be explained ! » (51)

Levi wrote that even with the rather easier 7th Symphony, « the orchestra started to become impatient, indeed voices were raised suggesting the work be removed from the repertory » . In other words, Levi felt that the 7th Symphony strained the limit of the practically possible, while the 8th Symphony over-stepped it. (This conclusion is quite remarkable for the man who, only 5 years earlier, had given the 1st performances of « Parsifal » , a work that would seem to be at least as challenging in all ways.)

Even after Bruckner revised the score, practical difficulties and stylistic doubts continued to hamper the dissemination of the 8th Symphony. By this time, Levi was no longer conducting concerts in Munich and was thus not in a position to perform it himself. Levi was apparently not particularly interested in promoting the 8th Symphony, in any case ; although he was able to arrange a concert of the 4th Symphony in Munich, on 10 December 1890 (conducted by his assistant Franz Fischer) , the 8th was not performed in Munich during Levi's tenure there. Instead, Levi recommended it to the young Felix Weingartner (1863-1942) , who had assisted him at Bayreuth and who had recently been appointed « Kapellmeister » in Mannheim. Weingartner was intrigued by the idea, and, on 14 September 1890, he wrote to Levi :

« Dear Papa, have you written to Bruckner regarding his 8th ? If Bruckner sends me the parts, then I'll certainly perform the Symphony and soon, in the 2nd or 3rd concert, but he mustn't give it to anyone else 1st. This is a condition. » (52)

Levi wrote apologetically to Bruckner that he could not do the 8th (« you must consider me a swindler ») but that Weingartner was interested. (53) Bruckner accepted Weingartner's proposal (he even boasted, possibly fancifully, that he had « refused » Richter in favour of Weingartner) and arranged to have the orchestral parts copied in Mannheim and had a score sent to Weingartner. (54) The concert was eventually scheduled for 26 March 1891 and was to feature Beethoven's 2nd Symphony and the 1st performance of Hugo Wolf 's « Christnacht » in addition to the 8th Symphony.

On 20 March, Weingartner informed Bruckner that he had to postpone the concert until 2 April, owing to the Good Friday performance of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » on 27 March. (55) At the last minute, however, Weingartner removed the 8th Symphony from the program and replaced it with Liszt's « Dante Symphony » . On 9 April, he wrote to Bruckner that his appointment as conductor of the « Königliche Oper » in Berlin had been « so sudden and the change in my position so unexpected » that it had disrupted his schedule and prevented him from rehearsing the Symphony adequately and would moreover obviously mean that he would not have another chance to do the Symphony in the foreseeable future. (56) The previous day, he had written to Levi more frankly :

« Unfortunately, I couldn't perform the Bruckner. The Symphony offers such difficulties that I could not demand the necessary rehearsals. We had new tuba players who were not experienced enough in their instruments. I clarified the circumstances to Bruckner. He seemed to be understanding and sees no harm as Richter will immediately perform it in London (this performance never materialized) . The sonorous effect of the 8th Symphony is unfortunately offensively raw. » (57)

Of course, Bruckner deduced the truth ; he wrote to Levi on 18 April :

« I think that the Symphony did not please " Herr " Weingartner or sounded poorly (" schlecht geklungen ") . » (58)

Although Weingartner's performance did not come to pass, it occasioned some of the most important (and most widely misinterpreted) of Bruckner's comments on the Symphony. On 27 January 1891, Bruckner sent Weingartner a letter containing a sporadically detailed, extra-musical program for the Symphony (see Chapter 3) . (59) Even more famously, Bruckner's correspondence about the performance makes mention of cuts in the Finale. His initial note to Weingartner (2 October 1890) contains a brief postscript :

« The Finale has indications for large cuts ; please shorten it because of its lengthiness. » (60)

The specific cuts Bruckner suggested are unknown, but they undoubtedly included one indicated in a loose page inserted into the manuscript (measures 345-386 of the 1890 version) . (61) In his letter, on 27 January 1891, by which time Bruckner seems to have been growing uneasy with the entire affair, he reiterated that Weingartner should « please shorten the Finale as indicated ; it would be far too long and is valid only for later times and for a circle of friends and connoisseurs (" gilt nur späteren Zeiten und zwar für einen Kreis von Freunden und Kennern ") . » (62)

On Good Friday, 27 March 1891, Bruckner again urged Weingartner to « please accept the cuts in the Finale, since otherwise it would be too long » . More interestingly, he also requested that Weingartner not physically alter the score and wrote that, « it is one of my dearest wishes » that the orchestral parts remain unaltered for publication. (63)

Much has been made of these comments ; the phrase « for later times and for a circle of friends and connoisseurs » in particular has been adopted as a motto by those who believe that the early editions of Bruckner are corrupt. Since the 1930's, it has been claimed as a sign that Bruckner privately wished that the so-called « original versions » of his works eventually be published. (64) In considering the validity of this interpretation, it should be borne in mind that although Bruckner's request has almost always been read as if it referred to the autograph manuscript, it did not.

The score that Weingartner had in his possession was a copy made by Viktor Christ, probably the one made in 1890. (65) It is probable, in fact, that the manuscript Weingartner had in his possession was the one eventually used in the preparation of the printed edition of 1892 ; not only does Bruckner's concern that the score and parts not actually be altered pre-suppose that they would eventually be used by the publisher, but we know that a copy made by Christ and Hofmeyer was the actual « Stichvorlage » (see Chapter 6) . Bruckner's allusion to posterity therefore has nothing to do with the earlier version of the Symphony - even less does it encode a wish for a posthumous edition based on his unpublished manuscript scores. His concern was simpler : he wanted to ensure that his revised score be printed without the actual excision of the passages he asked Weingartner to cut and without any alterations to the scoring made in rehearsal by Weingartner. Thus Bruckner seems, perhaps ironically in light of later interpretations, to have believed that the late revised version (and not the putative « Originalfassung ») was meant for later generations of connoisseurs.

Bruckner was stung by the fiasco with Weingartner. Even a year later, on 22 April 1892, he wrote to Levi :

« What I suffered in Vienna because of the 8th - I will remain silent for now. I conceived of performance only by you, certainly not the little orchestra with military tubas (!!!) and the (in my eyes) suspicious " Herr " Weingartner in Mannheim. Now a year is lost ! » (66)

Although Levi no longer regularly conducted the orchestral concerts in Munich, Bruckner clearly wanted him to perform the 8th ; on 24 July 1892, Bruckner played his trump card, Wagner's personal pledge to perform his Symphonies :

« Perhaps, I can hope that my " Künstler Vater " will perform my 8th Symphony once in Munich in one of his special concerts, as the noblest advocate of our immortal, blessed " Meister ", who also, as he assured me, wished to perform my Symphonies. » (67)

Levi apparently agreed (presumably somewhat grudgingly) to do either the 7th or the 8th Symphony at the « Tonkünstlerfest » of the « Allgemeiner deutscher Musikverein » scheduled for Munich in September 1892. (68) These plans came to nothing : the Festival was relocated to Vienna, and, finally, canceled because of a feared cholera outbreak. (69) Levi was, for whatever reason, not willing to perform the 8th himself ; as late as 12 January 1892, after the successful performance in Vienna, he wrote to Bruckner that he still did not have the « courage » to do the 8th. (70)

Bruckner realized well before this time that Levi was not going to champion the 8th and, instead, focused his efforts on arranging a performance in Vienna. As Josef Schalk wrote, on 29 January 1892, « Bruckner is going at it with all seriousness to produce a performance of the 8th » . (71)

At last, Hans Richter, whom Bruckner had pointedly bypassed 5 years before in favour of Levi and 2 years before in favour of Weingartner, agreed to give the 1st performance, and, on 18 December 1892, the 8th Symphony was finally performed at a subscription concert of the Vienna Philharmonic. Despite the success of its premiere, the Symphony was slow to gain widespread acceptance. It was performed only twice more before Bruckner's death, in Olmütz

(Olomouc) under Vladimir Labler on 22 October 1893 and by Jean-Louis Nicodé in Dresden on 18 December 1895. The 1st performance in Munich was conducted by Siegmund von Hausegger on 17 December 1900, some 7 months after Levi's untimely death. The 2nd performance by the Vienna Philharmonic was on 21 October 1906 under Bruckner's old protégé Franz Schalk. The 8th was 1st played in America by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Max Fiedler on 12 March 1909.

The musical design and Symphonic agenda of the 8th

In the final decades of the 19th Century, the Symphony was a loaded genre, both culturally and compositionally. Beethoven's great examples, especially the « Eroica », the 5th, and the 9th, had long since secured the Symphony as the highest, most elevated, and most meaningful genre of instrumental music. Yet, despite its cultural prestige, Symphonic composition was beset by special challenges in the late- 19th Century. A sine qua non of the Symphony during this era was monumentality, a trait that was essential to the public significance of the genre in an age given to bourgeois expansiveness and increasing rationalization, in which the construction of historical memory (which is what monuments do) increasingly substituted for religion and myth. (1) During this period, many progressive composers, including Bruckner, also desired to enrich the Symphony with an infusion of « Wagnerian » vocabulary. Gustav Mahler put it simply :

« Wagner took over the expressive means of Symphonic music, just as now the Symphonist will lay claim in his turn to the expressive riches gained for music through Wagner's efforts. » (2)

This desire to win some of Wagner's « expressive riches » for the Symphony raised something of a compositional puzzle. Monumentality pre-supposes grandeur, solidity, massiveness ; therefore, a crucial task of the Symphonist was to find ways of articulating large, coherent formal spans, which rested upon strong tonal and metrical frameworks, out of harmonic and motivic substance that was weighted toward expressive detail and pointed characterization and thus prone to fragmentation. Posed in these terms, a central concern of Bruckner's Symphonic project can be seen as a working-out of this synthesis and the construction of grand monumental Symphonies that, as Norbert Nägler wrote, « tectonically sublimate » , Wagner's chromaticism and « endless melody » . (3) Thus, it was given to Bruckner « as purifier of Wagner » , in Ernst Bloch's words, finally to separate « the benefits of the Wagnerian style, " eloquent " music, from the penalties of the programme or the music-drama and to have thus internalised it, as the route to other waters than those of poetry » . (4)

Movement I : Allegro moderato

The 1st movement, like all of Bruckner's opening movements, is built around the established framework of Sonata form. The scheme of exposition, development, and recapitulation is easily discerned, and the overall structure palpably enacts the tonal drama of Sonata form. Indeed, a bird's-eye view of the movement shows clear formal divisions ; upon closer examination, however, any hint of formal conventionality recedes and what Carl Dahlhaus called the « radical nature of Bruckner's compositional technique » grows increasingly vivid. (5) Particularly impressive is the virtuosity with which Bruckner harnesses a centrifugal, chromatic harmonic vocabulary for the purpose of building a tonally closed

Symphonic form. (6) In doing so, Bruckner performs a delicate harmonic balancing act. The tonic key of C minor is effectively defined by the tonal articulations of the movement, yet, many passages (and not only developmental ones) eschew standard harmonic syntax in favour of elaborate chromatic motion. Bruckner reserves clearly defined cadential progressions (i.e. , those in which, in Schönberg's definition, 3 successive chords « unmistakably express a region or tonality ») (7) for junctures that define the tonal framework of the movement.

The movement opens with an exposition consisting of 3 distinct thematic units of roughly equal length : the main thematic group (measures 1-50) , a contrasting thematic group in the dominant (measures 51-96) , and a closing section in E #, the relative major (measures 97-152) . There follow a substantial development section (beginning in measure 153) , a reprise of the 2nd and 3rd sections of the exposition (measures 311-392) , which unusually avoids solidly grounding the tonic key, and a compact Coda (measures 393-417) . The recapitulation of the opening material bridges the end of the development and the return of the 2nd thematic group in such a way that the crucial division of development and recapitulation (a juncture freighted with structural meaning) is artfully blurred.

The remarkable opening pages immediately unsettle expectation. The tonality of the opening theme is, at first, quite indefinable ; its most obvious tonal trait is that it is not in the movement's tonic key of C minor, or, indeed, any easily identifiable key. The striking use of G. and D. as chromatic neighbor tones, which will prove to be a crucial motive as the movement unfolds, both infuses the music with a charge of kinetic energy and clouds the latent suggestion of C minor accruing from the f' followed by g' sustained in the accompanying violins and horns, the arrival (under the g') on C in measure 5, and (a bit more distantly) the clarinet 5th on the dominant in measures 5-6. These provisional assertions of the tonic are swept away by the next dozen measures, which lead the opening motive through a stretch of roving harmony, the terminology coined by Schönberg to describe chromatic progressions that do not employ standard harmonic syntax and « fail to express a tonality » . (8) In measure 17, the chromaticism begins to clear in preparation for a half cadence on the dominant of C minor. Closure onto the tonic triad is preempted by a sudden restatement of the opening material (measure 23) in full orchestral dress. Here, the chromatic continuation is slightly different (measures 28-39) : it glances at the tonic (measures 40-41) , before arriving on the sub-mediante, which then serves as the basis of an augmented 6th progression (measure 43) that leads to the dominant, in which key the 2nd theme group begins.

This passage does the typical work of a Symphonic opening : presenting a protagonistic theme, exposing basic motives, and limning the tonic key. In addition, it establishes 2 principles that are important to the movement, and the Symphony, as a whole. 1st, it introduces the tendency of harmonic complexity to give way to relative stability and consonance as the point of cadence nears, a pattern that recurs on various levels throughout the piece, as does the particular strategy of anchoring spans of elaborate unstable chromaticism with cadential assertions of a structural key, here the tonic, later also the dominant, the mediant, and other related keys. (The particular device, which was canonized in « Tristan » , of asserting a key by sounding its dominant 7th, even in the absence of its tonic triad as in measures 21-22, also grows characteristic of the piece.) 2nd and more particularly, the prominence given to chromatic neighbor notes in the initial thematic unit (in measures 3-5 and, more forcefully, in measures 25-27) proves to be a basic motivic conceit. At many junctures of the movement, structural tones (the tonic, dominant, and sub-dominant) play-off in various ways with their chromatic neighbors ; sometimes, this happens with little moment (e.g. , in the course of the 2nd theme group) and, sometimes, with tremendous structural drama, as at the height of the development section.

The 2nd thematic group begins with a sudden unclouded G major triad and a disarming tune (measure 51). This thematic group is based in G, and, for all of its difference in mood and harmonic style (it is far more triadic), the tonal build of this section resembles that of its predecessor in 1 important way. Its tonic is, at first, only loosely defined and is surrounded by wandering sequential syntax; not until the clearly defined cadential activity around the restatement of the tune in G (measure 73) is the key of the dominant solidified. The harmony also has a tendency to turn from G major to G. major and its cognates, thereby not only tonicizing a pitch that was prominent in the opening theme, but also working-out in a new way the chromatic neighbor-note motive that opened the Symphony.

The 3rd thematic group introduces another strong contrast. It begins with a fresh, striding theme that quickly begins to describe the key of E #, the mediant of C minor, and thus the conventional contrasting tonal pole in a minor-key sonata-form exposition. E. is initially given as a minor key; the major is reserved until E. is regained after an intervening stretch of harmonic roving (measure 125). As in the 2 preceding thematic groups, cadentially secured harmonic poles anchor unstable chromatic harmony, although here, the proportions are quite different and the structural key, E #, is granted substantially greater weight. 14 measures are given to a very long dominant preparation of E #, balanced by 14 more that linger on the tonicized triad (measures 125-152).

The development section is elaborate. It opens with an intense meditation on the opening motive during which the brass and winds make obvious play with the motive's distinctively plastic shape against a background of tremolando strings. These variants generally adhere quite closely to the original form of the motive, often preserving it intact but inverted (as in the woodwinds, measures 169-171 and 179-181) or in inversion and augmentation (as in the brass, measures 173-177 and 183-187). At other times, the contour and pitch of the motive are changed more freely. These variations range from minor intervallic changes (horn, measures 141-145) to revamping the contour (measures 140-151; and trumpets, measures 175-179). As if in compensation for its textural and motivic clarity, this episode rises to great harmonic intensity by collapsing the chromatic neighbor notes into implacably sustained dissonances.

This overt manipulation of the primary motivic material dramatizes a process that imbues much of the movement in a less obvious way. As Werner Korte pointed-out, Bruckner's primary motives tend to be sharply profiled and highly-distinctive, and the strategic exploitation of this « capacity for meaningful flexibility (" flexibler Mehrdeutigkeit ") and re-interpretation » assumes a formative, structural function in Bruckner's Symphonies. Korte called this process, by which « decisive (motivic) traits are changed suddenly in favour of new ones », mutation. (9) In the process, as Carl Dahlhaus later pointed-out, the parameters of rhythm and pitch are separated and abstracted from « 'concrete' motives » and are treated as self-standing elements « unconnected to each other, freed from their original formation ». (10) These 2 parameters are handled differently: mutation almost always entails intervallic changes, while rhythmic features tend to be more stable. Thus rhythmic patterns become preeminent sources of continuity and coherence, while pitch structures continually evolve and develop. This is what happens in the opening bars of the movement. Measures 3-5 contain the basic idea, which immediately mutates in measures 7-9. The rhythm is preserved intact, but the melodic contour is changed fundamentally. Some intervallic features are retained, notably the initial minor 2nd, while others are recognizably modified, for example the chromatic tail of measure 4, which is inverted in measure 8 (and echoed by the oboe and clarinet in measures 9-10, 13-14, and 17-18) . (Other less obvious intervallic connections might be drawn as well, including the inversionally related leaps of a minor 6th, measures 3-4, and major 3rd, measures 7-8, and the overall span of a minor 3rd common to both measure 4 and measure 8.) The ensuing bars continue this process, each successive unit deriving from its predecessor, like links in a chain. The next segment (measures 11-13) begins with a motivic minor 2nd and a simple rhythmic modification, but the continuation introduces a new triplet rhythm and new melodic intervals. The next link (measures 15-17) has the same rhythm, but new pitch content in its 2nd half. At measure 18, the triplet motive is broken-off and inverted as the music moves toward cadence.

As several scholars have shown in detail, the entire Symphony is inhabited by densely interlocking networks of motivic similarities, from the intervallic parallels (chromatic ornaments and upward minor 6th) between the head-motives of the 1st movement and Adagio to the manifold uses of the rhythm of the initial motive of the Symphony. (11) Modern notions of Symphonic aesthetics are inclined to underrate the importance of these patterns of motivic integration, connection, and mutation, since now the essence of Symphonic form is located primarily in formal and tonal architecture, not motivic connections. Yet, in the latter half of the 19th Century, different standards of judgment prevailed, as we can see in Wagner's definition of « Symphonic unity » as a « web of basic themes which contrast, complete, re-shape, divorce, and intertwine with one another » . (12) In Bruckner's Symphonies, this web is spun largely out of rhythm ; recurring rhythmic cells and a solidly quadratic periodic structure endow the music with great tensile strength. This rhythmic and hyper-rhythmic solidity, along with large-scale spans of tonal coherence, is the basis of Bruckner's Symphonic structure ; by under-girding surface features, notably locally modulatory harmony and vivid episodic contrasts, that might otherwise be prone to fragmentation, it allows the creation of Symphonic forms that incorporate great contrasts, diverse moods, and fine detail into an epic structure.

The development section continues with a statement of the main idea of the 2nd thematic group in inversion beginning in G . (measures 193-200) . This quickly devolves into what initially appears to be the beginning of a forceful dominant preparation in C minor (measures 201-212) , which seems to herald a return to the tonic. Historically, composers have treated this juncture (which typically delivers both the tonic key and the main thematic material) as a crucial dramatic stroke. But, in this movement, Bruckner diffuses the process of recapitulation, both tonal and thematic, over the space of some 75 measures. Thus, as the dominant of C minor begins to gather itself, the harmony slips (not by the most obvious path) to the dominant of B. minor (measures 217-224) and the music drives forward to a massive thematic statement that sets the opening theme, in the bass and low brass, below a clear variant of the 2nd theme group, in the upper-strings and woodwinds, with both elements rhythmically augmented to double their original value. Gesturally, this feels like a recapitulation, and it does restate the opening theme at its original pitch level, yet, the original theme itself deflects the tonic key, and Bruckner capitalizes on its tonal ambivalence. (13) He leans on the G. neighbor note heavily so that the harmonic weight veers away from the tonic, so much so that, when the phrase arrives on C (measure 229) , it feels provisional. Bruckner repeats this grandiose thematic unit twice, with each statement a 3rd higher (starting on A . in measure 235 and on C in measure 245) . (A close study will reveal that this passage masterfully throws the balance of harmonic tones and non-harmonic tones into controlled confusion ; see especially, measures 225-228 and 235-238.) The final repetition comes to rest on G (measure 249) and this pitch (the dominant) holds, rooted by a long, quiet tonic pedal in the timpani (measures 247-

264) , above which, in an oddly austere passage, 2 trumpets softly intone the bare rhythm of the main-theme in octaves on the pitch C while a flute adds a descant outlining an octave and 5th on C as the basses descend nervously to low G, again and again. The home tonality is thus reached, although without the usual cadential definition.

This harmonic stability dissolves into a passage (measures 267-278) that quickly ascends through G . major, crests on the dominant 9th of C minor (with the trumpets again playing the motto rhythm, now on G, in measures 271-278) , and subsides by falling through a diminished 7th chord. The music resumes quietly on the dominant of D. (measure 279) and, then, for the 1st time in the movement, the opening theme is sounded beginning on G (1st oboe, measures 283-285) , the pitch level at which it most clearly rests within C minor (it circles around the minor 6th, G - E #, that is part of the tonic triad) . The long passage on C above the timpani pedal and the powerful assertion of the dominant have done enough to restore tonal centrality that this statement of the theme does not need to decide on the tonic key ; indeed, this is exactly what it avoids. The oboe is surrounded by filigrees outlining the dominant of D # ; this extraordinary harmonization not only realizes the C - D. opposition introduced in the opening bars, but, again, shifts the music away from the key of C. This movement away from the tonic continues in the ensuing elaboration (as does the play with chromatic neighbor notes) , yet, in this midst, the strong cadential figure (outlining iv-i64-V7) that had punctuated the opening page of the movement returns squarely in C (measures 300-302) . This cadential gesture could easily usher in the entry on C minor, possibly with the opening theme or more likely the 2nd thematic group ; but while it does inaugurate the return of the 2nd thematic group, this is not in the tonic key. Instead, the music slides through G. to an augmented 6th that leads to the key of E #.

The 2nd thematic group is restated in full in E #, and the 3rd thematic group begins in due course in the key of C minor. The initial section of this unit leads, as it did in the exposition, to a turbulent, harmonically unsettled continuation, but, now, it turns in a new direction. A strongly directed chromatic rise leads to a thunderous, aggressively diatonic peroration in C minor (measures 369-384) , built-on a rising diatonic tetrachord and the resounding intonation of the motto rhythm on C by 3 trumpets and 3 horns. This tremendous magnification of the passage on C that occupied an earlier part of the recapitulatory space (measures 250-262) elevates the hollowness of the earlier passage to the proportion of tragic grandeur. At its peak, the orchestra drops-out, dramatically exposing the 3 horns and 3 trumpets and leaving them to peal alone into the abyss. For all its loud emphasis of C, this passage is so strongly based on the tonic 6/4 chord (the timpani pedal on the tonic notwithstanding) that it forecloses a finally clinching tonal arrival. The music quickly wanes, and a quiet roll of the timpani leads to a compact, tensely immobile Coda that gently unwinds the opening motive above an unwavering tonic pedal.

Movement 2 - Scherzo : Allegro moderato ; Trio : Langsam

Bruckner's Scherzi are outstanding for their freshness and rugged vigor, and this one is no exception. In the 8th, the Scherzo does, however, function differently from those in Bruckner's previous Symphonies. It is the 2nd movement, rather than the 3rd, and, for the 1st time since the 3rd Symphony, it is placed in the tonic key. Thus rather than appearing as a strong contrast (in tempo, key, and tone) to a preceding slow movement, this Scherzo, in effect, joins with the opening Allegro to form the 1st part of the Symphony.

The movement follows the Classical pattern of Scherzo, Trio, and da capo reprise of the Scherzo. The Scherzo is built almost exclusively out of 2 elements : a short string of chromatic, descending parallel 6th chords, and a squarely sturdy motive based on an arpeggiated tonic triad, which is solidly formed but not particularly expressive. This arpeggio figure functions as the main-spring of the movement ; it sets into motion an effortlessly steady forward flow that suffuses the whole Scherzo. As the music unrolls through superbly regular 4 bar units (a pattern broken only by 3 6-bar phrases : measures 19-24, 89-94, and 153-158) , it is easy to feel it as a grand piece of Symphonic clockwork.

The Scherzo is an expansive rounded binary form. The 1st half of the movement (measures 1-64) moves from C minor to E #, with mystery-making arrivals in A major, E major, and A. minor (measures 33-36, 37-40, and 49-52, respectively) along the way. The 2nd half of the movement opens with a developmental area that falls into several parts : a sequentially structured section dominated by diminished and half-diminished sonorities (measures 65-90) ; a rather formal cadential preparation in C minor (measures 91-94) ; a leisurely exploration of the inversion of the opening arpeggio figure (measures 95-114) ; and, finally, a tighter, rhythmically telescoped development of the same motive (again, in inversion) in the woodwinds above a tonic pedal in the timpani, which ends with a few moments of expectant waiting for the reprise (measures 115-134) . The form is rounded-off by the return of the opening section, unaltered save for its final cadential portion (measures 171-195) , which is transposed down a minor 3rd with Schubertian aplomb, all but note for note, so that it ends in C, not E #.

In contrast to the 1st movement, which used harmonic tension as a source of intensity and structural force, the Scherzo is relatively relaxed harmonically ; this difference is clearly encapsulated in the character (tautly wound in one and openly forthright in the other) of the motivic material of the 2 movements. The 1st chord change of the movement moves from C to D. (measure 7) , and it is remarkable to note the simplicity with which Bruckner here moves through (by means of a direct chromatic ascent) a harmonic juncture that was so elaborately problematized in the preceding movement. Throughout the Scherzo, the harmony is given to periods of triadic calmness (measures 3-6, 33-36, 37-40, 53-64, and the corresponding spots in the 2nd half of the movement) that are quite free of the kinetic charge that coloured even the few moments of harmonic stasis in the 1st movement (e.g. , measures 217-224 and 369-380) . So, despite its palpable rhythmic energy, the Scherzo serves as a stabilizing foil to the 1st movement. Here, we can sense the logic of Bruckner's unusual decision to locate it before the Adagio, and to have it essay the tonic key. The Scherzo is thus able to anchor the 1st act of the Symphony, before the long and magnificent tonal excursus enacted by the Adagio and much of the Finale.

The Trio is idiosyncratic. It is, in effect, a miniature slow movement tucked into the Scherzo. (The initial version was quite different ; see Chapter 5.) The 1st half of the Trio has 2 components. The opening strain (measures 1-24) is a touching tune that starts in A. major and immediately begins to drift through F minor, A. minor, and C #. The contrasting section (measures 25-44) leisurely spells-out a big, brightly lit E major progression of great simplicity (4 measures each of 16, 146, 149, and 1) . The arrival of the root-position triad ushers in a striking moment : 8 bars of pure, triadic E major stillness preceding the double bar, celebrated with rippling arpeggios played by 3 harps.

Bruckner used harps for the 1st time in this Symphony. He had long believed, as Friedrich Eckstein recalled, that while the harp may have been appropriate in a Symphonic poem, it did not belong in « a proper Symphony » , but, here, he changed his mind. He told Eckstein that he felt compelled to use harps in this work :

« I simply had to, there was no other solution. » (14)

The 2nd half of the Trio begins with a brief modulatory passage (measures 45-60) that quietly leads from E major through C major and G. major back to A. for the reprise. The opening section returns in compressed form, with a new loud passage that moves through A major (measures 69-72) , and ends with the quiet triadic dwelling at the end relocated from E major to A. major (measures 85-94) .

If the Scherzo looks back to the 1st movement, the Trio looks forward to the Adagio. Like the subsequent movement, the Trio is slow, it makes use of harps, and its primary melodic strains are intense (with many expressive appoggiaturas) and tinged by somber harmonies. In addition, it shares some harmonic elements with the slow movement, notably the tendency of major keys to melt into minor and the juxtaposition of yearning chromaticism with preternaturally still triadic music, a device that returns in the Adagio. The Trio also italicizes E major, a key that, although unheard in the 1st movement, plays a considerable role after its striking appearance in the Trio. It is the key in which the B theme of the Adagio appears, it is prominently touched upon in the powerful build-up before the climax of that movement, and it is the starting point of an oddly significant chorale-like passage that interrupts the 3rd thematic group of the Finale.

Movement 3 - Adagio : Feierlich langsam, doch nicht schleppend

In Romantic Symphonies, the 2 inner movements tend, as Reinhold Brinkmann wrote, to be « character pieces of ‘ medium ’ dimensions and weight. This is already evident in the tempo markings : Andante or Larghetto, not a large-scale Adagio ; Allegretto or Moderato ; not a demonic Scherzo-Allegro. » (15)

Bruckner is an exception to this rule, probably the greatest one : his slow movements, of which all but one are marked Adagio, are big, grand statements ; his Scherzos are all boldly drawn and rhythmically charged. (16) In his slow movements, Bruckner began with the Beethoven of the « Eroica » and the 9th Symphony, not the 5th and 6th. The tempi are comparably slow, and the thematic principles are clearly derived: 2 well-characterized thematic groups, with the 2nd group in a new key (usually, some sort of mediant relation) and a brighter tempo (and, occasionally, a new meter) , appear in alternation (thus forming expansive ABABA schemes) with, as in Beethoven's 9th, incrementally increasing rhythmic animation. The Adagio of the 8th apotheosizes the genre. It carries the lyrical impulse, which can easily serve to cheer or to balm, far past the point of simple enjoyment to places of fervent vehemence. The movement's ardent expanse can feel more forbidding than enticing (it is amongst the longest and slowest slow movements in the entire Symphonic repertory, challenged only by the Adagio of Bruckner's 9th and the final movements of Mahler's 3rd and 9th) , but, in its course, it works through extreme contrasts and tensions, and, by its end, achieves a heroic peace.

The overall form of the Adagio is a variant of Bruckner's typical ABABA form. The movement, which inhabits an uncanny Neapolitan D. major, is anchored by 4 appearances of the opening theme, each of which begins in the tonic key only to move-off in a different direction. This theme grows-out of an expressively drawn melody above an accompaniment that, with its repeated chords and indefinite, syncopated triplets, evokes the great love duet at the core of « Tristan und Isolde » (« O sink' hernieder, Nacht der Liebe ») . (17)

Later, at measures 203-205, Bruckner quotes the « Siegfried » motive « in memory of the Master » , as he put it. (18)

This music develops quite differently on each of its appearances. In the 1st statement, the several thematic components, notably a great arpeggiated 6th chord (measures 15-17) , a compact chorale (measures 18-24) , and a series of plagal progressions decorated by the harps (measures 25-28) , are neatly furrowed and presented with expository lucidity. In the 2nd (beginning in measure 95) , the striking A2 motive is entirely suppressed, and the main idea is allowed to unroll into a climactic progression. The 3rd statement (beginning in measure 185) pushes forward rather harder, and brings back the A2 material in a moment of great drama (measures 239-243) . The final appearance of the opening material begins the Coda (at measure 239) , which, in marked contrast to the preceding sections, remains to luxuriate for some 32 measures in the tonic key.

The returns to the opening material are set-off by 2 appearances of a relatively self-contained contrasting theme (measures 47-80 and 141-168) . This theme does not, unusually, move more quickly than does the opening theme, but it does deepen the melodic impulse of the movement. It is built around by an expressively flowing line played by the violas and cellos. (19) In the midst of this music, a new idea emerges quite unexpectedly, only to trail-off rather abruptly : the ongoing musical flux is momentarily arrested by a brief chorale sounded by the Wagner tubas (measures 67-70) . Within 8 bars, the original tune loudly returns, only slightly deflected by the interrupting chorale. On its 1st appearance, this thematic group is in the key of E major ; on its return, it is relocated to E #. Just before the Coda, a slight but significant fragment of the B theme appears, hovering on the threshold of the tonic (measures 255-258) .

The basic gesture of the Adagio is the movement, whether gradual or sudden, from darkness (which is described by dissonance and / or harmonic remoteness) to light, clarity, and consonance. This gesture is played-out in various ways and at various levels throughout the movement, and, through an increasingly elaborate chiaroscuro, the relative values of light and dark are transfigured. In the opening theme, the music circles darkly above the persistent D. pedal in the bass, and when the gathering dissonance is suddenly displaced by a lambent A major 6th chord in measure 15, which is technically a pure consonance, it feels oddly unsettling. This is partly the shock of a raw triad after a long stretch of richer sonorities, and it is also due to the chord's sonic imbalance, overweighed by the thickly doubled 3rd in the bass.

The chord's special character derives also from its harmonically inexplicable appearance as an unprepared, non-functional lowered sub-median. This way of making plain triads strange by locating them on distant, cross-modal relations, works even more magically in the 2nd thematic group. The initial strain of the section feels rather dark, as much because of its use of the cello's baritone register as its E major tonality ; in contrast, the tuba chorale gleams poignantly and strangely, despite its placement in a far flat-side tonality of C major. This special illumination is partly due to the replacement of the warm strings by cool brass and the unexpected instatement of a triadic, plagal progression. Here too, a harmonic limit has been breached ; with the chorale, we have not merely reached the « darkest realm » , as Kurth called it, but actually begun to emerge on the far side of the harmonic sphere. (20) In progressing from the D. of the Adagio's opening, to the E major that begins the 2nd thematic group and finally coming to a C major chorale (all in the larger context of a C minor Symphony) , the harmonic removes become so great that the twain begin to approach each other, if not actually meet, and it is impossible to say for sure which is the light and which is the dark.

Movement 4 - Finale : Feierlich, nicht schnell

A great deal is invested in the Finale. The 1st movement, potent as it is, is so tightly compressed that it does not function as the Symphony's center of gravity. The Adagio may be slightly longer than the last movement (typically, some 26 minutes versus about 23) and more deeply affecting, but it falls to the Finale to bring the issues raised by the whole Symphony to a satisfactory conclusion. The Finale, as a genre, was a « problem » in the late- 19th Century Symphony, and Bruckner was not free from the burden of this history. (21) He labored more over his Finales than over his other movements, and they were subject to his most radical revisions (most notably, in the 3rd and 4th Symphonies). It was also in his Finales that Bruckner departed most widely from formal convention, especially as regards recapitulation (see the 6th and 7th Symphonies) . The composition of the Finale of the 8th Symphony gave Bruckner more trouble than did the other movements, and many observers, beginning with Hermann Levi, have not found the movement wholly convincing. Bruckner did not share this opinion. The day he finished composing it, he described it as « the most significant movement of my life » , and he resisted all suggestions to revise it radically. (22) It was the last Finale he was to complete, and represents a novel solution to the « Finale problem » .

The formal scheme of this movement, like that of the 1st, is derived from Sonata form, but, here, the thematic and tonal design is noticeably freer and, ultimately, follows a structural logic that is only loosely governed by what is now commonly understood as the « sonata principle » , a notion that invests great importance in the structural opposition of tonic and dominant established in the exposition and then resolved in the recapitulation. Nor does this movement, with its almost statuesque grandeur, even feign the sense of Symphonic inevitability generated by the 1st movement. This is not to say that the Finale does not share the musical concerns that fueled the 1st movement ; it does, but it treats them differently. In the 1st movement, the harmonic tensions that drove the music (which derived primarily from the C - D. crux) were played-out vertically as much as horizontally (as in the dissonant enjambments that unsettled the reprise of the opening material) . The Finale worries the opposition of C and G. (which is obviously derived from D #) , but does so more horizontally than vertically. In the Finale, as in the 1st movement, Bruckner strategically reserves decisive cadential action in the tonic key until late in the movement, and here, finally, the remote flat-key regions that have coloured so much of the Symphony are dissolved directly into the tonic key.

The movement opens very distinctively. The main-theme, boldly etched, fanfare-like and played by the brass, and accompanied by an oddly hitching accompaniment pattern in the strings, begins on F - which, as G #, links retrospectively to the long stretch of D. that just ended the Adagio. The statement of the theme spells-out a taut pattern of chromatic 3rds (from F. to D major to B. minor to G. major before moving to D #) , and, after a repetition of this thematic unit (transposed up a major 2nd) , the music moves directly to C for the 2nd clause of the theme, which soon secures the tonic key (measures 31-68 ; note especially the cadence in measures 38-39) . Thus, unlike the unsettled opening of the 1st movement, this passage is clearly centripetal ; it begins remotely, but moves toward the tonic. A grand pause introduces a lyrical contrasting thematic group (measures 69-134) that centers on A. major and F minor, and includes excursions to the important flat-key reaches of C. (measure 99) , D. (= C #) minor (measure 105) , and G. (measure 123) before closing on the dominant of E #. The closing group of the exposition (which begins in measure 135) recalls the corresponding section of the 1st movement. Not only is it in the same key, E. minor (the « normal » contrasting key in a minor-key exposition, but not the usual mode) , but, in melody and texture, it strongly resembles the earlier passage. This section is punctuated by a meaningful parenthesis (measures 159-174) : an austere descending line in the high violins and woodwinds high above a triadic progression in the low brass appears unannounced in the distant region of C minor and creates such a sense of momentary dislocation that it seems to be a cipher or, as Kurth dubbed it, a « visionary episode » . (23) It is possible to deduce some motivic antecedents of this passage (its rhythm and contour resemble ideas introduced at measures 32-35 and 75-78) , yet, its predominant impression (because of its markedly different harmony, texture, tempo, sonority) is one of novelty. (24) This brief stretch of tranquillity suddenly vanishes behind a sustained outburst in B. major (measures 183-210) . The exposition ends with an expansive codetta on E. (measures 215-253) that recalls the opening material and the « visionary episode » (and even hints of the Scherzo : horn, measures 234-235) before coming to rest on a soft timpani roll on E #.

This exposition, while perhaps a bit diffuse, seems conventional enough in outline, if not in content. The 2nd half of the movement is wholly unconventional ; it traces an unforeseeable, yet marvelously effective, course back to the tonic key. It begins, straightforwardly enough, with a stretch of lyrical development dominated by the strings (measures 253-300) that moves from E. through a poignantly songful passage in G. (beginning in measure 265) and culminates in an aching, chromatic progression (measures 277-280) before ebbing in E. minor (measures 285-300) . The next episode is striking : it consists of a sequential series of musical units built-out of the contrapuntal combination, in the brass, of prime and inverted versions of the 2nd clause of the main-theme (measures 301-344) , beginning successively on E. (measures 301-308) , F (measures 323-330) , and G (measures 333-344) . This G holds and is prolonged in the next section (measures 345-386) by a very distinctive contrapuntal passage, scored with bright delicacy, that plays and replays the opening motive of the main-theme, and rises by whole step until it regains G. The next section (measures 387-436) begins, the music still lucent, with the opening theme sounding softly in the brass against a brightly lit C major figure in the violins, but, soon, the harmony begins to slip decisively flatwards and then pivots through D. on its way to a reprise of the movement's opening. This reprise begins (in measure 437) as it had in the exposition, on F, but, now, the successive statements follow a new course : B, then E, and stabilizing momentarily on A #, before moving quickly to C (in measure 475) . Thus, the tonic is regained, but only by way of a rather involved series of chromatic moves. As if to balance this circuitous approach, Bruckner follows it with a great wave of music (measures 481-518) that rises in clear forceful steps, and then, with elemental clarity, peaks and finally descends to the dominant. Now, at last, the music articulates a cadential progression that, although it is left open, unmistakably defines C as the eventual goal (measures 519-526) .

The 2nd thematic group now returns, but, in violation of formal convention, in the same key as in the exposition (A. with a pull toward F minor) . The return of the contrasting theme in the tonic, or, at least, a key closer to the tonic, ordinarily functions as a structurally decisive stabilization. Here, things work differently. In the exposition, this thematic group did not articulate a fundamental tonal contrast ; the relationship of the submediant to the tonic is markedly less polarized than is that of the dominant to the tonic and, thus, is in less need of resolution. Here, the key of A. (poised between 2 long episodes that are strongly rooted on the dominant, G) can have the effect, as Robert Simpson put it, « not of going away, but of coming home » , yet, we still await our final arrival in the tonic key. (25)

The final stage of the recapitulation begins with the return of the thematic material that had closed the exposition (measures 583-646) . This, unlike the 2nd thematic group, is fundamentally altered upon its reappearance. It is firmly relocated to the dominant of C minor, and is initially presented in a series of loose imitative entries, beginning with an easy gait before tightening and gathering force. At the height of this process, still above G in the bass, the heavy brass intone a transformation of the theme that began the entire Symphony, now in rhythmic augmentation and, more importantly, at last resolutely on the dominant and in the tonic key. The music subsides and pauses silently above G. The Coda begins calmly in C minor, and rises steadily to its famous culmination : with the full orchestra in brilliant fortissimo, the main-themes of the 4 movements combine in a sonic panoply. 1st comes the Scherzo theme in the horns (at measure 679) , along with the trumpet fanfares that punctuated the opening pages of the Finale, and, as the music triumphantly reaches the tonic major in measure 697, 2 horns recall the sighing motive from the Adagio theme and trombones add a variant of the main-theme of the 1st movement that is recast so as to ring a C major triad. It is, quite literally, a moment of stunning glory.

For all its splendor, this peroration avoids a decisive perfect cadence in the tonic, the archetypal Symphonic gesture of hard-won victory. The dominant has, of course, been sounded at length in the 2nd half of the movement and has dominated the 60 odd bars preceding the Coda, and, yet, although the eventual arrival of the tonic is a foregone conclusion, the blaze of C major that ends the Symphony (measures 687-709) is reached through a grand plagal progression, rather than a syntactically explicit, authentic cadence (i.e. , one that leads from sub-dominant to dominant and then tonic) . Thus, the conclusive cadential preparation does not present itself as the final paroxysm of a long Symphonic struggle, but rather as a self-possessed expression of splendor and, at the end, the final tonic major is not wrested from the darkness with Beethovenian might, but granted to us with awesome ease. As Derek Scott aptly points -out, it is exactly this sort of « unveiling » or « disclosure » , that is essential to Bruckner's desire to create in his Symphonies a « musical form of apocalyptic vision » . (26) Bruckner's final, glorious reveling, as Robert Simpson wrote with acute poetry, « blazes with calm » , (27) yet, this fire is lit not by the lamp of humanity, but, as Scott understood, by « lux sancta, the holy light of salvation for the believer » . (28)

Programmatic levels in the 8th Symphony

One of the central æsthetic premises of the late- Romantic Symphony was that instrumental music was the art best able to express or represent the barely effable « Absolute » , the essentially indescribable, inner essence of things. This conceptualization of musical significance, which was most influentially formulated by Schopenhauer and, later, Wagner, precludes (in a way that Hanslick's position that musical content comprises nothing but « tonally moving forms » does not) any simple opposition of program and absolute music. Thus, while the 8th Symphony is in one sense undoubtedly absolute music (it engages both the musically absolute and the existential absolute) , it also carries several layers of programmatic and « extra-musical » significance.

First and most superficially, at its 1st performance in December 1892, the Symphony was accompanied by a long, unsigned program written by Josef Schalk : (29)

« The figure of Aeschylus' Prometheus. Vague, resentful defiance, with a presumptuous, titanic feeling of inner strength elevating itself above gods and fate. Soon, the Oceanides' words of consolation. Terrible loneliness and silence. Soliloquy : gentle complaint rising to outbursts of delirious grief, occasionally shaken by the premonition of the bliss of redemption to come. Brazenly and unbidden the dreadful power of fate rears-up. Prometheus grindingly succumbs to the will of the hostile Cronides, and, sinking down, he cries-out :

So hurl lightning's fiery snake down upon me, the thunderous quake of Wild wind's rage convulses the air. And the cruel whirlpool of Fate casts my body down to black Tartarus :

Yet, he cannot kill me !

The ideal elements of the 1st movement come forth in realistic depiction. The deeds and sorrows of Prometheus appear parodic, reduced to a meager scale. The composer himself gave this movement the odd name " German Michaël " .

The sphere of solemn, calm sublimity. Like the silent workings of divinity throned in splendor high above all earthly woe and all earthly joy. Not Zeus-Cronos, the inaccessible, no ; the all-loving father of humanity is given to us in his entire, incalculable Grace.

The sun resounds in age-old fashion. With brother spheres in hymnic sound. And fulfills his pre-ordained round with thunderous progression.

Heroism in service of the Divine. No longer battling, suffering and succumbing solely as the bearer of his own inner strength, but as the messenger of eternal sacred Truth, herald of the idea of God. The work reaches its triumphant conclusion in a combination of all the main-themes, from which " German Michaël " is not absent ; in fact, now in gleaming armor and with a swinging sword, like his namesake the Archangel, he is at the head of the flock. » (30)

Schalk's program has not often found a warm reception. Reviewers of the 1st performance easily identified it as the work of Schalk and were content to dismiss it as banal, if not ridiculous. Eduard Hanslick and Max Kalbeck both mocked it, and Bruckner's supporter Carl Hrubý criticized Schalk for merely providing critics with easy targets. (31)

It did however exert some influence in the 1st decades of this Century ; a few commentators obviously recycled some of its motifs and several more followed Schalk in invoking Prometheus or Faust when describing the 8th. (32) Modern critics have been content to ignore or simply forget Schalk's program ; yet, as Carl Dahlhaus pointed-out, many musical progressives of the later 19th Century deemed explicative programs acceptable, even useful, as « hermeneutic ' parables

' » , since although they « were considered too weak to be able to touch the ' absolute ' essence of music » , they could perhaps point toward it. (33)

Schalk, who seems to have worked in this spirit, once compared poetic ideas to a « diver's bell » that afforded safe and rewarding immersion in the depths of the sea of music, and with his programs intended to proffer security and guidance to those trying to plumb Bruckner's Symphonies. (34) However, we judge the propriety of this undertaking, Schalk was quite imaginative in metaphorically mapping the form of the Symphony (e.g. , the soliloquy rising to « delirious grief » in the 1st part of the development section) , and he chose his literary allusions well. His evocation of the defiance of the doomed Prometheus and of Gøethe's pæan to the awesome course of the Heavens do seem to point to things of importance about the Symphony.

Bruckner's comments on the extra-musical meanings of the Symphony are now better known than is Schalk's program. The most extensive expression of them is found in a letter Bruckner wrote to Felix Weingartner, during the conductor's ill-starred effort to perform the 8th in early 1891 : (35)

« In the 1st movement, the trumpet and horn passage based on the rhythm of the (main) theme (measures 369-389) is the " Todesverkündigung " (the annunciation of death) , which gradually grows stronger, and, finally, emerges very strongly. At the end : surrender.

Scherzo : Main theme - named deutscher Michel (German Michaël) . In the 2nd part, the fellow wants to sleep, and, in his dreamy state, cannot find his tune ; finally, he plaintively turns back. (36)

Finale : At the time our Emperor received the visit of the Czars at Olmütz ; thus, strings : the Cossacks ; brass : military music ; trumpets : fanfares, as the Majesties meet. In closing, all themes ; (odd) , as in " Tannhäuser " in Act 2 when the King (presumably the " Landgraf ") arrives ; thus, as deutscher Michel arrives from his journey, everything is already gloriously brilliant.

In the Finale, there is also the death march and then (brass) transfiguration. »

Bruckner's program does present a rather enigmatic face. (37) In trying to make sense of it, it might be noted that Bruckner had an ulterior motive in writing to Weingartner. By this time, he had begun to doubt gravely (and, as it turned-out, correctly) that Weingartner would actually perform the Symphony. (38) To some extent, Bruckner may have tailored his commentary, including its incongruous association of the final thematic assemblage with the 2nd Act of « Tannhäuser » and its effort to impose a vague narrative line onto the Scherzo and the Finale, in the hope of making the Symphony seem more explicitly programmatic and, thus, presumably more appealing to the conductor, who was a protégé of Franz Liszt and a famous advocate of Hector Berlioz. (39) Bruckner did not, however, dream-up all of this material solely for Weingartner's benefit. He had long identified the main-theme of the Scherzo with the figure « deutscher Michel » , a folksy embodiment of the Teutonic that combined stout-heartedness and good-natured simplicity, and, several times, he stated that the opening of the Finale depicts the meeting of Emperor Franz-Josef, Czar Alexander III, and Kaiser Wilhelm I of Germany at Skierniewice (not Olmütz, as Bruckner thought) in September 1884. (40) Both of these associations must have had some slight political or nationalistic import at the time, but, now, these meanings are obscure, and, in any case, such specific and relatively concrete frames of reference disarm interpretation. Indeed, Schalk's program, which clearly betrays knowledge of Bruckner's comments, seems in part an attempt to flesh them out and translate them into a form that is, at once, more conventional and less precise, and, thus, more amenable to Concert Hall, and, indeed, Coffee House, exegesis.

Bruckner's explanation of the eschatological symbolism of the climax and conclusion of the 1st movement is undoubtedly of greater hermeneutic value. Not only did Bruckner refer to it on several occasions, but his various comments on it are consistent, they offer richer soil for individual interpretation, and, most importantly, they make palpable musical sense : the last part of the 1st movement is striking, both in form and content, and it is not hard to accept that there is something extra-musical at play here. Bruckner described the Coda as a grim scene :

« This is how it is when one is on his deathbed, and opposite hangs a clock, which, while his life comes to its end, beats on ever steadily : tick, tock, tick, tock. » ; a scenario that nicely captures the ominous severity of the music. (41)

Bruckner's identification of the massive horn call that precedes the Coda as the « Todesverkündigung » is similarly apt. This moment in the Symphony does sound terribly portentous ; moreover, Bruckner's label inevitably recalls the 4th scene in the 2nd Act of « Die Walküre », which is commonly known by the same name. Although this part of the Symphony sounds nothing like the scene in Wagner's Opera, Bruckner's verbal allusion to it opens onto programmatic connotations that recall Schalk's : Siegmund's extreme devotion to Sieglinde and Brünnhilde's disobedient mercy both contain a seed of Promethean rebellion.

In the end, however, Bruckner's, and, for that matter Schalk's, extra-musical comments are curiously unsatisfying. Perhaps, they are best seen not as interpretive keys, but as reflections of what Werner F. Korte called the « Doppeldasein » , the double existence, of the 8th Symphony. (42) The work unites an expressive intensity, which seems to encode metaphysical meanings, and an intense musicality, which resists any concrete explanation. The motivic recurrences and transformations that cut across the Symphony and the scattered thematic allusions, especially Wagnerian ones (notably, the evocation of « Tristan und Isolde » 's love music in the main-theme of the Adagio and the sounding of the Siegfried motive later in that movement - horns, measures 203-205 -, that flicker across it carry a charge of palpable, if unconsummated, associative meaning. (43) In some passages, the music reaches such an uncommon depth of expression that it seems to give sounding form to intense subjective experiences, whether through sheer physical impact (as at the moment of reprise in the 1st movement, the grandiose perorations in the 1st and 3rd movements, or the beginning of the Finale) or through extraordinary lyrical fervor (in several stretches of the Adagio) . Furthermore, some phases of the Symphony's unfolding respond to expressive ends, not formal convention : the unusual recapitulation in the 1st movement, especially its precipitant treatment of the 3rd thematic group ; the great climactic deflection before the Coda of the Adagio ; the oddly intrusive « visionary episode » in the Finale exposition ; and the dramatic recasting of the 3rd group in the recapitulation into a great « Steigerung » that culminates in a transformed reminiscence of the thematic gesture that opened the Symphony. (44) In pushing so urgently, and so meaningfully, at the stylistic limits of Symphonic expression, these passages foreclose the possibility that this Symphony is a pure agon of « tonally moving forms » and insist that we accept it as an affair of considerable symbolic depth.

The Adagio and the sublime

Allusions to sublimity often colour descriptions of Bruckner's music. Program notes and serious criticism alike have long effused about the transcendent, metaphysical depth of the Symphonies, and the Adagio of the 8th Symphony has been identified as « sublime » with particular frequency. Josef Schalk's program identified the Adagio as a « sphere of calm, solemn sublimity » , and ever since, the term « sublime » has been prone to attach itself to this movement. (1)

A popular guide to Bruckner's Symphonies published in 1907 called this Adagio « one of the most solemnly transfigurative, splendid, and sublime tone-pieces ever written » . (2) Bruckner's 1st American biographer, Gabriel Engel, referred to it as « the sublime slow movement that rises to unprecedented heights of devotional ecstasy » . (3) As recently as 1997, Edward Rothstein placed the 8th on a short list of works that successfully aspire to sublimity. (4)

The tradition of linking Bruckner's Symphonies with transcendent sublimity derives from various sources. It reflects the common awareness of Bruckner's religiosity as a person, as a church musician, and as a composer of both sacred music and Symphonies. The genre of the Symphony itself has long been associated with the sublime. Johann Georg Sulzer's « Allgemeine Theorie der schönen Künste » (1792) identified the Symphonic Allegro as a genre « admirably suited to the expression of grandeur, of the festive and sublime » . (5) Some 80 years later, Richard Wagner declared in his Centenary essay, « Beethoven » , that « the only æsthetic term to use » to describe the effect of Beethoven's 7th and 8th Symphonies is « the Sublime » . (6)

Modern critics have continued to connect the Symphony and the sublime ; recently, Reinhold Brinkmann stated simply that « the theory of the Symphony was always related to the aesthetics of the sublime » . (7) In late- 19th Century practice, slow movements, with their intimations of the other worldly and their temporal expansion, increasingly came to carry the main weight of the desire to find in the Symphony expressions of the most profound and spiritual kind, and Bruckner, who was sometimes styled as the great « Adagio-Komponist » , was perceived as the greatest exponent of the ideal of the Symphony as sublimely symbolic. (8)

We may be conditioned, therefore, to associate Bruckner's Symphonies with sublimity casually, even reflexively ; indeed, the term « sublime » has itself something of a dual character. While it is often used quite loosely to denote something outstanding, impressive, or awesome, in philosophy and aesthetics (from Shaftesbury through Kant to Lyotard) , the concept of the sublime has acquired a fairly specific range of significance and, as we shall see, it was often an important category in 19th Century aesthetics. Bruckner critics may not have always worked with full cognizance of this tradition, yet, approaching Bruckner's music from the vantage of the aesthetics of the sublime can reveal aspects of both its musical substance and its cultural meaning. This chapter thus has 3 tasks : to sketch-out the idea of the sublime and capture something of its historical and conceptual density ; to consider how the Adagio of Bruckner's 8th Symphony stages itself as sublime ; and, finally, to explore how this musical sublimity might have resonated in the Vienna of his time.

The sublime aesthetic

The history of the sublime as an aesthetic category begins with a treatise entitled « On the Sublime » (« Peri Hypsous ») by Longinus, a Greek writer active in the 1st Century AD. (9) Longinus' goal was to show, through both explanation and demonstration, how rhetoric could express grand and elevated ideas and exercise the passions to the level of « intense and enthusiastic emotion ». (10) Longinus' work was also important in that it codified qualities that were to remain central to later notions of the sublime : seriousness, grandeur, depth of meaning and feeling, passion, enthusiasm even to the level of violence. Although it is essentially an essay on rhetoric (with chapters on figures, oaths, similes, periphrasis, and so forth) , « On the Sublime » is oddly reticent to define the sublime as strictly a rhetorical manner. For example, Longinus' statement that sublimity is « the resonance of a great mind » , carefully leaves open some doubt whether the mind in question is that of the persuasive speaker or that of the listener who is raised to ecstasy. (11) This ambiguity is inherent in « true sublimity » , which, as Longinus put it, fills one « with delight and great glory, as if our soul itself had created what it had just heard » . (12) Longinus' work thus contains a productive tension between author, text, and audience that was to inform many of the richest and most interesting subsequent discussions of the sublime.

Despite its venerable origins, the idea of the sublime, with its preference for the passionately expressive rather than the serenely beautiful, exerted only modest influence until the 18th Century. (13) As David Simpson wrote :

« Those generations for whom some model of decorum was the presiding ethic tended to consign whatever seemed excessive or irregular to the realm of the grotesque or bizarre, rather than to a positively validated sublime. » (14)

Even in the 18th Century, when the sublime began to attract serious attention, the Classical sense of the term as a rhetorical mode or a manner of address tended to hold. This was clearly true in music. During this era, the musical sublime was conceived of within the prevailing system of musical rhetoric ; it was identified with the elevated, the serious, the grave and impressive. (15) Concern was focused less on the affective response of the individual listener than on a composer's deployment of a common stock of stylistic signs and topoi. (16)

In the decades before 1800, with the 1st stirrings of Romanticism, sublimity became a focus of renewed critical interest. (17) Edmund Burke's « A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and The Beautiful » of 1757 was the watershed of an emerging reevaluation of the sublime. (18) Burke was concerned to expand the domain of aesthetic value beyond beauty and find a place for more intense, and less immediately appealing, realms of experience. He set-up a basic opposition between 2 aesthetic categories, the beautiful and the sublime. Beauty is charming and pleasing ; it is that which arouses delight and « love » , which Burke identified as « satisfaction » unclouded by « desire or lust » . (19) Sublimity is quite opposite ; it arises not from satisfaction or contentment, but from strong, often dark emotions : fear, terror, and dread. As Burke wrote :

« Whatever is fitted in any sort to excite the ideas of pain, and danger, that is to say, whatever is in any sort terrible, or is conversant about terrible objects is a source of the sublime. » (20)

In a well-known passage, Burke contrasted the physical traits of beautiful and sublime objects : he characterized those beautiful as small, smooth, polished, light and delicate, and those sublime as vast, great, rugged, negligent, gloomy, dark, and massive.

Although it was not his main concern, Burke did begin to gauge the psychological aspects of sublimity. He speculated on why sublime objects should induce in us an astonishment verging on horror, and concluded that this response was born of our inability adequately to perceive grand and confusing objects. This epistemological dimension of the sublime (its straining at the limits of our powers of « apprehensive synthesis ») was to become the basis of the most important 19th Century understandings of the concept. (21) The crucial moves in the Romantic appropriation of the sublime were made by Immanuel Kant in his « Critique of Judgment » (1790) . Kant emphasized that sublimity is not a quality objectively inherent in things, whether natural or man-made, but is instead a mental state arising from our apprehension of them. When we are confronted by an object that is « great beyond all standards of sense » , he wrote, « it makes us judge as sublime, not so much the object, as our own state of mind in the estimation of it » . (22) Kant's aesthetics argue that the intuition of sublimity arises from the failure of our empirical faculties : when our senses prove incapable of comprehending an object as a coherent totality, we become « aware, by contrast, of the magnificence of Reason itself. The resulting feeling is the feeling of the sublime. » (23) Paradoxically, it is only because of the frustration of our power to perceive external reality that we are able, indeed compelled, to realize the superiority of what Kant called « Reason » , our innately transcendent rational and moral dimensions. This is « the importance of the sublime » , Thomas Weiskel wrote in his extraordinary « The Romantic Sublime » :

« It is the very moment in which the mind turns within and performs its identification with reason. » (24)

This identification thereby « resolves the traumatic disequilibrium of the sublime moment (through) a metaphorical substitution of a " power within " for the external power. The power within, Kant tells us, is greater far than the external power - to which, however, we remain subject as natural beings. » . (25)

By the beginning of the 19th Century the sublime had become a basic component in Romantic aesthetics. The Romantic sublime grew out of Kant's understanding of sublimity as revelatory experience, and, in contrast to 18th Century versions, the 19th Century sublime emphasized the subjective component of sublimity and its intensely inward process of subsuming « the perceiving mind into the eternal and infinite » . (26) In music, then, expressions of sublimity, along with other means of musical signification, began to migrate, as Richard Taruskin put it, from such public, « socially sanctioned » codes as genre, rhetoric, and the doctrine of the affections to the « gnomic, hermetic » modes of expression that characterized absolute music in the age of Beethoven, Schopenhauer, and Wagner. (27) Around the turn of the 19th Century, we can see the emergence of this new understanding of the musical sublime. Critics continued to identify certain styles and musical manners (typically grand and serious ones) as sublime ; at the same time, Kant's notion of sublimity as a moment of « epistemological transcendence » began to infiltrate discourses on music. Both tendencies can be found in William Crotch's lectures on music (which originated as early as 1800) . His definition baldly juxtaposes a Kantian sensibility with a more traditional rhetorical sense :

« The sublime is founded on principles of vastness and incomprehensibility. The word sublime originally signifies high, lofty, elevated ; and this style, accordingly, never descends to anything small delicate, light, pretty, playful or comic. The grandest style is therefore the sacred style - that of the church and oratorio where the words express the most awful and striking images. » (28)

In 1805, the German aesthete Christian Friedrich Michaelis published « On the Beautiful and Sublime in Music » , which was, perhaps, the earliest thorough going attempt to work-out the musical implications of Kant's model of sublime transcendence. (29) He wrote :

« The feeling of sublimity in music is aroused when the imagination is elevated to the plane of the limitless, the immeasurable, the unconquerable. This happens when such emotions are aroused as either completely prevent the integration of one's impressions into a coherent whole, or when, at any rate, they make it very difficult. »

Michaelis argued that this difficulty could derive from 2 distinct types of musical phenomenon : from entrancing uniformity and repetition or from musical diversity and complexity so great as to dazzle the ear. He concluded :

« Thus, in music, the sublime can only be that which seems too vast and significant, too strange and wonderful, to be easily assimilated. Sublime notes, figuration and harmonies stimulate the imagination, which must exert itself and expand beyond its normal bounds to grasp, integrate and recall them. »

It is this musical sublime of surpassing strangeness and complexity that is engaged by Bruckner's Symphonies.

Articulations of sublimity in the Adagio

Immanuel Kant identified 2 genres of sublimity : the dynamical sublime and the mathematical sublime. The dynamical sublime, the more straightforward and traditional of the 2, is the sense of awe inspired by objects that seem to have power over us. It is akin to (and was, in fact, influenced by) Burke's notion that the sublime is always a « modification of power » and, as a rule, involves fright and terror. (30) The Adagio of the 8th Symphony explicitly plays at the dynamical sublime, with the frightening vehemence of its great climaxes, and its sheer sonic force. Indeed, Burke's adjectives seem tailor-made : great, rugged, negligent, gloomy, dark, and massive.

Less obvious, but ultimately more meaningful, are the ways in which the Adagio engages Kant's other category, the mathematical sublime. The mathematical sublime arises from that « which would force us to push comprehension to the bounds of the faculty of imagination » , whether by means of sheer size and expansiveness (Kant's famous example is the Pyramids of Egypt) or by æsthetic complexity. (31) Here, again, Bruckner Symphonies, with their expansiveness and, especially, their distinctive synthesis of formal convention and novel execution, quite obviously engage the mathematical sublime. Franz Schalk detected this early on :

« Bruckner's forms were so simple, so direct, that, at first, people overlooked them, as if they were not there. People wailed about chaotic incoherence, about pointless climaxes, about illogic and willfulness. As people finally began to comprehend Bruckner's works as wholes, suddenly, they stood clear in their primitive symmetry. They were the old

Classic Symphonic forms, but built-up into tremendous, sublime monumentality, in dimensions that no one could grasp up close. » (32)

Here, we have something very much like Kant's Pyramids.

The Adagio works at mathematical sublimity in another way, too, which lies a bit deeper and by its very nature challenges comprehension. Throughout the movement, Bruckner deploys a series of increasingly extreme harmonic progressions ; these seem designed to astonish the ear, to push it past its normal habitus, and, ultimately, set in motion the process of sublime crisis and sudden revelation. These passages move at the limits of the harmonic vocabulary of the late- 19th Century, the realm of enharmonic equivalence and symmetrical pitch formations - the sorts of things that, as Richard Cohn recently wrote, are capable of « inducing a mild type of vertigo » , (33) or as Bruckner's pupil Friedrich Eckstein put it, reveal « new, almost incomprehensible musical wonders » and « mysteries of daring chromaticism and enharmonicism. » (34)

The Adagio is in the key of D #, and, as we have seen, the 1st movement makes considerable use of D. (motivically, more than tonally) , but it is little heard in the Scherzo so that at its onset the tonality of the Adagio sounds fresh, even a bit precarious, yet, not wholly new. (Bruckner's late decision to place the Adagio after the Scherzo was likely inspired in part by considerations of key scheme ; see Chapter 5.) The movement opens with a broad thematic statement (measures 1-20) that unfolds above an unmoving tonic pedal, harmonized initially with a D. major triad and, at the end, by a dominant 7th on D. What is remarkable is how D. is treated in the middle of the passage. Bruckner overlays the tonic pedal with an array of chromatic, often dissonant harmonies that inflect the tonic enharmonically. The major key almost immediately begins to shade into the parallel minor (measures 4-5) , and beginning with the 2nd phrase (measures 7-10) , D. is treated as C #, if in a rather enigmatic way. The harmony slides toward F minor, producing a dominant sonority, which emphasizes D #, a pitch that contravenes the tonic status of D #. Still above the D # / C. in the bass, the music rises to an oddly massive A major 6th chord (measures 15-17) , which is marked by a wide, sweeping arpeggio figure, crowned by a distinctive turn figure. Then, with no further ado, there is a quick enharmonic move back to D #, where the passage comes to rest. This harmonic display serves no direct structural function : it does not tonicize a new tonal area, nor does it even solidly define the tonic key. Rather, it sits sphinx-like at the portal of the movement, and adumbrates a tendency to harmonic quixotism that characterizes several later junctures of the movement. The movement is shaped by a series of odd and unforeseen tonal slips that hinge on enharmonic progressions. The most important of these utilize the gesture of measures 15-17, which, it is worth noting, is immediately marked-off, as it were, by its appearance in a distinctive tonal region (A major, the lowered sub-mediante major) and an eccentric harmonic setting (a major triad in 1st inversion, with the 3rd massively doubled) . (35)

The movement is tripartite. Each section begins by restating the opening material and, then, cycles through the basic thematic material, although in slightly different ways each time. The final section (measures 185-258) brings the harmonic processes of the movement to a culmination. It starts with the music that opened the movement, and, for the 1st time, the enharmonic potential of D. to function as C. (and lead to D) is unleashed (measure 193) . This freeing of harmonic energy sets in motion a series of tonal waves (to borrow Ernst Kurth's terminology) that rise chromatically and crest over irregular cadential progressions. The 1st of these waves (measures 185–210) rises above a series of ascending half steps in the bass from D. (= C #) to E and, after a short digression, F, which serves briefly as the basis for a forceful dominant preparation in B. minor (measures 205-207) . At its height, this dominant collection shades into a half-diminished chord, which, in turn, functions as a pre-dominant in A. and progresses to a massive statement of the arpeggio motive from measures 15-16 on a 6/4 chord in A. (measures 208-210) . Just as this gesture is reaching for a conventional resolution, via its dominant 7th, the ground slips-out from under it and the music is suddenly becalmed on E major, whereupon another wave begins to stir.

This 2nd wave (measures 211-226) is more intense and strongly directed. It rises through a long series of chromatically ascending parallel 10ths. As the volume of sound grows, the music builds and begins to compress and tighten, and the wave peaks through a quick series of 7th chords and culminates in a great dissonant knot that collapses the difference between dominant 7th and augmented 6th (measure 225, note the play between F / F. and G / G #) . At this pinnacle, the music simply stops. After a moment of silence, the movement resumes quietly, again on E major. For a 2nd time, an intensifying wave has suddenly ebbed, its power dissipated by an irregular, enharmonic progression, to mystifyingly inconclusive effect.

The 3rd and final wave (measures 227-238) again builds on an ascending bass. It quickly arrives at a grandiose peroration in C #, with a series of uncanny parallel 6th chords in the brass, and moves with great power through a searing 4/2 chord (measures 237-238) , crowned with a flurry of trumpet calls as the basses and cellos strain at the top of their range. Now, at last, a wave breaks with full force : the dissonance discharges itself enharmonically onto a huge, bald E. major 6/4 chord, which is topped by a crash from the cymbal and triangle, harp arpeggios, and an announcement of the arpeggio theme in augmentation (measures 239-242) . This almost absurd magnification of the most basic of cadential gestures tries with all of its might to prepare us for an authentic cadence. It is not to be. Just as the dominant of E. is driving to close on its tonic, we are thrown back, crushingly, to C. (measures 242-243) . With a huge shift of register, the music quickly comes to rest on the dominant of A #, and the force of the wave dissipates through a series of plagal progressions before finally drifting to a halt on C. From this uncertain point in harmonic space, the music cadences with disarming simplicity in the tonic, D. The ensuing Coda is a mirror image of the opening pages of the movement. It is based on a long, unmoving tonic pedal, but the Coda (in marked contrast to the opening) luxuriates in the tonic key. The music unfurls a peaceful, secure tonality. The stress and angst of the preceding episodes are wholly, almost miraculously, absent.

The Adagio (with its staggering climaxes, its dazzling harmonic shifts, its mysteriously fractured form, and its abrupt juxtapositions of violent upheaval and uncanny stillness) plays-out a sublime plot. Bruckner's willfully esoteric tonal schemes eschew conventional means of expressing harmonic coherence. The stunning collapses that fissure the last 3rd of the movement strain heroically at the limits of Symphonic possibility, and physically enact what Schopenhauer called the « conscious and violent tearing away » that epitomizes the moment of sublime crisis. (36) Finally, with the arrival of the remarkably still Coda, which by some standards might be judged inadequately motivated or artificially easy, we are presented with a sonic expression of Kant's model of sublime satisfaction : faced with music that « bewilders » and « perplexes » our power of apprehension, the « imagination, in striving to surpass (its maximum) , sinks back into itself, by which, however, a kind of emotional satisfaction is produced » . (37)

If, as Raimonda Modiano wrote, Kant's sublime is a fantasy in which the mind « suspends disbelief for a moment ; it pretends to itself that nature is sublime in order to claim sublimity for itself and savor its power over nature » , then, the unforeseen lieto fine of the Coda is the key to the parable of sublimity portrayed in the Adagio. (38) For much of its length, the Adagio seems insuperably complex ; but, in a passage of sublime transcendence, this perception is unmasked as a fiction by the miraculous resolution of the Coda, which ecstatically dissolves everything into D. major serenity.

The meaning of sublimity in Bruckner's Vienna

Anton Bruckner's music provoked the ire of many of his early Viennese listeners, and this outrage was clearly recorded by a group of critics headed by Eduard Hanslick, who responded to Bruckner with high levels of distaste, invective, and even fear. A classic formulation of the case against Bruckner is found in Hanslick's review of the premiere of the 8th Symphony (which was already quoted in Chapter 1) . (39) Although he did not use the term, Hanslick focused with remarkable acuity on exactly those musical traits that Bruckner used to articulate sublimity, namely expansiveness, harmonic complexity, stunning power and repetition. He wrote :

« Characteristic of Bruckner's newest C minor Symphony is the immediate juxtaposition of dry, contrapuntal academicism with unrestrained exultation. Thus tossed between drunkenness and desolation, we achieve no artistic contentment. »

Hanslick specifically criticized Bruckner's way of building climaxes :

« He begins with a short chromatic motive, repeats it over and over again, higher and higher in the scale and on into infinity, augments it, diminishes it, offers it in contrary motion, and so on, until the listener is simply crushed under the sheer weight and monotony of this interminable lamentation. »

Hanslick even described the effect of being sublimely overwhelmed, although without achieving the transport of « epistemological transcendence » that is the essence of the sublime experience ; as he described it, he was « tossed between intoxication and desolation » but, in the end, was left « simply crushed » , not inspired or moved to ecstasy.

We might dismiss Hanslick as simply insensible to musical transport and write-off his critique as reactionary carping. Yet, taken in its social and political context, Hanslick's rejection of Bruckner's aspirations to sublimity makes sense. Bruckner's music tended to appeal most strongly to people, typically younger ones, who, under the star of Richard Wagner and Friedrich Nietzsche, felt alienated by what they saw as the lifeless culture of the Viennese establishment. Hanslick, like most of Bruckner's committed opponents, represented social institutions (the University, the « Neue Freie Presse » , and, by extension, the professional and bureaucratic classes) that were pillars of the bourgeois order that had come to control the Viennese polity in the 1860's and 1870's. (40) At the time, the links between the social, the political and the musical were keenly felt. In 1896, Heinrich M. Schuster wrote, for example, that « the opposition to Bruckner was and is a factional matter, and, in fact, it emanates from the party that means the same thing in the field of music that the old liberal does in the field of politics » . (41)

Audience reactions to Bruckner's music did reflect social divisions. After a performance of the 3rd Symphony at a subscription concert of the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1891, one critic reported that the galleries, which contained the only seats accessible to Bruckner's young partisans, « rang-out with noisy demonstrative applause » . In contrast, the parquet, which was occupied by old-guard subscribers, « began to empty after the 1st movement, and this process was repeated in increasing measure after each subsequent movement » . (42)

Hanslick's abjuration of Bruckner's sublime had a certain æsthetic logic as well. Hanslick's commitment to what he called « the musically beautiful » epitomizes the position of those who rejected Bruckner on principle. For Hanslick, « the primordial stuff of music is regular and pleasing sound » , which should operate « logically » on the mind ; this is hardly the stuff of sublimity. In fact, the musical sublime, which depends on inducing states of emotional intensity in the listener, found no welcome place in Hanslick's scheme. He frankly distrusted as « pathological » music and musical responses that were primarily concerned with the arousal of passions and emotions. (43)

Hanslick's musical ideal, its valorization of logic, internal coherence, and sober satisfaction, can be interpreted as a musical embodiment of what Max Weber was later to call « rationalization » , the principle of basing social organization and action on the practical application of reason (rather than on custom or tradition) in pursuit of efficiency, utility, and control. Rationalization was a crucial component of Weber's « spirit of capitalism » and the Viennese Liberal sphere, which Hanslick so successfully inhabited, was an early instantiation of rational, materialist, bureaucratic modernity. (44)

Bruckner's Symphonies sounded a different ethos (one drawing on Catholic piety, charismatic populism, Wagnerism, and atavistic mysticism) and thus mobilized opposing musical, cognitive, and, ultimately, social impulses. Sublimity, with its dialectical overcoming of empirical objectivity, is inimical to Apollonian order and the sovereignty of worldly rationality, to name two impulses that were at the heart of the ideology of Viennese Liberalism.

The sublime has always been fraught with revolutionary implications. (45) Radicals often embraced its possibility of tearing away the veil of convention. Others recoiled from the sublime as a force that could sunder the proper, traditional order of things. The sublime was politicized, for example, by Burke in his Classic counter-revolutionary statement, « Reflections on the Revolution in France » (1790) . Burke vehemently rejected the French Revolution and its goal of reconstructing society around a set of abstract ideas (namely, « fraternité, égalité, liberté ») as an illegitimate violation of the historically established social order, which, Burke believed, was a reflection of natural and divine laws. As several scholars, notably William R. Musgrave, have recently argued, Burke's political ideas and his æsthetic ideas link-up. For Burke, the monstrousness of the revolution resided in its freeing of the « threat of sublime energy to dislocate itself from these customary institutional constraints - to produce a self-authorizing political agent » . (46) Although it is not possible directly to transpose Burke's attitude to « fin-de-siècle » Vienna, intimations of the revolutionary moment inherent in sublimity may help explain the extraordinary defensiveness expressed by Bruckner's antagonists.

Gustav Dömpke, a critic closely allied to Hanslick, did in fact denounce Bruckner in terms that not only were explicitly political but actually invoked the threat of palace revolution. He wrote :

« Bruckner composes nothing but high-treason, rebellion and regicide. He is by far the most dangerous of the musical innovators of the day. » (47)

Yet, to others, who held different cultural and political ideals, the « sublime energy » unleashed by Bruckner's music was a welcome force.

At a Bruckner concert given by the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1888, a young Hugo Wolf jumped-up and shouted while « menacingly and imperiously raising his fist : ' Attention ! Now, the sublimest part is starting.' » and, as Max Graf later reported : « It sounded like a battle cry. » (48)

The 1887 version and the 1890 version

The 1887 version of the 8th Symphony has had a rather odd career. In the aftermath of Hermann Levi's negative appraisal in the fall of 1887, Bruckner set it aside, and it was soon eclipsed by the revised version of 1890. It was not until the appearance of Leopold Nowak's modern edition, in 1972, that the score became available for study, performance and, inevitably, comparison against the canonical 1890 version. For several decades before this, however, the 1887 version, then known only by reputation, and the events surrounding its revision led a shadow existence. During the « Bruckner-Streit » of the mid- 1930's (the debate, in Germany and Austria, about the authenticity of the previously available Editions of Bruckner's works sparked by the appearance and promulgation of the initial volumes of Robert Haas's collected edition) Levi's reaction to the 1st version of the Symphony occasioned far-reaching interpretation and speculation, some of it extravagant. For example, Haas asserted, without offering substantiation, that it depressed Bruckner to the point that he entertained « suicidal notions » (« Selbstmordgrillen ») . (1)

A number of writers and scholars, including Haas, came to believe that the incident and its psychological after-effects were decisive in sending Bruckner into what they saw as a spiral of uncertainty and self-doubt, during which he undertook, at least partly at external behest, a series of ill-advised revisions of not only the 8th Symphony, but also the 1st, 3rd, and 4th Symphonies (all of which were revised between 1887 and 1890) . (2) It was argued that, because of their ostensibly compromised origins, the revised versions of these works were less than fully authentic and needed to be discarded in favour of new editions based on Bruckner's « pure » manuscript scores. Several of Haas's later editions, notably the 4th Symphony (in 1936) , the 2nd Symphony (in 1938) and the 7th Symphony (in 1944) , put this belief into practice, and, in his edition of the 8th Symphony (of 1939) , Haas went so far as to incorporate passages of the 1887 version into the 1890 version in an effort to construct an « ideal » text that, as he put it, restored the work's « organic life-essentials » , which had supposedly been compromised by external pressure during the revision (see Appendix A) . (3) Several influential Brucknerians, notably Robert Simpson and Deryck Cooke, subsequently championed Haas's skepticism about the authorship of the 1890 version. Cooke, who asserted that Bruckner was beset by a « deep sense of insecurity in the face of others' criticism » , believed that Josef Schalk exerted substantial, direct influence on the 1890 version, which he labeled dismissively as the « Bruckner - Schalk revision » . (4)

These doubts about the authenticity of the 1890 revision are misplaced. They stem ultimately from a highly-questionable, albeit traditional, view of Bruckner as a naive genius beset by his circumstances and prone to unwise compromise. In the 1930's, as Haas's revisionist arguments against the authenticity of the late, revised versions of Bruckner's Symphonies began to circulate, several of the composer's surviving acquaintances rejected any suggestion that the composer was liable to manipulation or even that he was open to persuasion. (5) Josef von Wöb (1863-1943) denied that the revision of the 8th was compromised in this way and offered a reminiscence of Bruckner's steadfastness in the face of unwanted editorial advice :

« At a gathering at the " Gause Gasthaus ", at the time of the revision of the 8th, Bruckner took-out a page, pointed-out to the students a passage for wind instruments and said :

" I have simply scored it this way, and if you rascals (Viechkerln) keep arguing with me ..."

At that moment, he angrily raised his clenched fist like Zeus hurling lightning bolts. » (6)

More importantly, as Leopold Nowak bluntly emphasized, « all of the corrections in the autograph (score of the 1890 version) stem from Bruckner and there is no sign of other hand-writing » . (7) Nowak sensibly (and rightly) supplanted Haas's edition with a modern edition of the 1890 version (1955) , which he later supplemented with an edition of the 1887 version. As Nowak recognized, the 1887 version and the 1890 version are exactly that : self-standing, complete versions of the same Symphony. In the later version, the orchestration was revamped somewhat, a few passages recomposed, and some short passages simply deleted, especially in the Finale. Bruckner himself regarded these revisions as « improvements » (« Verbesserungen») and clearly felt that the 1890 version superseded the earlier one. (8) Yet, the 1887 version is not only undoubtedly legitimate, but it has an integrity and musical logic of its own. It also opens a fascinating series of perspectives on the 1890 version, Bruckner's approach to revision, and his evolving view of the Symphony.

The nature of the 1890 revision

While it is obvious that Levi's opinion that the 1st version was deeply flawed was the spur that prompted Bruckner to rework the piece, Levi's influence on the revised version can easily be over-estimated. Any suggestion that Bruckner either slavishly submitted to his opinion or revised the piece in a state of emotional collapse is surely mistaken. Bruckner was, naturally, taken aback and deeply dismayed by the negative response of his trusted colleague, yet, he rebounded in a reasonable time and was never thrown into profound despair (see Chapter 2) . The composer realized that Levi had reason to cavil at some aspects of the Symphony (notably, the orchestration) , but he also had the sureness of vision to see that the conductor's overall response reflected an inability to grasp the work as a whole. Indeed, if nothing else, Levi's reaction demonstrated dramatically that, in its initial version, the work failed to make itself understood to someone who, as a consummate conductor of the most advanced music, certainly should have been able to fathom it. With his critical judgment thus piqued, Bruckner returned to the Symphony. The musical substance of Bruckner's revision, which as we shall see goes far beyond simple adjustments and refinements, shows that he neither merely capitulated to Levi's judgment (let alone Schalk's) nor attempted to mollify or simplify his initial conception ; rather, he sharpened his conception of the Symphony.

Revisions to the orchestration

Hermann Levi stated frankly that he considered Bruckner's use of the orchestra, particularly « the trumpets and tubas (really of the winds, in general) », to be « impossible » . (9) In his revision, Bruckner did not generally simplify his orchestration ; indeed, he actually enlarged the woodwind choir by calling for triple woodwinds in all 4 movements, not only the Finale as in the 1887 version. He did, however, heed Levi's concern about his usage of the Wagner tubas. The inclusion of a quartet of Wagner tubas in a Symphony was highly-unusual ; Bruckner's 7th had been the 1st Symphony to include these instruments, which were famously introduced in « Der Ring des Nibelungen » . (10) In the 7th, these instruments are confined to the Adagio and the Finale, reserved for passages where their distinctive sonority is important, not given rhythmically active parts, nor used for very long stretches. The tuba quartet is, in effect, used as an adjunct to the regular orchestral forces. A clear example is the Coda of the Adagio, where the 4 Wagner tubas provide a striking timbral accompaniment to the horns.

This is similar to Wagner's prominent use of these instruments as a means of casting a somber hue across the music, e.g. , Hunding's music in « Die Walküre » , Act 1 ; the « Todesverkündigung » scene in « Die Walküre » , Act 2, scene 4 ; and Siegfried's death in « Götterdämmerung » , Act 3, scene 2.

In the 8th Symphony, Bruckner used the Wagner tubas more extensively. He included them in every movement but the Scherzo. In the Adagio and Finale, they are handled much as they were in the 7th, but, in the 1887 1st movement, they are used with considerably more freedom : the opening thematic statement includes 2 exposed interjections by them (measures 27-28 and 31-32) ; they are featured in the harmonically intense opening of the development section (measures 157-193) ; and they are used liberally throughout the movement, especially in heavily scored sections (e.g. , measures 102-143 and 425-453) . While these tuba parts may not quite be « impossible » (as recent recordings demonstrate) , it is understandable that Levi found them unidiomatic and needlessly difficult. Bruckner himself seems to have sensed quite early on that his use of the Wagner tubas in the 1st movement was immoderate ; even in the 1887 version, he deployed them far more judiciously in the Adagio and Finale, both of which were orchestrated after the 1st movement and both of which require 8 horn players with 4 doubling on Wagner tuba. And, in the 1890 version, Bruckner notably scaled back his use of the Wagner tubas in the 1st movement, too. Instead of scoring the movement for 4 horns and 4 Wagner tubas, as he had in 1887, he used 8 horn players, 4 doubling on tubas ; in this way, Bruckner was able to reserve the Wagner tubas for those places where their special timbre was used to effect (e.g. , the 1st part of the development section) without having to press them into service where horns were better suited (e.g. , most big tuttis) .

Bruckner's revisions to the orchestration, aside from the Wagner tubas, stem less from Levi's influence than the composer's growing Mastery of orchestral ends and means. (It is worth recalling he had prepared the final versions of the 4th, 1887-1888, and 3rd, 1888-1889, Symphonies, both of which incorporate orchestral modifications, in the interim.) Most of these changes move in the direction of greater clarity and directness, but not always by simplification. The scoring of some of the passages for full orchestra is slightly less busy and cluttered in the 1890 version (compare the woodwinds in measures 559-570 of the Finale in the 1887 version and measures 527-534 of the 1890 version), while others are made more massively imposing (compare measures 225-232 of the 1st movement in the 1887 version and measures 217-224 of the 1890 version). Some of the re-orchestration in the 1890 version reflects a subtly different compositional conception. Consider the differing scoring of the loud restatement of the opening theme of the 1st movement (measures 23-44, in both versions): in 1887, the theme is immediately sounded in a 3 octave unison by trumpets, trombone, bass tuba, and low strings; in the 1890 version, the trombones are replaced by the horns and the trumpets play not the actual theme, but instead only its bare rhythm. These changes do lessen the simple power of the 1887 scoring, but they do have 2 longer range effects. The withholding of the full weight of the combined horns, trumpets, and trombones, until measure 40, shifts the center of gravity precariously close to the end of this passage, thereby, creating an energetic impulsiveness that seems to urge the music forward just before the thematic group abates. In addition, the trumpets now prefigure not only the fateful climax of the movement, where the main-theme is stripped-down to its bare rhythm and hammered-out with great force (measures 369-389), but also the important device of paring motives down to their rhythmic skeleton.

Structural revisions

Bruckner's revision of the structure of the Symphony can hardly be ascribed to any external motivation, Haas notwithstanding. Bruckner did shorten each movement by roughly 10%, but the Symphony remained unusually lengthy. He also recomposed portions of each movement, most extensively in the 1st movement, the Trio, and the Adagio. These changes exhibit a compelling musical logic and it is wholly understandable that Bruckner felt that they improved the work.

The 1st movement

The structure of the exposition of this movement was largely untouched, but the rest of the movement was materially changed. The most dramatic alteration is the removal of the grand, triple-forte statement of the opening theme that ends the Coda in the 1887 version. The original ending dramatically resolves the dissonant D. of the opening theme onto a blazing C major triad. The revised Coda, in contrast, ends not with conclusive resolution, but poised quietly on C minor. Bruckner substantially revised the area surrounding the reprise as well. He shortened the approach to the reprise by 4 bars and altered its harmonic scheme slightly so that its initial phase emphasizes the dominant of C, not that of D. This has the effect of solidifying the tonal framework of the entire mid-section of the movement by girding it at both ends with the dominant. Bruckner also slightly shortened the passage that ends the re-capitulation of the main-theme (measures 258-269 of the 1887 version are removed) and altered its musical character. The original version of this passage (measures 269-308 of the 1887 version) is complex in texture, with prominent rhythmic motives spiking the accompaniment. The revised version thins the texture, especially near the beginning (measures 249-262 of the 1890 version), where the music is ominously spare, and in the medial climax (measures 263-278), which crests with blunt simplicity through a pair of diminished 7th chords. Bruckner also tightened the tonal framework of the beginning of this passage by more strongly articulating the tonic-dominant frame in measures 249-278 (note how the trumpets reiterate C at measures 255-261 and, then, G at measures 271-277, in the 1890 version) . At the same time, he made the following section, the reprise of the opening theme (measures 279-298, in the 1890 version) against a tangled, dissonant A. background, more complexly ambiguous.

The 2nd movement

The changes to the Scherzo are comparatively minor, comprising a few short excisions, some harmonic tinkering, and orchestral retouching. The revised Trio, in contrast, is fundamentally different. The tempo is changed from Allegro Moderato to Langsam, thus creating a much longer, slower interlude. Bruckner entirely recomposed the opening theme (measures 1-24) . He preserved the B and C themes more or less intact, but revised them so as to emphasize one of the most striking features of the Trio, the passages of pure, major triadic stillness (1st E, later A #) that dominate the latter portion of both halves of the movement. Bruckner clarified the harmonic preparation of these sections : the revised opening of the trio contains flashes of C #, the enharmonic dominant of E, and the revised voice-leading points very directly to E. He also added the distinctive harp flourishes that italicize E major (measures 37-44) , a tonality that is rather striking within a C minor context and one that comes to figure importantly in the Symphony. Although E major is not heard in the 1st movement, after it appears in the Trio, it plays a noteworthy role in the rest of the Symphony : it is the key in which the B theme of the Adagio appears, it is the starting point of the two climactic « waves » later in that movement, and it begins the striking, « Feierlich, innig » passage that intrudes on the 3rd thematic group of the Finale (measures 159-166, in the 1890 version) . In addition, the revised Trio contains some important motivic links to the surrounding movements, most notably, a trumpet call based on perfect intervals and a 16th-note triplet that recurs prominently in the Adagio (Trio : measures 26-39 and 85-87 ; and Adagio, measures 237-238 in the 1890 version) . (11)

The 3rd movement

Bruckner's revisions to the Adagio are important. As in the opening movement, the first part of the movement is essentially unchanged. Much of the remainder (measures 95-200 of the 1887 version, and measures 95-184 of the 1890 version) is, however, crucially modified. It is shortened by the removal of several brief passages. The harmonic scheme of the 2nd transition is modified (and this places renewed emphasis on the key of C ; see the 1890 version, measures 169-176) . The sublime culminating passage preceding the Coda (measures 269-273, in the 1887 version ; measures 239-243, in the 1890 version) is the single most elaborately re-worked area of the entire Symphony. Bruckner made several changes that intensify its power : he removed a gentle interlude of 10 bars that dissipates some of the gathering energy of the early stages of the « Steigerung » (measures 225-234 in the 1887 version - this is re-inserted in Haas's version) ; he deleted a forceful arrival on a D. 6/4 chord that anticipates the ultimate tonal goal and thus somewhat attenuates the accumulating tonal tension (measures 253-254 of the 1887 version) ; he made the long preparatory harmonic ascent more inexorably goal-directed ; he enriched the orchestral fabric of 2 tensely anticipatory passages (measures 223-226 and 235-238 of the 1890 version) to such striking effect that, as Ernst Kurth wrote that the final version appears « more expressive » than the later « Expressionists » . (12)

Most importantly, Bruckner re-oriented the terrible harmonic jolt that sunders the great final span of the movement. In the 1887 version, the progression moves from the dominant of C to a triad on A # ; in the 1890 version, it is relocated-up a minor 3rd so that it moves from the dominant of E. to a triad on C. It might sound, in the abstract, more « outré » for a movement in D. major to reach its high-point, as the 1887 version does, on a cadential progression in C major than on one in E. major, as in the 1890 version. Yet, in actuality, the revised version of this passage is more potent. In the 1st version, the G that supports the C major cadential preparation in measures 269-272 functions as a lower neighbor to the A. (which is, of course, the dominant of D #) that controls both ends of the passage ; thus, the move to the dominant of C major feels like a move away from the movement's prevailing tonal region, and the powerfully articulated irregular progression from the dominant of C to A. (measures 272-273) has the effect of returning the music to its « proper » orbit around the ultimate tonic, D #. In the 1890 version, this whole passage is harmonically renovated so that it begins and ends in the tonal region of E and B (= C #) . In this tonal context, the arrival on B. (as dominant of E #) in measures 239-242 is a move from a relatively distant region into a domain closer to the tonic, and, thus, the subsequent sudden deflection to C. in measure 243 pulls us suddenly away, and leaves us perched on a strange harmonic promontory.

The 4th movement

The revisions to the Finale are of a slightly different kind. The movement was shortened by 62 bars, primarily by several short excisions, but Bruckner left the fundamental structure and design of the movement intact. With only a few minor exceptions (i.e. , the substitution of new 4 bar passages for measures 119-130 and 223-242 of the 1887 version and the re-writing of measures 305-312) , Bruckner's revisions involve no recomposition ; indeed, the composer was able simply to enter most of his changes directly into his original score of the 1887 version. (13) Even the orchestration, which already included triple woodwind, was only lightly revised. The relatively minor nature of the changes made in this movement shows Bruckner's independence of mind. The Finale was the object of Levi's sharpest criticism (he called it a « closed book ») , yet, Bruckner's revisions can hardly be considered a response to this criticism. Nowhere did he alter the basic design of the movement ; he did nothing to open it to Levi's understanding. Rather, he stuck closely to his original conception of the movement that he had called « the most important of my life » .

The motivation and meaning of Bruckner's revisions

Bruckner's revisions have been interpreted variously. The common opinion, that Bruckner had intended largely to make the work more easily playable or practically acceptable, has been widely overvalued. The 1890 version is, as we have seen, hardly simplified and it failed to help the Symphony win performances. Not only did Levi eschew performing the Symphony despite Bruckner's urgings, but Felix Weingartner's decision to abandon the work, in 1891, hinged on its difficulty. As he wrote to Levi :

« Unfortunately, I couldn't perform the Bruckner. The Symphony offers such difficulties that I could not demand the necessary rehearsals. » (14)

Bruckner himself realized that the revised 8th surpassed the technical capacities of most orchestras ; in 1893, he actually advised his old mentor Otto Kitzler not to attempt a performance with his provincial orchestra in Brno, which Bruckner thought inadequate to the task. (15)

One relatively minor aspect of Bruckner's revision has been inadequately recognized. The 1887 version was largely composed, if not fully orchestrated, before Bruckner re-ordered the movements and placed the Scherzo in 2nd place and the Adagio in 3rd, and, in some details, this version retains the impress of the original sequence of movements. Some of the revisions contained in the 1890 version (most importantly, the changed Coda of the 1st movement and the new Trio) seem, in part, subtle responses to the new tonal scheme created by the new order of movements. The original fortissimo Coda of the 1st movement is the clearest vestige of this early phase of the Symphony's evolution. When the Adagio followed immediately, as it originally did, this emphatic tonic conclusion (with its strongly drawn resolution of D. as an auxiliary of C) served as an important point of contrast to the subsequent movement in D #. With the re-location of the Scherzo, which ends with a vigorous cadence in C, the 1st movement was freed of this obligation and could safely end in quiet mystery. Similarly, the 1890 Trio seems designed with the new sequence of movements in mind. With its unusual slow tempo and expressive intensity, the revised Trio is, in effect, a harbinger of the slow movement, and this premonitory quality is deepened by Bruckner's late addition of harps, which were already installed in the Adagio, and by the newly added motivic anticipation of the Adagio's climax. In contrast, the initial version of the Adagio, with a culmination that momentarily holds-out the promise of a cadence in C (measures 269-272) , seems more naturally to precede the Scherzo with its frank C minor beginning than the tonally ambivalent opening pages of the Finale.

The 1890 version also raises questions about the broader significance of Bruckner's revisions. These questions have been thoughtfully engaged by a few scholars, notably Manfred Wagner and Bryan Gilliam. Both Wagner and Gilliam recognize, albeit from different angles, that Bruckner's revisions embody the composer's renewed concern to reach his potential audiences. Wagner proposed, with a categorical sweep of the hand, that the 1st versions of Bruckner's Symphonies were composed with « no consideration » for orchestral practicalities or « acoustic economy » , and were not conceived in terms of audience response. (16) He pointed to a number of passages in the 1st versions of the 8th and, especially, the 3rd and 4th Symphonies that seem too busily cluttered and dense with musical information (« informationsreich ») to convey their sense in a concert-hall. This proposal is, undoubtedly, more apt in regard to the 3rd and 4th Symphonies, the earliest versions of which date from a time when Bruckner's radical Symphonic style was not yet fully mature ; Bruckner did, of course, revise both of these Symphonies over the course of some 15 years, each time making the score more obviously effective. The 8th is a rather different case (not only is it a fully mature work, but its revision followed the initial composition relatively soon) , yet, Wagner's sense that Bruckner's revisions clarify and focus the musical design and Symphonic texture does explain, at least, some aspects of the reworking. The 1890 version does tone down the few places in the 1887 version where the orchestration is gloriously « un-economical » (e.g. , the Coda of the 1st movement) , the texture fussier than necessary (e.g. , measures 185-194 and 293-294 of the Adagio) or the musical progression slightly awkward (e.g. , measures 263-307 in the 1st movement) . Gilliam reads Bruckner's revisions as an attempt to make the Symphony more acceptable to the conservative musical tastes of the time ; he suggested provocatively that the revised version of the 8th was designed to heighten the work's potential appeal to the Hanslick-Brahms audience by making it more « logical » and, in places, more « streamlined » .

Ultimately, this effort was, in Gilliam's view, misguided. By ameliorating some of the work's grandiosity and « sheer massiveness » (which, as Gilliam rightly pointed-out, are « words foreign to the Hanslickian vocabulary » and are « still often viewed with suspicion in modern critical discourse ») , Bruckner wrongly measured « his work by a standard other than his own » , and thus, in some measure, « compromised boldness for coherence » . (17)

I share Wagner's and Gilliam's sense that the 1890 version reflects a heightened concern with effect of the piece on the audience ; clearly, with its greater concentration and sharper lines, the revision presents a more imposing face than does the 1887 version. Rather than compromising the Symphony's boldness, then, the revisions sharpen it by drawing the music, at times, more daringly and, at times, more carefully. The 1890 version is, in other words, less striking for any taint of accommodation than for its intensification and concentration of characteristics that were already present, if less vividly, in the 1887 version. To take 1 significant example : one of the Symphony's characteristic gestures is a long climactic ascent that at its height deflects in some way, and, in some cases, even rives the musical fabric ; the 2 great examples are the reprise of the main-theme in the 1st movement (measure 225, in the 1890 version) and the tremendous climax preceding the Coda in the Adagio (measures 239-243, in the 1890 version) . In his revision, as we have seen, Bruckner intensified both of these passages. In the 1st movement, he accomplished this primarily by changing the preparation of the recapitulation : he focused the harmony more closely on the dominant of the tonic, C minor, and this heightened the tonal impact of the arrival of the primary theme. In the Adagio, Bruckner similarly modified the apex of the movement to make its harmonic effect more overwhelming and tightened its preparatory build-up by removing some passages that momentarily lower the tension, thus creating a longer, more unbroken, and, therefore, more unyielding, period of intensification - this, in turn, creates a greater effect when the anticipated culmination is subverted at the last moment. Bruckner made a few simpler revisions that tighten passages of gathering force in the 1st movement and the Finale as well (in the 1st movement, compare measures 217-225 of the 1887 version with measures 213-216 of the 1890 version, and, in the Finale, measures 515-524 of the 1887 version with measures 487-492 of the 1890 version) . These revisions do in a sense « smooth-out the nooks and crannies » , as Gilliam writes, but, in context, they have the effect not of planing but of honing the formal dynamics of the piece. (18) Even the revision of the massive accompaniment to the insistent trumpet calls that sound near the end of the 1st movement, which as Gilliam points-out is undoubtedly more static and less sweeping, exhibits a similar logic. The revised version, which reduces the chromatically inflected 3 octave upward sweep of the original (measures 379-395, of the 1887 version) in favour of a diatonic complex based on reiterated tetrachordal units (measures 369-385, of the 1890 version) , may be less extravagant, yet, it is more compactly coiled and its pure diatonicism not only adds to the air of austere tragedy, but also makes the triple forte arrival and subsequent resolution of an augmented 6th chord, an event of rare decision (measures 381-385) .

As well as reshaping climactic sections, Bruckner's revisions heighten a very different aspect of the Symphony. In addition to loudly grand passages, the 8th Symphony is characterized by stretches of remarkably still, quiet music, the greatest of which is the marvelous Coda to the Adagio, 33 bars that unfurl with glorious self-possession above a long tonic pedal. Episodes of relative stillness occur, if less dramatically, elsewhere too (e.g. , 1890 version : measures 140-164 of the 1st movement ; measures 115-134 of the Scherzo ; measures 45-69 of the Finale) , and, in the 1890 version, Bruckner subtly highlighted some of them. His removal of the loud ending of the 1st movement, for example, grants new importance to the quiet passage that now ends it and thus foreshadows the peaceful Coda of the Adagio rather than the triumphant close of the Finale. In the revised Trio, the new broad tempo obviously creates an additional reservoir of slow, still music, and magnifies its several ruminative triadic areas (measures 37-44 and 85-93).

The genius of Bruckner's revision is fully present even in small things. In the 1890 version, the 4 bars preceding the Coda of the Adagio are modified with lapidary skill, so that the musical character of this passage is not changed but rather revealed to us with greater acuity. The harmonically full accompaniment of the 1887 version is reduced, and simply eliminated in the 1st bar ; the initial dynamic marking is lowered to piano ; and the woodwind counter-melody is trimmed. As the vehicle of the movement's final authentic cadence and as the only statement of the contrasting theme in the tonic key (a traditional gesture of formal consummation) , this juncture is naturally meaningful. The revised version, with its reticence to grant an explicit tonic triad, subtly underplays this significance and slyly makes resolution wait until the Coda. Moreover, by leaving a slender melodic fragment to stand alone for a long moment poised on the brink of the tonic, the revision renders its poignancy far more keenly.

The 1892 edition, authorship, and performance practice

The 1st published edition of the 8th Symphony has long been out of print, and its contents and history are veiled in some mystery. This much is clear : the Symphony was 1st published in March 1892 by the firm of Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau (Berlin and Vienna) and, although the published text is based on the 1890 version, it differs in some ways from the text preserved in Bruckner's final manuscript (which is reproduced by Leopold Nowak's critical edition of the 1890 version) . These differences include a cut of 6 bars in the Finale (following measure 92) , the repetition of 2 bars later in that movement (measures 519-520 of Nowak's edition are repeated) , some changes in the orchestration, and the addition of many tempo, dynamic, expression, and agogic markings (see Appendix B) . The 1892 edition also contains 2 suggested cuts, marked « vi-de » above the staves, which, if taken, would result in the excision of measures 262-278 of the 1st movement and measures 519-576 (which correspond to measures 523-580 of the 1890 version) of the Finale.

Authorship

The 1892 edition is now almost universally rejected as « inauthentic » and, its textual differences, like those found in all of the 1st printed editions of Bruckner's works, are generally assumed to be the result of illegitimate editorial changes made without Bruckner's consent and possibly even without his awareness. While this is the case with several editions published in the last 3 years of Bruckner's life (notably, the Masses in E minor and F minor and the 5th Symphony, not to mention Ferdinand Löwe's posthumous edition of the 9th Symphony published in 1903) , a blanket dismissal of the editions published during his lifetime is too broad and categorical. Recent research has shown that the published versions of the 4th Symphony (1888) and the 2nd Symphony (1892) , which, traditionally, have been summarily dismissed, are, by any reasonable standard, authentic. (1) As the real complexity and ambiguity surrounding the texts, both manuscript and printed, of Bruckner's works becomes evident, it also grows increasingly apparent that our view of the 1st printed editions of Bruckner's music has long been controlled by an elaborate mythology about their inauthenticity. It has become a virtual article of faith that Bruckner's music was altered illegitimately by various editors and that the editions of his music published during his lifetime are as a result simply not authentic. (2)

In a different context, Garry Wills recently wrote, with unintended applicability to the Bruckner case, that « a myth does not take hold without expressing many truths - misleading truths, usually, but important ones » , including « truth to the demand for some control over complex realities » . (3) The myths we have constructed about Bruckner editions, their authorship, and their nature and significance are not without some basis (witness the duplicity involved in the editing of the F minor Mass and the 5th Symphony) , but they have given us a control over complex realities that is often too easy and, thus, both illusory and artificial. In this light, we need to rethink our estimation of the 1892 edition of the 8th Symphony. Any positive determination of its precise authorship is not now possible. In part, this is because substantial documentary research remains to be done : to this day, no thorough study and collation of the extensive manuscript sources of the 8th Symphony (which number more than 40 items in Vienna, Munich, Kremsmünster, and Washington) has been undertaken (neither Haas nor Nowak published a critical report) ; in particular, the manuscript copy used in the preparation of the printed score needs to be examined. (4) Yet, even an exhaustive study of all the pertinent sources cannot answer the decisive questions about the text of the 1892 edition. It is not, of course, possible to prove definitively that Bruckner was not responsible for the revisions it contains ; even those not in his hand might have been made at his express instruction. More importantly, pure documentary research cannot by itself produce critical and interpretive judgments ; in order to come to a reasonable appraisal of this text, it is necessary to uncover the circumstances through which it originated and to evaluate the nature and significance of its musical substance.

The origins of the 1892 edition

In 1891, when the 8th Symphony was to be published, Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner were charged with the task of seeing the score through press. Apparently, Schalk took on the musical preparation of the « Stichvorlage » (the score used by the printer) , while Oberleithner handled arrangements with the publisher and corrected the proofs. (5) The manuscript used was a copy prepared by Viktor Christ and Leopold Hofmeyer, likely the one prepared in 1890, shortly after Bruckner finished the composition of the revised version. (6) (This was also probably the score sent to Felix Weingartner for use in his aborted performance in 1891.)

The crucial questions concern the revisions that were made to the text before it was sent to the publisher. Schalk's correspondence makes it immediately evident that he and Oberleithner edited the score. In a letter of 31 July 1891, he informed Oberleithner that « after a week of extremely strenuous work, I have finally made the score of the Finale ready for printing (" druckreif ") » . (7) 5 days later, Schalk wrote again to Oberleithner ; this letter contains a pair of frequently cited statements. Schalk wrote that, in the Finale, the « 6 bars before F (i.e. , the 6 bars following measure 92) must also be omitted in print. The entirely unmotivated reminiscence of Symphony No. 7 primarily led me to decide to remove it. » (8) These bars are, in fact, deleted in the 1892 edition, and they do resemble measures 197-202 of the 1st movement of the 7th Symphony, but it is unclear why Schalk would have considered this grounds for removal. Schalk must also have been influenced by the fact that Bruckner himself had removed the corresponding spot in the recapitulation in the 1890 version (compare measures 547-566 of the 1890 version) . Whatever its rationale, it is likely that the decision to cut these measures from the 1892 edition was Schalk's. Not only did Schalk say so, but the revision is so crude as to suggest that it was not made by Bruckner. The 6 bars are simply stricken with no attempt to splice the music together smoothly. A more careful editor (i.e., Bruckner himself) might well have changed the final note in the bass in measure 92 from E. to D and might have removed the crescendo in the 2nd half of this bar since it now leads nowhere, or he might have simply started the cut 4 bars earlier as Bruckner had done at the corresponding spot in the recapitulation in the 1890 version (compare at measure 567 of that version).

The 1892 edition

In the same letter, Schalk also requested that Oberleithner « pursue ("treiben") the corrections only with the publisher. If Bruckner has to read from the cut ("gestrichenen") score at a rehearsal all of our good intentions will be thwarted, and, instead of his thanks, we would probably earn his curse. »

Several scholars have taken these sentences as evidence of extreme, surreptitious editorial intervention by Schalk and Oberleithner, and have even used this letter as support for the conclusion that the revisions contained in the 1892 edition are simply illegitimate. (9) It is likely, however, that we are faced here with an instance in which the reigning mythology about Bruckner editions has fostered mis-interpretation. First, the word « gestrichenen » (cut) has traditionally been transcribed inaccurately as « geschriebenen » (written), thus rendering the meaning of the sentence not only rather obscure but, also, apparently more damning by creating the implication that the entire « written score », meaning presumably the « Stichvorlage », contained changes that Schalk wanted to hide from Bruckner. (10) Furthermore, Schalk's letters to Oberleithner contain additional passages, which have been glossed over, that both explain the cryptic reference to the « gestrichenen » score and contravene any simple dismissal of their editorial activities as unauthorized meddling. (11) These passages reveal that Schalk and Oberleithner did not work in secrecy, but discussed at least some things with Bruckner, and, moreover, they show that Bruckner did not automatically accept suggested changes. In the 31 July letter, Schalk proposed a « very suitable » and « easily effected » cut before rehearsal letter Pp, in the Finale. No music is actually removed at this place in the 1892 edition, but it does contain a suggestion (marked « vi-de ») to cut « ad libitum » from 6 bars after Kk to Pp (this means, in effect, jumping from measure 522 to measure 581 of the Nowak edition). Schalk apparently would have been happy to remove this passage: he argued the merits of this excision to Oberleithner (« all that is lost is a rather superfluous build-up and the repetition of the anyhow very prolonged chorale-like lyrical thematic group » - "Gesangsperiode") and, in his 4 hand piano reduction, Schalk did simply leave-out this passage. (12) So, apparently, Schalk had some scruples about actually excising this long stretch of music in the orchestral score or, perhaps, he anticipated that Bruckner would not accept it. In any case, he instructed Oberleithner that « in print, the whole must, I suppose, be included », which of course is what happened. Schalk's 2nd letter states, somewhat cryptically, that « we must undo the cut at Letter Z! I have already discussed the retention of this passage with the Master and he agreed entirely ». Taken by itself, this reference is unclear, but it can be explained with reference to a loose sheet of paper inserted in Bruckner's manuscript score of the 1890 version (A-Wein Musik Handschriftlichen 19.480) that, as Dermot Gault reports, « carries a proposal to cut from the "Ruhig" episode (i.e., at Z) to just before letter Aa (i.e., measures 345-386) and substitute 4 bars of timpani roll. » (13) This was probably one of the cuts that Bruckner had suggested to Weingartner, in early 1891, and, presumably, Oberleithner (or less likely, Schalk) had actually crossed-out this passage in the « Stichvorlage » before Bruckner made it clear that he did not want this stretch eliminated from the printed score. (Bruckner had, of course, already made this clear to Weingartner in his letter of 27 March 1891; see Chapter

2.) This also explains Schalk's anxiety that Bruckner not see the « gestrichenen » score ; he was worried that it would reveal that he and Oberleithner had made the big cut after Z (which was soon undone) , and, also, possibly the shorter one after measure 92, before clearing it with Bruckner.

If some of the revisions, notably cuts, in the 1892 edition were made (or not made) contingent on Bruckner's prior approval, others were apparently not. In the letter of 31 July 1891, Schalk made it clear that he had made numerous changes on his own initiative and, with a scrupulousness that belies the image of him as a shameless bowdlerizer, he acknowledged that these pushed the limits of propriety :

« The many alterations I have made, which appear to me to be completely necessary, can be justified only through the most painstaking conscientiousness. You will easily recognize the intention toward greater clarity of effect or expression that the revisions contain. May the same conviction, which I have now gained, console you with the thought that the matter is extremely important and, actually, saves the life of this work. I assure you that I've done only what is absolutely necessary ; I had to leave much unchanged in view of the irresponsibility of the project. »

We are faced then with something of a puzzle : the 1892 score almost certainly contains changes (the cut after measure 92 of the Finale and, possibly, the new layer of performance indications and the few instrumental retouchings) that were made by Schalk without Bruckner's direct involvement. Although Schalk felt that these changes verged on the « irresponsible » , it is far from certain that he kept them secret from Bruckner (remember, he expressed worry only that Bruckner might see the « gestrichenen » manuscript, not the revised text itself) . Although Bruckner may, as Paul Hawkshaw wrote, have been « deliberately removed (emphasis original) » from the preparation of the editions of the F minor Mass and the 5th Symphony, we are not justified in making that claim about the 1892 edition of the 8th Symphony. (14) Rather, this case seems more closely analogous with those of the 2 other Symphonies published between 1889 and 1892, namely the 4th and the 3rd, in which Bruckner approvingly left part of the process (exactly how much can probably never be determined) of preparing the text for publication, including adding a final layer of performance markings, to an amanuensis. (15) Although the documentary history of the 1892 edition of the 8th Symphony has not yet been worked-out in detail, its origins appear to be similar and clearly involved a degree of collaboration in the final stages of editing. But this collaboration was presumably done only with Bruckner's consent. Indeed, Franz Schalk later said that Bruckner himself edited the revised text of the 8th and Josef von Wöb stated that Bruckner had authorized the published edition. (16)

The textual situation of the 8th Symphony is messy and cannot support simple, black-and-white answers ; so, while the 1892 edition may not be « pure Bruckner » (whatever that might be) to all appearances, Bruckner authorized it and, for that reason, it needs to be taken seriously. If we simply dismiss the 1892 edition in the name of honoring Bruckner's « real intention » , we paradoxically do something that contradicts the composer's own actions. For much of this Century claims about Bruckner's true, inner wishes have often been used in this way to defend the exclusive preserve of modern « Urtext » editions, to stifle debate about the « Bruckner Problem » , and to trump, legitimately or not, more complex answers. This process has obscured what is, as we shall see, an extremely valuable and historically important tradition of Bruckner performance and interpretation.

Notation, performance practice, and interpretation

In trying to come to understand the 1892 edition, it is essential to bear in mind that it (far more than Bruckner's manuscripts) is a score designed for practical use ; thus, if nothing else, this text does undoubtedly present a fascinating and valuable picture of 19th Century interpretations of the work. It explains how the music should sound and go far more explicitly (and in a musically compelling way) than do Bruckner's manuscript scores of the 1890 and 1887 versions and the modern critical editions based on them. This new, more careful and extensive notation of performance indications is consistent with Bruckner's practice with the other editions published in the late- 1880's and early 1890's. It was also only during the late- 1880's, with the growing success of the 7th Symphony and, later, the 4th and 3rd, that Bruckner began to gain extensive knowledge of how his Symphonies actually worked in repeated public performances. As Manfred Wagner pointed-out, Bruckner had little 1st hand experience with the orchestra until relatively late in his adulthood, and his early manuscript scores do not reflect a practiced orchestral hand in their notation of performance instructions and details of instrumentation. (17) Several of Bruckner's statements make it clear that he was aware of these short comings. Before the 1st performance of the 7th Symphony (which was based on Bruckner's manuscript score) , he wrote to the conductor Arthur Nikisch, « in the score, many important, frequent tempo changes are not marked » . (18) (When the score of the 7th Symphony was published in 1885, it contained some added tempo markings, clearly designed to remedy the lack Bruckner pointed-out to Nikisch.) Similarly, during rehearsal of the 8th Symphony, Bruckner felt compelled to ask Felix Weingartner to « please, freely modify the tempi (as necessary for clarity) » . (19) It was undoubtedly in order to avoid leaving important decisions about tempi to the discretion of conductors, which obviously admitted substantial room for misinterpretation, that Bruckner made sure to delineate clearly (far more so than in his unpublished manuscripts) the overall tempo schemes in the published editions of his works.

Unlike the 3rd and 4th Symphonies (and, for that matter, the 7th, 1st, and 2nd) , the 8th was not performed before it was published. Ordinarily, performances afforded Bruckner a chance to make minor adjustments (this was indeed the case with the 2nd and 4th Symphonies, for example) . (20) Although the composer was not to hear a note of the 8th for nearly 2 years, Weingartner's aborted performance, in early 1891, did provide him with, at least, some practical 2nd hand information. This experience must have shown Bruckner that his manuscript text of the 1890 version did not adequately represent his conception of the Symphony in one crucial respect : it failed to explain fully how to handle some important matters of performance, above all, the dynamic balance of the various choirs of the orchestra, the overall tempo schemes, and local changes of tempo. These are exactly the areas addressed by the revisions contained in the 1892 edition, all of which (the added tempo and dynamic markings, the minor changes to the orchestration, and even the suggested cuts) relate to performance. In light of the great difficulty that both Levi and Weingartner had in coming to grips with the score, which they knew only in manuscript, it is easy to understand why Bruckner felt the need to provide future interpreters with more adequate instructions about tempi and dynamics, as well as some minor instrumental changes.

Instrumentation

As Appendix B shows, the revisions made to the orchestration in the 1892 editions are generally subtle ; they are not nearly as extensive as the revisions Bruckner made in re-working the 1887 version. (The tendency among reviewers and commentators of referring casually to the « wholesale re-orchestrations » found in the 1st editions of Bruckner's Symphonies is a mere reflex, and is not borne-out by the facts.) Aside from the re-orchestration of measures 637-643 of the Finale, only the additions to the timpani part in measures 445-446, 453-454, and 461-462 of the Finale, and the added cymbal crash in measure 479 of the same movement are striking. In some sections, different string techniques (pizzicato, mutes, tremolando) are incorporated. Occasional doublings are added, more often for reasons of clarity than of colour ; see, for example, the doubling of the cellos and basses with bassoons in measures 132-139 of the 1st movement, or the addition of horns in measures 331-332 of the Finale to support a poorly articulated bass-line. Another change made to clarify an important passage is the deployment of the woodwinds on the final pages of the Finale (measures 688-696) to double the climactic trumpet fanfares. None of these changes to the orchestration alters the basic character of the music, and they certainly do not represent a conceptual change. They simply strengthen and clarify what was already present.

Dynamics

In his manuscript, Bruckner followed an older method of notating dynamics : even in passages scored for a large and diverse group of instruments, he indicated only one dynamic level for all of the parts. This notation was standard for much of the 19th Century (see the orchestral scores of Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms) , and it assumes, as Erich Leinsdorf explained, that adjustments of the relative loudness of the different instruments would be made by the conductor :

« Balances are so obvious most of the time that no composer writing in the Classical manner dreamed of taking time for such minute and self-evident (notational) detail. » , as indicating graded dynamics for the various instrumental groups. (21)

Bruckner's use of the orchestra departs quite decisively from the lassical manner, and balancing his scoring, especially with its great use of brass instruments, is not easily done. When Felix Weingartner was rehearsing the 8th, he wrote to Bruckner complaining of the sonic predominance of the brass and winds (which he diplomatically ascribed to his small body of strings) and even asked if he could remove some of the doublings in the winds and brass. (22) Bruckner agreed provided Weingartner did not alter the score or parts. (23) The 1892 edition remedies this problem. It does not lighten the scoring in even the most powerful tutti passages, but it does consistently modify the dynamics. Brass are frequently notated 1 level lower than the strings and woodwinds (e.g. , forte brass with fortissimo strings and woodwinds) . (24) In this way, the published score merely spells-out what any conscientious conductor must do. Franz Schalk, who was an internationally esteemed conductor in the 1st 3 decades of the 20th Century, wrote that the brass and strings need different dynamic levels « because, otherwise in Bruckner's instrumentation, the brass will obscure the strings » . (25) This disparity was greatest in the days of gut strings, which do not project as brilliantly as do modern wound strings. Yet, even in the modern era, the great Bruckner conductor Eugen Jochum (1902-1987) reached the same conclusion as did Schalk :

« Even when the brass and strings play the same thing in a fortissimo, the brass must be handled with restraint. The brass will come across anyway, the strings must be brought-out. » (26)

Tempo markings

Tempi are of particular importance in articulating the expansive and often episodic forms of the 8th Symphony, yet, apt tempi are not always immediately evident from the music, and Bruckner's manuscript scores (and thus Haas's and Nowak's editions) , with their sparing and inconsistent tempo indications, provide only partial answers. Bruckner noted most of the main tempi and, confusingly, some but not all of the major tempo changes. In Bruckner's original manuscript, the opening theme group of the Finale is marked « Feierlich, nicht schnell » (half-note = 69 measures) ; a slower tempo (« Langsamer » , half-note = 60 measures) is clearly marked for the 2nd theme (measure 69) , as is another slowdown (« Noch langsamer ») at measure 99, and the subsequent resumption of the « langsamer » tempo (measure 111) ; yet, Bruckner gives no further instruction with the beginning of the 3rd theme in measure 135. (27) Taken absolutely literally, this means that the « langsamer » tempo should continue until the next marked return of the main tempo 166 bars later. Surely, this is impossible ; not only would the music drag terribly, but it would rob the « Feierlich, innig » passage at measure 159 of some of its special character. The 1892 edition is much more detailed and leaves little to guess work ; it is noteworthy how carefully it prescribes the resumption of the original tempo for the 3rd theme (measure 135) and after each ritard. Constantin Floros was right to say that, in Bruckner's autograph scores, the « sparse tempo indications are not always sufficient for a meaningful performance » and, as Floros demonstrated, conductors generally do not even try to follow them slavishly. (28) Even so, modern-day Bruckner conductors do, at times, evince some difficulty in finding just tempi and, even more, in working-out the apt and convincing tempo relationships - a problem that is effectively resolved in the 1892 edition.

In addition to large-scale tempo schemes, numerous local fluctuations of tempo are indicated in the 1892 score. For example, occasional momentary italicizations are spelled-out, as in measures 221 and 229 of the Finale, where the tempo is broadened to highlight the flute chords. Several passages are punctuated by instructions to hold back momentarily and, then, resume the main tempo, thus shaping the flow of relatively large musical paragraphs (see, for example, the several « ritardando - a tempo » indications in the 2nd thematic group of the 1st movement reprise at measures 299-340) . This device is also used to introduce musical events that do not involve a basic tempo change (see, for example, the onset of the 2nd thematic group of the Adagio, measures 47 and 141) . Perhaps, the most striking of the tempo indications in this score are its many prolonged accelerandi that accompany Bruckner's characteristic « Steigerungen » , passages that climb toward a culminating point of arrival by building in intensity, loudness, register, and harmonic and surface rhythm (good examples are the prolonged approaches to the climaxes in the Adagio discussed in Chapter 4 and the build-up to the reprise of the opening theme in the 1st movement at measures 201-224) . In Bruckner's manuscript, these passages are marked only with long crescendi, while, in the printed score, they are additionally marked with progressive increases of tempo. As Robert Philip has shown, this application of accelerandi is a typical « 19th Century » interpretation of this sort of passage : modern performers are strongly inclined to eschew prominent accelerandi. (29) Thus, as with the other performance instructions added to the 1892 edition, such written accelerandi undoubtedly do not represent a new conception of the pieces, but simply make explicit what Bruckner left implicit in his manuscript text.

The tempo notations in the 1892 edition describe a rhetorical « give and take » that is wholly typical of progressive, late- 19th Century interpretive ideas. For example, in « On Conducting » (1869) , Richard Wagner wrote in detail of the need for « well-considered modifications of the tempo » , which are just as necessary « as the correct intonation of the notes themselves, if an intelligible rendering is to be obtained » .Wagner wrote that the artful manipulation of the tempo was particularly important in pieces of moderate pace (e.g. , « sehr mäßig bewegt ») and in which « the themes are treated episodically » , a category that contains many of Bruckner's Symphonic movements. (30) Since almost all of Bruckner's early champions (Hans Richter, Hermann Levi, Athur Nikisch, Felix Mottl, and the Schalk brothers) , not to mention the composer himself, were Wagnerians, they would have shared the belief that the successful performance of music entailed rhetorical and structural adjustments of tempo, another hint that tempi modifications added in the 1892 editions probably do not add something that was previously entirely absent from the music. Franz Schalk's comments, from the 1920's, on the performance indications in the printed version of Bruckner's scores help place the whole issue in proper historical perspective. He explained that, when Bruckner's Symphonies began to appear in concert in the 1880's, « Kapellmeisters » still followed the « ' rigid system (starre System) ' » marked by « an inflexible tempo » , « dynamics with little transitional shading » and little « concern for thematic clarity in performance » . (31) The markings in Bruckner's published score were intended, it would seem, largely to ward off the stiff, severe style of interpretation that prevailed in the 1880's (and, as we shall see, perhaps in the 1980's, too) . If, in an age of virtuosic, visionary conductors, Schalk felt called upon to emphasize that these tempo indications should not « be given too much weight » , today, in an age with a rather more abstemious interpretive ethos, we might well invert Schalk's concern, and stress that they should not simply be forgotten or ignored.

Changing interpretive approaches and their significance (a short case study)

The musical implications of the performance markings in the 1892 edition become vividly apparent when they are studied in conjunction with an array of recordings made over the past 60 years. The reprise of the 3rd thematic group in the Finale (measures 579-642 ; compare measures 583-646 of the 1890 version) can serve as a concise example for such a survey. This passage begins quietly with a series of fugal entries of the head motive of the 3rd theme in the violas and violins above a sustained timpani roll on the dominant. As the strings continue to spin-out, this motivic material, the clarinets, oboes, horns, and flutes enter in turn as the music gradually builds to a powerful fortissimo arrival (measure 617) above a big dominant pedal, whereupon the trombones, trumpets, and bass tuba proclaim the opening theme of the 1st movement. From this peak, the music recedes until it comes to rest with a series of 3 pianissimo timpani strokes on G. The manuscript text of the 1890 version of this passage contains relatively complete instructions regarding dynamics, while tempo indications are all but absent. In marked contrast, the 1892 edition presents a detailed set of instructions for the temporal progress of the passage that effectively describe the desired dramatic shape : the music is to begin calmly, very gradually increase in tempo and volume, peak vigorously, and then, slow and grow ever calmer as it comes to rest. (Note too that the 1892 tempo markings spell-out a continual process, not a series of states : beginning very calmly, very gradually growing more lively.) The few changes to the orchestration found on these pages in the 1892 edition also contribute to the dynamism of the music. The percussiveness of the pizzicato cellos in measures 609-616 helps to propel the music, and the more extensive use of tremolo in the cellos (measures 601-606 and measures 627-631) and violas (measures 627-630) contributes to the surging and ebbing flow of the music by increasing the vibrating energy of the climax. (The re-orchestration of measures 637-644, where 1 oboe, 2 clarinets, 2 horns, and 1 tremolando violin supplant the violins and viola of the 1890 version, is a simple change of timbre.)

Recordings reveal a clear historical trend. Older conductors, especially those who were active in the 1st decades of the 20th Century, tended to shape these pages in ways reminiscent of the 1892 edition (and to a degree that might well strike modern sensibilities as extreme) ; recordings by conductors of younger generations are generally much less rhetorical and far steadier in tempo. For example, recordings from the 1940's (which are the oldest that exist) typically present this passage as a grand accelerando-rallentando, with a tempo increase of as much as 20 % . (Herbert von Karajan's 1944 recording is a notable exception.) Equally important in these performances are the waxing and waning of sonic intensity of the orchestral playing, the incisiveness of the phrasing, and the increasing rhythmic animation that accompany these tempo modifications ; the music drives forcefully toward the climax, crests, and then subsides. Recorded performances of the 1892 score by Bruno Walter (1876-1962) and Hans Knappertsbusch (1888-1965) naturally exemplify this approach, but other conductors of the old school, notably Carl Schuricht (1880-1967) , Wilhelm Fürtwängler (1886-1954) , and Eugen Jochum (1902-1987) , played this passage in the spirit of the 1892 version, no matter what edition they were actually using. Recordings from the 1980's and 1990's by such eminent figures as Karajan (1908-1989) , Günter Wand (1912-2002) , Carlo Maria Giulini (1914-2005) , and Lorin Maazel (1930-) present this music much differently ; as a rule, these performances set a rather broader basic tempo (perhaps, reflecting Leopold Nowak's « viel langsamer » , in measure 583) , abstain from dramatic tempo fluctuations (especially increases) and place great store by fullness of tone, precise ensemble, and textural clarity. (Daniel Barenboim's tempi reflect something of the older tradition.)

Differing performances of the re-appearance of the main-theme of the 1st movement (measures 617-623) , an obvious high-point, encapsulate the evolution in interpretive approaches. The 1892 edition (and most older conductors) highlights this moment by surging through it as the crest of a wave. The modern tendency is to approach this point with steady, inexorable strides and, during the statement itself, allow the weighty brass tone ample time to resound ; indeed, most current-day conductors broaden the tempo (not hasten it) at this spot. Today, we usually hear this passage unfold patiently and splendidly ; older generations of listeners, likely reaching back to the 1890's, heard it played as high musical drama. (32)

These developments in performance style obviously parallel the rise of the « Urtext » editions of Haas and Nowak, yet, the sea change that Bruckner performance experienced in the 3rd quarter of the 20th Century was not based solely on the emerging supremacy of modern editions. During this era, performance styles in general moved in the same general directions traceable in the evolution of Bruckner performances : performers began to favour steadier tempi, to eschew marked accelerandi, and, generally, to pursue interpretive sobriety and « objectivity » . This impulse to play simply « what is written » (« com'è scritto » , in Arturo Toscanini's famous words) is often justified as simple adherence to a composer's intentions, and, as the renunciation of overly personal, subjective, or « Romantic » approaches to interpretations. With the Bruckner 8th, as we have seen, this position rests on slippery historical and text-critical ground, and, in any case, pinning down a composer's intentions about performance (or about anything else, for that matter) is always a tricky business - or, better, an endlessly fascinating project. Surely, it is unwise, and perhaps obfuscatory, to claim that this score or that score preserves in amber « Bruckner's interpretation » . (33)

Furthermore, framing the question in terms of narrowly defined notions of authorial intention is not the most enlightening approach. Performance styles, changing standards of scholarship, the evolving meaning of a given repertory, and the ideological, social, and material foundations of musical culture exist in a complex inter-relationship. The overtly dramatic interpretations of Bruckner's Symphonies of generations past were part of musical culture that differed crucially from ours. At that time, a Symphony was an event to be experienced in a concert-hall, and conductors aimed to put the music across to the audience as vividly and persuasively as possible (an impulse nicely reflected in the 1892 score) . Now, in an age of infinitely repeatable digital recordings, musicians are prone to be much more restrained. A recorded musical work is liable to be listened to in a living room (or even on headphones) , heard repeatedly, and sometimes closely scrutinized, but more often attended to casually ; as a result, listening to music, especially Symphonic music, becomes less a rare transporting event than a matter of either relatively inattentive consumption or exquisite delectation.

Just as manners of performance contribute decisively to a work's æsthetic effect and its perceived meaning, at the same time, they reflect changing attitudes toward the nature and significance of a given repertory. Conductors Bruno Walter and Wilhelm Fürtwängler, for example, presented the 60 odd measures before the Coda of the Finale as an intense, viscerally affecting experience, more gripping and ultimately more cathartic than attractive. Half a Century later, Wand, Giulini and Maazel played it serious, solemn, and beautiful. We can trace a parallel evolution in the metaphors used to describe Bruckner's music. Schalk's program notes from 1892 depict the titanic struggles of Prometheus. For Ernst Kurth (1886-1946) , Bruckner's music was composed of great « Symphonic waves » that play-out musical energy through space and time. Fürtwängler found « battles of demons » (« Kämpfe der Dämonen ») as well as « sounds of blessed transfiguration » in Bruckner's music. (34) Now, it is far more common to concentrate descriptions of Bruckner's Symphonies on images of peace and stability. Robert Simpson wrote, in a moving and resonant phrase, that « the essence of Bruckner's music lies in a patient search for pacification » . (35) The close relationship of this attitude and the interpretive approach of most modern conductors is not hard to see ; yet, an attitude of reverent patience is prone to obscure other, rather different and deeply important qualities that may be found in Bruckner's music. Now, it is easy to feel that the 8th has become all too tame and has lost much of the urgent excitement and demonic struggle that emerged from it a Century, or even half a Century, ago. Studying the Symphony in its 1892 edition may open new corridors for interpretation and, perhaps, help provide us with a renewed purchase on the work's awesome vitality and its visionary, even apocalyptic, quest for deliverance. For this reason, if no other, this score surely deserves serious attention and (is it too much to hope ?) the passionate creative energies of modern-day conductors.

Appendix A

Robert Haas' edition of the 8th Symphony

Robert Haas's edition of the 8th Symphony is a problem. It was one of the last of his Bruckner editions to appear, and it represents his editorial approach at its most extreme. Despite its label of « Original Version » , Haas's edition does not strictly follow either the 1887 version or the 1890 version, but, instead, is an editorial conflation that incorporates some elements derived from the 1887 version into the text of the 1890 version. Haas justified this procedure on the basis of what he understood to be the story of the Symphony's creation and revision. He believed that Bruckner was crushed by Hermann Levi's response to the 1887 version and contended that, in its aftermath, Bruckner was subject to manipulation, if not coercion, by Levi and Josef Schalk. In the preface to his score, Haas wrote darkly of Bruckner's « forced promise » (« abgezwungene Versprechen ») to revise the Symphony and of the « coerced cuts » (« abgenötigte Kürzungen ») found in the revised version. Because of this supposed taint of external influence (what Haas called : « fremden Einflußbereichs ») , Haas felt called upon when preparing his edition, which is based primarily on the 1890 version, to « reach back to the 1st version in some passages, in order to restore the authentic sound and sense » . (1)

Compared to the 1890 version, Haas's score contains sporadic minor changes in the orchestration, which are derived from the 1887 version, in the 1st movement, the Finale, and more extensive ones in the Adagio. (He made no such alterations in the Scherzo.) The form of the 1st 2 movements was left intact, but, in the 2 final movements, Haas selectively « undid » some of the cuts Bruckner had made in the course of his revision. Haas believed that the cuts that Bruckner effected by simply crossing-out passages reflected a « nonchalant manner of revision » and were made without the composer's « inner participation » , and thus were not legitimate. (This despite the fact that all the revisions are confirmed by Bruckner's characteristic « metrical numbers » , which demonstrate that the composer did consider them seriously. (2) Accordingly, Haas's edition contains several sections from the 1887 version that Bruckner struck from the 1890 version : in the Adagio, a stretch of 10 measures is re-instated following measure 208 (measures 209-218 in Haas's score) , and, in the Finale, measures 211-214 of the 1890 text are replaced by 20 measures from the 1st version, 4 bars are re-instated following measure 238 of the 1890 version, 12 bars are restored following measure 566 of the 1890 version, and 4 bars following measure 636 of the 1890 version (these are measures 211-230, 255-258, 587-598, and 671-674, respectively, in Haas's score) . Haas also replaced measures 577-582 of the 1890 version with a new 8 bar passage (measures 609-616 in Haas's score) . (Haas seems to have synthesized this passage himself by composing-out the underlying harmonies of the 1887 version of this passage to fit a sketchy flute part Bruckner penciled into the upper-margin of the revised manuscript. All of the material Haas worked with was clearly deleted by Bruckner and obviously replaced.) This creative editing surely exceeds reasonable limits of scholarly responsibility ; moreover, his edition does not include any scholarly apparatus nor does the introduction adequately explain this editorial intervention. (3)

Robert Haas's motivations are obscure. Presumably, he came to feel that he was able to identify so strongly with Bruckner that he could intuit the composer's true intentions even though there is no actual evidence that Bruckner's revision involved any coercion, manipulation, or hastiness and nonchalance. It is hard to ignore the consanguinity of Haas's approach and the cultural politics of National-Socialism. Haas's portentous rhetoric about Bruckner and « greater Germany » surely evokes the passions of the time (as is acutely evident in his comments quoted in Chapter 1) and his stated mission finally to « liberate the true Symphonic will of the Master » seems to embody something of the Nazi ethic. (4) Whatever Haas's thought process, it is paradoxical that a scholar who railed so fiercely against what he perceived as the illegitimate and intrusive editorial practices of the Schalk brothers and Ferdinand Löwe should himself intervene editorially in such extreme and obviously unauthorized ways.

Although the Haas edition is now obtainable only as a photo-reprint study score, a number of prominent conductors (including : Bernard Haitink, Günter Wand, Herbert von Karajan, and Daniel Barenboim) committed themselves to this version of the Symphony. (5) Several writers, including Robert Simpson and Deryck Cooke, have argued that Haas's score is musically superior to Nowak's. This point is, of course, debatable ; it could be argued, for example, that the passage Haas inserted in the Adagio unnecessarily dissipates the accumulating tension that spans much of the final 3rd of the movement. In the end, however, one might respond to Haas's edition, it must not be forgotten that it does not correspond to any version of the Symphony that Bruckner actually wrote.

Appendix B

Textual differences between the Finale in the 1890 version and the 1892 edition

The musical text of the 1892 edition is currently almost unknown. It does, nevertheless, have a very negative reputation. Deryck Cooke, for example, called it « an appalling picture of the muddled, amateurish and senseless desecration brought about by his pupils' tampering » . (1) Such dismissive description is not only tendentious, but it is also seriously in error. For this reason, it seems worthwhile to tabulate its differences from Nowak's well-known and authoritative edition of the 1890 version. The Finale contains the most important and numerous points of variance, and thus can serve as a representative example of the whole.

Notes

Introduction

(1) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , 4 volumes in 9 part, Regensburg (1922-1937) ; IV/3, page 21.

(2) I allude to Walter Wiora's well-known essay, « Zwischen absoluter und Programmusik » , in « Festschrift Friedrich Blume zum 70. Geburtstag » , edited by Anna Amalie Abert and Wilhelm Pfannkuch. Kassel (1963) . Pages 381-388.

(3) William Rothstein, « Phrase Rhythm in Tonal Music » , New York (1989) , page 249.

Placing the 8th Symphony

(1) See Paul Bekker's « Die Sinfonie von Beethoven bis Mahler » , Berlin (1918) . Also see : Margaret Notley, « Volkscconcerte in Vienna and Late 19th Century Ideology of the Symphony » , Journal of the American Musicological Society, No. 50 (1997) , pages 421-453 and Stephen Hinton, « Not Which Tones ? The Crux of Beethoven's 9th » , 19th Century Music, No. 22 (1998) , page 75, note 48.

(2) 3 previous subscription concerts had included a Symphony by Bruckner : the 7th Symphony on 21 March 1886, the 3rd on 21 December 1890, and the 1st on 13 December 1891, all under Hans Richter. Wilhelm Jahn had included the Adagio and Scherzo of the 6th Symphony at a subscription concert, on 11 February 1883. The Philharmonic also performed Bruckner Symphonies at concerts sponsored by the « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » (the 4th was given on 20 February 1881, the 7th on 24 February 1889, and the 3rd on 25 January 1891) . Another performance of the 4th, on 22 January 1888, was also privately funded.

(3) See August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , 4 volumes in 9 parts, Regensburg (1922-1937) ; IV/3, pages 284-285.

(4) See Clemens Hellsberg, « Demokratie der Könige : Die Geschichte der Wiener Philharmoniker » .Vienna (1992) ; page 275.

(5) Review dated 5 January 1893, excerpted in Norbert Tschulik, « Bruckner im Spiegel seiner Zeit » ,Vienna (1955) , page 51 ; unless otherwise noted, all translations are by the author.

(6) « -n. » , review dated 21 December 1892 in « Das Vaterland » , reprinted in Franz Grasberger, « Das Bruckner-Bild der Zeitung " Das Vaterland " in den Jahren 1870-1900 » in Festschrift Hans Schneider zum 60. Geburtstag, edited by Rudolf Elvers and Ernst Vogel, Munich (1981) . Page 126 (emphasis in the original) .

(7) Review of Bruckner's 8th Symphony, « Neue Freie Presse » , 23 December 1892 ; reprinted in Eduard Hanslick, « Fünf Jahre Musik » , Berlin (1899) . Pages 190-191 ; English translation in Eduard Hanslick, « Music Criticisms 1846-1899 » , translated by Henry Pleasants, Baltimore (1950) . Pages 288-289, translation modified.

(8) See the photo of the leaflet in Hans-Hubert Schönzeler, « Bruckner » , London (1970) . Page 158.

(9) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , 4 volumes in 9 part. Regensburg (1922-1937) ; IV/3, 298.

(10) « Österreichische Volks-Zeitung » , 21 December 1892 ; quoted in Manfred Wagner, « Zur Rezeptionsgeschichte von Anton Bruckners Achter Symphonie » , « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1991-1992-1993, Linz (1995) . Page 115.

(11) Reprinted in Grasberger, « Das Bruckner-Bild der Zeitung " Das Vaterland " » , page 128.

(12) Quoted in Manfred Wagner, « Zur Rezeptionsgeschichte » , page 111 ; also, see Ingrid Fuchs in « Round Table : Bruckner und die österreichische Presse » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Bruckner Rezeption » , edited by Othmar Wessely, Linz (1991) . Page 91, note 43.

(13) Letter to Emil Kauffmann, 23 December 1892, in Hugo Wolf's « Briefe an Emil Kauffmann » , edited by Edmund Heller, Berlin (1903) . Page 82.

(14) Karl Grunsky, « Anton Bruckner » . Stuttgart (1922) , pages 86-87. Franz Gräßlinger also analogized with Goethe's Faust ; see « Bruckners Achte Sinfonie » in « In Memoriam Anton Bruckner » , edited by Karl Kobald,Vienna (1924) .

Pages 100-113 ; especially, page 113.

(15) Heinrich Schenker, « Anton Bruckner » , « Die Zeit » No. 7 (1896) ; reprinted in Schenker, « Heinrich Schenker als Essayist und Kritiker : gesammelte Aufsätze, Rezensionen und kleinere Berichte aus den Jahren 1891-1901 » , edited by Hellmut Federhofer, Hildesheim (1990) . Pages 200-201.

(16) Ibid. , page 202.

(17) Ibid. , pages 203-204.

(18) Kurth, « Bruckner » . Berlin (1925) . Pages 1035-1099 ; also, see pages 346-355.

(19) « Leichtentritt, Musikalische Formenlehre » , 3rd edition, Leipzig (1927) . Pages 384-426 ; English translation in « Musical Form » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1961) . Pages 379-424.

(20) See Leopold Nowak, « Die Anton Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe : Ihre Geschichte und Schicksale » in « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1982-1983, Linz (1984) ; pages 33-67, and Benjamin Korstvedt, « ' Return to the Pure Sources ' : The Ideology and Text-Critical Legacy of the 1st Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » in « Bruckner Studies » , edited by Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw, Cambridge (1997) . Pages 91-109.

(21) Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 8. Band : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll (Originalfassung) , Studienpartitur » , edited by Haas, Leipzig (1939) . Haas generally toned down his comments in the 1949 reprint of the score, and entirely removed the allusion to the political significance of the Symphony.

(22) On the relationship of post-War and Nazi-era Bruckner reception, see Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « Anton Bruckner in the 3rd « Reich » and After : an Essay on Ideology and Bruckner Reception » , « The Musical Quarterly » , No. 80 (1996) . Pages 132-160.

(23) Theodor Adorno, « Alienated Masterpiece : the " Missa solemnis " » (1959) , translated by Duncan Smith, Telos No. 28 (1976) . Page 113.

The genesis and evolution of the 8th Symphony

(1) Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik des Schaffens von Anton Bruckner » , Göttingen (1978) , page 234.

(2) Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 72.

(3) Anton Bruckner, « Gesammelte Briefe, neue Folge » , edited by Max Auer, Regensburg (1924) , page 194 ; « Bruckner, Gesammelte Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräßlinger, Regensburg (1924) , page 192-194 ; Steffen Lieberwirth, « Anton Bruckner und Leipzig : Einige neue Erkenntnisse und Ergänzungen » , « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1989-1990, Linz

(1992) , pages 283-284.

(4) See the transcriptions in August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , 4 volumes in 9 part. Regensburg (1922-1937) ; IV/2, pages 543-546 and in Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik » , pages 342-343.

(5) A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 6070 ; see the fac-similé in Franz Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zum 150. Geburtstag (eine Ausstellung) » , Vienna (1974) . Page 3.

(6) See Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 102 and Franz Schalk, « Briefe und Betrachtungen » , edited by Lili Schalk, Vienna (1935) . Page 70.

(7) Very few sketches exist for any of Bruckner's works other than the 2 final Symphonies, for which they exist copiously. Many earlier compositional materials were destroyed by Bruckner, in 1895, as he prepared to move from his long-established apartment on the 4th floor of the « Wohnhaus » , on « Heßgasse 7 » , to his final residence, the « Kustodenstöckl » of « Schloß Belvedere » ; see August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 521.

(8) The sketches are preserved as A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 6052 ; see Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik » , page 339.

(9) On date of the relocation of the Adagio, see Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik » , page 234 and Franz Scheder, « Anton Bruckner Chronologie » , 2 volumes, Tutzing (1996) ; volume I, pages 511 and 514.

(10) Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner : Leben und Schaffen » (Umgearbeitete Bausteine) , Berlin (1927) . Page 334.

(11) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 537.

(12) Bruckner's original manuscript of the 1887 version is not preserved in its original state. The 1st 3 movements do remain in their original form in the « Musiksammlung of the Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » : the 2 opening movements are A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 6083 and 6084, respectively, and Bruckner's 1887 manuscript of the Adagio is now preserved as the 3rd volume of A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 19.840, which, otherwise, contains the 1890 version. Bruckner used his 1887 autograph of the Finale as the basis for his later revision of the movement (now preserved as volume IV of A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 19.840) , thereby obscuring much of the initial text. The 1887 version of this movement can only be recovered from Karl (Borromäus) Aigner's copy (A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 6001) . See Leopold Nowak's preface in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , Band VIII/1 : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll, Fassung von 1887 » , Vienna (1972) and Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » , « Musical Times » , No. 137 (1996) . Page 16.

(13) It is likely that Bruckner had more than 1 copy of the score made ; not only was this his usual practice, but although no other complete copy now exists, several fragments do.

(14) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 338.

(15) Ibid. , page 339.

(16) Max Auer wrote, for example, that the time Bruckner spent revising the 8th Symphony « was the real reason that work on the 9th Symphony was postponed » and was why that work « remained a torso » ; « Anton Bruckner : Sein Leben und Werk » , Vienna (1947) . Page 409.

(17) Letter of 30 November 1884 ; Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 338 and Frithjof Haas, « Zwischen Brahms und Wagner : der Dirigent Hermann Levi » , Zürich (1995) . Page 299.

(18) On these events in Munich, see Frithjof Haas, « Zwischen Brahms und Wagner : der Dirigent Hermann Levi » , Zürich (1995) . Pages 300-302.

(19) See August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/2, pages 486-490.

(20) On the events that led to the award see Brigitte Hamann, « Musikalisches aus dem Tagebuch der Prinzessin Amélie in Bayern » , in « Bruckner-Symposium » 1994 : « Bruckner-Freunde, Bruckner-Kenner » , Linz (1997) . Pages 21-23.

(21) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 333.

(22) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, pages 181-182.

(23) See Bruckner's letters to Hermann Levi dated 8 December 1884 and 3 January 1887 in Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , pages 326 and 335.

(24) Letter dated 30 September 1887 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 395 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/2, pages 560-561 ; Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , pages 130-131.

(25) The letter is in the « Bayerische Staatsbibliothek » , Leviana, Munich. Excerpts are included in Frithjof Haas, « Zwischen Brahms und Wagner : der Dirigent Hermann Levi » , Zürich (1995) . Pages 306 and 379.

(26) This translation is by Laurence Dreyfus, to whom I am indebted for generously sharing his discovery with me.

(27) « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 396 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/2, page 562 ; Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , page 131.

(28) Robert Haas, « Vorlagenbericht » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke », 4. Band / I. Teil : « IV. Symphonie in Es-Dur (Fassung von 1878 mit dem Finale von 1880) , Finale von 1878, Partituren und Entwürfe mit Bericht » , Vienna (1936) , page 11.

(29) Letter of 20 October 1887 in Franz Gräßlinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 339 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/2, page 563. Bruckner mentioned his idea of organizing a reading of the Symphony, with Levi present, at his expense to Princess Amélie on 23 October ; see Brigitte Hamann, « Musikalisches aus dem Tagebuch » , page 25.

(30) Brigitte Hamann, « Musikalisches aus dem Tagebuch » , page 25.

(31) Bruckner noted the date 3 December 1887 in a score of the Finale (A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 6047) , although he seems not to have made any changes at this time ; see Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik » , page 235-236.

(32) « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 220.

(33) Franz Gräßlinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 341.

(34) Bruckner worked with a copy of the score prepared in 1887 by Leopold Hofmeyer. In the process of revisions, Bruckner replaced numerous pages with new ones written in his own hand. This manuscript entered the collection of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » only in 1990 (A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 4099) ; see Günter Brosche, « Quellen für künftige Forschungen » , « Studien zur Musikwissenschaft » (1993) , pages 425-426. Dermot Gault reports that an intermediate version of the Adagio is preserved in yet another copyist's score (A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 34.614) ; see « For Later Times » , page 16.

(35) A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 19.480, volume IV.

(36) A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 19.480, volume II.

(37) A-Wn Musik Handschriftlichen 19.480, volume I.

(38) Bruckner's prayer list of 15 March 1890 : « 14.3.90 letzte auswendige Wiederholung von I. Satze der 8. Sinfonie » ; see August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 124 and Leopold Nowak, « Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung » in « Über Anton Bruckner » , Vienna (1985) , page 27.

(39) The copying was done in the winter of 1889-1890 by Leopold Hofmeyer and Viktor Christ. See Erich Partsch, « Bruckner-Pflege in Steyr bis zur Jahrhundertwende » , « Mitteilungsblatt der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft » No. 5-6 (1990) , page 35 and Andrea Harrandt, « Unbekannte Bruckner-Autographe entdeckt » , « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift » No. 49 (1994) , page 32.

(40) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 338.

(41) March 1890 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 229 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 46 ; Manfred Wagner, « Anton Bruckner » , Mainz (1983) , page 291.

(42) Max von Oberleithner, « Meine Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » , Regensburg (1933) , page 52 and Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 342.

(43) Franz Schalk, « Briefe und Betrachtungen » , page 52.

(44) See Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « The 1st Edition of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony : Authorship, Production, and Reception » , Ph.D. dissertation, University of Pennsylvania (1995) , pages 315-316.

(45) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, pages 48-49.

(46) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 342.

(47) See his letter of 27 March 1891 to Felix Weingartner in « Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräflinger, pages 131-132 and « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 241 (dated incorrectly as 17 March 1891) . On 15 June 1891, Siegfried Ochs wrote to Bruckner that the Berlin firm « Raabe und Plotow » was willing to publish the 8th Symphony, including piano scores, for a fee of 1,200 Florins ; see « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 341 and August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 162. By this time, Bruckner had already reached an agreement with « Haslinger » , and wrote to Ochs that he would keep « Raabe » in reserve ; see letter dated 15 June 1891 in « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, pages 249-250 ; « Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräflinger, pages 94-95 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, pages 163-164.

(48) Max von Oberleithner, « Erinnerungen » , pages 52-53.

(49) Ibid. , page 53.

(50) When he was preparing to perform the 7th Symphony in Leipzig, in 1884, Arthur Nikisch, for example, avoided presenting the work as part of the « Gewandhaus » subscription concerts so as to minimize the antagonism of Leipzig's traditionalists ; instead, it was given as part of the « Opern-Abonnement » at the « Neues Theater » . See Steffen Lieberwirth, « Anton Bruckner und Leipzig : Die Jahre 1884-1902 » , « Anton Bruckner Dokumente und Studien » No. 6, Graz (1988) . Pages 18-26, 42.

(51) Letter of 7 October 1887 ; see note 27 above.

(52) « Bayerische Staatsbibliothek » , Leviana, Munich ; courtesy of Laurence Dreyfus.

- (53) 20 September 1890 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, pages 320-321.
- (54) 2 October 1890 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 233.
- (55) « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, pages 368-369.
- (56) Ibid. , pages 369-370.
- (57) 8 April 1891 ; « Bayerische Staatsbibliothek » , Leviana, Munich ; courtesy of Laurence Dreyfus.
- (58) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , pages 347-348 ; August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 143.
- (59) « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, pages 369-370.
- (60) Ibid. , page 233 ; « Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräflinger, page 129.
- (61) Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » , page 18.
- (62) « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 237.
- (63) Ibid. , 241 (dated 17 March) ; « Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräflinger, pages 131-132.
- (64) See for example Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 2. Band : « II. Symphonie in C-Moll, Studienpartitur » , Vienna (1938) .
- (65) See August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 73. Bruckner always used copy scores, not his precious autograph manuscripts (which would, in any case, have been very difficult to read on the podium) , for performances.
- (66) Franz Gräflinger, « Anton Bruckner » , page 352.
- (67) Ibid. , page 353.
- (68) Bruckner reported Hermann Levi's plans in a letter to Felix Weingartner, dated 8 August 1891 (see « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 250 ; « Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräflinger, pages 132-133) ; and a letter to Ludwig Koch von Langetreu, dated 27 July 1892 (« Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, pages 259-260 ; « Briefe » , edited by Gräflinger, pages 33-34) .

(69) Franz Scheder, « Bruckner Chronologie », volume I, page 685.

(70) « Briefe », edited by Max Auer, page 326.

(71) Quoted in Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner », page 166.

The musical design and symphonic agenda of the 8th

(1) On Symphonic monumentality see : Norbert Nægler, « Bruckners gründerzeitliche Monumentalsymphonie », « Musik-Konzepte Nummer 23-24 : Anton Bruckner », Munich (1982), pages 86-118 - especially, pages 109-113 ; and Margaret Notley, « Volksconcerte in Vienna and Late 19th Century Ideology of the Symphony », « Journal of the American Musicological Society » No. 50 (1997), pages 432-439.

(2) Letter to Max Marschalk, 26 March 1896, quoted and translated in Peter Franklin, « Mahler : Symphony No. 3 », Cambridge (1991), page 15.

(3) Norbert Nægler, « Bruckners gründerzeitliche Monumentalsymphonie », page 112.

(4) Ernst Bloch, « Essays in the Philosophy of Music », translated by Peter Palmer, Cambridge (1985), pages 42-43. Also see : Carl Dahlhaus, « The Idea of Absolute Music », translated by Roger Lustig, Chicago (1989), pages 122-123.

(5) See Carl Dahlhaus, « Wagner's Musical Influence » in « The Wagner Handbook », edited by Ulrich Müller and Peter Wapnewski, translated by edited by John Deathridge, Cambridge, Massachusetts, (1992), page 553.

(6) See Carl Dahlhaus's important discussion of the relationship of harmonic style and formal design during the period in « Issues in Composition » in « Between Romanticism and Modernism », translated by Mary Whittall, Berkeley and Los Angeles (1980), pages 40-78.

(7) Arnold Schœnberg, « Structural Functions of Harmony », revised edition, New York (1969), page 3.

(8) Ibid., pages 3 and 164-165.

(9) Werner Korte, « Bruckner und Brahms : Die spätrömantische Lösung der autonomen Konzeption », Tutzing (1963), page 25.

(10) Carl Dahlhaus, « Bruckner und die Programmmusik : zum Finale der Achten Symphonie » in « Anton Bruckner : Studien zu Werk und Wirkung, Walter Wiora zum 30. Dezember 1986 », Tutzing (1988), page 23. Also see Dahlhaus, « 19th Century Music », translated by J. Bradford Robinson, Berkeley and Los Angeles (1989), pages 272-274.

(11) See Werner Korte, « Bruckner und Brahms », especially pages 24-29, 34-38, 44-57 ; Paul Dawson-Bowling, «

Thematic and Tonal Unity in Bruckner's 8th Symphony » , « Music Review » No. 30 (1969) , pages 225-236, and Erwin Horn, « Evolution und Metamorphose in der Achten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner : Darstellung der thematischen Zusammenhänge » , « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1989-1990, Linz (1992) , pages 7-34.

(12) « Über die Anwendung der Musik auf das Drama » (1879) , quoted and translated in Carl Dahlhaus, « The Music » in « The Wagner Handbook » , page 304.

(13) Critics and analysts have not agreed on where the recapitulation begins. Some writers have placed it at measure 225 ; see Robert Simpson, « The Essence of Bruckner » , revised edition, London (1992) , pages 194-195 ; Erwin Doernberg, « The Life and Symphonies of Anton Bruckner » , London (1960) , page 197. A larger group have located it at measure 283 ; see Alfred Orel, « Anton Bruckner : Das Werk, der Künstler, die Zeit » , Vienna (1925) , page 85 ; Robert Haas, « Anton Bruckner » , Potsdam (1934) , page 147 ; Hugo Leichtentritt, « Musical Form » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1961) , page 386 ; Constantin Floros, « Die Fassungen der Achten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Die Fassungen » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Linz (1981) , pages 55-56 ; and Willibald Kähler, « Sinfonie No. VIII (in C-Moll) » in « Bruckner's Symphonien, Meisterführer Nummer 4 » , edited by Karl Grunsky, Berlin and Vienna n. d. (1907) , pages 157-158. As ever, Ernst Kurth refused to cut and dry things, « Bruckner » , Berlin (1925) , pages 1044-1047.

(14) Friedrich Eckstein, « Alte unnennbare Tage ! » , Vienna (1936) , page 145.

(15) Reinhold Brinkmann, « Late Idyll : The 2nd Symphony of Johannes Brahms » , translated by Peter Palmer, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1995) , page 144.

(16) The one important exception is the 2nd movement of the 4th Symphony, which is marked « Andante quasi Allegretto » .

(17) Bruckner began sketching the Adagio very shortly after he attended a performance of « Tristan » in Leipzig, on 27 December 1884 (the earliest extant sketches of the Adagio are from the following month) . Bruckner also apparently returned to the score of this movement after he heard « Tristan » in Bayreuth, in late July 1886 ; see Franz Scheder, « Anton Bruckner Chronologie » , 2 volumes, Tutzing (1996) , volume I, pages 510-511.

(18) August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild, 4 volumes in 9 parts, Regensburg (1936) , IV/3, page 19.

(19) This tune is strongly prefigured in Bruckner's « Fantasie » for piano of 1868 (WAB 118) , measures 13-16. (I thank William Carragan for pointing this out to me.)

(20) See Ernst Kurth, « Bruckner » , pages 1066-1068.

(21) On the « Finale Problem » , see Paul Bekker, « Gustav Mahlers Sinfonien » , Berlin (1921) , pages 15-20 ; and Reinhold Brinkmann, « Late Idyll » , pages 203-217.

(22) See Bruckner's letter to Franz Schalk, 16 August 1885 ; quoted in Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 102.

(23) See Ernst Kurth, « Bruckner » , page 1087.

(24) For competing views on the nature and significance of this passage see Constantin Floros, « Brahms und Bruckner » , « Studien zur Musikalischen Exegetik » , Wiesbaden (1980) , pages 204-205, who emphasized its meaningful strangeness ; and Carl Dahlhaus, « Bruckner und die Programmmusik » , pages 23-24, who emphasized its explicability.

(25) Robert Simpson, « The Essence of Bruckner » , page 209.

(26) Derek Scott, « Bruckner and the Dialectic of Darkness and Light (II) » , « The Bruckner Journal » 2/2 (1998) , page 13.

(27) Robert Simpson, « The Essence of Bruckner » , page 232.

(28) Derek Scott, « Bruckner and the Dialectic of Darkness and Light (II) » , « The Bruckner Journal » 2/2 (1998) , page 12.

(29) The full text of the program is in August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, pages 288-290 and Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , pages 170-172.

(30) Franz Schalk's program contains 2 internal quotations. One is from « Aeschylus, Prometheus Bound » , lines 1041-1052. The other is the opening lines, spoken by the Archangel Raphael, of the « Prologue in Heaven » , in Gøethe's « Faust » , lines 243-246.

(31) See Eduard Hanslick's review in the « Neue Freie Presse » , 23 December 1892 ; repeated in Eduard Hanslick, « Fünf Jahre Musik » , Berlin (1899) , pages 190-191 ; English translation in « Eduard Hanslick, Music Criticisms 1846-1899 » , translated by Henry Pleasants, Baltimore (1950) , pages 288-289 and Max Kalbeck's in the « Montags-Revue » , 19 December 1892; reprinted in August Göllerich and Max Auer, Anton Bruckner, IV/3, 297–300. Even the favourable review of the Symphony in « Das Vaterland » , 21 December 1892, commented negatively on Schalk's program ; reprinted in Franz Grasberger, « Das Bruckner-Bild der Zeitung " Das Vaterland " in den Jahren 1870-1900 » in « Festschrift Hans Schneider zum 60. Geburtstag » , edited by Rudolf Elvers and Ernst Vogel, Munich (1981) , page 129. Carl Hrubý's comments can be found in « Bruckner Remembered » , edited and translated by Stephen Johnson, London (1998) , page 120.

(32) See Willibald Kähler, « Symphonie No. VIII » , pages 152-169 and Karl Grunsky, « Anton Bruckner » , Stuttgart (1922) , page 87.

(33) Carl Dahlhaus, « The Idea of Absolute Music » , page 135.

(34) Quoted in Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , page 237.

(35) Letter of 27 January 1891, « Anton Bruckner, Gesammelte Briefe, neue Folge » , edited by Max Auer, Regensburg (1924) , pages 369-370 ; also see Constantin Floros, « Brahms und Bruckner » , page 183.

(36) Constantin Floros has argued that, in this phrase, Bruckner's hand-writing is traditionally misread, and that the line actually reads : « Finally, it (i.e. , Michaël's tune) is plaintively inverted. » - « Endlich klagend kehrt es (not : er) selbes um. » . Floros suggests it is a direct reference to measures 95-98 of the Scherzo in which the main-theme is inverted ; see « Brahms und Bruckner » , pages 191 and 215.

(37) In the 1980's, the program provoked 2 significant, contrasting interpretations : Floros' « Brahms und Bruckner » , especially pages 182-210, which entertains Bruckner's program seriously ; and Carl Dahlhaus' in « Bruckner und die Programmusik » , which is rather less credulous.

(38) On 14 January 1891, Hugo Wolf wrote :

« (Between us,) Bruckner is enraged over the endless delay of his 8th, and, recently, I had great difficulty convincing him of Weingartner's sincerity and honest enthusiasm for his Symphonies. He no longer believes in the performance in Mannheim. » ; quoted in Günter Brosche, « Anton Bruckner and Hugo Wolf » in « Bruckner Studien » , edited by Othmar Wessely, Vienna (1975) , page 181.

(39) See Ernst Kurth, « Bruckner » , page 1048-1049, note 1 ; and Hans Redlich, « Das programmatische Element bei Bruckner » in « Bruckner-Studien » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Vienna (1964) , pages 92-93.

(40) See August Stradal, « Eine Erinnerung an Anton Bruckner » , « Zeitschrift für Music » , No. 93 (1926) , pages 505-506 and « Erinnerungen aus Bruckners letzter Zeit » , « Zeitschrift für Music » , No. 99 (1932) , page 977 ; as well, the comments recorded in August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, pages 15-23. Bruckner explained to Theodor Helm that, with his « Michel » theme, he meant to depict « the German Austrians, not to jest » ; quoted in ibid. , IV/3, page 16, note 1.

(41) Quoted in August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 15. Bruckner used similar imagery in explaining this passage on other occasions, too ; see Ernst Decsey, « Anton Bruckner » , Berlin (1921) , page 216 and Friedrich Eckstein, « Alte unnennbare Tage » , page 145.

(42) Werner Korte, « Bruckner und Brahms » , page 69.

(43) Bruckner himself pointed-out this evocation of « Siegfried » , which he said was « in remembrance of the Master

» ; quoted in August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner » , IV/3, page 19.

(44) The significance of the 1st 2 of these examples is discussed in Constantin Floros, « Brahms und Bruckner » , pages 182-210, especially 186 and 204-206 ; and Carl Dahlhaus, « Bruckner und die Programmmusik » , especially 12-13 and 22-26.

The Adagio and the sublime

(1) Quoted in Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 171.

(2) Willibald Kähler, « Sinfonie No. VIII (in C-Moll) » , in « Bruckner's Sinfonien, Meisterführer Nummer 4 » , edited by Karl Grunsky, Berlin and Vienna, n. d. (1907) , page 165.

(3) Gabriel Engel, « The Symphonies of Anton Bruckner » , Iowa City (1955) , page 70.

(4) Edward Rothstein, « Contemplating the Sublime » , « American Scholar » No. 66 (1997) , page 513.

(5) Quoted in Carl Dahlhaus, « The Idea of Absolute Music » , translated by Roger Lustig, Chicago (1989) , page 59.

(6) Richard Wagner's « Prose Works » , translated by William Ashton Ellis, London (1896) , volume V, page 93.

(7) Reinhold Brinkmann, « Late Idyll : The 2nd Symphony of Johannes Brahms » , translated by Peter Palmer, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1995) , page 202.

(8) See, for example, Karl Grunsky's comments on the « truth » and « depth » that reside in the interior spaces of Bruckner's Adagios in « Anton Bruckner » , Stuttgart (1922) , pages 21-23.

(9) Longinus, « On the Sublime » , translated with commentary by James A. Arieti and John M. Crosssett, New York (1985) .

(10) Ibid. , section 8.1, page 46.

(11) Ibid. , section 9.2, pages 52-53. Also see : Neil Hertz, « A Reading of Longinus » in « The End of the Line : Essays on Psychoanalysis and the Sublime » , New York (1985) , pages 1-20.

(12) Longinus, « On the Sublime » , section 7.2, page 42.

(13) « On the Sublime » was rediscovered only in the 16th Century, and its 1st important modern translation, by Boileau into French, appeared in 1674.

- (14) Robert Simpson, « Commentary : Updating the Sublime » , « Studies in Romanticism » No. 26 (1987) , page 245.
- (15) James Webster made a similar point in « The Creation, Haydn's Late Vocal Works, and the Musical Sublime » in « Haydn and his World » , edited by Elaine Sisman, Princeton (1997) , pages 60-61.
- (16) Elaine Sisman nicely explicated the rhetorical design of the Finale of Mozart's « Jupiter » Symphony, notably its use of the learned style as a « signifier of the sublime » in « Mozart : The Jupiter Symphony » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1993) , pages 68-79, especially page 76.
- (17) On this renewed influence see, for example, « Longinus, Hazlitt, Keats, and the Criterion of Intensity » in Meyer (Mike) Howard Abrams, « The Mirror and the Lamp : Romantic Theory and the Critical Tradition » , New York (1953) , pages 132-138.
- (18) Edmund Burke, « A Philosophical Enquiry into the Origin of our Ideas of the Sublime and The Beautiful » , edited by James T. Boulton, Notre-Dame (1968) .
- (19) Ibid. , part III, section I, page 91.
- (20) Ibid. , part I, section 7, page 39.
- (21) The term « apprehensive synthesis » is Jean-François Lyotard's ; see « Lessons on the Analytic of the Sublime » , translated by Elizabeth Rottenberg, Stanford (1994) , page 81.
- (22) Immanuel Kant, « Critique of Judgment » , translated by John Henry Bernhard, New York (1951) , § 26, page 94.
- (23) Monroe Beardsley, « Aesthetics from Classical Greece to the Present : A Short History » , New York (1966) ; reprinted, Tuscaloosa, Alabama (1975) , page 219.
- (24) Thomas Weiskel, « The Romantic Sublime : Studies in the Structure and Psychology of Transcendence » , Baltimore (1976) , page 94.
- (25) Ibid. , page 95.
- (26) Peter De Bolla, « The Discourse of the Sublime : Readings in History, Aesthetics and the Subject » , Oxford (1989) , page 44. De Bolla nicely distinguishes between the role of the subject in the 18th and 19th Century versions of the sublime, as exemplified by Joseph Addison and Samuel Taylor Coleridge, respectively ; see pages 44-48.
- (27) Richard Taruskin, « Resisting the 9th » in « Text and Act » , New York (1995) , page 247.
- (28) William Crotch, « Substance of Several Lectures on Music » , London (1831) ; excerpted in « Music and Aesthetics in the 18th and Early 19th Centuries » , edited by Peter Le Huray and James Day, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1981) , page 431.

(29) « Berlinische musikalische Zeitung » , Volume I, No. 46 ; excerpted and translated in « Music and Aesthetics » , edited by Peter Le Huray and James Day, pages 289-291.

(30) Edmund Burke, « A Philosophical Enquiry » , part II, section 5, page 64.

(31) Immanuel Kant, « Critique of Judgment » , § 26, pages 92 and 90.

(32) Franz Schalk, « Briefe und Betrachtungen » , edited by Lili Schalk, Vienna (1935) , page 81.

(33) Richard Cohn, « Maximally Smooth Cycles, Hexatonic Systems, and the Analysis of Late-Romantic Triadic Progressions » , « Music Analysis » No. 15 (1996) , pages 11.

(34) Review of a performance of the Adagio of the 7th Symphony on piano, by Josef Schalk at « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » , on 4 November 1884, « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » No. 80 (1884) , page 522 ; quoted in Othmar Wessely, « Bruckner Berichterstattung in der Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » in « Bruckner-Symposium : Bruckner Rezeption » , edited by Othmar Wessely, Linz (1991) , page 140.

(35) Robert Simpson mentioned the significance of the voicing of this chord in « The Essence of Bruckner », revised edition, London (1992) , page 199.

(36) Artur Schopenhauer, « The World as Will and Representation » , translated by E. F. J. Payne, 2 volumes, New York (1969) , § 39, Volume No. I, page 202.

(37) Immanuel Kant, « Critique of Judgment » , § 26, page 91.

(38) Raimonda Modiano, « Humanism and the Comic Sublime : From Kant to Friedrich Theodor Vischer » , « Studies in Romanticism » No. 26 (1987) , page 235.

(39) Review of Bruckner's 8th Symphony, in the « Neue Freie Presse » , 23 December 1892 ; reprinted in Eduard Hanslick, « Fünf Jahre Musik » , Berlin (1899) , pages 190-191 ; English translation in Eduard Hanslick, « Music Criticisms 1846-1899 » , translated by Henry Pleasants, Baltimore (1950) , pages 288-289, translation modified.

(40) On Viennese liberalism and music, see Leon Botstein, « Time and Memory : Concert Life, Science, and Music in Brahms' Vienna » in « Brahms and His World » , edited by Walter Frisch, Princeton (1990) , pages 3-22 ; and Margaret Notley, « Brahms as Liberal : Genre, Style, and Politics in Late-19th Century Vienna » , « 19th Century Music » No. 17 (1993) , pages 107-123.

(41) « Deutsche Zeitung », 5 November 1896 ; quoted in Margaret Notley, « Brahms as Liberal », page 109, translation modified.

(42) Felix Warteneck in « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » No. 87 (1891) , page 80 ; quoted in Othmar Wessely, « Bruckner Berichterstattung in der Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » , page 140.

(43) Eduard Hanslick, « On the Musically Beautiful » , translated by Geoffrey Payzant, Indianapolis (1986) , see especially page 28.

(44) See Max Weber, « The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism » , translated by Talcott Parsons, New York (1958) ; also see Herbert Marcuse's critical view in « Industrialization and Capitalism in the Work of Max Weber » in « Negations : Essays in Critical Theory » , Boston (1968) , pages 201-227.

(45) See Marie-Hélène Huet, « The Revolutionary Sublime » , « 18th Century Studies » No. 28 (1994) , pages 51-64.

(46) William R. Musgrave, « ' That Monstrous Fiction ' : Radical Agency and Aesthetic Ideology in Burke » , « Studies in Romanticism » No. 36 (1997) , page 10.

(47) « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » , quoted in Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Seine Leben und Schaffen » , Vienna (1947) , page 381.

(48) Max Graf, « The Legend of a Musical City » , New York (1945) , page 136. The 1887 version and the 1890 version « Studienpartitur » , edited by Robert Haas, Leipzig (1939) .

The motivation and meaning of Bruckner's revisions

(1) Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 8. Band : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll (Originalfassung) » .

(2) See Max Auer, « Die biographischen Tatsachen » in « Anton Bruckner : wissenschaftliche und künstlerische Betrachtungen zu den Originalfassungen » , Vienna (1937) , pages 10-11 ; and Robert Haas, « Vorlagenbericht » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 4. Band / I. Teil : « IV. Symphonie in Es-Dur (Fassung von 1878 mit dem Finale von 1880) , Finale von 1878, Partituren und Entwürfe mit Bericht » , edited by Robert Haas, Vienna (1936) .

(3) Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll » . Haas followed a rather similar editorial method in his edition of the 2nd Symphony.

(4) Deryck Cooke, « Anton Bruckner » in « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » , edited by Stanley Sadie, London (1980) , volume III, pages 361-362 ; reprinted in « The New Grove Late Romantic Masters » , New York and London (1985) , pages 34-36 ; also see his « The Bruckner Problem Simplified » in « Vindications : Essays on Romantic Music » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1982) , pages 65-69.

(5) As Bruckner's friend and student Friedrich Eckstein put it : « I can testify that it was impossible to coerce him in artistic matters. » ; quoted in « Leidenschaftliche Erörterungen um Bruckner » , « Anbruch » No. 18 (1936) , page 48. Similar sentiments were offered by Friedrich Klose, response to Alfred Orel's « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner » , « Deutsche Musikkultur » No. 1 (1936-1937) , page 223 ; and Josef von Wöb in comments quoted in Max Morold, « Noch einiges zur Bruckner-Frage » , « Zeitschrift für Musik » No. 103 (1936) , page 1188.

(6) Max Auer, « Der Streit um den ' echten ' Bruckner » , « Zeitschrift für Musik » No. 103 (1936) , page 542.

(7) Leopold Nowak, « Vorwort » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 8. Band : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll, Fassung von 1890 » , « 2. Revidierte Ausgabe » , Vienna (1955) .

(8) Quoted in Constantin Floros, « Die Fassungen der Achten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Die Fassungen » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Linz (1981) , page 53.

(9) Letter of 7 October 1887 ; see page 18.

(10) On the use of Wagner tubas in Symphonic music, see Stephen Parkany, « Kurth's Bruckner and the Adagio of Bruckner's 7th Symphony » , « 19th Century Music » No. 11 (1988) , page 269.

(11) Bryan Gilliam points-out several other subtle motivic links in « The 2 Versions of Bruckner's 8th Symphony » , « 19th Century Music » No. 16 (1992) , page 62, note 13.

(12) Ernst Kurth, « Bruckner » , Berlin (1925) , page 1077.

(13) Bruckner did replace a few pages of the score, but the majority of the cuts were effected by simple crossing-out ; see Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » , « Musical Times » , page 137 (1996) , page 17.

(14) Letter dated 8 April 1891, now in the « Bayerische Staatsbibliothek » Leiana, Munich. I am grateful to Laurence Dreyfus for sharing this letter with me.

(15) See « Bruckner, Vorlesungen über Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt an der Universität Wien » , edited by Ernst Schwanzara, Vienna (1950) , pages 201-202.

(16) See Manfred Wagner, « Bruckner : Leben, Werke, Dokumente » , Mainz (1983) , pages 394-396 ; and « Der Wandel des Konzepts : zu den verschiedenen Fassungen von Bruckners Dritter, Vierter und Achter Sinfonie » , Vienna (1980) .

(17) See Bryan Gilliam, « The 2 Versions of Bruckner's 8th Symphony » , pages 62-64, 69.

(18) Ibid. , page 63.

The 1892 edition, authorship, and performance practice

(1) See Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « The 1st Printed Edition of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony : Collaboration and Authenticity » , « 19th Century Music » No. 20 (1996) , pages 3-26 ; and William Carragan, « Introduction » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 2. Band : « II. Symphonie in C-Moll, Fassung 1887-1892, Studienpartitur » , Vienna.

(2) Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « ' Return to the Pure Sources ' : The Ideology and Text-Critical Legacy of the 1st Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » in « Bruckner Studies » , edited by Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1997) , pages 91-109.

(3) Garry Wills, « John Wayne's America : The Politics of Celebrity » , New York (1997) , page 26.

(4) Only the Scherzo (copied by Leopold Hofmeyer) is currently preserved, in the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna (A-Wgm XIII 32.394W) . In 1994, another late manuscript copy (not an autograph) of the score appeared on the market, and was purchased by a private collector ; see Andrea Harrant, « Unbekannte Bruckner-Autographe entdeckt » , « Österreichische Musikzeitschrift » No. 49 (1994) , page 32.

(5) See Max von Oberleithner, « Meine Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » , Regensburg (1933) , pages 52-53 ; and Leopold Nowak, « Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung » in « Über Anton Bruckner » , Vienna (1985) , page 28.

(6) See Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 8. Band : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll (Originalfassung) , Studienpartitur » , edited by Haas, Leipzig (1939) .

(7) Franz Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zwischen Wagnis und Sicherheit (eine Ausstellung) » , Linz (1977) , page 56 ; and Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 276.

(8) Franz Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zwischen Wagnis und Sicherheit (eine Ausstellung) » , Linz (1977) , page 56 ; Leopold Nowak, « Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie » , page 28 ; and Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) , page 276. Emphasis in the original.

(9) See for example Paul Hawkshaw, « The Bruckner Problem Revisited » , « 19th Century Music » No. 21 (1997) , pages 100-101, where the source of this quotation is mistakenly given as the letter of 31 July 1891.

(10) Although the hand-writing is not entirely clear, Schalk almost certainly wrote « gestrichenen » , as can be confirmed from the fac-similé in Franz Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zum 150. Geburtstag (eine Ausstellung) » , Vienna (1974) , page 33. Note that, in 1977, in « Anton Bruckner zwischen Wagnis und Sicherheit » , Grasberger did transcribe this word as « gestrichenen » .

(11) These portions of the letters have been published only in Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zwischen Wagnis und Sicherheit » , page 56. All subsequent quotations are from this source.

(12) See Ernst Kurth, « Anton Bruckner » , Berlin (1925) , page 1331.

(13) Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » , « Musical Times » No. 137 (1996) , page 18. Gault states that the cut covers bars 325-386, but this is undoubtedly a misprint for 345-386.

(14) Paul Hawkshaw, « The Bruckner Problem Revisited » , page 104 ; where Hawkshaw does make this claim about the 8th Symphony.

(15) See Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « The 1st Printed Edition of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony » and Thomas Röder, « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 3. Band : « III. Symphonie in D-Moll, Revisionsbericht » , Vienna (1997) , especially pages 241-246 and 331-341.

(16) See Lili Schalk, « Gespräche über Bruckner mit Franz » , unpublished typescript and Josef von Wöb, unpublished letter to Wilhelm Fürtwängler dated 23 April 1936 (both, Wn F 18 Schalk 360/4/3—4) . Wöb was proof-reader, and, eventually, director of « Waldheim-Eberle » , the firm that engraved all of Bruckner's editions, including the 8th Symphony, published after 1890.

(17) Manfred Wagner, « Bruckners Sinfonie-Fassungen - grundsätzlich referiert » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Die Fassungen » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Linz (1981) , page 18.

(18) Letter to Arthur Nikisch, 5 November 1884, « Anton Bruckner, Gesammelte Briefe, neue Folge » , edited by Max Auer, Regensburg (1924) , page 170.

(19) Letter to Felix Weingartner, 27 January 1891 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 237.

(20) See Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « The 1st Printed Edition of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony » , pages 13-16.

(21) Erich Leinsdorf, « The Composer's Advocate : a Radical Orthodoxy for Musicians » , New Haven (1981) , page 198.

(22) Letter of 20 March 1891 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, 368.

(23) Letter of 27 March 1891 ; « Briefe » , edited by Max Auer, page 241.

(24) The dynamic character of a few passages is altered more fundamentally, notably the addition of a diminuendo to the pealing horns and trumpets in measures 386-389 of the 1st movement and the lowering of measures 301-308 of the Finale from fortissimo to something like mezzo-forte. Also, a few big tuttis that are presented as a steady fortissimo in the 1890 version are made to build gradually to this peak of loudness in the 1892 edition ; e.g. , measures 183-211 and measures 679-686 of the Finale.

(25) Comment dated 20 October 1924 in Franz Schalk, « Gespräche über Bruckner mit Franz » .

(26) Eugen Jochum, « The Interpretation of Bruckner's Symphonies » , essay accompanying the DGG box-set « Bruckner : 9 Symphonies » , conducted by Eugen Jochum (DGG 429 079-2) .

(27) For some reason, conductors almost never follow the metronome markings in this movement. As a rule, the opening tempo is taken more quickly than indicated and the 2nd, significantly more slowly ; yet, this is probably exactly what Bruckner's metronome markings were designed to avoid !

(28) Constantin Floros, « Historische Phasen der Bruckner-Interpretation » in « Bruckner-Symposium : Bruckner-Interpretation » , edited by Frans Grasberger, Linz (1982) , page 99. For another important discussion of tempo schemes, see William Carragan, « Reconstructing Bruckner's Tempos » , « American Record Guide » , November / December 1996, pages 73-75 and 177.

(29) John Alan Phillips, « Flexibility of Tempo » in « Early Recordings and Musical Style : Changing Tastes in Instrumental Performance, 1900-1950 » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1992) , pages 7-36, also 38-41.

(30) Manfred Wagner, « Über das Dirigieren » , translated by Eduard Dannreuther as « On Conducting » , London (1887) ; reprinted New York (1989) , pages 92-93, also 43 and 67.

(31) Franz Schalk, « Briefe und Betrachtungen » , edited by Lili Schalk, Vienna (1935) , pages 83-84.

(32) Discographic details for Table 6.3 : Bruno Walter, New York Philharmonic, concert performance, 26 January 1941 (« Historical Performers » 23) ; Herbert von Karajan, « Preussische Staatskapelle » , radio broadcast, September 1944 (« Koch / Schwann » 314482) ; Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Vienna Philharmonic, concert performance, 17 October 1944 (« Unicorn » 109-10) ; Fürtwängler, Berlin Philharmonic, concert performance, 14 March 1949 (« EMI » 5 66210 2) ; Eugen Jochum, Hamburg State Philharmonic, 1949 (« DG » 449 758-2) ; Hans Knappertsbusch, Berlin Philharmonic, concert performance, 7-8 January 1951 (« Music & Arts » 856) ; Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Vienna Philharmonic, concert performance, 10 April 1954 (« Fonit Cetra » FE 17) ; Carl Schuricht, Vienna Philharmonic, 1964 (« EMI » CZ57 67279-2) ; Eugen Jochum, Berlin Philharmonic, 1964 (« DG » 429 079-2) ; Karl Böhm, Vienna Philharmonic, 1977 (« DG » 2709 068) ; Kurt Masur, Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, June 1978 (« Eurodisc » 300 639-440) ; Barenboim, Chicago Symphony Orchestra, 1981 (« DG » 2740 253) ; Carlo Maria Giulini, Vienna Philharmonic, 1984 (« DG » 415 124-1) ; Herbert von Karajan, Vienna Philharmonic, 1988 (« DG » 427 611-2) ; Lorin Maazel, Berlin Philharmonic, 1990 (« EMI » 69796-2) ; Kurt Eichhorn, Bruckner Orchestra Linz, July 1991 (« Camerata » 225) ; Jesús Lopez Cobos, Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, 14-15 March 1993 (« Telarc » 80343) ; Günter Wand, North German Radio Symphony Orchestra, 5-7 December 1993, concert performance (« RCA » 68047-2) ; Christoph von Dohnányi, Cleveland Orchestra,

6-7 February 1994 (« London » 443 753-2) .

(33) On this issue, see Richard Taruskin's thought-provoking meditations in « On Letting the Music Speak for Itself » and « The Pastness of the Present and the Presence of the Past » in « Text and Act » , Oxford (1995) , pages 51-66, especially pages 53-56, and 90-155, especially pages 90-102.

(34) Wilhelm Fürtwängler, « Anton Bruckner :Vortrag gehalten anlässlich des I. Großdeutschen Brucknerfestes in Wien (1939) » quoted in Keith Cunliffe, « Fürtwängler and Bruckner » , Newsletter of the « Wilhelm Fürtwängler Society » (United Kingdom) , No. 95, April and June (1989) , n. p.

(35) Robert Simpson, « The Essence of Bruckner » , revised edition, London (1992) , page 231.

Appendix A

(1) Robert Haas, « Einführung » in « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » , 8. Band : « VIII. Symphonie in C-Moll (Originalfassung) , Studienpartitur » , edited by Haas, Leipzig (1939) .

(2) See Leopold Nowak, « Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung, in « Über Anton Bruckner » , Vienna (1985) , page 28.

(3) It is interesting to note that Robert Haas did not re-introduce all of the material Bruckner crossed-out in his revised score ; see Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » , « Musical Times » No. 137 (1996) , page 17.

(4) Quoted in Morten Solvik, « The International Bruckner Society and the N.S.D.A.P. : A Case Study of Robert Haas and the Critical Edition » , « The Musical Quarterly » No. 83 (1998) , page 367. On the ideology of Haas's Bruckner editions, also see Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « ' Return to the Pure Sources ' : The Ideology and Text-Critical Legacy of the 1st Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » in « Bruckner Studies » , edited by Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1997) , pages 91-109. On Haas's early membership in the Nazi Party and its political advantage after the « Anschluß » , see Pamela Maxine Potter, « Most German of the Arts : Musicology and Society from the Weimar Republic to the End of Hitler's " Reich " » , New Haven (1998) , pages 115-117.

(5) In the United States, a photo-reprint of Robert Haas's edition is available from Kalmus (number : K 00382) .

Appendix B

Deryck Cooke, « Anton Bruckner » in « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » , edited by Stanley Sadie, London (1980) , volume III, page 362 ; reprinted in « The New Grove Late-Romantic Masters » , New York and London (1985) , page 36.

« Anton Bruchner : Ein Handbuch » , edited by Uwe Harten, Salzburg and Vienna (1996) .

Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Sein Leben und Werk » , Vienna (1947) .

William Benjamin, « Tonal Dualism in Bruckner's 8th Symphony » in « The 2nd Practice of 19th Century Tonality » , edited by William Kinderman and Harald Krebs, Lincoln, Nebraska (1996) , pages 237-258.

Ernst Bloch, « Essays in the Philosophy of Music » , translated by Peter Palmer, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1985) .

Leon Botstein, « Time and Memory : Concert Life, Science, and Music in Brahms's Vienna » in « Brahms and His World » , edited by Walter Frisch, Princeton (1990) , pages 3-22.

Reinhold Brinkmann, « Late Idyll : The 2nd Symphony of Johannes Brahms » , translated by Peter Palmer, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1995) .

« Anton Bruckner, Gesammelte Briefe » , edited by Franz Gräßlinger, Regensburg (1924) .

« Gesammelte Briefe, neue Folge » , edited by Max Auer, Regensburg (1924) .

William Carragan, « Reconstructing Bruckner's Tempos » , « American Record Guide » , November / December 1996, pages 73-75 and 177.

Deryck Cooke, « Anton Bruckner » in « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » , edited by Stanley Sadie, London (1980) , volume III, pages 352-371 ; reprinted in « The New Grove Late-Romantic Masters » , London (1985) , pages 1-73.

« The Bruckner Problem Simplified » in « Vindications : Essays on Romantic Music » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1982) , pages 43-71.

Carl Dahlhaus, « Issues in Composition » in « Between Romanticism and Modernism » , translated by Mary Whittall, Berkeley and Los Angeles (1980) , pages 40-78.

« Bruckner und die Programmmusik : zum Finale der Achten Symphonie » in « Anton Bruckner : Studien zu Werk und Wirkung, Walter Wiora zum 30. Dezember 1986 » , Tutzing (1988) , pages 7-32.

« The Idea of Absolute Music » , translated by Roger Lustig, Chicago (1989) .

Paul Dawson-Bowling, « Thematic and Tonal Unity in Bruckner's 8th Symphony » , « Music Review » No. 30 (1969) , pages 225-236.

Erwin Doernberg, « The Life and Symphonies of Anton Bruckner » , London (1960) .

Constantin Floros, « Brahms und Bruckner : Studien zur Musikalischen Exegetik » , Wiesbaden (1980) .

« Die Fassungen der Achten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Die Fassungen » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Linz (1981) , pages 53-63.

« Historische Phasen der Bruckner-Interpretation » in « Bruckner-Symposion : Bruckner-Interpretation » , edited by Franz Grasberger, Linz (1982) , pages 93-102.

Dermot Gault, « For Later Times » in « Musical Times » No. 137 (1996) , pages 12-19.

Bryan Gilliam, « The 2 Versions of Bruckner's 8th Symphony » in « 19th Century Music » No. 16 (1992) , pages 59-69.

August Göllerich and Max Auer, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Lebens- und Schaffensbild » , 4 volumes in 9 parts, Regensburg (1922-1937) .

Franz Gräßlinger, « Anton Bruckner : Leben und Schaffen (Umgearbeitete Bausteine) » , Berlin (1927) .

Franz Grasberger, « Anton Bruckner zum 150. Geburtstag (eine Ausstellung) » , Vienna (1974) .

« Anton Bruckner zwischen Wagnis und Sicherheit (eine Ausstellung) » , Linz (1977) .

« Das Bruckner-Bild der Zeitung ' Das Vaterland ' in den Jahren 1870-1900 » in « Festschrift Hans Schneider zum 60. Geburtstag » , edited by Rudolf Elvers and Ernst Vogel, Munich (1981) , pages 113-132.

Karl Grunsky, « Anton Bruckner » , Stuttgart (1922) .

Frithjof Haas, « Zwischen Brahms und Wagner : Der Dirigent Hermann Levi » , Zürich (1995) .

Robert Haas « Anton Bruckner » , Potsdam (1934) .

Eduard Hanslick, « Music Criticisms 1846-1899 » , translated by Henry Pleasants, Baltimore (1950) .

Eduard Hanslick, « On the Musically Beautiful » , translated by Geoffrey Payzant, Indianapolis (1986) .

Erwin Horn, « Evolution und Metamorphose in der Achten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner : Darstellung der thematischen Zusammenhänge » , « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1989-1990, Linz (1992) , pages 7-34.

« Bruckner Remembered » , London (1998) edited by Stephen Johnson.

Willibald Kähler, « Sinfonie No. VIII (in C-Moll) » in « Bruckner's Symphonien, Meisterführer Nummer 4 » , edited by Karl Grunsky, Berlin and Vienna, n. d. (1907) , pages 152-169.

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « Anton Bruckner in the 3rd « Reich » and After : An Essay on Ideology and Bruckner Reception » , « The Musical Quarterly » No. 80 (1996) , pages 132-160.

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, « ' Return to the Pure Sources ' : The Ideology and Text-Critical Legacy of the 1st Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » in « Bruckner Studies » , edited by Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw, Cambridge, Massachusetts (1997) , pages 91-109.

Werner Korte, « Bruckner und Brahms : die spätromantische Lösung der autonomen Konzeption » , Tutzing (1963) .

Select bibliography :

Ernst Kurth, « Anton Bruckner » , Berlin (1925) .

Thomas Leibnitz, « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Tutzing (1988) .

Hugo Leichtentritt, « Anton Bruckner : The 8th Symphony » in « Musical Form » , Cambridge, Massachusetts (1961) , pages 379-424.

Norbert Nögler, « Bruckners gründerzeitliche Monumentalsymphonie » , « Musik-Konzepte 23 / 24 : Anton Bruckner » , Munich (1982) , pages 86-118.

Margaret Notley, « Brahms as Liberal : Genre, Style, and Politics in Late 19th Century Vienna » , « 19th-Century Music » No. 17 (1993) , pages 107-123.

« Volksconcerte in Vienna and Late 19th Century Ideology of the Symphony » , « Journal of the American Musicological Society » No. 50 (1997) , pages 421-453.

Leopold Nowak, « Die Anton Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe : Ihre Geschichte und Schicksale » , « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1982-1983, Linz (1984) , pages 33-67.

« Anton Bruckners Achte Symphonie und ihre zweite Fassung » in « Über Anton Bruckner » , Vienna (1985) , pages 27-29.

Max von Oberleithner, « Meine Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » , Regensburg (1933) .

Alfred Orel, « Anton Bruckner : Das Werk, der Künstler, die Zeit » , Vienna (1925) .

Stephen Parkany, « Kurth's Bruckner and the Adagio of the 7th Symphony », in « 19th Century Music » No. 9 (1988) , pages 262-281.

Claudia Röthig, « Studien zur Systematik des Schaffens von Anton Bruckner », Göttingen (1978) .

Franz Schalk, « Briefe und Betrachtungen », edited by Lili Schalk ,Vienna (1935) .

Heinrich Schenker, « Heinrich Schenker als Essayist und Kritiker : gesammelte Aufsätze, Rezensionen und kleinere Berichte aus den Jahren 1891-1901 », edited by Hellmut Federhofer, Hildesheim (1990) .

Derek Scott, « Bruckner and the Dialectic of Darkness and Light », « The Bruckner Journal » 2/1 (1998) , pages 12-14 ; 2/2 (1998) , pages 12-14 ; 3/1 (1998) , pages 13-15 ; 3/2 (forthcoming) .

Robert Simpson, « The Essence of Bruckner », revised edition, London (1992) .

Elaine Sisman, « Mozart : The Jupiter Symphony », « Cambridge Music Handbooks », Cambridge, Massachusetts (1993) .

Richard Taruskin, « Text and Act », Oxford (1995) .

Manfred Wagner, « Der Wandel des Konzepts : zu den verschiedenen Fassungen von Bruckners Dritter, Vierter und Achter Sinfonie », Vienna (1980) .

« Bruckner : Leben, Werke », « Dokumente », Mainz (1983) .

« Zur Rezeptionsgeschichte von Anton Bruckners Achter Symphonie », « Bruckner Jahrbuch » 1991-1992-1993, Linz (1995) , pages 109-115.

Thomas Weiskel, « The Romantic Sublime : Studies in the Structure and Psychology of Transcendence », Baltimore (1976) .

L'Alliance des 3 Empereurs

Re-inforcing the idea of the new Empire as a voluntary union of princes, not something based on the will of the people, required the « performance » of monarchical rule by « Kaiser » Wilhelm I - above all in Berlin, but also in the capitals of Germany's individual Federal States. A woodcut from Leipzig's « Illustrierte Zeitung » depicts the « Imperial Days » in Dresden, specifically the « Kaiser » 's entry into the city on September 14th, 1882. Wilhelm I is accompanied in the carriage by King Albert.

15 au 17 septembre 1884 : Meeting of the 3 Emperors (« Der Dreikaisertreffen ») at Skierniewice (in Russian Poland) to discuss the extradition of political offenders. This event took place during the composition of Bruckner's 8th Symphony.

(Das Dreikaisertreffen von 1884 bekräftigte im Dreikaiserbund letztmals das nach 1871 verwirklichte Dreikaiserverhältnis.

So kam es im September 1884 in Skierniewice zu einem Zusammentreffen der Kaisermächte Osteuropas unter dem deutschen Kaiser Wilhelm I., dem österreichisch-ungarischen Monarchen Franz Joseph I. und dem russischen Zaren Alexander III., an der auch Bismarck und die Außenminister Österreich-Ungarns und Russlands teilnahmen. Es gelang den drei Kaisermächten nicht, die durch die andauernde österreichisch-russische Balkanrivalität verstärkten Gegensätze im Dreikaiserbund während dieses Treffens zu überwinden, womit es ohne nachhaltigen Erfolg blieb.)

This was an attempt to revitalise the alliance between « Kaiser » Wilhelm I of Germany, Emperor Franz-Josef of Austria, and Tzar Alexander III of Russia, part of Bismarck's system of alliances that seems to have led inexorably, in hindsight, to the First World War. This particular exercise was short-lived and the alliance collapsed again, in 1887. In the letter to Felix Weingartner quoted by Werner Wolff, Anton Bruckner states that the opening of the Finale of the 8th Symphony illustrates this event. This was a serious letter written to an intelligent young conductor, a pupil of Hermann Levi's, charged with the planned 1st performance of the 8th, so a very important letter - and yet, it is full of incredible mistakes of fact.

« Finale : At the time our Emperor received the visit of the Czars at Olmütz ; thus strings : the Cossacks ; brass : military music ; trumpets : fanfares, as the Majesties meet. »

Looking-up how the event was reported in the Vienna press, so as to get an idea of how Bruckner may have envisaged it, the 1st discovery you make is that it took place not at Olmütz, but at Skierniewice. The significance of that is that Skierniewice was in Russian Poland, so the Emperor did not receive any Czars, singular or plural. At 1:30 pm, Russian dignitaries and troops assembled at the station ; at 1:45 pm, the Tsar arrived to hurrahs ; at 2:00 pm precisely, the Emperor Franz-Josef arrived by train at the Grand Station, and sedately inspected the troops - no mention of any galloping Cossacks : the sound of the steam engine would, perhaps, have been a more appropriate music. There had been a meeting 30 years earlier at Olmütz, with the previous Czar involving troop movements, and maybe Bruckner's memory of this event when he was, in his early 30's, informed his idea of the 1884 meeting. Of course, Bruckner was neither political journalist nor historian so maybe these confusions count for little ; he merely had the impression of a grand Royal event and, no doubt, there were military parades. But he was a musician and Wagnerian, so, it is a little more disconcerting when he goes on to compare the combination of all the main-themes at the end of the Finale to Act II of « Tannhäuser », when the King arrives. There is no King in « Tannhäuser », just the Landgraf, and he does no « arriving » ; it is his guests who arrive to an attractive « Weber-ish » March. There is no combination of all themes that Bruckner writes of in his letter.

Again, commentators are non-plussed. Werner Wolff writes :

« And what about the beginning of the Finale. Where the very forces of Nature seem to shake themselves loose ? Of this part of the work. Bruckner wrote to Weingartner :

“ Finale. Our Emperor had the Czars to visit at the time, in Olmütz. Hence, the strings : the Cossacks on horse-back. Brass instruments : military music. Trumpets : a flourish when their Majesties meet.” »

The analyst is disarmed.

...

By the beginning of 1884, Vienna was in a fairly confident mood. In February, Baron Max Wladimir von Beck, departmental chief of the Ministry of Emperor Franz-Josef surveyed the horizon : relations with Italy had become increasingly stable, the only threat to them being a revolution in Rome and a consequent re-alignment of the Latin races under the Republican banner in a battle against the monarchical principle. With Roumania, relations had been greatly improved and clarified by the alliance (though that State might still hesitate to lend positive assistance in a War) . Bulgaria was no longer a problem ; but it would be well to keep in favour with Turkey, who could be useful in preventing trouble from Montenegro or in the occupied provinces. Russia, therefore, was in a fairly isolated position - particularly now that her friend France was so busy overseas. Of course, much still needed to be done to improve the Monarchy's defences and to reduce the time needed for mobilization.

But, all in all, Beck decided :

« The year 1883 has brought a real change for the better. »

It was in this contented mood that the Austrians proceeded to the renewal of the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » . They still kept a wary eye on Russia. For example, at Salzburg, in August 1883, Count Gustav Kálnoky rejected out of hand a Russian proposal which Chancellor Otto von Bismarck put to him that the alliance be modified in the sense of the « Reichstadt » Agreement of 1876, to take account of the eventual collapse of Turkey, and even of Russia's designs on Constantinople. The Emperor and the Hungarians would never agree to this, he said. Besides, the alliance was strictly defensive ; and the Monarchy had no interest whatever in anything remotely offensive to Turkey, who might still prove useful in a War. Nor had he any time for Bismarck's favourite idea of spheres of influence in the Balkans : Russia would not observe the principle in Serbia and Montenegro and, hence, it would just be pure loss for the Monarchy to abandon Bulgaria.

During the negotiations for the renewal of the treaty, he made only 1 concession to Russia. That was an important one : the text was amended to extend the prohibition of military action without prior consultation from Turkey proper and Bulgaria to the whole of the Balkan peninsula. Admittedly, he had sold this particular pass to the Russian Foreign Minister Nicholas de Giers, in the summer of 1883 ; but this formal amendment was to give the Austrians a good deal of trouble in the Serbo-Bulgarian War of 1885. Otherwise, there were no significant changes. Kálnoky rejected

Bismarck's suggestion that Italy might be brought-in : this would overthrow the whole basis of existing treaties, he said, in which Italy's role was only as part of the wall he had built against the danger of a Russian attack if the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » failed. (By the same token, he later refused another suggestion of Bismarck's to admit Russia to the Triple Alliance, and told Bismarck to confine himself to informing Russia of its conservative monarchical content.) Besides, Kálnoky said, the Near-East was no business of Italy's : she would only complicate matters. When Giers seemed to be prevaricating about Bosnia and the Herzegovina, Kálnoky firmly reminded him that their annexation was not to be regarded as a change in the « status quo » ; and that it would not authorize Russia to precipitate a union of the 2 Bulgarias - all of which Giers accepted. On this basis, the treaty was renewed for 3 years in Berlin, on 27 March 1884.

Now, during the negotiations, Kálnoky had agreed to a Russian suggestion for a meeting between Emperor Franz-Josef and Alexander III at the Tsar's hunting-lodge, at Skierniewice (in Poland) , to take place in the summer. But hardly was the ink dry on the renewed treaty than he began to find Russia's behaviour exasperating. In the spring, there were difficulties over Eastern Roumelia, where in view of the impending expiry of the term of office of the Turkish governor-general, Aleko Pasha, a nationalist movement was growing-up in favour of union with Bulgaria ; and this spread to the principality. The Tsar, meanwhile, was pressing strongly for the appointment of a pro-Russian successor to Aleko Pasha - no friend of Saint-Petersburg. All this alarmed Kálnoky : for with a pro-Russian governor-general in Eastern Roumelia, the Russians might expel Alexander from Bulgaria, and recover their prestige by bringing about a union under Russian auspices. To make matters worse, Bismarck seemed to be lending the Russians every assistance. For example, in June, he gratified the Tsar by delivering a crushing humiliation to Alexander of Battenberg, preventing the prince's marriage to the half-English Princess Victoria of Prussia.

To a certain extent, Kálnoky felt constrained to keep in step with his partners in the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » - at least to the extent of not actually opposing the Russian nominee for Eastern Roumelia. And he cooperated with them in sorting-out a Serbo-Bulgarian frontier dispute despite Franz-Josef's indignation at Russia's stiff opposition to Serbia's « just claims » . On the other hand, a bland suggestion from Bismarck that he should accept that Bulgaria lay in Russia's sphere provoked him too far. Again, he declaimed against the doctrine of spheres of influence, which, as he rightly observed, Russia herself did not accept. Austria-Hungary could never give Russia a free-hand in Bulgaria : to do so would be to create that same big Slav kingdom under Russian control that Count Gyula Andrassy had so tenaciously opposed. Such a State would dominate the whole Balkans. Besides, Austria-Hungary had a great material stake in Bulgaria.

On top of all this came an exasperating suggestion from Bismarck that the German Emperor should also participate in the Skierniewice meeting. This filled the Austrians with alarm : the participation of Germany, in her present frame of mind, could only benefit Russia ; and it might even look like a down-grading of the « Dual Alliance » in favour of the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » . Besides, such a spectacular meeting could only cause general wonder and disquiet.

Kálnoky complained to the ambassador in London :

« You can imagine what a noise it will make. »

Yet, at the same time, it could do no good to snub the Germans, especially at a time when the Russians were so alarmingly assiduous at Berlin. To make the best of an embarrassing situation, therefore, the Austrians decided to comply with Bismarck's plan, but to make sure that the Skierniewice meeting was preceded by meetings between Franz-Joseph and Wilhelm I, and between Kálnoky and Bismarck, at Ischl and Varzin. This would put the « Dual Alliance » in the foreground, and give the public the impression that Skierniewice was merely a subsidiary re-inforcement of Austro-German solidarity. Franz-Josef was most anxious that Germany should be squared in advance of any tripartite talks. Not that he was expecting much of lasting value to emerge from Skierniewice anyway :

« My distrust of conditions in Russia is so deep-rooted. »

An Austro-Hungarian foreign-office memorandum reviewing the situation in August took an extraordinarily gloomy view : the Balkan situation had recently become extremely precarious. Austria-Hungary might well prefer to humour Giers and the conservatives in Russia, but she might nevertheless soon have to call on that Power to halt - for she herself could not retreat in the Balkans without sacrificing the hard-won gains of recent years. Faced with this problem, she was virtually isolated : the feeble William Ewart Gladstone government seemed to have withdrawn from the Near-East ; and although the « Dual Alliance » remained the basis of Austro-Hungarian policy, Bismarck, with his talk of spheres of interest, was giving the Monarchy virtually no backing. It would be essential at Varzin, therefore, to find-out just what Bismarck had in mind. This was also Kálnoky's view, and in the weeks before he went to Varzin, he did his best to humour the Germans. He supported their opposition to an Anglo-Portuguese treaty about the Congo basin, and impressed strongly on Tibor Károlyi, in London, that it was vitally important in the London conference, then meeting on Egypt, to lend Bismarck wholehearted support against Gladstone. The latter's policy was, in any case, « a disaster » (« höchst unheilvoll ») for Austria-Hungary who had no interest whatever in seeing him continue in office.

In the event, Wilhelm I showered Franz-Josef with fulsome expressions of loyalty at Ischl ; and at Varzin, Bismarck, while not having any significant suggestions to make, at least did not return to his obnoxious advice of the summer. The talks at Skierniewice too (15-17 September) were also academic ; but they were very remarkable for their cordiality. Indeed, in this respect, they surpassed all expectation, and provided a good illustration of summit diplomacy at its most successful. This 1st personal contact brought a real improvement in the relations between Franz-Josef and the Tsar ; and, from this moment, Kálnoky too began to take a markedly more hopeful view of the possibility of lasting co-existence with Russia. Writer Theodor von Sossnosky's assessment of Skierniewice (« the electrifying of a corpse, which could deceive only the short-sighted ») certainly underrates the importance of the meeting. The Italians, for example, were not short-sighted in discerning a significant down-grading of the « Triple Alliance », the « raison d'être » of which was, of course, the possible collapse of the « 3 Emperors' Alliance ». They felt resentful at not being invited to join in the junketings of their allies (« siamo noi servitori ? ») and tried, in vain, to find-out what had transpired. The « 3 Emperors' Alliance » had, in fact, made a real recovery.

Kálnoky had no doubts about this. Indeed, when, in October, Count István Tisza allowed the Hungarian parliament to express its suspicion of Russia in a formal vote, his rage knew no bounds. He even went so far as to tender his resignation. Not only was it intolerable, he complained to the Emperor, that Tisza should allow any debate at all in the Hungarian parliament, rather than in the Delegations, where the minister for foreign-affairs would, at least, have a chance to defend his policy. The content of the Hungarian declaration was even more serious :

« For Austria-Hungary, today, it is a question of life and death to avoid War with Russia. »

At Skierniewice, he had managed to secure peace and friendship with Russia, without even a written agreement, « with a hand-shake, so to speak » ; and, here, were the Hungarians are giving the impression that the Monarchy was now drawing-back. In the end, Franz-Josef refused to accept Kálnoky's resignation ; and Tisza promised to behave more correctly in future. But the incident is as eloquent of Kálnoky's renewed faith in Russia as of the continuing mistrust of that Power in Hungary.

The Hungarians were, at the same time, raising obstacles in the way of Kálnoky's Balkan policy. Agrarian Hungary gained little from the Monarchy's commercial treaties with the Balkan States ; but, so long as she could send 75 % of her own exports to Austria and the rest to Germany and Western Europe, she was prepared to admit cheaper Balkan live-stock for home consumption. Now, in October 1884, foot and mouth disease broke-out in Serbia ; and when Serbia persisted in sending infected animals into Hungary, the Hungarians reacted drastically and closed the frontier to all live-stock from Serbia, Roumania, and Bulgaria. The Serbian government, backed-up by Rudolf Graf von Khevenhüller-Metsch, protested at this ; and Franz-Josef and Kálnoky eventually prevailed on the Magyars to relent and re-open the frontier (in December) . The affair had, of course, done nothing to raise the popularity of Hungary among the ordinary peasants, who made-up the bulk of the population in Serbia. Worse still, in February 1885, infected cattle from Roumania passed through Hungary to Germany, and a major disruption of the international cattle trade resulted. Britain forbade the entry of German cattle, Germany thereupon closed the frontier to Hungary ; and Hungary to Roumania. (The Hungarian government wanted to extend the ban to Serbia too ; but Kálnoky and the Emperor insisted that the Monarchy could not ignore its treaty obligations towards Serbia just because a 3rd party had made difficulties.) Relations with Roumania, of course, became seriously strained. Irredentism was as rife as ever, but Kálnoky had resignedly concluded that no Roumanian government, however well-intentioned, would ever have the power to check it effectively. Now, however, Bucharest decided not to renew the Austro-Roumanian commercial treaty, due to expire in 1886 ; and the Hungarians, to Kálnoky's dismay, did not seem to care. The Russophile press in Roumania, of course, had a field-day ; but Kálnoky's appeals to Budapest went unheeded. He was again feeling the shackles of the 1867 Constitution, which allowed the foreign-minister only an advisory function in internal and economic questions. He had no legal means of enforcing his views about a commercial policy which was made by others, but which had none the less important consequences in foreign policy for all that.

On top of these difficulties came a political crisis in Serbia, where King Milan Obrenović's political embarrassments were now complicated by the fact that his licentious life had alienated his Russian-born Queen, Natalia Keschko. The Royal pair quarrelled openly in the « cafés » of Belgrade. Milan now began to despair, and yearned for a life of pleasure in Paris or Vienna. But he had no money. In the summer of 1885, therefore, he hit on the idea of amending the Austro-Serbian treaty. The Austrians could provide him with a pension if he ever abdicated ; and they could also educate his son in Vienna, away from the influence of the Queen. In return, Milan would allow them to annex Serbia if they saw fit. He concocted a draft with the help of Khevenhüller, who sent it to Vienna.

Kálnoky would have nothing to do with it. He rebuked Khevenhüller and, in June, took Milan himself to task in Vienna ; monarchs had duties as well as privileges, he told the abject King, and it was Milan's duty to remain in Serbia and govern his people. Unless an openly hostile regime appeared in Belgrade to threaten the tranquillity of Austria-Hungary's southern Slavs, no one in the Monarchy had the faintest desire to intervene in Serbia :

« A flourishing and independent Serbia, on friendly terms with us, suits our intentions best - in any case, better than the possession of an unruly province. »

At the same time, Kálnoky had no illusions about the vital importance of Serbia. That State, he told Viscount Eduard Taaffe, in September 1885 , was « the key to the Monarchy's position in the Near-East » . True, he was at the time trying to persuade Taaffe to give Milan some secret-service money. Nevertheless, he was sincerely convinced that if Austria-Hungary did not control Serbia, Russia would ; and « that moral encirclement by the leading Slav Power, which will always remain the chief-danger for Austria-Hungary, would then extend from Montenegro to the banks of the Vistula ; Austria-Hungary would be cut-off from the Near-East » . Worse still, the south Slav idea would, then, have found a material basis for its political activity and would soon penetrate deep into the Monarchy - which would, then, find foreign problems turning into domestic problems. This prophecy of doom was remarkably percipient ; and, even in the immediate future, Kálnoky can have drawn but little comfort from the thought that the personality of King Milan was the « surest and almost the only guarantee against these dangers » .

In this situation, it seemed vital to preserve the good relations with Russia achieved at Skierniewice. Certainly, there seemed no hope of salvation from any other quarter, from the Western Powers, for example. On the contrary, Kálnoky found Italy's expedition to Massawa, in February 1885, profoundly unsatisfactory, and would have liked Bismarck to tell Italy plainly that she could expect no help from the « Triple Alliance » if she embroiled herself with France in the Red Sea. By the summer, both Bismarck and Kálnoky had a very poor opinion altogether of Italy ; and, at Varzin, in August 1885, they agreed that although the « Triple Alliance » was probably still worth renewing, Italy should be given no further concessions whatever. The behaviour of Britain who, in the spring, became involved in a dispute with Russia over Afghanistan was equally unsatisfactory. The idea that Britain might choose to fight-out this remote quarrel in the Black Sea filled Kálnoky with alarm. For if, Turkey allowed a British fleet through the Straits, Russia would take this as an Act of War ; and the conflagration would spread to the whole Balkans. To avoid this catastrophe, therefore, and, in accordance with her obligations under the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » , Austria-Hungary lost no time in joining the other continental Powers in reminding the Turks that they must, in no circumstances, open the Straits. Not that the Austrians were ready to render Russia any active assistance if Britain actually forced the Straits. They had no desire to see British influence disappear altogether from the Near-East, where it might, one day, prove a useful counter to Russia's. Nor did they share, in the least, Bismarck's relish for an Anglo-Russian War. Any gains that might accrue to Austria-Hungary from the weakening of her commercial rival, Britain, would be more than out-weighed by the danger of an increase in Russia's prestige or, if Russia were defeated, by the danger of a revolution in Russia which might produce an adventurous, pan-Slav policy.

Nor was France regarded, at this time in Vienna, as a potential source of support. Indeed, as Kálnoky came to rely more on the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » , considerations of monarchical principle assumed increased importance ; and, in this respect, he saw in France, perhaps not an enemy as Bismarck did (and, after all, Austria-Hungary still had no quarrel of her own with France) but a potential menace to the Monarchy's alliance system and, hence, to its security. His attitude was, therefore, less narrowly diplomatic than Bismarck's - Germany was simply confronted with a hostile neighbour who had to be isolated. And, at Varzin, in August 1885, he impressed on Bismarck that « the long continued existence of a French Republic, recognized as a fully equal Power, is a dangerous matter for the monarchical principle » . There was more than sentiment to this : the greatest menace was the extension of the Republican principle to France's Latin neighbours : « the realization of the well-known idea of the “ Confédération des races latines ” » . It would be very serious if some 80 million people from Cadiz to Lake Constance, from Syracuse to the North Sea, came to live under a Republican system of government. Belgium, with its numerous revolutionary elements, would not hold-out for long. One dream of the revolution would be realized ; and this would threaten the 3 Eastern Empires, for the Confederation of Slav States and the United States of Germany were inscribed on the same programme. Clearly, it was more than ever important that the 3 Empires stand together. A few days later (on 25-26 August) , a very cordial return-visit by Alexander III to Franz-Josef, at Kremsier, proclaimed again the Austrians' new-found faith in the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » .

In the summer of 1885, Austria-Hungary seemed to enjoy a reasonable measure of security. This was, in great part, due to the alliances she had built-up in the past 6 years. True, Count Gyula Andrassy's original simple idea of a grand alliance including Germany, Britain, and Italy to resist Russia had proved unrealizable owing to the vagaries of British policy and Germany's obsessive concern for good relations with Russia. It had been transformed by his successors into a more complex, but basically dualistic, system of alliances. On the one hand, undoubtedly in the ascendant since Skierniewice, was the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » , embodying the desire to co-operate with « official » Russia and by the exercise of mutual self-restraint to avoid a clash over the Balkans that could only prove disastrous to all 3 great Monarchies. On the other hand, and temporarily of less urgent importance as the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » seemed to be working and the risk of War receded, was the « Dual Alliance » and its ramifications, which would strengthen the Monarchy in War if the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » should fail to keep the peace. Of these alliances, the « Dual Alliance » was clearly the most important, with its promise of German military assistance. The Roumanian alliance promised a support that would hardly materialize, and the « Triple Alliance » no support at all. Moreover, the alliances with Serbia, Italy and Roumania were all plagued with irredentism. Nevertheless, all these alliances were important if the Monarchy needed rear-cover to concentrate its resources on the Russian front. And, even in peace-time, they were useful, like the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » , in bolstering-up the monarchical principle and conservative interests generally. Apart from this, the Monarchy had managed to establish good relations with Turkey, and had a firm foothold in Bulgaria - both of which States might prove useful, even without an alliance, in the event of War. Finally, with Salisbury's return to power in London (on June 24) , there even seemed a chance of some British support.

Yet, even the most elaborate alliance system can hardly provide for every use. The alliance system of 1879-1883 offered Austria-Hungary a fair chance of peaceful co-existence with Russia, provided the pacific Tsar continued to direct Russian policy ; and as strong a military position as she was ever likely to attain in the event of a final armed confrontation with Russia. There always remained the problems of day-to-day diplomacy, however ; perhaps, of less obvious urgency than the risks of actual War and annihilation, but, nonetheless, of vital importance when taken together over a number of years. The perpetual struggle for influence in the Balkan States had immense implications for the whole Great Power position of the parties concerned. At least, this was the conviction of those directing policy in Vienna and Saint-Petersburg. It might happen that a diplomatic crisis would prove severe enough to estrange even « official » Russia from the Monarchy and to destroy the « 3 Emperors' Alliance » , but would yet stop short of that War which would bring the other alliances into operation. Such a crisis would not only intensify the contradictions in the Balkan alliance system, given the conflicting ambitions of the Monarchy's friends and allies in the peninsula ; it would also reveal the inadequacy in diplomacy of alliances designed for use in War.

...

« Triple Alliance » , secret agreement between Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Italy formed in May 1882 and renewed periodically until World War I. Germany and Austria-Hungary had been closely allied since 1879. Italy sought their support against France shortly after losing North African ambitions to the French. The treaty provided that Germany and Austria-Hungary were to assist Italy if it were attacked by France without Italian provocation ; Italy would assist Germany if Germany were attacked by France. In the event of a War between Austria-Hungary and Russia, Italy promised to remain neutral. This abstention would have the effect of freeing Austrian troops that would otherwise have been needed to guard the Austrian-Italian border.

When the treaty was renewed in February 1887, Italy gained an empty promise of German support of Italian colonial ambitions in North Africa in return for Italy's continued friendship. Austria-Hungary had to be pressured by German chancellor Otto von Bismarck into accepting the principles of consultation and mutual agreement with Italy on any territorial changes initiated in the Balkans or on the coasts and islands of the Adriatic and Ægean seas. Italy and Austria-Hungary did not overcome their basic conflict of interest in that region, the treaty notwithstanding. On November 1, 1902, 5 months after the « Triple Alliance » was renewed, Italy reached an understanding with France that each would remain neutral in the event of an attack on the other. Although the alliance was again renewed in 1907 and 1912, Italy entered World War I, in May 1915, in opposition to Germany and Austria-Hungary.

...

Automne 1884 : Gustav Mahler, now aged 24, returns to Kassel.

26 septembre 1884 : Anton Vergeiner publishes an article about Anton Bruckner (aged 60) in the « Linz Tagepost » . He attacks Viennese critics for not giving proper recognition to Bruckner.

28 septembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner commence à rédiger la version dite finale de son « Te Deum » .

Octobre 1884 : Anton Bruckner dédie son Quintette à cordes (WAB 112) « à Sa Majesté Royale, le duc Max Emmanuel de Bavière, avec mon plus profond respect » .

Octobre 1884 : Lors de son passage à Vienne, Franz Liszt refusera la dédicace de la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner.

11 octobre 1884 : Ceremonial opening on « Franzensring » , in the presence of Emperor Franz-Josef I, of the Main Building of the new « University Palace » (in the Renaissance style) by architect Heinrich von Ferstel. The site, known as « Dr. Karl-Lueger-Ring I » during the 20th Century, is renamed today : « Universitätsring I » (for anti-Semitic reasons) .

Université de Vienne

L'Université de Vienne (« Universität Wien ») , ou l' « Alma mater Rudolphina » est fondée en 1365 par Rodolphe IV. C'est la seconde plus vieille université du monde germanophone après l'université Charles de Prague qui, en 1348, au moment où elle est fondée (enseignant en latin, comme partout alors) par Charles IV, est l'université principale du Saint-Empire Romain germanique.

Le bâtiment principal est l'œuvre de l'architecte Heinrich von Ferstel. Il s'élève sur le boulevard circulaire (le « Ring ») au centre de Vienne.

L'architecte autrichien Heinrich Freiherr von Ferstel est né le 7 juillet 1828 à Vienne et est mort le 14 juillet 1883 aussi à Vienne. Il est considéré comme représentatif de l'historicisme.

Son 1er projet important est pour le concours de l'église votive (« Votivkirche ») de Vienne, son projet néo-Gothique dans le style des cathédrales françaises est sélectionné en 1855 et lui apporte une célébrité immédiate.

Il a construit quelques autres bâtiments publics dans le centre-ville. Après des débuts dans un style historiciste Roman (notamment, le bâtiment de la bourse à Vienne, aujourd'hui, le palais Ferstel qui héberge le Café Central) , il devient professeur au « Polytechnikum » . Le caractère fonctionnel notamment de ses bâtiments d'enseignement supérieur, dès l'époque de leur construction, a été critiqué par ses contemporains, il n'en demeure pas moins qu'il a été un architecte célèbre et célébré de son vivant.

...

The University of Vienna (« Universität Wien ») was founded on 12 March 1365 by Rudolf IV, Duke of Austria, and his 2 brothers, Dukes Albert III and Leopold III, hence the additional name « Alma Mater Rudolphina » . With its long and rich history, the University of Vienna has developed into one of the biggest Universities in Europe and, also, one of the most renowned, especially in the Humanities. It is associated with 15 Nobel Prize winners and has been the academic home of a large number of figures both of historical and academic importance.

After the Charles University in Prague and Jagiellonian University in Kraków, the University of Vienna is the 3rd oldest University in Central Europe and the oldest University in the German-speaking world. It was modelled after the University of Paris. However, Pope Urban V did not ratify the deed of foundation that had been sanctioned by Rudolf IV, specifically in relation to the department of theology. This was presumably due to pressure exerted by Charles IV, Holy Roman Emperor, who wished to avoid competition for the Charles University in Prague. Approval was finally received from the Pope, in 1384, and the University of Vienna was granted the status of a full University, including the Faculty of Catholic Theology. The 1st University building opened in 1385. It quite grew into the biggest University of the Holy Roman Empire and, during the advent of Humanism in the mid- 15th Century was home to more than 6,000 students.

In its early years, the University had a partly hierarchical, partly cooperative structure, in which the Rector was at the top, while the students who had little say and were settled at the bottom. The « Magister » and Doctors constituted the 4 faculties and elected the academic officials from amidst their ranks. The students, but also all other « Supposita » (University members) , were divided into 4 Academic Nations. Their elected board members, mostly graduates themselves, had the right to elect the Rector. He presided over the Consistory which included procurators of each of the nations and the faculty deans, as well as over the University Assembly, in which all University teachers participated. Complaints or appeals against decisions of faculty by the students had to be brought forward by a « Magister » or Doctor.

Being considered a Papal Institution, the University suffered quite a set-back during the Reformation. In addition, the 1st Siege of Vienna by Ottoman forces had devastating effects on the city, leading to a sharp decline, with only 30 student numbers enrolled at the lowest point. For King Ferdinand I, this meant that the University should be tight to the church to an even stronger degree and, in 1551, he installed the Jesuit Order there. With the enacting of the « Sanctio Pragmatica » edict by Emperor Ferdinand II, in 1623, the Jesuits took-over teaching at the theological and philosophical faculty and, thus, the University became as stronghold of Catholicism for over 150 years. It was only in the mid- 18th Century that Empress Maria Theresa forced the University back under control of the monarchy. Her successor Joseph II helped in the further reform of the University, allowing both Protestants and Jews to enroll as well as introducing German as the compulsory language of instruction.

Big changes were instituted in the wake of the 1848 Revolution, with the Philosophical Faculty being upgraded into equal status as Theology, Law and Medicine. Led by the reforms of Leopold, Count von Thun und Hohenstein, the University was able to achieve a larger degree of academic freedom. The current main building on the « Ringstraße » was built between 1877 and 1884 by Heinrich von Ferstel. The previous main building was located close to the Stuben Gate (« Stubentor ») on Ignaz-Seipel Square, current home of the old University Church (« Universitätskirche ») and the Austrian Academy of Sciences (« Österreichische Akademie der Wissenschaften ») . Women were admitted as full students from 1897, although their studies were limited to Philosophy. The remaining departments gradually followed suit, although with considerable delay : Medicine, in 1900 ; Law, in 1919 ; Protestant Theology, in 1923 ; and, finally, Roman Catholic Theology, in 1946. 10 years after the admission of the 1st female students, Elise Richter became the 1st woman to receive habilitation, becoming professor of Romance Languages, in 1907 ; she was also the 1st female distinguished professor.

In the late- 1920's, the University was in steady turmoil because of anti-Democratic and anti-Semite activity by parts of the student body. Professor Moritz Schlick was killed by a former student while ascending the steps of the University for a class. His murderer was later released by the Nazi Regime. Following the « Anschluß » , the annexation of Austria into Greater Germany by the Nazi regime, in 1938, the University of Vienna was reformed under political aspects and a huge number of teachers and students were dismissed for political and « racial » reasons. In April 1945, the then 22 year old Kurt Schubert, later acknowledged doyen of Judaic Studies at the University of Vienna, was permitted by the Soviet occupation forces to open the University again for teaching, which is why he is regarded as the unofficial 1st rector in the post-War period. On 25 April 1945, however, the constitutional lawyer Ludwig Adamovich senior was elected as official rector of the University of Vienna.

...

The construction of the Main Building took place between 1877 and 1884, according to plans by the architect Heinrich von Ferstel that combined the forms of the Renaissance and the monumentality of the Baroque era. On the site of the former military parade area on Vienna's splendid new « Ringstraße », the Parliament, the City Hall and the University were all built at the same time. The architecture of these 3 monumental buildings echoes the democracy of the Greeks (in the Ancient Grecian style of the Parliament) , the aspirations of the bourgeoisie in the Middle-Ages (in the Gothic City Hall) , and the flowering of Humanism (in the Renaissance style of the University) .

In spite of the grand proportions of the whole complex (with a ground plan of 161 metres by 131 metres) , the original intention of accommodating all bodies of the University in one central building could not be fulfilled. In addition to the official rooms of the Rector, 2 ceremonial halls and the central administration the building was able to accommodate the 4 Deans, the University Library and many departments and lecture halls. But a considerable proportion of the University's institutions had to be located in many other buildings away from the centre.

...

The architect Heinrich Freiherr von Ferstel was born on 7 July 1828 in Vienna ; and died on 14 July 1883 in Grinzing, near Vienna (now a part of Döbling) . With Hansen and Schmidt, he helped build the late- 19th Century Vienna.

His father Ignaz Ferstel was a bank-clerk of Prague. After wavering for some time between the different arts, he finally decided on architecture which he studied at the Academy under Eduard van der Nüll, August Sicard von Sicardsburg, and Carl Rösner. After several years during which he was in disrepute because of his part in the 1848 Revolution, he entered the atelier of his uncle, Stache, where he worked at the votive altar for the chapel of Saint-Barbara in Saint-Stephen's Cathedral of Vienna, and co-operated in the restoration and construction of many castles, chiefly in Bohemia. Journeys of some length into Germany, Belgium, Holland, and England confirmed him in his tendency towards Romanticism. It was in Italy, however, where he was sent as a bursar in 1854, that he was converted to the Renaissance style of architecture, and his admiration for Bramante. He began to use of polychromy by means of « Graffito » decoration and terra-cotta. This device, adapted from the Early Renaissance and intended to convey a fuller sense of life, he employed later in the Austrian Museum of Applied-Arts.

In 1855, while still in Italy, he was awarded the prize in the competition for the votive church (« Votivkirche ») of Vienna (1855) over 74 contestants. He built it between 1856 and 1879. After his death, it was proposed by Sir Tatton Sykes as a model for the new Westminster Cathedral in London. Another of Ferstel's monumental works belonging to the same period is the Austro-Hungarian bank in Vienna, in the style of the Early-Renaissance (1856-1860) . The expansion of the city of Vienna enabled Ferstel, with Rudolf Eitelberger, to develop civic architecture along artistic lines : Burgomaster's residence ; Stock-Exchange (1859) . At the same time, he had also the opportunity of putting his ideas into practice in a number of private dwellings and villas, in Brünn and Vienna.

The more important buildings designed during his later years (passing over the churches at Schonau near Teplitz, really products of his earlier activity) are the palace of Archduke Ludwig Victor ; his winter palace in Klessheim ; the palace of Prince Johann II of Liechtenstein in the Rossau, near Vienna ; the palace of the Austro-Hungarian Lloyd's, in Trieste ; but, above all, the Austrian Museum for Applied-Art (completed in 1871) , with its imposing arcaded Court. Next comes the University of Vienna (1871-1884) . He was also an author of the project of the reconstruction in the neo-Gothic style the evangelical Church's of Saviour in Bielsko (1881-1882) . Through a technical error, his design for the Berlin « Reichstag » building received no award. In 1866, Ferstel was appointed professor at the Polytechnic School ; in 1871, chief government inspector of public works ; and, in 1879, was raised to the rank of Baron (« Freiherr ») .

...

After wavering for some time between the different arts, all of which possessed a strong attraction for him, Heinrich von Ferstel talented youth finally decided on architecture which he studied at the Academy under Eduard van der Nüll, August Sicard von Sicardsburg, and Carl Rösner. After several years during which he was in disrepute because of his part in the Revolution, he entered the atelier of his uncle, Stache, where he worked at the votive altar for the chapel of Saint-Barbara in the cathedral of Saint-Stephen and co-operated in the restoration and construction of many castles, chiefly in Bohemia. Journeys of some length into Germany, Belgium, Holland, and England confirmed him in his tendency towards Romanticism. It was in Italy, however, where he was sent as a bursar in 1854, that he was converted to the Renaissance style of architecture. This was, thenceforth, his ideal, not because of its titanic grandeur, but because of its beauty and symmetrical harmony of proportion, realized pre-eminently in Bramante, his favourite Master. He turned from the simplicity and restraint of the late- Renaissance to the use of polychromy by means of « graffiti » decoration and terra-cotta. This device, adapted from the Early-Renaissance and intended to convey a fuller sense of life, he employed later with marked success in the Austrian Museum.

In 1855, while still in Italy, he was awarded the prize in the competition for the votive church (« Votivkirche ») of Vienna, over 74 contestants, for the most part celebrated architects. In the Masterpiece of modern ecclesiastical architecture, he produced from 1856 to 1879 a structure of marvellous symmetry designed along strong architectural principles, with a simple, well-defined ground plan, a harmonious correlation of details, and a sumptuous scheme of decoration. After his death, this edifice was proposed by Sykes as a model for the new Westminster cathedral, in London. Another of Ferstel's monumental works belonging to the same period is the Austro-Hungarian bank in Vienna, in the style of the Early Italian Renaissance (1856-1860) . The expansion of the city of Vienna enabled Ferstel, with Eitelberger, to develop civic architecture along artistic lines ; Burgomaster's residence ; Stock-Exchange (1859) . At the same time, he had also the opportunity of putting his ideas into practice in a number of private dwellings and villas, at Brünn and Vienna.

Ferstel is the most distinctively Viennese of all Viennese architects ; able to give a structure beauty of design and harmony without prejudice to the purpose it was to subserve, and this because of his artistic versatility and inexhaustible imagination. These qualities also assured him success as a teacher, and were evident in his memoirs and numerous treatises, which are Masterpieces of clearness. Special mention should be made those which appeared in Forster's architectural magazine.

...

Die Universität Wien (lateinisch Alma Mater Rudolphina Vindobonensis) ist mit derzeit rund 92.000 Studierenden und 9.500 Mitarbeitern die größte Hochschule in Österreich sowie im deutschsprachigen Raum und eine der größten in Mitteleuropa. 1365 in Wien gegründet, ist sie die älteste Universität im heutigen deutschen Sprachraum.

Die mittelalterliche Universität war in verschiedenen Gebäuden im Stubenviertel der Wiener Innenstadt untergebracht. Ihr erstes Haus war das 1385 eröffnete Herzogskolleg in der heutigen Postgasse 7-9. Nach der Inkorporation des Jesuitenkollegs in die Universität 1623 wurde an derselben Stelle das frühbarocke Jesuitenkolleg errichtet, welches zusammen mit der Universitätskirche und einigen Zubauten noch heute als Alte Universität erhalten ist und beispielsweise das Archiv der Universität Wien enthält. 1753-1755 ließ Maria Theresia unmittelbar neben dem Jesuitenkollegium ein neues Hauptgebäude, die Neue Aula, errichten. Die Aula war ein zentraler Versammlungsort im Rahmen der Revolution von 1848. Nach der gewaltsamen Niederschlagung der Revolte wurde die Universität vom Militär besetzt und die Studenten vertrieben ; das Gebäude wurde 1857 der Akademie der Wissenschaften übergeben. Der Studienbetrieb fand in provisorischen Ausweichquartieren statt.

Für den Bau eines Hauptgebäudes der Universität wurde ab 1854 zunächst ein Platz hinter dem Chor der Votivkirche vorgesehen. 1868 wurde jedoch ein Areal an der Ringstraße verfügbar, und die Universität dort gebaut. Mit dem Bau wurde 1877 begonnen. Architekt Heinrich Ferstel wählte für das Gebäude den Stil der italienischen Hochrenaissance, wobei die Universitäten von Padua und Genua Pate standen. Den Blickfang an der Ringstraße bildet die markant vorspringende Säulenhalle. Im Giebel stellt ein Relief die Geburt der Minerva dar, der Göttin der Weisheit. 1884 war die Universität fertiggestellt. Das Areal der Uni umfasst 21.412 Quadratmeter, wovon 14.530 Quadratmeter verbaut sind. Die Kosten hatten 7,7 Millionen Gulden (circa 68 Millionen Euro) betragen.

Heute befinden sich in diesem Hauptgebäude am Universitätsring I vor allem das Rektorat, die meisten Dekanate, die zentralen Dienstleistungseinrichtungen, die Hauptbibliothek, einige wenige Institute mit ihren Fachbibliotheken und zahlreiche Hörsäle.

Die Gründungsurkunde der Universität, heute im Archiv verwahrt, wurde am 12. März 1365 von Herzog Rudolf IV. und seinen Brüdern Albrecht III. und Leopold III. unterzeichnet. Daher rührt auch der Name der Universität Alma Mater Rudolphina. Die Gründungsurkunde enthält in programmatischer Weise das Leitbild der Universität, daß « gemin guot, rechte gericht, menschlich vernunft und bescheidenhait aufneme und wachse und daz ein yeglich weiser mensch vernünftiger und ain unweiser zuo menschlicher vernunft in rechte erkantnüsse mit goetlicher lerung bracht und geczogen werde » .

Die Universität Wien ist somit nach der Karls-Universität Prag die zweitälteste Universität im damaligen Heiligen Römischen Reich nördlich der Alpen und die älteste bestehende Universität im deutschen Sprachraum. Bis zur Aufnahme des geregelten Lehr- und Lernbetriebs sollten jedoch noch fast zwanzig Jahre vergehen ; 1383 nützte Herzog Albrecht III. einen Streit an der Sorbonne, um zahlreiche Professoren von Paris nach Wien zu berufen, und nachdem auch der 1365 noch ausgesprochene päpstliche Vorbehalt, eine theologische Fakultät einzurichten, gefallen war, erließ Albrecht III. 1384 einen zweiten Stiftsbrief, mit dem die kontinuierliche Entwicklung begann.

Bis zum Ausgang des Mittelalters wuchs die Universität Wien stetig an und hatte in der Zeit des Humanismus (um 1500) über 6.000 Studenten, womit sie die größte Universität des Reiches geworden war. In den 1520er Jahren führten Pestepidemien, die Bedrohung durch das türkische Heer und die Reformation zu einem starken Schwund bei den Studentenzahlen ; im 16. Jahrhundert hatte die Universität zeitweilig nur mehr 30 Studenten. Am 13. Oktober 1623 wurde die Universität mit dem 1551 gegründeten Jesuitenkollegium vereinigt und die gesamte theologische und philosophische Fakultät den Jesuiten (der Gesellschaft Jesu) überantwortet. Nach dieser Reform nahm die Universität wieder einen gewissen Aufschwung.

Tiefgreifende Reformen erfolgten dann unter Maria Theresia und Joseph II. ab 1749, mit denen der Einfluss der Jesuiten zurückgedrängt und schließlich ganz beseitigt und die Universität in eine Staatsanstalt umgewandelt wurde, womit ein fast gänzlicher Verlust der Universitätsautonomie verbunden war. Auf Forschung wurde wenig Wert gelegt, die Lehre straff organisiert.

Die Revolution 1848 richtete sich nicht zuletzt gegen diese Einschränkungen der Lehr- und Lernfreiheit, die dann auch 1849 die Prinzipien der Universitätsreform des Unterrichtsministers Leo Thun-Hohenstein wurden. In diesem Zusammenhang wurde auch die Philosophische Fakultät aufgewertet und den drei « höheren » Fakultäten (Theologie, Jus, Medizin) gleichgestellt.

1850 wurde die Evangelisch-Theologische Fakultät gegründet, aber erst 1922 der Universität inkorporiert. Mit der Universitätsreform 1975 wurde die Universität in acht Fakultäten neu gegliedert : Katholische Theologie, Evangelische Theologie, Rechtswissenschaften, Sozial- und Wirtschaftswissenschaften, Medizin, Grund- und Integrativwissenschaften, Geisteswissenschaften sowie Formal- und Naturwissenschaften.

Im Jahr 1897 wurden Frauen erstmals als ordentliche Hörerinnen zugelassen, wenn auch zunächst nur an der philosophischen Fakultät. Die restlichen Fakultäten folgten teils mit erheblichem Abstand : 1900 die medizinische, 1919 die juristische, 1923 die evangelisch-theologische. Im Jahr 1946 ließ schließlich auch die katholisch-theologische Fakultät Frauen als ordentliche Hörerinnen zu. Acht Jahre nach Beginn des Frauenstudiums an der Universität Wien gelang es der Romanistin Elise Richter 1905 als erster Frau, sich zu habilitieren ; sie wurde 1921 auch die erste außerordentliche Professorin. Die erste Ordinaria wurde an der Universität Wien erst 1956 ernannt : die Physikerin Berta Karlik.

Schon lang vor dem « Anschluß » von 1938 waren demokratiefeindliche und antisemitische Studenten, von einigen Professoren wohlwollend toleriert, an der Universität aktiv. 1928 fanden Hochschulkrawalle statt, 1932 waren ebenfalls

Studentenkrawalle zu verzeichnen, die mit Demonstrationen vor dem Haupteingang der Universität verbunden waren. Im Juni 1936 wurde der Physiker und Philosoph Moritz Schlick, Begründer des Wiener Kreises, auf der Philosophenstiege im Hauptgebäude der Universität von einem seiner ehemaligen Studenten erschossen ; der Mörder wurde zwei Jahre später vom NS-Regime aus der Haft entlassen.

Nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich wurde die Universität Wien 1938 unter Rektor Fritz Knoll nach nationalsozialistischen Gesichtspunkten « gleichgeschaltet » und eine große Anzahl an Lehrenden und Studierenden aus rassistischen beziehungsweise politischen Gründen vertrieben. 1943 folgte ihm der Anatom Eduard Pernkopf.

...

Zentrales Bauwerk der Universität Wien ist ihr Hauptgebäude im 1. Bezirk. Das von Heinrich Ferstel konzipierte Gebäude wurde 1873-1884 erbaut.

Die mittelalterliche Universität war in verschiedenen Gebäuden im Stubenviertel der historischen Altstadt Wiens untergebracht. Ihr erstes Haus war das 1385 eröffnete Herzogskolleg in der heutigen Postgasse 7-9. Nach der Inkorporation des Jesuitenkollegs in die Universität, 1623, wurde an derselben Stelle das frühbarocke Jesuitenkolleg errichtet. Es ist mit der Universitätskirche und einigen Zubauten noch heute als Alte Universität erhalten und beherbergt unter anderem das Archiv der Universität Wien.

1753-1755 ließ Maria Theresia unmittelbar neben dem Jesuitenkollegium ein neues Hauptgebäude, die « Neue Aula » , errichten. Die Aula war zentraler Versammlungsort bei der Revolution von 1848. Nach der gewaltsamen Niederschlagung der Revolution wurde die Universität vom Militär besetzt. Die Studenten wurden aus der Altstadt vertrieben ; das Gebäude wurde 1857 der Akademie der Wissenschaften übergeben.

Der Studienbetrieb fand nun in provisorischen Ausweichquartieren statt : Die Medizinische Fakultät wurde in einer ehemaligen Gewehrfabrik in der Währinger Straße 13 im 9. Bezirk untergebracht (heute das « Anatomische Institut ») . Die juristischen, philosophischen und theologischen Vorlesungen wurden im ehemaligen Stadtkonvikt der Piaristen in der Altstadt abgehalten. Das Chemische Laboratorium kam im Theresianum im 4. Bezirk unter, und zahlreiche Institute wurden in Erdberg, einem vom Stadtzentrum entfernteren Teil des 3. Bezirks, angesiedelt.

Im Jahr 1854 plante Unterrichtsminister Leo von Thun und Hohenstein den Neubau eines Universitätsgebäudes am Rossauer Glacis, beim Beginn der Währinger Straße beziehungsweise der heutigen Günthergasse im heutigen 9. Bezirk. Thun beauftragte die Architekten Sicardsburg und van der Nüll, den Neubau zu projektieren, der dann 1855 beschlossen wurde. Der Standort gefiel der Obrigkeit auch deshalb, weil die unberechenbaren Studenten nicht die Ringstraße, sondern nur den Alsergrund unsicher machen würden.

Die Medizinische Fakultät fand den Standort attraktiv, weil er in günstiger Nähe zum damaligen Allgemeinen Krankenhaus lag. Inzwischen war aber der Baugrund für die Votivkirche, ein Projekt von Kaiserbruder Ferdinand Maximilian, abgesteckt worden, und dieses 1856 begonnene Bauvorhaben war nun der Universität im Weg. Sicardsburg und van der Nüll planten um und projektierten ein Universitätsgebäude hinter dem Chor der Votivkirche. Der Stil war an die Gotik angelehnt, um zur Votivkirche zu passen.

Ende 1857 entschied Franz Joseph I., die Stadtmauer um die Altstadt aufzulassen und um die Altstadt die Wiener Ringstraße zu errichten; ein Vorhaben, das viele Jahre in Anspruch nahm. Unabhängig davon wurden 1858 der Plan für das neue Universitätsgebäude bei der Votivkirche und seine sofortige Umsetzung beschlossen. 1859 konnte aber mit dem Bau wegen des norditalienischen Kriegs nicht begonnen werden, und 1860 schied Thun aus der Regierung aus, wodurch das Vorhaben ins Stocken geriet.

Das Vorhaben wurde zunehmend kritisiert. Vor allem Heinrich Ferstel protestierte heftig dagegen, daß ein zweites monumentales Gebäude seiner Votivkirche Konkurrenz machen sollte. Im Gegensatz dazu kämpfte die Bezirksvertretung des Alsergrunds für das prestigeträchtige Projekt in ihrem Bezirk. Jahrelange Diskussionen waren die Folge. In diesen Jahren änderten sich die Planungen oft. Die Universität wurde zeitweise als einzelnes Gebäude geplant, dann wieder als Campus mehrerer Gebäude nach englischem Vorbild. Als einziges Gebäude dieses Campus' wurde von Heinrich Ferstel 1869-1872 das Chemische Institut in der Währinger Straße 10 gebaut.

Die Situation änderte sich grundlegend, nachdem der Kaiser am 17. August 1868 die von der Stadtverwaltung lang verlangte Auffassung des großen Parade- und Exerzierplatzes nahe der Altstadt genehmigt hatte. Im Winter 1868-1869 gebar Bürgermeister Cajetan Felder die Idee, auf der Fläche des Paradeplatzes drei Monumentalgebäude errichten zu lassen, das Parlament, das Rathaus und die Universität. Der Plan fand sofort Gefallen. Es wurde auch sogleich bestimmt, daß Theophil Hansen das Parlament und Heinrich Ferstel die Universität bauen würde.

Allerdings gab es auch Widerstand. Obwohl nun viel Platz am Parade Gelände zur Verfügung stand, wollten mehrere Fakultäten an dem Standort am Alsergrund festhalten, - vor allem die Mediziner fühlten sich in der ehemaligen Gewehrfabrik wohl. Architekt Ferstel hatte stets gegen einen Monumentalbau neben seiner Votivkirche opponiert; nachdem er nun die Universität selbst bauen durfte, wurden seine Proteste noch heftiger.

Schließlich gelang es Franz von Matzinger, dem Leiter des Wiener Stadterweiterungsfonds, den neuen Standort an der Ringstraße endgültig durchzusetzen, und zwar dort, wo der damalige Franzensring (nach mehreren Namensänderungen heißt dieser Abschnitt seit 2012 Universitätsring) vor dem Schottentor (heute Verkehrsknotenpunkt neben der Universität) eine markante Richtungsänderung aufweist, in Sichtweite, aber ohne direkte Verbindung mit der Votivkirche. Der Bauplatz wurde von Ring, Rathausplatz, Reichsratsstraße und Universitätsstraße begrenzt.

Nachdem die Baupläne Ferstels publiziert wurden, war die Universitätsleitung von der Größe des Gebäudes freudig überrascht; vor allem konnte man nun die ganze Universitätsbibliothek im Haupthaus unterbringen.

Am 25. Juli 1870 wurde in der Amtszeit von Kaiserlich-Königlich Ministerpräsident Alfred Józef Potocki endgültig entschieden, die Universität am Ring zu bauen. Im Frühjahr 1871 unternahm Heinrich Ferstel eine Studienreise nach Italien, bei der er vor allem die Universitäten von Bologna, Padua, Genua und Rom besuchte. Bis zum Sommer 1872 fanden unzählige Verhandlungen und Besprechungen statt, in denen die einzelnen Fakultäten ihre Raumanforderungen bekanntgaben, die dann von Ferstel koordiniert werden mußten.

Das Projekt wurde schließlich von Architekt Gottfried Semper begutachtet. Sempers Expertise war grundsätzlich positiv, wobei er einige Verbesserungsvorschläge machte. Unter Berücksichtigung dieser Vorschläge erteilte Kaiser Franz Joseph I. am 29. Juli 1872 seine Genehmigung. Zugleich bewilligte der Kaiser 7 Millionen Gulden aus dem Staatsvermögen für den Universitätsbau. Zu dieser Zeit war das Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofoperntheater an der Ringstraße bereits eröffnet, der Neubau des Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofburgtheaters hingegen noch nicht begonnen. Kunsthistorisches Museum und Naturhistorisches Museum, die beiden großen Hofmuseen an der Ringstraße, waren seit einem Jahr in Bau. Der Bau der nahen Votivkirche hatte zwar schon 1856 begonnen, dauerte aber bis 1879.

Mit den Bauarbeiten wurde ein Jahr später, am 14. Juli 1873, begonnen. Die Anlage der Fundamente erwies sich als sehr schwierig. Unmittelbar vor der Universität hatte sich einst die Mülker Bastei erstreckt ; das Areal war von alten Minengängen aus der Zeit der Türkenkriege durchzogen.

Auf den Tag genau zehn Jahre nach Baubeginn, am 14. Juli 1883, starb Heinrich Freiherr von Ferstel in seiner Sommerwohnung im damaligen Wiener Vorort Grinzing. Sein langjähriger Mitarbeiter und Schwager Karl Köchlin (1828-1894) und sein Sohn Max von Ferstel übernahmen den Weiterbau. Ein Jahr später war der Bau im Wesentlichen fertiggestellt, am 10. Oktober 1884 wurde die Universität in Anwesenheit des Kaisers feierlich eröffnet. Die dekorative Ausgestaltung nahm aber noch Jahre in Anspruch. Die Gesamtkosten betragen bis 1890 7.633.186 Gulden (circa 67 Millionen Euro) .

...

Heinrich Freiherr von Ferstel (geboren 7. Juli 1828 in Wien ; gestorben 14. Juli 1883 in Grinzing, heute zu Wien) war ein österreichischer Architekt, Hochschullehrer und gilt als herausragender Vertreter des Historismus.

Als Sohn von Ignaz Ferstel, einem Bankdirektor aus Prag, studierte er an der Wiener Kunstakademie unter Eduard van der Nüll und August Sicard von Sicardsburg (1812-1868) Architektur. Seine besondere Begabung ermöglichte es ihm kleinere, prämierte Concurrencen zu gewinnen und Studienreisen nach Deutschland, ab 1855 Italien und abschließend Frankreich.

Für den Wettbewerb um die Votivkirche, das erste Bauprojekt der damals noch projektierten Wiener Ringstraße, reichte Ferstel einen neugotischen Entwurf im Stil der französischen Kathedralgotik ein. Dies tat er, kurz bevor er seine Italienreise antrat, und er war gerade in Neapel, als ihn die Nachricht erreichte, daß der erste Preis auf seinen Entwurf gefallen sei und er 4.000 Gulden gewonnen habe, die den Grundstock eines später beachtlichen Vermögens bildeten. Durch den Sieg in diesem Wettbewerb gelangte er 1855 zu schlagartiger Bekanntheit, hatte er sich doch gegen 74 Konkurrenten aus dem In- und Ausland durchgesetzt.

Er baute einige weitere öffentliche Gebäude in der Innenstadt und an der Ringstraße. Nach Anfängen in einem romantisierenden Historismus (namentlich im Bank- und Börsengebäude an der Freyung in Wien, heute Palais Ferstel genannt, das auch das bekannte Kaffeehaus Café Central beherbergt) wandte er sich einem strengeren Stil zu und wurde nicht zuletzt durch seine Professorenstelle am Polytechnikum stilistisch sehr einflussreich. Auf seine Initiative hin wurde der Wiener Cottage-Verein ins Leben gerufen, der das Cottageviertel gründete, mit dem Ziel, « den Bürgern ein Leben in gesunder frischer Luft » zu ermöglichen.

Ferstel wohnte mit seiner Familie, seiner Frau Lotte (gestorben 8. April 1922) sowie den sechs Kindern, in einer Villa in Grinzing, das damals noch nicht nach Wien eingemeindet und ein Dorf war. Seine Tochter Marianne ehelichte den Kaiserlich-Königlich Eisenbahnminister Zdenko von Forster zu Philippsberg.

1879 wurde Ferstel in Wien zum Ehrenbürger ernannt und von Kaiser Franz-Josef I. in den erblichen Freiherrenstand erhoben. 1882 wurde ihm die Royal Gold Medal verliehen.

Er stand jahrelang im persönlichen Kontakt mit Hermann von der Hude (1830-1908), der am 3. September 1883 in der Versammlung des Architekten-Vereins Berlin über sein Leben und Schaffen berichten wollte.

Am 14. Juli 1883 starb Heinrich Freiherr von Ferstel in Grinzing. Er wurde auf dem Grinzinger Friedhof (Gruppe MA, Nummer 46) in einer ehrenhalber gewidmeten Gruft beigesetzt; sein Mausoleum ist einer gotischen Kapelle nachempfunden. Die Inschrift auf der Gruftplatte nennt nur seinen Namen sowie den seiner Ehefrau Lotte, einer geborenen Fehlmann. Erbaut wurde die Familiengruft 1891 von Heinrich von Ferstels Sohn, Max von Ferstel, der ebenfalls Architekt, Hofrat und Professor an der Technischen Hochschule in Wien war und wie weitere Familienmitglieder dort bestattet wurde.

Im Jahr 1886 wurde in Wien Alsergrund (9. Bezirk) unmittelbar hinter der Votivkirche die Ferstelgasse nach ihm benannt. Um 1980 wurde das von ihm erbaute Bank- und Börsengebäude an der Freyung im Zuge der Revitalisierung vom Eigentümer Palais Ferstel benannt.

...

15 octobre 1884 : Lettre du chef Arthur Nikisch à Anton Bruckner :

« Today, I have played through the Symphony in E major to “ Herr ” Oskar Schwalm, the music-critic of the influential Leipzig newspaper, the “ Leipziger Tagesblatt ”. He was beside himself with delight and asked me to inform you that he was truly filled with enthusiasm for your magnificent Masterpiece and that he considers it his duty to use all his influence to work-in the press, on your behalf, and to ensure that you are not deprived of the public recognition which you so richly deserve. »

2 novembre 1884 : Prince Konstantine Hohenlohe-Shillingstfurst writes in his Memoirs ...

« Berlin, November 2, 1884.

This morning, church. Then, the Foreign-Office, where I studied the matter of the West-Coast of Africa. I was interrupted in this occupation by a letter from the Adjutant, summoning me to the Emperor at half-past 3. I thought the Emperor surprisingly well and cheerful, and remained an hour. He spoke of the satisfactory relations with France, and smiled. Then, he spoke about England, and lamented the Radical tendencies of the Government and Chamberlain's intention of carrying the Reform Bill by creating a number of peers. That disquiets him, and he is afraid that the Republican movement may gain the upper-hand in England. What would be the outcome ? " We shall have trouble in retaining our position. " It was consequently necessary that, at any rate, the 3 Imperial Powers should unite to defend the monarchical principle. That was also the main-reason for the meeting at Skiernevitze. Prince Wilhelm had exerted a very good influence over the Emperor of Russia. The Emperor and Bismarck had given the Prince instructions to advocate the union of the 3 Imperial Powers, and he had accomplished this very creditably. So that, when the visit of the Emperor of Austria was decided, he, the Emperor Wilhelm, had also expressed a wish to be present. No documentary agreement had been drafted, nor was any necessary. We, then, spoke of the opening of the Polytechnic School, at which the Emperor was present, and of the revival that is apparent in Berlin, and so forth. At 6 o'clock, I dined at Bismarck's. Conversation turned upon the Emperor's words with regard to the Skiernevitze meeting, and Bismarck said the Emperor was making a mistake when he said that he had expressed a wish to be present. That had been an understood thing. The only difficulty had been in Vienna and with Hungary. The Empress always wanted to know what had been arranged at Skiernevitze, and had worried the Emperor about it. When I took my leave, he gave me his compliments for Ferry, whom he holds in high-esteem. I am to say that we do not desire any friction between England and France. Gladstone may remain in office. It will be good for us, not for England. »

Karl Viktor. Memoirs of Prince Chlodwig of Hohenlohe-Schillingsfürst, Volume 2, Forgotten Books, London (2013) - Original work published 1906.

5 novembre 1884 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner au chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch.

« " Herr " Levi, the Munich music-director, wants to see the score of the 7th Symphony. Will the concert now take place in November ? In any event, could I ask you, when you reply, to state that I " must be present at the 2 final rehearsals ", so that I can request leave. In the score, there are actually a lot of important details apart from the tempo changes which have not been marked. Perhaps, the most important people should attend the rehearsals so that they will understand the work better ? I am pleased with the tuba passages. I am longing for things to happen and looking forward with excitement to the performance. I hope that several rehearsals have taken place already. Have the parts been written well and correctly ? HOW does the work sound when played by the Orchestra ?

With my heartfelt request for many rehearsals. »

WAB 40

14 novembre 1884 : WAB 40 - « Salvum fac populum tuum » (sauve ton peuple, Seigneur) , offertoire en fa majeur pour chœur mixte à 4 voix a cappella (SATB) . Une adaptation des versets 22 à 30 du « Te Deum » . Composé à Vienne.

G/A (August Göllerich / Max Auer) : IV/2 (1936) , pages 496-497 ; fac-similé du manuscrit autographe.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , pages 126-128. .

Salvum fac populum tuum, Domine
Et benedic hereditati tuae.
Et rege eos, et extolle illos usque in æternum.
Per singulos dies benedicimus te.
Et laudamus nomen tuum in saeculum,
Et in saeculum saeculi.
Dignare Domine die isto sine peccato nos custodire.
Miserere nostri Domine, miserere nostri.
Fiat misericordia tua Domine super nos,
Quemadmodum speravimus in te.

...

Sauve ton peuple, Seigneur, et bénis ceux qui ont recueilli ton héritage.
Et conduis-les
Et donne-leur l'éternité.

Chaque jour nous te bénissons ;
Nous louons ton nom pour toujours,
Et pour les siècles des siècles.

Pitié, Seigneur, aujourd'hui, garde nous du péché.
Prends pitié de nous, Seigneur, prends pitié de nous.

Que ta miséricorde, Seigneur, soit sur nous, ainsi que nous l'espérons.
C'est en toi, Seigneur, que j'ai espéré.
Que je ne sois jamais confondu.

...

« Salvum fac populum tuum » (O Lord, save thy people) , WAB 44, is a Motet (based on a few verses of the « Te Deum ») composed by Anton Bruckner on 14 November 1884, presumably on request of Franz Xaver Witt for the Cecilian Society. It was 1st published in Band IV/2, pages 496-497 of the GÖLLERICH / AUER biography. It is put in Band XXI/31 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

The 57 bar Motet in F major for choir a cappella, is based on the verses « Salvum fac populum tuum » till « Quem ad modum speravimus in te. » of the « Te Deum » . This, for Bruckner a quite unique composition, alternates passages in unison, in « Falsobordone » and in polyphony.

...

29 novembre 1884 : Décès de l'évêque de Linz, monseigneur Franz-Josef Rüdiger à l'âge de 73 ans. Anton Bruckner touche l'orgue dans l'exécution du « Requiem » de Mozart. Le service funèbre est officié par le cardinal Josef Ganglbauer, archevêque de Vienne.

Le cardinal autrichien Cölestin Josef Ganglbauer est né le 20 août 1817 à Thanstetten, près de Kremsmünster en Haute-Autriche ; et est mort le 14 décembre 1889 à Vienne.

Membre de l'Ordre des Bénédictins, Ganglbauer devient abbé de l'abbaye de Kremsmünster. Il est ensuite élu archevêque de Vienne, en 1881. Le pape Léon XIII le nomme cardinal, lors du consistoire du 10 novembre 1884.

Josef Ganglbauer était l'oncle de l'entomologiste Ludwig Ganglbauer (1856-1912) .

...

C'est Rüdiger qui, le 1er, offrit à son organiste favori la possibilité d'être inhumé à l'intérieur même d'un édifice religieux. Plus tard, poursuivant sa quête de liberté jusque dans l'au-delà, Bruckner notera dans son testament vouloir être inhumé dans la crypte, sous l'orgue de l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian.

30 novembre 1884 : Message du chef d'orchestre Hermann Levi à Anton Bruckner (proposant une exécution de l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie) :

« In the meantime, preparations are going well. I am playing the Adagio and (as far as it is possible on the piano) the 1st movement to every musician who comes to me, and experience in every case the same mounting response from astonishment to admiration which I had myself. By the day of the concert, half of the town will know already who and what Bruckner is. »

Décembre 1884 : Gustav Mahler, exasperated over his love for Johanna Richter, composes his song-cycle « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » (Songs of a wayfarer » ; more properly : « Songs of a traveling journeyman ») :

« Wenn mein Schatz Hochzeit macht » (When my sweetheart is married) .

« Ging heut' Morgen übers Feld » (I went this morning over the field) .

« Ich hab' ein glühend Messer » (I have a gleaming knife) .

« Die zwei blauen Augen von meinem Schatz » (The 2 blue eyes of my beloved) .

13 décembre 1884 : Hugo Wolf, noted composer of Lieder and pro-Wagner music-critic, writing in the « Wiener Salonblatt » ...

« Brahms' " Tragic Overture " strongly reminds of the appearances of ghosts in Shakespeare's dramas, who frighten the murderer by their presence while they remain invisible to those present. We do not know which hero Brahms has murdered in his " Tragic Overture ". Let us assume that Brahms is Macbeth, and the " Tragic Overture " is the murder embodied in the ghost of Banquo, whom he murders with the very 1st down bows, which fall like axe blows. »

19 novembre 1884 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner au chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch.

« I have my leave " in the bag " already, and intend to travel by North-West Railway's courier train on the evening of the 26th and arrive in Leipzig, at 11:00 am, on Saturday 27th December. (Unless you should say to me, " it is better to stay at home ".)

Are there no military tubas which can be used ? Have there been any rehearsals so far ? HOW does the Symphony sound ? Please, be so kind as to write to me, as I am very excited already. (If the work is unsuccessful, I will return home at dead of night.)

Many congratulations on the excellent " Tristan " success. I hope that everything is going well already. I am certain that the players who perform " Tristan " so well will also play my 7th Symphony, superbly. »

21 décembre 1884 : Lettre du chef Arthur Nikisch à Anton Bruckner :

« The performance will take place definitely on the 30th. There have been rehearsals already ; as the work is very difficult, it must be rehearsed carefully. We will have 5 rehearsals altogether for the Symphony, I believe that will be sufficient. You will have to change the orchestration of some passages as it does not work and does not sound good. If you are coming on Saturday, we will certainly have enough time to make the changes. »

22 décembre 1884 : Other performance by Josef Schalk of his solo piano arrangement of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony at a « Wiener Akademische Wagner-Verein » concert. At the same concert, Ferdinand Löwe plays his arrangement of the 1st movement of the 4th Symphony, and the 2 pianists play Löwe's piano-duet arrangement of the 1st Symphony. Concert reviews by : Theodor Helm, in the « Deutsche Zeitung » of 24 December 1884 ; Hugo Wolf, in the « Salonblatt » of 28 December 1884 ; and Emil von Hartmann, in the « Deutsche Kunst- und Musikzeitung » , XII, of 1 January 1885.

27 décembre 1884 : Bruckner assiste à une représentation de « Tristan und Isolde » , à Leipzig.

Bruckner begins sketching the Adagio of the 8th Symphony very shortly after this event (the earliest extant sketches of the Adagio are from the following month) . Bruckner also apparently returned to the score of this movement after he heard « Tristan » in Bayreuth, in late July 1886.

28 décembre 1884 : Un Hugo Wolf, âgé de 24 ans, publie une condamnation cinglante du compositeur Anton Bruckner dans sa chronique du « Wiener Salonblatt » .

29 décembre 1884 : While staying in Leipzig, Anton Bruckner played the « Gewandhaus » organ for a full complement of friends. He regularly requested a subject upon which to improvise a fugue. Professor Alexander Winterberger proposed him a theme in B minor.

Alexander Winterberger was a music-critic for the « Leipziger Nachrichten » . He was also a keyboardist and organist of some accomplishment. He had been one of Franz Liszt's earliest pupils.

Alexander Winterberger

The German pianist, organist, composer and music-critic Alexander Winterberger was born on 14 August 1834 in Weimar and died on 23 September 1914, aged 80.

He lived at various times in Vienna, Saint-Petersburg and Leipzig. His pupils in Vienna included Samuel de Lange junior. He is mostly remembered for his association with Franz Liszt, in particular, his close involvement with the 2 great organ Fantasies Liszt wrote for the Merseburg Cathedral organ : the Fantasy and Fugue on the chorale « Ad nos ad salutarem undam » and the Fantasy and Fugue on the Theme B-A-C-H.

Winterberger studied at the Leipzig Conservatory, then, at Weimar with the Weimar Municipal Organist Johann Gottfried Töpfer. Although he also studied under Franz Liszt until 1853, he was in the « outer circle » of students, that is, not among those with whom Liszt spent most time and was on most intimate personal terms. He displayed a Mastery of novel registrations which, in some cases, Liszt and he worked-out together. Winterberger had been a classmate of Julius Reubke in Berlin, and he was instrumental in Reubke deciding to come to Weimar to study with Liszt.

In 1855, Liszt inspected the construction of the new organ at Merseburg Cathedral, and resolved to write (some sources say he was commissioned by Winterberger) a grand piece for the official opening : his Fantasy and Fugue on the Theme B-A-C-H. The date was set for 26 September 1855 but, by 22 September, the Fantasy was still not ready. Instead, he decided to have Winterberger premiere the revised version of the Fantasy and Fugue on the chorale « Ad nos ad salutarem undam » (it had been published in 1852, but Liszt revised it more than once, most recently in 1855) . They rehearsed the work together a few days before the official opening.

The B-A-C-H Fantasy and Fugue, dedicated to Winterberger, finally had its premiere on 13 May 1856, again at Merseburg Cathedral. On the same occasion, Winterberger also played Liszt's arrangement of the Church Festive Overture on the Chorale « Ein feste Burg » (A Mighty Fortress) by composer Otto Nicolai.

Winterberger toured the Netherlands in 1856, receiving much praise for his performances of the 2 Liszt fantasies and fugues.

On 31 August 1856, he played the organ part in the premiere of Liszt's « Missa solennis zur Einweihung der Basilika in Gran » (Gran Mass) , at the inauguration of Esztergom Basilica, conducted by the composer, in the presence of Emperor Franz-Josef I of Austria and his Viennese Court.

Winterberger arranged for the organ Liszt's 1859 Prelude on Bach's Cantata « Weinen, Klagen, Sorgen, Zagen » , originally written for piano.

He went to Vienna in 1861 and, in 1869, to Saint-Petersburg, where he succeeded A. Dreyschock as piano professor at the Conservatory. In 1872, he took-up his residence permanently in Leipzig.

In 1886-1887, he compiled and published 12 volumes of technical exercises composed by Liszt. Winterberger edited the Piano Sonatas by Ludwig van Beethoven, with preface and annotations, Edition « Musikwoche » printed in Leipzig (« Bibliographische Anstalt Adolph Schumann ») .

Alexander Winterberger's photographic portrait by Sergey Lvovich Levitsky is housed at the State Piotr Ilich Tchaïkovsky Memorial Museum in Klin, Russia.

Winterberger's own compositions are interesting and original and include music for piano and organ, songs and duets :

Alinen-Tänze. Walzer, Mazurken und Menuetten für Pianoforte (1873) .

Ave Maria und Pater Noster für gemischtem Chor a capella (1874) .

Bergstimme. Romanze von Heinrich Heine, und Schottische Ballade von Friedrich Martin von Bodenstedt für eine Singstimme mit Begleitung (1875) .

2 Idyllen für Pianoforte (1875) .

3 Klavierstücke : Albumblatt, Treulos, Entschluss (1875) .

Salon-Étude und Valse-Caprice für Pianoforte (1875) .

Wie Gott es will, Glaube, und Vater unser für eine Singstimme mit Begleitung des Pianoforte (1875) .

4 geistliche Gesänge für eine Singstimme mit Begleitung des Pianoforte (1876) .

Volks-Poesien für eine oder zwei Singstimmen mit Begleitung des Pianoforte, Opus 43 (1876) .

Die Kapelle-Gedicht von Uhland (begins : « Droben stehet die Kapelle ») für eine Alt- oder Bassstimme mit Begleitung (1876) .

Concert-Adagio. Fantasiestück für Pianoforte (1877) .

5 Slavische Volkspoesien (ins Deutsche übertragen von Josef Wenzig) für zwei Frauenstimmen mit Begleitung des Pianoforte (1877) .

6 Slavische Volkspoesien (deutsche Uebersetzung von Josef Wenzig) für zwei Frauenstimmen mit Begleitung des Pianoforte (1877) .

24 Instructive charakteristische Clavierstückchen für ... Anfänger (1878) .

5 Slavische Volkspoesien (ins Deutsche übertragen von Josef Wenzig) , für zwei Frauenstimmen mit Begleitung des ... (1878) .

Scherzo und Trauer-Marsch für Pianoforte (1879) .

Dainos. Littauische Volkslieder übersetzt von Georg Heinrich Ferdinand Nesselmann, für zwei Frauenstimmen mit Begleitung des Pianoforte (1881) .

2 Valses pour piano, Opus 80 (1883) .

2 Valses pour piano, Opus 84 (1883) .

2 Romanzen für Pianoforte, Opus 90 (1883) .

2 Sonatinen für Pianoforte, Opus 93 (1885) .

Lieder für Singstimme und Klavier (oder Orgel, oder Harmonium) , Opus 58 ; text : Julius Sturm.

Dreissig Lieder und Gesänge, Opus 91.

9 leichte Sonatinen für Pianoforte, Opus 104.

5 Geistliche Gesänge für Singstimme und Klavier (oder Orgel, oder Harmonium) , Opus 119 ; text : Johann Friedrich Räder.

29 décembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner est choisi pour donner le récital d'orgue inaugural du « Neue Gewandhaus » (édition de 1884) . L'événement historique se déroule devant un groupe sélect d'amis. Durant sa prestation, il leur demande à plusieurs reprises un thème sur lequel il peut improviser une fugue. Le professeur Alexander Winterberger, présent dans l'auditoire, lui suggère un thème en si mineur. Winterberger était critique musical pour le « Leipziger Nachrichten » . Pianiste et organiste accompli, il fut l'un des Iers élèves de Franz Liszt.

L'orgue, surnommé l' « Opus 432 » , est l'œuvre du facteur E.F. Walcker & Cie. de Ludwigsburg. Il n'a été achevé que quelques jours avant l'ouverture. Le buffet, conçu par Martin Gropius, s'harmonise avec l'architecture de la salle.

Durant la Ire moitié du XXe siècle, les « Thomaskantor » Karl Straube et Günther Ramin démontreront également leur virtuosité sur cet instrument. Il a été détruit (avec le « Konzerthaus ») lors de 2 bombardements alliés : celui de la nuit du 3 au 4 décembre 1943 et celui du 20 février 1944, alors que la toiture s'effondre complètement. Malgré tout, on va réussir à sauver le buste de marbre de Bruckner (le 1er présent en sol allemand) , exécuté en 1931 par le peintre, graveur, sculpteur et poète allemand Fritz Zalisz (né le 17 octobre 1893 à Gera et décédé le 13 décembre 1971 à Holzhausen) . Il s'agit d'une commande du docteur Theodor Armbruster. Il se trouve aujourd'hui en montre au moderne « Gewandhaus » .

30 décembre 1884 : Le lendemain du récital d'orgue inaugural offert par Bruckner, Ire exécution (sans les tubas Wagnériens) , en présence du compositeur, de la 7e Symphonie en mi majeur de Bruckner sous la direction du chef Arthur Nikisch à la tête de l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig. L'événement a lieu exceptionnellement lors d'un concert d'abonnement (« Opern-abonnement ») au Nouveau Théâtre municipal (« Neues Theater ») . Nikisch évite ainsi de présenter l'œuvre devant les habitués, conservateurs et traditionalistes, qui assistent aux concerts d'abonnement du « Gewandhaus » , de manière à minimiser les réactions négatives.

Et ce fut un triomphe ! Les applaudissements durent plus de 15 minutes. Bruckner se voit même remettre 2 immenses couronnes de lauriers.

« In Leipzig, they clap at the end for a quarter of an hour. The papers are glowing with admiration. » (Anton Bruckner)

Il dira à Nikisch :

« Kindly accept the inexpressible thanks which I ought you. My God rewards you for the noble and inspired things you have done for me. »

Following the concert, Johannes Brahms wrote to Elisabeth von Herzogenberg, who had asked for his views on Bruckner's music :

« Everything has its limits. Bruckner lies beyond them, one can't speak of the good or bad points of his music, it's not possible to discuss it at all. Any more than the man himself. He is a poor deranged man, whom the worthy monks of Saint-Florian have on their conscience. »

Pour sa part, les critiques sont partagés. Mais une chose est sûre : il s'agit là du 1er véritable succès d'Anton Bruckner au niveau international. Il est alors âgé de 61 ans.

30 décembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner presse l'éditeur Albert J. Gutmann de publier son Quintette à cordes.

AB 84 : 1885

La correspondance de Bruckner

Anton Bruckner. Sämtliche Werke - Kritische Gesamtausgabe : Briefe 1. (1852-1886) . Edited by Andrea Harrandt, Otto Schneider and Leopold Nowak ; 336 pages. (« Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , Wien 1998 - 25. Januar 2007 : ISBN-13 : 979-0500252672, ASIN : 050025267X.)

Anton Bruckner. Sämtliche Werke - Kritische Gesamtausgabe : Briefe 2. (1887-1896) . Edited by Andrea Harrandt, Otto Schneider and Leopold Nowak, Band 24/2, Volume 24 ; xii, 381 (383) pages. (« Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , Wien 2003 ; ISBN 3-900270-54-6, 9783900270544 - 25. Januar 2007 ; ISBN-13 : 979-0500252344, ASIN: 0500252343.)

This, the 2nd of the 2-volume edition of Bruckner's letters, covers the final 10 years of the composer's life and provides the essential documentary background to the gestation of the 8th and 9th Symphonies (including the incomplete Finale of the latter) , « Psalm 150 » , and « Helgoland » , as well as revisions and / or pre-publication changes made to the 1st, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th Symphonies and the D minor, E minor, and F minor Masses. The format is the same as in the 1st volume, which was published in 1998 (see my review in « Music & Letters » , No. 80, 1999, pages 306-307) . Of the 554 letters published in the 2nd volume, many for the 1st time, 259 were written by Bruckner. The remaining 295 were either written to him or make direct reference to him. In the appendix, there are 6 undated letters as well as 12 letters (from 1855 to 1886) that are addenda to the 1st volume. These include a remarkable letter from the organist Robert Führer to Ignaz P. Traumihler, choir director at Saint-Florian abbey who has been excluded from the preliminary competition for the vacant post of cathedral organist at Linz, in December 1855.

(Crawford Howie. « Music & Letters » , Volume 87, No. 2, Oxford University Press, May 2006 ; pages 332-334.)

...

Anton Bruckner - Sein Leben und seine Werke. Eine Biographie. , Severus Verlag (15.08.2012) .

« Ein Urteil Wagners über mich erfuhr ich neulich erst, worin er sagte : ich sei der einzige, dessen Gedanken bis zu

Beethoven hinaufreichen. Groß ! Meinen Dank und tiefen Respekt. »

Doktor Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) war Komponist, Organist und Musikpädagoge. Auch wenn er erst spät als Komponist anerkannt wurde, leistete er Erstaunliches für die österreichische und die internationale Musikwelt. Briefe Bruckners, handschriftliche Faksimiles und Notenblätter bereichern dieses sensible Portrait des Musikkritikers und Brucknerforschers Franz Gräßlinger.

Einband : Kartoniert / Broschiert, Paperback.

ISBN-13 : 9783863472832 .

Bestell-Nummer : 3103164 .

Umfang : 176 Seiten.

Sonstiges : Mit 11 Bild- und Faksimile-Beilagen.

Auflage : Nachdruck der Originalausgabe von 1921.

Gewicht : 340 g

Maße : 249 x 130 mm

Stärke : 18 mm

...

Paperback : 178 pages.

Publisher : Severus (August 31, 2012) .

Language : German.

ISBN-10 : 3863472837 .

ISBN-13 : 978-3863472832 .

Dimensions : 17 x 1 x 24.4 cm

Weight : 299 g

...

Paperback : 190 pages

Publisher : Nabu Press (26 September 2010)

Language : German.

ISBN-10 : 1173073949 .

ISBN-13 : 978-1173073947 .

Dimensions : 18.9 x 1 x 24.6 cm

Weight : 349 g

...

Franz Gräßlinger. « Anton Bruckner Gesammelte Briefe » , published by Gustav Bosse (1924) .

...

I am a Anton Bruckner music-lover since the early 1970's. Not being able to read German texts, I discovered on your website this Ph.D. Dissertation by Mary E. Hetzel ...

1885-1893 : Selected, translated, and annotated correspondence of Anton Bruckner by Mary E. Hetzel. Ph.D. Dissertation number 15861, 28 centimetres, 304 (608) pages, bounded. Kent State University (2004) .

ABSTRACT - Author has provided translated, transcribed and annotated correspondence (leaves 60-299) . Thesis (Ph.D.) Kent State University (2004) . Includes bibliographical references (leaves 300-304) . ML410.B88 H48 2004 : Microfiche (microform) .

MAIN LIBRARY : On-site Storage (017) - Request Online ; Micro-4 ML410.B88 H48 (2004) ; AVAILABLE.

PERFORMING ARTS LIBRARY, Special Collections, 12th floor : KSU Dissertations and Theses, ML410.B88 H48 (2004) ; LIBRARY USE ONLY, AVAILABLE.

<http://kentlink.kent.edu/search~S1?/cML410.B88+H48+2004/cml++410+b88+h48+2004/-3%2C-1%2C0%2CE/2exact&FF=cml++410+b88+h48+2004&1%2C2%2C>

Kent State University Libraries
1125 Risman Drive
P.O. Box 5190
Kent, Ohio 44242-0001
I (330) 672-3456 / library@kent.edu

Is it possible for a non-student like me to obtain (buy) a copy (paper or PDF) of this work ?

Hi,

Unfortunately, we cannot sell you a copy of this dissertation - the University does not have the right to do that. However, there is a commercial company called ProQuest that does have those rights. They can sell you a copy in one of several formats - price depends on the format.

You can use this link to purchase a copy of that dissertation from ProQuest :

<http://dissexpress.umi.com/dxweb/results.html?QryTxt=&By=&Title=&pubnum=3180719>

An alternative is for us to loan you our copy, but you would have to return it. You will need to work with your local public or academic library to request it. We cannot loan material directly to individuals unless they are directly associated with Kent State University.

I hope this information helps !

Happy Holidays !

Kara

Kara L. Robinson, M.L.S. , J.D.
Head of Reference Services
Kent State University Libraries
(330) 672-1664
Krobinso@kent.edu

Thanks to your precious help, I just bought a PDF format of the dissertation. You are the Savior for Xmas !!!

19 décembre 2014 -

User name.

Password.

https://order.proquest.com/OA_HTML/pqdtibeCCkpOrdReview.jsp

http://media.proquest.com/media/pq/classic/doc/953970011/fmt/ai/rep/SPDF?_s=GrLsmSGGt8afWgnqv%2FcD6XJnrk%3D

Dear ... ,

We are pleased to report that your registration was successful ; your account is active and you may use it for all your future orders of dissertations and theses from ProQuest.

You will continue to search using the same site you usually use.

To access your account, sign in here :

...

Your user name is ...

Please retain a copy of this e-mail for your records.

Thank you,

ProQuest Customer Support.

IMPORTANT : This e-mail is an automated notification, which is unable to receive replies.

For questions or assistance with your account, please contact Customer Support via the web at :

<http://www.proquest.com/go/contactus>

Outside the United States and Canada, see :

<http://www.proquest.com/go/supportdirectory>

...

Dear ... ,

Thank you for your recent order with ProQuest Dissertations & Theses ordering system.

Please retain a copy of this e-mail for your records.

Order Number :

Order Date : 19-DEC-2014

Shipping to :

Delivery method : Standard

Product Number :

Title : SELECTED, TRANSLATED, AND ANNOTATED CORRESPONDENCE OF ANTON BRUCKNER FROM 1885 TO 1893.

Author : HETZEL, MARY E.

Format : PDF

Quantity : 1

Payment Method : *****

Amount : $ 38.00 (US)

Sub Total : $ 38.00 (US)

Shipping and Handling : $ 0.00

Tax (estimated) : $ 1.90 (US)

Total : $ 39.90 (US)

Information about print orders, including delivery information, is available here :

...

If your order includes one or more PDFs, you will receive a separate message with instructions for downloading those.

Your PDF order will remain valid for 72 hours, and we recommend that you download the file immediately.

Thank you,

ProQuest Customer Support.

IMPORTANT : This e-mail is an automated notification, which is unable to receive replies. For questions or assistance with your account, please contact Customer Support via the web at :

<http://support.proquest.com/apex/contactussubmitcase>

...

Your Order ID :

Dear ... ,

Thank you for your recent order through the ProQuest Dissertations & Theses database. Your copy is ready for download.

To download the PDF you ordered, please click on the link shown below.

« Selected, translated, and annotated correspondence of Anton Bruckner from 1885 to 1893 » , by Mary E. Hetzel.

...

This PDF order will remain valid until December 22, 2014 19:36 GMT.

We recommend downloading your file immediately. We will send you a link to any outstanding PDFs in your order as they become available.

If your order has expired and you need it re-activated, please refer to your Order Number and contact Customer Service at :

<http://www.proquest.com/go/contactsupport>

Best Regards,

ProQuest / UMI Dissertations Publishing Customer Service.

P.S. : If you would like to be notified when the latest research in your field is published, please sign-up for an Alert or RSS feed in PQDT. When you retrieve results from a search, simply choose « Set Up Alert » or « Create RSS feed » from the top of the page !

IMPORTANT : This e-mail is an automated notification, which is unable to receive replies. For questions or assistance with your account, please contact Customer Support via the web at :

<http://www.proquest.com/go/contactus>

Outside the United States and Canada, see :

<http://www.proquest.com/go/supportdirectory>

19 décembre 2014 - Good day, Mr. Berky.

Because I cannot read German, I just bought (in PDF format) , via the site ProQuest, the following 2004 Ph.D. Dissertation by author Mary E. Hetzel from Kent State U :

Selected, translated, and annotated correspondence of Anton Bruckner (1885-1893) .

Kent State University Libraries : MAIN LIBRARY : On-site Storage (017) - No. 15861, 28 centimetres, 304 pages, bounded. Request Online ; Micro-4 ML410.B88 H48 (2004) ; AVAILABLE.

Link for acquiring - <http://dissexpress.umi.com/dxweb/results.html?QryTxt=&By=&Title=&pubnum=3180719>

(ProQuest is committed to empowering researchers and librarians around the world. Its innovative information content and technologies increase the productivity of students, scholars, professionals and the libraries that serve them. Through partnerships with content holders, ProQuest preserves rich, vast and varied information (whether historical archives or today's scientific breakthroughs) and packages it with digital technologies that enhance its discovery, sharing and management. For academic, corporate, government, school and public libraries, as well as professional researchers, ProQuest provides services that enable strategic acquisition, management and discovery of information collections.)

Best Regards,

...

Hi Gilles,

Many thanks for this interesting find !

I have announced it on my website :

<https://www.abruckner.com/editorsnote/news/correspondence/>

For your generosity, please feel free to request a CD from me that I can send to you to offset your expense in buying this dissertation and then giving it to me.

Best wishes for the Holidays !

(John)

See it as a little something for Xmas. A generous man of your quality and humanity more than deserves it.

...

Thanks to my colleague Gilles Houle, I have discovered a Doctoral Dissertation by Mary E. Hetzel that translates some of Bruckner's correspondence into English. The 337 page dissertation is available for download. While much of her own writing about Bruckner falls into some of the old theories, the translations are interesting.

Hetzel's claim that Bruckner suffered from Asberger's is thought-provoking, but there is no clinical data that supports this and the practice of attaching ailments to long-dead personalities is a risky business.

Selected, translated, and annotated correspondence of Anton Bruckner from 1885 to 1893 (by Mary E. Hetzel)

A dissertation submitted to the College of Fine and Professional Arts of Kent State University in partial fulfillment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy.

By Mary E. Hetzel

(August, 2004)

UMI Number : 3180719

© 2005 by Mary E. Hetzel

All rights reserved.

UMI ® Microform 3180719.

© 2005 by ProQuest Information and Learning Company.

All rights reserved.

This microform edition is protected against unauthorized copying under Title 17, United States Code.

ProQuest Information and Learning Company
300 North Zeeb Road
P.O. Box 1346
Ann Arbor, MI 48106-1346

Reproduced with permission of the copyright owner. Further reproduction prohibited without permission.

Dissertation written by Mary E. Hetzel.
B.S.Mus. , Hunter College (1960) .
M.Mus. , Hardin-Simmons University (1976) .
Ph.D. , Kent State University (2004) .

Approved by Chair, Doctoral Dissertation Committee, Members of Doctoral Dissertation Committee.

Preface

Among the many elements that comprise the musicologist's world, 3 emerge as the most important ; music, its analysis, and composers' biographical data.

Biographies line the shelves of libraries, but collections of letters are less often found. Systemized, psychologically crucial matter gleaned from the correspondence of any composer is, in fact, rare.

Most of the letters selected for this study were written by (Josef) Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) , from 1885 to 1893. In order to substantiate and clarify the intent of this project, a number of letters from others have been included.

Translations of a few relevant calling cards are here, along with an occasional telegram and Bruckner's Testament.

Background

Born in Ansfelden, Anton Bruckner came from the humblest background in the Upper-Austrian countryside. The elder Anton was the town school Master and organist, placing him 1 degree away from the peasantry. Bruckner's mother sang in the local church choir and, reportedly, had a lovely voice. Bruckner's humble background certainly affected his later opinion of himself ; his religious background would further this self-portrait, as would his psychological and physiological problems.

Bruckner was the eldest of 4 surviving children ; he studied music 1st with his father, then harmony with his cousin and godfather, Johann Baptist Weiß. The life of Weiß ended in tragedy, for he committed suicide due to a scandal. While attending the priest for the last rites of his father, Bruckner fainted. He was just 13 years of age. Bruckner's later preoccupation with death may be traced back to his early childhood, after seeing several of his siblings die in infancy, along with the deaths of his father and godfather.

Due to his mother's intervention, the prior of Saint-Florian Monastery took Bruckner in as a chorister. Although his voice would break after the 1st year, he was allowed to stay on, playing the violin and deputizing at the organ. Bruckner's serious study of music began in 1837 at the monastery.

Even though his gifts were manifest, Bruckner was never confident as a musician in his own right and felt that he could not give himself up completely to musical pursuits ; thus, at age 16, he went to Linz for 1 year to train as a teacher. After graduation, he was assigned to be assistant school Master in the small village of Windhaag, where his supervisor, who was very unsympathetic toward his composing, delegated him even the duty of mucking-out the barn. This did nothing to further his self-esteem, and the whole situation must have added to his depression.

After 15 months, Michaël Arneth, his old mentor from Saint-Florian, came to Windhaag to inspect the school and had Bruckner transferred as assistant school Master in the village of Kronstorf, near Steyr. Although even smaller than Windhaag, Kronstorf is much closer to Saint-Florian and Linz.

In 1845, there was an opening at Saint-Florian, and Bruckner became a teacher there. He went there at the age of 20 and taught there for 10 years. Although secure in habitation and thankful to be there, he nevertheless showed symptoms of depression, even stating that he was alone in his little room, feeling melancholic and poor.

Unfortunately, he had no one with whom to speak freely and openly about his inner life and felt hurt that he was often misunderstood. Bruckner had come to the realization that the monastery was not the place for him to be, although he had once considered the priesthood.

In 1855, Bruckner became organist at Linz Cathedral. He had previously applied for a position at Olomouc but was sharply scolded by the « Stiftsprälat » , Frederick Theophil Mayer (1793-1858) , prior of the foundation of Saint-Florian, because he auditioned.

Always affected by what others said or thought of him, Bruckner must have been abashed by the display of anger directed at him. In addition, Bruckner nearly always bowed to authority, even lesser authority.

When the position of organist at Linz Cathedral became vacant, Bruckner was afraid to audition ; however, friends took him there and he won. At this time, he fulfilled the duties of organist, worked diligently on his organ technique, gave piano lessons in order to support his family, and sang (and later directed) the Liedertafel « Frohsinn » . That same year, Bruckner began to travel to Vienna to study counterpoint privately with Simon Sechter (1788-1867) , who taught theory at the Conservatory ; in reviewing Bruckner's 16 completed books of exercises, Sechter would tell him it was not good for him to work so hard. For a task Master like Sechter to make such a declaration would have been very unusual ; however, Bruckner had spent 7 hours a day for nearly 7 years on strict harmony and counterpoint In 1861, he finished these studies with great praise in the form of a testimonial from Sechter. Due to his insecurity, Bruckner requested a written testimonial. Bruckner had worked diligently and would work just as hard in his further studies. His persistence was evident later when he made many changes to his compositions, although often misguided.

As time passed, Bruckner developed some strange aberrations ; for example, he counted windows in buildings and numbered every measure in his Symphonies. He was curious about what topped a building in Bayreuth, whether it was a cross or a lightning rod ; and he asked why the woman was set on fire in a Wagner music-drama - ail of which are proofs of his having Asperger's Syndrome. He was oddly preoccupied with the death of Maximilian (1832-1867) in Mexico, wanting to know all of the details and viewing the casket several times. He also had a penchant for « falling in love » with very young girls, his intentions being of the highest order as he did not believe in sexual contact outside of the marriage contract. (As Bruckner aged, the young ladies were always the same age.) Of course, these attractions always came to nothing. Having always been of a depressed nature, in addition to his disappointments in love, his tremendous work load, and his dashed hopes of success, Bruckner experienced a breakdown, in 1867, and spent 4 months at the « spa » in Bad Kreuzen in a sanitarium setting.

Bruckner was truly a victim of Asperger's Syndrome. (I)

(I) According to the DSMIV (Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders) , 4th edition (Washington, D.C. - American Psychiatric Association, 2000) , the diagnostic tool used by ail psychiatrists and psychologists, criteria for the syndrome include qualitative impairment in social interaction and restricted repetitive and stereotyped patterns of behavior, interests, and activities, including apparently inflexible adherence to specific, non-functional routines or rituals and persistent preoccupations with parts of objects.

The disturbance causes clinically significant impairment in social, occupational, or other important areas of functioning ; but it does not significantly delay cognitive development. Asperger's Syndrome does not meet the criteria for Schizophrenia but is a pervasive developmental disorder and always includes some degree of autism, although the autism may be a lesser component. Experts in the field agree that Bruckner had Asperger's.

In 1868, Bruckner assumed the responsibilities of professorship at Vienna Conservatory. Although he should have been overwhelmed with joy that the eminent Professor Johann Herbeck (1831-1877) would consider him as the direct successor of Simon Sechter, as always Bruckner was replete with indecision. Faced with having had his Symphonies dubbed nonsense and unplayable by the Vienna Philharmonic, having been rejected as organist for the Imperial Chapel and, again, as lecturer at the University of Vienna, and with consideration of the reduction in income that would result from acceptance, he straggled until summer before accepting the position. Nevertheless, Herbeck was a great persuader. Perhaps, Bruckner might never have accepted at all if he had envisioned the vastly contemptible behavior of many of his fellow professors ; or, perhaps, a more stable person could have ignored the bad behaviors of others. Even so, it must have hurt him deeply when children in the street ran after him making fun of his old-fashioned, provincial clothing and the large handkerchief protruding from a pocket in his short, rather baggy pants. Mercifully, the future was unknown.

The situation became even worse when he declared himself a Wagnerite ; the Viennese critics, namely Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904) , hounded him nearly to the end of his life. In 1885, the Vienna Philharmonic decided to perform Bruckner's 7th Symphony due to the success of the premiere in Leipzig, but Bruckner entreated them not to do so because the Viennese criticism would probably impede his reputation in Germany.

Subsequently, more doubts plagued Bruckner, and he allowed others to change, cut, and publish his works under his name. Concurrently, he began to revise his own works because he was so unsure of himself and often acted according to the thinking of others. Some of those who tinkered with his compositions were greatly annoyed with his wanting to approve every measure that they wanted to change. (Nevertheless, unauthorized changes were made, printed, and performed ; and Bruckner sometimes miscalculated what those whom he trusted were going to do.) He wanted so much for his Symphonies to be heard, but the time spent in these pursuits probably explains why the 9th Symphony is incomplete.

In spite of his accomplishments, and in part due to his failures, Bruckner never outgrew his insecurity. Having Asperger's, along with manifestations of other types of disorders, such as depression, would not allow this. Without the treatment and medications which would be discovered later, Bruckner simply labored on, as an anomaly to some, a puzzle to others, and a complete « Geheimnis » to many more ; but not to those who have discovered his letters and other prose. Bruckner can be known intimately through careful scrutiny of his correspondence.

Having always been concerned about health (his and that of others) , his conditions actually did become worse ; and, in 1891, his health began to deteriorate terminally. He could no longer play the organ, a major blow to a performer who had made a reputation for himself in Austria, France, and England ; and he wrote pitifully about his problem.

The study of Bruckner's correspondence does not replace other biographical material ; on the contrary, it is the long-awaited factor that both clarifies and expands it. Herein lies its true and intrinsic value.

Survey of Literature

In this English translation, I have identified Anton Bruckner, people with whom he worked, his friends and students, his problems, and places of significance. Common knowledge came from « The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » and « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » ; but, because they are not cited anywhere, there are no footnotes concerning them and they are not found in the bibliography. My footnotes contain few complete bibliographical references since all of the letters came from Max Auer's « Gesammelte Briefe » (2) and Franz Gräßlinger's « Gesammelte Briefe » (3) and are mostly identifications of people and places plus my own usually brief commentaries.

(2) Max Auer, editor. « Anton Bruckner : Gesammelte Briefe : Neue Folge » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1924) .

(3) Franz Gräßlinger, editor. « Gesammelte Briefe », Reinhard Piper & Co., Munich (1911) ; Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1924) .

Although these 2 books were just what was needed for this dissertation, they were incomplete as far as what is extant. Auer's book contained most of the letters then known, but Gräßlinger had only a few « new » ones to add, in fact, fewer letters altogether. Since my dissertation deals mostly with the letters in these 2 books, I read the remaining material for further knowledge, sometimes citing other references that pertained to letters in the 2 books mentioned above. The most important of the other books and articles that I consulted can be found in my bibliography. Such authors as Elizabeth Maier, Leopold Nowak, Franz Grasberger, Manfred Wagner, and others will be known to Bruckner scholars, but there will be some surprises.

The Topic

My topic is « Selected Correspondence of Anton Bruckner From the Years 1885 to 1893, in Translation from the Original German ». Such a work has been long in coming and should take its place beside other collections of letters. After this presentation other scholars or students will still find it necessary to collect all of the remaining Bruckner correspondence and publish it 1st in the original German for accuracy. Then, others can translate and arrange all of it in chronological order. The aim should always be for accuracy. One of the letters, with which I worked, had a section missing which I later found imbedded in another letter. (4) I was not so fortunate in most cases.

(4) Andrea Harrandt and Otto Schneider. « Anton Bruckner, Briefe : Band I », Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, Vienna (1998) .

Source Materials

My source materials have been discussed under the heading « Survey of Literature ». However, I would like to add a few materials that were particularly informative and very enjoyable with which to work.

A Masterpiece is Uwe Marten's « Anton Bruckner : Ein Handbuch » (5), which contains pictures and photographs of nearly every place and everyone who came in contact with Bruckner. For deeper understanding of Bruckner, his times, and a wonderful study of the Finale of the 7th Symphony, I would suggest Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw's « Bruckner Studies ». (6) An enjoyable volume to read is Stephen Johnson's « Bruckner Remembered ». (7) Johnson has extracted the personal reminiscences of Bruckner's contemporaries. Before each, Johnson sets the scene historically ; however, such remembrances are always questionable.

(5) Uwe Harten, Renate Grasberger. « Anton Bruckner : Ein Handbuch », Residenz Verlag, Salzburg (1996) ; 544 pages.

(6) Timothy L. Jackson and Paul Hawkshaw. « Bruckner Studies », Cambridge University Press, Cambridge (1997) .

(7) Stephen Johnson. « Bruckner Remembered », Faber and Faber, Boston (1988) .

A worthwhile book, indeed, is Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt's « Bruckner : Symphony No. 8 » , (8) although it does not reveal its virtues after a single reading. The analytical details are all there « en masse » .

(8) Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt. « Bruckner : Symphony No. 8 » , Cambridge University Press, Cambridge (2000) .

Methodology

The 1st step in my method was to use Ohio Link and then USA Link for needed books. After I chose the specific Bruckner correspondence to be used, I then translated all of it from the original German and began to search for qualities in Bruckner's make-up that would explain his behaviors and reveal his inner being. This work would then add to the knowledge of his music and his biography.

There was little editing to do because Bruckner wrote well and was able to express himself in extraordinarily clear language. « Reading between the lines » was not so easy. Every allusion had to be checked in other sources or stated as the result of a hard-won conclusion. Of course, obsolete formations and idioms were difficult but not impossible to find.

Bruckner is a difficult and complicated figure. His letters, cards, and testament show us that he was not merely a country bumpkin but an educated person who thought logically when his emotional problems were not controlling his thinking patterns. Though not an easy subject, Bruckner had many qualities that all readers might envy, but also many that kept him in the shadows of success.

Acknowledgments

1st of all, I must thank all of those who have helped and encouraged me during a decade of illnesses. Members of the University faculty and staff have been very considerate and kind.

I would like to thank my advisor, Theodore Albrecht, Kent State University, for his expertise in guiding me toward the completion of this dissertation. Doctor Albrecht spent many hours with my manuscript, and his patience is nearly limitless.

In addition, I want to thank Irwin J. Shirley, Ph.D. , University Hospital, Cleveland, for encouragement, understanding, and the use of his library.

My gratitude to Jan N. Dittmer, Dolly A. Löwe, Diana J. Richardson, and Ronald L. Wittmaack for computer directions from the Help Desk, in the Main Library. I send my thanks to Christina M. McVay, my German tutor ; and thanks, also, to Rosalee M. Voitz for her assistance in proof-reading 75 letters and all of Chapter I. Deepest gratitude to Joan Stenger, Church Secretary at the Church in Silver Lake, for her profusion of common sense and logic.

Special thanks to my daughters Ann M. Santelli (of Sacramento) and Elizabeth M. Cam (of Canton) for their faith in my determination to finish this project.

My inexpressible gratitude to Klaus Beer, who worked with me to realize the final copy of the work.

Last of all, my thanks to those who guided me toward the finding of books, maps, photographs, and other materials necessary for an extended paper.

(Photo) « To the Great Master Anton Bruckner in Thankful Admiration and ... Remembrance. Siegfried Ochs. »

(Photo) « To the Great Symphonist Anton Bruckner from his grateful interpreter. Doctor Karl Muck. » (Graz, March 16, 1886.)

Bibliography

Walter Abendroth. « Bruckner : Eine Bibliographie » , Kindler Verlag, Munich (1958) .

Konrad Amein and Hans Schnoor. « Deutsche Musiker : Briefe, Berichte, Urkunden » , Vanderhoeck & Ruprecht, Gottingen (1956) .

Max Auer, editor. « Anton Bruckner : Gesammelte Briefe : Neue Folge » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1924) .

Max Auer. « Eine unveröffentlichter Brief Anton Bruckners » , (Neue) Zeitschrift für Musik, Nr. 108 (1951) ; page 21.

Marta Becker. « Zwei unveröffentlichte Bruckner-Briefe » , Allgemeine Musikzeitung Nr. 67 (1940) ; pages 410-414.

Otto Brechler. « Bruckner-Briefe der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek » , Phaidros Nr. I (1947) ; pages 10-36.

Renate Bronnen. « Die Weissgärber-Geschwister : Ein Kapitel aus dem Leben Anton Bruckners » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1984-1985-1986, edited by Othmar Wessely, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1988) ; pages 27-52.

Gabriel Dusinsky. « Anton Bruckner und die Aufführung seiner Siebenten Symphonie 1890 in Pressburg » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1981, edited by Franz Grasberger, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1982) ; pages 153-158.

Hellmut Federhofer. « Anton Bruckner in Briefwechsel von August Halm (1869-1929) - Heinrich Schenker (1868-1935) » , in : Anton Bruckner : Studien zu Werk und Wirkung Walter Wiora zum 30. Dezember 1986, edited by Christoph-Hellmut Mahling, Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1988) ; pages 33-40.

Hans Conrad Fischer. « Anton Bruckner : Sein Leben » , Residenz Verlag, Salzburg (1974) .

Rudolf Flotzinger. « Brahms als Briefschreiber » , in : Bruckner Symposion Bericht : Johannes Brahms und Anton Bruckner, edited by Othmar Wessely, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1985) ; pages 45-52.

August Göllerich and Max Auer (Ergänzer und Herausgeber) . « Anton Bruckner : Sein Lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » , Band IV, 2. Teil, Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1926) .

Franz Gräßlinger, editor. « Anton Bruckner : Bausteine zu Seiner Lebensgeschichte » , Reinhard Piper & Co. , Munich (1911) .

Franz Gräßlinger. « Ein Unbekannter Bruckner-Brief » , (Neue) Zeitschrift für Musik Nr. 84 (1917) ; pages 34-43.

Franz Gräßlinger. « Anton Bruckner : Gesammelte Briefe » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1924) .

Franz Gräßlinger. « Unbekannte Bruckner-Dokumente » , Neue-Musik Zeitung Nr. 46 (1925) ; pages 413-416.

Franz Gräßlinger. « Vier unveröffentlichte Briefe Anton Bruckners. Aus dem Kampf des Meisters um die Anerkennung der Welt » , Neues Wiener Tageblatt - Neue Freie Presse Nr. 29 (January 1939) ; page 12.

Franz Gräßlinger. « Unbekannte Bruckner-Briefe : Bruckner an Hans Puchstein » , Allgemeine Musikzeitung Nr. 66 (1939) ; pages 20-22.

Franz Grasberger. « Anton Bruckner zum 150. Geburtstag : Fine Ausstellung im Prunksaal der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek - 29. Mai bis 12. Oktober 1974 » , Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1975) .

Andrea Haarandt and Otto Schneider. « Anton Bruckner, Sämtliche Werke » , Band 24/1 : Briefe, Band I (1852-1886) , Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft, Vienna (1998) .

F. Hamel. « Am Rande der Musikgeschichte » , Musica Nr. 7 (1953) ; pages 207-210.

Uwe Harten. « Anton Bruckner : Ein Handbuch » , Residenz Verlag, Vienna (1996) .

« International Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , Mitteilungsblätter Nr. 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 34, 36, 37, and 39, Vienna (1970-2004) .

Wilhelm Jerger. « Briefe an die Philharmoniker » , Wiener Verlagsgesellschaft, Vienna (1942) .

Wilhelm Jerger. « Hochlöbliche, Hochverehrte philharmonische Gesellschaft - Die Briefe Anton Bruckners an die Wiener Philharmoniker nebst einem unbekanntem Brief an August Göllerich, senior » , Oberösterreichische Heimatblätter Nr. 28 (1974) ; pages 8-10.

Rolf Keller. « Die letztwilligen Verfügungen Anton Bruckners » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1982-1983, edited by Othmar Wessely, Anton Bruckner Institut, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft (1984) ; pages 56-62.

Rolf Keller. « Anton Bruckner und die Familie Albrecht » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1984-1985-1986, edited by Othmar Wessely, Anton Bruckner Institut, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1988) ; pages 53-56.

Rudolf Klein. « Anton Bruckner und Gottfried von Einem » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1981, edited by Franz Grasberger, Anton Bruckner Institute, Linz (1982) ; pages 103-106.

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt. « Bruckner: Symphony No. 8 » , Cambridge University Press (2000) .

Robert Lach. « Die Bruckner-Akten des Wiener Universitäts-Archives, edited by Strache Verlag, Vienna (1926) .

Felix von Lepel, editor. « Zehn Briefe von Anton Bruckner » , Bote & Bach Verlag, Berlin (1953) .

Steffen Lieberwirth, editor. « Anton Bruckner und Leipzig : Die Jahre 1884-1902 » , Akademische Druck- und Verlagsanstalt, Graz (1988) .

Rudolf Louis. « Anton Bruckner » , Georg Müller, Munich (1905) .

Rudolf Louis. « Anton Bruckner » , 3rd Edition, Georg Müller, Munich (1918) .

Elisabeth Maier. « Anton Bruckners “ Gesangs-Akademie ”. Zum biographischen Umfeld eines bisher unbekanntes Dokumentes » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1982-1983, edited by Othmar Wessely, Anton Bruckner Institut : Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1984) ; pages 56-60.

Josef Mayr-Kem. « Bruckners oberösterreichische Lehrer » , in : Bruckner Symposion : Anton Bruckner als Schueler und Lehrer, edited by Elisabeth Maier, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, Vienna (1976) ; pages 40-45.

Josef Mayr-Kem. « Probleme um das authentische Brucknerbild » , in : Anton Bruckner in Lehre und Forschung : Symposion zu Bruckners 150. Geburtstag, Linz an der Donau (September 1974) , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1976) ; pages 59-72.

Walter Robert Muckenschnabel. « Schweigende Zeugen im Schriftbild Anton Bruckners » , in : Bruckner Symposion Bericht, edited by Franz Grasberger. Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1978) ; pages 49-62.

Gertrude Norman and Miriam Lubell Shrifte. « Letters of Composers » , George Henschel, New York (1907) .

Leopold Nowak. « Die Bruckner-Ausstellung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek » , Phaidros Nr. I (1947) , edited by Franz Grasberger ; pages 39-44. Heinrich Bauer Verlag, Vienna (1947) ; pages 39-44.

Leopold Nowak. « Anton Bruckner : Musik und Leben » , Österreichischer Bundesverlag, Vienna (1964) .

Leopold Nowak. « Zu Anton Bruckners 70. Todestag (11 Oktober 1966) » , Österreichische Musikzeitschrift Nr. 21 (1966) ; pages 526-531.

Leopold Nowak. « Anton Bruckner : Musik und Leben » , Rudolf Trauner Verlag, Linz (1973) .

Alfred Orel. « Bruckner Brevier : Briefe, Dokumente, Berichte » , Verlag Paul Kaltschmid, Vienna (1953) .

Franz Xaver Osterrieder. « Bruckneriana im Nachlaß Anton Hagers » , (Neue) Zeitschrift für Musik Nr. 99 (October 1932) ; pages 882.

Milan Postolka. « Musikerbriefe in der Musikabteilung des Nationalmuseums in Prag » , in : Beiträge zur Musikdokumentation : Franz Grasberger zum 60. Geburtstag, edited by Günter Brosche, Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1975) ; pages 56-59.

Peter Raabe. « Wege zu Bruckner » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1944) .

Franz Scheder. « Zur Datierung von Bruckners Brief an Wolzogen » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1984-1985-1986, edited by Othmar Wessely, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1988) ; pages 65-68.

Franz Scheder. « Zur Datierung zweier Autographen Anton Bruckners » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch : 1987-1988, edited by Othmar Wessely et al. , Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1990) ; pages 63-65.

Otto Schneider. « Anton Bruckners Briefe an die Wiener Philharmoniker » , Österreichische Musikzeitschrift Nr. 29 (1974) ; pages 183-188.

Jiri Senhal. « Ein Brief Anton Bruckners an den mährischen Orgelbauer Franz Ritter von Pistrick » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch : 1980, edited by Franz Grasberger, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1980) ; pages 129-132.

Martin Spanjaard. « De Symphonie van Anton Bruckner » , L. J. C. Boucher, La Haye (1934) .

Mario Tipaldo. « Lettere inedite di Anton Bruckner » , Il Giorno d'Italia (3 February 1939) ; page 3.

Hermann Ullrich. « Ein unbekannter Brief Anton Bruckners : Episoden des Meisters um Anerkennung » , Erbe und Zukunft (October - December 1946) ; pages 47-48 - Österreichische Musikzeitschrift Nr. 8 (1953) ; pages 371-375.

Egon Voss. « Wagner und Bruckner : Ihre persönlichen Beziehungen anhand der überlieferten Zeugnisse (mit einer Dokumentation der wichtigsten Quellen) » , in : Anton Bruckner : Studien zu Werk und Wirkung Walter Wiora zum 30.

Dezember 1986, edited by Christoph-Hellmut Mahling, Hans Schneider, Tutzing (1988) ; pages 189-218.

Manfred Wagner. « Bruckner » , Bernhard Schott Söhne, Mainz (1983) .

Karl Wendl. « Ein Unbekannter Bruckner Brief » , Neue Musik-Zeitung Nr. 46 (1925) ; page 25.

Karl Wendl. « Ein unbekannter Freundesbrief aus Anton Bruckners Jugendzeit » , Die Musik Nr. 29-9 (June 1937) ; page 531.

Othmar Wessely, editor. « Bruckner-Studien : Festgabe der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften zum 150. Geburtstag von Anton Bruckner » , Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Vienna (1975) .

Othmar Wessely. « Anton Bruckner als Briefschreiber » , in : Bruckner Symposium Johannes Brahms und Bruckner, edited by Othmar Wessely, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1985) ; pages 81-86.

Franz Zamazal. « Ein Beitrag zur Familiengeschichte. Ausgehend von einer Episode aus dem Leben des Vaters Bruckners » , in : Bruckner Jahrbuch 1982-1983, edited by Othmar Wessely, Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft, Linz (1984) ; pages 177-128.

Chapter I - Bruckner's Correspondence and its implications

The outstanding quality that illumines Bruckner's letters is graciousness. Nearly every one of his letters, even those written when he was discouraged or depressed, still displays the quality which appears to be 2nd nature to him.

In a brief « thank you » letter to Theodor Helm, around 1891, Bruckner begins :

« Highly-Honoured Doctor ! » (1)

(1) No. 127, in this collection (by Mary E. Hetzel) .

In a letter to Siegfried Ochs dated June 26, 1891, Bruckner addresses Ochs as :

« Wonderful Conductor ! » (2)

(2) No. 159, in this collection.

On August 2, 1892, and October 31, 1891, Bruckner's salutations read :

« Most Venerable, Most Noble Friend ! » (3)

(3) No. 186, in this collection.

and, « Noble, Beloved Brother in Art and War ! » (4)

(4) No. 164, in this collection.

The 1st letter is to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol at Kremsmünster, a young priest whom he greatly admired ; the 2nd, to August Göllerich, his friend and biographer. Of course, these salutations reflect the conceits of the day, but each is flavoured with Bruckner's special caring and graciousness toward his friends.

Bruckner was always grateful for any kindness shown to him, so his graciousness flowed over into many « thank you » letters.

In the letter of June 7, 1885, to conductor Felix Mottl, Bruckner wrote :

« Accept my heartfelt thanks with the greatest admiration stemming from the innermost part of my soul, in loving kindness and friendship toward you. Never will I forget that ! I request that you, just such a great artist, remain always, my old young friend and brother ! May your ingenious art be, also forever and ever, always the benefactor of my works ! May God's will be done ! Again, from my entire soul which thanks you, I remain ... » (5)

(5) No. 29, in this collection.

Even allowing for writing style, one can see that Bruckner's kindness and his caring nature are always present. He wrote to Arthur Nikisch on New Year's Day, 1887, thanking him for his great artistic kindness :

« With the most sincere wish that God may preserve your irreplaceable health, to the renown of German musical art. I kiss the hand of your gracious wife, and I also wish her everything good ! Forever and forever, I ask that you give a kiss to your dear son in place of my own that I shall never have. To Bernard Vogel, again, my sincerest thanks, etc. My leave-taking from you in Bayreuth was very difficult for me. A fond farewell !!! » (6)

(6) No. 74, in this collection.

On January 4, 1887, a letter to Elizabeth Kietz reads :

« To your “ Herr ” Papa, my deepest respect. For you, I send my thanks from the bottom of my heart ; and I kiss your very gracious and benevolent hand. » (7)

(7) No. 75, in this collection.

Bruckner never disregarded or forgot anyone who did anything for him no matter how small or how large the favour, as evinced by his letter of June 2, 1887, to Theodor Helm :

« Thank you sincerely for your kind letter ! »

He stated :

« I cannot deny that I felt genuine pain at that time ! » (8)

(8) No. 85, in this collection.

Because Bruckner was very sensitive to the opinions of critics and musicians, he was especially depressed by the fact that conductor Hans von Bülow disliked his work.

To the wife of Baron von Mayfeld, on January 30, 1888, Bruckner wrote :

« Thank you from the bottom of my heart for your graciousness, as well as that of your husband, the Government Councillor. » (9)

(9) No. 92, in this collection.

Baron Moritz and Baroness Betty von Mayfeld were friends of Bruckner ; he often visited with them at Schwamenstadt, and this letter may well refer to one of those occasions. Nevertheless, they showed him so many kindnesses that it is impossible to be certain, for the letter also contains a number of details about forthcoming performances of his Symphonies.

The letter of January 1, 1889, is to Baron Hans von Wolzogen and includes these sentiments :

« From the fullness of my soul, I shout to my noblest patron, especially today at the beginning of the New Year :

“ 3 Cheers ” !

May God bless you, Baron, and be a generous benefactor to you for all the proven good that you do ! » (10)

(10) No. 102 in this collection.

It is not surprising that Bruckner would write to von Wolzogen with such enthusiasm because the Baron was a true friend to Bruckner. As a writer on music, as well as a Bruckner enthusiast and friend, von Wolzogen was in a position to help Bruckner both critically and financially. However, it is evident from extant sources that they would have been friends in any event ; Bruckner was appreciative and loyal to his friends and family, even those who were not interested in Classical music.

One of the few letters, which is not centered around a « thank you » , is dated December 12, 1890, and was written to Hans Puchstein :

« I must beg greatly for your acceptance of my apology for being prevented from meeting with you, on Wednesday evening, which I had not realized is Christmas Eve. I beg you whole heartedly for another evening of your choice when I can be of service, which will make me very happy. » (11)

(11) No. 122, in this collection.

Puchstein was a music reviewer in Vienna, and Bruckner was extremely pleased about the meeting. Because Bruckner was sometimes absent-minded, he apologized for his error ; however, he may have been doubly embarrassed, for Puchstein was also one of his patrons. Bruckner's gracious nature would have warranted the apology in any case.

This is revealed in an undated letter from around 1891 :

« Most kindly, permit me to send you 2 issues of the “ Weltblatte ” - very interesting ! May I not look forward to seeing my noble patron again soon ? The 2nd performance of the D minor was splendid, wasn't it ? In Graz, the 4th with jubilation - and encore. » (12)

(12) No. 128, in this collection.

About the same time, Bruckner left a « Calling-Card » for August Göllerich :

« Anton Bruckner gives you heartfelt thanks for everything !

Please accept my excuse for Saturday ! Saturdays are never free ; Monday, at the “ Weingartner ” (next to the “ Theater an der Wein ”) . » (13)

(13) No. 126, in this collection.

This message would certainly have been easier to convey than the last. Göllerich was Bruckner's close friend and biographer, by choice, and would have known him as well as or better than any other person, with the possible exception of Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol.

On June 26, 1891, Bruckner wrote the following to Siegfried Ochs :

« Above all, and once more, in the deepest feeling of my heart, my thanks for the highly-brilliant rendering of my “ Te Deum ”, as well as for the excellent effort put forth toward the thorough learning of the work, which resulted in a never-before achieved level.

Also, for my masterful, dearest beloved choir, I ask you very much to give members my sincerest thanks and heartfelt greetings.

Still today, I hear the “ fff ” of the “ Tu Rex Gloriæ ”, etc.

Nevermore, will I hear my work performed like that. » (14)

(14) No. 159, in this collection.

Bruckner continues by saying that he and his Symphonies will continue to be greatly admired due to the genius of « Herr » Ochs, as displayed in the performance. Although, wishful thinking can be noted on the part of Bruckner, Ochs was a renowned choral conductor who gave the 1st Berlin performance of the « Te Deum » , and who was particularly celebrated for his performances of the Bach « Saint-Matthew Passion » . Hearing his own work done so well must have been extremely electrifying for Bruckner, and he wanted to impart both his appreciation and his realization of the elegance of the performance.

Bruckner again wrote to August Göllerich on October 31, 1891 :

« I thank you and everyone who so troubled themselves to secure the arrival of the “ Romantic ” Symphony (No. 4) with my whole heart ; and I congratulate you in particular, you noble hero of the battle won ! Once again, thanks and a brother-kiss from your Bruckner. » (15)

(15) No. 164, in this collection.

On December 5 of the same year, Bruckner again wrote to Göllerich :

« Dearest Beloved “ Herr ” Colleague !

To see you or simply to be able to be near you is for me indescribable joy and delight ! Accordingly, away with diabolical influences, at present, and in all time to come. You know my way of thinking now, and have for such a long time. You also know my character.

Lies - suspicion - dissension are the weapons of my enemies ! But you have mercy upon me, you, my noble friend, so extensive a journey to travel as far as here !!!

I entrust everything to you : even more details when you are here. » (16)

(16) No. 169, in this collection.

Göllerich did agree to visit with Bruckner. No doubt they discussed details about the biography Göllerich was to write. The depth of Bruckner's Platonic love for this man is apparent.

The letter of October 18, 1892, is to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol, a young priest at Saint-Florian :

« Most Venerable, Most Noble Friend !

On this occasion, I am sending you the hymn for the holy Mass of my dear, young friends, whom I salute very sincerely.

I permit myself to send along my favourite " Tantum Ergo ", composed in 1868. I thank Right Reverend Georg for everything, and I will advise the Director of these small matters. To Professor Romauld, everything beautiful. To His Grace, Father Prior, and all of the venerable gentlemen of the monastery, my respect ! and thanks !!

May these lines find you in further progression toward your recovery ! With most heartfelt greetings. » (17)

(17) No. 194, in this collection.

Although it is common courtesy to send friends get-well wishes, Bruckner's concern about his health and that of everyone else was always at the core of his thinking. Nevertheless, his gratitude and true regard for Father Loidol, whose life was comparatively short, are certainly the greater impetus of the letter.

On June 1, of the same year, Bruckner had informed Father Loidol that :

« The heat is intensive ! Everyone is fleeing from Vienna. But I must thank Your Grace most deeply - as much as it pains me (because I would with pleasure be in Kremsmünster) - on behalf of your invitation honoring me so. My feet, particularly the right, are swollen so much that I am able to walk only ponderously and cannot play the organ at all. Please be informed, Your Grace, of my deepest respect and thanks ; perhaps Your Grace would permit me to pay a visit some time later. Please remember me to the Reverend Chapter, especially Professor Romauld. Heartfelt greetings. » (18)

(18) No. 182 in this collection.

Again to Father Loidol, on August 2 :

« To my sadness, I heard that you, the Right Reverend Father, are still sick. I want most sincerely to beg God that He, through His divine goodness, take away this difficult affliction, and grant you the best of health ! I am in Steyr, likewise a patient.

Repeating my most heartfelt wish, I ask again that you allow me to know how you are.

Your admiring, warmest friend. » (19)

(19) No. 186 in this collection.

At this time, Bruckner was himself quite ill with liver and stomach ailments and persistently swollen feet. He and Father Loidol had a friendship that defied age and time, so it is not surprising that Bruckner, though sick himself, would write a consoling letter which included his prayer for Father Loidol's recovery. It was not to be so, for Father Loidol died the next year.

Related to graciousness is the quality of consideration of others, which also displays Bruckner's deep feelings for them. Though very humble and usually unable to speak highly of himself or his work, he was indescribably pleased that August Göllerich was writing his biography. Even so, on September 20, 1885, Bruckner again put another person ahead of his own wishes :

« Dear Friend ! I think that the biography can wait ; you ought not to undertake expense on its behalf. » (20)

(20) No. 37, in this collection.

On September 20, 1885, Bruckner would have been thinking of his schedule at the Conservatory ; and he knew that he would have little time to spend with Göllerich ; but there is still that flavour of wanting to insure the welfare of another, in this case, Göllerich (and, in particular, his finances) .

When the mother of Baroness Marie Anna (of Amstetten) died, Bruckner wrote a letter expressing his sympathy, on December 31, 1885 :

« I am so deeply and profoundly moved that it is barely possible for me to arrange words of comfort and condolence. Allow me to say, " Fräulein ", only that I ask God that He grant you the needed strength in this most grievous sorrow
...

May the new year assuage your greatest sorrow.

I send my sincere condolences to ail of the ladies of your noble family. » (21)

(21) No. 43, in this collection.

On April 13, 1886, Bruckner expressed his concern about Wilhelm Floderer's having to work so hard. At that time, « Kapellmeister » Floderer was at the « Linz-Theater » (in 1887, he became also the Choir-Master of the Liedertafel « Frohsinn ») :

« It pains me that you have to labor so hard. » (22)

(22) No. 57, in this collection.

Bruckner was referring to a concert (of his choral works and I Symphonic movement) which was, at the time, in rehearsal and, then, given shortly after his letter.

Even to one of his paid copyists, Leopold Hofmeyer, Bruckner wrote a business letter, on February 2, 1890, containing Bruckner's wish not to take liberties in regard to possible future requests :

« You have written everything wonderfully. Sincere thanks, and I shall look highly upon your splendid copy as a gift from heaven. I will later inconvenience you again, if I may. Enclosed, please find 5 “ Gulden ”. » (23)

(23) No. 108, in this collection.

It is to be expected that Bruckner would write friendly and loving letters to his brother, Ignaz Bruckner ; in addition, on February 3, he demonstrated deep concern :

« How very alarmed I am over your misfortune, you can only imagine. We thank God out of fullest heart that He has saved you so wonderfully. All the same, be really careful about what you eat, and inspect each bite you intend to eat. I congratulate you on your life's being saved ! Please find 10 Florins enclosed. Be careful later about eating smoked meat, and I will be grateful. “ So be really careful ! ” » (24)

(24) No. 109, in this collection.

It appears that Ignaz Bruckner had stomach problems similar to those of Anton. Bruckner mentions that his sister, Rosalie (« Sali ») Hueber, complained of having to pay the doctor so much money for their brother's treatment. Bruckner inquires as to whether or not Ignaz knows anything about this situation, for his inquiries have so far netted no information.

Nevertheless, he sent Ignaz a bit of money anyway. Bruckner always looked to the financial situation of his family members, supporting all of them at one point, as a young teacher giving music lessons in addition to his other duties.

Bruckner's letters prove that he did not forget old friends and that he remembered each with a letter at a special time in that person's life, displaying his gratitude as well.

To Arthur Nikisch, in regard to his forthcoming wedding, he wrote on May 7, 1885 :

« You were my 1st apostle who made known in Germany, with the fullest dignity, my hitherto unknown expression. For that reason, be thanked in all eternity not only by me but also by my true friends. May God repay you for it !!!

Therefore, it is only natural that I take the liveliest interest in the events in your life. The greatest joyfulness now is your wedding. Take along my deepest-felt, most sincere congratulations !

God bless your marriage ! and permit you to enjoy this great good fortune in the best good health until the profoundest old age, arrayed with the 1st musical honors !

I offer your gracious young lady my congratulations and a kiss on the hand. » (25)

(25) No. 34, in this collection.

Although this rhetoric would be unfashionable today, it displays clearly the sincere regard and gratitude that Bruckner felt toward the most influential conductor of his day.

The next letter was written recently after the death of the brother of Felix Mottl.

A well-known conductor of the time, Mottl had been a student of Bruckner at the Conservatory. Dated April 29, 1885, the letter is actually a list of performance instructions for the Symphony No. 7 ; but Bruckner did not fail to address the passing of Fritz (Mottl) , cleverly knitting it into the very fabric of the communication :

« I have kept my funeral music especially for the “ Schotten-Kirche ”. Dear old departed Fritz wanted to visit me at Gause's (restaurant) !!! » (26)

(26) No. 22, in this collection.

On June 19, 1885, Bruckner wrote to Theodor Helm :

« To my eminent patron :

“ 3 Cheers ” !

When shall I have the good fortune to say this to you in person ? My Cheers must not be conveyed to you from a distance. » (27)

(27) No. 31, in this collection.

In the 1st paragraph of the letter, Bruckner is asking Helm to clarify some words that he wrote in the « Deutsche Zeitung » in a brilliant article concerning the 1885 music Festival, in Karlsruhe. Bruckner's insecurity is manifesting itself here, for he thinks he has the need to know precisely what the words imply. He also sends his Cheers and desires to convey them in person.

Sometimes, Bruckner would tell old friends of his compositions and their successes. He does so in a letter to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol, in April, 1892 :

« I must set the “ 150th Psalm ” for the “ Musikfest ”, in September. The 8th Symphony will be 1st performed in the Autumn. “ Te Deum ” - pleased enormously in Hamburg ; also in Saint-Louis, in North America.

Sincere greetings from your old friend. » (28)

(28) No. 180, in this collection.

Writing from Vienna, on February 3, 1892, to Siegfried Ochs in Berlin, Bruckner states :

« They also liked my “ Te Deum ” very much, here ; however, would not the Viennese have been astounded to have heard the same work by you and your beloved choir ? I will never again hear it, thus !!! Never, but never again. Thank you, noble friend. Permit me, also, the “ 1st Symphony in C minor ” had great success in the Philharmonic concert. My fondest wish is and will remain eternally this ; that you, yourself, likewise, should conduct my Symphonies. For me, you are a 2nd “ artistic ” father. » (29)

(29) No. 175, in this collection.

This is a great compliment to Siegfried Ochs, for Bruckner loved his own father who died early. Bruckner's childhood memories of his father's tutelage probably elevated the elder Bruckner to the status of an artist, although he was probably only a church musician typical of the time and place. However, emphasis on the word « artistic » and the use of the word father raised Ochs to the highest of all positions in Bruckner's idea of the world and the people in it.

Bruckner remained a very humble person ; and he never wanted to cause his friends any kind of inconvenience or expense, as he stated in his letter of June 17, 1885, to Bernhard Deubler at Saint-Florian :

« Thank you very much for the remembrance and honour to my humble self, and I wish you everything good.

In addition, I rejoice to be able to be at Saint-Florian, where I can engage in composition peacefully. Only one thing weighs me down heavily - having to place the burden of my being there on the praiseworthy monastery. If only I myself could pay for my board, I would be much happier and would be more at ease staying there, because every good has its limits. » (30)

(30) No. 30, in this collection.

On October 13, 1885, Bruckner wrote to the Vienna Philharmonic requesting they not perform his Symphony No. 7. He had been experiencing substantial problems with the music-critics in Vienna, the most influential of all being Eduard Hanslick. Bruckner briefly addressed the circumstances leading to this request :

« Although the project would very much honour and please me, I desire that my most submissive request be approved, that the honourable Committee might, “ for this year ”, pursue another course concerning the performance of my E major Symphony, on grounds which originate solely in connection with the lamentable local situation in relation to the influential criticism which could only inhibit my commencing successes in Germany. » (31)

(31) No. 39, in this collection.

In line with the request for dedication of the 7th Symphony is a desire for a performance of the work. There is actually a total of 3 requests ; and they can be found in a letter written to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, around 1886 :

« In the highest sense of joy, I beg most humbly that Your Majesty be willing to permit me the honour, to accept most graciously the most humble dedication of my 7th Symphony, and to allow me to place the deepest heart-felt thanks most respectfully at the feet of Your Royal Majesty.

Permit me, Your Majesty, to close also with the humblest request ; may it please Your Majesty to allow a performance in the presence of Your Royal Majesty of my most graciously received Symphony. » (32)

(32) No. 46, in this collection.

Bruckner was an extremely religious man, and his humble nature may spring in large part from the teaching that humility is a virtue. This idea was no doubt part of his everyday experience at home, as a young child. In addition, he probably felt that it was necessary for him to be even more humble due to previous rejections and the unfavorable climate in Vienna, in regard to his work. Furthermore, even at the University, he was treated shamefully by the other professors, although his students loved him. Finally, it really was part of the writing style of the time when making a request, as in the following excerpt. Nevertheless, writing style played only a miniscule part in actually clouding the presence of humility in the man.

The letter from December 1, 1885, to the Austrian critic, Theodor Helm, contains the requested sketch of Bruckner's life, but it is the 1st line of the letter that is significant for this study :

« Permit me, your Esteemed Self to be allowed to send you belatedly the enclosed little sketch concerning my humble self. » (33)

(33) No. 31, in this collection.

In 1886, Austrian Emperor Franz-Josef I bestowed upon Bruckner the Franz-Josef Medal making him a knight of the Order of Franz-Josef. It was through the intercession of Princess Amalie of Bavaria that this display of recognition came to Bruckner, and he expressed his feelings of thankfulness in a letter to her, dated July 9, 1886 :

« May Your Royal Highness permit me most graciously to lay at your feet my most humble, thankful feelings for the highest favour which your Royal Highness effected through your highest influence with His Majesty concerning my future artistic endeavors. » (34)

(34) No. 64, in this collection.

According to the way Bruckner thought, and also according to tradition, it followed that Bruckner wished to dedicate one of his Symphonies to the Austrian « Kaiser » Franz-Josef. On March 30, 1890, Bruckner wrote to His Majesty, asking permission to do so :

« The most subserviant undersigned, to whom a few years ago very great fortune became his lot, in receiving the most distinguished, highest sanction of all begs to lay before the same feet, a very humble request :

Will Your Imperial and Royal Apostolic Majesty concede to permit the most reverential dedication to be printed on the title page of the score ? » (35)

(35) No. 111, in this collection.

Bruckner never wanted to inconvenience his friends or anyone in any way ; and he was always grateful for any gesture on his behalf, as he conveyed, in addition to his thanks, to Karl Waldeck, on March 27, 1891 :

« In advance, I thank you very much for your trouble. By this time, I am in Saint-Florian and, on Sunday, will come in good time for the High-Mass.

Please do not be angry over the many inconveniences on my behalf. » (36)

(36) No. 143, in this collection.

Karl Waldeck was a former student and had become « Kapellmeister » in Linz, in 1890. On Easter Sunday, Bruckner was to play for High-Mass at the Cathedral in Linz, but there were complications in the arrangements. Bruckner felt compelled to apologize for them and to assure his friend that he felt sorry about them. On March 7, 1892, Bruckner wrote to Bernhard Deubler, the Choir Director at Saint-Florian concerning one of his compositions :

« I am allowing myself to send you my “ Vexilla regis ”. I composed it following purely heartfelt urgings. May it find favour. In addition, may it go well for “ Herr ” Aigner and the Boys’ Choir, and may they study it “ very slowly ”. » (37)

(37) No. 176, in this collection.

In this letter, Bruckner's humility is overcome by love for his composition.

There is no record of Deubler's requesting the work, although this may have been the case because the date of the letter is so close to Holy Week, just before Easter. Even so, Bruckner wanted his work to be pleasing to those who would read and perform it and hoped that it would go well with the director.

By trade, Karl (Borromäus) Aigner was a book-keeper for a bank ; but he was also a monastery musician (« Stiftsmusiker ») , and local copyist, an assistant to Bruckner, in charge of the Boys' Choir.

Because the offering was very special, very close to Bruckner's heart, he wanted every detail in this particular music to be addressed ; he, therefore, added the admonition to study the piece very slowly. However, such an instruction is inconsistent with his allowing others to butcher his Symphonies or take liberties with tempi. As discussed later and from general knowledge of his procedures, inconsistency was just another feature of his insecurity.

The « very-slowly » thought may have come partially from his experiences as a choir boy. Sight reading is done only once. No one can concentrate on one topic for long periods of time without having some thoughts come into his or her mind, as proven by modern psychological studies. This is often doubly true with young boys, even those who know mental discipline. Bruckner was writing about a rehearsal tempo but inferring a need for much practice so that performing correctly would be almost automatic, including the necessities of singing the exact words and notes, remembering artistic interpretation, and following the director. After all, he himself had been a member of the Boys' Choir.

Bruckner possessed a great sense of humor. It does not often appear in his letters, for they were usually written in a serious and formal mode - and, often, he displayed his depression rather than his caprice. Nevertheless, every once in a while, a glimmer comes through ; for example, to Felix Mottl on April 17 and, for a 2nd time, on June 7, 1885 ; on April 17, he wrote :

« Dear Old Young Friend ! This must be Bruckner you say, and right you are ; it is he. Listen : Professor Riedel from Leipzig has offered to present my Adagio from the 7th Symphony. » (38)

(38) No. 18, in this collection.

And on June 7, but a little more seriously :

« I request that you remain always my old, young friend and brother ! » (39)

(39) No. 29, in this collection.

Much later, he wrote to his own brother, Ignaz, on February 3, 1890 :

« Talk has it, in Vienna, that there is a teacher whose name is Anton Bruckner, and he pretends to be my brother. »
(40)

(40) No. 109, in this collection.

When August Göllerich arranged an organ recital for Bruckner in Wels, he began his return letter on March 27, 1891, thus :

« I do not know from where the nice letter of my noble patron and defender came. All the same, Wels will shortly have a joyous time. » (41)

(41) No. 142, in this collection.

Bruckner could be sentimental at times, too ; but this quality rarely appeared in his letters. Having written to Göllerich, a few months earlier, on January 1, 1891, he also approached pathos and humor in the same letter :

« At present, the new D minor Symphony has grown on my heart. Hugo Wolf threw himself around my neck, crying following the concert, which also affected me, and yet, a 3rd musician. Therefore : the weeping trio. » (42)

(42) No. 130, in this collection.

The last sentence, or course, constitutes a pun in German : « der Wein » being the beverage, and « weinen » being the verb, to weep. Bruckner was intelligent, and even clever, but his poor self-esteem, along with his depression, suppressed evidence of the capacity of his intellect, except for his music.

Not being a solitary person by nature, Bruckner found it increasingly difficult to live alone in the world. As a young man residing and working at Saint-Florian, he had felt alone and lonely in his little room. As time progressed, he began to look for a soul mate, a wife. He was, perhaps, the least likely prospect for marriage, but he was not without desires.

As an extremely religious man (he kept a list of the « Ave Maria » and « Pater Noster » prayers that he said each day) , he would never have sought a sexual relationship outside of marriage. Unfortunately, he often fell in love with young women, one after another, and, for the most part, his private students and daughters of his neighbors. His amorous feelings were almost never returned ; and when it seemed that 1 or 2 would be, nothing came from these attachments.

On November 6, 1885, Bruckner wrote to his friend Moritz von Mayfeld about the ladies who pursued him. It was fortunate that he was wise enough to realize that his celebrity-like status was behind their seeming admiration :

« Concerning my marriage, I still have no bride, up to this date ; if only I could find a properly becoming sweetheart

! To be sure, I have many female friends ; for, in recent times, the darlings pursue me extensively, and they think that they have to treat me in an idealistic manner. It's terrible if one is not well !! Entirely forsaken ! A hand-kiss to your gracious lady ! » (43)

(43) No. 41, in this collection.

In 1888, there are 2 letters to a woman identified as « Fräulein M » . She was further identified as « Fräulein Martha » , but none of the source materials gave a clue as to who she really was. No one knows where or how Bruckner met her ; nevertheless, it is obvious from the 2 letters that he was enchanted with her.

The 1st message, dated November 5, 1888, spoke to the fact that Bruckner had lost the treasured letter he had received from her :

« What will you think of me ? I felt indescribably joyful over your dear, sweet letter and put it immediately in my pocket next to my heart, where it was to stay until “ Fräulein Martha ” can come to Linz. Suddenly, I can find my jewel no more.

Therefore, I am using this address. » (44)

(44) No. 98, in this collection.

18 days later, on November 23, he wrote thanking her for her portrait. In those days, one sent one's portrait to another for whom one had the highest regard. The conclusion remains that she did, at least, respect him — and, a little more, he may have hoped ; but who was she ? And did she respond to the 2nd letter ? Obviously, nothing of a significantly Romantic nature came from this encounter. In addition, why did he sign the missive, « Your admiring old friend, Anton Bruckner » ? (45)

(45) No. 100, in this collection.

« I cannot express my great joy at receiving your magnificent portrait. Thank you for it, from the bottom of my heart ! That, being portrayed through this well-done likeness, is not a trivial thing ; you are such a highly-intelligent, splendidly turned-out, beautiful young lady, proclaimed with the most feminine virtues. Whoever knows you can only admire. » (46)

(46) No. 100, in this collection.

Herein lies one of the mysteries surrounding a man who was, by all accounts, completely open, honest, and naive. However, who was Martha, the old friend ?

By 1885, Bruckner had only 2 surviving siblings, Rosalie (Hueber) to whom he often referred as « Sali » , and his brother Ignaz. Bruckner's deep feelings for members of his family do not manifest themselves often in his letters, but he loved them and never forgot them in times of need. This excerpt is from a letter dated March 14, 1889 :

« Please accept my heartfelt sympathy at the deepest, saddest loss of your only daughter ! God give you two-fold strength ! For the departed (our dear niece) , however, eternal peace ! A week ago (Wednesday) , I attended a High-Mass at the “ Schottenkirche ” for the deceased Johanna ; I am sending the enclosed 20 “ Gulden ” to help with the cost of the funeral. Let us pray regularly for the dear one who has gone before us ! (47)

(47) No. 104, in this collection.

Bruckner's intimate feelings are sometimes hidden in his wishes for the good health of everyone, but they are always present. He worried about his own health nearly enough to make himself ill.

In the early 1880's, Bruckner began to be preoccupied with his health and, in general, with that of everyone he knew. Since his breakdown, in 1867, he had never been completely well. In 1883, in wishing everything good to a friend, he wrote that, above all else, was good health, upon which he expounded for the remainder of the paragraph. The same can be seen in one of his longer letters, from around 1884, where he ended with the 2 words :

« Mein Magen ! » (My stomach !)

On February 9, 1885, Bruckner wrote to his brother-in-law, including his sister's name in the salutation ; however, the letter really was to Johann Napomuk Hueber (the husband of « Sali ») . The message is newsy and mostly about the symphonies, but a few other details stand-out :

« Thank you for the letter. Sali, do not send anything. Here is 10 “ Gulden ”. I am well and wish that Sali may also be healthy soon ! » (48)

(48) No. 5, in this collection.

Bruckner was reasonably well and wished to stay so. At times, Rosalie would send her brother packages - parcels of meat, as is apparent in later correspondence. Anton had particular problems with his stomach and could not eat smoked meat, which was the customary method of preserving it ; this was the only type that could be sent to him during this era. Of course, he was concerned about Rosalie's health, too, and wished her a speedy recovery.

Bruckner gave only a glimpse of illness in a letter of November 6, 1885, to Moritz von Mayfeld :

« It's terrible if one is not well ! » (49)

(49) No. 41, in this collection.

In a letter of June 17, 1886, to Elisabeth Kietz, daughter of sculptor Gustav August Kietz, Bruckner wrote :

« May you remain in good health, “ Fräulein ”. » (50)

(50) No. 61, in this collection.

Such a statement could have meant nothing but a politeness for the beginning of a paragraph, which contained other customary refined phrases, but not from Bruckner. The mention of health was just another small reminder that it was at the top of his wish list, right-up there with musical success.

On November 3, 1888, Bruckner communicated with Karl Waldeck, one of his former students and his successor at Linz Cathedral, writing :

« May you receive the sincerest renewal of my deeply felt congratulations on your Name-Day ! Notwithstanding the highly-delightful fruits of your artistic work (for which I heartily congratulate you) , it is your physical well-being, your health, that I desire with my whole being from the all-bountiful heaven.

God grant you many, many healthy years to come. » (51)

(51) No. 97, in this collection.

Bruckner was bereft when his brother almost died in 1890. His message in the letter of February 3, is one of joy at the recovery of Ignaz :

« How very alarmed I am over your misfortune, you can only imagine. We thank God, out of fullest heart, that He has saved you so wonderfully. All the same, be really careful about what you eat, and inspect each bite you intend to eat. “ Frau Kati ” and I congratulate you on your life’s being saved ! Enclosed is 10 “ Florins ”. Be careful later about eating smoked meat, and I will be grateful. So be really careful ! » (52)

(52) No. 109, in this collection.

In June, 1891, Ignaz was ill again. This time, Bruckner wrote to his friend, Bernhard Deubler, on the 14th, asking him to find a new doctor for Ignaz :

« My brother, as he writes me, has been afflicted with influenza for a week.

Might I not request the most venerable “ Herr Professor ” (on my account) to arrange for a replacement and doctor for him, because this insidious disease, when it is neglected, often leaves behind bitter consequences. » (53)

(53) No. 154, in this collection.

It was not odd that Bruckner would write to his friend for this favour, for Ignaz resided in the town of Saint-Florian and was associated with the Monastery. In addition, Bruckner was not asking for himself, and he knew Professor Deubler would be understanding and kind.

On February 19, 1891, Bruckner again requested that no meat be sent to him until fall ; but, this time, the letter was to his brother and openly stated that Bruckner was not well :

« Thank you for the delicious meat. Here is 10 “ Gulden ”. But please, do not send me any more because I have a stomach disorder ; send me meat again only at harvest time. » (54)

(54) No. 139, in this collection.

As ever, Bruckner was gracious and did not refuse further gifts of meat altogether, but only until the new cattle were slaughtered for fresh meat in the autumn.

The stomach disorder, along with a throat disorder, were mentioned in 2 more letters, dated March 17 and March 27, 1891.

To Felix Weingartner, on March 17 :

« Because I have been suffering from throat and stomach disorders for a long time, I was advised to go to the countryside, for a certain time ; and, thus, at the present time, I find myself at Saint-Florian Monastery, in Upper-Austria - one and one-half hours from my birthplace. » (55)

(55) No. 140, in this collection.

The text of this letter reveals that Bruckner had not been feeling well for quite some time. Even so, at this point, he must have received some restorative power merely from being, again at Saint-Florian Monastery, and relatively close to his native Ansfelden.

And to August Göllerich, on March 27 :

« On Easter Sunday, I am playing the organ, in Linz, for the Bishop's Pontifical Mass ; then, I am returning to Saint-Florian where I shall stay through Saturday, in order to take a rest, particularly since I am continually suffering from throat and stomach problems.

I wish you a good holiday, and a good rest ! » (56)

(56) No. 142 in this collection.

Also cited is a letter from June 1, 1892, to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol, at Kremsmünster, in which Bruckner stated his regrets at not being able to accept the invitation to visit the Monastery. All in all, a sad letter. Bruckner could no longer play the organ due to the swelling in his legs, which allowed him to walk only ponderously.

On August 18, a letter to Bernhard Deubler found Bruckner in Steyr :

« I am in Steyr with swollen feet and may not do any organ playing ; on the contrary, I require the “ Karlsbad Cure ”. In September, I must go to Weimar ; they want to perform my new composition, the “ 150th Psalm ”. » (57)

(57) No. 190, in this collection.

On September 6, Bruckner was still residing in Steyr, from which location he wrote to Cyrill Hynais ; this means that he had not left between August 18 and September 6, due to his poor physical condition :

« My feet are better but not yet healthy. » (58)

(58) No. 192, in this collection.

For more than one reason, Bruckner was very much aware that he might not be able to attend a proposed performance of his 4th Symphony. He explained in a letter, dated December 27, written to Otto Kitzler who would conduct :

« Whether I am actually able to come to the performance depends on my constantly precarious state of health ; and the performance of one of my own works always agitates me. Stay very healthy. » (59)

(59) No. 198, in this collection.

Again, Bruckner's preoccupation with physical health is obvious. In his own case, it was truly justified at this point, for he would never fully recover from his maladies. In the case of Kitzler, who was in good health, it was Bruckner's hope that his friend not miss any good part of life, either on the personal or professional level.

For this study, the last letter relating to health is dated January 4, 1893, and was written to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol. Although much younger than Bruckner, Father Loidol would die in this same year. This letter demonstrates Bruckner's grief at the illness, eventually proving fatal, that Father Loidol was experiencing :

« From the bottom of my heart, I beg God above all for your health ! Alas ! if only I knew how to help. » (60)

(60) No. 200, in this collection.

This « communiqué » may have been a telegram ; nevertheless, it clarifies Bruckner's feelings, thus demonstrating that, in the face of his own deteriorating health, he was even yet very much concerned about the welfare of others - especially, one who was a beloved friend.

Bruckner was a man afflicted with self-doubt and insecurity. Even in times of great success, he often followed the inane suggestions of others and sometimes missed wonderful sections of music reviews by dwelling on specific negative details. Being devastated by the opinions of others was one characteristic that Eduard Hanslick discovered and used against Bruckner in the searing criticism which Ist smoked and, then, became incendiary by way of Hanslick's viciousness. Consequently, after Hanslick changed his mind negatively in regard to Bruckner's work, his insecurity became even worse and finally blossomed into the « fleur du mal » of paranoia.

Insecurity and unsuredness are found in profusion in Bruckner's correspondence. Separating them completely out from the matters that caused Bruckner's depression is impossible, but there is a magnitude of examples that can be used to explain instances of both ...

On April 17, 1885, Bruckner wrote to Felix Mottl concerning a rehearsal of the 7th Symphony in Karlsruhe :

« Ist : the Orchestra was not too unfavorably disposed toward me. » (61)

(61) No. 18, in this collection.

« Not too unfavorably disposed » placed Bruckner in a very vulnerable position. This is not merely humility ; this is depression looking for confirmation.

Even today, it is unfortunate if an orchestra has to play something that its members do not like ; however, this happens frequently, and one rehearsal may not be adequate in order to make any kind of judgment, if value judgments are ever justified. At Ist reading, an orchestra will often follow the conductor through a piece, unless the music makes no sense at all to them. However, under unusual circumstances, their likes and dislikes could affect the number of further performances ; but schedules usually remain schedules ; and Bruckner could have avoided worrying at all.

2 paragraphs later, he questions Mottl's enthusiasm and willingness to give his utmost to performances of the Symphony, especially the Adagio movement :

« 3rd : would you be willing to engage your whole artistic being, as Messieurs Levi and Nikisch, in rehearsing and conducting this Adagio with the tubas and the funeral music to the late Master, for your old, former teacher to whom you were always so dear ? Provided that you can fill yourself with enthusiasm for it, you, as highly-celebrated conductor, are the right artist to perform it.

If, my dear Mottl, you tell me this with your German word of honour, then, “ 3 Cheers ” ! The matter is then in order, and I must then send the parts to Leipzig. » (62)

(62) No. 18, in this collection.

These 2 paragraphs illustrate nearly all of Bruckner's problem areas. He was really unaware of normal functioning, in behavior and expression. Bruckner's method of approaching Mottl was certainly a strange one. Mottl was his former student and would obviously give the best performance possible. What conductor would risk damaging his own reputation ? As a friend, Mottl would naturally do everything in his power to heighten the quality of his presentation ; however, such odd requests are not unfamiliar to those who have learned about Asperger's Syndrome. Although the degree of autism, in Bruckner's case, must have been lesser than some, he nevertheless had trouble fitting into a social structure and frequently missed cues and refinements that his era and circumstances demanded. Nevertheless, he made and kept friends, which would not be expected of a person with Asperger's.

One of Bruckner's major failings was his uncertainty in regard to his composing.

Few composers spend as much time as he revising written compositions. Whole Symphonies were re-worked and sometimes cut and patched, often with the good intentions of others (and, perhaps, at their whims, now and then) in the hope of performances, but to the detriment of the music, ruining both the form and its ingenious contrapuntal structure. The only Symphony that may have been improved is the 3rd, and there are 3 versions of that one about which scholars still argue. Even so, Bruckner wanted to leave perfected Symphonies for posterity ; but not nearly all of the revisions can be blamed on those who might be considered his helpers.

In the case of the Mass in E minor, one might ask why revisions were made just because of the death of Bishop Franz-Josef Rüdiger, with a new bishop in place ; naturally, this is very likely the wrong question. As was Bruckner's practice, which became even more radical as time progressed, he felt that changes were necessary. In a letter to Vicar Johann Baptist Burgstaller (the Choir director of Linz New Cathedral - the « Neuen Dom ») , on May 18, 1885, Bruckner reported what he had done :

« The Mass dedicated to the late most venerable Bishop, belongs to the “ Dombau-Verein ”. I have undertaken revisions, and might they now be copied into the parts, since a new Bishop is reigning ? (63)

(63) No. 27, in this collection.

By 1885, Bruckner was famous, for his music was being performed in other European countries, as well as in the New World. Good reviews were important to him, of course ; but having received no news from a Karlsruhe critic, Bruckner assumed the worst and hastily wrote to Felix Mottl on June 7, 1885 :

« Several days ago, I received the most enthusiastic and honourable review from Professor Nohl in Heidelberg, wherein I saw that my success had probably been very good. In vain, I waited always for a message from Doctor Schönaich, - from the “ Karlsruhe Blätter ”, nevertheless in vain ! No doubt, they must have been severe. » (64)

(64) No. 29, in this collection.

Could there not have been an unaccounted-for delay in the delivery of a message from Karlsruhe or a delay in printing the review ? Bruckner's insecurity continued throughout his life. On March 17, 1891, he wrote to Karl Waldeck :

« In advance, I thank you very much for your trouble. By this time, I am at Saint-Florian ; and, on Sunday, will come to the Cannon Restaurant, in good time for the High-Mass.

Please, do not be angry over the many inconveniences on my behalf. » (65)

(65) No. 143, in this collection.

« Please, do not be angry » is more than politeness of writing style. Waldeck was a friend, admirer, and former student. Feeling unworthy describes Bruckner's attitude toward himself. It is possible that Bruckner had his humble beginnings always at the front of his thoughts. Irrational guilt over something small, but perceived as serious ; or one small infringement for which he could not forgive himself, although God could do so, could begin each of his downward spirals. Since a person cannot focus on any one idea for consistently long periods of time, there would have been times of relief when his mood lightened. If he had had a bi-polar II personality with an obsessive / compulsive overlay, then his depression, with mood swings and anxiety, could be very easily understood. Nevertheless, the inherited presence of Asperger's Syndrome, which is a collection of problems, not all of which are present in any victim, and not to the same degree in any 2, was most certainly the culprit.

On August 8, of the same year, Bruckner was residing in Steyr and wrote to Felix Weingartner, in Mannheim :

« Genuine heartfelt thanks for taking part in my being honoured. Nevertheless, I still have no diploma and believe the documents from the ministry and the " Kaiser " will be returned to me after much difficulty. Premature gossip came-out in the " Linzer Volksblatt ". On this occasion, I once more beg your good will, " Herr Hofkapellmeister ", in reference to the performances of my Symphonies.

You have my fullest trust.

I ask please, please. » (66)

(66) No. 160, in this collection.

In this instance, Bruckner was worrying about his diploma, gossip in the local newspaper, and quality in the upcoming performances of his Symphonies. Everyone knew, even in Roman times, how slowly bureaucracies work ; but he thought that he would have more of a problem than anyone else. Gossip was around even before antiquity ; and it always frightened Bruckner, but rightly so. Due to the unfavorable climate in Vienna, his professional reputation had long been assaulted ; unfortunately, his predilection for thinking the worst inevitably caused him undue agony. Finally, he knew Weingartner's reputation and his work and did not need to beg for fine performances. One wonders what Weingartner thought of this letter, in general ; of course, Weingartner knew Bruckner's modus operandi well.

To August Göllerich, Bruckner wrote on October 31, 1891 :

« Forges, in Munich, wrote a year ago :

“ The Finale of the Romantic Symphony is, by far, the weakest movement. I would have liked to pull the themes together, but it was not possible for me to do so successfully. ” - and such chatter.

I request that you chastize this unhappy man ; tell him that it did not occur to me to make all of the themes reconcilable. The same learned man finds this only in the Finale of the 8th. » (67)

(67) No. 164, in this collection.

That Bruckner waited a year to react becomes only one part of the reader's bafflement. Bruckner could have taken care of the matter himself or simply been confident and sophisticated enough to ignore the whole of it. Composers do not explain their work outside of classrooms, friendly gatherings, learned papers, if at all. Most do not even try because it is impossible to explain inspiration.

Bruckner's « not pulling the themes together » was a legitimate procedure if he did not wish to do it, or if it would have affected the composition adversely. His making the statement that it never occurred to him could only serve to open him up to further criticism. That statement was really a blunder. Traditional forms were altered and expanded in Romantic Austro-German music but not altogether abandoned, in order to go in new directions until later.

In conclusion, his biographer Göllerich also knew Bruckner well and could ignore any absurdity that came from him. Göllerich admired Bruckner's work and knew the true goodness which was so much a part of his character.

Bruckner was far too much affected by the opinions of others ; if negative evaluations of his work were the case, he began to feel depressed, then hopeless, then worthless. If positive criticism were his lot, often he was too elated, with flights of « grandeur » invading (Bi-Polar Disorder) ; but sometimes, even in his perception of the goodness of his life and work, there was the hint of a dark cloud lingering just below the sun. Having hoped for fame but being held back frequently by his own indecision, insecurity, and inability to remain objective in the face of success and defeat, he made bad decisions and worse attempts to undo the results. Of course, musical successes and failures were not the only situations which caused him bouts of depression ; he also had to deal with the other phenomena of daily life. His psychological make-up left him unprepared for the ups and downs everyone experiences.

On February 9, 1885, Bruckner wrote to Doctor Rudolf Prohaska who was a board member of the « Linz Musikverein

» :

« I was already in the unpleasant situation, here in Vienna as well as in Graz, of having to decline such honors. I am now even infinitely sorrier to have to say that I must also decline the wishes of the worthy “ Musikverein ” in Linz for the same honour that was meant for me. » (68)

(68) No. 6, in this collection.

Bruckner felt that he had to decline honorary membership in the Music Societies in Vienna, Graz, and Linz, in order to maintain a low-profile. Telling of performances in Munich, Leipzig, Hamburg, and Holland, and the good criticism regarding those that had already taken place, Bruckner sought to protect his successes abroad, as well, by receding into the background in Vienna. His words, « honour that was meant for me » , do indicate that he had some anger toward the situation.

In an obviously depressed mood, Bruckner wrote to August Göllerich on June 24, 1885 :

« Thank you very much for your letter. Unfortunately, I must inform you of the hurt which resulted from the breaking of your word that you were going to write to Doctor Helm. This brings-out a deep hurt in my inner being. As a consequence, Helm wrote no report, and Doctor Schönaich and Mottl did not write anything, either. Indeed, I gave your letter to Doctor Helm, yet, he sent it back to me unopened. Accept, once again, the assurance of my deepest hurt that people of importance will receive no report from my friends. » (69)

(69) No. 33, in this collection.

In this letter, Bruckner proposed that he was hurt, and then repeated the thought, intensifying it with the words, « deepest hurt » . He must have been disappointed in both his friend and in the outcome of the situation ; but, in reality, Bruckner was depressed and anxious, the obverse and reverse sides of the same problem. Unfortunately, he rarely expressed real anger, usually turning it inward, which undoubtedly contributed to his gastro-intestinal upsets and his anxious / depressed moods.

Approximateiy 2 weeks later, on July 7, Bruckner again wrote to Göllerich on the same subject but in a different tone :

« You will find it completely understandable, that it would mean much to me if only Doctor Helm, by way of addition (if only belatedly) , would at least give to the “ Deutsche Zeitung ” the pronouncement of German artist about me ; “ since Beethoven ceased to compose, German artists are measured solely by feeling and Wagner’s creative work ”. He (Doctor Helm) is in Salzburg. He seems, regardless of his lovely words, again to be somewhat difficult to move. You, my most worthy, my dear biographer, can do it, in particular if you do not let him have any peace. Therefore, please ! It is indeed the 1st general Festival in Germany where I am mentioned. I repeat my request that Helm may not be left in peace. » (70)

(70) No. 34 in this collection.

This time, Bruckner seems to have sent the right message in the right way. He knew that Göllicher could help him get the positive criticism that he felt he needed. Already, Bruckner had been mentioned in the critical review of the « Fest » ; but he wished for the distinction of German Artist. One can hardly realize the turmoil in Bruckner's mind because this pronouncement had not yet been made. The picture, though, was not as bleak as he was perceiving it ; he was in the process of reaching true fame, even though he was impatient and fearful due to Vienna's climate and the rejections he had felt, which completely stole his confidence. There was a component of reality in his fear, but his anxiety level magnified the possibility of his never being recognized, by at least tenfold in his imagination.

In 1886, on June 16, Bruckner wrote to his younger friend and admirer, Carl Wilhelm Zinne :

« About Hanslick and unfortunately about Brahms, I have been told stories which have been very hurtful to me, concerning which I prefer to keep quiet ; but my heart is sorrowful !!!

N.B. : Hanslick is still dictating to 2 reviewers to criticize me ; they really try everything to alienate me from Hans Richter who is enthusiastic for me, because everybody knows Richter's fear of the press. Many, many thanks for everything. » (71)

(71) No. 60, in this collection.

Such injustice, causing sadness for Bruckner ! Hanslick was, indeed, a formidable enemy, even though Bruckner had done nothing to provoke his wrath. Being associated with Richard Wagner and his music was enough. Thus, the Wagner-Bruckner camp and the Brahms camp. Vienna and its music-critics joined in on disagreements exacerbated by hatred, jealousy and hangers-on ; the music circles behaved like spectators at a cockfight, with Bruckner caught between the protagonists. Always fragile, Bruckner now battled emotional, physical, and psychosomatic illnesses.

January 9, 1887, found him writing to Theodor Helm about his plight in musical life :

« “ Herr Doktor ”, in a highly-noble manner and with admirable decorum, you are the only person who raises your noble voice for me, while all the others - long since sleeping again (except for my adversaries) - false, weak friends that are already safe and sound in the camp of my opponents.

Already many times, someone has shown me telegraphed reports from New York wherein is reported that Thomas has conducted my 7th Symphony and the public accepted it enthusiastically.

May I not, once more on this occasion, request a little notice ?

N.B. : Also, in Amsterdam. Pleading not to be abandoned. » (72)

(72) No. 76, in this collection.

Bruckner's feelings of abandonment are apparent here, but he lets them eclipse his realization and enjoyment of considerable success elsewhere. Vienna was not yet prepared to praise him. Times would change.

Again, on April 22, 1887, Bruckner wrote to Theodor Helm :

« Greetings ! As the only representative of my work in Vienna, I thank you for allowing my 5th Symphony to be recommended. At your request, I have consented to the preliminary performance. The chorus, " Um Mitternacht ", is new, the 3rd with the same title. The Society has returned from " Strasbourg " (in the region of Alsace) , no doubt by the shortest route from the Schottenring. » (73)

(73) No. 84, in this collection.

Bruckner still regarded Theodor Helm as his only Viennese ally ; and ally is the correct word, considering the musical war zone that was Vienna. In addition, how badly Bruckner actually felt about himself is shown in regard to the return of the University's Singing Society from Strasbourg. Bruckner lived on the 4th floor of the « 7 Heßgasse » , only a short block from where the members of the Society would pass, in returning to the University. What a wonderful tribute to the composer if the whole Society would have turned and walked the short distance to his home, singing the composition for him as a fitting tribute of appreciation. However, they did not. Bruckner felt that he was not regarded highly enough for this to happen ; and, again, in his feelings of unworthiness, perhaps even worthlessness, fell into place, making him depressed more than ever.

Bruckner never learned that, often, people think of a person as he thinks of himself and how others, then, perceive him. Such an attitude is reflected in the whole body, and others are quick to notice and stay away from that person, probably because of some personal fear of becoming like the person and repellent to others. Who would really want to deal with someone like that or have him as a new friend ? Bruckner never learned this truth because he did not notice, no one ever told him, and he did not see it at home. This concept can apply to professional relationships, too.

The situation looked even worse to Bruckner when he wrote to Helm, on June 2 of the same year :

« Thank you sincerely for the kind letter ! I cannot deny that I felt genuine pain and isolation. Look closely for yourself at the situation in Vienna (to mention only one) , I agree. Von Bülow will work for my ruin as long as he lives.

May I beg your further good will !!! » (74)

(74) No. 85, in this collection.

However, the end was not at hand. Eventually, von Bülow would speak-out for Bruckner ; but Bruckner was not to know that until von Bülow's conversion.

Around 1888, Bruckner sent a letter to Hermann Levi concerning the rejected score of the « Romantic » Symphony, he had sent it to Mainz, and had received the news upon his return from Bayreuth. He lists also his problems with publishers, Albert J. Gutmann and Theodor Rättig, feeling it necessary to compare his circumstances with those of Brahms :

« Again, in Vienna, there is nothing new. That nothing at all will be performed this year is preferable to me. Old friends have again become adversaries, and you know how that is. In brief, the reactionary, old-established treatment from all factions ! Without Hanslick - nothing proceeds in Vienna. Indeed, I might have already done a dozen years' penance for my position as lecturer. » (75)

(75) No. 91, in this collection.

Being treated shoddily by the Viennese music circle and shamefully by his fellow professors at the University would shake anyone's confidence, but it was especially true with Bruckner. Because he viewed himself as a person who always loses, he fulfilled his own prophecy. It never occurred to Bruckner to wait and see ; thus, he perceived every set-back, no matter how small, as a major disaster. The road was extremely rough for him ; but he made it even bumpier for himself, then was completely unable to smooth it out through his own efforts, sometimes plunging into a deep depression.

Baron Hans von Wolzogen received a letter from Bruckner, dated January 1, 1889. Besides wishing that Richard Wagner were there with him, Bruckner related his impression of Viennese musical life in relation to himself :

« The Brahms cult has achieved here the most unbelievable thing. Hans Richter, the very first in line !!! maintained that the new trend would have no justification in the concert at all ; and (because of Hanslick) he no longer dares to accept anything of mine for the prospectus. » (76)

(76) No. 102, in this collection.

Bruckner was not exaggerating in the tone of this letter. In the 1st place, Hans Richter was deathly afraid of critics ; and, 2ndly, the followers of Brahms were powerful and ruthless. Finally, little really did go on musically in Vienna during the years when Hanslick held sway, unless he approved. However, Bruckner had friends and supporters, was a teacher beloved by his students, and was a concert organist, not a composer only. As usual, though, Bruckner's thinking eclipsed the good in his life and settled in on the non-successes of his performances, all in all feeling inferior because Brahms was doing so well.

A letter of October 11, 1889, addressed to Wilhelm Floderer, in Linz, sums-up Bruckner's state of mind. Sadly, he writes :

« I am glad when the Austrians sing anything of mine. » (77)

(77) No. 106, in this collection.

On March 30, 1890, Bruckner wrote to Theodor Helm :

« In all haste, I ask you sincerely, for my sake to make no mention today (since I myself am at fault) that the Philharmonic has performed nothing of mine. I have taken away from them the “ Audacious Broom” (the 1st Symphony) , and the D minor Symphony is not yet printed. Also, Richter did not know that the 6th Symphony is already written. At both ends, we have waited on the D minor Symphony about which “ Herr ” Schalk has been assuring me for 3 months that it will undoubtedly come in good time. » (78)

(78) No. 110, in this collection.

As nearly always, problems stymied Bruckner, Franz Schalk being one of those problems, though unwittingly on his part. Schalk's good intentions and Bruckner's wishes to have his music performed and to please his listeners made-up a poor equation.

As time progressed, Bruckner's mental state worsened and his old aberrations, from 1867, began to recur. Already in 1889, on August 12, he wrote to August Göllerich :

« I wish to know of what the spires above the dome of the city towers, where we were, consist. Next to the dome is a) the stud ; then, b) the weather-vane with ornament ; isn't it ? Then, c) a cross ??? And a lightning rod or what else ? Is there a cross ?

What is on the spire of the Catholic church ? I believe only a weather-vane without a cross ?

Excuse me many times, and I thank you in advance. Please, make a note of “ everything ” ; in the autumn, I shall ask for clarification. » (79)

(79) No. 105, in this collection.

Since Bruckner was asking about Bayreuth, he could not easily check for himself.

Nevertheless, this is a very unusual request for information, seemingly of no real significance, except to a victim of what looks like an obsessive-compulsive disorder.

Bruckner also had a fascination, almost a preoccupation, with death. After his signature, at the very end of a letter of condolence to his sister Rosalie, he wrote on March 14, 1889 :

« Yesterday, a young officer, the son of a very rich citizen, was stabbed to death at a fencing practice. » (80)

(80) No. 104, in this collection.

What such a statement is doing at the bottom of a letter of condolence regarding the death of Johanna (his niece) , only daughter of Rosalie Hueber, is hard to understand except in psychological terms. However, by now, Bruckner's problems must have been making themselves obvious again to his family. Unfortunately for Bruckner, this incident illustrates only one of his strangenesses.

Along the same line, in 1867, Bruckner was intrigued by the death of Maximilian, brother of Franz-Josef I. As Archduke of Austria, Maximilian was made Emperor of Mexico ; but, for political reasons, he was court-marshalled and, then, executed by gunfire. Bruckner was interested in all of the details surrounding the death and visited the casket several times while Maximilian lay in state.

Bruckner remained a puzzle in Vienna, with his old-fashioned peasant clothing, which included a large red handkerchief protruding from a pants pocket, and his rustic table manners. Children laughed and followed him in the street. One of his oddest preoccupations was the counting of windows in buildings, the type of repetitive behavior that those suffering from autism display.

Bruckner was inconsistent in his behavior which was one of his failings, although he seemed to be powerless to change or even detect the problem. When necessary, he gave performance instructions to conductors, directors, and performers. At times, these directions were very clear and to the point. At other times, he granted ad libitum rights, occasionally even asking for advice. Then, there were those times when his ability to be direct was marred by indecision, too many qualifiers, and contradictions.

On March 31, 1885, the Benno Walther Quartet, with an added violinist, played Bruckner's String Quintet. A few days beforehand, on March 27, Bruckner wrote to the Quartet, giving what he considered a performance direction in regard to a portion of the Scherzo :

« In reference to the Quintet, I would like to request that the Scherzo not be played as prescribed ; on the contrary, in the 2nd section (nearly up to the recapitulation of the opening Andante) , please take the tempo as you ordain. I wish you much luck. » (81)

(81) No. 15, in this collection.

Bruckner had already heard Josef Hellmesberger's String Quartet play the work and must have liked the tempo, but his letter gives no clue as to what was done or what was to be done.

Bruckner wrote to Felix Mottl, on April 29 of the same year, asking that he change an expression mark in the Adagio of the 7th Symphony. What is more important, however, is Bruckner's insistence on the use of the Wagner tubas ; at least here, Bruckner overcame his unassuredness. Nonetheless, he gave the conductor too much freedom, for he was very concerned about what the laymen would think of what they heard. As a matter of fact, everyone was a layman in regard to this Symphony until the Symphony was played more than once or the score was studied at least twice.

« At X in the “ Adagio ” (“ Funeral Music ” for tubas and horns) , I beg you most sincerely (3 measures before Y) to increase the “ crescendo ” to “ fff ” by the next measure (about 1 measure before Y) , in order to allow a “ decrescendo ” on the 3rd quarter-note.

Be sure to use the Wagner tubas. (In no case are horns to replace these tubas.) Would it not be desirable to introduce the Scherzo with the Trio also ? (In particular, for the laymen ?) » (82)

(82) No. 22, in this collection.

Still in March, 1887, Bruckner was fussing over the funeral music in the 7th Symphony. Jean-Louis Nicodé had written him the most complimentary letter stating that he (Nicodé) was going to conduct the 7th Symphony in Dresden, as his last Philharmonic Concert. As he was already pleased with the Symphony, he may have been somewhat surprised when Bruckner wished him good luck :

« N.B. : At the end of the 2nd movement (“ Adagio ”) , in the tuba passages (the true funeral music) , 3 measures before Y, “ 4 horns playing fff ” sound much better than 2. Good luck ! » (83)

(83) No. 82, in this collection.

On October 2, 1890, Bruckner wrote to Felix Weingartner recommending the 8th Symphony for performance. Arthur Nikisch had already expressed a desire to conduct it ; but Bruckner was so unsure about its performance, and then its acceptance, that he begged Weingartner to honour the large cuts which Josef Schalk had made in the Finale :

« Please, “ Herr Kapellmeister ”, allow me to recommend my 8th Symphony ; when copied, it will come to your hands. The Finale has large cuts ; because of the length of the same, I beg you to allow these cuts. » (84)

(84) No. 124, in this collection.

In truth, Bruckner's Symphonies do tend to be long, especially as the numbers increase ; however, making cuts neither improves them nor makes them more desirable. It only spoils the composer's intentions.

Now and then, Bruckner was very precise in his directions. A letter of December 30, 1890, to Theodor Helm, contains an example :

« The “ Credo ”, in the absence of the orchestra, requires at least 2 keyboards, 4 hands ; and, then, requires solid full-score playing in order to bring-out well the bass of the foundation of the entire work (to bring-out the unison sections for the whole string orchestra in the “ er resurrexit ”), the Symphonic basses and the same with all of the “ unison ” lines for the string orchestra. » (85)

(85) No. 117, in this collection.

By 1891, Bruckner had still not desisted in cutting parts out of his Symphonies, expressly from the Finale of the 8th. On January 27, he wrote to Felix Weingartner :

« How is it going with the 8th ? Have you already had rehearsals ? How does it sound ? Please, cut the “ Finale, as it is indicated ”, because it would be too long and will matter only in later times for a circle of friends and those in the know. I ask that the “ tempi ” be intentionally altered, completely “ ad libitum ” (as is necessary for clarity) .

Again I ask : how does the 8th sound ? » (86)

(86) No. 133, in this collection.

In a letter of March 17, Bruckner asked Weingartner not to change the full-score of the Symphony but also requested that he accept the abridgement in the Finale :

« Please, just let me know what your orchestra needs ; however, I ask that the full-score not be changed. Also, it is one of my fondest prayers that, at the printing, the orchestra parts remain “ unaltered ”.

By all means, accept the abridgement in the Finale because, otherwise, it would be too long, and that would be detrimental. » (87)

(87) No. 140, in this collection.

Detrimental to what ? Bruckner composed the Symphony. In all probability, he meant that the critics or listeners, in general, might not like such a long performance ; but the Symphony makes better musical sense if unaltered. In spite of all, Bruckner desperately wanted, at least parts of his works, to be performed and heard during his lifetime and was willing to make any sacrifice, though he felt in his inner being that his works were for posterity. Again, he stated that it would matter only in later times and for the circle of his own friends. Understanding this « mélange » of fears and desires allows the excerpt above to make some sense.

Bruckner wrote to Hans Puchstein, on January 3, 1892, in order to correct an error concerning his 2 Symphonies in C minor ; Puchstein was to conduct Symphony No. 1. After affixing his signature to the letter, he amended it with :

« The harmonies (woodwinds and brass) are mostly indispensable (for keeping the lines separate) . » (88)

(88) No. 174, in this collection.

Even here, Bruckner qualifies his statement with the adverb « mostly » . Such a statement conveys his admonition but Puchstein was not told how much mostly meant.

If Bruckner had problems giving performance instructions, he certainly had more than his share of difficulties with publishers. He was always bemoaning the fact that he could not find a publisher ; but often when he did find one, he inevitably had knots and snarls to unravel. Nevertheless, Hermann Levi also saw that the problems were real :

« How is it, at present, with Gutmann ? I have heard nothing more. Just between us, I offered him 1,000 Marks as subsidy for the cost and so, I am of the opinion that he could folly well give a royalty to “ Herr ” Schalk. If he does not give it, I will certainly find a publisher in Germany. This situation would be resolved only if he were to give a definite Yes or No. If you are absolutely against Gutmann, write your answer to me. I have only turned to him since he published the Quintet. » (89)

(89) No. 21, in this collection.

The citation above appeared in a letter from Hermann Levi, which is dated April 26, 1885. About 3 years later (around 1888) , nothing had changed very much ; Bruckner was continuing to have problems with Albert J. Gutmann and others. As was his custom, Bruckner recounted his woes to Levi :

« Upon my return from Bayreuth, to my sorrow, I received back from Mainz, the “ Romantic ” Symphony in E-flat and, indeed, without any alleged reason. After that, “ Herr ” Seidl asked for the score and was of the opinion that he would find a publisher over there. Now, “ Herr ” Gutmann, himself, wants (and is of the opinion that I am obliged to request) 1,000 Florins from the Palace for him. In no case, can I do that. Rather, he, himself, should negotiate there without my having to proffer the fee ; indeed, I have never received anything.

(N.B. : From Rättig, 50 Florins.) » (90)

(90) No. 91 in this collection.

On March 17, 1891, Bruckner wrote to Felix Weingartner telling of his desire to have his 8th Symphony printed (not even published) ; just printed for an opening performance :

« If Schott would accept the printing, the goal would be achieved ; and I would have great joy. That he has gone to great lengths to further recognition of me is, for me, a great consolation, namely through your ingenuity. » (91)

(91) No. 140, in this collection.

Schott did admire Bruckner's work ; on the other hand, getting the publisher to go forward with the printing, at such a crucial time, was paramount and not at all an easy task.

After a while, Bruckner's general situation did look more promising. Relating his pleasure at the brilliant performance of his « Te Deum », he wrote to the conductor, Siegfried Ochs, on June 26, 1891 :

« Never more, will I hear my work performed like that.

N.B. : I intend to secure the publishing firm of Raabe for myself. » (92)

(92) No. 159, in this collection.

At last, Bruckner felt confident enough to state what he intended to do and, then, pursue his goal with no qualms. It goes without saying that the work was, again, published for him. Bruckner's printing and publishing distresses were over.

Along the way, Bruckner frequently had few opportunities to compose. Time after time, he wrote to friends, and even to the King of Bavaria, that he lacked the proper number of hours to do so ; but how overjoyed he was when he could slip away to Saint-Florian Monastery where he could compose without interruption. Nevertheless, he had more than enough commitments to fill his schedule and could spend time there, only infrequently.

On May 18, 1885, Bruckner wrote to Johann Baptist Burgstaller (the Choir director of the Linz New Cathedral - « Neuen Dom ») :

« Although I have only my times of rest for composing, and not even these for a long time !!! Even so, I have kept my promise and send you under separate cover the new “ Ecce sacerdos magnus ”. » (93)

(93) No. 27, in this collection.

No doubt Bruckner was rushed, with all of his duties as professor and organist, but he always kept his word. Withstanding stress was not his « forté », and it made his nervous condition even worse.

A reference to one of the rare times that he could anticipate a visit to Saint-Florian can be found in a letter of June 17, 1887, addressed to Bernhard Deubler :

« Thank you very much for the remembrance and honour to my humble self, and I wish you everything good.

In addition, I rejoice to be able to be at Saint-Florian, where I can engage in composition peacefully. Only one thing weighs me down heavily : having to place the burden of my being there, on the praiseworthy Monastery. If only I myself could pay for my board, I would be more at ease staying there because every good has its limit ! » (94)

(94) No. 30, in this collection.

Still thinking 1st of others, Bruckner, nevertheless, was overjoyed about his visit and the prospect of time to compose.

In 1886, Bruckner wrote to King Ludwig II of Bavaria asking for permission to dedicate the 7th Symphony to him. After much ritualistic rhetoric, Bruckner informed the King of his problems with finding time to compose :

« I am all the more fortunate that, likewise, the golden rays of the Royal grace touch me, as I, nearly 61 years old, in addition to all of my many school periods at the Vienna Conservatory, must also give private instruction in music, so that not very many residual hours remain left to me for musical composition. Because, at the present time, I feel myself honestly vigorous enough to create my best and would like to turn with pleasure toward dramatic composition, this lack of time fails heavily on my heart ! » (95)

(95) No. 46, in this collection.

The Symphony was dedicated to the King. In his letter of request, Bruckner made a point of mentioning Richard Wagner's statement about wanting to have all of Bruckner's Symphonies performed, no doubt, because the King considered Wagner a friend and was highly-influenced by him - so much so that individual walls in « Schloß Neuschwanstein » are covered with paintings depicting scenes from Wagnerian music dramas.

Bruckner was obviously hoping for more than acceptance of the dedication of his Symphony, plus a performance of it ; but King Ludwig was far too occupied with bankrupting his country by building castles to notice the dire needs of an overworked professor and composer.

By March 25, 1886, Bruckner was, indeed, buried in his 8th Symphony, as he wrote to Baron Hans von Wolzogen :

« A thousand thanks for your kind visit ; I was sincerely sorry that I did not know, and that I was unable to make a return visit, in particular, however, that I had to miss Your Grace's distinguished speech. (Once again, I'm in the same state of affairs.)

Your letter, which honoured me so and was so highly-ingenuous, cheered me greatly ! Unfortunately, I am now buried in the 8th Symphony and have almost no time for composition. » (96)

(96) No. 54, in this collection.

On February 23, 1887, Bruckner mentioned the lack of opportunity to work on his 8th Symphony again, this time, in a letter to his friend Elisabeth Kietz :

« Accept herewith my most sincere thanks and my deepest admiration for your highly noble heart ! Forgive my negligence, - it is the 8th Symphony that lays claim to my attention ; and, painfully, so little time for work ! which makes me feel so often discouraged. » (97)

(97) No. 80, in this collection.

Having almost no time to compose not only dispirited him but also added to his depression, thus heightening the other pathology in his psyche.

January 30, 1888, is the date on a letter to « Frau » Betty von Mayfeld, the wife of Moritz von Mayfeld - both of them close friends of Bruckner. It, too, emphasizes that Bruckner is working on the 8th Symphony with too little time to spend on it :

« Thank you from the bottom of my heart for your graciousness as well as that of your husband, the Government Councillor. The 8th Symphony is far from finished ; I have many proposed changes and too little time for working at them. » (98)

(98) No. 92, in this collection.

Bruckner had just finished the (1st) definitive version of the Symphony, in 1887 ; and already, early in 1888, he was concerned with making many proposed changes. Proposed by whom ? Unfortunately, changes were made in the course of the next 2 years, 1888 and 1889, under the guidance of Josef Schalk, a former student. This process was later dubbed « re-composition » . One need not wonder why the 9th Symphony was never finished, although the Trio in F, composed as the Scherzo of the Symphony, was already completed in 1889.

On March 26, 1892, Bruckner wrote to Theodor Helm :

« I have much to do ; must compose music for the “ 150th ” Psalm. » (99)

(99) No. 177, in this collection.

A month later, on April 26, Bruckner wrote to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol :

« I must set the “ 150th Psalm ” for the “ Musikfest ”, in September. » (100)

(100) No. 181, in this collection.

Most likely, the « Psalm » was completed in Steyr, his alternate haven for composition ; in fact, he once expressed that he could work constantly in Steyr. The « Psalm » was scheduled for performance before July 27, according to a letter to Adolf Koch Edler von Langentreu, a friend of Bruckner and the Director of the music Festival :

« The “ Psalm ” belongs precisely at the closing of the Festival. » (101) , wrote Bruckner.

(101) No. 185, in this collection.

Although, throughout his lifetime, Bruckner was plagued with too little time to compose, he was able to complete 10 Symphonies, leave fragments of numbered Symphony No. 10 with other Symphonic works, compose a String Quintet, and write a myriad of large and small vocal works. He wrote only a few minor organ works for students. Because he improvised so freely and well at the organ, he never wrote down what he played.

To his detriment, Bruckner was massively affected by the opinions of others. He considered the criticism of his music and his person to be the final word on the subjects. Seeking positive evaluation was ever his goal, while negative criticism nearly destroyed him. In his mind, bad press and personal attack often eclipsed the goodness and loyalty of his friends and followers - but most of all, his actual successes.

In a letter of February 9, 1885, to the Librarian at the Hague, Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs, Bruckner told of several successes :

Recently (on January 8) , Hellmesberger performed my Quintet in Vienna. I myself was called back repeatedly after every movement and, “ indeed ”, by the “ entire ” audience ; at the conclusion, fully 10 times. Court “ Kapellmeister ” Hellmesberger intends to perform it, again, in November. He requested me to write him still another one, called the work a “ revelation ”, and called me the “ Composer of the Modern Age ”. Vienna can be very proud, etc. , etc. ... Otherwise, I am despised by the music cliques, one and all in Vienna (with the exception of the “ Deutsche Zeitung ”) . For this reason, except for the 3rd Symphony and the Quintet, nothing has been published. » (102)

(102) No. 7, in this collection.

Inside the letter, by Bruckner's placement of the problems that he saw, one is made aware that, to him, the more significant part of his experience remained the negative element. It is almost as though his recital of his successes consisted merely of a prelude to the recitation of his difficulties. Bruckner was, again, depressed.

Bruckner was so concerned about the bad critical evaluations, which he was receiving in Vienna, that he actually requested that the Vienna Philharmonic not perform his 7th Symphony during the 1885 and 1886 season. Therefore, he wrote to the Committee on October 13, 1885 :

« Although the project would very much honour and please me, I desire that my most submissive request be approved, that the honourable Committee might, “ for this year ”, pursue another course concerning the performance of my E major Symphony, on grounds which originate solely in connection with the lamentable local situation in relation to the influential criticism which could only inhibit my commencing successes in Germany. » (103)

(103) No. 39, in this collection.

Most composers would probably not have refused a performance by the Vienna Philharmonic, but there is great truth in Bruckner's statement. Unfortunately, he anticipated disaster as a result of the performance, which may have been the result of his not being quite resilient enough to face possible local defeat ; but further foreign success was paramount in his mind. Bruckner was aware of his enemy, Eduard Hanslick, reigning critic supreme. One is then left with the question as to, whether or not, Hanslick could have thwarted Bruckner's success in Germany, for the Germans are quite apt to think for themselves.

Bruckner repeated his fears in a letter of November 6, to Moritz von Mayfeld :

« I protested against the performance of my 7th Symphony because, in Vienna, this has no purpose because of Hanslick and his associates. If the Philharmonic does not heed my protest, then, it can do as it will. » (104)

(104) No. 41, in this collection.

As always, Bruckner was looking for approval for his actions, still being unsure that he had taken the right step.

In a letter of April 22, 1887, Bruckner intimated that he was alone in Vienna, when it came to representatives, with the exception of Theodore Helm :

« Greetings ! As the only representative of my work in Vienna, I thank you for allowmg my 5th Symphony to be recommended. At your request, I have consented to the preliminary performance. » (105)

(105) No. 84, in this collection.

Most assuredly, one or more of his friends and followers could have recommended his work. As was the custom with Bruckner, his « naïveté » forced him to see all situations in black and white ; and so, at that moment, he saw Helm as his only ally.

Even so, Bruckner had changed his mind over a year and a half, in regard to a performance ; but he was incapable of changing Bruckner.

The only other possibility is that Bruckner was playing the fox, in order to insure future gain. However, this picture of him does not explain away his other behaviors, and is simply not a likely image of him.

On June 2, Bruckner followed-up a return letter with another to Theodor Helm :

« Thank you sincerely for the kind letter ! I cannot deny that I felt genuine pain and isolation, at that time ! Looking closely for yourself at the situation in Vienna (to mention only one) I agree. Von Bülow will work for my ruin as long as he lives.

Mister Barry wrote me from London that, on May 23, Richter conducted my 7th Symphony with masterly skill before a large audience, and that the work excited his highest delight and his deepest admiration. But he does not write how the public itself received the work. Also, to date, no critical review has become known to me. » (106)

(106) No. 85, in this collection.

1st, admission of his loneliness and malaise ; then, worry about audience and critics (with a fearful ideation toward the outcome) before anything is known. Although composers are always anxious about critical reviews, some wait calmly ; others wait nervously ; and, then, there was Bruckner who dreaded failure enough to bring him close to the point of terminal illness.

On November 11, 1889, Bruckner wrote to Leopold Hofmeyer, of success and astonishment :

« “ Hofkapellmeister ” Hans Richter is inexpressibly enthusiastic about my 1st Symphony. He ran-off with the score. He had it copied and he conducted it in a Philharmonic concert ; afterwards, he cried, kept on kissing me, and “ prophesied ” immortality for me. I was astonished. » (107)

(107) No. 118, in this collection.

Bruckner did not say whether his astonishment came from the prophesy or the tears, although kissing and emotionality were within the behavioral repertoire of Europeans, during the era, persisting in some areas even today. The fact that Richter loved the Symphony and felt that Bruckner would be another immortal artist both pleased and astounded him, although he craved for recognition. In addition, Hans Richter, an orchestral conductor of international renown, had not always been so fond of Bruckner's music, partly because Richter was deathly afraid of Hanslick ; thus, here was another victory for the composer. Nonetheless, Bruckner's elation did not last.

Writing to Arthur Nikisch, in Leipzig, on November 23, 1888, Bruckner revealed his own fright in regard to the critics :

« Hanslick !!! Bülow !!! Joachim !!! In God's name ! I work ; I do whatever is possible. » (108)

(108) No. 99, in this collection.

Bruckner seemed to think that working hard was the complete answer. Even inspired works are not always understood and accepted by those who think they know and those who simply have different taste. Fortunately, in a larger sense, Bruckner was right about his composing ; he did work diligently, magnificently and, at the highest level that his superior gifts would allow. It was his non-musical mistakes that marked him as being less than his worth, that reflected on his musical output.

It is true that the situation was not favourable in Vienna for Bruckner's music, in 1888, but his successes elsewhere should have taken the edge-off of the scathing remarks of the professional critics and a conductor or 2. As could be expected of Bruckner, he saw the immediate situation in Vienna and assumed that it would reflect on his success elsewhere ; and he became distraught.

Perhaps, the letter to Hans Puchstein, a music reviewer in Vienna, best demonstrates Bruckner's concern and emotional entanglement in the face of any critical review of his work. The time was January 19, 1891 :

« Thousands and thousands of thanks for your genial, wonderful article. How often I've read it ; in addition, I did so again, on Saturday, when I read for the 1st time (with shuddering) the one by Hanslick. At 1st, I almost became ill ; then, I quickly reached for " yours ", and I became well again ! God be thanked, and may He bless you. » (109)

(109) No. 132, in this collection.

The contents of the letter cited above are the keystone to understanding exactly how personally and seriously Bruckner regarded the opinions of « all » others, in regard to his music. In his letters, there is not very much information regarding the way people saw him as a person, for it would be mostly painted black, due to his emotional problems. However, we do know that he had a large number of students and other followers who loved him, which is revealed by inference and passing reference rather than by outright statement. Other biographical writings make this aspect very clear, however.

About the same year, Bruckner wrote again to Hans Puchstein :

« Most kindly, permit me to send you 2 issues of the " Weltblatte " - very interesting ! I don't know who ? ... ? (sic) May I look forward to seeing my noble patron again soon ? The 2nd performance of the " D minor " was splendid, wasn't it ? In Graz, the 4th with jubilation - and encore. » (110)

(110) No. 128, in this collection.

Of course, it was splendid ; Bruckner did not need to ask Puchstein about it. A tag question from Bruckner signified the need for verification and re-affirmation. Bruckner never lost his need for the positive opinions of others, not just critics.

In the following case, he relied on a chorus Master and composer to re-assure him.

On February 3, 1892, after great success in Vienna, Bruckner wrote to Siegfried Ochs :

« They also liked my " Te Deum " very much, here. Permit me, also, the " 1st Symphony in C minor " had great success in the Philharmonic concert.

At 1st, the Orchestra declared it to be the work of a madman ; after that, to be phenomenal. Hanslick writes absolutely nothing. » (111)

(111) No. 110, in this collection.

It was not necessary for Bruckner to repeat the statement about a madman. Telling a friend about his triumph should have been enough. Eduard Hanslick restrained himself from writing anything ; he might have known not to comment negatively on a grand success.

On March 26, 1892, Bruckner related to Theodor Helm the opinion of a Berlin newspaper that can only be described as his music's being damned by faint praise :

« The “ Berliner Börsen-Courier ”, from March 17, writes that I have the right to be performed, even if a work should be slightly or not at all pleasing, and recommended the 4th as very interesting, fresh, and elaborate. » (112)

(112) No. 177, in this collection.

How can one figure-out that review ?

Such a review from Berlin, where he had had so much success, came as a nasty surprise. It is easy to understand that Bruckner was upset by the words in the « Courier » , although anyone might wonder at his writing so quickly to Theodor Helm, a friendly critic in Vienna, for re-assurance. The great concern that Bruckner had over one declaration of mediocrity seems rather too much. He appears to have forgotten or overlooked his successes, there ; and, for another time, he succumbed to the opinion of a detractor, even after finally conquering Vienna. But did he even read the whole of the Berlin article ?

Bruckner never overcame his insecurity and dependence on the good will and approval of musicians and laymen alike. Of course, he did revel in his successes. Because he was so often depressed and uncertain, each true success must have been for him much like a flash of the mystical ; but it is his music that raises him into the realm where mystics are found. Even so, he seemed always to have descended rather quickly. Nevertheless, there are those who think that he was a mystic. Thinking so little of himself and his work becomes ever more apparent as his letters are read and cited, even though there were times when his good fortune is apparent, yet, did not bring him intrinsic joy.

The year of 1885 was really the beginning of his fame. On January 14, he wrote to an unnamed editor :

« I am sending a short biography (with photograph, as per your request) . On the 8th of the month, “ Herr Hellmesberger, Senior ”, presented my Quintet for the 1st time, with success that I cannot describe. Called at the closing of each movement ; at the end, 6 to 10 curtain calls, and the general applause, even the conservatives applauded vigorously. Hellmesberger called the Quintet “ Revelation ”, and intends to repeat it by demand, as soon as November. » (113)

(113) No. 3, in this collection.

That Bruckner was thrilled with his success fairly leaps from this letter. Surely, it should have given him some degree of lasting confidence, although it failed to do so.

To his brother-in-law and sister (Johann Napomuk Hueber and Rosalie) , he wrote on February 9, 1885 :

« Now, “ Holland ” is added to the list where, on the 4th of the month, my 3rd Symphony was performed with very great success. In Leipzig, on January 28, the 2nd performance of my 7th Symphony was given before the Royal couple. The newspapers are full of admiration just like the Dutch people. In March, it is going to “ Munich ”. The performance in Hamburg is, likewise, imminent. » (114)

(114) No. 5, in this collection.

On the same day, he wrote to Doctor Rudolf Prohaska, in Linz ; but he told of his problems 1st, then, of his great success. He was saving the better part until last but seemed not as enthused, as in the other letter to his brother-in-law and sister.

Bruckner was certainly busy writing letters on February 9, 1885, for he wrote also to Doctor Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs, the librarian at the Hague. Bruckner told of his success in Leipzig. He added a line referring to « extraordinary success » and, then, added :

« I received 2 laurel wreaths (one from the University, and one from the Orchestra) , which is very grand. In March, the same takes place in Munich, where “ Kapellmeister ” Levi raves most extraordinarily about the work. » (115)

(115) No. 13, in this collection.

As Bruckner had told Doctor van Meurs, the concert did take place in Munich and was a rousing success. Bruckner reported his triumph to Arthur Nikisch, on March 15 :

« I have just returned from Munich where, on the 10th of the month, there was an extremely magnificent performance of my 7th Symphony. The audience received it very enthusiastically ; the conductor and the Orchestra applauded vigorously. 2 laurel wreaths. Next performance, in the autumn. The reviews were very good. Also, especially splendid ; “ Neueste Nachrichten ”, “ Süddeutsche Presse ”, and such.

At a large reception for musicians, “ Herr ” Levi declared :

“ This is the most significant Symphonic work since Beethoven’s death. ”

He added that the performance of this work is going to be the pride and high-point of his artistic career. And the banquets ! The King will also be informed. The Intendant, likewise, sent for me. My portrait was painted by (Hermann

von) Kaulbach and I was photographed twice. » (116)

(116) No. 13, in this collection.

Bruckner was so excited that he also told his friend Baron Hans von Wolzogen of the events, in a letter dated March 18. In this letter, he added :

« Please, permit me to tell you something of the happiest week of my life, due to the glorious events in Munich.

The reaction was, as they say, indescribable jubilation. No one could remember such a scene in the “ Odeon ”. My Symphony (No. 7) remains in Munich. » (117)

(117) No. 14, in this collection.

On May 12, Bruckner was still thrilled with his success. In a letter to Moritz von Mayfeld, Bruckner recounted his success for another time :

« The success in Munich was the greatest of my life. There never has been such enthusiasm in Munich, as I was told. The most enthusiastic applause of hundreds. My Quintet and, above all, the “ Te Deum ”, which Wetzlar wants to print, has evoked the greatest jubilation. » (118)

(118) No. 26, in this collection.

On November 6, Bruckner wrote to Moritz von Mayfeld informing him that :

« 2 orders for the score and parts of the 7th Symphony arrived from foreign countries ; 3 from America. » (119)

(119) No. 42, in this collection.

As Bruckner sought recognition, thus, it came to him.

To a friend, Elizabeth Kietz, he wrote on January 4, 1887 :

« In Amsterdam and especially in New York, the 7th has aroused enthusiasm. Oh ! How I would like that to happen in Dresden, too. In addition, it will be performed in Berlin. » (120)

(120) No. 75, in this collection.

A few weeks later, on February 23, 1887, he wrote to « Fräulein » Kietz, again, telling her :

« It is the 8th Symphony that lays claim to my attention. » (121) , making it obvious that he was hard at work on the large project.

(121) No. 80, in this collection.

Meanwhile, on January 9, he informed Theodor Helm of his success in New York :

« Already, many times, someone has shown me telegraphed reports from New York wherein is reported that (Theodore) Thomas has conducted my 7th Symphony and the public accepted the work enthusiastically. » (122)

(122) No. 76, in this collection.

Bruckner was always very fond of his friends, the Mayfelds. On January 30, 1888, he wrote to Betty von Mayfeld to thank her and her husband for their graciousness. Being very happy about the success of his Symphonies, he included in the letter :

« On the 22nd of the month, Crown Princess Stefanie bestowed upon me her utmost sincere congratulations. During the course of March, the 4th Symphony (the “ Romantic ”) will be performed in Munich. In London, Boston, and Prague, the 7th Symphony has had enormous success. » (123)

(123) No. 92, in this collection.

Writing on April 24, to the « Stiftsorganist » at the Monastery of Saint-Florian, Bruckner recounted to Josef Gruber :

« I was sincerely gladdened by the great success of the 4th Symphony, in New York, through the recent performance by the celebrated conductor (Anton Seidl) . » (124)

(124) No. 95, in this collection.

August Göllerich received unexpected news from Bruckner on January 1, 1891. Bruckner had triumphed even with the staunchest critic in Vienna :

« I am still deeply moved by the acceptance of the audience at the Philharmonic concert, which hailed me back 12 times - and how !!! That was not all. You will have to be astounded :

Yesterday, Hanslick revered me with his photograph, the inscription on which reads : “ To my esteemed friend. ” » (125)

(125) No. 130, in this collection.

Bruckner, who had once feared music-critic Eduard Hanslick so greatly that he declined a proposed performance by the Vienna Philharmonic, had seen his 7th Symphony hailed by those present, who accorded him 12 calls-back. Even more significant, in the eyes of Bruckner, was that Hanslick had put to paper on the photograph that he was his esteemed friend.

It would have been unlike Bruckner to send the picture back with the inscription crossed-out, but there are those who would have done just that. The all-forgiving Bruckner was so pleased about his acceptance that Hanslick's attempt to mend the bridge between them arrived with status equal to his other triumphs. Perhaps, Bruckner possessed a little more sophistication on the inside than he displayed on the outside and for which he was never given credit. A more likely scenario would involve his simple happiness and true joy, his graciousness, and his kindness, as inspired by his devotion to his religious beliefs. With these qualities in mind, one can see why he would never think of retribution.

Perhaps, the « essentiel » , as well as the apex, of Bruckner's career is contained in the letter of June 12, 1891, written to Theodor Helm :

« Having just returned from Berlin, I permit myself to ask you to put together a few words from the enclosed reviews, and even the best from your celebrated newspaper. All of the Berlin papers pass very good judgments ; nothing unfavourable. - That was never the case. Tappert and Leßmann, wonderful.

The jubilation at the reception, after the final choir rehearsal and at the general rehearsal ; marvelous - at the end also, trumpets and kettle drums.

However, the jubilation after the concert defies description ; most of the notables came to me, and they congratulated me so much that I had to remain on the podium for a long, long time thanking them.

Next winter, the “ Te Deum ” will be performed, again in Berlin, and 1 or 2 of my Symphonies ; likewise, in Dresden Stuttgart, etc. “ Christiania ” came 8 days earlier. Von Bülow recommended the “ Te Deum ” for performance, brought my photograph to conductor Siegfried Ochs (who led the Orchestra in a masterful performance of the work) , and called the work, excellent. » (126)

(126) No. 153, in this collection.

Theodore G. Tappert : Distinguished church historian and author. He was Schieren Professor of the History of Christianity at Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia. He was also archivist of the Southeastern Pennsylvania Synod and a consultant to the Lutheran Church in American's Board of Publication.

Helmut T. Lehmann : Author of Martin Luther's Works Liturgy and Hymns.

Christiania, also known as Freetown Christiania (« Fristaden Christiania » , in Danish) is a self-proclaimed autonomous neighbourhood, covering 34 hectares (84 acres) in the borough of Christianshavn in the Danish capital, Copenhagen.

The area of Christiania consists of the former military barracks of Bådsmadsstræde and parts of the city ramparts. The ramparts and the borough of Christianshavn (then, a separate city) were established, in 1617, by King Christian IV by reclaiming the low-beaches and islets between Copenhagen and Amager. After the siege of Copenhagen during wars with Sweden, the ramparts were reinforced, during 1682 to 1692, under Christian V to form a complete defence ring. The western ramparts of Copenhagen were demolished during the 19th Century, but those of Christianshavn were allowed to remain. They are today considered among the finest surviving 17th Century defence works in the world.

The University of Oslo (« Universitetet i Oslo ») , formerly The Royal Frederick University (« Det Kongelige Frederiks Universitet ») , is the oldest and largest University in Norway, located in the Norwegian capital of Oslo. The University is recognized as one of Northern Europe's most prestigious Universities.

Its Faculties include : (Lutheran) Theology (Norway's State religion since 1536) ; Law ; Medicine ; Humanities ; Mathematics ; Natural Sciences ; Social Sciences ; Education. The University's original neo-Classical campus is located in the centre of Oslo ; it is currently occupied by the Faculty of Law.

The University was founded in 1811 and was modelled after the University of Copenhagen and the recently established University of Berlin. It was originally named for King Frederick VI of Denmark and Norway, and received its current name in 1939. The University is informally also known as « Universitetet » (the University) , having been the only University in Norway, until 1946, and was commonly referred to as « The Royal Frederick's » (« Det Kongelige Frederiks ») prior to the name change.

In 1811, a decision was made to establish the 1st University in the Dano-Norwegian Union, after a successful campaign which resulted in an agreement with King Fredrik VI. Fredrick agreed to the establishment of an institution that he had earlier believed might encourage political-separatist tendencies. In 1813, The Royal Fredrik's University was founded in Christiania, a small city during that time. Circumstances then changed dramatically, 1 year into the commencement of the University, as Norway proclaimed independence and adopted its own constitution. However, independence was somewhat restricted, as Norway was obliged to enter into a legislative union with Sweden based on the outcome of the War of 1814. Norway retained its own constitution and independent State institutions, whilst Royal power and foreign affairs were shared with Sweden. At a time when Norwegians feared political domination by the Swedes, the new University became a key institution that contributed to Norwegian political and cultural independence.

The main function of The Royal Frederick University was to educate a new class of (higher) civil servants. Although Norway was in a legislative union with Sweden, it was a sovereign State, and needed educated people to run it. Civil servants were needed, as well as parliamentary representatives and ministers. The University also became the centre for a survey of the country - a survey of national culture, language, history and folk traditions. The staff of the University strove to undertake a wide range of practical tasks necessary for developing the infrastructure critical to a modern society. When the union with Sweden was dissolved, in 1905, the University became important for producing highly-educated men and women who could serve as experts in a society which placed increasing emphasis on ensuring that all its citizens enjoy a life of dignity and security. Education, health services and public administration were among those fields that recruited personnel from among the University's graduates. In 1939, the University was renamed the University of Oslo and it remained Norway's only University, until 1946.

Throughout the 1800's, the University's academic disciplines became more specialized. One of the major changes in the University came during the 1870's when a greater emphasis became placed upon research. The management of the University became more professional ; academic subjects were reformed and the forms of teaching evolved. Disciplines became more specialized and Classical education came under increasing pressure.

...

On June 14, Bruckner imparted the same information to Bernhard Deubler. Also mentioned was his Symphony No. 3, which would be performed in London. He wrote to his landlord, the architect Anton von Ölzelt-Newin (1817-1875) , the next day, giving him some of the important details of the success ; even then, he described his triumph in Berlin in very simple and humble terms :

« “ Berlin ”, most incredibly, is again going to present the “ Te Deum ” this winter, and 1 or 2 of my Symphonies. »
(127)

(127) No. 154, in this collection.

Incredibly ?

Yet, in August, Bruckner was elated about his achievement. To Felix Weingartner, he wrote on August 8 :

« In Berlin, the days were so beautiful for me - as at no other time. » (128)

(128) No. 160, in this collection.

Bruckner wrote to the Vienna Philharmonic, on December 16 of the same year ; he was indeed pleased with the recent performance of the 1st Symphony :

« May I extend, herewith, my inexpressible thanks for the splendid rendering of my 1st Symphony, both to “ Herr Kapellmeister ” Doctor Hans Richter and to all of the gentlemen of the Philharmonic. In everlasting admiration - “ 3 Cheers ”. » (129)

(129) No. 171, in this collection.

On April 26, 1892, Bruckner wrote to his friend, Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol, who was serving at the Monastery of Kremsmünster, in Upper-Austria. Bruckner did mention an upcoming performance of his 8th Symphony, but it was the « Te Deum » that was uppermost in his mind :

« “ Te Deum ” - pleased enormously in Hamburg ; also, in Saint-Louis in North America. » (130)

(130) No. 180, in this collection.

Bruckner must have felt superb pleasure when the letter from Hamburg, which had been written 10 days earlier, related that everyone present at the performance had been deeply moved.

To Theodor Helm, Bruckner sent a letter of thanks on January 3, 1893 :

« I have just now come back from Saint-Florian, and I ask most kindly that you accept, here within, my fondest New Year's Congratulations and my deepest, warmest thanks, in the 1st place, for your highly-ingenious review and truly heroic advocacy for my 8th. God bless Your Honour for such noble effort. We shall shout the “ profit ” over the land. »

(131)

(131) No. 199, in this collection.

Although reviews of the 8th Symphony were not all favourable, Helm recognized a work of genius, at once, and wrote about it in excellent terms. As always, Bruckner was grateful, but he realized that Helm did not quite understand the work.

By careful wording, Bruckner made his point to Helm :

« N.B. : “ Herr Doktor ” ! In the Finale of the 8th Symphony, at double letter ZZ in the score, all 4 themes are united. Please, pardon very much my bringing this matter to your attention. Your articles, so wonderfully memorable, I will preserve it for myself for life. » (132)

(132) No. 199, in this collection.

As Bruckner had previously been criticized for not weaving themes from all movements into the fabric of his Finales, he wanted to make sure that he cited evidence of this point for all, which meant correct information for the critics. Bruckner's letters are, in many ways, like his Symphonies : « I reading - I hearing » is just not enough for complete understanding. It has been commonly accepted that Bruckner's letters contain nothing out of the ordinary. Such an assumption is a groß over-simplification. As the reader can perceive in this essay, Bruckner's life, letters, and music (all 3) have wonders and mysteries for those who seek.

...

Vers 1885 : Une strophe, attribuée à Anton Bruckner, trouvée au début d'un album.

Love, it can elevate the earth, -
With its clay existence, - to heaven.
It teaches us to bear suffering willingly
And peacefully look forward to a better day.

Incipit : « Die Liebe, sie kann erheben - »

Source : Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 149 ; pages 164-165.

This autograph-book poem was written for the niece of Bruckner's « old » copyist, Franz Sailer (1803-1848) . He was the Court scribe and was employed by the Monastery of Saint-Florian. It was from Sailer that Bruckner received his Bösendorfer piano, which he treasured for the rest of his life ; this piano is now preserved in Saint-Florian Monastery.

At the time when Franz Gräßlinger was compiling his reference-book, the original copy was in possession of Franz Müller, the « Kapellmeister » at the « Stephansdom » , in Vienna.

...

1 janvier 1885 : Bernhard Vogel's music-review, about the Bruckner 7th Symphony, for the « Leipziger Nachrichten » ...

« This work commands the highest-admiration. »

6 janvier 1885 : Lettre de Otto Kitzler (Brünn) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Dear Old Friend !

My brother in Dresden, who visited me for a few days at Christmas, has informed me that he heard your Symphony in D, there, and was witness to the marvelous success. I congratulate you most heartily to that end and sincerely rejoice that you have, at last, gained a deserved honour and recognition !

Besides, you have endured long enough ! Also, about a performance of a Mass (is it of a more recent date ?) in the palace cathedral, I have read splendid things. A great pleasure has been spoiled for me through the unfortunately necessary postponement of our Music Society concert, from today to next Sunday, because I really wanted to come to Vienna, on the 10th, to attend the performance of your “ Te Deum ”. I have obtained the score and I am presenting it, next fall, because the program for this season is already established and the required printed music has already been purchased. A great, majestic thread is woven through the “ Te Deum ”. I congratulate you sincerely for that, as well, and am already excited about its reception. I will be with you, in spirit, on Sunday.

Additionally, something yet of a prosaic nature. Befittingly, I have spent this summer very pleasantly with my family in Waidhofen. In addition, was in Linz on the 1st of August ; inquired after you of Zappe, who could not tell me where you have been ; had you been in Florian, I should certainly have sought you out. Now, farewell ; my wife and I send our compliments.

Your old friend,

Kitzler »

Incipit : « Mein Brüder in Dresden, welcher mich zu Weihnachten ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 1 de Otto Kitzler ; page 310.

Otto Kitzler (1834-1915) : « Kapellmeister » . While living in Linz, Bruckner studied orchestration, performance theory, and methods of composition, although Bruckner felt that composition itself could not be taught. Kitzler always felt humble when he was recognized as one of Bruckner's teachers.

Karl Zappe (1812-1971) : Cathedral and town parish church « Kapellmeister » , from 1840 to 1871, thus, being Bruckner's superior.

8 janvier 1885 : Exécution du Quintette à cordes de Bruckner par le Quatuor Hellmesberger. Également au programme, des œuvres de Mozart et de Beethoven.

10 janvier 1885 : Lettre de Josef Schalk (un des défenseurs les plus controversés de Bruckner) à son frère Franz. Soit 11 jours après la création leipzigoise de la 7e Symphonie.

« Ferdinand Löwe et moi avons dernièrement examiné la partition de la 7e avec Bruckner et discuté d'une ou 2 modifications et améliorations. Tu ignores probablement que Nikisch a arraché son accord pour notre coup de cymbales dans l'Adagio (accord de sixte et quarte en ut majeur) , avec le triangle et les timbales - à notre incommensurable joie. »

« Notre coup de cymbales » : voilà qui résout à coup sûr l'affaire ! Mais le fait est que nous ne saurons très certainement jamais combien de « modifications » et d'« améliorations » Bruckner fit sur l'insistance des Nikisch, Löwe et autres Schalk. Contrairement à ce qu'on croit, pourtant, il savait fort bien résister quand une idée lui déplaisait vraiment. Et bien qu'il pût être relativement puriste en matière d'instrumentation Symphonique (les harpes n'intégrèrent la Symphonie n° 8 qu'au bout d'un mois de bataille, à en croire son élève Friedrich Eckstein) , s'il avait douté du bien-fondé des cymbales et du triangle, pourquoi les introduire de nouveau dans l'Adagio de sa Symphonie n° 8 ? Musicologiquement parlant, c'est là une question difficile à trancher.

14 janvier 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à un éditeur inconnu (Cologne) .

« Honourable Professor :

I am sending a short biography, with photograph, as per your request. On the 8th of this month, “ Herr ” Hellmesberger, Senior, presented my Quintet for the 1st time, with success that I cannot describe. Called at the closing of each movement ; at the end, 6 to 10 curtain calls, and the general applause ! - even the conservatives applauded vigorously. Hellmesberger called the Quintet, “ Revelation ”, and intends to repeat it, by demand, as soon as November. Thanks very much for your kindness and, please, be willing to bear in mind my most favourable attitude toward you, in the future. Once more, wishing you a “ Happy New Year ”, thankfully, respectfully, and devotedly.

Yours truly,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Ihrem Wunsche gemäss übersende ich ... »

Source : Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 107 ; pages 122-123.

Josef Hellmesberger, Senior (1828-1893) : Violinist, conductor, founder of the Hellmesberger Quartet. From 1851 to 1859, he was artistic director and conductor of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » concerts, transforming the Orchestra into one of professional status and giving the programs their lasting form. In 1849, he founded the String Quartet which was regarded as the leading Viennese Quartet, from their 1st performance onward. (The Beethoven String Quartets were its particular « fortés » .) Hellmesberger was a witty, congenial « man about town » , and his playing pleased even the music-critic Eduard Hanslick.

15 janvier 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Alfred Stroß (Vienne) .

« Dear Good Friend !

I have “ not ” found a publisher. If you write to Professor Winterberger, would you ask him about the theme in B minor that he gave me at the “ Gewandhaus ” (in Leipzig) .

Sincere thanks for your kindness, noble friend !

Yours,

Bruckner

P.S. : Monday’s “ Extrablatt ”, terrible. Wednesday’s “ Deutsche Zeitung ”. »

Incipit : « Ich habe “ keinen ” Verleger gefunden. »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 144 ; page 173.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 107 ; pages 122-123.

Autograph Letter about the 7th Symphony : Elusive autograph signed letter and envelope from the influential Austrian composer and organist Anton Bruckner who writes regarding the world-premiere of his 7th Symphony. Autograph material of any kind from Bruckner is extremely rare. Sold together with a vintage postcard photograph.

1 page, double-sheet, 8vo. Dated « 15.01.1885 » . To the composer Alfred Stroß, envelope postmarked Vienna. In fine condition, tiny tears to 2 edges, envelope torn along the right edge. Translated :

« Dear, good friend ! I've found NO publisher. When you write to Professor Winterberger, you will want to ask him for the theme in B minor that he gave me in the “ Gewandhaus ”. Thank you for your support, dear noble friend. Your Bruckner » , and adding a postscript : « Special edition from Monday was terrible. The German newspaper by Wednesday, very good. »

The composer is referencing reviews of his 7th Symphony which was 1st performed on December 30, 1884. The premiere, given under Arthur Nikisch and the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra in the Opera House of Leipzig brought Bruckner the greatest success he had known in his life. The Symphony was eventually published by Albert J. Gutmann, in 1885.

Alfred Stroß

Alfred Stroß (1858-1886) : Estimable pianist and composer of keyboard music. His unfortunately early death came as a result of his insanity. He had been one of Bruckner's students and an acquaintance of Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Friedrich Eckstein, Rudolf Steiner and Fritz Lemmermayer.

Rudolf Steiner was present during Bruckner's lectures on harmony and counterpoint at the University of Vienna. He joined the Master at the « Café Griensteidl » , during the period 1886 to 1890.

From Rudolf Steiner auto-biography :

« Alfred Stroß, the composer, was a gifted man, but one tinged with a profound pessimism. When he took his seat at the piano in “ delle Grazie's ” home and played his “ études ” . One had the feeling ; Anton Bruckner's music reduced to airy tones which would fain flee this earthly existence. Stroß was little understood ; Fritz Lemmermayer was inexpressibly devoted to him.

Both Lemmermayer and Stroß were intimate friends of Robert Hamerling. Through them, I was led later into a brief correspondence with Hamerling. Stroß finally died of a serious illness in spiritual darkness. »

« We often had the opportunity to hear the 4 women artists of the Austrian Ischamper Quartet ; there, Fritz Lemmermayer melodramatically recited Hebbel's " Heideknabe ", to a fiery piano accompaniment by Alfred Stroß. »

« At that time, the visitors on Saturdays included church historians and theologians. Occasionally, one could meet the philosopher Adolf Stöhr, Maria Goswine von Berlepsch ; the sensitive story-teller Emilie Mataja, whose pen-name was Emil Marriot ; the poet and writer Fritz Lemmermayer ; and the composer Alfred Stroß. I first met Fritz Lemmermayer, who later became a close friend, at « delle Grazie's » afternoon gatherings. An unusual man, he spoke of his interests with an inner, measured dignity. He looked like the musician Rubinstein. He also resembled the actor Lewinsky. He worshipped Hebbel almost as a god. He had very definite views about art and life, which arose from an intelligent, knowing heart. He had written a profound and interesting novel, « The Alchemist », and much of his work possessed great beauty and depth. He could also endow the simplest things in life with importance. I remember when I visited him with other friends in his charming little room in a side-street of Vienna. He had just prepared his meal, 2 soft-boiled eggs with bread. While the water was boiling to cook eggs for us, he said emphatically, « This will be delicious ! »

The composer Alfred Stroß was somewhat of a genius, but his disposition was deeply melancholic. When he played his " études " at " delle Grazie's ", one felt that the music of Anton Bruckner evaporated in these tones, seeking escape from earthly existence. Stroß was not well-understood, but Fritz Lemmermayer's admiration for him knew no bounds.

Lemmermayer and Stroß were both close friends of Robert Hamerling. Later, I was able, through them, to exchange a few letters with Hamerling. Stroß's spirit clouded, and his life ended in serious mental illness. »

...

« Café Griensteidl » : Siehe den Hinweis zu Brief 113. Alfred Stroß (1860-1888) , Komponist ; war mit Friedrich Lemmermayer eng befreundet, gehörte zum delle Grazie-Kreis. Siehe auch « Lebens-gang », 7. Kapitel.

Eigenhändiger Brief mit Unterschrift an einen Freund Komponist. Ohne Ort, datiert « 15.01.1885 » . Doppelblatt Gr.-8°, gefaltet. Beiliegend Briefumschlag, adressiert an den Komponisten Alfred Stroß, Poststempel, Wien (rechter Rand eingerissen) . Provenienz : Schweizer Privatsammlung (durch Erbschaft) .

Alfred Stroß, der Komponist, war ein genialisch, aber tief pessimistisch angelegter Mensch. Wenn er sich bei delle Grazie ans Klavier setzte und seine Etüden spielte, so hatte man das Gefühl : Anton Bruckners Musik verdunstet in Tönen, die dem Erdensein entfliehen wollen. Stroß wurde wenig verstanden ; Fritz Lemmermayer liebte ihn ganz unsäglich.

Beide, Lemmermayer und Stroß, waren mit Robert Hamerling sehr befreundet. Und ich wurde durch sie später zu einem kurzen Briefwechsel mit Hamerling veranlaßt, von dem ich noch sprechen werde. Stroß endete in schwerer Krankheit, geistig umnachtet.

...

Alfred Stroß, Klavier-Compositionen. Es liegen zwei umfangreiche Werke des in der Kunstwelt noch wenig genannten Autors zur Beurtheilung vor und zwar als Opus 1 zwei Hefte « Silhouetten » und als Opus 2 « Fantasiestücke ». Das zuerst genannte Werk aus nicht weniger als 20 ziemlich ausgeführten Stücken bestehend, ist durchweg harmonisch und rhythmisch ungewöhnlich und in vielen Theilen interessant. Freilich leidet der natürliche Gang der Melodie recht oft durch die unlegbar auftretende Absichtlichkeit der harmonischen Folgen, aber es lässt sich dennoch nicht in Abrede stellen daß das Talent des sich anscheinend noch in der Sturm- und Drangperiode befindenden Componisten ein recht bedeutendes ist. Wird es Herrn Stroß erst gelingen seinen Stil natürlicher zu gestalten, dann dürften seine Compositionen noch mehr in alle Kreise dringen. Die « Silhouetten » sind nur solchen Spielern zugänglich deren musikalische Fähigkeiten nicht nur pianistisch-technisch hervorragender, sondern auch speciell musikalisch bedeutender Art sind ; ihre Reproduction fordert durchbildeten Musiksinn. In den « Fantasiestücken » deren Tanzrhythmen wesentlich dazu beitragen den Inhalt Jedem nahe an legen finden sich manche Sätze von großer Anziehungskraft. Scheint es doch schon hier in diesem Opus 2 als ob der Komponist vorsichtiger in seinen Harmoniebildungen verfare, denn neben den stellenweise recht gesucht klingenden Accordfolgen begegnet man hier manchen recht einfachen und dabei nie trivial geführten Wendungen. Unzweifelhaft wird der Komponist noch von sich reden machen, jedenfalls sei hiermit ernstlich auf diese seine Erstlingswerke hingewiesen, denn sie verdienen rückhaltlos Beachtung.

Fritz Lemmermayer

Fritz Lemmermayer, österreichischer Schriftsteller und Journalist : geboren 26. März 1857 in Wien (damals Österreich-Ungarn) ; gestorben 11. September 1932 in Wien 6, Sandwirtgasse 5 (Spital ; Zentralfriedhof, Gruppe 17B/1/26) .

Der Vater Carl Lemmermayer, ein Porträtmaler, starb früh, so daß die Mutter Anna (gestorben 1886) , eine Pianistin, vier unmündige Kinder allein großziehen mußte. Ab 1876 studierte Fritz Lemmermayer in Wien Philosophie, Geschichte und Literatur. Bald schrieb er schon Artikel für Journale. Zu seinem Freundeskreis zählten Robert Hamerling und Johann Fercher von Steinwand, vor allem aber Friedrich Hebbel und Richard Wagner. 1887 wirkte Lemmermayer in Genua an der Sammlung und Herausgabe der Briefe Friedrich Hebbels.

Am 31. März 1900 wollte Lemmermayer mit seinem Freund Hugo Astl-Leonhard (gestorben 1870) , Chefredakteur der Zeitschrift « Trautes Heim » , Doppelselbstmord begehen. Während der Freund starb, überlebte Lemmermayer. Er zog sich daraufhin für 25 Jahre auf das Schloß des Fürsten Elimar von Oldenburg in Brogyán zurück. Wieder nach Wien zurückgekehrt kam Lemmermayer in den Kreis von Richard Kralik und freundete sich mit Rudolf Steiner an, deßen Anthroposophischer Gesellschaft er 1926 beirat.

...

Fritz Lemmermayer, Schriftsteller und Journalist : geboren 26. März 1857 in Wien ; gestorben 11. September 1932 ebenda. Nach kurzem Technik und Handelswissenschaften Studierte. Studium er ab 1876 Literatur, Geschichte und Philosophie an der Universität Wien. Schon als Hochschüler war er bei mehreren Zeitung journalistisch tätigkeit Lemmermayer stand Fercher von Steinwand (Kleinfischer) und Hamerling (Hammerling) nahe, er war ein Verehrer Hebbels und Richard Wagners, in dessen Haus er verkehrte. 1887 wirkte er in Genua an der Sammlung und Herausgeber der Hebbel-Briefe mit. Persönlich befreundet war er und andere mit Richard von Kralik, der ihn als Mitarbeiter für seinen Kreis gewann. Lemmermayer anfängliches Bekenntnis zum Pessimismus Schopenhauers wurde abgelöst durch seinen Glauben an die heilbringenden Kräfte der Liebe sowie der Schaffung und Pflege geistiger Werte ; diese Zielsetzung des leidenschaftlichen Antimaterialisten Lemmermayer begründete seine Zugehörigkeit zur anthroposophische Gesellschaft. Für Rudolf Steiner bewirkte er dessen Beziehungen zum Kreis der « Iduna », der Lemmermayer angehörte und die er leitete. Mehr als durch seine Bücher errang Lemmermayer als Mitarbeiter der « Wiener Literatur-Zeitung » durch seine Kritiken und Essays Ansehen. Die von ihm geschaffene Anthologie enthält vorwiegend Dichtung aus Österreich, dessen reicher, wenn auch vielfach ungefördert gebliebener literarische Schaffenskraft Lemmermayer im gesamt. Kulturbereich den ersten Rang zuwies. Lemmermayers eigene frühe Lyrik und ein Teil seiner Prosaschriften tragen epigonenhafte Züge. Diese Feststellung ist nicht zu trennen von der Tatsache seiner hervorragenden Einfühlung in Wesen und Werk anderer. Lemmermayers Verdienste als Biograph wurden von Berufenen anerkannt. Die Gedichte seiner Spätzeit sind den Schöpfungen der großen österreichische Lyriker des 19. Jahrhundert, wie etwa Nikolaus Lenaus, als ebenbürtig anzureihen.

...

Fritz Lemmermayer studierte Technik und Handelswissenschaften, ab 1876 Literatur. Bereits während seines Studiums war er journalistisch tätig. Er kannte Robert Hamerling, Rudolf Steiner (Begründer der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft) und Richard Wagner und verehrte Hebbel, dessen Briefe er gemeinsam mit Doktor Richard Maria Werner herausgab (2 Bände, 1900) . Neben seinen Büchern (Prosa, Lyrik, Biographien auf sehr hohem Niveau) schrieb Lemmermayer auch zahlreiche Kritiken und Essays, die in der « Wiener Literarischen Zeitung » veröffentlicht wurden.

...

Als engster Jugendfreund Rudolf Steiners nimmt Fritz Lemmermayer eine einzigartige Stellung innerhalb der anthroposophischen Bewegung ein. Fritz Lemmermayer wies seinen Freund nicht nur in die verschiedensten Künstlerkreise Wiens ein, er veranlaßte ihn auch zu einem Briefverkehr mit Robert Hamerling und verhalf zur Begegnung mit Fercher von Steinwand. Er ist der Einzige aus Rudolf Steiners Wiener Freundeskreis, der sich später mit Anthroposophie verbinden konnte.

Reich an Klängen, schwermütigen, düsteren, aber auch himmlischen, war sein Leben. Er war ein Mensch des Herzens. In Wien wurde er geboren zu einer Zeit, da die Stadt als Festung aufgegeben wurde und der Ringstraßen-Bau ein großes Schaffensareal für die verschiedensten Künstler ermöglichte. Auch die Enthüllung des Gøthe-Schiller-Denkmal in Weimar von Ernst Rietschel gehört in diese Zeit ; von diesem sollte er später durch einen Brief Rudolf Steiners voll Anerkennung und Bewunderung erfahren.

Als er acht Jahre alt war, starb sein Vater Carl Lemmermayer, ein Porträtmaler. Das kindliche Leben zwischen Farbtöpfen und Musik (die Mutter Anna Lemmermayer war Pianistin) nahm eine radikale Wende. Früh schon mußte Fritz Lemermayer der Mutter, die mit vier unmündigen Kindern um ihren Lebensunterhalt kämpfte, mitverdienen helfen. Zur Mutter sowie zur Schwester Marie fühlte sich der scheue Knabe innig hingezogen.

Nach der Mittelschule fing Fritz Lemermayer ein technisches und handelswissenschaftliches Studium an, 1876 begann er mit dem Universitätsstudium ; Philosophie, Geschichte und Literatur wollte er studieren. Bald entdeckte der junge Student seine Liebe zur Dichtkunst, in den verschiedensten Journalen schrieb er. 1883 entstand sein Roman « Der Alchymist » . Anerkennende Worte sandte ihm Robert Hamerling und Rudolf Steiner erlebte die Entstehung dieses Werkes aus allernächster Nähe mit. Unzählige Male besuchte er den Schreiber in seiner « Alchymisten-Klausur » in der Nähe des Stefansdomes. Junge Dichter scharten sich um ihn. Einem großen Freundeskreis gehörte er an. Mit Rudolf Steiner gemeinsam besuchte er die Samstagnachmittage bei der Dichterin Marie Eugenie delle Grazie.

Die Künstlergesellschaft, die sich bei dem Ehepaar Marie und Alfred Formey traf, besuchten sie ebenfalls. Durch starke Gemütskräfte versuchten sie den heraufkommenden Materialismus, Nihilismus und Pessimismus in Schach zu halten ; dies war auch das Motiv, das eine neue Literaturgesellschaft, « Iduna » genannt, ins Leben rief. Bei der Herausgabe von Friedrich Hebbels Werken arbeitete Fritz Lemermayer unermüdlich mit.

1884 starb seine Schwester Marie, 1886 seine Mutter. Marie war verheiratet mit dem Musiker Carl Udel, einem Vertrauten des Kronprinzen Rudolf. Vieles aus dem Leben des Kronprinzen erfuhr Fritz Lemermayer aus nächster Nähe.

Nachdem Rudolf Steiner nach Weimar übersiedelte und der anfängliche Briefverkehr verebbte, wuchs Fritz Lemermayers Freundschaft mit Martin Greif. 1893 erschien Lemermayers Tragödie « Simson und Delila » , sie verklingt mit den Worten :

« Selig ist es, diese Welt des Wahns und der Wirrnis zu verlassen. »

Sieben Jahre nach diesem Schlußsatz, am 31. März 1900, entschloßen sich Fritz Lemermayer und der 14 Jahre jüngere Hugo Astl-Leonhard (Chefredakteur vom « Trauten Heim ») , durch einen Doppelselbstmord aus dem Leben zu scheiden. Der Freund starb, Fritz Lemermayer konnte gerettet werden. Durch dieses Ereignis ist seine Wiener Zeit zu Ende gegangen.

Fritz Lemermayer fand eine Bleibe auf dem Schloß des Fürsten Elimar von Oldenburg (in Brogyán, heute Brodzany in der Slowakei) . Fritz Lemermayer arbeitete an diesem Ort an einer Übersetzung von 200 englischen Gedichten aus zwei Jahrhunderten in die deutsche Sprache. 1910 bot er seine Arbeit dem Cotta-Verlag an. Dieser lehnte ab. Er kam in Verruf, kein Schriftsteller mehr zu sein, denn viele Jahre hatte er nichts veröffentlicht. Erst 1998 wurde das Manuskript seiner « Englischen Lyrik » gefunden und herausgegeben.

Die letzte Begegnung mit Rudolf Steiner war in Berlin in einer Bahn, die nach Friedenau fuhr. Es war in der Zeit, in der Rudolf Steiner Vorträge im Architektenhaus Berlins hielt. Die Jugendfreunde begrüßten sich aufs Herzlichste, standen sich noch einmal Aug in Auge gegenüber.

Am 24. September 1924 wurde Lemmermayer auf dem Schloßgelände in Brodzany auf einem Spaziergang von zahlreichen Hunden, welche sehr gefürchtet waren, ihm aber bis dahin gut waren, überfallen. Sie zerrissen ihn vom Hals bis zu den Füßen und brachten ihm klaffende Wunden bei. Ein halbes Jahr mußte er nun das Bett hüten, Fieber, Thrombose, doppelseitige Lungenentzündung stellten sich ein. Ein zweites Mal stand er an der Todesschwelle. Aufopferungsvoll wurde er von dem damals 23-jährigen Heinz Robert von Wallpach gepflegt. Ende März 1925 konnte der Kranke das erste Mal sein Lager verlassen und wenige Wochen darauf verließ Fritz Lemmermayer in Begleitung seines Pflegers für immer den Ort, an den er sich so viele Jahre wie « gebannt » gefühlt hatte.

Nach Wien kehrte er zurück, in die Stadt, in der er einst Rudolf Steiner kennen lernte und wo er nun der Anthroposophie begegnen sollte. Von ? Ferdinand Wanschura aufgenommen, wohnte er bis zuletzt in der Neubaugasse 29. Fritz Lemmermayer wurde 1926 Mitglied der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft. Im Jahre 1927 erkrankte er an einer selten schweren Art von Masern und einer Pneumonie. Immer mehr und mehr verband er sich mit dem Geistesgut seines Jugendfreundes, von dem er nun, durch Österreich, Deutschland, die Schweiz, Frankreich, Holland und England reisend, in kleinen und größeren Versammlungen, auf die gemeinsam verbrachte Wiener Zeit zurückblickend, sprach. Mit der Lauterkeit und Vornehmheit sowie dem feinen Takt seines Herzens führte er die Zuhörer ; er sprach auch über Fercher von Steinwand, Robert Hamerling, schrieb noch manchen Aufsatz in der Wochenschrift « Das Gøetheanum » , erlebte eine Neuauflage seines Jugendromans « Der Alchymist » sowie das Erscheinen seiner Gedichte und seines Buches « Erinnerungen » . Mit zahlreichen bekannten Anthroposophen kam er in Berührung : ? Marie Steiner, ? Albert Steffen, ? Elisabeth Vreede, ? Ita Wegman, ? Otto Graf von Lerchenfeld, ? Ernst Uehli, ? Emmanuel Joseph van Leer, ? Ludwig Graf von Polzer-Hoditz und vielen anderen.

Das Pastell Rudolf Steiners, 1923 entstanden mit dem Namen « Der Forscher inmitten von Marianus und Gabrilein » , zeigt eine Hauptgestalt aus des Dichters Jugendroman.

...

Fritz Lemmermayer war ein österreichischer Schriftsteller, Journalist und engster Jugendfreund Rudolf Steiners in Wien. Später fand er auch, als einziger von Steiners Jugendfreunden, zur Anthroposophie.

Fritz Lemmermayer wurde als Sohn von Carl und Anna Lemmermayer geboren. Sein Vater war Porträtmaler, seine Mutter Pianistin. Zu ihr und zu seiner Schwester Marie hatte der scheue Knabe ein besonders inniges Verhältnis. Als Fritz acht Jahre alt war, starb der Vater und die Mutter mußte nun unter schwierigen Verhältnissen für den Unterhalt von vier unmündigen Kindern sorgen und schon früh mußte Fritz mitverdienen helfen.

Fritz besuchte die Mittelschule und begann nach abgelegter Reifeprüfung für kurze Zeit ein technisches und handelswissenschaftliches Studium. Ab 1876 studierte er dann Philosophie, Geschichte und Literatur und entdeckte seine Liebe zur Dichtkunst und schrieb schon bald für die verschiedensten Journale. Zu seinem großen Freundeskreis zählten auch die Dichter Robert Hamerling und Fercher von Steinwand. Vor allem aber war Fritz auch ein glühender Verehrer von Friedrich Hebbel und Richard Wagner, in deßen Haus er regelmäßig verkehrte. Sein anfänglicher Hang zur pessimistischen Philosophie Schopenhauers wich bald dem unverbrüchlichen Glauben an die heilbringenden Kräfte der Liebe. Als leidenschaftlicher Anti-Materialist wollte er sein Leben der Schaffung und Pflege geistiger Werte widmen.

1883 vollendete Fritz Lemmermayer seinen Roman « Der Alchemist », seine bedeutendste literarische Leistung, zu der auch Hamerling sehr anerkennende Worte fand. 1884 starb seine geliebte Schwester Marie, die mit dem Musiker Carl Udel, einem Vertrauten des Kronprinzen Rudolf, verheiratet gewesen war, wodurch Lemmermayer vieles aus dem Leben des Kronprinzen aus unmittelbarer Nähe erfahren hatte. 1886 starb auch Lemmermayers Mutter.

Rudolf Steiner lernte Lemmermayer im selben Jahr 1886 im Kreis der Dichterin Marie Eugenie delle Grazie kennen. Ein ausgedehnter Briefwechsel bezeugt die enge Freundschaft, die zwischen den beiden entstand. In « Mein Lebensgang » berichtet Steiner :

« Fritz Lemmermayer, mit dem ich später eng befreundet wurde, lernte ich an den delle Grazie- Nachmittagen kennen. Ein ganz merkwürdiger Mensch. Er sprach alles, wofür er sich interessierte, mit innerlich gemessener Würde. In seinem Äußeren war er ebenso dem Musiker Rubinstein wie dem Schauspieler Lewinsky ähnlich. Mit Hebbel trieb er fast einen Kultus. Er hatte über Kunst und Leben bestimmte, aus dem klugen Herzenskennen geborene Anschauungen, die außerordentlich fest in ihm saßen. Er hat den interessanten, tiefgründigen Roman “ Der Alchymist ” geschrieben und manches Schöne und auch Gedankentiefe. Er wußte die kleinsten Dinge des Lebens in den Gesichtspunkt des Wichtigen zu rücken. Ich denke, wie ich ihn einmal in seinem lieben Stübchen in einer Seitengasse in Wien mit anderen Freunden besuchte. Er hatte sich eben selbst seine Mahlzeit bereitet : zwei kernweiche Eier auf einem Schnellsieder ; dazu Brot. Mit Emphase sprach er, während das Wasser wallte, uns die Eier zu sieden : “ Das wird köstlich sein. ” »

1887 arbeitete Fritz Lemmermayer in Genua an der Sammlung und Herausgabe von Hebbels Briefen mit. Wenn Lemmermayers frühe Dichtungen und Prosaschriften vielfach auch nur epigonenhafte Züge trugen, so zeichnete ihn ganz besonders sein tiefes Einfühlungsvermögen in die Werke anderer aus. Die reiferen Gedichte seiner Spätzeit sind denen der großen österreichischen Lyriker des 19. Jahrhunderts, wie beispielsweise Nikolaus Lenau, aber durchaus ebenbürtig. Als Mitarbeiter der « Wiener Literatur Zeitung » fand er besonders durch seine Kritiken und Essays großes Ansehen.

Lemmermayer und Steiner reihten sich auch in den Wiener Künstlerkreis ein, der sich wöchentlich im Haus des evangelischen Pfarrers Alfred Formey (1844-1901) und seiner Gattin Marie in der Dorotheergasse versammelte. Hier verkehrte auch Christine Hebbel, die Witwe Friedrich Hebbels.

« Es war auch im Jahre 1888, als ich in das Haus des Wiener evangelischen Pfarrers Alfred Formey eingeführt wurde. Einmal in der Woche versammelte sich dort ein Kreis von Künstlern und Schriftstellern. Alfred Formey war selbst als Dichter aufgetreten. Fritz Lemmermayer charakterisierte ihn aus Freundesherzen heraus so : “ Warmherzig, innig in der Naturempfindung, schwärmerisch, trunken fast im Glauben an Gott und Seligkeit, so dichtet Alfred Formey in weichen, brausenden Akkorden. Es ist, als ob sein Schritt nicht die harte Erde berührte, sondern als ob er hoch in den Wolken hindämmerte und träumte. ” Und so war Alfred Formey auch als Mensch. Man fühlte sich recht erdentrück, wenn man in dieses Pfarrhaus kam und zunächst nur der Hausherr und die Hausfrau da waren. »

1891 wurde Lemmermayer Vizepräsident des Schriftstellerbundes Iduna, benannt nach Iduna, der nordischen Göttin der Jugend und Unsterblichkeit, der als Gegengewicht gegen die Strömungen des Naturalismus und insbesondere gegen die von Hermann Bahr angeführte Gruppe Jung-Wien gegründet worden war. Ehrenpräsident des Bundes war Fercher von Steinwand und die Dichterin Auguste Hyrtl, Gattin des weltbekannten Anatomen Josef Hyrtls, der dem materialistischen Fortschrittsglauben kritisch gegenüberstand, wurde Vorstandsmitglied dieses Kreises, und auch Alfred Formey nahm daran teil.

Nachdem Steiner im Herbst 1890 nach Weimar gegangen war, um an der Herausgabe der Naturwissenschaftlichen Schriften Goethes für die große Weimarer Goethe-Ausgabe mitzuarbeiten, vertiefte sich die Freundschaft Lemmermayers mit Martin Greif. 1893 veröffentlichte Lemmermayer seine Tragödie « Simson und Delila », die mit den Worten endet :

« Selig ist es, diese Welt des Wahns und der Wirrnis zu verlassen. »

- eine Sehnsucht, die Lemmermayer sieben Jahre später gemeinsam mit dem jungen Chefredakteur von « Trautes Heim » , Hugo Astl-Leonhard, am 31. März 1900 durch einen Doppelselbstmord stillen wollte. Der Freund starb, doch Lemmermayer überlebte.

Die nächsten 25 Jahre verbrachte Lemmermayer auf dem Schloß des Fürsten Elimar von Oldenburg in Brogyán, dem heutigen heute Brodzany in der Slowakei. Hier arbeitete er an der Übersetzung von 200 englischen Gedichten aus zwei Jahrhunderten, die allerdings 1910 vom Cotta-Verlag abgelehnt und erst 1998 aus dem Nachlaß veröffentlicht wurde.

Am 24. September 1924 wurde Lemmermayer Opfer eines dramatischen Zwischenfalls. Während eines Spaziergangs auf dem Schloßgelände in Brodzany wurde er von mehreren Hunden angefallen und vom Hals bis zu den Füßen so schwer verletzt, daß er ein halbes Jahr lang das Bett hüten mußte. Fieber, Thrombosen und eine doppelseitige Lungenentzündung brachten ihn an den Rand des Todes. Nur der aufopferungsvollen Pflege des damals 23-jährigen Heinz Robert von Wallpach war es zu verdanken, daß er Ende März 1925 erstmals sein Krankenlager verlassen und bald darauf in Begleitung seines Pflegers nach Wien übersiedeln konnte. Er verließ damit für immer den Ort, an den er sich so viele Jahre wie gebannt gefühlt hatte.

In Wien wohnte Lemmermayer bis zu seinem Tod in der Neubaugasse 29. Er lernte nun die Anthroposophie Rudolf Steiners näher kennen und schätzen und wurde 1926 Mitglied der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft. 1927 erkrankte Lemmermayer an einer schweren und seltenen Art von Masern und an einer neuerlichen Lungenentzündung. Er verband sich nun immer mehr mit der Geisteswissenschaft Steiners und auf vielen Reisen durch Österreich, Deutschland, die Schweiz, Frankreich, Holland und England sprach er in seiner feinsinnigen Art von der gemeinsam mit Steiner in Wien verbrachten Zeit, und pflegte auch die Erinnerung an Robert Hamerling und Fercher von Steinwand. Daraus entstanden die 1929 veröffentlichten Erinnerungen an Rudolf Steiner, an Robert Hamerling und an einige Persönlichkeiten des österreichischen Geisteslebens der 80er Jahre. Darüber hinaus veröffentlichte Lemmermayer auch manche Artikel in der Wochenschrift « Das Goetheanum » . Auf seinen Reisen lernte er auch viele bedeutende Anthroposophen kennen.

Werke

Anthologie österreichischer Lyrik und Die deutsche Lyrik der Gegenwart (1884) .

Der Alchimist, Roman (1884) ; Berlin (1885) ; Stuttgart (1928) .

Gudrun. Ein deutsches Heldenlied, Stuttgart (1889) .

Der Goldschmied von Köln, Roman (1890) .

Menschen und Schicksale, Minden in Wien (1890) .

Im Labyrinth des Lebens, Gedichte (1892) (1899) .

Simson und Delila, Tragödie, Leipzig (1893) .

Belladonna, Roman (1895-1896) .

Haschisch. Orientalische Erzählung, Budapest (1898) (1904) .

Das öde Haus. Armut und Übermut, 2 Erzählungen (1900) .

Novellen-Novelletten, Linz (1903) 2. Auflage (1909) ; gemeinsam mit Dietrich von Kralik.

Novellen und Novelletten, Linz (1903) ;

Leiden eines deutschen Fürsten. Herzog Elmar von Oldenburg, Biographische Skizze (1905) .

Neue Hebbel-Dokumente, Berlin (1913) ; gemeinsam mit Dietrich von Kralik.

Gedichte, Stuttgart (1928) .

Erinnerungen an Rudolf Steiner, an Robert Hamerling und an einige andere Persönlichkeiten des österreichischen Geisteslebens der 80er Jahre, Stuttgart (1929) ; Basel (1992) .

Englische Lyrik, Ottersberg (1999)

Beiträge, in : G, N, OeB, Pfa.

Literatur

Emil Lucka. Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon, Giebisch-Gugitz : Giebisch-Pichler-Vančsa ; Kosch : Maderno, Nagl-Zeidler-Castle, Bände 3, 4, 5, Regierung.

Bio-Bibliographisches Literaturlexikon Österreichs, Wien (ohne Jahr) .

Ungedruckte Briefe Robert Hamerlings, Wien (ohne Jahr) .

Kasch. Kürschner (1879) .

Ludwig Eisenberg. Das geistige Wien. Künstler- und Schriftsteller-Lexikon. Mitteilungen über Wiener Architekten, Bildhauer, Bühnenkünstler, Graphiker, Journalisten, Maler, Musiker und Schriftsteller. Band I, Daberkow, Wien (1889) .

F. Brümmer und M. Geißler. Führer durch die Deutsche Literatur des 20. Jahrhundert (1913) .

Deutsch-Österreichische Literaturgeschichte, Wien (1931) .

R. Presse und Wiener Zeitung (16. September 1932) .

H. E. Lauer. Fritz Lemmermayer, in : N (1932) , Nr. 40.

Heinz Kindermann. Wegweiser durch die moderne Literatur in Österreich (1947) .

Österreichisches biographisches Lexikon (1815-1950) , Herausgeber von der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften. Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Böhlau, Wien und Graz (1954-lfd) .

Hans Markl. Kennst du die berühmten letzten Ruhestätten auf den Wiener Friedhöfen ? Band I : Zentralfriedhof und Krematorium (Urnenhain) . Pechan, Wien (1961) ; Seite 55.

GA, Band 28, 7. Auflage (1962) .

Hans Giebisch und Gustav Gugitz. Bio-Bibliographisches Literaturlexikon Österreichs von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart. Hollinek, Wien (1963) .

Unsere Heimat. Zeitschrift für Landeskunde von Niederösterreich, Band 37, Nr. 1/3 (1966) ; Seite 55.

Rath (1971) .

V. Hanus. Fritz Lemmermayer, in : Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon (ÖBL) 1815-1950, Band 5, Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Wien (1972) ; Seite 124.

GA, Band 38 (1985) .

Schöffler (1987) .

Lindenberg, Chronik (1988) .

Andrea Hitsch. « Inmitten ein einsamer Wanderer. Vergessene Künstler um Rudolf Steiner in Wien » , Dornach (2002) .

Erich Schwebsch

Music and Mysticism in the Weimar Republic : The Case of Anton Bruckner and Erich Schwebsch

(Doctor Nicholas Attfield, Saint-Catherine's College, Oxford.)

I will begin with my title. Anton Bruckner clearly needs no introduction to the readers of the « Bruckner Journal » ; likewise, the Weimar Republic (that is, the German State in the years 1918-1933) is surely familiar to most people. I can see that I am going to have to work a little harder, though, with my title's 2 outstanding terms, namely mysticism and Erich Schwebsch. Let's get underway by travelling from the latter towards the former.

I have to confess straight away that, presumably like most readers, I don't know very much about Erich Schwebsch. He is not a character who crops-up in the « New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians » or « Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » (MGG) ; while his name is occasionally seen in other large Germanic reference works, it is almost always in the middle of a long list of long forgotten names. Even in the esteemed pages of the « Bruckner Journal » , he seems to have had only one mention, in a paragraph from Raymond Cox's 2002 article, « Bruckner's Cosmic Musical Background in Relation to the Zodiac » - this title, alone, should give you a flavour of what is to come.

What I can say for certain about Schwebsch is that he lived from 1889 to 1953, that he studied modern languages and « Germanistik » in Berlin, and that he was a life-long devotee of Johann Sebastian Bach, Richard Wagner and, of course, Anton Bruckner. He wrote a number of books on these subjects : « Goethe and Wagner » , for example, published in Bayreuth in 1919 ; and « Johann Sebastian Bach and the Art of Fugue » , published in Stuttgart in 1931. His principal Bruckner text, which first appeared in 1921, was entitled, « Anton Bruckner : Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis von Entwicklungen in der Musik » (Anton Bruckner : A Contribution to Awareness of Developments in Music) ; he later added a considerable essay in the « Neue Musik-Zeitung » journal, in honour of the Centenary of Bruckner's birth, and a monograph on the 6th Symphony. I will return to the content of these texts shortly. But first, I want to outline Schwebsch's general approach to Bruckner - and it is here that we step-back into or, at least, around the peripheries of the realm of mysticism. For Schwebsch was one of the world's first, and, perhaps, still one of the world's only, self-proclaimed « music anthroposophists » . Anthroposophy, otherwise known as « spiritual science » , was largely the brainchild of the prolific Austrian thinker Rudolf Steiner (1861-1925) . Prolific is really the word here : I doubt that, at least in the modern age, there have been many thinkers with influence in so many different directions at once. Steiner's formal training was in maths and philosophy (undertaken in Vienna) and, so, he began his career as something of a philosopher and literary scholar, working on editions of the texts of G ethe, Schopenhauer, and Nietzsche. He later became, nonetheless, an educational reformer (he was the founder of Steiner schools, as we tend to call them - or « Waldorf-Schule » , as they are known in German) ; he was a social activist, he wrote plays, he painted pictures, he invented bio-dynamic agriculture, and the art form « Eurythmy » - which involves expressive movement in response to music and speech. His life's writings and lectures, unsurprisingly then, take-up over 350 volumes.

Amidst all this activity, anthroposophy remained Steiner's most highly-prized doctrine, the jewel in the crown of all his esoteric thought (and indeed, still is : the Anthroposophical Society that Steiner and others established in Germany, in 1913, is still today very much a thriving concern) . Its name's Greek roots literally referring to « human wisdom » , anthroposophy was described by Steiner as « a path of knowledge, to guide the Spiritual in the human being to the Spiritual in the universe » .

He says :

« It arises in man as a need of the heart, of the life of feeling ; and it can be justified insofar as it can satisfy this inner need. »

It is, by no means, however, the same as conventional mysticism ; Steiner found this latter too clouded in its approach to spiritual questions ; rather, with anthroposophy, he aimed to apply the clarity of thought found in the natural sciences to inner life - hence, the alternative name « spiritual science » . Overall, he advocates spiritual enquiry driven by thought freed from the empirical senses ; the kind of « internal » thought, I suppose, that we might conventionally apply to a question of logic or geometry.

When, in the 1924 lecture « Eurythmy as visible song » , he asks the question « Was ist das Musikalische ? » , then, it is not entirely surprising to find that his answer is similarly non-empirical - « Das Musikalische » , he states, is that « which is not heard » ; that which you « don't hear » between the tones of a melody is the « music in reality » or « the spirit in the thing » , whereas the tones themselves are simply the spirit's sensory expression.

Before we come to the application of Rudolf Steiner's anthroposophical thinking in Schwab's writings, though, I just want to clarify part of my agenda here. I'm anxious not to see these modes of thought in their own esoteric vacuum, as revealing as that may (or may not) prove. Rather, I am interested in reconnecting these kinds of esotericism with the political and cultural contexts from which they grew. And I should state right away, then, that, in Steiner's quest for a spiritual essence hiding behind the tones of a piece of music, I see a parallel with other searches for essence taking place in Germanic countries, at this time. I also see a cataclysmic provocation for these searches in common : the First World War, an event more disastrous and humiliating for German-speaking countries than anything before it, brought in its wake an urgent need to identify and cling on to the so-called « eternal values » of its culture, in the hope that they might soon be rejuvenated.

Now, of course, there are varying degrees in which such quests could be outspoken in their connection with contemporary politics ; perhaps, Steiner's writings on music reflect the mostly implicit end of the scale, by which I mean that their approach claims to transcend all earthly concerns. At the other end of the scale, however, I think we might place the writings from this period that asked « Was ist deutsche Musik ? » , that is, those writings that, within the pages of Germany's most conservative music periodicals, sought a specifically national and racial essence lying somewhere in or between the tones of great works of music. These, as is well-known, directed an unprecedented amount of vitriol towards the self-consciously « new » music of the period, finding there a foreign, and highly-damaging, influence on Germany's musical life. « New at any price » was the slogan of modern composers, the reactionaries claimed.

Yet, what is particularly fascinating is that, whether we consider the period from the perspective of Steiner, his apostle Schwebsch, or the ultra-conservatives, one name appears again and again as a saving grace in the midst of all this cultural confusion : and that, of course, is : Anton Bruckner. Bruckner's Symphonies, since their earliest reception in the late- 19th Century, had always been associated with « absolute » or essential revelation ; they had always offered, for many, a mystical glimpse of the Schopenhauerian world-in-itself and the promise of its transcendence. But, in the era after the First World War, these claims took on a new eloquence and urgency : Steiner, for instance, speaks in a late lecture that he gave (in Torquay, of all places) of Bruckner's 9th Symphony as necessitating a bold step into the purely musical (« in rein Musikalischen ») that, in turn, conjures the essence of the world, « das Wesenhafte » , in tones. And we also know of the rapid flourishing of a concerted « Bruckner-Bewegung » (Bruckner Movement) throughout German society at this time, that, in keeping with the nostalgic goal of rejuvenating past values, sought to promote the « true » Bruckner, a figure allegedly obscured by the vituperative excesses of his ignorant critics - a considerable part of this project, of course, was to produce and perform unadulterated editions of his Symphonies. These activities reached their height at Bruckner's Centenary, in 1924, with a variety of events in celebration of his life and works : music festivals in major cities and small towns alike, « Festschriften » and special periodical issues, and the dedication of Societies in the composer's name. Moreover, with the official foundation of the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (IBG) in Vienna, in February 1929, an organization came into being that could coordinate these wide-spread activities. These years, as Carl Dahlhaus once put it, were indeed the highest-height of Bruckner's fame.

Schwebsch's writings

I have used this introduction to establish a constellation of connected ideas : Rudolf Steiner and anthroposophy, quests for Germanic cultural essence in the inter-War period, and stinging critiques of that period's « modern » culture and music. This constellation is now going to help us, I hope, to chart an intelligible course through the twists and turns of Schwebsch's labyrinthine writings on Anton Bruckner. Straight away, in the 2nd line of the foreword to his 1921 book, « Anton Bruckner : A Contribution to Awareness of Developments in Music » , we find one of our ideas.

Schwebsch says :

« From thoughts arising from years of following recent music, the author was led to the anthroposophically-oriented spiritual science of Rudolf Steiner, that brought with it a new, boundless revelation of all historical Becoming. »

Schwebsch seems to mean that Steiner's work has given him new belief in the progress of human history - a promising development, since, for Schwebsch at least, the 1st decades of the 20th Century had been utterly bleak in cultural, musical, and spiritual terms. He finds the modern artist to be descended from the decadent figures of Nietzsche, Strindberg, and Dostoyevsky, in whom « the pathological became a quality of genius » ; he says that the modern artist is driven by materialism, agnosticism, and arbitrariness. Like civilization itself, his art is homeless, rootless and, above all, spiritless. In what sounds like a direct denunciation of expressionism, Schwebsch rails against modern music as that in which « the sick human screams and grows ever darker » ; as that in which the « all-too-human is repeatedly called-up for the listener » . He resorts to a striking Christian metaphor to claim that within modern music, the « essence of mankind » is nothing less than « crucified » .

As we might suspect from what we have already seen, the saving grace in this situation for Schwebsch is Bruckner. Though it is highly-unlikely that he ever met the composer, Schwebsch clearly feels a profound and personal connection to him ; let's not forget, after all, that Bruckner had been dead for less than 30 years at this point and, so, was very much in fond communal living memory. Indeed, at the opening of his Centenary salutation for the composer, Schwebsch even brings the apparent fact of Bruckner's death itself into question.

He says :

« Measured in spiritual terms, a conception of life cannot come to an end. The creative essence continues its spiritual existence, and human love is the bridge through which it participates in life even after earthly death. »

For Schwebsch, then, Bruckner and his music are very much a contemporary concern, and, moreover, something of a Schwelle, or threshold : on the one hand, they are the prize for which the human soul had been striving for the past 2 Centuries ; on the other, and even more significantly, they present a new attitude of that soul, a « neue Seelenhaltung » . This is music, according to Schwebsch, that is « not of this world » , music that « awakens the highest humanity in everyone. Here reign powers of resurrection in a human essence that, at its very core, is built upon the essence of Christ » . Ultimately, this is music that uncovers the true meaning of the word religion.

Schwebsch writes :

Here is found re-ligio, reconnection, re-discovery. Here, the divine world of humankind is created anew. Here, re-sounds for the 1st time and in the highest æsthetic and ethical sense : pure music ! »

Schwebsch makes this identification partly on the basis of his knowledge of Bruckner's own devout faith.

Schwebsch claims :

« Since childhood, Bruckner's humble consciousness purified itself of all personal content so that an inspirational spiritual world could stream in. »

Thus, unlike Beethoven, who « forged his music from the sheer act of concentration », Bruckner's themes came into existence and developed, through religious meditation.

Equally demonstrative of Bruckner's importance in human history is, for Schwebsch, his mature musical investment in the Symphony.

He says :

« Born from spiritual sound, Symphonic music treads forth as witness of a spiritual world, as a Master of feelings that it presents in their greatest purity and strength. »

This is music that truly offers an « image of the world » that stands contrary to the one we receive from our eyes : it unites the sensory with the extra-sensory, the revealed with the hidden. It is nothing less, says Schwebsch, than the « tönende Weltidee », that is, the idea of the world in tones ; a catch-phrase that, at once, blends Eduard Hanslick's famous « tönend bewegte Formen » (sounding moving forms) with Plato's and Schopenhauer's doctrine of the fundamental ideas underlying all empirical existence. At the same time, it fulfills the tenets of anthroposophy as defined by Steiner : the guiding of the Spiritual in the human being to the Spiritual in the universe.

Through Bruckner, then, the young generation of the 1920's would overcome the rubble of the War and would experience the « resurrection of modern music », an event driven by the birth of a « self in full inner-contact with the spiritual world » and « a life directed by a clear knowledge of God and, never again, torn to pieces in the world of its nerves ». Employing rhetoric that became ever more common in the following decade, Schwebsch adds that Bruckner will, thus, become seen as the 1st « Klassiker » of a new spiritual human elite, of a new race of the soul borne of « deutsche Gemüt und Geblüt » : the German mind and bloodline.

A Musical Case Study : The Adagio of Bruckner's 6th Symphony

Having reviewed Schwebsch's words about Bruckner, I would now like to bring us down to earth a little (but only a little) by offering something more practical : namely, an account of his approach to a specific movement from Bruckner's « œuvre ». What I want to know here is how the rich complex of ideas, doctrines, and motivations that define Schwebsch's writing inflect his view of Bruckner's Adagio ; in other words, how do his anthroposophical beliefs and conservative cultural outlook guide his hand in interpreting this music ? In turn, I am interested to know if and how Schwebsch's interpretation might give us new ways to think about and engage with Bruckner's Symphonies. And the movement that I have chosen for this purpose is the Adagio of the 6th Symphony, as described in Schwebsch's book on the work. If the 1st movement of the 6th is, for Schwebsch, the Symphony's « Kopfsatz » (literally, head-movement) , then, the Adagio is its « Herzsatz » : the work's very heart. As such, he says, it sets us on a trajectory inwards ; if the 1st movement showed us « shimmering cosmic distances », then, this one leads us into the « flourishing fullness of maternal inner-life ». Its home key of F major also makes it, according to Schwebsch's sparsely outlined theory of tonality, evocative of nature : F, he says, spreads a sense of the « elementary life of slumbering nature » and, hence, Beethoven, Wagner, and Weber's use of it as a « pastoral key ». (He independently verifies, incidentally, that on a trip to the American side of the Niagara Falls, in Winter 1939, he himself heard nature sound in the key of F major) .

Perhaps, most meaningfully of all, though, this movement is the spiritual night in contrast to the opening movement's spiritual day : as Schwebsch himself points-out, Novalis's « Hymnen an die Nacht » , a favourite document of Romantic æsthetics, found night to be the best metaphor for the « real, world lying outside the senses » and took sleep as representing the journey of the human soul into that world. Schwebsch can, thus, claim that, likewise, Bruckner's Adagio allows those « nocturnal powers of the world » to sound that guide the human being into the « deeper reality » of sleep and allow him (or her) to become spiritually regenerated.

The 1st theme, then, is the beginning of this nocturnal spiritual journey : Schwebsch treats its regular ascending and descending motion, best evoked by the lower-strings, as the « solemn breathing of a peaceful slumberer » . With the plaintive accents of the oboe melody that enters at bar 5, we are, then, borne down into a world of dreams, the equivalent, so it would seem, of the hidden life of the soul. And this sinking motion is fundamental, in Schwebsch's view, to the movement as a whole : in contrast to the ascending trajectory of many of Bruckner's other movements, we are here drawn downwards, he says, using another of his favourite metaphors, into the « maternal womb » (« mütterlichen Schoß ») .

The 2nd theme, based in the dominant of the 1st movement's A major tonality, provides a brief stopping-place on this downwards journey : it allows the higher sound world of this earlier music to mix, if only for a short time, with the dark sounds of the Adagio. With the 3rd theme, finally, we seem to have arrived somewhere : the « sinking current of movement » becomes, in Schwebsch's words, a « serious and quiet funeral procession (" Trauerzug ") » , marked by shadow-like pizzicato basses and toneless, dull timpani rhythms.

Nonetheless, as we recall from Schwebsch's preamble, this journey into the night was not so much about death as about regeneration and transfiguration, and so, in the 2nd part of his reading, this is exactly what we find : the recapitulation of themes he hears not as dictated by formal convention but rather as necessary to the chronicling of the development of the soul. In particular, the reprise of the 1st theme is a passage of revelation : its new figures in accompaniment and richer inner-polyphony bring a « wonderful excitement » for Schwebsch.

He says :

« The plaintive tone is forgotten and, from it, comes a newly-delivered and flourishing life. »

This is the high-point of the entire movement. Likewise, he hears the 2nd theme's return as the sound of « deepest, most spiritualized worship » , a change in part brought about by its key of F major - the tonality of nature, of course, that unites this theme, in Schwebsch's words, « with the maternal fundament » (« mütterlichen Urgrund ») .

Finally, the end of Schwebsch's description of this Adagio gives rise to a striking description that, for me, in its appeal to anthroposophical connection as to spiritual re-birth, neatly sums-up his approach to the movement, to Bruckner's music, and even to his hopes for the future of German culture.

He remarks :

« All the movement's descending scales come together at the end like a sonorous ladder from heaven, from which we experience the descent of the divine, through the spiritual realm and into the earthly sphere. There are few sounds like those of this spirit-blessed sleep-Adagio - it is the most tender artistic transfiguration of a spiritual conception, that now grows towards birth in the womb of the soul. »

Conclusions

So, to a few concluding remarks. I mentioned the possibility of finding something new here, and I would like to begin by pursuing that end. Certainly, I do not think that Schwebsch's means of analyzing Bruckner's 6th Symphony offers us anything out of the ordinary : in spite of his commitment to the revelation of Brucknerian secrets through meditation, as he puts it, his approach boils down to a relatively common place (and even unacceptably broad-brush) labelling of thematic material and harmonic areas inside a Sonata structure - as we might find in far more incisive shape in many writings of the period and since.

Perhaps, it is in Schwebsch's rhetorical and hermeneutic approach to this Symphony, then, that something more valuable is to be discovered - that is, the manner in which he interprets meaning in the 6th is arguably the most compelling quality of his writing. Yet, even here, it strikes me that we struggle to come across anything excitingly new for Bruckner criticism : as strange as an anthroposophical approach might appear at 1st glance, Schwebsch's conviction in Bruckner's music as disclosing the mysteries of inner-life, the infinite cosmos, or a spiritual re-birth are not so different, in my opinion, to beliefs found in virtually any vintage of writings about Bruckner.

Nonetheless, I do not want to dismiss Schwebsch as old hat, or as a pale imitation of other better-known Brucknerians. On the contrary : I want to suggest that, precisely because we are so comfortable and familiar with the conclusions at which he arrives, the rhetoric and hermeneutics adopted by Schwebsch and his mystical contemporaries must have become woven into the fabric of Bruckner discourse. I recall, as an example of this fabric's influence, reading about the Nazi « Dunkelkonzerte » (Darkness-Concerts) . As you may know, these were events that took place in the Vienna « Konzerthaus » , between 1939 and 1944, in which the « Wiener Symphoniker » would take to the stage and, under the direction of Hans Weisbach, would perform a program of works in near-complete darkness. The crowning piece would always be a Symphony and, in the vast majority of cases, a Bruckner Symphony. Their underlying æsthetic, I would suggest, points back to the ideas that we have heard about today : as one organizer explained in a « Dunkelkonzert » program note, « the tones resonate on this occasion through the room, dark as night » , so that « the essence of music is recognized » , or, as is elsewhere remarked, « our newly-introduced concerts in the darkened hall correspond to National-Socialist strivings after the internalization and absorption of the art experience » . In the writings of Schwebsch and others, then, it seems to me that Nazi ideologues found a rich fund of ideas for the taking ; a fund that still makes its presence known in the ways in which we, today, write about and play Bruckner's music.

Ultimately, then, outlandish though they may seem on 1st inspection, the mysteries of anthroposophy and similar modes of thought were inextricably bound-up with the conservative forces of German culture and music in the inter-War period. As such, they became a defining feature of the discourse and remain part and parcel of the mysteries of Anton Bruckner today - and so, I would suggest, an intrepid descent into their world is never likely to be dull, or indeed, uninformative.

...

Ernst Kurth makes several references to Erich Schwebsch, in : « Anton Bruckner : Ein Beitrag zur Erkemzmis von Entwickelmtgen in der Musik » , in : « Der Kommende Tag » , Stuttgart (1921) . Schwebsch's extensive writings have appeared as « Bruckners Symphonien » , edited by Jürgen Schriefer, Freies Geistesleben & Urachhaus, Stuttgart (2003) .

...

Erich Schwebsch, Musikwissenschaftler, Publizist, Pädagoge, Anthroposoph, Waldorflehrer : geboren 9. Juli 1889 Frankfurt an der Oder (Deutschland) ; gestorben 24. Mai 1953 in Freiburg im Breisgau.

Kurzbiografie : Leiter des Bundes der Freien Waldorfschulen (1889-1953) .

Wirkungsorte : Stuttgart.

Beziehung zu anderen Personen : Felicia Schwebsch (Ehefrau) .

Ein junger Mann, klein von Wuchs, aber mit einem ausdrucksvollen, an Wilhelm Furtwängler erinnernden Schädel, besucht zusammen mit seinem Vater den berühmten Wagner-Fachmann Professor Sternfeld in Berlin. Der junge Mann ist universell begabt, er war im Gymnasium in allen Fächern immer der Beste, spielte vorzüglich Klavier und hatte sich mit seinem um fünf Jahre älteren Bruder, der Geige spielte, ein beachtliches Repertoire aufgebaut und sich autodidaktisch ein profundes musikwissenschaftliches Fachwissen angeeignet. Er war ein begeisterter Wagnerianer, aktiv im Akademischen Wagnerverein in Berlin, wo er Engelbert Humperdinck und Siegfried Wagner kennenlernte. Er studierte dort neuere Sprachen und Germanistik an der Universität. Sein großer Wunsch und sein Lebensziel aber ist es, Dirigent zu werden. Arthur Nikisch und seine Anton Bruckner Interpretationen hatten einen nachhaltigen Eindruck auf ihn gemacht. Der Vater geht mit seinem Sohn und dessen Lebenswunsch zu Professor Sternfeld und läßt sich die Aussichten auf diesen Beruf erklären. Der spricht von einem brotlosen Beruf und der Vater weiß genug. Kurzerhand verbietet er dem 23-jährigen diesen Berufswechsel und zerknirscht verläßt er die Wohnung des verehrten Professors. Der junge Mann war Erich Schwebsch.

Das war 1912. Mit seiner Verlobten Felicia Sintenis entschließt er sich, das Studium fortzusetzen. Bei Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges meldet sich Erich Schwebsch als Kriegsfreiwilliger und liegt drei Jahre vor Verdun. Da der Krieg nicht enden will, entschließen sie sich trotz der widrigen Umstände zur Ehe und werden von Friedrich Rittelmeyer getraut. Er liest Bücher von Rudolf Steiner. Mit der « Philosophie der Freiheit » kann er nichts anfangen, aber « Gøethe als Vater einer neuen Ästhetik » zündet bei ihm sofort. Nach Kriegsende mußte das Staatsexamen nachgeholt werden. In der Zeit hört er zum ersten Mal Rudolf Steiner sprechen. Diese erste Begegnung ruft in ihm das Bild des Atlas hervor, der Welten trägt. In der Referendarzeit arbeitet er auf Anregung von Rittelmeyer an einem Aufsatz « Rudolf Steiner und Gøethe » zur Festschrift von Steiners 60. Geburtstag. Dieser Aufsatz führt zum ersten Gespräch mit Rudolf Steiner und zu dessen Aufforderung, an der Waldorfschule mitzuarbeiten.

Seine Liebe zur Musik war keineswegs erloschen. 1921 bringt er auf Drängen von Alexander Strakosch sein Brucknerbuch heraus, das schon ein Jahr später eine zweite, erweiterte Auflage erfährt. Neueren Auflagen widersetzt er sich gewissenhaft, da inzwischen die Brucknerforschung eingesetzt hatte. Seine Analysen aber, zum Beispiel die der Sechsten Symphonie des Meisters, sind bis heute beispielhaft.

Erich Schwebsch tritt im dritten Jahr nach der Gründung 1919 in das Lehrerkollegium der Waldorfschule in Stuttgart ein. Es wird berichtet, daß Steiner den Kunstunterricht der Oberstufe nur einrichten wollte, wenn Schwebsch ihn übernehmen würde. So geschieht es auch. Sein Motto, nur der Künstler ist Mensch, beginnt er an der Oberstufe der Waldorfschule zu leben und zu lehren. Zahllose Schüler erlebten durch ihn die großen Zusammenhänge der Kulturen, lernten die Bildersprache der Mythen deuten und erfuhren durch die Kunstbetrachtung, daß auch die Gegenwart ein Teil menschlicher Entwicklung ist.

Schwebsch kann dank seiner Selbstdisziplin eine gewaltige Arbeitsfülle meistern, die er nicht nur für die Schule einsetzt, sondern auch für die Anthroposophie selber. Er spricht 1922 am Wiener « West-Ost Kongress », nimmt am « Dramatischen Kurs » teil, ist mit Kurt Piper Redakteur der Zeitschrift « Die Drei », ist Teilnehmer im Siebener-, dann im Dreißigerkreis und gestaltet die Geschehnisse der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft in Deutschland mit, redigiert über viele Jahre die « Erziehungskunst » und reist als Vortragsredner bis in die USA, wo er 1939 auf einer « Tournée » 70 Vorträge hält. Zurück in Deutschland kann er noch an der Dresdener Waldorfschule unterrichten, bis auch diese von den Nazis geschlossen wird. Schwebsch kehrt mit seiner Frau 1943 nach Stuttgart zurück. In den letzten Kriegsjahren arbeitet er an einer gøethianistisch inspirierten Ästhetik, all' seine Erfahrungen und Arbeiten der vergangenen 30 Jahre darin zusammenfassend. Das Manuskript war fast fertig, als es in einer Bombennacht im September 1944 zusammen mit seinem Haus verloren geht. Einem Leistenbruch verdankt er, daß er nicht im « Volkssturm » aktiv werden muß.

Ernst Bindel schildert drei Stationen der Stuttgarter Waldorfschule : Gründung, Schließung und Wiedereröffnung. Für jede Stufe bezeichnete er eine markante Gestalt. Für die Gründung Emil Molt, für die Schließung Fritz Graf von Bothmer und für die Wiedereröffnung 1945 Erich Schwebsch. Tatsächlich : kaum war die Befreiung für Deutschland gekommen, ruft er die Freunde zusammen und bereitet den Wiederbeginn der Schule vor. Mit Emil Leinhas erwirkt er bei der Besatzungsmacht die Wiedergenehmigung der Schule im September 1945. Einen Monat später beginnt in der Stuttgarter Waldorfschule wieder der Unterricht in den von Schülern, Eltern und Lehrern notdürftig hergerichteten Ruinen. In vielen Städten wollen Eltern nach dem Krieg Waldorfunterricht für ihre Kinder haben und er reist von Stadt zu Stadt, um über innere Schulreformen zu reden. Der Ansturm der Schulgründungen macht eine übergreifende Koordination notwendig. Schwebsch übernimmt neben der Geschäftsführung der Stuttgarter Schule die Leitung des neu gegründeten Bundes der Waldorfschulen, bevor diese Aufgabe von Ernst Weißert weitergeführt wird. Er unterrichtet neben der Schule auch am Lehrerseminar und wird wieder Redakteur von « Die Drei » .

Aber auch die Anthroposophische Gesellschaft in Deutschland muß neu aufgebaut werden. Im Mai 1949 werden Paula Dieterich, Friedrich Husemann und Erich Schwebsch gebeten, den Kern einer Gesellschaftsleitung zu bilden. Anfang 1950 übernimmt er das Sekretariat der Gesellschaft in Deutschland. Am Gøetheanum kann er noch (im Rückblick erscheint es wie ein Vermächtnis) einen Kurs über « Die Künste als Offenbarer geistiger Impulse » geben, in dem er das, was durch die Bombennacht verloren ging, noch einmal mündlich zur Darstellung bringt. Im Frühjahr 1953 muß er zur Kur aussetzen, erholt sich aber nicht. Er stirbt am Pfingstsonntag, während in Stuttgart eine öffentliche Tagung der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft stattfindet, die er noch mit vorbereitet hatte.

Sein Jugendwunsch, Dirigent zu werden, hatte sich nicht erfüllt - und doch stand er dirigierend inmitten derjenigen, mit denen er die Erziehungskunst und die Anthroposophie der europäischen Kultur mit einschrieb.

...

Erich Schwebsch. Bruckners Symphonien, Herausgeber von Jürgen Schriefer, Verlag Freies Geistesleben.

Seitenzahl : circa 500 Seiten, zahlreiche Notenbeispiel.

Einbandart : Leinen gebunden.

Lieferbarkeit und Preis vorbehaltlich zwischenzeitlicher Änderungen.

Durch umfaßende, in die Tiefe gehende Analysen erschließt Erich Schwebsch den gesamten Kosmos der Brucknerschen Symphonien. Seine Darstellungen tragen damit wesentlich zu einem intensiveren Erleben und zu einem Verständnis dieser Musik bei. Bruckners Musik erschließt sich erst, wenn zum Hören die genaue Kenntnis ihrer Strukturen, ihrer Bewegungen und Entwicklungstendenzen hinzukommt. In diesem Sinne sind Erich Schwebschs ausführliche Betrachtungen zu Bruckners Symphonien eine unschätzbare Hilfe.

...

Durch umfaßende, in die Tiefe gehende Analysen erschließt Erich Schwebsch den gesamten Kosmos der Brucknerschen Symphonien. Seine Darstellungen tragen damit wesentlich zu einem intensiveren Erleben und zu einem Verständnis dieser Musik bei.

Bruckners Musik erschließt sich erst, wenn zum Hören die genaue Kenntnis ihrer Strukturen, ihrer Bewegungen und Entwicklungstendenzen hinzukommt. In diesem Sinne sind Erich Schwebschs ausführliche Betrachtungen zu Bruckners Symphonien eine unschätzbare Hilfe. Sehr detailliert verfolgt der Autor den inneren Aufbau und die musikalische Anlage der einzelnen Sätze, betrachtet sie im Kontext des gesamten symphonischen Werks und verfolgt so die biografisch-musikalischen Entwicklungslinien des Künstlers Anton Bruckner. Über die musikalische Analyse hinaus fragt Schwebsch aber immer auch nach dem geistigen Gehalt der einzelnen Symphonien. Auf diese Weise eröffnet sich der ganze Kosmos der Brucknerschen Musik, ihre tieferen Dimensionen werden sichtbar.

Der Komponist und Musikwissenschaftler Jürgen Schriefer hat in dieser Darstellung Schwebschs gesamten Nachlaß zu Bruckners Werk aufgearbeitet.

Bruckners unstillbarer Drang nach Vollendung war rein musikalisch-künstlerisch. Sein Bildungstrieb ging auf immer stärkere Durchlässigkeit seines Musikerorgans für die Kräfte, in denen er sich bewegte. Er wollte ganz reines Instrument werden, auf dem der Gott von einem neuen Menschen sprechen konnte. Daher hatte er auch eigentlich ein religiöses, nicht ein technisches Verhältnis zu seinen Studien.

Schriften

Schottische Volkslyrik, in : James Johnson's « The Scot's musical museum » (1920) .

Rudolf Steiner und Gœthe in : Vom Lebenswerk Rudolf Steiners (1921) .

Die Drei Anthroposophische Zeitschrift zur Erneuerung von Wissenschaft, Kunst und sozialem Leben (1921) .

Anton Bruckner ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis von Entwicklungen in der Musik (1921, 1922, 1923, 1927) .

Johann Sebastian Bach und die Kunst der Fuge (1931, 1955, 1988) .

Die Kunst der Fuge (BWV 1080) von Johann Sebastian Bach ; für zwei Klaviere gesetzt von Erich Schwebsch ; nach der Neuordnung von Wolfgang Graeser (1937, 1940, 1955) .

Anton Bruckners 6. Symphonie in A-dur (1953) .

Erziehungskunst aus Gegenwart des Geistes Gesammelte Aufsätze aus dem Leben der Freien Waldorfschule (1953) .

Zur ästhetischen Erziehung (1954) .

Literatur

Vorstand am Goetheanum, Doktor Erich Schwebsch, in : N, Nr. 22 (1953) .

In memoriam Erich Schwebsch, in : MaD, Nr. 24 (1953) .

Herbert Hahn. Für Erich Schwebsch, in : N, Nr. 24 (1953) .

Hermann Ranzenberger. In Erinnerung an Erich Schwegsch, in : N, Nr. 32 (1953) .

Hans Rudolf Niederhäuser. Im Gedenken an Erich Schwegsch, in : Msch, Nr. 6 (1953) .

Erich Schwegsch, in : Der Lehrerkreis um Rudolf Steiner, Herausgeber G. Husemann und J. Tautz, Stuttgart (1977) .

Deimann (1987) .

Schöffler (1987) .

Lindenberg, Chronik (1988) .

Erhard Fücke. Siebzehn Begegnungen, Stuttgart (1996) .

1953-1955 : Lauter ungelöste Fragen

Wie bereits Mitte der 1930er Jahre trennte sich auch durch den Konflikt mit Marie Steiner und dem Nachlaßverein ein Teil der Mitgliedschaft von der « Allgemeinen » Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft. Die Sezession gab sich einen eigenen organisatorischen Status, insbesondere als « Anthroposophische Vereinigung in der Schweiz » , die mit einer Reihe von Zweigen (Arbeitsgruppen) noch heute existiert. Die Spaltung zog sich aber durch alle bestehenden (oder im Aufbau begriffenen) Landesgesellschaften und erschwerte auf vielfache Weise die Zusammenarbeit.

In Deutschland hatte es seit dem Verbot durch die Nationalsozialisten 1935 keine Anthroposophische Gesellschaft mehr gegeben und aufgrund des Nachlaßkonfliktes drohten hier zwei Landesgesellschaften (von Steffen- respektive Marie-Steiner-Anhängern) zu entstehen. Die unbewältigten Erkenntnis- und Lebensfragen der Gesellschaft spiegelten sich bei den offiziellen Zusammenkünften in Krisendiagnosen und Äußerungen der Resignation. Der Vertreter des Hamburger Arbeitszentrums, Julius Solti, sprach auf der Generalversammlung der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft in Deutschland im Herbst 1953 von drei Erkenntnisrätseln, die sich lähmend auf die Mitgliedschaft auswirkten. Das erste betreffe die « Fortführung der Klassenstunden » (also das Verständnis der Hochschule für Geisteswissenschaft) , deßen Unlösbarkeit zu einem tiefgreifenden Konflikt zwischen Ita Wegman und Marie Steiner geführt habe. Das zweite die Verwaltung des « literarischen Werkes » Rudolf Steiners. Hier stünden sich das « spirituelle Recht » der Hochschule auf Verwaltung des Erbes innerhalb der Gesellschaft und das testamentarische « Erbrecht » unversöhnbar gegenüber. Das dritte Rätsel schließlich betreffe die Frage der « spirituellen Kontinuität » , die sich an der Ernennung Albert Steffens zum stellvertretenden Vorsitzenden und dem damit möglicherweise verbundenen Auftrag entzündet habe. Das erste Rätsel brachte er mit der luziferischen Versuchung in Verbindung, das Geistige wie eine Offenbarung empfangen zu wollen, das zweite mit der ahrimanischen, die sich durch irdischen Besitz eröffne und das dritte mit Todeskräften, die innerhalb der Gesellschaft walteten, die durch Auferstehungskräfte überwunden werden müßten.

Soltis Debattenbeitrag ist ein Beispiel für die im inneranthroposophischen Diskurs verbreitete Tendenz, symbolische Denkformen als Strategem der Erkenntnisvermeidung einzusetzen. Statt die Designate klar zu benennen, die mit den von ihm verwendeten Signifikaten verbunden waren, ließ er das von ihm Gemeinte in der Schwebelage und verschleierte mit seiner Konstruktion eines « dreifachen » Rätsels zugleich die offenkundige Tatsache, daß es sich bei den von ihm angesprochenen Problemen in Wahrheit nur um ein einziges handelte : das Problem nämlich, ob und wie im Rahmen der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft nach dem Tode Steiners der Anspruch auf Geisterkenntnis eingelöst und verifiziert werden konnte.

Erst im Oktober 1954 gelang es, die « Anthroposophische Gesellschaft in Deutschland » mit einer föderativen Struktur, die den widerspenstigen Arbeitszentren in den verschiedenen Landesteilen weitgehende Autonomie zugestand, unter der Leitung eines Arbeitskollegiums neu zu begründen, dem Friedrich Husemann (Psychiater, Begründer der Husemann-Klinik in Wiesneck, 1887-1959) ; Paula Dieterich (Waldorflehrerin, Hamburg, 1892-1974) ; Rudolf Kreuzer (Unternehmer, Firma Staedtler in Nürnberg, 1887-1976) ; und Carl Johannes Brestowsky (Waldorflehrer, Wuppertal, 1896-1974) angehörten. Erich Schwebisch (Waldorflehrer in Stuttgart, 1889-1953) , der die Gründung maßgeblich mit vorbereitet hatte, war 1953 verstorben.

Die führenden Persönlichkeiten der deutschen Landesgesellschaft waren alle nach Anbruch des neuen michaelischen Zeitalters (1879) geboren, hatten zwei Weltkriege, den Zusammenbruch eines Kaiserreichs, einer Republik und eines Terrorregimes sowie das Verbot der Gesellschaft in Deutschland erlebt und befanden sich nun ausnahmslos in ihrem siebten Dezennium, zwischen dem 60. und 70. Lebensjahr. Sie alle hatten auch Rudolf Steiner erlebt und sich zwischen 1909 und 1922 der Theosophie beziehungsweise Anthroposophie angeschlossen. Auf der anderen Seite der Grenze hatten sie es mit dem 70jährigen Steffen, dem 61jährigen Wachsmuth, dem 63jährigen Poppelbaum und dem geradezu jungen, 56jährigen Lewerenz zu tun. Angesichts dieser generationellen Konstellation drängt sich der Gedanke auf, die Anthroposophie sei zu einer Gerontosophie geworden. Aber das äußerliche Alter sagt bekanntlich nichts über die innere Lebendigkeit und Kreativität eines Menschen aus. Trotzdem geht das fortschreitende Alter häufig mit einer Verfestigung der Lebenseinstellungen und Lebensauffassungen einher. Es wäre interessant, die Frage zu untersuchen, ob der dogmatische Charakter, den die öffentliche Repräsentation der Anthroposophie durch die Anthroposophische Gesellschaft in der zweiten Hälfte des 20. Jahrhunderts annahm, nicht möglicherweise ein Altersproblem war. Die Vorstandsmitglieder, die bis 1963 berufen wurden, waren zwar etwas jünger (mit Ausnahme der Ärztin Margarete Kirchner-Bockholt, 1894-1973, die 69 war, befanden sich alle in der zweiten Hälfte ihres sechsten Jahrzehnts, weitaus der jüngste sollte Rudolf Große, 1905-1994, sein, der sich bei seiner Berufung im 50. Lebensjahr befand) , aber wenn man diese Alterskonstellation mit jener des Gründungsvorstandes von 1923-1924 vergleicht, ist die Differenz doch erheblich : Rudolf Steiner war 1923 mit 62 Jahren weitaus der älteste, Marie Steiner war 56, Ita Wegman 47, Elisabeth Vreede 44, Albert Steffen 39 und Günther Wachsmuth sogar erst 30 Jahre alt ! Erst 1966 sollte die « Allgemeine » Anthroposophische Gesellschaft mit Hagen Biesantz, 1924-1996, der bei seiner Berufung 42 Jahre alt war, wieder an die von Steiner begründete Tradition anschließen.

Nachdem bis Ende der 1940er Jahre die unmittelbaren Kriegsschäden beseitigt waren, begann in den Jahren zwischen 1950 und 1960 - so wie in den meisten vom Krieg heimgesuchten europäischen Gesellschaften, die in den Genuß des Marshallplans kamen - auch in der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft und der mit ihr in Beziehung stehenden - aber keineswegs identischen - anthroposophischen Bewegung eine Zeit der Konsolidierung und Ausbreitung. Die lebensgeschichtliche Dimension dieser Entwicklung läßt sich an der eben beschriebenen Generation, die 1954 das Arbeitskollegium der neugegründeten deutschen Landesgesellschaft bildete, verdeutlichen. Die Angehörigen dieses Kollegiums befanden sich in der Zeit zwischen 1935 und 1945 in ihrem vierten Lebensjahrzehnt, in dem in der Regel die individuellen Lebensmotive zur stärksten Entfaltung kommen und die Persönlichkeit sich in der Auseinandersetzung mit ihrem Umfeld sich diesem am intensivsten einprägt. Berufsausbildung, Studium, Familiengründung und ein gutes Jahrzehnt beruflicher oder familiärer Erfahrung haben Menschen in diesem Lebensalter bereits zurückgelegt, ihre Persönlichkeit durch die vielfältigen Erfahrungen gefestigt, ihren Horizont erweitert und häufig entwickeln sie die Bereitschaft oder das Bedürfnis, über den damit erreichten Lebenshorizont zu neuen (inneren oder äußeren) Ufern aufzubrechen. Diese bedeutende Epoche im Leben eines Menschen (im Leben der potentiellen Kontinuitätsträger der anthroposophischen Impulse) fiel aufgrund des Verbots anthroposophischer Arbeit in Deutschland aus, ihre schöpferischen Kräfte wurden zurückgedrängt, ihre moralischen Intuitionen unterdrückt - mit anderen Worten : die historischen Mächte des Bösen warfen die betreffende Generation um ein Jahrzehnt zurück, wenn sie die Kontinuität nicht sogar gänzlich zunichte machten, indem sie zu Emigration und Flucht zwangen oder die potentiellen Träger anthroposophischer Impulse schlichtweg zermalzten. Hinzu kamen die inneranthroposophischen Verwerfungen, die ihrerseits ein beträchtliches Maß geistiger Kräfte in unsinnige, überflüssige, zerstörerische Auseinandersetzungen kanalisiert. Weßen seelische und geistige Kräfte durch all diese Prüfungen nicht aufgezehrt waren, der hätte sie nun in gesteigertem Maß und zugleich aufgrund des fortgeschrittenen Lebensalters in überpersönlicher Form dem Neuaufbau der anthroposophischen Bewegung zur Verfügung stellen können. Gleichzeitig begann der Freien Hochschule für Geisteswissenschaft (der nach ihrem Selbstverständnis einzigen spirituellen Hochschule der Welt, die eine moderne Form abendländischer Esoterik mit der neuzeitlichen Wissenschaft verband) im Jahrzehnt zwischen 1950 und 1960 bereits eine neue Generation von Suchern zuzuströmen, deren spirituelle Sehnsüchte durch den bisherigen Lauf der Welt enttäuscht worden waren.

Diesen Sehnsüchten versuchten die öffentlichen Hochschulkurse entgegen zu kommen, die ab 1954 wieder von den einzelnen Sektionen zu unterschiedlichen Fachgebieten am Goetheanum durchgeführt wurden. Die Sektionen wurden personell verstärkt, insbesondere die medizinische Sektion durch Ärzte aus der Ita Wegman Klinik Arlesheim, die sich nach dem Beschluß der Generalversammlung von 1948 allmählich wieder auf das Goetheanum zubewegten und in die Leitung der Sektion aufgenommen wurden.

Bereits 1952 war der Beschluß gefaßt worden, den noch immer im Rohbau befindlichen großen Saal des Goetheanum auszugestalten. Der Auftrag erging im Rahmen eines Wettbewerbsverfahrens, an dem sich 27 Architekten beteiligten, schließlich an den Stuttgarter Johannes Schöpfer. Wie alle bedeutenderen Vorhaben der Gesellschaft war auch dieser Innenausbau Anlaß zu langwierigen Auseinandersetzungen. 1957 konnte der große Saal endlich dem Publikum zugänglich gemacht werden.

Doch trotz (oder vielleicht gerade wegen) des fortgeschrittenen Alters der Protagonisten waren die Dornacher Generalversammlungen auch in den 1950er Jahren weiterhin Schauplatz ideologischer Grabenkämpfe, bei denen sich in Schützengräben eingegrabene Parteien unversöhnlich gegenüberstanden. Aus heutiger Sicht erscheinen manche dieser Auseinandersetzungen wie Szenen aus einem dadaistischen Theaterstück. Die Existenz und die Publikationen der Nachlaßverwaltung erwiesen sich als der hartnäckigste Stachel im Fleisch der Gesellschaft. Die damit verbundenen Fragen sollten ihr bis in die 1970er Jahre erhalten bleiben.

1955, dreißig Jahre nach dem Tod ihres Begründers, sah sich der Vorsitzende, Albert Steffen, veranlaßt, auf der Generalversammlung Anfang April zu Vorwürfen Stellung zu nehmen, die in den « Mitteilungen der Anthroposophischen Vereinigung in der Schweiz » erhoben worden waren. Das Goetheanum sei « tot » , hieß es darin und Steffen wurde der Vorwurf gemacht, er habe die Gesellschaft zu einer « Sklavengesellschaft » umgeformt. Auf die Unterstellung, er habe dieselben Methoden angewandt, wie « gewisse Volksgruppenführer » , antwortete Steffen mit Ausführungen, die einen tiefen Einblick in sein Selbstverständnis gewähren :

« Es wird dabei wohl an den letzten Weltkrieg gedacht, wo diese Usurpationen ja stattfanden, von gewissen Führern von Volksgruppen, sowohl in Deutschland wie in Italien. Es wird darauf hingewiesen, daß diese Praktiken auch in unserer Gesellschaft angewendet werden, in der Hauptsache vom Vorsitzenden. Also wörtlich :“ Man identifiziert ein Volk mit einer Partei, die im Parteiführer gipfelt, oder das Christentum mit einer Kirche und dem Haupt dieser Kirche, oder Rudolf Steiner und die Anthroposophie mit dem Vorsitzenden.” Also das ist doch deutlich genug, daß ich da als Vorsitzender verglichen werde mit denjenigen Persönlichkeiten, welche dieses namenlose Elend über Europa gebracht haben, was ich zum Beispiel in zweien meiner Dramen dargestellt habe, natürlich in künstlerischer Art - , es schließt dann der Aufsatz :“ Diese Methode hat sich bei uns glänzend bewährt, wohl auch, weil sie in ihrem Wirken fast durchaus unerkant bleibt.” Also. »

So schließt Steffen, « die Mitglieder haben nicht erkannt, nach der Aussage dieses “ Schriftstellers ”, daß da ein Usurpator am Werk war mit der Absicht, nach den Praktiken übelster Okkultismen eine Gesellschaft von freien Menschen in eine “ Sklavengesellschaft ” zu verwandeln » .

Bei der Generalversammlung standen drei Anträge zur Debatte : der Dornacher Architekt Albert Baravalle (1902-1983) versuchte die Versammlung dazu bewegen, gegen den Entwurf Johannes Schöpfers zu protestieren, da er die Vorgaben Steiners für die Ausgestaltung des Saales mißachte, eine Reihe von Mitgliedern, unter ihnen Jakob Streit (1910-2009) , schlug vor, sämtliche Bücher Rudolf Steiners, gleichgültig in welchem Verlag sie erschienen seien, am Büchertisch des Goetheanum zu verkaufen und sie in den von diesem verantworteten Zeitschriften anzuzeigen und eine weitere Gruppe von Mitgliedern, zu denen wiederum Jakob Streit gehörte, stellte den Antrag, die weitere Verbreitung des Gutachtens von Professor A. Egger « Die Wege der richterlichen Rechtsfindung » , das gegen die Nachlaßverwaltung Stellung bezog, seitens der Gesellschaft zu unterbinden. Gegen den Antrag Baravalle lag ein Geschäftsordnungsantrag vor, der auf Nichteintreten in die Debatte plädierte, zum Antrag Egger lag ein Gegenantrag vor, der dessen Ablehnung befürwortete. Interessant ist, zu verfolgen, wie die Versammlung mit den jeweiligen Anträgen verfuhr, und welche Begründungen im einzelnen für oder gegen die Anträge vorgebracht wurden. Mit demselben Argument konnten nämlich Teilnehmer dieser Versammlung sowohl das Eintreten in eine Debatte und eine Abstimmung über einen Antrag ablehnen, mit dem sie kurz darauf eben dieses Eintreten und die Abstimmung rechtfertigten. Niemandem, auch nicht dem Leiter der Versammlung, dem Naturwissenschaftler Hermann Poppelbaum, schienen diese Widersprüche aufzufallen. Carl Jerome Bessenich begründete den Geschäftsordnungsantrag zum Antrag Baravalle mit der Behauptung, eine Entscheidung über den Entwurf des Saalausbaus durch die Generalversammlung widerspreche der « Konstitution der Hochschule » , da Fragen des « freien Geisteslebens » allein in die Kompetenz der Hochschulleitung fielen, die ihre Entscheidungen in Freiheit treffen müße. Gegen den Antrag Streit (zum Bücherverkauf) argumentierte Rudolf Große, die Annahme dieses Antrages würde die Konstitution der Anthroposophischen Gesellschaft verändern, die der Goetheanumleitung auch die Verantwortung über den Büchertisch zuweise. Die Leitung des Gœtheanum dürfe in dieser Frage nicht « dem Befehl » der Generalversammlung unterstellt werden. Mit diesem Argument setzte er sich jedoch nicht (was angesichts der eben vorangegangenen Auseinandersetzungen konsequent gewesen wäre) für ein Nichteintreten in die Debatte oder in eine Abstimmung ein, sondern dafür, den Antrag mittels einer Abstimmung abzulehnen. Das eine Mal wurde also der Generalversammlung mit dem Argument der Autonomie der Hochschulleitung das Recht bestritten, über eine Frage des freien Geisteslebens abzustimmen, das andere Mal wurde ihr mit demselben Argument genau dieses Recht eingeräumt. Daß sich die Hochschulleitung ebenso dem « Befehl » der Generalversammlung unterwarf, wenn diese den Antrag Streits ablehnte, schien Große nicht aufzufallen. Auch über den Antrag zum Rechtsgutachten Professor Eggers, der erst recht tiefgehende Erkenntnisfragen (also Fragen des freien Geisteslebens) aufwarf, wurde schließlich von der Generalversammlung abgestimmt. Er wurde ebenso abgelehnt, wie der Antrag zum Bücherverkauf. Daß es dreißig Jahre nach dem Tod Rudolf Steiners möglich war, diametral entgegengesetzte Verhaltensweisen innerhalb kürzester Zeit mit ein und demselben Argument zu rechtfertigen, zeigt, wie wohlfeil inzwischen die Berufung auf die Freiheit des Geistes geworden war und wie wenig Ernst die Gesellschaft ihren eigentlichen Auftrag, die Förderung der Geisterkenntnis, nahm.

Die letzte Viertelstunde der Versammlung, die um 23 Uhr zu Ende ging, war dem Traktandum « Berichte über die Arbeit am Gœtheanum und in der Gesellschaft » gewidmet. Was eigentlich im Mittelpunkt der Zusammenkunft hätte stehen sollen, spielte somit nur eine marginale Rolle, ja der Versammlungsleiter sah sich am Ende zur Aufforderung gezwungen, die Berichte über diese Arbeit nicht mehr mündlich, sondern schriftlich abzugeben. « Alle erklären sich einverstanden », bemerkt das Protokoll lakonisch. Von besonderer Taktlosigkeit zeugen die Schlußbemerkungen Poppelbaums, der die gesellschaftsinternen Kritiker unter Berufung auf ein Gedicht Goethes mit « Kläffern », also Hunden verglich.

Rudolf Steiner

Avec le 21e siècle, la tâche de la religion et de la tradition culturelle (donner un sens et une orientation à la vie) a été confiée à chaque individu. Nous sommes, en tant qu'êtres humains, parvenus à nous-même, dans toute l'ampleur de notre existence. La grandeur et le défi de notre époque réside dans le fait que chaque individu est maintenant tenu de se donner lui-même ses lignes directrices, pour ses actes et sa pensée, s'il ne veut pas se perdre dans les méandres du monde matériel.

C'est là que naît généralement le besoin de conquérir un lien conscient avec le monde spirituel. Développer une forme de connaissance par laquelle la réalité d'un monde de l'esprit peut être éprouvée de manière concrète et qui soit intérieurement aussi solide que les sciences de la nature - ce fut l'œuvre de vie de Rudolf Steiner.

Cette anthroposophie (conscience de notre humanité) ne peut donner une orientation à l'être humain individuel, mais peut lui apporter des impulsions pour tous les domaines de la culture. Elle a ouvert de nouveaux horizons à beaucoup de personnalités importantes dans leurs productions culturelles et leurs idées. Les réalisations émanant de l'anthroposophie dans les domaines de la pédagogie, de la médecine, de l'agriculture et de l'architecture sont considérées avec intérêt dans le monde entier. Cela commença surtout à partir du dernier tiers du 20e siècle, époque où les idées spirituelles devinrent un bien communément admis. Plus de 10,000 institutions anthroposophiques, cliniques, écoles, fermes et foyers, jouissent d'une reconnaissance sur tous les continents. Des initiatives culturelles naissent dans des contextes sociaux difficiles comme en Afrique du Sud, en Amérique du Sud ou au Moyen-Orient, et l'attribution du Prix Nobel alternatif à 2 personnalités porteuses d'initiatives culturelles anthroposophiques témoigne d'un respect inattendu envers cette réalité. La Société anthroposophique offre dans le monde entier un espace et un contexte dédié au développement spirituel, à l'épanouissement artistique et à l'engagement dans la société civile.

« Par “ anthroposophie ”, j'entends une investigation du monde de l'esprit qui constate le caractère unilatéral de la seule connaissance de la nature, mais aussi de la mystique habituelle, et qui, avant d'essayer d'entrer dans le monde supra-sensoriel, développe dans l'âme connaissante les forces latentes, encore inactives dans la conscience et la science habituelles, qui permettent d'accomplir cette entrée dans ce monde supra-sensoriel. »

(Rudolf Steiner)

« Je voudrais bien que vous deveniez attentifs à l'importance du battement de cœur qui fait que l'on est vraiment un pédagogue. »

(Rudolf Steiner, Stuttgart, 22 juin 1922.)

Le futur théosophe Rudolf Steiner, qui a suivi pendant quelque temps les fameuses conférences de Anton Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne, l'a bien caractérisé d'un mot :

« Ce qu'il disait en chaire n'était pas extraordinaire, mais la manière dont il le présentait était tout originale. »

Rudolf Steiner, Anton Bruckner et la vie musicale viennoise (1879-1925) :

Vienne et la musique, un phénomène géographique.

Rudolf Steiner à Vienne en compagnie des supporters de Bruckner et de Wagner : Friedrich Eckstein, Fritz Lemmermayer, Alfred Stroß, et Hugo Wolf.

Rudolf Steiner était un auditeur assidu aux conférences de Bruckner sur l'harmonie et le contrepoint à l'Université de Vienne.

Steiner a étudié l'importance du contrepoint abondant dans la création brucknérienne.

Rencontres avec Bruckner au « Café Griensteidl » , de 1886 à 1890.

Rudolf Steiner et les Symphonies 4, 6 et 9 de Bruckner.

Rencontres en 1911 à Linz et en 1912 à Kitzbühl avec August Göllerich, le secrétaire et biographe officiel de Bruckner.

Les travaux de recherche de Rudolf Steiner et de Erich Schweschs sur Bruckner.

Un concert Bruckner inaugure la session académique de l'Université de Vienne, en septembre 1920.

Un Festival Bruckner se tient durant le Congrès « Est-Ouest » de 1922.

Rudolf Steiner à propos de l'importance de la musique de Bruckner en tant que nouveau départ spirituel.

La musique de Bruckner est jouée (notamment au piano) lors de séances eurythmiques.

L'eurythmie (du Grec ancien « bon rythme ») est une forme d'art créée par Rudolf Steiner et sa femme Marie von Sivers.

L'eurythmie est une expression artistique dans laquelle la musique et les paroles sont exprimées par les mouvements spécifiques du corps qui correspondent à des notes, à des accords. On l'a également appelée « discours visible » ou « chant visible ». D'après Rudolf Steiner, mouvement, parole et chant n'étaient par le passé qu'une seule activité. Les prêtresses dansaient dans les temples pour honorer les dieux. Le chant et la musique y étaient associés. Ces arts se sont ensuite individualisés. L'eurythmie serait donc un chemin moderne où le mouvement du corps serait à nouveau expression objective du chant, de la parole, de la musique.

L'eurythmie fait partie intégrante du programme de toutes les écoles Steiner-Waldorf dans le monde. Les enfants entrent naturellement dans les rythmes et les exercices simples qui les aident à harmoniser leur corps et leurs forces vitales. Plus tard, les élèves plus âgés élaborent des représentations eurythmiques à partir de poèmes, de pièces de théâtre ou de morceaux de musique, gagnant ainsi une perception plus fine des œuvres en étudiant par exemple les différentes tonalités d'une œuvre musicale. L'eurythmie améliore la coordination et renforce la capacité à écouter.

Selon Rudolf Steiner, faire de l'eurythmie permet de préparer son corps à recevoir les mouvements du monde spirituel, la regarder permet d'intensifier le corps astral et le « Moi » :

« L'eurythmie fortifie l'âme en la faisant pénétrer vivante dans le supra-sensible. »

Cette discipline a pris plusieurs formes : l'eurythmie pédagogique, l'eurythmie de scène et l'eurythmie thérapeutique.

Art social par excellence, il permettrait de se relier en conscience avec le groupe ainsi qu'avec l'espace. L'utilisation de cannes en cuivre permet de travailler concrètement ce lien avec l'autre ainsi qu'avec soi-même.

L'eurythmie en France est enseignée sur un cycle de 4 ans d'étude à l'institut de formation Eurythmée, à Chatou, et permet, notamment, d'enseigner cet art dans les écoles Waldorf.

...

Le philosophe, occultiste et penseur social Rudolf Steiner est né le 25 février 1861 à Donji Kraljevec, à l'époque partie de l'Empire austro-hongrois, actuellement en Croatie ; et est mort le 30 mars 1925 à Dornach, en Suisse. Il est le fondateur de l'anthroposophie, qu'il qualifie de « chemin de connaissance », visant à « restaurer le lien entre l'Homme et les mondes spirituels ». Ses adeptes le considèrent généralement, à la fois, comme un homme de connaissance et un guide spirituel.

Membre de la Société théosophique puis secrétaire-général de la section allemande en 1902, il s'en sépare 10 ans plus tard pour fonder la Société anthroposophique.

Son enseignement est à l'origine de projets aussi divers que les écoles Waldorf, l'agriculture biodynamique, les médicaments et produits cosmétiques Weleda, le mouvement Camphill et la Communauté des Chrétiens.

Les parents de Steiner sont autrichiens. En 1869, sa famille s'installe à Neudörfel, aujourd'hui en Autriche. Il entre au Collège moderne et technique (« Realschule ») de Wiener-Neustadt, en 1872. 3 ans plus tard, il commence à s'intéresser à la philosophie. En 1877, il étudie la pensée d'Emmanuel Kant.

En 1879, Rudolf Steiner obtient son diplôme de fin d'études avec félicitations. Il continue à étudier la philosophie, en particulier Johann Gottlieb Fichte. En octobre, il devient étudiant à l'École supérieure technique de Vienne et se lie avec son professeur de littérature Karl Julius Schröer (1825-1900), philologue et grand connaisseur de l'œuvre de Goethe. Il suit également des cours de philosophie à l'Université. En 1880, il fait la connaissance de Félix Kogutzki (1833-1909), le cueilleur de « simples » (herbes médicinales ou aromatiques) qui l'initie à l'occultisme traditionnel et lui aurait fait rencontrer un « maître spirituel » éminent.

En 1882, Schröer conseille Steiner à Josef Kürschner en tant qu'éditeur de l'œuvre scientifique de Goethe. La famille Steiner s'installe à Inzersdorf am Wienerberge, dans les environs de Vienne. En 1883, il achève le 1er volume pour Josef Kürschner (parution en 1884). En octobre, il met fin à ses études supérieures car il s'intéresse davantage à la philosophie.

En 1884, Steiner devient le précepteur des enfants des époux Specht, et se consacre au jeune Otto qui est hydrocéphale. Il entame une correspondance avec Edouard von Hartmann. En 1886, il fréquente le salon de la poétesse Eugénie delle Grazie et les théologiens de son entourage. Il accepte de collaborer à l'édition des œuvres scientifiques de Goethe dans la grande édition de Weimar, celle dite « de la Grand Duchesse Sophie ». Il étudie les archives de Goethe et de Schiller et fait paraître, en 1886, son ouvrage « Fondements d'une épistémologie de la conception gœthéenne du monde » compte particulièrement tenu de Schiller.

En 1888, de janvier à juillet, il participe à la rédaction de l'hebdomadaire allemand « Deutsche Wochenschrift ». Le 9 novembre, il donne une conférence : « Goethe, père d'une esthétique nouvelle ». L'année suivante, il lit Nietzsche et fréquente le salon de la théosophe Marie Lang. Son travail aux archives, à partir de 1890, élargit le cercle de ses connaissances, dont Ernst Hæckel, Hermann Grimm, Otto Erich Hartleben, etc. Il soutient, en 1891, sa thèse de doctorat en philosophie à l'Université de Rostock :

« La Question fondamentale de la théorie de la connaissance, compte particulièrement tenu de la Doctrine de la Science de Fichte » .

Elle est publiée en 1892, complétée d'un chapitre sous le nom « Vérité et science » .

À partir de 1892, à 31 ans donc, il loge chez la veuve Anna Eunike et l'aide dans l'éducation de ses 5 enfants. En 1894, Steiner publie « La Philosophie de la Liberté » . Alors qu'il continue son étude de Friedrich Nietzsche, il rencontre la sœur de celui-ci, Elisabeth Förster, en 1894, et entre en relations avec les Archives Nietzsche à Naumburg. L'année suivante, il publie Nietzsche, un homme en lutte contre son temps. En 1896, il prépare pour la maison d'éditions Cotta l'édition des œuvres d'Arthur Schopenhauer et de Jean Paul. Il termine son travail pour Kürschner. En 1897, il fait paraître Gœthe et sa conception du Monde. Il s'installe à Berlin chez la famille Eunike. Il est alors corédacteur avec Otto Erich Hartleben du « Magazin für Litteratur » . Il met en scène la pièce de Maurice Maeterlinck : « L'Intruse » . Il donne aussi des conférences à l'association scientifique « Giordano Bruno » et à celles des jeunes chercheurs et écrivains « Die Kommenden » . En 1898, il donne un cycle de conférences sur « Les Grands courants de la littérature allemande de 1848 à nos jours » à la Société Littéraire Indépendante.

À partir de 1899, il commence à enseigner l'histoire, les sciences et la technique de l'expression orale à l'Université Populaire de Berlin fondée par Wilhelm Liebknecht. Il publie un article dans le « Magazin für Litteratur » : « La révélation secrète de Gœthe » . Il épouse civilement Anna Eunike. Il publie aussi son texte « L'Égoïsme en philosophie » . En 1900-1901, il fait paraître « Visions du monde et de la vie » au 19e siècle, repris en 1914 dans une édition élargie et « Les Énigmes de la philosophie constituant une histoire de la philosophie occidentale » .

En 1900, à la demande du Comte Brockdorff, Rudolf Steiner donne une conférence sur Nietzsche à la Bibliothèque Théosophique. Une semaine plus tard, il donne au même endroit une conférence sur Gœthe, à caractère ésotérique cette fois. Durant l'hiver, c'est une conférence sur Gustav Theodor Fechner, à laquelle assiste Marie de Sivers. Il cesse alors ses activités à la rédaction du « Magazin für Litteratur » . L'année suivante, il donne 2 cycles de conférences chez les théosophes : le 1er cycle portant sur la Mystique auquel assiste Marie de Sivers ; le second cycle a lieu chez les théosophes de Berlin : « Le Christianisme » , fait mystique.

En janvier 1902, il devient membre de la Société théosophique et secrétaire-général pour l'Allemagne. En juillet, à Londres, il rencontre les responsables de la Société théosophique, dont sa présidente Annie Besant. En octobre, il participe à la fondation de la Section allemande de la Société théosophique dont il devient le secrétaire-général. Marie de Sivers devient sa collaboratrice.

En 1903, c'est la 1re parution de la revue « Luzifer » qui s'appelle, à partir de 1904, « Lucifer-Gnosis » . À partir de 1904, son activité de conférencier prend de l'ampleur, notamment en dehors de Berlin. Il publie le petit livre « Théosophie » , et écrit des articles pour la revue « Lucifer-Gnosis » sur la « Chronique de l'Akasha » . Steiner fréquente Franz Kafka et le peintre Kandinsky et publie le « Drame » d'Édouard Schuré, « Les Enfants de Lucifer » dans « Lucifer-Gnosis ». Steiner se sépare de sa Ire épouse, Anna Eunike, et vit avec Marie von Sivers. Annie Besant le nomme responsable de l'École ésotérique de la Section allemande. En 1905, il cesse d'enseigner à l'Université populaire de Berlin (École de formation ouvrière). Il donne de nombreuses conférences à Berlin. C'est 1 an après la création du Cercle intérieur de l'École ésotérique, en 1905, que le « rite Yarker » le sollicite mais « Ni ce rite, ni l'École ésotérique n'avait à exercer d'influence sur la moelle de son enseignement, le présent doit reposer sur le passé. Certes, il apporte un message nouveau qui ne pouvait ni ne devait puiser ailleurs qu'à sa propre source : toutefois il cherchait encore à se rattacher par la forme aux traditions existantes ». Il rattache le germe nouveau au fait existant dans le respect de la tradition historique. Rudolf Steiner est donc sollicité par l'obédience maçonnique de l'Ordre Memphis-Misraïm, sous l'égide de John Yarker qui avait succédé à Garibaldi. Ce dernier avait réuni les 2 Ordres séparés jusque-là Memphis et Misraïm. Steiner œuvre avec Marie von Sivers durant une décennie à restaurer le cérémonial cultuel et symbolique basé sur la tradition de la sagesse ancienne. En 1906, Théodor Reuss, représentant de Yarker en Allemagne, présente un cadre à Steiner pour son propre enseignement :

« Un bon nombre de participants, il est vrai, parlèrent de notre institution comme s'il s'agissait d'un ordre. Il est vrai que nous avons Marie de Sivers et moi, signé des documents concernant nos rapports avec cette institution Yarker. D'aucuns s'en sont servis pour répandre sur notre compte des calomnies de toutes sortes. En fait, on avait attaché une grande importance à une affaire insignifiante. Nos signatures avaient été apposées au bas de certaines " formules ". Nous avons respecté les coutumes. Alors que nous signions, j'avais encore clairement insisté et dit : tout cela n'est que formalité et l'institution que je vais instaurer n'empruntera rien au courant Yarker. Mais j'aimerais faire remarquer en toute modestie qu'à cette époque je croyais encore à la droiture des gens à qui j'avais affaire. »

(Rudolf Steiner. Autobiographie, tome II ; pages 217-218.)

L'activité culturelle de l'École ésotérique s'y déroule, elle est ouverte à tous les Ordres ou Sociétés ésotériques. Nombreuses conférences à Berlin, Stuttgart, Cologne, Paris, Munich, Düsseldorf. À la fin de l'année, il voyage en Italie avec Marie von Sivers. Ils passent Noël et le Nouvel-An à Venise. En 1907, il multiplie les conférences à Berlin, Karlsruhe, Leipzig, Munich, Kassel, Stuttgart, Vienne, Bâle, Nuremberg, Cologne. En mai, le Congrès théosophique européen a lieu à Munich. On y représente la pièce « Le Drame sacré » d'Eleusis d'Édouard Schuré. Annie Besant et Rudolf Steiner constatent qu'ils ont des conceptions différentes de ce que devrait être l'ésotérisme. Fin mai, avec le 100e membre affilié à « Mystica Aeterna », Steiner devient le dirigeant du « Rite de Memphis-Misraïm » en Allemagne, des loges sont installées à Berlin, Cologne, Leipzig, Stuttgart et Munich. Il voyage en Italie durant 4 semaines au cours de l'été : 2 semaines à Rome, puis Pise, Gêne, Milan, Lucerne, Berne et lors du retour, en septembre, séjourne quelques jours à Barr, en Alsace, invité par Édouard Schuré. En 1908, il continue ses conférences : Francfort, Heidelberg, Berlin, Munich, Hambourg, Cologne, Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Leipzig et effectue un nouveau voyage en Italie par mer sur l'Adriatique. Il visite Pæstum et fait l'escalade du Vésuve.

En 1909, le drame de Schuré « Les Enfants de Lucifer » est joué au Congrès théosophique d'été de Munich. Au printemps, Steiner est invité à Rome par la princesse del Drago. Il donne des conférences dans la Ville. Il séjourne au Palazzo del Drago dans les pièces où Winckelmann avait vécu et développé ses idées sur l'art, qui avaient très fortement intéressé Gœthe. Il fait un nouveau séjour de 2 semaines en Italie, au printemps 1910. La même année paraît l'ouvrage « La Science de l'occulte » dans ses grandes lignes. C'est aussi la représentation du 1er drame-mystère. Il donne de nombreuses conférences à Berlin, Strasbourg, Karlsruhe, Heidelberg, Pforzheim, Kassel, Düsseldorf, Cologne, Vienne, Stuttgart, Munich, Rome, Palerme, Hanovre, Hambourg, Oslo, Berne.

En mars 1911, alors qu'il donne un cycle de conférences à Prague, « La Physiologie occulte » ; le 17 mars meurt Anna Steiner-Eunike. Au printemps, il fait un séjour de 3 mois au bord de l'Adriatique, puis de 2 semaines en Autriche, pour le rétablissement de Marie von Sivers. Il donne une conférence à Bologne à l'occasion du Congrès international de philosophie. Marie von Sivers traduit le livre de Schuré « Les Sanctuaires d'Orient » . En septembre, nouveau voyage en Italie et conférences en Suisse et à Milan. À l'automne, il entre en conflit avec Annie Besant à cause de l'affaire Alcyone-Krishnamurti qu'elle veut faire passer pour une ré-incarnation du Christ. Steiner poursuit ses conférences à Berlin, Stuttgart, Cologne, Coblenz, Bâle, Munich, Copenhague, Lugano, Milan, Neuchâtel, Karlsruhe, Leipzig, Nuremberg, Hanovre. En 1912, il fait un dernier voyage en Italie, visite Florence, Pérouse, Assise et donne 2 conférences à Milan. Il donne ensuite des conférences à Hanovre, Berlin, Munich, Winterthur, Zürich, Kassel, Breslau, Vienne, Stuttgart, Helsinki, Helsingfors, Stockholm, Düsseldorf, Copenhague, Norrköping, Cologne, Hambourg, Bâle, Milan, Neuchâtel, Saint-Gall, Berne. À l'automne 1912, ce sont les Iers pas de l'eurythmie, art du mouvement. Fin 1912, il se sépare de la Société théosophique et, à Noël, fonde la Société anthroposophique.

La Ire assemblée générale de la Société anthroposophique a lieu les 2 et 3 février 1913. Steiner n'exerce aucune fonction administrative, seulement celle d'enseignant et de guide spirituel. Il n'en était même pas membre. La direction devait être assurée par un comité de 3 personnes : Carl Unger, Michaël Bauer, Marie von Sivers. La Société anthroposophique est exclue officiellement de la Société théosophique, le 7 mars 1913, par décision venant d'Adyar. En mai, Steiner voyage à Paris pour la fondation du Groupe Saint-Michel. Il visite Chartres avec Schuré et Marie von Sivers. Le 20 septembre, il pose la Ire pierre du futur « Gœtheanum » , à Dornach. Il donne des conférences à Cologne, Berlin, Linz, Vienne, Tübingen, Stuttgart, Francfort, Munich, La Haye, Breslau, Düsseldorf, Londres, Paris, Strasbourg, Helsinki, Helsingfors, Oslo, Bergen, Copenhague, Leipzig.

La guerre limite les déplacements de Steiner à l'Allemagne, l'Autriche et la Suisse. Le 1er avril 1914, lors de la fête de l'érection des sapins, la charpente du « Gœtheanum » est construite. En août, la guerre éclate. De Bayreuth, Steiner et Sivers rentrent rapidement à Dornach. Eliza Von Moltke, membre de la société théosophique, fait venir Rudolf Steiner au chevet de son mari atteint dans sa santé, le général et chef de l'état-major allemand Helmuth Johannes Ludwig von Moltke, le 27 août 1914, à Coblenz mais son action réelle est restée ignorée. Le 24 décembre, Steiner épouse Marie von Sivers. Il donne des conférences à Leipzig, Berlin, Stuttgart, Pforzheim, Munich, Vienne, Dornach, Paris, Bâle, Norrköping. Cette année-là ferme l'école ésotérique, qui fonctionnait depuis 1904.

Il donne des conférences en 1915 à Berlin, Dornach, Vienne, Düsseldorf, Stuttgart et, en 1916, à Berne, Liestal, Berlin, Leipzig, Stuttgart, Dornach, Zürich, Bâle. En 1916, il publie un livret très controversé « Pensées du temps de guerre » publié à Berlin, qui fit démissionner Édouard Schuré.

1917 : Ses activités sociales et politiques, ses remises des mémorandums à de hauts-responsables de Berlin et de

Vienne restent sans écho. Il réalise la Ire formulation de la tri-articulation de l'être humain. Il donne des conférences à Dornach, Berlin, Zürich, Saint-Gall, Bâle et, en 1918, à Dornach, Berne, Munich, Stuttgart, Berlin, Heidenheim, Ulm, Hambourg, Bâle.

1919 : Fondation de l'École Waldorf à Stuttgart. Il donne de nombreuses conférences à Bâle, Zürich, Dornach, Düsseldorf, Stuttgart, Ulm, Berlin ; en 1920, à Stuttgart, Bâle, Dornach, Zürich, Berne ; en 1921, à Stuttgart, Dornach, La Haye, Berne, Oslo, Berlin, Bâle.

1922 : Conférences à Dornach, Berne, La Haye, Londres, Vienne, Stuttgart, Oxford, Berlin. Mais à la fin d'une conférence donnée à Munich, Steiner échappe de peu à une agression de perturbateurs fascistes. Dès lors, il ne fait plus de conférences publiques en Allemagne. La Communauté des Chrétiens est fondée cette année-là. Le 31 décembre, un incendie criminel détruit le « Gœtheanum » .

1923 : Conférences à Dornach, Stuttgart, Berne, Bâle, Penmaenmawr, Prague, Ilkey, Londres, La Haye. Création de la nouvelle Société anthroposophique : la Société anthroposophique universelle, dont Steiner prend la présidence et Albert Steffen, la vice-présidence. Création de l' « École libre de Science de l'Esprit » .

1924 : 1er janvier, Steiner se serait dit empoisonné. Conférences à Dornach, Berne, Zürich, Stuttgart, Prague, Paris, Koberwitz, Breslau, Arnheim, Torquay, Londres. Fin mars, Steiner achève la maquette du second « Gœtheanum » . Mai, Ire assemblée générale de la Société anthroposophique en France. Juin, naissance de la pédagogie curative à Iéna ; naissance de la Bio-dynamie suite au cycle de conférences faites devant les agriculteurs à Koberwitz. Juillet, Congrès anthroposophique et pédagogique à Arnheim aux Pays-Bas. 28 septembre, dernière conférence aux membres. À partir du 1er octobre, Steiner est alité. Il poursuit son « Autobiographie » et « Les Lignes directrices de l'anthroposophie » pour parution dans « Das Gœtheanum » .

1925 : Termine avec Ita Wegman, l'ouvrage médical à la base de la médecine anthroposophique. Données de base pour un élargissement de l'art de guérir. Steiner meurt le 30 mars, vers 10 heures du matin, à l'âge de 64 ans.

Jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, Rudolf Steiner attachera une importance première à cet ouvrage. Il déclara, au cours de la 2e décennie du XXe siècle, au seul étudiant qu'il conseilla en vue du doctorat d'État, Walter-Johannes Stein, qui lui demandait ce qu'il subsisterait de son œuvre dans quelques siècles :

« Rien ! Sauf “ La Philosophie de la Liberté ”, mais à partir d'elle le reste peut être retrouvé. »

Dates biographiques

1861

Naissance de Rudolf Josef Lorenz Steiner, le 27 février à Kraljevec, en Autriche-Hongrie (aujourd'hui, en Croatie) . 1er enfant des époux Franziska et Johann Steiner, originaires des régions boisées de la Basse-Autriche.

La profession du père (1829-1910) , tout d'abord télégraphiste puis chef de gare du « réseau sud » (« Südbahn ») des chemins de fer autrichiens. Ce qui amena la famille à déménager à de multiples reprises.

1862

Le père est nommé à Mödling, près de Vienne.

1863

Enfance à Pottschach, station de chemin de fer du Semmering.

1864

Naissance d'une sœur, Leopoldine.

1866

Naissance d'un frère, Gustav.

1868

Adolescence à Neudörfl, au bord de la Leitha-Burgenland.

1869

Déménagement à Neudörfl.

1872

Collège à Wiener-Neustadt.

1879

Le père est transféré à Inzersdorf, près de Vienne.

Études à Vienne à la « Technische Hochschule » (École supérieure technique) , avec comme objectif l'accès à la profession d'enseignant à la « Realschule » (équivalent approximatif des anciens collèges techniques) . Matières principales : mathématiques, physique, botanique, biologie, zoologie, chimie, ainsi que littérature, histoire, philosophie. Obtention de baccalauréats avec mention.

Professeur de littérature allemande : Karl Julius Schröer. Professeur de philosophie : Robert Zimmermann et Franz Brentano. Histoire : Otto Karl Lorenz. Il commence à étudier Goethe.

1882

Sur recommandation du professeur Karl Julius Schröer, historien de la littérature et spécialiste de Goethe, Steiner est sollicité comme éditeur des « Écrits scientifiques de Goethe » (« Goethes Naturwissenschaftliche Schriften ») , dans la collection « Kürschner Deutsche National-Literatur » .

Article : « Einzig mögliche Kritik der atomistischen Begriffe » (Unique critique possible des concepts atomistes) . Steiner dira plus tard qu'il s'agissait là du « nerf principal » de ses recherches.

1883

À 22 ans, on lui demande de publier dans la « Littérature Nationale de Kürschner » , les Écrits scientifiques de Goethe.

1884-1890

Précepteur dans la famille du négociant viennois Ladislaus Specht. Rencontre du médecin de famille, le célèbre spécialiste en médecine interne Joseph Breuer, considéré comme un précurseur de la psychanalyse. Le 1er volume des « Écrits scientifiques de Goethe » paraît. Les volumes II à IV suivront, entre 1887 et 1897.

Amitié avec la poétesse et future féministe Rosa Mayreder (« Zur Kritik der Weiblichkeit » : Critique de la féminité) et avec Friedrich Eckstein (qui sera, plus tard, le secrétaire de route et un des biographes d'Anton Bruckner) . Correspondance avec le philosophe Eduard von Hartmann.

Parallèlement aux travaux d'édition de l'œuvre scientifique de Goethe, nombreux articles pour différents dictionnaires encyclopédiques (entre autres, le « Pierers Konversations-Lexikon ») , à la demande du professeur Josef Kürschner.

1886

Épistémologie de la pensée goethéenne. À Vienne, à la « Société Goethe » , Rudolf Steiner fait une conférence : « Goethe, père d'une nouvelle esthétique » . Publication d'un 1er livre : « Grundlinien einer Erkenntnistheorie der Goetheschen Weltanschauung » (Une théorie de la connaissance chez Goethe) . Sollicitation d'Erich Schmidt, Directeur des Archives de Weimar, pour une collaboration aux « Éditions Sophie » (ou weimarienne) des œuvres de Goethe. Article : « La nature et nos idéaux » , publié dans : « Morale et liberté » .

1888

Rédacteur à l'hebdomadaire viennois « Deutsche Wochenschrift » . Nombreux articles et commentaires à propos des événements politiques en Autriche-Hongrie. Conférence au « Gœtheverein » de Vienne : « Gœthe, père d'une esthétique nouvelle » , publié dans : « L'art, sa nature, sa mission » .

1889

Ire visite à Weimar, Eisenach et Berlin. Contrat avec Suphan.

1890

À l'automne, installation à Weimar. Collaboration aux Archives de Gœthe et Schiller. Publication des écrits scientifiques de Gœthe aux « Éditions Sophie » . Rencontres avec Hermann Grimm, Gustav von Lœper, Erich Schmidt, Heinrich von Treitschke, Hermann Helmholtz, Ernst Hæckel. Amitié de Ludwig Laistner et Gabrielle Reuter. Ire rencontre avec Otto Erich Hartleben.

1890-1897

Collaborateur aux Archives Gœthe et Schiller. Édition de quelques sections des « Écrits scientifiques de Gœthe » , qui paraissent en 1891 et 1896.

Rencontre de Hermann Grimm, Ernst Hæckel et Eduard von Hartmann ; amitié avec la poétesse Gabriele Reuter ; l'élève de Franz Liszt, Conrad Ansoerge ; le biographe de Max Stirner, John Henry Mackay ; et l'éditeur de Friedrich Nietzsche, Fritz Kœgel.

Pour la « Cotta'sche Bibliothek der Weltliteratur » , Steiner assure une édition en 12 volumes des œuvres complètes de Schopenhauer, ainsi qu'une édition de Jean-Paul en 8 volumes. Dans la série « Berliner Klassiker-Ausgaben. Mit Einleitungen namhafter Literaturhistoriker » (Éditions berlinoise des Classiques, pourvues d'introductions d'historiens de la littérature renommés) paraissent les œuvres de Ludwig Wieland et de Ludwig Uhland, éditées et introduites par Rudolf Steiner.

1891

Promotion à Rostock au grade de docteur en philosophie. Son professeur de Thèse est Heinrich von Stein. Thème : « La question fondamentale posée par la théorie de la connaissance, en se référant particulièrement aux enseignements scientifiques de Fichte. » (Prolégomènes d'un accord de la conscience philosophique avec elle-même.)

1891-1892

Obtention du doctorat de philosophie à l'université de Rostock, avec une thèse, dirigée par le professeur Heinrich von

Stein, sur « Die Grundfrage der Erkenntnistheorie mit besonderer Rücksicht auf Fichtes Wissenschaftslehre » (La question fondamentale de la théorie de la connaissance, compte particulièrement tenu de la Doctrine de la science de Fichte. Prolégomènes à la compréhension de la conscience philosophant avec soi-même) . Parution en 1892, sous le titre : « Vérité et science. Prélude d'une philosophie de la liberté. Dédié à Eduard von Hartmann » .

1892

« Vérité et Science. »

1893

À l'automne, parution de son ouvrage philosophique principal : « La philosophie de la liberté » .

1894

« Philosophie de la liberté » . Visite à Nietzsche, malade à Naumburg.

1894-1896

Visites et séjours de travail aux Archives Nietzsche, à Naumburg. Il fait la connaissance d'Elisabeth Förster-Nietzsche, qui veut retenir Steiner comme co-éditeur des œuvres de son frère. Rencontre de Friedrich Nietzsche, malade. En 1895 paraît la monographie sur Nietzsche : « Friedrich Nietzsche, un homme en lutte contre son temps » .

1895

« Friedrich Nietzsche, un combattant contre son époque. »

1896

« Goethe et sa conception du monde. »

1897

Installation à Berlin.

Steiner présente un exposé synthétique des études sur Goethe qu'il a pu réaliser jusqu'alors dans son livre : « Goethes Weltanschauung » (Goethe et sa conception du monde) .

1897-1900

Éditeur et rédacteur du « Magazin für Literatur et des Dramaturgische Blätter », organe officiel du « Deutscher Bühnenverein » (Fédération des théâtres allemands) . Là et dans d'autres journaux, paraissent de nombreux articles concernant des questions littéraires et philosophiques, ainsi que des critiques de pièces de théâtre ou de livres.

En association avec Otto Erich Hartleben, éditeur du « Magazine Littéraire et des Feuilles Dramatiques » . Activité au sein de la « Société libre de littérature » , de la « Société dramatique libre » , du cercle de « Ceux qui viennent ... » , de « l'Université libre » , de la « Ligue Giordano Bruno » . Amitié d'Henry Mackay et Louis Jacobowski. Relations avec Bruno Wille et Wilhelm Bölsche.

1898-1905

Conférences à la « Freie Literarische Gesellschaft » , au « Giordano-Bruno-Bund » et au cercle littéraire « Die Kommenden » , dont Steiner prend la direction après la mort de Ludwig Jacobowski. Rencontre d'Else Lasker-Schüler, Peter Hille, Stefan Zweig, Käthe Kollwitz, Erich Mühsam, Paul Scheerbarth, Frank Wedekind et des membres du « Friedrichshagener Dichterkreis » (cercle poétique de Friedrichshagen) . Amitié avec Ludwig Jacobowski et Otto Heinrich Hartleben.

1899

31 octobre : mariage avec Anna, Vve Eunike (née Schultz) ; elle meurt en 1911.

1899-1904

Activité d'enseignant à l' « École de formation des Ouvriers » (« Arbeiterbildungsschule ») , fondée par Wilhelm Liebknecht à Berlin et, à partir de 1902, également à celle de Spandau. Conférences, cours, exercices de déclamation pour les conférenciers. Disciplines enseignées : histoire, exercices d'expression orale, littérature, sciences. Rencontre de Kurt Eisner et de Rosa Luxemburg, entre autres personnalités.

1900

Le 1er volume de « Welt- und Lebensanschauungen im neunzehnten Jahrhundert » (Visions du monde et de la vie au XIXe siècle) paraît ; l'an plus tard, suit le second ; cet ouvrage est publié en 1914 dans une édition revue et augmentée, sous le titre : « Les énigmes de la philosophie » .

Conférences à la Bibliothèque théosophique sur Nietzsche et sur « Le Conte de Goethe » . Là, à l'automne, début du cycle de conférences intitulé : « La mystique » .

1re rencontre avec Marie von Sivers, qui devient, à partir de 1902, la plus proche collaboratrice de Steiner. Elle avait suivi auparavant une formation en déclamation au Conservatoire de Paris et une formation en art dramatique à Saint-Petersbourg. Traductrice de plusieurs œuvres d'Édouard Schuré.

1901

Suite des conférences à la Bibliothèque théosophique sur le Christianisme comme fait mystique (25 conférences) .

9 mars : Conférence solennelle pour la création de l' « Union des femmes et des jeunes filles de la classe ouvrière » .

9 mai : Conférence à l'occasion de la mort de Louis Jacobowski.

Cycle de conférences dans le cercle de « Ceux qui viennent » sur « De Bouddha au Christ » (24 conférences) .

22 novembre : Conférence pour les étudiants de l'École supérieure technique sur Hegel.

1901-1902

Parution de « Die Mystik im Aufgange des neuzeitlichen Geisteslebens und ihr Verhältnis zu modernen Weltanschauungen » (La mystique à l'aube de la vie spirituelle moderne et les conceptions de notre temps) . Le 2e cycle de conférences, donné en 1901-1902 dans la Bibliothèque théosophique, paraît dans une édition corrigée, sous forme de livre intitulé : « Das Christentum als mystische Tatsache » (Le christianisme et les mystères antiques) .

Steiner devient membre de la Société théosophique et est, à partir d'octobre 1902, Secrétaire-général de la Section allemande de la Société théosophique.

Rencontre d'Annie Besant.

1902

Entrée dans la Société théosophique. Continuation du travail à l'École pour la formation des ouvriers, ainsi qu'à la Bibliothèque théosophique, dans le cercle de « Ceux qui viennent » et à la « Ligue Giordano Bruno » . Participation, avec Marie de Sivers, à la 13^e assemblée générale de la section européenne de la Société théosophique, en juillet à Londres. Fondation de la section allemande de la Société théosophique, en octobre. Rudolf Steiner, secrétaire-général de celle-ci. Conférence à l'Université libre. Au Théâtre Schiller, soirée « Ferdinand Freiligrath » . Publication du Journal « Lucifer » , devenant plus tard « Lucifer-Gnosis » .

1902-1904

Activité d'enseignant à la « Freie Hochschule » (Université populaire) fondée par Bruno Wille et Wilhelm Bölsche, membres du « Friedrichshagener Dichterkreis » .

1902-1912

Avec Marie von Sivers, fondation de Loges théosophiques en Allemagne et à l'étranger. Intense activité de conférencier aussi bien dans un cadre public que dans le cercle des membres de la Société théosophique.

Fondation, édition et rédaction du mensuel « Luzifer », qui deviendra « Lucifer-Gnosis » en 1903. Il y paraît des séries d'articles fondamentaux, parmi lesquels : « Comment acquiert-on des connaissances des mondes supérieurs ? » / « Extraits de la Chronique de l'Akasha » / « Théosophie et question sociale » / « L'éducation de l'enfant » / « Les degrés de la connaissance supérieure ». Ces articles paraîtront plus tard, également sous forme de livre.

Amitié avec Christian Morgenstern et Édouard Schuré. Rencontre de Wassily Kandinsky.

À chaque semestre d'hiver (à partir de 1903-1904), cycles de conférences publiques à la Maison des Architectes de Berlin, entre autres : « Ursprung und Ziel des Menschen » (Origine et but de l'être humain) / « Metamorphosen des Seelenlebens » (Métamorphoses de la vie de l'âme ; Expériences de la vie de l'âme) / « Antworten der Geisteswissenschaft auf die großen Fragen des Daseins » (Réponses de la science de l'esprit aux grandes questions de l'existence) .

1903

Continuation des activités à Berlin jusqu'en 1914. Début d'une activité publique théosophique à Weimar, Cologne, Hambourg et Londres.

1904

22 avril : Steiner prend la parole pour la 1^{re} fois à Stuttgart (« Goethe théosophe ») .

Conférences à Lugano, Nuremberg, Hanovre, Munich, Dresde, Ratisbonne, Karlsruhe, Heidelberg, Düsseldorf.

21 juin : Congrès théosophique à Amsterdam sur le thème « Mathématiques et occultisme » .

Parution de : « Théosophie. Introduction à la connaissance supra-sensible de l'univers et à la destination de l'être humain » , ouvrage central pour l'anthroposophie.

1905

Rudolf Steiner termine son activité à l'École pour la formation des ouvriers avec une conférence solennelle à l'occasion du 12^e anniversaire de sa création, le 22 janvier. Conférences et extension de la Société théosophique à Berlin et dans les grandes villes allemandes. Cycle sur « l'Évangile selon Saint-Jean » .

1906

Les Iers grands cycles de conférences hors de Berlin. Paris (18 conférences) . Ire rencontre avec Édouard Schuré, Leipzig (14 conférences) . Stuttgart, en août, « Cycle n° 1 : Au seuil de la théosophie » . Fondation de branches à Francfort et Brême. Conférences sur « l'Évangile selon Saint-Jean » , à Munich (8 conférences) .

1907

Cycles de 14 conférences à Munich, Kassel, Hanovre, Bâle (8 conférences) .

Dans le cadre du Congrès de la Société théosophique internationale à Munich, dont l'entière organisation incombe à Rudolf Steiner, représentation du « Drame sacré d'Éleusis » , d'Édouard Schuré, mis en scène par Rudolf Steiner, avec Marie von Sivers dans le rôle principal. Steiner a également assuré l'aménagement artistique et plastique de la salle de conférences, qui permet déjà de pressentir ses futurs concepts artistiques en architecture.

1908

Ier voyage en Scandinavie.

Mars, avril : Lund, Malmö, Stockholm, Upsula, Oslo, Göteborg. Copenhague.

Mai : 12 conférences sur « l'Évangile selon Saint-Jean » , à Hambourg.

Juin : 12 conférences à Nuremberg sur « Théosophie et apocalypse » .

2e voyage en Scandinavie. 15 conférences à Rome. Cycles à Düsseldorf.

Juillet : Conférence à Oslo.

Cycles à Stuttgart et Leipzig.

1909

Ernst Hæckel et ses adversaires. Conférences sur Nietzsche à l' « Union pour l'encouragement de l'Art » . Conférences à la « Ligue pour une pédagogie universitaire » .

Ire rencontre avec Christian Morgenstern à Berlin. Rudolf Steiner commence à annoncer « Le retour du Christ » (7 conférences à Rome) . Cycles à Düsseldorf, Oslo, Budapest (10 conférences) , Kassel, Munich, Bâle (« l'Évangile selon Saint-Luc ») .

17 juin : Fête en mémoire de Nietzsche, conférence solennelle à la fin du 5e Centenaire de Gutenberg devant 7,000 auditeurs et dans un cirque berlinois.

« L'action de Gutenberg, signe de l'évolution de la culture » . Ires conférences à la « Bibliothèque théosophique » dans la demeure du comte et de la comtesse Brockdorff. « Le monde et les différentes conceptions de la vie au XIXe siècle dédié à Hæckel » .

1910

L'année commence avec un cycle de 11 conférences sur « l'Évangile selon Saint-Jean » , à Stockholm. Cycle à Vienne en mars. Voyage par Klagenfurt vers Rome, Palerme en avril. Cycles à Hambourg, Oslo, Munich, Berne (« Évangile selon Saint-Matthieu ») , Munich.

Publication des résultats de ses investigations spirituelles sur des questions portant sur la cosmologie et l'évolution, dans : « La science de l'occulte dans ses grandes lignes » .

Ire représentation du 1er Drame-Mystère.

1910-1913

Premières à Munich des 4 Drames-Mystère de Rudolf Steiner (« La porte de l'initiation » , 1910 ; « L'épreuve de l'âme » , 1911 ; « Le gardien du Seuil » , 1912 ; « L'éveil des âmes » , 1913) , sous la direction de celui-ci.

Les 4 Drames-Mystères de Rudolf Steiner mettent en scène les lois complexes de la ré-incarnation et du karma telles qu'elles se manifestent dans l'existence de diverses personnes liées par le destin. Ils nous transportent dans les paysages de l'âme humaine et de l'esprit où vivent et agissent des êtres supra-sensibles. Par la perception de ces mondes cachés, l'occasion nous est donnée de comprendre les luttes que nous livrons lors de nos tentatives d'appliquer la connaissance de l'esprit à nos vies et à nos relations quotidiennes. Écrits entre 1910 et 1913, pendant des périodes de travail intérieur et extérieur intense, ces Drames-Mystères témoignent de l'originalité de la création théâtrale de Rudolf Steiner. En montrant sur une scène certaines réalités de l'âme et de l'esprit, ils préfigurent une nouvelle forme de dramaturgie qui nous éclaire sur les rapports mystérieux qui se jouent entre les humains.

Esquisse d'un édifice (« Johannes-Bau ») destiné à des représentations artistiques et des manifestations de l'École supérieure de science de l'esprit. La réalisation de ce projet à Munich-Schwabing ne peut aboutir, en raison des réticences de quelques riverains et des autorités.

Parution de : « Die geistige Führung des Menschen und der Menschheit » (Les guides spirituels de l'homme et de l'humanité) ; « Ein Weg zur Selbsterkenntnis des Menschen » (Un chemin vers la connaissance de soi) ; « Die Schwelle der geistigen Welt » (Le seuil du monde spirituel) . L'ouvrage commencé en 1910, « Anthroposophie » , reste inachevé. Études approfondies relatives à la théorie des sens.

En 1911, à Cologne, Ire rencontre avec l'écrivain russe Andréï Biély de Pétersbourg. Cet événement devait marquer durablement la vie et l'œuvre de Biély. À Prague, rencontre de Franz Kafka et de Hugo Bergmann.

Prémices d'un nouvel art du mouvement, l'eurythmie (1911) . À l'automne, 1er cours d'eurythmie à Bottmingen, près de Bâle. Les années suivantes, en collaboration avec Marie Steiner, développement de l'eurythmie, qui prend place parmi les arts de la scène.

Conférences dans différentes villes d'Allemagne et de l'étranger sur : « la ré-incarnation et le karma » / « les Évangiles » / « la vie entre la mort et une nouvelle naissance » / « l'histoire des Mystères » / « la théorie des sens » / « l'évolution » , etc. Fondation de Branches anthroposophiques en Allemagne et à l'étranger, en collaboration avec Marie von Sivers.

Séparation d'avec la Société théosophique et fondation de la Société anthroposophique (1912-1913) .

1911

« La Physiologie occulte » à Prague. 8 conférences en mars.

Anna Steiner, Vve Eunike, meurt le 17 mars.

Steiner parle au Congrès international des philosophes à Bologne, sur « Les bases psychologiques et la position de la théorie de la connaissance de la théosophie » . Cycles à Copenhague, Munich, Karlsruhe et Hanovre. Conférences séparées à Lugano, Locarno, Milan, Neuchâtel, Berne et Munich. Représentation du 2e Drame-Mystère.

1912

Septembre : Création de l'eurythmie. Préparation de la création de la Société anthroposophique.

Visite de Florence, cycles à Helsingfors, Norrköping, Oslo, Munich et Bâle. « L'Évangile selon Saint-Marc » à Cologne. Conférences « séparées » à Saint-Gallen, Vienne, Klagenfurt, Copenhague, Milan, Berne et Munich.

Représentation du 3e Drame-Mystère.

1913

2-3 février : Constitution de la Société anthroposophique.

Cycles à La Haye, Helsingfors, Munich, Oslo, Leipzig.

20 septembre : Pose de la pierre de fondation du bâtiment de Dornach.

Conférences séparées à Vienne, Gratz, Klagenfurt, Linz, Prague, Tübingen, Augsburg, Zwolle, Breslau, Erfurt, Essen, Elberfeld, Londres, Paris, Strasbourg, Stockholm, Bergen, Copenhague, Munich.

Représentation du 4e Drame-Mystère.

1913-1919

Avec la participation de nombreux artistes venus de différents pays, sous la direction de Rudolf Steiner et sur ses plans, construction à Dornach, en Suisse, du « Gœtheanum » : un édifice de bois à double coupole aux formes organiques.

Réalisations artistiques de Steiner : volumes intérieurs et extérieurs (esquisses) , peintures du plafond (esquisses et exécution partielle) , vitraux (esquisses pour les motifs) , sculpture (d'une hauteur de 9 mètres) : « Le Représentant de l'Humanité » (esquisses et exécution partielle) . Les calculs statiques déterminants pour l'édifice ont été faits par Steiner lui-même.

La construction du « Gœtheanum » , centre international du travail anthroposophique et lieu de représentation des Drames-Mystères, commence en septembre 1913 et se poursuit au cours de la Première Guerre mondiale, à Dornach, près de Bâle, avec des collaborateurs et artistes venus de tous les pays d'Europe. Pendant les travaux, des institutions scientifiques et artistiques naissent autour du « Gœtheanum » . Les modèles architecturaux de Steiner pour des habitations et des bâtiments utilitaires sont réalisés. Marie Steiner met en scène des extraits du « Faust » de Gœthe et l'eurythmie continue à être développée. Grâce au « Gœtheanum » , l'anthroposophie devient visible pour un public plus large.

1914

Cycle à Vienne.

1er avril 1914 : Inauguration solennelle du 1er « Gœtheanum » .

Dans l'environnement du « Gœtheanum » , s'élèvent peu à peu un ensemble de maisons d'habitation ou de bâtiments utilitaires, d'après des esquisses de Rudolf Steiner (« Glashaus » , maison Duldeck, chaufferie, « Verlagshaus » , transformateur) ; plus tard, furent également construites la maison « de Jaager » (« Atelierhaus ») et d'autres maisons d'habitation.

La colline de Dornach devient une colonie d'artistes ; de nombreux artistes russes, entre autres, viennent s'y installer, parmi lesquels Assia Tourgueniev, Andreï Biély et Margarita Volochine.

Nombreuses conférences sur l'art, l'architecture, l'histoire contemporaine et la science de l'esprit.

31 mars : Mort de Christian Morgenstern.

Paris, Chartres, Norrköping : « Le Christ et l'âme humaine » .

Quand la guerre éclate, il est à Bayreuth en juillet pour assister à « Parsifal » . Conférences à Hambourg, Berlin, Munich : « Le Peuple des barbares » , Schiller et Fichte.

24 décembre : Mariage avec Marie de Sivers.

1914-1918

Rudolf Steiner vit tantôt à Dornach, tantôt à Berlin.

1915-1916

Achèvement du « Gœtheanum » . Conférences en Allemagne, Autriche, Suisse. 1er cours d'eurythmie, en septembre.

1917

Cycle à Berlin : Pierres de construction pour la connaissance du « Mystère du Golgotha » à Dornach. Karma du matérialisme.

Sous le titre : « Des énigmes de l'âme » paraissent les résultats des investigations spirituelles de Rudolf Steiner sur l'organisation ternaire de l'organisme humain (système neuro-sensoriel, système rythmique, système du métabolisme et des membres) et des exposés sur le rapport de l'anthropologie à l'anthroposophie.

À la suite d'entretiens sur la situation en « Mitteleuropa » avec le comte Otto von Lerchenfeld, lié au monde politique, naissent 2 mémorandums, dans lesquels Steiner ouvre des perspectives pour une nouvelle organisation sociale de la vie publique. Ceux-ci sont remis à des personnalités politiques influentes en Allemagne (Kühlmann, le Prince Max von Baden) et en Autriche (l'Empereur Charles 1er) .

1918

1re moitié de l'année à Berlin. 2e à Dornach. Mouvement pour la triple organisation de l'organisme social « Tripartition sociale » .

1919

Dans la période de l'après-guerre, Rudolf Steiner et quelques uns de ses collaborateurs s'engagent pour un nouvel ordre social avec l'idée de la tri-articulation de l'organisme social. En avril 1919, Emil Molt demande à Rudolf Steiner de prendre la direction d'une école pour les enfants des ouvriers de son usine de cigarettes Waldorf-Astoria ; en septembre, la Ire école Waldorf ouvre à Stuttgart. Rudolf Steiner est invité à donner des cours de pédagogie en Suisse, en Angleterre et en Hollande ; d'autres écoles sont fondées.

Le 24 février, Ire représentation publique d'eurythmie sous la direction de Marie Steiner au « Pfautheater » de Zürich.

Cycles de conférences, données à Munich et à Dornach, sur « La question sociale » (appel au peuple allemand et au monde cultivé ; germes des questions sociales) , paraît en avril sous forme de livre, dans une édition revue et corrigée, sous le titre : « Die Kernpunkte der sozialen Frage in den Lebensnotwendigkeiten der Gegenwart und Zukunft » (Fondements de l'organisme social ; Éléments fondamentaux pour la solution du problème social) . L'idée directrice est « l'organisation ternaire de l'organisme social » , c'est-à-dire la décentralisation de l'État en 3 domaines : une vie culturelle libre, une vie juridique démocratique et une vie économique associative.

Dans des conférences et de nombreux entretiens avec des représentants des ouvriers des usines « Bosch-Delmonte » et « Daimler » , mais aussi avec des industriels, Steiner s'engage pour l'instauration de conseils d'entreprise.

Au terme d'un intense travail préparatoire, est ouverte à l'automne à Stuttgart l' « École libre » de Waldorf (« Freie Waldorfschule ») , école unitaire englobant les niveaux primaire et secondaire, sous l'égide d'Emil Molt, directeur de l'usine de cigarettes Waldorf-Astoria. La direction est confiée à Rudolf Steiner, rôle qu'il assumera jusqu'à sa mort en 1925. Il prépare les professeurs à leur tâche en leur dispensant des séminaires et des cours de pédagogie.

Représentation de « Faust » au « Goetheanum » à Dornach.

1920-1925

Nombreuses conférences publiques en Allemagne et à l'étranger, cycles de conférences pour les membres de la Société anthroposophique, par exemple :

« Entsprechungen zwischen Mikrokosmos und Makrokosmos » (Correspondances entre le microcosme et le macrocosme) .

« Anthroposophie als Kosmosophie » (L'anthroposophie, une cosmosophie) .

« Der Mensch als Zusammenklang des schaffenden, bildenden und gestaltenden Weltenwortes » (L'homme, les animaux et les êtres élémentaires) .

« Esoterische Betrachtungen karmischer Zusammenhänge » (Le karma. Considérations ésotériques) .

Parallèlement, Steiner est de plus en plus souvent sollicité pour donner des conférences et des cours sur des thèmes spécialisés : pédagogie, médecine, économie sociale, théologie, agriculture, physique, art dramatique, pédagogie curative, etc.

Il crée une série d'esquisses au pastel et d'aquarelles, conçues comme exercices de base pour les peintres (« Ambiances dans la nature », « esquisses Friedwart ») .

Nombreuses représentations d'eurythmie en différents théâtres d'Allemagne et de l'étranger, spectacles que Rudolf Steiner présente fréquemment par une brève conférence sur les aspects fondamentaux de ce nouvel art du mouvement.

Fondation d'instituts de recherche et de cliniques anthroposophiques, ouverture de nouvelles écoles.

Dans les journaux « Dreigliederung des sozialen Organismus » et « Das Goetheanum » , paraissent régulièrement des articles de Steiner.

1920

À la demande, entre autres, de Oskar Schmiedel et Ita Wegman, Rudolf Steiner donne des conférences sur l'élargissement de la médecine par la science de l'esprit. À Dornach, 3 conférences sur Thomas d'Aquin. Collaboration continue au travail de l'École Waldorf de Stuttgart et, surtout, participation aux conférences du « Collège des professeurs » (1919-1924) . 1er et second cours de sciences naturelles : la lumière (10 conférences) , la chaleur (14 conférences) , cours sur l'art de la parole, cours pour les médecins et étudiants en médecine (20 conférences) , cours de pédagogie à Bâle (14 conférences) . À partir de 1921, naissent des cliniques d'orientation anthroposophique et des produits pharmaceutiques.

1921

Le rapport des divers domaines de la science avec l'astronomie publié à Stuttgart. Cours aux conférenciers à Stuttgart. Voyage en Hollande. Mathématiques, expérience scientifique, observation et résultats de la connaissance du point de vue de l'anthroposophie (Stuttgart) . 2e cours médical. Cours sur l'eurythmie curative. 1er et 2e cours aux théologiens. Anthroposophie et Science. Organisation de l'École supérieure de Darmstadt, activité publique à Oslo, conférences à l' « Association pédagogique » , à l' « Union théologique » , à l' « Union pour l'économie de l'État » . Cours de Noël aux éducateurs (16 conférences à Dornach) .

1921-1922

La pratique et l'orientation scientifique de l'anthroposophie sont présentées lors de cours universitaires dans différents pays européens. Les tournées de conférences de Rudolf Steiner, organisées par une agence de concerts, rencontre un large écho dans le monde publique. Les revues culturelles « Das Goetheanum » et « Die Drei » , encore éditées aujourd'hui, sont fondées à cette époque.

1922

Cours supérieur d'anthroposophie à Berlin. « New Ideals in Education » (Nouveaux idéaux dans l'éducation) , à Strattford pendant la fête consacrée à Shakespeare. Cours d'économie politique. « Oxford holiday conference » : « Spiritual Values in Education and Social Life » (Valeurs spirituelles dans l'éducation et la vie sociale) . Semaines françaises. Cours de pédagogie pour les jeunes de Stuttgart. Voyages en Hollande et en Angleterre. Soirée de la Saint-Sylvestre. Incendie et destruction du Goetheanum.

2e congrès international d'anthroposophie, appelé Congrès international « Orient-Occident » ou « Est-Ouest » (« West-Ost-Kongress ») qui se tient du 1er au 12 juin au « Musikvereinsgebäude » de Vienne.

Organisé notamment par Ludwig Polzer-Hoditz, qui prononce le discours d'ouverture. Steiner y est l'orateur principal.

Jules Sauerwein n'assistait pas à ce congrès. C'est la raison pour laquelle il n'a pas eu connaissance des événements importants qui se sont produits à cette occasion au sein du mouvement anthroposophique, événements qui auraient pu avoir une influence directe sur sa compréhension de la politique et de la société.

Ce second (et dernier) congrès anthroposophique international organisé du vivant de Rudolf Steiner fut l'occasion pour lui d'exposer certaines idées qui, si elles s'étaient concrétisées, auraient pu éviter au monde de connaître les catastrophes que l'on sait.

Jules Sauerwein n'avait pas perçu les vrais arrière-plans du concept pan-européen, concept qui trouve sa continuité dans l'idée européenne actuelle. Jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, il a eu la conviction (en partie, en raison de ses liens avec Aristide Briand, le président d'honneur de l'Union pan-européenne qui, dans son célèbre « Mémoire » de 1939, appelait de ses vœux la fondation d'une fédération européenne) que la concrétisation de cette idée permettrait à l'humanité d'atteindre une forme supérieure de liberté et de spiritualité. Thomas Meyer, s'appuyant sur les recherches de Ludwig Polzer-Hoditz, a établi des parallèles intéressants et riches d'enseignements entre le « West-Ost Kongress » , au cours duquel Rudolf Steiner parla devant environ 2,000 personnes d'anthroposophie et de tripartition, et la « naissance » de l'idée pan-européenne, cette idée à l'origine de laquelle on trouve Richard Coudenhove-Kalergi, et qui repose sur une vieille tradition impérialiste anglo-saxonne. Or, c'est cette même année 1922 que Coudenhove-Kalergi, « entiché de son calamiteux projet pan-européen, alla frapper à la porte de la “ Hofburg ” » . (Thomas Meyer. « Ludwig Polzer-Hoditz » , opus citatum ; page 224.)

Septembre : Les initiatives de théologiens, prêtres et étudiants en théologie conduisent un cercle réuni autour de Friedrich Rittelmeyer à fonder un mouvement de renouveau religieux : la Communauté des chrétiens.

1922-1923

Dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre, de 1922 à 1923, le « Goetheanum » est détruit par le feu par une main criminelle.

Le travail (manifestations artistiques et conférences) se poursuit au même rythme dans la « Menuiserie », à proximité immédiate des ruines qu'a laissées l'incendie. À l'automne de 1924, Rudolf Steiner, en raison de sa maladie, ne sera plus en mesure que de créer la maquette d'un second « Gøetheanum en béton » (achevé en 1928) .

Dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre de 1922-1923, le « Gøetheanum » est détruit par un incendie criminel. L'animosité augmente et les formes de la Société anthroposophique ne correspondent plus à ce mouvement dont l'action est désormais publique. Rudolf Steiner incite à la formation de Sociétés territoriales autonomes. Un regroupement au niveau international doit être fondé à Noël 1923. La décision de reconstruire le « Gøetheanum » est prise dès juillet 1923.

...

Dans l'hebdomadaire « Das Gøetheanum », n° 42 (2005), Günter Aschoff lançait un appel en vue d'une recherche dans les archives sur les circonstances et causes de l'incendie du 1er « Gøetheanum ». Ainsi, le travail a-t-il été complété et enrichi par les « archives Rudolf Steiner », les « archives au " Gøetheanum " », les « archives d'Albert Steffen » et, aussi, avec le soutien des « archives Ita-Wegam » et par des profanes.

Selon Günter Aschoff, 13 personnes ont répondu à l'appel à ce jour, pour ce travail mené étroitement en collaboration avec Hella Wiesberger des « archives Rudolf Steiner », et d'autres indications ont été ainsi fournies. La connaissance centrale de leurs déclarations et à partir de diverses découvertes faites dans les archives, c'est que Jacob Ott, que l'on soupçonnait jusqu'à ce jour, ne peut plus être mis en cause (soulignement du traducteur) .

Selon Günter Aschoff :

« Ott n'a pas pu être l'incendiaire, puisqu'il avait passé toute la journée de la Saint-Sylvestre chez lui, avant de ce rendre, dans la soirée, à une répétition de chorale et d'assister ensuite à un service divin consacré à la clôture de l'année, dans l'Église réformée. »

Vers 22h30, Ott serait rentré chez lui en prenant le tramway. Lorsqu'il vit les nuages de fumée qui s'élevaient au-dessus du « Gøetheanum », dans la nuit éclairée par la Lune, il aurait monté rapidement la colline pour apporter son aide. Lors de la lutte contre l'incendie, Ott se serait trouvé en haut dans la petite coupole, mais il a dû perdre connaissance là-haut, au moment où les autres personnes s'étaient déjà retirées à cause des fumées devenues trop abondantes. Lorsque la petite coupole s'effondra dans les flammes, il tomba sur la scène et on a retrouvé, par la suite, ses restes dans un couloir qui passait sous la scène.

Les autres connaissances définitives de ces dernières années concernent le lieu exact du départ du feu et son heure.

À ce sujet, Günter Aschoff commente :

« L'après-midi du 31 décembre 1922, il y eut à 17 heures une représentation d'eurythmie. Après une allocution de

Rudolf Steiner, commença le prologue orchestral, et la musique se mit à résonner puissamment ; c'est exactement à ce moment-là, vers 17h20, que quelqu'un perça un trou dans la pièce située à l'angle de l'aile sud et de la paroi extérieure ouest, et glissa du matériel inflammable dans l'espace entre la paroi extérieure et la paroi intérieure. »

Cet incendie volontaire a été par la suite reconnu comme un fait par les autorités.

Dans la contradiction qui semble se présenter au sujet de souvenirs vécus lors de l'incendie du 1er « Gøetheanum » , le 31 décembre 1922, selon Günter Aschoff, il faut prendre en compte un détail qui a encore été découvert dans les archives.

L'horloger Jacob Ott portait toujours un chapeau gris jusqu'à la Noël 1922. Le jour de Noël, il acheta le même modèle mais en noir, et il le portait également à la Saint-Sylvestre. Peu après lui, un homme acheta à Båle exactement le même chapeau que celui que Ott avait porté jusqu'alors. Cet homme ressemblait à Ott et il fut pris pour lui par plusieurs personnes à Dornach et ses environs le jour de la Saint-Sylvestre et ... du Nouvel An, alors que ce pouvait pas être Ott, pour les raisons exposées précédemment (il était décédé dans l'incendie de la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre) . La raison pour laquelle cet homme déambulait ces jours-là à Dornach, n'est toujours pas connue jusqu'à présent.

(Paru dans « Das Gøetheanum » , en 2007.)

Un courrier de lecteur au sujet de l'article « Du nouveau dans l'Incendie du 1er “ Gøetheanum ” » , paru dans « Das Gøetheanum » , n° 1/2 (2007) .

C'est avec soulagement et, en même temps, avec une consternation qui me touche profondément que j'accueille avec reconnaissance la nouvelle si importante de Günter Aschoff, à savoir :

« ... que l'homme qui fut soupçonné (à tort par nous) jusqu'à présent, Jacob Ott, ne peut plus être mis en cause. »

Pendant de nombreuses années, j'ai été moi aussi de ceux qui parlèrent de ce « coupable d'incendie volontaire » et j'ai cru que l'auteur de l'incendie avait péri ensuite dans les flammes. Je ne l'ai pas seulement entendu dire pendant de nombreuses années à Berlin, mais (malheureusement, je dois le reconnaître) je l'ai raconté aussi moi-même à d'autres personnes.

Et voilà qu'à présent, non seulement cet homme a été accusé à tort d'incendie volontaire, mais on sait que c'est même exactement le contraire qui s'est produit : Jacob Ott a laissé sa vie en tentant d'éteindre l'incendie « en haut de la petite coupole » , le 31 décembre 1922.

Je présente ici mes excuses, après (12 fois 7) 84 ans, à Jacob Ott et à sa famille, peut-être également au nom de ceux, nombreux, pour le tort qui lui a été fait ainsi qu'à sa famille, à la suite de mes fausses allégations. Mon cœur en est profondément peiné. Éventuellement, ne pourrait-on pas envisager même de poser une plaque commémorative en un endroit approprié qui rappelle cet acte. Je subviendrai volontiers aux frais.

Au sujet des résultats de l'enquête sur l'incendie du 1er Gœtheanum dans « Das Gœtheanum » :

Au sujet des événements de l'incendie du 1er « Gœtheanum » voici 84 ans et en rapport avec la personnalité de Jakob Ott, au sujet de laquelle ont été apportées les précisions dans la revue « Das Gœtheanum », les faits et détails suivants doivent être mentionnés : au début de janvier 1923, on entreprit des investigations dans les décombres du « Gœtheanum ». La presse suisse rapporte que, le 10 janvier 1923, des restes d'os humains furent découverts dans les cendres, mais ils semblaient trop peu abondants pour pouvoir procéder à une identification. Par la suite, en s'appuyant sur l'identification dentaire, on parvint cependant à établir qu'il s'agissait du maître-horloger Jakob Ott, qui restait introuvable depuis l'incendie.

Ce n'est que le 7 juillet 1923, vers midi, qu'eurent lieu ses funérailles. Rudolf Steiner, Albert Steffen et Günther Wachsmuth, participèrent à la cérémonie d'inhumation de Monsieur Jakob Ott. Qu'est-ce qui les avait motivés à participer à cette inhumation ? Rudolf Steiner pensait-il que Monsieur Ott devait avoir mis le feu au « Gœtheanum », ou bien savait-il que Monsieur Ott avait contribué à sauver le « Gœtheanum » et qu'il y perdit la vie ? Par sa présence, voulait-il honorer la mémoire du défunt ?

Il est vraisemblable qu'il dut s'interdire de savoir si Monsieur Ott était ou pas l'auteur de l'incendie, puisqu'un initié aussi élevé que Rudolf Steiner ne doit pas utiliser l'investigation spirituelle à des intérêts cognitifs personnels.

Au sujet de la lettre de Gerhard Mächtle : après que l'enquête judiciaire fut terminée, en mai 1923, et que pour cette raison la somme assurée pour l'incendie du « Gœtheanum » fut versée en juin, les parents de Jakob Ott firent une requête en vue de la restitution des restes de leur fils.

Après la déclaration judiciaire de décès officiel, le 3 juillet 1923, par le conseil gouvernemental de Solothurn, qui ne pouvait effectivement que suivre aussi la reconnaissance de l'innocence de Jakob Ott par le tribunal, l'inhumation eut lieu le 7 juillet 1923, à 15 heures, dans l'ancien cimetière de Arlesheim.

Depuis juillet 1922, Jakob Ott était devenu, en effet, membre de la Société Anthroposophique et il s'était occupé des annonces pour la revue « Das Gœtheanum ». C'était déjà compréhensible, dans cette mesure, que Rudolf Steiner et de nombreux anthroposophes fussent présents lors de cette inhumation. Mais il faut cependant prendre en compte ceci : il fallait alors la mobilisation de toutes les forces pour continuer le travail à tous égards, et ainsi réduire à néant le dessein véritable de l'adversaire.

...

Lors du Congrès de Noël, du 24 décembre 1923 au 1er janvier 1924, Rudolf Steiner fonde la Société anthroposophique générale. Il constitue un Comité d'initiative composé d'Albert Steffen, Marie Steiner, Ita Wegman, Elisabeth Vreede et Günther Wachsmuth, et prend lui-même la présidence. En même temps, en tant que centre de l'action spirituelle, il fonde l'Université libre de science de l'esprit. Elle est constituée de classes et de sections pour l'anthroposophie générale, la pédagogie, la médecine, les arts de la parole et de la musique, les Belles-Lettres, les mathématiques et l'astronomie, les sciences de la nature et les arts plastiques (Edith Maryon) . Peu de temps après, une section pour la jeunesse s'y ajoute (Maria Röschl) , et, plus tard, un département agricole et une Section pour les sciences sociales.

1923

Ré-organisation intérieure de la Société anthroposophique, pour préparer la fondation de la Société anthroposophique universelle (Allemagne, Norvège, Suisse, Angleterre, Hollande, Autriche) . Cours de pédagogie pour les éducateurs suisses ; même cours à Ikley, en Angleterre (25 décembre) .

1924

1er janvier : Semaine de Noël de la Société anthroposophique universelle. Fondation de l'Université libre de science spirituelle.

Cours pour les jeunes médecins. Les conférences sur le karma (Dornach, Prague, Berne, Breslau, Arlesheim, Londres) . Cours de pédagogie à Stuttgart, Berne, Arnheim, Torquay (Angleterre) . Cours d'eurythmie musicale ; cours aux agriculteurs à Koberwicz, en Silésie. Cours d'eurythmie parlée. Conférence aux ouvriers. Cours d'art de la parole et d'art dramatique. Dernier cours aux théologiens sur L'Apocalypse. Dernière conférence pour les membres, le 28 septembre 1924.

Automne 1924 : Rudolf Steiner doit rester alité. Les cours et les conférences, qui avaient pris une ampleur considérable, sont brutalement interrompus.

1924-1925

À travers les questions d'agriculteurs (Carl Graf von Keyserlingk) , de pédagogues curatifs (Franz Löffler, Albrecht Stroschein, Siegfried Pickert) et les cours spécialisés donnés par Rudolf Steiner, naissent l'agriculture bio-dynamique, la pédagogie curative et la socio-thérapie anthroposophiques. À l'initiative de Marie Steiner, Max Gumbel-Seiling, Gootfried Haass-Berkow et d'autres, de nouvelles perspectives sont données pour le théâtre et l'art de la parole avec le « Cours d'art dramatique » .

Par son intense activité de conférencier, les « Lignes directrices anthroposophiques » et les « Lettres de Michaël » , une nouvelle formulation de l'anthroposophie apparaît.

Pendant cette période, poursuite de l'écriture de son autobiographie : « Mein Lebensgang » (Autobiographie) .

« Ma vie » paraît chaque semaine dans le journal « Das Goetheanum » .

En collaboration avec le Docteur Ita Wegman, naît l'ouvrage intitulé : « Grundlegendes für eine Erweiterung der Heilkunst » (Données de base pour un élargissement de l'art de guérir) .

À travers des lettres et des directives (« Lettres aux membres » , « Les Directives ») , il s'adresse régulièrement aux membres et les encourage à approfondir leur travail sur le plan spirituel.

...

Quand on atteint l'année 1924 dans la vie de Rudolf Steiner, on s'arrête comme au seuil d'un mystère qui ne s'éclairera qu'à la longue. Elle commence par un coup direct qui lui est porté. Le 1er janvier 1923, le « Goetheanum » flambait. Un an plus tard, jour pour jour, Steiner contracte brusquement une maladie que rien ne pourra vaincre, ni le formidable pouvoir qu'il a sur lui-même, ni les soins les plus éclairés. Certes, la perte du « Goetheanum » avait déjà ébranlé sa force de vie. La distance avait grandi entre l'âme et le corps, mais rien de comparable avec le choc que Marie Steiner a comparé à un coup de poignard. C'était dans l'après-midi du Jour de l'An ; l'Assemblée venait de se terminer. Avant que les membres se séparent et reprennent le chemin du retour, ils s'étaient tous réunis pour un « rout » amical dans la « Menuiserie » . Tasses de thé et pâtisseries légères circulaient. On lui en offrit ; il but, avala une bouchée et fut soudain pris d'un malaise violent. Il se dit empoisonné, mais toute nourriture par la suite devait également lui faire l'effet d'un poison et rien n'a pu prouver l'empoisonnement. En tout cas, de ce jour, tout aliment absorbé provoqua une souffrance et il se nourrit de moins en moins. Il est impossible de comprendre comment, dans ces conditions, il put mener pendant 9 mois encore cette vie que personne auprès de lui ne pouvait soutenir. Il devenait pourtant chaque jour plus diaphane. Il semblait traîner son corps au bout d'un fil. Mais quand il prenait la parole, ce n'était plus le même homme. Une telle intensité de vie rayonnait de lui qu'on ne pouvait pas croire qu'il fût sérieusement atteint. Fatigué, oui, mais gravement malade ? L'idée n'en effleurait pas l'esprit. Avec lui, on était habitué au miracle ; on avait confiance. L'effet n'en fut que plus terrifiant quand, arrivant au soir du 25 septembre pour la conférence, les membres virent la porte d'entrée close et lurent la pancarte annonçant que, ce soir-là, la conférence n'aurait pas lieu. Jusqu'à la Saint-Michel, il résista au mal qui consumait ses entrailles. Le 28, il put encore parler pour la dernière fois. Il le fit en levant le voile sur les arrière-plans du courant anthroposophique dans le passé et dans l'avenir. Mais il dut s'arrêter. Il ne restait à Rudolf Steiner que 9 mois pour terminer ce qui avait été entrepris.

Dans les lettres qu'il écrivit à Marie Steiner depuis son lit de malade il expliqua cet effondrement de la façon suivante :

« Cela fait déjà un bon moment que je n'ai plus guère de lien avec mon corps physique. Cela provoque un équilibre labile des forces physiques qui n'obéissent que si elles sont prises en main par une initiative correcte. Et cette rupture du lien avec le corps physique n'est pas due aux journées de conférences, ni même au fait que je me rendais entre-temps à la clinique - car tout cela était savamment dosé par la Doctoresse Wegman et moi-même, mais s'explique par la ruée des gens (le portier comptait 400 visiteurs pendant les journées où il donnait successivement 4 conférences du même jour, selon le récit de Marie Steiner) , et qu'il fallait alors, contrairement à tout dosage de ses propres forces, se tenir à leur disposition. »

(2 octobre 1924)

« Je t'ai déjà dit depuis longtemps que, dès janvier 1923 (à la suite de l'incendie) , le lien des membres supérieurs de mon être ne se réalisait plus entièrement avec mon corps physique ; dans ma vie en esprit, je perdais en quelque sorte le contact direct avec mon organisation physique. Pas avec le monde physique. Bien au contraire : la possibilité d'une appréciation saine de celui-ci ne fait que se renforcer et grandir. Mais c'est précisément parce qu'au niveau spirituel tout se passe sans la moindre déviation à l'égard du monde physique, que les forces adverses s'en prennent au corps physique. »

(15 octobre 1924)

Il ne quittera plus désormais l'atelier attenant à la « Menuiserie » où il travaillait au grand groupe de bois encore inachevé qui représente le Christ maîtrisant Lucifer et Ahrimane. Il l'a sous les yeux. Il reste au cœur du travail. Le jour tombe d'en-haut sur le lit qu'on a dressé là et que jonchent bientôt des papiers, des livres, les épreuves du Cours qu'il écrit sur la médecine avec la Doctoresse Wegman. Celle-ci, secondée par le Docteur Noll, veille sur lui, atténue ses souffrances.

(Édition du livre écrit en collaboration avec la Doctoresse Ita Wegman : « Bases d'une meilleure et plus vaste thérapeutique d'après les connaissances de la science spirituelle. »)

Ces 9 mois virent pourtant grandir encore son activité. Cela peut paraître superficiel de citer le nombre de conférences qu'il donna au cours de ces 9 mois qui lui restaient à vivre : 338 conférences et 68 allocutions et entretiens, tout cela en 272 jours ! Cet aspect extérieur des choses prouve bien une activité spirituelle intense et fournit un continuel sujet d'étonnement. Chaque mot de ces conférences fut transcrit et presque tout ce qu'il dit alors est aujourd'hui imprimé. Toute personne qui s'y intéresse peut donc suivre, jour après jour, tout ce qu'il fit et dit. Était-ce, ainsi qu'il l'a insinué lui-même, une sorte de compensation offerte par le monde spirituel à la perte que subit l'anthroposophie lors de l'incendie du « Gœtheanum » ? Était-ce l'approche de la mort qui lui donnait cette abondance de possibilités spirituelles ? Immédiatement après la semaine de Noël, Rudolf Steiner fit un cours « aux jeunes médecins » , qui les enthousiasma tout particulièrement. Il ne leur donna pas seulement des connaissances spirituelles, mais chercha surtout à approfondir l'être de ceux qui se préparaient à soigner les autres, ce que l'on peut appeler la « conscience morale et ésotérique » du médecin.

Depuis des années, Rudolf Steiner avait régulièrement fait des conférences aux ouvriers qui participaient à la construction du « Gœtheanum » , sur les problèmes pratiques et spirituels de la vie. Les ouvriers appréciaient beaucoup ces conférences. Il possédait à la perfection la manière de se faire comprendre des gens simples. Même en 1924, sa faiblesse physique et le surcroît de travail qui l'écrasait, ne purent l'empêcher de faire ce qu'il aimait et considérait comme son devoir social. Ces conférences étant éditées, tout le monde peut se les procurer. C'est à cette époque, qu'il fit la maquette du 2e « Gœtheanum » . Cet édifice, inauguré 3 ans après sa mort, est d'un style architectural qui (bien que tout à fait différent du précédent) s'éloigne considérablement du style traditionnel de notre époque. Expression d'un autre matériau (le 1er « Gœtheanum » était en bois ; le second est de béton) , l'édifice, malgré ses formes sévères, s'inscrit harmonieusement dans les lignes du paysage jurassien de Dornach. Ce « Gœtheanum » se tient là, maintenant, comme un être à l'esprit éveillé ; il regarde vers l'ouest, vers l'Occident, vers le soleil couchant. De cet édifice, la question devenue pierre s'élève : l'Occident, dont le destin est d'apporter par la technique la mort de la culture sur la Terre, trouvera-t-il aussi la force de transformer cette chute en une ascension ?

Ce que fit Rudolf Steiner à cette époque, personne d'autre que lui n'aurait pu le faire. Autour de lui, on se demandait souvent alors s'il prenait jamais le temps de dormir. Alors que tout le monde dormait, la lumière brûlait dans sa chambre (il travaillait) et, aux Ires heures de la matinée, il était le 1er à reprendre la tâche. C'est au cours de ces mêmes mois que furent fondées les sections pour la pédagogie curative et pour l'agriculture, que les pédagogues, les eurhythmistes et les médecins reçurent leurs dernières instructions, que la Communauté des chrétiens bénéficia d'un vaste concours. Les voyages que Rudolf Steiner entreprit à Prague, à Paris, en Hollande et en Angleterre lui permirent de faire participer ces pays à l'impulsion extraordinaire donnée à Dornach, pendant la semaine de fondation. Il semble qu'une zone spirituelle encore plus étendue s'était ouverte à Rudolf Steiner et qu'il ne pouvait parler que des choses qui, bien que reposant en lui depuis fort longtemps, venaient seulement d'atteindre leur complète maturité et demandaient à être exprimées. Le cycle de conférences de la semaine de fondation (Noël de 1923) , dont le titre est : « L'Histoire du monde à la lumière de l'anthroposophie et comme base de la connaissance de l'esprit de l'homme » , avait ouvert la porte aux Considérations karmiques qu'il poursuivit pendant tous ces mois et jusqu'au dernier jour.

La conception que l'individualité de l'homme doit s'incarner d'époque en époque pour compenser une vie par une autre et mûrir grâce à de nouvelles expériences nous vient de l'Antiquité. Elle domine depuis des millénaires la vie spirituelle de l'Orient. Ne serait-elle pas la première de toutes les conceptions ? Ces enseignements sont toujours demeurés vagues et limités. Aussi loin que l'on puisse remonter, Rudolf Steiner fut probablement le 1er qui osa, par son investigation spirituelle, suivre concrètement les courants historiques ainsi que les vies de certains personnages pendant de longues périodes et eut le courage d'exposer les résultats de ces investigations devant un vaste auditoire. Dans cet auditoire, justement, personne n'aurait pu « contrôler » jusque dans les détails, le contenu de ses dires. Mais nous tous, qui avons reçu alors de Steiner lui-même, toutes ces indications, nous eûmes l'impression qu'il avançait dans ce domaine avec le même souci d'exactitude et d'authenticité que celui des meilleurs physiciens ou astronomes modernes dans leur propre domaine. Du 20 janvier au 10 août, 18 lettres aux membres parurent dans « Les Nouvelles de la Société Antroposophique » . Il tenta alors d'expliquer les exigences spirituelles relatives à la « semaine de fondation » .

« L'anthroposophie ne peut se développer que comme une chose vivante, car son essence même est vie. Elle est la vie dont la source est l'esprit. La forme première qu'elle doit prendre parmi les hommes, est celle de l'Idée. Et elle s'adresse, en premier lieu, à l'intelligence de l'homme. S'il n'en était pas ainsi, elle perdrait tout contenu - elle ne serait qu'exaltation sentimentale. Mais l'esprit réel n'est ni délirant ni romanesque. Il parle un langage compréhensible, substantiel. » l'essence de l'anthroposophie, sa mission et ses devoirs. En 1924, au début du mois de septembre, lors de son retour d'Angleterre, plus de 1,000 personnes l'attendaient à Dornach, parmi lesquelles des médecins, des acteurs, des théologiens (il leur avait promis des cours particuliers) . Bien que souffrant déjà énormément, il tint ses promesses. Pendant 3 semaines, devant un auditoire d'acteurs, de récitants, de professeurs, il parla de « La Formation de la parole et de l'art dramatique » . Aux théologiens de la Communauté des chrétiens, il parla de « L'Apocalypse de Jean » , et aux prêtres et aux médecins il fit un cours sur la « Médecine pastorale » .

Ces Lettres aux membres passèrent dans « Les Directives » qui, plus tard, furent publiées sous le titre : « Le Mystère de Michaël » . Rudolf Steiner en écrivit la plus grande partie dans son lit de malade. Elles parurent chaque semaine, jusqu'à la dernière semaine de mars 1925. Il y a décrit, et pour la dernière fois, mais sous de nouveaux aspects.

Dans le « Bulletin » paraissent chaque semaine « Lettres » et « Directives » . Leur but est d'inciter les membres à se concentrer sur l'Enseignement, à reprendre, à la lumière de l'impulsion reçue à Noël, l'étude coordonnée de tout ce qui est disséminé dans les quelque 6,000 conférences sténographiées et la vingtaine de livres écrits. C'est maintenant aux groupes de travail de retrouver l'unité à travers la profusion des textes et le foisonnement des sujets traités. Lui-même entreprend au début de dégager dans un style lapidaire les motifs essentiels. Très vite, pourtant, ce n'est pas à une systématisation de l'œuvre qu'il travaille mais il allume de nouveaux foyers de lumière. Il poursuit l'investigation qu'il avait dirigée sur le karma historique du mouvement anthroposophique, et il la pousse vers ce qu'il appelle le « mystère de Michaël » . À mesure qu'il avance, son regard s'affranchit de plus en plus des limites de temps et d'espace et s'étend largement sur le passé et sur l'avenir de la « pensée michaëlique » . Ce qu'il décrit s'applique prophétiquement aux conditions d'existence dans lesquelles nous vivons aujourd'hui. Il voit déjà les conséquences du dessèchement des liens entre l'homme et la nature, l'emprise d'Ahrimane sur la pensée, les bouleversements historiques dus à l'âme de conscience, la lutte de Michaël pour la liberté humaine, la technocratie menaçant d'écraser cette liberté. Pour sauver l'humanité de ces dangers, il indique la seule ressource : conquérir une science de l'esprit qui s'élève aussi haut dans le monde supra-sensible que la technique nous entraîne dans la matière et la sous-matière. Son regard trouve encore la force de dissiper l'écran sombre qui recouvre l'avenir. Et pourtant, jusque dans ces ultimes conquêtes de l'esprit, il doit subir les assauts d'un adversaire qui joue sa partie décisive. C'est dans le secret de l'âme qu'il mène ces combats. Il n'en parle point et, jusqu'au bout, ne donne au monde que les résultats positifs des victoires qu'il obtient, gardant pour lui, si l'on ose dire, le sang versé. Mais ici, encore, les carnets de notes recueillis après sa mort fournissent des preuves. Celui de novembre 1924 porte ces quelques vers qui soulèvent un coin du voile sur les luttes qu'il poursuit en silence :

« Toi, magicien négateur de toute vie,
Tu t'insinues de nuit
Et instilles une force adverse
Dans la noble puissance du feu cosmique,
Dans la trame judicieuse du destin,
Dans l'éternel pouvoir des volontés divines,
Pour mieux répandre un venin démoniaque,
Qui tourmente les âmes et vers moi
Comme un serpent se glisse. »

Sur les traversées de ses nuits obscures, n'a-t-il vraiment jamais rien dit ? Pourtant, si. Pas de confidence personnelle, mais une scène des Drames-Mystères. Le dernier tableau du dernier drame, qui se déroule chaque année sous les yeux de milliers de spectateurs au « Gœtheanum » , met en scène un pareil affrontement. Plus que seul, isolé de ses disciples, cerné par Ahrimane, Bénédicte mis à l'épreuve se délivre de l'adversaire lorsqu'il le discerne, le reconnaît, le « pense » . Ahrimane doit alors s'enfuir, démasqué :

« Il est temps que je m'écarte au plus vite de son champ de conscience. Car, dès que sa vision pourra me penser dans ma vérité, aussitôt se créera dans sa pensée une partie de la force qui lentement m'anéantit. »

Si l'on rapproche cette fin des « Mystères » des ultimes avertissements qu'on tient de la main de Rudolf Steiner, on y retrouve bien la même victoire sur les ténèbres et la même injonction, il faut être vigilant, lucide, et comme il l'écrivait après l'incendie, « s'astreindre à la pensée forte » .

Ce fut « sans doute une expérience vraiment amère » pour Rudolf Steiner, lorsque le 26 septembre, il eut pour la 1^{re} fois à décommander une conférence. Les autres conférences aux ouvriers du « Gœtheanum » , aux membres, aux élèves de l'Université libre, furent poursuivies sans interruption jusqu'au 28 septembre. Le 28 septembre, il rassembla encore une fois toutes ses forces, selon Marie Steiner ...

« pour donner la 1^{re} partie d'une allocution qui devait être complétée le 29, à l'occasion de la fête de la Saint-Michel. Mais sa voix était déjà à moitié éteinte ; c'était comme un écho venant de très loin ; il dut interrompre plus tôt que prévu ... et le jour de la Saint-Michel, il n'y eut pas de suite. »

Ainsi, cette allocution du 28 septembre était-elle devenue sa conférence d'adieu. 2 jours plus tard, Marie Steiner dut entreprendre en Allemagne une tournée d'eurythmie qui avait été planifiée de longue date. Le 2 octobre, Rudolf Steiner lui communiqua qu'il avait convenu avec la Doctoresse Wegman de quitter la maison « Hansi » (appartement de Rudolf et Marie Steiner) pour s'installer dans son atelier à la « Menuiserie » du « Gœtheanum » . Son lit se trouvait dans son atelier, au pied de la statue inachevée du Christ. L'atelier où se trouvait la statue était lui-même accolé à la « Menuiserie » , et c'est pourquoi, tout comme la statue, il échappa au sinistre :

« Cela est nécessaire parce que j'ai besoin de soins très attentifs ; le trajet aller-retour efface chaque fois les résultats des soins. Je suis donc ici et y resterai tant que cela sera nécessaire. La Doctoresse Wegman fait tout ce qui est en son pouvoir. Bien entendu, j'aurais préféré m'installer à la maison Hansi. Lorsque nous avons vu que le trajet aller-retour était impossible, nous en avons discuté. Mais on ne peut pas faire aménager à la maison Hansi les installations de bain indispensables que nous avons ici. »

C'est ainsi que se réalisa une séparation spatiale entre Rudolf et Marie Steiner après une vie en commun de plus de 2 décennies. Alors que la Doctoresse Wegman se fut rendue entièrement libre pour se charger des soins dont Rudolf Steiner avait besoin, et que le Docteur Noll, de Cassel, se fut également mis à disposition, Marie Steiner ne put dorénavant revoir Rudolf Steiner que lorsqu'elle séjournait à Dornach, certes quotidiennement mais aux seules heures programmées. Cela doit avoir été très pénible pour elle et c'est probablement à cela que Rudolf Steiner fait allusion dans sa lettre du 27 février 1925 :

« Je t'écris ces lignes à peu près à l'heure où tu es d'habitude assise à mes côtés. C'est avec la plus profonde émotion intérieure que je pense combien c'est beau quand je peux écouter le récit de ton activité et que nous pouvons nous entretenir de cette activité qui est la tienne. Et quand je sais que tu lis de temps à autre le récit de notre activité commune décrite dans mon " Autobiographie ", je sens profondément combien nous sommes unis. Que le karma amène aussi d'autres personnes à mes côtés est une réalité karmique. Et la maladie a montré comment ce karma est incisif. Mais tu es parvenue à comprendre cela ; c'est une bénédiction pour moi. C'est vraiment avec toi seule que je puis, lorsqu'il s'agit de porter un jugement, être uni dans le penser et le ressentir. Je me suis déjà senti frustré de ne pouvoir te soumettre les dernières pages de l'article sur Steffen avant de le remettre (hier) à l'imprimeur. Car c'est à ton seul jugement que je reconnais, en ce qui me concerne, une compétence fondée sur l'être intérieur. »

Au printemps, pressé de tous côtés, Rudolf Steiner avait commencé à écrire une autobiographie qui paraissait chaque semaine sous forme d'esquisses et qui, plus tard, publiée, devint : « Mein Lebensgang » (Ma vie) . Même à l'époque de sa maladie, cet ouvrage ne fut pas interrompu. Alors que tous les fascicules écrits de sa main, portaient la mention à suivre, le dernier manuscrit qu'il envoya à l'imprimerie, la dernière semaine de mars 1925, ne portait aucune mention. Ainsi, couché dans son atelier, terrassé par la maladie, son esprit demeura actif et infatigable.

Par ces paroles, Rudolf Steiner confirme peu de temps avant sa mort ce qu'il avait déjà fixé par testament en 1907 :

« Après ma mort, Mademoiselle Marie de Sivers doit avoir le droit de disposer en mon nom. Ce qu'elle fera ainsi sera fait en mon nom. Elle doit considérer ma mort comme voulue par les puissances supérieures et, en aucun cas, y voir une énigme. Les choses ont un lien qu'il faut honorer même si on ne le comprend pas encore. Mais Marie de Sivers sera toujours auprès de moi. Notre union demeure indissoluble.

(Docteur Rudolf Steiner : Berlin, 19 février 1907.)

Marie Steiner ressentit comme un destin tragique le fait de n'avoir pu être présente au moment de la mort de Rudolf Steiner. Elle était en tournée avec la troupe d'eurythmistes lorsque l'état du malade se détériora brusquement. À la fin de cette tournée d'eurythmie, pour laquelle Rudolf Steiner avait collaboré à l'élaboration du programme, il était prévu de donner 2 représentations supplémentaires lors d'un congrès pédagogique, ainsi qu'une représentation pour les élèves de l'école Waldorf. Par ailleurs, Rudolf Steiner l'avait priée de s'occuper sur place de problèmes liés à la vie de la Société anthroposophique :

« Si tu trouvais encore le temps de parler avec les adversaires de Unger, ce serait une bonne chose. Je t'ai déjà écrit à quoi t'en tenir. »

(23 mars 1925)

Il appréciait et souhaitait de tout cœur cet engagement en faveur de l'eurythmie :

« Avec quelle grande émotion il recevait toujours les dépêches que Madame Steiner lui expédiait de chaque ville où avait été donnée une représentation d'eurythmie, des dépêches annonçant de grands succès », raconte la Doctoresse Wegman.

Cela ressort régulièrement dans ses lettres, dans une des toutes dernières (le 23 mars 1925) en termes suivants :

« Je ne peux vraiment pas t'exprimer combien j'admire ton dévouement, et combien je te suis reconnaissant pour tout ce que tu accomplis ainsi avec tant de bonheur. »

En fin de soirée du 29 mars, Marie Steiner fut informée par téléphone de l'aggravation de l'état de Rudolf Steiner, mais avec l'indication que ce n'était pas nécessaire de voyager tout de suite et qu'elle serait de nouveau tenue au courant le lendemain matin. Elle essaya néanmoins (mais sans succès) de trouver un moyen de locomotion. Le lendemain matin, peu avant 6 heures, elle reçut un second appel. On se procura immédiatement une voiture et, accompagnée de Emil Leinhas, Marie Steiner roula d'un trait jusqu'à Dornach. Lorsqu'elle arriva peu avant midi, c'était déjà trop tard. Elle apprit qu'il était décédé vers 10 heures.

Albert Steffen écrit :

« Elle n'a pu assister à la mort de l'être le plus cher mais, intérieurement, elle avait tout pressenti au cours du voyage. »

« Il aimait à entendre le bruit du marteau et la rumeur vivante, autour des échafaudages, qui pénétraient le silence de son atelier. Ces bruits qui parvenaient du lieu où l'on reconstruisait le " Gœtheanum " lui parlaient de l'édifice à venir. »

Il était lié par toutes les fibres de son être à ce nouveau centre de l'anthroposophie et à la Société qui en était le porteur, le responsable humain, ainsi qu'à ses membres. Puis, vint la journée du 30 mars. Günther Wachsmuth, qui a vécu cette journée, la raconta en ces termes :

« Les derniers instants de la vie terrestre de Rudolf Steiner furent délivrés de toute lutte avec le physique et exempts de tous les doutes qui assaillent généralement la plupart des hommes ; son visage respirait la paix, la grâce, la certitude intérieure, la contemplation spirituelle. Il joignit les mains sur la poitrine, ses yeux étaient lumineux et fermement dirigés vers les mondes de l'esprit auxquels il s'unissait par la contemplation. Lorsque vint le dernier souffle, il ferma lui-même les yeux et l'espace autour de lui s'emplit non pas de l'impression d'une fin, mais d'un acte spirituel d'une élévation infinie. Ses traits, la puissance des mains jointes pour la prière, parlaient d'un éveil sublime, radieux. Le corps qui reposait là ressemblait à ceux que les grands artistes ont prêté aux chevaliers du Moyen-âge, gisant sur leurs sarcophages, dont les yeux fermés voient, dont la position de repos éternel donne cependant l'impression d'une immense possibilité de mouvement; un éveil supra-terrestre, une marche vers les sphères de l'esprit. »

Il n'a pas dit une seule parole relative à la mort qui approche. On a seulement remarqué après-coup qu'en remettant comme chaque semaine les feuillets manuscrits du texte destiné à la revue « Das Goetheanum », il n'a pas ajouté comme à son habitude « à suivre » aux derniers mots qu'il a tracés et qui devaient paraître après sa mort. Mais il y a plus énigmatique encore : dans la nuit du 29 au 30 mars, quand les dernières heures sont arrivées et que la mort est imminente, la Doctoresse lui demande s'il a une dernière recommandation à faire, un message à lui laisser pour la Société ? Il la regarde les yeux dans les yeux, se tait et détourne la tête. Il faut que tout s'accomplisse ... Le temps de la parole est passé. Le temps du silence est venu. Il ne le rompra plus, même lorsqu'à l'aube elle appellera les autres membres du Comité directeur présents à Dornach pour qu'ils assistent à ses derniers moments. Ils se rassemblent : Albert Steffen, Günther Wachsmuth, Élisabeth Vreede. Ils le voient absorbé dans une contemplation intérieure qu'il semble suivre avec une extrême attention ; son regard dirigé droit devant lui plonge en d'autres mondes ; il prête l'oreille à d'autres sonorités. Le souffle se ralentit paisiblement. Lorsqu'entre cet esprit rayonnant et le corps dépouillé la distance devient si grande que le fil est prêt à se rompre, il croise les mains sur la poitrine et, sur la dernière expiration, ferme lui-même les yeux. Guéri.

A-t-il voulu par son silence élever ceux qui l'entouraient à la pleine responsabilité des tâches qui allaient leur demander d'acquiescer, à leur tour, la maîtrise ? Trop de « paroles du Docteur » avaient servi de prétexte à trop de mots d'ordre pour qu'à l'heure décisive il ne préfère simplement laisser germer l'avenir. Le temps était venu pour que les phrases, dont on fait passivement des formules, fassent place au silence qui voit mûrir les libres décisions. Tel est en tout cas le sens qu'on peut donner à la grandeur de cette scène.

« C'était un lundi matin à 10 heures. Dans la " Menuiserie ", les ouvriers arrêtaient les machines et, sans bruit, rangèrent les outils. Au dehors, la colline couverte de cerisiers en fleurs était envahie des forces du printemps, mais d'un printemps silencieux et solennel. Dans ce silence commença bientôt à se former la longue file des membres montant le chemin de la colline. Pendant 3 jours, sous un ciel d'avril qui rayonnait, il en vint de partout. En un lent défilé, ils pénétraient dans l'atelier et ne pouvaient se rassasier de contempler, au pied du Christ, les traits de leur Maître d'où émanait une lumière de résurrection. »

Marie Steiner racontera plus tard :

« Le voilà mis en bière, aux pieds du " Représentant de l'Humanité ". La foule se portait en masse vers l'atelier ; silencieuse, pleine de reconnaissance et de respect, profondément bouleversée. La pièce fut, pendant quelques jours et nuits, comme remplie d'une atmosphère non terrestre. »

4 semaines plus tard, elle écrivit à la sœur de Rudolf Steiner :

« Maintenant, nous nous disons tous que nous avons été trop optimistes, mais compte-tenu de l'immense énergie vitale dont Rudolf Steiner a toujours fait preuve, même pendant sa maladie, nous nous sommes toujours bercés d'espoir. Cela semblait impossible qu'il puisse s'en aller, et personne de nous n'a voulu y croire. Depuis qu'il ne pouvait plus voyager, j'ai pour ma part dû accentuer mon action vers l'extérieur, dans le sens voulu par lui ; c'était pénible mais, d'autre part, cela l'apaisait de savoir que l'activité n'était pas interrompue. Mes jambes malades ne m'auraient pas

permis d'assurer les soins dont la Doctoresse Wegman et le Docteur Noll se sont chargés avec dévouement. Mais j'ai beaucoup souffert de devoir être si souvent absente. Je crois qu'il a voulu faire un trop grand effort pour guérir. Il m'avait écrit qu'il devait guérir maintenant pour pouvoir reprendre son travail à la maquette du nouvel édifice. Mais l'organisme était déjà trop épuisé pour supporter cet effort. Surmenage ; par suite du travail sur-humain jamais interrompu, et sous-alimentation parce qu'il ne supportait plus rien, c'est sans doute cela qui a empêché la guérison. Comme le monde est mort depuis qu'il s'en est allé ! ... »

Il s'est avancé, seul, à des hauteurs où nul ne peut le rejoindre. À ceux qui le suivent, il doit laisser le temps de gagner par eux-mêmes les étapes. Il les a dotés de 3 trésors :

D'abord, une somme de connaissances, recouvrées ou conquises sur l'avenir, qui est loin d'être encore parfaitement explorée. Elle constitue la base d'une Science de l'esprit. De ce 1er trésor est sorti un fleuve de vie : l'œuvre qui s'épanche en un nombre sans cesse grandissant d'Écoles, Instituts curatifs, Cliniques, Laboratoires de recherche scientifique et d'applications thérapeutiques, Écoles d'art, Domaines bio-dynamiques, etc.

Enfin, une méthode de développement intérieur pour rétablir le contact perdu entre l'esprit dormant en l'homme et l'esprit dans l'univers. Aujourd'hui, trois-quart de siècle après sa mort, l'œuvre bienfaisante, convaincante, est en pleine extension ; elle confirme la vigueur des germes qu'en elle il déposa. Mais lui-même garde en partie le secret de son être profond. Il dépassait trop son époque pour être compris des hommes de son temps. La nôtre lui fait déjà une plus large place partout où l'excellence des fruits fait augurer de l'arbre. Quand donc sera-t-il vraiment reconnu pour ce qu'il fut ... ? Le temps doit faire son œuvre et voir lever les facultés spirituelles que lui-même posséda pleinement et voulut éveiller chez ceux qu'il appela ses frères.

Écho :

Un lourd nuage plane sur la civilisation européenne, et, dans un certain sens, il est étonnant de voir combien peu l'humanité accepte (...) de sentir, de percevoir ce lourd nuage.

(Rudolf Steiner, 1924.)

À la mort de Rudolf Steiner, le soubassement de béton du second « Gœtheanum » était à peine terminé. Ce que le Maître avait projeté, ébauché, des novices et des compagnons devaient le mener à bien. Un instant seulement avait suffi pour que la Société et l'Université perdent leur chef, alors que, si tout venait d'être organisé, rien n'était encore fait. Dans ce domaine, aussi, les novices et les compagnons durent, par leurs seules forces, faire ce que le Maître leur avait enseigné. Mais l'œuvre était trop grandiose, elle devait embrasser tout un monde et, bien souvent, la tâche dépassa les forces des disciples. Dans une société aussi vaste, qui rassemblait des individualités aussi disparates, les luttes étaient inévitables. Chez tout homme qui étudie l'anthroposophie et cherche à la vivre activement, celle-ci s'individualise, prend un autre visage, se colore de la personnalité de l'anthroposophe.

La routine détruit la recherche anthroposophique. Il n'est pas étonnant que la Société, peu de temps après la mort de Rudolf Steiner, ait traversé des crises - sans compter le fait qu'elle dut subir des interdictions sévères en Allemagne, sous le régime nazi. Mais elle s'est montrée pleine de forces, et les difficultés du début ont été vaincues. Après la mort de Rudolf Steiner, c'est Albert Steffen qui prit sa succession à la présidence de la Société. Presque toutes les sections de l'Université libre sont aujourd'hui sous la direction d'autres personnes. Tous les membres, qui ont fait partie du 1er Bureau, sont aujourd'hui décédés : Ita Wegman et Élisabeth Vreede, en 1943 ; Marie Steiner, en 1948 ; Günther Wachsmuth, en mars 1964 ; et Albert Steffen, en juillet 1964. Chaque année, des milliers de membres et de spectateurs affluent au « Gœtheanum » , surtout pour assister aux représentations des 4 Drame-Mystères de Rudolf Steiner, des drames d'Albert Steffen, et voir le « Faust » de Gœthe. Le « Gœtheanum » est, en effet, le seul endroit au monde où l'on peut voir représentées les 2 parties du « Faust » , dans le texte intégral et sans coupures.

Tout au long de l'année, une quantité de conférences, de séminaires, de représentations artistiques, d'expositions, ont lieu au « Gœtheanum » . La clinique d'Arlesheim ainsi que l'Institut pour la recherche du cancer, les fabriques de médicaments « Valeda » ont été agrandis par de nouveaux bâtiments. Le nombre des écoles et instituts pédagogiques croît d'année en année, dans le monde entier. Un groupe de collaborateurs travaille à l'édition de l'œuvre tout entière de Rudolf Steiner, c'est le « Rudolf Steiner Nachlaßverwaltung » . Si l'on jette un regard sur la vie et l'œuvre de Rudolf Steiner, on est tenté de crier au monde moderne qui se sait au bord de l'abîme : Qui et que cherchez-vous ? La victoire sur le matérialisme ? La solution des questions sociales ? Une renaissance de la science, de l'art, de la religion ?

À toutes ces questions, Rudolf Steiner a apporté des réponses. Elles sont différentes de celles que l'on attend. Cela suffit-il pour les rejeter ? Parce que le langage est inhabituel ? Parce que beaucoup parmi ses disciples ne sont pas convaincants ? En était-il autrement dans l'Antiquité des grands prophètes et des guides de l'humanité ?

Notre époque s'est-elle donné la peine d'examiner réellement son œuvre et sa vie ? A-t-elle pesé ses paroles sur la balance d'or ? A-t-elle accepté ses impulsions innombrables ? Les a-t-elles contrôlées ? Une monographie de Rudolf Steiner, écrite de nos jours pour le public, ne peut se terminer que par d'amères et graves questions ...

1943

4 mars : Mort d'Ita Wegman.

1948

27 décembre : Mort de Marie Steiner.

1963

2 mars 1963 : Mort de Günther Wachsmuth.

13 juillet : Mort d'Albert Steffen.

Rudolf Steiner : Penseur de l'éducation en Autriche

Rudolf Steiner, le précepteur

Rudolf Steiner fut très tôt confronté avec ce qui, dans les dernières années de sa vie, devint la « pédagogie curative ». Sur le conseil du professeur Karl Julius Schröer, il devint en 1884, précepteur dans la famille de Ladislav et Pauline Specht, et le demeura jusqu'à son départ de Vienne, en 1890.

« Le destin me donna, dans le domaine de la pédagogie, une mission particulière. J'entrai comme précepteur dans une famille où il y avait 4 garçons. Je faisais préparer l'école communale aux 3 premiers, puis, je leur donnais des répétitions pour le cours moyen. Je fus chargé de toute l'éducation du 4e, âgé d'environ 10 ans. C'était lui qui causait le plus de soucis aux parents, particulièrement à la mère. Lorsque j'arrivai dans la famille, il connaissait à peine les éléments de la lecture, de l'écriture et de l'arithmétique. Il était tellement anormal quant à son développement physique et psychique que, dans la famille, on doutait qu'il soit encore éducatible. Sa pensée était lente et endormie ; le moindre effort lui valait des migraines, chute de tension, pâleur, et le rendait même craintif. J'eus la satisfaction au bout de 2 ans, de voir l'enfant suivre l'école communale, et réussir l'examen d'entrée au lycée. Sa santé s'était beaucoup améliorée. L'hydrocéphalie était en régression très nette. Je pus proposer aux parents de présenter l'enfant à l'école publique.

Je suis reconnaissant au destin de m'avoir placé dans de telles circonstances, car j'ai acquis par cette expérience, de façon vivante, la connaissance de l'entité humaine. Je crois que je n'aurais jamais pu en avoir une connaissance aussi vivante si mon chemin ne m'avait conduit là. Mon élève fit donc ses études au lycée. Je restai à ses côtés jusqu'à la "unterprima", classe de Ire. Il avait alors fait tant de progrès qu'il n'avait plus besoin de moi. Après le lycée, il entra à la faculté de Médecine, devint médecin, et c'est comme tel qu'il fut tué pendant la Guerre. Une bonne partie de ma jeunesse est liée à cette mission. »

Plus tard, Rudolf Steiner se souvint avec gratitude de sa vie dans la famille Specht, de sa mission auprès de cet enfant (Otto Specht) et de sa guérison. Sa destinée lui permit ainsi, de très bonne heure, de se tourner vers les problèmes de la santé et de la maladie, de façon concrète. Sans ces 7 années d'apprentissage, il n'aurait guère eu, par la suite, la possibilité d'inaugurer son mouvement de pédagogie curative.

...

Les idées réformatrices de Steiner ont aujourd'hui, dans de nombreux domaines (éducation, médecine, agriculture et arts plastiques, notamment) un impact pratique tout à fait extraordinaire.

Sur le plan théorique, en revanche, ses écrits n'ont suscité, de la part des milieux scientifiques et philosophiques, que peu d'intérêt et encore moins remporté l'adhésion. Cela étant, sa pensée soulève des controverses passionnées parmi ceux qui la connaissent. Alors que ses partisans y adhèrent sans réserve, les chercheurs universitaires en font un sujet de polémique et la critiquent en bloc. Il n'y a pas de juste milieu dans l'appréciation des idées de Steiner.

Cela tient tout d'abord à la diversité et à l'hétérogénéité et à l'importance de son œuvre littéraire et rhétorique (2), ainsi qu'à l'impossibilité de l'appréhender dans son intégralité ; son style, souvent étrange et ésotérique, constitue un obstacle quasi insurmontable pour l'analyse scientifique et philosophique. En outre, il n'existe à ce jour aucune biographie critique de Steiner, celles que l'on trouve s'apparentant plus ou moins à l'hagiographie : pour ne pas nuire à son prestige, elles passent sous silence les nombreuses influences intellectuelles qui l'ont marqué et ses faiblesses de caractère, et s'arrangent pour présenter comme un tout harmonieux une vie personnelle et professionnelle caractérisée par d'évidentes discontinuités. Nous nous bornerons à exposer brièvement les principaux faits indiscutables de sa vie et ses grands principes les plus accessibles qui fondent son approche de l'éducation.

Fils d'un employé des chemins de fer autrichiens, Rudolf Steiner naît le 25 février 1861 à Kraljevec (Croatie). Après avoir fréquenté l'école secondaire (n'apprenant ni de latin ni de grec), il étudie les mathématiques, l'histoire naturelle et la chimie à l'École supérieure technique de Vienne, de 1879 à 1883, en vue de devenir professeur de l'enseignement secondaire général. Toutefois, il ne termine pas ces études et s'attache plutôt à approfondir ses connaissances littéraires et philosophiques. À l'expiration de sa bourse, il travaille de 1884 à 1890 comme précepteur et éducateur d'un enfant handicapé dans une famille juive de la grande bourgeoisie viennoise. Philosophe dilettante et autodidacte, il entreprend entre 1882 et 1897, à l'instigation de son professeur de littérature et mentor intellectuel Karl Julius Schröer, l'édition et le commentaire des œuvres scientifiques de Johann Wolfgang Goethe (1749-1832). À partir de 1890, il travaille, en tant que collaborateur indépendant, aux Archives Goethe et Schiller de Weimar (Allemagne). Ses premiers écrits, et notamment son œuvre principale, « Der Philosophie der Freiheit » (La philosophie de la liberté) (1894), sont l'aboutissement de ses efforts pour donner une explication philosophique systématique du mode de pensée objectif en même temps qu'idéaliste de Goethe. En 1891, il passe en tant qu'étudiant libre son doctorat en philosophie à l'Université de Rostock (Allemagne) en soutenant une thèse qui deviendra ultérieurement une de ses œuvres majeures, « Wahrheit und Wissenschaft » (Vérité et science).

En 1897, une fois terminés ses travaux d'édition, Steiner va s'établir à Berlin. Il travaille comme rédacteur, écrivain, conférencier et chargé de cours et participe aux activités des milieux littéraires bohèmes d'avant-garde, du mouvement ouvrier et des réformateurs religieux. En 1900, il donne un cycle de conférences à la « Bibliothèque théosophique » occultiste, où il rencontre Marie von Sivers qui deviendra plus tard sa seconde femme. De 1902 à 1913, il assume, en qualité de secrétaire-général, la direction de la section allemande de la Société théosophique dont le porte-parole international était Annie Besant. En tant que chef de file d'un mouvement de renouveau spirituel, le « Docteur Steiner » déploie alors une immense activité, multipliant conférences et voyages, comme en témoignent un nombre impressionnant de comptes-rendus sténographiques de conférences (plus de 6,000) et près de 30 monographies.

En 1913, Steiner rompt avec Annie Besant, en raison, essentiellement, de divergences d'opinion sur l'interprétation ésotérique de la vie du Christ, et fonde avec la majorité de ses partisans allemands la Société anthroposophique dont le siège se trouve aujourd'hui encore au « Goetheanum » de Dornach, près de Bâle (Suisse) , dont il avait lui-même dessiné les plans. En tant que fondateur charismatique d'une communauté idéologique entièrement axée sur lui, Steiner développe au cours des 20 dernières années de sa vie, dans d'innombrables cours et conférences donnés dans toute l'Europe, un programme de réforme spirituelle dans les domaines de l'art, de l'éducation, de la politique et de l'économie, de la médecine, de l'agriculture et de la religion chrétienne.

L'ambiance révolutionnaire qui règne dans l'Allemagne vaincue des années 1918-1919 lui offre l'occasion de mettre en pratique ses idées sur l'éducation dans une nouvelle école. Le 7 septembre 1919, il inaugure solennellement pour 256 élèves issus essentiellement de familles ouvrières travaillant à la fabrique de cigarettes Waldorf-Astoria de Stuttgart (Allemagne) , la Ire « Libre École Waldorf » , établissement d'éducation mixte du primaire et du secondaire. Il faut replacer sa réforme pédagogique dans le contexte de l'utopie radicale de « structuration tripartite de l'organisme social » qu'il avait lui-même proclamée : la création spontanée de nouveaux établissements dotés d'une constitution autonome (jardins d'enfants, écoles et collèges) ainsi que l'organisation coopérative d'entreprises économiques doivent permettre de parvenir à une stricte séparation entre la vie culturelle et économique d'un côté ; et le système politique étatique, de l'autre.

Le programme politique de « liberté de la vie spirituelle » et « d'économie associative » , tel que défini par Steiner, a échoué ; ses écoles, en revanche, ont été une réussite. Lorsqu'il meurt à Dornach, le 30 mars 1925, en laissant inachevée la rédaction de son autobiographie, la Ire promotion d'élèves de l'École Waldorf prépare le baccalauréat.

Le « Goethéanisme »

La perception intérieure du monde spirituel et la spiritualisation de tous les domaines de la vie constituent le thème central de l'œuvre de Steiner. À 19 ans, déjà, Steiner souffre de la démythification du monde due à l'économie, la technique, les sciences naturelles et la philosophie critique. Au plus profond de son être persiste, au contraire, la certitude, courante en d'autre temps, de l'existence d'un univers spirituel. Au début de ses études, censément en sciences naturelles, il écrit à un ami :

« L'année dernière, je me suis efforcé de comprendre si Schelling a raison de dire qu'il existe, en chacun d'entre nous, “ une merveilleuse faculté cachée, au-delà de l'instabilité du moment, de se retirer au plus profond de soi-même pour y observer ce qu'il y a d'éternel en nous dans sa forme immuable ”. Je pensais, et pense encore, avoir indubitablement découvert en moi cette faculté intérieure. Il y a d'ailleurs longtemps déjà que je l'avais pressentie. »

Dans ses œuvres pré-théosophiques, Steiner, réfutant délibérément le criticisme de Immanuel Kant, qui limite l'expérience objective, s'efforce de justifier, par la théorie de la connaissance, cette expérience mystique solitaire. Il part, au contraire, du principe que, par-delà les limites de la connaissance définies par Kant, tout ce qui est nécessaire à « l'explication du monde » est accessible à la pensée humaine, car il est convaincu que la pensée est, sous la forme des idées, l'essence du monde. La connaissance de soi permet de « pénétrer progressivement les fondements de l'univers » . Le spirituel s'incarne dans l' « organisme universel » ; sa manifestation la plus haute et la plus achevée est la pensée humaine car l'homme exprime le contenu de la pensée, c'est-à-dire les idées éternelles. La « perception intellectuelle » permet à l'homme de faire l'expérience directe des idées et de fusionner ainsi (à nouveau) de manière altruiste avec les fondements de l'univers. La théorie de la connaissance du jeune Steiner est donc, à la fois, une ontologie et une cosmogonie - un retour à la doctrine pré-moderne, à la fois naïve et réaliste, du réalisme des Universaux : elle a pour but de montrer à l'homme sa mission et sa place dans le monde par le biais de la réflexion sur soi et doit lui permettre de « conquérir par le travail de la pensée ce que l'on obtenait naguère par la foi en la révélation : la satisfaction de l'esprit » .

Le désir de réhabiliter une vision du monde objective et idéaliste explique aussi l'intérêt de Steiner pour les recherches de Goethe sur la nature : contrairement aux sciences naturelles expérimentales, basées sur l'analyse de causalité, Goethe était, dans sa morphologie idéaliste, à la recherche de l'unité universelle de la nature ; il découvre dans ses phénomènes primitifs ou dans les archétypes du règne végétal et animal, les manifestations graduelles du spirituel qui est susceptible de s'exprimer consciemment dans le microcosme que constitue l'homme.

Ce « gœthéanisme » métaphysique, avec son anthropomorphisme implicite, est la 1^{re} réponse de Steiner à la question Romantique fondamentale qu'il se posait : comment est-il possible de transcender intellectuellement l'intellect afin d'exprimer l'invisible dimension spirituelle ? Comme les 1^{ers} Romantiques, Steiner cherche dans sa critique de la modernité, à réconcilier la science, la religion et l'art, c'est-à-dire à re-mythifier la culture en faisant accéder la pensée à l'expérience intuitive du « savoir originel » . Sa 2^e réponse, qui est moins philosophique et systématique que théosophique et ésotérique, est « la science spirituelle anthroposophique » sur laquelle repose aussi pour l'essentiel son anthropologie pédagogique.

L' « anthroposophie »

Steiner considère l'anthroposophie comme une forme plus large de la connaissance scientifique, qui mène du « spirituel en l'homme jusqu'au spirituel dans l'univers » , comme une forme de mystique rationalisée. À la connaissance scientifique normale du monde physique, elle ajoute celle d'un monde spirituel immatériel, de prime abord, invisible. L'hypothèse fondamentale de Steiner est « que, derrière le monde visible, existe un monde invisible qui est tout d'abord caché aux sens, ainsi qu'à la pensée liée à ces sens » , et « qu'il est possible à l'homme de pénétrer dans ce monde caché s'il développe certaines facultés qui sommeillent en lui » .

La seconde hypothèse est que tout un chacun peut, en entraînant son « organe de la connaissance » à la méditation, acquérir les facultés lui permettant d'accéder aux mondes supérieurs : « l'être humain s'élève à la connaissance des mondes supérieurs lorsqu'en dehors du sommeil et de la veille, il accède à un 3^e état de conscience » (7) où toutes les impressions sensorielles sont éliminées alors même qu'il conserve toute sa conscience. Au cours de son apprentissage, l'élève spirituel abandonne la forme conceptuelle figée de la pensée ordinaire et franchit les phases imaginative et inspirée pour atteindre le stade intuitif de la « vision claire et exacte » . Une fois devenue une enveloppe vide, l'âme se répand dans l'univers tout entier, ne fait plus qu'un avec lui, sans pour autant perdre sa propre individualité.

L' « organe de la connaissance » est alors ouvert à l'expérience de la « logique vivante » du monde spirituel et de son ordre cosmique. Les lois fondamentales de ce monde spirituel occulte sont les processus de la ré-incarnation, du karma et la corrélation entre le macrocosme et le microcosme. D'après Steiner, le fonctionnement de ces lois explique pleinement l'évolution de l'univers et le cours de la vie de chacun. Pour lui et pour ses adeptes, l'univers et l'homme ont une seule et même origine Ire spirituelle ; par le biais de l'incarnation en 7 âges planétaires ou de la ré-incarnation en d'innombrables vies, le monde et l'homme s'élèvent de nouveau jusqu'au spirituel. La cosmogonie de Steiner a la forme fondamentale du mythe gnostique : chute hors de l'esprit universel et asservissement à la matière, élévation de l'âme et du monde jusqu'à l'auto-rédemption dans une nouvelle fusion avec la source divine et spirituelle qu'ils portent l'un et l'autre en eux.

L'homme moderne vit au 4e stade planétaire de développement de la terre, caractérisé par l'expérience de l'individuation et de la re-spiritualisation. Il est utile, à ce stade, de croire en Jésus-Christ, que Steiner ne considère pas d'abord comme un personnage historique mais comme un « être solaire » cosmique qui, en tant que ré-incarnation conjointe de l'esprit de Bouddha et de Zarathoustra, en représente la sagesse religieuse. Avec sa mort sacrificielle, ces « forces » se sont répandues dans le monde ; depuis, elles aident l'homme à retrouver, au sein d'une civilisation matérialiste séculière, le chemin du monde de l'esprit.

Il existe donc en chaque homme un noyau spirituel qui descend des mondes spirituels avant la naissance pour s'unir à son « enveloppe » physique et psychique ; il s'en sépare à nouveau au moment de la mort pour se ré-incarner dans une autre vie terrestre. Lors de sa ré-incarnation suivante, et du fait de son karma, c'est-à-dire l'enchaînement des vies successives, l'âme fait l'expérience de la récompense ou de la punition pour les pensées et les actes de la vie antérieure, tout comme dans la doctrine bouddhiste de la sagesse.

Dans l'anthroposophie de Steiner, la loi de la ré-incarnation entraîne une compréhension radicalement différente de la mort et de la naissance et de l'expérience historique et sociale. Chez le nouveau-né, nous rencontrons, en tant que parents, un être primitif et unique doté de dispositions innées encore inconnues, qu'il n'est pas encore capable de manifester sous sa nouvelle forme physique. L'éducation devient un moyen d'aider à l'incarnation, de soutenir et d'harmoniser la croissance de l'être spirituel pour qu'il prenne sa forme physique qui est génétiquement et spirituellement déterminée et qui porte, dès avant, la naissance l'empreinte du karma. Là où l'on parlait jusqu'alors de « hasard » pour expliquer les événements de la vie, existe en réalité un réseau de « dettes » non acquittées et de relations remontant à des existences antérieures.

La 2e loi du monde spirituel est l'analogie microcosmique : l'homme est le monde à échelle réduite, un microcosme ; et le monde est l'homme à grande échelle, le « macroanthrope ». La hiérarchie des divisions de la nature (règne minéral ; règne végétal ; règne animal ; et espèce humaine) représente un ordre ascendant vers la spiritualité ; l'être humain, qui est le couronnement de la création, réunit en soi les 4 formes d'existence ou « forces cosmiques actives ». De la doctrine de l'être découle également une doctrine de l'évolution (ou, plus exactement, de l'émanation) : animaux, plantes, minéraux se sont progressivement séparés de l'être humain avec lequel ils ne faisaient qu'un ; ils lui demeurent cependant étroitement apparentés. Le monde minéral est, pour ainsi dire, la partie solide de l'homme qui est restée au stade saturnien de développement de la terre ; les plantes proviennent de la partie végétative éthérique de l'homme, qui est restée au stade solaire, et les animaux enfin du corps humain du stade lunaire, déjà doté d'une âme animale, mais qui n'est pas parvenu à aller plus loin dans le processus d'incarnation de l'esprit.

Ces différents règnes de la nature, qui ont été éliminés du processus d'évolution de l'homme, se retrouvent aujourd'hui face à lui - non pas comme des éléments étrangers, mais comme des êtres étroitement apparentés. La médecine homéopathique et la thérapeutique naturelle de Steiner, ainsi que l'enseignement scientifique et écologique des écoles Steiner, se fondent sur cette doctrine primitive, pré-moderne, de l'unité du Cosmos. Dans l'optique anthroposophique, la nature de l'homme est présentée comme la combinaison génétique de 4 sortes de forces ou éléments cosmiques : le « corps physique », seul visible, soumis aux lois mécaniques du règne minéral ; deuxièmement, le corps « surnaturel » ou corps de vie, caché, dans lequel opèrent les forces de la croissance et de la reproduction, comme dans le règne végétal ; troisièmement, le corps « astral » occulte, ou corps sensible, qui recèle les forces animales que sont les pulsions, les désirs, et les passions ; et quatrièmement, le corps humain individuel qui se ré-incarne, et qui ennoblit et purifie les 3 autres éléments.

Pour l'anthroposophie, considérer ces 4 « corps », entités ou champs de force permet essentiellement de comprendre l'homme et l'univers ; de nombreux phénomènes sont attribués à l'action du chiffre « 4 ». Par exemple : les 4 éléments, les 4 saisons, les 4 tempéraments, les 4 stades de la connaissance, etc. ; ce qui les explique, en apparence. Dans ses ouvrages ultérieurs, Steiner ajoute à cela une structure tripartite de la nature humaine fondée sur l'ancienne triade spirituelle : pensée, sentiment, volonté.

Revenons un instant en arrière : la pensée Romantique de Steiner qui a commencé, en tant que théorie de la connaissance faisant référence à Johann Gottlieb Fichte et Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling, par une auto-intuition intellectuelle de la pensée, a abouti à une conception anthroposophique occulte du monde assorti d'une nouvelle mythologie. De la réflexion sur la pensée, on passe à l'hétéronomie d'une unité magico-mythique du monde dans laquelle le corps humain devient un élément du processus de salut.

Le paradoxe de l'anthroposophie est de déclarer comme scientifique ce qui n'est en vérité qu'un mythe de 2e ordre. Présence universelle du spirituel, symbolique des chiffres, magie de l'analogie, la « logique vivante des images » de Steiner est une tentative de réhabilitation de la pensée mythique et de la vie rituelle dans une civilisation dominée par la science.

Un bilan contradictoire

Le débat auquel donne lieu la pédagogie de Rudolf Steiner dans les milieux spécialisés a, encore aujourd'hui, ceci de paradoxal que cette pédagogie est acceptée dans la pratique et méconnue sur le plan théorique. Alors que, jusqu'aux années 1980, les spécialistes de l'éducation ont, à de rares exceptions près, négligé l'œuvre pédagogique de Steiner et de ses disciples, en Allemagne par exemple, d'éminents spécialistes des programmes et praticiens de l'éducation nouvelle avaient, dès les années 1920, constaté en visitant la Ire « Libre école Waldorf » (à Stuttgart) que l'établissement, créé par Steiner, était animé par le même esprit réformiste. La Ligue mondiale pour l'éducation nouvelle, fondée en 1921, n'a toutefois admis les écoles Rudolf Steiner comme membres de sa Section germanophone qu'en 1970, les tirant ainsi de 50 ans de « splendide isolement ». Entre-temps, elles sont, parmi les écoles du Mouvement de l'éducation nouvelle en Allemagne, de plus en plus nettement apparues comme la véritable alternative aux établissements publics et confessionnels. Compte tenu de cette évolution, les milieux allemands de l'enseignement se sont, depuis 10 ans environ, lancés dans une étude et une discussion approfondies de la pédagogie de Steiner.

Les positions sur le sujet sont extrêmement contrastées, allant de l'approbation enthousiaste jusqu'à la critique impitoyable. Les uns soulignent la pratique positive d'une éducation « complète » adaptée à l'enfant et passent sous silence l'anthropologie métaphysique de Steiner. Les autres critiquent justement, sans merci, cette néo-mythologie occulte de l'éducation et mettent en garde contre les risques d'endoctrinement qui en découlent (« école où est enseignée une conception du monde »), leur insistance sur ce point les empêchant de juger impartialement les multiples facettes de la pratique steinerienne. La position des critiques idéologiques est encore confortée par l'assertion des pédagogues anthroposophes selon laquelle toutes les normes et toutes les formes de leur pratique éducative procèdent de l'anthropologie « cosmique » du Maître.

Est-il possible de résoudre ce paradoxe fondamental de la pédagogie de Steiner : la création d'une pratique fructueuse sur la base d'une théorie douteuse ? Nous estimons, quant à nous, qu'il ne faut pas chercher le fondement systématique de la pratique éducative étonnamment stimulante et efficace des écoles Steiner dans les « vérités » simples de la doctrine anthroposophique, mais dans la diversité des points de vue, métaphores et maximes pédagogiques sur lesquels elle s'appuie. La pédagogie de Steiner demeure fidèle aux principes de bon sens qui fondent la pédagogie moderne depuis Comenius et Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi : premièrement, le concept d'enseignement et d'apprentissage génétiques ; progressivité de la formation en fonction du développement des capacités et des connaissances culturelles de l'enfant ; deuxièmement, le postulat de l'offre d'une formation « complète » (faisant appel à la tête, au cœur et à la main) ; troisièmement, le principe de l'apprentissage et de l'activité communautaires grâce, par exemple, au maintien, pendant toute la scolarité de classes homogènes quant à l'âge mais hétérogènes quant au niveau et à l'organisation d'une vie scolaire aux aspects multiples.

C'est sur cet ensemble de dogmes pédagogiques classiques que repose le consensus fondamental entre les enseignants, éducateurs et parents associés à la pratique éducative des établissements Rudolf Steiner. Contrairement aux autres pédagogues du Mouvement de l'éducation nouvelle (Montessori, Neill, Geheeb, etc.), dont le dogmatisme est moins affirmé, les pédagogues des écoles et jardins d'enfants Rudolf Steiner manifestent une indiscutable volonté d'orthodoxie, de prosélytisme, d'orgueil ou d'isolement sectaires, ce qui rend d'autant plus remarquable le dialogue que d'éminents disciples de Steiner ont noué en Allemagne avec des spécialistes de l'éducation ; à cette occasion, ils ont pu comparer leur conception anthropologique de la pédagogie, et les formes d'enseignement qui en découlent, avec les concepts et les modèles des sciences humaines ainsi que les critères de recherche.

Compte tenu de la propagation de la pédagogie de Steiner dans le monde entier, même hors de la sphère culturelle européenne, et du dialogue tout juste entamé avec les spécialistes de l'éducation, il sera peut-être possible d'en adopter et d'en développer les éléments sous de nouvelles formes moins empreintes du culte de la personnalité. Enfin, la pratique de cet enseignement, avec son large éventail de possibilités d'apprentissage dans le domaine des arts, des travaux manuels, des soins à apporter à la nature et les nombreuses occasions de participer à des tâches communautaires, est beaucoup trop importante pour qu'on se contente de la laisser aux inconditionnels de Rudolf

Steiner.

...

La destinée plaça sur le chemin de Rudolf Steiner un homme qui eut une influence sans égale sur sa formation : Karl Julius Schröer, le germaniste (fils de Tobias Gottfried Schröer, qui dirigeait à Presbourg un lycée allemand et écrivait des drames et de livres d'Histoire et d'Esthétique) qui enseignait à cette époque la littérature allemande à l'école supérieure d'enseignement technique (de l'Université de Vienne) . L'Histoire de la poésie allemande, de Gervinus, exerça sur lui une forte influence. Son cours, la Ire année, avait pour objet : « La littérature allemande depuis Gœthe » et « La vie et les œuvres de Schiller » .

Dès sa Ire conférence, je fus fasciné. La chaleur de son comportement, son enthousiasme lorsque, du haut de la chaire, il récitait les poèmes, nous faisaient pénétrer véritablement l'essence même de la poésie. C'est à 19 ans seulement que Rudolf Steiner découvrit le « Faust » de Gœthe pour lequel il se passionna. Après quelques-unes de ses conférences, j'eus l'occasion de faire plus intimement la connaissance de Karl Julius Schröer. Il m'invitait souvent chez lui, me parlait de ses cours, répondait volontiers à mes questions, et me confiait les livres de sa bibliothèque que je devais lire. Au cours de ces rencontres, nous parlions aussi un peu de la seconde partie du « Faust » dont il était en train de préparer une édition assortie de ses commentaires. C'est donc à cette époque que je lus la seconde partie du « Faust » . Les heures passées à la bibliothèque, je les consacrais à l'étude de la Métaphysique de Herbart, ainsi qu'à l'Esthétique ou science de la forme de Zimmermann. À cela s'ajoutait la Morphologie générale de Ernest Hæckel.

Rudolf Steiner écrivait le 13 janvier 1881 à un ami :

« Je dois à Dieu et à un heureux destin d'avoir rencontré ici, à Vienne, un homme que j'estime, admire et respecte tant comme professeur, savant, poète, que comme homme. Il s'agit de Karl Julius Schröer. »

Les efforts de Schröer tendaient principalement à détruire le jugement erroné enraciné dans les cercles littéraires de l'époque, selon lequel la 2e partie du « Faust » était œuvre de l'esprit défaillant d'un Gœthe sénile. On peut dire que ses efforts furent, jusqu'à un certain point, récompensés. Une autre de ses occupations consistait à sauvegarder les mystères de Noël du Haut-Rhin dont il publia un recueil sous le titre : « Jeux de Noël allemands joués en Hongrie » . Ces jeux populaires faisaient revivre les récits du Paradis de la Nativité du Christ et de l'Apparition des 3 Rois mages. Ces mystères étaient joués chaque année par les paysans allemands émigrés en Hongrie et installés dans les environs de Presbourg. Plus tard, Rudolf Steiner ressuscita ces jeux en les représentant chaque année au « Gœtheum » . Schröer voyagea pour étudier les dialectes allemands. Chaque fois qu'il trouvait des traces du folklore allemand dans les régions slaves, magyares et italiennes de la Monarchie danubienne, il s'efforçait d'en connaître le caractère spécifique. C'est ainsi que naquirent ses dictionnaires de grammaire du dialecte de Zip répandu au sud des Carpathes, de celui de Gottschee parlé par une petite partie de la population allemande dans le Krain et du dialecte des Heanzen, encore en usage à l'époque de Steiner dans l'ouest de la Hongrie. (Ils sont encore actuellement présentés chaque année au « Gœtheum » , à Dornach, et sont au nombre de 3 : le jeu d'Adam et d'Eve ; le jeu des Bergers et de la Nativité ; le jeu des Rois mages et d'Hérode.

Le thème de base de la vie de Schröer demeurait Goethe. Lorsque je me trouvais à ses côtés, je me réchauffais spirituellement. Il m'autorisait à passer des heures en tête à tête avec lui et j'avais alors l'impression qu'un 3e être se joignait à nous : l'esprit de Goethe. Schröer vivait, en effet, si pleinement dans l'esprit et dans l'œuvre de Goethe, qu'à chaque sentiment, à chaque idée qui naissait en son âme, on se disait instinctivement : Goethe n'aurait-il pas ressenti ceci, n'aurait-il pas pensé cela de la même façon ? Cet abandon de l'homme à la spiritualité de Goethe se transmet du Maître à l'élève. Goethe fut, pour chacun d'eux, l'étoile qui les guida sur le chemin de la connaissance, mais ce fut pour l'un et l'autre, d'une façon tout à fait différente.

Il y avait, à Vienne, une jeune poétesse, Marie Eugénie Delle Grazie. À 16 ans déjà, elle avait fait parler d'elle en publiant non seulement des poèmes, mais aussi une épopée, « Herman » ; un drame, « Saül » ; et une nouvelle intitulée « la Bohémienne » . Robert Zimmermann, esthète et philosophe éminent, a déclaré à son sujet :

« Elle est le seul véritable génie qu'il m'ait été donné de rencontrer. »

À peine Steiner eut-il lu un recueil des poèmes de Delle Grazie, qu'il rédigea un article qui lui valut la joie de la rencontrer une 1re fois. Elle habitait la maison de Laurenz Müllner, prêtre catholique et professeur de théologie (1848-1911) qui, en 1894, fut nommé Recteur de l'Université de Vienne. Il était son professeur et son plus fidèle ami.

« Le développement ascétique de son âme avait imprégné non seulement son visage, mais encore tout son être, il possédait par ailleurs une vaste culture philosophique, artistique et littéraire. »

Ils formaient, à eux deux, le centre spirituel le plus puissant de Vienne. Chaque semaine, un cercle composé des personnalités les plus éminentes, parmi lesquelles on comptait des artistes et des savants, se réunissait chez eux. L'atmosphère de ces réunions faisait grande impression sur le sensible Steiner. Elles l'attiraient comme un aimant, tout en le repoussant immédiatement.

Des personnalités aux opinions les plus diverses se rencontraient chez Delle Grazie. La poétesse était le centre du cercle. Elle lisait ses poèmes ; son visage mobile exprimait tout ce qu'elle ressentait en dévoilant sa conception de l'univers. Elle projetait ses idées sur l'existence et celles-ci n'étaient certes pas très lumineuses, mais plutôt sombres, rappelant un paysage lunaire, un ciel orageux qui faisait écran à la clarté du soleil. Des demeures des hommes s'élançaient dans l'obscurité, les grandes femmes porteuses des passions et des rêves où se consomment les humains. Les images au travers desquelles elle nous parlait étaient profondément humaines et extrêmement attachantes, saisissantes, même ; ce qu'elles contenaient d'amertume et de tristesse était comme voilé par le charme généreux d'une personnalité tout entière spiritualisée.

Au cours des années où Rudolf Steiner, introduit par le protestant Schröer dans la vie et le monde spirituel de Goethe, découvrait son propre « gœthéanisme » , il se trouvait également en présence, dans la maison de Müllner, d'un catholicisme cultivé dont la conséquence était une grande aversion pour Goethe. Au contraire, ils étaient fortement attirés par les romans de Dostoïevsky dont ils appréciaient les descriptions géniales de la souffrance et des passions humaines. Dans les drames de Shakespeare, les personnifications réalistes des meurtriers et les égarements de leur faible nature humaine, éveillaient un intérêt intense. Cependant, Delle Grazie et Müllner reniaient tous deux violemment Goethe. L'antipathie de Laurenz Müllner pour Goethe portait l'empreinte du théologien catholique. Chez Delle Grazie, il s'agissait plutôt d'une profonde antipathie personnelle. Dans sa maison, le pessimisme se manifestait avec une violence extraordinaire, en faisant par là-même le centre de l'anti-goethéanisme.

Il est très significatif que pour son développement, son évolution, Steiner ait accepté de faire l'expérience de cette opposition des atmosphères spirituelles de Schröer et du cercle de Delle Grazie. Schröer lui-même vint dans ce cercle le 1er soir ; ce fut la 1re et la dernière fois. Steiner en demeura l'hôte permanent aussi longtemps qu'il le put. Le fait que le cercle refusait Goethe ne le dérangeait point. Car, l'une des maximes qui l'accompagna toute sa vie fut de ne jamais traiter un sujet, sans s'être auparavant familiarisé avec le sujet contraire, ni de juger un esprit sans connaître à fond les adversaires de celui-ci. C'est pourquoi, longtemps après, il put dire à propos du cercle de Delle Grazie :

« Je leur dois plus que je ne saurais le dire. »

Nous touchons ici l'un des traits essentiels de l'être de Rudolf Steiner qui, souvent, lui valut d'être méconnu : l'intérêt inhabituel pour le « tout autre » dans les âmes de ses contemporains. Rudolf Steiner n'a trouvé que peu de compréhension parmi ses professeurs et ses amis d'enfance pour ses propres problèmes spirituels, mais lui-même était toujours prêt à écouter et à comprendre leurs problèmes. Cette attitude l'amena tout naturellement à une sorte de double vie spirituelle. Mon âme luttait à cette époque contre l'énigme de la connaissance, et cette lutte, tout en éveillant parmi mes amis un grand intérêt, ne provoquait chez eux aucune participation active. Je demeurais donc assez seul face à cette énigme. Cependant, je vivais pleinement ce qu'éprouvaient mes amis et cherchais à comprendre leurs problèmes. C'est ainsi que 2 courants opposés vivaient en moi. Je suivais l'un en solitaire, et l'autre dans la compagnie vivante d'hommes aimables. Rudolf Steiner souffrit de l'opposition de ces 2 cercles auxquels il se savait profondément lié : ma vie sentimentale partagée entre ces 2 sphères, pour lesquelles mon affection et ma vénération étaient égales, fut comme déchirée.

C'est sous le même jour qu'il faut voir ses rapports avec son très éminent et respecté professeur Schröer. Ce dernier lui avait pour ainsi dire ouvert la porte de l'œuvre de Goethe. J'accueillais avec la plus grande sympathie tout ce qui venait de Schröer. Même alors, je ne pus faire autrement que de construire, dans ma propre âme, dans une totale indépendance, même vis-à-vis de lui, ce qui était le but de ma recherche intérieure. Schröer était un idéaliste. Le monde des idées s'identifiait pour lui avec la force créatrice qui se manifeste dans la nature et dans l'homme. Pour moi, l'Idée n'était que l'ombre du monde vivant de l'esprit. Ces quelques mots que l'on trouve dans l'autobiographie de Rudolf Steiner, expriment l'abîme qui le séparait de Schröer et de tous les autres hommes.

L'une des silhouettes les plus intéressantes du riche cercle spirituel qui entourait les Delle Grazie-Müllner, était Wilhelm Neumann, prêtre cistercien de l'Ordre de la Sainte-Croix, dont le nom était connu tant dans le monde des savants que dans celui des ecclésiastiques. Rudolf Steiner aimait tout particulièrement à s'entretenir avec lui lorsqu'ils revenaient ensemble des soirées de Delle Grazie. J'aimerais mentionner ici 2 de ces conversations. L'une se rapportait à l'entité du Christ. J'exprimai mon opinion, selon laquelle Jésus de Nazareth avait, grâce à une influence extérieure, accueilli en lui le Christ et que depuis le mystère du Golgotha, le Christ vit comme entité spirituelle, et comme telle, participe à l'évolution de l'humanité. Cette conversation est restée profondément gravée dans mon âme et elle me revenait souvent en mémoire, car elle fut extrêmement importante. 3 interlocuteurs étaient en quelque sorte, en présence : le Professeur Neumann et moi, plus un être invisible, personnification de la dogmatique catholique, qui se tenait menaçante et visible aux yeux de l'esprit, derrière le Professeur Neumann. D'une tape sur l'épaule, elle le remettait dans le droit chemin, quand la logique subtile du savant me faisait trop de concessions. Il était très curieux d'entendre celui-ci émettre des conclusions contraires à ce que ses prémices faisaient prévoir. Cet homme, à cette époque, était l'un des plus représentatifs de la vie catholique, que j'ai appris à connaître, par l'observation d'abord, mais également et de façon réelle et profonde, grâce à lui.

Quant à l'autre entretien, il fut consacré aux vies terrestres successives. Le Professeur m'écouta, puis parla de toute la littérature qui traitait du même sujet ; souvent, il secouait doucement la tête, sans manifester l'intention de discuter d'un thème aussi singulier. Malgré cela, cet entretien est également demeuré dans ma mémoire. Le malaise qu'avait éprouvé Neumann à formuler intérieurement et sans les exprimer, des objections contre ce que j'avais, est resté profondément gravé en moi. Il n'est pas surprenant que, 40 ans plus tard, Steiner se souvienne si exactement de ces 2 conversations avec Wilhelm Neumann. Il s'agissait, en effet, des 2 thèmes, des 2 points culminants de la future « anthroposophie » qu'il allait enseigner : la christologie et la ré-incarnation. Rudolf Steiner, âgé alors de 24 ans, voyait ces 2 thèmes simultanément confrontés, grâce à la présence de Neumann, avec les enseignements de l'Église que lui-même avait reçus, et ressentait fortement la « gêne » que ses idées faisaient surgir chez les représentants de la théologie romaine. C'est la raison pour laquelle il y reconnut le prélude à toutes les expériences qu'il devait plus tard affronter.

À ces réunions chez la poétesse assistaient occasionnellement le philosophe Adolf Stöhr, la romancière Goswine von Berlepsch, Émile Mataja (qui écrivait sous le pseudonyme d'Emil Marriot) , le poète et écrivain Fritz Lemmermayer, avec qui Rudolf Steiner devait établir une amitié durable : lorsqu'il parlait de sujets qui l'intéressaient, il s'exprimait avec une dignité mesurée. Extérieurement, il ressemblait à la fois au pianiste Anton Rubinstein et à l'acteur Josef Lewinsky. Son admiration pour Hebbel était sans limites. Ses opinions sur l'art et sur la vie résultaient d'un sentiment intérieur profond et sage, et il ne manquait pas de les affirmer avec conviction. Il était l'auteur d'un roman intéressant et subtil : « L'alchimiste » - ainsi que d'autres ouvrages remarquables. Il possédait l'art de mettre en valeur les plus petits faits de la vie. Je me souviens du jour où, avec quelques amis, j'étais allé le voir dans sa petite chambre donnant sur une ruelle de Vienne. Il venait de préparer lui-même son repas, composé de pain et de 2 œufs à la coque cuits sur un réchaud. Pendant que bouillait l'eau, il annonça avec enthousiasme :

« Ce sera un repas délicieux ! »

Était aussi présent Alfred Stroß, ce compositeur génial, était un grand pessimiste. Lorsque, chez Delle Grazie, il se mettait au piano pour nous jouer ses œuvres, nous avions le sentiment d'une musique proche d'Anton Bruckner mais s'évaporant, s'efforçant de fuir l'existence terrestre. Stroß était peu compris ; Fritz Lemmermayer l'aimait beaucoup. Tous deux, Lemmermayer et Stroß, étaient liés d'amitié avec Robert Hamerling. Je leur dois d'avoir eu un échange de correspondance avec ce dernier. Stroß tomba gravement malade et mourut frappé d'aliénation mentale. Le sculpteur

Hans Branstetter se rendait aussi chez Delle Grazie.

Les cafés viennois avaient alors une renommée mondiale. C'est là que se réunissait la majorité des intellectuels de la monarchie austro-hongroise. On y prenait des décisions politiques, on y écrivait des poèmes et des romans, et ce qui était plus important, on « s'y rencontrait » sans contrainte, comme par hasard, sachant cependant où, quand et qui on pouvait y trouver. Bien souvent me reviennent les conversations interminables que nous eûmes alors dans un café renommé de la place Saint-Michel, à Vienne. C'était le café « Griensteidl », où il recevait son courrier. Les gens que Rudolf Steiner fréquenta à Vienne et dont les noms, à l'époque, étaient connus, même hors de la capitale autrichienne, sont aujourd'hui oubliés. Un des plus jeune de ce groupe était Joseph Kitir, qui cultivait un genre lyrique inspiré par Martin Greif. C'était une nature naïve. Pendant une courte période, il fut étroitement lié à Rudolf Steiner. C'est tout juste si l'on se souvient encore du poète Fercher von Steinwand, idéaliste plein de sensibilité et d'idées. Fils de pauvres gens, il avait connu dans sa jeunesse de grandes privations. L'éminent anatomiste Joseph Hyrtl sut l'apprécier et faire en sorte qu'il put se consacrer à sa poésie, sa pensée et sa réflexion. Robert Hamerling l'avait apprécié dès son 1er ouvrage poétique, « Comtesse Seelenbrand ». Grande fut ma joie le jour où il apporta ses « essais cosmiques ». Il s'agissait du « Chœur des impulsions originelles », et du « Chœur des rêves originels » ; poèmes enthousiastes exprimant des sensations qui semblent émaner des puissances créatrices de l'univers. Je considère comme une des choses les plus importantes de ma jeunesse le fait d'avoir pu connaître Fercher von Steinwand. Cette personnalité agissait comme celle d'un sage dont la sagesse rayonne à travers la poésie pure.

À l'époque où j'acquis de plus en plus de notions concrètes sur les incarnations successives, je fis la connaissance du mouvement théosophique dirigé par Madame Helena Petrovna Blavatsky. Un ami me procura « Le Bouddhisme ésotérique » de Alfred Percy Sinnett. C'est le 1er livre théosophique que j'eus entre les mains ; il ne me fit aucune impression. J'étais heureux de ne pas l'avoir lu avant d'avoir acquis par moi-même certaines vérités. Son contenu me rebutait ; mon aversion contre cette manière de présenter le supra-sensible m'aurait sans doute empêché de m'engager plus avant sur la voie qui m'était pourtant tracée.

L'année 1888, parut l'épopée satirique « Homunculus », de Robert Hamerling. Elle offrait à la société de l'époque un miroir qui grossissait d'une façon caricaturale son matérialisme et son penchant pour le côté frivole de la vie. Hamerling voulait stigmatiser la double déformation de la civilisation moderne : d'une part, un manque de sensibilité pour le spirituel, le monde étant considéré comme un mécanisme et la vie organisée comme une machine ; d'autre part, une fantaisie privée d'âme, ne cherchant pas à établir de rapport véridique entre cette fiction de vie spirituelle et la réalité. Le côté grotesque des images peintes par Hamerling lui fit perdre un grand nombre de ses anciens admirateurs. Cet « Homunculus » me fit une impression très profonde. Il me semblait mettre en évidence les forces qui, dans la civilisation moderne, obscurcissent l'esprit. J'y trouvai un sérieux avertissement à l'adresse de notre temps.

Cette année là, aussi, Rudolf Steiner fut introduit dans la famille du pasteur Alfred Formey. Une fois par semaine, des artistes et écrivains se réunissaient chez lui. Lui-même était poète. Son grand ami Fritz Lemmermayer l'avait caractérisé en ces termes :

« Plein de bonté, avec une sensibilité profonde pour la nature, quelque peu exalté, pour ainsi dire ivre de croyance divine et de béatitude ; il semble vivre et rêver dans les nuées. »

La veuve de Friedrich Hebbel y venait de temps à autre. Quand Christine Hebbel racontait des histoires, une chaleur d'âme envahissait tous ces auditeurs. L'actrice Wilborn venait aussi chez les Formey. Ce cercle qui s'était constitué autour de Formey avait pris l'habitude de se réunir également chez Madame Wilborn. Mais quelle différence ! L'ouverture sur le monde, la joie de vivre et le besoin d'humour régnaient ici et contaminaient aussi ceux qui, chez le pasteur, demeuraient toujours graves et sans réaction, même quand le poète populaire viennois Friedrich Schlögl faisait le récit de ses histoires drôles. Chez Wilborn, on riait à gorge déployée. Chez Wilborn, Formey était un homme du monde. Chez Formey, Wilborn ressemblait à une abbesse. On pouvait faire des études intéressantes sur la manière dont ces gens se transformaient, jusque dans l'expression de leur visage.

Lorsque Steiner évoquait, plus tard, ce foisonnement d'idées et de physionomies originales, des noms se pressaient sans fin sous sa plume ou sur ses lèvres. Aujourd'hui, les 9/10 sont tombés dans l'oubli. Ils n'en ont pas moins composé ce miroir du monde où pouvaient se lire déjà maints signes précurseurs de l'histoire qui s'est inscrite depuis dans la réalité. Quelques-uns de ces noms sont pourtant, aujourd'hui encore, évocateurs de toute l'époque. Par exemple, celui de Victor Adler, le chef du Socialisme autrichien, personnalité ardente et volontaire qui, de sa table, lançait des théories que Steiner, d'ailleurs, « écoutait avec peine ». Comment eut-il admis, en effet, l'image d'une société qui concentrait tout le pouvoir dans une dictature économique, et pour qui la vie spirituelle ne serait qu'une survivance du passé, une super-structure accessoire ? Il fit également la connaissance de Engelbert Pernenstorfer qui voulait quitter le Parti national pour rejoindre les Socialistes. C'était une personnalité forte au savoir étendu et un critique éclairé des misères de la vie publique. Je fus amené par eux à étudier Karl Marx, Friedrich Engels, Rodbertus et d'autres écrivains d'économie sociale. Je ne pouvais adhérer à leurs doctrines. Il m'était personnellement douloureux d'entendre dire que seules les forces matérielles et économiques assurent le développement de l'histoire de l'humanité, et que l'esprit n'est qu'une superposition idéelle à ce monde « véritablement réel ». Pour moi, les affirmations des théoriciens socialistes résultaient de ce qu'ils fermaient les yeux devant la vraie réalité. Je me rendais compte pourtant que la « question sociale » avait une importance illimitée.

Un peu plus loin se discutaient avec ardeur les curieux phénomènes dont Sigmund Freud, le contemporain de Steiner, allait déduire sa psychanalyse. Steiner n'a pas personnellement connu Freud et il a même fait, plus tard, une critique pénétrante de ses théories. Mais il a participé à la vie très animée des cercles médicaux, il a connu et estimé le médecin qui a le plus influencé les origines du freudisme : le docteur Josef Breuer. Chacun de ces germes nouveaux apportait avec lui un progrès dans le matérialisme, un recul des traditions idéalistes dont avaient été imbus jusqu'alors les milieux viennois. Dans les salons où, il n'y a pas longtemps encore, dominait le charme léger et sentimental d'une mélodie de Franz Schubert, d'un poème de Eduard Mörike, la sécheresse du matérialisme commence, en cette fin de siècle, à opérer ses ravages, à préparer des effondrements. Cette sécheresse est un poison pour l'âme autrichienne ; elle l'atteint dans sa sensibilité déjà nostalgique et y introduit le désenchantement, le doute. Elle gagne les sciences exactes et jusqu'à la médecine, où elle provoque le nihilisme ; elle s'attaque aux arts mêmes.

...

Rudolf Steiner greatly admired the Austrian composer Anton Bruckner, remarking that « something essentially spiritual, which is the foundation of all music, still lived in Bruckner » .

At the time of his 9th Symphony, the composer suffered from poor health and chronic nervous agitation ; after composing 3 magnificent movements, he struggled mightily but was unable to complete the 4th. Keith Francis will speak about Bruckner's achievement, his interest to anthroposophists, and the 9th Symphony. The talk will be illustrated with passages from the Symphony ; those who wish may stay to hear a complete recording of the « reconstructed » Finale.

Keith Francis majored in physics at Cambridge University, worked as an engineer at Bristol Aircraft before becoming a teacher. On the faculty of the Rudolf Steiner School in New York, for 31 years, he taught physics, chemistry, mathematics, earth science, English and music. Since retirement, he has written several novels and a history of atomic science and has founded and led the « 15th Street Singers » .

From the Life at the « Gœtheanum »

Michæl Kurtz on « Rudolf Steiner and Music » . Biographical, Humanities Research, Future Impulses, 160 black and white illustrations, 8 colour pages, published at the « Gœtheanum » , Dornach (2015) ; 608 pages. The appendix contains documents and current texts, including contributions from musicians on singing, instruments, music education and personal additions from 7 composers from different continents.

After 10 years of research, Michæl Kurtz, for the 1st time, documents a comprehensively study on the theme of : « Rudolf Steiner and Music » , and in this work, reveals a number of new sources.

A work comprised of more than 600 pages, Michæl Kurtz presents a comprehensive compendium. It contains detailed descriptions of Rudolf Steiner's musical experiences, his relationships with contemporary composers, his research into spiritual science and suggestions for the further development of music.

In Vienna, Weimar and Berlin, Rudolf Steiner met composers such as Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Richard Strauß and Hans Pfitzner, he commented on Claude Debussy and occupied himself in many regards with Richard Wagner. His commentaries on music, in the early years of modernism, were taken-up very little. But there are parallels to be found between Arnold Schœnberg, Alexander Scriabin and Charles Ives, as well as more recently between Giacinto Scelsi and Wolfgang von Schweinitz. Rudolf Steiner could see the source of the essence of music in the innermost souls of people. A new kind of music can arise-out of the souls of man, as a contribution to a future culture that humanizes people and becomes a bridge to the spiritual world, when one's inner schooling is fruitfully taken-up.

Rudolf Steiner gave suggestions for singing, for the construction of string instruments, for composing from the « melody in the single tone » and, thus, to expanding tonality. He made preparations for a singing course, a special course for trained musicians, and 5 more musical eurythmy courses (« Ton Eurythmy ») , which did not come about due to his death, in 1925.

THE LANGUAGE OF TONALITY in the music of Bach to Bruckner

Author : Hermann Beckh, original in German. Translated in English by Alan Stott. Published by Anastasi Limited (2015) .

Booklet : 123 pages, Paperback, Illustrated, 244 x 170 mm.

ISBN : 978-1-910785-03-4

Hermann BECKH (« The Language of Tonality ») :

Why are musical works named by their keys : « Mass in B minor » , « Symphony in D major » , and so on ? Can certain things be said best, or even « only » , in certain keys ? Can we hear the essence of a key ? Are « subjective » and « objective » relevant, or is there a higher synthesis ? How could the common chord express so much musical variety for over 3 Centuries and, for some decades, concentrated in one city, Vienna, in Central Europe ?

Hermann BECKH's (1875-1937) tone-zodiac (by 1922, not the 1st to be suggested) is still respected almost a Century on. With it, he explores the motivating power in our tonal system as lived - nobody's invention, so in no way a « theory » . The author (acknowledged polymath who also wrote music) played on the piano all the music mentioned in this pioneer study. In his explanation of tonality as an organizing, creative principle, Beckh cites music from Bach (effectively, the father of tonality) concluding with Wagner's music dramas. Beckh's apparently unique perspective on Wagner is one excellent reason to re-visit him, and Beckh, too, because his tone-zodiac invites access into the workshop of creation.

Beckh extends the concept of « music » and « musical » . The profession of music is not challenged, but upheld - from within. To see music as « abstract » , or deriving from sonic vibrations are both challenged. Through Beckh's holistic intuition, the reader is invited « back-stage » to research creativity itself. There is a practical path beyond the restrictions of dualism, beyond all « feel-good » factors (whether of « Mozart » , « Wagner » , or any other) in order to research « what is » .

In-depth researchers already recognize Professor Doctor Hermann Beckh as a pioneer ; musicians and music-lovers will gain innumerable enriching insights and stimuli. But even more, in telling us least about himself, and without notating a single musical example, the author is able to tell us a very great deal about the personality - of his reader.

Beckh on Beckh, and by his colleagues :

« In all other respects, I stand on the shoulders of my predecessors in scholarship, and my particular view of life I owe to Rudolf Steiner ; but in music, I feel I am really breaking ground. »

Steiner himself said of him in this respect,

« Beckh ventures into provinces which I have not yet had an opportunity of investigating myself. And there is a great deal in what Beckh says about them. »

There are not many people of whom Rudolf Steiner would have made such a remark.

(Alfred Heidenreich, 1938.)

...

It is clear that a « great » composer doesn't simply take-over where a previous « great » composer left-off. The trade has to be learnt. Franz-Josef Haydn's early compositions are musical and enjoyable but it wasn't until he reached the age of 40 that he created music worthily representative of his mature style, reaching a point where he was no longer limited by technical considerations and was free to launch-out in whatever direction he wished. It is arguable that something similar happened to Beethoven when he was in his mid-30's, and even then, the idea, which we often used to hear, that he « continued and improved the work of Haydn and Mozart » is manifest rubbish. Oddly enough, the people who expressed this opinion also regarded Beethoven as a great revolutionary, to which the only possible response is, « Huh ? » . Having adopted certain techniques of composition developed by his great predecessors, he had not only to achieve fluency in them but also to adapt them to fit his own evolving needs and intentions. The early Romantics (Felix Mendelssohn, Frédéric Chopin, Robert Schumann) did not abandon Classical techniques but developed and used them with new intentions and a new sensibility, so that the change in the flavour of the music was much more deep-seated than that which had taken place between Haydn and Beethoven. Richard Wagner's supporters claimed Beethoven's mantle for him, but, even supposing this claim to have been justified, it was a long time before he reached a level of competence at which it could be made. His early Operas are quite crude and even with « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » , products of his mid-30's, there are still plenty of bumps in the road. By the time he reached « Die Walküre » , at the age of 43, he was in the somewhat the same situation as Haydn at a similar age ; his technique and intentions might still change, but not in the sense of improvement. People who were inclined to listen to his ideology rather than his music saw him as the culminating figure in the history of music and didn't seem to worry about what comes after a culmination. Others thought that his great musical genius had been subverted by a megalomaniac tendency and an overwhelming need for self-justification, and some believed that rather than providing us with the great entrance hall into the « music of the future » , Wagner's works constituted a dead-end.

That the « dead-end » interpretation has, to a large extent, been the verdict of history doesn't mean anything bad about Wagner's music, although it does suggest that his view of the music of the past, the present and the future needs some revision. Composers who rejected Wagner, in principle, sometimes had a hard time shaking-off his influence, but they did feel that it was necessary to try. The view from a dead-end may be entrancing, but if you want to travel further you have to go back a bit before proceeding. In any case, it's clear that, even without Wagner's work, it was inevitable that, by about 1900, some composers would feel that the resources of the traditional tonal system were exhausted and that a radical change was needed. At that time, we entered a confusing period in which attempts to throw-out everything connected with traditional ideas of melody and harmony vied with efforts to maintain continuity by doing something different with old techniques. The so-called nationalist movement, involving Edward Grieg, Bedřich Smetana, Antonín Dvořák and the Russian Masters of the late- 19th Century, produced wonderful music with distinctive flavours without venturing beyond the existing system of tonality. Claude Debussy, who appears to have loved and hated Wagner's works in approximately equal measure, had struggled to rid himself of their influence and shown that there are ways of using triadic harmony other than those prescribed in the textbooks of the time. In the following generations, a more thoroughgoing exploration into national roots, most prominently by Béla Bartók and Ralph Vaughan Williams, led to genuinely new insights, modifying the use of traditional harmony without completely ousting it.

For many years, it was believed, although not by everyone, that the great breakthrough came when Arnold Schönberg got tired of writing big, and sometimes enormous, works in the late- Post-Romantic tradition and developed the 12 tone system. Some of us, finding that « Verklärte Nacht » and « Gurrelieder » strain our collective patience more than anything by Anton Bruckner or Gustav Mahler, have concluded that Schönberg stopped writing this kind of stuff because he wasn't very good at it. Schönberg's pupil, Anton Webern, however, interpreted musical history in such a way as to show that there was a stream of evolution which led inevitably to the 12 tone method of his Master. In Webern's view, Schönberg's method was the ultimate expression of the tendency for music to move-up the harmonic series until the half-step became the basic intervallic unit and the octave contained 12 tones with no class distinctions allowed. To at least one reader, Webern's book seems to be an even more advanced case of special pleading than anything by Wagner, but it does have the advantage that, like its author's music, it is very brief. Meanwhile, Igor Stravinsky was also engaged in historical self-justification, and he was, by no means, the last.

Historical research has given us a clear picture of the progressive employment of a greater and greater proportion of all the available resources of the tonal system. If it seems occasionally that the knowledge of music history built-up by generations of distinguished and devoted musicologists, many of whom have been fine musicians in their own right, contradicts Rudolf Steiner's esoterically informed view of history, it may well be because we have misunderstood or over-simplified Rudolf Steiner.

It would be natural to expect that the music produced by human beings would not be as beautiful as that produced by the Gods. When I 1st became involved in anthroposophy, I was assured that our slide into scientific materialism had produced art whose main characteristic was ugliness. Steiner referred to most of the music of the 19th Century as « un-musical » . I found this rather confusing since I had observed that a great deal of beautiful music was still being composed in the mid- 20th Century.

Tinctoris, as already noted, had found himself in a similar position 500 years previously, but he went a little further in his analysis of the situation than I did :

« I cannot pass-over in silence the opinions of many philosophers, among them Plato and Pythagoras and their successors Cicero, Macrobius, Boethius, and our Isidore, that the spheres of the stars revolve under the guidance of harmonic modulation, that is, by the consonance of various concords. But when, as Boethius relates, some declare that

Saturn moves with the deepest sound and that, as we pass by stages through the remaining planets, the moon moves with the highest, while others, conversely, ascribe the deepest sound to the moon and the highest to the sphere of the fixed stars, I put faith in neither opinion. Rather, I unshakeably credit Aristotle and his commentator, along with our more recent philosophers, who most manifestly prove that, in the heavens, there is neither actual nor potential sound. For this reason, it will never be possible to persuade me that musical concords, which cannot be produced without sound, can result from the motion of the heavenly bodies. »

« Concords of sounds and melodies, from whose sweetness, as Lactantius says, the pleasure of the ear is derived, are produced, then, not by heavenly bodies, but by earthly instruments with the co-operation of nature. »

I quote these words not with approval or disapproval but simply to illustrate the change in people's relationship to music. But although this view of music as a natural phenomenon rather than a gift from the Gods may have become the majority opinion, many people have continued to ascribe a super-natural or, at least, mysterious origin to music, right-up to the present-day.

Knowledge of Rudolf Steiner's descriptions of the evolution of consciousness does not leave us with any less work to do and allows us as many opportunities of floundering in the morass of actual historical process as someone who has never heard of Rudolf Steiner. One of the most helpful thoughts to have been recorded is the idea that music is an activity, not an organism or a gift from the Gods. It is something that people do. This may not have been true in the past, but it is true now.

Some remarks made by Rudolf Steiner on the subject of tone eurythmy :

« For in eurythmy, music is made visible ; and one must have a sense for the place in man's being where music has its true source if its fundamental nature is to be made visible. »

« Tone eurythmy makes visible what in music is invisible and audible. »

This is not what the ballet purports to do. Unlike eurythmy, the dance does not represent the music or translate what is audible into what is visible. It uses it as a suitable rhythmic, atmospheric and suggestive background for a story or a picture.

Steiner emphasized that at the time (March, 1924) when he made these remarks, tone eurythmy was in its infancy, so presumably, he was speaking of his intentions rather than of what had already been accomplished. He also said that it was inevitable that eurythmy would come into the world at this time, and the question I have asked myself is why this would happen after several Centuries in which music had become an experience complete in itself. Surely, the most wonderful thing about music is that it goes straight into the soul without verbal explanation or visual imagery. What happens, however, if it can't get in ? Can visual aid really help ?

The answer is a conditional « yes » , but 1st, it must be understood that people for whom the musical experience is so powerful that it overwhelms the other senses and is already visible to the inner-eye, not as pictures but as music, may well find tone eurythmy superfluous. Like many of my most musical acquaintances, I find that any kind of visual accompaniment, whether it is dance, colour slides, hospital procedures, antics by the musicians on stage, or tone eurythmy, simply gets in the way of the music. This is not the same thing as saying that we dislike or disapprove of the proceedings - such things can be very entertaining but we find that they simply don't take hold of the soul the way the purely musical does.

There is nothing inherently wrong with entertainment ; one of the worst sins a work of art can commit is to be dull, and I question whether any artistic performance can be entertaining if it has no deeper implications whatever. « Hamlet » , for example, is far more entertaining than « The Importance of Being Earnest » , and Oscar Wilde's light-hearted frolic is far more entertaining than the average Soap Opera. « Hamlet » , however, is not merely entertaining. It does something to the configuration of your soul. Steiner actually bewailed the fact that people frequently « found tone eurythmy more pleasing than speech eurythmy and comparatively easy to understand » . Speech eurythmy was more highly-developed and was linked to a medium (the spoken word) which demanded some attention for its understanding, whereas most people are not used to the idea of giving music that degree of attention. Tone eurythmy was experienced more as a congenial diversion ; this is very likely to be the case if your capacity to respond to music is limited. Music that can't get through to your soul is merely a pleasant undemanding background, unless the composer tries to insist, in which case, you may regard it as a thundering nuisance.

Rudolf Steiner believed that opposition to tone eurythmy signified a refusal « to allow the complete revelation of the human being » , and linked this opposition to the materialism with which, as he said, we are all infected. What makes this position problematical in relation to a great deal of the music composed in the 18th, 19th and 20th Centuries is that there was an increasingly conscious effort by composers to write music which, in itself, already gives a complete revelation of the human being. The Orchestra of the Classic-Romantic period is, as Steiner remarked, a picture of the human being. Mozart's music, in the words of Friedrich Blume, runs the whole gamut of human emotion. Haydn brought drama and humour into his music in ways for which there is no earlier parallel. In their different ways, Classical and early-Romantic composers probed the deep recesses of the human soul. Many 19th Century compositions appear to tell stories and paint pictures. Gustav Mahler believed that a Symphony could present a whole world of experience (autobiographical, religious and philosophical) and Bruno Walter believed that Anton Bruckner had found God. Rudolf Steiner made it clear that he didn't approve of representational music, but when I say that composers tried to give a complete revelation of the human being, I am not referring to representational music. The music is not there to paint pictures of primeval forests or mediæval knights, but to be taken in, experienced, savoured. It changes you when you allow it into your soul. To add any kind of visual accompaniment to Mozart's G minor Symphony, Beethoven's 7th, or Mahler's 9th, would be, at best, impertinent and at worst disastrous. Richard Wagner wanted his Operas to unite the music, the drama and the spectacle in a significant whole, so he called them « music-dramas » , echoing the early Italian Opera composers who used the term « dramma per musica » . He thought that one of the defects of earlier Operas was the domination of the music over the drama. It is clear, however, that he underestimated the power of his own music, as Herbert von Karajan tacitly acknowledged when he performed the « Ring » cycle in practically complete darkness. Tchaikovsky, having attended a performance of « Die Walküre » , in Vienna, made the point a little more forcefully :

« There is no question that Wagner is a marvelous Symphonist. You have probably heard of the renowned “ Ride of the Valkyries ” ? What a huge and wonderful panorama ! How we actually seem to see those fierce heroines soar on their magic horses through thunder and lightning ! In the concert-hall, this selection makes an extraordinary impression. On the stage, however, in view of the cardboard rocks, the canvas clouds, and the awkward soldiers running about in the back, the music loses all its expressive power. In this the stage, does not enhance the effect but acts as a wet blanket. »

Why was all this music so powerful and why is it losing its grip on the population ? It may be that, since the early-20th Century, our relationship to music has changed with our changing relationship to the spiritual world. In several lectures given in 1910, Steiner spoke about the « Kali Yuga », the period of spiritual darkness described in ancient Indian philosophy and related it to the coming of Christ :

« At the beginning of “ Kali-Yuga ”, there were still many who could either see or re-collect the divine-spiritual world but, for normal humanity, the time set-in when they could only see the physical world of nature. That was the descent of man to “ Kali-Yuga ”. It was the time of deepest descent. Into that had to come the impulse for re-ascent. That is why this impulse, the “ Christ-Impulse ”, had to come during the “ Kali-Yuga ”, in the “dark” age. »

This period is said to have lasted from 3101 B.C. until 1899 A.D. and it is clear that although the human race was under siege, the blockade was not total. Communication with the spiritual world did not cease altogether and there were still great initiates and lesser mortals whose spiritual intimations were received with varying degrees of consciousness. One of the functions of the age of musical autonomy, which lasted from some time in the later- Middle-Ages until some time in the 20th Century, was to keep communication open with the spiritual world for people who might, otherwise, have lost it altogether. Steiner explains the relationship between the musical intervals and clairvoyance, as follows :

« The 4th is a real perceiving, but a perceiving from the other side. It would be as if the eye, in perceiving itself, had to look back on itself. This is the experience of the 4th gained from the soul. The interval of the 5th is a real experience of imagination. He who can experience 5ths correctly is in a position to know subjectively what imagination is like. One who experiences 6ths knows what inspiration is. Finally, one who experiences 7ths (if he survives the experience) knows what intuition is. »

Imagination, inspiration and intuition are the 3 successive soul capacities through which the human being attains knowledge of the spiritual world. Experiencing the 5th, the 6th and the 7th puts the human soul into the configurations that go with clairvoyant imagination, inspiration and intuition.

« That is why, in the older mystery schools and remaining mystery traditions, clairvoyant cognition is also called a musical cognition, a cognition living in the musical element. »

What composers from Guillaume de Machaut in the 14th Century to those in the 20th who maintained any significant contact with traditional tonality have done is to unite the experience of the upper-intervals (4th to 7th) with that of the lower ones, particularly, the major and minor 3rds, making an indivisible bond between soul and spirit. This may seem to be an enormous over-simplification of 700 years of musical history and, in many ways, it is. In this period, there have been both radical changes and gradual transformations of style and technique, but the effect has always been that the music that we value most highly speaks to the intelligent, feeling soul and brings intimations of the spirit.

It is in the nature of music to keep us in touch with the spirit and, from my own humble experience, I know that the intense concentration that is needed for the process of composition puts the mind into a heightened state of awareness in which musical relationships are visible and almost tangible. Things begin to click into place in the most amazing way, almost as if someone is doing it for you. In an earlier essay, I tried, without much success, to characterize what we mean when we talk about « great composers » and concluded that the best thing to do would be to drop the phrase from our musical vocabulary. But you don't have to be a « great » composer to experience musical substance in this way and pass something on to your listeners - just sincere and competent. If I now suggest that the « great » composers have been able to go a stage further, I am neither suggesting this as a criterion for « greatness » nor hinting that they were or are initiates in the modern sense in which Rudolf Steiner uses the word. If I am right, the real difference not only between Mozart and Antonio Salieri but also between William Byrd and Nicholas Yonge ; Johann Sebastian Bach and Georg Philipp Telemann ; Franz-Josef Haydn and Karl Stamitz ; Ludwig van Beethoven and Muzio Clementi ; Johannes Brahms and Karl Goldmark ; Modest Mussorgsky and César Cui ; and Dmitri Shostakovich and Tikhon Khrennikov, is that the former member of each pair so often takes us out of ourselves and places us in new worlds of experience that are indescribable in ordinary language. The music doesn't have to be deeply tragic or trail clouds of incense - it is the way the composer works with the musical substance that creates the magic and the only way you can tell if it works is by listening. After listening, you may or may not be able to understand how the composer did it, but that really isn't important unless you have a professional interest.

Rudolf Steiner gave us some precise knowledge of these « magic casements » . Composers and performers have helped us, ordinary mortals, to see through them at a time when such vision was extraordinarily difficult. But, in the 20th Century, the human condition is changing again and it is not only a matter of the strengthening of the Christ impulse through the re-appearance of Christ in the etheric, early in the 20th Century. Lucifer and Ahriman have their own plans for the future of mankind and we have no wish either to be automatically good and spiritual or to be totally isolated within our own consciousness. It cannot be merely coincidental that the « Kali Yuga » ended just at the time when the exploration of the tonal resources that had enabled these composers to work their miracles was nearing completion and that tone eurythmy appeared at the same time as atonal music. Over the past 100 years, our relationship to music has been changing along with our relationship to the spiritual world and to explore the nature and consequences of these changes will be a major undertaking for someone. My feeling is that, whether we like it or not, we have seen the end of the great period of musical autonomy, when composers from Bach to Bruckner stormed the heavens for us because we were unable to reach them on our own. But now, although the path to a new clairvoyance is open, it is beset by toll-collectors and armed guards in the shape of the minions of Lucifer and Ahriman. For both good and bad reasons, people no longer hear the music in the old way and, so, they need visual representations or interpretations of it. This why I remarked earlier that today's composers are the inheritors of a diminished kingdom. Some of us don't like it but it looks as if we'll have to put-up with it.

...

Anton Bruckner had already made his 1st attempt to be appointed teacher of musical composition at the University of Vienna, in 1867 ; in 1875, he finally became unpaid lecturer in harmony and counterpoint in spite of the opposition of Eduard Hanslick and, evidently, with the support of Karl von Stremayer, Minister for Culture and Education. On 24 April 1876, he gave his inaugural lecture and, for the 1st time in 1880, he was able to obtain an award of the normal semester's remuneration. His students provide numerous reports of his unconventional style of teaching. Bruckner's ideas and his methods attracted many of the curious who nevertheless approached him with respect. Among his students were Alois Hofler, later professor of pedagogy at the University of Vienna, and Rudolf Steiner, the founder of anthroposophy.

Rudolf Steiner continued to be interested and actively involved in Vienna's public life and in current issues and developments in science, art, religion, and also in politics. As a student, he had been librarian and later president of the « Deutsche Lesehalle » at the Technical College, and had written « begging letters », asking for free copies of newly published books for the library, all of which he read. Now, in the 2nd half of the 1880's, Steiner worked in the Specht household and on Kürschner's Gœthe edition and encyclopedias. He also wrote for various journals and absorbed everything that was going on in literature, the theatre (he was an ardent theater-goer) , and in the world of music that played such a prominent role in Vienna.

Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, and Anton Bruckner became subjects for discussion at many cultural gatherings. Fritz Lemmermayer, who had the necessary connections, even went to Bayreuth to attend the dress rehearsal of Wagner's « Parsifal » . But people were also moved by Bruckner's Masses, performed on Sunday mornings in the chapel of the Imperial Palace (« Hofkapelle ») , with the composer himself playing the organ. Rudolf Steiner had several conversations with Anton Bruckner. He took an intense interest in the visual arts (the paintings of Arnold Böcklin, for instance, touched him deeply) and with the basic questions of æsthetics he had addressed in the final chapter of Gœthe's Theory of Knowledge (« Knowledge and Artistic Creation ») . He made an impression on his audience when he developed his thoughts on this theme in a public lecture on November 9, 1888, given to the Vienna Gœthe Society at the invitation of Karl Julius Schröer.

Side by side with the scientific undertakings of the Congress, one experienced the religious questions and the artistic impulses. On Pentecost Sunday, June 4, Doctor Friedrich Rittelmeyer spoke on « The Spirit of Pentecost and Religious Renewal » . The artistic part of the conference was introduced by Albert Steffen in a lecture on « The Position of the Artist between West and East » and a lecture by Doctor Erich Schwebesch on « Anton Bruckner's Musical Mission » . Out of Albert Steffen's lecture was later developed one of his most beautiful literary productions, and Doctor Schwebesch, inspired by Rudolf Steiner's long-continued high-evaluation of Bruckner, produced later a book which helped greatly in expanding the appreciation of this composer. During the Congress, there was a magnificent production of Bruckner's great Mass in F minor by a combination of 3 musical organizations of Vienna. Classical music was represented by a program produced on modern instruments built by the violin-maker Doctor Franz Thomastik (luthier and Doctor of Philosophy) .

In the course of the past Centuries, had not Vienna been to the development of music what Athens had once been to the creation of sculpture and architecture ? Both cities-seedbeds for gifted geniuses ! Yet, just as Plato and Aristotle appeared only after the arts had come into full-flower, so it was only after Anton Bruckner's great accomplishments that the young Rudolf Steiner left Austria, for the end of the Classical and Romantic epoch of music coincided with the beginning of the Michæl age, which led to the birth of anthroposophy.

Much more so than in Stuttgart, the musical element was a fully integrated part of the activities at the Vienna Congress. This became evident in the distinctive artistic performances, scheduled for the afternoons and culminating on Whit-Monday in the Bruckner celebration to be presented by members of the Vienna Philharmonic, the Bruckner Choir under the direction of Professor Weber, and also the Maireck-Buxbaum String Quartet. In addition to the 2 string concerts by the Thomastik Quartet, 2 eurythmy presentations under the direction of Marie Steiner took place in the « Volksoper » . A performance of recitation, an evening of arias and songs by Valborg Svardstrom-Werbeck, and 2 lectures ; one by Albert Steffen entitled « The Position of the Artist Between East and West » , and the other by Erich Schwebsch called « Anton Bruckner's Musical Mission » were also on the program.

Rudolf Steiner, in some ways, resembles Anton Bruckner, another rustic genius who was known for his social « faux-pas » and who was Steiner's older contemporary. Like Steiner, Bruckner had an unshakable belief in spiritual reality ; he once remarked that his Symphonies were all dedicated to God.

Steiner was determined and worked late into the night, his gaze turned firmly to the future. By 1886-1887, he had moved to Vienna and often spent the evenings meeting friends in town-young artists, poets and other seekers - whom he felt close to and with whom he discussed cultural issues. One of these friends was Fritz Lemmermayer, the affable poet he had 1st met in « delle Grazie's » salon. Lemmermayer lived in simple lodgings in an old building near Saint-Stephen's Cathedral where he wrote his novel « The Alchemist » , which is set in 15th Century Cologne. He had studied philosophy, history, and literature at the Vienna University and brought his friend, the highly-musical composer Alfred Stroß, who later died under tragic circumstances, to « delle Grazie's » meetings to play the piano. Lemmermayer looked after many young artists among his friends and introduced them to Rudolf Steiner. He also published an anthology of Austrian verse.

On the title page of Bruckner's recent published work, Friedrich Eckstein wrote a friendly inscription to Rudolf Steiner, recalling their days of joint spiritual search (this title page is reproduced in « Briefe » , volume I) . Eckstein's memoirs, « Alta unnennbare Tage » is a mine of information concerning the years that Steiner was in Vienna.

In his article « Schœnberg and the Occult : Some Reflections on the “ Musical Idea ” » (Theory and Practice : Journal of the Music Society of New York State, No. 17, 1992 ; pages 103-118) , the musicologist John Covach speculates that some of the people influenced by Rudolf Steiner's work on Gœthe, and who may even have heard of his « café » conversations, were the composers Arnold Schœnberg and Anton Webern, members of the so-called Second Viennese School, responsible for modern developments in music like the 12 tone system and serial composition. Both Schœnberg and his friend Wassily Kandinsky were later clearly influenced by Steiner's occult ideas, as is apparent from Kandinsky's essay, « On the Spiritual in Art », and in his correspondence with Schönberg ; Kandinsky attended some of Steiner's lectures as well. (Another central occult influence on Schönberg was Emanuel Swedenborg.) Covach points-out that, by the time Schönberg was himself a frequenter of Vienna's « cafés », the occult scene in Vienna was at its height, and that although Steiner himself had by this time (the 1890's) moved on to Weimar and Berlin, his ideas about Goethe's world-view were still part of « café » discussion. Webern's radically compressed compositions are a musical expression of Goethe's « Urphänomen », the most vocal and visible advocate of which at that time was Steiner.

Rudolf Steiner, das musikalische Wien und Anton Bruckner (1879-1925)

Wien und die Musik, ein geologisches Phänomen.

Rudolf Steiner in Wien im Kreise von Bruckner- und Wagnerverehrern : Friedrich Eckstein, Fritz Lemmermayer, Alfred Stroß, Hugo Wolf, Rudolf Steiner als Hörer von Bruckners Vorlesungen für Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt an der Universität Wien.

Die Bedeutung von Bruckners ausgiebigem Kontrapunkt Studium für dessen Schaffen.

Begegnungen mit Bruckner im Café Griensteidl zwischen 1886 und 1890.

Rudolf Steiner und Bruckners Symphonien IV, VI und IX.

Begegnungen mit dem Bruckner Sekretär und Biographen August Göllerich in Linz 1911 und Kitzbühl 1912.

Rudolf Steiner und Erich Schweschs Bruckner-Forschungen.

Bruckner Aufführungen zur Eröffnung des Ersten Hochschulkurses September 1920, zur Bruckner-Feier während des West-Ost Kongresses 1922 und zu anderen Gelegenheiten.

Bruckners Musik in eurythmischer Darstellung.

Rudolf Steiner über die Bedeutung von Bruckners Musik als eines spirituellen Neubeginns.

Rudolf Steiner und die Kunst der Musik

1) Der Musikbegriff des frühen Rudolf Steiner, seine Musikalität und seine musiktheoretischen Kenntnisse (1872-1925)

Rudolf Steiner und die Musik.

Musik in der Kindheit.

Musikbegriff in der frühen Wiener Zeit (1879-1882) .

Rudolf Steiners früher Musikbegriff und Goethes Ästhetik, Über das Heilige und Profane in der Musik (1882-1896) .

Schopenhauer und die Musik.

Rudolf Steiners Musikalität, seine Kenntnis der Musiktheorie ; seine Anschauung über Musik nach Aussagen von ihm selbst sowie Adolf Arenson, Fritz Kœgel, Ralph Kux, Ilona Schubert und Jan Stuten.

2) Rudolf Steiner, das musikalische Wien und Anton Bruckner (1879-1925)

Wien und die Musik, ein geologisches Phänomen.

Rudolf Steiner in Wien im Kreise von Bruckner- und Wagnerverehrern : Friedrich Eckstein, Fritz Lemmermayer, Alfred Stroß, Hugo Wolf.

Rudolf Steiner als Hörer von Bruckners Vorlesungen für Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt an der Universität Wien.

Die Bedeutung von Bruckners ausgiebigem Kontrapunkt Studium für dessen Schaffen.

Begegnungen mit Bruckner im Café Griensteidl zwischen 1886 und 1890.

Rudolf Steiner und Bruckners Symphonien IV, VI und IX.

Begegnungen mit dem Bruckner Sekretär und Biographen August Göllerich in Linz 1911 und Kitzbühl 1912.

Rudolf Steiner und Erich Schweschs Bruckner-Forschungen.

Bruckner Aufführungen zur Eröffnung des Ersten Hochschulkurses September 1920, zur Bruckner-Feier während des West-Ost Kongresses 1922 und zu anderen Gelegenheiten.

Bruckners Musik in eurythmischer Darstellung.

Rudolf Steiner über die Bedeutung von Bruckners Musik als eines spirituellen Neubeginns.

3) Rudolf Steiner und Richard Wagner (1879-1924)

Rudolf Steiner und der Besuch verschiedener Wagner Opern in Wien, Weimar, Berlin und Stuttgart zwischen 1880 und 1924.

Rudolf Steiner und das Weimarer Musikleben : Wagner, Liszt, Strauß und andere.

Rudolf Steiner in Bayreuth ; über das Bayreuther Festspielhaus und das erste Götetheatrum.

Die tragische « Sternen-Freundschaft » zwischen Richard Wagner und Friedrich Nietzsche.

Über die geistige Bedeutung Wagners als einem « der größten Musiker der neueren Zeit » in verschiedenen Aspekten zahlreicher Vorträge zwischen 1904 und 1924.

Über die Bedeutung des « Parsifal » .

Über das « Unmusikalische » in Wagners Musik, Hanslick contra Wagner, von Rudolf Steiner kommentiert und über die
Wirkungen von Wagners Musik.

Richard Wagner über Wiedergeburt.

Rudolf Steiner über Richard Wagner als Mensch und seine Entelechie.

4) Erste Okkulte Betrachtungen über das Wesen des Musikalischen (1906ff)

Die Musikmetropole Berlin vor dem I. Weltkrieg ; Hans Pfitzner im Kreis der Kommenden ; Ferruccio Busoni und seine Ästhetik der neuen Musik.

Erste Vorträge über geisteswissenschaftliche Forschung zum Musikalischen und der Beginn der musikalischen Moderne.

Das kompositorische Schaffen als unbewußte Erinnerung an die Sphärenharmonien im Schlaf.

Dur und Moll als menschenkundlich gegründete musikalische Phänomene.

5) Auf dem Weg zum Gesamtkunstwerk - München und die Mysteriendramen (1906-1913)

Die Kunststadt München.

Der Münchner Kongreß, Rosenkreuzerische Geisteswissenschaft und der Impuls zur Erneuerung des Künstlerischen.

Edouard Schuré's Mysteriendrama « Eleusis » (1907) mit Musik von Bernhard Stavenhagen.

Edouard Schuré's « Die Kinder des Luzifer » (1909) mit Musik von Adolf Arenson.

Rudolf Steiners Mysteriendramen als Gesamtkunstwerk : Sprache, Schauspiel, Eurythmie, Musik, Farben.

Zur Musik für die Mysteriendramen von Adolf Arenson.

Zeitgleiche Experimente und Entwicklungen bei Arnold Schœnberg « Die Jakobsleiter » , Alexander Skrjabin « Das Mysterium » , Charles Ives « Die Weltall Symphonie » .

6) Kunst im Lichte der Mysterienweisheit (1914-1920)

Der Baubeginn in Dornach ab 1914 und die anthroposophische Künstler-Kolonie.

Die dreifache Stellung der Musik in den frühen Dornacher Jahren.

Die Anfänge der Musik und Toneurythmie zu den Faust-Aufführungen.

Die Vorträge : Kunst im Lichte der Mysterienweisheit.

Technik und Kunst.

Die Künste und insbesondere die Musik und ihr Zusammenhang mit den Wesensgliedern des Menschen.

Astralleib und Ätherleib und das Musikalische.

Musik als Ausdruck der Einweihungserlebnisse.

Das sittlich-moralische Erleben des einzelnen Tones.

7) Das neue Erleben des Einzeltones (1915-1924)

Die Eröffnung des Gœtheanums mit dem Ersten Hochschulkurs September-Oktober 1920.

Fragen und Gespräche zum Einzeltonerlebnis während des Hochschulkurses.

Weitere Darstellungen verschiedener Aspekte des Einzeltonerlebnisses vor Musikern, Pädagogen, Priestern, Anthroposophen in Dornach, Stuttgart, Oslo.

Zeitgleiche Gedanken zur musikalischen Umbruchsituation und deren möglichen neuen musikalischen Mitteln (zum Beispiel als Reaktion auf Busonis Schrift von 1907 bei Bartók, Pfitzner und Schœnberg) .

Edmund Hussels Phänomenologie und das Erlebnis des Einzeltones.

Einzeltonerlebnis bei anderen Komponisten : Claude Debussy, Giacinto Scelsi, Karlheinz Stockhausen « Ich bin die Töne » und andere.

8) Das Hören, der musikalische Ton und das Musikerleben

Der hörende Mensch.

Der musikalische Ton.

Musik als Akustik (Mersenne, Helmholtz, Meyer-Eppler) und als sinnlich-sittliches Erlebnis (Goethe) , eine kulturgeschichtliche Zwischenbemerkung.

Das Okkulte Erleben des Musikalischen.

9) Zur Frage des Gesangs (1910-1924)

« Das Überleiten des Tones auf den Ätherleib » (1916) .

Hinweise Rudolf Steiners für das künstlerische Singen für die amerikanische Sängerin Gracia Ricardo, die Opernsängerin Martha Hundshausen-Hemsoth und Carl von Behr.

Valborg Werbeck-Svärdströms Zusammenarbeit mit Rudolf Steiner und ihre von ihm 1924 autorisierte « anthroposophisch orientierte Gesangspädagogik » .

Rudolf Steiner über die zukünftige Aufgabe des Singens und Gesangs und deren neue Elemente.

10) Zur Frage der Instrumente (1914-1924)

Zu den neuen Streichinstrumenten von Franz Thomastik in Wien.

Rudolf Steiners Zuordnung der Orchesterinstrumente und der Orgel zu verschiedenen Bereichen der geistigen und terrestrischen Welt.

Die neue Leier - Edmund Pracht, Lothar Gärtner, Julius Knierim.

Zum Klavier.

Zur Geschichte der Orgel im ersten Goetheanum.

11) Zur Frage der Tonordnungen und der Erweiterung des Tonsystems (1921-1924)

Die englische Musikarchäologin und Musikwissenschaftlerin Kathleen Schlesinger und die australische Komponistin und Pianistin Elsie Hamilton als Teilnehmerinnen des Zweiten Anthroposophischen Hochschulkurses in Dornach, April 1921.

Rudolf Steiner im Austausch mit Kathleen Schlesinger und Elsie Hamilton über Schlesingers Forschungen zu griechischen Aulos-Skalen Dornacher Musiker (und andere Leopold van der Pals und Wilhelm Dörfler) und Kathleen Schlesingers Forschungen.

Elsie Hamilton als Schülerin Alban Bergs sowie eine Begegnung von Kathleen Schlesinger und Elsie Hamilton mit Arnold Schönberg in London.

Béla Bartók und die Forschungen Schlesingers.

Aus musiktheoretischer Überschau : Hermann Pfrogner und Heiner Ruland.

Neue Wege bei Komponisten : wie Ferruccio Busoni, Béla Bartók, Alois Hába, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Luigi Nono, und andere.

12) Musikalisch-konkrete Anregungen Rudolf Steiners im Gespräch mit verschiedenen Musikern

Rudolf Steiners ungeschriebene Musikgeschichte von der Lemuris bis zur Neuzeit als Spiegel der Entwicklung des Menschen.

Zur Bedeutung des « Melos » .

« Großrhythmus und Kleinrhythmus » - zu Wilhelm Lewerenz, später bei Stockhausen, Gubaidulina, Bleffert unter andere mehr.

« Musikalische Form heißt Biographik » - zu Jan Stuten.

Die Bedeutung des Tones C und der Stimmung C 128 hz und die daraus entwickelte.

Renold-Stimmung.

Musikpädagogische Anregungen : Paul Baumann und das Ehepaar Ziemann-Molitor.

Anregungen zur Kultusmusik auf Fragen der Priester der Christengemeinschaft.

Rudolf Steiners musikalisches Vermächtnis im letzten Vortrag des Vortragszyklus « Das Initiatenbewusstsein » .

Weitere von Rudolf Steiner für Herbst 1924 und 1925 geplante Musik-, Gesangs- und Toneurythmiekurse, die durch seine Krankheit und den frühen Tod nicht mehr zustande kamen.

13) Toneurythmie und der Toneurythmiekurs (1915-1924)

Die Anfänge der Toneurythmie in Köln 1913, Dresden 1914 und Dornach 1915ff.

Rudolf Steiners Formen zur Toneurythmie nach dem Klavier und Formen zur Toneurythmie auf dem Krankenbett ohne Klavier.

Rudolf Steiner und Josef Matthias Hauer's Musikbegriff zwischen Tao und Moderne.

Zur Vorbereitung des Toneurythmiekurses : mit den Musiklehren von Hugo Riemann und Hermann Grabner.

Komponisten zur Eurythmie in Dornach zu Steiners Lebzeiten : Lewerenz, Leopold van der Pals, Max Schuurmann, Jan Stuten und andere.

14) Die Wirkenskräfte des Musikalischen

Was wollte Rudolf Steiner im Musikalischen und was dachte er sich dazu im ersten Gøetheanum ? Im Zentrum standen Dramatische Kunst und die Eurythmie. Marie Steiner-von Sievers wollte keinen Orchestergraben.

Die ersten Musikertagungen nach Steiners Tod 1926 und 1927.

Seither Studien verschiedener Musiker auf verschiedensten Gebieten zur Erneuerung und Vertiefung des Musikalischen.

Das Schaffen dreier Generationen von Komponisten, deren Schaffen von der Anthroposophie befruchtet war/ist, hauptsächlich in Europa, aber auch in Nordamerika, Ostasien und Australien : Georg von Albrecht, Frank Michæl Beyer, Hans Georg Burghardt, Lamberto Caffarelli, Johann Nepomuk David, Wilhelm Dørfler, Eve Duncan, Takashi Fudjii, Claudio Gregorat, Alois Hába, Roberto Lupi, Gianni Luporini, Wilhelm Petersen, Felix Petyrek, Peter Michæl Riehm, Jay Sydemann, Viktor Ullmann, Henri Zagwijn.

Wirkensfelder des Musikimpulses Rudolf Steiners in Pädagogik, Therapie und Kultus, bis hin zur Pflanzenzucht.

Anhang.

Wie entwickelten sich die Impulse Rudolf Steiners bis in die Gegenwart weiter ?

Originaltexte.

Zum Erleben des Einzeltons : Heiner Ruland (geboren 1934) , Gunhild von Kries (geboren 1956) , Steffen Hartmann (geboren 1978) .

Zur Frage des Gesangs : Name unbekannt.

Zur Frage der Instrumente : Christian Ginat-Streichinstrumente, Johann Sonnleitner-Tastensinstrumente, Gerhard Beilharz-Die Leier.

Zum Komponieren : Manfred Bleffert (geboren 1950) , Elmar Lampson (geboren 1952) , Eve Duncan (geboren 1956) , Wolfram Graf (geboren 1965) , Jitka Koželuhová (geboren 1966) , Torben Maiwald (geboren 1978) .

Rudolf Steiners Musikbibliothek.

Rudolf Steiners Vorträge über Richard Wagner.

Literaturliste.

Personenregister.

Eurythmie

Eurythmy is an expressive movement art originated by Rudolf Steiner in conjunction with Marie von Sivers in the early 20th Century. Primarily a performance art, it is also used in education, especially in Waldorf schools, and (as part of anthroposophic medicine) for claimed therapeutic purposes.

The word eurythmy stems from Greek roots meaning beautiful or harmonious rhythm.

The gestures in the eurythmist's movement repertoire relate to the sounds and rhythms of speech, to the tones and rhythms of music and to soul experiences, such as joy and sorrow. Once these fundamental repertoire elements are learned, they can be composed into free artistic expressions. The eurythmist also cultivates a feeling for the qualities of straight lines and curves, the directions of movement in space (forward, backward, up, down, left, right) , contraction and expansion, and colour. The element of colour is also emphasized both through the costuming, usually given characteristic colours for a piece or part and formed of long, loose fabrics that accentuate the movements rather than the bodily form, and through the lighting, which saturates the space and changes with the moods of the piece.

Eurythmy's aim is to bring the artists' expressive movement and both the performers' and audience's feeling experience into harmony with a piece's content ; eurythmy is, thus, sometimes called « visible music » or « visible speech » , expressions that originate with its founder, Rudolf Steiner, who described eurythmy as an « art of the soul » .

Most eurythmy today is performed to Classical (concert) music or texts such as poetry or stories. Silent pieces are also sometimes performed.

When performing eurythmy with music (also called tone eurythmy), the 3 major elements of music, melody, harmony and rhythm, are all expressed. The melody is primarily conveyed through expressing its rise and fall; the specific pitches; and the intervallic qualities present. Harmony is expressed through movement between tension and release, as expressions of dissonance and consonance, and between the more inwardly directed minor mood and the outwardly directed major mood. Rhythm is chiefly conveyed through livelier and more contoured movements for quick notes, slower, dreamier movements for longer notes; in addition, longer tones move into the more passive (listening) back space, quicker tones into the more active front space.

Breaths or pauses are expressed through a larger or smaller movement in space, giving new impulse to what follows. Beat is conveyed through greater emphasis of downbeats, or those beats upon which stress is normally placed. Beat is generally treated as a subsidiary element. Eurythmy has only occasionally been done to popular music, in which beat plays a large role.

The timbre of individual instruments is brought into the quality both of the tonal gestures and of the whole movement of the eurythmist. Usually, there will be a different eurythmist or group of eurythmists expressing each instrument, for example in chamber or Symphonic music.

A piece's choreography usually expresses elements such as the major or minor key, the shape of the melody line, the interplay between voices or instruments and the relative dominance of one or another voice or instrument. Thus, musicians can often follow even the finest details of their part in the movements of the eurythmists on stage. Particular musical forms (e.g., the Sonata) can have special characteristic choreographic expressions.

Eurythmy is often performed with spoken texts such as poetry, stories or plays. Speech eurythmy includes such elements as the sounds of speech, rhythms, poetic meters, grammar and mood. In speech eurythmy, all the sounds of language have characteristic gestural qualities: the sound of an « A » is open due to the position of the articulators during the vowel. A « k » sounds sharper due to the manner of articulation of the consonant, that it is a plosive. Note that it is the audible sounds themselves, not the letters of the written language, that are expressed.

Eurythmy was conceived in 1911 when a widow brought her young daughter, Lory Smits, who was interested in movement and dance, to the Austrian philosopher Rudolf Steiner. Due to the recent loss of her father, it was necessary for the girl to find a career. Steiner's advice was sought; he suggested that the girl begin working on a new art of movement. As preparation for this, she began to study human anatomy, to explore the human step, to contemplate the movement implicit in Greek sculpture and dance, and to find movements that would express spoken sentences using the sounds of speech. Soon, a number of other young people became interested in this form of expressive movement.

During these years, Steiner was writing a new drama each year for performance at the Anthroposophical Society's summer gatherings ; beginning in 1912, he began to incorporate the new art of movement into these dramas. When the Society decided to build an artistic center in Dornach, Switzerland (this later became known as the « Gœtheanum ») , a small stage group began work and offered weekly performances of the developing art. Marie Steiner-von Sivers, Steiner's wife, who was a trained actress and speech artist, was given responsibility for training and directing this ensemble. This 1st eurythmy ensemble went on tour in 1919, performing across Switzerland, the Netherlands and Germany.

Steiner saw eurythmy as a unique expression of the anthroposophical impulse :

« It is the task of Anthroposophy to bring a greater depth, a wider vision and a more living spirit into the other forms of art. But the art of Eurythmy could only grow-up out of the soul of Anthroposophy ; could only receive its inspiration through a purely Anthroposophical conception. »

(Rudolf Steiner)

According to Steiner :

« In eurythmy, we present in the form and movement of the human organism a direct external proof of a man's share in the life of the super-sensible world. When people do eurythmy, they are linked directly with the super-sensible world. Whenever art is formed from a truly artistic conviction, it bears witness to the connection of the human being with the super-sensible world. »

(Dornach, Switzerland, 12 September 1920.)

In 1924, Steiner gave 2 intensive work-shops on different aspects of eurythmy ; transcripts of his talks during these workshops are published as « Eurythmy as Visible Speech » and « Eurythmy as Visible Singing » .

Eurythmy ensembles in Stuttgart, Germany, and at the « Gœtheanum » soon became established parts of the cultural life of Europe. The « Gœtheanum » ensemble was recognized with a gold medal at the Paris Exposition of 1937-1938. The Stuttgart training and ensemble, led by Else Klink, had to close in the Nazi period but re-opened shortly after the close of World War II. There are now training centers and artistic ensembles in many countries.

The word « eurythmy » stems from Greek roots meaning beautiful or harmonious rhythm. The term was used by Ancient Greek and Roman architects to refer to the harmonious proportions of a design or building ; the English word « eurythmy » was used from the 17th to 19th Century to refer not only to harmonious architectural proportions, but also to « rhythmical order or movement » and « a graceful proportion and carriage of the body » .

There are notable eurythmy ensembles in Dornach, Switzerland ; Stuttgart, Germany ; The Hague, Netherlands ; London, England ; Järna, Sweden ; and Chestnut Ridge, New York (near NYC) . All of these groups both perform locally and tour internationally. Many smaller performing groups also exist. High-schools that have their own performing ensembles include the San Francisco Waldorf High-School ensemble.

When the 1st Waldorf School was founded in 1919, Eurythmy was included in the curriculum. It was quickly recognized as a successful complement to gymnastics in the school's movement program and is now taught in most Waldorf schools, as well as in many non-Waldorf pre-school centers, « kindergartens » and schools. It is taught to all ages from pre-schools through high-school and into college. Its purpose is to awaken and strengthen the expressive capacities of children through movement, stimulating the child to bring imagination, ideation and conceptualization to the point where they can manifest these as « vital, moving forms » in physical space. It is also thought to improve balance, coordination, concentration, rhythm, and form an awareness of patterns.

Eurythmy pedagogical exercises begin with the straight line and curve and proceed through successively more complicated geometric figures and choreographed forms, developing a child's coordination and concentration. An extensive set of special exercises has also been developed for pedagogical purposes. These include metamorphosing geometric patterns and dynamic movement sequences.

Rods or balls are sometimes used in exercises to develop precision in movement, to expand the experience of space, develop precise balance, and to objectify the movement experience. The rods are usually approximately the length of an arm ; the balls are of a size to fit comfortably in one hand. Both are generally made of copper, a material receptive to warmth.

Though there are some independent post-graduate trainings for pedagogical eurythmy, this aspect is frequently included in courses focusing on artistic work.

Eurythmy is a component of anthroposophic medicine, a system of alternative medicine which has been characterized by some critics as unscientific, pseudo-scientific and as « pure quackery » .

According to the precepts of anthroposophic medicine, a human has 4 aspects which need to be treated : spirit, soul, life and matter. Eurythmy is one of the practices said to act on the « life » aspect, and is claimed to effect an « improvement of health related life functions » . A person receiving eurythmy therapy moves under the guidance of a eurythmy therapist, who will have been trained 2 years beyond the 4 year fundamental course in eurythmy. The movements may be adapted to the condition of the person being treated ; for example, they may be done while either sitting or even lying down. Therapeutic eurythmy is claimed to bring about a « re-integration of body, soul, and spirit » .

A 2008 review in BMC Complementary and Alternative Medicine said that eurythmy was a « potentially relevant add-on » to a therapeutic program, but though the studies reviewed reported improvement in symptoms, limitations in the underlying data and in the review methods means these conclusions « warrant cautious interpretation » .

Le « Goetheanum »

Le 1er « Gœtheanum » était un imposant bâtiment en bois surmonté de 2 coupoles, sculptées et ornées de fresques à l'intérieur. Sa construction commença en 1913. Inauguré en 1920, l'édifice fut détruit par un incendie dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre 1922-1933. Rudolf Steiner présenta en 1924 la maquette du « Gœtheanum » actuel.

Ce 2e « Gœtheanum » fut édifié de 1925 à 1928. C'est la 1re construction aux dimensions monumentales qui utilise les possibilités plastiques du béton armé pour élaborer des formes. Selon le style architectural des 2 « Gœtheanum », chaque élément, chaque forme et chaque couleur sont conçus dans une correspondance interne et s'articulent selon des métamorphoses qui constituent un tout. Les silhouettes du second « Gœtheanum » et des bâtiments annexes épousent la topographie du paysage, le relief du terrain et les contours de la montagne qui surmonte la vallée de la Birse, voisine du Jura, à 10 kilomètres au sud-est de Bâle.

Les hautes fenêtres sur les flancs et la vaste fenêtre orientée vers l'ouest suggèrent la présence de la grande salle par derrière. Un regard à l'intérieur donne un aperçu de ce qu'expriment l'architecture, l'aménagement intérieur et les vitraux colorés de cet espace clos sur lui-même. Autour de la salle, de la vaste montée d'escalier côté ouest et derrière la scène côté est, se trouvent les garde-robes des artistes, des scènes annexes pour les répétitions, des salles d'exercices, les ateliers techniques et de couture et le dépôt des décors. Au nord et au sud sont situés les salles de séminaire, de conférence et de travail, la librairie, la bibliothèque et les archives, les secrétariats des sections et de la Société, les bureaux administratifs et destinés aux séminaires, la réception, le bureau d'information et la cafétéria.

La colline qui entoure le « Gœtheanum » est une vaste zone de verdure, où sont répartis divers bâtiments : les maisons des sections, des ateliers, des laboratoires de recherche et un observatoire céleste ; des centres de formation et des logements pour les étudiants ; la jardinerie, des ateliers et des bureaux ; des maisons d'habitation et d'hébergement des visiteurs et, au pied de la colline, le restaurant « Speisehaus » .

Plus de 300 personnes travaillent sur ce campus. Des milliers de visiteurs se rendent au « Gœtheanum » chaque année. Le « Gœtheanum » ressemble à une immense sculpture, à un être vivant. C'est un centre de culture et de rencontre.

...

Le « Gœtheanum » est un bâtiment érigé sur la colline de Dornach, à 10 kilomètres au sud de Bâle. Il constitue le siège de la Société anthroposophique universelle et de l'« École Libre de Science de l'Esprit » fondées par Rudolf Steiner qui lui a donné ce nom en référence aux travaux de Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

Dans ce bâtiment construit autour d'une grande salle de théâtre, sont encore données des représentations intégrales du « Faust » de Goethe. On y donne encore régulièrement des concerts et des spectacles d'eurythmie. En outre, plusieurs congrès s'y tiennent chaque année.

Le « Gœtheanum » comporte une vaste bibliothèque publique, une librairie, des salles de cours et de conférences. On peut aussi y voir des vitraux obtenus par la technique du dessin hachuré, ainsi que le groupe sculpté du « Représentant de l'Humanité » , qui échappa à l'incendie du 1er « Gøetheanum » , car il n'était pas encore en place.

Dans les Iers temps du mouvement anthroposophique, les représentations théâtrales étaient données dans des salles louées, notamment à Munich entre 1910 et 1913. Ce fut le cas pour les « Drames-Mystères » de Rudolf Steiner et pour certaines pièces d'Édouard Schuré. Les membres envisageaient de construire un théâtre et centre d'activités qui leur fut propre à Munich. Bien que les esquisses et préparatifs d'une telle construction fussent déjà bien avancés en 1911, il ne fut pas possible de construire un tel bâtiment à Munich pour des raisons urbanistiques et administratives. Certains membres de la Société anthroposophique offrirent à Rudolf Steiner un terrain situé sur une colline à Dornach, à proximité de Bâle. Le projet de Munich fut alors adapté à son nouvel environnement et la 1re pierre fut posée le 20 septembre 1913, sur la colline de Dornach. C'était une construction en bois à coupole double, ornée de sculptures et de peintures. En pleine Guerre, les membres de 17 nations ennemies œuvrèrent ensemble à son édification. Il fut inauguré en septembre 1920 par un congrès bien qu'il ne soit pas complètement achevé intérieurement. Une trentaine d'orateurs furent conviés à y prendre la parole à cette occasion. Cet édifice d'une taille respectable (80 mètres par 60 mètres au sol, pour une hauteur de 34 mètres) avait été conçu pour accueillir environ 900 spectateurs environ.

Dans ce 1er « Gøetheanum » , il y avait 9 fenêtres munies de vitraux colorés disposés en triptyque. Rudolf Steiner fit construire un atelier spécial (« Das Glashaus » : la Maison de verre) , à proximité, pour la fabrication de ces vitraux, qui furent gravés au moyen de meules au carborundum. La technique de gravure consistait à faire naître le motif en faisant varier l'épaisseur du verre coloré. L'impression de relief était obtenue par les variations de la profondeur de gravure qui modulaient le passage de la lumière. Il fut détruit par un incendie criminel dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre 1922-1923. Au matin du Nouvel-An de 1923, il était consumé : seules demeuraient les fondations en béton. Une place spéciale avait été réservée à une sculpture haute de 9 mètres 50 réalisée par Edith Maryon et Rudolf Steiner. Cette sculpture monumentale, de quelque 20 tonnes, que Steiner nommait « le Représentant de l'Humanité » , échappa à l'incendie car elle était en cours d'achèvement dans un atelier attenant à la menuiserie.

En mars 1924, Rudolf Steiner réalisa des esquisses et la maquette du second « Gøetheanum » , qui fut construit en béton armé entre 1925 et 1928. Toutefois, pour des raisons urbanistiques, certaines modifications durent être faites au projet initial. L'édifice fut ainsi un peu moins élevé qu'initialement prévu. C'était le 1er bâtiment de taille monumentale (85 mètres par 91 mètres à la base, pour une hauteur de 37 mètres) à être construit avec ce matériau. En 1928, on inaugurait un bâtiment encore à l'état brut et, dans les 70 années suivantes jusqu'en 1998, la construction fut poursuivie par étapes sur l'emplacement même du 1er bâtiment. Ce nouveau « Gøetheanum » devait, outre une salle de spectacle pour 1,000 personnes, contenir des locaux pour les diverses activités : ateliers, salles de conférences, bureaux, etc. Une petite salle de spectacle, non prévue à l'origine, fut ajoutée au rez-de-chaussée, la « Grundsteinsaal » (salle de la pierre de fondation) . Elle peut accueillir 450 personnes.

La grande salle de spectacle, qui se trouve à l'étage supérieur, resta inachevée jusqu'en 1957. Les vitraux, qui ornent cette grande salle, et le grand hall de l'entrée principale située du côté ouest, furent cette fois réalisés au moyen d'une autre technique de gravure. Steiner demanda à Assia Tourgueniev d'exécuter toutes les gravures selon la technique du dessin hachuré. Dans la partie sud de l'étage supérieur, un emplacement fut aussi réservé dans un local distinct pour le groupe en bois d'orme sculpté par Steiner et Edith Marion. En août 1996, des travaux importants furent entrepris pour remodeler la grande salle dont l'architecture laissait à désirer pour satisfaire aux principes de l'architecture organique particulière de Steiner. Les plafonds furent, à cette occasion, ornés de fresques dont les sujets sont empruntés à « La science de l'occulte » et au processus initiatique moderne. La Grande salle fut inaugurée lors d'un congrès à Pâques, en 1998.

...

Le « Gœtheanum » s'élève sur la colline de Dornach, à 10 kilomètres au sud de Bâle, dans le paysage du Jura. Il constitue le centre de la Société Anthroposophique Universelle, qui est active dans le monde entier. Il s'engage à promouvoir une vie culturelle et spirituelle libre, dans différents domaines :

École de science de l'esprit.

Siège de la Société Anthroposophique Universelle.

Centre de séminaires et de cours.

Spectacles : théâtre, eurythmie, concerts, récitation, marionnettes.

Expositions.

Bibliothèque et archives.

Le but de l'École de science de l'esprit au « Gœtheanum » est d'effectuer des recherches dans le domaine de l'esprit et d'approfondir ainsi la compréhension de l'existence, en étudiant les fondements de la science, de l'art et de la religion du point de vue de l'esprit, grâce à la formation permanente, à l'échange d'expériences, à l'enseignement et aux publications.

L'École s'articule selon les sections suivantes :

Section d'anthroposophie générale.

Section médicale.

Section des mathématiques et d'astronomie.

Section des sciences de la nature et département d'agriculture.

Section pédagogique.

Section des sciences sociales.

Section des arts plastiques.

Section des arts de la parole et de la musique.

Section des belles-lettres.

Section pour la recherche spirituelle de la jeunesse.

Siège de la Société anthroposophique universelle, le « Gœtheanum » cultive et coordonne les liens avec les membres des sociétés anthroposophiques de 45 pays et entre les membres organisés en nombreux groupes de travail locaux. Cette tâche est placée sous la responsabilité du comité directeur, du collège de l'École de Science de l'esprit et des collaborateurs du « Gœtheanum ». Le bulletin hebdomadaire « Das Gœtheanum », avec un supplément réservé aux membres, est une publication émanant de la société anthroposophique.

Les cours, les séminaires et les congrès présentent les réalisations artistiques et les résultats scientifiques des travaux de section, sous forme de séminaires d'anthroposophie générale, de congrès spécialisés ou de rencontres de travail entre enseignants, gestionnaires, artistes, apiculteurs, oncologues ou généticiens, pour ne citer que quelques exemples. Entre 120 et 150 cours, congrès ou séminaires, d'ampleur et de durée variables, se déroulent chaque année au « Gœtheanum » .

Rudolf Steiner né dans une région frontalière austro-hongroise et yougoslave, étudia à Vienne les sciences de la nature (mathématiques, physique, chimie) et publia, à Weimar, les œuvres scientifiques de Goethe. Il développa les méthodes de recherche de Goethe, qui avaient conduit celui-ci à la découverte de la plante primordiale (« Urpflanze ») et à la théorie de la métamorphose. Il choisit plus tard le nom de « Gœtheanum » pour l'édifice construit à Dornach. Dans ses écrits et ses conférences, il présenta les résultats de ses recherches.

Dans les 4 salles de théâtre (1,000 ; 450 ; 300 ; 180 places) , un programme très varié de représentations théâtrales, d'eurythmie, de récitations et de concerts est offert au public, que ce soit par le « Gœtheanum » lui-même avec son propre ensemble permanent de théâtre et d'eurythmie, ou par d'autres troupes ou ensembles invités, venant du monde entier. Entre autres, les 4 Drames-Mystères de Rudolf Steiner et le « Faust » de Goethe sont représentés régulièrement.

Le 1er « Gœtheanum » , dont la 1re pierre fut posée en 1913, fut inauguré en 1920, mais détruit par un incendie dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre de 1922-1923. C'était une imposante construction de bois à coupole double, ornée de nombreuses sculptures et peintures. Avec ce bâtiment, Rudolf Steiner développa un style d'architecture organique, c'est-à-dire un style dans lequel, comme dans la plante, chaque partie, chaque forme, chaque couleur est en rapport étroit avec l'ensemble, et cet ensemble se relie aux éléments par des métamorphoses. En mars 1924, Rudolf Steiner réalisa la maquette du second « Gœtheanum » , qui fut construit en béton dans les années 1925-1928. C'était le 1er bâtiment de taille monumentale à être construit avec ce matériau et selon des formes plastiques. Mais les travaux restèrent inachevés : en 1928, on inaugurait un bâtiment encore à l'état brut et, dans les 70 années suivantes jusqu'en 1998, la construction fut poursuivie par étapes, avec différents architectes :

Escalier sud.

Salle de la pierre de fondation de 450 places (1952 et 1989) .

Entrée ouest.

Aile nord (1985-1989) .

Grande salle (1re étape, 1956-1957, avec Johannes Schöpfer ; nouveaux aménagements en 1996-1998 avec Christian Hitsch et Ulrich Ölsner) .

La grande salle dispose d'environ 1,000 places et la grande scène (23 mètres de large, 20 mètres de profondeur ; 23 mètres de hauteur) est le cœur du bâtiment. Le thème de l'évolution est représenté de 3 façons : les murs de béton façonné et leur double rangée de 7 chapiteaux, socles et architrave évoquent les développements cosmiques et terrestres, depuis la création du monde jusque dans les lointains futurs. Les 12 motifs de la fresque du plafond illustrent la progression de l'humanité à travers les différentes époques culturelles, depuis la création de l'homme jusqu'à aujourd'hui. Les 9 vitraux de couleur sont des images du cheminement individuel de l'homme. Tous ces motifs sont liés à ceux du 1er « Gœtheanum » , mais sont extrapolés selon la forme et le style architectural du 2e. La grande sculpture en bois du « Représentant de l'Humanité » est une œuvre de Rudolf Steiner et d'Edith Maryon, sculpteur anglaise. Réalisée pour la scène du 1er « Gœtheanum » , elle n'était pas terminée au moment de l'incendie de 1922-1923 et se trouvait alors dans l'atelier de la « Menuiserie » , échappant ainsi aux flammes. Cette œuvre est exposée aujourd'hui dans une salle du 5e étage de l'aile sud.

Rudolf Steiner ne réalisa pas seulement le « Gœtheanum » , les bâtiments qui l'entourent et le site ont aussi été partiellement conçus par lui. La place ronde à l'ouest du « Gœtheanum » , les chemins, le rocher (« Felsli ») et le modelage du paysage remontent à l'époque du 1er « Gœtheanum » . Au cours des décennies s'est créée ici une atmosphère particulière qui associe repos, utilité, variété biologique et écologie.

Les constructions conçues par Rudolf Steiner sont visibles sur le plan de situation. Dans l'entourage du « Gœtheanum » , une centaine de maisons ou d'ateliers ont été construits au fil des ans par différents architectes, dans ce style d'architecture organique.

Le « Gœtheanum » , la maison Duldeck et le « Felsli » ont été classés monuments cantonaux et nationaux protégés, dans les années 1989-1993.

Plan des abords du « Gœtheanum » :

« L'Atelier de Verre » (« Glashaus ») édifié en 1914 pour tailler les vitraux du 1er « Gœtheanum » . Aujourd'hui, siège de la Section des sciences de la nature et de la maison d'édition « Verlag am Gœtheanum » .

La Maison Duldeck construite en 1915 comme maison d'habitation pour Monsieur Grosheintz, donateur du terrain sur lequel fut construit le « Gœtheanum » . Aujourd'hui, librairie et Éditions Rudolf Steiner.

3 Maisons d'eurythmistes construites en 1920 comme habitations pour les collaborateurs du « Gœtheanum » . Plan conçu par Edith Maryon, en collaboration avec Rudolf Steiner.

Maison van Blommestein : Maison-atelier construite en 1919 pour Louise van Blommestein, artiste-peintre. Aujourd'hui, maison d'habitation.

Magasin des livres (« Verlaghaus») construit en 1924 pour entreposer les livres des Éditions philosophiques-anthroposophiques. Aujourd'hui, salle de séminaires.

Annexe nord de la maison Brodbeck avec une salle d'eurythmie au rez-de-chaussée et un atelier à l'étage. Aujourd'hui, à l'étage, salle de travail et d'exposition des Archives Rudolf Steiner.

Maison de Jaeger - atelier construit en 1921 en mémoire du sculpteur Jacques de Jaeger, avec des pièces d'habitation pour sa veuve. Aujourd'hui, pièces à sa mémoire et appartement.

Transformateur public construit en 1921 pour la distribution de l'électricité.

Les frais courants du « Gœtheanum » et de près de 250 collaborateurs sont couverts, pour la plus grande partie, par les recettes des manifestations et par les cotisations des membres de la Société anthroposophique universelle. Le reste des frais, ainsi que les travaux de construction, sont financés par des dons. Le « Gœtheanum » ne reçoit aucune subvention publique, en exceptant un soutien pour la rénovation du béton de la façade par les Monuments historiques cantonaux et nationaux. Le « Gœtheanum » est reconnu institution d'utilité publique par les autorités suisses.

...

The « Gœtheanum » , located in Dornach (near Basel) , Switzerland, is the world center for the anthroposophical movement. The building was designed by Rudolf Steiner and named after Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. It includes 2 performance halls (1,500 seats) , gallery and lecture spaces, a library, a book-store, and administrative spaces for the Anthroposophical Society ; neighboring buildings house the Society's research and educational facilities. Conferences focusing on themes of general interest or directed toward teachers, farmers, doctors, therapists, and other professionals are held at the center throughout the year.

Both the present « Gœtheanum » building and its precursor have been widely cited as Masterpieces of modern architecture.

The « Gœtheanum » is open for visitors 7 days a week and offers tours several times daily.

The 1st « Gœtheanum », a timber and concrete structure designed by Rudolf Steiner, was one of 17 buildings Steiner designed and supervised between 1908 and 1925. It was intended as a « Gesamtkunstwerk » (the synthesis of diverse artistic media and sensory effects), infused with spiritual significance. Begun in 1913 to house the annual summer theater events of the Anthroposophical Society, it rapidly became the center of a small colony of spiritual seekers located in Dornach and based around Steiner. Numerous visual artists contributed to the building: architects created the unusual double-dome wooden structure over a curving concrete base, stained glass windows added colour into the space, painters decorated the ceiling with motifs depicting the whole of human evolution, and sculptors carved huge column bases, capitals, and architraves with images of metamorphoses.

Already during the construction, musicians, actors and movement artists began performing a wide variety of pieces in a neighboring workshop. When the « Gœtheanum » hall was completed, in 1919, these performances moved onto the stage located under the « Gœtheanum »'s smaller cupola. The auditorium was located under the larger cupola.

This building was destroyed by arson on New Year's Eve, December 31st, 1922 - January 1st, 1923.

In the course of 1923, Steiner designed a building to replace the original. This building, now known as the 2nd « Gœtheanum », was wholly built of cast concrete. Begun in 1924, the building was not completed until 1928, after the architect's death. It represents a pioneering use of visible concrete in architecture and has been granted protected status as a Swiss national monument. Art-critic Michael Brennan has called the building a « true Masterpiece of 20th Century expressionist architecture ».

The present « Gœtheanum » houses a 1,000 seat auditorium, now the center of an active artistic community incorporating performances of its in-house theater and eurythmy troupes as well as visiting performers from around the world. Full remodelings of the central auditorium took place in the mid- 1950's and, again, in the late- 1990's. The stained glass windows in the present building date from Steiner's time; the painted ceiling and sculptural columns are contemporary replications or re-interpretations of those in the 1st « Gœtheanum ».

In a dedicated gallery, the building also houses a 9 meter high wooden sculpture, « The Representative of Humanity », by Edith Maryon and Rudolf Steiner.

Steiner's architecture is characterized by a liberation from traditional architectural constraints, especially through the departure from the right-angle as a basis for the building plan. For the 1st « Gœtheanum », he achieved this in wood by employing boat-builders to construct its rounded forms; for the 2nd « Gœtheanum », by using concrete to achieve sculptural shapes on an architectural scale. The use of concrete to achieve organically expressive forms was an innovation for the times; in both buildings, Steiner sought to create forms that were spiritually expressive.

Steiner suggested that he had derived the sculptural forms of the 1st « Gœtheanum » as spiritual inspirations.

Steiner designed approximately 12 to 13 other built structures, principally residences in and around Dornach, as well as purpose built buildings such as the Glass House which houses the School of Spiritual Sciences. Steiner is one of very few major architects who was never the pupil of another major architect.

Architects who have visited and praised the « Goetheanum » 's architecture include : Henry van de Velde, Frank Lloyd Wright, Hans Scharoun and Frank Gehry.

Rudolf Steiner et Friedrich Eckstein

Au début du siècle, Vienne, cette ville où Jules Sauerwein fit ses premiers pas importants dans la vie, était un pôle culturel où se retrouvaient des compositeurs, des hommes de lettre, des mélomanes et des philosophes, mais aussi où des mouvements spirituels attiraient à eux les personnes en quête de formes de vie et de pensée différentes. De nature extrêmement sociable, Jules Sauerwein ne tarda pas à lier connaissance avec les personnes les plus diverses. Mais il considère tout d'abord avec un certain « scepticisme » les théosophes et les « voyants et guides spirituels » de tout acabit qu'il eut l'occasion de rencontrer :

« J'avais eu des motifs de concevoir quelques doutes, non point sur l'existence des mondes invisibles, mais sur la valeur morale et intellectuelle de ceux qui font métier d'en parler. »

Pourtant, si ces rencontres ne lui apportèrent pas ce qu'il recherchait, elles le menèrent tout de même plus loin. Ainsi, il fit la connaissance d'un certain nombre de disciples du franc-maçon chrétien Kerning, fondateur à Stuttgart, au début du XIXe siècle, d'un institut de formation spirituelle, parmi lesquels se trouvait une « vieille connaissance » de Rudolf Steiner, Friedrich Eckstein.

Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) , fils d'un directeur d'usine et protecteur des artistes viennois en mal d'argent, passait pour un touche-à-tout de génie. Ce grand voyageur était aussi à l'aise dans les sciences qu'en philosophie ou dans les arts, et il aimait la musique par-dessus tout. Jules Sauerwein se rappelle de lui comme d'un homme d'une « intelligence universelle » qui lui donna de précieuses clartés sur la vie intérieure, notamment sur les liens entre le corps éthérique et la pensée. Tout ce que Vienne comptait d'artistes, de musiciens et de scientifiques de renom se réunissait autour de la table qu'occupait Eckstein depuis le matin jusqu'au soir au « Café Impérial » . En 1887, alors qu'il n'avait que 25 ans, Helena Blavatsky, qui avait cru reconnaître en lui un « initié » , le nomma responsable de la branche viennoise de la Société théosophique. Mais, à l'époque où Jules Sauerwein fit sa connaissance, il s'était éloigné depuis longtemps de la théosophie, invoquant, d'après Rudolf Steiner, une vieille tradition de l'ésotérisme selon laquelle il ne faut pas « répandre la connaissance ésotérique comme on répand la connaissance ordinaire » .

On ne dira jamais assez l'importance d'Eckstein dans la vie du jeune Steiner (précisons que tous deux avaient le même âge) .

Steiner avait écrit à son ancien ami à la fin du mois de novembre 1890 :

« Il y a dans ma vie 2 événements que je considère comme les plus importants de mon existence. Ils sont si importants que je ne serais pas le même homme s'ils ne s'étaient pas produits. Je ne puis parler du 1er ; quant au second, il s'agit du fait que je vous aie rencontré. »

Friedrich Eckstein aurait dit à Sauerwein :

« L'homme qu'il vous faut connaître, c'est Rudolf Steiner. C'est mon ami intime. Je l'ai connu ici quand il était précepteur dans une famille. C'est plus et mieux qu'un théosophe. Je crois qu'il a travaillé sur lui-même avec des résultats assez étonnants. »

Certains indices laissent d'ailleurs supposer que la Ire rencontre entre Sauerwein et Steiner a été arrangée par Eckstein en personne. Il avait, en effet, assisté à l'une des conférences viennoises de Rudolf Steiner, et il se pourrait bien qu'il ait présenté personnellement Sauerwein à Steiner.

Alice Sauerwein a décrit, en 1928, cette Ire rencontre entre son frère et Rudolf Steiner :

« C'était à Vienne, il y a près de 25 ans, un soir, à la porte d'une salle de conférences, un tout jeune homme abordait Rudolf Steiner et lui demandait la permission d'entrer avec lui et de l'entendre parler. Ce fut le début d'une profonde et respectueuse amitié. »

On était en février 1907, le 22 très exactement. Steiner donnait à Vienne une conférence sur « l'ésotérisme chrétien et rosicrucien et le " Graal " » dans le cadre d'une tournée de conférences à travers l'Autriche-Hongrie. Et, ce soir-là, le jeune Sauerwein (peut-être était-il accompagné d'Eckstein) retint le conférencier à la porte de la salle pour le prier de bien vouloir le laisser entrer, la conférence étant réservée aux membres de la Société théosophique dont il ne faisait pas encore partie à l'époque. Et ce à quoi il eut alors l'occasion d'assister resta à jamais gravé dans sa mémoire.

Souvenirs de Jules Sauerwein

Rudolf Steiner : Un coup d'mil sur l'au-delà

(Cahiers trimestriels de l'Anthroposophie, décembre 1928.)

J'aborde ici l'histoire de mes relations avec le personnage le plus étrange, le plus séduisant, le plus admirable à beaucoup d'égards, que j'aie connu dans mon existence. Les autres, hommes d'État, chefs militaires, voire même souverains, font, sauf exceptions rares, assez petite figure quand on les regarde dans le recul du passé. Rudolf Steiner, au contraire, est un être derrière lequel tout un monde inconnu et formidable s'étend à l'infini, comme un décor qui prolonge la scène où évolue un personnage, mais un décor qui serait de la réalité. Quand je le revois sortant de la Ire conférence où je l'entendis, à Vienne, en 1906, quand je l'évoque descendant à petits pas la colline de Dornach, où s'élevait son école anthroposophique, il me semble qu'à travers lui une fenêtre s'est ouverte pour mon regard vers des univers insoupçonnés.

J'avais de tout temps dans mon existence étudié avec passion la théosophie. J'avais été membre de plusieurs sociétés secrètes et je dois dire que j'avais eu des motifs de concevoir quelques doutes, non point sur « l'existence des mondes invisibles, mais sur la valeur » morale et intellectuelle de ceux qui font métier d'en parler. Je vivais à Vienne, depuis environ 1 an, d'une existence qui se partageait entre l'étude de la banque et le secrétariat de l'ambassadeur de France, avec, comme récréation, un peu de bonne musique de temps à autre, et j'avais plutôt tendance, à cette époque, à considérer avec quelque scepticisme « les voyants et les guides spirituels » .

Je trouvai à Vienne, heureusement, un homme qu'aujourd'hui encore, je considère comme un grand ami et un puissant esprit et qui, en m'expliquant les travaux étonnants des disciples de Kerning, prononça pour la Ire fois le nom de Rudolf Steiner. Cet homme qui vit encore à l'heure où j'écris ces pages, se nommait Maxim (Friedrich) Eckstein.

Comme les disciples de Kerning et comme tout bon Viennois, il avait lui aussi son café attitré. Chaque jour, avant et après le dîner, on le voyait au « Café Impérial » dégustant son « mélange » et dissertant paisiblement au milieu de ses amis. Son intelligence était universelle. Mais à côté de cela, il était réellement savant. Il avait fait des études de chimie très poussées. Sur l'histoire de l'art, il était imbattable. La musique, il la connaissait dans sa technique comme il en jouissait dans son esprit, et il s'honorait d'avoir aimé et compris Anton Bruckner, le fameux Symphoniste viennois, à une époque où il était à peu près seul à posséder ce privilège.

Eckstein me donna sur la vie intérieure quelques clartés qui, à 23 ans de distance, me demeurent encore aujourd'hui aussi précieuses. C'est lui qui m'apprit, par exemple, que pour équilibrer le corps éthérique, il faut en arriver à répandre la conscience dans des parties correspondantes aux parties les plus diverses du corps physique. À l'état normal, nous pensons dans notre tête, nous ressentons nos émotions et nos impulsions dans les régions du cœur et du grand sympathique et, dans le reste du corps, nous connaissons simplement les perceptions sensorielles ou motrices. Eckstein m'enseigna, ce que je n'avais pas vu dans la théosophie, que pour prendre conscience du véhicule supérieur au corps physique, c'est-à-dire le corps éthérique, il fallait s'habituer à penser partout, c'est-à-dire à répandre dans notre organisme visible et invisible une activité spirituelle consciente, par le moyen des courants qui circulent dans le corps éthérique.

Il était très modeste. Il me disait qu'il savait très peu et qu'il tenait ce peu de science d'un disciple de Kerning (un certain W...) qu'il avait connu à Stuttgart, et il concluait :

« L'homme qu'il vous faut connaître, c'est Rudolf Steiner. C'est mon ami intime. Je l'ai connu ici quand il était précepteur dans une famille. C'est plus et mieux qu'un théosophe. Je crois qu'il a travaillé sur lui-même avec des résultats assez étonnants. »

Enfin, ce jour arriva. Steiner vint faire une conférence à Vienne.

À l'heure qu'il est, des milliers de gens ont entendu parler de Rudolf Steiner, de son fameux « Goetheanum » , l'édifice qu'il avait construit près de Bâle, qui fut brûlé dans la nuit de la Saint-Sylvestre, en 1922, et de sa mort inattendue au moment où s'élevait un nouveau bâtiment, tout différent de l'ancien. Il a été et sera l'un des hommes les plus discutés de notre temps.

Ce qu'il a écrit subsiste : une trentaine de grands ouvrages et plusieurs centaines de conférences sur les sujets les plus sublimes et les plus variés. Mais si beaucoup sont à même d'admirer ou d'attaquer ces écrits, peu de gens l'ont connu pendant aussi longtemps et dans des circonstances aussi intimes que le destin m'en a donné le privilège.

Périodiquement, même pendant la guerre, j'ai vu ce grand penseur. J'ai recueilli ses conseils, ses vues sur le monde et sur la politique et j'ai été, en quelque sorte, le témoin de ses activités les plus mystérieuses.

La 1re fois que l'on entendait Steiner, on avait un certain sentiment d'angoisse. Il était clair qu'il ne préparait jamais une conférence dans le sens ordinaire du mot préparation. Il méditait sur un thème. Il se le faisait, suivant son expression : « passer devant l'esprit ». Il entassait ainsi en lui-même une sorte de réserve d'images et d'intuitions dans lesquelles il pouvait aller puiser au fur et à mesure de son discours. Mais ce champ où il avait ainsi semé le fruit de ses perceptions spirituelles, il le fécondait par le Verbe. Sa parole rythmée, sonore, avec des résonances d'incantations, avait une sorte de vertu mystique qui faisait surgir vers lui des profondeurs de sa conscience les visions qu'il dépeignait ensuite avec une incroyable vigueur et avec des couleurs inconnues avant lui. Il était au point de croisement où l'artiste et le penseur se rejoignent dans la connaissance de l'au-delà.

Sa jeunesse s'était passée dans les archives de Goethe, à Weimar, dans la fréquentation de Nietzsche et de Häckel ; c'est-à-dire qu'il avait connu, lui, né d'une humble famille à la frontière austro-hongroise, les génies allemands les plus hauts, soit personnellement, soit par la pénétration intime de leurs œuvres. On s'en apercevait quand il causait ou écrivait. Mais quand il parlait, il s'élevait à un degré où l'on ne peut plus se référer aux œuvres des autres, si grands soient-ils. Il prenait en quelque sorte, dans son étreinte, les réalités supra-sensibles, pour les célébrer dans une sorte de cantique lyrique d'où l'analyse lucide ne disparaît pourtant jamais.

Dans son cabinet de travail de Dornach, il me montrait un jour un immense groupe en bois sculpté dû à son ciseau. Au centre, le Christ, mais non point le Christ de la légende. C'était un Christ beau comme Apollon, au visage imberbe, avec, dans la partie gauche du front, un développement anormal suivant des lignes rayonnantes qui partaient des yeux. De la main droite, levée vers le ciel, il domptait Lucifer, une immense et radieuse figure à la chevelure bouillonnante, au visage exalté. De la main gauche, il aidait à sortir d'une sorte de caverne souterraine, l'autre grand révolté, Ahriman, une entité aux membres noueux, aux mains sclérotiques, avec le visage pétrifié dans la ruse que l'on attribue à Méphistophélès. En me montrant cette œuvre, Steiner me disait :

« Voilà le Christ tel que je le vois en Palestine. »

En face du groupe, il y avait une sorte de bas-relief hallucinant. Dans le royaume d'Ahriman, tout tissé de gigantesques toiles d'araignées, des âmes humaines symbolisées par des figures drapées, s'avançaient courageusement vers le personnage épouvantable d'où partaient tous les fils et d'où sortaient des espèces d'arêtes rocheuses qui donnaient au paysage un aspect de cauchemar. Ici encore, Steiner me disait :

« Voici Ahriman tel que je le vois. »

Il était impossible de le prendre pour un simple halluciné. La magnifique ordonnance de son système, l'absolue lucidité de ses propos et surtout l'immense bonté qui s'exprimait dans chacune de ses actions, repoussaient bien loin toute idée soit de supercherie, soit de déséquilibre. Il n'avait rien non plus qui rappelât les transes des sibylles ou des prophètes de l'ancien temps. Il demeurait toujours conscient et intégralement Maître de tous ses moyens. Seulement, quand on était admis à toutes ses réunions, il apparaissait successivement comme à différents étages de grandeur spirituelle. Dans ses conférences publiques, il était éloquent et inspiré. Dans ses conférences plus intimes, il mêlait son discours d'incantations en langage semi-poétique qui touchaient l'âme des auditeurs par la puissance de leur sonorité et de leur rythme. Dans les cérémonies, il mettait en œuvre des rites connus de lui seul et ses invocations aux 4 Archanges-Régentes demeurent dans ma mémoire comme les plus grandes émotions, à la fois religieuses et artistiques, que j'aie ressenties dans mon existence.

Le 1er « Gøtheanum » , celui qui fut brûlé, était en quelque sorte l'incarnation de tout son enseignement sous des formes architecturales. L'édifice était abrité sous 2 coupes ; l'une plus grande que l'autre. La plus petite couvrait la scène ; la plus grande, la salle. Sous la 1re, 12 colonnes, sculptées dans des bois soigneusement choisis, étaient rangées en demi-cercle, représentant les 12 signes du zodiaque, symbole de la permanence dans les lois cosmiques. Sous la plus grande, 2 séries de 7 colonnes descendaient le long des gradins d'un amphithéâtre, chacune portant dans ses chapiteaux et dans ses soubassements, des ornements qui représentaient les 7 périodes successives de notre évolution. D'un côté, tout parlait de l'espace ; de l'autre, chaque détail disait le perfectionnement progressif des choses à travers le temps.

Il m'est arrivé, dans cette salle, d'une beauté si écrasante, de traduire 10 conférences au fur et à mesure que Steiner parlait. Généralement, il se laissait aller à son inspiration pendant 10 ou 15 minutes, tandis qu'assis derrière lui, à une petite table, je prenais des notes natives pour fixer dans mon souvenir le torrent de ses pensées. Quand il avait fini, c'était à moi de m'avancer et d'essayer, avec une peine indicible et une insuffisance dont je rougissais, de traduire ses magnifiques périodes dans un français abstrait et sec. Mais je sentais qu'il m'aidait de toutes ses forces. C'était comme si j'avais eu derrière moi un foyer qui empêchait mon esprit de se paralyser et qui me vivifiait au moment où j'allais perdre courage. Il me donnait bien, avant la conférence, un petit résumé écrit, mais emporté par sa propre puissance, il ne le suivait jamais.

Ce sont là des impressions inoubliables.

3 ans plus tard, Steiner mourait. J'ai toujours pensé qu'il mourut avec la claire vision que des difficultés insurmontables s'opposaient à une œuvre comme la sienne.

Il reste de Steiner son œuvre gigantesque et des enseignements compatibles avec la civilisation occidentale, qui sont les plus précis qui aient été donnés sur notre continent à ceux qui veulent entreprendre le travail périlleux d'affronter les problèmes que la nature nous a cachés, il a fécondé des branches très variées de l'activité humaine qui ont été profondément baignées de spiritualité grâce à sa doctrine, et qui, sous le nom de « sections » persistent encore avec une vigueur remarquable au moment où j'écris.

Des disciplines ont été créées dans les branches les plus diverses et les hommes, désireux de trouver dans les sciences ou dans l'art un chemin pour la connaissance spirituelle, ont ainsi des voies particulières à leur choix et conformément à la personnalité de chacun d'entre eux.

...

In Vienna, in the 1880's, Rudolf Steiner developed contacts with various literary, progressive, and mystical groups. The circle of the feminist and Theosophist Marie Lang, for instance, which attracted artists, literati, and social reformers, also took in Steiner. It was here that Steiner first met Franz Hartmann, who had introduced Lang to Theosophy. Vienna also contained the mystical circle around Friedrich Eckstein, whose knowledge of ancient esoteric texts Steiner found impressive but whose insistence on keeping his knowledge secret Steiner found repellent.

Rudolf Steiner :

« At the home of Rosa Mayreder, I was often privileged to share in conversations for which gifted men gathered there. Very quiet, seemingly with his gaze inward upon himself rather than listening to those about him, sat Hugo Wolf, who was an intimate friend of Rosa Mayreder. One listened inwardly to him even though he spoke so little. For whatever entered into his life was communicated in mysterious fashion to those who might be with him. With heartfelt affection was I attached to the husband of " Frau " Rosa, Karl Mayreder, so fine a person both as man and as artist, and also to his brother, Julius Mayreder, so enthusiastic in regard to art. Marie Lang and her circle and Friedrich Eckstein, who was then wholly given over to the spiritual tendencies and world-conception of theosophy, were often present. This was the time when my " Philosophy of Freedom " was taking more and more definite form in my mind. Rosa Mayreder is the person with whom I talked most concerning this form at the time when my book was, thus, coming into existence. She relieved me of a part of the inner-loneliness in which I had lived. She was striving for a conception of the actual human personality ; I toward a revelation of the world which might seek for this personality at the basis of the soul by means of spiritual eyes, thus, opened. Between the two, there were many bridges. Often, in later life, there has arisen before my grateful spirit one or another picture from this experience, for example, memory pictures of a walk through the noble Alpine forests, during which Rosa Mayreder and I discussed the true meaning of human freedom. »

...

If we look at Rudolf Steiner's life during his time in Vienna, we find him, on the one hand, engaged in serious natural-scientific studies ; he visits Edmund Reitlinger's laboratory amongst others. On the other hand, he still sees Karl Julius Schröder, whose life's breath is art. Thirdly, he is acquainted with the pessimistic young poetess, Marie Eugénie delle Grazie. In her circle, to which belonged many theology professors, there reigned a deep respect and reverence for the spirit of the Middle-Ages, and a strong dislike of Goethe. These different and various relationships provide him with the experience of how science, art and religion have become separated from the living source of the spirit and of how, when unable to attain to a real experience of the spirit, they are eventually forced to give themselves over to forces that lead to one-sidedness and final isolation. We may assume that, already at that time, out of his conscious life in the spiritual world, the necessity of uniting science, art and religion presented itself to Rudolf Steiner with particular clarity. In particular, too, that more conscious seeking after the spirit which he met in the Vienna theosophists grouped around Marie Lang remained alien to him because of her unclear, mystical frame of mind. This, however, did not affect his warm friendship with Rosa Mayreder in this circle. He was looking for « a meeting with the spirit by means of ideas illumined by the spirit ». So, it is also understandable that Alfred Percy Sinnett's « Esoteric Buddhism », the 1st theosophical work to come into Rudolf Steiner's possession through a friend, made a repugnant impression on him. It was only in Friedrich Eckstein that he 1st met a great scholar of Classical occultism and of the Cabbala.

His experience of these diverse spiritual streams of the past, all of which wished to continue to play a leading role, was transformed for him into occult experiences, and he devotes the whole of Chapter XI of his « Autobiography » to a description of them.

He says there :

« Towards the end of the 1st chapter of my life, I felt an inner-need to attain clarity concerning certain orientations of the human soul. One of these orientations was mysticism. I found it difficult to gain any relation to mysticism as it appeared in the various epochs of mankind's spiritual development, in “ Oriental wisdom ” (Marie Lang) , “ Neo-Platonism ” (Friedrich Eckstein) , the “ Christianity of the Middle-Ages ” (the circle around Marie Eugenie delle Grazie) and in the strivings of the Cabbalists. »

If one reads this chapter carefully, one can sense quite clearly that Rudolf Steiner only accepted mysticism where it had been able to free itself completely from the forces of Lucifer, which are a constant threat to the mystic ; for, in mysticism, « one has to surrender completely the relation of the human being to the spirit to “ subjective feeling ” ». But it is in the arbitrary nature of the subjective that Lucifer holds sway.

And he continues :

« By looking at this with the eyes of the soul, the forces in me which were in inner-opposition to mysticism became stronger and stronger. »

One can see in this statement how he was wrestling at that time with the 1st Tempter of mankind, which he then also describes :

« It was not so very difficult to confront this “ inner-existential conflict ” with that clarity which finally rises above it. »

In these simple words, Rudolf Steiner confirms his inner-victory over the luciferic forces of temptation.

The year 1888, in which he completed the 1st 7 years of his « Sun » period, was particularly important.

He writes :

« At this period of my life (about 1888) , I felt, on the one hand, impelled to strong spiritual concentration while, on the other hand, I led an extensive social life. »

We see how strongly he felt the polarity of the 2 streams in which he had lived from his early youth, and how the urgent need to unite them and, thereby, complete the Rosicrucian path of initiation for the future became more and more impelling.

He later says of this time :

« Thus, I led an inner-life that had no connection with the external world while, on the other hand, my interests were strongly bound-up with that world. »

But this intensification in his inner-life increased his search even more for forms of thinking suited to the expression of spiritual experiences and to the transformation of thinking in such a way that it could become capable of grasping the spiritual, as had happened with Goethe.

...

Rudolf Steiner's work on Goethe's natural-scientific writings helped him in his growing loneliness. But Goethe's perception of the world was something alien for those around Rudolf Steiner :

« I found no one with whom I could speak about this perception. »

And further :

« The only release I found from the feeling of living in spiritual isolation was reading and re-reading the conversation that took place between Goethe and Schiller, as they went away together from a meeting of the Society for Scientific Research, in Jena. In a few strokes, Goethe sketched for Schiller his “ archetypal plant ”. »

In its sensible-supersensible form this « archetypal plant » , at last, signified the direct bridge to the world of pure Imaginations.

He could now say :

« Goethe's way of looking at things appeared to me to be one in accordance with the spirit. »

Göethe's perception of nature also brought him to recognize that the time had come to start writing about his own spiritual experiences. This is clearly expressed in his « Autobiography » :

« Through the detailed introduction which I had to write for the 2nd volume of Göethe's natural-scientific works, which I was editing, I felt an inner-need to bring my perception of the spiritual world into the form of a presentation visible to thinking. »

He, then, quotes an extract from this introduction on a number of pages where he characterizes the essential nature of man's new relation to the spiritual world, to which he had managed to come at that time :

« The moment thinking takes hold of an idea. It merges with the primordial foundation of existence ; what is effective in the world that surrounds man is experienced within the human spirit ; man “ unites ” with objective reality at its source. “ Man's true communion is his experience of the idea within reality. ” Thinking has the same relationship to ideas as the eye has to light, the ear to sound. “ It is the organ of perception. ” »

These words written by Rudolf Steiner, in 1888, can be seen as the sum of the magnificent struggle for the true nature of thinking which he began at the age of 14. They bear witness to the fact that the battle for a new thinking (a thinking not in contradiction to spiritual experience but, on the contrary, actually opening the door to the spiritual world) , « that » battle is won, and won for the whole of mankind ! This historical fact was the 1st blow against the 2nd enemy of humanity : Ahriman. This was the 1st step in the battle to free human intelligence from his power, the 1st step of human intelligence on its path into the sphere of Michæl. The 2nd 7 year span in the « Sun » period of Rudolf Steiner's life is dedicated to securing this victory, once and for all, and the climax is reached with the appearance of « The Philosophy of Freedom » : the « 1st Michælic book » in the 5th post-Atlantean epoch.

...

In 1889-1890, just before leaving Vienna, Rudolf Steiner spent time with another group of people who would play an important part in his life, up to his departure for Weimar. This group met for spiritually inspiring conversations at the house of the theosophist Marie Lang. It included prominent and spiritually open-minded people such as Friedrich Eckstein, an expert in ancient occult knowledge who was personally acquainted with Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, the founder of the Theosophical Society. Eckstein was just 10 days younger than Rudolf Steiner. Their very dissimilar paths did not cross for the first time at Marie Lang's house. Eckstein grew-up in Perchtoldsdorf, near Brunn, the son of a wealthy factory-owner. In Vienna, he was widely known as a worldly and financially independent genius. He was at home among the upper-classes, highly-educated in philosophy and well-versed in the natural sciences. He discussed specialized issues (the time-space problem, for instance, that occupied Rudolf Steiner so deeply) with eminent scholars such as the mathematician Oskar Simony or the physicist Ernst Mach.

Eckstein was a knowledgeable patron of modern art. He had studied with composer Anton Bruckner, acting as his private secretary for a period of time and, later, made friends with the writers Hugo von Hoffmannsthal, Karl Kraus, and Hermann Bahr and, also, with Sigmund Freud. Rudolf Steiner met Eckstein frequently in Eckstein's « haunt », « Café Griensteidl » and, later, at the Hotel Imperial, often joining him at his table. After Eckstein had called on Helena Petrovna Blavatsky in Oostende, toward the end of 1886, talking with her over several days, she made him President of the Vienna-branch of the Theosophical Society. Rudolf Steiner consulted him for more information about the spiritual stream represented by Blavatsky. That Eckstein possessed an impressive knowledge of esotericism and occult traditions was known to Rudolf Steiner from earlier encounters in the circle around Karl Julius Schröer, where they had discussed the symbolism and esotericism in the works of G ethe. Friedrich Eckstein, in turn, was interested in Steiner's book on G ethe's « Theory of Knowledge » and his introductions to G ethe's scientific writings, which were discussed in various artistic and intellectual circles in Vienna. (« What was created there had been unknown before : an amazing picture of G ethe's view of the world. » - Fritz Lemmermayer)

Now, in Steiner's final year in Vienna, they met regularly as part of the circle around the sophisticated theosophist and later suffragette Marie Lang with whom Friedrich Eckstein had been in contact since 1887. In his « Autobiography », Rudolf Steiner wrote about these gatherings :

« The hours I was privileged to spend in the home of this lady, Marie Lang, were extremely valuable to me. Marie Lang's earnest view and feeling for life was expressed with nobility and beauty in her words. In melodious, impressive language, she expressed very deep soul experiences. A life of difficult inner-struggles with herself and with the world could find resolution (though incomplete) only through mystical seeking. Thus, it was only natural that she was the soul of a group of seekers.

Theosophy, inaugurated by Helena Petrovna Blavatsky at the end of the 19th Century, had penetrated this group. Franz Hartmann, who had become widely known for his many theosophical works and his relationship to Helena Petrovna Blavatsky, had also brought his theosophy into this group. Marie Lang was largely accepting of this. The meaning she found in it seemed to match her soul quality in many ways. Yet, what she received in this sense came only from outside. Within herself, she had a store of mystical knowledge that life's difficult trials had made conscious in a completely elemental way. The architects, writers, and others I met at Marie Lang's could hardly have been interested in the theosophy of Franz Hartmann if Marie Lang, herself, had not participated in it. And I certainly would not have become interested. The whole attitude to the spiritual world presented in the writings of Franz Hartmann was in direct opposition to my own. I could not credit it with inner-truthfulness. I was less interested in its content than in how it affected those who were, after all, truly seeking souls. »

Rudolf Steiner had long been attracted to such « seeking souls » in Vienna. His very 1st friends in the city, the group around Emil Sch onaich, Rudolf Ronsperger and Moriz Zitter, were without doubt such seekers. Ever since he had come to Vienna, in 1879, he had observed, with deep interest, how many yearning and spiritually sensitive people went on pilgrimages to Richard Wagner, in Bayreuth, or looked for other forms of new spiritual inspiration (theosophy with its Eastern orientation being one of them) because the prevailing culture and scientific thinking could no longer offer answers to the spiritual concerns, questions, and impulses they had, even if they were not always aware of them or willing to admit them. Looking back to the years in Vienna, Rudolf Steiner said, in 1923 :

« It was indeed interesting how spiritual life, spiritual activity, the yearning for a spiritual world began to find its way into European civilization. You have to bear in mind that this was much more difficult in the late-1880's than it is today. Even if it was less harmful, it was nevertheless more difficult to admit that one believed in a spiritual world since there was evidence of the ... »

...

Rudolf Steiner's former « mentor » and now friend, Professor Karl Julius Schröer, had initially encouraged his interest in Gœthe and, perhaps, importantly to Gœthe's esoteric symbolism, now, also, introduced him to Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) and, thus, ultimately, to many others within the Lang circle. Notably, Friedrich Eckstein mediated between the 2 worlds in which Rudolf lived, the outer-world, the cultural circles of Vienna ; and, the inner-world of Felix and the « Master » . One of the most knowledgeable men of his age, Eckstein was a chemist, industrialist, music-lover, alpinist and traveller ; also, he had a profound knowledge of traditional occultism. It was to him that Steiner could go if he wanted any exposition of occult (hidden) facts :

« Steiner was in complete harmony with Gœthe's way of looking at nature, but it was Eckstein who could explain to him the symbolism and occult (hidden) terminology in the poet's writings. »

And, as Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke says :

« Steiner had read Sinnett's " Esoteric Buddhism " , soon after its German translation (1884) , and asked Eckstein to explain the secret doctrine. In due course, Eckstein introduced Steiner to Rosa Mayreder and the theosophical circle of Edmund and Marie Lang. Steiner perceptively described them as " homeless souls from Wagnerland " but, nonetheless, however, empathized with the subjective pietism of Marie Lang and remained the life-long friend of Eckstein, who had shown him the occult key to Gœthe's symbolism. Under the influence of the circle, Steiner studied Oriental thought, Medieval mysticism, neo-Platonism and the Cabala. By the time Steiner left Vienna, in 1890, to take-up his post as editor of Gœthe's scientific works, in Weimar, his interest in both theosophy and German idealism was firmly established. »

Although Eckstein out-lived Steiner, it is clear from his autobiography that Rudolf Steiner never unveiled to him the insights, which he had already gained.

...

Because of the way it mingled material and spiritual realities, as well as other obvious shortcomings, the theosophy of Franz Hartmann had not convinced Rudolf Steiner when he came across it, in Vienna, in the circle around Marie Lang and Friedrich Eckstein. (« He simply declared it to be spiritually feeble. ») Yet, Rudolf Steiner had, at the time, appreciated Marie Lang's and Friedrich Eckstein's obvious spirituality - as he had the circle of truly seeking individuals who gathered around Marie Lang. Toward the end of his time in Vienna, he read the 1st theosophical books (Mabel Collins' « Light on the Path » and Alfred Percy Sinnett's much discussed « Esoteric Buddhism ») , but he probably did not go much further than that. (« I met various theosophists but nothing in what they had to say induced me to develop an interest in the kind of writings propagated by this Theosophical Society. »)

Rudolf Steiner stayed in touch with Eckstein and Lang after leaving Vienna ; he also read new theosophical publications while he was in Weimar, writing critical reviews in which he dealt with the, then, controversial phenomena of hypnosis and spiritism (they were for him as justified as they were problematic) as well as the dangers of taking on without reflection the Eastern spirituality favoured in theosophical circles. In a book review of 1892, he wrote that he did indeed think highly of the « intuitive Eastern wisdom » and its imagery. (« It is characteristic of the Eastern spiritual life that it creates images that express in the most detailed and pictorial way the great thoughts of humanity. ») At the same time, he spoke of the (entirely different) role that fell to Central Europe that consisted in the conscious taking hold of the « I ». This task could not be by-passed by borrowing from ancient Eastern wisdom or by making recourse to « spiritistic suggestions » . (« In basing their doctrine on the suggestions of a consciousness that is detached from the “ I ”, the spiritists are mocking science, because science can only rest on judgments formed by the “ I ”. By adopting views suggested to them from outside, they place themselves on the same level with those who believe in Revelation. It shows the dullness and cowardice of today's rationality that people often seek to gain knowledge of the world without thinking. ») In Berlin (3 years before he gave his 1st lectures at the Brockdorff's house) Rudolf Steiner occupied himself again with the theosophist Franz Hartmann, who enjoyed great popularity in Germany and Austria. When Hartmann founded the « International Theosophical Brotherhood » and published a German translation of the « Bhagavad-Gita » , Rudolf Steiner wrote in 1897 (in his « Magazin für Litteratur ») that the theosophists failed to recognize the responsibility of Central Europe for the advancement of knowledge and referred to the followers of Hartmann as ignorant and arrogant :

« They shrug their shoulders at the European approach to science, deriding its reliance on reason and insisting that the truth can only be found on the Oriental path. Nothing but empty phrases borrowed from Eastern writings without a trace of substance. Their inner-experiences are mere hypocrisy. Adopting phrases from writings that in themselves constitute profound literature, and using them to declare the entire Western striving for knowledge to be worthless, is nothing short of impertinent. The Theosophists know nothing of the depth and inwardness that pertains to the Western approach to science and, yet, they reject it as superficial and purely conceptual.

Their talk of highest-knowledge (which they do not possess) and their mystifying way of citing foreign knowledge without comprehension nonetheless seems to mesmerize a number of people today. The Theosophical Society is spread all over Europe and has followers in all the major cities. Their opaque ramblings about experiencing the divine within seem to attract many more people than the clear, bright, conceptual knowledge of the West. »

Rudolf Steiner et Anton Bruckner

« They had the audience in their control. In the Vienna hall, Bruckner's 4th Symphony was presented in 1887. I attended a concert by Franz Schalk. That was the 1st performance of Bruckner's Symphony. »

(Doctor Eduard Steiner)

In « Bruckner Propositions III » , Constantin Floros writes :

« In the 1920's especially, Bruckner was celebrated as a mystic “ par excellence ” as a composer whose work could be grasped from the standpoint of the mystical experience behind it. He was claimed by anthroposophists and theosophists as one of their own. »

...

Rudolf Steiner's teachings arose-out of his personal and clairvoyant research into the world of spirit. In his early (1906) lecture series « Concerning Music » , the effect of music upon man was discussed. Steiner explained that the individuality of a musician unites in a « karmic » way with the physical characteristics of his heredity. Steiner's most important lectures on music came in 1923. They included « The Experience of Tone in the Human Being » and « The World of the Hierarchies and the World of the Tones » as well as the seminal course, « The Arts and Their Mission » .

Throughout his life, Steiner held Anton Bruckner in high-esteem. This inspired Erich Schwebach to write a book entitled « Anton Bruckner. Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis von Entwicklungen in der Musik » (Anton Bruckner : A Contribution to the Perception of Developments in Music) . In 1922, Schwebach lectured on « Bruckner's Musical Mission » at Steiner's Nest-East Congress, in Vienna. Both here and in his book, he considers the significant part which the zodiac plays in the scheme of things :

« ... The keys in music represent space in soul and spirit, and, depending on the key, experiences can differ. They (keys) determine in a way the constellation of a theme in a Symphony, the law by which it enters in, and assert their will, just as the constellations of the zodiac determine the rhythm of 12 months of the year, each with its special nature and its special effect upon the human soul. »

...

Rudolf Steiner (1861-1925) enrolled for Bruckner's lectures on the theory of harmony at the University of Vienna in the winter semester of 1879 and the summer semester of 1880. He became a philosopher, teacher, seer and investigator of the spiritual world, which was as real to him as the material world. Steiner was the founder of anthroposophy, or spiritual science. It involves such subjects as the nature of the human being, reincarnation and karma, esoteric Christianity, education, curative education, medicine, biodynamic farming and much more. Steiner would refer to many scientists, philosophers, writers, and occasionally composers when speaking of art and music. Beethoven, Schubert, Wagner and Bruckner were mentioned as representing a bridge to the world of Spirit.

An understanding of what Steiner had to say can only really be gleaned from his lectures and books, particularly « The Inner Nature of Music and the Experience of Tone » . According to his biographer Günther Wachsmuth, he called attention to the idea that, at early stages in the evolution of humanity, « the musical experience blended with a religious experience » . Then, there was still a consciousness that the action of the Godhead was expressed in the intervals of the 7th, the 5th, the 3rd. Man still shared in the experience of the « cosmic sound of jubilation of the gods » and the « cosmic mourning of the gods » . But, in the last few Centuries, the human being has more and more lost this experience and is for that reason in danger of becoming unproductive in music.

In the lecture cycle « True and False Paths in Spiritual Investigation » , Steiner speaks of Bruckner's music :

« The Christ Impulse can be found in music. And the dissolution of the Symphonic into near-dissonance, as in Beethoven, can be redeemed by a return to the dominion of the cosmic in music. Bruckner attempted this within the narrow limits of a traditional framework. But his posthumous symphony (i.e. , the 9th) shows that he could not escape these limitations. »

It is emphasized that he is not criticizing Bruckner's music « per se » ; he considered that Bruckner came near to realizing the spiritual in music.

...

Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, and Anton Bruckner became subjects for discussion at many cultural gatherings. Fritz Lemmermayer, who had the necessary connections, even went to Bayreuth to attend the dress rehearsal of Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » . But people were also moved by Bruckner's Masses, performed on Sunday mornings in the Chapel of the Imperial Palace (« Hofburgkapelle ») , with the composer himself playing the organ. Rudolf Steiner had several conversations with Anton Bruckner. He took an intense interest in the visual arts (the paintings of Arnold Böcklin, for instance, touched him deeply) and with the basic questions of æsthetics he had addressed in the final Chapter of Gœthe's Theory of Knowledge (« Knowledge and Artistic Creation ») . He made an impression on his audience when he developed his thoughts on this theme in a public lecture, on November 9th, 1888, given to the Vienna Gœthe Society, at the invitation of Karl Julius Schröer.

...

Vienna, 4 years after the fall of the multi-national Empire : the former capital city and residence of the Habsburg Monarchy was in chaotic confusion, having lost its identity, and loudly screaming its desperation ! There was the misery of refugees, corruption of officials, poverty and beggars at every street-corner. The monetary standard suffered ceaseless devaluation : 1,000 « Kronen » bill and, in exchange for it, barely more than a meager breakfast ! 10 times that amount, and it was not even enough for a Theater ticket ; 50 times that, and it was just enough for paltry lodgings in an inn !

On the streets of the inner-city, past the Palaces of the aristocracy where the patrons of Beethoven had resided, in whose magnificent halls Mozart had given concerts - there, the young Rudolf Steiner, too, had walked at one time. He had strolled along the Belvedere to the « Technische Hochschule » (the Technical College) ; had walked-down the « Ringstraße » to the University to listen to a music conference given by professor Anton Bruckner ; or had stood at the « Hohe Markt » on his way to the nearby apartment of Karl Julius Schröer.

It was 33 years since he had left Austria to move 1st to Weimar and, then, to Berlin, until he finally established the last center of his international activity in Western Switzerland, in an area where 3 countries meet. Now, 33 years later, he was returning to Vienna with his world-wide and growing spiritual movement. The famous building of the « Musikverein » , with all its side-rooms, meeting-halls, study-rooms, and all its personnel had been put at his disposal for 2 weeks.

There, in the largest building of this musical city, this city whose music and lyric art had united nations, there a festive, joyful Whitsun mood ruled the meeting entitled « For the Comprehension of Western and Eastern World Contrasts » . How to build the bridge between West and East out of the new spirituality, the bridge destroyed by the past's lack of spirit - this was what the 2,000 listeners were to focus on for 12 days ! 12 days of Pentecostal contemplation !

The beauty of Providence appeared to have chosen Vienna as the city for the 2nd Congress of the Anthroposophical Movement. During these spring days, the genius of this locality seemed to harmonize with the blessings of the spirit of Whitsuntide. A multi-national union of musical artists had reigned in Vienna for Centuries, mysteriously called there by fate. The creative beauty of sounds reconciled the geniuses of all nations, for the language of music is common to all people. It defies all borders. It requires no rights of translation. It represents the universal bridge over the chasm torn open by materialism and agnosticism.

The faces of those who sit in a concert-hall often appear up-lifted as if by an inner-light. There is no colour to look at with their eyes ; there is nothing tangible to touch with their hands. There is no taste to titillate their palates ; there is no smell to tempt their noses. Yet, they sit devoutly without stirring, as if involved in a preliminary, spirit-training exercise of concentration. Concert-halls, where the Classic-Romantic art of music found its domicile, could become sites for new temples through the benevolence of spiritual geniuses, temples where people can receive a premonition of their inner-soul being, though still immersed, dream-like, in the starry night's kingdom of rhythms with which the soul harmonizes in sleep.

In the course of the past Centuries, had not Vienna been to the development of music what Athens had once been to the creation of sculpture and architecture ? Both cities : seed-beds for gifted geniuses ! Yet, just as Plato and Aristotle appeared only after the arts had come into full-flower, so it was only after Bruckner's great accomplishments that the young Steiner left Austria, for the end of the Classical and Romantic epoch of music coincided with the beginning of the Michæl age, which led to the birth of anthroposophy.

...

With reference to this lecture (« Gæthe the as the Father of a New Æsthetics ») , Rudolf Steiner wrote in his « Autobiography » :

« I wanted to discover what was preventing the idealism so urgently conveyed in the philosophies of Fichte and Hegel from understanding living spirit. In my search for the cause, I reflected on the errors of the purely idealistic philosophy of æsthetics. The opinion of Hegel and the Hegelians was that the meaning of art is found in the ideas presented to the senses ; in other words, embodied in a physical medium, an idea manifests as beauty. But the age following that of idealism no longer wished to acknowledge the reality of ideas. Because the idea, as it lived in idealistic philosophy, could not point to a spiritual world, the succeeding age was unable to maintain the intrinsic reality of ideas. This led to a “ realistic ” æsthetic that, in terms of art, was unconcerned with the idea embodied by physical form ; it concerned itself only with the physical image itself, which, because of the needs of human nature, assumed an unreal form in art. In my view, the sensory aspect should be the important aspect in a work of art. Nevertheless, I recognized that the path of the true artist is a path to the true spirit. One begins with what is physically perceptible but, then, transforms it. And what guides the artist is not a mere subjective impulse ; rather one tries to impart to the senses a form that appears as though the spirit itself were visible. I told myself that beauty is not an idea that is given sensory form, but a presentation to the senses in the form of spirit. Consequently, I viewed art as a way of placing the spirit realm into the sensory realm. A true artist affirms the spirit more or less unconsciously. I told myself repeatedly that it is necessary only to transform the soul forces (with which the artist works upon physical materials) into extra-sensory, purely spiritual perception, so that one may penetrate real knowledge of the spiritual world. »

...

What has been the musical evolution of the human being ? It begins with the experience of the spiritual, the actual presence of the spiritual in tone, in the musical tone structure. The spiritual fades away ; the human being retains the tone structure. Later, he links it with the word, which is a remnant of the spiritual ; and what he had earlier as imaginations, namely, the instruments, he fashions here in the physical world out of physical substance as his musical instruments. To the extent that they arouse the musical mood, the instruments are all derived from the spiritual world. When he built physical musical instruments, the human being simply filled the empty spaces that remained after he no longer beheld the spiritual. Into those spaces, he put the physical instruments.

It is correct to say that in music, more than anywhere else, one can see how the transition to the materialistic age proceeds. In the place where musical instruments resound today, spiritual entities stood formerly. They are gone, they have disappeared from the ancient clairvoyance. If the human being wishes to take objective hold of the musical element, however, he needs something that does not exist in outer nature. Outer nature offers him no equivalent to the musical element ; therefore, he requires musical instruments.

The musical instruments basically are a clear reflection of the fact that music is experienced by the whole human being. The wind instruments prove that the head of the human being experiences music. The string instruments are living proof that music is experienced in the chest, primarily expressed in the arms. All percussion instruments (or those in between string and percussion instruments) are evidence of how the musical element is expressed in the 3rd part of the human being's nature : the limb system. Also, everything connected with the wind instruments has a more intimate relation to the element of melody than that which is connected with the string instruments, which have a relation to the element of harmony. That which is connected with percussion possesses more inner-rhythm and relates to the rhythmic element. An Orchestra is an image of the human being ; it must not include a piano, however. Why is that ? The musical instruments are derived from the spiritual world ; the piano, however, in which the tones are abstractly lined-up next to each other, is created only in the physical world by people. All instruments, like the flute or the violin, originate musically from the higher-world. A piano is like the Philistine who no longer contains within him the higher-human being. The piano is the Philistine instrument. It is fortunate that there is such an instrument, or else, the Philistine would have no music at all. The piano arises-out of a materialistic experience of music. It is, therefore, the instrument that can be used most conveniently to evoke the musical element within the material realm. Pure matter was put to use so that the piano could become an expression of the musical element. Naturally, the piano is a beneficial instrument (otherwise, we would have to rely from the beginning on the spiritual in musical instruction in our materialistic age) but it is the one instrument that actually, in a musical sense, must be overcome. The human being must get-away from the impressions of the piano if he wishes to experience the actual musical element.

It is, therefore, always a great experience when a composition by an artist who basically lives completely in the element of music, such as Anton Bruckner, is played on the piano. In Bruckner's composition, the piano seems to disappear from the room ! One forgets the piano and thinks that one is hearing other instruments ; this is, indeed so, in Bruckner's case. It proves that something of the essentially spiritual, which lies at the basis of all music, still lived in Bruckner, though in a very instinctive way.

...

In the spring of 1923, Rudolf Steiner stayed in Stuttgart several times. On February 27th and 28th, as well as on March 6th and 7th, eurythmy performances took place, and Rudolf Steiner gave an address before each of them. The Domach eurythmists, who were in Stuttgart just at that time, were able to attend both lectures, which were held for Waldorf school teachers and musicians on March 6th and 8th, in « The Inner Nature of Music and the Experience of Tone » . In the lecture on March 8th, he gave 1st the spatial forms for the intervals and stressed that these are all contained in his « standard forms » . In addition, Rudolf Steiner spoke, in the same lecture, about the « spiritual origin of the musical instrument » .

It is to be assumed that he visited the « Eurythmeum » before March 8th, as was his custom on his trips to Stuttgart. (The leadership and management of this Conservatory was incumbent upon Marie Steiner.)

During one of these visits, Hedwig Köhler, who taught tone eurythmy, did a performance with her students of an arrangement of the orchestral movement from the 8th Symphony by Anton Bruckner. After this performance, Rudolf Steiner drew the spatial arrangement for a « eurythmic orchestral » piece, with quite differentiated forms for the string instruments, the reed instruments, and the brass. (An original is not available.) The lemniscate is the basis for the string instruments ; the form of the instrument is the basis for the woodwinds. The percussion instruments stand on a raised platform, in the center.

...

Much more so than in Stuttgart, the musical element was a fully-integrated part of the activities at the Vienna Congress. This became evident in the distinctive artistic performances, scheduled for the afternoons and culminating on Whit-Monday in the Bruckner celebration to be presented by members of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, the Bruckner-Choir (« Wiener Bruckner-Chor ») under the direction of Professor Ignaz Leo Weber and, also, the Maireck-Buxbaum String Quartet. In addition to the 2 String-Concerts by the Thomastik Quartet, 2 eurythmy presentations under the direction of Marie Steiner took place in the « Volksoper ». A performance of recitation, an evening of arias and songs by Valborg Svardstrom-Werbeck, and 2 lectures : one by Albert Steffen entitled « The Position of the Artist Between East and West » ; and the other by Erich Schwebsch called « Anton Bruckner's Musical Mission » were also on the program.

...

The eurythmy performance on 27 August 1923 opened with « The Rune of the 4 Winds » by Fiona Macleod, 1st published in 1896, in : « From the Hills of Dream » .

The author prefaced the collection by a note :

« I do not use the word “ Rune ” in its ancient or exact significance, but rather as a suitable analogue for Chant ; occasionally, however, with something of the significance of the old word “ Ran ”, meaning a mystery, or the more or less occult expression of mystery. »

The eurythmic version is performed by 4 eurythmists : one in yellow robe with blue veil ; one in blue robe with grey veil ; one in red robe with yellow veil ; and one in lilac robe with bright orange veil.

By the voice in the corries
When the Polestar breatheth :
By the Voice on the summits
The dead feet know :
By the soft wet cry
When the heat-star troubleth :
By the plaining and moaning
Of the sigh of the Rainbows :
By the 4 white winds of the world,
Whose father the golden Sun is,
Whose mother the wheeling moon is,
The North and the South and the East and the West :

By the 4 good winds of the world,

That Man knoweth,
That One dreadeth,
That God blesseth -
Be all well
On mountain and moorland and lea,
On loch-face and lochan and river,
On shore and shallow and sea !

By the Voice of the Hollow
Where the worm dwelleth :
By the Voice of the Hollow
Where the sea-wave stirs not :
By the Voice of the Hollow
That sun hath not seen yet :
By the 3 dark winds of the world ;
The chill dull breath of the Grave,
The breath from the depths of the Sea,
The breath of To-morrow :

By the white and dark winds of the world,
The 4 and the 3 that are 7,
That man knoweth,
That one dreadeth,
That God blesseth -
Be all well
On mountain and moorland and lea,
On loch-face and lochan and river,
On shore and shallow and sea !

Referring to this poem in a review of « From the Hills of Dream » published in the December 1896 number of « The Bookman », William Butler Yeats observed :

« I am altogether moved and impressed. »

In the eurythmy performance, there followed another poem by Fiona Macleod, « The Moon-Child » and, then, a Prelude by Johann Sebastian Bach, a couple of poems by Albert Steffen, a piece by Anton Bruckner, the song « April, April » by William Watson, and theme and variations from Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Violin Sonata.

After an interval, the 2nd part began with 2 Intermezzos by Johannes Brahms and a poem by Eduard Mörike. Then, came the fairies' lullaby « You spotted snakes with double tongue » from « A Midsummer Night's Dream » by Felix Mendelssohn and the song « When daisies pied and violets blue » from « Love's Labour's Lost » . The whole performance was concluded with further musical pieces by Piotr Ilitch Tchaikovsky and Robert Schumann.

...

Here, a man faced the Viennese public with the strength of upright, selfless determination to break-off the old bridges that had tied him until when to his Protestant church. As is known, this happened barely 3 months before the inauguration of the Christian Community, the movement for religious renewal, which took place in September of that year at the « Gœtheanum » , in Dornach. When Friedrich Rittelmeyer spoke of the Pentecostal speaking-in-tongues as the spiritual opposite to the construction of the Tower of Babel as the symbol of the confusion of tongues, his words rang with the heart-felt, almost palpable undertone of the wealth of wisdom of spiritual science, strengthened by the power of the Whitsun mystery to outlast all ages. As though in a higher-octave, Rudolf Steiner bore witness to this in his lecture on the following Sunday, which was the only one in this world-wide proclamation of anthroposophy he had set aside for members of the Anthroposophical Society only.

This Whitsun presentation, in the morning, tried to free religion as an element of humanit from the spell of dogmas, and something similar happened in the afternoon when Erich Schwebsch spoke of « Anton Bruckner's Musical Mission » . Bruckner had started as a church musician, but soon crossed from the monastic confines to the free artists' world of his Symphonic inspirations.

Schwebsch wrote in an essay he had published before the Vienna Congress in the weekly « Das Gœtheanum » :

« Nobody would consider the late “ 150th Psalm ” a church creation, and someday comprehending the “ Te Deum ” will depend not on grasping the traditional church concepts but on the super-sensible, cosmic experience of reality contained in it. »

Erich Schwebsch's lecture given that Whitsun Sunday, between the afternoon's artistic presentations, was intended as a preparation for the great Anton Bruckner Concert scheduled for the afternoon of Whit-Monday. This is why Schwebsch referred particularly to the mighty Mass in F minor, the String Quartet in F major and the « Te Deum » . Schwebsch, the art-instructor of the 11 per classes of the Stuttgart Waldorf School, had just recently published a biography of Bruckner. On the basis of the foundations of spiritual-scientific biographies, he was able to point to the spiritual background of these 3 musical works. The Mass was composed after completion of the 1st Symphony and after Bruckner's recovery from a difficult, critical illness. The String Quartet was conceived around the year 1879, between completion of the 5th Symphony and the beginning of work on the 6th Symphony. The « Te Deum » belongs to the time of Bruckner's final period of maturity.

Just as Rittelmeyer, a former Protestant preacher, succeeded in reaching the hearts of the Catholic Viennese, so Schwebsch, a former school inspector of a Prussian high-school in Berlin, was able to illustrate how Bruckner, a man who grew-up among the peasantry in Upper-Austria, rose to the heights of unique creative genius. Here, through anthroposophy's view of the human being, a cosmopolitan spirit had become active in an exemplary way !

Then Sunday evening approached to which I was looking forward with the greatest anticipation because the 4th lecture by Rudolf Steiner was scheduled for that time. In the program, the lecture's title was « Anthroposophy and World Evolution from the Stand-point of Geography » . The lectures describing the relationship of anthroposophy to natural science, psychology, and history had preceded this one. The inner-theme revolved around a new teaching of the earth's life, a geography of the etheric containing at the same time a higher-ethnology.

...

The entire building was occupied by many scientific or artistic programs. For instance, in one hall, there were discussions in the fields of chemistry and physics ; in another, in those of biology or psychology, medicine or pedagogy, sociology or economics ; while, in another, the interpretation of the German lectures was proceeding in French or English. For persons had come from various parts of Europe and from great distances, including America. It was really a great gathering of companions at the very time when mutual understanding in the outside world had sunk to its lowest-level. The good spirit which worked at the « Goetheanum » was here also to teach the human beings in the Congress of Vienna mutual understanding.

Side by side with the scientific undertakings of the Congress, one experienced the religious questions and the artistic impulses. On Pentecost Sunday, June 4th, Doctor Friedrich Rittelmeyer spoke on « The Spirit of Pentecost and Religious Renewal » . The artistic part of the conference was introduced by Albert Steffen in a lecture on « The Position of the Artist between West and East » and a lecture by Doctor Erich Schwesbch on « Anton Bruckner's Musical Mission » . Out of Albert Steffen's lecture was later developed one of his most beautiful literary productions, and Doctor Schwesbch, inspired by Rudolf Steiner's long-continued high-evaluation of Bruckner, produced later a book which helped greatly in expanding the appreciation of this composer. During the Congress, there was a magnificent production of Bruckner's great Mass in F minor by a combination of 3 musical organizations of Vienna. Classical music was represented by a program produced on modern instruments built by the violin-maker Thomastik. All of this artistic production came to a conclusion in the lecture of Rudolf Steiner.

...

The West-East Congress had not been sought for or brought about through propaganda but that, here, out of the very force of the external relations, a task had been given by destiny to the Movement, a question which had to be answered. He said, in earlier years, that his task in this time was « to say » the things and, then, leave it to the freedom of every human being to draw his own conclusions. Since now, in recent years, and especially through the activity of the younger element, these questions had come from the external world, the answer had now been given from the center of the Movement to the questioning periphery, neither less nor more than this spiritual necessity and concrete putting of questions from without correspondingly required. Rudolf Steiner said, therefore, in his report of June 18th :

« You know from much that I have said here that such Congresses as that in Stuttgart and, then, the Vienna Congress are really necessities demanded of the Anthroposophical Movement from without. I have said to you that the Anthroposophical Movement, from the beginning on, has worked-out of the esoteric and, in the case of an esoteric movement, it is obvious that there can be nothing of an agitative quality ; but it must so far as possible seek its path in such a way that, in spite of giving to every one who wills to hear the opportunity to hear, the Movement directs itself to those human beings who feel a certain inclination toward it, out of their hearts and out of their thinking, and who then (this must be said) find the way according to destiny. »

...

In late-March 1925, Rudolf Steiner lay on his sick-bed in the studio of the joinery work-shop, in Dornach. It was a high-ceilinged room with a skylight. At the foot of his bed soared the wooden sculpture which he had carved with the aid of his pupil, the sculptress Edith Maryon. It depicted the « Representative of Humanity » striding between the adversary powers of Lucifer and Ahriman. Steiner was working on the book, later published as his autobiography, which appeared in weekly instalments in « Das Goetheanum » magazine. Books and periodicals lay around on tables and stands. These probably included a book by Friedrich Eckstein, whom Steiner, in his autobiographical reminiscences published on 25 January 1925, had mentioned warmly ; at this, in gratitude, Eckstein had sent him his book entitled « Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » (Memories of Anton Bruckner) with the dedication :

« In memory of long-past days of joys of the spirit. »

For Steiner, this was a warm greeting recalling his youthful experiences in Vienna, when he had met Eckstein. In a letter to Eckstein, at the end of November 1890, Rudolf Steiner had said that the importance of this meeting for his own development was equalled only by one other of that time, about which however he must remain silent :

« There are 2 experiences in my life which I count among the most important of my existence, so that I would be a quite different person if they had not occurred. Of one I must remain silent ; the other is the fact that I became acquainted with you. »

There can be no doubt that the 1st of these 2 experiences refers to Steiner's encounter, at the age of 19, with his Master, which he later described to Edouard Schuré.

Bruckner, le cosmique et le Zodiaque

Bruckner's Cosmic Musical Background in Relation to the Zodiac

(Raymond Cox)

Rudolf Steiner was the founder of the Anthroposophical Society. His vast survey of the spiritual evolution of man included many diverse subjects and disciplines - the nature and spiritual background of music and the other arts among them. Steiner's teachings arose-out of his personal and clairvoyant research into the world of spirit. In his early * karma (Sanskrit) : Sum of person's actions in one of his successive states of existence, viewed as deciding his fate in the next ; destiny.

(1906) lecture series « Concerning Music » , the effect of music upon man was discussed. Steiner explained that the individuality of a musician unites in a karmic * way with the physical characteristics of his heredity. Steiner's most important lectures on music came in 1923. They included « The Experience of Tone in the Human Being » and « The World of the Hierarchies and the World of the Tones » as well as the seminal course, « The Arts and Their Mission » .

Throughout his life, Steiner held Bruckner in high-esteem. This inspired Erich Schwab to write a book entitled : « Anton Bruckner. Ein Beitrag zur Erkenntnis von Entwicklungen in der Musik » (Anton Bruckner : A Contribution to the Perception of Developments in Music) . In 1922, Schwab lectured on « Bruckner's Musical Mission » at Steiner's West-East Congress, in Vienna. Both here and in his book, he considers the significant part which the zodiac plays in the scheme of things :

« The keys in music represent space in soul and spirit, and, depending on the key, experiences can differ. The keys determine in a way the constellation of a theme in a Symphony, the law by which it enters in, and assert their will, just as the constellations of the zodiac determine the rhythm of 12 months of the year, each with its special nature and its special effect upon the human soul. »

Stuart Easton, in « Man and the World in the Light of Anthroposophy » (New York, 1975) , describes Steiner's insights into the arts from various points of view. Easton finds the zodiacal implications of great importance. In a section dealing with music, he quotes Steiner as saying that Pythagoras' « Music of the Spheres » is a reality, and that there is an area of the spiritual world into which an initiate enters and becomes « clairaudient » . Some of the great composers, including Bruckner, have been able to enter this world. They could capture and retrieve the sounds they heard in a way that could be sung by human voices or played by human beings on musical instruments. The 12 signs, or constellations, of the zodiac have been connected by tradition with the 12 parts of the human organism. But they also have a connection with the original 12 consonants, from within which the vowels sound forth to create human speech and song. Similarly, in the cosmos or macrocosm, the planets play the part of the vowels and sound forth through the « fixed » stars of the zodiac in greatly varied tones. Man after death experiences (actually, sees and hears) the world of stars and planets as qualities of soul and spirit belonging to the different constellations.

Steiner likens sound to « a window opening on to a spiritual world. In the future, we shall try to penetrate behind the sounds - each sound, in itself, will have a moral and spiritual value. » He always said that we do not experience musical notes as such and that our souls create within us the intervals between the notes. This is what Elsie Hamilton, a student of Steiner, calls the « spiritual experience in time between the 2 notes » . One cannot help recalling, in this respect, the significance of the pauses and spaces which are so characteristic of Bruckner's Symphonic movements.

With regard to the zodiac, special attention must be given to the thoughts of Anny von Lange and, particularly, her book called « Man, Music and Cosmos » (Rudolf Steiner Press, 1992) . Here, Bach, Wagner and Bruckner are prominent figures, Bruckner taking-up the whole of the concluding chapter. One of the book's striking features is the description of the relation of the various major and minor keys to certain qualities in human beings that are expressed through them - together, with the connection with the zodiac. (Minor-keys represent the return of the soul to its own inner-world ; major-keys, the movement of the soul forward to a world outside itself.) Bruckner's use of the key of D minor is touched upon twice, as is its place in the zodiac : the Ram, « Aries » . When it occurs in Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, it denotes a process of development towards individuality and earthly existence seeking expression :

« Man stands “ between heaven and earth ”. He grasps the possibility of mentally combining both regions. »

The 2nd occurrence is in Bruckner's « uncompleted » 9th Symphony, which offers a parallel with Bach's « The Art of Fugue » . Bruckner's process of development would have ended with the crowning Finale of the 9th. According to von Lange, Bruckner trod an unconscious path from his 1st Symphony onwards, united as an artist with the world of divine origin, and protected from any deviation as one « who knew himself to be a child of God » .

Von Lange does not include in her study Bruckner's early F minor and D minor (« Die Nullte ») Symphonies, and she indicates that the process of spiritual development, for Bruckner, really began with the 3rd. What, then, of the 2 C minor Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 2 ? These are represented by « Gemini » (the Twins) and show the composer setting-out to gain Mastery in his creative activity. The 1st Symphony finds joy in this creation and was written as the « outer » world sounding through the composer, while the 2nd was composed more from within. C minor is described as the world of Capability. The Twins operate between the duality of right and left in the body, between active and passive existence, between giving and receiving. When Bruckner reaches another Symphony in C minor, the 8th, it is in a higher-sense of creation (von Lange says : « creative play ») and he is now Master of this realm :

« It is the control of the unity of content and form in which one's every faculty works without question. »

We are left with the major-key Symphonies to consider. No. 4 in E-flat has « Aquarius » (the Waterman) , as its zodiacal counter-part. It is described by von Lange as an « Equilibrium » . Here, the attainment of the sphere of E-flat confirms the discovery of the « I » : Bruckner is growing mature in a cosmic world-consciousness. The E-flat element forms an axis in the zodiac with the « Feeling » element of A major, the key of Bruckner's 6th Symphony. In this axis, the soul is said to be connected to the regulating power of the harmony of the spheres. The 6th Symphony is represented by « Leo » (the Lion) , and it reveals the power of love. Highly-inspired though it is, the 6th remains a preliminary trial for the next stage of the process, which is found in the 7th.

Erich Schwebsch remarks of the 6th :

« Through the 12 spaces, which, as zodiacal spaces, form the whole heaven of sound for our music today, Bruckner lets the phases of the main-theme ring through all 12 keys. »

The 7th Symphony brings a new experience in the round of the zodiac. Its key of E major is a key of light and illumination. The word is « Contemplation » and the sign is that of « Virgo » (the Virgin) . Anny von Lange provides another poetic description :

« A feeling of freedom arises like a sigh of relief, clear and light, as though one were standing before a wide sunlit landscape. The relationship between the “ I ” and the universe, illumined by a knowledge which is still strongly united with feeling, is connected with the warmth of the sun and leaves a happy impression of un-defiled purity. A work of resounding light has to be developed. On this path to the heights, dimensions are attained which sound in a divine, star-like way to the (by now, clairaudient) ear of the maturing Master. »

Bruckner's 5th Symphony lies on the axis of « equilibrium » between his 4th and 6th Symphonies. The sign is « Pisces » (the Fishes) , and the description is « Destiny » . The « angel-consciousness » of the 4th Symphony was such that it had to be acquired anew, step by step. B-flat, the key of the 5th, is the natural progression from E-flat. The B-flat Symphony represents Bruckner's complete achievement of outward Mastery.

To quote von Lange again :

« It must prepare the way to a conquest of the personal realm and to a powerful all-embracing love. The difficulty, the solitude and the responsibility of an overwhelming artistic destiny must be made to sound but, also, the up-lifting grace it brings. »

At the 1922 Anthroposophical Congress, in Vienna, Professor Ignaz Leo Weber directed the Vienna Bruckner-Choir (« Wiener Bruckner-Chor ») in performances of Bruckner's Mass in F minor and « Te Deum » .

At a « matinée » concert in the Leipzig Conservatory, on 13 October 1940, an address by Erich Schwebsch preceded the 1st performance of Bruckner's String Quintet, in its original form by the Strub Quartet of Berlin with Emil Seiler. The concert also featured Franz Schubert's Quartet Movement (« Quartettsatz ») in C minor and the premiere of Bruckner's 2 discarded sketches for the Trio of his 9th Symphony, arranged by Armin Knab.

...

On December 29, 1884, while staying in Leipzig, Anton Bruckner played the « Gewandhaus » organ for a full complement of friends. He regularly requested a subject upon which to improvise a fugue ; the one in question was from Professor Winterberger. Here, Bruckner is inquiring about the forgotten theme.

The 2 reviews of which Bruckner speaks concern the 1st performance of his Quintet.

Autograph Letter about the 7th Symphony

Elusive autograph signed letter and envelope from the influential Austrian composer and organist who writes regarding the world-premiere of his 7th Symphony. Autograph material of any kind from Bruckner is extremely rare. Sold together with a vintage postcard photograph.

1 page, double-sheet, 8vo. Dated : « 15.01.1885 » . To the composer Alfred Stroß, envelope post-marked « Vienna » . In fine condition, tiny tears to 2 edges, envelope torn along the right edge.

Translation :

« Dear, good friend ! I've found NO publisher. When you write to Professor Winterberger, you will want to ask him for the theme in B minor that he gave me in the “ Gewandhaus ”. Thank you for your support, dear noble friend. Your Bruckner. »

And adding this postscript :

« Special edition from Monday was terrible. The German newspaper by Wednesday, very good. »

The composer is referencing to reviews of his 7th Symphony which was 1st performed on December 30, 1884. The premiere, given under Arthur Nikisch and the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, at the Leipzig Opera House, brought Bruckner the greatest success he had known in his life. The Symphony was eventually published by Albert J. Gutmann, in 1885.

22 janvier 1885 : Anton Bruckner is elected an honorary member of the « Akademischer Richard-Wagner-Verein » , in Vienna. This new Academic Richard Wagner Society was distinct from the one Karl Goldmark helped create, which had as one of its bylaws the explicit provision that no Jew could be a member.

Karl Goldmark

Le compositeur hongrois Károly Goldmark (Karl Goldmark, en allemand) est né le 18 mai 1830 à Keszthely et est mort le 2 janvier 1915 à Vienne.

Goldmark est issu d'une famille nombreuse juive (plus d'une vingtaine d'enfants) , dont le père exerce la profession de cantor. Il apprend le violon et, dès l'âge de 12 ans, fait montre d'un réel talent de compositeur en écrivant, notamment, des pièces vocales. Il fait ses études à l'école de la Société musicale de Sopron (1842-1844) où l'on remarque ses capacités de violoniste.

Il se rend ensuite à Vienne où il est l'élève de Leopold Jança puis poursuit ses études au Conservatoire de Vienne avec Gottfried Preger pour l'harmonie et Joseph Böhm pour le violon. Il se fait un nom comme pédagogue (Jean Sibelius compte parmi ses élèves) et comme compositeur.

En 1851, il est engagé au Théâtre de « Josefstadt » , puis au « Carlstheater » approfondissant ses connaissances musicales qu'il met à profit dans ses propres œuvres. En 1858, il organise un concert de sa propre musique mais la réaction de la presse viennoise est négative ce qui le décide à partir pour Budapest où il donne des leçons de piano et continue l'étude de la composition. En 1859, il donne un second concert et retourne à Vienne, en 1860, où il rencontre Johannes Brahms avec qui il se lie d'amitié. Avec Joseph Joachim, Brahms et le critique musical Eduard Hanslick, il défend la musique pure contre celle de Richard Wagner.

Son Quatuor à cordes, Opus 8, le rend immédiatement célèbre.

Les grandes étapes de sa carrière sont la création de son Ouverture « Sakuntala » par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, le 26 décembre 1865 de même que la 1re représentation de son Opéra « La Reine de Saba » à l'Opéra de Vienne, le 10 mars 1875. Ces 2 œuvres remportent un immense succès. On ne saurait passer sous silence son Concerto en la mineur pour violon et orchestre, composé en 1877, soit 10 ans après le 1er Concerto de Max Bruch.

Sa musique évoque surtout la musique traditionnelle de la Hongrie et la musique liturgique juive.

Ses Opéras le placent entre Giacomo Meyerbeer et Wagner.

Œuvres principales

Opéras

La reine de Saba (« Die Königin von Saba ») , (1875) ; création à Vienne, le 10 mars 1875.

Merlin (1886) ; création à Vienne, le 19 novembre 1886.

« Das Heimchen am Herd » , d'après « The Cricket on the Hearth » de Charles Dickens (1896) ; création à Vienne, le 21 mars 1896.

« Die Kriegsgefangenen » ; création à Vienne, le 17 janvier 1899.

« Götz von Berlichingen » , d'après Goethe ; création à Budapest, le 16 décembre 1902.

« Ein Wintermärchen » , d'après « A Winters's Tale » de Shakespeare ; création à Vienne, le 2 janvier 1908.

Œuvres symphoniques

Ouverture « Sakuntala » (1865) .

Ouverture « Penthesilea » .

Ouverture « Im Frühling » .

Ouverture « Der gefesselte Prometheus » .

Ouverture « Sappho » .

Ouverture « In Italien » .

Ouverture « Aus Jugendtagen » .

Poème symphonique « Ländliche Hochzeit » ; création à Vienne, le 5 mars 1876.

Symphonie n° 1 dite « Symphonie Rustique » , Opus 26.

Concerto pour violon n° 1, Opus 28 ; création à Nuremberg, le 28 octobre 1878.

Symphonie n° 2, Opus 35.

Musique de chambre

Quintette en la mineur pour 2 violons, 1 alto et 2 violoncelles, Opus 9.

Quintette en si bémol majeur pour 2 violons, 1 alto, 1 violoncelle et piano, Opus 30.

Quintette en ré bémol majeur pour 2 violons, 1 alto, 1 violoncelle et piano, Opus 54.

Quatuor à cordes en si bémol majeur, Opus 8 (1860) .

Trio en si bémol majeur pour violon, violoncelle et piano, Opus 4.

Trio en mi mineur pour violon, violoncelle et piano, Opus 33.

Suite en mi majeur pour violon et piano, Opus 11.

Suite en mi bémol majeur pour violon et piano, Opus 43.

Sonate en ré majeur pour violon et piano, Opus 25.

Sonate en fa majeur pour violoncelle et piano, Opus 39.

...

Hungarian composer Karl Goldmark, also known originally as Károly Goldmark (Goldmark Károly, in Hungarian) and later sometimes as Karl Goldmark ; born May 18, 1830, in Keszthely - died January 2, 1915, in Vienna) .

Goldmark came from a large Jewish family, one of 20 children. His father, Ruben Goldmark, was a chazan to the Jewish congregation at Keszthely, Hungary. Karl Goldmark's older brother Joseph Goldmark became a physician and was later involved in the Revolution of 1848, and forced to emigrate to the United States. Karl Goldmark's early training as a violinist was at the musical academy of Sopron (1842-1844) . He continued his music studies there and, 2 years later, was sent by his father to Vienna, where he was able to study for some 18 months with Leopold Jansa before his money ran-out. He prepared himself for entry 1st to the Vienna « Technische Hochschule » and, then, to the Vienna Conservatory to study the violin with Joseph Böhm and harmony with Gottfried Preyer. The Revolution of 1848 forced the Conservatory to close down. He was largely self-taught as a composer. He supported himself in Vienna playing the violin in Theatre Orchestras, at the « Carlstheater » and the privately supported Viennese institution, the « Theater in der Josefstadt » , which gave him practical experience with orchestration, an art he more than mastered. He also gave lessons : Jean Sibelius studied with him briefly. Goldmark's 1st concert in Vienna, in 1858, met with hostility, and he returned to Budapest, returning to Vienna, in 1860.

To make ends meet, Goldmark also pursued a side career as a music journalist :

« His writing is distinctive for his even-handed promotion of both Brahms and Wagner, at a time when audiences (and most critics) were solidly in one composer's camp or the other and viewed those on the opposing side with undisguised hostility. » (Liebermann, 1997)

Johannes Brahms and Goldmark developed a friendship as Goldmark's prominence in Vienna grew. Goldmark, however would ultimately distance himself because of Brahms' prickly personality.

Among the musical influences Goldmark absorbed was the inescapable one, for a musical colorist, of Richard Wagner, whose anti-Semitism stood in the way of any genuine warmth between them ; in 1872, Goldmark took a prominent role in the formation of the Vienna Wagner Society. He was made an honorary member of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , received an honorary doctorate from the University of Budapest and shared with Richard Strauß an honorary membership in the « Accademia di Santa Cecilia » , in Rome.

Goldmark's Opera « Die Königin von Saba » (The Queen of Sheba) , Opus 27, was celebrated during his lifetime and for some years thereafter. 1st performed in Vienna, on 10 March 1875, the work proved so popular that it remained in the repertory of the Vienna « Staatsoper » continuously until 1938. He wrote 6 other Operas as well.

The « Rustic Wedding Symphony » (« Ländliche Hochzeit ») , Opus 26 (premiered 1876) , a work that was kept in the repertory by Sir Thomas Beecham, includes 5 movements, like a suite composed of coloristic tone poems : a wedding march with variations depicting the wedding guests, a nuptial song, a serenade, a dialogue between the bride and groom in a garden, and a dance movement.

His Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Opus 28, was once his most frequently played piece. The Concerto had its premiere in Bremen, in 1877, initially enjoyed great popularity and then slid into obscurity. A very Romantic work, it has a Magyar march in the 1st movement and passages reminiscent of Antonín Dvořák, and Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, in the 2nd and 3rd movements. It has started to re-enter the repertoire, through recordings by such prominent violin soloists as Itzhak Perlman and Joshua Bell. Nathan Milstein also championed the work and Milstein's recording of the Concerto, in 1963, is widely considered the definitive one. Goldmark wrote a 2nd Violin Concerto, but it was never published.

A 2nd Symphony in E-flat, Opus 35, is much less well-known. (Goldmark also wrote an early Symphony in C major, between roughly 1858 and 1860. This work was never given an Opus number, and only the Scherzo seems to have ever been published.)

Goldmark's chamber music, in which the influences of Robert Schumann and Felix Mendelssohn are paramount, although critically well-received in his lifetime, is now rarely heard. It includes the String Quintet in A minor, Opus 9, that made his 1st reputation in Vienna ; the Violin Sonata in D major, Opus 25 ; 2 Piano Quintets in B-flat major, Opus 30, and C-sharp minor, Opus 54 ; the Cello Sonata, Opus 39, and the work that 1st brought Goldmark's name into prominence in the Viennese musical world : the String Quartet in B-flat, Opus 8 (his only work in that genre) .

Goldmark also composed choral music, 2 Suites for violin and piano (in D major, Opus 11 ; and in E-flat major, Opus 43) , and numerous concert Overtures, such as the « Sakuntala » Overture, Opus 13 (a work which cemented his fame after his String Quartet) ; the « Penthesilea » Overture, Opus 31 ; the « In the Spring » Overture, Opus 36 ; the « Prometheus Bound » Overture, Opus 38 ; the « Sappho » Overture, Opus 44 ; the « In Italy » Overture, Opus 49 ; and the « Aus jungendtagen » Overture, Opus 53. Other orchestral works include the Symphonic poem « Zrínyi » , Opus 47 ; and 2 orchestral Scherzos : in E minor, Opus 19 ; and in A major, Opus 45.

Karl Goldmark's nephew Rubin Goldmark (1872-1936) , a pupil of Dvořák, was also a composer, who spent his career in New York.

Goldmark died in Vienna and is buried in the « Zentralfriedhof » (Central Cemetery) , along with many other notable composers.

Many of his autograph manuscripts are in the collection of the National Széchényi Library, with « G » catalogue numbers attached to various works (including those without Opus number) .

Operas

« Die Königin von Saba » (The Queen of Sheba) (1875) .

Merlin (1886) .

« Das Heimchen am Herd » (1896) ; adapted from Charles Dickens's « The Cricket on the Hearth » .

« Der Fremdling » (The Changeling) (1897) .

« Die Kriegsgefangene » (The Prisoner of War) , (1899) ; a Trojan War story taking Achilles' captive Briseis as central figure.

« Götz von Berlichingen » (1902) ; after Gœthe's play about the historical figure.

« Ein Wintermärchen » (1908) ; adapted from Shakespeare's « The Winter's Tale » .

Symphonies

« Rustic Wedding Symphony » , Opus 26.

Symphony No. 2 in E-flat, Opus 35.

Concerti

Violin Concerto No. 1 in A minor, Opus 28.

Violin Concerto No. 2 (unpublished) .

Chamber Music

Ballad for Violin and Piano, Opus 54.

Piano Quintet in B-flat major, Opus 30.

Piano Quintet in C-sharp minor, Opus 54.

Romanze for violin and piano.

Sonata for violin and piano, Opus 25.

Piano Trio, Opus 33, No. 2.

Piano Trio, Opus 4.

String Quartet in B-flat major, Opus 8.

Suite in D major for violin and piano, Opus 11.

Suite in A major for violin and piano.

Piano works (solo unless indicated) :

« Sturm und Drang » , 9 characteristic pieces, Opus 5.

3 Pieces for piano duet, Opus 12.

Hungarian Dances for piano duet, Opus 22 (later orchestrated by the composer) .

« Zwei Novelletten » , Opus 29.

« Georginen » , 6 pieces, Opus 52.

Choral works

« Regenlied » for unaccompanied chorus, Opus 10.

2 Pieces for unaccompanied men's chorus, Opus 14.

« Frühlingsnetz » for men's chorus, 4 horns, and piano, Opus 15.

« Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt » for men's chorus and horns, Opus 16.

2 Pieces for unaccompanied men's chorus, Opus 17.

« Frühlingshymne » for contralto, chorus, and orchestra, Opus 23.

« Im Fuschertal » , a set of 6 choral songs, Opus 24.

Psalm CXIII for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra, Opus 40.

2 Pieces for unaccompanied men's chorus, Opus 41.

2 4-Part Songs with piano accompaniment, Opus 42.

Lieder

12 Gesänge, Opus 18.

« Beschwörung » , Opus 20.

4 Lieder, Opus 21.

7 Lieder aus dem « Wilden Jäger » , Opus 32.

4 Lieder, Opus 34.

8 Lieder, Opus 37 (Leipzig, 1888 or 1889) .

« Wer sich die Musik erkiest » , for piano and 4 solo voices, Opus 42.

6 Lieder, Opus 46.

...

Composer Karl Goldmark, famous in Vienna throughout the 2nd half of the 19th Century, was born into an enormous Jewish family (Goldmark had over 20 siblings) in Hungary, in 1830. The family moved to the outskirts of Ödenburg (now, Sopron) in 1834 and, 7 years later, Goldmark began to study the violin (in a most rudimentary way, his 1st teacher being a singer with little instrumental experience) . After 2 years at the Ödenburg music school (1842-1843) , the talented, but untrained, 14 year old was sent to Vienna for serious violin studies (1844) . Forced for monetary reasons to abandon the lessons after a little over a year, but nevertheless determined to pursue music as a vocation, Goldmark managed to gain admittance 1st to the Vienna technical school and, in 1847, to the city's Conservatory, where he studied violin with the respected performer Joseph Böhm and harmony (for a very brief time) with Gottfried Preyer.

Political troubles in the city, in 1848 (which shut down many Viennese institutions of learning, including the Conservatory) , forced Goldmark to abandon school after just a year of formal study. Working as a theater violinist and music teacher (1st in Ödenburg and, later, back in Vienna) for the next several years, Goldmark began trying to hone his skills as a composer and, in 1858, he organized a concert of his own music in Vienna. The concert was not a success, and Goldmark, disillusioned by the reception of his music in the city and uncomfortable with his lack of thorough compositional grounding, opted to relocate to Budapest, where he immersed himself in the music of Bach, Mozart, Haydn, and Beethoven and studied contemporary texts on musical form and language.

Upon his return to Vienna, in 1860, Goldmark met with considerable and immediate success and, by the 1870's, a string of successful works such as : the String Quartet, Opus 8, of 1860 ; the « Sakuntala » Overture of 1865 ; and, most significantly, the 1875 Opera « Die Königin von Saba » (The Queen of Saba) ; and the 1877 Symphonic poem «

Rustic Wedding » had placed Goldmark in the front tier of contemporary Austro-German composers. Despite the objections of many leading musicians (among them, the outspoken critic Eduard Hanslick) who considered him to be just another 2nd-rate Wagnerian, Goldmark remained an honoured and very visible part of Viennese musical life until his death, in 1915, at the age of 84.

Goldmark's musical influences were many and varied, beginning with his exposure to local folk-dances while a child in Hungary, and later moving through Wagner towards a unique blend of German Classicism and impressionism (a style he was just beginning to explore, at the time of his death) . Some of Goldmark's mature pieces, particularly the Operas « Die Königin von Saba » and « Ein Wintermärchen » (A Winter Tale) , in 1908, and the Opus 28 Violin Concerto, successfully employ a unique and beautiful language, rich in melody and warmly chromatic ; at other times (as in most of the music for piano, an instrument for which Goldmark had little native sympathy) , his work falls rather short of its hyper-expressive goal.

...

Hungarian by birth, Karl Goldmark made his principal career in Vienna after earlier years during which he earned his living as a violinist in Theatre Orchestras and as a teacher. Largely self-taught as a composer, he had his 1st success with his String Quartet, Opus 8, in 1860. He joined in the establishment of a Wagner Society, in Vienna, and gradually assumed a position of great importance in the musical life of the city.

Goldmark's Opera « Die Königin von Saba » (The Queen of Sheba) enjoyed considerable popularity also in Italy, its musical idiom influenced to some extent by the music of the synagogue with which the composer was familiar from his childhood. Other Operas were less successful, although his Opera based on Shakespeare's « A Winter's Tale » exemplified a form of stagework more familiar from Engelbert Humperdinck.

In addition to 2 Symphonies and 2 Violin Concertos, Goldmark wrote a series of concert Overtures and the popular « Rustic Wedding Symphony » .

Goldmark wrote a series of works for conventional chamber ensembles, Duos, Trios, Quartets and Quintets, the later compositions showing signs of other contemporary influences within the prescribed forms.

...

Karl Goldmark, häufig auch Karl Goldmark und Károly Goldmark, (geboren 18. Mai 1830 in Keszthely ; gestorben 2. Januar 1915 in Wien) war ein österreichisch-ungarischer Komponist, Musiklehrer und Geiger jüdischer Herkunft.

In Keszthely am Balaton als Sohn eines jüdischen Kantors geboren, übersiedelte er im Alter von vier Jahren nach Deutschkreutz im Burgenland, wo er in ärmlichen Verhältnissen in seiner deutschjüdischen Familie aufwuchs. Mit 11 Jahren bekam er den ersten Geigenunterricht, mit 14 Jahren zog er nach Wien und gab dort im Alter von 18 Jahren seine ersten Soloauftritte als Geiger. Über viele Jahre wirkte er unbeachtet als Theatergeiger am Carltheater, wo er seine Einkünfte durch Klavierunterricht aufbesserte. 1863 erhielt er ein Stipendium für Musik, das ihm von den drei Kommissionsmitgliedern des Unterrichtsministeriums Eduard Hanslick, Esser und Herbeck zugesprochen wurde.

Mit 27 Jahren fasste er erstmals den Entschluss, mit eigenen Kompositionen vor das Publikum zu treten, mit 28 Jahren gab er sein erstes Konzert mit eigenen Werken. Zu Beginn der Sechziger Jahre war Goldmark als Bratschist eines jungen Streichquartetts tätig. Diesem Quartett übergab Johannes Brahms sein später mehrfach umgearbeitetes Streichquartett in F-Moll zur Probe. In dieser Zeit entwickelte sich zwischen Brahms und Goldmark eine (nicht immer ganz problemlose) Freundschaft, die in zahlreichen Ausflügen etwa nach Baden oder Klosterneuburg und auch in einer gemeinsamen Italienreise zum Ausdruck kam. Goldmark gehörte daneben auch zu den regelmäßigen Gästen bei der Familie Johann Strauß. Gustav Mahler, der drei Goldmark-Opern auf seiner Dirigierliste hatte, « Heimchen am Herd » (1896) , « Die Kriegsgefangene » (1899) und die Neuinszenierung von « Die Königin von Saba » (1901) , und Goldmark begegneten sich mit einer gewissen Reserviertheit. Dies wurde teilweise darauf zurückgeführt, daß Mahler es Goldmark stets verübelt hatte, daß dieser als Mitglied der Juroren-Kommission (bestehend aus Hanslick, Brahms, Hans Richter und Goldmark) in den Jahren 1878 und 1881 den « Beethoven-Preis » der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien nicht ihm, sondern Robert Fuchs und Victor von Herzfeld zugesprochen hatte.

Als Autodidakt schaffte er 1865 mit der Sakuntala-Overtüre den ersten Durchbruch, aufgeführt im 4. Philharmonischen Konzert der Saison 1865-1866. Der Kritiker Eduard Hanslick, der die Aufführung insgesamt wohlwollend kritisierte, nahm allerdings wie in vielen späteren Kritiken an seinem « Dissonanzenreichtum » Anstoß. In der Uraufführung von Goldmarks Overtüre « Im Frühling » stellte Eduard Hanslick die Frage, ob « der Dissonanzenkönig es über sich gewinnen wird, dem Mai zuliebe seine schneidenden Akkorde zu verabschieden » , und in Goldmarks « Sappho-Ouverture » brandmarkte er dessen « Dissonanzenurwald » .

Seine Grabstelle befindet sich auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Alter jüdischer Friedhof - Tor I) . 1925 wurde der Goldmarkplatz in Wien-Hietzing ihm zu Ehren benannt.

Karl Goldmark war zu Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts in seinen späteren Jahren ein sehr populärer Komponist, der mit Superlativen überhäuft wurde. Jean Sibelius, zeitweiliger Schüler von Goldmark ab 1890, schrieb 1892, daß er in Wien einen außerordentlichen Ruf habe und man vielerorts beneidet würde, dessen Schüler zu sein. Julius Korngold, Nachfolger von Eduard Hanslick, sprach vom « Goldmark-Kultus » . Karl Kraus bescheinigte ihm, seit Richard Wagners Tod der größte lebende Musikdramatiker zu sein. Er wurde nach Brahms Tod gewissermaßen als der letzte Exponent des sich verlierenden spätromantischen Zeitalters angesehen, wobei die ungarische Musikwelt ihn als « Nationalkomponist » bis heute mit größerer Aufmerksamkeit bedacht hat.

Sein bekanntestes Werk ist die 1875 uraufgeführte Oper Die Königin von Saba, mit der er über Nacht berühmt wurde. Hanslick, der alles im Umkreis Richard Wagners Stehende befandete, glaubte bei allen Opern Goldmarks eine zu große Nähe zu Richard Wagner feststellen zu müssen. Auch viele andere Kritiker stigmatisierten Goldmark als Wagnerepigone. Am schonungslosesten mit seiner Kritik gegenüber Goldmark war Hugo Wolf. Die Oper Die Königin von Saba war noch bis 1936 an der Wiener Staatsoper präsent, bis das Verdikt der Nationalsozialisten für ein endgültiges Aufhören der Rezeption sorgte. Nach 1945 bot der Musikbetrieb Wiens Goldmark praktisch keinen Raum mehr.

Seine musikalischen Leitbilder waren Felix Mendelssohn, Robert Schumann und später auch Richard Wagner. 1860 ist seine einzige Begegnung mit Wagner dokumentiert. Um die Jahrhundertwende war er neben Gustav Mahler und Ludwig Bösendorfer Mitglied im Komitee zur Anschaffung einer neuen Orgel für den Musikvereinssaal. In seinen späten Jahren erhielt er neben zahlreichen Ehrungen die Ehrendoktorwürde der Universität Budapest.

Neben Sinfonien, anderen Orchesterwerken, Kammermusik, Chorwerken und Liedern komponierte er eine Reihe von Opern.

Sein Neffe Rubin Goldmark, Pianist und Komponist, Sohn seines 1879 in die USA emigrierten Bruders Leo Goldmark, studierte im Alter von 17 bis 19 Jahren 2 Jahre in Wien bei Robert Fuchs, danach in New York bei Antonín Dvořák und war zuletzt Lehrer der Kompositionsklasse an der Juilliard School in New York.

Im burgenländischen Deutschkreutz wurde 1980 das Haus, in dem Goldmark die Jahre 1834 bis 1844 verbrachte, von der Gemeinde angekauft und darin das Goldmark Museum errichtet.

Goldmarks frühes Streichquartett B-Dur, Opus 8 erfährt in letzter Zeit wieder eine gewisse Aufmerksamkeit und wurde vom Lajtha-Quartett (Hungaroton, 1993) und dem Klenke-Quartett (Classic, 1998) auf CD eingespielt.

Opern

Die Königin von Saba. Oper in 4 Akten (Opus 27 ; 1871) . Libretto : Salomon Hermann Mosenthal. Uraufführung 10. März 1875 Wien (Hofoper) .

Merlin. Oper in 3 Akten. Libretto : Siegfried Lipiner. Uraufführung 19. November 1886 Wien (Hofoper) .

Das Heimchen am Herd. Oper in 3 Akten. Libretto : Alfred Maria Willner (nach Charles Dickens : « The Cricket on the Hearth ») . Uraufführung 21. März 1896 Wien (Hofoper) .

Der Fremdling. Libretto : ? , Uraufführung 1897.

Die Kriegsgefangene (Briseïs) . Oper in 2 Akten. Libretto : Emil Schlicht (Alfred Formey) . Uraufführung 17. Januar 1899 Wien (Hofoper) .

Götz von Berlichingen. Oper in 5 Akten. Libretto : Alfred Maria Willner (nach Goethe) . Uraufführung 16. Dezember 1902 Budapest (Nationaloper) . Neufassung : Uraufführung 1910 Wien.

Ein Wintermärchen. Oper in 3 Akten. Libretto : Alfred Maria Willner (nach Shakespeare) . Uraufführung 2. Januar 1908 Wien (Hofoper) .

Ouvertüren

Sakuntala, Opus 13 (1865) ; erster großer Erfolg.

Penthesilea, Opus 31 (1884) , nach Heinrich von Kleist.

Im Frühling, Opus 36 (1887) .

Der gefesselte Prometheus, Opus 38 (1889) .

Sappho, Opus 44 (1894) .

In Italien, Opus 49 (1904) .

Sinfonien

Sinfonie Nr. 1, Opus 26, Ländliche Hochzeit (1877) .

Sinfonie Nr. 2 in Es-Dur, Opus 35 (1887) .

Orchesterwerke

Konzert für Violine und Orchester Nr. 1 in A-Moll, Opus 28.

Scherzo, Opus 45.

Chorwerke

Regenlied, Opus 10.

Zwei Stücke für Herrenchor, Opus 14.

Frühlingsnetz, für Herrenchor, 4 Hörner und Klavier, Opus 15.

Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt, für Herrenchor und Hörner, Opus 16.

Zwei Stücke für Herrenchor, Opus 17.

Frühlingshymne, für Alt, Chor und Orchester, Opus 23.

Im Fuschertal, sechs Chorgesänge, Opus 24.

Psalm CXIII, für Solostimmen, Chor und Orchester, Opus 40.

Zwei Stücke für Herrenchor, Opus 41.

Zwei vierstimmige Gesänge mit Klavier, Opus 42.

Werke für Violine beziehungsweise Cello und Klavier

Suite für Violine und Klavier in E-Dur, Opus 11 (siehe Erstausgabe, Edition Schott) .

Suite für Violine und Klavier in Es-Dur, Opus 43.

Sonate für Violine und Klavier, Opus 25.

Ballade für Violine und Klavier, Opus 54.

Romanze für Violine und Klavier, Opus 51.

Sonate für Cello und Klavier in F-Dur, Opus 39.

Violinkonzert in A-Moll, Opus 28 (1878) .

Werke für Klavier

Sturm und Drang - Neun charakteristische Stücke, Opus 5.

Drei Stücke für Klavier zu 4 Händen, Opus 12

Ungarische Tänze für Klavier zu 4 Händen, Opus 22 (später durch den Komponisten orchestriert) .

Vier Klavierstücke, Opus 29.

Georginen - Sechs Stücke für Klavier, Opus 52.

Kammermusik

Klaviertrios, Opus 4 und Opus 33.

Klavierquintett in B-Dur, Opus 30.

Klavierquintett in C-Moll, Opus 54.

Streichquartett in B-Dur, Opus 8 (1860) .

Streichquintett, Opus 9.

Lieder

12 Gesänge, Opus 18.

Beschwörung, Opus 20.

4 Lieder, Opus 21.

7 Lieder aus dem « Wilden Jäger » , Opus 32.

4 Lieder, Opus 34.

8 Lieder, Opus 37 (Leipzig, 1888 oder 1889) .

Wer sich die Musik erkiest, Opus 42.

6 Lieder, Opus 46.

...

27 janvier 1885 : Lors d'un concert spécial donné en l'honneur du couple royal de Saxe, le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans les 2e et 3e mouvements de la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner.

1885 : Max Stägemann, director of the Leipzig Theater, engages Gustav Mahler to conduct alongside Arthur Nikisch for 6 years, beginning in June 1886, but Mahler longs to return to Vienna.

...

Ludwig van Beethoven est de passage à Prague en 1796 (puis en 1798) . Il préfère se loger non pas dans le centre-ville mais de l'autre côté du Pont Charles, dans le quartier Malá Strana, quartier fréquenté par de nombreux artistes à l'époque. Il loge au n° 11 (anciennement, n° 285) de la rue Lázenská dans un hôtel Baroque qui porte aujourd'hui le nom de Palais Beethoven (« Palác Beethoven ») . En tournant au coin de la porte principale du bâtiment, on trouve le porche près duquel on voit une plaque représentant Beethoven.

Beethoven compose plusieurs œuvres pour mandoline, dédiées à la Comtesse Joséphine de Clary qui organisait des soirées musicales à Prague :

Les mouvements pour mandoline et clavecin (WoO 43) .

La Sonatine en do majeur pour mandoline et clavecin (WoO 44a) .

Le thème avec variations en ré majeur pour mandoline et clavecin (WoO 44b) .

L'attic de la salle de concert du « Rudolfinum » accueille plusieurs statues dont une de Beethoven.

Il existe plusieurs traces de passage de Beethoven à Prague. On sait aussi qu'il vint porter son violon chez un fameux luthier, fondateur de l'École de Prague. L'enseigne de sa boutique, située au n° 12 de la rue Nerudova (anciennement n° 210) , représente 3 violons bien mystérieux puisque l'un des 3 est retourné. À Prague, une légende dit que les nuits de pleine lune, les spectres de Malá Strana y viennent pour donner un concert. Aujourd'hui, l'ancienne lutherie est devenue une brasserie pragoise.

On peut également trouver à Prague, au musée Antonín Dvořák (Ke Karlovu 20, Prague 2) , le bureau, la chaise et le portrait de Ludwig van Beethoven, que Dvořák acheta dans la seconde moitié du 19e siècle.

27 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner au Baron Karl von Ostini.

« As the Symphony is to be performed on 10 March, I will arrive in Munich early in the morning of Sunday the 8th, and will be staying again at the “ Vier Jahreszeiten ” (Hotel) . I have asked the Court music-director for a couple of rehearsals because there are very many hidden difficulties, and such like, in the work. There could very well be a rehearsal on the Sunday if “ Herr ” von Levi was agreeable. A few corrections have also to be made to the score. »

Karl von Ostini

Le Baron Karl von Ostini (1830-1895) considérait Richard Wagner comme « le plus grand compositeur de tous les temps » .

...

Baron Karl von Ostini (1830-1895) : « Vorsitzender » of the Munich Wagner Society. His son, Fritz von Ostini, (1861-1927) , who was a journalist and critic, met Anton Bruckner in Bayreuth.

...

Friedrich Fabrizius Max Karl Freiherr von Ostini (geboren 27. Juli 1861 in München ; gestorben 1. Juni 1927 in Pöcking) war ein deutscher Redakteur, Schriftsteller, Humorist und Lyriker.

Fritz von Ostini absolvierte 1880 das Ludwigsgymnasium in München und begann im Anschluß daran an der dortigen Universität Jura zu studieren. Seinen literarischen und künstlerischen Neigungen folgend, wechselte er bald an die Akademie der Bildenden Künste München und war für einige Semester Schüler bei den Professoren Alois Gabl und Ludwig von Herterich.

Ostini publizierte gelegentlich neben dem Studium für die « Süddeutsche Presse ». Mit 26 Jahren (1887) wurde er fester Mitarbeiter der Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten und übernahm die Redaktion des Feuilletons.

Als Doktor Georg Hirth 1896 die Kunst- und Literaturzeitschrift Jugend gründete, wurde Fritz von Ostini deren leitender Redakteur. Er zeichnete mit « F. v. O. », so etwa das Gedicht « Er war ein König ! » über Ludwig II. in der « Jugend » Nummer 35 (1902) .

Von Ostini schrieb weiterhin als Kunstreferent für die Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten und verfasste Artikel für verschiedene Kunstzeitschriften.

Besondere Beachtung fanden unter anderem seine zahlreichen Künstlermonographien, wie zum Beispiel über Eduard Grützner, Franz von Defregger und Julius Diez, mit denen er zum Teil auch freundschaftlich verbunden war.

Fritz von Ostini war verheiratet mit Sophie Hohnhaußen und Vater von drei Söhnen und einer Tochter.

Schriften

Arme Seelen : Geschichten und Schnurren (2. Auflage 1910) , Bildschmuck von Paul Rieth Großes und Kleines (1888) .

Arme Seelen, Geschichten und Schnurren (1905) .

Deutsche Illustratoren (1906) .

Schwarmgeister, Gedichte aus Zeit und Zufall (1908) .

Der kleine König (1909) .

München in der Kriegszeit (1915) .

Tat und Schuld (1919) .

Fröhliche Kindheit (1921) .

Prinzessin Goldkind und die Wunderlilie (1922) .

Wurstel-Peters Mondreise (1922) .

Künstlermonographien

Eduard Grützner (1896) .

Hans Thoma (1900) .

Fritz von Uhde (1902) .

Anselm Feuerbach (1903) .

Arnold Böcklin (1904) .

Anton Braith (1905) .

Franz von Defregger (1905) .

Wilhelm von Kaulbach (1906) .

Adolf Hölzel (1907) .

Wilhelm Busch (1908) .

Leo Samberger (1910) .

Hugo von Habermann (1912) .

Carl Spitzweg (1912) .

Paul Hœcker und seine Schule (1913) .

Franz von Stuck (1920) .

Fritz Erler (1921) .

Aus Moritz von Schwinds Füllhorn (1925) .

...

Février 1885 : 2nd advertisement in the « Hofmeister Monatsbericht » for the full-score and the piano score of the 3rd Symphony. The piano score was in effect an unchanged, uncorrected 2nd edition of the Gustav Mahler - Rudolf Krzyzanowski arrangement, edited by Ferdinand Löwe and Josef Schalk. In her article, « Die vierhandigen Bearbeitungen der Dritten Symphonie von Anton Bruckner » , in : « Bruckner-Jahrbuch 1987-1888 » , Linz (1990) ; pages 67-78, Gertraud Kubacsek-Steinhauer suggests that Gustav Mahler's name was omitted because ...

a) He was no longer in Vienna and no longer a member of the « Wagner-Verein » .

b) Of personal differences between Josef Schalk and Gustav Mahler.

c) As a result of Josef Schalk's increasing involvement in the « Wagner-Verein » (he became its artistic director in 1887) and his desire to emphasize his own crusading zeal for the dissemination of Anton Bruckner's works.

Début février 1885 : Anton Bruckner se rendra successivement en visite à Prague, Bayreuth et Munich. Il visite la ville de Prague dans le cadre de sa dernière tournée organistique internationale.

7 février 1885 : Anton Bruckner inaugure le nouvel orgue du « Rudolfinum » (construit en 1883-1884 par le facteur allemand Wilhelm Sauer, de Francfort sur l'Oder) , en présence du dedicataire du lieu : l'Archiduc d'Autriche et Prince héritier de l'Empire austro-hongrois, Rodolphe François Charles Joseph de Habsbourg-Lorraine (Rudolf Franz Karl Joseph von Habsburg-Lothringen) . Mais tout cela a bien failli être gâchée par des querelles nationalistes : la plupart des invités présents étaient allemandophone et l'on ne retrouvait qu'une poignée de Tchèques. On pouvait s'apercevoir aussi que des éléments décoratifs manquaient encore dans l'enceinte. La presse tchèque mit le blâme sur le fait que trop peu d'artistes tchèques ont été invités à contribuer. (La construction de l'édifice s'est étendue sur une décennie.)

La façade du grand-orgue de la salle Dvořák est celle de l'instrument construit par la maison allemande SAUER pour la grande salle du « Rudolfinum » , en 1883 et 1884. Il fut inauguré par Anton BRUCKNER le 7 février 1885. Il s'agissait d'un orgue de 50 jeux de style symphonique. Cet orgue a été transféré en 1925 par la maison MÖLZER dans la grande salle du Conservatoire de BRNO, après que le parlement se fut installé dans le « Rudolfinum » après 1920. MÖLZER a reconstruit la traction pneumatique. En 1930, la maison des frères RIEGER de Krnov a restauré la transmission qui était défectueuse et modifié la disposition. En 1940, le « Rudolfinum » a retrouvé sa destination de salle de concert. En 1941 et 1942, la maison RIEGER y a construit un orgue neuf de 55 jeux dans la salle Dvořák, en réutilisant la façade de l'orgue SAUER de 1885, ainsi qu'une partie du matériel sonore. En 1957, RIEGER-KLOSS a agrandi l'instrument à 70 jeux. En 1975, RIEGER-KLOSS a reconstruit entièrement l'orgue, tout en gardant la façade de SAUER. Il reste encore quelques jeux de SAUER. La traction des claviers est mécanique et celle des jeux électromécaniques. La console originale a été préservée et est exposée dans une vitrine. Cet instrument jouit d'une excellente réputation.

...

In October 1941, the high-ranking German Nazi official Reinhard Heydrich became patron of the German Philharmonic Orchestra and re-opened the German Concert Hall in Prague, the « Rudolfinum » , founded in the 19th Century, but converted into the Czech Chamber of Deputies after the Great War (1914-1918) . At the festive opening of the newly-renovated « Rudolfinum » , on Thursday, October 16th, to which Heydrich had invited the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to perform Beethoven's 9th Symphony, he reiterated his firm conviction that culture and politics were inseparably intertwined, a point he sought to underline by pointing to the history of the « Rudolfinum » itself. Heydrich recalled that Anton Bruckner had played the organ here, but noted sadly that, after 1918, musical life had become « Czechified » and had, therefore, « degenerated » .

Cutting the ribbon at the re-opening ceremony, Heydrich said :

« The organ console at which Anton Bruckner once sat was smashed with an axe to make way for a bust of Masaryk. »

After 20 years of darkness, the « Rudolfinum » was now once more a « site of German art » .

...

While he attempted to undermine Czech culture and national identity, Reinhard Heydrich emerged as a patron of the arts, an unusual role for a security policeman. Czech higher-education was systematically attacked, but Heydrich built-up the German university in Prague, endowing several new chairs and attempting to transform it from an educational backwater into a leading academic institution. He hoped that it would function as a tool of Empire, providing ideas and surveys useful to the SS in the grisly task of creating a new Nazi civilisation in the Slavonic lands to the East. As a musician himself, Heydrich did not neglect this branch of the arts, although he employed it as a tool of German cultural supremacy. He became a patron of the German Philharmonic Orchestra, a congenial role in view of his father's difficulties with the musical establishment of Prussia, and re-opened the « Rudolfinum » concert-hall in Prague, founded in the 19th Century, but converted at independence into the Czech Chamber of Deputies, something considered by Heydrich an act of desecration. As he remarked cuttingly at the re-opening ceremony :

« The organ console at which Anton Bruckner once sat was smashed with an axe to make way for a bust of Masaryk. »

This one sentence asserted German artistic superiority and dismissed Czech independence as a barbaric anomaly.

Le « Rudolfinum » de Prague

Le « Rudolfinum » est un bâtiment néo-Renaissance situé place Jan Palach à Prague. Il sert de salle de concert (en particulier, pour l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque) et de salle d'expositions (« Galerie Rudolfinum ») .

Le « Rudolfinum » ouvre ses portes le 7 février 1885 comme complexe culturel comprenant des salles d'exposition et une salle de concert. C'est un cadeau de la caisse d'épargne tchèque (« Česká spořitelna ») à la ville de Prague et la nation tchèque à l'occasion du 50e anniversaire de sa fondation. Il doit son nom au prince héritier de l'Empire austro-hongrois, Rodolphe d'Autriche auquel il est dédié.

Le concours architectural qui a conduit à son édification a été remporté par les architectes Josef Zitek et Josef Schulz (son étudiant) , auteurs, en 1881, du Théâtre national.

Le bâtiment a été achevé en 1881, les sculptures sur le pignon du grenier ont été ajoutées en 1884 et au cours de la même année, la salle de concert et les espaces environnants ont été meublés. Le concert d'inauguration eut lieu le 7 février 1885 ainsi que les Ires expositions dans le bâtiment adjacent.

Dans l'entre-deux-guerres, le « Rudolfinum » servit au parlement tchécoslovaque de salle plénière. Il est aujourd'hui utilisé, tel qu'initialement prévu, comme salle de concerts et d'expositions artistiques. La salle Dvorak, du nom du grand compositeur tchèque, est un site exceptionnel pour les concerts et accueille de nombreux évènements commémoratifs du « Printemps de Prague » . Le Suk Hall, plus petit, est principalement utilisé pour les petits concerts vocaux et instrumentaux. La magnificence de l'intérieur et du bâtiment dans son ensemble et la qualité des concerts eux-mêmes font d'une soirée au « Rudolfinum » un moment inoubliable.

L'ensemble du « Rudolfinum » a subi des changements importants au cours de la reconstruction générale qui eut lieu entre 1990-1992, selon le projet de Karel Prager. Au cours de cette reconstruction, les salles de concert furent rénovées.

Le « Rudolfinum » est également remarquable pour les figures des célèbres compositeurs qui se tiennent au sommet de son toit. Il existe une célèbre nouvelle romanesque tchèque intitulée, « Mendelssohn est sur le toit » , qui raconte l'histoire de 2 travailleurs tchèques qui reçurent l'ordre des Nazis de retirer la statue du compositeur juif Felix Mendelssohn. Par erreur, ils détruisirent celle de l'idole d'Adolf Hitler : Richard Wagner. La raison ? Il avait le plus gros nez !

...

Nommé, en 1942, successeur de Konstantin von Neurath, protecteur de Bohême et de Moravie, Reinhard Heydrich mène dans ces régions une politique à la fois répressive et paternaliste, améliorant sensiblement le sort des populations paysannes et ouvrières (négligées depuis 1919 au profit de la bourgeoisie) .

...

Le 24 septembre 1941, Adolf Hitler nomme Reinhard Heydrich suppléant (« stellvertreter ») du gouverneur du Protectorat de Bohême-Moravie, Konstantin von Neurath, jugé peu efficace et officiellement en congé de maladie. Si von Neurath reste officiellement en place, il n'a plus son mot à dire et la situation est claire pour tout le monde : Heydrich est seul Maître à bord à Prague.

Traduisant une notable extension de ses pouvoirs, cette nomination permet, en outre, à Heydrich d'avoir des rapports directs avec les plus hauts-dirigeants du 3^e « Reich », sans devoir passer par l'intermédiaire d'Heinrich Himmler. De plus, il est persuadé qu'elle lui conférera un profil d'homme d'État.

Il tire ainsi parti de ses succès et fait oublier ses échecs comme l'accusation d'homosexualité portée contre le général Werner von Fritsch, accusation montée de toutes pièces et qui débouche sur l'acquiescement de von Fritsch par le tribunal de guerre du « Reich », le 17 mars 1938.

Dès son arrivée à Prague, Heydrich fait arrêter et condamner à mort le premier ministre Alois Eliáš, qui avait eu des contacts avec le gouvernement tchécoslovaque, en exil à Londres. Il met au pas le président du gouvernement fantoche, Emil Hácha, afin de dissiper toute idée d'indépendance vis-à-vis du « Reich », aussi minime soit-elle.

La population tchécoslovaque ne faisant pas preuve d'assez de docilité, Heydrich utilise rapidement son arme de prédilection : la terreur.

Entre la date de son arrivée, le 27 septembre, et le 29 novembre, 400 Tchécoslovaques sont exécutés. La « Gestapo » s'installe au palais Pecek et fait disparaître plus de 4,000 opposants ou résistants. Heydrich entreprend aussi de vider le Protectorat de sa population juive, en la déportant dans le camp de concentration de Theresienstadt, puis dans les camps d'extermination.

Il veut aussi maintenir la production industrielle tchécoslovaque, vitale pour l'effort de guerre allemand et ne plus apparaître uniquement sous l'image d'un bourreau. Il augmente les rations alimentaires, met en place des soupes populaires et lutte contre le marché noir.

Ses responsabilités dans le protectorat n'empêchent pas Heydrich de continuer à diriger le « Reichssicherheitshauptamt » (RSHA), au prix d'allers-retours incessants entre Prague (Tchécoslovaquie) et Berlin (Allemagne). Il veille notamment à la répression des tendances anglophiles d'une partie de la jeunesse allemande, qui apprécie le « swing ». Il suit également avec attention le recrutement des prostituées du salon Kitty, bordel de luxe fréquenté par de nombreuses personnalités, dont les chambres sont truffées de micros, sans aucun résultat probant.

Au bout de quelques mois de règne absolu sur le Protectorat de Bohême-Moravie, Heydrich se sait craint. Il se croit aussi respecté, voire apprécié par la « partie saine » de la population.

Au matin du 27 mai 1942, Heydrich est au faite de sa puissance : promu Obergruppenführer, Protecteur, dans les faits, de Bohême-Moravie, directeur du RSHA, décoré à de nombreuses reprises, reconnu par les plus hautes personnalités du Reich, dont Hitler lui-même, il envisage de transposer en France les méthodes qu'il a appliquées à Prague.

Pour lui l'avenir est porteur de promesses et, à seulement trente-huit ans, il veut poursuivre son ascension.

Comme à son habitude, Heydrich est seul avec son chauffeur, sans escorte ni protection particulière, à l'arrière d'un cabriolet décapoté. Un peu avant 10 heures 30 du matin, sa voiture ralentit dans un virage sur la route qui le mène au quartier-général établi dans le château de Hradcany.

3 résistants tchèques (dont 2 formés à Londres) sont parachutés en Tchécoslovaquie avec mission d'assassiner Heydrich dans une embuscade. Le chef du commando, Josef Valčík, signale l'arrivée de la Mercedes de Heydrich à l'aide d'un miroir. Lorsque la voiture passe à moins de 3 mètres de Jozef Gabčík, celui-ci braque sa Sten en direction de Heydrich, mais l'arme s'enraye et aucun coup ne part. Alors qu'Heydrich se redresse et dégaine son pistolet, le 3e membre du commando, Jan Kubiš, lance une grenade qui explose à l'arrière du véhicule. Les éclats transpercent le siège arrière et blessent Heydrich au dos. Mission accomplie.

Il n'est transporté à l'hôpital Bulovka, dans une fourgonnette de livraison, qu'au bout d'une heure. La blessure de Heydrich n'est en elle-même pas mortelle. Mais en traversant le siège arrière, les éclats de grenade ont également fait pénétrer dans la plaie des particules du rembourrage constitué de crins de cheval. La septicémie est foudroyante et rapidement généralisée.

Le 4 juin 1942, à 9 heures 24, Heydrich meurt à l'âge de 38 ans.

Rapatrié à Berlin, le corps de Heydrich a droit à des funérailles nationales, au cimetière des Invalides, orchestrées avec toute la pompe nazie. Heinrich Himmler salue tout d'abord « le caractère d'une rare pureté du défunt qui, du plus profond de son âme et de son sang, a compris, réalisé et matérialisé la conception du monde d'Adolf Hitler » .

Après le « SS-Reichsführer » , c'est le « Führer » lui-même, Adolf Hitler, qui rend hommage au défunt :

« Je n'ai que peu de mots à dédier à ce mort. Il était l'un des meilleurs Nationaux-Socialistes, l'un des plus vaillants défenseurs de l'idée du " Reich " allemand, et l'un des adversaires les plus résolus de tous les ennemis du " Reich ". »

(Adolf Hitler, 9 juin 1942.)

En privé, Hitler se déchaîne contre l'imprudence de Heydrich :

« Des gestes héroïques comme se déplacer dans une voiture ouverte sont des folies dont la nation n'avait pas besoin. Les hommes de la stature politique de Heydrich devraient avoir conscience qu'on les guette comme du gibier et que d'innombrables personnes n'ont qu'une idée en tête : Comment les tuer ? »

Cet assassinat est prétexte à une répression allemande particulièrement féroce : le village de Lidice (Tchécoslovaquie) , par exemple, est rayé de la carte.

Après un intérim assuré par Heinrich Himmler, Ernst Kaltenbrunner reprend les rênes du RSHA, le 30 janvier 1943, sans jamais atteindre le niveau de pouvoir et d'influence de son prédécesseur.

De mai 1942 à avril 1945, Lina Heydrich vit dans le château et le domaine de Jungfer-Breschnan, près de Prague, qu'elle fait notamment entretenir par des détenus extraits du camp de concentration de Theresienstadt. C'est dans le parc du château qu'elle fait inhumer, en présence de Heinrich Himmler, son fils Klaus, mort lors d'un accident de la route subi le 24 octobre 1943.

Lors de la fuite devant les troupes soviétiques, elle réquisitionne les services du conducteur de car impliqué dans l'accident mortel de son fils, dont la « Gestapo » avait pourtant déclaré qu'il n'avait aucune responsabilité dans le décès de Klaus : il disparaît lors du voyage ...

Poursuivie et condamnée lors du processus de dénazification en Allemagne, Lina Heydrich multiplie les procédures pour se voir finalement disculpée ; elle intente ensuite procès sur procès et finit par obtenir une pension sur la base d'un jugement déclarant que Reinhard Heydrich avait été la victime d'un acte de guerre. Après avoir défendu la mémoire de son mari dans la presse et à travers ses mémoires, allant jusqu'à affirmer à maintes reprises qu'il n'avait eu aucune part de responsabilité dans l'extermination des Juifs, elle meurt sur son île natale, le 14 août 1985.

...

The « Rudolfinum » is a music auditorium and art gallery in Prague, Czech Republic. It is designed in the neo-Renaissance style and is situated on Jan Palach Square on the bank of the river Vltava.

The « Rudolfinum » has been the home of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra since 1946 and is one of the main venues of the Prague Spring International Music Festival held each year, in May and June. The building was designed by architect Josef Zitek and his student Josef Schulz, and was opened 8 February 1885. It is named in honour of Rudolf, Crown Prince of Austria, who presided over the opening.

The « Rudolfinum » 's Dvořák Hall is one of the oldest concert halls in Europe and is noted for its excellent acoustics. On 4 January 1896, Antonín Dvořák himself conducted the Czech Philharmonic in the hall in its 1st ever concert.

The building also contains the « Galerie Rudolfinum » , an art gallery that features some of the city's most interesting and imaginative retrospectives, focusing on contemporary Czech and international artists. The beautiful building is decorated with statues of the world's most famous composers - it was the one of Jewish composer Felix Mendelssohn that was particularly bothersome to the Nazis during their occupation of the city. With the order to remove the statue, the job was given to a couple of Czech labourers who unfortunately had no idea what Mendelssohn looked like. Remembering their lessons in « racial science » , they decided to get rid of the statue that had the biggest nose. It was only after they had finished the job that they realized the statue they had pulled-down was ... Richard Wagner's.

...

The « Rudolfinum » is one of the most famous concert halls in Prague - it is the 2nd most important pseudo-Renaissance building after the National Theatre, in Prague.

Crown prince Rudolf became the patron of the project and the building was named after him. Well-known Prague architects Ignác Ullmann, Antonín V. Barvitius, Josef Zitek, Josef Schulz a F. Beníšek, as well as Viennese architects A. Wieleman, Otto Thienemann, G. Niemann, V. Lunche a Köchlin were invited to enter their bids into the project competition. The winners (Josef Schulz and his student Josef Zitek) presented the 1st plans in the year 1875. The façade is an analogy of the fire destroyed « Semper Oper » in Dresden (1838-1841) . The building was finished in the year 1881, the sculptures in the attic gable come from 1884 and, during the same year, the concert-hall and the surrounding spaces were furnished.

The inauguration concert was held on February 7, 1885 and, in this year, also began exhibitions in the adjacent building.

The « Rudolfinum » is the seat of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra.

The Dvořák Hall is a concert-hall with excellent acoustics, appropriate for Oratorios and Symphonic and chamber music. Exceptionally high-quality organ.

...

The « Rudolfinum » is a 19th Century Czech concert-hall that served as the 1st Czechoslovak Parliament building, from 1918 to 1938. When the Germans occupied Prague, they changed the « Rudolfinum » into a German concert-hall and renamed it : the German House of Art. Reinhard Heydrich, the acting « Reich » Protector in Bohemia and Moravia, was a music-lover eager to inaugurate the German House of Art with the bellowing sounds of a German Symphony. While admiring the sculptures adorning the roof of the « Rudolfinum » , Heydrich was revolted to find a statue of Felix Mendelssohn, the 19th Century German composer who had Jewish roots. Infuriated, Heydrich ordered the statue toppled at once. Within hours, 2 Czech underlings found themselves on the roof of the « Rudolfinum » , searching for the statue of the Jew. Since neither knew which statue was Mendelssohn, the workers decided to measure the noses of each of the statues. The one with the biggest nose, they decided, had to be the Jew. After locating the largest nosed statue, they put a rope around its neck and toppled it to the ground.

On the opening night of the German House of Art, Heydrich looked-up to the statues and nearly fainted on the spot. The statue that had been destroyed was that of Richard Wagner.

This semi-apocryphal tale is often related in Prague as a proud example, in pure Hasek fashion, of moral victory in the face of occupation. Jiří Weil spun a transcendent version in his novel : « Mendelssohn Is on the Roof » . The novel, which examines almost every conceivable angle of the Nazi extermination of Prague's Jews, places statues (and not only Mendelssohn's) at the heart of its chronicle of genocide.

...

You can see an impressive neo-Renaissance building near the Manesuv Bridge in Prague Old Town. It is a seat of Czech Philharmonic Orchestra and a place of concerts and exhibitions. The world famous Festival of Classical music « Prague Spring » takes place here, in the Dvořák Hall. The building is called « Rudolfinum » (or « House of Artists ») .

The « Rudolfinum » was built by the banking institution « Böhmisches Sparkasse » (Czech Savings Bank) on the occasion of its 50th anniversary. It was intended as a monumental house of arts with a picture gallery, concert halls and a collection of antiquities. It was named « Rudolfinum » after the crown prince Rudolph of Austria.

The « Rudolfinum » was built by important Czech architects of the 19th Century : Josef Zitek, who also built the National Theater, and Josef Schulz (his student) , the author of the National Museum. The building was opened in 1885.

The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra had its 1st concert there, in 1896, conducted by Antonín Dvořák. The concert-hall was called Dvořák Hall, later.

The « Rudolfinum » was a seat of the Chamber of Deputies of the National Assembly, between 1919 and 1939. It was called « House of Artists » since 1918, because the name of the Habsburg monarch Rudolph was politically unacceptable.

During the Nazi occupation (at the beginning of the 1940's) , the « Rudolfinum » was restored for the German Philharmonic Orchestra. Reinhard Heydrich, the Nazi Protector of Bohemia and Moravia, ordered that a statue of composer Mendelssohn-Bartholdy has to be removed from the « Rudolfinum » , because of his « non-Aryan » origin. The workers accidentally began to remove a statue of Richard Wagner, Adolf Hitler's favourite composer. Fortunately, the mistake was recognized soon enough. The statue of Mendelsohn-Bartholdy was hidden during the War and, afterwards, it was returned back to its place.

After the World War II, the « Rudolfinum » became the seat of Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. The Festival of the « Prague Spring » took place there, in 1946, for the 1st time.

You can see statues of famous composers, such as Mozart, Beethoven and others, on the attic of the building. The staircase leading from the square is decorated with statues of music Muses. There is a statue of composer Antonín Dvořák in front of the « Rudolfinum » .

Dvořák Hall is the most important hall in the « Rudolfinum » . It has excellent acoustics and there are 1,023 seats. You can also visit the beautiful « café » in the building.

...

The construction of the « Rudolfinum » , a multi-purpose building whose concept was unique at the time, was initiated by the « Böhmische Sparkasse » (« Česká spořitelna ») . Founded in 1825, this savings bank was the oldest financial institution in the Kingdom of Bohemia.

The prestigious building project bore witness not only to the financial strength and potential of the « Böhmische Sparkasse » , but also to its self-confidence, sense of corporate social responsibility and belief in the supreme role of art. The new building was to be located on the right bank of the Vltava, just opposite the Prague Castle.

An early construction effort on the site had given rise to a riding hall ; this was later replaced by a prison, which, in turn, gave way to a sawmill owned by the leading businessman Sir Vojtěch Lanna. Now, it seemed the site would finally be used for a truly outstanding purpose.

The exceptional status of the investor and the project itself is evident from the list of illustrious names that took part in the architectural tender : Antonín V. Barvitius, V. Lunche a Köchlin, G. Niemann, Otto Thienemann, V. I. Ullmann, A. Wieleman, Josef Zitek and Josef Schulz.

The jury, made-up of leading architects of the day such as K. von Ferstel, Theophil von Hansen or Friedrich von Schmidt, chose Zitek's and Schulz's project, even though contemporary opinions criticized it for having overly suppressed the required architectural unity of the building's mass and outward appearance to clearly distinguish its 2 functionally differentiated parts : the concert premises and the gallery. The façade of the concert-hall, with a rusticated elevated ground-floor that is separated from the other floors by a string course, faces southwards to the present-day Jan Palach Square.

The façade is articulated by Ionic columns and topped by a balustrade decorated with vases and statues of famous musicians. The gallery part, with 2 monumental corner-towers in its north façade, has the same decorative elements, which gives the building a unified visual appearance. The entrance in the west-front, facing the Vltava embankment, leads to the impressive Ceremony Hall of the « Rudolfinum » , lined by 25 arches. The central ceremonial staircase leads-up to the gallery rooms. Translucent ceilings ensure proper illumination of the collections.

The Czech-German animosity did not escape the attention of contemporary press. The « Rudolfinum » often appeared, e.g. , on the pages of the Czech satirical weekly « Humoristické listy » . In one of the magazine's jokes, a visitor to the Rudolfinum asks :

« Tell me, please, is there an exhibition of wooden sticks on ? »

« No, my dear sir, you are mistaken. These are only the “ Ziegenhainer ” (student walking sticks) of the “ Burschenschaft ” whose permanent residence here gives our house its character. »

The « Rudolfinum » was inaugurated on 7 February 1885, 10 years after its construction started. Crown prince Rudolph was present at the opening ceremony, but the great event was nearly spoiled by nationalist quarrels (most of the guests present at the inauguration spoke German, there was only a handful of Czechs) and the missing decoration of the Ceremony Hall. Contemporary Czech press blamed it on the fact that too few Czech artists had been asked to contribute.

Evoking the world of ancient Greece and Rome, Italian Renaissance and German music, the statues on the top of the building and other sculptures were also resented by the contemporary Czech society whose representatives would have preferred works commemorating leading Czech artists or, at least, artists who had been born or worked in the Czech lands. In protest against the poor representation of national art, those Czech artists and craftsmen who did take part in decorating the building refused to finish their work.

After its opening the « Rudolfinum » became the seat of the Czech Philharmonic and, also, of what was probably the most important art association in the Czech lands - The Fine-Arts Society (« Krasoumná jednota ») or, in German, « Kunstverein für Böhmen ». Another association that found a worthy home here was the Bohemian Society of the Patriotic Friends of Art. This organization, one of the oldest Czech associations of art-lovers, brought to the « Rudolfinum » the picture gallery previously housed by the Czernin Palace, in Hradčany.

On Saturday, 4 January 1896, the « Rudolfinum » witnessed the inaugural concert of the Czech Philharmonic which forever linked the Orchestra's beginnings with one of the most famous Czech composers. Antonín Dvořák ascended the stage to conduct his own works : the « Slavonic Rhapsody » No. 3 in A-flat major, the world-premiere of his « Biblical songs » Nos. 1 to 5, his « Othello Overture » and, also, the already world-famous Symphony No. 9 « From the New World ». The concert-hall that saw the performance, now the home-stage of our leading Orchestra, bears Dvořák's name today.

The well-known quotation says that, in times of War, the Muses fall silent. In the « Rudolfinum », however, the Muses fell silent once again after the War when, in 1918, the newly-created Czechoslovak State started looking for a worthy home for its parliamentary chamber. The building was adapted for its new purpose in several stages, between 1919 and 1932. The alterations were supervised mostly by architects Václav Roštlapil and Rudolf Křiženecký and involved substantial changes of both function and appearance, especially in the interior.

During the 1st phase, the stage was brought level with the concert-hall floor ; the organ was removed shortly afterwards. The loggias, galleries and lounges were also adapted. Connecting the north and east parts of the building together with construction changes in the lobby facilitated communication between the various parliamentary premises. To create rooms that could be used for the meetings of parliamentary clubs and for the newly-founded canteen, the builders had to lower the ceilings and partition the halls in the gallery wing of the « Rudolfinum » .

The rehabilitation of the « Rudolfinum » as an arts centre began, somewhat paradoxically, during the Second World War. The Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia was not an autonomous political entity so there was no longer any need to house the nation's supreme legislative and political body. Although not all of the original plans were implemented, the alterations made between 1940 and 1942 brought the building back to its original use, if only for the German Philharmonic Orchestra, active in Bohemia until 1945.

On February 11th and 12th, 1941, the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra appeared (at the instruction of Josef Goebbels) , in Berlin and Dresden. Conductor Václav Talich put the entire « My Country » (« Má Vlast ») Symphonic cycle (by composer Bedřich Smetana) on the program - a brave move in programming. But after its success in the bosom of the 3rd « Reich » , the cycle could, once again, be performed in the Protectorate. The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra could not shy from giving concerts directly for the ruling regime : in March 1942, it played « My Country » for the Czech National-Socialist Union and, in April 1944, it gave a concert to celebrate « the 55th birthday of “ Führer ” Adolf Hitler » .

Architects Bohumír Kozák and Antonín Engel, the latter a student of Josef Zíték, restored the original function and decoration of the concert-stage and auditorium, but also tried to improve the hall's acoustics, which had been criticized ever since the beginning of concert activities in the building. They also made an important creative contribution by adding another small concert-hall on the ground-floor, the present-day Suk Hall, whose design and decoration correspond with the original design of the « Rudolfinum » interiors.

The « Rudolfinum » served as the administrative offices of the occupying Nazis during WWII.

The plot of a novel is one thing and reality another. While you would indeed find Felix Mendelssohn on the roof of the « Rudolfinum » , you would be looking in vain for Richard Wagner. His statue has never been there. The statue looking toward the Charles Bridge on the photo is that of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart.

The history of the « Rudolfinum » under the Nazi occupation is connected with the last finished novel of Jiří Weil, a Czech author, literary critic and journalist. A deeply symbolic story, Weil's « Mendelssohn Is on the Roof » begins with an order of the acting « Reichsprotektor » Reinhard Heydrich to remove the statue of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy from the « Rudolfinum » parapet, since the composer's Jewishness allegedly taints the shrine of German art.

2 Czech workers, supervised by a « Schutzstaffel » member, are sent-up to remove the « enemy statue » , but barely escape demolishing the statue of the Nazi idol Richard Wagner, misled by his prominent nose. With the help of a learned Jew, they discover their mistake just in time to avoid a tragic fate - while, below them, Heydrich himself watches a performance of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » as the stone statue of the Commendatore drags the rake into hell.

In 1946, the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra returned to the « Rudolfinum » and, until a major reconstruction in the 1990's, shared it with the Academy of Performing Arts and the Prague Conservatoire. While the southern part of the « Rudolfinum » continued to serve as a venue for concerts and other music performances, the northern part had to get used to a quite different form of « art » .

To accommodate the requirements of the secondary school curriculum, the Ceremony Hall was converted into a « gymnasium » for Conservatoire students. Ropes for climbing were suspended from the ceiling and the majestic space of the hall resounded with the thumping of balls and the shouted instructions of teachers rather than sophisticated art discussions. In the late 1980's, the Ceremony Hall almost fell victim to plans for the demolition of the central staircase and the construction of another concert-hall. Fortunately, these came to nothing and the hall was preserved in its original appearance.

(Photo) The « Rudolfinum » in 1947, with the Communist 5 pointed star on the square whose name has changed several times with the caprices of history.

Until 1915 it had been called « Na Rejdišti » (The Riding Grounds) . In 1915, it was renamed « Empress Zita Square » . Subsequently, it was « Smetana Square » , from 1919 to 1942 ; « Mozartplatz » during the Nazi occupation ; and, once again, « Smetana Square » after the Liberation. From the 1950's, the toughest decade of the Communist era, to 1990, the people of Prague walked across the « Red Army Square » . « Jan Palach Square » , the present name commemorating the voluntary martyrdom of a student protesting against the 1968 Soviet occupation, can be found in city maps issued after 1990.

With the designation of the « Rudolfinum » , as a cultural monument in 1989, it became quite clear that the whole building was in urgent need of reconstruction. It also needed new technical equipment, air conditioning, security systems, a gas boiler room, etc. The reconstruction, which took place between 1990 and 1992, was entrusted to a team of architects led by Karel Prager. Their task was to carry-out the required work while respecting as much as possible the original design by Josef Zitek and Josef Schulz.

After its re-opening, in 1992, the whole building was, once again, dedicated to the service of the arts, to which it had been consecrated from the start. The Czech Philharmonic Orchestra is currently its main resident institution ; the reconstructed exhibition premises in the northern part serve the « Rudolfinum » Gallery.

...

Born in the German city of Halle, near Leipzig on March 7th, 1904, Reinhard (Eugen Tristan) Heydrich (nicknamed « The Blond Beast » by the Nazis ; and « Hangman Heydrich » by others) was raised in a cultured, musical environment. His father founded the Halle Conservatory of Music and was a Wagnerian Opera singer, while his mother was an accomplished pianist. Young Heydrich trained seriously as a violinist, developing expert skill and a lifelong passion for the violin.

...

The 2nd of 3 children, Reinhard Heydrich's father, Bruno, was a singer and minor composer, and his mother Elizabeth came from a well-to-do musical family. The Heydrichs intended Reinhard to have a musical career, and taught him to play the violin, a skill he retained for the rest of his life.

...

Reinhard Heydrich regarded the repression of indigenous cultures in occupied Europe as an essential pre-condition for the creation of a flourishing German culture in the East. This included a policy of « intellectual sterilization », permitting the local population no more than basic vocational training. According to Heydrich, vocational experience and cultural Germanization had to be the goals of the Czech education system. In the autumn of 1941, he ordered that Czech history lessons at school were to be cancelled in favour of German classes.

Heydrich's « educational policy » was very much in line with Heinrich Himmler's view, articulated in May 1940, that schooling for the local population in the occupied territories should be reduced to « simple arithmetic up to 500 at most ; writing one's name ; a doctrine that it is divine law to obey the Germans and to be honest, industrious and good ». In February 1942, Heydrich further announced that he intended to « strike violently » at the heart of the Czech teaching establishment, which he saw as the « training corps of the opposition », and threatened that he would drastically reduce the number of Czech secondary schools. Czech youth, he noted bitterly, had for too long been misled by its « thoroughly chauvinistic teachers » .

The collaborationist press echoed the view that education was an unnecessary luxury for the majority of the Czech population. On 1 May 1942, Labour Day, the widely circulated paper « České slovo » commented :

« The fact that we have, at present, 70,000 secondary school pupils is economically unbearable. »

Boys in secondary education, the paper argued, should leave school immediately in order to become apprentices and attend professional schools after training. The aim of these measures, as a British Intelligence Report pointedly remarked, was to turn Czech youths « into a race of slaves which the “ Herrenvolk ” system requires » .

Heydrich pursued a similar policy line towards the universities. He announced that the Czech University in Prague, which according to the University Act of 1920 had assumed the sole legal succession of the former Charles University and had been « temporarily » closed after student unrest in 1939 during which 9 students had been shot and 1,200 arrested, would never re-open. Henceforth, the German University of Prague, 73 % of whose academic staff consisted of Nazi Party members, would be the only remaining university in Prague.

Heydrich insisted :

« The oldest university of the Reich' should “ not only maintain a status worthy of its historical tradition ” but also serve as a “ pathbreaking ” institution for a new form of academia that “ infuses scholarship with the ' völkisch ' necessities ” of the New Age. »

In institutional terms, the university was to work closely with a new and independent educational foundation, later called the Reinhard Heydrich Foundation. The purpose of the foundation was to undertake research on the « “ völkisch ”, cultural, political and economic conditions of Bohemia and Moravia as well as the peoples in the Eastern and Southeastern European region » . Overall, the Heydrich Foundation comprised 8 institutes occupying the buildings of the dissolved Czech University. The directors of the institutes simultaneously served as professors at the German Charles University so that a close link between the university and the foundation could be guaranteed.

The foundation was a key element of Heydrich's long-term vision for the Protectorate's place in Nazi Germany's academic landscape, which he outlined to Martin Bormann, in May 1942. He flagged 2 principal political tasks for future academic scholarship in the Protectorate : 1st, to conduct research into the history of Bohemia and Moravia ; and 2ndly, actively to pursue scholarship on the re-Germanization of South-eastern Europe more generally. In essence, the Reinhard Heydrich Foundation was to conduct scientific studies that would facilitate the Germanization of the region. With regard to the intended denationalization and depoliticization of the population, so-called « tschechenkundliche » (Czechological) studies were conducted in order to demonstrate the Centuries-old positive German influence on the region.

But Heydrich's cultural Imperialism, aimed at undermining and eventually eradicating Czech culture, was by no means limited to academia. It was also to be applied to the field of architecture. When, on 4 December 1941, Albert Speer visited Heydrich in Prague, in order to negotiate future contingents of Czech slave labourers to be sent to the Old « Reich » , they also discussed the architectural future of Prague. One of Heydrich's aims was to turn Prague into a thriving German city, the gateway of the New Nazi Empire into the Balkans and the occupied East. After a 2 hour sight-seeing tour of the city, Heydrich and Speer contemplated a variety of architectural plans for the post-War rebuilding of Prague as a German city, including the construction of new German university buildings and a German Opera House as well as a new German government complex around the castle. Furthermore, the city was to be encircled by a major ring road that would link-up with the German « autobahn » system. In architectural matters, too, Speer found Heydrich to be refreshingly straight forward :

« There was no comparison with all those “ Gauleiters ”, who indulged in their hobby-horses, plans that were technically or architecturally impossible, perhaps, an old dream from their youth or their wives' fantasies, which they obstinately stuck to. By contrast, Heydrich was uncomplicated. He had only a few objections to my suggestions, all of which showed his sensible approach to the problem. If his objections were impractical for technical reasons, he was prepared to be convinced of this instantly. »

While he attempted to undermine and eventually eradicate Czech culture and national identity, Heydrich emerged as a patron of German arts. Particularly in the field of music, he energetically pushed for cultural Germanization. Under the ægis of Heydrich, Prague celebrated the 150th anniversary of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's death, on 5 December 1941, with considerable pomp - including the renaming of Smetana Square as « Mozart Platz » , a number of elaborate Mozart exhibitions and guest-performances by the Vienna State Opera. Heydrich also planned the establishment of a permanent Opera in Prague, in 1943-1944, a plan supported by Josef Goebbels but which, despite personal discussions between Heydrich and the « Reich » Finance Minister, had to be postponed for War-related reasons.

In October 1941, Heydrich became patron of the German Philharmonic Orchestra and re-opened the German Concert Hall in Prague, the « Rudolfinum » , founded in the 19th Century, but converted into the Czech Chamber of Deputies after the Great War. At the festive opening of the newly-renovated « Rudolfinum » , on 16 October, to which Heydrich had invited the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to perform Ludwig van Beethoven's 9th Symphony, he reiterated his firm conviction that culture and politics were inseparably intertwined, a point he sought to underline by pointing to the history of the « Rudolfinum » itself. Heydrich recalled that Anton Bruckner had played the organ here, but noted sadly that, after 1918, musical life had become « Czechified » and had, therefore, « degenerated » . After 20 years of darkness, the « Rudolfinum » was now, once more, a « site of German art » .

The opening of the « Rudolfinum » gave Heydrich an opportunity to reflect on his cultural policies in the Protectorate. After urging those engaged in cultural work « always to act as German artists in the spirit of the “ Reich ” » , he pledged that, as a professed admirer of the arts, he would provide German artists with all « the inspirational and material conditions they need for their work » . He, then, reminded his audience of the close inter-connection between « art and politics, race and character » and the particular relevance of the arts for « the soul and the heart of our people » .

He observed :

« Historical periods of true greatness and true inner-meaning have always prompted a flourishing of true art and genuine ability. »

Times of « cultural and ideological decline » , on the other hand, were historical periods in which Jewry thrived. It was the Jews, Heydrich insisted, who had « injected the Czech people with the madness of independent statehood and made it blind to their self-evident belonging to the “ Reich ” » .

Heydrich also wanted to start a new cultural tradition by establishing Prague's « Cultural Week » as « a festive manifestation of German power » . This was to be a week-long display of German cultural achievements, particularly in the field of music, which he considered a source of spiritual recreation « in great times of struggle » . He firmly believed that such a display of cultural superiority, coupled with the political message of abandoning Slavic influences in the Protectorate, would have « the greatest impact on the Slav ; it testifies to our power and culture and eases the integration of the racially desired part of the (Czech) population » . As patron of the Festival, Heydrich opened the 1st concert, on 15 May 1942 : Bruckner's 8th Symphony performed by the German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague (« Deutsche philharmonische Orchester Prags ») and their head-conductor Joseph Keilberth, with whom Heydrich occasionally played « house music » in his country mansion. Shortly thereafter, he and Lina attended a concert given by the famous « Leipzig Thomaner-Choir » , during which the choirboys, much to their delight, sang Johann Sebastian Bach's Motets in « Hitler Youth » uniforms.

On the evening of 26 May 1942, the night before his assassination, an event of special emotional relevance to Heydrich was staged in the Wallenstein Palace : a Violin Concerto composed by Heydrich's father, Bruno. As a special tribute to his father (whom he had treated rather disdainfully and unsympathetically, between 1931 and his death in 1938) , he had engaged a Quartet of former employees of the Halle Conservatory who played those pieces from Bruno's Opera « Amen » that celebrated its hero figure, Reinhard. One of the Opera's more memorable pieces, «

Reinhard's Crime » , was wisely omitted by the musicians. Visibly touched by the event, Heydrich displayed his softer side : he invited the « Oberlandräte » and several senior civil servants and their wives to join him for a surprise banquet at the fashionable Hotel Avalon where he greeted his guests with unusual friendliness, kissing the ladies' hands and presenting himself as a « Master of etiquette, entertaining, interested in everyone, a charming conversationalist » .

...

In September of 1941, the ever-ambitious Heydrich had achieved favoured status with Adolf Hitler and was, thus, appointed Deputy « Reich Protector » of Bohemia and Moravia, in former Czechoslovakia, and set-up headquarters in Prague. Soon after his arrival, he established a Jewish ghetto at Theresienstadt.

He also established a successful policy of offering incentives to Czech workers, rewarding them with food and privileges if they filled Nazi production quotas and displayed loyalty to the « Reich » . At the same time, Heydrich's « Gestapo » and SD agents conducted a brutal crack-down of the Czech resistance movement.

« SS Obergruppenführer » Heydrich was, by now, a supremely arrogant young man who liked to travel between his country-home and headquarters in Prague in an open top green Mercedes car without an armed escort as a show of confidence in his intimidation of the resistance and successful pacification of the population.

December 1941 : Staging of the Mozart week in Prague. Karl Hermann Frank made a speech describing the city as « Mozart's 2nd home » , a cradle of German art and culture. To push the message home, Smetana Square was renamed after the German composer. Heydrich's ultimate aim was to convert Prague into one of the leading cities of the « Reich » , the gateway to the new Nazi Empire in the Balkans and the occupied East. He dreamed of transforming the city into a monument to his own greatness with the assistance of Adolf Hitler's architect, Albert Speer, a figure Heydrich was eager to cultivate because of his friendship with the « Führer » . According to his wife, he considered Speer's very agreement to visit the Protectorate and discuss the project as a sign of Hitler's special favour. Heydrich planned to rebuild Prague, like Berlin, in the Nazi Imperial style, with a German Opera House and a new government complex around Hradčany Castle. The city was to be encircled by a ring-road and linked by « autobahn » to the rest of the « Reich » . This grandiose vision, which aped Hitler's plans for Berlin and other major cities, showed how far Heydrich had emerged from Heinrich Himmler's shadow. He clearly now considered himself a candidate for the inner-circle of Nazi power, a view confirmed by his enthusiastic reception at the « Führer » headquarters, in February 1942.

On May 27th, 1942, as Heydrich's car slowed to round a sharp turn in the roadway, it came under attack from Free Czech agents who had been trained in England and brought to Czechoslovakia to assassinate him. They shot at Heydrich, then, threw a bomb which exploded, wounding him. He managed to get-out of the car, draw his pistol and shoot back at the assassins before collapsing in the street.

Heinrich Himmler rushed his own private doctors to Prague to help Heydrich, who held-on for several days, but died on June 4th from blood poisoning brought-on by fragments of auto upholstery, steel, and his own uniform that had lodged in his spleen.

In Berlin, the Nazis staged a highly-elaborate State funeral with Hitler calling « SS Obergruppenführer » Reinhard Heydrich : « the man with the iron heart » . For the occasion, the « Berlin Staatskapelle » played Richard Wagner « Siegfried's Funeral Music » .

Meanwhile, the « Gestapo » and SS hunted down and murdered the Czech agents, resistance members, and anyone suspected of being involved in Heydrich's death, totaling over 1,000 persons. In addition, 3,000 Jews were deported from the ghetto at Theresienstadt for extermination. In Berlin, 500 Jews were arrested, with 152 executed as a reprisal on the day of Heydrich's death.

...

After the invasion of the Soviet Union spurred a previously dormant communist resistance movement in Bohemia and Moravia into acts of sabotage, Adolf Hitler dismissed « Reich » Protector Konstantin von Neurath and appointed Reinhard Heydrich acting « Reich » Protector, in September 1941. Heydrich 1st ordered a narrow wave of terror targeting real and perceived leaders of opposition in the Czech lands. In October and November 1941, Protectorate special Courts sentenced 342 people to death and turned 1,289 « over to the “ Gestapo ” » . Heydrich also established the Theresienstadt camp-ghetto, in November ; under his rule, 14,000 German and Austrian Jews and more than 20,000 Czech Jews were deported from Theresienstadt to the Lodz ghetto, to the Government General, and to the « Reich Commissariat Ostland » .

Heydrich as acting « Reich » Protector, then, courted Czech industrial workers and farmers, whose productive capacity was necessary to the German War effort, with wages and benefits packages equivalent to those of their German counterparts. The result of his policies was a 73 % reduction in acts of sabotage within 6 months. By spring of 1942, the German authorities could boast of a pacification of the Protectorate. Some have speculated that Heydrich aimed next to assume a newly-created top-civilian position in occupied Northern France and Belgium.

Heydrich was so confident that his pacification program had succeeded that he flagrantly disregarded measures for his own security and traveled around Prague in an open vehicle. On May 27th, 1942, as he traveled on a familiar route to the airport to fly to Adolf Hitler's headquarters, 2 Czech parachute agents succeeded in rolling a hand grenade under Heydrich's transport vehicle. Though not mortally wounded by the blast itself, the grenade splinters in his leg and lower-back led to an infection that killed him on June 4th, 1942.

Both Hitler and Himmler mourned this most ruthless implementer of the « Final Solution » . Hitler described Heydrich as :

« One of the best National-Socialists, one of the staunchest defenders of the concept of the German “ Reich ” and one of the greatest opponents of all enemies of this “ Reich ” . »

Himmler would later praise Heydrich's loyalty to the unified SS elite :

« With all the ambition that he invested in his Security Police and his “ Reich ” Security Main-Office, he saw all things Ist of all from the viewpoint of the entire SS. »

...

Das Rudolphinum (tschechisch Rudolfinum) ist ein im Stil der Neorenaissance errichtetes Konzert- und Galeriegebäude am rechten Ufer der Moldau in der Prager Altstadt (Staré Město) in Prag.

Das herausragende Gebäude aus hellem Sandstein wurde im Auftrag der böhmischen Sparkassen von den beiden Architekten Josef Zitek und Josef Schulz in den Jahren 1876-1884 errichtet. Die gerundete Fassadengestaltung lehnte sich an die der Dresdner Semperoper an. Schirmherr war Kronprinz Rudolf. Nach ihm und seinem kunstliebenden Vorfahren Kaiser Rudolf II. wurde das Gebäude benannt. Es war von Anfang an als ein Haus der Künstler (Dům umělců) konzipiert und sollte der Pflege der Musik und der Bildenden Künste dienen.

In der neu gegründeten Tschechoslowakei wurde das Haus im Jahr 1920 zum Abgeordnetenhaus umgestaltet. Erst nach der deutschen Besetzung unter den Nazis ab 1938 wurde das Gebäude dem ursprünglichen Zweck zugeführt. Anfänglich arbeiteten dabei nur tschechische Arbeiter, die bewusst statt der Statue von Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy jene von Richard Wagner entfernten. Nachdem dieser « Irrtum » aufflog, wurde der Rückbau durch deutsche Arbeiter fortgesetzt. Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg residierte in dem Haus nochmals kurz das tschechische Parlament. Seit 1946 dient das Gebäude aber wieder als Konzert- und Ausstellungsstätte. Dazu beherbergt es verschiedene Konzertsäle. Deren größter, der sogenannte Dvořák-Saal, ist die Heimstatt des wichtigsten klassischen Prager Orchesters, der Tschechischen Philharmonie. Hier finden auch wichtige Konzerte des Musikfestivals Prager Frühling statt.

Das Prager Rudolfinum unter den Nationalsozialisten

Das Rudolfinum dürfte den meisten Prag-Touristen wohl bekannt sein. Am Prager Moldauufer vor dem imposanten Panorama der Prager Burg gelegen ist eine der wichtigsten kulturellen Sehenswürdigkeiten der tschechischen Hauptstadt. Das Rudolfinum war jedoch nicht immer Konzert- und Ausstellungshalle wie heute. In unseren Archiven haben wir eine Reportage aus dem Jahr 1941 gefunden.

« In wenigen Tagen wird in einem feierlichen Staatsakt dem deutschen Musikleben in Prag eine neu gestaltete würdige Pflegestätte übergeben : das Rudolfinum. »

Von dort berichtete der Rundfunk am 13. Oktober 1941. Das Rudolfinum wurde in den Jahren 1876 bis 1884 im Neorenaissancestil erbaut. Der damalige Schirmherr war Kronprinz Rudolf. Nach ihm und seinem Kunst liebenden Vorfahren der Spätrenaissancezeit, Rudolf II. , wurde das Gebäude am Prager Moldauufer benannt. Es war als Konzert- und Ausstellungsgebäude konzipiert. Am 13. Oktober 1941 fährt der Rundfunkreporter, ganz auf nationalsozialistische Linie gedrillt, fort :

« Im Jahre 1920 wurde das Rudolfinum zum Abgeordnetenhaus umgestaltet. Kunst und Ruhe waren aus dem Rudolfinum verbannt worden. Die Kunst mußte einer als so genannte Demokratie aufgezogenen Politik weichen. An die Stelle der Musik trat die Kakophonie des oft stürmischen politischen Getriebes und Kampfes. Das Haus, das zum Tempel der Kunst bestimmt war, wurde zum Geschäftsgebäude der Politik. Das ist die Vergangenheit. »

1939 hatten die Nazis in Böhmen und Mähren ein Reichsprotektorat eingerichtet. Die tschechische Bevölkerung wurde gegängelt und terrorisiert. Die tschechoslowakische Nationalversammlung, die seit 1920 das Rudolfinum nutzte, wurde abgeschafft. Die Nazis wollten das Gebäude wieder seinem ursprünglichen Zweck zuführen :

« Wieder erfüllt lärmendes Getriebe die weiten Gänge und Säle des Rudolfinums. Aber jetzt ist es der Rhythmus zielbewußter aufbauender Arbeit. Die Handwerker und Bauleute legen letzte Hand an die Neugestaltungsarbeiten. Das deutsche philharmonische Orchester Prags probt für die Konzerte und für den Staatsakt. »

Anschließend referiert Regierungsbaurat Mittmaier, der für den Umbau zuständige Architekt, nüchtern über seine Aufgabe, die er offenbar unter großem zeitlichen und politischen Druck durchführen mußte. Dann entlockt der Reporter dem Architekten eine Aussage, die den Nazis sicher nicht gefallen hatte :

« “ Es erhellt allein schon daraus, wie groß das Arbeitsvolumen in diesem Gebäude war, daß im Zuge dieses Umbaus über 200 Arbeiter beschäftigt wurden. ”

“ Eine Frage Herr Regierungsbaurat : Arbeiter beider Nationalitäten ? ”

“ Arbeiter beider Nationalitäten, zum größten Teil allerdings tschechische Arbeiter. ”

“ Tschechische Arbeiter ! ”

“ Es standen uns für diese Aufgaben nur beschränkt deutsche Firmen zur Verfügung, die diesen großen Arbeiten gewachsen waren. ” »

Die tschechischen Arbeiter sollten auf Geheiß von Reichsprotektor Reinhard Heydrich persönlich eine Statue des jüdischen Komponisten Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy vom Rudolfinum entfernen. Sie begannen jedoch stattdessen die Statue von Adolf Hitlers Lieblingskomponisten Richard Wagner zu demontieren, der sich zu Lebzeiten nicht nur mit seiner Musik sondern auch mit antijüdischer Hetze gegen Mendelssohn-Bartholdy hervorgetan hatte. Der Irrtum wurde jedoch bemerkt. Als am 16. Oktober 1941 der Staatsakt im Beisein Heydrichs stattfand, war davon und auch von der Überforderung deutscher Firmen keine Rede mehr.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg zog das tschechische Parlament wieder kurzzeitig ins Rudolfinum ein. Seit 1946 dient es wieder als Konzert- und Ausstellungshalle.

...

Durant son passage à Prague, Anton Bruckner touchera également l'orgue de la cathédrale de Saint-Guy, celui de l'église de l'Assomption de la Vierge (« Klosterkirche Mariä Himmelfahrt ») du monastère de Strahov (œuvre du Prémontré local Lohel Öhlschlägl, datant de 1774, sur lequel improvisa Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart lors d'un séjour au monastère à Prague, en 1787 ; l'instrument a été remplacé après 1900). et celui du monastère d'Emmaüs.

L'orgue de la cathédrale de Saint-Guy de Prague

L'orgue Baroque de la cathédrale de Saint-Guy date de 1765 et se trouve sur 2 paliers. Il est composé de 40 registres répartis sur 3 claviers et 1 pédalier. Il est l'œuvre du facteur Antonín Gartner en provenance du village de Tachov, dans la région de Plzeň. L'ensemble de l'instrument a été retiré vers 1909 et a été perdu. En 1932, le facteur Joseph Melzel installe un orgue neuf, tout en conservant le buffet d'origine d'Antonín Melzer. Il a été restauré en 2001 par la firme Kánský et Brachtl. La partie instrumentale contient encore des tuyaux de 1765. Au total, on compte 4,475 tuyaux.

...

The Saint-Vitus Cathedral organ has 2 leaflets. The upper-Baroque prospectus, built in 1765 by Antonín Gartner, belonged to an organ with 40 registers, which were spread over 3 manuals and pedal. Today, this Prospectus is only decorative. The entire instrument was removed around 1909 and was lost.

The lower neo-Classical prospectus contains today's cathedral organ and was built by Joseph Melzel in the years 1929-1931. A major overhaul was carried-out by the organ-builder Brachtl a Kánský (1999-2001) . That in relation to the large church rather modest instrument has 58 registers on 3 manuals and 1 pedal, 4,475 pipes in total. The key action is purely pneumatically. With a large number of basic votes (flutes and principals) and low-reeds (trumpets) , the instrument has a gentle tone - a typical characteristic of post-Romantic organs.

In 1750, František Xaver Brixi (born in 1732) is the organist at Saint-Vitus Cathedral. Because of his extraordinary musical talent, he was also appointed choir Master on January 1st, 1759. He held this important post until his death in 1771.

...

The north transept is dominated by the Renaissance organ loft by Bonifác Wohlmüt, from between 1559-1561. Originally, it closed-off the main nave of the Parlě Cathedral but, during the completion of the Cathedral, it was transferred to its present site. In the loft is a Baroque organ built by Antonín Gartner, from Tachov, in 1757.

The Chapel of the Choir is on the ground-floor of the Wohlmüt organ-loft and is enclosed by 3 carved doors. Inside it, is an early Baroque archbishop's throne from the 2nd half of the 17th Century and a late-Renaissance altar from 1579.

On May 12, 1929, the completed Prague Cathedral of Saint-Vitus, Wenceslas and Adalbert was consecrated by the bishop Antonín Sedlák. According to Bedřich Antonín Wiedermann's plans, a monumental 5 manual organ was to be placed there. There was a tender and a Czech company by J. Mölzer won with their bid of 1,737,000 CZK. Because of the finances only a double manual organ was built at the bottom level of Wohlmüt's gallery. Later, the organ was enlarged with another manual.

Mölzer's Romantic organ, together with the furnishings, creates a harmonic unity. The fact that the organ was preserved in an almost unchanged condition is very rare. During the years 1999 to 2001, the organ went through a difficult restoration by Kánský - Brachtl company from Krnov and, on March 30, 2001, it was ready to be played. The organ has 3 manuals, 58 vocal registers and 4,475 pipes. The general restoration was funded by the Prague Castle Administration and it cost 5,000,000 CZK.

...

Der Veitsdom besitzt zwei Orgelprospekte. Der obere Prospekt gehörte zu einer Barockorgel, die 1765 von Antonín Gartner erbaut wurde. Sie hatte 40 Register auf 3 Manualen und Pedal. Dieser Prospekt ist nur noch Dekor. Das dazugehörige Werk wurde um 1909 abtransportiert und ging verloren.

Der untere neoklassizistische Prospekt enthält die heutige Domorgel. Sie wurde von Josef Melzel in den Jahren 1929-1931 gebaut. Eine Generalüberholung wurde durch die Orgelbaufirma Brachtl a Kánský (1999-2001) durchgeführt. Das im Verhältnis zum großen Kirchenraum eher bescheidene Instrument hat 58 Register auf 3 Manualen und Pedal, 4.475 Pfeifen insgesamt. Die Traktur ist rein pneumatisch. Mit einer großen Anzahl von Grundstimmen (Flöten und Prinzipale) und wenig Zungenstimmen (Trompeten) besitzt das Instrument einen eher sanften Ton - eine typische Eigenschaft postromantischer Orgeln.

František Xaver Brixi (1732-1771) wurde 1750 Organist am Veitsdom in Prag. Wegen seiner außergewöhnlichen musikalischen Begabung wurde er am 1. Januar 1759 zum Regens chori am Veitsdom berufen. Dieses bedeutendste Amt im Prager Musikleben bekleidete er bis zu seinem Tod.

Robert Führer (1807-1861) wurde am 11. Januar 1831 erster Organist am Veitsdom. Josef Foerster (1833-1907) war ab 1887 Chorleiter am Veitsdom.

Le monastère de Strahov de Prague

Le monastère de Strahov situé à Prague, est l'un des plus anciens monastères du pays incluant une célèbre bibliothèque.

Le monastère a été fondé en 1140 par Vladislav II et l'Ordre des Prémontrés. L'église abrite la dépouille de Saint-Norbert, fondateur de l'Ordre.

Détruit par le feu en 1258 et reconstruit dans le style Gothique, le couvent de Strahov connut un important remaniement Baroque au XVII^e siècle qui lui donna l'essentiel de son aspect actuel.

Sa célèbre bibliothèque, vieille de plus de 800 ans, reste une des plus importantes de Bohême malgré les pillages effectués par bien des envahisseurs. Elle renferme des manuscrits enluminés, des cartes, des globes et des gravures du Moyen-âge. La salle philosophique fut construite pour accueillir les livres du couvent de Louka, en Moravie, fermé en 1782. Les fresques du plafond par Franz Maulbertsch retracent la lutte de l'humanité pour la connaissance. La salle théologique, ornée de fresques exaltant l'amour du savoir, abrite des globes astronomiques réalisés au XVII^e siècle par William Blaeu.

La pinacothèque de Strahov comporte une des plus importantes collections conventuelles de peintures médiévales.

En 1783, sa transformation en institut de recherche évita la fermeture du monastère par Joseph II.

Depuis 1953, le Musée de la littérature tchèque est dans les bâtiments du monastère de Strahov.

Des expositions sont organisées dans les salles Romanes et dans le réfectoire d'été.

Le monastère est toujours un monastère des Prémontrés qui dans la brasserie du couvent fabriquent une bière locale.

...

Le couvent de Strahov est le 1^{er} couvent de Prémontrés de Bohême. Il fut fondé en 1140 par Jindřich Zdík, évêque d'Olomouc, et par le prince Vladislav II. À la fin du XII^e siècle, le cloître, construit dans un style Roman, occupe une surface un peu plus grande que celle du Château de Prague aujourd'hui. Suite à un incendie survenu en 1258, le couvent est rénové en 1^{er} Gothique. Le monastère connaît son heure de gloire en 1627 lorsqu'on y transfère les restes du fondateur de l'Ordre, Saint-Norbert, depuis la ville de Magdebourg, devenue protestante.

Durant la Guerre de trente ans, le couvent est saccagé par les troupes suédoises et est ensuite reconstruit dans un style Baroque. Sa forme est celle d'un carré irrégulier au centre duquel se dresse la cathédrale abbatiale de l'Assomption de la Vierge Marie. Le couvent comptait une bibliothèque Baroque unique ainsi qu'une galerie de peintures exceptionnelle qui abritait autrefois la « Vierge de la fête du Rosaire » d'Albrecht Dürer. Les moines y brassaient également une bière de haute-qualité, dont la brasserie qui se trouve dans la cour d'entrée reprend la tradition.

Depuis les années 1950, le Musée de la littérature nationale, des archives littéraires uniques, occupe les bâtiments du monastère.

L'église de l'Assomption de la Vierge Marie était à l'origine une basilique de style Romane, qui fut restaurée en Gothique sous le règne d'Ottokar II Přemysl, après l'incendie de 1258. Une chapelle consacrée à Sainte-Ursule, aujourd'hui à Saint-Norbert, fut alors ajoutée à la nef Nord. Détruite par les Hussites au XVe siècle, l'église fut à nouveau reconstruite, puis rénovée sur ordre de l'abbé Gaspard von Questenberg à la Renaissance. La basilique fut alors agrandie et une nouvelle façade fut édifiée. La basilique Baroque actuelle est l'œuvre de l'architecte italien Anselmo Lurago, qui restaura l'église endommagée par les bombardements pendant le siège des troupes françaises, en 1742.

...

À l'origine Romane, l'Église Notre-Dame de l'Assomption de l'Abbaye de Strahov a été le fruit de remaniements successifs : Gothique, Renaissance et enfin Baroque. En regardant attentivement cette église, on ressent à la fois une impression de nouveau et d'ancien. Toute la décoration se concentre au niveau du portail en pierre couronné par une niche dans laquelle se trouve une statue de la Vierge Marie en prière. Même si elle est fermée, vous pourrez, à travers la grille, jeter un oeil sur sa décoration intérieure qui date du XVIIIe siècle. La voûte est partagée en une quantité de médaillons en stuc ornés de peintures évoquant l'Histoire de la Vierge Marie. De même, les autels et les statues dorées disposés le long des piliers de la nef accentuent davantage encore la pompe de l'église.

...

En regardant attentivement cette église, on ressent à la fois une impression de nouveau et d'ancien. En fait, au XIIe siècle, l'église était une basilique Romane. Son aspect actuel est le fruit de remaniements successifs : Gothique, Renaissance, et Baroque.

C'est une façade somme toute sobre, composée de 2 niveaux, mais toute la décoration se concentre au niveau du portail. Ce portail en pierre est couronné par une niche dans laquelle se trouve une statue de la Vierge Marie en prière et vénérée par 2 anges agenouillés à ses pieds. Sa tête est cernée par une auréole étoilée, ce qui permet de l'identifier car seule la Vierge est couronnée par un nimbe étoilé. Son corps flotte sur un croissant de lune pendant que son pied écrase fermement le serpent, symbole du Mal. C'est bien la représentation de l'Assomption de la Vierge Marie, c'est-à-dire l'épisode relatant l'enlèvement miraculeux de la Vierge au ciel par les anges, célébrée chaque 15 août dans l'Église catholique.

Au second niveau, sur la corniche, des Saints attirent, puis dirigent notre regard au-dessus de leur tête vers le sommet du fronton où trône la représentation d'un agneau tenant une croix haute entre ses pattes. C'est l'Agneau de Dieu, symbole du sacrifice du Christ sur la Croix. Et c'est sous cet aspect héroïque que Quinaert l'a représenté. L'agneau domine fièrement le portail, loin de tout effet pathétique, loin du mouvement extensif qui anime la Vierge, les pattes bien droites et la toison épaisse, il est comme exposé au monde, et illustre parfaitement la phrase de Saint-Jean-Baptiste :

« Voici l'agneau de Dieu qui enlève le péché du monde. »

L'ensemble du programme, sculpté en 1744, est attribué à Johann Anton Quitainer, un artiste très actif à Prague. Son registre est plutôt celui du calme, de l'apaisement. Durant la période Baroque, les personnages des statues seraient apparus en mouvement, tourmentés. Regardons la vierge : on perçoit juste un long et calme mouvement ondulatoire. Pareil pour l'Agneau : il apparaît presque figé ; dressé sur ses pattes. C'est une nouvelle manière, plus décorative, qui d'ailleurs se retrouvera chez d'autres sculpteurs pragois.

Toute la décoration intérieure de l'église date du XVIIIe siècle. La voûte est partagée en une quantité de médaillons en stuc ornés de peintures évoquant l'Histoire de la Vierge Marie. Au rez-de-chaussée, les autels et les statues dorées disposés le long des piliers de la nef accentuent davantage encore la pompe de l'église, tout semble baigner dans la lumière et le marbre. L'austérité de cette église qui fut d'abord Romane puis Gothique s'est totalement diluée dans les ors, les stucs et les marbres, pour laisser place à la théâtralité du Baroque.

...

The Basilica of Assumption of Our Lady was constructed as a triple-aisle Romanesque basilica 56 metres long and 22 metres wide with a transept and 2 prismatic towers. This design did not last long, because the church was rebuilt in Gothic style after a fire, in 1258. The flat wooden ceiling was replaced by a dome and the Chapel of Saint-Ursula was added to the northern transept.

After being plundered by the Hussites and left to fall into disrepair for many years, Abbot Jan Lohelius started repairing and reconstructing the church in Renaissance style. Lohelius' successor, Abbot Kašpar Questenberg, had the basilica extended westwards and built a new façade. The Chapel of Our Lady of Passau was added to the southern transept.

The Basilica of Our Lady was severely damaged again, this time during the French bombardment of Prague. The building was given a Baroque overhaul under the leadership of Italian architect Anselmo Lurago, and the fruit of this project is today's church.

Today, the basilica nave is 63 metres long ; 10 metres wide ; and 16 metres high. It ends in an apse, which hosts an altar of marble from Slivenec, made by Lauer mann in 1768. There are 10 side-altars located at the pillars which separate the nave from the transepts. The sculptural work on the main-altar was made by Ignác Platzer, in 1768. Pictures by Liška, Willmann, and Palko adorn the 10 side-altars, devoted to the Nativity of Our Lord, the Sacred Heart of Jesus-Christ, Saint-John Nepomuk, Mary Magdalene, the Conversion of Saint-Paul, Saint-Martin, Saint-Anne, Saint-Augustine, the Bohemian Patron Saints, and the Visitation.

The west-side of the basilica ends in an organ loft, holding an organ built in 1774 by the Strahov Premonstratensian Lohel Öhlschlägl. Mozart improvised on the organ when he visited Strahov, in 1787.

The Chapel of Our Lady of Passau has been added to the basilica transept, and contains the tomb of General Pappenheim, a hero of the Thirty Years' War.

The vault of the church was painted in 1774 by Georg Wilhelm Neunhertz, who created a cycle of frescoes there with motives of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Along the walls of the nave, in the cartouches by Jan Palliardi, there are frescoes with scenes from the life of Saint-Norbert by Neunhertz.

A chapel originally devoted to Saint-Ursula but now to Saint-Norbert is situated along the northern transept. Here, on the main-altar, in a gilded brass sarcophagus, the body of the founder of the Premonstratensians and, later, Archbishop of Magdeburg Saint-Norbert lies buried in an ebony coffin. His relics were translated to Strahov by Abbot Kašpar Questenberg in 1627 ; and, in 1873, they were transferred from the main nave of the basilica to this chapel, where they rest near the Eucharist up today.

...

The Church of the Assumption of Virgin Mary is in its core a 3 aisle Romanic basilica with a Gothic transept, prolonged in 1627, and with a Renaissance chancel. The church was built in the 3rd quarter of the 12th Century. It was rebuilt in a Gothic style in the years 1258 to 1263, and this appearance outlived Centuries. Historical research in the 1950's did not find proofs of the devastating fire in the 13th Century, or of the destruction of the church by the Hussites. In 1601-1605, the era of abbot Lohel, there was a Renaissance reconstruction probably drafted by Giovanni Bossi de Campione. It was damaged during the shelling and bombing of Prague, in 1742, and subsequently, late-Baroque modifications were made on the church's front (T. Haffenecker, Anselmo Lurago, sculptural decorations by Jan Antonín Quittainer) , as well as in the interior : frescoes from the life of Saint-Norbert and scenes from the life of Virgin Mary by a Silesian painter Vilém Neuenherz (1743) . Stucco decoration by Jan Palliardi, the main-altar and 10 side-altars by the renowned Prague stonemason Josef Lauer mann (1769) . The statues on the main-altar were made by Ignác Platzer, the statues on the side-altars by Jan Antonín Quittainer. Paintings on the altars were mostly made by Michael Leopold Willmann, Franz Xaver Balko and Siard Nosecký.

From the very beginning, chapels were being added to the church. In the middle of the aisle, there is the Chapel of Virgin Mary of Passau (in place of a Gothic Chapel of Saint-Angels from the 14th Century) . It was built by Albrecht of Valdštejn for the Imperial general Pappenheim and Albrecht's nephew Berthold, who died in the Battle of Lützen. There is a copy of the painting of Virgin Mary of Passau on the altar, and on the ceiling, there is a fresco depicting the Battle of Lützen by Siard Nosecký. On the opposite side of the church, there is a larger Chapel of Sankt Voršila, which was Gothic, originally. There is an altar of Sankt Voršila and an altar of Saint-Norbert, the founder of the Premonstrate Order and the land patron, the remains of who were brought to Strahov from a Magdeburg Premonstrate Monastery in 1627 and are buried in this chapel. The church's co-founder, Vladislav II, was also buried in the church in 1174, and before him his wife Gertruda, just like the 2nd co-founder Jindřich Zdík (died in 1150) . However, their graves were not found during archæological research.

Famous organists Jan Křtitel Kuchař and Robert Führer played in the church. In 1787, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart improvised on the local organ. The original organ was replaced after 1900.

...

The history of Strahov monastery's church reflects that of the monastery itself. Originally built as a Romanesque basilica, the church was rebuilt in Gothic style after it was destroyed by fire, in 1258. 2 Centuries later, the church was plundered by the Hussites and repaired in Renaissance style. After a bombardment by French troops, in 1742, the church was repaired once again, this time in Baroque style.

The Strahov church, which is also known as the Basilica of our Lady, has a richly decorated interior. The nave's 16 meter high vault features frescoes painted in 1774. Along the side of the nave above the arcades are 12 frescoes depicting the life of Sankt Norbertus, founder of the Premonstratensians. The Strahov church also houses an organ on which Mozart played during his visit to the monastery, in 1787.

Le monastère d'Emmaüs de Prague

Le cloître d'Emmaüs (« Emauzský klášter ») , dans la Nouvelle Ville de Prague, est une abbaye de l'Ordre de Saint-Benoît dont les clochers sont un hommage payé par l'architecture moderne à la « ville aux 100 clochers » . Cette abbaye fait partie de la congrégation slave au sein de la confédération bénédictine.

Le cloître d'Emmaüs encore appelé le monastère bénédictin de l'église Notre-Dame et des Saints-Patrons-Slaves surnommé « Na Slovanech » (chez les Slavons) ou d'Emmaüs est fondé le 21 novembre 1347 par le roi de Bohême et Empereur du Saint-Empire Charles IV et l'Ordre des moines bénédictins slavons.

Charles IV fonde le monastère et l'église attenante sur la base de privilèges accordés par le pape Clément IV, le 9 mai 1346. L'église est vouée à Marie de Nazareth, à Saint-Jérôme de Stridon, aux Saints Apôtres des Slaves, Cyrille et Méthode et aux Saints tchèques, Adalbert de Prague et Procope de Sázava. Elle est consacrée le 29 mars, le jour de Pâques de l'an 1372 par le 1er archevêque de Prague, Jan Očko, en présence de l'Empereur, de 2 Princes-Électeurs, de plusieurs évêques et du prince héritier, le futur Venceslas 1er.

Charles IV, prince allemand par son père et tchèque par sa mère, tente ici une œuvre œcuménique au cœur de l'Europe, à la frontière entre les mondes slave et german, catholique et orthodoxe. Il décide de rétablir la liturgie en vieux slave créée par Cyrille et Méthode et de fonder un centre spirituel pour éduquer et proférer la foi catholique dans le monde slave en utilisant cette langue d'église qu'est le vieux slave. Pour ce faire, il fait appel aux moines bénédictins issus de l'actuelle Croatie, les glagolites, spécialistes de l'alphabet glagolitique.

Durant les croisades contre les Hussites, qui mettent le pays à feu et à sang, le monastère est relativement épargné. L'Église hussite professe un protestantisme avant l'heure, se révolte contre la pratique des indulgences et prône un retour aux sources liturgiques (d'où la relative mansuétude à l'égard d'un monastère certes bénédictin mais en quelque sorte « pré-schismatique » et œcuménique. Le monastère, sous influence hussite, adopte en 1419 le principe de la communion sous les 2 espèces, et la pratiquera jusqu'en 1589.

En 1611, Rodolphe II fait appel à l'archiduc d'Autriche, Léopold de Habsbourg, pour barrer le chemin de l'Empire à son frère Matthias. Léopold marche sur Prague où il se heurte à Matthias, fait que les annales tchèques appellent l'invasion des armées de Passau (« vpád pasovských vojsk ») , armée dont les soldats mettent à sac le monastère.

Benoît Peñalosa, confesseur de l'épouse de l'Empereur Ferdinand III du Saint-Empire, obtint pour les quelques moines tchèques encore présents, l'autorisation de quitter Emmaüs. Lorsqu'ils se retirent, en 1636, à Saint-Nicolas-de-la-Vieille-Ville, Peñalosa lui-même est installé comme abbé du monastère d'Emmaüs avec des moines bénédictins espagnols venus du monastère catalan de Montserrat. Commence alors une nouvelle période d'épanouissement. Parmi les abbés « espagnols » , l'abbé Juan Caramuel y Lobkowitz (1647-1657) se distingue par son activité scientifique.

Ces bénédictins espagnols y restent jusqu'en 1880 quand ils sont remplacés par ceux du monastère allemand de Saint-Martin, expulsés de leur base à Beuron suite au « Kulturkampf » . Avec l'indépendance de la Tchécoslovaquie, en 1918, les Ordres monastiques allemands sont expulsés. Les moines se replient alors à l'abbaye de Grüssau en Basse-Silésie allemande et un autre groupe à l'abbaye de Neresheim pour sa seconde fondation. En 1919, le cloître d'Emmaüs héberge le Conservatoire de musique de la ville de Prague. Un an plus tard, cependant, quelques moines bénédictins de Beuron reviennent y célébrer de nouveau la liturgie glagolitique.

La « Gestapo » expulse les moines en 1942 pour transformer les bâtiments en hôpital militaire. Le 14 février 1945, un bombardement allié a détruit une partie importante de l'église et ses tours. La reconstruction est entreprise dans les années 1950. Ensuite après le coup de Prague et la prise du pouvoir par le Parti communiste tchécoslovaque, le monastère est nationalisé. Les moines partent alors pour l'Italie et les bâtiments sont occupés par l'Académie tchécoslovaque des sciences.

...

Le Cloître d'Emmaüs fut fondé par Charles IV, en 1347, le pape Clément VI lui ayant donné l'autorisation de fonder un monastère où les liturgies seraient chantées en vieux slave. L'Empereur invite alors à Prague des moines de tradition orientale originaires de Dalmatie et de Croatie qui utilisent le slavon d'église comme langue liturgique. Avec cette initiative, Charles IV entend éviter le schisme qui menace entre les Églises d'Orient et d'Occident. Le cloître devient rapidement un centre d'arts et de savoir. C'est ici qu'est effectuée la 1^{re} traduction complète en langue tchèque de la « Vulgate » , la version officielle en latin de la Bible.

On considère avec raison le bâtiment du monastère, achevé avec sa nouvelle église, en 1372, comme un joyau de l'architecture Gothique. Les frais engagés lors de sa construction dépassent ceux du Pont Charles. Il est très probable que les ouvriers de Peter Parler aient pris une part importante à son édification. Les fresques Gothiques qui y sont conservées sont exceptionnelles.

Après la bataille de la Montagne blanche, en 1620, l'Empereur Ferdinand III invite des moines bénédictins espagnols à résider dans le cloître. Pendant leur présence, ce dernier sera largement rénové dans le style Baroque : le haut-toit à une seule pente de l'église est détruit, et 2 clochers en bulbe sont ajoutés sur la façade. À la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, l'église est fortement endommagée par un raid aérien de l'aviation américaine. C'est en 1967 que le clocher abîmé est remplacé par une construction moderne en béton blanc.

On raconte que vivait au couvent d'Emmaüs un moine si cupide qu'il n'hésitait pas à se livrer à de viles transactions avec un Juif. Il se faisait payer pour donner l'hostie sainte au Juif, lequel l'utilisait pour accomplir des rites clandestins et jeter des sorts sur les chrétiens. Ce commerce avait lieu sur les anciennes marches du couvent d'Emmaüs, qui menaient vers la vallée de Podskali, et étaient couvertes d'un toit et munies de palissades, de sorte que même au grand jour, il y faisait noir. De cette manière, le moine s'enrichit considérablement, menant de sombres tractations dans un escalier sombre.

Cependant, le Juif était si peu prudent en exécutant ses rituels et de ses maléfices, qu'il finit par être découvert et qu'il trahit son complice sous la torture. La sentence fut rapide et impitoyable. Le Juif fut écartelé et brûlé vif, tandis que le moine cupide était décapité dans la cour du couvent.

Dès la semaine suivant, l'esprit du moine apparut sur les marches, portant sa tête décapitée sous un bras et la bourse contenant l'argent du Juif sous l'autre. Il y pousse toujours d'effrayants gémissements, désirant la libération que seul peut lui apporter un prêtre nouvellement ordonné qui accepterait de lui donner la sainte hostie en échange de sa bourse. Mais personne, pour l'instant, n'a eu le courage de le faire, et les lamentations du moine maudit résonnent toujours dans les marches.

...

Le monastère d'Emmaüs (Monastère « Na Slovanech ») de Prague est classé monument culturel national. Charles IV a fondé le monastère, en 1347, pour les bénédictins slaves qui donnaient des offices divins en vieux slave. En 1371, une église a été annexée au monastère. Peu à peu, le monastère est devenu un centre d'érudition et d'art. Parmi les étudiants de la langue cyrillique figuraient également Jan Hus et Jeroným Pražský. Cependant, en 1611, le monastère a été dévasté et n'a été rénové que dans la seconde moitié du XVIIe siècle après une reconstruction dans le style Baroque, réalisée par des Bénédictins espagnols. Dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle, le monastère a été reconstruit par les Bénédictins de Beuron, qui ont créé un style d'art spécifique dans l'esprit du style de Beuron. En 1945, le monastère d'Emmaüs a été détruit lors du bombardement de Prague. Le complexe n'a été rénové que dans les années 1966 à 1969. Ensuite, le monastère est devenu le siège de l'Académie tchécoslovaque des Sciences. En 1990, Emmaüs a été restitué aux Bénédictins. Le monastère et l'église ont été reconstruits au cours des 20 années suivantes.

...

The Emmaus monastery (« Emauzský » or « Emauzský klášter ») is an abbey established in 1347, in Prague. The area became the only Benedictine monastery of the Bohemian kingdom and all Slavic Europe.

In the 1360's, the Cloisters of the Monastery were decorated with a cycle of 85 wall Gothic paintings with parallels from the Old and New Testaments. The Gothic cloisters also feature original faded frescoes with bits of Pagan symbolism from the 14th Century. The monastery was Baroquized in the 17th and 18th Centuries and the 2 temple towers were added.

Charles IV gave to the just-founded monastery the manuscript Reims Gospel, it was probably lost from Prague in the time of the Hussite Wars, manuscript later became part of the Reims Cathedral treasury. The monastery became a center of culture and art, students of Cyril and Methodius studied there in addition to Jan Hus.

During WWII, the monastery was seized by the « Gestapo » and the monks were sent to Dachau concentration camp. The monastery building and vaults were destroyed by a U.S. bombing raid on Prague, on 14 February 1945. The modern roof with steeples was added in the 1960's. It was returned to the Benedictine order in 1990, the monastery currently belongs to 3 monks, 2 of whom live there.

...

9 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au couple Johann Nepomuk et Rosalie Hueber (Vöcklabruck) .

« My Dear Brother-in-law and “ Sali ” !

Thank you for the letter. “ Sali ”, do not send anything. Here is 10 “ Gulden ”. I am well and wish that “ Sali ” may also be healthy soon ! The good woman has no idea of what I have to do ! Then, the correspondence from at home and abroad !!! Now, “ Holland ” is added to the list, where, on the 4th of this month, my 3rd Symphony was performed with very great success. * In Leipzig, on January 28th,  the 2nd performance of my 7th Symphony was given before the Royal couple. The newspapers are full of admiration just like the Dutch (papers) . In “ March ”, it (Symphony No. 7) is going to “ Munich ”.  (The performance in Hamburg is, likewise, imminent.) * Unfortunately, I need a great deal of money. In The Hague (in Holland) , they really want to see me “ in person ”.

Hearty farewell ! Greetings to all !

Your brother and brother-in-law,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Danke Euch für das Geschickte. »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 145 ; pages 173-174.

Bruckner's brother-in-law and younger married sister. Bruckner was the eldest of 11 children, most of whom died either at birth or in infancy. He remained close to his sister Maria-Anna, who served as his house-keeper in Vienna, his sister Rosalie, who was married to Johann Nepomuk Hueber and lived in Vöcklabruck, and his brother Ignaz, who lived in Saint-Florian. Little is known of his sister Josefa.

From time to time, Bruckner would receive gifts of food from Ignaz. Here, he may be referring to food. His stomach gave him problems, and he may be saying that he has to watch his diet.

Bruckner always re-imbursed family members when he received gifts of food or services from them. The sum of 10 « Gulden » is a generous one for the time ; perhaps, the value of $ 20, today.

* Under Johann Verhulst (1816-1891) .

 Actually, January 27, 1885.

 The performance was on March 10, 1885.

* The performance was on February 19, 1886, under Julius von Bernuth (1830-1902) .

9 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au docteur Rudolf Prohska (Linz) .

« Right Honourable Sir !

I was already in the unpleasant situation, here in Vienna, as well as in Graz, of having to decline such honours. I am now even infinitely sorrier to have to say that I must also decline the wishes of the worthy “ Musikverein ”, in Linz, for the same honour that was meant for me. In the month of March, I must go to Munich for the 1st performance, there, of my 7th Symphony, but I do not know exactly when. On January 28th, the 2nd performance in Leipzig took place before the Saxon Royal couple. The newspapers sparkle with admiration. In Hamburg, a performance is imminent. I have just received several letters from Holland where, in The Hague, my 3rd Symphony (dedicated to Wagner) was performed, on the 4th of this month, with very great success.

Again, thanking you very much for the intended honour, I am

Yours devotedly,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Schon war ich in der unangenehmen Lage ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 146 ; pages 174-175.

Doctor Rudolf Prohaska (1839-1909) : Lawyer and Board Member of the Music Society (« Musikverein ») , in Linz.

Bruckner declined honorary membership in the Music Societies in Vienna, Graz, and Linz, in order to keep a low-profile.

9 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au docteur Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs (La Haye) .

« Right Honourable Sir !

Thank you very sincerely for your great kindness. “ Meister ” Wagner wanted to perform “ all ” of my Symphonies, as he assured me a few months before his death. On December 30th and January 28th, my 7th Symphony was performed in Leipzig (before the Royal couple) in concerts of the “ Stadttheater ” under “ Herr ” Nikisch with the most “ extraordinary success ”. I received 2 laurel wreaths (one from the University, and one from the Orchestra) , which is very grand. The performance in Hamburg is imminent. In March, the same takes place in Munich, where “ Kapellmeister ” Levi raves most extraordinarily about this work. He writes with still more admiration and, also, about the joy in this work that he has finally had. Recently (on January 8th) , Hellmesberger performed my Quintet, in Vienna. This artist has “ never ” had a greater success in quartet playing. I myself was called-back repeatedly after every movement and, “ indeed ”, by the “ entire ” audience ; at the conclusion, fully 10 times. Court “ Kapellmeister ” Hellmesberger intends to perform it again, in November. He requested me to write him still another one, called the work a “ Revelation ”, and called me the “ Composer of the Modern Age ”. Vienna can be very proud, etc. , etc. The Quintet is published by Guttman, in Vienna (situated near the Opera House) . Otherwise, I am despised by the music cliques, one and all in Vienna (with the exceptions of the “ Deutsche Zeitung ” ; the “ Fremde Blatt ” ; the “ Tageblatt ” ; the “ Morgenpost ” ; and the music newspapers) . You no doubt understand why. For that reason, except for the 3rd Symphony and the Quintet, nothing has been published. Oh, “ if only I could find a publisher ! ” I am now writing the “ 8th ” Symphony. “ Herr ” Brahms treats me almost insultingly !

Finally, I thank you once more from my heart and request your continued good will ! Also, I thank all of the praiseworthy Societies and the conductors, with the Orchestra. I also thank “ Herr ” A. Simon, compatriot and Orchestra member, most sincerely.

With deepest respect,

Your most grateful,

Anton Bruckner

N.B. : I have written nothing for organ.

To : Doctor W. L. van Meurs, Librarian
The Hague, Holland »

Incipit : « Danke recht herzlich für Ihre ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 147 ; pages 175-176.

Manfred Wagner. « Bruckner » , pages 281-282.

Doctor Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs was the Librarian at The Hague.

Richard Wagner (1813-1883) : Bruckner always referred to Wagner as, « the Master » . Having dedicated his 3rd Symphony to Wagner, he wrote the Adagio to his 7th Symphony as a lasting memorial to Wagner.

Arthur Nikisch (1855-1922) : Most impressive and influential conductor of his day. He excelled in Romantic Music. His performances of Beethoven, Schumann, Bruckner, Brahms, Tchaïkovsky, and Wagner became legendary and remain so, even today ; and his passionate, yet, controlled string tone must have accomplished exactly what Bruckner intended. With his premiere of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, he won the 1st wide recognition of Bruckner's work.

Hermann Levi (1839-1900) : Distinguished German conductor with serious-mindedness toward life, music, and relations with others. His series of letters to Bruckner reflect the spiritual quality of his character ; and he was able to infuse this quality into Bruckner's already spiritual music, making him one of Bruckner's great interpreters and champions. In 1882, he conducted the premiere performance of Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » ; a highly unlikely occurrence, all things considered.

Josef Hellmesberger, Senior (1828-1893) : Violinist and conductor, professor of violin, and Director of the Vienna Conservatory. In 1849, he founded his famous String Quartet. From 1851 to 1859, he was conductor and Artistic Director of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » ; and he transformed this amateur Orchestra into a group of professional musicians, leaving an indelible mark on its repertoire.

Albert J. Guttmann (died in 1914) : Publisher and concert agent in Vienna. Bruckner's 4th and 7th Symphonies and the String Quintet were 1st published by him.

Johannes Brahms (1833-1897) : Composer who became increasingly condescending toward and about Bruckner. As the Wagner and Brahms camps emerged and became ever more antagonistic toward one another, Bruckner was caught-up in the hostilities ; because of his admiration for Wagner, as well as his being a Symphonist, he was paired with Wagner, especially in Vienna.

Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs (1817-1906)

Aged 64, Anton Bruckner exclusion from greatness seemed much more final than young author, dramatist and physician Arthur Schnitzler. True, he had some encouraging news on his return to Vienna, in September. His mail brought him 2 issues of the Parisian magazine, « Guide Musicale » , which were both wholly devoted to him :

« Un symphoniste d'avenir, Antoine Bruckner. »

But that was from the friendly distance of Paris. The same mail contained a blow from enemies closer by. He found his « Romantic » Symphony rejected by a Mainz conductor without even the courtesy of an explanation. In Vienna, the Philharmonic halls remained inhospitable. From the heights of the « Neue Freie Presse », the sovereign music-critic Eduard Hanslick decreed that Bruckner was still unworthy of performance. The old man walked the streets in his country togs, lonely and dazed, like a stranger. Even the chaos of his bedroom, on the 4th floor of the « Wohnhaus », on « Heßgasse 7 », was no longer familiar.

Bruckner wrote a letter to one of his far-away supporters, doctor Wilhelmus Ludovicus van Meurs who lives in the Netherlands :

« Dear Sir, it is a mystery. What you can do (for me) ... as it is a mystery what Hanslick, Bülow and Joachim do against me ... Till 1876, Hanslick was my greatest supporter and friend, and then became my greatest enemy because I accepted the Lectureship for Music at the University. Brahms is full of jealousy ... therefore, nobody dares to perform anything of mine. »

Bruckner felt abandoned in his « Heßgasse » flat on the 4th floor, at the onset of the fall in Vienna. His sometime ally, Gustav Mahler, was away, struggling to re-organize the Budapest Opera. Hugo Wolf, another occasional friend, was engrossed in his surreptitious love-affair and in his own work. Bruckner abided in isolation, just like Sigmund Freud, across the street.

(Up to 1891, the Freud family lived in the so-called « Sühnhaus » in Vienna, on « Maria Theresienstraße 8 ». Emperor Franz-Josef had this house built on the grounds of the former « Ringtheater » destroyed by fire, on December 8, 1881. In the course of this tragic event, 386 people had been killed.)

But he was more than 30 years older than these others, a rumpled, vulnerable village creature in the big city, bullied by his house-keeper « Frau » Kathi Kachelmayer for misplacing a slipper.

Still, he kept working. A new draft of the 3rd Symphony was almost finished. In his low mood, he feared more than ever Hanslick's anti-Wagnerian wrath and removed most of the direct Wagner quotes from the score. Saturday evening and Sunday morning, he played the organ in the Chapel of the Imperial Palace - not even Hanslick could take that away from him. He enjoyed his Pilsner beer, his roast pork and cabbage at the restaurant « Zur Kugel » .

At home, snuff from his silver box was a solace, even if « Frau » Kachelmayer growled about brown stains everywhere. He also had the memory of « Fräulein » Martha Rauscher, « a very nice, lovely girl » he would meet during the summer, in Upper-Austria ; she would send him a duplicate of the photograph he would lose on the journey back to Vienna. And the organizers of the Industrial Fair, in the « Prater », asked him to display his virtuosity on an organ there. It was the only public occasion to which he was invited. The great things happening that autumn passed him by.

And yet, Bruckner had a sort of season of his own. On the 1st day of fall, this wrinkled mystic from the Upper-

Austrian meadows received a State visit in the dimension special to him.

On 22 September 1888, at noon, he began to get himself ready to meet his visitor. He put on his best black suit with its trousers too short and too wide, his Sunday Saint-Florian jacket, and his top hat which « Frau » Kachelmayer refused to brush because, she said, it was no use, the « Herr Professor » had let it get wet again the night before.

So, he brushed it himself at great length. At 3 pm, he boarded the horse tramway out to Währing, to the district cemetery there. A number of officials from musical organizations had already gathered at a graveside together with some doctors and anthropologists. Bruckner took his place in the front row.

At 3:45 sharp, the cemetery workers started digging. Within minutes, the vehicle of the visitor rose into view : a crane lifted the heavy sarcophagus from the tomb, and transported it to the chapel where only Bruckner and a few officials and scientists were admitted. In the chapel, the coffin lid was opened. Anton Bruckner stood face to face with Franz Schubert, now 60 years dead.

As in his earlier confrontation with Beethoven, Bruckner started forward, but was restrained. Ist, others had their turn. The Mayor's representative delivered an address praising the bones that had produced such beautiful melodies. Today, he intoned, these exalted remains had been exhumed not only to give them a more dignified resting place in the Central Cemetery but also to afford scientists a chance to examine the physical evidence of genius.

Everything proceeded with characteristic Viennese ritual. On a small table covered by black velvet, Schubert's skull was placed, as ceremoniously as though it were a priest's monstrance. A Doctor Langl photographed it 4 times, especially the profile on the right side, which was much better preserved. A secretary, in top hat, took down minutes of the event. It was noted that Schubert's head was a deep yellow ; that his teeth were still in excellent condition (much better than Beethoven's as observed in the similar procedure, in June) and that only one molar was missing ; that the face was strongly developed in proportion to the skull top ; and that some clothes and hair were still present.

Now came the anthropologists. Their calipers ascertained curvature and depth of the brain cavity. Whereupon another commemorative appreciation was pronounced by the Mayor's representative. At half past 5, the officials wanted to replace the remains in the coffin, when Bruckner pressed forward, greatly excited, and insisted on touching the head « of the Master » . With both hands, he grasped the forehead. He clutched it until the Mayor's representative had to dislodge his hold gently. But he was permitted to put the skull into the coffin. Thus, Bruckner became the last man to touch Schubert.

Finally, Bruckner went home again in the horse tramway, while Schubert wended his way toward the Central Cemetery in a black coach. It was hard to say who was more fulfilled.

9 février 1885 : Alban Berg is born in Vienna. He lives the 1st 14 years of his life at « Tuchlauben 8 » , in central Vienna, during the main part of each year ; and summers at the « Berghof » summer villa, near Villach, and the Ossiacher See, in Carinthia.

14 février 1885 : Gustav Mahler achieves his 1st great success as a conductor by leading a Festival performance of Franz-Josef Haydn's « Die Jahreszeiten » (The Seasons) , in Münden.

18 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Rosa Papier-Paumgartner (Vienne) .

« Gracious Lady !

I thank you very sincerely for your great kindness toward my humble self and, in particular, for the wonderful advice concerning the “ Te Deum ”. I will never forget your esteemed card ; I will keep it always and follow your excellent advice. You certainly know, Gracious Lady, that I am among your greatest admirers ; and, indeed, my hands are often chafed from applauding for you.

As recently as the 13th of this month, I was totally enchanted by your wonderful voice ! I hope that the “ Verein ” * has already presented its request, in respect to the “ Te Deum ”, a request in which I join with all my heart !

Your charming hands receive kisses from

Your most admiring of all admirers,

Anton Bruckner

P.S. : I kiss your husband a thousand times, and thank him sincerely for everything ! »

Incipit : « Recht herzlich danke ich für die große ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 148 ; pages 176-177.

* The « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » .

Rosa Papier-Paumgartner

La mezzo-soprano d'Opéra et de Lieder Rosa (née Papier) Paumgartner est née le 18 septembre 1859 à Baden près de Vienne, en Basse-Autriche ; et est décédée le 9 février 1932 au 7 « Frankenberggasse » dans le 4e arrondissement de Vienne. Elle fut inhumée au cimetière central de Vienne puis transférée au cimetière de Mautern près de Krems.

Fille d'un fonctionnaire, elle fréquente l'école secondaire pour jeunes filles de Krems. Élève privée de Mathilde Marchesi en chant. Étudie la théorie musicale auprès du pianiste et compositeur Johann Paumgartner. Elle fait ses débuts, le 15 mars 1881, au « Theater an der Wien » dans l'Opéra « Aïda » de Giuseppe Verdi. Elle incarne le rôle d'Amneris ; le chef Wilhelm Jahn est au pupitre. Elle est invitée à se produire dans les grandes maisons d'Opéra en Allemagne mais aussi à Amsterdam, Prague et Budapest.

Excellente interprète de Richard Wagner, elle chante au « Wiener Staatsoper », de 1881 à 1891 - date à laquelle la maladie la force à mettre fin à sa carrière sur scène. En 1892, elle se tourne vers l'enseignement au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde »). Parmi ses élèves, citons : Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt, Helene Wildbrunn.

En 1882, Rosa Papier épouse le journaliste musical et chef d'orchestre Hans Paumgartner. Leur fils est le musicologue et chef d'orchestre Bernhard Paumgartner.

...

Rosa Papier-Paumgartner (1858-1932) : A famous Court-Opera singer, married to Hans Paumgartner (1844-1896) , a writer on music and a friend and supporter of Bruckner. Bernhard Paumgartner (born in Vienna, 14 November 1887 ; died in Salzburg, 27 July 1971) , their son, came into contact with the giants of Viennese music, including Bruckner, Wolf and Mahler, at an early age. He became a horn player, violinist, and pianist, a conductor, and a musicologist.

...

The mezzo-soprano Opera and Lieder singer Rosa Paumgartner (née Papier) was born on 18 september 1858 in Baden, Lower-Austria ; and died on 9 February 1932 in Vienna.

Private student of Mathilde Marchesi. Studied music theory with Hans Paumgartner.

Sang at the Vienna Court Opera from 1881 to 1891.

Ended her career in 1891 for health reasons and became, in 1892, a famous singing teacher at the « Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , in Vienna.

Amongst her students were Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt, Helene Wildbrunn.

Mother of conductor and musicologist Bernhard Paumgartner.

...

Rosa Papier, verehelichte Paumgartner (geboren 18. September 1859 in Baden bei Wien ; gestorben 9. Februar 1932 in Wien) war eine österreichische Opernsängerin und Gesangspädagogin.

Rosa Papier war eine Schülerin von Mathilde Marchesi. 1889 Kammersängerin. Die Mezzosopranistin war von 1881 bis 1891 an der Wiener Hofoper tätig. Sie brillierte als Wagner-Interpretin und war eine gefeierte Liedsängerin. 1891 mußte sie ihre Bühnenlaufbahn auf Grund einer Krankheit beenden.

1892 wurde Rosa Paumgartner Professorin am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien und unterrichtete Gesang. Die bekannten Wagner-Sängerinnen Anna Bahr-Mildenburg und Helene Wildbrunn sowie Rose Pauly zählten zu ihren Schülerinnen. Sie gehörte dem Freundeskreis um Gustav Mahler an und setzte sich für dessen Berufung zum Direktor der Wiener Hofoper 1897 ein. Der Musikwissenschaftler und Dirigent Bernhard Paumgartner war ihr Sohn.

Schülerinnen : Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt, Helene Wildbrunn.

1955 wurde die Papiergasse in Wien-Liesing nach ihr benannt.

...

Rosa Papier, verheiratete Paumgartner, geboren 18. September 1858 Baden bei Wien (Niederösterreich) ; gestorben 9. Februar 1932 Wien 4, Frankenberggasse 7 (Zentralfriedhof, später nach Mautern bei Krems überführt) ; Opernsängerin (Mezzosopran) ; Gatte (1882) Hans Paumgartner, Musikjournalist, Dirigent (Sohn Bernhard Paumgartner) . Kammersängerin (1889) .

Wuchs in der Wachau auf und zeigte schon frühzeitig Talent, das von einer Gräfin Todesco gefördert wurde. Sie besuchte ab 1878 das Konservatorium in Wien, wurde später Privatschülerin von Mathilde Marchesi und nahm Musiktheorieunterricht bei Paumgartner. Nachdem sie das Publikum bei ihrem Debüt im Theater an der Wien (15. März 1881) als Amneris (« Aida ») stark beeindruckt hatte, lud sie Wilhelm Jahn ein, am 21. April 1881 dieselbe Rolle in der Hofoper zu singen, worauf sie Mitglied der Hofoper wurde (bis 1891) . Papier war eine bedeutende Richard-Wagner-Interpretin und gab zahlreiche Gastspiele in verschiedenen europäischen Ländern. Wegen eines (nach einer Grippe aufgetretenen) chronischen Kehlkopfkatarrhs mußte sie ihre Operntätigkeit beenden und wurde Gesangslehrerin am Konservatorium (am Orte Professor) ; sie bildete zahlreiche erfolgreiche Sopranistinnen aus.

...

Rosa (geborene Papier) Paumgartner : geboren 18.09.1858 Baden bei Wien (Niederösterreich) ; gestorben 09.02.1932 Wien. Sängerin (Mezzosopran) , Musikpädagogin und -schriftstellerin. Tochter eines Staatsbeamten, Ausbildung an der höheren Mädchenschule in Krems, Mitglied im dortigen Gesang- und Orchesterverein, ab 1878 Gesangsstudium bei Mathilde Marchesi am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde beziehungsweise privat, Partiturspiel bei Johann Paumgartner, den sie 1882 heiratete. 1880 erster öffentlicher Auftritt, am 15.03.1881 Amneris in Giuseppe Verdis Aida im Theater an der Wien, dieselbe Rolle am 21.04. auf Einladung Wilhelm Jahns als Gast mit großem Erfolg an der Hofoper, deren Mitglied Paumgartner daraufhin bis 1891 war. Liederabende und Gastspiele an vielen großen deutschen Opernhäusern, auch in Amsterdam, Prag und Budapest. Paumgartner war eine bedeutende Interpretin der Werke Richard Wagners. Ein Kehlkopfkatarrh beendete 1891 ihre aktive Karriere als Sängerin. Ab 1893 war sie erfolgreich als Gesangslehrerin (am Orte Professor) am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde tätig, zu ihren bekanntesten Schülerinnen zählen Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt und Helene Wildbrunn. Paumgartner unterstützte 1897 Gustav Mahlers Berufung an die Wiener Hofoper.

...

Rosa (« née » Papier) Paumgartner : Sängerin und Musikpädagogin, geboren 18.09.1858 Baden bei Wien (Niederösterreich) ; gestorben 09.02.1932 Wien. Tochter eines Staatsbeamten, Gattin des Vorigen ; sang schon als Kind im Kirchenchor, während ihrer Ausbildung an der Höheren Mädchenschule in Krems auch im dortigen Gesang- und Orchesterver. Ab 1878 war sie zunächst am Wiener Konservatorium, dann privat - Schülerin von Mathilde Marchesi (Gesang) , im Partiturspiel wurde sie von Johann Paumgartner unterrichtet, den sie 1882 heiratete. 1880 trat sie erstmals in einem öff. Konzert auf, im folgenden Jahr mit überwältigendem Erfolg als Gast (Amneris in Giuseppe Verdis „Aida“) an der Wiener Hofoper, deren Mitgl. sie dann bis 1891 war. Gastspielreisen führten sie an fast alle großen Deutsche Opernhäuser und nach Amsterdam, Prag, Budapest etc. Auch bei zahlreichen Lieder-abenden wurde ihr klangvoller, in allen Lagen gleich hervorragend geschulter dramatischer Mezzosopran bewundert. 1889 wurde sie zur Kammersängerin ernannt. Ihrem Versuch, sich auch im jugendlich-dramatischen Sopranfach auszuzeichnen, war nur ein kurzer Erfolg beschieden, denn schon 1891 zwang sie ein Halsleiden zur Aufgabe ihrer aktiven Laufbahn. 1893 wurde Paumgartner als Gesanglehrerin (am Orte Professor) an das Wiener Konservatorium berufen, wo sie bis kurz vor ihrem Tode sehr erfolgreich wirkte. Zu ihren berühmtesten Schülerinnen zählen Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt und Helene Wildbrunn. Paumgartner, die Mahlers (siehe dies) Berufung nach Wien (1897) tatkräftig unterstützte, veröffentlichte in der « Neuen Freien Presse » mehrere Aufsätze über Persönlichkeiten und Probleme des Wiener Musiklebens.

...

Rosa Papier, verheiratete Paumgartner : Schülerin von Mathilde Marchesi, der bekanntesten Gesangslehrerin ihrer Zeit ; sie sang von 1881 bis 1891 an der Wiener Hofoper, wo sie in vielen Glanzrollen brillierte. Gastspiele an deutschen und holländischen Opernbühnen brachten ihr viel Erfolg.

1891 mußte sie ihre Bühnenlaufbahn wegen Krankheit aufgeben und wurde 1892 Professorin am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien und eine berühmte Gesangslehrerin (zu ihren Schülerinnen zählten unter anderem Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt, Helene Wildbrunn) .

...

Rosa Papier, verheiratete Paumgartner : Kammersängerin (Mezzosopran) ; Mutter von Bernhard Paumgartner. Schülerin von Mathilde Marchesi ; 1881-1891 an der Wiener Hofoper ; beendete 1891 wegen Krankheit ihre Tätigkeit und wurde eine berühmte Gesangslehrerin. Zu ihren Schülerinnen zählten unter anderem Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, Melanie Domenego, Felicie Hüni-Mihacsek, Sabine Kalter, Helene Offenberg, Bella Paalen, Rose Pauly, Lucie Weidt, Helene Wildbrunn.

Hauptrollen

Sieglinde (Richard Wagner, Die Walküre) .

Elisabeth (Richard Wagner, Tannhäuser)

Azucena (Giuseppe Verdi, Der Troubadour)

Orpheus (Christoph Willibald von Gluck, Orpheus und Eurydike) .

Fides (Giacomo Meyerbeer, Der Prophet) .

Grabe : Papiergasse - Wien XXIII (Inzersdorf) .

Preis : Kammersängerin (1889) .

Schriften

Signale für die musikal.

Mehrere Artikel über das Wiener Musikleben in der Neuen Freien Presse.

Neue Frei Presse (9. - 10.02.1932) .

Neue Wiener Tagblatt (12.08.1932) .

Welt (1932) ; Seite 137.

Wiener Neueste Nachrichten (10.02.1932) .

Wiener Zeitung (10.02.1932) .

Literatur

Aus der Heimat (Kulturbeilage zum Amtsblatt der Bezirk Hauptmannschaft Krems) , Jahrgang 11 (1972) , Folio 2.

Franz Hadamowsky. Jubiläumsausst. 100 Jahre Wiener Oper, Katalog (1969) ; Seite 81.

Hugo Riemann.

Baker. Frank-Altman, Band I.

Georg Müller, Eisenberg (1893) .

Kosel, Rollen. Neue Beiträge, Teil 12 (1899) ; Seite 42.

K-R (1997 und 2002) .

Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon, Band 7 (1978) .

Bernhard Paumgartner. Erinnerungen (1969) ; Seiten 6, 55.

Felix Czeike. Historisches Lexikon Wien, Band 4 (1995) .

Paumgartner, Familie

Johann : geboren 10.01.1844 Micheldorf (Oberösterreich) ; gestorben 23.05.1896 Wien. Pianist, Komponist, Musikschriftsteller. Sohn eines Richters, 1861-1865 Jusstudium an der Wiener Universität, bis 1880 als Jurist tätig. Nach einem erfolgreichen Klavierkonzert unter Felix Mottl im November 1879 widmete sich Paumgartner ganz der Musik. Sologesang-Korrepetitor an der Wiener Hofoper, zahlreiche Privatschüler, ab 1884 anerkannter Musikreferent der Wiener Zeitung. Paumgartner war befreundet mit Anton Bruckner und Johannes Brahms und ein Vorkämpfer für das Werk Richard Wagners in Wien. Hervorragender Kammermusiker und Klavierbegleiter.

Werke

Symphonien ; Quartette ; Klavierstücke ; Chöre; Lieder und andere.

Hans Paumgartner

Le célèbre critique musical viennois et pianiste, le docteur Hans Paumgartner (1843-1896) , fut un ami proche d'Anton Bruckner. Ce dernier lui donne le surnom de : « Muckerl » .

Anton Bruckner had, for some time, been receiving support in the press from Helm and another critic associated with the Academic Wagner Society, Hans Paumgartner (as well as from a 3rd critic, Ludwig Speidel, who had no use for Wagner) . While Helm and Paumgartner, critics for long-established newspapers, couched their reviews of Brahms in language with anti-Liberal overtones, critics for the new papers borrowed the linguistic innovations of « sharper key » politics. Indeed, in 1901, Carl Hrubý, a student of Bruckner in the years around 1890, explicitly connected the gains that had finally been made on that composer's behalf to the political changes :

« During the Liberal era, now defunct, one believed that everything must be handled with kid gloves and that, in all things, one had to maintain the wonderful so-called “ parliamentary tone ” . That has fortunately changed, in recent times. »

A covert anti-Semitism can be discerned in the reviews of so eminent and steadfast an associate as Hans Paumgartner, for as Stolzing's remark suggests, anti-Semitism was an inevitable part of the Wagnerian world-view.

En 1873, la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne joue un rôle important dans la diffusion du nouveau répertoire. Elle favorise non seulement les œuvres de son « Saint-Patron » mais également (par la suite) celles d'Anton Bruckner et de Hugo Wolf. Au fil du temps, Hans Paumgartner, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann et, surtout, Ferdinand Löwe se sont impliqués (soit en tant que pianiste-interprète ou soit en tant qu'arrangeur) dans la réalisation de nombreux concerts « Bruckner » . Le 1er a eu lieu le 12 novembre 1879, à la « Bösendorfer-Saal » de Vienne. Le duo composé de Hans Paumgartner et de Felix Mottl a joué une transcription pour piano à 4 mains (de Gustav Mahler) de l'Adagio et le Scherzo de la 3e Symphonie. Cette version ne remplace pas la partition pour orchestre mais elle permet au moins au public d'obtenir une bonne 1re impression.

The 1st performance of a piano arrangement of the 3rd Symphony took place on 12 November 1879 when Hans Paumgartner and Felix Mottl played the Adagio and Scherzo in Mahler's arrangement. The critic for « Die Presse » reported :

« There is no more reliable indicator of the worth of a musical work than the effect it has when heard more often, and this work made a thrilling and electrifying impression. »

Le 19 novembre 1879, « Die Presse » écrit :

« Ces dernières années, nous sommes redevables à cette Association pour la présentation d'œuvres nouvelles sans que le public ne montre des signes de ressentiment. »

The next music of a Bruckner Symphony in Vienna was presented on 4th February 1880 when, once again, Hans Paumgartner and Felix Mottl played the piano parts in their own arrangement of the 2nd and 3rd movements of the 4th Symphony, in the composer's presence. As it was the 1st performance of this work, one critic expressed his desire to « hear it in full orchestral sound » so that he would be able to say more about it.

In the 1st common concert of the Schalk brothers, on 24 March 1882, Josef Schalk performed his arrangement of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony in the composer's presence. One reviewer praised both Schalk for his arrangement and Bruckner for the vitality of his composition, which was by no means « only a series of phrases strung together » .

In 1883, Hans Paumgartner, who was also a performer of Bruckner's music, wrote in a biographical article about Bruckner that the composer had not yet obtained the recognition he deserved.

On 10 February 1883, Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann played, in their 1st joint recital, the 1st and 3rd movements of the 7th Symphony, although Bruckner had still not finished the work. In May 1883, Hans Paumgartner showed his own interest in Bruckner's music by mentioning this 7th Symphony in an article.

27 mars 1883 : Article du docteur Hans Paumgartner paru dans le « Wiener Abendpost » , à propos de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner ...

« Bruckner's 7th Symphony stands before us as an everlasting tonal construction. The time is very close when Bruckner's Symphonic works will fill the programs of all concerts and enter into the hearts of all musical men. Prejudice and insolence can torture, but never prevent. »

On 30 December 1884, the orchestral version of the 7th Symphony was performed by Arthur Nikisch in Leipzig, for the 1st time, followed by a performance, in March 1885 in Munich, under Hermann Levi, both in the composer's presence.

On 30 May 1885, the Adagio was performed in Karlsruhe. Hans Paumgartner criticized the « learned musicians at the Court Opera Orchestra » for their inability to evaluate the true worth of Bruckner's Symphonies and for forcing him to « eat the bread of artistic exile » as a result of their refusal to perform his works.

At times, Theodor Helm and the pianist-critic Hans Paumgartner used their reviews as a forum for criticizing aspects of the modern concert world that made the success of a composer like Bruckner improbable. Both took aim at such familiar Wagnerian targets as subscription concerts, inconsequential or conservative programs, fashionable audiences, and irresponsible critics. They found an occasion to denounce several of these in their reviews of the Viennese premiere of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, in 1886.

Helm wrote that « a part of the parquet audience which appears at the Philharmonic Concerts only for the sake of fashion left the hall after the sublime but very long Adagio to provide for their hungry stomachs, a process that was repeated, as well, after the Scherzo. »

Paumgartner, like Helm and Josef Schalk closely associated with the « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » , concurred about the behavior of the audience and went on to place some of the blame on certain unnamed critics :

« The audience for the Philharmonic concerts has degenerated increasingly, from year to year, into a fashionable public. They come to see and be seen, just as they do on the " Ringstraße " or in the " Stadtpark ". They come and go freely as they wish ; the whole thing is truly a kind of promenade with music. Of course, critics, too, have professional responsibilities. One of the most salient is surely, while maintaining full freedom in their personal judgment, to hear a new work through to the end, so that, by departing prematurely, they do not give that elegant, modern part of the public an excuse to leave at the same time. »

In 1885, Schalk devoted an entire article in the « Deutsche Worte » to a consideration of contemporary musical life in Germany and Vienna. He addressed the question :

« How is it possible in our musically blessed age that an artist of such significance (i.e. Bruckner) could remain unrecognized into his 60's ? »

Suite à la parution d'un brillant exposé d'Hans Paumgartner sur une de ses Symphonies (probablement la 8e) , Anton Bruckner s'est rendu à sa résidence vêtu d'un frac et portant des gants blancs. Il a offert un bouquet de fleurs à l'épouse et un gros morceau de viande fumée (typique de la Haute-Autriche) au critique musical.

Hugo Wolf was already known in other cultured circles, notably that of the composer Adalbert von Goldschmidt (which included the critics Gustav Schönaich and Hans Paumgartner, and the conductor Felix Mottl) .

It was only on 2 March 1888 that any Wolf song had been publicly performed (by Rosa Papier, Hans Paumgartner's wife) . By 23 March, Wolf was playing and singing his latest « Mörike » settings to the « Wagner-Verein » .

The mezzo-soprano Rosa Papier later became a well-known member of the Vienna Court Opera and, following her early retirement on health grounds, a distinguished singing teacher whose pupils numbered Anna von Mildenburg. She also exerted considerable influence on Vienna's musical scene, helping in no small way to bring about Gustav Mahler's appointment as director of the Court Opera. The wife of the pianist Hans Paumgartner, she was the mother of Bernhard Paumgartner, later to become well-known as a Mozart scholar and as president of the Salzburg Festival.

Mercrèdi, 14 octobre 1896 : C'est un Bernhard Paumgartner, âgé de 9 ans, qui assiste (dans la pénombre) avec sa mère, Rosa Papier-Paumgartner, aux funérailles d'Anton Bruckner à la « Karlskirche » de Vienne. Placé derrière une colonne, au fond de l'église, l'enfant voit des larmes coulées sur les joues du compositeur Johannes Brahms qui va mourir le 3 avril 1897.

...

Ungekürzt erklang die Symphonie erstmals in einem Konzert der Stuttgarter Hofkapelle im März 1901. Der Uraufführung der Binnensätze widmete Hans Paumgartner (der Vater des nachmaligen Präsidenten der Salzburger Festspiele und Dirigenten Bernhard Paumgartner) in der Wiener Zeitung vom 5. Februar 1883 eine Besprechung, die zeigt, daß Bruckner nicht nur Feinde in der Musikkritikerzunft hatte :

« Das Adagio ist ein Stück voll wehevollster Empfindung und rührendster Innigkeit. Von großer Schönheit ist das zuerst in E-Dur und späterhin in F-Dur in den Celli auftretende eigentliche Gesangsmotiv des Adagio. Bruckner ist eine hoch bedeutsame, das Durchschnittsmaß weit überragende künstlerische Persönlichkeit, deren Schöpfungen jederzeit das ungeteilte Interesse aller wirklichen Kunstfreunde für sich haben werden. »

Daran hat sich bis heute nichts geändert.

Bernhard Paumgartner

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur Bernhard Paumgartner a joué sous la baguette d'August Göllerich, fils :

« Il a été l'instigateur de Festivals aussi uniques qu'extraordinaires. Personne depuis n'a dirigé cette musique avec autant d'amour ! »

Works

« Das Taghorn » : Works of minnesingers (1922) .

« Mozart » Biography (1927) .

« Franz Schubert. Eine Biographie » (1943) ; published in Spain by Alianza Editorial, SA (1992) under the title : « Franz Schubert » .

« Bach » Biography (1950) .

« Mozart » Biography (1957) ; published in Spain by Alianza Editorial, SA (1991) .

« Das von der Antike Instrumentelle Ensemble bis zur Gegenwart » (1966) .

Decorations and awards

Honorary title of privy councillor.

Honorary doctorate from the Faculty of Philosophy, University of Salzburg (14 November 1967) .

Austrian Decoration for Science and Art (1962) .

Honorary Citizen of the City of Salzburg (1963) .

Ring of Salzburg (1963) .

Naming of « Bernhard-Paumgartner-Weg » , in Salzburg.

...

Bernhard Paumgartner : geboren 14.11.1887 Wien ; gestorben 27.07.1971 Salzburg. Dirigent, Musikforscher, -pädagoge, Komponist, Herausgeber. Schüler des Wiener Theresianums, Jusstudium an der Wiener Universität (Promotion 1911), daneben Musiktheorie und -geschichte, Komposition, Kontrapunkt und Dirigieren bei Eusebius Mandyczewski und Bruno Walter, Klavier bei Rudolf Dienzl und Horn bei Karl Stiegler, private musikwissenschaftliche Studien bei Guido Adler. 1906 Assistent Gustav Mahlers beim 7. Salzburger Musikfest; 1911-1912 Sologesangskorrepitor an der Wiener Hofoper unter Bruno Walter; 1914-1917 Dirigent des Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchesters (Wiener Symphoniker); vertrat Eusebius Mandyczewski 1915-1916 als Lehrer an der Wiener Musik Akademie (Partiturspiel, Gesangsliteratur); 1916-1918 Leiter der Musikhistorischen Zentrale beim Kaiserlich und Königlich Kriegsministerium (systematische, monarchieweite Soldatenliedersammlung, und andere gemeinsam mit Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, Konrad Mautner, Felix Petyrek, Rudolf Zoder); 1917-1938 und 1945-1959 Direktor beziehungsweise ab 1953 Präsident des Mozarteums in Salzburg, dessen Verstaatlichung er 1922 durchsetzte. Unter seiner Leitung wurde das Mozarteum 1922 Akademie und 1953 Hochschule. Paumgartner war und andere gemeinsam mit Max Reinhardt an der Gründung der Salzburger Festspiele beteiligt und 1960-1971 Präsident des Direktoriums. Während des Zweiten Weltkriegs erhielt er von der Wiener Universität einen Forschungsauftrag in Florenz über italienische Musikgeschichte und die Anfänge der Oper. Ab 1949 war Paumgartner auch Professor an der Wiener Musik Akademie und unterrichtete Musiktheorie und -geschichte, sein bekanntester Schüler war Herbert von Karajan.

Paumgartner schrieb mit Einar Nilson 1920 die erste Bühnenmusik zu Hugo von Hofmannsthal's Jedermann und dirigierte 1921 das I. Orchesterkonzert, die von ihm initiierte I. Mozart-Serenade sowie das I. geistliche Konzert der Festspiele. Er bemühte sich besonders um Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts Jugendopern, begründete 1930 die Sommerkurse am Mozarteum, 1949 die Mozart-Matineen und 1952 die Camerata Academia des Mozarteums, mit der er, wie schon seit 1922 mit dem Mozarteum-Orchester, auf zahlreichen Tournées in Europa, den USA und Japan wie auch durch Plattenaufnahmen den « Salzburger Mozart-Stil » bekannt machte. Paumgartner initiierte die Aufführung der von ihm ergänzten Messe in C-Moll von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart in der Stiftskirche Sankt Peter, die Rappresentazione von Emilio de' Cavalieri in der Felsenreitschule beziehungsweise in der Universitätskirche, die Renaissance des Hellbrunner Steintheaters, das Fest in Hellbrunn, die Musica aurea-Konzerte sowie das Musische Gymnasium.

In seinen umfangreichen Schriften und Vorträgen beschäftigte sich Paumgartner vor allem mit den Themen Mozart, Salzburg, Festspiele und Aufführungspraxis.

...

Bernhard Paumgartner (geboren 14. November 1887 in Wien; gestorben 27. Juli 1971 in Salzburg), war ein österreichischer Dirigent, Komponist und Musikwissenschaftler, Pädagoge, Gründungsmitglied und Präsident der Salzburger Festspiele.

Bernhard Paumgartner war der Sohn des Komponisten und Musikschriftstellers Hans Paumgartner und der bekannten Sängerin Rosa Papier. Er studierte in Wien, unter anderem bei Bruno Walter sowie an der dortigen Universität, wo er im Jahr 1911 in Jus promovierte.

Zusammen mit Felix Petyrek arbeitete Paumgartner in den Kriegsjahren an der Musikhistorischen Zentrale beim Kaiserlich und Königlich Kriegsministerium. Er leitete von 1914 bis 1917 das Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester und wurde 1917 Leiter des Mozarteums Salzburg. Dort hat er maßgeblich an der Gründung der Festspiele mitgewirkt und leitete unter anderem Serenadenkonzerte.

Als Komponist verfasste Bernhard Paumgartner Opern, Kantaten, Lieder und Chöre. Seine Lieder und instrumentale Kammermusik wird auch heute noch gelegentlich gespielt. Als Herausgeber veröffentlichte er 1922 Das Taghorn, eine Sammlung von Werken der Minnesänger. Er gab die Violinschule von Leopold Mozart sowie Werke von Monteverdi, Locatelli und anderen Meistern des 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts neu heraus.

Als Autor wurde er durch seine Biografien über Mozart und Bach bekannt. Beachtung fanden auch seine autobiographischen Erinnerungen.

Von den Nationalsozialisten wurde Paumgartner nach dem Anschluß Österreichs seiner Aufgabe als Direktor des Mozarteums enthoben. Paumgartner verbrachte die Kriegsjahre im Rahmen eines Forschungsauftrages der Wiener Universität in der Folge in Florenz. Seit 1952 war Paumgartner Gründer und Leiter der Camerata Academica des Mozarteums Salzburg. Er war 1953 Mitgründer der « Association Européenne des Conservatoires », « Académies de Musique » und « Musikhochschulen ». 1955 hatte er die musikalische Leitung in der Mozart-Verfilmung Don Juan - Opernfilm (Regie Walter Kolm-Veltée) mit den Wiener Symphonikern und mit großem Ballett. Von 1960 bis 1971 war er Präsident des Direktoriums der Salzburger Festspiele.

Er liegt in einem Ehrengrab auf dem Petersfriedhof in Salzburg.

Bernhard Paumgartner - Ein Leben für die Musik und für Salzburg

Als BERNHARD PAUMGARTNER am 27. Juli 1971 gestorben war, resümierte der Salzburger Journalist Max Kaindl-Hönig :

« Nun können wir den Polyhistor Salzburgs und der Festspiele nicht mehr fragen. Nun ist nur noch Musik. Nur noch Geschichte. Nur noch Dank. Und eine Art von Dauer, die es den Bewohnern dieser Stadt und ihren Freunden erlauben wird, zu sagen :“ Das war zu Paumgartners Zeiten ...” »

Welche Zeit ist gemeint ? Und wer war Paumgartner ?

Er dürfte vielen Musikliebhabern von heute, die die Worte « Mozart » und « Salzburg » geläufig im Munde führen und sich auch noch zu « Hofmannsthal » und « Max Reinhardt » etwas denken können, nicht einmal mehr dem Namen nach bekannt sein. Dies, obgleich er Salzburg und der Welt Mozarts mehr als ein halbes Jahrhundert eines bedeutenden Lebens gedient hat.

BERNHARD PAUMGARTNER wurde am 14. November 1887 in Wien geboren. Er entstammte einer hochgebildeten Familie : Seine Mutter war die bedeutende Sängerin Rosa Papier-Paumgartner, die im Ensemble der Wiener Hofoper unter Gustav Mahler wirkte und später eine über Österreichs Grenzen hinaus hochangesehene Gesangspädagogin war. Der Vater, Doktor Hans Paumgartner, war Musikreferent der « Wiener Amtlichen Zeitung » und ein enger Freund von Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms und Hugo Wolf. So wurde Paumgartner schon in seiner Jugend im ganz selbstverständlichen Umgang mit den bedeutendsten Persönlichkeiten des Wiener Kunstlebens geprägt von der kulturellen Atmosphäre jenes alten legendären « Kaiserlich und Königlich - Österreich », die ein Leben lang seine Arbeit bestimmen sollte. Als Dirigent wurde Paumgartner Schüler Bruno Walters, als Jurist, als Kunst- und Musikwissenschaftler promovierte er an der Wiener Universität. Universell ausgerüstet tat er (mitten im ersten Weltkrieg) den Schritt von der Metropole in die Provinzialität der kleinen Stadt Salzburg, die damals noch nicht einmal ahnungsvoll das war, wozu sie im Laufe der Jahrzehnte werden sollte : Salzburg verdankt den Aufstieg seiner Geltung nicht zuletzt dem lebenslangen tatkräftigen Wirken BERNHARD PAUMGARTNERS !

« Er blieb über ein halbes Jahrhundert lang im Schatten der schlagkräftigen Namen, war aber für dieses halbe Jahrhundert eine der Säulen, auf denen die Festspiele ruhten, eine der Konstanten, die sie als Substanz überhaupt nur möglich machten, und der vielleicht Einzige, dem es gelang, in seinen köstlichen Mozart-Serenaden und Matineen so etwas wie ein Salzburger Stammpublikum zu schaffen, das bescheiden (und unbescheiden) genug war, nach Salzburg vor allem zu Mozart zu kommen. »

(Helmut Reinold, 1981)

Vom allerersten Tag an war Paumgartner dabei, als die von Max Reinhardt, Hugo von Hofmannsthal und Richard Strauß initiierte Idee Gestalt anzunehmen begann : in Salzburg Festspiele zu etablieren : Das erste Konzert der ersten Festspiele 1921 (mit einem aus Wiener Philharmonikern und Mitgliedern des Mozarteum-Orchesters gebildeten Ensembles) dirigierte kein anderer als Bernhard Paumgartner !

« Wäre es nicht verboten, so etwas auf ein Denkmal zu schreiben, man müßte sagen, daß Paumgartner für die Festspiele Bier geholt hat, bevor er deren letzter großer Präsident geworden ist. »

(« Die Presse » , Wien, 29. Juli 1971.)

Ebenso wie einst seine Konzerte, vor allem die Mozart-Matineen und die Serenaden im Residenzhof (seit 1949) , lassen auch seine überaus zahlreichen (heute gleichwohl fast völlig vergessenen) Schallplatteneinspielungen deutlich den “ Salzburger Mozartstil ” erkennen, der zugleich Paumgartners “ Personalstil ” war und getragen wurde von der Überzeugung und Erkenntnis, zum Musizieren Mozarts gehöre “ vor allem Demut ”, die alle Eitelkeitsbestrebungen aus den menschlichen Bezirken des Künstlers fernhält, die vielgerühmte, “ eigene Auffassung ” vor allem, das Streben nach absonderlichen Effekten und leerer Virtuosität. Mozart ist in dieser Beziehung besonders empfindlich ... Die unbeschreibliche Diskretion seiner Kunst im Orchester und auf der Szene nachzufühlen, ihre lächelnde, transzendente Unergründlichkeit, ihre Universalität und göttliche Selbstverständlichkeit in diesem Sinne inmitten unserer problemgeladenen Zeit ganz natürlich wirkend zu machen, ist, glaube ich, die edelste Aufgabe jedes heutigen Interpreten, vielleicht auch das, was man mit Beruhigung als den wahren “ Mozart-Stil ” (wenn auch als wandelbarer Begriff verstanden) bezeichnen könnte. »

(Bernhard Paumgartner. « Erinnerungen » , Salzburg, 1969.)

« Bernhard Paumgartner nahm im europäischen Musikleben eine distinguierte Stellung ein. „ Grand Seigneur ” auf verschiedenen Ebenen, so könnte man seine Persönlichkeit charakterisieren, in deren Wirken die Vielseitigkeit eines weit gespannten Bildungshorizontes ebenso zum Tragen kam wie die gezielte Forschung auf Spezialgebieten, zu denen außer dem großen Thema Mozart auch der italienische Barock gehörte. In ihm verbanden sich spontane künstlerische Aktion mit Organisation und Repräsentanz, strenge Wissenschaftlichkeit mit literarischem Ausdruck in fruchtbarster Weise. »

(Karl Grebe)

Paumgartners bester Schüler am Mozarteum war HERBERT VON KARAJAN. Zum 80. Geburtstag huldigte er dem Jubilar, indem er sich zum Sprecher für alle Interpreten machte, die « in Berührung mit Dir, Deiner Interpretation der Kunst und in der Bereicherung und Erkenntnis aus Deinen Schriften Dir tiefen Dank schuldig und in aller Welt Deine Verehrer sind : wir alle können uns ein Vorbild an Deinem erfüllten Leben nehmen, das seine Harmonie im schönsten Ausgleich zwischen dem Wissen um die Musik und der Darstellung der Musik gefunden hat ... »

Bernhard Paumgartner und das Heute

Man rufe sich dies alles ins Bewußtsein : Der kleine Berndl Paumgartner wird zur Winterszeit vor der Wiener Karlskirche aus einem Schneeloch, in das er hineingerutscht war, von einem Herrn mit majestätischem Vollbart herausgezogen, und dieser Herr war Johannes Brahms - sein Vater, der bekannte Wiener Musikreferent Doktor Hans Paumgartner ist mit Anton Bruckner eng befreundet und wird von diesem Muckerl genannt - Hugo Wolf war ständiger Gast in seinem Elternhaus - seine Mutter sang Lieder Hugo Wolfs zum ersten Mal - der Neunjährige sieht in der Karlskirche bei der Einsegnungsfeier für Anton Bruckner im Dunkel eines Pfeilers Johannes Brahms stehen, und Tränen laufen über seine Wangen - der junge Mann sitzt bei einer Hauptprobe im Zuschauerraum des Salzburger Stadttheaters neben dem zusehenden Gustav Mahler und hört dessen Bemerkungen zu dieser altmodischen Inszenierung - der junge Direktor des Mozarteums geht mit Max Reinhardt über den Domplatz, und eine Idee formt sich : Die Stadt als Bühne. 1947, nach den dunklen Jahren, die Bernhard Paumgartner im Exil in Florenz und in der Schweiz verbringen mußte, fährt er in Lugano im kleinen Fünfziger-Steyr-Auto Richard Strauß spazieren Man versuche zu ermessen, was dies für ein Leben bedeutet, welche Prägungen dies bewirkt, und dies um so nachhaltiger, je stärker der Geist ist, dem dies alles zuteil wird.

Aber Menschen mit starkem Geist leben mit offenen Augen und Sinnen in ihrer Zeit, und sie schauen nach vorn, so lebendig in ihnen auch die Prägung durch ihre Herkunft bleibt. Zu solchen Menschen zählte in eindrucksvoller Weise Bernhard Paumgartner, der uns vor dreißig Jahren und drei Tagen verlassen hat. Wenn wir heute seiner gedenken, so soll jedoch nicht lediglich achtungsvoll an ihn erinnert werden, nein, das würde er wohl mit einem ironisch-geistvollen Aperçu kommentieren, sondern es soll herausgearbeitet werden, was diese von konstruktiven und weiterhelfenden Ideen sprühende Persönlichkeit uns heute zu geben hat, wie sie manche Entwicklung heute sehen würde.

Und da scheint mir, der ich lange Jahre in beruflicher und persönlicher Nähe zu ihm leben durfte, daß da einiges festzuhalten ist - festgehalten und ausgesprochen natürlich im Bewußtsein, auf einem heiklen Boden zu stehen, mittendrin im ewig prekäraktuellen Themenbereich Vergangenheit - Gegenwart, Tradition - Fortschritt, alt - jung, oder großgeschrieben : die Alten - die Jungen.

« Alles fließt » - Veränderung gehört zum Kosmos wie zum menschlichen Leben, und dies ist eine ebenso banale Erkenntnis wie die Folgerung daraus, daß es, salopp ausgedrückt, früher eben anders war als es heute ist. Und uns jetzt Lebenden wird das Schicksal zuteil, daß wahrscheinlich unsere Zeit in höherem Maß anders ist als es jemals früher aufeinanderfolgende Zeiten waren. Damit bin ich nun mitten im Thema « Bernhard Paumgartner und das Heute » . Das « Heute » - natürlich ein abstrakt zusammenfassender, ein undifferenzierter Begriff, trotzdem drückt sich darin etwas Unbestimmt-Bestimmtes aus.

Meine Überlegungen stützen sich auf die vielen Gedanken, die Bernhard Paumgartner in seinen unzähligen Publikationen aufschrieb, und zudem hatte ich das Glück, mit ihm oft Gespräche über diese Themen führen zu dürfen.

Paumgartner war dem « Neuen » - auch solch ein undifferenzierter Begriff - lebenslang aufgeschlossen. Das erwies sich nicht nur darin, daß er bei den ersten Autorennen auf der neubauten Gaisbergstraße als Radioreporter fungierte, sondern dies erwies sich vor allem auch in für die Musik Lebenswichtigem : In der Zeit, da er bei den Salzburger Festspielen Mitglied des Direktoriums und dann ihr Präsident war, gab es wesentlich mehr Opernuraufführungen lebender Komponisten als etwa in letzter Zeit. Er war aufgeschlossen für Neues, ja, aber nicht für alles, was unter « neu » firmiert. Mit der heutigen Polarisierung von « konservativ » und « innovativ » in der Kunst, der fast zur Ideologie gewordenen Überschätzung des Kriteriums « neu » hätte er bestimmt keine Freude, vor allem nicht mit deren Folgen. Es kam ihm an auf dieses Undefinierbare, aber Entscheidende, das mit Wert, ja Bewertung zusammenhängt, es kam ihm an auf Qualität. « Innovation » sollte nicht unbedenken mit « Qualität » gleichgesetzt werden, wie dies heute oft geschieht.

Paumgartner hatte Geist, und er verlangte von der Kunst Geist, und, selbst ein großer Könnner, er setzte Können voraus. Er zählte zu jenen Menschen, für die sich der Wert von Kunst an anderem und nicht nur zum Beispiel am Grad ihres Provozierens bemißt. Würde er umherblicken im edlen Kreise mancher heute Künstler genannten Künstler - na ja. Von Christian Morgenstern stammt das Wort :

« Alles Vorwärts der Menschheit geht auf Kosten ihres Einwärts. »

In seinem Buch « Erinnerungen » , dessen Neuauflage in einer halben Stunde präsentiert wird, schrieb Paumgartner :

« Die Zukunft gehört nicht den Schwachmütigen, nicht den Problematischen, nicht den am Leben Leidenden. Sie gehört denen allein, die das Leben mit zu bilden verstehen, die seinen Sinn vom Geist, vom Gemüt und von der Gesinnung her erfassen und zu durchleben wagen. »

Auf musikalischem Gebiet beklagte er das Vorherrschen eines wurzellosen « Intellektualismus » , die Leidenschaft endlosen Experimentierens sowie die dadurch hervorgerufene Breitstreuung der Argumente, Stil und Darstellungsformen, die Unsicherheit des Urteils innerhalb der Fachwelt, bei Kritik und Publikum. Das ist vor mehr als dreißig Jahren geschrieben. Hat sich da etwas geändert, oder ist die Situation seither nicht noch unübersichtlicher, Anführungszeichen : « pluralistischer » geworden ? Wir wissen : sie ist es. Stellt dies einen Gewinn für den Menscheng Geist dar, oder erfreut sich das Kulturleben heute schon einer derartigen Vielfarbigkeit, daß es zu dem Endzustand kommt, den man in der Optik als « weißes Licht » und in der Akustik als « weißes Rauschen » bezeichnet ? Lassen wir die Antwort offen. Vor fast fünfhundert Jahren schrieb Ulrich von Hutten :

« O Jahrhundert ! O Wissenschaften ! Es ist eine Lust zu leben ! »

Halten wir uns an die letzten sechs Worte : Es ist eine Lust zu leben.

Bernhard Paumgartner war ein « Beweger des Geistes » , wie es der damalige Universitätsrektor Stefan Rehr 1967 bei der Ehrenpromotion des Achtzigjährigen sagte. So spricht er in einem Rundfunkvortrag schon lange vor der Formierung der EU vom Europa-Gedanken, und als Österreicher, als in Selbstverständlichkeit mit seinem Heimatland verbundener Österreicher findet er gute Worte über die « Kraft des österreichischen Raumes, die Eignung dieses Raumes, Individualitäten aus dem größeren europäischen Raum anzuziehen, festzuhalten, sich diese in geheimnisvoll liebenswürdiger Weise zu assimilieren, zu neuen schöpferischen Leistungen anzuregen » . Er schrieb auch einmal :

« Kultur ist immer streng umgrenzt. Sie braucht Heimat, Boden, Wachstum und Klima. »

Paumgartner meinte mit dieser « Kraft des österreichischen Raumes » aber zweifellos nicht jene seltsame Kraft, mit der es zum Beispiel unseren öffentlich-rechtlichen ORF in die trüben Sümpfe unserer Spaß- , Krimi- und Talkshow-Gesellschaft zieht. Natürlich hatte er als versierter Praktiker Sinn für Kommerzielles. Wenn aber Kommerzmotive sich vor Forderungen des Geistes oder der Kunst zu drängen begannen, schrie er auf. Und er konnte sehr eindrucksvoll aufschreien, der Herr Hofrat.

« Ein so talentierter Kerl ! » schrieb Gustav Mahler in einem Brief an Paumgartners Mutter. Da war nicht nur ein Talent, sondern da war eine Fülle von Talenten, da war nicht nur Musik, Komponieren, Dirigieren, da war Wissenschaft, Forschen, Schreiben, da war Lehren, da war Organisieren, da war Präsidieren, da war Erblicken von Utopien, da war Erfinden - und noch vieles andere mehr, Malen, Segeln und Kochen, zum Beispiel aber auch Folgendes : Um das Jahr 1930 fuhr er nach Wien und legte dort seine Ideen und Anregungen zum Mutterschutz dar. Diese Anregungen wurden zum Gesetz erhoben.

Und er hat Ideen und Phantasien nicht bloß so hingesagt oder hingeschrieben, sondern diese Utopien wurden durch seine Tatkraft realisiert. Das ist das ganz Besondere an Bernhard Paumgartner: Er hat zeitlebens etwas bewirkt, das geblieben ist. Geblieben und erfolgreich sind nicht nur seine Werke, geblieben und erfolgreich sind die Serenaden und Mozart-Matinee der Salzburger Festspiele, geblieben ist und erfolgreich weiterwirkend die Camerata des Mozarteums, das Musische Gymnasium, als Idee schon 1948 formuliert, dessen Erfolg in Salzburg zu den « beglückendsten Tatsachen meines Lebens gehört » , wie er sagte, fruchtbar weiter entwickelte sich der von ihm ausgegangene Anstoß zur Wiederentdeckung Mozartscher Jugendwerke, zu hoher Bedeutsamkeit gelangte der « Verein der Freunde der Salzburger Festspiele » . Es ist sehr deutlich festzuhalten : Alles dies, und noch viel mehr, ist Ideen, Anstößen, Gründungen Bernhard Paumgartners zu verdanken. Alles dies ist heute wunderbar lebendig « Bernhard Paumgartner und das Heute » .

1917 zum Direktor der Salzburger Musikschule ernannt, hatte er schon 1919 einen Vortrag in Wien gehalten mit dem Titel :

« Eine musikalische Hochschule in Salzburg »

Er plante damit einen Versuch einer « idealen Verbindung zwischen Kunst und Wissenschaft » . Mit der Entwicklung « seines » Mozarteums vom Konservatorium zur Universität für Musik und darstellende Kunst hätte er große Freude. Es ist von ganzem Herzen zu wünschen, daß in diesem Haus jene Ausgewogenheit von Kunst und Wissenschaft erreicht wird, von der Paumgartner träumte, als er vom « musischen Gedanken » schrieb :

« Der musische Gedanke uralter Verbundenheit des Künstlerischen mit dem Erkennenden. »

Und als er 1959 sein Amt als Präsident der Akademie Mozarteum an seinen Nachfolger Doktor Eberhard Preußner übergab, sagte er die schönen Worte :

« Nehmen Sie im Geiste aus meiner Hand den goldenen Schlüssel. Er hat mir täglich, über vierzig Jahre lang, mit der gewissen Unterbrechung, getreu den sonnigen Garten unserer Schule aufgeschlossen. Vor allem : pflegen Sie fürderhin getreu die blühenden Beete unserer Jugend. Sie verdient es. »

Bernhard Paumgartner, der Lehrer : Unzählbar ist die Zahl seiner Schüler, die in der ganzen Welt für Kunst und Wissenschaft wirkten und wirken. Der Name eines seiner Schüler sei genannt : Herbert von Karajan. Und lebenslang hat sich dieser den Rat Paumgartners geholt.

Wissenschaft und Kunst. Wissenschaftler und Künstler - meist aber : Wissenschaftler oder Künstler. Nichts davon bei Bernhard Paumgartner. Bei jedem Schlag seines Taktstocks war zu spüren, daß er nicht nur die Noten in der vor ihm liegenden Partitur kannte, sondern um den Erfinder dieser Noten, den Komponisten, sein Umfeld, seine Zeit, seine Position in der Geschichte in bewundernswertem Ausmaß wußte. Und jede Zeile der wissenschaftlichen Arbeiten Bernhard Paumgartners ist geschrieben von einem Künstler, der formulieren konnte wie ein Dichter, ohne die Forderung nach wissenschaftlicher Korrektheit des Inhalts zu vernachlässigen. Eine herrliche Verbindung, besonders, wenn sie in solcher Selbstverständlichkeit geschieht wie bei ihm. Und er wäre recht einverstanden mit der heute sich abzeichnenden Tendenz in der Musikerziehung, sehr darauf zu achten, daß es beim Musiker nicht nur auf die Finger oder die Stimmbänder ankommt, sondern auch auf das Hirn.

Bernhard Paumgartner wurde in Wien geboren, Salzburg wurde seine zweite Heimat, die ihn allerdings, wie hier nicht unüblich, nach seiner Berufung nicht mit allzuweit geöffneten Armen empfangen hatte. Aber bald kannte er diese Stadt bis in die kleinsten Winkel ihrer architektonischen und landschaftlichen Kostbarkeit, und er kannte die Salzburger bis in die kleinsten Winkel jener in ihnen steckenden Mischung von leicht arroganter Weltstädtichkeit und alpiner Provinzialität. Er wohnte eine Zeit lang in Constanze Mozarts Sommerwohnung am Nonnberg, später auch in Mozarts Geburtshaus in der Getreidegasse. Er kannte Salzburg so gut, daß er es nicht nur lobte und pries, sondern beschrieb in einem Buch, in dem historische Präzision und architektonische Sicht mit poetisch-geistvollen Reflexionen brillant miteinander verbunden sind.

Wie könnte man zum Beispiel unsere Stadt und unsere Landschaft trefflicher beschreiben, als es in diesem Buch zu lesen ist :

« Ein alter Bauer sitzt neben Paumgartner auf dem Gaisberg, mit dem Rücken an den steinernen Sockel des Gipfelkreuzes gelehnt, und sagt zu ihm : Dös is wohl a freudigs Umanandschau´n. »

Ich füge hier an : würde angesichts architektonischer Kapitalschnitzer heute der alte Bauer dies noch sagen, und was würde Bernhard Paumgartner in seinem Salzburg-Buch dazu bemerken ? « A freudigs Umanandschau´n ? » Meine Damen und Herren, er würde nicht nur schriftlich in seinem Buch, er würde, da bin ich ganz sicher, bei den dafür verantwortlichen Politikern mit aller ihm verliehenen Kraft zu herrlicher Grobheit feurig dreinfahren.

Oder wie einprägsam ist doch an einer anderen Stelle des Buches die Atmosphäre des Sankt Petersfriedhofs gesehen und erfüllt :

« Unsagbar ernst und doch gar nicht traurig. Seine Aura scheint von jener unverwechselbaren " hilaritas animi " erfüllt, von der lächelnden Heiterkeit, die nur dem im Leide Gereiften aus dem Antlitz strahlt. »

Hilaritas animi, die Heiterkeit des Geistes, diese Ahnung eines Seelenziels, eines Lebensleitbildes. Wir hörten Paumgartner oft davon sprechen, versonnen und nachdenklich.

Auch ich denke nach : Heiterkeit des Geistes ? Heute ? Wie steht es heute mit dem Sinn für Heiterkeit, und wie steht es heute mit dem Sinn für dieses geheimnisvolle Lebenselement, das man « Geist » nennt ? Weiß die heutige Gesellschaft, was unter « Geist » zu verstehen wäre, oder versteht sie darunter die Figuren in den Harry-Potter-Romanen ? Wird heute statt « Geist » nicht allenthalben « Fun » gewünscht ? Heute, in einer Zeit, da Veranstaltungen, jetzt auch schon Kulturveranstaltungen für unsere Konsumgesellschaft vor allem dann zählen, wenn sie nicht bloß ein Ereignis, sondern ein Event werden - einer Zeit, in der zum Beispiel die Zahl der Museumsbesucher sich drastisch vervielfacht, wenn dort Artisten, Zauberkünstler oder Feuerschlucker auftreten ? Heute, in einer Gesellschaft, die ihre panische Angst vor der Kürze, Ausgesetztheit und Hinfälligkeit des menschlichen Lebens loveparadierend verdrängt, indem sie das Leben als Happening betrachtet.

Bernhard Paumgartner wäre wohl recht betroffen, ja entrüstet, sähe er sich heute kaum mehr von hilaritas animi, sondern weithin von stupiditas animi umgeben. Ich möchte einen Satz von André Gide hierhersetzen :

« Wenn ich aufhören werde, mich zu entrüsten, werde ich zu altern begonnen haben. »

Paumgartner und die Medien : Er wußte, daß diese für das Leben auf unserem Globus eine wichtige, eine entscheidende, wenn auch von ihnen immer bagatellierte Rolle spielen, und er bediente sich ihrer gekonnt, indem er seine Gedanken und seine Meinung unzählige Male in Zeitungsartikeln und Rundfunkinterviews veröffentlichte. Seine Meinung als Künstler über die medial agierende Musikkritik sei nur kurz durch zwei Aussprüche und eine von ihm erzählte Geschichte angedeutet.

Er sagte einmal : Das Fernsehen haben wir erfunden, aber den Weitblick haben wir verloren. In seinen « Erinnerungen » schreibt er : Kurz, nachdem sein Vater ein glänzendes Referat über eine Symphonie von Anton Bruckner geschrieben hatte, wahrscheinlich war es die VIII. , erschien Bruckner im Frack und weißen Glacéhandschuhen im Hause Paumgartner und überreichte der Mutter einen Blumenstrauß und dem Vater ein riesiges Stück oberösterreichischen Selchfleisches. Vom Festspielpräsidenten Paumgartner vernahm ich zwei Tage nach Aufführungen manchmal den Seufzer :

« Was schreiben s´ denn wieder, die Tinterln. »

Horribile dictu. Man sieht also, daß die Meinung Paumgartners zur kritischrichtenden Zunft eine durchaus ausgewogene war. Lehren für die Gegenwart ? Die Sache mit dem Selchfleisch sollten sich heutige Künstler überlegen. Es muß ja nicht Selchfleisch sein.

Der Dirigent Paumgartner und das Heute wie würde er wohl die doch andere Art, heute Mozart zu spielen, sehen und kommentieren ? Er hatte stets von der « Labilität » des sogenannten Mozart-Stiles gesprochen, denn er war der Meinung : Es ist das Recht jeder Generation, das Übernommene anders als die Väter (stets im Licht der eigenen Geisteshaltung) neu zu erleben. Er wußte, daß jede Zeitspanne überzeugt ist, etwas absolut Richtiges zu tun. Er wußte natürlich, daß es « das Richtige » in der Kunst nicht gibt. Ob er mit der heute als « richtig » verkündeten zur Weltanschauung gewordenen Musikanschauung « Originalklang » glücklich wäre - lassen wir es offen. Der Zukunft sei die Lösung der Frage übergeben :

« Musik im Klang ihrer Zeit » oder « Musik im Klang unserer Zeit » .

Der Komponist Paumgartner - er hätte viel mehr komponieren sollen ! Die Stücke zum Beispiel auf der CD, die gleich präsentiert werden wird - einfach schöne, berührende Musik. Gutes bleibt, Zeitgeist wechselt. Schade übrigens, daß Paumgartners E-Moll Trio heute hier aus praktischen und zeitlichen Gründen nicht aufgeführt wird. Es ist auf der CD enthalten.

Der Festspielpräsident Paumgartner und das Heute : Er hätte Freude über die Bewußtheit, mit der im heurigen Programm der Blick sich auf das ganze Europa und Österreich richtet. Er wäre sicher glücklich über den Erfolg des Festivals « Pfingsten Barock » . Er wäre einverstanden mit heutigen Opernregien, in denen Regisseure nicht sich selbst, sondern die durch die Musik verlebendigten Menschen und Menschenschicksale inszenieren. Auf welche Produktionen des heurigen Sommers dies zutrifft oder nicht zutrifft, darüber wird gestritten. Übrigens hatte Paumgartner 1959 seinen Gedanken zur Programmgestaltung der « Salzburger Festspiele » in einem Artikel für die « Salzburger Nachrichten » den Titel gegeben :

« Die Summe muß Salzburg heißen. »

Natürlich meinte er damit, daß Unverwechselbarkeit die tragende Säule dieses Festspiels sein muß.

Ich schließe mit zwei Wünschen. Erstens : Um die Erinnerung an Bernhard Paumgartner nicht nur ideell, sondern pragmatisch lebendig zu erhalten, könnte vielleicht eine Stiftung oder ein « Verein der Freunde Bernhard Paumgartners » gegründet werden. Und ganz zum Schluß : Der Erinnerung an ihn, dem Weiterwirken seiner Ideen, denen die Kunst, die Wissenschaft und Salzburg so viel verdanken, all dem gelte der Wunsch : Ad multos annos.

Bernhard Paumgartner - Ein Leben für die Musik und für Salzburg

Als Bernhard Paumgartner am 27. Juli 1971 gestorben war, resümierte der Salzburger Journalist Max Kaindl-Hönig :

« Nun können wir den Polyhistor Salzburgs und der Festspiele nicht mehr fragen. Nun ist nur noch Musik. Nur noch Geschichte. Nur noch Dank. Und eine Art von Dauer, die es den Bewohnern dieser Stadt und ihren Freunden erlauben wird, zu sagen :

“ Das war zu Paumgartners Zeiten. ” »

Welche Zeit ist gemeint ? Und wer war Paumgartner ?

Er dürfte vielen Musikliebhabern von heute, die die Worte « Mozart » und « Salzburg » geläufig im Munde führen und sich auch noch zu « Hugo von Hofmannsthal » und « Max Reinhardt » etwas denken können, nicht einmal mehr dem Namen nach bekannt sein. Dies, obgleich er Salzburg und der Welt Mozarts mehr als ein halbes Jahrhundert eines bedeutenden Lebens gedient hat.

...

Bernhard Paumgartner wurde am 14. November 1887 in Wien geboren. Er entstammte einer hochgebildeten Familie : Seine Mutter war die bedeutende Sängerin Rosa Papier-Paumgartner, die im Ensemble der Wiener Hofoper unter Gustav Mahler wirkte und später eine über Österreichs Grenzen hinaus hochangesehene Gesangspädagogin war. Der Vater, Doktor Hans Paumgartner, war Musikreferent der « Wiener Amtlichen Zeitung » und ein enger Freund von Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms und Hugo Wolf. So wurde Paumgartner schon in seiner Jugend im ganz selbstverständlichen Umgang mit den bedeutendsten Persönlichkeiten des Wiener Kunstlebens geprägt von der kulturellen Atmosphäre jenes alten legendären « Kaiserlich und Königlich -Österreich » , die ein Leben lang seine Arbeit bestimmen sollte. Als Dirigent wurde Paumgartner Schüler Bruno Walters, als Jurist, als Kunst- und Musikwissenschaftler promovierte er an der Wiener Universität. Universell ausgerüstet tat er (mitten im ersten Weltkrieg) den Schritt von der Metropole in die Provinzialität der kleinen Stadt Salzburg, die damals noch nicht einmal ahnungsvoll das war, wozu sie im Laufe der Jahrzehnte werden sollte : Salzburg verdankt den Aufstieg seiner Geltung nicht zuletzt dem lebenslangen tatkräftigen Wirken Bernhard Paumgartners !

« Er blieb über ein halbes Jahrhundert lang im Schatten der schlagkräftigen Namen, war aber für dieses halbe Jahrhundert eine der Säulen, auf denen die Festspiele ruhten, eine der Konstanten, die sie als Substanz überhaupt nur möglich machten, und der vielleicht Einzige, dem es gelang, in seinen köstlichen Mozart-Serenaden und Matineen so etwas wie ein Salzburger Stammpublikum zu schaffen, das bescheiden (und unbescheiden) genug war, nach Salzburg vor allem zu Mozart zu kommen. » (Helmut Reinold, 1981.)

Vom allerersten Tag an war Paumgartner dabei, als die von Max Reinhardt, Hugo von Hofmannsthal und Richard Strauß initiierte Idee Gestalt anzunehmen begann : in Salzburg Festspiele zu etablieren : Das erste Konzert der ersten Festspiele 1921 (mit einem aus Wiener Philharmonikern und Mitgliedern des Mozarteum-Orchesters gebildeten Ensembles) dirigierte kein anderer als Bernhard Paumgartner !

« Wäre es nicht verboten, so etwas auf ein Denkmal zu schreiben, man müßte sagen, daß Paumgartner für die Festspiele Bier geholt hat, bevor er deren letzter großer Präsident geworden ist“ („Die Presse“, Wien - 29.7.1971).

Ebenso wie einst seine Konzerte, vor allem die Mozart-Matineen und die Serenaden im Residenzhof (seit 1949) , lassen auch seine überaus zahlreichen (heute gleichwohl fast völlig vergessenen) Schallplatteneinspielungen deutlich den « Salzburger Mozartstil » erkennen, der zugleich Paumgartners « Personalstil » war und getragen wurde von der Überzeugung und Erkenntnis, zum Musizieren Mozarts gehöre « vor allem Demut, die alle Eitelkeitsbestrebungen aus den menschlichen Bezirken des Künstlers fernhält, die vielgerühmte, “ eigene Auffassung ” vor allem, das Streben nach absonderlichen Effekten und leerer Virtuosität. Mozart ist in dieser Beziehung besonders empfindlich ... Die unbeschreibliche Diskretion seiner Kunst im Orchester und auf der Szene nachzufühlen, ihre lächelnde, transzendente Unergründlichkeit, ihre Universalität und göttliche Selbstverständlichkeit in diesem Sinne inmitten unserer problemgeladenen Zeit ganz natürlich wirkend zu machen, ist, glaube ich, die edelste Aufgabe jedes heutigen Interpreten, vielleicht auch das, was man mit Beruhigung als den wahren “ Mozart-Stil ” (wenn auch als wandelbarer Begriff verstanden) bezeichnen könnte. » (Bernhard Paumgartner : « Erinnerungen » ; Salzburg, 1969.)

« Bernhard Paumgartner nahm im europäischen Musikleben eine distinguierte Stellung ein. Grand-seigneur auf verschiedenen Ebenen, so könnte man seine Persönlichkeit charakterisieren, in deren Wirken die Vielseitigkeit eines weit gespannten Bildungshorizontes ebenso zum Tragen kam wie die gezielte Forschung auf Spezialgebieten, zu denen außer dem großen Thema Mozart auch der italienische Barock gehörte. In ihm verbanden sich spontane künstlerische Aktion mit Organisation und Repräsentanz, strenge Wissenschaftlichkeit mit literarischem Ausdruck in fruchtbarster Weise. » (Karl Grebe)

Paumgartners bester Schüler am Mozarteum war Herbert von Karajan. Zum 80. Geburtstag huldigte er dem Jubilar, indem er sich zum Sprecher für alle Interpreten machte, die « in Berührung mit Dir, Deiner Interpretation der Kunst und in der Bereicherung und Erkenntnis aus Deinen Schriften Dir tiefen Dank schuldig und in aller Welt Deine Verehrer sind : wir alle können uns ein Vorbild an Deinem erfüllten Leben nehmen, das seine Harmonie im schönsten Ausgleich zwischen dem Wissen um die Musik und der Darstellung der Musik gefunden hat. »

« Dem großen Österreicher Bernhard Paumgartner schuldet die Nation den Dank des Nichtvergessens. »

So beschloß einst Rudolf Klein seinen Nachruf in der Österreichischen Musikzeitschrift. Daß es heute dennoch dringend vonnöten ist, neu und immer wieder an Paumgartner zu erinnern, seine Verdienste und seine überragende künstlerische Bedeutung auch den nachgeborenen Generationen zu Bewußtsein zu bringen, ist nur zwangsläufige Folge der Gesetzmäßigkeiten unserer immer schnelllebiger, oberflächlicher gewordenen Zeit. Die in Zusammenarbeit von ORF und Gramola in Wien entstandene CD « BERNHARD PAUMGARTNER - EIN LEBEN FÜR DIE MUSIK UND FÜR SALZBURG » , deren Verwirklichung einer Schülerin Paumgartners, Frau Margarete Bietak in Wien, zu danken ist, vereint in ihrer Programmwahl in glücklichster Weise ein weitgefaßtes Spektrum der Charaktereigenschaften Paumgartners : Ausgehend von dem von ihm besonders geliebten, oft dirigierten und ebenso gern « zugegebenen » « Col-legno-Marsch » KV. 335 Nummer 1 erleben wir Paumgartner selbst als den charismatisch Vortragenden eines seiner zahlreichen Wort-Beiträge für Studio Salzburg :

« Die Wandlung des Mozart-Stils im Laufe der Zeit. »

Als hochbedeutend erweisen sich drei (zum Teil Erst-)Einspielungen von Kammermusikwerken Bernhard Paumgartners ! Ein Nachruf aus dem Munde Herbert von Karajans und der Mitschnitt einer Aufführung aus einem Paumgartner-Gedenkkonzert des Mozarteums (1981) , Paumgartners « Concerto per voce, oboe, archi e cembalo » auf Texte von Karl Heinrich Waggerl, bilden den Beschluß dieser « Entdeckungs-Edition » .

Die eine oder andere CD-Ausgabe mit Aufnahmen Paumgartners ist in den vergangenen Jahren dank der Initiative von Gottfried Kraus, dem ehem. Musikchef des ORF, bei ORFEO oder in Sonderausgabe für die Freunde der Salzburger Festspiele zu verzeichnen gewesen. Zumeist handelte es sich dabei um Mitschnitte aus Matineen, aber auch um eine Aufführung der C-Moll Messe KV. 427 aus der Stiftskirche Sankt Peter. Wir dürfen für alle diese Veröffentlichungen dankbar sein, und doch geht ein besonderer Dank an Frau Bietak für die vorliegende Programmmzusammenstellung, die es erstmals auch einem breiteren « Hörpublikum » ermöglicht, sich mit unbekanntem, noch nicht erschlossenen Seiten der künstlerischen Persönlichkeit Paumgartners vertraut zu machen. Dazu trägt auch das mit Kennerschaft und Wissen ums Wesentliche ausgezeichnete betextete und bebilderte Booklet bei.

Mit einem Wort : Dieser CD, die an einen Europäer im besten geistes- und musikgeschichtlichen Sinne erinnern will, kann nichts Besseres gewünscht werden: möge ihr eine weite Verbreitung beschieden sein !

Werke

Mit Alfred Rottauscher : Das Taghorn. Dichtungen und Melodien des bayrisch-österreichischen Minnesangs. Eine Neuausgabe der alten Weisen für die künstlerische Wiedergabe in unserer Zeit. Mit beigefügter Klavierbegleitung, Buchschmuck nach zeitgenössischen Werken. In drei Bänden. Stephenson, Wien (1922) .

Mozart. Mit Noten- und Handschriftenproben und Illustrationen. (Biografie) Wegweiser-Verlag, Berlin (1927) .

Franz Schubert. (I. Auflage.) Atlantis-Verlag, Zürich (1943) .

Johann Sebastian Bach. Leben und Werk. Band I (mehr nicht erschienen) . Atlantis-Verlag, Zürich (1950) .

Das instrumentale Ensemble. Von der Antike bis zur Gegenwart. Atlantis-Verlag, Zürich (1966) .

Dokumente

Der Nachlaß von Bernhard Paumgartner befindet sich im Archiv des Forschungsinstituts für Salzburger Musikgeschichte am FB Kunst-, Musik- und Tanzwissenschaft der Universität Salzburg. Ein Teil der beruflichen Nachkriegs-Korrespondenz liegt im Mozarteum in Salzburg. Einige Briefe von 1929-1947 befinden sich außerdem im Bestand des Leipziger Musikverlages C.F. Peters im Staatsarchiv Leipzig.

Den Titel eines Hofrates

Ehrenpromotion an der Philosophischen Fakultät der Universität Salzburg (14. November 1967) .

Mozartmedaille durch die Mozartgemeinde Wien (1960) .

Österreichisches Ehrenzeichen für Wissenschaft und Kunst (1962) .

Ehrenbürger der Stadt Salzburg (1963) .

Ring des Landes Salzburg (1963) .

Benennung der Verkehrsfläche Bernhard-Paumgartner-Weg im Mirabellgarten, Salzburg.

...

25 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Arthur Nikisch (Leipzig) .

« Dearest, Most Noble Friend !

Accept my inexpressible thanks, for that which I am most kindly indebted to you. May God reward you for the very noble and brilliant deed which you have done for me. If only I knew how I could give you a little joy. Just write and tell me how ! A few days ago, I received the “ Leipziger Nachrichten ” with the wonderful articles by Professor Vogel. When you see him, please tell him of my heartfelt thanks ! Take care of your health ! I kiss the hands of your noble “ fiancée ”. Likewise, the gracious wife of the Director. Again, I thank the Director from my heart for his great noble-mindedness and for the sublime kindness to me ! Has the Director already been in Vienna ? I was unable to find-out and would like to see him. “ Herr ” Levi still has the better score of the 4th (“ Romantic ”) Symphony. What is going on with the 7th ? Have you most kindly had the parts corrected ? “ Please, send me the bill. ” Have you sent the parts to Hamburg ? Or will it be later ? Or does “ Herr ” Levi have them already ? I am as ill-informed as a child ? The 3rd Symphony in D minor was performed in The Hague (Holland) ; I received magnificent letters about it. Are publishers, in fact, not to be found ? Everything on earth has already happened to me, and I am becoming entirely indifferent toward noble mankind. I know nothing from Munich. How are the 2 movements which were recently received ?

Most sincerely thankful, once more, I am, with greatest respect and admiration,

Eternally gratefully yours,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Nimm den unaussprechlichen Dank ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 149 ; pages 177-178.

« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , Catalogue Reference ; page 19.

The deed was the performance by Arthur Nikisch of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, in Leipzig. In a letter dated March 10, 1884, from Adalbert von Goldschmidt (1848-1906) , « Chordirektor » , then « Kapellmeister » , at the « Neues Theater » , Leipzig, to Josef Schalk (1863-1931, brother of Franz Schalk and a Bruckner student and enthusiast) , Goldschmidt refers to « your Bruckner project » , which was to make all of the amogements for the premiere performance on December 30, 1884. It was a mighty task, headed-up by Nikisch ; and Goldschmidt dubs him « a hero » .

Bruckner and Nikisch were friends, and he felt comfortable in addressing Nikisch as « Du » .

Adolf Bernhard Vogel (1847-1897) : Music-critic for the « Leipziger Nachrichten » .

A little irony on Bruckner's part. He considered Hermann Levi to be noble, but not mankind as he experienced it - and, most especially, not Viennese philologists.

27 février 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à son frère Ignaz (Saint-Florian, près de Linz) .

« Dear Brother !

Thank you very much for the shipment. Enclosed is 5 “ Gulden ” toward defraying the cost of postage. You will receive the other money later.

I have been asked to make it known that on March 8, “ Herr ” Hellmesberger will perform my Quintet in Linz. Please, apprise Professor Deubler and other music-lovers of my greetings, and inform them about “ this ”.

On Saturday, March 7, I must travel to Munich, where my new work (Symphony No. 7) will be performed on the 10th. Farewell !

Your brother,

Anton

To : “ Herr ” Ignaz Bruckner
In the Noble Monastery of Saint-Florian, Near Linz »

Incipit : « Ich danke Dir sehr für das Übersendete. »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 150 ; pages 178-179.

Ignaz Bruckner : Younger brother of the composer who lived in the town of Saint-Florian.

Josef Hellmesberger, Senior (1828-1893) : Founder of the Hellmesberger Quartet. With an added viola, the Quartet premiered Bruckner's String Quintet in F major.

Professor Bernhard Deubler (1842-1907) : Priest, Consultant, Professor of Theology, Choir Director at Saint-Florian monastery. In 1884, he succeeded Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) . A friend to Bruckner.

27 février 1885 : Anton Bruckner écrit cette lettre, en provenance de Vienne :

« Illustrious Baron,

Again, I have to burden you with something. Since the Symphony is going to be performed on March 10, I will arrive in Munich on Sunday morning (March 8) and, will again, be staying at the “ Vier Jahreszeiten Hotel ”. I asked “ Herr Hofkapellmeister ” for a few rehearsals in advance, since there are many hidden difficulties in the work. Thus a rehearsal could very well take place on Sunday, if it is convenient to “ Herr ” von Levi. Could I ask “ Herr Baron ” to intervene on my behalf !? Furthermore, there are several corrections in the score.

“ Herr ” Landgraf feels better and sends cordial greetings ; he also supports my request. “ Herr ” Landgraf asked me to let “ Herr ” Baron know that it might be very good to introduce me to the distinguished members of the Wagner

Society, which might enable me to win many friends. Similarly, also with the members of the Holy Grail. Thus, I beg for the help of your Highness in this very important matter. I would not burden the gentlemen if I did not consider the situation so very important. With the expression of my deepest respect, and repeating my heartfelt requests, I remain your Illustrious Baron's most grateful. »

...

The 55 year old Hans von Bülow, impressed with Richard Strauß's Symphony in F minor, offers the 20 year old composer a position as Assistant-Conductor with his Meiningen Orchestra - a position which Gustav Mahler had desperately sought. Johannes Brahms is present at Strauß's debut, and congratulates him on his Symphony. Bülow soon resigns, eventually settling in Hamburg, and Strauß takes-over as musical-director at Meiningen. During this period, Strauß composes his « Burleske » in D minor, for piano and orchestra.

2 mars 1885 : Anton Bruckner (Vienne) envoie sa photographie à Marie Demar (Vienne) , avec cette inscription :

« For my highly-respected, dearest friend and admirer of the arts, “ Fräulein ” Marie Demar, as a little remembrance.

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Meiner hochverehrten, liebsten Freundin ... »

Source : Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 13 (A) ; page 22.

Marie Demar (1865-1946) : Female friend of Bruckner. He greatly admired her, so much so that their friendship became quite a serious matter (in 1885-1886) , and it was reciprocal.

4 mars 1885 : Lettre de Hermann Levi (Munich) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Highly-Honoured Master !

According to your wish, I have scheduled on Sunday, at 10:30, a rehearsal (in the “ Odeon ” Hall) . The dress rehearsal will be held on Monday morning, at 10:00. The day before yesterday, I rehearsed the Symphony (No. 7) . Naturally, the Orchestra hesitated ; the musicians understand absolutely nothing about it. Of course, the people here are incredibly reactionary. But that does not matter. If only they play well : and that, they will do. It is the same with Wagner. (I believe there are not 3 Wagnerites in the Orchestra !) - Just be of good spirits and trust me ! I do not yet know where to begin with the final movement. But that will come soon, I hope.

I have received a letter from the Vienna Academic Wagner Association which caused me great joy.

If you have the opportunity to see one of the gentlemen, please say to him that I am going to answer the letter “ after ” the performance of your Symphony. Baron Ostini passed your letter on to me. I will see to it that a few friends of our cause meet on Monday evening.

Until, we meet again soon !

Your entirely devoted,

Hermann Levi »

Incipit : « Ihrem Wunsche gemäss habe ich auf Sonntag ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 2 d'Hermann Levi ; pages 314-315.

Baron Karl von Ostini (1830-1895) : « Vorsitzender » of the Munich Wagner Society. His son, Fritz von Ostini, (1861-1927) , who was a journalist and critic, met Anton Bruckner in Bayreuth.

16 mars 1885 : Lettre de Josef Schalk à son frère Franz.

« The success was truly splendid. Levi showed a remarkable amount of understanding and care. We were very pleased with the performance. Bruckner is overjoyed. All in all, the whole “ Munich-affair ” looks like a triumphant procession for Bruckner. He has been honoured, to a surprising extent, in all artistic circles (banquets, laurel wreaths) . (Hermann von) Kaulbach has painted his portrait ; (Edgar) Hanfstängl has taken his photograph. »

Josef Löwy

Le peintre et photographe autrichien Josef Löwy est né le 16 août 1835 à Pressburg (aujourd'hui, Bratislava en Slovaquie) ; et est mort le 24 mars 1902 à Vienne. Il est inhumé à Viedeň, Rakousko.

Fils de Hermann Löwy et Rosalia Löwy. Époux de Mathilde Löwy. Frère de Ignaz Löwy ; Marie Weinberger et Babette Betty Buchwald.

Actif à Vienne, au numéro 31 de la « Weihburggasse » et au numéro 17 de la « Parkgasse » , des années 1860 aux années 1880. Il a travaillé de 1856 à 1902 à Vienne et Baden.

Photographe de la Cour Impériale de François-Joseph dans les années 1880. Membre de la Société française de photographie, de 1874 à 1885.

Anton Bruckner se fait photographe au studio de Josef Löwy à Vienne, au début et à la fin de sa carrière : en 1854 et en 1894.

...

The Austrian painter and photographer Josef Löwy was born on 16 August 1835 in Pressburg (today, Bratislava in Slovakia) ; and died on 24 March 1902 in Vienna. He rests in Vídeň, Rakousko.

Son of Hermann Löwy and Rosalia Löwy. Husband of Mathilde Löwy. Brother of Ignaz Löwy ; Marie Weinberger and Babette Betty Buchwald.

Decades 1860 to 1880 : Active in Vienna, at number 31 « Weinburggasse » and at number 17 « Parkgasse » .

Löwy was a prominent Viennese photographer whose studio became one of the leading establishments in the Austrian capital city between the decades 1870 and 1900. Trained as a lithographer and having received an artistic education at the Vienna Academy, Löwy eventually turned to photography in 1861. Since 1864, he regularly exhibited in photographic salons, leading to his participation in the 1873 Vienna World Exhibition, where his work was awarded with medals. This exposure led to his appointment as an official photographer to the Austrian Court, in the same year. Member of the « Société française de photographie » , from 1874 to 1885.

Löwy's studio production was highly-multifaceted. It included a wide-range of subjects - from Royal portraits to documentation of industrial sites. Of particular interest are the Löwy studio's studies of Theatre and Opera actors, which stand-out due to their expert use of « mise en scène » (staging) and performance. After the photographer's death, the studio was taken-over by his widow, Mathilde, who run the operation until 1908. It was purchased by Löwy's nephew and (presumably) assistant, Gustav Löwy who renamed the business into « Art Institute J. Löwy » .

Source

Durstmüller. « Josef Löwy » , in : « Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon (1815-1950) » , Band 5, Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Wien (1972) ; Seite 296f.

...

Josef Löwy was a very prominent and talented Vienna photographer who was active in the capital, between the 1870's and early 1900's. He was an Austrian. He was trained as a lithographer and received an artistic education at the Vienna Academy. He entered the field of photography in 1861 and was a regular exhibitor in photographic salons, beginning in 1864. He won medals in the 1873 Vienna World Exhibition and became an official photographer to the Austrian Court. Löwy had varied interests in photography. He did Royal portraits and also photographed industrial sites. He photographed many Theatre and Opera stars. Upon Löwy's death, his wife (Mathilde) took-over operation of the studio until 1908. Mathilde Löwy (1854-1908) had married Josef, in 1875. She was succeeded in business by Löwy's nephew, Gustav Löwy, who renamed the studio « Art Institute J. Löwy » .

...

Josef Löwy (geboren 16. August 1834 in Pressburg ; gestorben 24. März 1902 in Wien) war Maler, Verleger, Fabrikant und Kaiserlich und Königlich Hoffotograf.

Josef Löwy übersiedelte 1848 nach Wien, wo er das Lithografieren lernte. Dann studierte an der Wiener Akademie in der Malklasse. Er eröffnete 1856 sein erstes Zimmeratelier in Wien. 1859 zog er in ein neues Atelier um. Eine seiner bezogenen Räumlichkeiten war in der Weihburggasse 31, I. Bezirk. 1861 trat er der Photographischen Gesellschaft in Wien bei und 1864 beteiligte er sich an der Ersten photographischen Ausstellung in Wien. Von 1866 bis 1873 besaß er ein Sommeratelier in Baden bei Wien. Seit 1872 beschäftigte er sich mit dem Lichtdruckverfahren und er gründete ein Atelier für Industriaufnahmen im Wiener Gemeindebezirk Landstraße.

1873 wurde Löwy Mitglied der Wiener Photographen-Association, die anlässlich der Wiener Weltausstellung 1873 gegründet wurde. Diese hatte die Konzession zur Produktion von Bildaufnahmen im Ausstellungsgelände. Im selben Jahr wurde er aufgrund seiner fotografischen Leistungen um die Weltausstellung zum Hoffotograf ernannt.

Unter anderem sind seine Industriefotografien sowie die ab den 1880er Jahren erstellten Heliografien bekannt geworden. 1885 gründete er mit dem Amateurfotografen Josef Plener eine Trockenplattenanstalt. Löwy hat in seiner Laufbahn aus seinem Unternehmen eine international bekannte Reproduktionsanstalt mit Fotoverlag gemacht. Themenschwerpunkte seiner Fotografie waren Porträts, Wiener Architektur, Kunst- und Aktfotografie. Seine Firma wurde von der Witwe Mathilde Löwy fortgeführt und 1908 durch den Neffen Gustav Löwy unter dem Namen « Kunstanstalt J. Löwy » übernommen.

...

Josef Löwy, Maler und Fotograf : geboren 16. August 1834 in Pressburg (Bratislava, Slowakische Republik) ; gestorben 24. März 1902 in Wien. Studierte an der Wiener Akademie, besaß ab 1856 ein Fotoatelier in Wien und beschäftigte sich ab 1872 mit Lichtdruck ; gründete ein Atelier für Industriaufnahmen, ab Anfang der 80er Jahre stellte er auch Heliogravüren her. Als Kaiserlich-Königlich Hoffotograf schuf er zahlreiche Porträts und Darstellungen der vornehmen Gesellschaft. Weitere Themenschwerpunkte waren Akt, Kunst und Architektur.

Literatur

Durstmüller. « Josef Löwy », in : « Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon (1815-1950) », Band 5, Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Wien (1972) ; Seite 296f.

Otto Hochreiter und Timm Starl (Redaktion) . « Geschichte der Fotografie in Österreich », 2 Bände (1983) ; Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon.

Edgar Hanfstängl

Musicienne dotée d'une jolie voix, éprise d'absolu et admirant la musique de Richard Wagner, Sophie-Charlotte en Bavière (dit « Sopherl ») refuse d'abord tous les partis qui se présentent à elle, au grand dam de sa mère.

Ainsi, « Sopherl » refuse-t-elle successivement les propositions du roi Louis Ier de Portugal, qui épouse en 1862 la pétulante Maria-Pia de Savoie, fille du roi d'Italie ; du prince Philippe de Wurtemberg, un petit-fils du roi des Français Louis-Philippe, qui épouse en 1865 l'archiduchesse Marie-Thérèse d'Autriche, fille de l'archiduc Albert ; un intime de l'archiduchesse Sophie ; et même en 1866, celle de l'archiduc Louis-Victor d'Autriche, le propre frère de l'Empereur d'Autriche (le beau-frère de « Sissi ») .

Pour la duchesse Ludovica, ces refus sont autant de catastrophe et le mariage de sa benjamine, toujours célibataire à 19 ans, devient un véritable casse-tête.

C'est alors que se présente le plus intéressant et le plus beau des prétendants : Louis II. Le roi Maximilien II de Bavière est mort en 1864 ; son fils-aîné lui a succédé sous le nom de Louis II. Âgé de 19 ans, c'est un très beau jeune homme qui apprécie ses cousins de la branche cadette, ami d'enfance du duc Charles-Théodore en Bavière, frère aîné de Sophie-Charlotte. Fasciné par son Impériale cousine « Sissi », il apprécie le charme et le talent de Sophie-Charlotte et partage avec elle son goût (qui, chez lui, tournera à l'idolâtrie) pour la musique de Richard Wagner, le compositeur qu'il a appelé à sa Cour dès son avènement.

Sur les conseils d'un ami intime, le prince Paul de Tour et Taxis, le jeune souverain se décide à se marier et choisit d'épouser sa cousine qu'il surnomme Elsa, du nom de l'héroïne de « Lohengrin », l'Opéra du « Maître », qu'il a dû disgracier sous la pression de ses ministres tant l'impopularité du compositeur devenait grande.

Le 22 janvier 1867, sont proclamées les fiançailles officielles du roi Louis II de Bavière, qui est également le chef de la Maison de Wittelsbach avec la duchesse Sophie-Charlotte, sa cousine.

La duchesse Ludovica exulte : princesse de second rang, voici qu'elle va devenir la mère de sa souveraine, et si un fils naît, la grand-mère du futur roi de Bavière.

Les préparatifs vont bon train, le carrosse des noces est prêt, la couronne de la mariée également et nouveauté, le couple, ensemble ou séparément, pose pour des photographies officielles dans le studio munichois du photographe de la cour, Franz Hanfstängl.

Cependant, Louis II, qui découvre ses tendances homosexuelles, conçoit difficilement une vie conjugale avec une femme. N'osant s'engager, il repousse plusieurs fois la date du mariage tout en faisant une cour extravagante à sa fiancée, la laissant sans nouvelles ou la faisant réveiller en pleine nuit pour lui faire offrir des fleurs. De son côté, Sophie se désespère et s'écrie au sein du cercle familial : « Ne voyez vous pas qu'il ne m'aime pas. »

Déconcertée par la situation, la jeune « Sopherl-Elsa » noue, avec la complicité de ses 2 dames d'honneur, une idylle secrète avec le séduisant fils du photographe de la Cour, Edgar Hanfstängl, dont il reste quelques lettres.

Outre les étranges fiançailles de Louis et Sophie-Charlotte, l'année 1867 est une année de deuil pour les Maison de Habsbourg-Lorraine et de Wittelsbach : en quelques mois meurent la jeune épouse de Charles-Théodore, le mari d'Hélène, l'archiduchesse Mathilde qui meurt brûlée vive à 20 ans, et l'archiduc Maximilien, frère de François-Joseph, devenu Empereur du Mexique, exécuté par ses sujets rebelles tandis que son épouse sombre dans la folie. À ces drames familiaux, s'ajoute le compromis Austro-hongrois qui marque la défaite politique de l'archiduchesse Sophie. Tous viennent à Possi épancher leur cœur.

En octobre, vexé par les atermoiements du roi, le duc Max, abandonnant pour une fois son ton badin et sa vie bohème, exige la fixation définitive de la date des noces. Offusqué par l'attitude du duc en Bavière qui, s'il est son oncle et futur beau-père pressenti, n'en est pas moins son sujet, Louis II, rompt ses fiançailles avec Sophie-Charlotte.

Il est également possible que Louis II ait appris l'aventure de sa fiancée avec le fils de son photographe, qu'il en ait été blessé mais surtout qu'à l'instar de Wagner qu'il divinisait, il se soit rendu compte que Sophie était aussi un être de chair et non l'héroïne d'Opéra qu'il imaginait.

Le jeune roi, fuyant un monde qu'il rejette et dont il se sent incompris, se réfugie dans une vie de plus en plus solitaire.

...

Chief-Clerk, Commercial Purchaser and Art-Publisher Edgar Hanfstängl was born on 15 July 1842 in Munich ; and died on 28 May 1910 in Munich. He is a significant figure because he was the son of a famous Bavarian Court photographer connected with the circle of Ludwig II, and became a close confidant of the Duchess Sophie-Charlotte in Bavaria. He was also the father of Ernst Hanfstängl, the political figure.

Edgar Hanfstängl was the son of the photographer Franz Hanfstängl (1804-1877) and his 1st wife « Frau » Franziska Hanfstängl-Wegmeier (1809-1860) . Edgar completed a training as commercial purchaser in Stettin and with a London wholesaler. At the beginning of the 1860's, Edgar set-out for Asia, to work as financial clerk to the « Clark Tea Wholesaler's Company » . In 1867, he returned to Munich to his father's Art-business, where he was put to work as head-clerk. In the same year, he embarked upon a love-affair with the « fiancée » of Ludwig II of Bavaria, Princess Sophie-Charlotte. On November 12, 1868, Edgar took-over the photographic work-shop and expanded the business to the « Franz Hanfstängl Art Publishing-House » .

The engagement between Sophie in bavaria and Ludwig II was arranged at the behest of her father Duke Max Josef, even though the King, considering his own distinctly homosexual character, was concerned that she would not be happy in the union. The engagement was agreed upon, on 22 January 1867. 3 days later, Sophie met Edgar in his father's photographic studio, where he had recently arrived as senior clerk after his travels abroad. Possibly, they had known each other since childhood, when Franz Hanfstängl was a readily welcomed guest in the artistic circle of Duke Max.

The many photographs of the Royal bride which, then, had to be prepared, and additional work which brought Edgar regularly to Possenhofen Castle, brought them more closely together and they fell in love. Their meetings, attended by the utmost secrecy, occurred in the Pähl Castle, the Palace in Munich, and even at Possenhofen. 5 love-letters, which Sophie-Charlotte wrote to Edgar Hanfstängl, between July and September 1867, have been preserved. The wedding was called-off by Ludwig, in October.

Edgar was not able to make-up his mind to marry, until 1882. Edgar's wife, the Berlin-born Katharine Wilhelmina Heine (1859-1945) , produced for him 5 children : Edgar (1883-1958) ; Egon (1884-1915) ; Erna (1885-1981) ; Ernst « Putzi » (1887-1975) ; and Erwin (1888-1914) . From 1907, the eldest son Edgar took control of his father's Art-business. Edgar's only daughter Erna found, after her father's death, an envelope with the hand-written endorsement by her father : « Letters of Princess Sophie-Charlotte - burn these unread. Edgar. » Erna did not carry-out her father's wishes but, instead, handed-over the letters, in February 1980, to the author Heinz Gebhardt, in order « once (for all) to set the record straight » and he published details of the affair with excerpts from the correspondence in his history of the Hanfstängl family business.

Edgar Hanfstängl, Sophie's « dear, beloved friend » , died on 28 May 1910. He was buried in the old Munich south cemetery in the Hanfstängl family-plot.

...

Edgar Hanfstängl (geboren 15. Juli 1842 in München ; gestorben 28. Mai 1910 ebenda) war ein deutscher Prokurist und Handelskaufmann.

Edgar Hanfstängl wurde als Sohn des Fotografen Franz Hanfstängl (1804-1877) und dessen Frau Franziska Hanfstängl-Wegmeier (1809-1860) in München geboren. Edgar absolvierte eine Ausbildung als Handelskaufmann in Stettin und in einem Londoner Großhandel. Anfang der 1860er Jahre begab sich Edgar nach Asien, um als Kontorist beim Teehandelsunternehmen Clark zu arbeiten. 1867 kehrte er in den Kunstbetrieb seines Vaters nach München zurück, wo er als Prokurist tätig war. Im gleichen Jahr entwickelte er ein Liebesverhältnis zur Verlobten von Ludwig II. , der Prinzessin Sophie-Charlotte. Am 12. November 1868 übernahm Edgar das photographische Atelier und erweiterte den Betrieb zum Kunstverlag Franz Hanfstängl.

1882 heiratete Edgar Hanfstängl die in Berlin geborene Katharina Wilhelmina Heine (1859-1945) . Sie hatten fünf Kinder : Edgar (1883-1958) ; Egon (1884-1915) ; Erna (1885-1981) ; Ernst « Putzi » (1887-1975) ; und Erwin (1888-1914) . Der älteste Sohn Edgar führte seit 1907 den Kunstbetrieb seines Vaters. Die einzige Tochter Erna fand nach dem Tode ihres Vaters ein Kuvert mit dem handschriftlichen Vermerk ihres Vaters : « Briefe von Prinzessin Sophie-Charlotte - ungelesen verbrennen. Edgar. » Erna folgte dem Wunsch ihres Vaters nicht, sondern übergab die Briefe im Februar 1980 dem Autor Heinz Gebhardt, um « die Sache einmal richtigzustellen » .

Edgar Hanfstängl, Sophies « theurer, lieber Freund » , starb am 28. Mai 1910. Er wurde im Alten Münchner Südfriedhof im Familiengrab der Familie Hanfstängl begraben.

Franz Hanfstängl

Le peintre, lithographe et photographe allemand Franz Seraph Hanfstängl est né le 1er mars 1804 à Baiernrain, près de Bad Tölz ; et est mort le 18 avril 1877 à Munich.

Hanfstängl est issu d'une famille roturière. En 1816, sur les recommandations de l'instituteur du village, il intègre la classe de dessin du congé-école de jour à Munich, dirigée par Hermann Josef Mitterer. Il y suit les cours de lithographie, il a des contacts avec Alois Senefelder et étudie, de 1819 à 1825, à l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Munich. Surnommé « le comte Litho » , Hanfstängl acquiert une certaine popularité en réalisant des portraits en lithographie de la société munichoise. En 1833, il fonde à Munich son propre établissement lithographique, qu'il dirige jusqu'en 1868, et auquel il joint ensuite une imprimerie d'art et, en 1853, un atelier photographique.

Entre 1835 et 1852, Hanfstängl produit quelque 200 reproductions lithographiques de chefs-d'œuvre de la galerie de tableaux de Dresde, et les publie dans un porte-folio. Plus tard, il devient photographe de la Cour et réalise les portraits de personnes distinguées, comme celui du jeune roi Louis II de Bavière, de Franz Liszt, de Richard Wagner, d'Otto von Bismarck et de l'Impératrice d'Autriche Elisabeth.

Il influence son beau-frère, le médecin, inventeur et homme politique autrichien Norbert Pfretzschner dans l'évolution de la plaque photographique à sec, en 1866. Il est le père de Edgar Hanfstängl. Un autre membre de la famille, Erwin von Hanfstängl, épouse en 1873 la chanteuse d'Opéra Marie Schröder.

...

The Bavarian painter, lithographer and photographer Franz Seraph Hanfstängl was born on 1 March 1804 in Baiernrain, near Bad Tölz ; and died on 18 April 1877 in Munich.

Hanfstängl originated from a commoner family and, in 1816, came on the recommendation of the town-school-teachers into the drawing-class of the leave-day school at Munich, led by Hermann Josef Mitterer. He was instructed in lithography, he had contact with Alois Senefelder and studied, from 1819 to 1825, at the Munich Academy of Fine-Arts. In 1826, he went to Dresden and began his great work, completed in 1852, of copying in lithograph the canvases of the Dresden Gallery. Between 1835 and 1852, Hanfstängl brought-out about 200 lithographic reproductions of Masterworks from the Dresden picture-gallery, and published them in a portfolio. When he returned to Munich, he left his establishment at Dresden to his brothers Max and Hans.

In 1833, he founded in Munich a lithographic establishment of his own, which he operated until 1868, and to which he later attached a fine-art printing-shop and, in 1853, a photographic work-shop. Hanfstängl won for himself much popularity as the portrait lithographer of Munich society, being nicknamed « Count Litho » . Later, he became Court photographer and produced portraits of distinguished persons, amongst others of the young King Ludwig II, of Franz Liszt, of Otto von Bismarck and of Empress Elisabeth of Austria. In 1858, Hanfstängl tutored renowned French photographer Antoine Samuel Adam-Salomon.

He influenced his brother-in-law, the Austrian physician, inventor and politician Norbert Pfretzschner, senior, in the evolving of the photographic dry-plate, in 1866. He was married to Franziska Wegmeier (1809-1860) , by whom he became the father of Edgar Hanfstängl. Another family member, Erwin von Hanfstängl, married in 1873 the Operasinger Marie Schröder.

...

Franz Seraph Hanfstängl (geboren 1. März 1804 in Baiernrain bei Tölz ; gestorben 18. April 1877 in München ; Alten Südlichen Friedhof : Gräberfeld 2 - Reihe 7 - Platz 37) war ein deutscher Maler, Lithograf und Fotograf.

Franz Hanfstängl entstammte einer alteingesessenen Bauernfamilie aus Baiernrain bei Tölz und kam 1816 auf Empfehlung des Dorfschullehrers in die Zeichenklasse der von Hermann Josef Mitterer geführten Feiertagsschule in München. Er wurde in Lithografie ausgebildet, hatte Kontakt zu Alois Senefelder und studierte 1819-1925 an der Königlichen Akademie der Bildenden Künste in München.

Als Porträtlithograf der Münchner Gesellschaft erfreute sich Hanfstängl, « Graf Litho » genannt, bald großer Beliebtheit. 1833 gründete er in München eine eigene lithografische Anstalt, die er bis 1868 leitete und der er 1853 eine Kunstdruckerei und ein Fotoatelier angliederte. 1835-1852 stellte Hanfstängl rund 200 lithografische Reproduktionen von Meisterwerken der Dresdner Gemäldegalerie her und veröffentlichte diese in einer Mappe. Er war später Hoffotograf und schuf Porträts berühmter Persönlichkeiten, und andere des Königs Ludwig II. von Bayern, Franz Liszt, Otto von Bismarcks und der Kaiserin Elisabeth von Österreich.

Er beeinflusste seinen Schwager, den österreichischen Arzt, Erfinder und Politiker Norbert Pfretzschner senior bei der Entwicklung einer fotografischen Trockenplatte 1866. Er war der Vater des Kaufmanns Edgar Hanfstängl und Großvater des Politikers Ernst Hanfstängl.

Unter seinem Namen wurde die von ihm 1833 gegründete Anstalt als Kunstverlag über seinen Tod hinaus bis 1980 weitergeführt. Diesen Betrieb professionalisierte ab 1868 der kaufmännisch und überseeisch tätige Sohn Franz Hanfstängls, Edgar. Dessen massenhafte Vervielfältigung von Kunst ironisierte der Schriftsteller Thomas Mann in seiner 1902 erschienenen Novelle Gladius Dei, indem er ihn und seine « Reproduktionsindustrie » als « Kunsthandlung Blüthenzweig » beschrieb.

Auszeichnungen

Medaille mit Aufschrift aus Anlaß der Ausstellung in Brüssel 1856.

Medaille für guten Geschmack für Portrait-Photographien, Reproduktionen und Vergrößerungen anlässlich der Weltausstellung 1873 in Wien (Abteilung Photographie) .

...

May 1886 : In this edition of « la Revue wagnérienne » (1885-1888) , the London correspondent Louis N. Parker mentioned :

« Benjamin Lewis Moseley a fondé la branche anglaise de la Société Wagnérienne. »

Moseley's name suffered various misrepresentations throughout his life, though Parker must personally have known him.

The next month, Parker reported :

« Lors du passage de Franz Liszt à Londres, le 17 avril, une adresse lui a été présentée, de la part du Cercle Wagnérien, par Monsieur Benjamin Lewis Moseley. »

The « Revue » got the name right, though, when Parker reported the London Society's prospectus for 1886 which included the lecture to be given, on 16 March :

« Un simple description des principes d'art de Wagner par Monsieur Benjamin Lewis Moseley » and, earlier, when it listed the international central committee of « l'Association wagnérienne » , in Munich :

« Le président honoraire est Franz Liszt ; et les membres du Comité sont :

le Baron Karl d'Ostini et le Comte de Sporck, présidents ; Messieurs Sachs et Porges, secrétaires ; Schmid, trésorier ; et Hermann Levi, chef d'orchestre de Munich ; Oskar Merz ; le Baron Hans de Wolzogen ; Franz de Fischer ; Max Ritter de Schmædel ; et Franz Seitz. Le représentant à Paris est Monsieur Houston Stewart Chamberlain ; à Bruxelles, Monsieur Henri La Fontaine ; à Londres, Monsieur Benjamin Lewis Moseley. »

L'activité publique et professionnelle de Henri La Fontaine (1854-1943) à la fois avocat, homme politique, bibliographe, auteur, alpiniste et musicien (ami de Richard Wagner, il traduit « la Walkyrie ») permet de comprendre que La Fontaine a eu une vie bien remplie, conduite par des idées et des actions que connaissent parfaitement les enseignants documentalistes : le partage, l'autonomie, l'épanouissement, le respect et la reconnaissance des personnes.

...

1885 : Richard Wagner fut l'idole d'Anton Bruckner. À l'annonce de sa mort en 1883, Bruckner était à composer l'Adagio de sa 7e Symphonie. Il acheva alors le mouvement par un passage plutôt obsédant qu'il a toujours surnommé

« musique funèbre pour le Maître » . 2 ans plus tard (1885) , Bruckner immortalisa son Maître bien-aimé Richard Wagner lors d'un concert d'orgue inoubliable donné au monastère de Saint-Florian. Voici le compte-rendu d'un critique musical présent, rattaché au quotidien de la ville de Linz :

« Les admirateurs de Bruckner sont arrivés au monastère de Saint-Florian de toutes les façons possibles : à pied, en charrette, en voiture et par chemin de fer. Ils voulaient tous entendre la musique sublime du fameux organiste capable d'amadouer le magnifique instrument. Peu avant 3 heures de l'après-midi, la chapelle du monastère était rempli, et, après quelques instants d'attente, apparut le visage amical de notre cher Bruckner à l'orgue. »

« Bruckner a fait la preuve qu'il était l'un des plus célèbres improvisateurs du monde. Le thème de la lamentation sur la mort de Siegfried de l'Opéra « Götterdämmerung » s'amorça lentement, tout en prenant de manière graduelle de l'expansion, jusqu'au moment où il atteignit une puissance inattendue. Les sonorités du magnifique instrument ont secoué l'auditoire. Puis, il démontra son génie en tant que contrapuntiste. La lamentation de « Siegfried » fut bientôt suivie par un nouveau, et tout aussi sublime, chant solennel : celui de la musique funèbre tirée de l'Adagio de sa 7e Symphonie, écrite sous le choc de l'annonce de la mort de Richard Wagner. »

« C'est alors que les cieux se dégagèrent ; laissant apparaître un Intermezzo lyrique dans le style de Georg Friedrich Händel, entrelacé d'un thème extrait de la 8e Symphonie. Le « Walsungen » et les motifs de « Siegfried » tirés de l'Anneau réapparurent de nouveau. Cette fois, la douleur avait disparu. Les puissantes lignes de chant retentirent dans tous les registres, se précipitant au final vers une explosion de joie. La force de cette complexe improvisation de Bruckner souleva nos esprits et nous toucha profondément. Il serait difficile d'exprimer, en quelques mots, notre sincère gratitude pour ce qu'elle nous a apporté. »

The concert was reviewed in the Linz daily newspaper :

« Bruckner's admirers arrived at the Monastery by every possible form of transport (in carriages and carts, by rail and on foot) in order to hear the sublime music which Bruckner was able to coax from the magnificent instrument. Shortly before half past 3, the Monastery chapel filled-up, and, soon, the friendly face of our dear Bruckner appeared at the organ. Bruckner gave an excellent example of one of his world-famous improvisations. Beginning quietly, continually swelling-up until it reached unexpected power, the sounds of the magnificent lamentation on the death of Siegfried from " Götterdämmerung " shook the audience. Bruckner then brought all his genius to bear in a contrapuntal reworking of the piece ; but Siegfried's lamentation was soon joined by a new and equally sublime, solemn dirge : it was Bruckner's own funeral music from the Adagio of his 7th Symphony, which he wrote in deepest grief on the death of Wagner. Then, the heavens cleared and a lofty intermezzo in the style of Händel sang-out. This jubilant song, which followed the funeral music, was interwoven with a theme from the 8th Symphony. The " Walsungen " and " Siegfried " motifs from the " Ring " retuned once again. This time, however, the grief had disappeared, and powerful singing lines resounded in all registers, rushing and rejoicing towards the end of the piece. Bruckner's artistic achievement had stirred us and lifted our spirits powerfully, and it would be hard to express in mere words our thankfulness for what he gave us. »

Gisèle Louise Marie de Habsbourg-Lorraine

Bruckner séjourne à Munich du 8 au 14 mars 1885, à l'occasion de la première de sa 7e Symphonie donnée à la salle du « Théâtre de l'Odéon ». Et, au retour d'un périple à Bayreuth, Bruckner s'arrête de nouveau à Munich du 29 juillet au 5 août, toujours soucieux d'une autre possible exécution de sa 7e Symphonie. À cette occasion, il sera reçu en audience privée par l'archiduchesse Gisela, l'épouse du prince Léopold de Bavière.

Gisèle Louise Marie de Habsbourg-Lorraine, archiduchesse d'Autriche et princesse de Bavière est née le 12 juillet 1856 à Laxenburg et est décédée le 27 juillet 1932 à Munich. Elle était la 2e fille de l'Empereur et roi François Joseph Ier d'Autriche et de son épouse Elisabeth de Wittelsbach, la célèbre « Sissi » .

Tout comme sa sœur aînée Sophie et leur frère le Kronprinz Rodolphe, Gisèle n'a pas été élevée par sa mère, mais par sa grand-mère l'archiduchesse Sophie d'Autriche, femme de caractère, qui jugeait sa belle-fille trop jeune pour s'occuper d'un enfant.

Ressemblant tant au physique qu'au moral à son père, elle a, contrairement à sa mère qui a peu d'affection pour elle, les pieds bien sur terre.

L'oncle de Gisèle, le duc Maximilien-Emanuel en Bavière surnommé par la famille « Mapperl » , s'était épris de la princesse Amélie de Saxe-Cobourg-Kohary, laquelle répondait au sentiment du jeune homme. Mais Amélie avait été fiancée par sa famille au prince Léopold de Bavière. L'Impératrice Elisabeth entreprit alors de faire renoncer Léopold à ce mariage en lui proposant un parti plus avantageux : sa propre fille. « Mapperl » put ainsi épouser Amélie en 1875. Ils formèrent un couple très uni.

De ce fait, le 20 avril 1873, Gisèle épousa à Vienne, à l'âge de 16 ans, le prince Léopold de Bavière, frère cadet du futur roi Louis III, son cousin au 2e degré. Ils vécurent à Munich, en Bavière. Le couple eut 4 enfants :

Elisabeth (1874-1957) .

Augusta (1875-1964) .

Georges (1880-1943) .

Conrad (1883-1969) .

Elle s'investit dans de nombreuses sociétés de charité, afin d'aider les plus démunis, les personnes sourdes et aveugles. Pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, elle installe un hôpital militaire dans son palais, pendant que son mari est maréchal sur le front de l'Est.

Quand la révolution éclate en 1918, toute la famille fuit Munich, mais Gisèle reste et prend même part aux élections de 1919 pour l'Assemblée nationale de Weimar, lres élections où les femmes de plus de 20 ans purent voter.

Son mari meurt en 1930, et Gisèle ne lui survivra que 2 ans : elle meurt âgée de 76 ans, le 27 juillet 1932. Elle est enterrée près de son mari à Munich, dans l'église Saint-Michel.

...

Lors de son passage à Munich, Bruckner sera accompagné de son ami proche, ancien élève du Conservatoire et « secrétaire personnel volontaire », Friedrich Eckstein, fasciné par la partition de la 7e Symphonie.

Dans « Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » - Universal-Edition, Wiener Philharmonischer Verlag, Wien (1923) - , Eckstein donne un compte-rendu assez détaillé de son voyage à Munich en compagnie de son Maître.

La « Place de l'Odéon » à Munich

L'« Odeonsplatz » est une place publique de Munich. Elle marque la fin Sud de la « Ludwigstraße » et se situe dans l'alignement « Siegestor », « Ludwigstraße », « Odeonsplatz ». Son nom vient de la salle de concert de l'Odéon que le roi de Bavière Louis Ier a fait construire, en 1827, à l'angle sud-ouest de la place.

La Place marque la délimitation entre les secteurs de « Maxvorstadt » (au nord) et « Altstadt-Lehel » (au sud) . La place est délimitée à l'ouest par l'ancien Odéon et le « Leuchtenbergpalais » et à l'est par le « Basargebaude » (où se trouve le traditionnel Café Tambosi. Au fil des années, le nom d'« Odeonsplatz » a été également utilisé pour désigner le parvis de la « Feldherrnhalle », qui se trouve dans le prolongement de la place, entre la « Theatinerkirche » et la « Residenz » . Au sud, 2 rues piétonnes (la « Residenzstraße » à l'est et la « Theatinerstraße » à l'ouest) partent de la place. En direction nord se déroule la longue « Ludwigstraße » .

À partir d'environ 1790, des plans sont dressés pour la création d'une nouvelle place devant faire la liaison entre le quartier de « Schwabing », le château de « Nymphenburg » et la « Residenz » . Son aspect actuel a été fixé par Leo von Klenze, en 1816, chargé par Louis Ier de Bavière (seulement « Kronprinz », à l'époque) de la planification générale de la « Ludwigstraße » dont la place fait partie.

En 1972, la zone au sud de la place devient piétonne, le trafic venant de la « Ludwigstraße », en direction du centre-ville, étant dévié par les rues parallèles (la « Brienner Straße » ou la « Von-der-Tann-Straße ») .

Traditionnellement, les différentes parades organisées dans la ville (de deuil, comme pour celle de Franz-Josef Strauß, en 1988) ou de célébration de victoires (dont la Ire sera celle de la Guerre franco-prussienne de 1870) se déroulent le long de la « Ludwigstraße » en direction de la « Feldherrnhalle » .

C'est probablement en souvenir de ces parades qu'Adolf Hitler, après le « Putsch » de la brasserie en 1923, suit le même tracé dans son défilé jusqu'à l'« Odeonsplatz » où eut lieu l'affrontement avec la police qui mettra fin à ce coup d'État. Plus tard, sous le régime nazi, les défilés militaires vont partir de l' « Odeonsplatz » en direction de la « Königsplatz » .

...

« Odeonsplatz » is a sight to see. It is a magnificent square. As you pass a statue of Ludwig I on his big bronze horse, you come to the entrance of what used to be the « Odeon » Theater. It was here that Ulrichs made his famous speech in 1867. Fortunately, the city printed a booklet on the history of the « Odeon » . Here is Ulrichs' account of his visit to the « Odeon » :

« Until my dying day, I will look back with pride when on August 29, 1867, I found the courage to come face to face in battle against the specter of an age old, wrathful hydra which for time immemorial has been injecting poison into me and into men of my nature. Many have been driven to suicide because all their happiness in life was tainted. Indeed, I am proud that I found the courage to deal the initial blow to the hydra of public contempt. »

« What gave me strength at the last moment finally to mount the speaker's box at the Association of German Jurists was the awareness that at that very moment, the distant gaze of comrades of my nature was fixed on me. Should I return their trust with cowardice ? Also giving me strength were thoughts still fresh, indeed, still smoldering, of a suicide caused by the ruling system, in Bremen in 1866. And also a letter I received as I was on my way to our session, informing me that a colleague had remarked about me : ' Numa is afraid to take action. ' » .

« In spite of all this, moments of weakness continued to assail me, and an evil voice whispered in my ear : ' There's still time for silence, Numa. You need only to renounce the words you have prepared. Then your heart palpitations shall cease ! ' »

« But then, it seemed to me as if another voice began to whisper. It was the warning not to be silent, the voice that had warned my predecessor Heinrich Hössli in Glarus (Switzerland) 30 years before, and which at that moment loudly resounded in my mind with all its force : ' Speak, or be judged ! ' »

« I should like to be worthy of Hössli. I, too, did not desire to come under the hand of the grave digger without having openly attested to my oppressed inalienable rights and without having broken through a narrow passage to freedom, even if with less renown than a greater name of the past. »

« With these thoughts and with my heart pounding in my breast, I mounted the speaker's box on August 29, 1867, in the Grand Hall of the Odeon Theater in front of more than 500 jurists of Germany, among whom were members of the German parliament and a Bavarian prince. I mounted with God ! »

« There was apparent amazement and scorn ; isolated calls to adjourn. There was a tempestuous outcry : ' Adjourn, adjourn ! ' But now, outbursts as loud as the previous ones came from the opposite side of the hall : ' No, no, continue, continue. ' »

« There was a chaotic uproar and violent interruption. Uncommon excitement in the gathering on that side that previously called for adjournment. The president says : ' I request that the speaker continue reading his proposal in Latin.' But I took my notes and left the speaker's box. »

Le « Nationaltheater München »

Le « Bayerische Staatsoper » (Opéra d'État de Bavière) est une compagnie publique d'Opéra et de ballet située à Munich. C'est l'un des plus prestigieux Opéras allemand.

Les représentations d'Opéras se déroulent principalement au « Nationaltheater München ». Ce théâtre d'Opéras se situe au sein de la Résidence de Munich. C'est un édifice d'architecture néo-classique construit sur le modèle du Théâtre de l'Odéon de Paris. Il abrite 2,101 places. Érigé entre 1811 et 1818, il est détruit par un incendie en 1823, il est reconstruit en 1825. Par la suite, le roi Louis II de Bavière y impose la création des œuvres de Richard Wagner. Le Théâtre a été à nouveau détruit pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, le 3 octobre 1943, et reconstruit entre 1958 et 1963.

L'Orchestre en résidence est l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Bavière, créé en 1653.

...

The National Theatre Munich (« Nationaltheater München ») is an Opera House on the Max Joseph Platz. It is the home of the Bavarian State Opera and the Bavarian State Ballet (« Bayerisches Staatsballett ») .

The Bavarian State Opera also performs in the « Prinzregententheater » , which opened in 1901 and, like the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » , is built to Richard Wagner's specifications, and in the Cuvilliés Theatre at the Residenz, constructed in 1751-1753 and described by Thierry Beauvert as « a Rococo gem » .

The 1st Theatre was commissioned, in 1810, by King Maximilian I of Bavaria because the nearby Cuvilliés Theatre had too little space. It was designed by Karl von Fischer, in 1811-1818, with the 1782 Odéon in Paris as its architectural model. Construction began on 26 October 1811 but was interrupted in 1813 by financing problems and in 1817 by a fire in the unfinished building. The new Theatre finally opened on 12 October 1818 with a performance of « Die Weihe by Ferdinand Fränzl, but was soon destroyed by another fire on 14 January 1823 ; the stage décor caught fire during a performance of « Die beyden Fuchse » by Étienne Méhul and the fire could not be put out because the water supply was frozen. (Coincidentally, the Paris Odéon itself burned down in 1818.) It was then immediately rebuilt and re-opened in 1825.

This 2nd Theatre, designed by Leo von Klenze, incorporated neo-Greek features as seen in its portico and triangular pediment. The entrance is supported by Corinthian columns.

In 1925, it was modified to create an enlarged stage area with updated equipment. During World War II, it was gutted in an air raid on the night of 3 October 1943.

The 3rd and present Theatre (1963) recreates Karl von Fischer's original neo-Classical design, though on a slightly larger, 2,100 seat scale. The magnificent Royal box is the center of the 2,100 seater indoor rondel. It is decorated with 2 large caryatids on both sides. The new stage covers 2,500 square metres (3,000 square yards) , and the Theatre thus has the world's 3rd largest Opera stage, after the Opéra Bastille in Paris and the Grand Theatre, Warsaw. Through the consistent use of wood as a building material, the auditorium has excellent acoustics. Architect Gerhard Moritz Graubner closely preserved the original look of the foyer and main staircase. It opened on 22 November 1963 with a performance of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

During its early years, the National Theatre saw the premieres of a significant number of Operas, including many by German composers. These included Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » (1865) , « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » (1868) , « Das Rheingold » (1869) and « Die Walküre » (1870) , after which Wagner chose to build the « Festspielhaus » in Bayreuth and held further premieres of his works there.

During the latter part of the 19th Century, it was Richard Strauß who would make his mark on the Theatre in the city in which he was born in 1864. After accepting the position of conductor for a short time, Strauß returned to the Theatre to become principal conductor, from 1894 to 1898. In the pre-War period, his « Friedenstag » (1938) and « Capriccio » were premiered in Munich.

In the post-War period, the House has seen significant productions and many world premieres.

The following list refers only to those premières of the Bavarian State Opera staged in the National Theatre. The Bavarian State Opera had additional premieres also in other Theatres. Also, the Bavarian State Ballet had premieres in the National Theatre.

7 October 1849 : « Benvenuto Cellini » by Franz Lachner, Henri-Auguste Barbier and Léon de Wailly.

10 June 1865 : « Tristan und Isolde » by Richard Wagner.

21 June 1868 : « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » by Richard Wagner.

22 September 1869 : « Das Rheingold » by Richard Wagner.

26 June 1870 : « Die Walküre » by Richard Wagner.

29 June 1888 : « Die Feen » by Richard Wagner.

23 January 1897 : « Königskinder » (Melodrama edition) by Engelbert Humperdinck and Elsa Bernstein.

10 October 1897 : « Sarema » by Alexander von Zemlinsky, Adolf von Zemlinsky and Arnold Schönberg.

22 January 1899 : « Der Bärenhäuter » by Siegfried Wagner.

19 March 1906 : « I quattro rusteghi » (« Die vier Grobiane ») by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari and Giuseppe Pizzoloto (German by Hermann Teibler) .

11 December 1906 : « Das Christelflein » by Hans Pfitzner and Ilse von Stach.

4 December 1909 : « Il segreto di Susanna » (« Susannens Geheimnis ») by Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari and Enrico Golisciani (German by Max Kalbeck) .

28 March 1916 : « Der Ring des Polykrates » by Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Leo Feld and Julius Korngold and ; « Violanta » by Erich Wolfgang Korngold and Hans Müller-Einigen.

30 November 1920 : « Die Vögel » by Walter Braunfels (freely adapted from Aristophanes) .

15 November 1924 : « Don Gil von den grünen Hosen » by Walter Braunfels (by Tirso de Molina) .

12 November 1931 : « Das Herz » by Hans Pfitzner and Hans Mahner-Mons.

24 July 1938 : « Friedenstag » by Richard Strauß, Joseph Gregor and Stefan Zweig.

5 February 1939 : « Der Mond » by Carl Orff.

28 October 1942 : Opera « Capriccio » by Richard Strauß and Clemens Krauss.

27 November 1963 : « Die Verlobung in San Domingo » by Werner Egk (by Heinrich von Kleist) .

1 August 1972 : « Sim Tjong » by Yun I-sang and Harald Kunz.

9 July 1978 : « Lear » by Aribert Reimann and Claus H. Henneberg.

10 May 1981 : « Lou Salomé » by Giuseppe Sinopoli and Karl Dietrich Gräwe.

22 July 1985 : « Le Roi Bérenger » (« König Bérenger I ») by Heinrich Sutermeister (by Eugène Ionesco) .

8 November 1985 : « Night » by Lorenzo Ferrero and Peter Wehran (after Novalis) .

25 January 1986 : « Belshazar » by Volker David Kirchner and Harald Weirich.

7 July 1986 : « Troades » by Aribert Reimann and Gerd Albrecht (by Euripides and Franz Werfel) .

6 July 1991 : « Ubu Rex » by Krzysztof Penderecki (by Alfred Jarry) .

1 July 1996 : « Schlachhof 5 » by Hans-Jürgen von Bose (by Kurt Vonnegut) .

24 May 1998 : « Was ihr wollt » by Manfred Trojahn and Claus H. Henneberg.

30 October 2000 : « Bernarda Albas » Haus by Aribert Reimann (by Federico García Lorca) .

27 October 2006 : « Das Gehege » by Wolfgang Rihm and Botho Strauß.

30 June 2007 : « Alice in Wonderland » by Unsuk Chin and David Henry Hwang.

...

10 mars 1885 : Peu de temps après le succès retentissant de la 7^e de Bruckner à Leipzig, sous la direction d'Arthur Nikisch, le chef d'orchestre israélite Hermann Levi la programmera à son tour à Munich, en présence du compositeur. Le programme assez copieux aurait pu avoir un effet dissuasif au moment de l'exécution de la nouvelle Symphonie.

Grâce à ce concert, la ville de Munich deviendra le carrefour du « culte » brucknérien en Allemagne.

I. Ouverture du compositeur français Étienne-Nicolas Méhul.

II. L'un des (29) Concertos pour violon du compositeur italien Giovanni Battista Viotti.

III. Lieder de Robert Schumann.

IV. Solos de violon.

V. 7^e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner.

Le succès s'avérera plus grand qu'à Leipzig ; ce qui est en soi fort remarquable. Bruckner est appelé sur scène, après chaque mouvement, par des applaudissements nourris. L'œuvre est chaleureusement reçue par la presse munichoises.

À Vienne, le critique Theodor Helm se porte à la défense de Bruckner. Dans le « Deutsche Zeitung » , il accuse Hans Richter et le Philharmonique de négliger ses œuvres et de les qualifier injustement d'atonales.

Lors de la réception d'après concert, Hermann Levi portera un « toast » à Anton Bruckner en affirmant que « cette Symphonie est l'œuvre la plus importante depuis la mort de Beethoven » .

Levi deviendra l'un des plus grands admirateurs de Bruckner. Il s'avérera un promoteur des plus efficaces, déployant des efforts considérables pour amasser les fonds nécessaires à la publication de quelques-unes de ces œuvres. (Levi a lui-même avancé une forte somme d'argent.)

Bruckner le surnommera, à juste titre, mon « noble bienfaiteur » (« Edelsten Gönner ») .

En 1886, les efforts du chef ont permis la publication chez Albert J. Gutmann de la 4e Symphonie dite « Romantique » . C'est lui qui a recueilli les fonds pour payer les honoraires.

Grâce à ses nombreux contacts à la Cour de Bavière, il a aussi aidé le Maître de Saint-Florian de manière indirecte. Son intervention auprès de riches admirateurs munichois a permis de régler le montant exigé par l'éditeur Gutmann pour la 1re publication de la 7e.

11 mars 1885 : L'indulgence de Levi envers Bruckner le force à remplacer l'Opéra prévu au « Hoftheater » , « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » de Viktor Nessler, par la bien-aimée « Walküre » . Suite à la représentation, Bruckner pleure amèrement alors que le public est déjà parti :

« Je ne peux pas décrire la scène à l'intérieur de ce sombre Théâtre royal. » , écrira-il à un ami.

Bruckner demande alors à Levi d'interpréter l'Adagio de sa 7e Symphonie en hommage à Richard Wagner. Levi honore son hôte. Il ordonne à la section des cuivres d'interpréter, par 3 fois, la « Trauermusik » de la Coda.

La représentation sera suivie d'une petite fête donnée en l'honneur de Bruckner.

12 mars 1885 : Le chef Hermann Levi organise un concert privé de musique de chambre chez le Docteur Konrad Fiedler (1841-1895) , célèbre critique d'art et auteur de Munich. Le Quatuor à cordes Benno Walter (composé de : Benno Walter, Johann Ziegler, Anton Thoms et Johann Wihan) accompagné de l'altiste Heinrich Seifert (1873 - 25 mars 1931) joue le Quintette à cordes en fa majeur de Bruckner (WAB 112) . (Le compositeur a fait la connaissance de Fiedler durant ce même mois.)

Hermann Levi va épouser en 1895 Mary Fiedler, « née » Meyer (1854-1919) , la fille de l'historien d'art Julius Meyer et la veuve de l'historien d'art Konrad Fiedler (1841-1895) .

12 mars 1885 : Music review of the 7th Symphony from the Munich « Neueste Nachrichten » ...

« This is finally a composer who is not struggling to raise small and flimsy themes by way of careful calculation to something great, but those original feelings are “ truly great ” to begin with. »

13 mars 1885 : Music review of the 7th Symphony by Doctor Paul Marsop, for the « Berliner Tageblatt » ...

« The 1st 3 movements are highly-meaningful, the themes of the Adagio are full of touching beauty, and the structure is imposing. A trait of greatness pervades the whole. »

15 mars 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Arthur Nikisch (Leipzig) .

« Dearest Friend ! Noble Benefactor !

I have just returned from Munich where, on the 10th of the month, there was an extremely magnificent performance of my 7th Symphony. The audience received it very “ enthusiastically ” ; the conductor and the Orchestra also applauded vigorously. 2 laurel wreaths. Next performance, in the autumn. The reviews very good. Also, especially splendid : “ Neueste Nachrichten ”, “ Sddeutsche Presse ”, and such.

At a large reception for musicians, “ Herr ” Levi declared :

“ This is the most significant Symphonic work since Beethoven’s death. ”

He added that the performance of this work is going to be the pride and high-point of his artistic career. And the banquets ! The king will also be informed. The Intendant' likewise sent for me. My portrait was painted by Kaulbach and I was photographed “ twice ”.

Upon your request, “ Herr ” Levi will send you the 4th Symphony.

Please, give my compliments to my benefactors, especially to the Director and “ Herr ” Vogel, and hand-kisses for the ladies. I “ kiss you a thousand times ”, as the source of all good for me ! And thank you, thank you in all eternity ! Herewith, I send only the review from the “ Neueste Nachrichten ” ; when you have read it, I ask you most graciously to pass it on to “ Herr ” Vogel with my most sincere request about publication - if, at all, feasible. Perhaps, this will make a good impression on the publishers ! After the performance of “ Die Walküre ”, “ Herr ” Levi had the funeral music from the “ Adagio ” of my (7th) Symphony played, for me 3 times, by the tubas and horns. You will get a chuckle-out of this.

How are you ? So, write back to me. I kiss the hand of your dear “ fiancée ”.

Filled with gratitude and respect and admiration for you, most noble benefactor, I am and remain

Your most thankful

Anton Bruckner

N.B. : To “ Herr ” von Vogel, my respect and thanks for his kindness in the press. »

Incipit : « Sæben komme ich retour von München, ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 151 ; pages 179-180.

Manfred Wagner. « Bruckner » , page 283.

This performance of the 7th Symphony took place at an evening festivity of what lay Americans would call a composers' convention ; it would be an event which all of those gathered in Munich would expect to attend.

Baron Karl von Perfall (1824-1907) : German administrator and composer. He championed Richard Wagner's music and was instrumental in saving Bayreuth, under king Ludwig II. He advanced to General Intendant of the National Theater and made many improvements, both in the theater itself and in the quality of its productions. In the 1850's, he directed the Munich « Liedertafel » and, here, he summons Bruckner in order to arrange for him to sit for his portrait.

Hermann von Kaulbach (1846-1909) : German painter who did the 1885 portrait of Bruckner.

Director Max Stægemann (1843-1905) : Originally, a singer. Ultimately, he became director of the Leipzig « Neue Theater » , in 1882. The post became vacant only through his death.

Adolf Bernhard Vogel (1847-1897) : Music-critic for the « Leipziger Nachrichten » .

Bruckner was always searching for publishers for his compositions. His 8th Symphony was published in this same year (1885) .

18 mars 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au Baron Hans von Wolzogen (Bayreuth) .

« “ Herr ” Levi proposed a toast during the artist's get-together (after the performance) : “ To the most important Symphonic work since Beethoven's death ! ” And he went on to say that the performance of this magnificent work (his own words) was the crown of his artistic achievement !

(11th March - a performance of “ Die Walküre ”) After the audience had left, “ Herr ” Levi agreed to my request that the tubas and horns play the funeral song from the 2nd movement of the 7th Symphony 3 times, in memory of our blessed and much-loved immortal Master. Countless tears were shed. I cannot begin to describe the scene in the darkened Court Theatre. »

18 mars 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au Baron Hans von Wolzogen (Bayreuth) .

« Right Honourable Baron !

Please, permit me to tell you something of the happiest week of my life, due to the glorious events in Munich. The performance took place on the 10th of this month. I was at the last 2 rehearsals. In the beginning, the Orchestra was hostile, but, then, enthusiastic for me. The performance was ideal and excellent beyond all measure.

The reaction was, as they say, indescribable jubilation and enthusiasm ; even the conductor and the Orchestra applauded most vigorously. No one could remember such a scene in the “ Odeon ”. At the reception for the musicians, “ Herr ” Levi toasted me :

“ To the most important ' Symphonic ' work since Beethoven's death ! ”

And he continued :

“ The performance of this splendid work ” (as he called it) “ is the crown of his artistic activity ! ” (as far as concert life is concerned, of course) . 2 magnificent laurel wreaths !

What a disparity on the part of “ Herr ” Richter who is said, 2 weeks ago, to have declared me a crazy person “ without form ” ; and, then, as these witnesses maintain, he declared the Brahms 3rd Symphony (which is said to have failed, again, on Sunday) to be the new “ Eroica ” (naturally, Hanslick liked it) . My Symphony (No. 7) remains in Munich. “ Herr ” Levi is not allowing them to ruin me, in Vienna. He wants to take care of the publication. He and the Intendant want to refer the matter to the King and the Symphony is to be performed, again, in November. On the 11th of the month, my friends from Vienna and I attended a performance of “ Die Walküre ”, in Munich. Magnificent, as I had not heard this wondrous work in its entirety, since 1876. And, after the audience had left, “ Herr ” Levi, upon my request, had the “ Trauergesang ” from the 2nd movement of the 7th Symphony performed 3 times, by the tubas and horns, in remembrance of the late, highly-beloved, immortal “ Meister ” Wagner, whereupon innumerable tears flowed. I cannot describe the event in the darkened “ Hoftheater ”. “ Requiescat in pace !!! ” The reviews are all glorious ; many say “ marvelous ”. The finest was in the “ Neueste Nachrichten ” (through “ Herr ” Forges, as I hear) and the “ Süddeutsche Presse ”. Thank God, I now have Munich ; in it, I have enough success to last me the rest of my life. I permit myself to send you only one review ; it is from the “ Neueste Nachrichten ”.

In veneration, I kiss the gracious hand of the Baroness. Right Honourable Baron, I beg for your further favour and affection. I have your article to thank for the performance in Holland (The Hague) , as well as innumerable others !
Endless thanks !

With deepest respect, I remain

Your most thankful servant,

Anton Bruckner

P.S. : In Holland, they want all of my Symphonies. »

Incipit : « Gestatten mir Hochderselbe Ihnen ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 152 ; pages 180-182.

Franz Gräflinger, lettre n° 135 ; page 144 (fragment) .

Baron Hans Paul von Wolzogen (1848-1938) : German writer on music, as well as a librettist. He was a great Wagner and Bruckner enthusiast and a true friend to Bruckner. Von Wolzogen edited much Wagner literature, including 3 volumes of letters. He later revised E. T. A. Hoffman's « Ündine » .

Bruckner's 7th Symphony had just been a great success in Munich.

If Bruckner is quoting Hermann Levi word for word, then « his » should really read « my » . Evidence found in a letter to Arthur Nikisch and dated March 15, 1885, would confirm this conclusion.

Hans Richter (1843-1916) : Austro-Hungarian conductor of international acclaim. He was one of the 1st great international conductors and one of the 1st to appreciate Bruckner's work. He conducted 1st performances of Symphonies No. 1 (the « Vienna » version) ; No. 3 (the 1889 Version) ; No. 4, and No. 8. The comment above reflects Bruckner's emotional insecurity, not Richter's intrinsic feelings toward his music.

Doctor Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904) : Viennese music-critic, scholar, and civil servant ; sometimes referred to as a philologist. At 1st, he was enthusiastic for Bruckner but, later, hostile and cruelly critical of him and his works. In Wagner's « Die Meistersinger » , the character of Beckmesser is named « Veit Hanslick » , in a draft of the music-drama. It did little good to change the name because everyone recognized the restrictive attitude as portrayed in Beckmesser. Hanslick, of course, was in the Brahms camp ; and he caused self-critical Bruckner much grief.

King Ludwig II of Bavaria (1845-1886) reigned from 1864 until his mysterious death, in 1886. He was very much affected by Richard Wagner's music dramas, so much so that he built « Schloß Neuschwanstein » with these works in mind. This castle, though never completely finished, abounds in rich carvings and wall paintings of scenes from the music-dramas. A good example is the bedroom where the wall paintings (by August Spiess) and, also, the carvings depict scenes from « Tristan » , the King's favourite music-drama.

« Die Walküre » of Richard Wagner (1813-1883) : Bruckner always called him « The Master » , and grieved soulfully at his death. Having dedicated his Symphony No. 3 to Wagner, early on, he wrote the Adagio to his Symphony No. 7 as a lasting memorial to Wagner.

Heinrich Forges (1837-1900) : Conductor, writer on music, and music-critic for the Munich « Neueste Nachrichten » .

Heinrich Porges

The Bohemian-Austrian composer, conductor, Choir-Master, journalist, music-critic, and writer on music (of Jewish descent) Heinrich Porges was born on 25 November 1837 in Prague ; and died during a rehearsal of Franz Liszt's Oratorio, « Christus » , on 17 November 1900, in Munich. His grave is situated at the « Ostfriedhof » Cemetery (left-wall : No. 94) .

Possibly, a illegitimate son of Franz Liszt ; officially, the son of Simon Porges (1801-1869) and his wife, Charlotte. He originally studied Philosophy and Law in Prague, later turning to music. He was a pupil of Celestin Müller (piano) , Walter Morse Rummel (harmony) and Zwonar (theory and counterpoint) .

In 1863, Porges moved to Leipzig where he became a co-writer (assistant) for the « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (New Musical Review) . There, Doctor Franz Brendel introduced him to Wagner's circle of friends. He was in close intercourse with Peter Cornelius and became a devotee disciple and intimate of the Master. He zealously worked to bring him recognition and defend his principles. His extensive notes on Wagner's rehearsal and staging (« Die Bühnenproben zu den Bayreuther Festspielen des Jahres 1876 ») were published in the journal « Bayreuther Blätter » , over the period 1880-1896. He took a very active part in the preparation of the Bayreuth Festival.

He lived for a time in Vienna and, in 1867, was called to Munich by King Ludwig II of Bavaria (who gave him a life pension) . He wrote for the King a study of « Tristan und Isolde » which was published after his death, in 1906, by Baron Hans von Wolzogen.

Porges was a Lieder composer. In addition to articles for musical newspapers, he wrote numerous essays in German periodicals :

« Über die Aufführung der 9. Sinfonie unter Richard Wagner in Bayreuth » (1872) .

« Das Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth, Eine Studie über Wagners Ring der Nibelungen » (1877) .

In 1871, Porges became literary editor of the Munich « Süddeutschen Presse » and, from 1880, music-critic for the Munich « Neueste Nachrichten » . He was also, for a short period of time, a music teacher at the Royal School of Music, then, named Director of the institution. In 1886, he formed the « Porgesschen Gesangverein » (Porges Choir Society) which he used to make an intense propaganda for the « New School » represented by his favoured composers : Hector Berlioz, Franz Liszt, Peter Cornelius and Anton Bruckner ; but he also directed Bach and Palestrina's works as well.

Recollections and letters were published by R. Balka, in his book : « Kranz » (1903) .

Porges married Wilhelmine Merores ; the writer Elsa Porges-Bernstein was their daughter. She is the author of « KönigsKinder » with music by Engelbert Humperdinck. Elsa's daughter, the violin player Eva Bernstein, married a son of Gerhard Hauptmann.

A street in Munich bears his name : « Porgersstraße » .

Wagner Rehearsing the « Ring »

An eye-witness account of the stage rehearsals of the 1st Bayreuth Festival (translation by R. L. Jacobs) , Cambridge University Press (1983) ; ISBN : 052123722X .

« The stage rehearsals of the “ Ring ” brought home the imperative need to moderate dynamic expression-marks, convert fortissimos into fortes, fortes into mezzo fortes etc ... , in order to ensure that the singers’ words and inflections make their proper impact. We must never be allowed to forget that we are attending a dramatic performance which seeks to imitate reality ; we are not listening to a purely Symphonic work. From which it follows that Symphonic passages during which words are being sung should never become excessively loud. This was a recurring problem during the rehearsals. Wagner declared that the Orchestra should support the singer as the sea does a boat, rocking but never upsetting or swamping - he employed that image over and over again. » (Heinrich Porges)

This book presents Wagner's view of how the « Ring » should be performed.

He requested Heinrich Porges, a member of his circle and an able writer as well as an accomplished musician, to « follow all my rehearsals very closely and note down everything I say, even the smallest details, about the interpretation and performance, so that a tradition goes down in writing » . In the opinion of the eminent Wagner scholar, Curt von Westernhagen (expressed in his recent biography) , Porges's conscientious record shows « amazing insight and perception » since what distinguishes it is his « ability always to locate the endless detail of Wagner's instructions in an overall intellectual context » . The book is, therefore, required reading not only for conductors, producers, instrumentalists and singers but also for musicologists and critics. In addition, it is a fascinating read for anyone who knows and loves the « Ring » since it takes the form of a blow-by-blow commentary on the stage action as it unfolds. The writing has vitality and flow and one is caught-up in the spirit of the thing, as Wagner felt it. It provides a re-experience of the « Ring » through his eyes.

The « Bühnenproben » was originally published in the monthly « Bayreuther Blätter » in instalments that were not completed until 1896, when the « Ring » was 1st given again at Bayreuth ; its publication in book form was equally protracted. Its translation now is a sign of the times. Wagner in his black moods longed for an « invisible theatre » . He did not foresee the electronic revolution that has enabled countless people to sit comfortably at home, hi-fi equipment at their elbow, vocal score on their lap, revelling in his fusion of music and poetry and (guided by his stage directions) envisaging his « invisible theatre » in their minds.

Letters from Franz Liszt to Heinrich Porges, in Prague

Heinrich Porges was, then, Royal music-director and conductor of a « Gesang-verein » (Choral Society) in Munich, where he has lived since 1867.

...

« Dear Sir and Friend,

Owing to your affectionate understanding of what I have striven after in the “ Dante Symphony ” and the “ Ideale ”, you have a special right to both works. Allow me to offer them to you as a token of my sincere attachment, as also of the grateful remembrance which I keep of the Prague performance. (At Porges' initiative, the medical students had invited Franz Liszt, in 1858, to a concert, at which his “ Dante Symphony ” and the “ Ideale ” were given. In 1859, Hans von Bülow was also invited at Porges' inducement.) Taking your kindness for granted, I beg you to give the other 2 copies to “ Herr ” Professor Mildner and “ Herr ” Doctor Ambros with my best thanks.

It is to be hoped that this year's “ Medical ” Concert will have favourable results. My valiant son-in-law, Hans von Bülow, cannot fail to be recognized among you as an eminent musician and noble character. I thank you and “ Herr ” Musil (to whom I beg you to remember me most kindly) for offering Bülow this opportunity of doing something in Prague. There is no doubt that he will fulfill all your expectations.

For the next “ Medical ” Concert, I willingly place myself at your disposal. Possibly, we might, on this occasion venture on the Symphonic Poem No. I, “ Ce qu'on entered sur la Montagne ” (the chorus “ An die Künstler ”, and the “ Faust Symphony ” ?) . The respected medical men would, thus, take the initiative in the new musical pathology !

For the “ Tonkünstler-Versammlung ”, etc. (Meeting of Musicians) , in Leipzig at the beginning of June, Doctor Brendel is expecting you, and I rejoice at the thought of meeting you again, there. If the affair is not too much hampered in its natural course by local miseries and malevolence, it may do much for the bettering of our suffering musical position. In any case, we will not fail in doing our part towards it.

With highest esteem, yours most truly,

Franz Liszt

Weimar, March 10th, 1859. »

...

« Dear Friend,

Your letter for the 22nd October gave me heartfelt pleasure, and you need not be in doubt as to the correctness of the affectionate and deep perception of my endeavour, which “ has proceeded both from man's need of freedom as well as of love ”, and which, by and with the grace of God, has been impelled to raise itself toward the “ Divine ”. I cannot say much on this subject ; but may my works only remain no dumb witnesses, and may your intimate understanding of them give you some satisfaction.

I send you, herewith, Dingelstedt's “ Festal Song ” for the Schiller Celebration, which I have purposely composed in a very simple, national manner. Perhaps, there might be an opportunity of bringing the thing to a hearing during the Schiller Festival, in Prague. Will you ask Apt whether he would be disposed to do it ? The studying of it would not give the least trouble. It requires only a baritone or bass for the solo part, and an ordinary chorus of men's voices without any accompaniment.

Leaving it entirely in your hands to act about it as you may think best, and either to promote the performance or to let it alone, I remain, with best thanks and high esteem,

Yours very truly,

Franz Liszt

October 30th, 1859.

My composition to Halm's Festival play has been sent through “ Herr ” von Dingelstedt to “ Herr ” Thome, and will probably be performed on the 9th or 10th November. (The Festival play was given in Prague under the Theater conductor Thome. The music to it was never published. The Weimar archives probably possess the score.) Write and tell me how the matter is settled. »

...

Dear Sir,

In conveying my sincere thanks for your careful endeavours for the musical transcription of “ Faust ”, I would like to ask you one more favor :

I would like to modify the arrangement of the portion of the tenor voice solo : “ the Eternal Femininity ”, both times as marked on the attached musical sheet. This way, it is more singable and feminine, if I am not mistaken.

Please receive, dear Sir, the assurance of my deep appreciation,

Very sincerely,

Franz Liszt

July 18, 1861, Weimar.

P.S. : The “ Faust ” Symphony is supposed to be presented here, August 6. Perhaps, you will be able to attend this concert and let me have the pleasure of your visit. »

...

« Dear Porges !

You absolutely will have to do something so that the highly-commendable works of Rubinstein will not be ignored. I would appreciate some good articles, as you, no doubt, can work out for the musical papers to which we have access, amongst which we also can consider the “ Bösendorfer Blatt ”, in Vienna.

Best wishes for the New Year,

Yours sincerely,

Richard Wagner

January 9, 1876. »

...

Heinrich Porges, Chordirigent, Musikschriftsteller : geboren 25. November 1837, in Prag ; gestorben 17. November 1900, in München.

Heinrich Porges wurde als das Kind einer wohlhabenden jüdischen Familie in Prag geboren. Zeit seines Lebens hielt sich das Gerücht, daß er ein illegitimer Sohn von Franz Liszt wäre ; dies konnte jedoch nie eindeutig bestätigt oder widerlegt werden.

Porges studierte Jura und Philosophie in Prag, privat betrieb er musikalische Studien und hoffte auf eine Laufbahn als Pianist. Als junger Mann ließ er sich protestantisch taufen. Seit 1859 war er als Korrespondent der in Leipzig erscheinenden « Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik » tätig. Er lud Richard Wagner 1863 zu einem von ihm organisierten Konzert in Prag ein. Gespielt wurden ausschließlich Kompositionen Wagners, Porges übernahm sämtliche Kosten der Veranstaltung. Für weitere Konzerte überwies er Wagner, der zu dieser Zeit in Penzing bei Wien lebte, Vorschüsse und linderte damit dessen finanzielle Sorgen. 1864 wurde Porges Redakteur der « Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik » und übersiedelte im selben Jahr nach Wien, wo er mit Peter Cornelius und Karl Tausig zum engsten Freundeskreis um Wagner gehörte. Nach der Flucht Wagners vor seinen Gläubigern aus Wien versuchte Porges, die umfangreichen Verbindlichkeiten Wagners zu regeln. Am 28. Mai 1864 schrieb ihm Wagner, dessen Lage sich durch die Verbindung zu

Ludwig II. schlagartig verbessert hatte, und bot ihm eine Stelle in München an :

« Mein junger König will, daß ich Alles habe, was ich brauche. Ich brauche einen Sekretär, und zwar Einen, wie eben ich ihn brauche. Er muß mir meine geschäftliche Correspondenz abnehmen, meine Manuskripte in Ordnung halten, literarische wie musikalische Reinschriften, Einrichtungen meiner Partituren und so weiter machen können - kurz, er muß ein ganzer Kerl sein. Wollen Sie sich damit befassen ? »

Porges lehnt dieses Angebot jedoch zunächst ab. Als er schließlich 1865 nach München umzog, war die Position des « Sekretärs » bereits von Cosima von Bülow eingenommen worden. Für Wagner war Porges in München als Kopist tätig und er erstellte die Abschrift der « Walküre », die Wagner Ludwig II. schenkte. Zudem verfasste er für Ludwig II. einführende Texte zu « Tristan und Isolde », « Die Meistersinger » und « Lohengrin ». Nach der Abreise Wagners nach Tribschen blieb Porges in München zurück, wo er als Redakteur der « Süddeutschen Presse » für Wagner Öffentlichkeitsarbeit leisten sollte ; doch wurde er nach dem Eklat, den Wagners Artikel-Reihe « Von Deutscher Kunst und Deutscher Politik » in der « Süddeutschen Presse » ausgelöst hatte, wieder entlassen. Er war für kurze Zeit als Klavierlehrer an der neugegründeten Musikschule tätig, bis ihn Ludwig II. , der ihn außerordentlich schätzte, 1870 den Titel eines Musikdirektors « extra statum » und eine lebenslange Pension verlieh. Als Wagner anlässlich der Grundsteinlegung des Bayreuther Festspielhauses im Jahr 1872 Beethovens 9. Sinfonie dirigierte, veröffentlichte Porges eine eingehende Darstellung dieses Ereignisses. Gegenüber Cosima äußerte er zu dieser Zeit :

« Ich kann es nie vergessen, wenn sich einer so gut benommen hat, er hat damals in Prag das Konzert mir schön eingerichtet, und in Wien in üblen Zeiten war er der einzige, an den ich mich wenden konnte, da hat einer einen Stein im Brett bei mir, worauf er lang sündigen kann. »

Während der Proben für die Uraufführung des « Ring des Nibelungen » 1876 in Bayreuth protokollierte Porges die Regieanweisungen Wagners und publizierte diese als Dokumentation. Die gleiche Arbeit leistete Porges für die Uraufführung des « Parsifal » 1882. Später übernahm Porges in München die Leitung eines eigenen Chors und er unterstützte die Münchener Aufführungen der Opern Wagners als Solokorrepetitor und Chordirigent. Er starb während einer Probe zu Franz Liszts « Christus » und wurde in einem Ehrengrab in München bestattet.

Es bleibt unklar, ob Wagner und Cosima Kenntnis von der vermeintlichen Verwandtschaftsbeziehung zu Liszt besaßen. Auffällig ist, daß Cosima, trotz der Wertschätzung Wagners, sich wiederholt in besonders herablassender Weise über Porges geäußert hat. So schrieb sie am 1. März 1870 an Nietzsche :

« Wir haben nämlich den unerwarteten Besuch Heinrich Porges bekommen, ein ausgezeichnet guter Mensch und unbedingt der edelste Jude den ich habe kennen gelernt. Seine Überzeugung ist felsenfest und seine Geistesgaben sind durchaus ideal wie seine Stirn und sein Auge bezeugen, allein auch von ihm den ich wirklich lieb habe und ganz besonders schätze, muß ich mir sagen : er ist kein Deutscher. »

Die Tochter von Heinrich Porges, Elsa Bernstein, wurde unter ihrem Pseudonym Ernst Rosmer eine erfolgreiche Bühnenautorin und Schriftstellerin. Engelbert Humperdinck vertonte ihr Märchenspiel « Königskinder ». Als Elsa

Bernstein im NS-Staat wegen ihrer jüdischen Abstammung zunehmend in Bedrängnis geriet, wandte sie sich mit der Bitte um Hilfe an Winifred Wagner, die sich für sie erfolglos im Reichsjustizministerium einsetzte. 1942 wurde Elsa Bernstein zusammen mit ihrer Schwester Gabriele in das KZ Theresienstadt deportiert, wo Gabriele nach kurzer Zeit verstarb. Elsa Bernstein wurde in Theresienstadt im « Prominentenblock » untergebracht, die jüdische Selbstverwaltung des KZ bezeichnete sie als Enkelin von Liszt. Nach ihrer Befreiung lebte sie bis zu ihrem Tod 1949 bei ihrer Tochter in Hamburg. Elsa Bernstein wurde im Grab ihres Vaters in München beerdigt.

...

Heinrich Porges, Dirigent, Chorleiter und Musikschriftsteller (jüdisch, später evangelisch) : geboren 25.11.1837 Prag ; gestorben 17.11.1900 München / Deutschland. Begraben München, Ehrengrab Ostfriedhof.

Studierte Jus und Philosophie, dann Musik in Prag, arbeitete (laut Hugo Riemann) ab 1863 in Leipzig als Mitredakteur für die von Franz Brendel herausgegebene Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. In Wien verkehrte er im Freundeskreis Richard Wagners. 1867 wurde er auf dessen Wunsch als Klavierlehrer an die Musik-Schule nach München berufen, daneben wirkte er als Redakteur der Süddeutschen Presse. 1871 wurde Porges zum königlichen Musikdirektor ernannt, 1876 war er Wagners Assistent bei den Vorbereitungen zu den ersten Bayreuther Festspielen, 1882-1897 Solorepetitor und Chorleiter. 1880 wurde er Musikreferent der Münchener Neuesten Nachrichten, unterrichtete eine Zeitlang Klavier an der königlichen Musik-Schule und gründete 1886 den Porgesschen Gesangverein. Von Ludwig II. mit einer lebenslänglichen Pension ausgestattet, setzte er sich neben dem Schaffen Wagners auch für die Verbreitung der Werke von Franz Liszt und Hector Berlioz ein.

Grabe : Porgersstraße (München) .

...

Aus begüterter Familie stammend, studierte Porges zunächst Philosophie und Rechtswissenschaften an der Universität Prag, daneben Klavier, Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt, mit dem Ziel, Pianist zu werden. 1858 lud er Liszt, 1863 Wagner zu von ihm mitorganisierten Konzerten nach Prag ein und wurde einer ihrer eifrigsten Anhänger. 1859 wurde er Prager Korrespondent der Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik und 1863 deren Mitredakteur. Im selben Jahr ging er als Musiklehrer nach Wien. Von Wagner aufgefordert, übersiedelte Porges 1866 auf Dauer nach München, wo er für König Ludwig II. Einführungen zu « Tristan » , « Die Meistersinger » und « Lohengrin » verfaßte. 1867 arbeitete er drei Monate als Redakteur der Süddeutschen Presse, bis Wagner seine Artikelserie « Deutsche Kunst und Politik » abbrach. 1868-1869 war er für ein Jahr als Klavierlehrer an der neueröffneten Musikschule angestellt. 1870 verlieh ihm König Ludwig II. den Titel eines Musikdirektors extra statum, doch mangels Dirigiererfahrung blieb es bei nur zwei Dirigaten in der Hofoper. Als « Der Ring des Nibelungen » 1876 in Bayreuth uraufgeführt wurde, war Porges einer der Assistenten Wagners und hielt dessen Äußerungen zu Werk und Wiedergabe detailliert fest. Auch zu « Parsifal » sind entsprechende Aufzeichnungen in einem Klavierauszug erhalten. 1882-1897 war Porges als Solorepetitor und Chorleiter bei den Bayreuther Wagner-Aufführungen tätig, gleichzeitig arbeitete er bis 1900 als Konzertkritiker der Münchener Neuesten Nachrichten. 1885 gründete er in München den Porges'schen Chorverein (ohne Vereinsstatus) , mit dem er, auch unter Einsatz eigener finanzieller Mittel, vor allem die großen Werke von Berlioz und Liszt in München bekannt machte. Porges war einer der treuesten jüdischen Mitstreiter Wagners und wurde von diesem, auch seiner Schriften wegen, hoch geschätzt.

...

Heinrich Porges, Dirigent und Musikschriftsteller. Vater der Schriftstellerin Elsa Bernstein-Porges ; studium zunächst Jus und Philosophie, wandte sich dann der Musik zu und wurde von Celestin Müller (Klavier) , Walter Morse Rummel (Harmonielehre) und Zwonar (Kontrapunkt) ausgebildet. Ab 1863 red. er in Leipzig mit Brendel die « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » und fand als begeisterter Liszt-Anhänger im Wagnerschen Freundeskreis in Wien Aufnahme. 1867 berief ihn König Ludwig II. auf Vorschlag Wagners nach München, wo Porges an der von Bülow geleiteten Musikschule Klavier unterrichtete und gleichzeitig Redakteur der « Süddeutschen Presse » war. 1871 wurde er Musikdirektor, 1880 übernahm er die Musikberichterstattung der « Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten » . 1886 gründete er in München den Porgesschen Gesangverein, mit dem er Werke von Palestrina, Bach, Berlioz, Liszt, Cornelius und Bruckner aufführte. Ludwig II. setzte ihm eine lebenslängliche Pension aus, welche ihn aller materiellen Sorgen entthob. Porges, einer der frühesten und unermüdlichsten Anhänger Wagners, setzte sich Zeit seines Lebens auch nachdrücklich für die Verbreitung der Werke von Liszt und Berlioz in Deutschland ein. Seine enge Beziehung zu Bayreuth dokumentierte er in zahlreichen Schriften.

Genealogie

Vater nomen nominandum ; Mutter nomen nominandum ; verheiratet 1865 Wilhelmine Merores (geboren 1842) , aus Porges ; Brüder Friedrich (nach 1837 - vor 1874, verheiratet Ottilie Hirschl, 1850-1926, in 2. Ehe verheiratet mit der Bildhauer Heinrich Natter, 1844-1892, siehe NDB, Band 18) , Arzt in Wien ; Schwester Mathilde Stern-Porges ; 2 Tochter : Elsa (Pseudonym : Ernst Rosmer) (1866-1949, Max Bernstein, 1854-1925, RA in Merores, Schriftsteller, siehe NDB, Band II) , Schauspiel, Schriftsteller, und andere Autorin der Märchendramas « Die Königskinder » , 1942-1945 im Ghetto Theresienstadt, Gabriele (1867-1942, Ghetto Theresienstadt) , beide führten ein Salon in Merores ; E : Eva Bernstein (1894-1986, verheiratet Klaus Hauptmann, Sohn der Schriftsteller Gerhart Hauptmann, 1862-1946, siehe NDB Band VIII) , Konzertgeigerin, Hans Heinrich Bernstein (1898-1980) , RA.

Werke

Sieben Lieder (um 1888) .

Chorlied « Über allen Gipfeln » (1892) .

Elegie für Klavier (1901) .

Schriften

Aufsätze in Fachzeitschrift besonders über Richard Wagner.

Die Aufführung von Beethovens 9. Sinfonie unter Richard Wagner in Bayreuth (1872) .

Das Bühnenfestspiel in Bayreuth, Eine Studie über Wagners Ring der Nibelungen (1876) ; 21877.

Die Bühnenproben zu den Bayreuther Festspielen des Jahres 1876, 1. Auflage (1877) ; 2. Auflage (1881) .

Unser Musikleben, in ; Bayreuther Blätter, Nummer 23 (1900) ; Seiten 308-320.

Tristan und Isolde, herausgeber von Hans von Wolzogen (1906) .

Richard Wagners Probe Bemerkungen zu Werk und Regie der Parsifal 1882 nach der Klavierauszügen von Heinrich Porges und Julius Kniese, in : Dokumente zur Entstehung und ersten Aufführung des Bühnenweihfestspiels Parsifal, herausgeber von Martin Geck und Egon Voß (1970) ; Seite 165 ff.

Literatur

Julius Ferdinand Georg Schuberth. Musikalisches Conversations-Lexikon, herausgeber von Emil Breslauer, 11. Auflage (1890) .

Neue Frei Presse (vom 18 November 1900) .

Heinrich Porges, in : Über Land und Meer (1901) ; Seite 555.

Richard Batka. Heinrich Porges, in : Deutsche Arbeit, Band 2 (1902-1903) ; Seite 376 ff.

Biographisches Jahrbuch, Band 5 (1903) .

Richard Batka. Kranz, in : Gesellschaft Blätter über Musik (1903) ; Seiten 159-183.

Briefe. Herausgeber von Richard Batka, in : Deutsche Arbeit, Band 9 (1909-1910) .

M. Stern-Porges. Erinnerungen an Franz Liszt, in : Der Merker, Band 2 (1910) ; Seiten 1070-1076.

Theodore Baker. Biographical Dictionary of Musicians, bearbeitet von Nicolas Slominsky, 5. Auflage (1958) .

Hugo Riemann (1961 und 1975) .

Richard Wagner. Mein Leben, Band 2, herausgeber von Martin Gregor-Delfin (1969) , siehe Regierung.

Dokumente zur Entstehung und ersten Aufführung des Bühnenweihfestspiels « Parsifal », herausgeber von Martin Geck und Egon Voß, in : Richard Wagner, Sämtliche Werke, Band 30 (1970) ; siehe Regierung.

Yvonne Gleibs. Juden im kulturellen und wissenschaftlichen Leben Münchens in der zweiten Hälfte der 19. Jahrhundert (1981) ; Seiten 160-168.

Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon (ÖBL) , Band 8 (1983) .

R. Münster, in : Geschichte und Kultur der Juden in Bayern, LI. (1988) ; Seiten 151 und 157-161.

Österreichisches Biographisches Lexikon (ÖBL) . Zu Elsa Porges-Bernstein : Ursula Wiedenmann, in : Geschichte und Kultur der Juden in Bayern, LI. (1988) ; Seiten 217-224.

Spemanns Goldenes Buch der Musik, Herausgeber von Karl Grunsky und andere (1990) .

Lexikon der Musik (2000) .

NDB, Band 20 (2001) .

New Grove Dictionary, Volume 19 (2001) .

DBEM, Band I (2003) .

Biographisches Lexikon Böhmen ; Seite 247.

Jüdisches Lexikon.

Jewish Encyclopedia.

Frank-Altmann.

Ignaz Jaksch.

Otto Soyka. Erg.Lfg, Band IV/2.

Salomon Wininger.

24 mars 1885 : Anton Bruckner sollicite de nouveau un doctorat honorifique de l'Université de Philadelphie (la demande n'a peut-être jamais été envoyée) . Et le projet d'une grande biographie sur le compositeur, par August Göllerich junior, prend forme.

27 mars 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au Quatuor Benno Walther (Munich) .

« Right Honourable Sir !

Sincere thanks for your kindness. In reference to the Quintet, I would like to request that the Scherzo not be played as prescribed ; on the contrary, in the 2nd section (nearly up to the recapitulation of the opening Andante) please take the tempo as you ordain. I wish you much luck. Hellmesberger did it in the fullest measure. To “ Herr ” Court “ Kapellmeister ” Levi, my deepest respect ! I shall write to him immediately. With best wishes to your colleagues, I remain

Most devotedly yours,

Anton Bruckner

N.B. : In spirit, I am still totally in Munich ; my artistic home is there. I can be completely happy there. “ 3 Cheers ” ! »

Incipit : « Innigsten Dank für Dire Liebenswürdigkeit. »

Source : Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 114 ; pages 127-128.

The Walther Quartet was made-up of Concert Master Benno Walther (1847-1901) ; Michaël Steiger (active from 1872 to 1912) ; Anton Thoms (1858-1888) ; and Franz Bennat (1844-1913) . With Johann Wihan (1855-1920) , they played Bruckner’s String Quintet at the home of music-critic Konrad Fiedler, an enthusiastic supporter of Bruckner, on March 14, 1885. The public performance was on March 31, in the Great Concert Hall of the Museum.

From the late- 18th Century to the present, the Scherzo has been a standard Symphonic and Quartet (in this case : quintet) movement which originally replaced the Minuet. It is normally in rapid 3/4 time and is in rounded binary form, usually with a contrasting Trio and, then, repetition of the 1st section. Although many Scherzi are light and playful in character, they can be sinister or macabre. This Scherzo has the tempo marking of Andante : moderately slow, between Adagio and Allegro. The Trio of a Scherzo usually provides relief for the listener and, usually, by tempo, timbre, or other means. To mark the A section of a multi-Scherzo Andante, followed by a « Langsamer » (very slow) Trio seems less that effective. Therefore, knowing that the Benno Walther Quartet was artistically experienced, he entrusted the tempo of the Trio to their discretion. In this case, a wise decision on his part.

Benno Walther

The German violinist and teacher Benno Walther was born on 17 June 1847 in Munich and died on 23 October 1901 in Konstanz, at the age of 54. He had associations with Richard Strauß and his family, to whom he was closely related and, also, with Richard Wagner.

Benno Walther had a close relationship with Richard Wagner. He played the solo violin part at the 1st performance of « Parsifal » at Bayreuth, in 1882, and was a frequent guest at Villa « Wahnfried » .

Benno's father (Johann) Georg Walther was a municipal musician. He started to train his son at the Royal School of Music, in Munich, when he was 4. Benno was a child prodigy on the violin, and his father took him on concert tours when he was 8. 3 years later, the young kid so pleased the King of Bavaria by his virtuosity that he was presented with a Guarnerius violin.

In 1862, Benno Walther became a trainee musician at the Munich Court Theatre.

In 1863, he joined the Munich Court Orchestra.

In 1864, he achieved full status as a Court musician.

In 1870, he became the Orchestra leader, and also began to teach at his « alma mater » , the Royal School of Music.

He owned the Cremona 1720 « ex Bavarian » violin made by Antonio Stradivari. The Royal House of Bavaria had acquired the violin during the early 19th Century. King Ludwig II of Bavaria, the patron of Richard Wagner, presented the violin to Walther, in 1870. Its later owners included Henri Verbrugghen.

At the Royal School of Music, in 1872, he became the violin teacher of the 8 year old Richard Strauß, his cousin's son. Georg Walther's sister, Maria Anna Kunigunde Walther, was the mother of Richard's father Franz Strauß, making Franz and Benno, 1st cousins. Richard Strauß and Benno Walther were, therefore, cousins once removed, but Strauß called him « cousin » (and Walther is sometimes referred to as his « uncle ») .

Born in a little town in the Fichtelgebirge of northeast Bavaria, Franz Strauß was apparently unrelated to the Viennese Straußes. His father was a policeman, but his mother, « née » Walther, came from a musical family. (One of her relatives was Benno Walther, a violinist and founder of the Walther String Quartet.) Franz Strauß came to be one of the greatest horn virtuosos since Jan Václav Stícha (Giovanni Punto) . He was solo horn with the Court Opera Orchestra, in Munich, and professor of his instrument at the Royal School of Music. In 1853, a cholera epidemic killed his wife and children. Later, he married Johanna Pschorr, the daughter of a Munich brewer, who bore him 2 more children, Richard and Johanna, and brought him sufficient wealth that he never had to worry about money again.

The (original) Walther String Quartet was composed of : Josef Walther, 1st violin ; Franz Brückner, 2nd violin ; Anton Thoms, viola ; Hippolyt Müller, cello.

Benno Walther took-over as professor of violin at the Munich Conservatory and as concert Master (1st violinist) of the Walther String Quartet when his elder brother and founder of the Quartet, Josef Walther, died in 1875. He toured with the Quartet in Europe and America.

The (renewed) Walther String Quartet was composed of : Benno Walther, 1st violin ; Michaël Steiger, 2nd violin ; Anton Thoms, viola ; Hippolyt Müller or Hanuš Wihan, cello.

Richard Strauß's String Quartet in A major (1879-1880) , Opus 2, was dedicated to his violin teacher, Benno Walther and to the members of his own String Quartet, on 14 March 1881.

The year 1881 saw the beginning of Richard Strauß's fame, as far as the general public was concerned. 4 of his works were performed in Munich during March. On the 14th, his String Quartet in A major, Opus 2 (November 1880) was performed in the « Museumssaal » by a Quartet led by his teacher, Benno Walther. The cellist was Hanuš Wihan, principal cellist of the Munich Court Orchestra. The work is a typical product of a youth brought-up on Haydn, Mozart and Mendelssohn, at its most promising in the Scherzo where the strait-jacket of strict Sonata form was not such a constricting influence on the boy's imagination.

The performance of the String Quartet was not, by any means, the only time the boy Strauß heard his works given in public. Apart from amateur performances given by his father, « Frau » Cornelia Meysenheim, one of the singers at the Munich Opera, sang 3 of his Lieder (all settings of Emanuel Geibel) , 2 days later, at a concert in the same hall :

Waldgesang (« Die Liebe Sass als Nachtigall ») , Opus 55.

O schneller mein Roß (AV 159) .

Die Lilien glühn in Düften (AV 160)

Only Waldgesang survives.

After this recital Strauß's relatives and friends gave him a gold signet ring, with his monogram « RS » inscribed on a black stone and a laurel wreath inscribed in gold letters « Presented on the most memorable day of your life » . Strauß wore the ring until he gave it to his elder grandson Richard for his 18th birthday, on 1 November 1945.

Benno Walther was a relative and colleague of Franz Strauß, Richard's father, and had been the boy's violin teacher since Richard was 8. He helped, taught, and encouraged the young composer right up to the early years of his maturity, and the Violin Concerto in D minor, Opus 8, is also dedicated to him.

Benno gave the 1st performance, on 5 December 1882, in Vienna, with Strauß playing a piano reduction of the orchestral part. Walther also gave the 1st performance with Orchestra, on 4 March 1890, in Cologne, with an Orchestra conducted by Franz Wüllner.

Adolf Sandberger's Violin Sonata (1892) , Opus 10, was dedicated to Benno Walther.

3 avril 1885 : Lettre de Hermann Levi (Munich) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Dear and Honoured Friend !

Sincere thanks for your kind letter. If I can arrange it, I should like to spend a few days with you in the country. At the beginning of May, I am going to Florence (where Fiedler and I are going to meet. There, the Quartet Society will learn your Quintet thoroughly) . Then, off to my friend Lenbach in Rome ; and, at the beginning of June, to Switzerland. I am very worn-out and long for tranquility ! The performance of the Quintet, here, was quite good. On the previous day, Fiedler invited people to his home ; there, I analyzed the work carefully with them (before which 5 rehearsals had already taken place !) . I believe that the tempi were correct. (The 1st movement : “ molto moderato ! ”) The acceptance, on the part of the audience, was very enthusiastic. I have not read the “ Süddeutsche Presse ”. Ostini was absent, but Forges wrote very beautifully and warmly in the “ Neuesten ”. I am going to tell him to send you the article. The matter with the King (Ludwig II) can be recorded only in 2 weeks. I made a long report to the Director's office which passed it on to the Office of the Royal Secretary ; and it appears that no one over there hurries in order to expedite matters. There is no question that the King will accept the dedication, but it must also provide something for you. Before my departure, this matter will be secured in good order.

Wüllner, in Cologne, has announced a performance of the 7th Symphony for next winter. In addition, Müller, in Frankfurt, has appealed to me for it. Gutmann had better hurry a bit so the score and parts will be ready before the beginning of the winter season.

At the beginning of May, could you perhaps meet me in Florence ? This would be magnificent !

I did not arrange for the parts to be sent back to you again. In the meantime, however, hang on to them.

Remain well-disposed toward myself, and accept best regards, in admiration and reverence to you.

Yours,

Hermann Levi »

Incipit : « Herzlichen Dank für Ihren lieben Brief ! »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 3 de Hermann Levi ; pages 315-316.

Doctor Konrad Fiedler (1841-1895) : Music-critic in Munich, where Bruckner met him in March, 1885.

Baron Karl von Ostini (1830-1895) : President of the Munich Wagner Society.

Heinrich Forges (1837-1900) : Conductor, writer on music, and music-critic.

« Neueste Nachrichten » and « Münchner Anzeiger » , the newspapers in Munich.

Franz Wüllner (1832-1902) : In 1878, Bruckner wrote to Wilhelm Tappert (music-writer, teacher, musicologist : 1830-1907) that Wüllner, in Dresden, had written to him asking him for a score to peruse. From 1877, Wüllner was « Königlicher Hofkapellmeister » there.

Karl Müller (1818-1894) : Conductor of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts. From 1860 to 1892, he conducted the « Cäcilienverein » in Frankfurt. On December 4, 1885, he presented Bruckner's 3rd Symphony.

Albert J. Gutmann : Publisher and concert agent in Vienna. He died in 1914.

Konrad Fiedler

Le savant et théoricien de l'art allemand Konrad Fiedler est né le 23 septembre 1841 à Oederan, près de Dresde ; et est mort le 3 juin 1895 à Munich.

Originaire d'une riche famille juive, il compléta ses études à Leipzig, où la famille avait emménagé en 1846 et où son père, un industriel qui s'était retiré, décéda en 1854. Après avoir terminé ses études en droit et avoir travaillé pendant un certain temps avec un avocat, Fiedler abandonna sa carrière juridique et se consacra à une série de voyages en Europe et au Moyen-Orient, dans la tradition du Grand Tour.

Au cours de l'un de ces voyages à Rome, entre 1866 et 1867, Fiedler rencontra le sculpteur Adolf von Hildebrand et le peintre Hans von Marées avec lesquels il se lia d'une amitié durable qui contribua à une fécondation mutuelle des leurs idées. L'Italie resta une destination constante des voyages de Fiedler, qui acheta une maison dans le parc du manoir d'Hildebrand, près de Florence. La résidence d'Hildebrand, au cours de ces années, était l'un des nombreux salons fréquentés par des intellectuels et des artistes comme Anselm Feuerbach, Albert Lang et Arnold Böcklin.

En 1876, Fiedler épousa Marie Meyer et ils emménagèrent à Berlin puis en Bavière. C'est dans ces années-là que son travail, en tant que critique et théoricien, devint de plus en plus vif, avec l'élaboration de plusieurs essais et articles. À Munich, en 1895, il décéda dans des circonstances peu claires après la chute d'une fenêtre.

L'objectif principal des travaux de Fiedler était de construire une théorie de l'art figuratif indépendant de toute affirmation d'évaluation et de définir une épistémologie provenant d'autres disciplines telles que l'esthétique, l'histoire de l'art, l'iconographie ou l'anthropologie. Fiedler entendait trouver les bases de sa théorie dans la vue : en libérant la perception visuelle de la langue et de la pensée, et en attribuant aux sens une opinion indépendante, il aurait été possible d'étudier l'art avec les moyens qui lui sont propres. En fait, les arts visuels, selon Fiedler, sont l'activité qui créent des formes interprétables dans le domaine exclusif de la perception visuelle.

Cette théorie esthétique, que l'on retrouve également dans la production artistique et les théories de Hildebrand et de Marées, a été définie par la suite par Benedetto Croce comme étant de « pure vision ». Elle eut une grande influence sur la plupart des critiques de l'art au tournant des XIXe et XXe siècles, en particulier sur Alois Riegl.

Œuvres

« Über die Beurteilung von Werken der bildenden Kunst » - Sur l'évaluation des œuvres de l'art visuel (1876) .

« Über den Ursprung der künstlerischen Tätigkeit » - Sur l'origine de l'activité artistique (1887) .

« Hans von Marées » (1889) .

...

Konrad Fiedler (geboren 23. September 1841 in Oederan ; gestorben 13. Juni 1895 in München ; gelegentlich auch in der Schreibweise « Conrad Fiedler ») war einer der bedeutendsten deutschen Kunsttheoretiker des 19. Jahrhunderts.

Fiedler studierte von 1861 bis 1865 in Lausanne, Heidelberg, Berlin und Leipzig, wo er mit einer Promotion in Jura abschloß. Nach kurzer Beschäftigung in einer Anwaltskanzlei gab Fiedler den Beruf als Jurist wieder auf. Stattdessen widmete er sich der Kunst und reiste als Mäzen, Kunstsammler und Kunstkritiker durch Europa und den Vorderen Orient. In Rom lernte er Hans von Marées und Adolf von Hildebrand kennen, deren Freund und Förderer er wurde. 1876 heiratete Fiedler Mary Meyer, die Tochter des Kunsthistorikers Julius Meyer. 1880 ließ sich das Paar in München nieder, wo er sich und andere mit der bedeutenden Komponistin Ethel Smyth in geistigen und künstlerischen Angelegenheiten rege austauschte. 1895 starb Konrad Fiedler durch den Sturz von einem Balkon. Er wurde in der Familiengrabstätte auf dem Gut Crostewitz beerdigt. Da Dorf und Rittergut Crostewitz 1967 dem Braunkohleabbau weichen mußten, erfolgte eine Umbettung der sterblichen Überreste zum Südfriedhof Leipzig.

Fiedler gilt als ein für die Kunstanschauung im 20. Jahrhundert « bahnbrechender Theoretiker » (Kultermann) . Er entwickelte im Kreis der deutsch-römischen Künstler Anselm Feuerbach, Adolf von Hildebrand und Hans von Marées ein auf der Philosophie Kants und auch Schopenhauers fußendes kunstphilosophisches Konzept des autonomen Kunstwerks. In den Werken von Hildebrand und Marées sah Fiedler die Möglichkeit einer neuen Kunstsprache, die einzig den Gesetzen der Kunst und nicht, wie in der damaligen offiziellen Historienmalerei üblich, der außerkünstlerischen Realität verpflichtet war.

Fiedler übte großen Einfluss auf Künstler des frühen 20. Jahrhunderts aus, unter ihnen Paul Klee und Wassily Kandinsky. Unter den Kunsthistorikern ist vor allem Heinrich Wölfflin (auch über Adolf von Hildebrand) von Fiedler geprägt. Darüber hinaus sind die Ansätze des Kunstmäzens und Privatgelehrten nicht allein für die Ästhetik, sondern auch für eine Philosophie der Wahrnehmung von Bedeutung.

Zu den wichtigsten zu Lebzeiten veröffentlichten Werken Fiedlers zählen Über die Beurteilung von Werken der Bildenden Kunst (1876) ; Über Kunstinteressen und deren Förderung (1879) ; Moderner Naturalismus und künstlerische Wahrheit (1881) ; Über den Ursprung der künstlerischen Tätigkeit (1887) sowie Hans von Marées (1889) .

Der Titel von Moderner Naturalismus und künstlerische Wahrheit (1881) könnte vermuten lassen, daß Naturalismus in der Kunst zu Wahrheit führt. Ganz im Gegenteil ist in Fiedlers kunstphilosophischem Konzept Kunst jedoch von aller « äußeren Wirklichkeit » unabhängig - und somit auch von der Naturnachahmung (Mimesis) , von welcher der Naturalismus ausgeht. Wirklichkeit und damit auch Wahrheit realisieren sich im Schaffen des Künstlers, der im Kunstwerk das Sehen als solches veranschaulicht. Fiedler hebt die Autonomie und Eigenbedeutsamkeit einer als « absolut » verstandenen Kunst hervor. Das Kunstwerk ist zu schaffen als aus sich selbst und einer « reinen Sichtbarkeit » heraus zu Verstehendes - und nicht als eines, das auf gedankliche oder geistige Inhalte verweist.

Die wohl wichtigste Schrift Fiedlers Über den Ursprung der künstlerischen Tätigkeit (1887) sondiert die Rolle des Kunstwerks für die Erkenntnis von Welt in völlig neuer Weise, indem sie ausgehend von Immanuel Kant und Erkenntnissen des Impressionismus eine eigene Theorie der Wahrnehmung entwickelt. Diese ist gekennzeichnet durch eine Akzentuierung des « wahrnehmungsbildenden » Subjekts, eine monadische Sicht auf den Wahrnehmungsvorgang sowie die idealistische Stilisierung des Kunstwerks (fernab des Kantischen Geschmacksurteils) zum möglichen Ort « reiner » Sichtbarkeit.

Ausgaben

Konrad Fiedler. Der Ursprung der künstlerischen Thätigkeit, Hirzel, Leipzig (1887) .

Konrad Fiedler. Schriften über Kunst, Herausgegeben von Hans Marbach, Leipzig (1896) .

Konrad Fiedler. Vom Wesen der Kunst. Auswahl aus seinen Schriften. Zusammengestellt und eingeleitet von Hans Eckstein, München (1942) .

Konrad Fiedler. Schriften zur Kunst, Herausgegeben von Gottfried Böhm, München (1971) ; 2 Bände - 2. verbesserte und erweiterte Auflage (1991) .

Konrad Fiedler. Die Tagebücher (1866-1875) , Herausgegeben und eingeleitet von Brigitte Boiar, Kulturförderverein Ruhrgebiet - Amazon-kindle-edition, Gladbeck (2011) .

Franz Wüllner

Le compositeur et un chef d'orchestre allemand Franz Wüllner est né le 28 janvier 1832 et est mort le 7 septembre 1902. Il a dirigé les Ires représentations des Opéras de Richard Wagner : « l'Or du Rhin » , le 22 septembre 1869 ; et « la Walkyrie » , le 26 juin 1870.

...

The German composer and conductor Franz Wüllner was born on 28 January 1832 in Münster ; and died on 7 September 1902 in Braunfels. He led the premieres of Richard Wagner's Operas « Das Rheingold » and « Die Walküre » , but was much criticized by Wagner himself, who greatly preferred the more celebrated conductors Hans von Bülow and Hermann Levi.

Wüllner studied in his native place and in Frankfurt, Berlin, Brussels, and Munich. Among his teachers was Anton Schindler, who styled himself Beethoven's amanuensis carrying on the true traditions of the Master's style, a claim disputed by Beethoven's pupil Carl Czerny. In 1856, Wüllner became instructor in piano at the Munich Conservatory. He held the position of town musical director at Aix-la-Chapelle, from 1858 to 1864. In 1867, he became director of the choral classes in the re-organized School of Music at Munich and wrote for them « Chorübungen der Münchener Musikschule » , text of score reading and singing (« Solfège ») .

He succeeded the temperamental Bülow, in 1869, as conductor of the Court Opera and the Academy Courts. Here, he conducted the 1st performances of « Rheingold » , on 22 September 1869, and « Walküre » , on 26 June 1870, before the production of the entire « Ring » cycle at the 1st Bayreuth Festival of 1876. It is for these renditions that he is usually remembered now.

He became Court « Kapellmeister » in Dresden and artistic director of the Conservatory, in 1877, and director of the Cologne Conservatory and conductor of the Gürzenich concerts, in 1884. After 1864, he appeared frequently as conductor of the Lower-Rhenish Music Festival.

Among his notable pupils were Volkmar Andreae, Fritz Brun, Lothar Kempfer, Bruno Klein, Jan van Gilse, Hans von Kössler, Karl Aagard Østvig, Ernst von Schuch, and the conductor Willem Mengelberg. Mengelberg controversially claimed that his teacher's ties with Schindler gave Mengelberg a direct connection with Beethoven performance tradition.

Among his works :

« Heinrich der Finkler » , cantata for solo, male chorus, and orchestra.

Additional recitatives to Carl Maria von Weber's « Oberon » , accepted by many of Germany's principal theatres.

« Psalm 125 » for chorus and orchestra.

« Miserere » for double choir.

« Stabat Mater » for double choir.

Masses, Motets, Songs, chamber music, and piano pieces.

...

Franz Wüllner (geboren 28. Januar 1832 in Münster ; gestorben 7. September 1902 in Braunfels) war ein deutscher Komponist, Dirigent und Professor.

Sein Vater war der gleichnamige Philologe und Lehrer Franz Wüllner. Während seiner Kindheit in Düsseldorf erhielt er bereits früh Violin- und Klavierunterricht. Einer seiner Lehrer in dieser Zeit war Anton Felix Schindler, der einen prägenden Einfluss auf ihn hatte.

In der Zeit von 1850 bis 1854 unternahm Wüllner ausgedehnte Konzertreisen als Pianist, gleichzeitig neben Studien in Köln, Brüssel, Berlin und Leipzig. Hauptinhalt seiner Vorträge waren hierbei die Klaviersonaten von Ludwig van Beethoven. Bei dieser Gelegenheit begegnete er Johannes Brahms, mit dem ihn fortan eine lebenslange Freundschaft verband. Wichtige Anregungen verdankte Wüllner auch dem Kontakt zu Joseph Joachim, Ignaz Moscheles, Otto Jahn, Ferdinand David und Moritz Hauptmann.

Nach einer ersten Anstellung als Musikschullehrer in München wechselte Wüllner im Jahr 1858 als Städtischer Musikdirektor zum Theater Aachen und leitete dort bis 1865 das Sinfonieorchester Aachen. Danach ging er zurück nach München, um die Leitung der Königlichen Vokalkapelle zu übernehmen. Auf Anordnung von Ludwig II. und gegen den Willen von Richard Wagner dirigierte Wüllner 1869-1870 die Uraufführungen der Werke Das Rheingold und Die Walküre am Nationaltheater München und wurde daraufhin zum Ersten Hofkapellmeister ernannt.

Von 1874 bis 1892 war Wüllner, gemeinsam mit Josef Gabriel Rheinberger, Inspektor der Königlich bayerischen Musikschule, wo er Chor- und Orchesterklassen einrichtete. Seine « Chorübungen der Münchener Musikschule » wirkten bis weit in das 20. Jahrhundert hinein.

Ab 1877 wirkte er in Dresden als Professor, Leiter des Konservatoriums und Hofkapellmeister. Durch Intrigen in seiner Arbeit behindert, wechselte er nach Berlin. Dort dirigierte er die Philharmonischen Konzerte und war (wie vor ihm schon Meyerbeer, Lortzing und andere namhafte Künstler) Chorsänger in der Sing-Akademie. 1884 übernahm er auf Empfehlung von Brahms die Leitung des Kölner Konservatoriums als Nachfolger von Ferdinand Hiller. Er zeichnete für die Umwandlung des Gürzenich-Orchesters in ein Städtisches Orchester verantwortlich und prägte das Musikleben der folgenden zwei Jahrzehnte wesentlich. Zwischen 1864 und 1898 war Wüllner siebenmal verantwortlicher Festspielleiter der Niederrheinischen Musikfeste in Aachen, Düsseldorf und Köln.

1900 begründete Franz Wüllner gemeinsam mit dem Musikwissenschaftler Hermann Kretzschmar sowie dem Inhaber des Verlags Breitkopf & Härtel Oskar von Hase und Martin Blumner, Siegfried Ochs, Joseph Joachim und dem Thomaskantor Gustav Schreck die Neue Bachgesellschaft.

Als Komponist schuf Franz Wüllner Klavier- und Kammermusik sowie viele Vokalwerke. Er gilt als Vertreter der deutschen Hochromantik und als Förderer vieler junger Komponisten, stellvertretend sei hier Richard Strauß genannt. Strauß widmete Wüllner 1884 eine Vertonung des Gøethe-Gedichts Wandrers Sturmlied für Chor und Orchester.

Franz Wüllner war der Vater des Sängers, Schauspielers und Rezitators Ludwig Wüllner (1858-1938) .

Schüler : Ernestine Schumann-Heink.

Instrumentalwerke

Variationen über ein altdeutsches Volkslied für Klavier zu vier Händen, Opus 24 (1862) .

Violinsonate in E-Moll, Opus 30 (1871) .

Variationen über ein Thema von Franz Schubert für Violoncello und Klavier, Opus 39 (1875) .

Chorwerke

Messe Nr. 1 für 4-stimmig gem. Chor und 4 Solo-Stimmen, Opus 20 (1865) .

Miserere für Doppel-Chor und Soli a cappella, Opus 26 (1867) .

Messe Nr. 2 für 4-stimmig gem. Chor und 4 Solo-Stimmen, Opus 29 (1868) .

Drei Motetten zum Gebrauch in Concert und Kirche für 4-stimmig gem. Chor, Opus 42 (1889-1890) .

Stabat Mater für 8-stimmig gem. Chor, Opus 45 (1886) .

Drei Motetten (Gradualien) zum Gebrauche in Kirche und Konzert für 4-5-stimmig gem. Chor, Opus 47 (1887 ?) .

Abendgesang für 6-stimmig gem. Chor oder 6-stimmigen Männerchor, Opus 52 (1892) .

Te Deum für 4-8 stimmigen gem. Chor und großes Orchester, Opus 50 (1888) .

Tonträger

Violinsonate in E-Moll, Opus 30 (Suyoen Kim, Violine, Tobias Bredohl, Klavier) .

Variationen über ein altdeutsches Volkslied, Opus 24 (Alina Kabanova und Tobias Bredohl, Klavier) .

Variationen über ein Thema von Franz Schubert, Opus 39 (Konstantin Manaev, Violoncello, Ekatherina Titova, Klavier) .

Dohr DCD020 (Köln, 2003) .

Wilhelm Tappert

Wilhelm Tappert (19. februar 1830 - 27. oktober 1907) var en tysk musikforfatter, der også optrådte som komponist af sange og klaveretuder.

Tappert var oprindelig skolelærer, men gik 1856 ganske over til musikken, i hvis teori han fik Siegfried Dehn til lærer. I en lang årrække levede Tappert, der stod Richard Wagner og hans kreds nær, i Berlin som musiklærer, forfatter og fag- og dagbladskritiker. Han havde særlig fortjeneste af sine samlinger af og studier over luttabulatur.

I øvrigt har han udgivet skrifter som Musikalische Studien, Richard Wagner, Wagner-Lexikon, Wörterbuch der Unhöflichkeit (en kuriøs samling af « grove, hånende, hadefulde og bagtaleriske » udtryk, brugt om og mod Wagner, 2. oplag 1903), Wandernde Melodien, Entwicklung der Musik-Notenschrift, 54 Erlkönig-Kompositionen, etc.

...

10 april 1885 : Le chef Hermann Levi dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre de la Cour de Munich (« Hoforchester ») . Une première munichoise dans le cadre du 2e concert d'abonnement de la saison qui se tient à la salle de l'Odéon de Munich (« Königlich Odeon Konzerthaus ») .

10 april 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Eva Wagner (Bayreuth) .

« Dear Gracious “ Fräulein ” !

Having just arrived in Vienna from my home in Upper-Austria, I must ask for gracious indulgence. Already in September of last year, I sent the desired letter from your dear, late “ Papa ” to Managing Director Groß, in “ Bayreuth ”, that is, a “ copy ”. I have also enclosed other distinctions received orally throughout the years from the immortal Emperor of music. Now, I permit myself to send a copy of my precious relic to “ Fräulein ” Eva. I must have been distracted to the utmost that I cannot recall your entire instructions at all. Please, “ pardon ” me ! I immediately wrote to Otto Bach.

“ Fräulein ” Eva will probably have learned of the enthusiasm for my 7th Symphony, in Munich, through Baron von Wolzogen. Following “ Die Walküre ”, the funeral music from the 2nd movement of my 7th Symphony was performed, with the 4 new tubas, the “ contrabass tuba ”, and the horns, played “ 3 times ” in the “ darkness ” of the Court Theater. I wrote it to the memory of “ my unattainable ideal ” directly in that very sad time of mourning, carried-out, and, indeed, to the memory of the “ Beloved, Immortal Master of all Masters ! ”

How deeply moved we all were !

I am very disturbed over the unsettled status of your health and wish, from my entire soul, imminent and continual recovery ! Thank you very much for your very esteemed letter ; it is for me a precious gem. “ 3 Cheers ” to your “ gracious Mama ”.

“ Cheers ” to the young ladies. “ Cheers ” to “ Herr ” Siegfried ! “ Cheers ” to you, “ Fräulein Eva ” !

My noble patroness !

With thanks and respect,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Eben erst aus meiner Heimat, Oberösterreich ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 177 ; pages 203-204.

Eva Wagner (1867-1942) : Younger daughter of Richard Wagner and his 2nd wife Cosima von Bülow, « née » Liszt. In 1908, she married the author and cultural philosopher Houston Stewart Chamberlain, a union which produced the « famous » Wagner grandsons who made so many changes at Bayreuth - especially, in staging and lighting.

Bruckner would have spent the Easter Feasts at Saint-Florian Monastery.

Bruckner is referring to the Church Year, around which organists arrange their lives.

Baron Hans von Wolzogen (1848-1938) : German writer on music as well as a librettist ; a good friend to Bruckner.

Cosima Wagner (1837-1930) : Daughter of Franz Liszt (1811-1886) . She was 1st married to Hans von Bülow (1830-1894) , then divorced and remarried to Richard Wagner (1813-1883) , in 1870. He wrote “ Mein Leben ” for King Ludwig II of Bavaria (1845-1886) , but dedicated it to Cosima. The 4th part was written with her in mind, as she does not appear in the earlier sections. Detractors once thought that this 4th section may have been written by Cosima herself - to her own benefit ; however, in the 3rd volume, Wagner refers constantly to his work on the 4th, thus, confirming its authenticity. Also, it is written in his informal, poetic style and with his inherent frankness.

Eva's half-sisters : Daniela (1860-1940) ; Blandine von Bülow (1863-1941) .

Eva's sister : Isolde Wagner (1865-1919) .

Eva's brother : Siegfried Wagner (1869-1930) . He both composed and conducted.

Eva Wagner

Naissance : 17 février 1867, à Tribtschen près de Lucerne, en Suisse.

Mort : 26 mai 1942, à Bayreuth.

Fille de Richard Wagner et de Cosima Liszt - von Bülow.

1908 : Épouse Houston Stewart Chamberlain (1855-1927) .

Autres formes du nom : Eva Chamberlain-Wagner (1867-1942) .

Eva von Bülow (1867-1942) .

Eva Wagner (1867-1942) .

Mère : Cosima Liszt.

Père : Richard Wagner.

Frère : Siegfried Wagner.

Sœurs : Isolde et Daniela von Bülow.

...

Birthdate : 17 février 1867.

Birthplace : Tribtschen near Lucerne, Switzerland.

Death : Died on 26 mai 1942, in Bayreuth, Upper-Franconia, Bavaria.

Grave Location : Bayreuth (« Bayern Stadtfriedhof ») .

« Famille proche » : Daughter of Hans Guido « Freiherr » von Bülow et Cosima Francesca Gaetana Liszt.

Wife of Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

Sister of Daniela Senta Thode von Bülow ; Blandine Gräfin Gravina von Bülow et Isolde Ludowitz Beidler.

Half sister of Siegfried Helderich Richard Wagner.

...

Daughter of Richard Wagner and Cosima Liszt. Because her mother was still married to Hans von Bülow at the time of her birth her official name was Eva von Bülow. She married racial theorist Houston Stewart Chamberlain, in 1908. He had wanted to marry her sister and she was 40.

They lived at « Wahnfriedstraße I » , in Bayreuth, and the marriage remained childless. Eva deleted pages from Richard Wagner's notebook and kept it hidden for many years. Only a select number of biographers was allowed to see parts of this important source. She and her half sister Daniela protested when the costumes for « Parsifal » were renewed in the 1930's for the 1st time since the Opera was first performed in 1882.

...

Eva Chamberlain (geboren 17. Februar 1867 in Tribschen bei Luzern ; gestorben 26. Mai 1942 in Bayreuth ; geborene Eva Maria von Bülow) war die Tochter von Richard Wagner und Cosima Wagner und die Gattin von Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

Eva wurde als Tochter Richard Wagners geboren, ihre Mutter war aber noch mit Hans von Bülow verheiratet. Mit ihren Geschwistern Isolde und Siegfried wurde Eva durch einen Hauslehrer erzogen, ihre Halbschwestern Blandine und Daniela wurden in einem Internat untergebracht.

1906 übernahm Eva in der Villa Wahnfried in Bayreuth die Oberaufsicht über die Pflege der kranken Mutter, erledigte deren Post und hatte als einziges Familienmitglied Zugriff auf das Familienarchiv. Sie nutzte dies zur Schönung von Wagners Biografie. 1908 heiratete sie den Schriftsteller Houston Stewart Chamberlain. Sie erwarben eine stattliche Villa neben der Villa Wahnfried, die sie 1916 bezogen (heute Jean-Paul-Museum) .

In den 1920er und 1930er Jahren waren sie und ihre Schwester Daniela das Haupt der Altwagnerianer, die sich gegen jede Modernisierung der Werke Richard Wagners aussprachen. 1933 erhielt sie die Ehrenbürgerwürde der Stadt Bayreuth. Sie war Trägerin des Ehrenzeichens der NSDAP. Als sie 1942 an einem Krebsleiden verstarb, wurde ihr ein Ehrenbegräbnis der NSDAP zu teil, bei dem der bayrische Minister Adolf Wagner die Trauerrede hielt.

Otto Bach

The composer (primarily, liturgical music) and Opera « Kapellmeister » , Doctor Otto Bach, was born on 9 February 1833 in Vienna ; and died on 3 July 1893 in Unterwaltersdorf, a municipality of Ebreichsdorf (Lower-Austria) . Brother of Austrian Minister Alexander Freiherr von Bach (1849-1859) .

He studied under Simon Sechter.

He became the « Kapellmeister » and Artistic Director for the Salzburg « Dom-Musikverein » (Cathedral) and the « Mozarteum » Music College, from 1868 to 1880 (7 years before, Anton Bruckner placed a request for the same vacant position) .

In 1880, Bach became church « Kapellmeister » , in Vienna.

Works : Church music, Operas, Symphonies, incidental music (for Hebbels « Nibelungen ») .

...

Otto Bach (geboren 9. Februar 1833 in Wien ; gestorben 3. Juli 1893 in Unterwaltersdorf bei Ebreichsdorf, Niederösterreich) war ein österreichischer Komponist, Kirchenmusiker, Kapellmeister und einer der ersten Chefdirektoren des Mozarteum-Orchesters.

Otto war der jüngste Sohn des Rechtsanwalts Michaël Bach ; seine älteren Brüder waren die späteren Politiker Alexander und Eduard. Seine Schulbildung erhielt er am Wiener Schottengymnasium.

Nach den politischen Ereignissen von 1848-1849 begann Bach bei Simon Sechter in Wien Musik zu studieren. Weitere Studien führten ihn zu Adolf Bernhard Marx nach Berlin sowie zu Moritz Hauptmann nach Leipzig.

Privat war Bach seit 1864 mit Therese Bach-Marschner, der Witwe von Heinrich Marschner, verheiratet. Er pflegte auch engen Kontakt zur Familie von Franz von Hillebrandt, dessen Tochter Marie er einige Lieder widmete.

Mit 35 Jahren berief man 1868 Bach zum Direktor des Dommusikvereins und Mozarteums in Salzburg. Nach der Übergabe des Mozarteums an die Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum im Jahr 1880 ging er 1880 wieder zurück nach Wien, wo er zehn Jahre Kapellmeister an der Votivkirche (Wien) sowie Lehrer an der Horak Musikschule war. Außerdem leitete er von 1880 bis 1888 den Orchesterverein der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien. Um 1890 zog sich Bach ins Privatleben zurück und starb sodann im Alter von 60 Jahren in Unterwaltersdorf, Niederösterreich.

Als Dirigent galt Bach als bedeutend, als Komponist war er zu Lebzeiten in Österreich geschätzt und erfolgreich. Doch erlangte er darüber hinaus keine große Bekanntheit. Besonders seine frühen Lieder, die sich an Mendelssohn und Schumann orientieren, konnten Aufmerksamkeit erregen. Später wandte sich Bach der Neudeutschen Richtung zu. Kritiker haben ihm wiederholt einen Mangel an selbständiger kompositorischer Erfindungsgabe vorgeworfen. So schreibt Eduard Hanslick über eine Symphonie von Otto Bach :

« ... eine Symphonie von riesiger Dauer, offenbar mit verschwiegenem “ Programm ”. Dieses Thauwetter von Schwulst, Lärm und Reminiscenzen analysieren zu wollen, wäre vergebliche Arbeit. Die trockenste Nüchternheit feiert hier mit wüster Phantastik ein anmuthloses Hochzeitsfest. Ein großes Orchester mit zwei Harfen, Ophicleide, großer Trommel und Becken ist in fortwährendem Tumult ; aber alle Lärminstrumente des türkischen Reichs vermöchten diese

Gedankenarmuth nicht zu maskiren. Es war uns zu Muth wie Einem, der vor dem Schlafengehen alle Wagner'schen Opern und einige Liszt'sche Symphonien dazu gehört hätte, und nun in wirrem Durcheinander davon träumt. Von einer künstlerischen Form ist da kaum zu reden ; drei- bis viermal in jedem Stück glaubt man den Schluß gekommen, und - täuscht sich. Die Instrumentierung ist von erschreckender Rohheit, die Posaunen, Trompeten, Ophicleiden kommen nicht zu Athem - eine Panzerfregatte auf dem Stadtparkteich. »

An groß besetzter Kirchenmusik für Soli, Chor und Orchester komponierte Bach ein Te Deum (1856) , eine Missa solemnis in D (1869) und ein Requiem (1879) . In seinem Werk finden sich aber auch mehrere Opern, darunter Sardanapal (Lord Byron, 1862, nicht aufgeführt) Leonore, Opus 30 (Otto Prechtler, Uraufführung 1874 in Gotha) , Die Argonauten und Medea (beide Franz Grillparzer, 1876, nicht aufgeführt) . Er vertonte auch Friedrich Hebbels Tragödie Die Nibelungen. Weiters komponierte Bach vier Symphonien, eine symphonische Dichtung Frühlings-Nahen, ein Violin- (1854) und ein Klavierkonzert (1870) , ein Streichquartett in G-Moll (1851) , ein Streichquintett in A-Moll (1864) , Kammermusik, Klavier- und Chorwerke sowie zahlreiche Lieder. Ferner bearbeitete er mehrere Werke Mozarts.

Die meisten Werke von Otto Bach liegen heute in der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek, Wien.

...

Otto Bach studierte in Wien bei Simon Sechter, später in Berlin und Leipzig, bevor er sich 1868 für die Nachfolge von Hans Schläger als Künstlerischer Leiter des Dommusikverein und Mozarteums bewarb. Wie bereits sieben Jahre zuvor bei der Bestellung Schlägers war auch diesmal Anton Bruckner einer der Mitbewerber um die vakante Stelle. Und wie damals zog er gegen den erfahreneren Gegenkandidaten den Kürzeren. Am 1. Juli 1868 trat Bach die Stelle an.

Neben seiner Tätigkeit für das Mozarteum war Bach von 1869 bis 1872 auch Chorleiter der Salzburger Liedertafel.

Als Komponist war Bach vor allem mit seinen vier Sinfonien und seinen fünf Opern erfolgreich, zumindest eine davon - Leonore (1874) - entstand während seiner Zeit in Salzburg.

Am 1. April 1880 legte Bach unter der drohenden Übernahme seines Vereins durch die Internationale Stiftung Mozarteum sein Amt als Künstlerischer Leiter nieder und übersiedelte als Kirchenmusikleiter zurück nach Wien.

Otto Bach war der Bruder des ehemaligen österreichischen Innenministers Alexander Freiherr von Bach (1849-1859) .

...

Si l'on songe que Bruckner avait plus de 60 ans lorsqu'il l'écrivit, on sera surpris de son caractère candide et juvénile, et de la naïveté de l'enthousiasme qui s'en dégage. Il s'agit de la 7e Symphonie en mi majeur, celle qu'Hanslick avait surnommé « trémolo-Symphonie » , comme il avait baptisé « pizzicato-Symphonie » , la 5e en si bémol, la plus belle peut-être, la plus haute, la plus brucknérienne ; pour déprécier ces œuvres et empêcher qu'on les prit au sérieux. L'Adagio en ut dièse mineur, dont il va être question, est une sorte de marche funèbre à la mémoire de Richard Wagner. (Encore un grief du Parti de Brahms contre Bruckner, cette admiration pour l'auteur de « Parsifal » !)

« Une lettre est une âme », dit quelque part Honoré de Balzac.

17 avril 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à monsieur Félix Mottl, l'illustre « Kapellmeister » de Karlsruhe.

« Cher vieil ami, cher jeune ami ! Noble “ Kapellmeister ” de la Cour !

Ce doit être le bon Bruckner, vas-tu dire ; bien deviné, c'est justement lui.

Écoute : le professeur Riedel, de Leipzig, m'a demandé si je voulais consentir à laisser exécuter au Festival de l'Association des musiciens allemands, qui doit avoir lieu le 30 mai, à Karlsruhe, l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie. Franz Liszt et Henriette Standthartner m'y engagent. Tu es dans cette circonstance, le personnage principal.

Premièrement, l'Orchestre n'est-il pas trop mal disposé pour moi ?

Deuxièmement, as-tu les nouveaux tubas, les mêmes qui ont servi dans “ L'Anneau des Niebelungen ”, ou si tu ne les as pas, peux-tu te les procurer ?

Troisièmement, voudras-tu, comme l'ont fait messieurs Levi et Nikisch, consacrer ton moi artistique tout entier pour ton vieux Maître qui t'a toujours tenu en grande affection, et étudier et diriger cet Adagio avec les tubas et la musique funèbre pour le compositeur défunt, comme s'il s'agissait de ton propre ouvrage ?

Si mon cher Mottl me promet cela et m'en donne sa parole d'honneur, alors, “ 3 Hourrah ” ! Tout va bien, et je puis faire envoyer les partitions à Leipzig.

N.B. : Les 4 tubas sont très essentiels, et aussi le tuba contrebasse. Je pense que nous serons contents tous les deux.

Ma détermination repose en ce moment dans tes mains.

Sois salué de tout cœur, et embrassé par celui qui te tient en la plus haute estime et reste

ton Anton Bruckner. »

...

« Dear Old, Young Friend !

This must be Bruckner you say, and right you are, it is he !

Listen : Professor Riedel, from Leipzig, has offered to present my “ Adagio ” from the 7th Symphony to the “ Allgemeines deutsches Musikfest ”, in Karlsruhe, on May 30th, if I would give my consent. Liszt and Doctor Standthartner advise me to do it. However, you are now the central figure in this matter.

1st : Is the Orchestra not too unfavourably disposed toward me ?

2nd : Do you have the new tubas like those found in the “ Ring of the Niebelungen ”, or, if not, can you obtain them ?

3rd : Would you be willing to engage your whole artistic being, as “ Messieurs ” Levi and Nikisch, in rehearsing and conducting this Adagio with the tubas and the funeral music to the late “ Master ”, for your old, former teacher to whom you were always so dear ?

Provided you can fill yourself with enthusiasm for it, you, as a highly-celebrated conductor, are the right artist to perform it.

If, my dear Mottl, you tell me this with your German word of honour, then, “ 3 Cheers ” ! The matter is then in order, and I must then send the parts to Leipzig.

N.B. : The 4 tubas are very important, moreover ; also, Contra-Bass tuba. I believe we both can be joyful.

In your hands rests my decision. Be most sincerely greeted and kissed by

Your most admiring

Anton Bruckner

My sincerest sympathy ! I am very sorry about the noble man ! May he rest peacefully ! »

Incipit : « Das muß der Bruckner sein ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 153 ; pages 182-183.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 76 ; pages 84-86.

Bruckner is referring to the death of Felix Mottl's father, Peter, on March 18, 1885.

Felix Mottl (1856-1911) : Austrian conductor, editor, and composer ; a theory student of Bruckner at the Conseratory, in Vienna. By 1881, he was « Hofkapellmeister » in Karlsruhe, where he set the highest Opera standards in the Germany of his day, and also championed Bruckner's compositions. He conducted in Bayreuth, for the 1st time, in 1886.

Franz Liszt (1811-1886) : Extremely innovative and dramatic Hungarian composer, pianist, teacher, and conductor. His compositional methods anticipated 20th Century ideas, and he evolved the method of transformation of themes. As the greatest piano virtuoso of his time, he familiarized his audiences with the works of others through his transcriptions. A true Romantic, he was forever torn between spirituality and sensation.

Carl Riedel

The German chorus Master, conductor and composer Carl Riedel was born on 6 October 1827 in Cronenberg, Wuppertal ; and died on 3 June 1888 in Leipzig.

He initially worked as a dyer of silk before conductor Karl Wilhelm discovered his musical talent and encouraged him to pursue a music career. He studied at the Leipzig Conservatory and, after graduating from the school, joined the Conservatory's faculty as a professor of piano and music theory, teaching there for several decades. He was notably one of Julius Reubke's teachers, and Reubke dedicated his Sonata on the « 94th Psalm » to him. He was a highly-respected choral conductor in his native country. In 1854, he founded the Choral Society which became known as the « Riedel'scher Verein » .

He put special emphasis on Protestant works such as those of Bach and Heinrich Schutz, as well as newer German composers and Bruckner.

Riedel was one of the founders and president of the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » , from 1868 until his death, at the age of 60.

...

Carl Riedel - auch : Karl (geboen 6. Oktober 1827 in Cronenberg ; gestorben 3. Juni 1888 in Leipzig) war ein deutscher Kapellmeister und Komponist.

Riedel war ursprünglich Seidenfärber. Karl Wilhelm entdeckte sein musikalische Begabung in der Krefelder Liedertafel und förderte ihn. 1849 bis 1852 studierte Riedel am Konservatorium zu Leipzig, der heutigen Hochschule für Musik und Theater « Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy » Leipzig. Anschließend blieb er hier als Lehrer des Klavierspiels und der Theorie.

Seine Zeitgenossen sahen sein Hauptverdienst in der Gründung (1854) und Leitung des nach ihm benannten Gesangvereins für geistliche Musik (Riedel-Verein) , der in seinen regelmäßigen Aufführungen Pionierleistungen vollbrachte nicht allein durch Werke von Johann Sebastian Bach (H-Moll Messe, 1859) , Georg Friedrich Händel, und Ludwig van Beethoven (Missa solemnis, 1860) , sondern auch kirchliche Tonwerke der vorbachschen Zeit sowie der damaligen Gegenwart zur Aufführung brachte und infolgedessen eine gewisse Berühmtheit erlangte. 1859 sang der Chor die Uraufführung der Graner Festmesse von Franz Liszt, 1872 bei der Grundsteinlegung des Bayreuther Festspielhauses unter Richard Wagners Leitung die 9. Sinfonie von Beethoven.

Für die Literatur des Chorgesanges hat Riedel Werke geschaffen, die bleibende Bedeutung erhielten, etwa durch Veröffentlichung seiner Bergischen Weihnachtslegenden. Aber auch seine recht eigenwillige Bearbeitung der Passionsmusiken von Heinrich Schütz, die die Schütz-Renaissance vorwegnahm, die Herausgabe der Weihnachtslieder von Michaël Praetorius (Den die Hirten lobeten sehre, Es ist ein Ros entsprungen) , der altböhmischen Hussitenlieder sowie der Eccardschen Preußischen Festlieder waren von Bedeutung. Bis heute viel gesungen werden aus den altböhmischen Liedern die Weihnachtslieder Kommet, ihr Hirten, das sowohl im Evangelischen Gesangbuch (EG 48) wie in einigen Diözesananhängen des Gotteslob zu finden ist, und Freu dich, Erd und Sternenzelt.

Riedel war Mitbegründer des Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikvereins und übernahm 1869 dessen Präsidium von Franz Brendel. 1871 wurde er Vorsitzender des Leipziger Wagner-Vereins.

An seinem Geburtshaus Hütter Straße Nummer 4 wurde eine Gedenktafel angebracht.

Auszeichnungen

1864 erhielt er den Professorentitel durch Herzog Ernst I. von Sachsen-Altenburg.

1883 wurde er von der Universität Leipzig zum Ehrendoktor ernannt.

1884 Herzoglich Sächsischer Kapellmeister.

Werke

Drei bergische Weihnachtslegenden für gemischten Chor.

Zwölf Gesänge für Männerchor.

Nachtgesang - Tonstück für Streichorchester (1887) .

Altböhmische Gesänge für gemischten Chor.

Historia des Leidens und Sterbens unseres Herrn und Heilandes Jesu Christi : Chöre und Recitative aus den 4 « Passionen » von Heinrich Schütz. Zusammengestellt und herausgeber von Carl Riedel, Siegel, Leipzig (1870) .

Die sieben Worte unseres lieben Erlösers und Seligmachers Jesu Christi, so er am Stamm des heiligen Kreuzes gesprochen, ganz beweglich gesetzt von Heinrich Schütz. Herausgeber von Carl Riedel, Siegel, Leipzig (1872) .

Josef Standthartner

Doctor Josef (Johann Nepomuck Vincenz) Standthartner was born on 4 February 1818 in Troppau, Austrian Moravian Silesia (now, Opava Moravskoslezsky, in the Czech Republic) ; and died after a long and serious illness, on 28 August 1892 (shortly before midnight) , at his home in the « Alsergrund » district of Vienna. He was buried at « Heiligenstadter Friedhof » .

He was the son of Leopold Standthartner et Johanna Nepomuck Schönaich.

He was the husband of Wilhelmina (« Minna ») Josefa Khym Standthartner (1819-1900) , widow Schönaich.

1897 : « “ Frau ” Schönaich married the famous physician, Doctor Standthartner, director of the largest hospital in Vienna. She received in her salon the principal artists and greatest musicians of the time. » (Henry-Louis de La Grange)

The Home of Doctor and Mrs. Josef Standthartner was at the corner of « Seilerstätte » and « Singerstraße » , in the 1st district of Vienna.

Standthartner was the Imperial and Royal Councillor and Head physician and Director of Vienna's General Hospital. He was the personal physician (« Leibarzt ») of Empress Elizabeth of Austria (wife of Emperor Franz-Josef) .

He was a major benefactor of the composer Richard Wagner, the libretto of whose Opera « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » having had its 1st public reading in the parlor of Doctor and Mrs. Standthartner's apartment.

He was also a staunch supporter of Anton Bruckner.

He was the Director of the board of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna ; and the vice-President of the « Rudolfiner-Verein » .

Standthartner was the father of Mathilde Maria Wilhelmina Josefa Standthartner Schnabel (1856-?) .

Honours

Knight of the Order of the Iron Crown.

Knight of the Royal Prussian Red Eagle Order (3rd class) .

Comthur of the Royal Bavarian Michael Order.

Order of Christ of Portugal.

Order of the Ernestine House of Saxony.

North Star of the Hawk of Weimar.

Commander of Isabelle of Northern Spain.

Takowa Order of Serbia.

Standhartner and Wagner

Adrian Williams. « Portrait of Liszt by Himself and his Contemporaries » , Clarendon Press, Oxford, United Kingdom (1990) ...

The German-Bohemian pianist August Stradal (1860-1930) , who was a pupil of Liszt, reports in 1885 :

« One morning, when Doctor Standhartner, the long-standing friend of Wagner, Schönaich, the well-known writer on music, and I were at the Master's (Franz Liszt) . Anton Bruckner appeared. He was wearing an old-fashioned tail-coat and, in his hand, held an Opera hat. His clothes were not quite up to date, for, with the coat, he wore short grey leggings out of which peeped a pair of enormous boots. A smile came over all faces, especially when Bruckner addressed Liszt humbly with the words, " Your Grace, ' Herr ' Canon ". He had come to ask Liszt to recommend a performance of his 7th Symphony at the " Karlsruhe Tonkünstler-Versammlung " (under Felix Mottl) . Liszt apparently found Bruckner's request difficult to refuse. It was no longer possible to include the whole work, however, as the programme had already been drawn-up. Otherwise amenable to all requests, he seemed to find Bruckner's reiterated entreaties disagreeable. At this short meeting between the 2 Masters, I felt that Liszt had no great liking for Bruckner as a composer. To be sure, I remember that, on saying farewell, he showed Bruckner great friendliness, promising that, if it were still possible, he would comply with his request. But at the " Tonkünstler-Versammlung ", only the Adagio of the Symphony was played. After the return from Karlsruhe to Weimar, Liszt did indeed express a favourable opinion of the Adagio, but, all the same, one had the impression that the work did not impress him particularly.

Before leaving Vienna, Bruckner visited the Musicians' Society (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») . Anton Rubinstein, who was in the Austrian capital to attend rehearsals of his Opera " Nero ", also turned-up that evening, as did Johannes Brahms, the Society's honorary president. »

...

Doktor Josef Standthartner : Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofrath und Primararzt im allgemeinen Krankenhause, Directionsmitglied der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Vicepräsident des Rudolfiner-Vereines, Ritter des Ordens der eisernen Krone, Ritter des königlich preussischen rothen Adlerordens dritter Classe, Comthur des königlich bayrischen

Michaelsordens, des portugiesischen Christusordens, des Sachsen-Ernestinischen Hausordens, des Sachsen-Weimarischen Falkenordens mit dem Stern, Commandeur des spanischen Isabellenordens und des serbischen Takowa Ordens, am 28. August, kurz vor Mitternacht, versehen mit den Tröstungen der heiligen Religion, nach langem, schweren Leiden, selig in dem Herrn entschlafen ist.

Die entseelte Hülle des theuren Verblichenen wird Dienstag, den 30. Dieses Monats, präcise 3 Uhr Nachmittags vom Trauerhause : IX. , Alserstrasse Nummer 4, in die Pfarrkirche zur allerheil. Dreifaltigkeit in der Alserstrasse geführt, daselbst feierlich eingeseget und sodann auf dem Friedhofe zu Heiligenstadt im eigenen Grabe zur ewige Ruhe bestattet.

Die heilige Seelenmesse wird Mittwoch, den 31. Dieses Monats, um 9 Uhr Früh in obgenannter Pfarrkirche gelesen.

(Wien, am 29. August 1892.)

Professor Doktor Isidor Schnabel, ... Gustav Schönaich, als Schwiegersohn ... Franz Schönaich, Karl Schnabel, ... Kaiserlich und Königlich Generalmajor, Rosa Schnabel, ... Mathilde Schnabel, geborene Standthartner, als Enkel ... als Kinder.

Selected Texts

Selected texts from « Richard Wagner, My Life » (translated by Andrew Gay) , edited by Mary Whittall, Cambridge University Press, Cambridge, United Kingdom (1983) .

1861 :

« I stopped 1st of all at Karlsruhe for another interview with the Grand Duke, was accorded the same friendly reception, and got permission to engage in Vienna those singers I might need for a model performance of “ Tristan ” at the theatre, in Karlsruhe. Armed with this command, I went on to Vienna, where I stayed at the Archduke Karl and awaited the fulfilment of a promise “ Kapellmeister ” Esser had made by letter to put on a few performances of my Operas for me. It was here I 1st heard my “ Lohengrin ” performed on the stage. Although the Opera had already been given very frequently, the whole ensemble got together for the complete rehearsal I had requested. The Orchestra immediately played the Prelude with such beauty and warmth, and the voices of the singers and their other good qualities were displayed to such good advantage in the performance of a work they already knew well that, overcome by these impressions, I lost all inclination to criticize any aspect of the production. People seemed to notice how deeply moved I was and, to Doctor Hanslick, this no doubt appeared the proper moment to have himself amicably introduced to me, while I was sitting on the stage and listening ; I greeted him shortly as if he were entirely unknown to me, whereupon the tenor Ander introduced him to me again with the comment that this was my old-acquaintance Doctor Hanslick ; I replied laconically that I remembered Doctor Hanslick very well, and turned back to the rehearsal. It seems my Viennese friends now had the same experience as previously my London acquaintances, when they had tried to direct my attention to the most fearsome critic and found me disinclined to any such gesture. This fellow, who, then still a young student, had attended one of the 1st performances of “ Tannhäuser ” , in Dresden, and had written about the work with glowing enthusiasm, had since developed into one of the most vicious opponents of my work, as had been amply demonstrated on the occasion of productions of my Operas, in Vienna. Those members of the Opera company well-disposed toward me seemed, henceforth, to have no greater concern than to effect a reconciliation between me and this critic ; as they did not succeed, those who ascribed to the enmity thus aroused the ensuing failure of every undertaking in which I counted on Viennese support may not have been far wrong. I was able to go about the real business I had in mind. The academic young of Vienna had wanted to do me the honour of a torchlight procession, but I declined this, thereby gaining Esser's wholehearted approval, in particular. Together with the highest authorities at the Opera, he began considering how these triumphs could be exploited. I presented myself to Count Lanskoronsky, Comptroller of the Imperial Court, who had been described to me as a strange man who knew absolutely nothing about art and its requirements. When I submitted my appeal that he should give the principal singers at his Opera House, namely " Frau " Dustmann (formerly, Luise Meyer) , " Herr " Beck, as well as possibly " Herr " Ander, leave at some future time to participate in the performance of " Tristan " I was planning for Karlsruhe, the old gentleman replied dryly that this would not be possible. He thought it far more reasonable, given the fact that I was satisfied with his ensemble, to give my new work in Vienna. I promptly lost the courage necessary to oppose this proposition.

As I was descending the steps of the " Hofburg " meditating about this new turn of events, I was met at the gate by a stately gentleman of unusually sympathetic countenance, who offered to conduct me in his carriage to my hotel. This was Josef Standhartner, a famous society doctor and an earnest devotee of music, destined henceforth to be a staunch friend for life. »

1861 :

« On my last visit to Vienna, Kolatschek had called on me to offer the hospitality of his house if I should ever return for a longer stay, in order to spare me the unpleasantness of residing in a hotel. For reasons of economy alone, very urgent at the time, I had willingly accepted this offer, and now drove with my luggage directly to the address he had given me. To my astonishment, I discovered at once that it was in a very remote suburb, virtually without any transport to Vienna. Moreover, the house was quite deserted, for Kolatschek had gone off with his family for a summer vacation in Hutteldorf ; with some difficulty, I unearthed an old servant who had been given some vague idea by her employer that I was to be expected. She showed me to a little room where I was to sleep, if I wanted ; there appeared to be no arrangements for laundry or any other service. Greatly put-out by this disappointment, I went back into the city in order to wait for Kolatschek in a " café " near Saint-Stephen's square where, according to the maid, he would show-up at a particular hour. I sat there, for a long time, repeatedly asking after the man I expected to meet, when suddenly I saw Standhartner come in. His utter amazement at finding me here was intensified, as he told me, by the fact that he had never before entered this particular " café ". It was only a peculiar coincidence that had led him there, on this day and at that time. When I informed him of my situation he, at once, became incensed that I should be living in the most remote part of Vienna when I had such urgent business in the middle of the city, and he immediately offered me his own home, which he was about to leave for 6 weeks with his family, as a temporary abode. An attractive niece (Seraphine Mauro) , who was living in the same house with her mother and sister, would take care of breakfast and the necessary services. I would, thus, be able to make myself comfortable with the whole house at my disposal. He jubilantly led me to the house, which had already been vacated by his family to spend their summer holidays in Salzburg. Kolatschek was notified, my bag brought in, and, for several days, I enjoyed Standhartner's company, as well as his splendid hospitality. But I also had to recognize a number of new complications for my situation in the further news my friends gave me. The rehearsals scheduled the previous year, for this time (I had arrived in Vienna on August 14th) , had already been postponed indefinitely, because the tenor Ander had reported trouble with his voice. Upon hearing this, I at once came to the conclusion that my stay in Vienna would be pointless ; yet, I could not think anybody would have any idea where I should turn to pursue any constructive purpose. »

1861 :

« Princess Metternich, who had sensed my difficulty in these matters when I left Paris, had recommended me most heartily in Vienna to the family of Count Nakos, of whose wife she had spoken to me with particular emphasis. I had now also made the acquaintance through Standhartner, during the few days I spent with him before he left, of young Prince Rudolf Liechtenstein, known to his friends solely as “ Rudi ”. He had been commended warmly to me as a fervent admirer of my music by his doctor, with whom he was on close terms. I often met him for meals at the Archduke Karl after Standhartner had rejoined his family, and there we agreed upon a plan to visit Count Alakos at his Estate, Schwarzau, some distance away. »

1861 :

« While this whole “ Tristan ” affair was running its endless course like some chronic illness, Standhartner had returned at the end of September with his family. Consequently, the next thing I had to do was to look about for a residence, which I found in the Hôtel Empress Elizabeth. Through my cordial association with my friend's family, I got to know his wife (Wilhelmina) and 3 stepsons (Gustav, Karl and Franz) , as well as a daughter (Wilhelmina) from her 1st marriage, plus another daughter (Mathilde) from her 2nd with Standhartner. With regard to my stay in this congenial home, I would henceforth greatly miss the kindly care devoted to me by the aforementioned niece Seraphine, who was not only tireless in her solicitude but also an amusing companion. Because of her dainty figure and hair always curled “ à l'enfant ”, I had named her “ the doll ”. Now, I found it more difficult to get along in a gloomy hotel room. My living expenses also increased severely. »

1862 :

« My only worry was to arrange things so that I could leave Vienna and transfer to Paris in a dignified way. In this, an arrangement made through the Standhartners' intermediation, involving an offer by the management to pay me a part of the fee stipulated for “ Tristan ”, seemed to afford some help. »

1862 :

« In Mainz, I saw Friederike Meyer again. As I was also about to leave for Vienna, she was pleased to be able to make part of the journey with me, because she expected to stop for 1 day in Nuremberg where I could meet her for the rest of the trip. This, we did and arrived in Vienna together, where she went to the Hôtel Munsch, while I again took up residence in my already familiar Empress Elizabeth. Friederike's own condition soon aroused my most intense concern. She had contracted for 3 guest performances at the " Burgtheater " without bearing in mind how unfit she was, at that time, to make a favourable impression in the theater, particularly before a Viennese audience ; the severe sickness from which she had recovered only in the most turbulent circumstances had disfigured her by making her unduly thin ; in addition, her head had grown virtually bald, and, yet, she insisted on refusing to use a wig. The enmity of her sister had alienated the members of the " Burgtheater " company, and as a result of all this, as well as an inept choice of roles, her appearances were a failure, and there could be no question of a permanent engagement. Although she grew steadily weaker and suffered from constant insomnia, she still tried to conceal her true situation from me out of courageous reticence. At a somewhat cheaper inn, The City of Frankfurt, she now intended, as she did not seem to be embarrassed for funds, to spare her nerves as much as possible and await an improvement : at my request, she summoned Standhartner, who didn't seem to be able to help her very much.

While these matters involved me in all sorts of difficult complications, I had been keeping-up my old acquaintances in Vienna. A strange incident had occurred at the outset of this visit. I was to read my " Meistersinger " for the Standhartner family, just as I had done everywhere else : since " Herr " Hanslick was now considered a friend of mine, they thought it would be a good idea to invite him as well ; but, here, we noticed in the course of the reading that this fearsome critic became constantly paler and angrier, and remarkably enough, when the reading was over he could not be persuaded to remain for a time, but departed at once in obvious vexation. My friends all concluded that Hanslick had interpreted the entire libretto as a pasquinade directed at him and our invitation to the reading as an insult. And the critic's attitude toward me indeed underwent a highly-noticeable change from that evening forward and turned into bitter enmity, the results of which we were soon to see. »

1862 :

« I recognized Madame Kalergis, who had just arrived to spend some time in Vienna, being motivated, I fondly hoped, by the desire to do something for me as well. As she was also a friend of Standhartner, she got together with him at once to consider how I could be helped-out of the critical situation I was in, once again, as a result of the heavy expenses of the concerts. She herself had stated to our mutual friend that she had no funds at her disposal and could only meet special expenditures by going into debt. Thus, richer patrons needed to be enlisted. Chief among these was Baroness von Stockhausen, wife of the Hanoverian minister : as a very intimate friend of Standhartner, she was warmly attached to my cause, and also won over Lady Bloomfield together with her husband, the English ambassador. There was a " soirée " at the residence of the latter, as well as several evening parties at the house of " Frau " von Stockhausen. One day, Standhartner delivered 500 guilders to me from an anonymous donor to help cover my expenses. Madame Kalergis managed to scrape together 1,000 guilders, and these were also turned over to me by Standhartner for my subsequent needs. In her efforts to interest the Court in me, however, she remained unsuccessful, despite her close friendship with Countess Zamoiska. »

1863 :

« After the marked success of my 1st concert, I received some approaches from those circles to which, as now became clear to me, I had been secretly but strongly recommended by Marie Kalergis. My unseen patroness had most circumspectly prepared my introduction to the Grand Duchess Helene. I was instructed 1st of all to make use of a recommendation from Standhartner to the Grand Duchess's personal physician, Doctor Arneth, whom he had known in Vienna, and who, in turn, could introduce me to her most trusted lady-in-waiting, "Fräulein" von Rhaden. I would have been well content to make the acquaintance of this lady alone, for in her I found a woman of wide culture, great intelligence and noble bearing, whose increasingly earnest interest in me was admixed with a certain anxiety, which seemed to pertain to some worry about the Grand Duchess. It struck me that she felt something more should be done for me than could plausibly be expected from the Grand Duchess, her temperament and character being what they were. I was still not admitted directly to this exalted person, but rather received 1st an invitation to an evening party in the quarters of the chief lady-in-waiting, at which among others the Grand Duchess would also be present. »

1863 :

« In the company of my gun-dog named Pohl, one of the most loveable and excellent animals that ever became attached to me, I undertook long walks every day, for which the extremely pleasant neighbourhood afforded admirable opportunities. Otherwise, I remained more or less alone for a time, as Tausig had been confined to his bed by a severe illness for an extended period, and Cornelius was suffering from an injured foot as a result of having jumped down carelessly from an omnibus when visiting Penzing. I continued my amicable association with Standhartner and his family. »

1863-1864 :

« I was able to spend New Year's Eve with the Standhartners in a confident mood and enjoy a poem specially written for the occasion by Cornelius, which was equally humorous and appropriate.

But the new year of 1864 soon assumed an increasingly ominous aspect. I fell ill with a rapidly worsening, painful catarrhal malady, which necessitated my making frequent demands on Standhartner's care. »

1864 :

« Now, it became clear to me that under these circumstances I could no longer maintain my position in Vienna or my establishment in Penzing, because there was not only no prospect of earning any money even on a temporary basis, but, also, my short-term debts had mounted to such an ominous height under the well-known system of usury that without some extraordinary assistance my very person was actually threatened. In this situation, I turned in utter frankness, at 1st only for advice, to Eduard Liszt, the youthful uncle of my old friend Franz and a judge at the Imperial Provincial Court. During my 1st stay in Vienna, he had commended himself to me as a warmly devoted friend, who would always be willing to do me a favour. As far as the redemption of my short-term bills was concerned, he could see no way out other than to find a rich benefactor who would settle with the creditors. For a time, he believed that a certain Madame Schöller, a devoted admirer of mine and also the wife of a rich merchant, not only possessed the means but the willingness to use them on my behalf. Standhartner, from whom I concealed nothing, also thought he could do something for me in this regard. By these efforts, my situation was held in a state of suspension for a few more weeks, until it eventually turned-out that the best my friends could do for me was to provide enough money to take what seemed the absolutely necessary step of fleeing to Switzerland, where I would be personally protected until such time as I could raise funds to redeem my bills.

Thoughts of death gripped me so tightly that I lost all desire to shake them off. I set about bequeathing my books and manuscripts, of which Cornelius was to receive a share. Some time previously, I had taken the precaution of commending my household effects remaining in Penzing, now no longer secure, to the protection of Standhartner. As my friends now most urgently recommended that I get ready to flee, I had turned to Otto Wesendonck, given the fact that my path would take me to Switzerland, and asked him to shelter me in his house. He rejected my request categorically : in response, I could not avoid pointing-out how shabbily he was behaving. Now, it was a question of arranging my departure so that it would appear I would be coming back in the near future. In his great anxiety to cover-up my departure, Standhartner had me come to dine at his house, where my servant Franz Mrazek brought me my luggage. I bade a very distressed farewell to him, his wife Anna (should read “ Minna ”) , as well as my good dog Pohl. Standhartner's stepson, Karl Schönaich, who wept from grief, and Cornelius, who, by contrast, was in a frivolous mood, accompanied me to the station, where I departed on the afternoon of March 23rd, to go 1st of all to Munich, where I hoped to be completely unnoticed and have a chance to recuperate for 2 days from the frightful strain of the recent past. I spent those days in the “ Bayerischer Hof ”, from which I undertook a few walks through the city. It was Good Friday : the weather was very bad and seemed to reflect the mood of the entire populace, whom I saw proceeding, from one church to another, in deepest mourning. King Maximilian II, whom the Bavarians had grown to love, had died a few days before, leaving his son to ascend the throne at the youthful but still legitimate age of eighteen and a half. In a display window, I saw a portrait of the young King Ludwig II, and felt that special emotion awakened in us by the sight of beauty and youth being placed in what will presumably be a very difficult situation. Here, I wrote a humorous epitaph for myself and, then, journeyed unmolested over Lake Constance, a refugee, once again, and in need of shelter, and on to Zürich, from where I immediately proceeded to the estate of Doctor Wille, at Mariafeld. »

1864 :

« I got very bad news from Vienna : to protect the household effects, I had left behind in my apartment there, Standhartner had gone so far as to sell them to a Viennese agent, reserving the right to repurchase. To this, I responded in extreme indignation, as I saw my landlord, to whom I had to pay rent within a few days, compromised by this action. Through “ Frau ” Wille, I managed to obtain the money needed to meet this obligation and forwarded it, at once, to Baron Rackowitz. Unfortunately, I learned that Standhartner and Eduard Liszt had done a thorough job of things, having already paid the rent from the proceeds of the furniture and, thereby, cutting-off all possibility of my returning to Vienna, which both believed would be ruinous for me. But when I heard, at the same time, from Cornelius that Tausig, who was then in Hungary and had previously added his endorsement to one of my demand notes, now felt himself prevented by me from going back to Vienna as he wished, I was so deeply upset that I decided on the spot to return there, no matter how great the danger might be. I notified my friends there of this but decided I st to try to provide myself with enough money to be able to offer my creditors a settlement of sorts. »

...

Martin Gregor-Dellin. « Richard Wagner : His Life, His Work, His Century » translated by J. Maxwell Brownjohn, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York, NY (1982) .

1861-1862 :

« Then, he climbed into a 1 horse carriage and drove to Salzburg, reaching Vienna on the following day.

Reality turned-out to be harsher than his recent experiences in the Austrian capital had led him to expect. He had taken everything and everyone too literally. An apartment lent him by the journalist Adolph Kolatschek proved quite unsuited to his needs, and the local theater magnates, Intendant Count Lanskoronsky and Director Matteo Salvi, left him completely in the dark as to when rehearsals of “ Tristan ” could commence.

By a fortunate last-minute coincidence, Wagner bumped into Doctor Standhartner, who was on the point of taking his family abroad. Standhartner offered him the use of his “ Seilerstätte ” apartment for several weeks, complete with the services of his pretty niece, Seraphine Mauro, who lived in the same house and could, therefore, attend to his creature comforts. Half-Italian and half-Viennese, Seraphine had a doll-like face framed by a wealth of dark ringlets that hung down to her ripe young bosom. Wagner could hardly have remained indifferent to the charms that had already enslaved Peter Cornelius, who was tortured with jealousy. For a short while, “ Seraphinchen ” or “ Dolly ” became the sole focus of Wagner's interest in the opposite sex ; so much so that he shunned the company of everyone save Cornelius and Tausig.

1862 :

« It is difficult to guess how the Viennese reacted when Wagner set-out, late in 1862, to build a livelihood in their city on the threadbare promises of a theater manager, and how “ Tristan und Isolde ” would have sounded to Viennese ears had it been performed there. Ander persistently forgot the 1st Act as soon as he turned his attention to the 2nd, and Luise Dustmann, when asked by the conductor, Heinrich Esser, how she managed to memorize her part, is reputed to have answered that his guess was as good as hers. Torn between hope and despair because the singers proved incompetent or were unavailable for rehearsals, Wagner looked for other ways of endearing himself to the Viennese.

On November 23, 1862, he gave a reading of the “ Meistersinger ” libretto at the home of Doctor Standhartner. The latter, obviously with Wagner's consent, had included Eduard Hanslick in the guest list. Hanslick, who left in high-dudgeon when the reading was over, is widely reported to have done so because he recognized himself in Beckmesser or thought the character a deliberate travesty of himself. A more likely assumption is that someone in the know tipped him off to the fact that Beckmesser's name had originally been Hanslich. No one would admit to this indiscretion, of course, and the critic was cynically congratulated on having sat through the reading without losing his temper. Although Hanslick disclaims any annoyance in his memoirs, it is true that most of his subsequent pronouncements on Wagner contained some element of malice. »

1862 :

« Money problems gave him no rest. “ Minna ” was again set-up independently, and his own needs were far from small. No new income would be forthcoming until “ Tristan ” was performed and started on the round of German theaters. News from Vienna's great “ Kärntner ” Opera House was not encouraging. The tenor, Ander, so glorious a “ Lohengrin ”, had become terrified of Tristan's part and was succumbing to a series of strategic indispositions. By mid-August, Wagner was in Vienna and took-up residence in the house of Doctor Standhartner, a Wagner enthusiast and physician to Empress Elizabeth. Tausig formed part of Wagner's Viennese circle, as did Peter Cornelius, to whom had been entrusted the copying of those alterations and transpositions in the part of Tristan indispensable to Ander's recuperation.

In May, a surprise visit to the Wesendonks in Zürich had netted Wagner little, and when, during his Vienna sojourn, they invited him to join them on a Venetian holiday in November, he saw the opportunity of striking again. (Fearful of mentioning Mathilde's name to “ Minna ”, he wrote her that Doctor Standhartner, summoned to Venice for consultation by Empress Elizabeth, had insisted on his companionship during the journey !) The “ Tristan ” project, which he described as dangling on the lax vocal cords of a fatigued tenor, was moribund, and his situation desperate ; plans to import Schnorr or Tichatschek to Vienna had fallen through. But Otto and Mathilde, at the end of their “ largesse ”, were deaf to hints. Poor Bülow, who could barely keep his household together, was soon bothered for a loan. »

1862 :

« Though harsh, his estimate of Wagner is closer to modern criticism than is the indiscriminating adulation of the Wagnerites. As a partisan of the Leipzig school, Hanslick was deaf to many beauties in Wagner's scores and, in respect to Wagner, Berlioz, and Liszt (and, later, Bruckner and Richard Strauß) was unable to surmount an innate conservatism and a prejudice against “ literary ” music. Nonetheless, he could never be accused of intellectual dishonesty. One may disagree with his complaints about Wagner's unvocal writing, boring declamation, orchestral din, clumsiness, monotony, exaggeration of expression, and perpetual modulation ; yet, considering the hysterical excesses of the Wagnerites, he generally kept his temper, his logically presented opinions being based not on emotion but on a thorough study of the score in question. He had had 4 years of theory, composition, and piano with Tomaschek and was thoroughly professional at the keyboard.

Though he fought Wagner vigorously, he never denied him ; if he found little to praise in this music, he nonetheless could extol the beauty of a strong, sincere effort ; if he detested Wagner the man, he found him invulnerable in respect to artistic morality. If Hanslick was at times wrong, he was not unrighteous.

Wagner's attitude toward Hanslick was less dichotomous and generous ; after the “ Lohengrin ” review, he thoroughly loathed him.

The Vienna Opera was well aware of Hanslick's writings on Wagner. Its optimism in planning a production of "Tristan" was an echo of clinking coin at the box-office on Wagner nights. The Viennese public read and respected Hanslick but usually formed its own judgments. Yet, in the case of the novel and uncompromising "Tristan", the management, and especially the cast, felt from the beginning that a Wagner - Hanslick rapprochement would be advantageous. Efforts had been made in this direction by Ander and "Frau" Dustmann. Even Laube was besought to use his influence. But, at arranged "chance" encounters, Wagner was uncivil. Only when Hanslick gallantly remarked to him upon the relationship between misjudgments and personal limitations and declared himself willing to learn, did Wagner seem to respond. But to this call of the critic for social intercourse and friendship, he was to give strange answer when he returned to Vienna from the Rhineland. Ironically, it was probably because of their supposed reconciliation that the "Kärntnertor" Opera House had summoned Wagner back.

Hanslick was subsequently invited to the home of Doctor Standhartner to hear Wagner recite the "Meistersinger" poem (November 23, 1862). At this time, the pedantic, narrow minded character now known to the world as Beckmesser appeared in Wagner's manuscript under the name of Hanslick. Wagner had maliciously trapped the critic in a barbarously contrived situation. Pale and upset, Hanslick fled the reading as soon as he could, Wagner doubtlessly finding the whole affair vastly amusing. As Hans Sachs, he had acted-out the last act of "Meistersinger" and sent the cantankerous Marker fleeing the scene of contest. He wanted no mercies from the critics. Success would come from the Folk, from those with no knowledge of the musty Tabulatur. »

1863 :

« Wagner had visited Vienna for a few days, in May and June, to gather-up his servants (the Mrazeks) and the dog, to pay the most urgent debts, and to repurchase what could be located of his auctioned possessions. In a fury against friends who had faithfully acted to protect what they could of his property from the Viennese deluge he himself had let loose, he blamed them for his losses and wrote Mathilde Maier of their "unbelievable stupidity". Cornelius especially aroused his ire by refusing an invitation to settle permanently with him in Bavaria. In his strange way, he loved Peter. During the dark hours at Mariafeld, he had gloomily written to Doctor Standhartner in Vienna, "One thing ! Send Peter to me soon ! He must share all sorrow with me. Only death must he leave to me alone ; he need only be close by !" Now, he found it incomprehensible that Peter preferred work on his Opera "Le Cid" to the post of jester at the new Wagnerian court. Wagner was becoming more and more intractable. The opposing side of a problem had never been within his vision ; now, even the middle ground was blurring. One was either for or against him, and to be for him implied a complete sacrifice of personal desires. Cornelius reflected that he was treating old friends "like bootblacks". In a mood of deep resentment, Wagner had stormed Wotan like from Vienna to take-up residence at Villa Pellet.

He was lonely ; the house was desolate, his bed unshared, the rarefied air enveloping his interviews with the King left him gasping. »

...

Ronald Taylor. « Richard Wagner : His Life, Art and Thought » , Taplinger Publishing Company, New York, NY (1979) .

1862 :

« Sitting in a “ café ” on the “ Stephansplatz ” the next afternoon, he suddenly saw a man enter whom he had met earlier in the year, when he had been in Vienna to look for singers for “ Tristan ”. The man was, personal physician to the Empress Elizabeth and an enthusiastic follower of Wagner's music. He insisted that Wagner should come and stay with him while his family was away, and Wagner made Standhartner's house his own for over a month, visiting the aristocracy, making new acquaintances, like that of the dramatist Friedrich Hebbel, discussing the world with his old friend Heinrich Laube again, now director of the Vienna “ Burgtheater ”, and trying to get “ Tristan ” finally performed.

But nothing went right. Suitable singers, above all a tenor for the title role, were either unavailable, like Tichatschek and Schnorr von Carolsfeld, or diplomatically “ indisposed ” ; the music was again adjudged unplayable, and the whole opera unperformable. “ It became clear to me ”, he said in “ Mein Leben ”, “ that my position was utterly desolate. The whole world seemed to have given-up interest in me. ” The same self-pitying tone fills a long letter to “ Minna ” at the time : “ My new works are far, far in advance of the time and far beyond the capabilities of our theatres. Nobody asks for me. I shall have to start again from the very beginning. ”

When the Standhartner family returned from vacation, Wagner moved into the “ Kaiserin ” Elizabeth Hôtel, in the “ Weihburggasse ”, which quickly proved far too expensive. At the invitation of the Wesendonks, he spent a week with them in Venice, then returned to Vienna. But this time with a new purpose in mind - to carry “ Die Meistersinger ” through to the end. In November, he wrote a fresh scenario - in December, back in Paris at the invitation of the Metternichs, he started the poem, and the complete libretto was ready by the end of the following January. »

1862-1863 :

« But less than 5 months later this, together with the remains of sundry fees and loans, had disappeared, most of it swallowed-up by the expenses of a large, handsome apartment in a villa at Penzing, some 5 minutes ride from the beautiful palace of Schönbrunn, just outside Vienna. Biebrich had become petty and provincial, no place from which to launch an offensive against the theatrical establishment of Europe. The choice of Vienna was motivated by 2 thoughts : one was the lingering hope of seeing “ Tristan ” performed there ; the other, as he put it in “ Mein Leben ”, was because “ with no other German city had I developed so close an artistic relationship ”. Here, in the company of Cornelius, Tausig, Standhartner and others, and waited upon by a servant couple who remained faithful to him for a number of years, he celebrated his 50th birthday in grand style. “ Wagner is just like a child when he has money in his pocket ”, said the Viennese conductor Heinrich Esser, who was to have directed the 1st performance of “ Tristan ”, “ and it does not seem to enter his head that it will not last for ever. And, then, he claims that he cannot work at all unless his rooms are luxurious and unless he has exclusive use of a large garden - in a word, unless he can live like a lord. ” »

1864 :

« Wagner liked neither Brahms the man nor Brahms the composer (though many of Brahms' greatest works were yet to come - the 4 Symphonies, the Violin Concerto, the B-flat major Piano Concerto, the Clarinet Quintet - they would hardly have changed Wagner's opinion) . Together with Tausig, Peter Cornelius and Weissheimer, Brahms had corrected the orchestral parts for Wagner's concerts in Vienna, in 1862-1863, but this counted for little. The 2 men had met only once, in February 1864, when Doctor Standhartner brought Brahms to Wagner's house, in Penzing. Musically, there was hardly a single point of contact between them. Brahms had gone to “ Das Rheingold ” and “ Die Walküre ” in Munich, in 1870, but later was known to dissuade his pupils from concerning themselves with Wagner's music. In 1875, there was to be an unpleasant “ contretemps ” between them when Brahms, who, back in the 1860's, had received as a present from Tausig the manuscript of Wagner's new “ Venusberg ” scene for the Paris “ Tannhäuser ” of 1861, refused to return it for Wagner to publish. Eventually, he did, but only in return for a copy of the “ de luxe ” edition of “ Das Rheingold ”. In her diary, Cosima makes no effort to disguise her and Wagner's scorn for the “ crude, boorish ” man and his “ mediocre ” music. »

1864 :

« The press was equally consistent in its hostility, although faced with the growing public acceptance of Wagner's music, less sure of itself than a few years earlier. Much of his free time Wagner spent in the company of old friends, like Semper and Doctor Standhartner, and of more recent acquaintances, among them the painter Hans Makart. »

1881 :

« His health weakened, his energy diminished (the doctors failed to ascribe his frequent chest pains to a heart condition) Wagner now worked more slowly. Cosima, who begins almost every entry in her diary with a sentence on how her husband had slept, still records a large number of nights disturbed by pains and discomforts of one kind or another, or by strange and often unpleasant dreams. But his will lost none of its power, and he still dominated the social evenings at “ Wahnfried ”. Old friends came - Carl Brandt, who was to control the stage machinery for “ Parsifal ” but who died before seeing his work accomplished ; the Munich painter Franz von Lenbach, who made a number of famous portraits of Wagner and his circle : Karl Ritter, from his Dresden days ; Doctor Standhartner, from Vienna ; the Countess Marie von Schleinitz and her husband ; Liszt, of course, who stayed at the house for a number of days each time, and Malwida von Meysenbug. »

1883 :

« The hearse, drawn by 4 horses, moved-off on its mile-long journey down into the centre of the town, up past the old Margraves' Opera House and on to the Villa “ Wahnfried ”. By the side of the carriage walked the 12 men who were to bear the body to its last resting-place - Feustel, Muncker, Adolf Groß, Wolzogen, Joukovsky, Anton Seidl, August Wilhelmj, leader of the Bayreuth Orchestra, Heinrich Porges, Hermann Levi, Hans Richter, Doctor Josef Standhartner from Vienna, and the singer Albert Niemann (the Berlin “ Tristan ” of 1876 and the 1st Siegmund, at Bayreuth) . Crowds lined the route ; men, women, even children. »

...

Hans Gál. « Richard Wagner » , translated by Hans-Hubert Schönzeler, Stein and Day, New York, NY (1976) .

1864 :

« Thanks to the memoirs of Wendelin Weissheimer, who was constantly in Wagner's company during the Vienna concerts, in the winter of 1861-1862, we know of another pretty and typically Wagnerian episode :

Wagner had been staying at his hotel for 2 months. He was still hoping for the payment which was to be made to him after the 1st performance of “ Tristan ”, but it did not arrive - the proprietor became worried and sent him one bill after the other. When one evening, together with Tausig, I went to visit him, he was full of woe and bemoaned his miserable position. Full of sympathy, we listened to him and sat on the sofa in deep depression, while he was pacing up and down in nervous haste. Suddenly, he stopped dead and said :“ Ah, now I know what is missing and what I need.” He ran to the door and rang the bell loudly. The waiter finally appeared, slowly and with hesitation, for these people soon know which way the wind is blowing, and he was no less amazed than we were when Wagner ordered :“ Will you bring us immediately 2 bottles of champagne on ice ! ” - “ For God's sake, in this situation ! ”, we cried out when the waiter had left again. But he gave us a fervent lecture on the absolute necessity of champagne, especially in desperate situations - only champagne could help one to overcome such embarrassments. If you associated with Wagner you went from surprise to surprise. When I entered his room next morning, he showed me 1,000 guilders which the Empress had sent him, presumably at the instigation of Doctor Standhartner (Wagner's friend and personal physician to Empress Elizabeth) .

Talking of champagne, let us just mention by the way that when Wagner's Penzing home was compulsorily auctioned-off, the contents included 100 bottles of that precious liquid. There is no record, however, of whether Wagner had ever paid for them. »

...

Ernest Newman. « Wagner As Man & Artist » , Tudor Publishing Co. , New York, NY (1937) .

1862 :

« ... solely to his limitations ; and that to widen the boundaries of his knowledge he desired nothing more ardently than to learn from me. These explanations were made with such an explosion of feeling that I could do nothing but try to soothe his grief, and promise him my unreserved sympathy with his work in future. Shortly after my departure from Vienna, I heard that Hanslick had praised me and my amiability in unmeasured terms.

Whether Wagner's account of the interview is strictly accurate or not, we have no means of knowing ; but the story, even as he tells it, indicates that Hanslick was not, at this time, a hopelessly prejudiced or evil-natured antagonist. In November 1862, they met again at the house of Doctor Standhartner, in Vienna. Wagner read the “ Meistersinger ” poem to the company.

As Doctor Hanslick was now supposed to be reconciled with me, they thought they had done the right thing in inviting him also. We noticed that, as the reading went on, the dangerous critic became paler and more and more out of humour ; and it was noticed that, at the end, he could not be persuaded to stay, but took his leave, at once, with an unmistakable air of irritation. My friends all agreed that Hanslick regarded the whole poem as a pasquinade against himself, and the invitation to listen to it as an outrage. And truly from that evening the critic's attitude towards me underwent a striking change ; it ended in an intensified enmity, of the consequences of which we were soon made aware.

The touching innocence of it, the air of perfect candour, of conscious rectitude, of surprise that men should be found so base as Hanslick proved himself to be ! Would it be believed from this ingenuous record that Wagner had given Hanslick the most unmistakable cause of offense ? It may have occurred to more than one reader to ask how Hanslick managed to recognize a caricature of himself in Beckmesser. It is hardly likely that he could have done so from the poem alone. We may be tolerably sure he had something more to go upon.

We possess three prose sketches of the “ Meistersinger ” libretto. The 1st was made in 1845, the 2nd and 3rd ; there is hardly any difference between the two, in the winter of 1861. The actual libretto was written in Paris, in November 1861 and January 1862. In the 2nd sketch, the Marker is given the name of “ Hanslich ”. In the 3rd, he becomes “ Veit Hanslich ”. In these 2 later sketches, the Marker is drawn with a perceptibly harsher hand. That the conferring of this name on the Marker was something more than a passing joke is shown by its appearing in both sketches, and not merely in the list of “ dramatis personae ”, but written-out in full throughout. These 2 sketches were made, as we have seen, after the 1st meeting of Wagner and Hanslick in Vienna, in 1861. With an author so fond of reading his own works to his friends as Wagner was, it is incredible that news of Hanslick being satirized as the pedantic Marker in the forthcoming Opera should not have spread through musical Vienna, and have reached the critic's ears. His feeling, therefore, at the party in November 1862, that the shaft was aimed at himself may safely be put down not so much to his own intuition as to either a pre-suspicion or a knowledge of the truth. He would be quite justified, then, in regarding the invitation to be present at the reading as an insult. But even if we allow no weight at all to this theory, in spite of its inherent probability, what are we to think of Wagner's later conduct ? He tells us more than once of Hanslick's enmity towards him ; he makes no mention of himself having treated Hanslick, in the “ Meistersinger ” sketches, in a way that the critic and his friends could only regard as insulting. Hanslick was, of course, hopelessly wrong about Wagner, the musician ; but after Wagner's brusque treatment of him whenever he met him, and after the attempt to ridicule him in the “ Meistersinger ”, who will say that Hanslick was under any obligation to be fond of Wagner the man ? Yet, it is only Wagner's side of the case, as usual, that is given us in “ Mein Leben ”.

The autobiography, then, has to be used with caution : not that Wagner, I suppose, often consciously perverted the truth, but that it was impossible for him to believe he was ever in the wrong in his judgments of other people. »

1861 :

« After the disastrous “ Tannhäuser ” performances, in March 1861, Wagner fluctuated for a while between Paris, Karlsruhe and Vienna, at length settling down on the 14th August in the last named city, where it was proposed to produce “ Tristan ”. “ Minna ” had gone to Soden for a cure, on the 10th July : from there, she went on to Dresden once more. In Vienna, Wagner had the loan of Doctor Standhartner's house, for some weeks, during the physician's absence. His wants were attended to by a “ pretty niece ” of Standhartner's. This pretty niece was one Seraphine Mauro. According to Kapp's book “ Richard Wagner und die Frauen ”, “ Wagner was not insensible to so much beauty in his daily surroundings, and his “ dear little doll ” (“ Puppe ”), as he always called Seraphine, did not let him sigh in vain. The suffering in this affair of Wagner's fell upon his friend Peter Cornelius, who had lost his heart to the beautiful Seraphine, some time before.

Standhartner having returned to Vienna, at the end of September, Wagner had to leave his comfortable quarters, and as there seemed no prospect of an early performance of “ Tristan ”, and life at a hotel was expensive, he accepted an invitation from the Wesendoncks to meet them in Venice. He remained there only 4 days - “ 4 miserable days ”, he calls them. How unbridgeable was the gulf made between him and “ Minna ” by the memory of the Mathilde affair of 3 years before may be estimated from his letters to his wife of 19th October and 13th November 1861. The 1st is sensible and tender ; he is full of pity for the poor suffering woman, and will gladly do anything in his power to alleviate her misery - anything, that is, but give-up the Wesendonck acquaintance. He still has plans for a reunion, and a quiet old age to be spent together. But as a preliminary to any rapprochement he insists, as he had always done, on her consenting never again to mention the name of Mathilde, for whom, he declares, his passion has from beginning to end been absolutely pure. Of all the tragedies of Wagner's life, this surely is the greatest, that his one noble love, the one that was so necessary to him as an artist, to which we owe “ Tristan ” and many of the finest moods of the “ Meistersinger ” and “ Parsifal ”, should have been the one to embitter his existence and his wife's beyond all hope of remedy while his less worthy attachments were either unknown to “ Minna ” or counted for little with her. With Wagner obstinately resolved not to give-up the Wesendonck acquaintance, and “ Minna ” (blind to the true nature of the attachment, and seeing it, in all probability, merely as another Lausot affair) as obstinately bent on making the cessation of this acquaintance a condition of a full reconciliation with her husband, it was impossible that the breach between the 2 tortured and self-torturing souls should ever be healed. That Wagner dreaded giving “ Minna ” any cause to be reminded of Mathilde's name is evident from the sophisticated version he gives her of his Venice excursion, in his letter of 13th November 1861 : we can only regard as a piece of well-meant fiction his story that Doctor Standhartner, having been summoned in haste, as deputy physician in ordinary, to attend the Empress of Austria in Venice, had pressingly insisted upon Wagner accompanying him for his health's sake. “ I returned early this morning. I hope it has done me good ; at least, I had no talking to do for several days, but only to go sight-seeing, which really benefitted me. ” Not a word, it will be observed, as to having gone to Venice at the request of the Wesendoncks, or even as to their being in Venice, at that time. »

1862 :

« When Wagner is settled at Sternberg under the protection of King Ludwig II of Bavaria, Cornelius is, again, to come live with him and be his love. They are to live in the same house ; Cornelius can bring his piano, and there is a box of cigars awaiting him - yet, each is to maintain his own independence. “ Exactly 2 years ago, I ardently expected you in Biebrich : for a long time, I had no news of you, and then I suddenly learned from a 3rd person that you had let Tausig take you off to Geneva. You have never fully known how deeply this put me out of humour. Nothing of that sort must happen this time ; but we must be open with each other, like men. ” He knew that Cornelius was working at his Opera “ Le Cid ”, and doubted whether he could do this as well in Wagner's proximity as apart from him. Wagner will have it that Cornelius can work at “ Le Cid ” and he at his “ Meistersinger ” in their common home ; he is willing and anxious, indeed, to advise his friend about his Opera. “ Either you accept my invitation immediately ”, he concludes, “ and settle yourself for your whole life in the same house with me, or - you disdain me, and expressly abjure all desire to unite yourself with me. In the latter case I abjure you also root and branch (' ganz und vollständig '), and never admit you again in any way into my life. From this, you can guess one thing - how sorely I need peace. And this makes it necessary for me to know definitely where I stand : my present connection with you tortures me horribly. It must either become complete, or be utterly severed ! ”

Cornelius hesitated, as well he might, to give himself up body and soul to this devouring flame of a man ; he knew Wagner, and knew what sacrifices a friendship of his kind meant for the friend. Wagner was very angry with him for not accepting the invitation, at once. He came to Vienna to liquidate his debts with the 135,000 « Gulden » placed at his disposal for that purpose by the King and, generally, to put his affairs in order. Asked by Seraphine Mauro, the object of his visit to the city, he curtly replied, “ To quarrel with my friends. ” Heinrich Porges and his brother had called upon Wagner, but Cornelius did not go. “ There were such scenes ”, he writes to his brother Carl on 15th June, “ and tears of rage and despair over my conduct : no answer to his letter ; my “ Cid ” had “ miscarried ”, he could put everything in order, go through it all cordially and calmly with me ; at Sternberg, etc. , etc. , pianoforte ready ; a box full of cigars ; Peter as man and artist, etc. , etc. ” He saw Standhartner, who advised him, in case he did not mean to accept Wagner's invitation, not to go near him just then, as it would probably lead to a complete rupture. So, Cornelius writes to Wagner between 1 and 3 in the morning, telling him that he could not settle in Munich now with anyone but his brother, but that when he has finished “ Le Cid ” he will be willing to live there in merry companionship with Carl and Wagner. No answer was vouchsafed to this letter. “ Standhartner speaks to him again, in my interest. Heinrich Porges writes him : “ Reconciliation with Peter ; otherwise, Egoist ! ” Thereupon, he writes at once to Porges : “ do not visit me to-day ”, and to Standhartner : “ do not come till to-morrow ”, etc. , etc. , etc. , and, when they come next day, he is gone ! So that one can truly say that he has treated his best friends in Vienna like so many shoe-blacks. He came in May 1861. This is the upshot of these 3 years! ”

1862 :

« He (Wagner) writes to Cornelius from Paris, at the end of January 1862 : “ Listen ! On Wednesday evening, the 5th February, I am to read the “ Meistersinger ” at Schott's house, in Mainz. You have no idea what it is, what it means to me, and what it will be to my friends ! You must be there that evening ! Get Standhartner at once to give you, on my account, the necessary money for the journey from Vienna. In Mainz, I will reimburse you, and whatever may be necessary for the return journey. »

...

« Richard to Minna Wagner : Letters to His 1st Wife » , 2 Volumes translated, prefaced by William Ashton Ellis, Vienna House, New York, NY (1972) .

August 16, 1861 (Vienna) :

« I had another shock with my lodgings. Good Kolatschek lives in a frightfully distant suburb so that I promptly recognized I couldn't stay there as my cab-fares alone would have cost more than my lodgings. Moreover, it was very uninviting otherwise, and I was on the point of hunting for fresh lodgings when Doctor Standthartner, my highly-enthusiastic Viennese friend (a kind of Doctor Schuster) , luckily intervened, offering to house me in his roomy abode for as long as his family is away - til about the middle of September. This lies in the heart of the city and I'm getting to feel quite at ease in it ; the only thing I have to procure for myself is dinner. At least so far as lodging is concerned, then, I can quietly wait now and see if anyone else will invite me thereafter, or if I must look out for a furnished logis for myself which, indeed, is what would suit me least. For now, comes the other melancholy item in my communications, which will make it comprehensible to you that I'm not exactly in a cheerful mood ! »

August 26, 1861 (Vienna) :

« I cannot conceal that I am in a very melancholy humour through it all, and my kind host, Doctor Standthartner, has a pretty bad time with me. Nevertheless, I am glad I can remain in his house a few weeks longer ; by then, the Ander question must have come to its full resolution and, once the thing has a definite good purpose, I shall find more heart to hire myself a room in case of need. Even as it is, my stay here costs an awful lot of money. »

September 4, 1861 (Vienna) :

« I am delighted to see you are in humour enough to adorn your letters to me with such admonitions. For the rest, I am really much troubled by my stay in Vienna turning-out far more expensive at present than I had presumed ; and what is chiefly to blame for this, is the highly-inconvenient circumstance that my singers are scattered all over the country, causing me a wicked outlay on conveyances etc. Neither have I any regular meals provided me and, for the moment at least, I'm saving nothing but the cost of lodgings : if I could accept invitations to the country, it would be another matter. Still, I hope for some relief with the approach of autumn, especially when everybody is in town again. My host, Doctor Standthartner, has gone to join his family at Salzburg ; I'm quite alone in his abode, now. Tausig and Cornelius haven't come back to Vienna yet, so I'm happily protected for the present from the injurious influence of too youthful company on my views of life and general morals ; though I hope to expose my weak mind as little as possible to such contamination even later. »

September 26, 1861 (Vienna) :

« I have moved-out, had to pack and unpack everything once more, and got terribly cross with it this time ! My host's family (the Standhartners) will return in a day or two ; I hunted for a furnished lodging (lost hours and days over it) found nothing in needful proximity to the theatre, and finally struck-up friendship with the landlord of the hotel named above (i.e. , the “ Kaiserin ” Elizabeth on “ Weihburggasse ”) , who is an art-enthusiast, constantly harbours famous musicians, and has let me have a big parlour with bedroom on the 3rd floor, looking over the court, for the same terms as a private furnished lodging (all of which are dear enough !) . So, I'll here await the consummation of my Vienna fortunes. »

« Those (God be praised) are gradually assuming a rather propitious aspect. Ander has come back to town, and will reappear in a week. He boasts that his voice has grown better and clearer than ever ; whilst he is as full of zeal for “ Tristan ” as before. »

« So, my heart is considerably lightened on that score at any rate, and the only thing I have to bewail is the long delay and the loss of a hospitable house (the Standhartners) that eased my so protracted sojourn in Vienna. I seem doomed to have everything fall-out incredibly hard now ; God knows when Luck will smile on me a little once again ! »

November 13, 1861 (Vienna) :

« Last Wednesday (the 6th) , my friend Doctor Standhartner (as deputy physician in ordinary) was summoned in haste by the Empress to a consultation in Venice ; as doctor and friend, he insisted on my accompanying him, since I needed a change, some distraction, if I meant to hold-out here. I returned this morning, and shall hope it has benefitted me : at least, I had no talking to do for a few days running, but only sights to see, which really did me good. »

August 21, 1862 (Vienna) :

« You are quite right to be returning by Vienna. Call on the Laubes ; they live in the “ Stoss im Himmel ” block (sounds droll enough !) . The Standhartners , unfortunately, are not at home. »

November 12, 1862 (Biebrich) :

« I hope to start my trip tomorrow, though ; so, expect my next letter from Vienna. If you have anything of moment to write me meanwhile, please address to : “ Doctor J. Standhartner, Stadt 806. Wien. ” »

December 27, 1862 (Vienna) :

« Among all my cares and troubles, the care for you has still remained the most consuming. Nothing having turned-up from anywhere, at last, I begged Standhartner to advance me the needful on my “ Tristan honorarium ”. He has had my wish complied with through his banker - so now, take heart, good “ Minna ” ! »

...

Karl Geiringer. « Brahms : His Life and Work » , translated by H. B. Weiner and Bernard Miall, George Allen and Unwin, London (1942) .

1864 :

« As to his male acquaintances, he was on terms of increasing friendship with the well-known critic Eduard Hanslick, who even sought the acquaintance of Brahms's family, in Hamburg, sending his photo to the delighted Elise. He continued to see much of Tausig and Cornelius. Both were friends of Richard Wagner, who was then living in Vienna, and were anxious to arrange a meeting between Brahms and the composer who was responsible for the resuscitation of the music-drama. The introduction was, at last, effected through the medium of a 3rd mutual acquaintance, Doctor Standhartner, who took Brahms to see Wagner, on February 6, 1864. The evening was a gratifying success : apart from Classical music, Brahms played his “ Händel Variations ”, and Wagner could not but be impressed by this magnificent work. He expressed his admiration in the following words :

“ One sees what can still be done with the old forms in the hands of one who knows how to deal with them. ”

Never again were the 2 greatest German composers of their time to meet face to face. It would, therefore, seem appropriate to give some account of their relations here. In their art, Brahms and Wagner had no points of contact whatever (as will be more fully explained in another chapter) . Precisely because of their dissimilarity, one might have thought that each could have respected the other's achievements. Actually, however, their relations (mainly owing to the intervention of 3rd persons) became less friendly. The attack delivered upon the “ music of the future ” by Brahms, in 1860, can hardly be held responsible for this. In that year, Brahms, together with Joachim, Grimm, and Scholz, drew-up a manifesto in which they and a number of sympathizers sought to protest against the influence of the “ new German school ”. Owing to an indiscretion this manifesto, which was really aimed at Liszt rather than Wagner, was published over the names of the 4 principals only and, in this form, excited mirth rather than anger in the camp of their opponents. »

...

« The Diary of Richard Wagner (1865-1882) : The Brown Book » , presented and annotated by Joachim Bergfeld ; and translated by George Bird, Cambridge University Press, London (1980) .

October 24, 1865 (Vienna) :

« Yesterday evening, Standhartner was with me : we've put a lot in order. Today, it's off with him to the dentist (it's that monster who will now decide my existence) that is to say, in Vienna. »

October 26, 1865 (Vienna) :

« Yesterday, as a result of a very poor night, I was in a bad way : a tooth operation was undertaken ; reading Balzac brought balm - in the evening, an hour at the Standhartners. »

...

Cosima Wagner's Diaries. Volume I (1869-1877) , edited and annotated by Martin Gregor-Dellin and Dietrich Mack ; translated, and with an Introduction by Geoffrey Skelton, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York, NY (1978) .

Sunday, May 22, 1870 :

« Many letters and telegrams (King Ludwig II of Bavaria, Richter, Standhartner ... »

Monday, August 21, 1871 :

« Letter from Doctor Standhartner (business affairs) . »

Friday, November 3, 1871 :

« Richard writes letters to Doctor Standhartner, “ Herr ” Feustel in Bayreuth ; business affairs, in short. »

Tuesday, January 2, 1872 :

« He (Wagner) writes to Doctor Standhartner and Kafka. »

Monday, March 11, 1872 :

« Richard sends the score of “ Tannhäuser ” to Doctor Standhartner, to have the 1st scene copied. »

Wednesday, April 24, 1872 :

« Letters from the Standhartners, Levi ... »

Friday, May 10, 1872 :

« Doctor Standhartner reports that people wish to form a Wagner Society in Prague and are inquiring through a member whether Wagner would agree to Czechs and Bohemians being represented in it in equal numbers. Wagnerian art is the only kind which unites hostile elements. »

Tuesday, May 21, 1872 :

« Morning rehearsal, many Bayreuth people in my box, but friends too, among them Doctor Standhartner, who has come all the way from Vienna. »

Wednesday, May 22, 1872 :

« Dinner at the “ Fantaisie ” with Standhartner, who, like everybody else, praised the behavior of the children, particularly of “ Fidi ”, at the ceremony. »

Friday, October 25, 1872 :

« Sent my father (the composer Franz Liszt) the telegram from Doctor Standhartner describing Princess Hohenlohe's 18,000 Florins as “ a ridiculous exaggeration - one zero too many ”, to my great relief. »

Wednesday, November 6, 1872 :

« Telegrams from my uncle and Standhartner. »

Wednesday, January 21, 1874 :

« I write to Doctor Standhartner, regarding the concert in Vienna. »

Tuesday, July 28, 1874 :

« Telegram from our friend Standhartner, saying he is arriving today with his daughter, preparations and reception. Great joy at seeing this dear, loyal, and understanding friend again. Made music in the evening : 3rd Act of “ Siegfried ”. To my delight, Doctor Standhartner finds that Richard is looking very well. »

Saturday, August 1, 1874 :

« Richard relates some experiences from his life, the encounter with the King's erstwhile “ fiancée ”, Princess Sophie. Standhartner tells me how utterly the princes hate Richard. »

Sunday, August 2, 1874 :

« Richard very unwell, he seems to have caught cold yesterday, and singing is always a great strain on him. I alone accompany our friends to the railroad station ; I am glad of Standhartner's love for Richard and his delight in what he calls Richard's good fortune. Comfortingly, he finds him more cheerful than previously. But in what state do we leave our friends ? In these last 2 years, he has lost one son (Karl Schönaich) and is returning to the other (son, Gustav Schönaich) , who is wasting away. Oh life ! We drape our wounds with rags. Last night, I heard “ Fidi ” sobbing. I went to him, he complained that his throat was sore, in alarm, I sent for Standhartner, it turned-out to be nothing - but the shock, the alarm ! Richard spends the day in bed. »

Sunday, January 3, 1875 :

« Very nice letter from Doctor Standhartner, asking us to stay with him and his family. »

Saturday, February 20, 1875 :

« In Vienna, at 10 o'clock, on Sunday ; Standhartner, the Academic Wagner Society, 80 young people, and all sorts of others. Taken to Standhartner's house, cordial welcome. »

Wednesday, March 3, 1875 :

« Received calls, in the evening a “ soirée ” in Makart's studio in Richard's honour - Count and Countess Andrassy, Count and Countess Széchenyi, Countess Festetics, lady in waiting to the Empress, who told me in the morning that for her Richard's art is like the creation of the world. Countess Wickenburg, Count Hoyos, Countess Wilczek, Prince Liechtenstein, the Standhartner family, the Liszt family, “ Herr ” and “ Frau ” von Angeli, Doctor Mosenthal, Prince Metternich, the Hellmesberger Quartet, Semper (whom Richard, seeing him for the 1st time in 8 years, does not at 1st recognize) , Countess Dönhoff, “ Frau ” Wolter, and many others — perhaps, 60 people in all. A pleasant occasion, everyone looking his best, face and clothes, and the general mood very cheerful. »

Thursday, March 4, 1875 :

« In the evening, went through the 3rd Act of “ Götterdämmerung ” , in Standhartner's house, with piano accompaniment. »

Thursday, March 11, 1875 :

« At 2 o'clock, welcomed by the good Standharters, in Vienna. »

Friday, March 12, 1875 :

« A letter has arrived from the King Ludwig II, as exalted and enthusiastic as ever. He wants the fragments to be performed after Easter. Richard wants to do the concert here without a rehearsal, our friend Standhartner is against it. »

Monday, May 3, 1875 :

« At 5 o'clock, left for Vienna, tolerable night journey ; arrival at Standhartners, at 9. »

Thursday, May 6, 1875 :

« Concert at 12 o'clock - fine impression, " Hagen's Watch " repeated. But Richard is tired. I, then, visit the picture and flower exhibition with Prince Liechtenstein and Standhartner. »

Monday, May 10, 1875 :

« Sent-off copies of " Götterdämmerung " (to " Mimi ", the King, Standhartner. »

Thursday, July 8, 1875 :

« Preparations for the children's arrival, and rehearsals, between times letters ; I to Doctor Standhartner, asking him to visit Hans von Bülow (her 1st husband) and give me a report on his condition. »

Monday, November 1, 1875 :

« Battered arrival at 6 o'clock in the morning ; friend Standhartner, at the station. »

Thursday, December 2, 1875 :

« A Quartet " soirée ", at Hellmesberger's. In the evening, our Standhartner friends. »

Saturday, January 1, 1876 :

« Went to church, afterwards received visitors. Richard discovers that the newspapers are saying that " Herr " Scaria demanded 2,000 Florins for his entire stay in Bayreuth and had been turned down by the management committee ! Richard is requesting a correction through Standhartner. »

Thursday, February 10, 1876 :

« Standhartner writes that " Lohengrin " will be possible in Vienna, only on March 2. »

Friday, January 14, 1876 :

« Letters, a very good one from Standhartner with an account of the royalties, then, a nice one (as always) from the King Ludwig II. »

Wednesday, April 12, 1876 :

« Richard receives a letter from Doctor Standhartner, saying “ Herr ” Jauner is making the release of “ Frau ” Materna conditional on the performances of “ Tristan ” and “ Walküre ” in Vienna, next winter. So, before the work has even been done here, the seeds of its dissolution are being sown ! »

Sunday, April 23, 1876 :

« Around mid-day, while our musicians are having lunch with us, various telegrams arrive ; firstly, from “ Herr ” Niemann, recommending for Sieglinde a “ Fräulein ” von Pretfeld, of whom all present say she would be (because of her figure alone) impossible ! Then, from “ Herr ” Jauner, saying he is awaiting a reply to his letter in order to come to an agreement with “ Frau ” Materna ! A veritable parade of baseness, Richard refers him to his letter to Doctor Standhartner and concludes with the sentence that he hopes he will not have to prepare himself for a hostile attitude on the part of the management. »

Wednesday, March 28, 1877 :

« God be praised ! Richard is continuing to work on “ Parsifal ”, even though it means we sometimes have to deal with repugnant business matters till late in the night. “ Herr ” Hodge asks for a postponement of the guaranteed payment, we grant it to him through the lawyer. Arrival of (Hans) Richter, very vulgarly bringing the 20,000 Marks, with the request that Richard should sign a declaration of consent to the performance of the other 3 works. Richard is standing by what my father has written to Standhartner. Richter praises “ Die Walküre ”, in Vienna - from my father's account, I gather that it lacks all dedication and nobility. »

Saturday, April 21, 1877 :

« Richard writes to friend Standhartner, setting-out the terms for the use of the “ Nibelungen ” : 10 % instead of 7 ; 20,000 Marks as an advance (not as a gift) ; in return, exclusive rights for the Austrian monarchy. »

Wednesday, April 25, 1877 :

« From friend Standhartner, a telegram saying that neither the Prince nor the management is raising any significant objections to Richard's proposals (10 %, 20,000 Marks advance) . »

Wednesday, August 1, 1877 :

« Once again, in “ Wahnfried ”, Friend Standhartner. »

Friday, August 3, 1877 :

« Friend Standhartner departs. »

...

« The Letters of Franz Liszt to Marie zu Sayn-Wittgenstein » , translated and edited by Howard E. Hugo, Greenwood Press, Westport, Connecticut (1971) .

March 31, 1877 (Bayreuth) :

« You know that Standhartner and Mister Jauner have saddled me with a commission, concerning the complete performance at Vienna of the tetralogy, “ The Ring of the Nibelungs ”. Wagner is now not at all inclined to deal with the Opera directors : the obvious proof, is that he declined the 20,000 Mark letter of credit brought him by Richter, the day before yesterday, as a premium from Mister Jauner for the “ Nibelungs ”. When I spoke to him, however, of the supreme good-will that the Emperor so kindly displayed toward his work, he answered me immediately in tones of real emotion :

“ As soon as His Majesty will be so good to convey me his desire to see my " Nibelungs " performed at Vienna, I shall comply most respectfully and, then, place my work at the disposal of the Imperial Theater. ” »

...

« Cosima Wagner's Diaries. Volume II (1878-1883) » , edited and annotated by Martin Gregor-Dellin and Dietrich Mack ; translated, and with an Introduction, Postscript, and Additional Notes by Geoffrey Skelton, Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, New York, NY (1980) .

Monday, January 28, 1878 :

« Friend Standhartner reports that Hans Richter has made-up for his remissness and that “ Rheingold ” is a big success in Vienna - which we doubt, insofar as we have received no telegrams about it. »

Wednesday, June 5, 1878 :

« Memories of all our other good old friends - Standhartner, Mathilde Maier ... »

Saturday, September 14, 1878 :

« Friend Standhartner, yesterday, announced a visit, he is coming from the international exposition in Paris and, since he wrote in French, Richard says, “ Il s'est exposé lui-même comme ami de Wagner et, en cette qualité, il était en effet assez exposé là-bas. ” As always, when he jokes in French, he makes use of the best and most original of expressions. »

Sunday, September 15, 1878 :

« Beautiful day ; after waiting in vain at the station for friend Standhartner, we drive to the “ Ermitage ”. »

Monday, September 16, 1878 :

« Friend Standhartner tells us about the policemen in Gastein who surround the German Emperor in masses, and if somebody has a hand in his pocket when the Emperor or Bismarck passes by, he is politely requested to take it out !
»

Tuesday, November 5, 1878 :

« Before reading this libretto (Spontini's “ Fernand Cortez ”) , he received and answered a letter from friend Standh. He tells me that Standhartner was pleased with his clear, straightforward letter. »

Tuesday, November 12, 1878 :

« He comes upstairs to fetch me, sits down beside me, and suddenly laughs about Gurnemanz's herbs and roots : “ He sounds so cross, so disgruntled. ” Then, he became a bit impatient and said, “ If you only knew ! ” And soon, I do know for, when I enter the salon, I see a magnificent Persian carpet for my room lying there ! He had been in correspondence with Standhartner about it and, now, he sends-off a telegram of thanks, signed : “ He and she. ” »

Tuesday, January 4, 1881 :

« A nice letter from Standhartner pleases him and starts him reminiscing about Vienna ; Standhartner is proof, he says, that one can get through to the Viennese with music ; how much had he done for him when he settled in Vienna ! He describes the bone structure of Standhartner's skull as frighteningly Slavonic, yet, at the same time, pleasing. »

Saturday, May 21, 1881 :

« At coffee time, the Standhartners appear, father and daughter ; introductions and memories of Vienna. »

Sunday, May 22, 1881 :

« Richard slept well ; the “ Flower Greeting ” takes place a 8 o'clock and is very successful, the clock presented by “ Fidi ” - “ Parsifal ” delights Richard, and he is pleased with the flower costumes. The coats of arms of the Wagner Society towns genuinely surprise him, and he is pleased with the ceiling. In a mood of divine happiness, he strolls to the summer house with me in the blue robe, and we exchange gold pens and little poems ! Our lunch table consists of : Standhartners 3 (with Gustav !) , Ritters (the parents) , the Count, Joukowsky, “ Boni ”, Lusch, and “ Fidi ” ; in the hall : Eva, “ Loldi ”, Ferdi Jager, Julchen and Elsa ; the latter two have to slip away unnoticed, so that the singing of the verse will float down from the gallery. Siegfried speaks Stein's poem very well, splendidly proposing the health of eternal youth and, then, in a full voice Elsa movingly sings " Nicht Gut noch Pracht ", etc. , from above. Over coffee, Fafner, from the Festival Theater, appears with the program for this evening on his back. The dear good children act-out the little farces by Lope and Sachs magnificently, and Lusch speaks Wolz's linking epilogue particularly well. To the conclusion of the Sachs play J. Rub. linked the Prelude to " Die Meistersinger ", and when Richard went into the salon, the children, in different costumes, sang his " Gruss der Getreuen " ; at the conclusion of the evening, after the meal, came the " Kaisermarsch ", with altered text. All splendidly done by the children, though we are not entirely successful in sustaining the mood. Before lunch, Richard was upset by the military band, which he (somewhat to my concern) had allowed to take part, and it required Siegfried's toast to raise his spirits again. In the evening, he was irked by the dullness of our friends, he asked Standhartner to remain behind, without considering that the stepson (Gustav Schönaich) would also then remain, and the presence of this man whom he cannot bear kept him from expressing all that was in his heart, and that made him almost painfully unhappy. The successful parts are what delighted me - the fact that unbidden things intervene no longer bothers me, however much it once used to pain me : I keep remembering that " all transient things are but an image. " »

Monday, November 6, 1882 :

« I have to wait a long time in Saint-Mark's Square for him (Wagner) and, when he arrives with the children, he tells me he had a very severe spasm (I wrote to Standhartner) . But he quickly recovers. »

February 22, 1883 :

« Certainly, Cosima's 1st intention was exactly as Joukowsky described it. In her desire for death, she refused all nourishment for many hours after Wagner died, then, yielding to the inevitable, cut-off her hair and laid it in Wagner's coffin. Hidden from sight in black robes, she accompanied her husband's body in the train, back to Bayreuth. At " Wahnfried ", it was carried to the grave at the bottom of the garden by Muncker, Peustel, Groß, Wolzogen, Seidl, Joukowsky, Wilhelmj, Porges, Levi, Richter, Standhartner, and Niemann. Daniela, Isolde, Eva, and Siegfried walked beside the coffin ; Blondine, expecting her 1st child, was not present. Only after their friends had left, did Cosima emerge from the house to join her children as the coffin was lowered into the grave. »

...

William James Henderson. « Richard Wagner : His Life and His Dramas » , a Biographical Study of the Man and an Exploration of His Work, G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, NY (1901) .

1883 :

« The exertions necessary for the production of " Parsifal " had told severely on Wagner. It is said that, at one rehearsal he fainted and, on recovering, exclaimed : " Once more, I have beaten Death ". Doctor Standhartner, one of his firm Viennese friends, examined him in the course of the summer, and found that a heart affection (sic) , from which the composer had long been suffering, had made dangerous progress. Wagner was not told of his exact condition, but he was warned that immediate rest and relief from care was absolutely essential. »

...

17 avril 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Rudolf Weinwurm (Vienne) .

« Dearest Friend !

Today, I am seizing the opportunity to render to you my sincerest belated congratulations on the present feast of your Name-Day and all the feasts in your honour recently, even though my good wishes are late. May you have more and more noble and glorious years to continue among the highly-praised and beloved, intelligent academic youth ; for whom I also live, and may you shortly harvest true and worthy fruit on the part of high-authorities. May God make it so !

Accept also my most heart-felt thanks for the good you have always done for me and, particularly, in the recent past. Heaven blesses you ! In most cordial, sincere respect,

Your old friend,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Heute zum Feste Deines Namens ergreife ich ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 154 ; pages 183-184.

Rudolf Weinwurm (1835-1911) : Viennese choir director and composer. In the Max Auer collection, the 1st Bruckner letter to Rudolf Weinwurm is dated November 30, 1856. Bruckner and Weinwurm became very good friends, and Weinwurm was to be an important contact for Bruckner, in Vienna.

In Austria, a child or adult celebrates the feast or Name-Day of the Saint after whom the person is named, rather than his or her actual birthday, although the 2 are often the same. The feast of Saint-Rudolf is traditionally celebrated on April 17. (Weinwurm's 50th birthday was on April 3, 1885.) The celebration was held at the « Harmonie-Saal » .

As a choir director, Weinwurm worked with both boys and men ; the compliment is meant as much for the instructor as for the youth, for Weinwurm was a gifted Choir-Master. The old plea : « Give me your good students, and I'll give you a good choir. » , remains true even today.

Bruckner wishes his friend Weinwurm wordly appreciation but implies the necessity of pleasing God and asking for His help.

22 avril 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Felix Mottl (Karlsruhe) .

« Dear Highly-Esteemed Friend !

Upon becoming aware of the public report, I was both grief-stricken and horrified. Please, accept my most sincere sympathy ! It is very painful to all of us ! Please, be kind enough to apprise your respected “ Frau Mama ” also, and all the dear members of your noble family just how difficult for me is the loss of my dear friend, and that I am taking part in the same deep sorrow. I will tell you more when we meet. I am truly afflicted because I am unable to appear at the funeral, since I have 7 classes to give at the Conservatory ; please, kindly pardon me for this reason. I will certainly perform my obsequies for this noble friend in the Church ! “ Requiescat in pace ” !!

With sincerest respect,

Your friend who grieves with you,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Voll Trauer und Entsetzen vemahm ich ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 155 (incomplète) ; page 184.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 77 ; page 86.

Felix Mottl (1856-1911) : Conductor ; student of Bruckner at the Conservatory.

This dear friend is Felix Mottl's brother, Fritz.

23 avril 1885 : Performance by Ferdinand Löwe and Josef Schalk of the 1st movement of the 3rd Symphony (Mahler revised version ?) and the 2nd and 4th movements of the 4th Symphony. Reviewed by Emil von Hartmann in the « Deutsche Kunst-und Musikzeitung » , XII, of 1 May 1885.

26 avril 1885 : Lettre de Hermann Levi (Munich) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Honourable Friend !

After repeated consultations with the Court Secretary to the King (“ Herr Hauptmann ” Greßer) , I am sharing with you that His Majesty will most certainly accept the dedication of your “ 7th ” Symphony. In good time (I hope in the next few days) , an official announcement on the part of the Cabinet or the Director will come to you, to which I request that you “ immediately ” reply directly to the King. In this “ thank you ” letter, you must ask whether His Majesty desires to have your Symphony or the Adagio alone be played in special presentation for Himself. For neither the Director nor his Cabinet Secretary can propose this to the King. (To explain this to you in more detail would take too much time. Also, with respect to dramas and Operas performed as a special presentation, "no one" is permitted to make suggestions ; that requires an order directly from the King.) In your letter of thanks, fill your mouth with the phrases "most humble" and "most gracious" ; He, the King, thinks highly of formalities such as these. How is it, at present, with Gutmann ? I have heard nothing more. Just between us (no one else needs to know this !), I offered him 1,000 Marks as subsidy for the cost. (Fiedler, a certain Earl Oriolla, and I are the members of this Universal Anton-Bruckner Society !) and so, I am of the opinion that he could fully well give a royalty to "Herr" Schalk. If he does not give it, I will certainly find a publisher in Germany. This situation would be resolved only if he gave a definite "Yes" or "No". If you are absolutely against Gutmann, write your answer to me. I have only turned to him since he published the Quintet.

I will set-out on the 1st or 2nd of May. Unfortunately, I cannot come to Vienna ; Doctor Bolle has invited me to be present for the "Bruckner-Evening" ; I have a fellow traveler with whom I have promised, for a long time, to go to Italy. Until May 6, a letter will find me directly through the address :

Sculptor "Hildebrand,
Piazza San Francesco di Paola, No. 4
(fuori Posta Romana)
Florence "

From the 6th to the 16th, at

"Herr von Lenbach
Palazzo Borghese
Roma "

("Today, tomorrow, and Wednesday, we are doing only 'Parsifal' for King Ludwig II, in Italy !")

Sincere greetings from

Your faithful

Hermann Levi »

Incipit : « Nach wiederholter Rücksprache ... »

Source : Max Auer, Lettre n° 4 de Hermann Levi ; pages 316-318.

« Hauptmann » (Captain) Greßer was Court Secretary to King Ludwig II of Bavaria.

Doctor Konrad Fiedler (1841-1895) : Art-critic and author in Munich, where Bruckner met him in March, 1885.

29 avril 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Felix Mottl (Karlsruhe) .

« Dear Friend !

Herewith, I am sending you the Orchestra parts (for Symphony No. 7) . You will be receiving the full-score from Hermann Levi. At X, in the “ Adagio ” (“ Funeral Music ” for tubas and horns) , I beg you most sincerely (3 measures before Y) to increase the “ crescendo ” to “ fff ” by the next measure (about 1 measure before Y) , in order to allow a “ decrescendo ” on the 3rd quarter-note. Be sure to use the Wagner tubas. (In no case are horns to replace these tubas.) Would it not be desirable to introduce the Scherzo with Trio also ? (In particular, for the laymen ?)

I have kept my funeral music especially for the “ Schotten-Kirche ”. Dear old departed Fritz wanted to visit me “ at Gause ” !!!

Now, again, I appeal most sincerely to your “ undivided artistic strength ”, on behalf of my “ 7th child ”. Keep in touch. Take care !

Your old friend,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Hier sende ich Dir die Orchesterstimmen. »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 156 ; pages 184-185.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 78 ; pages 86-87.

If Bruckner's original score were to read like the 1954 « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » (MWV) publication, Bruckner would have had to issue these instructions because only Horns 1 and 2 are told to diminish after the 1st count of the measure ; and these instructions are not clear enough to effect the sound that he wants, « dim. » (diminuendo) is printed under the 2nd half of the 3rd count, and the accent marks further muddy the instructions. At any rate, Bruckner does not mean the 3rd quarter note ; he must mean the 3rd count of the measure.

« Schotten-Kirche » : Literally, the « Scottish Church » in Vienna. Benedictine priests and monks, from Scotland and Ireland, established churches and centers of learning on the Continent, around between the 9th and 12 Centuries. Bruckner is referring to his private memorial for the brother of Felix Mottl, mentioned earlier.

Bruckner is referring to the deceased Fritz Mottl, the brother of Felix.

« At Gause » : Name of a famous Viennese restaurant frequented by Bruckner, his students and disciples (not a town or an area) .

Mai 1885 : Après avoir refusé, en octobre 1884, la dédicace de la 2e Symphonie, Franz Liszt invitera Anton Bruckner à venir assister à une exécution de l'Adagio de la 7e, donnée à Karlsruhe par le chef Felix Mottl.

Cet ancien élève doué de la classe de Bruckner au Conservatoire de Vienne a jeté tant de feu spirituel dans la Symphonie que même un noble Franz Liszt aux cheveux blancs, assis parmi le distingué auditoire, est devenu instantanément un « brucknérien convaincu » .

Selon August Stradal, cette conversion est d'autant plus remarquable que le grand pianiste fut longtemps resté de glace (malgré son allégeance pro-Wagnérienne) devant les compositions du Maître de Saint-Florian, en partie à cause de sa tenue vestimentaire peu orthodoxe et de ses manières ampoulées. Lorsqu'il fut invité à montrer plus de gentillesse à son endroit, Franz Liszt aurait répliqué : « Je ne peux pas supporter l'entendre me répondre : " Votre Grâce, Monsieur Canonicus ! " » .

Franz Liszt soutenait l'idée que ses Poèmes symphoniques ne pourraient être compris du grand public tant et aussi longtemps que celui-ci n'ait appris à apprécier les drames lyriques de son beau-fils.

Selon Max Auer, le compositeur Franz Liszt (dont l'idéalisme et l'altruisme sont sans précédent !) avait montré un grand intérêt pour la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner (plus que pour tout ce qui a précédé) mais sans vraiment comprendre cette musique.

2 mai 1885 : A setting of the « Te Deum » for chorus and 2 pianos is conducted by Bruckner himself. This premiere is given in Vienna at the « Akademischer Wagner-Verein » (Academic Wagner Society) .

11 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Marie Demar (« Loco Wieden, Waaggasse 9 » , Vienne) .

« Kindest, Most Noble Friend ;“ Fräulein ” Marie !

Most sincere thanks for your wonderful picture. The trusting, beautiful eyes !

How often they comfort me. Till the end of my life, this relic will be precious and valuable to me. And what joy upon viewing it so frequently, etc. Also, I beg for your sincere friendship. Dearest “ Fräulein ” !

May your friendship never be taken away from me. You are assured eternally of mine.

Just now, I extended my thanks to the King of Bavaria for accepting the dedication. It is Levi's work. Once more, sincere thanks and fondest kiss on your gracious, lovely hands.

Your extremely admiring friend,

Anton Bruckner

“ Loco Wieden
Waaggasse 9
Wien ”

Incipit : « Herzlichsten Dank für Ihr herrliches Bild ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 157 ; page 185.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 13 (B) ; pages 22-24.

Marie Demar (1865-1946) : Female friend of Bruckner. Bruckner greatly admired her, so much so that their friendship became quite a serious matter (in 1885-1886) , and it was reciprocal. Here, he writes to her expressing this admiration, as he views the photograph that she has recently sent to him. From all accounts, he felt that he had found his soul mate. Nevertheless, she declined his proposal of marriage, left his heart and ego in disrepair, and ultimately married someone else (Wilhelm Blasdiel) , in 1890.

« Heartfelt thanks for your marvellous picture ! The beautiful, trusting eyes ! How frequently it comforts me ! This relic (“ Reliquie ”) will be dear and precious to me to the end of my life. And with what joy have I so often looked upon it ! »

The choice of the word « Reliquie » is striking and most unusual in this context, since it literally, and most commonly, signifies relics in precisely the Catholic, ritualistic sense. Certainly, it is quite distinct from the more appropriate « Andenken » , which would simply imply a memento. Bruckner's attitude towards the photograph thus seems subconsciously tied to his curiosity about the relics of death. The compulsion that controls obsessional thoughts of death by grasping its physical relics finds a parallel here in the attempt to contain a fear of loneliness by assigning an almost religious value to the mementos of a potentially reciprocated desire.

King Ludwig II of Bavaria (1845-1886) , ruled from 1864 until his death - under questionable circumstances. He was a great admirer of Richard Wagner and built « Schoß Neuschwanstein » with Wagner's music dramas in mind. The bedroom, for example, is resplendent with wall paintings (by August Spieß) depicting scenes from the King's favourite music-drama, « Tristan » .

The dedication for Symphony No. 7.

11 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Johannes Peregrin Hupfauf (Salzbourg) .

« Dear Sir !

I thank you very much for your kindness, and request patience since the “ Te Deum ” is just now being printed, as I hear, by Wetzler. “ Post-festum ”, it can be very easily obtained. I would have the greatest joy, if I once would hear my work resounding in the magnificent Cathedral of Salzburg !

With respect,

Your most devoted

Anton Bruckner

I cannot read your name, unfortunately. »

Incipit : « Ich danke sehr für Ihre Freundlichkeit, ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 158 ; page 186.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 90 ; page 100-101.

Emmanuel (Emil) Wetzler (1839-1901) : Viennese publisher and music-dealer. His establishment was located on the « Kärntner Ring ». He may have been connected with one or both of 2 companies which may have been related. Wetzler in Prague published light-music from 1866, continuing until at least 1899, while Wetzler in Vienna operated from 1881 until being bought by Ludwig Döblinger, in 1890. The latter's catalog included, in addition to dances, songs and piano pieces, some famous names : Franz Lehár, Oscar Straus and Hugo Wolf. Violin works by Ignaz Brüll, Zdenek Barták, Jan Hřimalý, and Josef Hellmesberger were also published.

« Post-festum » : Latin term meaning after the Feast or Fest. In the actual context, it means after the Feast of the Ascension of Our Lord into Heaven which the Church year places 40 days after Easter.

Johannes Peregrin Hupfauf must have written to Bruckner inquiring about obtaining copies of the “ Te Deum ”. Bruckner responded in kind, even though he was unable to decipher the signature on the letter.

Johannes Peregrin Hupfauf

Johannes Peregrin Hupfauf (1856-1889) : Music scholar, teacher, composer, and choir director at Salzburg Cathedral, from 1882 to 1889. His pseudonym : Peregrinus.

...

Johann Peregrin Hupfauf (Pseudonym : Peregrinus) geboren 22.03.1856, Schwaz / Tirol ; gestorben 14.10.1889, Salzburg. Chorleiter, Komponist, Musikpädagoge und -forscher. Zunächst Arbeiter und Chorsänger in Schwaz, lernte dann Orgel und wurde Regens chori. 1875 ging er als Bassist und Gesangslehrer an den Dom-Musikverein und Mozarteum nach Salzburg, wo ihn und andere Pater Peter Singer, Karl Santner und Otto Bach musikalisch ausbildeten und Hupfauf dann 1879 provisorischer, 1882 definitiver Domchordirektor wurde. Seit 1887, als der Chor auf die Mitwirkung von Frauen verzichten mußte, war Hupfauf auch mit der Ausbildung der Domsingknaben betraut. Zusätzlich unterrichtete er als Gesangslehrer an Salzburger Schulen. Neben der Verbreitung eigener Kompositionen setzte Hupfauf sich auch für die Aufführung zum Teil in Vergessenheit geratener a cappella-Werke salzburgischer Hofmusiker des 17. Jahrhunderts ein.

...

Johann Peregrin Hupfauf (Pseudonym : Peregrinus oder Johannes Peregrinus) : geboren 22. März 1856 Schwaz (Tirol) ; gestorben 14. Oktober 1889 Salzburg, war ein Komponist, Musikhistoriker und Direktor des Salzburger Domchores.

Johann Peregrin war Sohn eines armen Nagelschmiedes. Nach des Vaters Tode (gestorben 1864) mußte er sich als Arbeiter in einem Drahtzug verdingen.

Da er in Schwaz als Chorsänger seine musikalische Begabung bewies, wurde ihm die Erlernung des Orgelspiels ermöglicht. Er wurde Chorregent und 1875 als Basssänger und Gesanglehrer vom Dom-Musik-Verein und Mozarteum nach Salzburg berufen. Hier erhielt er seine musikalische Ausbildung unter Pater Peter Singer, Karl Santner und Otto Bach und studierte er Musikgeschichte.

An die Spitze des Salzburger Domchores folgte er Otto Bach 1879 als provisorischer, 1882 definitiver Domchordirektor. Daß 1887 die Mitwirkung von Frauen im Domchor eingestellt wurde, schränkte die Aufführungsmöglichkeiten sehr ein. Nun befasste sich Hupfauf besonders mit der Schulung der Domsingknaben. Gleichzeitig wirkte er als Gesangslehrer an der Kaiserlich-Königlich Oberrealschule und unterrichtete 1886 an der Kaiserlich-Königlich Lehrerbildungsanstalt.

1886 heiratete er Marie Spängler, Tochter des Kaufmanns Josef Spängler.

Johann Peregrin Hupfauf entdeckte manche vergessene A-capella-Werke salzburgischer Hofmusiker des 17. Jahrhunderts neu.

Es schuf selbst eine Anzahl kirchenmusikalischer Werke, die er zum Teil mit orchestralem Prunk ausstattete.

In seinen historisch-archivalischen Studien leistete er wertvolle Beiträge zur Musikgeschichte Salzburgs.

...

Hupfauf Johann Peregrin (Pseudonym : Peregrinus) - Domchordirektor. Geboren Schwaz (Tirol) , 22.03.1856 ; gestorben

Salzburg, 14.10.1889.

Als Sohn eines armen Nagelschmiedes mußte Hupfau nach dem Tode des Vaters 1864 als Arbeiter in einen Drahtzug eintreten. Da er als Chorsänger in Schwaz seine musikal. Begabung bewies, ermöglichte man ihm die Erlernung des Orgelspiels. Hupfau wurde Chorregent und 1875 als Baßsänger und Gesanglehrer vom « Dom-Musik-Verein Und Mozarteum » nach Salzburg berufen. Hier erhielt er seine musikal. Ausbildung unter Pater Peter Singer, Karl Santner und Otto Bach und studierte Musikgeschichte. 1879 provisorischer, 1882 definitiver Domchordirektor. Da 1887 die Mitwirkung von Frauen im Domchor eingestellt wurde, befaßte sich Hupfau Besonders mit der Schulung der Domsingknaben. Gleichzeitig wirkte er als Gesanglehrer an der Kaiserlich-Königlich Oberrealschule und unterrichtete 1886 an der Kaiserlich-Königlich Lehrerbildungsanstalt. Hupfau entdeckte manche Schätze der alten Salzburger A-capella-Musik neu, schuf viele kirchenmusikal. Werke, zum Teil Mit orchestralem Prunk, und gab in seinen historische-archival. Studient wertvolle Beiträge zur Musikgeschichte Salzburgs.

...

Jobannes Peregrinus, Geschichte der salzburgischen Dom-Sänger-knaben oder schlechthin des Kapellhauses. Josef Oberer's Wittwe, Salzburg (1889) ; 187 Seiten, gr. 8.

Das genannte Buch lag gerade behufs Besprechung auf meinem Pulte, als mich die Kunde traf von dem Tode des jungen, erst 34 Jahre alten Verfassers. Johannes Peregrinus ist der Künstler- und Schriftstellernamen des verstorbenen Dommusikdirektors Johann Peregrin Hupfau in Salzburg. In seiner rastlosen Thätigkeit als Leiter der Dommusik, als Lehrer der Kapellknaben, als Komponist und Schriftsteller überspannte er seine Kräfte, überschritt er das Maß der ihm taugenden Arbeit. Als Schriftsteller, in welcher Thätigkeit wir ihn jetzt zu betrachten haben, war er schon früher hervorgetreten. Mit seinen kleinen Beiträgen zur salzburgisch-österreichischen Musikgeschichte I. Die neue Orgel im Dom zu Salzburg (erbaut von Matthäus Mauracher im Jahre 1883) Salzburg, Herm. Kerber 1883 und 2. Johann Stadlmayr, Salzburg 1885, reihte er sich den Salzburger Lokalchronisten der Musik wie Pillwein, Sigismund Keller, Pirckmayer, Achleitner und Hammerle in würdiger Weise an. In seiner « Geschichte des Salzburger Kapellhauses » zeigt er etwas gereifere musikhistorische Einsicht und Erfahrung. Die Arbeit erscheint als Sonderabdruck aus den im Selbstverlage der « Gesellschaft für Salzburger Landeskunde » erschienenen Mittheilungen Band XXVII. Sie enthält eine vielfach aktenmäßig belegte Darstellung der Salzburger « schola cantorum » , eigentlich des Internates für Dommusikknaben. Die Ergänzung hierzu, die Geschichte der Dommusik hätte folgen sollen. Peregrinus legt den Entwicklungsgang des Hauses, welches von dem Salzburger Bürger Martin Aufner im Jahre 1432 gestiftet worden war, bis auf unsere Tage in übersichtlicher Weise dar. Alle Wandlungen, alle Förderer und Neider des Institutes werden vorgeführt. Der Autor schrieb nicht nur mit dem Griffel des Historikers, er belebt die einzelnen Vorgänge, vertheidigt sein ihm anvertrautes Institut auch vor all den Eingriffen, die es im Lauf der Zeiten zu zerstören, zu vernichten drohten.

Seine Darstellung erhält hierdurch einen persönlichen Reiz, welcher die Schwächen derselben gern vergessen läßt. Es wäre dankenswerth auf diese Nachtheile näher einzugehen, wenn der Autor sich dieselben vorhalten und in zukünftigen Fällen behersigen könnte. So aber ist es fruchtlose Bemühung und könnte obendrein den Schein erwecken, als ob die Verdienste desselben geschmälert werdensollten. Ich für meinen Theil finde mich leichter mit den Fehlern eines begabten, geistvollen Autodidakten zurecht, als mit dem Eigensinn eines, nicht eigentlich neue Gedanken schöpfenden, Schulschreibers. Künstlerische Anlage und Phantasie finden sich eben selten in gleichem Maße gepaart mit Strenge der Schulung und wissenschaftlicher Disziplin. Peregrinus wäre sicherlich auf der von ihm betretenen Bahn erfolgreich weitergeschritten, hätte nicht der Tod seinem ehrlichen Streben ein allzufrühes Ende bereitet.

Prag.

(Guido Adler.)

Werke

Großes und kleines Libera.

Mehrere Graduale.

Motetten.

Elf Messen.

Zwei große Instrumentalmessen.

Fünf Lieder (bis Opus 19 gedruckt) nach Texten von Erzherzogin Marie Antoinette von Toskana.

Pange lingua.

Stella cœli.

Requiem.

Te Deum.

Publikation

Beiträge zur Salzburger-österreich Musikgeschichte I. Paul Sartorius ; 2. Johann Stadlmayr (1885) .

Geschichte der Salzburg. Domsängerknaben, in : Mitt(h)eilungen Der Geschichte für Salzburger Landeskunde, Nummer 28 (1888) ; Nummer 29 (1889) .

Literatur

Salzburger Zeitung, Jahrgang 1889, Nummer 27-77 ; Deutscher Zeitung (Wien) vom 06.11.1889 ; Mitt(h)eilungen Der Geschichte für Salzburger Landeskunde, Nummer 30 (1890) ; Seiten 273-275.

Constantin Schneider. Geschichte der Musik in Salzburg (1935) .

Viktor Keldorfer. Klingendes Salzburg (1951) .

...

Doch nicht nur Zeitungsberichte verschickte Anton Bruckner, sondern auch Briefe. Erwähnt sei hier jener von Ludwig Nohl aus Heidelberg, der sich nach der Aufführung des Adagio der 7. Symphonie in Karlsruhe begeistert an Bruckner gewandt hatte. Nur zwei Wochen später sandte Bruckner dieses Schreiben oder wohl besser eine Abschrift desselben an Hans von Wolzogen mit folgenden Worten :

« Entschuldigen Hochderselbe, wenn ich mir erlaube, den herrlichen Brief des Professor Nohl an meine Wenigkeit zu übersenden, der überall Sensation erregen dürfte ! »

Der Brief vom 6. Juni war bereits am 14. desselben Monats in der Deutschen Zeitung erschienen. Ob Bruckner die Erlaubnis vom Ludwig Nohl dazu eingeholt hatte, sei dahingestellt.

Neben den grandiosen Erfolgen kam oft gleichzeitig Bruckners (angeblich) so schlechte Lage gleichsam in einem Atemzug zur Sprache, zum Beispiel in einem Brief an seine Schwester Rosalia Hueber :

« Jetzt ist auch Holland hinzugekommen, wo am 4. das ist meine 3te Sinfonie mit sehr großem Erfolge aufgeführt wurde. In Leipzig war am 28. Jänner die 2. Aufführung meiner 7. Sinfonie vor dem Königspaare. Die Blätter sind voll Bewunderung : eben so wie die Holländischen. Im März gehts nach München. (In Hamburg steht die Aufführung ebenfalls bevor.) »

Und einige Zeilen weiter :

« Leider brauche ich viel Geld. »

Wie jetzt schon leicht zu ersehen, war Bruckner zumindest in gewissen Lebensabschnitten ein eifriger Briefschreiber. So scheint er in den Tagen des Mai 1885 besonders schreibfreudig gewesen zu sein : 68 Briefe sind allein aus dem Jahre 1885 erhalten. Im Krakauer Schreibkalender für das Jahr 1878 verzeichnet Bruckner für Mai 1885 folgende Adressaten :

« 10./5. Briefe : König. Redaktion Linz. Mottl. Riedel, Ostini, Wolzogen, Levi, Demar, Rappoldi, Friedrich (Regensburg.) . P. Richter. Mayfeld. Fritsch. Perfall Linz Red. »

Erhalten geblieben sind davon : vom 9. Mai 1885 Briefe an König Ludwig II. von Bayern und an Felix Mottl in Karlsruhe, vom 10. Mai 1885 an Hermann Levi in München und an Hans von Wolzogen in Bayreuth und vom 11. Mai 1885 an Marie Demar in Wien, an Johannes Peregrin Hupfaut in Salzburg, an Eduard Rappoldi in Dresden und an die Redaktion des Musikalischen Wochenblattes in Leipzig, das heißt eigentlich an Theodor Helm. Abgesehen von dem Brief an König Ludwig II. sind diese Briefe relativ gleichen Inhalts. Als Beispiel hierfür soll der bis dato unbekannte Brief an Hans von Wolzogen zitiert werden, der alle wichtigen schon erwähnten Punkte eines Bruckner-Briefs beinhaltet : Danksagung, Verehrung, Berichte von Aufführungen. beigelegte Zeitungsausschnitte :

Hochgeborner Herr Baron !

Es ist unbeschreiblich, wie viel ich in der kurzen Jahresfrist Euer Hochgeboren verdanke !

Nehmen Hochderselbe diesen meinen tiefstgefühlten Dank und meine Bewunderung für Hochdesselben Edelmuth gnädigst entgegen !

...

11 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Eduard Rappoldi (Dresde) .

« Highly-Respected Sir !

Thank you very much for your kindness to me. The “ Quintet ” for Strings is published by Gutmann, in Vienna. The “ D minor Symphony ”, No. 3, dedicated to Wagner, is in Vienna to be published by Rättig. The “ 7th Symphony ”, dedicated to the “ King of Bavaria ”, is now being published and printed by Gutmann (inside the Court Opera building) . The “ Te Deum ” is being published and printed by Wetzler, in Vienna. A men’s chorus “ Germanenzug ” is in Austria, in Ried in the Innkreise region above the Enns, published by Kränzl. Nothing else is published. I request your affection and remain

Yours faithfully,

Anton Bruckner

P.S. : I’ll be very thankful for your intercession with the Royal Chapel. »

Incipit : « Ich danke dir für Ihre Gute ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 159 ; page 186.

« Anton Bruckner, 10 Briefe » , Berlin-Charlottenburg (1953) , Herausgeber und kommentiert von Felix von Lepel

Ferdinand Bruckner, seit 1911 literarisch publizierend, gehört wie die nur wenige Jahre jüngeren Carl Zuckmayer und Bertolt Brecht zur Generation der erfolgreichen jungen Dramatiker der zweiten Hälfte der Weimarer Republik. Er wurde (Sohn eines österreichischen Bankkaufmanns jüdischer Konfession und einer französischen Übersetzerin) 1891 in Sofia als Theodor Tagger geboren. In Wien, Berlin und Graz wuchs er auf ; er studierte Musik, Germanistik und Philosophie in Paris, Wien und Berlin. Er trat bereits in sehr jungen Jahren mit Veröffentlichungen (Essays, Rezensionen, Gedichte) hervor und begründete die aufwendig gestaltete, wenn auch kurzlebige ästhetische Zweimonatsschrift MARSYAS (1917-1919) , in der Max Brod, Alfred Döblin, Kasimir Edschmid, Yvan Goll, Franz Kafka, Carl Sternheim (nur um diese zu nennen) gedruckt wurden. Seit Beginn der zwanziger Jahre wandte er sich dem Theater zu und gehörte bald zu den vielgespielten Dramatikern seiner Zeit. Er änderte in dieser Zeit seinen Namen und legte sich das Pseudonym Ferdinand Bruckner zu, entstanden aus seiner Bewunderung für Ferdinand Raimund und Anton Bruckner. Erst 1930 lüftete er das Geheimnis, 1946 änderte er seinen bürgerlichen Namen offiziell in Ferdinand Bruckner um. Mit seiner Frau Bettina Neuer gründete er 1922 in Berlin das Renaissance-Theater, mußte aber dessen Leitung später wegen finanzieller Fehlschläge abtreten ; übernommen wurde die Direktion von Gustav Hartung. Zwischen 1928 und 1933 häuften sich die großen spektakulären, wenn auch nicht unumstrittenen Bühnenerfolge, die Bruckner mit seinen Zeitstücken und Historienstücken erlangte : Krankheit der Jugend (1926) , Die Verbrecher (1928) , Die Kreatur (1930) , Elisabeth von England (1930) , Timon (1932) , Die Marquise von O. (1933) . Der faschistische Terror zwang ihn, kurz nach der Machtübernahme Hitlers ins Exil zu gehen. Über Österreich und die Schweiz emigrierte er nach Paris. 1933 führte Gustav Hartung Bruckners antifaschistisches Zeitstück Die Rassen in Zürich am Schauspielhaus auf; das Stück fand eine « sehr günstige Aufnahme » , wie Thomas Mann in seinem Tagebuch notierte. Die Emigrationszeit verbrachte Bruckner zunächst in Frankreich, ging dann aber 1936 in die USA, wo er in Hollywood für die Paramount Productions arbeiten sollte. Als sich die Kooperation zerschlug, ließ er sich in New York nieder und widmete sich seinem Werk - allerdings ohne Aussicht auf größere literarische Erfolge in der amerikanischen Öffentlichkeit. Er übersetzte seine und anderer Autoren Stücke ins Englische, arbeitete zeitweilig mit Erwin Piscator zusammen und gestaltete Probleme des Widerstands in neuen Historien- und Zeitstücken. Freilich fanden seine europäisch orientierten Texte kaum das Interesse der New Yorker Theater. Dennoch sind Bruckners antifaschistisches Engagement und sein literarischer und außeliterarischer Einsatz gegen die nazistische Gewaltherrschaft in Europa höchst beeindruckend und geschichtlich sehr verdienstvoll gewesen. Nach Kriegsende versuchte Bruckner wieder im deutschsprachigen Kulturraum Fuß zu fassen, was aber nur schwer gelang. Die Kritik konnte mit seinem Spätwerk wenig anfangen. Seine Nachkriegsstücke wurden zwar da und dort gespielt, aber der große Erfolg der Jahre vor dem Exil stellte sich nicht mehr ein - weder in Deutschland noch in der Schweiz noch in Österreich. Bruckner lebte seit 1953 bis zu seinem Tode am 5. Dezember 1958 in Berlin. Er war unter anderem als dramaturgischer Berater am Schillertheater tätig. Nach seinem Tode geriet sein Werk weitgehend in Vergessenheit ; im Zuge der Erforschung der Literatur der Weimarer Republik und der Exilliteratur wurde man seiner erneut gewahr. So hat Bruckners Gesamtwerk (abgesehen von einigen Teilpublikationen) keine Publizität erfahren. Das ist um so bedauerlicher, als Bruckner gerade zu den literarisch qualifiziertesten Seismographen der bewegten ersten Hälfte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts gehört und höchst aufschlußreich für die unterschiedlichsten geistigen Problemfelder des ersten Weltkriegs, der Weimarer Republik, des amerikanischen Exils und der Nachkriegszeit ist. Allein schon deshalb verdient sein vielgestaltiges Werk (bis hin zu seinen Tagebüchern und zur Korrespondenz) eine Integration in die Literatur- und Kulturgeschichte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts. Die Ausgabe seiner Werke, Tagebücher und Briefe soll diesem Ziel Rechnung tragen. Die Ferdinand Bruckner-Ausgabe entsteht in Zusammenarbeit mit der Stiftung Archiv der Akademie der Künste Berlin-Brandenburg im Rahmen der Projekte des Studienganges Editions-wissenschaft der Freien Universität Berlin. Die Überlieferung der gedruckten und der ungedruckten Texte ist günstig. Der Nachlaß Bruckners befindet sich seit 1961 im Archiv der Akademie der Künste und kann in vollem Umfang für diese Ausgabe ausgewertet werden. Die Edition ist als wissenschaftliche Ausgabe unter Berücksichtigung der vorhandenen Textüberlieferung konzipiert worden. Die Struktur der Ausgabe ist durch die Textgattungen bestimmt : Schauspiele, Bearbeitungen und Übersetzungen, Schauspiele aus dem Nachlaß, Filmskripte, Prosa, Lyrik, Kleine Schriften, Tagebücher, Briefe. Innerhalb der Textgattungen gilt das chronologische Prinzip der Entstehung beziehungsweise ersten Publikation, sei sie als Uraufführung oder als Erstdruck erfolgt. Editorische Textgrundlage ist in der Regel die editio princeps. Varianten späterer Fassungen werden, sofern sie relevant sind, berücksichtigt. Der Ausgabe werden Kommentarbände beigegeben, die neben den Sacherläuterungen die Überlieferung des Textes, seine Entstehung und seine Rezeption nach Möglichkeit darstellen werden. In besonderen Fällen sollen textgenetische Transkriptionen in einzelnen Studienbänden vorgelegt werden, die geeignet sind, die Arbeitsweise des Autors zu dokumentieren. Eine bündig-geschlossene Textgenese läßt sich allerdings nur im Ausnahmefall vorstellen, da vor allem bei den Texten aus den zwanziger Jahren und aus der Exilzeit zahlreiche textuelle Zwischenstufen verloren gegangen sind. Sehr aufschlußreich für die Person des Autors und ihre Lebensumstände wird die Edition der Notiz- und Tagebücher sein, die in beträchtlichem Umfang erhalten sind. Sie umfassen über viertausend, meist kleinformatige Kalenderseiten mit unterschiedlich dichter Eintragungsfolge. Die Notizen sind (wie auch die Werkmanuskripte) seit den vierziger Jahren häufig in Gabelberger Stenographie erfolgt. Die Eintragungen betreffen gesellschaftliche und politische Vorgänge, beziehen sich auf Werkkonzeptionen, Lektüren und Schreibkrisen ; sie geben Auskünfte über Bruckners Verhältnis zu Kollegen. Eben solche Informationsqualität über Werk, Autor und Zeit besitzt der umfangreiche Briefwechsel Bruckners, von dem an die 6.000 Briefe, Postkarten und Telegramme im Nachlaß vorliegen ; weitere Briefe dürften sich noch finden lassen. Zu den Korrespondenten gehören die bedeutendsten Geister der ersten Hälfte des zwanzigsten Jahrhunderts. Die Ausgabe wird mit einer Dokumentation zu Biographie, Bibliographie und Rezeption des Autors und mit einem ausführlichen Register zur Gesamtausgabe abgeschlossen werden. Die Bände der Ausgabe werden als Einzelpublikationen vertrieben, so daß die Textbände ohne die umfangreichen wissenschaftlichen Beigaben auch ihre Aufgabe als Lese-Ausgabe erfüllen können, allerdings mit dem Vorteil, daß die Texte philologisch-kritisch behandelt worden sind, so daß auch dem am wissenschaftlichen Apparat weniger interessierten Leser zuverlässige Texte vorliegen.

Theodor Rättig (1841-1912) : Viennese music-publisher who issued the 1887 (1st) version of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony (1877) . Because Bruckner would revise this Symphony (at least) twice, this version is not that which we commonly hear today ; however, Bruckner was glad to see his works in print. This version, as a comparative tool, is extremely important to us because the 3rd Symphony is the only one which Bruckner actually improved upon through revision, in his endless search for « perfection » , approval, and performance of his Symphonies.

Emmanuel (Emil) Wetzler (1839-1901) : Viennese publisher and music-dealer.

Joseph Leopold Kränzl (1825-1907) : Printer and publisher in the town of Ried, located in the Innkreis region of Upper-Austria. In the summer of 1864, the « Kränzl Verlag » produced the « Germanenzug » , which was Bruckner's 1st work to appear in print. This was very encouraging to Bruckner. At the time, he was still organist in Linz, « studying » (orchestration and form) with Otto Kitzler (1834-1915, « Kapellmeister ») . As they poured over the score of « Tannhäuser » , in 1863, their time would not be wasted. Bruckner would learn to escape the tyranny of Simon Sechter's rules of counterpoint and apply his newly-found freedom in composing his 2 remaining student works : the Overture in G minor and the Symphony in F minor. Ultimately (in 1869) , Bruckner would conduct the 1st performance of the closing section of « Die Meistersinger » , 2 months in advance of the actual premiere - and with Richard Wagner's permission !

Eduard Rappoldi

The Austrian violinist, teacher, conductor, and composer Eduard (Edouard) Rappoldi was born on 21 February 1839 in Vienna and died on 16 May 1903 in Dresden, at age 64.

He is best-known for his teaching and his close association with Joseph Joachim. He began his violin studies at an early age, as do most concert violinists. His 1st teachers were 2 violinists : Leopold Jansa and « Herr » Doleschall. At only age 7, Rappoldi made his 1st public appearance as a violinist and pianist. It has been said that he later became a skilled pianist. At the Vienna Conservatory, he studied from 1851 to 1854 with 2 of the best teachers of the time : Josef Hellmesberger, Senior, and Joseph Böhm. From 1854 to 1861, he played violin in the Vienna Court Opera Orchestra, though presumably not as concert Master. He also toured Europe as a soloist. He was 15 years old when he joined the Orchestra, and 22 when he left.

From 1861 to 1866, he was concert Master of the Rotterdam German Opera Orchestra. He then became an successful Orchestra conductor between the years 1866 and 1870 : in Lübeck, in 1866 ; in Stettin, in 1867 ; and Prague, in 1869. In 1871, at age 32, he was appointed violin teacher at the Royal School of Music, in Berlin, which Joachim had helped establish. Joachim was already teaching there.

Rappoldi was a member of the Joachim Quartet (as violist) , between 1871 and 1877. When Rappoldi joined the Quartet, Heinrich de Ahna moved from viola to 2nd violin and, after Rappoldi left the Quartet, Emmanuel Wirth took his place as violist. De Ahna stayed on 2nd. In 1877, Rappoldi was appointed principal violin instructor and professor at the Dresden Conservatory. He taught there for 15 years.

From 1887, he was also concert Master of the Dresden Court Opera during those years but retired from playing, in 1898. He was then 59 or 60 years old. One source claims he was also conductor at the Dresden Opera. Perhaps, he was one of the conductors, as Opera companies seldom (if ever) hire just 1 conductor.

He, like Bruckner, was a student of Simon Sechter (1788-1867, renowned Austrian theorist ; also composer, conductor, and organist) . His wife Laura Rappoldi-Kahrer (1853-1925) , who had been a theory student of Bruckner at the Vienna Conservatory, was a famous pianist. In 1890, she, too, became a professor at the Dresden Conservatory.

His compositions include Symphonies, Quartets, and Sonatas. His music is seldom performed now except, perhaps, in Germany and Austria. One of Rappoldi's best-known and most accomplished pupils was Charles Martin Loeffler, a very influential violinist and composer in the United States, in the 1st half of the 20th Century.

According to a usually-reliable source, Rappoldi played a 1719 Stradivarius violin now known as the « Rappoldi Strad » .

...

The Austrian violinist, teacher, conductor, and composer Eduard (Edouard) Rappoldi studied at the Vienna Conservatory under Leopold Jansa, Josef Hellmesberger Senior, Joseph Böhm (violin) , and Simon Sechter (composition) . From 1854 to 1861, he was a member of the Vienna Court Opera Orchestra, and made successful tours through Germany, Holland, and Belgium. From 1861 to 1866, he was concert Master at Rotterdam and, from 1866 to 1870, conductor at Lübeck, Stettin, and Prague. In 1871, he was appointed teacher of the violin at the « Königliche Hochschule für Musik » , in Berlin, where he remained until 1877, when he became chief instructor in the violin at the « Dresden Conservatorium » , which position he held for 15 years. Until his retirement, in 1898, he was also concert Master of the « Dresden Oper Orchester » . In 1874, he married the pianist Laura Kahrer. Since that year, the couple made extensive concert tours. Rappoldi's eminent execution is consecrated to the highest object of art. He is noted for his rendering of Beethoven's Violin Concerto and Joachim's Hungarian Concerto.

Though a violinist of the 1st rank, Rappoldi prefers artistic interpretation to display. He is also distinguished as a Quartet player, and has contributed greatly to the advancement of Chamber music, in Dresden. His compositions include Symphonies, Quartets, Sonatas, and Lieder with pianoforte accompaniment.

...

Noted Austrian violinist and composer ; born in Vienna, and began his music study very early under Doleschall. In his 7th year, he appeared publicly as a violinist, pianist and composer. Studied under Leopold Jansa, later under Josef Hellmesberger, Senior, at the Vienna Conservatory, and under Joseph Böhm. He also studied composition at the Conservatory under Simon Sechter and Ferdinand von Hiller. He played in the Vienna Opera Orchestra, from 1854 to 1861. From 1861 to 1866, he was leader of the German Opera at Rotterdam, and was conductor successively at Lübeck, Stettin and Prague. From 1870, he was teacher at the Royal School of Music, in Berlin, where he was a colleague of Joseph Joachim and a member of his String Quartet. In 1876, he was made a Royal professor. In 1877, he became orchestral conductor of the Dresden Opera, and later became the headship of the violin department in the Dresden Conservatory. In 1874, he married the pianist Laura Kahrer. He has composed a number of Symphonies, Sonatas, instrumental Quartets and solos, and Songs.

...

Eduard (Edouard) Rappoldi was placed by his father, at an early age, under the teaching of Doleschall, and made his 1st appearance, in his 7th year, as violinist, pianist, and composer. His talent for the pianoforte was so great as to induce the Countess Irma Banffy (1851-1875) , born Baroness Banffy de Losonczo, to put him under Johann Gottfried

Mittag, Sigismund Thalberg's teacher. But the violin was the instrument of his choice, and he succeeded in studying it under Leopold Jansa, who induced him to go to London, in 1850. Here, he made no recorded appearance.

On his return to Vienna, he was so far provided for by the liberality of the same lady, that he became a pupil of the Conservatory under Josef Hellmesberger, Senior, from 1851 to 1854. He then put himself under Joseph Böhm, and shortly began to travel, and to be spoken of as a promising player. The 1st real step in his career was conducting a concert of Joseph Joachim's in Rotterdam, in 1866. At the end of that year, he went to Lübeck as « Kapellmeister » ; in 1867, to Stettin in the same capacity ; and, in 1869, to the « Landestheater » in Prague.

During this time, he was working hard at the violin, and also studying composition with Simon Sechter and Ferdinand von Hiller. From 1870 to 1877, he was a colleague of Joachim's at the « Hochschule » , in Berlin (where he proved himself a 1st rate teacher) , and a member of his Quartet Party. In 1876, he was made Royal Professor and, soon after, received a call to a Concertmeistership in Dresden. This, however, his love for Joachim and for Berlin, where he had advanced sufficiently to lead the Quartets alternately with his chief, induced him for a long time to hesitate to accept, notwithstanding the very high terms offered. At length, however, he did accept it, and is now joint- « Konzertmeister » with Johann Christoph Lauterbach, at the Dresden Opera, and chief teacher at the « Conservatorium » . Though a virtuoso of the 1st rank, he has followed in the footsteps of Joseph Joachim by sacrificing display to the finer interpretation of the music, and has succeeded in infusing a new spirit into Chamber music, in Dresden.

Eduard Rappoldi has composed Symphonies, Quartets, Sonatas, and Songs, some of which have been printed. They are distinguished for earnestness, and for great beauty of form, and a String Quartet was performed in Dresden, in the winter of 1878, which aroused quite an unusual sensation.

In 1874, he married a lady who is nearly as distinguished as himself, Miss Laura Kahrer, who was born in Vienna, in 1853, and whose acquaintance he made many years before at Prague. Her talent, like his, showed itself very early. On the nomination of the Empress Elisabeth, she became a pupil of the Vienna Conservatory, under piano teacher Dacha and Otto Dessoff, from 1866 to 1869. After taking the 1st prize, she made a « tournée » (tour) to the principal towns of Germany, ending at Weimar. There, she studied under Franz Liszt, and matured that beauty of touch, precision, fire, and intelligence, which have raised her to the 1st rank of pianists in Germany, and which induced Herr Hans von Bülow (no lenient critic) to praise her playing of Beethoven's Piano Sonata No. 29 in B-flat major, Opus 106, in the highest terms. She is the worthy colleague of her husband in the best concerts in Dresden. Madame Kahrer-Rappoldi has not yet visited England.

...

Eduard Rappoldi (21. februar 1839 i Wien - 16. maj 1903 i Dresden) var en østrigsk violinist.

Rappoldi var 1854-1861 medlem af hofoperaens orkester i Wien, 1861-1866 koncertmester i Rotterdam, 1866-1870 kapelmester i Lübeck, Stettin og Prag, 1871-1877 lærer ved den kongelige højskole for musik i Berlin, 1877-1898 koncertmester i Dresden og lærer ved konservatoriet.

Rappoldi har udgivet nogle kammermusikværker. Hans Hustru Laura Kahrer, født 14. januar 1853 i Mistelbach ved Wien, var en fortræffelig pianistinde, elev af Wienerkonservatoriet. Begge har gentagne gange foretaget koncertrejser (København 1877 og 1878) .

...

Der Violinspieler Eduard Rappoldi war ein Schüler von Leopold Jansa und Joseph Böhm, 1854 Mitglied des Hofopernorchesters in Wien, 1861 bis 1866 Konzertmeister der Deutschen Oper in Rotterdam, darauf Operkapellmeister in Lübeck, Stettin und Prag. 1871 ging er als Lehrer an die königliche Hochschule für Musik in Berlin.

Rappoldi kam 1877 nach Dresden. Er arbeitete bis 1898 als Hofkonzertmeister. Bis 1893 war er zugleich Lehrer am Konservatorium. Er veröffentlichte Lieder, zwei Violinsonaten, eine Klaviersonate und andere. Seine Gattin Laura, geborene Kahrer, geboren 14. Januar 1853 in Mistelbach bei Wien, Schülerin des Wiener Konservatoriums, dann von Franz Liszt, Adolph von Henselt und Hans von Bülow, war ab 1890 ebenfalls Lehrerin des Klavierspiels am Konservatorium in Dresden. Die Familie Rappoldi wohnte in der Albrechtstraße 10, I. Stock.

...

Der langjährige königliche Hofkonzertmeister Eduard Rappoldi, eigentlich Rappold, in Dresden zählt zu den größten Geigenvirtuosen der Gegenwart. Seine Technik ist eine vollendete und sein Ton voll Seele, rührend, hinreißend und poetisch. Er singt wundervoll auf seinem Instrument, versteht aber auch die Rhythmen selbst im schnellsten Tempo noch auszuprägen. Ich habe es bereits in meinem Buche : « Das Dresdener Hoftheater in der Gegenwart » ausgesprochen, daß er Joseph Joachim in keiner Weise nachsteht : Dieser edle, volle, durch und durch gesunde Ton, diese Stilgröße und die Abgeklärtheit im Vortrag, die Reinheit und Feinheit der Nuancierung, alles das erinnert an den Berliner Geigerkönig. Aber er kopiert ihn nicht, sondern ist durchaus selbstständig- und individuell; dabei verschmäht er jede Virtuosenkoketterie und seine große Technik dient ausschließlich einem ernsten künstlerischen Zwecke.

Daß Rappoldi ein musikalisches Wunderkind war, versteht sich von selbst. Geboren am 21. Februar 1839 in Wien, trat er schon mit sieben Jahren in einer von seinem damaligen Lehrer Doleschall veranstalteten Akademie als Pianist, Violinist und mit einer eigenen Komposition auf. Er war ein Schüler von Hellmesberger Senior, Joseph Böhm, Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst und Leopold Jansa. Nach vollendeten Studien unternahm er erfolgreiche Kunstreisen nach allen Städten der österreichisch-ungarischen Monarchie, sowie nach Norddeutschland, Belgien und Holland und spielte auch an den verschiedensten Höfen mit der größten Auszeichnung. Er folgte einem Rufe als Konzertmeister nach Rotterdam und war dann Kapellmeister in Lübeck, Stettin und am Deutschen Landestheater zu Prag. 1876 wurde er zum königlich preußischen Professor ernannt und erhielt eine Berufung als Hofkonzertmeister nach Dresden, wo er sich allgemeiner Beliebtheit erfreute und zahlreiche Schüler ausbildete. Die Konzertreisen, die er von dort aus mit seiner als Klavierspielerin berühmten Gattin, geborene Laura Kahrer, nach Kopenhagen, Warschau, Wien, München, der Schweiz unternahm, glichen wahren Triumphzügen.

Eduard Rappoldi hat auch als Komponist eine erfreuliche Tätigkeit entfaltet. Es existieren von ihm teilweise gedruckt, teilweise im Manuskript vorhanden : zwei Streichquartette ; zwei Klavier-Violinsonaten ; zwei Symphonien ; gegen 30 Lieder für eine Singstimme ; kleine Chöre ; eine Overtüre.

Vor einiger Zeit hat er seine Entlassung als erster Konzertmeister genommen, die ihm unter den ehrenvollsten Bedingungen bewilligt wurde.

Interessant ist's, daß sein Nachfolger als erster königlich sächsischer Hofkonzertmeister ein polnischer Jude aus Sulkow bei Krakau, der am 17. März 1870 geborene Max Lewinger, ist, der sich als Geigenvirtuos bereits einen klingvollen Namen gemacht hat.

Werke

Opus 2, Nr. 3 : Die Lotosblume (Vier Lieder) ; Text : Heinrich Heine.

Opus 4, Nr. 1 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Stille Sicherheit ; Text : Nikolaus Lenau.

Opus 4, Nr. 2 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Der kühne Schiffer ; Text : Samuel Christian Pape.

Opus 4, Nr. 3 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Rastlose Liebe ; Text : Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

Opus 4, Nr. 4 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Nun die Schatten dunkeln ; Text : Emanuel von Geibel.

Opus 4, Nr. 5 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Gefunden ; Text : Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

Opus 4, Nr. 6 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Abschied ; Text : Justinus Kerner.

Opus 4, Nr. 7 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Erster Verlust ; Text : Johann Wolfgang von Goethe.

Opus 4, Nr. 8 (Acht Lieder für I Singstimme mit Pianoforte) : Des Knaben Berglied ; Text : Johann Ludwig Uhland.

2 Streichquartette.

2 Klavier-Violinsonaten

2 Symphonien.

Gegen 30 Lieder für eine Singstimme.

Kleine Chöre.

I Ouverture.

WAB 13

20-28 avril 1885 : WAB 13 - « Ecce sacerdos magnus » (voilà le grand prêtre qui plut au Seigneur) , antienne en la mineur pour chœur mixte à 7 ou 8 voix, 3 trombones et orgue. Composée à Vienne pour le millénaire du diocèse de Linz, en 1885. Création à Vöcklabruck, le 21 ou 24 novembre 1912, sous la direction de Max Auer.

Arrangement : Josef Venantius von Wöb (1863-1943) .

Ire édition : UE 3298, Viktor Keldorfer (1873-1959) , Universal-Edition, Vienne (1911-1916) ; avec un avant-propos de Viktor Keldorfer.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , pages 130-140.

Ferdinand Habel, édition Anton Böhm & Sohn, Augsburg (1933 ?) .

EE 4185, Ernst Eulenburg, édition Peters (1939) , pages 19-26.

Ecce sacerdos magnus, qui in diebus suis placuit Deo.
Ideo iurejurando fecit illum Dominus crescere in plebem suam.
Benedictionem omnium gentium dedit illi
Et testamentum suum confirmavit super caput ejus.
Gloria Patri, et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto :
Sicut erat in principio, et nunc, et semper,
Et in saecula saeculorum. Amen.

« Ecce sacerdos magnus » est un antienne et un répons de la Liturgie des Heures et du « Graduale Romanum » .

Le texte latin est « Ecce sacerdos magnus, qui in diebus suis, placuit Deo » , ce qui signifie : « Voilà le grand prêtre qui plut au Seigneur. » . Dans certains cas, ces mots sont suivis de « et inventus est iustus » . Dans d'autres, la réponse est « Non est inventus similis illi, qui conservaret legem excelsis » (personne n'est comme lui comme gardien des lois du Très-Haut) .

Ce texte peut être utilisé lors de la procession de l'Évêque durant une ordination.

Ce texte a été mis en musique par les compositeurs Anton Bruckner et Edward Elgar.

...

« Ecce sacerdos magnus » (Behold a great priest) , WAB 13, is an 1885 sacred Motet by the Austrian composer Anton Bruckner. It is a musical setting of the antiphon of the same title.

This setting was composed at the request of Choir Director Johann Baptist Burgstaller, to be performed at the Linz Cathedral on the 100th anniversary of the founding of the diocese. It was completed by 28 April 1885 and sent to Burgstaller in mid-May. However, the work was not performed at that event. The work, which was edited by Viktor Keldorfer, in 1911, was premiered, on 21 November 1921, by the Vöcklabruck women's Choral Society. The Motet is put in Band XXI/33 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

The piece of in total 106 bars is a 6 part « responsorium » in A minor for 8 voice mixed choir, 3 trombones and organ :

« Ecce sacerdos magnus » (bars 1-22) . As in Bruckner's « Te Deum » , the work begins with bare 5ths.

« Ideo jure jurando » (bars 23-39) . This 2nd part the work, which is recalling the harmony of the previous « Locus iste » and « Christus factus est » (WAB 11) , is repeated 2 times as a « ritornello » on bars 64-80 and 90-106.

« Benedictionem omnium » (bars 40-63) . As in Mass No. 1 and the Adagio of most of Bruckner's Symphonies, this 3rd part contains Bruckner's typical ascending scales.

« Ideo jure jurando » (bars 64-80) . 1st repeat of bars 23-39.

Chorale : « Gloria Patri et Filio » (bars 81-89) . This 5th part, which is sung a cappella in unison, is a transcription of the Gregorian « plain-chant » « Gloria Patri » with a different metric structure.

« Ideo jure jurando » (bars 90-106) . 2nd repeat of bars 23-39.

The antiphon, which was intended as processional music for the entrance of the Bishop into the cathedral, was thus designed to be « majestic » and « ceremonial » in character. The work's « most enthralling feature » is « the antiphonal writing of Gabrielian “ grandeur ” » in bars 64-66. Kinder calls the piece, « one of Bruckner's crowning achievements in the small forms » and « a work of almost barbaric intensity » .

The trombones, which usually double the low-voices, occasionally adopt independent lines. The « ritornello » on the words « Ideo jurejurando » is expanded and contrasted with episodes « that seem to trace the evolution of church music » in their varied use of texture. In contrast, the harmonic structure is more reflective of Bruckner's own compositional style. The piece includes several references to Bruckner's 1854 « Libera me » , particularly in the harmonic writing.

...

WAB 13 (1885) : « Ecce sacerdos magnus » ; antiphon in A minor for mixt choir (SSAATTBB) , 3 trombones and organ.

Arranger : Josef Venantius von Wöb (1863-1943) .

Universal-Edition, Vienna (1916) .

During the 3 year period Anton Bruckner spent on the composition of his immense 8th Symphony, the composer found little time to produce much else. Yet, those few works which came from 1884-1887, mostly sacred vocal pieces, are of very high-quality and imaginative. Perhaps, the most arresting is the Motet « Ecce sacerdos magnus » for mixed chorus, 3 trombones and organ from 1885.

From its very opening, impassioned in utterance and almost barbaric in its opulence despite its economy of means, it is apparent that this Motet inhabits the same world as the recent « Te Deum » and the contemporary 8th Symphony. It is a vital, almost militant, assertion of Faith which yields to a highly-contrapuntal interweaving of voices and organ. At the word « Benedictionen » , the Trio of trombones enter with solemn dignity, underlining the benevolence of the text. The following « Gloria Patri » utilizes ancient plain song for a cappella unison voices until the vigor of the opening returns at the words « Ideo jurejando fecit » , a curious, yet effective, choice for reprisal. Bruckner then opts for a serene ending with the words « plebem suam » , an humble invocation to God to bless and increase His people. « Ecce sacerdos » is perhaps the most unusual of Bruckner's mature Motets. Even in returning to the beloved idioms of his youth, one is reminded of the composer's dictum :

« They would like me to compose a different way but I cannot. I must not. » .

...

12 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Moritz von Mayfeld (Linz) .

Right Honourable Sir.

Sincere sympathy at the bitter loss to your entire, highly-respected and honoured family.

“ Requiescat in pace ! ”

The success in Munich was the greatest of my life. There never had been such enthusiasm in Munich, as I was told. Excellent reviews. “ Neueste Nachrichten ”, “ Süddeutsche Press ”, in particular, with the most spirited approval, “ Herr ” Levi toasted the most significant Symphonic work since 1827, with the most enthusiastic applause of hundreds, and called the performance of the marvelous work, as he called it, the crown of his artistic activity. Levi reported to the King, who accepted the dedication. My Quintet and, above all, the new “ Te Deum ”, which Wetzler wants to print, has evoked the greatest jubilation.

A kiss on the hand to your gracious wife !

With deepest respect, I remain

Devotedly yours,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Herzliches Beileid zu dem herben Verluste ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 161 ; pages 187-188.

Moritz von Mayfeld (1817-1904) : Government official, composer, pianist, painter, and writer. He and his wife, Betty von Mayfeld (1831-1908) , lived in Linz, from 1859 to 1873 ; and they both were very fond of Bruckner, considering him a close friend and a gifted composer.

This may allude to the death of Moritz von Mayfeld's mother.

Bruckner is referring to the performance of his 7th Symphony in Munich, on March 10, 1885.

Emmanuel (Emil) Wetzler (1839-1901) : Viennese publisher and music-dealer.

14 mai 1885 : Otto Klemperer is born in Breslau, Germany (now, Wrocław, in Poland) , of Jewish parents. His mother, Ida, is a composer and pianist.

18 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Johann Baptist Burgstaller (Linz) .

« Reverend Vicar !

Although I have only my times of rest for composing, and not even these for a long time !!! Even so, I have kept my promise and send you under separate cover the new “ Ecce sacerdos magnus ”.

The “ Te Deum ”, as I hear, will be published. The Mass (in E minor) , dedicated to the late most venerable Bishop, belongs to the “ Dombau-Verein ”. I have undertaken revisions, and might they now be copied into the parts, since a new Bishop is reigning ? The Mass is vocal-music, with woodwinds and brass-ensemble accompaniment without strings. In 1869, I rehearsed the Mass and conducted it on the most magnificent days of my lifetime at the consecration in the votive chapel. The Bishop and the Governor toasted me at the Bishop's table.

With sincerest respect, I remain

Most devotedly,

Anton Bruckner

It was not required of me to write-out the “ Sicut erat ”, but I have made note of it in the chorale. »

Incipit : « Obwohl mir nur meine Erholungsstunden ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 160 ; page 187.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 11 ; pages 19-20.

Johann Baptist Burgstaller (1840-1925) : Cathedral Curate. Choir director at the New Cathedral (« Neuer Dom ») in Linz, from 1869 to 1909.

This would be the Mass in E minor. It was dedicated to Bishop Franz-Josef Rüdiger (1811-1884) , who had especially liked to sit and listen as Bruckner practised and improvised. He had loved Bruckner's music and had been an enthusiastic friend and supporter of Bruckner.

The words « Dombau-Verein » literally mean the cathedral building association. The manuscript belonged to the Cathedral and was probably housed in the Library, there.

The new Bishop was Ernest Maria Müller (1822-1888) , consecrated Bishop of Linz on April 26, 1885.

It was not only Bishop Rüdiger who had recognized the quality of Bruckner's music, but also the Governor. He and the new Bishop both toasted Bruckner as he sat at the Bishop's table as a guest of honour at the banquet which followed the ceremonies of consecrating this new Bishop.

Ernest Maria Müller

30 June 1822 : Born in Irritz, Czech Republic.

13 July 1846 (Aged 24) : Ordained Deacon in Vienna.

20 July 1846 (Aged 24) : Ordained Priest in Vienna.

17 February 1885 : (Aged 62.6) : Selected as Bishop of Linz.

27 March 1885 (Aged 62.7) : Confirmed as Bishop of Linz.

26 April 1885 (Aged 62.8) : Ordained Bishop of Linz.

3 May 1885 (Aged 62.8) : Installed as Bishop of Linz.

28 September 1888 (Aged 66.2) : Died as Bishop of Linz.

...

30. Juni 1822 : Geboren in Irritz (Mähren) .

20. Juli 1846 : Priesterweihe in Wien.

1847 : Studienpräfekt am fürsterzbischöfl. Alumnat in Wien.

1849 : Dozent für Erziehungskunde.

22. Juli 1853 : Promotion zum Doktor der Theologie in Wien.

1858-1868 : Professor für Moraltheologie an der Universität Wien.

1868 : Domherr in Wien.

17. Februar 1885 : Kaiserliche Ernennung zum Bischof von Linz.

27. März 1885 : Päpstliche Bestätigung.

26. April 1885 : Bischofsweihe in Wien.

3. Mai 1885 : Inthronisation in Linz.

28. September 1888 : Gestorben in Linz.

Ernest Maria Müller (geboren 30. Juni 1822 in Irritz, Mähren ; gestorben 28. September 1888 in Linz) war katholischer Bischof der Diözese Linz.

Der Sohn eines Volksschullehrers besuchte das Gymnasium in Nikolsburg, studierte 1843 Theologie in Wien und wurde am 19. Juli 1847 zum Priester geweiht. 1853 promovierte er zum Doktor der Theologie war Professor für Moraltheologie an der Universität Wien. 1863 Regens am Priesterseminars und 1864 Ehrendomherr in Wien.

Kaiser Franz Josef von Österreich ernannte ihn am 26. April 1885 zum Bischof von Linz. Papst Leo XIII. bestätigte ihn am 27. März 1885. Konsekriert wurde er am 26. April 1885 durch Cölestin Josef Ganglbauer dem Erzbischof von Wien. Seine Inthronisation in Linz erfolgte am 3. Mai 1885. Er setzte sich für den Weiterbau des neuen Doms ein und war der Kirchenmusik sehr zugetan.

Seine letzte Ruhestätte fand er im neuen Dom zu Linz.

...

Ernest Maria Müller : Bischof von Linz, geboren am 30. Juni 1822 zu Irritz in Mähren ; gestorben am 28. September 1888. Er wurde 1846 zum Priester geweiht, Cooperator zu Preßbaum, 1847 Studienpräfect im fürsterzbischöflichen Alumnat in Wien, 1849 Docent der Erziehungskunde an der Universität, 1850 Subrector des Priesterseminars, 1853 Doktor der Theologie, 1857 bis 1868 ordentlicher Professor der Moraltheologie an der Universität, 1863 zugleich Director des Priesterseminars, bis 1885, und fürsterzbischöflicher Consistorialrath, 1868 Domcapitular zu Sankt Stephan in Wien, 1877 päpstlicher Hausprälat ; am 17. Februar 1885 zum Bischof von Linz ernannt, am 27. März präconisirt, am 26. April von dem Fürsterzbischof von Wien, Cardinal Ganglbauer in Wien consecrirt, am 3. Mai in Linz inthronisirt.

Als Erzieher des Clerus genoß Müller während seiner langjährigen Wirksamkeit als Seminardirector in Wien ein großes Ansehen. Als Bischof trat er in der kurzen Zeit seines Wirkens mit Ernst und Eifer in die Fußstapfen seines Vorgängers Rüdiger. Auf dem Gebiete seiner Fachwissenschaft verfaßte er vor allem ein geschätztes, auch außerhalb Oesterreichs verbreitetes Lehrbuch : « Theologia moralis » (3 Bände, Wien 1868-1876 ; 1887 erschien Band I und II in 5. , Band III in 4. Auflage ; nach dem Tode des Verfassers bearbeitete Adolf Schmuckenschläger die seitherigen weiteren Auflagen ; Band I und II in 8. Auflage 1899 ; Band III in 7. Auflage 1902) . Als Bischof veröffentlichte Müller die Schrift : « Lösung der für die Pastoral-Conferenzen des Jahres 1886 dem Linzer Diöcesan-Clerus vorgelegten Fragen » (Linz 1887) , und das populär religiöse « Belehrungsbüchlein » : « Geistliche Apotheke für Alle, die ewig leben wollen » (Steyr 1887, 3. Auflage 1889 ; auch in verschiedene fremde Sprachen übersetzt) . In der von Scheiner und Häusle herausgegebenen « Zeitschrift für die gesammte katholische Theologie » (Wien) waren Müller's erste moralwissenschaftliche Arbeiten erschienen : « Über Herbart's Begriff des Sittlichen und des Sittengesetzes. Ein Beitrag zur Würdigung seiner Moral » (Band VII, 1855, Seiten 82-105) ; « Über das höchste Gut in der katholischen Ethik » (Band VIII, 2, 1856, Seiten 189-228) . Zahlreiche, in der Regel an der Spitze der Quartalshefte gedruckte Beiträge aus dem Gebiete der praktischen Theologie enthält von seiner Hand die Linzer « Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift » in den Jahrgängen 1875-1885. Auch zu den « Blättern für Kanzel-Beredsamkeit » lieferte er Beiträge.

...

Ernest Maria Müller wurde am 30. Juni 1822 in Irritz bei Misslitz (Jirice und Miroslavi) , Mähren, geboren. Der Sohn eines Volksschullehrers besuchte das Gymnasium in Nikolsburg und studierte anschließend Theologie in Wien (1843-1846) . Nach der Priesterweihe am 19. Juli 1846 wirkte Müller ein Jahr als Kooperator in Preßbaum, 1847 wurde er

Studienpräfekt und 1849 Subrektor am Wiener Priesterseminar sowie Supplent für Erziehungskunde. 1853 Promotion zum Doktor der Theologie, 1857 Berufung zum am Ort und 1858 zum oder Professor der Moraltheologie an der Theologischen Fakultät der Universität Wien. 1861 wurde er Dekan des Professorenkollegiums, 1863 zugleich des Professoren- und Doktorenkollegiums. Bekannt wurde Müller durch sein ab 1868 erscheinendes dreibändiges Werk « Theologia moralis », das zehn Auflagen erlebte. 1863 wurde Müller zum Regens des Wiener Priesterseminars bestellt, 1864 zum Ehrendomherrn ernannt ; 1868 wurde er « canonicus universitatis » des Metropolitankapitels bei Sankt Stephan. Nun legte er seine Professur zurück.

Die Ernennung des angesehenen Moraltheologen zum Bischof von Linz durch Kaiser Franz Josef am 17. Februar 1885 kam für viele überraschend (Bischofsweihe in Wien am 26. April 1885 durch Kardinal Cölestin Ganglbauer, Inthronisation in Linz 3. Mai 1885) . Müller erwies sich als eine Kraft des Ausgleichs und leistete einen wichtigen Beitrag zur Beendigung der Konflikte zwischen Kirche und Liberalismus. Schon 1885 ordnete der Bischof die Führung von Pfarrchroniken verpflichtend an. Unter ihm machte der Dombau gute Fortschritte (1885 Einweihung des Presbyteriums, 1886 Beginn des Turmbaus) .

Das 100-Jahr-Jubiläum der Diözese 1885 hielt Müller bereits im Neuen Dom ab, wobei Anton Bruckner ebenso die Orgel spielte wie auch am 29. September 1887 beim 25-Jahr-Jubiläum der Grundsteinlegung des Neuen Domes. In diesem Jahr erließ Müller, ermutigt durch ein römisches « regolamento » und beeinflusst vom Kirchenmusiker Johann Evangelist Habert, eine Verordnung über die Kirchenmusik, in der er sich entgegen den Bestrebungen des Allgemeinen Deutschen Cäcilienvereins (ACV) für den figurierten mehrstimmigen Gesang und die Instrumentalmusik aussprach. Der musikalisch begabte Bischof förderte den Oberösterreichischen Cäcilienverein (OÖCV) und unterstützte auch den Komponisten Habert.

Einen wesentlichen Beitrag leistete Müller zum Aufschwung der Herz-Jesu- und Herz-Mariä-Verehrung in der Diözese. Müller starb am 28. September 1888 nach längerer Krankheit in Linz und wurde im Neuen Dom beigesetzt.

Schriften

Theologia moralis, 3 Bände, Wien (1869-1876) ; Bände 1 und 2 : 21899 ; Band 3 : 61895.

Literatur

Johann Baptist Burgstaller. Bischof Ernest Maria und die Kirchenmusik, in : Christliche Kunstblätter Nr. 29 (1888) .

R. J. Dessl. Die Herz-Jesu-Verehrung in Oberösterreich im 18. und 19. Jahrhundert, in : Jahrbuch des Oberösterreichischen Museal-Vereins 132/1 (1987) ; Seiten 81-136.

Lambert Guppenberger. Bibliographie des Clerus der Diözese Linz, Linz (1893) ; Seiten 135-137.

Alois Hartl. Johann Evangelist Habert - Organist in Gmunden, Wien (1900) , besonders 489-499.

Leopold Mathias. Das Wiener Priesterseminar. Monatsschrift Dissertation, Wien (1975) ; Seiten 149-244.

Gustav Müller. Ernest Maria Müller, Bischof von Linz ; Theologisch-praktische Quartalschrift, Nr. 42. (Jahrgang 1889) ; Seiten 44-54, 296-307, 539-551.

Johann Ruhsam. Der Linzer Bischof Doktor Ernest Maria Müller als theologischer Schriftsteller. Mschr. Diplomarbeit, Linz (1981) .

Josef Lenzenweger. Ernest Maria Müller, in : Rudolf Zinnhobler (Herausgeber) , Die Bischöfe von Linz, Seiten 147-197.

Anton Wappler. Geschichte der theologie Facultät der Universität Wien, Wien (1884) ; Seiten 313, 460.

Rudolf Zinnhobler (Herausgeber) , Ein Bericht des Linzer Domkapellmeisters Johann Baptist Burgstaller über Anton Bruckner (1909) , in : NAGDL Nr. 4 (1985-1986) ; Seiten 229-231.

Rudolf Zinnhobler. Ernest Maria Müller, in : Uwe Harten (Herausgeber) , Bruckner, Seiten 294.

20 mai 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Friedrich Eckstein (Vienne) .

« I authorize, herewith, my dear friend, Director Friedrich Eckstein, to undertake the necessary steps, in his opinion, with regard to the publication of my “ Te Deum ” .

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Ich ermächtige hiemit ... »

Source : Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 19 ; page 28.

Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) : Publicist, philosopher, author, industrialist, and amateur musician - Viennese dilettante. He wrote 2 books of reminiscences on Bruckner : one on his theoretical values and teaching methods (« Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner ») ; the other, an auto-biographical account (« Alte unnennbare Tage ») , is a portrait of Bruckner as man and artist. Eckstein had been a student of Bruckner at the Conservatory and privately, from 1880 to 1884. He largely financed the publication of the « Te Deum » .

30 mai 1885 : The Adagio of the 7th Symphony is performed in Karlsruhe. Hans Paumgartner criticized the « learned musicians at the Court Opera Orchestra » for their inability to evaluate the true worth of Bruckner's Symphonies and for forcing him to « eat the bread of artistic exile » as a result of their refusal to perform his works.

La peinture allemande au XIXe siècle

Sous l'influence du Romantisme grandissant, au XIXe siècle, le viennois Moritz von Schwind (1804-1871) fut le 1er à traiter des épisodes du Moyen-âge. Mais la principale réaction partit, vers 1810, d'un groupe d'artistes, catholiques ardents, surnommés les Nazaréens, qui vivaient à Rome : Overbeck (1789-1869) , Cornelius (1783-1867) , Fürich (1800-1876) , Schnorr von Carosfeld (1794-1879) , travailleurs et instruits, mais au talent limité. Overbeck n'a exécuté que des pastiches maladroits de primitifs italiens. Cornelius et Kaulbach ont peint à Berlin et à Munich des cycles d'œuvres à tendances philosophiques, lourdes de pensées et d'intentions.

Des Nazaréens prirent la tête des 2 grands centres artistiques allemands : Munich et Düsseldorf. L'école de Munich fut fondée par Cornelius, qui en fut avec Kaulbach (1805-1874) le principal protagoniste. Ils servirent les desseins de Louis 1er qui les avait appelés, car il voulait faire de sa capitale une Athènes allemande, bâtie avec des copies de temples grecs et de palais florentins.

À la génération suivante, cette école se continue par des peintres d'histoire tels que Piloty (1826-1886) , inféodé aux Français et à Delaroche, et Makart (1840-1884) , virtuose imitateur des Vénitiens qui joua plus tard un grand rôle à Vienne. Ensuite, elle subit une éclipse. Un autre Nazaréen avait fondé, en 1826, l'école de Düsseldorf, imprégnée de Romantisme rhénan, de vieilles légendes que traduisent Hildebrandt (1804-1874) , Sohn (1805-1867) , Steinbrück. Ils avaient été précédés dans ce genre par Rethel (1816-1859) , auteur de la Salle impériale à Aix-la-Chapelle, et par Moritz von Schwind, déjà cité, qui avait traité des sujets Romantiques à Stuttgart, Munich et Vienne.

Ensuite, le centre artistique de l'Allemagne du Nord se déplaça. Berlin voulut être une capitale de l'art. C'est dans le milieu berlinois plus précis et moins rêveur que s'élabora la réforme réaliste de Menzel (1815-1905) ; il rompt avec ses prédécesseurs par ses tableaux de genre qui l'apparentent à Meissonier et par ses scènes de la vie contemporaine. Il a pour lieutenants Werner (né en 1843) , Gussow et Max Michel. Après Menzel, le chef du réalisme dans l'Allemagne du Nord sera Max Liebermann (1849-1935) . Cependant, Munich redevient la capitale de l'art. Ses 2 sociétés aux nombreux membres, ses expositions, les plus célèbres de toute l'Allemagne, lui assurent de nouveau l'hégémonie artistique. Un groupe d'artistes, les élèves d'Arthur de Ramberg, au 1er rang desquels se place Leibl (1844-1900) , le champion du réalisme en Allemagne, reçoit triomphalement Gustave Courbet. De même, en 1879, c'est Munich qui révèle les impressionnistes à l'Allemagne.

Après Leibl, Lenbach (1836-1904) est à Munich le principal représentant du réalisme. Intelligent et érudit, ce serait uniquement un virtuose ayant su analyser et s'approprier les manières de plusieurs grands Maîtres, si ses portraits, notamment ceux de plusieurs célébrités de l'Allemagne contemporaine, Bismarck, Moltke, n'étaient remarquables par leur acuité psychologique. Cependant l'idéalisme reprend ses droits.

Dernier stade de la peinture en Allemagne au XIXe siècle, comme il l'est aussi de la sculpture, une école néo-idéaliste et symboliste, à laquelle appartiennent les « Worpswédiens » , a succédé à celle des réalistes et impressionnistes trop uniquement préoccupés de l'aspect extérieur des choses, et se présente sous diverses formes : ici, inspirée des Primitifs et des pré-Raphaélites et imprégnée d'un vague mysticisme ; là, cherchant son inspiration dans la légende ; ailleurs, amoureuse de symbole ou d'expression subtile et tombant facilement, comme il arrive souvent dans ce cas en

Allemagne, dans l'obscurité ou l'affectation ; ou bien, au contraire (et sur beaucoup de représentants de ce dernier groupe l'exemple de compatriotes Paul Cézanne et Paul Gauguin n'a pas été sans influence) , montrant une recherche du style et de la ligne décorative.

C'est Munich qui lance le Bâlois Arnold Böcklin (1827-1899) , inventeur d'un nouvel art aux yeux des Allemands, sur qui il exerça une profonde attraction non point tant par ses paysages que par ses mythologies pesantes au trait alourdi, parfaitement germaniques d'inspiration. Hans von Marées (1837-1887) est, avant tout, un décorateur dont les compositions, notamment ses fresques à l' Aquarium de Naples, montrent des recherches originales, quoique desservies par un dessin sans force et un coloris sombre et terne. Le sculpteur Max Klinger se montre, dans ses tableaux, raffiné et poétique. Hans Thoma (1839-1924) interprète de vieux contes dans une manière naïve calquée sur les primitifs allemands. Plus jeune, Fritz von Uhde (1848-1911) mêle le réalisme à l'idéalisme dans des scènes évangéliques à costumes modernes. Franz Stuck (né en 1863) , chef de la jeune école munichoise, procède de Böcklin avec un style plus synthétique.

L'École de Munich

L'école de Munich est le nom donné au groupe de peintres actifs à Munich autour de l'académie des Beaux-arts de Munich du milieu du XIXe siècle, jusqu'au début du XXe siècle. Elle se caractérise par son naturalisme et son style clair-obscur. Ses thèmes de prédilection sont le paysage, le portrait, la peinture de genre, la peinture d'histoire et la nature morte.

Munich devient le lieu d'attraction de peintres attirés par l'académisme à partir des années 1850 et notamment par Carl von Piloty, professeur à l'Académie à partir de 1856, dont il devient le directeur en 1874. Ils mettent l'accent sur le style des fresquistes et s'éloignent du Romantisme en vogue auparavant. Leur peinture d'histoire est influencée par le Français Paul Delaroche, par le colorisme de Rubens et par l'école vénitienne. Outre Piloty, d'autres professeurs, comme Wilhelm von Diez, Wilhelm von Kaulbach et Arthur von Ramberg, s'attirent une renommée certaine.

On cite parmi ses représentants les artistes suivants : Robert Beyschlag, Anton Braith, Bernhard Buttersack, Franz Defregger, Rudolf Epp, Alois Gabl, Eduard von Grützner, Theodor Horschelt, Friedrich Kaulbach, Hermann von Kaulbach, Eduard Kurzbauer, Wilhelm Leibl, Franz von Lenbach, Wilhelm von Lindenschmit, Hans Makart, Christian Mali, Gabriel von Max, Victor Müller, Ferdinand von Piloty, Karl Raupp, Anton Seitz, Wilhelm Trübner.

Les affinités historiques entre le royaume de Bavière et la Grèce (le prince Othon de Wittelsbach est roi des Hellènes, de 1832 à 1862) impliquent que de nombreux peintres grecs sont formés à l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Munich, comme Constantin Volanakis, Nicolas Gysis, Polychronis Lembesis, Nicolas Vokos, Nicéphore Lytras, et Georges Jakobides, qui se rattachent ainsi à l'école de Munich.

...

L'école appelée « École de Munich » est créée sous la régence de Louis 1er alors que Munich se fait un nom en tant que centre artistique important. L'École de Munich est connue pour son niveau académique élevé et elle est fortement attachée aux préférences dynastiques.

En outre, les peintres nazaréens Cornelius et Schnorr exercent à l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Munich. Mais c'est plus tard que la véritable École de Munich connaît son apogée sous la direction de Carl von Piloty.

L'école s'intéresse à la peinture historique, à la peinture de genre mais également à la peinture paysagiste ; les natures mortes et les représentations animales appartiennent aussi au répertoire standard de l'école.

Les représentants de l'École de Munich sont : Nikolaus Gysis, Hans Makart, Wilhelm von Diez, Franz von Lenbach et Karl von Piloty.

...

« Munich School » is the name given to a group of painters who worked in Munich or were trained at the Royal Academy of Fine-Arts of Munich (« Münchner Akademie der Bildenden Künste ») , between 1850 and 1918. In the 2nd half of the 19th Century, the Academy became one of the most important institutions in Europe for training artists and attracted students from across Europe, and the United States.

Munich was an important center of painting and visual art in the period between 1850 and 1914. The mid-Century movement away from the Romanticism and emphasis on fresco painting of the earlier Munich school was led by Karl von Piloty, who was a professor at the Munich Academy, from 1856, and became its director in 1874. Piloty's approach to history painting was influenced by the French academician Paul Delaroche, and by the painterly colorism of Rubens and the Venetians. Besides Piloty, other influential teachers at the Academy were Wilhelm von Diez (1839-1907) , Wilhelm von Kaulbach, and Arthur von Ramberg.

Artists of the Munich School include Anton Braith, Alfred Kowalski, Hans Makart, Gabriel Max, Victor Müller, Franz von Lenbach, Friedrich Kaulbach, Wilhelm Leibl, Wilhelm Trübner, and the genre painters Franz Defregger, Eduard von Grützner, Hermann von Kaulbach and Miroslav Kraljević.

The last generation of students of the Munich School included nearly all the major figures of the German avant-garde, such as Lovis Corinth, Vassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee and Franz Marc.

There were notable schools of Munich trained painters active outside of Germany. The formative influence of teachers and examples of the Munich School shaped the academic naturalism in many European countries - e.g. : the Greek academic art of the 19th Century. Due to the historical affinity between Bavaria and Greece (Prince Otto I was, from 1832 to 1862, the 1st King of Greece) , many Greek artists were trained in Munich. The Munich School in Greek art is the most important artistic movement of Greek Art in the 19th Century with strong influences from the Academy of Munich. Among the leading artists of this school were Konstantinos Volanakis, Georgios Roilos, Nikolaos Gyzis, Polychronis Lembesis, Nikolaos Vokos, Nikiphoros Lytras und Georgios Jakobides.

Most of the artists of the Hungarian Nagybanya school of art were educated in Munich.

The Swedish painters Johan Christoffer Boklund and Johan Fredrik Höckert studied in Munich.

Frank Duveneck and William Merritt Chase were the most prominent exemplars of the Munich School in American art. Other American artists who studied in Munich include John Henry Twachtman and Walter Shirlaw.

The Munich school is characterized by a naturalistic style and dark chiaroscuro. Typical subjects are landscape, portraits, genre, still-life, and history painting.

...

Als Münchner Schule wird ein Malstil der Münchner Malerei des 19. und dem Anfang des 20. Jahrhunderts bezeichnet. Er entstand im Umfeld der Königlichen Akademie der Bildenden Künste und erlangte bald große Bedeutung in der akademischen Malerei.

König Ludwig I., der seit 1825 regierte, förderte die Kunst einerseits durch Museen, andererseits auch durch Förderung der zeitgenössischen Kunst, die München zwischen 1850 und 1914 zu einem der weltweit bedeutenden Zentren der Malerei machte. Dieses ungewöhnlich starke Kulturengagement wird als Kompensation der geringen wirtschaftlichen und militärischen Bedeutung des Landes interpretiert. Weder in Berlin noch in Düsseldorf gab es eine vergleichbare öffentliche Förderung. Gleichzeitig schaffte es die Kunstkritik deutschlandweit ein Publikum zu gewinnen, teilweise wurde durch die Kunstkritik auch politische Kritik geübt. König Ludwig I. war bemüht, auch außerhalb der Landesgrenzen die Kunst zu fördern, so etwa deutsche Künstler in Rom durch entsprechende Auftragsvergaben.

An der Akademie waren zuvor der Nazarener Peter von Cornelius und Julius Schnorr von Carolsfeld tätig. Mit der Berufung von Karl von Piloty als neuem Leiter wurde einerseits das akademische Niveau perfektioniert, andererseits aber auch auf die dynastischen Präferenzen abgestimmt. Dieser Zeitpunkt gilt als Beginn der Münchner Schule. Ein Anliegen Ludwigs I. war es, auch die Freskomalerei wieder zu etablieren. Nachdem Peter von Cornelius die Fresken in den Hofgartenarkaden geschaffen hatte, erlangte die Münchner Schule erstmals größere internationale Aufmerksamkeit und Bedeutung. Das Repertoire der Malerei umfasste zunächst vornehmlich die Historienmalerei, später auch Genre- und Landschaftsmalerei sowie Porträts und Tierdarstellungen. 1843 wurde die Neue Pinakothek eröffnet, in der auch Werke der Münchner Schule ausgestellt wurden. Spätestens seit der Weltausstellung 1867 in Paris hatte die Münchner Schule die Führung der Kunstentwicklung übernommen und die Düsseldorfer Malerschule abgelöst.

Eine beachtliche Anzahl von Künstlerinnen und Künstlern erwirtschaftete ein beachtliches Vermögen. Ein bedeutender Anteil der Kunstwerke wurde im Ausland, vor allem in den USA abgesetzt. Die Künstlerin Tini Rupprecht malte nur in schneller Pastelltechnik, lehnte fünfmal mehr Aufträge ab als sie annahm und erwirtschaftete trotzdem einen siebenstelligen Betrag. Zum Wohlstand einiger Künstler trug das neue Urheberrecht bei. Zahlreiche Werke wurden durch Lithographien und Stiche verbreitet. Mit Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs brachen die Verkaufszahlen auf dem Kunstmarkt ein, wodurch es zu einem künstlerischen Niedergang der Münchener Schule kam.

Bekannte Vertreter

Johan Christoffer Boklund.

Anton Braith.

Bernhard Buttersack.

Robert Beyschlag.

William Merritt Chase.

Franz Defregger.

Wilhelm von Diez.

Frank Duveneck.

Anton Doll.

Rudolf Epp.

Alois Gabl.

Eduard von Grützner.

Nikolaos Gyzis.

Karl Heinisch.

Theodor Horschelt.

Georgios Jakobides.

Friedrich August von Kaulbach.

Hermann von Kaulbach.

Eduard Kurzbauer.

Wilhelm Leibl.

Polychronis Lembesis.

Franz von Lenbach.

Wilhelm von Lindenschmit.

Nikiphoros Lytras.

Hans Makart.

Christian Mali.

Karl Heinisch.

Theodor Horschelt.

Georgios Jakobides.

Friedrich August von Kaulbach.

Hermann von Kaulbach.

Eduard Kurzbauer.

Wilhelm Leibl.

Polychronis Lembesis.

Franz von Lenbach.

Wilhelm von Lindenschmit.

Nikiphoros Lytras.

Hans Makart.

Christian Mali.

Die Münchner Schule zeichnete sich durch Genauigkeit und Naturalismus bei der Darstellung aus. Typische Genres waren Landschafts-, Historien- und Porträtmalerei. In der Historienmalerei wurde eine Versachlichung gepflegt, die dieses Genre von den Effekten und dem übertriebenen Pathos des 17. Jahrhunderts befreite.

Neben der Akademie entstanden zahlreiche Kunstschulen, darunter die renommierten von Heinrich Knirr und von Anton Ažbe. 1914 gab es fast sechzig Kunstschulen in der Stadt. Ein Grund war, auch daß Frauen in der Akademie nicht zugelassen waren, 1882 wurde der Münchner Künstlerinnenverein gegründet. Ein weiterer Grund war, daß versucht wurde, anders als in den anderen Großstädten, die Zahl der Studierenden an der Akademie gering zu halten. Viele Künstler waren in der Münchner Künstlergenossenschaft organisiert, ein Teil spaltete sich später ab und gründete die Münchener Secession. Die große Bedeutung für die Kunst in Deutschland zeigt sich nicht zuletzt daran, daß nahezu die gesamte folgende Avantgarde an der Akademie studiert hatte, darunter Lovis Corinth, Wassily Kandinsky, Paul Klee, Ernst Oppler und Franz Marc. Diese begleiteten jedoch auch das Ende der akademischen Malerei und der Münchener Schule als stilistische Abgrenzung.

Neben Paris war München eines von zwei Studienorten der Kunst internationaler Dimension : Nahezu jede europäische Malerei hat Einflüsse der Münchener Schule zu verzeichnen. Wenngleich es sich insgesamt nur um einige hundert ausländische Studierende handelte, so zählten diese häufig zu den wichtigsten Künstlern ihrer Heimatländer.

Johan Christoffer Boklund der in München studiert hatte, etablierte deren Prinzipien an der Königlich Schwedischen Kunstakademie. Einen ebenso großen Einfluss hatte München auf die Malerei Griechenlands ; da auch Griechen an der Akademie lehrten, entstand eine vielfältige Wechselwirkung. Auch Polen und Litauer entschieden sich in nennenswerter Anzahl für ein Studium in München. Ein von impressionistischen Freiheiten bereicherter Realismus machte für die litauische Malerei München zum Vorbild. Die Neue Bulgarische Malerei geht ebenfalls auf Münchener Vorbilder zurück. Amerikanische Vertreter der Münchener Schule waren und andere Frank Duveneck und William Merritt Chase sowie John Henry Twachtman und Walter Shirlaw.

Die Münchener Schule wurde lange Zeit dem Historismus vollkommen gleichgesetzt und ihre Bedeutung für die europäische Malerei und die deutsche Avant-garde wurde aus vielfältigen Gründen vergessen, teilweise wurde das Werk einzelner Protagonisten aus dem Zusammenhang gerissen. 1979 wurde die Ausstellung Die Münchner Schule : 1850-1914 der Bayerische Staatsgemäldesammlungen gezeigt, 2008 die Ausstellung Vor den Alpen : Malerei der Münchner Schule. Werke der Münchener Schule befinden sich in zahlreichen Kunstsammlungen. Die Anzahl der Werke auf dem Kunstmarkt ist heute jedoch eher gering, so daß selbst kleinere Arbeiten unbekannter Künstler aus dem Umfeld hohe vierstellige Beträge auf Auktionen erzielen.

...

Unter der Förderung König Ludwigs I. (Regierungszeit 1825-1848) bildete sich in München die sogenannte Münchner Schule heraus, deren Ruhm als eine der führenden Malerschulen Deutschlands bis ins 20. Jahrhundert hinein wirkte.

Ludwig I. war es auch, der den Bau der Neuen Pinakothek in München initiierte, um die zeitgenössische Kunst angemessen zu bewahren und zu präsentieren.

Carl Theodor von Piloty (1826-1886) ist als führender Vertreter im Bereich der Historienmalerei zu benennen. Er war auf die Inszenierung tragisch-dramatischer Ereignisse spezialisiert. Piloty lehrte ab 1856 an der Münchner Akademie und hatte von 1874 bis 1886 den Direktorenposten inne. Zu Pilotys Schülern zählten unter anderem Hans Makart, Alexander von Liezen-Mayer und Heinrich Lossow sowie die Genremaler Nikolaus Gysis, Eduard von Grützner, dessen bevorzugtes Sujet trinkende Klosterbrüder waren, und Franz von Defregger, der mit seinen ländlich-bayerischen Szenen Erfolge feierte.

Für die Landschaftsmalerei sind Joseph Wenglein, Adolf Heinrich Lier und Eduard Schleich der Ältere anzuführen. Die beiden letztgenannten gelten als Hauptmeister der stimmungsvollen « intimen Landschaft ». Anton Doll und Friedrich Eibner schufen als Vedutenmaler detailverliebte Stadtansichten. Als Tiermaler wirkten Robert Eberle und Heinrich von Zügel. Weitere wichtige Vertreter der Münchner Schule sind Franz von Lenbach, Wilhelm von Diez, Hugo Kauffmann, Carl Spitzweg und Wilhelm Leibl, um den sich in der Folge ein eigener Künstlerkreis konstituierte (« Leibl-Kreis » mit Wilhelm Trübner und Carl Schuch als wichtigste Mitglieder) .

Künstler und Werke der Münchner Schule wirkten prägend auf die nachfolgenden Maler, beispielsweise auf die Vertreter des deutschen Impressionismus Lovis Corinth, Max Slevogt und Fritz von Uhde.

Hermann von Kaulbach

Les artistes de Munich étaient très intéressés à réaliser un grand portrait d'Anton Bruckner en raison de ses traits uniques et fort impressionnants.

Le peintre Hermann von Kaulbach va en produire un de profil, « grandeur nature » mais sans tenir compte de la demande pressante du compositeur :

« S'il-vous-plaît, veuillez faire mon nez un peu plus petit ! »

Bruckner mesurait 5 pieds et 9 pouces, portait des chemises à large col, des pantalons amples et n'attachait jamais son veston.

...

As Bruckner had told Doctor van Meurs, the concert did take place in Munich and was a rousing success. Bruckner reported his triumph to Arthur Nikisch, on March 15, 1885 :

« I have just returned from Munich where, on the 10th of the month, there was an extremely magnificent performance of my 7th Symphony. The audience received it very enthusiastically ; the conductor and the Orchestra applauded vigorously. 2 laurel wreaths. Next performance, in the autumn. The reviews were very good. Also, especially splendid ; “ Neueste Nachrichten ”, “ Süddeutsche Presse ”, and such.

At a large reception for musicians, “ Herr ” Levi declared :

“ This is the most significant Symphonic work since Beethoven’s death. ”

He added that the performance of this work is going to be the pride and high-point of his artistic career. And the banquets ! The King will also be informed. The Intendant, likewise, sent for me. My portrait was painted by (Hermann von) Kaulbach and I was photographed twice. »

...

1885 : Ludwig Grande (1865-1940) réalise une caricature d'Anton Bruckner.

1885 : L'artiste-peintre allemand Hermann von Kaulbach (1846-1909) qui appartient à l'École de Munich achève son célèbre portrait d'Anton Bruckner : huile sur carton, 74 cm x 56 cm. Il se trouve aujourd'hui exposé au Musée de la Haute-Autriche, au Château de Linz (« Oberösterreichischen Landesmuseum - Schloßmuseum, Linz ») .

Portrait Anton Bruckner, Ölfarben auf Karton, 74 cm x 56 cm (1885) , im Oberösterreichischen Landesmuseum - Schloßmuseum, Linz, Sign. G. 297.

...

Le peintre Wilhelm Kaulbach sera l'auteur du « Torquato Tasso » (1838) et de « la Bataille des Huns » (« Hunnenschlacht ») (vers 1850) , dont s'inspira Franz Liszt dans ses poèmes symphoniques.

« Torquato Tasso » : The portrait depicts a man with a laurel wreath, a cape, loosely pleated black jacket resting his hands on a large book. The man also has a beard and mustache. The background is a muted green.

Le poème symphonique « Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo » (Tasso, lamentation et triomphe) , S.96, fut composé par Franz Liszt en 1849. Il le révisera en 1850-1851 et, de nouveau, en 1854. Il est le 2e des 13 poèmes symphoniques écrits par le musicien durant son séjour à Weimar.

La Ire esquisse de Liszt date du 1er août 1849. Il aurait entendu le thème principal de « Tasso, Lamento e Trionfo » à Venise, en Italie, quelques années plus tôt. Cependant, il l'utilisa dans la version datant de 1840 de sa pièce pour piano « La Gondoliera » du recueil « Venezia e Napoli » . Liszt termina la version de 1849 de « Lamento e Trionfo » comme une Overture en 2 parties, qu'il demanda à August Conradi d'orchestrer. Cette version fut réalisée à Weimar, en Allemagne, en l'honneur du centenaire de la naissance de Johann Wolfgang von Goethe et comme étant une Overture sur drame, « Torquato Tasso » . Liszt a plus tard corrigé la partition de Conradi et demanda à Joachim Raff d'en produire une nouvelle, entre 1850 et 1851. Il la révisa ensuite assez largement lui-même par l'ajout d'une section centrale. Cette dernière version fut jouée le 19 avril 1854, à Weimar, sous la direction de Liszt lui-même.

La version de 1849 est une Ouverture Classique conventionnelle, divisée en une section lente (« Lamentation ») et une rapide (« Triomphe »). Même avec cette division, toute l'œuvre était en fait un ensemble de variations sur une mélodie simple et un hymne folklorique chanté à Liszt par un gondolier de Venise, à la fin des années 1830. Parmi les modifications les plus importantes, l'une d'entre elles sera l'ajout d'une section centrale dans le style d'un menuet. Dans une note en marge, Liszt informe le gondolier que l'orchestre « assume un double rôle » dans cette section : en effet, les cordes et les vents jouent un contenu radicalement différent. Ce style d'écriture est très ressemblant de celui du compositeur italien Pietro Raimondi, dont la Maîtrise du contrepoint était telle qu'il avait écrit 3 Oratorios (nommés Joseph, Potiphar et Jacob) qui peuvent être joués individuellement ou à la suite. Liszt a étudié les œuvres de Raimondi, mais le compositeur italien est mort avant de Liszt n'ait pu le rencontrer personnellement.

...

« Hunnenschlacht » : Huile sur toile exposé à la « Neue Pinakothek » de Munich.

Le poème symphonique « Hunnenschlacht » (« la Bataille des Huns »), S. 105, de Franz Liszt fut écrit en 1857 d'après l'œuvre picturale homonyme de Wilhelm von Kaulbach. La peinture décrivait la bataille des champs Catalauniques qui eut lieu en l'an 451 et, au cours de laquelle, les armées hunniques, menées par Attila rencontrèrent une coalition romaine dirigée par le général romain Flavius Aetius et le roi Wisigoth Theodoric.

La Ire section de cet ouvrage, Tempestuoso, allegro non troppo, porte les instructions suivantes de la part du compositeur :

« L'on devra s'efforcer de maintenir couleur orchestrale très sombre, tous les instruments devant sonner comme des fantômes. »

Le compositeur français Christophe Looten a réalisé, à l'occasion de l'année du bicentenaire de la naissance de Liszt, une transcription de ce poème symphonique pour quatuor à cordes.

...

Hermann von Kaulbach est né le 26 juillet 1846 à Munich et est mort le 9 décembre 1909 à Munich. Il est le fils du peintre Wilhelm von Kaulbach (Bernhard Wilhelm Eliodrus von Kaulbach). Il suit l'enseignement de Carl von Piloty à Munich. Peintre de genre, il s'attache à la précision des détails et au réalisme de ses scènes historiques qui lui font rencontrer le succès dans la mouvance de l'Académie des Beaux-arts de Munich.

Parmi ses autres œuvres, citons :

Louis XI et Olivier Le Daim (1869) .

Confession enfantine (1871) .

Hänsel et Gretel chez la sorcière (1872) , musée national de Riga.

Les Derniers jours de Mozart (1873) , Städtische Galerie de Vienne.

Jean-Sébastien Bach chez Frédéric le Grand (1879) .

Lucrece Borgia (1882) .

Le Couronnement de Sainte-Élisabeth par Frédéric II (1886) , musée de Wiesbaden.

...

Le peintre allemand Friedrich August von Kaulbach est né le 2 juin 1850 à Munich et mort le 26 juillet 1920 à Ohlstadt, près de Murnau am Staffelsee. Il est un réputé pour ses portraits de la haute-société de l'époque, souvent dans le goût français « fin-de-siècle » .

...

Friedrich August von Kaulbach (il signait aussi Fritz August von Kaulbach) est le fils du peintre d'histoire Friedrich Kaulbach et le petit-neveu de Wilhelm Kaulbach. Il étudie à l'Académie royale des Beaux-Arts de Nuremberg auprès d'August von Kreling, parent par alliance, et de Karl Raupp, puis de son père. Il s'installe à Munich en 1871 et fait ensuite partie d'un groupe qui se baptise les princes de la peinture munichoise, avec Franz von Lenbach et Franz von Stuck. Il débute une carrière de portraitiste et devient l'un des mieux payés de cette catégorie dans l'Empire allemand. Il peint des personnages de la société mondaine de l'époque, allemands et même américains.

...

The German painter of the Munich School, Hermann von Kaulbach, concludes his famous portrait of Anton Bruckner in 1885. It is now at the « Oberösterreichischen Landesmuseum - Schloßmuseum, Linz » .

Hermann von Kaulbach was born on 26 July 1846 in Munich and died on 9 December 1909 also in Munich. He was the son of painter Wilhelm von Kaulbach. He was originally a medical student at the Ludwig Maximilian University of Munich but, perhaps inspired by his father, quit school to study painting instead. In 1867, he became a student of Karl von Piloty. Under his influence, Kaulbach devoted himself almost entirely to historical themes. Ultimately though, he became best-known for his portraits of children. He made 2 study trips to Rome, in 1880 and 1891. Meantime, in 1886, he was appointed a Professor of History Painting at the Academy of Fine-Arts in Munich. In 1906, he published a picture book, with children as motifs, that sold 135,000 copies.

He was married to Sophie Schroll, the daughter of an engraver, and they had 3 children. Many of his works are on display at the Museum in Bad Arolsen (his father's birthplace) . His letters and other papers are in the collection of the German Literature Archive (part of the Museum of Modern Literature) in Marbach am Neckar. He is buried in the « Alter Südfriedhof » , in Munich.

Although his work was generally well received, he was occasionally criticized for giving too much attention to detail, while missing the significance of the painting's main subject. His portrait of Lucrezia Borgia created a controversy because it was considered « too lewd » , and his version of the Coronation of Saint-Elizabeth by Emperor Frederick II was dismissed by some critics as « costume painting » .

Major works

« Hänsel und Gretel bei der Hexe » - Hänsel and Gretel with the Witch (1872) ; Municipal Gallery, Riga.

« Mozarts Letzte Tage » - Mozart's Last Days (1878) ; Municipal Gallery, Vienna.

« Krönung der heiligen Elisabeth durch Kaiser Friedrich II. » - Coronation of Saint-Elizabeth by Emperor Frederick II (1886) ; Museum at Wiesbaden.

« An der Grabstätte des Freundes » (At the Tomb of a Friend ; 1888, in the Neue Pinakothek, Munich) .

...

Kaulbach : German family of artists. The goldsmith, engraver and amateur painter Philipp Karl Friedrich Kaulbach was born on 25 November 1775 in Arolsen, Waldeck (now, Hessen) ; and died on 10 December 1846 in Mülheim an der Ruhr. One of his 2 sons was Wilhelm von Kaulbach. Head of the new German school, he was a pupil of Peter Cornelius, and associated with him in painting the frescoes in the « Glyptothek » , in Munich. Among other works, which have made his name famous, he executed the splendid series of compositions that adorn the vestibule of the Berlin Museum. He illustrated Gøethe's « Faust » and his « Reinecke Fuchs » (1805-1874) . The other son was the sculptor and painter Karl Kaulbach who was born in Arolsen, on 5 March 1808.

Wilhelm von Kaulbach's son, Hermann Kaulbach, was born in Munich on 26 July 1846 and died in Munich on 9 December 1909. He was a history and genre painter. Christian Kaulbach (1777-1847) , brother of Philipp Karl Friedrich Kaulbach, was a cabinet maker. He was the father of Friedrich Kaulbach. Friedrich Kaulbach's son Friedrich August von Kaulbach was born in Munich on 2 June 1850 and died in Ohlstadt bei Murnau, Bavaria, on 26 July 1920. He was a portrait and genre painter.

...

Hermann von Kaulbach (geboren 26. Juli 1846 in München ; gestorben 9. Dezember 1909 ebenda) war ein deutscher Maler der Münchner Schule.

Hermann von Kaulbach, Sohn des Malers Wilhelm von Kaulbach, brach sein Medizinstudium an der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München ohne Abschluß ab und widmete sich ganz der Malerei. Er wurde 1867 Schüler von Karl von Piloty. Beeinflusst durch seinen Lehrer behandelte Kaulbach meist historische Themen in seinen Genrebildern. Bekannt ist er für seine Kinderbildnisse. Für eine Opern-Galerie schuf Kaulbach mehrere Grisailen. 1871 heiratete er Sophie Schroll, die in Nürnberg geborene Tochter eines Kupferstechers, der Ehe entstammten drei Kinder. 1880 und 1891 hielt er sich zu Studienzwecken in Rom auf. 1886 wurde er zum Professor für Historienmalerei an die Akademie der bildenden Künste München berufen. Sein erstmals 1906 erschienenes Bilderbuch, vornehmlich mit Kindermotiven, erschien in mehreren Auflagen und wurde über 135.000 mal verkauft.

In Bad Arolsen befindet sich das Geburtshaus seines Vaters. Neben den Werken des Vaters sind im Museum Bad Arolsen auch seine Werke zu besichtigen. Ein Teil seiner Briefe und sonstigen Korrespondenzen ist im Deutschen Literaturarchiv Marbach verwahrt.

Hermann von Kaulbach verstarb am 9. Dezember 1909 und wurde am Alten Südlichen Friedhof zu München begraben.

...

Hermann von Kaulbach, Maler, geboren 26. Juli 1846 zu München, Sohn von Wilhelm), widmete sich anfangs auf der Universität gelehrten Studien, ging dann aber zur Malerei über und wurde Schüler von Karl Piloty. Seine historischen Genrebilder behandeln interessante Stoffe mit malerischem Reiz, der namentlich in der raffinierten Behandlung des Nebensächlichen liegt, während der Hauptinhalt weniger bedeutungsvoll hervortritt. Seine Gemälde gehören meist dem Kostümgenre an. Unter seinen frühern sind hervorzuheben : Ludwig XI. und sein Barbier Olivier le Dain im Gefängnis zu Péronne (1869), Kinderbeichte (1871), eine Kirchenszene (1872), Hänsel und Gretel bei der Hexe, Mozarts letzte Tage (1873), zechende Johanniter (1874), Sebastian Bach bei Friedrich der Große (1875), Voltaire als Paris (1876), der Turm-falke (1879) und mehrere Grisailen zu einer Operngalerie. Ein figurenreiches Bild : Lucrezia Borgia tanzt vor ihrem Vater (1882), verletzt durch die lüsterne Auffassung, und auch ein Gemälde ernstern Inhalts : Krönung der heil. Elisabeth durch Kaiser Friedrich II. von Hohenstaufen (1886), erhob sich nicht über den Wert einer glänzenden Kostümmalerei ohne tiefe Empfindung.

...

1er juin 1885 : « Frankfurter Zeitung » article about the Karlsruhe Music Festival organized by the « Deutscher Musikverein » ...

« Bruckner is a genius who educated himself by emulating Beethoven and who shows, indeed, traits that would be worthy of Beethoven. »

7 juin 1885 : In a letter to conductor Felix Mottl, Bruckner wrote :

« ... Accept my heartfelt thanks with the greatest admiration stemming from the innermost part of my soul, in loving kindness and friendship toward you. Never will I forget that ! I request that you, just such a great artist, remain always, my old young friend and brother ! May your ingenious art be, also forever and ever, always the benefactor of my works ! May God's will be done ! Again, from my entire soul which thanks you, I remain ... »

7 juin 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Felix Mottl (Karlsruhe) .

« Dearest Friend ! Excellent Court “ Kapellmeister ” !

Several days ago, I received the most enthusiastic and honourable review from Professor Nohl, in Heidelberg, wherein I saw that my success had probably been very good. In vain, I waited always for a message from Doctor Schönaich (from the “ Karlsruhe Blätter ”) , nevertheless in vain ! No doubt they must have been very severe ! Otherwise, I have heard nothing further, than through Göllicher who is, in my estimation, too great an enthusiast in this way. (Just a few days ago, I also read some few lines in the “ Frankfurter ” and “ Elsaß Lothringer Zeitung ”.) Otherwise, nothing ! To me, “ Herr ” Nohl is authoritative and frankly enthusiastic about what he would do, if he had not heard an excellent performance ! Thus, accept my heartfelt thanks with the greatest admiration stemming from the innermost part of my soul, in loving kindness and friendship toward you. Never will I forget that ! I request that you, just such a great artist, remain always my old, young friend and brother ! May your ingenious art be, also forever and ever, always the benefactor of my works ! May God's will be done ! Again, from my entire soul which thanks you, I remain

Your admiring, most obligated, dutiful friend,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Vor einigen Tagen bekam ich begeistertes ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 162 ; pages 188-189.

Doctor Gustav Schönaich (1840-1906) : Viennese musician, music-critic, and Bruckner enthusiast ; step-son of Doctor Joseph Standthartner (1818-1892) . The latter was a friend of Richard Wagner and, also, a Bruckner enthusiast.

August Göllicher junior (1859-1923) : Pianist, conductor, teacher, music-editor, Bruckner's official biographer, and a great devotee of Bruckner's music. He became Director of the the « Linzer Musikverein » , in 1896. His father August, Senior (1819-1883) , was Munciple Secretary in Wels, Imperial Deputy, and member of the Board of Directors of the Upper-Austrian Singing Society of Salzburg. August, junior, had been a pupil of Franz Liszt (1811-1886) .

Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl

Le musicologue et auteur allemand Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl est né le 5 décembre 1831 à Iserlohn, en Rhénanie-du-Nord-Westphalie ; et est mort le 15 décembre 1885 à Heidelberg, dans le Land de Bade-Wurtemberg au sud-ouest de l'Allemagne. Il est principalement connu pour avoir publié, en 1865, « la Lettre à Élise » de Ludwig van Beethoven.

...

Professor Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl (1831-1885) : German editor and writer on music. Following his father's wishes, he studied law at the Universities of Bonn, Heidelberg, and Berlin. In 1865, King Ludwig II appointed him as honorary professor at the University in Munich. He returned to Heidelberg, in 1872, where he taught Music History and Aesthetics at the University there, until his death in 1885.

...

The German music scholar Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl was born on 5 December 1831 in Iserlohn ; and died on 15 December 1885 in Heidelberg. He was best known for discovering and publishing Beethoven's famous bagatelle, « Für Elise » .

After graduation from the « Gymnasium » , in Duisburg, Nohl studied jurisprudence at the Universities in Bonn, Heidelberg, and Berlin, where he received instruction in music from Siegfried Dehn and Friedrich Kiel. From 1853 to 1856, he was a referendary and undertook journeys to France and Italy, and he also taught music in Heidelberg. In 1860, he wrote his thesis on Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and earned the rank of « privatdozent » for « History and Aesthetic of Musical Art » .

In 1864, he moved to Munich and made an introduction to Richard Wagner, whose works he had praised in his writings. In 1865, he was awarded, by King Ludwig II, the title of Professor of Music at the University of Munich for his compilation of Mozart's letters. The University faculty, however, was disinclined to Nohl, and he was not given any teaching duties. In that year, he discovered through the « industrial teacher » Babeth Bredl, in Munich, the now-lost autograph of Ludwig van Beethoven's Bagatelle « Für Elise » . The work was first published, in 1867, in Nohl's book entitled : « New Beethoven Letters » (« Neue Briefe Beethovens ») .

From 1868 to 1872, he lived in Badenweiler and, eventually, returned to Heidelberg. In 1875, he was a « Dozent » at the polytechnic in Karlsruhe (predecessor to the Karlsruhe Institute of Technology) and became a full professor in 1880.

He was one of the most widely read writers on music of his time. His many books went through a lot of printings. His main legacy is, as a Beethoven scholar, and a portion of his writings are housed at the State archive, in Iserlohn.

...

Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl (geboren 5. Dezember 1831 in Iserlohn ; gestorben 15. Dezember 1885 in Heidelberg) war ein deutscher Musikwissenschaftler und Musikschriftsteller.

Nach dem Besuch des Gymnasiums in Duisburg studierte Nohl zunächst Jura an den Universitäten in Bonn, Heidelberg und Berlin, wo er daneben Musikunterricht bei Siegfried Dehn und Friedrich Kiel nahm. 1853 bis 1856 war er Referendar, unternahm anschließend Reisen nach Frankreich und Italien und wurde dann Musiklehrer in Heidelberg. 1860 habilitierte er sich mit einer Arbeit über Mozart und wurde Privatdozent für « Geschichte und Ästhetik der Tonkunst » .

1864 übersiedelte Nohl nach München, suchte die Bekanntschaft von Richard Wagner (für dessen Werke er sich schriftstellerisch einsetzte) und wurde 1865 für eine Sammlung von Mozart-Briefen von König Ludwig II. mit dem Titel eines Professors an der Universität München geehrt. Die Universität lehnte Nohl jedoch ab, so daß er dort keine Lehrtätigkeit ausüben konnte. Im selben Jahr entdeckte er bei der « Industrielehrerin » Babeth Bredl in München das heute verschollene Autograph von Beethovens Albumblatt « Für Elise » , das er 1867 in seinem Buch Neue Briefe Beethovens erstmals veröffentlichte.

1868 bis 1872 lebte er in Badenweiler und kehrte danach wieder nach Heidelberg zurück. 1875 wurde er Dozent am Polytechnikum in Karlsruhe und dort 1880 zum Professor ernannt. (Aus der Einrichtung ging später das Karlsruher Institut für Technologie hervor.)

Nohl war einer der meistgelesenen Musikschriftsteller seiner Zeit. Seine zahlreichen Bücher erlebten oft mehrere Auflagen. Bleibende Verdienste erwarb er sich vor allem als Beethoven-Forscher. Einen Teil seines Nachlasses besitzt das Stadtarchiv in Iserlohn.

Friedrich Nietzsche ist im Frühsommer 1888 in einer Hotelbibliothek auf Nohls Wagner-Biographie gestoßen, in der er auch selbst als Wagner-Anhänger vorkam. 1888 war Nietzsche freilich schon zum erbitterten Wagner-Feind geworden, so daß er Nohls Elaborat nur verspotten konnte. Dies hinderte ihn freilich nicht daran, Nohls Buch für seine eigene Polemik gegen Wagner auszubeaunen. So benutzte er es in Der Fall Wagner.

Robert Eitner charakterisiert Nohls unkritische Verfallenheit an Wagner mit den Worten :

« Er hatte sich durch diese Schriften und unzählige Zeitungsartikel in Fach-, Unterhaltungs- und politischen Blättern schließlich in eine wahre Berserkerwuth gegen Alles, was nicht von Wagner und Liszt herrührte, geschrieben. Jedes Thema, jeder ältere Meister, mußte nur zum Piedestal dienen, auf welches er Wagner und Liszt erhob. Er verstieg sich bis zur tollsten Verachtung alles dessen, was vor und neben Wagner componirt worden ist. Seine Verblendung ging so weit, daß er das ganze deutsche Volk schmähte und jede Gelegenheit benutzte, es verächtlich hinzustellen, nur unter dem Eindrucke, daß es Wagner und Liszt nicht hinreichend vergötterte, die er als die Einzigen erkannt wissen wollte, die zur Errettung der Kunst und der Menschheit überhaupt erstanden wären. Oder am andern Ort :“ Es ist das Musikgebahren Meyerbeer's durchweg die Art des Affen, der uns die natürlichen Bewegungen des äußeren und inneren Menschen in einer das tiefe Gefühl verletzenden Entstellung zeigt. Es ist ein erschreckendes Bild innerer Armuth. ” Nohl selbst bietet uns in allen diesen Dingen ein erschreckendes Bild von Absurdität. Seine Urtheile sind so gut auf der einen wie auf der anderen Seite geschraubt und lächerlich, so wenn er über die Elsa im Lohengrin sagt :“ sie ist das Weib der Zukunft, von der wir alle die Erlösung zu erhoffen haben ”. Obwol die Kritik unbarmherzig über Nohl Gericht hielt, ließ er sich doch in seinem Gebahren nicht steuern ; sie schwieg ihn schließlich todt. »

Bücher

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Ein Versuch aus der Aesthetik der Tonkunst. Habilitationsschrift zur Erlangung der venia docendi bei der philosophischen Facultät der Universität Heidelberg, Bangel und Schmitt, Heidelberg (1860) .

Der Geist der Tonkunst, Frankfurt am Main (1861) .

Die Zauberflöte. Betrachtungen über die Bedeutung der dramatischen Musik in der Geschichte des menschlichen Geistes, Sauerländer, Frankfurt am Main (1862) .

Mozart, Bruckmann, Stuttgart (1863) .

Inventarium des Beethoven'schen Nachlasses, soweit sich derselbe in dem Nachlasse ... Anton Schindler vorgefunden hat und zur Zeit in den Händen der Frau Marie Egloff ... befindet : (jetziger Besitzer dieser Sammlung Herr Nowotny ...) aufgenommen im Juni 1864 in Mannheim durch Ludwig Nohl, Karlsbad (1864) .

Beethovens Leben, 3 Bände, Wien (1864) ; Leipzig (1867 und 1877) - die erste wissenschaftliche Beethoven-Biographie.

Briefe Beethovens, mit einem Facsimile, Stuttgart (1865) .

Musikalisches Skizzenbuch, Frankfurt am Main (1866) .

Neue Briefe Beethovens, Stuttgart (1867) .

Musikerbriefe. Eine Sammlung Briefe von Christoph Willibald Gluck, Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, Franz-Josef Haydn, Carl Maria von Weber und Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, Duncker und Humblot, Leipzig (1867) .

Mozarts Briefe, Taube, Salzburg (1877) .

Neues Skizzenbuch. Zur Kenntniß der deutschen, namentlich der Münchener Musik- und Opernzustände der Gegenwart, Carl Merhoff, München (1869) .

Neue Bilder aus dem Leben der Musik und ihrer Meister, Louis Finsterlin, München (1870) .

Beethovens Brevier. Sammlung der von ihm selbst ausgezogenen Stellen aus Dichtern und Schriftstellern alter und neuer Zeit ; nebst einer Darstellung von Beethovens geistiger Entwicklung, Ernst Julius Günther, Leipzig (1870) .

Gluck und Wagner. Über die Entwicklung des Musikdramas, Louis Finsterlin, München (1870) .

Die Beethoven-Feier und die Kunst der Gegenwart. Eine Erinnerungsgabe, Wilhelm Braumüller, Wien (1871) .

Beethoven, Liszt, Wagner. Ein Bild der Kunstbewegung unseres Jahrhunderts, Wilhelm Braumüller, Wien (1874) .

Eine stille Liebe zu Beethoven. Nach dem Tagebuche einer jungen Dame, Ernst Julius Günther, Leipzig (1875) .

Musik und Musikgeschichte. Ansprache zur Eröffnung seiner Lehrtätigkeit an der Großherzoglichen Polytechnischen Schule in Karlsruhe am 17. November 1875, gehalten von Ludwig Nohl, Müller, Karlsruhe (1876) .

Unsere geistige Bildung, Schlömp, Leipzig (1877) .

Mozart's Leben. Für die Gebildeten aller Stände erzählt, 2. Auflage, Günther, Leipzig (1877) .

Beethoven, nach den Schilderungen seiner Zeitgenossen, Johann Georg Cotta, Stuttgart (1877) .

Mozart nach den Schilderungen seiner Zeitgenossen, Thiel, Leipzig (1880) .

Allgemeine Musikgeschichte, populär dargestellt, Reclam, Leipzig (1881) .

Mosaik. Für Musikalisch-Gebildete, Gebrüder Senf, Leipzig (1882) .

Richard Wagner's Bedeutung für die nationale Kunst, Prochaska, Wien (1883) .

Spohr, in : Musiker-Biographien, Band 7, Reclam, Leipzig (1884) .

Das moderne Musikdrama. Für gebildete Laien (1884) .

Die geschichtliche Entwicklung der Kammermusik und ihre Bedeutung für den Musiker, Vieweg Braunschweig (1885) .

Aufsätze

Beethoven's Tod, in : Westermanns illustrierte deutsche Monatshefte, Band 18 (1864-1865) ; Seiten 620-650.

Ungedruckte Briefe Beethoven's, in : Westermanns illustrierte deutsche Monatshefte, Band 19 (1865) ; Seiten 306-313.

Ein Gebet Beethovens. Neue Mittheilungen aus seinem späteren Leben, in : Die Grenzboten, Jahrgang 2 (1873) ; Seiten 42-120.

Die Fischhofsche Handschrift. Ein Beitrag zu Beethovens Leben, in : Im neuen Reich, Jahrgang 9 (1879) ; Seiten 313-330.

Drei Freunde Beethovens. Über Beethovens Beziehung zu Ignaz von Gleichenstein, Stephan von Breuning und Johann Malfatti, in : Allgemeine Deutsche Musikzeitung, Jahrgang 6 (1879) ; Seiten 305-308, 313-315, 321-323, 329-331 und 337-339.

Beethovens letzte Liebe, in : Der Salon (1880) ; Seiten 537-545.

...

17 juin 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Bernhard Deubler (Saint-Florian, près de Linz) .

« Dear Highly-Regarded Professor !

Thank you very much for the remembrance and honour to my humble self, and I wish you everything good.

In addition, I rejoice to be able to be at Saint-Florian, where I can engage in composition peacefully. Only one thing weighs me down heavily : having to place the burden of my being there on the praiseworthy Monastery. If only I myself could pay for my board, I would be much happier and would be more at ease staying there, because every good has its limits !

I wish you everything good during your vacation !

Devotedly,

Anton Bruckner

P.S. : I beg you most graciously to remember me to “ Herr Oddo ” and Ignaz. »

Incipit : « Danke recht sehr für die Erinnerung ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 163 ; page 189.

Professor Bernhard Deubler (1842-1907) : Priest, Consultant, Professor of Theology, Choir Director at Saint-Florian monastery. In 1884, he succeeded Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) . A friend to Bruckner.

Saint-Florian's Monastery is located outside of Linz, near the small-town of Enns, but in its own village of Saint-

Florian, Florianus was a Roman tribune who was tortured then martyred for his Christian faith, in the 4th Century.

Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol (1858-1893) : Priest, composer, and friend of Bruckner. During 1879 and 1880, he audited Bruckner's lectures at the University of Vienna. In August 1880, he entered the Novitiate at « Stift Kremsmünster », taking the name « Oddo ». He studied at Saint-Florian's Monastery for 4 years, and was ordained on July 19, 1885, in Kremsmünster. He became a friend and advocate of Bruckner at the University of Vienna and remained so, for the rest of his life.

Ignaz is Anton Bruckner's younger brother.

19 juin 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Theodore Helm (Vienne) .

« Right Honourable Doctor !

Pardon most graciously my most sincere request about some words, from your gifted hand, taken from the “ Deutsche Zeitung ” and referring to Karlsruhe. “ Post-festum ”, I am again asking for Göllerich's letter.

To my eminent patron : “ 3 Cheers ” ! When shall I have the good fortune to say this to you, in person ? My Cheers must not be conveyed to you, from a distance.

Professor Nohl, with whom I am acquainted, writes to me in a truly touching manner. He will soon come to see me and will say even more than, Guttmann furnished the article in the newspaper.

“ Herr ” Vogel, from Munich, read Göllerich's letter and wrote in kindness and enthusiasm (derived from that already from Munich) , to the best friend of his King, the “ Riding Master ”, at whose table the King is frequently entertained. Because of Court “ Hofkapellmeister ” Rheinberger's behavior toward me, Vogel even left the “ Hofkapelle ”. I thank you in advance for the prebend, as for everything already received, from the depths of my soul.

Yours most indebtedly,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Entschuldigen gnädigst meine innigste Bitte ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 164 ; page 190.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 26 ; pages 34-36.

Theodor Otto Helm (1843-1920) : Austrian writer on music. Critic for the Vienna « Neues Fremdenblatt » and, later, the « Deutsche Zeitung » (1884-1901) . He received the title of Professor, in 1901. Helm was one of Bruckner's 1st admirers and wrote a biographical sketch and sketches of his Symphonies. Naturally, he found himself in conflict with such conservative, anti-Wagnerian critics as Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904) . There is nothing caustic in the writings of Helm, and he was always ready to acknowledge talented young composers. His commentaries provide a true picture of the Viennese musical scene, during his lifetime.

« Post-festum » : Latin term which means after the Feast or Celebration. In this case, Bruckner is referring to the 1885 Music Festival, in Karlsruhe.

Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl (1831-1855) : Music-editor and writer.

Adolf Bernhard Vogel (1847-1897) : Music-critic for the « Leipziger Nachrichten » .

Josef Gabriel Rheinberger (1839-1901) : Composer, organist, and conductor. « Hofkapellmeister » in Munich, from 1877 to 1894. He composed in the Classical Tradition and understood neither Wagner nor Bruckner.

20 juin 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au Baron Hans von Wolzogen (Bayreuth) .

« Dear Baron !

Pardon me if I permit myself to send you the wonderful letter of Professor Nohl to my humble self : it has stirred-up a sensation everywhere ! A genuine consolation against Hanslick and his associates' persecution ! In Germany, there are many nobler men ! I ask most graciously for this letter to be published in the newspapers. Your celebrated newspaper has introduced me in Holland. Thanks from my whole soul to my highly-noble patron ; you are the aristocrat in the true sense of the word, gifted with higher-genius.

I kiss the hand of your gracious wife ! With deepest respect and most heartfelt thanks, I am

Most devotedly yours,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Entschuldigen hochderselbe, ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 165 ; page 191.

Baron Hans von Wolzogen (1848-1938) : German writer on music, as well as librettist ; friend to Bruckner.

The letter from Professor Nohl.

The « Bayeuther Blätter » .

24 juin 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à August Göllerich junior (Weimar) .

« Honoured Friend !

Thank you very much for your letter. Unfortunately, I must inform you of the hurt which resulted from the breaking of your word that you were going to write to Doctor Helm. This brings-out a deep hurt in my inner being. As a consequence, Helm wrote “ no report ”, and Doctor Schönaich and Mottl did not write anything, either. Indeed, I gave your letter to Doctor Helm, yet, he sent it back to me, unopened. Accept, once again, the assurance of my deepest hurt that people of importance will receive no report from my friends.

Yours,

Bruckner

August Göllerich,
At the Moment : in Weimar. »

Incipit : « Danke sehr für Ihre Briefe. »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 166 ; page 191.

Theodor Helm (1843-1920) : Viennese critic and professor ; one of Bruckner's 1st admirers.

Doctor Gustav Schönaich (1840-1906) : Viennese musician, music-critic, and Bruckner enthusiast.

...

Juin 1885 : Gustav Mahler is engaged by the Prague Opera for the 1885-1886 season. At a Festival, in Kassel (frequently cited erroneously as the Münden Festival) , on June 29, a week before his 25th birthday, he gains notice with his outstanding success leading Felix Mendelssohn's Oratorio « Paulus » (Saint-Paul) .

In England, John Kemp Starley patents his « Rover » safety bicycle, employing the chain-and-sprockets transmission of Lawson's « Bicyclette » , but making the size of the 2 wheels nearly equal and increasing the angle of the front fork, so that the steering is direct. This machine incorporates all of the essential design features of the modern bicycle, and changes to it, since then, have consisted of only minor improvements.

In America, the « Volta Graphophone Company » is established by Bell and his associates to demonstrate and promote the « Graphophone » .

1er juillet 1885 : Anton Bruckner writes to Georg Armingier's successor, Johann Evangelist Aichinger :

« If I may be so bold, I will take the liberty of asking your Reverence whether I might, in the holidays, sometimes install myself (as a paying guest, of course) in your wonderful rectory ? »

Aichinger was no unknown quantity to Bruckner since he had been parochial vicar under Armingier for many years. This letter marks the beginning of the 2nd phase of the « holiday composer » in Steyr, with its clear emphasis on creativity (8th and 9th Symphonies, « Wiener Fassung » (Vienna version) of the 1st Symphony, the revision of the « Requiem » , WAB 39, and « Helgoland » , WAB 71) .

Juillet 1885 : Anton Bruckner est désormais invité régulièrement à Steyr. C'est dans le presbytère de l'église paroissiale, durant ses vacances d'été, qu'il va terminer l'esquisse du 1er mouvement de sa 8e Symphonie qui se conclut avec un triomphant « Hallelujah ! » final, dans la tonalité de majeur. La Symphonie sera achevée au mois d'août ; il s'agira de la version originale de 1887.

7 juillet 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à August Göllerich junior (Weimar) .

« You will find it wholly understandable that it would mean a great deal to me if Doctor Helm were to print in the “ Deutsche Zeitung ”, albeit belatedly, what the German musicians have to say about me, “ nothing like this written since Beethoven ”, can only be compared with Beethoven in feeling and Wagner in compositional facility. »

7 juillet 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à August Göllerich junior (Weimar) .

« N.B. : If you can do so, I request you to send the Master my most sincere respect.

My Dear, Good Friend !

You will find it completely understandable, that it would mean much to me if only Doctor Helm, by way of addition (if only belatedly) , would at least give to the “ Deutsche Zeitung ” the pronouncement of German artist about me ; “ since ” Beethoven “ ceased to compose ”, German artists are “ measured solely by ” Beethoven’s “ feeling and ” Wagner’s “ creative work ” . He (Doctor Helm) is in Salzburg, Nonnthal, Hahn-Wirtshaus. He seems, regardless of his lovely words, again to be somewhat difficult to move. You, my most worthy, my dear biographer, can do it, in particular if you do not let him have any peace. Therefore, please ! It is indeed the 1st general Festival in Germany where I am mentioned. Give my sincere greetings to van der Sandt, the great pianist ; give my compliments to the Court organist and the Court “ Kapellmeister ”. Through your kindness, I learned that “ Herr ” Stradal is actually still alive. I congratulate him ! While I shake your hand in hearty spirit, and longingly hope for a conversation in person, I repeat my request that Helm may not be left in peace.

Yours,

Bruckner

Gutmann told me that von Bülow recommended the 7th Symphony for Berlin. At the end of this week, I am going to Steyr. Mottl was filled with enthusiasm when he visited with me. My hand-kiss to the « Fräuleins » Stahr. Fritsch's "Wochenblatt", No. 27, is wonderful about me.

N.B. : For Doctor Helm :

Where is there a single living person, who has created something similar to the Adagio of my 7th, or who we believe could have created it, and how far must we reach back to the past to find anything similar ! Honour to whom honour is due ! - but this "Adagio" is a unique example among the creations of the post-Beethoven decades.

Reported among other things :

"May the glory, however, be withheld from the Viennese, to pay homage to their excellent fellow-citizens, even though Krähwinkel and Pfaffenbeurfurt have finally been moved to cast a vote for Anton Bruckner." (Comment below.)

"As soon as our time allows it, we will look for a French or Hungarian countess who might be inclined to make Bruckner her 'protégé'."

I ask you to write this down quite clearly to Doctor Helm, "and I also request its inclusion in the 'Deutsche Zeitung'." »

Incipit : « Sie werden es ganz begreiflich finden, ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 167 ; pages 192-194.

August Göllerich junior (1859-1923) : Pianist, teacher, conductor, and writer on music ; Bruckner's official Biographer. Politically anti-Semitic.

Bruckner was referring to Hans von Bülow (1830-1894), the pianist, conductor, and composer. He had been a law student. Bruckner met him in 1865 ; on June 21, 1868, von Bülow conducted the 1st complete performance of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg ». His association with Richard Wagner would later prove disastrous to his personal life although he never became bitter. He actually wrote a consoling message to Cosima, addressing her as : « Soeur » .

This was the « Allgemeines Fest », in Germany. It was held on May 30, 1885, in Karlsruhe.

The « Musikalisches Wochenblatt » was edited by Ernst Wilhelm Fritsch (1840-1902), a German music-publisher.

Bruckner is quoting Franz Liszt.

Max van de Sandt (18 October 1863 - 14 July 1934) : Pianist and composer. A student of Franz Liszt.

August Stradal (1860-1930) : Pianist. At the Vienna University, he studied theory with Bruckner, who made a profound impression on him. In Weimar, he studied piano with Liszt and made piano reductions of all of the Bruckner Symphonies.

Anna and Helene Stahr were sisters who studied with Franz Liszt, in Weimar.

Anna et Helene Stahr

Anna Stahr : geboren 1835 in Oldenburg ; gestorben 1909 in Weimar.

Helene Stahr : geboren 10. Juli 1838 in Oldenburg ; gestorben 1914 in Weimar.

Pianistinnen und Klavierlehrerinnen. Anna und Helene Stahr waren die Töchter des Schriftstellers und Literaturhistorikers Adolf Wilhelm Theodor Stahr (1805-1976) und seiner Ehefrau Marie geborene Krätz (1813-1879) . Ihre Kindheit verbrachten die beiden Mädchen zusammen mit den Eltern und drei Brüdern (Alwin, Adolf und Edo) in Oldenburg, wo ihr Vater als Konrektor und Professor für alte und neue Sprachen am Gymnasium tätig war. Anfang der 50er Jahre des 19. Jahrhunderts lebte die Familie in Jena und später in Weimar.

1854 ließen sich die Eltern scheiden. Adolf Stahr heiratete kurz darauf die Schriftstellerin Fanny Lewald (1811-1889) , die er während eines Italienaufenthalts Mitte der 1840er Jahre kennengelernt hatte, und siedelte mit ihr nach Berlin über. Marie Stahr ist seit 1855 in den Weimarer Adressbüchern aufgeführt. Vermutlich lebten die Töchter bei ihr. In Weimar erhielten sie ihre musikalische Ausbildung bei Liszt, der die Schwestern bei einem Besuch der Familie Anfang der 1850er Jahre in Jena spielen gehört und sie daraufhin zu sich nach Weimar eingeladen hatte. Er « unterrichtete sie nicht allein im Pianospiele sondern verschaffte ihnen auch eine weitere Ausbildung dadurch, daß er für sie Zutritt zu den Opernproben auswirkte. Bei weiterem Fortschreiten spielte er mit den jungen Damen seine Compositionen » . (Wissenschaftliche Beilage der Leipziger Zeitung 19. Februar 1887.) Zwischen 1857 und 1862 besuchten Anna und Helene Stahr den Klavierunterricht bei Sophie Pflughaupt (1834 oder 1837-1867) (ebenfalls eine Schülerin Liszts) und ihrem Mann Robert Pflughaupt (1833-1871) .

Anfang der 60er Jahre des 19. Jahrhunderts erfolgten erste Auftritte der beiden Pianistinnen, die sich fast ausschließlich zusammen hören ließen. 1862 gastierten sie in Leipzig, 1865 traten sie in Weimar auf, 1867-1868 in Aachen und Jena und 1869 in Berlin. Später zeigten sie sich überwiegend in den von ihnen seit 1866 in Weimar veranstalteten Soireen. Die Schwestern spielten vorwiegend vierhändige Werke, darunter Liszts PastoraleSchnitterchor aus dem Entfesselten Prometheus (Searle 508) , sein Vom Fels zum Meer. Deutscher Siegesmarsch (Searle 229) , eine Mazurka von Glinka sowie Kompositionen von Robert Volkmann, Robert Pflughaupt, August Goltermann und den Brüdern Louis und Willy Thern.

Schon früh konzentrierten sich Anna und Helene Stahr auf die Lehrtätigkeit. Seit etwa 1855 erteilten sie Klavierunterricht und wurden später « zu den vortrefflichsten Clavierlehrerinnen unserer Zeit » (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik 1889, Seite 188.) gezählt. In Weimar veranstalteten sie spätestens seit 1865 öffentliche Prüfungskonzerte, sogenannte « Klavierexamen » (Bock 1865, Seite 61.) , die von der Presse große Aufmerksamkeit erfuhren. Ihre SchülerInnen waren der « Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik » zufolge « meist nur Dilettanten » (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik 1877, Seite 128.) . Zu ihnen gehörten und andere zwei Enkelinnen von Johann Gottfried von Herder und Alexander Oglobinsky.

Bekanntheit erlangten die Schwestern vor allem durch ihre musikalischen Veranstaltungen im eigenen Salon. Carl Lachmund schreibt hierüber :

« Jedermann in Weimar kannte die Stahr-Schwestern Anna und Helene und ihre gemütliche Villa in der Schwanensee-Straße am Rande der Stadt. Kein wohlangedechnener Lisztianer fehlte je bei ihren Soireen, die sie “ Musikalischer Kaffee ” nannten. » (Lachmund, Seite 89.)

Die Soireen fanden einmal in der Woche statt. Im Zentrum stand die Aufführung Liszt'scher Kompositionen. Daneben kamen vor allem Werke von Komponisten der Neudeutschen Schule zur Aufführung. Unter den regelmäßigen BesucherInnen befanden sich und andere die Brüder Louis und Willy Thern, Alexander Siloti, Eugène d'Albert, Eduard Lassen, August Göllerich und Peter Cornelius. Auch Liszt wohnte während seiner Aufenthalte in Weimar diesen Veranstaltungen bei und trat hier mehrfach auf. Der « Neuen Zeitschrift für Musik » zufolge entwickelten sich die Soireen von Anna und Helene Stahr zu einem « Centralpunkte für alle jungen Lisztianerinnen und Lisztianer, welche hier bei diesen lieben Menschen immer aufrichtig und herzlich empfangen werden » . (Neue Zeitschrift für Musik 1873, Seite 331.) Zu ihrem ehemaligen Lehrer pflegten die Schwestern offenbar ein enges Verhältnis. In der « Leipziger Zeitung » heißt es :

« Es kann sich wohl keiner der vielen Schüler rühmen, so wie sie Liszt's musikalisches Leben in solchem Maße geteilt zu haben. »

(Wissenschaftliche Beilage der Leipziger Zeitung 19. Februar 1887.)

Nach Liszts Tod engagierten sich Anna und Helene Stahr für die Gründung und Erhaltung des Liszt-Vereins. Für diesen organisierten sie Konzerte und warben durch Anzeigen in der Fachpresse Gelder ein. Mitte der 1890er Jahre spendeten sie selbst für die Errichtung eines Liszt-Denkmal in Weimar.

1890 wurde ihnen vom « Vorstand des “ Lisztvereins ” zu Leipzig ein kunstreich hergestelltes Diplom übersendet, wonach dieselben “ als treue Freundinnen der Lisztsache, als unermüdete Vertreterinnen der Interessen des Vereins und in Anerkennung der besonderen Verdienste um denselben ” zu Ehrenmitgliedern des Lisztvereins ernannt worden sind » .

(Der Klavier-Lehrer 1890, Seite 19.)

Die Musikerinnen sind Widmungsträgerinnen von Kompositionen einiger Zeitgenossen. Carl Thern widmete ihnen seine 1869 veröffentlichten Musikalischen Bilder aus Weimar für Pianoforte zu vier Händen, Opus 32, und Alexander Winterberger sein Jugend-Album, Opus 101, mit 40 kleineren Klavierstücken.

Literatur

Adressbücher Weimar (1855) .

Bayreuther Blätter (1893) ; Seite 270.

Bock : (1865) , Seite 61 ; (1866) Seite 141 ; (1867) Seite 416.

Dwight's Journal of Music (1873) , Seite 95.

Fritsch Musikalisches Wochenblatt (1888) ; Seite 263.

Gœthe Jahrbuch (1902) ; Seite 13.

Katalog des Musikalien-Verlags von Julius Schuberth & Co. , Leipzig (1906) ; Seite 163.

Der Klavier-Lehrer (1890) ; Seite 19.

Der Merker (1970) ; Seite 1053.

Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (abgekürzt : NZfM) :

(1862) II ; Seite 44.

(1865) ; Seiten 175, 387.

(1866) ; Seiten 101, 167, 410.

(1867) ; Seite 323.

(1868) ; Seiten 14, 91, 445.

(1869) ; Seiten 78, 127.

(1870) ; Seiten 118, 182.

(1871) ; Seiten 78, 301.

(1872) ; Seite 529.

(1873) ; Seiten 81, 330f.

(1875) ; Seiten 222, 245.

(1876) ; Seite 10.

(1877) ; Seiten 30, 128.

(1880) ; Seite 190.

(1882) ; Seite 226.

(1883) ; Seiten 138, 238.

(1886) ; Seiten 133, 290, 380, 453.

(1887) ; Seiten 53, 153.

(1888) ; Seiten 157, 249, 374.

(1889) ; Seite 188.

(1890) ; Seite 34.

(1891) ; Seite 178.

(1895) ; Seiten 92, 188.

(1896) ; Seite 164.

Signale für die musikalische Welt (1867) ; Seiten 15, 1047.

Urania : (1876) , Seite 47 ; (1881) , Seite 169.

Westermanns Monatshefte (1895) ; Seite 199.

Wissenschaftliche Beilage der Leipziger Zeitung (19. Februar 1887) .

ADB

Adolf Wilhelm Theodor Stahr. Ein Stück Leben. Gedichte, Berlin (1869) .

Adolf Wilhelm Theodor Stahr und Fanny Lewald. Ein Winter in Rom, Berlin (1869) .

Wilhelm Pökel. Philologisches Schriftstellerlexikon, Leipzig (1882) .

Bettina Walker. My Musical Experiences, London (1892) .

Albert Morris Bagby. Miss Träumerei. A Weimar Idyl, Boston (1895) .

Leonie Gröbler-Heim. « Von meiner Studienzeit bei Liszt (1873) » , in : Neue Musik-Zeitung, Nr. 22 (1912) ; Seite 462f.

Carl Lachmund. Mein Leben mit Franz Liszt, Eschwege (1970) .

August Göllerich und Wilhelm Jerger. Franz Listzs Klavierunterricht von 1884-1886. Dargestellt an den Tagebuchaufzeichnungen, in : Studien zur Musikgeschichte des 19. Jahrhunderts, Nr. 39, Regensburg (1975) .

Alan Walker. Franz Liszt, 3 Bände - Band 3 : The Final Years. 1861-1886, New York (1996) .

Krimhild Stöver. Leben und Wirken der Fanny Lewald. Grenzen und Möglichkeiten einer Schriftstellerin im gesellschaftlichen Kontext des 19. Jahrhunderts, in : Literatur- und Medienwissenschaft, Nr. 97, Oldenburg (2004) .

Martin Hundt (Herausgeber) . Der Redaktionsbriefwechsel der Hallischen Deutschen und der Deutsch-Französischen Jahrbücher (1837-1844) , 2 Bände - Band 1, Berlin (2010) .

Evelyn Liepsch. « “ Im Sinne Liszts ist es gehandelt ”. Zur Gründung der Liszt-Stiftung und des Weimarer Liszt-Museums » , in : Das Zeitalter der Enkel. Kulturpolitik und Klassikrezeption unter Carl Alexander, in : Jahrbuch Klassik Stiftung Weimar, herausgeber von Hellmut Th. Seemann und Thorsten Valk, Göttingen (2010) .

Oliver Hilmes. Liszt. Biographie eines Superstars, München (2011) .

Musikalien der Schlossbibliothek Baden-Baden (Zugriff am 23. November 2012) :

<http://www.blb-karlsruhe.de/blb/blbhtml/besonde-re-bestaende/musik/bad-index.php?b=t>

Bildnachweis

Sammlung Manskopf der G ethe Universit at Frankfurt am Main (Zugriff am 16. November 2012) :

<http://edocs.uni-frankfurt.de/volltexte/2003/7801887/>

<http://edocs.uni-frankfurt.de/volltexte/2003/7809948/>

7 juillet 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne)   Arthur Nikisch (Leipzig) .

« Sublime Great Benefactor and Friend !

You were my 1st apostle who made known in Germany, in highly-brilliant art and, with the fullest energy and dignity, my hitherto unheard expression. In eternity, you will be praised because your eminent, great genius has shone forth to illumine the misunderstood and deserted ! For that reason, be thanked in all eternity not only by me but, also, by my true friends. May God repay you for it !!

Therefore, it is only natural that I take the liveliest interest in the events in your life. The greatest joyfulness now is your wedding. Take along my deepest-felt, most sincere congratulations ! God bless your marriage ! and permit you to enjoy this great good fortune in the best good health until the profoundest old age, arrayed with the 1st musical honours ! Although unacquainted with her, I offer your gracious young lady my congratulations and a kiss on the hand. I am soon going to the town of Steyr, in Upper-Austria, where I shall work industriously. Where and when, I wonder, will you encounter my letter ? Fare thee well !

With gratitude,

Your Bruckner »

Incipit : « Du warst mein erster Apostel ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n  168 ; page 194.

Arthur Nikisch (1855-1922) : Most impressive and influential conductor of his day who was affianced to Am lie Heu ner.

Amelie Heu ner

The Belgian actress, soprano, Opera « soubrette » , and composer Am lie Nikish (« n e » Heu ner) was born on 28 December 1862 in Brussels ; and died on 8 January 1938 in Berlin.

On 1 July 1885, she married the famous conductor Arthur Nikisch.

She had been engaged, the preceding years, at the Kassel Court Theatre by Gustav Mahler.

Mother of Demetrius Mitja Nikisch and noted pianist-composer Arthur Philipp Nikisch (1899-1936) .

She is buried in the Leipzig « Südfriedhof » - « Leipziger Stadtkreis, Sachsen » (Saxony) .

...

Amélie Heußner Nikisch (geborene Amélie Heußner) (geboren 28. Dezember 1862 in Brüssel ; gestorben 18. Januar 1938 in Berlin) war eine belgische Schauspieler, Sopranistin und Komponistin.

Die Tochter deutschstämmiger Eltern heiratete am 1. Juli 1885 den ungarischen Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch. Ihre Kinder sind der Rechtswissenschaftler Arthur Philipp Nikisch und der Pianist, Komponist und Bandleader Mitja Nikisch.

Kompositionen

Daniel in der Löwengrube. Burleske Oper in 3 Akten von Ernst von Wolzogen. Bearbeitet von Ilse Friedländer. Harmonie, Berlin 1914.

Bearbeitungen

Aebelö. Romantische Oper in 3 Akten und einem Vorspiel. Nach dem gleichnamigen Roman von Sophus Michaelis. Bearbeitet mit Ilse Friedländer. Musik von Joseph Gustav Mrazek, Drei-Masken-Verlag, München, Berlin (1915) .

12 juillet 1885 : Lettre du Baron Hans von Wolzogen (Bayreuth) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Highly-Honoured Professor !

Having been absent from Bayreuth for a long time, I have not yet managed to thank you for your last kind letter. I already knew the beautiful words of Nohl ; I simply do not yet know under which mode I would be able to cite them in our papers ; but I intend to take advantage of the next offered opportunity. About the performance in Karlsruhe, I heard (or rather) one read again peculiarly divergent so-called “ opinions ” in our “ Tagespresse ” ! I am becoming more and more desirous to hear your work with Orchestra. When Levi played the 1st and 2nd movements on the piano for me, in Munich, I would have liked to say what Nohl had already said. In Berlin, I recently became acquainted with a superior body of tone, in the Elberstadt Philharmonic Orchestra. Popular concerts, at 50 Pfennigs per entrance fee, act as a mediator between the general public and knowledge of the newer music, in a completely artistic way. But why must it always be the music of Saint-Saëns or Auber ? Why not the “ German ” Symphonic composer, in addition ? To be sure, for such a Symphony in its entirety, the untrained patience of this audience would not, in the end, suffice ; but the Adagio of the 7th would be bound to have precisely the most beautiful and most impressive appeal there. (It could be performed, say, for February 13th, a Memorial Day.) All the same, our “ special ” Berlin is certainly lost to the great and the good. Just look around you at the “ popular ” !

Has the Symphony in transcription for piano arrived yet at Gutmann's ? As soon as I come to know this, I will take possession of it - for I require personal interaction with these sounds.

Sincere and deeply respectful regards from

Baron Hans Paul von Wolzogen »

Incipit : « Längere Zeit von Bayreuth abwesend, ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 1 du Baron Hans von Wolzogen ; pages 379-380.

Baron Hans von Wolzogen (1848-1938) : German writer on music, librettist, and Bruckner enthusiast ; a true friend to Bruckner.

Karl Friedrich Ludwig Nohl (1831-1855) : Writer on the subject of music, and editor. He began his studies of music history and aesthetics at the University of Heidelberg, in 1872.

Elberfeld, now part of Wuppertal.

Daniel-François-Esprit Auber (1782-1871) : French composer. He was best-known for his « Opéras-comiques » and was considered to be the foremost representative of the genre in 19th Century France.

Été 1885 : During his summer vacation, the 52 year old Johannes Brahms completes his 4th Symphony, his last, with the 3rd and 4th movements.

The 24 year old Julius Korngold graduates from the University of Vienna and becomes a lawyer. He also begins reviewing concerts for the « Brünnner Morgenpost » (Brünn Morning Post) , then, becomes editor of the newly-formed « Brünnner Montags-Zeitung » (Brünn Monday Times) . An article he writes about Johannes Brahms's 4th Symphony gets the attention of Eduard Hanslick which, eventually, results in Korngold getting a job at the main Brünn paper, the « Tagesbote » , and also meeting and befriending Brahms.

The 42 year old Emil Schindler moves his family to a small castle called Plankenberg, in Upper-Austria near Vienna, where Alma, now aged 6, spends her childhood amidst sumptuous parties and musical evenings.

Août 1885 : Anton Bruckner completes in Vienna the short score of his 8th Symphony. The orchestration takes another 2 years.

16 août 1885 : In the 2nd year of work on the 8th, Bruckner « experimented » in the « Stadtpfarrh » of Steyr on the thematic of « 4 layeredness » (sic !), which was to transform the 8th into a musical and architectural circle. In the margin, the elated experimenter noted :

« Steyr, Stadtpfarrhof 16. August 1885. A. Bruckner mp. Halleluja ! »

...

The 9 year old Bruno Schlesinger enters the Stern Conservatory, in Berlin.

The 11 year old Arnold Schönberg enters secondary school and becomes friend with Oskar Adler, who teaches him the rudiments of music-theory. Together, with his cousin and Adler, the group performs String Trios every Sunday. Schönberg eagerly teaches himself as much as he can about music as each instalment arrives for his family's encyclopaedia. With the addition of another violinist to the group, Adler produces an over-size viola, strung with zither strings and tuned like a cello, on which Schönberg can play the cello part of String Quartets. After studying the long-awaited encyclopaedia entry for « Sonata », as well as some Beethoven String Quartet scores, he begins composing Quartet movements that can be tried-out by his little ensemble.

WAB 52

3 septembre 1885 : WAB 52 - « Virga Jesse floruit », graduel en mi bémol majeur pour chœur mixte à 4 voix a cappella (SATB) ; chanté lors des Fêtes de la Vierge Marie (« Beatæ Mariæ Virginis »). Usage liturgique : le temps de l'Avent. Dédié à Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884), le directeur de la musique (organiste et chef de chœur) du monastère de Saint-Florian. Traumihler fut un adepte du Cécilianisme : mouvement puritain ultra-conservateur de renouveau de la musique liturgique dans l'Église, apparu au XIXe siècle, visant à ré-introduire le style choral a cappella de Palestrina. Création à la chapelle de la Cour de Vienne, le 8 décembre 1885, sous la direction du compositeur. Une version en concert sera également offerte à Vienne, le 7 mars 1907, sous la direction du chef E. Thomas. Durée approximative : 3 minutes.

1re édition : TR 42, Theodor Rättig, Vienne (1886) ; le 4e des « Vier Graduale für Sopran, Alt, Tenor und Baß » .

« Geistliche Gesänge » III, n° 453, Willy Müller, Süddeutscher Musikverlag, édition Georg Darmstadt (1930) .

Ferdinand Habel, édition Anton Böhm & Sohn, Augsburg / Vienne.

EE / EP 4185, Ernst Eulenburg, édition Peters (1939) , pages 27-30.

EP 6317, édition Peters.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , pages 141-145.

« German Romantic Motets » , édition Novello, Londres (2004) , page 62.

Virga Jesse floruit :

Virgo Deum et hominem genuit :

Pacem Deus reddidit,

In se reconcilians ima summis.

Alleluia.

...

WAB 52 (1885) : « Virga Jesse floruit » (The branch from Jesse) ; graduale in E-flat major for 4 voice, mixed choir a capella. SATB (brief T & B divisi) .

Average Duration : 3 minutes.

1st Edition : Theodor Rättig, Vienna (« Vier Graduale ») .

The 1st recording of Bruckner's « Vexilla regis » occurred in 1931. Ferdinand Habel conducted the Choir of the « Sankt-Stephans-Dom » , in Vienna (78 rpm : « Christschall » 129) .

Traditional medieval text, based on Isaiah : 11, stating that Jesus belongs to David's lineage (Jesse being King David's father) . In the Tridentine Rite, it is assigned as the « Alleluia » verse for the Feast of the Annunciation when it falls in Eastertide instead of Lent. More commonly, it is heard at Votive Masses.

The early E-flat version of Johann Sebastian Bach's Magnificat (BWV 243) has a fragmentary duet for soprano and bass, « Virga Jesse floruit, Emanuel noster apparuit » , unrelated but for the incipit.

Virga Jesse floruit :

Virgo Deum et hominem genuit :

pacem Deus reddidit, in se reconcilians ima summis.

The branch from Jesse blooms :

a Virgin brings forth God and man :

God restores peace,

reconciling in Himself the lowest with the highest.

Alleluia.

« Virga Jesse » (The branch from Jesse) , WAB 52, is a Motet by the Austrian composer Anton Bruckner. It sets the gradual « Virga Jesse floruit » for unaccompanied mixed choir.

The work was completed on 3 September 1885 and may have been intended for the celebration of the 100th anniversary of the Linz diocese ; however, like the « Ecce sacerdos magnus » that Bruckner composed A.M.D.G. for that event, it was not performed there. It was performed on 8 December 1885 at the « Wiener Hofmusikkapelle » for the Feast of the Immaculate-Conception.

The Motet was edited together with 3 other Graduals (« Locus iste » , WAB 23 ; « Christus factus est » , WAB 11 ; and « Os justi » , WAB 30) , by Theodor Rättig in 1886. The Motet is put in Band XXI/34 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

This 91 bar Gradual in E minor is for mixed choir a cappella. In the 1st part on the verse « Virga jesse floruit » (bars 1-20) , Bruckner used twice the « Dresdner Amen » on the word « floruit » (bars 7-9 and 17-19) . The last part (bars 63-91) consists, as in the earlier « Inveni David » (WAB 19) , of an Alleluja, for which Bruckner drew his inspiration from the Hallelujah of Georg Friedrich Händel's « Messiah » , on which he often improvised on organ. The Motet ends in pianissimo by the tenor voice on a pedal point.

Max Auer regards it as the most accomplished and magnificent « a cappella » Motet of the composer. The Bruckner biographer Crawford Howie also calls this work :

« One of Bruckner's finest Motets. »

...

Anton Bruckner subscribed to the Cecilian movement in choral music, which attempted to restore Gregorian chant and Renaissance polyphony to Austrian sacred music. Composed in 1885, the text of « Virga Jesse floruit » is based on Isaiah 11, establishing Jesus' place in the lineage of King David (Jesse was David's father) . Although written in the « stille antico » , this rather dramatic Motet is nearly Symphonic. There is a magnificent climax that builds in imitative sequences on the phrase « pacem Deus reddidit » . Of special note is the text : « in se reconcilians imo sumis » , (reconciling in Himself the lowest with the highest) . Bruckner's musical setting mirrors this reconciliation of opposites, climaxing at the extremes of range and dynamics. Harmonically this Motet journeys far, until the Coda arrives in E major, culminating in a sequence of « alleluias » from the tenors.

The course of Anton Bruckner's musical development may have taken a new turn when he 1st made the acquaintance of Richard Wagner's music in the 1860's, but to regard him as a simple musical off shoot of Wagner, a disciple who brought to the Symphony something of what Wagner brought to music-drama, is both inaccurate and unfair. Indeed, an understanding of Bruckner's own sacred music (both the large Masses and such smaller works as the a cappella Motet « Virga Jesse floruit » of 1885) provides many keys to understanding Bruckner's immense Symphonic works.

« Virga Jesse floruit » , which is one of comparatively few sacred works composed after Bruckner turned to Symphonies, reminds us once again that even the idea of classifying Bruckner as a Romantic is not without problems. His musical mind-set was, as has often and rightly been observed, more of the Renaissance or even the pre-Renaissance than 19th Century modern, and no amount of chromatic elaboration and structural expansion can hide the fact that, psychologically speaking, his Symphonies have nothing whatever to do with the throbbing, searching new ways of Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, and others. In « Virga Jesse floruit » , Bruckner very consciously draws on an ancient musical heritage, spinning out rich, pure lines in a style reminiscent of Palestrina and the « stile antico » . It is as if time itself has no meaning to Bruckner, and in his music-making (long or short, old or new) his identity remains the same.

« Virga Jesse floruit » is one of Bruckner's most famous pieces ; it is sung at Christmas time by choirs, amateur and professional, around the globe. The brief gradual text translates something as follows : « The rod of Jesse flourished ; a virgin produced both God and man : and God restored peace, reconciling both lowest and highest within Himself. Alleluia. » . Bruckner's 92 measures of music move from a group of isolated phrases at the beginning of the piece through some expansive imitative play on the text « pacem Deus reddidit » , and finally to the staggered « alleluias » , at 1st ecstatic and then absolutely tender, that fill the final 3rd of this most effective piece.

...

1885 : Le Quintette à cordes sera exécuté à Munich et à Cologne. Pour sa part, la 3e Symphonie sera donnée à Amsterdam, Dresde, Francfort et La Haye de même qu'au « Metropolitan Opera House » de New York sous la baguette du chef Walter Damrosch. Quant à lui, Hans Richter a mené à bien la 7e Symphonie à Vienne, le 21 mars 1886. Il a été le 1er succès de Bruckner dans la ville Impériale. Richter a pu annoncer « un radical volte-face de la part de l'ensemble de la Société philharmonique concernant Bruckner » .

Une des grandes satisfactions de Bruckner durant les dernières années de sa vie fut de voir ses œuvres jouées aux États-Unis. Prenant connaissance de la critique du « New York Tribune » , il dira : « L'Amérique m'accepte. Je suis ravi. » .

1885 : Ire exécution américaine (à New York) de sa 3e Symphonie dédiée à Richard Wagner.

1885 : L'aménagement de « WC » (Water Closets) devienne la norme dans les appartements neufs de Vienne.

20 septembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à August Göllerich (Vienne) .

« My Dear Biographer !

Have you read the “ Berliner Tagblatt ” of August 10 ? Thereupon, “ Bote und Bock ” of Berlin offer to be my publisher. Dear Friend ! I think that the biography can wait ; you ought not to undertake expense on its behalf. In addition, Conservatory classes begin already on Tuesday. Do as you see fit. Sincerest greetings.

Yours,

Bruckner »

Incipit : « Haben Sie das Berliner Tagblatt ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 169 ; page 195.

« Anton Bruckner, 10 Briefe » , Berlin-Charlottenburg (1953) , Herausgeber und kommentiert von Felix von Lepel (1899, Dresden - 1979, Berlin) - lettre n° 1 ; page 6.

August Göllerich junior (1859-1923) : Pianist, teacher, conductor, and writer on music. Politically anti-Semitic. Göllerich had offered to assume expenses on behalf of Bruckner's biography.

25 septembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) au Père Raffael « Oddo » Loidol (Kremsmünster) .

« Dear Worthy, Noble Friend !

Herewith, I send you the “ Christus factus est ” ; accept it as a “ memento ” of August 2, 1885.

Please give my respects to the Director, Father Georg, with the request that the Mass in F be copied, as soon as possible. In the “ Berliner Tagblatt ” of August 10 is a colossal article about me by Doctor Paul Marsop, in which I am proclaimed the Number 1 living Symphony composer. 2 days later, “ Bote und Bock ”, the Number 1 publisher in Berlin, approached me and offered to publish works of mine. Thank you very much for your birthday congratulations. May you accept congratulations for all, in the future. I am, of course, too over-exerted to be able to go into every particular.

In the most sincere friendship and reverence,

Anton Bruckner

October 4 : I feel I should be in Linz (Mass in E minor. No. 2) . »

Incipit : « Hiemit sende ich Ihnen ... »

Source : Max Auer, n° 170 ; pages 195-196.

Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol (1858-1893) : Priest, composer, and friend of Bruckner. During 1879 and 1880, he audited Bruckner's lectures at the University of Vienna. In August 1880, he entered the Novitiate at « Stift

Kremsmünster » , taking the name « Oddo » . He studied at Saint-Florian's Monastery for 4 years, and was ordained on July 19, 1885, in Kremsmünster. He became a friend and advocate of Bruckner at the University of Vienna and remained so, for the rest of his life.

Paul Marsop

Doctor Paul Marsop (1826-1925) : German music-editor and critic from Munich. He championed Bruckner's music and praised him in his columns. He worked, « inter alia » , for the « Berliner Tagblatt » .

...

Le juriste, bibliothécaire, écrivain et directeur musical indépendant, l'érudit juif protestant allemand Paul Marsop, est né le 6 octobre 1856 à Berlin ; et est mort le 31 mai 1925 à Florence. Docteur en philosophie, il va travailler à Munich, à Berlin et en Italie. Il écrira comme critique musical, entre autres, pour le « Berliner Tagblatt » .

Il est le père fondateur d'environ 2 douzaines de bibliothèques musicales en Allemagne dont la Ire pour le grand public : la bibliothèque de musique municipale de Munich (« die städtische Münchener Musikbibliothek ») située au « Markthalle » sur la « Salvatorplatz » (aujourd'hui, ce lieu se nomme Maison de la littérature) .

D'abord un anti-bruckérien, il finira par devenir l'un de ses plus fervents supporters.

...

Paul Marsop : Geboren 6. Oktober 1856 in Berlin ; gestorben 31. Mai 1925 in Florenz.

Konfession : Jüdisch, protestantisch.

Musikalischer Beruf : Musikschriftsteller.

Weitere Tätigkeiten : Bibliothekar, Schriftsteller, Jurist.

Zeitgenössische Angaben : Musikdirektor, Gründer der städtischen Musikbibliothek.

Wirkungsorte : Italien, München, Berlin.

Doktor der Philosophie, Musikschriftsteller Marsop hat die Musikkritik um die Jahrhundertwende stark beeinflusst, er war zu einem Teile schuld an der Verfälschung des Beethovenbildes (Beethoven als Verfechter einer liberalistischen Weltauffassung) .

Privatgelehrter und Musikdirektor. Er war Gründervater von etwa zwei Dutzend Musikbibliotheken in Deutschland, unter anderem die erste musikalische Volksbibliothek in Deutschland, die städtische Münchner Musikbibliothek, die sich mittlerweile in der ehemaligen Markthalle am Salvatorplatz (heute : Literaturhaus) befindet.

Er ist Namensgeber der Marsopstraße.

Netzwerk

Hermann Levi (1839-1900) : Dirigent.

Hans Wihan (1855-1920) : Violoncellist.

Felix Weingartner (1863-1942) : Dirigent.

...

Septembre 1885 : Anton Bruckner sends the score of the 1881 version of the 4th Symphony to music-publishers Bote & Bock, of Berlin, with a view to publication. But it is rejected.

4 octobre 1885 : Création à Linz de la 2e version de la Messe en si mineur (WAB 27) par le « Linzer Musikverein » sous la direction d'Adalbert Schreyer.

13 octobre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) adressée à la Philharmonique de Vienne.

« Honourable Committee !

Although the project would very much honour and please me, I desire that my most submissive request be approved, that the honourable Committee might, “ for this ” year, pursue another course concerning the performance of my E major Symphony, on grounds which originate solely in connection with the lamentable local situation in relation to the influential criticism which could only inhibit my commencing successes in Germany.

With all respect,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Es wolle mir das ergebenste Ansuchen ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 171 ; page 196.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 124 ; page 137.

28 octobre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Adalbert Schreyer (Linz) .

« Dear Esteemed Director !

From afar, I cry-out to you, once more, with my sincerest thanks and deepest admiration for the artistic-heroic deed, the very successful performance of my E minor Mass. My joy over it will be inextinguishable. I request that these, my thanks and congratulations, most graciously be extended to the Board of the honourable Society, as well as to all of the ladies and gentlemen who have been so gracious and enthusiastic about art and who made the performance possible through their perseverance. Because of this performance, Linz shall always have a special place in my heart. The endeavor of the honourable Society was truly blessed. This is no longer the old Linz. Once more, congratulations to all of the artists.

Your most indebted,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Aus der Feme rufe ich Ihnen nochmals ... »

Sources : Max Auer, lettre n° 172 ; pages 196-197.

Franz Gräßlinger, lettre n° 100 ; pages 115-116.

Göllerich-Auer, Band III/1 ; pages 591-192.

Adalbert Schreyer (1850-1925) : « Kapellmeister » in Olmütz, Baden, and « Wiener-Neustadt » . From 1883 to 1896, he was Director of the « Linzer Musikverein » and Choir-Master of the « Männergesang Verein “ Sängerbund ” » .

6 novembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Moritz von Mayfeld (Linz) .

« Dear “ Herr ” Councillor !

I protested against the performance of my 7th Symphony because, in Vienna, this has no purpose because of Hanslick and his associates. If the Philharmonic does not heed my protest, then, it can do as it will. In no case, can anything be done before January because the parts have not been printed yet. Actually, the full-score, etc. (piano arrangement) will take an even longer time to get into print, so I hear. 2 orders arrived from foreign countries ; 3 from America.

Concerning my marriage, “ I still have no bride-up to this date ” ; if only I could find a properly becoming sweetheart ! To be sure, I have many female friends ; for, in recent times, the darlings pursue me quite extensively, and they think that they have to treat me in an idealistic manner. It's terrible if one is not well ! Entirely forsaken ! A hand-kiss to your gracious lady !

Respectfully yours,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Ich protestirte gegen die Aufführung ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 173 ; pages 197-198.

Moritz von Mayfeld (1817-1904) : Government official, composer and pianist. He and his wife were close friends of Bruckner.

Bruckner differentiates between European and American requests. His earliest performance in America was in Cincinnati.

1er décembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Theodor Helm (Vienne) .

« Highly-Esteemed Sir !

Permit me, your esteemed self, to be allowed to send you belatedly the enclosed little sketch concerning my humble self.

With deepest respect

Most devotedly yours,

Anton Bruckner

Sketch :

Born in 1824 in Ansfelden, in Upper-Austria.

Choir boy at Saint-Florian Monastery, from 1837 to 1840.

Teacher from 1841 to 1855 ; incidentally, monastery organist at Saint-Florian for the last 5 years there, as well.

Cathedral organist in Linz, from 1855 to 1868.

Court Organist since 1868, and also, professor at the Conservatory.

I completed my studies in strict counterpoint with Professor Simon Sechter in Vienna, from 1855 to 1861, where I always stayed for longer periods.

Then, until 1863, I studied composition in Linz with Otto Kitzler from Dresden.

In 1869, I concertized on the organ in Nancy and Paris ; in 1871, in London : 6 times in (Royal) Albert Hall ; 5 times in the Crystal Palace ; with the greatest success.

Compositions : 3 grand Masses, " Te Deum ", String Quintet, 7 Symphonies, choruses, etc. , etc. , etc.

N.B. : Since 1875, I have been Lecturer at the University.

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Gestatten mir Hochselber ... »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 174 ; pages 198-199.

Theodor Helm (1843-1920) : Austrian writer on music, critic, and professor.

5 décembre 1885 : Le chef Walter Damrosch programme la 3e Symphonie à New York. Il s'agit de la 1re exécution d'une œuvre de Bruckner aux États-Unis.

8 décembre 1885 : A setting of Anton Bruckner's « Virga Jesse floruit » (WAB 52) for unaccompanied chorus is performed for the 1st time, at the Vienna « Hofkapelle » .

11 décembre 1885 : Exécution de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner à Dresde sous la direction du chef Ernst von Schuch. Au même moment, le compositeur presse l'éditeur viennois Albert J. Gutmann de publier sa 7e Symphonie et l'éditeur Theodor Rättig de publier son « Te Deum » .

Anton Meißner felt that the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony was always taken too rapidly, and Amalie Klose recalls his broad tempo for the Scherzo of the 8th. In 1885, Bruckner wrote to Ernst von Schuch in Dresden to « ask fervently ...

Ernst von Schuch

Le chef d'orchestre autrichien Ernst Edler von Schuch (né Ernst Gottfried Schuch) est né le 23 novembre 1846 à Graz, en Styrie, Autriche ; et est mort le 10 mai 1914 à Niederlößnitz-Radebeul, Kötzschenbroda (Dresde) , dans le « Land » de Saxe, en Allemagne. Il s'est fait connaître par sa collaboration avec Richard Strauß à l'Opéra de la Cour de Dresde.

Schuch étudia à Graz, puis à Vienne, auprès de Felix Otto Dessoff et débuta, en 1867, en tant que Maître de chapelle au « Lobe-Theater » de Breslau. Suivirent des contrats à Würzburg (1868-1870) ; Graz (1870-1871) ; et Bâle, avant qu'il soit engagé en 1872 par Pollini, à Dresde. Dans cette ville, il fut, à partir de 1872, directeur musical au « Hofoper » ; à partir de 1873, Maître de chapelle royale aux côtés de Julius Rietz et, par la suite, aux côtés de Franz Wüllner. En 1882, il prit la direction du « Hofoper » avec le titre de conseiller aulique ; en 1889, il devint directeur général de la musique. En 1882, il s'installa à Niederlöbnitz, au 15-17 de la « Weintraubenstraße » (en 1883, à sa propre demande, elle fut rebaptisée rue Schuch) . En 1898, il fut anobli par l'Empereur d'Autriche et, en 1899, nommé au Conseil privé de Saxe. Du fait de son influence, on a parlé de l' « époque Schuch » dans l'histoire de l'Opéra.

Jusqu'en 1914, il ne quitta plus Dresde, mis à part des invitations à Berlin, Munich, Vienne et Paris, et il fit de son Opéra un des principaux temples de la musique en Europe ; il créa un ensemble prestigieux et fit de son Orchestre un des plus réputés du monde. Outre le répertoire de Richard Wagner, il dirigea les créations de « Feuersnot » (1901) ; « Salomé » (1905) ; « Elektra » (1909) ; « le Chevalier à la rose » (1911) , toutes de Richard Strauß, ainsi que les Ires représentations en allemand de Giacomo Puccini et Pietro Mascagni. On l'appréciait également pour diriger des concerts et dans ce domaine il s'imposait en particulier pour les œuvres orchestrales de Felix Dræseke et de Strauß.

Schuch était l'époux de la soprano coloratura Clementine von Schuch-Proska (1850-1932) . Elle était membre honoraire du Théâtre royal de la Cour. Sa fille, Liesel von Schuch, a chanté à Dresde et à Vienne.

...

The Austrian conductor Ernst Edler von Schuch (born Ernst Gottfried Schuch) was born on 23 November 1846 in Graz, Austria ; and died on 10 May 1914 in Niederlöbnitz-Radebeul, Kötzschenbroda (Dresden) , Saxony, Germany. He became famous through his working collaborations with Richard Strauß, at the Dresden Court Opera.

Schuch Ist studied law but, then, turned to music, trained at Ist by Eduard Stolz. He studied in Graz and, later, in Vienna, briefly with Felix Otto Dessoff, and started his conducting career, in 1867, as « Kapellmeister » at Lobe's Theatre, in Breslau, while the Breslau Opera was out of action following a fire.

Coincidentally, a father and son with the same family name Schuch had built and run the Ist Opera Theatre in Breslau, 120 years earlier. There followed engagements in Würzburg (1868-1870) ; Graz (1870-1871) ; and Basle, until he was employed in 1872 by Pollini's Italian Opera for Dresden. There, in 1872, he became Music director at the Court Opera ; from 1873, Royal « Kapellmeister » with Julius Rietz, later with Franz Wüllner. In 1878, he was appointed Royal Professor. In 1882, he undertook the direction of the Court Opera with the title of privy councillor and, in 1889, became its general music-director. From 1882 onward, he lived in Niederlöbnitz on the « Weintraubenstraße » (in 1883, renamed at his own suggestion as « Schuchstraße Nr. 15-17 ») . In 1898, he was ennobled by the Austrian Emperor and, in 1899, was appointed to the Saxon Confidential Privy Council. His period of influence is known as the « Schuch era » in Operatic performing history.

Tours as guest-conductor in Berlin, Munich, Vienna and Paris aside, he remained committed to Dresden until 1914, and made its Opera House there into one of the leading musical stages of Europe. He created a surpassing ensemble and enlarged the Orchestra to make it one of the greatest in the world. Specializing in the music-dramas of Richard Wagner, he also led the original productions of the Richard Strauß Operas « Feuersnot » (1901) ; « Salome » (1905) ; « Elektra » (1909) ; and « Der Rosenkavalier » (1911) as well as the 1st German productions of Operas by Giacomo Puccini and Pietro Mascagni. Also highly valued as a non-Operatic conductor, he was particularly known in the concert-hall for his renditions of the orchestral works of Felix Dræseke and Strauß.

He married coloratura soprano Clementine von Schuch-Proska (Klementine Procházka) (1850-1932) , who became an honorary member of Dresden's Royal Theatre Company. Their daughter Liesel von Schuch sang in Dresden (from 1914 on) and Vienna.

...

Ernst Edler von Schuch, geboren als Ernest Gottfried Schuch, (geboren 23. November 1846 in Graz ; gestorben 10. Mai 1914 in Niederlößnitz) war ein österreichischer Dirigent, der als Generalmusikdirektor der Dresdner Hofoper und durch seine Zusammenarbeit mit Richard Strauß, als dessen « Leibdirigent » , berühmt wurde. Die vierzig Jahre seines Schaffens in Dresden (1872-1914) werden als die Ära Schuch rezipiert.

Schuch war der Sohn eines höheren Beamten. Nach seinem Abitur studierte er in Graz Jura, daneben musizierte er weiterhin wie bereits seit früher Kindheit (Geige, Klavier) . Er leitete den Akademischen Musikverein und war ein Schüler des Dirigenten Eduard Stolz. Dann immatrikulierte er sich in Wien und wurde Schüler von Felix Otto Dessoff. 1867, nach seiner juristischen Zwischenprüfung, begann er als Kapellmeister bei Theodor Lobe in Breslau. Es folgten Verpflichtungen in Würzburg (1868-1870) , Graz (1870-1871) und Basel, bevor er 1872 von Bernhard Pollini (1838-1897) als Musikdirektor für dessen italienische Oper nach Dresden an die Hofoper engagiert wurde. Dort wurde er 1873 Königlicher Kapellmeister neben Julius Rietz, später neben Franz Wüllner. 1879 stieg er zum Leiter der Königlichen Kapelle auf. 1882 übernahm er die Direktion der Hofoper als Hofrat, womit er entscheidenden Einfluss auf die Programmgestaltung wie auch die Weiterentwicklung der Kapelle selbst nehmen konnte. 1889 wurde er zum Generalmusikdirektor ernannt.

Im Jahr 1898 wurde Schuch vom österreichischen Kaiser in den erblichen Adelsstand erhoben und 1899 wurde er zum sächsischen Geheimen Hofrat ernannt. Im selben Jahr 1899 erhielt er die sächsischen Adelsanerkennung. Sein Wirken ging als Ära Schuch in die Operngeschichte ein.

Neben Gastspielreisen in Berlin, München, Wien und Paris blieb er Dresden bis zu seinem Tode verbunden und schlug einige verlockende Angebote an andere bedeutende Häuser aus, darunter das Richard-Wagner-Festspielhaus in Bayreuth. Schuch machte Dresden zu einer der führenden Musikbühnen Europas, erweiterte die Sächsischen Staatskapelle zu einer der größten der Welt und schuf daraus ein Ensemble von Weltruf. Mit diesem pflegte er einerseits das Repertoire seines Amtsvorgängers Richard Wagner, den er verehrte und dessen Werk er dem Dresdner Publikum in Gänze erschloss. Daneben präsentierte er der Öffentlichkeit das Wirken der zeitgenössischen italienischen Opernkomponisten, ergänzt um Werke aus dem slawischen Kulturkreis. Als Pianist begleitete Schuch 1905 die sogenannte Traumtänzerin Magdeleine Guipet im Dresdner Schauspielhaus, die sich vor ihrem Auftritt unter Hypnose setzen ließ. Bei dieser und auch mehreren anderen Gelegenheiten in den 1900er Jahren waren Karl May und Gattin auf Einladung oder auch zusammen mit den Schuchs zu Musikveranstaltungen in Dresden.

Von seinen vielen Ur- und Erstaufführungen werden insbesondere die Uraufführungen von Richard Strauß' Feuersnot (1901), Salome (1905), Elektra (1909), Rosenkavalier (1911) sowie deutsche Erstaufführungen von Puccini und Mascagni rezipiert. Daneben wurde Schuch auch als Konzertdirigent geschätzt und setzte sich als solcher besonders für Orchesterwerke von Felix Dräseke, Strauß und Gustav Mahler ein, von dem er zwischen 1897 und 1914 viele Werke als Erstaufführungen nach Dresden brachte.

Schuch war ab 1875 mit der Koloratursopranistin Clementine von Schuch-Proska (1850-1932) verheiratet. Nachdem Schuch sich ab 1880 jeweils in der Löbnitz eine Sommerwohnung gemietet hatte, nahm er 1882 seinen Sommerwohnsitz in der Niederlöbnitz, in der Weintraubenstraße direkt nördlich des Gasthofs Goldene Weintraube (heute Stammhaus der Landesbühnen Sachsen). Die Straße wurde im Folgejahr, 1883, auf seinen Antrag umbenannt in Schuchstraße. Dort unter der heutigen Adresse Nr. 15-17 stand ursprünglich ein eher kleineres Haus, das der Baumeister Moritz Ziller 1866 (oder 1876-1877) als Landhaus im Schweizerstil für den Eigentümer der Goldenen Weintraube errichtet hatte und das in den Folgejahren mehrfach für Schuch erweitert werden mußte und ab 1897 als Ganzjahreswohnung diente. Schuch selbst nannte das Haus, dessen heutige Besitzer Villa Schuch an den Giebel geschrieben haben, Villa Favorita (damalige Adresse Schuchstraße 11). Dort kam 1891 seine Tochter Liesel von Schuch (1891-1990) als jüngstes von fünf Kindern zur Welt, die ebenfalls wie die Mutter eine erfolgreiche Koloratursopranistin wurde. Liesels ältere Schwester Käthe (1885-1973; auch verheiratet Ullmann beziehungsweise Schmidt) schlug ebenfalls die Sängerkarriere ein. Bruder Hans (1886-1963) wurde ein bekannter Cellist. Dessen Tochter Clementine von Schuch (1921-2014) wurde wiederum Opernsängerin. Schuch führte dort ein gastliches Haus, in dem « wohl alle namhaften Musiker und Theaterleute seiner Zeit einmal gern und ohne Förmlichkeit aufgenommen wurden ». Mit diesen erging er sich gern auf ausgedehnten Spaziergängen durch die Löbnitz.

Schuch fuhr viele Jahre mit der Eisenbahn von der nahegelegenen Station Weintraube zur Arbeit. Extra für ihn wurde ein Sonderzug eingerichtet, im Volksmund « Schuch-Zug » genannt, der jeweils zur Probenzeit fuhr.

Schuch starb kurz nach der Dresdner Erstaufführung von Wagners Parsifal. Er wurde am 14. Mai 1914 unter großer öffentlicher Teilnahme zu den Klängen von Wagners Trauermarsch aus der Oper Götterdämmerung auf dem Kötzschenbrodaer Friedhof beerdigt. Dort liegt er zusammen mit seiner Ehefrau Clementine, die dort 1932 neben ihm beerdigt wurde. Direkt in der Nähe liegt auch das Grab ihrer Tochter Liesel.

Schuch dirigierte in Dresden 122 oder 123 Erst- und Uraufführungen, darunter :

Giuseppe Verdi : Rigoletto, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1874) .

Giuseppe Verdi : La Traviata, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1875) .

Giuseppe Verdi : Messa da Requiem, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1876) .

Georges Bizet : Carmen, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1880) .

Robert Schumann : Genoveva, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1882) .

Richard Wagner : Tristan und Isolde, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1884) .

Richard Wagner : Der Ring des Nibelungen, Eigenmächtig Abwesend Dresden (1884-1886) .

August Bungert : Homerische Welt (anderer Titel : Die Odyssee) , Opern-Tetralogie, Opus 30.

1. Teil : Kirke, Musik-Tragödie in 3 Akten, Opus 30/1, Uraufführung Dresden (1898) .

2. Teil : Nausikaa, Musik-Tragödie in 3 Akten, Opus 30/2, Uraufführung Dresden (1901) .

3. Teil : Odysseus' Heimkehr, Musik-Tragödie in 3 Akten, Opus 30/3, Uraufführung Dresden (1896) .

4. Teil : Odysseus' Tod, Musik-Tragödie in 3 Akten, Opus 30/4, Uraufführung Dresden (1903) .

Richard Strauß : Feuersnot, Opus 50. Libretto : Ernst von Wolzogen. Uraufführung Dresden (1901) .

Richard Strauß : Salome Opus 54. Libretto : Richard Strauß, nach dem gleichnamigen Schauspiel von Oscar Wilde, deutsch von Hedwig Lachmann. Uraufführung Dresden (1905) .

Richard Strauß : Elektra, Opus 58. Libretto : Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Uraufführung Dresden (1909) .

Richard Strauß : Der Rosenkavalier, Opus 59. Libretto : Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Uraufführung Dresden (1911) .

Schuch erhielt im Laufe seiner Tätigkeit zahlreiche in- und ausländische Auszeichnungen und Ehrungen, die Orden teilweise in unterschiedlichen Stufen.

Im Jahr 1898 wurde Schuch als österreichischer Bürger durch Kaiser Franz Joseph I. nobilitiert. Das auch für seine Familie geltende erbliche Adelsprädikat war Edler von, dazu gab es ein Wappen. Anfang 1899 erhielt Schuch die Bestätigung des sächsischen Hofes zur Führung seines Adelstitels. Im April jenes Jahres wurde er dann zum Geheimen Hofrat 3. Klasse ernannt. 1907 folgte die Rangerhöhung auf Rang 18c der 2. Klasse in der Hofrangordnung, womit er an der königlichen Tafel selbst sitzen durfte (Platz Nr. 23) .

...

Ernst von Schuch begann seine musikalische Ausbildung an der Steirischen Landesmusikschule (Violine und Klavier)

seiner Heimatstadt. 1853 trat er erstmals öffentlich auf. Nach Abschluß des Gymnasiums studierte er Jurisprudenz in Graz, Wien und Breslau ; das Studium beendete er mit dem Referendarexamen. Daneben erlernte Schuch das Kapellmeisterhandwerk (Dirigieren, Korrepetition) bei Eduard Stolz und Otto Deshoff, außerdem übernahm er die Leitung des Akademischen Gesangsvereins Graz. Nach kurzen Kapellmeistertätigkeiten in Breslau (1867 am Lobe'schen Theater) , Würzburg, Graz und Basel und einem erfolgreichen Gastspiel mit der Pollinischen italian Operngesellschaft im März 1872 in Dresden trat Schuch am 1. August 1872 die Stelle als zweiter Kapellmeister an der Sächs. Hofoper an. Noch im selben Jahr übernahm er die Leitung der Abonnementskonzerte der Sächsischen Hofkapelle. 1873 wurde er « Königlich Kapellmeister » (Anstellung auf Lebenszeit) ; 1877 « Etatmässiger Kapellmeister » ; 1879 « Erster Kapellmeister » (Oberleitung der Hofkapelle) . 1880 wurde Schuch die alleinige musikalische Leitung der Hofoper übertragen ; 1882 erfolgte seine Ernennung zum « Direktor der Hofoper » .

Schuch war 42 Jahre lang mit Dresdens Hofoper und der Königlich Kapelle verbunden. Mit 123 Erst- und Uraufführungen unter seiner Leitung verhalf er der Dresdner Hofoper zu außergewöhnlichem Ruhm und Ansehen in Europa und Amerika. Am Beginn seiner Tätigkeit standen die Erstaufführungen von Giuseppe Verdis « Rigoletto » (1874) ; « La Traviata » (1875) ; und die « Missa da Requiem » (1876) ; gefolgt von Georges Bizets « Carmen » (1880) ; und Robert Schumanns « Genoveva » (1882) . Einen ersten Höhepunkt in der Reihe der von Schuch geleiteten Erstaufführungen bildeten die Werke von Richard Wagner (« Tristan und Isolde » , 1884 ; « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , 1884-1886) .

Schuchs beständige Neugier auf zeitgenössische Werke verband sich mit außergewöhnlicher Musikalität, perfekter Partiturbeherrschung, Einsatzfreude und Disziplin - die letztgenannten Eigenschaften vermochte er in besonderer Weise auf das Ensemble der Hofoper und die Kapelle zu übertragen. Die Qualitäten Schuchs und seines Orchesters schätzte nicht zuletzt Richard Strauß : Er übertrug Schuch die Uraufführungen der Bühnenwerke « Feuersnot » , Opus 50 (Uraufführung 21. November 1901) ; « Salome » Opus 54 (Uraufführung 9. Dezember 1905) ; « Elektra » Opus 58 (Uraufführung 25. Januar 1909) ; und « Der Rosenkavalier » Opus 59 (Uraufführung 26. Januar 1911) . In Schuch fand Strauß die künstlerische Professionalität, die der Interpretation seiner Werke höchste Authentizität sicherte.

Schuch war einer der maßgeblichen Interpreten des Musiktheaters seiner Zeit. Nicht weniger bedeutungsvoll sind seine Konzertdirigate, in denen er sich vor allem für die Symphonien von Gustav Mahler einsetzte ; diese nahm er von 1897 bis zu seinem Tod regelmäßig als Erstaufführungen in den Spielplan der Dresdner Orchesterkonzerte auf. Seit 1900 führten ihn Gastdirigate nach Berlin, New York (1900) , Paris (1904) und London (1905) .

...

Geheimrat Ernst Edler von Schuch, « né » als Ernest Gottfried Schuch (geboren 23. November 1846 in Graz ; gestorben 10. Mai 1914 in Niederlößnitz) , war ein österreichischer Dirigent, der durch seine Zusammenarbeit mit Richard Strauß an der Dresdner Hofoper berühmt wurde.

Er war mit Karl May bekannt, den er gezielt zu Aufführungen einlud.

1872 wurde er Musikdirektor an der Dresdner Hofoper, ab 1873 Königlicher Kapellmeister. 1882 übernahm er die Direktion der Hofoper als Hofrat, 1889 wurde er Generalmusikdirektor. 1898 wurde Schuch vom österreichischen Kaiser in den Erbliehen Adelsstand erhoben und 1899 wurde er zum sächsischen Geheimen Hofrat ernannt. Im Jahr 1909 erhielt er die sächsischen Adelsanerkennung.

Seinen Wohnsitz nahm er 1882 in Niederlößnitz in der Weintraubenstraße (1883 auf seinen Antrag umbenannt in Schuchstraße 15-17) , wo der Baumeister Moritz Ziller 1866 ein Landhaus im Schweizerstil errichtet hatte.

...

Ernst (Ernest) Gottfried von Schuch, Dirigent : geboren Graz (Steirmark) , 23. November 1846 ; gestorben Kötzschenbroda, Sachsen (Dresden, Deutschland) , 10. Mai 1914. Sohn eines höheren Beamten, Gatte der Sängerin Clementine Schuch. Schuch besuchte die Schule in Graz und Marburg an der Drau (Maribor) und trat bereits in seiner Kindheit als Geiger und Pianist in öffentlichen Konzerten auf. Während seines Studium an der Universität Graz leitete er den Akademischen Gesangverein und nahm Unterricht beim Dirigenten Eduard Stolz, in Wien bei Otto Dessoff. Nach Abbruch seines Studium begann er 1867 als Dirigent in Breslau (Wrocław) und kam über Würzburg (1868-1870) und Graz (1870-1871) nach Basel. Ein Gastdirigat 1872 in Dresden führte zu seinem Engagement an die dortige Hofoper ; 1879 Erster Kapellmeister ; 1889 Generalmusikdirektor Schuch setzte sich früh für das Oratorienwerk Franz Liszts ein, ebenso für das Werk Richard Wagners (« Der Ring des Nibelungen » , « Tristan und Isolde » , « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg ») . Trotzdem gelang es nicht, den von Wagner geschätzten Dirigenten nach Bayreuth zu verpflichten. Während seines Wirkens an der Dresdner Hofoper brachte Schuch 51 Uraufführung und 117 Erstaufführung heraus. Von besonders musikgeschichtliche Bedeutung ist dabei auch sein Eintreten für Richard Strauß, dessen Opern « Feuersnot » (1901) ; « Salome » (1905) ; « Elektra » (1909) ; « Der Rosenkavalier » (1911) er in Dresden zur Uraufführung brachte. Auch im Rahmen seiner Europa und die USA umspannenden Konzerttätigkeit (er war ab 1877 Dirigent der Königlich Hofmusikkapelle in Dresden) setzte er sich (neben der Klassik) für das zeitgenössische Schaffen (und andere Strauß, Mahler, Reger, Pfitzner, Debussy, Ravel) ein. Schuch, als Orchester- und als Ensembleerzieher ebenso wie als Interpret eine « Ausnahmeerscheinung unter den großen Dirigenten seiner Zeit » , machte die Dresdner Oper zu einem der führenden Häuser der Welt und kann als einer der wichtigsten Propagatoren der Musik seiner Periode bezeichnet werden. 1898 wurde er in den österreichische Adelsstand mit dem Ehrenwort « Edler von » erhoben.

...

Ernst Gottfried von Schuch, Dirigent : geboren 23 November 1846 in Graz ; gestorben 10. Mai 1914 Kötzschenbroda / Sachsen (heute Radebeul bei Dresden / Deutschland) . Schon als Kind trat er als Geiger und Pianist auf. Er begann später ein Jus-Studium an der Universität Graz, leitete daneben den Akademischen Gesangverein in Graz und wurde von den Dirigenten Eduard Stolz (geboren circa 1817 Salzburg ; gestorben 5. Juni 1889 Prag) und in Wien von Otto Dessoff ausgebildet. Er war als Musikdirektor in Breslau (Wrocław / Polen, 1867) ; Würzburg / Deutschland (1868-1870) ; Graz (1870-1871) und Basel / CH tätig. 1872 wurde Schuch an die Dresdener Hofoper engagiert (1. Kapellmeister 1879, Generalmusikdirektor 1889) . Ab 1877 dirigierte er auch die HMK. Er setzte sich vor allem für das Werk Franz Liszts, Richard Wagners und Richard Strauß' ein.

...

Ernst Edler von Schuch (geboren 23. November 1846 in Graz ; gestorben 10. Mai 1914 in Niederlöbnitz) war Generalmusikdirektor in Dresden.

Ernst Edler von Schuch führte von 1872 die Dresdner Oper in eine neue Blütezeit. Unter seiner Leitung wurde das Dresdner Orchester die « Wunderharfe » genannt. Schuch machte die späten Opern Richard Wagners heimisch und begeisterte durch die Grazie und Geschmeidigkeit, mit der er die Werke der Italiener deutete.

Ernst Edler von Schuch gilt als der Entdecker der Opern von Richard Strauß. Unter seiner Leitung gab es die Uraufführungen von « Salome » , « Elektra » und dem « Rosenkavalier » .

Ernst von Schuch und Karl May

Zu Schuchs 30jährigen Jubiläum, zur Erinnerung an seinen Antritt besuchten Karl und Emma May sowie Klara Plöhn am 16. März 1902 die Oper und sahen Don Pasquale. Anwesend waren auch Albert von Sachsen und seine Frau Carola.

Am 11. April erhielten Mays und Klara Plöhn Dank der Güte Schuch's doch noch Karten zu der eigentlich ausverkauften Vorstellung Manfred von Lord Byron mit Musik von Robert Schumann.

Am 3. Januar 1903 besuchten Karl May und Klara Plöhn das Theater (Hoffmanns Erzählungen) , was ihnen von Schuch warm empfohlen wurde.

Am 25. Januar 1904 waren Karl und Klara May gemeinsam mit Schuchs in der Oper bei Lohengrin von Richard Wagner.

Im März 1905 besorgte Schuch Karl und Klara May Billets zum Postillon von Lonjumeau und für die Vorstellung der Traumtänzerin Madeleine G. im Schauspielhaus, das sie am 10. März und 12. März besuchten. Bei der Traumtänzerin spielte Schuch selbst Klavier.

Am 10. Dezember leitete Schuch die Uraufführung von Richard Strauß' Salome in der Dresdner Hofoper.

Drei Tage später widmete May Ernst von Schuch ein Exemplar der Sascha-Schneider-Mappe in aufrichtigster und dankbarer Hochachtung.

Sonstiges

Marie Hannes berichtete May am 11. Juli 1902, daß sie Hans von Schuch, den Sohn Ernst von Schuchs, kennengelernt habe, der ihr erzählte, er sei mit Mays mal mit der Tram von einem Konzert nach Hause gefahren.

Genealogie Schuch, Familie

Vater - Josef Schuch, Staatsbeamter ; Mutter - Wilhelmine Dieffenbach ; verheiratet 1875 Clementine Procházka (1850-1932) , aus Sopron, Sängerin, 1873-1904 an der Hofoper in Dresden ; 3 Sohn - Ernst (1876-1945, verheiratet 1 ; Marga Mankiewicz, 2 ; 1924 Olga von Höffern, geboren 1886, evangelisch, aus Wien, Pianistin, Klavierpädagogin, siehe Deutsche Musiker-Lexikon, herausgeber von E. H. Müller, 1929) , Offz. - Friedrich (1882-1962, sächsische Adelsanerkennung 1909, verheiratet Susanne Hohl) , Doktor iuris, Oberregierungsrat (siehe Lexikon) , Hans (1886-1963, verheiratet 1 ; Valerie Koslerova, 2 ; Hanna Beck) , Cellist an der Hofoper in Dresden, 2 Tochter - Käthe (1885-1973, verheiratet 1 ; Leopold Ullmann, 1882-1917, Opernsänger, zuletzt in Graz, siehe Kutsch-Riemens, Große Sängerlexikon, 2) Reinhold Schmidt, Oberregierungsrat) , Sängerin - Elisabeth (1891-1990, verheiratet Wilhelm Ganzel, Korvettenkapitän der deutschen Marine) , Sängerin, bis 1935 Mitglied der Sächsischen Staatsoper in Dresden, bis 1967 Gesangslehrerin an der Dresdner Musikhochschule, Ehrenmitglied der Sächsischen Staatsoper, Ehrenbürgerin von Dresden.

Seine Frau Clementine von Schuch (« né » Procházka, Pseudonym : Schuch-Proska) : geboren 12. Februar 1850 Ödenburg (Šopron) / Ungarn ; gestorben 11. (Kürschner : 8.) Juni 1932 Kötzschenbroda. Sängerin (Koloratursopran) . Gesangsausbildung am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde bei Mathilde Marchesi. 1873-1894 sang sie an der Dresdener Hofoper. Gastspiele führten sie nach Wien, Berlin, Zürich, London, Moskau, Sankt Petersburg.

Preis : Königliche Kammersängerin Dresden (1878) ; Ehrenmitglied der Hofoper Dresden (1894) .

Deren Kinder

Käthe (verheiratet Schmidt) : geboren 18. März 1885 in Dresden ; gestorben 1973 (Ort ?) . Sängerin (Sopran) . War 1910-1912 in Dessau / Deutschland engagiert, danach Konzertsängerin.

Hans : geboren 19. Juni 1886 Dresden ; gestorben 1963 (Ort ?) . Violoncellist, Musikpädagoge. Studierte am Konservatorium Dresden und war als Cellist in Berlin, Wien und Dresden tätig. Ab 1922 war er pädagogisch tätig.

Liesel : geboren 12. Dezember 1891 Dresden ; gestorben 10. Januar 1990 Dresden. Sängerin (Sopran) . Ihre Ausbildung bekam sie von der Mutter, dann in Dresden und Wien. 1914-1935 war sie Mitglied der Dresdener Staatsoper. Gastspiele führten sie auch nach Wien. 1935-1967 unterrichtete sie an der Musik Hofschule Dresden. Ihr Mann Leopold Ullmann (geboren 25. Januar 1882 [Ort ?] ; gestorben 16. Oktober 1917 in Graz) war Sänger in Dresden (1909-1915) und Graz (1915-1917) .

Preis : Kammersängerin (1935) ; Ehrenbürgerin von Dresden.

Hans von Schuchs Tochter Clementine junior (geboren 24. Juli 1921 in Dresden) war Schülerin ihrer Tante Liesel. Sie trat in Königsberg (Kaliningrad / Russland) , Dresden und Berlin (Komische Oper, ab 1948) auf.

Künstlerfamilie

Ernst Edler von Schuch war mit der Koloratursängerin Clementine von Schuch-Proska (geboren 12. Februar 1853 in Wien ; gestorben 8. Juni 1932 in Niederlößnitz) verheiratet. Das Paar hatte eine Tochter :

Elisabeth von Schuch (geboren 12. Dezember 1891 in Niederlößnitz ; gestorben 10. Januar 1990 in Dresden) , die spätere Opernsängerin und Ehrenbürgerin von Dresden.

...

Auf die Eltern Ernst und Clementine von Schuch folgten zwei weitere Generationen musisch begabter Nachkommen :

Ernst von Schuch (1846-1914) , Dirigent und Generalmusikdirektor verheiratet Clementine von Schuch-Proska (1850-1932) , Kammersängerin (Koloratursopranistin) .

Käthe von Schuch (1885-1973) , Sopranistin.

Hans von Schuch (1886-1963) , Cellist.

Clementine von Schuch (1921-2014) , Sopranistin.

Liesel von Schuch (1891-1990) , Kammersängerin (Koloratursopranistin) .

Orden

Sachsen

Zivilverdienstorden : Komtur I. Klasse (1912) .

Albrechts-Orden : Komtur II. Klasse (1891) .

Ritter I. Klasse (1878) .

Goldene Medaille Virtuti et ingenio am Band (1902) .

Carola-Medaille in Silber (1899) .

Goldene Medaille für Verdienste der Stadt Dresden (1898) .

Erinnerungsgedenkmünze an das 350-jährige Bestehen der Dresdner Hofkapelle (1899) .

Sächsischen HR (1882) .

Sächsischen Generalmusikdirektor (1889) .

Sachsen, vereinigte herzogliche Häuser

Herzoglich Sachsen-Ernestinischer Hausorden :

Komtur I. Klasse (1893) .

Ritter I. Klasse (1884) .

Sachsen-Weimar

Hausorden vom Weißen Falken : Kommandeur mit dem Stern.

Baden

Orden vom Zähringer Löwen : Kommandeur I. Klasse (1908) .

Bayern-Kurköln : Orden vom Heiligen Michaël : II. Klasse mit dem Stern (1896) .

Bayern

Verdienstorden der Bayerischen Krone : Großkomtur (1912) .

Lippe

Lippischer Hausorden : Ehrenkreuz III. Klasse (1876) .

Österreich-Ungarn

Franz-Joseph-Orden : Komtur mit dem Stern (1906) .

Ritter (1879) .

Orden der Eisernen Krone : Ritter III. Klasse (1886) .

Preußen

Roter Adlerorden : II. Klasse (1912) .

IV. Klasse (1882) .

Kronenorden (Preußen) : II. Klasse (1903) .

Niedrigere Klasse (1897) .

Württemberg

Friedrichs-Orden : Komtur I. Klasse (1906) .

Komtur II. Klasse (1896) .

Päpstlicher Stuhl

Gregoriusorden : Komtur (1898) .

Rumänien

Orden der Krone von Rumänien : Offizier (1888) .

Russland

Russischer Orden der Heiligen Anna : II. Klasse (1890) .

Schweden

Wasaorden : Ritter (1875) .

Serbien

Takovo-Orden : II. Klasse.

Siam

Weißer Elefantenorden : Komtur II. Klasse (1897) .

Spanien

Orden de Isabel la Católica : Komtur mit Stern (1908 oder 1909) .

Toskana

Zivilverdienstorden : Komtur (1877) .

...

GHR (1899) .

Preis

1898 : Nobilitierung (« Edler von ») .

1899 : Ehrenmitglied des Steiermärkischen Musikvereines.

Ehrungen

1879 : Ehrenmitglied des Tonkünstlervereins in Dresden.

1882 : Ehrenmitglied der Dreyssigschen Singakademie Dresden.

1889 : Ehrenmitglied des Dresdner Männergesangvereins.

1890 : Ehrenmitglied des Steiermärkischen Musikvereins.

1891 : Alter Herr im Deutschen Akademischen Gesangverein Graz.

1895 : Ehrenmitglied des Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikervereins.

1900 : Ehrenmitglied der Berliner Liedertafel.

1903 : Ehrenmitglied des Österreichisch-Ungarischen Hilfsvereins Dresden.

1911 : Ehrenmitglied der American Philharmonic Academy.

Werke und andere Komposition

Korr. : G. Hanke Knaus, Richard Strauß.

Ernst von Schuch, Ein Briefwechsel, Bibliografie (1999) .

Nachlaß : Briefe vor allem im Richard-Strauß-Archiv, Garmisch, in der Richard-Strauß-Gesammelte, München, und in Familie besitz.

La « Staatskapelle » de Dresde

La « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » , plus communément appelé « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, est un Orchestre allemand basé dans la ville de Dresde. Fondé par le prince-électeur de Saxe, Maurice, le 22 novembre 1548, c'est un des plus anciens Orchestres du monde, si ce n'est le plus ancien. Il est aussi considéré comme l'un des plus prestigieux Orchestres européens.

La « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, comme son homonyme berlinois, remplit une double fonction : celle d'Orchestre d'Opéra en qualité d'orchestre attitré du « Semperoper » de Dresde, et celle d'Orchestre symphonique. La majorité de ses concerts ont lieu au « Semperoper » , quelques-uns à l'Église Notre-Dame de Dresde. Les enregistrements de l'Orchestre ont généralement lieu à l'Église Saint-Luc (« Lukaskirche ») de la ville. L'Orchestre philharmonique de Dresde, créé en 1870, joue lui au « Kulturpalast » .

À sa création, la « Hofkapelle » (Chapelle de la Cour) remplit essentiellement une fonction religieuse. C'est alors une formation vocale plus qu'instrumentale. Par la suite, sa composition et ses missions évoluent, avec le développement de l'Opéra au 18e siècle.

L'Orchestre a eu, au cours de son histoire, d'éminents chefs. Le nom de Heinrich Schütz est associé à ses 1res années, et ceux de Carl Maria von Weber et de Richard Wagner au 19e siècle. Avec ces 2 personnalités, Dresde et sa « Staatskapelle » jouent un rôle central dans la création de l'Opéra national allemand, à une époque où le genre est dominé en Allemagne par la musique italienne. Au 20e siècle, c'est en partie cette tradition qui est prolongée par la collaboration entre l'Orchestre et Richard Strauß, aussi bien en tant que chef d'orchestre que compositeur. Bon nombre de ses œuvres, surtout scéniques, ont été créées par la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, et font depuis partie de la tradition de l'Orchestre. Karl Böhm, Rudolf Kempe et (moins fréquemment) Herbert von Karajan, 3 chefs particulièrement prestigieux et familiers de l'œuvre de Strauß, l'ont également dirigé au cours du 20e siècle. Herbert Blomstedt en a été le directeur musical, de 1975 à 1985. C'est avec lui que l'Orchestre a enregistré l'intégrale des 9 Symphonies de Ludwig van Beethoven.

Giuseppe Sinopoli en a été le chef jusqu'à sa mort brutale, en 2001. D'août 2002 à l'année 2004, c'est Bernard Haitink qui lui a succédé. Depuis, Fabio Luisi a été désigné « Generalmusikdirektor » . Il a pris officiellement ses fonctions, en août 2007. Entre-temps, Sir Colin Davis a reçu le titre d' « Ehrendirigent » (chef honoraire) . Christian Thielemann a succédé à Fabio Luisi, en 2012.

Directeurs musicaux successifs

Christian Thielemann (2012-) .

Fabio Luisi (2007-2012) .

Bernard Haitink (2002-2004) .

Giuseppe Sinopoli (1992-2001) .

Hans Vonk (1985-1990) .

Herbert Blomstedt (1975-1985) .

Martin Turnovský (1966-1968) .

Kurt Sanderling (1964-1967) .

Otmar Suitner (1960-1964) .

Lovro von Matačić (1956-1958) .

Franz Konwitschny (1953-1955) .

Rudolf Kempe (1949-1953) .

Joseph Keilberth (1945-1950) .

Karl Elmendorff (1943-1944) .

Karl Böhm (1934-1943) .

Fritz Busch (1922-1933) .

Fritz Reiner (1914-1921) .

Ernst von Schuch (1884-1914) .

Franz Wüllner (1877-1884) .

Julius Rietz (1874-1877) .

...

The « Staatskapelle Dresden » (officially known in German as : the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden ») is an Orchestra based in Dresden, Germany founded in 1548 by Kurfürst Moritz (Elector Moritz, or Maurice) of Saxony. It is one of the world's oldest Orchestras. The precursor ensemble was « Die Kurfürstlich-Sächsische und Königlich-Polnische Kapelle » (The Saxony Elector and Royal Polish Band) .

The Orchestra is the musical body of the « Sächsische Staatsoper » (Saxon State Opera) . Venue of the Orchestra is the « Semperoper » Opera House.

The Orchestra has had many eminent chief conductors. Heinrich Schütz was associated with it early in its existence, and, in the 19th Century, Carl Maria von Weber and Richard Wagner were both chief conductors.

In the 20th Century, Richard Strauß became closely associated with the Orchestra as both conductor and composer, which premiered several of his works. Karl Böhm and Hans Vonk were notable among the Orchestra's chief conductors in that they served as chief conductors of both the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » and the State Opera simultaneously. Herbert Blomstedt was musical director of the « Staatskapelle » , from 1975 to 1985.

In 1990, the « Staatskapelle » elected Colin Davis as its 1st (and so far only) « conductor laureate » , a position that he held until his death in 2013.

Giuseppe Sinopoli was chief conductor, from 1992 until his sudden death in 2001. Bernard Haitink replaced him in August 2002, but resigned in 2004 over disputes with the « Staatskapelle » 's Intendant, Gerd Uecker, on the Orchestra's choice of successor. In August 2007, Fabio Luisi began his tenure as chief conductor after having appointed as far back as January 2004. He shared with Böhm and Vonk the historic distinction of being chief conductor of both the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » and the « Sächsische Staatsoper » simultaneously. Luisi was scheduled to step down as chief conductor in 2012 in accord with the October 2009 announcement of Christian Thielemann as the Orchestra's next chief conductor, effective with the 2012-2013 season. But Luisi resigned as chief conductor of the « Staatskapelle » in February 2010, effective immediately, after reports that the management had secured a contract with the ZDF network for a scheduled televised concert on New Year's Eve 2011 without consulting him at all in his capacity as the Orchestra's « General Musik Direktor » .

The Orchestra has named Myung-Whun Chung as its 1st-ever principal guest-conductor, effective as of the 2012-2013 season.

In 2007, the Orchestra inaugurated the post of « Kapell-Compositeur » (or composer-in-residence) , each appointed composer holding the post for 1 concert season.

In April 2007, the European Cultural Foundation awarded the Orchestra a prize « zur Bewahrung des musikalischen Weltkulturerbes » (for preservation of the world's musical heritage) . In June 2011, the Orchestra was announced as the new resident Orchestra of the Salzburg Easter Festival, as of 2013.

« Kapellmeister » and Chief Conductors

1548-1554 : Johann Walter.

1555-1568 : Mattheus Le Maistre.

1568-1580 : Antonio Scandello.

1580-1584 : Giovanni Battista Pinelli.

1587-1619 : Rogier Michaël.

1615-1672 : Heinrich Schütz (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1654-1680 : Vincenzo Albrici.

1656-1680 : Giovanni Andrea Bontempi.

1666-1688 : Carlo Pallavicini.

1688-1700 : Nicolaus Adam Strungk (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1697-1728 : Johann Christoph Schmidt (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1717-1719 : Antonio Lotti.

1717-1729 : Johann David Heinichen.

1725-1733 : Giovanni Alberto Ristori.

1733-1763 : Johann Adolph Hasse (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1776-1801 : Johann Gottlieb Naumann (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1802-1806 : Ferdinando Paer (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1810-1841 : Francesco Morlacchi (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1816-1826 : Carl Maria von Weber (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1826-1859 : Carl Gottlieb Reißiger (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1843-1848 : Richard Wagner (« Hofkapellmeister ») .

1850-1880 : Carl August Krebs.

1874-1877 : Julius Rietz.

1877-1884 : Franz Wüllner.

1884-1914 : Ernst von Schuch.

1914-1921 : Fritz Reiner.

1922-1933 : Fritz Busch.

1934-1943 : Karl Böhm.

1943-1944 : Karl Elmendorff.

1945-1950 : Joseph Keilberth.

1949-1953 : Rudolf Kempe.

1953-1955 : Franz Konwitschny.

1956-1958 : Lovro von Matačić.

1960-1964 : Otmar Suitner.

1964-1967 : Kurt Sanderling.

1966-1968 : Martin Turnovský.

1975-1985 : Herbert Blomstedt.

1985-1990 : Hans Vonk.

1992-2001 : Giuseppe Sinopoli.

2002-2004 : Bernard Haitink.

2007-2010 : Fabio Luisi.

2012- : Christian Thielemann.

...

The Dresden State Orchestra (its official name is « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » or Saxon State Orchestra Dresden) is one of the oldest Orchestras in the world and is renowned for its special, well-blended sound.

The Dresden State Opera dates its founding to 1548 when the ruler, Elector Moritz, founded a « Hofkantorei » (Court Chorus) and brought in foreign musicians to augment it. Dresden came to possess one of the finest Royal musical establishments in Europe, under the leadership of such stellar names as Michaël Prætorius and Heinrich Schütz. Johann Adolf Hasse, « Kapellmeister » from 1734 to 1763, brought Dresden Opera to its highest-level during the Baroque.

Saxony's defeat in the Seven Years' War (1756-1763) required the Opera to be curtailed drastically. Elector Friedrich Augustus III realized that the Orchestra must be the nucleus if the Opera were ever to rebuild its prestige. Johann Gottlieb Naumann, director from 1776 to 1801, returned the « Kapelle » to the highest-standards of instrumental playing. By 1810, the Opera was again one of Europe's greatest.

The post-Napoleonic Congress of Vienna made Saxony a kingdom. In 1817, the director of the new Royal « Kapelle » founded a German Opera in addition the established Italian troupe. Under the leadership of Carl Maria von Weber, from 1817-1826, this company won the favour of the populace. The Italian company disbanded in 1832. « Kapellmeister » Karl Gottlieb Reissinger maintained high-standards, assisted by Richard Wagner until the later was exiled in 1849 for Revolutionary activities. Wagner premiered his « Rienzi », « Flying Dutchman » and « Tannhäuser » in Dresden's new Opera House, opened in 1841, designed by Gottfried Semper. Wagner called the Orchestra a « magic harp » that stimulated his ideas of orchestration and led it often in Symphony concerts.

The Orchestra presented its 1st concert series, in 1858. In 1869, the Royal Opera Theater burned down. When a new concert-hall, the « Gewerbehause », opened in 1870, the Orchestra gave its concerts there (along with the newly formed Dresden Philharmonic) until 1878, when a 2nd Semper-designed Opera House opened. The music-director of Opera and Orchestra, from 1882 to 1914, was Ernst von Schuch, who gave the premieres of Strauß' « Feuersnot », « Salome », « Elektra », and « Der Rosenkavalier » at the « Semperoper » .

After World War I, the Royal « Kapelle » became the « Sächsischer Staatsoper » and the « Sächsischer Staatskapelle » . The Orchestra remains the Orchestra of the Opera, which is still also called the « Semperoper » . In 1923, the Orchestra founded its own orchestral school under Fritz Busch (later under Karl Böhm) , now known as the State Academy for Music and Theater. The majority of musicians in the Orchestra are natives of the region and graduates of the school, a reason for the remarkable continuity of its special sound.

The 2nd Semper Opera House was destroyed by bombing, in 1945. After the War, the Orchestra and the Opera performed in temporary halls until 1948, when a City Theater was re-modeled and opened as the « Grosses Haus » of a State theater complex. Joseph Keilberth brought the Opera and the Orchestra both to their feet as music-director, from 1945 to 1950. His successors with the Orchestra included Rudolf Kempe, Lovro von Matačić, Othmar Suitner and Kurt Sanderling, while Rudolf Neuhaus was general music-director of the Opera. In 1975, Herbert Blomstedt became conductor of both the Orchestra and the Opera.

In 1985, the Opera and Orchestra, again, regained their own home when the replacement « Semperoper » (built on Semper's plans for the 2nd house) finally opened with a performance of Weber's « Der Freischütz »). Under Giuseppe Sinopoli, its conductor from 1991 to 2001, the « Dresden Staatskapelle » continued its tradition of performance at the highest-level.

...

Founded by Prince Elector Moritz von Sachsen in 1548, it is one of the oldest Orchestras in the world and steeped in tradition. Over its long history, many distinguished conductors and internationally celebrated instrumentalists have left their mark on this one-time Court.

Previous directors include Heinrich Schütz, Johann Adolf Hasse, Carl Maria von Weber and Richard Wagner, who called the ensemble his « miraculous harp ». The list of prominent conductors of the last 100 years includes Ernst von Schuch, Fritz Reiner, Fritz Busch, Karl Böhm, Joseph Keilberth, Rudolf Kempe, Otmar Suitner, Kurt Sanderling, Herbert Blomstedt and Giuseppe Sinopoli.

...

The « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » (The Dresden State Orchestra of Saxony) celebrated its 450th Anniversary on 22 September 1998. Founded in 1548 by Elector Moritz of Saxony, it is not only one of the oldest Orchestras in the world and most rich in tradition, but it may well be the only one which has continuously played for more than 4 and a half Centuries and which, at the same time, has always been one of the leading Orchestras during various epochs. Heinrich Schütz already knew in the middle of the 17th Century that « it may shine forth and be praised as a light among Protestant chapels ». Jean-Jacques Rousseau characterised the Orchestra as « the one with the most balanced forces and the most perfect ensemble ».

In 1823, in one of Ludwig van Beethoven's conversation booklets is stated :

« It is generally said that the “ Dresden Hofkapelle ” is the best Orchestra in Europe. »

For Richard Wagner, it was a « miraculous harp », and Richard Strauß called it « the best Opera Orchestra in the world. » Seiji Ozawa, after recording « Salome », in 1991, said :

« This Orchestra is a dream. »

And, for Sir Colin Davis, it is « the most individual Orchestra ».

In addition to the stylistic variability, the technical standards, the culture of playing and the commitment, which comes from a love for music and the very specific spirit of the ensemble, it is primarily the character, distinctive in timbre, transparency and homogeneity of its sound, which has grown through tradition and has lived on through generations of musicians, which leads the public and the press throughout the world to speak, even today, of one of the greatest

Orchestras in the world.

Excellent Music Directors and internationally renowned instrumentalists have characterised what used to be the Court Orchestra and is today the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden ». Its conductors have include : Johann Walter, Heinrich Schütz, Johann Adolf Hasse, Carl Maria von Weber, Richard Wagner and Ernst von Schuch. Worthy of mention from the 20th Century are : Fritz Reiner, Fritz Busch, Karl Böhm, Joseph Keilberth, Rudolf Kempe, Franz Konwitschny, Otmar Suitner, Kurt Sanderling and Herbert Blomstedt. Giuseppe Sinopoli was the Chief Conductor from 1992 up to his sudden death, in April 2001. In the summer of 2002, Bernard Haitink took-over this position. Sir Colin Davis is Honorary Conductor. Richard Strauß was connected to the Orchestra, whose international reputation as the « Strauß Orchestra » continues until today, as composer, conductor and friend for more than 60 years ; 9 of his Operas were premiered in Dresden (including « Salome » , « Elektra » , and « Der Rosenkavalier ») and he dedicated the « Alpine Symphony » to the Dresden Orchestra.

The list of works premiered by the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » , or dedicated to it, is long : it ranges from Antonio Vivaldi, Richard Wagner, Robert Schumann, Franz Liszt, Richard Strauß, Paul Hindemith, Kurt Weill, Boris Blacher and others, to newer compositions by Zimmermann, Matthus, Rihm and Kantscheli. Many prominent guests have played with the Orchestra : composers such as Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Niccolò Paganini, Felix Mendelssohn, Robert Schumann, Franz Liszt, Hector Berlioz, Johannes Brahms, Igor Stravinsky, Witold Lutosławski, Hans Werner Henze ; the conductors : Herbert von Karajan, Carlos Kleiber, Wolfgang Sawallisch, Eugen Jochum, Seiji Ozawa, James Levine, Zubin Mehta, Lorin Maazel, André Prévin, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, John Eliot Gardiner, Christoph Eschenbach, Myung-Whun Chung, Daniele Gatti, Georges Prêtre, Kent Nagano, Fabio Luisi, Christian Thielemann and others.

An Opera Orchestra since the 1st 3rd of the 17th Century, the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » today disposes of a wide-ranging repertoire between the Baroque and the most modern, in the reconstructed Semper Opera House. It started by giving public concerts at the end of the 18th Century ; subscription concerts were introduced in 1858. The « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » members are dedicated, with a unique setting of idealistic goals, to a continuous maintenance of chamber music in the « Chamber Music of the Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » , which traces its roots back to the « Tonkünstler-Verein » , founded in 1854. At present, the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » plays about 50 Symphonic and chamber music concerts each season in the Semper Opera House. More than 50 members of the Orchestra teach as professors and lecturers at the « Carl Maria von Weber » College of Music.

The « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » regularly undertakes extensive tours to the musical centres of the world. Since 2000, they have given guest performances in Japan, China, South Korea, Taiwan, the United States, Greece, Italy, Spain, France, Austria, Belgium, Great Britain, the Netherlands, Switzerland, Poland and in all the major German cities. They have also participated in Festivals such as the Vienna and Berlin « Festwochen » , the Beethoven Festival in Bonn, the Salzburg Festival, the Schleswig-Holstein and the Rheingau Festivals, the Osaka Festival, the « Luzern Musikfestwochen » , the Edinburgh Festival and the London « Proms » .

The catalogue of albums released by the Orchestra since the 1920's lists a large number of recordings of the Symphonic and Opera repertoire with prominent guest-conductors.

Chief Conductor Bernard Haitink has been working continuously with the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » since 1989 for concerts in Dresden as well as on tour with a repertoire including : Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz-Josef Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Franz Schubert, Carl Maria von Weber, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, Igor Stravinsky, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky, Dmitri Shostakovich, Anton Webern and Béla Bartók. Together with the Orchestra, Haitink has recorded « Fidelio » for « Philips » ; « Der Rosenkavalier » for « EMI » ; and Beethoven's Piano Concertos for « Teldec » , with soloist András Schiff.

As Sponsor of the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » , the « Dresdner Bank » , has supported important artistic projects of the Orchestra, since 1994.

...

Die Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden gilt als eines der führenden und traditionsreichsten Orchester der Welt. Sie wurde am 22. September 1548 im Auftrag des Kurfürsten Moritz von Sachsen von Johann Walter gegründet und gilt als einziges noch existierendes Orchester, das über mehr als viereinhalb Jahrhunderte hinweg ununterbrochen musiziert hat und zugleich (wie zeitgenössische Berichte belegen) stets zu den führenden Klangkörpern der verschiedenen Epochen gehörte. Herausragende Kapellmeister und international geschätzte Instrumentalisten haben die einstige Hof- und heutige Sächsische Staatskapelle seit ihrer Gründung geprägt. 2013 übernahm das Orchester unter Christian Thielemann die Bespielung der Salzburger Osterfestspiele.

Die Hofkapelle war das bedeutendste Musikensemble ihrer Zeit. Sie erreichte im 17. Jahrhundert unter Heinrich Schütz ihre erste Blüte, aber am Ende des Dreißigjährigen Krieges auch einen Tiefstand.

Die Kurfürstlich-Sächsische und Königlich-Polnische Kapelle bestand zwischen 1697 und 1756 unter der Herrschaft von Friedrich August I. und seinem Sohn Friedrich August II. Die damalige Bezeichnung des Ensembles hatte ihren Grund darin, daß beide Herrscher (mit kleineren Unterbrechungen) nicht nur Kurfürsten von Sachsen waren, sondern auch als Könige über Polen herrschten.

Am sächsischen Hof zu Dresden stand die Hofmusik vor allem unter den Kurfürsten Johann Georg II. (1656-1680) und Johann Georg III. (1680-1691) schon in hoher Blüte. Doch im Zeichen des Hochbarock erlebte sie einen weiteren Aufschwung. 1697, im Jahr der Königskrönung von Friedrich August, war das Deputat der Hofmusik zwar im Vergleich mit 1691 von über 15000 Talern auf nur mehr knapp 7600 Taler zusammengestrichen worden, steigerte sich dann aber über fast 17000 Taler bis 1719 sogar auf 26400 Taler. Darin enthalten ist allerdings auch der Etat für die nach Friedrich Augusts Konversion notwendig gewordene katholische Hofkirchenmusik. Kapellmeister war Johann Christoph Schmidt, der anfänglich immerhin schon über 31 Musiker (Kapellknaben mitgerechnet) verfügen konnte.

Als Glücksfall erwies sich die 1709 erfolgte Verpflichtung des Violinisten Jean-Baptiste Volumier zum Konzertmeister, dem das stolze Jahresgehalt von 1200 Talern zugesprochen wurde. 1712 wurde der junge aufstrebende Violinist Johann Georg Pisendel eingestellt, 1715 der damals bereits hochberühmte Pantalonist Hebenstreit, 1716 als zweiter Kapellmeister Johann David Heinichen, 1717 als dritter Antonio Lotti. Dazu kamen u.a. dessen Frau, die Sopranistin

Santa Stella, der Kastrat Francesco Bernardi, genannt « Senesino » (für ein Gehalt von 70.000 Talern) und der italienische Violinvirtuose Francesco Maria Veracini. Während der längeren Krankheit Heinrichens bis zu seinem Tod im Jahr 1729 vertrat ihn der Komponist Jan Dismas Zelenka in seiner Funktion als Kapellmeister der Kurfürstlich-Sächsischen und Königlich-Polnischen Kapelle.

1716-1717 wurde Pisendel nach Italien geschickt, um sich über den neuesten Stand der Violinkunst zu informieren. Dort lernte er vor allem Antonio Vivaldi kennen, dessen Musik er sehr bewunderte. Am Hof zu Dresden betrachtete man sich damit allmählich für die anstehenden Vermählungsfeierlichkeiten des Thronfolgers mit der österreichischen Erzherzogin Maria Josepha gerüstet.

Nach 1763 nun wieder kurfürstlich-sächsische Kapelle wurde aus dieser ab 1807 die Königlich-sächsische musikalische Kapelle und nach 1918 die Sächsische Staatskapelle. In der DDR-Zeit wurde sie « Staatskapelle Dresden » oder auch « Dresdner Staatskapelle » genannt und erhielt erst nach der Wende ihren heutigen Namen.

Die öffentliche Konzerttätigkeit des Orchesters begann gegen Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts ; Abonnementskonzerte wurden 1858 eingeführt.

Die Sächsische Staatskapelle ist seit dem ersten Drittel des 17. Jahrhunderts Opernorchester - bis 1945 und nach der Wiedereröffnung 1985 spielt sie in der Semperoper.

Von 1992 bis zu seinem plötzlichen Tod am 20. April 2001 stand Giuseppe Sinopoli an der Spitze des Orchesters. Anschließend übernahm 2002 Bernard Haitink interimsmäßig die Position des Chefdirigenten, verließ jedoch im Jahr 2004 vorzeitig das Orchester. Sein letztes Konzert als Chefdirigent gab er im November 2004 im Rahmen einer « Tournée » in Wien. Im September 2007 übernahm Fabio Luisi, Chefdirigent der Wiener Symphoniker, die Position des Generalmusikdirektors. Seit der Spielzeit 2012-2013 wurde Christian Thielemann für vorerst sieben Jahre zum neuen Chefdirigenten verpflichtet.

Pro Saison gibt die Sächsische Staatskapelle heute 12 bis 15 Sinfonie- und Sonderkonzerte und spielt bei sämtlichen Opernproduktionen, also nahezu täglich. Zu den Sonderkonzerten zählen Konzerte in der Frauenkirche sowie spezielle Aufführungsabende. Außerdem gibt es Matineen und Jugendprojekte.

Die Komponistin Isabel Mundry erhielt in der Saison 2007-2008 den Titel Capell-Compositrice, die Reihe (bei Männern : Capell-Compositeur) wurde mit Bernhard Lang, Rebecca Saunders, Johannes Maria Staud, Lera Auerbach, Hans Werner Henze und Wolfgang Rihm fortgesetzt ; in der Saison 2014-2015 hat Sofia Gubaidulina den Titel inne. Die Staatskapelle ist Mitglied im KlangNetz Dresden.

Am 26. April 2007 erhielt die Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden im « Palais Beaux-Arts » in Brüssel den erstmals von der Europäischen Kulturstiftung ehrenhalber verliehenen « Preis für die Bewahrung des musikalischen Weltkulturerbes »

Seit der Saison 2013 ist die Sächsische Staatskapelle das Orchestra in Residence der Salzburger Osterfestspiele, als

Nachfolgerin der Berliner Philharmoniker. Alljährlich stehen in Salzburg eine Opernproduktion und mehrere Orchesterkonzerte auf dem Programm. Die Osterfestspiele stehen seit 2013 unter der Leitung von Christian Thielemann, der auch die meisten Salzburger Programmpunkte dirigiert.

Konzerttourneen führten die Sächsische Staatskapelle bislang in verschiedene deutsche Städte, nach Japan, in die Schweiz, die Niederlande, Österreich, Großbritannien, Spanien, in die USA, Griechenland, Ungarn, Frankreich, Abu Dhabi und Hongkong sowie zu den Festivals in Luzern, Edinburgh, London Proms, Salzburg, Prag, Bukarest und auf die Kanarischen Inseln.

Neben der eigentlichen Orchestertätigkeit wird von Orchestermittgliedern auch die Kammermusik der Sächsischen Staatskapelle gepflegt, die auf den 1854 gegründeten Tonkünstler-Verein zurückgeht.

Bekannte Kapellmeister und Dirigenten

450 Jahre Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden : Sonderbriefmarke von 1998.

Die wichtigsten Kapellmeister und Dirigenten im Laufe der Geschichte der Kapelle :

Johann Walter (1548-1554) .

Mattheus Le Maistre (1555-1568) .

Antonio Scandello (1568-1580) .

Giovanni Battista Pinello di Ghirardi (1580-1584) .

Rogier Michaël (1587-1619) .

Heinrich Schütz (« Henricus Sagittarius ») (1615-1672, Hofkapellmeister) .

Vincenzo Albrici (1654-1680) .

Giovanni Andrea Bontempi (1656-1680) .

Carlo Pallavicini (1666-1688) .

Nicolaus Adam Strungk (1688-1700, Hofkapellmeister) .

Johann Christoph Schmidt (1697-1728, Hofkapellmeister) .

Antonio Lotti (1717-1719) .

Johann David Heinichen (1717-1729) .

Jan Dismas Zelenka (Vertreter Heinichens, erfolglos als Hofkapellmeister beworben) .

Giovanni Alberto Ristori (1725-1733 Vertreter Heinichens, erfolglos als Hofkapellmeister beworben, ab 1750 Vizekapellmeister unter Hasse) .

Johann Adolph Hasse (1733-1763, Hofkapellmeister) .

Johann Gottlieb Naumann (1776-1801, Hofkapellmeister) .

Ferdinando Paer (1802-1806, Hofkapellmeister) .

Francesco Morlacchi (1810-1841, Hofkapellmeister) .

Carl Maria von Weber (1816-1826, Hofkapellmeister) .

Carl Gottlieb Reißiger (1826-1859, Hofkapellmeister) .

Richard Wagner (1843-1848, Hofkapellmeister) .

Carl August Krebs (1850-1880) .

Julius Rietz (1860-1877, Hofkapellmeister) .

Franz Wüllner (1877-1882, Hofkapellmeister) .

Ernst von Schuch (1872-1914, Hofkapellmeister, ab 1889 General Musik Direktor) .

Hermann Kutzschbach (1898-1936) .

Kurt Striegler (1886-1958) .

Karl Pembaur (Kapellmeister 1913-1939) .

Fritz Reiner (1914-1921) .

Fritz Busch (1922-1933)

Karl Böhm (1934-1942) .

Karl Elmendorff (1943-1944) .

Joseph Keilberth (1945-1950) .

Rudolf Kempe (1950-1953) .

Franz Konwitschny (1953-1955) .

Lovro von Matačić (1956-1958) .

Otmar Suitner (1960-1964) .

Kurt Sanderling (1964-1967) .

Martin Turnovsky (1967-1968) .

Herbert Blomstedt (1975-1985) .

Hans Vonk (1985-1990) .

Giuseppe Sinopoli (1992-2001) .

Bernard Haitink (2002-2004) .

Fabio Luisi (2007-2012) .

Christian Thielemann (ab 2012-2013) .

Ehrendirigent ab 1991 : Sir Colin Davis (gestorben 2013) .

In neuerer Zeit wurde das Orchester auch von Carlos Kleiber, Georges Prêtre, Sir John Eliot Gardiner, Daniele Gatti, Herbert von Karajan, Myung-Whun Chung, Kent Nagano, Charles Dutoit, Daniel Harding, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Sylvain Cambreling und Michail Pletnjow dirigiert.

Mitglieder der sächsischen Staatskapelle, die teilweise auch solistisch auftreten, waren :

Geiger

Carlo Farina (1626-1629, Konzertmeister) .

Johann Jakob Walther (1674-1680, Konzertmeister) .

Johann Paul von Westhoff (1674-1697) .

Jean-Baptiste Volumier (Woulmyer) (ab 1709) .

Johann Georg Pisendel (1712-1755, Konzertmeister) .

Francesco Maria Veracini (1717-1722, Konzertmeister) .

Karol Lipiński (1840-1861, Konzertmeister) .

François Schubert (1861-1878, Konzertmeister) .

Johann Christoph Lauterbach (1861-?) (Konzertmeister) .

Theo Bauer (1898-1939) .

Henri Petri (1853-1914, Konzertmeister) .

Gambist

Carl Friedrich Abel (1748-1757) .

Cellist

Justus Johann Friedrich Dotzauer (1811-1850) .

Friedrich August Kummer (ab 1817) .

Friedrich Wilhelm Grützmacher.

Rudolf Kratina (1916-1938) .

Karl Hesse (bis 1945) .

Peter Bruns.

Jan Vogler (Konzertmeister 1984-1997) .

Isang David Enders (Konzertmeister) .

Kontrabassist

Constantin Christian Dedekind (1666-1675, Konzertmeister) .

Jan Dismas Zelenka (1719-1745) .

Lautenist

Silvius Leopold Weiss (1718-1750) .

Pantaleonist

Pantaleon Hebenstreit (1714-1733) .

Flötist

Pierre-Gabriel Buffardin (1714-1749) .

Johann Joachim Quantz (1728-1741) .

Anton Bernhard Fürstenau (1819-1852) .

Moritz Fürstenau (1845-1889) .

Eckart Haupt.

Oboist

François le Riche.

Johann Christian Richter.

Klarinettist

Johann Gottlieb Kotte (um 1817) .

Hornist

Anton Joseph Hampel (ab 1750) .

Josef Rudolf Lewy (1837-1851) .

Peter Damm (1969-2002) .

Posaunist

Antonio Scandello (1549-1580) .

Carbonio Besozzi (ab 1549) .

Alois Bambula (1934-1982) .

Werner Beyer (1952-1985) .

Stefan Fritzen (1973-1980) .

Tubist

Heinz Forker (1934-1967) .

Paukist

Heinrich Knauer (1879-1947) .

...

Der Staatskapelle wurden verschiedene Werke gewidmet, andere wurden von ihr uraufgeführt. Dazu zählen Werke von Vivaldi über Wagner, Schumann, Liszt, Strauß, Hindemith, Weill, Blacher und andere bis zu neueren Kompositionen von Geißler, Kochan, Zimmermann, Matthus, Rihm, Kantscheli und Ruzicka.

Besonders Richard Strauß war dem Klangkörper, der heute international oft noch als « Strauß-Orchester » betrachtet wird, über 60 Jahre als Komponist, Dirigent und Freund verbunden, insbesondere seinem « Leibdirigenten » Schuch, der ihn beförderte ; neun seiner Opern wurden in Dresden uraufgeführt (darunter Salome, Elektra und Der Rosenkavalier) . Die Alpensinfonie widmete er der Dresdner Kapelle.

Die Diskographie des Orchesters weist seit Anfang der 1920er Jahre eine Vielzahl von Aufnahmen des sinfonischen und des Opernrepertoires mit renommierten Dirigenten aus. Im Studio der Lukaskirche in Dresden entstanden zahlreiche Aufnahmen für das DDR-Label Eterna, auch heute wird die Kirche für Aufnahmen der Staatskapelle genutzt. Mit dem Preis ECHO Klassik wurde 2007 eine Edition von Hänssler gewürdigt, die archivierte Opern- und Konzertmitschnitte aus frühen Schallplattenzeiten bis heute dem Publikum wieder zugänglich machte. Daneben war und ist die Staatskapelle weiterhin Vertragspartner großer Plattenlabel.

...

27 décembre 1885 : Décès à Linz, à l'âge de 65 ans, de Marie Freiin von Czerny, la Baronne Zobel (Zobel-Giebelstadt-Friesenhausen) .

Marie von Czerny est née le 21 août 1820. Elle épouse Franz-Josef Karl Cyrillus von Czerny. À 37 ans, elle met au monde une fille, Hedwig, qui épousera Thomas Hranac, fils de Alois Hranac.

Franz Josef Karl Cyrillus von Czerny est né le 30 mars 1816 à Vienne et est mort le 28 octobre 1890 à Vienne. Il était le fils de Franz Seraph Stefan von Czerny et d'Elisabeth von Czerny. Son frère était Franz Czerny.

31 décembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à la Baronne Marie Anna Lederer (Amstetten) , la fille de Marie Freiin von Czerny.

« Highly-Honoured Baroness Marie Anna !

I am so deeply and profoundly moved that it is barely possible for me to arrange words of comfort and condolence. Allow me to say, “ Fräulein ”, only that I ask God that He grant you the needed strength in this most grievous sorrow.

Yesterday, like the day before, a holy Mass was read at the “ Schottenkirche ” in her highly-blessed memory !

Those were my obsequies.

May the New Year assuage your greatest sorrow.

I send my sincere condolences to all of the ladies of your noble family.

Sorrowfully, I kiss your hand.

Your mourning friend,

Anton Bruckner »

Incipit : « Selbst aufs Tiefste ergriffen ist es ... »

Source : Franz Gräflinger, lettre n° 58 ; pages 66-67.

Baronne Marie Anna Lederer

Baroness Marie Anna Lederer was the wife of Baron Lederer of Amstetten.

This letter concerns the death of her mother Marie von Czerny, born Baroness Zobel, who died on December 27, 1885, in Linz. Baroness Lederer appeared to be pleasantly surprised that Bruckner had written his letter to her already on December.

Marie von Czerny died in Linz, a place that Bruckner knew and loved ; he would have known Baroness Lederer as a young girl and probably still pictured her thus ; and, so, he addresses her as « Fräulein » in the letter of condolence. It was not unlike him to be attracted to young girls in his quest for a wife, although he always knew his place and was circumspect.

Zur Genealogie der Freiherren Zobel von Gieselstadt und Darstadt

Thomas Friedrich Freiherr Zobel von Gieselstadt zu Darstadt, Feldmarschall-Lieutenant und Kämmerer, Ritter des kaiserlichen Leopold-Ordens, Inhaber des 61. Infanterie-Regiments (1799-1869) .

Die Zobel sind eine alte fränkische Familie, deren ältere 1238 mit dem Würzburger Canonicus Adalbert von Zobelstein erloschene Linie das Unterschenkenamt des Herzogthums Franken besaß. Die jüngere Linie, die Zobel von Giebelstadt, blüht noch heute in drei Zweigen. I : von Giebelstadt ; II : Darstadt ; und III : Friesenhausen. Die Zobel sind ein bei allen Hochstiftern des weiland römisch-deutschen Reiches, sowie bei allen Ritterorden häufig aufgeschworne und zu den reichsritterschaftlichen Cantonen in Franken gehöriger Adel. Die Sproßen desselben zählen Kirchenfürsten, Würdenträger des Staates und der Armee in ihren Reihen. Ein Melchior Zobel von Guttenberg war Bischof von Würzburg und fand in den Grumbach'schen Händeln 1558 einen gräßlichen Tod durch Mörderhand, ein Hans Georg starb 1518 als Bischof von Bamberg ; Andere dieses Geschlechtes bekleideten die Würden von geheimen Räten, Kämmerern und Amtsmännern an verschiedenen Aemtern des Herzogthums Franken ; zu Anfang dieses Jahrhunderts bis auf die Gegenwart erscheinen zahlreiche Sproßen dieses Hauses in den Reihen der kaiserlichen Armee, unter denen der General und Maria Theresien-Ordensritter Thomas Friedrich Freiherr von Zobel seinen Namen in die Gedenkblätter der österreichischen Kriegsgeschichte in ruhmvollster Weise einzeichnete. Bei Entstehung des Landes-Unterkammeramtes des ehemaligen Herzogthums Franken wurde die Familie für immerwährende Zeiten damit belehnt, und ist dasselbe Seniorat. Die Familie wurde siehe dies in Oktober 1818 bei der Freiherrnklasse der königlich bayrischen Adelsmatrikel eingetragen. Durch Heiraten ebensowohl der männlichen wie der weiblichen Sproßen des Hauses ist dasselbe mit den besten und ältesten Familien des deutschen und seit Beginn des laufenden Jahrhunderts auch des österreichischen Adels versippt, und wir finden und andere die Namen der Echter von Mespelbrunn, Gemingen, Neipperg, Greiffenclau von Vollraths, Berlichingen, Schertel von Burtenbach, Speth von Zwyzalten, Stetten, Schenk von Stauffenberg, Stadion, Reischach, Spannoch, Feretti di Rocco, Traun, Redwitz, Thüngen, Zamoyki, Bothmer in (215) den Stammtafeln vertreten.

Johann Christian Hellbach, ab 1819 von Hellbach. Adelslexikon oder Handbuch über die historischen genealogischen Nachrichten vom hohen und niederen Adel besonders in den deutschen Bundesstaaten und so weiter (Ilmenau 1826, B. F. Voigt, 8°.) Seite 829, mit Angaben zahlreicher Quellen.

...

Die Familie von Zobel, später auch Zobel von Giebelstadt, ist ein schwäbisch-fränkisches Adelsgeschlecht mit vormaligen Besitzungen im Ritterkanton Odenwald. Der Stammsitz Giebelstadt für diesen Zweig der Familie ist heute ein Markt im unterfränkischen Landkreis Würzburg.

Schon früh wurde der Familie das Unterkammereramt im Hochstift Würzburg übertragen. Andreas Zobel von Giebelstadt kaufte vom Landgrafen Johann von Leuchtenberg die Herrschaft Lobenhausen mit Burg und verschrieb ihm im Jahre 1398 daraufhin die Öffnung. Etwa zur selben Zeit erhielt Hans Zobel von Giebelstadt vom Kurfürsten Rupprecht III. von der Pfalz, die Schirmgerechtigkeit der Kessler zu Lehen, die vorher Dieter Zobel von Giebelstadt besaß. Einen weiteren Hans Zobel von Giebelstadt belehnte der Abt von Fulda 1440 mit dem gesamten Burgsitz zu Retzstadt. Bereits 1483 verkaufte Andreas Zobel von Giebelstadt den Sitz wieder. Melchior Zobel von Giebelstadt wurde am 19. August 1544 zum Bischof von Würzburg erwählt und starb, vermutlich ermordet, während der Grumbachschen Fehden am 15. April 1558. Johann Georg I. Zobel von Giebelstadt war von 1577 bis 1580 Bischof von Bamberg.

1596 erfolgte die Teilung in die Linien zu Giebelstadt und zu Darstadt und Messelhausen.

In Goßmannsdorf am Main, heute ein Stadtteil von Ochsenfurt, herrschten die Zobel von Giebelstadt als Ganerben über das Dorf, das heißt sie teilten sich den Besitz gemeinschaftlich mit den Geyer von Giebelstadt und dem Würzburger Domkapitel.

In der bayerischen Adelsmatrikel waren 1818 noch zwei Linien des Geschlechts, der Giebelstädter Zweig und der Giebelstadt-Dorfstätter Zweig, bei der Freiherrenklasse eingetragen. Der Freiherrenstand war durch Lehensbriefe nachgewiesen Während des 18. bis Anfang des 19. Jahrhunderts waren die Herren Zobel von Giebelstadt wegen des Besitzes beziehungsweise Teilbesitzes von Baiertal, Balbach, Darstadt, Giebelstadt, Großmannsdorf, Guttenberg mit Schloß Guttenberg, Herchsheim, Messelhausen mit Schloß und Kloster Messelhausen, Osthausen, Segnitz, Lipprichhausen und Rüttschdorf, Mitglied der Reichsritterschaft im Ritterkanton Odenwald des fränkischen Ritterkreises. Außerdem waren Angehörige der Familie im Ritterkanton Altmühl, Baunach und Anfang des 18. Jahrhunderts auch im Ritterkanton Rhön-Werra immatrikuliert. Wegen der als Erbschaft von der Familie Thüngen erhaltenen Anteile an Freudental wurden sie von 1717 bis 1727 und von 1727 bis 1770 als Personalisten im Ritterkanton Kocher des schwäbischen Ritterkreises geführt.

1808 fielen Messelhausen, Balbach und Rüttschdorf an das Großherzogtum Baden, Giebelstadt an das Großherzogtum Würzburg und Lipprichshausen an das Königreich Bayern.

2002 geriet Schloß Giebelstadt in die Schlagzeilen, als eine Versteigerung historischer Gegenstände aus dem Schloß angekündigt worden war. Das Landratsamt Würzburg ordnete unter Federführung des Landesamtes für Denkmalpflege an, daß 64 Objekte im Giebelstädter Schloß bleiben müßen. Die Verschuldung der Familie führte dazu, daß die vierflügelige Schlossanlage der Zobel im Zentrum von Giebelstadt schließlich am 19. Februar 2008 in Würzburg auf Antrag der Raiffeisenbank Ochsenfurt zwangsversteigert wurde. Der neue Schlossbesitzer Walter Konrad ist in Giebelstadt geboren und gründete im Jahr 1980 im US-Bundesstaat Texas ein Unternehmen für Jalousien.

...

A delightful story his linked to the origin of Anton Bruckner's « Te Deum ». When rehearsing for the 1885 performance in Vienna, the conductor Hans Richter stepped-down from the podium with tears of rapture in his eyes, embraced Bruckner and exclaimed :

« The only other person who could have written that was Beethoven ! »

But Bruckner said candidly :

« And did you know, “ Herr Hofkapellmeister ”, it isn't really by me at all ! »

Seeing Richter's surprise and bafflement, he went on eagerly :

« Yes, that isn't by me but by Spohr ! And do you know how it happened ? It was like this : I'm lying in bed one night and, in a dream, Spohr comes in and says to me : “ Bruckner, get-up and write this down ! ” Then, I woke-up and I really did write it down. Now, tell me : is it by me or by Spohr ? »

Hans Richter conducted the 1st performance with full-orchestra on 10 January 1886, in the « Großer Musikvereinsaal » of Vienna.

...

31 décembre 1885 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Vienne) à Carl Ferdinand Pohl (Vienne) .

« Honourable Sir !

I wish, you a Happy New Year from my heart ! May these few items of data be sufficient ! I ask for your customary good will and remain with respect,

Yours truly,

Anton Bruckner

N.B. : The 7th Symphony is to be performed in March. I have composed 3 grand Masses. No. 1 in D, dated 1864. Performed under my direction in the same year, at the end of November, in Linz Cathedral for Saint-Cecilia's Day ; and, again, on December 6 of the same year, in the Linz “ Redoutensaal ”, in a “ concert spirituel ” also conducted by me. Then, in Linz Cathedral, on January 6, 1868, once again under my direction. In February, 1867, Herbeck conducted the same Mass for the 1st time, in the Court Chapel (Vienna) . I conducted the repeat performances in the Court Chapel. The 2nd Mass, in E minor, is in part an 8 part vocal Mass with wind accompaniment. Composed, I believe, in 1866. Dedicated to Bishop Rüdiger ; performed under my direction at the consecration of the Votive Chapel in the new Cathedral in Linz, September 29, 1869. Performed the 2nd time by the “ Musikverein ” in Linz, under Schreier's direction, on October 4, 1885. The 3rd Mass, in F (minor) , also composed in Linz, in 1868. Performed for the 1st time in June, 1872 (the 16th, I believe) , in the “ Augustiner ” Church (Vienna) , under my own direction, with large choir and large orchestra, as has not happened again, since then. (Government Councillor Hanslick wrote splendidly about it and advocated a grand concert performance.) It is dedicated to the late Court Councillor Imhof. On December 8, 1872, the 1st time in the Court Chapel ; often performed there since. I directed ail of the performances. In addition to these Masses, I wrote a cantata for the laying of the corner-stone of Linz Cathedral, in 1862. Furthermore, graduals, offertories (vocal) , etc. Before my studies, together with smaller interludes, “ Tantum Ergo ”, and so forth, I wrote a Mass in B-flat for the investiture of the Monastery Prelate Maier at Saint-Florian, in 1854. In 1849, a “ Requiem ” in D minor for my late patron Sailer (monastery official) ; in the same year, performed at Saint-Florian, in September, and on Founders Day, in Kremsmünster (December 11, 1849) .

Incipit : « Wünsche von Herzen gates neues Jahr ! »

Source : Max Auer, lettre n° 175 ; pages 199-200.

Carl Ferdinand Pohl (1819-1884) : German music scholar (music historian) , organist, composer, and teacher. From 1863 to 1866, he lived in London, where he did research for the British Museum. The resulting book is entitled : « Mozart and Haydn in London » and is still of use today because of its accuracy and attention to detail. From 1866 on, he was Archivist for the « Gesellschaft Musikfreunde » , in Vienna. His biography of Franz-Josef Haydn (1732-1809) remains valuable to all serious biographers of Haydn.

November 22nd is the Feast of Saint-Cecilia, patroness of music.

Johann von Herbeck (1831-1877) : Composer, conductor of the « Hofoper » in Vienna, « Hofkapellmeister » , and one of the most prominent personages in the musical life of Vienna during Bruckner's time, there. His 1st music post was as Choir-Master at the « Piaristenkirche » , in Vienna, beginning in 1852. Successively, he was Choir-Master of the « Männergesangverein » , then, teacher at the Conservatory and director of the Choral Society of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » . He conducted concerts for the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » for 2 different periods and, finally, became a member of Emperor Franz-Josef's « Hofkapelle » , where he became « Kapellmeister » , in 1866. He directed the Vienna Court Opera, from 1870 to 1875, but declined to become conductor of the Dresden Opera, in 1877. He recognized Bruckner's talent and was responsible for his appointment as professor of counterpoint at the Vienna Conservatory.

Adalbert Schreyer (1850-1925) : « Kapellmeister » in 3 cities in succession ; Choir-Master of the « Männergesangverein " Sängerbund " » .

Eduard Hanslick (1825-1904) : Critic scholar, « philologist » . Unnecessarily unkind to Bruckner in his critical evaluations of Bruckner's work.

Anton Ritter von Imhof-Geißlinghof (1816-1872) : Privy Councillor and Chancellery Director in the Supreme Court Council.

Friedrich Theophil Mayer (1793-1858) : Provost at Saint-Florian's Monastery, from 1854.

...

1885-1886 : 25 représentations de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner sont données en Allemagne ; et c'est sans compter les exécutions en Autriche et aux États-Unis durant cette même période.

Anton Bruckner presse l'éditeur viennois Theodor Rättig de publier 4 de ses graduels : le « Christus factus est » n° 3 (WAB 11) ; le « Locus iste » (WAB 23) ; le « Os Justi » (WAB 30) ; et le « Virga Jesse floruit » (WAB 52) .