Das Stift Sankt Florian ist Bruckners « Klein-Bayreuth » . Im Sommerrefektorium sowie im Leopoldinischen Trakt und in den muffigen sogenannten Kaiserzimmern rund um den schönen Innenhof sind augenblicklich wunderliche Reliquien zu besichtigen : Bruckners Hut (mit Loch) , Bruckners Lehnstuhl (ledern) , Bruckners Lokke (!) , sein Schulzeugnis, sein Flügel, sein Kruzifix. Dazu das originalbrucknerische Ambiente : ein oberösterreichisches hölzernes Schaukelpferd (frühe Brucknerzeit, das ewige Kind) , eine Vitrine mit oberösterreichischen Kieseln und Gräsern (mittlere, das Naturkind) . Da kommt allerhand zusammen : mehr als neunhundert Exponate in 34 Sälen. Dabei handelt es sich nur um die zweite Hälfte der großen Oberösterreichische Landesausstellung « Vom Ruf zum Nachruf » , deren erster Teil im Schloß Mondsee das oberösterreichische « Künstlerschicksal » ganz allgemein kritisch durchleuchtet. Bruckners Schicksal aber ist ein besonderes. Bei ihm fallen Ruf und Nachruf zusammen, jenseits jeder Kritik.

Die Legende dient nicht nur als getreuer Korrepetitor der Information, sie ist selbst Exponat und sprechender Teil der Ausstellung. Tragisch nur, wenn die Legenden nichts mehr zu sagen haben : leere Worte, aufgebläht zu Lettern von Armlänge und überblendet mit Redundanz.

Wie mit nacktem Finger weisen viele museumspädagogisch aktuell gestaltete Installationen in der Brucknerausstellung darauf hin, daß in der Fülle alter Anekdoten nichts Neues geboten wird. « Sehr schöne Gegenstände » , lobt die Führung, hilflos. « Und wenn Sie bittesehr darauf Obacht geben : In jedem Raum wird auch das Passende dazu gespuht ! »

In jedem Saal träufeln Musikdrogen aus unsichtbaren Lautsprechern.

Ein um das andere Mal erweist sich die hypermoderne Museumspädagogik als noch reaktionärer als ihr Gegenstand. Zum Beispiel Raum 23 (die « Romantische » , das « Jagdzimmer ») . Nebst der Büchse und dem original « Ausseer Jagdanzug » von Kaiser Franz Joseph I. , in Loden und Kamelhaar, liegt das Autograph des dritten Satzes aus Bruckners vierter Symphonie aus. Dabei war Bruckner kein Freund der Jagd, nur vom Kaiser hielt er viel. Was hat der aber mit dem Leierkastenmotiv aus dem Trio der Vierten zu tun ? Oder Raum 16 (privat) , in dem erstens das messingglänzende Gitterbett zu sehen ist, in welchem der Komponist am liebsten schlief. Zweitens geht es um den « gaumenfreudigen » Bruckner mit seinen Liebesspeisen und Lieblingsgetränken (« Geselchtes, Bier ») und drittens, heiße, um Bruckners legendäre immerwährendpubertäre Dienstmädchenerotik. Eine Wand mit siebzehn Gucklöchern darin, « wenn Sie bittesehr da einmal durchschaun wollen, Herrschaften, lauter fesche junge Damen » . Neben jedem Loch steht ein Name, hinter jedem Bild eine nichterzählte Biographie : Henriette Sammet, Minna Reischl, Rosa Rabl, Marie Demar, Leopoldine Werndl (« Es will mi halt keine ! ») . Dies also ist das regional werbewirksame Brucknerbild : a Bier, a Bett, a Biepschau.

Die neue Oper, die Peter Androsch (Musik) und Harald Kislinger (Text) im Auftrage des Linzer Brucknerfestes geschrieben haben, geht noch einen Schritt weiter. Sie heißt : « Geschnittene Heiligkeit - Anton Bruckner und die Frauen » , wird beworben mit Gratis-Kondomen, und das clevere Plakat dazu zeigt, daß das geheimnisvolle Loch sich, wie jeder (außer Bruckner) weiß, in den jungen Damen selbst befindet. Sie tragen es mitten auf dem Bauch, in ihrer Kittelschürze, wer da durchschauen will, kann, bittesehr, Bruckners Totenmaske erblicken.

...

Après le « bon Dieu », l'orgue, le grand Richard Wagner, ses Symphonies, l'inconfort de l'arithmomane, les certificats de compétence, les doctorats honorifiques, sa bière favorite, la « Pilsner », et les plats de viande riches en protéines, les jeunes filles demeurent l'obsession la plus tenace chez Bruckner.

Oberammergau

Oberammergau est une localité de Garmisch-Partenkirchen, en Haute-Bavière. Elle se situe dans l'Ammertal, au bord de la rivière Ammer. La montagne Kofel surplombe le village.

À part ses représentations spectaculaires de la Passion du Christ, le village d'Oberammergau est aussi reconnu pour sa longue tradition de sculpture sur bois. L'école de sculpture sur bois de l'État de Bavière se trouve là-bas. Parmi les anciens élèves célèbres citons l'artiste allemand Wolfram Aichele ; sa procession représentant le Christ sur un âne peut être admirer à l'église de Saint-Pierre et de Saint-Paul. Les rues du centre d'Oberammergau abritent des dizaines de boutiques de sculpteur sur bois. Leur répertoire va des sujets religieux, aux jouets, aux portraits humoristiques.

Une caractéristique du village d'Oberammergau est le « Lüftlmalerei », c'est-à-dire des façades peintes.

Le mot pourrait originer d'une maison d'Oberammergau, appelé « Lüftl Zum », qui était la résidence du peintre Franz Seraph Zwinck, (1748-1792) . On y retrouve des fresques, des thèmes traditionnels de la Bavière, des contes de fées, des scènes religieuses, des façades en trompe-l'œil. Au XVIIIe siècle, des citoyens et des agriculteurs aisés ont fait décorer leurs façades de motifs religieux. Des exemples de cette peinture Baroque sont, entre autres, les façades de la « Kölblhaus » et de la « Pilatus-Haus » .

24 août 1880 : Anton Bruckner s'arrête à Munich.

25 août 1880 : Bruckner s'arrête à Zürich.

Rapperswil

26 août 1880 : Bruckner s'arrête à Rapperswil dans le canton de Saint-Gall pour visiter le Musée national polonais situé dans l'ancien château des Habsbourg. Un musée créé conjointement, en 1869, par le Comte polonais Władysław Plater et Agaton Giller.

Władysław Plater (Broel-Plater) est né le 7 novembre 1808 à Vilnius et est mort le 22 avril 1889, à Broelberg, Kilchberg, près de Zürich. Il était le frère de Cezary Plater, et un proche de Emilie Plater.

La fondation de la ville par les seigneurs de Rapperswil a eu lieu vers l'an 1200. La mention documentée la plus ancienne date de 1229. Après l'extinction de la famille de Rapperswil, la ville passe aux Habsbourg. À l'intersection de la route Zürich-Coire et de la route des pèlerins qui se rendaient d'Allemagne à Einsiedeln, la ville se développa avec le transbordement des marchandises et la perception de péages.

La partie historique est reconnue comme bien culturel suisse d'importance nationale ainsi que le château avec le musée et l'Hôtel de Ville avec les archives.

Monuments

Château construit entre 1220 et 1230.

Église paroissiale Saint-Jean.

« Heilig Hüsli » (Maison Sainte) , probablement du XVIe siècle.

Couvent des Capucins, édifié en 1606.

Hôtel-de-Ville, reconstruit vers 1470.

Maison Bleuler, bâtie en 1606.

Hôpital du Saint-Esprit, fondé au XIIIe siècle, reconstruit en 1843.

« Rheinfall »

28 août 1880 : Bruckner visite la plus grande cascade d'Europe, soit les chutes du Rhin (« Rheinfall ») situées près de « Schaffhausen » , la localité la plus septentrionale de Suisse ; chef-lieu du canton de « Schaffhouse » .

Les chutes du Rhin (en allemand : Rheinfall ; en suisse allemand : Rhyfall) sont des chutes d'eau situées entre Neuhausen (rive droite) et Flurlingen (rive gauche) en Suisse en aval de Schaffhouse. Elles sont classées parmi les plus grandes d'Europe.

Entre le lac de Constance et Bâle, là où le Rhin forme la frontière entre la Suisse et le Land de Bade-Wurtemberg, le lit du fleuve s'est creusé dans les roches calcaires du Jura formant des rapides et ces chutes.

Lorsque le Rhin a son débit moyen, ce sont 750 mètres cubes d'eau par seconde qui franchissent les rochers d'une hauteur de 23 mètres et sur 150 mètres de largeur. Le débit maximum mesuré fut de 1,260 mètres cube par seconde, en 1965, et le débit minimum de 95 mètres cube par seconde, en 1921.

En contrebas des chutes, sur la rive droite du fleuve (côté ville de Neuhausen) , se trouve la maison Wörth à partir de laquelle des petits esquifs permettent de s'approcher au plus près des chutes, d'accoster sur le rocher qui se trouve au milieu et de grimper au sommet où flotte le drapeau suisse. Au-dessus des chutes, sur la rive de Zürich, se trouve la maison Laufen qui abrite un restaurant, une boutique et une auberge de jeunesse.

L'histoire géologique récente, avec les glaciations successives et les formations géologiques, explique la formation de ces chutes.

Il y a environ 500,000 ans, la Ire avancée des glaciers sur le plateau suisse commence à dessiner le paysage actuel. Jusqu'à la fin de la glaciation de Riss, il y environ 200,000 ans, le Rhin coulait à l'ouest de Schaffhouse à travers le Klettgau. Ce lit ancien fut ensuite comblé par des dépôts glaciaires.

Il y a environ 120,000 ans, le fleuve fut détourné vers le sud au niveau de la ville de Schaffhouse et forma une « rigole » . Le bassin versant actuel laisse encore voir cette rigole, qui fut ensuite comblée de sédiments glaciaires.

Pendant la dernière glaciation, la glaciation de Würm, le Rhin fut repoussé en un large croissant vers le sud et creusa son lit actuel dans le calcaire. Sur la zone de transition entre la roche calcaire et les sédiments glaciaires facilement érodables se formèrent les chutes dans leur physionomie actuelle il y a environ 17,000 à 14,000 ans.

« Schaffhausen »

La ville de Schaffhausen (Schaffhouse, en français) , dominée par l'imposante forteresse de Munot, est étagée sur la rive droite du Rhin. La cité ancienne a conservé son passé médiéval et ses maisons aux oriels.

Schaffhouse était une ville - État au Moyen-âge. Des documents montrent qu'elle commença à frapper sa monnaie dès l'an 1045. L'abbaye bénédictine de Tous-les-Saints fut fondée en 1049 par le Comte Eberhard de Nellenburg qui la dota richement. En 1376, un incendie dévasta une grande partie de la ville. Pendant un temps, elle fut sous la domination des Habsbourg mais regagna son indépendance en 1415 en achetant sa liberté à l'Empire autrichien.

Elle s'allia avec Zürich, en 1457. La guerre de Souabe, en 1499, rapprocha la ville des autres cantons et elle devint un membre complet de la Confédération en 1501 en formant le 12e canton.

En 1529 la Réforme est adoptée par la ville et les couvents sont fermés.

La partie ancienne de la ville possède de nombreux immeubles pittoresques d'époque Renaissance décorés avec des fresques extérieures et des sculptures et plusieurs fontaines ornées de statues polychromes.

De nombreuses maisons bourgeoises à pignons du XVIIe siècle ont été conservées, avec des tourelles et des toits fortement pentus couverts de tuiles en forme d'écaille de poissons.

Bien que la plus grande partie des fortifications ait été abattue, la ville a conservé de nombreux vestiges de son passé médiéval comme plusieurs tours et portes ainsi que la vieille forteresse cantonale, le Munot, un donjon circulaire aux dimensions impressionnantes.

Le monastère de Tous-les-Saints a été restauré et abrite un musée historique. L'église Gothique Saint-Jean date de 1120.

Le XIXe siècle est celui de l'industrialisation avec l'établissement d'une filature mécanique de coton, en 1813, mais aussi celui des crises économiques et sociales.

Le 1er chemin de fer atteint la ville, en 1857, par l'ouverture de la ligne Winterthour-Schaffhouse.

En 1944 la ville, bien que dans la Suisse neutre, subit par erreur un bombardement par l'aviation américaine qui devait viser l'Allemagne proche, faisant 40 morts.

29 août 1880 : Bruckner s'arrête à Genève.

30 août - 3 septembre 1880 : Vers la fin de sa tournée estivale, Anton Bruckner passera quelques jours à l'un des endroits les plus merveilleux de la planète : Chamonix, La Flégère. De la vallée, la vue imprenable des sommets glacés du Mont-Blanc demeure une expérience inoubliable. Curieusement, le calendrier de Bruckner, qui lui sert aussi de journal intime, n'évoque à aucun moment la majesté écrasante du site. Ce qui tend à confirmer les commentaires de Friedrich Klose (un élève du compositeur) à l'effet que Bruckner n'était pas vraiment interpellé par la beauté de la nature (comme ce fut le cas chez Beethoven ou chez Gustav Mahler) .

Septembre 1880 : Back in Vienna, the 20 year old Gustav Mahler resumes work on the music of his 1st significant composition, the Cantata « Das Klagende Lied » (The Lamenting Song) .

Septembre 1880 : The 22 year old Hans Rott, suffering from lack of both family and money, and from an unrequited love, submits his Symphony to the Beethoven Prize competition, and goes to play it to Johannes Brahms, who enters a cruelly harsh judgment :

« The composition contained besides such beauty so much triviality and non-sense that the former could not possibly stem from Rott himself. »

Brahms advises Rott to give-up composition. Rott's Symphony boldly combines the styles of several major German / Austrian composers and, in the last movement, contains a theme presented 3 times which sounds much like that from the last movement of Brahms's own 1st Symphony - Brahms may easily have misinterpreted the combination of that with Wagnerian-style material as a put-down. All this stress is too much for Rott and his mind snaps.

La cathédrale Saint-Pierre de Genève

4-5 septembre 1880 : Anton Bruckner assiste, le 1er jour, à un concert donné par l'organiste bâlois, Anton Häring , titulaire à la cathédrale Saint-Pierre de Genève de 1866 à 1886. À la demande de ce dernier, Bruckner va exécuter (le lendemain) des improvisations sur ce même instrument, œuvre du facteur français « Merklin et Schütze » inauguré en 1866.

Les autres titulaires de Saint-Pierre de Genève :

Thilo Muster (1994-2005) .

Pierre Segond (1942-1994) .

Otto Barblan (1887-1942) : Né le 22 mars 1860 à Schanf ; mort le 19 décembre 1943 à Genève ; de Ramosch. Fils protestant de Florian, organiste, directeur de chœur et inspecteur scolaire, et de Mengia Pitsch. Marié à Frieda Lanzer. Barblan étudia la composition et l'orgue chez Immanuel Faisst à Stuttgart.

Maître de musique à l'école cantonale de Coire, de 1885 à 1887 ; organiste à la cathédrale Saint-Pierre de Genève dès 1887, professeur de composition et d'orgue au Conservatoire de Genève dès 1888 ; directeur de la Société de chant sacré de 1892 à 1938.

Otto Barblan influença pendant des décennies la vie musicale genevoise, à travers sa prédilection pour la musique de Bach et ses créations d'œuvres chorales de Händel, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms et César Franck. Combinant des éléments néo-Baroques et le patrimoine mélodique rhéto-romanche avec l'harmonie post-Romantique, son œuvre compte des « Festspiele » patriotiques, des pièces chorales, des lieder, de la musique de chambre, des morceaux pour orgue et pour piano.

Il fut membre d'honneur de l'Association des musiciens suisses en 1937, citoyen d'honneur du canton de Genève et docteur « Honoris causa » de l'Université de Genève.

Anton Häring (1866-1886) .

Joseph Mooser (1821-1865) .

Nicolas Scherrer (1795-1821) .

Jean-Jacques Scherrer (1757-1795) .

On sait qu'il y eut un orgue à Saint-Pierre de Genève au 16e siècle. Mais le 1er instrument important fut celui construit par le fameux facteur Samson Scherrer, en 1757. C'était un grand-orgue avec Positif de dos et une partie instrumentale de type Classique français. Samson Scherrer a aussi oeuvré à Lausanne, à la cathédrale et à l'église Saint-François. À noter que Joseph Mooser, fils du célèbre Aloys Mooser, constructeur de l'actuel grand-orgue de la cathédrale de Fribourg, fut titulaire des grandes orgues de Saint-Pierre dès 1821. Le 2e grand-orgue de la cathédrale de Genève fut un orgue du facteur français Merklin, inauguré en 1866. Ce fut un instrument Symphonique français de 4 claviers à traction assistée par une « machine Barker ». Joseph Mooser fut titulaire de cet orgue monumental. Atteint de surdité, il fut malheureusement contraint de laisser son poste à un organiste bâlois, Anton Häring. En 1887, le poste d'organiste est mis au concours. C'est un Grison, Otto Barblan, qui devint organiste titulaire. L'orgue Merklin devenant fatigué, il fallait reconstruire ! Le 3e grand-orgue de Saint-Pierre fut un un orgue du facteur Tschanun, inauguré en 1907 (3 claviers, buffet de style Gothique, pédale basée sur une Soubasse de 32 pieds) . La traction pneumatique se mit à vieillir plus rapidement qu'une traction mécanique (ce qui est prévisible) , et le 4e orgue de Saint-Pierre fut un grand-orgue Metzler (Metzler & Fils, Dietikon, Suisse) , érigé en 1965. C'est encore l'instrument que l'on admire actuellement (4 claviers, 67 jeux, traction mécanique des claviers et électrique des jeux) . L'esthétique de cet instrument est inspirée de l'orgue nord-allemand avec certains jeux d'inspiration Française et Romantique. Le buffet est l'œuvre de P.-G. Andersen de Copenhague.

Le nouvel orgue de la cathédrale a été construit en 1965 par les facteurs Metzler et fils de Dietikon. Le buffet en a été conçu par l'architecte Poul-Gerhard Andersen de Copenhague.

La composition sonore de cet instrument s'inspire de l'orgue nord-allemand de la fin du XVIIe siècle, de style néo-Baroque. Il comprend également quelques registres d'inspiration française (Cornet et Cromorne) et quelques jeux d'anches de l'époque Romantique (1907) .

En 1972, l'organiste Louis Thiry a enregistré sur cet instrument l'œuvre d'orgue d'Olivier Messiaen pour la maison d'édition Calliope. Cet enregistrement a été couronné par le « Grand Prix du disque de l'Académie Charles-Cros » en 1973 et demeure à l'heure actuelle une référence pour l'interprétation du grand compositeur français du XXe siècle.

...

La construction de la cathédrale Saint-Pierre de Genève a débuté en 1160 et durera 150 ans. Elle a donc, comme celle de Lausanne, émergée au 12e siècle par des structures Romanes importantes. Puis, la cathédrale (tout comme à Lausanne) s'est achevée en style Gothique primitif de type Bourguignon. Saint-Pierre de Genève n'a ni l'ampleur, ni les dimensions importantes de Lausanne. Elle ne comporte pas de déambulatoire. La marque de l'art Roman est plus importante à Genève : notamment, l'extérieur est franchement de style Roman de telle sorte que, vue de loin, Saint-Pierre de Genève donne plutôt l'aspect d'un grand édifice Roman. À l'intérieur, le chœur est de dimensions plutôt modestes. On peut admirer encore quelques beaux chapiteaux, vestiges de la cathédrale Romane. On peut aussi admirer le tombeau du Duc Henry de Rohan.

La façade Romane de la cathédrale menaçait de tomber en ruine au 18e siècle. On décida d'attribuer des travaux de restauration à l'architecte Benedetto Alfieri dont les plans furent exécutés de 1752 à 1756. Il s'agissait d'un portique néo-Classique considérable qui s'adossa sur toute la largeur de la Basilique, portique formant un « narthex » symétrique flanqué de murs massifs se terminant, à l'ouest, par des pilastres et des 3 quarts de colonnes. Ceux-ci formèrent un péristyle saillant qui s'ouvrait sur la place par un escalier imposant. Une travée de la nef fut sacrifiée pour édifier cette construction néo-Classique. La fameuse chapelle des Macchabées, sur le côté droit, ne fut pas touchée par la construction du grand porche. Cette chapelle, édifiée de 1406 à 1411, au sud-ouest de la cathédrale, est un très beau monument du Gothique rayonnant avec des fresques néo-Gothiques du 19e siècle. Cette chapelle abrita l'Autel de Saint-Pierre exécuté par Konrad Witz en 1444. À la Réforme, cet autel fut épargné et, en 1536, Genève devint la « Rome protestante », principale église du protestantisme calviniste mondial.

Pourquoi le tombeau du Duc Henry de Rohan, fils du Vicomte de Rohan, est-il placé en la cathédrale de Genève ? Au 16e siècle, la France, traversée par 30 ans de guerre civile, était en passe de devenir un champ de ruines et elle était menacée à l'extérieur par les ambitions austro espagnoles de la Maison des Habsbourg très catholique et qui revendiquait le leadership sur l'Europe. Rohan épousa la fille du ministre protestant d'Henri IV, Sully, qui tomba en disgrâce à l'assassinat du roi de France et à l'arrivée du Cardinal de Richelieu. Avec l'accord du Roi Louis XIII, Rohan fut chargé de missions diplomatiques, politiques et militaires, notamment dans les Grisons pour occuper certains cols stratégiques et pour arracher la Valteline à l'ennemi. Il se comporta en héros, mais il fut contraint de se retirer suite à une retentissante trahison. Il reprit les armes à la demande du Duc allemand de Saxe-Weimar contre les Austro-Espagnols et périt à Rheinfelden à 59 ans. À sa demande, sa dépouille fut ramenée à Genève, sa patrie spirituelle. Les obsèques furent donc célébrées en la cathédrale de Genève le 27 mai 1638. Le mausolée actuel date de 1890.

La cathédrale de Genève recèle, en outre, un ensemble exceptionnel de vitraux. Elle a abrité des vitraux du Moyen-âge de la seconde moitié du 15e siècle. Il reste notamment d'importants témoins de la splendeur médiévale de cet art du vitrail de la cathédrale, au musée d'Art et d'Histoire : il s'agit des 6 vitraux de l'abside. Au 19e siècle, ces vitraux médiévaux de l'abside avaient un urgent besoin de restauration. Le choix fut fait de les transférer au Musée et mettre en place des copies dans la cathédrale. L'actuel édifice ne contient donc que des vitraux du 19e siècle, mais de grande beauté. Les 6 fenêtres de la très belle chapelle dite des Macchabées sont également de cette période : posés en 1888 (œuvres du peintre verrier Friedrich Berbig, près de Zürich). Les 2 grandes roses des transepts sud et nord sont de 1835, œuvres du Maître-verrier Rodet. Un des verres de l'une de ces rosaces porte la signature : « Bordelais Resolu 1835, compagnon vitrier ». Sous les roses, il y a 2 fois 3 vitraux magnifiques qui purent être réalisés avec les fonds de souscription réunis pour les rosaces. La rose sud est consacrée au Nouveau Testament, la rose nord à l'Ancien Testament. Saint-Pierre de Genève est donc un magnifique édifice qui nous présente ce que l'on a pu faire de mieux dans l'art du vitrail au 19e siècle. Il faut absolument « lever le nez » et admirer ces très belles verrières, même lorsqu'elles ne sont que purement décoratives.

...

L'Empire Romain d'Occident s'est dissout et, en 534, les Francs viennent d'annexer le royaume des Burgondes qui s'étaient installés en 443 à Genève. C'est sous ce nouveau règne que le groupe épiscopal subit de profonds changements. La ville voit naître la cathédrale orientale et de nouvelles structures administratives. Plus tard, au IXe siècle, sous le règne des Carolingiens, Genève est gouvernée par des comtes et, en 888, intègre le royaume de Bourgogne. À cette époque, la cité assiste à un monumental essor des paroisses rurales. Avec ce développement, vers l'an 1000, une crypte « hors-d'œuvre » s'ajoute à la cathédrale désormais unique et le chœur s'agrandit. Enfin, c'est en 1032 que Genève rejoint le Saint-Empire romain germanique.

La Ire cathédrale de Genève remonte à la fin du IVe siècle. Cette cathédrale (désignée comme « Cathédrale Nord » par les archéologues) est intégrée dans un ensemble qui comprend en outre un baptistère et une église qui fut probablement un martyrium (destinée à la vénération des reliques des martyrs) ; il y avait, en outre, des bâtiments d'habitation appuyés à la cathédrale nord. À cette époque, l'évêque est l'homme le plus important de la cité : il gouverne depuis le groupe épiscopal qui se dresse depuis la fin du IVe siècle sur la colline et où se déroulent la plupart des activités religieuses, politiques et économiques. La ville de Genève est fortement influencée, tant au niveau politique que topographique, par l'essor du christianisme, suite à sa reconnaissance par l'Empereur romain Constantin en l'an 3136.

Dans son état initial, aux alentours de l'an 380, cette cathédrale mesure 32 mètres de longueur par 15 de largeur et constitue un lieu de rassemblement pour les fidèles. Elle se dresse en fait sur les fondations du grand bâtiment résidentiel dont les axes ne se coupent pas à angle droit, ce qui explique la tenue légèrement en biais de l'église. La cathédrale ne possède qu'une entrée latérale précédée d'un vestibule et est montée en Opus africanum. La nef est séparée en 2 par une légère barrière dans le but hypothétique de créer une scission entre les fidèles privilégiés et les autres ; le chœur est également séparé de la nef par une barrière ; on nomme cette zone presbyterium.

Le baptistère est une annexe réservée au baptême et dont la forme changera beaucoup. Dans les Iers temps, c'est un simple bâtiment rectangulaire doté d'une abside et équipé d'une cuve à immersion d'un mètre carré placée dans un coin. La salle est également séparée, mais cette fois le presbyterium est très peu développé.

Pour augmenter les proportions du groupe et en faire un complexe comparable à celui de Lyon ou de Grenoble, il est remanié vers l'an 400. L'évêque fait donc construire une nouvelle cathédrale au sud. Le baptistère est alors déplacé pour l'harmonie de l'ensemble. Entre les 3 bâtiments se loge un atrium permettant de circuler d'une cathédrale à l'autre et servant de cour à l'évêque qui vient y faire ses discours. Des annexes, servant à subvenir aux besoins terrestres des moines, fleurissent tout autour du complexe.

La cathédrale méridionale est construite en tant qu'église secondaire destinée aux enseignements religieux et aux lectures de textes sacrés. Elle mesure approximativement la taille de sa jumelle et son architecture paraît plus soignée. La nef, dotée de 2 rangées de colonnes, est à nouveau séparée en 2, délimitant ainsi les zones pour les 2 classes de fidèles. Le chœur, quant à lui, est totalement interdit aux laïcs par un mur. Cette frontière entre le presbyterium agrémentée d'une solea se terminant sur un ambon polygonal, ce qui nous indique que l'évêque lit « des textes sacrés au milieu des fidèles » .

L'ancien baptistère sert désormais de vestibule au second qui est équipé d'une cuve octogonale couverte d'un ciborium soutenu par 8 colonnes qui forme un ensemble monumental. À nouveau, la partie réservée aux ecclésiastiques est séparée du reste de la pièce.

L'augmentation du nombre des moines pousse l'évêque à faire agrandir le chœur de la cathédrale nord dans le but d'obtenir un presbyterium plus grand. Au Ve siècle, seul le chœur a été modifié et l'église conserve sa largeur originale, tandis que la longueur se rallonge de 11 mètres. Une solea, dont la paroi intérieure sud est aménagée d'un tombeau vénéré se terminant par une ouverture et un escalier, s'avance dans la nef. 2 rangées de piliers remplaceront plus tard le chancel. Cet aménagement est sûrement destiné aux processions liturgiques, ce qui marque la différence entre les 2 cathédrales au niveau de leurs rôles.

Le 1er baptistère est détruit et le second s'allonge jusqu'à toucher le mur de l'atrium. Au Ve siècle, l'abside est reconstruite dans un modèle carré à l'extérieur et rond à l'intérieur, ce qui donne un aspect très massif. La place ainsi créée sert à l'ajout d'un autel posé sur un podium séparé de la nef par une barrière. Une solea se terminant par un ambon ouvert est construite à l'entrée et suit l'axe de l'ancien baptistère. La cuve déplacée a gardé ses proportions et sa forme mais le ciborium qui la recouvre a bien changé. Les 8 colonnes de l'an 400 ont été récupérées, retaillées et enfoncées dans les maçonneries de la cuve. Celle-ci aussi a changé. En effet, l'eau est acheminée d'un puits par le biais de tuyaux faits de sapins évidés et reliés entre eux par des frettes de fer jusqu'à la cuve où elle passe par le coude pratiqué dans un bloc de calcaire et ressort comme un petit jet d'eau. Un second ambon arrondi et flanqué de 2 plaques latérales, se dresse près de la piscine. L'évêque peut ainsi facilement atteindre le front des personnes debout dans la cuve.

Au Ve siècle, encore, l'évêque exige la construction d'une salle de réception contre la paroi de la cathédrale sud. Cette pièce mesure 9,40 mètres par 5,50 mètres et est chauffée par des conduits d'eau chaude. Elle est aussi dotée d'un système d'évacuation de la fumée et composée de tuyaux pratiqués dans l'épaisseur des murs. Le sol est entièrement recouvert de mosaïques représentant 5 rangées de 9 dessins. Les thèmes de ces motifs mêlent la culture antique avec la symbolique chrétienne qui domine finalement grâce à l'adjonction de 2 grandes croix aux bouts de la pièce. Les murs sont magnifiquement décorés comme le prouvent les fragments de peinture retrouvés au XXe siècle. Cette salle sert de bureau à l'évêque, c'est de là qu'il traite les questions religieuses et administratives de son territoire.

En l'an 500 et 501, l'incendie provoqué à Genève par la guerre fratricide opposant Gondebaud à Godegisèle, cause de sérieux dégâts. Les frères s'allient pour la reconstruction de la ville et apportent des modifications à certains bâtiments. Le chantier est repris en 516 par le nouveau roi Burgondes couronné à Carouge. Le chœur de la cathédrale nord est une nouvelle fois modifié. L'abside est à nouveau rebâtie et les annexes latérales sont associées au chœur pour former un transept à croisée. Après la guerre, au début du VIe siècle, une autre salle de réception est construite derrière la cathédrale méridionale et marque la volonté du groupe de s'étendre à toute la colline et de descendre vers le lac. La salle mesure approximativement 125 mètres carrés et son sol est recouvert de terre argileuse. Au Nord, une porte s'ouvre sur un couloir agrémenté des colonnes de bois permettant de retourner à la cathédrale sud depuis la salle. Il est fortement possible que ce complexe serve de résidence à l'évêque.

L'établissement de la cathédrale orientale dans le prolongement du baptistère des Ve et VIe siècles provoque la disparition du quartier antérieur. Néanmoins, l'espace à disposition ne suffira pas et plusieurs édifices sont encore démantelés pour permettre la construction de ce bâtiment. Cet ensemble architectural n'est cependant pas né sans une raison bien déterminée, l'occupation de cet emplacement privilégié étant très dense et les parcelles de terrain difficiles à libérer. Il est vrai que les dégâts provoqués par la guerre dynastique des Burgondes en l'an 500 engendrèrent un renouveau qui modifia la ville.

Le caractère architectural de cette cathédrale varie beaucoup des édifices antérieurs. Cependant, son abside monumentale ressemble fortement à celle de la cathédrale nord, elle aussi dotée de contreforts. De plus, les chantiers de construction de ce bâtiment et celle de la cathédrale nord se relient et il semble évident, pour le bas-côté sud, que l'architecte a tenu compte de l'ancien portique de la salle de réception (groupe épiscopal du IV^e siècle) . Ce n'est pas le cas pour l'autre partie du chantier, au nord, où le mur qui limitait la parcelle est abattu, le chevet n'étant pas dans le même axe que celui-ci.

Au début de la construction, des piliers carrés, bâtis sur une solide maçonnerie formant un chaînage horizontal et séparant la cathédrale en 3 nefs, supportent les grandes arcades de la cathédrale. Une porte, taillée dans du calcaire massif, arrive par les bas-côtés au presbyterium (espace réservé aux ecclésiastiques) . Le chœur, légèrement surélevé par rapport aux nefs, est accessible à travers 2 portiques latéraux et fermé par une barrière. Cette paroi étroite en stuc (toujours visible de nos jours) qui recouvre des décorations de motifs grecs en tuf volcanique est haute de 2 mètres et sépare le presbyterium du vaste espace réservé à la circulation des fidèles qui se recueillaient devant l'abside pour pratiquer le culte du souvenir.

Le chœur évoluera en 3 phases jusqu'à l'établissement de la cathédrale de l'an 1,000. Ainsi, au VII^e siècle, pour donner de la valeur à la sépulture privilégiée, la séparation décorée en stuc est remodelée et des estrades apparaissent des 2 côtés. Une seconde limite, placée en avant dans la nef principale, et des chancels (barrière entre les colonnes) canalisent la circulation des laïcs se rapprochant de la tombe du défunt vénéré (ces chancels en cloison séparant la nef centrale des collatéraux seront renouvelés plusieurs fois) . C'est à cause de la tombe aménagée dans l'abside au VII^e siècle que le chœur est réorganisé et que l'espace réservé aux ecclésiastiques, auparavant minuscule, prend de nouvelles dimensions.

Aux IX^e siècle et X^e siècle, un effort particulier est consacré à la cathédrale orientale et, pour lui donner des proportions plus équilibrées, elle est prolongée à l'ouest jusqu'à l'atrium, aux dépens de l'ancien baptistère et de la grande annexe de la cathédrale nord. L'ouverture latérale reste en fonction mais une porte principale est placée dans l'axe de la nef centrale. Les 4 piliers de départ sont complétés par 4 colonnes occidentales, montées séparément et installées sur les murs rasés du baptistère. L'abside est renforcée, le presbyterium est élevé de plus d'un mètre et des murs épais remplacent les chancels entre les piliers pour supporter ce chœur désormais massif. Ce dernier atteint ici la 3^e phase de ses variations architecturales. À l'intérieur, le soutènement remplaçant le mur décoré en stuc passe devant les colonnes pour ensuite se tourner perpendiculairement jusqu'à la limite de la première travée. Des marches, prenant toute la largeur de la nef et établies après les 2 I^{res} travées ainsi que les 2 accès latérales depuis les bas-côtés, permettent l'accès aux aménagements liturgiques et conservent la circulation nécessaire aux cérémonies.

Par conséquent, ce nouveau corps, Basilique carolingienne et dernière évolution de la 3^e cathédrale, laisse apercevoir, à travers ses solides fondations, les bases des édifices à venir et son importance future.

Au tournant de l'an 1000, l'ensemble du groupe épiscopal est à nouveau réorganisé et restauré. Les changements viennent sans doute d'une envie d'unifier le complexe architectural à travers un seul et unique bâtiment.

Toutefois, au VIII^e siècle, une « réforme des institutions » a une grande incidence topographique sur la ville dans les années qui suivent et donc une grande influence sur les développements structuraux de la nouvelle cathédrale. Cette réforme est celle de Charles Martel, évêque de Metz, un intellectuel qui a joué un rôle capital lors de la Renaissance carolingienne. Il impose aux chanoines (religieux entourant l'évêque) une « règle » qui leur dicte une vie commune très stricte : ils doivent vivre avec l'évêque dans les cités des abbayes, dormir dans le même dortoir et manger dans le même réfectoire. C'est ainsi que des véritables monastères s'installent dans les villes de l'Empire. Confronté à ce problème d'habitation (il est en effet indispensable que l'enclos canonial se trouve à proximité immédiate de la cathédrale), l'évêque se procure le terrain nécessaire en rachetant ou en détruisant les espaces autour de la cathédrale. Par conséquent, les espaces funéraires auparavant gardés « hors les murs » commencent à infiltrer les remparts de Genève qui, avec cette réorganisation urbaine, s'étendent par dessus les anciens sanctuaires. Désormais, c'est autour des paroisses et des lieux de cultes à l'intérieur de la ville que s'implantent les cimetières. C'est pourquoi, en raison de l'« Institutio canicorum » (Règle des chanoines) de Charlemagne qui poursuit l'action de l'évêque, la cathédrale double (nord et sud) et le reste du groupe épiscopal sont démolis au profit de l'édifice central qui s'agrandit. Enfin, la dernière raison d'unification est, qu'à l'époque, le rapport en mode entre cathédrale et abbatiale veut que le bâtiment soit unique pour créer un lien matériel et spirituel avec les constructions autour d'elle. C'est justement en France, comme à Paris, que des bâtiments tels que les baptistères sont détruits pour faire de la place à un monument unique et particulièrement gigantesque.

Tout commence avec le prolongement à l'est du plan à 3 nefs par de très puissantes fondations. L'architecte préparait peut-être un transept (nef coupant la nef principale perpendiculairement pour former une croix) non saillant ou surélevé comme il en existait déjà en France à cette époque. Ce projet est pourtant abandonné et une crypte voit le jour dans les fondations déjà établies. Le plan de ce 2^e chœur indépendant s'inspire sans doute de la célèbre crypte du monastère de Saint-Bénigne de Dijon, restaurée au XI^e siècle et dotée elle aussi d'un double déambulatoire. La crypte est donc inscrite dans ce massif rectangulaire, mais circulaire à l'intérieur, et munie d'une abside saillante du côté oriental. La rotonde contient une double couronne de colonnes et 4 dans son abside. Les 2 larges couloirs latéraux contrôlent la circulation des touristes. Ce genre de rotonde abritait généralement en son centre une tombe ou un coffre contenant des reliques et un autel dans l'abside.

La construction du chœur de la cathédrale Romane passe par une 3^e phase, lorsqu'on opte pour une véritable reconstruction afin d'unifier les 2 monuments. C'est ainsi que l'on arrive à un 3^e palier dans la nef. Le presbyterium prend la place de l'ancien chœur et l'on y aménage un large espace pour les chanoines. Alors que le chevet de l'ancienne cathédrale évolue énormément, le reste du groupe épiscopal change vraisemblablement très peu. Néanmoins, les parois latérales sont plusieurs fois recouvertes de badigeon et une nouvelle banquette, sur lequel on pouvait s'asseoir ou poser des cierges, court le long du mur. La façade occidentale est percée d'un nouveau portique et un escalier donnant sur une chapelle haute ou à une galerie est aménagé dans la même extrémité. On perfectionne la porte principale de 2 mètres de hauteur en lui ajoutant 2 battants et 2 montants monolithes.

Les 3 volées de marches, montant des nefs charpentées jusqu'au chœur voûté, accentuent ce caractère monumental de la cathédrale qui devient le point de focalisation de la ville. Cette dernière n'est plus complètement axée sur le culte du souvenir comme son aïeul. Toutefois, l'instauration d'un cimetière sur l'ancien atrium et la présence de la crypte retiennent le souvenir d'un culte, qui a toujours été présent sur la colline genevoise.

La cathédrale de l'an 1000, prenant de plus en plus d'importance à Genève, est un préliminaire pour l'église à venir en s'adaptant aux besoins populaires variés d'une ville qui occupe un lieu extrêmement stratégique au niveau du commerce, du voyage ou, surtout en ces temps-là, du plan militaire. L'engouement est tel à l'égard de cet édifice moderne que l'Empereur du Saint-Empire romain germanique, Conrad II le Salique, vient s'y faire sacrer roi de Bourgogne. En revanche, avec la réforme Grégorienne, lorsque l'église se bat pour la souveraineté sur la ville, le lieu de culte devient un lieu de polémique.

Placée au cœur des conflits qui opposent les seigneurs locaux, la cathédrale devient une citadelle entre 1289 et 1300. L'office religieux cesse d'y être célébré et le bâtiment est endommagé par les pierres catapultées depuis le Bourg-de-Four et par les nombreux incendies qui ont lieu au XIVe siècle.

Avec l'arrivée de la Réforme protestante, le destin de la cathédrale change brutalement. Le 8 août 1535, Guillaume Farel, malgré l'interdiction des magistrats y prêche la Réforme pour la Ire fois devant une foule immense. C'est l'après-midi de ce même jour, durant les vêpres, que des iconoclastes ont dévasté la cathédrale en y brisant les statues et en lacérant les images qui n'étaient pas en conformité avec le nouveau culte réformé. En voici un récit (en ancien français) d'Antoine Froment, qui prêchait la Réforme à Genève depuis environ 1532 :

« Dieu suscita une vintaine de petits enfans contre tout l'entendement des hommes une Dimenche, à Vespres. Après que Farel eust presché à Saint-Pierre, en la grande église quathedrale. Du temps que les Prebstres chantoient leurs Vespres, et disans le Psalme 114, In Excitu Israel de Egipto, ces petits enfans, sans que personne y pensa rien, commencèrent à crier, à bryre et à urler comme les Prebstres. Alors ces petis enfans poursuivent à fayre ung grand bruiet, remuans les sieges des fourmes, où les Prebstres se souloynt assoyer, et frapper, baisser et relever ces sièges en dérision des Prebstres, tellement que tous furent estonnés ouans ce bruiet. Alors le Magnifique Mesgret Dict à Baudichon, qui estoient dans l'église avec les aultres, n'y pensant aultre chose : Certes cecy passe nostre entendement ; Dieu veult faire quelquechose que nous n'entendons pas. Et soubdaynement voicy venir Amy Perrin, Jehan Golle et certains aultres ouans le bruiet qui souventesfois auparavant avoiant prié et requesté le Conseil de mattré bas les ydolles, comme auoit esté deffini, ce que le Conseil n'avoit jamais voullu fayre. Lesquelz voyans ces petits enfans faysans tel bruiet contre les Prebstres et se joyans de leurs marmousets, etrèrent dans le cueur du temple et à la présence des Prebstres soubdaynement jetterent par terre leurs ydolles. Et mes petits enfans à courir et à sauter après ces petits dieux et cryoyent à haute voix joyeux au peuple qui estoit arresté dehors l'Église : « Nous auons les dieux des Prebstres, en voullès-vous ? » et les jetoynt après eulx. Et les Prebstres à fouyr dehors du temple pensans estre perdus et à courir aux Sindicques, et de courir après leurs dieux : et des folles femmes de la ville à plourer et à gemir, mauldissans ces cagnes qui ont destruit leurs bons Sainctz. »

Suite à cet événement, le Conseil décide, le 10 août 1535, de suspendre la Messe provisoirement. Cette précaution ne sera en réalité pas relevée, et la messe sera ainsi abolie. C'est encore un point pour la Réforme, qui ne cesse d'en marquer depuis le départ du Prince évêque en 1533. La Réforme sera officielle à Genève en le 21 mai 1536.

Par ailleurs, durant 23 ans, Jean Calvin y lit et explique les Saintes Écritures.

Construite pour le rite catholique, l'avènement de la Réforme, au milieu du XVIe siècle, avec sa philosophie d'austérité bouleverse l'intérieur de l'édifice, le vidant de tout ornement et recouvrant les décors polychromes du Moyen-âge. Seuls les vitraux sont épargnés et une partie du mobilier (les stalles, par exemple) , leur destruction aurait été alors coûteuse en réparations. Les dernières œuvres d'art qui ont orné cette cathédrale, à l'origine entièrement peinte à l'intérieur, incluent le 1er tableau de paysage réaliste : le retable de Konrad Witz (1444) avec une représentation de la rade de Genève comme cadre de la pêche miraculeuse avec le Christ et Saint-Pierre (aujourd'hui déposé au musée d'art et d'histoire) .

La cathédrale subit de nombreuses modifications suite à des travaux de restauration et de reconstruction, des guerres et des incendies successifs. Au fil du temps, les ajouts et les rénovations ont modifié l'apparence intérieure et extérieure de la construction. À l'extérieur, les changements les plus visibles, sinon les plus importants, sont certainement la construction de la tour sud, l'ajout du portique, l'adjonction de la chapelle des Macchabées (expression du Gothique flamboyant réalisée vers 1400-1405 à l'initiative du cardinal de Brogny) , la reconstruction de la tour nord et la mise en place de la flèche est plus moderne, elle date de 1895.

La façade néo-Classique actuelle date du milieu du XVIIIe siècle, remplaçant la précédente de style Gothique. Elle fut réalisée sur les plans de l'architecte Benedetto Alfieri, entre 1752 et 1756, notamment en raison de la menace d'écroulement de la partie occidentale du bâtiment. Lors des révolutions de Genève, dans la 2e moitié du XVIIIe siècle, Saint-Pierre est le Théâtre de troubles importants et sert de dépôt de munitions. Un tribunal révolutionnaire (donnant à la cathédrale le nom de Temple des Lois) y est mis en place en 1794 et les cultes n'y sont plus célébrés jusqu'à l'occupation française de 1798.

À l'intérieur, la cathédrale présente le plus vaste ensemble de chapiteaux Romains et Gothiques de Suisse (près de 300 éléments) tandis que les vitraux (identiques à ceux de la Renaissance qui sont au musée d'art et d'histoire) remontent aux travaux de restauration du XIXe siècle.

Anciennement appelée Chapelle Notre-Dame, elle devient Chapelle des Macchabées en raison de la présence possible de reliques des Frères Macchabées. La construction de la chapelle des Macchabées est décidée en 1397 et sa construction est achevée en 1405-1406. Son commanditaire, le cardinal Jean de Brogny la conçoit comme une chapelle funéraire ; le tombeau dans lequel il n'aura pas l'occasion de reposer (suite à sa mort à Rome en 1426) est aujourd'hui disparu. Il était l'œuvre du sculpteur bourguignon Jean Prindale qui a réalisé également quelques éléments des stalles encore visibles dans la cathédrale. Aujourd'hui un orgue Walcker datant de 1888 se trouve à l'emplacement probable du tombeau du cardinal. Le style architectural de cet ensemble était lors de sa réalisation dans le plus pur style du Gothique flamboyant. La Réforme transforma cette chapelle en entrepôt puis, du XVIIe au XIXe siècle, elle accueille des salles de classe de l'Académie sur 3 étages créés dans cette optique. Au XIXe siècle, la Chapelle des Macchabées récupère le statut d'édifice religieux. À cette même époque (en 1878) , une vaste campagne de rénovation est lancée, campagne rendue nécessaire par les adaptations architecturales et artistiques peu respectueuses des siècles précédents. Les derniers vestiges encore en état de conservation sont des fresques représentant des anges musiciens. Conservées au Musée d'art et d'histoire, elles sont remplacées par des copies à l'identique réalisées par Gustave de Beaumont. Les vitraux datent de la même époque et représentent notamment les 4 évangélistes, la sainte Cène, la Samaritaine et le « Laisser venir à moi les petits enfants ». Enfin, la Chapelle comporte un grand nombre d'éléments rappelant la Réforme dans son aspect politique : écussons de cantons combourgeois (Berne, Fribourg, Zürich) , symboles héraldiques de Genève. La Chapelle des Macchabées constitue depuis sa restauration un très bel exemple de style néo-Gothique.

La cathédrale n'abrite pas moins de 45 cloches réparties entre les 2 tours et la flèche. C'est dans la tour nord que se trouvent la plus grosse, La Clémence, et La Bellerive. La Clémence est fondue par le magister campanarum genevois Guerri de Marclay (qui travaillera également au château de Ripaille pour le compte du duc Amédée VIII de Savoie) et baptisée par l'évêque Jean de Lornai le 25 octobre 1407. D'un poids de 6 tonnes, La Clémence protège Genève du démon et des fléaux par ces prières :

La Clémence :

Laudo Deum Plebem voco, convoco clerum,
Defunctos ploro, pestem fugo, festa decoro,
Vox mea cunctorum est terror doemoniorum.

Je proclame au Peuple la Parole de Dieu, je convoque le clergé,
Je pleure les défunts, je mets en fuite la peste, j'anime la fête,
Ma voix plus que tout est la terreur des démons.

C'est L'Éveil, L'Espérance, La Collavine, La Bellerive et L'Accord qui forment la volée qui se fait entendre le samedi soir et le dimanche matin pour annoncer le culte. Lors des grandes fêtes religieuses et civiles, elles sont complétées par La Clémence.

Le 1er carillon de la cathédrale date de 1749. Il comportait alors 8 timbres et jouait 7 airs différents, un pour chaque jour de la semaine. Restauré en 1850 puis à nouveau en 1897, il cesse définitivement de fonctionner en 1930. Le carillon actuel de Saint-Pierre fut construit en 1931 en collaboration par la Fonderie Rüetschi d'Aarau et la Maison Paccard d'Annecy-le-Vieux. Cet instrument comportait jusqu'à son agrandissement en 2011 19 cloches (la3 puis chromatique de si3 à mi5) auxquelles s'ajoutait la Cloche des Heures (mi3) . De nos jours, le carillon comporte 37 cloches (mi3, la3 puis si3 à la6) et peut être joué soit par le carillon automatique de l'horloge, soit par un carillonneur. Chaque mois, une mélodie différente est jouée automatiquement toutes les heures du jour et de la nuit. Ces mélodies sont des chants patriotiques, traditionnels ou religieux.

Depuis le 22 février 1536, la tradition veut qu'une cloche de la cathédrale, L'Accord, sonne pour appeler les députés en séance. Ainsi, l'article 11 alinéa 1 de la loi portant règlement du Grand Conseil indique qu'« une cloche de Saint-Pierre annonce la session 2 heures avant son ouverture » . C'est pourquoi trente coups (un par minute) retentissent le 1er jour de la session, entre 15h00 et 15h30.

...

À travers les siècles, la cathédrale est toutefois davantage qu'un lieu de culte. Elle remplit notamment des fonctions civiles et accueille encore tous les 4 ans l'assermentation du Conseil d'État, du pouvoir judiciaire et des magistrats communaux. Mais la cathédrale est surtout l'illustration vivante de l'influence que Genève a eue sur le monde protestant comme lieu du refuge aussi bien que comme académie formant les pasteurs de toute l'Europe.

Un site archéologique, installé dans le sous-sol à la suite des campagnes de fouilles, est ouvert en 1976 par l'archéologue cantonal Charles Bonnet. Plusieurs espaces ont été spécialement aménagés et présentent, avec des techniques muséographiques renouvelées en novembre 2006, l'un des plus vastes sites archéologiques d'Europe, au nord des Alpes. Le parcours archéologique commence ainsi au IIIe siècle avant Jésus-Christ et s'achève avec l'édification de l'actuelle cathédrale entreprise au XIIe siècle.

Au cœur de la cité de Genève, la cathédrale s'inscrit désormais dans un espace spirituel et culturel : outre la cathédrale, on trouve désormais à proximité le musée international de la Réforme situé au rez-de-chaussée de la maison Mallet construite à l'emplacement de l'ancien cloître de la cathédrale. Légèrement en retrait, l'Auditoire de Calvin, autrefois lieu d'enseignement du réformateur Jean Calvin, complète cet ensemble.

La Fondation des Clefs-de-Saint-Pierre joue un rôle essentiel dans la mise en valeur et la conservation du monument.

La cathédrale orientale et même l'archaïque rotonde trouvée sous les fondations de cette dernière ne sont pas, à cet endroit, les 1ers monuments dédiés aux défunts. Au contraire, cet espace a une très longue histoire qui tient ses racines en l'an 100 avant Jésus-Christ, lorsqu'un chef allobroge, vraisemblablement idolâtre par le petit groupement qui se tenait à cette époque sur la colline genevoise, est inhumé sous un tumulus préhistorique datant de 1150 avant Jésus-Christ.

Dès lors, une succession d'édifices et de bâtiments commémoratifs se dressent à cet endroit dominant le port et les environs. De sorte qu'au Ier siècle, un temple en bois est construit par-dessus la tombe du chef et l'on creuse un trou pour avoir accès à son crâne. Suivant l'incendie du quartier après l'urbanisation Romaine, une terrasse commémorative s'édifie en souvenir d'un personnage extraordinaire à qui l'on rend un culte, comme à un héros. C'est le début du culte funéraire qui, sur ce site, traversera les âges. Enfin au IVe siècle, une église paraît sur l'emplacement sanctifié, toujours dévolue au culte du souvenir. C'est là la dernière trace d'un mausolée miniature (le groupe épiscopal étant bâti à cet endroit et tout le quartier rénové) avant la découverte d'une rotonde datant de ce siècle.

Les aménagements liturgiques de la cathédrale orientale ne sont ainsi qu'une addition à une longue histoire funéraire d'un lieu mythique. Le chœur de ces édifices gardent jusqu'à nos jours les restes légendaires de ce chef allobroge qui reposait sous le chœur de la cathédrale actuelle.

157 marches mènent au sommet de la tour nord de la cathédrale et au panorama à 360° sur la ville et le lac Léman alors que la tour sud compte 150 marches.

Genève

La soumission Romaine du pays des Allobroges (Vienne) intervient dès 121 avant Jésus-Christ. Genève devient alors un poste avancé au nord de la province de la Gaule transalpine (prendra le nom de Gaule narbonnaise à partir du règne d'Auguste) . L'aménagement d'un port intervient en 123-105 avant Jésus-Christ. La ville est alors constituée d'une modeste agglomération où les habitations sont bâties en bois et en torchis. Genève entre dans l'histoire en l'an 58 avant Jésus-Christ, lorsque Jules César mentionne son passage dans cette cité (Genua) dans son « De Bello Gallico » . Voulant empêcher le passage des Helvètes, César coupe le pont sur le Rhône. Lorsque César s'installe provisoirement avec ses troupes en l'an 58 avant Jésus-Christ, l'oppidum s'agrandit encore devient dès lors une ville Romaine (« vicus puis civitas ») . Pourtant, Nyon (Colonia Julia Equestris) puis Avenches (Aventicum) occupent une place plus importante dans le réseau urbain régional. Après un incendie au milieu du 1er siècle, l'urbanisme est modifié et les constructions en pierre remplacent les édifices en matériaux légers. Les migrations alémanes provoquent la destruction de l'ensemble bâti dans le dernier quart du IIIe siècle.

Le 1er sanctuaire chrétien est établi aux environs de l'an 350. À la fin du IVe siècle, le complexe est achevé : il est constitué d'une église de plus de 30 mètres de long bordée par un portique d'accès vers le baptistère et son annexe. Dans la ville haute, l'église Saint-Germain représente au Ve siècle un second point de focalisation des Iers temps chrétiens. L'installation des Burgondes en 443 et le choix de Genève comme capitale renforcent le rôle politique de la ville. Le centre du royaume burgonde se déplaçant vers l'an 467 à Lyon, Genève subit les guerres fratricides entre Godégisel et Gondebaud qui incendie la ville. Jusqu'à la fin du Haut Moyen-âge, on observe une continuité d'occupation dont le meilleur exemple est le groupe épiscopal. Les limites de la cité se maintiennent à l'intérieur de l'enceinte du Bas-Empire mais les faubourgs proches des grands cimetières se développent. L'effondrement de la montagne du Tauredunum en l'an 563 provoque un raz-de-marée qui détruit le port et fait de nombreux morts. Au début du Moyen-âge, succédant au développement horizontal propre à l'époque Romaine, l'espace urbain se réduit et se densifie en donnant une ville médiévale de plus en plus bâtie en hauteur sous les contraintes imposées par l'édification des fortifications.

La structure du pouvoir entre l'arrivée des Burgondes et le traité de Seyssel de 1124 fait l'objet de débats qui ne sont pas clos aujourd'hui. En face du roi burgonde, l'évêque possède l'autorité spirituelle. Mais les querelles dynastiques affaiblissent la monarchie burgonde qui disparaît en l'an 534 au profit des Francs. Genève devient alors le centre d'un pagus, le Comté de Genève, qui dépend du roi régnant à Orléans ou du roi de Neustrie. Dès l'époque des Carolingiens, le diocèse de Genève est l'enjeu de luttes de pouvoir entre les souverains de la région et l'Empereur. Lors du Partage de Verdun en 843 entre les 3 fils de Louis I le Débonnaire, Genève entre dans le royaume dévolu à Lothaire, qui deviendra la Lotharingie. En l'an 855, un nouveau partage a lieu par le Traité de Prüm entre les 3 fils de Lothaire. À cette occasion, Genève, Lausanne et Sion passent sous la souveraineté du fils aîné Louis II, roi d'Italie et Empereur. En 875, à la mort de Louis II, le diocèse de Genève passe sous la souveraineté de son oncle Charles le Chauve, qui le donne en apanage à son fils-aîné Louis le Bègue, futur roi des Francs de l'an 877 à l'an 879. Le 15 octobre 879 est créé le royaume de Bourgogne ou royaume de Provence des Bivinides (879-928) , dont Genève devient partie intégrante, avec l'élection par une assemblée de notables de Boson, beau-frère de Charles le Chauve et Comte d'Autun, duc du Lyonnais et de la Provence. En l'an 888, à la mort de Boson, alors roi de Provence et Bourgogne transjurane, se crée un nouveau royaume de Bourgogne, le royaume de Bourgogne transjurane des Welf (888-1032) avec la proclamation de Rodolphe Ier de Bourgogne (859-911) . L'évêque de Genève fait partie des prélats jurant fidélité à Rodolphe à l'abbaye territoriale de Saint-Maurice d'Agaune. Rodolphe est de la famille des Welfs, seigneurs de la Haute-Bourgogne ; il épouse Willa, fille de Boson. L'évêché de Genève fait ainsi partie du royaume de Bourgogne transjurane pendant 250 ans à la tête duquel se succèdent Rodolphe II, Conrad le Pacifique, son fils, puis Rodolphe III de Bourgogne, son fils. Celui-ci meurt en 1032 et selon sa volonté, le royaume de Bourgogne devient possession de Conrad le Salique, Empereur du Saint-Empire Romain germanique. Leur souverain devenant plus lointain, tous les évêques successifs de Genève se battraient sans relâche pour faire reconnaître leurs droits régaliens, particulièrement face aux ambitions des comtes de Genève, seigneurs des terres alentour. Ainsi, s'il exerce un certain nombre de droits régaliens comme celui de battre monnaie, l'évêque ne reçoit pas les droits comtaux dans l'une ou l'autre partie de son diocèse qui sont exercés par le Comte de Genève qui possède un château au-dessus du Bourg-de-Four.

Avec la réforme Grégorienne, à la fin du XIe siècle, commence une réaction contre les empiètements du seigneur laïc sur les biens de l'Église. Soutenu par le pape, l'évêque Humbert de Grammont impose au Comte Aymon Ier le traité de Seyssel qui établit la souveraineté de l'évêque sur la cité. Par des lettres patentes datées du 17 janvier 1154 à Spire, l'Empereur Frédéric Barberousse investit l'évêque de Genève Arducus de Faucigny (1135-1185) des droits régaliens de la cité et confirme à lui et à ses successeurs tous les biens actuels de la dite Église et tous ceux qu'elle pourra acquérir. Ces lettres établissent définitivement l'indépendance des évêques désormais reconnus comme princes immédiats de l'Empire. Une Bulle du pape Adrien IV confirme cet état le 21 mai 1157. Après une tentative de mise en cause d'Amédée IV, Comte de Genevois en septembre 1162, les droits de l'évêque de Genève sont confirmés par une Bulle d'or de l'Empereur. Au début du XIIIe siècle intervient un 3e pouvoir : celui de la maison de Savoie. Le Comte de Savoie s'empare en 1250 du château du Bourg-de-Four. Au milieu du XIIIe siècle, les marchands et artisans se regroupent pour lutter contre la puissance seigneuriale de l'évêque. Ce mouvement est favorisé par les foires de Genève qui, à partir du milieu du XIIIe siècle, apportent aux citoyens l'exemple des communes libres d'Italie et la prospérité qui leur permet d'imposer leurs volontés à l'évêque. Dès la fin du siècle, le Comte de Savoie s'attaque au pouvoir épiscopal.

En 1285, les citoyens désignent 10 procureurs ou syndics pour les représenter. La décision est annulée par l'évêque le 29 septembre mais, le 1er octobre, le Comte Amédée V leur accorde des lettres patentes garantissant la sécurité des marchands se rendant aux foires. En 1309, l'évêque reconnaît aux citoyens le droit de constituer des syndics ou procureurs pour traiter leurs affaires communes à condition qu'ils n'empiètent pas sur la juridiction épiscopale. En contrepartie, il leur impose la construction d'une halle, nécessaire à l'entreposage des marchandises destinées aux foires, et leur en assure le tiers des recettes. Dès lors, les citoyens, assemblés au début de chaque année au sein du Conseil général, élisent pour un an les syndics de Genève. En 1387, l'évêque Adhémar Fabri confirme les franchises accordées aux citoyens et à leurs syndics par une charte qui dominera pendant 150 ans la vie politique genevoise. Les comtes de Savoie s'arrogeant de plus en plus de pouvoir au détriment de l'évêque, les citoyens font front avec l'évêque contre l'ennemi commun. Mais Amédée VIII de Savoie, qui a acquis le comté de Genève, obtient pour les princes de sa maison un droit de présentation au diocèse : le siège épiscopal sera occupé par des Savoie ou des membres de familles vassales.

Engagée par son évêque aux côtés du duc de Bourgogne dans la guerre de Bourgogne, Genève est menacée par les Suisses après leur victoire et condamnée en 1475 à payer une amende importante. L'évêque se tourne alors vers les vainqueurs et conclut, le 14 novembre 1477, avec les villes de Berne et Fribourg un traité de combourgeoisie pour 5 ans. En 1519, c'est la communauté des citoyens qui signe avec Fribourg un traité de combourgeoisie mais le duc de Savoie contraint les Genevois à renoncer à cette alliance dirigée contre lui. Toutefois, le traité de 1526 entre Genève, Berne et Fribourg annonce la fin du pouvoir de l'évêque et l'émergence d'une seigneurie autonome. Les Eidguenots, partisans des Confédérés, font approuver le traité par le Conseil général le 25 février.

Dès 1526, des marchands allemands propagent à Genève les idées de la Réforme luthérienne parmi les commerçants genevois ; la même année, Genève signe un traité de combourgeoisie avec Berne et Fribourg. Sous l'influence de Berne, Genève accepte de laisser prêcher des prédicateurs dans la ville, dont Guillaume Farel en 1532. Le 10 août 1535, la célébration de la messe catholique est interdite et, le 26 novembre, le Conseil des Deux-Cents s'attribue le droit de battre monnaie à sa place alors que la ville est à nouveau menacée par la Savoie. La Réforme est définitivement adoptée le 21 mai 1536 en même temps que l'obligation pour chacun d'envoyer ses enfants à l'école. Genève devient dès lors le centre du calvinisme et se trouve parfois surnommée la « Rome protestante » .

Arrivé à Genève en juillet 1536, Jean Calvin aura une influence immense, en tant que président de la Compagnie des pasteurs, sur tous les aspects de la vie genevoise. Mais le nombre de ses opposants augmente, suite à l'écriture des « Confessions de foi », 21 articles que Farel et Calvin entendent faire signer à tous les citoyens et bourgeois genevois, quitte à les excommunier s'ils refusent. Le mécontentement est tel que Calvin devra s'exiler à Strasbourg en 1538, avant de revenir en 1541 lorsque la république est proclamée sous le nom de « Seigneurie de Genève » ; il en rédige alors les Ordonnances ecclésiastiques, puis les Édits civils en 1543 qui sert de constitution à cette nouvelle république. Les institutions politiques comprennent : le Conseil général (où siègent les membres de la bourgeoisie de Genève) , le Conseil des Deux-Cents et le Conseil des Soixante. Les affaires religieuses étant du ressort du Consistoire.

Dans le contexte politique et géographique, Genève se trouva isolée de son seul allié Suisse : Berne. En 1579, Genève bénéficia d'une protection grâce au traité de Soleure qui engageait les cantons de Berne et Soleure (cantons protestants) , associés à la France.

Dès son avènement en 1580, les attaques du duc Charles-Emmanuel Ier de Savoie se multiplient. Genève étend alors son alliance avec Soleure, Zürich et la France. En avril 1589, les Genevois et leurs alliés tentent de faire reculer les Savoyards qui parviennent à maintenir leur position.

Le 11 décembre 1602, la nouvelle attaque nocturne des Savoyards, défaite restée dans l'histoire sous le nom d' « Escalade », contraint le duc à accepter une paix durable scellée par le traité de Saint-Julien du 12 juillet 1603 qui reconnaît l'indépendance de la cité. Sur le plan économique, de nombreux protestants italiens mais surtout français doublent la population durant les années 1550 et donnent un nouveau dynamisme à la ville. Ces nouveaux venus, hommes d'affaires, banquiers ou artisans, apportent de l'argent et des relations avec les milieux d'affaires étrangers et développent le rôle de relais commercial de Genève. Les activités manufacturières implantées par leurs soins (soierie dont les Maîtres sont Italiens, dorure et horlogerie après la disparition de la soierie au milieu du XVI^e siècle) se développent pour la 1^{re} fois à l'exportation grâce au soutien que leur accordent les autorités municipales.

Le siècle, économiquement et culturellement florissant, est secoué par des troubles politiques que les contemporains appellent les « révolutions de Genève ». En effet, le système politique en place repose sur la distinction entre 2 groupes : ceux qui bénéficient des droits politiques et civils, aristocrates et bourgeois qui restent minoritaires (27 % en 1781) , et ceux qui n'ont pas de droits politiques et seulement certains droits civils (habitants et natifs) . C'est toutefois à l'intérieur du groupe formé par les citoyens et les bourgeois que la lutte finit par éclater.

Un mouvement de révolte éclate en 1707 en raison d'un mécontentement d'ordre économique. La révolte a pour chef un membre de l'aristocratie, l'avocat Pierre Fatio, qui fixe un programme aux aspirations confuses. Le soulèvement échoue grâce à l'appui de troupes bernoises et zurichoises et Fatio fusillé secrètement en prison. En 1737, une nouvelle révolte provoque 11 morts. Vaincu, le gouvernement alerte la France qui intervient par un arbitrage satisfaisant pour les citoyens. Pourtant, démentant le certificat de tolérance décerné par l'Encyclopédie de Diderot et d'Alembert, le Petit Conseil condamne en 1762 2 ouvrages de Rousseau (Émile ou De l'éducation et Du Contrat social) à être brûlés devant l'Hôtel de ville parce que « tendant à détruire la religion chrétienne et tous les gouvernements » . Les citoyens protestent en présentant au gouvernement des plaintes désignées sous le nom de « représentations » . Les bourgeois et les natifs finissent donc par occuper la ville en février 1781 et votent une loi octroyant l'égalité civile aux natifs, aux habitants et aux sujets de la campagne.

Mais l'aristocratie appelle Louis XVI à l'aide : 3 armées coalisées (française, sarde et bernoise) assiègent Genève qui capitule le 2 juillet 1782. L'aristocratie retrouve le pouvoir mais les natifs conservent l'égalité civile. Un millier de Représentants s'exilent vers Paris (où leurs idées participeront à la Révolution française) , Bruxelles ou Constance. La fin de la haute conjoncture économique entre 1785 et 1789, conséquence de la crise générale qui marque la période précédant la Révolution française, frappe la population par une hausse des prix mais aussi les petits patrons. Le 26 janvier 1789, le gouvernement genevois augmente le prix du pain suite à une mauvaise récolte. Cette décision déclenche une émeute à Saint-Gervais qui conduit à l'annulation de la hausse et à la libéralisation progressive de la constitution.

Après la Révolution, l'encerclement de Genève par les révolutionnaires a pour résultat, en décembre 1792, un mouvement qui abat le gouvernement de l'Ancien Régime, le 28 décembre, et proclame l'égalité politique de toutes les catégories de la population. En 1793, l'Ancien Régime prend fin à Genève : une constitution, rédigée par une assemblée nationale et votée par les citoyens le 5 février 1794, institue un contrôle étendu de la part des citoyens sur les actes du gouvernement et de l'administration.

L'économie genevoise est alors dominée avec 32 % des actifs par le secteur de l'horlogerie et ses métiers annexes regroupés sous le nom de « Fabrique » , réseau de petits ateliers artisanaux situés à l'étage supérieur des bâtiments. Par ailleurs, le secteur textile voit se développer une industrie des indiennes (caractérisée par de grandes manufactures) dans le 1er tiers du siècle pour devenir le second secteur en termes d'importance. Liées au développement du commerce international et aux besoins d'argent pour les guerres de Louis XIV, les activités bancaires deviennent l'un des pivots de l'économie genevoise à partir de 1700.

Le 15 avril 1798, le traité de Réunion intègre Genève au territoire de la République française. Fin août, après avoir renoncé à sa souveraineté et à ses alliances, Genève est choisie comme préfecture et chef-lieu du département du Léman. Genève devient alors une ville française parmi d'autres et ses habitants font l'expérience du centralisme napoléonien. Mais la défaite de l'armée napoléonienne lui rend son indépendance. Le 30 décembre 1813, la garnison française quitte la ville et le général autrichien Ferdinand von Bubna und Littitz y fait son entrée. Le lendemain, après le retrait définitif du préfet, un gouvernement réactionnaire dirigé par l'ancien syndic Ami Lullin proclame la restauration de la république de l'Ancien Régime. Cependant, les magistrats sont conscients que Genève ne peut plus former un État isolé et se tournent vers les anciens alliés suisses en demandant l'entrée de la république dans la Confédération suisse. Malgré la crainte des catholiques suisses face à la « Rome protestante » et aux troubles qu'elle a connus au XVIIIe siècle, le rattachement est effectif le 19 mai 1815.

En 1833 et 1834, les grèves des tailleurs et des serruriers sont parmi les grèves du XIXe siècle en Suisse et, en novembre 1841, une émeute a pour conséquence l'élection d'une assemblée constituante. La constitution de 1842 adopte le suffrage universel masculin et dote la ville de Genève d'institutions municipales propres. Toutefois, la guerre du Sonderbund finit par entraîner la chute du régime. Le 3 octobre 1846, les autorités refusent de recommander aux membres genevois de la Diète fédérale de voter la dissolution du Sonderbund. Le quartier ouvrier de Saint-Gervais se soulève en conséquence, 2 jours après, et repousse les troupes gouvernementales. C'est le déclenchement d'une révolution de gauche menée par le Parti radical de James Fazy qui renverse le gouvernement et établit une nouvelle constitution le 24 mai 1847 qui supprime notamment le caractère dominant du protestantisme.

Sur le plan économique, la ville ouvre en 1850 la 1re bourse des valeurs de Suisse. L'industrialisation de la région évolue, avec l'apparition d'ateliers de mécanique, d'appareillages électriques et d'automobiles, alors que l'électrification de la cité se fait sous l'impulsion du conseiller administratif Théodore Turretini avec la construction des usines des Forces motrices et de Chèvres. Par ailleurs, la venue toujours plus massive d'ouvriers étrangers achève de transformer la physionomie sociale de l'agglomération. Alors qu'au début du XIXe siècle, on peut encore distinguer un campagnard d'un citadin, les différences s'estompent progressivement et la population présente un visage toujours plus cosmopolite.

La mission internationale de la ville s'affirme particulièrement après la Première Guerre mondiale : elle devient (notamment par l'action de Gustav Ador et William Rappard) le siège de la Société des Nations en 1919.

Dans le sillage de la Première Guerre mondiale, la lutte des classes s'accroît et conduit à la grève générale du 11 novembre 1918 dirigée depuis la Suisse alémanique. Mais la francophilie ambiante réduit grandement son impact à Genève. Des petits partis d'inspiration fasciste, comme l'Union nationale, attaquent les leaders socialistes le 9 novembre 1932, ce qui entraîne une manifestation de la gauche anti-fasciste. À cette occasion, de jeunes recrues tirent sans sommation sur la foule faisant 13 morts et 63 blessés. Cette tragédie engendre, quelques jours plus tard, une nouvelle grève générale en signe de protestation.

...

Le 1er établissement retrouvé dans la région de Genève, après l'ère glaciaire, se situe à Saint-Gervais sur la rive droite et date de l'an 4,500 à 4,000 avant Jésus-Christ. Durant le Néolithique, les 1ers villages s'installent autour de la rade et s'étendent partiellement sur l'eau durant l'âge du bronze, défendus par des palissades. Une nouvelle agglomération naît sur la terre ferme à la fin du IIe siècle avant Jésus-Christ, mais on ne peut parler de ville qu'à partir de 122 avant Jésus-Christ. Elle devient l'un des points militaires et commerciaux les plus importants aux confins de l'empire suite à la conquête de la Gaule par les Romains. Vers le milieu du 1er siècle avant Jésus-Christ, de larges fossés sont creusés autour d'une citadelle, avec en contrebas un quartier d'artisans et un petit sanctuaire. Après le passage de Jules César, de grands entrepôts, un édifice public et des habitations sont construits près du port et conforte l'idée du rôle de Genève comme un point commercial important.

Un grand bâtiment est construit au 1er siècle en haut de la pente du lac ; cette résidence n'a pas cessé de s'agrandir jusqu'au IVe siècle et devait appartenir à l'un des hauts personnages de la ville.

Suite au passage des Alamans en l'an 260 et 277 et les destructions qu'ils amènent, Genève connaît une période de renouveau. Elle se fortifie grâce à un système de terrasses au centre de la cité entourée d'une enceinte fortifiée. Le grand bâtiment résidentiel est ensuite ré-organisé : on installe le chauffage dans l'une des pièces et des bases de pilier permettent de penser qu'il existait un second étage. Dès le début du IIIe siècle, Genève redevient le centre régional qu'elle était et sera choisie comme siège épiscopal.

Fribourg

7 septembre 1880 : Anton Bruckner arrive le matin à Fribourg. Il touche l'orgue de la cathédrale Saint-Nicholas. Il assistera ensuite à un récital donné par l'organiste Johann Vogt qui interprétera, en autres, la Toccata en ré mineur de Jean-Sébastien Bach.

Bruckner mentionne dans son journal personnel : « Pedal only to C. I played after the concert. »

A judgment on the cathedral organ in Freiburg seemed to him more important than crossing Lake Geneva ; he dedicated more time to a reminiscence about Rudolf von Habsburg than to the Lucerne sunset which he found « magnificent » . « Miss Babette » , sister of the « hôtelier » Schreiber in Kussnacht, impressed him just as much as the more massive natural beauties ; as did a « Miss Wisbauer » , a « hôtelier » 's daughter from Salzburg whom he met on the return journey and found « very pretty » .

...

L'orgue de Saint-Nicolas, construit en 1834, deviendra mondialement célèbre. Cet instrument de 61 jeux répartis sur 4 claviers (dont un Écho donnant sur le narthex) et pédale est évoqué dans d'innombrables textes de voyageurs (George Sand et Franz Liszt, Harriet Beecher-Stowe, Louis Spohr et bien d'autres) et représente une synthèse fort originale entre le style français et allemand, entre les éléments de facture « Classique » et « Romantique » .

C'est en 1425 qu'est attestée pour la 1re fois la présence d'un orgue sur sol fribourgeois. L'instrument, œuvre de Conrad Belius, se trouvait dans le chœur de l'église des Cordeliers, à Fribourg. Toutefois, seuls des éléments d'instruments datant de la 1re partie du XVIIe siècle sont encore conservés : le buffet et les ornements de l'orgue de chœur de la Collégiale d'Estavayer-le-Lac provenant de Saint-Nicolas de Fribourg, œuvre de Niklaus Schönenbühl (1600-1668) d'Alpnach (de la tuyauterie ayant fait partie probablement de cet instrument subsiste dans le positif reconstruit de l'abbaye de la Fille-Dieu près de Romont) , ou encore le buffet principal de l'orgue de l'abbaye de la Maigrange près de Fribourg, construit en 1648-1649. Un matériel plus conséquent provenant d'instruments de la 2e partie du XVIIe siècle subsiste encore. Ainsi de l'orgue de chœur de Sebald Manderscheidt (1620-1685) de Nuremberg qui remplaça celui de Schönenbühl en 1655-1657, le buffet, la façade, le clavier du grand-orgue (avec feintes brisées) et une part importante de la tuyauterie ont été conservés. Un autre instrument de ce facteur, un positif de pédale construit vers 1667 aujourd'hui dans la chapelle de l'Hôpital des Bourgeois à Fribourg, a été sauvegardée à l'exception de la régale de pédale. Ce sont toutefois essentiellement les orgues du XIXe siècle qui constituent la principale richesse du paysage organistique du canton de Fribourg, en particulier les instruments d'Aloys Mooser (1770-1839) que la construction des grandes orgues de Saint-Nicolas (en 1834) rendra mondialement célèbre.

...

Fribourg (en allemand : « Freiburg » , en patois fribourgeois : « Friboua ») est une ville et une commune suisse du canton de Fribourg, sur la Sarine. C'est la capitale du canton de Fribourg et le chef-lieu du District de la Sarine. Le nom de Fribourg provient directement de l'allemand frei- (libre) et -burg (ville) , littéralement ville libre, c'est-à-dire disposant de libertés, de franchises. En allemand, la ville s'appelle aussi Freiburg im Uechtland, Fribourg en Nuithonie, pour la distinguer des autres Fribourg (Fribourg-en-Brisgau notamment) . Nuithonie ne semble cependant pas avoir une signification particulière ni désigner une région précise.

Fribourg est située de chaque côté de la Sarine sur le plateau suisse à la frontière culturelle entre la Suisse Alémanique et Romande. Elle est un important centre économique, administratif et éducatif et comprend une Université. Elle est placée sous le patronage de Saint-Nicolas de Myre, de Sainte-Barbe et de Sainte-Catherine d'Alexandrie.

Fribourg est située à l'ouest du plateau suisse qui constitue l'une des 3 principales aires géographiques de la Suisse, à 28 kilomètres au sud-ouest de Berne, la capitale fédérale, elle occupe une position majeure sur l'axe est-ouest d'importance nationale. Au pied des préalpes fribourgeoises, distantes d'une quinzaine de kilomètres, elle communique par l'ouest du plateau vers Genève et la France, par l'est du plateau vers la vallée du Rhin et l'Europe centrale. À vol d'oiseau, Fribourg se trouve à 100 kilomètres de Genève, 120 kilomètres de Zürich et 90 kilomètres de Bâle.

Fribourg est située à la frontière linguistique entre le français et l'allemand depuis le Haut Moyen-âge. Située à environ 600 mètres d'altitude, la ville est caractérisée par un relief très accidenté. Le point le plus bas de la ville (au bord de la Sarine) est à 541 mètres d'altitude tandis que le point le plus haut (la colline du Guintzet) culmine à 691 mètres.

On distingue ainsi 4 étages d'implantation qui ne correspondent pas forcément à la chronologie de leur fondation. De bas en haut, on a ainsi : les quartiers de l'Auge et de la Neuveville appelés Basse-ville (altitude moyenne : 550 mètres) , le quartier du Bourg au sommet des falaises (altitude moyenne : 580 mètres) , les quartiers des Places, de Pérolles, du Jura et de Bourguillon (altitude moyenne : 630 mètres) et les quartiers du Schœnberg et de Beauregard (altitude moyenne : 670 mètres) .

La ville de Fribourg s'étend sur les 2 rives de la Sarine, un affluent de l'Aar. La Sarine ayant creusé son cours dans la molasse du plateau, il en résulte un cours très sinueux avec de profondes gorges. Fribourg a été fondée sur un méandre surplombant la rivière. Du fait de l'implantation de la ville sur un relief particulièrement accidenté et de part et d'autre de la Sarine, de nombreux ponts ont été construits depuis le Moyen-âge jusqu'à nos jours.

Fribourg a été fondée sur une terrasse surplombant la Sarine en 1157 par le duc Berthold IV de Zähringen. En voyage dans la région, sans doute pour mettre de l'ordre dans ses possessions et tenant compte d'un « ensemble de considérations politiques, militaires, géographiques et économiques » , Berthold IV choisit une terrasse surplombant la Sarine, afin d'y établir une ville « nouvelle » qu'il fortifie : Fribourg (de l'allemand frei « libre » et Burg « lieu fortifié » , nom provenant des libertés octroyées par le fondateur et à rapprocher de celui de Fribourg-en-Brisgau) .

En 1218, à l'extinction de la famille des Zähringen, la ville passe sous la domination des Kybourg, puis elle est vendue en 1277 à la famille des Habsbourg, avant d'être cédée à la Maison de Savoie en 1452. Devenue quasi indépendante lors des Guerres de Bourgogne, la ville obtient l'immédiateté Impériale en 1478. En 1481, Fribourg entre dans la Confédération suisse.

La ville originelle correspond au quartier actuel du Bourg. Il est formé de 2 rues parallèles reliées par des petites ruelles ; cela correspond au quadrillage typique des villes fondées par les Zähringen. Très rapidement, au XIIIe siècle, la ville s'étend aux quartiers de l'Auge et de la Neuveville (au bord de la Sarine) d'une part, aux quartiers des Places (rue de Lausanne et rue de Morat) d'autre part. Le dernier agrandissement notable a lieu en 1390 ; il englobe les quartiers d'Alt et de la rue de Romont et le faubourg de la rue de Morat. L'enceinte édifiée à ce moment-là délimitera la ville jusqu'au milieu du XIXe siècle.

Ville francophone et catholique enclavée dans le canton de Berne protestant, elle s'allie avec la France, constituant notamment l'essentiel de la Garde suisse du roi de France avec qui elle a un contrat exclusif de louage de mercenaires. Suite à la Révolution de 1789, 3,700 (sur une population de 5,000 habitants) religieux et aristocrates français émigrent à Fribourg. Certains y pratiquant la contre-révolution en essayant de ruiner la révolution par des faux assignats. Alors qu'une partie de ces réfugiés retournent en France sous la Restauration, d'autres s'installent définitivement.

2 événements vont provoquer de nouvelles extensions de la ville de Fribourg : l'arrivée du chemin de fer en 1862 et la création de l'Université en 1889. Plusieurs faubourgs sont créés : les quartiers de l'avenue de la gare, de Gambach, de Miséricorde, de Beauregard et de Pérolles en 1903. En 50 ans, la population de Fribourg passe de 9,000 à 20,000 habitants.

Bien que dominée par le style Gothique, notamment dans la vieille ville, l'architecture de Fribourg est intéressante à plus d'un titre. Elle recèle en effet des exemples intéressants de plusieurs périodes historiques. Le centre historique regroupe de nombreuses maisons Gothiques, notamment dans le quartier de l'Auge, à la rue d'Or. Certaines de ces maisons datent de la fondation du quartier au XIII^e siècle. De cette période datent encore entre autres la cathédrale Saint-Nicolas, les fortifications de la rive droite, l'Hôtel-de-Ville, l'ancienne commanderie de Saint-Jean et le chœur de l'église des Cordeliers. L'architecture de style Renaissance est magnifiquement représentée par l'Hôtel Ratzé, à la rue de Morat et par les fontaines de la vieille ville, édifiées au XV^e siècle. De l'époque Baroque, il faut mentionner les maisons patriciennes de la Grand-Rue, l'ancien corps de garde (à côté de l'Hôtel de Ville) ainsi que plusieurs églises dont l'église de la Visitation, le couvent des Capucins, le collège et l'église Saint-Michel et l'ancien hôpital des Bourgeois.

La cathédrale Notre-Dame de Lausanne

6 septembre 1880 : Anton Bruckner visite la ville de Lausanne. Le Maître a pu faire sonner le vieil orgue de la cathédrale Notre-Dame de Lausanne en présence de l'organiste en résidence, Louis Daniel Delessert.

Une note personnelle du journal de Bruckner mentionne :

« Lausanne Cathedral. Viewed at 7:00 in the morning. Rudolf of Habsburg (whose castle was seen on the left during the trip from Zürich to Geneva) was present at the consecration. »

Les nouvelles grandes orgues de la cathédrale Notre-Dame de Lausanne ont été inaugurées en décembre 2003 et forment un instrument unique au monde, tant par leur conception que par leurs caractéristiques techniques (styles Classiques et Symphonique Français ; Baroque et Romantique allemands) . L'organiste titulaire est Jean-Christophe Geiser, professeur au Conservatoire et HEM de Lausanne.

Un orgue unique au monde ! Les nouvelles orgues Fisk de la cathédrale de Lausanne, inaugurées en décembre 2003, constituent une prouesse musicale et technologique.

10 ans d'étude et de réalisation, 2 concours internationaux, 7,000 tuyaux, 5 claviers et pédalier, 2 consoles.

Le 1^{er} orgue au monde à avoir été dessiné par un designer (Giugiaro) .

Le 1^{er} orgue à contenir les 4 principaux styles de la facture d'orgues : Classique et Symphonique Français, Baroque et Romantique allemands.

Le 1^{er} instrument construit par une manufacture américaine (Fisk) dans une cathédrale en Europe.

Une réalisation internationale, puisque des entreprises de Suisse, des États-Unis, du Canada, d'Italie, d'Angleterre et d'Allemagne ont participé à sa construction.

Un coût total de 6 millions de francs.

150,000 heures de travail.

...

Construite au XIII^e siècle sur la colline de l'ancienne Cité, la cathédrale Gothique de Lausanne s'ouvre sur la ville et le bassin lémanique. Bâtie en molasse, la cathédrale de Lausanne fut édifiée en plusieurs étapes : un 1^{er} Maître d'œuvre érigea dès 1170 le déambulatoire. 20 ans plus tard, un nouveau Maître d'œuvre corrigea l'implantation, modifia la composition et construisit l'église actuelle jusqu'en 1215.

Jean Cotereel, 3^e Maître d'œuvre, poursuivit le chantier en bâtissant le massif occidental, le dotant d'un porche et de 2 tours, dont l'une porte le beffroi et l'autre ne sera jamais achevée. Le portail peint fut ajouté sur la façade sud vers 1225-1235.

La cathédrale Notre-Dame de Lausanne est un bâtiment édifié en pierre de taille (molasse), de style majoritairement Gothique, commencé sous l'épiscopat de Landry de Durnes, entre 1160 et 1178, et achevé vers le milieu du XIII^e siècle, soit à l'époque où la région, exceptée la ville qui dépendait de l'évêché, était rattachée au comté de Savoie. Elle fut consacrée à la Sainte-Vierge Marie sous le vocable « Notre-Dame » le 20 octobre 1275 en la présence du pape Grégoire X, de l'évêque de Lausanne Guillaume de Champvent et de l'Empereur Rodolphe de Habsbourg. Son plan inhabituel, avec l'abside légèrement inclinée par rapport à l'axe de la nef, devait en effet reproduire Marie penchant la tête sur son enfant. Au Moyen-âge, elle fut ainsi un haut-lieu de pèlerinage marial : 70,000 personnes environ s'y rendaient chaque année pour vénérer la statue miraculeuse de la Vierge, alors que Lausanne ne comptait que quelque 7,000 habitants.

La construction de la cathédrale Notre-Dame eut lieu de 1170 à 1235 (environ). C'est la grande époque des constructions de cathédrales en Europe occidentale : l'une des plus célèbres, celle de Chartres (1194-1220), est ainsi contemporaine de la cathédrale de Lausanne. Si les 1^{ers} travaux furent effectués dans le style Roman, les Maîtres d'œuvre successifs adoptèrent très rapidement pendant les décennies qui suivirent le style Gothique, plus conforme à l'évolution de l'architecture du temps.

L'anti-pape Félix V y fut intronisé le 23 juillet 1440.

À l'arrivée des Bernois et avec l'adoption de la Réforme protestante, l'édifice fut dédié en 1536 au culte calviniste. Il connut à cette époque des déprédations importantes, dont notamment la destruction du cloître et de la plupart du mobilier précieux du chœur et des chapelles : citons le retable d'argent peint du Maître-autel et surtout la statue miraculeuse en argent doré de la « Vierge trônant avec l'Enfant » (XIII^e siècle) donnée par l'évêque Benoît de Montferrand (1476-1491), dont seuls les 2 angelots sculptés qui se tenaient à ses côtés ont survécu (Musée d'histoire de Berne). Ces 2 pièces majeures furent fondues en juin 1537 à Berne.

L'église du Saint-Rédempteur à Lausanne possède cependant une copie assez fidèle du XVe siècle de cette statue, en bois polychrome, sauvée par les chartreux de la Valsainte. Les 12 statues en argent des apôtres du narthex ont également été fondues. Quant au Maître-autel de marbre noir poli de Saint-Triphon, il fut emporté en hiver 1561 à la Collégiale protestante Saint-Vincent de Berne où il se trouve aujourd'hui encore. Les riches tapisseries furent également confisquées (Musée d'histoire de Berne) . Enfin, le jubé en marbre noir (seules 7 colonnes ont subsisté) ainsi que la plus grande partie des stalles sculptées furent détruits dans le 1er tiers du XIXe siècle. L'ensemble de la statuaire en pierre fut par contre bien conservé. Il reste même des vestiges de polychromie architecturale à l'intérieur (notamment dans la chapelle Notre-Dame) et, surtout, dans le « portail peint » (XIIIe siècle) dont la restauration des statues polychromes fut achevée en 2007. Le bâtiment est inscrit comme bien culturel suisse d'importance nationale.

Dès 1874, l'édifice a fait l'objet d'une restauration conduite par l'architecte Eugène Viollet le Duc, dont ce fut le dernier chantier (l'architecte mourut d'ailleurs dans la ville en 1879) . Un nouveau cycle de restauration de l'édifice est lancé au début des années 2010 pour une durée de 5 ans et un coût de 20 millions de francs ; la tour inachevée, le chœur et la toiture de la cathédrale sont en particulier concernés par ces travaux.

Au flanc sud de la cathédrale Notre-Dame, le portail peint constitue un joyau de la statuaire médiévale. Ancien et Nouveau Testament encadrent le couronnement de la Vierge. L'originalité du portail peint tient tant dans la conservation (relative) du décor polychrome que dans la position modeste de la Vierge, la part belle étant faite au Christ en Gloire. C'est par cette entrée latérale que les milliers de pèlerins entraient dans l'édifice, alors que d'habitude, c'est la porte principale (en bout de nef) qui est utilisée.

Il a fallu près d'un siècle de travaux pour restaurer le portail peint et le rendre au public, avec une protection issue des plus récentes techniques architecturales. Les responsables de la restauration ont décidé de ne pas reproduire artificiellement toute la polychromie originale, en partie disparue, mais de préserver et renforcer celle qui subsistait.

Rose

Les structures lapidaires de la rose de la cathédrale Notre-Dame furent mises en œuvre vers 1205, soit antérieurement aux roses de Chartres. Ses vitraux du XIIIe siècle qui sont presque intégralement préservés participent largement de la renommée de la cathédrale. En forme de Mappa Mundi, Pierre d'Arras les a peints entre 1231-1235. Un dessin de la rose se trouve dans le recueil de Villard de Honnecourt de 1270.

7 septembre 1880 : Anton Bruckner ira entendre l'organiste Johann Nikolaus Vogt, à l'église Saint-Nicolas de Fribourg.

7-8 septembre 1880 : Sur le chemin du retour, Anton Bruckner se rend à Berne. Sur place, il visite le Palais fédéral, l'Ours, la Tour de l'Horloge, et rencontre l'organiste de la cathédrale, Johann Jacob Mendel, qui lui offre de toucher l'instrument. Son jeu suscite alors la plus grande admiration.

La « Hofkirche » de Lucerne

8-10 septembre 1880 : Anton Bruckner visite la ville de Lucerne. Le Père Ambros Meyer relié au monastère cistercien de Saint-Urbain, professeur de musique et titulaire, depuis le 15 août 1866, des grandes orgues de l'église de Sankt Leodegar (Saint-Léger) de la Cour de Lucerne sera l'hôte du Maître de Saint-Florian lors de son court séjour. La « Hofkirche » de Lucerne est un édifice absolument superbe dans lequel on trouve de très nombreuses œuvres d'art des 16e, 17e et 18e siècles.

Le grand-orgue de « Sankt Leodegar » est un instrument majeur en Europe, de par son ampleur et son histoire. Sa construction par le facteur Johann Geissler de Salzbourg débuta dès 1640. De 1858 à 1862, le facteur Friedrich Haas reprit cet orgue en l'agrandissant à 70 jeux avec un Fernwerk. Après une intervention de Friedrich Goll en 1899, la 1re restauration avec, notamment, la restitution du Positif de dos revient à la Manufacture suisse Kuhn et date de 1976-1977. Les jeux se montent alors à 81 en tout. Une plus récente intervention (montant l'instrument à 84 jeux) de la maison Kuhn date de 2000-2001.

Grands Orgues de tribune, à traction électro pneumatique : Johann Geissler facteur de Salzbourg, 10 années de construction, 1640-1650 ; Hass, 1862 ; Goll, 1887, 1898-1889 ; Kuhn, 1977, 1999, 2001, 2009. 5 claviers manuels (6 divisions) et pédalier ; 103 jeux ; 144 rangs ; plus de 5,900 tuyaux et une division de Fernwerk ; tuyaux de 32 pieds placés juste au-dessus du lutrin et des claviers de l'organiste.

Petit orgue de chœur, à traction mécanique des claviers et des jeux : Thomas Sylvester Walpen, 1842-1844, 1853 / Manufacture suisse Kuhn, 2003. 2 claviers manuels et pédalier ; 27 jeux ; 35 rangs ; 1,137 tuyaux.

...

Suite à un incendie dévastateur en l'année 1633, la « Hofkirche » fut nouvellement érigée, dans un style Baroque. Après avoir eu 2 orgues de chœur (1637-1642), elle a pu abriter sur sa tribune ouest un orgue aux proportions monumentales pour l'époque, construit entre 1640 et 1652, comprenant 2 claviers et pédalier avec 42 jeux sonnants. C'est le Maître facteur d'orgues Johann Geisler de Salzbourg qui l'avait construit avec un projet émanant de son homonyme, Niklaus Geisler de Lucerne. Sa particularité subsiste toujours : il a en façade le plus gros des tuyaux de Montre existant, le 1er do du Principal 32' (longueur : 970 centimètres, diamètre : 57 centimètres).

Outre de nombreuses interventions et modifications, dans les années 1867-1862 une transformation radicale suivit, effectuée par Friedrich Haas. Il modifia cet orgue Baroque pour en faire un orgue de concerts, Romantique. Le Positif séparé a été supprimé, les sommiers à gravures ont été remplacés par des sommiers à cônes avec une nouvelle traction mécanique munie de machines Barker, un clavier d'Écho (« Fernwerk ») situé dans les combles de l'église a été ajouté. Il ne restait simplement de l'ancien orgue que son buffet imposant, avec sa tuyauterie de façade, et environ une quinzaine de jeux. En particulier, tous les jeux gambés et harmoniques ainsi que les anches furent des jeux neufs. Le « reconstruteur » a été triomphalement félicité, tout comme le constructeur, Maître Geisler, l'avait été plus de 2 siècles auparavant. La biographie de l'orgue ensuite se réduit. En 1895, la maison Goll l'a pneumatisé puis électrifié en 1942. « L'Orgelbewegung » avait bien fait sentir que les spécialistes n'auraient bientôt plus d'intérêt pour de tels instruments, alors que les traditionnels concerts évoquant le célèbre « Orage » s'oubliaient de plus en plus. C'est ainsi que des plans se sont élaborés après 1970 avec une dure polémique qui s'élevait : les uns voulaient revenir à l'état de 1652, les autres retrouver celui de Haas et d'autres ne voulaient faire effectuer que des réparations. C'est finalement la majorité qui a eu gain de cause, voulant prudemment avancer pour faire faire un orgue contemporain avec cependant l'obligation de conserver toute la substance existante provenant de l'instrument Baroque, et d'intégrer partiellement dans le nouvel orgue des éléments du 19e siècle, encore utilisables. Cette conception trouvait aussi l'accord des Monument Historiques.

Dès ce moment, notre rôle principal a été de finaliser un projet aussi technique que concret, tenant compte des idées de base, des désirs. Le Positif serait reconstruit même sur une tribune en balustrade ne retrouvant pas ses dimensions originales. L'emplacement des 3 claviers manuels et de la Pédale ne serait pas strictement dicté par des données historiques, mais par l'espace nécessité par de nouveaux sommiers à coulisses à traction mécanique. Le 5e clavier, l'Écho (« Fernwerk ») serait retravaillé dans un sens restauratif. Ce clavier possède maintenant toujours son sommier à cônes, mais sa traction a été électrifiée. Le travail le plus difficile, à côté du choix des tailles, fut celui de l'harmonisation. Il fallait créer une ambiance sonore homogène à partir de ce qui appartenait à l'époque Baroque de 1662, à l'état Romantique de 1862, à l'apport de jeux modernes, compléments de 1977.

En 2001, un ajout s'est fait pour l'Écho. 3 jeux à anches libres entreposés depuis 1977 et qui provenaient de l'orgue de Friedrich Haas datant de 1862 ont été replacés dans son espace sonore, son canal de résonance. Il s'agissait d'un Physharmonica 8', d'une Clarinette 8' et d'un Basson 16'. Ces 3 jeux ont été disposés sur un nouveau sommier à cônes dans une boîte d'expression séparée agissant en parallèle avec celle de l'autre sommier de ce clavier, avec de même une traction électrique. Le Basson est jouable à la Pédale (30 notes) et les autres jeux sur le 5e clavier. Les jeux ou partie des jeux qui n'ont pas été utilisés en 1977, provenant de Geisler ou de Haas, sont entreposés dans les combles de l'église.

...

Un monastère fondé au 8e siècle se trouvait originalement sur le site de l'église. La règle bénédictine est adoptée au 9e siècle. Ayant appartenu à l'abbaye de Murbach en Alsace vers 1135, le monastère est vendu à la Maison de Habsbourg au 13e siècle. En 1332, Lucerne entre dans la Suisse primitive. L'église sera construite sur les fondations d'une ancienne Basilique Romaine qui a brûlé en l'an 1633, au soir du dimanche de Pâques. Le trésor est sauvé ainsi que quelques œuvres d'art majeures. La reconstruction, dans le style de la Renaissance italienne : l'un des chefs-d'œuvre de ce style dont on peut admirer le pays helvético-suédois. Il fallut 6 ans pour la construire. Elle a été achevée en l'an 1639 et est la seule église qui se trouvait au nord des Alpes, à la fin de la guerre de 30 Ans. Au 18e siècle, l'intérieur sera Baroquisé. Au début du 17e siècle, le nonce apostolique séjourne à Lucerne et utilise, pour quelques années, la « Hofkirche » comme Cathédrale. Actuellement, la « Hofkirche » représente l'église principale catholique de Lucerne, à la tête de 7 autres paroisses de l'agglomération lucernoise. Elle est toujours l'un de des monuments les plus emblématiques de la ville.

Cette vaste et sublime église est consacrée à Sankt Leodegar (Saint-Léger) . Leodegar fut évêque d'Autun en France en l'an 663. Il fut d'une grande bonté, d'une grande fermeté. À la mort du roi Dagobert, l'Occident est partagé en 4 royaumes et Clovis II, l'un des Iers rois fainéants, régna sur la Neustrie et la Bourgogne. À la mort de Clovis II, la reine fut nommée régente des 3 royaumes : Neustrie, Bourgogne, Austrasie. Elle appela Leodegar auprès d'elle pour ses conseils, pour sa sagesse et sa bonté. Grâce à son influence, elle abolit l'esclavage dans lequel les Gaulois étaient tenus. Une révolution de Palais amena Ebroïn au pouvoir. Cet homme, ambitieux et sans scrupules, voulut se débarrasser de Leodegar. Ebroïn entreprit donc le siège d'Autun avec une armée. Pour épargner les habitants, Leodegar se livra à l'ennemi à condition que les habitants soient épargnés. Ebroïn s'empara de Leodegar et le supplicia en forêt voisine (langue arrachée, yeux crevés, lèvres coupées) . Demeuré en vie, on l'enferma dans un monastère où il vécut dans la prière et la souffrance. Finalement, il fut égorgé. Sa tombe est dans un bois près d'Arras. La fête de Sankt Leodegar est célébrée le 2 octobre.

Quelques dates fondamentales de la « Hofkirche » de Lucerne :

735-736 : Ire mention d'un monastère dédié à Saint-Maurice.

800 : Crise dans le monastère.

850 : Reprise du monastère et adoption de la règle bénédictine.

1135 : Le monastère dépend de l'abbaye de Murbach (Alsace) .

1291 : L'abbaye de Murbach vend le monastère de Lucerne à la Maison de Habsbourg.

1332 : Entrée de Lucerne dans la Suisse primitive.

1455-1456 : Le monastère de Lucerne dépend de l'évêque de Constance. Au début du 17e siècle, le nonce apostolique séjourne à Lucerne et utilise, pendant quelques années, la « Hofkirche » comme Cathédrale. La Paroisse catholique de la « Hofkirche » est fondée au 19e siècle.

1633 : Au soir du dimanche de Pâques, la « Hofkirche » brûle. Le trésor est sauvé ainsi que quelques œuvres d'art majeures.

1644 : Consécration de la nouvelle église.

1742 : La décoration intérieure est Baroquée.

1859-1862 : Ire restauration du lieu.

Plusieurs interventions de restauration eurent lieu avant la rénovation remarquable achevée en 2001 (y compris le grand-orgue) .

Le fameux autel de style Gothique tardif (vers 1500) , représentant Marie sur son lit de mort, fut sauvé de l'incendie de 1633. Entièrement doré, il est d'une splendeur exceptionnelle et d'une très grande rareté. C'est cet autel qui a été équipé, à l'origine, de l'orgue de chœur du facteur Thomas Sylvester Walpen.

La façade de la « Hofkirche », de style Renaissance tardif, est exceptionnelle. Elle porte les représentations de l'Archange Saint-Michel, de Saint-Léger et de Saint-Maurice.

Le chœur est fermé par une grille magnifique, comportant des effets de perspective, qui date de 1641-1643. C'est l'œuvre de Johann Reiffel. Les stalles superbes, difficilement visibles (car sous clef) qui datent, elles, de 1639-1642 furent réalisées par Niklaus Geisler.

Les flancs des bancs de la nef (aussi de Niklaus Geisler) sont sculptés à la main et datent de 1638.

Clôture de la plate-forme où se dresse l'église : Après l'incendie dévastateur de 1633, on décida d'entourer la Hofkirche d'une importante galerie couverte (datant de 1641) dans un style rappelant sensiblement les constructions de style italien toscan (milieu du 17^e siècle) . Cette galerie, très fleurie et soigneusement entretenue, abrite de nombreuses tombes privées mais aussi de personnages célèbres locaux comme : Bernhard Fleckenstein, 1659 ; Rudolf Mohr, 1701 ; le théologien Hans Urs von Balthasar.

L'abbaye cistercienne de Saint-Urbain a été fondée en 1194 par des moines de l'abbaye de Lucelle en Alsace, avec l'appui de familles de barons de Haute-Argovie. L'abbaye est un édifice d'importance nationale, impressionnant témoin de l'architecture et de la culture Baroque et Cistercienne au XVIII^e siècle. Les édifices médiévaux, malgré de multiples rénovations et agrandissements, ne répondant plus aux besoins des moines, ceux-ci prièrent l'architecte du Vorarlberg, Franz Beer, de construire un tout nouveau monastère, au cours de la 1^{re} moitié du XVIII^e siècle. La vie monacale prit fin en 1848 d'une manière inattendue : afin d'honorer la dette de guerre du Sonderbund, le canton de Lucerne ordonna la suppression du monastère. Après avoir connu de multiples fonctions, la majeure partie des anciens bâtiments est aujourd'hui affectée à des buts culturels. Les stalles de l'église jouissent d'une reconnaissance internationale. L'abbaye s'est affirmée au cours de son histoire comme le centre religieux et spirituel, territorial et économique de cette région frontière, entre les cantons de Berne, Soleure, Argovie et Lucerne.

La région de Lucerne a été habitée depuis les temps pré-historiques. Après la chute de l'Empire Romain, les Aléman s'y installèrent, et quelques monastères apparurent avant l'an 1000. La fondation de la ville de Lucerne se situe entre 1180 et 1200. En 1332, Lucerne est la 1^{re} ville à rejoindre la Confédération des 3 Cantons, bien qu'elle se soit battue aux côtés des Habsbourg lors de la bataille de Morgarten.

...

9 septembre 1880 : Bruckner s'arrête à Rigi, la « Reine des montagnes » .

11 septembre 1880 : Bruckner repasse par Munich. Il va ensuite arrêter quelques semaines à Saint-Florian.

27 septembre 1880 : Toujours à Saint-Florian, Bruckner termine le 1er mouvement de sa 6e Symphonie, commencé il y a 1 an. Les mouvements centraux sont considérés comme une réalisation musicale de ses impressions de la Suisse : l'Adagio sera achevé le 22 novembre à l'Université de Vienne ; et le Scherzo, lui, le 17 décembre 1880.

Pendant ce dernier périple, le journal personnel de Bruckner indique une longue liste de noms de jeunes filles qu'il avait interpellées au passage. Si la candidate était perçue comme digne et honnête pour devenir son épouse, il tendait l'oreille. Ensuite, il essayait d'obtenir plus d'informations sur son caractère, sa famille et la dotte. À maintes reprises, il ira jusqu'à demander à un proche de faire une enquête approfondie. Il voulait s'assurer que la bien-aimée possède suffisamment d'argent pour garantir la viabilité du mariage. Il prenait également en considération la possibilité qu'advenant son décès, il n'aurait aucune obligation à son égard. Bien sûr, les femmes légères demeureront jusqu'à la fin de sa vie un symbole de péché et de damnation.

Sexe et religion : le « cas » Bruckner

Nul doute que son physique peu engageant fut pour beaucoup dans les échecs successifs de ses passions amoureuses. Et pourtant, ce célibataire « prisonnier » sera hanté jusqu'à la mort par l'idée du mariage ; mariage qu'il proposait à des femmes de plus en plus jeunes.

La personnalité complexe et ambivalente d'Anton Bruckner a toujours laissé entrevoir la crainte de la sexualité et de la relation intime. Son désengagement face à l'amour physique est fort indicateur de son angoisse (inconsciente) d'anéantir la pulsion créatrice, au profit d'une relation stable et durable avec une adolescente sans défense, toujours vierge de surcroît, qui n'a rien à voir avec la complicité d'un couple uni, arrivé à maturité. En ce sens, l'abstinence promulguée par le Catholicisme, dont Bruckner est un fervent dévôt, se veut un gage de succès dans la carrière qu'il poursuit.

Chaque fois que l'adversité s'acharnait contre lui, Anton Bruckner trouvait dans la musique le refuge le plus efficace, et aussitôt sa détresse se muait en espérance. La force de ce génie était telle que bien rares sont dans son œuvre les pages pessimistes ou se concluant sur une note de défaite : on ne citerait guère comme significatif que le 1er mouvement de la 8e Symphonie dans sa version remaniée. Au contraire, il trouvait toujours des accents d'une beauté pénétrante, et lors même qu'il exprimait, comme dans ses Messes, la Passion du Christ, ou comme dans ses Symphonies la sienne propre, il donnait à l'humanité une leçon de courage, de noblesse et d'amour.

Anton Bruckner reste donc un authentique Romantique dans la mesure où son œuvre ne se concevait pas en dehors des épreuves humaines de sa vie, dont elle est le reflet fidèle et immédiat. En 1867, une grave crise nerveuse nécessite son hospitalisation à Bad-Kreuzen. Il caractérise lui-même son cas : surexcitation extrême mêlée à un sentiment de total abandon. Ce n'est pour lors ni la médecine ni la seule prière qui le sauvèrent : contre l'avis formel de la Faculté, il se remit à composer et esquissa à l'hôpital même le Kyrie de la Grande Messe en fa mineur, la plus remarquable de toutes celles qu'il écrivit.

Ainsi, dans le 1er cas, la composition d'une Messe est occasionnée par un conflit psychique où la religion n'a pas une part directe ; dans le 2e (sa rupture avec Marie Bartl) , un autre drame intérieur est résolu dans une forme purement Symphonique, mais avec des accents mystiques. Cette interpénétration entre musique profane et musique sacrée trouve son expression pratique dans le fait qu'il n'est pas rare qu'un même thème fournisse, à la fois, la matière d'un mouvement Symphonique et d'un verset de Messe, et cela indifféremment dans un ordre ou dans l'autre. À la limite, il n'est pas interdit de considérer que la plus belle Messe jamais écrite par Anton Bruckner fut en réalité ... sa 5e Symphonie, voire sa 9e ! (Paul-Gilbert Langevin)

Carved Holiness : Anton Bruckner and the women

(By Peter Androsch.)

Anton Bruckner finds himself catapulted out of the afterlife back into this life. The Lord requires him to remain here until he is purged through an encounter with a woman, so that he can finally be admitted to Heaven. A time machine beams him into the present, where he is confronted with the here and now of our time. As Bruckner is subjected to the extreme influences of our day and age, the authentic geography of his soul becomes visible for the 1st time : his sensitivity, brusqueness and ineptness, his attempted overtures and the rejections suffered, his abstinacy ; in short, all that is meant by a love life.

Here, his music is only of marginal interest.

« There is no burden worse than the hope of attaining happiness. » (Carlos Fuentes)

« Eroticism is the smooth transition from decency to indecency. » (Kurt Krenn)

Bruckner's search for a worthy wife proved fruitless in spite of innumerable advances, because he would not permit himself the saving grace of eroticism.

If Bruckner had allowed this (« obsessively Catholic and pubescently religious » as he was (Thomas Bernhard in : « Alte Meister ») , he would have robbed himself of this greatest desire : a marriageable Immaculate-Mary.

Bruckner held one fundamental belief that no amount of desire was ever allowed to threaten.

Hôtel-restaurant des « 3 Houes »

Située au 28 de la « Singerstraße » dans le 1er arrondissement de Vienne (1010) .

Téléphone : + 43 (0)1 512 58 95 .

Télécopieur: + 43 (0)1 810 33 09 .

gasthaus@zuden3hacken.at

Pour un « Wiener schnitzel » (le plat typique de la ville) , rendez-vous au « Gasthaus zu den 3 Hacken » . Plusieurs spécialités y sont servies.

...

Cozy, small-scale, and charming, the « inn » known as « Gasthaus zu den 3 Hacken » (Tavern of the 3 Hatchets) is the oldest one in Vienna. It is lovingly maintained, and serves utterly contemporary foods and wines at their best.

Illustrious artists such as Franz Schubert, Franz von Schober, Johann Nepomuk Nestroy, Leopold Kupelwieser, Therese Krones or Moritz von Schwind frequented this « inn » , sipped their favourite beverages or worked on drawings and sketches. They, too, knew that « The 3 Hatchets » is a great place to wile away the hours and eat well. Little has changed beneath the antique arched vaulting since those days of age-old tradition. The cuisine has remained Classic, yet, presented in perfection at a very high-level of quality : after all, how can you improve on a succulent roast pork with cabbage and dumplings ; « sauté » kidneys with parsley potatoes ; or « horse-cabby's goulash » accompanied by « sauté » sliced dumpling, sunny-side-up egg, sausage and cucumber ? It's a fact, you can still eat here just they way they did in Schubert's day, except that the wines are now far better, and unfold in rich variety. That is the special domain of Josefine Zawadil, the patroness, who is also a wine merchant at the nearby « Drei Hacken Magazin » shop. There, you can poke your way through shelf upon shelf of wines to select the one which speaks to you, then drink it at the inn, alongside Viennese dishes rippling with panache.

...

The 18th Century tavern called « Gasthaus zu den 3 Hacken » with green wooden shutters and green wooden outdoor tables and chairs is typical of traditional taverns. (I always find it amazing to have that kind of neighbourhood eatery at a 5 minutes walk from « Kärntnerstraße » shopping boulevard.)

Every one of the 4 small rooms is special in its own way : wooden floor boards and walls full of historic drawings of local places and old portraits of local celebrities, newspapers stuck into traditional newspaper holders hanging from the walls, an old radio, and the kind of wood carved chandeliers my grandfather used to make in his Vienna studio.

Finally, we settled for a lovingly decorated side room which had just enough space for 2 tables, and a wide green painted wooden window opening to the street. It was like having lunch at my grandparents' summer village in the Vienna Woods.

« Zu den Drei Hacken » serves fine Austrian food, from Vienna roast to « Gulasch » , « Wiener Schnitzel » to « Tafelspitz » . There are always a few dishes with a modern twist on the menu, such as polenta strudel with mushrooms. Most of the time, you will also find seasonal specialities such as wild garlic, mushroom and asparagus dishes.

The Vienna roast, served with dumplings and « sauerkraut », was excellent, as were my wild garlic dumplings and my husband's « gulasch ». With Viennese cuisine, it's easy to cook a hearty meal, but challenging to lighten-up the calories and create a fresh taste. The « chef » had really done her job in that sense.

...

As we headed for « Zu den Drei Hacken » at « Singerstraße » 28, in Vienna's 1st District, all we were looking for was the cosy atmosphere of an old Viennese « Beisl », its traditional cuisine, and its low-key comfort. No one had mentioned that it came with legends.

In fact, as it turned-out, the « Drei Hacken » is not only one of the oldest restaurants in Vienna, but was the favourite haunt of the « crème de la crème » of Vienna's Biedermeier Bohemian inner-circle (« Bie-Bos », ancestors of the « Bo-Bos ») . Composer Franz Schubert gathered his talented circle of friends - painters Leopold Kupelwieser and Moritz von Schwind as well as lyricist and actor Franz von Schober to share culinary pleasures. Playwright and actor Johann Nepomuk Nestroy mentioned the restaurant in one of his notorious songs (a preferred tool to spice-up his plays with sarcastic word play) and, thereby, paved the way to the restaurant's unfading fame.

Entering the Biedermeier world, we fell into its old « Beisl » charm ; 4 small dimly lit rooms with vaulted low ceilings branched-out to each side, scattered wooden tables covered in white linen, dark wooden chairs and worn benches - all hallmarks of Viennese « Gemütlichkeit », which combines simplicity with the cosiness of wooden interior. Above the waist-high wall panelling were paintings and lithographs of street scenes interrupted by busts of (or course !) the Emperor Francis Joseph II and our old friend Franz Schubert, placed with highest respect, in the « Schubertstüberl » dedicated especially to his honour.

Seated in the midst of this engaging decor, I had to force myself to concentrate on the menu, which offered a wide range of Viennese Classics : clear soup with semolina dumplings (« Grießnockerlsuppe ») ; a small soup pot with vegetables, noodles and beef (« Altwiener Suppentopf ») ; or boiled beef in aspic with onions and pumpkin oil (« Tafelspitzsülz mit Zwiebelringen und Kürbiskernöl ») as « entrées » ; and, as main course, veal scallop bread crumbed and fried with potato-green-salad (« Kalbswienerschnitzel mit Erdäpfel-Vogerlsalat ») or boiled rump with chive and apple sauce with horseradish and roast potatoes.

The wine flowed, and the appetiser arrived, we divided an « Altwiener Suppentopf », and while we were spooning-up the broth, the balance of spices a pleasure in itself, Ms. Parker and I tried to overhear the conversation of a French couple « en face » - a difficult mission, as it turned-out, as the ear-piercing voice of a fellow Austrian in between lecturing on Viennese culture to his apparently German friends drowned-out all other sounds. But, whoever thinks that the « 3 Hacken » is an overly touristy place is mistaken. Natives and tourists are joined (on separate tables) in animated chatter and Lucullian joy.

However, eventually, hunger won over distracting curiosity. Ms. Parker fell for duck with Bohemian dumplings, artfully embedded in a pool of red cabbage, whereas my Viennese self selected the traditional Hungarian-rooted « goulash » of veal with « Nockerl » (gnocchi-shaped pasta) joined in delicious harmony, both dishes in refreshing simplicity served on ordinary white plates.

« Paßt alles ? » (meaning « paßt alles » in proper German / Austrian ; « Is everything alright » ?) , asked our waiter in unmistakable Viennese slang and a pleasing nonchalant attentiveness - a hallmark of Viennese « Gemütlichkeit » . Yes, everything was alright, the duck juicy, the veal tender, for us a time to surrender.

But what surrender is complete without the soothing taste of alcohol. The wine had, as it was our habit on these occasions, the agony of choice from well-assorted and entirely Austrian vineyard offerings ; among these, we found a « Grüner Veltliner 2008 Federspiel, S. Donabaum, Spitz » from the renowned Austrian wine region Wachau, Chardonnay 2008, a Cuvée Tridendron 2005, a « Triebaumer, Gerhard Markowitsch, Göttlesbrunn » or a Saint-Laurent Selection 2006, Netzl.

For a luscious dessert, maybe a Classic like « Mohr im Hemd » (Hazelnut « soufflé » with chocolate and whipped cream) or Apple Strudel with cream.

...

Das Gasthaus zu den 3 Hacken im 1. Wiener Gemeindebezirk, Singerstraße 28, zählt zu den ältesten Gaststätten Wiens. Das traditionsreiche Restaurant wurde unter anderem von Franz Schubert, Moritz von Schwind, Johann Nestroy und Therese Krones besucht.

Das Gasthaus befindet sich in einem Wiener Altbau und besteht aus mehreren heimeligen Gaststuben. In der wärmeren Jahreszeit steht den Gästen ein begrünter Schanigarten zur Verfügung. Im Jahr 2009 wurde das Lokal für seinen vorbildlichen Schanigarten mit dem Goldenen Schani ausgezeichnet.

Die Küchenangebot repräsentiert die klassische Wiener Küche. Das Gasthaus bekennt sich zur österreichischen Weintradition, was sich im beachtlichen Weinangebot widerspiegelt.

Schwesterbetrieb des Gasthauses zu den 3 Hacken ist das in unmittelbarer Nähe befindliche 3 Hacken Magazin (Restaurant und Weinshop) in der Riemergasse 14. Im angeschlossenen Weinshop « Vinum » lagern rund 1000 Weine.

...

7 octobre 1880 : Le 1er mouvement de la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner est donné pour la 1re fois à Vienne, dans un arrangement pour piano à 4 mains.

9 octobre 1880 : De retour à Vienne, Bruckner appliquera lors d'un concours pour le prestigieux poste d'assistant-chef de chœur du « Wiener Männergesang Verein » (Société chorale masculine de Vienne) , un ensemble réputé, de très haut calibre. Il essuiera un refus.

Durant cette même période, une anomalie sérieuse se développe au niveau de ses pieds et de ses jambes ; ce qui n'aide en rien le moral du compositeur.

22 ou 23 octobre 1880 : Hans Rott goes insane while traveling, urging another passenger not to light his cigar because Rott is under the delusion that Johannes Brahms has filled the train with dynamite. Rott spends the rest of his short life in an asylum, where he continues to compose and uses his manuscripts for toilet paper, saying :

« That's what human works are worth. »

A surviving page of the opening of « Hochzeitstück » (Wedding-piece) , the original Part 3 of « Das Klagende Lied » , is dated : « end of October or beginning of November »

1er novembre 1880 : Gustav Mahler announces in a letter to his friend Emil Freund that the composition of the Cantata, « Das Klagende Lied » , has been completed.

Novembre 1880 : Parmi les élèves de Bruckner au Conservatoire durant ce semestre, citons ...

Johann Evangelist Aichinger, Otto von Liebig, J. Schnabl et Rudolf Steiner.

10 novembre 1880 : Ire transcription (rédigée sur place) d'une conférence d'Anton Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne par le futur père bénédictin, Raffael (« Oddo ») Loidol.

28 novembre 1880 : Le Ministre autrichien de l'Éducation et de la Culture annonce au professeur Anton Bruckner de l'Université de Vienne (âgé de 56 ans) , l'octroi d'une rémunération annuelle de 800 Florins (« Gulden ») pour ses leçons. Le compositeur atteint enfin une certaine sécurité financière.

Mais cette sécurité, Anton Bruckner l'a chèrement gagnée. Il enseigne 2 fois par semaine à l'Université ; 16 heures par semaine au Conservatoire ; et donne 12 cours privés par semaine. Les fins de semaine n'existant pas à cette époque en Allemagne et en Autriche, son travail quotidien s'élève à 5 heures par jour. Pour un total de 30 heures d'enseignement par semaine. Il s'agit d'une charge énorme, même pour un enseignant ordinaire, sans grande réputation. Alors on peut s'imaginer ce que cela représente pour un compositeur de génie qui arrive difficilement à joindre les 2 bouts.

Les leçons de musique sont souvent le pire ennemi de l'inspiration. Lorsqu'on demanda à Bruckner comment une belle mélodie pouvait soudainement lui venir à l'esprit, il répondit :

« Elle arrive par elle-même pendant que je déguste mon plat préféré. » .

...

Johannes Brahms, compositeur fier et très sûr de lui qui connaît beaucoup de succès, siège sur le Conseil d'administration de la Société Amis de la Musique qui administre le Conservatoire de Vienne.

Anton Bruckner le traite avec tout le respect (et les courbettes ...) que l'on accorde à un artiste important et célèbre.

Les cercles Libéraux de Vienne encense les prises de position « conservatrices » de ce musicien d'Allemagne du nord (Hambourg) alors qu'ils dénoncent son opposant « moderne » de la Haute-Autriche (Saint-Florian) . Brahms était toujours celui qui allumait la mèche ...

« Bruckner, un pauvre nigaud, un malheureux fou que les moines de Saint-Florian ont sur la conscience. » (Johannes Brahms)

« Herr Brahms me traite presque de manière injurieuse. » (Anton Bruckner)

L'Hôtel du « Hérisson Rouge »

« L'Hôtel du Hérisson Rouge » (« Gasthof Zum Rothen Igel ») au I « Wildpretmarkt » servit de bastion aux militants démocrates, lors de la Révolution d'octobre 1848. Il se trouve juste à côté de la « Maison du Hérisson Rouge » (« Haus zum Roten Igel ») qui va abriter, à partir de 1831, l'ancien Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique sis au n° 558 (qui deviendra plus tard le n° 12) de la rue « Tuchlauben » , dans le 1er arrondissement de Vienne.

Une porte cochère donne facilement accès au café-restaurant de l'Hôtel qui devient, très tôt, un important lieu de rencontre pour les artistes (dont le peintre autrichien Moritz von Schwind) , les musiciens (Franz Schubert, Robert Schumann et Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy) , les professeurs et les étudiants du Conservatoire (sans oublier les habitués de sa bibliothèque) . Convivialité et conversations passionnées sont accompagnées de café, de repas succulents, de bière et d'alcool. Pour Johannes Brahms, le « Hérisson Rouge » représentait sa seconde demeure viennoise. Il refusera obstinément de manger ou de boire n'importe où ailleurs.

« Sur le chemin du retour de l'Hôtel du " Hérisson Rouge " ou de l'Hôtel " Kochschule " , Brahms arrêta régulièrement se détendre au Chalet du parc municipal de Vienne. Je l'ai rencontré en compagnie du docteur Münz. Le compositeur était assis à une petite table de marbre sur la grande terrasse, sirotant un café agrémenté d'un verre de cognac. Il scrutait impatientement les quotidiens fixés à un bâton : c'est la façon viennoise de faire. » (Le compositeur et pianiste polonais Sigismond Stojowski, 1870-1946.)

Conformément à ses habitudes et à sa personnalité, Johannes Brahms eut une vie relativement calme, si on le compare à certains acteurs et musiciens célèbres de son époque. Son quotidien à Vienne était tout ce qu'il y a de plus routinier. Un lève-tôt, il prenait un café très noir accompagné de quelques petits pains sucrés. Après ce petit-déjeuner simple mais satisfaisant, il composait toute la matinée et parfois, en après-midi. Comme son prédécesseur Ludwig van Beethoven, Brahms adorait faire de longues promenades en après-midi, aux alentours de Vienne. L'un de ses endroits de prédilection était le parc du « Prater » qui attirait beaucoup de visiteurs depuis la tenue de l'Exposition universelle de 1873. (La fameuse « Grande Roue » sera érigée 1 ou 2 années après sa mort.)

L'artiste spécialisé dans les silhouettes, Otto Böhlér, immortalisera le compositeur Johannes Brahms en train de se promener, fumant le cigare, croisant son petit animal favori : le hérisson rouge (qui finira par symboliser son caractère « épineux ») .

L'inauguration le 6 janvier 1870 de la nouvelle salle du « Musikverein » sur la « Karlplatz » ne viendra pas compromettre la survie du « Hérisson Rouge » car les habitués de l'endroit resteront fidèles.

Anton Webern, originaire de Klagenfurt, arrive à Vienne en 1902. Il étudie la composition auprès d'Arnold Schönberg à partir de 1904. Lui aussi deviendra un fervent client du « Hérisson Rouge » .

L'Hôtel va devoir fermer ses portes en 1906. La démolition du bâtiment sera rendu nécessaire à cause de la mise en chantier du futur Pavillon de l'École polytechnique de l'Université de Vienne (par l'architecte Franz Riess) amorcé dès 1904. On peut voir sur le haut de son mur extérieur (arrondi) à l'intersection des rues (au 8 de la « Brandstätte ») , un écusson en relief qui nous rappelle qu'il s'agissait bien du site de l'ancien Hôtel et de sa célèbre icône : le « Hérisson Rouge » .

Dans le même ordre d'idée, l'immeuble où Johannes Brahms vécut à Vienne pendant les 26 dernières années de sa vie fut curieusement démoli sans aucun scrupule, exactement 10 ans après la date de sa mort (en 1897) .

Le pratique et confortable Hôtel « Amadeus » situé au 5 « Wildpretmarkt » bénéficie d'une place stratégique dans le 1er arrondissement de Vienne (A-1010) , à proximité de la cathédrale de Saint-Étienne et du Palais Impérial. Il est implanté à quelques minutes de marche de l'Opéra national de Vienne et des principales salles de concert (le « Musikverein » et le « Konzerthaus ») . L'édifice moderne et rectiligne fut érigé sur l'ancien site historique de l'Hôtel du « Hérisson Rouge » (« Gasthof Zum Rothen Igel ») .

...

Anton Bruckner was good and naive enough to become set-up by the viennese newspapers as an anti-Semite, which could only damage him. One day, at « The Red Hedgehog » Restaurant-Hotel (« Gasthof Zum Rothen Igel ») , just when he had again been denounced in the newspaper as an anti-Semite, he met Doctor Königstein, the critic of the « Illustriertes Wiener Extrablatt » .

Bruckner addressed him :

« So, “ Herr ” Doctor, what it says in the newspapers is absolutely not true - I have absolutely nothing against the Israelite gentlemen ! »

...

Sacred Music : Brahms and Bruckner with Harry Christophers (BBC) - <https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=nG0tRkFmHqY>

Face à face Brahms - Bruckner

Avril 1880, 19 heures : Lors de l'unique rencontre organisée entre Anton Bruckner et Johannes Brahms au café-restaurant de l'Hôtel du « Hérisson Rouge », les compositeurs ne se comprirent qu'en matière ... culinaire !

Un véritable accord de paix entre ces 2 monuments de Vienne était, bien sûr, impossible. Il s'agissait de tempéraments diamétralement opposés avec des conceptions artistiques fondamentalement aux antipodes. Bref, une illustration patente de ces mots de Rudyard Kipling : « Et les 2 ne se rencontreront jamais. » .

Des observateurs neutres et des supporteurs des 2 camps décidèrent d'organiser une rencontre à l'amiable, sans chi-chi, au restaurant favori de Brahms (le « Zum Roten Igel » , situé juste à côté de l'édifice qui porte le même nom et qui abrite le vieux Conservatoire) dans l'espoir de mettre un terme à la querelle fratricide entre les 2 compositeurs.

Bon joueur, Bruckner arriva tôt (autour de 19 heures) accompagné de 2 amis. Les garçons de table furent estomaqués de voir apparaître cet habitué du « Zur Goldenen Kugel » de la « Am Hof Platz » . La soirée semblait des plus prometteuses. Lorsque Johannes Brahms fit son apparition, accompagné de 3 de ses collègues, le Maître de Saint-Florian avait déjà englouti 2 ou 3 bols de soupe aux nouilles !

Après des salutations d'usage des plus glaciales, Brahms prit place à l'extrémité opposée de la longue table.

Selon une des personnes présentes :

« Ils étaient assis aux extrémités de la même table, froids et impassibles. »

La situation était plutôt décevante pour les organisateurs de ce repas dit « de la réconciliation » .

Même s'il s'agissait de son restaurant régulier, et qu'il connaissait les plats par cœur, Brahms demanda énergiquement au garçon de lui apporter le menu.

Brahms brisa le lourd silence et demanda qu'on lui apporte le menu (la liste des prix) . S'efforçant de demeurer conciliant malgré son caractère acrimonieux, il s'écria :

« Maintenant, nous allons voir ce qu'il y à manger. »

Bruckner fit alors de même dans son dialecte typique de la Haute-Autriche. Pendant de longues minutes, les 2 hommes froncèrent les sourcils, consultant le menu de haut en bas.

Puis Brahms leva les yeux et ordonna le premier :

« Garçon, apportez-moi du jambon fumé et des boulettes de pain ! »

Bruckner enchaîna aussitôt :

« Très bien, bon choix cher collègue Docteur. Du jambon fumé et des boulettes de pain. Voilà quelque chose sur lequel nous pouvons nous entendre. » .

Tout le monde pouffa de rire. La glace était brisée. Les 2 camps se mirent à parler de bière « Pilsner » et de cuisine viennoise. Le reste de la soirée (qui ne s'est pas terminée trop tard) s'avéra des plus chaleureuses et des plus joyeuses.

Bruckner expliqua la situation ainsi :

« Voici Brahms, je lui présente mes hommages. Chapeau bas ! Moi, je suis Bruckner et je préfère mes propres compositions. Celui qui veut être bercé par la musique va opter pour Brahms ; mais celui qui veut se laisser emporter par la musique trouvera peu de satisfaction dans son œuvre. »

Brahms lui-même avait déclaré, avant de rejoindre définitivement le camp traditionnel d'Eduard Hanslick :

« Bruckner est le plus grand Symphoniste de notre temps. »

Plus tard, après avoir assisté à une Symphonie de Bruckner, Brahms s'approcha du compositeur :

« J'espère que vous ne vous sentirez pas incommode face à mes propos, mais je n'arrive vraiment pas à comprendre ce que vous essayez de dire avec vos compositions. »

À quoi Bruckner répliqua :

« Peu importe, Docteur, c'est tout à fait légitime. Je ressens la même chose avec les vôtres. »

...

The happiest event in musical Vienna occurred one April evening in 1880, at the « Rothen Igel » restaurant. At 7 pm, Professor Bruckner appeared with 2 friends. The waiters were astonished. Usually, the peasant Mæstro ate elsewhere, at the restaurant « Zur Kugel » , on « Am Hof » Square. And the wonders of the night had only begun. A few minutes later, Johannes Brahms marched in, complete with white beard, nimbus and a retinue of 3. After a stiff greeting, he took a seat at the opposite end of a long table. Even though this was his regular restaurant, whose dishes he knew by heart, Brahms demanded the menu, quick !! Bruckner tried to match the other man's fierceness by yelling for the same thing in his Upper-Austrian dialect.

For long minutes, the 2 Masters frowned, up and down, the list of dishes. Mutual acquaintances had arranged this « conciliation dinner » . Obviously, they had engineered a debacle. And then, at the very same second, both geniuses shouted the same phrase at the waiter :

« Roast pork and “ sauerkraut ” ! »

The table dissolved into laughter. The impossible ensued : an amiability between opposites, feeding on small talk about « pilsner » beer and Viennese cuisine. It did not survive long beyond the evening. But, for the duration of one dinner, the muse knew peace.

...

(Lettre avec petit dessin humoristique en tête) Invitation à un Carnaval au « Tonkünstlerverein » de Vienne. Le croquis nous montre un Anton Bruckner, vu de profil, quittant la maison Haslinger, l'éditeur de Beethoven.

La légende dit : « La 12e Symphonie est maintenant terminée ! Soulagé, Bruckner entreprend sa seconde douzaine. » .

Les signataires : Johannes Brahms, J. M. Grun, Julius Epstein, Robert Lienau (ami de Brahms, auteur du petit dessin et éditeur de la 8e Symphonie) , Karl Goldmark, Ignaz Brüll, et monsieur et madame Anton Door.

...

The happiest event in musical Vienna occurred one April evening in 1880, at the « Zum Roten Igel » restaurant. At 7 pm, Professor Anton Bruckner appeared with 2 friends. The waiters were astonished. Usually, the peasant Mæstro ate elsewhere, at the restaurant « Zur Goldenen Kugel » , on « Platz Am Hof » . And the wonders of the night had only begun. A few minutes later, Johannes Brahms marched in, complete with white beard, nimbus, and a retinue of 3. After a stiff greeting, he took a seat at the opposite end of a long table. Even though this was his regular restaurant, whose dishes he knew by heart, Brahms demanded the menu, quick !! Bruckner tried to match the other man's fierceness by yelling for the same thing, in his Upper-Austrian dialect.

For long minutes, the 2 Masters frowned, up and down, the list of dishes. Mutual acquaintances had arranged this « conciliation dinner » . Obviously, they had engineered a debacle. And then, at the very same second, both geniuses shouted the same phrase at the waiter :

« Roast pork and “ sauerkraut ” ! »

The table dissolved into laughter. The impossible ensued : an amiability between opposites, feeding on small talk about Pilsner beer and Viennese cuisine. It did not survive long beyond the evening. But for the duration of one dinner, the muse knew peace.

...

Das Gasthof « Zum Rothen Igel » befand sich in Wiens I. Bezirk auf dem « Wildpretmarkt I » . Durch die neben dem Gasthof gelegene Hauseinfahrt gelangte man in das Gebäude der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde (heute Adresse Tuchlauben 12) , in dem sich auch das Wiener Konservatorium befand. Der « Rothe Igel » war ein wichtiger Musikertreffpunkt. Professoren, Studenten, in Wien auftretende Künstler, Benützer der Bibliothek des Konservatoriums : sie alle bevölkerten dieses berühmte, zentral gelegene Wirtshaus.

1870 wurde das neue Musikvereinsgebäude am Karlsplatz eröffnet. Dadurch lag der « Rothe Igel » etwas abseits des neuen Wiener Musikzentrums, dennoch blieb das Lokal ein beliebter Musikertreffpunkt. Das Gasthaus wurde 1906 geschlossen, in der Folge wurde das Gebäude abgerissen.

Für Johannes Brahms war der « Rothe Igel » seine « zweite Wiener Adresse » . Hier fand das legendäre Treffen zwischen Johannes Brahms und Anton Bruckner statt. Beide Komponisten klammerten bei diesem Kontakt, der sehr einsilbig verlaufen sein soll, alle die Musik berührenden Themen aus, und fanden in Bezug auf die Wertschätzung der Speisekarte des « Rothen Igels » zu wenig überraschender Übereinstimmung.

Anton Webern kam von Klagenfurt, wo er aufgewachsen war, 1902 nach Wien, um Musikwissenschaft und (ab 1904) Komposition bei Arnold Schönberg zu studieren. Daß der junge Webern, der in Wien musikalisch Anschluß suchte, auch Gast im « Rothen Igel » war, darf als gesichert angesehen werden. Begegnet sind sich Brahms und Webern nie : Johannes Brahms war 1897 in Wien verstorben.

...

Dieser bezieht sich auf den Gasthof zum Roten Igel, der hier belegen war. Das Lokal war eine Hochburg der Demokraten während der Oktoberrevolution 1848.

Hier sollen sich auch ein paar Jahrzehnte später die Komponisten Brahms und Bruckner begegnet sein, ohne miteinander Kontakt zu finden. So studierten sie lange die Speisekarte, um beschäftigt zu sein. Erst als Brahms schließlich beim Kellner « Knödel und ein Geselchtes » bestellte, schien Bruckner auf und meinte :

« Sehen Sie, Herr Kollege, hier finden wir zusammen ! Knödel und Geselchtes esse ich auch. »

Wir biegen jetzt links ab und gehen über den Bauernmarkt, wo, wie der Name deutlich ausdrückt, bis ins 18.

Jahrhundert Obst und Gemüse verkauft wurde. Auch der Name « Hühnerlücke » war geläufig, weil man hier auch Geflügel erstehen konnte. Wir nehmen schon die nächste Abzweigung rechts und biegen in die Freisingergasse ein.

Les goûts gastronomiques de Johannes Brahms

Johannes Brahms travaillait peu le soir, préférant passer du temps à socialiser en prenant 1 ou 2 bières au café-restaurant de l'Hôtel du « Hérisson Rouge ». Il se trouvait toujours en compagnie de 2 ou 3 proches (comme le docteur Ignaz Semmelweis). Les échanges allaient de la plaisanterie (légère ou grossière) à l'insulte acerbe. Brahms n'a jamais savouré un repas en parfait solitaire. Il était friand de gastronomie paysanne, plus particulièrement de plats de viande très assaisonnés. Il arrivait qu'il demande à son éditeur Fritz Simrock de lui faire parvenir, directement de Hambourg ou de Hollande, de délicieuses pièces de viande que le chef du « Hérisson Rouge » lui apprêtait pour le souper. Enfin, pour bien terminer la soirée, il adorait jouer aux cartes entouré de ses amis dans la modeste salle-à-manger située au 2^e étage.

Un professeur hollandais, attablé au Hérisson Rouge, fut témoin des commandes répétées de Brahms pour de la blanchaille frite (un met surtout apprécié des débardeurs du port de Hambourg) accompagnée d'un plat de pommes de terre et d'une salade. Mais ce poisson n'était pas toujours disponible à Vienne. Le cuisinier le remplaçait soit par du poisson-chat, de la truite, du brochet ou du doré jaune. Une rumeur voulait que Brahms boive l'huile directement de la boîte de sardines.

Le personnel du restaurant lui avait spécialement mis de côté, dans la cave, une réserve de bouteilles de Tokay, un vin hongrois.

Aujourd'hui, un magasin spécialisé de la ville de Winsen offre une bouteille de vin appelé : « Le Johannes Brahms du Hérisson Rouge » .

Les choix préférés de Johannes Brahms au « Hérisson Rouge » :

Le goulash de bœuf à la hongroise (ce met paysan comprenant du paprikás et du pörkölt qui a intégré la gastronomie bourgeoise au cours du XIX^e siècle) avec de la crème sure viennoise accompagné d'un plat de boulettes de pain ou de pommes de terre.

Sinon, la version viennoise du goulash : un mélange de bœuf (coupé en gros dés) , de poivrons, d'oignons et d'épices.

L'épaule de boeuf (« Kruspelspitz ») servie avec du raifort et des crêpes de pommes de terre (« Erdapfelschmarrn ») .

L' « Apfelmeerettich » (bœuf bouilli, apprêté avec des épices méridionales, servi avec pommes de terre rôties) amenait le compositeur en extase après des heures de répétition exténuantes avec la Chorale des femmes.

L'escalope panée à la viennoise accompagnée d'une salade de pommes de terre.

Le hareng aux pommes de terre frites accompagné d'anneaux d'échalotes et de salade.

La « Silsilat » : une salade de hareng autrichienne.

Le « Rindspilaw » : une sorte de bœuf pilaf toujours accompagné de café ou de cognac.

Des tomates farcies sur de la baguette de pain servies avec du beurre à l'ail, de l'oignon ou des fines herbes.

Du bacon et des haricots.

Des poires ou un strudel aux pommes accompagnés de crème fouettée, servie dans une coupe.

Après le vin, les pâtisseries maison accompagnées d'un café-crème ramenait Brahms sur ses pieds.

La morale de cette l'histoire : Vous pouvez arracher le jeune Brahms des bidonvilles de Hambourg ou de Winsen mais vous ne pouvez pas effacer de son esprit le précieux souvenir de ses mets préférés alors qu'il était enfant.

Les proches amis qui invitèrent Brahms à la maison furent à même de constater ses affinités prolétaires. La famille Kalbeck rapporta son penchant pour le « Silsilat » (une salade de hareng autrichienne) . Flore Kalbeck, la fille de Max Kalbeck nous rappelle un souper en famille en compagnie de Johannes Brahms : « Au bout de la table se trouvait l' « oncle » avec la grande barbe blanche qui pendait. Pour blaguer, il signait de fictifs reçus de table. Son rire puissant se rendait jusqu'à nous. Oui, oncle Brahms pouvait en effet bien boire et bien manger ! » .

...

When he reached his inn, the « Zum Rothen Igel » , on the « Wildpretmarkt » , Johannes Brahms passed by the main dining-room frequented by higher-government officials. A « Stube » farther back was his favourite ; coachmen cut into their goulash here, and here, a corner table was famous for being the Brahms lunching place.

He ordered his roast pork, kraut and « pilsner » , received friends and admirers. Then, he walked-back to the « Ringstraße » , toward another table reserved for him at the « Café Heinrichshof » , opposite the Opera. There, he reclined in a chair by the window and often would doze-off after his mocha. Passers-by would pause to admire the Brahms monument which sat there behind the glass pane with closed eyes. It was a thrill to watch the statue come alive and tip the waiter.

Eusebius Mandyczevski

Le musicologue, compositeur, chef d'orchestre et professeur de musique ukraino-autrichien, Eusebius Mandyczevski

(Roumain : Eusebie Mandicevski) , est un né à Hlyboka, Raion (alors dans l'Autriche-Hongrie, aujourd'hui dans l'Ukraine) , le 18 août 1857 et est décédé à Vienne, le 13 mars 1929. Il a été très connu, respecté et influent dans les milieux musicaux autrichiens, roumains et ukrainiens. Il a réalisé des éditions et des études très prestigieuses de la musique de Franz-Joseph Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Franz Schubert, Johannes Brahms et Antonio Caldara.

Son père a été prêtre et sa mère, Veronica, née Popovici, était la sœur d'Eusebiu Popovici, professeur érudit d'histoire de l'Université de Cernauti et le père du poète bucovinien Gheorghe Popovici (connu sous le pseudonyme de T. Robeanu) . Selon son père, son origine a des filiations slaves ; selon sa mère, son origine est roumaine. Il a fait ses études secondaires à l'institut de Tchernivtsi en même temps qu'il étudiait la musique avec Sydir Vorobkevych. Il est entré à l'Université de Tchernivtsi, mais, en 1875, il est allé à Vienne pour étudier à l'Académie de musique et d'arts du spectacle de Vienne, où il a suivi les enseignements de Eduard Hanslick (Histoire de la Musique) , Gustav Nottebohm (Théorie de la musique) et Robert Fuchs. En 1879, il a fait la connaissance de Johannes Brahms dont il est devenu un de ses meilleurs amis. En 1903, il s'est marié avec la chanteuse de lieder et professeur de chant, Albine von Vestl.

Entre 1879 et 1881, Mandyczewski a été le directeur de la « Wiener Singakademie » (Académie Viennoise de Chant) . De 1887 à 1929, il a été archiviste et bibliothécaire de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Société des Amis de la Musique) , et dont il a été nommé chef de son orchestre en 1892. Il a été fait docteur « Honoris causa » par l'Université de Leipzig en 1897, la même année où il a commencé à enseigner au Conservatoire de Vienne comme professeur d'Histoire de la Musique et des Instruments de Musique. En 1916, il a été nommé membre du Conseil privé autrichien.

Durant de nombreuses années, il a été le correspondant à Vienne de la revue britannique « The Musical Times » .

Entre 1884 et 1897 est apparue l'édition de Mandyczewski des lieder de Franz Schubert (au sein de l'œuvre complète éditée par l'éditeur Breitkopf et Härtel) . La méticulosité de Mandyczewski (qui, dans certains cas, l'a amené à éditer 3 ou 4 variantes de chaque lied) a fait de lui une autorité sur ce compositeur. Le prestige de ses éditions était tel que, pour elles, en 1897, il a été fait docteur « Honoris causa » par l'Université de Leipzig. Il a également organisé une grande exposition sur Schubert, en 1922, ainsi que le Congrès international sur Schubert de 1928.

Mandyczewski a publié un ouvrage de Nottebohm, « Beethoveniana » , dans lequel est rassemblée une série d'essais académiques sur Beethoven, quelques-uns déjà publiés par la Musikalisches Wochenblatt et d'autres inédits, laissés par Nottebohm sous forme de manuscrits. George Grove lui était reconnaissant pour toute l'aide qu'il avait reçu lors de la rédaction de son livre sur les Symphonies de Beethoven.

Mandyczewski a commenté l'édition de l'œuvre complète de Franz-Joseph Haydn. En collaboration avec son disciple, Hans Gál, il a édité l'œuvre complète de Johannes Brahms.

Mandyczewski a composé des Messes orthodoxes, des pièces pour le piano, des cycles de lieder s'inspirant de textes de poètes comme Tarás Shevchenko, Yurii Fedkovych, Vasile Alecsandri, Mihai Eminescu ou Heinrich Heine. Il a également effectué de nombreux arrangements d'œuvres folkloriques ukrainiennes, roumaines, allemandes et hongroises.

...

The Ukrainian musicologist, composer, conductor, and teacher Eusebius Mandyczewski (Romanian : Eusebie Mandicevski) was born on 18 August 1857 in the village of Molodiya (then Austria-Hungary ; now Ukraine, Hlyboka Raion) and died on 13 August 1929 in Sulz, near Vienna. He was an author of numerous musical works and is highly-regarded within Austrian, Romanian and Ukrainian music circles.

His father was a priest and his mother, Veronica, born Popovici, was the sister of Eusebiu Popovici, erudite professor of History at the University of Cernauti and the father of the Bucovinian poet Gheorghe Popovici (known under the pen name of T. Robeanu) . His origin according to the father has Slavic affiliations ; according to his mother, the origin is Romanian. Eusebius had 2 brothers (Georgiy and Professor Kostiantyn) and 1 sister (Kateryna) . Kostiantyn was a secondary school teacher, member of the regional School Council and, later, Head of the Chernivtsi Library. Kateryna Mandychevs'ka was a school teacher. Georgiy was also a composer of choral music.

He finished his secondary studies at the Upper-School of Chernivtsi and, simultaneously, studied music under Sydir Vorobkevych. He began studies at the University of Chernivtsi, then moved to the Vienna Conservatory, in 1875, and studied music history under Eduard Hanslick, music theory under Martin Gustav Nottebohm and Robert Fuchs. Beginning in 1879, he became a close and life-long friend of Johannes Brahms and a prominent member of the « Brahms Circle » (who aided Brahms in teaching Gustav Jenner) . Johannes Brahms supported the young composer and appointed him as curator of his Estate.

In 1901, he married Albine von Vest, a lieder singer and singing teacher.

From 1879 to 1881, Mandyczewski was the conductor of the Vienna « Singakademie » . From 1887 to 1929, he was the archivist and librarian of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » . In 1892, he became the musical director of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde Orchester » .

The decade 1887-1897 saw the appearance of Mandyczewski's work on the Schubert « Gesamtausgabe » . His name is particularly associated with the 10 volumes of songs, which he edited meticulously, sometimes printing as many as 3 or 4 variants of individual songs ; in recognition of his editorship, he was awarded an honorary doctorate from the University of Leipzig, in 1897. A gifted philologist as well as musician, he was widely respected both for his scholarship and for his generosity to inquiring scholars ; Grove was indebted to him for his help in the writing of his book on Beethoven's Symphonies. Mandyczewski also brought out a 2nd volume of Nottebohm's « Beethoveniana » , a series of pioneering essays in Beethoven scholarship that had been partly published in series in the « Musikalisches Wochenblatt » and partly left in manuscript.

In 1897, he received an Honorary Doctorate from the University of Leipzig. Later, in 1897, he began teaching at the Vienna Conservatory as Professor of Music History and Musical Instruments. In 1916, he was made a Privy Councillor.

Mandyczewski edited the complete edition of Franz Schubert's works, began a complete edition of Franz-Josef Haydn's and, together with his pupil Hans Gál, edited Brahms' complete works.

For many years, in the early part of the 20th Century, he was the Viennese correspondent to the « Musical Times » . He was joint editor of the Brahms « Gesamtausgabe » with Hans Gál, and organized the Schubert exhibition of 1922 and the International Schubert Congress (1928) ; this last function greatly overtaxed his strength, and he died before the proceedings of the Congress were published.

Mandyczewski composed music to the words of poets such as Taras Shevchenko, Yurii Fedkovych, Vasile Alecsandri, Mihai Eminescu, Heinrich Heine. He arranged compositions based on many Ukrainian, Romanian, German, and Hungarian folk songs.

« Zweite Beethoveniana » , Nottebohm MG Verlag, Leipzig (1887) , (2/1925) .

« Namen- und Sachregister zu Nottebohms Beethoveniana und Zweite Beethoveniana » , Leipzig (1888/R) .

« Beethoven's Rondo in B für Pianoforte und Orchester » , SIMG, i (1899-1900) ; pages 250-306.

« Carl Czerny : Versuch einer richtigen Würdigung » , Deutsche Kunst- und Musikzeitung, xviii (1891) ; pages 23-24.

« Gœthes Gedichte in Franz Schuberts Werken » , Chronik des Wiener Gœthe-Vereins, xi/112 (10 March 1897) ; pages 2-3.

« Franz Schubert : zur Erinnerung an seinen 100. Geburtstag » , Breitkopf & Härtel, Mitteilung xlvi (1907) ; pages 1609-1610.

« Jägers Abendlied » , Die Musik, vi/7 (1907) ; pages 45-46.

« Schubert-Pflege in der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , Geschichte der Kaiserlich-Königlich Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Wien (1912) .

« Drei Meister Autographe » , Vienna (1923) ; « fac-similés » of autographs of Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms.

« Brahms » , « Bruckner » , « Pohl » , « Strauß, Johann, Vater » , « Strauß, Johann, Sohn » , ADB.

La « Ringstraße »

Le « Ring » (ou « Ringstraße ») est un boulevard annulaire qui encercle le centre-ville historique de Vienne (« Innere Stadt ») . Il est bordé d'importants monuments de l'ancienne capitale Impériale autrichienne et délimite le 1er arrondissement de la ville. Aujourd'hui, le « Ring » est un des plus beaux boulevards de la capitale autrichienne.

Le 20 décembre 1857, l'Empereur d'Autriche François-Joseph signe le décret décidant du démantèlement des vieux remparts qui enferment la ville de Vienne. Il crée ensuite un boulevard annulaire long de bâtiments publics et de maisons de rapport, le « Ring » .

Le « Ring » historique, parfois appelé « intérieur » , offre aux véhicules une circulation en sens horaire, excepté pour les tramways, qui peuvent rouler dans les 2 sens. Un second boulevard concentrique permet de tourner dans l'autre sens ; il est parfois appelé « Ring extérieur » .

On y retrouve des sites prestigieux :

L'Opéra d'État de Vienne (« Staatsoper ») .

Le Palais de la « Hofburg » : « Burggarten » , « Heldenplatz » , « Volksgarten » .

Le Parlement autrichien.

Le « Kunsthistorisches Museum » et le Musée d'histoire naturelle.

Le « Rathaus » (l'Hôtel de ville) .

L'Université de Vienne.

Le « Burgtheater » .

La « Votivkirche » .

Lors de la destruction des vieux remparts de la ville au milieu du XIXe siècle, on décida de construire la « Votivkirche » (une église votive de style néo-Gothique) sur le nouveau boulevard circulaire de la capitale : la « Ringstraße » . Le jeune architecte de 28 ans, Heinrich von Ferstel, s'inspirera des églises de France construites 7 siècles plus tôt.

Elle fut érigée à l'initiative de l'archiduc Ferdinand-Maximilien (le frère de l'Empereur qui deviendra le futur Empereur Maximilien Ier du Mexique) , pour commémorer l'attentat raté contre François-Joseph par le Hongrois Janos Libényi, le 18 février 1853 : Après l'échec de l'attentat, l'archiduc appela tous les peuples de la monarchie Habsbourgeoise à participer à cette souscription nationale. 300,000 sujets contribuèrent à l'érection du bâtiment.

Ses tours devaient culminer à 99 mètres mais elles seront limitées, réglementation oblige, à 98 mètres ; soit la hauteur de celle de l'Hôtel de ville. Il s'agit de la seconde plus haute église de Vienne.

La Bourse de Vienne.

Le Palais Todesco.

Le « Stadtpark » .

La « Schwarzenbergplatz » .

...

Le « Ring » de Vienne mesure 5,3 kilomètres. Une longueur suffisante pour accueillir de nombreux immeubles d'aspect monumental, construits pendant l'époque historiciste, entre 1860 et 1890. De l'Opéra au Musée des Beaux-arts, toutes ces réalisations comptent aujourd'hui parmi les principales curiosités de Vienne.

« Telle est ma volonté... » - C'est par ces mots que l'Empereur François-Joseph donna l'ordre de construire la « Ringstraße » , en 1857. Nobles et grands bourgeois s'empressèrent d'édifier tout au long de la prestigieuse avenue nombre de pompeux Palais. Beaucoup de ces édifices, autrefois propriétés privées, peuvent encore être admirés (quoique le plus souvent seulement de l'extérieur) . Le style de leur construction est entré dans l'histoire sous le nom de style « Ringstraße » (une des formes de l'historicisme) . Il s'agit d'un pluralisme stylistique qui vise à imiter les nombreuses formes architecturales héritées du passé.

Le 1er mai 1865, l'Empereur François-Joseph a inauguré solennellement la « Wiener Ringstraße » .

Les immeubles les plus remarquables ne sont en fait pas les Palais, mais bien plutôt les grands édifices comme l'Opéra (construit en style néo-Renaissance) , le Parlement, l'Hôtel-de-Ville (de style Gothique flamand) , le « Burgtheater » (de style néo-Baroque) , l'Université (de style néo-Renaissance) , le Musée des Arts appliqués, la Bourse de Vienne et la « Votivkirche » (de style néo-Gothique) , tous des bâtiments construits dans la seconde moitié du XIXe siècle. Sont également dignes d'intérêt le Musée des Beaux-arts et le Musée d'Histoire naturelle, tous 2 édifiés dans le style néo-Renaissance. Outre les trésors artistiques et naturels qu'ils hébergent, ils sont aussi par eux-mêmes des chefs-d'œuvre de l'architecture.

Des Maîtres d'œuvre comme Theophil von Hansen, Karl Freiherr von Hasenauer, Gottfried Semper, Heinrich von Ferstel ou Friedrich von Schmidt ont imprimé leur marque sur la « Ringstraße » . La fin du XIXe siècle vit l'avènement du « Jugendstil » (Art nouveau) viennois, qui abandonna les excès de faste pompeux de l'époque historiciste.

AB 80 : 1881

17 janvier 1881 : Bruckner complète la 6e Symphonie lors de son retour au bureau à l'Université de Vienne.

20 février 1881 : Événement qui marquera une étape décisive dans la vie du compositeur Anton Bruckner (âgé de 56 ans) . Concert commandité par le « Wiener akademischer Wagner-Verein » . Création de la seconde version de la 4e Symphonie sous la direction du chef Hans Richter à la tête du Philharmonique. Au même programme, de Beethoven : l'Ouverture du Roi Étienne (« König Stephan ») , Opus 117, et le 4e Concerto pour piano en sol majeur, Opus 58, avec Hans von Bülow comme soliste. Bülow dirigera aussi une de ses propres œuvres, la Ballade pour grand orchestre intitulée « Des Sängers Fluch » (la Malédiction de la chanteuse) , Opus 16, basée sur des textes de Ludwig Uhland.

Le critique Eduard Kremser dira à propos de ce concert :

« Bruckner chante ses propres chansons. Il dit au monde quelque chose qui lui fait du bien. »

Ce jour est considéré comme le début d'une réelle prise en charge de Bruckner à Vienne.

20 février 1881 : The 1880 version of the « Romantic » is premiered in Vienna by the Philharmonic conducted by Hans Richter ; 1st premiere of a Bruckner Symphony to be conducted by someone other than the composer. Bruckner makes some changes to the Symphony after the 1st performance, resulting in the 1881 version.

25 mars 1881 : Béla (Viktor János) Bartók is born at Nagyszentmiklós (Great Saint-Nicholas) , then part of Greater Hungary within the Austro-Hungarian Empire (now, Sânnicolau Mare, in Romania) .

2 rich patrons buy all of the 38 year old Emil Schindler's paintings, suddenly making him wealthy. He also takes on Carl Moll as a pupil.

The 34 year old Ignaz Brüll becomes Artistic Director at the Horák School of Piano Studies, in Vienna.

The 31 year old Richard Heuberger becomes music-critic of the « Wiener Tagblatt » .

In America, the « Graphophone » , a much improved version of the phonograph which uses wax-covered cardboard cylinders, is developed by Chichester A. Bell and Charles Sumner Tainter. Edison shows no interest in their invention, so they set-up their own factory in Washington, D.C. Edison, then, introduces his own improved phonograph, based on the « Graphophone » . Bell and Tainter, in turn, copy Edison's invention of solid wax cylinders. Both firms compete to try to create interest in office sound recording devices.

3 au 17 mai 1881 : Ire ébauche par Bruckner de son « Te Deum » (WAB 45) .

2 juillet 1881 : Franz Liszt fell down the stairs of a hotel in Weimar. Though friends and colleagues had noticed swelling in his feet and legs when he had arrived in Weimar the previous month (an indication of possible congestive heart failure) , he had been in good health up to that point and was still fit and active. He was left immobilized for 8 weeks after the accident and never fully recovered from it. A number of ailments manifested themselves - dropsy, asthma, insomnia, a cataract of the left eye and heart disease. The last-mentioned eventually contributed to Liszt's death. He became increasingly plagued by feelings of desolation, despair and preoccupation with death - feelings which he expressed in his works from this period. As he told Lina Ramann :

« I carry a deep sadness of the heart which must now and then break-out in sound. »

3 septembre 1881 : Anton Bruckner, 57 ans, achève sa 6^e Symphonie.

Automne 1881 : The 21 year old Gustav Mahler is hired for his 1st important post as an Opera conductor, at the provincial Theater of Laibach (now, Ljubljana, in Slovenia) , for 1 season.

Mahler submits his score of « Das Klagende Lied » to the competition for the Beethoven Prize, whose jury includes Johannes Brahms and Eduard Hanslick.

23 septembre 1881 : Anton Bruckner pose sur papier les 1^{res} idées de sa 7^e Symphonie. Apparemment, le splendide thème d'ouverture lui est venue pendant un rêve. Le chef Ignaz Dorn, un ami de jeunesse qui succéda à Otto Kitzler, lui apparut jouant le thème à l'alto, avec ces mots : « Cela t'apportera le succès ! » . Effectivement, la première de la 7^e sera créée non pas à Vienne, un terreau trop conservateur, mais plutôt à Leipzig, une ville beaucoup plus progressive artistiquement. Un critique s'étonna même : « Comment a-t-il pu nous demeurer aussi longtemps inconnu ? » .

Autres élèves d'Anton Bruckner au Conservatoire (II)

L'élève Friedrich Eckstein

L'un des élèves d'Anton Bruckner, Friedrich Eckstein, un ami intime qui deviendra son « secrétaire personnel volontaire » , comme il le dira si bien, le visitait régulièrement durant cette période. Il a souvent examiner les manuscrits des compositions en cours d'écriture. Eckstein fut frappé par ce thème qui initie le 1^{er} mouvement de la 7^e Symphonie.

Eckstein, surnommé « le philosophe de la “ Ringstraße ” » , était un sanscritiste, un végétarien, un ami proche de Hugo Wolf, d'Anton Bruckner, et d'autres musiciens. Il a écrit des articles sur la psychanalyse. Son autobiographie, que Freud a amené avec lui à Londres, s'intitule : « “ Alte unennbare Tage ! ” Erinnerungen aus 70 Lehr- und Wanderjahren » (Journées ineffables de voyage et d'étude : de vieux souvenirs de 70 ans) , paru en 1936 aux éditions Herbert Reichner (Vienne / Leipzig / Zürich) .

...

Nul doute que le long 1^{er} thème en arche de la Symphonie n° 7 (violoncelles et altos, avec cor d'abord) soit tout droit venu de l'inconscient - un cadeau de la nature. À cette époque-là, Friedrich Eckstein rendait régulièrement visite à Bruckner, son professeur et ami intime et, pouvant examiner à loisir les esquisses des œuvres en cours, il fut frappé par la manière inhabituelle dont le thème inaugural de la Symphonie n° 7 prit forme. Ses remarques sur les habitudes de travail de Bruckner (et sur la spécificité de l'ouverture de la n° 7) valent d'être citées en entier :

« Chaque fois, ou presque, que j'allais voir Bruckner à son appartement de la Hessegasse, je le trouvais assis à son vieil et encombrant piano Bösendorfer, laborieusement plongé dans l'ébauche d'une de ses Symphonies, les mains tremblantes, à s'échiner sur les harmonies. Ces esquisses étaient en elles-mêmes des plus remarquables. Généralement, seule la ligne de violon ou la ligne supérieure des bois était remplie avec, en bas, la basse ; entre les 2, il y avait un vide, et c'était seulement bien plus tard que les autres voix orchestrales étaient ajoutées. Leur dimension harmonique et leur agencement étaient déjà clairement établis dans l'oreille interne du Maître et, çà et là, apparaissait sous la ligne de basse une note, ordinairement sous la forme d'une majuscule, pour indiquer la " note fondamentale " harmonique du passage en question. »

« Mais quel trésor de beauté inimaginable s'offrit à moi quand je vis les toutes premières mesures d'une œuvre à peine commencée, la merveilleuse Symphonie n° 7 : là où les trémolos de cordes lancent une séquence harmonique très émouvante qui surplombe en arche une splendide chaîne de retards, inondant le thème principal, au cor et aux violoncelles, de rais d'une lumière éclatante ! »

...

Friedrich Eckstein est né le 17 février 1861 à Perchtoldsdorf près de Vienne. Brillant philosophe, théosophe, érudit, mécène, mathématicien et chimiste autrichien, il était également un passionné de musique. Il pouvait échanger ses vastes connaissances avec les grands penseurs, écrivains et musiciens de Vienne. Eckstein a produit plusieurs ouvrages sur le compositeur Anton Bruckner dont un recueil de « souvenirs » .

Dans « Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » - Universal-Edition, Wiener Philharmonischer Verlag, Wien (1923) - Eckstein donne un compte-rendu assez détaillé de son voyage à Munich en compagnie de son ancien Maître du Conservatoire, devenu un ami proche.

Friedrich Eckstein énonce brièvement (environ 70 pages) ses « souvenirs » sur Anton Bruckner. Lui-même un élève du compositeur, il se décrit comme étant « son secrétaire personnel volontaire » . Eckstein parle d'abord de l'homme puis de l'enseignant : ses vues sur la théorie musicale et son système d'enseignement, souvent accompagnés d'exemples musicaux, de notes et d'apartés provenant de la plume du Maître. Certains de ses contemporains ont défini son comportement « d'étrange ou même d'absurde » . Ses compositions innovatrices vont influencer l'histoire de la musique du 20e siècle.

À la toute fin de sa vie, la foi de Bruckner (comme en témoigne chacun des 4 mouvements de sa 9e Symphonie) passera par une grave crise existentielle. Son intérêt soudain pour les religions Orientales (dont le Bouddhisme) était en grande partie dû à l'influence d'Eckstein.

Le penchant d'Eckstein pour l'occultisme sera surtout évident lorsqu'il deviendra membre d'un « Lebensreform » , un groupe végétarien viennois qui discutait, à la fin des années 1870, des doctrines de Pythagore et des néo-Platoniciens.

Plus tard, ses intérêts ésotériques se porteront vers la mystique allemande et espagnole, les légendes entourant les Templiers et les Francs-maçons de même que la mythologie wagnérienne et les religions Orientales.

Personne, pas même les plus célèbres célébrités viennoises, ne manquait l'occasion d'échanger avec Friedrich Eckstein, toujours assis à la table des habitués du Café Impérial « Mac Ecks » (seconde salle de réception à gauche) . Les compositeurs Anton Bruckner, Hugo Wolf et Johann Strauß, les théosophes E. Blavatsky et Annie Besant, les écrivains Peter Altenberg et Felix Salten, le pamphlétaire Karl Kraus, l'auteur dramatique Ferdinand Bruckner, le psychanaliste Sigmund Freud, le psychothérapeute Alfred Adler, l'écrivain et médecin Arthur Schnitzler et Léon Trotzky, tous lui demandaient conseil. Si Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Franz Werfel ou Rainer Maria Rilke doutaient de l'un de leurs poèmes, ils accouraient tout de suite pour lui demander son opinion. Des architectes comme Adolf Loos ou des ingénieurs comme Robert Musil lui présentaient leurs plans ; des mathématiciens, leurs équations ; des physiciens, leurs formules ; des compositeurs, leurs partitions. Les juristes, avocats et psychanalystes discutaient avec lui de leurs cas. Des acteurs l'ont longuement interrogé sur leurs rôles ; et les historiens, sur sa vision de l'histoire.

Dans son livre intitulé « The Diary of Dostoyevsky's Wife » , écrit en 1925 (Reinhard Piper Verlag, München) , l'auteur René Fülöp-Miller a richement dépeint à travers moult anecdotes (dont les rencontres avec Hugo Wolf, Anton Bruckner, Mark Twain et bien d'autres) l'itinéraire de ce grand penseur, ce littéraire, ce mécène, ce théosophe autrichien que fut Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) .

...

Friedrich était l'un des 10 enfants du couple Albert Eckstein et Amalie Wehle. Cette famille juive appartenait à la haute bourgeoisie viennoise. Le père était chimiste et inventeur en plus d'être le propriétaire d'une usine de parchemin. À la table des habitués de son père, Friedrich Eckstein aura l'occasion de rencontrer des personnalités fortes comme le général et inventeur Franz von Uchatius, le philosophe social, inventeur et écrivain Josef Popper-Lynkeus, l'ingénieur forestier Wilhelm Franz Exner ainsi que le fondateur de la psychanalyse, Sigmund Freud avec qui il aura la chance de collaborer occasionnellement sur le plan professionnel. (Dans « Malaise dans la culture » , Friedrich Eckstein rapporte avoir fait découvrir l'art du yoga à Freud.) . Une longue amitié va alors s'établir.

Sa sœur, Emma Eckstein, va entrer dans l'histoire de la psychanalyse sous le pseudonyme de « Irma » . Elle aura à subir une chirurgie du nez catastrophique pratiquée par l'ami de Freud, le médecin juif allemand Wilhelm Fließ. Une autre de ses sœurs, Therese Schlesinger, deviendra une politicienne aguerrie et une militante féministe. De 1919 à 1923, elle siégera à l'Assemblée nationale constituante et, par la suite, au Conseil fédéral jusqu'en 1930.

C'est Franz Hartmann qui fera découvrir la théosophie à Eckstein. En juin 1886, ce dernier va recevoir l'acte de fondation d'une loge maçonnique, signée de la main d'Helena Petrovna Blavatsky : la Société Théosophique de Vienne. Il en deviendra le 1er président, en 1887.

Eckstein se liera d'amitié avec Gustav Meyrink et fréquentera régulièrement le théosophe Henry Steel Olcott jusqu'à son départ pour Vienne en compagnie de Rudolf Steiner. En 1890, il sera tenu en haute estime par le cercle des théosophes dirigé par Marie Lang mais Eckstein finira par rejeter cette science l'accusant d'être une « spiritualité faible » .

Depuis 1898, Friedrich Eckstein était marié à la théosophe et écrivaine Bertha Helene Diener (1874-1948) . Le couple invitera à leur salon du « Sankt-Genois-Schlössl » (Villa Aichelburg) au 19-21 Helenenstraße à Baden, le « tout Vienne » ; citons entre autres : Peter Altenberg, Arthur Schnitzler, Karl Kraus et Adolf Loos.

Le dramaturge Arthur Schnitzler évoquera en présentation de son « Das weite Land die Ecksteinvilla in Baden » (Le vaste pays de la Villa Eckstein, à Baden) , écrit en 1911, le personnage du fils d'Eckstein, Percy (né en 1899 et mort en 1962)

En 1904, Bertha Helene Diener quittera son mari. Suite à son divorce, en 1909, elle utilisera comme journaliste et comme écrivaine les pseudonymes de « Ahasvera » et de « Sir Galahad » .

Friedrich Eckstein va mourir à Vienne, le 10 novembre 1939, à l'âge de 78 ans.

Il est l'auteur de « Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » , Vienne, (1923) .

...

If the German occult sub-culture was well-developed before the First World War, Vienna could also look back on a ripe tradition of occult interest. The story of this tradition is closely linked with Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) . The personal secretary of composer Anton Bruckner, this brilliant polymath cultivated a wide-circle of acquaintance amongst the leading thinkers, writers and musicians of Vienna. His penchant for occultism Ist became evident as a member of a « Lebensreform » group who had practised vegetarianism and discussed the doctrines of Pythagoras and the neo-Platonists in Vienna, at the end of the 1870's. His esoteric interests later extended to German and Spanish mysticism, the legends surrounding the Templars, and the Freemasons, Wagnerian mythology, and oriental religions. In 1880, he befriended the Viennese mathematician Oskar Simony, who was impressed by the metaphysical theories of Professor Friedrich Zöllner of Leipzig. Zöllner had hypothesized that spiritualistic phenomena confirmed the existence of a 4th dimension. Eckstein and Simony were also associated with the Austrian psychical researcher, Lazar von Hellenbach, who performed scientific experiments with mediums in a state of trance and contributed to « Die Sphinx » . Following his cordial meeting with Blavatsky, in 1886, Eckstein gathered a group of theosophists in Vienna. During the late 1880's, both Franz Hartmann and the young Rudolf Steiner were « habitués » of this circle. Eckstein was also acquainted with the mystical group around the illiterate Christian pietist, Alois Mailänder (1844-1905) , who was lionized at Kempten and later at Darmstadt by many theosophists, including Hartmann and Hübbe-Schleiden. Eckstein corresponded with Gustav Meyrink, founder of the « Blue Star » theosophical lodge at Prague, in 1891, who later achieved renown as an occult novelist before the First World War. In 1887, a Vienna Theosophical Society was founded with Eckstein as president and Count Karl zu Leiningen-Billigheim, as secretary.

...

The Austrian polymath and theosophist Friedrich Eckstein was born on 17 February 1861 in Perchtoldsdorf, Lower-Austria, and died on 10 November 1939 in Vienna. He was a friend and temporary co-worker of Sigmund Freud.

He appears anonymously in Freud's « Civilization and its Discontents » as a « friend of mine, whose insatiable craving for knowledge has led him to make the most unusual experiments », including « the practices of Yoga. He sees in them a physiological basis, as it were, for much of the wisdom of mysticism » .

Also the husband of fellow theosophist and writer Bertha Diener, Eckstein's penchant for occultism first became evident as a member of a vegetarian group which discussed the doctrines of Pythagoras and the Neo-Platonists in Vienna at the end of the 1870s. His esoteric interests later extended to German and Spanish mysticism, the legends surrounding the Templars and the freemasons, Wagnerian mythology and oriental religions. In 1886, in the week after the tragedy at Mayerling, in which Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria, and his mistress were found dead in mysterious circumstances, he and his friend, the composer Anton Bruckner (for whom he also served as private secretary) traveled to the monastery of « Stift Heiligenkreuz » to ask the abbot there for details of what happened.

The proof sheets of Bruckner's Quintet, which at the time were in the possession of Friedrich Eckstein, « show many corrections in Bruckner's hand » , which reveal that « the last actual manuscript handed in by Bruckner before the printing did not mark the conclusion of his work on the composition » .

One of Bruckner's pupils and closest friends, Friedrich Eckstein, visited the composer regularly at this time, and he was often able to inspect the sketches for whichever work was then in progress. Eckstein was struck by how unusually the 7th's opening theme came into being. His remarks about Bruckner's normal working habits (and how the opening of the 7th differed from these) is worth quoting at length :

« Almost every time I visited Bruckner at his apartment in the Hessegasse, I found him sitting at his old fashioned, bulky Bösendorfer grand piano, deep in the sketch of one of his Symphonies, laboriously, with shaking hands, coaxing out the harmonies. These musical outlines were in themselves quite remarkable. As a rule only, the violin or the top woodwind line was filled in, and in the bottom, the bass ; in between was a yawning gap, and it wasn't until much later that the remaining orchestral voices were added. The harmonic dimension and the arrangement of the orchestral voices were already clearly established in the Master's inner ear, and here and there, underneath the bass line, would stand a note, usually in the form of a capital letter, to indicate the harmonic ' fundamental tone ' of the passage in question. »

« But what a wealth of unimagined beauty was revealed when I saw the very 1st bars of one newly begun work, the wonderful 7th Symphony : where the string tremolos launch a deeply moving harmonic sequence that arches through a splendid chain of suspensions, bathing the main-theme, on horn and cellos, in shafts of radiant sunlight ! »

Contrary to popular belief, Bruckner was quite capable of putting up resistance when he really didn't like an idea. And although he could be relatively puritan about instrumentation when it came to Symphonies (harps were included in the 8th only after a 1 month long struggle, according to his pupil Friedrich Eckstein) , if he had doubts about the suitability of cymbals and triangle, why did he include them again in the Adagio of Symphony No 8 ? From a musicological point of view, the issue is hard to resolve.

Bruckner used harps for the 1st time in the 8th Symphony. He had long believed, as Friedrich Eckstein recalled, that while the harp may have been appropriate in a Symphonic poem, it did not belong in « a proper Symphony » , but, here, he changed his mind. He told Eckstein that he felt compelled to use harps in this work :

« I simply had to, there was no other solution. »

Bruckner's pupil Friedrich Eckstein said about the 8 Symphony that it reveals « new, almost incomprehensible musical wonders » and « mysteries of daring chromaticism and enharmonicism. »

Bruckner's friend and student Friedrich Eckstein put it :

« I can testify that it was impossible to coerce him in artistic matters. » ; quoted in « Leidenschaftliche Erörterungen um Bruckner » , « Anbruch » No. 18 (1936) .

...

In his memoirs, Friedrich Eckstein wrote a detailed story of his trip to Munich with his former teacher, and close friend, Anton Bruckner.

February 1889 : In the week after the tragedy at Mayerling (on January 30th) , in which Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria, and his mistress were found dead in mysterious circumstances, Anton Bruckner and his private secretary Friedrich Eckstein traveled to the monastery of « Stift Heiligenkreuz » to ask the abbot there for details of what happened.

Friedrich Eckstein was the husband of fellow theosophist and writer Bertha Diener. Eckstein's penchant for occultism 1st became evident as a member of a « Lebensreform » group who had practised vegetarianism and discussed the doctrines of Pythagoras and the Neo-Platonists in Vienna, at the end of the 1870's. His esoteric interests later extended to German and Spanish mysticism, the legends surrounding the Templars and the Freemasons, Wagnerian mythology and Oriental religions.

...

In 1880, he befriended the Viennese mathematician Oskar Simony, who was impressed by the metaphysical theories of Professor Friedrich Zöllner of Leipzig. Zöllner had hypothesized that spiritualistic phenomena confirmed the existence of a 4th dimension. Eckstein and Simony were also associated with the Austrian Psychical researcher, Lazar von Hellenbach, who performed scientific experiments with mediums in a state of trance and contributed to « Die Sphinx »

. Following his cordial meeting with Blavatsky in 1886, Eckstein gathered a group of theosophists in Vienna. In 1887, a Vienna Theosophical Society was founded with Eckstein as president and Count Karl zu Leiningen-Billingheim as secretary.

During the late- 1880's, both Franz Hartmann and the young Rudolf Steiner were « habitués » of this circle. Eckstein was also acquainted with the mystical group around the illiterate Christian pietist, Alois Mailänder (1844-1905) , who was lionized at Kempten and, later, at Darmstadt by many theosophists, including Hartmann and Hübbe-Schleiden.

Eckstein corresponded with Gustav Meyrink, founder of the « Blue Star » theosophical lodge at Prague, in 1891, who later achieved renown as an occult novelist before the 1st World War.

...

Friedrich Eckstein (geboren 17. Februar 1861 in Perchtoldsdorf bei Wien ; gestorben 10. November 1939 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Polyhistor, Literat, Mäzen und Theosoph. Er war Freund und zeitweiliger Mitarbeiter Sigmund Freuds und ist in Das Unbehagen in der Kultur der Freund, von dem Freud sagt, er habe ihn über Yoga unterrichtet.

Friedrich Eckstein wurde am 17. Februar 1861 in Perchtoldsdorf als eines von zehn Kindern von Albert Eckstein und Amalie Wehle geboren. Der Vater war Chemiker und Erfinder sowie Besitzer einer Pergamentfabrik. Die jüdische Familie gehörte dem Wiener Großbürgertum an.

Über den Stammtisch seines Vaters lernte der junge Eckstein Persönlichkeiten wie den General und Erfinder Franz von Uchatius, den Sozialphilosophen, Erfinder und Schriftsteller Josef Popper-Lynkeus, den Forstingenieur Wilhelm Franz Exner sowie den Begründer der Psychoanalyse, Sigmund Freud, kennen. Mit diesem war er sein Leben lang in Freundschaft verbunden.

Eckstein wurde durch Franz Hartmann in die Theosophie eingeführt. Im Juni 1886 erhielt er eine von Helena Petrovna Blavatsky persönlich unterzeichnete Stiftungsurkunde für die Wiener Loge der Theosophischen Gesellschaft. Damit gründete er 1887 die erste offizielle Loge dieser Gesellschaft in Österreich, deren Präsident er wurde. Er war mit Gustav Meyrink befreundet und verkehrte mit dem Theosophen Henry Steel Olcott und bis zu dessen Wegzug aus Wien mit Rudolf Steiner. Dieser schätzte ihn persönlich hoch und hielt sich um 1890 im Kreis der Theosophen bei Marie Lang auf, verwarf dann aber die Theosophie als « Schwachgeistigkeit » .

Eckstein hatte frühe Kontakte zu lebensreformerischen Kreisen (Vegetarismus) . Er war seit 1898 mit Bertha Helene Diener (1874-1948) verheiratet. Sie führten im Sankt-Genois-Schlössl in Baden bei Wien einen Salon, in dem Peter Altenberg, Arthur Schnitzler, Karl Kraus und Adolf Loos, also « ganz Wien » verkehrte. Schnitzler verwendete für sein Drama Das weite Land die Ecksteinvilla in Baden und den 1899 geborenen Sohn Percy Eckstein als Vorlage. 1904 wurde Eckstein von seiner Frau verlassen, die sich nach ihrer Scheidung im Jahr 1909 unter dem Pseudonym Sir Galahad als Journalistin und Schriftstellerin einen Namen machte.

Bei literarischen Stammtischen (zum Beispiel im Café Imperial, zweiter Saal, links) traf Eckstein Karl Kraus, Arthur Schnitzler, Felix Salten, Hugo Wolf, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Franz Werfel, Rainer Maria Rilke, Robert Musil, Adolf Loos, Leo Trotzki und besonders Anton Bruckner, dessen Schüler und späterer Mäzen und Privatsekretär er war.

Ecksteins Schwester Emma ging als Irma in die Geschichte der Psychoanalyse ein. Sie hatte eine katastrophale Nasenoperation durch Freuds Freund Wilhelm Fließ hinter sich. Eine weitere Schwester von ihm, Therese Schlesinger, war eine bekannte Politikerin und Frauenrechtlerin, die von 1919 bis 1923 der konstituierenden Nationalversammlung und dem Nationalrat, danach bis 1930 dem Bundesrat angehörte.

René Fülöp Miller über Friedrich Eckstein :

« In Wien, wo Literatur, Kunst, Musik, Philosophie und Geschäft in Kaffeehäusern ihr Heim hatten, war es nur natürlich, daß auch Mac Eck, die Weisheit in persona, an einem Café-Tisch thronte. In einer Ecke des Café Imperial saß er von Morgen bis Mitternacht. Er hatte einen Ziegenbart und einen mongolischen Augenausschnitt. Sein Alter war selbst seinen vertrautesten Freunden nicht bekannt ... Julius, der alte Oberkellner, behauptete jedenfalls, er habe Mac Eck schon in der gleichen Ecke des Cafés vorgefunden, als er seine Laufbahn als Piccolo begann. Selbst unter den berühmtesten Wiener Berühmtheiten gab es keinen, der sich nicht gern an Mac Ecks Stammtisch eingefunden hätte. Hugo Wolf, Johann Strauß, Helena Petrovna Blavatsky und Annie Besant, Ferdinand Bruckner, Sigmund Freud, Alfred Adler und Leo Trotzki - sie alle berieten sich mit ihm. Wenn Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Werfel und Rilke über ein Gedicht in Zweifel waren, so pilgerten sie zu Mac Eck. Architekten legten ihm ihre Baupläne, Mathematiker ihre Gleichungen, Physiker ihre Formeln, Komponisten ihre Partituren zur Begutachtung vor. Juristen und Psychoanalytiker besprachen ihre Fälle mit ihm. Schauspieler befragten ihn über ihre Rollen und Historiker über ihre Geschichtstheorien. Selbst der kaiserliche Hofzeremonienmeister erschien eines Tages, um Mac Eck über eine strittige Frage der spanischen Hofetiquette zu konsultieren. Mac Eck kannte sich in allen Gebieten aus. Wollte jemand die Haupt- und Nebenflüsse in Paraguay wissen, eine Auskunft über Neothomismus, das erste romantische Gedicht oder die früheste Erwähnung der Zahnbürste, so wandte er sich an Mac Eck. Der Spötter Karl Kraus, der im Imperial am Nebentisch seinen Sitz aufgeschlagen hatte, wagte als einziger, sich über Mac Ecks Allwissen lustig zu machen. " Ich hatte heute nacht einen Alptraum » , erzählte er einmal. « Ein Band Brockhaus stieg aus dem Regal herab, um in Mac Eck etwas nachzuschlagen. " Mac Eck, der sich in allen geistigen Dingen auskannte, wußte natürlich auch über alle praktischen Fragen Bescheid. Er konnte Kunsthändlern sagen, welcher Liebhaber sich für ein ganz bestimmtes Bild aus der Frührenaissance interessieren würde ; er sah auf den ersten Blick den Unterschied in der Webart von Brünner und englischen Stoffen, er konnte Buchhändlern den Wert von Erstausgaben angeben und wußte, wer in Europa was finanzieren würde. »

(Der Narr im Frack, in : Der Monat (4) 1952, Seite 401f.)

Friedrich Torberg hat die folgende Begebenheit über Eckstein erzählt :

« ... der Polyhistor Eckstein war der berühmteste der Stammgäste des Café Imperial. Autor einer leider verschollenen Bruckner-Monographie mit dem schönen Titel " Der Weltgeist an der Orgel ", enorm belesen und enorm gebildet, stand der alte Eckstein im Ruf, einfach alles zu wissen. Es gab keine Frage, die er nicht unverzüglich beantworten konnte, ja

manchmal nahm er die Antwort ahnungsvoll und kenntnisreich vorweg, ohne die Frage abzuwarten. Man raunte sich zu, daß der große Brockhaus, wenn er etwas nicht wußte, heimlich aufstand und im alten Eckstein nachsah. Als einmal die " Presse " eine Meldung brachte, in der von einem neuen Werk des Dichters Kun-Han-Su die Rede war, konnte der alte Eckstein seinen fragenden Jüngern sofort mit genauen Auskünften über das Schaffen dieses bedeutenden chinesischen Lyrikers aufwarten, der als einziger versuchte, eine unter den letzten Kaisern der Ming-Dynastie zur Hochblüte gelangte Versform wieder zu beleben. Zwar stellte sich am nächsten Tag heraus, daß es sich bei Kun-Han-Su lediglich um einen Übermittlungsfehler von Knut Hamsun handelte, aber der alte Eckstein hatte wieder einmal alles gewußt, und man respektierte ihn so sehr, daß man geneigt war, auch weiterhin an die Existenz eines chinesischen Lyrikers namens Kun-Han-Su zu glauben. »

(Die Tante Jolesch oder Der Untergang des Abendlandes in Anekdoten, München 1975, Seite 202.)

Therese Schlesinger

Friedrich Eckstein was the brother of the suffragette, Therese Schlesinger, and the Austro-Marxist Gustav Eckstein, father of the writer Percy Eckstein.

Therese Schlesinger's life was characterized by her desire for lifelong learning and her endeavors to alter the plight of working class women. She was a dedicated feminist who was inspired by the ideals of socialism, struggling to combine both of her political passions within the Social-Democratic Party. The widowed mother of a daughter, she devoted herself ardently to the Socialist cause despite her physical ailments. In March 1919, she was elected one of the 1st female Social-Democrats to the Austrian parliament and had a lasting impact on aspiring new female Socialists, such as Käthe Leichter (1895-1942) and Stella Klein-Löw (1904-1986) . In her autobiographic writings, Schlesinger-Eckstein hardly ever comments on her Jewish identity. However, given the context of an increasingly acculturated Jewish community in « turn of the Century Vienna » , this fact does not strike one as uncommon. Nevertheless, it still remains a subject of speculation whether the ambivalence of the Social-Democrats towards its many Jewish supporters contributed to her not undisputed position within the Party.

Therese Schlesinger-Eckstein was born in Vienna, on June 6, 1863, as the 3rd of 10 children in a Liberal Jewish family. Her father, Albert Eckstein (1825-1881) , a graduate of the Prague Technical University, was a pioneer in the development of parchment paper. He was an acquaintance of the philosophers Ernst Mach (1838-1916) and Joseph Popper-Lynkeus (1838-1921) . Her mother, Amalie Wehle (1836-1921) , was born in Prague and was unusually educated for a woman of her time. Together with her husband, she regularly attended seminars at Vienna University. Given the progressive atmosphere at home, it should come as no surprise that 4 out of the 8 surviving siblings (2 brothers died during infancy) are known as influential figures in « turn of the Century Vienna » . Schlesinger's older brother, Friedrich Eckstein (1861-1939) , the legendary « Mac Eck » , was a dazzling character on the Viennese intellectual scene. An expert in various academic fields, ranging from science, astronomy, linguistics and theology to mathematics and musicology (he was the secretary of composer Anton Bruckner) , he was closely acquainted with famous Viennese characters such as Sigmund Freud, Arthur Schnitzler, Karl Kraus (1874-1936) and the Social-Democrat Victor Adler (1852-1918) . Schlesinger's younger sister, Emma Eckstein (1865-1924) , active in the rising women's movement, was one of the 1st patients of Sigmund Freud and, subsequently, became one of his students. The youngest of the siblings, Gustav Eckstein (1875-1916) , was a renowned Social-Democrat and close friend of Karl Kautsky (1854-1938) .

Unlike her brothers, Schlesinger was denied a higher-education. In Habsburg-Austria, schools preparing girls for University were established only in the last decade of the 19th Century. Throughout her life, she constantly strove to overcome the limitations of her education and took great pains to achieve this goal. In the summer of 1888, she married Victor Schlesinger, a bank clerk 15 years her senior. In the following year, she gave birth to her daughter, Anna. The delivery turned into a traumatic experience : the midwife who assisted her during labor infected Schlesinger with a disease which crippled her for life. Shortly thereafter, her husband died of tuberculosis. During this fateful time, her friend Marie Lang (1858-1934) introduced her to the radical feminist organization, « Allgemeiner Österreichischer Frauenbund » , and, in 1894, Schlesinger became a member. She soon belonged to the close circle of activists around Auguste Fickert (1855-1910) , who became her mentor and encouraged her to publish her 1st articles. In 1896, Schlesinger participated in a conference on the conditions of Viennese female workers, which introduced her to the plight of the female proletariat and aroused her interest in Socialism. Deeply moved, she accepted an invitation to attend a meeting of female workers. Subsequently, she was caught in an inner-struggle between her feminist and Socialist loyalties. During this time, she started to attend the lectures of Emil Reich (1864-1940) on Social ethics at Vienna University. In the fall of 1897, Therese Schlesinger officially joined the Social-Democrats, but this step could not ultimately solve the conflict between her diverging political interests. Within the Social-Democratic Party, she was now confronted with ambiguous strategies regarding feminist questions.

This ambivalence made itself felt as early as spring 1898 in the course of the 1st Social-Democratic Women's Conference, when Party officials feared a weakening of its power by female separatism. The convention eventually took place with the Party's blessings. At about the same time, Therese started her eclectic publishing activities for various Socialist papers. Her 1st publication, in 1897, was an article in the German paper « Neue Zeit » , edited by the Socialist Karl Kautsky, who became her lifelong mentor and friend. Her correspondence with Kautsky and Auguste Fickert, in the following years, indicates that her position within the Party was not undisputed. Besides encountering accusations of female separatism, she was also met with reservation because of her Jewish origins and her bourgeois background, which was heightened by her political history in the feminist movement. Nevertheless, she dedicated herself fervently to the Social-Democratic cause and worked ceaselessly for the Party despite her physical ailments. One of her main agendas was the implementation of women's suffrage. At the Party Congress in Graz, in 1900, she criticized the Party's attitude towards this issue, stating that most officials conceive the question of voting rights as an issue related solely to the male proletariat. Her pamphlet, « What Women Want in Politics » (Vienna, 1909) , emphasized this subject and stressed the importance of educating women to political maturity. At the same time, she fought for the protection of working mothers and suggested the adoption of a national maternity insurance. Her publications in the Social-Democratic paper, « Der Kampf » , include several articles on this topic.

During World War I, Therese was among the members of the Leftist opposition under the leadership of Friedrich Adler (1879-1960) , who were fighting for the ideals of internationalism and peace, in a time dominated by avid War patriotism. In 1919, Therese Schlesinger, representing the Social-Democrats, was elected one of the 1st female members of parliament in the newly-founded Austrian Republic. In the year that followed, she attracted the attention of a circle of young female Socialists, including Käthe Leichter and Stella Klein-Löw, whose adored mentor and role model she became.

Therese Schlesinger remained politically active until 1933, when she retired from the Party leadership. In 1934, the Austrian Social-Democrats were forced into illegality. After the Nazi take-over, in 1938, she emigrated to France, where she died on June 5, 1940.

Emma Eckstein

La journaliste autrichienne, suffragette et auteur de livres pour enfants Emma Eckstein est née le 28 janvier 1865 à Gaudenzdorf et est morte d'une hémorragie cérébrale le 30 juillet 1924 à Vienne. Une célèbre patiente de Sigmund Freud, qui après son analyse est elle-même devenue psychanalyste pendant une très courte période. Elle est issue d'une grande famille viennoise de tradition socialiste, et participa activement au mouvement féministe.

À 27 ans, elle consulte Freud notamment pour des symptômes de douleurs intestinales et un syndrome dépressif lié à la menstruation. Il diagnostique alors un trauma psychologique dû à des abus sexuels dans l'enfance. Freud adresse sa patiente à son ami Wilhelm Fließ, selon qui un lien physique existe entre l'organe génital féminin et le nez (théorie de la « névrose nasale réflexe ») . Il l'opère du nez la même année. L'opération est un désastre. Fließ commet une grave erreur, en oubliant des cautères dans le nez de sa patiente. Ré-opérée, elle en gardera de graves lésions sur le visage toute sa vie. Freud s'était bien rendu compte que Fließ avait commis une faute grave, « un de ces actes manqués chirurgicaux » , mais il mit du temps à en tirer les conséquences dans sa ré-évaluation du savoir de son ami et confident.

Elle a écrit un livre sur l'éducation sexuelle des enfants, en 1904.

C'est une des patientes qui suscite encore la controverse au sujet de l'abandon de Freud de sa théorie de la séduction. Freud mettait ce type d'affirmation en doute à la faveur du fantasme œdipien considéré à son tour comme psycho-traumatogène.

...

Quand Freud chercha à comprendre d'où venaient les angoisses des gens, il mît au point la théorie de la séduction. Ainsi, selon lui, tout le monde connaîtrait un traumatisme sexuel dans sa petite enfance, subit ou vu. L'enfant le refoulerait, et se ferait un film à la place : le souvenir écran. Cependant, il y a des symptômes, car l'inconscient sait bien que ce souvenir n'est pas vrai. Freud fait donc parler ses patient sous hypnose, pour retrouver le trauma initial. Cependant, il finît par renoncer à cette théorie, entre autres à cause de nombreux échecs. Pour exemple, on peut citer le cas d'Emma Eckstein. Cette dernière était incapable de rentrer dans un magasin. Elle consulta Freud qui lui diagnostiqua donc un trauma psychologique, dû à des abus sexuels dans son enfance. Cependant, l'ami de Freud, et chirurgien Fließ lui diagnostiqua une névrose nasale. Il l'opéra, ce qui se révéla être une véritable boucherie. Freud dissimula ce cas, jusqu'à sa redécouverte après sa mort.

...

Dans son ouvrage « Le réel escamoté », Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson explique même que l'ensemble de l'édifice psychanalytique n'aurait pas vu le jour si Freud n'avait pas abandonné sa théorie de la séduction, par laquelle il reconnaissait que les abus sexuels subis par ses patients au cours de leur enfance étaient la cause de leurs névroses. Citant une correspondance avec Anna Freud, Masson écrit :

« Conserver la théorie de la séduction, cela aurait signifié abandonner le complexe d'Œdipe et, avec lui, toute l'importance de la vie fantasmatique, qu'il s'agisse du fantasme conscient ou inconscient. En fait, je pense qu'après cela, il n'y aurait pas eu de psychanalyse. »

À l'appui de sa thèse iconoclaste, Masson expose notamment le cas d'Emma Eckstein, une des Ires analysées de Freud, dont le calvaire (et pour cause) a été pratiquement occulté dans l'histoire de la psychanalyse. Pour Freud, cette femme de 27 ans souffrait de « symptômes hystériques » qui découlaient d'abus sexuels survenus dans l'enfance. Dans l'« Esquisse d'une psychologie scientifique », écrite à l'intention de Wilhelm Fließ, il suggère dans un 1er temps que des traumatismes refoulés pourraient effectivement être à l'origine de sa névrose :

« À l'âge de 8 ans, elle était entrée 2 fois dans la boutique d'un épicier pour y acheter des friandises et le marchand avait porté la main, à travers l'étoffe de sa robe, sur ses organes génitaux. »

Cependant, il ne fait pas de lien entre ces attouchements et le fait que la jeune femme se masturbe de façon compulsive, une pratique que Freud et Fließ considèrent au contraire comme cause du déclenchement des maladies névrotiques. Pour Fließ, le seul moyen d'y remédier est d'avoir recours à une intervention chirurgicale sur le nez de la patiente, qu'il considère comme le lieu physique d'un déplacement de ses problèmes sexuels. Freud, lui, abandonne la jeune femme - en « toute confiance », lui écrit-il - et Fließ mène l'opération de telle sorte qu'Emma fait plusieurs hémorragies dont elle faillit mourir. Au bout de 15 jours, Freud découvre que Fließ a laissé au moins 50 centimètres de gaze imprégnée de teinture d'iode dans sa cavité nasale, empêchant toute cicatrisation de la plaie.

Mis en cause par Emma Eckstein, Freud écrit :

« Tous ces événements, il est vrai, n'ont pas ébranlé l'opinion que j'ai de vous, mais m'ont à nouveau inspiré du respect pour la féminité primordiale contre laquelle je ne cesse de lutter. »

L'obsession des 2 hommes pour le nez d'Emma et leur acharnement chirurgical prennent un sens lorsqu'on considère qu'ils subirent l'un et l'autre, à 8 jours, une opération mutilante, non reconnue comme telle : l'ablation sanglante de leur prépuce par la circoncision rituelle. Cette intervention traumatisante menace la vie du bébé et les soins qui suivent peuvent rendre la cicatrisation difficile. Il est donc vraisemblable que Freud et Fließ ont fait usage de leur patiente pour mettre en scène un vécu refoulé et revivre (par personne interposée) la terreur d'anéantissement provoquée en son temps par leur propre circoncision. Le jeu de ce traumatisme et la gestion de son refoulement par déplacement sur l'organe nasal de leurs patientes apparaissent clairement dans ce commentaire de Wilhelm Fließ au sujet d'un autre cas, pour lequel selon lui toutes les méthodes gynécologiques avaient échoué :

« Au moment même où j'ai enlevé le cornet moyen gauche de son nez qui était hypertrophié, l'hémorragie utérine a complètement cessé. »

Pour ne pas mettre en cause son ami et interdire le dévoilement de sa propre vérité, Freud se livre alors à une véritable contorsion sémantique qui débouchera sur l'élaboration de sa théorie du fantasme, selon laquelle les abus évoqués par ses patients au cours de l'analyse sont le fruit de leur imagination. Il soutient que les hémorragies d'Emma n'avaient rien à voir avec une chirurgie désastreuse, mais étaient « d'origine hystérique, provoquées par des désirs inassouvis et survenaient probablement lors des périodes sexuellement propices ». Les responsabilités des 2 hommes dans les souffrances endurées par la jeune femme pourront ainsi être occultées et c'est pourquoi cette théorie sera si bien accueillie par ceux qui veulent éviter de mettre en cause les parents malveillants dans la genèse des troubles psychiques, en rendant les enfants responsables des maux qu'ils manifestent.

...

Une histoire moins connue est celle de l'abandon de la théorie de la séduction précoce par Freud, entre 1897 et 1903. La théorie de la séduction précoce par un adulte, pour expliquer certaines névroses, a été remplacée sans arguments solides par une autre théorie selon laquelle ce sont les enfants qui désirent les adultes et fantasment à propos d'eux. Cette théorie fait du complexe d'Œdipe une phase obligatoire du développement psychologique et affectif.

Une enquête à partir des Archives Sigmund Freud a montré que cette théorie résultait de l'échec du traitement d'Emma Eckstein, successivement par la psychanalyse et par une opération du nez effectuée par Wilhelm Fließ, ami et correspondant de Freud. Cette intervention se fondait sur la correspondance symbolique entre le nez et les organes sexuels. Selon Fließ, les dysménorrhées, la fatigue et les troubles de la marche de cette patiente étaient liés à la masturbation, et l'opération du nez devait résoudre le problème en modifiant ses réflexes. L'intervention effectuée par Fließ tourna à la catastrophe, et la patiente dut être ré-opérée par un chirurgien compétent.

Emma Eckstein se plaignait d'avoir été séduite par un adulte dans son enfance. Devant les échecs successifs de la psychanalyse et de l'intervention chirurgicale, Freud aboutit à la conclusion qu'Emma lui avait menti et qu'il n'y avait pas de séduction réelle, mais un simple fantasme. La correspondance de Freud et de Fließ fut publiée, mais expurgée des lettres qui racontaient en détail le cas d'Emma Eckstein et Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson, le psychanalyste qui avait découvert et publié cette histoire, fut licencié des Archives Sigmund Freud dont il avait la charge.

Bien que la personnalité de Masson soit controversée, ses conclusions s'appuient sur des documents solides et ont du sens au regard des données actuelles de l'épidémiologie. Elles montrent que la séduction réelle par des adultes, la violence et la négligence familiale sont des faits qui peuvent conduire à des troubles de personnalité graves à l'âge adulte, ce que tout psychologue peut constater chaque jour.

...

La psychanalyse est souvent perçue comme une affaire d'hommes. Pourtant, les femmes aussi ont contribué à son histoire, et ce dès l'origine. Patientes, disciples, elles sont devenues praticiennes et ont largement contribué, souvent au péril de leur réputation voire de leur vie, à faire évoluer les théories élaborées alors par Freud à Vienne, Jung à Zürich, avant Lacan à Paris. Éternelles exilées, elles furent, en Europe et aux États-Unis, les passeuses d'une science encore controversée.

Le début du XXe siècle accompagne l'ascension de ces pionnières qui posent les jalons d'une réflexion sur l'âme, telles Emma Eckstein, Ire femme psychanalyste, ou Lou Andreas-Salomé et Marie Bonaparte, fidèles partisans de Freud. Leurs confrères, sceptiques, apprennent bientôt à compter avec elles sur les bancs de l'Université. Margarethe Hilferding, docteure en médecine, est ainsi la première à entrer dans le cercle très fermé de l'Association psychanalytique de Vienne. Au sortir de la guerre, en 1920, au congrès de La Haye, elles sont presque toutes déjà là, aux côtés des hommes : Anna Freud, Melanie Klein, Sabina Spielrein, Helene Deutsch, Eugénie Sokolnicka et Hermine von Hug-Hellmuth. Alors que les femmes partout en Europe se mobilisent pour la cause féminine, elles jettent un regard nouveau sur l'inconscient, la femme, la sexualité et l'enfant, avec Françoise Dolto. Un bel hommage à 14 de ces femmes du XXe siècle, qui connurent des destins parfois tragiques, mais toujours exceptionnels, et sans lesquelles celles d'aujourd'hui n'auraient pas gagné le droit de penser autrement.

...

Emma Eckstein (1865-1924) was an Austrian author. She was « one of Sigmund Freud's most important patients and, for a short period of time around 1897, became a psychoanalyst herself » : she has, indeed, been described as « the 1st woman analyst. Emma Eckstein became both colleague and patient » for Freud. As analyst, while « working mainly in the area of sexual and social hygiene, she also explored how “ daydreams, those ' parasitic plants ', invaded the life of young girls ” » .

Ernest Jones placed her with such figures as Lou Andreas-Salomé and Joan Riviere as a « type of woman, of a more intellectual and, perhaps, masculine cast who played a part in his life, accessory to his male friends though of a finer calibre » .

« Emma Eckstein was born in Vienna, on 28 January 1865, to a well-known bourgeois family » with close connections to Freud : « one of her brothers was Gustav Eckstein (1875-1916) , a Social-Democrat and associate of Karl Kautsky, the leader of the Socialist Party ; and a sister, Therese Schlesinger, a Socialist, was one of the 1st women members of parliament » . Another brother, Friedrich, appears (anonymously) in Freud's « Civilization and its Discontents » as a « friend of mine, whose insatiable craving for knowledge has led him to make the most unusual experiments » , including « the practices of Yoga. He sees in them a physiological basis, as it were, for much of the wisdom of mysticism » .

Emma, herself, was active in the Viennese women's movement, « collaborating with “ Dokumente der Frauen and Neues Frauenleben ” » .

After an nose operation in 1910, however, « Emma took to her couch, and remained a partial invalid until she died on 30 July 1924 of a cerebral haemorrhage » .

When she was 27, she went to Freud, seeking treatment for vague symptoms including stomach ailments and slight depression related to menstruation. Freud diagnosed Eckstein as suffering from hysteria and believed that she masturbated to excess ; masturbation, in those days, was considered dangerous to mental health. Her « treatment lasted something in the region of 3 years - one of the most protracted and detailed of Freud's early cases » .

In her analysis, Emma Eckstein « supplied Freud with the material that would allow him to theorize hysteric symptomology » taught Freud about « the no-man's land between fantasy and memory, resonating with sadistic acts and fantasies of a former historical epoch » . Her « eager collaboration in her analysis gave Freud much precious material, contributed substantial changes and fundamental new elements to his theories : the wish theory of psychosis and dream ; the transference reconstruction of her early pleasures and fantastic scenes from her inner life » . In particular, Freud's theory of deferred action owed much to « Emma Eckstein's twinned scenes in shops » . « Now, this case is typical of repression in hysteria. We invariably find that a memory has been repressed which has only become a trauma through deferred action. »

Freud suspected, in addition to hysteria, a « nasal reflex neurosis » , a condition popularized by his friend and collaborator Wilhelm Fließ - an ear, nose, and throat specialist. Fließ had been treating « nasal reflex neurosis » by cauterizing the inside of the nose under local anesthesia, with cocaine used as the anesthetic. Fließ found that the treatment yielded positive results, in that his patients became less depressed. Fließ conjectured that if temporary cauterization was temporarily useful, perhaps, surgery would yield more permanent results. He began operating on the noses of patients he diagnosed with the disorder, including Emma Eckstein and even Freud, himself.

Eckstein's surgery was a disaster. She suffered from terrible infections for some time, and profuse bleeding. Freud called in a specialist, his old school friend, Doctor Ignaz Rosanes, who removed a mass of surgical gauze that Fließ had not removed. Eckstein's nasal passages were so damaged that she was left permanently disfigured. Freud initially attributed this damage to the surgery, but later, as an attempt to reassure his friend that he shouldn't blame himself, Freud reiterated his belief that the initial nasal symptoms had been due to hysteria.

Guilt over the episode has been identified as contributing to the dream of Irma's injection in « The Interpretation of Dreams » :

« Max Schur grasped right away the significance of the episode to the “ Irma ” dream in his paper on the specimen dream. »

Eckstein is also associated with Freud's seduction theory. In 1897, Freud cites her analytic findings to Fließ as support for his « so-called seduction theory, the claim that all neuroses are the consequences of an adult's, usually a father's, sexual abuse of a child » . Freud wrote that :

« Eckstein deliberately treated her patient in such a manner as not to give her the slightest hint of what would emerge from the unconscious and in the process obtained from her the identical scenes with the father. »

Jeffrey Masson in his assault on Freud's abandonment of the seduction theory makes much of Eckstein's role, linking Freud's « abandonment » of her position with respect to the Fließ surgery to his « abandonment » of her evidence for the paternal etiology of neurosis : for « the idea (which even Masson concedes is crazy) that all neurotic patients had been sexually abused » .

Yet, while few (since Max Schur) would dissent that in regard to the failed surgery « Freud's evasiveness is blatant. Freud was eager to protect Fließ from the obvious charge of careless, almost fatal malpractice » , there is, at the same time, much to suggest that « as far as the seduction theory is concerned, Eckstein is a red herring, no more relevant than Freud's other patients. The fact that Masson lavishes so much attention on her is because Emma Eckstein is, for him, a woman whom Freud and Fließ abused. She is, thus, the prototypical psychoanalytic victim of this symbolic function. »

In 1904, « Eckstein had published a small book on the sexual education of children » , although, in it, « she does not mention Freud » . A few years later, however, in his open letter on « The Sexual Enlightenment of Children » , Freud refers to her book approvingly, highlighting « the charming letter of explanation which a certain “ Frau ” Emma Eckstein quotes as having been written by her to her son when he was about 10 years old » .

...

Emma Eckstein's relationship to Sigmund Freud and to psychoanalysis has been shrouded in mystery. Only vague hints as to her connection with Freud have emerged from the standard sources. Ernest Jones (Volume 2 ; pages 469) writes that Freud found the psychology of women more enigmatic than that of men. Freud was interested in another type of woman, of a more intellectual and, perhaps, masculine cast. Such women, several times, played a part in his life, accessory to his men friends though of a finer caliber, but they had no erotic attraction for him. Minna Bemays, then, in chronological order : Emma Eckstein ; Loe Kann ; Lou Andreas-Salome ; Joan Riviere ; Marie Bonaparte. It is not clear from whom Jones heard this, whether from Freud himself, or, more likely, from his daughter Mathilde. (The letters between Jones and Mathilde are in the Jones Archives in the Institute for Psycho-Analysis, in London. I could not find any reference to Emma Eckstein, there.)

Emma Eckstein was born in Vienna on January 28, 1865, the child of Albert (born in 1825) and Amalia (born Wehle, in 1836) Eckstein, and died on July 30, 1924, of « apoplexiacerebri » . Emma Eckstein had 5 sisters and 2 brothers. Her eldest sister, Kathe Hirsch, was the mother of Albert Hirst and Doctor A. Elias, both of whom granted interviews to K. R. Eißler in the 1950's about their « Aunt » Emma. (These interviews are now at the Library of Congress, in sealed archives.) One of Emma's brothers, Friedrich Eckstein, was referred to, by Freud, in : « Civilization and Its Discontents » (SE, 21 ; page 72) .

According to Anna Freud :

« Another friend of mine, whose insatiable craving for knowledge has led him to make the most unusual experiments and has ended by giving him encyclopædic knowledge, has assured me that through the practices of Yoga, by withdrawing from the world, by fixing the attention on bodily functions and by peculiar methods of breathing, one can in fact evoke new sensations and “ cœnesthesias ” in oneself, which he regards as regressions to primordial states of mind which have long ago been overlaid. »

Friedrich Eckstein, called « the philosopher of the “ Ringstraße ” » , was a Sanskritist, a vegetarian, a close friend of Hugo Wolf, Anton Bruckner, and other musicians, and wrote articles about psychoanalysis. His autobiography, which Freud took with him to London, « “ Alte unnennbare Tage ! ” Erinnerungen aus 70 Lehr- und Wanderjahren » (Ineffable Days of Old Memories of 70 Years of Travel and Study) , edited in 1936 by Herbert Reichner (Vienna / Leipzig / Zürich) , mentions Freud several times (pages 20-24) .

There is some information given about the father, Albert Eckstein, an inventor, who had a parchment factory but, otherwise, he says little about the family. Emma Eckstein is not mentioned by name.

The other brother, Gustav Eckstein (1875-1916) , a Social-Democrat, was an associate of Karl Kautsky, the leader of the Socialist Party, in Austria. Gustav died of tuberculosis, at an early age. He is mentioned on page 214 of the « Österreichische Biographische Lexikon » (1815-1950) .

Karl Kautsky's son, an obstetrician, was a friend of Emma Eckstein. According to Mrs. Ella Heinz, a friend of his, whom I interviewed in Berkeley, in 1981, he spoke of an ill-fated gynecological operation that Freud encouraged, which eventually led to Emma Eckstein's death. I have not been able to confirm this from any other source, and Mrs. Heinz's memory of what Doctor Kautsky told her about this was rather vague. Emma Eckstein's sister, Therese Schlesinger, was one of the 1st women members of parliament. Her biography is found in : Alfred Magaziner. « Die Wegbereiter : Aus der Geschichte der Arbeiterbewegung » , Volksbuchverlag, Vienna (1975) ; pages 216-219.

We do not know much about Emma Eckstein's early life. Until 1905, she wrote articles ; after that, she seems to have withdrawn from the world and lived in a room, surrounded by books, never leaving her couch, apparently confined to it by a puzzling ailment which those around her considered hysterical in origin but which she felt was organic. A single mysterious line from an unpublished passage in a letter to Fließ (12 December 1897) indicates that Emma Eckstein, at Freud's request, saw patients. The passage itself is about the seduction theory. The 1st line begins :

« Die Eckstein hat ihre Patientin so behandelt, daß sie ... » (Eckstein treated her patient in such a way that ...)

From the rest of the passage (see above : page 114) , it is clear that the treatment she used was nothing other than psychoanalysis. It is, unfortunately, the only such passage in the letters - nothing further is said about Emma's seeing patients. Fließ seems to have known about it, since Freud does not feel it necessary to explain to him why Emma would be seeing patients. Under what circumstances, for how long, and with what results, are all questions that cannot be answered.

In the Library of Congress, there is a series of 14 unpublished letters, given to the library by Emma Eckstein's nephew, Albert Hirst, that Freud wrote to Emma Eckstein between 1895 and 1910. One of these is simply a visiting-card, which reads, on the envelope :

« Fraulein Emma Eckstein
V Siebenbrunnengasse 15 »

On the other side, it is written :

« Doktor Sigmund Freud
Dozent für Nervenkrankheiten an der Universität Wien,
ord. 3-5 h. IX, Berggasse 19
Dies ist Fraulein Stella Pfeffer, 19 Jahr Ihr
Pflegekind und so weiter »

The card is not dated. But since Freud uses the title « Dozent » , this was before he received the title of « Außerordentlicher » (Associate) Professor (before 1902) .

The text reads :

« This is to introduce Miss Stella Pfeffer, 19 years old, your foster child, etc. No doubt the “ etc. ” referred to the fact that Freud had already discussed the “ case ” with Emma Eckstein before sending her. It appears to be a referral of a patient. »

Emma Eckstein had written about the sexual enlightenment of children as early as 1899, in an article published in the socialist « Die neue Zeit » entitled, « Eine wichtige Erziehungsfrage » - An Important Question in Education (« Die neue Zeit, Revue des geistigen und öffentlichen Lebens » , Band 18, 1899-1900 ; pages 666-669) . She writes there that a child knows shame only slightly, or not at all, knows no sexual feelings of any kind, and so, can only guess that there are other reasons, besides the desire to have children, that would fuel the desire to have sexual intercourse.

...

... moreover, « of a highly-fantastic kind » . Could this possibly be a reference to the shame she felt at having had ideas of being seduced as a child ? No doubt, by this time, she was well-aware that Freud felt she had never, in fact, been seduced, but was a severe masturbator, given-over to inventing stories « of a highly-fantastic kind » . At the end of her book, Emma Eckstein speaks of a fear that many young women had that « by dancing, by topical (medical) treatment such as massages and the like, or through a kiss, they could become pregnant » (page 30) . She hints that she, herself, « treated » such cases :

« Here, I wish to stress as well : I am not aware of a single case that can be thought of as the result of a constitutional predisposition to illness or lack of intelligence. When I, for the 1st time, succeeded with much difficulty in eliciting such a secret from a well-read, gifted 18 year old girl who had been educated accordingly when, for the 1st time, I came to see the emotional anguish of such a helpless being, I believed, deeply shaken, I was faced with the specific product of a diseased imagination. Once my attention had been drawn to it, though, experience taught me that this fantasy was not at all unusual, but is the exceedingly painful result of a lack of knowledge. »

She, then, proceeds to the device of an invented letter :

« I believe the best way to express my views and ideas, in regard to this subject, is by means of the following letter which is conceived (“gedacht”) as part of a correspondence between a mother and her child and is to provide the desired enlightenment from afar. »

Why would Emma choose to include a letter that could be mistaken for a real one to an imaginary son (who could also be mistaken for a real son) ? The theme of an unmarried mother (vaguely hinted at by the fact that the mother is writing to her son from far away - almost as if they were not to meet again) was very important to Emma Eckstein. She has a short article, in : « Dokumente der Frauen, “Das Dienstmädchen als Mutter” » (Servant as Mother), published in 1899 («Dokumente der Frauen», Volume 2, No. 14, 1899-1900, edited by August Fickert, Marie Lang, and Rosa Mayreder ; pages 594-598). The article is about «unmarried girls who come, at a very tender age, from the country to the city» (page 595), where they take-up service in a wealthy household, convinced they are «under the protection of the family». But, in reality, their protectors too often turn into their seducers :

«The inexperienced girls are only too easily made the victims of the men of the household.»

Emma, then, points-out :

«Our laws, which protect all our property, do not recognize the honour of somebody who serves, and these poor young girls are without rights and without protection even in the eyes of the law. A telling proof of this is paragraph No. 504 of our “Laws of Tort”: A guest in the house who dishonours a minor daughter, or a minor relative of the male or female head of the house who belongs to the household, is liable, for this transgression, to be punished with incarceration from 1 to 3 months according to the relationship to the family. Paragraph 505 says that the same punishment is to be meted-out to a woman servant in the family who commits a sexual felony on a minor son or a minor relative who is living in the house. So, we see : according to Austrian law, ... »

...

Freud adds :

«I do not believe that this touching letter brought the 2 sisters the enlightenment they wanted. Later on, the writer of it fell ill from unanswered questions of obsessional brooding.»

Freud clearly knows a great deal about the letter and the person who wrote it, and the person who did not answer it. As if impelled by some inner-need that he does not communicate, Freud adds a footnote, in 1924 :

«After some years, however, her obsessional brooding gave way to a dementia præcox.»

It is not beyond the realm of possibility that Emma Eckstein had an illegitimate child, and that her letter is, in fact, based on reality. If the child was 10, at the time this book was written in 1904, then, she would have given birth in 1894, during her analysis. Being in analysis, she would have told Freud, and possibly nobody else. I must stress that none of the 6 people I spoke to, who knew Emma Eckstein, had ever heard any such rumour. Nor do I believe this is anything more than speculation. But it is one more piece of evidence that the mystery surrounding Emma Eckstein has, by no means, been resolved.

One more, perhaps minor, but nevertheless intriguing revelation comes from an unpublished letter that Freud wrote to Emma Eckstein, on April 17, 1904 :

« Dear Emma :

At last, I can give you the answer I owe you - I have been speaking so much that I did not get around to writing. So, as far as the thesis (or sentence) is concerned, you can make whatever use of it you wish. As soon as your work has seen the light of day, I will write, in accordance with your ideas, a review, add to it the censure (“ Tadel ? ”) you and I both wish and, then, offer the whole thing to the “ Neue Freie Presse ”. Anyway, it will take some time before it is printed. I will not demand that it appear in the Sunday issue. I know that such wishes do not allow themselves to be fulfilled and, in any event, it is entirely immaterial (on what day the review appears) . »

This comes from the collection of 14 unpublished letters to Emma Eckstein in the Library of Congress. It could well be that because Freud never did manage to publish the review, the open letter to Doctor Furst appeared in place of the promised review. From a later letter of February 11, 1905, from Freud to Emma Eckstein, we learn that the « Neue Freie Presse » rejected the review, and Freud intended to re-write it and send it elsewhere :

« Dear Emma :

So that you don't do away with yourself, which would be a grave loss for me, I am enclosing the response of the “ Neue Freie Presse ” to the letter we discussed. I answered :

“ I am perfectly prepared to re-write it but, this time, I must request assurance that it will appear next Sunday. ”

As of now, there has been no answer. And now, I believe we are finally free of the “ Neue Freie Presse ” and can write the article for another newspaper and I hope get it published. And this time, it should be better.

Cordial greetings,

Your Doctor Freud »

Whether he ever did so, or whether he repaid this « debt » to a patient with the reference to her, in the 1907 article, is not known. My attempts to find the review have been unsuccessful.

At the end of his life, in 1937, Freud published « Analysis Terminable and Interminable » (SE, 23) . It would seem that, to the end of his days, he was preoccupied with Emma Eckstein. For, if I am not mistaken, that work contains a hidden reference to her case. Freud writes (page 222) :

« I now pass on to my 2nd example, which raises the same problem (as Ferenczi's analysis) . An unmarried woman, no longer young, had been cut-off from life since puberty by an inability to walk, owing to severe pains in the legs. Her condition was obviously of a hysterical nature, and it had defied many kinds of treatment. An analysis lasting 3 quarters of a year removed the trouble and restored to the patient, an excellent and worthy person, her right to a share in life. In the years following her recovery, she was consistently unfortunate. There were disasters in her family, and financial losses, and, as she grew older, she saw every hope of happiness in love and marriage vanish. But the one-time invalid stood-up to all this valiantly and was a support to her family in difficult times. I cannot remember whether it was 12 or 14 years after the end of her analysis that, owing to profuse haemorrhages, she was obliged to undergo a gynecological examination. A myoma was found, which made a complete hysterectomy advisable. From the time of this operation, the woman became ill, once more. She fell in love with her surgeon, wallowed in masochistic phantasies about the fearful changes in her inside-phantasies with which she concealed her romance - and proved inaccessible to a further attempt at analysis. She remained abnormal to the end of her life. The successful analytic treatment took place so long ago that we cannot expect too much from it ; it was in the earliest years of my work as an analyst. No doubt, the patient's 2nd illness may have sprung from the same source as her 1st one which had been successfully overcome : it may have been a different manifestation of the same repressed impulses, which the analysis had only incompletely resolved. But I am inclined to think that, were it not for the new trauma, there would have been no fresh outbreaks of neurosis. »

Certain facts speak in favour of identifying this patient as Emma Eckstein. 1st of all, the dates : when Freud speaks of the analysis having taken place « in the earliest years of my work as an analyst » , we must assume this to be between 1894 and 1898. Emma Eckstein's analysis certainly fell within this period. The letters to Fließ about her cover a period of about 3 quarters of a year, precisely the time Freud mentions as having been given-over to her analysis. The gynecological operation took place 12 to 14 years later, between 1908 and 1912. Do we have anything from that period that would indicate that Freud was in contact with Emma Eckstein ? Yes. In the Library of Congress, among the papers that Emma Eckstein left her nephew, Albert Hirst, is a medical prescription, dated May 24, 1910. It is for boric acid for the vagina. It is made-out to Miss Emma Eckstein (Emma Eckstein never married) , and it is signed by Sigmund Freud. Freud says that this was one of his earliest cases. Albert Hirst, her nephew, in an interview with K. R. Eißler, on March 16, 1952 (from the Jones Archives in London) , writes :

« This “ Aunt ” Emma, Freud's 1st patient, while her whole life was marred by a hysteria, still had unusual qualities. »

Freud says that she was « an excellent and worthy person » . Freud writes that the analysis of this patient was a success. Hirst also wrote an autobiography, « Analysed and Re-educated by Freud Himself » , which was never published. (Albert Hirst's niece, Doctor Hanna E. Kapit, in New York, kindly sent me a copy of this autobiography.) He begins the chapter entitled, « Aunt Emma » with these words :

« One of Freud's earliest successes as an analyst, perhaps his earliest, was the cure of the neurosis of my aunt Emma. »

In the interview with Eißler, he said :

« I think it was of importance to him (Freud) in his practice that he had this great success, this well-known girl, this girl of a well-known family. Now, she was a very beautiful woman and after he had this great success, she, for several years, led a perfectly normal life. »

Freud says :

« She was a support to her family. »

Hirst, in the interview, says :

« She also, after the marriage of her 2 older sisters, ran my grandmother's household. That was quite a task - 6 members, and always open-house. »

Freud tells us that this patient suffered a relapse. Hirst, in his chapter on Emma Eckstein, writes :

« Then, Emma suffered a relapse. I have a notion that she was all her life in love with a certain Vienna architect, and that her relapse came after he got married, or after she became convinced in some other way that her love was hopeless. »

Freud says that there were disasters in the family and financial losses, and Hirst (interview) says that :

« She ran a rather complicated household which had to be run in a certain way on very little money, with most incredible efficiency. »

As for the symptom of not being able to walk, Hirst (autobiography) writes that :

« She spent all her days on her couch, never left her room, not even for meals, could not walk. »

(This is also mentioned in a letter to Fließ.)

Freud writes that :

« She proved inaccessible to a further attempt at analysis. »

And Hirst (interview) says :

« There was a time when, I remember, I don't think it was during the time that I was in analysis, but it may have been. Anyhow, Freud would come to her and try to continue the analysis. There was a conflict between him and her. »

Freud ends by saying that :

« She remained abnormal to the end of her life. »

Hirst (autobiography) writes :

« Emma soon returned to her couch on which she had lived so long. She survived, as a hopeless invalid, for another 10 years. »

A Letter to Emma Eckstein

« November 30, 1905.

Dear Emma :

It won't do you any good if you deprive me of my title. It cannot change much between us, and I change my sentiments with as much difficulty as I do my opinions. Let me, therefore, repeat that it is only a nasty accident if I cannot resume your treatment. As though it had waited for you, the onslaught started after you stayed away so that within 1 week, I had to accept 4 patients and decline 2. You are only too familiar with the sad necessity of having to make a living ; and the touchiness you betray, though at a distance (that I should have treated you without expecting money from you) is something that is so little like you that I am convinced this will be the 1st thing you will take back. But it naturally has as much to do with the other. That you could be so misled, could so misunderstand the freedom to say anything in the treatment, and attribute to me the intention of offending you when I relied on my unshakable trust in your friendship and your love of truth, in order to permit you to obtain insight into a delicate but, nevertheless, usual and expectable transference - that, it is true, did not shake my opinion of you, but it did, again, instill in me respect for the elemental femaleness with which I constantly have to struggle. I am not surprised then that you also do not comprehend other sentences in my letter which cannot be misunderstood. I cannot possibly have meant anything but that it is impossible for me to let the discontinuation of treatment (the interruption, I hope) be explained with the pretext that I regard your pains as organic. That you would have to say something else instead which is closer to the truth, to explain the break, for example, that we had a quarrel ; that you could not accept something that I asserted and the like ; that you wanted some time in which to think things over or something similar.

May I, at the end, draw your attention to a small contradiction which is, in fact, at the bottom of your being angry. At one time, I am supposed to have offended you by denying you the qualities that would attract a man ; the other time, I must have offended you by explaining to you how it happened that in our relationship love did not appear. Can both injuries really be comprehended from the same stand-point ? I hope you will soon tell me : No (which, after all, you like to say) and, therefore, I remain with cordial greetings,

Your Doctor Freud »

The 1952 interview with Emma's nephew, Albert Hirst, is instructive. He tells Doctor Eißler :

« There was a Viennese woman physician, the daughter of a rather well-known physician - a Doctor Dora Teleky. Now, she was a friend of the family and I thought she was a very good-looking woman, incidentally, and I admired her. She, one day, was visiting Emma, while Freud was analyzing Emma in the 2nd stage, and discovered a ... oh, some ulcer or something, anyhow, some pus collection on her abdomen, and pretended to operate it and that was supposed to be the answer for the trouble, and Emma immediately had a great recovery and could get-up, and here was the proof that this thing was physical. And that must have happened while I was in analysis because I remember how indignant Freud was about Doctor Teleky for this interference, and he immediately stopped the analysis and said :

« Well, that's the end of Emma. That dooms her from now on, nobody can cure her neurosis. »

Hirst tells the same story, slightly differently, in his unpublished autobiography :

« The 2nd event : Doctor Dora T(eleky) , a friend of the family, a woman physician, came to see Emma as a friendly visitor. She claimed suddenly to have discovered an abscess near Emma's navel and drained it. Dora claimed that she had found the source of Emma's illness and had cured it. She, thus, confirmed Emma in her rejection of Freud's diagnosis of a recurrence of her old neurosis. When I told that to Freud the next day, he was furious. He took Dora's " diagnosis " as a fake. That, to him, was a matter of course. He called it a highly-unprofessional ... »

...

Emma Eckstein (geboren 28. Januar 1865 in Gaudenzdorf ; gestorben 30. Juli 1924 in Wien) war eine österreichische Publizistin, Frauenrechtlerin und Kinderbuchautorin. Prominenz erlangte sie vor allem als eine von Sigmund Freuds wichtigsten frühen Patientinnen.

« Über Emma Ecksteins frühe Jahre wissen wir nicht viel. Bis 1905 schrieb sie einige Aufsätze ; danach scheint sie sich aus dem öffentlichen Leben zurückgezogen und in einem Zimmer voller Bücher gelebt zu haben ; aufgrund einer rätselhaften Krankheit, die ihre Umgebung für hysterisch, sie selbst aber für organisch bedingt hielt, war sie ihr Leben lang an ihre Couch gefesselt. »

(Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson, 1984 ; Seite 265.)

Emma Eckstein war Mitglied einer prominenten jüdischen Familie mit engen Verbindungen zu Freud. Nach dem frühen Tod des Vaters, des Chemikers und Erfinders Albert Eckstein, übernahm die Mutter die Leitung der durch ihn gegründeten Papierfabrik. Emma hatte neun Geschwister : fünf Schwestern und vier Brüder. Zwei Brüder starben schon im Kindesalter. Einer ihrer Brüder war der Polyhistor Friedrich Eckstein, ein anderer Gustav Eckstein (1875-1916) , ein Sozialdemokrat und Genosse des deutsch-tschechischen Philosophen und sozialdemokratischen Politikers Karl Kautsky ; ihre zwei Jahre ältere Schwester, Therese Schlesinger, eine der ersten weiblichen Mitglieder des Nationalrates, war eine Anhängerin Freuds und suchte die Psychoanalyse zum Gegenstand sozialdemokratischer Politik zu machen. Emma scheint selbst aktiv an der Wiener Frauenbewegung beteiligt gewesen zu sein : Beide Schwestern waren Mitglied im linksliberal orientierten Allgemeinen österreichischen Frauenverein. Sie waren verwandt mit dem Arzt und Psychoanalytiker Paul Federn. Ihr Neffe war Albert Hirst, der im Herbst 1909 bei Freud eine Behandlung begann. Emma Eckstein war mit der Familie Freud befreundet ; insbesondere mit Minna Bernays, der Schwester von Freuds Gattin Martha. Die Familien Freud und Eckstein verbrachten gemeinsame Urlaube. Seit 1905 führte Emma zusammen mit ihrer früh verwitweten Schwester Therese, der Mutter Amalie und dem Bruder Gustav einen gemeinsamen Haushalt. Um die Jahrhundertwende veröffentlichte Emma Eckstein unter dem Einfluß ihrer Gespräche mit Freud einige Texte, in denen sie zu Fragen der Sexualerziehung Stellung nahm.

1899 erschien in der sozialistischen Zeitschrift Die neue Zeit ein Aufsatz zur sexuellen Aufklärung von Kindern, in dem sie die erzieherische Dringlichkeit einer kindgemäßen Darstellung des elterlichen Geschlechtsverkehrs betont. Da das Kind weder Scham noch sexuelle Empfindungen kenne, solle der Geschlechtsakt als Zeugungswunsch der Eltern und Ausdruck von Liebe und Zärtlichkeit dem Kind verständlich und emotional zugänglich gemacht werden.

An gleicher Stelle polemisierte sie in einer späteren Rezension gegen eine mütterliche Erziehung, die den Töchtern Triebangst und Schamgefühl (wegen eines unehelichen Kindes) vermittelt.

Ist der Tenor ihrer Publikationen häufig der Hinweis auf die Seelenqualen und Tagträumereien vor allem junger Frauen, die durch fehlende oder unzulängliche Sexualaufklärung verursacht sind, so wendet sie sich in Das Dienstmädchen als Mutter (1900) dem juristischen Aspekt des Themas zu : der strafrechtlichen Behandlung der Verführung unerfahrener Mädchen vom Lande durch seine Dienstherrn in der Gastfamilie : Die zeitgenössische Gesetzeslage schütze die Familienangehörigen vor solchen Übergriffen seitens des Personals, welche als strafwürdiges Vergehen angesehen seien ; sie schütze aber nicht die Ehre des Mädchens, das sich in familiärer Obhut glaubt.

In Die Vorbereitung der Frau zur Lebensarbeit von 1899 setzt Eckstein sich zustimmend mit den Ansichten der Münchener Ärztin Doktor Adams-Lehmann auseinander : Diese fordert eine physische Ertüchtigung in der Mädchenerziehung und Aufhebung beruflicher Einschränkung für Frauen.

In einer durch Freud kritisch begleiteten und durch Leihgaben aus seiner Fachbibliothek unterstützten Broschüre von 1904, Die Sexualfrage in der Erziehung des Kindes befasst sie sich unter Berufung auf die zeitgenössische Wissenschaft und führende Psychiater mit der Schädlichkeit kindlicher Masturbation :

« Für die Kindheit ist die Masturbation ein tückischer Feind. Unbemerkt und ungeahnt schleicht er sich in die Kinderstube ein und arbeitet dort emsig an der Zerstörung von Jugend und Kraft, von Körper und Geist seiner Opfer, die ihm überlassen bleiben, weil die berufenen Hüter die Gefahr nicht verdrängen, oder auch nur sehen gelernt haben. »

(Emma Eckstein, 1904.)

Sie empfiehlt die Verbündung des Erziehers mit dem gesunden Willen des Kindes mit dem Ziel, die Verachtung des Kindes für solche Regungen zu bestärken.

Motiv solcher kindlicher Selbstbefriedigung sei die Entschädigung für entzogene Liebe, der Mangel elterlicher Zuwendung.

Im Zusammenhang mit dieser Publikation kam es um 1905 schließlich zu einem Streit zwischen Freud und Eckstein. Freud sah sich (offenbar durch eine Suizidandrohung seitens der Eckstein genötigt), trotz ablehnender Bescheide seitens der Presse, zu weiteren Bemühungen veranlasst, eine wohlwollend kritische Rezension zu platzieren. Im Anschluß daran ging es um den Wunsch Emmas, erneut (und ohne Berechnung) therapiert zu werden, den Freud, der mittlerweile vielbeschäftigt war, zumindest vorläufig ablehnen mußte. Emma fühlte sich daraufhin offenbar durch Freud auf lieblose Weise zurückgestoßen und in ihrer weiblichen Ehre gekränkt, welchen Vorwurf dieser in einem Antwortschreiben durch Hinweis auf dessen innere Widersprüchlichkeit zu parieren suchte.

1908 rezensierte sie in der Zeitschrift Neues Frauenleben den unter Pseudonym veröffentlichten Lebensbericht des Pseudohermaphroditen Karl M. Baers (Pseudonym : N. O. Body).

Nach einer gynäkologischen Operation (vermutlich Hysterektomie aufgrund eines Myombefundes) um 1910, mit der zugleich ihre Beziehung zu Sigmund Freud ihr endgültiges Ende fand, war zog Emma Eckstein sich völlig zurück. Dem Bericht ihres Neffen Albert Hirst zufolge kollidierte diese Operation mit einem erneuten Therapieversuch durch Freud, der diese Operation als verhängnisvolle Fehlentscheidung und ärztlichen Schwindel angesehen habe, welcher Emmas Neurose unheilbar mache. Die Operation wurde veranlasst durch Doktor Dora Teleky, einer Freundin der Familie Eckstein.

1918 erschien ihr Kinderbuch Von Spinnen und Ameisen, das 1962 eine Neuauflage erfuhr.

Emma Eckstein starb am 30. Juli 1924 an einer Hirnblutung.

Zwischen 1892 und 1893 begab sich Emma Eckstein im Alter von 27 Jahren vermutlich wegen einer als hysterisch diagnostizierten Gehstörung, neurotischen Angstzuständen und vager Symptome wie Magenschmerzen und leichter Depressionen in Verbindung mit ihrer Menstruation bei Freud in psychoanalytische Behandlung. Die genaue Art ihrer Beschwerden ist unbekannt.

In der Auseinandersetzung mit der komplexen Symptomatik Emma Ecksteins entwickelte Freud seine Vorstellungen über mögliche ätiologische Modelle zur Pathogenese der Hysterie (Verführung als Kindheitstrauma, Hysterie als Abwehrbeziehungsweise Psychoneurose).

Die Therapie, deren intensive Phase wohl ein dreiviertel Jahr beanspruchte, muß in Hinsicht auf die erwähnten Gehstörungen zunächst ein Erfolg gewesen sein. Sie habe, so der Neffe Albert Hirst, im Anschluß einige Jahre ein völlig normales Leben geführt und dieser Erfolg sei angesichts der Prominenz der Ecksteins im damaligen Wien für Freud nicht unbedeutend gewesen.

« Wir hatten ihr also unrecht getan ; sie war gar nicht abnorm gewesen. »

(Freud an Fließ am 8. März 1895)

Freud stellte Fließ Emma Eckstein im Dezember 1894 vor. Die Operation fand im Februar 1895 statt. Die Gründe, die Freud bewogen haben, Emma Eckstein durch seinen Freund und kollegialen Intimus begutachten und operieren zu lassen, können nur rekonstruiert werden.

Freud vermutete bei Eckstein, zusätzlich zur Hysterie, eine « Nasenreflex-Neurose », ein neuartiges, medizinisch unorthodoxes Krankheitsbild, das von seinem Freund Wilhelm Fließ, einem Hals-, Nasen- und Ohrenarzt vertreten wurde.

Fließ führte eine Reihe von Beschwerden, über die Eckstein geklagt haben muß, auf einen Symptomkomplex zurück, den er von sogenannten Genitalstellen in der Nase aus zu beeinflussen suchte : Darunter Menstruationsbeschwerden und neuralgische Magenschmerzen (die er zugleich und unter Berufung auf Freuds sexualätiologische Begründung der Neurasthenie als typische Folge der Onanie beschrieb) . Während Freud also bemüht war, die als hysterisch diagnostizierten Symptome der Eckstein analytisch zu therapieren, überließ er die Beschwerden, die er als nicht psychoneurotisch bedingt ansah, seinem Freund und Kollegen.

Fließ behandelte diese Beschwerden durch Kokain und Kauterisation innerhalb der Nase. Dies führte seiner Ansicht nach zu temporären positiven Ergebnissen, wie der Verbesserung depressiver Symptome. Er nahm an, daß eine Operation am Knochen der Nasenmuschel, im Gegensatz zur Kauterisation, zu dauerhafter Besserung führen könnte und begann, an diagnostizierten PatientInnen Operationen durchzuführen, zu deren frühesten Kandidaten Eckstein gehörte.

Emma Ecksteins Operation war ein Desaster. Sie litt an Infektionen und starken Blutungen ; Freud rief Robert Gersuny zur Hilfe, den er ursprünglich schon bei der Operation gerne dabei gehabt hätte. Gersuny leistete ersten Beistand, verhielt sich jedoch, so Freud, eher ablehnend. Freuds befreundeter Kollege Rosanes kam schließlich an seiner Statt und entfernte unvorsichtiger- und unvermuteterweise einen Streifen Verbandsgaze, den Fließ in der Wunde hinterlassen und der die Heilung zwei Wochen lang verhindert hatte. Emma wäre daraufhin fast verblutet. Freud war einer Ohnmacht nahe und fassungslos. Man brachte Emma unter der Aufsicht von Rosanes in das Sanatorium Löw. Trotz der Entfernung der Gaze wiederholten sich die Blutungen. Es waren zwei weitere Operationen notwendig. Gersuny und Gussenbauer vermuteten eine Verletzung der Carotis. Emmas Zustand beruhigte sich erst im Frühsommer des Jahres. Fließ forderte von Gersuny ein Entlastungsschreiben, das er allerdings nicht bekam. Freud suchte seinen Freund diesbezüglich zu beruhigen und suchte mit ihm nach einer Erklärung für die wiederkehrenden Blutungen seiner Patientin :

« Ich werde Dir nachweisen können, daß Du recht hast, daß Ihre Blutungen hysterische waren, aus Sehnsucht erfolgt sind und wahrscheinlich zu Sexualterminen. Das Frauenzimmer hat mir aus Widerstand die Daten noch nicht besorgt. »

(Freud an Fließ am 16. April 1895.)

Ecksteins Nasengänge waren so stark beschädigt, daß sie permanent entstellt blieb. Trotz der desaströsen Vorfälle aber blieb sie Freud treu.

Der Arzt und Psychoanalytiker Max Schur hat zuerst auf den medizinischen Skandal dieser Operation aufmerksam gemacht und Freuds mangelnde ärztliche Gewissenhaftigkeit im Umgang mit diesem Fall und seiner Nachbearbeitung notiert : Die Korrespondenz mit Fließ enthülle Freuds verzweifelte Versuche, die Tatsache nicht zur Kenntnis zu nehmen, daß Fließ wegen dieses beinahe tödlichen Irrtums von jedem Gericht wegen eines Kunstfehlers hätte verurteilt werden können.

In einem Brief an Fließ 1897 zitiert Freud Ecksteins analytische Ergebnisse (als analytische Behandlerin an einem jungen Mädchen) als neuerliche Bekräftigung der später sogenannten Verführungstheorie, die besagt, daß Hysterie die spezifische Folge kindlichen sexuellen Missbrauchs durch einen Erwachsenen sind, meist den Vater :

« Mein Vertrauen in die Vaterätiologie ist sehr gestiegen. Die Eckstein hat ihre Patientin direkt in kritischer Absicht so behandelt, daß sie ihr nicht die leiseste Andeutung gegeben hat, was aus dem Unbewußten kommen wird, und von ihr dabei die identischen Vaterszenen und dergleichen Erhalten. »

(Brief an Fließ vom 12. Dezember 1897.)

Masson findet darüber hinaus Belege dafür, daß Emma Eckstein als Analysandin selbst solche Missbrauchs - beziehungsweise Attentatserinnerungen berichtet haben muß :

Wenn Freud Emma Eckstein als hysterisch diagnostiziert hat und wenn Freud 1896 in seinem ominösen Vortrag Zur Ätiologie der Hysterie für alle ihm bekannten achtzehn Fälle eine solche Zurückführung des hysterischen Symptoms durch die analytische Arbeit behauptet, dann muß Emma zu diesen achtzehn Fällen gehört haben.

Die im unveröffentlichten Entwurf zu einer Psychologie genannte Emma ist laut Masson tatsächlich Emma Eckstein. Da Freud diesen Entwurf für seinen Freund Fließ verfasst habe, der Emma kannte, habe es für Freud keine Notwendigkeit gegeben, die betreffende Person zu anonymisieren. Die von Freud hier beschriebenen Szenen aus der Erinnerungsarbeit seiner Klientin aber schildern genau ein solches Attentat im Alter von acht Jahren und dessen nachträgliche Konsequenzen in der Pubertät (wenn auch im Rahmen ganz anderer Überlegungen Freuds ; vergleiche und Literatur) Masson begründet hiermit in Abgrenzung von Max Schur seine These, daß Emma Eckstein die Patientin war, deren Fall Freud zu seiner Verführungstheorie angeregt hat. Max Schur war hier zu dem gegenteiligen Schluß gelangt.

Ernest Jones, der erste umfassende Biograph Freuds, setzte sie mit Persönlichkeiten wie Lou Andreas-Salomé und Marie Bonaparte gleich als einen Typ Frau von mehr intellektueller und vielleicht maskuliner Art welche eine bedeutende Rolle in Freuds Leben spielte und die sein besonderes, im Gegensatz zum sanften weiblichen Typus allerdings nicht erotisch grundiertes Interesse gefunden habe.

Freuds Typisierung einer gewissen Klasse von Frauen, deren elementare Leidenschaftlichkeit zuletzt die Möglichkeit einer analytischen Behandlung aufhebe, wird gelegentlich auf seine Erfahrung mit Emma Eckstein zurückgeführt : Das elementar-frauenzimmerliche, daß er in einem Schreiben an Emma feststellt, sei verantwortlich für das Scheitern der analytischen Bemühung, da er bei solchen Kandidatinnen nur die Wahl zwischen voller Gegenliebe oder Inkaufnahme der Feindschaft des verschmähten Weibes habe. In Freuds Sichtweise sind solche Frauen außerstande ihre Liebesbedürftigkeit als typisches Übertragungsphänomen zu reflektieren.

Von Verwandten wurde sie als erste analytisch behandelte Patientin Freuds bezeichnet. Es gibt eindeutige Hinweise darauf, daß Freud ihr nach der ursprünglichen Behandlung seinerseits Patientinnen zur analytischen Behandlung überwiesen hat. Damit kann sie als erste weibliche Psychoanalytikerin gelten.

Sie gilt darüber hinaus als Vorbild der Irma in Freuds prototypischer Deutung des Traums von Irmas Injektion. Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson sieht einen eindeutigen Zusammenhang zwischen der Abkehr von der Verführungstheorie und Ecksteins misslungener Operation. Die katastrophalen Folge der Operation im Frühjahr 1895 und die Reaktion im Wiener Ärztekollegenkreis hätten ihm zufolge Freud, den eigentlichen Entdecker der gravierenden seelischen Auswirkungen von Traumatisierung durch Kindesmissbrauch, bewogen, diese Entdeckung zu widerrufen. Hieraus resultiere zugleich die allgemeine Nachwirkung der psychoanalytischen Lehrmeinung auf die zeitgenössische, traumaverleugnende Psychotherapie, die solche Verführungsberichte als bloße ödipale Phantasie wahrzunehmen zwingt.

Obwohl breite Übereinstimmung und Ablehnung bezüglich Freuds eklatanter Leugnung eines Kunstfehlers durch Fließ herrscht, wird Ecksteins Bedeutung in Hinblick auf Freuds Absage an die Verführungstheorie außer von Masson selbst nur selten hervorgehoben ; für Masson sei sie laut Kritikern das prototypische psychoanalytische Opfer, durch Freud und Fließ zu ihren Zwecken missbraucht und somit Symbol für Massons Agenda.

Das Wörterbuch der Psychoanalyse kommentiert wie folgt :

« Sigmund Freuds Beziehung zu dieser seiner Wiener Patientin ist für die Geschichte der Psychoanalyse äußerst bemerkenswert. Sie zeigt, von welcher Bedeutung das Verhältnis zwischen den Ärzten und ihren Patienten in der Genese klinischer Theorien ist. Allerdings liegt hier eine Spaltung vor zwischen dem nosographischen Diskurs des Wissenschaftlers und der tiefer liegenden (oft verschleierte) Geschichte des Wahnsinns, in der das tragische Bewusstsein des Patienten zum Ausdruck kommt. »

(Jeffrey Moussaieff Masson, 1984 ; Seite 203.)

In einer aktuellen Revision des Falls Freud / Eckstein interpretiert der italienische Psychoanalytiker Carlo Bonomi die Operation als retraumatisierende Neuauflage eines frühen Kastrationstraumas Emmas. (Freud hat in den Fließbriefen eine erinnerte Beschneidungsszene Emmas festgehalten.) Im Irma-Traum trete Freuds unbewusste Identifikation mit Emma zu Tage. In der Abwehr dieser Identifikation, dem « männlichen Protest » Freuds, sieht er zugleich ein unbewusstes Motiv im Ursprung der Psychoanalyse überhaupt wirksam.

L'élève Carl Hrubý

Carl Hrubý, un élève de Bruckner, a relaté les importantes innovations harmoniques au plan formel de son professeur et de leur relation avec la tradition viennoise. Le Maître, qui vénérât Beethoven comme un Dieu, avait étudié de près la Symphonie « Eroica » et, en particulier, l'écriture métrique et l'orchestration. Hrubý rappelle :

« Après avoir passé un certain temps plongé dans ses pensées (son regard semblait intériorisé) , il brisa soudainement le silence : " Je pense que, si Beethoven était encore vivant aujourd'hui, j'irais vers lui pour présenter ma 7e Symphonie et dire : Ne pensez-vous pas, " Herr " von Beethoven, que la 7e n'est pas aussi mauvaise que certaines personnes le croient ? Elles qui me dépeignent comme un idiot. Puis, Beethoven pourrait peut-être me prendre par la main et dire : Mon cher Bruckner, n'en faites pas de cas. Ce ne fut pas mieux pour moi. Ces mêmes messieurs qui se servent de moi comme d'un bâton pour vous frapper ne comprennent pas vraiment mes derniers Quatuors, quoi qu'ils en disent ! »

« Mon frère m'a souvent raconté comment il jouait au voleur dans les prés, en compagnie d'autres garçons de son âge. Lorsqu'ils arrivaient à l'attraper, ils lui assénaient de grands coups de bâton dans le dos. Rusé, Anton avait prévu le stratagème : il enfilait, pour la circonstance, de vieux pantalons très rapiécés afin de mieux se protéger. Il ressentait beaucoup de satisfaction à être frappé sans ressentir de douleur. » (Ignaz Bruckner)

...

Carl Hrubý (1869-1940) : Viennese pupil of Anton Bruckner. Writer on music. Author of « Meine Erinnerungen an Anton Bruckner » , Franz Schalk Verlag, Wien (1901) .

Hrubý recounted important comments regarding his teacher's formal harmonic innovations and their relationship to the Viennese tradition. After a performance of Beethoven's « Eroica » , a Symphony which Bruckner revered and had studied closely (especially, its metrical and orchestral part-writing aspects) , Hrubý recalled :

« After he had spent a while sunk in thought, his gaze as it were turned inwards, he suddenly broke the silence : « I think, if Beethoven were still alive today, and I went to him, showed him my 7th Symphony and said to him : « Don't you think, Herr von Beethoven, that the 7th isn't as bad as certain people make it out to be (those people who make an example of it and portray me as an idiot) then, maybe, Beethoven might take me by the hand and say : « My dear Bruckner, don't bother yourself about it. It was no better for me, and the same gentlemen who use me as a stick to beat you with still don't really understand my last Quartets, however much they may pretend to. » .

Hrubý described the scene of 13 October 1863 in « My Recollections of Anton Bruckner » (1901) :

“ The day Beethoven's remains were exhumed, Bruckner invited me to go with him to the old Währing cemetery. Bruckner stood in front of me and stared into the coffin, deeply moved. Those who took part in the ceremony will undoubtedly remember the unforgettable moment when, just as the coffin was being lifted up and solemn silence had descended all around, a nightingale suddenly launched into a torrent of sobbing notes from a nearby tree as if in final tribute to the great mastersinger. The powerful effect was soon spoiled when the representatives of the City of Vienna began squabbling about whether the coffin should be opened in the cemetery or later, in the chapel. In the end they decided on the 1st option. On the way home, his mood was serious. The gloomy solemnity of the occasion appeared to have shaken him to the core. Suddenly, he noticed that one of the lenses had fallen out of his pince-nez : ' I think ', he said, brimming over with joy, ' it must have fallen into Beethoven's coffin while I was leaning over.' It delighted him to know that his eyeglass was buried with Beethoven. ”

Hrubý wrote that Bruckner once said that if he were to speak to Beethoven about bad critiques Beethoven would say, " My dear Bruckner, don't bother yourself about it. It was no better for me, and the same gentlemen who use me as a stick to beat you with still don't understand my last quartets, however much they may pretend to." In saying this, Bruckner both acknowledged his bad critiques and maintained hope that his own compositions might one day garner the same type of positive reaction that Beethoven's music received from his contemporaries.

As his favourite student, Hans Rott was at stake, Anton Bruckner put his foot down. Carl Hrubý relates an occurrence at the Conservatory of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Society of the Friends of Music) in July 1878 : « At the end, a scornful laughter was heard from the « Merker » chair, sorry, the examiners' table. Thereupon, the otherwise so timid Bruckner rose and cried the flaming words to the " Merkers " down there : « Do not laugh, gentlemen, of this man you will hear great things yet ! » . Which of Hans Rott's works caused the gentlemen's scorn is not mentioned in the account ; most probably, it was the 1st movement of the young composer's Symphony in E major, a work which, more than 100 years after it had been written, experienced an unexpected renaissance and confronted the general public with the hitherto almost unknown name of « Rott » .

It took Bruckner some time to reconcile himself to the need to revise the 8th Symphony. He looked over the score in late 1887, and, by the end of January 1888, he seems to have accepted that he must revise the work. Schalk's program has not often found a warm reception. Reviewers of the 1st performance easily identified it as the work of Schalk and were content to dismiss it as banal, if not ridiculous. Eduard Hanslick and Max Kalbeck both mocked it, and Bruckner's supporter Carl Hrubý criticized Schalk for merely providing critics with easy targets.

L'élève Friedrich Klose

D'origine bernoise, Friedrich Klose naquit à Karlsruhe, en Allemagne. Il vint faire des études de composition auprès d'Adolf Ruthardt à Genève, où son poème symphonique, « Loreley » , fut créé par l'Orchestre du Théâtre, au mois de février 1884. Après des études auprès d'Anton Bruckner à Vienne, entre 1886 et 1889, il enseigna à l'Académie de Musique à Genève et fut appelé plus tard à prendre la succession de Max Reger, à Munich. À Genève, Klose fut surtout connu pour sa musique sacrée, notamment la Messe en ré mineur, dédiée à Franz Liszt et créée à la basilique Notre-Dame de Genève, en 1889, ainsi que son motet, « Vidi aquam » , qui fut ovationné à la Fête de l'Association des Musiciens Suisses, à Genève, en juin 1901. Klose va mourir le 24 décembre 1942 à Ruvigliana, en Suisse.

...

The German-Swiss composer Friedrich Klose was born on 29 November 1862 in Karlsruhe, Germany ; and died in 24

December 1942 in Ruvigliana, Switzerland. He turned to music quite late. Between 1886 and 1889, he was a student of Anton Bruckner, in Vienna (contemporaneously with Heinrich Schenker) . He taught at the Conservatory in Basel and, between 1907 and 1919, at the « Akademie der Tonkunst » in Munich, where his students included Max Butting, Wilhelm Petersen and Paul Ben-Haim. Later, he moved permanently to Ruvigliana.

...

In 1927, Klose published his recollections of Anton Bruckner :

« Meine Lehrjahre bei Bruckner. Erinnerungen und Betrachtungen » , « Deutsche Musikbücherei » , Band 61, Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1927) ; 479 pages.

Rudolf Louis was taught composition by the Bruckner student, Friedrich Klose, who was also his close friend. Ernst Kurth even counts Louis among Bruckner's direct students. See his « Bruckner » in 2 volumes, Max Hesse Verlag, Berlin (1925) ; volume 1, page 142.

Louis' « Anton Bruckner » , Georg Müller Verlag, Berlin (1904) , is a rare example of a genuinely critical biography in the early 20th Century. The passages especially in which Louis sharply critiques Simon Sechter's theory are in the tradition of his teacher and breathe Louis's critical spirit. See : Friedrich Klose. « Meine Lehrjahre bei Bruckner : Erinnerungen und Betrachtungen » , Gustav Bosse, Regensburg (1927) .

Ernst Kurth reacted to this book with unbridled disgust and, indeed, it is difficult to imagine a greater contrast between the « emotional » panegyric of the mature Kurth and the « intellectual » tendencies of Louis's dialectical analysis. See Kurth. « Bruckner » , volume 1 ; page 196.

...

Influenced by Richard Wagner, his other teachers included : Vinzenz Lachner and Felix Mottl. His works include the tone poems : « Loreley » , « Das Leben ein Traum » , « Jeanne d'Arc » , « König Elf » , « Das Märchen » , the dramatic Symphony « Ilsebill » and a String Quartet.

His Opera « Ilsebill » (1903) is inspired by the music of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß, and the plot is based on the Brothers Grimm tale of a fisherman who catches a huge fish which grants wishes.

Although its formal title is « Dramatic Symphony » , this 1903 work is an Opera inspired by Richard Wagner and, especially, « Lohengrin » . A folk-Opera from a Brothers Grimm tale about a poverty-stricken fisherman who catches a huge fish which grants wishes. His wife Ilsebill makes them and is granted them until she over-reaches herself and the pair end-up poor again, Klose was hailed at its premiere as the « new man » of German music theatre. At a time when Richard Strauß's tone poems and Gustav Mahler's massive Symphonies were current, Klose was admired specifically for his orchestration (!) . In his « glowing, mellow, extraordinarily differentiated colours » (one critic of the period) , we may hear much of Strauß and less of Mahler, but this is still strikingly original orchestration as the instrumentation grows with Ilsebill's ambitions, culminating in a full Romantic Orchestra, organ, 6 off-stage trombones, several choirs, bells and thunder machine.

A week-long celebration of the composer's work was held in Munich, in June 1918, at which Heinrich Schenker's associate, Walter Dahms, was present.

Works published by Universal-Edition :

« Festzug » for orchestra, Universal-Edition (1892) ; 3 3 3 3 - 4 3 3 1, timpani, percussions (4) , harp, strings (10 10 10 6 6) .

« 5 Gesänge » for voice and piano, Universal-Edition.

« Das Leben ein Traum » for speaker, female choir and orchestra, Universal-Edition (1896) ; 4 4 6 4 - 4 5 6 1 - timpani, percussions, harp, organ, serpent, strings.

« Der Sonne-Geist » for soli, choirs, orchestra and organ, Universal-Edition (1917) ; 3 3 3 4 - 6 3 3 1, timpani, percussions (2) , harp, cello, piano, strings.

...

Friedrich Klose (geboren 29. November 1862, in Karlsruhe ; gestorben 24. Dezember 1942, in Ruvigliana) war ein deutscher Komponist und Musikpädagoge. Klose war Schüler von Vinzenz Lachner und studierte danach in Wien bei Anton Bruckner. Von 1906 bis 1907 unterrichtete er am Konservatorium von Basel und war anschließend als Nachfolger Ludwig Thuilles bis 1919 Kompositionslehrer an der Akademie der Tonkunst in München, wo unter anderem Max Butting, Wilhelm Petersen und Paul Ben-Haim zu seinen Schülern zählten. Danach lebte er bis zu seinem Tod in der Schweiz. 1942 wurde ihm anlässlich seines 80. Geburtstages von der Universität Bern die Ehrendoktorwürde verliehen.

Nach 1918 betrachtete Klose sein musikalisches Schaffen als abgeschlossen, veröffentlichte keine Kompositionen mehr und widmete sich dem Verfassen von Erinnerungsbüchern.

Friedrich Klose war ein vorwiegend von außermusikalischen Vorlagen inspirierter Komponist in der Nachfolge der Neudeutschen Schule. Vor allem von Richard Wagner und Hector Berlioz gingen starke Impulse für sein Werk aus, während Einflüsse seines Lehrers Bruckner eher spärlich sind. Kloses Werke zeichnen sich durch intensive motivische Arbeit unter Einbeziehung von Thementransformationstechniken sowie dichten kontrapunktischen Satz und daraus resultierende chromatisch angereicherte Harmonik aus. Seine Orchesterbehandlung ist von großem Klangfarbenreichtum geprägt.

Da er sehr langsam und sorgfältig komponierte, blieb der Umfang von Kloses Werkverzeichnis gering. Die meisten Musikgattungen bedachte er nur mit einem einzigen, allerdings stets ambitionierten und gewichtigen Werk.

Bühnenwerk

Ilsebill. Das Märlein vom Fischer und seiner Frau, Dramatische Sinfonie (Musikdrama) ; Libretto : Hugo Hoffmann (1902, Uraufführung Karlsruhe 7. Juni 1903) .

Chorwerke

Asklepiadische Strophen für Männerchor (nach Heinrich Leuthold, 1888) .

Messe in D-Moll für Soli, Chor, Orchester und Orgel, Opus 6 (1889) .

Andante religioso, Opus 9 (nachkomponiertes Orchesterzwischenpiel zur Messe, Opus 6, von 1894) .

« Vidi Aquam » für Soli, Chor, Orchester und Orgel, Opus 10 (nachkomponiertes Orchesterzwischenpiel zur Messe, Opus 6, von 1894) .

« Ave Maria » für Sopran und Orchester, Opus 11 (nachkomponiertes Zwischenpiel zur Messe, Opus 6, von 1894) .

« O salutaris hostia » für Sopran, Tenor und Orchester, Opus 12 (nachkomponiertes Offertorium zur Messe, Opus 6, von 1894) .

Vier Gesänge für Männerchor (1905) .

Die Wallfahrt nach Kevlaar, Ballade für Sprecher, drei Chöre, Orchester und Orgel (nach Heinrich Heine, 1911) .

Ein Festgesang Neros für Tenor, Chor, Orchester und Orgel (nach Victor Hugo, 1912) .

Der Sonne-Geist, Oratorium für Soli, Chor, Orchester und Orgel (nach Alfred Mombert, 1917) .

Lieder

14 Lieder für Singstimme und Klavier, Opus 1-5 (1886-1887) .

Verbunden, Liederzyklus für Mezzosopran und Klavier, Opus 8 (nach Friedrich Rückert, 1888) .

Fünf Gesänge nach Giordano Bruno für Singstimme und Klavier (1918) .

Orchesterwerke

« Jeanne d'Arc » , Sinfonische Dichtung (vor 1881) .

Loreley, Sinfonische Dichtung (vor 1881) .

Elfenreigen (1892) .

Festzug (1892) .

Das Leben ein Traum, Sinfonische Dichtung mit Sprecher und Schlusschor für Frauenstimmen (1896) .

Sonstige Instrumentalwerke

Elegie für Violine oder Viola und Klavier, Opus 7 (1889) .

Präludium und Doppelfuge in C-Moll über ein Thema von Anton Bruckner für Orgel mit Schlusschoral für Blechbläser (1907) .

Streichquartett in Es-Dur, Ein Tribut in vier Raten entrichtet an Seine Gestrengen den deutschen Schulmeister (1911) .

Schriften

Meine Lehrjahre bei Bruckner (1927) .

Bayreuth. Eindrücke und Erlebnisse (1929) .

Rudolf Louis

The influential German music-critic and conductor Rudolf Louis was born on 30 January 1870 in Schwetzingen, Germany ; and died on 15 November 1914 in Munich, at age 44.

He studied in Geneva, where he was a pupil of Friedrich Klose, and continued his studies in Vienna and, then, in Karlsruhe under Felix Mottl before becoming conductor of the Theatre Orchestras in Landshut and Lübeck. In 1897, he moved to Munich, where he lived for the remainder of his life. Here he taught harmony and composition. Among his pupils was Wilhelm Petersen.

He was also the music-critic for the newspaper « Münchner Neueste Nachrichten » . An advocate of the latest trends in music as exemplified by his friends Ludwig Thuille and Richard Strauß, he published books on Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, Hector Berlioz, Anton Bruckner, Hans Pfitzner, Friedrich Klose and contemporary German music. With Ludwig Thuille, he wrote an influential manual on harmony, « Harmonielehre » (1907) , which went through many editions.

He had an acrimonious relationship with the composer Max Reger, of whose compositions he usually had negative opinions. After the 1st performance of Reger's « Sinfonietta », on 2 February 1906, Louis wrote a typically negative review in the « Münchener Neueste Nachrichten », on 7 February.

Reger wrote to him :

« Ich sitze in dem kleinsten Zimmer in meinem Hause. Ich habe Ihre Kritik vor mir. Im nächsten Augenblick wird sie hinter mir sein ! »

(I am sitting in the smallest room of my house. I have your review before me. In a moment it will be behind me !)

...

Rudolf Louis (geboren 30. Januar 1870 in Schwetzingen ; gestorben 15. November 1914 in München) war ein deutscher Musiker, Musikschriftsteller und Musikkritiker.

Louis studierte zunächst Philosophie und Musikwissenschaft in Genf und anschließend in Wien, wo er auch mit einer Dissertation über den « Widerspruch in der Musik » zum Doktor der Philosophie promovierte. Danach nahm er dort Unterricht in Komposition bei Friedrich Klose und später im Dirigieren bei Felix Mottl in Karlsruhe. Es folgten Kapellmeistertätigkeiten in Landshut und Lübeck. Seit 1897 lebte er in München und war als Musikschriftsteller und ab 1900 als Musikkritiker der Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten tätig. Seine Kompositionen konnten sich im Musikleben nicht durchsetzen. Durch die gemeinsam mit Ludwig Thuille verfasste Harmonielehre, die zum Standardwerk avancierte und mehrere Auflagen erlebte, erlangte er Bekanntheit in der Musikwelt.

Musikwissenschaftliche Werke :

Der Widerspruch in der Musik, Breitkopf & Härtel (1893) .

Richard Wagner als Musikästetiker (1897) .

Die Weltanschauung Richard Wagners, Breitkopf & Härtel, Leipzig (1898) .

Franz Liszt, Berlin (1900) .

Hector Berlioz, Leipzig (1904) .

Anton Bruckner, Georg Müller-Verlag, München (1905) .

Die deutsche Musik der Gegenwart, Georg Müller-Verlag, München (1909) .

Harmonielehrer. Rudolf Louis und Ludwig Thuille. Carl Grüniger, Stuttgart (1910) .

Musikalisches Schaffen :

Sinfonische Phantasie « Proteus » .

L'élève Felix von Kraus

The Austrian dramatic, Oratorio and Lieder singer Felix von Kraus was born on 3 October 1870 in Vienna and died on 30 October 1937 in Munich. He received a doctorate in musicology from the University of Vienna in 1894 ; as a singer, however, he was mainly self taught. He studied with Anton Bruckner, in Vienna. He was an early interpreter of the works of Johannes Brahms. Kraus made his debut at Bayreuth as Hagen in « Götterdämmerung » , in 1899, and was heard thereafter at numerous Bayreuth Festivals and at other Opera Houses throughout Europe ; he specialized in the works of Richard Wagner. In 1908, he became the artistic director of the Munich Opera ; that same year, he became a professor at the Munich Conservatory. Among his students was the Swiss tenor and early music specialist Max Meili and heldentenor Karel Burian.

In 1899, Kraus married the American contralto Adrienne Osborne (née Eisbein) , also a Wagnerian. The couple lived in Munich (1908-1935) where they both were vocal teachers. They had a child called Max but her real name was Felizitas. They also had a 2nd daughter who died as a small child. Her name was Maria (or « Moidl ») . The grave of Max is in the cemetery of Zell am Ziller, in the Tyrol.

The American contralto Adrienne von Kraus-Osborne was born on 2 December 1873 in Buffalo, NY ; and died on 15 Jun 1951 in Zell-an-der-Ziller, Austria. She was a great Waltraute interpreter. She studied in Germany with Auguste Gotze (in Leipzig) and Felix von Kraus, who became her husband, in 1899. Her debut, in 1893, was at the Leipzig Opera. She sang there until 1908 and then became a member of the Royal Opera, in Munich. She appeared at the Bayreuth Festivals from 1902-1909.

Felix von Kraus retired from the stage, in 1927. He wrote his Memoirs about his renown teacher, Anton Bruckner :

« Begegnungen mit Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms, Cosima Wagner » . Aus den Lebenserinnerungen von Doktor Felix von Kraus (1870-1937) , F. Hain Verlag, Wien / München (1961) .

Felix von Kraus (Autor) und Felicitas (Adriana Christina) von Kraus (Autorin) .

...

Felix von Kraus, Konzertsänger (Bass) geboren 03.10.1870 Wien ; gestorben 31.10.1937 München. Studierte in Wien Musikwissenschaft promovierte 1894 mit einer Arbeit über Caldara (unveröffentlicht) , war 2 Monate Schüler Stockhausens, im übrigen Autodidakt, wirkte aber bereits 1899 in Bayreuth mit. Er gehörte zu den ersten Interpreten von Brahms' « Vier ernsten Gesängen » und war ein hervorragender Oratoriensänger. Seine Gattin Adrienne, geborene Osborne, war Bühnen- und Konzertsängerin (Alt) . Das Ehepaar wohnte in München, wo Kraus 1908-1935 Gesanglehrer an der Akademie der Tonkunst war.

...

Felix von Kraus, Sänger, geboren Wien, 03.10.1870 ; gestorben München, 31.10.1937. Sohn des Generalstabsarztes Carl von Kraus (geboren 1837) , Enkel des Vorigen ; als Kind erhielt er Unterricht auf der Violine, später auch in Musiktheorie. Er besuchte das Schotten-Gymnasium in Wien und studiert an der Universität Musikwissenschaft unter Eduard Hanslick (siehe dies) . Nach seiner Promotion (1894) widmete er sich ganz dem Gesangsstudium, das er, abgesehen von zwei Monaten Lehrzeit bei J. Stockhausen in Berlin, auf Anraten Brahms' Autodidaktisch betrieb. Nach kurzer Zeit bereits begann er eine glänzende Laufbahn als Konzertsänger. Ab 1899 sang er nach Aufforderung durch Cosima Wagner auch in Bayreuth (Hagen, Gurnemanz, später auch Landgraf, Marke, Titurel) . 1908 wurde er von Felix Mottl als Lehrer an die Akademie der Tonkunst in München geholt, wo er bis zu seiner Pensionierung 1935 wirkte. Seine letzten Jahre verbrachte er größtenteils in Zell am Ziller (Tirol) . Kraus stand in persönlichem Kontakt mit Anton Bruckner (siehe dies) , Johannes Brahms (siehe dies) , der ihn sehr förderte und mit großer Auszeichnung behandelte, Eusebius Mandyczewski, Friedrich Chrysander, der Familie Wagner, Felix Mottl und andere. Seine eigentliche Domäne als Sänger waren Lied (besonders Brahms und dessen « Vier ernste Gesänge ») und Oratorium ; auf dem Gebiet der Oper wirkte er trotz großer Erfolge nur selten und trat außer in Bayreuth nur als Gast in Wien, München und London auf. Kraus, herzoglich meiningischer und Kaiserlich-Königlich österreichisch Kammersänger, war ab 1899 mit der Sängerin Adrienne Osborne (1873-1951) verheiratet.

Werke

Biographie des Kaiserlich-Königlich VicaHof-Kapellmeisters Antonio Caldara. Samt thematisch Katalog der Kirchenwerke, 2 Bände, philosophie Dissertation Wien, 1894 ; Begegnungen mit Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms, Cosima Wagner. Aus den Lebenserinnerungen von Doktor Felix von Kraus zusammengestellt und ergänzt von Doktor Felix von Kraus ohne Jahr.

L'élève Karl Kobald

Karl Kobald est né le 28 août 1876 à Brno et est décédé le 12 octobre 1957 à Vienne.

Dès son plus jeune âge, il commence son apprentissage musical comme petit-chanteur à la Chapelle de la Cour de Vienne. Puis, il étudie au Conservatoire de Vienne auprès de Hans Richter, Josef Hellmesberger et Anton Bruckner. À l'Université de Vienne, il étudie le droit, l'art et l'histoire de la musique. Il a, entre autres, comme professeur Alois Riegel et Guido Adler. Après l'obtention de son diplôme, en 1901, il amorce sa pratique du droit en tant que conseiller à la Commission centrale Imperiale et Royale en ce qui attrait à l'art et aux monuments historiques, en plus d'être conseiller sur l'art au ministère de l'Éducation. À l'occasion du centenaire de Ludwig van Beethoven, en 1924, il est honoré à titre de professeur.

Karl Kobald publie le 1 janvier 1924 :

« In Memoriam Anton Bruckner, Festschrift zum 100. Geburtstage Anton Bruckners. Herausgegeben im Auftrage des Österreichischen Unterrichtsministeriums von Karl Kobald. » , Amalthea-Verlag, Zürich, Wien, Leipzig (1924) .

En 1932, on lui confère le titre de président de l'Académie de Musique et des Arts. On lui doit la nationalisation du Conservatoire de Vienne ; la réhabilitation des concerts du « Mozarteum » , à Salzburg ; et, de 1933 à 1937, l'organisation de concours internationaux de musique à Vienne.

...

Der Brünner Karl Kobald wurde am 28. August 1876 geboren.

Er begann seine der Musik gewidmeten Karriere bereits in jungen Jahren als Hofsängerknabe in Wien. An der Wiener Universität studierte er die Rechte, ferner Kunst- und Musikgeschichte. Und andere gehörte Alois Riegel und Guido Adler zu seinen Lehrern. Nach der Promotion (1901) durchlief er die Gerichtspraxis, wurde Konzipist der Kaiserlich-Königlich Zentralkommission für Kunst- und historische Denkmale, schließlich Kunstreferent im Unterrichtsministerium und zuletzt Ministerialrat. Anlässlich der Beethoven-Zentenarfeier wurde er mit dem Professorentitel geehrt. 1932 wurde ihm das Amt eines Präsidenten der Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst übertragen.

Zu seinem Wirkungskreis gehörten die Verstaatlichung des Wiener Konservatoriums, an dem er selbst noch bei Hans Richter, Josef Hellmesberger und Anton Bruckner studiert hatte, die Sanierung des Mozarteums in Salzburg und die Veranstaltung der internationalen Musikwettbewerbe in Wien von 1933 bis 1937. Er wirkte auch bei den Jahrhundertfeiern für Bruckner, Beethoven, Haydn und Schubert mit. Wesentliches leistete er auch als Vorsitzender des österreichischen Volksliedunternehmens, des Wiener Bruckner-Bundes und als Mitglied der Kommission zur Herausgabe der Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich.

Außer Gedichtbänden, Erzählungen und einen Roman (« Künstlerfrühling ») hat Kobald viele musikgeschichtliche Bücher geschrieben, uund andere « Alt-Wiener Musikstätten » , « Wo unsterbliche Musik entstand » (Musik in Österreich) , ferner Biographien von Beethoven, Haydn, Schubert und Johann Strauß. Karl Kobald arbeitete auch an seinen Memoiren, denen er den Arbeitstitel « Ein Wiener Hofrat erzählt » gegeben hatte.

Karl Kobald verstarb am 12. Oktober 1957 in Wien.

L'élève Heinrich M. Schuster

En 1896, Heinrich M. Schuster écrivit que « l'opposition envers la musique de Bruckner originait de factions conservatrices ; de la même façon que l'opposition à l'idéologie libérale dans le domaine de la politique » .

Heinrich M. Schuster est aussi l'auteur de :

« Die Verbindung von Musik und Poesie im Liede : Zu Robert Franz' 75. Geburtstage. »

(La combinaison de la musique et de la poésie dans le lied : 75e anniversaire de naissance de Robert Franz.)

parut dans le « Bayreuther Blätter » , en 1890 (xiii, pages 192-201) .

L'élève Ciprian Porumbescu

Le compositeur, chef d'orchestre, chef de chœur, violoniste, pianiste et pédagogue roumain Ciprian Porumbescu (né : Cyprian Gołęmbiowski) est né le 14 octobre 1853 dans le village de Șipotete Sucevei, dans l'ancienne province de Bucovine en Roumanie ; et est mort le 6 juin 1883 (à l'aube) à Stupca, en Roumanie.

Porumbescu étudia la musique à Suceava et à Cernăuți. Il poursuiva au « Konservatorium für Musik und darstellende Kunst » de Vienne, de 1879 à 1881, sous la direction des professeurs Anton Bruckner et Franz Krenn. Il fut l'un des plus célèbres compositeurs roumains de son temps. Ses valse furent longtemps au répertoire des Orchestres populaires de la capitale de l'Empire. Il a entre autres composé la musique de l'hymne national albanais, « Hymni i Flamurit » .

Porumbescu fut emprisonné par les autorités autrichiennes pour son engagement politique. Il composa la majeure partie de son œuvre en détention. Il mourut à l'âge de 29 ans à Stupca, aujourd'hui rebaptisée Ciprian Porumbescu.

...

The Romanian composer, conductor, choir Master, violinist, pianist and pedagogue Ciprian Porumbescu (« né » Ciprian Gołęmbiowski) was born on 14 October 1853 in the village of Șipotete Sucevei, in Bukovina (now, Shepit, Putyla Raion, in Ukraine) ; and died on 6 June 1883 (at dawn) in Stupca, Romania.

Porumbescu was born into the family of Iraclie Porumbescu, an ethnic Romanian writer and Orthodox priest of Romanian origins, whose Romanian name was changed by Austrian authorities into Gołęmbiowski. The name Porumbescu was changed from Gołęmbiowski, in 1881, when Ciprian was at school in Suceava. He studied music in Suceava and Cernăuți, then, continued at the « Konservatorium für Musik und darstellende Kunst » in Vienna, from 1879 to 1881, under Anton Bruckner and Franz Krenn. His artistic career as a composer, conductor, violinist, and pianist started in Cernăuți, and continued in Vienna and, later, in Brașov where he taught vocal music at Romanian schools.

Ciprian Porumbescu wrote poetry, lyrics and press articles, and actively participated in the public cultural life. He helped the rise of the Romanian music school during an age of enthusiasm generated by Romania's independence. Some of the most remarkable musical pages of the composer were inspired by national heroes and great army leaders, such as Stephen III of Moldavia and Dragoș Vodă. The appreciation of his music came from the melodic nature of his compositions and their folklore inspiration.

In 1877, Porumbescu was arrested by the Austrian authorities due to his political ideals of independence manifested within the Arborea Society ; during detention, he contracted tuberculosis. He was released later after being found not guilty, going on to become a founding member of « Societatea Academică Junimea » . He died at the age of 29 in Stupca, which was renamed Ciprian Porumbescu in his honour.

Porumbescu was among the most celebrated Romanian composers of his time. He left a legacy of more than 250 works, bringing him fame and popularity through his short life. As a student at the Vienna Music Conservatory, Porumbescu noted with great interest the success of Operettas by Johann Strauß, Franz von Suppé, Jacques Offenbach and others. His supreme goal was to replace the frivolity of subject-matter in the fashionable Operettas with a plot that revived old Romanian traditions. His work spreads over various forms and musical genres, but the majority of his work is choral and Operetta. His popular works include :

« Crai nou » (New Moon) in which the new-born moon will fulfill every lover's dreams of happiness (collected and published by Vasile Alecsandri) . It appeared the most appropriate for the dream-like environment of the local and earnest task Porumbescu had in mind. The result was Romania's 1st operetta of the same name. « Crai nou » was premiered in Braşov, in presence of the composer.

The famous Ballad for violin and Orchestra was finished on October 21, 1880. In seclusion in Stupca, the composer meditated, drafted and, then, finished the piece, full of poetry and bitter nostalgia, with light and shade, a mixture of « doina » , old dance and song, everything in the environment of serene melancholy. It soon became his best-known work : a reference piece in Romanian Classical music of the 19th Century.

Among his other celebrated works, let's mention « Trei culori » or « Tricolorul » (3 coloured) ; the « Song for the 1st of May » ; the Ballad for violin and piano ; and the « Serenada » . In addition, he composed the music for « Pe-al nostru steag e scris Unire » (Union Is Written On Our Flag) , which was used for Albania's national anthem, « Hymni i Flamurit » .

His vocal works « Cântec de primăvară » (Spring song) ; « Cântecul gintei latine » (Latin nation song) ; « La malurile Prutului » (On the Prut's shores) ; and « Altarul manastirii Putna » (Putna monastery's altar) were already in the public conscience.

...

Learning music from his father at an early age, Ciprian Porumbescu was duly prepared for matriculation at the Vienna Conservatory where he became the student of Anton Bruckner and Franz Krenn. He helped to establish the Conservatory in Romania for instrumental and vocal music and had ample experience to do so given his compositions of Operettas and numerous pieces for piano and violin. « Crai nou » was an Operetta Porumbescu composed in 1882. By 1900, it had become the most popular of Romanian works in this genre. For political reasons, he was confined to a specific district and was a leading musical organizer and musician of the area. He conducted, composed and helped to establish a Society for students. Subsequently, his music became the rallying cry for young Romanian students. Popular music was Porumbescu's inspiration. He composed most of his music during his later years while in service at Saint-Nicholas' Church, in Braşov.

...

Ciprian Porumbescu, a Romanian Classical music composer, patriot, and national hero, surrounded by the aura of an early tragic death, was born on 14 October 1853 in the village of Șipotetele Sucevei, in Bukovina (now, Shepit, Putyla Raion, in Ukraine) .

Porumbescu established a significant presence for himself in intellectual and student circles. He was a 2nd child to a family with a Ukrainian name, changed later into the Romanian « Porumbescu » . Adina Istrate, a museographer with the Ciprian Porumbescu Memorial House, in Stupca, told us about the composer.

Adina Istrate : « Ciprian Porumbescu inherited his patriotism from his father, who was a priest, as well as a patriot, folklore collector and 1848 revolutionary. Ciprian studied music with Karol Mikuli, a former student of Frédéric Chopin and later director of the Conservatory in Lemberg, today's Lvov. Ciprian studied piano with him for 6 years, before playing in the troupe of great traditional musician Grigore Vindereu. »

Passionate about the emancipation of Romanians in Bukovina, back then, an Austro-Hungarian province, Ciprian Porumbescu went to Putna on 15 August 1871. Putna, the monastery where Stephen the Great is buried, hosted that day a congress for Romanian students across the world, held by the « Young Romania » Society. It was organized under the leadership of famous Romanian writers Ioan Slavici and Mihai Eminescu. This was the 1st time that Ciprian Porumbescu met the greatest Romanian poet. 2 years later, he went to Chernowitz to study philosophy and theology. There, he became the president of the « Arboroasa » Society, an association of Romanian students from Bukovina, which organized actions considered hostile towards the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Adina Istrate : « It all culminated in a condolence telegram sent in 1877 to Iasi City Hall on the 100th commemoration of the decapitation of ruler Grigore Ghica III. That telegram was signed : « Youth from the cut-off part of old Moldavia » . It was the expression « cut-off » that bothered the Austrian authorities, who held in detention all 5 members of the « Arboroasa » Society Committee for 11 weeks. Unfortunately, Ciprian fell ill in prison, catching the tuberculosis that would lead to his death. However, the trial resulted in the release of the 5, who were found not guilty. »

Between 1879 and 1881, he was in Vienna, where he continued his studies in music and philosophy. In the capital of the Empire, he met members of the Strauß family, and continued his patriotic militancy.

Adina Istrate : « He became a member of the “ Young Romania ” Society and composed its anthem (“ Union Is Written On Our Flag ”) , a tune which is now the national anthem of Albania. Another song written by Ciprian Porumbescu was Romania's national anthem before 1990. Also, while he was a student in Vienna, he printed a collection of patriotic songs for Romanian students. During the same period, he composed his immortal ballad for violin, the best-know and most beloved composition by Ciprian Porumbescu. After graduating in Vienna, he was given a teaching position at a school in Brașov, which he held between 1881 and 1882. This is the pinnacle of his career. It was the time when the 1st Romania Operetta was staged, “ Crai Nou ”, on lyrics by Vasile Alecsandri. It was a very successful show. »

Unfortunately, his disease was progressing, and doctors sent him for treatment to a warmer area, in Italy.

Adina Istrate : « From November 1882 to February 1883, Ciprian Porumbescu went to Italy for treatment. He met Giuseppe Verdi there, and traveled to the major Italian cities of Rome, Venice, Pisa and Milan, and was impressed by their architecture. However, lacking money and missing home, he left Italy in 1883. He left behind 20 degrees Celsius for the - 20 degrees Celsius of his home, in Stupca, and this proved lethal. He died on June 6, at dawn, not even 30 years of age, after beseeching his sister to take care of his music. »

The people who love his music often visit his home in the village of Stupca, today renamed Ciprian Porumbescu, in Suceava county. This used to be the parochial house that the composer's father, Iraelie, was granted when he came to the village as the local priest.

L'élève Josef Gruber

Le compositeur, musicien d'église et organiste autrichien Josef Gruber (pseudonyme : Josef Wösendorfer) est né le 18 avril 1855 à Weißenkirchen (Wösendorf près de Krems, dans la vallée de Wachau en Basse-Autriche) une paroisse chapeauté par Saint-Florian. Il quittera la maison familiale pour entrer au monastère augustinien où il reçoit une formation musicale comme petit-chanteur du « Kapellmeister » Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) , en fonction depuis 1852. Il reçoit aussi des leçons d'orgue de Josef Seiberl, celui qui a succédé comme titulaire à Anton Bruckner en 1855. En 1887-1888, Gruber est un élève dans la classe d'harmonie de Bruckner, au Conservatoire de Vienne alors que son professeur de composition est Johann Evangelist Habert. Gruber retournera régulièrement à Saint-Florian où, en 1878, il sera nommé, à son tour, organiste titulaire prenant la succession de son Maître Bruckner et de Josef Seiberl. Gruber était un passionné de musique et un militant de la Ire heure du Cécilianisme, mis de l'avant par Traumihler ; ce qui influencera directement ses compositions de jeunesse. Bruckner, Habert et le Maître de chœur associé Bernhard Deubler (1842-1907) , le successeur de Traumihler à Saint-Florian en 1884, viendront atténuer cette idéologie rigoriste. À partir de ce moment, Gruber composera une musique d'église pragmatique qui sera en vogue jusqu'au début de la Première Guerre mondiale. De 1906 jusqu'à sa retraite, il sera professeur de musique au Collège (« Lehrerbildungsanstalt ») de Linz ; ville où il va mourir le 2 décembre 1933.

Selon les statistiques, son répertoire est chanté dans plus de 1,200 églises en Autriche. Mais si l'on tient compte du Sud de l'Allemagne, de la Silésie de même que des pays issus de l'ancienne Monarchie Austro-Hongroise, ce nombre augmente considérablement. Par son enseignement, Josef Gruber aura influencé une génération de compositeurs dédiés à la musique religieuse.

Son style de la maturité se veut une fusion du Cécilianisme et du Classicisme autrichien. Sa musique d'église, écrite dans le style Romantique finissant, trouvait beaucoup d'appuis et était de plus en plus en demande. Il a composé plus de 300 œuvres sacrées, dont 58 Messes, 17 Requiem et 1 grand « Te Deum » . Il a également laissé des Messes propres, des Messes allemandes, des Lieder, des Motets, des litanies, des pièces pour chœur d'hommes, des œuvres pour orgue, un recueil de préludes, un manuel d'orgue en 3 parties et une école d'orgue.

A capella :

Requiem en mi bémol, Opus 3.

Asperges me, pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) a cappella, Opus 35, n° 1.

Asperges me, pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) a cappella, Opus 35, n° 2.

Thomasmesse pour 7 harmonisistes, Opus 83.

Missa « Salve Regina », Opus 197.

Pour orgue seul :

Theresienmesse, Opus 31.

Aloysiusmesse, Opus 76.

Familienmesse, Opus 117.

Avec orchestre :

Fest-Messe in honorem Sancti Petri (Missa Sankt Petri ; Sankt Petrus-Messe) pour quatuor vocal mixte (SATB) , Doktor J. Butz Musikverlag, Opus 14.

Requiem en ré mineur pour chœur et orgue, Opus 20.

Elisabethmesse, Opus 36.

Kaiser-Jubiläumsmesse, Messe du Jubilé pour chœur et orchestre (ou accompagnement à l'orgue) à l'occasion du 50e anniversaire de règne de l'Empereur François-Joseph, Opus 40 (1898) .

Missa Papæ Leonis, Opus 151.

Autres Messes et Requiem :

Zweites Requiem en do mineur pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) a cappella et orgue, Opus 21 :

Introitus, Kyrie, Sanctus, Benedictus, Agnus Dei, Communio.

3e Requiem en ré bémol, pour chœur mixte, 2 cors et orgue, Opus 37.

Pastoral-Messe en fa (court et très léger) pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) a cappella, Opus 45a.

Pastoral-Messe en sol (court et très léger) pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) a cappella, Opus 45b.

Missa pro defunctis, Opus 71.

Missa pro defunctis en mi bémol mineur pour quatuor vocal mixte (SATB) , chœur, et orgue, Opus 80 :

Introitus : Requiem aeternam - Kyrie - Graduale : Requiem aeternam - Tractus : Absolve Domine - Offertorium : Domine Jesu Christe - Sanctus - Benedictus - Agnus Dei - Communio : Lux aeterna.

Requiem en la pour quatuor vocal mixte (SATB) , 1 chœur mixte (SATB) , 2 violons, 1 alto, 1 violoncelle, 1 contrebasse, 2 clarinettes, 2 cors, 1 trombone et orgue, Opus 84.

Ein Deutsches Requiem en do mineur, Opus 114 : tout comme Johannes Brahms, Josef Gruber n'utilise pas la forme traditionnelle de la Messe des défunts.

Requiem en ré mineur pour 1 ou 2 voix solistes et orgue (ou harmonium) ; ou pour chœur mixte à 3 voix (SAB) , 2 cors d'harmonie, ensemble de cordes et orgue, Opus 145 (vers 1905) .

Missa pro defunctis pour chœur à 3 voix et orgue, Opus 179 (1910) .

Requiem und Libera pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix, Opus 206 (1910) .

Requiem en mi bémol majeur pour quatuor vocal mixte, (SATB) , ensemble de cordes, 2 cors d'harmonie et orgue, Opus 201 (vers 1920) .

Missa pro defunctis avec Libera me pour 1 ou 2 voix solistes et orgue (ou harmonium) , Opus 219 (1911) .

Requiem en si majeur, Opus 299.

Gregorius-Messe.

Missa Mater Dolorosa.

Missa in honorem Sancta Caeciliae.

Autres :

Christus ist auferstanden (le Christ est ressuscité) , chant Pascal pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) et orgue, Opus 70, No. 1.

Vidi aquam, Opus 82.

Vidi aqua, mantiphone pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) , Opus 83.

Angelus Domini, antiphone pour soprano, chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) et orgue, Opus 85, n° 4.

Terra Tremuit, offertoire de la Passion et de Pâques pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) et orgue, Opus 134.

Deutsche Messe de Franz Schubert (TTBB) , arrangement de Josef Gruber, Anton Böhm und Sohn Verlag.

Zweiten Cäcilienmesse : Sanctus et Benedictus pour 3 voix solistes (SAB) , arrangement de Albert Kupp, Musica International Carus-Verlag Stuttgart.

Auferstehungslied.

Svétku mise sv. Pétera godam.

Andachtsjodler (« Du güldne Sonn ») pour chœur mixte à 4 voix (SATB) .

Und mitten im Winter, chant de Noël alpestre pour le temps de l'Avent pour chœur à 4 voix (SATB) .

...

The Austrian organist, church musician and composer Josef Gruber was born on 18 April 1855 in Weißenkirchen / Wösendorf (Wachau) . He was a student of Anton Bruckner and, in 1878, took-over his teacher's former position as organist in the monastery of Saint-Florian. At the entombment ceremony of Anton Bruckner in Saint-Florian, Josef Gruber (the house organist) improvised on themes from « Parsifal » by Richard Wagner. Gruber was a musical devotee of the Cecilian ideals. After 1906, he taught music in Linz, where he also died on 2 December 1933.

Gruber is the author of « Meine Erinnerungen an Doktor Anton Bruckner » , Einsiedeln (1928) .

...

Geboren in Wösendorf in der Wachau, einer Stiftspfarr von Sankt Florian, kam er schon früh aus seinem Heimatort in das Augustiner Chorherrenstift, wo er seine erste musikalische Ausbildung als Sängerknabe erhielt. Ignaz P. Traumihler (1815-1884) war dort seit 1852 Stiftskapellmeister. Auch Anton Bruckner war bis 1855 unter diesem Stiftsorganist. Harmonielehre studierte Gruber und andere bei Anton Bruckner (1887-1888) , der ein ständiger Gast in Sankt Florian war. Sein Kompositionslehrer war Johann Evangelist Habert. Von 1906 bis zu seiner Versetzung in den Ruhestand war er Musikprofessor an der Lehrerbildungsanstalt in Linz. Immer wieder wird er mit Franz Xaver Gruber, dem Komponisten von « Stille Nacht » , verwechselt.

Der Einfluß des strengen Cäcilianers Traumihler prägte Grubers erste Schaffensperiode. Der Einfluß Bruckners, Haberts und des Stiftskapellmeisters Deubler (Traumihlers Nachfolger) milderte die Strenge des Cäcilianismus und Gruber fand « Anschluß » an die pragmatische Kirchenmusik, wie sie vor 1914 entwickelt wurde. Seine Werke sind eine Verschmelzung von österreichischem Cäcilianismus und klassizistisch konzertanter Richtung. Viele Freunde fand vor allem seine im spätromantischen Stil verfaßte Kirchenmusik und man verlangte von ihm immer Neues. Nach der Statistik der österreichischen Kirchenmusik werden Grubers Werke in weit über 1200 österreichischen Kirchen gesungen. Zählt man Süddeutschland und Gebiete in den Nachfolgestaaten der Monarchie sowie Schlesien dazu, wird die Zahl um ein Vielfaches größer. Als Lehrerbildner vermittelte Gruber mehr als einer Generation das Rüstzeug für den kirchenmusikalischen Dienst. Seine « Jubiläumsmesse » Opus 40 zählt zu den Repertoiremassen des Chores und wird daher meist mit Orgelbegleitung aufgeführt und nicht wie vorgesehen mit Orchesterbegleitung. Komponiert wurde sie zur Feier des 50jährigen Regierungsjubiläums Kaiser Franz Josephs I. im Jahr 1898.

L'élève Fritz Kreisler

Le violoniste et compositeur autrichien Fritz (Friedrich) Kreisler est né le 2 février 1875 à Vienne et est mort le 29 janvier 1962 à New York.

Enfant prodige, le jeune Fritz Kreisler savait lire la musique à l'âge de 3 ans. Il reçoit ses premières leçons de violon de son père, qui était un amateur enthousiaste de Jacques Auber.

En 1882, il devient le plus jeune élève à être admis au Conservatoire de Vienne (7 ans) où il étudie le violon avec Josef Hellmesberger junior et l'harmonie, la théorie musicale et la composition avec Anton Bruckner. Il en sort à l'âge de 10 ans, médaillé d'or. Puis, il travaille à Paris avec Joseph Massart, de la classe duquel il sort à 12 ans, partageant le 1er prix avec d'autres élèves, en 1887.

À 14 ans, il effectue sa première tournée aux États-Unis, avec Moritz Rosenthal. De retour en Europe, il consacre 2 années à élargir son éducation (en étudiant l'art et la médecine) et son expérience (en passant une année dans l'armée autrichienne). La musique demeure cependant son véritable métier, et il reprend sa carrière en 1896 en effectuant une tournée en Russie.

Vienne lui fit bon accueil, en 1898, lorsqu'il y joue le Concerto n° 1 de Max Bruch sous la direction de Hans Richter, et il en est de même à Berlin l'année suivante lorsqu'il fait ses débuts de concertiste. Il retourne en Amérique, en 1900, et se produit pour la première fois en Grande-Bretagne, en 1902. C'est également en 1902 qu'il épouse Harriet Lies qui se charge de la tâche primordiale d'organiser sa vie.

En 1910, Kreisler crée le Concerto d'Edward Elgar, et est célèbre au moment de la Première Guerre mondiale (durant laquelle il sert brièvement, avant d'être blessé et rendu à la vie civile). Après avoir passé quelque temps en Amérique, il s'installe à Berlin, en 1924, mais refuse de se produire en Allemagne à partir de 1933. Après 1938, il prend la nationalité française avant d'aller s'installer définitivement aux États-Unis (il prendra la nationalité américaine en 1943).

Le 12 mai 1941, il est renversé par un fourgon dans une rue de New York et reste dans le coma durant 1 semaine. Bien que cet accident ait mis fin à sa carrière professionnelle, il continuera de jouer jusqu'en 1950.

Son art se caractérise par l'intensité de son vibrato et par l'économie de ses mouvements d'archet.

...

Aujourd'hui, il y a probablement des gens qui n'ont jamais entendu les nombreux enregistrements de Fritz Kreisler et qui le connaissent uniquement comme compositeur de ravissantes pièces pour violon. Mais, en son temps, il fut tenu pour un interprète révolutionnaire, pour la quintessence du violoniste viennois, et ses compositions étaient auréolées d'un singulier parfum de scandale. Né à Vienne, le 2 février 1875, sous le nom de Friedrich Kreisler, il prit des leçons avec son père, médecin polonais et violoniste amateur, et avec Jacques Auber, chef de pupitre au « Ringtheater », avant de devenir, en 1882, le plus jeune élève admis au Conservatoire de Vienne. Là, il étudia le violon avec Josef Hellmesberger fils et la composition avec Anton Bruckner. Médaillé d'or à 10 ans, il intégra le Conservatoire de Paris, où 2 de ses professeurs furent Joseph Massart (violon) et Léo Delibes (composition). 1er prix de violon en 1887, il fit une tournée américaine (1888-1889), à l'issue de laquelle il poursuivit sa formation, fit 2 années de médecine et son service militaire. En 1896, il se lança dans une carrière de virtuose et fit partout impression avec son nouveau style de jeu au vibrato continu. Après avoir fait ses débuts à Vienne (1898) et à Berlin (1899), il conquiert toute l'Europe en une marche triomphale. En 1900, il retourna en Amérique et, en 1902, il fit tant sensation à Londres qu'on lui décerna, en 1904, la médaille d'or de la « Philharmonic Society ».

Dès ses 1ers récitals, Kreisler programma ses propres pièces ; mais, vers 1905, il se mit à en faire passer certaines pour des œuvres de compositeurs passés, allant jusqu'à écrire un Concerto de « Vivaldi » :

« Lorsque je désirais étoffer mes programmes, je trouvais impudent et peu diplomatique de répéter constamment mon nom sur les programmes. » , s'excusa-t-il.

Comme assez peu d'œuvres Baroques et Classiques étaient alors connues, personne ne remarqua que son « Vivaldi » n'avait rien du vrai Vivaldi ni que les autres morceaux étaient aussi des pastiches. Il est amusant de lire les critiques fustigeant Kreisler d'oser faire cohabiter ses propres bagatelles avec les superbes pièces de grands compositeurs comme Pugnani et Couperin ! À un journaliste, Kreisler raconta éhontément comment il avait « découvert une collection de manuscrits, une musique aux mains de moines habitant l'un des plus vieux monastères d'Europe et comment, impatient de les avoir pour lui, il copia l'un des morceaux sur son poignet de chemise. Ce contre quoi les moines s'élevèrent ; finalement, après avoir beaucoup insisté, il parvint à acheter toute la collection pour une somme considérable » .

En 1909, il déclara au « New York Times » :

« J'ai découvert les œuvres dans un vieux couvent du Sud de la France. Je possède, en tout, 53 manuscrits de ce genre. 5 d'entre eux sont plus ou moins sans valeur. 48 sont des bijoux. »

Avec le temps, des confrères attentifs au style commencèrent à flairer quelque chose de louche. Dès 1910, Kreisler fut morigéné par le critique berlinois Leopold Schmidt pour avoir fait figurer son « Caprice viennois » aux côtés de joyaux de « Joseph Lanner » et il dut indiquer que les dits morceaux étaient aussi de lui ; il s'agissait de ses « Liebesfreud » et « Liebesleid » . En 1910 également, 14 de ses faux parurent sous le titre de « Manuscrits classiques » (l'éditeur Willy Strecker, de Schott, lui avait offert 1,000 $ pour 20 pièces) et il s'en écoula plus de 70,000 exemplaires en 6 mois.

Toujours en 1910, Kreisler assura la création londonienne du Concerto pour violon d'Elgar (dont il était le dédicataire), sous la baguette du compositeur. Après avoir brièvement servi dans l'armée pendant la Première Guerre mondiale (blessé, il fut rendu à la vie civile), il s'installa à New York, où il fut d'abord traité en héros. Mais l'attitude de nombreux Américains changea, surtout en province, avec l'entrée en guerre des États-Unis, en 1917 : accusé d'envoyer de l'argent à l'armée autrichienne, il dut préciser que ces fonds étaient destinés à son père vieillissant et aux orphelins de guerre. Dans les grandes villes, il garda le soutien de ses admirateurs mais il mit plusieurs années à reconquérir sa popularité. En revanche, son retour à Londres, en 1920, fut un succès. En 1923, il effectua une tournée en Extrême-Orient et, l'année suivante, il emménagea à Berlin, dans une maison neuve, mais l'avènement du Nazisme, en 1933, l'amena à boycotter l'Allemagne, en réaction contre le traitement infligé à ses co-religionnaires juifs. En 1934, il chargea son éditeur américain Carl Fischer de ranger ses « manuscrits Classiques » parmi ses œuvres, dans le catalogue de 1935. Mais déjà, le critique du « New York Times », Olin Downes, qui s'était vu demander une conférence-récital avec Yehudi Menuhin, s'était mis en quête des origines du « Préludium et Allegro », obligeant Kreisler à reconnaître qu'il en était l'auteur. Son subterfuge fit la une des journaux du monde entier et, si la plupart des gens s'en amusèrent, le critique anglais Ernest Newman, se montra particulièrement froissé. Après l'« Anschluß » de 1938, Kreisler prit la nationalité française puis émigra aux États-Unis. Le 12 mai 1941, un camion le heurta alors qu'il traversait distraitemment une rue de New York ; il eut beau s'en remettre et continuer de se produire en public jusqu'en 1950, il ne retrouva jamais son statut. Il mourut à New York, le 29 janvier 1962.

Parmi les compositions de Kreisler figurent 2 Opérettes et 1 quatuor à cordes. Ses pièces populaires, qu'il enregistra pour beaucoup jusqu'à 6 fois, parurent sous diverses appellations : Chants traditionnels d'Autriche, Œuvres, Manuscrits Classiques, Chefs-d'œuvre du violon, Compositions originales et Transcriptions. Elles reflètent son double talent de coloriste au violon et de pianiste. Un jour, à New York, Harold Bauer et lui interprétèrent la Sonate pour violon « à Kreutzer » de Beethoven avant d'échanger leurs instruments et de la rejouer à la fête donnée après le concert.

...

Violoniste autrichien, élève d'Anton Bruckner et de Josef Hellmesberger fils, à Vienne (1882-1885) ; de Joseph Massart et de Léo Delibes, à Paris (1885-1887), Fritz Kreisler commence une carrière d'enfant prodige interrompue pour effectuer des études médicales. En 1898, il reprend ses activités de violoniste, vivant à Vienne et à Berlin jusqu'en 1933. De 1933 à 1939, il se réfugie en France puis gagne les États-Unis où il séjournera jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, cessant de jouer en 1947.

Virtuose dans la tradition de l'école autrichienne, il s'est imposé dans les chefs-d'œuvre du répertoire et dans d'innombrables petites pièces qu'il avait lui-même écrites en les attribuant à des compositeurs du XVIIIe siècle (Pugnani, Francœur, Martini, Vivaldi). La supercherie ne fut découverte qu'en 1935, après plusieurs années ! Son style, très personnel, reposait sur un vibrato serré, une élégance et un sens de la phrase mélodique que soutenait une sonorité chatoyante. Habité par le rythme, il contribua à gommer les excès des interprétations Romantiques sans en perdre l'expression générale. Peu attiré par la musique de chambre, il ne s'est guère produit qu'avec Sergueï Rachmaninov. Il est l'un des rares virtuoses de cette génération à n'avoir pas fait école. Comme compositeur, il laisse, en dehors de ses fameux pastiches, des pièces pour violon (« Caprice viennois », « Liebesleid », « Tambourin chinois » , « Schön Rosmarin ») , des cadences pour tous les grands Concertos et plusieurs Opérettes dont « Sissi » , en 1932.

...

The Austrian-born violinist and composer Friedrich (« Fritz ») Kreisler was born on 2 February 1875 in Vienna and died on 29 January 1962 in New York. One of the most famous Violin Masters of his or any other day, and regarded as one of the greatest violinists of all time, he was known for his sweet tone and expressive phrasing. Like many great violinists of his generation, he produced a characteristic sound which was immediately recognizable as his own. Although he derived in many respects from the Franco-Belgian school, his style is nonetheless reminiscent of the « gemütlich » (cozy) lifestyle of pre-War Vienna.

Kreisler was the son of Anna (« née » Reaches) and Samuel Kreisler, a doctor. Of Jewish heritage, he was baptised at age 12. He studied at the Vienna Conservatory and in Paris, where his teachers included Anton Bruckner, Léo Delibes, Jakob Dont, Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, Joseph Massart, and Jules Massenet. While in Paris, he won the « 1er Grand Prix de Rome » gold medal, competing against 40 other players, all of whom were, at least, 20 years of age.

He made his United States debut at Steinway Hall, in New York City, on November 10, 1888, and his 1st tour of the United States, in 1888-1889, with Moritz Rosenthal, then returned to Austria and applied for a position in the Vienna Philharmonic. He was turned down by the Concert Master Arnold Rosé. It is easy to understand why upon hearing a recording of the Rosé Quartet ; Rosé was sparing in his use of vibrato, so Kreisler would not have blended well with the Orchestra's violin section. As a result, he left music to study medicine. He spent a brief time in the army before returning to the violin, in 1899, giving a concert with the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Arthur Nikisch. It was this concert and a series of American tours, from 1901 to 1903, that brought him real acclaim.

In 1910, Kreisler gave the premiere of Edward Elgar's Violin Concerto, a work commissioned by and dedicated to him. He served briefly in the Austrian Army in World War I, before being honourably discharged after he was wounded. He arrived in New York, on November 24, 1914, and spent the remainder of the War in America. He returned to Europe, in 1924, living 1st in Berlin, then moving to France, in 1938. Shortly thereafter, at the outbreak of World War II, he settled once again in the United States, becoming a naturalized citizen, in 1943. He lived there for the rest of his life, giving his last public concert in 1947 and broadcast performances for a few years after that.

On April 26, 1941, he was involved in the 1st of 2 traffic accidents that marked his life. Struck by a truck while crossing a street in New York, he suffered a fractured skull and was in a coma for over a week.

In his later years, he suffered from not only some hearing loss but also sight deterioration due to cataracts.

Towards the end of his life, he was in another accident while traveling in an automobile, and spent his last days blind and deaf as a result. Nonetheless, he « radiated a gentleness and refinement not unlike his music » , according to Archbishop Fulton J. Sheen who visited him frequently during that time (Kreisler and his wife were converts to Catholicism, received into the Church by the Archbishop himself) . He died of a heart condition aggravated by old age in New York City, in 1962, and was interred in a private mausoleum in Woodlawn Cemetery, Bronx, New York.

Kreisler wrote a number of pieces for the violin, including solos for encores, such as « Liebesleid » and « Liebesfreud » . Some of Kreisler's compositions were pastiches in an ostensible style of other composers, originally ascribed to earlier composers such as Gaetano Pugnani, Giuseppe Tartini, and Antonio Vivaldi. Then, in 1935, Kreisler revealed that he actually wrote the pieces. When critics complained, Kreisler replied that they had already deemed the compositions worthy : « The name changes, the value remains. » , he said. He also wrote Operettas including « Apple Blossoms » , in 1919, and « Sissy » , in 1932, a String Quartet and cadenzas, including ones for the Brahms D major Violin Concerto, the Paganini D major Violin Concerto, and the Beethoven D major Violin Concerto. His cadenzas for the Beethoven Concerto are the ones most often employed by violinists today.

He performed and recorded his own version of the 1st movement of the Paganini D major Violin Concerto. This version is re-scored and, in some places, re-harmonised. The orchestral introduction is completely re-written in some places. The overall effect is of a late- 19th Century work.

Kreisler owned several antique violins crafted by luthiers Antonio Stradivari, Pietro Guarneri, Giuseppe Guarneri, and Carlo Bergonzi, most of which eventually came to bear his name. Many of his violins were made by Doctor Morris Spriggs of San Francisco.

He also owned a Jean-Baptiste Vuillaume violin of 1860, which he often used as his 2nd violin, and which he often loaned to the young prodigy Josef Hassid.

On recordings, Kreisler's style resembles that of his younger contemporary Mischa Elman, with a tendency toward expansive tempi, a continuous and varied vibrato, expressive phrasing, and a melodic approach to passage-work. Kreisler makes considerable use of portamento and rubato. The 2 violinists' approaches are less similar in big works of the standard repertoire, such as Felix Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, than in smaller pieces.

A trip to a Kreisler concert is recounted in Siegfried Sassoon's 1928 autobiographical novel : « Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man » .

...

Violinist Fritz Kreisler was one of the most beloved and best-known of early recording era musicians. His burnished tone and patrician phrasing were quintessentially Viennese, and the warmth of his playing won him devoted followers wherever he appeared. So great was his fame and the affection in which he was held that he survived a blaze of controversy when he revealed, in 1935, that many of the short pieces he had performed as transcriptions of such composers as Couperin, Vivaldi, and Pugnani were, in fact, his own work. While the critics fumed, the public expressed little concern and continued to pack his concert appearances.

Kreisler was the son of a famous surgeon, a good amateur musician who gave young Fritz his 1st violin lessons.

Kreisler made his public debut at 7, in a collection of short works. Shortly thereafter, he was permitted to enter the Vienna Conservatory despite a policy that no one younger than 14 be accepted. After 3 years of study with Josef Hellmesberger, Junior (violin), and Anton Bruckner (composition), he was awarded a gold medal.

Kreisler was sent to Paris for further studies with Léo Delibes and Joseph Massart. At the age of 12, he won the « Premier Grand Prix de Rome » gold medal competing against 40 other players, all of whom were, at least, 20 years of age.

In 1888, Kreisler sailed to the United States for a concert tour with pianist Moritz Rosenthal, earning many complimentary reviews. When he returned to Vienna, he applied to the Vienna Philharmonic for a position but was turned down. Feeling discouraged, he resolved to abandon music and chose to pursue a career in medicine. After several years, he rejected that course and began the study of painting. First in Paris, then in Rome, he worked toward mastering his technique, but soon this, too, became tiresome. He returned to Vienna and enlisted in the army.

A full year as a soldier was sufficient to cause, yet, more rethinking and Kreisler resigned his commission and returned to the study of violin. He spent 8 weeks in country solitude readying himself for his return to the concert stage. His « second début » in Berlin was successful, but widespread acclaim came during several American tours, between 1901 and 1903. In the United States, he was hailed as one of the foremost violinists of his time and, soon after, Europe followed suit in recognizing his extraordinary artistry.

In 1910, in London, Kreisler gave the premiere performance of Elgar's Violin Concerto, a work dedicated to him.

While vacationing in Switzerland, in 1914, Kreisler received the news that Austria was at War. Returning to his native country, he rejoined his former division, now stationed in Galicia. An attack by the Russians resulted in an injury and his discharge with high honors. Wishing to help his country, Kreisler embarked on a lengthy concert tour of America. The United States' entry into the War, however, put him in the awkward position of being an ex-Austrian officer aiding what was now an enemy nation. Negative reaction obliged him to withdraw from concertizing and retire to the State of Maine to pass the remaining period of hostilities.

At his return to the New York concert stage, in 1919, however, he was given a tumultuous reception. He took-up residence in Berlin for 10 years, beginning in 1924. With the « Anshluß », in 1938, he moved to France, but returned to the United States before the Nazi invasion and lived his remaining years in America, where he gave his final public concert, in 1947. He continued to perform on broadcasts until 1950.

...

Kreisler was, without doubt, one of the most famous violinists of all time, dominating the world's stage until the 1930's and surviving even Jascha Heifetz's explosive « début » of 1917, audiences remaining loyal to Kreisler's warmth of tone and arresting musical personality. Feted by many as a pioneer of the so-called continuous vibrato (i.e., used as a constituent part of his tone, applied to passage work as much as to long melodic notes), Kreisler was not without his detractors in his early years. In 1896, when he auditioned for the Vienna « Hofoper » Orchestra, Arnold

Rosé, 12 years his senior, rejected him on the grounds that he was unable to sight read ; a reason that seems far less plausible than the possibility that Rosé, espousing an older German performance aesthetic (not unlike Joseph Joachim's) , considered Kreisler's playing inartistic and, perhaps, even felt threatened by his easy but devastatingly effective tonal charms. In spite, or perhaps because, of Eugène Ysaÿe giving Kreisler a standing ovation at his Berlin premiere, Joachim was cool in his reception of the young virtuoso who, in many ways, epitomised the qualities of the Franco-Belgian school that Joachim criticised. Most certainly, he disagreed with what he considered an abuse of the vibrato and when Kreisler filled-in for an accompanist in Joachim's class, the Master failed to mention Kreisler's violin performance, preferring instead to compliment him on his piano playing !

In truth, Kreisler did not invent the modern violin vibrato. It was a well-known characteristic of Henryk Wieniawski's playing, whilst many others considerably older than Kreisler (including Eugène Ysaÿe, Jenő Hubay and Pablo de Sarasate) used it frequently. Moreover, Rosé's solo recordings reveal that he too used it much more than Joachim. Kreisler bore Joachim no malice and even cited him as one of the profoundest influences of his artistic life. Nonetheless, he popularised this approach to sound, which was to prove highly-influential : there is scarcely a violinist of the 20th Century who was unaffected by Kreisler's style. In many respects, the reason for this can be traced to his recordings. According to Carl Flesch, Kreisler's tone was particularly suited to the recording processes of both the acoustic and early electric eras, his musical personality transcending their limitations.

Recognized for leading a trend towards more overtly emotional styles of playing, Kreisler was known for the bravura and intensity of his performances. Equally at home in the small-scale recital as with the Concerto, he composed a large number of pieces for performance in recital, all of which remain popular. Famously, Kreisler passed-off many of these as rediscovered works by earlier composers (Couperin, Dittersdorf, Pugnani) , only to reveal, in 1935, that this had been a good-humoured act of deception made in order to avoid over-repetition of his own name in solo recital programmes ! Kreisler was great friends with Ysaÿe and, perhaps more incongruously, Sergei Rachmaninov, with whom he recorded a number of works including an individual but effective 1928 performance of Beethoven's Violin Sonata, Opus 30, No. 3.

Kreisler's recordings display his wonderfully flexible sound and a controlled but effective expressivity. Certainly, he is much more overt in these matters than musicians of Joachim's Circle, but his is a more disciplined approach than, for example, Bronisław Huberman's sometimes wilful eccentricity. His earliest recordings (made during Joachim's lifetime, in 1904) already reveal the hallmarks of his later reputation : a regular and, some might say, rather saccharine portamento and a frequent (but not actually continuous) vibrato which seems narrow compared to that of modern players, whatever Kreisler's pioneering reputation. His 1916 recording of the Bach Double Violin Concerto with Efrem Zimbalist shows the performers' individuality, something that renders this disc (with nothing more than String Quartet accompaniment) both powerful and fascinating. His 1920's performances of the Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Brahms Concertos with the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Leo Blech are, arguably, finer than his later versions in terms of interpretation although they are technically inferior from a recording point of view, whilst his pairing with Rachmaninov holds an obvious fascination.

Kreisler, who allegedly never practised (possibly because he was so frequently occupied with actual performing engagements) , seems not to have suffered from stage fright and was, in many ways, a thoroughly natural player. For all his education and broad experience of life, he lacked the self-conscious academicism of older players of the Germanic tradition, many would say to his evident credit. A warm-hearted and generous artist, easy-going to a fault, Kreisler's best recordings mirror this generosity of spirit and allow us to glimpse something of the magnetic personality that ensured his enduring popularity.

...

« Music possesses all the characteristics of a vice : its acute attractive force, its secret salaciousness, the strange compulsion for self-abandonment. Musicians are, therefore, the only humans whose vices are respected, honoured and even paid for. » (Fritz Kreisler)

Fritz Kreisler was born in Vienna, on 2 February 1875. He received violin tuition from Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, at the age of 7, and became the youngest pupil of his time to study at the « Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » . He attended his 1st courses in music theory which were taught by Anton Bruckner, from 1882 to 1885. From 1885 to 1887, Kreisler studied at the « Conservatoire national supérieur de Paris » . The young student was a member of Joseph Massart's violin class and studied harmony and counterpoint with Leó Delibes. Despite having accompanied the pianist Moritz Rosenthal on a 6 month tour of the United States, in 1888, Kreisler subsequently began a 2 year course in medicine, in Vienna, following his travels.

He then spent a brief period in military service with the Austrian army. At the age of 21, Kreisler finally resolved to take-up a musical career. In 1898, he performed with the Vienna Philharmonic under the direction of Hans Richter and, 1 year later, with the Berlin Philharmonic conducted by Arthur Nikisch. This was followed by extensive concert tours to Scandinavia, Russia and Turkey.

In 1910, Edward Elgar dedicated his Violin Concerto to the internationally acclaimed violin virtuoso. From 1915, Kreisler was primarily resident in New York, but relocated to Berlin during the middle of the 1920's. Following Adolf Hitler's accession to power, the son of a Jewish doctor left Germany, initially going to Paris. With the outbreak of the Second World War, however, Kreisler took-up permanent residence in the United States and acquired American citizenship. He died on 29 January 1962, in his adopted home-town of New York.

Kreisler was not only an outstanding violinist, but also an extremely talented composer. A substantial part of his concert programmes consisted of his own works or own arrangements of popular pieces by other composers. Works such as « Caprice Viennois » , « Tambourin Chinois » and the « Rondino über ein Thema von Beethoven » have now entered the standard repertoire of numerous violinists. Kreisler also composed several lieder and 2 Operettas (« Apfelblüten » in New York, in 1919 ; and « Sissy » , in Vienna, in 1932) . In numerous compositions, the composer incorporated stylistic elements of famous composers from the past ; for example, his Concerto in C major for violin, string orchestra and organ is subtitled « in the style of Vivaldi » and the Concerto No. 1 in D major for violin and orchestra utilises motifs from Niccolò Paganini's compositional workshop.

Kreisler originally published the collection « Classical Manuscripts » for violin and piano as arrangements of original works by Corelli, Pugnani, Boccherini and other well-known composers of past eras before unmasking them as original works, in 1935. This collection also includes the 3 « Old Viennese Dance Tunes » : « Liebesfreud » , « Liebesleid » and « Schön Rosmarin » , in which the composer achieved an ideal combination of his own personal vibrato tone originating from the Viennese tradition from Ignaz Schuppanzigh to Josef Hellmesberger, his studies in counterpoint of the old Masters and the unmistakable Viennese 3/4 time. These « dance tunes » are, today, still considered as the most popular of Kreisler's compositions and are available in numerous arrangements. Kreisler was also an expert arranger and supplemented the violin repertoire with works by Manuel de Falla, Maurice Ravel, Antonín Dvořák and Frédéric Chopin. His Cadenza for Beethoven's Violin Concerto is one of the most frequently performed alongside the cadenza by Joseph Joachim.

Kreisler was only 12 when he was awarded the « Premier Prix du Conservatoire de Paris » . Eugène Ysaÿe dedicated the 4th of his 6 Solo Sonatas for violin to the violinist. The International Fritz Kreisler Society has held the « Fritz Kreisler Competition for Violin » in Vienna, since 1979, in commemoration of the Austrian violin virtuoso.

...

In an era of great violinists, Kreisler had technique, intellect, tone, and charm. He transcended the domain of serious music, performing and recording both popular music and the great Masterpieces. Greatly influenced by the work of Anton Bruckner and Léo Delibes, Fritz Kreisler has a marvelous gift for harmony and counterpoint. In his pastiche pieces, Kreisler demonstrates his musical genius and successfully provides the violin repertoire with idiomatic and satisfying music.

...

Fritz Kreisler (geboren 2. Februar 1875 in Wien ; gestorben 29. Januar 1962 in New York) war ein österreichstämmiger Violinist und Komponist.

Kreisler war der Sohn des jüdischen Arztes Samuel Kreisler, der auch Sigmund Freud behandelte. Von seinem Vater erhielt er im Alter von vier Jahren den ersten Violinunterricht. Seine Mutter, Anna Reches (im Geburtsregister von Fritz noch Chaje Ribe) , war römisch-katholisch, im Alter von 12 Jahren wurde er getauft. 1882 wurde er in das Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien aufgenommen und von Josef Hellmesberger junior (Violine) und Anton Bruckner (Musiktheorie) unterrichtet. Er war erst 7 Jahre alt und damit das jüngste « Wunderkind » , das jemals aufgenommen wurde. Von 1885 bis 1887 studierte er am Pariser Konservatorium, von seinen dortigen Lehrern sind insbesondere Lambert Joseph Massart (Geigenunterricht) und Léo Delibes (Komposition) sowie Jules Massenet zu nennen. 1887 gewann er die höchste Auszeichnung des Pariser Konservatoriums, den Premier Prix, im Alter von nur 12 Jahren.

Mit dem Pianisten Moriz Rosenthal trat er 1888-1889 seine erste Konzerttour durch die USA an. Nach seiner Rückkehr bewarb er sich bei den Wiener Philharmonikern, wurde jedoch abgelehnt, weil er nicht richtig vom Blatt lesen konnte. Er hörte auf zu musizieren und begann erst Medizin und dann Malerei zu studieren und verbrachte eine kurze Zeit in der Armee. 1896 fing er wieder mit dem Violinspiel an und debütierte 1898 in Wien, bevor er 1899 bei den Berliner Philharmonikern unter dem Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch ein Konzert gab. Dieses Konzert und eine Reihe von Tourneen in Amerika, in den Jahren 1901 bis 1903, brachten ihm wahre Beifallsstürme ein. 1904 erhielt er die Gold Medal (Goldmedaille) der Royal Philharmonic Society in London.

Bei der Überfahrt an Bord der Fürst Bismarck im Mai 1901 lernte er die Brooklyner Tabakhändlerstochter Harriet Lies (geschiedene Woerz) kennen, die er 1902 vor dem Friedensrichter in New York City sowie in der Österreichischen Botschaft in London heiratete. 1947 folgte eine kirchliche Trauung in der katholischen Pfarrei von New Rochelle. Sie zählte den Weiberhelden und Spieler. Seine Frau wurde auch seine Managerin und hatte damit alle Hände voll zu tun, da er in manchen Jahren 250 Konzerte und mehr absolvierte.

Herlitz vermerkt kurz : « Kreisler ist aus dem Judentum ausgeschieden. » .

Allein ein fünfjähriger Schallplattenvertrag mit der Victor Company soll ihm die seinerzeit unvorstellbare Summe von 750.000 Dollar eingebracht haben.

In diese Zeit fällt auch die Komposition seiner bekannten Charakterstücke. Er machte seine ersten Einspielungen und unternahm viele Konzertreisen. 1910 gab Kreisler die Premiere von Edward Elgars Violinkonzert, das ihm gewidmet war.

Er diente kurzzeitig in der österreichischen Armee im Ersten Weltkrieg, bevor er nach einer Verwundung in Russland ehrenvoll entlassen wurde. Die letzten Kriegsjahre verbrachte er in Amerika. Danach folgten Konzerttours durch die ganze Welt. 1923 war seine erste Tournee nach Fernost, wo er allerdings schon lange durch das Grammophon bekannt war.

Von 1915 bis 1925 lebte er in den USA, ab 1924 in Berlin, Kurfürstendamm. Im Berliner Grunewald kaufte Kreisler 1924 ein bewaldetes Grundstück und ließ sich eine mehrgeschossige Villa mit einem Nebengebäude für Bedienstete errichten : am Ende der Bismarckallee, Nummer 32a.

Im Sommer 1933 bat ihn der Dirigent Wilhelm Furtwängler als Solist in der kommenden Saison mit den Berliner Philharmoniker aufzutreten. Kreisler lehnte mit der Begründung ab, daß bereits die berühmten Dirigenten Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer und Fritz Busch Deutschland zwangsweise verlassen mußten :

« Ich bin daher fest entschlossen, mein Auftreten in Deutschland so lang aufzuschieben, bis das Recht aller Künstler, ihre Tätigkeit in Deutschland, ungeachtet der Abstammung, der Religion oder Nationalität auszuüben, unumstößliche Tatsache geworden ist. Ich vertraue darauf, daß es mir bald vergönnt sein wird, mit Ihnen zu musizieren. »

Als der österreichische Bundeskanzler Engelbert Dollfuß, ein Freund Kreislers, während des Juli-Putsches 1934 im Amt ermordet wurde, weilte Kreisler in Paris und äußerte die Bedenken, daß auch er bald Untertan eines nationalsozialistischen Reiches sein könnte. Daraufhin bot der Senator aus Savoyen ihm an, daß er auf Grund eines alten Gesetzes ohne Wartezeit in Frankreich eingebürgert werden könne :

« Ich werde zu George Bonnet (den französischen Außenminister) , gehen und die Angelegenheit regeln. Sie können über Nacht Franzose werden ! »

Die Nationalsozialisten verboten den Verkauf seiner Werke, seine Aufnahmen durften nicht mehr gespielt werden. Zu seinem 60. Geburtstag 1935 brachten die Rundfunkstationen weltweit Gedenksendungen : in Deutschland dagegen schwieg man ihn tot.

Nach dem Einmarsch deutscher Truppen im März 1938 wurden alle Bewohner des Landes aufgefordert, ihre österreichischen Pässe gegen deutsche umzutauschen. Daraufhin verließ Kreisler Deutschland und nahm die angebotene französische Staatsbürgerschaft an. Der deutsche Außenminister Joachim von Ribbentrop weigerte sich zunächst, die Gültigkeit der neuen Staatsbürgerschaft anzuerkennen. Um diplomatische Verwicklungen zu vermeiden, nahm Kreisler seinen Aufenthalt in der Nähe von Monte Carlo. Im Mai 1938 wurde er in Anerkennung seiner Kunst zum Kommandeur der Französischen Ehrenlegion ernannt.

Seit 1939 lebte er in New York, wo er bis zu seinem Lebensende wohnte ; er kehrte nie wieder nach Europa zurück. 1943 wurde er amerikanischer Staatsbürger. Wegen eines Autounfalls 1941, der seinem Gedächtnis Schaden zufügte, wurden seine Auftritte seltener. Sein letztes öffentliches Konzert gab er 1947. Seine 1944 begonnene Bell Telephone Hour Radiosendung setzte er noch bis in die 1950er Jahre fort.

Im Januar 1949 ließ Kreisler bei den Parke-Bernet Galleries seine Sammlung seltener Bücher, Manuskripte und einige Kunstgegenstände versteigern. Die mehr als $ 120,000 schenkte er der Golden Rule Foundation und dem Lenox Hill Hospital.

Bei seinem 80. Geburtstag war Fritz Kreisler beinahe blind und konnte kaum noch etwas hören. Am 29. Januar 1962 starb er nach kurzem Krankenhausaufenthalt in New York City als der letzte geigende Romantiker im Alter von 86 Jahren, vier Tage vor seinem Geburtstag. Seine Frau Harriet überlebte ihn um ein Jahr.

Kreislers Bruder Hugo, Cellist, floh 1938 mit seiner Familie aus Europa in die USA. Der Komponist, Sänger und Dichter Georg Kreisler war ein weitläufiger Verwandter von Fritz Kreisler.

An Kreisler scheiden sich die Geister. Von vielen (zum Beispiel von dem Geigenpädagogen Suzuki Shin'ichi) wird er verehrt, von anderen dagegen abgelehnt. Wie schon sein ältestes Tondokument von 1904 zeigt, hatte Kreisler bereits in jungen Jahren eine spezielle warme Tongebung entwickelt, mit der er seine Zuhörerschaft in den Bann schlug, und durch die er zusammen mit seinen Kompositionen dem Geigenspiel des 20. Jahrhunderts entscheidende Impulse gab. Dieser warme schmelzende Ton entsprach dem legendären Alt-Wiener Geigenklang (zum Beispiel eines Franz Clement oder Ignaz Schuppanzigh) , der von Josef Mayseder über Hellmesberger an Kreisler weitergegeben worden war. Die These, daß Kreisler der Erfinder des modernen durchgehenden Vibratos sei, wird zwar häufig zitiert, ist allerdings historisch nicht belegbar.

Bis heute sehr bekannt sind Kreislers Charakterstücke für Violine und Klavier, die sich an alten Formen und Stilen orientieren. Zu nennen sind hier insbesondere die drei Alt-Wiener Tanzweisen Liebesfreud und Liebesleid und Schön

Rosmarin. Sie sind tonal und einerseits von Barock und Klassik, andererseits vom Wiener Stil geprägt. Einige dieser Stücke entstanden im Stile anderer Komponisten. Viele dieser Werke (zusammengestellt in Klassische Manuskripte) schrieb Kreisler anfangs früheren Komponisten wie Gaetano Pugnani und Giuseppe Tartini zu, bis er 1935 bekannte, daß sie in Wirklichkeit von ihm stammten, und damit für einen kleinen Skandal sorgte, der eher peinlich für die Musikkritik war, die den Schwindel nicht erkannt hatte.

Kreisler schrieb neben einem Violinkonzert in G-Dur und einem Concerto für Violine, Streichorchester und Orgel in C-Dur (Im Stile von Antonio Vivaldi) auch die Operetten Apfelblüten (1919, zusammen mit Viktor Jacobi) und Sissy, sowie ein Streichquartett in A-Moll und einige Lieder. Von Bedeutung sind heute noch seine Kadenzen, einschließlich einer für das Violinkonzert Johannes Brahms'. Seine Kadenz für das Violinkonzert Ludwig van Beethovens gehört heutzutage neben der von Joseph Joachim zu den meistgespielten Kadenzen dieses Werkes.

Kreisler war der letzte komponierende Virtuose im Stile Niccolò Paganinis, der seine Kompositionen in großen Konzerttours unter Volk brachte. Seine Werke sind von Geigern mit unterschiedlichstem Können spielbar. Eugène Ysaÿe widmete Kreisler die vierte seiner sechs Solo-Sonaten.

« Mops », le petit carlin de Bruckner

« Mops » (qui signifie « fâché ») est le terme allemand associé à cette race de chien, d'origine chinoise, qui fut amené en Europe au 16^e siècle : on dit carlin, en français ; et « pug dog », en anglais.

C'est un chien à face plate réputé pour ses ronflements, son ronronnement et, étonnamment, ses miaulements.

Il est très apprécié pour sa douceur et son esprit joyeux ainsi que sa vivacité. C'est un chien apprécié des jeunes enfants, pour qui il aura toujours de l'énergie. Il ne grogne pas lorsqu'il est caressé ou pris dans les bras. Il n'est pas agressif. Il peut être très sportif ou, au contraire, très calme. Il a une santé fragile qui mérite des soins particuliers. Ses articulations sont également fragiles, il faut donc éviter de lui étirer les membres ou de le laisser sauter ou tomber de meubles ou d'endroits élevés.

Le compositeur Anton Bruckner en possédait un et il l'avait tout simplement surnommé : « Mops ». Le rondelet (et peut-être même obèse *) petit animal se trouvait toujours à ses côtés, en classe, durant les cours d'harmonie, de contrepoint, de composition et de théorie musicale au Conservatoire de Vienne (« Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde »). Sur l'heure du dîner, alors que le Maître sortait pour aller prendre son copieux repas dans l'un de ses restaurants préférés, il demandait à ses « chers élèves » (de fervents Brahmsiens, fort réticent face à la musique de Wagner) d'en prendre soin pendant son absence. Ils en profitaient donc pour le divertir tout en le gavant de morceaux de sandwiches. L'un d'eux, le prodigieux jeune violoniste Fritz Kreisler fit partie de sa classe, dès l'âge de 7 ans . Et après 3 ans d'études (1882-1885), il reçut une médaille d'or.

Mais le gamin était aussi connu pour ses tours pendables. Étant au fait des expériences de réflexes conditionnels du biochimiste et physiologiste russe Ivan Pavlov (impliquant un chien), une idée plutôt tordue lui vint à l'esprit en rapport avec le côté influençable et naïf de son vieux professeur qui adorait être complimenté à propos de sa musique.

* Le carlin a une vie essentiellement sédentaire. Il peut être sujet à l'obésité, bien que cela soit évitable grâce à l'exercice régulier et un régime alimentaire sain. Mais en compagnie de Bruckner, est-ce vraiment possible ???

 Fritz était le fils du célèbre chirurgien juif Samuel Kreisler (qui a travaillé aux côtés de Sigmund Freud) . Il était également un bon musicien amateur. C'est lui qui a donné au jeune garçon ses premières leçons de violon. Fritz Kreisler fit ses débuts en public, à l'âge de 7 ans, avec une sélection d'œuvres brèves. Peu de temps après, il fut accepté au Conservatoire de Vienne, en dépit d'une politique qui interdisait l'entrée au moins de 14 ans.

...

Anton Bruckner was the butt of many jokes in his later years. Vienna's society circles saw him as a « naïve » country bumpkin with an inexplicable passion for the music of Richard Wagner, whom the well-heeled considered unsophisticated beside Johannes Brahms.

And Bruckner got a hard time from many of his pupils at the Vienna Conservatory. He was an old man and often struggled to keep-up with their jokes. One of his liveliest students was the very young violinist Fritz Kreisler, a prodigy who had been admitted in this institution at the age of 7 !

Unfortunately for his teachers, the maturity of his musical skills was not matched by his personality, and his childish sense of humour often got him into trouble.

Bruckner had a chubby Pug Dog named « Mops » who always came to lessons. After morning classes, Bruckner would go for lunch, leaving « Mops » with the pupils. Kreisler and his friends had a great idea for a prank, and « Mops » was central to the plan.

One day, when Bruckner had left, the students began playing a leitmotif from Wagner at the piano. As they did so, they chased the dog around the room. Next, they played the theme from Bruckner's « Te Deum » , which the composer considered to be his finest work and, in order to get « Mops » to agree, they fed him pieces of their sandwiches as they played it.

Soon, of course, the dog was showing a distinct preference for the Bruckner theme.

After a few weeks of dog training, they said to Bruckner, as he returned from lunch :

« We know you're devoted to Wagner, but we don't think he compares to you. Even a dog would know that you're a greater composer than Wagner. »

Bruckner took exception to the idea that there was any composer as great as Wagner, but was curious and asked what they meant by the dog remark. He'd fallen for it. They played the Wagner motif to « Mops » , who ran howling from the room. When they played the theme from the « Te Deum » , the dog ran straight back in, wagging his tail and pawing at their sleeves.

Kreisler and his classmates were clearly well-informed about the conditioning experiments with dogs by the russian biochemist and physiologist, Ivan Pavlov.

Kreisler later went on to study medicine when it seemed that a career as a violinist was not going to pay the bills. His teacher was renowned Viennese surgeon Theodor Billroth, who was also a talented musician. Billroth recognized that Kreisler was far better at music than medicine and encouraged him to return to the violin. Music lovers should be grateful that he heeded the advice - and so should dogs.

...

Everybody knows that Fritz Kreisler was Suzuki's favourite violinist.

He referred to Kreisler as « my teacher » because he had analyzed Kreisler's tone, interpretations and mannerisms by listening to his recordings. I think Suzuki must have listened to every Kreisler recording more than 1,000 times, at least. Suzuki not only had Kreisler's complete recordings, but he also ordered these collections by the truckload for his own pupils.

Kreisler was the 1st « 7 year old » ever to be admitted to the Vienna Conservatory as an undergraduate student. No one under the age of 10 had ever been admitted prior to Kreisler.

He studied the violin with Josef Hellmesberger Junior and harmony, theory and composition with the famous austrian composer Anton Bruckner.

Bruckner was very eccentric and a religious fanatic. At the sound of the neighboring church bells, he would fall on his knees and start praying even if he was in the middle of a lesson. During the lunch hour, Bruckner would take-off for a sumptuous lunch and leave Kreisler and his fellow pupils to eat their sandwiches in the company of his fat little dog named « Mops » .

At that time, there was a terrific feud raging in Vienna between the Wagner fans and the Brahms fans. And Bruckner was a staunch supporter of Wagner.

At the age of 8, Kreisler, who was a very well-read boy, knew all about Pavlov and his experiments in conditioning. He decided with his friends to play a trick on Bruckner, who was very child-like and « naïve » . They wanted to flatter him and, at the same time, neutralize his adulation for Wagner since Kreisler and his fellow students were all Brahms fans.

With « Mops » in the studio, they would shut the door and play at the piano Wagner's « Meistersinger » Overture. Then, they would start shouting at « Mops » , chasing him around the room, slapping him and scaring the daylight out of him for the duration of the work. After that, they would play Bruckner's « Te Deum » and then pat, caress and feed « Mops » bits of sandwiches while talking to him very gently. « Mops » would wander around his tail.

They did this every day for several weeks until « Mops » was perfectly conditioned. The time had now come to face Bruckner !

One day, after Bruckner had returned from lunch, the young Fritz Kreisler said :

« You know, “ Herr ” Bruckner, you are a much greater composer than Wagner. »

« Never ! » , replied Bruckner, horrified, almost as if Kreisler had blasphemed.

« Despite your admiration for Wagner, it is obvious you are a far greater composer. In fact, even a dog would know that. » Bruckner was blushing and looking embarrassed.

« What do you mean even a dog would know that ? » , he asked with great curiosity.

This was the moment that they had been waiting for ...

« Just watch very carefully, now. » , said Kreisler.

They shut the door and played Wagner's « Meistersinger » Overture. « Mops » immediately started howling, around and hiding under tables and chairs in absolute terror while they all sat and watched him.

Next, they played Bruckner's « Te Deum » and, at once, « Mops » crawled-out from under the table, wagging his tail and like a perfectly happy dog.

...

The gentle composer Anton Bruckner was deeply loved by his music students. They knew that the public had generally rejected his music in favour of Richard Wagner's and that Bruckner had despaired of ever receiving the recognition he deserved. So they found an amusing way to encourage their teacher, using his dog, who was named « Mops » .

...

Anton Bruckner had a chubby, fat Pug Dog named « Mops » . Young Fritz Kreisler, a former pupil of Bruckner's at the Vienna Conservatory, once recalled :

« He would leave us with “ Mops ” munching our sandwiches while he himself hastened-off to luncheon. We decided we'd play a joke on our teacher which would flatter him. So, while the “ Magister ” was away, we'd play a motif (on the piano) by Wagner and, as we did so, would slap “ Mops ” and chase him. Next, we'd start Bruckner's “ Te Deum ” and, while this music was in progress, would give “ Mops ” something to eat. He soon showed a convincing preference for the “ Te Deum ” ! When we thought we had trained him sufficiently so that he would automatically run away when Wagner was played and joyfully approach us at the sound of a Bruckner strain, we deemed the moment appropriate for our prank. »

One day, as our teacher returned from lunch, we said to him :

« “ Meister Bruckner ”, we know that you are devoted to Wagner but, to our way of thinking, he cannot compare with you. Why, even a dog would know that you are a greater composer than Wagner. »

« Our guileless teacher blushed. He thought we were serious. He reproved us, paid tribute to Wagner as unquestionably the greatest contemporary, but was nevertheless filled with enough curiosity to ask what we meant by claiming even a dog could tell the difference. »

« This was the moment we had waited for. We played a Wagner motif. A howling, scared “ Mops ” stole-out of the room. We started in on Bruckner's “ Te Deum ”. A happy canine returned, wagging his tail and pawing expectantly at our sleeves. Bruckner was touched. »

...

While Bruckner was away, his students « trained » the dog. One of them relates how « we would play a motif by Wagner and, as we did so, would slap “ Mops ” and chase him. Next, we would start to play Bruckner's “ Te Deum ” and, during that period, we would give “ Mops ” something to eat. He soon showed a convincing preference for the “ Te Deum ” ! » .

After considerable training, they were ready for their fun.

One day, the students said to Bruckner how much better his music was than that of Wagner :

« Why, even a dog would know that you are a greater composer than Wagner ! »

As their astonished teacher watched, they played the Wagner melody and the dog howled and ran-out of the room. Then, they played Bruckner's « Te Deum » , and « Mops » returned wagging his tail. It was soon clear what they had done, but their teacher was deeply touched by their loyalty. The love that he had always shown his students had come back to touch him.

...

Some of Anton Bruckner's students decided to play a trick on him. While he was out to lunch, they played music on the piano for Bruckner's dog. As one of them played a motive from Richard Wagner's music, the others chased the dog around the room and slapped him. But when they played from Bruckner's own « Te Deum », they gave the dog treats.

Once the dog started running away every time he heard Wagner's music and came bounding toward the piano with his tail wagging every time he heard Bruckner's, the students prepared the next part of their plan.

When Bruckner returned from lunch, the student's hailed him as the greatest living composer. Bruckner, of course, always insisted that Wagner was the greatest. He became incensed when someone elevated even his own music above Wagner's.

The students then informed him that even the dog knew that Bruckner was greater than Wagner. Intrigued, he asked for proof. Sure enough, at the sound of Wagner's music, the dog howled and ran-out of the room but, at the sound of Bruckner's « Te Deum », he returned with his tail wagging and pawed expectantly at the students' sleeves. Surely, it didn't take Bruckner long to figure-out the explanation, but he was pleased at the demonstration nonetheless.

Le carlin (« Pug Dog »)

Le carlin (vient du nom du comédien Carlo Antonio Bertinazzi) est une race de chien provenant de Chine et existant en Europe depuis au moins le XVI^e siècle. Il est connu sous l'appellation de « Pug » aux États-Unis, en Australie et en Angleterre (du fait de son profil en poing) et de « Mops » (fâché) en Allemagne et en Russie. Il appartient à la catégorie des chiens de compagnie et des molossoïdes ou molosses.

C'est un chien de taille moyenne : environ 30 centimètres au garrot pour un poids moyen de 6 à 10 kilogrammes. Il existe différentes couleurs de robe : sable avec masque noir, abricot avec masque noir et noire. L'origine du carlin noir serait différente de celle du carlin sable.

Ce fut le chien de compagnie de princesses ou d'aristocrates, telles que la reine Marie-Antoinette, Madame Élisabeth, la princesse Catherine Galitzine, la marquise de Pompadour, Joséphine de Beauharnais. Les carlins étaient aussi les chiens favoris du Duc et de la Duchesse de Windsor qui adoraient se faire photographier avec eux.

On peut lui donner un bain et un shampooing, au besoin. Il faut garder un œil sur son museau pour s'assurer qu'il demeure propre et sec. Il peut être nécessaire de lui nettoyer les yeux régulièrement, car le carlin est sensible à l'accumulation de poussière. Il est important de nettoyer à l'aide d'un mouchoir ou d'un linge humide les replis de peau situés entre ses yeux et son museau, appelés le chanfrein, parce qu'il peut accumuler des croûtes dues à l'humidité et macérer, cela peut provoquer des démangeaisons et des maladies.

Du fait de leur museau aplati, les carlins sont sujets à l'insuffisance respiratoire et à l'hypoxie chronique comme toutes les espèces brachycéphales.

Le museau comportant de nombreux plis et ridules, le carlin est aussi confronté à la pyodermite du pli faciale.

Son espérance de vie moyenne est d'environ 11 ans.

...

The Pug is a breed of dog with a wrinkly, short-muzzled face and curled tail. The breed has a fine, glossy coat that comes in a variety of colours, most often fawn or black, and a compact square body with well-developed muscles.

Pugs were brought from China to Europe in the 16th Century and were popularized in Western Europe by the House of Orange of the Netherlands, and the House of Stuart. Pugs, as breeding animals, may have contributed to the English Bulldog, the modern Pekingese and the King Charles Spaniel.

Pugs remain popular into the 21st Century, with some famous celebrity owners.

While the Pugs that are depicted in 18th Century prints tend to be long and lean, modern breed preferences are for a square cobby body, a compact form, a deep chest, and well-developed muscle. Their smooth and glossy coats can be fawn, apricot fawn, silver fawn, or black. The markings are clearly defined and there is a trace of a black line extending from the occiput to the tail. The tail normally curls tightly over the hip.

Pugs have 2 distinct shapes for their ears, « rose » and « button » . « Rose » ears are smaller than the standard style of « button » ears, and are folded with the front edge against the side of the head. Breeding preference goes to « button » style ears.

Pugs' legs are very strong, straight, of moderate length, and are set well under. Their shoulders are moderately laid back. Their ankles are strong, their feet are small, their toes are well split-up, and their nails are black. The lower teeth normally protrude further than their upper, resulting in an under-bite.

The breed is often described as multum in parvo, or « much in little » , alluding to the Pug's remarkable personality, despite its small size. Pugs are strong willed but rarely aggressive, and are suitable for families with children. The majority of the breed is very fond of children and sturdy enough to properly play with them. Depending on their owner's mood, they can be quiet and docile but also vivacious and teasing. Pugs tend to have a lazy nature and spend a lot of time napping. They are often called « shadows » because they follow their owners around and like to stay close to the action.

The breed has strong, straight legs set well under the body and a tail that curls over the hip. Un-exaggerated wrinkles feature on the head. Eyes should be large with a rounded shape and dark in colour.

The early history of the Pug is not attested to in detail, it is accepted that modern Pugs are descended from dogs imported to Europe from China in the 16th Century. Similar dogs were popular in the Imperial Court during the Song Dynasty.

Pugs were popular at European Courts, and reportedly became the official dog of the House of Orange, in 1572, after a Pug named Pompey saved the life of the Prince of Orange by alerting him to the approach of assassins.

A Pug travelled with William III and Mary II when they left the Netherlands to accept the throne of England, in 1688. During this period, the Pug may have been bred with the old type King Charles spaniel, giving the modern King Charles Spaniel its Pug characteristics.

The breed eventually became popular in other European countries as well. Pugs were painted by Francisco José de Goya y Lucientes, in Spain, and, in Italy, they rode-up front on private carriages, dressed in jackets and pantaloons that matched those of the coachman. They were used by the military to track animals and people, and were also employed as guard dogs.

The English painter William Hogarth was the devoted owner of a series of Pugs. His 1745 self-portrait, which is now in London's Tate Gallery, includes his Pug, named « Trump ». The Pug was also well-known in Italy. In 1789, a Mrs. Piozzi wrote in her journal :

« The little Pug Dog or Dutch mastiff has quitted London for Padua, I perceive. Every carriage I meet here has a Pug in it. »

The popularity of the Pug continued to spread in France during the 18th Century. Before her marriage to Napoleon Bonaparte, Joséphine had her Pug named « Fortune » carry concealed messages to her family while she was confined at « Les Carmes » prison, it having alone been given visiting rights.

In 19th Century England, the breed flourished under the patronage of Queen Victoria. Her many Pugs, which she bred herself, included « Olga », « Pedro », « Minka », « Fatima » and « Venus ». Her involvement with dogs, in general, helped to establish the Kennel Club, which was formed in 1873. Queen Victoria favoured apricot and fawn colours. Queen Victoria's passion for Pugs was passed on to many other members of the Royal family, including her grandson King George V and his son King Edward VIII. In paintings and engravings of the 18th and 19th Centuries, Pugs usually appear with longer legs and noses than today and, sometimes, with cropped ears. The modern Pug's appearance probably changed after 1860 when a new wave of Pugs were imported directly from China. These Pugs had shorter legs and the modern-style Pug nose. The British aristocrat Lady Brassey is credited with making black Pugs fashionable after she brought some back from China, in 1886. Ear cropping was made illegal, in 1895.

Pugs arrived in the United States during the 19th Century and were soon making their way into the family home and the show ring. The American Kennel Club recognized the breed, in 1885. The Pug Dog Club of America was founded in 1931 and was recognized by the American Kennel Club that same year.

Since Pugs lack longer snouts and prominent skeletal brow ridges, they are susceptible to eye injuries such as proptosis, scratched corneas, and painful entropion. They also have compact breathing passageways, leaving many prone to breathing difficulties or unable to efficiently regulate their temperature through evaporation from the tongue by panting. A Pug's normal body temperature is between 101°F (38°C) and 102°F (39°C) . If this temperature rises to 105°F (41°C) , oxygen demand is greatly increased and immediate cooling is required. If body temperature reaches 108°F (42°C) , organ failure can occur. Their breathing problems can be worsened by the stresses of travelling in air cargo, which may involve high temperatures. Following the deaths of Pugs and other brachycephalic breeds, several airlines either banned their transport in cargo or enacted seasonal restrictions.

Pugs that live a mostly sedentary life can be prone to obesity, though this is avoidable with regular exercise and a healthy diet. The median life span of Pugs is 11 years, which is in line with other breeds of the same size.

Pugs, like other short-snouted breeds, have elongated palates. When excited, they are prone to « reverse sneezing » which causes them to quickly (and seemingly laboriously) gasp and snort. The veterinary name for this is pharyngeal gag reflex and it is caused by fluid or debris getting caught under the palate and irritating the throat or limiting breathing. Reverse sneezing episodes are usually not harmful, and massaging the dog's throat or covering its nose in order to make it breathe through its mouth can often shorten a sneezing fit.

Some pugs are also born with stenotic nares which can also inhibit their breathing. In serious cases, the pinched nostrils make breathing even more difficult for this breed and put added pressure on the larynx. In some cases, the dog could pass-out from blocked airways. If this happens, one should inquire with their veterinarian whether or not surgery is needed to modify the breathing passages.

Eye prolapse is a common problem among Pugs and other brachycephalic breeds and can be caused by a trauma to the head or neck, or even by the owner using a tight leash instead of a harness. While the eye can usually be pushed back into its socket by the owner or by a vet, veterinary attention is usually advisable. If the prolapse happens on a regular basis, the Pug might require surgery.

Pugs have many wrinkles in their faces, so owners will often clean inside the creases to avoid irritation and infection. If this is not done, the dog may develop a condition known as skin fold dermatitis.

An abnormal formation of the hip socket, known as hip dysplasia, affected nearly 64 % of Pugs in a survey performed by the Orthopedic Foundation for Animals ; the breed was ranked the 2nd worst-affected by this condition out of 157 breeds tested.

Pugs are one of several breeds that are more susceptible than other dogs to demodectic mange, also known as « demodex » . This condition is caused when parasitic mites, that are often present in a dog's skin without causing symptoms, are allowed to do damage because their host has a weakened immune system. It is a problem for many young Pugs, although not usually a major one, and is easily treatable, but some are especially susceptible and present with a systemic form of the condition. This vulnerability is thought to be genetic and breeders will avoid producing puppies from adults who have this condition. An investigative documentary carried-out by the BBC found significant inbreeding between pedigree dogs, with a study by Imperial College, London, showing that the 10,000 Pugs in the United Kingdom are so inbred that their gene pool is the equivalent of only 50 individuals.

Pugs can suffer from necrotizing meningoencephalitis (NME), also known as Pug dog encephalitis (PDE), an inflammation of the brain and meninges. NME also occurs in other small dogs, such as the Yorkshire Terrier, Maltese, and Chihuahua. There is no known cure for NME, which is believed to be an inherited disease. Dogs usually die or have to be put to sleep within a few months of onset, which, in those susceptible to this condition, is typically between 6 months and 7 years of age.

This breed, along with other brachycephalic dogs (e.g., boxers, bulldogs), are also prone to hemivertebrae. The curled tail of a British bulldog is an example of a hemivertebrae, but when it occurs not in the coccygeal vertebrae but, in other areas of the spine, it can cause paralysis. The condition occurs when 2 parts of a spinal vertebra do not fuse properly while a young Pug is still growing, resulting in an irregularly shaped spinal cavity which can put pressure on the spinal cord.

Bernhard Deubler

Bernhard Deubler est né en 1842 dans le village de Obertraun (district de Gmunden) en Haute-Autriche. Fils d'un instituteur, il entre jeune garçon comme petit-chanteur au monastère augustinien de Saint-Florian. En 1884, lors du décès de Ignaz P. Traumahler, Bernhard Deubler deviendra le nouveau « Kapellmeister » (organiste et chef de chœur) à Saint-Florian. Appuyé par les professeurs du Conservatoire de Vienne, Anton Bruckner (harmonie) et Johann Evangelist Habert (composition), Deubler réussira à atténuer l'orthodoxie du mouvement Cécilianiste mis de l'avant par son prédécesseur.

Ignaz P. Traumahler (1815-1884) fut un adepte du Cécilianisme : mouvement puritain ultra-conservateur de renouveau de la musique liturgique dans l'Église, apparu au XIXe siècle, visant à ré-introduire le style choral a cappella de Palestrina.

...

Le titre « Romantique » a été donné à la 4e Symphonie par Bruckner lui-même. Ce surnom ne se réfère pas à une conception contemporaine de l'amour, en plein XIXe siècle. Le compositeur semble plutôt avoir été inspiré par le contexte médiéval et chevaleresque retrouvé dans les Opéras de « Lohengrin » et de « Siegfried » de Richard Wagner.

Bruckner annota plusieurs passages dans sa partition. 1er mouvement : « ville médiévale, chevaliers se lançant au-dehors sur de fiers chevaux » ; 2e mouvement : « amour repoussé » ; 3e mouvement : « danse pour le repas de chasse » ; 4e mouvement : « fête populaire » .

Le manuscrit autographe du Scherzo et du Finale de la version de 1878 contient les annotations : « Jagdthema » (thème de la chasse) ; « Tanzweise während der Mahlzeit auf der Jagd » (air de danse pour le repas de la chasse) et « Volksfest » (fête populaire) .

À propos du 1er mouvement, Bruckner va écrire une lettre au critique et musicologue Theodor (Otto) Helm qui, à son tour, va transmettre ce compte-rendu détaillé à l'ami et associé du compositeur, le chef de chœur et organiste de Saint-Florian, Bernhard Deubler : « ville médiévale ; l'aube ; l'appel du matin résonne des tours de la ville ; les portes s'ouvrent ; les chevaliers se lancent au-dehors sur de fiers chevaux, la magie de la nature les enveloppe ; murmures de la forêt ; chants d'oiseaux ; et ainsi, l'atmosphère Romantique se poursuit. » .

...

Wilhelm Pailler (1838-1895) est l'auteur de recueils de textes folkloriques évoquant la région autrichienne du « Salzkammergut » dans les Préalpes orientales septentrionales. Pour les mettre en musique, il fera appel aux talents du « Kapellmeister » Bernhard Deubler à Saint-Florian et de Karl Moshammer à Gmunden. Les manuscrits se trouvent aujourd'hui aux archives de la Bibliothèque du monastère (n° XI.543.F) . À son tour, le demi-frère de Wilhelm Pailler héritera d'un recueil de chansons manuscrites provenant de son oncle Nußhammer (ou Nußbaumer) , un habitant du village de Hallstatt (situé près du lac Hallstättersee) . Il s'agit de 34 textes sur le thème de la Nativité, également conservés à la bibliothèque du monastère (n° 10543.6) .

À la satisfaction des villageois, Wilhelm Pailler et Bernhard Deubler produiront conjointement des spectacles populaires sur les grands thèmes bibliques. Deubler composera des mélodies fort simples utilisant la forme tripartite « ABA » . La simplicité de ces œuvres faciliteront leur répétition par les laïcs.

Productions

1868 : « Das Passionsspiel zu Brixlegg » (le Jeu de la Passion à Brixlegg) .

24 avril 1879 : Spectacle monté pour célébrer les noces d'argent de l'Empereur François-Joseph 1er et de l'Impératrice Elisabeth (« Sissi ») .

« Sanct Dorothea » (Sainte-Dorothée) , légende dramatique en 2 actes.

« Sanct Julia » (Sainte-Julie) , légende dramatique en 4 actes sur une musique de Bernhard Deubler.

La grâce de Dieu, légende dramatique en 3 actes sur une musique de Bernhard Deubler.

« Volksthümliche » , spectacle sur le thème de la crèche de la Nativité comprenant des chants de Noël traditionnels sur une musique de Bernhard Deubler ; visant essentiellement les associations jeunesse.

Spectacle sur le thème de la Nativité et de l'Épiphanie.

Après la mort de Wilhelm Pailler en 1895, on assistera l'année suivante à la création de nouvelles pièces bibliques pour les jeunes sur des musiques de Bernhard Deubler et de Josef Gruber.

« Der armen Seelen Mutter » (la Mère des âmes perdues) , spectacle religieux en 3 actes comprenant des lieder de Bernhard Deubler.

« Sankt Maria's Herzen » (le Cœur de la Vierge-Marie) , spectacle religieux avec 1 prologue et 5 actes comprenant des lieder de Bernhard Deubler.

« Sankt Marias letzter Tag » (le Dernier jour de la Vierge-Marie) , une légende dramatique en 3 actes sur une musique de Bernhard Deubler, visant essentiellement un auditoire de jeunes filles.

Bernhard Deubler va mourir au monastère de Saint-Florian, en 1907.

...

Le village de Hallstatt est connu pour abriter le site de l'Âge du fer, issu de la civilisation à laquelle on a donné son nom, la civilisation de Hallstatt. Fouillé par Georg Ramsauer, de 1846 à 1868, il a livré près de 1,000 tombes, datant du VIIe siècle avant Jésus-Christ. Les mines de sel de la montagne voisine furent exploitées dès la période néolithique. Si cette activité débuta à l'échelon local vers 3,000 avant Jésus-Christ, elle prit durant le 1er millénaire une dimension « européenne » , puisque l'on a établi la preuve que le sel était alors transporté par de véritables voies commerciales vers les mers de la Baltique et de la Méditerranée. Le profil type qui définit la base géologique du Rhétien se trouve au-dessus de Hallstatt. En 1997, le village est inscrit au patrimoine mondial de l'Unesco pour ses maisons couleur pastel et son paysage culturel de Hallstatt-Dachstein / Salzkammergut.

Le village d'Hallstatt, connu pour son ossuaire, est inscrit à l'inventaire du patrimoine mondial par l'Unesco pour ses maisons sur pilotis blotties autour du lac. Le site a été habité dès le 1er millénaire avant Jésus-Christ : cette période qui correspond à l'Âge de fer a vu aussi s'épanouir une civilisation florissante. La cité s'est également enrichie grâce aux mines de sel situées aux alentours (« Salzbergwerk ») . À l'époque, le sel se négociait au prix de l'or. Aujourd'hui, le village dégage un pittoresque indéniable. On s'attardera avec plaisir dans ses ruelles, ou l'on fera une promenade en barque sur le lac.

...

Anton Bruckner critiquera le « Te Deum » d'Hector Berlioz pour sa non conformité « ecclésiastique » , principalement parce qu'il avait assisté à une représentation hors des murs de l'église. Bruckner commença à travailler sur son propre « Te Deum » peu avant mai 1881. Il portait alors son attention sur sa 6e Symphonie. Il a fallu attendre la fin de la composition de la 7e Symphonie pour que le compositeur reprenne le travail sur son « Te Deum » , le terminant le 7 mars 1884. (Bruckner reprendra une mélodie basée les mots « non confundar » dans le dernier mouvement de sa 7e Symphonie.)

Du début du 18e siècle et jusqu'au 19e siècle, de nombreux compositeurs ont écrit des « Requiem » si longs ou utilisant tant de musiciens qu'ils ne pouvaient pas être joués pendant un service funèbre normal ; les « Requiem » de Gossec, Berlioz, Verdi, et Dvořák sont des Oratorios. Une contre-réaction à ce mouvement vint du mouvement Cécilien qui recommandait un accompagnement restreint pour la musique liturgique et voyait d'un mauvais œil l'utilisation de solistes vocaux.

WAB 45 : « Te Deum »

Mai 1881 - 7 mars 1884 : WAB 45 - « Te Deum » en do majeur pour quatuor vocal (SATB) , chœur mixte (SATB) , grand orchestre (2 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 2 clarinettes en si bémol, 2 bassons, 4 cors en fa, 3 trompettes en fa, 3 trombones (ATB) , contrebasses, 1 tuba, timbales en do et en sol, ensemble de cordes) et orgue ad libitum. Composé entre mai 1881 et mars 1884, parallèlement à la 6e Symphonie (achevée en 1881) et à la 7e Symphonie (achevée en 1883) , avec laquelle il a des rapports étroits. La mort de Richard Wagner aura fourni au compositeur l'impulsion pour compléter l'œuvre. La version originale sera révisée entre septembre 1883 et le 7 mars 1884.

La première aura lieu le 2 mai 1885 dans le cadre d'un concert semi-privé donné à l' « Akademischer Wagnerverein » ou « Wiener Akademische Wagner-Verein » (Société académique Wagner de Vienne) . Un accompagnement pour 2 pianos se substituera à l'orchestre ; le tout sous la direction du compositeur.

Les Iers concerts majeurs d'œuvres Symphoniques contemporaines, donnés à Vienne, eurent lieu à la Société académique Wagner. Cette branche, fondée en 1872-1873, avait d'abord pour but de promouvoir et de diffuser les œuvres de Richard Wagner. Bruckner lui-même en est devenu membre à l'automne de 1873. De nombreux élèves et supporteurs de Bruckner (Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Hans Rott, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, August Göllerich et Guido Adler) vont s'y joindre également. Outre les œuvres du Maître de Bayreuth, on mettait de l'avant celles de Franz Liszt, de Hugo Wolf et d'Anton Bruckner. Lors de réunions occasionnelles appelés « soirées privées » l'on va présenter, en grande première, les Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner sous la forme d'arrangements pour piano à 2 mains, à 4 mains ou 2 pianos. Suivront le « Te Deum » , le Quintette à cordes et les Motets.

À la fin des années 1880, au moment où Bruckner commence à être reconnu en tant que Symphoniste, ses amis et ses élèves, fascinés par son style avant-gardiste, décident de former un « Cercle » restreint afin de promouvoir ses œuvres de différentes façons. Beaucoup d'entre eux étaient de jeunes musiciens émergents qui ont étudié la théorie musicale dans la classe du Maître au Conservatoire de Vienne. Ils ont également agi comme assistants à diverses occasions. Certains de ses élèves sont devenus de précieux et proches collaborateurs. Les frères Josef et Franz Schalk de même que Ferdinand Löwe, en particulier, ont su gagner sa confiance. Ils vont faire connaître la musique de Bruckner au public grâce à des d'arrangements pour piano lors de récitals organisés par le « Wagner-Verein » . Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe vont rester fidèle à la « cause » après la mort du Maître de Saint-Florian. Ils vont s'imposer comme les Iers grands interprètes de sa musique. Leur dévotion profonde et leurs efforts dans la publication et la diffusion des Symphonies s'avérera un moment charnière dans l'histoire.

Directeurs artistiques de la Société académique Wagner de Vienne : Felix Mottl (1873-1880) , Johann Paumgartner (1880-1881) , Eduard Schütt (1881-1887) , Josef Schalk (1887) et F. Foll (1902) .

Membres éminents de la Société académique Wagner de Vienne : Anton Bruckner (1873 ; 1885, membre honoraire) , Gustav Mahler (1877-1879) , Hans Rott (1875-1879) , Guido Adler (1873-1785) , L. Bösendorfer (membre honoraire) .

Le chef Hans Richter programmera l'œuvre à Vienne dans sa version (orchestrale) révisée de 1883-1884, le 10 janvier 1886, lors d'un de ses grands concerts avec le Philharmonique. Cette œuvre sacrée fait partie des compositions qui ont suscité l'enthousiasme du public dès la Ire représentation. Il ne fallut pas à attendre très longtemps pour voir sa publication :

Version provisoire (1881) , non encore publiée.

Ire édition : TR 40b, Theodor Rättig, Vienne (1885) , arrangement pour piano de Josef Schalk.

Version révisée de 1883-1884 :

TR 40b, T. Alan, Theodor Rättig, Vienne (1904) .

UE 2989, T. Alan, Universal-Edition, Vienne.

EE 4728, Ernst Eulenburg (10) , édition Max Steinitzer (1920) .

EE 4278, Ernst Eulenburg (960) , édition Adolf Aber (vers 1930) .

EE 4278, Ernst Eulenburg (960) , édition Hans Ferdinand Redlich (1960) .

S 9600, Broude (USA) , édition Peters (3488) .

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XIX, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Leopold Nowak (1962) ; sur la page-titre : « Fassung von 1884 » .

D'une durée approximative de 23 minutes, le « Te Deum » est donc une œuvre courte, relativement aux Symphonies de Bruckner, mais aussi à sa grande Messe en fa mineur (3e) . Bruckner n'a donc pas, comme Hector Berlioz l'avait fait dans son propre « Te Deum » (1855) , doté son œuvre de proportions gigantesques. Cette concision est peut-être pour beaucoup dans l'excellent accueil que reçut l'œuvre. Eduard Hanslick lui-même, l'éternel ennemi de Bruckner, ne put que reconnaître l'excellence de la nouvelle composition. Gustav Mahler, enthousiaste, écrivit sur la partition, à la place des indications « pour chœur, voix solistes, orchestre et orgue ad libitum » : « pour des langues angéliques, des chercheurs de Dieu, des esprits tourmentés et des âmes purifiées dans les flammes » . Bruckner, surtout, en était particulièrement satisfait ; il affirma plus tard : « Lorsque Dieu jugera mon âme, je Lui offrirai la partition de mon « Te Deum » et il me jugera avec bienveillance » . Le « Te Deum » est le témoignage de la foi fervente de Bruckner, et un chant de louanges et de réjouissance sacrée. C'est l'œuvre de Bruckner qui connut le plus de succès, avec la 7e Symphonie et, dans une certaine mesure, la 8e en 1890, en Autriche et dans le monde. Une de ses représentations, à Berlin en 1891, remporta un succès extraordinaire.

Le « Te Deum » est également la dernière de ses œuvres que Bruckner, déjà affaibli, entendit en concert (organisé sur l'instigation de Johannes Brahms) , le 12 janvier 1896. C'est peut-être ce qui détermina Bruckner, sentant qu'il risquait de ne pouvoir achever sa 9e Symphonie, à recommander que son « Te Deum » soit exécuté en guise de mouvement final, ces 2 œuvres étant dédiées « à Dieu » (un thème du « Te Deum » est d'ailleurs cité dans la 9e. Cette solution est toutefois rarement choisie, en raison des difficultés techniques, les exécutants préférant la laisser s'éteindre sur le silence final de l'Adagio qui clôt ainsi l'œuvre du Maître.

La première berlinoise aura lieu le 31 mai 1891 sous la puissante direction du chef du chœur philharmonique, Siegfried Ochs (19 avril 1858, Francfort-sur-le-Main ; 6 février 1929, Berlin) . Il s'agira d'un triomphe. Même Hans von Bülow était enchanté du résultat. Ochs était l'homme idéal pour mener à bien cette œuvre sacrée surtout dans les moments théâtraux. Ochs était passé Maître dans la production d'effets contrastés. Il respectait scrupuleusement la partition notamment à l'approche des triples pianos. Ochs était fier de voir que Bruckner assistait aux répétitions. Bruckner qui semblait enchanté du résultat a quand même demandé à ce que certains passages doux soient joués un peu plus fortissimo. Surpris, Ochs se plia aux exigences du Maître qui ne cessait de répéter : « Encore un peu plus fort. » . Il arrivera à être entièrement satisfait lorsqu'ils furent finalement joués fortissimo.

I. Te Deum laudamus.

II. Te ergo, quaesumus.

III. Aeterna fac cum sanctis tuis.

IV. Salvum fac populum tuum, Domine.

V. In te, Domine, speravi.

Te Deum laudamus : te Dominum confitemur. Te æternum Patrem omnis terra veneratur.

Tibi omnes Angeli, tibi caeli et universae potestates : Tibi Cherubim et Seraphim incessabili voce proclamant :

Sanctus : Sanctus : Sanctus Dominus Deus Sabaoth. Pleni sunt caeli et terra majestatis gloriae tuae.

Te gloriosus Apostolorum chorus : Te Prophetarum laudabilis numerus : Te Martyrum candidatus laudat exercitus.

Te per orbem terrarum sancta confitetur Ecclesia : Patrem immensae majestatis :

Venerandum tuum verum, et unicum Filium : Sanctum quoque Paraclitum Spiritum.

Tu Rex gloriae, Christe. Tu Patris sempiternus es Filius. Tu ad liberandum suscepturus hominem, non horruisti Virginis uterum.

Tu devicto mortis aculeo, aperuisti credentibus regna caelorum.

Tu ad dexteram Dei sedes, in gloria Patris. Judex crederis esse venturus.

Le « Te Deum » est l'un des hymnes d'actions de grâce les plus célèbres de la liturgie chrétienne. Selon une légende du début du Moyen-âge, il aurait été improvisé au baptême de Saint-Augustin par Saint-Ambroise et Augustin lui-même.

L'œuvre est attribuée par certains à l'évêque Nicétas (de Remesiana, aujourd'hui, Béla Palanka en Serbie) qui vécut à la fin du 4^e siècle mais ce n'est pas vraiment établi. En tout cas, le texte, lui, est bien du 4^e siècle comme le « Sanctus » et la Préface de la Messe.

Le texte original se termine au verset 21. Il y en a, en tout, 29 ou 30 selon la façon dont on traite le dernier verset.

La 1^{re} partie se compose d'acclamations à Dieu le Père (10 versets) .

Suit une doxologie (louange à la Trinité) incluant donc le Fils et le Saint-Esprit.

La seconde partie énumère les mystères christiques à partir de « Tu Rex gloriae » (versets 14 à 23) .

La 3^e est assez hétérogène et se compose de versets puisés dans les Psaumes (à partir de « Aeterna fac ») .

Les recherches récentes datent la mélodie du début du 5^e siècle et localisent sa naissance dans le Sud-Est de la Gaule ou la région de Milan. Cette mélodie est du grégorien du 4^e mode mais il en existe plusieurs versions dont les plus anciennes semblent être le « ton solennel » du « Graduale Romanum » et celui de l'Antiphonaire Monastique ; le plus ancien manuscrit ne date que du 12^e siècle donc assez tardif. Il n'existe aucune polyphonie écrite avant le début du 14^e siècle.

Dans la France de l'Ancien Régime, le « Te Deum » est l'hymne d'actions de grâce et de louange obligatoire pour les cérémonies comme le sacre du roi, la consécration d'un évêque, les victoires militaires. La liturgie anglicane, très calquée sur la liturgie catholique Romaine, le conserve. Le compositeur anglais William Walton en a écrit un, en 1953, pour le couronnement de la reine Elizabeth II et Henry Purcell, un en 1694, pour la Sainte-Cécile.

Ce qui ne veut pas dire que la France Républicaine l'a oublié : le 1^{er} « Te Deum » du répertoire civique a été composé par François-Joseph Gossec pour la Fête de la Fédération qui eut lieu le 14 juillet 1790, au Champ de Mars, pour célébrer le 1^{er} anniversaire de la prise de la Bastille et les espoirs de la Révolution.

Et comment oublier celui du 26 août 1944, à Notre-Dame de Paris, pour célébrer la libération de la ville, à la fois par les insurgés des Forces françaises de l'intérieur (FFI) et la 2^e DB ?

Si les 1^{ers} « Te Deum » datent du XIV^e et du XV^e siècle, il y en a fort peu. Le XVI^e est mieux représenté : Felice Anerio, Roland de Lassus, Palestrina. C'est à l'ère Baroque que le « Te Deum » de style polyphonique s'épanouit.

Voici des exemples choisis du XVII^e au XX^e siècle :

Marc-Antoine Charpentier est l'auteur de 6 « Te Deum » au moins, il nous en reste 4 dont le plus célèbre est celui en ré majeur, datant autour de 1690.

Michel-Richard Delalande en a composé un vers 1684, révisé plusieurs fois, exécuté pour la consécration de l'église Saint-Louis des Invalides à Paris, en 1706.

Antoine Blanchard a célébré les victoires de Louis XV : son œuvre donnée à Paris, en mai 1744, a été exécutée à Versailles après la victoire de Fontenoy sur les Anglais.

Franz-Joseph Haydn en a composé 2 versions : l'une pour le prince Esterhazy (la date donnée est, selon les ouvrages consultés, 1762 ou 1765.) au service duquel il entre en 1761 (la famille Esterhazy était l'une des plus riches et des plus influentes familles de la noblesse magyare) ; l'autre pour Marie-Thérèse, épouse de l'Empereur François II du Saint-Empire devenu François Ier d'Autriche, en 1806.

François-Joseph Gossec, déjà évoqué, est l'auteur d'un « Te Deum » en 1779 (de 50 minutes !) avec grand orchestre et de celui de 1790 qui réunit 1,000 choristes hommes et des instruments à vent et à percussion (il faut dire que l'œuvre fut donnée en plein air) .

Pour le couronnement de Napoléon Ier, le 2 décembre 1804, c'est un Italien, Giovanni Paisiello (1740-1816) , dont le 1er Consul était un grand admirateur, qui composa la Messe et le « Te Deum » .

...

The « Te Deum » in C major (WAB 45) is a setting of the « Te Deum » hymn, composed by Anton Bruckner for 4 soloists, mixed-choir (SATB) , orchestra (2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets in A, 2 bassoons, 4 horns in F, 3 trumpets in F, alto, tenor and bass trombones, contrabass tuba, timpani in C and G, and strings) , and organ « ad libitum » .

Total duration : about 24 minutes.

The setting is in 5 sections :

« Te Deum laudamus » (Allegro, Feierlich, mit Kraft, in C major) .

The 1st section opens in blazing C major by the choir in unison, propelled by a powerful open-5th pedal-point by the organ and open-5ths motive in the strings. Thereafter, the soloists and the choir enter as the music moves through distinctly Brucknerian processes and modulations.

« Te ergo quæsumus » (Moderato, in F minor) :

The 2nd section in F minor (« Te ergo quæsumus ») is serene and imploring in nature, featuring an expressive tenor solo and a solo violin.

« Æterna fac » (Allegro, Feierlich, mit Kraft, in D minor) :

The 3rd section (« Æterna fac ») , in Bruckner's favoured key of D minor, is almost apocalyptic in its fury. Propelled by a rhythmic device, it draws on the full resources of the choir and orchestra before coming to an abrupt unresolved cadence.

« Salvum fac populum tuum » (Moderato, in F minor) :

The 4th section (« Salvum fac populum tuum ») , which begins as a repeat of the 2nd section, this time with women's voices accompanying the tenor, evolves, after a bass solo and a pedal-point by the choir on « et rege eos, et extolle illos usque in æternum » , to the « Per singulos dies » sub-section, which recalls the fervour and energy of the opening.

« In Te, Domine speravi » (Mäßig bewegt, in C major) :

The final section in C major, which begins with the solo quartet, culminates in a joyous fugue, followed by an impassioned chorale on the words « non confundar in æternum » , which is remarkably similar to the main-theme of the Adagio of Symphony No. 7. The opening string figure returns, as the full ensemble carries the work to a powerful conclusion.

...

Bruckner started work on his « Te Deum » from 3 to 17 May 1881, when he was finalizing his Symphony No. 6. After finishing his next Symphony (No. 7) , Bruckner resumed work on his « Te Deum » on 28 September 1883. The vocal and orchestral score was completed on 7 March 1884. The « ad libitum » organ part was added on a separate score, on 16 March 1884. The composer dedicated the piece « For the greater glory of God » (« Ad maiorem Dei gloriam » or A.M.D.G.) « in gratitude for having safely brought me through so much anguish in Vienna » .

The « Te Deum » was premiered in the « Kleiner Musikvereinssaal » in Vienna, on 2 May 1885, with soloists « Frau » Ulrich-Linde, Emilie Zips, Richard Exleben, and Heinrich Gassner, with the Choir of the « Wiener Akademischer Richard Wagner Verein » , and Robert Erben and Joseph Schalk substituting for the Orchestra on 2 pianos. Hans Richter conducted the 1st performance with full-orchestra on 10 January 1886, in the « Großer Musikvereinssaal » of Vienna.

Thereafter, there were almost 30 more performances within Bruckner's lifetime. The last performance, which Bruckner attended, was conducted by Richard von Perger at the suggestion of Johannes Brahms. On his copy of the score, Gustav Mahler crossed-out « für Chor, Soli und Orchester, Orgel " ad libitum " » (for choir, solos and orchestra, organ « ad libitum ») and wrote « für Engelzungen, Gottsucher, gequälte Herzen und im Feuer gereinigte Seelen ! » (for the tongues of angels, heaven-blest, chastened hearts, and souls purified in the fire !) . The composer himself called the work « the pride of his life » .

The 1st performance in the United States occurred at the Cincinnati May Festival, on 26 May 1892. Theodore Thomas conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus and the soloists Corinne Moore-Lawson, Marie Ritter-Goetze, Edward Lloyd and George Ellsworth Holmes.

The draft-version of 1881 and the 1st sketch of 1883 are stored in the archive of the Kremsmünster Abbey. The voice and orchestral score, and the « ad libitum » organ score of 1884 are stored in the archive of the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » .

Draft-version of 1881 (edited by Franz Scheder)

The draft-version of 1881, the manuscript of which is stored in the archive of the Kremsmünster Abbey, includes the vocal scores and some basic orchestration. It is shorter than the final version (357 bars versus 513 bars) . In particular, the « Æterna fac » is different and much shorter, and the final fugue is not yet composed.

Final version of 1884 (Theodor Rättig, Vienna, 1885 ; Leopold Nowak, 1962)

The « Te Deum » was 1st published in 1885 by Theodore Rättig, who paid Bruckner 50 Gulden, « the only money he ever earned as a composer in the whole of his life » . Another important difference with Bruckner's other 1st publications is that there are few differences between it and the original manuscript.

« The most important (difference) being the absence of the trombone and double-bass tuba chords at bars 275 and 283 of the “ Salvum fac ” section. At bar 26, the 2nd clarinet has a different note and, in the 1st edition, the clarinets are in B-flat instead of in A as in the original manuscript. » with no recomposition from the Schalk brothers.

Note : In the 1890's, Bruckner was aware that he might not live to finish his Symphony No. 9, and some commentators have suggested that the « Te Deum » could be used as a Finale. However, musicologist Robert Simpson believed that not « even in the poor state of health and mind of his last few months of his life, would Bruckner have considered the use of the C major “ Te Deum ” as Finale to a D minor Symphony to be more than a make-shift solution » , and that the link to the « Te Deum » was simply a matter of self-quotation more than anything else.

Anton Bruckner et la famille Brown de New York

2 September 2014 - Sally B. Brown, Visiting Committee Co-chair, Department of Musical Instruments (The Metropolitan Museum of Art of New York) .

The Department of Musical Instruments continues to commemorate the 125th anniversary of the 1st gift of musical instruments from Mary Elizabeth Adams Brown who, over several decades, built a collection of more than 3,300 instruments for the Museum. The collection she gave is named for her husband, John Crosby Brown, and still forms the majority of the Museum's departmental holdings.

Prior to any thoughts of collecting musical instruments, though, Mary Elizabeth Adams Brown, her husband, and 4 of their 6 children spent the winter of 1881-1882, in Vienna. They were there to « cultivate whatever capacity for music in us was either already there or could be discovered » , and each family member studied a separate instrument while residing in the city. Mister Brown, already a competent organist, took 3 lessons a week from none other than Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) - then on the faculty of the Vienna Conservatory and organist at Saint-Stephen's Church.

(Photo) The Brown family's music teachers in Vienna. Photo courtesy of the Brown Family Archives

(Photo) Anton Bruckner (top left) and the Brown family's music teachers during their stay in Vienna. Image courtesy of the author.

Was it a formal introduction or chance that brought the Browns and Bruckner together ? Ultimately, there are no clues. We do know, however, that despite Bruckner's legendary unpopularity as a composer in Vienna, he was a favourite of the Brown family. In her Vienna diary, Mary Elizabeth described Bruckner as a « very funny, fat, warm-hearted old man with a plum pudding face and a few spears of hair sticking up on his head which clearly resembled the pieces of almond usually projecting from (such) a pudding » . At the same time, Bruckner was at work on his 7th Symphony, which would not be performed until 1884 and, only then, was it premiered in Leipzig, and not Vienna. In 1882, he autographed its opening bars for the Browns, a familial gesture which they carefully preserved in their archives.

Fascinating !!! I will post this on my website www.abruckner.com (John F. Berky)

...

From 1889 to 1909, Mary Elizabeth Adams Brown was regarded as the authority in America on musical instruments from all over the world. By her death, in 1918, she had lavished more than 3,300 instruments on The Metropolitan Museum of Art. Her 1st gift, in 1889, consisted of 276 instruments - mostly objects from distant places and « savage and oriental » peoples, as she described them in the parlance of her day. By 1901, these instruments occupied 5 rooms, or 10 % of the total number of galleries in the Museum, at the time. Brown called her collection, as an acknowledgement of its scope and in honour of her husband, « The Crosby Brown Collection of Musical Instruments of All Nations » .

It might be thought that she was inspired to acquire « exotic » instruments by being an adventurous traveler throughout the world. Although Brown did travel in Europe and would later visit major instrument collections there, her inspiration to collect musical instruments came from somewhere else - her family's relationships with foreign missionaries across the globe.

Brown's father, the Reverend William Adams, was a renowned Presbyterian minister in New York. In 1873, he became the 3rd president of Union Theological Seminary, where many American missionaries received their early training. As a leader and a preacher, he was an influential voice in an increasingly tumultuous city and was noted for his domestic and foreign outreach. Among Adams's many international affiliations was his longtime presidency of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church. He traveled extensively (though never further east than Russia) , and according to Mary Elizabeth's brother, Thatcher Adams, their father's visits abroad were regularly reciprocated by returning missionaries. In a 1917 Christmas letter to his sister, Thatcher wrote about their Houston Street childhood home :

« Besides relatives, we abounded in missionaries. They came from all parts of the earth, from the slopes of Lebanon, from the Islands of the Sea, from Phrygia Pamphylia and the regions beyond Jordan, there was even one who had dwelt among the cannibals and whose safe return from those dangerous parashioners I always attributed to his extremely unappetizing appearance. »

Mary Elizabeth no doubt heard some of the « tales of these worthy men » , and they probably brought gifts to the

Adams family from the places they had been posted. Some of these might have been musical instruments, which would explain why, describing herself as « always (having been) fond of old musical instruments », she sent instructions to a cousin in Florence to purchase her « 1st instruments », initially intended as decorations for her music room. Mary Elizabeth's expansive world view had already begun at home.

In June 1883, the Browns' personal records show their 2 eldest daughters receiving prizes from « Miss Doremus' Preparatory School ». This school was only one of Sarah D. Doremus's occupations ; she was also the corresponding secretary of the well-established Women's Union Missionary Society founded by her mother, Sarah Platt Doremus, in 1860. This organization was among the 1st to send female missionaries into countries where native women were isolated and deprived of physical, educational, and spiritual assistance - those whose needs could not be properly met by male missionaries. Furthermore, Mary Elizabeth Brown's missionary correspondents were augmented by her husband, John Crosby Brown, who continued the family connection to Union Theological Seminary as a board member and, later, president until his death, in 1909.

In the early 1880's, Doremus had put Brown in touch with Elizabeth Stevens, the wife of a missionary in Rangoon, Burma (now Yangon, Myanmar) , who wrote in June 1886 :

« I am at last able to tell you that the box containing musical instruments has been shipped for New York. Its contents are so very rude and low down in the scale of civilization that I fear they will be out of place in the elegant music room you describe. »

Stevens warmed considerably when describing a harp she was also sending. She enclosed a list of instruments she had purchased, 5 of which appeared in Brown's 1st collection catalogue, « Musical Instruments and Their Homes » (1888) . In 1898, 6 months before her death, Stevens wrote with enthusiasm of another, more elegant Burmese harp she had purchased — undoubtedly, the one that is highlighted in the « Musical Instruments » galleries today, gilded all over and featuring scenes from the Hindu Ramayama on its body.

Correspondence shows that many friendships developed between Mary Elizabeth Brown and the missionaries she encountered. As they had with her father, many visited the Browns' homes, particularly their country home, Brighthurst, in Orange, New Jersey. As required by Brown, they all signed the visitors books. Doctor George E. Post, a Union Theological alumnus and a University of New York Medical College graduate, was for many years professor of surgery at the Syrian Protestant College, in Beirut. In 1886, he sent Brown a carefully labeled box of « Near Eastern » instruments, and upon visiting the Browns a year later, signed the visitors book in Hebrew.

Earlier, in 1885, George Gilmore, another Union Seminary graduate and missionary, was a Brighthurst guest. Later, that year, he was one of 3 men picked to establish the 1st English-language school in Korea, under the patronage of King Gojong. By 1888, he had managed to put together a representative group of Korean musical « instruments of torture », as he called them, which he sent to Brown. The Western missionaries often wrote disparagingly about the instruments and music of indigenous peoples around the world, but Brown did not share those opinions and never wrote in similarly judgmental terms. Instead, she sought-out and welcomed musical instruments of all types, no matter how unusual or unconventional they appeared to her contemporaries.

The Reverend Henry N. Cobb, corresponding secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, was a friend and neighbor to the Browns, in New Jersey, and, for years, was like a magnet that attracted missionaries world-wide to Brown. In 1886, he introduced her to Reverend James L. Amerman, an independent missionary in Tokyo. Most of the Japanese instruments illustrated in Brown's 1888 catalogue were sent by Amerman through the long, slow shipping route of the Suez Canal. Amerman informed her that he had consulted with « one skilled in Japanese music » in order to acquire the instruments, and later suggested knowledgeable corrections to her draft catalogue.

Brown's many missionary correspondents always showed an interest and pride in the work they did to assist her, as maintaining this unusual contact at home must have provided a unique way for them to delve more deeply into their foreign assignments. At the back of the 1st Brighthurst visitors book, which spanned from 1874 to 1888, Brown compiled a list of languages in which her guests had signed ; there were more than 30. She clearly collected people as well as instruments.

The Browns' interest in Japan was augmented by the fact that a cousin, Annie Hammond Bradshaw, was a missionary in Sendai, north of Tokyo. There is no evidence that Bradshaw sent instruments to New York, but she did send numerous photographs of herself at work.

Brown's most engaging and faithful correspondent was also in Japan : Florence H. Learned, who, along with her husband, Dwight W. Learned, a professor at Doshisha University, had been missionaries for over 20 years. At the end of the 19th Century, when Brown had become an experienced and selective collector, the 2 women corresponded in detail, with each often sending the other drawings of possible acquisitions. Learned's most stunning find was an enormous gong anchored by 2 carved oni, or 3-toed devils. It must have occasioned considerable comment at the Museum when it arrived 2 days before the opening of the May 1899 social season.

Locating instruments was only part of the chore Brown imposed on her missionary contacts. Arranging financing and transportation to New York was crucial, since shipping was often as costly as the weighty or fragile objects themselves. Because she sometimes sent missionaries small amounts of money as well as doctrinal and practical publications, many became Brown's « pen pal » friends. For instance, the isolation of Learned as missionary and wife of a professor was palpable from her letters. On March 4, 1899, she wrote to Brown :

« I shall feel almost sorry to have our business relations cease. You have been such a kind, generous sympathetic friend, I feel as though I had really known you as a dear personal friend though I have never seen you nor can I expect to, for there is little prospect that we shall return to the United States before our work here is done.

On April 4, she wrote again :

« May I be so bold as to say that when you wish to send me a little remembrance again, nothing will please me more than your own photograph. »

WAB 107 : Symphonie n° 7

Le chef Arthur Nikisch fera de la publicité gratuite, en marge du concert de la première, en jouant au piano (à la Société académique Wagner de Vienne) la partition de la 7e Symphonie devant des critiques influents. Il faisait ensuite rapport à Bruckner, chaque fois qu'il croyait avoir gagné l'estime de l'un d'eux.

23 septembre 1881 - 17 août 1883 : WAB 107 - Symphonie n° 7 en mi majeur pour 2 flûtes, 2 hautbois, 2 clarinettes en la, 2 bassons, 4 cors en fa (dont 4 jouent aussi les tubas wagnériens) , 3 trompettes en fa, 3 trombones (ATB) , 5 tubas (2 tubas wagnériens ténors en si bémol, 2 tubas wagnériens basses en fa et 1 tuba contrebasse) , timbales, triangle, cymbales et les cordes. Durée approximative : 64 à 69 minutes.

Ce concert historique apporta à Anton Bruckner, le compositeur, la consécration internationale si longtemps attendue. Stimulé par ce triomphe, Anton Bruckner commencera la composition de sa 8e Symphonie.

Dédiée au roi Louis II de Bavière. Le chef Hermann Levi interviendra personnellement auprès de lui afin qu'il accepte la dédicace de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner. Création à Leipzig (sans les tubas wagnériens) par l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » , le 30 décembre 1884, sous la direction du chef Arthur Nikisch, un ancien élève de Richard Wagner. Le concert eut lieu exceptionnellement au Théâtre municipal de Leipzig. Le Maître a pu en profiter pour visiter le tout Nouveau Théâtre de Leipzig (« Neues Theater ») qui avait cependant refusé d'accueillir sa nouvelle œuvre.

Malgré quelques commentaires négatifs à propos de la 7e Symphonie, un des critiques mentionnera :

« Son talent éveillait d'abord de la curiosité, puis de l'intérêt, ensuite de l'admiration et finalement de l'enthousiasme. »

...

La 7e est la plus exécutée du compositeur à cause, sans doute, de l'incomparable Adagio. Bruckner commence à écrire la Symphonie en septembre 1881 avec le pressentiment de la mort de Richard Wagner, ce qui, par la suite, s'est effectivement réalisé (1883) . Le 1er mouvement, qui annonce « Parsifal » sans s'en inspirer est terminé en juillet 1882. L'adoration qu'il portait à Wagner est quelque peu exagérée mais, il est certain que le fruit spirituel de l'admiration exaltée de Bruckner est particulièrement mûr et la 7e (souvent intitulée Symphonie des trémolos) est la plus chaleureusement sincère et la plus ardente de toutes les Symphonies du compositeur. Elle contient beaucoup de thèmes bien choisis. L'auteur ne lui apporte aucune modification.

Selon Max Auer, le compositeur Franz Liszt (dont l'idéalisme et l'altruisme sont sans précédent !) avait montré un grand intérêt pour la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner (plus que pour tout ce qui a précédé) mais sans vraiment comprendre cette musique. Lorsqu'il fut invité à montrer plus de gentillesse à son endroit, Franz Liszt aurait répliqué :

« Je ne peux pas supporter l'entendre me répondre : " Votre Grâce, Monsieur Canonicus ! " » .

Bruckner va réviser la Symphonie en 1885 après sa création, le 30 décembre 1884. La seule partition manuscrite autographe qui a survécu porte le numéro « Musik Handschriftlichen 19479 » . Mais des révisions ont été apportées à cette partition. Dans certains cas, le matériau d'origine (datant de 1881-1883) a été effacé. Par conséquent, la forme exacte de la version originale n'existe plus. Le manuscrit contient plein d'ajouts écrits sur des bouts de papier qui ont été collés directement sur les pages, particulièrement aux 1er et 2e mouvements. Ces interventions ne sont pas de la main du compositeur (probablement des disciples Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe) mais elles sont soupçonnées d'avoir été faites à la demande de Bruckner.

1re édition : Albert J. Gutmann, Vienne (1885) , version révisée.

2e édition : Albert J. Gutmann, Vienne (1895) .

Édition Ernst Eulenburg, Leipzig (vers 1925) .

Universal-Edition, Vienne.

Édition Robert Haas (1944) .

Ré-édition : Leopold Nowak (1954) ; quelques changements mineurs, notamment rétablissement du coup de cymbales et du trémolo de triangle et de timbale lors du climax de l'Adagio (que Robert Haas avait supprimés) .

EE 03167, édition Ernst Eulenburg, Londres (1958) .

...

Composée à Vienne en 1881-1883 ; révisée en 1885.

Version originale (1881-1883) :

Brucknerverlag, édition Robert Haas (1944) ; ré-édition (1949) . G/A (August Göllerich / Max Auer) : VII.

Breitkopf et Härtel (3621) , édition Robert Haas (1953) .

Dover Publications Inc. , édition Robert Haas (1990) .

(1) Allegro moderato ; (2) Adagio. Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam ; (3) Scherzo. Sehr schnell ; Trio. Etwas langsamer ; (4) Finale. Bewegt, doch nicht schnell.

Version originale révisée (1881-1883) :

Seconde édition révisée :

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) VII, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Leopold Nowak (1954) (1967) (1970) .

EE 6849 (465) , édition Ernst Eulenburg (1992) .

3e édition révisée : Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Leopold Nowak / Rüdiger Bornhöft (1995) (2003) .

Source des tempi utilisés : version hybride de Robert Haas et Leopold Nowak.

Édition Kalmus (Kalmus Orchestra Library, n° A7168) , non datée.

Version et révisions (1885) :

2e édition révisée : AJG 576, Albert J. Gutmann, Vienne (1895) .

EE 3637, Ernst Eulenburg (65) , édition Max Steinitzer (1912) .

UE 6577, Universal-Edition, Vienne (vers 1924) .

UE 3599, Philharmonia (211) , Universal-Edition, Vienne ; révisée par Josef Venantius von Wöb (1927) .

10397, Édition Peters (1927) , 3840g.

EE 3637, Ernst Eulenburg (465) , édition Wilhelm Altmann (vers 1936) .

27446 (3161) , Breitkopf et Härtel (1936) ; ré-impression : Kalmus Orchestra Library, n° A1194, non datée.

EE 3637, Eulenburg (465) , édition Hans Ferdinand Redlich (1958) .

Édition Kalmus (158) .

(1) Allegro moderato, minim = 58 ; (2) Adagio. Sehr feierlich und langsam, quaver = 63 ; (3) Scherzo. Sehr schnell, dotted minim = 80 ; Trio. Etwas langsamer, dotted minim = 42 ; (4) Finale. Bewegt, doch nicht schnell, minim = 63.

La liste de la 7e Symphonie fut mise à jour entre août et octobre 2009. Remerciements à Alan Leighton pour avoir fourni d'importantes informations supplémentaires.

SIMON RATTLE CONDUCTS THE PREMIERE OF A NEW BRUCKNER EDITION BY BENJAMIN-GUNNAR COHRS

After more than 4 years of preparation, the 1st volume of the new « ANTON BRUCKNER “ URTEXT ” COMPLETE EDITION » will be released this summer - a critical edition of the 7th Symphony, edited by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, Editorial Director of the « Bruckner Edition Wien » (Publisher : Alexander Hermann, Vienna) . The premiere of this brand-new score will be given by the Berlin Philharmonic, conducted by Sir Simon Rattle, in Milano (Expo / La Scala, 2 May 2015, at 9:00 pm) and in Vienna (« Musikverein » , 3 May 2015, at 7:30 pm) , the latter in the presence of the Editor.

The « ANTON BRUCKNER “ URTEXT ” GESAMTAUSGABE » (ABUGA) is published by the « Bruckner Edition Wien » , an imprint of « Verlagsgruppe Hermann Wien » , since 2015. The patron is Nikolaus Harnoncourt. The Editorial Director is Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. The publisher is Alexander Hermann. This newly-conceived, scholarly-practical complete edition (45 volumes) has a fundamentally revised division into scorings and genres. Parallel with the music-editions, a series of text publications on Bruckner will be published, providing contextual information.

EDITORS

Doctor Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs : scholar, author and conductor (Bremen, Germany) .

Doctor Morten Solvik : scholar (Vienna, Austria) .

Matthias Giesen : « Stiftskapellmeister » and organist (Saint-Florian, Austria) .

Joseph Kanz : « Kapellmeister » and arranger (Wiesbaden, Germany) .

Rob van der Hilst : Organist, composer, author and scholar (Utrecht, Netherlands) .

ADVISORY BOARD

University Professor, Doctor Manfred Wagner : scholar (Vienna) .

« Magister » , Doctor Beatrix Darmstädter : curator of the Collection of Early Musical Instruments in the « kunsthistorisches Museum » , Vienna.

Doctor Franz Scheder : author and editor of the Bruckner chronology (Nuremberg, Germany) .

Doctor Johannes Wildner : conductor and scholar (Vienna) .

Gerhard Zechmeister : tuba player, scholar and author (Vienna) .

CONCEPTION

In comparison with other composers, Bruckner's own manuscripts contain very few errors in the musical text. Nevertheless, they present particular problems in terms of performance practice (dynamic markings, articulation, tempi etc.) , because these kinds of performance instructions were often added as part of the last stage of a work on a composition. It is precisely the complex source material which demands that, in addition to the autograph manuscripts, the 1st copies, manuscript sets of parts, 1st editions and corresponding galley proofs have to be taken in consideration, together with secondary documents. This is where the « “ Urtext ” Complete Edition » comes into play : all sources have been thoroughly examined as a whole, for the 1st time, and are newly-presented together in a scholarly-practical edition. Bruckner left part of his output in several versions, which will be published in separate volumes. A few versions and works which have remained unpublished to the present day will be evaluated and published for the 1st time in the « ANTON BRUCKNER “ URTEXT ” GESAMTAUSGABE » (ABUGA) . Variants, alternatives and re-worked individual movements will be included in a volume where possible. Scholars and performers will find these « in situ » , without having to combine different editions.

In its many years' preparatory work for the ABUGA, the « Bruckner Edition Wien » has conceived a fundamentally new layout which is especially suited to the particular problems and peculiarities of Bruckner's manuscripts. Works with orchestra are published in full-score. The omission of key signatures and clefs on the right-hand page creates the visual impression of a landscape-shaped music page over the page break when reading the score ; it provides additional space, thereby, reducing the number of page-turns required. For the 1st time, Bruckner's « metrical numbers » , which help in the division and emphasis of groups of bars, have been reproduced where they survive in the musical text. Editorial additions and variants in the text will be identified in different colours. This method supersedes the often cluttered visual appearance of scores by avoiding the uses of brackets, dotted lines or cue-sized notes. In order to reflect the needs of performers, individual performance material can be supplied on request, chosen variant readings can be given preference and alternatives suppressed. Great importance is attached to achieving the most usable result.

PUBLICATION

The volumes of the Complete Edition and full-scores appear in the format 25 centimeters x 31 centimeters as hard-cover with cloth binding and 2 colour embossing. All volumes include detailed foreword, suggestions on performance practice, chronology, tables, appendices and editorial report. Texts are generally included in German and English. Study scores are planned. 2 volumes will be published each year. Volumes can be purchased separately, or after arranging a subscription upon publication. Performance materials for the Symphonies are available on hire ; all other works (smaller orchestral works, choral works, church music, chamber music, Lieder, piano and organ works) will be on sale as part of a set. The « Anton Bruckner “ Urtext ” Complete Edition » is distributed internationally by Schott Music.

STRUCTURE OF THE EDITION

Series I : Works with Orchestra

I.1. Symphonies (Volumes 1-19) .

I.2. Orchestral works (Volumes 20-21) .

I.3. Vocal works with orchestra (Volumes 22-30) .

Series II : Sacred Works for Mixed Choir

II.1. Sacred works for mixed choir with instruments (Volumes 31-33) .

II.2. Sacred works for mixed choir with organ or piano (Volume 34) .

II.3. Sacred works for unaccompanied mixed choir (Volume 35) .

Series III : Secular Works for Mixed Choir

III.1. Secular cantatas for mixed choir with wind instruments (Volume 36) .

III.2. Secular works for mixed choir with organ or piano (Volume 37) .

III.3. Secular works for unaccompanied mixed choir (Volume 38) .

Serie IV : Works for Male Choir

IV.1. Works for male choir with instruments (Volume 39) .

IV.2. Works for male choir with organ or piano (Volume 40) .

IV.3. Works for unaccompanied male choir or male solo quartet (Volume 41) .

Serie V : Chamber Music and Lieder

V.1. Chamber music for ensembles (Volume 42) .

V.2. Sacred and secular Lieder (Volume 43) .

Serie VI : Works for Keyboard Instruments

VI.1. Works for piano (Volume 44) .

VI.2. Works for organ (Volume 45) .

INFORMATION

www.benjamin Gunnar Cohrs.com

www.hermann.eu

www.harassowitz.de

...

La Symphonie est en 4 mouvements : Allegro moderato - Adagio : sehr feierlich und sehr langsam (très solennel et très lent) - Scherzo : sehr schnell (très rapide) - Finale : bewegt, doch nicht schnell (animé mais pas rapide) .

Le thème principal du 1er mouvement apparaît après un doux trémolo des cordes (dit « Urnebel ») qui est une des idées mélodiques les plus étendues et les plus riches de l'histoire de la musique. C'est de ce thème et dans son rapport à lui que naissent et découlent non seulement les 2 autres thèmes de cette partie mais aussi le développement de toute la composition. Le Scherzo qui regorge de sons, au thème fortement rythmé formé « d'intervalles primitifs » en octaves, quintes et quartes, est le mouvement le plus prisé par les auditeurs. L'Adagio est considéré comme le morceau le plus important de cette Symphonie. En l'honneur de Richard Wagner, il construit l'Adagio autour de 2 thèmes monumentaux, y introduisant une mélodie correspondant aux paroles « Non confundar in æternum » (je n'aurai pas honte pour l'éternité) du « Te Deum » qu'il compose en même temps. Dans ce mouvement, il est aussi le 1er à utiliser dans une partition qui n'est pas de l'Opéra 4 des « Wagnertuben » (tubas de Wagner) que le Maître de Bayreuth fait fabriquer spécialement pour l'exécution de sa Tétralogie. Le thème du Finale découle du 1er mouvement en étant plus rythmique et plus frappant, et avec le thème contrastant du choral, il utilise d'incessantes variations culminant en une éblouissante reprise jusqu'à la fin imposante de l'ouvrage.

Allegro moderato : Dès le début, les cors et violoncelles entonnent le thème principal large et élégiaque avec des trémolos que reprennent les altos. À intervalle court, le hautbois et la clarinette introduisent, tranquillo, le second thème (une généreuse extase dont les harmonies, le coloris et le remarquable doublé font penser à Wagner) . Le développement est tout à fait sous le signe de l'envoûtement de l'Anneau du Nibelung. Quelques timides essais tentés par les cors pour esquisser une mélodie chorale mais couverts par des images virtuelles de l'idée fondamentale et par le 2e thème.

Adagio : sehr feierlich und sehr langsam (très solennel et très lent) (ut dièse mineur et fa dièse majeur) - La mort de Wagner obsède Bruckner : « Je rentrais chez moi un jour, très triste ; je me disais il est impossible que le Maître vive longtemps encore. À ce moment précis, l'Adagio en ut dièse mineur me fut inspiré. » . Misterioso e lente assai : 4 tubas wagnériens (Wagnertuben) et 1 tuba contrebasse modulent comme de belles orgues un thème d'une rare élévation que les violons reprennent avec une mélodie que l'on relève dans son « Te Deum » . Apprenant le décès de Richard Wagner, il en fut extrêmement affecté et modifia la fin de l'Adagio, insérant un choral funèbre aux cors, tubas wagnériens et tuba basse juste avant la Coda terminale. Presque partout, ce thème est résigné. Cet Adagio a été exécuté aux obsèques de Bruckner dans un arrangement pour harmonie de Ferdinand Löwe. Il a également été diffusé sur la radio allemande le 1er mai 1945, au lendemain de la mort d'Adolf Hitler.

Scherzo : sehr schnell (très vite) - Selon la légende, le thème de la trompette est suggéré au compositeur par le chant d'un coq qui le réveille chaque matin à Saint-Florian. Lorsque les bois et les cordes se mettent à marteler leurs gammes sur des rythmes inexorables, on ne peut qu'être saisi d'effroi. Le trio (en fa majeur) paraît, au départ, idyllique, grâce à son thème mélodieux et pastoral, mais les duolets causent une légère angoisse qui se dissipe dans les dernières mesures pour laisser la place à une flûte donnant une mélodie. C'est l'un des plus beaux Scherzo des Symphonies de Bruckner, avec celui de la 6e et de la 9e.

Finale : bewegt, doch nicht schnell (animé mais pas rapide) - L'idée fondamentale domine le Finale. Particulièrement enjouée à l'excès, elle révèle vers la fin une tendance à se laisser abattre. Un contraste se présente avec un choral qui ne fait que passer. On le retrouve à la fin du développement mais se perd à la répétition du mouvement. Enfin, il y a des passages où la technique domine et le morceau se termine sur un monumental retour de l'idée fondamentale du 1er mouvement.

...

Pour Bruckner, les années précédant la composition de sa Symphonie n° 7 (1881-1883) furent une dure leçon de patience qui éprouva rudement sa santé mentale et sa foi. N'écrivit-il pas au chef d'orchestre israélite Hermann Levi avoir dédié son « Te Deum » presque contemporain (1881-1884) « à Dieu pour m'avoir sorti d'une si grande angoisse à Vienne » ?

Tout avait pourtant bien commencé. En 1868, à 44 ans, Bruckner, plein d'espoir, avait quitté sa Haute-Autriche natale (où il avait connu un immense succès) pour Vienne. Mais malgré le soutien du chef d'orchestre Johann Herbeck, malgré sa réputation d'organiste grandissante, il fut en butte à l'incompréhension et aux féroces railleries de l'« establishment » musical viennois. En 1877, Herbeck parvint à persuader le rechigneux Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne de créer la Symphonie n° 3 de Bruckner ; mais, à quelques semaines seulement de la première, il mourut subitement (il n'avait que 45 ans) et Bruckner dut le remplacer. Ce fut une catastrophe : l'Orchestre ne fut impressionné ni par sa musique, ni par ses talents de chef et l'on peut seulement imaginer ce que dut être ce concert, la salle qui se vida peu à peu, pour ne laisser qu'une vingtaine d'inconditionnels ; puis, ce fut la presse qui l'éreinta. Le papier de l'influent critique Eduard Hanslick fut un mélange particulièrement malveillant de compliments acides et perfides :

« Il ne nous plaît pas de tracasser le compositeur, que nous respectons sincèrement comme homme et comme artiste, probablement sincère en art, même s'il a peu à voir avec l'art. Au lieu de le critiquer, nous avouons donc modestement n'avoir rien compris à sa gigantesque Symphonie. Ses intentions poétiques furent, pour nous, tout sauf limpides - peut-être un peu comme si la 9e de Beethoven avait donné son amitié à la " Walküre " de Wagner pour finir piétinée par ses chevaux.

Naturellement, la confiance de Bruckner (inébranlable dans les meilleurs moments) s'effondra presque totalement. Pendant plus d'un an, il n'écrivit pratiquement rien et, malgré l'enthousiasme de quelques amis zélés (dont Gustav Mahler, alors âgé de 17 ans), sa vie privée ne lui apporta guère de consolation. L'échec constant de ses tentatives de mariage ne fit qu'ajouter à sa dépression (il avait bizarrement tendance à s'amouracher de femmes inconvenablement jeunes). Certains indices donnent à penser qu'il éprouva aussi des doutes quant à sa foi (comme on peut peut-être le déduire de la conclusion curieusement non résolue, ou à tout le moins tonalement ambiguë, de sa Symphonie n° 6 (1879-1881). Pourtant, le fait même qu'il ait toujours composé (y compris des Symphonies) dit toute la résolution qui, au fond de lui, l'animait. En fin de compte, il avait, chevillé au corps, le sentiment que sa « vocation » était de composer. Pour beaucoup d'auditeurs, ses Symphonies dégagent une manifeste puissance intérieure - et la 7e n'est pas en reste.

Enfin, Bruckner fut encouragé par d'autres milieux, plus influents. En 1881, année où il commença sa Symphonie n° 7, la première tardive de sa Symphonie n° 4 (originellement écrite en 1874 mais fort révisée), sous la direction du chef Hans Richter, s'attira les louanges d'une certaine frange de la presse viennoise. Cela n'avait rien d'unanime, mais être un tant soit peu compris suffit à le rendre fou de joie. Ce serait lors d'une répétition pour ce concert qu'avec un enthousiasme toujours aussi maladroit il aurait pressé un « thaler » d'argent dans la paume de Richter en lui disant : « Buvez un verre de bière à ma santé. » . Peu après, il se mit à son « Te Deum » et, quelques mois plus tard, le 23 septembre, il nota les Ires idées de sa Symphonie n° 7. Manifestement, la merveilleuse mélodie d'ouverture lui vint en rêve : le chef d'orchestre Ignaz Dorn, un ami de jeunesse, lui apparut et lui joua ce thème à l'alto, avec ces mots : « Cela t'apportera le succès ! » . Et de fait, la création de la Symphonie n° 7 (qui, détail important, délaissa la conservatrice Vienne pour Leipzig, plus progressiste) fut l'un des plus grands succès de la vie de Bruckner. Un critique s'étonna même : « Comment a-t-il pu nous demeurer aussi longtemps inconnu ? » .

Le violon s'intensifie lorsque la mélodie est redite au grand orchestre pour ensuite disparaître de manière poignante. Un 2e thème mélancolique (au hautbois et à la clarinette), bien plus écrit, aspire à recouvrer la gloire perdue et finit par donner l'impression qu'il pourrait bien y parvenir : il y a un long crescendo par-dessus une note de basse répétée, avec des fanfares de cuivres qui s'élèvent dans une excitation grandissante. Mais soudain, tout s'arrête et un 3e thème plus animé surgit, un truculent air de danse (cordes à l'unisson, étayées des bois et des cuivres) qui, lui aussi, atteint un apogée façon fanfare pour brusquement tourner court, avant que tout soit pleinement résolu. D'aucuns trouvent frustrante cette stratégie toute brucknérienne. « Rien que dans le 1er mouvement, j'ai repéré 6 potentialités prometteuses, dont 4 au moins n'ont rien donné. » , pesta le chef d'orchestre Thomas Beecham après avoir dirigé la Symphonie n° 7. La patience finit pourtant par payer, dans cette Symphonie comme dans la vie de Bruckner, et la grande résolution finale est d'autant plus éloquente qu'elle arrive avec un fort long (et fort habile) retard. Il n'est pas fantaisiste de comparer ce processus avec les rouages de la Providence, tels que les décrit John Milton à la fin de son Samson Agonistes :

Tout est pour le mieux, même si souvent nous doutons
De ce que l'inscrutable pouvoir
De la Très-haute Sagesse apporte,
Et, en fin de compte, toujours pour le mieux.

Pendant l'essentiel du 1er mouvement, Bruckner ne nous laisse que des souvenirs fugaces de sa conception originelle ; mais, vers la fin, un calme brutal survient et les timbales entrent pour la 1re fois, en tenant un mi pédale, pianissimo, par-dessus lequel un motif de la mélodie inaugurale de la Symphonie s'élève majestueusement avant de virer, avec une magnifique inévitabilité, vers le ton principal. Le motif inaugural monte alors peu à peu dans l'orchestre, crescendo, par-dessus un accord parfait de mi majeur tenu. En écrivant cela, Bruckner songeait certainement au fondamental crescendo d'un accord qui ouvre « Das Rheingold » de Richard Wagner mais, en dehors de la sonorité orchestrale, l'effet est ici tout autre - après tout, c'est une fin, non un début.

Bruckner aurait composé l'Adagio en sachant que son idole Wagner allait bientôt mourir et le majestueux 1er thème exsude une flagrante note éplorée, avec (pour la 1re fois) un quatuor de « tubas Wagner » (cet instrument, qui tient plus du « bugle » alto et du « bass-horn » que de l'habituel tuba basse, avait été créé par Wagner pour rehausser les cuivres de son « Ring ») . Son idolâtrie était si intense qu'elle aurait embarrassé jusqu'à Wagner lui-même. Pourtant, contrairement à celle d'autres dévots, sa musique sonne rarement comme du Wagner. Juste avant le charmant second thème de l'Adagio (cordes, 3/4) , cor et tubas introduisent une citation de « Tristan und Isolde » (la figure chromatique ascendante des mesures 2 et 3 du Prélude) , dont ils conservent la hauteur de son. Mais si personne ne le lui fait remarquer, l'auditeur ne s'en apercevra probablement pas : l'effet est purement « brucknérien » .

Pour terminer, le 1er thème de l'Adagio débouche peu à peu sur l'un des plus grandioses apogées de Bruckner. L'accent est tout particulièrement mis sur le motif ascendant par degrés conjoints que l'on retrouve dans le long crescendo final du « Te Deum » , aux mots « non confundar in æternum » (que je ne sois jamais confondu) . Dans la plupart des interprétations, l'apogée est couronné d'un coup de cymbales, avec triangle et timbales. Mais lorsque le musicologue Robert Haas réalisa sa propre version de la partition, en 1944, il supprima ces parties de percussion et choisit de les reproduire dans sa préface, arguant que quelqu'un avait écrit « gilt nicht » (pas valable) dans le coin supérieur droit de la page. Selon lui, l'écriture est celle de « la vieille main de Bruckner » , encore que cela ait été contesté.

Son choix semblerait corroboré par une lettre d'un des défenseurs les plus controversés de Bruckner, Josef Schalk, à son frère Franz. Elle est datée du 10 janvier 1885, soit 11 jours après la création leipzigoise de la Symphonie :

« Ferdinand Löwe et moi avons dernièrement examiné la partition de la 7e avec Bruckner et discuté d'une ou 2 modifications et améliorations. Tu ignores probablement que Nikisch a arraché son accord pour notre coup de cymbales dans l'Adagio (accord de sixte et quarte en ut majeur) , avec le triangle et les timbales - à notre incommensurable joie. »

« Notre coup de cymbales » : voilà qui résout à coup sûr l'affaire ! Mais le fait est que nous ne saurons très certainement jamais combien de « modifications » et d'« améliorations » Bruckner fit sur l'insistance des Nikisch, Löwe et autres Schalk. Contrairement à ce qu'on croit, pourtant, il savait fort bien résister quand une idée lui déplaisait vraiment. Et bien qu'il pût être relativement puriste en matière d'instrumentation Symphonique (les harpes n'intégrèrent la Symphonie n° 8 qu'au bout d'un mois de bataille, à en croire son élève Friedrich Eckstein) , s'il avait douté du bien-fondé des cymbales et du triangle, pourquoi les introduire de nouveau dans l'Adagio de sa Symphonie n° 8 ? Musicologiquement parlant, c'est là une question difficile à trancher.

Comme nombre des Scherzos brucknériens antérieurs, celui de la Symphonie n° dit et redit combien il est ancré dans la Haute-Autriche campagnarde : dans sa jeunesse, Bruckner avait amélioré son maigre salaire de professeur en jouant dans des orchestres de danse villageois. Mais on sent là un élan fondamental, obsessionnel, qui s'amplifiera encore dans les Scherzos des 2 Symphonies suivantes. Le Trio, beaucoup plus doux, plus mélodieux, met en œuvre le rythme caractéristique de Bruckner, 1-2, 1-2-3.

Vient alors le Finale : pour une fois chez Bruckner, c'est le plus léger des 4 mouvements. Comme dans le 1er mouvement, on trouve 3 thèmes principaux contrastés : un thème dansant en rythme pointé (violons) ; un choral pas trop solennel aux violons et aux altos, par-dessus une « walking bass » en pizzicato ; et une version déchiquetée du 1er thème, pour le grand orchestre. L'excitation monte à l'approche de la Coda ; puis, à la dernière minute, Bruckner révèle ce que beaucoup auront déjà deviné, du moins intuitivement : le 1er thème dansant du Finale est tout simplement une autre version du motif inaugural de la Symphonie, qui s'achève ainsi sur une splendide confirmation de la vision liminaire du 1er mouvement. Pour citer T. S. Eliot dans ses « Four Quartets » : « En mon commencement est ma fin. » .

...

Bien qu'au berceau de la poétique musicale d'Anton Bruckner, il y eut la Symphonie de Beethoven et le contrepoint de Bach mais surtout l'harmonie, l'instrumentation et le propos dramatiquement pathétique de Wagner, son art s'écarte pourtant de tous ces courants esthétiques dominants d'alors. Lui-même se réclamait des principes du néo-Romantisme de Liszt et de Wagner, ce qui de la part des partisans de Brahms lui valut bien des amertumes qu'il supporta avec opiniâtreté sans modifier en quoi que ce soit ses opinions artistiques. Pourtant, en pratique, sa musique avait tout aussi peu de points communs avec le système esthétique de Wagner qu'avec Brahms.

Bruckner, homme simple et « non littéraire », qui jamais ne composa sur d'autres textes que liturgiques et qui n'était disposé ni même capable de quelque manière que ce soit de commenter les conceptions artistiques de ses 9 Symphonies, ne prit de son Wagner tant admiré que les traits extérieurs : la forme monumentale, les mélodies « infinies » et la mystique du son orchestral avec son brillant majestueux, d'une part, et la mystérieuse tendresse du son, d'autre part. Au lieu d'être en communion avec les éloquents énoncés théoriques et pompeux, Bruckner mit avantagement à profit le folklore autrichien. Ses « Ländler » du terroir forment un important contrepoint au caractère d'hymne du choral, autre source fondamentale de sa musique. Pourtant, celle-ci doit aussi payer un « tribut » à son grand déploiement, son charisme temporel et rythmique fondamental ; cette musique donne parfois l'impression d'une excellente improvisation à l'orgue qui ne serait pas entièrement maîtrisée. Peut-être est-ce la raison pour laquelle les Symphonies de Bruckner, dans leur majorité n'apparaissent que rarement en dehors du terrain culturel allemand et que bien des chefs d'orchestre éprouvent de la répugnance envers leurs constructions cyclopéennes. Ce n'est pas une musique facile, elle ne retient pas l'attention par des effets bon marché et une accessibilité directe mais pour l'auditeur attentif elle peut devenir une source inépuisable de véritable beauté et d'émotion et d'excitante découverte.

...

La Symphonie n° 7 en mi majeur est la Symphonie la plus populaire de Bruckner et, avec la 4e, elle forme la paire que nous rencontrons le plus souvent dans les salles de concert. Comme il l'a dit lui-même, Bruckner commença à écrire la Symphonie en mi majeur en septembre 1881 avec le pressentiment de la mort de Wagner, ce qui par la suite s'est réalisé (1883). L'adoration que Bruckner portait à Wagner était quelque peu exagérée. Les nombreuses personnes avec lesquelles Bruckner était en contact n'étaient pas trop courants ses sentiments qu'il portait. Brahms le considérait même comme un fou « non dangereux » : « Un pauvre homme dérangé que les petits prêtres de Saint-Florian avaient sur la conscience. » .

Le dévôt catholique qu'était Bruckner décrit comme suit sa dernière rencontre avec Wagner, en juillet 1882, à l'occasion de la première de l'Opéra « Parsifal » à Bayreuth :

« Lorsque le plus Grand me tendit la main, je suis tombée à genoux, j'ai serré sa main, l'ai couverte de baisers et lui ai dit : Ah, Maître, je vous adore ! . Wagner me répondit :

Calmez-vous, Bruckner, bonne nuit. Ce furent les dernières paroles que le Maître me dit. »

Embarrassé, Wagner reconstituera (à sa façon) cet événement dans un rêve des plus fascinants : « Une nuit, le Saint-Père vint me visiter. Je voulus l'accueillir avec dignité et respect mais il inversa subitement les rôles. Il se pencha humblement vers moi pour me baiser la main. Puis, il saisit une bouteille de cognac et disparut ! Le souverain Pontife ressemblait étrangement à Anton Bruckner. » .

Quoi que nous pensions des relations de ces 2 grands hommes, il est certain que le fruit spirituel de l'admiration exaltée de Bruckner est particulièrement mûr et la 7e (souvent intitulée Wagnérienne) est la plus chaleureusement sincère et la plus ardente de toutes les Symphonies du compositeur ; et vraiment bourrée de thèmes bien choisis. C'est pourquoi elle produit un effet plus complet, plus équilibré et c'est aussi la raison pour laquelle, par la suite, l'auteur ne lui apporta aucune modification : une maladie qui atteindra la majorité de ses Symphonies. Bruckner (de même ses épigones) apportait de lui-même des changements ou sur les conseils de ses amis à ses Symphonies, une situation qui ne cessa qu'avec l'édition critique de l'œuvre de Bruckner dans les années '30.

...

Esquissée à l'automne 1881 et achevée presque 2 ans plus tard, la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner reflète la 1re maturité d'un compositeur presque sexagénaire et clôt une trilogie de Symphonies accomplies dès le 1er jet, sans les angoisses du remaniement connues jusqu'alors. D'une construction limpide et d'un langage toujours à l'affût de l'expressivité, l'œuvre se singularise par l'intense lyrisme de ses 2 1ers mouvements. L'élément religieux s'y affirme en outre plus nettement qu'auparavant, ne serait-ce que dans le recours certainement pas anodin au ton de mi majeur, dont les

4 dièses symbolisent la croix.

L'Allegro moderato initial, érigé sur la vaste nef d'un 1er thème de 21 mesures confié aux violoncelles doublés tour à tour par le cor, les altos et la clarinette, ouvre un espace infini, d'intense luminosité, avec un matériau thématique plus unifié, moins contrasté que dans les Symphonies précédentes, et utilise largement dans le développement le principe du miroir. Archétype du grand crescendo brucknérien, sa Coda bâtie sur l'accord parfait est soulevée par un roulement de timbales (dont c'est l'unique intervention dans le mouvement) de 52 mesures.

Longue déploration en ut dièse mineur faisant appel à une orchestration assombrie par les tubas wagnériens (conçus à l'origine par Adolphe Sax spécifiquement pour « l'Anneau du Nibelung » de Richard Wagner, de sonorité à mi-chemin entre le trombone et le cor et introduits pour la 1re fois dans le monde de la Symphonie), l'Adagio se veut un hommage au Maître de Bayreuth, disparu en février 1883 et à qui Bruckner avait rendu visite quelques mois plus tôt à l'occasion de la création de « Parsifal ». Profondément affecté, Bruckner aurait ajouté l'épilogue funèbre faisant suite au climax, avant de laisser la musique s'éteindre dans la paix consolatrice du mode majeur.

Le Scherzo, dans le ton volontairement cru de la mineur, est caractérisé par des motifs bloqués, répétés jusqu'à satiété aux cordes et par un vigoureux appel de trompette, que d'aucuns ont perçu comme une réminiscence cauchemardesque d'une sirène de pompiers, Bruckner ayant éprouvé une fascination morbide à la vue, juste en face de son domicile, de centaines de corps calcinés extraits du « Ringtheater » de Vienne après le tristement célèbre incendie du 8 décembre 1881. Le Trio central, en fa majeur, tout en legato des cordes, amorce toutefois une certaine consolation dans l'évocation du « Ländler » de la Haute-Autriche natale.

Le Finale, court et nerveux, voit s'affronter en blocs des éléments antagonistes, dans l'alternance entre un 1er thème marqué par des valeurs pointées et un indolent choral accompagné de pizzicati. La Symphonie s'achève sur une péroraison ramassée, augmentée de tubas wagnériens affirmant pour la dernière fois une adoration quasi mystique pour Richard Wagner.

Reste le litige concernant la présence de la percussion au sommet de l'Adagio. À la lettre « W » (l'arrivée sur le climax) existent 2 versions de la partition. L'une, retenue par le musicologue Robert Haas dans son édition critique de 1944, se contente de l'orchestre présent jusqu'alors. L'autre, retenue par son successeur Leopold Nowak dans son édition de 1954, adjoint une partie de percussion, et notamment un coup de cymbale au même endroit. La raison de cette différence ? Une bandelette de papier, de la main de Bruckner, collée sur le manuscrit autographe, comprenant la partie séparée des percussions pour l'ensemble du mouvement, avec à « W » le fameux coup de cymbale, doublé de roulements de timbales et de triangle. Mais dans le coin supérieur droit de la bandelette, la mention « gilt nicht » (non valable) d'une plume tremblante, qui pourrait être celle du compositeur dans les toutes dernières années de sa vie, pris d'une sorte de repentir quant à son ajout. Haas juge l'indication authentique, Nowak estime à l'inverse qu'elle est d'une main extérieure, ce que tendraient à prouver les dernières expertises graphologiques. La question de la validité « morale » du coup de cymbale reste donc pour l'heure ouverte.

7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner (Constantin Photiadès)

Article paru en 1937, dans « La Revue de Paris », année 44, tome 7.

Soirées musicales :

Introuvables en France, rares même chez les peuples de race germanique, les amis d'Anton Bruckner constituent, à travers le monde, une secte assez restreinte, forte néanmoins par sa constance et sa vitalité sereine. Les adeptes, loin de gémir sur leur petit nombre, s'en feraient gloire plutôt. Comme tant de cénacles, ils se comptent pour une élite, et cette agréable conviction satisfait leur amour propre.

Approuvons-les de rendre à la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner un culte reconnaissant. Elle en est digne. Que l'ouvrage reste donc associé, dans leur souvenir, à la seule joie qui ait illuminé, sur le tard, une carrière vouée à des travaux immenses et décevants ! L'histoire citerait à peine ce musicien d'un village de Haute-Autriche, en qui le paysan et le régent de collège faisaient un si bizarre contraste avec le Maître organiste, avec le persévérant bâtisseur de Messes et de Symphonies à grand orchestre, si la 7e Symphonie ne l'eût imposé à la longue aux Viennois. Elle sut plaire. Et, dès lors, 60 années de disgrâces et d'humbles tâtonnements se trouvèrent effacées en une heure de triomphe.

Bruckner était loin de s'y attendre. Cette dangereuse épreuve de Vienne, il l'avait crainte au point d'en solliciter l'ajournement par écrit. Odieux aux réactionnaires comme affilié à la révolution wagnérienne, comme un véritable boute-feu, il tâchait de se faire oublier, cherchant fortune au dehors. L'Allemagne paraissait offrir à cet égard des chances plus favorables. C'est ainsi qu'Arthur Nikisch accepta de diriger la 7e Symphonie à Leipzig, le 30 décembre 1884. Hermann Levi la présenta ensuite aux Munichois, le 10 mars 1885. Cette double expérience ayant réussi, les organisateurs s'enhardirent. Ils rendaient grâce à Hermann Levi d'avoir porté, après l'exécution de Munich, un toast vibrant « au second Beethoven ». Ce petit discours eut un retentissement prodigieux. Et les conservateurs à outrance, débordés, connurent avec dépit que leurs persécutions n'avaient servi qu'à faire des prosélytes.

Néanmoins, la Symphonie en exil dut courir les grands chemins une année entière avant de pouvoir rentrer dans sa patrie, la terre promise du Beau Danube bleu. L'auteur n'osait affronter les critiques de Vienne. Quel supplice que leurs comptes rendus et leurs feuilletons ! Le cruel Hanslick n'allait-il pas le mettre en pièces ? D'hésitation en hésitation, la 7e Symphonie en mi majeur ne fut jouée à la « Philharmonie », sous la baguette de Hans Richter, que le 21 mars 1886. Ici encore, le succès passa toute espérance. Et cette fois, elle eut une portée si décisive que les braves Autrichiens, après avoir tant querellé Bruckner sur « sa musique d'ivrogne », se mirent à l'exalter comme le plus digne héritier de Schubert, puis, insensiblement, comme leur compositeur national.

Pendant les 10 années qui suivirent, les dernières, Anton Bruckner, décoré, pensionné, reçu en audience par François-Joseph à la « Hofburg », nommé docteur de l'Université de Vienne, voyait enfin venir à lui ces titres et ces avantages pécuniaires qu'un bureaucrate appelle respectueusement les honneurs. On l'engageait à déposer au pied du trône sa prochaine Symphonie, la 8e, dont Sa Majesté Apostolique l'Empereur et Roi daignait agréer la dédicace. Et comme toutes ces faveurs découlaient de la 7e Symphonie, celle-ci passait naturellement pour un chef-d'œuvre.

Après le mémorable concert du 21 mars 1886, les adeptes, dit-on, s'étaient joints à leur bon Maître pour fêter joyeusement sa victoire. La bière, le vin, le punch, ces amis fidèles de l'éloquence, les amenèrent à prolonger leur réunion fort au-delà de minuit. Bruckner était abasourdi et harassé lorsqu'on le reconduisit enfin chez lui. Quelques poignées de mains, et, soudain, l'artiste se retrouva seul, dans son logis de vieil étudiant sans famille et sans fortune, dans ce gîte banal où tout paraissait minable, jusqu'à l'ordre et à la propreté. Une dépêche l'attendait sur son bureau. Elle émanait, ô surprise ! de Johann Strauß. Celui-ci, ravi de la 7e Symphonie qu'il venait d'entendre, tenait à manifester immédiatement son enthousiasme. Et voici que, malgré l'heure tardive, la fatigue se dissipait. Bruckner, les mains tremblantes, lisait, relisait sans trêve, comme en extase, le texte de cette dépêche. Volontiers, il fût tombé à genoux pour remercier le bon Dieu d'un hommage où le musicien du Beau Danube bleu avait su mettre tout son cœur.

De tels souvenirs ont leur prix. Mais le prestige durable de la 7e Symphonie tient à d'autres causes, et plus spécialement à son Adagio. Outre que le flot musical s'épanche ici avec ampleur, un épisode assez intempestif mis à part, on y entrevoit, comme à travers le rideau d'une fenêtre éclairée dans les ténèbres, l'ombre souveraine de Richard Wagner.

Sur cette présence mystérieuse, l'auteur s'est expliqué. Son Adagio, déclarait-il, mouvement solennel dans le style des marches funèbres, était conçu, dès l'origine, sous une oppression de cauchemar. Pour la 1e fois, Bruckner avait compris que son idole, ce génie sans pareil, la vive image du drame lyrique, l'homme qui prêtait à une petite ville bavaroise plus de splendeur que n'en eurent jamais les feux des Mages sur la montagne nocturne, il avait enfin compris que Richard Wagner lui-même pouvait mourir ! Depuis la création de « Parsifal », une affection cardiaque, déjà ancienne, s'était réveillée dangereusement. Le malade, trop faible pour les rudes hivers de Bayreuth, cherchait désormais un refuge en Italie. Pour vaincre un héros, il suffit de 70 ans, et Wagner arrivait précisément à cet âge. Ses fidèles vivaient dans l'inquiétude, quand soudain, le 13 février 1883, un télégramme de Venise annonça la catastrophe. Bruckner éclata en sanglots : « J'ai pleuré, ce jour-là, disait-il plus tard, mon Dieu que j'ai pleuré !... » Et voilà comment l'Adagio, tout d'abord pressentiment vague, s'est achevé bientôt sur une lamentation déchirants.

Le meilleur de Bruckner se trouve consigné dans ces pages. Aux regrets poignants, à cette révolte qui hérissait sa chair devant les adieux éternels et l'horreur de la destruction, il opposait chrétiennement ses espérances, la foi en un Dieu qui a bien voulu être notre Père, sa vision d'un Paradis où la beauté et la bonté rayonneront inépuissablement sur la Sainte hiérarchie des élus. Pieux et candide à la manière de César Franck, Bruckner avait, comme lui, cette puissance de souffle qui permet d'atteindre aux régions supérieures. Et rien ne ressemble mieux à l'inspiration qu'une telle ferveur. Toutes 2 se rejoignent dans l'enthousiasme. L'une vient librement du ciel, l'autre s'efforce d'y monter.

Mais Bruckner, avouons-le, est ignoré en France. À peine si les grands concerts ont joué certaines de ses Symphonies, dont la 4e, souvent dénommée Symphonie Romantique, et la 8e, dédiée à l'Empereur François-Joseph. On a bien essayé, après la guerre, de nous montrer sa 9e Symphonie, en remplaçant le Finale inachevé par le grand « Te Deum », qui fut composé entre 1883 et 1884, comme cela se fait en Autriche et en Allemagne. Malheureusement, le Festival avait lieu à Notre-Dame et, comme l'acoustique de la vénérable Basilique n'était pas moins défectueuse que l'exécution matérielle, on aboutit à un échec.

Il émane pourtant de Bruckner, cœur fervent et pur, une telle irradiation qu'on lui revient assez volontiers, une fois par lustre ou par décade, ne fût-ce que pour apprendre enfin à l'aimer. Si cette leçon d'amour ne va point sans lassitude, qu'importe ! Monsieur Charles Munch et la « Société Philharmonique de Paris », malgré le fâcheux avertissement de Notre-Dame, ont bien osé afficher la 7e Symphonie à la salle Pleyel, le 28 janvier 1937. Ce fut une soirée intéressante. Grâce à sa double culture, que favorisent ses atavismes et ses affinités d'Alsacien, Monsieur Charles Munch pourrait devenir la Providence de ces partitions d'outre Rhin, où la pensée égale trop souvent en densité les matériaux sonores qu'elles utilisent, mais dont la force et la grandeur sollicitent l'attention. Ce jeune chef réussit où ses prédécesseurs ont succombé. Il est en train d'acclimater Bruckner en France. Il le rendra plus accessible. Dans un temps où la musique, revendiquée par les nationalismes en armes, a presque cessé d'être une langue universelle, c'est un exploit surprenant d'avoir transporté à Paris la 7e Symphonie tout entière, avec ses 4 panneaux aux dimensions colossales.

Chacune de ces parties vient d'être acclamée. On a goûté pleinement la noble introduction, allegro moderato, où le cor et les violoncelles suivent l'idée principale en ses alternatives de fougue et de mélancolie. L'Adagio, tour à tour oraison funèbre et chant d'apothéose, a remué les cœurs. Le Scherzo, lui-même, a bien des partisans. N'est-ce pas une musique pour un bal au village, que des trompettes guerrières traversent de leurs fanfares ? Seule, la conclusion déroute et déplaît. Les Parisiens ne lui pardonnent pas ses analogies avec le Venusberg. Ils condamnent ses réminiscences de bacchanale, son clinquant de Théâtre emprunté à Tannhäuser. Et le second motif ne les dispose pas non plus à l'indulgence. Que vient faire ici, demandent-ils, un choral religieux, murmuré pianissimo par les cordes ? Il est hors de place entre toutes ces diableries. Quant au paroxysme instrumental de la fin, son éclat, ne permet point d'oublier que ce déchaînement fait double emploi avec la fulgurante péroraison du 1er morceau. On s'aperçoit même, en collationnant les textes, que les violons, à l'aigu, dessinent, de part et d'autre, des figurations identiques. Une symétrie si fastidieuse trouvera-t-elle des défenseurs ?

Bruckner se discrédite ainsi par des faiblesses qui mettent nos délicats à la torture. On peut même dire qu'elles le caractérisent. Personne n'est moins divers. Ignorant de la monotonie, il ignore la satiété. Ce besoin de renouvellement, auquel un Richard Wagner, un César Franck sacrifiait sans cesse, à peine s'il le soupçonne. Certaines tonalités lui ont inspiré un attachement superstitieux : il y revient toujours. Sur 9 Symphonies, il en écrit 2 en ré mineur, 3 en do mineur, sans se douter qu'il y a peut-être là quelque abus. La plupart de ses ouvrages se ressemblent par la facture. Bruckner, issu d'une obscure lignée de paysans, devait attribuer une valeur immuable aux principes dont il s'était nourri lentement, avec effort. Chaque année, il revenait à son champ. Le même sol, il le retournait cent fois avec la même charrue, le même attelage, sans révolte. Et cette placidité, cette persévérance bovine, incroyables chez un artiste du XIXe siècle, font l'étonnement des historiens.

Une pâte si lourde eût-elle fini par lever sans l'influence de Wagner ? Qu'on nous permette d'en douter. Les intimes de Bruckner, ses disciples ou ses protecteurs, gémissaient entre eux, bien souvent, de ses insuffisances. Sa médiocrité intellectuelle ne transparaît que trop dans ses compositions. Dieu ! que leurs « développements » sont touffus ! À coup sûr, le sens de l'équilibre faisait défaut à leur auteur. Le mieux serait probablement de l'en tenir quitte. Acceptons donc, une fois pour toutes, cette idée : son goût n'était point le nôtre. Nul raffinement, nulle culture. Les disparates ne le choquaient en rien, puisque ses grandes tapisseries d'orchestre sont faites presque toujours de pièces et de morceaux. Les plus beaux éclairs surviennent chez lui après des remplissages sans intérêt, des mélodies redondantes et cotonneuses. Nous déplorions tantôt certain épisode qui dépare l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie. Eh bien ! examinons-le ensemble, s'il vous plaît. Voyez comme ce moderato se fait insinuant, doucereux. Avec ses molles inflexions à la viennoise, son rythme ternaire qui s'oppose à la carrure du motif héroïque, il voudrait nous rappeler peut-être le céleste intermède en ré majeur qui transfigure, chez Beethoven, l'Adagio de la 9e Symphonie. Peine perdue, hélas !... Entre Bruckner et Beethoven, les Muses ont eu soin de laisser une distance incommensurable. Et le mot de Vauvenargues. se vérifie cette fois encore : « On ne peut contrefaire le génie. » .

À la vérité, la grandeur de Bruckner est d'un autre ordre. L'essentiel se trouve ailleurs. L'écrivons-nous, au risque d'effaroucher ceux qui n'envisagent dans l'art des sons que le phénomène auditif à l'état brut, indépendamment de ses résonances intellectuelles ou affectives, comme si la musique n'était pas avant tout un langage ? Oui, certes, osons le dire : l'excellence d'Anton Bruckner n'a point tenu à sa Maîtrise de la forme ou de la couleur ; elle tient à des éléments moraux et spirituels. Amour des humains, ses frères ; amour de la Création et du Très Haut qui l'a voulue si belle ; amour de la religion, si chère à ce catholique fervent que la méditation, la prière et l'extase sont les véritables ailes de sa musique ; amour enfin de cette perfection idéale qui presque toujours le fuyait, mais dont il jouissait quand même en Dieu, avec une allégresse infinie : le chaud rayonnement de cette flamme exalte, dans ses moments heureux, la fougue du Symphoniste. Ses fidèles le vénéraient, à la fois, pour son talent et pour son âme. Son prestige ressemblait à une vertu. C'était un cœur expansif, vibrant, que le froid de la vie, le froid impitoyable de l'expérience, n'avait pu altérer. Il existe ainsi des rêveurs, sur les lèvres de qui les vieux mots Romantiques de vaillance, d'honneur, de foi, d'espoir et d'amour céleste, même prononcés avec le plus vif enthousiasme, ne rendent pas un son ridicule. Anton Bruckner fut l'un d'eux.

...

WAB 107 (1881-1883) : Symphony No. 7 in E major with Wagner tubas, triangle and cymbals. 1883 : 1st concept ; revised in 1885.

The Symphony is performed with extraordinary success :

In Leipzig, with « Kapellmeister » Arthur Nikisch.

In Munich, with Court « Kapellmeister » Hermann Levi.

In Karlsruhe, at the music Festival of the Association of German Musicians (« Deutscher Tonkünstler-Verein ») with Court « Kapellmeister » Felix Mottl.

In Cologne, with « Kapellmeister » Doctor Franz Wüllner.

In Hamburg, with « Kapellmeister » Julius Bernuth.

In Graz, with « Kapellmeister » Karl Muck.

In Vienna, with Court « Kapellmeister » Hans Richter conducting the « Philharmoniker » .

...

1883 Version (unpublished) .

1885 Version (1885, [Haas] , Nowak) .

Anton Bruckner revised the 7th Symphony in 1885, after its 1st performance on 30 December 1884. The only surviving manuscript score for this Symphony is the autograph composition score Mus.Hs. 19479 (a copy score is lost) , and the revisions were made in this score. In some cases, the original 1883 material was erased ; therefore, the exact form of the 1883 version is lost unless it can be recovered from some other source. The autograph is full of additions in other hands. In the outer-movements in particular, many passages were pasted into the score to replace material from the 1883 version that had been erased. All of these revisions are believed to have been done at Bruckner's request.

All of the published scores are different interpretations of the autograph Mus.Hs. 19479. The 1885 edition includes some alterations not in the autograph, which could be authentic nonetheless ; Leopold Nowak, on the other hand, accepted some, but not all, of the alterations based on documentary evidence. Haas restored certain aspects of the 1883 version, but, since a complete reproduction of the earlier version is impossible, his edition is, by necessity, a mixture of the 2 versions. Most noticeably, Haas left-out the cymbal crash, triangle roll, and tympani in the Adagio, whereas the other editions include these parts.

...

Original version composed from September 23, 1881 to August 10, 1883. 1st performance in Leipzig (by Arthur Nikisch) on December 30, 1884. The later revision was made once more over the original text, so that an exact edition of the original 1883 version cannot possibly be made, although the Robert Haas edition (1944) restored some parts of it.

1885 version : Some changes were introduced by Bruckner under the influence of Schalk, Löwe, and Nikisch (among others the inclusion of cymbals, triangle, and timpani in the Adagio) . These changes were made shortly after the 1st performance, and are incorporated in the 1st Edition of the work, published by Albert J. Gutmann in 1885. Some of the changes in tempo and dynamic, although not in Bruckner's hand, were sanctioned by Leopold Nowak in his edition (1956) and put between parentheses. If they are skipped, little difference remains between Haas and Nowak. The percussion is likewise maintained by Nowak in the Adagio, while Haas omits it. A famous passage is the cymbal clash (with triangle) at the climax of the Adagio, which some conductors play, others don't.

...

Having recently gained acceptance in Vienna with the premiere of the 4th Symphony, Anton Bruckner received a visit from famed conductor Arthur Nikisch who offered to premier the composer's 7th Symphony. The concert took place in Leipzig with the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra on December 30, 1884 ; Hans Richter and the Vienna Philharmonic gave the Symphony its local premiere in January 1885. Despite a cool reception from the critics, the work was an enormous success, and public enthusiasm helped to solidify Bruckner's growing reputation. Among the accolades was a telegram from Johann Strauß, Junior, which read : « Am deeply moved. It was the musical experience of my life. » . Unlike most of his other Symphonies, Bruckner's 7th underwent virtually no revision ; the one point of concern was a cymbal crash at the Adagio's climax which Bruckner added at the suggestion of friends, but then subsequently removed.

The Symphony commences with a string tremolo from which the searching main-theme arises ; this theme is said to have been whistled to Bruckner in a dream by his late personal friend Ignaz Dorn, and it reappears throughout the Symphony in subtle transformations. This is followed by a plaintive, yet animated, theme for woodwinds, and followed in turn by an imposing dance-like 3rd theme. The development is expansive, making effective use of theme inversion, and the recapitulation is varied ; a long crescendo using fragments of the opening theme forms a glowing and dynamic Coda.

The deeply felt 2nd movement, an Adagio in song form, is mournful and dignified. Said to have been inspired by a premonition of Richard Wagner's death, the opening threnody breaks into a sonorous hymn for strings. This alternates with a beautiful arching theme which offers consolation at each appearance. The climax occurs with the 3rd appearance of the movement's opening theme which, against an ostinato of rising sextuplets, is propelled to a blazing C major climax. Finally, a dirge for Wagner tubas, said to have been composed upon Bruckner's learning of Wagner's passing, follows as Coda with the strings intoning a poignant transformation of the Symphony's main-theme.

With a contrast as stunning as the corresponding moment in Beethoven's « Eroica » , the windswept Scherzo which follows is one of Bruckner's best. The main-theme is said to have been derived from the crowing of a cock ; the wistfully nostalgic Trio is deeply affecting.

The Finale opens with an athletic transformation of the Symphony's opening theme. This is followed by beautifully modulating chorale for strings against a walking bass, and in turn following by a thundering unison transformation of the opening theme in minor. These 3 wonderfully contrasting ideas are interwoven deliberately, yet, with great animation and vigor, until the heartily extroverted Coda brings home the Symphony's opening theme in the full orchestra.

...

Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major (WAB 107) is one of his best-known Symphonies. It was written between 1881 and 1883 and was revised in 1885. It is dedicated to Ludwig II of Bavaria. The premiere, given under conductor Arthur Nikisch and the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra in the Opera House at Leipzig, on 30 December 1884, brought

Bruckner the greatest success he had known in his life. The Symphony is sometimes referred to as the « Lyric », though the appellation is not the composer's own, and is seldom used.

The Symphony requires the following Orchestra :

Woodwinds : 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets in A, 2 bassoons.

Brass : 4 horns in F, 3 trumpets in F, 3 trombones, 4 Wagner tubas (2 tenors in B-flat, 2 basses in F) , 1 tuba. (If Wagner tubas are not available, they are sometimes substituted with euphoniums.)

Percussion : timpani, cymbals, triangle.

Except in the 3rd movement where the use of timpani figures prominently, usage of percussion in the Symphony is extremely limited. A timpani roll enters at the Coda of the 1st movement. In some performance editions, the timpani re-enters along with cymbals and triangle together in the climax of the 2nd movement (the only movement employing cymbals and triangle) . Many conductors have taken to performing the 2nd movement without percussion, however, and the decision is generally settled by the performers' preferences. In the last movement, the timpani rolls in brief climaxes before crescendoing with orchestral tutti in the final bars.

Strings : violins 1, 2, violas, violoncellos, double basses.

The Symphony is in 4 movements :

1. Allegro moderato E major :

The movement starts with tremolo strings and the cellos presenting « a complete, divinely given melodic whole » . Bruckner declared he heard it in a dream, played on a viola, and wrote it down on awakening, but the tune incorporates a quotation from the Credo of his D Minor Mass (1864) which he was currently revising.

2. Adagio. Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam C-sharp minor :

This movement was composed between January and April 1883. Bruckner began writing it in anticipation of Richard Wagner's death and funeral, as he was in poor health. The 1st part of the movement features 4 Wagner tubas. It also features a bass tuba, which Wagner had invented, and was the 1st appearance in a Symphony. Legend has it that Bruckner wrote the cymbal clash at the climax of this movement upon hearing the news that Wagner had died. By way of contrast, Williman Mann states that :

« At the climax of the slow movement, Nikisch persuaded Bruckner to add a cymbal clash supported by a triangle ; later this addition to the manuscript was marked “ invalid ” but not in the composer's hand, so who was the purist ? »

3. Scherzo. Sehr schnell A minor with Trio in F major.

4. Finale. Bewegt, doch nicht schnell E major : In the recapitulation, the subject groups are reversed in order (a form sometimes called « tragic Sonata form »).

The 1883 version was performed at the work's premiere. Unfortunately, it survives only in one autograph copy which includes later changes by Bruckner and others, so the exact contents of this version are lost. This version is unpublished.

In the 1885 version (Albert J. Gutmann edition published in 1885), some changes were made after the 1884 premiere but before the 1st publication by Gutmann in 1885. It is widely accepted that Arthur Nikisch, Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe had significant influence over this edition, but there is some debate over the extent to which these changes were authorized by Bruckner. These changes mostly affect tempo and orchestration.

The Robert Haas edition, published in 1944, attempted to remove the influence of Nikisch, Schalk and Löwe in order to retrieve Bruckner's original conception of the Symphony. Haas used some material from the 1883 autograph but because this autograph also includes later changes much of his work was the product of conjecture. The most prominent feature of Haas's edition is the absence of cymbals, triangle and timpani in the slow movement : Haas asserted that Bruckner decided to omit the percussion, a claim scholar Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt deems « implausible ».

The Leopold Nowak edition, published in 1954, kept most of the changes in the 1885 Albert J. Gutmann edition, including the percussion. He reprinted the tempo modifications from Gutmann but placed them in brackets. Some performances of this edition omit the cymbal clash at the climax of the slow movement, although it is included in the printed score.

An arrangement of this Symphony for chamber ensemble (consisting of 2 violins, viola, cello, bass, clarinet, horn, piano 4 hands, and harmonium) was prepared in 1921 by students and associates of Arnold Schönberg, for the Viennese « Society for Private Musical Performances » : Hanns Eisler (1st and 3rd movements), Erwin Stein (2nd movement), and Karl Rankl (3rd movement). The Society folded before the arrangement could be performed, and it was not premiered until more than 60 years later.

An arrangement of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 for chamber ensemble could never be intended as anything but a substitute for the real thing. The elysian heights and abysmal depths of Bruckner's awesome Orchestra could never be reproduced by anything but a full-scale Romantic Orchestra. Nor was this arrangement of the Symphony No. 7 for chamber ensemble by Erwin Stein, Hanns Eisler, and Karl Rankl done in 1921 for Arnold Schönberg's « Verein für musikalische Privatufführungen » ever intended to be anything but a substitute for a work they all loved but that could not be performed in the culturally devastated landscape of Vienna after the end of the Hapsburg Empire. Schönberg's private audience of musical cognoscenti expected only the best from Schönberg's pupils and Stein, Eisler, and Rankl turned in an arrangement full of respect and reverence. While at 1st the sound of the ensemble (1 clarinet, 1 horn, 2 violins, 1 viola, 1 cello, 1 bass, 1 harmonium, and piano 4 hands) is distracting (a horn for the main-theme of the opening movement ?) , the cogency of the conception and the thoroughness of its execution soon stills all objections.

...

According to Frederic Spotts' « Hitler and the Power of Aesthetics » , Adolf Hitler compared this Symphony favorably with Beethoven's 9th Symphony. When he consecrated a bust of Bruckner at Regensburg's « Walhalla » temple, in June of 1937, the Adagio from the 7th was played as Adolf Hitler stood in quiet admiration. A recording of the Adagio was played before the official radio announcement of the German defeat at Stalingrad, on 31 January 1943, and before Admiral Karl Dönitz announced Hitler's death on Radio Berlin, on 1 May 1945 ; a recording by Wilhelm Furtwängler was used.

...

Anton Bruckner began work on his Symphony No. 7 on September 23, 1881, completing the 1st movement on December 29, 1882.

The score calls for 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 4 horns, 4 Wagner tubas, 3 trombones, 1 bass tuba (alternating contrabass tuba) , timpani, and strings.

As Robert Simpson so aptly says it, in his beautiful study of Bruckner :

« The entrance leads to a very lofty and light interior. » , a vastly arching melody in which the cellos are subtly supported, now by a horn, now by the violas, now by a clarinet. To the extent that Bruckner here conveys the feeling of an immense arch, he is giving us, in microcosm, the sense of this entire movement with its grand pull away from the opening E major into the regions of B minor and B major, and its sovereign reconquest of the original tonality.

The Adagio was ready in sketch on January 22, 1883, and in score 3 months later, on April 21. The Scherzo was sketched by July 14, 1882, and finished on October 16 that year. The Finale, and with it the entire Symphony, was completed on September 5, 1883. Bruckner's pupils Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann had already played the 1st and 3rd movements on 2 pianos, in Vienna, in February 1883. Schalk and another Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe, gave the whole Symphony in that form in Vienna, 1 year later. Bruckner undertook a few revisions after the formal premiere, which Arthur Nikisch conducted with the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra of Leipzig, on December 30, 1884. The dedication, which Bruckner decided upon after the 1st performance of the work in Munich, is « to H. M. , King Ludwig II of Bavaria, in deepest reverence » .

Until the solemn Adagio begins, we don't even notice that Bruckner has, so far, stayed away from one of the most obvious harmonies to which a movement in E major might aspire, that of the relative minor, C-sharp. With that harmony that is both so close and so new, he introduces a new sound, that of a quartet of Wagner tubas, instruments designed for « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and intended to combine the mellowness of horns with something of the weight of tuba tone. There is, however, a deeper association with Richard Wagner for, in January 1883, Bruckner wrote to the conductor Felix Mottl :

« One day, I came home and felt very sad. The thought had crossed my mind that, before long, the Master would die, and, then, the C-sharp minor theme of the Adagio came to me. »

Wagner did, in fact, die in Venice, on February 13, and the quiet closing music that begins with the quartet of tubas and contrabass tuba became Bruckner's memorial to the man he worshipped above all living musicians. What would one not give to have been present when, at one of his improvisations at Saint-Florian's, Bruckner wove together his own Adagio with the music for « Siegfried » 's funeral ?

Following the example of Beethoven's 9th, Bruckner builds the movement on 2 contrasting ideas (the initial solemn one in minor, in 4/4 time, and a more pastoral, Schubertian one in major and in triple meter) of which the 2nd is abandoned after 2 statements, both scored with striking richness and loveliness. What the strings play immediately after the movement begins, a firm sequence of rising steps, is an allusion to music in Bruckner's own « Te Deum » , his last choral work on a large scale, in progress at the same time as the Symphony, and completed in March 1884. The words, at that point in the « Te Deum » , are « non confundar in æternum » (let me not be confounded for ever) , and Bruckner uses the momentum of those upward steps to build a great climax in the 1st variation. Later, he achieves another, one as stupendous as we can find in any Symphony, and reached in a place (C major) that is almost unimaginably far from the harmonic origins of the movement. From that summit, the music descends into the grief-stricken, then profoundly peaceful, threnody for Wagner.

In most performances, the thrilling arrival at the great C major climax in the Adagio is marked by a clash of cymbals with a roll of drums and triangle. This has been controversial almost from the beginning. It is clear that the cymbals and triangle were an afterthought of Bruckner's, for their entry appears on an insert to the autograph score. To this insert, Bruckner added 6 question marks ! These have been crossed-out and the words « gilt nicht » (not valid) added above the measure in question ; not all scholars, however, are convinced that this notation is in Bruckner's hand.

From a letter written by Josef Schalk to his brother Franz, we know that the cymbal clash in the Adagio of the 7th was their idea and that the 29 year old Arthur Nikisch, who conducted the premiere, talked Bruckner into accepting it : « which delights us wildly » . The structurally similar climax of the Adagio of Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 has 2 cymbal clashes of undisputed authenticity ; citing this parallel case, some measure of doubt about who added the « gilt nicht » , and the undeniable effectiveness of this spectacular punctuation, most conductors use the cymbals and triangle in the 7th.

The 3rd movement is a Scherzo dominated by the restless ostinato of strings and the cheerily trumpeting cock-crow with which it begins. As is Bruckner's custom, the Trio is slightly slower, lightly scored, and pastoral in character.

One of the features that define its pastoral nature is the prevalence of bagpipe-like, long-held notes in the bass, much as one might find them in musette movements in Baroque music.

The Finale, to quote Robert Simpson again, « blends solemnity and humor in festive “ grandeur ” ». It presents highly-diversified ideas that run the gamut from the capricious and even the magnificently grotesque to the sublimely simple. Here, to hang on to any semblance of order, it is necessary to ignore the many tempo modifications that almost certainly go back to Nikisch rather than to Bruckner, which unfortunately are still to be found in the widely used score edited by Leopold Nowak for the International Bruckner Society, and whose observance produces a distressingly spastic effect. At the end, all is gathered into a blaze of E major as intimations of the Symphony's beginning return and the heavens open.

...

For Bruckner, the years leading-up to the composition of the 7th Symphony (1881-1883) were a hard lesson in patience, to say nothing of the strain they put on his mental health and religious faith. Writing about the almost exactly contemporary « Te Deum » (1881-1884), Bruckner explained to the conductor Hermann Levi that he had dedicated it « to God for having brought me through so much anguish in Vienna ».

...

In 1881, the year Bruckner began the 7th Symphony, the belated premiere of the 4th (originally composed in 1874 but much revised) under conductor Hans Richter actually drew praise from some quarters of the Viennese press. This was by no means universal, but Bruckner was overjoyed to be understood at all. Apparently, it was at a rehearsal for that performance that (with typically gauche enthusiasm) Bruckner pressed a silver Thaler into Richter's hand and told him to « drink my health in a glass of beer ». Soon afterwards, Bruckner began work on the « Te Deum ».

A few months later, on 23 September 1881, Anton Bruckner set-down his 1st ideas for the 7th Symphony. Apparently, the Symphony's wonderful opening melody came to Bruckner in a dream : the conductor Ignaz Dorn, a friend from Bruckner's younger days, appeared to him and played the theme on a viola, with the words : « This will bring you success. ». As it turned-out, the 1st performance of the 7th Symphony (significantly, not in conservative Vienna, but in the much more progressive city of Leipzig) was one of the greatest successes of Bruckner's life.

One critic wrote : « How is it possible that he could remain so long unknown to us ? ».

It isn't hard to believe that the 7th Symphony's long arching 1st theme (cellos and violas, with horn at 1st) could have come straight from the unconscious mind ; a gift of nature. One of Bruckner's pupils and closest friends, Friedrich Eckstein, visited the composer regularly at this time, and he was often able to inspect the sketches for whichever work was then in progress. Eckstein was struck by how unusually the 7th's opening theme came into being. His remarks about Bruckner's normal working habits (and how the opening of the 7th differed from these) is worth quoting at length :

« Almost every time I visited Bruckner at his apartment in the “ Hessegasse ”, I found him sitting at his old fashioned, bulky “ Bösendorfer ” grand piano, deep in the sketch of one of his Symphonies, laboriously, with shaking hands, coaxing-out the harmonies. These musical outlines were in themselves quite remarkable. As a rule only, the violin or the top woodwind line was filled in, and in the bottom, the bass ; in between was a yawning gap, and it wasn't until much later that the remaining orchestral voices were added. The harmonic dimension and the arrangement of the orchestral voices were already clearly established in the Master's inner ear, and here and there, underneath the bass line, would stand a note, usually in the form of a capital letter, to indicate the harmonic “ fundamental tone ” of the passage in question. »

« But what a wealth of unimagined beauty was revealed when I saw the very 1st bars of one newly begun work, the wonderful 7th Symphony : where the string tremolos launch a deeply moving harmonic sequence that arches through a splendid chain of suspensions, bathing the main-theme, on horn and cellos, in shafts of radiant sunlight ! »

The vision intensifies as the melody is repeated by full Orchestra, then it fades poignantly. A melancholy, far more plainly scored 2nd theme (on oboe and clarinet) aspires to recover lost glory, and eventually it sounds as though it might succeed : there is a long crescendo over a repeated bass note, with brass fanfares rising in mounting excitement. But this is suddenly cut-off, and a more animated 3rd theme follows : an earthy dance tune (strings in unison, with woodwind and brass support) . This too reaches a fanfare like climax, yet once again, it is cut short before everything is fully resolved. Some find this typically Brucknerian strategy frustrating. After conducting the 7th Symphony, Sir Thomas Beecham grumbled :

« In the 1st movement alone, I took note of 6 pregnancies and at least 4 miscarriages. »

But patience brings rewards ; just as it did for Bruckner himself. When the great final resolution does come it is all the more telling for being so long (and so expertly) delayed. It is not too fanciful to compare this process with the workings of Providence as described by John Milton at the conclusion of his Samson Agonistes :

All is best, though we oft doubt,
What th'unsearchable dispose Of Highest Wisdom brings about,
And ever best found in the close.

For most of the 1st movement, Bruckner allows us only fleeting memories of his original vision ; but then, near the end, comes a sudden hush, and the timpani enter for the 1st time, holding a pedal E, pianissimo. Above this, a motif from the Symphony's opening melody aspires nobly, then turns with magnificent inevitability to the home key. Now, the Symphony's opening motif rises steadily through the Orchestra, a crescendo over a long held E major triad. Bruckner almost certainly had the elemental I chord crescendo the opens Wagner's « Das Rheingold » at the back of his mind, but quite apart from the orchestral sound, the effect here is quite different. After all, this is an ending, not a beginning.

It is said that Bruckner composed the Adagio in the knowledge that his idol Wagner hadn't long to live. There is an unmistakable note of mourning in the noble 1st theme, in which Bruckner uses (for the 1st time) a quartet of the so-called « Wagner tubas » (more like tenor and bass horns than the familiar bass tuba) : Wagner had had these instruments created to enhance the brass section in his « Ring » Cycle. Bruckner's idolization of Wagner was so intense that it seems to have embarrassed even Wagner himself. And yet, in contrast to the music of some of Wagner's other devotees, Bruckner rarely sounds like Wagner. Just before the Adagio's lovely 2nd theme (strings, 3/4) , horn and tubas introduce a quotation from « Tristan und Isolde » (the chromatic rising figure in bars 2 and 3 of the Opera's Prelude) , at its original pitch. But, unless this is pointed-out, the listener would be unlikely to notice it ; the effect is pure Bruckner.

Eventually, the Adagio's 1st theme builds steadily to one of Bruckner's grandest climaxes. Here, there is special emphasis on the stepwise rising motif that also appears in the final long crescendo of the « Te Deum » (to the words « non confundar in æternum » : « let me never be confounded ») . In most performances, the climax is crowned by a cymbal clash, with triangle and timpani. But when musicologist Robert Haas made his version of the score, in 1944, he removed these percussion parts, reproducing them instead in his preface to the score, pointing-out that someone has written the words « Gilt nicht » (not valid) in the top right-hand corner of the page ; Haas says that the handwriting is that of « the elderly Bruckner » , though this has been disputed. Haas' decision would appear to be strengthened by a letter from one of Bruckner's more controversial champions, Josef Schalk, to his brother Franz. The date of the letter is 10 January 1885 : i.e. , 11 days after the Symphony's Leipzig premiere :

« Ferdinand Löwe and I have recently gone through the score of the 7th with Bruckner, discussing 1 or 2 alterations and improvements. You probably don't know that Arthur Nikisch has got him to agree to our cymbal clash in the Adagio (C major 6-4 chord) , along with the triangle and the timpani ; to our unbounded delight. »

« Our cymbal clash » ; surely, that clinches the matter ! Yet, the fact is that we shall almost certainly never know how many « alterations and improvements » Bruckner made at the promptings of enthusiasts like Nikisch, Löwe and the Schalk brothers. Contrary to popular belief, Bruckner was quite capable of putting-up resistance when he really didn't like an idea. And although he could be relatively puritan about instrumentation when it came to Symphonies (harps were included in the 8th only after a 1 month long struggle, according to his pupil Friedrich Eckstein) , if he had doubts about the suitability of cymbals and triangle, why did he include them again in the Adagio of Symphony No 8 ? From a musicological point-of-view, the issue is hard to resolve.

Like many of Bruckner's earlier Scherzos, the Scherzo of the 7th Symphony reveals its rustic Upper-Austrian roots at almost every turn. In his younger days, Bruckner had boosted his meagre teacher's salary by playing in village dance bands. However, there is an obsessive, elemental drive here, which is to become still more pronounced in the Scherzos of the next 2 Symphonies. The Trio is much gentler, more songful, featuring Bruckner's signature 1-2, 1-2-3 rhythm.

Then, comes the Finale : unusually for Bruckner, this is the lightest of the 4 movements. As in the 1st movement, there are 3 contrasted main-themes : a dancing, dotted rhythm theme (violins) ; a not too solemn chorale on violins and violins above a « walking » pizzicato bass ; and a jagged version of the 1st theme for full Orchestra. Excitement builds towards the Coda ; then, at the last minute, Bruckner reveals what many listeners will have guessed already, at least intuitively : that the Finale's dancing 1st theme is simply another version of the Symphony's opening motif. Thus, Bruckner's 7th Symphony closes with a splendid confirmation of the 1st movement's opening vision ; or, as T. S. Eliot put it in his « 4 Quartets » : « In my beginning is my end. » .

...

Bruckner began work on his 7th Symphony on September 23, 1881, and completed the score a bit less than 2 years later, on the day after his 59th birthday. The 1st performance was given by the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch, on December 30, 1884.

The score, dedicated to King Ludwig II of Bavaria, calls for pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets and bassoons, with 4 horns, 4 Wagner tubas, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, tuba, timpani, triangle, cymbals and strings. Approximate duration, 68 minutes.

Bruckner was at his most energetic and most confident when he composed this Symphony, less than 3 months after completing his 6th. Although he worked on his Mass in E minor and outlined the « Te Deum » , during the same period, he was able to maintain a clear and steady course in bringing the 7th to completion. 6 months after he completed the score, his disciples Ferdinand Löwe and Josef Schalk played a piano duet reduction for Arthur Nikisch in Leipzig, and the legendary conductor (then only 28 years old, but already well established) decided, then and there, to give the Symphony's premiere in that city. His 1st thought was to present the work on June 27, 1884, in a concert to raise funds for the erection of a monument to Richard Wagner (who was born in Leipzig) . For one reason or another, the premiere was delayed for 6 months, and it was a rather mixed success in that bastion of conservatism, despite Nikisch's enthusiastic commitment. 10 weeks later, however, Hermann Levi conducted the 7th in Munich, and that occasion was an undisputed triumph, bringing Bruckner approval and acceptance on a scale he had not known before ; it was immediately following that happy event that he dedicated the score to King Ludwig, who had been Wagner's patron, and he, thereafter, referred to Hermann Levi as « my artistic father » (though the conductor was his junior by 15 years) . Within 3 years, the 7th Symphony had been received warmly in Vienna, Chicago, New York, London, Amsterdam and Berlin. In the 1920's, the 7th became the 1st of Bruckner's Symphonies to be recorded ; it was recorded 3 times (one with Jascha Horenstein and the Berlin Philharmonic) , in fact, before any of his others was recorded in full. It continues to be the most favored of Bruckner's works, both in recordings and in concert performances.

Even more significantly, perhaps, the 7th achieved this level of success on Bruckner's own terms from the outset. Bruckner never revised it, as he did his others, but produced a single version and stood by it. Together with the aforementioned Schalk and Löwe, he did make changes in tempo markings and orchestration in a few passages before the premiere, but these were for the most part minimal and did not affect the character or proportions of the work. After the premiere, at Arthur Nikisch's suggestion, there was some more polishing, but nothing beyond the norm in making adjustments to a big score between its 1st actual performance and its publication.

The 7th remains the one Bruckner Symphony that has undergone the fewest changes from one edition to the next, either on the composer's part or by his various editors. His own autograph score, with the emendations just noted, was used as the basis for the 1st publication in 1885, and the differences between that version and the 2 « Original Editions » published by the International Bruckner Society are again minimal, having to do mainly with octave doublings, expression marks and other such details. In essence, musicologist Robert Haas, in the 1944 edition, preserved the score as Bruckner 1st set it down, while Leopold Nowak, 10 years later, incorporated the alterations made at Nikisch's request. Conductor Stanisław Skrowaczewski, one of the most respected Brucknerians of our time, conducts a version based mainly on the Haas edition, but with a few passages from the Nowak and some touches of his own.

The single point of major significance that has been less than fully clear since the Bruckner Society undertook its critical editions has been the question of the cymbal clash at the climax of the Adagio ; actually, a cymbal clash with a triangle roll. This touch was not in Bruckner's original score ; it was apparently a suggestion from Löwe and Schalk, not only accepted by Nikisch but, according to Löwe, « insisted upon » by the conductor, who as late as 2 weeks before the delayed premiere more or less demanded that several sections be re-orchestrated. Such a demand, too, is hardly an unusual occurrence in the process of bringing so big a work to the public, especially when so powerful a conductor as Nikisch is involved.

Robert Haas cited the cymbal clash as inauthentic because the words « Gilt nicht » (« Doesn't count » or « May be ignored ») were added to the notation for inserting these percussion instruments on the strip of paper fastened to the affected page of the score. But those words are not in Bruckner's hand-writing, and, surely, if he had intended to delete the cymbals and triangle, he would simply have removed the addendum on which he had inserted them, rather than leave it in place with a note that it should be disregarded ! He did unequivocally include just such a treatment at the corresponding point in the Adagio of his next Symphony, the last one he brought to completion (and it is of interest in this respect that the 8th also contains an outright quotation from the 7th in its Finale) , but this pesky question remains the most conspicuous textual decision to be made by a conductor performing the 7th Symphony.

Bruckner's 9 numbered Symphonies (there are 2 earlier ones without numbers) divide neatly into groups of 3 to mark-off significant stages or levels in his progress as a Symphonist. The 7th, which initiated the glorious final trilogy, was not only presented on Bruckner's own terms, but was also the 1st one he completed without some level of concern for approval from his idol, Richard Wagner. Wagner died while Bruckner was composing this work, and its exalted slow movement is at least in part an elegy for him.

The 1st meeting between Anton Bruckner and Richard Wagner took place in Munich, in June 1865, at the time of the premiere of « Tristan und Isolde » . On that occasion, Bruckner was too timid to show Wagner the 3 movements, he had completed of his Symphony No. 1, but, in 1873, « the Master » allowed Bruckner to visit him at Bayreuth with the scores of his 2nd and 3rd Symphonies, and accepted the dedication of the latter, which was originally filled with quotations from Wagner's Operas. 2 years later, Wagner embraced Bruckner publicly in Vienna. Their last meeting was at Bayreuth, in July 1882, when Bruckner attended the premiere of « Parsifal » (conducted by the same Hermann Levi who was destined to realize the full grandeur of the Symphony Bruckner had begun some 10 months earlier) . Wagner declared then that among Symphonists he knew « of only one composer who measures-up to Beethoven, and that is Bruckner » . (As both Wagner and Bruckner were well aware, Johannes Brahms had, by then, introduced 2 of his 4 Symphonies.) He went on to promise Bruckner that he would personally perform all of his Symphonies ; but Bruckner sensed that « the Master » would not be able to keep that promise, and this premonition dwelt in him as he worked on the 1st movement and Scherzo of his 7th.

The Scherzo was to be in its usual position as 3rd movement (it was only in his 2 final Symphonies that Bruckner reversed the traditional order of the inner movements) but it was actually the 1st of the 4 movements to be completed. After finishing the 1st movement, Bruckner began work on the Adagio, and had it fully sketched by January 22, 1883. When he began to turn the sketch into the actual score, he felt a strong presentiment of Wagner's death, which occurred on February 13 ; when the news reached him he extended the original design of the Adagio, ending the movement with a noble elegy which he labeled, so as to leave no doubt about his intentions, « In memory of the immortal and dearly beloved Master who has departed this life » . The Adagio was brought to completion on April 21, leaving the rest of the spring and the entire summer for the composition and orchestration of the Finale.

The composer's identity is established unmistakably in the soaring phrase that opens the 1st movement (Allegro moderato) , which is laid-out according to Bruckner's own comfortable modification of Sonata form. The 1st subject is related to a motif in the Mass in D minor which he composed in 1864, while the 2nd is pervasively Wagnerian in character. The course of the music is more serene than proclamative, but by no means deficient in characteristic Brucknerian drama. Brass chorales are heard at transitional points, and the final pages blaze with pealing brass and sweeping strings.

In the Adagio, Bruckner met the self-imposed challenge of creating an elegy worthy of Wagner by producing one of the most eloquent utterances in his entire catalogue of works. It is was this movement that he used the quartet of Wagner tubas for the 1st time, and it is in this great Adagio that he set the seal on the 7th as the 1st in the magnificent final trilogy of Symphonies in which the rustic character of his earlier works is almost entirely replaced by a consciously loftier concept. The music is marked « Sehr feierlich und sehr langsam » (Very solemn and very slow) , the term « solemn » , as so often in musical parlance, carrying a connotation of a solemnizing ritual or ceremony. The opening (Wagner tubas and lower-strings) is somewhat reminiscent of the episode « Siegfried's Death » in « Götterdämmerung » ; by way of contrast, it is followed at length by an almost waltz-like section (violins) which, from our vantage of hindsight, might be said to hint at what Gustav Mahler was to do with similar material in his Symphonies. The general structure of this vast movement, however, suggests neither Wagner nor Mahler so much as the sublime Adagio of Beethoven's 9th Symphony.

Since Bruckner's Adagio is in the nature of a dirge, though, it is a good deal more impassioned (as well as more extended) , rising in intensity through restatements of the simple opening theme until the peak is reached. The effect of this climax, achieved with the simplest of means, is a great release of tension, leaving the tonal landscape hushed as back-drop for the final benediction, in which fragments from Wagner's « Ring » may be discerned. At the end is a trombone chorale whose theme Bruckner was to use again in the concluding « Non confundar » of his « Te Deum » , the 1st major work he completed after this Symphony (also in 1884) .

The lusty « cock's crow » Scherzo brings us back to earth with its brilliant trumpet tune against an insistent 4 note figure in the strings. The Trio, though, is not the bucolic idyll Bruckner had given us in his earlier Scherzos, but, in the words of Hans Ferdinand Redlich (who prepared his own edition of the 7th Symphony, seeking a middle ground between Leopold Nowak and Robert Haas) , « music of a nostalgia for the lost golden age » , music that « gazes longingly beyond the confines of this pastoral world » .

The Finale is a concise (for Bruckner) « résumé » of what has gone before. Its opening theme is derived from that of the 1st movement, and what proceeds is in the nature of a review of the work's emotional sequence. The exultant, affirmative conclusion represents both fulfilment in itself and a promise to be kept again in Bruckner's 2 remaining Symphonies.

...

« They want me to write in a different way. I could, but I must not. Out of thousands, God gave talent to me ... One day I shall have to give an account of myself. How could the Father in Heaven judge me if I follow others and not him ? » (Anton Bruckner, as quoted by August Göllerich.)

Anton Bruckner was a mass of contradictions. Perhaps this, above all other reasons, explains why appreciation of his music was slow to come, and Bruckner was made to join the abundant ranks of history's misunderstood composers. Possessed of a striking imagination, he wrote one of the 19th Century's most important sets of Symphonies - the 1st important Symphonic achievement after Beethoven, it has been claimed. He was a diligent and careful musician, who studied the craft of composition all his life, not ready to produce his Symphony No. 1 until the age of 42. By that time, he had amassed a formidable store of knowledge and, in having already composed orchestral Masses, the experience of using it. Yet, Bruckner's personality was strangely matched with his sophisticated musicianship. Though he had relocated to the cosmopolitan culture of Vienna by the time he wrote most of the Symphonies, Bruckner retained all his provincial mannerisms - the Upper-Austrian dialect, the rural dress habits, the ingenuous attitudes towards religion and authority. His inelegant « bumpkin » ways (the source of so many endearing anecdotes) coloured the way his music was received, and consequently the newness of Symphonic form, bold chromaticity of harmonic language and profundity of expression were misunderstood as clumsy idiosyncrasies of an unoriginal and unaware mind. The dichotomy between man and artist was too contrasting and, ultimately, irreconcilable for so many listeners and critics of his day.

But now that the music can be received without the accompaniment of entertaining but finally malevolent tales about the man, Bruckner's music stands a chance of assessment within its historical and musical context - but a context that must not, as it turns-out, ignore the character of the man. This essay takes Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 as the point of departure for discussing the impulses behind the music - the twin influences of Beethoven and Wagner, the obsessive-compulsive disorder, the persistent self-doubt and the constant search for external approval. Symphony No. 7 is special within Bruckner's output, for it was the work to bring him his long-sought public acclaim, occurring only in 1884 when he was 60. Many conductors have since given this work a special place in their careers ; Herbert von Karajan made no fewer than 3 recordings of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, the 3rd being in fact his final recording.

« Perhaps, it was a vision of how Beethoven's 9th befriends Wagner's " Valkyries " and finishes-up trampled under their hooves. » (Eduard Hanslick, reviewing the premiere of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony in 1877.)

Symphony No. 7 contains Bruckner's great tribute to Richard Wagner, a man Bruckner always called « Master » ; the monumental Adagio is a memorial to the older composer, news of whose death, on 13 February 1883, reached Bruckner as he was at work on this composition. It was 20 years to the day since Bruckner's 1st contact with an Opera by Wagner. Wagner's significance to Bruckner has been both overstated by his detractors and understated by his champions. The former dismiss his music as mindless imitation - « ersatz » Wagnerian music-drama with the words removed ; the latter take pains to point-out the bits of « Wagnerian » instrumentation and harmony that predate his acquaintance with Wagner's music, arguing that Bruckner's music would have evolved in the same direction nonetheless. Given all this, it is crucial to verify what Wagnerian, and indeed other, influences actually exist in his music. Bruckner 1st heard a complete work of Wagner's on 13 February 1863. This was « Tannhäuser » , in a performance at Linz where Bruckner was then living and working as a cathedral organist. The discovery of Wagner was a cataclysmic event. Bruckner later said he felt like a watchdog that had snapped-off its chain, now free to explore new territory. His next major composition was the 1864 Mass in D Minor, a sudden and brilliant emergence of the characteristic mature composer. While still modelled on the Symphonic Masses of Haydn and Beethoven (the « Missa solemnis » comes to mind) , this Mass deploys enharmonic key relationships and an advanced chromaticism new to Bruckner. The sudden appearance of a virtually fully-formed composer, but at the age of 40, is curious - how can he have grasped and disciplined for his own purposes the Wagnerian language so quickly ?

The biographer Robert Simpson has put forward an interesting theory : Bruckner was, after all, an organist famous for his improvisations. It has to be remarked that Bruckner left no compositions of note for his own instrument, despite an obvious mastery of extemporisation that gained him his position as cathedral organist at Linz. It is possible that Bruckner had evolved a daring style in his improvisations, but did not risk notating it. When asked to comment on the bold newness of the Mass, he simply said, « I didn't dare before. » . Perhaps, what was new in the Mass was not so much the language itself, but the courage to express it.

Nevertheless, Bruckner's adulation of Wagner was real. His relationship with Wagner himself (more Master - Disciple than friendship) began when he attended the premiere of « Tristan und Isolde » in Munich, in May 1865. There, he made Wagner's acquaintance, and, in fact, had the opportunity to spend a greater amount of time with him because the « Tristan » premiere was postponed for 2 weeks owing to the ill health of Malvina Schnorr, the 1st Isolde. But Bruckner was too timid to show Wagner any of his compositions, and it wasn't until he had completed the 2nd Symphony and nearly finished the 3rd that he journeyed to Bayreuth, in September 1873, with the intention of dedicating one of them to Wagner. Wagner accepted the incomplete 3rd ; not coincidentally, therefore, the completed Symphony contains direct quotations from « Tristan und Isolde » and « Die Walküre » - quotations that were simply fodder for the Viennese Classicist critic Eduard Hanslick, champion of Johannes Brahms and hater of Richard Wagner, who wrote the vituperative review quoted above. Bruckner was to excise the Wagner quotations in one of his several revisions of this embattled Symphony, but, immediately following that Bayreuth trip of 1873, Bruckner joined the « Akademischer Richard Wagner-Verein » and declared his support for the « Master » .

The hero-worship notwithstanding, Bruckner was already a developed composer and, therefore, knew to process and assimilate the raw substance of Wagner's music in making his own. Hence, in the final analysis, it is not easy to define exactly « the Wagnerian influence » present. Bruckner took from Wagner his harmonic language but virtually none of the philosophy. The notion of « Gesamtkunstwerk » (the total artwork, integrating words, music and spectacle) is nowhere to be found. Bruckner wrote not a single Opera or music-drama, and, in fact, stories abound about Bruckner being oblivious to the words in Wagner's Operas - his score of « Tristan » being a copy without the text, or his bewilderment at the end of « Die Walküre » , wondering why Brunhilde was being burned. But Bruckner found useful Wagner's tonal idiom and melodic contours as well as the large-scale Orchestra - although, even here, it is essential to point-out what Bruckner did not adopt. Instruments like the « cor anglais » , piccolo, bass clarinet and double bassoon, so essential to the subtle shading of Wagner's music, show-up in none of Bruckner's Symphonies. Even some conventional instruments like the harp, cymbals and timpani show-up sparingly (the harp once only, in the Scherzo of the 8th Symphony, and percussion in just the slow movements of the 8th and, with questionable authenticity, the 7th) . The notable exception is Bruckner's use of the « Wagner tuba » from the 7th Symphony onwards, that instrumental being one designed by Wagner and used in the « Ring » cycle after encountering the new horns designed by Adolph Sax.

Whether he knew it or not, Eduard Hanslick's mention of Beethoven's 9th Symphony is quite significant. If from Wagner came the immense scale and advanced harmony, then from Beethoven's 9th Bruckner took over what Deryck Cooke calls the « metaphysical challenge » . The 9th Symphony of Beethoven was transcendental - in form, style and content, it was a Symphony that attempted things tried by no Symphony before, and, consequently, threw down a challenge to all who would compose Symphonies. Subsequent composers like Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms and Antonín Dvořák shied away from the challenge, while a few, like Hector Berlioz, posed one of another kind. Wagner and Bruckner were the 1st to respond resolutely to this metaphysical challenge, and Bruckner the one to do so in its original Symphonic genre. Wagner seized on Beethoven's use of the verbal in a Symphony, declaring it the irrevocable final step of music towards the union of artistic media :

« The last Symphony of Beethoven is the redemption of Music from out of her own peculiar element into the realm of universal art. It is the human evangel of the art of the future. Beyond it, no forward step is possible ; for upon it, the perfect artwork of the future alone can follow, the universal drama to which Beethoven has forged us the key. » .

Anton Bruckner, whose discovery of Beethoven's 9th, in 1866, post-dated his acquaintance with Wagner's music, achieved the same but within the genre of the Symphony itself. His vast, unorthodox forms (so often dismissed as shapeless, awkward and repetitive) are no less than the engenderment of this same « universal drama » by the very transcendence of received form. Bruckner's conception of Symphonic structure is wholly related to another legacy of his rural upbringing, his Austrian Catholic peasant faith. It is not the organic and humanistic evolution of the basic music towards some goal or higher state, that is at the heart of conventional Sonata form. The fact that it lacks, on the whole, thematic development, motivic manipulation and a sense of advancement is precisely the point. Bruckner's form is majestically static, the huge slabs of music fully formed from the beginning and the themes more unfurled than developed. There is no conflict, no doubt. The components of Symphonic form for Bruckner are simply there as statements, not questions - the icons of a resolute man, not the struggle and search of humanity wondering about the will of God. In Deryck Cooke's words :

« Experiencing Bruckner's Symphonies is more like walking round a cathedral, and taking in every aspect of it, than like setting-out on a journey to some hoped-for goal. » .

But to simply say that the Bruckner Symphony is a product of religious faith is an over-simplification. Some of the characteristics of his Symphonies should also be viewed in the context of his complex character, in particular his neurological condition. It appears that Bruckner was plagued by a kind of obsessive-compulsive disorder. The subject of his obsessions were many and varied. The most obvious was his numeromania, which caused him to ceaselessly count objects around him. He would count cathedral gables, statues in a park, and kept a diary of the number of dances he had with girls at parties. A friend of Bruckner's (Betty von Mayfeld) found she could never wear a certain dress around him because he would count the petals on the flowers of the print.

Musically, this numeromania manifested itself in his numbering of bars and phrase lengths in his manuscripts. Bruckner was also obsessed by the idea of marriage. His innumerable crushes on young girls were a recurring feature of his whole adult life, from the aborted affair with the 16 year old Antonie Werner, in 1850, to the chamber-maid, Ida Buhz, in 1895. More bizarre were his obsessions with corpses and far-off lands. He hastened to the mortuary after a the « Ringtheater » fire to view the charred bodies ; he requested official permission to view the body of Emperor Maximilian after the assassination, and was extremely eager to view the bodies of Beethoven and Schubert as they were being exhumed for re-internment. Bruckner was obsessed with Mexico and the North-Pole, places which he never visited, but to which, in moments of depression, he would express a desperate desire to flee.

...

« Bruckner is the greatest living peril, a type of tonal anti-Christ. The violent nature of the man is not written in his face, for his expression indicates at most the small soul of an everyday " Kapellmeister ". Yet, he composes nothing but high treason, revolution and murder. His work is absolutely devoid of art or reason ... His music has the fragrance of heavenly roses, but is poisoned with the sulphurs of hell. » (A Viennese critic, reviewing the 1885 premiere of the String Quartet.)

The premiere of the 7th Symphony, on 30 December 1884, unlocked doors in Bruckner's path. Significantly, the performance took place not in Vienna but in Leipzig where Bruckner, then 60 years old, received an ovation lasting a quarter-hour. A Leipzig critic wrote :

« His homely, honest countenance beamed with a warm inner happiness such as can appear only on the face of one who is too good-hearted to give way to bitterness even under the weight of crushing circumstances. »

And the conductor of the performance, Arthur Nikisch, said afterwards :

« Since Beethoven, there has been nothing that could even approach it. From this moment, I regard it as my duty to work for the recognition of Bruckner. »

Within a year, the Symphony was heard in Dresden, Frankfurt, Utrecht, New York and The Hague but not in Vienna (though the Vienna Philharmonic was enthusiastic about wanting to play it, Bruckner implored them not to, afraid that the Vienna press, including of course Eduard Hanslick, would set him back ; and Bruckner was right) . When it was eventually played in Vienna, it was 1 year later, in March 1886, under Hans Richter ; Hanslick called the work « unnatural, bombastic, sickly and decadent » while the critic and official Brahms biographer Max Kalbeck said :

« It comes from the “ Nibelungen ” and goes straight to the devil. »

On the other hand, Johann Strauß, Junior, who was the dominant popular composer at the time, was wholly complimentary. He sent Bruckner a heartfelt telegram saying simply :

« I am deeply moved. It was one of the strongest impressions of my life. »

Not long before, Bruckner had indirectly paid Strauß a curious compliment in criticising Brahms ; he claimed he preferred a Strauß waltz to a Brahms Symphony. It was to be expected : Brahms himself had called the Bruckner works « Symphonic boa-constrictors, a swindle that will be forgotten in a few years. » . Bruckner had begun the 7th Symphony, on 21 September 1881 (he had completed the 6th Symphony only on September 3) , and finished the work 2 years later, on 5 September 1883.

The major event in the period affecting the composition was the death of Wagner, on 13 February 1883. Apparently, Bruckner was at work on the 2nd movement, the Adagio, when he heard the news, and the closing pages of the movement are purposefully written as « funeral music for the Master » . According to a letter he wrote to the conductor Felix Mottl, Bruckner actually had a premonition of the event, « and at that moment the C-sharp minor theme of the Adagio (the very opening theme of the movement) came to me » . Not coincidentally, this C-sharp minor theme is played on a quartet of Wagner tubas, the very 1st time Bruckner employed this instrument. Perhaps also, not coincidentally, the long-breathed melody at the very beginning of the entire work contains a cadence that closely resembles the cadence of the « Walhalla » motif from Wagner's « Ring » cycle - the « Walhalla » motif being the 1st music given to a quartet of Wagner tubas in « Das Rheingold » . And when the Symphony was published, the dedicatee was King Ludwig II of Bavaria, Wagner's long-standing patron who made Bayreuth a reality. Clearly, the 7th Symphony functions as a tribute to Wagner on more than one level.

As a result of its immediate success, the 7th Symphony escaped the obsessive revisions to which the other Symphonies were subjected. Nevertheless, there is one moment in the Adagio which has caused consternation amongst Bruckner enthusiasts : whether the percussion instruments (cymbal, timpani and triangle) at the climax of the movement were intended by Bruckner or were, yet, another interpolation by his well-meaning associates.

Apparently, the idea was not Bruckner's, but came from Josef Schalk, an ardent pupil of Bruckner's who felt that the composer, so often fraught with self-doubt, needed the ideas of others. Nonetheless, Bruckner often sanctioned the ideas that originated with his associates. The autograph manuscript has both the percussion parts and the words « Gilt nicht » (not valid) on it, and it is disputed as to whose hand-writing any of it is - hence Bruckner's true thoughts on this are unknown. It is interesting, in the knowledge of this dispute, to note Hugo Wolf's fierce defence of Bruckner against the Hanslicks of Vienna. He said :

« One cymbal crash by Bruckner is worth the 4 Symphonies of Brahms with the Serenades thrown in. »

Probably the most obvious example in the Symphony of the reiterative Brucknerian motif occurs in the long crescendo passage leading-up to this climax with the cymbal crash. A cell consisting of ascending notes is obsessively repeated over and over, ingeniously saved from tedium by daring underlying harmony. Superimposed on this passage is a motif quoted directly from Bruckner's own « Te Deum », originally set to the words « Non confundar in æternum » (Let me never be confounded) - a final prayer for the departed Wagner, perhaps.

The 7th Symphony, otherwise, exhibits a general structure much like Bruckner's other Symphonies, one modelled on Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The enormous 1st movement, beginning imperceptibly over string tremolandi like the emergence of a world « ex nihilo », is a loose Sonata form with 3 theme groups. The 2nd movement is based on 2 theme groups in alternation, the 2nd theme in F-sharp major bearing a striking resemblance to the corresponding theme in the Adagio of Beethoven's 9th. The hurtling 3rd movement, the Symphony's briefest, is a Scherzo permeated by obsessive dotted rhythms, with a contrasting Trio section of a soaring, « lyric » character. The grand, rather festive finale is, once again, a loose Sonata structure but, this time, comprising 4 groups of material. The 1st is, in fact, a theme that is obviously related to the very opening themes of the Symphony and, in the closing passages of the Finale, both themes are united in a characteristically Brucknerian blazing climax.

Review of Bruckner 7th Symphony (The Montreal Gazette, October 10th, 1964)

Due to the actual musical director of the MSO, maestro Zubin Mehta, and, also prior to that, to maestros Josef Krips and Otto Klemperer, the music of Anton Bruckner seems to be in the process of making its way into the orchestral repertory in Montreal. It is likely to be a slow process because of its music requiring performance under, more or less, special conditions due to its weight and its length. We have so far had the 4th, the 7th, the 8th and the 9th Symphonies. This leaves 6 more to come. Actually, Bruckner composed 11 Symphonies in all. The 2 early ones being the F minor of 1863 and the D minor of 1864.

Imposing as this symphonic repertory may be, it forms only a part of the Bruckner totality. There is a large collection of choral works, none of which have been heard here. They include not only the 3 big Masses and the Te Deum but also a lengthy list of Motets and other Sacred pieces as well as Secular ones.

It is strange that Bruckner left so little organ music because he was one of the greatest organists of his time. The reason would seem : to be that his organ playing was mainly improvisational.

In the summer of 1960, I had the good fortune to visit the Klosterneuburg Abbey on the Danube, near Vienna. This, I was told, is where Anton Bruckner often came to improvise on the Abbey organ. "Communion with God in music", he called it. But the organ style is strongly imbedded in his symphonic music. An example is the beautiful Adagio movement in his 7th Symphony which we heard this week. Bruckner, like Johann Sebastian Bach, is a pedal man. In judging the style of any composer, however, it is the man behind the music who counts in the long run. And Bruckner was quite a man.

Anton Bruckner was born of peasant stock and he remained true to his heritage all his life. His character was essentially simple and childlike. He was intensely religious. While in Linz, he was studying with 2 composition teachers. One a Protestant, the other a Roman Catholic. Bruckner categorically refused to show his Church music to the Protestant.

The stories told about him are legion. There is one that has been fairly well vouched for. In 1875, he was appointed lecturer in harmony and counterpoint at the University of Vienna. A group of students decided to "haze" him. They asked if they could come to his apartment and make him a presentation. The "presentation" proved to be a notorious prostitute. Bruckner didn't say a word. He walked across the room and knelt at his prie-Dieu. Above the crucifix was a picture hidden by a small curtain. Rising, he pulled the curtain back and stood quietly facing the visitors. The picture was one of his mother laid out in her coffin.

Yet, there is not the slightest trace of stuffiness in his music. It is essentially the music of a man who loved the mountains and the forests. His God was a God of nature as well as of the Church. He developed relatively late. He was just 40 year old when he essayed symphonic writing for the 1st time.

He was also late in getting a sympathetic hearing. He was 60 year old before he became into his own with the success of the 7th Symphony in Leipzig and, 3 months later, in Munich.

Not until long after his death was his music really appreciated. For years, he was regarded as little more than a Wagnerian camp follower. In reality, his music has little or nothing in common with Richard Wagner's. It is as different as the 2 men were, themselves, different.

The Gramophone Choice

Symphony No. 7 (Robert Haas Edition) : Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Herbert von Karajan.

« DG Karajan Gold » : 439 037-2GHS - DDD (66 minutes) .

The Vienna Philharmonic features on Karajan's last recording, an idiomatic account of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, lighter and more Classical in feel than either of his 2 Berlin recordings, yet, loftier too. As for the original-image bit-processing, you need go no further than the 1st fluttered violin tremolando and the cellos' rapt entry in the 3rd bar to realise how ravishingly « present » the performance is in this reprocessing. Or go to the end of the Symphony and hear how the great E major peroration is even more transparent than before, the octave drop of bass trombone and bass tuba 13 bars from home the kind of delightfully euphoric detail that in 1989 only the more assiduous score-reader would have been conscious of hearing. This remastered 7th is definitely « pure gold » .

...

Symphony No. 7 :Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Otto Klemperer, in 1958.

« Testament » mono : SBT1459 - ADD (60 minutes) .

The high-point of this marvellous, previously unpublished 1958 version of Bruckner's 7th Symphony is the Adagio, specifically its emotional candour, its great elasticity and the warmth of the string-playing, even when tonally a little on the thin side. Everywhere you sense the hand of someone in the know, even when unexpected things happen (for example, the « crescendos - decrescendos » in the Scherzo, and the marked broadening of tempo that bends the Finale's opening theme (the chorale 2nd subject is also taken fairly slowly) .Yes, there are blemishes that « spit and polishers » might object to.

...

Symphony No. 7 (Robert Haas Edition) : Royal Scottish National Orchestra conducted by Georg Tintner.

« Naxos » : 8 554269 - DDD (66 minutes) .

In the absence of recommendable budget or super-budget recordings of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, this will do nicely. It's a finely schooled performance, chaste and discreet, with a notable reading of the Adagio. A notable bargain.

L'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig

L'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig est l'Orchestre symphonique principal de la ville de Leipzig, en résidence au « Gewandhaus » .

Sa genèse par la bourgeoisie marque une rupture avec les traditions d'orchestres nés des volontés princières ou ecclésiastiques : après la création d'institutions à l'effectif adapté aux compositions musicales de l'époque (la 1re en 1743, du vivant de Bach) , c'est en 1781 qu'une société de concert prend le nom d'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » à l'occasion de la construction d'une salle de concert dans la « halle aux tissus » (« gewand-haus ») de Leipzig.

L'effectif s'agrandit selon les souhaits et les exigences des compositeurs romantiques et la grande notoriété des différents chefs permanents (qui succèdent aux « Konzertmeister ») parmi lesquels Felix Mendelssohn (qui aide à sortir Bach du purgatoire) vont l'amener au plus haut-niveau artistique.

Arthur Nikisch étend le répertoire aux compositeurs contemporains, Johannes Brahms, Richard Strauß, Antonín Dvořák, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Max Reger ou Arnold Schönberg et Wilhelm Furtwängler parachèvera son œuvre.

Bruno Walter succède à Furtwängler, en 1929, mais la montée du Nazisme l'oblige à quitter son poste.

De grands musiciens se sont produits dans le 1er « Gewandhaus », Clara Schumann, Franz Liszt ou Hector Berlioz. Le bâtiment qui lui succède, le 2e « Gewandhaus », construit en 1884, est très sévèrement endommagé lors du bombardement de la ville, le 20 février 1944. Les ruines sont conservées jusqu'en 1968 dans l'espoir d'une reconstruction puis finalement rasées. Le 8 octobre 1981, pour le bicentenaire de l'Orchestre, un 3e « Gewandhaus » est inauguré, bâtiment d'architecture moderne dont la construction a duré 5 ans.

Outre les chefs permanents, la classe des chefs invités, Hans Pfitzner, Otto Klemperer, Carl Schuricht, Fritz Busch, Richard Strauß, Felix Weingartner, Thomas Beecham, démontre que l'Orchestre n'a cessé d'occuper un rang particulier parmi les grandes phalanges internationales. La période communiste lui a, en outre, permis de rester à l'écart de la tendance générale à la standardisation de la sonorité des grands Orchestres symphoniques mondiaux.

Les instrumentistes de l'Orchestre assurent également les concerts à l'Opéra de Leipzig et à l'Église Saint-Thomas où Jean-Sébastien Bach occupa de longues années le poste de « Kantor » .

Le « Gewandhaus » abrite aussi 3 formations de musique de chambre :

I Quatuor à cordes (« Gewandhaus-Quartett ») , fondé en 1809 (l'un des plus anciens en activité) .

I Quintette à vent (« Gewandhaus-Bläserquintett ») , fondé en 1896.

I Octuor (« Gewandhaus-Oktett ») , fondé en 1993.

En 2011, Riccardo Chailly et l'Orchestre ont entrepris d'enregistrer un cycle complet des 9 Symphonies de Beethoven sur étiquette « Decca » . La sortie des disques a été suivie d'une tournée, les 9 Symphonies étant réparties sur 5 concerts. Les représentations ont eu lieu à Leipzig, à la Salle Pleyel de Paris et au « Barbican Centre » de Londres.

« Konzertmeister »

1781-1785 : Johann Adam Hiller (Saint-Empire Romain) .

1785-1810 : Johann Gottfried Schicht (Saint-Empire Romain) .

1810-1827 : Johann Philipp Christoph Schulz (Confédération Germanique) .

1827-1835 : Christian August Pohlenz (Confédération Germanique) .

1843-1844 : Ferdinand Hiller (Confédération Germanique) .

1845-1847 : Felix Mendelssohn (Confédération Germanique) .

1848-1854 : Julius Rietz (Confédération Germanique) .

Chefs permanents

1835-1848 : Felix Mendelssohn (Confédération Germanique) .

1848-1852 : Julius Rietz (Confédération Germanique) .

1852-1853 : Niels Wilhelm Gade (Danemark) .

1852-1854 : Ferdinand Hiller (Confédération Germanique) .

1854-1860 : Julius Rietz (Confédération Germanique) .

1860-1895 : Carl Reinecke (Empire Germanique) .

1895-1922 : Arthur Nikisch (Autriche-Hongrie) .

1922 à 1928 : Wilhelm Furtwängler (République de Weimar) .

1929-1933 : Bruno Walter (République de Weimar) .

1934-1945 : Hermann Abendroth (Allemagne nazie) .

1945-1948 : Herbert Albert (Allemagne occupée) .

1949-1962 : Franz Konwitschny (Allemagne de l'Est) .

1964-1968 : Václav Neumann (Tchécoslovaquie) .

1970-1996 : Kurt Masur (Allemagne de l'Est) .

1996-2005 : Herbert Blomstedt (Suède) .

2005- : Riccardo Chailly (Italie) .

Quelques œuvres créées par l'Orchestre

1811 : Concerto pour piano n° 5 de Beethoven.

1839 : Symphonie n° 9 « la Grande » de Schubert.

1841 : Symphonie n° 1 de Schumann.

1841 : Symphonie n° 4 de Schumann.

1845 : Concerto pour violon n° 2 de Mendelssohn.

1846 : Concerto pour piano, Opus 54, de Schumann.

1er janvier 1879 : Création du Concerto pour violon de Brahms par Joseph Joachim sous la direction du compositeur.

1884 : Symphonie n° 7 de Bruckner.

...

The Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra (« Gewandhausorchester Leipzig » ; sometimes simply referred as the « Gewandhausorchester ») is a German Symphony Orchestra based in Leipzig. The Orchestra is named after the concert-hall in which it is based, the « Gewandhaus » (Cloth Hall or Textile Hall) .

The Orchestra's origins can be traced to 1743, when a Society called the « Großes Concert » began performing in private homes. In 1744, the « Großes Concert » moved its concerts to the « 3 Swans » Tavern. Their concerts continued at this venue for 36 years, until 1781. In 1780, because of complaints about concert conditions and audience behavior in the tavern, the mayor and city council of Leipzig offered to renovate one story of the « Gewandhaus » (the building used by textile merchants) for the Orchestra's use. The motto « Res severa (est) verum gaudium » (A serious concern is true pleasure » , or « True pleasure is a serious business » written by the Roman author, Seneca) was painted in the hall, suggesting the priorities of the sponsors. The Orchestra gave its 1st concert in the « Gewandhaus » , in 1781. The Orchestra, thus, has a good claim to being the oldest continuing Orchestra in Germany founded by the bourgeoisie, while older Orchestras were part of Royal suites.

In 1835, Felix Mendelssohn became the Orchestra's music-director, with the traditional title of « Gewandhauskapellmeister » , and held the position with only 1 year's interruption, until his death in 1847. In 1885, the Orchestra moved into a new hall. It was destroyed by bombing, in 1944. The present « Gewandhaus » is the 3rd building with the name. It was opened in 1981. The large organ in the hall bears the original « Gewandhaus » hall's motto : « Res severa (est) verum gaudium » .

Aside from its concert duties, the Orchestra also performs frequently in the Leipzig « Thomaskirche » , as the official Opera Orchestra of the city.

Later, principal conductors included Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Bruno Walter, and Václav Neumann. From 1970 to 1996, Kurt Masur was « Gewandhauskapellmeister » , and he and the Orchestra made a number of recordings for the « Philips » label. From 1998 to 2005, Herbert Blomstedt held the same position and they, in turn, made several recordings for the « Decca » label. Masur and Blomstedt each currently hold the title of « conductor laureate » with the Orchestra.

In 2005, Riccardo Chailly took-over as both « Gewandhauskapellmeister » and music-director of the Leipzig Opera, with an initial contract through 2010. In 2008, Chailly's 1st contract extension occurred, through 2015. However, he concurrently resigned as « Generalmusikdirektor » of the « Oper » , reportedly after conflict over the hiring of personnel without his consultation. In June 2013, the « Gewandhausorchester » further extended Chailly's contract through 2020. They have released recordings on the « Decca » label of Felix Mendelssohn, Johannes Brahms, the Robert Schumann Symphonies in the re-orchestrations by Gustav Mahler, and the Beethoven Symphonies.

...

The earliest roots of the Orchestra can be traced back to the year 1479, in which the City Council 1st appointed 3 musicians (« Kunstpfeifer » : artistic pipers) as municipal employees. This small ensemble remained in civic service until 1840, by which time their number had increased to 7. The musicians played a central role in Leipzig's cultural life, performing at functions in the City Hall, providing the musical accompaniment for services in the city's churches and participating in theatre productions, as well as forming a part of the Orchestra of the « Großes Concert » .

This concert enterprise was founded in 1743 by a Society comprising both nobility and regular citizens alike - the 1st venture of its kind in Leipzig. The original « Große Musicalische Concerte » were held in the more spacious of homes of Leipzig society. The concerts' popularity soon, however, necessitated the hire of a hall in the hostelry - « Zu den drei Schwanen » . For over 30 years, this inn played host to those citizens of Leipzig who could afford the Society's substantial annual membership fee, from which the musicians were remunerated. The original Orchestra comprised 16 musicians, half of whom were professionals (the « Kunstpfeifer ») , half students of the city's University.

The year 1766 saw the opening of the « Komödienhaus » (Comedy Theatre) . This theatre employed no musicians and ensemble of its own, rather hosting itinerant theatrical and Operatic troupes, for which the « Leipziger Stadtmusiker » were engaged as Orchestra. As time passed and the demands of the theatrical productions increased, the Orchestra was to be ever more frequently bolstered by the musicians of the « Großes Concert » . So began the gradual symbiosis of Leipzig's concert and theatre Orchestras.

At this time, the « Gewandhaus » , the trading house of the city's textile merchants, had no use for a substantial part of the upper-floor of the building. On the initiative of the Mayor, this space was converted into a concert-hall. In November 1781, the 1st « Gewandhauskonzert » took place. The audience consisted of the members of the Society which had promoted the concerts in the inn ; the 32 man Orchestra comprised the musicians who had given the « Großes Concert » , the majority of whom were, by this time, also employed regularly by the theatre. The Orchestra of these « Gewandhaus » Concerts, therefore, soon came to be known as the « Gewandhaus and Theatre Orchestra » .

In 1786, the musicians of the « Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester » signed a reciprocal agreement, in which the organisational, disciplinal and artistic affairs of the Orchestra were ordered, as well as the founding of a pension fund for the members. This constitution included, for instance, measures to ensure the « good reputation of the Orchestra »

, as well as the communal pledge « to stand, all for one and one for all » . This solidarity contract can be regarded as the genesis of the Orchestra as an independent body.

In 1789, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart travelled to Leipzig, in order to give a concert in the « Gewandhaus » . The hall was, by this time, well-established as the centre of Leipzig's concert life and would remain so for the subsequent 100 years.

Ludwig van Beethoven's 5th Piano Concerto received, in 1811, its 1st performance in the « Gewandhaus » and the 1st complete cycle of his Symphonies world-wide was to follow in the 1825-1826 season - during the composer's lifetime.

Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy's celebrated tenure as « Gewandhauskapellmeister » (conductor and music-director of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra) began in 1835. His « Scottish Symphony » and Violin Concerto in E minor were both premiered in the « Gewandhaus » . Mendelssohn conducted the 1st performances of the Symphonies of Robert Schumann and Franz Schubert's « Great » Symphony in C major.

In later years, both Richard Wagner's « Meistersinger » Prelude and Johannes Brahms' Violin Concerto were 1st presented to the world in the « Gewandhaus » , conducted in both cases by the composers themselves.

This period saw the development of the « Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester » 's additional role as Orchestra of the city's churches. The musical provision for the services held in Leipzig's 2 principal churches, Saint-Thomas and Saint-Nicolai, was the responsibility of the « Thomaskantor » (Cantor of Saint-Thomas's) , who also embodied the position of Civic Music Director. The « Thomanerchor » (Saint-Thomas's Choir) sang in both churches, accompanied by the « Stadtmusiker » . Here too, however, were the musical demands to increase ; from 1789, the City Musicians were augmented by 7 members of the « Gewandhaus » and Theatre Orchestra. During the following years, members of the Orchestra became increasingly involved in the realisation of the churches' musical requirements until, in 1840, the « Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester » was officially declared the « civic Orchestra » by the City Council. The performance of sacred music has, since this time, formed a staple part of the Orchestra's duties.

In 1868, a new Opera House was opened in Leipzig. This theatre was able to accommodate significantly more ambitious, more elaborate stagings than the erstwhile « Komödienhaus » (remodelled as « City Theatre » , in 1817) . At this time, the « Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester » numbered 58 musicians, a strength which was not sufficient, 1stly, to satisfy the orchestral requirements of the larger-scale Operas now being staged and, 2ndly, to fulfil these increased duties adequately in addition to its Symphonic commitments in the « Gewandhaus » . The ensuing conflict between the theatre and the « Gewandhaus » managements was resolved by the City Council's decision to augment the Orchestra to a total of 72 players.

As time passed and the 19th Century ran its course, the concert-hall in the « Gewandhaus » became increasingly unable to cope with the demands placed upon it by the Orchestra's steadily burgeoning public. Following several measures over the years to increase the audience capacity, the management of the « Gewandhaus » eventually bowed to the necessity of erecting a new concert-hall. Following 2 and a half years construction, the « New Gewandhaus » was inaugurated in December 1884.

The « Neues Gewandhaus » witnessed the tenures of Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter, among others, as « Gewandhauskapellmeister », as well as playing host to the likes of Johannes Brahms, Piotr Ilich Tchaïkovsky, Edvard Grieg and Richard Strauß conducting their own works. Anton Bruckner graced the « New Gewandhaus » with an organ recital. The new hall was also the scene of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra's 1st audio and film recordings.

The « Gewandhausorchester » undertook its 1st foreign tour during, of all times, the First World War. Prior to this, the « Gewandhaus » directorate had been thoroughly opposed to such ventures, « due to the risk that our illustrious Orchestra, which has, heretofore, served only noble causes, could descend to depths, such as those occupied by a Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin with its commercial undertakings. Should the Orchestra members begin to travel, they will very well take to the variety this affords and demand its recurrence. » On receiving an invitation from Switzerland, in 1916, however, the City Council and « Gewandhaus » approved the enterprise, « on the grounds that it represents an artistic cultural mission of great significance » . 2 further visits to Switzerland were to follow before the colossal undertaking of a 1st extensive tour of Europe, in 1931. The political developments of the ensuing years were, sadly, to prevent the Orchestra capitalising on its newly-established reputation beyond Germany's borders. The « Gewandhausorchester » would have to wait until 1951 to represent Leipzig abroad anew.

Both the « Neues Theater » and the « Neues Gewandhaus » had been destroyed by bombing during the War. Since the cessation of hostilities in Europe, in 1945, Opera performances and concerts had taken place in temporary, sometimes somewhat makeshift locations in Leipzig.

Following the opening of the city's new Opera House, in 1960, Leipzig would have to wait a further 2 decades for the construction of a new concert-hall for the « Gewandhausorchester » . The « New Gewandhaus » (named, as its predecessor, « Neues Gewandhaus ») opened its doors to the public in 1981 - the only dedicated concert-hall to be built in the former communist East Germany. Overwhelming credit for the realisation and success of the project must be given to the « Gewandhauskapellmeister » of the day, Kurt Masur.

Masur's successor, Herbert Blomstedt, led the Orchestra (now numbering 185 musicians) into the 21st Century, before handing the baton on to Riccardo Chailly.

Much has changed in Leipzig during the past decades - one thing, however, remains constant : the « Gewandhausorchester » performs in the « Gewandhaus », in the Leipzig Opera and, together with the « Thomanerchor », in Saint-Thomas's Church. The combination of Symphonic, Operatic and sacred repertoire continues to imbue the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra with an artistic profile of unparalleled diversity and richness.

...

Both Dresden and Leipzig, Saxony's leading cities, claim to have Europe's oldest permanent Orchestra, although Norway insists on Bergen's « Harmonien » being the oldest. While both German cities had municipal music as far back as the 16th Century, the « Dresdner Staatskapelle » (created in 1548 as a Court Orchestra) can claim an unbroken history. Dresden was principally an Operatic center, however, whereas Leipzig specialized in choral and instrumental music, the latter led by Concert Masters. Only vocal music, secular or sacred, had « conductors » . Local partisans insist the « Collegium Musicum » , founded by Georg Philipp Telemann and extended by his successor, Johann Sebastian Bach, was father of the Orchestra that played its 1st concert, on March 11, 1743, in the « Gewandhaus » (a garment mart) although it didn't become the « Gewandhausorchester » officially until 1781. Notable Concert Masters included Bartolomeo Campagnoli and Karl Matthäi, who presided consecutively from 1797 to 1835, when Mendelssohn was named « Dirigent » .

He was the 1st conductor to use a baton, to lead both choral and concert music, and to double the size of the Orchestra (salaries, too) . His 1841 revival of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » was the corner-stone of a Bach renaissance. Mendelssohn also sponsored contemporary music - the world-premieres of 3 Symphonies by his friend Robert Schumann plus « Das Paradies und die Peri » ; Franz Schubert's long-lost 9th Symphony, his own « Scottish Symphony » and Violin Concerto. He invited Franz Liszt and Hector Berlioz as guest-conductors (despite his dislike of the latter's « Symphonie fantastique ») . Mendelssohn's premature death, however, in 1847, precipitated a crisis. Julius Rietz, newly-appointed by the Leipzig Opera, was deputized (with Niels Gade and Concert Master Ferdinand David to assist) , but continued at the Opera until double duty exhausted him in 1854. By then, Leipzig had commissioned a statue of Mendelssohn, unveiled in front of the « New Gewandhaus » he had inaugurated in 1840. The Nazis removed this, in 1936, but the concert-hall survived until Allied bombs destroyed it in 1943 and 1944.

In 1860, Carl Reinecke followed Rietz for 35 conservative years, although he was devoted to Johannes Brahms, and invited Richard Wagner, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky, Edvard Grieg, and Richard Strauß to guest-conduct their works. His successor, in 1895, was Artur Nikisch, one of the world's leading conductors (along with Gustav Mahler and Arturo Toscanini) , who also accepted leadership of the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1897. He continued to conduct both Orchestras until his death in 1922, when Wilhelm Furtwängler followed, likewise in Berlin as well as Leipzig (where Charles Munch was Concert Master, from 1926 to 1932) . However, after 7 years, he left the « Gewandhaus » to become a permanent guest-conductor in Vienna.

By then, the Orchestra numbered 100, double the size of Mendelssohn's, which welcomed Bruno Walter as their new conductor. However, he was a Jew, so the Nazis forced his resignation in 1933 and installed Hermann Abendroth, who became conductor in 1934 and continued until the War disrupted musical life.

Herbert Albert took-over for 3 post-War seasons (1946-1949) before Franz Konwitschny rebuilt the Orchestra, then playing in the great hall of the zoo that was later remodeled as a congress hall. He remained music-director until his death, in 1962 (while rehearsing in Belgrade) . Before Kurt Masur came in 1970, Leipzig had 2 more leaders : the Czech Václav Neumann (1964-1968) ; and Heinz Bongartz from Dresden.

During Masur's 27 year tenure, Leipzig built a 3rd « Gewandhaus » (with 2 concert chambers, the larger one seating 1,900) , which opened on October 4, 1981. Although Masur became music-director of the New York Philharmonic, in 1991, he stayed with Leipzig until 1997-1998, then handed the baton to Herbert Blomstedt. In 2005, Riccardo Chailly became the « Gewandhauskapellmeister » and music-director.

Das Gewandhausorchester : Von der Kapelle zur Weltmarke

Im Grunde genommen begann die Geschichte des Gewandhausorchesters bereits 1479. In diesem Jahr nahm der Leipziger Magistrat drei sogenannte Kunstpfeifer in städtische Dienste. Bis 1840 spielten diese Stadtmusiker (ihre Zahl wuchs im Laufe der Zeit auf sieben) für das Leipziger Musikleben eine wesentliche Rolle : Sie gestalteten Feste im Rathaus ebenso wie Gottesdienste in den städtischen Kirchen musikalisch aus, wirkten bei Theaterunternehmungen mit und waren auch im Orchester des « Großen Concerts » zu finden.

Die Kapelle des Großen Concerts : Ein halbes Studentenorchester

Diese Konzertunternehmung, 1743 gegründet, wurde von einer aus Adligen und Bürgern bestehenden Gesellschaft getragen. Sie war die erste ihrer Art in Leipzig. Die von ihr veranstalteten « Großen Musicalischen Concerte » fanden zuerst in Bürgerhäusern statt. Aufgrund des großen Zuspruchs wurde bald schon ein Saal im Gasthaus « Zu den drei Schwanen » gemietet. Hier trafen sich über 30 Jahre lang diejenigen Leipziger Bürger, die den hohen Jahresbeitrag zahlen konnten. Von dem Geld wurden die Musiker honoriert. Am Anfang waren es 16, die das Konzertorchester bildeten. Ihm gehörten zur einen Hälfte Berufsmusiker, unter ihnen die Stadtmusiker, und zur anderen Hälfte Studenten der Leipziger Universität an.

Nicht weit von den « Drei Schwanen » entfernt wurde 1766 ein Komödienhaus eröffnet. Allerdings hatte es kein eigenes Ensemble. Es wurde von reisenden Theater- und Operntruppen bespielt, die für die orchestralen Aufgaben die Leipziger Stadtmusiker verpflichteten. Deren kleines Ensemble bekam im Laufe der Jahre jedoch Probleme, den wachsenden musikalischen Anforderungen gerecht zu werden. Deshalb wurden immer öfter Musiker des « Großen Concerts » gebeten, das Theaterorchester zu verstärken. So vermischten sich nach und nach das Konzert- und das Theaterorchester.

Das Orchester wird namhaft : Pate steht das Haus der Tuchmacher

Im Gewandhaus, der Gewerbehalle der Tuchmacher, gab es zu dieser Zeit einen großen, ungenutzten Dachboden. Auf Initiative eines Bürgermeisters wurde er als Konzertsaal ausgebaut. Im November 1781 fand das erste « Gewandhauskonzert » statt. Im Publikum saß die Konzertgesellschaft aus dem Gasthaus, und im 32 Mann starken Orchester spielten die Musiker, die schon in den « Drei-Schwanen-Konzerten » mitgewirkt hatten und deren überwiegender Teil auch beim Theater engagiert war. Daher war bald vom « Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester » die Rede.

1789 kam Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart nach Leipzig und gab ein Konzert im Gewandhaus. Dessen Saal war längst zum Zentrum des Leipziger Konzertlebens geworden und sollte es ein Jahrhundertlang bleiben. Die neun Sinfonien Ludwig van Beethovens erklangen weltweit erstmalig als Zyklus im Konzertwinter 1825-1826, also noch zu Lebzeiten des Komponisten. Ab 1835 war Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Gewandhauskapellmeister. Seine « Schottische Sinfonie » und sein Violinkonzert e-Moll wurden im Gewandhaus aus der Taufe gehoben. Unter seiner Leitung kamen Robert Schumanns Sinfonien und Franz Schuberts große C-Dur Sinfonie zur Uraufführung. Von den Komponisten selbst dirigiert, hatten 1862 Richard Wagners « Meistersinger » Vorspiel und 1879 Johannes Brahms' Violinkonzert in diesem Saal ihre Weltpremiere.

Nicht mehr nur Theater und Konzert : Das neue Kirchenorchester

In dieser Zeit wuchs das Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester auch in die Rolle als städtisches Kirchenorchester hinein. Die Nikolai- und die Thomaskirche waren die Hauptkirchen der Stadt Leipzig. Die musikalische Ausgestaltung der Gottesdienste in beiden Kirchen verantwortete der Thomaskantor, der zugleich städtischer Musikdirektor war. Die Thomaner sangen in beiden Kirchen, und die Instrumente wurden von den Stadtmusikern gespielt. Aber auch hier wuchsen die musikalischen Anforderungen. So wurden 1789 zusätzlich zu den Stadtmusikern sieben Mitglieder des Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchesters für die Kirchenmusik verpflichtet. In den folgenden Jahren kam es zu weiteren Engagements von Gewandhausmusikern für den Dienst in den Kirchen, bis das Gewandhaus- und Theaterorchester die Stadtmusiker vollständig ablöste und 1840 vom Leipziger Magistrat offiziell als « Stadtorchester » anerkannt wurde. Seit dem gehört die Kirchenmusik zu den festen Aufgaben des Gewandhausorchesters.

Neues Theater, neue Opern, neuer Stress: Das Orchester wächst

1868 wurde ein neues Theaterhaus in Leipzig eröffnet. Hier konnten reicher ausgestattete Opern aufgeführt werden als noch im ehemaligen Komödienhaus, das 1817 zum Stadttheater umgewandelt worden war. Dem inzwischen auf 58 Musiker angewachsenen Orchester brachte der Dienst im Neuen Theater jedoch eine enorme Belastung. Die großen Opern mußten in mehr Proben als bisher einstudiert und in größerer Besetzung gespielt werden. Das führte zu Streitigkeiten zwischen Orchester und Theaterdirektion. Der Rat der Stadt mußte schlichten. Im Ergebnis wurde das Orchester auf 72 Musiker erweitert.

Unterdessen ging es im Gewandhaus um eine räumliche Erweiterung. Der Konzertsaal war schon mehrmals umgebaut worden, um dem größer werdenden Publikum Platz zu bieten. Als alle Kapazitäten ausgeschöpft waren, entschloß sich die Gewandhausdirektion zum Bau eines neuen Konzerthauses. Es wurde in zweieinhalb Jahren errichtet und im Dezember 1884 eröffnet. In diesem Neuen Gewandhaus wirkten unter anderem Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Furtwängler und Bruno Walter als Gewandhauskapellmeister. Johannes Brahms, Peter Tschaikowski, Edvard Grieg, Richard Strauß und andere Komponisten dirigierten eigene Werke, Anton Bruckner gab hier ein Orgelkonzert. Aus diesem Haus stammen auch die ersten Ton- und Filmaufnahmen mit dem Gewandhausorchester.

Trotz aller Bedenken : Das Orchester geht auf « Concertreise »

Ausgerechnet im Ersten Weltkrieg ging das Orchester erstmals auf Konzerttournee ins Ausland. Zuvor war die Gewandhausdirektion gegen alle auswärtigen Gastspiele, « weil zu fürchten ist, daß unser berühmtes Orchester, das bisher nur edeln Zwecken gedient hat, durch Concertreisen auf den Standpunkt eines philharmonischen Orchesters in Berlin und derartiger Gewerbsunternehmungen herabsinken könnte. Haben die Orchestermitglieder das Herumreisen einmal angefangen, so werden sie Gefallen an der Abwechslung finden und Wiederholung verlangen. » Als das Gewandhausorchester 1916 jedoch in die Schweiz eingeladen wurde, stellten die Stadtoberen und die Gewandhausdirektion « in der Erwägung, daß es sich hier um eine hoch bedeutsame künstlerisch-culturelle Mission handelt » , ihre prinzipiellen Bedenken zurück und genehmigten die Reise. Zwei weitere Schweizfahrten schloßen sich an und 1931 die erste Europatournee. An deren Erfolg anzuknüpfen, ließen die politischen Ereignisse der folgenden Jahre nicht mehr zu.

Alles ändert sich : Das Orchester bleibt sich treu

Erst 1951 konnte das mittlerweile heimatlose Orchester wieder zu einer Konzertreise aufbrechen. Sowohl das Neue Theater als auch das Neue Gewandhaus waren im Zweiten Weltkrieg zerstört worden. Operaufführungen und Konzerte fanden seitdem in provisorischen Spielstätten Leipzigs statt. 1960 wurde das neu errichtete Opernhaus eingeweiht, der Bau eines neuen Konzerthauses dagegen konnte erst wesentlich später realisiert werden : 1981 öffnete die wiederum « Neues Gewandhaus » genannte neue Spielstätte ihre Pforten. Sie war der erste und einzige Konzerthausneubau der DDR. Wesentlichen Anteil an dessen Gelingen hatte der damalige Gewandhauskapellmeister Kurt Masur.

Sein Amtsnachfolger Herbert Blomstedt hat das Orchester, dem heute über 180 Musiker angehören, ins 21. Jahrhundert geführt und dann den Dirigentenstab weitergereicht an Riccardo Chailly. Vieles mag sich im Laufe der zurückliegenden Jahrzehnte in Leipzig geändert haben, eines aber ist geblieben : Das Gewandhausorchester musiziert im Gewandhaus ebenso wie im Opernhaus und gemeinsam mit dem Thomanerchor in der Thomaskirche. Durch Konzert, Musiktheater und Kirchenmusik in verschiedener Weise gefordert, hat sich das Orchester einen weltweit einzigartigen künstlerischen Horizont erworben.

...

1743 : Mit dem ersten « Großen Concert » Gründung des Orchesters.

1781 : Einzug ins Gewandhaus, wovon sich der Name « Gewandhausorchester » ableitet.

1786 : Solidarvertrag der Orchestermusiker.

1840 : Ernennung zum Leipziger Stadtorchester.

1916 : Erste Auslandstournee in die Schweiz.

1931 : Erste Europatournee.

1960 : Erste Japantournee.

1974 : Erste USA-Tournee.

1980 : Erste Südamerikatournee.

2003 : Erste Australientournee.

Die Gewandhauskapellmeister

1781-1785 : Johann Adam Hiller (1. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1785-1810 : Johann Gottfried Schicht (2. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1810-1827 : Johann Philipp Christian Schulz (3. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1827-1835 : Christian August Pohlenz (4. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1835-1847 : Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (5. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1841-1842 - 1852-1854 : Ferdinand David (6. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1843-1844 : Ferdinand Hiller (7. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1844-1848 : Niels Wilhelm Gade (8. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1848-1860 : Julius Rietz (9. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1860-1895 : Carl Reinecke (10. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1895-1922 : Arthur Nikisch (11. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1922-1928 : Wilhelm Furtwängler (12. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1929-1933 : Bruno Walter (13. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1934-1945 : Hermann Abendroth (14. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1946-1948 : Herbert Albert (15. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1949-1962 : Franz Konwitschny (16. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1964-1968 : Václav Neumann (17. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1970-1996 : Kurt Masur (18. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

1998-2005 : Herbert Blomstedt (19. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

2005-2016 : Riccardo Chailly (20. Gewandhauskapellmeister) .

Les édifices du « Gewandhaus »

Le « Gewandhaus » est une célèbre salle de concert de Leipzig qui abrite l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig, ainsi que 2 chœurs et diverses formations de musique de chambre. La 1^{re} salle de concert a été construite en 1781 par Johann Carl Friedrich Dauthe à l'intérieur du « Gewandhaus », édifice bâti pour les marchands de tissus. Le 2^e est érigé selon les plans de Martin Gropius dans un style néo-Classique. Il ouvre ses portes le 11 décembre 1884 et comporte une grande salle de concert et une petite salle de musique de chambre. Il est détruit par 2 bombardements alliés entre 1943 et 1944. Le 3^e édifice sur la « Augustusplatz » est inauguré le 8 octobre 1981, pour le bicentenaire de la fondation du « Gewandhaus » .

Des concerts historiques y sont donnés, notamment ceux dirigés par Felix Mendelssohn, directeur de l'Orchestre.

...

Le « Gewandhaus » (la Maison des habits) est l'une des plus célèbres salles de concert au monde. L'« Alte Gewandhaus » a été construite en 1781 par l'architecte Johann Carl Friedrich Dauthe. Le « Neue Gewandhaus » , œuvre de Martin Gropius, inaugurée en 1884, est lourdement endommagée en 1943 puis en 1944 lors des bombardements de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Elle est restée à l'état de ruines jusqu'en 1968, dans l'attente d'être reconstruite à l'identique. La 3^e salle, construite par l'architecte Rudolf Škoda, est inaugurée en 1981. Depuis, le « Gewandhaus » a vu se succéder les plus grands chefs, parmi lesquels Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Niels Gade, Carl Reinecke, Arthur Nikisch, Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Bruno Walter et Hermann Abendroth.

Années d'inauguration des 3 salles : 1781, 1884, 1981.

1^{er} « Gewandhaus »

La salle est construite en 1781. Elle se trouve à l'étage. De plan rectangulaire, elle contient une estrade de 63 mètres carrés, du côté sud pour l'Orchestre. Le public est assis sur des rangées lui faisant face ainsi que sur 2 rangées de côté. Avec la galerie où l'on se tient debout, elle contient 500 places. Les fresques du plafond sont l'œuvre d'Adam Friedrich Öser. La salle est rénovée en 1833, ce qui provoque un scandale, à cause de son nouvel arrangement. Woldemar Neumann refait la décoration l'année suivante. En 1842 et 1872, la salle de concert est ré-aménagée. Elle peut accueillir un millier de personnes. Du côté frontal, on peut lire la phrase du philosophe stoïcien Sénèque, « Res severa (est) verum gaudium » : « Il n'y a de vraie jouissance que dans le sérieux de la chose » (ou plus littéralement : « La chose sévère - sérieuse, rigoureuse - est la vraie joie » ; ou encore : « La vraie joie est une chose sérieuse ») . Cette phrase a été reproduite dans le « Gewandhaus » actuel.

2^e « Gewandhaus »

Le bâtiment du « Gewandhaus » , édition de 1884, sera victime des bombardements alliés le 20 février 1944. Mais on va réussir à sauver le buste de marbre de Bruckner (le 1^{er} présent en sol allemand) , exécuté en 1931 par le peintre, graveur, sculpteur et poète allemand Fritz Zalisz (né le 17 octobre 1893 à Gera et décédé le 13 décembre 1971 à Holzhausen) . Il s'agit d'une commande du docteur Theodor Armbruster. Il se trouve aujourd'hui en montre au moderne « Gewandhaus » .

Lorsque le nouveau « Gewandhaus » est construit, en 1884, la salle est appelée « Alte Gewandhaus » ; l'édifice est partiellement détruit en 1893-1896, pour y construire la chambre de commerce de la ville (« Städtisches Kaufhaus ») .

Le nouvel édifice de style néo-Classique est construit en 1884 à l'intersection des rues Beethoven et Grassi, au sud-ouest de la ville. Il est construit par Heino Schmieden, selon les plans de Martin Gropius, et en grande partie financé par le testament du riche entrepreneur Franz Dominic Grassi. Il est inauguré le 11 décembre 1884. La salle contient 1,700 places et la petite salle de musique de chambre, 650 places. Le décor de sculptures est l'œuvre d'Otto Lessing.

En novembre 1936, les nouvelles autorités nationales-socialistes font détruire la statue de Felix Mendelssohn, érigée devant l'édifice en 1892. Le « Gewandhaus » est partiellement détruit par un bombardement allié, dans la nuit du 3 au 4 décembre 1943, et la toiture disparaît dans un bombardement, le 20 février 1944. Les ruines du « Gewandhaus » ne disparaissent qu'en 1968, pour laisser place à un stationnement, jusqu'en 2002. Entretemps, l'Orchestre joue au Cinéma « Kapitol » de la « Petersstraße », en 1944 et 1945 ; puis, de 1946 à 1981, au « Kongreßhalle am Zoo » .

3e « Gewandhaus »

La Ire pierre du 3e « Gewandhaus » est posée en 1977 par le directeur musical Kurt Masur. Le nouveau bâtiment est achevé en 1981 sur la « Augustusplatz » (appelée, à l'époque, la « Karl-Marx-Platz ») à l'emplacement de l'ancien Musée des Beaux-arts de Leipzig, détruit lui-aussi. Il est de style brutaliste, en vogue à l'époque dans les pays du bloc communiste. Sighard Gille est chargé de peindre dans le foyer une immense fresque, la plus grande d'Europe, intitulée « Gesang vom Leben » (Chant de la vie) ; elle mesure 714 mètres carrés pour une hauteur de 31,80 mètres. D'autres fresques sont réalisées par Wolfgang Pecker.

La grande salle contient 1,900 places avec une acoustique remarquable. Le concert inaugural, dirigé par Kurt Masur, est donné le 8 octobre 1981 avec les « Chants » de Siegfried Thiele et la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven. La petite salle contient 497 places ; elle est ré-aménagée en 1997 et baptisée « salle Mendelssohn » .

Le compositeur Anton Bruckner fera aussi partie d'une peinture de Frank Riddigkeit, intitulée : « Musik und Zeit » (La musique et le temps, 1980-1981) . Le peintre, graveur et artiste de livre résidant à Leipzig Frank Riddigkeit est né le 19 août 1939 à Grenzberg, en Prusse orientale (aujourd'hui, Pridoroschnoje) .

...

Es kommt vor, daß Leipzig-Besucher vor dem Konzerthaus am Augustusplatz stehen und sich verwirrt fragen : Das soll das jahrhundertealte Leipziger Gewandhaus sein ? In diesem « Haus mit Mütze » , wie Václav Neumann spöttelte, sollen Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, Arthur Nikisch und Wilhelm Furtwängler dirigiert haben ?

Nein, haben sie nicht. Vielmehr standen sie in zwei anderen Leipziger Gewandhäusern am Dirigentenpult : Mendelssohn im Gewandhaus an der Universitätsstraße, Nikisch und Furtwängler im Neuen Gewandhaus an der Beethovenstraße. Das Haus am Augustusplatz ist also bereits das dritte Leipziger Gewandhaus, das allerdings wie schon das zweite mit dem namengebenden Zweck nichts mehr zu tun hat.

Nur das erste Gewandhaus (ein dreiflügliges Gebäude zwischen Gewandgäßchen und Kupfergasse) war tatsächlich Gewerbehalle der Tuchhändler. Daher der Name, was jedoch nur die halbe Wahrheit ist. Denn im Erdgeschoß des Flügels an der Universitätsstraße wurden bis 1828 die stadteigenen Waffen und Rüstungen aufbewahrt, so daß die Leipziger diesen Gebäudeteil das Zeughaus nannten.

In jenem Zeughaus ließ die Stadt den ersten Leipziger Konzertsaal errichten. Keine anderthalb Jahre brauchten die Bauleute, bis hier ab November 1781 die « Großen Concerte » (sie waren 1743 gegründet und bis 1778 im Gasthaus « Zu den drei Schwanen » veranstaltet worden) ihre Fortsetzung fanden.

Die Weitsicht der Konzertdirektion (damals ein ehrenamtlich arbeitendes Gremium Leipziger Bürger) darf man heute noch bewundern : Sie mietete den neuen Saal im Zeughaus, nannte ihre musikalischen Veranstaltungen aber « Concerte im Saale des Gewandhauses » . Ein Coup mit Langzeitwirkung : Nicht als « Zeughaus zu Leipzig » , sondern als « Gewandhaus zu Leipzig » erlangte die Konzertsstätte Bedeutung, und kein « Zeughausorchester » eroberte künstlerischen Rang, sondern das « Gewandhausorchester » .

Zu Rang und Namen trug der Konzertsaal wesentlich bei : Ganz aus Holz, war er in das Obergeschoß des Zeughauses nahezu wie eine Geige in einen Geigenkasten hineingesetzt. So bildete der Saal einen riesigen Resonanzkörper und wirkte selbst wie ein Musikinstrument. 500 Zuhörer fanden in ihm Platz, erlebten Mozarts einziges Leipziger Gastspiel oder Clara Wiecks ersten öffentlichen Auftritt, waren dabei, als Carl Maria von Weber oder Franz Liszt als Pianisten brillierten, sahen Hector Berlioz und Johannes Brahms und Richard Wagner dirigieren und bekamen als Erste Stücke zu hören, die heute in aller Welt berühmt sind : Beethovens fünftes Klavierkonzert zum Beispiel oder Franz Schuberts große C-Dur Sinfonie, Felix Mendelssohns Violinkonzert oder Robert Schumanns « Frühlingssinfonie » .

Kein Wunder, daß die Nachfrage nach diesen Konzerten rasant wuchs. Um weitere Zuhörerplätze zu schaffen, baute man den Konzertsaal mehrmals um - und jedes Mal büßte der Raum ein Stück seines guten Klanges ein.

Um 1860 begannen Überlegungen zur Errichtung eines neuen Konzerthauses. Dabei dachten die Gewandhausdirektoren an einen Platz in bester « Citylage » . Die Stadtregierung aber hatte anderes im Sinn : Ein Konzerthausbau am Stadtrand könnte die Initialzündung für ein neues Stadtviertel sein. Und so geschah es : Das in zweieinhalb Jahren erbaute und im Dezember 1884 eröffnete Neue Gewandhaus (das erste Gebäude des neuen Stadtteils) beflügelte die Entwicklung des entstehenden Leipziger Musikviertels ungemein.

Anders als der alte Gewandhaussaal gehörte das neue Haus nicht der Stadt, sondern der Gewandhausdirektion. Der Große Saal (« ein akustisches Gefäß von offenbar durch Glück und Genie gefundenen besten Maßen ») bot 1.500 und der Kleine Saal 500 Zuhörern Platz. In diesem Haus schlug Anton Bruckner die Orgel, strich Paul Hindemith die Bratsche, griff Igor Strawinsky in die Klaviertasten, dirigierten Brahms, Edvard Grieg, Richard Strauß, Tschaikowski und weitere berühmte Komponisten.

1892 wurde vor dem zweiten Gewandhaus ein Denkmal für Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy enthüllt. 44 Jahre später behaupteten die herrschenden Nationalsozialisten, dieses Denkmal für einen « Vollblutjuden » errege « öffentliches Ärgernis » , und ließen es beseitigen. 1933 hatten sie schon Gewandhauskapellmeister Bruno Walter gleichsam Auftrittsverbot erteilt. Er hatte daraufhin Leipzig für immer verlassen.

Von Bomben getroffen, brannte das Neue Gewandhaus im Februar 1944 aus. Jahre in provisorischen Spielstätten folgten. Ab 1947 fanden die Gewandhauskonzerte in der Kongresshalle am Zoo statt. Über 30 Jahre vergingen, ehe die Stadt Leipzig ein neues Konzerthaus ihr eigen nennen konnte : die wiederum « Neues Gewandhaus » genannte Spielstätte an der Südseite des heutigen Augustusplatzes.

Dieses dritte Gewandhaus ist der einzige Konzerthausneubau der DDR. Die Initiative zu seiner Errichtung ging von Gewandhauskapellmeister Kurt Masur aus, der während der 57-monatigen Bauzeit eng mit dem Architektenteam zusammenarbeitete.

Aushängeschild des dritten Gewandhauses ist das Deckenbild « Gesang vom Leben » des Leipziger Künstlers Sighard Gille. Es erstreckt sich über vier Deckenschrägen und ist die größte zeitgenössische Deckenmalerei Europas. Nachts von Scheinwerfern beleuchtet, strahlt es durch die Glasfront des Hauses auf den Platz hinaus.

Der Große Saal mit amphitheatrischer Sitzanordnung bietet über 1.900 Besuchern und der Mendelssohn-Saal knapp 500 Besuchern Platz. Den Großen Saal krönt die majestätische Orgel der Potsdamer Firma Schuke mit vier Manualen, 92 Registern und 6.845 Pfeifen. Am Orgelprospekt ist der Leitspruch des Gewandhauses angebracht : « Res severa verum gaudium » (wahre Freude ist eine ernste Sache) . Dieser Spruch des römischen Philosophen Lucius Annæus Seneca begleitet das Gewandhaus seit 1781. Im ersten Gewandhaus stand er an der Stirnseite des Konzertsaals, im zweiten Gewandhaus prangte er an der Fassade über dem Haupteingang.

Ungefähr 800 Veranstaltungen verschiedenster Art gibt es jährlich im Gewandhaus. An herausragender Stelle stehen dabei die Sinfoniekonzerte des Gewandhausorchesters wie auch die Gewandhaus-Organikonzerte im Großen Saal. Im Mendelssohn-Saal finden neben der Gewandhaus-Kammermusik Kongresse, Symposien, Vorträge und anderes mehr statt.

Und für die Leipzig-Besucher, die vor dem Konzerthaus am Augustusplatz stehen und sich verwirrt fragen : « Das soll das jahrhundertealte Leipziger Gewandhaus sein ? » , gibt es ein breit gefächertes Angebot an Führungen durch das Haus. Außerdem zeigt im Hauptfoyer, das in der Regel wochentags 10 bis 18 Uhr und samstags 10 bis 14 Uhr geöffnet ist, eine Dauerausstellung die Modelle der drei Gewandhausbauten von 1781, 1884 und 1981 mit begleitenden Texten und Bildern.

...

Das Konzertgebäude Gewandhaus in Leipzig und zwei ebenfalls Gewandhaus genannte Vorgängerbauten an anderer Stelle sind seit 1781 Heimstätte des Gewandhausorchesters. Seit 1998 steht es unter der Intendanz von Gewandhausdirektor Andreas Schulz. Zum Konzerthaus gehören ebenso der Gewandhausorganist, der GewandhausChor sowie der GewandhausKinderchor. Außerdem existieren verschiedene Kammermusikensembles wie beispielsweise das Gewandhaus-Quartett, das Gewandhaus-Bläserquintett und Gewandhaus-Brass-Quintett.

Das Gebäude wurde 1498 in der Leipziger Altstadt im Kupfergäßchen (der heutigen Kupfergasse) als Zeughaus errichtet. Nach der Nutzung des ersten Stockwerks als Messehaus der Tuch- und Wollwarenhändler wurde das ganze Gebäude bald Gewandhaus genannt. Weiterhin befand sich in dem Haus die Leipziger Kupferwaage.

1743 fanden sich in Leipzig sechzehn Kaufleute zusammen, um den Konzertverein « Großes Concert » zu gründen. Er bestand zunächst aus 16 Musikern. Das erste Konzert fand am 11. März 1743 statt. Ab 1744 fanden die Konzerte im Gasthaus « Drey Schwanen » am Brühl statt. Mit dem Umzug in das Messehaus der Tuchwarenhändler (Gewandhaus) im Jahre 1781 erhielt das Orchester den Namen « Gewandhausorchester » .

1780-1781 wurde im Auftrag der Stadt durch Johann Carl Friedrich Dauthe ein Konzertsaal im zweiten Stockwerk des Hauses eingebaut. Auf der Südseite des quaderförmigen Saales befand sich das etwa 63 Quadratmeter große Orchesterpodium. Das Publikum saß auf längs zum Podium ausgerichteten, gegenüberliegenden Sitzreihen, an der Saalrückseite waren die Reihen quer ausgerichtet. Zusammen mit der Galerieebene sowie Stehplätzen bot der Saal bis zu 500 Zuhörern Platz. In ihm erklang erstmals am 25. November 1781 ein Konzert des auf das Jahr 1743 zurückgehenden Orchesters Das neue Konzert. Durch den Einbau des Konzertsaales in die größere Tuchhalle, die beinahe ausschließliche Verwendung von Holz und die Konstruktion auf Holzstützen über dem ehemaligen Tuchboden, so daß ein Resonanzraum um den Saal entstand, kam eine sehr gute Akustik mit relativ kurzer Nachhallzeit zustande. Das Deckengemälde stammte von Adam Friedrich Öser, es fiel 1833 Renovierungsarbeiten zum Opfer. Da diese Renovierung in der Öffentlichkeit zum Skandal führte – unter anderem wurde der Konzertsaal als « Teufelsküche » bewertet - erhielt 1834 der Dresdner Maler und Architekt Woldemar Hermann den Auftrag zur Neudekoration des Konzertsaales. 1842 und 1872 wurde der Konzertsaal erneut renoviert und umgebaut. Nach dem Umbau 1842 konnte der Saal 1.000 Personen aufnehmen.

Die Stirnseite des Saales schmückte ein Spruch Senecas, der zum Leitspruch des Orchesters werden sollte :

« Res severa (est) verum gaudium » (Wahre Freude ist eine ernste Sache.)

Das ursprüngliche Gewandhaus erlebte zahlreiche Uraufführungen bedeutender Werke der klassischen Musik, die heute zum Standardrepertoire des weltweiten Konzertbetriebs gehören. Einer der bedeutenden Kapellmeister des Gewandhausorchesters war Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.

Nach 1884 wurde das Haus Altes Gewandhaus genannt und bis 1886 noch gelegentlich für Konzerte verwendet. Das Gebäude wurde 1893-1896 teilweise abgebrochen, umgebaut und in den Gebäudekomplex Städtisches Kaufhaus einbezogen, wo heute noch eine Gedenkplakette im zweiten Obergeschoß des historischen Treppenhauses an den früheren Eingang zum Gewandhauskonzertsaal erinnert.

Konzerthaus (2. Gewandhaus)

Am 11. Dezember 1884 wurde im Musikviertel südwestlich der Altstadt (Grassistraße / Beethovenstraße) ein Neues Concerthaus eröffnet, das bezugnehmend auf das ursprüngliche Gewandhaus auch häufig als Neues Gewandhaus bezeichnet wurde. Das Gebäude wurde 1882-1884 nach Plänen von Martin Gropius durch Heino Schmieden erbaut ; der Bau wurde durch einen Kredit aus dem Nachlaß von Franz Dominic Grassi finanziert. Das Konzerthaus enthielt einen großen Saal mit 1.700 Plätzen und einen Kammermusiksaal mit 650 Plätzen. Der Leitspruch des Orchesters fand am Giebel des Eingangsportales Platz. Den bauplastischen Schmuck schuf der Berliner Bildhauer Otto Lessing.

Das 2. Gewandhaus war architektonisches Vorbild der 1900 errichteten « Symphony Hall » in Boston, Heimstätte des « Boston Symphony Orchestra », die sich auch beim Konzertsaal an der als akustisches Vorbild geltenden « Schuhkarton » -Form orientierte.

Im November 1936 vernichteten die Nationalsozialisten bei Nacht und Nebel das vor dem Konzerthaus stehende Mendelssohn-Denkmal des Bildhauers Werner Stein (hergestellt von Hermann Heinrich Howaldt, 1892 enthüllt) .

Im Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde das Konzerthaus bei den Luftangriffen auf Leipzig am 4. Dezember 1943 und 20. Februar 1944 schwer beschädigt. Zunächst war nach dem Krieg geplant, das Gebäude wieder aufzubauen. Letztlich wurde aber entschieden, die Reste des Gebäudes abzutragen und ein neues Gebäude an anderer Stelle zu errichten. Ab dem 29. März 1968 wurde die Ruine des Konzerthauses abgerissen. Nach langen Jahren der Nutzung des Geländes als Parkplatz wurde 2002 an dieser Stelle das Geisteswissenschaftliche Zentrum der Universität Leipzig eröffnet.

Nach der Zerstörung des Konzerthauses mußte sich das Gewandhausorchester eine neue Bleibe suchen. Nachdem das Orchester 1944 und 1945 im Kino Capitol spielte, fanden von 1946 bis 1981 die Gewandhauskonzerte in der Kongreßhalle am Zoo statt.

Neues Gewandhaus (3. Gewandhaus)

Das erste Konzert des Gewandhausorchesters unter Leitung von Kurt Masur im neuen Gebäude galt am 7. Oktober 1981 den am Bau des Hauses Beteiligten.

Am 20. Januar 1977 wurde der Grundstein für ein neues Gewandhaus in der Stadtmitte am Karl-Marx-Platz (heute wieder Augustusplatz) gelegt, gegenüber dem Leipziger Opernhaus am ehemaligen Standort des Museums der bildenden Künste. Das Gewandhaus war der erste und einzige Neubau einer reinen Konzerthalle in der DDR - andere Großprojekte in der DDR wurden hingegen als Multifunktionsbauten geplant (meist als « Kulturhaus » , « Kulturpalast » oder « Stadthalle ») . Die Zustimmung des Staatsapparates zu einem Gewandhausneubau wird vor allem dem großen Einsatz des damaligen Gewandhauskapellmeisters Kurt Masur zugeschrieben.

Entwurf und Projekt für das 1981 fertiggestellte Neue Gewandhaus stammen von Rudolf Skoda mit Eberhard Göschel, Volker Sieg und Winfried Sziegoleit ; basierend auf der von Horst Siegel gemeinsam mit Rudolf Skoda erarbeiteten städtebaulich-architektonischen Konzeption (1975-1976) . Oberbauleiter bei diesem außergewöhnlichen Projekt war der Leipziger Bauingenieur Peter Kunze. Sighard Gille schuf 1980-1981 für die Foyers das 714 Quadratmeter große und 31,80 meter hohe Deckengemälde Gesang vom Leben. Es ist das größte Deckengemälde Europas. Unsichtbar für Besucher, weil übermalt und verschalt, befindet sich hier auch ein unvollendeter Wandfries des Malers Wolfgang Peuker.

Der Große Saal mit 1.900 Plätzen besitzt eine ausgezeichnete Akustik, für die die Akustiker Wolfgang Fasold, Helgo Winkler, Hans-Peter Tennhardt und Eberhard Küstner verantwortlich zeichneten. Während des Baus wurde der Saal mehrere Male mit Soldaten der NVA besetzt, um die Akustik bei voller Auslastung zu testen. Der Saal ist mit einer Schuke-Orgel mit 6.638 Pfeifen ausgestattet. Der Orchesterleitspruch « Res severa verum gaudium » befindet sich wiederum im Konzertsaal an der Orgelempore. Ein dem normalen Konzertbesucher verborgen bleibender Ort dieses Leitspruch befindet sich im Treppenaufgang des Dienstbereiches - dort verweist der erste Halbsatz « Res severa » (ernste Sache) auf den Eingang zu den Musiker- und Chorgarderoben, der zweite Teil des Spruches « Verum Gaudium » (wahre Freude) hingegen auf die Kantine des Gewandhauses.

Das Eröffnungskonzert unter der Leitung des damaligen Gewandhauskapellmeisters Kurt Masur fand am 8. Oktober 1981 statt ; auf dem Programm standen Siegfried Thieles Gesänge an die Sonne und Ludwig van Beethovens Sinfonie Nr. 9.

Im Herbst 1989 kam dem Gewandhaus politische Bedeutung zu. Kurt Masur öffnete das Haus für die sogenannten « Gewandhausgespräche » , öffentliche Diskussionsrunden, in denen über die Reformen und die Zukunft der DDR debattiert wurde. Damit wurde das Gewandhaus zu einer Plattform für die politische Opposition der DDR.

Der Kleine Saal mit 498 Plätzen wurde 1997 ebenfalls von Rudolf Skoda zum Mendelssohn-Saal umgebaut ; er wird vor allem für Kammermusik genutzt.

2001 entwarf Peter Kulka den MDR-Kubus, der über eine Brücke direkt mit dem Gewandhaus verbunden ist.

Die 1884 erbaute Walcker-Orgel im Konzerthaus

Für den großen Saal des 1884 errichteten Neuen Konzerthauses baute die Orgelbaufirma E. F. Walcker & Cie. (Ludwigsburg) eine große Konzertorgel. Das Orgelgehäuse bildete mit der Architektur des Konzertsaals eine Einheit, es wurde nach einem Entwurf von Martin Gropius angefertigt. Das Instrument konnte als Opus 432 wenige Tage vor der Eröffnung des Neuen Gewandhauses übergeben werden.

Die Orgel wurde zusammen mit dem Konzerthaus im Zweiten Weltkrieg zerstört.

Uraufführungen

Im 1. Gewandhaus

Ludwig van Beethoven : Klavierkonzert Nr. 5 (1811) .

Franz Schubert : Große Sinfonie in C-Dur (21. März 1839) .

Robert Schumann : Sinfonie Nr. 1 « Frühlingssinfonie » , Opus 38 (31. März 1841) .

Robert Schumann : Sinfonie Nr. 4, Opus 120 (1. Fassung, 1841) .

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy : Sinfonie Nr. 3 « Schottische » (3. März 1842) .

Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy : Violinkonzert in E-Moll, Opus 64 (13. März 1845) .

Robert Schumann : Sinfonie Nr. 2, Opus 61 (5. November 1846) .

Richard Wagner : Vorspiel zu Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg (2. Juni 1862) .

Johannes Brahms : Ein deutsches Requiem (Uraufführung des vollständigen Werkes am 18. Februar 1869) .

Johannes Brahms : Violinkonzert in D-Dur, Opus 77 (1. Januar 1879) .

Im Konzerthaus (2. Gewandhaus)

Max Reger : Violinkonzert in A-Dur, Opus 101 (18. Oktober 1908) .

Max Reger : Klavierkonzert in F-Moll, Opus 114 (15. Dezember 1910) .

Antonín Dvořák : Cellokonzert in A-Dur (komplettiert von Günter Raphael, 24. Oktober 1929) .

Im Neuen Gewandhaus

Alfred Schnittke : Sinfonie Nr. 3 (5. November 1981) .

Siegfried Matthus : Neun sinfonische Intermezzi zu Schillers Ode an die Freude (9. November 2009) .

« Neue Zeitschrift für Musik »

La revue « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (Nouveau Journal de la Musique) , ou NZM, est un magazine de musicologie publié à Leipzig, et créé par Robert Schumann. Son 1er exemplaire sort le 3 avril 1834.

Bien que les Ires publications officielles soient signées Julius Knorr, la plupart des articles dans les Iers numéros proviennent en réalité de Schumann lui-même. En 1835, lorsqu'un nouvel éditeur est trouvé, le nom de Schumann apparaît pour la Ire fois. Dans ses articles, il donne des descriptions complètes de son opinion sur la nouvelle génération de musiciens méritant d'être acclamée, comme c'est le cas pour Frédéric Chopin ou Hector Berlioz.

En juin 1843, les nombreux engagements de Schumann l'obligent à abandonner l'édition du magazine et, en 1844, Franz Brendel devient le nouveau propriétaire et éditeur. La publication la plus célèbre à cette époque reste certainement l'article antisémite de Richard Wagner, « Das Judentum in der Musik » , publié sous le pseudonyme de K. Freigedank (qui signifie en allemand : libre pensée) dans le volume 33, n° 19, de 3 septembre 1850. À la suite de cela, des demandes de démissions furent émises au nom du Conservatoire de Leipzig à l'encontre de Brendel, notamment par Ignaz Moscheles et d'autres enseignants. En effet, l'article de Wagner avait insulté la mémoire de Felix Mendelssohn, le fondateur du Conservatoire. Mais cette affaire n'eut aucun effet, et Brendel continua à éditer jusqu'à sa mort en 1868.

...

« Die Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (New Journal of Music) , or NZM, is a music magazine, co-founded in Leipzig by Robert Schumann, his teacher and future father-in law Friedrich Wieck, and his close friend Ludwig Schuncke. Its 1st issue appeared on 3 April 1834.

Although the 1st editor was Julius Knorr, most of the work on the early issues of the « Neue Zeitschrift » was done by Schumann ; in 1835, when a new publisher was found, Schumann's name appeared as editor. In his reviews, he praised those of the new generation of musicians who deserved acclaim, including Frédéric Chopin and Hector Berlioz. Schuncke wrote some articles under the byline « Jonathan » but died at the age of 23, in December 1834.

In June 1843, Schumann's other commitments made him give-up editorship of the magazine and, in 1844, Franz Brendel became owner and editor. Under his tenure, the most notable piece was Richard Wagner's anti-Jewish article, « Das Judenthum in der Musik » , published under the pseudonym K. Freigedank (Freethought) in volume 33, no. 19, on 3 September 1850. Ignaz Moscheles and other teachers at the Leipzig Conservatory were outraged and called for Brendel's resignation from its board. Wagner's article had insulted the memory of Felix Mendelssohn, the Conservatory's founder - but had little further effect at the time. Later in the 19th Century, it contributed to the rise in anti-Semitism, including criticism of music by Jewish composers who differed in style from Wagner. Brendel continued to edit the magazine until his death, in 1868.

The « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » , under the ægis of Schott Music, continues as a vehicle for writing on music, including Classical, Jazz, Rock, and sound art. Each issue focuses on a particular topic, and includes a variety of essays, CD and book reviews.

...

Die Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (abgekürzt : NZfM) ist eine Zeitschrift, die sich mit zeitgenössischen Strömungen der Musik beschäftigt. Sie erschien erstmals am 3. April 1834 und besteht nahezu ununterbrochen bis heute fort.

Die Neue Zeitschrift für Musik (im ersten Jahr unter dem Titel Neue Leipziger Zeitschrift für Musik) wurde 1834 von Robert Schumann zusammen mit seinem späteren Schwiegervater Friedrich Wieck und den Pianisten Julius Knorr und Ludwig Schuncke gegründet. Da Wieck aber durch seine zahlreichen Reisen nur eingeschränkt mitarbeitete, Knorr durch häufige Krankheiten ausfiel und Schuncke nur wenig schriftstellerisches Talent besaß, fiel beinahe die gesamte Verantwortung auf Schumann. So kam es auch dazu, daß Schumann statt wie geplant zwei Jahre zehn Jahre als Redakteur der NZfM arbeitete, um den Untergang der Zeitschrift zu verhindern. Auch finanzielle Erwägungen waren ausschlaggebend. Am 1. Juli 1844 übergab Schumann die Leitung der Zeitschrift an Oswald Lorenz, der bereits zahlreiche Beiträge unter verschiedenen Pseudonymen verfasst hatte. Franz Brendel kaufte dann die Zeitschrift und war ab 1. Januar 1845 verantwortlicher Redakteur.

Zu Beginn erschien die Zeitschrift zweimal pro Woche. Jede Ausgabe bestand aus einem Bogen, also vier Seiten. Es wurden zwei Spalten je Seite gedruckt. Ab dem ersten Juli 1847 wurde der Umfang auf meist acht Seiten erhöht. Hier gibt es mit Ausnahme des ersten Jahrganges pro Jahr zwei Bände mit je 52 Nummern.

Den Ausgaben wurden literarische Motti vorangestellt. Diese stammten von Literaten wie Shakespeare, Goethe, Jean Paul und Weiteren, konnten aber auch von Schumann selbst sein. Ein größerer Aufsatz über Themen wie Ästhetik, Biographien, Musikgeschichte schloss sich an. Stattdessen war auch eine große Rezension eines oder mehrerer Werke möglich, was sich über mehrere Ausgaben hinzog. Dann folgten die Rezensionen von Musik oder Schriften mit Musikbezug. Schumann legte Wert auf den Korrespondenzteil, in dem über das Musikleben in in- und ausländischen Städten berichtet wurde. Den Abschluß bildete eine Sektion mit Vermischtem und Notizen.

Die NZfM der Anfangszeit wurde von dem teils realen, teils fiktiven Verein von Künstlern und Kunstfreunden, den Davidsbündlern herausgegeben. Beiträge wurden daher unter verschiedensten Pseudonymen verfasst, wobei pro Verfasser bis zu 33 verschiedene Kürzel (Schumann selbst) existierten. Beispielsweise sind die bekanntesten literarischen Pseudonyme Schumanns, Florestan und Eusebius häufig vorhanden. Ein Mitwirkender mit zahlreichen Beiträgen und Kürzeln war Oswald Lorenz, der zeitweise auch Redakteur der NZfM gewesen ist. Ein prominenter Autor im Bereich von Klaviertechnik und -pädagogik war Friedrich Wieck.

In den 1920er Jahren bestimmte Alfred Heuß die Gesichte des Blattes. Er schmiedete die einst dem Fortschritt gewidmete Zeitschrift zu einem reaktionären und nationalistischen Organ um. Oliver Hilmes wies nach, daß Heuß « die Zeitschrift für Musik in der "Weimarer Republik" zu einem Bollwerk gegen die Avantgarde und alles vermeintlich "Undeutsche" führte, daß die Musikideologie im NS-Staat nicht den Beginn, sondern den Gipfelpunkt einer längeren, folgenreichen Entwicklung darstellt. Der Geist, der die Artikel des Monatsblattes zunehmend prägt und besonders an den Rezensionen zeitgenössischer Werke abzulesen ist, beruht nicht auf differenzierter Analyse, sondern greift weitverbreitete Vorurteile auf. Sogenannte "killer-phrases" täuschen vor, die Ursachen komplex empfundener gesellschaftlicher Krisen zu erkennen und zu benennen; tatsächlich tragen die massensuggestiven wirkenden Scheinargumente jedoch zu einer dogmatischen Spaltung in "Gut" und "Böse" bei und richten schließlich in verhängnisvoller Weise über die Existenzberechtigung von Werken und deren Schöpfern. »

1925 bezeichnete Alfred Einstein die NZfM als « das Kampfblatt für deutsche, gegen Neue und Internationale Musik » .

Herausgebende Redakteure und Verleger

Leipzig (1834-1844) . « Im Vereine mit mehreren Künstlern und Kunstfreunden herausgegeben unter Verantwortlichkeit von Robert Schumann. » Erscheint zweimal wöchentlich. (Das letzte von Schumann herausgegebene Heft ist Band 20, Nummer 52 - vom 27. Juni 1844.)

1844, Band 21 (Juli bis Dezember) , Herausgeber : Oswald Lorenz.

Franz Brendel (1845-1868) . Ab 1851 einmal wöchentlich. (Letztes von Brendel herausgegebene Heft : Band 64, Nummer 48 - vom 20. November 1868.)

1850, Heft 19 mit dem Beginn von Richard Wagners Schmähchrift Das Judentum in der Musik und der editorischen Bemerkung von Franz Brendel.

Verantwortungsbewusst Red. und Verlag : C. F. Kahnt (1869-1885) .

(1885?-1920) Verlag Gebrüder Reinecke, Leipzig.

Oskar Schwalm (1886-1888) .

Doktor Paul Simon (1889-1898) .

Edmund Ræhlich in Vertretung (1899-1903) .

Ab 1903 (Band 99, Heft 27 - 1. Juli) in Antiqua gedruckt.

Arnold Schering (1903 bis 1904) .

Arnold Schering und Walter Niemann (1905-1906) .

Walter Niemann (1906) .

Ab 1906, Heft 40 (1. Oktober) unter dem Titel [Leipziger] Vereinigte Musikalische Wochenschriften vereinigt, mit Musikalischem Wochenblatt (K. Kipke) , herausgeber vom Ludwig Frankenstein. 1908-1910 unter dem Titel Musikalisches Wochenblatt.

Seit 1911 wieder unter dem Titel Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, Schriftleitung : Friedrich Brandes.

Seit 1920 herausgeber vom Steingräber-Verlag als Zeitschrift für Musik. Erscheint ab März zweimal monatlich.

Oktober 1921 bis 1930 Herausgeber : Alfred Heuß.

Erscheint ab November 1923 einmal monatlich. Untertitel : « Kampfblatt für deutsche Musik und Musikpflege » .

1925 Untertitel : « Monatsschrift für eine geistige Erneuerung der Musik » .

1929 (Heft 7) - 1943 Ort : Regensburger Verlag : Bosse Herausgeber : Gustav Bosse (bis 1943) . Wird mit lang-s gedruckt.

April 1943 bis August 1944 unter dem Titel : Musik im Kriege, Organ des Amtes Musik beim Beauftragten des Führers für die Überwachung der gesamten geistigen und weltanschaulichen Schulung und Erziehung der NSDAP ; Zugleich amtliche Zeitschrift der Ämter Feierabend und deutsches Volksbildungswerk in der NS-Gemeinschaft « Kraft durch Freude » . Herausgeber : Herbert Gerigk (zusammen mit Melos, Allgemeine Musikzeitung, Die Musik) , dann eingestellt.

Dezember 1949 bis 1955 (Heft 9) als Zeitschrift für Musik, Herausgeber : Erich Valentin (bis 1959) . Verlag : Bosse, Ort : Regensburg. Untertitel : « Monatsschrift für eine stete geistige Erneuerung der Musik » .

1953 inkorporiert : Der Musikstudent.

Seit 1955 Ort : Mainz. Redaktion : Karl H. Wörner (bis 1959) .

Ab Oktober 1955 (Heft 10) wieder Neue Zeitschrift für Musik und inkorporiert : Das Musikleben.

1960-1974 : NZ - Neue Zeitschrift für Musik.

1960 Redaktion : Karl Amadeus Hartmann (bis 1963) , Ernst Thomas.

Ab 1967 Verlag : Schott.

1967 tritt Otto Tomek in die Redaktion ein (bis 1978) .

1972 tritt Carl Dahlhaus in die Redaktion ein (bis 1978) .

1975-1978 Titel : Melos / NZ Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Erscheint sechsmal jährlich. Ernst Thomas, Otto Tomek, Carl Dahlhaus, Hans Esch.

Ab 1979 Titel : Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Chefredakteur Wolfgang Burde.

1982 Erscheint 12-mal jährlich. Redaktion : Harald Budweg (bis 1984) , Manfred Karallus, Michaël Stegemann.

1985 tritt Sigfried Schibli in die Redaktion ein (bis 1992) .

1988 bis 1992 Peter Niklas Wilson, Lotte Thaler.

Seit 1993 sechsmal jährlich. Redaktion : Rolf W. Stoll

Bekannte Korrespondenten

Hugo Riemann seit 1872, Pseudonym Hugibert Ries.

August Wilhelm Ambros, Pseudonym Flamin.

Hans von Bülow.

Karl Ferdinand Becker.

Karl Banck.

Joachim Raff.

Die Neue Zeitschrift für Musik heute

Die Zeitschrift widmet sich den zeitgenössischen Strömungen - vor allem der neuen Musik, dem avancierten Jazz, der Klangkunst und dem Pop, aber auch historischen Erscheinungsformen von Musik. Sie hat jeweils ein Schwerpunktthema und enthält darüber hinaus Komponistenporträts, Gespräche mit Protagonisten des zeitgenössischen Musiklebens und analytische Beiträge. In zahlreichen CD-, DVD- und Buchrezensionen werden Neuerscheinungen besprochen und kritisch bewertet.

Zum Portfolio der Zeitschrift gehört und andere die edition neue zeitschrift für musik, eine Buchreihe mit Sach- und Komponisten-Bänden sowie die DVD-Reihe « musica viva - forum der gegenwartsmusik mit Komponisten- und Werkporträts » .

Le tuba wagnérien

Le tuba wagnérien est un instrument de musique à vent de la famille des cuivres. Il est également appelé « tuben » et parfois, à tort, car il s'agit d'un autre instrument, « saxotromba » .

Le tuba wagnérien (en allemand : « Wagnertuba » ; au pluriel, « Tuben ») a été inventé en 1876 par Adolphe Sax, à la demande de Richard Wagner qui voulait un instrument ayant une sonorité entre le cor d'harmonie et le saxhorn. Il a été à l'origine créé pour la « Tétralogie » de Richard Wagner « l'Anneau du Nibelung » . Depuis lors, d'autres compositeurs ont écrit pour cet instrument, notamment Anton Bruckner, dont le 2e mouvement de la 7e Symphonie commence par un chœur de tubas wagnériens en hommage à Wagner.

Wagner a été inspiré pour inventer cet instrument après un bref déplacement à Paris, en 1853, après avoir visité le magasin d'Adolphe Sax dans lequel il a notamment découvert le « saxotromba » , inventé quelques années plus tôt. Wagner a voulu un instrument qui pourrait entonner le motif du « Walhalla » comme un trombone, mais avec un son moins clair, comme celui d'un cor. Cet effet a été obtenu par une perce conique (comme un cor) et l'utilisation d'une embouchure de cor. Ces instruments sont, en fait, composés des tuyaux d'un cor, mais enroulés à la façon d'un tuba pour obtenir un son plus direct. L'instrument est construit avec des palettes jouée avec la main gauche, comme sur le cor.

Il existe en 2 tessitures :

le « tuben » en mi bémol.

Le « basstuben » en si bémol.

Sax aurait lui-même donné le nom de tuba wagnérien à son instrument, bien que cette appellation soit peu représentative de l'instrument qui provient plutôt d'une déformation du cor que du tuba. Cet instrument est d'ailleurs joué par les cornistes (qui actionnent les palettes de la main gauche) , et non par les tubistes (qui jouent de la main droite) .

Le tuba wagnérien existait à l'origine dans 2 modèles, le ténor en si bémol et le basse en fa, avec une tessiture comparable à celle du cor, l'un étant spécialisé dans l'aigu, l'autre dans le grave. Plusieurs facteurs du XXe siècle ont, cependant, combiné les 2 instruments dans un tuba wagnerien double en fa - si bémol ou ut grave - fa. Le tuba wagnérien est normalement écrit en si bémol pour les aigus et en fa pour les graves mais la notation utilisée varie et est une source de confusion (Wagner lui-même a utilisé 3 notations différentes au cours de « l'Anneau » et les 3 ont été utilisées par des compositeurs ultérieurs. Une source supplémentaire de confusion provient du fait que cet instrument est quelquefois utilisé simplement comme un tuba.

Le son du tuba wagnérien est plus sombre que celui du cor et semble plus éloigné mais aussi plus dense. Bruckner l'utilise généralement pour des passages mélodiques. Dans ses 8e et 9e Symphonies, 4 « Tuben » sont joués par des cornistes qui alternent entre le cor et le tuba wagnérien. Wagner utilise la même procédure dans « l'Anneau ». Ce changement est simplifié par le fait que le cor et le tuba wagnérien utilisent la même embouchure, mais n'en reste pas moins périlleux. L'avantage de cet instrument, par rapport au cor, est qu'il peut jouer fort sans « cuivrer » et garder ainsi l'emprunte sonore du cor dans les « tutti » joués « forte » .

L'emplacement sur la partition orchestrale des tubas wagnériens peut varier. S'ils sont joués par des musiciens qui jouent aussi du cor, leurs parties sont sous ceux des cors et au-dessus des trompettes. S'ils sont joués par des musiciens qui ne jouent pas de cor dans la pièce, ils sont situés au-dessous des trombones, au-dessus du tuba, qui est alors appelé « tuba contrebasse » .

Le nom de « tuba wagnérien » est problématique, considéré comme incorrect par beaucoup de théoriciens. Kent Kennan dit qu'ils ne devraient pas être appelés « tubas » :

« Ce sont réellement des cors modifiés. »

Mais puisqu'ils ont été appelés « tubas wagnériens » si longtemps, un changement de nom est peu probable.

D'autres compositeurs ont écrit pour cet instrument notamment : Béla Bartók ; Alec Wilder ; Stephen Caudel ; Andrew Downes ; Felix Dræseke ; Alexander Kaloian ; Elisabeth Lutyens ; Michaël Nyman ; Ragnar Söderlind ; Arnold Schœnberg ; Richard Strauß ; Igor Stravinsky ; Edgard Varèse ; Esa-Pekka Salonen ; et Sofia Gubaidulina.

...

The Wagner tuba is an infrequently-used brass instrument that combines tonal elements of both the French horn and the trombone. Wagner tubas (or « Wagnertuben ») are also referred to as Wagner horns or Bayreuth tubas in English ; and as « Bayreuth-Tuben » or simply « Tuben » in German. The term Wagner tuba has been used in English since the 19th Century and is standard today. Wagner's published scores usually refer to these instruments in the plural, « Tuben » , but sometimes in the singular, « Tuba » .

The Wagner tuba was originally created for Richard Wagner's Operatic cycle « Der Ring des Nibelungen » . Since then, other composers have written for it, most notably Anton Bruckner, in whose Symphony No. 7 a quartet of them is 1st heard in the slow movement in memory of Wagner, and Richard Strauß, who composed several works that used the Wagner tuba, including his « An Alpine Symphony » .

Wagner was inspired to invent the Wagner tuba after a brief visit to Paris, in 1853, when he visited the shop of Adolphe Sax, the inventor of the saxophone and saxhorn. Wagner was initially shown a saxhorn which is similar to the instrument that Wagner ultimately wanted and later had constructed by the C.W. Moritz firm, in Berlin. Wagner wanted an instrument that could produce the noble and somber « Walhalla » motif in « Das Rheingold » like a trombone but with a less incisive tone, like that of a horn.

That Wagner tuba aural effect is obtained by a conical bore (like a horn) and the use of the horn mouthpiece (tapered and conical, as opposed to the parabolic cup mouthpiece such as on a trombone) . The saxhorn had a more cylindrical and larger bore, used the parabolic cupped mouthpiece and, thus, had a more brassy tone that wasn't quite suitable for Wagner's tonal intent.

The Wagner tuba is built with rotary valves, which (like those on the horn) are played with the left-hand. Horn players traditionally double on Wagner tubas because the mouthpiece and fingering are identical.

The Wagner tuba nominally exists in 2 sizes, tenor in B-flat and bass in F, with ranges comparable to those of horns in the same pitches while being less adept at the highest notes. Several 20th Century and, later, manufacturers have, however, combined the 2 instruments into a double Wagner tuba that can easily be configured in either B-flat or F.

Wagner tubas are normally written as transposing instruments, but the notation used varies considerably and is a common source of confusion - Wagner, himself, used 3 different and incompatible notations in the course of the « Ring » , and all 3 of these systems (plus some others) have been used by subsequent composers.

An additional source of confusion is the fact that the instruments are invariably designated in orchestral scores simply as « tubas » , leaving it sometimes unclear as to whether true bass tubas or Wagner tubas are intended (for example, the 2 tenor tubas in Leoš Janáček's « Sinfonietta » are sometimes wrongly assumed to be Wagner tubas when they are euphoniums) .

The name « Wagner tuba » is considered problematic, possibly incorrect, by many theorists. Kent Kennan says they are poorly named since « they are really modified horns » rather than tubas.

The sound of the Wagner tuba is as mellow as that of the horn and sounds more distant, yet, also more focused. Anton Bruckner generally uses them for pensive melodic passages at piano to pianissimo dynamics. They can hold their own in a « forte tutti » but Bruckner generally gives them sustained tones rather than melodic motifs in such passages.

In Bruckner's 8th and 9th Symphonies, the 4 Wagner tubas are played by 4 players who alternate between playing horn and Wagner tuba, which is the same procedure Wagner used in the « Ring » . This change is simplified by the fact that the horn and Wagner tuba use the same mouthpiece and same fingering.

Where on the orchestral score the Wagner tubas are placed depend on who plays them.

The euphonium is often used as a substitute in modern orchestras, but the psycho-acoustical difference between the 2 instruments is so substantial as to be noticeable.

Wagner tubas are typically played by players who are also playing horn. The staves for the Wagner tubas logically go below those of the horns and above the standard tubas.

If they are played by players who are not also playing horn, they are placed below the trombones, above the regular tuba, which is then called a « contrabass tuba » .

These composers have written for the instrument :

Béla Bartók.

Anton Bruckner.

Felix Dræseke.

Jerry Goldsmith.

Esa-Pekka Salonen.

Arnold Schœnberg.

Richard Strauß.

Igor Stravinsky.

Edgard Varèse.

Richard Wagner.

John Williams.

...

It may carry the word « tuba » in its name but this instrument is in fact a horn ; it uses the same mouthpiece as a horn and is played by traditional horn players.

The Wagner Tuba is generally used as an alternate doubling instrument to the horn and played as part of a quartet, comprising a pair of tenor tubas (played by 5th and 6th horns) and a pair of bass tubas (played by 7th and 8th horns) . It's because of this doubling and quartet performance combined with the fact that there are few works written to include the instrument, that most horn players do not have a Wagner Tuba of their own.

Usually, Orchestras, Music Colleges, Opera Houses, etc. , purchase 4 Wagner Tubas as a set for use as and when required.

It was in the mid 19th Century that instrument maker Adolphe Sax produced the instrument, demonstrating it to German composer Richard Wagner when they met (around 1853) . Wagner was struck by the horn's rich sound and soon began to incorporate it into his orchestral composition.

At the time he met Sax, he had just begun work on « Das Rheingold » and it is in the opening of Scene 2 where we find him using the instrument to announce the « Walhalla » theme. Indeed, « the Ring » became the 1st major orchestral work to feature the instrument and Wagner had a set of 4 built specifically, having written for a quartet in 2 pairs : B-flat (tenor) and F (bass) . Hence, why it became known as the Wagner Tuba.

Evolution, Physics and Usage of the Wagner Tuba

The evolution of the tuba in the 19th Century begins with the ophicleide. This instrument, inspired by a keyed bugle, was invented in 1817. (Baines, page 198.) It was an improvement on the Serpent, a brass-type instrument from the end of the 18th Century. Variants of the ophicleide remain in use today, such as the Russian bassoon. But this instrument is best remembered as an ancestor to the tuba.

After the invention of valves, brass was changed forever. Keyed instruments have weaker sounds when they keys are opened, but a valved instrument is strong on every note. After the invention and improvement in valves, the ophicleide was modified into the Bombardon. It still retains the ophicleide shape. Unlike the ophicleid, keyed in B-flat, the majority of bombardons « are in tuba pitch F » and are « up to 145 centimeters tall with valve bore reaching 18 millimeters » . (Baines, page 250) The instrument as a whole is very close in profile and shape to it's predecessor.

While the bombardons were still a relatively new invention, Moritz and Wieprecht produced the 1st tuba. This horn was also keyed in F, and had an unusual valve arrangement. (Baines, page 250.) Most modern tubas follow the trumpet, where the 1st valve lowers by a whole step ; the 2nd a half step ; and the 3rd is equal to 1st 2 added together. On the 1st tuba, « the 1st and 2nd valves, for the left-hand, lowered by a tone and a semi-tone. The 3 for the right-hand provided : a large tone, to make an exact 2 tones with the 1st valve ; large semi-tone, to make an exact tone and a half with the 1st valve ; and a perfect 4th » . (Baines, page 250.) Although some argue that this is a more useful valve arrangement, it soon was replaced with the one we are more familiar with.

The tuba, thus introduced, continues to evolve to this day. But, in the 19th Century, several people tried modifications to the tuba, with varying degrees of success, which no longer survive in regular uses. One of these people was Adolphe Sax. Sax did not primarily work on the tuba. His plan was to integrate the wildly divergent band instruments of the time into a single family of Saxhorns. These Tuba-influenced instruments (tenor and bass members) are narrower in bore than generally found on modern tuba. As his ideas were more of unification than modification, especially among the tenor and tuba size instruments, his changes did not significantly alter the sound or structure of the bass instrument. However, all of his changes were soon incorporated by other instrument makers into their own horns, so whatever improvements he made remain with us today, even if by a different name. (Baines, page 253.)

Despite all this comparison between the bore of a particular horn and the « modern tuba », there was and still is a lot of variance in layout, size and bore. 3 Bass tubas of the same key and from approximately the same time period : yet, even though the 2 horns oriented the same direction are called by the same name and in the same key, there will be a great difference between them in timbre. With this in mind, the various re-namings and deviants of tuba seem to be of less importance. They are all variations on a theme with pretty much the same sound. Yet, one mutant tuba does stand-out, the « Wagner tuba » .

The Wagner Tuba stands-out not in its legacy to modern instruments, but in the wild divergence it possessed. The Wagner tuba has several construction differences which greatly later its tone. The most immediately striking thing about the Wagner tuba is the almost complete absence of a flared bell. In fact, the instrument is completely conical, including the valves. How does this change the sound ? « The sound waves passing down a cone without a bell have their curvature suddenly changed at the open end. » (Richardson, page 77.) This makes the Wagner tuba less efficient at transmitting sound. It also affects the timbre. « If you give a tube a large flare you reduce the intensity of the upper-partials in the note and render it more mellow. » (Richardson, page 78.) The Wagner tuba would then have a brighter sound than either the french horn or a more standard tuba.

The next major difference between a Wagner and a standard tuba is method of sound production. « They are intended to be played by french horn players using their own mouthpieces. » (Morley-Pegge) This certainly affects the tone of the instrument in a way different from other tuba-variants. « On mouthpieces of the horn type, there is no flange and, therefore, nothing definite to form an edge-tone, hence, the player is deprived of its help, with the result of a soft tone. » (Richardson, page 72.) Therefore, we have simultaneously a bright sounding instrument with a soft tone.

While the shape of the mouthpiece is important, it is not as important as the dimensions. « The cup volume and the diameter of the constricted passage of the mouthpiece have significant effect upon the performance of a given mouthpiece, with the shape being a much less important variable. » (Fletcher and Rossig, pages 369-370.) The depth of the french horn mouthpiece is 44 millimeters. (Richardson, page 74.) The higher Wagner tuba is in approximately the same range as the horn, so this is not striking. However, the lower Wagner tuba is in the same range as a tenor trombone, which has a cup depth of 64 millimeters. (Richardson, page 74.) The varied cup volume and constriction of the french horn mouthpiece would also give a french horn sort of sound to the instrument.

It is important not to underestimate the mouthpiece in sound generation and tone. The mouthpiece has a profound affect on the impedance of the horn and the sound of the horn in general. The impedance, as modified by the mouthpiece, is also closely linked with the flare of the bell. (Fletcher and Rossig, page 372.) The total sound of the Wagner tuba, therefore, will be unlike anything else in the orchestra, not like a tuba, and not like a french horn, but similar to both.

Despite these very unique characteristics, the Wagner tuba is really a hybrid between the saxhorn or tuba and the french horn. Aside from sharing mouthpieces and players with the french horn section, « in bore, they are midway between the horn and the saxhorn » . (Morely-Pegge) What lead Wagner to invent a hybrid instrument ? In fact, « Wagner had already begun to compose Rheingold before he included the tubas » . (Baines, page 263.) So, initially, at least, he did not even have them in mind. But, in October of 1853, Wagner visited Sax. September 1865 : « A letter from the composer to King Ludwig refers to the “ extra instruments ” which he had been scoring for in “ The Ring ” and which he had become acquainted with in Paris at the maker Sax, whose, invention they were. » (Richardson, page 74.) So, at least by that time, Wagner had not thought of any innovations. Necessity, however, prompted him, as he was unable to find « those “ Sax'schen Instrumente ” or even possible substitutes for them in the military bands in Munich, or in Vienna either » . (Baines, page 264.) As he had already begun to compose for the Saxhorns, at this point, he was faced with a dilemma.

When he finally had the instruments built, he used them as a quartet, with 2 B-flat instruments and 2 F. When they are used in « The Ring » , « they are played by the 2nd quartet of horns, horns 5 and 7 playing the B-flat instruments ; and 6 and 8 those in F » . (Morley-Pegge) Unsurprisingly, given Wagner's history of building his own Opera House specifically for I Opera, he only uses the mutant tubas in « The Ring » and nowhere else in his work.

Bruckner and Strauß both made some use of the Wagner tuba. Bruckner uses them in the Adagio movement of his 7th Symphony, and also in his 9th. Strauß made use of the horns, but later revised them out. « The Tenor Tuba in “ Don Quixote ” was evidently 1st to have been a Wagner tuba : Strauß tells in “ Instrumentationslehre ” how, several times, he has written for a B-flat tenor horn, and had found that as a melody instrument the ordinary Bariton (euphonium) was preferable to the “ harsh, awkward Wagner-tubas with their demoniac (sic) sound ” . » (Baines, page 265.)

Despite Strauß' criticism, it was Bruckner's 7th Symphony which became his 1st commercial success, which must be attributed, at least in part, to the role of the tubas.

Wagner failed to create a consistent transposition for his instruments. « In all the parts of “ Rheingold ”, they sound respectively a tone and a 5th lower than written. » Yet, « in the other scores, they appear in E-flat and B-flat, sounding a 6th and a 9th lower » . (Baines, page 264.) He apparently though the 2nd version would be easier for the conductor. But, in yet another « exception is in the Prelude to “ Gotterdammerung ”, where they are written in B-flat and F in brass-band style and sound a 9th and a 12th lower » . (Baines, page 264.) This lack of consistency may indicate a lack of certainty on Wagner's part about the best way to notate his new instrument, or it may stem from a desire to irk french horn players.

In « Das Rheingold » , Wagner uses D-flat major for the tonality around « Walhalla » , as it is suggested « as the most obvious contrasting tonality for the framing scenes before “ Walhalla ” » . (Bailey, page 54.) Thus, the « Walhalla » theme is in D-flat :

Wagner scores this for his tuba quartet. This theme, as is this key are paralleled in « Götterdämmerung » and the tubas are again used. As Bailey states, Wagner uses many such parallels between the 2, « The appearance of D-flat, then, at the beginning and end of the main action of “ Das Rheingold ” serves to define the dramatic structure of the work but, at the same time, Wagner re-inforced the structural parallel of this Opera with “ Götterdämmerung ” by concluding that Opera in D-flat also. The parallel uses of D-flat are re-inforced by the association of the “Walhalla” music with that tonality-music which is scored for the special sound of the so-called “Wagner Tubas” in both Operas. » (Bailey, page 54.) In fact, the 1st time the tubas get the melody in « Das Rheingold » (in the beginning of the 2nd scene), it is a variant of the « Walhalla » theme in D-flat major.

Bruckner makes more diverse use of the Wagner tubas in his 7th Symphony, which, as stated above, undoubtedly led to its commercial success. The 2nd movement opens with a Wagner tuba quartet. Their part is marked « hervortretend », which means « from the heart ». Bruckner uses the Wagnerian tubas in this way, primarily to carry emotion, and especially sorrow.

Bruckner dedicated that movement to Wagner because he died while Bruckner was writing it. The use of « the Master's » weird little tubas is undoubtedly done in tribute to him. The use of sorrow in the tuba parts is, then, a reflection of Bruckner's sorrow over Wagner's death.

When he makes use of the tubas, it is in the low-register and, often, with only minimal support from the orchestra. Their solist introduce both the 1st and the 2nd theme of the movement. His tubas are scored richly and tragically.

Aside from its use by the composers mentioned above, the Wagner tuba has undergone a bit of a renaissance and is currently being used for film and television scores. Most of the other historic brass is still here and there also. Nothing in music ever gets obsolete.

The Vision

From its beginnings as a musical instrument, the Wagner tuba has never been far from controversy. Its very name has been a source of confusion, there being over a dozen terms for it, in German alone. Its history and development have been subject to sketchy and often incorrect analyses, as have descriptions of the instrument's qualities. What can be said at the outset, however, is that its hybrid construction and limited repertoire often result in problems of intonation for the hornist who doubles on the instrument, certainly for the less-than-skilful player. The Wagner tuba's tone, however, is rightly admired for its nobility and dignity, whilst its use and notation have always been a bit of a puzzle to prospective composers. The difficult issue of notational method has often led to confusion over transposition for the player.

The Wagner tuba was conceived by Richard Wagner (1813-1883), in the summer of 1853, when he was exiled in Zürich. He was working on « Das Rheingold » and envisaged a quartet of instruments which he called : « Tuben ». The Opera's « Walhalla » motif was initially intended for trombones but, then, changed to « Tuben » in the orchestral draft. Wagner probably had in mind the ancient Bronze age Nordic horn, or « lur », when he designed the Wagner tuba. The aim was to bridge the gap in timbre between the horn and trombones, and so, blend the sounds of the brass section more effectively. Being a smaller sized tuba, it would also integrate the sound of the new bass tuba (created in 1835) with that of the horns. The quartet of Wagner tubas would also be able to function on their own as a choir.

The Wagner tuba came to birth against a background of European militarism and national armies which had their own wind bands. There was a concurrent development in all types of brass instruments across the continent, and there are various theories as to which of them inspired Wagner's new instruments. He certainly had dealings with the firm of Moritz before the Munich performances of « Das Rheingold » and « Die Walküre », in 1869-1870. Whatever the inspiration, the Wagner tuba undoubtedly started life as a military band horn-substitute and Wagner needed both technical and practical assistance to realize his new instruments and convert them to his requirements. Excerpts from « The Ring » played in concerts during the 1860's employed band instruments for what Wagner now called his tenor and bass tuba quartet. Finding the right instruments, however, sometimes proved difficult or impossible.

Wagner early became dissatisfied with Sax's products, and while it is thought that the hornist Franz Strauß (the father of Richard Strauß) helped him develop his new instruments, it was a different hornist altogether.

The Apprentice

That hornist was Hans Richter, a gifted musician who played a variety of instruments. He was recommended to Wagner by the Viennese « Kappelmeister » Heinrich Esser. Wagner needed a competent copyist and Richter was engaged to work on « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » while still playing the horn.

Wagner's patron, King Ludwig II, wanted « Das Rheingold » performed on his birthday, in August 1869, but Wagner was less than enthusiastic about it and, indeed, unready for the event : there were still things to be sorted-out, not least of which was procuring his small tubas.

Most of the extant literature on the Wagner tuba agrees that C.W. Moritz of Berlin manufactured the 1st instruments. Wagner had previously employed him, and a new set of Moritz tubas was acquired for Bayreuth, in 1877. However, the first 1869-1870 Munich performances of « Rheingold » and « Walküre » and the 1876 Bayreuth performances of « Der Ring der Nibelungen » used tubas from some other source, and the Moritz family never claimed responsibility for being that source.

Whatever the source, it is certain that the actual premiere of « Das Rheingold », on 22 September 1869, did not employ the new instruments. The performance had a difficult preparation in that the originally intended conductor, Hans von Bülow, stepped down when Wagner began to live with his wife, Cosima. Richter, who looked in line to take-over, also resigned. The King searched for a new conductor and refused to re-instate Richter at Wagner's request. Eventually, Franz Wüllner was taken on and resisted being warned-off by Wagner.

There is no mention of Wagner tubas in Sebastian Roeckl's listing of orchestral personnel, nor is there a record of the instruments or of musicians being additionally paid for playing them. Wüllner, for whom the Wagner tubas were not a priority, accepted many compromises to make the production viable, and the parts would have been given over to military instruments.

Trials and Transpositions

Wagner's lack of cooperation in the preparation of the « Rheingold » premiere persisted with the « Walküre » premiere of 26 June 1870. This meant that hornists had to play the tuba parts on existing brass instruments (the bugle horn) .

However, Wagner had written to Hans Richter, in May 1870, regarding the little tubas and « arranging the extra brass » for the « Rheingold » score. In the published score, printed on 20 March 1873 (for which Wagner received assistance from an unknown copyist on 11 pages of 4 part tuba incipits) , there is a preface where Wagner officially introduces the new quartet of tubas.

Of the 8 horns, 4 alternate on tubas. Of these tubas, 2 are tenor and in B-flat, and 2 are bass and in F. They are to be played by the 3rd and 4th pairs of hornists, numbers 5 through 8, the tenor tubas by players 5 and 7, and the bass tubas by players 6 and 8. Players 6 and 7 typically exchange seats so that the arrangement is 2 tenor tubas alongside 2 bass tubas.

In the score of « Die Walküre » , however, the tenor tubas are written in E-flat and the bass tubas in B-flat in an attempt to cater to the band instruments that 1st played the parts and also to the limitations of the players : the parts were, thus, considered more comfortable for reading. However, the keys of B-flat and F were to be retained in copying the orchestral parts and the music had to be transposed into these keys.

This was the start of the tangled issue of transpositions in writing for the Wagner tuba. Wagner, however, had a change of heart and the parts were not transposed but notated exactly as they had been written in the autograph manuscript. Was this simply indecision on his part or an uncertainty as to the employment and transposition of the new instruments ? Wagner evidently preferred E-flat / B-flat notation while Richter preferred B-flat / F notation.

This confusion is seen in the « Ring » 's final 2 Operas : « Siegfried » adopts E-flat / B-flat notation, with a short but notable excursion into C for the 2nd bass tuba ; and « Götterdämmerung » has the Prelude notated for tenors in B-flat and basses in F, whereas Acts 1-3 return to E-flat / B-flat notation. Wagner's preference of notation, which looked to him like the pitches sounded, gained the upper-hand, and many conflicting theories have been put forward to explain it. One solution from the very beginning was for players to write-out the parts in their own chosen key, and this happens even to this day.

Fruition

It is apparent that the Wagner tuba had a drawn-out conception, realization and 1st employment. In November 1874, however, « Tuben » were ordered in Munich. The very 1st Wagner tubas were made in 1874-1875 by the Munich craftsman Georg Ottensteiner, who had been trained in Paris and offered his own line of Sax-type brass instruments.

The Wagner tuba's public debut took place on 1 March 1875, and Alois Schantl, Michaël Pichler, Franz Nittmann and Wilhelm Kleinecke were the 1st Wagner tubists. Conceived in 1853, the Wagner tuba had needed 22 years to be fully realized.

The instrument was essentially a Cornon with a reduced bore size and 4 valves. It was still far from technically sound and the B-flat instrument was judged the easier to play. Articulation seemed to be a continual problem, and intonation was difficult to control.

The hornists who premiered the Wagner tubas on the 1st entire « Ring » cycle were Theodor Methfessel, Ernst Schmidt, Richard Dechandt and Karl Mullich. The instrument's tone is such that it is able to personify « Walhalla » 's divine majesty, but also the sinister, subterranean world of « Nibelheim » .

In 1877, Moritz delivered a quartet of what he called « horn tubas » and, in 1890, Alexander delivered a definitive set to Bayreuth which would be played for years to come.

The latter were signally the 1st to market their instruments as Wagner tubas and their product would come to be the dominant Wagner tuba of the next Century. Even so, there was heavy competition for the market.

For Wagner himself, the last appearance of the instrument occurred in « Götterdämmerung » . Up to this point, it had been confined to Operatic scores but, after Wagner's death, it would make a notable entry into the Symphonic literature.

The Disciple

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) 1st met Wagner in 1865 and was present at the Bayreuth « Ring » performance, in 1876. He was overwhelmed by the new quartet of tenor and bass tubas, and their inspiration led him to include Wagner tubas in his most mature 3 Symphonies (7, 8, 9) . In the early 1860's, he had experimented with writing for euphonium and tenor horn but he now became captivated by the expressive possibilities of the Wagner tuba.

In 1882, at the age of 59, Bruckner decided to use them himself, not out of a conscious desire to emulate Wagner or pay him homage, but for musical reasons : to re-inforce the brass section and give it structural back-bone, but also to imbue the music spiritually with a sense of the numinous. So, it was that the Wagner tubas 1st appeared in the Adagio of his Symphony No. 7 in E major (1884) . Their tone colour and timbre brought one more variety of brass sound to the score. No tubas were available for the Arthur Nikisch premiere, but they appeared in the 1885 Munich performance. The work was a success and Bruckner was praised for his treatment of the Wagner tubas.

The Wagner tuba was then given a more extended role in the Symphony No. 8 in C minor, appearing in all movements except the Scherzo. Wagner tubas also feature in the Adagio of Symphony No. 9 in D minor and have a highly-important role in the Finale.

As with Wagner, the instrument's notation is equally problematic for Bruckner, and discrepancies survive in his Wagner tuba parts to this day.

Even after Bruckner, the use of the Wagner tuba quartet was not universally accepted. Rimsky-Korsakov wrote that tubas entered the orchestra « to the detriment of other groups » and led to a « neutralization of brass sound » ; and the influential academic Hugo Riemann asserted that the tuba choir had no place in the Symphony (both Rimsky-Korsakov and Riemann condemned the instrument's inclusion in the orchestra) .

And, yet, despite the notorious difficulties of idiomatic writing, choice of proper key, finding 4 instruments and the skilled players who could master problems of intonation, the Wagner tuba never failed to impress with its unique sound.

Wagner's Heirs

The Wagner tuba's inclusion in the orchestra had its supporters in Heinrich Rietsch, Alfred Orel and Fritz Öser but, even so, most composers didn't trust themselves to write for it. Engelbert Humperdinck warned against its casual deployment and Gustav Mahler gave thought to using them but ultimately excluded them. Only a handful of post-Wagnerians actually composed for them :

Adalbert von Goldschmidt (1848-1906) in « Heliantus » (1884) .

Jean-Louis Nicodé (1853-1919) in « Das Meer » , Opus 31 (1891) .

Friedrich Klose (1862-1942) (who had lessons with Bruckner) in « Der Sonne-Geist » (1917) .

Felix Dræseke (1835-1913) in « Jubel-Overtüre » , Opus 65 (1898) in which Dræseke uses 2 B-flat tenor tubas and 2 basses in F, which are employed separately and in a jolly, galloping manner (a far cry from the hieratical tones of Wagner and Bruckner, a divergence for which he was rebuked by Richard Strauß) .

Richard Strauß also used the instruments in : « Guntram » , Opus 25 (1893) ; « Don Quixote » , Opus 35 (1898) ; « Ein Heldenleben » , Opus 40 (1899) ; and « Elektra » (1909) . Strauß's most intensive continuous occupation with the Wagner tuba was during the years 1913 to 1917 in : « Josephs Legende » , Opus 63 (1914) ; « Eine Alpensinfonie » , Opus 64 (1915) ; and « Die Frau ohne Schatten » , Opus 65 (premiered in 1919) .

In « Don Quixote » , he was the 1st to use a mute for the Wagner tuba, and both this work and « Ein Heldenleben » are scored for a single tenor tuba in B-flat. « Elektra » contains what may be the most difficult tuba parts in existence in an about-face from his critique of Dræseke's « dancing tubas » . They assume a very important place in the Opera's sound world. After 1919, he never again composed for the Wagner tuba. Indeed, Strauß later came to think that his solo Wagner tuba parts were generally better off played on euphoniums, baritones or tenor horns - « better than the rough and inflexible tuba with its demonic noise » , was his comment.

Wagner tuba parts were typically played by existing military instruments outside the German-speaking world. Substitution (variously by cornophones, Saxhorns, tubettes, tenor horns or euphoniums, or tuba instruments built along Sax lines) was also the norm in Great Britain, but the 1st true English Wagner tuba quartet (from Alexander in Mainz) made its debut in the Covent Garden « Ring » cycles, in Spring 1935. The United States, because it imported many German hornists, had authentic Wagner tubas from quite early on.

With the major Opera Houses in Germany and Austria all having sets of Wagner tubas by the early 20th Century, there was consequently a finite market for the instruments. Makers like Enders (Mainz) ; Schopf (Munich) ; Schopper (Leipzig) ; Reißmann (Chemnitz) ; and the « Produktiv-Genossenschaft der Instrumentmacher » (Vienna) found the market a crowded one, vying with Gbr. Alexander (Mainz) ; Eschenbach (Dresden) ; Knopf (Markneukirchen) ; Eduard Kruspe (Erfurt) ; C. W. Moritz (Berlin) ; Piering (Adorf) ; C. F. Schmidt (Berlin-Weimar) ; and Uhlmann (Vienna) . They were saved by the military bands in Prussia and Imperial Germany which took on use of the instruments more and more to replace horns in march-music and so be loud enough to compete in the open-air.

Felix Dræseke and the Wagner Tuba

The repertoire for the Wagner tuba is severely limited, but unsurpassed for sheer quality. The instruments are the sonic embodiment of « Walhalla » , and attempts to describe their sound have always been fulsome : « solemn, dignified and heroic » (1) , « dark and richly mellow » (2) , « very noble » (3) , « a totally unique, exalted, ceremonial character » (4) , « full and smooth » (5) , « a new brass timbre something on the dark and smoky side » (6) , « holy and sovereign » (7) , « a profound strength » (8) , « rich, round, solemn » (9) , « a grave majesty » (10) , « very deep and sonorous » (11) , « characteristic tone that is more potent and somber than that of the horn » (12) , « a stately power and hallowed grandeur » (13) , « strange and individual, impossible to describe, and not to be forgotten, once heard » (14) . Yet, Wagner tubas have always presented a puzzle, both to prospective composers, and to the players themselves. The former disagreed so widely on how to notate for the instruments that the resultant confusion of transpositions still confounds novice tubists today. And the hybrid construction that produces a majestic sound in the hands of a skilled quartet also guarantees that less expert attempts end in intonational disaster.

Confusion is inherent in their very name. In German alone, they have been known variously as : « Tuben » , « Wagner-Tuben » , « Ring-Tuben » , « Nibelungen-Tuben » , « Rheingold-Tuben » , « Siegfried-Tuben » , « Bayreuth-Tuben » , « Tenor-Tuben » ; and « Bass-Tuben » , « B-Tuben » ; and « F-Tuben » , « Horn-Tuben » ; and « Waldhorn-Tuben » (15) . Historical and technical treatments of the instrument are often sketchy, hazy affairs. « There is a great deal of misinformation about these unusual instruments » (16) wrote Nicholas Bessaraboff. Even the best current reference works in German and English treat basic journalistic questions about the instrument coyly ; the original manufacturer is variously identified as C. W. Moritz, Adolphe Sax, or simply unknown, and the date of the 1st instruments inspires estimates ranging from 1869 to 1876. Hans Kunitz concluded :

« Literature about the Wagner tuba consists mainly of assertions either dubious or erroneous. »

Compelling argument for an extensive treatment.

They were conceived in the summer of 1853, a gleam in the fertile imagination of Richard Wagner, in Zürich exile after his participation in the Dresden uprising of the Revolution of 1848. More than 20 years would pass before the Wagner tubas made their 1st appearance in the orchestra. But, slowly, the necessary elements fell into place : the former Viennese hornist Hans Richter lent Wagner the practical expertise that he was missing, and Ludwig II of Bavaria's generous gift of privy funds, in January 1874, was followed by a commission to Munich artisan Georg Ottensteiner (trained in Paris during the rise of Adolphe Sax) to create Wagner's new tubas themselves. They were unveiled at a Viennese performance of « Ring » excerpts led by the composer, on 21 February 1875, and were employed at the 1st Bayreuth « Festspiel » of 1876.

Yet, aside from the signal example of Anton Bruckner, composers were loathe to adopt the Wagner tuba over the next few decades. Its future in the orchestra became a matter of debate, as both Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakov and the influential academic Hugo Riemann condemned its inclusion. Well-known post-Wagnerians like Siegfried Wagner, Hans Pfitzner, Siegmund von Hausegger, August Bungert and Max von Schillings declined to take-up the instruments. Engelbert Humperdinck, whose admiration for Wagner was unlimited, explicitly cautioned against casual employment of the tuba quartet :

« The use of 4 tubas and daring harmonic progressions are in the end merely superficialities, and they have nothing to do with the actual essence of Wagner's art. » (18)

Among the handful of composers who did trust themselves to experiment with Wagner tubas were the avid Wagnerians Adalbert von Goldschmidt, Jean-Louis Nicodé, Friedrich Klose and the young Arnold Schœnberg. Another, who stands apart from this group, was Felix Dræseke.

Though Dræseke's studies were made at the Leipzig Conservatory with the Mendelssohnian Julius Rietz, he was afterwards drawn to Wagner and Liszt. Dræseke attended the « Ring » in Bayreuth, in August 1876, and there had a chance to hear the new Wagner tubas. At the end of the month, he resettled in Dresden where, in 1884, he became Franz Wüllner's successor as composition teacher at the Conservatory. He often heard the excellent hornists of the « Hofkapelle » (led by the incomparable Oscar Franz) , and composed the « Adagio » , Opus 31, and « Romanze » , Opus 32, for horn and piano (19) in 1885, and the Quintet, Opus 48, for piano, violin, viola, cello, and horn (20) in 1888. « With the passing of time, Dræseke's relationship to Liszt and New German ideals cooled » (21) and, returning to his early-Romantic roots, he opposed what he termed the « cacophony » of modern composers. But a close friendship with Jean-Louis Nicodé (who conducted a number of Dræseke's works in his concert series) , perhaps, influenced his inclusion of a quartet of Wagner tubas in the « Jubel-Overtüre » , Opus 65. Written for the dual occasion of the 70th birthday and 25th Jubilee of King Albert of Saxony, and 1st performed by the « Dresden Hofkapelle » under Ernst von Schuch, on 23 April 1898, the score includes 2 tenor tubas in B-flat (alto) and 2 basses in F (loco, in so-called « new » bass clef) . The horn section that season included solo hornist and « Kammervirtuos » Oswald Mai, Bruno Franz, Hugo Wünschmann, and Reinhard Beyer, and probable tubists were Karl Krellwitz, Carl Blochwitz, Richard Köhler, and Max Uhlemann (22) . Dræseke wrote in the preface to the work :

« A reduction of orchestral forces should be easy to arrange. 3rd clarinet, triangle, glockenspiel, and bass trombone could simply be left-out. Likewise, the participation of 2nd harp and 4th trumpet are not essential and are left to the discretion of the conductor. However, the 4 tubas are to be retained if at all possible. » (23)

Dræseke's tubas play through much of the jovial overture simply doubling the trombones in the rhythmical figures of the tuttis, or serving as chordal accompaniment.

The special colour of the tuba quartet is never allowed to be heard in isolation (the B-flat and F instruments often used separately, either unison or singly) . The hieratical sense of Wagner and Bruckner is lost in the jolly galloping, but is replaced by a new, more muscular style.

That Dræseke had departed from Wagner's lead on tuba use was obvious to one observer, who submitted the cautionary example of the case of a living composer who once showed me the score of a comic Overture in which 4 « Nibelung » tubas danced along together with the rhythm of the rest of the brass (simply amplifying the tutti) . I asked the author, an otherwise admirable, highly-cultured musician, what he was doing in a cheerful comic Overture with what one might call Wagner's « discovery » (which he used with such wisdom and secure vision to portray the gloomy world of the « Nibelungs ») . He answered me quite ingenuously :

« Well really, tubas are used in every large orchestra these days. Why shouldn't I write for them, too ? »

I kept silent, but thought privately, « the man cannot be helped. » (24)

The author of these lines was Richard Strauß, who had conducted a performance of the « Jubel-Overtüre » in Leipzig, on 1 October 1898, for a stellar audience of leading German composers. The « cautionary example » was a very public 1905 rebuke of Dræseke's writing for the tuba quartet. It may also have been an opening salvo that preceded Dræseke's famous condemnation of Strauß in « Die Konfusion in der Musik » (25) , the next year.

Strauß, himself, had approached Wagner tubas with circumspection. The 28 year old began by writing his hornist father Franz, in May 1893 :

« Would you please be so good as to find-out how to write for tenor horns, in which key, and their range :

1. What is altogether possible.

2. How high and how low are truly comfortable ? I need them for the stage-music at the end of the 2nd act of the Opera « Guntram » , Opus 25, where I want to use them in place of horns. » (26)

While bass trumpet, bass trombone, and contrabass tuba all found their way into the « Guntram » score, the 4 tenor horns (written in B-flat alto) were only used for 20 bars in the off-stage band (27) . 5 years later, Strauß wrote for a single tenor tuba in B-flat in the tone-poem « Don Quixote » , Opus 35. A tenor tuba in B-flat also figured in Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben » , Opus 40. Not until the composition of « Elektra » , in 1908, did Strauß decide to employ an entire quartet of Wagner tubas for the 1st time.

Wagner and Bruckner, wrote Ingrid Fuchs, had treated « the tuba quartet preferentially, as a group set apart, mostly for quiet ceremonial, solemn utterances » . (28) Dresden hornist August Prée observed :

« Because of their unwieldy nature, great technical prowess should not be expected from the tubas. » (29)

This status quo was shattered when Strauß produced the score of « Elektra » , an about-face from his critique of Dræseke's dancing tubas. Here, Strauß went far beyond Wagner in his demands on the instruments, Julian Baker rightly calling the parts « uncompromisingly virtuosic » . (30) The awe-filled handling of the Wagner tuba by late- Romantic composers had now been joined by a more athletic writing style, and Igor Stravinsky and Béla Bartók were among many that enthusiastically continued in the new vein. As time progressed, this raw aspect of the tubas would be exploited in venues as diverse as Opera Houses, Prussian military bands, and Hollywood films. In hindsight, perhaps, Strauß had learned something from Dræseke's dancing tubas after all.

Notes

- (1) Raymond Bryant. « The Wagner Tubas » , Monthly Musical Record No. 67 (September 1937) ; page 153.
- (2) Dieter Michaël Backes. « Die Instrumentation und ihre Entwicklung in Anton Bruckners Symphonien » , Volume I, Dissertation, Mainz (1993) ; pages 220-221.
- (3) Anonym. « The Stage » (February 1896) , quoted in : John Webb. « Mahillon's Wagner Tubas » , The Galpin Society Journal No. 49 (March 1996) ; page 2.
- (4) Friedrich Eckstein. « Alte unnennbare Tage ! Erinnerungen aus siebzig Lehr- und Wanderjahren » , Vienna (1936) ; page 155.
- (5) Hans Kunitz. « Instrumenten-Brevier » , Wiesbaden (1961) ; page 79.
- (6) Alfred Frankenstein. « A Modern Guide to Symphonic Music » , New York (1966) ; page 179.
- (7) Karl Geiringer. « Instrumente in der Musik des Abendlandes » , Munich (1982) ; page 208.
- (8) « Lexikon Musikinstrumente » , edited by Wolfgang Ruf, Mannheim (1991) ; page 563.
- (9) Barry Millington. « Wagner » , Princeton (1984) ; page 221.
- (10) Robin Gregory. « The Horn. A Comprehensive Guide to the Modern Instrument and its Music » , London (1969) ; 177.
- (11) Paul Schwers. « Das Konzertbuch. Sinfonische Werke » , Stuttgart (1940) ; page 201.
- (12) Bruno Kampmann. « Les instruments de l'orchestre wagnérien » , « Bulletin de l'Association des Collectionneurs d'instruments à Vent » No. 13, Larigot (July 1993) ; page 10.
- (13) Kurt Janetzky and Bernhard Brüchle. « Das Horn. Eine kleine Chronik seines Werdens und Wirkens » , Bern and Stuttgart (1977) ; page 82.
- (14) Walter Piston. « Orchestration » , New York (1955) ; page 294.

Comparing the instruments to the bass tuba, Forsyth called the tone « less “ bullocky ”, quieter, and more “ otherworldish ” » - Cecil Forsyth. « Orchestration » , London (1935) ; page 153.

(15) The confusion is sometimes exacerbated in English by the adoption of the word « Tuben » directly from the German. An argument for this usage is for precision of expression (to distinguish from the bass tuba) : as Jeremy Montagu has written, « the Wagner tuba or, as it is usually known today, the tuben » (« The French Horn » , Buckinghamshire, 1990 ; page 26.) . Yet, precision is blurred if the singular form (« Tube ») is ignored, either because of unfamiliarity or because of its acoustical similarity to tuba. This unfamiliarity can easily result in linguistic hash, like the doubly plural title « Wagnerian tubens are growing in popularity » (« The School Musician » No. 42, November 1970 ; page 66.) . Still another usage adds the English plural to the German singular : « Tube » -s.

Tradition has it that Hans Richter unwittingly coined the phrase « Wagner tuba » , during rehearsals for the 1st London « Ring » : his correct German pronunciation of « Tube » being understood acoustically by the English musicians as « tuba » (Reginald Morley-Pegge. « The Horn, and the Later Brass » , in : « Musical Instruments Through the Ages » , edited by Anthony Baines, Harmondsworth, 1978 ; page 315.) Whether or not this anecdote is true, the designation Wagner tuba(-s) now carries the advantage of being the most wide-spread name for the instrument in English. As formulated by Barry Tuckwell, « The term “ Wagner Tuba ” is convenient and leaves no doubt as to what instrument is intended. » (Horn. London and Sydney, 1983 ; page 90.)

(16) Nicholas Bessaraboff. « Ancient European Musical Instruments » , Boston (1941) ; page 144.

(17) Hans Kunitz. « Die Instrumentation. Ein Hand- und Lehrbuch » , Band 9 : Tuba, Leipzig (1968) ; page 889.

Robert Pinson Bobo agreed :

« In spite of the fact that a number of authors have written articles about the Wagner Tuben, the material is incomplete, debatable, and somewhat inaccessible. » - Scoring for the Wagner « Tuben » by Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Richard Strauß - DMA Thesis, Miami (1971) ; page 2.

(18) August Göllerich and Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner. Ein Lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » , Band 4, chapter 3 : (1890-1896) , Regensburg (1936) ; page 539.

(19) « Adagio » , Opus 31, for horn and piano ; « Romanze » , Opus 32, for horn and piano, Kistner, Leipzig (1885) .

(20) Quintet, Opus 48, for piano, violin, viola, cello, and horn, Kistner, Leipzig (1888) . Dræseke wrote of the work that he had employed the horn « as binding agent for the very different sounds of the keyboard and string instruments » . Martella Gutiérrez-Denhoff. « Felix Dræseke : Chronik seines Lebens. Veröffentlichungen der Internationalen Dræseke-Gesellschaft. Schriften » , Band 3, Bonn (1989) ; page 92.

(21) Alfred Einstein. « Das neue Musiklexikon » , Berlin (1926) ; page 155.

(22) Private communications from Peter Damm, January 29 and February 19, 2003. Though the original Dræseke parts no longer exist, notations in the « Dresden Ring » parts for the season of the « Jubel-Overtüre » premiere reveal which players typically played the tubas. Further performances of the « Jubel-Overtüre » , in 1898, were given in Leipzig and Berlin.

(23) Felix Dræseke. « Jubel-Ouvertüre für grosses Orchester » , Opus 65, Breitkopf & Härtel, Leipzig (1898) ; preface.

(24) Forward to : Hector Berlioz. « Instrumentationslehre » , enlarged and edited by Richard Strauß, Frankfurt (1905) . The identity of the composer of the « Comic Overture » began as an enigma. A surprising number of likely-named Overtures had to be vetted, including works by Ferruccio Busoni (« Lustspiel-Overtüre » , Opus 38) ; Hans Huber (« Lustspielovertüre » , Opus 50) ; Max Reger (« Eine Lustspiel-Overtüre » , Opus 120) ; Georg Schumann (« Lebensfreude Overtüre » , Opus 54) ; and Felix Weingartner (« Lustige Overtüre » , Opus 53) . All of these composers knew Strauß. Several were, tantalizingly, less than friendly with Strauß. But none of them included Wagner tubas in their scores.

Otherwise, authoritative sources were unhelpful in providing specific information. Use of Wagner tubas has been attributed to Felix Dræseke in each of the following :

Janetzky and Brüche ; page 82.

Clifford Bevan. « The Tuba Family » , London (1972) ; page 194.

Curt Sachs. « Handbuch der Musikinstrumente » , Wiesbaden (1979) ; page 280.

Stephen Parkany. « Kurth's Bruckner and the Adagio of the 7th Symphony » , 19th Century Music, Volume 11, No. 3 (1998) ; page 269 - footnote.

However, none of these correctly identified the work in question, several hinting misleadingly that Dræseke's « Sinfonia Tragica » might have included Wagner tubas. It does not.

(25) Felix Dræseke. « Die Konfusion in der Musik. Ein Mahnruf » , « Neue Musik-Zeitung » , Stuttgart (1906) ; reprinted in : Susanne Shigihara. « Die Konfusion in der Musik. Felix Draesekes Kampfschrift von 1906 und ihre Folgen » , « Veröffentlichungen der Internationalen Dræseke-Gesellschaft. Schriften » , Band 4, edited by Helmut Loos, Bonn (1990) .

(26) Letter from Richard Strauß to Franz Strauß (May 10, 1893) , in : « Richard Strauß, Briefe an die Eltern (1882-1906) » , edited by Willi Schuh, Zürich (1954) ; page 178.

(27) Act 2, Scene 3 : « Ziemlich lebhaft » , 2 measures after rehearsal No. 128. The band opens its fanfare fortissimo, reducing gradually to piano diminuendo to simulate its departure in the distance.

(28) Ingrid Fuchs. « Klingt Bruckner “ wagnerisch ” ? » , « Bruckner Symposion. Bruckner, Wagner und die

Neudeutschen in Österreich » , edited by Othmar Wessely, Linz (1986) ; page 115.

(29) August Prée. « Die Wagner- oder Horntuben » , in : Emil Ludwig Teuchert and Erhard Walter Haupt. « Musik-Instrumentenkunde in Wort und Bild » , Band 3, « Messingblas-und Schlaginstrumente » , Leipzig (1928) ; page 27.

(30) Julian Baker. « Opera and Ballet » , in : « The Business » , edited by Paul Pritchard, Thames Ditton, Surrey (1992) ; page 28. Strauß would continue to employ the Wagner tuba in « Josephs Legende » , « Eine Alpensinfonie » and « Die Frau ohne Schatten » .

Modern Voices

The Wagner tuba had been taken-up by a select number of Wagner's heirs, its literature and scope had continued to grow, a healthy number of manufacturers now produced them, and military contracts seemed a guarantee for a prosperous future. The First World War, however, swept away most of the military bands as well as the last vestiges of the Romantic inheritance. The question now was, would the Wagner tuba find a place in the modern musical landscape ? Would « modern » composers use the instrument at all, and if so, how ?

In the event, the modern titans only used the Wagner tuba sparingly. Arnold Schönberg's sole use of the instrument was in his « Gurre-Lieder » (1900-1911) which included 10 horns in F with the last 4 doubling on Wagner tubas (tenor tubas in E-flat and bass tubas in B-flat, the only departure being the seating arrangements : 7 and 8 in B-flat, and 9 and 10 in F) .

Igor Stravinsky was early exposed to the music of Wagner, Bruckner and Strauß, but one questions his familiarity with the Wagner tuba itself. He used them in a way uniquely his own in « The Firebird » (1910) . « The Rite of Spring » (1911-1913) was Stravinsky's 2nd and final work for the instrument. He didn't indicate which octave he required for the B-flat tenor tuba parts, and the controversy continues to this day.

Béla Bartók used 2 B-flat tenor tubas in « Kossuth » (1903) and « The Miraculous Mandarin » , Opus 19 (1918-1919) . In Gustav Holst's « The Planets » (1914-1916) , the 1 tenor tuba in B-flat is meant to be played by the euphonium, but it is played in Vienna on the Wagner tuba. Likewise, Leoš Janáček's « Sokol Fanfare » from his « Sinfonietta » , and the « Capriccio » (1926) , whose scores indicate tenor tubas, employ euphoniums in Prague, and Wagner tubas in Vienna !

Composing for the Wagner tuba slowed down after the First World War and its repertoire languished for 40 years. Exceptions, however, were Leopold Stokowski's orchestral arrangement of Bach's Passacaglia in C minor (BWV 582) which uses a quartet of tenor and bass tubas, and Edgard Varèse's « Arcana » (1927) . The solo tuba in Maurice Ravel's orchestration of « Pictures at an Exhibition » (« Bydlo ») is sometimes played on the Wagner tuba. Yet, all of these are simply cameo appearances.

Danish composer Rued Langaard (1893-1952) used a quartet of Wagner tubas in his 1st Symphony (1908-1911) . When the work was premiered in Berlin, the Wagner tuba parts were played by horns to save money. Understandably, Langaard never again wrote for Wagner tubas !

As the Century wore on, many manufacturers went-out of business and closed their doors. Even the oldest extant maker of instruments, C. W. Moritz, shut down operations in 1955. The Wagner tuba was in danger of becoming a museum piece.

Wagner Tuba Revival

The 1960's brought a sea change for the Wagner tuba as 4 leading composers chose to give the instrument a significant role in important works : Friedrich Cerha (born in 1926) , in « Mouvements I-III » for chamber orchestra ; Einojuhani Rautavaara (born in 1928) , in his 3rd and 4th Symphonies (1961, 1962) , « Kaivos » (1963) , and « Angels and Visitations » (1978) ; Bernd Alois Zimmermann (1918-1970) in « Die Soldaten » (1958-1960) ; and Hans Werner Henze (born in 1926) in « Das Floß der Medusa » (1968, revised in 1990) .

There followed a rebirth of composing interest and, in the last 3rd of the 20th Century, the Wagner tuba had been used by Michaël Horwood (born in 1947) in his 3rd Symphony, « Andromeda » (1996) ; Jens-Peter Ostendorf (born in 1944) in his « Chor für Orchester » (1974) ; Alfred Reed in his « Theme » from « In Memoriam » (1971) ; Will Eisma (born in 1929) in his « Vanbridge Concerto » ; Eberhard Eyser (born in 1932) in his « Tornadas » ; Siegfried Borris (1906-1987) in his « Musik für Waldhorn » , Opus 109, Book 3, No. 4 ; Charles Shere (born in 1935) in his « Small Concerto for piano and orchestra » (1964) , « Night-music » (1967) , and « Tongues » (1978) ; Christopher Rouse in his Symphony No. 1 (1986) ; Sofia Gubaidulina (born in 1931) in her « Viola Concerto » (1997) ; Thomas Goss (born in 1962) in his « Uriel's Flame » (2000) and « The 7 Deadly Sins (of a dog) » (2002) .

Stephen Caudel's « Edel Rhapsody » for Wagner Tuba and small orchestra (1993) is the 1st and only work ever to feature the instrument in a solo role with orchestra.

Perhaps, the most prolific composer for Wagner tuba is the Cuban George Lopez (born in 1955) who composed a remarkable 11 works for Wagner tuba including : « Gonzales the Earth Eater for Solo Wagner Tuba and 4 Instruments » (1996) , and « Dome Park for 82 Instrumentalists » (1993) which includes 8 Wagner tubas (4 in B-flat, and 4 in F) .

From the 1960's onwards, the instrument reached Hollywood and even the Motown charts. The Wagner tuba was memorably used in Harry Nilsson's « Everybody's Talkin » ; Mason Williams' « Classical Gas » ; and Mike Post's « Rockford Files Theme » - the latter 2 being honoured with musical awards. The Wagner tuba has been used creatively in both Jazz and motion film scores.

The general impression of the Wagner tuba that is still current is of an outdated museum piece, and it is often the butt of caricature. Many hornists also have a problematical relationship with the instrument and do not normally like to play them. The Wagner tuba has a negative reputation of being hard to play and having intonational difficulties, but this stems purely from unfamiliarity with the instrument which can be the result of infrequent usage.

The one-time dearth of mid- 20th Century instrument-makers has now been turned around and there are currently 15 manufacturers of the Wagner tuba. Of these, Gebr. Alexander in Mainz are the longest continuous manufacturer. Additionally, there are 3 manufacturers of mutes for the Wagner tuba.

Compensating double tubas were re-introduced in the 1960's, to be followed by full double tubas, yet, these instruments have not been accepted without criticism.

At the start of the 21st Century, inclusion of the Wagner tuba in the orchestra shows no sign of waning. Sofia Gubaidulina wrote a « Saint-John's Passion » (2000) ; Gavin Bryars (born in 1943) wrote an Opera called « G » (2002) ; Esa-Pekka Salonen (born in 1958) wrote the orchestral work « Insomnia » (2002) ; Heinz Karl Gruber (born in 1943) wrote the orchestral work « Dancing in the Dark » (2003) ; and Klaus Lang (born in 1971) wrote the Opera « Die Perser » (2003) . Each of these compositions include Wagner tubas in their scores.

Les adaptations pour piano des Symphonies de Bruckner

Le succès incomparable et la gloire internationale que Bruckner connut après la création mondiale de sa 7e Symphonie donnée le 30 décembre 1884 au Nouveau Théâtre de Leipzig par l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » sous la direction d'Arthur Nikisch peut être attribué à la reconnaissance unanime du 2e mouvement en do dièse mineur. L'équilibre formel et la perfection structurelle de l'Adagio de la Symphonie en mi bémol majeur élèvent l'œuvre, dont le mouvement final fut écrit sous le choc de l'information de la mort du « Maître adoré et immortel » Richard Wagner, au rang des meilleures musiques funèbres du répertoire Symphonique. Même les critiques des journaux se laissèrent entraîner à rédiger des commentaires enthousiastes, qui atteignirent des sommets positifs jusque là inconnus lorsqu'il s'agit de la musique de Bruckner, et Hans Richter (1843-1916) , Maître de chapelle de la Cour et chef d'orchestre des concerts philharmoniques de Vienne, aurait affirmé plein d'enthousiasme que « depuis Ludwig van Beethoven, rien de pareil n'a été composé » . Même les adeptes d'Eduard Hanslick, qui dans sa fonction de professeur d'esthétique et d'histoire de la musique à l'Université de Vienne fut le chef de file de la critique hostile à Bruckner, se virent contraints de rédiger des commentaires bienveillants.

Étant donné qu'ils représentaient une idéologie Classique, les critiques continuèrent de diffamer Bruckner, lui reprochant d'être un épigone de Richard Wagner et un copiste naïf de la nouvelle École allemande, mais ils constatèrent cependant que l'on pouvait tomber sur « une beauté singulière, des idées géniales (!) » et des « passages intéressants, même beaux » . Ainsi Max Kalbeck, qui fut aux yeux de Bruckner un adepte du « méchant adversaire, le docteur Hanslick » , décrivit dans un article publié dans la « Wiener Presse » concernant l'exécution de la 7e Symphonie à Vienne (le 21 mars 1886) une « forte impression » qui fut provoquée chez l'auditeur par cet Adagio « relativement réussi » .

Hugo Wolf, un ami et compagnon d'infortune de Bruckner, plus jeune que celui-ci, raconta à quel point toute réaction positive concernant l'œuvre Symphonique de Bruckner, sans parler de réussite ou même de jubilation frénétique, fut unanimement réprouvée dans la presse contemporaine et que les milieux déterminants pour la musique à Vienne désapprouvèrent, bannirent et même empêchèrent les entreprises de Bruckner jusqu'au moment où cette Symphonie dédiée à Louis II, roi de Bavière, remporta sa victoire. Seulement 2 (!) jours avant l' « acte salvateur » d'Arthur Nikisch, Hugo Wolf décrivit dans une glose dans le « Wiener Salonblatt » la situation à ce moment désespérée du compositeur de la Haute-Autriche dans la métropole du Danube. Avec quelques paroles ironiques, il démasqua la compétence présumée ainsi que l'ignorance du public et de la critique comme n'étant qu'un demi savoir et il déplora « l'impression bouleversante de voir cet homme extraordinaire banni de la salle de concert et auquel devrait revenir l'honneur d'être joué et adoré en premier ». De plus, il accusa les partisans de Bruckner de ne pas savoir imposer le compositeur auprès des personnalités et institutions importantes de la vie culturelle publique à Vienne. Ainsi, l'on peut trouver un renvoi au chef Hans Richter qui dut affronter le refus de jouer des œuvres de Bruckner de son Orchestre philharmonique. Bruckner dut effectivement lutter pour pouvoir réaliser les peu nombreuses exécutions contemporaines de ses œuvres par des orchestres, et assez souvent il se vit contraint de présenter au public ses créations sur le piano.

Dans cette situation misérable, il fut soutenu principalement par Ferdinand Löwe, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, August Stradal et le pianiste Cyrill Hynais ; ceux-ci comptèrent parmi ses élèves et furent partisans des œuvres de leur Maître, il servirent de copiste, rédigèrent des réductions pour piano 4 mains et se présentèrent principalement comme interprètes des Symphonies de Bruckner au piano. Ces arrangements pour le piano furent exécutés, la plupart du temps, lors de concerts semi-officiels, organisés par des Associations de musique privées bourgeoises. Ainsi, l'association académique viennoise pour la promotion de Wagner et la nouvelle association de Richard Wagner offrirent à Bruckner assez souvent la seule et unique possibilité de se produire en tant que compositeur et artiste. Ainsi, la 7e Symphonie fut créée en entier le 27 février 1884 dans sa version pour 2 pianos 4 mains, laquelle fut réalisée par Josef Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe. La réduction pour piano 4 mains de Franz et Josef Schalk ainsi que l'arrangement pour 2 pianos de Hermann Behn furent publiées en 1895-1896 aux éditions Albert J. Gutmann. L'adaptation pour 2 mains, publiée chez Universal-Edition, fut réalisée par le pianiste Cyrill Hynais et reproduit fidèlement la partition pour orchestre. L'honnêteté de Hynais concernant l'adaptation pour piano doit être considérée comme exception ; assez souvent, les arrangements pour piano comprirent des modifications et des corrections, qui se laissèrent justifier pour des raisons de sonorité, mais qui furent réalisées par les adeptes Schalk, Löwe et Stradal afin de rendre les œuvres plus attrayantes.

C'est dans ce cadre qu'il s'agit d'évaluer la problématique des versions pour piano des œuvres de Anton Bruckner : Bruckner prit au sérieux ces interprétations de ses œuvres pour orchestre (il dirigea (!) lui-même la création mondiale de son « Te Deum » dans la version pour 2 pianos, cependant, il fut conscient des problèmes de ces exécutions quant à une interprétation fidèle à l'original des œuvres écrites pour la postérité. Ferdinand Löwe, les frères Schalk et Cyrill Hynais furent des pianistes remarquables et des instrumentalistes capables, sans aucun doute, de réaliser des « exécutions soignées, presque orchestrales » et pouvant transmettre le contenu des compositions, même si l'orchestration et la sonorité furent pour Bruckner des éléments musicaux aussi importants que le rythme, la mélodie ou l'harmonie. L'emploi des tubas dans sa « musique funèbre » (7e Symphonie, Adagio, à la lettre X), un hommage à Richard Wagner, peut servir d'exemple. Les comptes rendus dans la presse contemporaine montrent que le public et la critique furent tout à fait capables de différencier entre les « interprétations parfaites » des adaptations et la « beauté pressentie » de l'original. Participer à de tels « concerts de piano » servit donc également à la préparation et à la transmission d'un avant-goût de l'exécution orchestrale. Les transcriptions pour piano furent par conséquent un moyen légitime pour l'occupation avec l'œuvre orchestrale d'un compositeur et pour l'assimilation et la promulgation d'œuvres rarement données en concert.

Arrangements of Symphonic music which remained as close as possible to the original text were very popular in the 19th Century. Piano arrangements played an increasingly important role in concert life, and the arrangements of Bruckner's Symphonies, in particular, have been described as « well-known examples » of this genre. (1)

Why was it so important to perform Bruckner's Symphonies in piano transcriptions ? Who made them, who played them, when were they printed ?

One reason was the musical situation in Vienna in the late- 1870's and 1880's. When Bruckner moved to Vienna, in 1868, he was known as an organist, teacher and composer of church music. Nevertheless, his 1st Symphony was performed in Linz, in 1868.

In the « Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein » and with the help of some young musicians and he found a means to get his music performed and to popularize it among the interested public.

Founded in 1872, the « Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein » found its importance not only in drawing attention to Richard Wagner and the Bayreuth Festival, but as well to Bruckner as a composer. (2)

As performances of the orchestral versions presented difficulties, Bruckner's Symphonies were introduced to the public in arrangements for piano (2 hands, 4 hands) or 2 pianos at so-called « Internen Abenden » (internal evenings) of the « Wagner-Verein » , thus, providing a foretaste of eventual orchestral performances of his works.

As Leon Botstein considers, it was very important for new music such as Bruckner's to be performed in this way, as « the anticipation of a work's actual sound before a live hearing made the live event that much more impressive » . (3)

Let us now follow the history of Bruckner's Symphonies in Vienna and see the differences in their reception.

3rd Symphony

One of the earliest piano reductions of a Bruckner Symphony was arranged by Gustav Mahler, and probably Rudolf Krzyzanowski, soon after the 1st orchestral performance of the 3rd Symphony, on 16 December 1877, in Vienna. It is interesting to consider that, only 2 weeks later on 30 December 1877, the 1st performance of Johannes Brahms' 2nd Symphony was reasonably successful.

In 1878, Theodor Rättig published the piano version as well as the orchestral score (in the 2nd version) .

The 1st performance of a piano arrangement of the 3rd Symphony took place on 12 November 1879 when Hans Paumgartner and Felix Mottl played the Adagio and Scherzo, in Gustav Mahler's arrangement. The critic for « Die

Presse » reported :

« There is no more reliable indicator of the worth of a musical work than the effect it has when heard more often, and this work made a thrilling and electrifying impression. » (4)

In the 1st common concert of the Schalk brothers, on 24 March 1882, Josef Schalk performed his arrangement of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony in the composer's presence. One reviewer praised both Schalk for his arrangement and Bruckner for the vitality of his composition, which was by no means « only a series of phrases strung together » . (5)

On 7 May 1883, Schalk and Franz Zottmann played the 3rd Symphony on 2 pianos. On 22 December 1884, Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe performed the Scherzo and, on 23 April 1885, the 1st movement of the 3rd. On 5 March 1890, Löwe played the Adagio and Scherzo from the 3rd Symphony and was commended for « achieving the best possible results in making the polyphony clear » . (6)

In 1890, Theodor Rättig published the 4 hand version for piano arranged by Schalk and Löwe - at the end of the same year, on 21 December 1890, Hans Richter conducted the 3rd version of the 3rd Symphony in Vienna.

4th Symphony

The next music of a Bruckner Symphony, in Vienna, was presented on 4th February 1880 when, once again, Hans Paumgartner and Felix Mottl played the piano parts in their own arrangement of the 2nd and 3rd movements of the 4th Symphony in the composer's presence. As it was the 1st performance of this work, one critic expressed his desire to « hear it in full orchestral sound » so that he would be able to say more about it. (7)

On 7 October 1880, the same duo performed the 1st movement of the 4th Symphony. It was Mottl's farewell - he moved as musical director to Karlsruhe where he conducted an unsuccessful performance of the 4th, in December 1881.

Beside these internal evenings of the « Wagner-Verein » , there were weekly meetings with lectures and recitals. At one such meeting, on 12 January 1881, movements of the 4th Symphony were performed, perhaps, by way of preparation for the orchestral concert on 20 February when Hans Richter conducted the Symphony, in the « Musikverein » . Although the performance was successful the critical reviews were mixed.

Max Kalbeck, one of the harshest critics of Bruckner's music, wrote :

« The 4 movements of his work are a veritable Symphony-Tetralogy and each on its own is sufficient to kill-off an unprepared Orchestra. » (8)

In 1883, the same Hans Paumgartner, who was also a performer of Bruckner's music, wrote in a biographical article about Bruckner that the composer had not yet obtained the recognition he deserved. (9)

On 29 January 1884, Josef Schalk played the 1st and 2nd movements of the 4th Symphony. The reviewer remarked that the work had made a powerful impression, although performed on the piano rather than the Orchestra. (10)

In 1884, Friedrich Eckstein praised Josef Schalk and his pianistic skills when he performed the 3rd movement of the 4th Symphony, but he also argued :

« Nevertheless, a good piano interpretation can never take the place of an Orchestra, and the fact that great orchestral works of a native composer have to be performed on the piano for the public actually to know them at all shows the musical conditions in Vienna in a sad light. About this, there is much to be said and complained about. »
(11)

On 22nd December 1884, Schalk and Löwe performed the 1st movement of the 4th.

On 19 January 1888, Josef Schalk played the 4th Symphony in a so-called « Ladies Evening » , in the « Wagner-Verein » . A few days later, on 22nd January 1888, Hans Richter conducted the same Symphony, in the « Musikverein » . In the same year, on 4 April 1888, the 4th was performed in New York.

...

Anton Bruckner hat nur wenige orchestrale Aufführungen seiner Symphonien erlebt, einige seiner Werke wurden im Wiener « Akademischen Richard-Wagner-Verein » auf zwei Klavieren durch seine Freunde und Schüler (Franz und Josef Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, Felix Mottl, Doktor Hans Paumgartner, August Stradal und andere) einem eingeweihten Kreis erstmals zu Gehör gebracht. Auch Bruckners Zeitgenosse Johannes Brahms pflegte diese Praxis der symphonisch / pianistischen Probe-Voraufführungen und fertigte von jedem seiner großen Orchesterwerke eigenhändig Versionen für zwei Klaviere an, welche er vor der eigentlichen Orchester-Uraufführung im Wiener Ehrbar-Saal oder im Salon des befreundeten Chirurgen Theodor Billroth für gewogene Freunde musizieren ließ.

Der später berühmte Wagner- und Bruckner-Interpret und damalige Bruckner-Schüler Felix Mottl setzte als artistischer Leiter des Wagner-Vereins schon ab 1879 regelmäßige Aufführungen Bruckner'scher Werke auf das Programm. « In den Gesellen-Donnerstag eine gehörige Portion Bruckner hineinstreichen » , so charakterisiert der Bruckner-Schüler Josef Schalk diese Abende. Die « Romantische Symphonie » erklang erstmals am 4. Februar 1880 (also ein Jahr vor der Uraufführung durch die Wiener Philharmoniker unter dem Dirigenten Hans Richter am 20.02.1881) durch Doktor Hans Paumgartner und Felix Mottl auf zwei Klavieren. Diese Fassung ist verschollen. Die vorliegende Transkription der IV. Symphonie wurde von Matthias Giesen und Klaus Laczika anhand der Transkriptionen von Doktor Karl Grunsky (1911) und Doktor Walter Magnus (1917) (beide auf Basis der bekanntlich stark veränderten Orchesterfassung von Franz Schalk) instrumentatorisch und dynamisch wieder an Bruckners Urtext angeglichen. Die Aufführung will weder bürgerliche Klavier-Hausmusik-Traditionen der Jahrhundertwende zu Konzerten überhöhen, noch kann und will sie den von Anton Bruckner intendierten orchestralen Klangreichtum eines Symphoniekonzertes reproduzieren, sondern will das zeitgenössische Klangerlebnis der Erstaufführung reproduzieren und in einer Art von Werkstatt-Atmosphäre eine im Kreis um Anton Bruckner übliche Konzertform und Tradition der frühen Vermittlung von Anton Bruckners symphonischem Werk (so wie es dem Komponisten selbst zu Gehör gebracht wurde) wieder erlebbar machen.

7th Symphony

On 10 February 1883, Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann played in their 1st joint-recital the 1st and 3rd movements of the 7th Symphony, although Bruckner had still not finished the work. In May 1883, Hans Paumgartner showed his own interest in Bruckner's music by mentioning this 7th Symphony in an article. (12)

1 year later, on 27 February 1884, Schalk and Löwe played the 7th Symphony. On 16 January 1884, Bruckner had written to Josef Schalk :

« Do you really intend to play 2 movements with Löwe on 2 pianos ? You must know only too well (as does Löwe) that a Symphony like mine cannot produce its proper effect when played with 2 hands only. I would be very grateful if I could hear it once, for the sake of the tempi. » (13)

On 4 November 1884, Josef Schalk achieved great success in performing the Adagio of the 7th and the Scherzo of the 4th Symphony. He was described as one of the « most brilliant and musically educated pianists in Vienna ». The Adagio of the 7th was called the « most interesting number of the evening ». The reviewer added, however, that it was difficult to « gain a convincing impression of this extremely complicated piece of music on hearing it for the 1st time » and that it lost its full effect in being played on the piano. He also criticised a few insensitive and tactless people who had left the hall during the playing of the Adagio ! (14)

Once again, it was argued that the Philharmonic Society consistently ignored a national composer with the result that he would not become known to the rest of the world.

Schalk's arrangement of the Adagio exists in a copy made by August Göllerich and dated with « 18 November 1884 ». (15)

And, once again, Friedrich Eckstein writes :

« We are confronted, here, with new and elusive musical wonders ! What mysteries of bold chromaticism and enharmonicism they contain ! You have to hear this Adagio several times, in order to appreciate the profundity of the great contrapuntal skill ! » (16)

On 30 December 1884, the orchestral version of the 7th Symphony was performed by Arthur Nikisch in Leipzig, for the 1st time, followed by a performance, in March 1885 in Munich, under Hermann Levi, both in the composer's presence. On 30 May 1885, the Adagio was performed in Karlsruhe.

Hans Paumgartner criticized the « learned musicians at the Court Opera Orchestra » for their inability to evaluate the true worth of Bruckner's Symphonies and for forcing him to « eat the bread of artistic exile », as a result of their refusal to perform his works. (17)

1 year later, on 30 December 1885, Löwe again partnered Schalk in a performance of the 1st and 3rd movements of the 7th Symphony, in a 2 piano arrangement ; a performance that was greeted with enthusiasm although it « cried-out for an orchestral interpretation » . (18) Only a few days later, Albert J. Gutmann published the piano score (for 4 hands) of the Symphony.

On 18 March 1886, Löwe and Schalk played the 7th Symphony, in a weekly meeting of the « Wagner-Verein » . Only 3 days later, on 21st March 1886, the 1st orchestral performance, in Vienna, took place in a concert in the « Musikverein » which was a great success for Bruckner. The Symphony was the 1st to be performed world-wide : in 1886, it was performed in Boston, Chicago and Amsterdam ; followed, in 1887, in Berlin and London.

On 24 February 1889, Hans Richter conducted the 7th Symphony with the Philharmonic, in a concert organized by the « Wagner-Verein » . Because of the « private » nature of the performance, the concert was attended by people who were really interested in the composer and his music :

« The artistic success was enormous. There was wild applause for Bruckner, after each movement. » (19)

In 1896, the piano reduction for 4 hands was published by the brothers Franz and Josef Schalk. On 26 October 1896, only 1 day after the unveiling of Bruckner's bust in Vienna, Ferdinand Löwe performed the 1st 2 movements of the 7th Symphony.

...

Klavierauszüge erfüllen eine doppelte Funktion. In einem frühen Stadium erleichterten sie dem Komponisten das Skizzieren, Erproben und Kennenlernen, anschließend konnten sie wesentlich zur Verbreitung eines Werkes beitragen. Der erstgenannte Aspekt gewann an Bedeutung, als die Werke immer länger und komplizierter wurden, dabei eine immer größere Besetzung verlangten. Als die Möglichkeit technischer Reproduzierbarkeit von Musik noch nicht gegeben war, waren es dann nicht zuletzt die Klavierauszüge, die eine Begegnung mit selten aufgeführten Werken erlaubten. Falsch wäre indessen die Vermutung, an Klavierauszügen bestünde heute kein Bedarf mehr : Wer einmal eine Oper oder ein Orchesterwerk selbst « in den Fingern » gehabt hat, wird eine Vertrautheit mit dem Werk bemerkt haben, die sich beim bloßen Anhören niemals eingestellt hätte. Vorbei sind allerdings die Zeiten, daß jedermann froh war, wenn er sich den Klavierauszug eines Werkes sein Eigen nannte, denn erstens sind inzwischen selbst entlegene Werke auf Tonträger greifbar, und außerdem sind vielfach günstige Studienpartituren erhältlich, die (eine intensive Nutzung vorausgesetzt) eine sehr genaue Begegnung mit dem Werk ermöglichen. Unabdingbar sind Klavierauszüge aber nach wie vor bei den Proben in den Opernhäusern, wo allein aus ökonomischen Gründen nicht immer mit dem ganzen Orchester gearbeitet werden kann.

Klavierauszüge wurden jedoch nicht nur von Opern, sondern von nahezu allen spätromantischen Orchesterwerken hergestellt. Johannes Brahms spielte seine Sinfonien mit befreundeten Musikern an zwei Klavieren, und natürlich wurden die Werke von Anton Bruckner und Gustav Mahler zunächst in reduzierter Besetzung erprobt. Wie Ludwig van Beethoven und Johannes Brahms war auch Anton Bruckner kein gebürtiger Wiener. Anton Bruckner stammte aus Oberösterreich, wirkte zunächst als Lehrer und Stiftsorganist in Sankt Florian, wurde Domorganist in Linz und schließlich Professor am Wiener Konservatorium. Bruckner zählt zu den bedeutenden Sinfonikern des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts. Offiziell werden neun Sinfonien gezählt, von denen die letzte unvollendet blieb, während zwei Studiensinfonien nicht mitgezählt werden. Nicht in Wien, sondern in Leipzig wurde die siebte Sinfonie am 30. Dezember 1884 uraufgeführt. Der Uraufführung unter der Leitung von Arthur Nikisch gingen mehrere private Aufführungen voraus. Bereits am 10. Februar 1883 spielten Josef Schalk und Franz Zottmann an zwei Klavieren im Wiener Bösendorfer-Saal den ersten und den dritten Satz, und am 27. Februar 1884 trugen Josef Schalk und Ferdinand Löwe das vollständige Werk vor. Bereits 1885 hatte Albert J. Gutmann einen zweihändigen Klavierauszug hergestellt, die Brüder Franz und Josef Schalk hatten das Werk 1896 für Klavier zu vier Händen eingerichtet, und noch im gleichen Jahr legte Hermann Behn eine Fassung für zwei Klaviere vor. Im frühen zwanzigsten Jahrhundert hat Otto Singer dann für die Leipziger Edition C.F. Peters alle Bruckner-Sinfonien für Klavier zu vier Händen eingerichtet. Otto Singer (1863-1931) hat eine ganze Reihe von Klavierauszügen vorgelegt und beispielsweise die Opern von Richard Strauß für Klavier eingerichtet. Hier wie dort stand er vor der Aufgabe, bei der nötigen Reduzierung den orchestralen Charakter der Musik zu erhalten. Dieses Problem war nicht gänzlich neu, weil viele Komponisten ihren Klavierstücken bereits ein orchestrales Kolorit gaben, während andererseits die zahlreichen Tremoli der Bruckner Sinfonien umgesetzt werden mußten und nun eine echte Herausforderung an die Interpreten darstellen.

Die Sinfonie Nr. 7 in E-Dur zählt zu den bekanntesten Werken Anton Bruckners. Das Werk entstand in den Jahren 1881 bis 1883 und wurde dem König Ludwig II. von Bayern gewidmet. Die Arbeit am Kopfsatz wurde am 23. September 1881 begonnen und zog sich bis zum 29. Dezember 1882 hin. Das ernste Adagio soll dann unter dem Eindruck vom Tode Richard Wagners entstanden sein. Wird Bruckners Musik für Klavier eingerichtet, dann sind verschiedene Punkte zu berücksichtigen. Natürlich kann ein einziger Spieler das große Orchesterwerk nur unvollkommen andeuten, eine Fassung für Klavier zu vier Händen bietet da schon mehr Möglichkeiten. Aber schon das eröffnende Streichertremolo, das dem Dreiklangshauptthema vorausgeht, will richtig angedeutet sein und stellt erst den Bearbeiter und dann den Interpreten vor Schwierigkeiten. Die Beliebtheit der siebten Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner ist verständlich. Schon in den frühen Kritiken wurden der klare formale Aufbau und die Dramaturgie der Komposition gerühmt. Obwohl das Zentrum der Komposition im langsamen Satz zu suchen ist, kann die Richtigkeit der Urteile bereits am Kopfsatz festgemacht werden. Dieser exponiert nämlich zunächst ein kantables Hauptthema, und überwiegend kantabel ist auch der Charakter des Satzes. Entgegen der Arbeit mit kurzen Motiven in anderen Bruckner Sinfonien gehört die Arbeit mit weit gespannten Melodiebögen zu den Besonderheiten der « Siebten » .

Ist Symphony

As mentioned above, the Ist Symphony was performed in Linz, in 1868. As late as 31st January 1884, a movement of this music was heard in Vienna when Ferdinand Löwe gave his Ist recital, playing his own arrangement of the Adagio from the Ist Symphony. Theodor Helm reports in his « Erinnerungen » about « the accomplished piano transcription, very close to the original orchestral score » . (20)

A critic wrote about the performance :

« Concerning the Adagio of the Symphony performed by Ferdinand Löwe, it is as an integral part of a great unknown organism beyond superficial judgement. Altogether, this Adagio is of a peculiar atmosphere, after remaining contemplative for too long, it makes a surprising passionate upswing. » (21)

In a so-called « Bruckner-Abend » , which took place on 22nd December 1884, Josef Schalk and his new partner Ferdinand Löwe played the whole 1st Symphony on 2 pianos, in an arrangement by Löwe.

Although the Symphony was not yet well-known in Vienna, the 2 piano performance was highly-successful. (20) According to Theodor Helm, the Scherzo made the greatest impact (22) and it is reported that :

« After the Scherzo, the very select audience responded with a great tribute to the Master. » (23)

« Such frenetic applause was rarely heard, considering how Bruckner has been ignored by the Orchestras. » (24)

On 23 April 1885, Löwe and Schalk, again, played the Adagio and Finale from the 1st Symphony, in Löwe's arrangement, and the 1st movement of the 3rd Symphony, on 2 pianos :

« Every sincere music-lover was indebted to both artists for arranging some movements from Bruckner's Symphonies for piano and presenting them to the public with youthful enthusiasm and with such astonishing technical assurance that they and the composer, who was present, were received with acclamation at the end of each movement. » (25)

On 30 December 1891, Ferdinand Löwe played the 2nd and 4th movements of the 1st Symphony, less than 3 weeks after the 1st performance of the revised version of the work, in a Philharmonic concert on 13 December. Once again, Löwe was praised as an « unsurpassable interpreter of Bruckner's music » and the critic noted that he played the movements « from memory with thrilling effect » .

In 1892, the arrangement for 4 hands was published by Ludwig Döbbling. The 1st « Linz » version wasn't performed by an Orchestra, until 1934.

5th Symphony

The 1st performance of the 5th Symphony, on 20 April 1887, in a 2 piano version played by Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann took place at the « Wagner-Verein » after some problems, such as severe difficulties with Bruckner before the concert. (This occasion typified Bruckner's often-stubborn character.)

Josef Schalk's error was to prepare the work in secret and invite Bruckner only to the final rehearsal. Bruckner was, apparently, offended by the assumption that his input would be required only at the final stage. The composer threatened to cancel the concert unless Schalk and the other pianist, Franz Zottmann, held additional rehearsals under his direction.

Friedrich Klose described the following scene in « Gause » 's restaurant with Bruckner, at one point, threatening to call the police to stop the performance taking place.

On the next day, Bruckner put his feelings into words in a calm but firm letter to Schalk dated 25 March 1887 :

« Dearest, most honourable friend !

Yesterday, I came to the firm decision that I would resolutely decline with thanks all performances of my works, unless they were preceded by one or more weeks of thorough rehearsal - moreover, rehearsals in my presence.

I would, therefore, ask you to choose something other than my 5th Symphony. But, please, arrange rehearsals in the course of April and May, when I will tackle the work with you myself. With heartfelt sympathy and appealing to our old friendship. »

The performance of 20 April 1887 was appreciated :

« After hearing it for the 1st time, and in view of the conscientious, effective and excellent execution of the arrangement for 2 pianos which only anticipates the richness of Bruckner's orchestral sound, it remains for a later time to discuss this extremely great and courageous work whose 1st impression is extremely powerful. » (26)

And Theodor Helm argued :

« Schalk and Zottmann performed a noble and honourable task by giving us an insight into the creative mind of our genial Bruckner. They acted as pioneers in their penetration of the intricate Symphonic textures." (27)

Even with the extra-rehearsals, a scandal nearly ensued when Bruckner hesitated before acknowledging the applause. In any case, it may have been this concert that planted the idea of revision in Bruckner's mind.

On 30 December 1891, Ferdinand Löwe performed the 2nd and 4th movements and, on 28 November 1895, he played the 1st 3 movements of the 5th Symphony :

« Ferdinand Löwe arranged this great work for the piano and played the 1st 3 movements (the powerful Finale had to remain unperformed because of limited time) with perfect Mastery, as always by heart, a performance which no one else can imitate. » (28)

On the other hand, Camillo Horn argued that :

« The sound of Bruckner's music deprived of its orchestral basis, even though it received a most perfect rendering, loses much of its fascination. » (29)

In 1894, Franz Schalk conducted the 1st orchestral performance of the 5th, in Graz.

In 1896, the 1st print of the Symphony, edited by Franz Schalk, including Josef Schalk's 4 hand piano transcription, was published by Ludwig Döblinger.

6th Symphony

The 1st performance of only the 2nd and 3rd movements of the 6th Symphony took place on 11 February 1883, with Wilhelm Jahn and the Vienna Philharmonic. As Bruckner wrote, in 1882 :

« The Philharmonic were so pleased with the work that they applauded vigorously and played a fanfare. » (30)

But, after the performance, Max Kalbeck reports :

« We wish to be far from the future which is able to enjoy such a distorted piece of music. » (31)

In the following year, it was Ferdinand Löwe who promoted this Symphony. On 28 December 1890, Löwe played the 2nd and 3rd movements and, on 29 November 1894, the 1st movement of the 6th, in an « Internal Evening » :

« The hero of the evening was Professor Löwe who has still not received sufficient recognition as an excellent musician and specialist performer of Bruckner's music. His recital of the 1st movement of the 6th, rendered with great accuracy and played with an orchestral sound, was unanimously admired. We also wish to put on record that Löwe played this very difficult movement from memory. » (32)

The « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » music-critic agreed that the performance was excellent but observed that the piano score just hinted at the beauty of the orchestral score and could only « whet one's appetite for an orchestral performance » . (33)

On 18 March 1897, Ferdinand Löwe performed the 1st movement of the 6th. The critic said that he had the ability to « give some idea of the instrumentation of this almost unknown work in his playing » . (34)

The Viennese public had to wait until 1899 to hear the whole Symphony when Gustav Mahler conducted an orchestral performance of an abbreviated version with instrumental modifications. In the same year, the 1st edition was published by Ludwig Döblinger.

Löwe played the 4th movement at the « Wagner-Verein » concert, on 7 April 1900. It was not until March 1901 that an uncut orchestral performance of the 6th Symphony was given in Stuttgart.

8th Symphony

A proof of the close connection between Bruckner and Josef Schalk is an early piano arrangement of the 1st 2 movements of the 8th Symphony, in 1886, when the Symphony was not yet finished. (35)

As late as 22nd November 1892, Josef Schalk played the 1st movement of the 8th Symphony in an « Internal Evening » . One reviewer described his performance as a « commendable preparation » for the forthcoming orchestral performance of « this most remarkable work » which took place on 18 December. (36)

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt calls this performance « a turning point » in the conflict between the Philharmonic and Bruckner's music. (37)

Josef Schalk also gave lectures entitled « Über Bruckner's VIII. Symphonie » (About Bruckner's 8th Symphony) with music examples. These lectures were criticized. Hans Puchstein (38) remarked that difficult works of this nature demanded « a 4 hand performance, at the very least » and, even then, were of interest only for those who already knew them. For those who were not acquainted with the work, a piano performance was « of very little practical use » . (39) Another critic made the point that, even in the hands of accomplished pianists who were able to produce an orchestral sound on the piano, there was something « extremely incomplete » about the piano arrangements of the « most recent orchestral works written by German composers » . (40)

After considering the history of Bruckner's Symphonic music in Vienna, we notice that the 2nd Symphony is not mentioned. After the orchestral performances, in 1872 and 1876 in Vienna, both conducted by Bruckner, this music never was played on the piano. An edition for piano for 4 hands was published as late as the orchestral score, in 1892. But there is an arrangement of the Scherzo by Cyrill Hynais, from November 1884, and later annotated by August Göllerich :

« Scherzo aus der Franz Liszt gewidmeten II. Symphonie von Anton Bruckner. Arrangirt für Pianoforte zweihändig von C. Hynais. 26. November 84 » , written by August Göllerich. (41)

« By means of such concerts, Bruckner's devoted friends and pupils were attempting to increase his public profile » , as Crawford Howie writes in his Bruckner biography. (42) And the « artistic apostles » (43) continued to do so also, after the composers death.

Nowadays, Bruckner's music is accepted all over the world. Piano arrangements are a curiosity for our musical ears now used to the orchestral sound. At the beginning of the 21st Century, we are now able to experience the sound of the late- 19th Century, either actively or passively.

A CD of transcriptions for Piano 4 hands of Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 1 and 2 is available at www.abruckner.com .

Symphony No. 3 in the arrangement for piano 4 hands by Gustav Mahler and Rudolf Krzyżanowski is issued on « MDG GOLD » : 330 0591-2.

Notes

(1) Helmut Loos. « Zur Klavierübertragung von Werken für und mit Orchester des 19. und 20. Jahrhunderts » in : « Schriften zur Musik » No. 25, Munich / Salzburg (1983) ; page 26.

(2) Andrea Harrandt. « Frühe pädagogische Vermittlungsversuche für Bruckner im Wiener Akademischen Wagner-Verein, in : « Bruckner-Symposion - Musik ist eine bildende Kunst » , Linz (2002) ; Bericht, Linz (2005) , pages 173-180.

Andrea Harrandt. « Students and friends as “ prophets ” and “ promoters ” : the reception of Bruckner’s works in the “ Wiener Akademische Wagner-Verein ” » , in : « Perspectives on Anton Bruckner » , edited by Crawford Howie, Paul Hawkshaw, Timothy L. Jackson, Ashgate (2001) ; pages 317-327.

(3) Leon Botstein. « Music and it’s Public : Habits of Listening and the Crisis of Musical Modernism in Vienna (1850-1914) » , Ph.D. Dissertation, Harvard University (1985) ; page 452.

(4) « Die Presse » (19 November 1879) .

(5) « Die Presse » (31 March 1882) .

(6) « Musikalische Rundschau » (10 March 1890) .

(7) « Deutsche Kunst- und Musikzeitung » (10 February 1880) .

(8) « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » (23 February 1881) , quoted from : Crawford Howie. « Anton Bruckner - A Documentary Biography » , Volume 2 : « Trial, Tribulation and Triumph in Vienna » , Lewiston (2002) ; page 355.

(9) « Wiener Zeitung » (27 May 1883) , quoted from : Crawford Howie, Volume 2 ; page 387.

(10) « Deutsche Zeitung » (7 February 1884) .

(11) « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (5 December 1884) .

(12) « Wiener Zeitung » (27 May 1883) , quoted from : Crawford Howie, Volume 2 ; page 388.

(13) A-Wn, F18.Schalk.178a.

(14) « Deutsche Zeitung » (6 November 1884) .

- (15) A-Wn, Mus.Hs.19674.
- (16) « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » (5 December 1884) .
- (17) « Wiener Abendpost » (13 January 1885) , quoted from : Crawford Howie, Volume 2 ; page 441.
- (18) « Morgenpost » (31 December 1885) .
- (19) Thomas Leibnitz. « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner. Dargestellt an den Nachlassbeständen der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek » , « Publikationen des Instituts für Österreichische Musikdokumentation, Nummer 14, Tutzing (1988) ; page 138.
- (20) August Göllerich and Max Auer, Band IV/1 ; page 577.
- (21) « Deutsche Zeitung » (7 February 1884) .
- (22) « Deutsche Zeitung » (24 December 1884) .
- (23) August Göllerich and Max Auer, Band IV/2 ; page 212.
- (24) « Allgemeine Kunst-Chronik » (17 January 1885) .
- (25) « Deutsche Kunst- und Musikzeitung » (1 May 1885) .
- (26) « Musikalische Rundschau » (1 May 1887) .
- (27) « Deutsche Zeitung » (26 April 1887) .
- (28) « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » (3 December 1895) .
- (29) « Deutsches Volksblatt » (7 December 1895) .
- (30) Letter to Therese von Jäger (13 October 1882) , quoted from : Crawford Howie, Volume 2 ; page 377.
- (31) « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » (13 February 1883) , quoted from : Crawford Howie, Volume 2 ; page 381.
- (32) « Deutsches Volksblatt » (2 December 1894) .
- (33) « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » (18 December 1884) .

(34) « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » (24 March 1897) .

(35) A-Wn F18.Schalk.453.

(36) « Deutsche Zeitung » (24 November 1892) .

(37) Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt. « Bruckner Symphony No. 8 » , Cambridge Music Handbooks, Cambridge University Press (2000) ; page 4.

(38) « Deutsches Volksblatt » (7 December 1892) .

(39) « Deutsches Volksblatt » (7 December 1892) .

(40) « Ostdeutsche Rundschau » (18 December 1892) .

(41) A-Wn Mus.Hs.19670.

(42) Crawford Howie. Volume 2 ; page 488.

(43) « Allgemeine Kunst-Chronik » (17 January 1885) .

Anton Bruckner am Klavier

(Bruckner als Klavierkomponist und seine Symphonien in Klaviertranskriptionen)

Anton Bruckner als Klavierkomponist

Bruckner, der Symphoniker, als Komponist kleiner Formen ? - Bevor Bruckner zum Symphoniker reifte, schrieb er Musik, die in seinem Umfeld verankert war : Kirchenmusik, Lied- und Chorwerke, Klavierstücke.

Bruckners Klavierstücke zu zwei und vier Händen sind reine Gelegenheitswerke, die zwischen 1850 und 1868 entstanden. Es handelt sich um Widmungskompositionen und Werke für den von ihm erteilten Klavierunterricht. Stilistisch folgen sie der Wiener Klassik oder stehen den Werken von Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy nahe und spiegeln den musikalischen Geschmack ihrer Entstehungszeit wider.

Die ersten Klavierstücke entstanden in Sankt Florian, wo Bruckner von 1845 bis 1855 als Schullehrer wirkte und (zunächst provisorischer) Stiftsorganist war. Hier gründete er, ebenso wie schon vorher in Kronstorf, ein Männerensemble, für das er die Quartette Wie des Bächleins Silberquelle und Sternschnuppen komponierte.

1850 schrieb er für Aloisia Bogner, die Tochter des ihm vorgesetzten Schullehrers Michaël Bogner, die Lancier-Quadrille, in der er Motive aus dem Wildschütz und Zar und Zimmermann von Gustav Albert Lortzing und aus der Regimentstochter von Gaetano Donizetti verarbeitete. Beide Werke wurden am Linzer Theater gespielt und es ist möglich, daß Bruckner sie auf der Bühne gesehen hat. Entgegen der allgemein fünf Touren umfassenden Quadrille ist diese viersätzig angelegt.

Ebenfalls um 1850 und für Aloisia Bogner entstand der Steiermärker in G-Dur (WAB 122) . Die Gelegenheitskomposition hat volkstümlichen Charakter, erinnert an einen stilisierten Ländler und zeigt eine vielleicht von Schubert beeinflusste Harmonik.

Drei kleine Stücke für Klavier zu vier Händen (WAB 124) entstanden in den Jahren 1853 bis 1855 für die Kinder des Bezirksrichters Josef Marböck in Sankt Florian, die sie bei verschiedenen Familienfesten spielten.

Ein weiteres, ebenfalls als Quadrille bezeichnetes vierhändiges Stück (WAB 121) entstand 1854 und ist dem Stiftsrichter von Sankt Florian, Georg Ruckenstein gewidmet. In seiner sechssätzigigen Form (Pantalon, Été, Poule, Trénis, Pastourelle und Finale) entspricht es der seit dem Beginn des 19. Jahrhunderts üblichen Form der Quadrille.

Im Dezember 1855 übersiedelte Bruckner nach Linz, um seine Stelle als Dom- und Stadtpfarrorganist anzutreten. Er nahm aber auch am gesellschaftlichen Leben der Hauptstadt des Kronlandes Österreich ob der Enns teil. Zunächst war er kurze Zeit ausübendes Mitglied der Liedertafel Frohsinn und 1860-1861 und 1868 deren Chorleiter. Immer wieder wirkte er bei Konzerten mit, sei es als Dirigent, sei es als Pianist beziehungsweise Liedbegleiter. Er besuchte Ballveranstaltungen und soll auch ein begeisterter Tänzer gewesen sein.

Vermutlich 1856 entstand das Klavierstück Es-Dur (WAB 119) für den Klavierunterricht. Als stilistisches Vorbild ist Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy erkennbar, ebenso wie bei dem 1863 komponierten Charakterstück Stille Betrachtung an einem Herbstabende in Fis-Moll (WAB 123) , in dem dessen Venetianisches Gondellied Opus 30/6 anklingt.

Weitere Klavierstücke in Form von Kompositionsübungen enthält das so genannte Kitzler-Studienbuch, das 1861 bis 1863 während Bruckners Studien beim Linzer Kapellmeister Otto Kitzler entstand.

1868 entstand die zweisätzig Fantasia in G-Dur (WAB 118) , die der Klavierschülerin Alexandrine Soyka gewidmet ist, ebenso wie das im selben Jahr entstandene Charakterstück Erinnerung in As-Dur (WAB 117) , das in seiner Kompositionstechnik schon auf den Symphoniker Bruckner hinweist.

Bruckners Symphonien

Die Aufführung von Werken Bruckners in der Bearbeitung für Klavier zu zwei oder vier Händen beziehungsweise für zwei Klaviere war ein wichtiger Beitrag zur Rezeption des Komponisten im Wien der 1880er und 1890er Jahre.

Seit 1868 lebte Bruckner in der Haupt- und Residenzstadt Wien, als Professor für Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, als expektierender und ab 1878 kaiserlicher Organist der Hofmusikkapelle und ab 1876 auch als Lektor an der Universität Wien. Als Komponist hingegen konnte er zunächst im Musikleben Wiens nicht Fuss fassen - teils scheiterte er selbst bei den Aufführungen seiner Werke, teils vernichtete ihn die Kritik.

So kam dem 1873 gegründeten Wiener akademischen Richard Wagner-Verein, der nicht nur die Werke seines Namenspatrons förderte, sondern auch jene von Anton Bruckner und später von Hugo Wolf, eine wichtige Rolle zu. Hans Paumgartner, Franz Zottmann und vor allem Josef Schalk und Ferdinand Löwe setzten sich in den folgenden Jahren als Pianisten und Bearbeiter in zahlreichen Aufführungen für die Rezeption nicht nur der symphonischen Werke Bruckners ein.

Die erste Aufführung dieser Art fand am 12. November 1879 im Bösendorfersaal statt : Hans Paumgartner und Felix Mottl spielten Adagio und Scherzo der Dritten Symphonie. Konnte die Klavierfassung auch nicht das Orchester ersetzen, so gewann das Publikum doch einen ersten Eindruck, wie etwa auch Die Presse am 19. November 1879 feststellte :

« So verdanken wir diesem Vereine, daß wir im letzten Jahre unter anderen seltenen Sachen ein Werk zu hören bekamen, von dem das musikalische Publicum keine Ahnung hatte. »

Es folgten Teile der Vierten Symphonie, am 10. Februar 1883 schließlich zwei Sätze aus der damals noch nicht fertiggestellten Siebenten Symphonie, im Februar 1884 schließlich alle vier Sätze dieses Werkes. Im November 1884 folgte das Adagio aus der Siebenten, « Für uns ohneweiters die interessanteste Nummer des Abends. » , schrieb die Deutsche Zeitung (6. November 1884) .

« Allerdings vermochten wir beim erstmaligen Hören des äußerst complicirten Stückes (das überdies durch und durch orchestral gedacht und daher auf dem Clavier offenbar an Wirkung sehr viel verliert) noch keinen völlig überzeugenden Eindruck zu gewinnen. »

Am 30. Dezember 1885 (genau ein Jahr nach der Leipziger Uraufführung unter Arthur Nikisch) spielten Ferdinand Löwe und Josef Schalk den ersten und dritten Satz der Siebenten in der Fassung für zwei Klaviere :

« Das Auditorium fühlte sich ferner durch zwei Sätze aus Bruckner's siebenter Symphonie in höchstem Grade angeregt und rief stürmisch den genialen Componisten, obgleich das bedeutende Werk von den Verfassern des Clavierauszuges, den Herren Löwe und Schalk blos vierhändig gespielt wurde, während es fortwährend laut nach dem Orchester schreit. » (Morgenpost, 31 Dezember 1885)

Die erste Orchesteraufführung in Wien fand schließlich am 21. März 1886 unter der Leitung von Hans Richter statt. Mit diesem Werk gelang Bruckner endgültig der Durchbruch als Symphoniker. Von großer Bedeutung war auch die erste Aufführung der Fünften Symphonie in der Schalkschen Bearbeitung für zwei Klaviere am 20. April 1887, gespielt vom Bearbeiter und Franz Zottmann. Bruckner versuchte bis zuletzt, die Aufführung zu verhindern, wie er etwa am 25. März

1887 an Josef Schalk schrieb :

« Der gestrige Tag brachte mich zu dem festesten Entschlusse, mich für alle Aufführungen meiniger Werke auf das entschiedenste zu bedanken, wenn nicht vorher ein (mehrere wochenlanges gründliches Studium vorhergegangen ist) und zwar ein Studium in meiner Gegenwart. Ich bitte also, anstatt meiner 5. Sinfonie etwas Anderes gütigst wählen zu wollen. »

Schalk hatte schon viel Zeit auf die Vorbereitung verwendet und konterte :

« Andererseits hat mich ja nur das Interesse Ihrer Sache bewogen, den Winter nicht vorüber gehen zu lassen ohne dem besten Theile des Wiener Publikum's wenigstens auf dem Klaviere etwas zu biethen. Denn die zu langen Pausen schaden dem Verständnisse sehr und lassen Antheil und Begeisterung auch bei den Besseren erkalten. » (27. März 1887)

Die Aufführung wurde zu einem Erfolg, wenn auch bemerkt wurde :

« Nach einmaligem Hören und Angesicht einer, wenn auch noch so gewissenhaften, wirkungsvollen und dabei durch die Herren Professor Schalk und Professor Zottmann vorzüglich zur Ausführung gebrachten Bearbeitung für zwei Klaviere, welche uns den bei Bruckner selbstverständlichen Klangreichthum des Orchesters nur ahnen lässt, muß es einem späteren Zeitpunkte vorbehalten bleiben, auf das grossartig kühne Werk, dessen Eindruck ein überaus mächtiger ist, näher einzugehen. » (Musikalische Rundschau, 1. Mai 1887)

Die erste Orchesteraufführung der Fünften fand erst am 8. April 1894 in Graz unter der Leitung von Franz Schalk statt. Bruckner konnte krankheitshalber nicht daran teilnehmen.

Bei wöchentlichen Zusammenkünften und so genannten « Internen Abenden » des Wagner-vereins wurden immer wieder einzelne Sätze aus Bruckners Symphonien gespielt und erläutert, was durchaus auch als Vorbereitung auf Orchesteraufführungen gewürdigt wurde. Auch nach Bruckners Tod setzen seine Freunde und Schüler die Tradition der Klavieraufführungen fort.

(Andrea Harrandt)

Arthur Nikisch

Le chef d'orchestre, violoniste et pédagogue hongrois, Arthur Nikisch, est né à Lébény-Szentmiklós, le 12 octobre 1855. Il fait ses études musicales au Conservatoire de Vienne où il apprend le violon, le piano et la composition avec comme professeurs Felix Otto Dessoff, Johann von Herbeck et Josef Hellmesberger II.

Dès l'année 1872 à Bayreuth, Nikisch participe comme violoniste à l'exécution historique (pour la pose de la Ire pierre du « Festspielhaus ») de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven sous la direction de Richard Wagner dont il sera un des héritiers spirituels de par sa vision expressionniste de la direction d'orchestre.

Entre 1874 et 1877, il est 1er violon à l'Opéra de Vienne. Il joue sous la direction de compositeurs illustres, alors souvent chefs d'orchestre, tels que Johannes Brahms, Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner ou Giuseppe Verdi.

En 1877, Arthur Nikisch fut nommé chef des chœurs à l'Opéra de Leipzig. (La fondation de l'Opéra de Leipzig remonte déjà à 1693.) Puis en 1878, il devint le chef assistant de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra. Et en 1879, il fut promu comme chef d'orchestre principal, et ce, jusqu'en 1889. Arthur Nikisch a su étendre pendant son règne à Leipzig le répertoire des compositeurs de son temps : Johannes Brahms, Richard Strauß, Antonín Dvořák, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski, Gustav Mahler, Max Reger, Arnold Schönberg, Wilhelm Fürtwängler.

Nikisch est parmi les 1ers supports de la musique d'Anton Bruckner. Le 30 décembre 1884, il donne en création la 7e Symphonie.

Entre 1889 et 1893, il dirige l'Orchestre Symphonique de Boston. De retour en Europe, il prend en charge la direction musicale de l'Opéra de Budapest jusqu'en 1895.

En 1895, il est appelé à diriger la destinée de 2 des plus grands orchestres allemands : l'Orchestre du Gewandhaus de Leipzig et l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin comme successeur de Hans von Bülow, fonctions qu'il conservera pendant plus d'un quart de siècle, jusqu'à sa mort le 23 janvier 1922, à Leipzig. Son successeur à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin sera Wilhelm Fürtwängler à qui il lègue un orchestre de très haute qualité artistique.

Nikisch se consacre également à la pédagogie (directeur des études au Conservatoire de Leipzig de 1902 à 1907) .

À l'aune des chefs d'aujourd'hui, il parcourt le monde avec de nombreux orchestres en Europe d'abord, principalement en Angleterre. En 1912, il dirige la tournée de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Londres aux États-Unis, une première pour un orchestre européen, témoignage de son engagement pour une diffusion plus internationale de la musique.

Chef élégant au charisme inégalé, il est un peu abusivement considéré comme l'archétype du chef d'orchestre moderne : pourtant sa fine analyse des œuvres, le respect de l'esprit, démentent l'image de « poseur » que certains de ses contemporains lui ont collée.

Sa prodigieuse technique de la direction d'orchestre, avec une battue très simple, lui permettait d'obtenir de tous ses orchestres une sonorité pleine, chaleureuse, chantante jusqu'aux tréfonds de la partition.

Arthur Nikisch fut admiré par de nombreux chefs d'orchestre et son art eut un impact immense sur celui de Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Ce dernier fut présenté à Nikisch, en 1912, et eut toujours une admiration sans borne pour son aîné. À la mort de Nikisch, c'est Wilhelm Fürtwängler qui le remplaça, entre autres, au prestigieux Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Fürtwängler se considéra toujours comme le fils spirituel de Nikisch. Madame Elisabeth Fürtwängler, la femme du chef d'orchestre, relate :

« Wilhem affirmait qu'il n'avait appris que d'Arthur Nikisch. Bien sûr, l'immense personnalité de Hans Pfitzner, son Maître à Strasbourg, avait beaucoup compté, mais sur un autre plan. À ses yeux, parmi les chefs d'orchestres, nul autre qu'Arthur Nikisch n'était digne de considération. »

Fürtwängler dira : « De lui, j'ai appris le son, la façon d'obtenir le son. » .

...

The Hungarian conductor Arthur (Augustinus Adalbertus) Nikisch (Nikisch Artúr) was born on 12 October 1855 in Lébény-Szentmiklós (Mosonszentmiklós) , Hungary, located mid-way between Vienna and Budapest ; and died on 23 January 1922 in Leipzig.

He performed internationally, holding posts in Boston, London and (most importantly) Berlin. He was considered an outstanding interpreter of the music of Bruckner, Tchaïkovsky, Beethoven and Liszt. Johannes Brahms praised Nikisch's performance of his 4th Symphony as « quite exemplary, it's impossible to hear it any better » .

Nikisch was born to a Hungarian father, and a mother from Moravia. He began his studies at the Vienna Conservatory, in 1866. There, he studied under the composer Felix Otto Dessoff, the conductor Johann von Herbeck, and the violinist Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, and won prizes for composition and performance on violin and piano. He was engaged as a violinist in the Vienna Philharmonic, and also played in the Bayreuth Festival Orchestra in its inaugural season of 1876.

He was to achieve most of his fame as a conductor. In 1878, he moved to Leipzig and became 2nd conductor of the Leipzig Opera ; in 1879, he was promoted to principal conductor. He gave the premiere of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in 1884.

On 1 July 1885, Nikisch married Amelie Heußner (1862-1938) , a singer and actress, who had been engaged the preceding years at the Kassel Court Theatre with Gustav Mahler. Their son Mitja (1899-1936) later became a noted pianist.

Nikisch later became conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, from 1893 to 1895, director of the Royal Opera in Budapest. In 1895, he succeeded Carl Reinecke as director of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra. In the same year, he became principal conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic, and held both positions until his death. His successor at the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra was his scholar and 1st violinist Albert Heinig. Nikisch was also a popular guest-conductor with the Vienna Philharmonic and « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam, and conducted the « Ring » Cycle of Richard Wagner at Covent Garden, in London. Nikisch also served as director of the Leipzig Conservatory from 1902 and, there, taught a class in conducting.

He was a pioneer in several ways. In April 1912, he took the London Symphony Orchestra to the United States, a 1st for a European Orchestra. On November 10, 1913, Nikisch made one of the earliest recordings of a complete Symphony, Beethoven's 5th, with the Berlin Philharmonic, a performance later reissued on LP and CD by DGG and other modern labels (Dutton Laboratories) . He also made a series of early recordings with the London Symphony Orchestra, some of which display the portamento characteristic of early 20th Century playing.

He died in Leipzig, in 1922, and was buried there. Immediately after his death, the square where he had lived was renamed « Nikischplatz » and, in 1971, the city created the Arthur Nikisch Prize for young conductors.

His legacy is as one of the founders of modern conducting, with deep analysis of the score, a simple beat, and a charisma that let him bring-out the full sonority of the Orchestra and plumb the depths of the music. Nikisch's conducting style was greatly admired by Leopold Stokowski, Arturo Toscanini, Sir Adrian Boult, Fritz Reiner, Ervin Nyiregyházi, and many others, including George Szell, who called Nikisch « an orchestral wizard » .

Fritz Reiner said : « It was Nikisch who told me that I should never wave my arms in conducting, and that I should use my eyes to give cues. »

A short silent film survived, showing Nikisch conducting ; after seeing it, Herbert von Karajan described how impressed he was by Nikisch's use of his eyes instead of hand motions.

...

Arthur Nikisch was born to a Hungarian father and a Moravian mother, and was a typical case of a young boy whose musical talent showed itself early. At the age of 7, he heard the « William Tell » and « Barber of Seville » Overtures for the 1st time. When he got home he wrote them out from memory.

He was given music lessons and, before he was 11, was admitted to the Vienna Conservatory. He studied violin under Josef Hellmesberger and composition under Otto Dessoff. He won prizes for composition, violin, and piano, but the violin was his main instrument. He started his career as an orchestral musician. He was in the Orchestra at Bayreuth when Wagner conducted Beethoven's 9th there, at the laying of the foundation stone of the « Festspielhaus » there. He joined the Vienna Court Orchestra, which gave him an opportunity to play under the leadership of Franz Liszt, Richard Wagner, Johannes Brahms, and Giuseppe Verdi, as well as some of the great conductors of the time.

In 1878, he gained a position of assistant conductor at the Leipzig Opera, debuting in an Operetta called « Jeanne, Jeannette, Jeanetton » . Just a year later, still only 23 years old, he had become principal conductor of the Opera in this major German musical center and was leading works like « Die Walküre » and « Tannhäuser » .

Tchaïkovsky wrote home about Nikisch after a visit to Leipzig :

« One only gains a true idea of the perfection to which an orchestra can attain under a talented conductor when one hears the difficult and complicated scores of Wagner played under the direction of so wonderful a Master as " Herr " Nikisch. »

The great Russian composer recorded that Nikisch obtained his result with a minimum of motion, no superfluous movement, and a small beat. He wrote that Nikisch was « small in stature, a very pale young man with splendid poetical eyes that really must possess mesmeric powers ». The adjective « mesmeric » occurs almost unfailingly in discussion of his musical leadership. Adrian Boult recorded that after hearing Nikisch lead « the most thrilling performance of the Brahms C minor Symphony I have ever heard », he realized « that Nikisch's hand had never been raised higher than the level of his face throughout the whole movement ». In his own career, Boult was also famous for using a precise and undemonstrative beat. Nikisch also had exceptional independence of his arms, and was said never to use his left arm simply to repeat what the right arm was doing.

Despite the lack of podium emoting, Nikisch was a spontaneous and improvisatory performer. He rarely repeated performances the same way, and often took-off in directions quite different from what he had rehearsed.

One of the secrets to his leadership was something simpler than some hypnotic power. He was a genuinely nice, warm-hearted man. When Fritz Busch was a member of the « Concerts Colonne » Orchestra in Paris, Nikisch guest-conducted. Busch writes that Nikisch entered and smiled at the horns and winds « with such charm that when he stepped-up, the whole Orchestra was already on its feet and had broken-out into enthusiastic applause ». He then said it was the dream of his life to conduct this famous Orchestra (he said that to all the Orchestras). Noticing an aged viola player, he smiled and said :

« Schulze, what are you doing here ? I had no idea you had landed in this beautiful city. »

... and briefly recalled a performance in which they had both been orchestral players. And Busch says :

« By this time, the Orchestra would have died for Nikisch. »

One of his greatest skills was as a score-reader, which led to one of the few criticisms against him, which was that he sometimes relied upon his ability to hear the sound on sight and failed to study new music as thoroughly as he should. One time, he was rehearsing the Berlin Philharmonic in a new work by Max Reger. Suspecting that the conductor had not prepared for the rehearsal and performance, the composer interrupted the rehearsal and gently suggested that the conductor try the final fugue 1st.

The conductor said, « Ja, ja, ja » and started turning the pages to find it.

He kept looking and muttering : « The final fugue, ja. Where is it ? Where is it ? »

Reger snapped : « There is none. »

In 1889, he was engaged to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He stayed there until 1893, and toured the United States, which was then in the midst of an explosion of new Symphony Orchestras. In 1893, he became director of the Budapest Opera, keeping that post until 1895. In 1895, he was offered the directorships of both the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic. He accepted both positions (the 2 cities are not far apart) and later added the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1897.

He kept the leadership of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » until his death, in 1922, and became director of the Leipzig Conservatory as well, in 1902. He returned to America on tour with the London Symphony Orchestra, in 1912, and made other successful appearances there over the years.

Arthur Nikisch was one of the 1st conductors to record a complete Symphony, and the earliest-born conductor to appear before the acoustic horn recorder. His recordings of Beethoven's 5th Symphony, made in 1914 with the Berlin Philharmonic, is accordingly a valuable insight into the Romantic era's approach to performances. They reveal much use of portamentos in the strings and pronounced contrasts of tempos, but are not that old-fashioned sounding.

...

Arthur Nikisch's father came from Moravia, and his mother from Hungary. At an early age, he showed remarkable musical talent, and was initially taught privately : aged only 7, having heard Rossini's « Guillaume Tell » and « Il barbiere di Siviglia » Overtures for the 1st time, he was able to write them out from memory. When he was 11 years old, he entered the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied violin with Josef Hellmesberger and composition with Otto Dessoff. He won prizes for his violin and piano playing, as well as for composition, and later commented that all conductors should learn the violin, both for its own sake and to acquire wrist control. He joined the Vienna Court Orchestra in 1874 and played under composers such as Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, Giuseppe Verdi and Richard Wagner, as well as major contemporary conductors including Johann Herbeck and Otto Dessoff. Nikisch was also a member of the Orchestra which performed Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 « Choral » under Richard Wagner's direction, at the laying of the foundation stone for the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » .

Nikisch's conducting career began in 1878, when he became 2nd conductor at the Leipzig Opera. He was to maintain a presence in this city for the rest of his life. He made his debut with an Operetta entitled « Jeanne, Jeannette, Jeanetton » ; within a year, still aged only 23, he became chief conductor at the Opera and was leading major works such as Wagner's « Tannhäuser » and « Die Walküre » . Tchaïkovsky wrote thus about Nikisch after a visit to Leipzig :

« One only gains a true idea of the perfection to which an orchestra can attain under a talented conductor when one hears the difficult and complicated scores of Wagner played under the direction of so wonderful a Master as " Herr " Nikisch. »

The Russian composer noted that Nikisch obtained his results with a minimum of motion, no superfluous movement, and a small beat. He described Nikisch as « small in stature, a very pale young man with splendid poetical eyes that really must possess mesmeric powers » . The adjectives « mesmeric » and « magical » occurred regularly in contemporary descriptions of his conducting.

As Nikisch's fame spread, he began to conduct outside Germany and the Austro-Hungarian Empire. He was invited to become chief conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1889 ; here, what were seen as his interpretative excesses, for instance in his performances of the Symphonies of Beethoven, provoked enormous debate. Having toured with the Orchestra extensively across the United States, he left Boston in 1893 to become chief conductor of the Budapest Opera and, in 1895, he was approached at the same time by 2 of the major German Orchestras : the Berlin Philharmonic and the Leipzig Gewandhaus, with the offer of their chief conductorships. He decided to take on both positions, retaining them to the end of his life also, in 1897, taking over from Hans von Bülow (his predecessor in Berlin) the directorship of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra, maintaining this too until his death. In addition to this extraordinary raft of permanent commitments, he appeared after his return from America as a guest-conductor with the Vienna Philharmonic and Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestras ; and also in London, where he established a close relationship with the London Symphony Orchestra following its formation in 1904, conducting it regularly until the outbreak of World War I, including a tour of the United States in 1912. Nikisch also conducted at Covent Garden, including a complete cycle of Wagner's « Ring » in 1913 and, between 1905 and 1906, was director of the Leipzig Opera. As if all this was not enough, he was also director of the Leipzig Conservatory, where he taught conducting and, towards the end of his life, he toured as the piano accompanist to the singer Elena Gerhardt, with whom he also recorded some lieder. He was married to the singer Amélie Heusner ; their son Mitja (1899-1936) was a successful concert pianist.

Nikisch had a most engaging personality, and Orchestras held him in high-regard. In his memoirs, « Pages from a Musician's Life » , another Master conductor Fritz Busch described how Nikisch achieved this rapport, drawing from his own experience of playing under Nikisch in the Orchestra for a performance of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » in Cologne :

« 10 minutes after the time fixed for the beginning of the rehearsal, a small, very elegantly dressed gentleman came in. He bowed quietly to the nearest horns and greeted them and the other wind players with such charm that when he stepped-up on to the conductor's rostrum the whole Orchestra was already on its feet and had broken-out into enthusiastic applause. He then said that it was the dream of his life to conduct this famous Orchestra. He said the same thing, from inborn amiability, wherever he appeared as a guest-conductor. Noticing an aged viola player, he cried out : " Schulze, what are you doing here ? I had no idea you had landed in this beautiful town ! Do you remember how we played the Berg Symphony under Liszt in Magdeburg ? " Schulze did remember and immediately resolved that with this conductor he would use the whole length of his bow instead of playing with only half, as was his custom with the usual conductors. »

Nikisch always conducted from memory, and had an exceptional baton technique, which although sparing and without any duplication between right and left hands, was always extremely clear and highly-nuanced. Sir Adrian Boult, who was greatly influenced by Nikisch, recalled hearing him conduct « the most thrilling performance of the Brahms C minor Symphony I have ever heard » , and noted that « Nikisch's hand had never been raised higher than the level of his face throughout the whole movement » . Despite his economical baton technique, Nikisch was a spontaneous and improvisatory performer who was most successful in the interpretation of Romantic music in which his virtuoso

(the description of Otto Klemperer) control of rhythm, dynamics and balance could be heard to the best effect. He was able to draw from his Orchestras rich string tone, which was allied to a flexible sense of tempo. He rarely repeated performances in exactly the same way and, often in performance, pursued a different route to that outlined in rehearsal. Nikisch himself was clear about his varying approach to performance :

« I don't sit down and think-out in advance how I am going to have every note of the composition played. Music is a dead thing without interpretation. We all feel things differently. A metronome can keep a 4 square indication, if they like it that way, but never forget that you should make every performance a great improvisation - even though you direct the same work every day of the year. »

His interpretations of the music of composers such as Robert Schumann, Johannes Brahms and Richard Wagner were famous. His conducting of the 1st performance of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in Vienna, at the end of 1884, effectively established this composer's international reputation, while his direction of Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5 in Saint-Petersburg, in 1888, asserted its greatness after a less than wholly successful 1st performance.

Nikisch was the 1st conductor to commit a complete Symphony to disc : Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, which he recorded in 1913 with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. Despite the inevitably primitive recorded sound, this performance still sounds remarkably compelling. A year later, he recorded for « His Master's Voice » with the London Symphony Orchestra the Overtures to Mozart's « Le nozze di Figaro » , Beethoven's « Egmont » , and Weber's « Der Freischütz » and « Oberon » , as well as Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 ; he re-recorded this last work with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1920, together with Berlioz's Overture « le Carnaval Romain » . Nikisch was arguably the father of one of the major styles of conducting prevalent in the 20th Century, the opposite being that pursued by Arturo Toscanini. Several of his followers were prolific recording artists : they included his successor with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Wilhelm Furtwängler, and the English conductors Albert Coates and Sir Adrian Boult. Through their recordings, and those of many others, the artistry of Nikisch may still be glimpsed, albeit fleetingly.

...

Born in Hungary, in 1878, Arthur Nikisch moved to Leipzig and became 2nd conductor of the Leipzig Opera in 1878 and, in 1882, was promoted as its principal conductor. He gave the premiere of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, in 1884. Regarded as one of the founders of modern conducting, Nikisch held posts as principal conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the « Gewandhausorchester » in Leipzig and the Berlin Philharmonic.

(Photo) Rare early cabinet photograph of the great conductor, boldly signed in the the lower margin at age 28 and dated, « Leipzig, 11 August 83. » . Cabinet photograph by W. Kuffert. By far, the earliest signed image of Nikisch we've seen, well before he trimmed his beard and mustache into the small and pointy figuration which became his trademark (and often caricatured) look !

...

Arthur Nikisch studied at the Vienna Conservatory : conducting under Johann von Herbeck (1831-1877) ; violin and conducting under Josef Hellmesberger, Junior (1855-1907) . Upon leaving the Vienna Conservatory in 1878, Nikisch followed the German method of mastering conducting with a series of « provincial » conducting responsibilities. In 1878, Nikisch became 2nd conductor of the « Stadt Theater, Leipzig » (the Opera House) and, in 1882, Nikisch advanced to Principal conductor. In 1889, Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the Boston Symphony, was searching for a successor to Wilhelm Gericke, who had decided to return to Vienna. Higginson's friend Julius Epstein of the Vienna Conservatory, just as he had recommended Gericke, now recommended Nikisch. Nikisch accepted and arrived in October, 1889, for the opening of the Boston 1889-1890 season. He is said to have found the Boston Symphony Orchestra a better ensemble than he had expected. With the Boston Symphony, contemporaries noted that Nikisch conducting style was more free and Romantic than Gericke's more Classical approach. The Boston Symphony under all its conductors regularly toured American cities, but a disagreement between the Orchestra and Nikisch, about such touring, led to his departure in the Spring of 1893. (It is interesting that Nikisch demurred at touring then, but later returned in 1912 to tour the eastern United States with the London Symphony. But the press claimed Nikisch was earning $ 1,000 per night, on this later tour.) On leaving Boston, Nikisch became Director General of the Budapest Royal Opera from 1893 to 1895 .

The Nikisch fame and career as a conductor advanced rapidly, and contemporaries all agree that he had an immediate, and some said magical, effect on the playing of an orchestra, simply from his direction. In 1895, Nikisch became Music Director of the famed Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, one of the oldest and greatest Symphony groups. Nikisch remained head of the « Gewandhausorchester » until his death, in 1922. Also in the 1895-1896 season, Nikisch became Music Director of the Berlin Philharmonic, while still Music Director in Leipzig. It may seem unusual, particularly for that era, for Nikisch to be Music Director of 2 of the leading Symphony Orchestras. However, Wilhelm Furtwängler succeeded Nikisch in both positions upon Nikisch's death.

Arthur Nikisch made some of the earliest recordings of a full Symphony Orchestra playing major works. This was physically and musically difficult to accomplish in the acoustic recording era, and the results so variable and often poor that many leading conductors of that era did not enter the recording studio. Nikisch's 1st recording was with the London Symphony, in June 1913. This was followed by one of the most famous early recordings : the Beethoven Symphony No. 5 with the Berlin Philharmonic, in November 1913. Fritz Busch in his autobiography wrote that Nikisch knew everyone's name. This was unlike, for example, Leopold Stokowski who would address the musicians as « flute » or « fagotte » .

Fritz Busch wrote : « It was a speciality of Nikisch to know the players by name quickly and never make a mistake. I felt at once that, before he had even begun to conduct, the hearts of the whole of the Orchestra had been won. »

...

Arthur Nikisch (geboren 12.10.1855, Lébényi Szent Miklos, Ungarn ; gestorben 23.01.1922, Leipzig) war Dirigent in Leipzig, Boston und Budapest. Er galt als hervorragender Interpret der Werke von Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) und Piotr Ilitch Tschaikowski (1840-1893) . Von 1878 bis zu seinem Tod 1922 wirkte Artur Nikisch mit einer Unterbrechung von sechs Jahren in Leipzig als Dirigent. Zuerst als Kapellmeister am Stadttheater, dem Vorläufer der heutigen Oper, dann ab 1895 als Chef des Gewandhausorchesters. Noch im selben Jahr wurde er auf Empfehlung von Franz Liszt parallel dazu zum Chefdirigenten der Berliner Philharmoniker auf Lebenszeit berufen.

Nikisch war ein Gigant am Pult internationaler Orchester. Neben den Aufgaben in Leipzig und Berlin reiste er auch regelmäßig zu Konzerten in die USA, nach Rußland oder auch nach Wien. Er schuf in Leipzig als Kapellmeister des Gewandhausorchesters die Form des reinen Symphoniekonzerts.

1913 nahmen die Berliner Philharmoniker unter Nikischs Leitung erstmals in der Geschichte der Schallplatte eine komplette Sinfonie auf ; eingespielt wurde Beethovens Fünfte.

Nikisch gab unentgeltlich Konzerte für das « Arbeiter-Bildungs-Institut » . In der Silvesternacht 1918, kurz nach Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges, dirigierte er ein Konzert des Gewandhausorchesters, das als « Friedens und Freiheitsfeier » Beethovens Neunte Sinfonie zur Aufführung brachte. Dieser Abend begründete die bis heute gepflegte Leipziger Tradition der Silvesterkonzerte des Gewandhausorchesters mit Beethovens « Ode an die Freude » .

Nikisch liebte Leipzig, hier fühlte er sich zuhause. Versuchen, etwa aus Wien, ihn abzuwerben, widerstand er.

Nikisch lebte die letzten Jahre seines Lebens in der Thomasiusstraße 28, in der er 1922 nach einer Lungenentzündung starb. Nikisch, der große Neuerer des Musiklebens, liegt auf dem Leipziger Südfriedhof begraben.

Bis zum heutigen Tag wird in der internationalen Musikwelt seine Leipziger Zeit kaum gewürdigt, er vor allem als legendärer Chefdirigent der Berliner Philharmoniker gefeiert.

Aber auch Wien beansprucht gerne, daß Nikisch mit dem Herzen einer der Ihren war. Zwei Tage nach seinem Tod schrieb die « Neue Presse » : « In Wien hat sich der Meister am wohlsten gefühlt. » . Nur daß er eben in Leipzig geblieben ist, bis zu seinem Tod.

(Nikischs Sterbehaus wurde Opfer des Zweiten Weltkriegs. Vor dem in den Achtziger Jahren errichteten Neubau steht seit 1997 ein Gedenkstein anlässlich seines 75. Todestages.)

...

Arthur (Artúr) Nikisch (geboren 12 Oktober 1855, in Mosonszentmiklós - Lébényi Szent-Miklós - gestorben 23 Januar 1922, in Leipzig) war ein ungarischer Dirigent. Er galt als hervorragender Interpret der Werke Anton Bruckners und Pjotr Iljitsch Tschaikowskis.

Nikisch heiratete im Juli 1885 die Schauspielerin Amélie Heußner (Brüssel, 1862 - Berlin, 1938) . Ihre Kinder sind der Rechtswissenschaftler Arthur Philipp Nikisch und der Pianist, Komponist und Bandleader Mitja Nikisch.

Nikisch studierte am Konservatorium von Wien Violine, Klavier und Komposition. Zwischen 1872 und 1877 wirkte er zunächst als Geiger in verschiedenen Orchestern, und ab dem Wiener Hofopernorchester (Wiener Philharmoniker). Von 1878 bis 1889 war er 1. Kapellmeister des Leipziger Stadttheaters. Sein 2. Kapellmeister (1886-1888) war Gustav Mahler. Am 30. Dezember 1884 dirigierte Nikisch die Uraufführung von Bruckners 7. Sinfonie am Leipziger Neuen Theater.

Nach Aufhalten in Boston (Chefdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra) und Budapest (Direktor der Königlichen Ungarischen Oper) wurde er im Jahr 1895 in Nachfolge von Carl Reinecke Gewandhauskapellmeister in Leipzig; er führte dieses Amt bis zu seinem Tode. Ebenfalls wurde er im Herbst 1895 zum Chefdirigenten der Berliner Philharmoniker berufen. Unter seiner Leitung nahmen sie 1913 als erste eine komplette Tonaufnahme einer Sinfonie auf, der 5. Sinfonie von Beethoven.

Von 1902 bis 1907 war er Direktor des Leipziger Konservatoriums.

Im Februar 1906 spielte er für das Reproduktionsklavier Welte-Mignon als Pianist vier von Brahms' Ungarischen Tänzen auf Klavierrolle ein (Nr. 1, 4, 5 und 6), sowie eine Valse lente aus Léo Delibes' Ballett « Coppélia ».

Nikisch war ein guter Freund Alexander Frommermanns, des Vaters von Harry Frommermann (1906-1975), der 1927 die Comedian Harmonists gründete. Nikisch unterrichtete den kleinen Harry ab 1910 für einige Jahre am Klavier.

Am 23. Januar 1922 starb Nikisch im Alter von 66 Jahren in Leipzig. Er wurde auf dem Leipziger Südfriedhof beigesetzt (II. Abteilung).

Unmittelbar nach Nikischs Tod erhielt ein Platz in Leipzig, an dem Nikisch zuletzt gewohnt hatte, den Namen Nikischplatz. 1935 wurde die Straße G 82 in Berlin-Grünwald anlässlich des 80. Geburtstages des Dirigenten Arthur Nikisch nach ihm benannt. Im Jahr 1952 wurde in Wien Penzing (14. Bezirk) die Nikischgasse nach ihm benannt. Im Jahr 1971 stiftete die Stadt Leipzig den Arthur Nikisch Preis für junge Dirigenten.

...

Das Neue Theater war der Vorgängerbau des Leipziger Opernhauses.

Es wurde in den Jahren 1864-1868 von Carl Ferdinand Langhans an der Nordseite des Augustusplatzes erbaut. Detailplanung und Bauleitung lag in den Händen des Leipziger Architekten Otto Brückwald. Zur Eröffnung am 28. Januar 1868 wurde Goethes Iphigenie auf Tauris gegeben. Das Neue Theater bot 1.700 Sitz- und 300 Stehplätze und war für Schauspiel, Oper und Ballett gedacht. Da sich das Haus als ausgezeichnet für die Oper, für das Schauspiel jedoch als ungeeignet erwies, zog das Schauspiel ganz in das Alte Theater am Fleischerplatz (Theaterplatz, heute Richard Wagner Platz), während das Neue Theater zur Leipziger Oper avancierte.

1935-1938 wurden Zuschauerraum, Bühne und Orchestergraben umgebaut. Im Zweiten Weltkrieg, am 4. Dezember 1943, zerstörte ein alliierter Luftangriff das Gebäude. Bis zum Vortag der Zerstörung war die Bühne noch bespielt worden. Die Ruine wurde 1950 abgetragen und an gleicher Stelle nach mehreren Wettbewerben und Vorprojekten von 1956 bis 1960 die neue Oper errichtet, die, obwohl im damaligen Zeitgeschmack erbaut, in einigen Merkmalen an das Neue Theater erinnert.

Als Ausweichquartier der Oper diente von 1945 bis 1960 das Haus Dreilinden im Leipziger Stadtteil Lindenau.

Am 11. Dezember 1884 wurde im Musikviertel südwestlich der Altstadt (Grassistraße und Beethovenstraße) ein Neues Konzerthaus eröffnet, das bezugnehmend auf das ursprüngliche Gewandhaus auch häufig als Neues Gewandhaus bezeichnet wurde. Das Gebäude wurde 1882-1884 nach Plänen von Martin Gropius durch Heino Schmieden erbaut; der Bau wurde durch einen Kredit aus dem Nachlaß von Franz Dominic Grassi finanziert. Das Konzerthaus enthielt einen großen Saal mit 1.700 Plätzen und einen Kammermusiksaal mit 650 Plätzen. Der Leitspruch des Orchesters fand am Giebel des Eingangsportales Platz. Den bauplastischen Schmuck schuf der Berliner Bildhauer Otto Lessing.

Das 2. Gewandhaus war architektonisches Vorbild der 1900 errichteten Symphony Hall in Boston, Heimstätte des Boston Symphony Orchestra, die sich auch beim Konzertsaal an der als akustisches Vorbild geltenden „Schuhkarton“-Form orientierte.

Im November 1936 vernichteten die Nationalsozialisten bei Nacht und Nebel das vor dem Konzerthaus stehende Mendelssohn-Denkmal des Bildhauers Werner Stein (hergestellt von Hermann Heinrich Howaldt, 1892 enthüllt).

Das Konzerthaus wurde im Zweiten Weltkrieg am 3. und 4. Dezember 1943 sowie am 20. Februar 1944 durch Bomben schwer beschädigt. Zunächst war nach dem Krieg geplant, das Gebäude wieder aufzubauen. Letztlich wurde aber entschieden, die Reste des Gebäudes abzutragen und ein neues Gebäude an anderer Stelle zu errichten. Am 29. März 1968 wurde die Ruine des Konzerthauses abgerissen. Nach langen Jahren der Nutzung des Geländes als Parkplatz wurde 2002 an dieser Stelle das Geisteswissenschaftliche Zentrum der Universität Leipzig eröffnet.

Josef Hellmesberger, fils

Le compositeur, violoniste et chef d'orchestre autrichien Josef Hellmesberger II (surnommé « Pépi » par ses proches) est né le 9 avril 1855. Il est le fils du violoniste et chef d'orchestre Josef Hellmesberger I (1828-1893) qui fut son 1er professeur. Il est issu d'une famille de musiciens comprenant son grand-père Georg Hellmesberger I (1800-1873), son oncle Georg Hellmesberger II (1830-1852) et son frère Ferdinand Hellmesberger (1863-1940).

En 1875, Hellmesberger devient membre du Quatuor Hellmesberger et, en 1887, son directeur principal. En 1878, Hellmesberger devient violoniste solo de la Chapelle de la Cour de Vienne et professeur au Conservatoire de Vienne. En 1890, il devient le 1er « Hofkapellmeister » à l'Opéra de la Cour de Vienne et, de 1901 à 1903, il fut le principal chef d'orchestre de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. En 1904-1905, il fut le Maître de chapelle au Hoftheater de Stuttgart. Hellmesberger meurt à Vienne le 26 avril 1907, à l'âge de 52 ans. Son œuvre comprend 22 opérettes, 6 ballets, de la musique de danse et des lieder.

1879 : Musique de fête pour les noces d'argent de François-Joseph Ier.

1880 : Der Graf von Gleichen (Opérette) .

1880 : Kapitän Ahlström (Opérette) .

1881 : Der Rattenfänger von Hameln (Musique de scène pour le « Ringtheater ») .

1884 : Harlekin als Elektriker (Ballet) .

1886 : Der schöne Kurfürst (Opérette) .

1886 : Fata Morgana (Opéra) .

1887 : Die verwandelte Katze (Ballet) .

1887 : Rikiki (Opérette) .

1889 : Das Orakel (Opérette) .

1890 : Der bleiche Gast (Opérette) .

1890 : Meißner Porzellan (Ballet) .

1891 : Das Licht (Ballet) .

1892 : Vater Radetzky (Jeu de fête) .

1893 : Die fünf Sinne (Ballet) .

1895 : Die Doppelhochzeit (Opérette) .

1902 : Der Wunderkaftan (Opérette) .

1902 : Die Perle von Iberien (Ballet) .

1904 : Das Veilchenmädel (Opérette) .

1904 : Die Eisjungfrau (Opérette) .

1905 : Wien bei Nacht (Opérette) .

1905 : Die schöne Liedersängerin (Opérette) .

1906 : Triumph des Weibes (Opérette) .

1906 : Die drei Engel (Opérette) .

1906 : Mutzi (Opérette) .

1909 : Der letzte Fasching (Opérette) .

1911 : Der Veilchenkavalier (Opérette) .

1934 : Wiener G'schichten (Singspiel) ; complété par O. Jascha.

Die Schmauswaberl (Opérette) .

Drei Schwarzmäntel (Opérette) .

Posthume : Der Schusterkönig (Opérette) .

Posthume : Nachtfalter (Opérette) .

Posthume : Die beiden Mazzi (Opérette) .

Autres œuvres :

Danse Diabolique.

Auf Wiener Art (Polka française) .

Kleiner Anzeiger (Polka rapide) .

Valse Espagnol.

Elfenreigen.

Leichtfüßig (Polka rapide) .

...

The Austrian composer, violinist and conductor Josef (« Pepi ») Hellmesberger Junior was born on 9 April 1855 and died on 26 April 1907 in Vienna.

He was the son of violinist and conductor Josef Hellmesberger Senior (1828-1893) , who was his 1st teacher. Among his family of notable musicians include : grandfather, Georg Senior (1800-1873) ; uncle, Georg Junior (1830-1852) ; and brother, Ferdinand (1863-1940) .

In 1875, Josef Hellmesberger Junior became a member of his father's Hellmesberger Quartet while, in 1887, he became leader. In 1878, Hellmesberger became solo violinist of the Vienna Court Chapel and professor at the Vienna Conservatory. In 1890, he was the 1st « Hofkapellmeister » at the Vienna Court Opera and, from 1901 to 1903, he was principal conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic.

In 1904 and 1905, he was « Kapellmeister » at the « Stuttgarter Hoftheater » .

His compositions include : 22 Operettas, 6 Ballets, dance music and lieder.

Hellmesberger died at age 52.

...

Josef (« Pepi ») Hellmesberger Junior was the 2nd generation of Hellmesbergers to hold significant musical positions in Vienna. For a period, he was the conductor at the « Carltheater » . Later, he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic following Gustav Mahler's resignation due to ill health and remained for 3 seasons until he had to resign as a result of a scandal. He was taught by his father before studying at the Vienna Conservatory. Some of his Polkas have appeared in recent years in the Vienna Philharmonic's New Year's Day Concerts, making him one of the few non-Strauß composers to be represented in these illustrious concerts. He wrote a wide variety of music, including more serious works. He had a wide musical talent, and his greatest success was his Operetta « Das Veilchenmädel » (1904) . The waltz from this Operetta was recorded on the CD « Spirit of Vienna » , Volume I. His Operetta melodies carry his own distinctive melodic inventiveness and the « Marco Polo » label dedicated a complete CD to his and his father's works. The father, Josef Hellmesberger Senior (1828-1893) , was also a composer and a very noted musician. who held the position of concert Master at the Court Opera. His most remembered composition today is « Ballszene » .

...

The Hellmesberger family was at the centre of Viennese musical life from the Biedermeier period onwards, with the violinist Georg Hellmesberger (1800-1873) contributing music for the violin, followed by his sons Joseph (1828-1893) , a violinist, conductor and composer, and Georg (1830-1852) , a composer and conductor. The younger Josef, called after his father, continued the family tradition as a violinist, conductor and composer, and was more prolific than his elders in this last occupation.

The younger Josef Hellmesberger wrote Operettas, Ballets and incidental music, and was closely connected with the ballet in Vienna as a conductor. His compositions also include a number of dance pieces.

...

Josef Hellmesberger junior, genannt « Pepi » Hellmesberger (geboren 9. April 1855 in Wien ; gestorben 26. April 1907 ebenda) war ein österreichischer Komponist, Violinist und Abonnementdirigent der Wiener Philharmoniker.

Hellmesberger war der Sohn des österreichischen Violinisten und Dirigenten Josef Hellmesberger senior (1828-1893) , der auch sein erster Lehrer war. Bereits im Alter von 15 Jahren wurde er als 2. Violinist Mitglied des Quartetts seines Vaters (Hellmesberger-Quartett) , dessen Leitung er 1887 übernahm und mit 18 Jahren trat er als Geiger in das Wiener Hofopernorchester ein. Als Konzertmeister (in der Streicherbesetzung) und als Schlagzeuger (in der Bläserbesetzung) begann er 1875 den Militärdienst in der Kapelle des österreichischen Infanterie-Regiments Nummer 4, rückte noch im selben Jahr zum Kapellmeister auf und übernahm 1876 die Leitung der Militärmusik der « 32er » . Diese Funktion hatte er bis 1878 inne. Ab 1878 wirkte er als Sologeiger in der Wiener Hofmusikkapelle und an der Hofoper (heute Wiener Staatsoper) . Ebenfalls ab 1878 war er Professor für Violine am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien (der Vorgängeranstalt der Wiener Musikakademie) . 1890 wurde er erster Hofkapellmeister der Wiener Hofkapelle und wirkte auch am Ringtheater als Kapellmeister. Als Nachfolger von Gustav Mahler leitete er von 1901 bis 1903 die Philharmonischen Konzerte. 1903 legte er aus privaten Gründen alle Wiener Funktionen nieder und ging als Kapellmeister an das Stuttgarter Hoftheater. Schon ein Jahr später kehrte er nach Wien zurück, erkrankte bald nach seiner Rückkehr und verstarb 1907.

Seine Grabstätte befindet sich auf dem Hietzinger Friedhof (Gruppe 15, Nummer 4 D) .

Er schuf 22 Operetten, 6 Ballette, Tänze und Lieder und Märsche.

...

17 novembre 1881 : Création des 3 Iers mouvements (sans le Finale) du Quintette à cordes (WAB 112) , au « Wagnerverein » de Vienne, par le Quatuor Winkler (Julius Winkler, Carl Lillich, Hans Kreuzinger, Julius Desing et Theodor Lucca) dirigé par Josef Schalk. Son frère Franz, lui, occupera la chaise de second alto pour l'occasion.

L'incendie au Théâtre du « Ring »

Jeudi, 8 décembre 1881 : Shortly before the beginning of the 2nd Viennese performance of « Les Contes d'Hoffmann » by Jacques Offenbach, in the « Ringtheater » , fire breaks-out on stage. Since the doors open inward, many are killed in the crush. About 650 people are burned, asphyxiated, or trampled to death.

A striking entry in Bruckner's diary describes the scene with choking horror :

« On both sides, numerous corpses. Most between the 2nd and 3rd floors. »

Composer Johann Strauß (aged 56) attended the Vienna premiere, the night before. Anton Bruckner, who keeps all his musical manuscripts in an apartment next door, rushes to the scene to save his work. By the time Bruckner gets there, the fire is under control. Among the dead are Heinrich Nachod and his wife, an uncle of Mary Vetsera, aunt and uncle of Arnold Schönberg (aged 7, at the time) . Their 2 children will be adopted by the Schönbergs.

Both Anton Bruckner and Sigmund Freud had tickets for the performance that night. Both might have been among the 386 charred bodies if they hadn't been separately (they never knew each other) diverted to other engagements at the last moment.

...

The appalling fire at the Vienna Ringtheater on 8 December 1881 made an indelible impression on Anton Bruckner. One reason was that he had planned to go to the performance himself and only changed his mind at the last minute. Another reason was that he was able to watch the fire raging all night from his window in the immediate vicinity. Living alone, he was gripped by tremendous fear. It was fortunate that 2 of his pupils, who came from his own part of Austria, went to see him and stayed until morning.

« I shall never, ever forget it ! » Bruckner would say whenever speaking of the horror of that night.

But the next day, with a child-like mixture of fear and curiosity, he went to the mortuary at the police station and viewed the dreadfully maimed victims.

After that inferno, Bruckner was afraid of fire. He would no longer use a petroleum lamp for fear of an explosion, and would only burn candles. When going-out in the evening, he would put the candle out very carefully and dash back into his room a couple of times to check that the wick had stopped smouldering. It took a longish period of recuperation in Saint-Florian to restore his equanimity.

...

Anton Bruckner survit, sans vraiment le vouloir, à la plus grande catastrophe incendiaire dans l'histoire de la ville de Vienne. Il a probablement remercié la « Providence » pour cela, malgré le choc provoqué !

Le tragique incendie du Théâtre du « Ring » (en face de la Bourse de Vienne) , érigé en 1873 (sous le nom de Théâtre de l'Opéra-Comique) par l'architecte Emil von Förster (1838-1909) , emporte entre 386 et 436 personnes dont 180 par défenestration. Une plaque commémorative orne aujourd'hui le côté-ouest du bâtiment actuel construit de 1969 à 1974 ; soit la « Bundespolizeidirektion Wien » (ou quartier-général de la Police fédérale autrichienne, pour le secteur de Vienne) .

La compagnie de l'Opéra de la Cour (ancienne appellation de l'Opéra de Vienne) y présente, ce soir-là (c'était jour de fête ; on célébrait la proclamation de l'Immaculée-Conception de la Vierge) , la seconde représentation viennoise de l'Opéra « les Contes d'Hoffmann » de Jacques Offenbach. La veille, le compositeur Johann Strauß (âgé de 56) avait assisté au soir de la première.

Bruckner détient 2 billets mais décide de ne pas s'y rendre, ne se sentant pas suffisamment bien et parce que l'on apporte un changement qui lui déplaît. De sa fenêtre, il sera néanmoins un témoin privilégié du drame. Il assistera d'abord à l'effondrement de la scène dans le brasier.

À 7 heures, l'écroulement d'un mur force de suspendre le travail de déblaiement des décombres.

Parmi les nombreuses victimes, citons Heinrich Nachod et son épouse, soit la tante et l'oncle du jeune Arnold Schœnberg (alors âgé de 7 ans) . Les 2 enfants du couple, devenus orphelins, seront adoptés par les Schœnberg.

Un fourgon de la Croix-Rouge est employé pour emporter les cadavres et les débris humains. C'est à ce moment-là que Bruckner va descendre pour assister de plus près, aux opérations de secours et au dégagement des corps.

À 7 heures 5 minutes, les Iers pompiers arrivent, et avec leurs échelles, ils réussissent à sauver un grand nombre de personnes. On tend des draps sous les fenêtres, et plus de 60 personnes sautent d'une hauteur de 3 étages.

D'autres pompes arrivent au grand galop et écrasent plusieurs personnes dans l'immense foule qui entourait le Théâtre. On essaie de pénétrer dans l'édifice. Il faut d'abord écarter des morceaux de cadavres qui encombrant les issues ; on s'était étouffé près de la sortie.

Les pompiers reconnaissent bientôt qu'il faut se border à préserver les maisons voisines. Bruckner, paniqué, a une seule idée en tête : sauver ses partitions et ses manuscrits qui sont ses seuls trésors.

Finalement, Bruckner va se diriger, à toutes jambes, vers l'hôpital général de Vienne (ou celui de la garnison) où les cadavres sont exposés. La foule des parents est si grande que les soldats et la police doivent y veiller pour maintenir l'ordre.

Le comportement du compositeur est conforme avec son étrange attirance pour le sensationnel et le morbide.

Au moment du drame, l'Empereur François-Joseph se trouve à sa résidence d'été de Gödöllő, en Hongrie. Apprenant la nouvelle, il se précipite à Vienne. La ville entre dans une grande période de deuil.

Au lendemain de l'incendie, le pionnier de la médecine légale moderne, le docteur Eduard von Hofmann (1837-1897) , professeur à l'Université de Vienne et directeur de l'Institut de médecine légale, est mandaté par l'Empereur pour examiner les corps. Utilisant des méthodes modernes comme l'examen des dents, il réussit à démontrer que les victimes décèdent d'abord d'empoisonnement par la fumée avant de brûler. Le monoxyde de carbone retrouvé dans le sang est la principale cause de décès.

La tête carbonisée d'une des victimes est encore aujourd'hui conservée au Musée de médecine légale de Vienne. Une autre est exposée au Musée de la criminalité, situé dans le quartier de « Leopoldstadt » .

...

L'incendie du « Ringtheater » va causer à Bruckner un profond traumatisme. Il était tellement surmené qu'il ne voulait plus rester seul la nuit. Sa peur du feu fit en sorte qu'il ne se servira plus jamais des lampes incandescentes à la paraffine, effrayé par la possibilité d'explosions. (Il s'en remettra aux simples bougies jusqu'à la fin de sa vie.) Ne pouvant plus supporter la proximité des ruines fantomatiques du Théâtre, il demandera à être temporairement relocalisé ailleurs.

Anton Bruckner continuera de demeurer au second palier du 5 « Schottenring » , à proximité de la « Votivkirche » , jusqu'au mois de juillet 1895 ; année où l'hydropisie dont il souffre ne lui permettra plus de monter les escaliers.

24 décembre 1881 : Extrait de l'article (signé A.) du journal « Le Monde Illustré » :

« C'est le jeudi 8 décembre que l'incendie a éclaté sur la scène de ce Théâtre, un peu avant le lever de rideau. La salle était déjà fort garnie, et un nombreux public était venu pour assister à la représentation des ' Contes d'Hoffmann '. Le feu a pris dans une toile légère et s'est rapidement propagé. Le gardien éteignit le gaz sans plus tarder, et tout aussitôt la panique devint indescriptible. Les malheureux spectateurs se précipitèrent fiévreusement vers les issues donnant sur les couloirs ; mais en présence d'une pareille affluence, les dégagements ne se trouvèrent pas suffisants. Dès que le nouvelle du désastre fut signalée, les autres représentations furent interrompues, dans les Théâtres de Vienne. La plupart des artistes ont pu se sauver. Quand au nombre de spectateurs se trouvant dans la salle, il a été évalué à environ 2,000. Le chiffre des morts n'a pu être exactement établi, on parle de 1,000 victimes. Le Gouvernement autrichien a pris sans tarder des mesures formelles, relatives à la sécurité des spectateurs. »

Richard Wagner racontera à sa femme Cosima que tous les Juifs devraient alors brûler dans un spectacle de « Nathan » .

Sur son emplacement, l'Empereur François-Joseph fait construire, en ce moment, un établissement de bienfaisance.

...

Article du journal « le Petit Stéphanois » :

D'après les dernières nouvelles qui sont parvenues de Vienne, le nombre des personnes signalées à la police comme « manquant » à la suite de l'incendie qui a dévoré le théâtre du « Ring », s'élevait ce matin à près de 600. Hier soir, on avait compté 320 cadavres.

La plupart des personnes qui ont péri appartenaient aux classes populaires ; ce sont des ouvriers et de petits boutiquiers. Il y a beaucoup de jeunes gens et d'enfants parmi les morts. Il y a aussi quelques machinistes et quelques musiciens de l'Orchestre.

Le théâtre était très plein : c'était jour de fête ; on célébrait la proclamation de l'Immaculée-Conception de la Vierge.

On devait jouer, comme les jours précédents, « les Contes d'Hoffmann » par Jacques Offenbach. Le correspondant viennois de la « Gazette » de Cologne raconte que, le matin, il avait voulu acheter une place au théâtre : il n'y en avait plus de libres : on peut juger, par là, de la foule considérable qui était pressée dans la salle, au moment où l'incendie a éclaté.

À 6 heures 3 quarts, les galeries supérieures du Théâtre étaient bondées ; le parquet et les loges se remplissaient ; les acteurs sortaient de leurs loges pour descendre sur la scène ; un employé, quelques minutes avant 7 heures, allumait une dernière rangée de becs de gaz près du rideau, lorsque, tout à coup ; soit que trop de gaz se fût échappé des becs ; soit que l'allumeur se fût approché de trop près du rideau. Un jet de flammes jaillit. Le régisseur s'écriait : « Commencez ! » . On lui répondit en criant : « Au feu ! Au feu ! » .

Le gaz fut immédiatement éteint, et la salle entière se vit plongée dans les ténèbres complètes. L'incendie se propagea si rapidement qu'il fut impossible, à cause des flammes, de baisser le rideau de fer qui sépare la scène de la salle. 5 bouches d'eau placées au-dessus de la scène ne furent pas ouvertes.

Les petites lampes à huile des couloirs n'étaient pas allumées ; les issues par lesquelles on aurait pu se sauver n'étaient pas éclairées.

Dans la salle, le trouble, la confusion, le désespoir furent horribles. Un certain nombre de personnes réussirent à gagner les escaliers et à se sauver par une porte. D'autres chercheront à gagner les fenêtres des corridors, le balcon, et se jetèrent dans la rue.

La plupart de ceux qui eurent recours à ce moyen se cassèrent bras et jambes.

À 7 heures 5 minutes, les premiers pompiers arrivèrent, et avec leurs échelles, ils réussirent à sauver un grand nombre de personnes. On tendit des draps sous les fenêtres, et plus de 60 personnes sautèrent d'une hauteur de 3 étages.

D'autres pompes arrivèrent au grand galop et écrasèrent plusieurs personnes dans l'immense foule qui entourait le Théâtre. On essaya de pénétrer dans l'édifice. Il fallut d'abord écarter des morceaux de cadavres qui encombraient les issues ; on s'était étouffé près de la sortie.

Les pompiers reconnurent bientôt qu'il fallait se border à préserver les maisons voisines.

Ce matin, des poutres brûlaient encore.

Hier soir, à 7 heures, l'écroulement d'un mur a forcé de suspendre le travail de déblaiement des décombres.

Un fourgon de la Croix-Rouge est employé pour emporter les cadavres et les débris humains.

À l'hôpital général et à l'hôpital de la garnison, où les cadavres sont exposés, la foule des parents est si grande que les soldats et la police doivent y veiller pour maintenir l'ordre.

...

En moins de 3 années, Vienne a perdu 2 Théâtres par suite d'incendie. L'une de ces catastrophes est une des plus épouvantables que l'imagination humaine puisse rêver. Que l'on se représente en elfet la salle si coquette, si élégante, si dorée du « Ringtheater », avec ses frontons, ses ornements, ses lambris fouillés avec toute la recherche possible, bondée depuis les Iers bancs de l'orchestre jusqu'aux derniers rangs du paradis ; seules quelques loges étaient vides et béantes, leurs propriétaires trouvant sans doute de bon ton de n'arriver au spectacle qu'une fois le rideau levé. Cette triste observation de la mode, ou ce manque aux convenances, sauva ce soir-là la vie aux retardataires. 1,500 personnes étaient venues, pressées, serrées les unes contre les autres dans l'enceinte ; toutes les classes de la société de Vienne y étaient représentées ; mais la moyenne bourgeoisie, les modestes employés, les gens du peuple même, formaient le gros de ce public, car c'était un jour de fête, le 8 décembre vent dans des filets matelassés, les spectateurs qui ont la présence d'esprit de sauter par les fenêtres ; une foule de citoyens (parmi les Iers, le Comte Lanezan, procureur général) viennent en aide aux pompiers, et c'est grâce à ses efforts que l'on réussit à sauver la plus grande partie des spectateurs, mais 350 à 400 cadavres, on n'en saura jamais le nombre exact, sont ensevelis sous le monceau de ruines qui, le matin du 9 décembre 1881, marquait l'emplacement où s'élevait fièrement, depuis une dizaine d'années environ, le « Ringtheater », qui s'appelait d'abord le Théâtre de l'Opéra-Comique.

...

L'incendie du 8 décembre 1881 eut un retentissement énorme. Il y eut autant de familles en deuil qu'au lendemain d'une grande bataille ; mais ceux-là mêmes qui n'avaient pas été frappés dans leurs parents ou leurs affections gardèrent le souvenir de cette horrible nuit. Le procès qui fut intenté au directeur, monsieur Franz Ritter von Jauner, démontra que la négligence avait été très grande et l'inculpé fut condamné a plusieurs mois de prison. Mais on constata également de la part de la police et de certaines autorités une grave négligence. Le préfet de police dut donner sa démission et plusieurs hauts fonctionnaires furent mis à la retraite. 2 années après l'incendie du « Ringtheater », le Théâtre de la Ville, non moins spacieux, non moins élégant de construction, non moins luxueusement agencé, devenait aussi la proie des flammes.

Le souvenir de la catastrophe du « Ringtheater » de Vienne s'est présenté à la mémoire de chacun et plusieurs journaux ont rappelé le nombre des victimes. On a même réédité le chiffre de 700 morts, dans certains grands journaux. En feuilletant la collection du journal « l'Impartial » de Paris, nous retrouvons les chiffres suivants, ayant trait à cette catastrophe.

...

Le « Ringtheater » fut incendié le 8 décembre 1881. Les lres dépêches annoncèrent 300 morts, puis 1,000, puis 700... Le 26 décembre, une liste rectifiée des victimes contenait 558 noms, dont 12 considérés comme douteux. Puis un certain nombre de personnes portées comme disparues ayant été retrouvées, on annonçait de Vienne, le 5 janvier 1882 : « Il est définitivement constaté que le nombre des victimes de la catastrophe du " Ring Theater " s'élève à 436 personnes. » . Ceci dit, pour répondre à certaines questions qui nous ont été adressées à ce sujet.

Le ruines du Théâtre furent démolie. Grâce à son soutien financier en mémoire des victimes, l'Empereur François-Joseph fit construire sur le site même de la tragédie un établissement privé de bienfaisance qui portera le nom de « Sühnhaus » (« Sühnhof ») . Il sera présent lors de l'inauguration. Le bâtiment sera gravement endommagé par les bombardements du 12 mars 1945. Ce qui en reste sera complètement démoli en 1951. Entre 1969 et 1974, un immeuble à bureaux sera érigé sur le site. Les quartiers généraux de la police de Vienne, la section des commandos de même que les agents de sécurité fédéraux occupent l'immeuble. Une plaque commémorative sur l'édifice rappelle le tragique incendie du « Ringtheater » . Les statues de style Grec, dont le « Singendes Quartett » (Quatuor de chant) datant de 1874, qui ont survécu au brasier en restant debout sur les pilastres du Théâtre, sont l'œuvre de l'architecte Emil von Foerster. Après la tragédie de décembre 1881, elles seront achetées par le fabricant de meubles Max Schmidt qui les légua à la ville de Vienne lorsque le parc du château de Pötzleinsdorfer sera ouvert au grand public en 1935.

...

The « Ringtheater » was a popular theater in Vienna. It was located in the 1st District (« Bezirk I ») , Schottenring 7. It was destroyed in a fire, in 1881, and, today, the site is the federal headquarters of police for Vienna.

The « Ringtheater » was built between 1872 and 1874 by Heinrich von Förster, following plans by Emil Ritter. It opened on January 17, 1874, under the direction of Albin Swoboda, Senior as an « Opéra-Comique » , antithetical to the « seriousness » of the Vienna State Opera, then called the Court Opera (« Hofoper ») . However, in September 1878, the focus was shifted to spoken plays, German and Italian Opera and variety, and the name was changed to the « Ringtheater » .

Given that the footprint of the theatre was small (and the theatre was intended to hold an audience of 1,700) , the architect was forced to build high, but with disastrous consequences. On December 8, 1881, a fire broke-out shortly before a performance of « les Contes d'Hoffmann » by Jacques Offenbach. The so-called « Ringtheaterbrand » (« Ringtheater » Fire) totally destroyed the theatre, and killed at least 384, according to official figures. (The following year, a new law was passed, regarding the outfitting and safety provisions, including safety curtains, outwards-opening doors and fireproofing of the set.)

A so-called « Sühnhaus » was built on the site of the « Ringtheater » , out of the Emperor's private funds ; it was a private residence, which supported worthy causes. This was badly damaged, in 1945, and eventually fell-down, in 1951 ; between 1969 and 1974, an office block was erected on the site, in which the federal headquarters for police, in Vienna, and the general inspectorate of the federal security guards, and the now police commandos are housed. The fire is commemorated on a plaque on the police building. The Attic style statues, which had stood on the pilasters, are now in the « Pötzleinsdorfer Schlosspark » .

...

A short distance past the station « Schottentor » , a memorial plaque on number 7 « Schottenring » , on the left-hand side of the « Ring » , commemorates one of the great fire catastrophes of the 19th Century. In the « Ringtheater » that once stood at this spot, on 8 December 1881, shortly before a performance of Jacques Offenbach's Comic Opera « The Tales of Hoffmann » , a fault in the electro-pneumatic ignition system for the gas lighting started an appalling fire. The number of dead was estimated at over 400. In identifying the corpses, the forensic doctor Eduard von Hofmann (under whom Viennese forensic medicine achieved a leading position in the world) used modern methods such as examining the teeth of the victims. The charred head of a victim of the « Ringtheater » fire is still kept today in the Museum of Forensic Medicine, in Vienna, and a further one is exhibited in the Crime Museum in the « Leopoldstadt » . Hofmann's suspicion that, in many cases, the victims of a fire die through poisoning by smoke rather than burning could be proved through these corpses. He also succeeded in proving the existence of carbon monoxide in the blood of the victims. For forensic medicine, this was a most important discovery. In the case of a murder after which the body of the victim is burned, it could now be proved that, if there was no carbon monoxide in the blood, the victim had already been dead before being burned, or, on the other hand, if CO was found in the blood then this showed that victim had been burned while still alive. This catastrophe brought with it a new awareness, not just for the field of forensic medicine. In addition to changes to the building regulations concerning Theatres and Opera Houses - the fire curtain and emergency lighting became compulsory items and, since then, entrance doors always have to open outwards the shock caused by this disaster led to the establishment of the « Wiener freiwillige Rettungsgesellschaft » (Viennese Voluntary Rescue Society) .

More than 3,000 years of fire legislation

The earliest known law relating to fire is recorded in the Code of Hammurabi (Codex Hammurabi) dating back to circa 1760 BC. The Babylonian king and law-giver legislated that if fire break-out in a house, and some one who comes to put it out cast his eye upon the property of the owner of the house, he shall be thrown into that self-same fire. Whilst perhaps reducing theft in ancient Babylon, it is doubtful that such a law did much to actually prevent fires. For this, we must turn to ancient Rome.

Following a serious conflagration in Rome in the year 6 BC, the Emperor Augustus replaced the city's existing fire brigade, which was made-up of slaves, with a corps of so-called « vigiles » (firefighters and watchmen) , consisting of 7 cohorts, each of 1,000 freedmen. Each cohort was responsible for fire and, especially at night, police protection in 2 of the city's 14 « regiones » . Equipped with buckets, water syphons, axes, and dousing blankets it was the dawn of the fire service as we know it. This wouldn't be enough to stop the burning of Rome in 64 AD, however, after which new building regulations stipulated the need for broad access roads, standardised house façades, restricted use of timber, and subsidies to ensure that the construction of private dwellings also adhered to the law.

Meanwhile, far from Rome, on the eastern border of the Empire, a fire brigade comprising military veterans was formed in 150 AD, in « Carnuntum » , the capital of the Roman province of « Pannonia » . A similar force was deployed in the nearby legionary fortress of « Vindobona » (modern Vienna) , in 220 AD. And it was just 3 decades after this, that Saint-Florian, the patron Saint of firefighters, was born in « Aelium Cetium » (modern Sankt Pölten) , in the region that would later be known as Lower-Austria.

A high-ranking officer in the Roman army, « Florianus » is remembered for refusing an order to put Christian properties to the torch, declaring instead his own strong Christian beliefs. When « Florianus » subsequently failed to make the required sacrifices to the pagan gods of ancient Rome, he was sentenced to death by burning. After taunting his executioners with boasts of how he would climb to heaven on the flames, « Florianus » was drowned, instead, in the River Enns. Several statues of Saint-Florian can be seen in Vienna today, usually in the act of extinguishing a burning house with a pail of water (for example, on a building in « Sobieskiplatz » in the 9th District of « Alsergrund ») .

With the fall of the Roman Empire, the art of fire prevention was lost in Central Europe until 1221, when the Babenberg Duke of Austria, Leopold VI, passed a law whereby those whose houses caught fire, threatening others in the vicinity, were liable to a large fine. With such a threat hanging over them, and the knowledge that a soot-filled chimney was usually the cause, it is little wonder that the Viennese began viewing the humble chimney sweep as a harbinger of good luck. This is still felt strongly in the city today. The huge figure of a chimney sweep, for example, hangs outside the lotto office on « Wipplingerstraße » , where it acts as a symbol of good fortune. Similarly, tiny effigies of chimney sweeps are amongst the most popular lucky charms exchanged in Vienna at New Year.

With the accession of the Habsburgs to the Austrian throne, further fire legislation followed. Emperor Ferdinand I, for instance, issued specific instructions in 1534 as to how fires should be handled in the capital. Certain trades, such as blacksmiths and carpenters, were to play key roles in firefighting, and the city treasurer was to finance these activities. In 1686, 2 years after the Great Fire of London, Vienna's 1st fire brigade was founded, with 4 firefighters (« Fueurknechte ») storing their equipment in the Civic Armoury (« Bürgerliches Zeughaus ») on « Am Hof » . Further legislation followed during the 18th Century, by which the army was to be brought in, if several fires started simultaneously.

The 19th Century saw great leaps forward in the provision of firefighting equipment, the 1st respirator arriving in Vienna, in 1812, after 2 chimney sweeps suffocated in a smoke-filled cellar. Another important development came in 1838, when a watchmaker from Klagenfurt signed-up for duty as Austria's 1st voluntary fireman. A decade later, the newfound confidence that spread amongst the citizens of Vienna, in the wake of the French Revolution of 1848, was reflected in the formation of further volunteer fire brigades, including the 1st in Krems, Lower-Austria, in 1861.

Still, the threat of fire remained high, due mainly to the preponderance of buildings with thatched and timber-shingled roofs, as well as the use of candles and oil lamps. What Vienna needed was a city centre fire station. During the early 18th Century, Austria's most influential Baroque architect, Johann Bernhard Fischer von Erlach, had voiced the need for this, if only as a means of protecting his own work, which included the magnificent « Hofburg » Library, the « Prunksaal ». However, it was not until 1848, when Viennese citizens stormed the Civic Armoury on « Am Hof », looking for weapons with which to arm themselves, that a fire station was opened here (the Armoury was re-located to a purpose-built Arsenal, on « Landstraße »). Incidentally, adjacent to the former Armoury, behind the palatial façade at « Am Hof » 7-9, is today's Central Fire Station (« Feuerwehr Zentrale »), installed here, in 1935. Vienna's Fire Service Museum (« Feuerwehrmuseum ») can be found on the 1st floor of the building and contains a reconstruction of a look-out post (« Alte Türmestube »), which was once installed in the spire of the « Stephansdom ». The post was used for fire watching between 1534 and 1956.

The « Ringtheater » Ignites

In June 1870, the Austrian Parliament decreed that the responsibility for firefighting be transferred to the regional municipalities, each with its own police force and fire chief. The Lower-Austrian fire brigade federation was founded 1 year later and, in 1873, Vienna's 1st steam-powered fire engine (« Dampf-Spritzenwagen ») was demonstrated at the World Exhibition in the park of the « Prater ». Despite such readiness, however, some of Vienna's buildings remained perilously unprepared for a fire. The « Ringtheater » on « Schottenring 7 », on the northern stretch of the « Ringstraße », would become the most infamous of these.

The « Ringtheater » was unveiled on January 17th, 1874, as the « Wiener Theater », an « Opéra-Comique », providing a counterpoint to the seriousness of the « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofopertheater » (later called, the « Wiener Staatsoper »). In September 1878, however, the artistic focus of the « Wiener Theater » shifted to spoken plays, German and Italian Opera, and Variety, and it was renamed the « Ringtheater ».

Given that the footprint of the « Ringtheater » was small and that the building was intended to hold an audience of 1,700, the architect Emil von Förster (1838-1909) was forced to build high and narrow, but with disastrous consequences. On December 8th, 1881, a fire broke-out shortly before a performance of « les Contes d'Hoffmann » by Jacques Offenbach. Known, thereafter, as the « Ringtheaterbrand », it gutted the building within a few hours, killing at least 384 people in the process.

The cause of the fire remains a mystery, although it is known that the stage lamps were lit at 6:45 pm, while the curtain was still down, in readiness for the performance to begin. Perhaps, one of these lamps, which could raise the temperature of wooden stage scenery to 70 C° (centigrade), was to blame? For reasons unknown, the safety curtain was not lowered and the flames burst quickly out into the front seats. In the ensuing panic, the Theatre's telegraph system was not used to summon the fire brigade, nor were the water taps on the stage activated.

At this point, what began as a manageable accident turned quickly into a human catastrophe. So, as not to quicken the spread of the fire, the management switched-off the flickering gas jets, which were used for illumination in theatres, at the time. The emergency oil lighting, in the narrow and windowless hallways, which led to the Theatre's 4 galleries, had been left inoperable after recent repair work. Those trying to escape the flames were consequently plunged into darkness.

Whilst most of the performers were able to make their escape through the back of the building, the terrified theatregoers stumbled « en masse » towards the exit on « Schottenring » . Here, they became trapped, since the main doors only opened inwards. The scene was horrific, as recorded later in gruesome detail by the world's press. With the doors firmly closed and the fire raging behind them, those that didn't succumb to the flames were soon asphyxiated.

Within an hour, the building was like a furnace, fuelled by the lavish internal decorations that were made of highly-combustible light wood and « papier mâché » . The uppermost gallery, containing the cheapest seats, had no windows opening directly outside, so rescue by ladder was impossible. By contrast, some 50 people from the more exclusive 1st floor gallery were saved by their jumping from the windows onto sheets held-out by the fire brigade, on the pavement below. Here, a surreal scene was unfolding as bodies slowly piled-up and it began to snow.

By 11:30 pm, only the outside walls of the Theatre remained standing. By this time, those still unaccounted for had undoubtedly been reduced to cinders. Bizarrely, the ornate façade of the Theatre, with its confident statues of theatrical muses, was still intact. It is a little-known fact that these Classical-style statues were later taken down and used to adorn the « Pötzleinsdorfer Schlosspark » , where they can still be found today.

As the « Ringtheater » burned, Emperor Franz-Josef I (1830-1916) was at his Hungarian summer residence, in Gödöllő. Upon hearing the shocking news, he rushed back to Vienna and the city went into a period of deep mourning. In the immediate aftermath of the fire, the pioneer of modern forensic pathology, Eduard von Hofmann (1837-1897) , a professor at the University of Vienna, was brought in to examine the bodies. His autopsies deemed carbon monoxide poisoning to be the primary cause of many of the deaths.

Those who had lost family members were offered financial assistance, and a considerable amount of money was raised at the city's Stock Exchange (« Börse ») , which stood almost directly opposite the burned-out ruins. The Imperial family also contributed and, in time a so-called « Sühnhaus » (House of Atonement) was built on the former Theatre site at the Emperor's expense. Used for charitable purposes, it was demolished in 1951, after being damaged during the Second World War, and was replaced by Vienna's Federal Police Headquarters (a plaque commemorating the « Ringtheater » fire can be seen on the building, today) .

Blame for the failure to halt the « Ringtheater » fire and for not saving more lives was laid at the feet of 2 men. One of them, the « Ringtheater » 's newly-ennobled director, Franz Jauner, was held responsible for the lack of emergency oil lighting and for failing to keep the Theatre's fire buckets filled. The Emperor stripped him of his title (awarded for directing the « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofoperntheater » , between 1875 and 1880) and had him thrown into prison for 3 months. Returning to the theatre, in later life, Jauner eventually shot himself after falling victim to financial mismanagement.

The 2nd potentially guilty party was the Austrian Prime Minister and chief of secret police, Count Eduard von Taaffe. Ironically, he had ordered an investigation into the safety of all Vienna's theatrical venues, following the burning of the « Théâtre Royal » in Nice (France) , on March 1881.

That particular fire, which had been caused by a faulty gas main, had claimed the lives of 92 people. Von Taaffe's report concluded that existing building and fire regulations in Vienna were woefully inadequate. Numerous urgent improvements were deemed necessary : emergency exits should be clearly marked and fitted with emergency oil lighting, in the event of the gas supply being switched-off ; the wire-mesh safety curtain (made today of iron) separating the stage from the auditorium should be lowered at all times, except during rehearsals and performance ; separate gas mains should be used for the stage and for the auditorium ; and all doors serving as exits for the audience should open outwards. By the time of the « Ringtheater » fire, it was clear that not all of these improvements had been instigated.

Von Taaffe's recommendations finally became law, in 1882, and were emulated in theatres around the globe. At the same time, Vienna's network of fire alarms and water hydrants was improved, and outward-opening doors became common-place in all buildings accessible to the public, from the grandest of theatres to the most modest of corner shops. To some of today's visitors from outside continental Europe, this author included, outward-swinging doors are still quite a novelty to behold.

The effect of these new regulations was felt quickly. On 16th May 1884, for example, the « Wiener Stadttheater » set alight and its interior was gutted. A proposal to rebuild a theatre on the same site was refused by the Lower-Austrian authorities, on the basis of the new fire regulations : in this case, the access to the site was not deemed good enough. Consequently, in March 1887, the ruin was sold to Anton Ronacher, who built an eponymously-named concert hall and ballroom, on the site, with tables where the theatre stalls had once been. Similarly, when Vienna's « Volkstheater » was unveiled, in 1889, the new regulations were clearly reflected in the architecture of the building, which was given an isolated site and exhibited a clear structural separation between auditorium and stage, which were given separate roofs. The « Volkstheater » also featured a fire-proofed iron stage and electric lighting.

By 1908, the improved situation in Europe even warranted an article in the « New York Times » , bemoaning the fact that the cities of the « New World » were suffering more fires each month than those of London, Paris, Berlin and Vienna were in 6 months. Regarding Vienna, it stated the following :

There is no case known in this city where a conflagration has extended beyond the building in which it originated, and even hardly any cases are known where a fire extended beyond the floor on which it originated. This is prevented by the solidity of the buildings, by strict fire regulations, and by a pretty well-trained Fire Department. « Why Should America Have So Many More Disastrous Fires Than Europe ? » (« New York Times » , 1908.)

It would be another 3 decades, and the appearance of Allied bombers in the skies over the city, before well-built

Vienna and its well-trained firemen would again face the threat of destruction by fire.

Eduard von Hofmann

Né à Prague, en Bohême, le 27 janvier 1837.

Élu Correspondant étranger, le 30 mai 1885 (4e section) .

Professeur aux Universités d'Innsbrück et de Vienne.

Spécialités : médecine légale et hygiène.

Directeur de l'Institut de médecine légale de Vienne.

Nouveaux éléments de médecine légale.

Sera nommé Chevalier (Ritter) .

Nouveaux éléments de médecine légale par les docteurs Édouard (Ritter) von Hofmann, et Paul Brouardel Baillière, (1881) ; 830 pages.

Atlas-manuel de médecine légale par le docteur Édouard (Ritter) von Hofmann (1899) .

Décédé à Prague, le 27 août 1897.

...

The Austrian physician Eduard (Ritter) von Hofmann was born on 27 January 1837 and died on 27 August 1897 in Opatija. A native of Prague, he was a pioneer of modern forensic pathology.

In 1861, he earned his medical doctorate at Charles University, in Prague, and, in 1869, became a professor of « Staatsarzneikunde » (State Medical Research) at the University of Innsbruck. He obtained this position with assistance from Carl Rokitansky (1804-1878) . In 1875, he became a professor of forensic medicine at the University of Vienna.

Hofmann is remembered for his diligent work in development of forensic medicine as a separate scientific entity. He is credited for introducing and expanding methodologies such as microscopy, spectroscopy and laboratory animal experimentation into forensic medicine, at Vienna. He wrote 2 important books : « Lehrbuch für gerichtliche Medizin » (Textbook of Forensic Medicine) ; and « Atlas der gerichtlichen Medizin » (Atlas of Forensic Medicine) ; both of which have been translated into different languages.

Hofmann was instrumental in autopsy studies of the nearly 400 victims who perished at the Viennese « Ringtheater » fire which happened on December 8, 1881, where carbon monoxide poisoning was deemed to be an underlying cause of death. Also, he conducted the report on the controversial death of Crown Prince Rudolf of Austria (1858-1889) at Mayerling.

With Hermann Reinhard (1816-1892) , Eduard von Hofmann was one of the founders of forensic entomology.

...

Following the example of Vienna, a chair for State pharmacology was established at the University of Innsbruck. The 1st holder of this chair was the future Director of the Vienna Institute, Eduard von Hoffmann.

1875 : A chair for hygiene was established upon the opening of a dedicated Institute of Hygiene, in 1908, on Kinderspitalgasse.

Eduard Hofmann (Head of the Institute from 1875 to 1897) .

Investigated the death of Crown Prince Rudolph, on 30 January 1889.

Investigated the over 400 victims of the « Ringtheater » fire, on 8 December 1881 :

1st time identification was made using dental records.

Smoke inhalation was the cause of death.

Demonstrating that the presence of carbon monoxide (CO) is evidence that someone was burned alive.

1878 : 1st publication of Hofmann's « Textbook for Forensic Medicine » . For a long period of time, this was the standard reference book for forensic medicine and was translated into French, Italian, Spanish and Russian.

Removal of forensic medicine specimens from the pathology association collection and transferred to its own, independent collection.

Forensic medicine and hygiene separated : Post-mortems ordered by the Court and health authorities were linked to the Director of the Institute for Forensic Medicine from 1875 and, from this time on, forensic medicine was no longer part of pathological anatomy.

...

One of the most remarkable works belonging to Austrian literature concerned with the termination of pregnancy is a textbook of juridical medicine, from 1878, with special regard to Austrian and German legislation (« Lehrbuch der Gerichtlichen Medizin mit besonderer Berücksichtigung der österreichischen und deutschen Gesetzgebung ») . It was written by Austrian physician and pioneer of modern forensic pathology, Eduard Ritter von Hofmann (1837-1897) , and provides exhaustive insight into methods of traditional and mainstream medical practice. This work was repeatedly reprinted and it was translated into several languages. It is significant not only because of its focus upon relevant German and Austrian law, but also because of the information it provides regarding forbidden methods of intervention entirely missing from gynecological literature of the day. Hofmann earned high honors at the Vienna University for continuing the tradition of the « Vienna School of Forensic Medicine » . He directed an open and modern institute that attracted individuals from all over the Empire. He introduced microscopy and animal experimentation to forensic medicine. He was also renowned for identifying the casualties of Vienna's « Ringtheater » fire, as well as his autopsy of Crown Prince Rudolf. He was decorated with innumerable medals for his accomplishments, achieved knighthood, and was laid to rest in an honorary grave in Vienna's Central Cemetery.

...

Eduard Ritter von Hofmann (geboren 27. Januar 1837 in Prag ; gestorben 27. August 1897 in Opatija) war ein österreichischer Mediziner und gilt als Pionier der modernen forensischen Pathologie.

Hofmann studierte an der Prager Karlsuniversität, promovierte 1861 und habilitierte 1865 über die Fruchtwasseraspiration während der Geburt. Auf Empfehlung Carl von Rokitanskys wurde er 1869 an den Lehrstuhl für Staatsarzneikunde an der Universität Innsbruck berufen. Durch Nutzbarmachung neu entwickelter Methoden und Geräte wie Mikroskopie, Spektroskopie und Tierversuch für die Rechtsmedizin gab er der Wissenschaft neue Impulse. 1873 wurde von Hofmann in Innsbruck Dekan, folgte aber bereits 1875 einem Ruf an die Universität Wien, um wiederum auf Fürsprache des nunmehr emeritierten Rokitansky dessen Professur weiterzuführen.

Wie sein Vorgänger band er sein gerichtsmedizinisches Institut forciert in das behördliche Obduktionswesen ein, was die ausreichende Versorgung mit Körpern für die Forschung sicherte. Er stützte überdies die stärkere Zusammenarbeit mit experimentellen Pathologen und forensischen Toxikologen in der Gerichtsmedizin. Letztendlich galt sein Streben der Etablierung einer von der Vorherrschaft der pathologischen Anatomie befreiten Gerichtsmedizin. In diesem Sinne trennte er das gerichtsmedizinische Museum aus der pathologisch-anatomischen Ausstellung der Universität heraus. Seine Arbeit hob die Bedeutung des Wiener Instituts insgesamt auf ein international beachtetes Niveau.

Von Hofmann wurde für seine Verdienste um Wissenschaft wie Gesundheitspflege sowohl akademische als auch staatliche Anerkennung in Form zahlreicher Orden und der Erhebung in den Adelsstand mit der Verleihung des Titels « Ritter von » zuteil. Eduard von Hofmanns Hauptwerk, das 1878 erschienene « Lehrbuch für gerichtliche Medizin » , wurde in alle Wissenschaftssprachen übersetzt und erlebte allein bis zu Hofmanns frühem Tod neun Auflagen. Er selbst erhielt ein Ehrengrab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof.

Fälle

Unter den teilweise international mit Aufmerksamkeit verfolgten Fällen, bei denen Hofmann als rechtsmedizinischer Sachverständiger hinzugezogen wurde, können hervorgehoben genannt werden :

Aufklärung des Mordes an einer jungen Frau durch deren Bräutigam, der anhand von ausgerissenen Haaren an den Händen der im Stifser Joch Abgestürzten überführt wurde.

Mitarbeit bei der Identifizierung der fast 400 Opfer des Ringtheaterbrandes vom 8. Dezember 1881 ; dabei Entdeckung der Vergiftung mit Kohlenstoffmonoxid als eigentliche Todesursache von Brandopfern und damit, daß Kohlenmonoxid ein sicherer Beweis dafür ist, daß jemand lebendig verbrannt ist.

Gutachten zur Identität einer in der Theiß gefundenen Frauenleiche im Ritualmordprozess von Tiszaeszlár (1883)
Beteiligung am Gutachten zum Tode Kronprinz Rudolfs 1889, das eine Selbsttötung nachwies.

Werke

Lehrbuch für Gerichtliche Medizin, 1878 - 11 Auflagen bis 1927.

...

The « Ringtheater » was not rebuilt after the fire and the Emperor Franz-Josef had the « Sühnhaus » (Expiation House) , which he financed from his private purse, built in its place. The income from this tenement house was to be donated for all eternity to charitable foundations. Sigmund Freud lived and had his practice here from October 1886 to September 1891. The famous couch that he was given by a grateful patient originally stood in his newly opened practice in this building. He later took it with him to « Berggasse » and, then, to London where it can still be seen today. During the Second World War, the Imperial foundation building was heavily damaged by a bomb and was demolished in 1951. The « Bundespolizeidirektion » (Federal Police Headquarters) has stood here since 1974.

...

Das Ringtheater war ein volkstümliches Theater am Schottenring 7 im I. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Innere Stadt, das 1881 durch einen schweren Brand zerstört wurde. Heute befindet sich an seiner Stelle die Landespolizeidirektion Wien.

Im Oktober 1872 erhielt ein Konsortium von drei Herren durch kaiserliche Entschließung die Konzession für ein « neues stabiles Theater auf dem Schottenring gegenüber der Börse unter dem Namen “ Komische Oper ” für theatralische Vorstellungen jeder Art und des Balletts » . Zur Beschaffung des Bau- und Betriebskapitals wurde eine Aktiengesellschaft gegründet. Mit der Planung und Bauausführung wurde Emil von Förster betraut. Da ihm nur eine relativ kleine Bauparzelle zur Verfügung stand, das Theater aber 1.700 Personen fassen sollte, strebte er eine Raumerweiterung nach oben an und erreichte das durch eine verschachtelte Gliederung von Vestibülen, Gängen und Stiegenhäusern. Die Komische Oper, die als Gegenpol zur Hofoper « leichte » Opern spielen sollte, wurde am 17. Jänner 1874 unter der Direktion Albin Swobodas mit Rossinis Der Barbier von Sevilla eröffnet.

Zunächst führte die Aktiengesellschaft, auf welche die Konzession übergegangen war, den Betrieb auf eigene Rechnung. Der von der Aktiengesellschaft als künstlerischer Leiter engagierte Albin Swoboda legte die Direktion bereits am 9. März 1874 wieder zurück. In der Folge lösten die Direktoren einander immer wieder kurzfristig ab. Es gelang keinem, das Haus zum Erfolg zu führen, zeitweilig war es sogar geschlossen. Auch der erfolgreiche Direktor des Theaters an der Wien, Friedrich Strampfer, vermochte sich nicht länger als drei Jahre über Wasser zu halten, obwohl er das Haus in Ringtheater umbenannte und das Repertoire um Sprechstücke, deutsche und italienische Oper sowie Varieté erweiterte. Zu finanziellen Schwierigkeiten kamen auch immer wieder technische, wie unter anderem bei den Proben zu den « Sieben Raben » .

Mit 1. Juni 1881 pachtete Franz Jauner das Theater. Die Hoffnung, daß nunmehr unter seiner theaterkundigen Leitung das Unternehmen endlich gedeihen werde, machte die verheerende Brandkatastrophe, der Ringtheaterbrand, vom 8. Dezember 1881 zunichte : Knapp vor einer Aufführung von Hoffmanns Erzählungen brach ein Feuer aus, das das (im Eigentum des Stadterweiterungsfonds befindliche, versicherte) Theatergebäude vollständig vernichtete und nach offiziellen Angaben mindestens 384 Todesopfer forderte. Daraufhin wurde 1882 ein neues Gesetz betreffend die Einrichtung der Theater und Sicherheitsvorkehrungen (unter anderem Eiserner Vorhang, nach außen öffnende Türen, Imprägnierung der Bühnendekorationen) erlassen.

An der Stelle des Ringtheaters entstand aus Privatmitteln des Kaisers das so genannte « Sühnhaus » , ein Zinshaus, dessen Zinsertrag wohltätigen Zwecken zufloss. Es wurde 1945 schwer beschädigt und 1951 abgetragen ; 1969-1974 wurde auf dem Areal ein Amtsgebäude errichtet, in welchem die Bundespolizeidirektion Wien sowie das Generalinspektorat der Sicherheitswache, nunmehr zusammengefasst in der Landespolizeidirektion Wien, untergebracht wurde. Heute erinnert an den Brand noch eine Gedenktafel am Polizeigebäude. Vier Statuen, das sogenannte « Singende Quartett » , die auf den Pilastern der Attika standen, befinden sich heute im Pötzleinsdorfer Schlosspark.

« Sühnhaus »

The eminent Wagnerian soprano of Austrian nationality, Anna von Mildenburg was born on 29 November 1872 in Vienna and died on 21 January 1947. Known as Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, after her 1909 marriage, she had been a « protégé » (and mistress) of the composer-conductor Gustav Mahler during his musical directorship at the Hamburg State Opera. In 1898, Mahler took her to the Vienna Opera, where she established herself as one of the great stars during his celebrated tenure there as music-director.

Anna von Mildenburg lived in an apartment of the « Sühnhaus » , at « Schottenring 7 » , the north-western section of that boulevard. The address seemed ominous, for the apartment was built on the ruins of the « Ringtheater » , which had burned to the ground in 1881, killing 100's of those attending the night's performance. Werthen remembered that incident only too vividly. A teenager, he and his family were in Vienna for the Christmas season and had tickets to that evening's performance of Jacques Offenbach's « Tales of Hoffmann » . But his mother had come down with a bout of intestinal influenza and their father decided that it would be ungentlemanly for the rest of the family (his younger brother, Max, had still been alive, at that time) to be enjoying themselves while his wife was bedridden. For once, his father's gentlemanly code-forever aping what he thought to be the mannerisms of the titled classes-served them well.

The Emperor himself had ordered the building of this « House of Atonement », a magnificent structure combining elements of Gothic and Renaissance styles, surmounted by church-like spires. The building contained apartments, commercial properties, and a memorial chapel as a remembrance to those who had died. Despite its elegance and its quality address, the « Sühnhaus » was always a safe bet for a quick rental, for the Viennese were a superstitious lot, and the address was not a favored one. But for someone who had the cash and was in urgent need of upscale lodgings, the « Sühnhaus » was a popular short-term address. The singer surely had enough for the monthly rent : Berthe had informed him that Von Mildenburg had been hired at the unheard of sum of 14,000 « Gulden », as much as some advisors to the Emperor earned.

Their appointment had been arranged through the singer's agent. Berthe had easily found the man's name in the annual agent's list and had made the call while Werthen had been engaging Prokop and Meier. As far as the agent or the singer knew, Werthen, accompanied by his « assistant » Groß, had a commission from Gustav Mahler. Berthe had wisely left the nature of the commission up in the air.

Von Mildenburg lived on the top-floor, overlooking the broad « Ring ». The Stock Exchange was just across the street, while a close neighbor on the same side of the boulevard was the Police « Präsidium » .

They stood in front of the door to the singer's apartment and Werthen touched the bronze clapper that was shaped like a Dutch clog against the doorplate. The singer herself answered the door a moment later : Werthen recognized her, for he had seen her in the role of « Brünnhilde » at the « Hofoper » . Usually stars of the stage are much smaller when encountered outside the theater. However, Anna von Mildenburg was actually bigger in life ; not a heavy woman for a Wagnerian soprano, but substantial, like the building she lived in. She was tall and thick-boned and wore a flowing wrap, half-kimono and half-robe. A shock of dark brown hair was held aloft with pins and combs ; her face was punctuated by a broad Roman nose.

...

SÜHNHAUS tells the story of a luckless address : Vienna, « Schottenring 7 » . This was the site of the « Ringtheater » where nearly 400 people died in a fire, in 1881. Where the Emperor subsequently built the « Sühnhaus » (House of Atonement) to make-up for it, and no-one wanted to live there. Where Sigmund Freud opened a practice when he was still unknown. And moved-out again, after Pauline Pauline Silberstein, a patient, lunged to her death in the staircase.

The « Gestapo » put the place to the torch, in order to destroy files, successfully annihilating the Emperor's allegedly « incombustible » legacy. Here, Cold War fear was cast in concrete : Vienna's control centre for cases of breakdown, 18 meters under the earth and untouched to this day. The essay film SÜHNHAUS takes an associative look at Monarchy, 1st and 2nd Republic and connects images, events and thoughts that do not seem to have much in common, at 1st glance. As a ghost house movie without ghosts, it uses a piece of property's history as an occasion to look for real skeletons in Austria's cupboard.

...

SÜHNHAUS tells the story of an address inextricably linked to misfortune : « Schottenring 7 » , in Vienna. This was the site of the « Ringtheater » , where nearly 400 people died in a fire, in December 1881. The essay film moves through stages in Austrian history, from the Monarchy to the 1st and 2nd Republics, tracing the connections between images, events and ideas that may not, at 1st glance, appear to have much in common. As a ghost house movie without ghosts, it uses the history of a property as a starting point in the search for the real skeletons in Austria's cupboard.

Subsidies : « Filmfonds Wien » .

Production company : Freibeuter Film - www.freibeuterfilm.com

Running time : 90 minutes.

Language spoken : German.

Director : Maya McKeckneay.

Producer : Oliver Neumann.

Screenplay : Maya McKeckneay.

Camera : Martin Putz.

Sound : Klaus Kellermann.

Film editing : Oliver Neumann.

Production start date : 10 September 2013.

Post-production start date : 16 February 2014.

Completion expected : 2014.

...

Das « Sühnhaus » oder Kaiserlich-Königlich Stiftungshaus war ein Zinshaus (Miethaus) am Schottenring 7 im 1. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Innere Stadt, das nach dem Brand des Ringtheaters von 1881 an dessen Stelle errichtet wurde.

Nach dem verheerenden Ringtheaterbrand, bei dem mindestens 384 Menschen ums Leben kamen, finanzierte Kaiser Franz-Josef aus seiner Privatschatulle den Bau eines Miethauses. Die Erträge dieses Miethauses sollten laut kaiserlicher Anordnung für ewige Zeiten wohlthätigen Stiftungen zufließen. Im zweiten Stock des Gebäudes erinnerte eine Kapelle (Unbefleckte Empfängnis) an die Opfer des Brandes. Da das Gebäude rasch fertiggestellt sein sollte, wurde auch an Sonntagen daran gearbeitet.

Das Gebäude wurde von 1882 bis 1885 errichtet. Der Architekt war wie bei vielen anderen Gebäuden der Ringstraße Friedrich von Schmidt. Es wurde am 26. Jänner 1886 durch eine Messe in der Kapelle, bei der auch der Kaiser anwesend war, eröffnet. Zur Eröffnung prägte auch das Kaiserlich-Königlich Hauptmünzamt Medaillen. Trotz günstiger Mieten waren anfangs nicht alle Wohnungen vermietet, da das mit diesem Ort verbundene tragische Ereignis noch nicht lange zurücklag. Zu den ersten Mietern zählte der frisch verheiratete Sigmund Freud, welcher aber bereits 1891 in die nahegelegene Berggasse übersiedelte. Im selben Jahr wurde das « Sühnhaus » zum Sterbehaus seines Architekten, Friedrich von Schmidt.

1945 wurde das « Sühnhaus » bei einem Bombenangriff schwer beschädigt und 1951 abgetragen. An seinem Platz wurde 1974 der Sitz der damaligen Bundespolizeidirektion Wien und heutigen Landespolizeidirektion Wien errichtet. Heute erinnert an den Brand noch eine Gedenktafel am Polizeigebäude.

...

Das nach Plänen von Emil Förster zwischen 1873 und 1874 erbaute Theater trug bei der Eröffnung den Namen : « komische Oper » , da dieses für die damalige Zeit architektonisch sehr wunderschön gebaut war.

Ab September 1878 wurde sein Name jedoch in « Ringtheater » geändert. Vor dem Beginn einer Vorstellung entzündeten sich einige Gaslampen in der Deckendekoration und ließen viel Gas ausströmen. Binnen sieben Minuten standen Bühne, Schnürboden und Versenkung in hellen Flammen und einige Personen wurden daraufhin durch Nichtbemerken teilweise durch das Feuer eingekreist. Durch das zu späte Rufen der Feuerwehr wurden die Chancen heil wieder heraus zu kommen immer geringer und führten schließlich zum Sterben von 386 Personen.

Das Ringtheater war gerade sieben Jahre alt und wurde nach diesem Vorfall nicht mehr aufgebaut. Durch diesen Extremfall wurde die Einführung der strengsten Brandschutzverordnungen des Kontinents veranlasst. Somit wurde zum Beispiel das Hantieren mit offenem Licht auf der Bühne komplett verboten.

An die Stelle des Theaters ließ der Kaiser vom Dombaumeister Friedrich Schmidt, dem Erbauer des Rathauses, mit Mitteln aus der kaiserlichen Privatschatulle das « Sühnhaus » erbauen. Dieses « Sühnhaus » war ein so genanntes Zinshaus, wobei die daraus erhaltenden Erträge, laut kaiserlicher Anordnung, für ewige Zeiten wohlthätigen Stiftungen zufließen wurden.

Hinzukommend wurde im zweiten Stock des Gebäudes eine Kapelle zu gedenken der Opfer der schrecklichen Brandkatastrophe errichtet. 1945 wurde dann das « Sühnhaus » bei einem Bombenangriff schwer beschädigt und 1951 wieder aufgebaut. An deren Platz wurde 1974 die noch heute existierende Bundespolizeidirektion errichtet.

...

« Sühnhaus » (Bezirk I, Schottenring 7) . Am 8. Dezember 1881 war das Ringtheater abgebrannt. An seiner Stelle wurde nach Plänen von Friedrich Schmidt aus kaiserlichen Privatmitteln ein « Sühnhaus » (Kaiserliches Stiftungshaus) erbaut, in dem sich auch eine Kapelle befand (« Sühnhauskapelle ») . Die Skulpturen « Glaube » und « Liebe » schuf Alois Düll. Das « Sühnhaus » war ein Miethaus, dessen Ertrag wohltätigen Zwecken zufließte. Es wurde am 8. Dezember 1885 eröffnet, ließ sich aber anfangs wegen der makabren Erinnerung trotz relativ niedriger Mieten nur schwer vermieten (einer der ersten Mieter war der jungverheiratete Sigmund Freud) ; 1891 starb im « Sühnhaus » Friedrich Schmidt. Am 12. März 1945 wurde das Gebäude durch Bomben schwer beschossen und mußte 1951 abgetragen werden. Auf dem Areal I, Schottenring 7-9 wurde 1969-1974 die (neue) Polizeidirektion erbaut (Gedenktafel, 1982) .

Sigmund Freud et le « Sühnhaus »

Après avoir passé 5 années dans le service de Theodor Meynert, Sigmund Freud entre en septembre 1883 dans la 4e division du docteur Ingrid Scholtz. Il y acquiert une expérience clinique auprès de malades nerveux. En décembre de la même année, à la suite de la lecture d'un article du docteur Theodor Aschenbrandt, il se livre à des expériences sur la cocaïne et en déduit qu'elle a une efficacité sur la fatigue et les symptômes de la neurasthénie. Dans son article de juillet 1884, « Über Coca » , il conseille son usage pour de multiples troubles. Freud, à la suite de la lecture d'un texte qui propose de traiter la morphinomanie par la cocaïne, traite un ami morphinomane, Ernst Fleischl von Marxow, mais l'expérience tourne mal et ce dernier se suicide.

Bien qu'il l'ait nié publiquement à de nombreuses reprises, il fut lui-même consommateur de cocaïne entre 1884 et 1895, comme en atteste sa correspondance. Il travaille sur sa découverte avec Carl Köller, qui mène alors des recherches sur un moyen d'anesthésier l'œil en vue de pratiquer des opérations peu invasives. Celui-ci informe ensuite Leopold Königstein qui applique cette méthode à la chirurgie. Tous 2 communiquent leur découverte lors de la Société des médecins de Vienne en 1884, sans mentionner la primauté des travaux de Freud.

Jeune médecin, Freud est affecté au service d'ophtalmologie, de mars à mai 1884, puis dans celui de dermatologie. Il y rédige un article sur le nerf auditif. Freud reçoit un accueil favorable. En juin, il passe l'examen oral pour le poste de « Privatdozent » , et y présente son dernier article. Il est nommé le 18 juillet 1885 et, voyant sa demande de bourse de voyage acceptée, il décide d'aller étudier à Paris, auprès de Jean-Martin Charcot. Après 6 semaines de vacances auprès de sa fiancée, Freud s'installe donc dans cette ville. Admirateur du neurologue français, qu'il rencontre la 1re fois le 20 octobre 1885, il se propose de traduire ses écrits en langue allemande. Dès lors, le Français le remarque et l'invite à ses somptueuses soirées du faubourg Saint-Germain. Cependant, il semble que Freud n'ait pas passé autant de temps qu'il le dit auprès de Charcot, puisqu'il quitte Paris le 28 février 1886 ; il en retire néanmoins toujours de la fierté et fait de ce séjour à Paris un moment clé de son existence. Il reste en outre en contact épistolaire avec le Français.

En mars 1886, Freud étudie la pédiatrie à Berlin, avec Baginsky, et revient finalement à Vienne en avril. Il rédige son rapport sur l'hypnotisme tel qu'il est pratiqué à la Salpêtrière devant les membres du Club de physiologie et devant ceux de la Société de psychiatrie, tout en organisant les préparatifs de son mariage. Un article d'Albrecht Erlenmeyer le critique vivement quant aux dangers de l'usage de la cocaïne. Freud finit de traduire un volume des leçons de Charcot, qui paraît en juillet 1886, avec une préface de sa main. Après quelques mois de service militaire à Olmütz, comme médecin de bataillon, Freud épouse Martha Bernays le 13 octobre 1886, à Wandsbek ; ils passent leur voyage de noces sur la mer Baltique. Dès son retour à Vienne, Freud aménage son cabinet dans l' « Erste Öffentliche Kinder-Krankeninstitut » (1er institut public des malades pour des enfants) et travaille parallèlement avec l'Institut Max-Kassowitz, un hôpital pédiatrique privé où il est affecté au service neurologique. Il travaille à l'institut de 1886 à 1896.

Le 15 octobre 1886, devant la Société des médecins de Vienne, Freud fait une allocution concernant l'hystérie masculine, discours demeuré célèbre dans la littérature psychanalytique sous le titre de « Beiträge zur Kasuistik der Hysterie » (publié en 2 volumes) . Ce sujet est alors polémique, d'autant plus que la conception classique de Charcot oppose l'hystérie post-traumatique à une hystérie dite simulée. S'appuyant sur la distinction entre « grande hystérie » (caractérisée par des convulsions et une hémianesthésie) et la « petite hystérie » , et sur un cas pratique examiné à la Salpêtrière, Freud explique que l'hystérie masculine est plus fréquente que ce que les spécialistes observent habituellement. Pour Freud, la névrose traumatique appartient au champ de l'hystérie masculine. La Société s'insurge contre cette opinion qui est, de plus, déjà connue des neurologues viennois. Selon Henri Ellenberger, l'idéalisation de Freud pour Charcot lui vaut l'irritation de la Société, agacée par son attitude hautaine. Blessé, Freud présente alors à la Société un cas d'hystérie masculine afin d'étayer sa théorie. La Société l'entend de nouveau, mais l'éconduit. Contrairement à une certaine légende autour de cet événement, Freud ne se retire pas de la Société ; il en devient même membre, le 18 mars 1887.

Pauline Theiler Silberstein (1871-1891) est l'épouse d'Eduard Silberstein, un ami d'enfance de Sigmund Freud avec qui ce dernier a échangé une abondante correspondance durant leur jeunesse. De 15 ans plus jeune que Silberstein, Pauline a développé une profonde « mélancolie » (dépression) peu après son mariage. Accompagnée d'une domestique qui veille en permanence sur elle, elle vient à Vienne de Braila, en Roumanie, pour se faire traiter par Freud. Elle loge dans l'immeuble voisin du sien, au 10 « Maria Theresienstraße » . On ne sait pas combien de temps dure le traitement ni en quoi il consiste, mais d'après Rosita Vieyra, la petite-fille d'Eduard Silberstein, la famille en gardera un souvenir vivace, ainsi que de son issue funeste. Le 14 mai 1891, Pauline Silberstein se présente devant l'immeuble de Freud, demande à sa domestique de l'attendre en bas et, après avoir gravi 4 étages, se jette dans la cour (constat de décès dressé par la police viennoise) . Elle avait 19 ans. Mis à part une lettre adressée le 22 avril 1928, au B'nai B'rith de Braila, dans laquelle il mentionne brièvement avoir eu en traitement la Ire femme de feu son ami Eduard Silberstein, Freud ne fera jamais la moindre allusion à ce cuisant échec thérapeutique.

Sigmund Freud letters to his future wife, Martha Bernays

From Paris (18 January 1886) :

« He (Charcot) invited me (as well as Ricchetti) to come to his house tomorrow evening after dinner : “ Il y aura du monde. ” . You can probably imagine my apprehension mixed with curiosity and satisfaction. White tie and white gloves, even a fresh shirt, a careful brushing of my last remaining hair, and so on. A little cocaine, to untie my tongue. It is quite all right, of course, for this news to be widely distributed in Hamburg and Vienna, even with exaggerations such as that he kissed me on the forehead (“ à la Liszt ”) . »

From Paris (20 January 1886) :

« On Saturday, Charcot came-up to Ricchetti and invited him to dine at his house on Tuesday before leaving. Startled, Ricchetti declined, and finally accepted to go after dinner. Then, Charcot turned to me and repeated the latter form of invitation, which I accepted with a bow, feeling delighted. »

« We drove there in a carriage the expenses of which we shared. Ricchetti was terribly nervous, I quite calm with the help of a small dose of cocaine, although his success was assured and I had reasons to fear making a blunder. »

« These were my achievements (or rather the achievements of cocaine) , which left me very satisfied. »

From Paris (2 February 1886) :

« The bit of cocaine I have just taken is making me talkative, my little woman. I will go on writing and comment on your criticism of my wretched self. »

« Here I am, making silly confessions to you, my sweet darling, and really without any reason whatever unless it is the cocaine that makes me talk so much. But now, I must go out to supper and then dress myself up and do some more writing. Tomorrow, I will report to you quite truthfully on how the evening at Charcot's turned-out. You, of course, must tell everyone that I had a wonderful time, and I shall write the same to Vienna. The truth is for us alone. »

« Thank God, it's over, and I can tell you at once how right I was. It was so boring I nearly burst ; only the bit of cocaine prevented me from doing so. »

« Only toward the end, I embarked on a political conversation with Gilles de la Tourette, during which he, of course, predicted the most ferocious war with Germany. I promptly explained that I am a Jew, adhering neither to Germany nor Austria. »

« But please don't tell anyone how boring it was. »

...

Returning to Vienna, in February 1886, Sigmund Freud opened a private practice as a specialist in the treatment of « nervous diseases ». As his practice grew, he finally earned enough money to marry Martha Bernays, on 13 October 1886, at Wandsbek (Austria) . They pass their honeymoon on the Baltic Sea.

The couple moved into an apartment in a middle-class neighborhood, in the heart of Vienna. Their 1st child, Mathilde, was born in 1887, followed by 3 sons and 2 daughters, over the next 8 years.

Freud began to receive referrals from other physicians to treat their most challenging patients - « hysterics » who did not improve with treatment. Freud used hypnosis with these patients and encouraged them to talk about past events in their lives. He dutifully wrote down all that he learned from them - traumatic memories, as well as their dreams and fantasies.

...

In 1886, Sigmund Freud returned from academic study in Paris to Vienna, where he opened a private practice specializing in nervous and brain disorders. On 14 September of that same year, he married Martha Bernays, with whom he had 6 children during the span of 9 years. Over the next decade, Freud combined clinical practice with theoretical insights to develop the foundational principles of psychoanalysis.

...

Sigmund Freud married Martha Bernays, in October 1886, in Wandsbeck (Austria) , after opening his own medical practice, specializing in neurology. She is the granddaughter of Isaac Bernays, the influential chief rabbi of Hamburg. She will not, however, remain as religious as her father and grandfather. For most of her life, her views on religion will align more closely with that of her husband, Sigmund, though towards the end of her life, she returns to, at least, some Jewish traditions.

After experimenting with hypnosis on his neurotic patients, Sigmund Freud abandoned this form of treatment, in favour of a treatment where the patient talked through his or her problems. This came to be known as the « talking cure » . (The term was initially coined by the patient called « Anna O. » who was treated by Freud's colleague, Josef Breuer.) The « talking cure » is widely seen as the basis of psychoanalysis.

...

25 April 1886 : Sigmund Freud opened-up his 1st neurologist's office in Vienna, at « Rathausstraße 7 » . He was 30 years old, and soon would marry Martha Bernays, the daughter of the chief rabbi of Hamburg. In his Vienna practice, Freud experimented with hypnosis, but abandoned it in favour of the « talking cure » (a term coined by « Anna O. » , that is, Bertha Pappenheim, the Austrian Jewish feminist who was treated by Freud's colleague, Josef Breuer) . Freud developed many of his fundamental psychological theories about repression, of the functioning of the unconscious, and the role of sexual desire in the human psyche, and more, based on his practice with patients on « Rathausstraße » .

« To my Jewish nature, I owed 2 characteristics that had become indispensable to me in the difficult course of my life. Because I was a Jew, I found myself free from many prejudices that restricted others in the use of their intellect ; and, as a Jew, I was prepared to join the Opposition and do without agreement from the “ compact majority ”. » (Sigmund Freud, 1926.)

...

1 October 1886 : Sigmund Freud set his medical practice in his Viennese apartment of the so-called « Sühnhaus » , on « Maria Theresienstraße 8 » . His family lived there, until 1891. Emperor Franz-Josef had this house built on the grounds of the former « Ringtheater » , destroyed by a violent fire on December 8, 1881. In the course of this tragic event, 386 people had been killed.

...

The Freuds had been entitled to think that their investment in a good address would pay-off. « Maria Theresienstraße 8 » lay right by the « Ringstraße » , a neighborhood of arrived doctors and distinguished professionals. Anton Bruckner, for example, lived opposite at « Heßgasse 7 » and could afford the rent, having only himself to support on his joint salaries as music teacher at the Conservatory, and organist at the Palace Chapel. But if the old musician ever troubled to look-down from his 4th floor clutter to the young doctor's orderly household on the 2nd floor across the street, he would have seen a precious few patients in the waiting-room.

...

On May 14, 1891, a 19 year old woman, Pauline Theiler Silberstein, killed herself by jumping from an upper-story at « Maria Theresienstraße 8 » , in Vienna, where Sigmund Freud had his office and residence. She was the wife of Freud's closest friend of adolescence, Eduard Silberstein, who had referred her to Freud for treatment when she became severely depressed shortly after they were married, requiring her to travel with a maid from her home in Braila, Rumania, to Vienna. There is no available record of any communication between Freud and Silberstein about this incident nor anything about it in Freud's letters to Wilhelm Fließ, where there is a gap between May 2 and August 17, 1891. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to infer that there was some exchange between Freud and Eduard Silberstein beyond simple notification of his wife's death, as he must have come to Vienna to identify and claim her body, arrange for a funeral (as she is buried in a Viennese cemetery) , and consult with Freud about what had happened.

The exact nature of the relationship between Pauline Silberstein and Freud is uncertain. It is not known how long she had been his patient, what her diagnosis was, what therapeutic approach he may have taken with her, and whether or not she had any contact with him, on May 14. Walter Böhlich, who edited the correspondence between Freud and Eduard Silberstein, claims that she ended her life « without having seen Freud » that day. Kurt Eißler misquotes Böhlich, as having said « that Freud never had met Pauline Silberstein, and I think he is right » .

...

The the wife of Austrian psychoanalyst Sigmund Freud, Martha Bernays, was born on 26 July 1861 in Hamburg and died on 2 November 1951 in London.

Bernays was the 2nd daughter of Emmeline and Berman Bernays. Her paternal grandfather Isaac Bernays was a Chief Rabbi of Hamburg. Sigmund Freud and Bernays met in April 1882 and, after a 4 year engagement (1882-1886) , they got married on 14 September 1886, in Hamburg.

Freud and Bernays' love letters sent during the engagement years, according to Freud's official biographer Ernest Jones, who read all the letters, « would be a not unworthy contribution to the great love literature of the world » . Freud and Bernays had 6 children : Mathilde (born in 1887) ; Jean-Martin (born in 1889) ; Oliver (born in 1891) ; Ernst (born in 1892) ; Sophie (born in 1893) ; and Anna (born in 1895) . Bernays' younger sister, Minna Bernays, is known to be one of Sigmund's friends - it has also been speculated that she was Freud's mistress. This claim was controversial, at 1st, but the publication of a hotel log has prompted some Freud scholars, including his defender Peter Gay, to regard the conjecture of Freud and Minna having an affair as probably accurate.

...

Sigmund Freud never seems to have considered marrying out of his faith, as many Victorian Jews did. He courted and married Martha Bernays, who came from a pious and well-connected Jewish family. They were engaged for 4 years, from 1882 to 1886, and wrote constantly to each other. Their letters show the young Freud as ambitious, passionate, driven, but also amdous and insecure, often the charming, even humble lover, but also forceful. He admits many anxieties to her, especially the fact that he cannot manage financially and has to borrow money. 2 of his teachers, Samuel Hammerschiag and Ernst Fielschl, who taught anatomy at the University of Vienna, often provided loans. Freud bemoaned the fact that no one was willing to lend money to a young doctor without charging exorbitant interest rates. He was not frugal ; he bought books, ate out in restaurants, and took French lessons even when he could afford none of these things. In his letters, he shared with his « fiancée » his scientific ideas and reflections on being Jewish.

Martha Bernays' grandfather had been a famous rabbi in Hamburg. Her uncle, Jacob Bernays, was one of the foremost Classical and Biblical scholars of the mid- 19th Century ; Freud knew his work well. In one of Jacob Bernays's books, « Ein Lebensbild In Briefen » (roughly translated as : « A Portrait of a Life in Letters ») , Bernays described how he refused to convert to Christianity. One of his friends, Christian von Bunsen, the Prussian ambassador to London, wanted to help Bernays get a professorship but he knew Bernays could never get a chair in Prussia because he was a Jew. Bernays should convert, von Bunsen suggested, but not merely to gain such lofty academic status. The ambassador was a subtle tempter. Jews were consigned to the margins of history, von Bunsen told his friend. A great scholar like Bernays should convert and be « in the mainstream » . Bernays was never even tempted to convert and told von Bunsen that his « inner core » was Jewish.

Sigmund Freud's inner core was also Jewish. And he liked talking about it more than one might expect. In one letter,

Freud described meeting an old Jew, Nathan. Nathan had no doubts about the romance of his religion. Freud seems to have approved, for he told Martha. Nathan said the Jew is the finest flower of mankind. The Jew is made for joy and joy for the Jew. Nathan then explained how his teacher, Martha's grandfather, the famous rabbi, used to explain how various Holy Days brought with them particular degrees of joy. The most joyous was Simchat Torah when Jews celebrate the fact that God has given them the Torah and drink a good deal. (In biblical times, it was wine, but once Jews lived in Eastern Europe, they toasted the Torah, in vodka.)

Then, Freud told her « fiancée » , a customer walked into the shop and Nathan dropped the elegiac tone and « became a merchant again » . Freud reassured her with surprising intensity :

« And as for us, this is what I believe ; even if the form wherein Jews were happy no longer offers us any shelter, something of the core, of the essence of this meaningful and life-affirming Judaism, will not be absent from our home. »

After 4 years, and much opposition from her mother, Sigmund Freud and Martha Bernays married, in 1886. The wedding was not conducted in a synagogue. Emmeline, Martha's mother, did not want her daughter to marry a poor young doctor. She had seen what poverty could mean. She and her husband had had to come to Vienna because Bennan, Martha's father, was in desperate financial difficulties. Bennan worked selling advertising but he was financially chaotic. In 1866, he was put on trial for keeping false accounting records. He was made bankrupt and served 1 year in prison, at exactly the same time as Uncle Josef did. In 1867, devastated, the Bernays family moved to Vienna. So when Freud married Martha Bernays, they both had seen people they loved imprisoned. The nephew of the forger married the daughter of the embezzler. It's hardly surprising that Martha's mother had wanted her daughter to marry someone who offered security. We owe to Freud's grandson, Anton, the details of his great-grandfather Bernays' inglorious business career.

The 1st son of the marriage was born in 1887 and named Jean-Martin, in honour of Charcot. The law required births to be registered according to religious faith. The old registers for Jewish families are still held in the offices of Vienna's main synagogue, on a cobbled street near the city center. There is a Kosher restaurant nearby. To see the register, you have to go through strict security, submit to a search, and pass through a metal detector. The Jews of Vienna still feel under threat.

The Jewish archive is run by Doctor Walter Eckstein. He smiled as he brought-out the huge books and pointed to the entries that recorded the birth of Jean-Martin Freud, mother Martha Freud, and father Sigmund Freud. Looking at the fine copperplate hand-writing, I wondered whether Freud had his own sons circumcised, as he himself had been. On this point, I can find no information, and 2 men who might have been able to answer, his grandsons, Clement, and brother, Lucien Freud, did not answer my questions. Sadly both men are now dead.

Late in life, Freud wrote that he had been exceptionally happy in his marriage but that it was not a simple one. His wife's sister lived with them for 46 years. Minna Bernays moved in after her « fiancé » died. Consciously or unconsciously, Freud re-created a situation much like that of his childhood stepfamily. Minna had to walk through her sister and brother-in-law's bedroom to reach her own. Carl Jung has been accused of starting the rumor that Freud and his sister-in-law slept together. The 2 certainly spent holidays together on their own, while Freud's wife stayed in Vienna to look after the children ; author Peter Swales claims to have found a hotel register that suggests Freud and his sister-in-law shared a room.

...

25 April 1886 : This day, in 2 rented office rooms in a building at « Rathausstraße 7 » , in Vienna, young Sigmund Freud opened his 1st practice.

He had used the preceding years to finish his medical studies and internships ; the year before (1885) , he had worked on a scholarship with prominent French psychiatrist Jean-Martin Charcot (1825-1893) in the famous « Salpêtrière » Hospital, in Paris.

At the time, Freud's profession was still often named neurology rather than psychiatry, but he himself was already especially interested in psychiatric problems that had no obvious physical cause. 10 years later (in 1896) , he would introduce the term « psychoanalysis » for the particular kind of therapy he had developed by then.

Freud was the 1st who tried to solve patients' mental problems by bringing inner conflicts in the patients' mind from a subconscious to the conscious level : mainly, by getting the patient to talk in an associative way about her or his experiences, in the past.

...

Sigmund Freud's Vienna practice is usually associated with the address « Berggasse 19 » where he lived and worked for most of his life, and where the Vienna Freud Museum is located today.

But his practice started on this day, in 1886, at « Rathausstraße 7 » ; he did not move to the « Berggasse » until 5 years later.

« Rathausstraße 7 » , in Vienna, therefore, is a very significant place in the history of psychiatry. The building still exists, but it proved unexpectedly hard to find any decent photo of it.

(Dieses Haus wurde 1882 von Dionys Milch und Heinrich Hellin erbaut und liegt am Friedrich-Schmidt-Platz 2.)

...

The Viennese often say : « It is no surprise Sigmund Freud developed psychoanalysis in this city. » , insinuating a dark side of the magnificent capital of Austria. I found it intriguing and exiting, simply worth investigating further. Especially since the city seemed to peaceful and civilised.

It is best to arrive into the city centre by the subway. Landing on the airport or coming into the « Westbahnhof » train station, the city seem like any other European capital. Apartments, offices, stores and super-markets. If you go underground, take the subway into the 1st District (« Bezirk I. ») and, then, exit ; an entirely different city would reveal itself. The 1st time I was in « Wien », I did exactly this. I went of the subway at « Herrengasse », where I suddenly found myself surrounded by large, white, beautiful 19th Century blocks of flats. Walking around a street corner, I entered the enormous « Heldenplatz », overlooking the « Kunsthistorisches and Naturhistorisches Museum ». « Wien » seems like a dream.

This, however, seems to be more of a false 1st impression. Adolf Loos wrote that the impressive « Ringstraße », surrounding the inner city, was nothing but a « Potemkin Village ». This Russian expression describe a city that is make-out of facades, attempting to deceive us to believe it is more magnificent than it actually is. Loos is criticizing the style ; historicism, which he considered to be a vulgar masquerade. However, this city of the facades, could still apply to Vienna. It is a city full of anxiety, hidden behind velvet curtains and locked-up in the basement.

This was the place Sigmund Freud explored psychoanalysis, a method for treating mental disorders. One of his 1st patient, « Anna O. », was a hysteric woman suffering from anxiety and neurosis. Freud started treating her by talking to her, and he realised that all affect was rooted in oppressed emotions. But the place itself was a location of tragedy.

On the site where Freud had his 1st office (not the famous « Bergasse 19 » but the « Maria Theresienstraße 8 ») , it used to be a theatre within the style of historicism, « Ringtheater ». Loos would probably have condemned it as pretentious and vulgar if it had not burnt down to the ground in December 1881. In this tragic fire, killed at least 385 people (some says it was more than 600) , leaving hundreds of orphans traumatised by the event. The city built an orphanage on the site. Called the « Sühnhaus » (House of Atonement) , this later became the address of Sigmund Freuds home and office.

It is not only Freud and Loos which underscore the neurotic state of this early metropolis. Elfride Jelinik with « The Piano Teacher » ; Mikael Haneke with « Funny Games » or « Das Weiße Band » , propose a similar tendency of anxiety and forbidden, and perverted pleasures.

...

Le Scherzo de la 7e Symphonie, dans le ton volontairement cru de la mineur, est caractérisé par des motifs bloqués, répétés jusqu'à satiété aux cordes et par un vigoureux appel de trompette, que d'aucuns ont perçu comme une réminiscence cauchemardesque d'une sirène de pompiers, Bruckner ayant éprouvé une fascination morbide à la vue, juste en face de son domicile, de centaines de corps calcinés extraits du « Ringtheater » de Vienne après le tristement célèbre incendie du 8 décembre 1881. Le Trio central, en fa majeur, tout en legato des cordes, amorce toutefois une certaine consolation dans l'évocation du « Ländler » de la Haute-Autriche natale.

...

Décembre 1881 : At the decision of the jury, Mahler fails to win the Beethoven Prize. For the rest of his life, he blames this loss for his inability to make a living as a composer and for the resultant necessity to have a conducting career, « condemning me to the hell of the Theater » .

The 46 year old Wilhelm Jahn becomes Music-Director of the Vienna Opera.

10 décembre 1881 : Ire audition d'une œuvre de Bruckner en Allemagne. La version de 1881 de la 4e Symphonie, dite « Romantique », est donnée à Karlsruhe par le chef Felix Mottl, ancien élève du compositeur au Conservatoire de Vienne. L'événement est un échec mais le compositeur n'était pas présent.

1881-1882 : Bruckner procède à une importante révision de la Messe en ré mineur (WAB 26) .

AB 81 : 1882

12 janvier 1882 : Bruckner sollicite un doctorat « Honoris causa » en musique de l'Université de Cambridge, en Angleterre. Lorsque cette tentative échoue, il écrit à l'Université de Pennsylvanie à Philadelphie, en disant :

« Je me permets de demander à nouveau à l'Université de Pennsylvanie d'accepter gracieusement la dédicace de ma Symphonie dite " Romantique " en me conférant le grade de Docteur en musique. »

On conseille alors à Bruckner d'expédier aussi une demande à l'Université de Cincinnati. Lors de ce geste désespéré, un escroc de grand chemin réussira à profiter de la naïveté du Maître en tirant profit de la situation.

L'Opéra « Parsifal »

13 janvier 1882 : C'est à la Villa « Wahnfried » que Richard Wagner (âgé de 69 ans) achèvera l'Opéra « Parsifal » .

Le dévôt catholique décrit comme suit sa dernière rencontre avec Wagner : « Lorsque le plus Grand me tendit la main, je suis tombée à genoux, j'ai serré sa main, l'ai couverte de baisers et lui ai dit : Ah, Maître, je vous adore ! . Wagner me répondit : Calmez-vous, Bruckner, bonne nuit. Ce furent les dernières paroles que le Maître me dit. » .

Embarrassé, Wagner reconstituera (à sa façon) cet événement dans un rêve des plus fascinants : « Une nuit, le Saint-Père vint me visiter. Je voulus l'accueillir avec dignité et respect mais il inversa subitement les rôles. Il se pencha humblement vers moi pour me baiser la main. Puis, il saisit une bouteille de cognac et disparut ! Le souverain Pontife ressemblait étrangement à Anton Bruckner. » .

Et c'est durant cette même rencontre « au sommet » que Richard Wagner déclarera : « Je ne connais qu'un homme qui s'approche de Beethoven, cet homme c'est Bruckner. » . Ceci qui prouve que Wagner avait mis de côté l'idée que l'univers Symphonique prenait fin avec la composition de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven.

La première de l'Opéra « Parsifal » sera placée sous la direction du chef d'orchestre allemand d'origine « israélite », Hermann Levi.

Les chanteurs ...

Amfortas : Theodor Reichmann.

Titirel : August Kindermann.

Gurnemanz : Emil Scaria.

« Parsifal » : Hermann Winkelmann.

Klingsor : Karl Hill.

Kundry : Amalie Materna.

16 représentations de l'Opéra, dirigées par Hermann Levi et Franz Fischer auront lieu entre juillet et août. (Le décor de la « salle du Graal » était basée sur l'intérieur de la cathédrale de Sienne que Wagner avait visitée en 1880.) C'est seulement à Bayreuth que « Parsifal » pourrait être présentée pensant qu'il s'agirait d'une source de revenus pour sa famille après sa mort. Richard Wagner sera enterré en 1883 dans le jardin de la Villa « Wahnfried » où sa femme Cosima ne le rejoindra que le 1er avril 1930 à l'âge de 92 ans, soit 47 ans après Richard et la même année que son fils Siegfried.

...

« Parsifal » est défini comme un « Festival scénique sacré » en 3 actes (« Bühnenweihfestspiel », selon l'appellation de Wagner) . Il se fonde sur l'épopée médiévale « Parzival » de Wolfram von Eschenbach et sur « Perceval » ou le Conte du Graal de Chrétien de Troyes.

Le 12 novembre 1880, Wagner a réalisé une exécution privée du Prélude pour Louis II de Bavière, au théâtre de la Cour à Munich. La création de l'œuvre entière a été faite au nouveau « Festspielhaus », le 26 juillet 1882, sous la direction du chef d'orchestre allemand d'origine juive, Hermann Levi. La mise-en-scène était confiée à Max Bruckner et Paul von Joukowsky qui ont pris les conseils de Wagner lui-même. Le décor de la « salle du Graal » était basée sur l'intérieur de la cathédrale de Sienne que Wagner avait visitée en 1880. Tandis que le « jardin magique de Klingsor » a été calqué sur celui du Palazzo Rufolo, à Ravello. Entre juillet et août 1882, 16 représentations de l'œuvre ont eu lieu à Bayreuth, dirigées par Levi et Franz Fischer. La production nécessitait un orchestre de 107 musiciens, un chœur de 135 personnes et 23 solistes (les parties principales avaient été doublées) . Lors de la dernière de ces représentations, Wagner a pris le relais d'Hermann Levi et a conduit la scène finale de l'Acte 3 à partir de l'interlude orchestral jusqu'à la fin.

Lors de la 1^{re} représentation de « Parsifal », il y a eu des problèmes avec la scène mobile au cours de la transition de la scène 1 à la scène 2 de l'Acte I. Cela a entraîné que l'interlude orchestral écrit par Wagner était terminé avant que « Parsifal » et Gurnemanz ne soient arrivés à la « salle du Graal ». Le compositeur Engelbert Humperdinck, qui assistait à la création, a ajouté quelques mesures supplémentaires à la musique pour combler cette lacune. Les années suivantes, le problème a été résolu et les ajouts d'Humperdinck n'ont pas été utilisés.

Pendant les 20 premières années de son existence, les seules représentations de « Parsifal » (à l'exception des 8 représentations privées pour Louis II de Bavière, à Munich, en 1884 et 1885) ont eu lieu dans le « Festspielhaus » de Bayreuth, le théâtre que Wagner avait conçu pour l'Opéra. Wagner avait 2 raisons de vouloir garder « Parsifal » exclusivement pour la scène de Bayreuth. Tout d'abord, il voulait éviter qu'il ne devienne un « simple divertissement » pour un simple public d'Opéra. C'est seulement à Bayreuth que sa dernière œuvre pourrait être présentée de la manière envisagée par lui : une tradition maintenue par son épouse, Cosima, longtemps après sa mort. Deuxièmement, il a pensé que l'Opéra serait une source de revenus pour sa famille après sa mort si Bayreuth avait le monopole sur ses représentations.

Les autorités de Bayreuth ont permis des exécutions sous forme de concert dans divers pays après la mort de Wagner (par exemple : à Londres, en 1884, à New York, en 1886, et à Amsterdam, en 1894) mais ils ont maintenu un embargo sur les spectacles en dehors de Bayreuth. Le 24 décembre 1903, après une décision de justice indiquant que les représentations aux États-Unis ne pourront être empêchées par Bayreuth, le New York Metropolitan Opera a mis en scène l'œuvre complète, en utilisant de nombreux chanteurs formés à Bayreuth. Cosima a interdit que les chanteurs ayant participé à la production de New York, puissent se produire à Bayreuth dans les représentations futures. Des spectacles qui n'étaient pas autorisés, ont cependant été montés à Amsterdam en 1905, 1906 et 1908.

Le monopole de Bayreuth sur « Parsifal » a pris fin le 1^{er} janvier 1914 et certains théâtres ont commencé leurs représentations à minuit, le 31 décembre 1913. La 1^{re} représentation autorisée a été mise-en-scène au Grand théâtre du Liceu à Barcelone : elle a commencé à 22h30, 1 heure et demi avant minuit le 31 décembre 1913, profitant de la différence d'une heure qui existait à l'époque entre Barcelone et Bayreuth. Les attentes autour de « Parsifal » étaient telles que l'Opéra a été présenté dans plus de 50 salles d'Opéra européennes entre le 1^{er} janvier et le 1^{er} août 1914. C'est le 4 janvier que l'œuvre a été donnée à Paris.

« Parsifal » est l'un des Opéras de Wagner régulièrement présentés au Festival de Bayreuth, à ce jour. Parmi les plus importantes productions d'après-guerre figure celle dirigée en 1951 par Wieland Wagner, petit-fils du compositeur. Lors du 1^{er} Festival de Bayreuth, après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, il a choisi une mise-en-scène totalement différente d'une représentation littérale de la salle du Graal ou de l'écrin des filles-fleurs. Au lieu de cela, des effets d'éclairage et le strict minimum de décor ont été utilisés pour accompagner la musique de Wagner. Cette production a été fortement influencée par les idées du scénographe suisse, Adolphe Appia. Les réactions à cette production ont été extrêmes : Ernest Newman, biographe de Wagner, l'a décrite comme « non seulement le meilleur « Parsifal » que j'ai

jamais vu et entendu, mais l'une des 3 ou 4 plus émouvantes expériences spirituelles de ma vie » . D'autres personnes étaient consternées de voir que les indications scéniques de Wagner avaient été bafouées. Le chef d'orchestre de la production de 1951, Hans Knappertsbusch, à qui on demandait comment il pouvait participer à une telle mascarade honteuse, a déclaré que pendant les répétitions, il avait imaginé que les décors n'étaient pas encore arrivés. Knappertsbusch a été particulièrement troublé par l'absence de la colombe qui apparaît sur la tête de « Parsifal » à la fin de l'Opéra, ce qui, selon lui, l'a incité à donner de meilleures interprétations. Pour rassurer son chef, Wieland a décidé de rétablir la colombe, descendue au bout d'une corde. Ce que Knappertsbusch n'avait pas compris, c'est que Wieland avait choisi la longueur de la chaîne assez longue pour le chef voit la colombe, mais pas assez pour que le public l'aperçoive. Wieland a continué à modifier et affiner sa production de « Parsifal » à Bayreuth jusqu'à sa mort en 1966 .

Amfortas : prêtre-roi du Graal (baryton-basse) .

Titrel : ancien roi, père d'Amfortas (basse) .

Gurnemanz : doyen des chevaliers du Graal (basse) .

Klingsor : magicien (baryton-basse) .

« Parsifal » : chevalier (ténor) .

Kundry : mezzo-soprano ou soprano.

2 chevaliers : ténor et basse.

Écuyers : sopranos et ténors.

Filles-fleurs de Klingsor : sopranos.

Place, terres et château de Montsalvat ; palais magique de Klingsor.

Synopsis : Herzeleide, de la maison royale des gardiens du Saint-Graal, a élevé son fils « Parsifal » dans une forêt isolée, pour l'empêcher de suivre la même voie que son père, Gamuret, mort prématurément après être parti en quête d'aventures héroïques. Ignorant du monde, « Parsifal » grandit comme un innocent sans guide. Un jour, ayant vu par hasard un groupe de chevaliers, son amour de l'aventure s'éveille et il implore sa mère de l'autoriser à s'en aller.

Acte I : Une forêt aux environs du château du Graal situé sur une montagne inaccessible, Gurnemanz attend, entouré de jeunes chevaliers, l'arrivée du Roi Amfortas.

« Amfortas, roi des Chevaliers du Graal et fils de Titrel, leur fondateur qui vit toujours, essaya un jour de tuer le magicien Klingsor à l'aide de la Sainte-Lance que gardent les Chevaliers de l'Ordre du Graal en même temps que le Saint-Graal lui-même. La Sainte-Lance est celle qui infligea la blessure au flanc du Christ sur la croix. Amfortas succomba au charme d'une femme très belle et, tandis qu'il était dans ses bras, Klingsor lui arracha la Sainte-Lance et la lui plongea dans le côté. Ainsi fut perdue la Sainte-Lance et Amfortas reçut-il une blessure qu'aucun remède ne peut guérir. »

Apparaît Kundry, la folle qui se moqua du Christ sur la croix ; sa présence bien qu'un peu hostile est toujours de bon augure. Accompagnée par les cris des chevaliers, elle se précipite vers Gurnemanz et lui fait don d'une fiole contenant un baume pour le roi que l'on porte au bain afin de tenter d'apaiser ses souffrances.

Gurnemanz leur apprend que Klingsor voulut, un jour, devenir membre des Chevaliers de l'ordre du Graal mais qu'il n'aurait pas pu rester fidèle au vœu de chasteté qu'il aurait dû prononcer. Une fois rejeté par l'Ordre, Klingsor construisit un jardin magique où il installa des femmes d'une grande beauté, toutes appliquées à la perte des Chevaliers du Graal. Amfortas était au nombre de ceux qui succombèrent et cette chute coûta à l'Ordre la perte de la Sainte-Lance. Désormais, un seul homme peut la reconquérir, « un innocent au cœur pur » .

Un jeune étranger apparaît et, devant tous, abat un cygne qui est un oiseau sacré pour les chevaliers. Un cri de réprobation s'élève. Le jeune homme est rapidement saisi, traîné devant Gurnemanz. Bien que le jeune étranger ne la connaisse pas, c'est Kundry qui raconte son histoire.

Alors que la scène se termine, Gurnemanz propose au nouveau venu, « Parsifal » , de l'accompagner au château du Graal à Monsalvat. Ils s'éloignent ensemble.

Scène 2 : Dans la halle du château, les chevaliers se réunissent. Amfortas est obligé, contre son désir, de faire l'exposition rituelle du Saint-Graal qui réveille en lui la douleur causée par la lance. « Parsifal » est abasourdi par ce spectacle. À la fin de la cérémonie, alors que tous s'en vont, Gurnemanz s'adresse à « Parsifal » qui avoue ne rien comprendre. Contrarié, Gurnemanz l'expulse alors brutalement du château.

Acte II : Du haut d'une tour de son château, Klingsor se tient à côté de ses instruments de magie. Il ordonne à Kundry de séduire « Parsifal » pour l'amener à sa perte. Mais il aperçoit les chevaliers ainsi que « Parsifal » , qui s'est joint aux assaillants, accourir vers les murs de la forteresse afin de libérer Kundry. Arrachant une épée à l'un de ses adversaires, « Parsifal » combat avec tant de courage que la garde de Klingsor s'enfuit.

Klingsor et le château magique s'enfoncent alors sous terre, laissant place à un merveilleux jardin peuplé de superbes filles belles comme des fleurs. Elles entourent « Parsifal » et se disputent ses faveurs. Kundry apparaît et le touche au cœur en lui annonçant la mort de sa mère. Elle lui donne un baiser passionné mais ce baiser lui révèle brusquement la vérité et il la repousse.

Cette attitude laisse Kundry face à un véritable dilemme, car bien que « Parsifal » soit l'homme qui doit lui apporter le salut, elle le voit encore comme sa proie légitime. Elle lui propose alors un compromis : que « Parsifal » lui donne un baiser seulement et le péché qui l'a poursuivie sans cesse depuis la mort du Christ (elle avait ri de ses tourments) sera lavé. Le jeune homme refuse, car ce geste les condamnerait tous 2 à la damnation éternelle.

À la fin, désespérée, Kundry appelle Klingsor à l'aide. Le magicien apparaît, brandissant la Sainte-Lance. Il la jette brusquement, mais l'arme s'arrête miraculeusement dans les airs, à la portée de « Parsifal ». Celui-ci s'en empare et fait le signe de croix. En un instant, le château de Klingsor tombe en ruines et le jardin merveilleux se transforme en désert aride.

Acte III : Un bois dans la gloire du printemps, des fleurs, un puits et la hutte d'un ermite.

« Parsifal », après avoir erré pendant des années, a appris la sagesse et se dirige une fois de plus vers le château du Graal. Gurnemanz vit dans le bois, au pied du château. Ayant trouvé Kundry, il vient de l'éveiller d'un long sommeil magique et la prend à son service. Gurnemanz, comme les autres chevaliers, est devenu vieux, car Amfortas n'a pas présenté le Graal, qui redonne la jeunesse, depuis le départ de « Parsifal » .

Quand il voit la Lance Sacrée dans les mains de « Parsifal », il reconnaît avec enthousiasme l'« innocent au cœur pur ». C'est le Vendredi Saint, Kundry lave les pieds de « Parsifal » pour qu'il puisse entrer dans la forteresse propre et pur tandis que Gurnemanz lui baigne les cheveux. « Parsifal » baptise Kundry comme chrétienne. Tous 3 entrent dans le château comme à l'Acte I.

Scène 2 : Les chevaliers se sont rassemblés pour enterrer Tituel et demander à Amfortas de pratiquer la cérémonie de présentation du Graal. Ce dernier refuse et demande qu'on l'achève. Mais « Parsifal », entrant, saisit la Sainte-Lance et guérit la blessure en l'effleurant de la pointe de la Sainte-Lance. Les chevaliers acclament « Parsifal » qui s'agenouille, absorbé dans une prière. La lumière resplendit, le Graal s'embrase et une colombe descend de la coupole au-dessus de « Parsifal ». Kundry, repentante, tombe à terre et meurt.

WAB 82

3 février 1882 : WAB 82 - « Sängerbund » (l'Association des chanteurs) , cantate profane (79 mesures) en do majeur pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) . Composée à Vienne. Dédiée à son élève et biographe personnel, August Göllerich. 2 textes disponibles : « Die Sängerfeste unsrer Städte » (les festivals de chant de nos villes) de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) et « Nichts Schön'eres auf der ganzen Erde » (il n'a rien de plus beau dans tout l'Erde) du poète Karl Kerschbaum, un ami de Bruckner ; président du Liedertafel (orphéon) « Frohsinn » de Linz (en plus d'être le comptable et l'archiviste de la ville) . Création par le Liedertafel (orphéon) de Wels, le 10 juin 1883, jour de l'anniversaire du chœur d'hommes.

« Sängerbund » s'est avérée une pièce de choix lors des concerts d'œuvres chorales du village de Steyr.

In addition to its German-nationalist overtones, a quotation from Johann Wenzel Kalliwoda's then well-known «

Deutsches Lied » doubtless made its own contribution to its success :

« Their 1st piece, “ Sängerbund ”, by Bruckner, sounded like their artistic and political credo and powerful chords marked their oath of loyalty to the German people in all phases of its history. » , as the report on the foundation concert of the « Steyrer Liedertafel » in the « Alpen-Bote » newspaper of 26 July 1891 puts it.

1re édition : UE 3296, Viktor Keldorfer, Universal-Edition, Vienne (1911) .

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXIII/2, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Angela Pachovsky - Anton Reinthaler, Vienne (2001) ; « Weltliche Chorwerke » , pages 140-144.

(Texte : Heinrich von der Mattig)

Die Sängerbunde unserer Städte
Erwecken bildend um die Wette
Den Sinn für Tonkunst und Gesang,
Den Sinn für Tonkunst und Gesang.

Es drängt hinaus von Kreis zu Kreise
Und heut ertönt in Festes Weise
Das deutsche Lied mit hellem Klang.

Wir halten fest und treu am Bunde,
Den an der Traun in dieser Stunde,
Erneuern wir mit Herz und Hand.

In Lied und Tat frei ohne Zagen,
So werden wir das Höchste wagen
Für Freiheit und fürs Vaterland.

(Texte : Karl Kerschbaum)

Nichts Schönres auf der ganzen Erde
Als froher Sang am Heimatherde
Lobpreisend deutsche Sitt' und Treu.

Es drängt hinaus von Kreis zu Kreise
Und es ertönt in Festes Weise
Das deutsche Lied so frisch und frei.

Ob unsre Brust erbebt vom Leide,
Ob unsern Sinn verklärt die Freude,
Wir halten fest am deutschen Liederband,

Und braust auch Sturmwind durch die Lande,
Das Lied tönt bis zum Grabesrande
Für Freiheit und fürs Vaterland.

WAB 7

5 février 1882 : WAB 7 - « Ave Maria » n° 3, hymne « Marial » (motet d'offertoire) en fa majeur pour voix d'alto et piano (harmonium ou orgue) . La voix d'alto est quelquefois remplacée par une voix de soprano, de baryton ou de basse. Cette pièce de circonstance sera dédiée à « Fräulein Luise Hochleitner », la belle-sœur de son élève d'origine Bohémienne, le compositeur Camillo (Kamillo) Andreas Horn (1860-1941) . Apparemment, la juvénile « mademoiselle Louise » avait une voix de contralto exceptionnelle. Le Maître sera charmé par son registre étendu et son énergie, lors de sa rencontre à Wels, en septembre 1871, durant quelques jours de vacances. Création à Stuttgart, à l'occasion du Festival Bruckner (« Brucknerfest ») de 1921.

Neue Musikzeitung, Stuttgart-Leipzig-Vienna, 23 (1902) , supplément.

6705, E. F. Schmid, Anton Böhm & Sohn, Augsburg / Vienne, production indépendante (1927) .

S 10894, Robert Lienau, Berlin.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , pages 118-121.

...

WAB 7 (1882) : « Ave Maria » No. 3 ; Marian hymn in F major for alto (or mezzo) and piano (harmonium or organ) .

In all, Anton Bruckner produced 3 known settings of the « Ave Maria », each in a different medium. Interestingly, all are in the key of F, a key often associated with serenity. His last setting came in 1882 when he was, at 58, hitting his creative stride as he worked on his 7th Symphony. That year saw a successful Vienna performance of the F minor Mass. At the same, a young contralto with a beautiful voice, « Fräulein Luise Hochleitner », caught Bruckner's ear and, possibly, his heart as well. His last setting of the « Hail Mary », then, was for contralto solo with organ accompaniment. It is not known whether the middle-aged organist-composer and the young vocalist rehearsed or performed this work together.

There are many striking and original features in this brief but beautiful work. It reflects the expanding harmonic world that the composer was forging his way into at the time, yet, some passages are quite unlike anything else in Bruckner's output. An extraordinary modulating crescendo on the word « Jesus » (at « Blessed is the Fruit of Thy womb ... ») uses the familiar Brucknerian device of an ascending chorale-like melody, yet is harmonically different from any of his other similar passages. Given the natural 2 part form of the prayer, the « Sancta Maria » begins like the opening « Ave » but shifts the tonal plane to the most remote of keys, building to another crescendo. (This crescendo uses, interestingly, a phrase almost identical to one in the hymn « O Sanctissima » , on the same words, « ora pro nobis » . Could Bruckner have been taken by the old hymn and tried to emulate it ?) . The music emerges from the chromatic thicket to close in the tonic. A long-arching melisma on « Amen » against a final crescendo and decrescendo and a series of long-held pianissimo chords brings the piece to a serene close.

...

The Offertory Motet, « Ave Maria » , dates from February, 1882, while Bruckner was working on his Symphony No. 7. It is Bruckner's 3rd setting of this text, all 3 of which are in F major. Written for solo low voice and organ (or harmonium) , this was an occasional piece for a young lady, one « Fräulein Luise Hochleitner » . Apparently, she had a beautiful contralto voice of exceptional range and had impressed the composer with her youthful charm. The work is notable for its main-theme, a glorious, octave-spanning melody that captures a sublimity of mood similar to that of the opening of the 7th Symphony. That this late « Ave Maria » is the only mature specimen of « geistliche Lieder » from Bruckner's pen is cause enough to regret his lack of interest in song-writing. As a crafter of melodies and sound-painter of words, Bruckner's talent was of the highest order ; yet, with few exceptions his temperament lay with absolute music.

...

When staying in Wels, during the summer of 1881, Anton Bruckner met Luise Hochleitner, a singer with a beautiful alto voice. Bruckner promised to dedicate to her an « Ave Maria » . The work, which was composed on 5 February 1882 (almost 20 years after his more famous Motet) is for alto (or baritone) solo-voice and keyboard (organ, piano or harmonium) .

It was published in 1902, as an appendix to No. 13 of the « Neue Musikzeitung, Stuttgart » . The 1st public performance occurred during a concert of the « Wiener Akademischer Wagner-Verein » , on 5 February 1903, by Gisella Seehofer, who then also premiered Bruckner's « Amaranths Waldlieder » (WAB 58) .

The 81 bars, demanding work, scored in F major, requires a singer with a 2 octave broad tessitura.

Alike the 2 earlier settings of the « Ave Maria » , the name « Jesus » is sung thrice (bars 23-31) . It is followed by an instrumental interlude (bars 32-38) and goes then on with the 2nd part (« Sancta Maria ») , which quotes the 20 year earlier setting. Thereafter (bars 53-58) , « Nunc et in hora mortis nostrae » is sung pianissimo in unison. After a repeat of « Sancta Maria » , it is ending by a 2 octave descending arpeggio on « Amen » (from F5 to F3) and a short instrumental postlude (bars 76-81) .

...

28 février 1882 : Richard Heinrich Stein is born in Halle, Germany.

21 mars 1882 : In a gala concert of the « Steyrer Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Society of the Friends of Music of Steyr) , which traditionally enlisted the cooperation of all other musical Societies, the piece « Germanenzug » (WAB 70) by Anton Bruckner, a dramatic male-voice chorus supported by solo quartet and brass ensemble, had its 1st performance as part of a varied programme. As it was obvious that the musicians were not up to the technical demands of the chorus, the work met with a very mixed reception.

23 mars 1882 : The 23 year old Hans Rott attempts to hang himself (unsuccessfully) , in the Lower-Austrian State Insane Asylum.

24 mars 1882 : 1st common concert of the Schalk brothers. Josef Schalk gives the 1st (?) performance of his arrangement of the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony at a « Wiener Akademische Wagner-Verein » concert, in the composer's presence. One reviewer praised both Schalk for his arrangement and Bruckner for the vitality of his composition, which was by no means « only a series of phrases strung together » .

...

The 70 year old Franz Liszt completes his 13th and last Symphonic poem, « Von der Wiege bis zum Grabe » (From the Cradle to the Grave) , S. 107 / 647.

1er avril 1882 : Gustav Mahler finishes his conducting job in Laibach and leaves, spending time over the summer around his 22nd birthday with his family in Iglau, and returns to Vienna in the fall, working on his fairy-tale Opera « Růbezal » , which will remain unfinished, and which provides material later incorporated into his Symphonic poem (the work we know today as his 1st Symphony) . Mahler also composes 4 Songs which will be published in 1892 :

« Frühlingmorgen » (Spring Morning) , on text by Richard Leander.

« Erinnerung » (Memory) , on text by Richard Leander.

« Serenade aus Don Juan » , on text by Tirso de Molina.

« Phantasie aus Don Juan » , on text by Tirso de Molina.

At some point, Mahler plays Hans Rott's Symphony in E major on the piano to Rott's friends.

30 avril 1882 : Reprise de la Messe en fa d'Anton Bruckner à la « Hofkapelle » de Vienne.

25 juin 1882 : Joachim Raff dies of a heart attack at the age of 60.

25-year-old Hirschfeld becomes lecturer at Vienna Conservatory.

The 8 year old Arnold Schœnberg begins taking violin lessons.

The 7 year old Fritz Kreisler becomes the youngest student ever admitted to the Vienna Conservatory. He studies violin with Josef Hellmesberger, Junior ; and theory with Anton Bruckner.

The 6 year old Bruno Schlesinger starts school and also begins piano lessons.

The concerts of Charles Lamoureux in Paris begin the « Wagner craze » , there.

26 juillet 1882 : Anton Bruckner (58 ans) se rend à Bayreuth afin d'assister à la création de l'Opéra « Parsifal » (« Bühnenweihfestspiel ») au « Festspielhaus » . Le compositeur Engelbert Humperdinck (37 ans) a préparé, pour l'événement, le chœur de garçons. C'est là que le Maître de Saint-Florian rencontrera Richard Wagner (69 ans) pour la dernière fois.

Le jour de son arrivée à la gare de Bayreuth, à l'occasion de la grande première de l'œuvre présentée lors du second Festival qui se mit en branle le 26 juillet, un voleur qui rôdait autour de Bruckner s'empara d'une somme de 300 Florins (« Gulden ») qu'il avait enfouie dans son gros manteau.

30 juillet 1882 : Bruckner assiste à la 3e représentation de « Parsifal » à Bayreuth.

Durant cette même période, Bruckner poursuit son travail sur la 7e Symphonie et révisé sa Messe en mi mineur (WAB 27) .

WAB 94/2

1882 : WAB 94/2 - « Volkslied » , chant populaire (67 mesures) en do majeur pour voix soliste et piano. Composé à Vienne dans le cadre d'une compétition afin de choisir un nouvel hymne national facile à chanter (« für eines sangbares Nationallied ») . Sur le texte allemand en 6 versets « Anheben laßt und all' zusamm' ein Lied von starkem Klange » (levons-nous et entonnons très fort ce chant) de Josef Winter (1857-1916) . La 2e version.

Folk-song composed for a competition for a singable National hymn (« für eines sangbares Nationallied ») :

Version I : for voice and piano in D major (33 bars) , WAB 94, Volume XXIII/1, No. 6.

Version 2 : for male choir a cappella in C major (33 or 67 bars) , WAB 94, Volume XXIII/2, No. 32. Text (originally 6 stanzas) :

In Renate Grasberger's work catalogue (1977) , the work is dated at « around 1861 » and this information was taken from August Göllerich. However, in reality, this 6 stanza song was only written in 1882 ! For, on 16 October 1881, the « Deutsche Zeitung » in Vienna had announced a competition « to obtain a text for a singable anthem which would be suitable to strengthen the Germans of Austria in the defence of their national customs and traditions » . Then, no fewer than 1,570 poems were submitted and the 6 stanza « Lied der Deutschen in Österreich » by Josef Winter was awarded the 1st prize. Then, on 1 January 1882, a musical competition was announced for an « anthem for the German nation in Austria » for voice and piano as well as for male choir. Bruckner's « Volkslied » was among the 1,320 works submitted, but none of the compositions was awarded a prize. The 1st edition was published in Volume III/2 of the Göllerich / Auer biography, in 1930 (fac-simile on pages 191-192) . The instructions in both versions : powerful, solemn, stressed.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXIII/1, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Angela Pachovsky, Vienne (1997) , pages 28-29.

Anheben laßt uns allzusamm'
Ein Lied von starkem Klange,
In Österreich den deutschen Stamm
Laßt preisen uns mit Sange.
Die auf die Ostmark einst gestellt,
Dem Feind den Weg zu weisen,
Sie stehen heute noch im Feld
Und halten blank ihr Eisen.

Und gilt's auch nicht, den Hunnenschwall
Mit Schild und Schwert zu stauen,
Aus deutschen Leibern einen Wall
Dem Türkenvolk zu bauen ;
Uns blieb so mancher grimme Gast
Noch in den Sand zu fegen,
Im Ostreich ward uns nimmer Rast,
Hand in den Schoß zu legen.

Mit Trommeln nicht und Feldgeschrei
Wird heut' zur Schlacht geschritten,
Der Feind schleicht leise sich herbei,
Er wohnt in unsrer Mitten
Und möcht' uns drängen gar zu gern

Zur schimpflichsten der Taten :
das Deutschtum, unsres Wesens Kern,
Das sollen wir verraten.

Wir aber halten gute Wacht
Und werden nicht erschlaffen.
Wie einst in Not und Sturm und Schlacht,
So schallt's auch heute : Waffen !
Und wo der kühne Ruf erklingt,
Schart er die Kampfgenossen,
Das Blut, das unsere Scholle düngt,
Ist nicht umsonst geflossen.

Ob wir im welschen Gau zufernst,
Ob hoch in Böhmen hausen,
Ob Siebenbürgens Eichen ernst
Um unsre Söhne brausen,
Uns einet Sitte, Ehr' und Zucht,
Die Sprache hold und süße,
Und mahnend trägt durch Tal und Bucht
Die Donau Schwarzwalds Grüße.

So laßt uns halten fürderhin
An deutscher Sprach' und Treue, Dem deutschen Stamme, deutschem Sinn
Gelobt euch an aufs neue.
Der Osten kam in unsre Hut,
Darnach tun wir uns schreiben,
Doch deutsch sind wir in Mark und Blut
Und wollen Deutsche bleiben.

13 octobre 1882 : Anton Bruckner entend intégralement sa 6e Symphonie lors d'une répétition générale du Philharmonique de Vienne au « Musikverein » . (Ce sera la seule et unique fois dans sa vie.) L'atmosphère était amicale et empreinte de reconnaissance comme en témoigne une lettre de Bruckner à son proche ami et copiste de Steyr, Leopold Hofmeyer :

« Après avoir rejeté toutes les autres, le Philharmonique a maintenant accepté ma 6e Symphonie. Lorsque je me suis présenté au chef d'orchestre (soit le directeur de l'Opéra de la Cour) , il m'a confié qu'il comptait parmi mes plus sincères et proches admirateurs. Le Philharmonique y a trouvé une telle satisfaction en la jouant qu'ils m'ont offert une " douche " d'applaudissements suite à l'exécution. »

Parmi les copistes de Bruckner, citons : Karl (Borromäus) Aigner de Saint-Florian (qui fut l'un de ses élèves) ; un certain Carda, de Vienne ; Viktor Christ (qui fut l'un de ses élèves) ; Franz Hlawaczek de Vienne (qui a travaillé à plusieurs reprises pour Franz Schubert et son frère, Ferdinand) ; Leopold Hofmeyer (un ami proche de Steyr et un de ses copistes les plus fiables) ; Johann (Giovanni) Noll (copiste à la « Hofkapelle » de Vienne) ; Karl Paur ; Franz Schimatschek (1812-1877) (altiste à l'Orchestre du Théâtre de Linz ; ami et copiste préféré du Maître) ; et Karl Tenschert qui a travaillé chez Franz Hlawaczek, à Vienne.

AB 82 : 1883

À partir de 1883 : Le monastère de Kremsmünster accorde à Anton Bruckner le statut d' « invité spécial » .

L'appartement de Bruckner au « Wohnhaus »

L'auteur Auguste Stradal, à travers à son recueil biographique « Erinnerungen » (Souvenirs sur Anton Bruckner) , nous a laissé une description détaillée de l'appartement où vivait le compositeur :

« Au début de janvier 1883, des élèves du Maître décident de monter au 4^e étage de l'immeuble résidentiel du " Wohnhaus " situé au numéro 7, " Heßgasse ", à l'angle de " Schottenring " (numéro 5) , pour aller le visiter. On y retrouvait 2 chambres. Au milieu de la Ire, on pouvait admirer un vieux Bösendorfer de concert : les touches blanches se distinguaient à peine des touches noires à cause de la poussière accumulée et des résidus de tabac à priser. Contre un mur : un harmonium à 2 claviers et 1 pédalier ; contre l'autre, un lit et un grand crucifix accroché au-dessus ; en face de la fenêtre, une petite table réservée pour l'écriture. (Des années plus tard, cette dernière sera transférée de l'autre côté de la porte dans un espace restreint utilisé à la fois pour faire la lessive et servir les repas.) La salle de séjour n'était utilisé que pour les besoins quotidiens. L'ameublement modeste avait des allures de renoncement. »

« Des feuilles de musique étaient empilées sur le piano. On pouvait distinguer à travers ce désordre des partitions de Bach, de Beethoven, de Schubert et de Wagner. Bruckner ne possédait que 2 livres de chevet, à l'époque : la Bible de même qu'une biographie de Napoléon Bonaparte. Le Maître a étudié le Livre saint avec l'énergie d'un théologien et a admiré le Napoléon réformateur, tout comme l'a fait avant lui, Beethoven. »

« La seconde chambre n'était pas meublée, donc inutilisée. Dans un coin, on pouvait apercevoir un tas de lettres personnelles et de contre-rendus rédigés par les critiques. Les manuscrits de ses Symphonies et de ses Messes étaient mélangés avec des articles de journaux et des lettres des chefs Hermann Levi, Arthur Nikisch et Hans Richter, entre autres. Anton Bruckner m'a demandé de lui donner un coup de main afin de retrouver son Quintette à cordes dans cette masse de papiers. Lors de mes recherches, j'ai découvert le manuscrit de la seule composition pour piano du Maître. Son titre : « Erinnerung » (Souvenir) . Malheureusement, il n'arrivait pas se rappeler où il l'avait composé. »

(Le « Souvenir » pour piano sera trouvé dans ses papiers après la mort de Bruckner.)

Dans la pièce de travail de Bruckner, toute peinte en bleu, se trouvait son vieux piano à queue « Bösendorfer » de même que son harmonium « Matthäus Mauracher » de Salzburg : 2 legs testamentaires de l'administrateur du monastère de Saint-Florian, Franz Sailer (le parrain de son frère Ignaz) ; en plus d'une petite table et quelques chaises.

Il semble que Sailer avait acquis le piano lors d'une exposition tenue dans une maison de campagne à Linz, en 1848 (l'année de son décès) .

Le plancher et la plupart du mobilier étaient jonchées de feuilles de musique. Accrochées au mur, on retrouvait une grande photo et une peinture à l'huile de lui-même. Une porte conduisait à sa chambre à coucher dont les murs étaient recouverts de photos de ses Maîtres bien-aimés.

Anton Bruckner héritera de son « Bösendorfer » en plus de (de même qu'une petite table et quelques chaises)

Anton Bruckner était toujours heureux de montrer un buste de lui-même qu'il possédait. On dit qu'il plaçait sa main, avec un sourire mélancolique, sur le front de la statue lui en disant : « Bon garçon. » . Contre le mur se trouvait un lit en laiton Anglais gracieuseté de ses élèves ; il l'avait baptisé : « Mon seul luxe. » .

Lors de ses nombreuses visites, Friedrich Klose (qui devint l'élève d'Anton Bruckner en 1886) évoquera 4 livres que son Maître a parcourus pendant des années. Le 1er est une histoire sur la guerre au Mexique. Le 2e est le récit d'une expédition polaire dans la région arctique. Le 3e est une petite compilation illustrée des compositeurs Franz-Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart et Ludwig van Beethoven. Et finalement, le 4e est un traité intitulé « La miraculeuse Marie de Lowdes » . Klose nous donne aussi une description similaire de la maison du compositeur. Il nous rapporte que les vêtements ainsi que la musique jonchaient littéralement le piano. Lorsqu'il avait l'habitude de se rendre chez Bruckner durant la nuit, sa chambre n'était éclairée que par 2 longs cierges. La raison de cette pratique stricte découlait de sa phobie du feu depuis la triste tragédie du Théâtre du « Ring » qui eut lieu le 8 décembre 1881, en face de chez lui.

D'autres témoins oculaires ont mentionné la présence d'une anti-chambre avec baignoire et d'un buste de Bruckner. Bruckner lui caressait parfois le dessus de la tête avec sa main, en disant : « Gentil vieux garçon. » . Tous s'accordent à dire que sa chambre était dans un désordre épouvantable. Son ancien professeur d'orchestration, Otto Kitzler, a lui-même constaté ce fouillis. Bruckner arrivait au moins à exprimer ce petit quelque chose du « Bohême » en lui.

La personnalité de Bruckner

À cette époque, Vienne offrait de nombreuses activités culturelles. Mais Bruckner n'a jamais su en profiter, par simple manque d'intérêt. Un jour, il demandera à son ami Friedrich Klose : « Pourquoi fréquentez-vous le Burgtheater ? Voulez-vous devenir un poète ? » . Il semble que le Maître a assisté à une seule de ses représentations : à l'affiche, un drame de William Shakespeare. Il s'ennuiera à mourir. Il n'y est jamais retourné.

Par contre, Bruckner assistera souvent aux soirées à l'Opéra de Vienne. On le verra également dans la section des places « debout » lors des concerts Symphoniques alors que son opposant, Johannes Brahms, avait sa place réservée dans une loge luxueuse. Plusieurs commentateurs de la scène artistique évoqueront la jalousie du compositeur sans moyen. Mais, au fond, Bruckner était plutôt indifférent à l'idée de ne pas faire partie de l'élite bourgeoise de Vienne.

Le dernier médecin personnel de Bruckner, le docteur Richard Heller, a lui aussi laissé un témoignage prenant de son caractère, rapporté dans le recueil biographique de Karl Kobald, « In Memoriam Anton Bruckner » (1924) .

« Celui qui a vu Bruckner dans sa vie ne pourra jamais oublier l'impression produite par cette tête si caractéristique qui rappelle un buste provenant de la période du Cinquecento (Renaissance italienne du XVIe siècle) combinée avec ce physique presque comique. La ressemblance frappante entre son profil et celle d'un Empereur Romain fut renforcée par ce refus total de porter la barbe, et par cet héritage villageois de couper sa chevelure blanche presque au ras du crâne. Le haut de son corps était assez court et son surpoids le faisait apparaître trappu. »

« Ses pieds étaient chaussés par de larges bottines (presque rectangulaires) faites en peau de phoque. Obsessif de nature, Bruckner en possédait environ une trentaine de paires. Il portait de très larges pantalons fabriqués en forme de sac. Ses vestes étaient d'une étendue semblable et chacune possédait son propre nom, de sorte que sa fidèle servante devait avoir une mémoire assez prodigieuse pour rapporter la bonne au compositeur. L'une d'elle, typiquement autrichienne, était surnommée « Shaggy » parce qu'elle était fabriquée d'un matériau assez épais, résistant à l'eau, appelé « Loden » (fabriqué à partir de laine de mouton, sans enlever la lanoline) . Un autre s'appelait « les Cordons » parce qu'elle était fabriquée de laine peignée. Sans oublier la « Dandy » , la « Bobby » , la « Grasse » ... et ainsi de suite. »

Le « Loden » est un tissu de laine imperméable typique du Tyrol, du sud de l'Allemagne et de la province de Bolzano. Étoffe souple, douce, chaude et résistante, à l'aspect feutré et velu, elle sert principalement à la confection de manteaux ainsi que de capes, jupes et pantalons. Dans le val Pusteria, à Vandoies, se trouve un musée qui permet de connaître toute l'histoire du « Loden » et les différentes étapes de fabrication artisanale d'un vêtement : de la tonte des moutons jusqu'à la coupe du tissu.

Ce tissu appartient à l'histoire des Alpes et aux bergers tyroliens. Depuis le Moyen-âge, l'étoffe de « Loden » est produite par les paysans des Dolomites et du Tyrol : sa couleur est, alors, grisâtre comme la laine brute de leurs moutons. À l'origine de couleur grise, le manteau en « Loden » deviendra successivement blanc, rouge, noire et, enfin, vert sombre (la teinte la plus populaire) .

Le « Loden » devient un tissu à la mode lorsque la filature Mössmer, fondée en 1892 (originaire de Campo Tures) , confectionne un manteau de couleur blanche pour l'Empereur François-Joseph. L'ajout de laine Mérinos au manteau rustique en « Loden » produira une étoffe élégante pour habits de chasse et d'équitation prisée de la noblesse Austro-Hongroise.

« Les chapeaux de Bruckner ont aussi hérité de noms. Son « Hüadal » noir était un petit chapeau mou à larges rebords qu'il portait la plupart du temps. Son chapeau du dimanche s'appelait tout simplement « le Chapeau » . Son

« Haut de forme » flexible ne sera porté que lors des grandes cérémonies ; mais il avait le défaut de dater de la préhistoire. Le principe de base de sa garde-robe : être spacieuse et confortable malgré l'inconvénient d'une longueur quasi grotesque. Le mode de vie était aussi simple que l'homme. Ceux qui ont eu l'occasion de voir Bruckner siphoner son bol de soupe ont sûrement cru se trouver en face d'un vieux paysan en tenue honorable plutôt que devant un grand compositeur. »

...

Stories abound regarding Bruckner's unsophisticated ways and rather bizarre appearance and how those who wanted to see and be seen received them. He was clean-shaven and he could never find a barber who could crop his white hair short enough at a time when that was far from fashionable ; compare this with Johannes Brahms's long hair and bushy beard. Bruckner wore curious looking clothes, which certainly made no concession to fashion. Bruckner's physician, Doctor Richard Heller, has left a vivid description of his character as reported in Karl Kobald's « In Memoriam Anton Bruckner » (1924) :

« No one who saw Bruckner could ever forget the impression made by that characteristic head, reminiscent of a cinquecento bust, in combination with his almost comical physique. The resemblance between that striking profile and the head of a Roman Emperor was strengthened by his constant refusal to wear a beard, and, by his habit of cropping his thick, white hair almost to the skull. His body was small and thick-set. His feet were shod in broad, almost rectangular sealskin ankle boots, of which he owned about 30 pairs. Above these, he wore a pair of immensely wide, bag-like trousers. His jackets were of a similar expanse and each one had its own name, so that his faithful house-keeper needed a good memory if she was always to bring the right one. One of them was called " Shaggy " because it was made of thick Loden material ; another was " the Cords " since it was made of worsted ; a 3rd was " the Dandy ", or " the Bobby ", or " Fatty " and so on. Bruckner's hats were also given names. The " Hüadal " (a little hat) was the one he usually wore, a black, broad-brimmed slouch-hat ; his Sunday hat was simply " The Hat " ; while " The Top Hat " was a collapsible Opera hat of prehistoric design, which he put on only for very special ceremonious occasions. The basic principle of his wardrobe was spacious and comfortable - which he carried to grotesque lengths. His way of living was as simple as he himself was, and anyone who saw the Master slurping-up his soup from the bowl would have thought that he was in the company of a farm-hand grown old in honourable service rather than a great composer. »

...

Le style verbal de Bruckner était habituellement simple et direct. Mais lorsqu'il s'adressait à des personnes qui détenaient un poste influent, son humilité ampoulée ne convenait pas avec son statut de grand musicien. On y retrouvait une abondance de « Votre Honneur », de « Votre Majesté », et d'autres titres honorifiques du même genre. Il avait même réussi à embarrasser le grand Richard Wagner lorsqu'il lui avoua à la première de l'Opéra « Parsifal », en juillet 1882, lors du second Festival de Bayreuth : « Ah Maître, je vous adore ! ». Ses excès maladifs de dévotion étaient injustifiés mais fort compréhensibles : l'enfant de chœur Anton Bruckner, âgé de 12 ans, apprendra tôt à baiser les mains des chanoines de Saint-Florian durant sa période de formation au monastère. Le protocole officiel autrichien qui sévissait au sein de l'Église et de la Monarchie laisseront des traces indélébiles chez cet être insécure. Il interpellera Johannes Brahms avec un « Monsieur, le Président » lors de sa rencontre historique au restaurant du « Hérisson Rouge », à l'automne de 1880. Bruckner lui payera aussi de la bière (un prélude à la soirée bien arrosée à « Wahnfried » aux côtés de Richard Wagner, en septembre 1883) .

Ce trait naïf de Bruckner l'amènera aussi à poser des gestes qui se situent à l'autre extrême du balancier. Lors d'une réception, il aura le privilège d'être présenté à une princesse, membre de la famille Impériale allemande. Il secouera vigoureusement sa main en disant :

« Je suis ravi de faire votre connaissance. J'ai entendu de bien belles choses à votre sujet. » . On peut facilement penser que ce geste a ajouté du piment à l'ambiance déjà festive de la soirée.

Bruckner pouvait être à l'occasion être assez cru. Lorsqu'un éditeur lui demandera pourquoi ses compositions n'étaient pas plus populaire, il répondra du tac au tac : « Ce fut la même chose avec Beethoven. Ces ' bœufs ' ne le comprirent pas non plus. » .

Malgré l'inconsistance de son discours public, Anton Bruckner réussira quand même à bien se faire comprendre par son entourage. Le chef d'orchestre Bruno Walter déclarera à son sujet :

« J'explique ce pouvoir d'attraction par l'éclat et l'éminence de son âme pieuse et la splendeur de son génie musical qui parvenaient à transcender une ignorance sans prétention. Même si Bruckner pouvait être parfois perçu comme un personnage sans intérêt, son humanité demeurait édifiante. »

10 janvier 1883 : Gustav Mahler is summoned urgently to a Theater post in Olmütz, in the Austrian province of Moravia (now, in the Czech Republic) , and conducts there until March 18.

10 février 1883 : Création partielle (dans le cadre d'un événement organisé par la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne) de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner (les 1er et 3e mouvements) dans un arrangement pour 2 pianos donné par les solistes Josef Schalk et Franz Zottmann. Il s'agit de leur 1er récital conjoint.

Franz Zottmann

Le pianiste et pédagogue Franz Zottmann est né le 23 mars 1858 à Hainburg, en Haute-Autriche ; et est mort le 24 mai 1909 à Vienne. Il étudie le piano et la théorie musicale, jusqu'en 1879, au Conservatoire de la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Gesellschaft Der Musikfreunde ») auprès des professeurs H. Schmitt, Robert Fuchs et Franz Krenn. De 1882 à 1909, il est rattaché à ce même Conservatoire comme interprète virtuose et autodidacte où il dirige notamment une classe de formation en piano.

...

Dimanche 11 et mardi 13 février 1883 : Création en présence du compositeur des 2^e et 3^e mouvements de la 6^e Symphonie données en public lors d'une lecture à vue par Philharmonique de Vienne sous la direction du chef intérimaire Wilhelm Jahn (le prédécesseur de Gustav Mahler à la « Hofoper ») . On joua ainsi de prudence face aux critiques (spécialement, Eduard Hanslick) n'offrant que ces 2 mouvements intermédiaires considérés comme moins risqués.

The audience, which includes Johannes Brahms (aged 49) , gives the work a great ovation. The press is mixed.

« Ce remarquable concert s'est tenu tôt un dimanche. Bruckner, accompagné de son élève Lamberg, entrèrent dans la salle qui, bien évidemment, était vide à 9 heures du matin. Le compositeur portait des chaussures qui ne correspondaient pas, et, ce qui était plus surprenant, l'une d'elles avait une pointe en cuir verni. L'élève s'est abstenu de rapporter cette incongruité malencontreuse à son Maître nerveux. Avant la prestation, alors qu'ils étaient attablés à un restaurant situé à proximité, Lamberg avait reçu ses consignes : le plus important était d'espionner le redoutable critique Eduard Hanslick. » .

Il y avait aussi d'autres œuvres au programme comme le rapporte le biographe de Bruckner, August Göllerich :

« Les 2 mouvements, Adagio et Scherzo, étaient précédés de l'Ouverture Leonore n° 2 de Beethoven ; suivis d'un Concerto pour violoncelle de Karl Anton Florian Eckert et de la 5^e Symphonie en ut mineur de Ludwig Spohr. »

Parmi l'auditoire, Johannes Brahms enthousiasmé par ce qu'il venait d'entendre. Selon un étudiant de Bruckner, du nom de Lamberg, Eduard Hanslick était là « glacial et immobile comme un Sphinx » .

He wrote :

« It has become ever harder for me personally to achieve a proper relationship with these peculiar compositions in which clever, original, and even inspired moments alternate frequently without recognizable connection with barely understandable platitudes, empty and dull patches, stretched-out over such unsparing length as to threaten to run players as well as listeners out of breath. »

Mardi 13 février 1883 : Max Kalbeck, a friend of both Johannes Brahms and Eduard Hanslick, wrote in the « Wiener Allgemeine Zeitung » :

« The puzzles that Bruckner presents to us are tim. The tonal ghosts are altogether too mad : it is as though a pack of wolves met on Walpurgis Night, such stamping and roaring, raging and screaming goes wildly on. If the future can relish such a chaotic piece of music, with sounds echoing from a hundred cliffs, we wish that future to be far away from us. »

Mardi, 13 février 1883 : Mort de Richard Wagner d'une crise cardiaque, à Venise.

Cosima Liszt von Bülow Wagner makes the last entry in her diary ...

15h30 : Wilhelm Richard Wagner dies in the Palazzo Vendramin, in Venice, of a heart attack, in the arms of his wife, aged 69 years, 8 months and 22 days. His Venetian doctor, Friedrich Keppler, writes :

« It is self-evident that the innumerable psychical agitations to which Wagner was daily disposed by his peculiar mental constitution and disposition, his sharply defined attitude towards a number of burning questions of art, science, and politics, and his remarkable social position did much to hasten his unfortunate end. »

Jacques Manheit, a baritone in the Olmütz Opera, will recall :

« Just as I was going from my home to the Theatre, I saw a man running through the streets ; he was quite distraught, sobbed loudly, and pressed his handkerchief against his eyes ; I recognized Gustav Mahler (aged 22) with difficulty. I went up to him anxiously and asked him quietly : “ In heaven’s name, has something happened to your father ? ”. He howled at the top of his voice : “ Worse, worse, much worse. The worst, the worst has happened, the Master has died. ” After that, it was impossible to talk to Mahler for days. He came to the Theatre for rehearsals and performances, but was inaccessible to everybody for a long time. »

Mardi, 13 février 1883 : Un télégramme en provenance de Venise annonce la mort de Richard Wagner. Anton Bruckner éclate alors en sanglots :

« En apprenant la tragique nouvelle, j’ai pleuré. Mon Dieu que j’ai pleuré ! »

Lettre de Bruckner adressée au jeune chef Felix Mottl :

« Un jour, je suis rentré. Je me sentais très triste à l’idée que le Maître allait bientôt mourir. Et c’est seulement à ce moment que le thème en do dièse mineur de l’Adagio (le thème d’ouverture du mouvement) m’est venu. » .

Tout d’abord pressentiment vague, l’Adagio de la 7e Symphonie s’est bientôt achevé sur une lamentation déchirante : une « Marche Funèbre » à la mémoire de l’illustre Maître.

Mercredi, 14 février 1883 : More than 24 hours after the death of Richard Wagner, Cosima Wagner is persuaded by family members to let go of his body. He died in her arms yesterday, in Venice.

Anton Bruckner (aged 58) is at the Vienna Conservatory when he hears of the death of Richard Wagner. Currently composing, in his office, the Adagio movement of his 7th Symphony, he concludes the work with funeral music in honour of his mentor.

Upon hearing the news of Wagner’s death, Hugo Wolf (aged 22) plays the funeral march from « Götterdämmerung » , then spends the rest of the day on a tree, crying.

On hearing of the death of Richard Wagner, Giuseppe Verdi (aged 69) writes to his publisher :

« Sad. Sad. Sad ! Wagner is dead ! When I read the news yesterday, I may truly say that I was crushed ! It is a great individual who has disappeared ! A name that leaves a powerful imprint on the history of art ! » (Theodore T. Barker, page 284.)

Les derniers moments de Richard Wagner

En 1877, Richard Wagner s'attelle à son dernier Opéra, « Parsifal », qu'il finit à Palerme pendant l'hiver 1881-1882. Il loge dans la Villa des Whitaker, futur Grand Hôtel des Palmes. Pendant la composition, il écrit également une série d'essais sur la religion et l'art.

Richard Wagner retourne à Venise où il séjourne à l'Hôtel Danieli pour 3 nuits le 4 octobre 1880.

Il met la dernière main à « Parsifal » en janvier 1882, et le présente lors du second Festival de Bayreuth. Pendant l'acte III de la 16e et dernière représentation, le 29 août, le chef Hermann Levi est victime d'un malaise. Wagner entre alors discrètement dans la fosse d'orchestre, prend la baguette et dirige l'œuvre jusqu'à son terme.

Richard et Cosima Wagner visitent le Palais Vendramin Calergi de Venise habité par Adolfo Lucchesi Palli, duc della Grazia, ainsi que de son neveu Henri de Bourbon et de sa femme Aldegonde de Bragance, princesse de Portugal.

Après quelques voyages, ils s'installent dans ce Palais dont ils avaient réservé l'entresol qui comptait à lui seul plus de 18 pièces. Ils disposent de nombreux domestiques, dont un gondolier : Luigi Trevisan.

Après le Festival de Bayreuth de 1882, il se rend à Venise avec sa famille pour y passer l'hiver.

Fin novembre, l'arrivée de Franz Liszt (son beau-père) est l'occasion d'une suite de mondanités et de concerts donnés dans le grand salon. Mais Richard Wagner en sort épuisé.

L'état de santé de Richard Wagner se détériore à un tel point qu'il ne peut plus rien apprécier : ni les plaisirs artistiques offerts par Venise, ni les plaisirs de la vie en société.

Le mardi 13 février 1883, Richard Wagner ressent de violentes douleurs au cœur qui annoncent déjà sa mort imminente, qui se produit à midi en présence de sa famille au Palais Vendramin Calergi.

En 1910, on apposa une plaque commémorative à Richard Wagner (ornée d'un médaillon sculpté par Guido Cadomien) au Palazzo Vendramin Calergi avec une épitaphe sur un texte rédigé par Gabriele d'Annunzio :

IN QUESTO PALAGIO

L'ULTIMO SPIRO DI RICCARDO WAGNER
ODONO LE ANIME
PERPETUARSI COME LA MAREA
CHE LAMBE I MARMI.

Les yeux ne pouvaient le soutenir ; mais les cœurs, avec un émerveillement et un effroi qui les rendaient religieux, crurent recevoir de lui la révélation d'un secret divin.

Stelio demanda à la veuve de Richard Wagner que les 2 jeunes italiens qui, un soir de novembre, avaient transporté du bateau à la rive le héros évanoui, et 4 de leurs compagnons avec eux, fussent admis à l'honneur de transporter le cercueil depuis la chambre mortuaire jusqu'à la barque et depuis la barque jusqu'au wagon. Cet honneur leur fut accordé.

C'est son fidèle gondolier, Luigi Trevisan, qui mena la dépouille en gondole jusqu'à la gare Santa Lucia.

Le convoi fut bref. La barque funèbre allait en avant ; puis venait la veuve avec les siens ; puis venait le groupe juvénile. Au-dessus du grand chemin d'eau et de pierre, le ciel était encombré de nuages.

« Le profond silence était digne de celui qui, pour la religion des hommes, avait transformé en un chant infini les forces de l'Univers. » (Gabriele d'Annunzio)

Cosima resta assise avec le corps de Wagner pour plus de 24 heures, refusant tout rafraîchissement et tout répit. Le processus d'embaumement durera 2 jours. Cosima fut assise auprès du cadavre aussi souvent que possible, au grand dam de ses enfants. Elle a également demandé à ses filles de lui couper les cheveux pour les insérer dans un coussin qui sera, par la suite, recousu et placé sur la poitrine de Wagner.

Le cadavre était là, enfermé dans le cercueil de cristal, et, à côté debout, était la femme au visage de neige. Le second cercueil en métal poli, grand ouvert, brillait sur le plancher. Tous avaient les regards fixés sur l' élu de la Vie et de la Mort. Un sourire infini illuminait la face du héros étendu dans la bière : infini et distant comme l'éclat des glaciers, comme le brasillage des mers, comme le halo des astres.

Le voyage de retour à destination de Bayreuth, avec une escale à Munich, se mettra en branle le vendredi 16 février. 2 wagons raccordés au train, spécialement emménagés, transporteront le corps.

« Je fus le 1er dans le monde entier à reconnaître ce grand artiste maintenant décédé. Je suis celui qui l'a sauvé pour la postérité. » Ainsi s'exprima le roi Louis II de Bavière lors de l'arrêt du convoi à Munich.

Le dimanche 18 février, le train à bord duquel la veuve éplorée, les enfants, les amis de la famille, des représentants du Roi et le cercueil contenant les restes de Richard Wagner arrive finalement à Bayreuth. Toujours plus de personnes endeuillées affluaient aussi par train à la gare. En quittant la gare, le cortège funèbre se mit à serpenter à travers la ville, passant par l'Opéra, jusqu'à la Villa « Wahnfried » . Plus de 20,000 personnes composées de citadins et de gens venus de l'extérieur bordaient respectueusement les rues ornées de drapeaux noirs. Le monde parut diminué de valeur. C'est ainsi que débutera la légende du Maître ...

Puis, un bref service funèbre accompagné par les sons sombres du « Götterdämmerung » fut célébré au jardin de la Villa « Wahnfried » où Wagner sera enterré. Cosima resta à l'intérieur jusqu'à la fin de la cérémonie. Selon sa fille, Daniela, elle s'est ensuite rendu à la tombe pour demeurer longtemps étendue sur le cercueil jusqu'à ce qu son fils, « Fidi » (Siegfried) , aille la chercher. » Puis, elle s'enferma pendant de nombreux mois, voyant à peine ses enfants ; avec qui elle communiquera principalement par des notes écrites. Parmi les nombreux messages de support, elle reçut un télégramme de son ancien époux, le chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow : « sœur, il faut vivre. » .

La mort de Richard Wagner (Pascal Bouteldja)

Introduction

Puisque selon le mot de Jean-Paul Sartre, “ la mort change la vie en destin ”, le 13 février 1883, c'était un mardi, le destin exceptionnel de Richard Wagner s'achevait. Et plus de 125 ans après, cette mort est encore entourée d'un certain nombre de rumeurs, ces dernières ayant pris naissance dès le lendemain même de l'annonce de son décès. C'est pourquoi, cet exposé aurait pu être nommé du titre alléchant : “ Qui a tué Richard Wagner ? ”, en référence à l'ouvrage de l'écrivain surréaliste, Stefan Themerson. Une mauvaise langue pourrait répondre à cette question : ses médecins. Nous verrons qu'elle ne serait pas complètement dans l'erreur. Aussi, en bon amateur de romans policiers, j'ai décidé de troquer mon habit de médecin (et, accessoirement, de scientifique) pour celui, pas si lointain, de détective et de vous livrer les résultats de mon enquête sur la mort de Richard Wagner. Comme disait le physicien et épistémologue Thomas Kuhn : “ le travail du savant consiste à résoudre des énigmes ” en tout cas, il essaie. Conan Doyle, le père de Sherlock Holmes, n'hésitait pas aussi à affirmer avoir été inspiré par les méthodes de l'un de ses professeurs à la Faculté de médecine pour camper celles de son héros littéraire. Comme toute enquête qui se respecte, nous étudierons d'abord les faits connus. C'est seulement après l'établissement de ces faits que nous pourrons, comme l'inspecteur de police, proposer une intrigue qui élimine les contradictions et avancer une interprétation acceptable historiquement, puisque les protagonistes ne sont plus là (en admettant, que de toute façon, ils disaient vrai) pour confirmer si nous nous sommes fourvoyés ou non. Pour en arriver là, nous avons dû également interroger les journaux de l'époque, fouiller dans des ouvrages anciens et interroger des correspondances pour rassembler un faisceau de preuve en faveur d'une hypothèse donnée. Aussi, je vous invite à une enquête qui va nous ramener 125 ans en arrière.

« Arlequin, tu dois mourir ! » (Cosima Wagner, Journal. Tome IV)

Au soir du 29 août 1882, le second Festival de Bayreuth s'achevait sur un confortable bénéfice et les représentations de l'été suivant reposaient sur une base solide. Le 10 septembre, Richard Wagner emmenait sa famille à Venise, ville qu'il avait choisie pour passer la mauvaise saison, sans savoir qu'il quittait Bayreuth à jamais. Il lui restait 5 mois à vivre. Toute la famille s'installa dans les 18 pièces de l'entresol du Palais Vendramin Calergi. Menant une vie plus tranquille à Venise, la santé de Wagner s'en ressentit notablement, du moins au tout début. Ainsi, pendant tout le mois d'octobre, malgré un climat délétère pour son moral, il se sentit mieux. Il recevait peu de visites, hormis son cercle d'intimes. Mais les nuits restaient pourtant toujours aussi pénibles : insomnies, cauchemars, digestion difficile et douleurs dans la poitrine. Car Wagner était gravement malade. Depuis plusieurs années, il souffrait d'angine de poitrine. Depuis la fin 1881, les crises étaient plus fréquentes, plus longues et s'accompagnaient d'un essoufflement. On est surpris de constater que Cosima s'inquiétait davantage des symptômes de son époux que les médecins dont l'attention restait fixée sur les troubles digestifs. Pas un seul, y compris le docteur Friedrich Keppler qui le soigna dans les derniers mois de sa vie, ne sut reconnaître l'origine coronarienne de ses troubles. Tous les attribuaient à ses sempiternels problèmes digestifs. Au moral, Wagner se montrait d'un caractère changeant. La moindre modification de son emploi du temps suffisait à le contrarier. Dès la fin octobre, il commença à avoir des ennuis plus graves avec son cœur. Les crampes de poitrine survenaient à présent avec une fréquence accélérée. Péniblement, le compositeur se traînait dans les ruelles de la ville, marchant lentement et s'arrêtant souvent la main sur la poitrine. Cependant rien dans l'état de santé de Wagner ne laissait présager une fin très prochaine. Lui-même n'en avait pas l'exact pressentiment. À Venise, nous le voyons bâtir des plans à plus ou moins longue échéance. Ainsi, en janvier, s'occupait-il à préparer le prochain Festival de 1883 et en pensant à ses projets de Symphonies en un mouvement. Le vieux Maître exprimait également son désir de donner dans son Théâtre des représentations modèles de toutes ses œuvres à partir du Hollandais volant. Le 12 janvier, il n'était pas bien du tout. Le docteur Keppler, quant à lui, était toujours aussi confiant de l'état de la santé de son patient ; ce qui fit dire à Cosima dans son Journal : " Comme il n'est absolument pas inquiet de l'état de Richard, nous plaisantons au petit déjeuner, nous disant que nous ne mourrons jamais ni l'un ni l'autre. ". Se sentant assez bien le jour du Mardi gras (le 6 février) , Richard se rendit avec toute sa famille sur la place Saint-Marc pour assister jusqu'à minuit passé, à la fête de l'enterrement du Carnaval. Keppler fut étonné de le voir en si bonne forme : " Sa démarche était facile, même jeune ; la tête haute et bien tenue. ". Le dimanche 11 février, il pleuvait. Wagner était de mauvaise humeur et resta enfermé une bonne partie de la journée dans son bureau de travail. Dans l'après-midi, il fit une promenade et revint peu après, la main sur le cœur. Ce fut sa dernière sortie. Le lundi 12 février, le Maître éprouva un malaise assez pénible au réveil. À 6 heures du soir, comme tous les jours, le docteur Keppler vint examiner son patient. Ce dernier, se sentant mieux, plaisanta avec le praticien. Après le dîner, il passa la soirée en famille ; il lut à haute voix Ondine, pendant que Paul von Joukowsky dessinait au crayon le dernier portrait que nous ayons de lui. Vers 11 heures, le peintre prit congé. Richard et Cosima restèrent seuls. Il se mit au piano et joua les lamentations des filles du Rhin.

Le matin du mardi 13 février, il pleuvait de nouveau. Wagner se leva plus tard. Il dit à son valet de chambre, Georg Lang : " Aujourd'hui, il faut que je fasse attention. ". Il but son café avec sa femme puis se retira dans son cabinet pour travailler à son essai " Du féminin dans l'humain ", qu'il avait débuté 2 jours plus tôt. Wagner et son épouse avaient prévu d'aller visiter l'atelier de l'artiste russe Alexandre Wolkoff durant l'après-midi. La gondole avait été commandée pour 15h30. Wagner travailla jusqu'à l'heure du déjeuner. Paul von Joukowsky arriva vers 13h45 comme d'habitude pour le déjeuner. On connaît de nombreux détails de cette journée grâce au témoignage de Joukowsky qui en fit le récit dans une lettre adressée à Franz Liszt, le 20 février 1883 : " A 2 heures, il nous fit savoir qu'il avait sa crampe habituelle et nous demanda de nous mettre à table sans l'attendre. Nous étions tous gais comme à l'ordinaire. ". Soudain, au milieu de la conversation, 2 violents coups de sonnette retentirent ; la femme de chambre, Betty Bürkel, surgit dans la salle à manger pour faire " savoir à Madame Wagner que Monsieur la prieait de venir immédiatement " .

Elle raconta qu'elle avait entendu le Maître gémir et se plaindre. " Il était assis à son bureau, son bonnet avait glissé à côté de lui et il semblait attendre la fin d'une crampe. Soudain, il sonna. Il dit à Betty : Ma femme... et le docteur. ". Entre temps, le domestique Georg avait conduit Wagner jusqu'à un canapé. Cosima trouva son époux sans connaissance, les yeux clos. Quand le docteur Keppler arriva en toute hâte vers 3 heures, il le trouva entre les bras de sa femme, qui le croyait endormi. Le cœur avait probablement cessé de battre depuis plusieurs dizaines de minutes. Le praticien déclara : " Nous n'avons pas encore perdu tout espoir. ". On l'allongea sur le lit de repos et Georg desserra ses vêtements. On tenta de lui donner une solution alcoolisée et le praticien commença des frictions prolongées, arrosant et frottant l'ensemble du corps sans succès. Richard Wagner était mort. Sa montre avait glissé de son gilet. Il était 15h30.

Cosima resta près du corps, " qu'elle serra contre son cœur dans une étreinte convulsive sans le moindre mouvement, sans une parole ni plainte et sans verser une seule larme ", tout le jour et toute la nuit. Il fallut plus de 24 heures au docteur Keppler avec l'aide de Joukowsky pour parvenir à l'éloigner de la dépouille de son époux. Le mercredi 14 février à 2 heures, ils purent la convaincre d'aller s'allonger dans la pièce voisine. Elle s'y trouvait encore, refusant de manger ou de voir quiconque hormis ses enfants, quand Adolf von Groß, le banquier de Bayreuth qui avait eu la responsabilité des arrangements financiers du Festival de 1882, et sa femme, arrivèrent précipitamment de Bayreuth le 15 février. Elle accepta de les recevoir mais elle garda le silence. " Je vous confie les enfants. " furent ses seules paroles. Von Groß fut nommé le tuteur légal des enfants et s'occupa d'organiser les funérailles.

Ires nécrologies

Dès le 13 au soir, les télégraphes annoncèrent dans le monde entier le décès de Richard Wagner. Près de 300 télégrammes de condoléances et des couronnes arrivèrent au Palais Vendramin Calergi, devant lequel une foule considérable de vénitiens s'était assemblée. En signe de deuil, l'orchestre municipal annula son concert hebdomadaire sur la place Saint-Marc. La dépouille mortelle fut laissée dans la chambre à coucher jusqu'à l'arrivée de l'envoyé du roi Louis II de Bavière, le secrétaire de la Cour, Ludwig von Bürkel. Le jeudi 15 février, dans l'après-midi, vers 15h00, le docteur Keppler avec l'aide de son assistant transporta le corps dans une pièce voisine et procéda à l'embaumement à l'aide d'une préparation à base d'arsenic, tandis que le sculpteur vénitien Benvenuti Augusto effectua l'empreinte du visage mortuaire. On laissa à la dépouille mortelle du musicien sa somptueuse robe de chambre de soie noire brodée d'or et son célèbre béret. On mit le corps dans un 1er cercueil dont Cosima conserva la clef. La veuve s'était fait couper ses longs cheveux blonds pour les poser sur la poitrine du défunt. La partie supérieure était vitrée pour que l'on pût apercevoir le visage. On le plaça ensuite dans un second de chêne massif, orné aux 4 angles de tête de lions. Le médecin légiste de la ville de Venise scella le cercueil et établit le certificat officiel.

Le vendredi 16 vers 13h30, les domestiques descendirent la lourde bière dans la gondole funèbre, tendue de noir que suivirent les membres de la famille et les intimes. Cosima avait refusé les funérailles solennelles offertes par la ville de Venise, l'inhumation au cimetière de San Michele ainsi que toute manifestation officielle. Son vœu fut respecté. Le convoi funéraire partit pour Bayreuth où il parvint dans la nuit du 17 février. Le lendemain, eurent lieu les obsèques officielles et l'inhumation dans le jardin de la Villa « Wahnfried » .

Éléments médicaux post-mortem

L'ouverture du corps pour les besoins de l'embaumement permit au docteur Keppler de réaliser le rapport suivant : “ Richard Wagner souffrait d'une cardiectasie (dilatation du cœur) fort avancée, spécialement d'une dilatation du ventricule droit avec dégénérescence consécutive grasseuse du muscle cardiaque. D'autre part, il était atteint d'une dilatation assez importante de l'estomac. Les souffrances auxquelles Richard Wagner fut soumis dans les derniers mois de sa vie consistaient d'abord en troubles provenant de l'estomac et de l'intestin, mais il souffrit également de troubles douloureux de la fonction cardiaque. Ces troubles finirent par provoquer la catastrophe par la rupture du ventricule droit. Il va sans dire que les innombrables excitations psychologiques auxquelles Wagner était exposé quotidiennement par ses positions très affirmées sur une foule de questions brûlantes dans les domaines de l'art, de la science et de la politique, et par sa situation sociale étonnante, ont beaucoup contribué à accélérer la fin fatale. La crise qui mit fin si brusquement à la vie du Maître doit avoir eu une telle cause cependant, je ne peux m'engager dans ce genre de suppositions.”.

D'un point de vue médical, le docteur Friedrich Keppler mentionne la dégénérescence grasseuse du myocarde. Il faut toutefois émettre quelque réserve et convenir que la façon dont Keppler est arrivé à sa conclusion n'est pas claire, dans la mesure où aucune véritable autopsie n'a été effectuée. Toutefois, les traités médicaux de l'époque précisent que “ cette accumulation est parfois considérable et dans certains cas, le cœur est comme enseveli dans une enveloppe grasseuse d'une grande épaisseur ” ; une ouverture même partielle du corps aurait pu donc permettre au praticien de la constater sans avoir recours à une autopsie. D'un point de vue anatomo-pathologique, cette “ dégénérescence grasseuse du cœur ” correspond de nos jours à ce que l'on appelle l'athérosclérose, étiologie dominante de l'insuffisance coronarienne ou angine de poitrine. Il note également de manière précise dans son rapport l'existence d'une rupture du ventricule droit associée à une dilatation de ce dernier. En sachant que Richard Wagner souffrit de crises d'angor répétées, dont l'aboutissement fut probablement une insuffisance cardiaque, il est légitime de conclure que l'évolution ultime fut un infarctus myocardique compliqué de rupture cardiaque.

Les rumeurs

La famille ne communiquant pas d'informations concernant la nature du décès et la façon dont il était survenu, toutes sortes de notices nécrologiques et de fausses versions ne tardèrent pas à se propager à Venise. Un musicologue, plutôt détective amateur, Joachim Köhler mentionne même que Cosima aurait dit à Betty Bürkel : “ Aucun souvenir personnel ne doit tomber dans d'autres mains. ”. (Joachim Köhler, Richard Wagner. The Last of the Titans.) Il nous semble que cette affirmation est à prendre avec beaucoup de précautions, l'auteur ne mentionnant aucune source précise. Plus crédibles sont les témoignages fournis par journaux de l'époque. Grâce à eux, il est possible de dresser la liste des diverses nécrologies parues. La version la plus répandue était celle-ci : “ La pièce dans laquelle Wagner rendit l'âme, était la salle à manger. Tandis que le gondolier Luigi apportait la soupe, le Maître se leva subitement de son siège en s'écriant : “ Je me sens mal ! ” À l'instant même, il tombait évanoui. Madame Cosima et ses filles se précipitèrent pour relever le malade. Luigi et les autres domestiques que l'on avait appelés vinrent en aide aux femmes, malheureusement en vain. Une embolie avait provoqué la fin rapide de Wagner. ”. Cette version fut d'ailleurs reproduite dans le « Bayreuther Tagblatt » , un des rares journaux que Wagner admît à la Villa « Wahnfried » . « La Gazzetta di Venezia » du 15 février 1883, se référant au gondolier préféré de Wagner, Luigi Trevisan, publiait le récit suivant : “ Avant-hier, Wagner s’est senti un peu indisposé, mais il a travaillé pendant quelques heures de la matinée, tout comme à son habitude. Vers 3 heures de l’après-midi, il s’est senti plus mal, il s’est quand même fait servir son repas ; mais il ne s’est senti en état de prendre que du bouillon. Il a ensuite demandé de faire préparer la gondole, espérant peut-être trouver un peu de fraîcheur à l’air libre et dans la tranquillité pittoresque de notre Canal Grande ; mais il a soudain été pris d’un malaise avant d’avoir pu descendre dans la gondole. Il est allé dans sa chambre et a enfilé une robe de chambre rose ; il a sonné et a demandé sa femme. Sa Cosima est accourue tout de suite et quand elle a vu combien l’état de son mari s’était aggravé, elle a fait venir le médecin et a prodigué entre-temps tous les soins au mourant ; mais tout a été inutile parce que quand le docteur Keppler, le médecin de famille, est arrivé, il n’a pu que constater le décès. L’épouse, déjà habituée à quelques attaques, sous forme de syncopes, auxquelles Wagner était sujet (il semblerait qu’il soit mort d’une maladie cardiaque) , ne voulait pas se laisser convaincre qu’il était mort et elle est restée des heures entières accrochée à sa poitrine : il n’y avait pas moyen de la séparer de lui. On peut bien s’imaginer la scène avec les filles et le fils qui éprouvaient tous une grande affection pour lui.” Un autre journal vénitien “ prétendait tenir du chef Hans Richter que les dernières paroles de Wagner avaient été : “ Il faut que mon fils...” ; ces mots devaient s’interpréter, paraît-il, comme le souhait de Wagner que Siegfried, qui s’intéressait à l’architecture, se consacre à la musique et par conséquent, au Festival. De même, les spéculations à caractère scabreux ne firent non plus défaut. Un journal italien sema le doute en précisant que la femme de chambre de Wagner, Betty Bürkel était seule avec lui lors du décès. C’est ainsi que l’assertion formulée par certains biographes selon laquelle Wagner serait mort au cours d’ébats amoureux avec sa camériste commença à voir le jour. Cette hypothèse ne relève peut-être que de la fantasmagorie malveillante des auteurs ou de leur penchant pour le sensationnalisme égrillard. Les preuves sont suffisamment minces pour qu’on n’accorde à cette rumeur aucune créance.

« Qui a tué Richard Wagner ? »

Consulté sur la maladie qui l’avait emporté, le docteur Keppler fit une réponse aussi franche et précise au point de vue strictement médical, qu’évasive et prudente en ce qui concernait les causes probables ou possibles de la mort. En effet, dans ses conclusions le praticien indiquait qu’une excitation psychologique pouvait avoir brusqué la fin. Les biographes et commentateurs que cette hypothèse ne laissait pas en repos, ne se privèrent pas de se répandre en conjectures à ce sujet. Pour Adolphe Jullien (1921) : “ Ces derniers renseignements et la réserve ambiguë où se tient le médecin, sans émettre aucune opinion dans aucun sens, ne sont-ils pas de ceux qui, précisément parce qu’ils ne veulent rien dire, en laissant deviner long ? ”. Pourquoi a-t-il souligné que l’attaque qui mit fin si brutalement à la vie du Maître devait avoir “ une telle cause ” ? Avait-il eu connaissance par les domestiques ou l’entourage de Wagner de certaines rumeurs ? Pour Joachim Köhler, “ pas de doute qu’il devait avoir de bonnes raisons ”. Le biographe de Cosima Wagner, le Comte Richard du Moulin-Eckart, évoque dans le second tome de son ouvrage des complications causées par “ des annonces indiscrettes ” de la part du docteur Keppler. On trouve trace de ces indiscretions dans une lettre qui ne semble pas avoir été conservée d’Adolf von Groß, écrite au praticien, dans laquelle il évoque la santé préoccupante de Cosima et fait allusion aux notices nécrologiques publiées (probablement analogues à celles reproduites ci-dessus) : “ Il y a quelques jours, nous avons lu dans tous les journaux ce que vous trouverez dans la coupure ci-jointe. Nous espérons que vous me mettez dans une position qui me permette de démentir cela. Madame Wagner et les enfants demandent à ce que rien ne soit publié à ce propos. Si vous avez rédigé vos observations, je vous demanderais de me les faire parvenir dans une enveloppe scellée. En tant que tuteur des enfants, je dois transmettre à Siegfried ce qui m'a été confié pour lui quand il sera en âge". Il y conclut que " la seule personne capable d'éviter le scandale est Keppler lui-même ". Le médecin ne sembla pas avoir donné suite à l'injonction du tuteur des enfants de Wagner. Nonobstant le secret médical, Keppler procura à la journaliste Henriette Perl, des notes dans lequel il rendait compte de tous les détails de l'état de santé du compositeur et des causes de son décès, laquelle publia 2 mois après le décès de Wagner, un récit consacré aux derniers mois de sa vie sous le titre, Richard Wagner in Venedig. C'est à partir de ce moment-là que la Villa « Wahnfried » fit savoir que Keppler avait tué Wagner. Ainsi dans une lettre du chef d'orchestre Julius Kniese à sa femme, datée du 1er juillet 1883, on peut lire : " Wagner serait toujours vivant aujourd'hui s'il n'avait pas été la victime d'un charlatan patenté, le Docteur Keppler, à Venise."

Qu'est-ce qui a causé cette réaction émanant de « Wahnfried » ? Probablement pas les détails cités sur la mort de Wagner et en particulier sur le comportement de Cosima après la mort de son époux bien que ceux-ci eussent parfaitement justifié la désapprobation de la veuve et des enfants du compositeur. Le dernier médecin de Wagner " avait quelque chose à voir avec une communication indiscreète provenant de Venise ". Dans une lettre à Malwida von Meysenbug du 22 février 1883, Joukowsky parla de " bruits désagréables " qui s'étaient répandus au sujet de la mort de Wagner. Était-ce à propos de cette rumeur concernant Betty Bürkel ? Mais, dès 1886, il est question d'une autre hypothèse. L' " inspecteur ", Adolphe Jullien, dans son épais ouvrage, Richard Wagner, sa vie et ses œuvres, évoque le jour même du décès de Wagner, " un accès de colère, une discussion assez vive " sans vouloir en dire davantage. C'est ce même auteur qui en 1921, dans un article de La Revue musicale intitulé " Une dernière faiblesse de Wagner " évoque le 1er, la cause de cette fameuse dispute le matin de la mort de Wagner, en reprenant une discrète tradition orale : " Mais ce qu'on a toujours caché, ce qu'ont raconté seuls sous le manteau des gens très informés de tout ce qui se passait à Bayreuth (ou à Venise) , c'est que Wagner venait précisément de soutenir une discussion très vive et d'avoir un violent accès de colère en croyant que tout le monde se liguaient autour de lui pour l'empêcher de rappeler à Bayreuth certaine chanteuse, peu jolie à coup sûr, mais supérieurement douée, à ce qu'il avait cru voir : c'était Melle Pringle."

Ainsi, le matin de sa mort, Wagner aurait soutenu une discussion très vive avec Cosima et aurait eu un violent accès de colère à propos d'une chanteuse anglaise qui voyageait en Italie, Carrie Pringle. Cette dernière, de son vrai nom Caroline Mary Isabelle Pringle, était née à Linz le 19 mars 1859. Appartenant à une famille de musicien, elle poursuivit des études de chant en dilettante. Elle fut donc surtout une chanteuse, de talent certes, mais au niveau amateur seulement. Elle fut auditionnée par Wagner sur la proposition du chef Hermann Levi en août 1881 et se trouva chargée du rôle d'une fille-fleur. Par la suite, il ne semble pas qu'elle n'ait jamais fait d'autre apparition sur le plan professionnel, sombrant dans une obscurité provinciale ; sa prétention à la renommée d'être la Ire chanteuse anglaise à participer au Festival de Bayreuth, n'ayant pas été reconnue par ses contemporains. Elle mourut à l'âge de 71 ans à Brighton le 12 novembre 1930, quelques mois après Cosima. Rien d'autre ne peut expliquer l'aparté étrange du docteur Keppler dans son rapport. Cette thèse fut à nouveau développée et plus argumentée par Jean Mistler dans son article La mort à Venise. L'éminent académicien confirme que c'est dans les années '30 que la rumeur attira pour la Ire fois son attention : " Des personnes dignes de confiance m'ont répété, il y a 30 ans, ce que la fille de Wagner, Isolde, leur aurait raconté : le matin du 13 février était arrivé au Palais Vendramin Calergi, un télégramme de Miss Carrie Pringle. Voyageant en Italie, la jeune anglaise demandait au Maître quand elle pourrait lui rendre visite. Son télégramme serait tombé sous les yeux de Cosima et une violente scène aurait suivi. ”.

C'est en effet à partir des années 1920 et 1930 que des rumeurs commencèrent à circuler sur une liaison entre Carrie Pringle et Wagner. Les écrits de Mistler ont longtemps été négligés dans le monde wagnérien anglophone et germanophone. Ce n'est que grâce à quelques “ détectives ” disposant de données nouvelles, en particulier, Herbert Conrad et Curt von Westernhagen, que la “ wagnérologie ” se mit à considérer ce fait avec plus de rigueur (“ Absturz aus Klingsors Zaubergarten ”, Supplément du Nordbayerischer Kurier, août 1978 - Le plongeon du jardin enchanté de Klingsor - et “ Wagner's Last Day ”, The Musical Times, mai 1979).

Le témoignage d'Isolde (Wagner) von Bülow

Le rôle d'Isolde est essentiel dans cette affaire. Le matin du 13 février, la Ire fille de Wagner, alors âgée de 17 ans, “ fut le témoin d'une scène très violente entre ses parents : autant qu'elle sût, la raison de cette dispute était l'annonce de la visite de Carrie Pringle ”. La soprano anglaise habitait effectivement à cette époque à Milan avec ses parents, et poursuivait ses études de chant. Selon Conrad, la seule personne à qui Isolde parla de ce qu'elle avait entendu ce matin-là fut son fils, qui n'a jamais fait aucun commentaire public à ce sujet. Isolde avait épousé en 1900 le chef d'orchestre d'origine suisse, Franz Beidler qui dirigea à Bayreuth l'un des cycles du « Ring » en 1904 et « Parsifal » en 1906. Comme le souligne Westernhagen, il n'est pas impossible qu'Isolde fut la seule à être témoin de cette dispute, si l'on prend en compte la superficie des 18 pièces occupées par la famille et les domestiques.

Comment cette histoire devint-elle donc publique ? Les faits ne sont pas clairs et comme dirait Tintin, dans l'Affaire Tournesol : “ Cette affaire paraît assez embrouillée. ”. Toujours selon Westernhagen, la seconde fille de Hans Richter, Ludowika, était une amie intime d'un certain Benedikt Lochmüller, une connaissance du fils d'Isolde. Lochmüller tint un journal, qui fut déposé après sa mort aux Archives municipales de Bayreuth. Une entrée en date du 14 mars 1933 rapporte une “ conversation très intéressante ” entre Ludowika Richter, dont il émerge que Judith Gautier ne fut nullement la dernière femme de la vie de Wagner : “ La dernière femme que Wagner a aimée était une certaine Pringle. Elle était anglaise ; une personne sérieuse et bien élevée. On dit qu'elle était très belle. On dit que Hermann Levi l'introduisit à Bayreuth. Quand Wagner quitta Bayreuth pour Venise, Miss Pringle retourna à Venise également : son télégramme de Milan a survécu. ” Et le 16 mars, Lochmüller questionna Mizzi Richter (la fille cadette) au sujet de Carrie Pringle : “ Mizzi indiqua qu'elle avait environ 20 ou 25 ans. Remarquable mystère entourant la femme ! Je me demande si Otto Strobel, l'archiviste de Bayreuth, sait quelque chose. ”. Le chercheur britannique, Stewart Spencer émet l'hypothèse que Hans Richter a “ pu colporter des rumeurs sur la vie privée de Wagner ; rumeurs qu'il aurait pu apprendre de la bouche d'Isolde ”.

Depuis, il est devenu quasiment impossible, de nos jours, de lire un récit de la vie de Wagner sans s'entendre dire qu'il a été tué par une fille-fleur anglaise du nom de Carrie Pringle. C'est à Stewart Spencer que l'on doit en 2004 d'avoir réalisé la synthèse du sujet, en se basant sur des faits documentés en la matière dans son article : “ Er starb, - ein Mensch wie alle ” : Wagner et Carrie Pringle. Le “ commissaire ” Spencer nous livre une chronologie de faits retenus, de témoignages, de pièces à conviction qui ressemblent à celles qu'Agatha Christie ou Georges Simenon établissaient probablement avant de rédiger un roman afin de s'assurer de la cohérence du récit. Et son enquête démontre qu'il n'existe aucun indice, ni aucune preuve pour appuyer l'hypothèse d'une liaison avec Carrie Pringle. De même, il n'y a pas dans le Journal de Cosima la moindre trace de jalousie latente envers la soprano. L'étude des témoignages d'ordre privé ne permet pas de trouver le moindre indice contemporain qui puisse étayer l'idée d'une liaison entre Wagner et Carrie Pringle. La seule fois où leurs noms se trouvent associés, de manière avérée est le Journal de Lochmüller, dont on ne sait pas ce qu'il vaut. Les faits documentés en la matière sont les suivants : Carrie Pringle fut auditionnée par Richard Wagner le 5 août 1881.

Elle envoya 2 télégrammes : le 1er pour souhaiter un bon anniversaire au compositeur le 22 mai 1882 ; le second, pour présenter ses condoléances à la famille. Enfin, elle chanta l'une des filles-fleurs lors du Festival de 1882. Toutes les autres assertions sont des spéculations. Bien évidemment, il est impossible d'établir avec une certitude absolue que Wagner et la jeune soprano anglaise n'étaient pas amants en 1882. Alors, bien sûr, elle fut la seule interprète des 6 filles-fleurs à ne pas être réinvitée à chanter pour les représentations bayreuthiennes suivant la mort de Wagner en juillet 1883. Mais d'autres artistes et non des moindres (Marianne Brandt, la créatrice de Kundry) ne le furent pas non plus. En réalité, le rôle dépassait ses capacités et ayant réagi en faisant des difficultés, elle ne fut pas réinvitée. La correspondance entre Levi et Groß évoque le 7 mars 1883 " l'insubordination de Carrie Pringle " envers Hermann Levi et son " incompetence artistique ". Stewart Spencer va même jusqu'à prétendre qu'Isolde ait pu inventer cette histoire de dispute entre ses parents dans le but de discréditer sa mère. En 1913, Isolde attaqua sa mère en justice afin que les droits de son fils puissent être reconnus dans la succession de Bayreuth. Déjà en 1906, son époux, Franz Beidler, s'était brouillé avec Cosima pour une autre raison. Débutée, Isolde ne se remit jamais de cela. Il n'est pas impossible qu'une dispute ait bien eu lieu à Venise ce matin du 13 février, mais dont la cause n'aurait pas été Carrie Pringle. Pourquoi avoir choisi Carrie Pringle ? Se souvenait-elle que la soprano anglaise avait été impliquée dans un accident sur scène au cours des représentations de 1882 (d'où le titre sensationnel de Conrad, faisant allusion à la chute de la soprano) ou que la chanteuse avait été un handicap en 1882 et que Wagner n'avait pas voulu l'inviter à nouveau en 1883.

Ce qui s'est vraisemblablement passé

Nous-même, pensons qu'une dispute a bien eu lieu entre Richard et Cosima Wagner. Nous avons précisé plus haut que la moindre modification de son emploi du temps suffisait à le contrarier et que ses accès de colère étaient de plus en plus fréquents. Il est possible que cette dispute fût entendue par un domestique. Ce dernier aurait pu la répéter en toute confiance au docteur Keppler, homme de médecine soumis au secret professionnel de ses patients. À moins qu'Isolde ne l'ait rapporté au praticien, durant les 2 jours suivant le décès. Une chose est certaine, la mort de Richard Wagner fut un accident qui devait finir par arriver et qui n'avait pas besoin de circonstance déclenchante. Finalement, toute cette histoire ne serait-elle pas qu'une tentative d'auréoler la simple banalité de la mort du compositeur d'une atmosphère d'exception. L'Histoire n'a-t-elle pas besoin de légende et de mystère ? Une chose est certaine, les médecins qui méconnaissent l'origine coronarienne des symptômes dont souffrait Wagner sont blâmables, car il aurait pu bénéficier d'un traitement à la trinitrine. Un siècle après la description princeps de l'angor par Heberden en 1772, on pensa, en 1876, à utiliser le nitrite d'amyle dans le traitement de la crise angineuse. C'est en 1879 que la nitroglycérine ou trinitrine fut promue au 1er rang des médicaments de l'angine de poitrine, en démontrant son efficacité par voie sublinguale. Légitimement, la postérité peut en vouloir à ses médecins de ne pas avoir permis à Wagner de vivre quelques années supplémentaires. Alors, qui a tué Richard Wagner ? Et si la clé du mystère n'était pas dans l'incompétence de ses médecins ? Cette question demeure à jamais sans réponse par défaut de quelques dragées de trinitrine.

Les funérailles de Richard Wagner

« Le Festspielhaus est le site le plus célèbre de la ville de Bayreuth. Où serait-elle sans Richard Wagner ? Il en est le moteur touristique. Ce grand Maître fut une véritable bénédiction pour notre ville. C'est lui que devons remercier lorsque le nom de Bayreuth est cité avec révérence par les gens éduqués du monde entier. » Ainsi s'exprima Theodor Muncker, maire de Bayreuth, dans son discours lors des obsèques nationales grandioses de Richard Wagner, tenues le dimanche 18 février 1883.

Pour l'occasion, Anton Bruckner aura le privilège de toucher l'orgue. De plus, il sera désigné (aux côtés de 2 musiciens juifs ; le chef wagnérien israélite Hermann Levi et le pianiste russe Joseph Rubinstein) comme l'un des porteurs du cercueil en métal poli.

La transcription du « pari de Pascal » par Bruckner se situe dans les années 1880. À un ami incroyant qui s'étonnait qu'il ajoutât foi à l'immortalité de l'âme, Bruckner répondit :

« Je vous comprends, mais voyez-vous : si la chose est vraie, c'est tant mieux pour moi ; si ce n'est pas vrai, de prier, ça peut pas me faire de mal ! »

Joseph Rubinstein

Joseph Rubinstein est né le 8 février 1847 à Starokonstantinov et est mort (par suicide) le 15 septembre 1884 à Lucerne. Ce pianiste russe fut un élève de Josef Hellmesberger, Josef Dachs et Franz Liszt. On lui doit des arrangements pour piano de « Siegfried » et de « Parsifal » .

En 1872, Joseph Rubinstein écrivit de Kharkov à Richard Wagner qui l'admit à Bayreuth dans son intimité, et ce malgré son anti-sémitisme musical avéré. Il vit chez lui, comme « pianiste de maison » . En 1881, à Paris, il collabora aux feuilles de Bayreuth, puis suivit le Maître à Palerme l'année suivante, et à Venise en 1883. À la mort de Wagner, Rubinstein tomba dans une grave dépression et se suicida à Lucerne, le 15 septembre 1884. Sa dépouille aurait été ensevelie au cimetière juif de Bayreuth.

...

Joseph Rubinstein (1847-1884) est un jeune pianiste russe issu d'une très riche famille juive. C'est un grand admirateur de Richard Wagner. Il lui avait offert ses services, en mars 1872. Depuis, il vit chez les Wagner en qualité de « pianiste de maison » . Il a réalisé des arrangements pour piano du « Siegfried-Idyll » (WV 103) et du « Parsifal » (WV 1) . Il se suicidera peu après la mort de son idole. Rubinstein fut l'élève de Franz Liszt à Budapest pendant 1 semestre et joua en public dans cette ville les 22 janvier, 18 mars et 1er avril 1873.

...

The Russian pianist and composer Joseph Rubinstein was born on 8 February 1847 in Staro-Constantinov and died (by his own hand) on 15 September 1884 in Lucerne. He was a pupil of Josef Hellmesberger, Josef Dachs, and Franz Liszt, and a friend and ardent admirer of Richard Wagner, from whose drama « Ring des Nibelungen », he made excellent pianoforte transcriptions. In 1869, the grand duchess Helena of Russia appointed Rubinstein « Kammerpianist ». 3 years later, he visited Wagner at Tribschen, and went with him to Bayreuth, where he attended the piano rehearsals of the « Ring des Nibelungen » .

On 1 June 1876, Joseph Rubinstein was (again) in the Wagner household. He had left over half a year before to spend the winter in Budapest taking lessons from Franz Liszt. It must have benefited him ; Cosima remarked that his piano playing had made great strides. Such complimentary remarks are almost always more than balanced by something negative, and only concerning the negative does the religious faith become important. Less than a week later, she gave another slant on her father's tutelage of the young pianist. She said :

« Rubinstein, in the way of Jews, has copied all sorts of things from my father, much to his own advantage. »

On July 1, Richard was « pleased with Joseph Rubinstein's talent » . On the 15th, Rubinstein « distinguishes himself by playing from the manuscript of the 3rd Act of « Götterdämmerung » . In September, he played Strauß Waltzes to their « great enjoyment » .

In 1880, Rubinstein gave, in Berlin, a series of lectures on the « Wohltemperierte Klavier » which gained him considerable renown. Rubinstein was the author of several song-and piano compositions, and a number of articles appeared in the « Bayreuther Blätter » over his signature, in which Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms were attacked in a very offensive and vindictive manner. These articles, which are believed by some to have emanated from a more famous pen, obtained for Rubinstein a rather unenviable notoriety.

...

Joseph Rubinstein (geboren 8. Februar 1847 in Starokonstantinow, Russisches " Reich ", heute Ukraine ; gestorben 22. August 1884 in Tribschen bei Luzern, Schweiz) war ein russisch-jüdischer Pianist sowie Anhänger und Mitarbeiter Richard Wagners.

Joseph Rubinstein wurde als Kind einer wohlhabenden jüdischen Familie im ukrainischen Teil des russischen Zarenreichs geboren. In seiner Heimatstadt erhielt er den ersten Klavierunterricht von dem deutschsprachigen Pianisten Josef Schadek. Seit seinem elften Lebensjahr lebte Rubinstein in Wien, wo er Schüler von Josef Dachs am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien wurde. 1865 trat er als Klaviervirtuose in Wien und in seiner Heimat auf. Im Herbst 1869 wurde er von der Großfürstin Helene von Russland als Kammerpianist nach Salzburg berufen, wo sie zu dieser Zeit residierte. Während einer Konzertreise nach Sankt Petersburg lernte er durch den Musikkritiker und Komponisten Alexander Serow erstmals die Werke Richard Wagners kennen. Für Rubinstein kam dies einem Erweckungserlebnis gleich, über das er später schrieb :

« Das Resultat dieses sich Versenkens in eine neue Welt war eine förmliche Bekehrung zu den Prinzipien des Meisters von Bayreuth, zugleich aber auch eine unbezwingliche Sehnsucht, dem Manne, dessen Werke mich in eine so hohe Begeisterung versetzt, auch persönlich nahe treten zu dürfen und ihm, so wie seiner so schwer angefeindeten Sache so viel als mir möglich zu nützen. »

Am 7. März 1872 erhielt Wagner in Tribschen schließlich einen Brief Rubinsteins, der mit einer Beichte begann :

« Ich bin Jude - Hiermit ist für Sie alles gesagt. Alle jene Eigenschaften, die an dem Juden der Gegenwart bemerklich sind, besaß ich auch : In gänzlicher Muthlosigkeit und fast beschämender Schwäche schleppte ich mich durch das Leben. Da geschah es, daß ich durch die Umstände auf Ihre Werke aufmerksam gemacht wurde. Durch Serow in Petersburg ward ich zum Studium derselben angespornt. Doch die Zeit, die die glücklichste meines Lebens war, die Zeit des Studiums in jenen Werken ist nun vorbei.

Mir bleibt nur noch der Tod ! - Schon habe ich versucht, ihn mir zu geben : aber noch beschloß ich Ihnen zu schreiben. Sie könnten mir vielleicht helfen. Ich meine selbstverständlich keine Hilf aus bloßem Mitleiden. Nein ! Aber könnte ich Ihnen nicht bei der Aufführung der Nibelungen nützlich sein ? Ich glaube, ich verstehe dieses Werk, wenn auch noch nicht vollkommen. - Von Ihnen erwarte ich Hilfe und Hilfe, die dringend ist. Meine Eltern sind reich. Die Mittel, um zu Ihnen zu fahren, würde ich sogleich haben. Ich erwarte eine Antwort so bald als möglich. »

Wagner antwortete Rubinstein in freundlichem Ton und lud ihn nach Tribschen ein. Cosima berichtete darüber Friedrich Nietzsche : « einen seltsamen Brief von einem, der Erlösung durch die Teilnahme an Bayreuth sucht, sollten Sie hier einmal sehen » . Noch vor dem Eintreffen Rubinsteins in Tribschen erhielt Wagner einen Brief von dessen Arzt Maximilian Leidesdorf, Chefarzt der Irrenabteilung im Allgemeinen Krankenhaus der Stadt Wien :

« Sie werden wohl entschuldigen, wenn ich dem Besuch, welchen Herr Joseph Rubinstein bei Ihnen machen wird, einige Zeilen voransicke, damit Sie diesem jungen Künstler wirklich und wahrhaft nützen können, was bei Ihrer hochherzigen Gesinnung gewiß Ihr Wunsch ist. Der junge Mann hat für Sie nicht nur die natürliche Verehrung und Begeisterung, welche Ihr schöpferischer Genius bei wahren Künstlernaturen erzeugen muß, er hat auch in Sie das unbedingtste Vertrauen. Eine kaum überstandene und noch nachklingende psychische Erkrankung erheischt aber noch große Vorsicht und Schonung - und nach meinem Darfürhalten muß der junge Künstler noch durch 8-12 Wochen von jeder Aufregung geschützt werden und sich einer Badekur in größter Ruhe (geistiger und körperlicher) unterziehen. In diesem Sinne bitte ich auf ihn gütigst wirken zu wollen. »

Rubinstein traf am 21. April 1872 in Tribschen ein, doch bereits am nächsten Tag verließ Wagner die Schweiz und übersiedelte nach Bayreuth. Im Juli 1872 erschien Rubinstein dann in Bayreuth und wurde zum ständigen Begleiter und Mitarbeiter Wagners. Er wurde mit der Kopie der « Götterdämmerung » beauftragt. Weihnachten 1874 verbrachte er in der Villa Wahnfried und durfte mit Cosima den Weihnachtsbaum schmücken, danach trat er eine Konzertreise an. Im Sommer 1875 kam Rubinstein erneut nach Bayreuth, um als Solokorrepetitor bei den Vorproben für den « Ring » mitzuwirken. Einen Monat vor der Eröffnung der Bayreuther Festspiele reiste er jedoch nach einem Streit mit Wagner während der Probe ab. Bei Cosima hieß es dazu lapidar :

« Die Klavierproben endigten mit vollständiger Entlassung von Herrn Rubinstein, welcher die traurigsten Eigenschaften seines Stammes hier wiederum bewährt. »

Im Mai 1878 kehrte Rubinstein abermals nach Bayreuth zurück, nachdem er sich zuvor bei Wagner für sein « Benehmen » entschuldigt hatte. Seit November 1878 arbeitete Rubinstein erneut für Wagner bei der Vorbereitung der Parsifal-Premiere, wurde sein Hauspianist und blieb ständig an seiner Seite. 1880 fuhr Rubinstein nach Berlin, um Konzerte zugunsten der Festspiele zu geben. Er spielte an sechs Abenden jeweils das gesamte « Wohltemperierte Klavier » von Johann Sebastian Bach und überwies sein Honorar an den Festspiel-Fonds. 1882 folgte er Wagner nach Italien, lebte zusammen mit Cosima und den Kindern in Venedig und spielte regelmäßig zur Unterhaltung der Familie und der Gäste Klavier, meist Teile aus den Opern Wagners. Am 22. Oktober 1882 verließ Rubinstein völlig überraschend Venedig und fuhr zu seinen Eltern nach Charkow. Als er dort im Februar 1883 vom Tod Wagners erfuhr, schickte er Wagners Witwe Cosima ein Beileidstelegramm.

Im Frühjahr 1883 ging Rubinstein wieder auf Konzertreise, mit Bearbeitungen und Fantasien nach Richard Wagner. Im August 1884 fuhr er nach Tribtschen und erschoss sich im Alter von 36 Jahren am Vierwaldstättersee. Sein Leichnam wurde nach Bayreuth überführt und auf dem Israelitischen Friedhof beigesetzt. Sein Vater ließ auf seinem Grab einen schwarzen Obelisk aufstellen.

...

Klaviervirtuose geboren 8. Februar 1847, Starokonstantinow / gestorben 22. August 1884, Luzern.

Rubinstein wurde als Kind einer wohlhabenden jüdischen Familie im ukrainischen Teil des russischen Zarenreichs geboren. In seiner Heimatstadt erhielt er den ersten Klavierunterricht von dem deutschsprachigen Pianisten Josef Schadek, seit seinem elften Lebensjahr lebte Rubinstein in Wien, wo er Schüler von Josef Dachs am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft für Musikfreunde wurde. 1865 trat Rubinstein als Klaviervirtuose in Wien und in seiner russischen Heimat auf. Im Herbst 1869 wurde er von der Großfürstin Helene von Russland als Kammerpianist nach Salzburg berufen, wo sie zu dieser Zeit residierte. Während einer Konzertreise nach Petersburg lernte er durch den bekannten Musikkritiker und Komponisten Alexander Serow erstmals die Werke Richard Wagners kennen. Für Rubinstein kam dies einem Erweckungserlebnis gleich, über das er später schrieb :

« Das Resultat dieses sich Versenkens in eine neue Welt war eine förmliche Bekehrung zu den Prinzipien des Meisters von Bayreuth, zugleich aber auch eine unbezwingliche Sehnsucht, dem Manne, dessen Werke mich in eine so hohe Begeisterung versetzt, auch persönlich nahe treten zu dürfen und ihm, so wie seiner so schwer angefeindeten Sache so viel als mir möglich zu nützen. »

Am 7. März 1872 erhielt Wagner in Tribtschen schließlich einen Brief Josef Rubinsteins, der mit einer Beichte begann :

« Ich bin Jude - Hiermit ist für Sie alles gesagt. Alle jene Eigenschaften, die an dem Juden der Gegenwart bemerklich sind, besaß ich auch : In gänzlicher Muthlosigkeit und fast beschämender Schwäche schleppte ich mich durch das Leben. Da geschah es, daß ich durch die Umstände auf Ihre Werke aufmerksam gemacht wurde. Durch Serow in Petersburg ward ich zum Studium derselben angespornt. Ich versenkte mich dergestalt in diese für mich, und für viele Andere gewiß auch, so neue Welt, daß ich bald die andere, die wirkliche nämlich, vergaß. Doch die Zeit, die die glücklichste meines Lebens war, die Zeit des Studiums in jenen Werken ist nun vorbei.

Mir bleibt nur noch der Tod ! - Schon habe ich versucht, ihn mir zu geben : aber noch beschloß ich Ihnen zu schreiben. Sie könnten mir vielleicht helfen. Ich meine selbstverständlich keine Hilfe aus bloßem Mitleiden. Wenn es Ihnen bloß darum zu tun wäre, daß ich mir nicht das Leben nähme, so wäre es umsonst, wenn Sie mich da beruhigen wollten, auf die eine oder andere Weise würde ich doch zugrunde gehen. Nein ! Aber könnte ich Ihnen nicht bei der Aufführung der Nibelungen nützlich sein ? Ich glaube, ich verstehe dieses Werk, wenn auch noch nicht vollkommen. - Von Ihnen erwarte ich Hilfe und Hilfe, die dringend ist. Meine Eltern sind reich. Die Mittel, um zu Ihnen zu fahren, würde ich sogleich haben. Ich erwarte eine Antwort so bald als möglich. »

Wagner antwortete Rubinstein in freundlichem Ton und lud ihn ein, zu ihm nach Tribtschen zu kommen. Cosima berichtete darüber Friedrich Nietzsche : « einen seltsamen Brief von einem, der Erlösung durch die Teilnahme an Bayreuth sucht, sollten Sie hier einmal sehen » . Noch bevor Rubinstein in Tribtschen eintraf erhielt Wagner einen Brief von dessen Wiener Arzt Maximilian Leidesdorf, Chefarzt der Irrenabteilung des Allgemeinen Krankenhaus der Stadt Wien :

« Sie werden wohl entschuldigen, wenn ich dem Besuch, welchen Herr Joseph Rubinstein bei Ihnen machen wird, einige Zeilen voransicke, damit Sie diesem jungen Künstler wirklich und wahrhaft nützen können, was bei Ihrer hochherzigen Gesinnung gewiß Ihr Wunsch ist. Der jungen Mann hat für Sie nicht nur die natürliche Verehrung und Begeisterung, welche Ihr schöpferischer Genius bei wahren Künstlernaturen erzeugen muß, er hat auch in Sie das unbedingtste Vertrauen. Eine kaum überstandene und noch nachklingende psychische Erkrankung erheischt aber noch große Vorsicht und Schonung - und nach meinem Darfürhalten muß der junge Künstler noch durch 8-12 Wochen von jeder Aufregung geschützt werden und sich einer Badekur in größter Ruhe (geistiger und körperlicher) unterziehen. In diesem Sinne bitte ich auf ihn gütigst wirken zu wollen. »

Rubinstein traf am 21. April 1872 in Tribtschen ein, doch bereits am nächsten Tag verließ Wagner die Schweiz und übersiedelte nach Bayreuth. Im Juli 1872 erschien Rubinstein dann in Bayreuth und suchte Wagner in seinem Hotel auf, um ihm vorzuspielen. In den nächsten Wochen wurde Rubinstein zum ständigen Begleiter Wagners und er darf kleinere musikalische Schreibebeiten für ihn übernehmen. Er wird mit der Kopie der « Götterdämmerung » beauftragt, die Wagner an Ludwig II. schicken möchte. Das Klavierspiel Rubinsteins ist zwar technisch versiert, Wagner hegte jedoch grundsätzliche Zweifel an den Fähigkeiten jüdischer Musiker. Cosima hielt am 14. August 1872 fest :

« Wie wir über das Spiel Josef Rubinstein's sprechen, sagt Richard, es sei merkwürdig, wie die Juden eigentlich kein Thema heraushören noch spielen. »

Wenig später verließ Rubinstein Bayreuth und reiste mit einem Empfehlungsschreiben Wagners München, wo er bei Peter Cornelius Unterricht nehmen sollte. Kurzfristig änderte er jedoch seine Pläne, um jetzt bei Liszt an der Akademie in Pest zu studieren. Nach zwei Jahren im Juni 1874 kehrte Rubinstein zu Wagner nach Bayreuth zurück, wo er in der « Nibelungen-Kanzlei » nach den Anweisungen Hans Richters erneut mit Schreibearbeiten befasst war. Am 14. Oktober 1874 erhielt Rubinstein Besuch von seinem Vater Isaak aus Charkow. Er bezahlte für seinen Sohn einen Patronatsschein der Bayreuther Festspiele und wurde daraufhin in der Villa Wahnfried empfangen. Obwohl sein Vater seine enge Bindung an Wagner kritisierte, blieb Rubinstein in Bayreuth. Weihnachten 1874 verbrachte er in Wahnfried und er darf mit Cosima den Weihnachtsbaum schmücken, danach trat Rubinstein eine Konzertreise an. Im Sommer 1875 kam Rubinstein erneut nach Bayreuth, um als Solokorrepetitor bei den Vorproben für den « Ring » mitzuwirken. Er war jetzt intensiv in die Vorbereitung der Festspiele eingebunden, Rubinstein arbeitete erneut für die « Nibelungen-Kanzlei » und er besucht immer wieder die Gesangssolisten der Festspiele an ihren verschiedenen Wohnorten, um mit ihnen zu proben. Doch als die Festspiele schließlich am 13. August 1876 eröffnet wurden, ist Rubinstein nicht unter den Zuschauern, obwohl er Eintrittskarten besaß. Genau einen Monat zuvor war er nach einem Streit mit Wagner während der Probe abgereist. Bei Cosima hieß es lapidar :

« Die Klavierproben endigten mit mit vollständiger Entlassung von Herrn Rubinstein, welcher die traurigsten Eigenschaften seines Stammes hier wiederum bewährt. »

Zunächst galt Rubinstein als verschollen, in der Villa Wahnfried wurde angenommen, er habe sich das Leben genommen. Doch im Mai 1878 kehrte Rubinstein abermals nach Bayreuth zurück, nachdem er sich zuvor bereits bei Wagner für sein « Benehmen » entschuldigt hatte. Bei einem gemeinsamen Abendessen bemerkte Wagner :

« So ein Jude benimmt sich doch ganz anders wie wir Deutschen, sie wissen, ihnen gehört die Welt. »

Seit November 1878 war Rubinstein erneut für Wagner tätig, der ihn jetzt für die Vorbereitung der « Parsifal » -Premiere benötigte. Rubinstein diente Wagner als Hauspianist und blieb ständig an seiner Seite. Nur als Wagner im Januar 1880 nach Italien reiste, fuhr Rubinstein nach Berlin, um Konzerte zugunsten der Festspiele zu geben. Er spielte an sechs Abenden jeweils das gesamte « Wohltemperierte Klavier » von Johann Sebastian Bach und überwies sein Honorar an den Festspiel-Fonds. Anschließend reiste er zu Wagner nach Italien, wo dieser am « Parsifal » arbeitete und die Hilfe Rubinsteins benötigte. Während der zweiten Bayreuther Festspiele 1882 erhielt Rubinstein erneut Besuch von seinem Vater, der auch die Premiere des « Parsifal » besuchte und ihn anschließend zur Rückkehr in seine Heimat aufforderte. Rubinstein folgte jedoch abermals Wagner nach Italien, er lebte zusammen mit Cosima und den Kindern in Venedig, regelmäßig spielte er zur Unterhaltung der Familie und der Gäste Klavier, meist Teile aus den Opern Wagners. Am 22. Oktober 1882 verließ Rubinstein völlig überraschend Venedig und fuhr zu seinen Eltern nach Charkow, wo er im Februar 1883 vom Tod Wagners erfuhr. An Cosima schickte er das Telegramm :

« Gott verleihe Ihnen Kraft, die schwere Prüfung zu ertragen, gewiß Trost ist unmöglich, aber bedeutet, ein Richard

Wagner stirbt nicht, nur seine sterbliche Hülle ist abgestreift, sein himmlischer Genius strahlt desto hellerem Glanze für ewige Zeiten, Ihr inniger mitfühlender Rubinstein. »

Seit Frühjahr 1883 ging Rubinstein wieder auf Konzertreise, er trat auf mit Bearbeitungen und Fantasien nach Richard Wagner. Im August 1884 fuhr Rubinstein nach Tribtschen, wo er zwölf Jahr zuvor erstmals mit Wagner zusammengetroffen war und erschoss sich im Alter von 36 Jahren am Zürich-See. Sein Leichnam wurde nach Bayreuth überführt und auf dem Israelitischen Friedhof beigesetzt. Sein Vater ließ auf seinem Grab einen schwarzen Obelisk aufstellen.

Hermann Levi

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hermann Levi est né le 7 novembre 1839 à Gießen, en Allemagne, et est mort le 13 mai 1900 à Garmisch-Partenkirchen, en Autriche.

De confession juive, fils du rabbin Benedikt Levi, Hermann est éduqué à Gießen et à Mannheim, avant d'être remarqué par Vinzenz Lachner. De 1855 à 1858, il étudie au Conservatoire de Leipzig et, après une série de voyages qui le mènent à Paris, il obtient son 1er poste comme directeur musical à Sarrebruck, puis à Mannheim en 1861. De 1862 à 1864, il est chef principal à l'Opéra allemand de Rotterdam, puis à Karlsruhe jusqu'en 1872, date où il part pour l'Opéra d'État de Bavière à Munich, poste qu'il va conserver jusqu'en 1896 alors que des problèmes de santé l'obligent à mettre un terme à ses activités. Il visitera Londres en 1895. Il va mourir à Munich le 13 mai 1900. Il sera inhumé, plus tard durant la même année, dans un Mausolée érigé sur le terrain de sa Villa de Garmisch-Partenkirchen.

Hermann Levi, d'abord proche du compositeur Johannes Brahms et de ses conceptions musicales, s'est progressivement rapproché de Richard Wagner et de sa famille. Il a joué un grand rôle dans l'appréciation du public pour la musique de Wagner, dont il fut un proche (et ceci malgré l'antisémitisme affiché de Wagner) . Bien que Wagner lui eût demandé sans succès de se convertir pour diriger « Parsifal » (Opéra « chrétien » par excellence, aux yeux du compositeur) , c'est bien lui qui en dirigea la première à Bayreuth en 1882. Il fut aussi un ami d'Anton Bruckner, et contribua largement au succès de sa 7e Symphonie en la dirigeant à Munich, en 1885, après sa création à Leipzig, en 1884, sous la baguette du chef Arthur Nikisch.

...

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur allemand Hermann Levi étudia la musique avec Vinzenz Lachner à Mannheim (1852-1855) , puis avec Gerhart Hauptmann et Julius Rietz au Conservatoire de Leipzig (1855-1858) . Il fut directeur de la musique à Sarrebruck (1859-1861) , chef d'orchestre à l'Opéra de Rotterdam (1861-1864) , chef d'orchestre de la Cour à Karlsruhe (1864-1872) , puis à Munich (1872-1890) , où il fut nommé en 1894 directeur général de la musique. Il dirigea la première de « Parsifal » à Bayreuth, en 1882, et fut aussi l'ami de Johannes Brahms.

...

The German Jewish orchestral conductor Hermann Levi was born on 7 November 1839 in the Hessian town of Gießen, in Germany, and died on 13 May 1900 in Munich.

Son of a rabbi, Levi was educated at Gießen and Mannheim, and came to Vincenz Lachner's notice. From 1855 to 1858, he studied at the Leipzig « Konservatorium » , and after a series of travels which took him to Paris, he obtained his 1st post as music-director at Saarbrücken, which post he exchanged for that at Mannheim, in 1861. From 1862 to 1864, he was chief conductor of the German Opera in Rotterdam, then till 1872 at Karlsruhe, when he went to Munich, a post he held until 1896, when ill-health compelled him to resign. Levi also taught at the Leipzig Conservatory where one of his pupils was conductor Emil Steinbach.

Levi's name is indissolubly connected with the increased public appreciation of Richard Wagner's music. A longtime friend of Wagner, he conducted the 1st performance of « Parsifal » at Bayreuth, in 1882, and was connected with the musical life of that place during the remainder of his career. He visited London in 1895.

Late in 1900, he was interred in a Mausoleum in the grounds of his Villa, in Garmisch-Partenkirchen.

During his early years, Levi also worked as a composer. His 1st Opus number was a Piano Concerto published in Paris, besides which he also wrote a Violin Sonata.

...

As the author of one of the most infamous anti-Semitic tracts in music history, Richard Wagner seemingly contradicted himself by having hand-picked Hermann Levi, the son of a rabbi, to conduct the premiere of his last and most « Christian » Opera « Parsifal » . As mentioned, his father was a rabbi who had sent him for education at the Mannheim « Gymnasium » where he had music lessons with Vincenz Lachner.

He showed signs of musical talent and was given musical studies. He entered the Leipzig Conservatory in 1855, remaining there until 1858. His teachers there were Gerhart Hauptmann and Julius Reitz. He studied briefly in Paris and embarked on his 1st permanent job as music-director in Saarbrücken, in 1859. This put him firmly on the traditional path for a budding conductor in Central Europe. He was musical director in Saarbrücken, assistant- « Kapellmeister » of the Mannheim National Opera, « Kapellmeister » of the Rotterdam Opera, and « Hofkapellmeister » in Karlsruhe, all in about 13 years. In Karlsruhe, he became a friend of Clara Schumann, who lived in nearby Baden-Baden and led a distinguished performance of Robert Schumann's difficult stage work « Genoveva » , in 1869.

In 1872, he was appointed « Hofkapellmeister » in Munich. Levi had gained a reputation as an adherent of Johannes Brahms in the divisive, press-fuelled feud between Brahms' supporters and Wagner. Levi's accepting a position in Munich was suspect, for Munich was the capital of King Ludwig II of Bavaria, Wagner's great royal patron. A conductor there would be expected to champion Wagner. When Levi began doing just that, Brahms, to put it bluntly, began to suspect that Levi had in some way been « bought » . As a result, he severed their once cordial friendship and refused to talk to him. Hans Richter retained his position in Munich, until 1890. He continued to conduct Brahms, led some important performances of Mozart Operas and, above all, was one of the leaders (with Hans Richter) in spreading Wagner's late works throughout Europe. When Wagner appointed Levi to prepare and conduct the world premiere of « Parsifal » , his last music-drama, anti-Semitic opposition grew. « Parsifal » is based on the legend of the Holy Grail and has as its central symbols the spear that pierced Christ's side on the cross and the cup in which the 1st communion was served. Accordingly, the Opera has always been considered by many as a « Christian » work. (In fact, its religious content is strangely pagan and mystical, with some connection to Buddhism in that « Parsifal » has to gain knowledge and compassion for all to attain the enlightenment that will allow him to save the Grail Knights.) This appointment of Levi is a central argument by his supporters to deny that Wagner was actually anti-Semitic, despite the nasty things he wrote about Jews, in general. It can just as easily be taken as proof that Wagner was willing to set aside any of principles once he recognized what was best for himself. And Levi, a conductor whose performances were known for a strongly spiritual quality, was the man for the job. In fact, once Wagner had obtained Levi's agreement to undertake « Parsifal » , Wagner attempted to get the conductor to convert to Christianity, at least to the extent of accepting a token baptism. Levi refused, but Wagner did not give-up. He showed Levi an anonymous letter, attacking Wagner for permitting Levi to conduct the sacred Christian music-drama. The letter also scurrilously suggested that Levi had become the lover of Wagner's wife, Cosima. The composer evidently hoped that Levi would convert in order to spare Wagner any more such criticism, a move that offended Levi, who asked to be released from his commitment. At this point, King Ludwig, who admired Levi, insisted that Wagner patch-up things with the conductor and thus Levi led the premiere on July 25, 1882, less than a year before Wagner's death. He remained the sole conductor of « Parsifal » (which, for years, was only given in Bayreuth) until 1894, except in the year 1888, when Cosima replaced him with Felix Mottl. Levi was noted for the simplicity and directness of his beat and his eschewing of extravagant gestures. He was somewhat erratic and could lead a performance of transcendent, unearthly spirituality one night and the next fail entirely to take-off. He retired from conducting, in 1894, and later appearances, rare because he was already ill and suffering from a nervous disorder, were largely unsuccessful.

...

Hermann Levi (geboren 7. November 1839 in Gießen ; gestorben 13. Mai 1900 in München) war ein deutscher Orchesterdirigent und Komponist.

Vater : Doktor Benedikt Levi (1806-1899) , Landesrabbiner.

Mutter : Henriette Mayer (1807-1842) .

Ausbildung bei Hofkapellmeister Vinzenz Lachner in Mannheim.

1855-1858 : Studium der Musik am Konservatorium Leipzig.

1859-1861 : Musikdirektor in Saarbrücken.

1861 : Wechsel nach Mannheim.

1862-1864 : Chefdirigent der Deutschen Oper in Rotterdam.

1864-1872 : Dirigent am Hoftheater in Karlsruhe ; Kontakt zu Johannes Brahms.

1872-1896 : Generalmusikdirektor und Hofkapellmeister am Hof- und Nationaltheater in München.

Juli 1882 : Dirigent der Uraufführung des Parsifal in Bayreuth.

Hermann Levi war der Sohn des hessischen Landesrabbiners Benedikt Levi und Henriette Mayer (1807-1842) . Seine Mutter entstammte der bekannten Tabakfabrikanten-Familie Mayer in Mannheim. Seine Urgroßväter mütterlicherseits waren der kurpfälzische Hoffaktor Gottschalk Mayer und der Mannheimer Bankhaus-Gründer Wolf Hajum Ladenburg. Sein Großvater väterlicherseits war der Wormser Rabbiner Samuel Levi, ein Sohn des Rabbiners Wolf Levi in Pfersee bei Augsburg.

Sein Bruder war der Bankprokurist Wilhelm Levi des Bankhauses Ladenburg, der sich später Wilhelm Lindeck nannte und Vermögensverwalter des Komponisten Johannes Brahms wurde.

Hermann Levi heiratete 1895 Mary Fiedler geborene Meyer (1854-1919) , eine Tochter des Kunsthistorikers Julius Meyer und Witwe des Kunsthistorikers Konrad Fiedler (1841-1895) .

Hermann Levi wuchs in Gießen auf. In Mannheim absolvierte er bei Hofkapellmeister Vinzenz Lachner eine Art musikalische Lehre. Von 1855 bis 1858 studierte er am Leipziger Konservatorium. Nach Reisen unter anderem nach Paris übernahm er den Posten des Musikdirektors in Saarbrücken und wechselte 1861 nach Mannheim. Von 1862 bis 1864 war er Chefdirigent der Deutschen Oper in Rotterdam, anschließend bis 1872 am Großherzoglichen Hoftheater Karlsruhe, wo er kurz vor dem deutsch-französischen Krieg 1870-1871 Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg dirigierte. Dort stand er in freundschaftlicher Verbindung zu Johannes Brahms (die allerdings Mitte der 1870er Jahre zerbrach) und Clara Schumann. Ab 1872 amtierte er als Generalmusikdirektor und Hofkapellmeister am Königlichen Hof- und Nationaltheater in München, bis er sich 1896 aus gesundheitlichen Gründen zurückzog und in Partenkirchen niederließ. 1872 wurde er Mitglied der Zwanglosen Gesellschaft München, der er bis zu seinem Tode angehörte.

Auf dem Höhepunkt seiner Laufbahn dirigierte Levi im Juli 1882 die Uraufführung des Parsifal in Bayreuth. Obwohl aus bedeutenden jüdischen Familien stammend, war Levi in die christliche Mythenwelt Wagners hineingewachsen und seit 1871 mit dem Komponisten freundschaftlich verbunden. Wagner selbst wies Kritik, sein « heiligstes » Werk nicht von einem Juden dirigieren zu lassen, entschieden zurück. Jedoch stand immer die Forderung Wagners an Levi, sich taufen zu lassen, im Raum. Dieser Erwartung entsprach Levi bei aller Verehrung Wagners zwar nie, der äußere und vor allem innere Konflikt belastete ihn jedoch sehr, wie Levis Schüler Felix Weingartner sich erinnerte. Auch nach Wagners Tod 1883 blieb Levi bis 1894 der « Major » und die rechte Hand der Witwe Cosima Wagner bei der Leitung der Bayreuther Festspiele. Der anhaltende Erfolg der Musik Richard Wagners nach dessen Tod ist eng mit Levis Namen verknüpft. Anfeindungen aus antisemitischen Kreisen belasteten seine ansonsten glanzvolle Karriere.

Levi führte den « Mozart-Zyklus » in das deutsche Opernrepertoire ein. Er übersetzte selbst die Libretti von Lorenzo da Ponte zu Mozarts Opern Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Giovanni und Così fan tutte ins Deutsche. Diese Übersetzungen erfreuen sich bis heute großer Beliebtheit und haben sich gegen andere Übersetzungsversuche durchgesetzt ; viele Formulierungen daraus wurden geflügelte Worte (« “ Reich ” mir die Hand, mein Leben ») . Ein Umstand, der die Nationalsozialisten in Verlegenheit bringen sollte : Einerseits sollten Opern nur in deutscher Sprache aufgeführt werden, und andererseits war das Libretto des konvertierten Juden da Ponte auch noch von einem weiteren Juden, nämlich Levi, übersetzt worden.

Levi verfolgte in jungen Jahren zunächst eine Karriere als Komponist : In Paris entstand als sein Opus I ein an Schumann orientiertes Klavierkonzert in A-Moll, das vom Gewandhausorchester Leipzig uraufgeführt wurde, außerdem eine Symphonie, eine Violinsonate, Klavier- und Kammermusik sowie verschiedene Liedvertonungen. Nach einer harschen Kritik von Brahms an seinen Werken gab Levi jedoch diesen Teil seiner musikalischen Tätigkeit trotz großer Erfolge auf und vernichtete alle Manuskripte. Erhalten geblieben sind lediglich die im Druck erschienenen Werke, zwei Liederzyklen und die Solostimme des Klavierkonzerts. Das verloren geglaubte Orchestermaterial des Klavierkonzerts wurde vom Pianisten und Dirigenten Martin Wettges in der Universitätsbibliothek Zürich wiederentdeckt. Er rekonstruierte daraus die Partitur und führte das Werk am 1. Juni 2008 wieder auf (Christian Schröder, Begleitheft zu einer Aufführung des Klavierkonzerts am 4. Februar 2014 in Gießen) .

Im Gießener Musikerviertel ist eine Straße nach ihm benannt.

...

Kapellmeister Hermann Levi dirigierte die Meistersinger und den Parsifal, war häufiger Gast in Bayreuth. Doch der Antisemitismus des Wagner-Clans traf ihn schwer. Garmisch-Partenkirchen will seinem in der NS-Zeit geächteten Ehrenbürger jetzt wieder eine Straße widmen.

Im Winkel eines großen Grundstücks in Garmisch-Partenkirchen liegt unter einer roh gezimmerten Holzabdeckung, die vor den danebenlagernden Baumaterialien schützen soll, eine laubbedeckte Grabplatte für « Hermann Levi. Königlich Bayerischer Hofkapellmeister. 1839-1900 » . Er war Ehrenbürger von Garmisch-Partenkirchen, hatte postum der Straße, die am Grundstück vorbeiführte, den Namen gegeben. Doch nach Hitlers « Machtergreifung » wurde das im Garten seiner Villa errichtete Mausoleum verwüstet und die Straße umbenannt. Hermann Levi war einst ein gefeierter Wagner-Dirigent. « Zuerst muß ich sagen, daß Levis Orchester Wagner zu Wagner macht. Bei einer solchen fast überirdischen Schönheit der Wiedergabe ist die Wirkung kein Wunder » , schrieb eine Chronistin der Zeit, Henriette Feuerbach.

Nun hat Wagner alles getan, einer von seiner Musik hingerissenen Welt seine gesellschaftspolitischen Vorstellungen zu predigen : von einer judenfreien, vegetarischen, nach Süden gewanderten Menschheit. Für Juden sieht Wagner in « Das Judentum in der Musik » von 1869 nur einen Ausweg « von dem auf (ihnen) lastenden Fluche » - « die Erlösung Ahasver's - der Untergang ! » . Der Fluch fiel, wie in seinen Opern, auf ihn zurück und belastet sein Werk und seine Familie bis heute. Im Jubiläumsjahr 2013, zweihundert Jahre nach Wagners Geburt, wird sein Werk in Israel nicht öffentlich aufgeführt, während die Erben peinlich darauf achten, jede Assoziation mit Nazisymbolik zu vermeiden.

Und doch hat der Judenfeind die Uraufführung seiner letzten Oper, in deren Mittelpunkt die christliche Taufe steht, dem jüdischen Dirigenten Hermann Levi anvertraut. Eine künstlerisch produktive, menschlich fragwürdige Beziehung.

Hermann Levi wird 1839 als drittes Kind des liberalen Landesrabbiners von Gießen im Großherzogtum Hessen geboren. Früh als Hochbegabung erkannt, findet Levi in Vinzenz Lachner, dem Mannheimer Hofkapellmeister, einen verständnisvollen Lehrer und Förderer, der ihm mit 21 Jahren zu seiner ersten Dirigentenstelle verhilft. 1864 dirigiert Levi bereits in Karlsruhe, wo er die verwitwete Clara Schumann und den jungen Johannes Brahms kennenlernt, dessen Duzfreund er wird. Levi ist ein Mann der Moderne, der Schumann, Berlioz und seinen Freund Brahms durchsetzen hilft, später auch Georges Bizet, Emmanuel Chabrier, Pietro Mascagni, Giuseppe Verdi, Peter Tschaikowski und Richard Strauß.

Kurz vor dem deutsch-französischen Krieg 1870-1871, in dem er als Sanitäter dient, kann Levi in Karlsruhe die « Meistersinger » dirigieren - die dortige Erstaufführung eines revolutionären, an Sänger und Orchester ungewohnte Anforderungen stellenden Werks. Und zwar so gut, daß sich Wagner schriftlich dafür bedankt.

1873 wird er, mit nur dreiunddreißig Jahren, von Ludwig II. in München zum « Königlich-Bayerischen Hofkapellmeister » ernannt. Die Religion seines Dirigenten kümmert den großen Kunstmäzen nicht. Er war bereit, für Richard Wagner den finanziellen und politischen Ruin zu riskieren, doch den von diesem geforderten Antisemitismus lehnt der Monarch als « unköniglich » ab.

Levi wird in München ein wichtiger künstlerischer Impulsgeber. Er führt « Manfred » von Schumann zum Erfolg, und leitet stilgerechte Aufführungen von Mozarts drei Da-Ponte-Opern auf der Rokoko-Bühne des Cuvillé-Theaters.

...

Die Così-Vorstellung ist so gelungen, daß Levi seinen Freund Brahms dazu einlädt. Doch der bleibt nur einen Tag, bevor er sich mit ihm überwirft. Gegenstand des Streits : Levis zunehmende « Wagneritis » . Die führt 1880 auch zum Bruch mit seinem Lehrer Vinzenz Lachner :

« Ich sehe Dich, einen der berufensten Priester der Kunst, für immer an eine Sache geschmiedet, die ich als eine Krankheit, ja als ein Nationalunglück ansehen muß. »

Die Trennung ist für Levi « die schmerzlichste Erfahrung meines ganzen Lebens » . Ohne von seiner Wagner-Verehrung ablassen zu wollen. 1875 besucht er Bayreuth und zeigt sich in einem Brief an seinen Vater « ganz überwältigt vom Eindruck der Werke, des Hauses und der Aufführung. Gerade ich, der ich auf großen Umwegen und nach vielen inneren Kämpfen Wagnerianer geworden bin, habe vielleicht ein freieres Urteil. » Doch « Wagnerianer » , schreibt Levi, sei ein « dummes Wort » . « Man versteht eigentlich nur die Radikalen darunter, zu denen ich nie gehören werde. »

Als Wagner 1879 den « Parsifal » abschließt, und von Ludwig II. das Münchener Orchester samt seinem Chefdirigenten Levi zur Uraufführung angeboten bekommt, sieht er nur ein Hindernis :

« Ungetauft darf er den " Parsifal " nicht dirigieren. »

Levi war Wagner, wie er an einen Freund schrieb, « mit Leib und Seele verfallen » , doch zu dem von seinem Idol geforderten Religionswechsel hat er sich nicht durchringen können. Levi ist trotz der oft bössartigen Sticheleien und Attacken nie Christ geworden. Als er nach einem besonders unschönen Angriff um Entpflchtung ersucht und abreist, schickt ihm Wagner ein Telegramm nach : « Um Gotteswillen, kehren Sie sogleich um und lernen Sie uns endlich ordentlich kennen ! » . Und Levi kommt zurück.

Von da an gehen die Wahrnehmung Levis und die Beobachtung Außenstehender zunehmend auseinander. Während Levi nicht müde wird, seinem Vater, dem Rabbiner, die « Güte » und « Freundlichkeit » der Wagners ihm gegenüber zu betonen, fallen anderen die fürchterlichen Verrenkungen auf, zu denen man ihn dort zwingt :

« Es war ein fortwährendes seelisches und körperliches Sich-Verbeugen, das mich peinlich berührte, da ich Levi, den großen Künstler und freigiebigen Menschen, von dieser Seite nicht kannte » , erinnerte sich etwa Levis Meisterschüler Felix Weingartner.

Letztlich ist Levis Position, als Musiker, der von Wagner fasziniert ist, und als Jude, der von eben diesem Wagner, trotz Sympathie und Anerkennung seiner überragenden Dirigierbegabung, als Mensch zweiter Klasse betrachtet und behandelt wird, unhaltbar und selbstzerstörerisch. Auch die von Wagner geforderte Taufe hätte daran nichts geändert. Der Begriff « Antisemitismus » für Feindschaft gegen Menschen jüdischer Abstammung, im Unterschied zur Ablehnung der jüdischen Religion, ist genau damals, um 1880, aufgekommen und durch die Parteinahme einer so bedeutenden Persönlichkeit wie Wagner geädelt worden.

Als Wagner 1883 stirbt, ist Levi einer der Sargträger. Er setzt sich tatkräftig dafür ein, daß die Festspiele unter Cosima Wagners Leitung weiter geführt werden und dirigiert dort nach wie vor seinen « Parsifal » . Doch die « Clique der Radikalen » , der er nun als Mitglied des innersten Wagner-Zirkels angehört, tut alles, ihm die Mitgliedschaft schwer und immer schwerer zu machen. Die Erinnerungen des ihm beigeordneten Chordirektors tragen den Titel « Der Kampf zweier Welten um das Bayreuther Erbe » . Houston Stewart Chamberlain, der neue Vordenker des Wagnerkults, ist einer der wichtigsten Popularisierer des Rassismus.

1888 setzt Levi zum ersten Mal in Bayreuth aus, 1894 gibt er auf. In München dirigiert er weiter. Doch zwei Jahre später lässt er sich pensionieren. Er ist gesundheitlich und nervlich am Ende. Ein kurzes Glück : 1896 heiratet Levi die Witwe seines besten Freundes. In den dreieinhalb Jahren, die ihm bleiben, erstellt er eine sorgfältig der Musik angepasste deutsche Übersetzung von Mozarts drei Da-Ponte-Opern, die bis heute benutzt wird. Anfang 1900, er ist keine 61 Jahre alt, bricht er zusammen. Nervöse Erschöpfung. Levis letzter Wunsch : noch einmal Cosima Wagner sehen. Dazu ist es nicht gekommen. Zur Beerdigung schickt sie einen Kranz und den Geschäftsführer.

Garmisch-Partenkirchen, immerhin, soll von diesem Sommer an, zum 115-jährigen Jubiläum der Verleihung der Ehrenbürgerschaft, wieder eine Hermann-Levi-Straße aufweisen.

Article nécrologique : Journal L'Art Moderne de Paris (n° 7)

(Dimanche, 18 février 1883.)

La mort vient d'apporter à l'illustre compositeur la solennelle consécration qui, seule, manquait à sa gloire. Wagner est tombé en héros, dans la mêlée. Le sort n'a pas voulu que la sénilité affaiblît l'éclat de sa lumineuse carrière. Il a triomphalement gravité les degrés qui mènent à l'imortalité et, parvenu au sommet, sans s'arrêter ni contempler la route parcourue, sans que l'affaiblissement progressif de ses forces créatrices courbât vers la terre son front qu'il levait orgueilleusement, il est entré d'un pas ferme dans la région sereine de l'éternelle renommée.

Sa fin est une apothéose. Et la marche funèbre qui accompagnera sa dépouille, de Venise à Bayreuth, éclatera comme un hymne triomphal.

Que les fanfares retentissent et que les tambours résonnent ! Ce n'est pas un mort que nous pleurons, c'est un héros qui pénètre, vainqueur, dans le Panthéon du souvenir.

Il a dignement et glorieusement rempli sa vie. Il a joui du bonheur bien rare d'assister à l'épanouissement complet de son génie, au triomphe des idées pour lesquelles il a lutté et des principes qu'il a défendus sans trêve, ni défiance. Il a pressenti l'influence qu'exercerait son art dans l'avenir des générations. Est-il de plus belle récompense ?

Qu'ajoutent au tableau superbe de cette carrière victorieuse les regrets que fait naître la chute du vaillant lutteur ? Dans le cimetière de Scutari, la plus vaste nécropole du monde, on n'inscrit sur les tombes que le nom des morts. Toute louange est rigoureusement bannie des pierres lumineuses. Le nom de Richard Wagner suffit à le faire vivre de la grande vie qui plane au-dessus des querelles et des rancunes. De même que le peuple de Lacédémone fit taire celui qui s'offrit à prononcer le panégyrique d'Hercule et lui dit : « Qui pourrait blâmer le héros ? » inclinons-nous, silencieux, devant la tombe du grand homme. Loin de nous attendrir sur la catastrophe, félicitons notre siècle d'avoir assisté à l'écllosion d'un génie indépendant et libre, d'une des gloires qui illustrent l'histoire des arts.

Que les fanfares retentissent et que les tambours résonnent !

Au jour des funérailles, les créations gigantesques de Wagner formeront dans la mémoire de la foule, un imposant cortège. « Lohengrin » et Elsa. « Tannhäuser » et Elisabeth. « Tristan und Isolde ». Walter et Éva, Siegfried et Brunnhilde. « Parsifal » et Kundry, divinités et héros qui peuplent son œuvre, marchez à la suite du char funèbre. Le génie d'un homme vous a animés d'un souffle épique. Son âme a passé dans votre être ; vous êtes l'incarnation de sa pensée, le produit de ses prodigieuses ressources intellectuelles. Mieux que les discours, mieux que les panégyriques, vous chanterez la gloire du défunt.

Il revient à Cosima d'avoir maintenu l'existence du Festival de Bayreuth, dont seules 2 sessions exceptionnelles avaient eu lieu en 1876 et en 1882. Aidée par son fils Siegfried et pour les aspects financiers par Adolf von Groß, elle le dirige jusqu'en 1911 et en fait le lieu de la célébration du culte de son défunt mari, dans une orientation résolument conservatrice, refusant par exemple jusqu'à sa mort tout changement dans la mise-en-scène, les décors et les costumes de la création de « Parsifal » .

Winnifred Wagner déclare à son propos : « Elle était toujours, malgré ses 77 ans, un personnage tout en grandeur, qui inspirait le respect. De sa voix mélodieuse, un peu grave, elle ne manquait jamais de m'adresser quelques mots aimables quand nous allions la saluer à notre arrivée ou au moment de nous retirer. Par la suite, j'ai vécu 15 ans sous le même toit qu'elle, et nos relations étaient aussi bonnes que possible : il n'y a jamais eu le moindre malentendu entre nous. Elle avait la fibre pédagogique (et c'était très marqué) ; c'est ce qui l'incita à parfaire mon éducation durant la 1^{re} année de mon mariage. Cosima a salué avec joie la naissance de nos 4 enfants et a suivi leur croissance en tant que grand-mère attentive. » .

Cosima Wagner meurt le 1^{er} avril 1930 à l'âge de 92 ans, soit 47 ans après Richard et la même année que son fils Siegfried. Elle est enterrée aux côtés de Richard Wagner dans le jardin de la Villa « Wahnfried » .

...

Wagner est mort sans réaliser la régénération artistique et sociale dont il avait toujours rêvé. L'inévitable déperdition de l'idéal dans le passage concret à la scène (« après avoir inventé l'Orchestre invisible, j'aimerais inventer aussi le théâtre invisible » , se plaignit-il en 1878 à Cosima) , l'incompréhension des adversaires mais aussi des enthousiastes, la nécessité du soutien de la bourgeoisie moderne et des pouvoirs anciens, tout cela ne pouvait susciter que de l'amertume, ou des espérances qui ne se réaliseraient, peut-être, qu'à titre posthume. À sa mort, Wagner laisse derrière lui une institution extrêmement fragile, et il faudra toute la ténacité de Cosima pour sauver l'entreprise et la porter. C'est à Venise, au milieu des beautés éternelles de cette cité, que Wagner choisit de mourir, retiré du monde et concentré sur lui-même. 10 ans plus tôt, Friedrich Nietzsche avait déjà surpris chez celui qui était encore son ami quelque chose qu'il rapportera dans sa « 4^e Considération inactuelle » , et qui doit nous donner à réfléchir :

« Lorsqu'en ce jour de mai 1872, la première pierre eut été posée sur la colline de Bayreuth, par une pluie battante et sous un ciel assombri, Wagner regagna la ville en voiture avec quelques-uns d'entre nous ; il gardait le silence et regardait longuement en lui-même, d'un regard qu'aucun mot ne saurait décrire. Mais ce que Wagner, ce jour-là, contemplait intérieurement (comment il est devenu ce qu'il est, ce qu'il sera) , nous pouvons le suivre avec lui, nous ses proches, jusqu'à un certain point : et seul ce regard wagnérien nous permettra de comprendre son haut fait - afin que forts de cette compréhension nous nous portions garants de sa fécondité. »

Ce que Nietzsche, dans « Nietzsche contre Wagner » , a saisi à la pointe de l'aphorisme pourrait être représentatif, rétrospectivement, de 130 ans de réception wagnérienne en Allemagne et en France : voie royale et voies de traverse ; rayonnement international et enfermement national ; histoire d'une « bonne » et d'une « mauvaise » réception. Le processus engagé dans l'Allemagne Impériale, du vivant même de Wagner, et qui prendra des formes absurdes après sa mort, conduira finalement, sous le 3^e « Reich », à l'échec désastreux d'une image dont le compositeur allemand souffre encore aujourd'hui dans l'opinion publique. Il aura fallu, pendant des décennies, les efforts d'une lente réhabilitation pour arracher Wagner à la barbarie nazie et ouvrir au fur et à mesure la voie à l'image, affranchie de toute idéologie suspecte, de l'artiste international par excellence du XIX^e siècle, tel que Wagner était déjà perçu en France autour de 1900.

Après 1871, l'Allemagne a construit de Wagner l'image d'un « compositeur national », nouveau fondateur de mythes germaniques, représentant culturel principal du nouveau « Reich ». En France, Wagner fut reconnu, avec beaucoup plus de clairvoyance, comme ce qu'il incarnait vraiment : symbole et fer-de-lance de l'avant-garde artistique. Le contraste ne saurait être plus grand, et l'interprétation nourrie par l'Empire allemand n'aurait pu être plus fatale.

Cette constatation n'enlève rien au fait que c'est par l'un de ses contemporains allemands que Wagner aura le mieux été percé à jour, disséqué et compris comme personne d'autre avant et après lui : Friedrich Nietzsche, l'apostat le plus clairvoyant du cas Wagner, en a senti et saisi toutes les facettes, les grandeurs et les abîmes, les beautés, les conquêtes et les dangers, tandis que commençait autour de lui « l'extirpation de l'esprit allemand au profit du Reich allemand » (« Ire Considération inactuelle »), et que l'on creusait les tranchées d'une interprétation nationale bornée. Mais Nietzsche, comme Wagner et selon ses propres mots, ne fut lui-même « qu'un simple malentendu » parmi les Allemands, et l'acuité de ses analyses ne put empêcher la réception « officielle » allemande de prendre un chemin tout à fait contraire.

La réception allemande de Wagner est le miroir de l'histoire du pays depuis la fin du XIX^e siècle. Tout ce que l'Allemagne a connu de hauts et de bas, de développements et de ruptures, se reflète dans la réception de l'art et de la pensée du compositeur, dans l'histoire du Festival de Bayreuth et au sein de la famille Wagner. La confrontation de l'Allemagne avec Wagner a toujours été le sismographe de la situation nationale, et se réclamer de lui aura toujours été le moyen d'invoquer le meilleur ou le pire de la germanité.

La réception wagnérienne sous l'Empire allemand, malgré l'apparence rétrospective de son unité, a été en réalité un Janus aux 2 visages : le Festival de Bayreuth est l'histoire d'une carrière à succès, et autour de 1900, l'œuvre de Wagner a été très largement diffusée dans les maisons d'Opéra. D'un autre côté, dans les années 1870, celui-ci ne s'est imposé qu'à travers d'âpres conflits entre les partisans de la « musique de l'avenir » et les « conservateurs ». La bourgeoisie allemande qui, certes, raffolait du 1^{er} Acte de « la Walkyrie » trouvait le second inutilement long, et manqua ainsi l'essence intime de la tétralogie : le moment « schopenhauerien » de Wotan, le savoir compassionnel de Brünnhilde. Le bourgeois cultivé pouvait voir dans le « Ring » l'affirmation de sa propre germanité, et dans le mythe des « Nibelungen » l'origine même de cette histoire allemande qui trouvait son accomplissement téléologique dans la réalisation de l'unité nationale en 1871 - c'était passer fondamentalement à côté du sens et de la portée de cette parabole de l'effondrement d'un monde corrompu par le pouvoir. Et pourtant, le « Reich » n'a jamais cru bon d'assumer le patronage du Festival et a laissé au royaume de Bavière le soin de cette tâche. L'État allemand laisse ainsi s'installer un vide politique qu'Adolf Hitler s'empressera de remplir.

Après la mort de Wagner, la direction du Festival de Bayreuth qui (tant du point de vue des personnes que de la conception) ne tenait plus qu'à un fil, fut reprise par Cosima Wagner ; après une phase de deuil qui l'a un temps paralysée, c'est avec détermination qu'elle sauva le Festival de la ruine qui le menaçait pendant les années 1880 pour en faire, à partir des années 1890, un succès artistique et économique au rayonnement international stupéfiant (en 1891, 42,5 % des spectateurs de Bayreuth étaient issus de pays non germanophones) . Le Festival est alors devenu (et il l'est toujours) l'épicentre, non seulement allemand mais international, de la tradition wagnérienne, Cette étrange dichotomie (une sorte d'institution « nationale » qui pourtant, dès le départ, a joui d'une importante dimension internationale et s'est même tournée explicitement vers un public étranger) traverse l'histoire de Bayreuth jusqu'à aujourd'hui, malgré des moments de rupture massive.

Winnifred Wagner

Winnifred Wagner, née Winnifred Williams Klindworth le 23 juin 1897 à Hastings (Grande-Bretagne) et morte le 5 mars 1980 à Überlingen (Allemagne) , est la belle-fille de Richard Wagner. Elle fut notamment directrice du Festival de Bayreuth et amie personnelle d'Adolf Hitler.

Winnifred Williams naît le 23 juin 1897 à Hastings (Grande-Bretagne) . Son père, John Williams, est un journaliste gallois et sa mère, Emily Florence Karop, une actrice. Elle perd ses parents avant l'âge de 2 ans et est élevée dans différents orphelinats après avoir été transbahutée entre sa grand-mère en Grande-Bretagne et chez des cousins éloignés en Allemagne.

À l'âge de 9 ans, suite à une maladie, elle est adoptée par une lointaine cousine de sa mère, Henrietta Karop, et son mari Karl Klindworth, un musicien ami de Richard Wagner. Ils habitent Oranienburg puis la banlieue de Berlin. La désormais Winnifred Klindworth étudie à partir de 1913 au lycée de l'école navale d'Augusta.

Elle rencontre Siegfried Wagner, fils de Richard Wagner au Festival de Bayreuth, à l'été 1914, alors que son père adoptif l'y emmène pour assister aux répétitions générales. Il a 45 ans, elle en a 17. Elle fait aussi connaissance avec sa mère Cosima Wagner (ancienne directrice du Festival) , et déclare à son propos : « Elle était toujours, malgré ses 77 ans, un personnage tout en grandeur, qui inspirait le respect. De sa voix mélodieuse, un peu grave, elle ne manquait jamais de m'adresser quelques mots aimables quand nous allions la saluer à notre arrivée ou au moment de nous retirer. » .

Le couple se marie 1 an plus tard, le 22 septembre 1915. De leur union naîtront 4 enfants : Wieland (1917-1966) , Friedelind (1918-1991) , Wolfgang (1919-2010) et Verena (née en 1920) .

En 1929, Winnifred Wagner adhère au Parti National-Socialiste. En 1923, elle rencontre pour la Ire fois Adolf Hitler, qui admire la musique de Richard Wagner. Alors que Hitler était en prison suite à sa tentative de coup d'État manqué à Munich, elle lui fait parvenir le papier sur lequel il écrit « Mein Kampf » . À la fin des années 1930, elle est la traductrice personnelle d'Hitler pendant les négociations de traités avec l'Angleterre. Ce dernier est également un hôte fréquent de son ménage, au point que les enfants le connaissaient comme « l'oncle Wolf » .

Après la mort de son époux, en 1930, Winnifred Wagner dirige le prestigieux Festival de Bayreuth, jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Elle ne peut néanmoins conserver le poste de directrice et épouser un autre homme, comme le stipule le testament de Siegfried : certains historiens ont ainsi pu spéculer sur une éventuelle liaison avec Adolf Hitler contre les conséquences de laquelle Siegfried Wagner se serait prémuni en couchant sur papier des dispositions quant à l'accession de son épouse à la tête du Festival.

Elle en fait un haut lieu du Nazisme culturel, où se produisent des artistes comme Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Karl Böhm, Richard Strauß le baryton et SS Rudolf Bockelmann, chanteur favori du « Führer », tandis que des musiciens opposés au régime comme Arturo Toscanini cessèrent d'y apparaître. Néanmoins, si l'amitié qui unit la directrice du Festival et le Chancelier est une évidence et que ce dernier en fait un rendez-vous mondain du régime, le fait que le National-Socialisme ait eu une incidence décisive sur la nature du Festival est un point plus ambigu. Ainsi, Winnifred Wagner déclare :

« Les faits sont les suivants. Il est de notoriété publique que, durant sa jeunesse, Hitler s'était familiarisé avec les œuvres de Wagner à l'Opéra de Linz et qu'il en était résulté chez lui une passion qui ne fit que s'accroître au cours des années passées à Vienne, années au cours desquelles il manqua rarement une représentation de Wagner à l'Opéra National. À l'automne 1923, cet enthousiasme conduisit Hitler à pénétrer pour la première fois dans notre maison, ce qui fut à l'origine de notre longue amitié. En 1925, Hitler fut à nouveau invité au festival par Edwin Bechstein et son épouse. À cette époque déjà, sa présence irritait de nombreux esprits. Aussi lorsqu'il quitta Bayreuth, Hitler me promit-il d'y revenir seulement lorsqu'il ne risquerait plus de porter préjudice à l'entreprise, et qu'au contraire il aurait l'espoir de pouvoir lui être utile. Il respecta cette décision jusqu'en 1933, date à laquelle il devint un habitué des Festivals. Il est à préciser qu'il achetait ses cartes d'entrée, pour lui-même et son entourage. Dans l'enceinte du « Festspielhaus », il n'admettait aucune ovation de la part du public, consigne qui fut strictement respectée. Concernant l'embauche des artistes, Hitler n'exprima qu'une seule fois un « désir » : à l'occasion d'une nouvelle mise en scène de « Parsifal », il proposa comme metteur en scène le célèbre artiste Alfred Roller, de l'Opéra National de Vienne. Malheureusement, à cette époque, Roller était déjà très malade et son travail ne nous donna pas entière satisfaction, de sorte que nous dûmes nous passer de sa collaboration, et que nous confiâmes le soin de réaliser de nouvelles esquisses à mon fils Wieland. Hitler se soumit sans protester à notre décision. Lorsque Gœbbels exigea l'incorporation du Festival de Bayreuth à la Chambre des Théâtres du « Reich » et que je m'y opposai en raison de certaines clauses dont le caractère était incompatible avec l'activité du Festival, je m'adressai à Hitler, qui partagea mon opinion et refusa les exigences de Gœbbels. J'ajouterai que ni Tietjen (le metteur en scène), ni Preetorius (le décorateur), ni Fürtwängler (le chef d'orchestre) n'ont été membres du Parti et que, pour ma part, j'ai toujours eu la possibilité de travailler avec des collaborateurs juifs ou de parenté juive, jusqu'à leur émigration. » . Ainsi, malgré les amitiés de la directrice, le Festival est demeuré artistiquement parlant indépendant, la déclaration de Winnifred Wagner se vérifiant d'un point de vue historique et étant corroborée par l'ouvrage Winnifred Wagner oder Hitlers Bayreuth de l'historienne allemande Brigitte Hamann. De même l'esprit d'innovation de Winnifred en épurant les décors et faisant produire des chefs d'orchestre tels que Richard Strauß, Wilhelm Fürtwängler ou Victor de Sabata et des solistes comme Maria Müller, Germaine Lubin, Max Lorenz, Franz Völker ou Rudolf Bockelmann ne peut pas réduire le travail de la directrice à ses seules connivences politiques et amicales. »

Lors de l'effondrement du 3e « Reich », le tribunal de dénazification lui interdit de s'occuper du Festival de Bayreuth. Elle remet alors la direction de l'événement entre les mains de ses fils Wieland et Wolfgang. En 1951 s'ouvre le « nouveau Bayreuth », inauguré par la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven, dirigée par Fürtwängler et enregistrée par Walter Legge. Cet enregistrement est considéré par toute la critique musicale, d'André Tubeuf à John Ardoin, comme un sommet du genre ; EMI le réédite par ailleurs régulièrement depuis lors.

En 1975-1976, elle est interviewée par le cinéaste Hans-Jürgen Syberberg pour son film « Hitler », un film d'Allemagne et lui tient les propos suivants à propos du Führer : « L'avoir rencontré est une expérience que je n'aurais pas voulu rater. ». Elle déclare aussi, quand son interlocuteur lui demande ce qu'elle ferait si Adolf Hitler était sur le pas de la porte : « Je l'accueillerais comme l'ami qu'il a toujours été à la maison. ». Ces déclarations amènent son fils Wolfgang Wagner à refuser à sa mère sa présence, à l'occasion du centenaire du Festival (1976) .

Elle décède à Überlingen sur les rives du lac de Constance, le 5 mars 1980, à l'âge de 82 ans.

...

Winifred Wagner (23 June 1897 - 5 March 1980) was an English woman and wife of Siegfried Wagner, Richard Wagner's son. She was the effective head of the Wagner family from 1930 to 1945.

In 1923, Winifred met Adolf Hitler, who greatly admired Wagner's music. When Hitler was jailed for his part in the Munich Beer Hall Putsch, Winifred sent him food parcels and stationery on which Hitler's autobiography « Mein Kampf » may have been written. In the late- 1930's, she served as Hitler's personal translator during treaty negotiations with Britain.

Her relationship with Adolf Hitler grew so close that, by 1933, there were rumors of impending marriage. « Haus Wahnfried », the Wagner home in Bayreuth, became Hitler's favourite retreat. Hitler gave the Festival government assistance and tax exempt status, and treated Winifred's children solicitously.

She corresponded with Hitler for nearly 2 decades. Scholars have not been allowed to see the letters which are kept locked away by one of Winifred's grand-children, Amélie Lafferentz.

« Wahnfried » was the name given by Richard Wagner to his villa in Bayreuth. The name is a German compound of « Wahn » (delusion, madness) and « Fried(e) » (peace, freedom) .

The house was constructed from 1872 to 1874 under Carl Wölfel's supervision after plans from Berlin architect Wilhelm Neumann, the plans being altered according to some ideas of Wagner. The front of the house shows Wagner's motto : « Hier wo mein Wähnen Frieden fand - Wahnfried - sei dieses Haus von mir benannt. ». (Here where my delusions have found peace, let this place be named Wahnfried.)

The grave of Richard Wagner and his wife Cosima lies on the grounds of Wahnfried. An extension to the house was built for Wagner's son, Siegfried Wagner, and was later used by Hitler and was known as the « Führerbau » .

Siegfried Wagner

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Siegfried Wagner est né le 6 juin 1869 à Tribschen, au bord du Lac Lucerne (Suisse) ; et est mort le 4 août 1930 à Bayreuth. Il est le fils de Richard Wagner et le petit-fils de Franz Liszt.

3e enfant de Richard Wagner et Cosima von Bülow, il doit son nom à l'Opéra « Siegfried », auquel travaille son père au moment de sa naissance. Cette période de bonheur pour le couple Wagner inspire à Richard la pièce pour petit orchestre « Siegfried-Idyll » (1870), basée sur des motifs issus de l'Opéra et dédiée à Cosima. Le titre originel, « Tribschener Idyll mit Fidi-Vogelgesang und Orange-Sonnenaufgang » (Idylle de Tribschen avec chant d'oiseau de Fidi et lever de soleil orange), fait référence au surnom de Siegfried, « Fidi ».

C'est dans l'ambiance ultra-nationaliste du Cercle de Bayreuth qu'Adolf Hitler se découvrit une mission d'ordre spirituel : la régénération de l'Allemagne. Dans une lettre qu'il écrivit à Siegfried Wagner, le 5 mai 1924, de sa prison de la forteresse de Landsberg, il parle de Bayreuth comme « de la ville où fut forgée, d'abord par le Maître, puis par Chamberlain, l'épée spirituelle avec laquelle nous combattons aujourd'hui ».

Lui-même compositeur d'Opéras, Siegfried Wagner vit longtemps dans l'ombre de son père. Après la mort de celui-ci, en 1883 (il a alors 14 ans), il songe à devenir architecte, mais se tourne vers la musique et étudie la composition avec un disciple de son père, Engelbert Humperdinck.

Il était secrètement homosexuel et ne semble pas avoir tenu à se marier. En 1914 (il a alors 45 ans), une rencontre est arrangée avec Winifred Williams Klindworth, jeune Anglaise âgée de 17 ans. Leur mariage a lieu le 22 septembre 1915. Le couple aura 4 enfants :

Wieland (1917-1966) .

Friedlinde (1918-1991) .

Wolfgang (1919-2010) .

Verena (1920-) .

Siegfried eut également avec la fille d'un pasteur un enfant adultérin, Walter Aign, qui fut employé comme répétiteur au Palais des festivals du vivant de Siegfried, mais que Winifred fit renvoyer après sa mort.

En 1908, sa mère Cosima lui délègue (en titre seulement) la direction du Festival de Bayreuth. Après la Première Guerre mondiale, la très mauvaise situation financière du Festival le pousse à entamer des tournées de concert pour récolter des fonds.

À partir de 1924, il s'attache à la modernisation des représentations du Festival, que Cosima tend à figer dans un conservatisme buté, et engage le décorateur Kurt Söhnlein.

Il ne prend véritablement la direction du Festival qu'à la mort de sa mère, en 1930. L'un de ses projets les plus importants est la nouvelle production de « Tannhäuser », pour laquelle il engage le chef Arturo Toscanini. Les difficultés du Mæstro à communiquer avec l'Orchestre, dans son allemand à couper au couteau, son intransigeance artistique, ainsi que la chaleur de cet été caniculaire, épuisent Siegfried qui fait un infarctus pendant une répétition, et meurt le 4 août 1930, sans avoir pu moderniser le Festival en profondeur comme il l'avait projeté.

La direction passe à sa femme Winifred.

En 1914, Siegfried Wagner fut un des signataires du « Manifeste des 93 » .

Siegfried Wagner a surtout écrit des Opéras pour enfants, basés sur des contes de fées, et nettement plus modestes, simples et courts que ceux de son père :

1898 : « Der Bärenhäuter » .

1900 : « Herzog Wildfang » .

1903 : « Der Kobold » .

1904 : « Bruder Lustig » .

1906 : « Sternengebot » .

1909 : « Banadietrich » .

1910 : « Schwarzwanenreich » .

1912 : « Sonnenflammen » .

1913 : « Der Heidenkönig » .

1914 : « Der Friedensengel » .

1915 : « An allem ist Hütchen schuld ! » .

1917 : « Das Liebesopfer » .

1920 : « Der Schmied von Marienburg » .

1922 : « Rainulf und Adelasia » .

1927 : « Die heilige Linde » .

1928 : « Wahnopfer » (inachevé) .

1928 : « Walamund » (inachevé) .

1929 : « Wernhart » .

1929 : « Das Flüchlein, das Jeder mitbekam » .

Aucun n'est entré dans le répertoire standard des maisons d'Opéra. Son œuvre la plus connue est la Ire, « Der Bärenhäuter » (l'Écorcheur d'ours) . À l'instar de son père, il écrivait lui-même les livrets qu'il mettait en musique.

Autres œuvres

Vers 1882 : Marche pour « Gottfried der Spielmann » .

1890 : Orchestration de « Ekloge » , d'après les « Années de pèlerinage » n° 7 de Franz Liszt.

1892-1895 : « Sehnsucht » , Poème symphonique d'après Schiller.

1913 : « Concertino » pour flûte et petit orchestre.

1913 : Symphonie en ut majeur, avec 2 versions pour le second mouvement (publiée en 1925 ; révisée en 1927) .

1913 : « Das Märchen vom dicken fetten Pfannekuchen » , pour voix soliste et orchestre.

1915 : Concerto pour violon et orchestre.

1922 : « Und wenn die Welt voll Teufel wär » , Scherzo pour orchestre.

1922-1923 : « Glück » , Poème symphonique dédié à la mémoire de Clement Harris.

...

The German composer and conductor Siegfried Wagner was born on 6 June 1869 at Tribschen, on Lake Lucerne (Switzerland) ; and died on 4 August 1930 in Bayreuth. He was the son of Richard Wagner. He became an Opera composer, and the artistic director of the Bayreuth Festival, from 1908 to 1930.

Siegfried Richard Wagner, nicknamed « Fidi », was the son of Richard Wagner and of Cosima Liszt. Through his mother, he was the grandson of Franz Liszt, from whom he received some instruction in harmony.

To Adolf Hitler, Siegfried Wagner was a kindred soul whom he idolized. They shared the same level of consciousness. Except that Siegfried used his resources to lead a primitive era of humanity forward as best he could, while Hitler attempted to hold humanity back in the consciousness of an age long past. Hitler could not conceive of Siegfried as a good person leading humanity on its quest for higher-consciousness. He thought Siegfried's childish behaviour epitomized the ultimate state of consciousness and that he was the prime example of what a human being should be.

Some youthful compositions date from about 1882. After he completed his secondary education, in 1889, he studied with Wagner's pupil Engelbert Humperdinck, but was more strongly drawn to a career as an architect and studied architecture in Berlin and Karlsruhe.

In 1892, he undertook a trip to Asia with a friend, the English composer Clement Harris. During the trip, he decided to abandon architecture and commit himself to music. Reputedly, it was also Harris who first aroused his homoerotic impulses.

While aboard the ship, he sketched his first official work, the Symphonic poem « Sehnsucht », inspired by the poem of the same name by Friedrich Schiller. This piece was not completed until just before the concert in which Wagner conducted it in London, on 6 June 1895. He composed more Operas than his father. Though his works are numerous, none entered the standard repertory.

He made his conducting debut as an assistant-conductor at Bayreuth, in 1894 ; in 1896, he became associate-conductor, sharing responsibility for conducting the « Ring » Cycle with Felix Mottl and Hans Richter, who had conducted its premiere, 20 years earlier. In 1908, he took-over as Artistic Director of the Bayreuth Festival in succession to his mother, Cosima.

Siegfried Wagner was bisexual. For years, his mother urged him to marry and provide the Wagner dynasty with heirs, but he fought-off her increasingly desperate urgings.

Around 1913, pressure on him increased due to the « Harden-Eulenburg Affair » (1907-1909) , in which the journalist Maximilian Harden accused several public figures, most notably Philipp, Prince of Eulenburg-Hertefeld, a friend of « Kaiser » Wilhelm II, of homosexuality. In this climate, the family found it suitable to arrange a marriage with a 17 year old English woman, Winifred Klindworth, and, at the Bayreuth festival of 1914, she was introduced to the, then, 45 year old Wagner. They married on 22 September 1915.

The couple had 4 children :

Wieland (1917-1966) .

Friedlinde (1918-1991) .

Wolfgang (1919-2010) .

Verena (1920-) .

Though the marriage provided for the dynastic succession, the hope that it would also bring an end to his homosexual encounters and the associated costly scandals was disappointed, as Wagner remained sexually active with other men.

Peter Pacht, one of Siegfried's biographers, asserted that, in 1901, Siegfried had sired an illegitimate son, Walter Aign (1901-1977) . However, that assertion remains controversial, as he supplied no evidence. Nonetheless, several recent authors, such as Frederic Spotts and Brigitte Hamann, have taken it up.

Wagner died in Bayreuth having outlived his mother by only 4 months. Since his 2 sons were still only adolescents, he was succeeded at the helm of the Festival by his wife, Winifred.

Orchestral works

March for « Gottfried der Spielmann » (around 1882) .

Orchestration of « Ekloge » from Franz Liszt's « Années de Pèlerinage » No. 7 (1890) .

« Sehnsucht » , Symphonic poem after Schiller (1892-1895) .

Concertino for flute and small orchestra (1913) .

Concerto for violin and orchestra (1915) .

« Und wenn die Welt voll Teufel wär » , Scherzo for orchestra (1922) .

« Glück » , Symphonic poem dedicated to the memory of Clement Harris (1922-1923) .

Symphony in C major (1925 ; revised in 1927) :

The 1st version of the Symphony used the Prelude to « Der Friedensengel » as the slow movement, whereas a new movement was composed for the revised version. The Scherzo is based on the sketches for an unfinished orchestral tone-poem, « Hans im Glück » .

Vocal music

1890 : « Abend auf dem Meere » , for soprano and piano, based on a text by Henry Thode.

1890 : « Frühlingsglaube » , for soprano and piano, based on a text by Ludwig Uhland.

1890 : « Abend am Meer » , based on a text by Alfred Meißner.

1897 : « Schäfer und Schäferin » .

1913 : « Das Märchen vom dicken fetten Pfannekuchen » , for solo-voice and orchestra.

1918 : « Wahnfried-Idyll » .

1919 : « Nacht am Narocz » , for tenor and piano, based on a text by Günther Holstein.

1922 : « Ein Hochzeitslied für unseren Erich und seine liebe “ Dusi ” » .

1927 : « Dryadenlied » .

1927 : « Weihnacht » .

« Frühlingsblick » , based on a text by Nikolaus Lenau.

« Frühlingsstod » , based on a text by Nikolaus Lenau.

...

Siegfried Wagner, son of the great German Opera composer Richard Wagner, displayed a feminine demeanor while growing-up and was greatly attached to his mother. During his student days, he often dressed-up as a ballerina, and he had affairs with several of his fellow male students.

Siegfried, who was also the grandson of pianist and composer Franz Liszt, became part of a circle of high-profile closeted homosexual men, including English composer Clement Harris, tenor Max Lorenz, writer Oscar Wilde, illustrator Franz Stassen and Prince Philipp of Eulenburg. In 1892, Clement Harris and 23 year old Siegfried set-off on an « around the world » tour, together, and the 2 fell deeply in love. Wagner kept a portrait of Harris on his desk for the rest of his life.

When journalist Maximilian Harden later accused Prince Philipp of Eulenburg and others close to « Kaiser » Wilhelm II of homosexuality (the « Harden-Eulenburg Affair ») , Siegfried either had to get married or be exposed for what he was. So, it was that in 1915, at the age of 45, after strong prodding from his mother, Siegfried Wagner married an 17 year old English woman named Winifred Klindworth, with whom he had 4 children, thus, providing heirs for the continuation of the Wagner dynasty. His sexual orientation, however, became the source of both scandal and concerted attempts to erase it from the history of the Wagner family.

When the Wagner dynasty's papers were bequeathed to Bayreuth's Richard Wagner Foundation, in 1973, Winifred Wagner included Siegfried's musical scores but withheld her husband's correspondence. This was consistent with the family's notorious stalling and purging of any revelations that would taint the legacy of Richard Wagner.

In response to Harden's insinuations about his sexual nature, Siegfried replied :

« There was ugly gossip about Frederick the Great, too, the greatest king of all time - and he made Prussia great and strong ! So, don't worry. I won't defile the House of the Festival. »

The irony in that statement is that all the rumours and gossip about Frederick the Great were true.

Siegfried did not give-up social and sexual relations with homosexuals, however, and he and Franz Stassen (1869-1949) , a gay artist who had served as the best man at Siegfried's wedding, continued a social and artistic relationship that lasted for decades. Stassen was a noted « Art nouveau » painter and illustrator who also married. Siegfried introduced Stassen to Wagnerian tenor Max Lorenz (1901-1975) , much admired by Adolf Hitler, even though Lorenz was a gay man married to a Jewish woman. For a time, Stassen and Lorenz were involved in an affair. When Hitler, who was a financial supporter of the Bayreuth Festival, could no longer publicly endorse Lorenz, it was Siegfried's wife, Winifred, who used her influence to rescue Bayreuth's star « Heldentenor » from public disgrace, exile and possible imprisonment over a charge of homosexuality.

Most historians concede that Hitler and Winnifred carried on an affair after Siegfried's death, in 1930 ; there were even rumours of a possible marriage. Although Winifred was proud of her association with Hitler, when he visited her at Bayreuth, she took pains to conceal the connection. Hitler would register at the Hotel Bube, in nearby Bad Berneck, and Winnifred would send her own car to pick him up, so that Hitler's ostentatious Mercedes would not be seen pulling into the drive-way at Wahnfried, the Wagner family's villa built for Richard Wagner by King Ludwig II of Bavaria.

Following in his father's footsteps, Siegfried Wagner was also a composer, but his Operas, although popular during his lifetime, never entered the standard repertoire. In 1896, Siegfried began conducting at the Bayreuth Festival and, from 1906-1930, was the Festival's sole artistic director. In Siegfried's controversial 1930 staging of his father's Opera, « Tannhäuser » , he boldly embellished several scenes with scantily clad male teenagers.

Siegfried dedicated one of his 18 Operas to Franz Stassen, who designed illustrations for the programs for Wagnerian Opera productions at Bayreuth. Franz also published homoerotic drawings and paintings and went on to become a major player in the Teutonic « Art nouveau » style. During the last decade of his life, Stassen wrote recollections about his male « soul mate », thus, publicly hinting at his own homosexuality.

In the previous decade, Stassen had also become associated with the Nazi Party. He created 4 important tapestries for Hitler's « Reich » Chancellery, in Berlin, that illustrated motifs of the Germanic Edda sagas. In gratitude, Hitler awarded him the title of professor, in 1939.

After 1941, Franz lived openly with his male partner and professed his homosexual orientation, but the 3rd « Reich » generously overlooked and ignored this declaration. In the final phase of World War II, Hitler included Stassen in the « Gottbegnadeten v» (Gifted by God) list of important artists most crucial to Nazi culture.

Wagnerian tenor Max Lorenz was homosexual as well but, in 1932, he married Lotte Appel, a Jewish singer who was aware of his sexual orientation going into the marriage. Max's homosexuality was tolerated by the Nazis as a well-known secret, because Lorenz was a favourite of Hitler. When Lorenz was dragged into Court because of an affair with a young man, Hitler advised Winifred Wagner, the director of the Bayreuth Festival after Siegfried's death, in 1930, that Lorenz would not be suitable for the Festival. She replied that, in that case, she would have to close the Festival, because :

« Without Lorenz, there can be no Bayreuth. »

Lorenz was, thus, retained.

As for his Jewish wife Lotte, Max insisted on being open about his marriage of convenience, which was taken as a provocation by the Nazis. Once, when Lorenz was away from his house, the SS burst in and tried to take Lotte and her mother away. At the last moment, Lotte Lorenz was able to make a phone call to Hermann Göring's sister, and the SS was ordered to leave their residence and not bother the women. Göring stated, in a letter dated 21 March 1943, that Lorenz was under his personal protection, and that no action should be taken against him, his wife, or her mother.

...

Siegfried Helferich Richard Wagner, deutscher Komponist, Librettist und Dirigent : geboren 6. Juni 1869 in Tribschen bei Luzern ; gestorben 4. August 1930 in Bayreuth. War ein Von 1908 bis zu seinem Tod leitete er die Bayreuther Festspiele.

Siegfried Wagner war das dritte Kind von Richard Wagner und Cosima Freifrau von Bülow, einer Tochter von Franz Liszt. Damit er den Nachnamen Wagner führen konnte, wurde Siegfried erst im Alter von vierzehn Monaten, am 4. September 1870, getauft. Eine Heirat der Eltern war erst in jenem Jahr möglich, nachdem Cosimas Scheidung von Hans von Bülow rechtskräftig geworden war.

Im Jahr 1870 komponierte Richard Wagner anlässlich der Geburt seines Sohnes das Siegfried-Idyll, eine Zusammenstellung von Motiven aus seiner Oper Siegfried. Nach dem Tod des Vaters 1883 trug sich Siegfried Wagner zunächst mit dem Gedanken an ein Studium der Architektur, wandte sich aber dann doch der Musik zu. Seine musikalische Ausbildung erhielt er bei Engelbert Humperdinck und Julius Kniese. Seit 1886 trat Siegfried Wagner auch als Dirigent bei den Bayreuther Festspielen hervor.

Die These, daß Siegfried Wagner der Vater von Walter Aign (1901-1977), dem jüngsten Kind einer Bayreuther Pastorengattin gewesen sei, erweist sich aufgrund neuerer Forschungen von Brigitte Hamann als unzutreffend. Wagners Homosexualität machte ihn zur Zielscheibe von Erpressungen, gegen die er sich auf juristischem Weg zu wehren suchte.

Im Jahr 1908 übernahm Siegfried Wagner von seiner Mutter die Leitung der Bayreuther Festspiele. Mit unermüdlichem Arbeitseifer gelang es ihm, die mit Beginn des Ersten Weltkrieges unterbrochene Festspieltradition 1924 wieder aufzunehmen. Zur Finanzierung der kostspieligen Festspiele (der Kartenverkauf hatte damals noch keineswegs den heutigen Umfang) unternahm Siegfried Wagner regelmäßig Konzertreisen als Dirigent, so zum Beispiel Anfang 1924 in die Vereinigten Staaten. Siegfried dirigierte dabei wechselnde Orchester. Die Tournee hatte allerdings nur mäßigen Erfolg: Statt der erhofften 200.000 Dollar blieben nur weniger als 10.000 Dollar für den geplanten Zweck.

1914 kündigte Wagner an, das gesamte Wagner-Erbe in eine Richard-Wagner-Stiftung des deutschen Volkes umzuwandeln. Im Jahre 1915 heiratete er Winifred Williams, die Pflөгetochter Karl Klindworths. Der Ehe entstammen vier Kinder: Wieland, Friedelind, Wolfgang und Verena Wagner.

In den Jahren nach 1924 bemühte sich Siegfried Wagner um eine zeitgemäße Modernisierung der Festspielaufführungen, insbesondere auch durch die Verpflichtung des Bühnenbildners Kurt Söhnlein. 1925 übernahm er gemeinsam mit Winifred Wagner das Ehrenpräsidium des völkischen Bayreuther Bundes der deutschen Jugend.

Am 1. April 1930 starb seine Mutter Cosima Wagner, zu der er ein inniges Verhältnis hatte. 1930 war zudem eine Neuinszenierung des Tannhäuser geplant. Dafür verpflichtete Siegfried Wagner den bedeutenden Dirigenten Arturo Toscanini. Die Proben zu dieser Aufführung erwiesen sich in dem heißen Festspielsommer als äußerst anstrengend. Siegfried Wagner erlitt am 18. Juli 1930 bei einer der Proben einen Herzinfarkt, von dem er sich nicht mehr erholte. Er wurde auf dem Friedhof in Bayreuth beigesetzt.

Nach Siegfrieds Tod übernahm seine Witwe Winifred bis 1944 die Festspielleitung.

Bedingt durch seine Einbindung in den antisemitischen Bayreuther Kreis um Cosima Wagner und Houston Stewart Chamberlain wurde Siegfried Wagner schon früh in die Nähe der deutschnationalen und völkischen Bewegung gerückt und von seinem Schwager wiederholt erpresst, seine kosmopolitische Einstellung zu unterdrücken. Er war ein Abonnent des Völkischen Beobachters, der seit 1920 erschien. Politisch interessierter und wesentlich engagierter als Siegfried war erziehungsbedingt jedoch seine Frau Winifred.

Nach dem von Winifred arrangierten Besuch Adolf Hitlers im Haus Wahnfried am 1. Oktober 1923 kurz nach dem Deutschen Tag in Bayreuth urteilte Siegfried Wagner über den Gast :

« Hitler ist ein prachtvoller Mensch, die echte deutsche Volksseele. »

Nach einem Empfang bei dem italienischen Faschistenführer Benito Mussolini im März 1924 notierte er :

« Alles Wille, Kraft, fast Brutalität. Fanatisches Auge, aber keine Liebeskraft darin wie bei Hitler und Ludendorff. »

Im Juni desselben Jahres schrieb Siegfried Wagner in einem Brief an den Bayreuther Rabbiner Falk Salomon :

« Was ich für ein Unglück für das Deutsche Volk halte, ist die Mischung der jüdischen mit der germanischen Rasse. »

Nachdem er als einer der wenigen Zeitgenossen Hitlers Pamphlet gelesen hatte, machte Siegfried jedoch « offen in Philosemitismus » (Schreiben an Evelyn Faltis, Bayerische Staatsbibliothek) .

In einem offenen Brief an Püringer bekannte er : « Mein Vater hat den Juden Unrecht getan » und in seiner Oper Das Flüchlein, das Jeder mitbekam zeichnete er Hitler als brutal-sadistischen Räuberhauptmann Wolf (Hitlers Name in den Kreisen der NS) , der im dritten Akt überführt wird. Das Libretto dieser Oper legte Siegfried Wagner zu seinem 60. Geburtstag allen geladenen Gästen auf den Teller. Noch 1929 äußerte gegenüber seiner Mitarbeiterin Evelyn Faltis : « Mit Juden kann man viel besser arbeiten. » (Bayerische Staatsbibliothek)

Ein für den 9. November 1923, Hitlers geplanter « Machtergreifung » , angesetztes festliches Konzert im Münchener Odeon wird als Beleg dafür gewertet, daß Siegfried Wagner um den geplanten Hitler-Ludendorff-Putsch wusste und vom Gelingen des Putsches ausging. Die Komposition Glück, die an dem Abend zur Uraufführung kommen sollte, ist jedoch nicht Hitler gewidmet, sondern, wie und andere Claus Victor Bock in seiner Biographie Pente Pigadia und die Tagebücher des Clement Harris belegt, Siegfrieds Jugendfreund Clement Harris. Nach dem Scheitern des Putsches und Hitlers Verhaftung korrespondierte Winifred Wagner während dessen Festungshaft mit Hitler. Er soll auf Papier geschrieben haben, das Winifred nach Landsberg schickte. Laut Friedelind Wagner, Nacht über Bayreuth, Seite 33 brachte die Begeisterung ihrer Mutter für Hitlers Ideen den Vater zu dem Stoßseufzer « Winni vernichtet alles, was ich verzweifelt aufzubauen versuche » .

Da er grundsätzlich allen jungen männlichen Wagner-Enthusiasten, die Wahnfried besichtigten, das « Du » anbot, wurde Siegfried Wagner spätestens 1925 einer der wenigen Duzfreunde Hitlers. Josef Gæbbels urteilte in einer Tagebucheintragung vom 8. Mai 1926 über Siegfried und Winifred Wagner, die er als « rassiges Weib » ansah, allerdings wenig konspirativ :

« Sie klagt mir ihr Leid. Siegfried ist so schlapp. Pfui! Soll sich vor dem Meister schämen. »

Neben seinem Einsatz für die Bayreuther Festspiele war Siegfried Wagner auch kompositorisch tätig. Er schuf 17 Opern, zu denen er nach dem Vorbild seines Vaters selbst die Libretti schrieb. Einen durchschlagenden Erfolg auf deutschen Bühnen erzielte er nicht. Schon seine erste Oper Der Bärenhäuter wurde 1899 von der Kritik verrissen. Peter Raabe, der in der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus Präsident der Reichsmusikkammer wurde, nannte sie in der Allgemeinen Musikzeitung 1899 « stammelnde Kompositionsversuche ». Siegfried Wagner selbst schob die Misserfolge auf « Jüdische Machenschaften » (« Dafür sorgt Judas Hass ») .

Nachdem vor allem Winifred Wagner Aufführungen der Werke ihres verstorbenen Mannes blockiert hatte, erleben sie seit einigen Jahren eine Renaissance (zum Beispiel bei den Rudolstädter Festspielen oder gelegentlichen Inszenierungen vor allem der ersten Oper Der Bärenhäuter auf anderen Bühnen) , zu der auch der Ablauf der Schutzfrist (70 Jahre nach dem Tod des Komponisten) beitrug. Inzwischen liegen mehrere CD-Einspielungen vor, darunter Aufnahmen, die Siegfried Wagners Wirken als Dirigent dokumentieren.

Opern

Der Bärenhäuter - Uraufführung 22. Januar 1899, München.

Herzog Wildfang - Uraufführung 23. März 1901, München.

Der Kobold - Uraufführung 29. Januar 1904, Hamburg.

Bruder Lustig - Uraufführung 13. Oktober 1905, Hamburg.

Sternengebot - Uraufführung 21. Januar 1908, Hamburg.

Banadietrich - Uraufführung 23. Januar 1910, Karlsruhe.

Schwarzschanenreich - Uraufführung 5. November 1918, Karlsruhe.

Sonnenflammen - Uraufführung 30. Oktober 1918, Darmstadt.

Der Heidenkönig - Uraufführung 16. Dezember 1933, Köln.

Der Friedensengel - Uraufführung 4. März 1926, Karlsruhe.

An allem ist Hütchen schuld ! - Uraufführung 6. Dezember 1917, Stuttgart.

Der Schmied von Marienburg - Uraufführung 16. Dezember 1923, Rostock.

Rainulf und Adelasia - 1922 ; Uraufführung (konzertant) 4. Oktober 2003, Metzingen (B.-W.) .

Die heilige Linde - Uraufführung Vorspiel 27. November 1924, Rudolstadt ; Uraufführung komplett 2001, Köln/WDR.

Wahnopfer - Unvollendet, 1928 ; Uraufführung 10. Juni 1994, Rudolstadt.

Walamund - Unvollendet, 1928.

Das Flüchlein, das Jeder mitbekam - Unvollendet, 1929 ; Uraufführung nach posthumer Instrumentierung 4. August 1984, Kiel.

Sonstige Werke

Konzertstück für Flöte und Kleines Orchester (1913) .

Konzert für Violine mit Begleitung des Orchesters (1915) .

Winnie et oncle Wolf

Not « Winifred Wagner » but « Adolf Hitler and Bayreuth » would have been a more appropriate title for Hans Jürgen Syberberg's 5 hour film interview with the widow of the composer's only son, Siegfried, the principal subject being not so much the lady herself as her relationship to the « Führer » during his long involvement with Richard Wagner's Bayreuth. In 1947, a de-Nazification Court convicted Winifred of collaboration and forbade her to make public statements ; hence, this film violates the ruling and breaks a silence of 3 decades.

Cosima Wagner, the composer's wife, outlived him by 47 years, and, for nearly half of this time, directed the Bayreuth Festival that she had revived after his death, in 1883. Her daughter-in-law, the English-born Winifred Williams, succeeded as director for 14 more years (1931-1944) of the 47 by which she has survived Cosima. Neither woman was qualified, by experience or talents, to undertake the Festival's artistic control, though, obviously, Cosima had the stronger mandate. Siegfried Wagner was nominally in charge during his mother's dotage, but, from 1914 through 1924, the Festival was suspended, and, in the later 1920's (Siegfried died in the same year as his mother, in 1930) , Winifred's influence seems to have been predominant. The recent director, her son, Wolfgang, is married to a woman of scarcely half his age, which would have seemed to guarantee matrilineal rule for, at least, another generation, except that, in 1973, the Bavarian government purchased the « Festspielhaus » , the family home (Villa Wahnfried) , the Wagner Archives, and assumed major responsibility for the Festival.

A 2 hour version of Winifred Wagner, condensed from the original and given English titles, is still so tedious that the prospect of having to see the film in its full Wagnerian dimensions makes one disregard the critics who claim that abridgment means falsification. Ironically, Syberberg's high-minded conditions are themselves partly responsible for the monotony. The camera focuses unrelentingly, and with no pictorial supplementation, on the Festival's 78 year old former mistress. And, instead of following a logical plan of organization (by subject matter, since the same themes disappear and reappear) , the film rigidly adheres to the chronology of the 5 days during which the taping took place.

Clearly, Syberberg's aim was to achieve maximum authenticity and candor, but this purpose is defeated by his own tendentious questions and by a moralistic commentary, larded with quotations from, among others, Walter Benjamin, Egon Friedell, Thomas Mann, Hannah Arendt, Erich Fromm, that makes the viewer squirm. At the end, a smiling « Herr » Syberberg and contented « Frau » Wagner pose together, signifying that the presentation bears her seal of approval. Yet, the film deserves an X-rating, as do all such that lay claim to complete veracity but that, by their very nature, cannot escape the biases of the director.

Despite Syberberg's good intentions and « Frau » Wagner's sanction, she was nonetheless exploited. For one thing, the filming process, at times, confuses her. « Imagine keeping those things running like that » , she exclaims, indicating the camera and recording equipment, and, once, as if to herself, « I would not say this in public » . An inexperienced speaker, especially during a lengthy interview, tends to forget circumstances and to be carried away by a subject. But apart from this, « Frau » Wagner's life has been so confined to the inbred enclave of Bayreuth (in which, moreover, she reigned supreme for so long) that her views lack perspective.

She is oblivious not only to differing and opposing opinions but also to the outside world. And while not unaware of criticisms of her autocratic management of the Festival, and of her flaunting of the friendship with Hitler (« We old Nazis » is one of her favourite locutions) , she unquestionably feels that her conduct, in both capacities, was justified and that she is not without sympathizers. Though momentarily bewildered by the filming, more often she is consciously appealing to posterity, using the arguments that she was never a political person, and that what Hitler did elsewhere was none of her business. « What was going on in the world did not concern me. » , she says, bringing to mind a comment by a young German woman in Marcel Ophüls' « Memory of Justice » : « They deliberately did not try to find-out. » .

Yet, the « defendant's » position is unfair, if only because the course of the interview is directed by the « prosecutor's » questions, while the commentary looks down on the scene in undisputed judgment. Nor do Syberberg's trappings of « fidelity » (the inadequate lighting, the poor sound, the black and white film, the absence of make-up and sets) compensate for the stacked philosophy of the format. These artifices of naturalness might better have been abandoned for a quality of technical realization and such other alleviating devices as the showing of stills of events and people mentioned by « Frau » Wagner. A variety of background and some relief from the concentration on her stony face might also have made the film more palatable for its inevitable educational television audience.

The preservation of the recorded order of the interviews is obstructively pedantic, « Frau » Wagner's own time sense being vague and sketchy, while few of her answers depend on sequence or large contexts. When asked for her evaluation of Gustav Mahler (a loaded question, political rather than musical, being wholly unspecific) , she strays into an anecdote about a dinner with Alma Mahler and Franz Werfel, quoting a joke by Siegfried Wagner about the paternity of Alma's new baby. But either this child was Manon Gropius, born 2 years before Werfel became Alma's consort, in which case Winifred's memory was faulty, or else the child was Werfel's premature and short-lived son, in which case Siegfried's tasteless witticism might have been deleted. Or would such tampering destroy documentary validity ?

For 2 hours, and at wart-close range, the camera follows the elderly but robust woman, always alone, usually in an armchair but occasionally standing, once at a desk typing with 2 fingers, once eating lunch. Her most conspicuous feature is a jutting jaw, emphasized by erect posture and backward titled head. Her manner is direct, blunt, and, when speaking of Jews, servants, and all social « inferiors » (a not inconsiderable percentage of the population) , insensitive to a scarcely credible degree. The voice is husky and she coughs frequently, but the speech, despite her English upbringing, is without accent. She laughs (at some of Syberberg's questions, at the thought of the « childishness » of such artists as Arturo Toscanini) but the audience is amused only once, by her story that, after the War, she and her friends changed their code name for Hitler from « Wolf » to « USA » . The touchiest subjects fail to ruffle her, though she is often stumped for an expression or a way of approach. True to his veristic guidelines, Syberberg does not interrupt, kibitz, correct.

But there is no respite from the woman's dogmatic pronouncements, class and race prejudice, and consuming self-righteousness. She even sees Hitler (« warm blue-eyed » , « kind » , « considerate ») only in relation to herself, and when pressed to reconcile these impressions of him with the atrocities of the concentration camps and the realities of the « Final Solution » , she off-handedly contends that « such things did not come from him but from Streicher and Bormann » . Indeed, Uncle Wolf's greatest shortcoming was that « he was too easily influenced by such people » . According to Winnie, in fact, Uncle Wolf scarcely appears to have been « anti-Semitic » at all, and thanks to his protection, Jewish artists, and the Jewish wives and husbands of Aryan ones, were allowed to participate in the Festival even in the late- 1930's.

At this point, the commentary contradicts her with a horrifying selection from Hitler's own writings on the subject. Adolf Hitler's spell over Winifred Wagner was cast in the early 1920's. On his 1st visit to Bayreuth, in 1923, she recalls that he visited the Master's grave alone, and came back in a state of great emotion saying that :

« Out of " Parsifal ", I make a religion. »

While Hitler was in prison, she brought food to him, not to mention the paper on which he wrote a best-seller, and she invited him to the Festival, as far back as 1925, when his presence could have had disastrous consequences. These actions alone would seem to indicate what the film bears out : that her interest in him was not primarily for his potential political power, convinced disciple though she was in that sense, but rather that she was in love with him. She is proud and pleased, at any rate, when Syberberg asks about the rumors of a « Winnie - Wolf » marriage, but she is quick to dispose of a question (thereby suggesting that it might be a painful one) whether Hitler refrained out of personal considerations for her from ever mentioning Eva Braun. Winnie boasts that Wolf was « a member of the family » , an « uncle » to her children (whom he, sometimes, helped to put to bed at night) and that he stayed in her home. She adds that, despite his phobia about women drivers, he allowed her to chauffeur him, and that few of her requests were not granted, even during the darkest days of the War. Over and above, his dedication to Wagner, it seems indisputable that Hitler came to Bayreuth to see her.

Regrettably, therefore, the film misses an opportunity to fill-out the private portrait of Hitler that an expert questioner might have extracted from Winifred Wagner, for it is unlikely that any other living woman knew him so intimately and over so long a period (1923-1945) . Although she did not see him after the assassination attempt of July 20, 1944, they continued to communicate, and she was able to recognize when his dosages of anti-depressant drugs had been increased. The latter point is an example of an unexplored detail, since it is obvious that she must know more about the subject than appears in her passing reference to it in the film.

But Syberberg fails even to pursue the question of Hitler's musicality, which grew in interest after the War when Heinz Tietjen, Bayreuth's one-time music-director, testified that the « Führer » once complained to him, correctly, that the oboes had played wrong notes (which Richard Strauß, who was conducting, overlooked) . When Winnie talks about Uncle Wolf's piano playing, the audience wants to know just how good it was, as well as what music, other than Wagner's, Hitler may have known and liked ; something being indicated about a man who is enthralled by Wagner but, perhaps, not by Bach, Mozart, or Beethoven. We would also like to know whether Hitler (perish the thought) could sing (anything, that is, besides « Deutschland über Alles ») for if he really were exceptionally musical, perhaps, new personality tests and some surveillance should be introduced into our Conservatories.

In sum, the film reveals how much closer was Hitler's relationship with Winifred Wagner and her family than had previously been known, and how much more profound his association with Bayreuth. In fact, Winnie's son-in-law was the director of the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) organization which bought-up most of the seats during the War and partly filled them with wounded and furloughed soldiers ; a sadistic form of rest and recreation, as might appear to some. Near the end of the film, Winnie answers the question, « Was Hitler a curse on Wagner and Bayreuth ? » with « Exactly the contrary. » ; and, undoubtedly, she believes in his eventual exoneration, and her own. But when she confesses that, « If Hitler were to come through that door, I would be as happy to see him as ever. » , the feeling is personal, all the more strikingly so because of the absence of emotion during most of the interview.

Following the recent reversal of literary genres, the film has been made into a book, and the script should soon be available. Meanwhile, the history of the Wagner dynasty in Bayreuth may be studied in 3 new volumes of pictures. One of these, « The Wagner Family Albums » , a collection of private photographs, includes views of Hitler with Winifred, and of Hitler with her children. Another, « Richard Wagner in Bayreuth » , is misleadingly titled, little of the book being devoted to the composer and most of it to his heirs and their supervision of the Festival. (A reason for the brevity of the section on Wagner may be the imminent publication of the 2nd part of « Cosima Wagner's Diaries » which center on the Bayreuth period, 1878-1882.) The text, by Hans Mayer, is as intelligent and fair in its analyses of people and events as any that the reader is likely to encounter on the subject, yet, silly remarks occur, such as that Siegfried Wagner showed a new, freer disposition. The trauma seemed to abate. He died because of this. Could Siegfried live only when traumatized ? And what is the meaning of Siegfried Wagner died during the Bayreuth Festival. It was but one of the many ironic set-backs in this seemingly happy and successful life. Admittedly, death is something of a « set-back » , but Siegfried's life, on the contrary, must have been profoundly sad, and he was one of the least successful composers of his time.

The documentation by Gottfried Wagner, one of Richard's 11 great-grand-children, contains new information, but the sources are not identified beyond « The Wagner Archives », and no dates are given for most of the photographs, the choice of which, furthermore, is peculiar. Thus one chapter begins with a reference to the well-known portrait of the loving Cosima looking-up into the reciprocating Richard's eyes, yet, this picture is nowhere to be found in the book, while the one facing the verbal description is of the widow in old age. Then, too, apart from the cover, only 3 portraits are offered of Wagner himself : seated, with demonic upward gaze ; with his right-hand on the shoulder of his young son ; and in a Villa Wahnfried « Royal Family » group portrait, in which King Richard, wearing a wide brimmed summer hat. The book does not contain any photographs of Hitler, but Mayr quotes passages from recent publications as evidence that « the new Bayreuth » is, by no means, de-Nazified. Winfried Schüler's « Der Bayreuther Kreis » (1971) , for instance, praises Julius Kniese (Cosima's assistant and Siegfried's teacher) for his « rigorous anti-Semitism » , while a 1969 biography of Wagner's son actually reproaches Malwida von Meysenbug for her lack of racist instincts in contrast to the convinced anti-Semite, Siegfried Wagner.

The illustrations that comprise the 1st half of « Wagner : A Documentary Study » include a generous number in colour, of manuscripts, programs, costume designs, paintings, the places and theaters in which the composer lived and worked. The 2nd half of the book is an anthology of writings both by and about the composer chosen by 3 eminent Wagner scholars. Much less satisfactory is the preface, « Divergences : The Man and His Work » , by that more recent arrival among Wagner ideologues and apologists, Pierre Boulez. In an earlier essay, « Approaches to Wagner » , Boulez expediently avoided any mention of the composer's controversial doctrines. That subject should have been side-stepped again this time. In any case, readers will be astonished to learn from Boulez that, for example, Wagner was « a committed Christian » , and that Wagner, steeped in the Romantic idealism of medieval myths, adds to the political and cultural reaction of the 19th Century the prejudices of a militant Christian.

The notion of Wagner acting-out of Christian belief and principle is patently ridiculous, nor was his anti-Semitism religiously motivated, the earlier brand having been chiefly of the paranoid and scapegoating kind, the later based on quack anthropology such as Joseph Arthur de Gobineau's « Essay on the Inequality of Races » . Certainly, neither manifestation deserves to be dignified by Boulez's term « concept » : Wagner does represent an amalgam of concepts on which it was only too easy to draw in order to label him the leader of a particularly vicious crusade.

So it was Wagner, not « the Jews » , who was maligned and victimized. No less preposterous is the remark that a series of misunderstandings converts Wagner's work into a narrow-minded symbol of nationalism and racism. But no conversion was possible since the nationalism and racism were already plainly there, even for the broadest minds. The further statement that political ideology took hold of Wagner's work and raised it by force as its own banner implies, of course, that no kindred spirit existed in « Parsifal » or in the composer's contemporaneous writings, such as « Religion and Art » , some of whose tenets, as Walter Kaufmann noted, Hitler was later to enforce by law.

Many of Boulez's comments on the artistic aspects of Wagner's world are also puzzling, but, for only one example, Boulez deplors that, as for architecture, the model of Bayreuth has remained a dead letter. We still live with the Italian style theater in which the singer's voice attempts to penetrate the wall of sound raised before it. Which « wall of sound » ? Mozart's ? Verdi's ? Would the acoustical balances and orchestral-vocal rapport of « Figaro » or « Falstaff » benefit from such subterranean structures as that of Bayreuth ?

Incomparably superior to this preface is Boulez's more recent Wagner essay, « Time Re-explored ». This deserves to be widely read, not only for its insights but also as a measure of the evolution of Boulez's own views on music. Ist, however, it must be said that the « re-exploration of time » is simply the familiar idea of a « dialectic » between « the opposition of chromatic and diatonic », which are respectively identified with « fluid and rigid time ». Wagner's « re-exploration » is merely a vast enlargement of scale, the principle being as old as the early 16th Century, thereafter rapidly becoming conventionalized. For the rest, some of Boulez's speculations are brilliant, some are highly-debatable, and a few are specious, as when he says that Wagner has extended the limits of variation well beyond even that which he found in Beethoven. Obviously, Boulez continues to believe that changes in style (though he would not agree that these are such) can be explained as progress.

This new article on Wagner also reveals that Boulez has not changed his mind about the separation of the ideology from the music :

« In that Europe of Marx and Engels where Wagner had hoped to play an ideological part, he did not cut a very brilliant figure ; but the dramaturge, the musician Wagner offers a perpetual denial of Wagner the ideologist : on that plane, he is and remains unrivalled and completely subversive. It is not at all surprising that 2 Jews, Mahler and Schönberg, should be the most distinguished inheritors of the musical ideas of the most obtuse anti-Semite ; for his musical heritage remains the privilege of those who can understand it, grasp and absorb it, while his ideological legacy went to Wolzogen and Chamberlain and (subsequent to their insipidity) was adopted by a political power, by no means insipid, which made use of the musical testimony as well as the ideological ambiguity to camouflage its tyrannical brutality. The political power of the Nazis would have existed anyway, with or without music ; like all such political powers, they looked for intellectual justifications and tried to base the « Masterpieces of the national inheritance » on a certain historicity. In that case, Wagner's text offered itself as camouflage, but his music remained irrefragible, and that is why his music still lives although his ideology is already no more than a document. »

But, surely, the power of the ideology is in the music, which cannot be entirely dissociated from the dramatic and verbal meaning. If the ideology of « Parsifal » is pernicious, so, too, in some degree, is the music, which is not to deny its greatness. He considered himself a genius. He was a leader, and he believed that by virtue of his special gifts he could command subordination and allegiance. He considered himself removed from the realm of rational criticism by reason of his self-appreciation.

Thus, Walter Scheel, President of the « Bundesrepublik », in a speech inaugurating the Bayreuth Festival of 1976. Was he referring to Richard Wagner or to Adolf Hitler ? It was to the latter, in fact, which contradicts the President's further claim (the fallacy of most apologias for Wagner « vis-à-vis » Hitler) that it was hardly Wagner's fault that Hitler liked him. Yet, to some extent, it was Wagner's fault, so long as things equal to the same thing are also equal to each other. And there is truth in Erik Satie's « bon mot » on being told that Maurice Ravel had refused the legion of honour : « But he should not have done anything to deserve it. ». To name only one of the charges against Wagner's Operas, they are guilty of glorifying nationalism and the power of arms.

Like Wagner's grand- and great-grand-children, Scheel hopes to de-Nazify the Festival. Yet, it is doubtful that this can be done. On the other hand, Winnie's pro-Nazi confessions could conceivably save Bayreuth. The film unleashed an unexpected reaction among German audiences, some of whom admired her honesty in saying what she and many of them felt, preferring her forthrightness to the rationalizations and ambiguities of the politicians and « intelligentsia », As an instance of this, Syberberg concludes his sermon : « It is easy not to be a Nazi when no Hitler is around. » .

Winifred Wagner's continuing loyalty to Hitler is totally misplaced, of course, as well as evidence of a seemingly unbalanced mind, otherwise the revelations of 1945 would have compelled her to deplore her former blindness. Yet, by exposing Bayreuth as the spiritual center of Nazism, her interview invalidates the argument that Wagnerism and its unfortunate heritage are « divergences » . The moral of the film is that the wisest course would be to tell the whole truth and to acknowledge that even the worst of it is an integral part of Bayreuth history. Men and institutions carry the past with them, after all, and to pretend that it is possible to make a new start which is not laid on old foundation is foolish. The acceptance of the full story might at last afford an objective view and, perhaps, even turn Bayreuth's oppressive and uncritical worship into free and intelligent appreciation.

A « Letter from Bayreuth » , published in « The New Yorker » , September 27, 1976, claims that, « Wagner himself hired the brilliant Hermann Levi, a Jew, to conduct the premiere of “ Parsifal ” . » . In truth, it was King Ludwig who insisted on Levi against Wagner's wishes and who would not permit the Munich Orchestra to appear in Bayreuth without the Munich conductor. Wagner, for his part, expressed empathic anxiety feelings for anyone having to work under Levi : « Richard remarked to me privately that, if he were playing in the Orchestra, he wouldn't like to be directed by a Jew. » (From Cosima Wagner's Diaries, July 22, 1882.)

Le Cercle de Bayreuth

« The Bayreuth Circle » (« Der Bayreuther Kreis ») was a name originally applied, by some writers, to devotees of Richard Wagner's music who attended and supported the annual Bayreuth Festival, in the later 19th and early 20th Centuries. As some of these devotees espoused nationalistic German politics, and some of them were supporters of Adolf Hitler from the 1920's onwards, this group of people has been associated by some writers with the rise of Nazism.

The term « Bayreuth Circle » was originally applied to the enthusiasts of Wagner's music who were also associated with or subscribed to the publication « Bayreuther Blätter » , established in the 1880's by Wagner himself and edited by Baron Hans von Wolzogen. This journal, apart from containing snippets by Wagner himself on social, political and æsthetic matters, was also strongly nationalistic and anti-Semitic. Its circulation was small and it was not politically influential.

After the death of Wagner, in 1883, his 2nd wife Cosima, in continuing to propagate what she saw as her husband's views, was supported by a number of active anti-Semites, including Houston Stewart Chamberlain and Ludwig Schemann. Schemann, the founder of the German Gobineau Society, « did a great deal to bring Gobineau's term “ Aryan ” into vogue amongst German racists » . Chamberlain (who died in 1927) wrote an influential anti-Semitic book,

« The Foundations of the 19th Century » , and married Eva Wagner, daughter of the composer.

There was never any organisation named « The Bayreuth Circle » or any group of people who identified themselves by that name ; but the term has been used by some historians from about the 1960's onwards as a convenient label for Hitler supporters associated with Bayreuth. Examples of such association are given in the following citations :

« Only with timely support from “ The Bayreuth Circle ”, especially Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Winifred Wagner, and henchmen like Dietrich Eckhart of the Thule Society, could the unimpressive Hitler assume the self- then public image of a Wotan / Siegfried figure, complete with telling nickname :“ Wolf ”. »

« Thus, Hitler himself admitted :“ It was Cosima Wagner's merit to have created the link between Bayreuth and National-Socialism. ” It was “ The Bayreuth Circle ” which raised Wagner's message to the status of gospel, manoeuvring his ideas into a Germanic-Christian doctrine of salvation. »

Strong on assertion, such statements are void of supporting evidence : it should be borne in mind that Eckhardt died in 1923, Chamberlain was dead in 1927, and Cosima Wagner in 1930, i.e. , before the 1st political victory of the Nazi Party, in the September 1930 elections. Whilst these personages were (or would have been) undoubtedly supporters of Hitler, they played little or no part, and had no influence, in his climb to power. These citations also make the typical, and unsubstantiated, assumption of many modern historians that the German people in general (or even active Nazis, in particular) knew, or cared, anything at all about Wagner or his Operas.

Evidence for any political active role played by a « Bayreuth Circle » as a group is, therefore, highly-contentious.

Amongst those often listed as « members » of a Hitlerian « Bayreuth Circle » are Cosima Wagner (who died in 1930) , 2nd wife of the composer ; Winifred Wagner, wife of the composer's son Siegfried ; and Houston Stewart Chamberlain. None of the Wagners, however, played any personally active role in the Nazi movement, although Hitler was undoubtedly influenced by Chamberlain's « Foundations of the 19th Century » . Chamberlain himself joined the Nazi Party and contributed to its publications. The Nazi journal « Völkischer Beobachter » dedicated 5 columns to praising him on his 70th birthday, describing Foundations as the « Gospel of the Nazi movement » . Hitler later attended Chamberlain's funeral, in January 1927, along with several highly-ranked members of the Nazi Party. Other members of the putative « Circle » , such as Winifred Wagner, were sycophants of Hitler, partly from political sympathy, partly in the hopes of obtaining advantages (including financial support) for the Bayreuth Festival. There is, however, no evidence that the actions of either Chamberlain or Winifred Wagner (or others associated with Bayreuth) led Hitler to power or had any influence over him once he obtained it.

Later in the Nazi era, as part of the regime's propaganda intentions of « Nazifying » German culture, specific attempts were made to appropriate Wagner's music as « Nazi » and pseudo-academic articles appeared such as Paul Bülow's « Adolf Hitler and the Bayreuth Ideological Circle » (in : « Zeitschrift für Musik » , July 1933) . Such articles, as pointed out by Frederic Spotts, were Nazi attempts to rewrite history to demonstrate that Hitler was integral to German culture. Modern writers who assert any political or social significance to « The Bayreuth Circle » risk falling into the traps thus set by Nazi ideologues.

...

The « Bayreuth Circle » coalesced in the mid-1870's around 3 key events that continued to shape its history and development. The 1st of these was the opening of the Festival theater in Bayreuth and the premiere performance of Richard Wagner's « Ring » cycle, which brought together a far-flung community of Wagner enthusiasts. Efforts that began on the plane of shared artistic values, however, then extended to much broader areas of concern.

The 2nd foundational event, in the autumn of 1877, was the re-location to Bayreuth, at Wagner's behest, of Baron Hans Paul von Wolzogen, the figure who played the most influential role in the history of the « Circle » and the development of its ideas. A dramatist and a music-critic rather than a musician (he is said to have coined the term « Leitmotif ») Wolzogen helped found and then edit the « Bayreuther Blätter » (Bayreuth Pages) . For nearly 60 years, he functioned as the organizer, promoter, steward, and major interpreter of the cultural and intellectual body of thought entrusted to him, preserving the Master's legacy and pursuing its logic even further. He was, for example, one of the 1st to proclaim the « Aryan Jesus » , even though Wagner had not dared to go that far when he questioned Jesus' Jewish descent in the « Bayreuther Blätter » . His anti-Semitism, too, went beyond what Wagner was willing to espouse publicly. He called for a ban on Jews in the professions and their compulsory emigration to the colonies ; unlike Wagner, he signed the « Anti-Semites' Petition » (1880-1881) . As early as 1924, he opened the « Bayreuther Blätter » to the Nazis.

After Wagner and his wife, Cosima, Baron Hans von Wolzogen stood clearly at the top of the « Circle » 's hierarchy. Below him came many of the charismatic leader's « apostles of the “ Inner Circle ” » , among them Houston Stewart Chamberlain, Ludwig Schemann, and Bernhard Forster, men whose anti-Semitism ranged from the radical to the paranoid. Wolzogen's eminence did not go unchallenged, however. There were enough controversies and crises, especially with Chamberlain, to keep the « Circle » from developing into a disciplined league.

The 3rd formative event in the history of the « Circle » was the establishment of the « Bayreuther Blätter » , in early 1878. Dedicated to the art and world-view of Richard Wagner, it was intended to serve as the literary vehicle for the cultural movement that would radiate out from Bayreuth into the world beyond, a mission the journal fulfilled until it ceased appearing at Wolzogen's death in, 1938. Wagner's works established the themes and the tone, foregrounding the « völkisch » (racist-nationalist) and anti-Semitic nature of his views. Other « prophetic » Germans (Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, Friedrich von Schiller, Immanuel Kant, Johann Gottlieb Fichte, Ernst Moritz Arndt, and Paul de Lagarde) appeared frequently. Thanks to the efforts of Cosima Wagner, the race theories of Joseph Arthur de Gobineau were taken with utmost seriousness. It was Cosima who commissioned Wolzogen to give thorough exposure to Gobineau's « Essay on the Inequality of the Human Races » .

Anti-Semitism ; racially defined nationalism ; rejection of Socialism and Liberalism ; and the reform of culture and « life » , art, and religion were the constantly reiterated themes that produced a unique ideological amalgam in the « Bayreuther Blätter » . In its pages, Aryan Germandom was glorified and Jews denigrated, relegated to the role of the inimical counterrace. But it is, perhaps, inaccurate to speak of a single Bayreuth ideology, even in the matter of anti-Semitism ; its proponents sometimes used racial arguments, sometimes religious, economic, or ethical ones. In their anti-Semitism, Wagner and his followers in the « Bayreuth Circle » doubtlessly belonged on the German Right, probably somewhere between the aesthetically inclined and those given over to Germanic religion.

After its 1st year, in which the « Bayreuther Blätter » was brought-out by the anti-Semitic publisher and grassroots organizer Ernst Schmeitzner, the Journal appeared from its own press until 1913, when it was farmed-out to an external firm. It remained home to members of the « Circle » but also opened its pages to many other prominent anti-Semites, such as Constantin Frantz, Ottomar Beta, Adolph Wahrmund, Friedrich Lienhard, Heinrich Pudor, and many others. These individuals can be considered extended members of the « Circle » . Together, they stood for the segregation of Jews from the German national body politic. They normally kept their distance from « rowdy » anti-Semitism, but nonetheless, the ideological affinities to the anti-Semitic political Parties of the German Empire and, later, to the Nazis were unmistakable. From the beginning, anti-Semitism was omnipresent in Bayreuth's « milieu » .

Houston Stewart Chamberlain

L'essayiste anglais d'expression allemande, principalement connu comme théoricien raciaiste, Houston Stewart Chamberlain est né le 9 septembre 1855 à Southsea, dans le Hampshire en Angleterre, et est mort le 9 janvier 1927 à Bayreuth. Dès l'âge de 14 ans : sa famille l'y avait envoyé pour soigner une santé fragile. Son précepteur allemand lui apprit sa langue et l'amena à se passionner pour la culture germanique. Il devint un habitué des milieux intellectuels wagnériens et épousa Eva, fille de Richard Wagner.

Dans l'ouvrage qui le rendit célèbre, « la Genèse du XIXe siècle » (1899) , Chamberlain soutenait que la race supérieure décrite par Gobineau (« race » indo-européenne que Chamberlain désignait sous le terme de « race aryenne ») était l'ancêtre de toutes les classes dirigeantes d'Europe et d'Asie, qu'elle n'avait pas cessé d'exister et qu'elle subsistait à l'état pur en Allemagne.

Chamberlain incluait dans la race aryenne les peuples celtiques et nordiques qu'il considérait comme appartenant à la même famille germanique ainsi que les Berbères d'Afrique du Nord. Son œuvre fut appréciée et lui valut d'être invité à la Cour du « Kaiser » Guillaume II. Durant la Première Guerre mondiale, Chamberlain écrivit des articles contre son pays d'origine et prit la nationalité allemande.

Il fut l'un des principaux représentants du pan-germanisme et consacra plusieurs monographies à des personnalités allemandes telles que Richard Wagner, Heinrich von Stein, Kant et Goethe. Ses écrits inspirèrent notamment Alfred Rosenberg et Adolf Hitler, l'une des rares personnes présentes à ses funérailles en 1927.

Publications

Das Drama Richard Wagners : Eine Anregung (1892) .

Richard Wagner (1895) .

Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts (Genèse du XIXe siècle) (1899) .

Arische Weltanschauung (1905) .

Avec Friedrich Poske : Heinrich von Stein und seine Weltanschauung (1903) .

Immanuel Kant : Die Persönlichkeit als Einführung in das Werk (1905) .

Gœthe (1912) .

Kriegsaufsätze (1915) .

Lebenswege meines Denkens (1919) .

...

Houston Stewart Chamberlain, dont la vie et l'œuvre constituent l'une des ironies les plus fascinantes dans l'inexorable processus historique qui devait amener la montée et la chute du 3e « Reich » .

Ce Britannique de belle lignée (fils d'amiral, il avait pour oncles un maréchal, Sir Neville Chamberlain, et 2 généraux) qui naquit en 1855, se destinait à la marine ou à l'armée ; mais sa santé délicate ruina ces projets. Le jeune homme fit ses études en France et à Genève, où il s'acclimata si bien que le français devint sa langue préférée. Il était encore adolescent quand le destin le mit, successivement, en présence de 2 Allemands ; rencontre décisive qui devait le pousser irrésistiblement vers l'univers germanique. Il devait, en effet, devenir l'un des grands penseurs de l'Allemagne d'alors, en prendre la nationalité et, même, en adopter la langue dans laquelle il allait écrire tous ses livres. Plusieurs de ses ouvrages exercèrent une influence profonde sur Guillaume II, sur Adolf Hitler et sur d'innombrables Allemands de moindre importance.

En 1870, âgé de 14 ans, Chamberlain se trouva entre les mains d'un précepteur remarquable, Otto Kuntze, prussien à l'extrême, qui, 4 années durant, imprégna son jeune esprit réceptif et son âme sensible des gloires de la Prusse militaire et conquérante, ainsi que de celles d'artistes et de poètes tels que Beethoven, Gœthe, Schiller et Wagner ; apparemment, ce contraste ne gênait pas le pédagogue ! À 19 ans, Chamberlain tomba follement amoureux d'Anna Horst, Prussienne elle aussi, son aînée de 10 ans, et, comme lui, névropathe. À 27 ans, en 1882, il quitta Genève, où il s'était plongé, pendant 3 ans, dans l'étude de la philosophie, des sciences naturelles et de la médecine pour Bayreuth. Il y rencontra Wagner, qui devint le soleil de sa vie (ce sont ses termes) , et sa femme Cosima, à laquelle il demeura passionnément et dévotement attaché jusqu'à sa mort. Dès 1885, quand il alla en compagnie d'Anna Horst, qu'il avait épousée, passer 4 années à Dresde, il devint Allemand de langue et de pensée. En 1889, il se rendit à Vienne, où il vécut 20 ans, et, en 1909 à Bayreuth, où il habita jusqu'à sa mort en 1927. En 1905, il divorça d'avec sa Prussienne adorée, alors qu'elle avait 60 ans et qu'elle était mentalement et physiquement encore plus mal en point que lui ; la séparation fut si pénible qu'il prétendit en être devenu presque fou. 3 ans plus tard, il épousa Eva Wagner et se retira près de la Villa « Wahnfried » , où il pouvait voisiner avec sa belle-mère, l'autoritaire et réverée Cosima.

Hypersensible, sujet à de fréquentes crises d'abattement, Chamberlain était affligé de visions où, disait-il, des démons lui enjoignaient sans pitié ni relâche de rechercher de nouveaux champs d'étude et de poursuivre ses extraordinaires travaux. Elles le forçaient successivement à passer de la botanique aux Beaux-arts, à la musique, à la philosophie, à la biographie, à l'histoire. Un jour de 1896, alors qu'il revenait d'Italie, une de ces apparitions eut un caractère si impérieux qu'il descendit du train à Gardone, s'enferma pendant 1 semaine dans une chambre d'hôtel et, abandonnant un projet d'œuvre musicale, entreprit fiévreusement un essai biologique, où il découvrit l'embryon du thème qui allait dominer tous ses ouvrages ultérieurs, celui de la, race et de l'histoire.

Nonobstant ses tares, son intelligence disposait d'un vaste éventail qui couvrait les domaines de la littérature, de la musique, de la biologie, de la botanique, de la religion, de l'histoire et de la politique. Comme l'a signalé Jean Réa, tous ses travaux publiés montrent une profonde unité d'inspiration et une cohérence remarquable. Etant donné qu'il se sentait pourchassé par ses démons, ses livres (sur Wagner, sur Goethe, sur Kant, sur le christianisme et sur la race) étaient écrits sous l'étreinte d'une surexcitation terrible, combinaison d'état de transe et d'auto-intoxication, si bien que, comme il le raconte dans son autobiographie, « Lebenswege » , il était souvent incapable de les reconnaître, parce qu'ils dépassaient ce qu'il en attendait. Des esprits plus équilibrés que lui ont, depuis, infirmé ses théories raciales et une grande partie de sa position historique. L'éminent germanisant français Edmond Vermeil tient ses idées pour essentiellement absurdes. Néanmoins, pour le biographe anti-nazi d'Hitler, Konrad Heiden, qui d'ailleurs regrettait l'influence exercée par les écrits racistes de Chamberlain, celui-ci « fut un des talents les plus remarquables qui se soient manifestés dans l'histoire de l'esprit allemand, en même temps qu'une mine de connaissances et d'idées profondes » .

Le livre qui exerça sur cet intellect allemand l'influence la plus prononcée, qui plongea Guillaume II dans l'extase et qui fournit aux Nazis la matière de leurs aberrations racistes fut « Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (Fondements du XIXe siècle) , ouvrage de quelque 1,200 pages, que Chamberlain, retombé sous la griffe d'un de ses « démons » , écrivit en 19 mois (du 1er avril 1897 au 31 octobre 1898) , à Vienne, et qui fut publié en 1899.

Tout comme Gobineau qu'il admirait, Chamberlain voyait la clef de l'histoire, la base de la civilisation dans la race. Pour expliquer le XIXe siècle, c'est-à-dire le monde contemporain, il disait qu'il fallait d'abord examiner ce que les époques précédentes lui avaient apporté ; ce legs était triple : la philosophie et l'art de la Grèce ; la loi Romaine ; la personnalité du Christ. Et il y avait 3 légataires : les Juifs et les Allemands, qui étaient les « 2 races pures » , puis les sang-mêlé latins de la Méditerranée, qu'il appelait un « chaos de peuples » . Seuls, les Allemands avaient droit au splendide héritage. Il est vrai que leur venue dans l'histoire ne remontait qu'au XIIIe siècle ; mais ils avaient prouvé leur valeur auparavant, en détruisant l'Empire Romain.

Chamberlain déclare :

« Il est faux que le Teuton barbare ait fait descendre sur l'Europe ce qu'on appelle la nuit de Moyen-âge ; bien plutôt, cette nuit survint après la faillite intellectuelle et morale du chaos humain sans race engendré par l'Empire Romain dans son agonie. Sans le Teuton, une nuit éternelle se serait appesantie sur le globe. »

Car, au temps qu'il s'exprimait ainsi, Chamberlain, plaçait dans le Teuton l'unique espoir du monde. Parmi les « Teutons », et quoique ceux-ci fussent les éléments de l'ensemble, Chamberlain comprenait aussi les Celtes et les Slaves. Il est cependant très catégorique dans ses définitions et il assure quelque part que « quiconque se comporte en Teuton est un Teuton, quelle que soit la souche de sa race ». Peut-être se souvint-il alors de son origine non allemande. En tout cas, le Teuton était, selon lui, « l'âme de notre civilisation ».

« L'importance de toute nation, en tant que puissance vivante d'aujourd'hui est, en proportion de l'authentique sang teuton de sa population. L'histoire véritable commence au moment où le Teuton, de sa main souveraine, prend dans sa poigne le legs de l'antiquité. »

Et les Juifs ? C'est à eux qu'il consacre le plus long chapitre des « Fondements ». Chamberlain prétend que les Juifs et les Teutons représentent les seules races pures subsistant en Occident. Dans le chapitre en question, il condamne « l'antisémitisme stupide et révoltant ». Il assure que les Juifs ne sont pas « inférieurs » aux Teutons, mais seulement qu'ils sont « différents » d'eux. Ils ont leur grandeur propre, ils comprennent le « devoir sacré » qui incombe à l'homme de maintenir la pureté de la race. Pourtant, quand il entreprend d'analyser ce qui les concerne, Chamberlain sombre dans le même antisémitisme vulgaire qu'il condamne chez les autres, antisémitisme aboutissant aux grossièretés des caricatures qui, au temps d'Adolf Hitler, paraissaient contre les Juifs dans « Der Stürmer », le périodique de Julius Streicher.

L'absurdité des opinions de Chamberlain saute aux yeux. Il a déclaré que la personnalité du Christ est un des 3 grands legs : faits par l'Antiquité à la civilisation moderne. Il entreprend alors de « prouver » que Jésus n'était pas Juif. Ses origines galiléennes, son incapacité à prononcer correctement les gutturales aramaïques constituent pour Chamberlain des « signes nets », indiquant que le Christ avait « une forte proportion de sang non sémite ». Puis, il proclame en termes typiquement décisifs :

« Quiconque a prétendu que Jésus était un Juif, ou bien s'est montré stupide, ou bien a menti. Jésus n'était pas juif. »

Qu'était-il donc ? Chamberlain répond :

« Probablement, un Aryen ! »

Sinon, tout à fait par le sang, du moins et très certainement à cause de sa doctrine morale et religieuse, si nettement opposée « au matérialisme et au formalisme abstrait » du judaïsme. Il était, par conséquent, naturel (aux yeux de Chamberlain, en tout cas) que le Christ devint « le dieu de tous les jeunes peuples indo-européens débordants de vie » et, par-dessus tout, celui des Teutons, parce que « nul autre peuple n'était aussi bien doué qu'eux pour écouter cette voix divine ».

Vient ensuite ce qui est supposé constituer une histoire détaillée de la race juive, depuis l'époque du mélange des Sémites ou bédouins du désert, avec « les Hittites à tête ronde » , qui avaient un « nez juif » et, enfin, avec les Amorrites, qui étaient aryens. Malheureusement, le mélange aryen (les Amorrites, affirme Chamberlain, étaient de grands et magnifiques blonds) se produisit trop tard pour réellement améliorer l'élément hébreu « corrompu » . À partir de là, Chamberlain se trouve en contradiction avec toute sa théorie de la pureté de la race juive et il découvre que les Juifs deviennent une race « négative » et « abâtardie » , de sorte que les Aryens ont à bon droit « refusé » Israël. En fait, il blâme les Aryens d'avoir conféré aux Juifs un « halo de fausse gloire » , puis il trouve que ces derniers « manquent lamentablement de vraie religion » .

En fin de compte, Chamberlain pense que la voie du salut passe par les Teutons et leur culture et que les Allemands sont les plus doués d'entre eux, car ils ont hérité les meilleures qualités des Grecs et des Indo-Aryens. Cela leur donne le droit d'être les Maîtres du monde.

« Dieu ne fait fond aujourd'hui que sur les seuls Allemands, a-t-il écrit ailleurs. Telles sont la conviction et la vérité certaine qui sont les miennes depuis des années. »

La publication des « Fondements du XIXe siècle » créa une sensation et valut à leur étrange auteur anglais un renom soudain en Allemagne. Malgré son éloquence coutumière et la tenue de son style (Chamberlain était un artiste-né) , le livre n'était pas d'une lecture facile. Mais il ne tarda pas à être bien accueilli par les classes dirigeantes, qui semblent y avoir trouvé exactement ce qu'elles désiraient croire. En 10 ans, il eut 8 éditions, avec une vente de 60,000 exemplaires ; quand éclata la Guerre de 1914, ce chiffre atteignait 100,000. Cette faveur du public se renouvela pendant la période nazie, et je me rappelle l'annonce de sa 24e édition, en 1938 ; la vente dépassait alors 250,000 exemplaires.

Le « Kaiser » Guillaume II fut l'un de ses lers et de ses plus enthousiastes lecteurs. Il invita Chamberlain à son Palais de Potsdam ; dès leur Ire rencontre se forma entre eux une amitié qui dura jusqu'à la mort de l'auteur, en 1927, et qui fut marquée par une copieuse correspondance. Certaines des 43 lettres que Chamberlain écrivit à l'Empereur (qui lui envoya 23 réponses) étaient de longs essais que Guillaume II utilisa dans plusieurs de ses discours et déclarations sensationnels.

« C'est Dieu qui a adressé votre livre au peuple allemand, et vous qui me l'avez personnellement adressé » , lui manda-t-il dans une de ses lres missives.

L'obséquiosité de Chamberlain et ses flatteries exagérées sont parfois écœurantes :

« Votre Majesté et ses sujets sont nés dans un Saint-Sanctuaire » , écrit-il.

Ajoutant pour Guillaume II qu'il avait placé son portrait dans son cabinet, vis-à-vis celui du Christ par Léonard de Vinci, de sorte que, pendant son travail, il allait souvent de l'image de son Sauveur à celle de son souverain.

Cette servilité n'empêchait pas Chamberlain d'offrir continuellement des conseils au monarque. En 1908, l'opposition populaire faite à Guillaume II était telle qu'on vit le « Reichstag » désapprouver sa désastreuse intervention dans les affaires étrangères ; Chamberlain ne lui en déclara pas moins que l'opinion publique étant fabriquée par des idiots et des traîtres, il n'avait pas à en tenir compte ; l'Empereur lui répondit que, tous les 2, ils s'entendraient et se serreraient les coudes :

« Vous brandissez votre plume ; j'use de ma langue et de mon épée. »

L'Anglais ne manquait jamais de rappeler au « Kaiser » la mission et la destinée de l'Allemagne.

« Lorsque l'Allemagne aura vaincu (écrit-il, après le début de la Première Guerre mondiale et nous pouvons y compter avec confiance) , il faudra qu'elle s'adonne immédiatement à une politique scientifique de génie. Auguste entreprit ainsi une transformation politique du monde ; l'Allemagne doit faire de même. Pourvue d'armes offensives et défensives, organisée aussi fermement et complètement que son année, supérieure à tous en art, en science, en technologie, en industrie, en commerce, en finance, bref, en tous les domaines ; guide, pilote et pionnière du monde ; chaque homme à son poste, chaque homme donnant toutes ses forces à la cause Sainte ; ainsi, l'Allemagne conquerra le monde au moyen de son essentielle supériorité. »

Guillaume II décora Chamberlain de la « Croix de fer » pour avoir incité à une si glorieuse mission son pays d'adoption. (Il s'était fait naturaliser Allemand, en 1916, en pleine guerre.)

Toutefois ce fut le 3e « Reich » qui ne fut instauré que 6 ans après sa mort, mais dont il prévit la venue, que l'influence de cet Anglais s'exerça le plus fortement. Ses théories racistes et son sens ardent de la destinée des Allemands et de l'Allemagne furent repris par les Nazis, qui l'acclamèrent comme un de leurs prophètes. Durant le régime hitlérien, les presses répandirent à foison des livres, des brochures et des articles célébrant le « fondateur spirituel » de l'Allemagne nationale-socialiste. Alfred Rosenberg, un des mentors d'Adolf Hitler, s'efforça souvent de lui communiquer l'enthousiasme qu'il éprouvait à l'endroit de Chamberlain. Il est probable que le « Führer » eut connaissance de ses écrits avant de quitter Vienne, car ils étaient répandus et appréciés dans les groupes pan-germanistes et antisémites, dont il dévorait les élucubrations lors de cette période ancienne. Sans doute aussi lut-il des articles chauvins de Chamberlain pendant la Guerre. Dans « Mein Kampf », il exprime le regret que les observations de l'écrivain n'aient pas été mieux écoutées au cours du 2e « Reich » .

Chamberlain fut un des Iers intellectuels qui, en Allemagne, prévirent un grand avenir pour Hitler et de nouvelles chances de succès pour les Allemands, s'ils le suivaient. Hitler avait fait sa connaissance à Bayreuth, en 1923 ; quoique malade, à demi-paralysé, déçu par la défaite et par la chute des « Hohenzollern » (écroulement de tous ses espoirs et de toutes ses prophéties !) , l'écrivain se sentit soulevé par l'éloquence du jeune Autrichien. Dès le lendemain de leur rencontre, il lui écrivit :

« De hautes tâches vous attendent. Ma confiance dans le germanisme n'a pas été ébranlée un seul instant, quoique

mon espérance, je l'avoue, soit descendue assez bas. D'un coup, vous avez changé mon état d'âme. L'Allemagne, en donnant naissance à un Hitler au temps de sa plus grande détresse, fait preuve de sa vitalité ; il en est de même pour les forces d'influences qu'on sent émaner de lui ; ces 2 choses, en effet, la personnalité et l'influence, vont de pair. Dieu vous protège ! »

Cette lettre date du moment où Adolf Hitler, avec sa moustache « à la Charlie Chaplin », ses façons de voyou, son extrémisme violent et hors de saison, n'éveillait encore chez les Allemands que des accès de fou rire. Sans doute, avait-il déjà des partisans ; toujours est-il que le magnétisme de sa personnalité agit à la manière d'un charme sur le philosophe vieillissant et malade et rajeunit la foi qu'il nourrissait dans le peuple auquel il avait voulu s'intégrer et qu'il voulait voir aux plus hauts sommets. Chamberlain s'affilia donc au jeune Parti nazi et commença d'écrire pour ses obscures publications, dans la mesure où sa santé le lui permettait. Dans un de ses articles, qui parut en 1924, il salua Hitler comme l'homme destiné par Dieu à conduire et diriger le peuple allemand. Le destin avait fait signe à Guillaume II, mais celui-ci avait échoué ; c'était dès lors le tour d'Hitler. Le 5 septembre 1925, le 70^e anniversaire du remarquable écrivain anglais fut célébré en 5 colonnes d'éloges par le journal nazi « Völkischer Beobachter » (L'Observateur populaire), qui qualifia ses « Fondements » d'« évangile du Mouvement Nazi ». Chamberlain descendit dans sa tombe 6 mois plus tard, le 11 janvier 1927, espérant fermement que tous ses enseignements et toutes ses prévisions se réaliseraient sous la divine égide du nouveau « Messie allemand ».

À l'exception d'un prince représentant Guillaume II, à qui le retour sur le sol national était interdit, Hitler fut la seule personnalité publique à assister aux obsèques de Chamberlain. Annonçant sa mort, le « Völkischer Beobachter » déclara que le peuple allemand venait de perdre « un des grands paladins dont les armes n'ont pas été utilisées à notre époque à toute leur valeur ». Ni ce moribond à demi paralysé, ni même Hitler, ni personne d'autre en Allemagne n'aurait jamais prévu, en ce sombre mois de janvier 1927, alors que la fortune du Parti nazi était au plus bas, que dans un avenir très proche les armes forgées par l'Anglais transfuge de son pays allaient servir avec toute leur force et avec d'effroyables conséquences.

...

Écrivain anglais connu essentiellement comme l'un des pères européens du racisme. Né dans une famille d'officiers supérieurs, influencé par un professeur allemand de Cheltenham, Otto Kuntze, et par ses études de sciences naturelles à Genève, il passe les années 1885-1889 en Allemagne et s'enthousiasme pour Richard Wagner, auquel il consacrera plusieurs monographies (« Notes sur Lohengrin », 1892). Installé à Vienne, il y publie en allemand son ouvrage essentiel (« Les Fondements du XIX^e siècle », « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts », 1899), qui sera traduit en anglais en 1911. Naturalisé allemand en 1916, il soutient la cause du « Reich » lors de la Première Guerre mondiale, apportant son appui aux pan-germanistes qui prônent l'annexion de tous les territoires « allemands ». Il terminera sa vie à Bayreuth où il s'est établi dès 1908.

Ses conceptions se rattachent au courant de pensée organiciste qui se développe dans la seconde moitié du XIX^e siècle, et dont les théories fondées sur la race représentent l'expression la plus extrême. Dans sa théorie, il magnifie le rôle civilisateur de la race « germanique » ou aryenne qu'il prétend reconnaître dans la succession des peuples dominateurs de l'Europe depuis l'Antiquité grecque et dans la personne des plus beaux esprits de ce continent, de Dante à Shakespeare et à Descartes. Il exalte les potentialités présentes dans les peuples nordiques, allemands et britanniques au XIXe siècle, et fait de la langue allemande celle promise aux plus hautes destinées. Dans la lignée de Gobineau, il présente d'autre part le Juif comme l'élément hétérogène par excellence et comme un dissolvant des sociétés les moins impures. L'ensemble de ses idées a fourni un aliment de choix aux grands apôtres du pangermanisme, puis aux disciples nationaux-socialistes de Hitler. Il a d'ailleurs, entre 1933 et 1945, été placé très haut dans l'olympie des ancêtres du Nazisme.

...

Un des pères européens du racisme : Houston Stewart Chamberlain (1855-1927) .

Critique musical, mais surtout auteur d'écrits antisémites et racistes, son style journalistique et sa tendance à la généralisation ont attiré une attention considérable sur lui.

Sa pensée a notamment influencé celle d'Hitler.

Houston Stewart Chamberlain, né à Portsmouth en 1855 et mort à Bayreuth en 1927 est un philosophe allemand d'origine anglaise. Son père est un amiral anglais, originaire d'une famille d'officiers anglais. Houston Stewart Chamberlain est élevé en France et en Suisse, et s'établit plus tard en Allemagne, où il devient un wagnérien enthousiaste. Après avoir épousé Eva en second mariage, la fille unique du grand musicien, il s'établit à Bayreuth, en 1907, et devient le gendre de Wagner à titre posthume. Bayreuth est une ville de Bavière où Richard Wagner (1813-1883) vient s'établir en 1872. Le compositeur y avait fait construire le célèbre « Festspielhaus », spécialement conçu pour les représentations grandioses de ses Opéras, qui est inauguré en août 1876 avec « l'Anneau des Nibelungen » .

Son œuvre est appréciée et lui vaut d'être invité à la Cour du Kaiser Guillaume II. Durant la Première Guerre mondiale, Chamberlain écrit des articles contre son pays d'origine, l'Angleterre, et prend la nationalité allemande. Il reçoit la Croix de guerre allemande, en 1915, et est naturalisé, en 1916. Blessé, et déjà d'une santé fragile, il connaît ensuite des problèmes médicaux jusqu'à sa mort. Adolf Hitler assiste à son enterrement en 1927.

Houston Stewart Chamberlain est l'auteur d'analyses poussées de l'œuvre de Wagner, notamment dans « Das Drama Richard Wagners », en 1892, où il insiste sur les aspects héroïques des « Teutons » dans les œuvres du compositeur. Mais il est surtout connu car, disciple de Paul de Lagarde et de Joseph Arthur de Gobineau, il se fait l'apôtre du racisme et du pan-germanisme politique et spirituel.

Il est un des Iers intellectuels à se rallier à Hitler, qu'il salue comme « le grand simplificateur » . Son ouvrage, « la Genèse du XIXe siècle », qui paraît en 1899, le rend célèbre. Ce livre nous présente une analyse large mais biaisée de la culture européenne. Il soutient que les peuples aryens de l'Ouest étaient à l'origine de la grandeur et de la créativité européenne, et que l'influence juive avait été négative. Il y soutient aussi que la race supérieure décrite par Gobineau (« race » indo-européenne que Chamberlain désigne sous le terme de « race aryenne ») était l'ancêtre de toutes les classes dirigeantes d'Europe et d'Asie, qu'elle n'avait pas cessé d'exister et qu'elle subsistait, à l'état pur, en Allemagne. Chamberlain incluait dans la race aryenne les peuples celtiques et nordiques qu'il considérait comme appartenant à la même famille germanique.

Il est aussi l'auteur de « Kant » (1905) ; « Goethe » (1912) ; et d'autres essais comme « Race et Personnalité » (1925) .

...

The English author of books on political philosophy, natural science Houston Stewart Chamberlain was born on 9 September 1855 and died on 9 January 1927. He was the son-in-law of the German composer Richard Wagner. He is described in the « Oxford Dictionary of National Biography » as a « racist writer » . He later became a German citizen. In December 1908, 25 years after Wagner's death, Chamberlain married Wagner's daughter, Eva von Bülow. Chamberlain's 2 volume book, « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century) , published in 1899, became one of the many references for the pan-Germanic movement of the early 20th Century, and, later, of the « völkisch » anti-Semitism of Nazi racial policy.

Chamberlain's education began in a « Lycée » at Versailles and most of his education occurred on the continent, but his father had planned a military career for his son and, at the age of 11, he was sent to Cheltenham College, an English boarding-school which produced many army and navy officers. The young Chamberlain was « a compulsive dreamer » more interested in the arts than the military, and he developed a fondness for nature and a near-mystical sense of self. The prospect of serving as an officer, in India or elsewhere in the British Empire, held no attraction for him. In addition, he was a delicate child with poor health. At the age of 14, he had to be withdrawn from school.

He then travelled to various spas around Europe, accompanied by a Prussian tutor, « Herr » Otto Kuntze, who taught him German and interested him in German culture and history. Chamberlain then went to Geneva, where he studied under Carl Vogt (a supporter of racial typology at the University of Geneva) , Professor Graebe, Müller Argoviensis, Marc Thury, Alexis Plantamour, and other professors. He studied systematic botany, geology, astronomy and, later, the anatomy and physiology of the human body.

Thereafter, he settled at Dresden, where « he plunged, heart and soul, into the mysterious depths of Wagnerian music and philosophy, the metaphysical works of the “ Master ” probably exercising as strong an influence upon him as the musical dramas » . Chamberlain was immersed in philosophical writings, and became a « völkisch » author, one of those who were concerned more with art, culture, civilisation and spirit than with quantitative physical distinctions between groups. This is evidenced by his huge treatise on Immanuel Kant with its comparisons. His knowledge of Friedrich Nietzsche is demonstrated in that work (page 183) and « Foundations » (page 153n) . By this time, Chamberlain had met his 1st wife, the Prussian Anna Horst, whom he was to divorce in 1905.

In 1889, he moved to Austria. During this time, it is said his ideas on race began taking shape, influenced by the concept of Teutonic supremacy he alleged, was embodied in the works of Wagner and Arthur de Gobineau. This was, in spite of Wagner having dismissed Gobineau's racist ideology in his late years, as « eine schlechthin unmoralische Weltordnung » (completely immoral world-order) .

Chamberlain had attended Wagner's Bayreuth Festival, in 1882, and struck-up a close correspondence with his widow Cosima. In 1908, 25 years after Wagner's death, he married Eva von Bülow-Wagner, Franz Liszt's granddaughter and Richard Wagner's step-daughter. The next year, he moved to Germany and became an important member of the « Bayreuth Circle » of German nationalist intellectuals.

By the time World War I broke-out, in 1914, Chamberlain remained British, only by virtue of his name and nationality. In 1916, he also acquired German citizenship. He had already begun propagandising on behalf of the German government and continued to do so throughout the War. His vociferous denunciations of his land of birth, it has been posited, were the culmination of his rejection of his native England's capitalism, in favour of a form of German Romanticism akin to that which he had cultivated in himself during his years at Cheltenham. Chamberlain received the Iron Cross from the « Kaiser » , with whom he was in regular correspondence, in 1916.

After the War, Chamberlain's chronically bad health took a turn for the worse and he was left partially paralysed ; he continued living in Bayreuth until his death in 1927.

Under the tutelage of Professor Julius von Wiesner of the University of Vienna, Chamberlain studied botany in Geneva, earning a « Bachelier en sciences physiques et naturelles » (Bsc) , in 1881. His thesis, « Recherches sur la sève ascendante » (Studies on rising sap) , was not finished until 1897, and did not culminate in a further qualification. The main thrust of his dissertation is that the vertical transport of fluids in vascular plants via xylem cannot be explained by the fluid mechanical theories of the time, but only by the existence of a « vital force » (« force vitale ») that is beyond the pale of physical measurement. He summarises his thesis in the « Introduction » :

« Without the participation of these vital functions, it is quite simply impossible for water to rise to heights of 150 feet, 200 feet and beyond, and all the efforts that one makes to hide the difficulties of the problem by relying on confused notions drawn from physics are little more reasonable than the search for the philosopher's stone. »

Physical arguments, in particular transpirational pull and root pressure, have since been shown to be adequate for explaining the ascent of sap.

He was an early supporter of Hanns Hörbiger's « Welteislehre » , the theory that most bodies in our solar system are covered with ice. Due in part to Chamberlain's advocacy, this became official cosmological dogma during the 3rd « Reich » .

Chamberlain's attitude towards the natural sciences was somewhat ambivalent and contradictory. He later wrote :

« One of the most fatal errors of our time is that which impels us to give too great weight to the so-called “ results ” of science. »

Still, his scientific credentials were often cited by admirers to give weight to his political philosophy.

Chamberlain rejected Darwinism, evolution and social Darwinism and, instead, emphasised « gestalt » which he said derived from G ethe.

Chamberlain was an admirer of Richard Wagner, and wrote several commentaries on his works including « Notes sur “ Lohengrin ” » (Notes on « Lohengrin » , 1892) ; an analysis of Wagner's drama (1892) ; and a biography (1895) , emphasising, in particular, the heroic Teutonic aspects in the composer's works. Stewart Spencer, writing in « Wagner Remembered » , described Chamberlain's edition of Wagner letters as « one of the most egregious attempts in the history of musicology to misrepresent an artist by systematically censoring his correspondence » .

In 1899, Chamberlain wrote his most famous work, « The Foundations of the 19th Century » (« Die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts ») . The book argued that Western civilisation is deeply marked by the influence of Teutonic peoples. Chamberlain grouped all European peoples (not just Germans, but also Celts, Slavs, Greeks, and Latins) into the « Aryan race » , a race built on the ancient Proto-Indo-European culture. In fact, he even included the Berber people of North Africa in the Aryan race :

« The noble Moor of Spain is anything but a pure Arab of the desert, he is half a Berber (from the Aryan family) and his veins are so full of Gothic blood that even at the present day noble inhabitants of Morocco can trace their descent back to Teutonic ancestors. »

At the helm of the Aryan race, and, indeed, all races, according to Chamberlain, were the Germanic or Teutonic peoples.

« The Foundations » sold well : 8 editions and 60,000 copies within 10 years ; 100,000 copies by the outbreak of World War I ; and 24 editions and more than a quarter of a million copies by 1938.

During World War I, Chamberlain published several propaganda texts against his country of birth : « Kriegsaufs tze » (Wartime Essays) . In the 1st 4 tracts, he maintains that Germany is a nation of peace ; England's political system is a sham, while Germany exhibits true freedom ; German is the greatest and only remaining « living » language ; and the world would be better off doing away with English and French-styled parliamentary governments in favour of German rule « thought out by a few and carried-out with iron consequence » . The final 2 discuss England and Germany at length.

During his lifetime, Chamberlain's works were read widely throughout Europe and, especially, in Germany. His reception was particularly favourable among Germany's conservative elite. « Kaiser » Wilhelm II patronised Chamberlain, maintaining a correspondence, inviting him to stay at his Court, distributing copies of « The Foundations of the 19th Century » among the German Army, and seeing that « The Foundations » was carried in German libraries and included in the school « curricula » .

« The Foundations » would prove to be a seminal work in German nationalism ; due to its success, aided by Chamberlain's association with the Wagner « Circle » , its ideas of Aryan supremacy and a struggle against Jewish influence spread widely across the German State at the beginning of the 20th Century. If it did not form the framework of later National-Socialist ideology, at the very least, it provided its adherents with a seeming intellectual justification.

Chamberlain himself lived to see his ideas begin to bear fruit. Adolf Hitler, while still growing as a political figure in Germany, visited him several times (in 1923 and in 1926, together with Josef Gœbbels) at the Wagner family's property in Bayreuth. Chamberlain, paralysed and despondent after Germany's losses in World War I, wrote to Hitler after his 1st visit in 1923 :

« Most respected and dear Hitler,

It is hardly surprising that a man like that can give peace to a poor suffering spirit ! Especially when he is dedicated to the service of the fatherland. My faith in Germandom has not wavered for a moment, though my hopes were (I confess) at a low ebb. With one stroke, you have transformed the state of my soul. That Germany, in the hour of her greatest need, brings forth a Hitler (that is proof of her vitality) that the magnificent Ludendorff openly supports you and your movement. What wonderful confirmation ! I can now go untroubled to sleep. May God protect you ! »

Chamberlain joined the Nazi Party and contributed to its publications. Its primary journal, the « Völkischer Beobachter » dedicated 5 columns to praising him on his 70th birthday, describing « The Foundations » as the « gospel of the Nazi movement » .

Adolf Hitler later attended Chamberlain's funeral, in January 1927, along with several highly-ranked members of the Nazi Party. Chamberlain's ideas were influential in particular to Alfred Rosenberg, who became the Nazi Party's in-house philosopher. In 1909, some months before his 17th birthday, he went with an aunt to visit his guardian, where several other relatives were gathered. Bored, he went to a book shelf, picked-up a copy of Chamberlain's « The Foundations » and wrote of the moment :

« I felt electrified. I wrote down the title and went straight to the bookshop. »

In 1930, Rosenberg published « The Myth of the 20th Century » , a homage to and continuation of Chamberlain's work. Rosenberg had accompanied Hitler when he called upon Wagner's widow, Cosima, in October 1923, where he met her son-in-law. Hitler told the ailing Chamberlain he was working on his own book which, he intended, should do for the 3rd « Reich » what Chamberlain's book had done for the 2nd.

Beyond the « Kaiser » and the NSDAP, assessments were mixed. The French Germanic scholar Edmond Vermeil considered Chamberlain's ideas « essentially shoddy » , but the anti-Nazi German author Konrad Heiden, despite objections to Chamberlain's racial ideas, described him as « one of the most astonishing talents in the history of the German mind, a mine of knowledge and profound ideas » . In a 1939 work, Martin Heidegger (himself a former Nazi) dismissed Chamberlain's work as « Weltanschauung » (fabricated world-view) .

Works

1892 : « Das Drama Richard Wagners. Eine Anregung » , Breitkopf & Härtel.

1895 : « Richard Wagner » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1899 : « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1905 : « Arische Weltanschauung » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1903 : « Heinrich von Stein und seine Weltanschauung » , Georg Heinrich Meyer.

1905 : « Immanuel Kant. Die Persönlichkeit als Einführung in das Werk » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1912 : « Gœthe » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1915 : « Kriegsaufsätze » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

1919 : « Lebenswege meines Denkens » , Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag.

Works in English translation :

1897 : « Richard Wagner » , J. M. Dent & Co. - translated by George Ainslie Hight.

1911 : « The Foundations of the 19th Century » , 2 Volume, John Lane, The Bodley Head - translated into English from the German by John Lees, with an Introduction by Lord Redesdale.

« Foundations of the 19th Century » , in : « Modern Political Ideologies » , Oxford University Press (1959) .

1914 : « Immanuel Kant » , 2 Volumes, edited by John Lane, The Bodley Head - translated by Lord Redesdale.

1915 : « The Wagnerian Drama » , edited by John Lane, The Bodley Head.

1915 : « The Ravings of a Renegade » , Jarrold & Sons - translated by Charles H. Clarke with an introduction by Lewis Melville.

2005 : « Political Ideals » , University Press of America - translated by Alexander Jacob.

2012 : « Aryan World-View » , Aristeus Books (ISBN : 978-1479223039) .

2012 : « The Ravings of a Renegade » , Aristeus Books - translated by Charles H. Clarke with an introduction by Lewis Melville (ISBN : 978-1479231584) .

2014 : « Richard Wagner » , Aristeus Books - translated by George Ainslie Hight (ISBN : 978-1502494689) .

...

Houston Stewart Chamberlain : Anglo-German publicist, playwright, cultural critic and race theorist born on 9 September 1855 in Southsea, England ; and died on 9 January 1927.

Chamberlain's mother, Eliza Jane Hall, died before he was 1 year old and he was raised by his grandmother in France. Chamberlain's father, Captain William Charles Chamberlain (later Rear-Admiral) had planned a military career for his son and, at 11 years old, he was sent to a boarding-school for future army and navy officers. But the young Chamberlain was more interested in studying music, literature and astronomy, and the prospect of serving as an officer in India or elsewhere in the British Empire held no attractions for him.

By the age of 14, Chamberlain was in poor health. Doctors wrongly suspected that he had a disease of the respiratory organs, and he left England to visit one health resort after another : Bad Ems, Montreux and Cannes. He was accompanied by his aunt and a Prussian private teacher, Otto Kuntze, who taught his studious pupil German and interested him in German history, literature and philosophy. In 1874, Chamberlain's father arrived in Switzerland to persuade him to finish his studies in England, but Chamberlain refused. By now, his bad experiences in England had coupled with his French upbringing to alienate him from his fatherland. It was in Cannes that he met his 1st wife, Anna Horst, whom he married in 1878.

Chamberlain moved to Florence to study botany at the University there. As things turned-out, though, Florence offered so many artistic impressions that Chamberlain spent 7 months there, in a kind of cultural shock :

« I will never forget that one evening, when, while I was aimlessly wandering through the city, I suddenly and unexpectedly came across the “ Piazza della Signoria ” : the impression of beauty was so overwhelming that I was seized with giddiness and I had to withdraw into a portico, in order to lean and recover myself. »

He was caught in a comparable situation, later on, when he read the works of William Shakespeare (a « Shakespeare-intoxication » , as he called it) ; heard Richard Wagner's music ; and when he saw Albrecht Dürer's self-portrait in the « Alte Pinakothek » in Munich, in 1896. In 1879, Chamberlain enrolled in the faculty of natural sciences at the University of Geneva, where he obtained his bachelor's degree. He then moved to Dresden and began work on a dissertation about the rise of plant saps. But his illness flared-up again and, this time, the doctors diagnosed neurasthenia : a popular disease at the time. Chamberlain had to rest and, while recuperating, he began studying history, philosophy, literature and music, as well as writing his 1st essay in German.

Chamberlain moved to Vienna, in 1889, to continue his research into plant physiology. But, on the morning of January 19th, 1892, he was captivated by something he called the « writing demon ». It was a demon that couldn't be ignored, according to Chamberlain, and it controlled him so much that, after writing a piece, he often didn't recognise it as his own work. Some occultists have assumed that Chamberlain was clairvoyant and possessed by demons. But he, himself, was adamant that this entity was a kind of alter ego like Socrates' daimon. Henceforward, Chamberlain was determined to become a writer.

Chamberlain's most important work is « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century, 1899). The book's central idea is that Western civilization's moral, cultural, scientific and technological superiority comes largely from the positive influence of the Germanic race (Slavs and Celts included) on the progress of history down the ages :

« Certain anthropologists would fain teach us that all races are equally gifted ; we point to history and answer : that is a lie ! The races of mankind are markedly different in the nature and also in the extent of their gifts, and the Germanic races belong to the most highly-gifted group, the group usually termed Aryan. Is this human family united and uniform by bonds of blood ? Do these stems really all spring from the same root ? I do not know and I do not much care. »

Opponents of the Germanic race would be the Roman Catholic Church (« the shield- and armour-bearer of all Anti-Germanic movements ») , Jewry, the Jesuit Order and other obscure forces, who fought and still fight a racial war, « the war still waged among us between those elements that advance and those that retard culture » . Although the book was received with reservation (to say the least) by the Church and in Jewish circles, it became a best-seller in Germany, was translated into English and French, and had an important influence on its contemporaries. In his review of « The Foundations » , George Bernard Shaw wrote :

« It is a Masterpiece of really scientific history. It does not make confusion, it clears it away. He is a great generalizer of thought, as distinguished from the crowd of our mere specialists. It is certain to stir-up thought. Whoever has not read it will be rather out of it in political and sociological discussions for some time to come. »

And President Theodore Roosevelt, although not an admirer of Chamberlain's work, wrote :

« A man who can write such a really beautiful and solemn appreciation of true Christianity, of true acceptance of Christ's teachings and personality, as Mister Chamberlain has done, represents an influence to be reckoned with and seriously to be taken into account. »

A predecessor of Chamberlain was Joseph Arthur, Comte de Gobineau (1816-1882) , who argued for the superiority of Nordic Aryans in his « Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines » (1853-1855) but also forecast their decline owing to mingling with other races :

« Nous ne descendons pas du singe, mais nous y allons. »

(We do not descend from the ape, but are headed in that direction.)

But Chamberlain used his biological training to refute the latter, although he agreed with Charles Darwin about uncontrolled racial mixing :

« Free crossing obliterates characters. »

Count Gobineau, incidentally, was a friend of Richard Wagner.

A recurring theme in Chamberlain's work is that Jesus was not a Jew. He has no hard proof, he admits, but he does offer some circumstantial evidence. To wit :

« King Solomon sold Galilee to the king of Tyrus (1 Kings 9:11) because the region was scarcely inhabited by Jews. Jesus was born, not in Jewish Judaea, but in foreign Galilee, and Gelil haggoyim means “ district of heathens ”. Jesus himself denounces Jews : Matthew 8:12 : “ but the children of the kingdom [i.e. , the Jews] shall be cast out into outer darkness ” ; John 8:47 : “ He that is of God heareth God's words : ye therefore hear them not, because ye are not of God. Then answered the Jews, and said unto Him, Say we not well that thou art a Samaritan ” ; Matthew 23:33 : “ Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers ”. »

According to Chamberlain, Christianity developed into a murderous totalitarian system because of 2 factors : the Catholic Church's emergence from racial chaos after the fall of the Roman Empire ; and the laws of the Old Testament, which can be attributed to Jewish influence. Only after Centuries of Roman Catholic terror did the Germanic forces, embodied by Francis of Assisi, Martin Luther and others, turn Christianity into the religion that Jesus had envisioned. In Chamberlain's day, Emperor Wilhelm II was convinced by these theories and even argued that the Old Testament should be removed from the Bible (with the exception of a few Psalms) to sever any remaining links between Christianity and Judaism.

Another recurring theme in Chamberlain's work is the similarity between Germanic thinking and Indian brahmanism, the ancient Indo-Aryan philosophy. He often cites the Upanishads, the Vedas and other sacred Hindu texts to illustrate this idea, and he wrote a whole book, « Arische Weltanschauung » (Aryan World-View) on the subject. In this book, he expressed the opinion that knowledge of the Indo-Aryan philosophy would serve as a counter-balance against a Semitic world-view, and that the Indian sages would show the Westerner the goal of his civilization.

Chamberlain became fascinated by the composer Richard Wagner. He attended the premiere and the following 5 performances of Wagner's « Parsifal » in Bayreuth, during July 1882. Wagner died the following year before the 2 men had ever met, but his genius had a lasting influence on Chamberlain. In 1896, he published his 2nd Wagner-book (« Richard Wagner ») , a popular and important work, still regarded as a Classic. He became honorary member of the « Viennese Akademische Wagnerverein » . During his life, he wrote an estimated 50 essays about Wagner and his music. One of these, « Künstlerische Dankbarkeit » , which compared Wagner and Franz Liszt, was read by Liszt's daughter, Cosima Wagner and, in 1888, she invited Chamberlain for a meeting. Thus, began a lasting friendship, and the 2 carried on an extensive correspondence, until 1908. In that year, Chamberlain married his 2nd wife, Eva, the daughter of Richard and Cosima Wagner.

Germany's Emperor Wilhelm II invited Chamberlain to his palace, at Potsdam. Wilhelm was delighted by the Englishman who had praised the Germanic race to the skies, and in a letter to Chamberlain he wrote :

« It was God who sent the German people your book and you personally to me. »

Chamberlain became Wilhelm II's friend and counsellor. In one of his letters, Chamberlain advised the Emperor :

« Deutschland kann dahin gelangen, die gesamte Erdkugel (teils unmittelbar politisch, teils mittelbar, durch Sprache, Kultur, Methoden) zu beherrschen, wenn es nur gelingt, beizeiten den " neuen Kurs " einzuschlagen, und das heißt, die Nation zum endgültigen Bruch mit den angloamerikanischen Regierungsidealen zu bringen. Die Freiheit, die Deutschland braucht, ist die unbeschränkte Freiheit des Denkens, der Religion, der Wissenschaft - nicht die Freiheit, sich selber schlecht zu regieren. »

« Germany can achieve complete control of the world (partly, by direct political means ; partly, by language, culture, methods) , only if it succeeds in taking a new direction in time, which means the final rupture with Anglo-American ideals of government. The freedom that Germany needs is the unlimited freedom of thought, of religion, of science - not the freedom to rule itself badly. »

After England allied with the « Entente » forces in World War I (1914-1918) , a disappointed Chamberlain accused his fatherland of treason to the Germanic race. During the War, he wrote a series of « Kriegsaufsätze » as German propaganda ; highly-successful War Essays, which have sold hundreds of thousands of copies. The earnings went to the Red Cross. More than once, he mentions in his essays the coming of a future leader, « the man with the lion's heart » . In his essay, « Der Wille zum Sieg » (1916) , he wrote :

« Die Deutschen stehen bereit ; ihnen fehlt nur der vom heiligen Geist eingesetzte Führer. »

(The Germans are ready for it; all that is missing is a God-sent « Führer ».)

Furthermore, he lays in his essays the foundation for what came to be known as the « Dolchstoßlegende » , the dagger-blow legend, that would play an important role in post-War Germany : the idea that some infamous (« Niederträchtige ») elements within Germany would like to see Germany losing the War, and strive after the destruction of the Empire. In contradistinction to what certain historians claim, this point of view isn't entirely unjustified : it was felt within anti-Imperial circles that, if Germany would win, « Kaiser » Wilhelm's position would be stronger than ever, and « life would become impossible » :

« Wenn Deutschland den Krieg gewinnt, dann bleibt das wilhelminische System und dann ist das Leben unmöglich. »

A prominent representative of this movement was Albert Einstein.

In 1915, Houston Stewart Chamberlain received the Iron Cross for services to the German Empire. Having shown his loyalty to Germany, Chamberlain became a German citizen, in 1916. But Germany lost the War and had to sign the Treaty of Versailles - a treaty intended to ruin Germany economically and ensure that it could never fight a major War again, although the treaty also had a financial aspect :

« The occupation of German territory by the Allied troops should be accompanied by the destruction of all the large industries within the sphere of occupation. It is held that if it were known and felt, here and in France, that such a scheme of organised destruction was to be carried-out on German territory, capital would be, at once, stimulated in steady streams in aid of the home industries, which would profit enormously by the course taken. »

This ill-fated plan was indeed carried-out. The ensuing hyperinflation and chaos in Germany made an excellent playground for extremist political groups. And, by the time the Allies alleviated their measures, it was already too late : Adolf Hitler won the elections for the « Reichstag » , on March 5th, 1933.

Many argue that Chamberlain's work influenced Adolf Hitler, although the precise links are unclear. The 2 men did meet in Bayreuth, on September 30th, 1923, on a so-called « German day » . Chamberlain, who was by now elderly, ill and embittered, regarded Hitler as Germany's future saviour and, after this meeting, he wrote to Hitler :

« In no way do you resemble the descriptions depicting you as a fanatic. I even believe that you are the absolute opposite of a fanatic. The fanatic wants to persuade people, you want to convince them, and to convince only. »

This letter meant a success for Hitler, because the famous writer's approval would certainly attract new members to his nascent political movement. After staging an unsuccessful « coup » that began in a Munich Beer Hall, Hitler was imprisoned in Landsberg, where he wrote his political manifesto, « Mein Kampf » . Unfortunately, Hitler's letters from Landsberg to Chamberlain are now lost, and no one knows what Hitler told his fellow-author about writing the book. « Mein Kampf » refers just once to Chamberlain :

« Die offiziellen Stellen der Regierung gingen an den Erkenntnissen eines Houston Stewart Chamberlain genau so gleichgültig vorüber, wie es heute noch geschieht. Diese Leute sind zu dumm, selbst etwas zu denken. »

« Those who had the government of the country in their hands were quite as indifferent to principles of civil wisdom laid down by thinkers like Houston Stewart Chamberlain as our political leaders now are. These people are too stupid to think for themselves. »

The title of « Mein Kampf » echoes « Der Kampf » , the 3rd section of Chamberlain's « Foundations » , which discusses the physical and intellectual battle of Germanics against Roman Catholic Imperialism and Jewish theocracy, although this supposed echo might be coincidental. At any rate, Hitler condemned nationalist German scholars who would write and write but never act :

« Nobody of common sense would appoint to a leading post some Teutonic Methuselah who had been ineffectively preaching some idea for a period of 40 years, until himself and his idea had entered the stage of senile decay. It is typical of such persons that they rant about ancient Teutonic heroes whereas, in reality, they themselves are the woofullest poltroons imaginable. »

It is possible that Hitler didn't have Chamberlain in mind here, and that he had a genuine respect for a fellow-Wagnerite. But Hitler did disagree with Chamberlain's opinions about Germanic Christianity.

Hitler said in one of his « Table Talks » :

« The reason why the ancient world was so pure, light and serene, was that it knew nothing of the 2 great scourges : the pox and Christianity. »

Hitler added, in another conversation, that :

« In my opinion, Houston Stewart Chamberlain was mistaken in regarding Christianity as a reality upon the spiritual level. »

Chamberlain was convinced of a Jewish threat to the Germanic world, and that Jewry poses « a danger to every culture » . But he opposed a violent solution to the « Jewish question » . He insisted :

« We may not even injure a single hair on their heads. »

He didn't believe in Jewish world-conspiracies :

« Doch glaube ich, daß wir geneigt sind, unsere eigenen Kräfte sehr zu unterschätzen und den jüdischen Einfluss sehr zu überschätzen. Hand in Hand damit geht die geradezu lächerliche und empörende Neigung, den Juden zum allgemeinen Sündenbock für alle Laster unserer Zeit zu machen. »

(Yet, I think that we are inclined to under-estimate our own powers and to exaggerate the importance of the Jewish influence. Hand in hand with this goes the perfectly ridiculous and revolting tendency to make the Jews the general scapegoat for all the vices of our time. »

According to Chamberlain's biographer, professor Geoffrey G. Field :

« Hitler, Hess, Goebbels, Eckart, Himmler, von Schirach and, above all, Rosenberg had read Chamberlain and professed to have been influenced by him. Hans Kerrl, the Minister for Church Affairs, and Hans Schemm, the Bayreuth school Master who became Bavarian “ Kultusminister ”, were also firm admirers, while Nazi intellectuals such as Hans Friedrich Karl Günther, Alfred Bäumler, Walter Frank, Ernst Krieck, and the Nobel physicist Philipp Lenard showered him with filial respect. »

Other admirers were Lord Redesdale, Winston Churchill, David Herbert Lawrence, the American senator Albert J. Beveridge, Nobel prize winner Albert Schweitzer, and the Dutch mystic philosopher P. H. Hugenholtz.

In May 1926, Hitler visited the old writer for the last time. A passage in Josef Gœbbels' diary describes the meeting :

« Erschütterende Szene : Chamberlain auf einem Ruhebett. Gebrochen, lallend, die Tränen stehen ihm in den Augen. Er hält meine Hand und will mich nicht lassen. Wie Feuer brennen seine großen Augen. Vater unseres Geistes, sei begrüßt. Bahnbrecher, Wegbereiter ! Ich bin im Tiefsten aufgewühlt. Abschied. Er lallt, will sprechen, es geht nicht - und dann weint er wie ein Kind ! Langer, langer Händedruck ! Leb wohl ! Du bist bei uns, wenn wir verzweifeln wollen. Draußen klatscht Regen ! Ich hab das Bedürfnis zu schreien, zu weinen. »

« Shattering scene : Chamberlain on a couch. Broken, mumbling, tears are in his eyes. He holds my hand and won't let me go. His big eyes burn like fire. Greetings to you, spiritual father. Trailblazer, pioneer ! I am deeply upset. Leave-taking. He mumbles, wants to speak, can't - and, then, weeps like a child ! Long, long hand-shake ! Farewell ! You stand by us when we are near despair. Outside the rain patters ! I want to cry-out, to weep. »

Houston Stewart Chamberlain died of his nervous disease a few months later, on January 9th, 1927, in Bayreuth. He was 71 years old. The last book he had written was « Mensch und Gott » (Man and God) , a plea for a new Christianity without dogmas and sacraments. Upon his headstone were engraved the words of Luke 17:21 :

« Das Reich Gottes ist inwendig in euch. »

(The Kingdom of God is within you.)

...

« I say, therefore, that the men who founded Judaism were goaded on by a demoniacal power. »

« The Jew's existence is sin ; their existence is a crime against the holy laws of life. »

« Not only the Jew, but also all that is derived from the Jewish mind, corrodes and disintegrates what is best in us. »

(Houston Stewart Chamberlain)

The British-born German author of books on political philosophy, natural science and Richard Wagner Houston Stewart

Chamberlain was born on 9 September 1855 in Southsea, Hampshire, England ; and died on 9 January 1927 in Bayreuth, Germany.

Chamberlain married the composer's daughter, Eva, some years after Wagner's death.

His 2 volume book, « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century) , published in 1899, became one of the many references for the pan-Germanic movement of the early 20th Century, and, later, of the « völkisch » anti-Semitism of Nazi racial policy.

Chamberlain was the son of Rear Admiral William Charles Chamberlain, of the Royal Navy. His mother, Eliza Jane, daughter of Captain Basil Hall, of the Royal Navy, died before he was 1 year old, and he was raised by his grandmother in France.

Chamberlain's education began in a « Lycée » in Versailles and most of his education occurred on the continent, but his father had planned a military career for his son and, at the age of 11, he was sent to Cheltenham College, an English boarding-school which produced many army and navy officers.

The young Chamberlain was « a compulsive dreamer » , more interested in the arts than the military, and he developed a fondness for nature and a near-mystical sense of self.

The prospect of serving as an officer in India, or elsewhere in the British Empire, held no attraction for him. In addition, he was a delicate child with poor health.

At the age of 14, he had to be withdrawn from school.

He, then, traveled to various spas around Europe, accompanied by a Prussian tutor, « Herr » Otto Kuntze, who taught him German and interested him in German culture and history.

Chamberlain then went to Geneva, where he studied under Carl Vogt, (a supporter of racial typology at the University of Geneva) Professor Graebe, Müller Argoviensis, Marc Thury, Alexis Plantamour, and other professors.

He studied systematic botany, geology, astronomy, and later the anatomy and physiology of the human body.

Thereafter, he settled at Dresden, where « he plunged heart and soul into the mysterious depths of Wagnerian music and philosophy, the metaphysical works of the “ Master ” probably exercising as strong an influence upon him as the musical dramas » .

Chamberlain was immersed in philosophical writings, and became a « völkisch » author, one of those who were concerned more with art, culture, civilization and spirit than with quantitative physical distinctions between groups.

This is evidenced by his huge treatise on Immanuel Kant with its comparisons.

His knowledge of Friedrich Nietzsche is demonstrated in that work (page 183) and « The Foundations » (page 153) .

By this time, Chamberlain had met his 1st wife, the Prussian Anna Horst, whom he was to divorce in 1905.

In 1889, he moved to Austria. During this time, it is said his ideas on race began taking shape, influenced by the concept of Teutonic supremacy embodied in the works of Wagner and Arthur de Gobineau.

Chamberlain had attended Wagner's Bayreuth Festival, in 1882, and struck-up a close correspondence with his wife Cosima.

In 1908, he married Eva Wagner, the composer's daughter and, the next year, he moved to Germany and became an important member of the « Bayreuth Circle » of German nationalist intellectuals.

He lived close to the Wagners, at 1 « Wahnfriedstraße » in a large, imposing house.

By the time World War I broke-out, in 1914, Chamberlain remained an Englishman only by virtue of his name and nationality. In 1916, he also acquired German citizenship.

He had already begun propagandising on behalf of the German government and continued to do so throughout the War.

His vociferous denunciations of his land of birth, it has been posited, were the culmination of his rejection of his native England's capitalism, in favour of a form of German Romanticism akin to that which he had cultivated in himself during his years at Cheltenham.

Chamberlain received the Iron Cross from the « Kaiser » , with whom he was in regular correspondence, in 1916. After the war Chamberlain's chronically bad health took a turn for the worse and he was left partially paralyzed ; he continued living in Bayreuth until his death, in 1927.

Chamberlain was an admirer of Richard Wagner, and wrote several commentaries on his works including « Notes sur “ Lohengrin ” » (Notes on « Lohengrin » , 1892) ; an analysis of Wagner's drama (1892) ; and a biography (1895) , emphasizing in particular the heroic Teutonic aspects in the composer's works.

In 1899, Chamberlain wrote his most important work, « Die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century) .

« Die Grundlagen » (1899) was the best-selling work by Houston Stewart Chamberlain. In it, he advances various racist and, especially, « völkisch » anti-Semitic theories on how he saw the Aryan race as superior to others, and the Teutonic peoples as a positive force in European civilization ; and the Jews as a negative one.

Chamberlain was a germanophile who adopted German citizenship and wrote most of his works in German (on numerous subjects, from biographies to biology) .

Published in German, the book focuses on the controversial notion that Western civilization is deeply marked by the influence of the Teutonic peoples.

Chamberlain grouped all European peoples (not just Germans, but Celts, Slavs, Greeks, and Latins) into the « Aryan race » , a race built on the ancient Proto-Indo-European culture.

At the helm of the Aryan race, and, indeed, all races, were the Nordic or Teutonic peoples.

« Certain anthropologists would fain teach us that all races are equally gifted ; we point to history and answer : that is a lie ! The races of mankind are markedly different in the nature and, also, in the extent of their gifts, and the Germanic races belong to the most highly-gifted group, the group usually termed Aryan. Physically and mentally, the Aryans are pre-eminent among all peoples ; for that reason, they are, by right, the lords of the world. »

Chamberlain's book focused on the claim that the Teutonic peoples were the heirs to the Empires of Greece and Rome, something which Charlemagne and some of his successors also believed.

He argued that, when the Germanic tribes destroyed the Roman Empire, Jews and other non-Europeans already dominated it.

The Germans, therefore, saved Western civilization from Semitic domination.

Chamberlain's thoughts were influenced by the writings of Arthur de Gobineau who had argued the superiority of the « Aryan race » .

Joseph Arthur Comte de Gobineau (born on 14 July 1816, Ville-d'Avray, Hauts-de-Seine ; died on 13 October 1882, Turin) was a French aristocrat, novelist and man of letters who became famous for developing the racialist theory of the Aryan Master race in his book, « An Essay on the Inequality of the Human Races » (1853-1855) . De Gobineau is credited as being the father of modern racial demography.

This term was increasingly being used to describe Caucasian or European peoples, as opposed to Jews, who were conceptualised as « infusing Near-Eastern poison into the European body politic » .

For Chamberlain, the concept of an Aryan race was not simply defined by ethno-linguistic origins. It was also an abstract ideal of a racial elite.

The Aryan, or « noble » race was always in the process of creation as superior peoples supplanted inferior ones in evolutionary struggles for survival.

Chamberlain (who had graduate training in biology) rejected Darwinism, evolution and social Darwinism and, instead, emphasized « gestalt » which he said derived from Goethe. Chamberlain said that Darwinism was the most abominable and misguided doctrine of the day.

« The Foundations » sold extensively : 8 editions and 60,000 copies within 10 years ; 100,000 copies by the outbreak of World War I ; and 24 editions and more than a quarter of a million copies by 1938.

The 1911 translation received positive reviews in most of the English press.

It was praised in « The Spectator » as « a monument of erudition » .

The « Birmingham Post » said that it was « glowing with life, packed with fresh and vigorous thought » .

The « Glasgow Herald » thought that it would be difficult to « over-estimate the stimulating qualities of the book » .

In the « Times » Literary Supplement, it was declared to be « one of the books that really mattered » .

In the Left-wing « Fabian News » , George Bernard Shaw called it, a « historical Masterpiece » . « Those who failed to read it, would be unable to talk intelligently about contemporary sociological and political problems. »

The United States President, Theodore Roosevelt, altogether more cautious, highlighted the extreme bias of the author, a judgement that seems to have escaped other contemporary readers, but praised Chamberlain's denunciation of social egalitarianism.

« Kaiser » Wilhelm II patronized Chamberlain, maintaining a correspondence, inviting him to stay at his Court, distributing copies of « Die Grundlagen » to the German army, and seeing that « Die Grundlagen » was carried in German libraries and included in the school « curricula » .

Chamberlain's ideas on race were greatly influential to Adolf Hitler, who readily adapted them into his Nazi ideology ; Chamberlain himself joined the Nazi Party, and both Hitler and Josef Goebbels visited Chamberlain whilst on his deathbed.

« Die Grundlagen » would prove to be a seminal work in German nationalism ; due to its success, aided by Chamberlain's association with the Wagner « Circle » , its ideas of Aryan supremacy and a struggle against Jewish influence spread widely across the German State, at the beginning of the 20th Century.

If it did not form the framework of later National-Socialist ideology, at the very least, it provided its adherents with an intellectual justification.

Chamberlain himself lived to see his ideas begin to bear fruit.

Adolf Hitler, while still growing as a political figure in Germany, visited him several times (in 1923 and in 1926, together with Josef Goebbels, at the Wagner family's property in Bayreuth.

Chamberlain joined the Nazi Party and contributed to its publications.

Its primary journal, the « Völkischer Beobachter » dedicated 5 columns to praising him on his 70th birthday, describing « Die Grundlagen » as the « gospel of the Nazi movement » .

Hitler later attended Chamberlain's funeral, in January 1927, along with several highly-ranked members of the Nazi Party.

Composer Edward Elgar wrote his Symphony No. 2 in E-flat major, Opus 63, in the year 1911, 1 year after the death of Edward VII.

The great funereal peroration of the 2nd movement, written ostensibly in response to the King's death, broadens-out into a vast elegy, foretelling the dissolution of an age.

The seeds of that coming dissolution were endemic, and were to be found particularly in the countries of Central Europe and, particularly, Germany.

Edward Alexander Crowley (Georges Gurdjieff's sometime rival) was not the only Englishman to fascinate and influence the German people at this time ; in fact, Crowley's influence was insignificant when compare to that of another Englishman : Houston Stewart Chamberlain.

...

As fate would have it, Houston Stewart Chamberlain was not educated, as one would expect, in the English public school tradition, which may well have induced him to follow in the exalted footsteps of his elders, but rather he was brought-up in Paris, by relatives, who engaged, for reasons best-known to themselves, a Prussian tutor to supervise his education.

As a result, he became fluent in the German language and remarkably well-versed in German literature, poetry, music and philosophy.

By the age of 27, Chamberlain had become so imbued with Richard Wagner's music and « philosophy » that he decided to take-up residence in Germany, permanently, moving to Dresden in 1882.

In that same year, Chamberlain met Richard Wagner at Bayreuth, in Bavaria, during the « Festspiel » . They were 2 men who were made for each other.

Chamberlain found in Wagner the father figure he craved ; and Wagner found in Chamberlain the devoted disciple which he had sought, unsuccessfully in Ludwig II and Nietzsche.

Whereas Nietzsche had rejected Wagner's last, and arguably greatest work, « Parsifal » , to Chamberlain, it was a summation of all his thoughts regarding the sacred role that Germany was to play in the « world historical process »

« The Spear of Longinus » , which is a central element of the « sacred Festival drama » came to fascinate Chamberlain, as it had fascinated many before, and would fascinate many others in the future.

(The « Spear of destiny » is kept in the « Weltliche Schatzkammer » , which is situated in the « Hofburg » Palace, which was the « Residenz » of the Austrian Hapsburg Emperors, in Vienna. The phrase itself means « Secular Treasury » , and is the area in the « Hofburg » where treasures, which are not used in religious rituals, are kept. The « Weltliche Schatzkammer » is open to the public on a regular basis, at the present time.)

In 1889, Chamberlain settled in Vienna, where he lived for the next 20 years, making regular visits to the « Weltliche Schatzkammer » , in the « Hofburg » , where the original spear, which was part of the « Reichskleinodien » , was displayed. As in Wagner's music-drama, the spear in the « Hofburg » is claimed to be the very Spear which pierced the side of Jesus of Nazareth, as he hung upon the cross.

Whether or not this is true is a moot point ; but the Spear is, undoubtedly, ancient and has long been venerated.

Regardless of that, it is considered by some commentators that Chamberlain's communion with the Spear may have, in some way altered his awareness.

In Chamberlain's autobiography « Lebenswege » , he makes the revealing statement that he was often unable to recognize his works as being the product of his own thought.

Chamberlain, it appears, was driven by dæmons just as much as Crowley.

His books were written in a state of hysterical intoxication and trance, and owed, by his own admission, little of their fundamental substance to that, admittedly, brilliant intellect.

Later, Chamberlain married ; but, in 1905, he divorced his Prussian wife and married Richard Wagner's daughter, Eva.

In 1909, he moved to Bayreuth where he lived until his death, in 1927.

It was in 1899 that he published his greatest work, « Die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The foundations of the 19th Century) : a volume of over 1,200 pages, in German.

Despite its length and difficulty, it eventually sold over a quarter of a million copies, and, in the event, made its author a rich man.

The work was stupendous, both in its breadth of scholarship and its complexity of thought.

It was intended to present, and successfully achieved a union of disparate artistic, philosophical, historical and racial theories which had been developing in Germany for the previous 50 years.

Undoubtedly, Chamberlain, at the book's inception, viewed it personally as the new bible of the Pan-Germanic movement, but despite this, he was admittedly staggered by the remarkable response the book elicited, from all levels of society.

The final accolade came when the « Kaiser » invited Chamberlain to Potsdam and greeted him with an affirmation that it was God who had ordained that Chamberlain's book should be given to the German people and their « Kaiser » .

« Die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » is, essentially a grand synthesis of numerous ideas which had been simmering in the German intellect for many years.

Essential elements of this synthesis were Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel's concept of the « world historical process » ; Friedrich Nietzsche's theory of the « Übermensch » (superman) ; Arthur de Gobineau's and Wagner's notion of the superiority of the Aryan race, along with various other ideas circulating in « völkisch » and pan-Germanic « Circles » .

The fact that both Nietzsche and Wagner suffered from the same dæmonic creative possession as Chamberlain, combined with the fact that most of the contemporaneous « völkisch » and pan-Germanic groups had strong occult leanings is, undoubtedly, significant, particularly when one considers the cataclysm which was about to break some 15 years later.

It was not long before Chamberlain became an unofficial adviser to the « Kaiser » .

A total of 43 lengthy letters, from Chamberlain to the « Kaiser » , survived, in which Chamberlain attempts to fill his sovereign with glorious visions of the destiny which awaits the Aryan race, and Germany in particular.

Such encouragement was, in Chamberlain's view necessary as, contrary to popular belief, the « Kaiser » was not bellicose by nature.

The son of Queen Victoria's eldest daughter Vicky, speaking perfect English, he was a devoted husband, worshipping the « Kaiserin » , Auguste Viktoria of Schleswig-Holstein, known to her family Donna, and doting over his large family. He was sentimental and lazy, and painfully aware of his deformed arm.

Like Chamberlain, he too was driven by a dæmon, but it was not of the super-natural order.

The demon that drove the « Kaiser » was the endless fear that, because of his deformity, he was not a real man, in a society which glorified militarism and the heroic virtues ; a society which he led. Under the influence of Chamberlain, and members of the High-Command, his insecurity manifested itself in aggressive statements of foreign policy.

When War eventually came, he feared its consequences as much as anyone.

When the War ended, he was forced into permanent exile at Doorn, in Holland.

There, strangely enough, he amassed one of the largest collections of occult literature in the world.

Perhaps, his dæmons were like Chamberlain's after all.

Chamberlain was luckier.

Unlike the « Kaiser » , who was punished for the War he did not start or want, Chamberlain was left unpunished for encouraging the conflagration for which he had assiduously provided the tinder. Chamberlain continued to live peacefully and comfortably in Bayreuth.

As he was of no further use, his dæmons had left him.

They would return to him, however, in his last years (summoned by another) for while the « Kaiser » had been the apprentice to Chamberlain's sorcery. Now, Chamberlain himself would become the « sorcerer's apprentice » to Adolf Hitler.

...

Houston Stewart Chamberlain : British-born Germanophile political philosopher, whose advocacy of the racial and cultural superiority of the so-called Aryan element in European culture influenced pan-German and German nationalist thought, particularly Adolf Hitler's National-Socialist movement.

Educated at Versailles, Geneva, and Vienna, Chamberlain became an admirer of Richard Wagner, publishing his 1st work, « Notes sur " Lohengrin " » (Notes on « Lohengrin ») , in 1892. An analysis of Wagner's drama (1892) and a biography (1895) followed. In these publications, Chamberlain emphasized the heroic Teutonic aspects in the composer's works. In 1899, he published « Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts » (The Foundations of the 19th Century, in 2 volumes, 1911) , a broad but biased analysis of European culture, in which he claimed that the Western Aryan peoples have been responsible for the greatness and creativity of Europe, and that the Jewish influence has been primarily negative. Chamberlain's theories owed much to the writings of Joseph Arthur, comte de Gobineau, who was the 1st to claim to prove the superiority of the « Nordic » race.

Chamberlain's later works included studies of Immanuel Kant (1905) and Gøethe (1912) , various essays defending Germany's military efforts and aims during World War I, the autobiographical « Lebenswege meines Denkens » (Paths of My Thought, 1919) , and « Rasse und Persönlichkeit » (Race and Personality, 1925) . In 1907, he settled in Bayreuth and married Wagner's only daughter Eva, his 2nd wife. Remaining in Germany during World War I, Chamberlain received the German Military Cross, in 1915, and became naturalized the next year.

...

Anglo-German musical critic and anti-Semitic writer ; son of Admiral William Charles Chamberlain. He received his early education abroad, being sent to France, where he went to school at Versailles. Subsequently, he removed to Switzerland and studied science at Geneva University and, finally, he settled in Austria, where he became privat-docent in philosophy at the University of Vienna.

Besides several works on Richard Wagner, from whom he probably imbibed much of his anti-Semitism, he has attracted attention by his chief work, « Die Grundlagen des 19. Jahrhunderts » , Munich (1899) ; 4th edition (1902) . In this, he regards all history as a conflict between the Aryans and the Semites ; the latter being regarded as a special genus, « homo Syriacus » , of which the Jew, « homo Judaicus » , is a typical species. Race rules history ; and the influence of the Semites, in the early forms of Christianity, broke down the ancient world, which had to be revived by the new blood of Germanism against which the Roman Catholic Church is perpetually struggling in order to introduce once more the abstract universalism of the Semite. Chamberlain dreads a world-supremacy on the part of the Jews, and attacks in every way their intellectual, moral, and religious qualities. While evincing great admiration for the character and views of Jesus, so great is his anti-Semitic bias that he denies Jesus' Jewish origin.

Chamberlain's journalistic style and wide generalizations have attracted considerable attention, especially in German-Jewish journalism, as can be seen from the accompanying bibliography.

...

Despite his undoubted devotion to the Villa « Wahnfried » , Chamberlain kept astonishingly much on his mind beyond Wagner. In 1889, only 1 year after that 1st meeting with Cosima, he and Anna abandoned Dresden and set-up house in Vienna. In his memoirs, Chamberlain says he made the move not just because the Habsburg capital was blessed with much culture (true) and better weather (arguable) , but also because it was the home of Julius Wiesner, a professor of botany whose work had intrigued him while he was studying in Geneva. The latter argument is not as spurious as it may seem. Chamberlain was now well into his 30's and uncomfortably aware, as his letters show, that he was still much dependent on the « largesse » of relatives and 1 or 2 rich admirers. He, thus, seems to have reluctantly concluded that it was time to make another stab at qualifying himself and earning a living. Accordingly, he enrolled at the Vienna University and took-up work again for a doctorate, probing what caused the movement of sap in plants. He failed to finish his studies, typically casting his net ever wider so that what began as a limited investigation became a quasi-philosophical hunt for the essence of life itself ; but doctorate or not, the city with its sweet-sour charm would not let him go. Chamberlain finally stayed there for all of 2 decades, usually in the closest touch with Bayreuth and often visiting the Festival, but gradually winning an intellectual independence all but unknown in « Wahnfried » 's « inner Circle » .

It is easy to see why Chamberlain loved Vienna. His spacious apartment was only a few minutes walk from the wide, tree-lined « Ringstraße » , encircling much of the city centre and built by special command of Emperor Franz-Josef a few decades before to match the « boulevards » of Paris. The Court Opera, the grandest building on the « Ring » , offered fine performances that reached stellar heights after the fiercely uncompromising Gustav Mahler became director in 1897. Theatres, museums and libraries equalled any in the German-speaking world and the ubiquitous coffee houses offered an ideal combination of club and 2nd home for rich and poor alike. Besides, as Chamberlain gleefully noted to a French friend, the city abounded in pretty women of easy morals. Despite his long-standing ailments and intense intellectual pursuits (not to mention his marriage) , Chamberlain had found time to philander even before his arrival in Vienna. Once there, he became involved in new affairs, including a lengthy one with an actress called Lili Petri whom some of his friends thought he might one day marry. But, in the end, it was the attraction of belonging to the Wagner Clan that Chamberlain found irresistible.

What Chamberlain most loathed about Vienna is plain too : its Jews. Hitherto his anti-Semitic comments had been intermittent and, despite the influence of Bayreuth, usually marked more by disdain than hatred. In Dresden, he had actually claimed to feel real sympathy for Jews after hearing brutish charges made against them there, at a tub-thumping rally. But he soon began to change his tune in fast-growing Vienna, focus of the social and political unrest seething throughout the multinational Empire. Jews were more visible there than in most German cities, thanks to the often poverty-stricken « Ostjuden » with their distinctive dress and habits who (to the embarrassment of many already-established brethren) streamed in from the east to find work. Moreover, although they made-up less than 10 % of the population of greater Vienna, Jews already accounted for nearly 1/3 of the students at the University and, in some Faculties like medicine, almost a half. They were prominent in music even before Gustav Mahler took-over at the Opera and highly-active in the press and publishing. To the hyper-sensitive, intellectual newcomer from Dresden, the Jewish influence that had seemed an irritation started to loom as a threat.

At 1st, Chamberlain's growing hostility was directed largely at Jews, not at other groups from all over the Empire that helped people Vienna. He even said he was elated to live amid such a colourful mix of Magyars, Poles, Czechs, Slovaks, Slovenes and the rest. But that feeling gradually changed too. During his long trip on horseback with Anna through the Balkans, in 1891, Chamberlain began to be obsessed with race - comparing what he regarded as degenerate Slavs with pure, fair-haired Serbs. He also joined the « Neuer Wagner-Verein » (New Wagner Society) , a group that had broken away from Vienna's main Wagner association and which, unlike the parent body, flirted with nationalist politics - even with prom-fascists like Georg von Schönerer, leader of the (Austrian) Empire's pan-Germans. Chamberlain despised Schönerer and had become involved with the « New » Society mainly because the old one had increasingly criticised Cosima's imperious rule in Bayreuth. But the more he came into contact with nationalist Circles and observed the Jews and Slavs around him, the more he began to see history in terms of racial conflict - with the Germans the highest strain, but gravely endangered.

...

Houston Stewart Chamberlain (geboren 9. September 1855 in Portsmouth, England ; gestorben 9. Januar 1927 in Bayreuth) war ein Schriftsteller, Verfasser zahlreicher populärwissenschaftlicher Werke, unter anderem zu Richard Wagner, Immanuel Kant und Johann Wolfgang von Goethe, mit pangermanischer und antisemitischer Einstellung. Sein bekanntestes Werk sind die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts (1899) , das zu einem Standardwerk des rassistischen und ideologischen Antisemitismus in Deutschland avancierte.

Houston Stewart Chamberlain wurde in Portsmouth im Stadtteil Southsea geboren und entstammte einer wohlhabenden Adelsfamilie. Chamberlains Mutter starb bald nach seiner Geburt, wodurch der vielbeschäftigte Vater, Konteradmiral William Charles Chamberlain, die Verantwortung für die Erziehung der drei Söhne übernehmen mußte. Vater und Sohn blieben sich zeit ihres Lebens fremd, was vor allem daran lag, daß Chamberlain und seine Brüder die nächsten zehn Jahre in Versailles bei der Großmutter und der Tante verbrachten und ihren Vater kaum zu Gesicht bekamen.

1866 kehrte Chamberlain nach England zurück, da es der Vater nicht gern sah, daß sich sein Sohn immer mehr von seinem Heimatland entfremdete und besser Französisch als Englisch zu sprechen begann. In der neuen Schule kam der scheue und sensible Junge nicht zurecht und war ständigen Anfeindungen seiner Mitschüler ausgesetzt. Dieses Gefühl des Fremdseins im eigenen Land, bereits in frühester Jugend entwickelt, begünstigte später seine Hinwendung zum Deutschtum. 1869 kehrte er aufgrund gesundheitlicher Probleme nach Frankreich zurück und verbrachte zusammen mit seiner Tante die nächsten neun Jahre auf Reisen durch Europa.

Den wohl wichtigsten Einfluss auf Chamberlains neu erwachte Liebe zum Deutschtum hatte der deutsche Theologiestudent und spätere Pastor der deutschen evangelischen Gemeinde in San Remo Otto Kuntze. Er half dem gesundheitlich angeschlagenen, aber sehr interessierten Knaben, seine Studien zu ordnen und förderte sein Interesse an Shakespeare und den Naturstudien. Chamberlain selbst begann, angeregt durch Kuntzes Deutschunterricht, sich neben französischen Klassikern vermehrt mit deutscher Literatur zu beschäftigen. Goethe, Schiller und Kant zählten zu seinen Lieblingsautoren.

1873 mußte Chamberlain auf Druck seines Vaters nach England zurückkehren, da sich dieser für seinen Sohn eine Karriere in der britischen Armee erhoffte. Da das raue englische Klima für Chamberlains Gesundheit abträglich war und dieser keinerlei Ambitionen für die Vorstellungen seines Vaters zeigte, durfte er nach Frankreich zurückgehen. Er wurde mit einer jährlichen Leibrente bedacht, die ihm ein relativ unabhängiges Leben außerhalb des Einflussbereiches seiner Familie ermöglichte. Während eines Aufenthaltes im schweizerischen Aarmühle, 1891 in Interlaken umbenannt, lernte er durch Leutnant Reinhold von Twardowski (1851-1933) den renommierten Juristen Oscar Borchardt (1845-1917) kennen. Chamberlain schreibt in seinen Lebenserinnerungen Lebenswege meines Denkens über Borchardt :

« Es würde mir schwer fallen, wollte ich alle Keime zu zukünftiger Bildung aufzählen, die ich diesem Freunde verdanke. »

Daß Borchardt aus einer jüdischen Familie stammte, wird ihm wohl verborgen geblieben sein. Im Winter 1874 lernte Chamberlain in Cannes seine spätere erste Frau Anna Horst kennen. 1878, nach dem Tod seines Vaters, heirateten die beiden und reisten mehrere Monate lang durch Europa, bis sie sich 1879 in Genf niederließen und Chamberlain mit dem Studium der Naturwissenschaften an der Universität Genf begann.

Aufgrund seines Fleißes und seines Ehrgeizes absolvierte Chamberlain bereits 1881 das Baccalaureus-Examen und begann bald darauf mit seiner Doktorarbeit, die sich mit dem Wurzeldruck bei Pflanzen befasste. Unerwartete Probleme und zeitaufwendige Experimente verzögerten immer wieder die Fertigstellung. Ein schwerer Nervenzusammenbruch im Herbst 1884 war die Folge ; sie führte zu einer jahrelangen Unterbrechung seiner naturwissenschaftlichen Forschungen.

Gesundheitlich angegriffen und durch verschiedene Börsengeschäfte auch finanziell in Schwierigkeiten, geriet Chamberlain nun wieder in die Abhängigkeit von seiner Familie. Erneut mit einer Leibrente ausgestattet, zog er mit seiner Frau nach Dresden. Einerseits war das Leben in Deutschland billiger als in der Schweiz, andererseits reizte die beiden das dortige kulturelle Angebot an Theater und Musik. Von seinen Ärzten überzeugt, daß eine akademische Karriere seiner angegriffenen Gesundheit noch weiter schaden würde, füllte Chamberlain seine im Übermaß vorhandene Freizeit nicht nur mit zahlreichen kulturellen Aktivitäten aus, sondern vertiefte sich außerdem in das Studium von Kant und Platon. Beide Autoren fanden in seinen späteren Werken eingehende Betrachtung.

Zudem engagierte er sich aktiv im lokalen Wagner-Club. Zunächst noch relativ unbekannt, publizierte Chamberlain 1888 seinen ersten deutschsprachigen Artikel, der die Aufmerksamkeit und das Interesse des so genannten inneren Wahnfried-Zirkels um Cosima Wagner erweckte. Mit ihr verband den introvertierten Chamberlain eine lebenslange Freundschaft, die in einem umfangreichen Briefwechsel dokumentiert ist.

Nachdem sich Chamberlain von seinem Nervenzusammenbruch erholt hatte, beschloss er, seine naturwissenschaftlichen Studien, die er in Genf im Rahmen seiner Doktorarbeit begonnen hatte, innerhalb eines Jahres zum Abschluß zu bringen. Als seine Arbeit 1897 unter dem Titel « Recherches sur la sève ascendante » veröffentlicht wurde, hatte Chamberlain kein Interesse mehr daran, sie der Universität Genf als Doktorarbeit vorzulegen. Ihm wurde auch ohne akademischen Titel Ruhm und Anerkennung zuteil, und der bekennende Dilettant konnte sich nun voll und ganz der Schriftstellerei widmen.

Auch in Wien war Chamberlain in ständigem Kontakt mit dem Wahnfried-Zirkel. Cosima Wagner empfahl ihm als Lektüre Arthur de Gobineaus Essay über die Ungleichheit der Menschenrassen (« Essai sur l'inégalité des races humaines » , 1853-1855) . Er verglich die Aussagen des Buches mit den alltäglich in Wien beobachteten Volkstumskonflikten (zum Beispiel im Zusammenhang mit der Badenischen Sprachenverordnung) , und bei ihm setzte sich zunehmend der Gedanke fest, die deutsche Kultur vor « fremden » Einflüssen und den Folgen « rassischer Durchmischung » schützen zu müßen. Die « Degeneriertheit » Wiens, die er zu sehen glaubte, machte ihn umso empfänglicher für die vom Bayreuther Kreis um Cosima Wagner propagierte politische und religiöse « Erlösung » .

Wien war neben Bayreuth das zweite große Zentrum des Wagnerkultes. In diesen Umgebungen begann Chamberlain mit der Arbeit an seinem ersten größeren Werk, einer Biographie über den von ihm verehrten Richard Wagner (erschienen 1895) , die jedoch den Schwerpunkt nicht auf biographische Daten legt, sondern die Beweggründe Wagners in den Bereichen der Politik, der Philosophie und der Musik wiederzugeben versucht.

Im Februar 1896 begann er die Arbeit für sein Hauptwerk, die Grundlagen des Neunzehnten Jahrhunderts, und schloß das 1200-seitige Werk in nur 19 Monaten ab. Das Buch wurde zu einem großen Erfolg und löste nach dem Erscheinen zahlreiche Kontroversen aus :

« Die Konventikler und Pamphletisten des primitiven Antisemitismus erhielten eine unerwartete Bestätigung aus dem Bereich der hohen Bildung. Mit der Theorie des Sozialdarwinismus ließen sich Chamberlains Lehren leicht verbinden, das geschah alsbald in alldeutschen Kreisen, die ihn verehrten. Die “ Deutschen Christen ” beriefen sich später auf ihn, ebenso wie auf Paul de Lagarde, Julius Langbehn und Arthur Bonus, den Kündler der germanischen Religion. »

Chamberlain schuf mit den Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts ein Standardwerk des theoretischen Rassenantisemitismus, das einen großen Einfluss auf die Vorstellungen Alfred Rosenbergs und später Adolf Hitlers hatte. Aber nicht nur in antisemitischen und deutschnationalen Kreisen fand sich die Leserschaft der Grundlagen. Kaiser Wilhelm II. war ebenso angetan von Chamberlain wie David Herbert Lawrence, Winston Churchill und sogar Albert Schweitzer. Zum herausragenden Erfolg des Buches konstatiert Wanda Kampmann :

« Man war am Ende des positivistischen Jahrhunderts der Detailforschung und ihrer widersprüchlichen Ergebnisse müde, und dann war es wohl der Kulturenthusiasmus, die Verklärung von Kunst, Kultur und Religion als schöpferische Leistung des germanischen Geistes, die der Bildungsschwärmerei einer breiten Leserschicht entgegenkam, ferner die Rassentheorie, die eine unsicher gewordene Generation in ihrem Selbstgefühl stärkte und nicht zuletzt die Überredungskraft, die von Simplifikation jederzeit ausgeht. »

Motiviert durch den großen Erfolg seiner Werke, verfasste Chamberlain neben zahlreichen Aufsätzen zu Richard Wagner und Bayreuth in den folgenden Jahren einige Bühnenstücke und zahlreiche Monographien, darunter eine Einführung in das Werk Immanuel Kants (1905) .

In diesen schriftstellerisch sehr produktiven Jahren kam es auch in seinem Privatleben zu Veränderungen. Die Beziehung zu seiner Frau Anna war über die Jahre abgekühlt, und Chamberlain, der in Haus Wahnfried ein- und ausging, ehelichte nach einer schnellen, einvernehmlichen Scheidung Eva Wagner, die Tochter von Richard und Cosima Wagner. Die 41-Jährige reichte ihm die Hand, nachdem er schon ihrer Schwester Blandine 1896 Liebesbriefe geschrieben und sich auch von Isolde Wagner einen Korb geholt hatte.

Die Jahre bis zum Ersten Weltkrieg verbrachte Chamberlain relativ ruhig in seinem Haus in Bayreuth. Die einzige Monographie aus diesen Jahren war eine Abhandlung über das Leben und die Werke Goethes (1912) . Daneben verfasste er einige Aufsätze zu Kant, Goethe und Wagner und genoss ansonsten sein Leben als angesehener Autor. Doch die weltpolitische Lage, das Säbelrasseln zwischen seiner alten Heimat England und seinem gelobten Land Deutschland, führte bei Chamberlain zu einem Bewusstseinswandel. Die Folge war eine Flut an Aufsätzen und Publikationen, die sich mit den Kriegsursachen und -folgen beschäftigten. Im August 1916 wurde er deutscher Staatsbürger. Seine einseitige Parteinahme für das Deutsche Reich brachte ihm in der britischen Presse den Ruf eines Abtrünnigen ein, und er verspielte fast vollständig das Ansehen, das er sich im Ausland für seine Grundlagen erworben hatte. 1917 trat er in die Deutsche Vaterlandspartei ein.

Die Niederlage des Deutschen Reiches überraschte Chamberlain sehr. Er konnte nicht verstehen, daß das Land kapitulierte, obwohl deutsche Soldaten immer noch feindliches Territorium besetzt hielten. Analog zur damals sehr populären Dolchstoßlegende sah Chamberlain die Ursache für die Niederlage Deutschlands in einer konspirativen Verschwörung der Juden. Da er inzwischen aufgrund einer Quecksilbervergiftung gelähmt und von seiner Nervenkrankheit stark gezeichnet war, ging auch seine schriftstellerische Produktivität zurück.

Seine letzte größere Veröffentlichung zu Lebzeiten war eine autobiographische Zusammenstellung verschiedener Briefe und Texte, 1919 unter dem Titel Lebenswege meines Denkens veröffentlicht. An das Krankenbett gefesselt und abgeschieden von der Außenwelt setzte Chamberlain seine Hoffnung in den damals 34-jährigen Adolf Hitler, der ihn 1923 kurz nach dem Deutschen Tag von Bayreuth in seinem Haus besuchte. Chamberlain war sehr beeindruckt und schrieb in einem Brief an Hitler :

« Sie sind überhaupt nicht der Fanatiker, als welcher Sie mir beschrieben worden sind. Ein Fanatiker entflammt den Geist, Sie wärmen das Herz. Ein Fanatiker will die Menschen mit Worten überwältigen ; Sie wollen überzeugen, nur überzeugen, und das ist der Grund, warum Sie erfolgreich sind. »

Der Weimarer Republik stand er ablehnend gegenüber ; ebenso lehnte er das demokratische System an sich ab und glaubte, es entspreche nicht dem Wesen des deutschen Volkes. Chamberlain verstarb am 9. Januar 1927 im Alter von 71 Jahren. Am 12. Januar fand auf dem Coburger Stadtfriedhof eine Trauerfeier mit anschließender Einäscherung statt. Anwesend waren unter anderem Adolf Hitler, Wilhelm von Preußen und Ernst von Hohenlohe-Langenburg.

Zusammenfassend muß Chamberlain als einer der wichtigsten intellektuellen Wegbereiter des nationalsozialistischen Rassismus gesehen werden. David Clay Large resümiert in seinem Artikel über Richard Wagner und Chamberlain :

« Chamberlain selbst hielt sein Verständnis der Rassenfrage für einen Fortschritt gegenüber den Äußerungen Wagners. An dieser Stelle bleibt festzuhalten, daß die Nationalsozialisten Chamberlains Ideen nicht noch verbessern mußten - es reichte, sie zu einem logischen Abschluß zu bringen und in die Wirklichkeit umzusetzen. »

Chamberlain wurde 1922 Ehrenbürger der Stadt Bayreuth ; 1988 wurde ihm die Ehrenbürgerschaft wieder aberkannt. Er hinterließ der Stadt eine große Erbschaft, und sein Wohnhaus dient heute als Jean-Paul-Museum. Eine 1937 nach ihm benannte Straße wurde 1947 umbenannt, eine 1958 an einer anderen Stelle der Stadt geschaffene im Jahr 1989 ebenfalls. Das gemeinsame Grab mit seiner Frau Eva geborene von Bülow befindet sich auf dem Stadtfriedhof in Bayreuth.

Veröffentlichungen

Das Drama Richard Wagners. Eine Anregung. Breitkopf & Härtel, Wien (1892) .

Richard Wagner. Illustrationen Alexander Frenz. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag, München (1895) .

Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag, 1899. (Band 1 als Digitalisat und Volltext im Deutschen Textarchiv ; Band 2 als Digitalisat und Volltext im Deutschen Textarchiv.)

Arische Weltanschauung. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag (1905) .

Heinrich von Stein und seine Weltanschauung. Georg Heinrich Meyer, Leipzig (1903) - mit Friedrich Poske.

Immanuel Kant. Die Persönlichkeit als Einführung in das Werk. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag (1905) .

Göthe. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag (1912) .

Kriegsaufsätze. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag (1915)

Enthält die sechs Aufsätze

« Deutsche Friedensliebe » ; « Deutsche Freiheit » ; « Die deutsche Sprache » ; « Deutschland als führender Weltstaat » ; « England » ; « Deutschland » .

Lebenswege meines Denkens. Friedrich Bruckmann Verlag (1919) .

Paul Pretzsch (Herausgeber) : Cosima Wagner und Houston Stewart Chamberlain im Briefwechsel (1888-1908) . Reclam, Leipzig (1934) .

Bayreuth après la mort de Wagner

Après la mort de Richard Wagner à Venise, le mardi 13 février 1883, Bayreuth devient le lieu de rassemblement d'un groupe soutenu par Cosima et formé d'admirateurs zélés du compositeur. À la mort de Cosima et de Siegfried, en 1930, la responsabilité du Festival échoit à la veuve de ce dernier, Winnifred, amie personnelle du chancelier Adolf Hitler. Hitler est lui-même un zélé de Wagner, donnant une lecture National-Socialiste à un anti-sémitisme retiré de son contexte, et aux thèmes germaniques qui jalonnent l'œuvre, censée inscrire le Maître de Bayreuth dans l'idéologie nazie. Il déclara un jour que le National-Socialisme n'avait eu qu'un seul prédécesseur légitime : Richard Wagner. Les Nazis font un usage courant de sa musique et la jouent lors de leurs grands rassemblements. Il n'est pas le seul compositeur apprécié des nazis : Beethoven et Bruckner sont aussi récupérés par le régime. Les Nazis faisaient un usage courant de cette musique et la jouaient lors de leurs grands rassemblements.

Le Festival de Bayreuth se déroule au cours la période durant laquelle tous les autres théâtres sont fermés. Les musiciens, chefs d'orchestre et chanteurs peuvent ainsi s'y produire, en venant de toute l'Europe. Le 1er Festival ayant été un échec financier, chacun avait alors renoncé à son cachet. Une tradition qui perdura jusque après la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Venir à Bayreuth constituait un honneur ! Le dernier chef à se produire gratuitement à Bayreuth fut Hans Knappertsbusch.

Ni la salle, ni la scène n'ont subi de modifications essentielles depuis 1876. En revanche, divers ajouts ont été effectués au cours des ans au corps même du bâtiment :

Ainsi, dès 1881, Wagner confie à Otto Brückwald la construction d'une sorte d'avant-corps de réception qui brise la nudité formelle de la façade extérieure du « Festspielhaus », appelé le « Königsbau », théoriquement destiné à permettre au roi Louis II de s'isoler, lors de ses visites.

En 1888, Cosima fera remplacer l'éclairage au gaz par un éclairage à l'électricité.

En 1925, Siegfried Wagner fera édifier une vaste arrière-scène, qui augmente d'un tiers la profondeur virtuelle de la scène, en élargit les dégagements, et, par le percement de larges vantaux ouverts au nord vers les magasins de décors, il facilite la circulation des grands praticables que l'on commence, à cette époque, à utiliser.

En 1931, Winnifred Wagner élargit encore les dégagements latéraux et fait construire tout un ensemble de bureaux administratifs et de salles de répétitions, notamment du côté ouest du bâtiment.

En 1952 et 1958, l'éclairage est complètement rénové et les structures sont consolidées. C'est à cette époque que les éléments porteurs en bois sont remplacé par des éléments en béton. Les grands « X » que forment les poutres, sur la façade, disparaissent.

En 1964, toute la scène sera réaménagée et sa largeur est agrandie.

En 1997-1998, la façade est restaurée dans son état d'origine et les peintures refaites dans la salle.

...

Dans les « Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg », Richard Wagner avait tenté, entre autres, d'offrir des points d'ancrage à la prise de conscience d'une identité nationale, comme préalable de l'unité allemande. Mais les nationalistes racistes se firent passer pour les seuls garants, l'unique rempart de l'identité nationale, et s'emparèrent de l'œuvre, avec les passages les plus compromettants de son livret. Et personne ne leur résista, pas même Bayreuth et ses organes de presse. Bien au contraire. La semence empoisonnée d'écrivains et de journalistes se définissant comme « le Cercle bayreuthien » ou encore, dans leur milieu fermé, comme des « Wahnfriediens », qui avaient préparé le terrain idéologique et activé la politisation de Bayreuth, cette semence donna une moisson abondante. Le processus débuta avant même la Première Guerre mondiale. Dès 1896, les « Bayreuther Blätter » qualifièrent le « Festspielhaus » de « refuge aryen » ; l'écrivain-maison de Wahnfried, le Baron Hans von Wolzogen, réclama que l'on fit de « la grande cause » wagnérienne une « cause nationale ». Après 1933, on put constater avec plaisir que ce but avait été atteint. Les notions de « Bayreuth » et de « Wahnfried » ne recouvraient plus seulement le Festival et ses intentions artistiques, mais une idéologie bornée, pan-germaniste, nationaliste, conservatrice et anti-démocratique. Les « Bayreuther Blätter » devinrent de plus en plus nettement l'organe de presse de l'idéologie nationaliste allemande.

En 1914, Maximilian Harden avait donné l'alerte :

« Renoncez enfin à tenter de le (Bayreuth) falsifier en le transformant en Sion, en rempart, en sanctuaire presque céleste de l'âme du peuple allemand, d'où s'exprime la volonté du Maître. »

Et Paul Bekker écrivit dans ses « Kritische Zeitbilder » de 1921 :

« La présentation éthique et nationaliste fondamentalement erronée qui a fait de Bayreuth, lieu d'art à l'origine, le lieu de culte d'un germanisme mal assimilé, en insistant toujours davantage sur les facteurs extra-artistiques, cette présentation est funeste et à, bien des égards, presque catastrophique pour l'attitude spirituelle, notamment des Allemands. La réaction non seulement esthétique, mais également politique, le sinistre teutonisme, la bigoterie, le racisme et le nationalisme borné trouvent ici leur soutien et croient pouvoir s'attribuer ainsi (que l'on pense simplement à Chamberlain) la grandeur du phénomène artistique wagnérien, et en tirer leur propre justification».

Houston Stewart Chamberlain, le dilettante universel et lettré, auteur des « Fondements du XIXe siècle », était entré en correspondance avec Cosima Wagner, en 1888, puis, en 1901, avec l'Empereur Guillaume II, dont il encouragea les idées de croisade pendant la Première Guerre mondiale. Il épousa Eva, la fille de Cosima, en 1908, et établit, en 1923, le 1er contact entre la Villa « Wahnfried » et Adolf Hitler. Ces étapes n'illustrent pas seulement la dérive de Bayreuth dans le camp de la réaction politique, mais également, dans un sens plus large, l'itinéraire de l'histoire allemande vers la catastrophe. À la ré-ouverture du Festival, en 1924 (après une interruption de 10 ans due à la Première Guerre mondiale) , Adolf Rapp écrivit dans le guide du Festival un article intitulé : « Wagner : “ Führer ” de la nature allemande » ; il y affirmait :

« On peut dire aujourd'hui que la communauté bayreuthienne est également réunie politiquement dans le camp où se retrouvent, de plus en plus nombreux, ceux qui veulent résolument être allemands. »

Ludendorff fut présent dès les répétitions. Lors de la représentation des « Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » que dirigeait Fritz Busch, le public se leva pendant l'allocution de Hans Sachs, et entonna l'hymne allemand à la fin du spectacle. Il semblerait que l'on ait également entendu quelques « Heil » isolés.

Le directeur du Festival, Siegfried Wagner, remarqua « pâle d'indignation : à la fin du “ Crépuscule des dieux ”, ils vont vraisemblablement chanter le “ Wacht am Rhein ”. » (Franz Stassen)

Mais Siegfried Wagner accepta que l'on hissât sur le toit du « Festspielhaus » le drapeau noir-blanc-rouge, à côté du drapeau bavarois, et dans la République de Weimar, c'était un aveu. En 1925, les excès se renouvelèrent et Siegfried fit afficher l'avis suivant :

« Nous vous prions de bien vouloir vous abstenir de tout chant, même bien intentionné : ici, seul l'art compte ! »

En 1921, il refusa catégoriquement le boycottage des Juifs au Festival, demandé par August Püringer ; il estimait qu'il s'agissait d'une atteinte à la tolérance ; il écrivit en 1925 :

« Pour ma part, j'ai tout fait pour garantir que les journées bayreuthiennes resteraient à l'écart de toute intrusion politique. Tous ceux qui veulent trouver à Bayreuth édification et expérience y seront les bienvenus, quelles que soient leurs opinions ou leur extraction. Personne ne doit craindre que de quelconques incidents déplaisants s'y produisent. »

(« Berliner 8 Uhr Abendblatt » , 9. März 1925)

Mais il était trop tard. Il était désormais impossible de vouloir une chose et d'empêcher l'autre. Bernhard Diebold, qui avait assisté au Festival de 1928, s'interrogeait :

« Où sont passés les esprits Libéraux pour l'œuvre d'art Libérale ? Où se cache le peuple des “ Maîtres Chanteurs ” ? Où sont les nerfs sensibles qui vibraient avec l'âme de “ Tristan ” ? Est-on trop chic pour la musique d'hier ? Est-on si intelligent politiquement que l'on mette dans le même sac Wagner et Chamberlain ? Que s'est-il passé ?

Au lieu de revendiquer les “ Maîtres Chanteurs ” pour le Festival démocratique, l'esprit partisan a cédé tout Richard Wagner aux nationalistes ingénument et sans combat. Il faut opposer à la défiguration nationaliste le Libéralisme de l'œuvre wagnérienne. »

Mais ces voix ne pouvaient plus se faire entendre. « Les Allemands se sont accommodés un Wagner à leur guise, auquel ils puissent rendre hommage. Ils n'ont jamais été psychologues, leur manière de témoigner leur reconnaissance consiste à comprendre de travers » : le jugement de Friedrich Nietzsche prit une nouvelle actualité. Wolfgang Wagner avait raison de dire, en 1976, dans son discours prononcé à l'occasion de la ré-ouverture comme musée de la Villa « Wahnfried » , détruite pendant la Guerre :

« Je crois qu'il fallait que la bombe tombât. »

La redécouverte de Wagner à notre époque ne fut possible que lorsque « Wahnfried » ne fut plus une institution.

Il était dans l'ordre des choses que la « journée de Potsdam » du 22 mars 1933 commençât par une exécution des « Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » à l'Opéra national de Berlin « Unter den Linden » , et que cette œuvre fût ensuite érigée (ou plutôt abaissée) au rang d'Opéra d'apparat pour les Congrès du Parti nazi à Nuremberg. En 1933, lors de la retransmission radiodiffusée de l'œuvre depuis le « Festspielhaus », Josef Goebbels fit un discours où il mentionna les vers de Hans Sachs tirés du « Rossignol » de Wittenberg (1523) . Ces vers, écrits à l'époque de la « Réforme » avaient été insérés par Richard Wagner dans le chœur « Wach auf » (Réveillez-vous) des « Maîtres Chanteurs » . Goebbels les définit comme le « hurlement du peuple » (qu'en aurait dit le chef des chœurs ?) et comme un « symbole tangible du réveil du peuple allemand après la profonde anesthésie politique et spirituelle de novembre 1918 » .

À l'occasion de la « Journée de la liberté » du Parti nazi, « les Maîtres Chanteurs » furent donnés pour la 1re fois dans les nouveaux décors dessinés par l'artiste officiel du « Reich » , Benno von Arent. Adolf Hitler lui en avait passé commande personnellement, et avait examiné lui-même les projets avant leur réalisation. Dans la conception de von Arent, l'échoppe du cordonnier n'était plus la sympathique chambre bourgeoise, mais un atelier qui devait exprimer :

« Respectez le travail, estimez les travailleurs. » (Benno von Arent.)

Le seul décor à s'éloigner du cadre historicisant de l'Allemagne ancienne était la prairie de fête : avec ses rangées de drapeaux, elles ressemblait au terrain des Congrès annuels du Parti. Elle était donc réellement devenue « cause nationale » . Benno von Arent fournit également ces décors, autorisés par Hitler, pour la ré-ouverture de l'Opéra allemand de Berlin, le 17 novembre 1935 ; pour la semaine théâtrale du « Reich » à Munich, en 1936 ; pour Danzig, en 1938 ; pour le Festival de la jeunesse allemande au Théâtre national de Weimar, en 1939 ; et pour la nouvelle mise-en-scène du Théâtre de Linz, en 1941 ; Hitler accorda même à ce dernier spectacle un crédit supplémentaire tiré de sa caisse personnelle. En modifiant légèrement un slogan de ces années-là, on pourrait parler d'un peuple, d'un « Reich » et d'un décor. La volonté de conditionner les sentiments individuels des sujets pour créer une unité de pensée et d'expérience est symptomatique de la politique culturelle de tous les régimes totalitaires. Une autre caractéristique de l'époque est le recours aux masses, notamment dans la scène de la prairie. C'était déjà frappant dans la nouvelle mise-en-scène de l'Opéra municipal de Berlin, en mai 1933, puis au Festival de Bayreuth de la même année. En 1939, les chœurs des Opéras de Nuremberg et de Vienne, réunis, participèrent à la représentation de gala dirigée par Wilhelm Furtwängler à l'occasion du Congrès du Parti.

On mit au service du nouveau régime les idées de noblesse et de sainteté de l'art germanique et on en conclut à la nécessité de lutter contre l'étranger, de maintenir la pureté et de préserver l'art de la « souillure » apportée par les influences artistiques des races étrangères. À partir de là, s'ouvrait une voie qui menait tout droit à la répression et à l'élimination de l'étranger, à la terreur et à la barbarie au nom même de l'art. L'Orchestre philharmonique d'Israël, fondé en 1936, et qui avait encore joué en avril 1938 les Préludes du 1er et du 3e Actes de « Lohengrin » , sous la direction d'Arturo Toscanini, supprima de son programme le Prélude des « Maîtres Chanteurs » . Depuis lors, la musique de Richard Wagner est proscrite en Israël et particulièrement dans cet Orchestre, bien qu'aucune interdiction officielle n'ait jamais été prononcée. Lors d'un concert donné à l'automne 1981, le chef Zubin Mehta a tenté de lever cet interdit.

Au cours des Festivals de Bayreuth, dits « de guerre », organisés par l'Association nazie « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF :

la Force par la Joie) , on ne donna en 1943 et 1944 que « les Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » . On distribua les billets à des soldats, des blessés, des ouvriers d'usines d'armement et à des infirmières, en récompense de leur engagement pour la Guerre. Tandis que les villes allemandes s'écroulaient en cendres et en gravats, on continuait d'évoquer au « Festspielhaus » le rêve du passé glorieux d'une culture nationale allemande. Ce public pouvait-il encore espérer que l'art allemand survivrait à la destruction et à la ruine de l'Empire ?

Dans son ouvrage intitulé « Les racines du Nazisme » , Ernst Bloch avait critiqué, en 1939, le fait que les « anti-fascistes instruits » ne prononcent généralement plus le nom de Wagner que « dans un contexte nazi » , et avait affirmé :

« La musique des Nazis n'est pas le Prélude des “ Maîtres Chanteurs ” , mais le “ Horst-Wessel-Lied ” ; ils n'ont pas d'autre gloire, on ne peut et on ne doit pas leur en accorder d'autre. »

Mais la génération de ceux qui avaient survécu à la Guerre ne pouvait plus voir cette œuvre profanée qu'à la lumière de ses expériences. Pour Theodor W. Adorno (en 1952) , Beckmesser était, en 1937-1938, « le Juif dans les épines » du cruel Conte de Grimm. Quant à la scène de pugilat, on se mit à y flairer des relents de pogrome.

« Pouvez-vous vraiment supporter encore la comédie de délicatesse de Hans Sachs, et cette chère petite oie d'Eva ? » , demandait Thomas Mann à Emil Preetorius, en 1949.

Cependant, « les Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » sont restés en vie. Ils n'ont pas disparu tels les drames d'Emil Ludwig, né comme Richard Wagner, en 1813, comme le fait remarquer Hans Mayer ; ils n'ont pas non plus été engloutis dans l'insignifiance des productions artistiques du 3e « Reich » ; en effet, ils n'appartenaient pas aux productions de cette nature.

« Bien sûr, Richard Wagner avait du génie, mais ça n'explique pas tout. Chose curieuse, même ses contradictions se sont révélées fructueuses. » (Hans Mayer)

Bien plus qu'au cours des décennies précédentes, c'est dans les mises-en-scène des 30 dernières années, qui n'ont pas nié les faits, que « les Maîtres Chanteurs » ont pu manifester leur richesse bien spécifique. Mais de nombreux théâtres firent comme s'il ne s'était rien passé. Et lorsque les réserves avaient survécu à la Guerre, on réutilisa les décors et les costumes d'autrefois. À l'étranger, on se sentait étonnamment peu gêné par cette œuvre. On se contenta d'en biffer les passages suspects.

Cosima et Bayreuth

Au lendemain de la mort de Richard Wagner, c'est sa seconde femme, Cosima (la fille de Franz Liszt) qui prend en mains les destinées du Festival de Bayreuth, avec l'aide du banquier Adolf von Groß, ami de la famille et exécuteur testamentaire de Richard Wagner. Quant au chef israélite Hermann Levi, qui a dirigé la première de « Parsifal » , il se voit confier la direction musicale du théâtre.

Cosima restera à la tête du Festival jusqu'en 1905. Siegfried, son fils, prendra sa succession, jusqu'au 4 août 1930, date de sa mort, 4 mois exactement après celle de sa mère.

S'il est, à Bayreuth, un personnage proprement « légendaire », il s'agit bien de Winnifred Wagner, née Williams. Winnifred aurait transformé Bayreuth en épicerie culturelle du régime nazi ; elle aurait été, bien davantage qu'Eva Braun, la Ire dame du « Reich » auprès d'Adolf Hitler, qu'elle aurait sans doute épousé, n'eût été le testament de Siegfried, qui lui interdisait de demeurer à la tête du Festival de Bayreuth au cas où elle se remarierait. Winnifred aurait transformé le Festival de Bayreuth en outil de propagande au service de Josef Goebbels. Bref, elle aurait eu une attitude si condamnable durant toute cette période que sa propre fille, Friedelind, dégoûtée, aurait préféré l'exil au confort compromettant de « Wahnfried » .

Il est vrai qu'à la fin de sa vie, Winnifred n'a rien fait pour arranger les choses, refusant de renier ses amitiés d'autrefois, notamment lorsque le cinéaste Hans-Jürgen Syberberg, dans le cadre de l'entretien-fleuve qu'il filma en 1976, lui demanda comment elle réagirait si, demain, Adolf Hitler venait frapper à sa porte et qu'il reçut cette réponse : « Je l'accueillerais comme l'ami qu'il a toujours été à la maison. » .

Le scandale fut tel, que Wolfgang Wagner dut se résoudre à interdire à sa mère de paraître durant le Festival du Centenaire (1976) .

Cela dit, au-delà des polémiques anecdotiques, il s'agit de se demander ce que sont les faits, au juste...

Que Winnifred Wagner ait entretenu des relations personnelles, amicales et très chaleureuses, avec Hitler ne souffre aucun doute.

Mais la question essentielle, celle qui importe au 1er chef, parce qu'elle ne concerne pas simplement une attitude d'ordre privé, est la suivante : Ces relations privilégiées qu'entretenait Winnifred Wagner avec Hitler ont-elles influencé la direction artistique du Festival de Bayreuth ? Et si oui, en quoi ? Autrement dit : en quoi peut-on affirmer que le « Bayreuth de Winnifred Wagner » était Nazi, comme il semblerait que cela soit entendu ?

Winnifred a répondu très clairement à la question, à maintes reprises. Laissons-lui la parole :

« Les faits sont les suivants. Il est de notoriété publique que, durant sa jeunesse, Hitler s'était familiarisé avec les œuvres de Wagner à l'Opéra de Linz et qu'il en résulta chez lui une passion qui ne fit que s'accroître au cours des années passées à Vienne, années au cours desquelles il manqua rarement une représentation de Wagner à l'Opéra National. »

« À l'automne 1923, cet enthousiasme conduisit Hitler à pénétrer pour la Ire fois dans notre maison, ce qui fut à l'origine de notre longue amitié. »

« En 1925, Hitler fut à nouveau invité au Festival par Edwin Bechstein et son épouse. À cette époque déjà, sa présence irritait de nombreux esprits. Aussi lorsqu'il quitta Bayreuth, Hitler me promit-il d'y revenir seulement lorsqu'il ne risquerait plus de porter préjudice à l'entreprise, et qu'au contraire il aurait l'espoir de pouvoir lui être utile. »

« Il respecta cette décision jusqu'en 1933, date à laquelle il devint un habitué des Festivals. Il est à préciser qu'il achetait ses cartes d'entrée, pour lui-même et son entourage. Dans l'enceinte du « Festspielhaus », il n'admettait aucune ovation de la part du public, consigne qui fut strictement respectée. »

« Concernant l'embauche des artistes, Hitler n'exprima qu'une seule fois un « désir » : à l'occasion d'une nouvelle mise-en-scène de « Parsifal », il proposa comme metteur-en-scène le célèbre artiste Alfred Roller, de l'Opéra National de Vienne. Malheureusement, à cette époque, Roller était déjà très malade et son travail ne nous donna pas entière satisfaction, de sorte que nous dûmes nous passer de sa collaboration, et que nous confiâmes le soin de réaliser de nouvelles esquisses à mon fils Wieland. Hitler se soumit sans protester à notre décision. »

« Lorsque Josef Gœbbels exigea l'incorporation du Festival de Bayreuth à la Chambre des Théâtres du « Reich » et que je m'y opposai en raison de certaines clauses dont le caractère était incompatible avec l'activité du Festival, je m'adressai à Hitler, qui partagea mon opinion et récusait les exigences de Gœbbels. »

« J'ajouterai que ni le metteur-en-scène Heinz Tietjen, ni le décorateur Emil Preetorius, ni le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler n'ont été membres du Parti Nazi et que, pour ma part, j'ai toujours eu la possibilité de travailler avec des collaborateurs juifs ou de parenté juive, jusqu'à leur émigration. » (Nouvelle École, numéros 31-32, printemps 1979.)

Il serait légitime d'exprimer des doutes quant à la véracité de tels propos, si la moindre preuve venait étayer pareil soupçon. Or, rien de ce que déclare ici Winnifred n'a été ni ne peut être contesté ! Les contorsions de Barry Millington (dans Wagner, Guide Raisonné) sont, à cet égard, du plus haut comiques, quand il déclare dans la même phrase que « Bayreuth réussit à préserver une certaine indépendance » mais que « cela ne changea rien au fait que Bayreuth était désormais un instrument de propagande nazie » .

Sous la direction de Winnifred, le Festival de Bayreuth est demeuré totalement indépendant du pouvoir en place. L'influence de Josef Gœbbels, de ses idées, comme du Parti Nazi, s'arrêta aux portes du « Festspielhaus », jusqu'au bout. Pour preuve ? Franz von Hoesslin ! Son cas est pour ainsi dire exemplaire.

Chef d'orchestre réputé et de grand talent, von Hoesslin se voit pourtant refuser, sur interventions de Josef Gœbbels, la direction des Opéras de Hambourg et de Munich, au motif que son épouse est juive, tandis que dans le même temps, il dirige « Parsifal » à Bayreuth, en alternance avec le compositeur Richard Strauß. En butte à de multiples difficultés, von Hoesslin finira par se résoudre à l'exil, en Italie dans un 1er temps, puis en Suisse.

À l'appel de Winnifred Wagner, Franz von Hoesslin reviendra diriger à Bayreuth en 1938, 1939 et 1940 ! Preuve en est qu'aux yeux de Winnifred Wagner, le talent primait sur tout le reste.

Après plusieurs années de recherches, c'est du reste l'une des conclusions auxquelles est parvenue l'historienne autrichienne Brigitte Hamann (l'auteure d'un ouvrage remarquable sur les années viennoises d'Adolf Hitler) , dans un livre consacré à Winnifred Wagner ; livre qui renversera bien des idées reçues sur l'attitude, durant l'époque nazie non pas de Winnifred, mais de Friedelind ainsi que de Wieland Wagner.

En outre, tout aussi peu contestable que l'attitude indépendante de Winnifred vis-à-vis du pouvoir Nazi est le fait que le Festival de Bayreuth offrit au public, à cette époque, quelques-unes des plus grandes productions de son histoire, que ce soit sur le plan scénique, orchestral ou vocal.

Ayant su s'entourer de collaborateurs de talent (Heinz Tietjen pour la régie et la direction orchestrale, Emil Preetorius pour la mise-en-scène et les décors) , Winnifred Wagner, 2 ans à peine après la mort de Siegfried, sut renouveler le style des productions présentées à Bayreuth, rompant avec les décors en trompe-l'œil, les trop nombreux accessoires et les costumes « réalistes » . Elle sut, par ailleurs, attirer à Bayreuth quelques-uns des chefs d'orchestres et des solistes parmi les plus prestigieux de son temps. C'est ainsi que se succédèrent au pupitre de la « fosse mystique » du « Festspielhaus » , Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Richard Strauß, Victor de Sabata, Karl Elmendorff. Tandis que, sur scène, résonnaient les voix de Maria Müller, Kirsten Flagstadt, Emmy Krüger, Germaine Lubin, Franz Völker, Max Lorenz, Rudolf Bockelmann. Des voix si extraordinaires que les enregistrements qui en ont conservé le souvenir demeurent aujourd'hui encore parmi les plus recherchés.

(Photo) Winnifred et ses principaux collaborateurs : (de l'arrière-plan au 1er plan) le directeur technique Paul Eberhard, Emil Preetorius, Wilhelm Fürtwängler et Heinz Tietjen.

Dans ces conditions, ne peut-on se demander si ce n'est là, précisément, ce qui est principalement reproché à Winnifred Wagner : le haut niveau artistique qu'elle sut maintenir à Bayreuth, en dépit des ravages culturels perpétrés par ailleurs par le pouvoir Nazi ? Logique simpliste et perverse (qui, sur un autre plan, s'est aussi appliquée au sculpteur Arno Breker) , selon laquelle le pouvoir en place étant honni, rien, absolument rien de ce qui se fit à cette époque ne peut aujourd'hui mériter un quelconque jugement positif. De la sorte les vraies questions, autrement plus complexes et inconfortables, sont éludées. Ce type de questions que posent sans ambages un George Steiner sur les rapports (ou l'absence de rapport) entre l'art et la morale.

Mais si faire de Winnifred le chantre d'une sorte de « Nazification » de l'œuvre wagnérienne se heurte aux faits, cela permet de justifier commodément toutes les manipulations ultérieures effectuées sur l'œuvre de Wagner, sous prétexte de la « dénazifier » . Nul n'a à l'esprit de s'aviser que ce qui est de la sorte effectué sur scène (les interprétations marxistes, notamment, du « Ring ») , les Nazis ne se risquèrent que très exceptionnellement à l'accomplir. Pourtant, une œuvre comme « les Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » se prêtait sans doute idéalement, de leur point de vue, à une « transposition » orientée dans le sens politique du moment. L'art est ainsi demeuré le dernier espace de liberté pour les Allemands, durant la période Nazie, comme l'a souligné Wilhelm Fürtwängler, après guerre, pour se justifier d'être resté en Allemagne. Quiconque assistait, durant ces années, au « Ring » ou à tout autre œuvre de Wagner, dans le « Festspielhaus » , avait la pleine et entière liberté d'y voir ce qu'il souhaitait : Hitler en Alberich ou en Klingsor. Pourquoi pas ? Nul (à commencer par aucun des décorateurs et des metteurs-en-scène de l'ère « Winnifred ») ne chercha jamais à imposer au public des Festivals de l'époque une quelconque interprétation orientée des œuvres de Richard Wagner. Bien malin serait celui qui pourrait déceler le moindre « relent Nazi » dans les décors d'Emil Preetorius ou ceux d'Alfred Roller.

Le mot d'ordre, après guerre, fut : « déblaiement » !

De quoi les œuvres de Richard Wagner avaient-elles donc besoin d'être déblayées ? Sinon de ce qu'on y avait projeté. Là encore, règne la plus grande confusion ; car ce qu'on laisse finalement entendre, c'est que les œuvres de Richard Wagner, en elles-mêmes, nécessitaient une sorte de « purification expiatoire » . L'esprit des œuvres de Wagner avait été respecté, là où il importe : sur scène, durant le 3^e « Reich ». Ce n'est pas du tout comme si l'on s'était mis, à cette époque, à interpréter scéniquement le « Ring », « Parsifal » ou « les Maîtres Chanteurs » dans des décors qui eussent évoqué les parades de Nuremberg, avec de bannières ornées de « swastika » .

Si déblaiement il devait y avoir, ce n'était donc pas sur la scène du « Festspielhaus » qu'il devait se produire, en l' lieu, c'était dans les esprits. Et dans ce cas, il aurait fallu faire appel à des hommes à l'esprit libre, qui, n'ayant rien trempé dans le marais glauque du Nazisme, n'auraient eu aucun compte à régler avec leur pays, leurs compatriotes, leur propre famille ; voire avec eux-mêmes.

Toute l'équivoque de la démarche entreprise, après guerre, avec le « Neue Bayreuth » (une expression inventée par la presse en 1951, selon Wieland) repose sur cette sorte de mélange hommes / œuvres ; les secondes servant aux lers à se confronter avec leurs problèmes intimes.

Il ne s'agit pas ici de contester le réel talent dont sut faire preuve Wieland Wagner dans les productions qu'il réalisa de 1951 (date de la ré-ouverture du « Festspielhaus ») , à sa mort prématurée, en 1966. Il s'agit bien plutôt de se demander dans quelle mesure la démarche prônée par Wieland n'a pas ouvert la porte à toutes les interprétations scéniques qui ont vu le jour peu après, que ce soit à Bayreuth ou ailleurs, et qui, au nom du sempiternel « déblaiement » ont imposé aux spectateurs, sur scène, des transformations inacceptables des œuvres de Richard Wagner. Wieland n'hésitait d'ailleurs pas à modifier jusqu'au contenu même des œuvres, à effectuer des coupures dans la partition, afin qu'elles correspondent à ses idées. Ainsi, il supprima toutes les scènes parlées dans « Fidelio » ; de même, lorsqu'il réalisa « Orphée et Eurydique » de Gluck, il supprima tout bonnement la conclusion heureuse de l'œuvre, sous prétexte que celle-ci apparaissait alors « dans une profonde unité dramatique et humaine dont Gluck a certainement rêvé » . Et quand Antoine Goléa, lors de ses Entretiens, note avec une certaine désinvolture que depuis que Wieland est le Maître de Bayreuth, « on coupe dans des partitions de Wagner » , celui-ci ne le reprend pas.

Donc, après 6 années de silence, le « Festspielhaus » rouvre ses portes le 29 juillet 1951, aux accents de la 9^e Symphonie de Beethoven, sous la baguette de Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Au programme : « Parsifal » (direction : Hans Knappertsbuch) , « les Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » (direction : Herbert von Karajan) et le « Ring » (direction : Herbert von Karajan et Hans Knappertsbusch, en alternance) ; mise-en-scène et décors réalisés par Wieland Wagner.

Par la suite, Wolfgang Wagner qui, au début, s'était chargé essentiellement des questions administratives, se lancera à son tour dans la mise-en-scène, avec « Lohengrin », en 1953 ; « Tannhäuser », en 1954 ; le « Ring » de 1960 à 1964, et de nouveau, de 1970 à 1975.

Le parti pris esthétique de Wieland et Wolfgang Wagner est à peu de choses près identique chez l'un et chez l'autre : stylisation symbolique, suggestion de l'espace et caractérisations de lieux par des éclairages recherchés, abstraction spacio temporelle des décors et des costumes, gestuelle moins emphatique que celle qui était de rigueur précédemment, élimination de tous les « détails » techniques épineux dont la visualisation, sur scène, est aléatoire et qui, par conséquent, risquent de détruire l'illusion ; et Dieu sait que le « Ring » fourmille de tels « détails » qui, de tout temps, ont posé problème aux metteurs-en-scène. Bref, Wieland a dépouillé le plateau, jusqu'à l'austérité parfois, de tout ce qui peut divertir l'attention du spectateur du drame qui est en train de s'y jouer.

Wieland Wagner : « À la source, il y eut certainement un doute. Je me suis demandé si les représentations de Bayreuth, telles que je les voyais dans ma jeunesse, correspondaient aux dimensions spirituelles de l'œuvre de Wagner. Ce fut la musique qui constitua pour moi l'aspect essentiel de l'œuvre de Wagner : la peinture, l'architecture, les décors et même le poème passèrent au second plan. En conséquence, le seul chemin possible pour moi a été celui du radicalisme esthétique et intellectuel. C'est radicalement que je voulais m'éloigner du Bayreuth de ce temps-là. » .
(Entretiens avec Antoine Goléa.)

Il est à souligner, en préambule, qu'avec Wieland Wagner s'est développé une sorte de « mise-en-avant » du metteur-en-scène, beaucoup plus accentué qu'autrefois, les polémiques, discussions, louanges que son travail suscitait ayant parfois tendance à prendre le pas sur l'œuvre mise-en-scène.

Quoi qu'il en soit, les productions de Wieland et Wolfgang Wagner ont donné lieu à des résultats contrastés, allant du meilleur (le « Ring », « Tristan und Isolde », « Parsifal ») au plus contestable, avec, notamment, en 1956, la mise-en-scène par Wieland des « Maîtres Chanteurs » .

Dans une lettre adressée en 1951 à Karl Hermann, Wieland Wagner écrivait :

« Libérer l'élément purement humain de toute espèce de convention, c'est le but que Richard Wagner assignait à l'art. C'est vers ce même but que j'ai orienté toutes mes mises-en-scène de cette année. Plaçant au 1er plan l'élément purement humain, j'ai éliminé toutes les formes de convention, aussi bien celles du théâtre lyrique que celles d'une certaine tradition wagnérienne sans jamais m'écarter le moins du monde des données de la partition. »

Et il est un fait que là où Wieland a le mieux réussi, c'est dans l'évocation sur scène (que se soit dans le « Ring », « Tristan und Isolde » ou « Parsifal », surtout) d'un « paysage intérieur » ouvert, intimement lié à la musique, s'opposant de la sorte aux habituels décors en 3 dimensions dans lesquels l'action a tendance à s'enfermer comme dans une boîte de résonance. Cela peut avoir ses avantages. Le parti pris de Wieland était autre. Il donnait à voir ; comme la musique donne à entendre, sans qu'aucun discours ne puisse cerner ne serait-ce que le contour de qui est ainsi donné à voir ou à entendre.

Le danger qui menaça toutefois la conception Wielandienne de la mise-en-scène des œuvres de Richard Wagner, après qu'elle se fut imposée, était de se transformer en une sorte de nouvel académisme s'empoussiérant année après année (la « Société des Amis de Bayreuth » n'alla-t-elle pas jusqu'à proposer, en 1966, que la mise-en-scène de « Parsifal » soit considérée comme définitive et qu'elle soit placée sous la protection de l'administration des sites et monuments ?) . Du « déblaiement » effectué par Wieland, on assista donc, après la mort de celui-ci à une manière de « remblaiement » ; d'abord timide, puis nettement plus provocateur, lorsque, en 1972, Wolfgang Wagner invita le metteur-en-scène est-allemand, Götz Friedrich, à venir donner un petit « coup de jeunesse » à « Tannhäuser » .

Sur les conditions « juridiques » de la ré-ouverture du « Festspielhaus » :

(Extrait d'Entretiens avec Wieland Wagner, Belfond, Paris, 1967.)

Wieland : « La situation issue de la guerre a fait que Winnifred Wagner, qui était propriétaire du Théâtre depuis la mort de mon père, a abandonné en 1951 la direction, qu'elle aurait, dans d'autres circonstances, conservée jusqu'à aujourd'hui, malgré notre majorité. Pour pouvoir continuer d'organiser les Festivals sous la nouvelle constellation politique, nous avons conclu, mon frère et moi, un contrat de location avec notre mère. D'un point de vue familial, nous sommes les locataires du « Festspielhaus » . Par rapport aux pouvoirs publics et privés qui nous subventionnent, nous sommes les gérants de l'entreprise. »

Significatif est à cet égard le commentaire qu'apporte Wieland à propos de sa mise-en-scène d' « Aïda » de Verdi, lorsque Antoine Goléa lui demande la raison pour laquelle la scène du triomphe de Radamès, qui se déroule habituellement en plein jour, se déroule, chez Wieland, en pleine nuit.

Wieland : « À partir du moment où l'honneur et le devoir patriotique commandent à Radamès de renoncer à « Aïda » , la nuit se répand dans son âme ; et cette nuit, pour lui, recouvre le monde entier. »

Ce qui, ici encore, a conduit Wieland à supprimer le ballet qui se déroule à cet instant, sous prétexte qu'il ne pouvait « se familiariser avec l'idée de faire danser dans la nuit spirituelle de Radamès, d'y laisser paraître, d'une façon plus générale, toute manifestation superficielle de joie » .

À la mort de son frère, Wieland, en octobre 1966, Wolfgang se retrouva donc unique directeur du Festival de Bayreuth : lourde charge, qu'il assumait seul jusqu'en 1969, date à laquelle il fit appel au metteur-en-scène August Everding pour mettre en scène une nouvelle production du « fliegende Holländer » (décors de Josef Svoboda) ; tandis que Peter Lehmann et Hans Hotter se chargeaient de perpétuer les mises-en-scène Wielandiennes du « Ring » , de « Tristan und Isolde » et de « Parsifal » .

En 1970, Wolfgang proposa au public une nouvelle mise-en-scène du « Ring » , laquelle succède ainsi à celle que Wieland avait présenté pour la 1^{re} fois en 1965. Faisant appel à un plateau circulaire articulé qui adopte différentes formes en fonction du moment, mais qui demeure l'élément essentiel du décor durant toute la Tétralogie, Wolfgang rétablit volumes et perspectives sur scène, tout en employant de manière soutenue lumières et des couleurs.

L'ensemble est loin de manquer d'intérêt, offrant un compromis intelligent entre les conceptions scéniques d'avant-guerre et celles de Wieland. Pourtant, une partie de la presse ainsi que les thuriféraires de feu Wieland, ne voudront voir que médiocrité là où pourtant s'exprime une personnalité qui ne manque pas d'originalité et de finesse. Mais il sera dit, désormais, que Wolfgang Wagner n'a ni l'étoffe ni le génie de son frère. Jugement hâtif, définitif ; et très injuste qui, quelque soit les qualités intrinsèques de ses productions, poursuivra sans cesse Wolfgang, tant et si bien qu'on peut légitimement se demander dans quelle mesure cette sorte de mépris hautain avec lequel la presse le traite volontiers n'a pas joué un rôle dans le choix des metteurs-en-scène qu'il a été amené à effectuer, dès 1972, en invitant Götz Friedrich à venir mettre en scène « Tannhäuser » à Bayreuth, puis, en 1976, le trio Chéreau / Boulez / Peduzzi, pour le « Ring » du Centenaire, Harry Kupfer, en 1978, pour « Der fliegende Holländer » puis de nouveau, Götz Friedrich pour le « Parsifal » du Centenaire, en 1982, et encore Harry Kupfer, pour le « Ring », cette fois, et jusqu'au dramaturge Heiner Müller, pour mettre en scène de manière parfaitement grotesque « Tristan und Isolde » .

Il est vrai qu'il y a aussi eu le « Ring » de Sir Peter Hall et de Sir Georg Solti, ainsi que les très belles productions de « Tristan und Isolde » par Jean-Pierre Ponnelle (1981) et de « Lohengrin » par Werner Herzog ; sans compter les excellentes mises-en-scène de « Parsifal » (1975) et des « Maîtres Chanteurs de Nuremberg » (1981) , réalisées par Wolfgang lui-même.

En jetant un regard sur ce qu'est devenu Bayreuth depuis le « Ring » du Centenaire, on ne peut se défaire d'une impression de clinquant superficiel, comme si le « Festspielhaus » , ayant totalement perdu sa fonction de lieu de représentations modèles des œuvres de Richard Wagner, s'était transformé en un « atelier théâtral » (« Werkstatt » : le mot employé en 1976 par le président de la République Fédérale, Walter Scheel, fera fureur jusqu'à donner son titre à un livre, avant d'être contesté par Wolfgang Wagner, en 1998) où se déroulent chaque années des « essais » , des « expériences » , avec, à l'arrière-plan, la volonté (imbécile) de faire sans cesse du nouveau. Bref, il est arrivé au Festival de Bayreuth ce qui pouvait lui arriver le pire : il est tombé dans le travers de la mode qui, chaque année, change et cherche par tous les moyens à faire sensation.

Wolfgang Wagner a fait reconstruire la Villa « Wahnfried » dans son état d'origine ; il a aussi été à l'origine de la création du Musée Wagner de Bayreuth ; il a fait restaurer le « Festspielhaus » de manière à lui redonner l'aspect qu'offrait le bâtiment en 1883, à la mort de Richard Wagner. Il a fait en sorte que l'avenir financier du Festival soit assuré.

Mais que reste-t-il de Bayreuth ? L'acoustique du « Festspielhaus » , sans aucun doute. Elle est fabuleuse. L'atmosphère ? Probablement aussi, un peu. Le prestige que la patine du temps a déposé sur les lieux ? Incontestablement. Bayreuth continue à jouir du prestige de son fondateur. Mais pour combien de temps encore ? Pourquoi donc ce qui est fait avec tant de succès au cinéma ne pourrait-il plus être réalisé, avec les œuvres de Richard Wagner, sur la scène du « Festspielhaus » ? D'autant plus que le retour effectué par Sir Peter Hall à une mise-en-scène « mythique » du « Ring » fut (en dépit de ce qui fut dit dans la presse) un grand succès.

Il a été convenu, depuis longtemps déjà, de classer le public en 2 grandes catégories : les Pour et les Contre ; que

Wieland Wagner se plaisait à qualifier de « Gardiens du Graal ». Jeunes ou vieux réactionnaires, pour lesquels, si ça ne tenait qu'à eux, les œuvres de Wagner devraient toujours être jouées dans les décors et les costumes d'origine.

Ils ont existé ces Wagnériens-là (en 1933-1934) à l'époque où Winnifred Wagner exprima son intention de présenter « Parsifal » dans de nouveaux décors, l'œuvre ayant été jusqu'ici représentée dans les décors d'origine. Pour différents motifs, qui tous n'avaient pas trait à des considérations d'ordre artistique, une partie de l'entourage immédiat de la famille Wagner se dressa contre l'idée d'un tel changement, parmi lesquels le Baron Hans von Wolzogen (le rédacteur en chef des « Bayreuther Blätter »), Eva Chamberlain (née Wagner) la seconde fille de Richard et Cosima, ainsi que Daniela Thode (née von Bülow) la Ire fille du chef d'orchestre Hans von Bülow et de Cosima. Ils allèrent jusqu'à lancer une pétition dont l'intention (à peine dissimulée) était en fait d'éloigner Winnifred et le metteur-en-scène Heinz Tietjen de la direction du Festival.

En 1934, Winnifred Wagner aura finalement raison de ses adversaires et une nouvelle production de « Parsifal » sera présentée, dans une mise-en-scène d'Heinz Tietjen et des magnifiques décors d'Alfred Roller (en 1937, ces mêmes décors ne seront pas retenus au profit de ceux de Wieland). Personne ne semble s'interroger sur les motifs de cet abandon. Dans son livre « Richard Wagner à Bayreuth », Hans Mayer, grand ami de Wieland, passe directement de l'année 1936 à l'année 1939.

À partir de l'histoire de renoncement aux décors originaux de « Parsifal », le mythe prit racine. Il serait entendu désormais que Bayreuth comporterait chaque année son lot de « vieux grincheux réactionnaires ». Le principal avantage d'un tel mythe, soigneusement entretenu jusqu'à aujourd'hui, consiste bien entendu à tuer dans l'oeuf toute réelle discussion quant à la légitimité (ou non-légitimité) des libertés croissantes que s'accordent les metteurs-en-scène, au détriment de la liberté du public.

Sans doute parce que Richard Wagner n'a pas vécu suffisamment de temps, après le 1er Festival de Bayreuth, pour en parfaire la définition. Et surtout parce qu'il ne put ouvrir son Théâtre au public qu'à seulement 2 reprises. Le Maître de Bayreuth a laissé derrière lui (avec le « Festspielhaus ») une œuvre partiellement inaccomplie.

Le fait que Richard Wagner n'ait pas eu le temps (et les moyens financiers) de mettre pleinement ses idées en œuvre, à Bayreuth, a donné lieu, après sa mort, à une équivoque sur laquelle prennent appui, aujourd'hui, ceux qui entendent faire de Bayreuth un « atelier ».

Outre le fait que l'entreprise était colossale, les moyens techniques insuffisants dont disposait Richard Wagner, lors de la création de l'Anneau du Nibelung, en 1876, l'empêchèrent de réaliser sur scène les images qu'il avait en tête. Wagner écrivit à August Förster, à l'automne 1876 : « Mon œuvre n'est pas encore terminée : il a fallu les représentations pour m'éclairer sur maints aspects encore inachevés. Laissez-moi le temps de présenter, une nouvelle fois, mon œuvre l'année prochaine, ici à Bayreuth, sous une forme soigneusement corrigée. ».

Richard Wagner ne pourra malheureusement pas présenter une seconde fois son œuvre. Cosima s'en chargera, 20 ans après la création du « Ring ». Il n'existe donc pas, comme pour « Parsifal », une représentation modèle d'origine de l' « Anneau du Nibelung » . La version de Cosima s'inspirait du « Ring » de 1876 ; une version « améliorée » , ne correspondant qu'en partie aux idées du Maître.

Et c'est sur cette approximation que se fondent aujourd'hui nombre de metteurs-en-scène, à Bayreuth notamment, pour justifier, voire légitimer, leurs re-lectures de l'œuvre, aussi fantaisistes fussent-elles. Il ne saurait en somme y avoir, de leur point de vue, de « représentations modèles » du « Ring » , puisqu'il n'y en a jamais eu. Et puisqu'il ne saurait y avoir de « représentations modèles » , il ne saurait donc y avoir de représentations infidèles à l'œuvre.

Les vaines protestations de 1934 contre le renouvellement des décors de « Parsifal » servent, aujourd'hui encore, à stigmatiser, voire à tourner en ridicule tous ceux qui contestent les « expériences scéniques » qu'on leur impose sur la scène du « Festspielhaus » . D'autre part, le « Ring » de 1876, insatisfaisant de l'aveu même de Wagner, sert à légitimer tous les renouvellements possibles et imaginables de la mise-en-scène.

Mais la question qui dès lors se pose : À quoi bon Bayreuth ? À quoi bon réserver l'usage du « Festspielhaus » exclusivement aux représentations des œuvres de Wagner ? (C'est à cela que Wolfgang Wagner tente d'apporter une réponse, dans son Avant-propos à l'album de présentation du Festival de 1998.)

La question : « Bayreuth, pour quoi faire ? » s'est, en somme, posée dès après la mort de Wagner. La réponse tenait pour l'essentiel dans le fait que le « Festspielhaus » était le seul Théâtre au monde où l'on pouvait assister à l'Opéra « Parsifal » (l'œuvre bénéficiant d'une protection) dont les décors et la mise-en-scène furent voulus et agréés par Richard Wagner lui-même. À l'époque, les Wagnériens se rendaient à Bayreuth essentiellement pour ça, et il n'était pas rare que les autres œuvres soient représentées devant des salles à moitié vides ! Lorsqu'en 1913, « Parsifal » perdit sa protection, l'œuvre put dès lors être représentée n'importe où. Bayreuth perdit la seule exclusivité dont le Festival avait joui durant 30 ans. Un an plus tard, la Première Guerre mondiale éclatait en plein Festival, lequel était brutalement interrompu, avec à la clef un déficit de 400,000 marks. L'interruption durera 10 ans.

Lorsqu'en 1924, Siegfried Wagner fera redémarrer le Festival, après s'être rendu aux États-Unis pour recueillir des fonds, il ne pourra faire autrement que d'utiliser les vieux décors de 1914, pour des raisons d'économie. Le « Festspielhaus » sembla rouvrir ses portes sur une scène transformée en une sorte de « musée désuet » . L'événement que constitua la ré-ouverture du « Festspielhaus » en 1924, puis de nouveau en 1925, avant de se refermer 2 années durant, assura à l'entreprise des bénéfices suffisants pour permettre à Siegfried Wagner d'éviter une nouvelle baisse de fréquentation, lorsque « l'effet » de la ré-ouverture commencerait à s'émousser. Wieland Wagner à ce propos : « La nouvelle mise-en-scène de Tristan, en 1927, de même que l'engagement du chef italien Arturo Toscanini, en 1930, firent sensation non seulement au plan artistique, mais aussi publicitaire. » . Le Festival de Bayreuth commencera alors seulement à trouver sa spécificité propre par le haut niveau artistique des représentations qui y fut de rigueur à partir de ce moment. Lequel coïncide avec l'arrivée à la direction du Festival de Winnifred Wagner.

Wieland Wagner, très conscient du fait qu'une bonne part du prestige de Bayreuth reposait sur la qualité orchestrale et vocale des représentations qui y étaient proposées, ne cherchera pas à faire autre chose, lorsqu'il rouvrira le Théâtre, en 1951. Le renouvellement qu'il apporta à cette époque aux mises-en-scène des œuvres présentées passait en réalité au second plan. Par les chefs qu'il avait invités, dès cette 1^{re} année, des chefs aussi célèbres et prestigieux que Wilhelm Fürtwängler et Herbert von Karajan (avec lequel, pourtant, Wieland ne s'entendait guère) , ou aussi ancrés dans la « tradition Bayreuthienne » que l'était un Hans Knappertsbusch, par la qualité exceptionnelle des solistes qu'il sut réunir sur scène (Birgit Nilsson, Wolfgang Windgassen, Theo Adam, Karl Ridderbusch, Gustav Neidlinger, Régine Crespin) . Bien davantage qu'un « révolutionnaire » , Wieland Wagner donna au public une impression de continuité ; cette impression devait-elle, de manière très paradoxale, l'irriter. D'où ses « coups d'éclat » scéniques (comme avec la mise-en-scène de 1956 des « Maîtres Chanteurs ») , comme pour chercher à se démarquer de cette continuité qui lui pesait, sans toutefois prendre le risque de mettre en péril l'équilibre financier précaire du Festival.

Le problème auquel se trouva confronté Wolfgang Wagner, peu après la mort de son frère, fut précisément un problème lié à la qualité décroissante des chefs et des solistes auxquels il pouvait encore faire appel. D'où cette impression de statu quo, du moins au niveau des solistes, qui se dégage des années qui suivent la mort de Wieland. Au niveau de la direction orchestrale, Bayreuth ne peut mettre à l'affiche, en guise de « célébrité » , guère plus que Pierre Boulez, tandis que le « Ring » est dirigé par l'honorable chef Horst Stein.

À défaut de grands chefs (le dernier à avoir dirigé au pupitre de Bayreuth fut Sir Georg Solti lors du « Ring » de Sir Peter Hall) , et, à défaut de grandes voix, ce serait désormais aux metteurs-en-scène que serait confié le soin de faire de Bayreuth un « événement » . On peut ainsi dire que Wolfgang Wagner a pleinement réussi dans son entreprise, lorsqu'il confia la réalisation du « Ring » de 1976 à Patrice Chéreau. Il suffit pour s'en convaincre de relire les critiques favorables de l'époque.

Wolfgang Wagner a tout fait pour mettre sur pied la « Fondation Richard Wagner de Bayreuth » , destinée à assurer la pérennité du Festival, au-delà des problèmes financiers auxquels il pourrait être confronté à l'avenir.

Le « Parsifal » de Stefan Herheim (édition 2012) nous plonge dans les jardins de la villa de Wagner : « Wahnfried » . Le personnage de « Parsifal » nous narre le destin de l'Allemagne depuis les années '30 (avec meneur de revue, S.A. et SS à croix gammées) jusqu'à la naissance de la République Fédérale dans le Bundestag de Bonn.

...

Considering that Francesca Gaetana Cosima Liszt Bülow Wagner was the person most responsible for framing the role of Wagner in 20th Century German cultural and political life, it is remarkable that « Cosima Wagner : The Lady of Bayreuth » , by Oliver Hilmes, is the 1st serious academic study of her life. On that ground alone, the volume claims an essential place in the Wagner library. The elegance of its writing, the assurance and confidence of its English translation, the originality of its research and the dispassionate approach of its author make the book not only a duty but a pleasure.

I had been aware of only 2 Cosima biographies in English. One, « Cosima Wagner : Extraordinary Daughter of Franz Liszt » by Alice Hunt Sokoloff (Dodd, Mead & Company, 1969) , is a hagiography. The other, « Cosima Wagner » , by George R. Marek (Harper & Row, 1981) , is quite entertaining and accurate enough to merit a blurb from Clifton Fadiman calling Cosima one of the most repulsive women of her Century. Hilmes cites « an uncritical and, linguistically speaking, risibly bombastic account » by Richard De Moulin Eckart (1929-1931) , as well as works by Ilse Lotz (1935) and Max Millenkovich-Morold (1939) . Hilmes' volume is what we want : a definitive account written not by a Wagnerian, or worse yet by a « Bayreuthian » , but by a scholar.

Cosima's life might be neatly summarized in 3 periods : Her childhood and early adulthood prior to meeting Richard Wagner ; her 18 years spent with Wagner, 1st as mistress then as wife, but always as idolator ; and the 47 years spent between Wagner's death, on 13 February 1883, and Cosima's own, on 1 April 1930, her last recorded words directed to Hans von Bülow :

« Forgive me. »

Bülow's spirit may, by now, have done so ; he never did in life, and so vast were her offenses and so profound their consequences that it is difficult for either history or art to do so, ever.

As the illegitimate, but acknowledged, daughter of the young and papiac Franz Liszt, Cosima was ignored by her father (who spent years on the road) and, after Liszt dumped Cosima's mother Marie d'Agoult, was sent with her sister and brother to live with Liszt's mother, Anna. At age 12, this grandparental affection was abruptly severed when the children (at the instigation of Liszt's then-current paramour, Princess Carolyne von Sayn-Wittgenstein) were sent to be raised by 70 year old Madame Louise Adélaïde Patersi de Fossombroni, whose « teaching programme was as terrifying as her name » . (page 19)

The children were forbidden to attend concerts or the theater, strictly constrained in demeanor and conduct, and taught how to drink tea and biscuits properly. Their letters to Liszt were censored, and to their mother were forbidden. Even when their father visited after 7 years' absence, he found little time for them and they were permitted to express only abject veneration towards him. Original ideas, in particular, were discouraged in these young women.

Upon Madam Patersi's decline, at age 17, Cosima and her sister joined the provincial Berlin household of Liszt's friend Franziska von Bülow (« a strict, suspicious, cold and deeply frustrated matriarch with two failed marriages behind her ») - and her « highly-gifted, eccentric and perpetually sickly son, Hans » . (page 37)

In 1855, at age 19, Cosima spent an all-nighter talking with Hans after his conducting a concert that included the « Tannhäuser » Overture, and their special relationship led to their eventual marriage, in 1857. It was apparently a hollow relationship, with Bülow more attentive to his career, his tenuous health, and his service to Richard Wagner than to his wife. They, nevertheless, had 2 daughters : Daniela and Blandine.

Richard Wagner had 1st met Cosima in Franz Liszt's company when she was a child of 15 and, ironically, Bülow decided to spend part of their honeymoon with Wagner at the Asyl, in Zürich. Others staying at this pleasant refuge, at that time were Wagner's wife of 20 years, Minna, and his muse, Mathilde Wesendock.

« Bülow played from “ Das Rheingold ” and “ Die Walküre ”, while Wagner sang all the parts. » (page 44)

Indeed, he did.

Another visit by the Bülows to the Zürich Asyl, 1 year later, coincided with the infamous row when Minna found-out about Mathilde, as well as a visit from Cosima's long-banished mother Marie d'Agoult. There was a brief and inconclusive meeting between Wagner and Bülow's wife, in 1861, in Bad Reichenhall, and another the next year, in Biebrich (where Wagner recalled that his playing of Wotan's Farewell prompted in Cosima a look of « supreme transfiguration ») . Then, on November 28, 1862, Wagner and Cosima took a cab ride together in Berlin, « sealed their vows » to each other, and became spiritually united.

That is, at least, from her point of view. In fact, Wagner continued his relationships with Mathilde Maier, Maria Volkl, Eliza Wille and others.

The next part of Cosima's life was, in many ways, the least complicated : she served Richard Wagner. No deception was too great, no adultery too shameful, no humiliation too onerous for her to bear if Richard required it. She lied to Bülow ; she lied to Ludwig ; she carried pennies in a wheelbarrow from the Munich treasury ; she re-located her family to be with Wagner ; and she made herself available to the Master when and how he pleased. As early as 1865, she began a project to control Wagner's reputation by recalling his past written correspondence, demanding the return of his letters from Karl Tausig, Peter Cornelius and even Mathilde Wesendonck. She accompanied Wagner to parties ; did her best to manage his relationship with Ludwig ; bore Wagner's illegitimate child ; and insisted upon her honour in a letter to Ludwig that, « in terms of its sheer hypocrisy and mendacity, takes some beating » . (page 96) She converted from Catholic to Protestant for him.

When Wagner retreated to his villa, at Tribschen, Cosima followed him there with her husband in tow, « even if it is difficult to imagine how this remarkable “ ménage à 3 ” actually functioned » . (page 98) After they returned to Berlin, Cosima herself did an about-turn and took-up residence at Tribschen. It was there that she gave birth to her and Wagner's 2nd illegitimate daughter, Eva. Finally, on October 3, 1868, Cosima wrote to Bülow announcing her decision to leave him and live permanently with her lover. The birth of their son Siegfried, in 1869, the granting of a divorce from Bülow, and their marriage on August 25, 1870, formalized the relationship that was to end only in Wagner's death, 13 years later.

Hilmes is acutely perceptive in his explanation of this appalling relationship. Noting the guilt that plagued Cosima arising from her treatment of the innocent Bülow, Hilmes draws from her diary and concludes :

« Cosima dealt with these emotional conflicts by deifying her new lover. Whenever Wagner spoke to her, it was “ always divine, unique ”. She worshipped him to the point of idolatry and, more than once, we find in her writing that “ every utterance from him is like doctrine to me ”. The more she revered Wagner and the more God-like he appeared to her, the sooner she could come to terms with her “ guilt ”. She compensated for her complexes with regard to her 1st husband by suggesting that she had abandoned him for a demi-God and, indeed, that she had had no choice in the matter. She was determined to serve this divine being at all costs and, in that way, to atone for the failure of her marriage to Bülow. » (page 105)

Indeed, Hilmes suggests that Cosima might be described today as having a masochistic personality disorder - not that she derived sexual pleasure from her own pain, but rather that in some profound sense she experienced ecstasy from suffering.

While not criticizing this analysis, I find a much more compelling rationale for her self-demeaning conduct in a much more obvious source : Wagner's music gave meaning to Cosima's hitherto empty life. The great moments of her marriage, one senses, came when Wagner handed her the score to the « Siegfried Idyll », which he had composed for her alone, or when, in her diary entry after a 1878 concert that featured « Siegfried Idyll » and the « Parsifal » Prelude, she realized :

« There, stands he who called forth these wonders, and he loves me. He loves me ! »

Without Wagner, Cosima was a cipher. She raised her daughters to be ciphers too, to « note when it is time for you to disappear » and to « draw a veil over whatever may embarrass another person » . Her son, Siegfried, she taught to be a 2nd Richard Wagner and, her daughters, she taught to be of service to Siegfried. The limited nature of her own gifts (except as martyr and apostle) became apparent after Wagner's death, in 1883, when Cosima was 45 years old.

It was during this remaining period of her life that Cosima's toxic mixture of quasi-religious devotion, self-definition through her husband's accomplishments, virulent judgmentalism, implacable anti-Semitism, and megalomaniac confidence all combined to cause irreparable harm to Wagner's artistic legacy, and to lay the groundwork for the rise of right-wing German nationalism.

Cosima stayed in Wagner's home, in Bayreuth, and wore widow's weeds, every day, for the next 47 years - even to her children's weddings. She refused to allow Wagner's piano to be played or Wagner's chair to be sat in. She decided that the Bayreuth Festival should be Wagner's artistic testimony and, therefore, her remaining life's work. Lacking creativity, she became instead a curator. And as her assertion of artistic control continued, the Bayreuth Festival (the theatre built by the most visionary and innovative theatre professional of his time) became widely regarded as an artistic backwater, « the centre of an old-fashioned and even tedious performance style » . (page 288)

How she managed this crime is an appalling story, and the best part of Hilmes' book. Cosima gathered a core of unquestioning supporters and locked them into an ideology of her own (not her husband's) devise. Adolf von Groß administered the finances and kept the enterprise afloat. Hermann Levi and Karl Ritter stayed loyal to the Festival despite Cosima's constant taunting and marginalization of Levi as « less than a true man » because of his Jewishness. Baron Hans von Wolzogen performed numerous tasks at Cosima's bidding, including editorial control of the « Bayreuther Blätter » - a delegation that was injudicious on a variety of levels.

Hilmes notes :

« Outside Bayreuth, the editor of the Bayreuther Blätter was regarded as a simpleton and nowhere taken seriously. » (page 161)

Carl Friedrich Glasenapp became the official Richard Wagner hagiographer and the vacuous and bigoted Houston Stewart Chamberlain the in-house philosopher.

While Wagner had relied upon and found inspiration from Jewish musicians such as Jacques Halévy, Karl Tausig, Karl Ritter, Heinrich Porges, Lilli Lehmann, Angelo Neumann, Hermann Levi and Josef Rubinstein, Cosima attracted virulent anti-Semites like Julius Kniese, Houston Stewart Chamberlain, and Adolf Hitler. Hatred of Jews became more important to Cosima than the art of her late husband :

« In Wahnfried's jaundice eyes, Jewish ancestry ruled a person out of court as someone who could make an authentic artistic contribution to the Festival. »

Levi's « birth defect » (his Jewish ancestry) was spoken of to his face. And Felix Weingartner reported that, when he attempted to defend Levi, Cosima « listened to me calmly and at the end remarked that there could be no bond between Aryan and Semitic blood. " I don't expect we shall ever see eye to eye on this, my dear Weingartner. " »

She maintained the loyalty of her « Bayreuth Circle » with Stalinesque delicacy. When talented Wagnerians like Peter Cornelius, Richard Strauß, and Weingartner himself, tried to maintain a career of their own, they were banished. Her fixation upon the Festival was unnerving : Cosima's father had the poor taste to die during the 1886 Festival, in the house next to « Wahnfried » , and such was the pressing nature of Cosima's obligations that his body remained there until the stench required Cosima to do something - so, she put it in a wheel-barrow and removed it from « Wahnfried » and, thence, to burial.

Cosima's utter lack of artistic vision did not prevent her from exercising despotic artistic control of the Festival's performances. In her black mourning dress, she set-up a cloth-covered booth near the stage that « resembled nothing so much as a confessional while she, herself, acquired all the characteristics of a high-priestess, praising, criticizing and pointing the way ahead » . (page 163) She sent notes to Levi and Felix Mottl telling them what tempi the « Master » wanted certain passages taken. The stage director also received notes on how the « Master » wanted things staged, and what gestures were to be used at what moment of the performance. She rejected the new æsthetic of Adolphe Appia and Vsevolod Meyerhold, in favour of the « Master » 's approved stagings.

Eventually, she and her cohorts dropped the term « Wagnerian » and referred to themselves as « Bayreuthians » . Their endeavors were no longer limited to mounting old-fashioned productions of Wagner's work and preventing « Parsifal » from being seen by anyone else, anywhere else, except at Bayreuth. Now, she and her colleagues published tracts on politics, culture and other « half-baked ideas » . (page 199) They latched onto Arthur de Gobineau's racist tract « Essay on the Inequality of the Human Races » and wrote 61 different articles debasing even this putrid original by changing Gobineau's 3 « primeval races » (black, yellow and white) into Houston Stewart Chamberlain's 2 : « German and “ others ” » . (page 200) Curious, that (in light of the fact that Cosima was French / Hungarian ; Glasenapp was Latvian ; Chamberlain was English / Scottish ; and Cosima's daughter-in-law and successor, Winifred, was English.

The rest of the story is familiar. Because she could not create, she conserved, ostensibly for Wagner's sake and actually for her own. When the expiration of German copyright laws threatened to diminish her and her family's income, she pressured the German legislature to change them, citing as always « the Master's wishes » . (page 225) When her son displayed no aptitude whatsoever for either theatre, music or heterosexuality, she required him to compose, conduct, direct and have children. Her daughter Blandine's husband shot himself, and her daughter Isolde was defeated and destroyed, ending her life in mental incapacity. Cosima objected to plans for a 90th birthday commemoration and memorial of Wagner because the concert would also include music by a Frenchman (Jules Massenet) and an Italian (Pietro Mascagni) . It is impossible to imagine that, had Wagner lived to see all this done in his name, he would not have wept.

Cosima's decline, after World War I, offered her a few isolated reasons for hope. Her favourite bigot, the charlatan Houston Stewart Chamberlain, became a naturalized German, denounced King George V as a traitor, and married Cosima's daughter, Eva. Her homosexual son, Siegfried, had 4 children by the orphaned English girl, Winifred Williams. And the disaster that was post-World War I Germany showed some hope of revival to its former glory. Then, in 1923, the Bayreuth National-Socialist Party invited its Bavarian leader to make an address in the town's « Reithalle » . Afterwards, he visited « Wahnfried » and « knelt before Chamberlain and reverently kissed his hand » . (page 303) Siegfried also fell within the thrall of the charismatic Adolf Hitler, whose continual financial support sustained the Festival, over the next 20 increasingly difficult years.

...

19 mars 1883 : Josef Matthias Hauer is born in « Wiener Neustadt » .

27 mars 1883 : Hans Paumgartner shows his own interest in Bruckner's music. His review of the 7 Symphony for the « Wiener Abendpost » ...

« Bruckner's 7th Symphony stands before us as an everlasting tonal construction. The time is very close when Bruckner's Symphonic works will fill the programs of all concerts and enter into the hearts of all musical men. Prejudice and insolence can torture, but never prevent. »

Avril 1883 : Gustav Mahler works as Chorus Master for a season of Italian Opera at the « Carl-Theater » , outside Vienna.

Mai 1883 : Hans Paumgartner, who was also a performer of Bruckner's music, wrote in a biographical article about Bruckner that the composer had not yet obtained the recognition he deserved.

7 mai 1883 : The String Quintet of Anton Bruckner (WAB 112) is performed completely for the 1st time, at the « Bösendorfersaal » , in Vienna.

18 mai 1883 : Walter Gropius is born in Berlin.

24 mai 1883 : In America, the Brooklyn Bridge construction is completed and the bridge is opened, crossing the East River to link Manhattan with Brooklyn (then, still a separate city) . It is the 1st steel-wire suspension bridge ever built and, at the time, is the longest bridge in the world.

The 22 year old Gustav Mahler is accepted for a post as « Music and Choral Director » in Kassel, for the season beginning in the fall.

Juin 1883 : Gustav Mahler visits Vienna. Anton Bruckner lends him the score of his 2nd Symphony (WAB 102) . Then, Mahler spends the rest of the summer with his parents in Iglau and with his friend Emil Freund in Seelau, also making a trip to Bayreuth to see the Opera « Parsifal » .

10 juin 1883 : Le « Sängerbund » (l'Association des chanteurs) de Bruckner est joué pour la 1re fois, lors du jour de l'anniversaire du chœur d'hommes de Wels. Cette cantate profane en do majeur, composée à Vienne, est écrite pour chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) . Elle est dédiée à son élève et biographe personnel, August Göllerich.

2 textes sont disponibles : « Die Sängerbund unsrer Städte » (les festivals de chant de nos villes) de Heinrich von der Mattig (pseudonyme du médecin militaire de Salzbourg et poète amateur Heinrich Wallmann, 1827-1898) et « Nichts Schön'res auf der ganzen Erde » (il n'a rien de plus beau dans tout l'Erde) du poète Karl Kerschbaum, un ami de Bruckner ; président du Liedertafel (orphéon) « Frohsinn » de Linz (en plus d'être le comptable et l'archiviste de la ville) .

Été 1883 : The 50 year old Johannes Brahms completes his 3rd Symphony, which is a resounding success at its premiere in December, in Vienna.

Juillet 1883 : Anton Bruckner se rend à nouveau à Bayreuth.

25 juillet 1883 : Alfredo Casella is born in Turin, Italy.

Août 1883 : Bruckner viendra à nouveau se recueillir sur la tombe de son Maître, Richard Wagner. Il gardera en souvenir une boîte d'allumettes gaufrée et une feuille de gerbe qui était déposée sur le cercueil.

Août 1883 : The 22 year old Gustav Mahler is accepted for a post as « Music and Choral Director » in Kassel, for the season beginning in the fall. But he complains about not being able to work on his Opera, « Rubezahl » .

Août 1883 : Gustav Mahler sends his score of « Das Klagende Lied » to Franz Liszt in hopes of getting it performed by the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » (General German Music Association) . Liszt returns it 1 month later, with the short reply :

« Dear Sir !

The composition which you so kindly sent to me, “ Waldmärchen ”, contains much of value. The poem, however, does not seem to be of a kind to guarantee it a success.

With highest-regards,

Franz Liszt »

« Waldmärchen » (Forest Fairy Tale) is the subtitle only to Part One. Liszt's letter seems to indicate that he read the poem and reviewed only this section of the piece. This rebuff from the foremost « modernist » composer hurts Mahler deeply (especially, considering the reputation Liszt rightfully holds as being most generous, financially and otherwise, towards young composers) and, in a later revision, he will remove the entire « Waldmärchen » section from the work.

3-5 septembre 1883 : Anton Bruckner, 59 ans, termine la composition de sa 7e Symphonie à Saint-Florian.

14 septembre 1883 : Richard Gerstl is born in Vienna.

28 septembre 1883 : Anton Bruckner reprend son travail sur le « Te Deum » .

Theodor (Otto) Helm

Le critique musical et écrivain autrichien Theodor (Otto) Helm a travaillé en tant que collaborateur indépendant au « Pestor Lloyd » (un journal allemand vendu à Budapest) de même qu'au « Wiener Salonblatt » et au « Deutsche Zeitung » (1884-1901) . D'abord fort critique de la musique d'Anton Bruckner, Helm se convertit, en 1883, devenant l'un de ses plus ardents défenseurs. Il lui alloua des dizaines d'articles élogieux et ce, jusqu'à la fin de sa vie. De 1883 à 1896, Bruckner et Helm ont conservé une correspondance régulière. Le compositeur recherchait souvent un commentaire favorable dans ses articles publiés dans le « Deutsche Zeitung » , lors de concerts de moindre importance présentés à l'extérieur de Vienne. Bruckner s'est souvent rendu à son domicile du 3 de la Rochusgasse 10, pour lui payer une visite amicale et pour passer en revue ses partitions de Symphonies.

De 1902 à 1905, soit 6 ans après la mort d'Anton Bruckner, le critique musical et écrivain autrichien Theodor (Otto) Helm organise, en collaboration avec le « Wiener Akademische Gesangverein » , un événement exceptionnel appelé « Célébrations » , en hommage au compositeur de Saint-Florian. Par ailleurs, le Festival Bruckner annuel ne sera fondé qu'en 1929.

Helm, loyal à sa phalange, préférait voir le chef Hans Richter diriger les cordes « luxuriante » du Philharmonique de Vienne que de le voir face à la « précision prussienne » du Philharmonique de Berlin.

Theodor (Otto) Helm a assisté à Vienne aux funérailles d'Anton Bruckner (1896) , de Johannes Brahms (1897) ; et, probablement aussi, de Johann Strauß II (1899) et d'Hugo Wolf (1903) .

...

The Austrian music-critic and writer Theodor Otto Helm was born on 9 April 1843 in Vienna and died on 25 December 1920 in Vienna.

Theodor Otto Helm was a leading figure in Viennese musical life and a prominent music-critic in Vienna for 50 years (1866-1916) . While Helm specialized in criticism of the works of Ludwig van Beethoven, Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms, Richard Wagner, Franz Liszt, and Antonín Dvořák, he also wrote on younger composers including Béla Bartók and Gustav Mahler, and Arnold Schönberg. Heavily involved in the Vienna music scene, including the « Wiener Akademischer Wagner Verein » , Helm counted both Bruckner and Brahms as close acquaintances.

In 1853, Theodor Helm began his studies at the « Schotten Gymnasium der Benediktiner » , in Vienna. He eventually focused his efforts on studying law. Helm received his Ph.D. in 1870. He taught as an instructor of the history of music and aesthetics at the Conservatory « Horakschen » , beginning in 1874. In 1900, he was named professor.

Helm began his writing career in Vienna's « Neues Fremdenblatt » , in 1867. He continued his essays and music criticisms in the « Musikalisches Wochenblatt » , a Leipzig weekly (1870-1905) , and continued with the paper when subsumed by the « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » .

Helm's greatest work is arguably his 1885 « Beethovens Streichquartette : Versuch einer technischen Analyse dieser Werke im Zusammenhange mit ihren geistigen Gehalt » (Leipzig, 1885) . This analysis of Beethoven's String Quartets is considered seminal work and has been reprinted many times by publishers across the world.

He contributed freelance writings to the « Pestor Lloyd » (a German newspaper issued in Budapest) and the Viennese « Salonblatt » and the « Deutsche Zeitung » (1884-1901) .

While initially critical of Anton Bruckner's work, in 1883, Helm converted in his views and became one of Bruckner's strongest advocates, penning dozens of glowing reviews throughout the rest of Bruckner's life. Bruckner and Helm regularly corresponded between 1883 until Bruckner's death in 1896. Often Bruckner was seeking a favourable review from Helm in « Deutsche Zeitung » , albeit 2nd hand account, of a non-Vienna venue concert. On occasion, Bruckner visited Helm at his home III. Rochusgasse 10, in Vienna, to visit and go over his Symphonic scores with Helm.

1902 : The Austrian music-critic and writer Theodor (Otto) Helm organizes a 3 year Bruckner Celebration with the collaboration of the « Akademische Gesangverein » , 6 years after the composer's death. However, the well-known annual Bruckner Festival wasn't founded until 1929.

Ever the Viennese loyalist, Helm preferred Hans Richter and the lush string section of the Vienna Philharmonic over the « Prussian precision » of the Berlin Philharmonic.

Theodor Helm attended the funerals ceremonies (all in Vienna) of Anton Bruckner (1896) ; Johannes Brahms (1897) ; and, probably, Johann Strauß II (1899) , and Hugo Wolf (1903) .

Helm not only appreciated fine composition and performances but also excellent acoustics. After the opening concert at the « Golden Hall » of the « Musikverein » (« Große Musikvereinsaal ») , Helm commented on the impressive acoustics :

« This achievement, is partly a stroke of pure luck (unfortunately, acoustics still cannot be precisely forecast or calculated) and, on the other hand, it is undeniably merited by the excellent architect Hansen. »

While many view Helm in the conservative German Nationalist camp, he was simultaneously regarded as one of the « most fair-minded and balanced Viennese critics » , in Vienna. As Helm approached middle age, the « Deutsche Zeitung » was still a liberal paper. However, in 1884, as the paper took a decidedly anti-Semitic turn, Helm was hired as the chief music-critic for the « Deutsche Zeitung » and attempted to maintain his critical objectivity in his writings against the politics of the editors. Over the subsequent decades, the « Deutsche Zeitung » touted itself as a highly anti-Semitic German nationalist newspaper.

Some criticized Helm for writing to pander to the political views of his audience and thus for writing contradictory reviews of a given performance. He was attacked in the press for being a « helmet without a head » . Hugo Wolf retaliated to a critical review by calling Helm « an idiot » .

Other argued that Helm sought to not let the political bias of the management taint his writings. Theodor Helm's political comments seem « to be added almost reluctantly, even gratuitously, as if he were bowing to the wish of management » . His criticism of Johannes Brahms included comments deriding his liberal supporters more often than Brahms' works which Helm generally held in high-regard :

« Helm declined to support the anti-Semitic politics that began to pose a serious threat to the Viennese Liberalism of the 1880's. »

As further evidence of Helm's rejection of German Nationalistic bias, Helm collaborated with both the Jewish critic Robert Hirschfeld and Slavic critic Grigory Lvovsky.

...

Theodor (Otto) Helm's parents, Doctor Julius Helm (1813-1844) and Julie Freiin von Forstern had married in 1842.

Theodor was their only child. Julius Helm died when Theodor was only 1 year old. Theodor's mother died when he was 15, leaving Theodor in the care of Julius's uncle, Friedrich Drahtschmidt von Märentheim, who was friends of Robert and Clara Schumann.

While in school, Theodor Helm became friends with a classmate Richard Müller whose father was Karl Müller (1813-1868) , a prominent music-critic from « nobility » . The elder Müller was largely responsible for introducing young Theodor to Vienna's musical events and salons. Upon Karl Müller's death, Helm replaced Müller as music-critic for the « Neues Fremdenblatt » .

Theodor Otto Helm married Irene Dorothea Müller (1844-1911) , Karl Müller's daughter, on 1 June 1869.

In 1870, Theodor and Irene Helm had their 1st child, Julius. Tragically, Theodor's wife Irene completely lost her hearing in 1870. It isn't clear if this was a complication related to childbirth. As a very young boy, Julius studied violin under Johannes Brahms, who suspected that Julius was a musical genius. Sadly, Julius died at the early age of 5 years and 9 months.

In 1872, Theodor and Irene had a daughter Gabriela Mathilde Helm. An accomplished pianist, she lived until 1945.

In 1875, Theodor and Irene Helm had a 2nd son Theodor Ludwig Moritz Helm (1875-1963) . Theodor Junior attempted to emulate his father by publishing several critical essays on Anton Bruckner's music, but failing to follow his father's success while under the economic pressures of providing for his growing family, he later settled to work as a civil servant with the Postal Service.

Theodor (Otto) Helm died of « old age » on 25 December 1920. He was buried on the 27th in the « Zentralfriedhof » cemetery in Vienna, near the graves of his fellow critic Eduard Hanslick and the composers Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Franz Schubert, Karl Goldmark, Hugo Wolf, Antonio Salieri and several Strausses.

Writings :

« Beethovens letzte Quartette » , Tonhalle (1868) .

« Beethovens Streichquartette : Versuch einer technischen Analyse dieser Werke im Zusammenhange mit ihren geistigen Gehalt » , Leipzig (1885) , (3/1921/R) .

« 50 Jahre Wiener Musikleben » , Autobiographie (1916) .

4 octobre 1883 : Vienna premiere of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » .

Novembre 1883 : Parmi ceux qui assistent aux conférences de Bruckner à l'Université de Vienne, citons : le baryton Eduard Mirus, H. Pietschmann, E. Reimer et R. Scharpff.

Eduard Mirus

The German baritone, Operatic singer and vocal teacher Eduard Mirus (pseudonym : Eduard Mirius) was born on 12 May 1856 in Klagenfurth (Austria) ; and died on 14 December 1914.

As a student, he was a pupil of Eduard Hanslick at the Vienna Conservatory, then studied singing (as a baritone) in Italy where he appeared in various theatres. He finally settled in Vienna, as a singing teacher. He has collected, arranged and published songs and choruses. He also conducted Operatic concerts.

Samstag 3. Dezember 1910 : Opern-Konzert im Hotel Savoy Wien (Mariahilf) .

Dirigent : Eduard Mirus.

Bariton : Franz Riedl.

Mariahilfer Männergesangverein.

Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester.

Programm

Richard Wagner : Prelude to Act I of the Opera « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » (WWV 96) .

Johann Strauß II (Junior) : « Kaiserwalzer » (the Emperor Waltz) , Opus 437.

Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart : « O Isis und Osiris » , priest's choir from the Opera « Die Zauberflöte » (The Magic Flute) (K. 620) .

Charles Gounod : Prayer of Valentin from the Opera « Faust » (« Margarethe ») .

Georges Bizet : Suite No. I (WD 40) , based on the scene-music « L'Arlésienne » (The girl from Arles) (WD 28) .

Martin Plüddemann : « Das Schwedengrab » , ballad for male choir and orchestra, orchestrated by Josef Pembaur.

Edvard Grieg : « Triumphal march » from the incidental music " Sigurd Jorsalfar " » , Opus 22.

...

13 novembre 1883 : Le docteur Alois Scherer, maire du village de Vöcklabruck, nomme Anton Bruckner membre honoraire du « Vöcklabrucker Liedertafel » : chœur fondé par le compositeur. Scherer sera l'un des Iers à reconnaître sa contribution artistique. Avocat de profession, Alois Scherer fut le 1er magistrat de Vöcklabruck pour plus d'un mandat.

Letter from Anton Bruckner to a friend, 13 November 1883

The Moldenhauer Archives - The Rosaleen Moldenhauer Memorial at the Library of Congress in Washington have posted online a letter written by Anton Bruckner to a friend, on 13 November 1883.

31 août 2015 : Good evening Mr. Berky,

Moldenhauer Archives : About the letter by Anton Bruckner to a friend, from 13 November 1883, may I add that the « Master » was named an honorary member of the Vöcklabruck « Liedertafel » , that same day. (Gilles Houle)

...

3 décembre 1883 : Anton von Webern is born into an aristocratic German family. As with Alexander von Zemlinsky, he too will later drop the « von » (but, in Webern's case, it is legitimate) , and will be known as Anton Webern.

The 19 year old Richard Strauß composes his Piano Quartet in C minor, Opus 13, reflecting his new interest in Johannes Brahms, and begins his Symphony in F minor.

The 17 year old Ferruccio Busoni lives in Vienna and becomes friends with Carl Goldmark and Johannes Brahms.

AB 83 : 1884

WAB 50

1884 (ou avant) : WAB 50 - « Veni Creator Spiritus » (viens Saint-Esprit créateur) , graduel de la Pentecôte, en mode Grégorien, pour orgue seul ; ou une ou plusieurs voix et orgue. Livret : « Pfingsthymnus des Hrabanus Maurus » , vers 476-556.

G/A (August Göllerich / Max Auer) : IV/1 (1936) , page 524.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , page 129.

Veni Creator Spiritus ("Come, Holy Ghost, Creator blest"), WAB 50, is a motet composed by Anton Bruckner in c.1884.

The Motet was composed around 1884. Bruckner's manuscript is stored in the Schlägl Abbey, where it was retrieved in 1831. The Motet was 1st published in Band IV/1, page 524, of the Göllicher / Auer biography. It is put in Band XXI/36 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

The Motet is a harmonisation of the Gregorian hymn « Veni Creator Spiritus » for voice(s) and organ.

Veni Creator Spiritus,
Mentes tuorum visita :
Imple superna gratia
Quae tu creasti, pectora.

« Veni Creator Spiritus »

« Veni Creator Spiritus » est une hymne entonnée pour le chant Grégorien, considérée comme la plus célèbre de toutes les hymnes grégoriennes. Le « Veni Creator » fut composé par Raban Maur au IXe siècle et est normalement associé à l'Église catholique Romaine.

Le « Veni Creator Spiritus » est chanté lors de l'entrée en conclave à la chapelle Sixtine, ainsi qu'au moment de la consécration d'un évêque, l'ordination de prêtres, la dédicace d'églises, la célébration de synodes et de conciles, le couronnement de Rois, l'échange des consentements d'une Messe de mariage, et lors d'autres événements solennels. L'hymne fut d'abord consignée aux Vêpres. Un manuscrit du 11e siècle le situe à la fois aux Laudes et aux Vêpres. Ainsi, cette hymne fut chantée par la Chapelle royale, le samedi 16 octobre 1610 selon la tradition, à la fin de l'office solennel des Vêpres et la veille du sacre du roi Louis XIII, dans l'abbaye Saint-Nicaise, près de Reims.

Le titre de l'hymne signifie « Viens Saint-Esprit Créateur » et commémore la Pentecôte. Son usage dans l'office de tierce aurait commencé dans la liturgie de Cluny, puisqu'il commémore la descente de l'Esprit à la 3e heure du jour.

Cette hymne de Pentecôte constitue le 1er mouvement de la 8e Symphonie « des Mille » de Gustav Mahler. Le compositeur l'a écrite dans un style rigoureusement contrapuntique en hommage aux Maîtres de la Renaissance. Le recueillement se mêle à la puissance dans la musique, mettant merveilleusement en valeur les différents aspects du texte (l'humble prière des 1res strophes, l'appel à la lutte spirituelle au 5e quatrain) . En France, Michel-Richard de Lalande, musicien de Louis XIV, est connu en tant que compositeur de ce Psaume (grand Motet en latin, S. 14) , de même que son contemporain Henry Desmarest.

Cette hymne était aussi entonnée par Sainte-Jeanne d'Arc et son armée, lorsque la « Pucelle de Domrémy » , menait ses soldats vers une de ses plus grandes victoires sur les Anglais (à Patay notamment où il y eut au minimum 2,000 Anglais tués et 3 côté français seulement !) .

Veni, creator, Spiritus,
Mentes tuorum visita,
Imple superna gratia

Quae tu creasti pectora.

Qui diceris Paraclitus,
Altissimi donum Dei.
Fons vivus, ignis, caritas
Et spiritalis unctio.

Tu septiformis munere,
Digitus paternae dexteræ.
Tu rite promissum Patris,
Sermone ditans guttura.

Accende lumen sensibus
Infunde amorem cordibus,
Infirma nostri corporis
Virtute firmans perpeti.

Hostem repellas longius
Pacemque dones protinus;
Ductore sic te praeviso
Vitemus omne noxium.

Per te sciamus da Patrem,
Noscamus atque Filium;
Teque utriusque Spiritum
Credamus omni tempore.

Deo Patri sit gloria,
Et Filio, qui a mortuis
Surrexit, ac Paraclito
In saeculorum saecula.
Amen.

...

Viens, Esprit Créateur, visite l'âme de tes fidèles, emplis de la grâce d'En-Haut les cœurs que tu as créés.

Toi qu'on nomme le Consolateur,
Le don du Dieu très-Haut,
La source vivante, le Feu, la Charité,
L'Onction spirituelle.

Tu es l'Esprit aux 7 dons, le doigt de la main du Père,
Son authentique promesse,
Celui qui enrichit toute prière.

Fais briller en nous ta lumière,
Répands l'amour dans nos cœurs,
Soutiens la faiblesse de nos corps
Par ton éternelle vigueur !

Repousse au loin l'Ennemi,
Donne-nous la paix qui dure ;
Que sous ta prévenante conduite, nous évitions tout mal et toute erreur.

Fais-nous connaître le Père, révèle-nous le Fils,
et toi, leur commun Esprit, fais-nous toujours croire en toi.

Gloire soit à Dieu le Père, au Fils ressuscité des morts,
à l'Esprit Saint Consolateur, maintenant et dans tous les siècles.
Amen.

...

« Veni Creator Spiritus » (Come Creator Spirit) is a hymn believed to have been written by Rabanus Maurus in the 9th Century. When the original Latin text is used, it is normally sung in Gregorian Chant. As an invocation of the Holy Spirit, in the practice of the Roman Catholic Church it is sung during the liturgical celebration of the feast of Pentecost (at both Terce and Vespers) . It is also sung at occasions such as the entrance of Cardinals to the Sistine Chapel, when electing a new pope, as well as at the consecration of bishops, the ordination of priests, when celebrating the sacrament of Confirmation, the dedication of churches, the celebration of synods or councils, the coronation of kings, the profession of members of religious institutes and other similar solemn events.

The hymn is also widely used in the Anglican Communion and appears, for example, in the Ordering of Priests and in the Consecration of Bishops in the « Book of Common Prayer » of 1662. It has been translated into several languages ; one English example is « Creator Spirit ! » by whose aid, written 1690 by John Dryden and published in « The Church Hymn » book, in 1872 (near 313) . Martin Luther used it as the basis for his chorale for Pentecost « Komm, Gott Schöpfer, Heiliger Geist » , composed in 1524.

Gustav Mahler set the Latin text to music in Part I of his Symphony No. 8 in E-flat major. The text has been set for chorus and orchestra by Cristóbal Halffter. A Motet for women's voices to the text was among the last works of Hector Berlioz. Krzysztof Penderecki wrote a Motet for mixed choir, and Paul Hindemith concludes his Concerto for Organ and Orchestra with a Phantasy on « Veni Creator Spiritus » . Maurice Duruflé used the chant tune as the basis for his Symphonic organ composition « Prélude, Adagio et Choral varié sur le thème du ' Veni Creator ' » , in 1930. Michaël John Trotta's setting incorporates the 1st 2 lines of this hymn along with the text from « Veni Sancte Spiritus » in a 21st Century setting for choir.

Veni, creator Spiritus
mentes tuorum visita,
imple superna gratia,
quae tu creasti pectora.

Qui diceris Paraclitus,
altissimi donum Dei,
fons vivus, ignis, caritas
et spiritalis unctio.

Tu septiformis munere,
digitus paternae dexteræ
tu rite promissum Patris
sermone ditans guttura.

Accende lumen sensibus,
infunde amorem cordibus,
infirma nostri corporis,
virtute firmans perpeti.

Hostem repellas longius
pacemque dones protinus ;
ductore sic te praevio
vitemus omne noxium.

Per te sciamus da Patrem
noscamus atque Filium, te utriusque Spiritum
credamus omni tempore.

Deo Patri sit gloria,
et Filio qui a mortuis
Surrexit, ac Paraclito,
in saeculorum saecula.
Amen.

V. Emitte Spiritum tuum, et creabuntur.

R. Et renovabis faciem terrae.

Oremus : Deus qui corda fidelium Sancti Spiritus illustratione docuisti: da nobis in eodem Spiritu recta sapere, et de eius semper consolatione gaudere. Per Dominum nostrum Jesum Christum, Filium tuum, qui tecum vivit et regnat in unitate eiusdem Spiritus Sancti Deus. Per omnia saecula saeculorum. Amen.

...

Come, Holy Ghost, Creator blest, and in our hearts take-up Thy rest ;
come with Thy grace and heav'nly aid,
To fill the hearts which Thou hast made.

O Comforter, to Thee we cry,
Thou heav'nly gift of God most high,
Thou Fount of life, and Fire of love, and sweet anointing from above.

O Finger of the hand divine, the sevenfold gifts of grace are thine ;
true promise of the Father thou,
who dost the tongue with power endow.

Thy light to every sense impart, and shed thy love in every heart ;
thine own unfailing might supply to strengthen our infirmity.

Drive far away our ghostly foe, and thine abiding peace bestow ;
if thou be our preventing Guide,
no evil can our steps betide.

Praise we the Father and the Son and Holy Spirit with them One ; and may the Son on us bestow
the gifts that from the Spirit flow.

V. Send forth Thy Spirit, and they shall be created. R. And Thou shalt renew the face of the earth.

Let us Pray : O God, Who didst instruct the hearts of the faithful by the light of the Holy Ghost : give to us, in the same Spirit, to know what is right, and ever rejoice in His consolation. Through Jesus-Christ, Thy Son, our Lord, Who with Thee livest and reignest in the unity of the same Holy Spirit, God. World without end. Amen.

Since the English Reformation in the 16th Century, there have been more than 50 English language translations and paraphrases of Veni Creator Spiritus. The version included in the 1662 revision of the Book of Common Prayer retained the Latin title and was written by Bishop John Cosin for the coronation of King Charles I of Great Britain in 1625. The same words have been used at every coronation since, and is sung by the choir after the singing of the Creed, while the sovereign is dressed in a white alb and seated in the Coronation Chair, prior to the Anointing. The 1st verse is :

Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire, and lighten with celestial fire.
Thou the anointing Spirit art, who dost thy sevenfold gifts impart.

Another well-known version by the poet John Dryden was 1st published in his 1693 work, « Examen Poeticum » . It may be sung to the tune « Melita » by John Bacchus Dykes. Dryden's 1st verse is :

Creator Spirit, by whose aid
The world's foundations first were laid,
Come, visit every pious mind ;
Come, pour thy joys on humankind ;
From sin and sorrow set us free,
And make thy temples worthy thee.

Janvier 1884 : In Kassel, the 23 year old Gustav Mahler gets the 1st opportunity to attend concerts conducted by the 54 year old Hans von Bülow and is deeply impressed. Mahler writes a letter to the famous conductor begging to become his pupil ; Bülow, offended by Mahler's breach of authority and protocol, brushes him off and sends a copy of Mahler's letter to his superiors, which deteriorates Mahler's relationship with the Kassel Theater.

After leaving the University, Richard Strauß is encouraged by his father to travel and meet other musicians.

Janvier 1884 : In Berlin, the 19 year old Richard Strauß completes his Symphony in F minor, Opus 12. Theodor Thomas, an American conductor visiting Europe, sees the score and gives the premiere with the New York Philharmonic in New York, in December.

22 janvier 1884 : Bruckner est nommé membre honoraire du « Wiener Akademischer Wagnerverein » .

27 février 1884 : Création intégrale (dans le cadre d'un événement organisé par la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne) de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans un arrangement pour 2 pianos donné par les solistes Ferdinand Löwe et Josef Schalk.

16 mars 1884 : Anton Bruckner achève la 1re version de son « Te Deum » en do majeur pour chœur, solistes, grand orchestre, et orgue ad libitum (WAB 45) . La mort de Richard Wagner aura fourni au compositeur l'impulsion pour compléter l'œuvre.

23 mars 1884 : Hugo Wolf, noted composer of Lieder and pro-Wagner music-critic, writing in the « Wiener Salonblatt » ...

« The 2nd number was Brahms' Piano Concerto in B-flat major, played by the composer himself. Whoever can swallow this Concerto with appetite can calmly await a famine ; it is to be assumed that he enjoys an enviable digestion, and in time of famine will be able to get along splendidly on the nutritive equivalent of window glass, cork stoppers, stove pipes, and the like. »

5 mai 1884 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner à son élève Rudolf Krzyzanowski :

« My 7th Symphony is completed, as well as a large “ Te Deum ”. Nikisch, in Leipzig, is absolutely delighted with the 7th and wants to perform it soon, at a concert for the Wagner memorial fund. »

Hartman Sta

Bruckner tombe en amour avec la jolie Hartman Sta.

Encore sous l'influence des liturgies solennelles de la Semaine Sainte, Bruckner écrira, au retour de ce voyage ...

WAB II

28 mai 1884 : WAB 11 : « Christus factus est » (le Christ s'est fait pour nous obéissant) n° 3, graduel pour le Jeudi-Saint en ré mineur pour chœur mixte a cappella (à 4, 5 ou 6 voix) et cordes (ou trombones) . Composé à Vienne. Dédié par Bruckner, le 2 août 1885, à son ami, le Supérieur ecclésiastique (compositeur, organiste et professeur) Père Raphael « Oddo » Loidol du monastère de Kremsmünster. Création à Vienne, le 9 novembre 1884. Dirigé le 28 février 1905 par le chef E. Thomas.

Durée approximative : 5 minutes.

1re édition : TR 41, Fritz Brodersen, Theodor Rättig, Vienne (1886) ; le 1er des « Vier Graduale für Sopran, Alt, Tenor und Baß » .

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XXI/1, édition Hans Bauernfeind - Leopold Nowak (1984) (2001) , pages 122-125.

« Geistliche Gesänge » III, n° 453, Willy Müller, Süddeutscher Musikverlag, édition Georg Darmstadt (1930) .

E. F. Schmid, édition Anton Böhm & Sohn, Augsburg.

EE 4185, Ernst Eulenburg, édition Peters (1939) , pages 16-18.

« European Sacred Music » , édition John Rutter, Oxford University Press (1996) , pages 68-74.

...

« Christus factus est » (Christ became obedient) , WAB 11, is a sacred Motet by Anton Bruckner, his 3rd setting of the Latin gradual « Christus factus est » , composed in 1884. Before, Bruckner composed, in 1844, a 1st piece on the same text as gradual of the « Messe für den Gründonnerstag » (WAB 9) and, in 1873, a Motet (WAB 10) for 8 part mixed choir, 3 trombones, and string instruments ad libitum. The Motet is an expressive setting of the gradual, influenced by Richard Wagner's music.

Bruckner composed this Motet, which uses the gradual of Maundy Thursday, on 25 May 1884. The piece was performed 6 months later, on 9 November, in the « Wiener Hofmusikkapelle » . Bruckner dedicated the work to Father Raffael « Oddo » Loidol, one of his students at the Conservatory. The piece was published together with 3 other graduals (« Locus iste » , WAB 23 ; « Os justi » , WAB 30 ; and « Virga Jesse floruit » , WAB 52) by Theodor Rättig, in 1886. The Motet is put in Band XXI/30 of the « Gesamtausgabe » .

The work in 79 bars in D minor is set for mixed choir a cappella.

In the 1st part (bars 1-19) , till « mortem autem crucis » , the choir is singing in homophony. It expresses, in sombre lines, how inhuman is God's demand to implacable obedience to the death, even the death on the cross. After a 1 bar rest (bar 20) , the Motet evolves in waves of intensification, with twice the « Dresdner Amen » , on « exaltavit illum » (bars 23-24) and « super omne nomen » (bars 37-38) , respectively. After a 2nd 1 bar rest (bar 56) , it reaches a dramatic climax (bars 57-62) . Thereafter, the Motet is evolving diminuendo and a gradual sorrowful rest returns, with the 8 bar Coda in pianissimo, which is harmonically similar to that of the previous setting of 1873. Publisher Carus-Verlag summarizes that by means of modulation and chromatic, Bruckner achieves heightened expressiveness for the Passion text.

Bruckner composed the piece when he was in preparation to have his 7th Symphony performed and revised his « Te Deum » . The 2nd part of the Grail motif from Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » which the composer had heard in Bayreuth, in 1882, is also the « Dresdner Amen » .

...

WAB 11 (1884) : « Christus factus est » No. 3 ; graduale for Maundy Thursday in D minor for choir. Actually, 1886 is the date of publication (« Vier Graduale » , by Theodor Rättig, Vienna) , per HMB, assuming this is that one and WAB 9 is the other one.

Bruckner's 3rd setting of « Christus factus est » is arguably his best. It seems that it was composed during a trip by the composer to Prague and several German cities. Scored for unaccompanied voices, it is in Bruckner's mature idiom, being contemporary with the « Te Deum » and sharing some the latter's thematic material.

In this solemn Motet, Bruckner's tone painting is excellent and idiosyncratic, the latter adjective being in the best sense of the word. There is an impassioned repetition of and hanging-on to the word « obediens » as though to impress one with the humility and sacrifice of Christ ; here, one is reminded of accounts that during his prayers, the composer could often be heard repeating a phrase or a word up to 5 times, as though to immerse himself with its significance. As the text of the music alludes to the Crucifixion, the music sinks to minimal audibility, again a reminder from Bruckner's external world, that he expressed his most important spiritual thoughts in a hushed and solemn voice. The mood intensifies and rises appropriately with the line « Propter quod et Deus exaltavit » (for which cause, God also hath exalted Him) . A device from the « Te Deum » is here used, the repetition of the final line « quod est super omne nomen » , which recalls the « Non confudar » from the larger work. Some material from the « Te Deum » is even utilized but here the climax is inverse. Where the former relies on a building-up of forces and intensity, the « Christus factus » ends with a prolonged diminuendo, a fading into a powerful and mystic silence with its final thought.

Berlioz et Weimar

« Weimar est une ville artiste et la famille ducale sait honorer les arts. »

(Berlioz, « 1er voyage en Allemagne » , Lettre 10 - en 1843.)

« Des grands compositeurs français, Berlioz est celui qui a le plus de points de rattachement avec Weimar. »

(Liszt, lettre au Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre - en 1883)

Dans l'histoire des rapports de Berlioz avec l'Allemagne, Weimar tient une place de 1er choix : ses relations avec la ville s'étendent sur plus de 2 décennies, de 1843 à 1863 et au-delà. Pendant cette période, Berlioz développera de multiples liens avec des musiciens et écrivains actifs à Weimar, particulièrement dans les années 1852-1856 quand un cercle de jeunes enthousiastes se forme autour de Liszt, l'ami de Berlioz de longue date et la compagne de Liszt, la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein, qui sont à cette période le moteur de l'activité musicale de la ville. Un lien parcourt toute cette aventure : la protection bienveillante fournie par une suite de Grand-Ducs et Grandes-Duchesses de Saxe-Weimar, de Charles Frédéric (1783-1853) et sa femme Maria Pavlovna (1786-1859), sœur du Tsar de Russie, à son fils et successeur Charles Alexandre (1818-1901) et sa femme Wilhelmine Marie Sophie Louise (1824-1897), fille du roi de Hollande. Tous ces souverains perpétuent consciemment une tradition de mécénat éclairé pour l'activité artistique et intellectuelle qui remonte à Charles Auguste (1757-1828), père de Charles Frédéric et ami et protecteur de Goethe. Sous son règne, et malgré ses dimensions modestes, Weimar se hisse au rang de centre intellectuel du monde allemand et acquiert la réputation d'une « Athènes moderne ». Il va de soi que tous les membres de la famille ducale parlent français couramment (la correspondance entre Liszt et Charles Alexandre, tous 2 d'éducation allemande, est entièrement en français).

Les rapports de Berlioz avec Weimar peuvent être divisés en 3 périodes : la 1re visite en 1843 ; la période de relations étroites entre 1852 et 1856, quand l'influence de Liszt à Weimar est à son apogée ; et la période après 1856 quand l'influence de Liszt décline et lui et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein quittent finalement Weimar pour Rome et l'Italie, mais la cour de Weimar continue à entretenir des rapports bienveillants avec Berlioz.

1843

À son retour d'Italie, en 1832, les projets de Berlioz de voyage en Allemagne se fixent d'abord sur Berlin. Il connaît bien entendu Weimar de réputation, mais tout d'abord non comme ville musicale mais comme le centre intellectuel et culturel qui est lié au nom de 2 de ses idoles littéraires, Goethe et Schiller, et de leur patron le Grand-Duc Charles Auguste (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 100). Berlioz connaît les œuvres de ces 2 poètes, bien que seulement en traduction française. En 1828, il découvre le « Faust » de Goethe dans la traduction de Gérard de Nerval, qui l'inspire à écrire les « 8 scènes de Faust » qu'il publie sans tarder comme son Œuvre I ; mais il retire bientôt l'ouvrage, qu'il développera plus tard pour en faire « la Damnation de Faust » (« Mémoires » : Chapitres 26 et 54). Berlioz pousse même l'audace à écrire au célèbre poète pour lui envoyer un exemplaire de la partition dès sa publication (Correspondance Générale, n° 122, le 10 avril 1829 ; ci-après la Correspondance Générale tout court), mais Goethe, se fiant au jugement négatif du compositeur Zelter, ne se donne pas la peine de répondre.

Au départ, Berlioz ne connaît personne parmi les musiciens de Weimar. La 1re relation éventuelle à se présenter est Jean-Baptiste Chélaré (1789-1861), violoniste, compositeur et chef d'orchestre, dont Berlioz fait la connaissance à Paris dans les années 1820 quand Chélaré fait partie de l'Orchestre de l'Opéra (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 126 et 154) . Après plusieurs tentatives de faire carrière à l'étranger, Chélaré s'installe enfin à Weimar en 1836 comme « Kapellmeister » , mais sans jamais s'imposer là ou ailleurs, et Berlioz visiblement ne le considère pas comme méritant d'être cultivé. Bien plus prometteur est le musicien et écrivain Johann Christian Lobe (1797-1881) , « ce type du véritable musicien allemand » comme Berlioz l'appellera plus tard (« Mémoires » : « 1er voyage en Allemagne » , 3e lettre) . Ami de Goethe, il est flûtiste à l'Orchestre du théâtre de Weimar jusqu'en 1842 et fonde un institut de musique dans la ville. Lobe est parmi les Iers et plus chaleureux partisans de Berlioz en Allemagne : « j'étais votre ami depuis le moment, que j'ai ouï l' « Ouverture des Francs-Juges » , et je le serai jusqu'à la fin de ma vie » , écrira-il à Berlioz quelques années plus tard (Correspondance Générale, n° 793) . L'Ouverture avait été exécutée à Weimar à un concert en 1837 (le 19 mars) et avait suscité de la part de Lobe une lettre ouverte enthousiaste dans la « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » de Schumann le mois suivant (9 mai) , où Lobe exprimait l'espoir d'une visite de Berlioz à Weimar. Schumann, lui-même partisan de l'heure de Berlioz, s'empresse de lui envoyer un exemplaire de l'article (Correspondance Générale, n° 496bis - tome VIII) .

Quand Berlioz se met finalement en route, en décembre 1842, pour le voyage en Allemagne si souvent ajourné, Weimar est donc une étape qui s'impose : avant la fin du mois, il est en rapport avec Lobe et reçoit de lui une lettre à la fois instructive et chaleureuse (Correspondance Générale, numéros 792, 793) , mais Lobe le prévient toutefois de concilier par prudence Chélaré pour éviter des froissements, conseil que Berlioz s'empresse de suivre (Correspondance Générale, numéros 796, 798bis et 798ter) . Il arrive à Weimar vers le 18 janvier, en provenance de Francfort, et séjourne jusqu'au 28 quand il part pour Leipzig (Correspondance Générale, numéros 806 et 807) . Après les déceptions du début du voyage, le séjour de Weimar marque le début d'une phase plus positive. Mais c'est aussi à Weimar que Marie Recio, à qui Berlioz a tenté de fausser compagnie à Francfort, le rejoint et ils feront ensemble le reste du voyage (Correspondance Générale, n° 815) .

Il subsiste un certain nombre de lettres datant de janvier 1843 mais elles donnent peu de détails sur le séjour de Weimar. Le récit publié par Berlioz plus tard dans l'année dans la 3e de ses lettres sur son voyage (« Journal des Débats » , 28 août ; « Critique Musicale » , tome V, pages 275-284) , qu'il reprendra dans ses « Mémoires » , est un peu plus fourni. À l'époque, les ressources musicales de Weimar sont modestes ; le chœur du théâtre est très faible, l'orchestre comme d'habitude a ni cor anglais (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 970 - tome VIII) , ni ophicléide, ni harpe, et il faut renforcer les cordes avec des joueurs supplémentaires (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 792, 793, 799) . Berlioz demande audience au Grand-Duc et à la Grande-Duchesse mais ne semble pas l'avoir obtenu (Correspondance Générale, n° 801) ; le silence des « Mémoires » est significatif. Le concert du 25 janvier au théâtre comprend l' « Ouverture des Francs-Juges » , bien connue à Weimar, « la Symphonie fantastique » , le 2e mouvement de « Harold en Italie » , et 3 mélodies chantées par Marie Recio (« Le Jeune pâtre breton » et « Absence » avec accompagnement de piano, et « La Belle voyageuse » avec orchestre) . Comme d'habitude, la participation de Marie Recio n'est pas mentionnée dans les « Mémoires » .

Berlioz se déclare satisfait des résultats et de la réception qu'on lui accorde (Correspondance Générale, numéros 806, 806bis [tome VIII] , 807) , et de toute sa tournée en Allemagne, Weimar est la seule ville où on lui laisse la totalité de la recette du concert. Il aurait voulu faire un autre passage à Weimar avant son retour à Paris, mais le projet échouera (Correspondance Générale, n° 831) . Conscient de l'avertissement de Lobe, Berlioz a bien soin de rester en rapport avec Chélard pendant le reste de son voyage (Correspondance Générale, numéros 810, 826, 831) . Dans la lettre sur le séjour de Weimar, qu'il publie dans « le Journal des Débats » , il souligne expressément l'appui qu'il a reçu de Chélard, qu'il nomme son « savant compatriote » et « un artiste noble et digne » (Critique Musicale V, pages 281-282) . Chélard ne peut contenir sa joie à cet hommage public inaccoutumé, et il en conçoit de grands espoirs pour l'avenir (Correspondance Générale, n° 864) . Mais Berlioz gommara les épithètes flatteurs de la version qui sera reprise plus tard dans les « Mémoires » . Chélard sera plus tard remplacé par Liszt à Weimar ; le reste de sa carrière musicale est sans relief et son nom ne figure que rarement dans la correspondance de Berlioz ; il meurt en 1861 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2071, 2207bis [tome VIII] , 2536) .

L'amitié avec Lobe durera, par contre, encore bien des années, bien que ce qui reste de leur correspondance est assez modeste (pour la suite voir Correspondance Générale, n° 1655, et au tome VIII, les numéros 1598bis, 1663bis, 1751bis et 2707bis) . Lobe quitte Weimar pour Leipzig, en 1846, où il devient rédacteur de son propre journal (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1444) . Berlioz l'y reverra plus tard et, en avril 1863, il sont toujours en rapport : Berlioz l'invite à venir entendre « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 2707bis) .

1852-1856

Pendant bien des années, Weimar disparaît de l'horizon de Berlioz, malgré l'accueil bienveillant qu'il y a reçu. C'est grâce à Liszt qu'il est invité à revenir des années plus tard et, cette fois, Weimar va jouer un rôle de tout 1er plan dans sa carrière musicale. La lettre qu'il publie en août 1843 sur sa visite à Mannheim et Weimar est en fait adressée à Liszt, mais on y trouve aucune allusion évidente aux liens que Liszt était en train de développer avec Weimar dès avant le passage de Berlioz en 1843. Liszt s'y produit en virtuose pour la 1re fois, en novembre 1841, et fait tout de suite une grande impression sur le public et sur la famille ducale. Il revient en octobre 1842, et le mois suivant (2 novembre) est nommé « Kapellmeister » extraordinaire. Le contrat précise qu'il consacra 3 mois par an à cette tâche et, au début de 1844, Liszt dirige une 1re série de concerts. Berlioz est sans aucun doute au courant de la situation : il voit Liszt à plusieurs reprises au cours de ces années, à Paris en avril 1844 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 896-898) , à Bonn en août 1845 aux cérémonies en l'honneur de Beethoven, et de nouveau à Prague en avril 1846. Les 2 hommes sont en correspondance, et dans une lettre de juin 1845, Berlioz, qui sait que Liszt cherche à développer les ressources instrumentales de l'Orchestre de Weimar, lui recommande un joueur de hautbois et de cor anglais (Correspondance Générale, n° 970 - tome VIII) .

Pendant quelques années, Liszt n'est associé à Weimar qu'à temps partiel. Mais au cours d'une tournée en Russie, en février 1847, il rencontre la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1108) qui le convainc d'abandonner la carrière de virtuose errant qu'il a poursuivi au cours des années 1840 pour s'installer avec elle à Weimar, ce qu'ils feront en 1848 (ils n'auront cependant jamais l'occasion de se marier) . Liszt va se consacrer à composer, mais il a aussi comme « Kapellmeister » permanent, remplaçant Chélard, le projet de faire de Weimar un nouveau centre de musique progressive. Berlioz est au courant de ces événements : en janvier 1849, Liszt lui adresse une lettre l'informant de ses activités à Weimar et d'une prochaine exécution du « Tannhäuser » de Wagner (Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis - tome VIII) . Effectivement, l'effort de Liszt va se porter tout d'abord sur

Wagner, dont il vient de découvrir la musique et qu'il va soutenir de multiples façons pendant des années à venir : « Tannhäuser » en 1849 sera suivi de la première de « Lohengrin » en août 1850. Mais, outre Wagner, Liszt a également l'intention de se faire tout autant le champion de la musique de Berlioz, son ami de longue date : leur 1^{re} rencontre remonte à 1830 et à la première de « la Symphonie fantastique » (« Mémoires » : Chapitre 31 ; Correspondance Générale, n° 190) et, depuis cette date, ils restent en contact malgré leurs voyages et obligations. Liszt s'efforce sans cesse d'appuyer son ami : ainsi, en janvier 1839, il publie dans la « Revue et Gazette musicale » un article à la louange de « Benvenuto Cellini », peu après la première malheureuse de l'œuvre à l'Opéra (Correspondance Générale, n° 622) . Et, cependant, il ne semble-t-il pas être venu à l'esprit de Berlioz que Liszt aurait pu tirer parti de sa nouvelle situation pour appuyer son ami, et c'est pour Berlioz une surprise totale quand, en août 1851, il apprend que Liszt a l'intention de monter « Benvenuto Cellini » à Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 1426) .

« Benvenuto Cellini »

La chute de « Benvenuto Cellini » à l'Opéra, en septembre 1838, est pour Berlioz un des plus graves échecs de sa carrière ; l'œuvre ne sera jamais représentée à nouveau à Paris du vivant du compositeur. Mais, au cours des années suivantes, Berlioz peut tout de même sauver par la publication une partie de la musique. La grande partition de l'Ouverture, souvent exécutée par Berlioz au concert à Paris et à l'étranger, est publiée par Schlesinger en 1839, ainsi que 9 airs de l'Opéra avec accompagnement de piano (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1690) . En 1841, Berlioz arrange la 1^{re} version de l'air de Teresa au 1^{er} acte pour en faire « Rêverie » et le caprice pour violon et orchestre et, en 1843-1844, il adapte la musique de 2 scènes de l'Opéra pour en tirer l'Ouverture du « Carnaval romain » . Ces 2 morceaux figurent souvent dans ses tournées à l'étranger, et la 2^e version de l'air de Teresa est chantée plusieurs fois séparément aux concerts de son voyage en Allemagne de 1843 et ultérieurement. Mais pour l'œuvre dans son ensemble, Berlioz n'envisage visiblement pas d'avenir en France ou ailleurs et, pendant des années, elle sera mise de côté. Il est frappant de constater à ce sujet que quand Berlioz est nommé chef d'orchestre au théâtre de « Drury Lane » à Londres, en 1847, et est chargé de fournir un Opéra pour la saison à venir, il ne lui vient pas à l'esprit de reprendre « Benvenuto Cellini » mais pense plutôt à adapter « la Damnation de Faust » à cette intention.

Berlioz accepte avec reconnaissance l'offre de Liszt et se met tout de suite au travail pour restaurer la partition (toujours inédite) avant de l'envoyer à Liszt ; il s'agit aussi de rétablir plusieurs coupures faites à l'Opéra, en 1838 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1426, 1430) . Dans cette forme, et dans une traduction allemande dûe à August Ferdinand Riccius, l'Opéra est monté avec succès à Weimar 3 fois : les 20, 24 et 27 mars 1852. Berlioz, absent à Londres et dans l'incapacité d'assister aux représentations, est tenu au courant par Liszt (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1449 et 1459) , pour lequel il déborde de reconnaissance (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1462, 1463, 1471, 1489) , et il n'oublie pas non plus de remercier la Grande-Duchesse (Correspondance Générale, n° 1464) . Mais Liszt, avec la collaboration de son élève Hans von Bülow qui publie 2 articles sur l'Opéra, en avril 1852, parvient vite à la conviction que le 2^e acte nécessite de profonds changements et, d'ailleurs, l'Opéra, dans sa version originale, dépassait « la durée d'un spectacle ordinaire » en Allemagne (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1501) . Il fait part de ses doutes à Berlioz dans une lettre (perdue) de juin 1852 ; il est en fait possible (selon David Cairns) que Liszt et Bülow auraient déjà introduit des coupures et changements dans l'ouvrage dans une 4e représentation, le 17 avril, avant même d'avoir consulté Berlioz, et avant la publication le 30 avril du 2e article de Bülow dans lequel il recommande de faire des changements à l'Opéra. Quoiqu'il en soit, Berlioz est prêt à consentir aux changements suggérés et de bouleverser le 2e acte pour ne pas sacrifier de la bonne musique ; mais il se voit obligé de faire des coupures importantes, et l'Opéra maintenant raccourci est divisé en 3 actes au lieu des 2 d'origine (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1499 et 1501) . Sous cette forme, l'Opéra est exécuté 4 fois en novembre 1852 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1520, 1532, 1533, 1537, 1542) , et encore 2 fois en février et mars 1856 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2076, 2092, 2093, 2100, 2104, 2128) , cette fois, dans une nouvelle traduction allemande due à Peter Cornelius (Correspondance Générale, n° 1690) . Elles seront les seules exécutions en Allemagne du vivant de Berlioz. Il est question de monter l'ouvrage à Dresde, en 1854 et 1855 (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1690) , mais le projet n'aboutit pas, pas plus que d'autres projets ailleurs, comme à Karlsruhe (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1542, 1548, 2351) . L'ouvrage sera repris plus tard par Hans von Bülow à Hanovre, en 1879 (« Benvenuto Cellini ») occupe une place de choix dans le cœur de Bülow, place qui remonte à son travail sur l'ouvrage à Weimar, en 1852 - et son exemple sera suivi ailleurs en Allemagne où l'Opéra s'installe de façon durable au répertoire de nombreux théâtres lyriques.

Il n'y a pas lieu de s'étendre ici sur les modifications apportées alors à l'Opéra, qui vont transformer la « version de Paris » originale dans ce qui deviendra la « version de Weimar » , ni non plus de peser le pour et le contre des différentes versions (voir par exemple les articles publiés en 1905 par Julien Tiersot dans sa série de « Berlioziana » ; NBE tome I, pages XXIV-XXXVII ; David Cairns, « Hector Berlioz » , tome II, 2002, pages 531-537 ; les articles de Hugh Macdonald, Christian Wasselin et Pierre-René Serna ; et Serna, « Berlioz de B à Z » , 2006, pages 18-32) . On pourrait avancer que la cause première des difficultés qui vont assaillir l'Opéra (et Berlioz lui-même) est que, dès le départ, Berlioz n'est pas le Maître sans partage de son œuvre, puisqu'il n'écrit pas son propre livret (ce qu'il fera plus tard pour « les Troyens » et pour « Béatrice et Bénédicte ») , sans parler des obstacles présentés par la suite par chanteurs et exécutants. On constatera que Berlioz était infiniment reconnaissant à Liszt et à la maison ducal pour avoir permis la résurrection heureuse de l'ouvrage, comme toute la correspondance du compositeur l'atteste. Il accepte avec bonne grâce les changements proposés par Liszt (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1499 et 1501) , et continue de sa propre initiative à travailler à d'autres révisions et changements jusqu'en 1856 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1538 et 1617) . Il se déclare enchanté des résultats qui, selon lui, marquent un progrès sur la version originale (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1532, 1537, 1542, 1563, 1609, 1617, 2100) , et rien dans sa correspondance ne laisse supposer, qu'en son for intérieur, il aurait voulu revenir sous une forme ou une autre à la version de 1838. Quand, dans la foulée du succès de Weimar, l'œuvre est montée au « Covent Garden » de Londres, en 1853, dans une traduction italienne, les révisions de Weimar servent de point de départ (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1563, 1568, 1581, 1589, 1609, 1617) . Berlioz décide de sanctionner la version de Weimar en la faisant publier, décision de principe prise dès l'été de 1853 et poursuivie activement par la suite (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1620, 1690, 1918) . La partition chant et piano est finalement publiée par Litolf à Brunswick, en 1856, avec le texte français et la traduction allemande de Cornelius (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1935, 2012, 2143, 2149, 2159, 2179 ; la transcription pour piano de l'Ouverture est due à Bülow - Correspondance Générale, n° 1776) ; « notre édition de Cellini » , dira Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1995) . L'ouvrage est dédié, comme il se doit, à la Grande-Duchesse Douairière de Weimar (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1918, 2012, 2013, 2029, 2191, 2199bis - tome VIII) . Berlioz aurait-il fait, par la suite, d'autres remaniements si l'occasion s'en était présentée ? On ne saurait trancher. L'échec de la représentation de Londres, de 25 juin 1853, prive le compositeur de la possibilité d'étudier l'ouvrage d'un œil critique dans une série d'exécutions sous sa propre direction (l'exécution de Londres est la seule de son ouvrage qu'il ait jamais dirigée lui-même ; se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2104) . Fin 1856 et au début de 1857, il est question de monter l'œuvre au Théâtre Lyrique à Paris « avec une partie du livret mise en prose pour le dialogue et quelques changements avantageux qu'y ont introduits les auteurs » , mais le projet tourne court (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2178, 2183, 2195, 2209 ; se reporter à NBE tome Id, Appendice 4) . Après cette date, les allusions à l'ouvrage dans la correspondance de Berlioz se font rares jusqu'en 1863 quand, en juillet, Berlioz signe un contrat avec l'éditeur Choudens à Paris ; le contrat donne pleins droits à Choudens pour la publication de la partition chant et piano ainsi que de la grande partition, dans la version de Weimar mais avec les paroles en français. La partition chant et piano paraît en 1865 avec quelques coupures dans les récitatifs (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2660, 2827-8, 2855, 2991) ; la grande partition ne sera publiée qu'en 1886.

Novembre 1852

Liszt ne se contente pas d'inviter Berlioz à entendre son « Cellini » ressuscité : il insiste en juin 1852 pour qu'il vienne diriger un concert de sa musique (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1496, 1505, 1510, 1511) . « Cette petite excursion en Allemagne a été la plus charmante que j'aie jamais faite » , dira Berlioz de la visite qu'il fait à Weimar en novembre, accompagné de Marie Recio (Correspondance Générale, n° 1542). L'accueil qu'il reçoit dépasse en chaleur tout ce qu'il a connu avant, comme sa correspondance l'atteste (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1532, 1533, 1537, 1542) . Il entend son Opéra remis sur pied, joué avec bienveillance devant un public enthousiaste (17, 21, 23 novembre) , et le succès de l'ouvrage suscite des projets de le monter ailleurs, dont il est vrai seul celui de Londres aboutira, comme il a été dit ci-dessus. Il dirige avec grand succès un concert comprenant les 4 Ires parties de « Roméo et Juliette » et les 2 Ires de « la Damnation de Faust » (20 novembre) . Il est reçu à plusieurs reprises par la famille ducale, par Liszt et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein, et par les musiciens de Weimar et des villes avoisinantes (21, 22, 23 novembre) . Le Grand-Duc le décore de l'Ordre du Faucon Blanc (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1725) . Les solennités attirent une foule de visiteurs de nombreuses villes (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1533, 1542, 1563) et les comptes-rendus de la presse allemande sont élogieux (Correspondance Générale, n° 1561) . Berlioz peut renouer contact avec de vieilles connaissances qui ont fait le voyage de Weimar pour l'occasion, tel Robert Griepenkerl de Brunswick. Particulièrement importants pour l'avenir sont les liens qu'il noue en novembre 1852 et, par la suite, avec des membres du cercle de Liszt, tel Hans von Bülow qui avait aidé à la révision de la partition de « Cellini » . Le séjour de Weimar mènera à la relance des voyages musicaux de Berlioz et à la série la plus réussie de concerts jamais donnés par lui en Allemagne, notamment à Francfort, Hanovre, Leipzig, Dresde, Bade et Weimar, où il est invité à revenir. Après son séjour de novembre, il reste en contact régulier avec Liszt sur toutes ses activités musicales, et leur correspondance ne sera jamais plus soutenue que dans la période de 1852 à 1856. En avril 1854, Berlioz espère s'arrêter en route à Weimar pour voir Liszt et le jeune Grand-Duc qui a pris la succession de son père, mort l'année précédente (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1717, 1725, 1726) , mais le voyage doit être reporté au début de mai à son retour de Dresde (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1738, 1751bis [tome VIII] , 1753, 1756) . Détail pittoresque : en quittant Paris, Berlioz a oublié d'emporter les croix reçues de feu le Grand-Duc et il est obligé de les faire venir spécialement avant sa venue (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1725, 1739, 1746) . À la fin de l'année, il reçoit une invitation en bonne et due forme de revenir à Weimar au début de 1855 pour un autre festival consacré à sa musique (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1811, 1812, 1847, 1869) .

Février 1855

Le succès de la visite à Weimar de février 1855 est sans doute encore plus décisif que celui de novembre 1852. Berlioz donne 2 concerts et on le presse de donner un 3e, ce qui s'avère impossible bien qu'il ait prolongé son séjour plus que prévu (du 11 au 27 février) . Conséquence embarrassante : il est obligé d'ajourner un concert à Gotha décidé depuis plusieurs mois. Le 1er concert, donné à la cour le 17 février dans une salle du palais ducal, comporte au programme des extraits de ses œuvres et la 1re exécution du nouveau Concerto pour piano en mi bémol de Liszt, qui joue la partie de solo (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1880, 1897, 1899, 1903) . Le second, le 21 février au théâtre, fait date, non seulement par sa longueur mais à cause du programme. Pour commencer, « l'Enfance du Christ » , choix qui s'impose à cause du succès récent de l'œuvre lors des 1res exécutions à Paris, en décembre 1854. Ensuite, « la Symphonie fantastique » , mais cette fois pas toute seule, comme dans les nombreuses exécutions dirigées par Berlioz à l'étranger à partir de 1842, mais avec sa suite et complément « le Retour à la vie » . Les 2 œuvres n'ont pas été jouées ensemble depuis mai 1835, et « le Retour à la vie » n'a pas été entendu de nouveau avant le concert de Weimar. Il est présenté maintenant pour la 1re fois dans une version mise en scène et avec les monologues de 1831 profondément remaniés (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1897, 1899, 1903) . C'est une idée très personnelle de Berlioz, et qui mérite commentaire.

La nouvelle version de l'ouvrage est sans doute conçue par Berlioz comme un hommage à Harriet Smithson, l'actrice qui, en 1827, lui avait révélé Shakespeare. La mort de Harriet moins d'un an avant, le 3 mars 1854, avait bouleversé Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1701-1702, 1704-1705, 1708 ; « Mémoires » : Chapitre 59) . Liszt, de son côté, avait été intimement mêlé à la passion de Berlioz pour Harriet et, lors de leur mariage le 3 octobre 1833, il est un de leurs témoins. À l'occasion de sa mort, il envoie une émouvante lettre de sympathie que Berlioz met en valeur en la citant à la fin du récit de la mort de Harriet dans les « Mémoires » . Les changements faits pour l'exécution du « Retour à la vie » , en 1855, accentuent l'inspiration shakespearienne qui est au cœur de l'œuvre ; les passages du monologue qui concernent Beethoven sont maintenant supprimés. Le lien avec Harriet est souligné pour un double retour de l'idée fixe de « la Symphonie fantastique » , pendant la 1re chanson (« Le pêcheur ») et tout à la fin après « la Fantaisie sur la Tempête » .

Autre explication probable pour le choix de Berlioz (elle n'exclut pas la 1re) : c'est précisément la juxtaposition inattendue de « l'Enfance du Christ » et des 2 autres œuvres qui suivent. La lettre de Berlioz à Liszt, au début de l'année (Correspondance Générale, n° 1869) , fournit une clef : il suggère en effet de faire suivre « un concert pie » par « un concert impie » . Berlioz est certes ravi du succès de sa « petite Sainteté » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1874) mais aussi plutôt irrité à l'idée qu'il aurait changé de style (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1847-1848, 1851, 1853 ; Post-Scriptum des « Mémoires ») . Il veut donc, sans doute, réaffirmer sa personnalité artistique en faisant jouer dans un même concert 2 (ou plutôt 3) œuvres d'un caractère bien différent, son Oratorio sacré et les manifestes iconoclastes de sa jeunesse. Il sent qu'il trouvera à Weimar un public bienveillant qui sera également réceptif ; sa correspondance montre que c'est le succès du « Retour à la vie » à Weimar qui fait le plus plaisir à Berlioz, et il s'étend là-dessus longuement (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1897, 1899, 1903) . Tout de suite après l'exécution de Weimar, il prépare une publication intégrale de l'ouvrage dans sa version revue, sous le titre de « Léo, ou le retour à la vie » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1907, 1916, 1918) ; la partition chant et piano paraît en décembre (Correspondance Générale, n° 2070) , et la grande partition l'année suivante (Correspondance Générale, n° 2169) .

Tout comme en novembre 1852, Berlioz est accueilli et fêté généreusement, et invité à revenir l'année suivante quand Liszt a l'intention de monter « Benvenuto Cellini » de nouveau (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1902, 1908, 1975) . La veille de son 2e concert, il est même fait membre honoraire de la « Neue Weimar Verein » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1899, 1903) , « club de jeunes artistes dits progressistes, dont je suis censé porter le Drapeau » , comme il l'explique. La réaction de la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à la nomination de Berlioz à l'Institut, l'année suivante, rend manifeste la pensée des cercles de Liszt à Weimar : la nomination « est une fête de famille pour tous les musiciens de l'avenir » (Correspondance Générale, n° 2148ter, mais se reporter au n° 2143) . On touche là l'origine d'un problème qui va compliquer les rapports de Berlioz avec Liszt dans les années à venir : Berlioz n'appartient à aucune secte, et ne veut pas être promu porte-étendard de tel ou tel mouvement ou école (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2274) .

Février-mars 1856

Pour éviter l'embarras de l'année précédente, Berlioz commence par aller à Gotha où Liszt, bien que souffrant, tient à assister au concert de Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2093 et 2094) ; ils se rendent ensuite, ensemble, à Weimar où ils arrivent le 8 février. De même qu'en 1855, Berlioz donne 2 concerts (Correspondance Générale, n° 2076) . Le 1er, le 17 février, est à la cour et comprend des extraits de la musique de Berlioz, y compris l'Ouverture du « Corsaire » que le public de Weimar ne connaît pas encore (Correspondance Générale, n° 2100) , et un Concerto de Litoff joué par le protégé de Berlioz, le jeune prodige Théodore Ritter (Litoff est, à la fois, musicien pratiquant et directeur de la maison d'édition à Brunswick qui va publier « Benvenuto Cellini » pour la 1re fois, à la fin de l'année) . Le 2e concert, au bénéfice des veuves et orphelins de musiciens, a lieu au théâtre, le 1er mars, et comporte la 1re intégrale à Weimar de « la Damnation de Faust » (on se demande comment Goethe aurait jugé l'ouvrage) . Berlioz ne dit rien de particulier sur le 1er concert et se déclare satisfait du 2e (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2104, 2128) mais, de nouveau, ses lettres insistent sur sa joie à entendre la dernière version de « Benvenuto Cellini » remanié, cette fois dans la traduction de Cornelius (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2092, 2093, 2100, 2104, 2128 ; se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2101 et 2101bis) . Il assiste à la 1re exécution le 16 février, mais non à la seconde le 16 mars. Liszt lui écrit 2 jours après cette dernière (Correspondance Générale, n° 2109, se reporter au n° 2115) - elle sera, en fait, la dernière de l'ouvrage du vivant de Berlioz.

Pendant son séjour, Berlioz a aussi l'occasion d'entendre pour la 1re fois à Weimar la musique de Wagner : Liszt dirige 2 exécutions de « Lohengrin » , la 1re le 18 février ou peu après, et la 2e le 24, mais elle seront l'occasion d'une altercation publique et du 1er désaccord ouvert entre les 2 amis. La vérité des faits n'est pas claire, et le rôle de Berlioz dans la controverse n'est connu que de seconde main. Il n'y fait qu'une brève allusion dans une lettre 4 mois plus tard (Correspondance Générale, n° 2128) , et il semble vouloir réduire la portée de l'événement ; une lettre antérieure à sa sœur Adèle brille par son mutisme sur l'affaire mais laisse aussi percevoir une certaine réserve à l'égard de Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2104) . Liszt, de son côté, prend l'affaire très au sérieux, comme on peut le voir d'après sa correspondance et, à tort ou à raison, il trouve le comportement de Berlioz peu bienveillant et suspect d'envie (Correspondance Générale V : page 272, note 2 ; et page 304, notes 1 et 2) . Les faits connus se réduisent à assez peu. Berlioz et Marie Recio sortent de la 1re représentation de « Lohengrin » pendant le 2e acte ; à la seconde représentation, ils restent jusqu'au bout. Selon un récit dans un journal de Dresde, repris à Paris par « La France musicale » , le 20 avril, il y aurait eu à un moment donné une altercation en public au sujet de la musique de Wagner, entre d'une part Litoff et Berlioz, et de l'autre Liszt. Au cours des mois suivants, Berlioz et Liszt vont cependant continuer à correspondre comme si de rien n'était (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2109, 2115, 2149, 2178) , mais leurs lettres n'ont plus la même chaleur spontanée ni la franchise ouverte des années passées.

Après 1856

Comme lors des visites précédentes, le Grand-Duc insiste auprès de Berlioz pour qu'il revienne le plus tôt possible (Correspondance Générale, n° 2104) , mais bien des années vont s'écouler avant que cela soit possible. En août 1858, Berlioz ne peut accepter une invitation de la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein de rendre visite à Weimar après son concert à Bade (Correspondance Générale, n° 2317) , et il faudra attendre avril 1863 pour qu'il reprenne le chemin de Weimar.

Liszt et la princesse

Entre-temps, la position de Liszt à Weimar s'affaiblit et finit par s'écrouler complètement. Malgré le soutien de la famille ducale, Liszt a toujours été contesté sur place et plus largement parmi certains cercles conservateurs de l'Allemagne musicale (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2093) . Par exemple, le violoniste Joachim, nommé 1er violon de l'Orchestre de Weimar, en 1850, quitte son poste en 1852 pour rejoindre l'Orchestre de Hanovre ; par la suite, il prendra parti pour Brahms dans la réaction contre Liszt et Wagner. Le soutien de Liszt pour Wagner, exilé de l'Allemagne pendant toutes les années 1850 pour des raisons politiques, et ses relations avec la princesse, sont autant de griefs contre lui (la correspondance de Berlioz est très discrète sur ces questions) . La crise éclate en plein jour en 1858, lors de la première de l'Opéra de Cornelius « Le Barbier de Bagdad » (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2521) dirigée au théâtre le 15 décembre par Liszt : face à une manifestation publique hostile, Liszt en colère donne immédiatement sa démission comme chef d'orchestre du théâtre. La princesse quitte finalement Weimar pour Rome en 1860, où Liszt la rejoint l'année suivante.

Berlioz et Liszt ne cesseront jamais d'être amis ; ils restent en rapport, même indirectement, et se rendent service quand l'occasion s'en présente. Mais, au cours des 10 années à venir, ils s'éloignent insensiblement l'un de l'autre, épreuve sans doute également pénible pour tous les 2. En 1830, la musique les réunit et va cimenter leur amitié pendant 25 ans, pour leur bien mutuel ; mais maintenant, la musique les sépare de plus en plus. Au cœur de leur désaccord est « la musique de l'avenir » ou, en d'autres termes, l'admiration sans bornes vouée par Liszt à Wagner et que Berlioz ne peut partager. Pour Berlioz, « la musique de l'avenir » va devenir « l'école du charivari » . Une lettre de Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand, datée du 29 octobre 1864, montre la distance qui sépare désormais les 2 hommes : «

Liszt est venu passer 8 jours à Paris, nous avons dîné ensemble 2 fois, et toute conversation musicale ayant été prudemment écartée, nous avons passé quelques heures charmantes. Il est reparti pour Rome, où il joue de “ la musique de l’avenir ” devant le pape qui se demande ce que cela veut dire. » (Correspondance Générale, n° 2920) . Mais Liszt, de son côté, ne cessera jamais de défendre la musique de Berlioz.

Mais le relâchement progressif des liens avec Liszt aura sa contre-partie. Le résultat le plus important du séjour de 1856 est la décision de Berlioz d’entreprendre, enfin et après bien des résistances, la composition d’un grand Opéra d’après « l’Énéide » de Virgile qui le hante dès son enfance et de plus en plus au début des années 1850 (« Mémoires » : Chapitre 59) . Il a déjà évoqué son projet durant sa visite de 1855 (Correspondance Générale, n° 1903, P.S.) . À cette occasion, il résiste encore aux pressions exercées sans doute par Liszt et surtout par la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein. Mais, en 1856, il cède, et c’est la princesse qui a gain de cause. La correspondance de Berlioz avec elle remonte déjà à plusieurs années (la lettre la plus ancienne, Correspondance Générale, n° 1463, date de 1852) mais, à partir de mai 1856, elle va s’épanouir de façon remarquable. Au départ, c’est le travail sur « les Troyens » qui est le fil conducteur de leur échanges. Berlioz ne cessera de reconnaître le rôle décisif joué par la princesse en le poussant à entreprendre l’ouvrage, et c’est elle qui partagera la dédicace avec Virgile (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2264, 2293, 2799, 2814 ; « Mémoires » : Postface) . Mais leur correspondance s’étend bien au delà : malgré leurs différences de points de vue (sur les questions religieuses, par exemple) , la princesse lui accorde le droit de s’exprimer librement avec elle, et Berlioz ne se fait pas prier. Avec des interruptions (tel le départ pour Rome) , leur correspondance durera jusqu’en 1867, et comblera en parti le fossé avec Liszt (la correspondance avec Liszt ne va pas au delà de 1864) . Liszt est ainsi au courant de la genèse et du sort des « Troyens » et s’intéresse au nouvel ouvrage, de même que pour la dernière œuvre d’envergure de Berlioz, « Béatrice et Bénédict » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2632, 2634, 2651) .

Amis de Weimar

Au cours de ses visites à Weimar, dans les années 1850, Berlioz rencontre de nombreux membres du cercle de Liszt, et ses lettres à Liszt évoquent plusieurs fois ce groupe d’amis (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1538, 1848, 1927, 1959, 2056) . Parmi eux, seuls quelques-uns formeront des liens plus approfondis et durables avec Berlioz. Ainsi, le compositeur Joseph Joachim Raff (1822-1882) est mentionné plusieurs fois comme ami dans plusieurs lettres, de 1854 à 1856 (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1899) , mais il n’y a pas de trace d’une correspondance entre lui et Berlioz, et son nom disparaît des lettres de Berlioz après cette date. 3 noms cependant retiennent l’attention.

On a évoqué ailleurs en détail les rapports entre Berlioz et Hans von Bülow (1830-1894) : les réactions de Bülow envers Berlioz sont le reflet de celles de son Maître et beau-père Liszt - Bülow ne cessera d’admirer Berlioz et de prôner sa musique, mais le rejet de Wagner par Berlioz le blesse.

Un cas différent est celui de Peter Cornelius (1824-1874) , traducteur de « Benvenuto Cellini » pour les représentations de 1856 à Weimar, ainsi que de « l’Enfance du Christ » , « le Retour à la vie » et « La Captive » , tous également joués à Weimar (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1690, 1869, 1880) . Sa correspondance avec Berlioz commence en 1853 et se poursuit jusqu’en 1866. Personnage particulièrement sympathique, Cornelius réussit la gageure d'être admirateur à la fois de Berlioz et de Wagner et de garder l'amitié des 2. C'est lui qui, dans un article à la louange de Berlioz publié à Berlin (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1690), lance l'expression « les 3 B », qui signifie pour lui : Bach, Beethoven et Berlioz (déformé plus tard par Hans von Bülow pour devenir Bach, Beethoven et Brahms). Il reconnaît ouvertement la dette de son Opéra « Le Barbier de Bagdad » envers « Benvenuto Cellini » (Correspondance Générale, n° 2521) et reste très lié avec Berlioz jusqu'à la fin (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2521, 2522, 2594, 2599, 2605, 2843, 3191). Berlioz est très touché quand, en décembre 1866, Cornelius insiste pour venir de Munich à Vienne, dans les plus brefs délais, pour le voir et loger au même hôtel. Berlioz tient en haute estime son travail de traducteur et exprimera dans son testament le souhait que Cornelius fasse une traduction allemande des « Troyens » - souhait qui cependant ne sera pas réalisé.

Moins prisé comme traducteur par Berlioz, mais non moins dévoué à sa cause, est le critique musical et écrivain Richard Pohl (1826-1896). On citera aussi, en même temps, sa femme Joanna (1824-1870) ; de 1854 à 1864, elle est harpiste dans l'Orchestre de Weimar (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2509). Berlioz avoue avoir un faible pour cet instrument (par exemple, Correspondance Générale, numéros 1568 et 2297), et le jeu de Madame Pohl remporte évidemment son suffrage : il le loue à plusieurs reprises (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1811 et 1869) et s'estime toujours heureux de pouvoir faire appel à Madame Pohl pour ses concerts en dehors de Weimar, comme à Leipzig, en décembre 1853 (Correspondance Générale, n° 1654) ; Gotha, en février 1856 ; Bade, en 1858 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2289) ; et Löwenberg, en avril 1863 (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2722).

C'est à Bade, en 1853, que Richard Pohl rencontre Berlioz pour la 1^{re} fois (il ne s'installe à Weimar que l'année suivante). La 1^{re} lettre à avoir survécu date de 1855 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2089) mais leur correspondance a commencé, en fait, plus tôt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1704) et va se poursuivre jusqu'en 1864 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2355, 2571, 2670, 2678, 2691). Pohl défend la musique de Berlioz dans ses travaux critiques, et ambitionne aussi d'être son traducteur. Dès 1855, Berlioz envisage une édition allemande de ses « Mémoires » à venir, et le nom de Pohl lui vient à l'esprit, mais avec hésitation (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1965, 1975, 1995), tandis que Pohl lui-même s'offre pour faire le travail (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2074, 2355). Pour finir, il n'y aura pas de traduction allemande des « Mémoires » par Pohl. Mais, en 1859, Berlioz suggère à Pohl de traduire « les Grottesques de la musique » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2355, 2479) et, en 1862, Pohl offre de faire également « À Travers chants » (Correspondance Générale, n° 2663), puis une édition complète en allemand des écrits de Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2678). 4 tomes paraîtront finalement en 1864, comprenant en outre : « les Soirées de l'orchestre » et « le Traité d'instrumentation ».

C'est également à Richard Pohl que revient l'honneur d'avoir indirectement frayé le chemin pour « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Weimar : journaliste et écrivain, il est souvent en visite à Bade (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2678, en 1853 ; 2163, en 1856 ; 2297 et 2317, en 1858 ; 2355 et 2393, en 1859), et il finira par s'y installer vers la fin de 1863 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2797). Il est le seul journaliste allemand à assister aux représentations de « Béatrice et Bénédict », en août 1862 (Correspondance Générale VI : page 325, note 1 ; et numéros 2632, 2663) et, de retour à Weimar, il suggère de monter l'œuvre au théâtre dans une traduction allemande dont il serait responsable. À Weimar, les avis sont semble-t-il d'abord partagés ; Dingelstedt, le directeur du théâtre, est peu enthousiaste, et les conditions proposées au départ à Berlioz le mettent en fureur (Correspondance Générale, n° 2670) . D'où intervention de Pohl et de la Grande-Duchesse : Dingelstedt est mis au pas et tout s'arrange rapidement (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2678, 2692) . Berlioz revient ainsi à Weimar pour la 1re fois depuis 1856, mais les circonstances ont bien changé : Liszt et la princesse ne sont plus là, et les néo-Weimariens se sont dispersés. 2 exécutions de l'Opéra, maintenant augmenté de 2 morceaux supplémentaires, ont lieu le 8 et 10 avril 1863 : grand succès, et la correspondance de Berlioz donne un récit très détaillé de l'événement (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2708, 2709, 2710, 2711, 2712, 2713, 2715) . 2 autres exécutions auront lieu après le départ de Berlioz, le 29 mai (Correspondance Générale, n° 2725) et le 13 novembre (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2771 et 2797) .

Berlioz a, sans doute, des réserves sur le travail de son traducteur (Correspondance Générale, n° 2712) mais, pendant les mois qui suivent, ses rapports avec Pohl et sa femme harpiste n'auront jamais été plus cordiaux. Les Pohl accompagnent Berlioz dans son excursion à Löwenberg, puis Berlioz insiste pour faire inviter Pohl à Strasbourg, en juin, pour l'exécution de « l'Enfance du Christ » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2738-2739) , et Pohl assiste de nouveau aux représentations de « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Bade, en août (Correspondance Générale, n° 2757) . Mais, de manière surprenante, leur correspondance prend fin subitement l'année suivante, et une série de lettres de Berlioz à Pohl reste sans réponse (Correspondance Générale, n° 2913) . En l'occurrence, Pohl n'a pas tourné le dos à Berlioz et, 20 ans après, en 1884, il publiera un recueil bienveillant d'études et de souvenirs sur Berlioz (se reporter à la lettre de Liszt de 1883 ; on trouvera des extraits du livre de Pohl [« Hector Berlioz : Studien und Erinnerungen »] dans Michaël Rose, « Berlioz Remembered » , 2001, pages 131-132, 148, 245, 248-249, 251) .

La famille ducale

« L'accueil que me fait toujours cette charmante famille ducale est si gracieux et si cordial malgré l'étiquette ! » , s'écrie Berlioz au début de 1856 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2076) . À l'époque de sa 1re visite de 1843, le Grand-Duc et la Grande-Duchesse lui sont certes bienveillants (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 793) , mais ne semblent pas l'avoir rencontré en personne et se contentent d'envoyer leurs chambellans pour lui présenter leurs compliments ; Berlioz, néanmoins, quitte Weimar avec le sentiment que « la famille ducale sait honorer les arts » (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 826) . Mais, à partir de la visite de novembre 1852, et d'une génération ducale à la suivante, il se sentira toujours le bienvenu à la cour : tous les souverains s'intéressent à sa musique et lui prodiguent un appui constant, comme la correspondance du compositeur le démontre abondamment (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1533, 1537, 1542, en 1852 ; 1811 et 1869, en 1854 ; 1869, 1899, 1903, en 1855 ; 2076, 2104, en 1856) . La Grande-Duchesse Douairière soutient particulièrement la reprise de « Benvenuto Cellini » et, comme il se doit, l'ouvrage lui sera dédié (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1464, 2013, 2029, 2191, 2195) . Dans ses « Mémoires » , Berlioz distingue 3 souverains allemands qui se passionnent pour la musique ; le (jeune) Grand-Duc de Weimar est l'un d'eux et lui adresse une invitation ouverte à Weimar, en 1856 ; et c'est à l'influence de la (jeune) Grande-Duchesse que Berlioz attribue la décision de monter « Béatrice et Bénédict » , en avril 1863.

À l'occasion de la visite de Berlioz, en 1863, le Grand-Duc et la Grande-Duchesse le comblent à nouveau de gracieusetés, comme les écrits du compositeur en témoignent : de ce point de vue, il n'y a aucune solution de continuité dans les traditions de Weimar, malgré le départ de Liszt et de la princesse. Le Grand-Duc va même plus loin : il s'enquiert des « Troyens », demande à Berlioz de lire le poème de l'Opéra à la cour devant un auditoire de choix, et intervient auprès de sa cousine la Duchesse de Hamilton pour essayer de pousser Napoléon III à faire monter l'ouvrage à l'Opéra dans sa totalité (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2713, 2715, 2722, 2724, 2728) . Quand, en novembre 1863, « les Troyens à Carthage » sont finalement montés au Théâtre Lyrique, il fait parvenir ses félicitations au compositeur (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2798 et 2805) . L'année suivante, Berlioz lui écrit une longue lettre d'adieu pour le remercier de son appui et l'informer du destin de l'Opéra et de sa situation personnelle (Correspondance Générale, n° 2857) .

Après 1863 le Grand-Duc continue à s'intéresser à Berlioz et reste en rapport avec lui (Correspondance Générale, n° 3217) et, de temps en temps, on joue Berlioz à Weimar. Un projet d'exécuter, au début de 1864, le duo de Cassandre et Chorèbe n'aboutit pas (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2810, 2811, 2820) , mais on exécute « Harold en Italie » , le 2 février ; « Sur les lagunes » , le 16 (Correspondance Générale VII : page 19, note I ; se reporter au n° 2840) ; et « la Symphonie fantastique » , en janvier 1867 (Correspondance Générale, n° 3217) . Bien des années plus tard, une souscription est lancée à Paris, en 1883, pour l'érection d'un monument en l'honneur de Berlioz : Liszt attire là-dessus l'attention du Grand-Duc dans une lettre où il évoque les rapports de Berlioz avec Weimar et son propre rôle dans la propagation de la musique de son ami. Liszt, le Grand-Duc et la Grande-Duchesse ajoutent leurs propres contributions à la souscription, mais quand le monument est finalement inauguré à Paris, en 1886, la presse parisienne passera semble-t-il le fait sous silence.

Chronologie

1837

19 mars : Exécution de l'Ouverture des « Francs-Juges » à Weimar.

9 mai : Lettre ouverte à la louange de Berlioz par Johann Christian Lobe dans la « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » à Leipzig.

1842

Décembre : Berlioz écrit à Johann Christian Lobe au début de son 1er voyage en Allemagne.

1843

Vers le 18 janvier : Berlioz arrive à Weimar.

25 janvier : Concert de Berlioz au théâtre.

28 janvier : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Weimar pour Leipzig.

28 août : Publication dans « le Journal des Débats » de la 3^e lettre du « Voyage musical en Allemagne », adressée à Liszt.

1851

août : Liszt offre à Berlioz de monter « Benvenuto Cellini » à Weimar.

1852

20, 24 et 27 mars : 3 lres exécutions de « Benvenuto Cellini » à Weimar, sous la direction de Liszt ; Berlioz est absent à Londres.

17 avril : 4^e exécution de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

Fin juin : Liszt propose à Berlioz des modifications à « Benvenuto Cellini » .

2-4 juillet : Berlioz répond aux propositions de Liszt.

12 novembre : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Paris pour Weimar par le train du soir (Correspondance Générale, n° 1529) .

14 novembre : Arrivée à Weimar, le matin (Correspondance Générale, n° 1529) .

17 novembre : Exécution de « Benvenuto Cellini » sous la direction de Liszt.

20 novembre : Concert au théâtre dirigé par Berlioz.

21 novembre : Berlioz dîne à la cour à l'invitation de la Grande-Duchesse Maria Pavlovna ; le soir, exécution de « Cellini » .

22 novembre : Banquet et bal en l'honneur de Berlioz, qui est décoré par le Grand-Duc ; soirée de gala à l'Hôtel-de-ville.

23 novembre : Exécution de « Cellini » ; réception à l'Altenburg.

24 novembre : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Weimar.

25 novembre : Arrivée à Paris ; exécution de « Cellini » .

30 novembre : Exécution de « Cellini » .

1853

25 juin : Unique représentation de « Benvenuto Cellini » à « Covent Garden » .

8 juillet : Mort du Grand-Duc Charles Frédéric.

1854

4 mars : Mort de Harriet Smithson.

Avril : Un arrêt prévu à Weimar ne se réalise pas.

3 mai : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Dresde pour Weimar.

3-6 mai : Arrêt à Weimar.

7 mai : Arrivée à Paris.

Novembre : Berlioz est invité par le Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre à revenir à Weimar.

1855

8 février : Berlioz et Marie Recio partent pour Weimar.

9 février : Arrêt à Bruxelles.

11 février : Arrivée à Weimar.

2e moitié de février : Portrait de Berlioz à Weimar par Richard Lauchert.

17 février : 1er concert de Berlioz, à la cour de Weimar ; réception à la cour par les Grandes-Duchesses.

18 février : Réception à l'Altenburg pour l'anniversaire de la Princesse Marie von Sayn-Wittgenstein ; Berlioz improvise la « Valse chantée par le vent » sur l'album de la princesse.

20 février : Berlioz est élu membre honoraire du « Neue Weimar Verein » .

21 février : 2e concert de Berlioz, au théâtre.

26 février : Réception en honneur de Berlioz au « Musée de Gœthe » .

27 février : Départ pour Gotha.

2 mars : Retour à Paris.

27 mars et 3 juin : Publication d'un article de Cornelius sur « Hector Berlioz à Weimar » dans la « Revue et Gazette musicale » .

1856

6 février : Concert à Gotha, en présence de Liszt.

7 février : Liszt accompagne Berlioz et Marie Recio dans leur voyage à Weimar.

8 février : Arrivée à Weimar.

11 février : Berlioz est invité à rendre visite à la Grande-Duchesse (Correspondance Générale, n° 2097) .

16 février : Liszt dirige une version révisée de « Cellini » .

17 février : 1er concert dirigé par Berlioz, au palais ducal.

Vers le 18 février : Liszt dirige une exécution de « Lohengrin » ; Berlioz et Marie Recio sortent pendant le 2e acte.

24 février : 2e exécution de « Lohengrin » sous la direction de Liszt, en présence de Berlioz et Marie Recio.

1er mars : 2e concert dirigé par Berlioz, au théâtre.

2 mars : Départ de Weimar.

3 mars : Arrivée à Paris.

16 mars : 2e (et dernière) exécution de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

Début décembre : Publication de la partition chant et piano de « Benvenuto Cellini » par Litolff, à Brunswick.

1858

Août-septembre : Berlioz ne peut faire le voyage de Weimar après son concert à Bade.

1859

23 juin : Mort de la Grande-Duchesse Maria Pavlovna, dédicataire de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

1862

8 août : Richard Pohl assiste à la 1^{re} représentation de « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Bade.

1863

Janvier : Berlioz accepte de faire monter « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Weimar.

30 mars : Départ pour Weimar.

6 avril : Berlioz assiste à une représentation de « Tannhäuser » de Wagner.

8 avril : 1^{re} représentation de « Béatrice et Bénédict » au théâtre, dirigée par Berlioz ; banquet après la représentation.

10 avril : 2^e représentation de « Béatrice et Bénédict » dirigée par Berlioz, qui dîne après avec le Grand-Duc.

12 avril : Berlioz lit le poème des « Troyens » au Grand-Duc.

14 avril : Berlioz part pour Löwenberg.

29 mai : 3^e représentation de « Béatrice et Bénédict » .

13 novembre : 4^e représentation de « Béatrice et Bénédict » .

Novembre : Le Grand-Duc félicite Berlioz sur les représentations des « Troyens à Carthage » , à Paris.

1864

Janvier : Un projet d'exécution du duo entre Cassandre et Chorèbe à Weimar n'aboutit pas.

2 février : Exécution d' « Harold en Italie » au théâtre de Weimar.

16 février : Madame Milde chante à Weimar la version avec orchestre de « Sur les lagunes » .

12 mai : Dernière lettre connue de Berlioz au Grand-Duc.

1867

Janvier : Exécution de « la Symphonie fantastique » au théâtre de Weimar.

1883

Mars : Le Grand-Duc, la Grande-Duchesse de Weimar et Liszt souscrivent au monument pour Berlioz à Paris.

Choix de lettres de Berlioz et autres correspondants

1842

À Johann Christian Lobe à Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 792 - tome VIII : 24 décembre, de Stuttgart) :

« Peut-on avoir à Weimar une bande respectable d'instruments à cordes ? Car il me faut des violons et des basses et des altos comme s'il en pleuvait ; je ne marche pas sans eux, ils sont ma force et ma vie ; quand on me les ôte, je demeure comme Samson après que sa femelle Dalilah lui eût coupé les cheveux. Que peut rapporter de métal un concert heureux à Weimar ? Combien peut-on avoir de répétitions ? Dites-moi tout cela en allemand, on me traduira votre lettre en langue humaine. Quelle honte pour moi de ne pas savoir un mot de Germain !

Mais soyez tranquille, nous nous comprendrons bien. Mon ancien ami Chélarde me donnera bien, j'espère, sa main pour m'aider à franchir les obstacles que naturellement je trouverai chez vous ... n'est-ce pas ?

Je tiens surtout à vous faire entendre mes Symphonies que vous ne connaissez pas ; c'est-à-dire les Symphonies sans chœurs, car pour " Roméo et Juliette " et " la Symphonie funèbre ", je n'y songe pas, c'est un attirail infernal ; il faut des chanteurs ... des chanteurs et des chanteuses, n'est-ce pas pis que 500 diables ?

Oh, que je serai ravi de vous serrer la main et de connaître quelques-uns de vos ouvrages qui me sont encore tout à fait étrangers ! Vous ne pouvez imaginer quelle joie, quel rajeunissement je ressentirai de trouver une âme d'artiste, non blasée, forte, ardente et hardie comme on me dit qu'est la vôtre.

Je me suis persuadé qu'il n'y avait rien de pareil en vous et je me fais une véritable fête de notre rencontre.

Tenez-moi pour un de vos plus anciens et solides amis. »

Johann Christian Lobe à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 793 ; 29 décembre, de Weimar) :

« Vous comprenez comme je suis ravi de votre lettre, qui m'apporte l'espoir de l'accomplissement d'un de mes désirs les plus ardentes, de celui, de voir vous et de serrer ta main comme ami et frère artiste ! Oui, Monsieur Berlioz, qui a dit à vous que j'eusse une âme artiste, il n'a pas dit un mensonge, vous le trouverez si nous nous rencontrons dans cette vie. J'étais votre ami depuis le moment, que j'ai ouï l'Ouverture des " Francs-Juges ", et je le serais jusqu'à la fin de ma vie.

Outre cela, vous avez bien écrit quelques mots à Monsieur Chélarde ? Entre nous, il n'a pas beaucoup d'influence sur les affaires musicales chez nous, mais si peu d'hommes peuvent être utiles à leur prochain, tous les hommes peuvent être nuisibles à leur prochain.

Madame la Grande-Duchesse aime la musique, elle a ouï votre Ouverture aux " Francs-Juges ", elle a lu ma lettre à vous dans la " Gazette musicale ", et elle possède elle-même la partition de votre Ouverture, par notre directeur de Musique, Goëtz. Si vous pouviez recevoir une lettre de la Cour de Stuttgart à la nôtre, il serait bon.

J'aurais pu trouver beaucoup de personnes à Weimar qui m'auront traduit une lettre d'allemand en français, ou corrigé cette lettre-là. Mais, j'ai mes raisons que personne n'en sait un mot avant votre concert : Si, par exemple, Monsieur Chélarde savait, que vous m'aviez écrit, et pas d'abord à lui, il se trouvera peut-être blessé, son amitié pour vous pourrait aller au diable, et c'est au moins à ce spectre que vous croyez un peu.

Oui, Monsieur, il y a un diable, et surtout dans le monde musicale ! Il se nomme, envie ! Vous le connaissez bien, n'est-ce pas ? Vous le trouverez aussi en Allemagne. Gardez-vous !

J'étais, je suis, et je serai toujours un de vos plus solides amis. »

(Note : Le texte de Lobe n'a pas été corrigé.)

1843

À Karol Lipinski, à Dresde (Correspondance Générale, n° 807 ; 27 janvier, de Weimar) :

« Le concert que j'ai donné ici a été très brillant et très heureux, les habitants de Weimar ont accueilli ma musique, comme l'auteur, avec une rare bienveillance. »

À Jean-Baptiste Chélarde (Correspondance Générale, n° 826 ; 3 avril, de Berlin) :

« Monsieur Parish Alvars qui vous remettra cette lettre se fera certainement entendre à Weimar; je vous donne ma parole d'honneur que c'est le Harpiste le plus prodigieux qui ait jamais existé; c'est un phénomène. Sans aucun doute le Grand-Duc et la Grande-Duchesse auront le plus vif plaisir à l'entendre. Je n'ai donc pas besoin de vous prier de faire pour lui ce que vous avez si gracieusement fait pour moi; les choses s'arrangeront d'elles-mêmes. »

Jean-Baptiste Chélaré à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 864 ; 15 novembre, de Weimar) :

« Lors de votre court séjour ici, vous me faites le reproche d'avoir négligé mes anciens amis de Paris au nombre desquels vous vous êtes compté si cordialement, et vous me faites entrevoir l'agréable perspective d'une correspondance avec vous. Le reproche de négligence, je viens le décliner et en rejeter toutes les fausses apparences par la complication des chances que le parti que j'avais pris m'avait faites ; et, quant à la correspondance, vous avez pris, dans vos lettres du feuilleton des " Débats sur Weimar et Leipzig ", l'initiative avec tant de vraie bienveillance à mon égard, tant de mesure et de délicatesse, que ce serait bien mal à moi de ne pas y apporter au moins le tribut de ma gratitude. Me voici donc et je me reproche presque de n'être pas venu plus tôt. Vous dire quel bien m'a fait la vue de mon pauvre nom dans une feuille française, et ce nom presque toujours oublié ou persiflé par la presse parisienne, de le voir dans un de ses principaux organes si simplement mais si dignement réintégré, vous dire, donc, l'émotion que j'ai ressentie, ce serait aussi puéril qu'inutile. Merci, merci, cher Berlioz : ces nobles mouvements d'un bon cœur valent bien la bonne musique et la bonne critique, sans leur faire tort. Vos articles font sensation. J'attends Liszt bien impatiemment pour causer de tout cela avec lui et, malheureusement, il ne se presse guère. Que tout cela reste entre nous. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 796, 798bis et ter (tome VIII) , 799, 801, 803-804, 806, 806bis (tome VIII) , 810, 815-817, 831, 848.

1851

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1426 ; 6 août, Paris) :

« J'arrive de Londres. Belloni [l'agent de Liszt] m'apprend que tu as le projet de monter " Benvenuto " à Weimar. Je te remercie mille fois d'y avoir songé. Ce sera pour moi un grand plaisir de voir ce pauvre ouvrage renaître, ou plutôt naître sous ta direction. Je viens de mettre la partition entre les mains de mon copiste qui la répare et y fait quelques changements que je crois nécessaires. Tout sera prêt dans quelques jours et Belloni t'enverra le paquet. N'oublie pas de m'informer de son arrivée, car je n'ai pas d'autre copie de cet ouvrage. Puis, quand le copiste de Weimar n'en aura plus besoin, retire-le de la circulation du théâtre ; je sais ce que les manuscrits deviennent dans ces bagarres.

Je t'enverrai en même temps un livret imprimé conforme à la partition, et indispensable au traducteur. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1430 ; 29 août, de Paris) :

« Je crains qu'il ne te manque à Weimar quelques instruments à vent. Il faudrait donc que tu eusses la complaisance d'arranger certains passages.

Ainsi, j'ai employé 4 Bassons ; quand ils forment des accords à découvert, remplace le 1er et le second par 2 clarinettes si elles n'ont rien d'important à faire au même instant.

J'ai mis aussi une clarinette Basse dans le Septuor et dans l'Ouverture. Si l'on ne peut en avoir une, il vaut mieux presque partout faire jouer sa partie par une clarinette ordinaire in B.

Avez-vous deux Harpes ? 2 cornets à Pistons ? Ceux-ci peuvent être remplacés par 2 Ventil-Trompettes, en la bas et en si bémol bas. Quant aux 3 Timbales, on en supprimera une et il est aisé de trouver une 2e timbalier tel quel pour les endroits où il y a 2 roulements simultanés sur les 2 caisses.

Je ne te dis rien des chanteurs, je ne connais pas le personnel de Weimar ni la manière dont le chœur est maintenant composé. Seulement, il est plus que probable que tu auras à faire des actes de volonté pour obtenir l'exécution réelle de beaucoup de morceaux dont les difficultés rythmiques doivent être enlevées avec verve et non abordées avec hésitation et en tâtonnant. C'est presque une éducation à faire.

Maintenant, quelque enfantine que ma joie puisse te paraître, je ne la dissimulerai pas avec toi. Oui, je suis très heureux de voir cet ouvrage présenté à un public sans préventions et présenté par toi. Je viens de l'examiner sérieusement après 13 ans d'oubli, et je jure que je ne retrouverai jamais cette verve et cette impétuosité Cellinienne, ni une telle variété d'idées. Mais l'exécution n'en est que plus difficile, les gens de théâtre, les chanteurs surtout, sont si déshérités de l'humour ! Au reste, je compte sur toi et sur ta flamme pour Pygmalioniser toutes ces statues. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 1428bis.

1852

À Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 1449 ; 10 février, de Paris) :

« Je suis, au fond, assez vexé de ne pas aller entendre “ Benvenuto ”. Liszt me dit que cela va à merveille, voilà 4 mois qu'on y travaille. J'avais bien nettoyé, reficelé, restauré la partition avant de l'envoyer. Je ne l'avais pas regardée depuis 13 ans ; c'est diablement vivace, je ne trouverai jamais une telle averse de jeunes idées. Quels ravages ces porcs de l'Opéra m'avaient fait faire là-dedans ! J'ai tout remis en ordre. »

Liszt à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 1459 ; 21 mars, de Weimar) :

« Honneur aux ciseleurs ! Gloire aux belles choses et place pour elles ! “ Benvenuto Cellini ”, représenté hier, restera debout et de toute sa hauteur. C'est sans “ puff ” qu'on peut informer de son succès Londres et Paris. Je remercie bien sincèrement Berlioz du noble plaisir que m'a procuré l'étude attentive de son “ Cellini ”, qui est une des œuvres les plus puissantes que je sache. C'est, à la fois, de la ciselure splendide et de la statuaire vivante et originale. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1462 ; 29 mars, de Londres) :

« Mon bon, cher, admirable ami,

Je suis bien moins joyeux, crois-moi, de ce que tu m'annonces, et de l'heureux résultat de tes efforts, que de tes efforts mêmes et de la nouvelle preuve qu'ils me donnent de ton amitié pour moi. Je t'embrasse donc de tout mon cœur, en te disant : Merci ! sans phrases.

P.S. : Ne manque pas d'adresser de ma part aux artistes du théâtre de Weimar des paroles de reconnaissance pour le zèle et le talent qu'ils ont mis à te seconder, en y ajoutant des excuses sur les difficultés que présente ma partition et qui ont dû si souvent mettre leur patience à l'épreuve. Dis-leur qu'en exécutant comme ils l'ont fait cette musique capricieuse et emportée, ils ont donné la plus grande preuve de valeur musicale qu'il soit possible de demander à des artistes aujourd'hui, et que je les crois capables de tout. »

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 1463 ; 29 mars, de Londres) :

« La conduite de Liszt, dans cette occasion, conduite si originalement belle, fait l'admiration de tous les esprits élevés et de tous les cœurs artistes, amis ou ennemis. Les méchants imbéciles en cherchent le motif qu'ils ne comprendront jamais. »

À la Grande-Duchesse de Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 1464 ; 29 mars, de Londres) :

« Permettez-moi de mettre aux pieds de votre Altesse l'expression de ma reconnaissance pour la bonté avec laquelle vous avez daigné accueillir le projet de faire représenter mon Opéra à Weimar. Le constant appui, la haute protection que vous avez ensuite accordé à l'éminent artiste qui en dirigeait les études, ont pu seuls amener à un résultat favorable une entreprise difficile, et qui devait d'ailleurs attirer sur elle une sorte de blâme. Ce témoignage d'estime donné par votre Altesse à une œuvre vaincue dès sa Ire bataille et qu'on avait laissée parmi les morts, cette confiance en sa force vitale, ne pouvaient manquer de la ranimer, si une étincelle de vie lui restait encore. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1471 ; 12 avril, de Londres) :

« Les détails que tu me donnes m'ont beaucoup intéressé, je dirai même étonné. Comment as-tu fait pour avoir tout le bataillon instrumental contenu dans ma partition ? Tu as donc le pouvoir de Moïse, et ton bâton, en frappant les murailles du théâtre, peut donc faire sortir des flots d'instrumentistes, comme sa baguette tirait de l'eau des rochers. »

À Dieudonné Denne-Baron (Correspondance Générale, n° 1489 ; 26 mai, de Londres) :

« Veuillez aussi mentionner [dans un article biographique sur Berlioz] , la belle conduite de Liszt qui vient de monter à Weimar avec un grand succès mon Opéra de " Benvenuto " tombé avec éclat à Paris, en 1838. Liszt a proposé cette mise en scène de mon ouvrage et l'a dirigée malgré toutes les oppositions que les souvenirs de la chute devaient naturellement faire naître. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1499 ; 2 juillet, de Paris) :

« Je te dirai au sujet de tes observations sur “ Benvenuto ” qu’elles sont parfaitement justes, et que tout la partie que tu proposes de supprimer, m’a toujours paru glaciale et insupportable. Mais personne ne m’avait encore mis sur la voie du moyen tout simple qui en permet la suppression ; c’est toi qui l’as trouvé. Il ne s’agit en effet que de ne pas faire sortir le Cardinal après la scène de la statue et de courir au dénouement. Seulement, j’ai trouvé le moyen de conserver et le chœur des ouvriers (“ Bienheureux les matelots ”) qui commencerait le dernier acte en donnant les soli à Francesco et à Bernardino, l’air d’Ascanio (avec un changement de paroles) et l’air de Cellini “ sur les monts ”. Ces 3 morceaux malgré le peu d’élévation du style du second doivent je crois être conservés.

Il résulte de ton idée et de la mienne que l’Opéra sera maintenant en 3 actes, que la décoration du 3e acte étant celle du dernier tableau celle du 3e tableau sera supprimée. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1501 ; 3 ou 4 juillet, de Paris) :

« L’Opéra ainsi réduit, surtout si l’on ne conserve pas la Stretta à 6/8 du sextuor, ne doit pas dépasser la durée d’un spectacle ordinaire d’Allemagne. D’autant plus sûrement qu’il n’y aura plus maintenant que 2 changements de décors à faire. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1520 ; 10 octobre, de Paris) :

« La “ Gazette musicale ” a annoncé l’autre jour que j’allais en Allemagne pour diriger en personne une représentation de “ Benvenuto ”; je ne suis pour rien, comme tu le penses, dans cette nouvelle inexacte que Brandus aura trouvée dans quelque feuille allemande mal informée.

“ Benvenuto ” est entre bonnes mains, et je suis même extrêmement curieux de voir jusqu’où va la synonymie de nos 2 manières de sentir les mouvements dans une œuvre de cette espèce. »

À Auguste Barbier (Correspondance Générale, n° 1532 ; 19 novembre, de Weimar) :

« Je profite d’un quart d’heure de liberté que me laissent nos répétitions pour vous dire que la 1re représentation de “ Benvenuto ” a eu lieu avant-hier avec un succès pyramidal, sous la direction de Liszt. On m’a forcé de comparoir après le dernier acte et acclamé d’une façon fort confortable.

Vraiment, parole d’honneur, tel qu’il est maintenant, “ Benvenuto ” est un gentil garçon. Le grand final du “ Carnaval ”, “ le Serment des Ciseleurs ”, les airs d’Ascanio et de Teresa, et la prière à 2 voix avec les litanies, et surtout la scène du Cardinal ont produit un effet assez rare. Nous avons 2 femmes de talent, un très bon Fieramosca et un Cellini convenable pour les scènes énergiques. Néanmoins, il dit assez bien la Romance ; quant à l’air “ Sur les monts ”, il n’a jamais osé le chanter. La mise en scène est excellente, “ la Pantomime d’Arlequin et Pierrot ” très bien exécutée. En somme, c’est charmant.

Vous dire ce que j'ai éprouvé de triste joie, en établissant une comparaison entre cette exécution bienveillante et la sale cabale que nous avons subie à l'Opéra, me serait difficile. J'en avais le cœur serré. Je vous quitte pour aller à la dernière répétition du concert que je donne demain, et dans lequel figurent " Roméo et Juliette " en entier et les 2 lers actes de " Faust ". J'ai 100 choristes et un bon orchestre. Tous les hôtels de Weimar sont pleins d'amateurs de musique venus de Hanovre, de Brunswick, d'Iéna, d'Eisenach, et de Leipzig pour assister à ce concert et à la 2e représentation de " Cellini " qui aura lieu après-demain Dimanche. »

À Joseph-Esprit Duchesne (Correspondance Générale, n° 1533 ; 21 novembre, de Weimar) :

« Grandissime succès ! Après " Benvenuto ", j'ai été rappelé par toute la salle et prié par l'Intendant de paraître pour que le public consentît à sortir. Après le concert d'hier que je dirigeais, la frénésie a été bien autre encore. La Grande Duchesse m'a fait appeler dans sa loge et l'Intendant m'a remis de sa part, aussitôt après la décoration du " Faucon blanc ". J'ai dîné à la Cour avant hier et les princesses m'ont comblé de gracieusetés. Le vieux Duc est dans une jubilation curieuse. Ce soir, seconde représentation de " Benvenuto " sous la direction de Liszt qui a été, dans cette circonstance, d'une admirable chaleur d'âme. Demain, Grand dîner qui m'est offert par tous les artistes du théâtre, chœurs, orchestre, chanteurs, comédiens, réunis à une foule d'amateurs et d'artistes, de Weimar, d'Iéna, de Brunswick, de Hanovre et de Leipzig et d'Eisenach, accourus pour ces 3 fêtes musicales.

Nous avons donné hier soir, sous ma direction au concert, " Roméo et Juliette " en entier et les 2 lers actes de " Faust ". J'avais un grand chœur, tous les amateurs hommes et dames de la ville s'étant réunis, pour la 1re fois, aux artistes à cette occasion. Le serment final a été splendide, il y a eu bis, rappels, couronnes, tout le tremblement.

Pourrez-vous faire un peu parler les journaux de votre connaissance ? Si vous le pouvez, n'y manquez pas. »

À sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 1537 ; 27 ou 29 novembre, de Paris) :

« J'arrive de Weimar ; je ne puis que t'embrasser et de te prier de lire le paragraphe du " Journal des Débats ", ce matin. Monsieur Bertin a fait faire cela par un de nos confrères d'après une lettre que je lui avais écrite ; tu y verras ce qui cause ma joie.

Il me faudrait des longues pages pour te donner tous les détails de ces fêtes de Weimar, et te répéter les charmantes choses que m'ont adressées le Grand Duc, la Grande Duchesse, et surtout les princesses de Prusse. Pourtant, j'ai éprouvé un bien violent serrement de cœur le 1er jour, en remarquant le contraste que cet enthousiasme du public et des artistes faisait avec les sales et odieuses cabales dont cet Opéra fut l'objet, il y a 13 ans, à Paris. Je l'avais presque oublié ; je l'ai entendu du fond d'une loge avec le sang-froid d'un simple auditeur et, à part quelques petites modifications de détail que j'y ai faites, j'ai trouvé la partition jeune et fraîche ; certainement, je ne ferai jamais rien en ce genre de plus vif et de plus coloré. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1538 ; 30 novembre, de Paris) :

« J'ai trouvé, en revenant, une assez bonne modification à apporter au dénouement de " Cellini ", je la ferai dès que la partition me sera revenue. J'ai profité aussi de ton observation pour le petit mesquin allo fugué en mi majeur, qui interrompt le Sextuor ; cela est du plus petit style d'Opéra-Comique, et je le supprime. Ce sont les paroles qui m'avaient amené à l'écrire ; on peut parfaitement les faire disparaître, elles ne tiennent en rien à l'action.

Je vais limer cette scène dont plusieurs détails ne me satisfont pas.

Bonjour à Joachim, à Cosman, à Monsieur Bülow, à Monsieur Mar, à tous nos excellents amis. »

À Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 1542 ; 19 décembre, de Paris) :

« J'aurais de longues pages à barbouiller pour vous donner tous les détails des affaires de Weimar et de Londres et de Paris. Je vous dirai seulement que cette petite excursion en Allemagne a été la plus charmante que j'aie jamais faite dans ce pays-là. Ils m'ont comblé, gâté, embrassé, grisé (dans le sens moral) . Tout cet orchestre, tous ces chanteurs, acteurs, comédiens, tragédiens, directeurs, Intendant, réunis au dîner de l'Hôtel-de-ville la nuit de mon départ, représentaient un ordre d'idées et de sentiments qu'on ne soupçonne pas en France. J'ai fini par pleurer comme 2 douzaines de veaux, en songeant à ce que ce même " Benvenuto " m'a valu de chagrins à Paris. Cet excellent Liszt a été adorable de bonté, d'abnégation, de zèle, de dévouement. La famille ducale m'a comblé de toutes façons. Les jeunes princesses de Prusse ont été d'une grâce ravissante, elles ont eu des mots, surtout sur " Roméo et Juliette " que nous avons exécuté en entier avec un chœur superbe de 120 voix. Puis, le bouillant Griepenkerl, qui était venu de Brunswick et qui a oublié le peu de français qu'ils savait, m'a dit, après la Ire représentation de " Benvenuto ", en m'embrassant avec fureur : " E pur si muove ", mon cher ! " E pur si muove " !!!

J'ai retouché quelques petites choses dans la partition et arrangé le livret de manière à ce qu'il marche bien maintenant. On s'occupe de le traduire en Italien pour Londres.

Mille amitiés à Lecourt. Oh, comme il aurait ri, bu et blagué à Weimar s'il y fut venu ! Nous avons du monde de tous les environs, de Leipzig, de Iéna, de Brunswick, de Hanovre, d'Erfurth, d'Eisenach, de Dresde même, et jusqu'à Chorley qui était venu de Londres. Celui-la aime " Benvenuto " et ne comprend rien à " Roméo " !! Qu'y faire ? »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1444-1445, 1448, 1451, 1453-1454, 1456, 1465, 1471, 1496, 1505, 1510-1511, 1514, 1524, 1525, 1528-1529, 1535, 1543, 1546, 1548-1549.

1853

À Carl Friedrich, Grand-Duc de Saxe-Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 1552bis - tome VIII ; 2 janvier, de Paris) :

« Permettez-moi de vous présenter un volume que je viens de publier [" Les Soirées de l'orchestre "], dans lequel des questions importantes pour la musique sont traitées sous différentes formes. Le vif intérêt que prend votre altesse à tout ce qui se rattache aux arts, me fait espérer qu'elle voudra bien parcourir ce livre.

C'est un bien faible témoignage de ma reconnaissance pour les bontés dont vous, Monseigneur, et Madame la grande Duchesse, m'avez comblé. »

À Karl Franz Brendel (Correspondance Générale, n° 1561 ; 5 février, de Paris) :

« Vous avez écrit des pages pleines de bienveillance au sujet de mon dernier voyage à Weimar et des ouvrages que j'y ai fait entendre. L'opinion d'un critique éclairé et consciencieux tel que vous ne peut qu'exercer une puissante influence pour le redressement d'idées au moins fort étranges que certaines gens se font de moi et de mes ouvrages. Les occasions telles que celles de Weimar, et les grands artistes tels que Liszt, me manquent pour combattre moi-même ces idées dans les parties de l'Allemagne où elles dominent. »

À Charles Gruneisen (Correspondance Générale, n° 1563 ; 8 février, de Paris) :

« Ma grande ambition, mon vif désir serait maintenant de pouvoir faire représenter " Benvenuto Cellini " à l'un des théâtres Italiens de Londres, cette saison. Je crois au succès. Il y a un feu du diable dans cette partition ; et, dans l'état où je viens de la mettre, il me semble qu'elle est digne d'être soumise à un public attentif et impartial.

Le voyage de Weimar a été une fête pour moi, et une fête indescriptible, tant la chaleur d'âme de tous les artistes et de Liszt et la grâce de la famille Ducale m'ont ému et charmé. Il nous était venu beaucoup de monde des villes voisines et j'ai bien souvent regretté qu'il ne vous ait pas été possible de venir aussi. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1568 ; 23 février, de Paris) :

« Le voyage de Weimar a eu, pour moi, un résultat d'autant plus heureux qu'il a renoué et rendu plus fréquentes nos relations épistolaires. C'est une véritable joie quand, en rentrant de mes boueuses ou coûteuses excursions dans Paris, je trouve sur ma table une enveloppe sillonnée par les éclairs de ta plume ; tes zigzags me consolent des lettres carrées et trop lisibles auxquelles, pour mon malheur, je suis obligé de répondre si souvent.

Je vois, cher ami, que tu gardes à mon sujet des illusions qui te sont agréables. Lors même que " Benvenuto " serait représenté avec le plus inespéré succès à Londres, il ne le serait pas pour cela à Paris. Et le fût-il même avec succès à Paris, pas un éditeur ne se risquerait à en publier la grande partition. Ta demande du manuscrit me touche beaucoup et je comprends le prix que tu y attaches. Cet ouvrage t'est cher comme le deviennent les convalescents au médecin qui les a sauvés d'une maladie mortelle. Je serai donc bien heureux de te le conserver. En tout cas, si " Faust " est publié le 1er, ce manuscrit-là aussi te revient de droit. »

À Frederick Gye (Correspondance Générale, n° 1581 ; 6 avril, de Paris) :

« Il faut pour que cette partition produise tout son effet la monter avec verve, sans peur et sans hésitations, et arriver ainsi à une exécution brillante des mêmes qualités, à une exécution, pour ainsi dire insolente de brio.

Alors je crois que le public nous suivra. »

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 1589 ; 23 avril, de Paris) :

« Le directeur de “ Covent Garden ” n’est qu’un plagiaire dans cette circonstance ; c’est Liszt qui a été comme toujours un fameux original. L’idée de ressusciter “ Benvenuto ” ne pouvait, certes, venir qu’à lui. »

À Gemmy Brandus (Correspondance Générale, n° 1609 ; 27 juin, de Londres) :

« P.S. : ENTRE NOUS, je suis sûr qu’un avenir sérieux est réservé à cette partition (en Allemagne et, plus tard, en France) , je suis presque fâché de l’avoir faite, à cause de l’impossibilité où je me trouve de l’analyser. Je ferais là-dessus un curieux article. Quelle que soit sa fortune présente et les mauvaises chances que lui fait courir le livret, à mon avis, c’est une musique nouvelle et d’une vitalité indomptable. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1617 ; 10 juillet, de Paris) :

« L’ouvrage a gagné beaucoup à cette épreuve [sa chute à “ Covent Garden ”] , plusieurs détails de la partition ont été améliorés, de petites coupures heureusement pratiquées, et des effets de mise en scène ajoutés. Je serai obligé de te renvoyer les 2 derniers actes pour que ton lent copiste puisse mettre en ordre tous ces changements.

Ainsi, il faut ajouter maintenant sur le titre de la partition : tombée pour la seconde fois le 25 juin, etc. Un des journaux anglais, en parlant des dernières représentations de “ Benvenuto ” à Weimar, dit qu’elles ont eu lieu sous la direction de l’intrépide Liszt. Eh bien, que cette nouvelle défaite de ton protégé n’ôte rien à ton intrépidité ; je t’assure que le “ Cellini ” est plus digne que jamais de ta protection et, tôt ou tard, je l’espère, il fera honneur à son patron. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1552-1554, 1556, 1562, 1567, 1572, 1574, 1603, 1619, 1620, 1637, 1657, 1662, 1664, 1669.

1854

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1690 ; 15 janvier, de Paris) :

« Je ne puis te dire combien ta sollicitude pour mon malheureux Opéra me touche et me pénètre d’admiration. Tu es un homme à part. Je le sais depuis longtemps, mais ces monstruosité là sont si rares, qu’il est presque permis de s’en étonner. Oui, certes, je te donne carte blanche pour aviser au destin de “ Cellini ” et j’abonde dans ton sens pour accorder la préférence à Dresde. Je suis aussi de ton avis qu’il faut commencer par le publier en Allemagne, si l’on peut.

Et il ne saurait y avoir d'obstacles de la part de Brandus. Les morceaux détachés de cette partition qui lui appartiennent, n'ayant pas été publiés en Allemagne depuis qu'il les a mis en vente en France, sont, en conséquence, tombés dans le domaine public à l'étranger et je n'ai jamais fait avec lui ni avec son prédécesseur Schlesinger de traité quelconque pour l'ensemble de la grande ni de la petite partition. On a publié ainsi sans difficultés " la Cavatine de Teresa ", à Vienne. Ces morceaux sont à tout le monde, le reste n'est qu'à moi.

Remercie mille et mille fois Monsieur Cornelius de vouloir bien se charger avec toi de la révision du texte allemand et de sa traduction de " La Fuite " et de son charmant et spirituel article de la " Gazette musicale " de Berlin. Il me comble ; tu communique tes mauvaises qualités à tout ce qui t'entoure. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1725 ; 4 avril, de Brunswick) :

« Veux-tu avoir la bonté de prévenir le maître d'hôtel du Prince héréditaire qu'on lui enverra à mon adresse une petite boîte, et qu'il la reçoive. Ce sont mes croix que j'avais oubliées à Paris. Il ne me serait guère convenable de me présenter au Grand Duc sans porter l'Ordre que m'a donné son père. »

À sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 1756 ; 10 mai, de Paris) :

« Je t'ai écrit vers le 29 ou le 30 en te donnant des détails sur mes bonheurs de Dresde et t'annonçant que j'allais à Weimar faire une visite à Liszt et au jeune grand Duc.

Les artistes de Dresde sont venus en corps me conduire au chemin de fer, et ceux de Weimar qui savaient que j'arrivais sont venus m'y attendre et m'y reconduire à 1 heure du matin. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1811 ; 14 novembre, de Paris) :

« Je serai enchanté d'aller à Weimar avant la fin de l'hiver, en revenant de Gotha, où le Duc m'a fait invité à venir, par Griepenkerl.

Je te félicite d'avoir obtenu l'engagement de Madame Pohl ; voilà au moins l'Orchestre de Weimar au grand complet. Je te prie de me rappeler au souvenir de l'aimable Harpiste et à celui de son mari ; je serai bien joyeux de les retrouver l'un et l'autre. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1696, 1704, 1706, 1711, 1717, 1726, 1738, 1739, 1746, 1748, 1751bis (tome VIII) , 1753, 1756bis (tome VIII) , 1762, 1764, 1773, 1776-1777, 1785-1787, 1796, 1799, 1812, 1847, 1848.

1855

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1869 ; 1er janvier, de Paris) :

« J'accepte avec grand plaisir l'invitation que tu me transmets de la part de Monsieur le Grand Duc, remercie son altesse de ma part.

J'ai bien une proposition pour 3 concerts à Bruxelles en février, mais je ne suis pas fou des Belges et j'aime beaucoup mieux (comme dit la chanson) moins d'argent et passer de bonnes heures avec toi et nos amis de Weimar.

Maintenant, pour le programme du concert de la cour mon avis est d'y donner " l'Enfance du Christ ". Il n'y a point là d'effets très violents, les trompettes et cornets n'y sont point employés, il n'y a même que 2 cors. D'ailleurs, le sujet plaira aux âmes religieuses du Grand Duc et des Grandes Duchesses. Nous trouverons bien au théâtre une Vierge Marie telle quelle, quand le diable y serait. Madame Pohl étant à Weimar (ce dont je remercie le bon Dieu bien souvent) , notre trio d'Ismaélites ira à merveille, en faisant travailler un peu les 2 flûtes avec la Harpe.

Veux-tu faire un coup de tête ? Après un concert pie, veux-tu faire un concert impie (*) ? Nous donnerons alors au théâtre " la Fantastique " suivie du " Mélologue ", " le Retour à la vie " (beaucoup modifié) . Génast réciterait le rôle de l'artiste ; les chœurs sont faciles à apprendre et je crois que Monsieur Cornelius, en 8 jours et même moins, pourrait traduire le texte parlé et chanté. Ce serait assez curieux, et sans dangers à Weimar où l'on ne blague pas trop. Il faudrait jouer le " Mélologue " avec costume et mise en scène ; mais, c'est aisé !

(*) C'est une façon de parler, il n'y a rien d'impie dans le " Mélologue " ; c'est seulement très violemment passionné. Faisons cela ! »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1880 ; 10 janvier, de Paris) :

« Voilà qui est convenu. Pour le programme de la cour, il y aura :

1) " La Fête de Roméo ".

2) " La Scène des Sylphes de Faust ", avec solos de Faust et de Méphisto.

3) Le Trio avec chœur des " Ciseleurs de Benvenuto ".

4) " La Captive " par Madame Knopp, avec orchestre.

Puis, ce que tu voudras pour compléter le programme si cela ne suffit pas.

Je vais dire à Richaut de t'envoyer " la Captive " pour que Cornelius ait le temps de la traduire.

Tu me parles de ré-entendre ce morceau mais tu ne l'as jamais entendu, il n'a été exécuté que 3 fois : à Londres, par Madame Viardot ; au Festival de Versailles, par Madame Widemann ; et dernièrement ici, par Madame Stolz qui le redira au concert du 28.

Je crois que c'est une des choses les plus colorées que j'ai écrites et je serai ravi de te la faire connaître. C'est assez difficile pour la cantatrice et il faut qu'elle s'entende parfaitement avec le conducteur, sans quoi - rien.

Adieu, mille amitiés, je me fais une fête des 10 ou 12 jours que je vais passer près de toi. »

À Adolphe Samuel (Correspondance Générale, n° 1897; 20 février, de Weimar):

« Je suis abîmé, exterminé de fatigue. J'ai dirigé le concert de la cour samedi dernier ; il y avait dans le programme :

1) Fragment de " Roméo et Juliette ".

2) " La Captive ".

3) Un Concerto de Liszt.

4) " La Scène des Sylphes de Faust. "

5) Et le grand trio avec chœur de " Benvenuto Cellini ".

À l'exception du magnifique Concerto de Liszt, vous voyez que tout le reste m'appartenait. L'exécution a été admirable.

Demain, je donne au théâtre un immense programme :

" L'Enfance du Christ " et " la Symphonie fantastique " (suivie de sa conclusion) , " Le Retour à la vie ", " Monodrame lyrique " avec chœurs, chant et monologues. Ce dernier ouvrage sera exécuté pour la 1re fois dramatiquement (sur l'avant-scène, devant la toile baissée) , l'orchestre et les chanteurs étant sur le théâtre, et invisibles par conséquent. On me dit que j'ai pour le rôle de " l'Artiste " un bon acteur, Monsieur Granz. Quant aux chanteurs, j'en suis très content. Ce sont Messieurs Caspari et Milde. Je vais faire la répétition générale tout à l'heure. Il nous est arrivé hier, de Gotha et d'Erfurt, quelques artistes de renfort. »

À son oncle Félix Marmion (Correspondance Générale, n° 1899 ; 25 février, de Weimar) :

« J'ai été invité à venir ici, par Madame la grande Duchesse Douairière, sœur de l'Empereur de Russie, pour organiser un concert composé presque exclusivement de ma musique et le diriger à la cour, le 17 de ce mois, jour de la fête de S.A.I. Liszt, pour me faire fête aussi, y a joué, par extraordinaire, un Concerto de piano avec orchestre de sa composition. 4 jours après, j'ai donné une autre grandissime soirée musicale au théâtre, où figuraient avec " l'Enfance du Christ ", ma " Symphonie fantastique " et un " Monodrame lyrique " dont les paroles et la musique sont de ma façon, intitulé " le Retour à la vie ". Ceci n'avait jamais encore été exécuté dramatiquement. Il a fallu un peu bouleverser le théâtre pour le rendre exécutable, c'est-à-dire agrandir l'avant-scène, l'orchestre, le chœur et les chanteurs devant être placés derrière la toile baissée, et invisibles par conséquent, pendant que le personnage du “ Monodrame ” parle et agit sur le “ proscenium ”. Il me serait difficile de vous donner une idée du succès de cette soirée. J’ai été acclamé, redemandé, applaudi comme un ténor à la mode. Les Duchesses m’ont fait venir dans leur loge, suant et haletant comme je l’étais, pour me complimenter avec une chaleur de Dilettanti pur-sang. Puis, les jeunes gens de Weimar m’ont donné un souper où les “ toast ” ont fait rage. L’un d’eux, qui ne parle pas assez bien le français, ayant égard à ma profonde ignorance de la langue allemande m’a fait un beau discours Latin, et le poète Hoffmann a improvisé une chanson également Latine, qui, mise en musique immédiatement par un jeune compositeur [Raff] , a été chantée en chœur à lre vue par les convives.

En voici les paroles :

“ Nostrum desiderium
Tandem implevisti ;
Nobis venit gaudium
Quia tu venisti.

Sicut coloribus
Pingit nobis pictor,
Pictor es eximius
Harmoniae victor.

Vivas, crescas, floreas
Hospes germanorum,
Et amicus maneat
Neo-Wimarorum. ”

(Tu as enfin exaucé notre désir ; ta venue nous a apporté la joie.
Tout comme le peintre peint avec des couleurs, tu es un peintre hors pair, vainqueur de l’harmonie.
Puisses-tu vivre, croître et prospérer, l’hôte des Allemands, et puisses-tu rester l’ami des néo-Weimariens.)

Les néo-Weimariens, dont il est ici question, forment un club de jeunes artistes, dits progressistes, dont je suis censé porter le drapeau.

La cour me comble, je viens de dîner chez la Duchesse Régente, et c’est pour la 5e fois. On voulait me faire donner un 3e concert, mais le jour où cela eût été possible est un peu trop éloigné ; je dois revenir à Paris pour des engagements plus importants et retourner ensuite à Bruxelles où je suis retenu pour 3 concerts au théâtre du Cirque. La jeune Duchesse m’a invité à rester au moins jusqu’à Lundi. On donnera ce soir-là, en mon honneur, une fête dans cette partie du musée qu’on nomme “ les Salons de Goethe ”, et qui seront illuminés à Giornò par extraordinaire. Vous voyez qu’on fait tout pour me donner une grotesque vanité ; j’espère pourtant en rester exempt. J’éprouve seulement le regret, au milieu de toutes ces manifestations, de ne pouvoir vous en rendre témoin et vous convaincre que décidément votre élève vous fait quelque honneur. Plaisanterie à part, j'ai souvent en pareil cas, et dernièrement à Paris, aux 3 exécutions de mon Oratorio, éprouvé un sentiment très vif de tristesse en me trouvant seul de la famille, en face d'un succès exceptionnel dont il vous eut été sans doute si agréable de voir l'explosion en France. »

À Fiorentino (Correspondance Générale, n° 1903 ; 28 février, de Gotha) :

« L'exécution a été excellente, les chanteurs étaient : Melles Wolf et Génast, Messieurs Milde, Knopp et Caspari. Ce dernier a une voix de ténor dont on donnerait diablement d'argent à Paris s'il savait le français et s'il savait ... chanter. Milde, au contraire, a du talent, en outre, une très belle voix de Baryton grave. La musique produit un effet tout spécial dans cette splendide salle du palais Ducal, qui rappelle par son architecture et son ornementation la salle de l'Assemblée des nobles à Saint-Pétersbourg. Toutes les harmonies semblent lumineuses au milieu de cette lumineuse atmosphère, et le retentissement pompeux mais non excessif de ces hauts-plafonds donne un caractère merveilleux à certains morceaux tels que " La Fête de Roméo et Juliette " et " le Chœur des Ciseleurs " de " Cellini ".

Liszt a été stupéfiant de verve et de puissance, comme toujours.

3 jours après [4, le 21 février] , en faisant 2 répétitions par jour, et avec le concours de l'Académie de chant de Weimar (formant un personnel de 80 chanteurs et chanteuses) réunie aux choristes (artistes) , je suis parvenu à donner au théâtre un concert en 3 parties :

1) " L'Enfance du Christ " (accueillie comme à Paris) .

2) " La Symphonie fantastique ".

3) " Le Retour à la vie ", " Monodrame Lyrique ".

Ce dernier ouvrage, dont j'ai fait les paroles et la musique, était exécuté en scène pour la 1re fois. On avait établi un plancher au-dessus de l'emplacement ordinairement occupé par l'orchestre et sur cette scène avancée, devant la toile baissée, l'acteur (Granz) jouait le " Monodrame ". Derrière la toile, les chœurs, les chanteurs, les pianistes, l'orchestre et moi, sur un assez vaste amphithéâtre, nous exécutions invisibles, les morceaux de musique amenés par les monologues de l'acteur et dont la sonorité un peu affaiblie par l'interposition de la toile prenait le caractère de mystérieuse poésie exigée par le sujet. Cette musique étant censée imaginaire et entendue en pensée seulement par " l'Artiste ", personnage unique du Drame. Ce sont : 1) " Le Pêcheur ", ballade de Gœthe, pour ténor et piano, Liszt jouait le piano, entremêlée d'apparitions de " l'Idée fixe " de " la Symphonie fantastique " dont ce " Monodrame " n'est que la conclusion. 2) Un Chœur d'ombres avec orchestre (Liszt jouait le tam-tam) . 3) Chanson et chœur des Brigands. 4) " Hymne du bonheur " pour ténor et orchestre. 5) Un morceau d'orchestre intitulé : " La Harpe éolienne. Souvenirs. " 6) Enfin, " Grande Fantaisie " avec chœurs, orchestre et piano à 4 mains, sur " la Tempête " de Shakespeare avec la toile levée, au dénouement du " Monodrame ". Cette dernière est censée l'œuvre esquissée de " l'Artiste " qui sortant de son avant théâtre, va dans la salle d'études de ses nombreux élèves leur en confier l'exécution. La toile se lève alors, on voit sur leur estrade tous les exécutants, c'est de la musique réelle, " l'Artiste " la fait répéter, et donne à ses interprètes des conseils critiques, comme fait Hamlet dans la scène des comédiens. Après ce vaste final, il les remercie, les complimente et les congédie. La toile se baisse de nouveau ; demeuré seul, il entend encore retentir (en musique imaginaire) le thème de “ la Fantastique ”, “ l’Idée fixe ”, son type musical de la femme aimée, il s’écrie en sortant : “ Encore, encore ! (et sur le dernier murmure de l’orchestre invisible) Encore ... et pour toujours. ”

Voilà, mon cher Fiorentino, ce que c’est que ce “ Monodrame ” que je n’oserais jamais faire représenter devant notre public hâbleur de Paris.

Le succès a été pyramidal, j’ai été rappelé mainte et mainte fois, complimenté par les Grandes Duchesses dans leur loge, etc. , etc. , mais j’étais presque mort de fatigue et (le dirai-je) d’émotion. Le morceau des “ Souvenirs ” où la “ Harpe éolienne ” est imitée par l’orchestre avec une grande fidélité, m’avait brisé le cœur. C’est là un genre d’impressions tristes dont vous concevriez la désastreuse puissance sur moi, si vous entendiez cet ouvrage. J’ai écrit cela en 1831, en Italie, pendant un voyage que je fis à pied de Gênes à Rome, et l’ai remanié ensuite à Paris.

Le lendemain, les jeunes gens lettrés et artistes de Weimar m’ont donné un souper dans lequel l’un d’eux m’a adressé un discours latin, terminé par une “ Chanson latine ” qui, mise en musique immédiatement par l’un des convives, et copiée sur 30 et quelques bouts de papier, a été chantée en chœur à l’oreille (voilà des musiciens !). Avec ce refrain :

“ Vivas, crescas, floreas
Hospes Germanorum
Et amicus maneat
Neo Wimarorum ! ”

Je suis parti hier, les néo-Weimarois m’attendaient à l’embarcadère du chemin de fer et, au moment où le convoi s’est mis en marche, ils ont lancé une pluie de bouquets dans mon wagon en criant : “ Elien ! Elien ! ” (cri hongrois qui remplace le “ Vivat ”). À présent, plaignez-vous de mon silence ! »

À la Grande-Duchesse Maria Pavlovna de Saxe-Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 2013 ; 10 septembre, de Paris) :

« Mon “ Benvenuto Cellini ”, assassiné en France il y a plusieurs années, a repris quelque étincelle de vie, grâce aux soins d’un illustre Docteur, votre Maître de chapelle à Weimar. Un éditeur allemand s’est trouvé qui veut bien lui faire prendre le grand air de la publicité, et j’ose prier V.A.I. de continuer votre patronage au convalescent en agréant la dédicace de cette œuvre. »

À sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 2029 ; 30 septembre, de Paris) :

« J’avais écrit une lettre presque familière à La Grande Duchesse douairière de Saxe Weimar, la tante de l’Empereur de Russie actuel, pour la prier d’accepter la dédicace de mon Opéra “ Benvenuto Cellini ” qui se publie en Allemagne. Il paraît que ma lettre a fait grand plaisir à la bonne vieille Duchesse ; elle m’a fait répondre en conséquence, et

Liszt croit qu'on me ménage quelque gracieuseté pour cet hiver à la cour de Weimar. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1871, 1882-1883, 1891-1895, 1896 (avec le tome VIII) , 1898, 1900-1902, 1905, 1907-1908, 1911, 1918, 1927, 1931, 1935, 1965, 1974, 1975, 1995, 2012, 2044, 2056, 2065, 2070, 2071-2072, 2074.

1856

À sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 2076 ; 8 janvier, de Paris) :

« Je suis attendu à Gotha le 2 février, et à Weimar le 8. Le 16, jour de la fête de la Grande Duchesse, il y aura au théâtre grande représentation de gala pour la reprise de mon Opéra “ Benvenuto Cellini ” et, 2 jours après, une exécution de mon “ Faust ” complet, dont on n'a encore entendu que les 2 Iers actes à Weimar.

Pourtant, le voyage à Weimar va me déridier ; l'accueil que me fait toujours cette charmante famille ducal, est si gracieux et si cordial malgré l'étiquette ! Et puis, Liszt et tous les artistes amis de la chapelle, et les autres amis de Brunswick et de Berlin qui viendront ! Et mes 2 grands ouvrages exécutés ! »

Ferdinand Friedland à Prague à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2092 ; 3 février) :

« Il y a quelques jours que j'ai lu dans les journaux que vous vous rendiez à Weimar où votre illustre ami Liszt fera exécuter votre Opéra “ Benvenuto Cellini ”. Dimanche passé, votre ami m'a confirmé cette nouvelle à son passage par notre ville, où j'avais le plaisir de lui parler. Vous qui me connaissez, et qui sait quel intérêt je prends à tout ce qui a rapport à vous, cette nouvelle m'a causé une grande joie, parce que je vois là-dedans que votre génie perce et percera toujours plus notre patrie, toujours si difficile envers les novateurs, et qu'enfin l'Allemagne vous rendra les justes honneurs que vous méritez. »

La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Weimar à Berlioz à Gotha (Correspondance Générale, n° 2093 ; début février) :

« Pourtant à l'heure qu'il est sa besogne, Liszt en est rendue très difficile et l'assaut qu'on lui livre est vraiment de la furie. Ni les injures, ni les mensonges ne lui sont épargnés. Le terrain que gagne tous les jours le sentiment moderne est un signe qu'il a pris à cœur de représenter dans son rayon d'activité, fait monter jusqu'au “ delirium tremens ” la rage des Classiques, c'est-à-dire des improductifs qui le baptisent de ce nom. En ce moment, c'est une averse de flèches qu'il reçoit.

Votre “ Cellini ” ira sur des roulettes ; la vanité de clocher sera en jeu, on tient à se montrer à vous sous le meilleur jour, on fera donc le possible et l'impossible, soyez-en persuadé.

N'invitez-vous pas le Duc de Gotha à venir assister à cette représentation en lui représentant combien vous serez heureux (!!!) de lui présenter “ Cellini ”. Cela pourrait le décider. Il ferait peut-être comme artiste pour l'artiste ce que, depuis plusieurs années, il n'a pas fait comme prince pour des princes, nommément de venir ici le 16. »

À Hans von Bülow (Correspondance Générale, n° 2100 ; 12 février, de Weimar) :

« Nous espérons ici une bonne exécution de “ Cellini ”, maintenant que la partition est dérouillée et fourbie à neuf comme une épée. Les chanteurs sont animés du meilleur vouloir ; Caspari, à qui on avait dit que ce rôle était inchantable et lui briserait la voix, le chante, au contraire, avec amour et sans efforts. Lui, au moins, chantera l'air “ Sur les monts ”, que j'avais regretté de ne pouvoir vous faire entendre. Hier, nous avons répété longuement l'Ouverture du “ Corsaire ” pour le prochain concert de la cour. Je vous remercie de bien vouloir arranger cette Ouverture, et si vous ne l'avez pas, je vous l'enverrai ; mais je crois qu'elle est réductible pour le piano à 2 mains, et cela vaudrait bien mieux. Lorsque 2 pianistes exécutent ensemble un morceau à 4 mains, soit sur 1 seul piano, soit sur 2 pianos, ils ne vont jamais ensemble (du moins, pour moi) et le résultat final de l'exécution est toujours (pour moi encore) plus ou moins charivarique. En outre, les arrangements à 4 mains pour 1 seul piano ont l'inconvénient d'accumuler dans le grave du clavier une masse de notes dont la sonorité est disproportionnée avec celle de la main droite du 1er pianiste, et il en résulte un pâtre harmonique plus bruyant qu'harmonieux et horriblement indigeste. Il vaut donc mieux confier aux 2 mains d'un seul pianiste intelligent la traduction d'une œuvre symphonique, quand cela est possible. L'auteur alors est au moins sûr de n'être pas tiré en sens contraire par 2 chevaux.

Pardonnez-moi ces blasphèmes sur les pianistes. Ils ne vous regardent point d'ailleurs : vous êtes musicien. »

À sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 2104 ; 3 mars, de Paris) :

« J'ai été accueilli comme de coutume en Allemagne. Mon Opéra de “ Cellini ” marche à merveille. La Cour de Weimar s'est montrée d'une bienveillance parfaite, comme toujours. J'ai dirigé le concert annuel qui a lieu au palais, à chaque fête de la grande Duchesse Douairière ; de plus, j'ai dirigé au théâtre, AVANT HIER samedi (telle est la rapidité des voyages que je puis t'écrire cela de Paris aujourd'hui, lundi) , une grande exécution de ma Légende dramatique “ La Damnation de Faust ”. Les dames et les jeunes gens amateurs de l'Académie de chant de Weimar s'étaient réunis aux choristes du théâtre ; j'avais un chœur de 150 voix, une charmante Marguerite et un excellent Méphistophélès, le Faust seul s'est montré faible et froid. Il y a eu plusieurs morceaux bissés, on m'a rappelé 3 fois, le Grand Duc m'a fait monter dans sa loge pour me complimenter et m'engager à revenir le plus tôt possible.

2 heures après, j'étais à l'embarcadère du chemin de fer où des artistes et amateurs m'attendaient et où mon départ a été salué par eux de vivats, de hurrahs, et où ils m'ont accueilli par un chœur de “ Benvenuto Cellini ” et de longs applaudissements.

À 1 heure du matin (dimanche) , le convoi se mettait en marche et, à 5 heures du matin (lundi) , j'arrivais à Paris. Liszt est toujours un excellent ami, et ses amis sont les miens. Je voudrais seulement qu'il me laissât conduire une fois mon Opéra ; mais son dévouement ne va pas jusques là. »

À Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 2128 ; 23 mai, de Paris) :

« Je n'ai pas encore reçu de Brunswick la partition de " Cellini ", sans quoi je vous en eusse envoyé un exemplaire. Nous venons de donner très bien cet ouvrage à Weimar, avec un succès trépidant, bis et rappels d'acteurs, etc. , m'écrit-on. Je n'ai entendu que la Ire représentation de cette reprise, qui a eu lieu pour la soirée de gala en l'honneur de la Grande Duchesse Douairière, et ce soir-là, il était défendu d'applaudir. On s'est dédommagé à mon égard, 3 jours après, quand j'ai dirigé dans le même théâtre " La Damnation de Faust " .

J'avais les 160 choristes de l'Académie de chant réunis à ceux du théâtre, ils savaient leur affaire à merveille, et vraiment l'effet a été prodigieux. On ne connaissait encore à Weimar que les 2 premiers actes de cette partition ; les 2 derniers paraissent avoir saisi par la nuque ce public impressionnable et intelligent. La course à l'abîme a ébouriffé la salle ; mais l'apothéose de Marguerite a touché, m'a-t-on dit, plus que tout le reste.

Nous avons eu à Weimar des scènes incroyables au sujet de " Lohengrin " de Wagner. Ce serait trop long à vous raconter. Il en est résulté des histoires qui font encore long feu en ce moment dans la presse allemande. »

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2145 ; 24 juin, de Paris) :

« Je n'aurais jamais cru que l'opinion publique put attacher à cette nomination [à l'Institut] une telle importance. J'ai même su que vous aviez porté (à l'Altenburg) un toast à ma candidature ; j'en remercie Liszt et vous et nos amis. Au prochain dîner académique (car nous allons en avoir quelques-uns) , je porterai un toast à l'Altenburg et aux esprits que le hantent.

J'oubliais de vous dire que cela me donne 1,500 francs de rente. (15 feuilletons de moins à faire !!!) »

La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Weimar à Berlioz à Paris (Correspondance Générale, n° 2148ter - tome VIII ; 28 juin) :

« La nouvelle de votre nomination a réjoui tout Weimar, et le NW (" Neue Weimar ") la célèbre avec acclamation. On ne s'est rencontré qu'avec cette bonne nouvelle depuis 10 jours. C'est une fête de famille pour tous les musiciens de l'avenir, dans la capitale d'abord, et aussi parmi les nombreux membres dispersés sur toute l'Allemagne. »

À la Grande-Duchesse Maria Pavlovna de Saxe-Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 2191 ; 4 décembre, de Paris) :

« Vous avez daigné me permettre de placer sous votre haut-patronage l'édition allemande d'un de mes ouvrages, qui n'existerait plus sans la bienveillante protection que vous lui avez accordée. La partition de " Cellini " ressuscité vient de paraître. Je prends la liberté d'en offrir un exemplaire à votre Altesse, en la priant de recevoir l'expression de ma vive reconnaissance et l'assurance de mon entier dévouement. »

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2195 ; 25-26 décembre, de Paris) :

« Je vous croyais depuis longtemps revenus tous à Weimar. Je me hâte de vous répondre, pour vous obéir d'abord, et pour dire à Liszt de ne pas encore envoyer les parties d'orchestre de " Cellini ". Elles resteraient ici inutilement. Je ne sais encore rien de positif sur l'époque précise où elles me seront nécessaires, et le nombre de semaines pendant lesquelles je demanderai à les garder. Liszt doit faire, à cet égard, comme si je ne lui avais rien dit. Il s'agit (entre nous) de monter le " Cellini " au Théâtre-Lyrique, avec une partie du livret mise en prose pour le dialogue et quelques changements avantageux qu'y ont introduits les auteurs. Mais cela ne doit être mis en répétition qu'après " Obéron " que ce théâtre répète en ce moment.

Litolff a dû envoyer à Liszt ma lettre à Madame La grande-Duchesse et un exemplaire de la partition de " Cellini ". Je le prie de vouloir bien présenter l'une et l'autre à Son Altesse.

Je vous conjure très instamment de ne rien laisser transpirer hors de l'Altenburg de ce projet de représentation à Paris. Personne ici n'en sait rien ; et la prudence veut qu'on n'en entende parler qu'au dernier moment. »

Voir aussi Correspondance Générale, numéros 2077, 2079, 2083, 2089, 2090-1, 2094, 2094bis (tome VIII) , 2097, 2098, 2099, 2101 et 2101bis (tome VIII) , 2102, 2105-2106, 2109, 2115, 2120, 2126, 2149, 2160, 2163-2165, 2178, 2183.

1857

Voir Correspondance Générale, numéros 2199bis (tome VIII) , 2200-2201, 2207bis (tome VIII) , 2209, 2211, 2216, 2219, 2232, 2264, 2269.

1858

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2279 ; 20 février, de Paris) :

« De Bülow m'avait avant vous informé de son entreprise musicale à Berlin, et parlé du 1er concert qu'il a dirigé. Seulement, il m'annonçait que les journaux prussiens avaient voulu contrecarrer le succès de cette Ouverture [“ Benvenuto Cellini ”] , bien loin de la louer. Je lui répondis sur le champ une longue lettre. Wagner vint me voir précisément le même jour. Sa présence à Paris, peu après l'attentat [contre Napoléon III, le 14 janvier] , ne pouvait manquer d'être singulièrement interprétée. Nous avons néanmoins passé ensemble quelques heures ; il devait me faire faire la connaissance du gendre de Liszt, Monsieur Ollivier, et nous n'avons pu nous rencontrer.

Ce que vous m'annoncez de la reprise d'“ Alceste ” à Weimar ne me surprend pas. Ce qui m'étonne seulement, c'est qu'on laisse entrer les bourgeois au théâtre quand on y représente des œuvres pareilles. Si j'étais le Grand-Duc, j'enverrais ce soir-là, à chacun de ces braves gens, un jambon et 2 bouteilles de bière, en les faisant prier de rester chez eux.

Je voudrais bien que Liszt eût la complaisance de féliciter de ma part Madame Milde sur la manière dont elle a joué Alceste ; je vous crois sur parole. Ce devait être une charmante reine de Thessalie. »

À Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2317 ; 28 septembre, de Paris) :

« Je t'en prie, présente à la princesse mes excuses les plus humbles, j'aurais dû lui répondre il y a plus de 3 mois et je ne l'ai pas fait. Je n'ai pas pu, à mon grand regret, me rendre à l'invitation contenue dans sa dernière lettre, d'aller en quittant Bade passer quelques jours à Weimar. Trop de choses me rappelaient ici.

Voilà mon compte rendu. Mais que fais-tu à Weimar ? Que devient le théâtre ducal ? Je vois annoncé dans quelques journaux un Opéra d'un de tes élèves. Quel est ce jeune homme dont le nom m'était inconnu ?

Wagner, dit-on, va se fixer à Florence ; cela ce conçoit. Je ne connais pas la Suisse mais j'aime mieux l'Italie.

Wallace, le néo-Zélandais, dont l'histoire se trouve à la fin de mes " Soirées de l'orchestre ", est de nouveau revenu des antipodes. Il va visiter Weimar dans quelques mois, et veut que je lui donne une lettre pour toi. Reçois-le sans peur, il ne te mangera pas ; il n'a, par exception et tout Zélandais qu'il soit, aucun goût pour la chair humaine. Il a une très jolie femme, et ils jouent l'un et l'autre fort bien du piano.

Adieu, cher ami, rappelle-moi au souvenir de nos amis de Weimar, Singer, Steur [Stör] , Kausmann [Cosman] . »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2273, 2274, 2289, 2293, 2297.

1859

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2343 ; 7 janvier, de Paris) :

« Votre lettre (" pietosa " toujours) , celle de Liszt qui l'avait précédée, et Madame Viardot, que j'ai vue ces jours-ci, m'ont mis à peu près au courant de votre existence à Weimar. Je vous vois à l'Altenburg, j'entends vos intéressantes causeries du soir, illuminées par le doux sourire de la princesse Marie ; et je pense (en dépit de l'ordonnance de mon médecin) et j'admire combien, dans ce petit coin du monde, que vous habitez, il y a de cœur et d'intelligence, et de quelles nobles idées, Vestales de l'art, vous entretenez la flamme.

Oh ! comme je vous écouterai, comme je boirai vos paroles et celles de Liszt, qui en a de si magnifiques, quand il parle sur les sujets qui l'émeuvent et l'exaltent ! On voudrait m'envoyer à Cannes, au soleil du midi. Ah ! si j'étais libre, c'est à Weimar que j'irais ; le Midi est, en réalité, là où la vie ne souffle sur nous que de tièdes haleines, où le cœur peut se dégeler, l'imagination déployer ses grandes ailes. Vous me laisseriez bien me rouler dans un grand fauteuil, prêter l'oreille en ayant l'air de dormir et m'obstiner dans mon silence. Mais tant de voix me crient : " Reste ! Reste ! " que j'obéis, comme obéissait le Juif errant. »

À la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2390 ; 10 août, de Paris) :

« Votre lettre adorable ... comment saurais-je, comment pourrais-je vous dire tout le bien qu'elle m'a fait ? Je craignais, en comptant les semaines de votre long silence, qu'il vous fût arrivé quelque malheur. Un allemand, qui a passé le mois dernier à Weimar, assurait ici que vous n'y étiez plus, que Liszt aussi était absent. Vous avez donc dû recourir à votre philosophie. Ah ! Rome a raison : " Périr la philosophie ! Si elle n'a pas le pouvoir de ... etc. , etc. , etc. » Il me semble que je suis là, dans votre salon de Weimar, à écouter Liszt parler, à entendre vos pensées, à me dorer sous vos regards bienveillants.

Voyez, chère princesse, l'inconvénient de permettre l'effusion d'âme à des blessés tels que moi ! Je saigne, saigne, saigne ... je ferais mieux d'aller à l'hôpital que de vous fatiguer de mon éternelle plainte. Il y a des jours où je donnerais avec bien de la joie 2 des années qui me restent à vivre, pour pouvoir m'accroupir à vos pieds, comme un chien respectueux, et vous entendre réciter ces poèmes de consolations dont votre cœur est plein. Si impossible qu'il soit de panser des plaies qu'on ignore. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2347, 2351, 2355, 2380, 2393, 2406, 2427, 2428, 2447, 2449, 2451.

1860

Peter Cornelius à Vienne à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2521 ; vers le 22 novembre) :

« Oh si je pourrai vous montrer ma partition du " Barbier de Bagdad ", vous verriez là-dedans que vous avez fait de l'école en Allemagne, et que le " Cellini " fait des enfants aux esprits !

Monsieur Heckenast, à Pest, publie ma traduction, ou plutôt, mon arrangement des " Bohémiens " de Liszt, car c'est simplifié et raccourci et, en même temps, un recueil de poésies de moi intitulé : " Lieder von Peter Cornelius ". Faites-vous en traduire un, et composez-le, mon vénéré Berlioz, je le garderais comme un saint souvenir de vous, jusqu'à ma tombe ! Mon Dieu ! Les chaudes larmes me coulent des yeux en ce moment, en pensant à vous et tant de moments d'enthousiasme et de bonheur que nous avons eus ensemble !

" Quelle vie ! quelle vie ! ", chante le " Cellini ".

Je vous embrasse en pleurant, cher Maître ! Chaque 12 décembre, je vous félicite et, cette fois, je veux célébrer votre fête avec mes amis d'ici, jeunes gens de Prague, où vous êtes dans toutes les mémoires.

Mon cher Berlioz ! Dieu vous garde et soit avec vous ! J'ai pour vous le plus tendre et affectueux souvenir. Ne m'oubliez pas ! »

À Peter Cornelius (Correspondance Générale, n° 2522 ; 27 novembre, de Paris) :

« Votre lettre m'a fait un bien grand plaisir ; je désirais depuis longtemps avoir de vos nouvelles, et ni Liszt ni la princesse ne m'ayant écrit depuis plus de 10 mois, je ne savais ce que vous étiez devenu.

Oui, je voudrais bien entendre votre “ Barbier ” et votre “ Cid ” ; je suis persuadé qu’il y a là-dedans de la saveur, de la vie, du coloris.

Ce que vous devinez, sans que je le dise, c’est ma sincère et vive affection pour vous, c’est l’ardente sympathie qui me lie à une foule d’idées, d’efforts, de passions, qui sont les vôtres. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 2509.

1861

Voir la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2536, 2538, 2551-2552, 2555, 2557, 2571.

1862

Peter Cornelius à Vienne à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2594 ; 16 février) :

« Moi, je célébrai véritablement une fête en écoutant vos accents passionnés et toute cette musique si aristocratique, qui sera toujours pour la foule un carrosse à 4 chevaux allant au galop. Ils restent interdits et la bouche ouverte et demandent : “ Qui donc peut avoir été là-dedans ! ”

Cher, cher Berlioz, je vous baise la main ! C’est celle d’un grand Maître ! »

À Richard Pohl (Correspondance Générale, n° 2670 ; 28 novembre, de Paris) :

« Vous m’apprenez des choses étranges. Je vois qu’un Opéra nouveau, quel qu’en soit l’auteur, n’a pas, à beaucoup près, autant de prix pour les théâtres d’Allemagne qu’un album de chansonnettes n’en a pour un éditeur de Paris. Je vous ai répondu que je m’en rapportais à Monsieur Dingelstedt au sujet de la somme qui me serait accordée pour faire le voyage de Weimar. Avec 15 Louis, c’est impossible. Quant à laisser jouer “ Béatrice ” sans que j’assiste aux répétitions générales et sans que j’en dirige les Ires représentations, c’est à quoi je ne puis consentir.

À présent, pour conclure, je vous dirai tout bonnement qu’il faut renoncer à monter “ Béatrice ” à Weimar, puisque ni la pièce, ni la musique, ni la direction de l’auteur ne sont d’aucune valeur pour le théâtre ! Je vous prie donc de me renvoyer le livret et de ne pas vous donner la peine de le traduire. Il est triste de reconnaître que, dans le pays de l’intelligence, l’intelligence soit si peu estimée. Nous ne sommes pas des esclaves, et nous ne devons pas même avoir l’air de subir une exploitation.

N’y pensons plus. »

Richard Pohl à Weimar à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2678 ; 9 décembre) :

« Vous recevrez, j'espère, ces lignes au 11 décembre - votre jour de naissance ! Je n'ai jamais oublié cette journée que j'ai célébrée une seule fois avec vous à Leipzig, il y a 9 années [en 1853] . 9 années déjà, période assez longue pour oublier et perdre beaucoup mais pour gagner aussi d'autant plus ! Et j'ai gagné dans cette période votre amitié, qui m'est si chère et qui me fait si heureux. C'était en 1853 que j'ai fait votre connaissance à Baden et, voilà, les 9 années d'Horace (" nonum prematur in annum ") se sont passées et ma vénération pour vous est restée invariable.

Le théâtre Weimar est trop petit pour honorer les chefs-d'œuvre comme il faut - à Vienne, à Berlin, à Dresde, on peut payer ce qu'on demande mais, ici, l'état est si petit que seulement la Cour peut faire des frais extraordinaires, et c'était un des plus grands mérites de Liszt, qu'il avait toujours insisté que la Grande-Duchesse Douairière donnait les fonds pour honorer vous et d'autres grands artistes. J'espère que le Grand-Duc se décide pour votre Opéra et, dans ce cas, vous recevrez ce qu'il faut. Je vous prie donc : ayez patience, quelques semaines encore et ne redemandez pas votre livret dans ce moment.

J'espère que je puis faire peu à peu une édition allemande de vos œuvres complètes. N'y pensez-vous pas encore à une édition complète ? Y compris : vos livrets (poésies) , les articles de journaux pas encore reproduits et, puis, vos mémoires choisies, c'est-à-dire les chapitres qui se trouvent dans " Le Monde Illustré " et votre " voyage musical " peut-être ? »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2632, 2651, 2656, 2663.

1863

Franz Dingelstedt à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2692 ; 22 janvier, de Weimar) :

« Peut-être Leurs Altesses Royales Régnautes feront-elles quelque chose de leur part pour contribuer à mes nouveaux efforts de vous satisfaire j'aime à l'espérer sans oser l'assurer d'avance. Ce qui est certain et que vous savez d'ancienne date, Monsieur, c'est que votre visite fera du plaisir à la Cour, au théâtre, aux artistes de Weimar, et plus qu'à tout le monde à moi. »

À Johann Christian Lobe à Leipzig (Correspondance Générale, n° 2707bis - tome VIII ; 5 avril, de Weimar) :

« Je suis ici depuis 3 jours, nous donnerons mon Opéra de " Béatrice ", le 8 ; je serais bien heureux de vous voir.

Pourriez-vous venir passer 24 heures à Weimar ? Faites votre possible.

Mille amitiés constantes. »

À Hippolyte Lecourt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2708 ; 7 avril, de Weimar) :

« Farceur ! mais n'importe ! Je crois qu'au fond la " Béatrice " vous plaît. C'est gentil et joliment instrumenté, je vous jure. Nos répétitions ici marchent très bien et je vais tout à l'heure diriger la dernière. Le trio des 3 femmes que j'ai ajouté depuis les représentations de Bade et que je n'avais jamais entendu, m'a causé l'autre jour une agréable surprise et ces dames le disent à merveille. Seulement, la " Béatrice " (Madame Milde) ne peut pas s'italianiser, elle reste une " Béatrice " allemande et sentimentale.

La salle est louée depuis longtemps ; la reine de Prusse est arrivée hier soir. Le Duc et la Duchesse m'ont reçu, comme toujours, de la façon la plus gracieusement affectueuse, et l'orchestre et tous les acteurs et l'intendant. Demain, nous aurons donc, je l'espère, une belle soirée. Je conduirai encore une représentation, puis je partirai pour Lövenberg où m'appelle le prince de Hohenzollern, pour lui diriger un concert dont il m'a envoyé le programme.

J'ai vu hier une représentation de " Tannhäuser ", Madame Milde est la personnification idéalisée de l'Elisabeth, je la trouve admirable et adorable avec sa beauté de colombe. Il y a de bien belles choses dans le dernier acte surtout ; c'est d'une tristesse profonde mais d'un grand caractère ; pourquoi faut-il ? etc. , etc. , il y aurait trop à dire. »

À Fiorentino (Correspondance Générale, n° 2709 ; 9 avril, de Weimar) :

« Voilà la chose. Grandissime succès ; malgré l'étiquette imposée par les représentations de gala, la salle frémissant du haut en bas par moments, d'applaudissements rentrés ; exécution excellente dans son ensemble, Madame Milde ravissante Béatrice, et Knop, très spirituel Bénédict. Le nouveau trio des 3 femmes produisant presque autant d'effet que le duo. Leurs Altesses après la pièce m'ont fait appeler dans leur loge où elles m'ont chaudement complimenté ; la reine de Prusse a été bien plus enthousiaste encore, en sa qualité de musicienne accomplie. On me promet pour demain une débâcle, un dégel d'applaudissements, l'interdiction étant levée. Après le spectacle, j'ai dû assister à un long banquet que m'offraient les artistes de Weimar réunis à ceux qui étaient venus de Dresde, de Berlin, de Leipzig et des petites villes voisines.

Si vous trouvez le joint, soyez assez bon pour dire quelque amabilité à l'adresse de la Grande Duchesse et du Grand Duc de Weimar. Il n'est vraiment pas possible d'être plus charmants qu'ils ne le sont toujours pour moi. Et cette fois-ci, il m'ont comblé de témoignages d'affection. »

Aux Massarts (Correspondance Générale, n° 2710 ; 9 avril, de Weimar) :

« Je vous écris en me levant à 1 heure. On m'a fait passer une partie de la nuit à un banquet qui m'a été offert, après la Ire représentation, par les artistes de Weimar, réunis à ceux qui étaient venus des villes voisines et même de Dresde et de Leipzig. Le succès de " Béatrice " a été flambant, l'exécution excellente dans son ensemble. Le grand-duc et la grande-duchesse et la reine de Prusse m'ont accablé de compliments. La reine surtout m'a dit des choses, oh ! mais des choses que je n'ose vous répéter. Le morceau qu'elle aime le plus, c'est le trio des femmes, tout en avouant que le Duo est une invention ravissante, et que l'air de " Béatrice " et la fugue comique lui plaisent infiniment.

On m'annonce pour demain une bordée d'applaudissements à démolir la salle.

L'orchestre va à merveille et tout l'ensemble vocal se comporte musicalement. La " Béatrice " est délicieusement jolie et une artiste véritable ; seulement, elle reste trop allemande et rend cette lionne sicilienne presque sentimentale. »

À Pauline Viardot (Correspondance Générale, n° 2711 ; 9 avril, de Weimar) :

« Vous avez bien voulu me permettre de vous donner des nouvelles de la représentation de " Béatrice ". En 2 mots, les voilà. Très grand succès, exécution irréprochable pour l'ensemble, félicitations, compliments, remerciements de leurs Altesses et de la Reine de Prusse, qui m'ont comblé de gracieusetés.

Le Ire soirée réduite aux rumeurs favorables par l'étiquette des soirées de gala, après une répétition générale très chaude. On me promet pour demain un dégel d'applaudissements. Il était venu beaucoup d'artistes de Dresde, de Leipzig, et des petites villes voisines de Weimar. Madame Milde est charmante mais elle fait de la lionne sicilienne une " Béatrice " allemande, et ses yeux de colombe ne parviennent pas à darder des flammes.

C'est un autre genre de vérité. Notre nouveau trio a produit une véritable sensation, c'est même celui de tous les morceaux que la reine de Prusse et plusieurs autres " dilettanti " préfèrent. La mise en scène est bien réglée. Le Duo a remué tout l'auditoire. En somme, c'est beaucoup mieux qu'à Bade.

Décidément, ces Allemands sont des musiciens. J'épiais les fautes hier soir, on n'en a pas commis une seule. Knop (" Bénédicte ") ne bronche pas dans le Scherzo final. »

À Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 2712 ; 11 avril, de Weimar) :

« Béatrice vient d'obtenir ici un grand succès. Après la Ire représentation, j'ai été complimenté par le Grand Duc et la Grande Duchesse et, surtout, par la reine de Prusse qui ne savait quelles expressions employer pour dire son ravissement.

Hier, j'ai été rappelé 2 fois sur la scène par le public après le 1er acte et après le 2e. Après le spectacle, je suis allé souper avec le Grand Duc qui m'a comblé de gracieusetés de toute espèce. C'est vraiment un Mécène incomparable. Pour demain, il a organisé une soirée intime où je lirai le poème des " Troyens ". Les artistes de Weimar et ceux qui étaient venus des villes voisines et même de Dresde et de Berlin m'ont donné un immense banquet.

Hier soir, j'ai pris, dans ma joie, la liberté d'embrasser ma " Béatrice " qui est ravissante. Elle a paru un peu surpris d'abord ; puis, me regardant bien en face : " Oh ! a-t-elle dit, il faut que je vous embrasse aussi moi ! "

Si vous saviez comme elle a bien dit son : " Il m'en souvient ! "

On me fait beaucoup d'éloges du travail du traducteur [Richard Pohl] . Quant à moi, je l'ai surpris, malgré mon ignorance de la langue allemande, en flagrant délit d'infidélité en maint endroit. Il s'excuse mal, et cela m'irrite. C'est le même qui traduit mon livre " À travers chants ". Or, figurez-vous que dans cette phrase : " Cet adagio semble avoir été soupiré par l'archange Michel, un soir où, saisi d'un accès de mélancolie, il contemplait les mondes, debout au seuil de l'empyrée », il a pris l'archange Michel pour Michel-Ange, le grand artiste florentin. Voyez le galimatias insensé qu'une telle substitution de personne doit faire dans la phrase allemande. N'y a-t-il pas de quoi pendre un traducteur ? Mais quoi ! il m'est si dévoué, c'est un si excellent garçon ! »

À Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 2713 ; 15 avril, de Weimar) :

« Oui, “ Béatrice ” a obtenu ici un succès magnifique, j'ai été complimenté par le Grand Duc, par la Grande Duchesse et par la Reine de Prusse à la 1re représentation où les applaudissements étaient interdits à cause de l'étiquette du jour de gala ; à la seconde, applaudissements sans fin. J'ai été rappelé après le 1er acte et après le second. Souper donné par les artistes de Weimar réunis aux étrangers venus de Dresde, de Leipzig, et des villes voisines de Weimar, etc. , etc.

Le Duc me comble d'amitiés, au grand dîner de la cour dernièrement, pendant que la musique militaire placée dans une tribune jouait ma “ Marche hongroise ” de “ Faust ”, il m'a fait signe de loin avec un verre de champagne. Tous les jours, il m'envoie chercher pour causer nous 2. Avant-hier, il a réuni un petit nombre de personnes devant lesquelles j'ai lu le poème des “ Troyens ” avec un véritable succès, je puis le dire. »

À son oncle Félix Marmion (Correspondance Générale, n° 2715 ; 26 avril, de Paris) :

« Je viens de passer un mois de véritable ivresse musicale. J'ai dirigé les 2 1res représentations de “ Béatrice ” au théâtre de Weimar (en allemand) avec un succès pyramidal, compliments du Grand Duc, et de la Grande Duchesse, qui avait choisi mon Opéra pour le jour de sa fête, et félicitations bien plus vives encore de la Reine de Prusse, rappels de l'auteur sur la scène après le 1er et le 2e acte, souper offert par les artistes de Weimar et par ceux qui étaient accourus de Leipzig, de Dresde, d'Iéna, etc. Charmantes flatteries du Duc qui a bu à ma santé de loin au grand dîner du jour de gala (300 couverts) au moment où un orchestre militaire placé dans une galerie jouait ma “ Marche hongroise ”. »

À Johanna Pohl (Correspondance Générale, n° 2722 ; 6 mai, de Paris) :

« J'ai écrit il y a 5 jours à Madame la Grande Duchesse de Weimar, en lui envoyant la partition des “ Troyens ”, dont j'avais cru comprendre un soir qu'elle serait bien aise d'avoir un exemplaire.

J'ai écrit aussi au prince d'Hohenzollern pour savoir de ses nouvelles. Je n'ose parler de lui dans mon prochain feuilleton, dans la crainte de produire un mauvais effet sur l'esprit de la cour de Weimar. Vous comprenez. Plus tard, cela viendra plus facilement. »

À Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 2724 ; 9 mai, de Paris) :

« Le Grand Duc de Weimar a voulu absolument écrire à sa cousine la Duchesse de Hamilton (à mon sujet) une lettre destinée à être mise sous les yeux de l'Empereur. La lettre a été lue, et l'on m'a fait venir au ministère, et j'ai dit tout ce que j'avais sur le cœur, sans gazer, sans ménager mes expressions, et l'on a été forcé de convenir que j'avais raison, et ... il n'en sera que cela. Pauvre Grand Duc, il croit impossible qu'un souverain ne s'intéresse pas aux arts. Il m'a bien grondé de ne vouloir plus rien faire. " Le bon Dieu, m'a-t-il dit, ne vous a pas donné de telles facultés pour les laisser inactives." »

Il m'a fait lire les " Troyens ", un soir à la cour, devant une vingtaine de personnes comprenant bien le français. Cela a produit beaucoup d'effet. »

Le Baron Beaulieu Marconnay à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2728 ; 23 mai, de Weimar) :

« Son Altesse Royale la Grande Duchesse m'a chargé de vous faire parvenir la bague ci-jointe, qu'Elle vous prie d'accepter en souvenir de votre dernier séjour à Weimar. La Grande duchesse m'a expressément ordonné de vous dire tout le plaisir que vous lui avez fait par le précieux envoi de la partition des " Troyens " qui l'intéresse au plus haut degré : Son Altesse Royale est infiniment sensible à cette attention de votre part et à la pensée qui vous a porté à La faire jouir de cette belle composition. »

Le Comte von Wedel à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2798 ; 18 novembre, de Weimar) :

« Son Altesse Royale le Grand-Duc, mon auguste Maître, ayant appris que la représentation de vos " Troyens " a eu lieu dernièrement à l'Opéra Impérial et que cette œuvre a eu tout le succès qui lui était dû et qui répondait aux vœux sincères de Son Altesse Royale, me charge de vous transmettre Ses félicitations empressées et de vous exprimer toute la part qu'il prend à cet heureux événement. »

À Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 2805 ; 26 novembre, de Paris) :

« Le Grand-Duc de Weimar vient de me faire écrire par son secrétaire intime pour me féliciter sur le succès des " Troyens ". Sa lettre a paru partout. N'est-ce pas une attention charmante ?

On n'est pas plus gracieux, on n'est pas plus prince, on n'est pas plus intelligent Mécène.

Vous seriez ainsi, si vous étiez prince. »

À Eduard Lassen (Correspondance Générale, n° 2811 ; 14 décembre, de Paris) :

« Mon éditeur, Monsieur Choudens, vient de m'avertir qu'il avait reçu une lettre de Richard Pohl dans laquelle celui-ci lui demande d'envoyer tout de suite à Weimar la grande partition du Duo de Chorèbe et Cassandre dans le 1er acte de " la Prise de Troie ". Il dit que Madame La grande Duchesse voudrait entendre ce morceau à un concert de la cour, le 1er Jour de l'an. Ma partition ne m'appartient plus, l'éditeur en conséquence vous en enverra demain une copie, qu'il avait déjà, et je ne sais ce qu'il demandera pour cela à l'Intendant. Je lui ai dit seulement d'être très modéré dans ses prétentions.

Écrivez-moi à ce sujet, au reçu de ma lettre. Je désirerais bien vivement que la chose pût marcher au gré de Madame la grande Duchesse. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2691, 2693, 2694-2695, 2697-2698, 2701, 2705-2707, 2714, 2716, 2719 (tome VIII) , 2725-2726, 2734-2735, 2738-2739, 2745, 2769, 2771, 2797, 2801, 2804, 2806, 2810, 2814.

1864

À Toussaint Bennet (Correspondance Générale, n° 2843 ; 15 mars, de Paris) :

« Si vous rencontrez par hasard à Vienne Monsieur Peter Cornelius, dites-lui 1,000 choses de ma part et que je serais bien heureux d'avoir une lettre de lui. »

Au Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre de Saxe-Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 2857 ; 12 mai, de Paris) :

« Monseigneur,

Votre bienveillance est infatigable. J'ai su que dernièrement vous aviez daigné vous informer de moi en termes qui m'ont vivement touché. Je ne puis résister au désir de vous en remercier.

J'aurais dû, il y a longtemps, vous informer du résultat de la lettre que vous aviez bien voulu écrire à Madame la Duchesse d'Hamilton à mon sujet, mais la crainte de vous occuper trop de mes affaires et de vous paraître importun m'a retenu. Aujourd'hui, il me semble que mon noble protecteur me pardonnera de lui faire mes tristes confidences. L'an dernier, peu après mon retour de Weimar, je me trouvai à un rendez-vous que m'avait demandé Monsieur Camille Doucet, chef du bureau des beaux-arts au ministère d'État. L'Empereur avait chargé le ministre de me voir et celui-ci s'était reposé de ce soin sur son subordonné. Aux Iers mots de Monsieur Doucet, je reconnus la cause de ses questions. C'était votre lettre, monseigneur, qui, ainsi que vous l'aviez voulu, avait été placée sous les yeux de l'Empereur. Monsieur Doucet était déjà au fait de tout. La question était simple : j'avais terminé depuis 3 ans un immense Opéra, on ne le jouait pas, on m'interdisait la salle du Conservatoire, où j'avais pourtant autrefois donné 36 concerts, toutes les portes de France m'étaient fermées, etc. , etc. Monsieur Doucet ayant voulu tant bien que mal expliquer cette anomalie et justifier l'administration de son hostilité dédaigneuse, je coupai court à la conversation par ces mots : " Permettez-moi de parler à Monsieur Doucet l'artiste, l'homme de lettres, l'auteur applaudi au théâtre français, et non point au chef de bureau du ministère d'État ; alors je lui dirai, Mon cher monsieur, à propos des raisons que vous me donnez, qu'il n'est pas permis à un artiste de dire à un autre DES BÊTISES de cette énormité-là. " Ce à quoi Monsieur Doucet baissant les yeux répondit : " Hélas, puisque vous me placez sur ce terrain, je suis bien obligé de convenir que vous n'avez pas tort. " La conférence finit là et, depuis, je n'entendis plus parler ni de l'Opéra, ni du Conservatoire, ni de l'intervention de votre Altesse.

3 mois après, je cédaï enfin aux nouvelles sollicitations de Monsieur Carvalho, directeur du Théâtre Lyrique qui, depuis longtemps, me demandait mon Opéra des “ Troyens ”. Je consentis à confier aux ressources bornées de son théâtre, qui ne possède pas le quart de celles de l'Académie Impériale de Musique, la partition des “ Troyens à Carthage ”, en en détachant “ La Prise de Troie ” et en composant un prologue pour justifier cette suppression. Il fallut alors engager Madame Charton-Demeur, la seule cantatrice capable de chanter et de jouer le rôle de Didon. Comme ce rôle la tentait beaucoup, elle consentit à faire un sacrifice en acceptant 6,000 francs par mois, au lieu des 8,000 que lui offrait le Théâtre Italien.

Mon ouvrage fut ainsi donné et les efforts et la hardiesse de Monsieur Carvalho parvinrent à réaliser ce que votre Altesse eût voulu obtenir en totalité pour moi de l'administration de l'Académie impériale. Mais après 21 représentations et un brillant succès, la cantatrice retourna au Théâtre Italien qu'elle n'avait quitté que momentanément et “ Les Troyens ” disparurent de l'affiche. Monsieur Carvalho a prouvé là, une fois de plus, qu'il était un artiste ; il a mis en scène sur son théâtre les chefs-d'œuvre de Gluck, de Mozart, de Weber, de Beethoven qu'on n'entendait nulle part à Paris et, sans lui, ma grande partition serait encore à cette heure complètement inconnue. Je ne puis m'empêcher de le signaler à votre attention, et si jamais votre Altesse jugeait convenable d'accorder à un directeur de théâtre une distinction honorifique, il n'y en a pas un en Europe, je le crois, qui en fut plus digne et plus heureux que Monsieur Carvalho. L'Opéra des “ Troyens ” a fait sensation. Aujourd'hui encore, il m'arrive souvent d'être arrêté dans les rues par des enthousiastes inconnus qui me remercient ou me félicitent de l'avoir produit. D'autres, au contraire, me lancent des regards de Schylock, comme si je les eusse insultés personnellement ; telle est la rage qu'excitent à Paris les manifestations du grand art parmi les partisans de la basse industrie musicale.

Maintenant, ma tâche est finie. “ Othello's occupation's gone. ” J'ai même donné ma démission de rédacteur du “ Journal des Débats ”. L'art étant mort chez nous, la critique n'est plus qu'une farce méprisable. Je ne me sens plus le courage d'écrire des riens sur des riens.

Je ne fais plus ni prose, ni vers, ni musique. On joue quelques-uns de mes ouvrages au loin, dans plusieurs villes d'Allemagne, en Amérique et ailleurs. J'ai fait 4 Opéras qu'on ne joue nulle part [Berlioz compte “ Les Troyens ” comme 2 Opéras.] . Je souffre cruellement, jour et nuit, d'une maladie nerveuse inexorable ; mais je me suis arrangé de manière à être toujours prêt et à pouvoir dire à la mort : “ Quant tu voudras. ”

Voilà, Monseigneur, ma confession. J'espère que votre Altesse me pardonnera de la lui avoir faite et qu'elle ne doutera pas de la reconnaissance profonde et attendrie avec laquelle je pense constamment à vos bontés. »

À Eduard Bock à Berlin (Correspondance Générale, n° 2913 ; 13 octobre, de Paris) :

« Je n'ai pas reçu l'exemplaire que vous m'annoncez de votre édition de “ Béatrice et Bénédicte ”. Je viens d'écrire à Monsieur Kœnnemann [Correspondance Générale, n° 2912] de vous envoyer les Ires feuilles de la Ire scène de la grande partition. J'ai écrit aussi à Monsieur Pohl, bien persuadé qu'il ne fera aucun cas de ma lettre ; c'est la 5e que je lui écris sans obtenir de réponse. En conséquence, si vous n'obtenez pas de lettre de lui d'ici à 10 jours, veuillez m'en informer ; je vous enverrai alors le dialogue français que vous pourrez faire traduire en allemand sous vos yeux, à Berlin. À l'aide de la pièce de Shakespeare (" Much ado about nothing ") traduite par Schlegel, il y aura seulement à copier en beaucoup d'endroits, et cela prendra à peine 3 jours. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2820, 2827, 2840, 2851, 2855, 2858, 2871, 2887, 2888, 2905-2907, 2908, 2911, 2915, 2918, 2920, 2923, 2924.

1865

À Estelle Fornier (Correspondance Générale, n° 2984 ; 22 mars, de Paris) :

« Je voudrais être, plus tard, immensément admiré et célèbre, afin de vous rendre chère à mes admirateurs. Oh, vous serez chère aux Allemands surtout ; on vit encore de la vie de l'âme dans leurs pays. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 3008, 3021, 3025, 3046.

1866

À Peter Cornelius (Correspondance Générale, n° 3191 ; 12 décembre, Vienne) :

« Cher, bon, excellent camarade Cornelius !

Mille remerciements pour votre charmant souvenir que j'ai reçu hier, en revenant d'une exténuante répétition. Cela m'a ranimé. Vous êtes toujours le même. Je vous avais écrit de Paris avant mon départ, et j'ai été bien chagriné d'apprendre en arrivant que nous n'étiez plus à Vienne. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 3110, 3115, 3116, 3117, 3187.

1867

Le Comte von Wedel à Weimar à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 3217 ; 1er février) :

« Le Grand Duc vous fait dire à cette occasion, monsieur, qu'il a bien pensé à vous, surtout dernièrement où l'on a fait une très belle reprise de votre " Symphonie fantastique ", fort bien exécutée au théâtre grand-ducal et reçue avec tous les applaudissements du public qu'elle mérite à un si haut degré. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 3290 et 3296.

1882

Liszt au Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre de Saxe-Weimar (Correspondance entre Franz Liszt et Charles Alexandre, Grand Duc de Saxe [Leipzig, 1909] , Lettre 172, page 187 ; 28 février, de Budapest) :

« Dans le petit volume des “ Lettres intimes ” de Berlioz à son ami Ferrand, publiées récemment, je lisais ceci [Correspondance Générale, n° 2805] : “ On n’est pas plus prince, ni plus charmant mécène que le Grand-Duc de Saxe-Weimar. ” Un tel éloge me fait si fort plaisir que j’en oublie volontiers l’exclamation du même Berlioz à propos de ma “ Messe de Gran ” [Correspondance Générale, n° 3116] : “ Quelle négation de l’art ! ” Qu’il ait raison sur vous, Monseigneur, et tort envers mon œuvre, reste mon souhait. »

1883

Liszt au Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre de Saxe-Weimar (Opus citatum, Lettre 182, page 196 ; 8 février, de Budapest) :

« 2 suppliques à vous soumettre aujourd’hui, Monseigneur.

Un ami de 30 ans, Richard Pohl, publie maintenant ses écrits en volumes. Le 1er, comme de raison, est consacré à Wagner et dédié au Roi Louis de Bavière, qui a gracieusement decerné la croix de Saint-Louis à Pohl. Le second volume, relatif à la période de Weimar de 1850 à 1860, sera dédié à Votre Altesse Royale, si Elle le permet, et je La prie d’accorder la croix de chevalier du Faucon à l’écrivain. Pohl a séjourné une dizaine d’années à Weimar, où sa femme était engagée comme harpiste au théâtre. Lui est un des meilleurs critiques et coopérateurs en musique ; il a traduit les œuvres littéraires de Berlioz, le livret de “ Béatrice et Bénédict ”, comme aussi celui de l’Opéra de Saint-Saëns, “ Samson ”, et, si je ne me trompe, plusieurs choses pour Madame Viardot. Voilà bien des points de rattachement avec Weimar, auxquels il ne manque que le ruban rouge. Votre Altesse Royale daignera combler ce vide. »

Liszt au Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre de Saxe-Weimar (Opus citatum, Lettre 186, page 200-201 ; 4 mars, de Budapest)

:

« Pour ce qui est de la modeste part qui revient à la musique, je me permets de réclamer l’attention de Votre Altesse Royale en l’honneur de la mémoire de Berlioz.

Des grands compositeurs français, Berlioz est celui qui a le plus de points de rattache avec Weimar. Son “ Benvenuto Cellini ”, merveilleux de verve et d’originalité, a été représenté plusieurs fois sur votre théâtre, malgré la chute que d’injuste préventions et une violente cabale lui ont fait subir à Paris, et une quinzaine d’années plus tard, à Londres. En agréant la dédicace de “ Cellini ”, Votre auguste mère daigna réparer les torts commis par d’autres théâtres.

Le second opéra de Berlioz (plus léger et de “ mezzo carattere ”) : “ Béatrice et Bénédict ”, est resté au répertoire du théâtre de Weimar, et je sais un des plus fins connaisseurs de l’Europe qui l’apprécie : Madame la Grande-Duchesse régnante.

Si mon activité, un peu trop énergique, j’en conviens, relativement à la température moyenne de la ville, avait continué à votre théâtre, j’y aurais certainement introduit au complet “ les Troyens ”, ouvrage des plus remarquables et superbes, lequel n'obtint, du vivant de l'auteur, qu'un succès d'estime à Paris. Vous en connaissez des fragments, Monseigneur, et vous vous souvenez aussi que Berlioz a eu l'honneur de diriger ses admirables Symphonies aux concerts de votre cour.

Je communique au Baron de Loën la lettre que m'adresse le comité du monument Berlioz. Président : le Vicomte Delaborde, secrétaire perpétuel de l'Académie des beaux-arts. Membres : Ambroise Thomas, Saint-Saëns, Massenet, etc. , de l'Institut de France.

Selon mon avis, il n'est pas opportun de suivre littéralement l'invitation du comité de Paris, en établissant des sous-comités à Weimar et à Budapest. En Allemagne et en Hongrie, nous avons à pourvoir à tant de monuments nationaux, et malheureusement, hélas ! à tant de victimes des inondations que nos bourses restent généralement à sec.

Ici, j'ai demandé à quelques bienveillants amis - le Cardinal Haynald, Géza Zichy, Albert Apponyi et d'autres de me remettre leur contribution pour le monument de Berlioz.

De Weimar, si Vos Altesses Royales daignent accorder un don, le Baron de Loën serait l'intermédiaire qualifié. »

Le Grand-Duc Charles Alexandre de Saxe-Weimar à Liszt (Opus citatum, Lettre 187, page 202 ; 8 mars, en réponse) :

« Votre lettre du 4 datée de Buda-Pest m'a trouvé presque en exécution des désirs qu'elle me transmet, puisque Monsieur de Loën m'avait déjà communiqué la demande concernant le monument de Berlioz. La somme de 600 marks qui réunit l'offrande de la Grande-Duchesse et la mienne sera remise à Monsieur de Loën pour répondre à l'appel que la conscience française artistique fait entendre pour prouver que ni république, ni monarchie n'ont su ni ne savent apprécier à temps le vrai mérite. Vous avez eu raison de compter de suite sur la compréhension weimarienne, mon cher ami et très vénéré Mæstro. »

Weimar autrefois, et particulièrement à l'époque de Berlioz :

Dès son arrivée à Weimar, en 1843, Berlioz tombe sous le charme de la ville (« Mémoires » : 1er voyage en Allemagne, 3e lettre) :

« Je sens quelque chose dans l'air qui m'annonce une ville littéraire, une ville artiste ! Son aspect répond parfaitement à l'idée que je m'en étais faite, elle est calme, lumineuse, aérée, pleine de paix et de rêverie ; des alentours charmants, de belles eaux, des collines ombreuses, de riantes vallées. Comme le cœur me bat en la parcourant ! Quoi ! C'est là le pavillon de Goëthe ! Voilà celui où feu le Grand-Duc aimait à venir prendre part aux doctes entretiens de Schiller, de Herder, de Wieland ! Cette inscription latine fut tracée sur ce rocher par l'auteur de " Faust " ! Est-il possible ? Ces 2 petites fenêtres donnent de l'air à la pauvre mansarde qu'habita Schiller ! C'est dans cet humble réduit que le grand poète de tous les nobles enthousiasmes écrivit " Don Carlos ", " Marie Stuart ", " les Brigands, Wallenstein " ! C'est là qu'il a vécu comme un simple étudiant ! »

Hôtel du Prince Héritaire, Place du Marché :

Pendant ses séjours à Weimar, de 1843 à 1863, Berlioz loge presque invariablement à l'hôtel, et semble-t-il toujours le même, le « Hotel zum Erbprinzen » (ou Hôtel du Prince Héritaire) . C'est le cas en janvier 1843 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 801, 803-4, 810) ; 1852 (Correspondance Générale, n° 1529) ; 1854 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1725 et 1739) ; 1856 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2075, 2091, 2100, 2149) ; 1863 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2707bis - tome VIII) ; et, sans doute aussi, en 1855. Mais les attestations semblent alors faire défaut. Bâti en 1749, l'hôtel était situé sur la place centrale ou Place du Marché (« Marktplatz ») , mais n'existe plus.

La chambre a été baptisée d'après Berlioz, mais rien ne prouve que Berlioz y ait logé. Cette chambre a été de même baptisée d'après Napoléon, mais rien ne prouve que l'Empereur y ait logé.

L'Hôtel-de-ville :

Situé sur la place du marché, le « Rathaus » (Hôtel-de-ville) original est détruit 2 fois par un incendie et reconstruit 2 fois. La structure néo-Gothique de l'Hôtel-de-ville date de 1841. Le 22 novembre 1852, Berlioz assiste là à un banquet en son honneur.

Le théâtre :

Le théâtre ducal connu de Berlioz est construit en 1825 par Baurat Steiner pour remplacer un bâtiment plus ancien, construit en 1779 et détruit par un incendie. Le nouveau théâtre, détruit lui aussi par un incendie en 1906, est reconstruit dans le style Classique par l'architecte Max Littmann, et ouvre en 1908. À la suite de bombardements par l'aviation américaine, le 9 février 1945, seule la façade principale reste debout ; le théâtre est ré-ouvert en 1948. Au fil des ans, le théâtre a été connu sous divers noms : le « Hoftheater » (1779) ; le « Hoftheater Weimar » (1825-1907) ; le « Nationaltheater » (1907) ; le « Deutsche Nationaltheater » et « Staatskapelle Weimar » (1999) .

Toutes les exécutions de « Benvenuto Cellini » , en 1852 et 1856, ainsi que celles de « Béatrice et Bénédict » en 1863, ont lieu dans ce théâtre, de même que les concerts dirigés par Berlioz en 1843, 1852, 1885 et 1856, sauf pour 2 concerts en 1855 et 1856 qui ont lieu dans une salle du palais. Pour l'exécution du « Retour à la vie » , le 21 février 1855, il faut aménager la scène pour la circonstance (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1899 et 1903) . C'est Liszt, directeur artistique du théâtre, de 1848 à 1858, qui dirige toutes les exécutions de « Benvenuto Cellini » ; dans une lettre, Berlioz exprime son regret que Liszt ne lui ait pas confié une seule exécution de son Opéra (Correspondance Générale, n° 2104) .

Le palais des Grands-Ducs de Saxe-Weimar :

Berlioz est invité à plusieurs réceptions au palais des Grands-Ducs (21 et 22 novembre 1852 ; 17 février 1855 ; 10 avril 1863) et se rend sans doute fréquemment au palais pendant ses séjours, à partir de 1852. 2 de ses concerts ont lieu dans une salle du palais (17 février 1852 ; 17 février 1856) ; dans une de ses lettres, il évoque la splendeur de cette salle et l'éclat de son acoustique (Correspondance Générale, n° 1903) .

L'Altenburg :

L'Altenburg, vaste demeure sur la pente d'une colline juste à l'extérieur de Weimar et qui autrefois dominait la ville, est construit en 1811 par l' « Oberstallmeister » Friedrich von Seebach. Liszt et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein s'y installent en 1848 et y logeront jusqu'à 1861.

À Weimar, Berlioz loge d'habitude à l'hôtel, et ne séjourne que rarement à l'Altenburg (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1445 : il hésite à cause de Marie Recio) , mais y rend très souvent visite et participe sans doute à de nombreuses réceptions (l'une d'elles a lieu le 23 novembre 1852 ; une autre le 18 février 1855) . 2 lettres de 1859 évoquent avec nostalgie les soirées que Berlioz y passait (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2343 et 2390) .

Une chambre de l'Altenburg, en 1855 :

Cette gravure provient de l' « Illustrirte Zeitung » , du 2 juin 1855 (n° 622, page 364) . Elle montre le salon de musique au 2e étage de l'Altenburg. Le petit instrument à clavier, au fond, avait appartenu à Mozart. Le grand piano est l'œuvre du facteur d'instruments Édouard Alexandre, ami de Berlioz, d'après une commande de Liszt. Berlioz servit d'intermédiaire dans la correspondance entre les 2 hommes. Par exemple, dans une lettre datée du 23 avril 1853 (Correspondance Générale, n° 1589) , Berlioz informe la princesse Carolyn Sayn-Wittgenstein des progrès dans la conception de l'instrument :

« J'ai vu Alexandre il y a quelque temps et il s'est refusé à me laisser voir ses préparatifs pour l'instrument de Liszt, m'assurant que je ne distinguerais rien et ne pourrais concevoir encore aucune idée de son plan. Il se croit plus que jamais sûr de réussir. La forme de l'instrument sera celle d'un piano à queue ordinaire, dont tout le dessous seulement sera plein jusqu'au niveau des pédales. »

(Voyez aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1556, 1558, 1559, 1568, 1620, 1624.) Dans ses feuilletons, Berlioz évoque, à plusieurs reprises, l'instrument à triple clavier inventé par Alexandre, qu'il nomme « piano-orgue » et appelle une fois « piano-Liszt » (par exemple, « Journal des Débats » : 3 mai 1856 ; 24 septembre et 14 décembre 1857) .

L'Ordre du Faucon Blanc, Saxe-Weimar :

Le Grand-Duc Charles Frédéric de Saxe-Weimar avait décoré Berlioz de l'Ordre du Faucon Blanc.

Berlioz et Wagner

« Au cher et grand auteur de Roméo et Juliette, l'auteur reconnaissant de “ Tristan et Yseult ”. »

(Wagner, dédicace sur la partition de « Tristan » , offerte à Berlioz en 1860 - Correspondance Générale, n° 2468.)

Le lecteur des autobiographies de Berlioz (« Mémoires ») et de Wagner (« Mein Leben ») sera sans doute frappé par la différente manière dont chaque auteur traite de l'autre. Wagner fait fréquemment allusion à Berlioz, de ses premiers contacts avec lui et sa musique, en 1839-1842, jusqu'aux dernières rencontres qu'il mentionne en 1860 quand il donne des concerts à Paris. Dès mai 1841, il publie dans le « Dresdner Abendzeitung » un article sur Berlioz. Les passages principaux de « Mein Leben » qui traitent de Berlioz sont réunis ci-dessous en traduction française (par Michel Austin) ; une page séparée donne le texte allemand original de ces extraits ainsi que d'un certain nombre de lettres échangées entre Liszt et Wagner, de 1852 à 1860, où il est question de Berlioz ; ces dernières sont présentées ci-dessous en traduction française (également par Michel Austin) . On pourra parfois déceler une certaine gêne chez Wagner chaque fois qu'il parle de Berlioz, et cela dès son article de 1841, mais Wagner a du moins reconnu le génie de son aîné et son influence sur son œuvre. L'inscription citée ci-dessus sur la partition de « Tristan und Isolde » qu'il offre à Berlioz, au début de 1860, accompagnée d'une lettre (Correspondance Générale, n° 2468) en donne un témoignage ouvert (voir aussi l'étude sur Berlioz et Wagner publiée par Georges de Massoungnes, en 1900) .

Par contre, le silence des « Mémoires » de Berlioz sur Wagner est très frappant : il n'y a en fait qu'un seul passage un peu développé qui le concerne, à propos de la visite de Berlioz à Dresde, en février 1843. Autrement, on ne trouve qu'une allusion passagère à la vente par Wagner du livret du « Hollandais Volant » , qui est ensuite donné à Dietsch, le chef des chœurs de l'Opéra : « Dietsch, qui inspirait à Monsieur le directeur beaucoup plus de confiance que Wagner, pour le mettre en musique ! » , dit de lui Berlioz ironiquement (Chapitre 57) . Le silence de Berlioz est voulu, comme il le déclare à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein, en 1865 : dans la Postface des « Mémoires » , qui embrasse la période critique de ses rapports avec Wagner : « Il n'y a pas un mot, dans le récit de mes 10 dernières années, qui ait trait à Wagner, ni à Liszt, ni à la musique de l'avenir. » (Correspondance Générale, n° 3008) Tandis que Wagner reconnaissait à sa manière le génie de Berlioz et sa dette envers lui, Berlioz, de son côté, a refusé à celui-ci la reconnaissance qu'il désirait de sa part. La question de Wagner était devenue pour Berlioz un sujet d'irritation, et il réagit en la passant carrément sous silence. On peut cependant reconstituer l'essentiel d'après d'autres écrits de Berlioz (ses travaux critiques et, surtout, sa correspondance) ainsi que par la correspondance de Wagner, Liszt et autres.

Chronologie

1803

11 décembre : Berlioz naît à La Côte Saint-André.

1813

22 mai : Wagner naît à Leipzig.

1839

15 décembre : Wagner, récemment arrivé à Paris, assiste à la 3^e exécution de « Roméo et Juliette » au Conservatoire, dirigée par Berlioz ; le concert comprend aussi les 2 1^{ers} mouvements de « Harold en Italie », un mouvement du « Requiem », et l'air d'Ascanio de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

1840

14 août : Wagner assiste à la 3^e exécution de la « Symphonie funèbre et triomphale » à la Salle Vivienne, dirigée par Berlioz.

1841

5 mai : Article de Wagner sur Berlioz dans la « Dresdner Abendzeitung » .

23 et 30 mai : Articles de Wagner sur « Der Freischütz » dans la « Gazette musicale » .

1843

Du 6 au 18-19 février : Berlioz à Dresde, où il rencontre Wagner, entend « Rienzi » et « Le Vaisseau Fantôme » .

12 septembre : Publication dans le « Journal des Débats » de la 5^e lettre (Dresde) du « Voyage musical en Allemagne » .

1849

16 février : Liszt dirige la 1^{re} exécution à Weimar du « Tannhäuser » de Wagner.

1850

28 août : Liszt dirige la 1^{re} exécution à Weimar du « Lohengrin » de Wagner.

1853

10 octobre : Berlioz, Liszt et Wagner se rencontrent à l'hôtel de Liszt, à Paris.

11 octobre : Berlioz accueille Liszt et Wagner au petit-déjeuner ; Berlioz chante et Liszt joue des extraits de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

1855

8 juin : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Paris pour Londres.

11 juin : Une répétition empêche Berlioz d'assister à un concert dirigé par Wagner où il joue l'Ouverture de « Tannhäuser » .

13 juin : Concert à « Exeter Hall » dirigé par Berlioz, en présence de Wagner.

Vers le 20 juin : Berlioz et Wagner dînent ensemble au domicile de Sainton où ils ont une longue conversation.

25 juin : Berlioz dîne avec Wagner avant un concert dirigé par Wagner et prend un verre avec lui après.

1856

Vers le 18 février : Liszt dirige une exécution de « Lohengrin » à Weimar ; Berlioz et Marie Recio sortent pendant le 2^e acte.

24 février : 2^e exécution de « Lohengrin » sous la direction de Liszt, en présence de Berlioz et Marie Recio.

1858

20 janvier : Berlioz reçoit une visite de Wagner à Paris et lui lit le livret des « Troyens » .

23 janvier : Berlioz rend visite à Wagner à son hôtel à Paris.

1859

15 septembre : Wagner arrive à Paris pour un séjour de 19 mois.

23 octobre : Berlioz et Wagner se rencontrent dans la rue.

1860

25 janvier : 1^{er} concert de Wagner à Paris, en présence de Berlioz.

1 février : 2^e concert de Wagner ; Berlioz n'y assiste pas.

8 février : 3^e concert de Wagner.

9 février : Publication du compte-rendu de Berlioz dans le « Journal des Débats » .

22 février : Lettre ouverte de Wagner à Berlioz dans le « Journal des Débats » .

22 et 23 mai : Échange de lettres entre Wagner et Berlioz à propos des articles de Berlioz sur le « Fidelio » de Beethoven.

Juillet : Rencontre chez Madame Viardot où le 2e acte de « Tristan » est joué par Viardot, Wagner et Klindworth en présence de Berlioz et Madame Kalergis.

1861

13 mars : 1re exécution de « Tannhäuser » à l'Opéra, en présence de Berlioz.

18 mars : 2e exécution de « Tannhäuser » .

24 mars : 3e et dernière exécution de « Tannhäuser » .

Mai : Wagner quitte Paris pour ne jamais y revenir.

1863

6 avril : Berlioz assiste à une exécution de « Tannhäuser » à Weimar.

Berlioz et Wagner : 1839-1843

Après la publication de sa lettre sur sa visite à Dresde, Berlioz semble ne plus avoir pensé à Wagner pendant plusieurs années, si l'on peut tirer argument du silence, en apparence total, sur lui dans ce qui subsiste de sa correspondance. On pourrait avancer que Berlioz, tout en reconnaissant en Wagner un compositeur d'importance et un nom avec lequel il fallait compter, n'avait d'emblée pas de sympathie naturelle pour son style musical et ne s'y est donc pas attardé outre mesure.

Liszt, Wagner et Berlioz : 1849-1855

Les choses auraient pu en rester là, et les carrières de Berlioz et Wagner auraient pu se poursuivre indépendamment l'une de l'autre sauf pour l'intervention de Liszt. Quand Liszt prend la décision de s'établir de manière permanente à Weimar, en 1848, son 1er objectif est de faire jouer la musique de Wagner, à laquelle il vient d'être converti : il fait monter « Tannhäuser » en 1849 et, l'année suivante, dirige la 1re exécution de « Lohengrin » . Berlioz est prévenu tôt des intentions de Liszt, comme il ressort d'une lettre de janvier 1849 dans laquelle Liszt l'informe de ses projets, attire son attention sur « Tannhäuser » et suggère, peut-être naïvement, que Berlioz serait flatté d'y reconnaître des emprunts par Wagner à « Roméo et Juliette » . (Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis) La réponse de Berlioz, s'il y en eut, n'est pas connue ; le nom de Wagner n'apparaît pas dans sa correspondance pendant encore plusieurs années, et il semble qu'il n'ait pas relevé l'allusion.

Ce que Berlioz ne sait sans doute pas, c'est que, depuis avril 1852, Liszt est en train de débattre avec Wagner sa décision de soutenir Berlioz, et non seulement Wagner, à Weimar. La contestation porte d'abord sur la reprise de « Benvenuto Cellini », en 1852 : Wagner essaie de dissuader Liszt de son projet et, dans cet esprit, n'a pas scrupule à dénigrer une œuvre qui lui est pratiquement inconnue. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettres numéros 70, 71, 78.) Quelques mois plus tard, il élargit sa critique contre les insuffisances présumées de Berlioz : selon lui, ce qu'il faut à Berlioz c'est un poète et Wagner, du même coup, condamne « la Damnation de Faust », œuvre qui lui est tout aussi inconnue que « Cellini » et qu'il confond avec une « Symphonie ». Néanmoins, il se déclare prêt à venir au secours de Berlioz en lui offrant un poème qu'il n'a plus l'intention de mettre en musique et dont Liszt ne veut pas non plus. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 79) Liszt, d'abord interloqué, admet le bien-fondé de certaines des objections de Wagner mais persiste dans sa conviction : « Benvenuto Cellini » est un chef-d'œuvre qui mérite bien d'être repris. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettres numéros 81, 82, 135, 145.) Rien n'indique que Berlioz ait jamais eu vent de tous ces débats, et on remarquera au passage que, de son côté, Berlioz n'a jamais cherché à dissuader Liszt de défendre d'autres compositeurs que Berlioz.

L'ambition évidente de Liszt de réconcilier les 2 compositeurs contemporains qu'il admire le plus s'inscrit dans le cadre de son grand projet d'être le guide d'un mouvement en faveur de la musique progressive dont Weimar serait le centre. Liszt, pour sa part, n'a aucune difficulté à entretenir les meilleurs rapports avec les 2 hommes, et dispose d'un avantage de taille : il parle et écrit couramment à la fois le français (avec Berlioz) et l'allemand (avec Wagner) . Berlioz, de son côté, ne sait pas l'allemand et ne manifeste aucune intention de l'apprendre, tandis que Wagner, qui a une certaine connaissance du français comme on peut le voir d'après sa correspondance et son autobiographie, est conscient de ses limites. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettres numéros 124, 187, 301a ; « Mein Leben », Band II, pages 616-618.) Il souligne aussi, à plusieurs reprises, que Berlioz ne peut jamais le comprendre complètement du fait de son ignorance de l'allemand (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 192 ; Correspondance Générale, n° 2481) , objection que Berlioz est prêt à lui accorder (Correspondance Générale, n° 2014) . La question de langue est certes importante, et ce n'est pas par hasard que la correspondance entre Berlioz et Wagner semble avoir été très limitée, en comparaison avec leurs propres correspondances avec Liszt. Mais tout ne peut se réduire à la question de langue : Berlioz entretient des rapports étroits avec des musiciens allemands dont la connaissance du français était approximative, tel Robert Griepenkerl à Brunswick (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1542) . Les différences de tempérament sont, par contre, fondamentales. La question d'âge a aussi son importance et Wagner, pour sa part, en est conscient (se reporter à « Mein Leben », Band I, pages 229-231 ; et Band II, pages 616-618) , mais elle n'a aussi jamais empêché Berlioz et Liszt de se traiter en égaux. Une autre difficulté est purement pratique : pour Berlioz et Wagner, les occasions de se rencontrer et parler face à face sont restreintes au cours des années 1850, puisque Wagner est exilé d'Allemagne pendant tout ce temps. Les quelques rencontres qui ont donc lieu sont soit à Paris, soit à Londres, dans les rares occasions où ils s'y trouvent tous les 2 en même temps.

Dès l'été de 1853, et peut-être plus tôt, Liszt visiblement presse Berlioz de se rapprocher de Wagner : Berlioz se déclare prêt et veut bien passer outre à quelques remarques critiques publiées par Wagner sur son compte. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1620) En octobre 1853, Liszt, Wagner et Berlioz se trouvent à Paris ensemble pendant quelques jours (se reporter à « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 124) et se rencontrent à 2 reprises (le 10 et 11 octobre) , juste avant un nouveau départ de Berlioz pour l'Allemagne. Les réactions de Berlioz à cette rencontre ne sont pas connues (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1633) mais, d'après l'allusion dans l'autobiographie de Wagner (« Mein Leben », Band II, page 597) , les résultats ne semblent pas concluants.

La prochaine occasion se présente 2 ans plus tard, en juin 1855, quand Wagner et Berlioz se trouvent par hasard tous les 2 à Londres pour y diriger des concerts (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1972 et 1975) . Malgré leurs engagements, ils parviennent chacun à assister à un concert dirigé par l'autre ; vers le 20 juin, ils se rencontrent longuement autour d'un dîner au domicile de Sainton à Londres, et se revoient le 25 juin, avant et après le dernier concert de Wagner. Tous les 2 font part à Liszt peu après de leur rencontre (Correspondance Générale, n° 1987, se reporter à 1991 ; « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 187) et Wagner y consacre aussi un développement dans son autobiographie. (« Mein Leben », Band II, pages 616-618) Les récits des 2 hommes s'accordent sur la cordialité d'une rencontre qui leur permet de mieux se connaître qu'avant ; après leur retour de Londres, ils échangent des lettres amicales et aussi quelques-unes de leurs œuvres. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1986, 2012, 2014 ; se reporter à « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 192 ; et « Mein Leben », Band II, page 625.) Liszt est ravi : ses rêves de concorde au sein du camp de la musique progressive semblent en voie de se réaliser et, dans sa lettre à Wagner, il transcrit quelques lignes de la lettre de Berlioz. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig (1910) : lettre n° 188.)

« La musique de l'avenir » : 1855-1858

Apparences cependant trompeuses, et les sources possibles de désaccord ne manquent pas. L'appréciation qu'ils expriment chacun sur la direction d'orchestre de l'autre met à jour la différence de leurs tempéraments musicaux. (Wagner sur Berlioz : « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 187 ; et « Mein Leben », Band II, pages 616-618 ; Berlioz sur Wagner : Correspondance Générale, n° 1991.) Et il y a d'autres points de désaccord. Berlioz reproche à Wagner son dédain de Mendelssohn (Correspondance Générale, n° 1987) et soupçonne la sincérité de ses protestations d'amitié. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1991.) Le récit plus tardif donné par Wagner dans son autobiographie (« Mein Leben », Band II, pages 616-618) émet plus de réserves envers Berlioz que ses lettres de 1855 à Liszt, où il a peut-être caché ses doutes. Et surtout, malgré la chaleur momentanée de leurs rapports personnels, les réserves émises dès 1843 par Berlioz sur la musique de Wagner font surface de nouveau. La 1^{re} indication en est une lettre de Berlioz à son jeune protégé Théodore Ritter (Correspondance Générale, n° 2059) , où Berlioz utilise pour la 1^{re} fois l'expression « la musique de l'avenir » et, dans un sens péjoratif, mais toutefois sans l'associer encore explicitement à Wagner. Cette expression malencontreuse, source de tant de malentendus et de controverses, ne remonte pas à Wagner lui-même, comme il le soulignera à Berlioz plus tard (Correspondance Générale, n° 2481, février 1860) , mais elle est déjà monnaie courante et souvent liée au nom de Wagner. Berlioz apprend à mieux connaître la musique de Wagner, mais son verdict n'en devient pas plus favorable. On peut supposer qu'il aura parcouru la partition de « Lohengrin » qu'il possède (Correspondance Générale, n° 2014) en avance des exécutions à Weimar, en février 1856. Berlioz sort de la première pendant le second acte mais écoute la 2e jusqu'au bout, et le résultat est de faire éclater au grand jour son désaccord avec Liszt sur Wagner. Liszt écrit à Wagner le mois suivant mais sans souffler mot de la réaction de Berlioz à « Lohengrin », silence que Wagner ne peut se manquer de relever. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettres numéros 207 et 208.)

« Les néo-Weimariens forment un club de jeunes artistes dits progressistes, dont je suis censé porter le drapeau. »

Tel est le commentaire prudent que Berlioz fait des célébrations en son honneur à Weimar, l'année précédente. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1899.)

Mais, en juin 1856, sa position s'est durcie, comme il ressort des remarques sur son élection à l'Institut qu'il confie à Henri Litolff, qui avait pris partie pour lui dans la dispute sur Wagner à Weimar, en février : Berlioz rejette toutes les dénominations et tient bien à marquer sa distance de « la musique de l'avenir ». (Correspondance Générale, n° 2143.) Mais, quelques jours plus tard, la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein souligne avec insistance que l'élection de Berlioz est précisément une victoire « pour tous les musiciens de l'avenir » ! (Correspondance Générale, n° 2148ter.) En août, écrivant à la princesse sur son travail en cours sur les « Troyens », Berlioz insère un paragraphe frappant où il défend sa conception du rôle de la musique qu'il contraste avec « le crime de Wagner » qui « veut réduire la musique à des accents expressifs ». (Correspondance Générale, n° 2163.) Il veut manifestement dissiper toute confusion entre Wagner et lui-même.

Au début de 1858, Wagner est de retour à Paris et rencontre Berlioz, qui lui lit le poème des « Troyens ». Une lettre de Berlioz à son fils, peu après, garde un mutisme frappant sur ses rencontres avec Wagner, mais décrit Hans von Bülow avec lequel il vient d'échanger des lettres (Correspondance Générale, n° 2273) comme « l'un des plus fervents disciples de cette école insensée qu'on appelle en Allemagne, " l'école de l'avenir " » dont Berlioz se refuse à faire partie. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2274.) Visiblement, Bülow espère encore réconcilier les 2 géants de la musique contemporaine. Une autre lettre de Berlioz, à la princesse, fait allusion à sa rencontre avec Wagner, mais seulement en termes généraux et sans mentionner la lecture du poème des « Troyens ». (Correspondance Générale, n° 2279) Le témoignage de Wagner est différent : il réagit très défavorablement au nouvel Opéra (ou, du moins, à son livret, car il n'a rien entendu de la musique) dans une lettre à Hans von Bülow et aussi, plus tard, dans son autobiographie. (« Mein Leben », Band II, page 663 ; voir aussi « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 251 ; Liszt et Richard Wagner. « Sämtliche Briefe », tome XI, lettre n° 117.) Son jugement négatif a pu être influencé précisément par le fait qu'il sait que c'est la princesse qui a encouragé Berlioz à écrire l'Opéra. Quelques semaines plus tard, le ton monte encore : Joseph d'Ortigue, ami de Berlioz, publie un article dans le « Journal des Débats » (2 juin 1858) dans lequel il s'empresse de dissocier Berlioz (et Litolff) de tout lien avec « la musique de l'avenir » qu'il caractérise en termes peu flatteurs. Hans von Bülow, qui soupçonne l'influence de Berlioz derrière la publication de l'article, est outré.

« L'école du charivari » : 1859-1868

Berlioz n'a pas inventé l'expression « la musique de l'avenir » ni son application à la musique de Wagner, mais une autre expression « l'école du charivari » entre dans son vocabulaire, en 1860, et devient synonyme pour lui avec « la musique de l'avenir ». Berlioz utilise souvent le mot « charivari » dans le sens de « bruit », « confusion », « désordre » (par exemple, Correspondance Générale, numéros 2100, 2192, 2202, 2219). C'était aussi bien entendu le nom d'un journal satirique de Paris, et Berlioz avait souvent été en butte à ses attaques. Il semble que l'expression « l'école du charivari » soit une invention de Berlioz qu'il associe dans son esprit à la musique de Wagner.

Les Ires expériences de Wagner à Paris, en 1839-1842, compositeur alors jeune et peu connu, sont parmi les épisodes les plus malheureux de sa vie. On pourrait considérer son retour à Paris, en septembre 1859, pour un séjour qui se prolongera jusqu'à mai 1861 comme la contrepartie à ce 1er séjour : compositeur maintenant célèbre avec une série d'œuvres majeures à son actif, Wagner veut y faire connaître sa musique et établir sa position dans ce qui est encore la capitale du monde de la musique de l'époque. C'est aussi au cours de son 1er séjour parisien que Wagner a rencontré Berlioz, dont la musique a fait une telle impression sur lui. 20 ans après, il considère toujours Berlioz comme l'un des 3 grands compositeurs de l'époque, en même compagnie que Liszt et Wagner lui-même. (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 301a.) L'un de ses espoirs, en 1859, semble maintenant de renouer le dialogue avec Berlioz sur le terrain de la musique (et pas seulement sur le plan personnel, comme à Londres en 1855) - d'où, entre autres, la dédicace sur l'exemplaire de la partition de « Tristan und Isolde » qu'il offre à Berlioz, au début de 1860. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2468.)

C'est précisément ce que Liszt pressait Berlioz depuis des années à faire avec Wagner. Selon une lettre de Hans von Bülow, qui a pu être informé par Wagner lui-même, Berlioz réagit avec lenteur au don fait par Wagner de la partition, et Bülow en est outré. Il se trouve que l'exemplaire de « Tristan », donné à Berlioz par Wagner, existe encore ; d'après les nombreuses annotations critiques crayonnées par Berlioz sur la partition, on peut constater que Berlioz a lu l'ouvrage de près. (Voir « Le Ménestrel » du 28 septembre 1884, pages 348-349 ; et une série d'articles dans le même journal, en octobre 1884.) Mais Berlioz refuse son adhésion et, avec le recul du temps, on peut avancer qu'il était déjà trop tard pour réaliser « l'entente cordiale » que Liszt souhaitait. Le résultat, en 1860, est un dialogue de sourds au cours duquel Berlioz et Liszt vont s'éloigner encore plus l'un de l'autre.

À l'automne de 1859, Wagner et Berlioz ont plusieurs fois l'occasion de se rencontrer. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2425, 2428, 2431, 2433, 2451.) Wagner est occupé à la préparation d'une série de concerts de sa musique. Selon son autobiographie, il tente d'obtenir le soutien de Berlioz ; ce dernier, d'abord obligeant, aurait ensuite été mis au pas par l'intervention de Marie Recio (« Mein Leben », Band II, pages 706-708) qui a pu concevablement jouer un rôle en compliquant les rapports entre lui et Wagner. (Voir aussi « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 301a.) Quoiqu'il en soit, les concerts de Wagner sont, pour Berlioz, une charge importune : ce n'est pas la 1re fois qu'il se voit obligé de rendre compte de musique qui lui est antipathique, mais Wagner est une autre affaire que les innombrables médiocrités que Berlioz a dû subir tout au long de sa carrière de critique musical, et il ne peut être tout simplement négligé. La correspondance de Berlioz est éloquente à ce sujet. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2464, 2471, 2472, 2473 ; se reporter à 2480.)

Le compte-rendu du 1er concert, publié dans le « Journal des Débats », le 9 février, coûte à Berlioz bien de la peine (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2476, 2477) ; elle paraît sous le titre : « Concerts de Richard Wagner », mais avec le sous-titre inquiétant : « La Musique de l'Avenir ». Après quelques remarques préliminaires l'article décrit en détail les morceaux joués et mêle louange à quelques critiques. On remarquera que Berlioz, tant dans cet article que dans ses autres écrits, ne fait jamais allusion aux échos de sa propre musique dans Wagner qui, pourtant, devaient lui être évidents. Des années plus tôt, Liszt avait attiré son attention sur les ressemblances entre « Roméo et Juliette » et l'Ouverture de « Tannhäuser » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis), et la dédicace de Wagner sur la partition de « Tristan » veut évidemment faire acte de cette dette. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2468.) L'influence de Berlioz sur Wagner faisait d'ailleurs l'objet d'un débat parmi leurs contemporains, comme les souvenirs d'Ernest Reyer, ami de Berlioz, l'attestent. D'autre part, Berlioz ne pouvait bien entendu savoir que le livret des « Maîtres-chanteurs » allait adapter d'importants éléments de « Benvenuto Cellini » : de même que « Tristan und Isolde » est la réponse de Wagner à « Roméo et Juliette », « les Maîtres-chanteurs » peuvent être considérés comme la contrepartie wagnérienne de « Benvenuto Cellini ».

Après examen des différents morceaux joués, le compte-rendu résume la personnalité musicale de Wagner :

« On doit en conclure, ce me semble, qu'il possède cette rare intensité de sentiment, cette ardeur intérieure, cette puissance de volonté, cette foi qui subjuguent, émeuvent et entraînent ; mais que ces qualités auraient bien plus d'éclat si elles étaient unies à plus d'invention, à moins de recherche et à une plus juste appréciation de certains éléments constitutifs de l'art. »

Jusqu'à ce point, Wagner n'aurait pu sérieusement tirer ombrage du compte-rendu et, à certains égards, il aurait même pu s'en féliciter. Mais Berlioz va plus loin : il se sent obligé de soulever la question de « la musique de l'avenir » et de prendre position sur les principes supposés d'une prétendue « école » à laquelle le nom de Wagner était indissolublement lié. Il s'y sent obligé parce que son propre nom y a été parfois associé et il veut de nouveau marquer ses distances. Le compte-rendu conclut ainsi sur un ton ambigu et polémique.

L'importance que Berlioz attache au compte-rendu est attestée par son inclusion, 2 ans plus tard (1862), dans « À Travers chants » (Chapitre 24), son dernier recueil d'articles critiques qui a valeur de profession de foi musicale. La place donnée au chapitre est voulue et accablante : il suit un bref commentaire sur le déclin de l'art musical à Paris à l'époque (« Les temps sont proches ») et est bientôt suivi (Chapitre 26) par un article à la louange des Symphonies de Henri Reber (tirés tous 2 de feuilletons dans le « Journal des Débats », du 3 janvier et du 23 juillet 1861). Le style musical de Reber est caractérisé en ces termes :

« Son harmonie est plus hardie que celle de Haydn et de Mozart, sans indiquer pourtant le moindre penchant pour les discordances féroces, pour le style charivarique systématiquement adopté depuis 4 ou 5 ans par quelques musiciens allemands dont la raison n'est pas bien saine, et qui fait à cette heure l'épouvante et l'horreur de la civilisation musicale. »

L'allusion à l'écriture harmonique de Wagner est évidente et renvoie au compte-rendu du concert : chacun des 3 derniers paragraphes du compte-rendu utilise des mots dérivés de « charivari » pour décrire certaines des caractéristiques présumées de « la musique de l'avenir ». L'expression sera utilisée de nouveau par Berlioz dans un de ses derniers feuilletons (20 mars 1863) avec une allusion indirecte à Wagner, mais sans le nommer.

Wagner se sent provoqué et obligé de répondre : dans une longue lettre ouverte à Berlioz publiée dans le « Journal des Débats », le 22 février, il se distance de l'appellation « musique de l'avenir » qui n'est pas son invention, puis développe longuement la thèse de son livre de 1849, « L'Œuvre d'art de l'avenir », source de la confusion. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2481 ; « Mein Leben », Band II, page 716.) Berlioz ne répond pas (Correspondance Générale, n° 2492), mais Wagner ne renonce pas et veut visiblement poursuivre le débat. Quand, en mai, Berlioz publie 2 articles sur le « Fidelio » de Beethoven (repris pour l'essentiel dans « À Travers chants », Chapitre 4), Wagner est mû à lui écrire une chaleureuse lettre de remerciements qui tente d'exprimer sa conviction qu'il est possible aux grands esprits de s'entendre (Correspondance Générale, n° 2503 ; « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 301a) ; Berlioz répond le lendemain. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2504) C'est le dernier échange de lettres connu entre eux. Ils se rencontrent de nouveau en juillet quand Wagner organise, pour le compte d'une admiratrice (Madame Kalergis), une exécution privée chez Madame Viardot du 2e acte de « Tristan », avec Wagner et Viardot se partageant la distribution et Klindworth, invité de Londres pour l'occasion (se reporter à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1991), jouant la réduction de l'orchestre au piano. Berlioz n'a jusqu'alors entendu que le prélude de l'Opéra, qui lui a paru incompréhensible : c'est pour lui l'occasion d'entendre le cœur de l'œuvre. Selon l'autobiographie de Wagner, la seule source semble-t-il pour cet épisode (« Mein Leben », Band II, page 731), c'est Pauline Viardot qui aurait persuadé Berlioz de venir dans l'espoir de le réconcilier avec Wagner. (Elle connaissait les sentiments de Berlioz : Correspondance Générale, numéros 2471, 2473, 2477, 2480.) Selon le récit de Wagner, Berlioz aurait été peu communicatif et l'affaire finit là.

On pourrait hasarder ici l'hypothèse que l'écoute de « Tristan » a peut-être influencé Berlioz plus qu'il ne paraît à l're vue : quelques mois plus tard, à l'improviste et sur sa propre initiative, Berlioz entreprend la composition de sa dernière œuvre majeure, l'Opéra « Béatrice et Bénédict », qui traite un thème d'amour mais de manière légère et ironique. Serait-ce de la part de Berlioz la contrepartie voulue de la passion dévorante de « Tristan und Isolde », lui-même la contrepartie wagnérienne de « Roméo et Juliette » ?

Quoiqu'il en soit, la réunion en juillet semble être la dernière occasion où Berlioz et Wagner se trouvent face à face et, dans l'autobiographie de Wagner, il n'est pas question de la réaction de Berlioz aux exécutions de « Tannhäuser », en mars 1861. Wagner a tout simplement renoncé à Berlioz. Berlioz, de son côté, est exaspéré (et on le comprend) de voir l'œuvre de Wagner prendre le pas à l'Opéra sur ses « Troyens » qui n'ont toujours pas été exécutés, à grands frais et avec l'appui de l'Empereur qui a traité l'œuvre de Berlioz avec indifférence. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2857 ; « Mémoires » : Postface.) Il réagit en refusant de faire aucun commentaire en public sur l'ouvrage, sans doute pour éviter les désagréments du compte-rendu des concerts de Wagner l'année précédente (il laisse à son ami d'Ortigue le soin de le faire). Mais en privé à ses amis, il donne libre cours à ses sentiments et ne semble avoir assisté qu'à la 1re exécution. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2534, 2535, 2536, 2538, 2542, 2545.) Pour Berlioz, Wagner est maintenant sans ambage un membre de « l'école du charivari » qui a le soutien de Liszt. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2536, 2542 ; en l'occurrence, Liszt n'assistera pas aux exécutions : Correspondance Générale, n° 2538.) Le ressentiment a visiblement faussé le jugement de Berlioz, ce qui semble avoir inquiété même certains de ses amis : l'insistance avec laquelle Théophile Gautier s'attarde sur Wagner dans la nécrologie qu'il publie sur Berlioz, en 1869, le laisse supposer. (Voir aussi les souvenirs d'Ernest Reyer sur Berlioz : il estimait ne pas avoir à choisir entre Wagner et Berlioz.)

On possède un aperçu intéressant sur la première houleuse de « Tannhäuser » à Paris dans une lettre de Marie Recio-Berlioz à ses nièces, Joséphine et Nancy Suat, du 20 mars 1861, une semaine après l'exécution à laquelle elle avait assisté en compagnie de Berlioz (la lettre se trouve au Musée Hector Berlioz) . Dans cette lettre, Marie exulte sur la débâcle de l'Opéra :

« Nous voilà débarrassés de toute la clique de “ la musique de l'avenir ”, il faut espérer du moins qu'après si rude épreuve, elle en restera là. »

2 ans après les représentations de l'Opéra, et dans un meilleur état d'esprit, Berlioz entend « Tannhäuser » à Weimar (ni Liszt, ni Wagner ne sont présents) , et il est capable de formuler un brève appréciation des beautés de l'œuvre. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2708.) Mais, visiblement, il ne veut pas s'attarder sur un sujet qui lui est pénible, et les quelques références à Wagner dans ses lettres, par la suite, sont hostiles. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2750, 2843, 2888 ; se reporter à 2920.) Une des dernières lettres de sa correspondance, du critique russe Vladimir Stasov, un de ses chauds partisans, suppose que Berlioz serait heureux de voir Wagner et « la musique de l'avenir » dénigrés par rapport à la sienne. (Correspondance Générale, n° 3375.) On comprend pourquoi Berlioz a préféré éliminer toute mention de Wagner, Liszt et « la musique de l'avenir » de l'avant-dernier chapitre de ses « Mémoires » avec lequel se termine sa carrière de musicien. (Correspondance Générale, n° 3008.)

Choix de lettres de Berlioz, Wagner et autres

La correspondance de Berlioz et Wagner est peu développée et seuls quelques textes ont survécu ; voici la liste des lettres connues (les chiffres renvoient à Correspondance Générale) :

Lettres de Berlioz à Wagner

1840 : 757 (12 octobre) .

1855 : 2014 (10 septembre) .

1859-1860 : 2425.

1859 : 2431 (vers le 11 novembre) ; 2433 (18 novembre) .

1860 : 2464 (12 janvier) ; 2476 (2 février) ; 2504 (23 mai) .

Lettres de Wagner à Berlioz

1860 : 2468 (21 janvier) ; 2481 (vers le 15 février) ; 2503 (22 mai) .

1849

Voir la Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis.

1852

Liszt à Wagner, 7 avril (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 70) :

« Les informations les plus détaillées sur la mise en scène de l'Opéra de Berlioz sont fournies par le journal de Brendel [la " Neue Zeitschrift für Musik ", 2 et 30 avril 1852] . Pour ma part, j'ajouterai seulement que les raisons qui m'ont décidé pour cet Opéra se sont avérées entièrement justes et susceptibles de favoriser mon activité ici. Pourquoi " Cellini " à Weimar ? Voilà une question à laquelle je n'ai pas besoin de donner de réponse à tout le monde, mais dont la solution dans la pratique devrait nous satisfaire. Au départ, tu n'as sans doute pas bien compris l'affaire, mais tu le comprendras mieux plus tard. En tout cas, je crois que si tu n'es pas porté à faire des suppositions en l'air, tu me donneras raison. »

Wagner à Liszt, 13 avril (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 71) :

« Que t'est il donc venu à l'oreille au sujet de mon attitude envers la mise en scène de " Cellini " ? Il me semble que tu me supposes hostile. Je voudrais te détromper. Je considère ton initiative comme une question d'engagement personnel de ta part qui découle de ton amitié pour Berlioz : quel animal serais-je si je voulais te faire reproche de cette amitié et de cette initiative ! Chacun doit suivre les élans de son cœur comme tu le fais, ou mieux encore, chacun devrait avoir un cœur comme le tien. La situation serait alors vite différente. Ici aussi, je ne peux que me réjouir pour toi. Ce n'est que quand un pareil élan doit aussi satisfaire le bon sens que je dois exprimer mon avis qu'on risque de commettre des erreurs qui peuvent paraître évidentes à une tierce personne. Je ne peux absolument pas croire aux conséquences que (d'après ce qu'on me dit) tu attends de la mise en scène de " Cellini " : c'est tout ! Est-ce que mes doutes peuvent faire la moindre différence à mon opinion sur ton action ? Absolument pas ! De tout mon cœur, je te dis : tu as bien fait, et je voudrais aussi pouvoir dire la même chose à bien des personnes. »

Liszt à Wagner, 23 août (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 78) :

« À la mi-novembre, j'attends Berlioz ; on ne doit pas mettre de côté son " Cellini " (sauf pour une coupure assez considérable) - parce qu'en dépit de toutes les bêtises qui circulent à son propos, " Cellini " est et reste une œuvre d'envergure qu'il faut placer très haut. J'ai la certitude qu'elle te plaira beaucoup. »

Wagner à Liszt, 8 septembre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 79) :

« Ceci me mène à Berlioz et Raff. Je suis franchement attristé que Berlioz s'occupe encore de la révision de son " Cellini ". Si je ne me trompe, cette œuvre remonte à plus de 12 ans : est-ce que Berlioz n'a pas fait assez de progrès depuis pour être en mesure de faire quelque chose de complètement différent ? Il doit vraiment manquer terriblement de confiance en soi pour avoir à revenir à un ouvrage tellement ancien. Bülow a vu tout à fait juste quant au défaut de " Cellini " : c'est le poème et la situation fautive où elle met le compositeur d'avoir à couvrir, par des moyens purement musicaux, les insuffisances que seul le poète peut combler. Berlioz ne pourra jamais sauver ce " Cellini " : mais qu'est-ce qui compte le plus, " Cellini " ou Berlioz ? Laisse donc aller le 1er pour venir en aide au second ! C'est pour moi quelque chose d'horrible d'assister à ces efforts surhumains pour ranimer cette œuvre. Au nom du ciel, Berlioz devrait écrire un nouvel Opéra ; s'il ne le fait pas, ce sera son plus grand malheur, car une seule chose peut le sauver : le drame, et son refus obstiné de suivre le seul moyen d'en sortir ne peut que le mener toujours plus bas à sa perte. Ce dilemme ne sera qu'aggravé par une nouvelle tentative sur un vieux problème, où le poète lui fait défaut et il ne peut que chercher constamment à le remplacer par sa musique.

Crois-moi, j'aime Berlioz, malgré la défiance avec laquelle il s'obstine à garder sa distance envers moi ; il ne me connaît pas, mais moi je le connais. S'il y a quelqu'un dont j'attende quelque chose, c'est bien Berlioz, mais pas de la manière qui l'a mené aux platitudes de sa " Symphonie de Faust ". S'il continue sur cette voie, il ne peut que se rendre tout à fait ridicule. S'il est un musicien qui ait besoin du poète, c'est Berlioz, et c'est son malheur d'adapter toujours ce poète à sa fantaisie de musicien, en habillant tantôt Shakespeare et tantôt Goethe à son gré. Il lui faut un poète pour le pénétrer complètement et le subjuguier, un poète qui sera pour lui ce qu'un homme est à une femme. Je vois avec désespoir cet artiste exceptionnellement doué aller à sa perte par son isolement égoïste. Puis-je lui être d'un quelconque secours ??

Tu ne veux pas " Wiland " [" Wiland le Forgeron ", poème de Wagner] ; à mon avis, c'est un beau poème, mais je ne puis plus le développer. Veux-tu l'offrir à Berlioz ? Henri Blaze serait peut-être la personne indiquée pour en faire une version française. »

Wagner à Liszt, 3 octobre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 81) :

« Mon Dieu, ai-je dit quelque chose sur Berlioz ou Raff que tu n'aurais pas bien compris, comme si j'avais quelque grief contre eux ? J'ai parlé comme je vois les choses de loin et, en particulier, dans le cas de Berlioz, je n'ai que les meilleures intentions. »

Liszt à Wagner, 7 octobre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 82) :

« Tu as entièrement raison, très cher ami, de voir dans le poème le nœud de la question en ce qui concerne Berlioz, et mon opinion là-dessus rejoint tout à fait la tienne. Tu es seulement mal informé quand tu crois que Berlioz a entrepris une révision de son " Cellini ". Ce n'est pas le cas : il s'agit seulement d'une coupure assez importante (environ un tableau entier), que j'ai proposée à Berlioz et qui lui a paru bonne. En conséquence, la prochaine représentation de " Cellini " comprendra 3 au lieu de 4 tableaux. Si cela t'intéresse, je t'enverrai le nouveau livret avec l'ancien, et je pense que tu approuveras le changement et la fonte des 2 derniers tableaux en un seul. Je te remercie bien vivement de ta proposition d'offrir " Wiland " à Berlioz, et je lui en parlerai à l'occasion de son séjour à Weimar. Il est malheureusement à craindre que les Parisiens ne marcheront pas, et Henri Blaze n'est absolument pas l'homme pour retravailler ce poème et lui faire justice. Mais surtout, très cher et meilleur ami, ne va pas supposer que je te fais grief de ce que tu as pu dire sur tel ou tel. Ma sympathie pour toi et mon admiration pour ton génie divin sont vraiment trop profondes et sincères pour que je me méprenne sur la force de tes arguments. Tu ne peux et ne dois être autre chose que ce que tu es, et c'est dans cet esprit que je t'honore, te comprends et t'aime de toute mon âme. »

1853

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1620 ; fin juillet, Paris) :

« Je suis persuadé comme toi de la facilité de l'engrenage entre Wagner et moi si, toutefois, il met un peu d'huile dans ses roues. Quant aux quelques lignes dont tu parles, je ne les ai jamais lues, je n'en ai pas le moindre ressentiment ; et j'ai assez tiré moi-même de coups de pistolets dans les jambes des gens qui marchent, pour ne pas m'étonner de recevoir quelques chevrotines à mon tour. »

Wagner à Liszt, 25 août (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 123) :

« Salue Berlioz : c'est un drôle d'excentrique, mais il n'en est pas encore au point où seuls les millionnaires peuvent lui porter secours. Mais c'est un digne homme. »

Wagner à Liszt, 12 septembre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 124) :

« À présent, la perspective de Paris ne me sourit pas ; Berlioz me fait peur et, avec mon mauvais français, je suis perdu. »

Liszt à Wagner, 31 octobre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 135) :

« Tout le reste (tout sauf les œuvres de Wagner exécutées à Weimar) me laisse tout à fait froid, avec la seule exception du " Cellini " de Berlioz, pour lequel j'ai toujours une grande prédilection ; quand tu connaîtras mieux l'œuvre, tu me donneras raison. »

1854

Liszt à Wagner, 21 février (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 145):

« Fin mars, Berlioz vient de nouveau à Hanovre et va ensuite à Dresde, où il va diriger quelques concerts au théâtre. Fischer m'a écrit récemment à propos d'une représentation de " Cellini ", à Dresde. C'est encore un secret mais que, pour ma part, je voudrais rendre public très bientôt. Cet Opéra est l'œuvre la plus fraîche et la plus complète de

Berlioz, et sa chute à Paris et à Londres le résultat de coups bas et d'incompréhension. Il serait beau de pouvoir lui offrir la revanche éclatante qu'il mérite. »

1855

Berlioz à Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 1972 ; 2 juin, Paris) :

« Je pars vendredi pour Londres où je suis engagé pour diriger les 2 derniers concerts de la “ New Philharmonic Society ”, et “ Harold ” et “ Roméo et Juliette ”. Après quoi, je reviendrai ; et, peut-être, donnerai-je ici, en juillet ou en août, 1 ou 2 concerts. Wagner qui dirige à Londres l'ancienne Société Philharmonique (direction que j'avais été obligé de refuser étant déjà engagé par l'autre) succombe sous les attaques de toute la presse anglaise. Mais il reste calme, dit-on, assuré qu'il est d'être le Maître du monde musical dans 50 ans. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1975 ; 7 juin, Paris) :

« Je verrai Wagner en arrivant à Londres ; on le dit de fort méchante humeur. Je te dirai ce que je croirai vrai au sujet de sa position en Angleterre. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1987 ; 24-25 juin, Londres) :

« Nous avons beaucoup parlé de toi avec Wagner, ces jours-ci, et tu peux penser avec quelle affection, car, ma parole d'honneur, je crois qu'il t'aime autant que je t'aime moi-même.

Il te racontera sans doute son séjour à Londres et tout ce qu'il a eu à souffrir d'une hostilité de parti-pris. Il est superbe d'ardeur, de chaleur, de cœur, et j'avoue que ses violences même me transportent. Il semble qu'une fatalité m'empêche d'entendre rien de ses dernières compositions ! Le jour où, sur la demande du Prince Albert, il a dirigé son Ouverture du “ Tannhäuser ” au “ Hanovre Square Room ”, j'étais, à la même heure, forcé d'assister à une affreuse répétition de chœurs pour le concert de la “ New Philharmonic ” que j'avais à diriger 2 jours après. Il s'agissait des chœurs des 4 premières parties de “ Roméo ” : et cela était si prodigieusement exécrable que j'ai dû, malgré l'avis du Docteur Wilde qui trouvait le tout très bien chanté, couper court à ces horreurs en supprimant entièrement le chant. Malgré quelques absences réelles dans l'orchestre, les 2 lers morceaux de “ Roméo ” ont bien marché. La Fête a même été rendue avec une telle verve que, pour la 1re fois depuis que cette Symphonie existe, elle a été bissée à grands “ Hurras ” par tout ce vaste auditoire d' “ Exeter Hall ”. Il y a eu beaucoup de fautes dans le Scherzo.

Je reste à Londres quelques jours de plus, à cause d'un concert qu'on me propose de diriger à “ Covent Garden ”, après notre dernier du Philharmonique.

Wagner finit demain, Lundi, avec ceux de “ Hanovre Square ”, et se hâtera de partir le lendemain. Nous dîmons ensemble avant son concert. Il y a chez lui quelque chose de singulièrement attractif et si nous avons des aspérités tous les 2, au moins, nos aspérités s'emboîtent. Explique cela à Cornelius.

Adieu, on vient me chercher pour aller à “ Champion Hill ”, où j’ai promis de passer une partie de la journée.

Lundi matin. Je reviens de mon excursion agreste. C’est-à-dire j’en suis revenu hier soir. Klindworth y était, il a joué un délicieux et mélancolique morceau de toi ; puis, nous avons chanté lui, les 2 filles à la maison, un jeune peintre allemand et moi, des morceaux à 5 voix de Purcell que ces dames paraissent connaître comme leur Bible, et qui nous ont médiocrement charmés Klindworth et moi. Les autres buvaient cela comme du lait sucré. Au demeurant, il y a un sentiment musical au fond de ces organisations anglaises, mais c’est un sentiment conservateur, religieux avant tout, et anti-passionné. Wagner s’est perdu dans l’esprit du public de Londres en paraissant faire peu de cas de Mendelssohn. Or, Mendelssohn, pour beaucoup de gens, est un Händel et demi !!! D’un autre côté, si je n’avais le même défaut pour d’autres Maîtres que j’exècre avec une violence de canon de 120, je dirais que Wagner a tort de ne pas considérer comme une riche et belle individualité le puritain Mendelssohn.

Quand un Maître est un maître, et quand ce Maître a toujours et partout honoré et respecté l’art, il faut l’honorer et le respecter aussi, quelle que soit la divergence existant entre la ligne que nous suivons et celle qu’il a suivie. Wagner pourrait me rétorquer l’argument s’il savait qui j’abomine si cordialement ; mais je me garderai de lui dire. Quand j’entends ou je lis certains morceaux de ce gros Maître [Berlioz veut sans doute dire Händel] , je me contente de serrer fortement les dents, jusqu’à ce que, rentré chez moi et seul, je me dégonfle en l’accablant d’imprécations.

On n’est pas parfait. »

Berlioz à Théodore Ritter (Correspondance Générale, n° 1991 ; 3 juillet, Londres) :

« Départ de Wagner après que le brave Monsieur Hogarth l’a présenté à son tour à Monsieur Meyerbeer, en demandant à ces 2 illustres s’ils se connaissaient, joie de Wagner de quitter Londres, recrudescence de fureur contre lui parmi tous les critiques après le dernier concert de “ Hanovre Square ”, il conduit en effet en style libre comme Klindworth joue du piano, mais il est très attachant par ses idées et sa conversation, nous allons boire du punch chez lui après le concert, il me renouvelle ses amitiés, il m’embrasse avec fureur, disant qu’il avait eu sur moi une foule de préjugés, il pleure, il trépigne, à peine est-il parti que le “ Musical World ” publie le passage de son livre où il m’éreinte de la façon la plus comique et la plus spirituelle, joie délirante de Davison en me traduisant cela, LE MONDE EST UN THÉÂTRE, c’est Shakespeare et Cervantès qui l’ont dit. »

Wagner à Liszt, 5 juillet (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 187) :

« Je rapporte d’Angleterre un véritable profit : une amitié chaleureuse et profonde que j’ai conçue pour Berlioz et qui nous lie tous les 2. J’ai entendu un concert de la “ New Philharmonic Society ” sous sa direction, et je dois avouer avoir été peu impressionné par son interprétation de la Symphonie en sol mineur de Mozart ; quant à l’exécution de sa Symphonie “ Roméo et Juliette ”, fort médiocre, elle m’a fait pitié. Mais quelques jours plus tard, nous étions seuls à dîner ensemble chez Sainton : il était en pleine forme, et les progrès en français que j’ai faits à Londres m’ont permis d’avoir, pendant 5 heures, une conversation du plus haut intérêt avec lui sur toutes questions se rapportant à l'art, la philosophie et la vie. J'ai ainsi conçu une sympathie profonde pour mon nouvel ami ; il me parut tout autre qu'auparavant ; nous avons chacun reconnu dans l'autre un compagnon d'infortune et je me trouvai plus heureux que Berlioz. Après mon dernier concert, il est encore venu me rendre visite avec le peu d'amis que me restent à Londres ; sa femme y était aussi ; nous sommes restés jusqu'à 3 heures du matin, et avons pris congé avec de chaleureuses embrassades. Je lui ai dit, à cette occasion, que tu voulais me rendre visite en septembre, et je l'ai invité à te donner rendez-vous chez moi ; ce qui semblait le gêner était surtout la question d'argent. Mais dis-lui exactement quand tu viens. »

Liszt à Wagner, 10 juillet (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 188) :

« En attendant, je suis enchanté de la cordialité de tes rapports avec Berlioz. Parmi tous les compositeurs contemporains, je le considère comme celui avec lequel tu peux avoir les rapports les plus directs, les plus ouverts et intéressants. Tout compte fait, c'est un homme d'honneur, une personnalité magnifique et forte ; en même temps que ta lettre, j'en reçois une de Berlioz dans laquelle il me dit, entre autres choses, ceci : [Liszt transcrit une partie de la lettre Correspondance Générale, n° 1987] »

Wagner à Liszt, début septembre (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 192) :

« Ton article sur la Symphonie " Harold " est très beau et m'a fait grand plaisir. Je vais écrire demain à Berlioz ; il doit m'envoyer ses partitions. Mais jamais il ne me connaîtra bien ; son ignorance de l'allemand y fait obstacle, et il ne peut voir de moi qu'un profil trompeur. Je ferai donc un usage honorable de mon privilège et je chercherai à le rapprocher de moi. »

Berlioz à Wagner à Zürich (Correspondance Générale, n° 2014 ; 10 septembre, Paris) :

« Votre lettre m'a fait un bien grand plaisir. Vous n'avez pas tort de déplorer mon ignorance de la langue allemande, et ce que vous me dites de l'impossibilité où je suis d'apprécier vos ouvrages, je me le suis dit bien des fois. La fleur de l'expression se fane presque toujours sous le poids de la traduction, si délicatement que cette traduction soit faite. Il y a des accents, dans la musique vraie, qui veulent leur mot spécial, il y a des mots qui veulent leur accent. Séparer les uns des autres, ou leur donner des approximations, c'est faire allaiter un petit chien par une chèvre et réciproquement. Mais que voulez-vous ! J'ai une difficulté diabolique à apprendre les langues ; c'est à peine si je sais quelques mots d'anglais et d'italien.

Vous êtes donc en train de faire fondre les glaciers en composant vos " Niebelungen " ! Cela doit être superbe d'écrire en présence de la grande nature ! Voilà encore une puissance qui m'est refusée ! Les beaux paysages, les hautes cimes, les grands aspects de la mer, m'absorbent complètement au lieu de provoquer chez moi la manifestation de la pensée. Je sens alors et je ne saurais exprimer. Je ne puis dessiner la lune qu'en regardant son image au fond d'un puits.

Je voudrais bien vous envoyer les partitions que vous me faites le plaisir de me demander ; malheureusement, mes éditeurs ne m'en donnent plus depuis longtemps. Mais il y en a 2 et même 3 : le " Te Deum ", " l'Enfance du Christ " et " Léléo " (monodrame lyrique) , qui vont paraître dans peu de semaines, et celles-là au moins, je pourrai vous les envoyer.

J'ai votre " Lohengrin " ; si vous pouviez me faire parvenir le " Tannhäuser ", vous me feriez bien plaisir. La réunion que vous me proposez serait une fête ; mais je dois bien me garder d'y penser. Il faut que je fasse des voyages de désagrément, pour gagner ma vie, Paris ne produisant pour moi que des fruits pleins de cendre.

C'est égal, si nous vivions encore une centaine d'années, je crois que nous aurions raison de bien des choses et de bien des hommes. »

Berlioz à Théodore Ritter (Correspondance Générale, n° 2059 ; 6 décembre, Paris) :

« Où diable avez-vous pris cette invention ? Rien ne pouvait vous induire en erreur dans la partition ; les cors en ré font ce qui en tout pays fait, et en tout temps fit ré naturel ; je ne réponds pas de l'avenir. Peut-être que, dans " la musique de l'avenir ", cette note-là fera ré dièse, à cause de la tendance ascendante de l'art. Mais, à cette heure, de par tous les cinq cent mille diables ! »

1856

Berlioz à Henri Litolf (Correspondance Générale, n° 2143 ; 24 juin, Paris) :

« Je vous dirai, ce que vous savez déjà peut-être, que je viens d'être élu membre de l'Institut. Faites le savoir à Griepenkerl, quand vous le verrez. Cela fait à Paris grande sensation. C'est une espèce de révolution ou de coup d'état en faveur de la jeune musique, qui n'a pas grands rapports avec " la musique de l'avenir ", mais qui pourtant n'en a pas beaucoup non plus avec la musique du passé. Toutes ces dénominations, ces catégories, sont de véritables charges, à parler sérieusement. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2163 ; 12 août, Bade) :

« Ce qu'il y a d'immensément difficile là-dedans, c'est de trouver la forme musicale, cette forme sans laquelle la musique n'existe pas, ou n'est plus que l'esclave humiliée de la parole. C'est là le crime de Wagner ; il veut la détrôner, la réduire à des accents expressifs, en exagérant le système de Gluck (qui, fort heureusement, n'a pas réussi lui-même à suivre sa théorie impie) . Je suis pour la musique, appelée par vous-même, libre. Oui, libre et fière et souveraine et conquérante, je veux qu'elle prenne tout, qu'elle s'assimile tout, qu'il n'y ait plus pour elle ni Alpes, ni Pyrénées ; mais, pour ses conquêtes, il faut qu'elle combatte en personne et non par ses lieutenants, je veux bien qu'elle ait, s'il se peut, de bons vers rangés en bataille, mais il faut qu'elle aille elle-même au feu comme Napoléon, qu'elle marche au 1er rang de la Phalange comme Alexandre. Elle est si puissante qu'elle vaincrait seule, en certain cas, et qu'elle a eu mille fois le droit de dire comme Médée : " Moi ! c'est assez ! " . Vouloir la ramener à la vieille récitation du Chœur Antique est la plus incroyable et, fort heureusement, la plus inutile folie qu'on puisse citer dans l'histoire de l'art.

Trouver le moyen d'être expressif, vrai, sans cesser d'être musicien, et donner, tout au contraire, des moyens nouveaux d'action à la musique, voilà le problème. »

1858

Wagner à Hans von Bülow (Richard Wagner. « Sämtliche Briefe » , tome IX : lettre n° 118 ; 10 février, Zürich ; voir aussi la lettre n° 117, à la princesse Marie von Sayn-Wittgenstein) :

« Il ne faut jamais rien écrire en réponse à une commande, même quand celle-ci émane de la Comtesse Wittgenstein. Je l'ai constaté une fois de plus avec le malheureux livret de Berlioz [pour " les Troyens "]. J'ai été saisi d'horreur quand il me l'a lu, et j'en suis à souhaiter de ne jamais me retrouver face à face avec Berlioz. Je ne peux plus continuer à tromper le monde et moi-même pour maintenir Berlioz dans ses illusions sur moi et sur lui-même. Le voir assis là, ruminant sur le destin de cette absurdité sans nom, comme si le salut du monde et de son âme en dépendait, pour moi, c'est trop fort. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 2274.

1860

Wagner à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2468 ; 21 janvier, Paris) :

« Je suis ravi de vous pouvoir offrir le 1er exemplaire de mon " Tristan ". Acceptez-le et gardez-le d'amitié pour moi.

(Dédicace sur la partition) " Au cher et grand auteur de ' Roméo et Juliette ', l'auteur reconnaissant de ' Tristan et Yseult '. »

Berlioz à Adolphe Samuel (Correspondance Générale, n° 2472 ; 29 janvier, Paris) :

« Wagner vient de donner un concert qui a exaspéré les 3 quarts de l'auditoire, et enthousiasmé le 4e quart. Moi, j'y ai souffert beaucoup, en admirant la véhémence de son sentiment musical dans certains cas. Mais les 7es diminuées, les discordances, les modulations sauvages, m'ont donné la fièvre et, décidément, ce genre de musique m'est odieux, il me révolte. »

Berlioz à Wagner (Correspondance Générale, n° 2476 ; 2 février, Paris) :

« Je suis en effet toujours malade, mais ce n'est pas la raison qui m'a empêché d'assister à votre second concert ; c'est encore moins un défaut d'intérêt pour vos compositions, croyez-le bien. Mais ma soirée était impérieusement prise et j'ai dû donner vos billets à 2 dames, excellentes musiciennes, qui désiraient vivement vous entendre. Je n'ai pu encore écrire mon feuilleton, mais je m'y mettrai prochainement et je vous dirai sincèrement toutes mes pensées et mes impressions. »

Berlioz à Pauline Viardot (Correspondance Générale, n° 2480 ; 10 février) :

« Voici vos partitions de Wagner ; je vous remercie. J'ai peur que les 7es diminuées qu'elles contiennent ne s'échappent et ne rongent mes meubles. Prenez garde aux vôtres. J'aurai bien besoin de vous parler, au sujet de bien des choses ; je suis cruellement tourmenté de ne le pouvoir pas. »

Wagner à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2481 ; lettre ouverte publiée dans le « Journal des Débats » du 22 février) :

« Lorsqu'il y a 5 ans, à Londres, la destinée nous rapprocha, je me vantais d'avoir sur vous un avantage, celui de comprendre parfaitement et d'apprécier vos œuvres, tandis que vous ne pouviez vous rendre qu'un compte imparfait des miennes, ne connaissant pas la langue allemande, à laquelle mes conceptions dramatiques sont liées par une si étroite connexité.

Ce ne sont ni des vues ambitieuses, ni des espérances de lucre qui m'ont décidé à demander à la France l'hospitalité pour mes ouvrages. J'ai été guidé par le seul espoir d'arriver à faire représenter ici mes drames lyriques avec paroles françaises, et si le public veut bien accorder un peu de sympathie à celui qui est obligé de prendre tant de peine pour parvenir à entendre enfin ses propres créations, j'aurai, je n'en doute pas, mon cher Berlioz, la satisfaction d'être compris de vous.

Apprenez donc, mon cher Berlioz, que l'inventeur de “ la musique de l'avenir ”, ce n'est pas moi mais bien Monsieur Bischoff, professeur à Cologne (ami de Ferdinand Hiller et que vous vous rappellerez avoir connu comme ami de Rossini) . L'occasion qui donna le jour à cette creuse expression fut la publication faite par moi, il y a une dizaine d'années, d'un livre sous ce titre : “ L'Œuvre d'art de l'avenir ” (suit un long résumé de l'argument du livre) .

J'espère que bientôt l'un et l'autre, dans des conditions tout à fait égales, nous pourrons nous comprendre réciproquement. Laissez cette France si hospitalière donner un asile à mes drames lyriques ; j'attends de mon côté, avec la plus vive impatience, la représentation de vos “ Troyens ”. »

Berlioz à Charles Hallé à Manchester (Correspondance Générale, n° 2492 ; 4 avril, Paris) :

« Je n'ai pas, que je sache, été attaqué par Wagner, il a seulement répondu à mon article des “ Débats ” par une lettre prétendue explicative à laquelle personne n'a rien compris. Cette lettre amphigourique et boursouflée [Correspondance Générale, n° 2481] lui a fait plus de tort que de bien. Je n'ai pas répliqué un mot. »

Wagner à Paris à Liszt, 22 mai (« Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 tomes, Leipzig, 1910 : lettre n° 301a) :

« J'ai ensuite lu le dernier feuilleton de Berlioz sur " Fidelio ", paru aujourd'hui. Depuis mon concert, je n'avais pas revu Berlioz ; auparavant, c'était toujours à moi de lui rendre visite ou de l'inviter - mais lui ne s'inquiétait jamais de moi. Cela me causait une grande tristesse : je ne lui étais pas hostile, mais je me demande seulement si le bon Dieu n'aurait pas dû omettre les femmes de sa création. Il est très rare qu'elles fassent quelque bien et, d'ordinaire, elles nous font du tort, sans pour finir en tirer aucun profit elles-mêmes. Avec Berlioz, j'ai pu étudier une fois de plus avec la précision d'un anatomiste comment une méchante femme peut ruiner à volonté un homme absolument hors pair et le rendre tout à fait ridicule. Quelle satisfaction peut un tel homme trouver à se voir traiter de la sorte ? Sans doute, la triste satisfaction de voir la pire partie de son être étalée au grand jour ! Comme je le disais, je n'avais pas vu Berlioz depuis ce jour. J'ai lu alors son article, aujourd'hui. Cela m'a fait tellement plaisir que je lui ai écrit le billet suivant dans mon affreux français, dans la certitude que cela n'aurait pour résultat qu'une gigantesque incompréhension de sa part :

Cher Maître ! (Je sais qu'il trouve maintenant mon ton familier, gênant.) Je viens de lire votre article sur " Fidelio ". Soyez en mille fois remercié ! C'est une joie toute spéciale pour moi d'entendre ces accents purs et nobles de l'expression d'une âme, d'une intelligence si parfaitement comprenant et s'appropriant les secrets les plus intimes d'un autre héros de l'art : il y a des moments, où, je suis presque plus transporté en apprenant cet acte d'appréciation, que par l'œuvre appréciée elle-même, puisque cela nous témoigne infailliblement qu'une chaîne, ininterrompue d'intime parenté rallie entre eux les grands esprits, qui (par ce seul lien) ne tomberont jamais dans l'incompris. Si je m'exprime mal, j'espère pourtant, que vous me ne comprendrez pas mal. [Correspondance Générale, n° 2503.]

Dieu sait comment il prendra ce galimatias. S'il ne veut pas me comprendre cette fois-ci, je crains que mon français ne lui ait donné au moins une bonne raison. Néanmoins, d'avoir envoyé ces lignes au malheureux m'a rempli d'une chaleur particulière. L'article de Berlioz sur " Fidelio " m'a démontré clairement, une fois de plus, que le malheureux reste isolé ; il est si délicat et sensible que le monde ne peut que le blesser et abuser de son irritabilité pour le mener, lui et ceux autour qui l'influencent, dans d'étranges errements. Il devient tellement étranger à sa nature qu'il se mutile sans même s'en rendre compte. Mais c'est précisément par cet étrange phénomène que j'ai compris qu'un homme hautement doué a besoin d'un ami tout aussi doué qui puisse le comprendre. Cela m'a amené à la conclusion qu'à présent nous sommes les 3 seuls à appartenir vraiment les uns les autres, parce que nous seuls sommes égaux, et j'entends par là : toi - lui - et moi ! Mais, à aucun prix, il ne faut le lui dire : il résiste quand il entend cela. Un dieu qui se frappe ainsi n'est qu'un pauvre diable ! »

Berlioz à Wagner (Correspondance Générale, n° 2504 ; 23 mai, Paris) :

« Je suis tout à fait heureux que mes articles sur " Fidelio " vous aient plu. Je les avais étudiés avec soin, mais sans espoir qu'ils fussent le moins du monde utiles. Je ne crois plus guère à l'éducation du public par la critique ; ou, du moins, je crois qu'un très long temps est nécessaire pour que la critique porte ses fruits. Je ne sais pas si vous avez des illusions, quant à moi, je vois depuis bien des années les choses telles qu'elles sont. Vous êtes au moins plein d'ardeur, prêt à la lutte ; je ne suis, moi, prêt qu'à dormir et à mourir. Pourtant, une espèce de joie fébrile m'agite encore un peu, si, quand je crie d'amour pour le beau, une voix me répond au loin et me fait entendre au travers des rumeurs vulgaires son salut approbateur et amical. Merci donc pour votre lettre ; elle m'a fait du bien. Je vous croyais encore en Belgique. Depuis que nous nous sommes vus, j'ai été bien malade, bien triste, bien tourmenté de mille manières. Pourquoi, en m'écrivant, me dites-vous : " Cher Maître ", comme les gens cérémonieux ? Entre nous, cela ne va pas. »

1861

Berlioz à son fils, Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 2534 ; 14 février, Paris) :

« L'opinion publique s'indigne de plus en plus de me voir laissé en dehors de l'Opéra quand la protection de l'ambassadrice d'Autriche y fait entrer si aisément Wagner. »

Berlioz à J.-A. Demeur (Correspondance Générale, n° 2535 ; 19 février, Paris) :

« Nous sommes tous malades ici, on me tue de vilénies de toute espèce ; et nous allons avoir le " Tannhäuser " et une banque dont jamais on n'avait vu d'exemple. Mais j'ai pris mon parti, je leur ferai la guerre du silence. Mon malheureux ami d'Ortigue se dévouera pour parler de la chose. Ils ne s'attendent pas à cette Jarnacade. »

Berlioz à Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 2536 ; 21 février, Paris) :

« Wagner fait tourner en chèbres les chanteuses, les chanteurs et l'orchestre et le chœur de l'Opéra. On ne peut pas sortir de cette musique du " Tannhäuser ". La dernière répétition générale a été, dit-on, atroce et n'a fini qu'à une heure du matin. Il faut pourtant qu'on en vienne à bout. Liszt va arriver pour soutenir " l'école du charivari ". Je ne ferai pas l'article sur le " Tannhäuser ", j'ai prié d'Ortigue de s'en charger. Cela vaut mieux sous tous les rapports et cela les désappoindra davantage. Jamais je n'eus tant de moulins à vent à combattre que cette année ; je suis entouré de fous de toute espèce. Il y a des instants où la colère me suffoque. »

Berlioz à Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 2538 ; 5 mars, Paris) :

« On est très ému dans notre monde musical du scandale que va produire la représentation du " Tannhäuser " ; je ne vois que des gens furieux ; le Ministre est sorti l'autre jour de la répétition dans un état de colère ! L'Empereur n'est pas content ; et, pourtant, il y a quelques enthousiastes de bonne foi, même parmi les Français. Wagner est évidemment fou. Il mourra comme Jullien est mort, l'an dernier, d'un transport au cerveau. Liszt n'est pas venu, il ne sera pas à la Ire représentation ; il semble pressentir une catastrophe. Il y a pour cet Opéra en 3 actes, 160,000 francs de dépensés à l'heure qu'il est. Enfin, c'est vendredi que nous verrons cela. »

Comme je te l'ai dit, je ne ferai pas l'article là-dessus, je le laisse faire par d'Ortigue. Je veux protester par mon silence, quitte à me prononcer plus tard si l'on m'y pousse. »

Berlioz à Madame Massart (Correspondance Générale, n° 2542 ; 14 mars, Paris) :

« Eh ! oui, parbleu ! à ce soir donc !

Ah ! Dieu du ciel, quelle représentation ! quels éclats de rire ! Le Parisien s'est montré hier sous un jour tout nouveau ; il a ri du mauvais style musical, il a ri des polissonneries d'une orchestration bouffonne, il a ri des naïvetés d'un hautbois ; enfin, il comprend donc qu'il y a un style en musique.

Quant aux horreurs, on les a sifflées splendidement.

Tâchez donc de ne jamais mieux jouer que la dernière fois ; si vous continuez à faire des progrès, vous tomberez dans " le puits de l'avenir ".

La perfection suffit. »

Berlioz à Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 2545 ; 21 mars, Paris) :

« La 2e représentation du " Tannhäuser " a été pire que la 1re. On ne riait plus autant ; on était furieux, on sifflait à tout rompre, malgré la présence de l'Empereur et de l'Impératrice qui étaient dans leur loge. L'Empereur s'amuse. En sortant, sur l'escalier, on traitait tout haut ce malheureux Wagner de gremlin, d'insolent, d'idiot. Si l'on continue, un de ces jours, la représentation ne s'achèvera pas et tout sera dit. La presse est unanime pour l'exterminer. Pour moi, je suis cruellement vengé. »

1863

Berlioz à Hippolyte Lecourt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2708 ; 7 avril, de Weimar) :

« J'ai vu hier une représentation de " Tannhäuser ", Madame Milde est la personnification idéalisée de l'Elisabeth, je la trouve admirable et adorable avec sa beauté de colombe. Il y a de bien belles choses dans le dernier acte, surtout ; c'est d'une tristesse profonde mais d'un grand caractère ; pourquoi faut-il ? etc. , etc. , il y aurait trop à dire. »

Berlioz à Ferdinand Hiller (Correspondance Générale, n° 2750 ; 8 juillet, Paris) :

« Votre ouvrage est écrit dans ce style clair et ferme que je vous félicite d'avoir conservé au milieu des tendances charivariques qui se manifestent depuis si longtemps parmi les nouveaux compositeurs allemands. »

1864

Berlioz à Toussaint Bennet (Correspondance Générale, n° 2843 ; 15 mars, Paris) :

« La folie de Wagner se dessine donc de plus en plus ? Il y a longtemps qu'on aurait dû le prévoir. Il finira comme

Schumann et comme Jullien. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 2920.

1868

Vladimir Stasov à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 3375 ; 5-17 octobre, de Saint-Pétersbourg) :

« Ce soir, on donne, pour la Ire fois à l'Opéra russe, le " Lohengrin " de Wagner, et il est possible qu'il y aura une partie du public qui trouvera cette musique brutale et dépourvue de talent - à son goût. Tant pis qui le trouveront ainsi. Quant à nous tous, nous ne croyons pas que Wagner soit un " prophète de l'avenir " : nous pensons qu'il a fait seulement rétrograder la musique de Weber. Nous trouvons dans Wagner un manque total de mesure et de goût, un tas de choses banales, une instrumentation surchargée et criarde, nul talent pour le récitatif, et des modulations outrées qui font enrager à tout moment. Cependant, le prestige d'une célébrité allemande, le nom d' " avenir " attaché à cette musique, l'éclat des décors et des costumes produiront peut-être leur effet sur un public peu développé et seront la cause d'un engouement quelconque. Cela ne nous regarde pas : nous avons les yeux tournés vers le beau et le grand véritables, tels que nous les trouvons dans vos œuvres, nous ne songeons qu'à les connaître et à les apprécier dans toute leur étendue et en même temps. »

Wagner sur Berlioz : extraits de « Mein Leben »

Le texte utilisé est celui de l'édition de 1911.

« Mein Leben » , Band I ; pages 229-231 (sur le 1er séjour de Wagner à Paris, en 1839-1842) :

« Avec une suite à cette nouvelle, sous le titre : " Un musicien étranger à Paris ", je me vengeai de toutes les humiliations que j'avais dû souffrir. Elle plut beaucoup moins à Schlesinger [éditeur, Rue de Richelieu] , mais attira des marques touchantes d'approbation de la part de son pauvre commis, et de Heinrich Heine cet éloge : " Hoffmann n'aurait pu écrire rien de pareil. " Même Berlioz en fut touché, et il fit mention de ma nouvelle dans un de ses feuilletons du " Journal des Débats ". [Note : Berlioz mentionne un article antérieur de Wagner, " Une visite à Beethoven ", mais pas celui-ci ; voir " Critique Musicale ", tome IV ; page 402.] Un autre de mes articles sur l'esthétique musicale, " De l'Ouverture ", m'attira son approbation, tout au moins verbale, surtout parce qu'en expliquant mes principes pour ce genre de composition j'avais donné en exemple l'Ouverture à " Iphigénie en Aulide " de Gluck.

Ces marques d'approbation m'encouragèrent à essayer de me rapprocher de Berlioz. J'avais déjà été présenté à lui depuis quelque temps au bureau de Schlesinger où, depuis lors, je le rencontrais assez souvent. Je lui avais offert un exemplaire de mes " 2 grenadiers ", mais je n'avais pu tirer de lui d'autre réaction qu'il ne jouait qu'un peu de guitare mais ne savait pas jouer du piano. Mais, d'un autre côté, ses grandes compositions instrumentales, que j'avais entendues plusieurs fois sous sa direction, l'hiver précédent, avaient fait sur moi une impression peu commune. Cet hiver-là (1839-1840), il donna pour la 1^{re} fois 3 exécutions de sa Symphonie “ Roméo et Juliette ” dont j’assistai à une. Ce fut pour moi un monde nouveau et, encore sous le choc que j’avais reçu, je voulus me faire une opinion tout à fait objective de l’œuvre. La puissance et la virtuosité de l’orchestre étaient, pour moi, quelque chose d’inouï et, tout d’abord, je fus complètement stupéfait. La hardiesse fantastique, la précision aigüe, l’audace des combinaisons que l’on pouvait presque toucher du doigt, tout cela fit sur moi une telle impression que mes propres conceptions du sentiment musical et poétique furent brutalement refoulées au fond de mon être. J’étais tout oreilles pour des choses dont je n’avais jusqu’alors eu absolument aucune idée, et je devais me les expliquer. Par contre, de nombreux passages de “ Roméo et Juliette ” m’avaient paru maintes et maintes fois vides et sans objet, et l’ouvrage souffrait gravement, il faut le dire, de ses longueurs et de son plan d’ensemble. J’en étais d’autant plus peiné que, d’un autre côté, tous les grands moments de la partition m’écrasaient au point que j’en perdais la possibilité d’émettre un jugement critique. Après cette nouvelle Symphonie, Berlioz fit entendre de nouveau sa “ Symphonie fantastique ” et “ Harold en Italie ”. J’avais été particulièrement saisi et fasciné par les tableaux qui constituent la trame de “ la Symphonie fantastique ” et presque complètement séduit par “ Harold ”. Mais ce fut la dernière composition de ce Maître merveilleux, sa “ Symphonie funèbre pour les victimes de la Révolution de Juillet ”, qu’il fit exécuter à l’été de 1840 pour la cérémonie du transfert des restes des victimes sous la colonne de la Bastille (œuvre d’une puissante imagination pour grande harmonie militaire) qui me convainquit pleinement de la grandeur et de la force de cette nature d’artiste, incomparable et unique en son genre. Et cependant, malgré cette impression d’ensemble, je ne pouvais m’empêcher d’éprouver un profond sentiment de malaise. J’étais comme effrayé par quelque chose d’étranger que je ne pourrais jamais comprendre entièrement. Chaque fois que j’entendais une des œuvres principales de Berlioz, j’étais surpris d’être à la fois séduit et rebuté et, parfois même, franchement ennuyé. Le problème de Berlioz me troubla pendant des années et ce n’est que plus tard que je parvins à me l’expliquer clairement et à en trouver la solution.

Ce qui est certain, c’est qu’à cette époque je me sentais petit comme un écolier à côté de Berlioz ; et je fus donc réellement embarrassé quand Schlesinger, voulant tirer profit pour moi du succès de ma nouvelle, m’invita à faire exécuter quelque œuvre pour orchestre dans un grand concert qui serait organisé par la “ Gazette musicale ”. (Wagner décide de jouer son Ouverture de “ Colomb ”, mais les répétitions vont assez mal.) Berlioz, qui assistait à cette répétition, resta tout le temps silencieux, s’abstenant de m’encourager ou de me décourager, et se contenta de sourire en soupirant que “ c’était difficile à Paris ”. »

Voir aussi les lettres Richard Wagner. « Sämtliche Briefe », tome I : lettres numéro 139 (Wagner à Ferdinand Heine ; 27 mars 1841) et numéro 189 (Wagner à Robert Schumann ; 5 janvier 1842) .

« Mein Leben », Band I ; page 235 (en 1841, à Paris) :

« Il me sembla que tout ce qui me restait était mon travail de journaliste ; il me rapportait peu, mais m’avait cependant apporté quelque succès. L’hiver précédent, j’avais déjà écrit pour la “ Gazette musicale ” un assez gros article sur le “ Freischütz ” de Weber, qui devait préparer le terrain pour les représentations à venir de cette œuvre à l’Opéra, avec l’addition des récitatifs de Berlioz. Il semble que cet article m’ait d’emblée attiré le déplaisir de Berlioz. Je n’avais pas pu éviter de souligner le défaut de l’entreprise : l’addition de récitatifs à un ouvrage conçu d’après les formes de l’ancien “ Singspiel ” en bouleversait les proportions pour l’adapter aux conventions fastueuses du répertoire de ce théâtre. »

« Mein Leben », Band I ; page 346 (concernant la visite de Spontini à Dresde) :

« Concernant la mort de Spontini, Berlioz, qui ne quittait jamais son chevet, m'a raconté que le Maître avait lutté avec la plus grande énergie contre sa mort, et ne cessait de crier : " Je ne veux pas mourir, je ne veux pas mourir ! " Quand Berlioz, tentant de le consoler, lui dit : " Comment pouvez-vous penser mourir, vous, mon Maître, qui êtes immortel ! " Spontini lui répondit en colère : " Ne faites pas de mauvaises plaisanteries ! " »

« Mein Leben », Band II ; page 597 (sur la rencontre à Paris, en octobre 1853) :

« Ici aussi, on reprit la lecture du poème et, donc, du dernier acte du " Crépuscule des Dieux ", ce qui nous mena à la conclusion tant désirée de toute l'œuvre. Berlioz arriva pendant cette séance et se comporta avec une parfaite amabilité face à cette lecture malencontreuse. Il nous reçut le lendemain matin, au petit déjeuner, pour faire ses adieux ; il venait en effet d'empaqueter sa musique en vue d'une tournée de concerts en Allemagne. À cette occasion, Liszt accompagna au piano des extraits de " Benvenuto Cellini " chantés par Berlioz, dans le style sec qui lui était particulier. »

« Mein Leben », Band II ; pages 616-618 (sur la rencontre à Londres, en juin 1855) :

« Notre petit cercle fut grandement élargi par l'arrivée de Berlioz, qui lui aussi avait été invité à Londres pour diriger 2 concerts, mais par une Société nouvellement établie : la " New Philharmonic Society ". Mais pour donner quelque lustre à ces concerts, on avait comme je l'ai dit invité Berlioz à participer aux manifestations. À cette occasion, je l'entendis diriger plusieurs œuvres de musique Classique, entre autres, une Symphonie de Mozart [n° 40 en sol mineur] et fut surpris d'entendre ce chef, par ailleurs si énergique quand il dirigeait ses propres œuvres, sombrer dans la routine d'un batteur de mesure ordinaire. Quelques unes de ses propres compositions et, en particulier, les fragments les plus frappants de sa Symphonie " Roméo et Juliette ", firent certes encore sur moi une grande impression ; mais les étranges faiblesses qui défigurent même les plus belles créations de ce musicien exceptionnel me parurent maintenant beaucoup plus évidentes qu'auparavant, quand je n'éprouvais de manière générale qu'un sentiment de malaise à la mesure de l'impression que l'œuvre avait faite sur moi.

Par contre, les quelques occasions où Sainton m'invita à dîner chez lui avec Berlioz furent pour moi d'un très grand intérêt. Je me trouvai soudain face à face avec lui - personnage ravagé et déjà beaucoup diminué, mais tout de même un homme prodigieusement doué. Mon voyage à Londres avait pour but un changement d'air et la recherche d'un stimulant extérieur ; je devais, par conséquent, m'estimer très heureux et, pour ainsi dire, planant dans un ciel serein en voyant Berlioz, bien plus âgé que moi, venir ici dans le seul but de gagner quelques guinées. Tout en lui respirait la lassitude et le découragement, et je conçus subitement une profonde sympathie pour cet homme, dont les dons me semblaient tellement évidents et qui dépassaient de haut tous ceux de ses rivaux. Berlioz parut faire bon accueil à la camaraderie spontanée que j'affichai à son égard ; son comportement, d'ordinaire raide et réservé, se dégela visiblement pendant les quelques heures sympathiques passées ensemble. Il me raconta beaucoup d'histoires drôles sur Meyerbeer et l'impossibilité de se dérober à ses flatteries et sa manière sinueuse qui visaient toujours à provoquer des articles favorables. Il avait fait précéder la Ire représentation du " Prophète " par l'habituel " dîner de la veille " ; Berlioz s'en étant excusé, Meyerbeer le lui reprocha doucement et l'invita à redresser ce grave tort en écrivant " un bien joli article " sur son Opéra. Selon Berlioz, il n'était pas possible de faire publier dans la presse parisienne un article critique sur Meyerbeer.

Il me fut par contre plus difficile de m'entendre avec lui sur des questions artistiques plus approfondies. Je retrouvais constamment en lui le Français à l'esprit vif qui s'exprime en certitudes lapidaires, tellement sûr de lui-même qu'il ne se demande jamais s'il aurait même bien compris son interlocuteur. Je cherchais à un moment donné à lui expliquer mon point de vue sur le mystère de la " conception artistique " - je m'étais échauffé et enhardi, surpris par ma soudaine Maîtrise de la langue française. Je cherchais à décrire le pouvoir des impressions de la vie sur nos sentiments qui, pour ainsi dire, nous tiennent captifs, jusqu'au moment où nous parvenons à nous libérer d'elles complètement grâce au développement intérieur de nos plus profondes intuitions spirituelles, qui se réveillent de leur profond sommeil - mais non par l'entremise de ces impressions. En d'autres termes, la création artistique n'est nullement l'effet de ces expériences de la vie, mais bien plutôt une libération de leur emprise. À ce moment, Berlioz sourit et me dit de haut avec condescendance : " Nous appelons cela digérer. " Ma surprise à ce résumé instantané de mes laborieuses explications fut confirmée par le comportement extérieur de mon nouvel ami. Je l'invitai à mon concert d'adieu, et ensuite à un petit dîner d'adieu que je donnais chez moi à mes quelques amis. Il partit tôt dans la soirée en prétextant qu'il ne se sentait pas bien ; mais les amis qui restèrent ne me firent pas mystère du fait qu'ils croyaient que Berlioz avait été froissé par l'accueil enthousiaste que le public venait de me donner. »

« Mein Leben » , Band II ; page 625 (en 1855) :

« Je reçus aussi une lettre charmante de Berlioz qui me fit plaisir ; elle était accompagnée par son nouveau livre " Les Soirées de l'orchestre ". Malgré tout le côté grotesque dans le goût de son auteur qui me rebutait tout autant que dans ses compositions, le lecture du livre me parut cependant d'un grand intérêt. »

« Mein Leben » , Band II ; page 663 (sur la rencontre à Paris, en janvier 1858) :

« Je rendis maintenant visite à Berlioz, le nouvel ami que je m'étais fait à Londres, et je le trouvai en général bien disposé à mon égard. Je lui avais dit que je ne faisais qu'un court séjour à Paris pour me divertir. Il était alors occupé par la composition d'un grand Opéra, " les Troyens " ; pour me faire une idée de l'ouvrage je voulais particulièrement connaître le poème qu'il avait écrit lui-même. Il passa une soirée tout seul à me lire le livret : mon impression fut très mauvaise, tant à cause de la conception du poème que par la surprenante sécheresse et l'affectation théâtrale de sa diction. Je pensais pouvoir y reconnaître le caractère de la musique qu'il avait dû écrire pour son texte, et je fus plongé dans un profond désespoir ; je voyais, en effet, que Berlioz considérait évidemment cet ouvrage comme son chef-d'œuvre et l'exécution qu'il cherchait à réaliser comme le but principal de sa vie. »

« Mein Leben » , Band II ; pages 706-708 (sur les concerts de Wagner à Paris, en 1860) :

« Le plus important semblait maintenant de réunir et d'engager un orchestre de 1er ordre pour mes concerts, et mes 2 agents eurent d'abord les mains pleines. C'est à la suite de leurs efforts à cette occasion que j'eus les 1ers indices d'une hostilité de la part de mon ancien ami Berlioz envers moi et mon entreprise, hostilité dont je ne m'étais pas encore douté.

Toujours plein des bonnes impressions laissées sur moi par ma rencontre avec Berlioz en 1855, à Londres, et qu'il avait entretenu lui-même par une correspondance amicale avec moi pendant quelque temps, je me rendis chez lui tout de suite après mon arrivée. Comme il n'y était pas, je redescendis dans la rue où je le rencontrai rentrant à la maison. Je m'aperçus qu'en me voyant il fut saisi d'un mouvement convulsif qui se reflétait de manière vraiment affreuse dans sa physionomie et dans tout son comportement. Sur le champ, je n'eus aucun doute sur l'état de nos relations, mais je cachai ma propre terreur sous l'expression d'une sollicitude bien naturelle pour sa santé ; il me fit savoir tout de suite qu'elle était bien mauvaise, car il souffrait des attaques violentes d'une névralgie qu'il ne pouvait supporter qu'au moyen d'un traitement par choc électrique, et qu'il revenait à l'instant d'une telle séance. Pour ne pas ajouter à ses souffrances, j'offris de le quitter à l'instant ; il eut tellement honte qu'il insista pour que je remonte avec lui à son appartement. Je parvins à le rassurer un peu en lui révélant la vérité sur mes intentions à Paris : même mon projet d'organiser des concerts n'avait d'autre but que d'attirer l'attention du public sur moi, juste assez pour permettre l'établissement d'un Opéra allemand où je désirais faire représenter mes œuvres, œuvres que je n'avais pas encore entendues moi-même. En contrepartie, je renonçais complètement à l'idée d'une représentation en français de "Tannhäuser", telle que le directeur Carvalho semblait envisager.

À la suite de ces explications, mes rapports avec Berlioz devinrent, pendant quelque temps, non seulement supportables mais, en apparence, tout à fait amicaux. Je pensais donc pouvoir donner à mes agents le conseil, pour l'engagement de musiciens pour les concerts projetés, de faire appel à l'expérience et aux conseils certainement bien avisés de mon ami. Ils me firent savoir que Berlioz, après s'être comporté au départ de manière serviable, changea subitement d'attitude quand, un jour, Madame Berlioz entra dans la chambre pendant qu'ils étaient en train de discuter et s'écria d'un ton surpris et plein de colère : " Comment, je crois que vous donnez des conseils pour les concerts de Monsieur Wagner ? " Au sujet de cette dame Belloni, l'un des agents de Wagner avait découvert que Meyerbeer venait de lui envoyer comme cadeau un bracelet coûteux. " Ne comptez pas sur Berlioz ! " Cet avertissement de mon agent bien renseigné remit toute l'affaire en bon ordre. »

« Mein Leben », Band II ; page 716 (sur le compte-rendu de Berlioz des concerts de Wagner, en 1860) :

« Berlioz souleva une forte indignation avec un article dans le " Journal des Débats " qui, partant de considérations laborieuses et alambiquées, finissait avec des insinuations ouvertement hostiles. Il avait été autrefois mon ami, et je résolus de ne pas laisser passer si facilement son mauvais comportement ; je lui répondis dans une lettre que je fis à grand-peine traduire en bon français et qui fut imprimé après une certaine insistance dans le " Journal des Débats ". Cette lettre semble m'avoir totalement acquis la sympathie de ceux qui avaient été impressionnés par mon concert. »

« Mein Leben », Band II ; page 731 (sur la rencontre chez Madame Viardot, en juillet 1860) :

« Spécialement pour le compte de Madame Kalergis, j'improvisai une écoute du 2e acte de " Tristan " ; Madame Viardot, avec laquelle je me liai d'amitié à cette occasion, devait se charger avec moi des parties vocales, tandis que pour la partie de piano, j'avais fait venir à mes propres frais Klindworth de Londres. Cette étrange exécution privée eut lieu au domicile de Madame Viardot. Outre Madame Kalergis, pour le compte unique de laquelle elle avait lieu, seul Berlioz était présent. Madame Viardot s'était particulièrement employée pour amener ce dernier dans l'intention expresse, semble-t-il, de dissiper les malentendus qui s'étaient élevés entre moi et Berlioz. Quelle impression l'exécution de ces fragments excentriques dans de pareilles circonstances a pu laisser sur les participants et ceux présents ne m'a jamais été clair ; Madame Kalergis resta muette, et le seul compliment que fit Berlioz fut de louer la " chaleur " de mon interprétation. Elle devait en tout cas faire un contraste frappant avec celle de ma partenaire qui chantait presque tout à mi-voix. Klindworth semblait particulièrement outré du résultat ; il s'était, pour sa part, fort bien acquitté de sa tâche mais, quant au comportement de Viardot et de la tiédeur de son interprétation, il se déclara furieux, et supposait que la présence de Berlioz en était la cause. »

Richard Wagner : article sur Berlioz (mai 1841)

Traduction française (par Camille Benoit) publiée dans « Le Ménestrel » du 5 octobre 1884 (pages 257-258) d'un article de Richard Wagner sur Berlioz, paru d'abord en allemand, le 5 mai 1841, dans le « Dresdner Abendzeitung » (disponible en ligne sur le site internet de la Bibliothèque nationale de France) . C'est le 1er texte sur Berlioz publié par Wagner, écrit au cours de son 1er séjour à Paris, de 1839 à 1842.

5 mai 1841

« Je vois bien qu'il me faut enfin parler de Berlioz à tout prix, car je me rends compte que l'occasion favorable ne se présentera pas si tôt.

Déjà, ce fait qu'en vous mentionnant les manifestations quotidiennes de la vie de plaisir de Paris (mettons " de la vie artistique ", si l'on veut) , l'occasion de m'occuper de ce musicien génial ne s'est pas toute seule offerte à moi, ce fait me semble assez caractéristique : j'y trouve une excellente entrée en matière pour mon jugement sur Berlioz, et cet artiste a bien le droit, en tous cas, de revendiquer une place importante toute particulière dans la correspondance que je vous envoie de Paris.

I

Berlioz n'est nullement un compositeur d'occasion, c'est même la raison pour laquelle je n'ai pas eu à m'occuper de lui occasionnellement. Il n'entretient pas de relations, il n'a rien à faire avec ces établissements artistiques de Paris, fastueux et exclusifs, l'Opéra et le Conservatoire, qui, dès le 1er abord, se sont empressés de lui fermer leurs portes en s'étonnant de son audace. On a forcé Berlioz à être et à rester une exception bien tranchée à la grande, à l'éternelle règle, et c'est cela qu'il est et qu'il reste, aussi bien au fond qu'en apparence.

Celui qui veut entendre la musique de Berlioz est obligé de se déranger tout exprès pour cela, et d'aller à lui, sans quoi il n'en trouverait nulle part la moindre trace, pas même aux endroits où l'on rencontre côte à côte Mozart et Musard. On entend les compositions de Berlioz uniquement dans 1 ou 2 concerts qu'il organise lui-même chaque année ; ces concerts restent son domaine exclusif : c'est là qu'il fait exécuter ses œuvres par un orchestre qu'il a formé à son usage tout particulier, devant un public dont il a fait la conquête pendant une campagne de 10 ans. Quant à entendre ailleurs du Berlioz, il faut y renoncer, à moins que ce ne soit dans la rue ou à l'église, où le gouvernement l'appelle de temps en temps à une action politico-musicale.

Cet isolement de Berlioz ne s'étend pas seulement à sa situation extérieure ; c'est avant tout cet isolement qui est le principe de son évolution intellectuelle : si Français qu'il soit, si réelles que soient les sympathies qui unissent son essence, sa tendance à celle de ses concitoyens, il n'en reste pas moins seul. Il ne voit personne devant lui sur qui s'étayer, à ses côtés personne sur qui s'appuyer.

Du fond de notre Allemagne, l'esprit de Beethoven a soufflé sur lui et, certainement, il fut des heures où Berlioz désirait être un Allemand ; c'est en de telles heures que son génie le poussait à écrire à l'imitation du grand Maître, à exprimer cela même qu'il sentait exprimé dans ses œuvres. Mais, dès qu'il saisissait la plume, le bouillonnement naturel de son sang de Français reprenait le dessus, le bouillonnement de ce sang qui frémissait dans les veines d'Auber, lorsqu'il écrivit le volcanique dernier acte de sa " Muette ". Heureux Auber, qui ne connaissait pas les Symphonies de Beethoven ! Berlioz, lui, les connaissait ; bien plus, il les comprenait, elles l'avaient transporté, elles avaient enivré son âme et, néanmoins, c'est par là qu'il lui fut rappelé qu'un sang français coulait dans ses veines. C'est alors qu'il se reconnut incapable de faire un Beethoven, c'est alors aussi qu'il se sentit incapable d'écrire comme un Auber.

Il fut Berlioz, et écrivit sa " Symphonie fantastique ", œuvre dont Beethoven eût souri, tout comme en sourit Auber, mais qui était capable de plonger Paganini dans la plus fiévreuse extase, et de gagner à son auteur un parti qui ne veut plus entendre d'autre musique au monde que la " Symphonie fantastique " de Berlioz.

Celui qui entend cette Symphonie ici, à Paris, doit vraiment croire qu'il entend une chose étrange, inouïe. Une riche, une monstrueuse imagination, une fantaisie d'une énergie épique, vomissent, comme d'un cratère, un torrent bourbeux de passions ; ce qu'on distingue, ce sont des nuages de fumée de proportions colossales, traversés seulement par des éclairs, zébrés par des bandes de feu, et façonnés en fantômes changeants. Tout est excessif, audacieux, mais extrêmement désagréable. Là, il ne faut chercher nulle part la beauté de la forme, nulle part le courant majestueusement paisible, à la sûre ondulation duquel on aimerait à confier son espoir.

Après la " Symphonie fantastique ", le 1er morceau de la Symphonie en ut mineur de Beethoven eût été pour moi une jouissance bienfaisante et pure.

II

Je disais que, même en Berlioz, la tendance française était prédominante.

En vérité, si tel n'était le cas, et s'il y avait eu possibilité pour lui de se soustraire à cette tendance, peut-être alors pourrait-on soutenir aussi en lui ce qu'en bon allemand on nomme un digne disciple de Beethoven.

Mais cette tendance l'empêche de s'assimiler plus à fond le génie beethovenien. C'est la tendance qui vise à l'effet extérieur, qui est en quête du succès auprès des catégories les plus divergentes du public. Alors qu'en pleine vie sociale, l'Allemand, pour sonder en lui-même la source véritable où s'alimente sa faculté de production, préfère s'isoler et se recueillir, nous voyons que le Français, au contraire, aspire à trouver dans les classes les plus extrêmes de la société ce principe de son activité productrice. Le Français pense avant tout à une chose, divertir, amuser ; même quand il cherche à perfectionner son art par l'ennoblissement, par l'idéalisation de cet amusement, jamais il ne perd de vue son but immédiat, à savoir que cet art ait le pouvoir de plaire et de captiver le plus grand nombre possible d'auditeurs. Aussi, l'effet, l'impression du moment, sont et demeurent pour le Français l'objet principal ; s'il est totalement dépourvu du sens intuitif, il lui suffit d'avoir tout simplement atteint ce but ; mais s'il est doué d'une véritable faculté créatrice, cela ne l'empêche pas de se servir de cet effet ; seulement, ce n'est plus alors que le 1er et le plus important moyen pour faire comprendre à tous sa pensée intime.

Quels tiraillements ne doivent-ils pas se produire dans une âme d'artiste comme celle de Berlioz ! D'un côté, il est poussé, par une force vive d'intuition, à puiser à la source la plus profonde, la plus mystérieuse du monde idéal ; d'un autre côté, par les exigences et le caractère particulier de compatriotes dont il fait partie et partage les penchants (et même par sa propre impulsion native) , il se sent engagé à n'exprimer sa pensée que dans les éléments les plus superficiels de sa création ! Il sent qu'il a quelque chose d'extraordinaire, quelque chose d'infini à rendre ; il sent que la langue d'Auber est bien trop insuffisante pour cela ; il sent qu'il doit néanmoins imaginer quelque chose d'équivalent, pour gagner, a priori et tout de suite, les bonnes grâces de son public : et c'est ainsi qu'il en arrive à employer cette langue musicale frappante à la moderne, aux entortillages profanes, qui lui sert à ébaubir et à recruter les badauds, tout en rebutant ceux qui eussent été aisément en état de comprendre ses intentions intimes, mais qui dédaignent de les pénétrer sous cette enveloppe.

III

Une autre chose fâcheuse, c'est que Berlioz a l'air de se complaire en son isolement, et semble s'efforcer opiniâtement de s'y maintenir. Il n'a pas d'ami qu'il juge digne de lui donner un conseil, auquel il permette de lui signaler dans ses œuvres tel ou tel défaut de forme.

À ce point de vue, l'audition de sa Symphonie, " Roméo et Juliette ", m'a fait éprouver les plus vifs regrets. Dans cette composition, à côté des trouvailles les plus géniales, il s'amoncelle une telle quantité de fautes contre le goût et la bonne économie artistique, que je ne pus me défendre de faire ce souhait : c'est que Berlioz, avant l'exécution de cette œuvre, l'eût soumise à un homme tel que Cherubini ; certainement celui-ci, sans nuire le moins du monde à l'originalité de la composition, aurait su la débarrasser d'un bon nombre d'imperfections qui la déparent.

Mais la susceptibilité de Berlioz est si excessive, que même son plus intime ami n'oserait lui faire une telle proposition ; d'autre part, il frappe ainsi ses auditeurs, au point qu'ils voient en lui un phénomène artistique pour lequel nul point de comparaison n'existe, auquel on ne peut appliquer aucune mesure : et voilà comment Berlioz restera toujours incomplet ; voilà pourquoi, peut-être, il ne brillera réellement que comme une exception passagère, étrange.

Et c'est grand dommage ! Si Berlioz savait s'emparer de la quantité d'excellents éléments qui a surgi de la dernière et brillante période de la musique française moderne, si Berlioz pouvait renoncer à cet isolement auquel il est parvenu, et dont il se prévaut avec un si vain orgueil, pour se rattacher à quelque grande figure de la musique présente ou passée, pour y prendre son point d'appui, alors, forcément, il aurait l'assurance nécessaire pour exercer sur l'avenir de la musique en France une influence puissante, au point de rendre sa mémoire inoubliable.

Berlioz, en effet, ne possède pas seulement la force créatrice et l'originalité de l'invention : une vertu brille en lui, aussi peu commune, d'ordinaire, chez les compositeurs de son pays que chez nous autres Allemands, le vice de coquetterie. Cette vertu consiste à ne pas écrire pour l'argent ; et pour qui connaît Paris, pour qui connaît le train de vie et les pratiques des compositeurs de Paris, il est tout naturel de rendre hommage, dans cette ville même, à une telle vertu.

Berlioz est l'ennemi le plus acharné de toute banalité, de toute gueuserie, de toute trivialité, il a juré d'égorger le 1er joueur d'orgue de Barbarie qui oserait jouer une de ses mélodies. Si terrible que soit ce serment, je n'ai pas la moindre appréhension pour les jours d'un de ces virtuoses des rues ; je suis même convaincu que personne ne tient la musique de Berlioz en plus parfait mépris que les membres de cette vaste corporation musicale.

Et pourtant, il est un talent qu'on ne saurait contester à Berlioz : c'est précisément son entente à fournir des compositions parfaitement populaires, je dis " populaires " au sens le plus idéal du mot.

Quand j'entendis la Symphonie qu'il a écrite pour la translation des victimes de Juillet, j'éprouvai l'impression vive que le 1er gamin en blouse bleue et en bonnet rouge devait la comprendre à fond ; ce genre de compréhension, à vrai dire, exigerait de ma part le nom de " national " plutôt que celui de " populaire " ; car il est certain que du Postillon de Lonjumeau à cette " Symphonie de Juillet ", il y a encore un bon bout de chemin à parcourir.

Je n'aurais vraiment nulle répugnance à donner le pas à cette composition sur les autres œuvres de Berlioz : elle est noble et grande de la 1re à la dernière note ; un sublime enthousiasme patriotique, qui s'élève du ton de la déploration aux plus hauts sommets de l'apothéose, garde cette œuvre de toute exaltation malsaine.

En outre, je reconnais à Berlioz le mérite d'avoir employé, dans un style tout à fait noble, la musique militaire d'harmonie, qui seule était à sa disposition en cette circonstance. Je dois donc retirer ce que je disais plus haut du sort futur des œuvres de Berlioz, au moins en ce qui concerne cette " Symphonie de Juillet ", je dois exprimer avec joie ma conviction que cette Symphonie durera et exaltera les courages, tant que durera une nation portant le nom de France. »

Berlioz et Liszt

Correspondance entre Berlioz et Liszt, et entre Berlioz et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein.

Choix de lettres de Berlioz, Liszt et autres.

« Tu es un homme à part. »

(Berlioz à Liszt, lettre du 15 janvier 1854 ; Correspondance Générale n° 1690.)

Franz Liszt (1811-1886), hongrois de naissance mais allemand et français par l'éducation, tient une place tout à fait exceptionnelle parmi tous les compositeurs et musiciens rencontrés par Berlioz au cours de sa carrière. Les rapports entre ces 2 géants de la musique de leur temps s'étendent pendant plus de 35 ans ; de leur 1^{re} rencontre en 1830, à leur dernière, en 1866, vers la fin de la carrière de Berlioz. Par leur importance, ces rapports n'auront d'égal que ceux qui se développeront à la fin des années 1840, parallèlement, d'abord et ensuite en concurrence, entre Liszt et un autre géant de la musique du 19^e siècle, Richard Wagner (1813-1883).

Sujet vaste et complexe, qui ne se laisse pas résumer en quelques mots : presque dès le départ, les rapports entre Berlioz et Liszt sont d'ordre personnel et non seulement musical ; ils s'étendent dans de multiples directions, et évoluent au cours de leurs carrières. Leur analyse en est rendue plus difficile du fait qu'une source de 1^{re} importance, la correspondance entre les 2 hommes, souffre d'un déséquilibre fondamental. Comme pour le reste de la correspondance de Berlioz (réunie dans la Correspondance Générale), les lettres écrites par Berlioz qui ont survécu l'emportent très largement en nombre sur celles reçues par lui de ses correspondants, et il en est de même pour sa correspondance avec Liszt (Berlioz en a sans doute détruit beaucoup avec bien d'autres, après la mort de son fils Louis, en 1867). D'un autre côté, on possède nombre de lettres écrites par Liszt à d'autres correspondants, et elles apportent parfois d'importants aperçus sur ses rapports avec Berlioz.

À cause de la longue période envisagée, on a réparti la matière en plusieurs phases distinctes, déterminées en 1^{er} lieu par les cheminements de Liszt au cours d'une carrière tout à fait exceptionnelle. Du point de vue de Berlioz, l'époque charnière s'étend de 1848 à 1857 quand Liszt, installé à Weimar, s'emploie à transformer la ville en centre de musique progressive. C'est pendant les années 1852 et 1856 que l'amitié entre les 2 hommes atteindra son apogée, mais c'est aussi au cours de la même période que des différences fondamentales entre eux se révèlent et, par la suite, leurs rapports vont se relâcher et finir par cesser complètement.

1830-1835 : Liszt à Paris

Chronologie

1803

11 décembre : Berlioz naît à La Côte Saint-André.

1811

22 octobre : Liszt naît à Raiding près de Sopron, en Hongrie.

1821

La famille de Liszt s'installe à Vienne.

Fin octobre : Berlioz arrive à Paris.

1823

Automne : La famille de Liszt vient s'installer à Paris.

1830

4 décembre : Ire rencontre de Berlioz et Liszt, le jour de la Ire exécution de « la Symphonie fantastique » au Conservatoire.

1832

9 décembre : Liszt présent au concert du Conservatoire où l'on joue « la Symphonie fantastique » et « Le Retour à la vie », en présence d'Harriet Smithson.

1833

2 avril : Liszt participe à un concert au bénéfice d'Harriet Smithson. (Correspondance Générale, n° 332.)

12 mars : Liszt donne un concert bénéfice au « Vauxhall », à Paris, où le chef Girard dirige l'Ouverture des « Francs-Juges » .

3 octobre : Liszt est témoin au mariage de Berlioz et Harriet Smithson.

24 novembre : Concert bénéfice donné par Berlioz pour Harriet Smithson avec la participation de Liszt. (Correspondance Générale, n° 363 ; « Mémoires », Chapitre 45.)

15 décembre : Liszt participe à un concert donné par Ferdinand Hiller. (« Critique Musicale », tome I ; pages 119 et 126.)

22 décembre : Liszt participe à un concert dirigé par Berlioz. (« Critique Musicale », tome I ; page 128.)

1834

28 décembre : Liszt participe à un concert donné par Berlioz où il joue des mouvements de « la Symphonie fantastique ». (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 420 ; « Critique Musicale », tome II ; pages 3 et 4.)

1835

9 avril : Liszt participe à un concert dirigé par le chef Girard à l'Hôtel-de-ville, où il joue sa fantaisie sur « Le Retour à la vie ». (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 429 et 430 ; « Critique Musicale » II ; pages 127-133, 135-136.)

23 mai : Liszt joue le « Konzertstück » de Weber pour piano et orchestre. (« Critique Musicale », tome II ; page 195.)

À propos de la 1^{re} exécution de « la Symphonie fantastique » au Conservatoire, le 5 décembre 1830, Berlioz raconte (« Mémoires » : Chapitre 31) :

« Ce fut la veille de ce jour que Liszt vint me voir. Nous ne nous connaissions pas encore. Je lui parlai du « Faust » de Goethe, qu'il m'avoua n'avoir pas lu, et pour lequel il se passionna autant que moi bientôt après. Nous éprouvions une vive sympathie l'un pour l'autre et, depuis lors, notre liaison n'a fait que se resserrer et se consolider.

Il assista à ce concert où il se fit remarquer de tout l'auditoire par ses applaudissements et ses enthousiastes démonstrations. »

Une lettre de Berlioz à son père, le lendemain de l'exécution, y fait allusion brièvement. (Correspondance Générale, n° 190.) Dès le départ, le ton est donné : c'est une amitié presque sans limites qui s'étend dans toutes les directions. Bientôt, ils vont se tutoyer, ce qui place Liszt dans un groupe très restreint parmi les amis de Berlioz en dehors de sa famille, à côté de Joseph d'Ortigue et, plus tard, James Davison. Il se trouve que Berlioz se voit obligé de partir pour l'Italie à la fin de 1830, et il est absent de Paris pendant 1831 et presque toute l'année 1832. Il n'est pas question de Liszt dans les lettres connues de Berlioz de cette période, mais les 2 hommes ne tarderont pas à renouer leurs rapports dès le retour de Berlioz, et Liszt fait partie de l'auditoire au concert du 9 décembre au Conservatoire où Harriet Smithson est présente. Dès le départ, il est mêlé à la passion orageuse de Berlioz pour l'actrice irlandaise ; il semble qu'il ait cherché à dissuader Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 303) mais, pour finir, il lui accorde son entier soutien et est l'un des témoins à leur mariage, le 3 octobre 1833. (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 348.)

C'est en fait de l'époque où Berlioz faisait sa cour à Harriet Smithson que date le 1^{er} commentaire connu de Liszt sur Berlioz dans une lettre à Madame d'Agoult de 1833, mais sans date précise. On y rencontre déjà le ton de sollicitude apitoyée qui se reconnaît par la suite dans l'attitude de Liszt envers Berlioz : il estime de son devoir de venir en aide à son ami et, à ce moment de sa carrière, il le fait en mettant à la disposition de Berlioz son prodigieux talent de pianiste. En 1833, et dans les années suivantes, il participe donc à des concerts, dont certains sous la direction de Berlioz. Il met en œuvre également l'un de ses talents particuliers, la transcription ou adaptation pour le piano d'œuvres écrites à l'origine pour orchestre. En 1833, outre la composition d'une fantaisie sur des thèmes du « Retour à la vie » (Correspondance Générale, n° 429) , il fait une transcription pour piano de « la Symphonie fantastique » et de l'Ouverture des « Francs-Juges » (se référer à la lettre à Madame d'Agoult de mai 1833) ; la transcription de l'Ouverture ne sera publiée qu'en 1845, mais celle de la Symphonie paraît en Allemagne, en 1834, et joue un rôle capital dans la diffusion de la renommée de Berlioz : c'est grâce à elle que son nom est porté pour la 1^{re} fois à l'attention du public allemand. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 342, 357, 384, 398, 416, 425, 453.) Quelques années plus tard (vers 1836) , Liszt transcrit également « Harold en Italie » et l'Ouverture du « Roi Lear » , et les soumet à Berlioz en vue d'une publication éventuelle. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 478, 498, 525, 538.) Berlioz accueille d'abord les transcriptions avec joie (Correspondance Générale, numéros 342, 453) , mais il exprimera plus tard des réserves de fond sur le genre même, bien que seulement à ses proches et en privé. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 968 et 969 ; se référer à aussi 1598bis (tome VIII) , 2100 ; et « Critique Musicale » , tome II, pages 577-578.) En 1852, Liszt réclamera à Berlioz ses manuscrits des transcriptions de « Harold » et des 2 Ouvertures, sans doute en vue d'une révision (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1499 et 1589) ; en réponse, Berlioz fait à Liszt quelques observations critiques sur la transcription de « Harold » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1501) et de l'Ouverture du « Roi Lear » . (Correspondance Générale, n° 1593.) Pour finir, la transcription de l'Ouverture ne sera jamais publiée, et celle de la Symphonie ne paraîtra intégralement qu'en 1879, 10 ans après la mort de Berlioz.

Par contre, Berlioz ne met jamais en question les prouesses de Liszt au piano, comme on peut le constater tout au long de ses écrits. (Voir, par exemple, le début de la 3^e lettre du « 1^{er} Voyage en Allemagne » ou le 3^e chapitre d' « À Travers chants » .) Dès ses débuts dans la carrière de critique musical, il vante les talents du grand virtuose, avec seulement quelques réserves sur le caractère parfois subjectif de ses interprétations. (Se référer à la « Critique Musicale » , tome II ; pages 131-132.) Dans le compte-rendu d'un concert de mars 1834, il dit de Liszt :

« Il parle piano comme Goethe parlait allemand, comme Moore parle anglais, comme Weber parlait orchestre. »

(« Critique Musicale » , tome I ; pages 188 et 189.)

Dans un article de juin 1836, consacré entièrement à Liszt, il célèbre en lui « le pianiste de l'avenir » (« Critique Musicale » , tome II ; pages 471-475) , expression destinée à l'avenir que l'on sait, mais dont nul n'aurait pu à ce stade prévoir la portée.

Liszt, tout comme Berlioz, n'est pas seulement un grand musicien : pénétrés tous 2 de littérature, ils font partie entière des cercles intellectuels de l'élite parisienne du temps. (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 370.) Un exemple : la réunion chez les Berlioz à Montmartre, au début de mars 1834, connue d'après la correspondance du compositeur. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 395, 396, 397.) Mais la période parisienne de Liszt va bientôt prendre fin : en 1833, il a rencontré à Paris la comtesse Marie d'Agoult et, plus tard en 1835, il quitte Paris pour aller s'installer avec elle à Genève.

1835-1847 : Liszt à l'étranger

Chronologie

1836

Juin : Récital donné par Liszt dans les salons Érard ; compte-rendu de Berlioz le 12 juin. (« Critique Musicale » , tome II ; pages 471-475 - se référer aux pages 535-536.)

7 août : Article de Berlioz sur le Conservatoire de Genève, fondé avec le soutien de Liszt. (« Critique Musicale » , tome II, pages 539-542 - se référer aux pages 447-449 ; Correspondance Générale, numéros 461, 470, 478.)

18 décembre : Liszt participe avec Berlioz à un concert au Conservatoire de Paris. (Correspondance Générale, n° 485 ; « Critique Musicale » , tome III ; page 27.)

1837

28 janvier ; 4, 11 et 18 février : Concerts de chambre donnés aux salons Érard par Liszt avec le violoniste Chrétien Urhan et le violoncelliste Alexandre Batta. (« Critique Musicale » , tome III ; pages 33-36, 41-43, 67-71, 83-84.)

5 décembre : Ire exécution du « Requiem » .

1838

10, 12, 14 septembre : Échec de « Benvenuto Cellini » à l'Opéra.

16 décembre : Hommage public de Paganini à Berlioz, suivi d'un don de 20,000 francs.

1839

13 janvier : Liszt publie un article à la louange de « Benvenuto Cellini » . (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 622.)

1840

20 avril : Récital donné par Liszt dans les salons Érard. (« Critique Musicale » , tome IV ; pages 313-314.)

1841

27 mars et 13 avril : Récitals donnés par Liszt dans la salle Érard. (« Critique Musicale » , tome IV ; pages 493-495.)

25 avril : Festival Beethoven au Conservatoire, dirigé par Berlioz et avec la participation de Liszt. (« Critique Musicale », tome IV ; pages 503-505.)

1842

2 novembre : Liszt est nommé directeur de musique extraordinaire au service du Grand-Duc de Weimar.

1843

28 août : La 3^e lettre sur les voyages de Berlioz en Allemagne est publiée dans le « Journal des Débats » ; elle est adressée à Liszt. (« Critique Musicale », tome V ; pages 275-284.)

1844

Janvier : Iers concerts dirigés par Liszt à Weimar.

21 et 25 avril : Concerts de Liszt au Théâtre Italien, à Paris. (« Critique Musicale », tome V ; pages 486 et 487 ; se référer à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 896-898.)

4 mai : Liszt participe à un concert dirigé par Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale numéros 899, 899bis [tome VIII] ; « Critique Musicale », tome V, pages 479-482.)

11 mai : Liszt participe à un concert à la Salle Herz. (« Critique Musicale », tome V ; pages 486-487.)

1845

Août : Liszt organise et dirige le Festival Beethoven à Bonn ; Berlioz assiste au Festival et publie un rapport sur les solennités.

1846

Fin mars : Liszt se rend à Prague et assiste à des concerts donnés par Berlioz. (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1030, 1031, 1034.)

1847

Février : Liszt rencontre la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Kiev.

Malgré son départ pour la Suisse et ses voyages à l'étranger, Liszt revient de temps en temps à Paris pour y donner des concerts (en 1836, 1837, 1840, 1841, 1844) . Même quand il est absent de Paris, il reste en rapport avec Berlioz, et continue à s'intéresser vivement à son sort, comme l'atteste ses réactions au succès du « Requiem » en 1837 (Correspondance Générale, n° 525) , et à l'échec de « Benvenuto Cellini » en 1838 (Correspondance Générale, n° 622) . Berlioz, de son côté, rend compte régulièrement des concerts de Liszt à Paris et évoque souvent ses voyages à l'étranger : voyages en Italie, en 1837 et 1838 (« Critique Musicale » , tome III ; pages 171, 436-437) ; à Vienne, en 1838 (« Critique Musicale » , tome III ; page 495) ; à Londres et en Belgique, en 1840 (« Critique Musicale » , tome IV pages 353-4, 476) ; en Russie, en 1842 (« Critique Musicale » , tome IV ; page 601) ; en Espagne, en 1844 (« Critique Musicale » , tome V ; page 571) . Liszt visiblement lui manque, comme on peut le lire dans 2 lettres de 1839 ; la 1re adressée à Liszt personnellement (Correspondance Générale n° 622) , l'autre une longue lettre ouverte parue dans la « Revue et Gazette musicale » , en août (Correspondance Générale n° 660 ; « Critique Musicale » , tome IV, pages 131-137) . Quand, finalement, Berlioz entreprend lui-même sa longue série de voyages musicaux, il a 2 fois l'occasion de rencontrer Liszt à l'étranger ; à Bonn, en août 1845, puis en avril de l'année suivante, à Prague.

C'est au cours des années 1840 que Liszt voyagera le plus, à la suite de sa rupture avec Marie d'Agoult, en 1839 (de Suisse, elle reviendra à Paris avec leurs 3 enfants, mais ils continueront à correspondre encore pendant bien des années) . À cette époque, Liszt, « vagabond infatigable » (Correspondance Générale, n° 660) parcourt le monde plus que peut-être n'importe quel musicien de son temps, plus que Berlioz lui-même : entre autres pays, il se rend en Turquie, en Espagne, au Portugal, et même en Islande (mais comme Berlioz et Wagner, il ne se rendra jamais en Amérique, même s'il y songera) . Mais, en même temps, l'idée de s'établir de manière durable le hante, et l'occasion s'en présentera grâce aux liens qu'il commence à nouer avec Weimar où, dès novembre 1842, il est nommé à un poste à mi-temps. Ses ambitions pour Weimar s'expriment dans une lettre à Marie d'Agoult, au début de 1844, peu après sa 1re série de concerts dans cette ville. Mais il faudra plusieurs années avant que ses projets se concrétisent. L'événement décisif est sa rencontre avec la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Kiev, en février 1847, au cours d'une tournée en Russie ; elle le persuadera finalement de mettre fin à sa carrière de virtuose errant pour s'établir avec elle à Weimar. Coïncidence singulière : c'est peu après la visite de Liszt que Berlioz fait lui-même son 1er voyage en Russie, où il rencontre lui aussi la princesse, et tous 2 forment une impression très positive de leur rencontre. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1108, 1154, 1242bis ; et Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome 2, page 383.) Les voyages en Russie de 1847 auront donc une influence décisive sur la carrière de tous les 3.

1848-1856 : Liszt à Weimar

Chronologie

1848

Février : Liszt s'installe à Weimar.

La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein ne peut obtenir du Tsar de Russie le droit de divorcer son mari.

1849

16 février : Liszt dirige la 1^{re} exécution du « Tannhäuser » de Wagner à Weimar. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis.)

La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein et Liszt s'installent à Weimar à l'Altenburg.

1850

28 août : Liszt dirige la 1^{re} exécution du « Lohengrin » de Wagner, à Weimar.

1851

Août : Liszt propose à Berlioz de monter « Benvenuto Cellini » à Weimar.

1852

20, 24, 27 mars : Liszt dirige 3 exécutions de « Benvenuto Cellini » à Weimar.

17 avril : Liszt dirige à Weimar une exécution de la version révisée (?) de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

Juin : Exécution d'extraits de « Harold en Italie » par Liszt au Festival de Ballenstedt. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1491 et 1499.)

14 novembre : Berlioz et Marie Recio arrivent à Weimar.

17, 21, 23, 25, 30 novembre : Liszt dirige plusieurs exécutions de la version révisée de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

20 novembre : Berlioz dirige un concert au théâtre de Weimar.

24 novembre : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Weimar.

1853

3 février : Liszt dirige au théâtre de Weimar des extraits de « la Damnation of Faust » et de « Roméo et Juliette » pour lesquels Berlioz a envoyé la musique. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1543, 1549, 1552, 1554.)

5 octobre : Au Festival de Karlsruhe (du 3 au 7 octobre) , Liszt dirige des extraits de « Roméo et Juliette » ; Berlioz n'assiste pas au Festival. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1627 et 1631 ; se référer à 1620 et 1624.)

8 au 19 octobre : Séjour de Liszt à Paris.

10 octobre : Rencontre de Berlioz, Liszt et Wagner à l'hôtel de Liszt, à Paris.

11 octobre : Berlioz reçoit Liszt et Wagner au petit-déjeuner ; Berlioz chante et Liszt joue des extraits de « Benvenuto Cellini » .

1er décembre : Liszt arrive à Leipzig pour assister à un concert donné le même jour par Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1657 et 1659) ; au cours d'une soirée chez Ferdinand David, il joue aussi sa nouvelle paraphrase sur 2 thèmes de « Benvenuto Cellini » (publiée l'année suivante) et revient bientôt à Weimar (Correspondance Générale, n° 1662) .

10 décembre : Liszt se rend de nouveau de Weimar à Leipzig pour un autre concert donné le même soir par Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1664 et 1669.)

1854

Janvier : Liszt projette une étude de l'œuvre de Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1696.)

27 janvier : Liszt dirige « La Fuite en Égypte » , à Weimar.

4 mars : Mort de Harriet Smithson.

3 au 6 mai : Berlioz et Marie Recio s'arrêtent à Weimar, en route de Dresde à Paris.

1855

11 février : Berlioz et Marie Recio arrivent à Weimar.

17 février : Au cours d'un concert à la cour, dirigé par Berlioz, Liszt donne la Ire exécution de son Concerto pour piano en mi bémol.

21 février : Liszt participe à un concert, dirigé par Berlioz, au théâtre de Weimar.

Juillet et août : Liszt publie dans la « Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » un article en allemand sur « Harold en Italie » , écrit à l'origine en français ; une publication à Paris n'aura pas lieu.

Septembre : De passage à Paris, la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein voit Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2005-2007, 2012, 2017, 2019.)

18 octobre : À un concert à Brunswick, Liszt dirige l'Ouverture de « Benvenuto Cellini », ainsi que ses poèmes symphoniques « Prométhée » et « Orphée ». (Correspondance Générale, n° 2044.)

1856

6 février : Liszt vient de Vienne pour assister à un concert à Gotha, dirigé par Berlioz.

7 et 8 février : Liszt accompagne Berlioz et Marie Recio pendant leur voyage de Gotha à Weimar.

16 février : Liszt dirige une exécution d'une version révisée de « Benvenuto Cellini », à Weimar.

17 février : 1er concert dirigé par Berlioz.

Vers le 18 février : Liszt dirige une exécution du « Lohengrin » de Wagner ; Berlioz et Marie Recio sortent pendant le 2e acte.

24 février : 2e exécution de « Lohengrin » dirigée par Liszt, en présence de Berlioz et Marie Recio.

1 mars : 2e concert dirigé par Berlioz.

2 mars : Berlioz et Marie Recio quittent Weimar pour Paris.

16 mars : 2e (et dernière) exécution de « Benvenuto Cellini », dirigée par Liszt.

La décision de Liszt de s'établir de manière permanente à Weimar a de grandes conséquences pour son soutien de Berlioz, qui tout d'abord ne semble cependant pas s'en douter. Certes, les ressources de Weimar ne sont nullement comparables à celles des grandes villes musicales d'Allemagne, mais Liszt est maintenant en mesure de réaliser pour son ami ce dont il a longtemps rêvé. Une lettre à son agent Belloni, du début de 1852, résume sa conception de la tâche qu'il s'est imposé : Berlioz, musicien hors pair, mérite d'être soutenu à fond, et Liszt va faire tout son possible pour l'encourager et promouvoir sa musique. On remarquera au passage que dans cette lettre Liszt ne prononce pas le nom de Wagner, pour lequel il a cependant déjà beaucoup fait à Weimar au cours des années précédentes.

Le point de départ est une reprise de « Benvenuto Cellini », dont l'échec en 1838 avait marqué un tournant dans la carrière de Berlioz à Paris. Liszt se passionne pour le projet, comme on peut le voir d'après sa correspondance avec Wagner, qui tente en coulisse de décourager l'entreprise. Hans von Bülow, élève de Liszt, prend une part très importante à la préparation du projet. Outre les représentations de 1852 et 1856, réalisées avec la participation active de Berlioz qui remanie la partition, Liszt essaie de faire monter l'œuvre ailleurs en Allemagne (Dresde en 1853 et 1854, mais sans succès), et encourage sa publication. À part « Benvenuto Cellini », il fait exécuter d'autres œuvres de Berlioz, à Weimar (1853, 1854) et ailleurs en Allemagne (Ballenstedt, en 1852 ; Karlsruhe, en 1853 ; Brunswick, en 1855). Il invite Berlioz à Weimar pour organiser et diriger des concerts de sa musique en novembre 1852 ; février 1855 ; et février 1856. Berlioz sera accueilli comme membre honoraire de la « Nouvelle Weimar » que Liszt et ses partisans essaient de créer. Mais l'action de Liszt s'étend au delà de Weimar. Les Iers grands voyages de Berlioz en Allemagne, en 1842-1843 puis en 1845-1846, avaient eu lieu pratiquement sans le concours de Liszt ; ce dernier prend maintenant une part active à ceux des années 1852-1856, soit en personne, soit par l'entremise de ses partisans et amis dans le monde musical d'Allemagne, tel Hans von Bülow à Dresde en 1853. En 1854, Liszt cherche semble-t-il à obtenir un poste permanent pour Berlioz comme chef d'orchestre à Dresde (se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1746) , mais le projet n'aboutira pas. À plusieurs reprises, il insiste pour faire acte de présence et donner son appui à des concerts donnés par Berlioz (Leipzig en 1853 ; Gotha en 1856) . À l'occasion, il met ses talents de virtuose au service de Berlioz ou de sa musique : il exécute en l'honneur de Berlioz, et sous sa direction, son 1er Concerto pour piano (Weimar, 1855) , remanie quelques transcriptions pour piano d'œuvres pour orchestre de Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1499, 1501, 1589, 1593) , et compose aussi une nouvelle paraphrase sur 2 thèmes de « Benvenuto Cellini » qu'il joue à Leipzig en 1853, et publie l'année suivante. La critique musicale doit aussi prendre sa place : il envisage une étude de l'œuvre de Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 1696) mais, en définitive, seul un article sur « Harold en Italie » verra le jour ; il paraîtra en Allemagne à l'été de 1855, mais une publication en français dans la presse parisienne n'aura finalement pas lieu (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1962, 1995, 2012, 2017, 2019, 2025, 2044, 2065 ; se référer à « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 volumes, Leipzig, 1910, n° 192) .

Malgré la disparition de la plupart des lettres de Liszt à Berlioz, on peut lire entre les lignes de celles que Berlioz lui adresse l'intérêt qu'il porte à la carrière de son ami. En juin 1852, Liszt lui demande une liste complète de ses œuvres musicales et Berlioz en réponse le met à jour sur ses derniers travaux. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1471.) À partir de là, Berlioz tient Liszt au courant de ses plus importants projets et activités ; on possède plusieurs lettres qui relatent ses concerts de ces années : en 1853, Londres (Correspondance Générale, n° 1617) , Bade et Francfort (Correspondance Générale, n° 1624) , et Brunswick (Correspondance Générale, n° 1637) ; en 1854, Hanovre (Correspondance Générale, n° 1717) et Dresde (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1739, 1746, 1748) ; en 1855, Bruxelles (Correspondance Générale, n° 1927) . En remaniant « Benvenuto Cellini » pour les exécutions de Weimar, Berlioz se montre réceptif aux suggestions de Liszt et le considère pratiquement comme un collaborateur : dans ses lettres à Liszt, il parle de l'œuvre comme « notre Opéra » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1499) , « notre Benvenuto » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1556) , « ton protégé » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1617, se référer à 1568) , et la version publiée est, pour lui, « notre édition de Cellini » (Correspondance Générale, n° 1995) .

À part « Cellini » , Berlioz tient Liszt aussi au courant des progrès de ses œuvres les plus importantes. De 1852 à 1854, Liszt peut suivre l'élargissement de « La Fuite en Égypte » d'origine jusqu'à ce qu'elle devienne la trilogie de « L'Enfance du Christ » , et il prête son concours pour la réalisation de la traduction allemande de l'œuvre par Peter Cornelius. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1471, 1510, 1617, 1690, 1696, 1738, 1762, 1764, 1773, 1776, 1799, 1811.) Après le succès des exécutions à Paris, en décembre 1854, Berlioz lui confie son estimation personnelle de l'œuvre qui allait être jouée bientôt à Weimar dans la traduction de Cornelius. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1848 et 1869.) Liszt n'avait pas été mêlé de près à la genèse de l'œuvre mais visiblement se prend d'affection pour elle. Après l'exécution de Weimar, Berlioz lui donne un compte-rendu des exécutions à Bruxelles, le mois suivant (Correspondance Générale, n° 1927) , et tient à assister à une autre exécution l'année suivante à Gotha.

Liszt n'a jamais encore entendu le « Requiem » mais ambitionne de le diriger lui-même, comme il le souligne dans sa lettre de janvier 1852 à Belloni. Berlioz lui fait part de l'exécution à Paris, le 22 octobre de la même année (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1510, 1520, 1525) , et quelques mois plus tard, dans une lettre qui montre que Liszt l'encourage à écrire une Messe, il évoque la prédilection de Liszt pour une œuvre qu'il n'avait jamais encore entendue (Correspondance Générale, n° 1568) . Le « Te Deum » , qui n'a pas encore été exécuté quand Liszt en apprend l'existence (Correspondance Générale, n° 1471) , est souvent mentionné dans la correspondance de Berlioz avec Liszt. Il lui parle de la difficulté d'organiser une exécution (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1525, 1528, 1538, 1568) et, en réponse à une demande de Liszt pour la partition qu'il est obligé de refuser, il brosse un tableau de l'œuvre (Correspondance Générale, n° 1552) . Finalement, une exécution est mise sur pied pour l'ouverture de la grande Exposition de 1855, à Paris (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1773 et 1776) , et Berlioz écrit à Liszt pour solliciter son aide avec la publicité pour l'événement (Correspondance Générale, n° 1935) . Il ressort de cette dernière lettre que Berlioz et Liszt ont dû longuement discuter de l'ouvrage et, en réponse à des objections apparemment soulevées par Liszt concernant le prélude pour orchestre du « Dignare » (à présent, le 3^e mouvement) , il le supprime tout simplement (Berlioz ne l'inclura pas dans la publication de la grande partition) . À l'occasion de la 1^{re} exécution de l'œuvre, le 30 avril 1855, Liszt est le 1^{er} à recevoir un récit détaillé de l'événement, quelques heures plus tard. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1959.) Tout de suite, il exprime le désir de donner lui-même une exécution de l'ouvrage (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1962 et 1965) et, plus tard la même année, il sera question d'un Festival en Thuringe où le « Te Deum » et le « Requiem » devaient être joués tous les 2, mais le projet n'aura pas de suite (Correspondance Générale, n° 2012) . Autre œuvre d'envergure à recevoir sa 1^{re} exécution, en 1855 : la cantate « L'Impériale en l'honneur de Napoléon III » . L'ouvrage est mentionné pour la 1^{re} fois dans une lettre à Liszt de juillet 1854 (Correspondance Générale, n° 1773) ; il recevra sa 1^{re} exécution au cours de 2 concerts monstres, le 15 et 16 novembre 1855, et, une fois de plus, Liszt reçoit un compte-rendu détaillé de la solennité (Correspondance Générale, n° 2046 ; se référer à numéros 2044 et 2045.)

Au cours de 1854 et 1855, les liens entre Berlioz et Liszt semblent donc se resserrer de plus en plus. Liszt demande à Berlioz son portrait en médaillon (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1764 et 1776) et, de son côté, Berlioz affiche chez lui un portrait de Liszt au-dessus de son piano (Correspondance Générale, n° 2168, septembre 1856) . Au début de 1854, Liszt demande à Berlioz un exemplaire de ses « Mémoires » , alors encore inachevées et inédites (Correspondance Générale, n° 1696) , et Berlioz le lui fait parvenir l'année suivante en vue d'une éventuelle traduction allemande, avec recommandation à Liszt pour leur publication s'il devait décéder prématurément (Correspondance Générale, n° 1965 ; se référer à 1975 et 1995) . Pendant le séjour à Weimar, de février 1855, Berlioz évoque semble-t-il avec Liszt le projet d'une édition allemande de ses œuvres complètes, pour laquelle Liszt se propose d'être son représentant en Allemagne. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1901, 1908, 1913.) Il est question du projet dans plusieurs lettres à Liszt au cours des mois suivants mais, pour finir, le projet n'aboutira pas. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1918, 1927, 1965.) Qui plus est, Berlioz décerne à son ami l'honneur suprême de l'assimiler à des personnages de Shakespeare : dans une lettre, Liszt est Prospero tandis que la jeune princesse Marie von Sayn-Wittgenstein est Miranda (Correspondance Générale, n° 1927) ; dans une autre, il est nul autre que Hamlet vis-à-vis de Berlioz-Horatio :

« Adieu je te serre la main Ton dévoué Horatio et continuons à rire de tous les Guildenstern, de tous les Rosencrantz, et de tous les petits Osrick ;
sans compter les Polonius de ce bas monde. »

(Correspondance Générale, n° 1975.)

On se rappellera que, jadis, Berlioz s'assimilait volontiers à Hamlet et son ami Humbert Ferrand à Horatio.

Apparences cependant trompeuses - le resserrement des liens entre Berlioz et Liszt a finalement pour effet de faire éclater au grand jour un désaccord que Berlioz, de son côté, aurait sans doute préféré passer sous silence mais que Liszt veut surmonter : leur divergence de vues sur Wagner. Qu'il suffise de dire ici que, sans doute dès 1849, et en tout cas à partir de 1853, Liszt s'emploie à faire partager par Berlioz et par Wagner l'admiration et la chaleur qu'il ressentait lui-même pour tous les 2. Au cours de l'été de 1855, Berlioz et Wagner se rencontrent à Londres et l'occasion semble se présenter d'y parvenir enfin ; mais les espoirs de Liszt sont rapidement déçus et le désaccord surgit ouvertement pendant les exécutions du « Lohengrin » de Wagner à Weimar, en février 1856.

1857-1866 : de Weimar à Rome

Chronologie

1857

1er juin : Liszt dirige une exécution de « La Fuite en Égypte », à Aix-la-Chapelle.

2 juin : Une exécution de « l'Enfance du Christ » à Aix-la-Chapelle, organisée et dirigée par Liszt, est sifflée.

1858

15 décembre : Manifestation publique contre Liszt à la 1re exécution du « Barbier de Bagdad » de Peter Cornelius, à Weimar ; Liszt démissionne de son poste de chef d'orchestre.

1859

20 octobre : Arrivée de la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Paris, sans Liszt ; Berlioz dîne avec elle. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2417 ; se référer à 2418.)

22 octobre : Berlioz organise chez Madame Viardot une exécution d'extraits des « Troyens » pour la princesse. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2419 et 2427 ; se référer à la lettre de Liszt à la princesse, du 24 octobre.)

28 octobre : La princesse quitte Paris. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2423.)

Fin octobre : À la mort de Spohr (le 22 octobre) , Liszt pose sa candidature à l'Institut avec l'appui de Berlioz.

3 décembre : Liszt n'est pas élu à l'Institut.

13 décembre : Mort à Berlin de Daniel, fils de Liszt, à l'âge de 20 ans.

1860

Mai : La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein quitte Weimar pour s'établir à Rome ; elle voit le Pape pour lui demander un divorce avec son mari.

1861

13, 18, 24 mars : Exécutions du « Tannhäuser » de Wagner à l'Opéra ; Liszt n'est pas présent. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2534, 2535, 2536, 2538, 2542, 2545.)

10 mai : Liszt arrive à Paris pour 1 mois ; il voit Wagner avant son départ de Paris.

Vers le 13-15 mai : Liszt dîne avec Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2551 ; la lettre de Liszt du 16 mai à la princesse.)

22 mai : Liszt dîne avec Napoléon III. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2555 et 2557.)

31 mai : Liszt est nommé Commandeur de la Légion d'honneur. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2552, 2555, 2557.)

Août : Liszt quitte Weimar.

1862

9 et 11 août : Ires exécutions de « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Bade, en l'absence de Liszt et de la princesse.

Septembre : Berlioz reçoit de Liszt un exemplaire de la « Symphonie Faust » qui lui est dédiée.

11 septembre : Blandine, fille de Liszt, meurt à l'âge de 26 ans.

1863

8 et 10 avril : Liszt et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein n'assistent pas aux exécutions de « Béatrice et Bénédict » , à Weimar.

14 et 18 août : Liszt et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein n'assistent pas aux exécutions de « Béatrice et Bénédict » , à Bade.

Novembre-décembre : Liszt et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein n'assistent pas aux exécutions des « Troyens » , à Paris.

1864

Août : Festival à Karlsruhe où l'on joue de la musique de Liszt. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2887 et 2888.)

Début octobre : Liszt passe 1 semaine à Paris sans la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein, et dîne avec Berlioz le 7 et 10 octobre. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2905-2907, 2908, 2911, 2915, 2920, 2923, 2924.)

1865

Liszt entre dans les ordres.

1866

7 mars : Liszt assiste à un concert où le Septuor des « Troyens » est exécuté. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 3110, 3115, 3116, 3117.)

15 mars : Exécution de la « Messe de Gran » de Liszt, à l'église Saint-Eustache, en présence de Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, n° 3116.)

16 avril : Berlioz dîne avec Liszt, d'Ortigue et Damcke chez Léon Kreutzer. (Correspondance Générale VII : page 405, note 1.)

20 avril : Berlioz et Liszt assistent à un concert donné par Saint-Saëns. (Correspondance Générale VII : page 422, note 1.)

Conséquence du désaccord ouvert entre Berlioz et Liszt sur la musique de Wagner : leur correspondance esquivait désormais ce débat. Par contre, quelques mois plus tard, Berlioz se sent libre de soulever la question de front avec la princesse pour bien marquer sa distance avec le rôle que Wagner, selon lui, attribuait à la musique. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2163.) Les encouragements prodigués par la princesse pour la composition des « Troyens » ont sans doute, en partie, l'arrière-pensée de contrecarrer l'influence de Liszt sur Wagner qui, de son côté, émet des réserves sur l'influence que la princesse exerce sur Liszt. Liszt, néanmoins, continue avec sa générosité coutumière à soutenir la musique de Berlioz en Allemagne, ce qui va bientôt mener à un nouveau et sans doute plus grave désaccord. En 1857, Liszt veut à tout prix faire exécuter « l'Enfance du Christ » intégralement à un Festival à Aix-la-Chapelle, en juin ; Berlioz se prononce tout d'abord en faveur du projet (Correspondance Générale, n° 2209 ; se référer à 2207bis - tome VIII) , mais change ensuite d'avis quand des oppositions se manifestent sur place (Correspondance Générale, n° 2219) . Liszt persévère quand même, avec pour résultat le jour de l'exécution une cabale ouverte, dirigée sans doute plus contre Liszt que contre l'œuvre elle-même. (Ferdinand Hiller, ancien ami de Berlioz qui s'est prononcé contre Liszt, joue un rôle primordial dans l'affaire.) Berlioz reproche à Liszt d'avoir passé outre à ses conseils et ne se gêne pas pour le faire savoir à d'autres correspondants. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2232 et 2233 ; voir aussi le récit de Hans von Bülow.) L'affaire souligne une autre différence entre eux : Berlioz désire certes que l'on joue sa musique et qu'elle soit appréciée, mais n'a nullement l'intention de l'imposer à un public rétif. N'avait-il pas dit un jour à Liszt lui-même :

« Je persiste dans mon plan de ne plus marcher vers la montagne ; peut-être la montagne finira-t-elle par se mettre en marche vers moi ? »

(Correspondance Générale, n° 1250, mars 1849.)

Liszt, pour sa part, voit les choses d'un autre œil. Il écrit à Madame d'Agoult, en 1839 :

« Comme toujours, je maintiens et défends le droit de l'artiste d'imposer le beau et le supérieur à la masse. »

(Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome I ; page 294.)

Profession de foi qui acquerra par la suite un sous-entendu wagnérien, comme Berlioz lui-même a pu l'apprécier. L'affaire d'Aix-la-Chapelle amène un froid passager entre eux (se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 2264) , et Liszt, par la suite, ne dirige plus de musique de Berlioz mais, de toute façon, il donnera l'année suivante sa démission de chef d'orchestre à Weimar. Dans les années qui suivent, il continue à s'intéresser aux dernières compositions de Berlioz qui le tient au courant, soit directement soit par l'intermédiaire de la princesse. (« Les Troyens » : Correspondance Générale, numéros 2149, 2317, 2338, 2632 ; « Béatrice et Bénédict » : Correspondance Générale, numéros 2632, 2634, 2651.) Quelques unes de ses transcriptions pour piano de Berlioz paraissent au milieu des années 1860 et, jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, il continuera à admirer la musique de Berlioz malgré les divergences qui les ont séparé.

Après le séjour de 1856 à Weimar, Berlioz ne reverra plus Liszt et la princesse ensemble, mais seulement séparément à l'occasion des quelques visites qu'ils font chacun à Paris : la princesse, en octobre 1859 ; Liszt, en mai 1861, octobre 1864 et mars-avril 1866. Berlioz continue à donner son soutien à Liszt, comme lors de sa candidature (malheureuse) à l'Institut vers la fin de 1859 (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2428, 2429, 2442, 2443, 2447, 2449, 2678) , et à l'occasion de la mort de Daniel, fils de Liszt, peu après (Correspondance Générale, n° 2451) et de sa fille Blandine en 1862 (Correspondance Générale, n° 2651) . De manière générale, la correspondance entre Berlioz et Liszt ralentit considérablement après 1856, avec cependant cette compensation que celle avec la princesse s'épanouit entre 1856 et 1859 ; interrompue en 1860 par le départ de la princesse pour Rome où Liszt la rejoint l'année suivante, elle reprend bientôt ensuite. Mais ni Liszt, ni la princesse n'assisteront aux Ires représentations des 2 nouveaux Opéras, que ce soit « Béatrice et Bénédict » à Bade, en 1862-1863, et à Weimar, en 1863 ; ni (et surtout) « les Troyens » à Paris, en 1863, au grand regret de Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2799 : « Et vous n'y étiez pas, et Liszt n'y était pas. ») L'Italie est maintenant le centre de leur existence, malgré le souhait exprimé par Berlioz qu'ils s'installent à Paris. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2557 et 2651.)

Les années qui suivent 1856 sont, pour Liszt, une succession de déboires et, dès 1862, Berlioz se demande si Liszt ne va pas être tenté de chercher refuge dans la religion (Correspondance Générale, n° 2651) , supposition que la princesse, elle-même catholique fervente, confirme (Correspondance Générale, n° 2656) . Les aspirations religieuses de Liszt remontent à sa jeunesse et Berlioz les connaît de longue date, comme il le laisse entendre dans une lettre de mai 1834 où il souligne son propre manque de croyances religieuses. (Correspondance Générale, n° 395.) Pas plus que dans ses rapports avec Joseph d'Ortigue, cela n'a jamais fait obstacle à leur amitié. Quand Liszt entre dans les ordres, en 1865, Berlioz n'est donc pas surpris (Correspondance Générale, numéros 3008, 3021, 3025) ; il ne lui en fait pas grief, mais c'est un signe de plus de la distance qui se creuse entre eux, outre le différend wagnérien. Rien de surprenant à ce qu'il décide de maintenir le silence sur Liszt et Wagner dans la Postface de ses « Mémoires » . (Correspondance Générale, n° 3008.)

Bilan et conclusion

En 1854, Berlioz dédie sa « Damnation de Faust » à Liszt (se référer à la Correspondance Générale, n° 1568) ; Liszt rend la pareille, en 1861, en dédiant sa « Symphonie de Faust » à Berlioz. (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2632, et 2651.) Comme Berlioz le souligne dans ses « Mémoires » (Chapitre 31) , c'est lui qui a fait connaître le « Faust » de Goethe à Liszt. Mais les 2 dédicaces n'expriment pas le même ordre d'obligation : Liszt doit énormément à Berlioz, compositeur de musique d'orchestre (la « Symphonie Faust » , par exemple, n'aurait pu être écrite sans « la Symphonie fantastique ») , mais les dettes de Berlioz envers Liszt, non moins importantes, sont d'ordre personnel et plus général. Comme compositeur, Berlioz doit peu ou rien à la musique de Liszt et à ses procédés de composition. Vaste sujet que celui de l'influence de Berlioz sur Liszt, qui mérite traitement par une spécialiste de Liszt et déborde, par conséquent, le cadre de cet article.

Quant à la dette personnelle de Berlioz envers Liszt, elle commence par la transcription pour piano de « la Symphonie fantastique » qui lance sa réputation de compositeur en Allemagne, dès le milieu des années 1830 et avant ses voyages à l'étranger. Plus tard, dans les années 1850, Berlioz doit à Liszt la résurrection de son Opéra « Benvenuto Cellini » : sans la reprise de Weimar, Berlioz n'aurait peut-être jamais eu l'occasion de lui rendre l'existence. Mais la reprise de Weimar aura aussi, pour conséquence, de modifier le caractère de l'original et atténuant son côté burlesque, sa couleur et sa variété. Il existe des notes faites par Berlioz au cours de répétitions à Weimar, sans doute en novembre 1852, qui laissent supposer que la direction de Liszt tendait à des mouvements plus lents que ceux voulus par Berlioz. (Correspondance Générale IV : page 227, note I.) On peut se demander si Liszt était vraiment en plein accord avec l'œuvre telle qu'elle avait été conçue par Berlioz, et les 2 articles sur « Benvenuto Cellini » , publiés par

Hans von Bülow en 1852, renforcent ces doutes. Quoi qu'il en soit, Berlioz acceptera de bon gré les révisions proposées et en ajoutera d'autres de sa propre initiative ; il est profondément reconnaissant à Liszt de ce qu'il a fait, et considère le résultat comme étant pratiquement le fruit d'une collaboration. C'est sans doute une des raisons pourquoi, après les exécutions de Weimar, Berlioz semble peu enclin à rouvrir le dossier de « Cellini », encore moins à revenir à la version de Paris de 1838 : ce serait, en quelque sorte, désavouer le travail de son ami.

Comme on l'a dit précédemment, c'est aussi à Liszt que Berlioz doit, en partie, l'occasion de remanier et de faire représenter « Le Retour à la vie », en 1855 : Liszt, présent à la 1^{re} exécution de l'ouvrage, en décembre 1832, avait été intimement mêlé avec les relations de Berlioz et de Harriet Smithson après cette exécution. Liszt aide aussi à encourager la décision de Berlioz à entreprendre la composition des « Troyens », bien que le rôle décisif ait été joué en 1856 par la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein et non par lui, comme Berlioz le souligne souvent. (Par exemple, « Mémoires » : Postface ; Correspondance Générale, numéros 2264, 2427, 2814, 3008.)

De manière générale, Berlioz a peu à apprendre de son cadet, qu'il s'agisse de composition ou d'instrumentation. Il élabore son propre style et ses procédés, de la fin des années 1820 aux années 1840, longtemps avant que Liszt se tourne sérieusement vers la composition pour orchestre. Le nom de Liszt n'apparaît pas dans le « Traité d'instrumentation » dont la 1^{re} édition date de 1843. Quant à la direction d'orchestre, Berlioz fait là aussi figure de pionnier. En privé, il exprime en 1845 des réserves sérieuses sur la direction de Liszt. (Correspondance Générale, n° 992.) Pendant ses années à Weimar, Liszt a sans doute l'occasion de développer son talent de chef et d'acquérir de l'expérience, et Berlioz exprime, au départ, sa confiance dans son savoir ainsi que sa curiosité de s'entendre dirigé par Liszt. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1520.) Mais ce qu'il entend alors semble lui suggérer quelques doutes et, après sa visite à Weimar, en février 1856, il confie à sa sœur Adèle sa déception de ne pas avoir été laissé par Liszt diriger une seule exécution de « Benvenuto Cellini ». (Correspondance Générale, n° 2104.) Liszt aurait-il redouté une comparaison qui n'aurait pas été à son avantage ? La réputation de chef d'orchestre dont Berlioz jouissait en Allemagne et ailleurs était inégalée. (« Mémoires » : Post-Scriptum ; Correspondance Générale, numéros 1726 et 1752.) De façon générale, Berlioz n'aime pas s'entendre jouer par d'autres chefs d'orchestre, comme il le répète souvent : il est le seul à savoir diriger sa musique. (« Mémoires » : Post-Scriptum ; Correspondance Générale, numéros 1543, 1560bis, 1631.) Le seul domaine où la supériorité de Liszt sur Berlioz (et pratiquement tous ses contemporains) est incontestée est en tant que virtuose du piano : mais, de toute façon, Berlioz n'est pas pianiste, comme il le souligne dans les « Mémoires » (Chapitre 4) et il n'écrit pas de musique pour piano seul.

Il n'est pas aisé de savoir ce que Berlioz pensait de Liszt compositeur (par opposition à Liszt, virtuose du piano) . Dès 1835, il l'encourage ouvertement à entreprendre la composition d'une Symphonie. (« Critique Musicale », tome II ; pages 135-136.) À plusieurs reprises, il exprime un jugement positif sur telle ou telle œuvre de Liszt. Il loue la cantate jouée par Liszt au Festival de Bonn, en 1845, tant dans le rapport qu'il publie que dans une lettre à sa sœur Nanci. (Correspondance Générale, n° 992.) Dans un article du « Journal des Débats » (5 octobre 1854), il nomme les poèmes symphoniques de Liszt « vastes partitions de l'ordre le plus élevé, du style le plus neuf et le plus hardi ». (Se référer à la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1773 et 1776.) À propos du 1^{er} Concerto pour piano qu'il vient de diriger à Weimar, il parle à Liszt de son « magnifique ouvrage, si vigoureux, si neuf, si brillant, si frais et si brûlant » et regrette de ne pouvoir trouver à Paris un pianiste capable d'en donner une exécution satisfaisante. (Correspondance Générale, n° 1918 ; se référer à 2074.) En 1862, après avoir reçu la partition de la « Symphonie Faust » qui lui est dédiée, il la décrit à la princesse : « C'est une grande œuvre ! » (Correspondance Générale, n° 2651 ; se référer à 2632) , mais il n'en est plus question dans sa correspondance par la suite.

Berlioz, aussi, manifeste régulièrement son intérêt pour les exécutions d'œuvres de Liszt : la « Messe de Gran » (Correspondance Générale, numéros 1965, 2168, 2178) , des œuvres pour orchestre à Berlin (Correspondance Générale, n° 2056) et Leipzig (Correspondance Générale, n° 2209) , un Oratorio en Hongrie (Correspondance Générale, n° 3046) . Vers la fin de 1855, il exprime le désir d'exécuter le poème symphonique « Orphée » à la salle Herz, mais le projet n'a pas de suite. (Correspondance Générale, n° 2074.) Berlioz n'a certes jamais joui d'une position comparable à celle de Liszt à Weimar, mais il n'en reste pas moins qu'il n'a jamais œuvré autant pour faire entendre la musique de Liszt que Liszt ne le fit pour lui. Aucune œuvre de Liszt ne figure dans tous les concerts qu'il donne à Bade, en 1853, puis chaque année de 1856 à 1861 ; le nom de Liszt n'entre au programme à Bade qu'en 1865 quand Berlioz n'est plus à la tête du Festival. (Correspondance Générale, n° 3025.) Dans les années 1850 et au début des années 1860, Berlioz n'utilise pas non plus sa position de critique musical pour faire avancer la cause de Liszt autant qu'il l'a fait dans les années 1830.

Le soutien accordé par Liszt à ce que Berlioz appellera, à partir de 1860, « l'école du charivari » (en d'autres termes, la musique de Wagner) finit par fausser le jugement de Berlioz, comme on peut le voir d'après le ton acerbe de 2 lettres de 1864 évoquant la participation de Liszt à un Festival à Karlsruhe. (Correspondance Générale, numéros 2887 et 2888.) Liszt, résigné sans doute au manque de compréhension de Berlioz envers la musique de Wagner, est blessé (et on le comprend) par le rejet de sa propre musique. Le problème éclate en mars et avril 1866, quand Liszt et Berlioz se voient pour la dernière fois. On joue la « Messe de Gran » de Liszt à l'église Saint-Eustache à Paris, et Berlioz est dans l'auditoire ; Liszt est conscient des réserves de Berlioz, mais non des termes précis utilisés par ce dernier dans une lettre à Humbert Ferrand. (Correspondance Générale, n° 3116 ; se référer à 3117.) Plus tard, les lettres de Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand sont publiées (« Lettres Intimes » , 1882) , et Liszt, maintenant âgé, est peiné par ce qu'il lit - triste et déplorable conclusion à l'une des grandes amitiés musicales du siècle.

Correspondance entre Berlioz et Liszt, et entre Berlioz et la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein

Comme pour tout le reste de la correspondance de Berlioz, il y a disproportion dans ce qui a survécu : les lettres connues de Berlioz à Liszt (99) dépassent de beaucoup celles de Liszt à Berlioz (9) , et il en est de même des lettres à la princesse (70) par rapport aux siennes à Berlioz (4) . Tous les chiffres renvoient à la Correspondance générale.

Lettres de Berlioz à Liszt

1830 : 197 (21 décembre) .

1831 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1832 : 303 (19 décembre) .

1833 : 348 (6 octobre) .

1834 : 383 (10 mars) ; 395 (début mai) .

1835 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1836 : 461 (25 janvier) ; 470 (28 avril) ; 478 (27 septembre) .

1837 : 498 (22 mai) ; 504 (20 juillet) .

1838 : 538 (8 février) .

1839 : 622 (22 janvier) ; 660 (6 août) .

1840-1842 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1843 : 800bis (voir le tome VIII ; entre le 18-28 janvier) .

1844 : 890 (16 mars) ; 896 (21 ou 25 avril ?) ; 897 (22 avril) ; 898 (22 ou 26 avril ?) .

1845 : 962 (17 mai) ; 970 (voir le tome VIII ; 29 juin ?) .

1846 : 1030 (26 mars) .

1847 : 1108 (27 avril / 9 mai) .

1848 : 1216 (23 juillet) .

1849 : 1250 (vers le 25 mars) .

1850 : 1295 (8 janvier) .

1851 : 1426 (6 août) ; 1430 (29 août) .

1852 : 1444 (24 janvier) ; 1445 (4 février) ; 1454 (22 février) ; 1456 (2 mars) ; 1462 (29 mars) ; 1471 (12 avril) ; 1491 (7 juin) ; 1499 (2 juillet) ; 1501 (3 ou 4 juillet) ; 1505 (27 ou 28 juillet) ; 1510 (14 août) ; 1520 (10 octobre) ; 1525 (29 octobre) ; 1528 (6 novembre) ; 1529 (10 novembre) ; 1534 (22 novembre) ; 1538 (30 novembre) ; 1543 (20 décembre) ; 1549 (29 décembre) .

1853 : 1552 (1 janvier) ; 1554 (3 janvier) ; 1556 (14 janvier) ; 1559 (20 janvier ?) ; 1560bis (début février) ; 1568 (23 février) ; 1572 (4 mars) ; 1593 (fin avril) ; 1617 (10 juillet) ; 1620 (vers la fin juillet) ; 1624 (3 septembre) ; 1637 (26 octobre) .

1854 : 1690 (15 janvier) ; 1696 (24 janvier) ; 1704 (11 mars) ; 1717 (31 mars) ; 1725 (4 avril) ; 1738 (14 avril) ; 1739 (15 ou 16 avril) ; 1746 (23 avril) ; 1748 (26 avril) ; 1753 (30 avril) ; 1762 (26 mai) ; 1764 (30 mai) ; 1773 (2 juillet) ; 1776 (28 juillet) ; 1799 (15 octobre) ; 1811 (14 novembre) ; 1848 (16 décembre) .

1855 : 1869 (1 janvier) ; 1880 (10 janvier) ; 1893 (7 février) ; 1918 (14 mars) ; 1927 (23 mars) ; 1935 (vers le 14 avril) ; 1959 (30 avril) ; 1965 (10 mai) ; 1975 (7 juin) ; 1987 (24 juin) ; 1995 (21 juillet) ; 2012 (10 septembre) ; 2046 (17 novembre) ; 2056 (30 novembre) ; 2074 (31 décembre) .

1856 : 2115 (12 avril) ; 2149 (29 juin) ; 2178 (8 octobre) .

1857 : 2232 (14 juin) .

1858 : 2317 (28 septembre) ; 2338 (13 décembre) .

1859 : 2428 (4 novembre) ; 2429 (5 novembre) ; 2451 (vers le 20 décembre) .

1860 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1861 : 2551 (10 mai) ; 2552 (31 mai) .

1862 : 2632 (19 juillet) .

1863 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1864 : 2905 (6 octobre) ; 2096 (8 octobre) ; 2907 (9 octobre) .

Lettres de Liszt à Berlioz

1837 : 525 (vers le 8-10 décembre) .

1849 : 1242bis (voir le tome VIII ; 3 janvier) .

1851 : 1428bis (voir le tome VIII ; 20 août) .

1852 : 1459 (21 mars) .

1854 : 1711 (vers le 20-25 mars) .

1856 : 2109 (18 mars) .

1857 : 2207bis (voir le tome VIII ; vers le 10 février) .

1859 : 2447 (8 décembre) .

1864 : 2911 (10 octobre) .

Lettres de Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein

Voir aussi : Christian Wasselin. « Lettres à la Princesse » (2003) .

1852 : 1463 (29 mars) .

1853 : 1589 (23 avril) .

1854 : 1847 (16 décembre) .

1855 : 1962 (6 mai) ; 2005 (septembre) ; 2006 (septembre) ; 2006bis (voir le tome VIII ; septembre ?) ; 2007 (septembre) ; 2017 (14 ou 21 septembre) ; 2019 (vers le 15 ou 22 septembre) ; 2044 (6 novembre) ; 2045 (15 novembre) ; 2065 (16 décembre) .

1856 : 2094 (5 février) ; 2099 (entre le 10-15 février) ; 2126 (17 mai) ; 2145 (24 juin) ; 2150 (29-30 juin) ; 2163 (12 août) ; 2168 (3 septembre) ; 2173 (21 septembre) ; 2183 (14 novembre) ; 2195 (25-26 décembre) .

1857 : 2206 (voir le tome VIII ; 1er février) ; 2209 (13 février) ; 2216 (18 mars) ; 2219 (24 mars) ; 2264 (30 novembre) ; 2269 (27 décembre) .

1858 : 2279 (20 février) ; 2293 (6 mai) .

1859 : 2343 (7 janvier) ; 2347 (22 janvier) ; 2351 (8 février) ; 2361 (10 mars) ; 2380 (20 juin) ; 2390 (10 août) ; 2406 (25 septembre) ; 2418 (21 octobre) ; 2419 (22 octobre) ; 2423 (28 octobre) ; 2430 (7 novembre) ; 2442 (2 décembre) ; 2443 (4 décembre) ; 2449 (13 décembre) .

1860 : Aucune lettre n'a survécu.

1861 : 2557 (vers le 10 juin) .

1862 : 2634 (22 juillet) ; 2651 (21 septembre) .

1863 : 2779 (19 novembre) ; 2814 (23 décembre) .

1864 : 2871 (3 août) ; 2883 (vers le 17 août) ; 2892 (30 août) ; 2899 (24 septembre) ; 2908 (9 octobre) ; 2918 (19 octobre) ; 2923 (30 octobre) .

1865 : 2982 (20 mars) ; 2999 (23 avril) ; 3008 (11 mai) ; 3009 (12 mai) ; 3014 (8 juin) ; 3015 (16 juin) ; 3021 (30 juin) ; 3046 (17 septembre) ; 3069 (24 novembre) .

1866 : 3078 (11 janvier) ; 3092 (30 janvier) ; 3147 (13 juillet) .

1867 : 3290 (11 octobre) ; 3296 (27 octobre) .

Lettres de la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Berlioz

1856 : 2093 (début février) ; 2148ter (voir le tome VIII ; 28 juin) .

1862 : 2656 (27 septembre) .

1866 : 3079 (13-28 janvier) .

1830

Berlioz à son père (Correspondance Générale, n° 190 ; 6 décembre, Paris) :

« Liszt, le célèbre pianiste, m'a pour ainsi dire emmené de force dîner chez lui en m'accablant de tout ce que l'enthousiasme a de plus énergique. »

1833

Liszt à Marie d'Agoult (Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome I : pages 19-20 ; sans date, de Paris) :

« Pauvre Berlioz ! Comme je me retrouve parfois dans son âme. Il est là, à côté de moi. Tout à l'heure, il pleurait, sanglotait dans mes bras et j'ai l'impudence de continuer à vous écrire !

Pourquoi le jour a-t-il été donné au misérable et la lumière à ceux qui sont dans l'amertume du cœur ?

La douleur, toujours la douleur. »

Liszt à Marie d'Agoult (Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome I : pages 22-23 ; 3 mai, de Paris) :

« À propos de musique, j'ai ré-entendu hier soir, à la soirée de l'Europe littéraire, " la Symphonie fantastique " de Berlioz ; jamais cette œuvre ne m'avait paru aussi complète, aussi vraie. Si je ne suis pas tué d'ici à la fin de juin, probablement je me mettrai à l'œuvre, je l'arrangerai pour piano, quelque peine et difficulté qu'il y ait à cette entreprise. Je suis persuadé que vous en serez encore plus étonnée qu'à l'exécution. Pour moi, l'émotion est à peu près nulle maintenant mais l'admiration demeure. J'écoute sans entendre parfaitement, mais je sais que cela est très beau, je le dis, je le pense. »

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 342 ; 30 août, Paris) :

« Liszt vient d'arranger ma Symphonie pour le piano ; c'est étonnant. »

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 357 ; 25 octobre, Paris) :

« En outre, Liszt vient de réduire pour le piano seul, la Symphonie entière. On va la graver, et cela vous suffira pour vous en rafraîchir la mémoire. »

1834

Berlioz à sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 397 ; 12 mai, Montmartre) :

« Nous avons eu, lundi dernier, une espèce de petite partie de campagne. Mes amis sont venus passer une demi-journée chez moi. C'étaient des célébrités musicales et poétiques, Messieurs Alfred de Vigny, Antoni Deschamps, Liszt, Hiller et Chopin. Nous avons causé, discuté art, poésie, pensée, musique, drame, enfin ce qui constitue la vie, en présence de cette belle nature, de ce soleil d'Italie que nous avons depuis quelques jours. »

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 416 ; 30 novembre, Montmartre) :

« " La Symphonie fantastique " a paru ; mais comme ce pauvre Liszt a dépensé horriblement d'argent pour cette publication, nous sommes convenus avec Schlesinger de ne pas consentir à ce qu'il donne un seul exemplaire ; à telles enseignes que, moi, je n'en ai pas un. Ils coûtent 20 francs ; voulez-vous que je vous en achète un ? Je voudrais bien pouvoir vous l'envoyer sans tout ce préambule ; mais vous savez que, pendant quelque temps encore, notre position sera assez gênée. »

1835

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 453 ; 16 décembre, Montmartre) :

« J'ai un grand succès en Allemagne, dû à l'arrangement de piano de ma " Symphonie Fantastique ", par Liszt. On m'a envoyé une liasse de journaux de Leipzig et de Berlin, dans lesquels Fétis a été, à mon sujet, roulé d'importance. Liszt n'est pas ici. D'ailleurs, nous sommes trop liés pour que son nom ne fit pas tort à l'article au lieu de lui être utile. »

1837

Liszt à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 525 ; vers le 8-10 décembre, de Milan) :

« Grâce à Dieu, j'ai eu assez de bon sens pour comprendre tout d'abord la portée de ton génie, la haute et incontestable valeur de tes Iers ouvrages, je crois aussi avoir le droit non pas de te complimenter de ton succès aux Invalides (ce qui serait une bêtise entre nous) , mais de me réjouir sincèrement et vivement de ce que pleine et entière justice t'ait été rendue une bonne fois.

Le regret que j'avais de ne pas assister à l'exécution de ta Messe, se trouve aussi adouci par l'idée qu'à cette heure plusieurs obstacles seront levés pour toi et que, probablement, tu arriveras au but désiré avant peu. Il est temps enfin. Assez longtemps, tu souffres et tu luttas avec un inébranlable courage. Il faut que la récompense vienne à ceux qui ont persévéré comme toi.

Tu recevras d'ici à peu l'arrangement de piano de ta seconde Symphonie. Si ton intention était de la livrer au public (ainsi que les Ouvertures des " Francs-Juges " et du " Roi Lear ") , Hoffmeister à Leipzig, me paye 6 francs par page pour tout ce que je lui envoie. Ce serait, par conséquent, environ 600 francs. Tu pourrais ne la publier qu'en Allemagne en supposant qu'on ne trouve point à la vendre à Paris ou en tout cas il faudrait garder ta propriété d'auteur pour plus tard s'il y a lieu. Réponds-moi là-dessus quand tu en auras le temps. Quoiqu'il me serait agréable que ces choses parussent, je tiens avant tout, à ne faire que ce qui te convient entièrement. Une autre chose que je veux te demander, c'est de m'envoyer aussitôt qu'elle aura paru ta " Messe des Morts " et d'y joindre les scènes de " Faust " (publiées chez Schlesinger) que je voudrais revoir. »

1839

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 622 ; 22 janvier, Paris) :

« J'allais t'écrire pour te remercier précisément de l'article dont tu me parles. Il a paru dans la " Gazette musicale ", 2 jours après la reprise de mon Opéra, et je t'avoue qu'il m'a touché plus que je ne saurais dire ; l'à-propos de son insertion est en outre un hasard heureux qui ne te fâchera pas. Oh, tu m'as fait bien plaisir ! Je n'ai rien changé à ta rédaction n'ayant appris l'existence de ton article qu'en le lisant dans le numéro du journal où l'on rendait compte de ma représentation. Merci ! tu es un bon, un excellent ami.

Tu ne me dis rien de Paganini ! C'est beau pourtant ! Tu aurais fait ça toi ! Réellement, mon dernier concert a été magnifique, je n'ai jamais été exécuté ni compris comme ce jour-là.

Je rumine en ce moment une nouvelle Symphonie, je voudrais bien aller la finir près de toi, à Sorrente ou à Amalfi (va à Amalfi) mais impossible, je suis sur la brèche, il faut y rester.

Bah ! J'aime cette vie-là ; j'aime à nager en mer ; tout comme toi. Et, à force de nous rouler dans les vagues, nous finirons par les dompter et par ne plus leur permettre de nous passer sur la tête.

Que je suis content de bavarder avec toi, ce soir ! Je t'aime beaucoup, Liszt. Quand nous reviendras-tu ? Aurons-nous encore des heures de causeries enfumées, avec tes longues pipes et ton tabac turc ? »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 660 ; 6 août, Paris ; voir « Critique Musicale » , tome IV : pages 131-137) :

« O vagabond infatigable ! quand reviendras-tu donc pour nous rendre ces nuits musicales que tu présidais si dignement ? Entre nous, il y avait trop de monde à tes réunions, on parlait trop, on n'écoutait pas assez, on philosophait. Tu faisais une dépense affreuse d'inspiration qui eût donné le vertige à quelques uns sans tous les autres. Te rappelles-tu notre soirée chez Legouvé, et la Sonate en ut dièze mineur, et la lampe éteinte, et les 5 auditeurs couchés sur le tapis dans cette obscurité, et notre magnétisation, et les larmes de Legouvé et les miennes, et le respectueux silence de Schœlcher, et l'étonnement de Monsieur Goubeaux ? Mon Dieu, mon Dieu, que tu fus sublime, ce soir-là !

Adieu ; mon indifférence ne va pas jusqu'à prendre mon parti de ta longue absence ; reviens, reviens donc ; il en est temps pour nous, et pour toi, je l'espère. »

1844

Liszt à Marie d'Agoult (Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome 2 : pages 322-323; 23 janvier, de Weimar) :

« J'ai remis en vigueur la Chapelle (à Weimar) , organisé des concerts, lesquels, sans trop de fatuité, étaient à peu près impossibles sans moi. Je soutiens aussi une thèse assez brillante et qui me donne une sorte de position tant que je ne tomberai pas en défaveur (ce qui du reste ne me paraît guère probable) . Cette thèse qui vous semblera peut-être une marotte, je vous l'écrirai tout au long puisque vous y attachez un intérêt de curiosité.

Une position définie, circonscrite, ne m'est jamais échue en partage nulle part. Inconnue ailleurs, une faveur marquée, des invitations nombreuses à la Cour me mettent sur un pied différent d'un virtuose ou d'un Maître de chapelle, soit. Voici donc mon programme que je répète partiellement ou fragmentairement à tout propos, comme le bonhomme Marius (en fait, Caton l'Ancien) : “ Delenda Carthago ”, ou le général Bertrand : “ Je vote pour la liberté indéfinie de la Presse. ” Non pas “ Delenda Carthago ”, mais “ Ædificanda Vimaria ”.

Weimar était sous le grand-duc Charles Auguste une nouvelle Athènes, songeons aujourd'hui à construire la nouvelle Weimar. Renouons franchement et hautement les traditions de Charles-Auguste. Laissons les talents agir librement dans leur sphère. Colonisons le plus possible et tâchons d'arriver peu à peu à ce triple résultat qui doit être toute la politique, tout le gouvernement, l'Alpha et l'Oméga enfin de tout Weimar : une Cour aussi charmante, aussi brillante, aussi attractive que possible ; un théâtre et une littérature qui ne pourrisse pas dans les combles du grenier et qui ne se noie pas dans les soupentes des caves ; et, enfin, une Université (léna) . Cour, Théâtre, Université, voilà la grande triologie (sic) pour un état comme Weimar qui ne saurait tirer d'importance ni de son commerce, ni de son industrie, ni de son armée de terre, ni de son armée de mer, etc. , etc.

Voilà ainsi mon thème principal que je chanterai ici sur tous les tons dans le lointain espoir de faire peut-être un peu de bien, mais qui peut se flatter d'en faire ! »

1845

Berlioz à sa sœur Nanci (Correspondance Générale, n° 968 ; 6 juin, Paris) :

« Ta lettre m'a vivement intéressé, rien n'est plus curieux pour nous autres artistes que d'étudier les impressions de l'art sur les natures vierges comme la tienne. Je conçois donc à merveille l'effet que Liszt a produit sur toi ; seulement, je m'étonne que ce soit l'Ouverture de " Guillaume Tell " qui t'ait émue davantage ; car c'est un morceau que, selon moi, il a tout à fait manqué et qui produit à Paris moins de sensation que tous ceux de son répertoire.

Je suis ravi qu'il n'ait rien joué de moi à Grenoble, je déteste tous ces arrangements qui ne sont que des dérangements et qui donnent toujours une idée grotesque des morceaux que les pianistes ont choisis. (Cela est entre nous bien entendu.) . Ah ! j'aurais voulu pouvoir te faire entendre au dernier concert du cirque mon " Dies Irae " et je crois que tu en aurais tremblé 2 bonnes heures au moins. Mais il paraît que vous n'entendrez jamais rien de ma façon. »

Berlioz à sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 969 ; 6 juin, Paris) :

« Nanci a été toute bouleversée par le jeu de Liszt, elle regrette qu'à son passage à Grenoble il n'ait rien joué de mes compositions ; je suis ravi de cela au contraire ; rien ne me déplaît davantage que ces travestissements de l'orchestre en piano. Et si tant est que je paraisse devant mes compatriotes, encore faut-il que ce soit dans mon état naturel et avec tous mes charmes. Malheureusement, je crois bien que cela ne m'arrivera qu'au cas où le Dauphiné ferait une émigration à Paris. Liszt a voulu me faire aller à Bonn pour l'inauguration du monument de Beethoven, grande fête musicale qui aura lieu au mois d'août. Mais les arrangements financiers ne me vont pas jusqu'à présent, et je suis obligé de convenir que l'or n'est pas une chimère, quoi qu'en dise Scribe. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 962 et 992.

1846

Voir la Correspondance Générale, n° 1034.

1847

Liszt à Marie d'Agoult (Correspondance de Liszt et de la comtesse d'Agoult, 2 volumes, Paris, 1933-1934, tome 2 : page 383 ; mai, de lassyl) :

« Berlioz m'écrit une grande et (illisible) lettre [Correspondance Générale, n° 1108] de Pétersbourg par l'intermédiaire de la Princesse Wittgenstein (qui est ma nouvelle découverte de princesse, comme disait Madame Allart, à cette différence près que nous ne songeons nullement à être amoureux l'un de l'autre) . Il a donné 4 concerts et me dit avoir tout lieu d'être enchanté de son succès et de l'argent qu'il y a gagné. Le roi de Prusse l'a engagé à monter “ La Damnation de Faust ” au théâtre de Berlin, et il se rendra à cette invitation ; mais le ton de sa lettre est désespéré comme un glas funèbre. Pauvre grand génie aux prises avec les 3 quarts de l'impossible ! »

Berlioz à Belloni (Correspondance Générale, n° 1154 ; 19 décembre, Londres) :

« Je suis bien heureux d'avoir enfin des nouvelles de Liszt ; je lui écrivis l'hiver dernier de Pétersbourg par l'entremise de Madame la Comtesse de Wiltenshtein (Sayn-Wittgentstein !) qui se chargea de lui faire parvenir ma lettre ; je crains qu'elle ne soit égarée (la lettre !) .Vraiment, je suis chagriné plus que je ne puis dire de rester si longtemps sans communications avec Liszt. Remerciez-le de ma part d'avoir songé aux 2 ouvrages dont vous me parlez. Mais, pour “ Roméo et Juliette ”, il n'y faut plus penser ; cette Symphonie est publiée, et, ne le fût-elle pas, le nom de Paganini, qui me la fit écrire, était le seul qui dût figurer dans la dédicace ; la reconnaissance et l'admiration eussent été cruellement outragées si j'avais un instant songé à agir autrement.

Quant à “ Faust ”, il n'est pas gravé, et il se développe même en ce moment d'une façon effrayante, car Scribe l'arrange en grand Opéra pour notre saison prochaine de Londres.

Pour en revenir aux dédicaces, dites à Liszt que je regrette de n'avoir pu adresser galamment “ Roméo ” à la personne qu'il voulait m'indiquer, et que pour “ Faust ”, quand on le publiera, j'ai en vue un prince de l'art que je préfère de beaucoup à tous les princes de la terre, même au prince héréditaire de Weimar qui est fort aimable et dont j'ai fait la connaissance à Paris il y a 2 ans : c'est à Liszt que je comptais dédier cette partition, et pour tous les cadeaux princiers imaginables, je ne renoncerais à me donner ce plaisir.

“ Faust ” est, je crois, parmi mes œuvres, la plus spécialement digne de lui être offerte ; il ne la connaît pas, mais je lui en donne ma parole, et il me croira. »

1849

Liszt à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 1242bis - tome VIII ; 3 janvier, de Weimar) :

« Depuis 7 mois, je n'ai pas quitté Weimar, où je compte encore passer tout l'hiver. J'y travaille et fais travailler chanteurs et orchestres, en m'occupant assez activement du théâtre. Le mois prochain, nous représenterons le dernier Opéra de Wagner, " Tannhäuser " ; c'est une grande partition dont je te recommande en particulier l'Ouverture, où tu auras le plaisir de retrouver de ton bien, notamment dans les effets de violons en trémolos aigus.

Somme toute, cette Ouverture est le morceau de musique qui m'a fait la plus forte impression depuis notre rencontre à Prague ; et si tu as l'occasion de la faire exécuter à quelque concert monstre de la République, je suis persuadé qu'elle ne manquera pas son effet. Il importe seulement de la faire répéter avec beaucoup de soin.

L'été prochain, j'espère que le singulier drame-Roman de ma vie sera arrivé à son dénouement par un mariage. Les énormités complexes d'une lâche et infâme ligue de famille, à laquelle le peu de bienveillance personnelle de Sa Majesté l'Empereur pour moi, vient en plus s'ajouter, peut sans doute retarder encore la conclusion que j'appelle de tous les vœux de mon âme ; mais avec l'inébranlable fermeté, la sublime hauteur du caractère et des sentiments de la Princesse Wittgenstein (laquelle a gardé de toi le souvenir le plus enthousiaste et le plus affectueux qu'elle me charge de t'exprimer) , ces difficultés ne sauraient se prolonger au-delà d'un certain temps assez court et quelques déplorables que puissent être les événements qui viennent et viendront se jeter à la traverse d'un sentiment suprême et absolu, j'ai tout lieu d'avoir plein espoir dans la prochaine réalisation de ce mariage. »

1851

Voir la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1426 et 1430.

1852

Liszt à son agent Belloni (texte cité par David Cairns. « Hector Berlioz » , 2002, tome 2 : pages 506-507 ; 14 janvier, de Weimar) :

« Après le succès de " Cellini " (que je ne mets pas en doute) , j'aviserais aux moyens de faire exécuter ici convenablement " la Symphonie dramatique de Roméo et Juliette ", " la Symphonie Fantastique ", etc. , et j'espère qu'il ne se passera (pas ?) plus d'un an que je ne parvienne à donner soit à Leipzig, soit ailleurs dans notre voisinage (car, ici, nous manquons malheureusement d'un local assez considérable pour une pareille solennité, sans compter les nombreuses difficultés qui se rencontreraient pour réunir un personnel de 300 à 400 musiciens tant chanteurs qu'instrumentistes) , le " Requiem " de Berlioz, en entier. Quand vous le verrez, vous pouvez lui dire, qu'amitié à part, je tiens à l'honneur de faire peu à peu à ses œuvres la place qu'elles méritent en Allemagne. C'est une question d'art et de conviction pour moi. Par conséquent, il s'agit de la résoudre sérieusement, dignement, sans blague d'aucune espèce. Or, vous savez, mon cher Belloni, que je ne manque ni de persévérance, ni peut-être de savoir faire, et s'il ne dépend pas toujours de moi de disposer de certaines circonstances et opportunité indispensable, je tâche néanmoins de m'arranger de façon à mettre le temps à profit. Il est un très petit nombre d'œuvres et d'hommes qu'on ne peut comprendre et admirer à demi. Aussi, est-ce à mon sens mal les servir que de leur marchander la part qui est à leur faire. Il faut les traiter autrement que les autres. Berlioz est de ce nombre et je me plais à croire qu'il ne se méprendra pas sur les motifs qui m'ont différé jusqu'ici à m'occuper activement de l'exécution régulière et continue de ses œuvres en Allemagne. D'une part, je n'avais pas les moyens matériels en main (car il doit se souvenir de l'état au dessous de médiocre dans lequel il a trouvé l'Orchestre de Weimar sous la direction de Chélaré !), et de l'autre, il ne m'a pas fallu moins que ces 2 dernières années pour arriver au crédit moral nécessaire pour imposer à peu près le silence à la cohue des encroûtés, des imbéciles, des cuistres, etc., etc., etc. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1471 ; 12 avril, de Londres) :

« Tu me parles du Catalogue de mes ouvrages publié par mes Éditeurs de Paris. Tu le trouveras reproduit dans l'« Union Record » que je t'envoie et qui a annoncé aussi en 3 mots (« no more ») la mise en scène de « Benvenuto » à Weimar.

Il y a dans cette liste exorbitante, comme dit notre Caberetier Romain, bien des choses que je n'ai jamais entendues, entre autres, « Les Tristia », le « Te Deum » et l'Ouverture du « Corsaire » ; on grave en ce moment la Ire et la dernière de ces partitions. Quant au « Te Deum », je ne sais qu'en faire, c'est le canot de Robinson, il me faudra creuser un canal pour le faire arriver à la mer.

Les fragments de « La fuite en Égypte », mystère attribué à Pierre Ducre, Maître de chapelle imaginaire, sont le résultat d'une petite farce que j'ai faite à nos bons gendarmes de la critique Française. Je leur ai fait entendre 2 fois « l'Adieu des Bergers » de cet ancien Maître et quand ils ont eu bien divagué sur la vieille école et le style pur et simple, je me suis nommé, et j'ai vendu la partition à Richaut avec « Tristia » et « le Corsaire ». »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1501 ; 3 ou 4 juillet, de Paris) :

« J'ai retrouvé ta partition de piano d'« Harold », mais point de « Roi Lear » ce qui me confirme dans l'idée où je suis d'avoir remis cette Ouverture à Belloni avec celle des « Francs-Juges ». Tu auras beaucoup à changer dans ton manuscrit à cause des changements que j'ai faits dans la partition après que ton travail a été terminé. Le 3e morceau surtout contient une foule de modifications qui, je le crains, sont intraduisibles sur le piano, il faudra sacrifier beaucoup de tenues. Je te prie aussi de ne pas conserver la forme de trémolo arpégé que tu emploies dans l'introduction à la main gauche, cela produit au piano l'effet contraire de l'orchestre et empêche de bien distinguer le dessin lourd mais calme des basses. C'est encore un effet de trémolo à sacrifier, je le crains, et qui en tout cas, transporté ainsi au grave fait trop de bruit et distrait l'attention. D'un autre côté, ne penses-tu pas que la part que tu donnes à l'alto, plus grande que celle qu'il a dans la partition, altère la physionomie de l'ouvrage ? L'alto ne doit intervenir dans la partition de piano que de la façon dont il est employé dans l'autre. Ici, le piano représente l'orchestre, l'alto doit demeurer à part et se renfermer dans son radotage sentimental, tout le reste lui est étranger, il assiste à l'action et ne s'y mêle point. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1525 ; 29 octobre, de Paris) :

« En tout cas, je ferai mon possible pour aller te voir avant mon départ pour Londres. J'ai tant besoin de causer avec toi. L'exécution du " Requiem " a été grandiose sinon délicate, et jamais, depuis que je l'ai écrite, cette partition n'a produit un pareil effet. Combien j'aurais désiré te la faire entendre. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1543 ; 20 décembre, de Paris) :

« Maintenant, quant à Leipzig, je te prie de ne pas leur envoyer ce que je te confie ; je ne sais entre les mains de qui cette exécution tombera et je ne suis pas du tout désireux d'être entendu à Leipzig EN MON ABSENCE. Si une société veut mon ouvrage sérieusement et EN ENTIER, il faut que j'en surveille et dirige l'exécution. En ce cas, j'y consentirai. Sinon, non. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1459, 1462, 1463, 1471, 1489, 1499, 1520, 1538 ; et « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 volumes, Leipzig (1910) , numéros 70, 71, 78, 79, 81, 82.

1853

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1568 ; 23 février, de Paris) :

« Ton désir de me voir écrire une Messe solennelle me flatte beaucoup, bien que je ne sois pas le moins du monde certain de faire sur ce texte ressassé quelque chose de nouveau. Mais une Messe solennelle est la pire des grandes compositions à tenter, si l'on tient compte des chances qu'elle a d'être bien et souvent exécutée. Il n'y a pour tirer d'affaire le compositeur, qu'une commande Royale (comme tu le dis) . Mais les Rois et les Empereurs ont autre chose à commander par le temps qui court.

Tu vois, par l'exemple de mon " Te Deum ", quelles facilités j'aurais pour produire en France une œuvre pareille. En Angleterre, en Prusse et partout où règnent ces affreux schismes, bâtards scrofuleux du rationalisme, qu'on nomme Protestantisme, Luthérianisme ou tout autre chose en isme, les Messes sont un objet d'horreur. Les " Requiem " ont, au moins chez nous, une protectrice, la plus puissante de toutes, infatigable, et toujours à l'œuvre, la mort. Quant aux chants de reconnaissance, d'exultation, de foi, il n'y faut pas penser.

On annonce une cérémonie funèbre pour l'anniversaire de la mort de l'Empereur Napoléon, au 5 mai prochain ; ce serait le cas d'y faire exécuter mon " Requiem " ; on s'en gardera bien. Quelque plate combinaison l'emportera encore, même sur le bon vouloir des gens les mieux placés pour faire une chose convenable. Et, pardieu, s'il y eut jamais un " Requiem " destiné à une cérémonie pareille, je jure que c'est celui-là.

Tu ne l'a jamais entendu, et tu l'aimes pourtant !

Je me console de n'avoir pas fait 37 Opéras-comiques ; et de bien d'autres malheurs plus réels. Je te dis ces naïvetés parce que j'ai la tête pleine de cette partition, ayant passé ces derniers jours à corriger les épreuves de la nouvelle édition qu'en a fait Ricordi, à Milan. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1593 ; fin avril, de Paris) :

« J'allais oublier de te dire que, depuis que ton arrangement du " Roi Lear " a été fait, j'ai changé la coda de cette Ouverture. Tu en as je crois la grande partition. Prends donc la peine de revoir cette fin. En outre, je te prie de chercher une forme de trait de piano pour le passage de la péroration :

Toutes les fois que ce dessin se présente, tu as employé des triolets en octaves. Or, le triolet est tout à fait insuffisant à rendre l'effet des croches ; le rythme ternaire est là, inconciliable avec le caractère échevelé que j'ai voulu reproduire. On ne pourra pas avoir d'octaves, il est vrai, mais c'est un sacrifice qu'il faut faire, et tu trouveras j'en suis sûr quelque terrible et excellent moyen de faire entendre à peu près telles qu'elles sont, les 8 croches que contient chaque mesure. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1620 ; fin juillet, Paris) :

« Tu m'écris des lettres de 12 pages pour me parler de moi et de mes affaires, et j'ai la naïveté de te répondre sur le même sujet.

Mais ce n'est que de la naïveté, jointe à un peu de crainte de m'avancer indiscrètement sur des sujets que tu ne veux pas aborder. Sois bien persuadé, très cher Liszt, que personne, personne, entends-tu bien, ne s'intéresse plus vivement à tout ce qui te touche et que nul ne sera plus heureux que moi de la solution des difficultés qui s'opposent encore au repos de ta vie. »

Berlioz à sa sœur Adèle (Correspondance Générale, n° 1631 ; début octobre, de Paris) :

« Je te disais donc que, demain, commence le Festival de Karlsruhe dans lequel on exécute ma " Symphonie de Roméo et Juliette ". Le Grand Duc de Bade m'a fait adresser une invitation ; mais je n'ai pas le temps d'y aller. C'est Liszt qui dirige tout cela, il me donnera les détails qui peuvent m'intéresser. D'ailleurs, je n'aime pas à entendre ma musique quand je n'en conduis pas moi-même l'exécution. Sous ce rapport, je suis comme Spontini, qui se trouva mal, un soir à Dresde, de douleur, en entendant exécuter à contre-temps sa " Vestale ". »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1589, 1617, 1624, 1696 ; et « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 volumes, Leipzig (1910) , numéros 123, 124, 135.

1854

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1773 ; 2 juillet, de Paris) :

« Je vois par un journal que tu as fait exécuter ton " Mazeppa ", à Weimar ; tu devrais bien m'écrire là-dessus quelques détails ; j'en profiterais pour mon prochain feuilleton. Je dirais (ce qui est vrai) , que j'ai parcouru la partition à mon dernier passage à Weimar. Je m'en tirerai de façon à ne pas te compromettre, sois tranquille. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1848 ; 16 décembre, de Paris) :

« Ainsi, je suis devenu bon enfant, humain, clair, mélodique, je fais enfin de la musique comme tout le monde, voilà qui est bien convenu. Adieu, la sensation causée par cette conversion augmente ; laissons-la augmenter. L'article de Scudo a mis tout le monde en rage, c'est excellent.

Je te dirai à toi que la véritable trouvaille que j'ai faite c'est la scène de l'air d'Hérode avec les Devins, ceci est d'un grand caractère et qui t'ira je l'espère.

Pour les choses gracieuses qui touchent davantage, à l'exception du Duo de Bethléem, je ne crois pas qu'elles aient autant de valeur d'invention. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1690, 1725, 1811 ; et « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt » , 2 volumes, Leipzig (1910) , n° 145.

1855

Berlioz à son beau-frère, Marc Suat (Correspondance Générale, n° 1901 ; 27 février, de Weimar) :

« J'ai à vous consulter aussi pour une grosse affaire qu'il faut que je fasse absolument. Il s'agit d'une édition allemande de mes œuvres complètes. Je veux la publier à Leipzig où je redeviendrai ainsi propriétaire de tout mon répertoire qui ne me rapporte plus rien à Paris et qui a été cédé pour presque rien aux éditeurs français. Il faut que je puisse disposer avec certitude d'une certaine somme tous les ans pour payer les frais de gravure et d'impression, au fur et à mesure que les œuvres paraîtront.

Cela ne me rapportera rien de longtemps, mais cela peut acquérir une grande valeur plus tard, et j'aurai une édition soignée, exacte, admirable, de moitié meilleur marché que les éditions françaises, inabordable pour les allemands, à cause de leur prix, et enfin mon œuvre sera sauvée. Liszt m'a offert d'être mon fondé de pouvoir pour les opérations que cette affaire nécessitera. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1918 ; 14 mars, de Bruxelles) :

« Je sais maintenant que je pourrai affecter de 1,500 à 1,800 francs par an à mon édition allemande. En tout cas, je commencerai par les partitions non publiées et rien ne m'obligerait à continuer ensuite si je ne pouvais pas aller.

Mon avis serait de commencer par la grande partition de " Cellini " que je voudrais pouvoir placer sous le patronage de Madame La Grande Duchesse Douairière de Weimar, en la lui dédiant, puisque c'est feu le Grand Duc (ou peut-être elle-même) qui t'a donné le moyen de galvaniser ce pauvre Opéra. Mais si tu vas à Leipzig, veuillez t'informer chez Hoffmeister des arrangements qu'il y aurait ultérieurement à prendre avec lui au sujet des 3 ou 4 partitions dont Richaut lui a cédé la propriété en Allemagne, quoique lui, Hoffmeister, ne les ait pas publiées. Il serait peut-être mieux de prendre Hoffmeister pour dépositaire de ma publication et de lui donner un intérêt dans la vente, si vente il y a.

Demande aussi ce que coûteront la gravure et l'étain de chaque grande planche (comme celles de mon " Requiem ") plus grande d'un pouce et demi en hauteur et en largeur que celles de l'édition de Bach que tu m'as montrée. C'est le format que je veux adopter pour toute ma collection. Il y aura je crois économie, à cause de la grande quantité de lignes et de mesures que ces planches peuvent contenir.

J'ai voulu te demander ton Concerto pour mon concert du 7 avril à l'Opéra-comique, mais informations prises il se trouve que Fumagalli, à qui je le destinais, est si faible musicien qu'il lui faudrait 2 mois pour l'apprendre. J'ai donc renoncé à cette idée qui me souriait fort dans la crainte de faire incomplètement exécuter ton magnifique ouvrage, si vigoureux, si neuf, si brillant, si frais et si brûlant. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1927 ; 23 mars, de Bruxelles) :

« Je te remercie encore une fois de vouloir bien être mon Firmin Didot ; nous irons doucement et prudemment. Je ne sais si je t'ai appris que Richaut gravait à la fois " l'Enfance " et le " Monodrame ". Je t'enverrai cela aussitôt que les premiers exemplaires paraîtront.

J'ai beaucoup parlé de toi dernièrement avec une dame fort enthousiaste à sa manière des grandes choses de l'art. " O Liszt ! me disait-elle, j'aime tant Liszt, que vraiment entre un bon Opéra italien et une soirée musicale de Liszt, je crois que n'hésiterais pas, je me déciderais pour Liszt ! " »

Mille amitiés à nos excellents amis, Raff, Cornelius, Pohl. Il faudra donc renoncer à te voir à Paris cette année ! J'avais déjà annoncé ta venue à tout le monde.

Adieu, je reste aux pieds de la princesse, et, en ta qualité de Prospero, je te prie de faire agréer mes respectueux hommages à la jeune belle Miranda. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1935 ; vers le 14 avril, de Paris) :

« Voici des réclames pour le " Te Deum " ; veux-tu être assez bon pour les faire traduire et reproduire dans les journaux de Weimar et de Leipzig où tu connais quelqu'un. Il faut que cela se répande immensément pour que, la veille de l'ouverture de l'Exposition, notre immense église soit pleine.

A propos du " Te Deum ", j'ai purement et simplement supprimé le prélude où se trouvent les modulations douteuses. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1959 ; 30 avril, de Paris) :

« Je t'écris 3 lignes pour te dire que le " Te Deum " a été exécuté aujourd'hui avec la plus magnifique précision. C'était colossal, Babylonien, Ninivite. La splendide église était pleine. Les enfants ont chanté comme un seul artiste ; et les artistes comme je l'espérais et comme j'avais le droit de l'attendre d'eux à cause de la sévérité qui avait dicté mon choix. Pas une faute, pas une indécision. J'avais un jeune homme venu de Bruxelles (Adolphe Samuel) qui conduisait au loin l'organiste dans sa tribune et qui l'a fait marcher malgré l'éloignement.

Mon dieu que n'étais-tu là ! Je t'assure que c'est une œuvre formidable, le " Judex " dépasse toutes les énormités dont je me suis rendu coupable auparavant. Je t'écris à toi le 1er, tout harassé que je suis, parce que je sais bien que pas un homme en Europe ne s'intéresse à cet avènement autant que toi. Oui, le " Requiem " a un frère, un frère qui est venu au monde avec des dents, comme Richard III (moins la bosse) ; et je te réponds qu'il a mordu au cœur le public, aujourd'hui. Et quel immense public ! Nous étions 950 exécutants. Et pas une faute ! Je n'en reviens pas. Il m'était venu des amis de Marseille (Lecourt, Rémusat, etc.) . Lecourt était dans un état ; il ruisselait, c'était un fleuve ! Adieu, je vais me coucher. Quel malheur que je sois l'auteur de cela ! Je ferais un article curieux. Nous allons voir ce que vont chanter les confrères. Cette fois, il ne s'agit pas de " Piccoli paësi ", c'est une scène de l'apocalypse. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 1965 ; 10 mai, de Paris) :

« Si tu veux bien t'intéresser à une exécution du " Te Deum " plus tard, c'est tout ce que ton amitié infatigable pourra faire de plus pour l'auteur. Laissons aller les choses quant au reste. Si j'ai le temps de rassembler tous les journaux qui en ont parlé et en parleront, je te l'enverrai.

Hier, je t'ai envoyé en un paquet 3 volumes manuscrits reliés, que je t'avais promis. Tu sais que Monsieur Pohl veut bien se charger d'en faire la traduction, qu'il s'engage à ne pas publier de mon vivant et dont je lui cède toute la propriété en Allemagne. Il y aura là-dedans une foule de mots, d'allusions et de locutions tout à fait inintelligibles pour lui, mais je te prie de vouloir bien les lui expliquer.

Si je mourais avant d'avoir reçu de toi mon manuscrit, je te prie de le garder et d'en arranger une publication fidèle aussi avec Michel Lévy (Rue Vivienne) qui me l'a déjà proposée. Tu remettrais alors le produit de cette vente, quel qu'il soit, moitié à ma femme moitié à mon fils.

Pardon de te parler sur ce ton testamentaire ; mais, comme disent les bonnes femmes, cela ne fait pas mourir.

Feras-tu graver ta Messe catholique ? Malgré les fleurs du Jardin du Vatican dont tu l'as parsemée, je serais bien heureux de la connaître.

Nos paysans n'achètent pas autrement. Cela éloigne beaucoup mes projets d'édition allemande. Prends néanmoins toutes les informations auprès de Härtel, comme si j'allais l'entreprendre bientôt. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2046 ; 17 novembre, de Paris) :

« Je t'écris 6 lignes pour te dire que les 2 immenses batailles d'hier et d'avant-hier ont été gagnées. L'orchestre géant a fonctionné comme un quatuor. Hier surtout, nous avons descendu l'orchestre dans la grande nef, et la sonorité ayant par cela même gagné une puissance double, l'effet a été immense. Il y a eu un auditoire apocalyptique, je me suis cru dans la vallée de Josaphat ; 60,000 et quelques cents francs de recette !

Le jour de la cérémonie officielle dont je ne t'essaierai pas de te décrire la splendeur Babylonienne, l'orchestre a fait scandale. Après mon morceau de l'Apothéose, malgré l'étiquette, mes gaillards on fait un tapage de hurrahs, d'applaudissements, ont jeté leurs chapeaux en l'air, comme s'ils se fussent trouvés à une répétition.

Je voudrais bien te faire connaître la cantate (" L'Impériale ") , il y a là un tremblement final, à la reprise du thème :

“ Du peuple entier les âmes triomphantes
“ Ont tressailli, comme au cri du destin,
“ Quand des canons les voix retentissantes
“ Ont annoncé le jour qui vient de luire enfin. ”

Et sous ce raz de marée, les tambours battent aux champs comme à l'entrée de l'Empereur dans les cérémonies religieuses.

Je t'assure que cette Polka te donnerait envie de danser. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2056 ; 30 novembre, Paris) :

« Quand se réalisent tes projets sur Berlin ? Quelles œuvres y feras-tu entendre ? ton laconisme, au sujet de tes ouvrages, me cause une humiliation rentrée ; je suis d'une expansion honteuse quand il s'agit des miennes. Si tu continues, à l'avenir, je ne te parlerai dans mes lettres que politique, ou morale, ou conchyologie. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2074 ; 31 décembre, Paris) :

« Si je puis, à mon retour de Weimar, y donner (Salle Herz) un autre concert sans chœurs, je pourrai alors avoir un orchestre entier. En ce cas, je serais assez hardi pour tenter la dépense des 2 répétitions (!!!!) et je te demanderais ton poème symphonique sur " Orphée ", si tu n'y vois pas d'inconvénient. Je ne connais personne ici capable de rendre convenablement ton 1er Concerto en mi bémol, sans quoi, je te le demanderais aussi. Au reste, nous causerons de tout cela dans quelques semaines. Ces 2 morceaux sont, ce me semble, ceux qui conviendraient le mieux dans une si petite salle. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 1869, 1880, 1975, 1987 ; et « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt

» , 2 volumes, Leipzig (1910) , numéros 187, 188, 192.

1856

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2168 ; 3 septembre, Paris) :

« J'apprends de vous de bonnes et belles choses du séjour de Liszt en Hongrie ; mais quand et comment sera exécutée sa Messe, c'est ce que vous ne me dites point. Son noble profil, appendu au-dessus de mon piano, a semblé me sourire, quand je suis rentré chez moi hier en revenant de Plombières.

Tout va donc bien ! Je veux le croire. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2093, 2145, 2148ter, 2163, 2195.

1857

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2209 ; 13 février, Paris) :

« Quand Liszt sera revenu de son excursion à Leipzig, vous seriez bien bonne de me donner quelques détails sur l'exécution de ses œuvres au " Gewandhaus ", et de me parler des siens.

Remerciez, je vous prie, cet excellent Liszt de son infatigable et persévérante amitié. Je suis très heureux d'apprendre qu'on exécutera " l'Enfance du Christ " au Festival d'Aix-la-Chapelle. Mais Liszt serait bien aimable de m'écrire un mot au sujet de l'époque où se commenceront les études chorales de cet ouvrage et des autres détails de l'exécution. Est-ce de l'ouvrage entier qu'il s'agit ? A-t-on déjà fait venir les parties de chœur et d'orchestre ? Aura-t-on un orgue-Alexandre ? Etc. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2219 ; 24 mars, Paris) :

« Je prie Liszt de ne pas se tourmenter pour l'affaire de " l'Enfance du Christ ". Je croyais que tout était arrêté avec les gens d'Aix-la-Chapelle. Ils sont donc revenus sur leur parole ? Puisqu'il en est ainsi, laissons-les en repos. Que Liszt se résigne à leur diriger quelque bon gros Oratorio, bien entre-bâillé, qui fera dormir les fidèles et sortir de la salle les infidèles. J'avoue que je ne suis pas du tout flatté d'être imposé à ce comité, et Liszt me rendrait un vrai service en n'insistant pas. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2232 ; 14 juin, Paris) :

« Je te remercie des détails que tu viens de me donner sur les petits événements d'Aix-la-Chapelle. Je ne connaissais le mot du " Signale " que depuis quelques heures, quand ta lettre est arrivée. Jusque-là, j'étais resté malade dans mon lit et dans la plus complète ignorance de ce qui s'était passé. Ton silence toutefois ne me semblait pas de bonne augure. Je ne doute pas des peines que tu as prises et de l'ennui que tout cela t'a donné ; mais permets-moi de te faire très amicalement le reproche de m'avoir exposé inutilement à cette petite avanie. Lorsque je priai dans une de mes lettres la Princesse Wittgenstein, de t'engager à ne pas insister pour vaincre la résistance du comité du Festival au sujet de l'admission de " l'Enfance du Christ " dans le programme, je parlais très sérieusement. J'éprouvais une vive répugnance à être ainsi introduit de force dans une solennité dont les organisateurs ne voulaient pas de moi.

Plus tard, quand tu as vu le résultat de cette introduction et que ces messieurs de la coterie de Cologne se préparaient à faire un scandale, tu aurais dû, ce me semble, retirer sur le champ " l'Enfance du Christ " du programme, sans en conserver le moindre morceau ; quitte à expliquer plus tard la raison de ce coup d'état. Je rends donc grâce au hasard qui a mis Dalle Aste dans l'impossibilité de chanter et a épargné ainsi à la Ire et à la seconde partie de mon ouvrage les insultes qu'on leur préparait. Les vanités de province, les préjugés de clocher, de province allemande, de clocher allemand surtout, sont bien ce qu'il y a de plus stupide et de plus brutal au monde. Nous n'avons pas mission de les détruire ; pourquoi les honorer d'une lutte corps à corps avec nous ?

" Patience et longueur de temps Font plus que force ni que rage. "

Ainsi, mon cher Liszt, je t'en prie, à l'avenir ne me propose plus, et à plus forte raison, ne m'impose plus aux gens qui ne me demandent pas, et ne cherchons pas à faire de la propagande. Tu vois que le jeu n'en vaut pas, etc. »

Berlioz à Jakob Melchior Rieter-Biedermann (Correspondance Générale, n° 2233 ; 14 juin, Paris) :

« Vous avez sans doute appris la petite cabale qui s'est organisée à Aix-la-Chapelle dernièrement contre mon " Enfance du Christ " par les gens d'Aix et de Cologne, irrités que Liszt leur eût imposé cet ouvrage. Cela est bien misérable. Mais Liszt a eu bien tort d'exiger que mon ouvrage fût dans le programme, malgré l'instance prière que je lui avais adressée de ne pas le présenter.

J'espère que cette imprudence ne sera plus commise à l'avenir. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2264 ; 30 novembre, Paris) :

« Mille remerciements, Princesse, pour votre charmante mais beaucoup trop flatteuse lettre. Je ne suis pas tout à fait aussi coupable que je le parais. Je n'osais vous écrire, voilà le vrai. Je craignais que ma lettre fut inopportune et peut-être importune. Je craignais d'être désormais dans votre pensée un musicien arriéré, à vieilles idées et à convictions violentes, et qui de plus exprime fort brutalement ses opinions. C'est peut-être vrai - mais, enfin, il est si aisé d'abstenir de certains débats, et il y a tant d'autres points sur lesquels j'ai le bonheur d'être d'accord avec vous, que j'espère à l'avenir n'avoir plus la mauvaise chance d'être entraîné à de saignantes discussions.

Je n'oublierais jamais, princesse, que c'est à vous, à vous seule, que je dois de m'être livré à ce luxe de composition. Non, certes, sans vos encouragements, sans vos indulgents reproches, je n'eusse jamais rien entrepris de pareil ; laissez-moi vous remercier des uns et des autres, quels que puissent être plus tard les chagrins que cet ouvrage me causera. Veuillez me mettre aux pieds de la princesse Marie et dire mille choses affectueuses de ma part à Liszt. J'ai vu un instant à Bade, Monsieur et Madame de Bülow. »

1858

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2338 ; 13 décembre, Paris) :

« J'ai écrit dernièrement au ministre d'État au sujet des partitions modernes que la bibliothèque du Conservatoire ne possède pas, et que l'insuffisance de son budget ne lui permet pas d'acquérir, à mon grand étonnement, le ministre accorde 3,000 francs. Je viens donc te prier de me donner la liste de tous ceux de tes ouvrages qui sont publiés en grande partition, et de ceux de Schumann que tu connais, également en grand partition. Quant à Wagner, nous avons le " Tannhäuser " et le " Lohengrin " ; sais-tu si le " Hollandais " et le " Rienzi " sont publiés ? Où le sont-ils ? Si tu peux m'indiquer quelques productions intéressantes, tu m'obligeras ; mais n'oublie pas l'adresse de l'éditeur. Nous en avons un qui est chargé des achats pour le Conservatoire et il demande à être bien renseigné. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2279 et 2317.

1859

Liszt à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Lettres de Franz Liszt à la princesse Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein, éditions La Mara, Leipzig, 1899, page 495 ; 24 octobre ; texte cité de la Correspondance Générale VI : page 47, note 1) :

« Je vous envie d'entendre le duo des " Troyens ", tout en trouvant charmant de la part de Berlioz de vous offrir cette belle surprise. Pauvre grand ami, il s'en va tristement de ce triste monde, " saignant par tous les pores ", comme vous me dites ! Si, du moins, on pouvait adoucir son mal - mais il est difficile d'imaginer comment. Répétez-lui bien que je lui suis resté profondément attaché, et que ce me serait un bonheur de pouvoir lui être bon à quelque chose. »

Berlioz à son beau-frère, Marc Suat (Correspondance Générale, n° 2427 ; 2 novembre, Paris) :

« Dernièrement, la Princesse Wittgenstein (qui fut, il y a 4 ans, la véritable instigatrice de mon entreprise lyrique, et qui me fit donner ma parole d'honneur d'exécuter le plan de l'Opéra des " Troyens " ; plan que je lui avais exposé à Weimar) , la Princesse Wittgenstein, donc, est venue passer 4 jours à Paris. Elle est allée prier Madame Viardot de lui faire entendre quelques scènes de ma partition. On a arrangé une soirée intime et Madame Viardot, secondée de Lefort et de Ritter et de Mademoiselle Viardot et de Mademoiselle Moschelès, ont exécuté 5 scènes de mon ouvrage. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2428 ; 4 novembre, Paris) :

« Tu ne pouvais pas me faire un plus grand plaisir que de te mettre sur les rangs pour la place de Spohr à l'Institut.

J'y avais déjà pensé. Demain, je verrai nos confrères, et je tâcherai de les allumer s'ils sont encore inflammables. Cela doit aller tout seul. J'ignore si Wagner a l'intention de se présenter ; mais son nom (dans la section des Beaux-Arts) est fort loin d'avoir la popularité glorieuse du tien. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2442 ; 2 décembre, de Paris) :

« Demain, samedi, nous sommes convoqués à l'Institut pour examiner les titres des divers candidats proposés par la commission pour les places vacantes de correspondants. On m'a fait cette curieuse question : " Est-ce comme compositeur ou comme virtuose que l'on présente Monsieur Liszt ? " »

C'est comme tout, ai-je répondu, cela vous va-t-il ? »

Liszt à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2447 ; 8 décembre, de Weimar) :

« Je te suis très reconnaissant, cher Berlioz, de la cordiale sympathie que tu m'as prouvé, une fois de plus, dans la circonstance de ma candidature à l'Institut. Le mauvais tour que d'autres m'ont joué dès la première séance, n'a pas de quoi me surprendre ; encore moins, passerai-je mon temps à m'en chagriner. Seulement, comme je ne saurais cesser de croire que ma prétention à faire partie, un jour ou l'autre, de l'illustre corps, est suffisamment fondée en raison, je te prie d'avoir l'obligeance de me prévenir quand l'occasion de me présenter de nouveau se trouvera, car il se pourrait que le décès de tel ou tel membre correspondant me restât inconnu. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2449 ; 13 décembre, de Paris) :

« Pour en revenir à cette sottise de l'Institut, Verdi et Conti ont été nommés. C'est flatteur pour Verdi, n'est-ce pas ? En tout cas, il ne s'en est pas mêlé, et le voilà bien surpris sans doute de cet excès d'honneur. Il faut que je vous le dise : Verdi est un galant homme, très fier, très inflexible, et qui sait on ne peut mieux remettre à leur place les petits chiens et les gros ânes qui s'émancipent trop. »

Nous serons plus heureux dans notre tentative de nous adjoindre Liszt, si une vacance survient prochainement. De Lacroix et quelques autres sont passablement indignés. Quant à Liszt, j'ai été un peu chagriné de le voir attacher à cette nomination une sorte d'importance qu'elle ne saurait avoir pour lui ; elle en avait pour nous, mais pour nous seulement. L'Institut devrait tenir à s'attacher par les liens les plus étroits les gens de haute-taille, au lieu de prendre dans sa main d'un air protecteur tant de nains à peine dignes d'être noyés par les irrigations de Gulliver. »

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2451 ; vers le 20 décembre, Paris) :

« Un cruel malheur vient de te frapper ; tu ne doutes pas de la part que je prends à ta peine. Tu étais préparé depuis longtemps, je crois, à la perte de ce pauvre enfant et je sais qu'il s'est éteint sans souffrances. Mais le sort, jusqu'ici, t'avait épargné ; les déchirements de cœur de cette espèce t'étaient encore inconnus. Tu étais bien jeune quand tu perdis ton père et, depuis lors, tu n'as vu tomber ni frère, ni sœur, ni enfant, ni aucun être chéri, et c'est l'inexpérience de la douleur que je redoute pour toi.

Je voudrais apprendre que tu as tes filles à Weimar. Elles sont l'une et l'autre si bien douées sous tous les rapports. Je ne les connais guère que depuis 1 an. J'ai passé la soirée, il y a quelques semaines, avec l'aînée et son mari chez Wagner.

Madame Ollivier parle toujours de son père avec une admiration tendre qui charme ceux qui en entendent les expressions. J'ai moins souvent vu sa sœur, je la crois néanmoins une personne d'une rare distinction et son culte pour toi se décèle dans chacune de ses paroles.

Adieu, cher ami, il te reste de nombreuses affections, laisse-moi t'embrasser en te renouvelant l'assurance de la mienne.
»

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2343, 2361, 2380, 2390, 2429, 2443.

1860

Voir la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2468, 2472, 2476, 2480, 2492, 2504, 2509 ; et « Briefwechsel zwischen Wagner und Liszt », 2 volumes, Leipzig (1910) , n° 301a.

1861

Liszt à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (« Franz Liszts Briefe », tome V, Leipzig, 1900 : page 171 ; 16 mai ; cité dans la Correspondance Générale VI : page 219, note 1) :

« Notre pauvre ami Berlioz est bien abattu et rempli d'amertume. Son intérieur lui pèse comme un cauchemar et, à l'extérieur, il ne rencontre que contrariétés et déboires. J'ai dîné chez lui avec d'Ortigue, Madame Berlioz et la mère de Madame Berlioz. C'était morne, triste et désolé ! L'accent de la voix de Berlioz s'est affaissé. Il parle d'habitude à voix basse - et tout son être semble s'incliner vers la tombe ! Je ne sais comment il s'y est pris pour s'isoler de la sorte, ici. De fait, il n'a ni amis, ni partisans - ni le grand soleil du public, ni la douce ombre de l'intimité. »

Berlioz à son fils, Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 2555 ; 2 juin, Paris) :

« Liszt vient de faire la conquête de l'Empereur : il a joué à la cour la semaine dernière et, hier, il a été nommé commandeur de la Légion d'honneur. Ah ! quand on joue du piano ! »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2557 ; vers le 10 juin, Paris) :

« Que faites vous donc à Rome et quand reviendrez-vous ? Liszt a fait une apparition brillante à Paris ; le voilà reparti. Mais notre grande ville l'a charmé, il ne la connaissait pas si belle. Venez donc l'habiter tous les 2. Que diable faire à Weimar ? Est-ce qu'on vit ailleurs qu'à Paris ? »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2534, 2535, 2536, 2538, 2542, 2545, 2571.

1862

Berlioz à Liszt (Correspondance Générale, n° 2632 ; 19 juillet, de Paris) :

« Hier, nous avons fait une très bonne répétition ; j'ai donc l'esprit un peu plus libre que de coutume pour te répondre. Je te remercie d'abord d'avoir chargé Pohl de réparer la négligence incroyable de ton éditeur. Donc, je recevrai " Faust " à Bade, dans quelques jours. Je ne pars que le 28.

Je vais t'envoyer la partition de piano des " Troyens ". À celle-là, il n'y a pas d'Ouverture. Le raison qui m'a empêché d'en écrire une est une raison d'instrumentateur : pendant toutes les scènes populacières du commencement, la canaille Troyenne est accompagnée seulement par les instruments à vent (bois) ; les archets restent inactifs et ne font leur entrée qu'au moment où Cassandre prend la parole. C'est un effet spécial, qui eût été détruit par l'Ouverture ; car ne n'eusse pas pu m'y passer des instruments à cordes. Et puis, il y a tant de musique là-dedans ! »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2651 ; 21 septembre, Paris) :

« Avant tout, il faut que je vous demande des nouvelles de Liszt, comment supporte-t-il, comment a-t-il supporté le coup qu'il vient de recevoir ? [La mort de Blandine, le 11 septembre.] Voilà un arrachement de cœur ! C'est son tour aujourd'hui ; la mort frappe partout. La pauvre jeune femme idolâtrait son père ! Est-il vrai qu'il ait été repris par les idées religieuses ? Si cela est, tant mieux, il sera plus fort contre les tourments et les tourmentes de ce monde. Quant à moi, je suis tout à fait hors d'état de répondre aux affectueux et consolants raisonnements que votre bonté et la hauteur de votre esprit vous ont porté à m'adresser ; vous le savez, j'ai depuis longtemps pris en haine la philosophie et tout ce qui lui ressemble, philosophie religieuse ou non ; et si de telles réflexions pouvaient me faire pleurer, il ne tomberait de mes yeux (comme dit Shakespeare) que des meules de moulin.

J'ai reçu la partition de Liszt que je lis et relis ; je lui écrirai à ce sujet, en lui demandant quelques explications sur des signes que je n'ai pas compris dans la dernière partie. C'est une grande œuvre !

Je ne m'explique toujours pas ce que vous pouvez faire à Rome, on peut avoir la foi et l'espérance partout. Vous exercez bien la charité à distance, pourquoi ne conserveriez-vous pas les 2 autres vertus même à Paris ? Quand vous m'écrivez des lettres si cordiales, si affectueuses, et si indulgentes, c'est la charité qui vous fait parler. Merci, princesse, vous n'ignorez pas que de toutes les belles qualités du cœur humain, c'est la bonté que je préfère, et vous la joignez à tant d'esprit ! »

La princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2656 ; 27 septembre, de Rome) :

« Vous me demandez si les idées religieuses ont repris Liszt. Elles n'ont pu guère le reprendre, car elles ne l'ont jamais quitté au fond. Il est des bouderies, si j'ose dire, superficielles, et, entre l'homme et Dieu, il se passe souvent des Dépits amoureux (si une telle comparaison ne vous scandalise pas) durant lesquels on se fâche et on se plaint d'autant plus qu'on aime davantage, qu'on se fait plus besoin d'espérer et qu'on est plus disposé à croire. Illusion ! dira-t-on. Qu'importe, si c'est la seule illusion dont on ne puisse être désillusionné en cette vie. Tout peut nous manquer, nous laisser veufs ou orphelins de nos plus beaux songes et de nos plus beaux rêves, hormis cet amour de par delà la tombe, hormis cet espoir d'Éternité.

Liszt aurait bien voulu vous faire entendre son " Faust ", et son Éternel féminin, qu'est justement cet Amour là et ce Désir là, et cet Espoir là, - car qu'est ce que l'élément féminin dans l'univers et surtout dans le cœur de l'homme ? L'amour, toujours l'amour, jusque dans l'Infini Éternel. »

Richard Pohl à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 2678 ; 9 décembre, de Weimar) :

« Je vous remercie des nouvelles que vous me donnez de vos efforts pour Liszt dans l'Académie. Cela ferait beaucoup de plaisir à Liszt, j'en suis sûr. Je vous prie de bien vouloir me communiquer le résultat. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 2634.

1863

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2814 ; 23 décembre, Paris) :

« Je me hâte de vous répondre ; et je débute par vous demander une faveur. Vous avez vu en tête de la partition de piano des " Troyens " ces deux mots : " Divo Virgilio ". C'est comme si j'avais mis ces paroles sacramentelles : " Sub invocatione Divi Virgilii. " Maintenant, je vais faire graver la grande partition des 2 parties du poème lyrique (" La prise de Troie " et " les Troyens à Carthage ") qui, sans vous, n'existerait pas ; permettez-moi de vous la dédier. Si vous y consentez, j'éprouverai une double reconnaissance. Le " Divus Virgilius " n'empêchera pas la dédicace, et je serai ainsi sous un double patronage. Cette publication ne pourra guère être terminée que dans 1 an. L'éditeur est un brouillon que je suis obligé de surveiller de très près et qui me ferait mille sottises si je le laissais faire.

Je n'ai pas reçu la lettre de Liszt. Je suis bien heureux d'apprendre que la vie de Rome ne vous est pas trop lourde et que votre santé est supportable. Votre lettre, que je vais relire plusieurs fois à présent que j'ai la clé de ses hiéroglyphes, me fera passer une meilleure journée que je ne pouvais l'espérer. Écrivez-moi quelquefois, voulez-vous ? Ce sera une bien bonne œuvre. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, numéros 2708 et 2750.

1864

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2871 ; 3 août, Paris) :

« Adieu, chère Princesse, vous ne me donnez pas de nouvelles de Liszt, mais j'en ai eu dernièrement par un jeune nigaud de l'Académie de France. »

Berlioz à Berthold et Louise Damcke (Correspondance Générale, n° 2887 ; 21 août, Paris) :

« C'est après-demain qu'a lieu le Festival de Karlsruhe. Liszt y est déjà. Le programme du 1er jour est publié. Comment pouvez-vous n'y pas aller ? Moi, j'ai une bonne excuse : je suis malade. »

Berlioz à Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 2888 ; 21 août, Paris) :

« Il y a, après-demain, grand festival à Karlsruhe. Liszt y est venu de Rome ; ils vont y faire de la musique à arracher les oreilles, c'est le conciliabule de la jeune Allemagne, présidé par Hans von Bülow.

Vous savez que ce bon Scudo est reconnu fou et enfermé. Il y a longtemps que sa folie était manifeste, comme l'est celle de Wagner, comme l'étaient celles de Schumann et de Jullien, et de tant d'autres.

Quel malheur ! »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2908 ; 9 octobre, Paris) :

« Chère Princesse, ne raillez pas et ne confiez à personne ces misères de cœur dont je vous fais l'aveu et qui n'ont peut-être jamais eu d'exemple. J'ai vu Liszt avant-hier, je le verrai demain. Il me faudra parler de mille choses indifférentes. Plus rien ne m'intéresse. Et vous même, peut-être, riez de la multitude de mes affections. Celle-là est unique dans son genre ; elle persista à travers d'autres passions différentes. »

Berlioz à ses nièces, Joséphine et Nanci Suat (Correspondance Générale, n° 2915 ; 14 octobre, Paris) :

« Liszt a passé 8 jours ici ; nous avons dîné 2 fois ensemble avec sa fille. Les voilà repartis ! »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2918 ; 19 octobre, Paris) :

« P.S. : J'ai vu Liszt 2 fois, nous avons passé quelques bonnes heures ensemble. Il est bien charmant, comme toujours. Je ne pense pas qu'il me trouvât ridicule, si vous lui parliez de mes confidences, pourtant j'aime mieux ne pas lui paraître si enfant. »

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 2920 ; 29 octobre, Paris) :

« Liszt est venu passer 8 jours à Paris, nous avons dîné ensemble 2 fois, et toute conversation musicale ayant été prudemment écartée, nous avons passé quelques heures charmantes. Il est reparti pour Rome, où il joue de “ la musique de l’avenir ” devant le pape qui se demande ce que cela veut dire. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 2923 ; 30 octobre, Paris) :

« Liszt est donc déjà de retour à Rome ? Je le croyais encore à Saint-Tropez. J’ai eu bien du plaisir à le revoir, il est si séduisant quand il reste lui-même, sans chercher l’effet, que je l’ai trouvé tout à fait beau. »

Berlioz à son beau-frère Marc Suat (Correspondance Générale, n° 2924 ; 1 novembre, Paris) :

« Liszt a passé 8 jours ici avec sa fille et nous avons dîné ensemble 2 fois, mais sans parler de musique, il a compris que nous ne nous entendions plus sur beaucoup de points ; en conséquence, comme il est excellent et plein d’esprit, ces soirées ont été charmantes. »

Voir aussi la Correspondance Générale, n° 2843.

1865

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 3008 ; 11 mai, Paris) :

« Voici l’épître dédicatoire qui sera inscrite sur notre partition. Je vous remercie de votre bonne et belle lettre. Je savais la détermination de Liszt. Je ne me moque pas, votre recommandation était superflue. Vos suppositions à l’égard de la Postface des « Mémoires » sont également gratuites. Il n’y a pas un mot, dans le récit de mes 10 dernières années, qui ait trait à Wagner, ni à Liszt, ni à “ la musique de l’avenir ”. Il n’y a pas moyen de vous envoyer les feuilles séparées du livre ; mais je demanderai la permission de vous prêter le livre lui-même, quand tout sera fini. »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 3021 ; 30 juin, Paris) :

« Mille amitiés à Liszt, je vous prie. Son changement de costume a fait ici beaucoup de bruit, vous devez le penser. Maintenant, on se tait. Demain, on n’y pensera plus. Au reste, qu’on se taise ou non, je pense qu’il est fort indifférent à tous les caquets et à tous les silences. »

Berlioz à son fils, Louis (Correspondance Générale, n° 3025 ; 11 juillet, Paris) :

« Le programme de Bade est bien tel que je te l’ai dit. C’est Jourdan qui chantera Énée, et madame Charton, Didon. Mais il y a du Wagner, du Liszt, du Schumann, et le pauvre Reyer ne sait pas ce qui l’attend aux répétitions.

La princesse Wittgenstein m’a aussi écrit de Rome une lettre charmante. Tu sais que Liszt est abbé ? »

Berlioz à la princesse Sayn-Wittgenstein (Correspondance Générale, n° 3046 ; 17 septembre, Paris) :

« Je suis bien content d'apprendre que l'œuvre nouvelle de Liszt a été tout de suite comprise, plus content encore que cela lui ait fait plaisir. Les événements du monde musical semblent tous pour moi maintenant se passer au fond d'un puits ; de temps en temps, je me penche sur la margelle pour écouter ce qui se passe là-bas. »

1866

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 3110 ; 8 mars, Paris) :

« Je voulais vous parler de ce qui s'est passé hier à un grand concert extraordinaire, donné avec les prix triplés, au cirque Napoléon, au bénéfice d'une société de bienfaisance, sous la direction de Padeloup.

On y jouait pour la Ire fois le Septuor des " Troyens ". Madame Charton chantait ; il y avait 150 choristes et le grand bel orchestre ordinaire. À l'exception de la marche de " Lohengrin " de Wagner, tout le programme a été terriblement mal accueilli par le public. L'Ouverture du " Prophète " de Meyerbeer a été sifflée à outrance ; les sergents de ville sont intervenus pour expulser les siffleurs. Enfin est venu le Septuor. Immenses applaudissements ; cris de bis. Liszt y était, je l'ai aperçu du haut de mon estrade ; il arrive de Rome et ne connaissait rien des " Troyens ". Pourquoi n'étiez-vous pas là ? »

Auguste Morel à Berlioz (Correspondance Générale, n° 3115 ; 13 mars, de Marseille) :

« Que n'étais-je là !

Mais vous y aviez votre ami, j'oserais presque dire, notre ami Liszt ! »

Berlioz à Humbert Ferrand (Correspondance Générale, n° 3116 ; 16 mars, Paris) :

« L'exécution du Septuor fait de plus en plus de bruit. Hier, on a donné à Saint-Eustache la Messe de Liszt. Il y avait une foule immense. Mais, hélas ! Mais quelle négation de l'art. »

Berlioz à Auguste Morel (Correspondance Générale, n° 3117 ; 16 mars, Paris) :

« Vous avez dû voir sur l'exécution du Septuor bien d'autres articles que celui du " Ménestrel " ; on fait de cela un bruit immense. Il n'y a qu'heur et malheur en ce monde. Hier, on a exécuté à Saint-Eustache la Messe de Liszt. »

...

Franz Liszt a amorcé son éducation musicale à Vienne. Il est revenu dans la capitale autrichienne à plusieurs reprises, soit pour entendre ses propres œuvres, soit pour les diriger ou soit pour visiter ses parents qui y vivent depuis 1822.

Liszt arrive à Rome en 1861. Il a 50 ans. Le choix de la destination correspond aux aspirations religieuses du compositeur présentes depuis l'enfance et nourries de sa rencontre avec Lamennais. À Rome, Liszt souhaite réformer la musique sacrée moribonde. Il rejoint l'Ordre franciscain, en 1865, et reçoit les ordres mineurs. Un grand nombre d'œuvres sacrées (et notamment des Oratorios) voient le jour : « La légende de sainte Élisabeth » , « Christus » , « Messe de Gran » , « Messe hongroise pour le couronnement » , « Requiem » , etc. , témoignant de ses connaissances de la musique religieuse du Moyen-âge et de la Renaissance associées à son amour du terroir hongrois et de son éternel regard vers la musique de l'avenir. Néanmoins, Liszt ne reçoit pas de l'Église les signaux attendus et, à partir de 1869, le compositeur partage son temps entre Rome, Weimar et Budapest, où il crée en 1875 une Académie de Musique.

Liszt a subi plusieurs grandes épreuves familiales. Son fils Daniel est mort (à Berlin) à l'âge de 20 ans, le 13 décembre 1859 ; sa fille Blandine à l'âge de 26 ans, le 11 septembre 1862 ; et sa mère, en 1866.

Le « Salon Bleu »

Avril 1884 : Le compositeur hongrois Franz Liszt arrive à Vienne. Il donne rendez-vous à Anton Bruckner à la « Schottenhof » , plus précisément au « Salon Bleu » , une chambre privée avec piano, dédiée à la musique. Le sujet à l'ordre du jour : la dédicace de la 2e Symphonie.

Le « Schottenhof » est le complexe de bâtiments historiques du couvent bénédictin des Écossais situé juste à côté de l'église abbatiale de Notre-Dame des Écossais (la « Schottenkirche ») dans le 1er arrondissement (A-1010) .

Le « Salon Bleu » fait partie des appartements du cousin et oncle de Franz Liszt, le docteur Eduard Ritter von Liszt (1817-1879) .

Eduard (dont la 1re épouse, Karolina Pickhart, avait été emportée par le choléra en 1854) se remarie avec Henriette Wolf (mère de 3 enfants) . En 1863, ils décident d'aller s'établir à la « Schottenhof » . À partir de 1869, Eduard va offrir à Franz Liszt son lieu de résidence comme pied-à-terre, chaque fois que ce dernier sera de passage dans la capitale. Lui-même homme de culture, doué pour la musique, Eduard donne des leçons privées de piano dans une pièce intimiste. Avec l'arrivée de son célèbre cousin-neveu, il va la décorer au fil du temps de tapis luxueux, de tapisseries, de bustes, de statuettes, de peintures et de plusieurs instruments. Elle portera le nom de « Salon Bleu » (en raison de la couleur de la sellerie du mobilier et des finis muraux) . Des rencontres musicales mémorables se dérouleront dans ce « salon-musée » qui deviendra rapidement mythique. Parmi les invités : Richard Wagner, Ludwig Bösendorfer et Sophie Menter.

Après 1837, Eduard et Franz entretiennent des relations cordiales. Eduard connaît une brillante carrière comme juriste dans l'Empire austro-hongrois ; devenant, à la fois, procureur et procureur-général Royal et Impérial à la Cour suprême. Au début des années 1850, il va s'occuper des affaires juridiques et financières de Franz. À sa mort, en 1879, Liszt devra prendre la relève, ce qui lui causera beaucoup d'anxiété.

Liszt appréciera l'ambiance monastique qui règne dans ces bâtiments qui forment la « Maison des Écossais » . Le complexe possède 3 entrées qui mène à 2 cours intérieures du cloître, ornées d'arbres : le n° 6 sur la « Freyung » (rue de la liberté) ; le n° 2 sur la « Schottengasse » ; et le n° 2 sur la « Helferstorferstraße » . Une plaque commémorative offerte en l'honneur de Liszt, par la ville de Budapest, orne aujourd'hui le mur extérieur du n° 6 sur la « Freyung » .

L'inscription dit :

« In diesem Hause wohnte

Franz Liszt

vom Jahre 1869 bis 1886

so oft er in Wien weilte

Gewidmet von der Stadt Budapest »

...

A tastefully furnished room had been set aside in Vienna by Franz Liszt's aristocrat cousin and uncle, Doctor Eduard Ritter von Liszt (1817-1879) , for his permanent use, where he could relax, play the piano, compose, and receive his friends. It became a « home away from home » where he stayed whenever he was in the Austrian capital. With the passing years, these quarters were filled with memorabilia (furniture, carpets, paintings, and pianos) and the « Blue Salon » (as it became known) remained something of a Liszt shrine for nearly a Century, until everything was transferred to the « Burgenländisches Museum » in Eisenstadt, in 1970.

The English writer William Beauty-Kingston saw much of Liszt at this time and even heard him play at various private homes in Vienna. Many years later, he was able to recall the memory of those occasions in detail :

« At that time, all his capabilities of invention, memory, and technique, were still entirely at his disposal ; and, as a pianist, he was not only unrivalled, but unapproachable. Practice and will had so thoroughly disciplined his fingers and accustomed them to fulfil infallibly the orders transmitted to them from his brain, that he was absolutely free from any preoccupation as to their ability to execute, and was at liberty to give full play to the creative and constructive faculties of his intellect without giving a thought to the mere mechanical contrivances attached to his wrists. His interpretations of Beethoven and Bach were sublime revelations ; his improvisations bewildering realizations of the seemingly impossible. »

Now that Liszt had permanent quarters in Vienna, his visits to that city became more frequent (from 1871, he managed to return practically every year) .

Der Blaue Salon aus dem Schottenhof in Wien

Für das Burgenland war es eine moralische Verpflichtung, das Inventar des historischen « Liszt-Zimmers », den mit wertvollem, alten Kunstgut ausgestatteten « Blauen Salon » im Schottenhof zu Wien im Gedenken an Franz Liszt der Nachwelt zu erhalten. Selbst die Originaltapeten wurden abgenommen und nach Eisenstadt übertragen. Wenn Liszt nach Wien kam, hat er vom Jahre 1869 bis zu seinem Tod 1886 regelmäßig im Schottenhof Aufenthalt genommen.

Franz Liszt und das Schottenstift : Katalog zur Ausstellung im Museum im Schottenstift, 27. November 2008 bis 28. März 2009 / bearbeitet und herausgegeben von Martin Czernin.

Liszt Ferenc Emlékmúzeum

Pas question d'achever son séjour dans la capitale hongroise, Budapest, sans avoir assisté à un concert de musique Classique. L'un des endroits les plus agréables pour un concert de fin de journée est l'Académie Liszt Ferenc (Franz Liszt) . Depuis ses débuts, en 1963, cette institution défend particulièrement la musique nationale, l'occasion de revisiter les grands compositeurs hongrois, comme Béla Bartók. Tous les interprètes de renommée internationale comme David Oistrakh, Jean-Pierre Rampal, Sir Yehudi Menuhin ou Isaac Stern ont joué à l'Académie.

À Budapest, il est très facile d'assister à un concert de musique Classique ou d'aller à l'Opéra. Les places sont loin d'être hors de prix et la plupart du temps, il est inutile de réserver à l'avance. Si l'on vient en fin de matinée à l'académie Liszt Ferenc pour prendre son billet, il faut en profiter pour voir, dans la grande salle, une éventuelle répétition. Un spectacle passionnant pour comprendre l'empreinte du chef d'orchestre dans l'interprétation d'une œuvre. L'institut est un endroit magique, qu'il faut visiter même en dehors des heures de spectacle. Avec un peu de chance, il est possible d'assister à une répétition.

La musique Classique prend une grande place dans la vie des Hongrois. Dans la ville, il suffit de se promener dans la rue pour entendre, çà et là, quelques notes de musique, échappées d'un appartement ou d'une salle de répétition.

Le musée Liszt Ferenc est une reconstitution du dernier appartement de Liszt, à Budapest. Au 1er étage de la vieille Académie de musique, où le compositeur a vécu de 1881 à 1886, on peut voir une collection des instruments du Maître, ses livres et partitions et certains de ses objets personnels.

...

The Liszt Ferenc Memorial Museum and Research Centre was opened in September, 1986, in the building of the Old Academy of Music (H-1064 Budapest, « Vörösmarty utca 35 ») . This building was used from late 1875 until mid-1907 for music teaching of the Academy of Music : it was the 2nd site of the institution which had been inaugurated in 1875 (the 1st building on « Hal-tér / Fisch-Platz » has been demolished ; its memory is preserved only by photos of the time) . After opening the new palace at Liszt Ferenc tér (12 May 1907) , the building on « Vörösmarty utca » was used by several other institutions (among others : a music-school, a coffee-shop, political and social associations, a foreign trade company) , until the Ministry for Culture and Education bought it, in 1980, and put it at the disposal of the Academy of Music.

Liszt, the founding president and professor of the Academy who did not accept any salary for his teaching, got a service apartment in the building of the Old Academy of Music, of which the main front looked on « Andrassy út » (once called : « Sugár-út / Radialstraße ») while the entrance was on « Vörösmarty utca » . This apartment on the 1st store, in which Liszt lived from January 1881 until 1886, the year of his death whenever he stayed in Budapest, is today a memorial museum, furnished by his instruments, furniture, library and memorabilia. The entrance room of the apartment, such as Liszt's study-and-bedroom and drawing-room is awaiting visitors with a permanent exhibition, while the one-time dining-room and the foyer at the ground-floor is used for temporary (thematic) Liszt-exhibitions. In the concert-hall, near Liszt's apartment, the museum arranges Saturday « matinée » concerts for its visitors.

In the Liszt Ferenc Memorial Museum, the heart of the collection is Liszt's donation to the Academy of Music as a heritage : his instruments (1 Bösendorfer piano ; 2 Chickering pianos ; a composing desk ; a Mason & Hamlin « cabinet organ » , a « piano-orgue » by Érard and Alexandre ; a « piano-harmonica » by Bachmann) , and his Budapest library (books and scores marked after Liszt's death by a stamp of Estate) , several pieces of his furniture, pictures, sculptures, personal belongings. After the opening of the 1st memorial room of the Academy (1925, in the « Liszt Ferenc tér » building) , this basic collection has been gradually completed by authentic memorabilia and manuscripts from Liszt's circle of relatives, pupils and friends (e.g. , Eduard von Liszt, Jenő Hubay, István Thomán, Árpád Szendy, Henrik Gobbi, Vilma Varga) . The Academy of Music has always made efforts to buy Liszt manuscripts and relics. Another important exhibition material in the former Liszt memorial rooms (supervised by the Academy Library) such as in their highly-enlargened continuation, the self-standing Liszt Ferenc Memorial Museum (since 1986) , has come as loan from the Hungarian National Museum : Liszt, himself, had bestowed the most precious relics of his artistic career to this institution.

Entrance room

Opposite the entrance of the Liszt Ferenc Memorial Museum, you can see this plaque on the wall, the reception plaque of Liszt, which was originally on the door of his flat. It says in Hungarian and German, at what time Liszt received his guest.

The lithographs by Joseph Kriehuber show the young virtuoso, the medallion by Ernst Rietschel shows the conductor from Weimar, the oil painting by Mrs. Elisa Nemes (« née » Ransonnet-Villez) depicts the aged artist-professor in the year the new building of the Old Academy of Music was opened (1879) ; the engraving by Jozsef Rippl-Ronai, after an oil painting by Mihály Munkácsy (1886) , represents the ailing Liszt in his last years.

One can find the ticket-office of the museum in the entrance hall where all those who are interested, can buy (in addition to the publications of the museum) Liszt-scores, music, books and several recordings as well.

Dining room

Here, periodic exhibitions are organized owing to the fact that neither furniture nor description of this room have remained. The richness of the collection of the Liszt Ferenc Memorial Museum enables us to fill the showcases, from time to time, with varying pictures, documentation, manuscripts, plaquettes and other objects to do with Liszt and his circle. For our thematic exhibitions, we often borrow additional material from other collections.

The piano, which can be seen here, was manufactured by the Boston company Chickering. Jonas Chickering's (1798-1853) most important patent was the cast-iron frame (1840-1843) which gave the instrument a greater stability and a richer sound. The American company, after the death of the founder, also had great success. His long concert-piano « Opus 30.540 » , with English mechanism, won a gold medal at the World Fair of Paris, in 1867, and even its manufacturer Mr. Charles Francis Chickering was awarded the « Légion d'Honneur » by the Emperor Napoléon III. The prize-winning instrument of 7 1/3 octaves volume, straight strung, with 2 pedals, and decorative on the outside as well (with a case made of rosewood, and with carved and bent legs) was taken by Chickering himself to Rome, on Christmas of 1872, for Liszt. Although the instrument was highly-appreciated by the Romans, Liszt (possessing no permanent residence in Rome) had problems to place the piano, with its dimensions of 254 centimeters long by 147 centimeters wide. In 1872, it was transported to the country-house of his Hungarian friend, Baron Antal Augustz in Szekszard, where previously himself had been a guest several times. Only after Liszt's death, in April 1887, was it delivered to the Academy of Music. The widow of Baron Augustz gave it to the Liszt Estate in Budapest (together with the glass-piano in her keeping) .

The water-colour caricature of Liszt above the glass showcases is by Árpád Szendy, after a drawing by Georg Henschel. On the picture, Liszt is portrayed with a « pince-nez » on his nose. Árpád Szendy was a student of Liszt between 1883 and 1884, and later on, became a teacher at the Academy of Music, and together with István Thomán, was one of the most representative inheritors of the Liszt-tradition in Hungary.

Study bedroom

On the basis of a picture published in one of the 1886 issues of the journal « Magyar Szalon » (Hungarian Salon) , together with other descriptions, it was possible to reconstruct the study-bedroom of his flat most like the original. Liszt obviously found some calm here, if he needed some rest and, here, he composed the works of his last years.

Ludwig Bösendorfer (1835-1919) was a personal friend of Liszt, as is proved by unique evidence in the Budapest Estate ; namely a 2 door writing-desk, with 3 drawers made of walnut. In the place of the middle-drawer, there is a small pull-out piano with 3 octave keyboard. This composing-desk with piano, « a splendid work of art, which decorated both the study-bedroom and the dining-room, on which the name Bösendorfer will soon be engraved, this name, which is so benign for me » (30 January 1877, Liszt) thanked Liszt in his letter to the donor. The small instrument, in which the miniature hammers, which are supplied with sound-dampers as well, strike fixed metal-sheets. Actually, it is rather a curiosity. It is only useful to check chords, fingering or any kind of passage or rapid scales, during composing. Its soft sound could hardly disturb Ferenc Erkel, who as the director of the Academy of Music lived for some years above the study-bedroom of Liszt. Bösendorfer's gift is unique, we know of no other writing-desk like this one.

The small table is very similar to the one which stood here, at one time. On it, is placed the bronze replica of Liszt's right-hand, made by Alajos Strobl. The programme on the table with a drawing of Liszt by Munkácsy is that of Liszt's concert on 23 March 1886, in Paris, at the palace of Mihály Munkácsy.

The drapery behind the bed is from the Liszt Estate, though originally there hung here another tapestry embroidered by Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein. The original bed-cloth was also her work, but we have no information about their whereabouts. The picture above the bed is the painting by Alajos Györgyi Giergl, which portrays the daughter of Liszt, Cosima Bülow. The circumstances of its origin are unknown. The praying-desk was made for the flat on « Sugar ut », it was designed by Sándor Fellner. Most probably, the crucifix was presented by Princess Carolyne Sayn-Wittgenstein. On the praying-desk of Liszt can be seen both his prayer-book and his rosary. The glass cabinet was also in the flat at « Sugar ut », with Liszt's library in it, which he left to the Academy of Music. In the other glass case, we keep some of his scores. Both the books and the scores, about which a detailed catalogue has been published, contain several important markings and inscriptions by Liszt and bear the impress of the stamp of the Estate.

The glass-piano of Liszt (even if not the only instrument like this) is a curiosity. It was made by Georges Bachmann, who had a factory in Tours and in Angers. He called his invention piano-harmonica, introducing it in 1865, though not without any precedents in the history of instruments. It had a range of 4 octaves (c1-c5) with piano action. Instead of strings, there are glass plates. We don't know either the year when Liszt's instrument was manufactured (it doesn't bear a serial number) or the time when he obtained it. Nevertheless, in 1872, it was in the safe-keeping of Bösendorfer, and Liszt asked that the small instrument, named by him as « joujou d'harmonica en verre », should, together with the Chickering piano of 1867, go to Szekszard, where it would be near the huge instrument like the small dog in the lions-house. It was Bachmann's score entitled « Fête des Nymphes » which gave the idea of this connection, which was personally dedicated to Liszt by Bachmann and which contains a duettino written for a piano-harmonica and piano.

The instrument became the property of the Academy of Music, in 1887. Above the glass piano, on the wall, can be seen portraits of Liszt's relatives.

Drawing room

4 arm chairs, one so-called X-seat, one Ottoman stove-bench and a card-table, these were the pieces of furniture which formed the combined furnishings with plush drapery and leather-cover designed by Fellner, in the style of Henry II.

The 2 piano stools were made of cane inter-woven with silk, as Liszt preferred to play the piano sitting on a cane inter-woven chair. The embroideries of all the pieces of furniture, pillows, curtains and table-clothes were done by a 15 member company of ladies. The embroidery of the X-chair was designed by Fellner, but all other embroideries of the ladies followed old Hungarian patterns. These artistic embroideries were quite different from the decoration of the fashionable salons. After the death of Liszt, when the flat had to be made free for teaching purposes of the Academy of Music, the donators received back the pieces of furniture. After a couple of years, it was possible to obtain them back for the Liszt memorial collection at the Academy of Music.

In one of the corners of the drawing-room, we can see the miniature Beethoven statue made of bronze, with which Liszt was presented by the Viennese Beethoven Committee. There are valuable paintings hanging on the walls, among them, 2 drawings by Gustave Doré, which were illustrations after Liszt's « Dante Symphony » and the piano legend « Saint-Francois de Paule marchant sur les flots » .

The other Chickering piano, which is in the drawing-room, was specially made for Liszt, according to its « Opus Number 50.080 » , around the turn of 1879-1880. Inside the keyboard-lid, inscribed in gold letters : « Chickering & Sons / à F. Liszt » . Its range is AAA-c5 and its action is the same as in the other Chickering piano, but this instrument is much larger in size (260 centimeters long by 150 centimeters wide) , and cross-strung, having 3 pedals, of which the middle one is a divided damper level for increasing the volume of the treble notes. The case is laquered dark, with carved ornaments and carved legs, less decorated than the piano made for the World Exhibition.

When, in autumn 1880, Liszt (staying in Italy) learned Chickering's intention to present him with the piano, he wrote asking him to send the piano to the Academy of Music. Here, it was finally placed in the concert-hall near his flat, and both he and his students used this specially enduring instrument, the sound of which can still rival that of modern concert-pianos.

After Liszt's death, the 2 Chickering pianos were regularly used at the Academy of Music and, in 1927-1928, the manufacturing company hired them for a long American concert-tour. Nowadays, they serve only for representative and museum purposes.

The music stand of silver was presented to Liszt, in 1858. In the middle a Liszt relief, in the upper-part, 3 busts are seen : those of Beethoven, Schubert and Weber. The names engraved in the wide base are those of the donors, primarily from Liszt's circle, in Vienna and Pest.

Liszt held his lessons most often in his drawing-room, where (according to the descriptions of the time) there were always 1 or 2 Bösendorfer pianos. One of them has a serial number « 7561 » and the year of its manufacturing has not been precisely determined (around 1873) . The short piano of 7 octaves range (AAA-a4) , Viennese action, straight strung, with 2 pedals, is a special instrument. Inside its case, under the strings, a certificate reads in Hungarian and German : Mr. János Nepomuk Dunkl music-dealer, Henrik Gobbi professor of the Academy of Music, and Gusztav Chmel piano-dealer, certify, that Liszt used this instrument at his flat in Pest, between 1880-1886 until his death. The instrument has a mahogany-plated case with sections varnished black and shows the ravages of time. Its complete and total renewal and restoration could only have been done at the cost of its authenticity. Its tuning is one complete tone lower and deeper than the original one, therefore, on the CD-recordings demonstrating the sound of the instruments in the museum, the composition recorded on the Bösendorfer piano sounds a major second lower.

In the Budapest Estate, the large American harmonium has also remained, which was given to the Mæstro, in January 1877, by the Boston company Mason & Hamlin. The instrument with the mark « Style 496, No. 90243 » has a suction system, 5 octaves range (CC-c3) . The instrument was made expressly for Liszt in 1876, afterwards, the same type was manufactured in a series as well, named « Liszt Cabinet Organ » , with a reference to Liszt's appreciation. Its 15 stops and knee-pedals (for varying the dynamics) produce a rather varied sound.

In his letter concerning the piano-harmonica, Liszt also disposed of his other special instrument, the pianino-harmonium of Érard-Alexandre. This instrument had been transported to his flat in Pest and, during his moves, he had never parted from it. This combined instrument of 2 manuals is according to its inscriptions a « piano-orgue » . The serial number of the pianino-part (« 37537-44236.8740 D.N. ») refers to the fact that it was manufactured in 1866. The harmonium, with a bellows system of 5 octaves (C-c4) with its narrow frontal part, is lower. It is the work of Jacob Alexandre & Son, one of the best-known harmonium-manufacturers of his time, in Paris. The sound-box containing the strings of the pianino is wider and higher, the instrument has an iron-frame, and a range of 7 octaves (AAA-a4) supplied with a « pianino una corda » and a damp pedal (which can be found between the pedals of the harmonium) . This part of the instrument was made by the Érard Company, which had already supported Liszt as a child when he had arrived in Paris, at the end of 1823, Liszt maintained a good relationship to their mutual advantage, which lasted until the death of the composer.

The vitrine nearby contains memorabilia of Liszt's artistic life. We can see here, among other things, his award certificate presenting the freedom of Sopron, and a silver conducting baton, with which he was presented by the town, in 1846. On the lower-shelf, there are objects from his travels : his travelling case, lamp, writing-utensils, writing-box, his dummy keyboard, etc.

Concert hall

From the Salon (as it was in Liszt's lifetime) , we directly enter the concert-hall. As the salon no longer can serve as an artist's room, the stage has been transferred to the opposite end of the hall, where a separated artist's room is joining to it.

Unfortunately, the organ, which was originally in the room, could not be replaced, and in its place is a large allegorical drawing by Sándor Liezen-Mayer (an artist of Liszt's time) which decorates the background of the podium. In the concert-hall, the only original pieces of furniture are the wooden armchairs built along the walls. All the other pieces of furniture were designed in modern times by Gabor Mezey. The huge candelabra and wall lamps, in the style of the time, are the work of Imre Tatar.

Today, in the concert-hall near Liszt's flat, one can often hear music. There are lessons here, concerts by the Academy of Music and other organizers, as well as morning concerts organized by the museum itself, on Saturdays at 11.00 a.m. On special occasions even those instruments are played which used to be touched by Liszt's own hand.

...

The Liszt Academy of Music (« Liszt Ferenc Zeneművészeti Egyetem » , often abbreviated as « Zeneakadémia » - Music Academy) is a concert-hall and music Conservatory in Budapest, founded on November 14, 1875. It is home to the Liszt Collection, which features several valuable books and manuscripts donated by Franz Liszt upon his death, and the AVISO studio, a collaboration between the governments of Hungary and Japan to provide sound recording equipment and training for students.

The Academy was named after its founder Franz Liszt, only in 1925. Initially christened the « Royal National Hungarian Academy of Music » , it was also called « College of Music » , from 1919 to 1925. It was founded in Liszt's home, and re-located to a 3 story neo-Renaissance building designed by Adolf Láng and built on today's Andrassy Avenue, between 1877 and 1879. That location is referred to as « the old Music Academy » and commemorated by a 1934 plaque made by Zoltán Farkas. It was re-purchased by the Academy in the 1980's, and is now officially known as « the Ferenc Liszt Memorial and Research Center » .

Replacing « the old Music Academy » , the Academy moved into a building erected in 1907, at the corner of Király Street and Ferenc Liszt Square. It serves as a centre for higher-education, music-training, and concert-hall. The « Art Nouveau » style building is one of the most well-known in Budapest. It was designed by Flóris Korb and Kálmán Giergl, at the request of Baron Gyula Wlassics, who was the Minister of Culture at that time. The façade is dominated by a statue of Liszt (sculpted by Alajos Stróbl) . The inside of the building is decorated with frescoes, Zsolnay ceramics, and several statues (among them, that of Béla Bartók and Frédéric Chopin) . Originally, the building also had stained glass windows, made by Miksa Róth.

Other facilities used by the Academy are the Budapest Teacher Training College, located in the former National Music School on Semmelweis Street, a secondary school (Béla Bartók Secondary Grammar and Technical School of Music) , and a student dormitory.

Ever since its foundation, the Academy has been the most prestigious Music University operating in Hungary. A major development in its history was the recent establishment of a new, independent Folk-Music Faculty. The Franz Liszt Academy of Music is as much a living monument to Hungary's continued musical life, as it is to the country's musical past.

...

L'université de musique Franz-Liszt (« Liszt Ferenc Zeneművészeti Egyetem ») est aussi connue sous le nom d'Académie de musique de Budapest (« Zeneakadémia ») . Appelée parfois « Conservatoire de Budapest » , elle est la plus importante école de musique hongroise et une des plus prestigieuses d'Europe centrale. L'édifice, situé Liszt Ferenc tér, est l'œuvre de Kálmán Giergl.

L'Académie de musique a été créée le 14 novembre 1875, sous l'appellation d' « Académie royale nationale hongroise de musique » . Un de ses fondateurs est le célèbre pianiste et compositeur Franz Liszt qui en est élu 1er président.

De 1876 à sa mort, en 1886, il y donne régulièrement des cours pendant certaines périodes de l'année, partageant son temps entre Budapest, Rome et Weimar.

En janvier 1919, l'Académie prend le nom de « Collège de musique » puis, en 1925, celui de Liszt, qu'elle porte encore de nos jours.

C'est la seule université de Hongrie à délivrer un doctorat en musicologie.

L'Académie de musique Franz Liszt dispose d'une grande salle de concert, de la plus grande bibliothèque musicale de Hongrie (plus de 400,000 partitions, 70,000 livres et 15,000 enregistrements) et, depuis 1997, d'un studio d'enregistrement, le studio AVISO, fruit d'un accord entre les gouvernements hongrois et japonais.

Les locaux de l'Académie de musique se divisent en 4 bâtiments dispersés dans Budapest. Le bâtiment central, construit en 1907 dans le style Art nouveau, se tient au coin de la rue Király et de la place Ferenc Liszt. Le bâtiment de 1881 (celui de 1876 ayant été détruit), appelé Vieille Académie, est situé dans la rue Vörösmarty. Construit par l'architecte Adolf Lang, il accueille aujourd'hui le Mémorial et centre de recherche Franz Liszt, composante de l'Académie. Le compositeur y a vécu au 1er étage, de 1881 à 1886, dans un appartement reconstitué en 1986 et qui accueille le musée Franz Liszt de Budapest. On y trouve les legs de Liszt à l'Académie, notamment des instruments, des manuscrits et des lettres.

Certaines disciplines instrumentales sont enseignées et des studios de travail pour les élèves ont été aménagés.

Eduard Ritter von Liszt

Édouard Ritter von Liszt affirme que les parents de Franz parlaient allemand. Ces 2 confirmations ont été retenues par plusieurs biographes (Lina Ramann, August Göllerich junior, etc.) . Pourtant, plus tard, d'autres biographes magyars (Somssich, Falk, Pourtalès-Lányi) ont affirmé exactement le contraire. Mais le problème reste le même : celui du double emploi du terme « hongrois » . À en croire Anne Großer-Rilke, à la question : « ob er nicht am liebsten ungarisch spreche » , Franz Liszt s'est esclaffé :

« Je l'ai complètement oublié. »

Mais de quel hongrois parle-t-il ?

Pour compléter le tableau de la famille de Liszt, il reste sa mère, qui vécut longtemps, et dont nous savons très peu de choses. Son nom de jeune fille est Lager (ou Laager) . Elle naquit le 9 mai 1788, à Krems, en Basse-Autriche. Fille de boulanger, elle devient tôt orpheline. Son père meurt alors qu'elle n'a que 8 ans et demi ; sa mère, 6 mois plus tard. Mais nous savons qu'elle fut adoptée par la famille Lager. Elle est femme de chambre à Vienne lorsqu'elle épouse Adam Liszt, employé chez le prince Esterházy. À la mort de son mari, en 1827, elle s'installe à Paris pour soutenir son fils encore adolescent qui n'a que 16 ans. Les enfants de Franz et de Marie d'Agoult, plus tard, habiteront chez elle, dès la Ire rupture de leurs parents en 1839, puis ils seront mis en pension à leur séparation définitive, en 1844. La mère de Liszt meurt en 1866. Une femme telle que Maria Anna Lager, d'origine autrichienne, aurait-elle accepté de se marier si rapidement avec un Hongrois ? Elle-même parlait très certainement mal l'allemand. Son nom ne confirme en rien son origine germanique. Nous savons qu'Adam Liszt, son mari, corrigea son nom déjà déformé par Édouard Liszt (1817-1879) , procureur Royal et Impérial à Vienne, qui s'était hâté d'ajouter un « a » à son nom de jeune fille. Les Allemands ne sont pas allés aussi loin que les Magyars quant à l'appropriation nationale de Franz Liszt. Ils connaissaient trop bien le problème des minorités slovène et slave en Autriche. Pour obtenir du travail, à l'exemple des Slovènes, les Slovaques durent souvent germaniser leur nom sous Joseph II. Ainsi, Lager devint Laager. Malheureusement, cette question n'a jamais été étudiée. Alan Walker précise qu'après le décès d'Adam, la vie d'Anna et de son fils Franz prend un tournant décisif :

« De retour à Paris, Franz s'installa avec sa mère qui, depuis 3 ans, vivait chez sa sœur à Graz ; d'abord au 38 de la rue Coquenard, puis au 7 de la rue Montholon, face à l'église Saint-Vincent-de-Paul. »

Cette période à Graz marqua définitivement la vie sentimentale, religieuse et culturelle de Franz Liszt, « esclavon » humilié et ridiculisé, s'éveillant à la conscience politique.

...

Eduard, Ritter von Liszt (1817-1879) : Austrian aristocrat and lawyer - and, as the youngest child from the 3rd marriage of Franz Liszt's grandfather, Georg Adam Liszt, Franz Liszt's uncle by marriage ; the composer, however, invariably referred to Eduard as his « cousin » . After 1837, the 2 men maintained cordial relations. Eduard enjoyed a brilliant career in the Austro-Hungarian legal profession and, eventually, became both Public Prosecutor and Procurator General. Beginning in the 1850's, he looked after the composer's legal and financial affairs ; when Eduard died, Liszt was obliged to look alter these himself, which caused him much anxiety.

Despite the more Liberal constitutional era that began in 1860, following a decision to draft a new Code of Criminal Procedure, another 12 years passed before the entry into force of the 1873 Code, on 1 January 1874, which re-established the Procurator General's Office at the Supreme Court, again now known as the Supreme Court of Justice and Cassation. Doctor Eduard Ritter von Liszt (uncle of the composer Franz Liszt and father of the great criminal law scholar Franz von Liszt) was appointed Advocate General and Deputy Procurator General, on 2 December 1873, but was only promoted to Procurator General at the end of 1875 (the post having been vacant until then) . He was replaced, in 1879, by the author of the Code of Criminal Procedure, Julius Glaser, after the latter's retirement from the office of Minister of Justice. The functions he wished the Code of Criminal Procedure to allocate to the Procurator General are particularly clear in his response to the words of welcome from the 1st President of the Supreme Court of Justice, Doctor Anton Ritter von Schmerling :

« Detached from any hierarchical connection to the Public Prosecutor's Office at the Courts of 1st and 2nd instance, the Procurator General's Office sees its field of activity as determined by the circle of hearings before the High-Cassation Court, its almost sole function being to participate impartially in the resolution of the legal issues arising. »

...

Eduard von Liszt, Jurist : geboren Margarethen am Moos (Niederösterreich) , 31 Januar 1817 ; gestorben Wien, 8. Februar 1879. Aus der 3. Ehe des Schulmeisters und späteren Esterházy'schen Herrschaftsbeamten Georg Liszt, Onkel des Vorigen und des Folgenden (dessen Adelsstand 1867 auf ihn übertragen wurde) , Vater des Juristen Franz von Liszt ; studium 1834-1842 an der Universität Wien Jus, 1844 Doktor juris, legte 1842 die Auskultantenprüfung ab und trat in das Kriminalgericht Wien als Rechtspraktikant ein. 1844 Richteramtsprüfung aus dem Kriminal-Justizfach, 1846 aus dem Zivil-Justizfach, 1849 Advokatenprüfung. Liszt war 1844-1849 Assistent an den Lehrkanzeln für Zivilprozeßordnung, adeliges Richteramt und Außerstreitverfahren sowie für Lehens-, Handels- und Wechselrecht an der Universität Wien. 1848 machte er mit Bewilligung des Justizministerium eine Studienreise nach Deutschland, Belgien und Frankreich. 1845-1847 war Liszt am Wiener Merkantil- und Wechselgericht, 1847-1850 beim Niederösterreichische Landrecht tätig. 1850 wurde er mit Einführung des Institut der Staatsanwaltschaft Staatsanwaltssubstitut beim Landesgericht Wien, wo er in mehreren Schauprozessen erfolgreich auftrat. 1854 Rat am Wiener Zivilgericht, 1866 erfolgte der Ruf in die Legislativabteilung des Justizministerium, 1867 OLGR, 1868 Oberstaatsanwalt, 1870 Hofrat, 1873 Generaladjunkt und Leiter der General-Prokuratur, 1875 General-Prokurator beim Obersten Gerichts- und Kassationshof. Liszt war ab 1850 Mitglied der judiziellen Staatsprüfungskommissar, viele Jahre Landtafelreferent beim Wiener Zivilgericht sowie Vorsitzender des Grundbuchssenates, Vorstand der Notariatskammer und Direktor des Notariatsarchivs. Große Verdienste erwarb er sich durch seine organisator. Leistungen auf dem Gebiet des Sträflingswesens, das unter seiner Amtsführung als Oberstaatsanwalt aus dem Wirkungskreis der Statthalterei in den der Oberstaatsanwaltschaft übertragen wurde. Liszt, von dem und andere der Entwurf einer Zivilprozeßordnung und eines neuen Strafrechts stammte, genoß wegen seiner legislativen Arbeiten zur Zivil- und Strafrechtsreform großes Ansehen. Krankheitsgründe verhinderten, daß er Julius Glasers Nachfolger als Justizministerium wurde. Von Zeitgenossen allgemeinen Als « Meister des Plaidoyers » bezeichnet, galt er als einer der bedeutendsten forens. Redner Österreich Seine Tochter Hedwig von Liszt (geboren Wien, 5. Januar 1866 ; gestorben Rödelmaier bei Neustadt an der Saale, 31. Dezember 1941) trat 1890 in den Karmel in Wien-Baumgarten ein (1891 Santa Maria Gabriela a Santissimo Sacramento) und gründete nach mehreren mißlungenen Versuchen 1926 (1928 kanonische Errichtung) in Rödelmaier ein Kloster für unbeschulte Karmelittinnen, welches sie ab 1929 als Priorin leitete.

An Unknown Grandmother of Franz Liszt

The genealogical basics of Franz Liszt's family tree have been established decades ago. This may have been caused by the debated question whether Liszt was a German or a Hungarian composer and by the fact that having been Richard Wagner's father-in-law, his ancestry simply was an important issue in the eyes of purebred Wagnerites and a Ministry of propaganda in Nazi Germany that used Liszt's « les Préludes » as signature tune of its regular reports from the theater of War.

While the details of Liszt's family's roots have been covered quite extensively back to Liszt's great-grandfather Sebastian List (around 1703-1793) , including the identification of the complete 4th generation of ancestors, 10 of Liszt's 16 great-great-grandparents still remain unknown.

At times, the genealogical literature is a little messy. Liszt's 4 grandparents (« Generation III ») , on whose identity the literature agrees unanimously, are given in Heinz Schöny's 2001 article in « Adler » .

A few things are gravely amiss in the list and one wonders, who served as editor at the « Gesellschaft Adler » back in 2001. Liszt's grandfather Georg Adam List was not born on 14 January, but on 14 October 1755. He did not marry in 1715, but in 1775. His 1st wife Barbara Schlesak was of course born in 1753, not in 1853. Mathias Lager was not born in 1815, but 100 years earlier. Lager did not get married in Kirchberg am Wagram on 26 May, but on 27 May 1777 (with Ludwig von Köchel's grandfather Georg Heinrich Köchel serving as his best man) , his bride's name was Schuhmann, not Schihmann and the place of her birth was not « Öttinger » , but Oettingen in Bayern. At least, Franziska Lager's date of death (9 June 1797) is correct, while Wamser gives it 1 month too early. It is also interesting to note that Georg Adam List was not only an organist, but up into the 1830's, was also in charge of rehearsing the Boys Choir in the chapel of Pottendorf Castle.

According to the literature, Georg Adam List (he always signed his name just « Adam List ») was married 3 times, namely to :

1) Barbara Schlesak (1753-1798) ; Liszt's supposed grandmother.

2) Barbara Weninger (1778-1806) .

3) Magdalena Richter (1780-1856) . His late 3rd marriage, in 1807, led to his last son Eduard (1817-1879) being actually 6 years younger than his 1st grandson, the famous pianist Franz Liszt.

A few days before Franz Liszt's father, Adam, married Maria Anna Lager, on 11 January 1811, in the Hungarian village of Unterfrauenhaid, the banns had to be published in the 2 Viennese home parishes of the bride. The sources in Vienna's parish archives concerning Adam List's wedding have hitherto not been acknowledged by Liszt scholarship. The information in these documents regarding the mother of the groom is starkly at odds with what is documented in the genealogical literature. According to the entries in the marriage records of Saint-Stephen's and the « Schottenkirche » , which were made on 7 and 8 January 1811 respectively, Adam List's mother was not Barbara Schlesak, but a certain Katharina Baumann :

January 7th, 1811, Mister Adam List, head accountant with Prince Esterházy in Raiding in Hungary, born in Mattersdorf in Hungary, legitimate son of Adam List, workman in Mattersdorf at Prince Esterházy's, alive and of Mrs. Katharina List, « née » Baumann deceased.

As a matter of fact, Adam List was born in Edelstal, not in Mattersdorf. And the fact that List's age is given as 30 (instead of 24) might also be of interest, considering his unknown mother that appears nowhere in the Liszt literature. The earlier original entry from 7 January 1811 (A-Wd, Rapular 1810-1813, folio 220) referring to the bride also yields new information : we finally learn for whom Liszt's mother had worked as parlourmaid in Vienna.

The maiden Maria Anna Laager, formerly parlourmaid with Frau von Kurzbeck, born in Krems, legitimate daughter of Matthäus Laager, deceased citizen in said town, and Mrs. Franziska, « née » Schuchmann deceased. Her current parish is Mattersdorf in Hungary, formerly at Saint-Stephen's parish, number 1139, then, at « Schotten » parish, number 235. Years of age : 22, born 9 May 1788.

In contrast to the groom, the bride was underage and, therefore, had to present a birth certificate and a licence from the Krems magistrate. On 10 January 1811, the couple also received a dispensation from the other 2 publications of the bans. Maria Anna Laager's employer « Frau von Kurzbeck » was Katharina von Kurzbeck, « née » Gerold (born on 15 November 1748 in Vienna ; died on 19 August 1821 in Baden bei Wien) , widow of the printer, merchant and Estate owner, Joseph von Kurzbeck (1736-1792) . The Kurzbeck family is of particular interest because of several very musical daughters, who were acquainted with Mozart and Haydn. They are listed in the 1788 « Taschenbuch des weiblichen Adels » , living at « Stadt 1152 » (today, « Bräunerstraße 1 ») , a house that had been owned by Joseph von Kurzbeck, since 1775.

The most prominent member of the family was, of course, Magdalena von Kurzbeck (1767-1845) , pianist, composer and student of Clementi, Haydn and Andreas Streicher. For a long time, she was regarded as Vienna's finest female pianist. Haydn dedicated the printed edition of his Piano Sonata in E-flat major (Hob. XVI/52) and the Piano Trio (Hob. XV/31) to her. Johann Nepumuk Hummel wrote his Piano Sonata, Opus 20 for her. Soon after the death of Joseph von Kurzbeck, his widow Katharina sold the house on « Untere Bräunerstraße » for 46.000 Florins and moved into the so-called « Hasenhaus » at « Kärntnerstraße 8 » (then, number 1082 ; from 1795 until 1821, number 1139) where, about 15 years later, Liszt's mother was to work as parlourmaid.

Shortly before the marriage of her maid, Kurzbeck must have moved to the house at « Stadt 235 » (today, « Tiefer Graben 22 ») . Surviving records from other Viennese parishes prove that, on 7 January 1811, Maria Anna Laager also had to submit a testimony by her employer to the government and the parish priest, regarding her good moral conduct during her service as maidservant.

There are 3 different copies of the entry concerning the publication of the bans for Adam List and Maria Anna Laager in Viennese parish archives :

a) The entry in the records of Saint-Stephen's.

b) A slightly shortened copy of this entry (lacking the Kurzbeck information) in the series of duplicate marriage records of Saint-Stephen's.

c) The entry in the marriage records of the « Schotten » parish which was made 1 day later, on 8 January 1811. The entry related to Adam List is basically identical with the earlier ones and Katharina Baumann is given, again, as Adam List's mother. Only the dates referring to the dispensation from 2 publications of the bans and the delivery of the certificate (« Ist der Braut den 13. Jänner 1811 der Verkündschein gegeben worden ») have been added. This and the date « 12 Jänner » above the entry suggest that the bride was still in Vienna, on 13 January 1811, and that the supposed date of Adam List's wedding in Hungary may be wrong.

Who was Adam List's mother Katharina List, « née » Baumann ? The following explanatory scenarios come to mind :

Heinrich Wamser's genealogical chart is flawed, because Wamser overlooked one of Georg Adam Liszt's wives. Adam List the elder did not marry 3, but 4 times. The age given by his son, at the time of his marriage in 1811, pointing to 1780 as his year of birth, could be a clue in favour of this hypothesis.

Liszt's father, Adam List, was an illegitimate child and this family secret was already covered-up by Liszt's early biographers.

Adam List had been provided with false information regarding his ancestry. In times when many people didn't even know their own date of birth, such a situation was quite common. On the other hand, the fact that his father was still alive and he was in regular contact with his relatives makes such a lack of information unlikely.

Liszt's official paternal grandmother Barbara Schlesak and Katharina Baumann are one and the same person. Different Ist names bear little significance in 200 year old sources that sometimes are fraught with errors, caused by faulty readings and flawed transmission. And, yet, it is hardly conceivable that the name « Katharina Baumann », as mother of the groom, does not appear in the 1811 marriage records of Unterfrauenhaid. One wonders which documents the genealogists have actually examined.

The whole « Schlesak-construct » is a fabrication by the fervent Nazi, Heinrich Wamser, who discovered that Liszt had a Jewish grandmother by the name of Katharina Baumann and decided to erase her from the family tree. Composer Johann Strauß forgery is ample proof that the Nazis did not shy away from falsifying the sources for the sake of « preserving » a composer for the German nation.

Katharina Baumann's existence could remain undetected for over 200 years, because Viennese genealogists, who obviously considered the marriage of Liszt's parents in Unterfrauenhaid an exclusively Hungarian affair, never did any research in Vienna. Based on the newly discovered documents, it is very likely that Liszt's father did not make the acquaintance of his bride in Mattersdorf, but actually Ist met her in Vienna and, then, made her move to Hungary with his proposal of marriage. A lot of research still remains to be done on a topic that seemed to be covered so exhaustively.

Liszt et le « Schottenhof » : correspondance

Dimanche, 23 avril 1871, « Schottenhof », chez Édouard von Liszt.

En venant ce matin dans cette maison, je me suis senti à moitié chez vous. La meilleure part de l'ameublement a été donnée par vous (votre portrait orne le salon) c'est grâce au constant et généreux appui que vous avez prêté à mon cousin, que son existence est devenue plus aisée et plus douce. Je vous ai plusieurs fois dit ma reconnaissance à ce sujet, et vous renouvelle aujourd'hui du fond du cœur mes remerciements pour les bontés effectives que vous accordez à mon très cher et très honorable cousin. Son fils aîné s'annonce bien, travaille assidument - et se montre capable de bien porter son nom. Sa sœur Marie vous plaisait, je crois. Elle a de la noblesse dans les traits et un certain charme doux et sérieux, sans nulle affectation.

Ma dernière semaine à Pest me devint passablement fatigante. Sans compter les ennuis quotidiens, il a fallu s'occuper des 2 soirées avec représentations dramatiques et concert au Palazzo Karatsonyi à Bude. Si le public avait pu être plus nombreux - du moins, sa satisfaction était complète et démonstrative. Diverses petites circonstances s'opposaient à plus d'affluence. Les dames patronnesses de Pest n'ont pas encore acquis la virtuosité transcendante de celles de Paris en matière d'arrangements de concerts, spectacles et quêtes charitables. Amortir les scrupules, fixer les hésitations, fusionner les rivalités, surtaxer les avarés et les avaricieux, charmer, entraîner et, tout à la fois, dévaliser le monde, sont des traits de bravoure, que n'exécutent avec une stupéfiante perfection que les dames à Paris, les étrangères en tête ! Somme toute, les soirées Karatsonyi ont suffisamment réussi, de la même façon que le concert au Palazzo Barberini, en avril 1865, avec les Chimay, et Madame de Montessuy. La recette était même plus considérable cette fois. La Comtesse Marie Rossi, fille de la Comtesse Rossi-Sontag, est une délicieuse cantatrice de salon, d'excellente méthode et parfait bon goût. Elle habite d'ordinaire Presbourg, ou sa parente avec les Palffy, lui garantit les amabilités et prévenances de l'aristocratie austro-hongroise.

Ce soir, je tâcherai de trouver Magne et vous ré-écrirai avant de quitter Vienne, samedi ou dimanche prochain.

B.B.

Mardi, 2 avril 1872, 10 heures du matin, « Schottenhof » .

Arrivé ici, ce matin, j'ai hâte de vous dire mon chagrin de ne pas vous avoir écrit avant de quitter Pest. Les offices de la Semaine-Sainte auxquels je tenais à ne pas manquer, me prenaient plusieurs heures par jour, et les autres se perdaient en menues affaires et obligations pressantes. Il m'a fallu aussi retarder ma communion, que je me proposais de faire le Jeudi-Saint. Mais mon confesseur, le Père Supérieur des Franciscains, était retenu à Raab par des exercices spirituels jusqu'au Dimanche de Pâques. Je me suis encore confessé à lui, hier, lundi, vers midi - et communierai demain ici, à l'église des Bénédictins du « Schottenhof » . Édouard m'a remis vos lignes, qui sont ma plus douce et glorieuse fête, avec le bouquet, et je viens de recevoir votre télégramme. Le Vendredi-Saint, j'ai revu le Prince Constantin à Bude, où il n'a passé que 3 ou 4 jours. Je le retrouverai ce soir à l' « Augarten » , et ferai votre commission à Magne. La reliure des exemplaires de la Messe du couronnement, destinés à « Her Majesty's » et au Prince Constantin, a parfaitement réussi - et je ne regrette point la dépense de près de 300 Florins qu'elle m'occasionne. Ainsi, en compagnie de ces 3 volumes, je me présenterai avec un tant soit peu de fierté ce soir, à l' « Augarten » !

Le Prince Constantin a pris sous son patronage Lenbach autrefois professeur à l'académie de peinture à Weimar, qui peindra prochainement 2 grands portraits en pied de l'Empereur et de l'Impératrice. Accessoirement, Lenbach a 84 portraits pré-notés à Vienne, et davantage encore en Russie ! Son registre de maîtresses « en peinture » ressemble fort à celui de « Don Juan » - exhibé dans le célèbre air de Leporello de Mozart.

Je crois vous avoir déjà écrit que je resterai ici jusqu'à vendredi soir. Les demandes de concerts de bienfaisance et autres me poursuivent. Même la Princesse Auersperg a daigné revenir à la charge - trouvant qu'il était de ma gloire de compléter le brillant succès du concert de Pest par un second concert à Vienne ! Hélas, il n'y a pire sourds que ceux qui ne veulent pas entendre (et je n'entendrai rien de la sorte avant l'hiver prochain, et même alors) vedremo !

Vous me demandez de vous raconter ma vie intime. Rien de plus simple - elle se partage entre les lettres que je vous écris et mes heures de prière. Je voudrais y ajouter quelques heures de travail musical - mais quand et où le retrouverai-je ? Du reste, je me sens tout à fait impersonnel et « selbstlos ». Ce mot m'a été appliqué élogieusement dans plusieurs articles à mon sujet, cet hiver. Il se traduirait difficilement en français sans périphrase, comme dépourvu d'égoïsme, ou débarrassé de soi-même. En dépit de la réputation de personnalité « efirenle », dont on m'a souvent gratifié autrefois, je crois que la ligne continue de ma vie intérieure est précisément ce manque de Moi, que signifie la « Selbstlosigkeit ». Cela ne rend guère ni agréable ni intéressant - quelque bonne envie que j'aie de l'être pour ceux que j'aime, et pour vous par-dessus tout !

On avait l'intention de me fêter aujourd'hui, à Pest. À cause de mon départ, que je ne voulais pas ajourner, quelques-uns de mes amis se sont entendus pour arranger un banquet à l'Hôtel Hungaria, le soir du Dimanche de Pâques. Augusz vous en parlera. Madame la Comtesse Szirmay Szechényi était la « Lady Patroness » de cette petite fête, qui avait bel air et bon ton. Beaucoup de dames de la meilleure société y sont venues, sur l'invitation de la Comtesse Szechényi - et le nombre des assistants dépassait 200, je crois. Abrényi, Albert Apponyi et d'autres ont porté des toasts. Je me suis borné à causer modestement, sans rien dire à haute voix - mais, à la fin de la soirée, j'ai fait mes compliments d'adieu au piano à la très bienveillante compagnie.

Je vous écrirai encore d'ici avant de partir.

B.B.

Je vous envoie l'article de Mihalovich sur le « Christ ». Les lignes sur mon « Christ » avec la citation de Saint-Thomas, sont de Madame Moukhanoff. Elle reste fidèle à son admiration esthétique pour l'Empereur Napoléon - et dit que c'est le seul Français honnête qu'elle connaisse.

Judi, 24 octobre 1872, Vienne, « Schottenhof » .

Je suis arrivé ici, hier matin - et ce matin, avant 7 heures, comme je vous l'écrivais avant-hier de Ratisbonne, je me suis confessé et j'ai communié à l'église des Franciscains. Mon confesseur m'était et me reste inconnu - il m'a dit d'un ton de douce piété plusieurs choses excellentes dont je tâcherai de profiter.

Hier, j'ai beaucoup causé avec Édouard. Mosenthal m'avait écrit à Weimar une lettre fort éloquente, pour me demander de contribuer triplement (comme pianiste, chef d'orchestre et compositeur) au nouveau monument de Beethoven qu'on se propose d'ériger ici. Je me suis excusé, en observant que j'avais déjà fait à peu près ce qu'on me demandait en 1845, à Bonn - et qu'une récidive me semblait peu recommandable. Probablement aussi la très zélée Dominicaine, Patronnesse Raymondine Auersperg, me sommera d'aider de mes 10 doigts son œuvre pie - j'essaierai de la calmer, car il serait difficile d'obtenir un succès et une recette pareils à ceux du concert de l'hiver dernier, à Pest.

2 concerts de Bülow sont annoncés à Vienne, pour le 2 et 8 novembre ; je n'y assisterai point, et n'irai pas non plus à Presbourg comme l'hiver passé. Magne a eu la gracieuseté de me télégraphier pour le 22 octobre, à Bayreuth. Son télégramme m'a été renvoyé ici, hier - avec une toute charmante lettre du Comte Hohenlohe, à laquelle je répondrai prochainement. En ce moment, on m'apporte votre lettre, la bonne - que je lirai après l'expédition de celle-ci.

B.B.

Vendredi, 9 avril 1875, Munich, Hôtel Marienbad.

Plusieurs visites de peu d'intérêt, mais pressantes, m'ont empêché de vous écrire hier du « Schottenhof ». Je suis parti à 7 heures du soir, et arrivé ici avant 6 heures, ce matin. À l'« Augarten », tout est au mieux. Vous seriez contente de la bonne mine et de l'excellent maintien de Magne. Point de futilité, ni d'élégie superflue - mais parfait équilibre d'esprit, avec une exquise bonne grâce de manières fort dignes et mesurées, nullement prétentieuses. Je l'ai vue 4 fois, samedi et mercredi, seule ; lundi, à dîner à l'« Augarten » (où elle avait invité Wilczek, l'aîné des fils de Ratibor, attaché à l'ambassade allemande à Vienne, Mosenthal, Goldmark, Mihalovich et Riedel, jeune compositeur et accompagnateur de renom), et mercredi, à une petite soirée chez les Dönhoff. Là, se trouvaient quelques illustrations de Tart, Semper, Makart, Lenbach et Wilbrandt, le poète dramatique, fort célèbre maintenant. Sa dernière tragédie, « Arria et Messalina », a eu un succès plus retentissant encore que plusieurs autres de ses drames et comédies représentées sur les principaux théâtres d'Allemagne.

Le Prince Constantin est venu chez Bösendorfer sans Magne, qu'on ne s'était pas enhardi à inviter. C'était une petite réunion d'une quinzaine d'artistes : Sophie Menter, Pauline Fichtner, Brüll, Joseffy, Pinner, Zarembski, Mihalovich, etc. — plus Édouard et sa famille, Standhartner, Wilczek et les Dönhoff.

On n'a pas fait de musique le mercredi - Madame Dönhoff prétendant ne plus vouloir jouer du piano, depuis son triomphe du concert Auersperg, avril 1874. Le programme de la soirée Bösendorfer se composait de 4 morceaux seulement - 2 brillamment joués sur le piano par Joseffy, que Moritz protégeait autrefois - un « Albumblatt » pour violoncelle dédié à Madame Dönhoff, composé et exécuté par Popper, mari de Sophie Menter - et le « Walklirenritt » à 4 mains, que j'ai accompagné à Madame Popper. Le menu du souper était plus richement fourni que le programme musical - les convives se partageaient sans trop de division, à de petites tables. À celle de Madame Bösendorfer, nous nations que 4 personnes : Madame Dönhoff, moi et le Prince Constantin, qui me témoigne toujours une très affable bienveillance. Ce que j'ai entendu dire de lui, à Vienne, rend toute inquiétude superflue, sur la continuité de son éminente situation. La Cour et la ville s'accordent en cela - que le Prince Hohenlohe ne chancelle point !

Les représentations de « la Reine de Saba » sont interrompues pour quelque temps. Je ne puis vous en donner par conséquent d'autres nouvelles que celles de son succès un peu surfait, ce me semble - que vous savez par les journaux. Ni la partition ni le « Klavierauszug » n'ont paru - et Goldmark m'assurait qu'il ne s'était pas encore arrangé avec un éditeur. Veuillez dire à Sgambati que je vous enverrai ou apporterai l'Opéra de Goldmark, aussitôt qu'il sera publié.

Certainement, je reviendrai en septembre et terminerai le « Saint-Stanislas » - qui serait déjà bien plus avancé si les embarras du texte ne m'avaient arrêté. Vous ne connaissez que trop mes exigences à ce sujet - je ne puis m'en dédire, car elles me semblent raisonnables. Il faut que cet Oratorio se présente dans des conditions de viabilité, desquelles le texte décide principalement. Inutile désormais de faire même de la bonne musique - sur de la poésie banale, fade, outrée. Sans viser à un succès prompt, je ne voudrais pas affronter un fiasco mérité. Avant de quitter Rome, j'ai prié Blum de s'entendre avec vous sur la tournure définitive du livret de « Saint-Stanislas » . Il a paru comprendre mes intentions - et réussira peut-être à les réaliser, si vous avez la bonté de l'aider. Dès que j'aurai ce livret, ajusté selon mon gré - je vous promets de le composer en 3 ou 4 mois.

B.B.

Augustz vous écrira de ma corde au cou académique, dont je vous reparlerai un autre jour. Mardi ou mercredi, j'irai à Weimar, et serai le 22 à Hanovre.

Weimar, matin du 8 avril 1876.

Arrivé le 2 avril, à 6 heures et demi, au « Schottenhof » , Édouard me remit tout de suite votre lettre et votre magnifique bouquet. Je voudrais savoir vous remercier en paroles, et mieux encore - à défaut d'y réussir, je vous prie de me pardonner mes manquements et ignorances !

À Vienne, il ne m'a pas été possible de trouver 1 ou 2 heures pour vous écrire. J'ai revu Magne 2 fois, en tête-à-tête - et mercredi à dîner à l' « Augarten » . Elle se maintient en assez bonne santé, et garde un noble équilibre de sentiments et d'intelligence. Chez elle, rien d'équivoque ni de futile - son cœur est droit, pur, élevé et pieux - son esprit attrayant, judicieux, ferme - sa contenance dans le monde parfaitement mesurée, prudente, affable, sans ostentation quelconque. Je remercie Dieu de vous avoir donné une si bonne fille, et de bénir en elle le long travail de sollicitudes et d'enseignements que vous lui aviez voué. Vos vertus et mérites fructifient en elle !

De mes 4 journées à Vienne, rien de particulièrement intéressant à raconter. Édouard vous demeure toujours fort reconnaissant et attaché. Le 2 avril, nous avons invité à dîner au « Schottenhof » Monsieur et Madame Bösendorfer, que j'affectionne beaucoup, Camille Saint-Saëns, Gobbi de Pest et Oncken. Celui-ci expose un assez grand tableau, représentant quelques cyprès de la Villa d'Este. Magne m'a fait l'éloge de cette peinture, que je suis allé voir. Saint-Saëns a obtenu un succès de très bon aloi à Vienne, comme pianiste, et pour ses compositions. Sa « Danse macabre » , poème symphonique, devient populaire. La saison prochaine, on donnera sa « Dalila » , Opéra en 4 actes, à Vienne, et, auparavant, à Weimar. Depuis de longues années, je fais grand cas de son talent, tout à fait notoire. Pour vous le définir d'un mot, je dirai que c'est le Rubinstein français doué, à la fois un virtuose éminent, et un compositeur très productif, largement doué, pouvant prétendre à exceller dans tous les genres : Symphonie, Oratorio, musique de chambre ou de salon et Opéras. De plus, il joue admirablement de l'orgue. Personnellement, je suis encore plus lié avec Saint-Saëns qu'avec Rubinstein. Il a eu l'amabilité d'illustrer le concert des élèves du Conservatoire, improvisé à mon intention, lundi dernier, en dirigeant sa « Danse macabre », et en jouant ma Fantaisie sur des motifs des « Ruines d'Athènes » de Beethoven. L'auditoire se composait de 200 à 300 personnes environ, en tête desquelles se trouvaient le Prince Metternich, le Prince Hohenlohe, etc. Le petit concert commença par une Marche du Comte Seilern, intitulé « Liszt-Marsch » - composition bien réussie et qu'on a beaucoup applaudie. Seilern l'a dirigée lui-même, et le Prince Constantin me dit qu'il la mettra sur le programme d'un des prochains concerts de la Cour. Zaluski vous a parlé de cette Marche au mois de décembre dernier. Lundi soir, il y avait réunion artistique et aristocratique chez Seilern, à laquelle Hohenlohe prit part. Le beau sexe y était représenté exclusivement par la Comtesse Dönhoff, qui nous avait invités à un petit dîner chez elle, entre le concert du Conservatoire et la soirée Seilern. Nous n'étions que 4 convives : Son Éminence le Baron Hofmann, le Docteur Standhartner (ancien ami de Wagner et l'habitué de tous les salons aristocratiques, aussi bien que des cercles artistiques) , Saint-Saëns et moi. Au dîner de l' « Augarten », on était 8 à table : Magne et son mari, Wilczek, la Comtesse Gizycka, née Zamoyska, Seilern, Makart (qui a rapporté de superbes esquisses d'Égypte) , Édouard et moi. Sans verboisement, le Prince Constantin a gracieusement porté mon toast. Wilczek reviendra à Weimar à la mi-mai, et sera de la Ire représentation des « Nibelungen » à Bayreuth. Vous savez que, par ordre, la Ire représentation de « Tristan et Isolde », à Berlin, a été donnée au bénéfice de la grande œuvre de Bayreuth. L'Empereur et l'Impératrice y assistaient du commencement à la fin, et notre Grande-duchesse aussi. La recette était de 5,000 Thaler. Depuis 2 mois, je n'ai pas de lettres de Cosima - nous nous entendons sans phrases ! Elle, Wagner et tout « Wahnfried » m'ont télégraphié le 2 avril.

Je répéterai du fond du cœur et aussi des lèvres, la belle prière polonaise pour tous ceux que j'ai fait pécher, ou n'ai pu empêcher de pécher. Quant à ma réponse à votre lettre « à lire en wagon » - elle ne pourrait s'écrire qu'en sanglots ! Que les bons anges vous protègent !

B.B.

Mercredi soir, 11 octobre 1876, Vienne, « Schottenhof » .

Pendant les 3 jours à Nuremberg, de vendredi à lundi, j'ai éprouvé quelque chose de ce plaisir intime, qui fait que les amoureux ne s'ennuient jamais en tête-à-tête ; car ils parlent toujours d'eux-mêmes. Avec Monsieur Ramann, votre sincère enthousiaste, nous n'avons fait que parler de vous, regarder vos portraits - et remémorer des jours passés, qui durent sempiternellement au fond de mon cœur. Quelques morceaux de piano et une visite au Musée Germanique, dont vous avez vu les commencements dans la maison du Baron von und zu Aufseß, étaient les seuls intermèdes à nos entretiens romains. Ces divertissements d'art et d'archéologie nous ramenaient encore sans cesse à vous.

Lundi, 2 heures de l'après-midi, je suis arrivé à Ratisbonne. L'éditeur Pustet (bien connu au Vatican par ses belles Éditions du missel, du bréviaire, etc.) et Haberl (prêtre et maître de chapelle au dome) continuent dignement l'œuvre de la restauration de la musique dans les églises catholiques, œuvre commencée et soutenue pendant plus de 30 années par le chanoine Docteur Charles Proske. Votre Patron Saint-Charles l'a bien inspiré en cela - et Ratisbone, bon radeau, reste fidèlement attaché à la barque de Saint-Pierre. Je vous ai dit que la métropole de cette restauration est Ratisbonne. Entreprise un peu avant la Révolution de juillet 1830, elle s'opère lentement mais durablement. Réintégrer le chant grégorien et raviver les offices de musique a cappella de Palestrina, Lassus, Anerio, Vittoria, voilà le hic et le hoc. Selon l'exemple de Proske, mort en 1861, Witt, Haberl et quelques autres se dévouent avec une ardeur toute chrétienne, afin d'atteindre le but de la « Musica divina » - laquelle ne doit pas rester enfouie, comme lettre morte dans les bibliothèques, mais bien se chanter, se publier de nouveau, et résonner dans nos églises. Le « Cäcilienverein », présidé par Witt, a déjà produit de bons résultats pratiques et en produira davantage - si Nos Saintetés, les évêques, et Ses Éminences, les cardinaux, daignent lui prêter un quart d'oreille attentive. Mais la musique ne compte guère dans l'Église - elle y est comme la Cendrillon des Beaux-arts, sans aucune chance d'égaliser ses sœurs, la peinture, la sculpture et l'architecture, qui ont l'espace et le temps pour elles, tandis que la pauvre ne sait que devenir. Malheureusement, Witt est fort souffrant depuis 2 ans. Je regrette de ne l'avoir pas retrouvé à Ratisbonne, et j'aurais pu le chercher à son presbytère de Schatzhofen, village près de Landshut - mais il est, pour raison de santé, à Meran, climat doux, et y passera tout l'hiver.

Édouard m'a montré les dernières lignes de votre lettre. Hélas, je ne suis pas encore parvenu à sourire de mes afflictions - tout en espérant de la miséricorde divine qu'elles cesseront !

B.B.

Peut-être Magne reviendra-t-elle ici, après-demain. Dimanche, je serai à Budapest.

18 mars 1879, Budapest.

À mon retour ici, je trouve votre lettre du 3 au 13 mars. La chaîne continue de vos bienfaits pour moi, depuis 32 années, ne me laisse d'autre liberté que celle de la plus profonde gratitude. Vous m'avez presque défendu d'en parler, et je ne saurais guère l'exprimer comme je la ressens. Avant d'aller à Rome, j'ai déposé, fin septembre ou les premiers jours d'octobre 1861, mon testament écrit de cœur, sans conseil ni consultation quelconque, au « Stadtgericht » de Weimar. Je vous en ai envoyé alors la copie - sur vos observations, relatives à la singularité inopportune de la forme, j'ai déposé un 2^e papier, de quelques lignes seulement, à ce même « Stadtgericht », pour confirmer la disposition principale de mon testament. Elle se réduit simplement à ceci : je vous dois la conservation et l'accroissement de mon avoir - aussi bien que la meilleure part de mon être. Donc, je vous lègue cet avoir - et prie Dieu de disposer de mon être à votre service, en ce monde et en l'autre ! Jamais, je n'ai songé à retirer ou changer ce testament - quand la mort me viendra, j'y ajouterai ma dernière bénédiction pour vous ! Si je meurs avant vous, je vous supplie d'avantager ma bien-aimée fille, Cosima, dans la distribution des objets de ma possession. En regard du Musée de Pest, je maintiens la détermination que je vous ai écrite et répétée verbalement. Point de faste, même dans la générosité - restons simples et vrais, et bornons nos dons au Musée de Budapest, aux objets désignés en novembre 1873, lesquels sont : le sabre qui m'a été remis en plein public, au Théâtre de Pest, en 1840. Le gobelet en or des dames hongroises, dont le nom est inscrit - également donné en 1840. Le piano donné à Beethoven par la maison Broadwood - il resta dans la chambre de Beethoven jusqu'à sa mort, et fut acheté par Monsieur Spina, qui voulut bien m'en faire cadeau de la fagon la plus amicale. Je n'avais nulle idée de m'approprier une telle relique, et ne l'acceptais que sur l'instance de Spina. Le magnifique pupitre en argent, produit d'une souscription en mon honneur à Vienne, en 1846. La chose n'a abouti que par votre efficace intervention subséquente. Votre merveilleux « Tactstock » en or massif, orné de pierres précieuses. Votre plus merveilleux encrier en platine, de composition si poétique. Plus, serait trop ! Vous savez que je désirais offrir tout de suite ces objets au Musée, après le jubilé de ma cinquantaine de carrière artistique, qu'on a célébré à Budapest en novembre 1873. Vos objections ont été respectées - mais je ne puis changer d'avis à cet égard. Demander un local spécial au Musée pour mes dons me répugne, et me semble même « nicht vornehm » ! Autre chose, si après ma mort, on fait une place à part à ces dons. Vis-à-vis du directeur du Musée, Monsieur de Pulsky, je me trouve un peu embarrassé, à cause de ma promesse d'il y a presque 6 ans. Je suis cependant parfois son « partner » au « whist » - et sa longue expérience des choses de ce monde le rend indulgent !

Pendant que j'étais à Klausenburg, le Prince Constantin, qui passait par Pest, a eu l'aimable attention de me laisser sa carte. La Ire semaine d'avril, je retrouverai Wilczek et son ami à Vienne - si vous avez quelque commission pour eux, veuillez m'en charger.

En Hongrie, tout le monde tâche de secourir les victimes du grand désastre de Szegedin. Le Roi est venu en personne à Szegedin et, dans une très noble proclamation, demande que les sommes considérables, votées pour la prochaine célébration de ses noces d'argent, soient employées au profit de 1,000 et 1,000 infortunés. À Budapest, la souscription en leur faveur a déjà atteint près de 200,000 Florins - presque autant en Angleterre. À Vienne, la Comtesse Andrésy arrange une représentation au théâtre, où la Princesse Metternich et la Comtesse Pallavicini rempliront les principaux rôles. Elle a bien voulu m'inviter à y participer de mes 10 doigts - je me suis excusé, et me bornerai au concert, qui aura lieu ici, mercredi prochain ; on espère que la recette dépassera 7,000 Florins.

Du 2 au 8 avril, je serai au « Schottenhof » , chez ma cousine. Toujours et partout de tout cœur,

Franz Liszt

1er avril 1879, Budapest.

Demain matin, je serai à Vienne, au « Schottenhof » . Le concert de Szegedin, mercredi passé, a réussi - 6,000 et quelques 100 Florins de recette nette. Il paraît que j'ai encore assez proprement joué du piano - ce sera encore à recommencer pour en finir finalement, dans 3 ou 4 jours à Vienne.

Mon évêque de Szathmar me demande une effigie quelconque de Palestrina, lithographie ou photographie, médaille ou gravure. Son médaillon doit figurer grandement sur le fronton de l'académie de musique. Veuillez avoir la bonté de demander à Sgambati d'expédier 1 ou 2 images de Palestrina à Monsieur Kornel Abranyi.

De plein cœur, tout a vos pieds,

Franz Liszt

Matin du 3 avril 1879, Vienne, « Schottenhof » .

Tendrement, merci de vos lettres, vœux, fleurs, prières et communion - pour la fête de Saint-François. Tout cela reste recueilli dans l'intime du cœur ! Revenu hier matin, dans cette chambre, où manque l'ami tutélaire et persévérant qui me garda une inébranlable confiance de même que ma mère - j'ai retrouvé votre photographie sur ma table à écrire. Elle m'incite à devenir meilleur - et à vivre de sorte à bien mourir !

À 1 heure, j'étais à l' « Augarten » . Le Prince Constantin est encore assez souffrant - je ne le reverrai qu'aujourd'hui à dîner. Avec Magne, nous avons tout de suite parlé de vous.

Franz Liszt

Mercredi, 9 avril 1879, Vienne.

Je suis retourné à l' « Augarten » , dimanche soir. Le Prince Constantin m'a dit affectueusement que Franz lui a fait bonne impression. Demain soir, je pars d'ici avec Franz (il va à Giessen, moi à Hanovre) , notre route est la même jusqu'à Leipzig. À Hanovre, je resterai de 6 à 8 jours. La soirée musicale, lundi, chez Andrézy, a parfaitement réussi - l'Empereur et plusieurs Archiducs et Archiduchesses y étaient. Hier soir, la Messe de Gran s'est trouvée pour la 1re fois en pleine lumière - tant par l'excellente exécution, que par le très bienveillant accueil du public. Hier matin, aussi, Hellmesberger, l' « Hofkapellmeister » , a fait très bien chanter à la Chapelle de la « Burg » , mes 2 compositions pour les « Sacramente » de l'Eucharistie et du Mariage. Magne m'a ménagé cette noble surprise - il n'y avait qu'une dizaine d'auditeurs discrets dans la Chapelle. De tout cœur, tout à vos pieds,

Franz Liszt

Mercredi matin, 24 mars 1880, « Schottenhof » , Vienne.

J'ai revu Magne hier matin. Malgré ses nombreuses veilles, ses angoisses, pendant plus d'une semaine, et ses fatigues continuelles - sa mine est bonne, plutôt meilleure que l'année passée. Elle paraît rassurée sur la guérison assez lente de son fils, aux soins duquel elle se consacre entièrement. Par conséquent, elle ne sort pas encore le soir, et ne reçoit qu'un petit nombre de personnes. Le Prince Constantin est venu à mon concert, hier soir, mais nous ne nous sommes pas rencontrés. Demain soir, je retournerai à l' « Augarten » , après l'heure du dîner.

Ci-joint, le programme du concert - l'impression du public était des plus satisfaisantes. L'exécution des « Idéale » et des « Cloches de Strasbourg » , excellente - un peu moins, mais convenable pourtant, celle de la Messe pour voix d'hommes qui, à la répétition, inquiétait plusieurs de mes amis. Le nombreux auditoire s'est montré très bienveillant, et m'a chaleureusement applaudi. Dame Critique se chargea de mettre son eau un peu trouble dans mon vin - je suis aguerri à ses procédés, et ne m'en plains nullement ! Ma cousine vous enverra les articles des principaux journaux.

Ce soir, le « Wagnerverein » m'invite à une soirée musicale, non payante, donnée en mon honneur dans la salle Bösendorfer. Demain, on exécutera ma Messe chorale, écrite au Monte Mario, dans la petite église dédiée aux 9 chœurs des Anges. Le Maître de chapelle de cette église se nomme Böhm, et appartient à l'école Cécilienne de Witt, à Ratisbonne, à laquelle je me rattache volontiers sans prétentions ni obséquiosité. Le chanoine de Lucca, évêque de Palestrina, a nommé le curé Witt, chanoine honoraire du chapitre de Palestrina. En cela, Son Éminence a suivi le bon exemple, donné l'an dernier par le Prince Hohenlohe, à Albano. Le Lundi de Pâques, à la Chapelle de la Cour, Hellmesberger dirigera de nouveau la Messe du couronnement. Elle a pris domicile à Vienne - sa brièveté et sa facilité d'exécution lui profitent.

Je commencerai ma douzaine de visites obligatoires aujourd'hui - par les Metternich ; les Reuss ; Dingelstedt qui a été malade et garde encore sa chambre ; Hellmesberger ; Standhartner. Vos très chères lignes sur Daniela me touchent profondément - ma tendre affection et ma prière lui sont dévolues. Le 4 avril, je pars d'ici pour Weimar.

Jeudi matin, 2 février 1882, « Schottenhof », Vienne.

Je n'ai jamais voyagé en hiver par un temps aussi doux que celui d'hier. Soleil du matin au soir - manteaux et plaids devenaient presque superflus. Le trajet de Venise à Vienne se fait en 18 heures - nous sommes exactement arrivés ici à 10 heures du soir. À la gare m'attendaient Brichta, Standhartner, Bösendorfer et Bülow - qui m'a mené seul dans son fiacre au « Schottenhof ». J'y ai trouvé quelques lignes de bienvenue de Magne, et lui porterai à une heure votre lettre et les objets. Ce soir, concert de Bülow, dont le programme se compose exclusivement des œuvres pour piano de Brahms. Le 8 février, Bülow donnera son concert à Budapest - après, il jouera à Presbourg, etc. Son humeur est des meilleures, et les prodigieux succès de sa Chapelle de Meiningen à Berlin, Hambourg et Leipzig l'ont ragailardi.

En revenant de l' « Augarten », j'acheverai ces lignes.

6 heures du soir :

Magne a l'air mieux portante que l'hiver passé, et paraît un peu engraisée, ce qui ne lui fait pas tort. Notre entretien a été court, à cause de la visite du Comte Gustav von Neipperg. Demain, je dînerai à l' « Augarten », et l'on parlera amplement de Rome. Chez la Comtesse Dönhoff (qui va un peu mieux, mais ne sort pas encore le soir), Bülow a causé en long avec Magne, et lui a fait le franc aveu qu'il n'aimait guère le Prince Constantin Hohenlohe. Celui-ci ne se chagrinerait point de cette privation et s'en dédommagerait aisément partout, à la Cour et en ville ! À moins de pratiquer la charité chrétienne - nul n'est besoin d'aimer beaucoup de personnes ! L'esprit du monde nous conduit nécessairement au dénigrement d'autrui et à l'exagération de nos égoïstes vanités.

Je suis très content des soins attentionnés et intelligents d'Achille. Samedi soir, je serai à Budapest. Demain, je tâcherai de retrouver le Comte Haynald, excessivement occupé par des délégations - et la Princesse Reuss, qui vient de m'écrire aimablement. Vostrissimo Sclavissimo.

Lundi matin, 17 avril 1882, Vienne.

Ma dernière lettre, expédiée de Budapest, était écrite le jour de mon départ de Kalocsa - quelques heures avant le dîner, ou, comme les jours précédents, j'étais assis près du Cardinal. Cette fois, il me parla avec de vifs éloges, sans restriction quelconque, des Causes - ce qui me surprit un peu, car Son Éminence protège ostensiblement les Révérends Pères de la compagnie de Jésus. Néanmoins, il admire beaucoup vos remarquables chapitres sur la situation des évêques. Il en loua l'exactitude, la perspicacité et la profondeur lumineuse, qu'il pouvait apprécier mieux que d'autres - s'étant trouvé, paraît-il, dans un des cas que vous assimilez maîtement, avec ampleur, de façon cardinalice. Ce flatteur et juste éloge vous fera plaisir. J'ajoute un médiant bon mot que je connais depuis plusieurs années - mais n'ai gardé de rentrer, et vous prie de ne pas redire. « Haynald n'est pas ultramontain - mais ultramondain. » Le fait est que Haynald emploie le considérable revenu de son siège archi-épiscopal, 300,000 Florins environ, de la manière la plus édifiante (comme aucun des hauts Prélats de Hongrie) en fondation d'écoles, d'hôpitaux, secours et largesses de toutes sortes. On en profite et glose - c'est le train ordinaire du monde. Les partis de l'opposition conservatrice et destructive reprochent aussi à Haynald son attitude archi-gouvernementale.

Mardi :

Au dîner d'hier, à l'« Augarten », le Prince Constantin brilla par son absence. La fête de la Sainte-Rodolphe est celle du « Kronprinz » - par conséquent, le Grand-Maître était retenu à la Cour. Nous n'étions que 7 à table : les Comtesses Gizycka et Dönhoff, 2 jeunes fils de Hohenlohe et Monsieur Lippe. Celui-ci m'avait porté hier votre aimable billet au « Schottenhof », sans me rencontrer - mais j'irai le trouver à l'Archevêché cet après-midi. Il vient de faire une éclatante conversion américaine.

Le pianiste de la Cour de l'« Augarten », le jeune Godefroi, n'a pas reçu, à ma surprise, mon petit Arbre de Noël. N'y pensez plus car, de Weimar, j'enverrai à Magne les 2 éditions à 2 et à 4 mains. À perpétuité, votre Sclavissimo,

Franz Liszt

Demain soir, je serai à Weimar, et le 27 avril à Bruxelles.

Jeudi, 23 octobre 1884, Weimar.

Hier, au moment d'aller à la Messe, lettre et télégramme de vous me sont arrivés - ils ont accompagné ma prière. Ce m'est un chagrin de vous dire que je ne pourrai rester à Rome, au-delà de 5 à 6 semaines. Il faut que je m'occupe de l'Académie de musique à Budapest - les mois d'hiver sont indiqués pour cela. Je ne voudrais pas manquer à ma tâche cet hiver et, comme les 14 années précédentes, je compte passer le mois de janvier à partir du 15, et les mois de février et mars jusqu'à la Semaine Sainte, à Budapest. On peut trouver que mon séjour là est de peu d'utilité, et je suis assez de cet avis - cependant, j'espère contribuer à diminuer l'ivraie et à faire lever la bonne semence. Donc, je vous prie, très chère « Beschutzerin », de ne faire retenir aucun logis pour moi. Je m'accommoderai soit de l'Hôtel Alibert, soit de l'Hôtel Vittoria, qu'on dit meilleur. Achille me l'avait déjà recommandé - il est à 2 pas de Saint-Andrea, l'église des Minimes, qui est mon chemin naturel pour venir chez vous. Mon intention était de quitter Weimar avant la mi-octobre. Une de ces indispositions, comme il m'en prend au printemps et en automne chaque année, m'a repris la semaine passée, au moment où je faisais mes paquets. Selon l'assurance d'un excellent médecin, aucun mal organique ne m'a atteint ; je suis seulement sujet à gagner, de loin en loin, des petites fièvres de lassitude ou de surexcitation. Cela n'a rien d'inquiétant - sous le rapport physique, je suis quitte à bon marché de l'existence !

À cause de mon indisposition dont je suis remis, j'ai passé le 22 octobre assez tranquillement. La veille, les Altesses héréditaires m'ont invité à un petit dîner de 7 à 8 couverts.

Monseigneur est encore à Biarritz avec sa fille Elsi, la Grande-duchesse à Heinrichsau. Hier, j'ai dîné en tête-à-tête avec mon excellent ami Gilles. Après, l'héréditaire est venu me voir, ainsi que Beust, etc. - mais je m'étais endormi, et ne me suis réveillé que pour entendre un admirable harpiste, Monsieur Posse et de charmants morceaux de piano d'un jeune compositeur américain, Monsieur Bird. Ces 2 artistes étaient venus exprès de Berlin pour me complimenter à l'entrée de ma 74^e année. La soirée n'a pas été moins paisible, et je me suis mis au lit à 10 heures.

Voici mon prochain itinéraire : samedi, 25 octobre, Nuremberg ; lundi soir, Vienne, « Schottenhof » ; jeudi, 30 octobre, Budapest. Là, je prendrai les dispositions relatives aux 3 visites que, depuis longtemps, j'ai promis de faire : au Comte Géza Zichy, à sa terre de Tetetlen ; à Monsieur l'évêque Schlauch, à la résidence de son diocèse de Szathmar ; et à mon vieil ami, le Comte Alexandre Teleky, à son château de Kolto, sur la frontière de Transylvanie. Ensuite, reviendra nécessairement à Budapest, en route pour Rome, votre umilissimo Sclavissimo,

Franz Liszt

...

Lori Wittgenstein a écrit ici que son mariage sera célébré à Tegernsee, près de Munich - et qu'elle passera sa lune de miel à Paris, avant de revenir à Weimar.

Du Jeudi-Saint jusqu'au Lundi de Pâques, j'étais à Kalocsa chez le Comte Haynald. Revenu hier soir, j'ai trouvé vos 2 très chères lettres. Je reviens à mon portrait. C'est sur la recommandation de Hubert que j'ai posé pour Monsieur Layraud, 1^{er} prix de Rome qui s'annonçait comme un Berlioz de la peinture. Je suis bon gré au Prince Radziwill d'avoir acquis ce portrait. La Princesse Marcelline Czartoryska, née Radziwill, se garderait bien de pendre une effigie de grande dimension de Liszt dans son salon de musique - tout au plus, y admettrait-elle une photographie !

Le Comte Haynald est toujours très occupé et surchargé. Il n'y a de ces sortes de choses qu'on ne lui demande, et quelquefois avec impudence. Le portrait de Son Éminence, peint par Munkácsy, est fort beau, mais un peu vieilli, dit-on.

Mardi prochain, sera à Vienne, « Schottenhof » , votre umilissimo Sclavissimo.

Le couvent bénédictin des Écossais

Accolé à l'église, le complexe d'habitation de « Schottenhof », de l'architecte Joseph Kornhäusel possédant 2 cours intérieures, date de 1835. Franz Liszt demeura quelques années dans ce bel exemple du style « Biedermeier » .

Ces bâtiments abritent aujourd'hui le musée du Couvent des Écossais (« Museum im Schottenstift ») qui possède d'intéressantes collections de tableaux figuratifs de la fin du Moyen-âge ainsi que des instituts universitaires et des restaurants. Le collège voisin compta parmi ses élèves quelques futures personnalités comme l'acteur-dramaturge Johann Nestroy ; Wagner-Jauregg, prix Nobel de médecine ; Viktor Adler, père du marxisme autrichien ; ou encore le célèbre compositeur Johann Strauß.

...

Bienvenue à la « Benediktushaus » : l'hôtel de l'abbaye « Schottenstift », au cœur de Vienne.

L'abbaye « Schottenstift » dirige un hôtel conformément à la tradition de la règle de Saint-Benoît. La « Benediktushaus » propose des petits-déjeuners et est intégrée dans le complexe de bâtiments historiques du cloître des bénédictins, sur la « Freyung ». Elle fut ouverte en 1980 et a été complètement rénovée ces dernières années.

Nos clients apprécient particulièrement le calme absolu qui règne dans les chambres implantées dans l'une des cours intérieures du cloître, ornées d'arbres. C'est pourquoi nous avons renoncé, volontairement et conformément aux désirs de nos clients, à équiper nos chambres de télévision et de radio. Chacun des étages ne comprend que 5 chambres. Les couloirs larges et clairs sont une invitation à la flânerie.

Profitez de ce silence monastique au beau milieu du centre-ville et découvrez l'atmosphère particulière de la « Benediktushaus » .

...

Schottenhof : I. Bezirk - Freyung Nr. 6 ; Schottengasse Nr. 2 ; Helferstorferstraße Nr. 2.

Um 1155 rief der Babenberger Heinrich II. irische Benediktinermönche (« Schotten ») nach Wien. 1418 übergab Albrecht V. das Schottenstift wegen Missständen den Benediktinern aus Melk. 1724 bis 1794 entstand der sich aus mehreren Gebäuden zusammensetzende Komplex des Schottenhofs. Der hinter der Kirche und auf einem großen Teil der Freyung gelegene Klosterfriedhof (« Im Vogelsang ») wurde 1751 aufgelassen. 1826 bis 1832 wurden die meisten Gebäude des ausgedehnten Komplexes, der nun offiziell den Namen « Schottenhof » erhielt, nach Plänen von Josef Kornhäusel umgestaltet beziehungsweise neu erbaut. 1846-1847 ließ das Stift im rechten Winkel zum alten Schottensteigtrakt ein neues Miethaus errichten, 1871 bis 1874 wurde anstelle des Schottensteigtrakts ein neuer Trakt errichtet.

Das Museum im Schottenstift

Da das Schottenstift als eines der wenigen Klöster nie aufgehoben wurde, sind seine Sammlungen von besonderem Interesse. Die schönsten Stücke sind im Museum ausgestellt.

Das Museum ist in den Räumen der ehemaligen Abtwohnung eingerichtet. Kostbarster Schatz sind die Tafeln des sogenannten Schottenaltars, eines Hauptwerks der gotischen Tafelmalerei. Der namentlich leider unbekannte Künstler dürfte aus Nürnberg zugewandert sein. Auf zwei der Tafeln sieht man, wie Wien um 1470 ausgesehen hat : Es sind die ältesten topographischen Darstellungen der Stadt.

Weitere bedeutende Ausstellungsstücke sind eine Tafel des Peter Paul Rubens, frühe niederländische Landschaftsbilder und ein besonders schönes Bild des österreichischen Barockmalers Franz Anton Maulbertsch.

Den Charme des Museums machen auch wertvolle alte Möbel, liturgisches Gerät, kostbare liturgische Gewänder und natürlich Bücher, Handschriften und Urkunden aus.

Gerne planen und organisieren wir für Sie auch private, maßgeschneiderte Führungen - bitte kontaktieren Sie uns dazu hier.

Die Pflege von Kultur gehört zu den klassischen Aufgaben eines Benediktinerklosters.

Die Mönche des Schottenstiftes heißen Sie im Museum herzlich willkommen !

Franz Liszt et l'abbaye bénédictin des Écossais

Der berühmte Musiker Franz Liszt (1811-1886, oberes Bild) hat nicht nur in Wien seine Ausbildung begonnen, sondern kam auch später immer wieder nach Wien zurück. Einerseits gab er hier eigene Konzerte oder besuchte Aufführungen seiner Werke, andererseits besuchte er hier seine Wiener Verwandten.

Unter diesen Verwandten sticht vor allem der Onkel Franz Liszt's, Generalprokurator Doktor Eduard Ritter von Liszt (1817-1879, unteres Bild) , heraus, dem Franz Liszt nach dem Tod seines eigenen Sohnes Daniel (1859) den erblichen Ritterstand übertragen ließ. Doktor Eduard Ritter von Liszt zog 1863 in eine Wohnung im sogenannten « Schottenhof » ein. Selbst sehr kulturinteressiert und musikalisch begabt richtete er in seiner Wohnung einen eigenen Raum ein, der auf Grund der Farbe der Polsterung der Möbel als « Blauer Salon » bekannt wurde. Nachdem Franz Liszt ab 1869 im Rahmen seiner Wien-Aufenthalte regelmäßig bei seinem Onkel wohnte, fanden dort viele musikalische Treffen statt, an denen und andere Richard Wagner, Ludwig Bösendorfer, Sophie Menter und dergleichen teilnahmen.

Nach dem Tode des Generalprokurators und dessen Witwe übernahm der Sohn, Eduard junior, die Wohnung und begann bereits 1936 anlässlich der Feierlichkeiten zum 50-Jahr-Jubiläum des Todestages von Franz Liszt einige Gegenstände nach Ungarn zu verkaufen. Die Wohnung selbst wurde nach dem Tode von Eduard junior ausgeräumt und die noch vorhandenen Einrichtungsgegenstände auf verschiedene Orte aufgeteilt.

Die Ausstellung findet in Zusammenarbeit mit dem Ferenc Liszt Gedenkmuseum in Budapest, dem Burgenländischen Landesmuseum in Eisenstadt und dem Archiv der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien statt und versucht die Spuren Franz Liszt's rund um das Schottenstift, seine Aufenthalte in der Wohnung seines Onkels, die Beziehungen zum Konvent der Schottenmönche und das weitere Schicksal des sogenannten « Blauen Salons » darzustellen.

L'abbaye bénédictine et l'église de Notre-Dame des Écossais

Le monastère de « Schottenstift » - Abbaye bénédictine Notre-Dame des Écossais de Vienne.

Lorsque le duc Henri II (Jasomirgott) fonda le monastère en 1155 à Vienne, il fit appel à des moines écossais de sa précédente ville résidentielle de Ratisbonne. Dans l'acte de fondation le plus anciennement conservé datant de l'année 1161, ces moines sont appelés « Scottos », Écossais. Le monastère fut consacré à « Notre-Dame des Écossais », dont la statue se trouve être la plus ancienne statue mariale conservée à Vienne. Elle se trouve dans la chapelle Romane, la chapelle du Saint-Sacrement, accessible depuis l'entrée de la tour des cloches.

Du 6e au 15e siècle, les moines venus d'Irlande, puis plus tard d'Écosse, influencèrent le développement de la culture chrétienne européenne. Connus pour leur foi personnelle forte et leur profonde formation, ils pèrègrinèrent à travers toute l'Europe afin de répandre la foi chrétienne et fonder monastères et hôpitaux. Ils tinrent aussi des hospices pour pèlerins se rendant à Rome ou en Terre Sainte. À partir de l'année 1310, l'existence à Vienne d'une école du monastère des Écossais est attestée. Cette tradition perdure jusqu'à aujourd'hui avec le célèbre « Schottengymnasium ». Depuis la fondation de l'Université de Vienne, en 1365, plusieurs moines viennois y exercèrent en tant que recteurs ou professeurs. Différents privilèges furent concédés au monastère comme le droit d'asile, c'est-à-dire l'accueil et la protection d'une personne poursuivie politiquement ou coupable d'un délit jusqu'à ce qu'un accord de justice soit conclu. C'est pourquoi la place devant le monastère s'appelle encore aujourd'hui « Freyung » (« frei » signifiant libre). Cette tradition trouve son origine dans l'Ancien Testament, lorsque le peuple juif pris possession de la Terre Promise et fonda des villes d'asile afin de permettre aux personnes poursuivies d'échapper à la vengeance du sang.

Les moines iro-écossais n'abandonnèrent jamais leur étroite appartenance à leur patrie d'origine. Leur accroissement venait des abbayes irlandaises. C'est de là aussi que leur venait un soutien financier. Lorsque le Pape Martin V les obligea à accepter des personnes autres qu'iro-écossaises, les moines refusèrent. Ils préférèrent abandonner la maison de Vienne et retourner dans le monastère Saint-Jacques de Ratisbonne. C'est en 1418 que les 1ers moines de langue allemande investirent les lieux. Mais bientôt (aux 16e et 17e siècles) de nouveaux obstacles se dressèrent entravant le développement de la vie spirituelle du monastère : pendant la Réformation, le nombre des frères fut réduit au minimum, l'abbaye fut également lourdement taxée pour l'effort de guerre contre l'invasion des Turcs.

L'église Romane et Gothique était pratiquement d'un tiers plus grand que l'église actuelle. Après plusieurs incendies et tremblements de terre dévastateurs, l'église fut, de 1638 à 1648, reconstruite plus petite et Baroquée, ce qui se reconnaît aisément aux peintures des autels ainsi qu'aux riches appareillages des voutes. L'abbaye vécut sous l'abbatit de l'Abbé Carl Fetzer (1705-1750) un sommet de son histoire et s'enrichit sur les plans tant spirituels qu'économiques.

Les possessions actuelles de la riche bibliothèque ainsi que du musée viennent principalement de cette époque. Le chef-d'œuvre du musée est cependant un triptyque du « Schottenmeister » représentant des scènes de la Passion du Christ et de la vie de la Mère de Dieu. Avec sa haute valeur artistique, ce triptyque est également remarquable par le fait qu'il nous donne la plus ancienne représentation topographique de Vienne au 15^e siècle. Au 19^e siècle, en raison du mauvais état des bâtiments, le monastère fut partiellement rebâti. L'église fut également rénovée à l'intérieur dans un style néo-Baroque (notamment les tableaux au niveau de la voûte, de l'autel majeur et de la mosaïque) . En 1994, une rénovation globale permit de s'adapter aux nouvelles exigences liturgiques. Le grand orgue et l'orgue de chœur furent reconstruits à neuf.

Les moines s'acquittent de l'office choral (ouvert au public) , de la lecture spirituelle et du travail à l'école et dans les différentes paroisses du monastère. La communauté compte actuellement 26 frères. L'engagement des Iers moines iro-écossais pour l'honneur de Dieu reste l'option fondamentale de notre communauté, telle que nous la trouvons formulée par Saint-Benoît dans sa Règle :

« UT IN OMNIBUS GLORIFICETUR DEUS »

(Qu'en toutes choses, Dieu soit glorifié !)

...

Les origines de l'abbaye Schottenstift remontent à l'année 1155. À cette époque, le duc Henri II d'Autriche (Jasomirgott) fit venir à Vienne des moines iro-écossais du monastère Saint-Jacques de Ratisbonne. Ces moines quittèrent Vienne en 1418 mais le cloître germanophone conserva le nom de « Schotten » (écossais) .

Le « Museum im Schottenstift » (musée du « Schottenstift » , accessible depuis la boutique du cloître) , abrite l'imposant autel des Maîtres écossais, de style Gothique tardif, qui présente la plus ancienne vue de la ville de Vienne qui soit topographiquement correcte.

Nos clients sont invités aux services et aux heures de prière de l'église écossaise. La « Benediktushaus » elle-même comprend une chapelle.

La chapelle Romane de l'entrée de la « Benediktushaus » est la plus ancienne partie conservée de l'église et un lieu de culte au rayonnement méditatif considérable. Il est possible de la visiter.

Dès le seuil de notre porte, l'offre culturelle très riche de Vienne vous attend. Le « Hofburg » , le « Burgtheater » et l'Hôtel-de-ville ne sont qu'à quelques minutes à pied de la « Benediktushaus » , et le trajet jusqu'à la cathédrale Saint-Étienne vous permet de faire une courte promenade à travers le centre-ville de Vienne. Les monuments et lieux culturels les plus importants du centre sont tous très bien accessibles à pied.

La « Benediktushaus » est située juste à côté des sièges de différentes sociétés, ministères, lieux de formation et du bâtiment principal de l'Université de Vienne, qui est étroitement relié à l'abbaye du « Schottenstift » , depuis 1365.

...

Le « Schottenstift » , nom complet : « Benediktinerabtei unserer Lieben Frau zu den Schotten » (Abbaye bénédictine de Notre-Dame des Écossais) est une abbaye au centre de Vienne fondée en 1155 quand Henri II Jasomirgott appela des moines irlandais et écossais à Vienne. Ces moines ne venaient cependant pas directement des îles Britanniques, mais de l'abbaye Saint-Jacques, près de Ratisbonne.

Elle dépend de la congrégation bénédictine d'Autriche.

Au Haut Moyen-âge, les moines irlandais étaient réputés pour leur œuvre missionnaire. En latin, l'Irlande fut appelée « Scotia Maior » et, dans les pays germaniques, ces moines furent souvent appelés Écossais, les monastères et abbayes fondés furent alors des « Schottenklöster » . Dans l'acte de fondation, Henri II Jasomirgott promettait de n'appeler que des moines « irlando-écossais » .

L'ancien margrave Henri II prend le titre de duc, en 1156. Il quitte alors Klosterneuburg pour Vienne qui devient sa nouvelle ville de résidence. Par conséquent, il a besoin d'une abbaye. Au Moyen-âge, les monastères et abbayes ne furent pas uniquement des lieux de prière mais également d'importants trésors du savoir. Par la fondation d'un monastère, le seigneur avait accès à une bonne administration, une bibliothèque, un hôpital et à des prêtres pour assurer la Messe dans sa nouvelle ville de résidence. Les « Écossais » participent également à la fondation de l'Université, en 1356.

La nouvelle abbaye reçoit des privilèges abondants. La Ire construction débute en 1160, la consécration a lieu vers 1200. Les moines de l'époque construisaient leur abbaye à l'extérieur de l'enceinte viennoise. Un hospice destiné aux pèlerins et croisés qui passaient par Vienne sur leur route vers Jérusalem est rajouté.

La Ire église de l'abbaye est construite en style Roman avec une abside. Quand Henri Jasomirgott meurt en 1177, il est enterré dans la nouvelle église, appelée « Église des Écossais » . En 1276, l'ancienne abbaye est détruite dans un incendie qui ravage Vienne.

Dans le cadre de la réforme de Melk, Albert V enlève l'abbaye aux Écossais en 1418 pour la donner aux bénédictins. Le nom d' « Écossais » était cependant déjà établi et a perduré.

À la fin de l'époque Gothique, on installa dans l'Église un nouveau Maître-autel. Les volets dont une « Déploration du Christ » sont conservés au Palais du Belvédère, et le reste au Musée des Bénédictins de l'Abbaye. Le peintre, encore anonyme, est ainsi appelé le Maître de l'Autel de l'Église des Bénédictins de Vienne.

L'œuvre littéraire du Maître d'école des Écossais, Wolfgang Schmelztl, est datée du 16e siècle, son successeur fut Johannes Rasch.

La foudre avait détruit une tour de l'église en 1638, une occasion pour Andrea Allio l'Ancien, son cousin Andrea Allio le Jeune et Sylvestre Carlone d'entreprendre une restructuration complète de l'édifice. Le tailleur de pierre impérial Peter Concorz est chargé des travaux pour lesquels il achète une carrière à Kaisersteinbruch. Lors de ces travaux, la longueur de l'église fut réduite et elle ne fut plus adjacente à la nef. Une nouvelle image d'autel fut créée par Joachim von Sandrart à l'époque Baroque qui se trouve aujourd'hui dans la salle des prélats. Au bout du siège de Vienne par les Turcs, l'église est de nouveau rénovée. Les tours Baroques n'étaient pas très hautes, il y a eu certains projets à ce sujet, mais aucun ne fut réalisé.

Vers 1700, le grand musicien Baroque Johann Joseph Fux est organiste de l'abbaye. Vers 1773-1774, une nouvelle maison du prieuré est construite sur le territoire du cimetière ouvert pour abriter l'école d'Andreas Zach. Le bâtiment ressemblait à une commode et fut appelé quotidiennement « Schubladkastenhaus ». À côté se trouvait l'hôtel « Römischer Kaiser » où une chanson de Franz Schubert fut entendue pour la 1re fois.

Un décret impérial crée, en 1807, l'école privée « Schottengymnasium ». Entre 1826 et 1832, les maisons autour de l'abbaye sont transformées ou reconstruites par Joseph Kornhäusel, surtout du côté de la « Freyung ». Les Maîtres de « Kaisersteinbruch » recevaient de nouveaux ordres comme des nouveaux escaliers en pierre impériale. Dans les années 1880, l'église est à nouveau modifiée ; des peintures murales de Julius Schmid ainsi qu'un nouvel autel, d'après les plans d'Heinrich Ferstel avec une mosaïque de Michael Rieser, sont ajoutés.

Dans la cour se trouve une Notre-Dame noire, une œuvre de Peter Nobile de 1825. La fontaine avec la statue du fondateur Henri II Jasomirgott est une œuvre de Sebastian Wagner.

Le musée de l'abbaye a été rénové en 2004-2005. S'y trouve entre autres l'« autel des Maîtres écossais », d'environ 1470, une œuvre importante du style Gothique tardif ainsi qu'une importante source visuelle pour l'histoire de Vienne à cause des vues sur la ville y présentes.

...

D'un jaune impérial (hérité de Marie-Thérèse et du château de Schönbrunn), l'église des Écossais doit son nom à la confrérie ecclésiastique qui s'y établit dès le milieu du 12e siècle, sous l'impulsion du duc Babenberg, Henri de Jasomirgott. Plusieurs fois modifiée, l'église n'acquies sa forme définitive et son intérieur Baroque assez Rococo qu'à la fin du siècle dernier. Cette église abrite aujourd'hui de très jolies fresques au plafond, relatant la « Passion du Christ », et la plus vieille statue de la Vierge datant du 12e siècle.

...

The « Schottenstift » (Scottish Abbey), formally called « Benediktinerabtei unserer Lieben Frau zu den Schotten » (Benedictine Abbey of Our Dear Lady of the Scots), is a Roman Catholic monastery founded in Vienna, in 1155, when Henry II of Austria brought Irish monks to Vienna. The monks did not come directly from Ireland, but came instead from Scots Monastery in Regensburg, Germany. Since 1625, the abbey has been a member of the Austrian Congregation, now within the Benedictine Confederation.

In the early Middle-Ages, Irish monks were actively involved in missionary work. Ireland was known in Latin as « Scotia Major » ; therefore, in German, Irish monks were called « Schotten » (Scots) or « Iroschotten » . The monasteries that they founded were called « Schottenklöster » . In the foundation documents of the « Schottenstift » , Henry II specified that it was to be occupied exclusively by these « Iroschotten » (« Solos elegimus Scottos ») .

Henry II was elevated from the rank of Margrave (« Markgraf ») to that of Duke (« Herzog ») , in 1156. He moved his residence from Klosterneuburg to Vienna and required a monastery for his new city. In the Middle-Ages, monasteries were not only places for prayer, but also and above all, repositories of knowledge. The foundation of a monastery gave the ruler support for his administration (for example, schools to educate competent scribes) . It also provided a library, a hospice and old age home, architects, educated men, and priests to conduct services in the new ducal city. The « Schotten » were also involved with the University of Vienna, which was founded in 1365.

Henry granted the new monastery extensive privileges. Construction of the 1st monastery started in 1160, and the structure was consecrated in 1200. The monastery was outside the city walls of Vienna. The monks also built a hospice for pilgrims and crusaders, who often passed through Vienna on their way to Jerusalem.

The 1st church was a 3 aisled Romanesque pillar church with a single apse. Henry II was buried there upon his death, in 1177.

A fire, in the year 1276, destroyed the cloister and many other buildings in Vienna.

In 1418, Duke Albert V seized the cloister during the Melker Reform, an attempt to revive the original ideals of Benedictine monasticism, and settled a community of Benedictines in their place. These new residents, however, continued to be known as the « Schotten » .

In the middle of the 15th Century, the monastery was distinguished through the literary activities of its school Master, Wolfgang Schmeltzl, and his successor, Johannes Rasch.

The collapse of the tower, struck by a lightning bolt in 1638, was seized as an opportunity to completely rebuild the church, a project undertaken by the architects Andrea d'Allio the Younger and Silvestro Carlone. The church was somewhat shortened, and the tower no longer stood directly beside the basilica. Joachim von Sandrart provided the church with a new altar piece, which today is kept in the prelates' hall. After the Turkish siege, the church was restored. As the Baroque west tower was barely higher than the façade itself, its extension has often been proposed, but this has never come to fruition.

Around 1700, the great Baroque musician Johann Joseph Fux was the organist at the « Schottenstift » .

In 1773 and 1774, a new priory, with school, was built by Andreas Zach in the grounds of an open-air cemetery. As it resembled a piece of furniture, it became popularly known as the « Schubladkastenhaus » (the chest-of-drawers house) . Directly next door, stood the Hotel « Römischer Kaiser», where the first public performance of a song by Franz Schubert was held.

In 1807 the « Schottengymnasium » , an institute for secondary education, was founded by Imperial decree.

Around 1830, the auxiliary buildings of the Abbey, in particular those that bordered on the Freyung, were renovated and partially rebuilt by Joseph Kornhäusel.

In the 1880's, the church was restored and partially renovated. From this period, date the ceiling paintings by Julius Schmid, and a new high-altar, built from sketches by Heinrich von Ferstel, with a mosaic by Michaël Rieser.

In the court, there is a « Schwarze Muttergottes » (a « Black Madonna ») , designed in 1825 by Peter Nobile. The fountain, with a statue of Henry II, is the work of Sebastian Wagner.

The museum has been re-installed twice in recent history, in 1994-1995 and in 2004-2005. It contains, among other notable items, the « Schottenmeisteraltar » , from around 1470, which is not only a significant work of late- Gothic art, but also an important historical source, on account of its views of the city.

The « Schottenstift » is located on the « Freyung » (Freyung Nr. 6, A-1010 Wien) .

...

Um 1155 berief Markgraf Heinrich II. Jasomirgott irische Benediktinermönche aus dem Sankt-Jakobs-Kloster in Regensburg (wo er als Herzog von Bayern residiert hatte) nach Wien und stattete sie mit Grundbesitz auf dem sogenannten Steinfeld außerhalb der Stadtmauern (vom Tiefen Graben bis zur Burgfriedensgrenze am Alsbach) zur Erbauung von Kirche und Kloster sowie mit verschiedenen Gerechtigkeiten aus. Da Irland damals Neu-Schottland genannt wurde (Scotia minoris im Gegensatz zu Scotia maioris) , bürgerte sich im Volksmund die Bezeichnung « Schotten » ein.

Der älteste echte Stiftsbrief stammt vom 22. April 1161 (der Stiftsbrief von 1158 ist eine Fälschung aus der Zeit von 1258-1260, ebenso Urkunden von 1161 mit der angeblichen Schenkung der Pankrazkapelle) . Hierbei bestätigte Heinrich II. seine Stiftung und bestimmte das Schottenstift zur Begräbnisstätte für sich und seine Familie. Er ließ eine kleine Kirche, ein Kloster sowie ein Spital für erkrankte Kreuzfahrer errichten. Mit der Übergabe der Stiftung unterstellte er den Mönchen die Kirche Maria am Gestade (sie wurde 1303 gegen die Ulrichskirche eingetauscht) , die Peterskirche, die Ruprechtskirche und die Pankrazkapelle. 1181 wurde die autonome Gerichtsbarkeit verliehen, 1200 erfolgte die erste schriftliche Besitzbestätigung. Die Abtei erhielt auch die pfarrherrlichen Rechte über einen Teil der Stadt und ihrer Umgebung, was immer wieder zu Konflikten mit Sankt Stephan führte. Außerdem bekamen sie das Asylrecht, das anderen Wiener Kirchen erst unter Leopold VI. gewährt wurde, und das Recht der freien Abtwahl.

Heinrich II. hatte auch an das leibliche Wohl der Mönche gedacht und ließ ihnen Speise und Trank aus der Hofküche bringen. Die Überbringung der Nahrungsmittel erregte große Neugier in der Wiener Bevölkerung. Wurden anfangs die Speisenträger nur angehalten und ausgefragt, versuchten Neugierige bald die Deckel von den Töpfen zu heben. Daraufhin wurde die Naturalabgabe durch eine regelmäßige Zahlung ersetzt, « damit man nit wissen soll, was in seiner Kuchl auf seiner fürstlichen Gnaden Leib gekocht wird ». Aus dieser Zeit stammt das Wiener Wort « Häferlgucker ». Im Jahr 1280 wurde die Geldabfindung von Rudolf I. aufgehoben und den Mönchen das Patronat der Pfarre Gaunersdorf (heute Gaweinstal) als Ersatz überlassen.

Das erste Kloster aus der Mitte des 12. Jahrhunderts dürfte bereits bald durch ein größeres mit einer dreischiffigen Kirche ersetzt worden sein. Da sich der Bau aus nicht überlieferten Gründen in die Länge zog, konnte das Kloster erst 1200 durch Bischof Wolfger von Ellenbrechtskirchen geweiht werden. Bis dahin stand den Mönchen nur ein kleines Kirchlein an der Stelle des sogenannten Patronatshauses (Freyung 7) zur Verfügung. 1771 wurde hier ein Grab gefunden, das man für das Grab Heinrichs II. hält. Es enthielt einen Mann mit gebrochenen Schenkel (Heinrich II. war durch einen Sturz vom Pferd umgekommen) und zwei Frauen (zweite Gattin Theodora und Tochter Agnes). Wahrscheinlich war der Herzog nach seinem Tod wohl nur provisorisch beigesetzt worden, da die Stiftskirche noch nicht fertiggestellt war. Aus Jans Enenkels Reimchronik ist zu erfahren, daß sich in der Stiftskirche ein Stein mit dem Bild des Herzogs befand :

« Und noch hewt zu den Scoten ist begraben sein Schein in ein Stein gehauen der mitten in dem Minster stat. »

Durch häufige Umbauten (auch bedingt durch Brände) war das Herzogsgrab jedoch in Vergessenheit geraten. Heute befindet es sich in der Krypta der Stiftskirche.

In der Stiftskirche fand auch die Schwertleite (Vorform des Ritterschlages) der jungen Herzöge statt. Besonders bemerkenswert war jene, die im Jahr 1200 zu Pfingsten stattfand. Als das Schwert Leopolds VI. des Glorreichen von Bischof Wolfger von Ellenbrechtskirchen gesegnet wurde, waren unter den hohen Gästen auch der Kardinalerzbischof von Mainz und der Erzbischof von Salzburg anwesend. Noch glanzvoller soll die Schwertleite zu Maria Lichtmess im Jahr 1232 gewesen sein : Hier wurden neben Friedrich II. dem Streitbaren 200 junge Männer durch Bischof Gebhard von Passau zu Rittern geschlagen. Nach der Zeremonie zog man mit dem Herzog an der Spitze zum festlich geschmückten Turnierplatz in Penzing.

1185 erhielten die « Schotten » von Papst Lucius III. das Recht, Reisende und fremde Personen, die in Wien gestorben waren, sowie Leute des Herzogs und Mitbrüder in ihrer Klostergruft zu bestatten. Als nach der Schlacht auf dem Marchfeld (26. August 1278) Kaiser Rudolf I. die Leiche seines Gegners Ottokar II. Přemysl nach Wien bringen ließ, wurde sie zuerst im Schottenstift aufgebahrt, wofür Königin Anna, die Gemahlin Rudolfs I., eine Purpurdecke stiftete. Danach wurde die Leiche einbalsamiert, dreißig Tage lang im Kapitelhaus der Minoriten ausgestellt und danach über Znaim nach Prag überführt.

1313 wurde dem Kloster von Elisabeth, der Witwe Albrechts I. das Recht eingeräumt, jedes Jahr zum Georgitag 30 Fuder Salz von Hallstadt zollfrei einzuführen. Dafür hatten die Mönche für sie und ihren Gemahl jeden Jahrestag zu beten (Vigil und Seelamt) .

Bereits 1235 beauftragte Papst Gregor X. die Äbte von Heiligenkreuz und Lilienfeld sowie den Propst von Klosterneuburg, das Schottenkloster zu visitieren und gegebenenfalls Abt Dirmicus aus dem Amt zu entfernen. Die Mönche sollen zu dieser Zeit weder enthaltsam gelebt noch Wissenschaften und Künste gefördert haben. Auch soll ihre Gastfreundschaft zu wünschen übrig gelassen haben. Außerdem hielten sie an ihren Sitten und Gewohnheiten sowie ihrer Sprache fest und standen der Wiener Bevölkerung verständnislos gegenüber. Darüber hinaus kamen sie ihren übrigen Pflichten nur mehr bedingt nach und verwalteten ihr Vermögen schlecht. Immer wieder kam es daher zu Konflikten mit den Herzögen von Österreich. Da die Mönche offenbar ihr Recht des Blutbannes über Stiftsangehörige missbraucht hatten, wurde es ihnen von Albrecht III. entzogen und dem Stadtrichter übertragen.

Als die « Schotten » Kirche und Kloster verfallen ließen und sogar Turmglocken und Ornate verpfändeten, erwirkte Albrecht V. am 17. Jänner 1418 die päpstliche Vollmacht zu einer Generalvisitation. Die Mönche des durch einen Brand 1413 zusätzlich beschädigten Klosters lehnten dies mit der Begründung ab, nur Schotten dürften ihr Kloster betreten. Da der Herzog darauf bestand, resignierte Abt Thomas III. am 9. August 1418 und erklärte sich bereit, gegen Aushändigung eines Reisegeldes und der Zusicherung von freiem Geleit, Wien zu verlassen und sich mitsamt seinen Mitbrüdern ins Stammkloster nach Regensburg zurückzuziehen. Albrecht ging darauf ein und übertrug die Gottesdienste den Minoriten. Durch den Abzug der « Schotten » gingen viele Urkunden verloren. Bereits 1418 übergab Albrecht V. das Kloster den Benediktinern aus Melk, das infolge einer Neuorganisation 1432 alle Rechte zurück erhielt. Obwohl Maria Stuart später bei Rudolf II. intervenierte, kamen die « Schotten » nicht mehr nach Wien zurück. Noch auf dem Basler Konzil versuchte das Regensburger Sankt-Jakobs-Kloster, die Oberaufsicht über das Wiener Haus zurückzuerhalten. Nach einem langen Prozess verloren sie jedoch 1448 sämtliche Rechte am Kloster, das nun dem Passauer Bischof und ab 1480 dem neu gegründeten Wiener Bistum unterstellt wurde. Die Bezeichnung Schottenstift hat sich jedoch bis heute erhalten.

Unter den Benediktinern wurden die verpfändeten Güter eingelöst und die beschädigten Gebäude repariert. Das Kloster kam nun zu neuer Blüte : Abt Nikolaus, der erste Benediktinerabt, und seine Nachfolger legten viel Wert auf Unterricht und holten zahlreiche Gelehrte ins Kloster. In dieser Zeit erhielt es viele Zuwendungen von Wohltätern, die keine Gegenleistung forderten. Zum Beispiel unterrichtete Doktor Urban von Melk, der im Stephansdom begraben liegt, mehrere Jahre lang unentgeltlich Theologie, es wurden Gebäudeteile errichtet beziehungsweise deren Errichtung finanziert, aber auch Bücher und Altäre gespendet. Sogar Weingärten und Häuser wurden dem Kloster überlassen. Im Konflikt zwischen Kaiser Friedrich III. und seinem Bruder Albrecht VI. kam es erneut zu Problemen, da viele Gelehrte Wien verließen. Von den 103 Professoren lasen nur mehr 43. Außerdem wurden Besitzungen des Klosters von Söldnern verwüstet. Aus einer Urkunde des Jahres 1459 geht hervor, daß sowohl der Kaiser als auch der Bürgermeister und der Rat der Stadt Wien dem Kloster Entschädigungen zukommen ließen.

Unter den Äbten Hieronymus (1461-1466) , Johannes VI. von Lambach (1466-1467) und Matthias Fink (1467-1475) konnte das Schottenstift seinen Grundbesitz deutlich vermehren. Abt Mathias Fink, der auch Geheimschreiber Kaiser Friedrichs war und großes Ansehen genoss, legte jedoch viel Wert auf Prunk. So ließ er sich zum Beispiel immer von dreißig Reitern begleiten, wenn er auf der Burg erschien. Er stürzte das Kloster in solche Schulden, daß er 1475 seine Abtwürde verlor und in Haft genommen wurde. Später konnte er entkommen und nach Ungarn fliehen.

1488 kam es erneut zu einem großen Brand, der in der Stadt etwa hundert Häuser vernichtete. Durch die enorme Hitze schmolzen sogar die Glocken und mehrere Mauern stürzten ein. Am 27. Mai 1488 kam es während des Kirchweihfestes zu einer Auseinandersetzung zwischen Bediensteten des Stiftes und königlich ungarischen Viehhirten. Als Bürger einschritten, kam es zu einem Handgemenge, bei dem ein ungarischer Hirte ums Leben kam. Daraufhin ließ der ungarische Stadthauptmann mehrere Priester und Stiftsdienner festnehmen. König Matthias Corvinus wurde berichtet, daß in Wien ein Aufstand gegen seine Herrschaft ausgebrochen sei. Er wollte daraufhin Abt und Mönche zusammengebunden in die Donau werfen lassen, ließ sich aber vom Bischof von Großwardein (heute Oradea, Rumänien) besänftigen. In der Folge kam Corvinus selbst nach Wien, um die Untersuchungen zu leiten. Er vernahm persönlich die Gefangenen und überzeugte sich von der Unschuld der Mönche.

Nach dem Ende der Ungarnherrschaft verbesserte sich die finanzielle Lage des Klosters zunehmend. Auch konnten die Wissenschaften wieder stark gefördert werden. Unter dem Abt Benedictus Chelidonus (1518-1521), der mit Dürer befreundet war, gab es einen außerordentlichen Andrang an Schülern. Es wurden auch Schauspiele aufgeführt, die von der Hofgesellschaft außerordentlich gelobt wurden. Durch die Reformation gingen die Schülerzahlen bald wieder merklich zurück. In die Zeit von 1542 bis 1550 fällt die schriftstellerische Tätigkeit des Schottenschulmeisters Wolfgang Schmeltzl, der durch seinen « Lobspruch der Stat Wienn » (1548) in weiten Kreisen bekannt wurde. Unter ihm wurden erstmals Dramen in deutscher Sprache aufgeführt. Sein Nachfolger war der gelehrte Schulmeister und Organist Johann Rasch. Auch rege Bautätigkeit setzte wieder ein: Der Schottenhof, der ursprünglich hinter der Kirche lag, erstreckte sich in den folgenden Jahren bis an die Bastei beziehungsweise mit seiner Hauptfront von der Kirche bis zum Schottentor und nahm die ganze nördliche Seite der heutigen Schottengasse ein.

Als die Osmanen zum ersten Mal Wien belagerten (Erste Türkenbelagerung - 1529), flüchteten die Mönche nach Passau. Nur ein Priester blieb zurück, er wurde jedoch umgebracht, als er sich zu weit aus der Stadt hinaus wagte. Im Kloster hausten nun Soldaten, die es beraubten und Bibliothek und Archiv verwüsteten. Selbst die Kirche wurde geplündert und auch der Klostergarten blieb nicht verschont. Als nach der Belagerung verboten wurde, außerhalb einer 50 Klafter-Zone vor der Stadt Häuser wiederherzustellen, verlor das Kloster mehrere Bauten.

Erst unter Abt Wolfgang Traunsteiner (1541-1562) scheint sich das Kloster wieder vollständig erholt zu haben. Zu dieser Zeit arbeiteten fünf Brüder im Konvent, weitere waren außerhalb mit der Seelsorge oder der Administration von Klostergütern betraut. In einer Urkunde aus dem Jahr 1566 werden Besitzungen des Klosters aufgezählt :

« anbau und äcker auf der Alserstrass, zu Sankt Ulrich, Stämersdorf, Gumpendorf bei 200 Joch, Weingartbau zu Enzersdorf, Prun, Pettersdorff, in der Mauer, Grintzing, Nußdorf, Döbling, Ottakring, Dornbach, Hernals, Sankt Ulrich, bei der Stadt vor dem Schottentor und Staimertorf, Wiesen zu Ottakring, Schwechat, Achau, Münchendorf, Laxenburg, einen Wald zu Dornbach, einen Hof zu Sankt Pankraz samt Kapelle »

Eine andere Urkunde, in der nach dem Tod des Abtes Johannes IX. Schretel (1562-1583) das Inventar aufgelistet wird, zählt zwanzig Melkkühe, zehn Kälber, einen Ochsen, zwei Stiere, 15 alte Schweine, zwölf Ferkel und einen Geißbock auf. Weiters wurden 3.000 Eimer Wein und eine große Menge an Weizen, Mehl und Hafer verzeichnet. Die im Haus vorhandenen Textilien (Tischtücher, Vorhänge, Handtücher und Bettzeug) wurden allerdings als alt und zerrissen vermerkt. An Bargeld wurden 135 Gulden und 20 Kreuzer vorgefunden, weiters besaß das Kloster Schuldbriefe in der Höhe von mehr als 2.500 Gulden. Diese waren allerdings zum Großteil uneinbringlich und wurden mit Anmerkungen wie « nichts einzubringen, längst verstorben », « zahlt nichts », « ist nichts », « hats ausgebeten », « ihm geschenkt » oder « ist arm, hat nichts zu zahlen » versehen.

Als man Abtes Johannes IX. Schretel beisetzte, wurde sein Grabstein neben dem Sakramentshäuschen aufgerichtet. Ein Zimmernmannsknecht versteckte sich nach der Arbeit in der Kirche, um ins Sakramentshäuschen einzubrechen und die wertvolle Monstranz und den goldenen Kelch zu stehlen. Der Organist Johann Rasch berichtet, daß er den Wein, der sich im Kelch befand, austrank und dabei einige Weintropfen auf seinen Rock fielen, deren Flecken er nicht mehr entfernen konnte. Als er die erbeuteten Gegenstände einem Händler anbot, erstattete dieser Anzeige. Daraufhin wurde der Dieb mitsamt seinem weinbefleckten Rock am 17. Dezember 1583 auf der Gänseweide zu Erdberg verbrannt.

Im Laufe des 17. Jahrhunderts wurde die Unterrichtssprache der Schottenschule auf Deutsch umgestellt. Sie wurde jedoch bald darauf zugesperrt und erst im nächsten Jahrhundert wieder eröffnet. In den Jahren 1642 bis 1648 wurde die Schottenkirche in ihrer damaligen Gestalt erbaut, womit die Bauzeit in die letzten Jahre des dreißigjährigen Krieges fällt.

Am 14. Juli 1683, dem ersten Tag der sogenannten « Türkenbelagerung », brach im Schottenstift eine verheerende Feuersbrunst aus, die die Stadt in höchste Gefahr brachte. Die Restaurierungsarbeiten wurden erst 1690 abgeschlossen.

1724-1794 entstand der sich aus mehreren Gebäuden zusammensetzende neue Komplex des Schottenhofs. Der hinter der Kirche und auf einem großen Teil der Freyung gelegene Klosterfriedhof, der den Namen « Im Vogelsang » führte, wurde 1751 aufgelassen. Im Zuge der Erweiterung nach 1720 entworfenen Plänen ließ Abt Benno Pointner (1765-1807) auf einem Teil des Friedhofs beziehungsweise dem nach dem Umbau und der Verkleinerung der Kirche (1638-1648) freigewordenen Areal das Prioratshaus errichtet (Schublackkastenhaus) .

Am 24. März 1806 erhielt Abt Benno Pointner ein Landesregierungsdekret, das die unverzügliche Errichtung eines Gymnasiums befahl. Eine Kommission suchte am 28. Mai des selben Jahres einen geeigneten Bauplatz. Der ausgewählte Ort wurde für bestens geeignet erachtet, da er außerordentlich ruhig war, den Schülern durch das Kloster einen bequemen Weg zur Kirche bot und sich die Lehrer nicht auf fremden Grund zu begeben brauchten. Am 16. Jänner 1807 befahl der österreichische Kaiser Franz I. trotz Bedenken mancher Behörden den Bau der Schule. Noch bevor der Bau beginnen konnte, verstarb Abt Benno Pointner. Obwohl es dadurch zu Verzögerungen kam, konnte das Schottengymnasium (Gymnasium zu den Schotten) am 4. November 1807 eröffnet werden.

Im Französisch-österreichischen Krieg (1809) lagerten in den Höfen des Schottenstifts zwei- bis dreihundert Soldaten, für deren Verpflegung das Kloster zu sorgen hatte. Der Kreuzgang wurde als Magazin adaptiert, in dem sogar eine Bäckerei untergebracht wurde. Trotz des hohen Schadens rüstete das Stift das vierte Bataillon der Wiener Freiwilligen, das an der Schlacht von Ebelsberg erfolgreich teilnahm, fast ausschließlich aus Stiftungsgeldern aus. Um dies finanzieren zu können, opferte man große Teile des Silbergeräts. Später wurden die Klosterweine von den Franzosen beschlagnahmt. Der damalige Abt, Andreas Wenzel (1807-1831), gehörte auch der Abordnung an, die Napoleon in Schönbrunn um Schutz für das von den kaiserlichen Truppen geräumte Wien bat.

1826 bis 1832 wurden die meisten Gebäude des ausgedehnten Komplexes, der nun offiziell den Namen Schottenhof erhielt, nach Plänen von Josef Kornhäusel umgestaltet beziehungsweise neu erbaut, insbesondere die der Freyung zugewandte Fassade und das eigentliche Stiftsgebäude im ersten Hof (siehe Baugeschichte). Am 24. Juli 1854 erregte der Brand des Dachstuhls großes Aufsehen. Im Zusammenhang mit dem Abbruch der Bastei wurde am 14. Jänner 1870 ein Durchgang zwischen der Helferstorferstraße und der Freyung geschaffen.

Aufgrund des Ostmarkgesetzes wurde 1938 das renommierte Schottengymnasium geschlossen. Auch durch den Krieg wurde das Schottenstift schwer getroffen: Mehrere Bombeneinschläge richteten schwere Beschädigungen an (siehe Baugeschichte).

Am 17. April 1945 konstituierte sich im Schottenhof die Österreichische Volkspartei (ÖVP). Auch das Schottengymnasium konnte bald wieder in Betrieb genommen werden.

Im Schottenhof wohnten (neben Wolfgang Schmelzl und Benedictus Chelidonus) unter anderem Johann Joseph Fux (1696-1702; Organist des Stiftes); Franz Liszt (1869-1886; Gedenktafel mit Porträtrelief); und Ignaz Abmayer (1827). 1817 kam hier auch Franz Grillparzer bei seiner Tante unter, da seine Mutter und er keine (finanzierbare) Wohnung fanden. Grillparzers Wohnung lag über der Backstube im von Abt Karl Fetzer erbauten Trakt. Wegen der Wärme und dem Lärm der Backstube konnte er hier nicht schlafen. Er übernachtete daher gerne in der Wohnung seiner zweiten Tante, die diese nur tagsüber benutzte und die sich in einem anderen Trakt des Schottenstifts befand. In dieser Zeit schrieb er « Sappho » und wurde zum Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofdichter ernannt, wodurch er mit seiner Mutter in eine Wohnung im Haus Stadt 403 (Judenplatz 1) übersiedeln konnte. 1908 verstarb der Staatsmann Ignaz Plener im Alter von 98 Jahren im Schottenstift.

Über die erste Klosteranlage gibt es kaum Informationen. Sie fiel dem Brand im Jahr 1276, der von einem Ziegelofen ausging, zum Opfer. Auf einer Grundfläche, die wesentlich größer war als die des heutigen Stifts, entstand eine neue Klosteranlage. Sie bestand aus vielen einzelnen Objekten, die ohne Gesamtplan nach den jeweiligen Bedürfnissen nach und nach errichtet wurden.

Im 15. Jahrhundert wurden diese Gebäude von den Benediktinern vielfach durch neue ersetzt. Wie schon erwähnt erhielten die Benediktinermönche viele Zuwendungen von Wohltätern. So ließ der Hubmeister Albrechts V., Berthold von Mangeln, anstelle eines Obstgartens ein neues Refektorium bauen. Außerdem trug er den Großteil der Kosten für das neue Dormitorium (Schlafraum). Unter Abt Martin von Leibitz (1445-1461) wurden eine neue Bibliothek und ein Gästehaus errichtet. Außerdem ließ er ein am Schottenhof gelegenes Gebäude restaurieren und daneben ein neues aufbauen. Darüber hinaus wurde der Kornspeicher repariert.

Von Hans Scharfenperger wurde ein Haus im Bereich des Schottenhofes erbaut sowie ein Brunnen gegraben, der in späterer Zeit verschüttet wurde und dessen Reste man noch heute im Keller des Schottenstifts findet. Leopold Süß baute ein Wohnhaus im Schottenhof, in dem er selbst wohnte. Beide stifteten auch Altäre für die Kirche.

Durch den Brand von 1488, bei dem der Kirchturm einstürzte, wurden viele Klostergebäude beschädigt. Noch größere Schäden entstanden durch die Belagerung Wiens 1529. Im Zuge der Reparaturarbeiten ließ Abt Konrad Weichselbaum (1528-1541) einen tiefen Keller unter dem Stift anlegen.

Wegen der schlechten finanziellen Situation des Stiftes im 16. Jahrhundert konnte der Erhaltung des großen Komplexes nur beschränkt nachgekommen werden. Da die Mieteinnahmen zu dieser Zeit nur wenig Geld einbrachten, verkaufte das Stift Grundstücke. Auf diese Weise konnten beim Bau des Kaiserlichen Zeughauses im Jahr 1585 der Stiftsmeierhof und ein großer Teil des Stiftsgartens in dessen Bauareal einbezogen werden.

Aus einer Beschreibung der Klosteranlagen, die aus dem Jahr 1600 stammt, geht hervor, daß die Prälatur sehr armselig ausgestattet war. Sie umfasste ein Vorhaus, einen Saal, das « alte Schlafhaus » und ein Vorzimmer, in dem allerlei Silber aufbewahrt wurde. Im Schlafzimmer des Abtes lagen seine Ornate und sein Eigentum, das sich in sieben Kisten befand. Die übrigen Kirchenschätze wurden in der oberen und unteren Sakristei aufbewahrt. In einer Inventarliste aus dem Jahr 1608 wird ein Neubau erwähnt, der im Zusammenhang mit der Prälatur stand und eine Stube und fünf andere Zimmer umfasste. Diese waren aber kaum oder gar nicht eingerichtet. Dem Abt standen darin eine Schreibstube und ein Grundbuchgewölbe zur Verfügung.

Die Konventualien hatten außer dem Dormitorium und Refektorium noch eine Konventstube und daneben einen Saal samt Vorhaus.

Zur Küchenanlage gehörte ein Speisegewölbe sowie eine Küche, ein « Kuchlhöfl » , ein « Kuchlstübl » , ein Keller und ein Fleischgewölbe.

Das Schulhaus bestand aus einem Vorhaus, einem Zimmer und einer Kammer für den Schulmeister, drei Studentenkammern und einer eigentlichen Schulstube. Die Einrichtung der Schule war ärmlich.

Zu den Wirtschaftsgebäuden zählte ein Meierhof mit Küche, Stube für die Magd, Krautkammer sowie ein Keller, ein Stall für die Reitpferde, ein Stall für die Wagenpferde, ein Kuh- und ein Schweinestall. Außerdem gab es eine Wagenhütte mit Stadel und Geschirrkammer sowie eine Kammer über der Küche. Im Anschluss an den Meierhof befanden sich die Kammern des Kellners, des Weingartenknechtes, des Zuschrotters und des Küchenknechtes. Weiters gab es ein Presshaus mit einem « Preßhöfl » und einem Gewölbe (Die Presse wurde 1654 im Stift abgebaut und in Sankt Ulrich wieder aufgestellt) . Zusätzlich gab es drei Kästen (Speicher) . In der Nähe des Meierhofes lagen zu dieser Zeit auch die Binderwerkstätte und die Sattlerei (Beide kamen später in den von Abt Johannes XI. Schmitzberger erbauten Trakt) . Schmiede, Wagnerei und Bäckerei schlossen den Schottenhof gegen die übrigen Wirtschaftsgebäude ab. Zwischen dem Kasten oder dem Stadel befand sich die Rossschwemme. Es muß auch eine Mühle gegeben haben, da dem Kloster 1645 empfohlen wurde, die ehemalige Rossmühle im Schottenhof wieder instand zu setzen.

Unter Abt Johannes Xaver Walterfinger (1629-1641) setzte eine Bauperiode ein, in der die einzelnen Bauten, durch große und zusammenhängende Gebäude mit einheitlichen Fronten ersetzt wurden. Als erstes wurde die Kirche zwischen 1638 und 1648 durch einen Neubau ersetzt. Die Neuerrichtung des baufälligen Klostergebäudes, die bereits 1638 angedacht war, konnte wegen knapper finanzieller Mittel nur in Etappen vorgenommen werden. Sie begann im Jahr 1672 und dauerte ungefähr hundert Jahre. Nur der sogenannte Heinrich-Jasomirgott-Brunnen konnte bereits 1652 unter Abt Petrus Heister (1649-1662) vom Bildhauer Johann Sebastian Wagner errichtet werden.

Abt Johannes XI. Schmitzberger (1669-1683) begann mit der Errichtung eines zusammenhängenden Hofes. Er begründete dies nicht nur mit der Baufälligkeit der alten Gebäude und der erhöhten Feuergefahr, die von den vielen Herden in den verwinkelten Häusern ausging, sondern auch damit, daß es keine sicheren Aufbewahrungsorte für Briefschaften gäbe. Auch bleibe kein Platz für die Aufnahme von Fremden und nicht einmal für ihn und seine Bediensteten gäbe es eine ordentliche Wohnung. Wichtiger scheint jedoch gewesen zu sein, daß das Stift dringend höhere Einnahmen benötigte, die man durch größere Zinshäuser erwirtschaften konnte.

Der Rat der Stadt Wien wollte die Arbeiten verhindern und reichte am 25. August 1673 in einer Audienz eine Beschwerde ein. Der bereits begonnene Bau solle eingestellt werden, da die Stadt durch die klösterlichen Bauten zu viel Steuergeld verliere. Da kirchlicher Besitz von der Steuer- und Quartierpflicht (Zwangswise Einquartierungen) befreit sei, könne das Kloster einen viel niedrigeren Mietzins verlangen. Der Abt erwiderte, daß er über seinen Grund frei verfügen könne und setzte die Arbeiten fort.

Der ziemlich niedrige Neubau war zweistöckig und nahm ungefähr die Fläche des heutigen Stiftes ein. Kaum war der Bau fertiggestellt, kam es zu schweren Beschädigungen durch die Brandkatastrophe vom 14. Juli 1683, die im Zusammenhang mit der Belagerung Wiens durch die Osmanen stand. Abt Sebastian I. Faber (1683-1703) ließ die zerstörten Gebäude wiederherstellen, wobei die Arbeiten 1690 beendet werden konnten. Als teilweise Wiedergutmachung für die Schäden der Belagerung erlaubte Leopold I. dem Kloster, den Neudeggerhof « mit den dazu gehörigen 13 Unterthanen, so alles zu dem Hochstift Passau gehörig eigentümlich an sich zu bringen » .

Als der erst 29jährige Karl Fetzer das Stift als Abt (1705-1750) übernahm, war es in einer schweren finanziellen Krise. Es verfügte zu diesem Zeitpunkt über 30 Gulden, hatte aber Schulden in der Höhe von 250.000 Gulden. In seiner Zeit als Abt wirtschaftete er dermaßen erfolgreich, daß er 200.000 Gulden in Bauten ; 20.000 Gulden in neue Bücher ; 60.000 Gulden in neue Ornate ; 13.000 Gulden in Silbergerät ; 5.000 Gulden in eine neue Monstranz ; und 4.000 Gulden in Musikalien investieren konnte !

Als erstes ließ er den Prälatusaal ausbauen und ausmalen, dann wurden leerstehende Räume hergerichtet und vermietet. Auf diese Weise konnte er den Zinsertrag eines einzigen Traktes auf 2.200 Gulden steigern. Als nächstes wurde der große Meierhof, der als feuergefährlich galt, abgebrochen und durch einen Neubau auf dem Schottenfeld ersetzt. Der dadurch entstandene Platz war für den Bau neuer Wohntrakte vorgesehen. Er konnte jedoch nur mehr zwei dreistöckige Trakte errichten, der Rest wurde erst unter seinen Nachfolgern fertiggestellt. In Richtung des Schottentores wurde an der Wand ein sehr altes Kruzifix angebracht.

Am 8. Februar 1754 stellte eine von Abt Robert Stadler (1750-1765) zusammengerufene Kommission fest, daß zwei noch nicht erneuerte Trakte nicht nur baufällig, sondern auch feuergefährlich seien. Daher wurde ein Antrag auf Neuerrichtung eingebracht, welchen die Regierung am 13. Februar 1754 bewilligte. Sieben Tage später schloss der Abt mit dem Baumeister Matthias Gerl einen Vertrag über die Neuerrichtung eines zweistöckigen Gebäudes ab, das bis zum Georgitag des Jahres 1755 fertiggestellt sein müsse. Gerl hatte sämtliche Arbeiter und Materialien zu stellen. Die Kosten dieses Baus betragen 17.328 Gulden. Durch die Fertigstellung waren bereits die Umrisse des heutigen Schottenklosters erkennbar.

Kurz nachdem am 27. März 1765 Benno Pointner zum Abt (1765-1807) gewählt wurde, begann er mit dem Bau eines neuen Refektoriums, wobei im ersten Stock die Bibliothek untergebracht wurde. Es wurde vom Baumeister Ludwig Kaltner errichtet, kostete 15.581 Gulden und schloss sich an das Konventsgebäude an. Die Fresken in der Bibliothek wurden von Johann Wenzel Bergl geschaffen, der dafür 100 Dukaten erhielt. Am Eingang standen zwei vergoldete Statuen (heiliger Benedikt und heilige Scholastika). Im Garten ließ der Abt 1775 ein Lusthaus (kleiner Kuppelbau) bauen und sechs Nischen der Gartenmauer mit Motiven aus dem Leben des heiligen Benedikt und der heiligen Scholastika bemalen.

Der Plan, den von seinem Vorgänger erbauten Trakt noch im selben Jahr zu verlängern und den Hof zu vollenden, scheiterte wohl an fehlenden finanziellen Mitteln. Außerdem wollte er in der Nähe der Zeughausmauer ein Gebäude errichten, in dessen Erdgeschoß eine neue Wagenremise untergebracht werden sollte. In den oberen Stockwerken wären Mietwohnungen entstanden. Dieser Plan scheiterte jedoch am Widerstand des Feld- und Zeugamtes, da man eine erhöhte Feuergefahr verhindern wollte.

1792 verfügte der Abt über die notwendigen finanziellen Mittel, um zwei neue Trakte errichten zu können. Die Pläne entwarf der niederösterreichische Regierungsbaumeister Andreas Zach, der sich bereits beim Prioratsgebäude (Schublackkastenhaus) bewährt hatte. Dem Bau, durch den drei der heutigen Höfe voneinander getrennt werden, fielen die Stiftskanzlei und das Amtsrichterhaus zum Opfer. Die Arbeiten, die am 16. Mai 1792 vom Magistrat genehmigt wurden, hatten bereits am 27. Februar dieses Jahres begonnen und wurden am 28. Juni 1794 abgeschlossen. Die Kosten betragen 111.288 Gulden und konnten durch Ersparnisse des Klosters gedeckt werden.

Im Jahr 1807 wurde für das neue Gymnasium ein weiteres Gebäude erbaut, mit dem der Hof gegen Osten abgeschlossen wurde. Am 14. Mai 1807 konnte von der provisorischen Klosterleitung (Abt Benno Pointner war am 15. Februar 1807 verstorben) die Finanzierung auf Kredit festgelegt und der Bau begonnen werden. Die Arbeiten kamen aber nur langsam voran, da man im Hinblick auf die bevorstehende Abtwahl keine wichtigen Entscheidungen wünschte. Erst als am 18. Juni 1807 Andreas Wenzel zum Abt (1807-1851) gewählt wurde, kam es zu einer raschen Fertigstellung der Arbeiten. Die Kosten betragen circa 63.000 Gulden.

In der Mitte des Schottenklosters befand sich noch das alte Konventsgebäude, das seit der ersten Hälfte des 17. Jahrhunderts unverändert geblieben war. Abt Andreas Wenzel suchte 1826 um die Erlaubnis an, diesen Trakt, der an der Schottengasse und dem Basteiweg lag und bisher zweistöckig war, auf vier Stockwerke zu erhöhen. Obwohl die Erlaubnis unter der Auflage, daß die Bauarbeiten innerhalb von drei Jahren abgeschlossen sein müssten, erteilt worden war, wurde am 5. März 1827 der Entschluss gefasst, daß das gesamte Gebäude abgebrochen und vollkommen neu erbaut werden sollte. Weiters plante man, alle außer dem von Abt Karl Fetzer erbauten Trakte auf vier Stockwerke zu erhöhen.

Bereits am Georgitag des Jahres 1828 konnte der an Schottengasse und Basteiweg gelegene Trakt bezogen werden. In den drei folgenden Jahren wurden weitere Trakte, darunter das Gymnasium um zwei Stockwerke erhöht und die Fassade erneuert.

Am 6. Mai 1831 wurde unter Anwesenheit des Hofes und vieler Adelliger der Grundstein für das neue Stiftsgebäude gelegt. Als man die Baugrube für das Fundament aushob, fand man einen großen, inschriftlosen Sarkophag aus Sandstein, der sich heute im Konventgarten befindet. Darunter befanden sich Ziegelsteine aus der Römerzeit, die den Stempel der achten Legion trugen. Im September 1832 wurde das neuerbaute Gebäude von den Behörden zur Benutzung freigegeben und 1832-1833 der Konventgarten neu angelegt. Die Gesamtkosten für die Umbauten betrugen 766.640 Konventionsgulden. Alleine der Architekt Josef Georg Kornhäusel erhielt 8.000 Gulden. Der eigentliche Bauleiter war der Baumeister Joseph Adelpodinger, der auch die Grundrisspläne signierte. Die Bildhauerarbeiten wurden von Jakob Schroth geschaffen, darunter der Schmuck des Bibliothekseinganges, die Aufstellung der Grabmäler im Mausoleum, Arbeiten an der Hauptfassade sowie mehrere Wappen. Gleichzeitig wurde die Bildersammlung in der Prälatur restauriert und die große und die kleine Bildergalerie in den Zimmern der Prälatur an der Ecke Freyung / Schottengasse eingerichtet. 1848 wurden sie samt dem Archiv von der Prälatur getrennt und zu einer Privatwohnung umgebaut.

Unter Abt Sigismund Schultes (1832-1861) wurde an der bisher unverbauten Fläche in Richtung des Zeughauses ein neuer Trakt errichtet, der im rechten Winkel zum alten Schottensteigtrakt stand und den Hof an dieser Seite abschloss. In diesem Trakt befanden sich Mietwohnungen, die ab Oktober 1847 bezogen werden konnten.

Nach dem Dachstuhlbrand vom 24. Juli 1854 erhielt der erste Hof ein Ziegeldach anstatt des bisherigen Kupferdaches. Als in den 1860er Jahren die Schottenbastei mitsam den Basteihäusern abgetragen wurde, kaufte das Stift ein kleines Grundstück, auf dem einige Verkaufslokale errichtet werden konnten. Die an der Rückseite einiger Basteihäuser liegende Feuermauer lag ab 1869 frei. Abt Othmar von Helferstorfer (1861-1880) berief daher am 20. Juni 1869 das Kapitel ein, da « die Mauer ein Schandfleck und eine anstößige Anomalie » sei. Man beschloss einstimmig, daß « in Berücksichtigung der ästhetischen Interessen Wiens und in billiger Rechnungstragung der Verschönerung der Hauptstadt das unschöne Bauwerk abgetragen und ein anständiger Neubau errichtet werde ». Auch der von Abt Karl Fetzer erbaute Doppeltrakt sollte in den Neubau einbezogen werden. Die Arbeiten verzögerten sich jedoch, da es Unstimmigkeiten zwischen Gemeinde Wien und dem Stift über die Anlage einer Straßenfläche gab. Das Angebot der « Wiener Baugesellschaft », den betreffenden Grund zu kaufen, wurde vom Kloster abgelehnt. Erst nachdem der Magistrat 1870 die Baulinie festgelegt hatte, konnte mit den Arbeiten begonnen werden. Franz von Neumann zeichnete Pläne für den Neubau, doch wurde der Architekt Ludwig Zettl beauftragt, der zwar grundsätzlich die Pläne Neumanns verwendete, aber mehrere, teils wesentliche Änderungen vornahm. Die Arbeiten wurden vom Baumeister Johann Sturany geleitet und dauerten vom 1. November 1871 bis zum 1. Mai 1874. Durch den Neubau wurde Wohnraum für 635

Personen geschaffen. Bereits etwas früher wurde im zweiten Hof ein neues Bassin errichtet.

1913-1914 wurde zwecks Erweiterung des Gymnasiums durch einen Turn-, Physik- und Zeichensaal ein neuer Flügel erbaut, der sich an den Nordtrakt des Konventsgebäudes in nördlicher Richtung anschließt und parallel zum Gymnasiumsgebäude verläuft.

Am 10. September 1944 schlug östlich der Stiege VI (erster Hof) eine Bombe ein, welche die oberen drei Stockwerke in einer Breite von sechs Fensterachsen zerstörte und auch Schäden im ersten Stock und im Erdgeschoß anrichtete. Im zweiten Hof (nahe der Heßgasse) kam es am 25. Jänner 1945 zu zwei Bombentreffern, die nur wenig Schaden anrichteten. Eine dritte durchschlug jedoch Wasser- und Gasleitungen und verwüstete mehrere Räumlichkeiten im Erdgeschoß.

Bis 1996 wurde das Schottenstift teilweise saniert. Schwerpunkte der Neugestaltung bildeten die Einrichtung des öffentlich zugänglichen Museums und das Innere der Stiftskirche.

Das Schottenstift besteht aus einer Vielzahl von in den Jahren 1724 bis 1770 entstandenen Trakten, die zum Teil nach dem großen Brand im Jahr 1818 neu errichtet wurden. Die an der Schottengasse und an der Freyung liegende Fassade wurde erst 1832 geschaffen. Das Stift steht auf einer verbauten Grundfläche von 14.963 Quadratmetern. Dazu kommen noch 5577 unverbaute Quadratmeter, auf denen sich die Höfe und Gärten befinden.

Im Konventgebäude befinden sich ebenerdig Aula, Johanneskapelle und Refektorium, in den Obergeschoßen unter anderem die bemerkenswerte zweigeschoßige Bibliothek (mit Tonnengewölbe auf ionischen Säulen, Fresken von Franz Weiner und Reliefs von Joseph Klieber) und der Prälatensaal. Im ersten Stock wurde in den Räumen der ehemaligen Prälatur das Museum des Schottenstifts (mit Gemälde- und Kunstgalerie) eröffnet, in dessen Zentrum der Altar des Schottenmeisters steht. Außerdem besitzt das Stift ein bedeutendes Archiv und eine Bibliothek.

Im Konventgarten steht auf einem Sockel die « Schwarze Muttergottes » (Entwurf von Peter Nobile, 1825 ; Gusseisenstatue von Johann Nepomuk Schaller) , im ersten Hof steht der von Johann Sebastian Wagner gestaltete Heinrich-Jasomirgott-Brunnen, im zweiten Hof ein (von Ludwig Zettl) 1872-1874 entworfener Zierbrunnen.

...

Das Schottenstift (eigentlich : Benediktinerabtei Unserer Lieben Frau zu den Schotten) ist ein Benediktinerkloster im I. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Innere Stadt, an der Freyung 6. Es wurde im Jahr 1155 gegründet, als Herzog Heinrich II. Jasomirgott iro-schottische Benediktinermönche nach Wien berief, und gehört seit 1625 zur Österreichischen Benediktinerkongregation. Die Klosterkirche der Abtei ist die Schottenkirche.

Der Babenberger Heinrich II. Jasomirgott, der nicht nur Markgraf von Österreich, sondern auch Herzog von Bayern war, verlegte, bevor er im Jahr 1156 mit dem Privilegium Minus zum Herzog von Österreich erhoben wurde, seine Residenz von Klosterneuburg nach Wien und benötigte dafür ein Kloster. Im Mittelalter waren die Klöster nicht nur Stätten des Gebets, sondern vor allem Träger und Bewahrer des Wissens. Eine Klostergründung brachte dem Herrscher Sachkenntnis und Erfahrungswissen für seine Verwaltung (zum Beispiel Schulen, die kompetente Schreiber ausbildeten), eine Bibliothek, ein Hospital, Baumeister, Fachleute und Priester für den Gottesdienst in der neuen Residenzstadt. So berief er iro-schottischen Mönche, die er in Regensburg im Kloster Sankt Jakob kennengelernt hatte, nach Wien.

Heinrich II. sicherte den Mönchen in der Stiftungsurkunde ausdrücklich zu, nur Iro-schotten zu berufen (« Solos elegimus scottos »), stattete das neue Kloster mit umfassenden Besitzungen und Privilegien aus und bestimmte das Stift zu seiner Grabstätte. Zur Stiftungsdotation zählten in Wien die Kapellen von Sankt Ruprecht, Sankt Peter und Maria am Gestade, die Kapelle von Sankt Stephan in Krems, die Heilig Kreuz-Kapelle in Tulln, die Sankt Kolomann-Kapelle in Laab sowie die Pfarrkirchen von Pulkau und Eggendorf. Die Mönche erbauten ihr Kloster noch außerhalb der Stadtmauern des damaligen Wiens. Sie errichteten auch ein Hospiz für Pilger und Kreuzritter auf dem Weg nach Jerusalem, die oft durch Wien kamen.

Der Bau der Schottenkirche wurde 1155 begonnen; sie wurde 1200 geweiht. Es handelte sich bei der ersten Kirche um eine dreischiffige romanische Pfeilerkirche mit einer Apsis. Im Jahr 1177 starb Heinrich II. Jasomirgott und wurde in der Schottenkirche bestattet.

Bereits Mitte des 13. Jahrhunderts scheinen die Schottenäbte die Pontifikalien verwendet zu haben. Eine förmliche Verleihung des Rechts zu ihrem Gebrauch datiert ins Jahr 1287.

Die Bedeutung der Schotten für den Wiener Hof drückt sich unter anderem in der häufigen Zeugenschaft von Schottenäbten in herzoglichen Urkunden aus. Eine Schreibschule gab es im Schottenstift nachweislich ab 1310. Auch an der Wiener Universität, die 1365 gegründet wurde, beteiligten sich die Schotten; so war etwa Abt Donaldus (1380-1392) ihr achter Rektor.

1418 entzog Herzog Albrecht V. im Zug der Melker Reform den Iro-schotten, die unter geringer klösterlicher Disziplin und Personalmangel litten, das Kloster und siedelte deutschsprachige Benediktiner an. Die Bezeichnung Schotten blieb aber erhalten. Das Schottenstift wurde im 15. Jahrhundert zu einem wichtigen Zentrum der Reform.

Während der Ersten Türkenbelagerung quartierten sich Söldner im Schottenstift ein und plünderten Kirche, Bibliothek und Archiv. Die Zeit der Reformation war auch für die Schotten keine leichte; trotzdem blieb das Schottenkloster durchgehend bestehen und führte auch weiterhin eine Schule. In der zweiten Hälfte des 16. Jahrhunderts wurden sogar einige Schottenpatres als Äbte in andere Klöster postuliert. Besondere Bedeutung erlangten in dieser Zeit die verschiedenen an der Schottenkirche beheimateten Bruderschaften, unter denen die Sebastianibruderschaft die wichtigste war.

Das 17. Jahrhundert war im Schottenstift wie an vielen anderen Orten auch eine Zeit der Bautätigkeit. Ab 1638 wurde die Schottenkirche in Etappen neu errichtet, danach begann man mit dem Umbau der Schottenhöfe. Im ersten Hof wurde 1652 der von Sebastian Wagner stammende Heinrich-Jasomirgott-Brunnen mit der Statue des Gründers errichtet. Diese Bauarbeiten sowie durch die Zweite Türkenbelagerung erlittene Schäden an seinen Besitzungen führten zu großen finanziellen Problemen des Klosters. Um die Landwirtschaft wieder anzukurbeln, wurde das bereits seit dem 12. Jahrhundert den Schotten gehörende Gut in Breitenlee neu kultiviert ; es bildet auch heute noch eine wichtige Grundlage für die Landwirtschaft des Stiftes.

1702 wurde dem Schottenstift die von den Türken zerstörte ungarische Abtei Telki samt der Dörfer Telki, Jenő (heute Budajenő) und Páty einverleibt. Bis zur Abtretung der Abtei 1881 führten die Schottenäbte daher zwei Mitren in ihren Wappen.

Abt Karl Fetzer (1705-1750) war in der Lage, die finanziellen Sorgen des Klosters zu mindern; gleichzeitig war er ein großer Förderer von Kunst und Wissenschaft. 1715 gründete er ein Gymnasium, an dem weltliche Schüler die philosophischen Kurse besuchen durften; dieses mußte aber bereits 1741 wieder aufgelöst werden. Abt Benno Pointner (1765-1807) gelang es, die Aufhebung des Klosters im Josephinismus zu verhindern. In diesen Zusammenhang fällt auch die Inkorporation zahlreicher Pfarren. 1773-1774 wurde auf dem Areal des aufgelassenen Friedhofs ein neues Prioratshaus mit Schule von Andreas Zach errichtet. Da es in der Form an eine Kommode erinnert, hieß es im Volksmund bald Schubladkastenhaus. Anfang des 19. Jahrhunderts verkauften die Schotten große Teile ihrer Besitzungen in den heutigen Wiener Gemeindebezirken Neubau und Josefstadt, vor allem in Schottenfeld und Breitenfeld, um Platz für den Ausbau der dortigen Vorstädte zu schaffen.

Unter Abt Andreas Wenzel (1807-1831) wurde 1807 durch kaiserliches Dekret das Schottengymnasium gegründet, heute eines der letzten humanistischen Gymnasien Österreichs.

Von 1826 bis 1832 wurden die Schottenhöfe, der ausgedehnte Gebäudekomplex um das Stift, von Joseph Kornhäusel umgestaltet und das schon stark baufällige Konventgebäude abgerissen und neu errichtet. Dabei wurde unter anderem der mittelalterliche Kreuzgang zerstört. Die Kaisersteinbrucher Steinmetzmeister erhielten große Aufträge, unter anderem für lange Antrittsstufen im Konventsgebäude und zwei mit Bodenplatten ausgelegte große Treppen, die allesamt aus dem glattpolierten Kaiserstein mit durchscheinenden Farbeinschlüssen gefertigt wurden. 1858 wurde die bereits 1825 von Peter Nobile entworfene Schwarze Muttergottes-Statue im Konventgarten aufgestellt. Im zweiten Hof entstand 1874 der Delphinbrunnen. Abt Ernest Hauswirth (1881-1901) ließ die Schottenkirche restaurieren und teilweise umgestalten, an der Fassade der Kirche ein Monument zu Ehren des Stiftsgründers Heinrich II. Jasomirgott errichten und diesen in der Krypta in einen neuen Sarkophag umbetten.

Da eine seit 1924 angeordnete Klosterreform nicht ordentlich durchgeführt worden war, wurde 1930 das Schottenstift visitiert, der regierende Abt Amand Oppitz (1913-1930) zum Rückzug bewogen und der junge Mönch Hermann Peichl zum Abtkoadjutor ernannt. Nach der förmlichen Resignation seines Vorgängers wurde Peichl 1938 Abt des Schottenstiftes (1938-1966) .Während des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurden die meisten jungen Schottenmönche zum Wehrdienst eingezogen. Der Schottenkonvent hatte in dieser Zeit schwere Verluste zu verzeichnen. Von 1949 bis 1966 betreuten Patres des Schottenklosters das Priorat Mariazell. 1960 ließ Peichl die Krypta der Schottenkirche umgestalten. Unter seinem Nachfolger Bonifaz Sellinger (1966-1988) wurden Teile des alten romanischen Kirchenbaus freigelegt und das Gästehaus des Stiftes, das Benediktushaus, eröffnet. Abt Heinrich Ferenczy (1988-2006) entfaltete eine rege Bau- und Umgestaltungstätigkeit in Kirche, Krypta und Gymnasium.

Viele Äbte und Mönche des Schottenstifts waren herausragende Persönlichkeiten ihrer Zeit. Abt Donaldus (1380-1392) war achter Rektor der Universität Wien. Die ersten deutschsprachigen Äbte Nikolaus von Respitz (1418-1428), Johannes von Ochsenhausen (1428-1446) und Martin von Leibitz (1446-1461) wirkten als wichtige Akteure der Melker Reformbewegung. Abt Benedictus Chelidonius (1518-1521) war ein gelehrter Humanist und Dichter. Die Äbte Augustin Pitterich (1608-1629), Johann Walterfinger (1629-1641) und Johann Schmitzberger (1669-1683) waren allesamt Weihbischöfe von Wien. Die Äbte Andreas Wenzel (1807-1831) und Sigismund Schultes (1832-1861) waren ebenfalls Rektoren der Wiener Universität. Politisch besonders aktiv war Abt Othmar Helferstorfer (1861-1880), unter anderem als Landmarschall von Niederösterreich. Von Abt Ernest Hauswirth, einem Historiker, stammen die auch heute noch maßgeblichen Werke zur Stiftsgeschichte. Abt Hermann Peichl war Präsident der Wiener Katholischen Akademie, die Äbte Bonifaz Sellinger und Heinrich Ferenczy beide Erste Vorsitzende der Österreichischen Superiorenkonferenz.

Auch einige Mönche des Stiftes hatten Funktionen an der Universität Wien inne. Der Philologe Meinrad Lichtensteiner und der Pastoraltheologe Anselm Ricker waren Rektoren der Universität. Dekane der Katholisch-Theologischen Fakultät waren neben Ricker auch der Dogmatiker Adrian Gretsche, der Orientalist Andreas Oberleitner, der Philologe Paul Hofmann sowie die Kirchenhistoriker Bernhard Wagner und Cölestin Wolfsgruber; Dekan der philosophischen Fakultät war neben Lichtensteiner der Naturwissenschaftler Sigismund Gschwandner. Weitere Universitätslehrende in Wien waren der Philosoph Vincenz Knauer und zuletzt der Alttestamentler Georg Braulik. Der Bibelwissenschaftler Friedrich Wagl war Rektor der Universität Graz.

Von den Patres, die am Schottengymnasium unterrichteten, waren einige ebenfalls wissenschaftlich tätig. Zu ihnen zählen der Historiker Albert Hübl, die Philologen Maurus Schinnagl, Heinrich Maschek und Paulus Lieger sowie die Germanisten Berthold Sengschmitt, Hugo Marena und Meinrad Sadil. Als Musiker erlangten Karlmann Pachschnid und Theodor Zwettler Bedeutung. In der Seelsorge ragen Honorius Kraus, Urban Loritz, Hermann Schubert und Adolf Kern heraus. Mit Othmar Helferstorfer, Clemens Kickh und Cölestin Wolfsgruber stellte das Schottenstift darüber hinaus über 70 Jahre lang den Hofprediger an der Wiener Hofkapelle. Politisch als Wiener Gemeinderäte aktiv waren die Stiftsprioren Edmund Götz und Stephan Fellner.

Doch nicht nur im Kloster selbst, auch in dessen Umfeld finden sich bedeutende Persönlichkeiten. In die Mitte des 16. Jahrhunderts fällt die schriftstellerische Tätigkeit des Schottenschulmeisters Wolfgang Schmeltzl, sein Nachfolger war Johann Rasch. Um 1700 war der große Barockmusiker Johann Joseph Fux Stiftsorganist, die gleiche Funktion bekleidete Johann Baptist Henneberg. Als Regenschori des Schottenstiftes dienten die späteren Hofkapellmeister Joseph von Eybler und Ignaz ABmayer. Der Jurist Christoph Sonnleithner war Hofrichter des Stiftes.

Heute dem Schottenstift inkorporiert sind neben der Stiftspfarr die Pfarren Sankt Ulrich, Breitenlee, Enzersfeld, Kleinengersdorf, Gaweinstal, Höbersbrunn, Schottenfeld, Stammersdorf, Enzersdorf im Thale und Eggendorf im Thale; nicht alle von ihnen werden aber von Schottenpatres seelsorglich betreut. Nicht mehr zum Schottenkloster gehören die Pfarren Gumpendorf, Laab, Martinsdorf, Platt, Pulkau, Waitzendorf, Watzelsdorf und Zellerndorf.

Die ehemalige Prälatur des Schottenstiftes beherbergt heute des Museum im Schottenstift, in welchem Exponate aus den verschiedenen Sammlungen der Abtei ausgestellt sind (Gemälde, Möbel, Tapisserien, Paramente und liturgische Geräte, Handschriften und Drucke) .

Hauptattraktion ist der Wiener Schottenaltar, ein vom sogenannten Meister des Wiener Schottenaltars ab 1469 geschaffener Flügelaltar, der bis ins 17. Jahrhundert als Hochaltar der Schottenkirche gedient haben dürfte. Dieser ist nicht nur ein bedeutendes Kunstwerk der Spätgotik in Österreich, sondern aufgrund seiner detaillierten und topographisch richtigen Stadtansichten von Wien und Krems als Hintergrundlandschaften auch eine wichtige historische Bildquelle.

Schwerpunkte der Gemäldesammlung liegen auf der flämischen, holländischen und österreichischen Malerei des 16., 17. und 18. Jahrhunderts sowie auf der Wiener Biedermeiermalerei. Gezeigt werden neben religiösen Darstellungen (Peter Paul Rubens, Joachim Beuckelaer, Marten de Vos, Orazio Samacchini, Jan Cossiers, Tobias Pock, Johann Spillenberger, Johann Heiss, Peter Strudel, Giovanni Battista Pittoni, Franz Christoph Janneck, Franz Anton Maulbertsch, Franz Josef Dobiaschovsky) auch Porträts (Christopher Paudiß, Christian Seybold) , Landschaftsmalerei (Gillis van Coninxloo, Joos de Momper, Maximilian Joseph Schinnagl, Christian Hilfgott Brand, Johann Leonhard Herrlein, Albert Christoph Dies, Jakob Alt, Thomas Ender, Luigi Bisi) , Stilleben (Carstian Luyckx, Alexander Coosemans, Nicolaes van Verendael, Franz Werner Tamm, Philipp von Purgau, Johann Baptist Drechsler, Johann Knapp) und Genremalerei (Simon de Vos, Cornelis Bega, Egbert van Heemskerck, Jan van der Bent, Adriaen de Gryeff, Jan Pieter van Bredael, Johann Peter Krafft) . Im Prälatensaal ist das ehemalige barocke Hochaltarbild Himmlische Glorie (1671) von Joachim von Sandrart zu sehen.

Außerdem zu besichtigen sind eine Dokumentation zur Stiftsgeschichte und den Stiftspfarrnen sowie ein naturhistorisches Kabinett. Ausschließlich im Rahmen von Führungen zugänglich ist die nach Plänen Joseph Kornhäusels errichtete klassizistische Bibliothek des Klosters.

In Wien sind beziehungsweise waren einige Straßen, Gassen, Plätze und auch Bezirksteile nach dem Schottenstift sowie einzelnen Äbten und Mönchen benannt : Schottenbastei, Schottengasse, Schottenring, Schottentor, Schottenviertel, Freyung und Helferstorferstraße (früher Schottensteig) in der Inneren Stadt ; Schottenfeld, Schottenfeldgasse, Hermannngasse, Sigmundgasse, Spindlergasse (heute Döblergasse) , Urban-Loritz-Platz und Zitterhofergasse am Neubau ; Neuschottengasse (heute Teil der Piaristengasse) , Schottentorgasse (heute Florianigasse) , Bennogasse und Bennoplatz in der Josefstadt ; Schottenpoint, Schottenberg beziehungsweise Schottenbühel (heute Berggasse) , Schottenau und Neuer Schottenfriedhof am Alsergrund ; Schottenwald und Schottenhof in Penzing ; Auf der Schottenwiese und Schottenhof (Ottakringer Freihof) in Ottakring ; Wolfsgrubergasse in Döbling ; sowie Schottenau und Schottenuastraße in der Brigittenau.

Am 7. Oktober 1994 brachte die Österreichische Post eine Dauermarke der Briefmarkenserie Kunstwerke aus Stiften und Klöstern in Österreich mit der Schottenmadonna als Motiv im Wert von 30,00 Schilling heraus. Bereits am 28. November 1975 war eine Weihnachtsmarke mit einem Ausschnitt der Tafel Geburt Christi des Wiener Schottenaltars als Motiv im Wert von 2,00 Schilling erschienen.

...

5 avril 1884 : Première du Quintette à cordes de Bruckner (WAB 112) donnée dans sa version intégrale par un Quatuor Winkler « élargi » : Julius Winkler, Carl Lillich, Hans Kreuzinger, Reinhold Hummer ... et Franz Schalk.

3 juin 1884 : Décès à Mattighofen du Maître d'école, organiste et compositeur Franz Sücka, l'ami personnel de Bruckner lors de son passage comme instituteur-adjoint à Windhaag.

11 juin 1884 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner au chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch.

« May I ask you, once again : Is the concert now going to take place ? On the 21st of this month ? And, if so, when are the 2 final rehearsals which I would so very much like to attend ? I would be overjoyed to see my youngest child brought into the world by the leading German conductor ! I am very excited already. Marvellous things have been written recently in the “ Deutsche Zeitung ”, the “ Bayreuther Blätter ”, and German papers ! »

16 juin 1884 : Lettre du chef Arthur Nikisch à Anton Bruckner :

« Although I am sorry that I have not yet been able to introduce the Leipzig public to this marvellous E major Symphony, I am convinced that the performance is guaranteed a full-attendance, in September, when all the Leipzig people have returned from their Summer travels and, as a result of its undoubted success, will prompt other concert-giving bodies to perform it. You will be pleased with Leipzig. I have already given you so much publicity through piano performances and have won so many friends for your marvellous Symphony that the success of the performance is assured ! »

17 juin 1884 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner au chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch.

« Recently, “ Messieurs ” Schalk and Löwe played the Finale of the 7th Symphony for me on 2 pianos, and I realized that I must have chosen too quick a tempo. I became convinced that the tempo should be a very moderate one and frequent changes of tempo would be required. With a gifted conductor like you in charge, all of this will no doubt happen automatically. My earnest request to you, my most generous supporter, is that I should be present at the last 2 rehearsals so that I can hear the work 3 times. Hellmesberger, the Court music-director, is so delighted with my new “ Te Deum ” and wants to perform it at the Court. »

28 juin 1884 : Les funérailles de Hans Rott ont lieu à la « Zentralfriedhof » de Vienne (groupe n° 23 ; rangée n° 2 ; lot n° 59) . Son Maître bien-aimé, Anton Bruckner, arrive tôt et passe beaucoup de temps, seul, auprès du cercueil de son protégé. L'on voit Bruckner pleurer amèrement lors de l'enterrement. Il déclare sans détour que le traitement cruel et déplacé de Brahms envers ce talent prometteur, déjà suffisamment isolé, est en grande partie responsable de la tragédie.

L'ami de Hans Rott, Friedrich Löhr (le père de la publiciste Maja Löhr) se verra forcer de faire un véritable exercice d'équilibre dans ses commentaires :

« Je crois que Brahms a fait cette réprimande au " débutant " , qui commençait par la mise en œuvre des plus grands moyens d'expression de son art, dans une louable intention pédagogique ; il ne pouvait rien faire d'autre à partir des expériences et des convictions que lui avaient forgées son évolution artistique et son être propre et je crois qu'il a commis là une véritable injustice artistique. Mais à ce moment là, c'était peu avant le début de la maladie, il n'était plus possible de sauver Rott, il avait succombé à son terrible destin : sa maladie, provoquée par de tout autres facteurs psychiques et émotionnels, se préparait déjà depuis longtemps. » (Friedrich Löhr, « Die Musik » , 1903-1904.)

...

Composer Hans Rott's funeral at the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna was attended by Anton Bruckner, who arrived early and spent a significant amount of time alone with the coffin of his young friend and student. At the funeral itself, Bruckner was seen crying, and stated openly that Brahms' uncalled-for, harsh treatment of an already isolated young composer was to blame for his demise.

...

Juin 1884 : For a gala performance on the last day of the Kassel season, Gustav Mahler composes incidental music for a set of « Tableaux vivants » (Living Pictures ; acted-out on stage with scenery) based on the popular poem « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » (The Trumpet-player of Säckingen) , the main piece of which, a serenade, will later be used as the « Blumine » movement of his Symphonic poem. (There is also a very popular Opera named « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » by Victor Ernest Nessler, which Mahler will have to conduct frequently.) Around this time, Mahler falls in love with Johanna Richter, a singer at the Kassel Theater.

25 juin 1884 : Living in the Lower-Austrian State insane asylum, Hans Rott dies of tuberculosis at age 25 ; the most tragic result of the Brahms-Bruckner dispute.

Été 1884 : Johannes Brahms, aged 51, composes the 1st and 2nd movements of his 4th Symphony.

The 13 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky enters the « Vorbildungsschule » (Preparatory School) of the Vienna Conservatory and studies piano and theory.

The 10 year old Arnold Schœnberg begins his 1st attempts at composition, writing small pieces for 2 violins modelled after the duets he plays with his teacher.

Été 1884 : On his summer vacation, Gustav Mahler spends a few days with his parents in Iglau. Then he visits Anton Bruckner in Vienna and persuades him not to revise his 3rd Symphony.

Vraisemblablement, juin-juillet 1884 : Anton Bruckner, âgé de 60 ans, revise le « Te Deum » et commence à travailler sur la 8e Symphonie.

Juillet 1884 : Gustav Mahler spends the month in Perchtoldsdorf, near Vienna.

The 27 year old Robert Hirschfeld receives his Ph.D. with a dissertation on Johannes de Muris, and is appointed teacher of music esthetics at the Vienna Conservatory.

1884 : Lors de son passage à Vöcklabruck, Anton Bruckner va louer une petite chambre au second étage de la maison du 38 de la « Stadtplatz » : le propriétaire est un certain monsieur Hartmann. Au rez-de-chaussée se trouve le quincaillier Franzmair, d'où le nom : « Franzmair-Haus » . Le propriétaire mettra un piano à la disposition du compositeur. C'est là, en 1884, que Bruckner va terminer la 1re version de sa 8e Symphonie. La charmante belle-fille de monsieur Hartmann va devenir la « muse » du 1er mouvement. Une plaque commémorative extérieure installée entre 2 fenêtres du 2e étage, souligne le passage d'Anton Bruckner : « Le membre honoraire du Liedertafel (orphéon) de Vöcklabruck et grand Maître de la tonalité, le docteur Anton Bruckner, a composé dans cette maison. » (inaugurée le 27 mai 1900) . (Aujourd'hui, le Stadtplatz 38, 4840 Vöcklabruck, abrite au rez-de-chaussée la boutique-mode « 17 & Co. » et un petit café de la chaîne « Resch & Frisch » / Telefon : 07672/90 801.)

1884 : Anton Bruckner passe ses vacances d'été à Steyr. Il séjourne dans le vieux presbytère de l'église paroissiale (« Stadtpfarrkirche ») . Une plaque commémorative apposée en 1908, et commanditée par la Société chorale de l'endroit, rappelle qu'il y a composé, de 1886 à 1894, des pages de ses 8e et 9e Symphonies.

L'autrichien Julius Bayer était organiste et chef de chœur à Steyr. Fils de Julia Bayer (1862-1921) , il deviendra un ami d'Anton Bruckner. Bayer sera l'auteur de mémoires sur le compositeur.

Dimanche de la Pentecôte 1898 : Un monument à la mémoire du compositeur Anton Bruckner est inauguré sur la place publique devant l'église paroissiale de Steyr. Le buste est l'œuvre du sculpteur viennois Viktor Oskar Tilgner (Bratislava, 1844 - Vienne 1896) . La base et le reste du monument (putti, muse, lyre, couronne de laurier) sont de Fritz Zerritsch. Tous les villageois sont rassemblés pour assister à la cérémonie. Elle est présidée par le maire Johann Redl, assisté du curé de la paroisse Johann Strobl. Pour l'occasion, la Société chorale de la Haute-Autriche est sous la direction des « Kapellmeister » Franz Xaver Bayer et Edward Werndl. (Tilgner récidivera plus tard avec un autre monument au cimetière central de Vienne.) Le lieu sera rebaptisée « Brucknerplatz » . Au cours de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, le monument sera retiré. Il sera ré-installé en septembre 1945.

Viktor Oskar Tilgner sera l'auteur du monument en hommage à Josef Werndl à Steyr et de celui en hommage à Mozart au jardin du Château (« Burggarten ») de Vienne.

Selon le journal « Alpenboten » , l'organiste Anton Bruckner s'est produit à Steyr.

L'année 1884 marque le décès du curé de la paroisse de Steyr, le grand amateur de musique Georg Arminger. L'événement fait tomber le rideau sur de la période initiale d'Anton Bruckner à Steyr.

...

It is well-known that Anton Bruckner, for the last 6 years of his life, received financial help from the so-called « Steyr consortium » and from a few private individuals. The information about the precise amount he received, as printed in August Göllerich and Max Auer's Bruckner biography (Volume IV/3) , is not correct and although there are 1 or 2 uncertainties, musicologist Erich Wolfgang Partsch, in his « Anton Bruckner und Steyr » (Vienna, 2003) , has already revised the annual amount received from the consortium downwards from 1,025 Florins to 500. In his article in : « Vier unveröffentlichte Leibrentenverträge für Anton Bruckner » , Partsch, drawing on hitherto unpublished documents in the Austrian National Library, also provides a re-assessment of the annual amounts received from Carl von Oberleithner, the father of Max, one of Bruckner's private pupils (500 Florins, as stated in Göllerich-Auer) ; Friedrich Eckstein, another of his private pupils (50 Florins, not 500) ; the industrialist Albert Böhler (50 Florins, not 500) ; and Gustav Riehl, a hospital consultant (100 Florins, as stated in Göllerich-Auer) . Bruckner was clearly well-provided for in his final years, but was by no means so richly endowed as has often been claimed.

Le mécène Karl Almeroth

L'homme d'affaires et manufacturier Karl Almeroth est né le 9 décembre 1852, à Vienne. Il deviendra rapidement un ami proche et un mécène d'Anton Bruckner.

Son père, Johann Almeroth, était représentant syndical de l' « Innerberger » . Son atelier sidérurgique se trouvait dans la grange « Schönauer » (appelée ensuite grange « Innerberger ») . Elle était située à côté du pont de « Neutor » . L'endroit abrite aujourd'hui le Musée historique de Steyr (« Heimatmuseum-Innerberger Stadel ») au 26 Grünmarkt. Le bel édifice fin Renaissance qui, remanié et quelque peu « Baroquisé » , garde son charme caractéristique du XVIIe siècle. Les expositions proposées réunissent des outils anciens, des œuvres représentant l'évolution artistique dans la région, des témoignages sur l'histoire du travail du fer et une superbe collection de couteaux à travers les âges.

Karl Almeroth deviendra le président du grand syndicat autrichien « Innerberger » de l'industrie du fer et du commerce et celui de la Société alpestre « Montan » (sections de Steyr et de Vienne) .

1867-1868 : Karl Almeroth se fait construire une immense Villa au 3 Garstnerstraße (aujourd'hui, la Leopold Werndlstraße) . Il retient les services des architectes Anton et Johann Pichler.

1877 : La Villa devient la propriété de madame Margaretha Moritsch (né Almeroth) .

13 janvier 1878 : Anton Bruckner dédie à Karl Almeroth son « Abendzauber » (magie du soir) , WAB 57, cantate profane en sol bémol majeur pour voix soliste (ténor ou baryton) , 3 voix de jodel (yodleurs) - ou 3 voix féminines distantes -, chœur d'hommes à 4 voix a cappella (TTBB) et quatuor de cors.

Almeroth deviendra aussi un ami personnel du sculpteur Viktor Oskar Tilgner. Ce dernier sera l'auteur de 3 mémoriaux importants à Steyr : la sépulture de Josef Werndl, le monument en hommage à Anton Bruckner et le buste de Franz Schubert devant la maison du 16 de la Place principale (« Stadtplatz ») .

Mars 1892 : Karl Almeroth fait l'acquisition d'une scierie à Neuzeug. Il la démolit pour faire place à une usine moderne de fabrication de lame de couteau de type « Solingen » .

...

Karl Almeroth was another friend and one of Bruckner's sponsors. An affluent merchant and factory owner, he had close personal and commercial ties to Steyr : his father had been a member of the prestigious « Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft » , in Steyr ; the well-known Almeroth blade factory was located in Neuzeug, the birth place of Bruckner's mother ; the family owned a villa in Steyr. Almeroth introduced the composer to influential circles, where he met the likes of Karl Reder, a wood merchant and land-owner, and the merchant Isidor Dierkes. This led to the formation of a « Steyrer Circle » which met on a regular basis in the Vienna of the 1880's. Reder was to play an important role in organising financial support for Bruckner as part of the activities of the so-called « Steyrer Consortium » .

...

When Anton Bruckner spent part of his summer vacations in Steyr, he particularly enjoyed the company of 3 music-loving businessmen : Carl Almeroth, Isidor Dierkes and Karl Reder who, in the 1880's, indulged the composer in 2 of his favourite pursuits : coach riding and Pilsner beer drinking.

The trio was involved in a short-lived scheme to provide Bruckner with some financial help.

Franz Xaver Bayer, director of the parish church choir from the late- 1880's, was an enthusiastic advocate of Bruckner's music and was responsible for several performances of Bruckner's sacred works. On one such occasion (a performance of his D minor Mass in Steyr Parish Church, on 2 April 1893) , Bruckner played the organ part ; at a special reception after the performance, the delighted composer paid tribute to conductor and performers for their exemplary preparation of the work.

L'Église municipale luthérienne de Vienne

Anton Bruckner devient le complice de Karl Almeroth lorsque ce dernier demande la main de mademoiselle Elizabeth Pracherstorfer (la fille d'un Maître tailleur de pierres, née le 16 février 1871) .

3 juillet 1893 : Mariage du couple à l'Église municipale évangélique luthérienne (« Lutherische Stadtkirche ») de Vienne, sise au 18 Dorotheergasse (dans le 1er arrondissement) . Le sculpteur Viktor Oskar Tilgner tient le rôle de garçon d'honneur tandis que Bruckner tient l'orgue durant la cérémonie.

Les organistes titulaires :

Friedrich Lachmund (1783-1794) .

Lebrecht Lorbeer (1794-1802) .

Johann Gottlieb Wosch (1802-1823) .

Franz Lachner (1824-1834) .

Vinzenz Lachner (1834-1836) .

Theodor Dirczka (1837-1882) .

Franz Urban (1882-1916) .

Richard Urban (1916-1919) .

Wolfgang Hiebisch (1919-1921) .

Franz Kemmler (1921-1945) .

Adolf Wurm (1945-1978) .

Martin Rieker (1978-1988) .

Jürgen Rieger (1988-1992) .

Arno Hartmann (1989-2003) .

Andreas Fauß (2003-2004) .

Zuzana Ferjencikova (2004-2006) .

Erzsébet Windhager-Geréd (2006-) .

The Lutheran City Church of Vienna is situated at Dorotheergasse 18, next to the Reformed City Church and opposite of the auction house Dorotheum in the « Innere Stadt » (the 1st district) . It was built in the Renaissance period and has a neo-Classical façade. There is a triangular pediment above the main entrance. A blind, round arched window is attached to this pediment. It is flanked by 2 pilasters on each side and topped by large triangular pediment. The Lutheran City Church has no steeple, but a bell-storey.

The aisleless church has a transept-like extension giving it a cruciform floor plan. On all sides of the church, there are matronea. The altar-piece painted by Franz Linder, in 1783, is a copy of van Dyck's painting « Christ on the Cross », which is kept in the « Kunsthistorisches Museum » just a short walk away. The carved choir stalls next to the altar were installed in 1876. The baptismal font on a « scagliola » column was transferred to the church in 1822. The hearts of Empress Anna, Emperor Matthias and Emperor Ferdinand II were originally buried in the building. The marble locking plates of their burial niches are located in the back of the church. Plaques commemorating the Protestant martyr Caspar Tauber and Emperor Joseph II are attached to the walls.

The Lutheran City Church was built as the monastery church of the Catholic Queen's Monastery (« Königinkloster ») from 1582 to 1583. The Poor Clare monastery was consecrated to Mary, Queen of the Angels. It was founded by Elisabeth of Austria, daughter of Emperor Maximilian II and widow of King Charles IX of France. The Queen dowager established the monastery probably as an atonement for the Saint-Bartholomew's Day massacre and spent her final years there. The original construction plans of the Queen's Monastery are by Pietro Ferabosco. The construction was carried out by Jakob Vivian, the later Architect to the Imperial Court.

In the course of the Josephinist reforms, the monastery was abandoned in 1782. The same year, both a Lutheran and a Reformed congregation were able to constitute themselves in Vienna due to the Patent of Toleration of 1781. The parish based in the Lutheran City Church is the oldest of the Lutheran Superintendentcy of Vienna's parishes. The Lutheran and the Reformed congregation both bought a part of the former Queen's Monastery in 1783. The Reformed congregation built the Reformed City Church which was the 1st building in Vienna intended to be a Protestant church from the beginning. The Lutheran parish purchased the central part of the abandoned monastery including the monastery church. The other parts of the premises were acquired by the banker Johann von Fries who built the Palais Pallavicini there. The former monastery church was extended and converted into a Lutheran church. The 3 church towers had to be removed since the Patent of Toleration stated that Protestant churches should not be recognizable as churches from the outside. On 30 November 1783, the Lutheran City Church was inaugurated.

After a few minor structural changes, a major modification of the building was carried-out by the architect Otto Thienemann in 1876. The façade was redesigned so that the church was recognizable as such from the outside as well. This had been allowed by the Protestant Patent of 1861. In the 19th Century, the composers Franz Lachner and Hermann Graedener were employed as organists in the Lutheran City Church and the distinguished piano maker Johann Andreas Streicher released a new service hymnal. The Lutheran City Church had to be rebuilt again in 1907 due to more stringent fire regulations after the « Ringtheaterbrand ». A direct exit to the street became necessary. The architect Ludwig Schöne turned the interior at 180 degrees by swapping the positions of the organ and the altar - an approach similar to the rebuilding of the neighboring Reformed City Church carried-out by the architect Ignaz Sowinski in 1887. In World War II, the Lutheran City Church suffered severe damage. The façade was completely destroyed by an aircraft bomb in 1945. In 1948, the façade was rebuilt : plain, with bricked-up windows and a distinctive stone cross on the smooth façade. This conversion was reversed in 1989 by restoring the neo-Classical façade of 1907.

...

Baujahr : 1582 / 1783.

Stil : Klassizismus.

Kurzbeschreibung :

1582 / 1783 als Klosterkirche des Konvents der « Heiligen Maria, Königin der Engel » erbaut.

Vermutlich mitunter als Erinnerung an die blutgetränkte « Bartholomäusnacht » .

Kaiser Joseph II. lässt das Kloster aufheben ; die Stadt Wien ist fortan Besitzerin der Gebäude.

Um 1783 kauft die evangelische Gemeinde die Kirche und einen Teil der Klostergebäude.

Aus- und Umbauarbeiten im Jahre 1783 nach Bedürfnis der evangelischen Gemeinde.

Die Fassade erleidet im 2. Weltkrieg schwere Schäden ; daraufhin restauriert.

Erneute Renovationen in den Jahren 1991 und 1998.

Hochaltarbild von Franz Linder um 1783.

Grabplatten von Kaiser Matthias, dessen Frau Kaiserin Anna von Tirol und von Kaiser Ferdinand II.

Gedenktafel für Kaspar Tauber (erster Blutzuge, der evangelischen Gemeinde in Wien) .

Dankschrift für Kaiser Joseph II. bezüglich seines Toleranzediktes rechts im Altarraum.

Die Lutherische Stadtkirche ist ein evangelisch-lutherisches Kirchengebäude im I. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Innere Stadt.

Die Lutherische Stadtkirche befindet sich in der Dorotheergasse 18 neben der Reformierten Stadtkirche und gegenüber dem Auktionshaus Dorotheum. Sie wurde in der Renaissancezeit erbaut und besitzt eine neoklassizistische Straßenfront. Über dem Hauptportal befindet sich ein Dreiecksgiebel an der Fassade. Oberhalb dessen schließt ein hohes Rundbogen-Blendfenster an, das von je zwei Pilastern flankiert und von einem großen Dreiecksgiebel gekrönt wird. Die Lutherische Stadtkirche besitzt keinen Kirchturm, sondern wird an der Frontfassade oben von einem Glockengeschoß abgeschlossen.

Die Saalkirche besitzt eine querhausartige Erweiterung bei kreuzförmigem Grundriss. Auf allen Seiten im Kircheninneren befinden sich Emporen. Das Altarbild von Franz Linder aus dem Jahr 1783 ist eine Kopie von van Dycks Gemälde Christus am Kreuz, das nur wenige Gehminuten entfernt im Kunsthistorischen Museum aufbewahrt wird. Beim Altar wurde 1876 ein geschnitztes Chorgestühl eingebaut. Das Taufbecken auf einer Säule aus Stucco lustro befindet sich seit 1822 in der Kirche. Im hinteren Teil der Lutherischen Stadtkirche sind marmorne Verschlussplatten an den Beisetzungs-nischen der Herzen von Kaiserin Anna, Kaiser Matthias und Kaiser Ferdinand II. erhalten, die ursprünglich hier bestattet waren und später in die Loretokapelle der Augustinerkirche überführt wurden. Außerdem sind Gedenktafeln für den evangelischen Märtyrer Caspar Tauber und für Kaiser Joseph II. in der Kirche angebracht.

Die Lutherische Stadtkirche wurde als katholische Klosterkirche des Königinklosters in den Jahren 1582 bis 1583 erbaut. Dieses Maria, Königin der Engel, geweihte Klarissen-Kloster war eine Stiftung von Elisabeth von Österreich, einer Tochter Kaiser Maximilians II. und Witwe des Königs Karl IX. von Frankreich. Die Königinwitwe stiftete das Kloster vermutlich als Sühne für die Bartholomäusnacht, das Massaker an den Hugenotten in Frankreich, und verbrachte ihre letzten Lebensjahre dort. Die Baupläne zum Königinkloster stammten ursprünglich vom italienischen Architekten und Maler Pietro Ferrabosco, durchgeführt wurde der Bau jedoch vom späteren Hofbaumeister Jakob Vivian. Die Klosterkirche wurde am 2. August 1583 geweiht.

Im Zuge der josephinischen Reformen wurde das Kloster 1782 aufgelassen. Im selben Jahr hatten sich durch das Toleranzpatent von 1781 sowohl eine lutherische als auch eine reformierte Gemeinde in Wien konstituieren können. Die in der Lutherischen Stadtkirche beheimatete heutige Pfarrgemeinde Wien Innere Stadt ist die älteste innerhalb der Evangelischen Superintendentur A. B. Wien. Die lutherische und die reformierte Gemeinde kauften 1783 jeweils einen Teil des ehemaligen Königinklosters. Die reformierte Gemeinde ließ auf ihrem Grundstück die Reformierte Stadtkirche als erste als solche erbaute evangelische Kirche Wiens errichten. Die lutherische Gemeinde bekam den zentralen Teil des aufgelassenen Klosters mit der Klosterkirche. Einen weiteren Teil des Geländes erwarb der Bankier Johann von Fries, der dort das heutige Palais Pallavicini erbauen ließ. Die ehemalige Klosterkirche wurde zur Lutherischen Stadtkirche umgebaut und erweitert. Da den Bestimmungen des Toleranzpatents zufolge die Kirche von außen nicht als solche erkennbar sein durfte, mußten unter anderem die drei Kirchtürme abgetragen werden. Am 30. November 1783 wurde die Lutherische Stadtkirche eingeweiht.

Nach kleineren baulichen Veränderungen erfolgte 1876 ein größerer Umbau durch den Architekten Otto Thienemann. Hierbei wurde die Fassade so umgestaltet, daß die Kirche auch von außen als solche erkennbar war, was seit dem Protestantenpatent von 1861 nun gestattet war. Im 19. Jahrhundert waren die Komponisten Franz Lachner und Hermann Graedener als Organisten der Lutherischen Stadtkirche angestellt und der bedeutende Klavierbauer Andreas Streicher gab ein neues Gesangbuch für den Gottesdienst heraus. Auf Grund strengerer feuerpolizeilicher Vorschriften nach dem Ringtheaterbrand mußte die Lutherische Stadtkirche 1907 erneut umgebaut werden. Weil ein direkter Ausgang des Kirchenraums zur Dorotheergasse notwendig wurde, ließ der Architekt Ludwig Schöne das Innere der Kirche um 180 Grad drehen, also die Position von Orgel und Altar vertauschen - ein Verfahren, das in der benachbarten Reformierten Stadtkirche von Architekt Ignaz Sowinski bereits 1887 erprobt worden war. Im Zweiten Weltkrieg erlitt die Lutherische Stadtkirche schwere Schäden, die Fassade fiel 1945 vollständig einem Bombenangriff zum Opfer. 1948 wurde die Fassade neu errichtet: schlicht, mit vermauerten Fenstern und einem markanten Steinkreuz an der glatten Fassade. Diese Umgestaltung wurde 1989 rückgängig gemacht und die neoklassizistische Fassade in der Form von 1907 wiederhergestellt.

...

Un autre proche de Karl Almeroth à Steyr était l'avocat Franz Angermann (1854-1918) .

1894 : Karl Almeroth décide de vendre son entreprise de lames à monsieur Otto Christ.

Karl Almeroth faisait partie du « Cercle » restreint des amis, mécènes et disciples d'Anton Bruckner. Sa position respectable dans le monde des affaires (il est un membre influent du Consortium « Steyr ») et de la culture (de 1889 à 1894, il est membre de l'Association des artistes viennois) permettra de faire avancer la cause du Maître de Saint-Florian.

Almeroth et Bruckner font de nombreuses excursions en chariot tiré par un cheval.

C'est en pensant à la personnalité enjouée de Karl Almeroth que Bruckner donnera au Trio du Scherzo de sa 8e Symphonie son aspect anguleux. (Almeroth avait d'abord rejeté la 1re version de ce mouvement.)

Le fils du couple Almeroth voit le jour le 31 octobre 1895. Anton Bruckner est choisi comme parrain. De là, l'origine du prénom de l'enfant : Karl (le père) et Anton (le parrain) . La petite famille réside au 11 de la « Dukartstraße » à Steyr.

1885 à 1894 : Les Almeroth habitent la Villa (l'ancienne mairie technique dite « Technische Rathaus ») du 3 de la « Garstnerstraße » (aujourd'hui, « Leopold Werndl Straße ») . Plus tard, ils iront vivre au 17 « Lenaugasse » dans le 8e arrondissement de Vienne.

1896 : Herbert Moritsch von Morenau junior prend possession de la Villa. Puis, ce sera au tour de la famille de Joseph Hack.

L'ami de Karl Almeroth, le sculpteur Viktor Oskar Tilgner, meurt le 16 avril 1896.

Anton Bruckner rend l'âme le 11 octobre 1896. Le petit Karl Anton Almeroth se tiendra debout, à côté du cercueil, avec le bouquet de roses que son illustre parrain tenait dans ses mains.

1897 : Karl Almeroth doit faire face à une épreuve encore plus douloureuse : la mort de son épouse bien-aimée, Elisabeth (surnommée « Elsa » ou « Elserl ») alors âgée de 26 ans.

Karl Almeroth épousera en seconde nocces Johanna Muley. Ils auront 1 fils et 1 fille.

Karl Almeroth sera l'auteur de nombreux articles sur Bruckner ; notamment sur ses improvisations à l'orgue et le monument érigé à sa mémoire, en plein cœur de Steyr, par le sculpteur Viktor Oskar Tilgner.

En effet, Almeroth co-signe, en 1899, avec le musicologue Leopold Nowak (le futur président de l' « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » de Vienne) un ouvrage intitulé : « Wie die Bruckner-Büste entstand : zum Bruckner-Denkmal » (Format : 14, XII Seite : I Ill. ; 19 cm ; 46 illustrations ; 48 exemples musicaux. Ré-édition en 1973 et en 1979.)

Karl Almeroth meurt à Vienne le 3 octobre 1906. Il n'avait que 54 ans.

...

À l'initiative du « Kapellmeister » et organiste de Steyr, Franz Xaver Bayer, dans le cadre du Jubilé du « Männergesangsverein Kränzchen » (l'Association du chœur d'hommes de la « petite Couronne ») en 1908, l'on procédera devant l'église paroissiale à l'inauguration d'une plaque commémorative en hommage au docteur Anton Bruckner. Elle rappelle qu'il a écrit ses dernières œuvres majeures lors de ses vacances estivales passées dans ce village de 1886 à 1894. C'est en 1889 que Bruckner fut nommé membre honoraire de cette Association.

Texte

Hier schuf

Doktor Anton Bruckner

In den Ferienmonaten

Der Jahre 1886-1894

Seine letzten großen Werke

Seinem Ehrenmitglied der Männergesangsverein « Kränzchen » .

(A. D. 1908)

...

Buste et plaque commémorative en hommage à Anton Bruckner (une initiative privée de la Chambre de commerce de Steyr) inaugurés le 12 mars 1961 dans l'ancienne mairie technique (« Technische Rathaus ») du 3 de la « Leopold Werndl Straße » (anciennement, « Garstnerstraße ») ; aujourd'hui, propriété de monsieur Josef Hack (d'où le nom « Hackvilla ») . Karl Almeroth vécut dans cette maison de 1885 à 1894.

Texte de la plaque commémorative

In den Jahren 1885-1894

Doktor Anton Bruckner

Bei seinem Freund und Gönner

Karl Almeroth

(12. März 1961 - Technische Rathaus Josef Hack)

...

Eine Bruckner-Gedenktafel, die aus privater Initiative entstanden ist, wurde im Haus Leopold Werndl Straße 3 enthüllt. Der Stifter der Gedenktafel ist Herr Technische Rathaus Josef Hack, der Besitzer dieses Hauses.

Die Gedenktafel ist unterhalb einer Brucknerbüste angebracht. Carl Almeroth war früher Besitzer des Hauses. (Steyrer Kalender, 1962)

...

Karl Almeroth : Fabrikant, Generalvertreter der Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft. Geboren 9.12.1852 in Wien ; gestorben 3.10.1906 in Wien.

Karl Almeroth, Teilnehmer. Aufgenommen am 25.01.1889. Realitätenbesitzer in Steyr. Vorgeschlagen durch Rudolf Blümel, Gustav Koppel und Moriz Mayr. Mitglied des Billard-Clubs. Mit 29.01.1894 ausgetreten, hat wenig Gelegenheit in Wien zu sein.

Karl Almeroth war Fabrikant, Generalvertreter der Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft beziehungsweise der Alpinen Montangesellschaft in Steyr und Wien.

Die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft ist ein historisches österreichisches Unternehmen der Eisenindustrie und Eisenvermarktung.

Die Gesellschaft trägt mit Innerberg den bis ins 18. Jahrhundert verwendeten alten Namen der beim steirischen Erzberg gelegenen Stadt Eisenerz. Der Name Gewerkschaft hat nichts mit Arbeitnehmervertretung zu tun. Die Gewerke waren selbständige Unternehmer, und zwar die Radmeister, welche die Roheisenerzeugung besorgten, die Hammermeister oder Hammerherren, die sich mit der Verarbeitung des Roheisens zu Stahl und Eisen befassen und die Eisenhändler oder Verleger, die den weiten Vertrieb der Eisenwaren durchführten. Die Gewerkschaft war in diesem Fall ein Zusammenschluss der Gewerke. Ein Gewerke war zumeist nicht nur Industrieller sondern auch Gutsbesitzer, der einen Großteil seines Bedarfs an Brennstoff und Lebensmitteln aus seinem eigenen Grund und Boden bezog.

Die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft bestand von 1625 bis 1881. Sie war ein Vorgängerunternehmen der Österreichisch-Alpine Montangesellschaft und damit auch der heute bestehenden voestalpine AG. In der wechselvollen Geschichte dieser Unternehmungen bestehen gewisse Parallelen, vor allem was die mehrmaligen Änderungen der Struktur der Eigentumsverhältnisse betrifft. Zeitweise waren diese Unternehmungen gänzlich verstaatlicht, zeitweise waren zum Teil verstaatlicht und zum Teil privat und zeitweise auch überwiegend oder zur Gänze in privatem Eigentum.

Im 14. Jahrhundert wurde durch Verfügung des Landesfürsten der Abbau des Eisenerzes am steirischen Erzberg, die Erzeugung des Roheisens und die Weiterverarbeitung klar geordnet. Die obere Berghälfte wurde vom südlich gelegenen Vordernberg aus erschlossen, während der untere Teil von Innerberg, dem heutigen Eisenerz, ausgebeutet wurde. Eine waagerechte Linie in 1186 m Seehöhe, die so genannte Ebenhöhe, unterteilte den Berg. Eine Eisenordnung, erlassen 1448, führte auch zu einer Teilung der Absatzgebiete. Nordeuropa wurde von Innerberg beliefert, während Südosteuropa, über Venedig bis in die Levante, Eisen aus Vordernberg erhielt. Der Eisenhandel konzentrierte sich in Steyr und Leoben, die sich diesbezüglich als privilegierte Zentren durchsetzen konnten. Schon im Jahre 1287 erhielt Steyr vom Landesfürsten das Große Privileg für den Handel mit Innerberger Eisen und 1314 Leoben für den Handel mit dem Vordernberger Eisen.

Das Roheisen wurde ab dem 15. Jahrhundert in Radwerken erzeugt. In Innerberg gab es 19 und im Vordernberg 14 Radwerke. Die Betriebe gehörten den einzelnen Gewerken, die wiederum Erzrechte am Berg besaßen. Die Erzgewinnung geschah durch die bei den Gewerken angestellten Knappen.

Wie dies häufig der Fall ist, wurde auch im damaligen Eisenwesen beim Handel besser verdient als bei der Erzeugung. Die Eisenhändler wurden Verleger genannt, weil Sie den Rad- und Hammermeistern Verlag, das heißt eine Vorfinanzierung, gewähren mußten. Die finanzielle Überlegenheit der Verleger bewirkte mit der Zeit eine Abhängigkeit der Rad- und Hammergewerken.

Um eine Verbesserung der Situation zu erreichen, wurden im Jahre 1625 unter Kaiser Ferdinand II. die Hauptglieder des Eisenwesens im Bereich nördlich des Erzberges in einer Gesellschaft zusammengefasst. Es waren dies 19 Radwerke in Innerberg (Eisenerz), 18 Welschhammerwerke samt den dazugehörigen kleinen Hämmern bei Großreifling, Sankt Gallen, Weißenbach an der Enns und Altenmarkt bei Sankt Gallen, ferner 17 Hammerwerke in der Laussa, in Kleinreifling und Reichraming, sieben Hammerwerke in Weyer und zwei Hammerwerke zu Hollenstein an der Ybbs samt Gebäuden, Grundstücken und Wäldern und die Eisenhändler der Stadt Steyr. Das Ganze erfolgte unter starker Kontrolle des landesfürstlichen Kammergrafenamtes. Damit war das damals größte Industrieunternehmen Österreichs entstanden. Die Gewerken und Hammermeister wurden zu Teilhabern. Aus diesen Schichten kamen auch die leitenden Beamten der neuen Gesellschaft. Im Vordernberger und Leobener Bereich blieb die Struktur im Wesentlichen unverändert.

Die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft war mit 2.000 bis 3.000 Beschäftigten und einer Jahresproduktion von circa 5.000 Tonnen Eisen im 17. Jahrhundert das größte Eisen produzierende Unternehmen der Welt. Zu diesem frühkapitalistischen Montankonzern gehörten auch ein umfangreichen Waldbesitz, Waldnutzungsrechte, Einrichtungen zur Holzflößung und die Holzkohlenerzeugung.

Im Erzabbau und bei der Erzaufbereitung waren relativ wenige Personen beschäftigt. So beschäftigte im Jahre 1678 die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft 2.624 Personen, davor nur 153 Bergknappen. Dagegen wurden für die Radwerke und die Holzbesorgung 824 Arbeiter benötigt, für die Hammerwerke 973 und die Köhlerei 800.

An der Spitze standen die leitenden Beamten, die zwar einerseits Amtsträger des Landesfürsten waren, andererseits als sogenannte Verweser selbst Unternehmerfunktionen wahrnahmen. Daneben standen ein Bergrichter und einige Schreiber und darunter, aber über den Arbeitern, die Vorarbeiter, die sogenannten Hutleute.

Als sich herausstellte, daß auch nach dem Zusammenschluss in der neuen Konstruktion die Abhängigkeit von den Steyrer Eisenhändlern bestehen blieb und daß diese hohe Gewinne lukrierten, während die Gesamtgewerkschaft Verluste schrieb, wurde 1669 eine Reorganisation vorgenommen. Dabei wurde die Gewerkschaft dem Kammergrafenamt völlig unterstellt und damit zum quasi-öffentlichen, staatlich gelenkten und kontrollierten Betrieb. Der Sitz des Kammergrafen befand sich im Kammerhof in Innerberg-Eisenerz.

Als die englische Konkurrenz immer stärker wurde, übernahm 1783 die Stadt Steyr das Alleineigentum an der Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft. Das Kammergrafenamt wurde abgeschafft und die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft erhielt im Jahre 1787 wieder ihre Selbständigkeit zugestanden und Steyr übernahm deren Führung.

1798 verkaufte die Stadt Steyr ihre Gewerkschaftsanteile an die Kaiserlich und Königlich privaten Canal- und Bergbaugesellschaft. 1807 schließlich, in höchster Not und im patriotischen Gefühl der Napoleonischen Kriege ging die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft wieder zur Gänze in staatliche Verfügungsgewalt über, nämlich an das Montan-Ärar. Mit der Leitung betraute man die Kaiserlich und Königlich Hofkammer für das Münz- und Bergwesen. Im Jahre 1818 entstand die Kaiserlich und Königlich steiermärkisch-österreichische Eisenwerks Direction im Sitz in Eisenerz.

Die Modernisierung und Reduzierung der Anzahl der Frischhütten und Hammerwerke, der Bau dreier Hochöfen in Eisenerz und Hieflau als Ersatz für die unrentabel gewordenen alten Floßöfen und der verbesserte Transport auf und im Erzberg führte dazu, das die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft ein sehr solides Unternehmen wurde.

Nach der Verstaatlichung am Ende des 18. Jahrhunderts wurde sie 1869 wieder privatisiert. Als Folge der Niederlage im Deutschen Krieg im Jahre 1866 mußte der Staat, um seinen Verpflichtungen nachkommen zu können, die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft verkaufen. Käufer war die Österreichische Creditanstalt, die jedoch unter den Folgen des Gründerkrachs vom Jahre 1873 sehr zu kämpfen hatte.

Im Jahr 1881 wurde die Österreichisch-Alpine Montangesellschaft gegründet, von der die Innerberger Hauptgewerkschaft gemeinsam mit den meisten anderen steirischen und kärntnerischen Industrieunternehmen des Eisenwesens übernommen wurde.

...

Er war von 1889 bis 1894 Mitglied des Wiener Künstlervereines. Er war ein guter Freund des Wiener Bildhauers

Professor Viktor Oskar Tilgner, in Steyr Schöpfer der Werndlgruft, des Werndl- und Bruckner-Denkmal sowie der Schubertbüste am Haus Stadtplatz 16. Auch der Symphoniker Professor Anton Bruckner zählte zu seinen besten Freunden. Beide galten als « Ehestifter » für seine Heirat mit Frau Elisabeth Pracherstorfer aus Unterhimmel Nummer 4, geboren am 16. Februar 1871, Tochter eines Steinmetzmeisters. Die Hochzeit fand am 03. Juli 1893 in der evangelischen Kirche A. B. Wien I. Dorotheergasse 18 statt. Viktor Oskar Tilgner war Trauzeuge und Anton Bruckner spielte auf der Orgel. Am 31. Oktober 1895 wurde ihr Sohn Carl Anton geboren. Anton Bruckner war sein Taufpate. Sie wohnten zuerst in Steyr, Dukartstraße 11, anschließend in der Villa Garstnerstraße 3 und später in Wien 8. Lenaugasse 17. Im März 1892 kaufte er in Neuzeug ein Sägewerk und baute an dessen Stelle eine moderne Messer-Klingenfabrik nach Solinger-Art. 1894 verkaufte er die Klingenschlägerei an Herrn Otto Christ. Karl Almeroth gehörte zum engsten Freundes- und Förderkreis von Anton Bruckner. Er stellte immer wieder gesellschaftliche Kontakte her. Er war wichtiges Mitglied des « Steyrer Consortiums » und unternahm mit Bruckner viele Ausflüge im « Zeugl » (Pferdegespann, daher auch sein Spitzname « Wagerl ») . Er war Widmungsträger des Chores Abendzauber und publizierte auch Artikel über Bruckner (Orgelimprovisation, Denkmal) .

Am 16. April 1896 starb sein Freund Professor Viktor Oskar Tilgner und im Oktober 1896 sein Freund Professor Anton Bruckner. Auf der Schleife des Rosenbouquets, welches Bruckner im Sarg in den Händen hielt, stand : Vom kleinen Karl Anton - seinem Taufpaten. Im Jahr 1897 starb dann auch noch seine geliebte Gattin Elisabeth, genannt Elsa oder Elserl, mit 26 Jahren. Mit seiner zweiten Ehefrau Johanna Muley hatte er einen Sohn und eine Tochter. Karl Almeroth starb am 3. Oktober 1906 im 54. Lebensjahr in Wien.

(Foto) Almeroth und Angermann (1892) .

In Steyr zählte auch der Advokat Doktor Franz Angermann (1854-1918) zu seinen Freunden.

Sein Vater Johann Almeroth war Vertreter der Innerberger Gewerkschaft und hatte bis Oktober 1871 sein Eisen- und Stahllager im Schönauer Kasten (Stadl) neben der Neutorbrücke und anschl. im Innerbergerstadl (Grünmarkt 26 - heute Museum der Stadt Steyr) . Er ließ sich 1867-1868 von den Baumeistern Anton und Johann Pichler eine mächtige Villa in der Garstnerstraße 3 (heute Leopold Werndlstraße 3) bauen. 1877 ging die Villa in den Besitz von Frau Margaretha Moritsch (geborene Almeroth) über. Von ihr erbte diese 1896 der minderjährige Herbert Moritsch Edler von Morenau. Später war die Familie Hack im Besitz dieser Villa.

...

6 août 1884 : Message de Anton Bruckner au chef d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch ...

« Requesting postponement of the concert till student term begins. I expect to gain many supporters among the young people. “ Gaudeamus igitur ”. I have begun my 8th Symphony ... »

WAB 129

20 août 1884 : WAB 129 - « Perger Präludium » (prélude de Perg) en do majeur pour orgue (ou harmonium) solo. Composée entre les 7e et 8e Symphonies lors d'une visite à Saint-Florian. Le manuscrit original est maintenant considéré comme perdu. Le Prélude a heureusement survécu grâce à 2 arrangements pour harmonium composés à l'intention de son ami et compagnon de voyage à Bayreuth : le docteur Karl Josef Diernhofer, maire du village de Perg, en plus d'être marchand de cuir et organiste à l'église paroissiale.

Une plaque commémorative qui orne la résidence du 24 de la « Herrenstraße » rappelle que, le 20 août 1884, le compositeur Anton Bruckner dédia un court prélude pour orgue en hommage à son ami Karl Josef Diernhofer, marchand de cuir, organiste et maire de Perg.

Une plaque commémorative (sur le même thème) orne également la façade de l'actuelle mairie (« Rathaus »), située sur la « Hauptplatz ». De facture Classique (s'inspirant des bâtiments grandioses de la « Ringstraße » de Vienne), l'édifice (dont on ignore qui sont les architectes) fut érigé en 1876 pour remplacer l'ancien Hôtel-de-ville de 1736 détruit par un incendie. En 2005, le « Rathaus » de Perg a été nommé bien patrimonial.

Anton Bruckner venait souvent dans les environs de Perg pour y jouer de l'orgue : son instrument de prédilection. La grand-mère d'Anton Bruckner, Marie-Thérèse Pruckner, est née dans le village de Perg.

Le « Perger Präludium » est probablement la pièce la plus courte (avec 27 mesures) et la moins connue des œuvres significatives de Bruckner. Elle semble être la seule œuvre pour orgue provenant de sa période tardive. L'influence de Richard Wagner est omniprésente. Le thème d'ouverture s'apparente à l'aria de « l'Étoile de la nuit » tiré de l'Opéra « Tannhäuser » puis les 3 mesures suivantes nous fait soudainement pénétrer dans le royaume de « Tristan und Isolde » et la « scène de l'adieu » de Wotan.

1re édition : UE 8752, Josef Venantius von Wöb, Universal-Edition, Vienne (1926) ; supplément à la revue « Musica Divina » XIV/10. Avec un avant-propos de Josef Venantius von Wöb.

« Anton Bruckner Orgelwerke » : Hans Haselböck, édition Ludwig Döblinger, Vienne (1970) ; en dehors de la nouvelle édition complète : Neuen Gesamtausgabe (NGA) .

Belwin Mills (Kalmus Organ Library, n° 3266) , page 20. Fin modifiée.

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) XII/6, édition Erwin Horn (1999) , page 16 ; esquisse imprimée en page 17.

Aujourd'hui, des éditeurs offre même une 3e version avec orgue.

(Photo) Une copie du manuscrit du « Prélude de Perg », autographiée par Bruckner, utilisée par la chorale de l'église, en 1927.

...

WAB 129 (1884) : « Perger Präludium » ; Prelude of Perg in C major for organ (or harmonium) .

The Prelude for organ in C major, the so-called « Perger Prelude » (or « Perger Präludium ») , is one of the least-known, perhaps the shortest, yet one of the most significant works by Anton Bruckner. Composed during an 1884 visit to Saint-Florian, the original manuscript is believed lost. The work survived in a 2 staved arrangement for harmonium which Bruckner made for his friend Karl Josef Diernhofer of Perg, providing the work's nickname. Modern editors of the score have provided a 3rd stave for organ performance.

This brief work (with 27 measures) was composed between the 7th and 8th Symphonies and is believed to be the only organ work of Bruckner's late-period. The influence of Richard Wagner is heavy, the opening subject bearing a resemblance to the « Evening Star » aria from the Opera « Tannhäuser » and within 3 measures entering the realm of « Tristan » and Wotan's « Farewell » . Even more significant is the remarkable tonal growth which begins at measure 7. A decade later, a similar passage will have emerged ghostlike in the Adagio of the 9th Symphony. In binary form, after a full measure's rest the reprise nestles the music to a serene close firmly in C major. However, it is the subtle link with Anton Bruckner's last completed musical utterance which renders this tiny work a sign post in the transition from the 19th to the 20th Century music.

The « Perger Prelude » is one of Anton Bruckner's shortest and least well-known works. Despite its brevity, it is, by no means, as simple in design as its scale might suggest. Rather, the Prelude is an ornately carved doll house. As we peer in through a window, we discover a drama being played out 4 characters come and go, and one more lurks in the shadows. To follow their story, we must look through the different windows of the house, as the action moves from room to room. It is thus that we must examine the Prelude : from several perspectives, all necessary to understand this brief, yet rich work.

The story concerns 5 characters who represent the central players in this piece. The main character is a harmonic motive (V-VI) that appears on both the surface of the Prelude, and at the level of the deep structure. The supporting roles are played by a motive of interval classes, a chameleon (whose colours change with the re-interpretation of functional roles throughout the piece) , and the part of the mysterious stranger is played by the key of A, always lurking in the shadows. Finally, the Master himself, Richard Wagner, makes several cameo appearances over the course of the work ; his interjections are akin to dramatic asides that comment on the music from without.

Bruckner was recognized for his abilities as an improviser at the organ, but committed few works for that instrument to paper. Written in 1884, the same year that he began work on the 1st version of the 8th Symphony. The Prelude is the only surviving work for organ that Bruckner wrote after his study with the conductor Otto Kitzler when he moved to Vienna.

Although, the autograph score of the « Perger Prelude » is lost, the work survives as a transcription for harmonium. The accompanying dedication to mayor Karl Josef Diernhofer of Perg, dated 20 August 1884, reads as follows :

« Your Honour Mister Josef Diernhofer, Perg.

Your Honour !

At present, I am staying at Kremsmünster, where I have copied for you the little piece (“ Stückchen ”) composed at Saint-Florian.

I would be very happy if it should please you.

My Symphony in D minor, including a piano reduction, has been published by Rättig, in Vienna ; my Quintet by Albert J. Gutmann, in Vienna (Opera Theatre) .

Your noble taste and enthusiasm for art redound to your highest ... »

L'orgue de l'église paroissiale « Sankt Jakobi » de Perg

En 1665, le directeur du marché publique de Perg, George Hagenauer, décide de faire ériger un nouvel orgue (le facteur et le type d'instrument sont aujourd'hui inconnus) . De 1673 à 1677, le Maître d'école Richard Christoph Haimb devient le 1er organiste titulaire de l'église paroissiale de « Sankt Jakobi » . En 1708, l'orgue sera lourdement endommagé (ou complètement détruit) lors d'un grave incendie. En 1828, le facteur Sebastian Schwarzmayr de Wippenham est choisi pour construire un nouvel instrument (on ignore aujourd'hui ses caractéristiques et sa place à l'intérieur de l'enceinte) ; il sera utilisé jusqu'en 1861. 1862-1863 : un orgue comprenant 12 registres du facteur Franz Xaver Meindl de « Ybbs an der Donau » (affluent de la rive droite du Danube) , du district de Melk en Basse-Autriche, sera installé durant le règne du curé Carl Auer. Il sera inauguré le 20 janvier 1863 par Anton Bruckner, l'organiste titulaire à l' « Alter Dom » de Linz, qui en fera alors une évaluation rigoureuse. Insatisfait de la sonorité de départ, il décide de rester sur place jusqu'à ce que l'instrument reçoive sa « bénédiction » (certification) . En 1875, le facteur entreprendra des réparations. En 1893, Bruckner va être de retour à Perg pour assister, en présence de Meindl, à l'inauguration de la mise à niveau de l'instrument qui possède dorénavant 23 registres. En 1903, l'entretien de l'orgue est accordé au facteur Breinbauer de Ottenheim. Déjà en 1911, le curé Johann Evangelist Stauchner avait à l'idée de remplacer toute la mécanique. Lors de son démantèlement pour faire place à l'instrument actuel, la découverte d'inscriptions faites au crayon révèle que des réparations de même qu'une maintenance soutenue avaient été effectuées en 1917, 1941, 1950 et 1973. L'orgue moderne de l'église paroissiale de « Sankt Jakobi » de Perg fut inauguré le 23 mars 1983 par l'évêque diocésain, Monseigneur Maximilian Aichern.

L'église paroissiale « Sankt Jakobi » de Perg

L'église paroissiale gothique de « Sankt Jakobi » est à voûte unique. Elle fut mentionnée pour la 1re fois dans un registre datant de 1363. En 1416, une chapelle vouée à Saint-Jacques sera érigée à cet endroit. En 1528, est agrandie et sacrée église. Lors de travaux, on découvre des fresques sur les façades Est et Sud de la tour qui datent de sa construction. En 1542, une paroisse sera fondée. La tour du clocher est de 48 mètres de hauteur. Les magnifiques fonts baptismaux à l'intérieur sont de marbre rouge.

Perg

Le territoire de Perg se trouve d'un côté, dans la pleine fertile du « Machland » et de l'autre, au pied du Massif de Bohême. Perg est située à environ 25 kilomètres à l'est de Linz et au sud à seulement quelques kilomètres du fleuve Danube. Le centre-ville se trouve à l'endroit où la Naarn, un affluent du Danube, quitte sa vallée profondément érodée et entre dans la plaine du Machland.

La bourgade de Perg fut fondée par la Maison des Babenberg située dans la partie orientale du duché de Bavière. Elle appartiendra à l'Autriche dès le 12^e siècle. Perg doit son nom aux « Seigneurs de Perge » dont on trouve des traces dans des documents datant du 11^e siècle. En 1269, la commune de Perg reçoit des privilèges commerciaux (le droit de marché) de la part du roi Ottokar II de Bohême. Dès le début du 14^e siècle, les habitants ont droit à leur propre tribunal. À partir de 1490, Perg fera partie de la principauté de l'Autriche sur l'Ems. Pendant les Guerres de la Révolution française, le général Édouard Adolphe Mortier va y installer, en 1805, un camp militaire. Devenu indépendant en 1542, Perg va être occupé, à plusieurs reprises, durant les guerres napoléoniennes.

Perg offre à ses visiteurs un certain nombre d'églises intéressantes et de bâtiments historiques, 2 musées avec des collections variées et des monuments extraordinaires comme la colonne de la peste et les pierres de la justice qui rappellent l'histoire de la ville.

Du centre-ville historique, il ne reste que l'église paroissiale de « Sankt Jakobi » et la maison du savonnier ; plusieurs incendies ont détruit le reste.

Les principaux sites touristiques :

« Pergkirchen » : Église gothique vouée à Saint-Martin, possédant des éléments de style Roman. Elle est mentionnée dès 1088. Au cours des 15^e et 16^e siècles, elle subit plusieurs modifications. En 1527, on rajouta la chapelle de Sainte-Marguerite (« Sankt Margaret ») .

La « Kalvarienbergkirche » : L'église du Mont-du-Calvaire fut érigée sur une petite butte, entre 1734 et 1754. Visible de loin, elle représente l'emblème de Perg. Le conseil du marché ordonna sa construction afin de protéger les citoyens des désastres naturels et des épidémies. Il s'agit d'une rotonde du Baroque finissant avec un intérieur de style Rococo. Le bâtiment sera consacré en 1765 en l'honneur du Saint-Sauveur sur la croix.

« Burgfriedenstein » : Les « Pierres de la Justice » démarquaient le territoire de la juridiction locale.

La « Herrenstraße » (carte postale datant de 1920) : Vie de tous les jours dans la « Herrenstraße » .

La fontaine en granit (octogonale à 4 trombes) de Perg est située sur la place centrale. Elle fut construite durant la seconde moitié du 17^e siècle.

« Einhorn » : La grande sculpture d'une licorne inspiré des Armoiries de la ville. (Les armoiries de Perg montrent une colline noire avec 3 sommets sur fond rouge et un licorne couleur argent. Le rapport entre le licorne et la ville n'est pas connu ; peut-être s'agit-il d'une référence à un conte oublié de nos jours.)

La « Seifensiederhaus » (maison du savonnier) : La maison du fabricant de savon (incluant un atelier et une chaudière pour le bouillage) , située près du centre-ville, fut construite en 1563. De 1671 à 1879, elle hébergea une savonnerie. La façade de style Baroque avec ses belles décorations en stuc datent de 1720. Elle fut rénovée en l'an 2000.

« Perger Stainprecher » : La Ire teinturerie de Perg est mentionné en 1391.

« Martin Neugschwendner Geburtshaus » : À la maison natale de Martin Neugschwendner se trouve une plaque commémorative rappelant le geste courageux de cet homme, qui sauva la ville de Schrobenshausen de la mise à sac par des troupes anglaises et autrichiennes.

Le « Pranger » (pilori) : Cette colonne (un pilier de forme carrée, en granit) située sur la place principale de Perg fut érigé en 1583 (ou 1587) . Elle servait à exposer des condamnés au mépris et à l'indignation du public.

La « Heimathaus » : Le musée historique de Perg et de ses environs propose aux visiteurs une documentation impressionnante. Les pièces exposées mettent l'accent sur l'industrie de la pierre et des meules et sur l'exploitation des mines : des leviers importants de la région.

« Steinbrecherhaus » : La petite maison du casseur de pierres (qui travaille avec une meule) fut construite en 1802. Il s'agit d'une maison typique (avec un mobilier d'origine) de la famille d'un ouvrier qui travaillait dans les carrières meulières, située dans les anciennes carrières de Perg. Transformée en musée, en 2007, on y présente les conditions de vie de gens simples du passé.

« Erdstall Ratgöbluckn » : À quelques pas de la maison du « casse-pierres » se trouve une écurie troglodyte d'une longueur de 106 mètres qui date de 1,000 ans avant Jésus-Christ. Il s'agit d'une caverne avec un système de galeries, creusée par l'homme pour offrir à la population la possibilité de se cacher et de se retirer au cas d'une attaque ennemie. Elle est aujourd'hui classé site culturel patrimonial et se trouve sous la juridiction de la Société historique de Perg (« Heimatverein ») .

...

Der Erdstall Ratgöbluckn in Perg ist der größte gefahrlos begehbarer Erdstall im Mühlviertel.

Er befindet sich in der Stadtgemeinde Perg am Rand des Machlands im Bezirk Perg in Oberösterreich und steht als schützenswertes Kulturgut unter Denkmalschutz.

Der Erdstall befindet sich in dem 1881 vom Verschönerungsverein als Spazierweg angelegten, nach der Gemahlin Erzherzog Rudolfs, Prinzessin Stephanie von Belgien, benannten Stephaniehain. Es handelt sich in der äußeren Hälfte um ein in Sandstein und in der inneren Hälfte in Flins (verwitterter Granit) gehauenes, unterirdisches, stark verzweigtes Gänge- und Kammernsystem, das wie viele andere um ungefähr 1000 nach Christus als Zufluchts- und Versteckmöglichkeit angelegt wurde. Der ursprünglich angelegte Erdstall dürfte im Verlauf der Jahrhunderte um mehrere Kammern im vorderen Teil erweitert worden sein. 1905 veranlasste der damalige Bürgermeister von Perg, Michael Fries, daß der Erdstall durch Stützen und Mauerungen in den Gängen vor dem Einsturz bewahrt wurde.

Die Anlage wurde 1944 im Auftrag des Landrates Gustav Brachmann im Rahmen eines Schulprojektes unter der Leitung von Hauptschuldirektor Karl Stummer von Schülern der 4. Klasse Hauptschule Perg untersucht, vermessen und in einem Plan festgehalten :

Demnach hat das größtenteils ausreichend hohe und leicht begehbare Gängenetz eine Gesamtlänge von 106 Metern und besteht aus 22 Gangstücken beziehungsweise Röhren, die 8 Kammern oder breitere Räume miteinander verbinden, in denen sich 2 Sitz- und 19 Lichtnischen befinden. Die Gänge sind stark ansteigend angelegt, sodass zwischen Eingang und höchstem Punkt ein Niveauunterschied von 5,4 Metern besteht. Bei dieser gründlichen Erforschung ergaben sich keine Anhaltspunkte, daß der Erdstall, wie in einigen älteren Schriften angeführt, über Verbindungsgänge zu einer Burg der Herren von Perg auf dem Dollberg, zum Markt Perg oder zu der mehrere Kilometer von Perg entfernt gelegenen Burg Mitterberg verfügte.

1945 erfolgte auf Veranlassung des Marktgemeindeamtes der Verschluss des Erdstalls durch eine Mauer. 1973 fasste der Heimatverein Perg den Beschluss, den Erdstall wieder zugänglich zu machen. 1975 wurde ein neuer Eingang freigelegt, mit Granitsteinmauern abgesichert und mit einem schmiedeeisernen Tor abgeschlossen. Seit 1976 ist der Erdstall wieder für die Allgemeinheit zugänglich. Erst 2002 wurde im Erdstall eine elektrische Beleuchtung installiert, da sich die zuvor bei Führungen verwendeten Fackeln nachteilig für den Erhaltungszustand ausgewirkt haben. Im selben Jahr bildete der Erdstall die Kulisse für einen im Auftrag des ZDF gedrehten dreiteiligen Film über den 30-jährigen Krieg.

2011 drehte die Theatergruppe Mining einen Kurzfilm, der bei der Begleitausstellung zur Landesausstellung 2012 in einem Verlies sowie danach in einer Dauerausstellung gezeigt werden soll.

Die zu den Außenanlagen des Heimatmuseums Stadtmuseum Perg zählende Freilichtanlage gehört seit 1976 zu den schützenswerten Kulturgütern nach der Haager Konvention. 2009 wurde der Erdstall im Ensemble mit dem Mühlsteinbruch Scherer und dem Steinbrecherhaus mittels Bescheid unter Denkmalschutz gestellt und wird im Rahmen des Donauradwegs und des Donausteigs als Sehenswürdigkeit angeführt.

« Perger Mühlsteinbrecher » : La carrière de Perg est créée en 1582, sous le règne de l'Empereur Rodolphe II. Elle sera complètement en opération jusqu'en 1895. Elle sera fermée après la Première Guerre mondiale. Aujourd'hui, on peut visiter une partie du site.

Les ruines du « Mitterberger » se trouvent à l'est de Perg (à environ 45 minutes, en empruntant la piste de randonnée) . Déjà en 1673, ces ruines furent le sujet d'une gravure sur cuivre de l'artiste Clemens Beuttler. Aujourd'hui, on peut à peine discerner les restes en bois.

Les « Tranches de Manner » : Manner SA, le plus grand producteur de friandises en Autriche, produit ses gaufrettes « Mannerschnitten » (tranches de Manner) à Perg dans le plus grand four à gaufrettes du monde.

La Fête de Perg : La plus grande fête de l'année qui a toujours lieu à la fin de l'été avec des prestations de musique, des saltimbanques, des artistes de la rue, un programme pour enfants et, bien-sûr, tout pour le palais et l'estomac.

En 1969 (soit 700 ans après avoir obtenu le droit de marché) , Perg fut élevée au rang de ville. Depuis 1938, les communes de « Pergkirchen » et de « Weinzierl zu Perg » ont été incorporées à la commune de Perg.

Perg est une localité dans le « Land » de la Haute-Autriche. Elle est la capitale du district du même nom.

Le district de Perg est subdivisé en 26 communes :

Allerheiligen im Mühlkreis.

Arbing.

Bad Kreuzen.

Baumgartenberg.

Dimbach.

Grein.

Katsdorf.

Klam.

Langenstein.

Luftenberg an der Donau.

Mauthausen.

Mitterkirchen im Machland.

Münzbach.

Naarn im Machlande.

Pabneukirchen.

Perg.

Rechberg.

Ried in der Riedmark.

Saxen.

Schwertberg.

Sankt Georgen am Walde.

Sankt Georgen an der Gusen.

Sankt Nikola an der Donau.

Sankt Thomas am Blasenstein.

Waldhausen im Strudengau.

Windhaag bei Perg.

21 août 1884 : Le lendemain de la composition de son Prélude de Perg (« Perger Präludium ») , Anton Bruckner va esquisser 3 thèmes pour une improvisation à l'orgue en do mineur (« Bausteine zu seiner Lebensgeschichte ») à l'église du monastère de Kremsmünster.

Ire édition : Franz Gräflinger (1876-1962) . Reinhard Piper & Co. , Munich (1911) .

21 août 1884 : The « Perger Prelude » in C for organ of Anton Bruckner is performed for the 1st time, in Kremsmünster Abbey.

Fin d'été 1884 : En revenant de Bayreuth, Anton Bruckner décide de s'arrêter à Munich.

« Paixhanslia » et « Schlaraffia »

Mercredi, 3 septembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner devient membre honoraire (tout comme l'écrivain Franz Stelzhamer) du chapitre « Paixhanslia », le club local (« Reych ») n° 315 du mouvement « Schlaraffia ». L'origine du terme « Paixhanslia » provient du canon « Paixhans » qui sera récupéré comme symbole militant : l'esprit plaisantin et satyrique permet à ses membres de tirer à boulets rouges créant une brèche dans les remparts de l'hypocrisie. Les cérémonies sont des parodies des rituels militaires. Les membres portent des noms purement imaginaires. Cette association « pour hommes seulement » (généralement d'âge mûr et occupant des postes sécurisés) fera la promotion des arts, de la tolérance, de l'amitié et de la joie de vivre. Incidemment, il y a une certaine ressemblance avec la franc-maçonnerie.

La nomination de Bruckner au sein de « Paixhanslia » est dû au fait que Friedrich Hueber, son grand-neveu (dit « Trawi Trawi »), était un « chevalier » du chapitre (club local) de Vöcklabruck. Le Maître de Saint-Florian sera baptisé « Credo » (« Non confundare in æternam ») à cause de son « penchant » pour la piété et la dévotion. Parions que la bonne chair, la bière et la musique étaient au rendez-vous.

Personnalités membres du mouvement « Schlaraffia » (avec leur surnom)

Beethoven, Ludwig van : « Florestan » .

Erhardt, Heinz : « Alberich von Schalk » .

Ginzkey, Franz Karl : « Jakobus vom Attersee » .

Gœthe, Johann Wolfgang : « Faust » .

Grillparzer, Franz : « Jaromir » .

Haydn, Franz-Josef : « Symphonie » .

Jungmair, Rudolf : « Freidhof » .

Kaplan, Viktor : « Turbine » .

Löns, Hermann : « Mümmelmann » .

May, Karl : « Kara Ben Nemsî » .

Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus : « Don Juan » .

Petzelt, Otto : « Daheim » .

Rosegger, Peter : « Heimgarten » .

Rubens, Peter Paul (Oder) : « Malerfürst » .

Schiller, Friedrich : « Funke » .

Schubert, Franz : « Erbkönig » .

Stifter, Adalbert : « Hochwald » .

Stelzhamer, Franz : « Piesenham » .

Stolz, Robert : « Servus Du » .

Wagner, Richard : « Parsifal » .

Sans compter ...

Les compositeurs Alfred Grünfeld, Richard Bruno Heydrich, Karl Komzák junior, Franz Lehár, Hans Pfitzner et Oscar Straus.

Les directeurs du « Staatsoper » de Vienne, Wilhelm Jahn et Gustav Mahler.

Les chanteurs d'Opéra Walter Berry, Oskar Hillebrandt et Franz Innozenz Nachbaur.

Les musiciens Erwin Bootz, Norbert Pawlicki et Horst Winter.

Les acteurs Gustl Bayrhammer, Richard Eybner, Alexander Girardi, Konrad Adolf Hallenstein, Attila und Paul Hörbiger.

Les comédiens et écrivains Fritz Grünbaum, Fritz Riha et Peter Wehle.

Les écrivains Ludwig Ganghofer, Peter Rosegger, Eduard Schmidt-Weißfels, Albert Sixtus, Rudolf Stürzer, Karl Heinrich Tinti.

Les peintres Leo Sebastian Humer et Leopold Matzal.

Le criminaliste Max Edelbacher.

Le météorologue de la ZDF : Uwe Wesp.

L'histoire de « Paixhanslia »

L'ancêtre du club social « Paixhanslia » s'appelait « Lucke ». La gaieté et la bonne humeur y régnaient ; la musique et le chant avaient une place prépondérante.

« Paixhanslia » a été fondé en 1855 (4 ans avant son grand frère « Schlaraffia ») . Martin Brown, propriétaire d'entreprise, fut élu 1er président ; son surnom : « Capitaine Schnautzle ». Le quartier général du chapitre de Vöcklabruck reproduit à petite échelle un château Moyen-âgeux aux allures de taverne. On l'appelle le château de « Paixburg ». Le manuscrit de fondation (« Luckenbrief ») orne ses murs. L'endroit est le soubassement (double) du 22 et 22a de la Stadtplatz. L'édifice patrimonial a été scrupuleusement conservé selon les normes établies entre 1575 et 1625. En consultant un plan datant de 1700, on peut le qualifier d'imposante maison seigneuriale « jumelée » avec ses 2 pignons, ses 2 entrées et ... ses 2 caves. La partie secondaire du « château » occupe la cave de droite alors que la partie principale occupe celle de gauche (vue de la place publique) . Plus tard, les 2 espaces seront reliés par un passage étroit. Le bâtiment a changé plusieurs fois de propriétaire. Il a servi de centre communautaire, de caserne, d'école, de théâtre municipal, de bureau de district et de tribunal d'instance. Les parties sans voûte de la structure ont subi de multiples rénovations entre 1978 et 1982 mais la double cave en pierre est demeurée dans son état d'origine. Avant l'arrivée de « Paixhanslia », le soubassement a servi d'entrepôt de marchandises, d'armes, de charbon et de chambre à débarras.

Un poème humoristique de 8 strophes rédigé le 19 juillet 1862 par l'écrivain, romancier et compositeur Franz Stelzhamer (1802-1874) , intitulé « A lustige Eicht » (un joyeux étalon) , deviendra l'hymne officiel de « Paixhanslia » . La 1re strophe servira de devise. Stelzhamer qui a publié 270 poèmes (et qui est l'auteur de l'hymne national de la Haute-Autriche) résidait à Salzbourg l'hiver mais passait ses étés à Vöcklabruck. (Le manuscrit de « A lustige Eicht » se trouve aujourd'hui à la Bibliothèque de Haute-Autriche.)

Une adaptation sans génie pour chœur d'hommes sera composée par un membre du chapitre, le « Kapellmeister » du Liedertafel (orphéon) de Vöcklabruck, Anton David dit : « Paixhans Blasele » (né le 25 mai 1832 à Mauerkirchen) . Bruckner interviendra au niveau de la partition pour limiter les dégâts. C'est sa version « améliorée » qui ouvre encore aujourd'hui les réunions de la confrérie. (La mélodie d'Anton David a été intégrée au carillon d'Ebelsberger.)

« A lustigö eicht da herrgott selm gweicht » : singende jugend, G131 (1948) .

A'lustig Eicht

Hat da Hergott selm gweicht,
Selm gweicht und selm gsöngt,
Ruck'n Huat, wannsta göngt.

Und da sei aft der Narr nöt,

Der zifert und zöhlt,
Der'n Apfel eh arn anbeißt,
Zerst speidelt und schölt.

Vothua da koan - lazt
Zwögna - Nachat und Aft,
Hau, dö Bira, weil s' 'n hat,
Dadl laßt s' 'n, san Saft.

Zwanzger is Zwanzga.
der erst wie da löst
Floigt gern ab als wia's Vögerl
Bald's kann, aus'n Nöst.

Da erst und da löst
Hat ain'n Klang und ain'n Glanz,
Und vospielt oda gwunga,
Ganz ausggspielt wird d'Schanz.

Hat'n d'Kellnerin kripst,
Kringnt'n Spielleut, ain Ding !
Kains derf kenna, mein Geldkatz
Is s'schwar oda gring.

Mit an Juchatza kimmi
Mit an Kreuzsprung gehts furt,
« Schlick einö ! » « schleck obi ! »
Hm, Hadern ain Burd.

Drum a'lustigö Eicht
Hat da Herrgott selm gweicht,
Selm gweicht und selm gsöngt
Und a'Glück is 's, wenn s'gögnt.

(Vöcklabruck, 19 juillet 1862.)

Le docteur Franz Leitner est l'auteur de : « Anton Bruckner in Vöcklabruck » , édité en 1996.

L'historique de « Paixhanslia » (textes allemands)

1855 (vier Jahre vor der Gründung Schlaraffias) wurde in Vöcklabruck die « Paixhanslia » gegründet. Das Vereinslokal hieß Lucke. Die Aufnahme erfolgte durch Kugelung und anschließende Taufe.

An den Luckenabenden regierten in freundschaftlicher Geselligkeit Humor und Heiterkeit, Musik und Gesang. Ihr Ceremoniale war persiflierend dem Militärischen nachempfunden. Die Mitglieder trugen Phantasienamen.

Der erste Obmann der vorschlaraffischen « Paixhanslia » war der Fabrikbesitzer Martin Braun (Feldhauptmann Schnautzle) .

Bedeutende Bürger gehörten ihr an.

Große Söhne unserer Heimat wie Anton Bruckner und Franz Stelzhamer waren Ehrenmitglieder.

Der Name « Paixhanslia » wurde von der damals entwickelten Kanone Paixhans abgeleitet. Originalzitat aus der Zeitung Luckenteufel aus 1876 : « Ihr Zeichen ist die Kanone Paixhans, die " Paixhanslia " will damit andeuten, daß sie sich berufen fühle, durch eigenes Bestreben, durch Frohsinn und gute Laune, durch Witz und Satyre eine Bresche zu schießen in die Bollwerke des Zopfthums der Gleißnerei, Scheinheiligkeit, Wohldienerei und der melancholischen Kopfhängerei. » .

Die Kanone war nicht nur das Vereinssymbol in vorschlaraffischer Zeit, sie ist auch heute noch allgegenwärtig :

Im Paixwappen, als Ahne und beim Eintritt unserer Gäste, die mit einem Salut aus der Reichskanone begrüßt werden.

Kontakte zu Schlaraffenreichen ließen in den Paixhanseln die Überzeugung reifen, daß sie ihrem Wesen nach eigentlich Schlaraffen sind :

Am 10. Christmond anno Uhu 90 wurde die « Paixhanslia » als Reich Nummer 315 in den Weltbund « Schlaraffia » aufgenommen.

Das Vorgängerhaus und der Keller (Burg) wurden laut Baualtersplan des Bundesdenkmalamtes zwischen 1575 und 1625 erbaut. Die Paixburg ist demnach an die 400 Jahre alt. Laut einer Zeichnung aus 1700 war es ein stattliches Doppelhaus mit 2 Giebeln und 2 Einfahrten. Daraus erklärt sich auch der Grundriss unserer Burg, die eigentlich aus zwei Kellern besteht : Die Vorburg war der Keller des rechten Hauses und die Hauptburg der Keller des linken Hauses (vom Stadtplatz aus gesehen) . Später sind dann die beiden Keller mit einem schmalen Durchgang verbunden worden. Dieses Haus, das mehrfach den Eigentümer wechselte, diente als Bürgerhaus, Kaserne, Schule, städtisches Theater, Bezirkshauptmannschaft und Bezirksgericht.

Der Keller fand demnach Verwendung als Lagerraum für Waren aller Art, Waffen, Ausrüstung und Vorräte und zuletzt als Kohlenkeller und Rumpelkammer.

1978 bis 1982 wurde das Haus neu errichtet. Der Keller blieb erhalten.

Trotz einiger Innenveränderungen im Laufe der Jahrhunderte dürften die beiden Keller von Anfang an die derzeitige Größe und Gestalt gehabt haben, wofür die Bauweise des Gewölbes und die einheitlichen Baumaterialien sprechen. Alle Teile ohne Gewölbe sind 1978 bis 1982 neu erbaut worden (Eingang, Garderobe, Toiletten und Küche) .

L'historique de « Schlaraffia »

« Schlaraffia » (mouvement purement idéaliste et apolitique) n'a pas de buts fixes, ni d'ordre du jour. Les « Schlaraffen » croient fermement au respect entre les humains. Ils ne se soucient pas si un individu croit en Dieu ou non, ils ne tiennent pas compte de son statut professionnel ou de ses opinions politiques. Rivalité et jalousie n'ont pas leur place. L'humour et l'appréciation des arts demeurent des valeurs essentielles.

Les membres sont appelés « Schlaraffen » : des hommes généralement d'âge mûr occupant des postes sécurisés. Ils se rencontrent une fois la semaine, du 1er octobre au 30 avril.

La langue parlée durant les cérémonies est l'allemand. Les membres n'ont pas à être d'origine allemande mais ils doivent assez bien maîtriser la langue pour suivre ce qui se déroule.

« Sippungen » est le nom donné à la cérémonie « chevaleresque » qui s'y déroule : on dépeint le quotidien de manière satirique par des présentations littéraires et musicales.

Lors des « Sippungen », on utilise une langue archaïque (comme le Latin) à laquelle on introduit avec beaucoup de fantaisie des mots du vernaculaire. Par exemple : « poudre pot » veut dire pipe à tabac ; « essence cheval » veut dire voiture à moteur ; « château monstre » veut dire ... belle-mère !

Chaque chapitre doit afficher, à l'entrée de son « château », la « mascotte » (empaillée, sculptée ou peinte) du mouvement « Schlaraffia » : le grand aigle ou le hibou grand-duc (dit « bubon bubon ») . Les membres n'idolâtrèrent, ne prient, ni s'inclinent devant la créature. Il ne s'agit que de la parodie !

Un « Club des arts » de l'aristocratie pragoise, avec en son sein des membres de la noblesse des Habsbourg, bloquait systématiquement l'adhésion d'artistes populaires provenant du Théâtre allemand. Ces derniers réagirent au snobisme arrogant de la classe supérieure. Une association sera mise sur pied afin de promouvoir la création, la vertu, la sagesse, l'amitié et l'humour. Son nom : « Schlaraffia » (un mot insignifiant) . Ce terrain de jeu « intemporel » qui regroupent les communautés de langue allemande prendra plaisir à se moquer de la noblesse, de l'autorité et surtout ... de sois-même.

Les quelque 280 « Reychs » (chapters) demeurent toujours en étroit contact. Chaque « Schlaraffe » (membre) est le bienvenu partout dans le réseau.

Les « prétendants » doivent être parrainés par un « Schlaraffe » . Une période de probation est obligatoire avant le grand jour du vote. Les nouveaux élus devront amorcer leur ascension au bas de l'échelle passant de « fripon » à « écuyer » à « chevalier » . Parmi les personnalités connues, citons : Franz Lehár, Gustl Bayrhammer et Peter Rosegger.

Le mouvement « Schlaraffia » n'englobait à l'origine que les pays germanophones. Il fut fondé le 10 octobre 1859, avec le soutien d'un groupe d'artistes et d'amis des arts, de la musique et de la littérature (suite à l'intolérance en cours en Europe au 19^e siècle) , par Franz Thomé, directeur depuis 1842 du Théâtre National de Prague, en Bohême (une province de l'Empire Austro-Hongrois) .

L'acteur, metteur-en-scène et directeur de théâtre Francis Thomé est né le 24 novembre 1807 à Vienne et est décédé le 22 mai 1872 à Prague. Thomé a fait ses débuts à l'âge de 17 ans à Vienne. Il sera actif dans différents théâtres de la ville comme acteur ou metteur-en-scène. Il se joint à la Compagnie d'Opéra allemand et passe un peu de temps à Paris. En 1837, il reçoit une offre du Théâtre de Pest. Après un court séjour à Nuremberg, il devient directeur des scènes de Klagenfurt, Ljubljana et Trieste. Puis, il dirige les théâtres de Graz et de Riga. De 1858 à 1866, il est à la tête du Théâtre national de Prague et en profite pour fonder le Nouveau Théâtre. De 1867 à 1870, il est directeur du Théâtre de Linz. Il retourne ensuite de nouveau à Prague.

« Schlaraffia » était devenue une Société internationale largement reconnue et en pleine expansion. Avant le début de la Première Guerre mondiale, elle totalisera plus de 197 chapitres, principalement en Allemagne et en Autriche mais aussi en Amérique du Nord (San Francisco, Milwaukee, New York, Chicago, Newark, Cincinnati, Philadelphie, Jersey City, Cleveland, New Haven, Boston, Clifton, Buffalo, Washington et Denver) .

Le conflit viendra tout changé. À partir de 1918, plusieurs chapitres en Europe et à l'étranger cesseront leurs activités à cause du nouveau contexte politique.

Les idéaux de « Schlaraffia » permettront l'arrivée de plus de 100 nouveaux chapitres entre 1919 et 1937, principalement en Allemagne et dans les nouveaux pays de l'Est qui ont émergé de la monarchie des Habsbourg. En 1937, le mouvement va subir un dur coup lorsque le Chancelier Adolf Hitler ordonne la fermeture et la dissolution de tous les locaux de « Schlaraffia » en Allemagne et en Autriche. (Seuls les chapitres en Suisse, en Amérique du Nord et en Amérique du Sud vont demeurer actifs.)

Après la Deuxième Guerre mondiale, les Communistes d'Europe de l'Est interdisent à leur tour les activités de « Schlaraffia » qui continueront dorénavant dans la clandestinité. Les américains, eux, se méfient de leur présence à cause de la grande quantité de germanophones. Tout cela était évidemment absurde et sans fondement.

Alors qu'à l'origine la plupart des membres étaient des artistes, l'échantillonnage contemporain va des chanteurs d'Opéra, aux acteurs de théâtre, aux peintres, aux ingénieurs, aux inventeurs, aux ouvriers et aux enseignants. Ils se disent tous des « descendants » des derniers chevaliers Romantiques. Leur approche n'a rien de dogmatique mais empreinte de subtilité. Ce qui a permis au mouvement de survivre malgré les crises de l'Histoire.

Aujourd'hui, on retrouve des chapitres en Allemagne, en Autriche, en Suisse, en Italie, en Espagne, en France, en Belgique, en Suède, aux États-Unis, au Canada, au Mexique, au Venezuela, en Colombie, en Équateur, au Brésil, en Argentine, en Thaïlande, en Afrique du Sud et en Australie.

Le siège social se trouve à Berne, en Suisse. Un conseil général composé de 15 membres représente les 5 zones de « Schlaraffia » : Allemagne, Autriche, Suisse, Amérique du Nord, Amérique latine. Au total : 261 chapitres.

Le nombre total de « Schlaraffen » s'élève à environ 11,000.

Les 26 chapitres nord-américains représentent 666 membres.

...

The « Schlaraffia » movement is a world-wide German-speaking Society founded by Franz Thomé in 1859, in Prague (then, Bohemia, part of the Austrian Empire) , with a pledge of friendship, art and humour.

The « Schlaraffen » , members of a men's organization (many of a mellow age and in secure positions) , meet in mid-winter (from 1 October to 30 April) once per week in their « Schlaraffen » castle (equipped in the style of a knight's tavern from the Middle-Ages) for « Sippungen » (gatherings which take place in the fixed ceremonial form of a knight's play) . In doing so, everyday life is satirized as well as kept alive through recitations of literary and musical forms. An antiquated language with its own vernacular for everyday things (« Schlaraffen » Latin - for example : « powder pot » for tobacco pipe ; « gasoline horse » for car ; « castle monster » for mother-in-law) gives the « Sippungen » their own humorous note. The approximately 280 « reychs » (local clubs) stay in close contact with one another. Each Schlaraffe is always welcome in every reych in the world.

« Reychs » currently exist in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, France, Belgium, Sweden, the United States of America, Canada, Mexico, Venezuela, Colombia, Ecuador, Brazil, Argentina, Thailand, South Africa, and Australia. The total number of « Schlaraffen » amounts to about 11,000. New members must be introduced by a « Schlaraffe » (godfather) , complete a probationary period before a general vote is recorded, and start their career as knave, which leads from the position of squire to knight.

Important artists were and are Schlaraffen (for example, Franz Lehár, Gustl Bayrhammer, Richard Bruno Heydrich, Leopold Matzal, Peter Rosegger and many more) .

Their « mascot » is the eagle owl (« bubo bubo ») symbolizing wisdom, virtue and humour (the owl itself represents knowledge and wisdom) .

...

The « Schlaraffia » Society was founded in 1859, in Prague, Bohemia, which, at that time, was part of the Austrian-Hungarian Monarchy. It was the lack of tolerance during the 19th Century in Europe that spurred its founding. A high-society arts-club in the city which had among its members nobility from the Hapsburg monarchy, routinely rejected the membership of a well-known performing artists from the German Theater. The fellow German artist saw that as a wanton act of snobbishness and arrogance of the upper-class society, and promptly formed their own artist's round table, the 1st « Schlaraffia » : a name with no real meaning. With this, they formed a timeless playing field for men who cherish friendship and humour, and who devote themselves to the arts in the widest sense of interpretation. Within the framework of a joyfull and humorous play, they poked fun at the nobilities and authorities and most of all at themselves.

In 1914, before the start of the First World War, « Schlaraffia » had grown to 197 Chapters, mostly in Germany and Austria, but also in North America (with Chapters in San Francisco, Milwaukee, New York, Chicago, Newark, Cincinnati, Philadelphia, Jersey City, Cleveland, New Haven, Boston, Clifton, Buffalo, Washington, and Denver) , and other European countries around German speaking artist and communities. « Schlaraffia » had developed into an international Society with broad recognition and growing fast. The War changed this bright picture. Many Chapters in post-War Europe but also abroad closed due to political reasons, the 1st time « Schlaraffia » had to pay tribute to the political environment.

Nevertheless, the ideals of « Schlaraffia » defied the politics and the Society grew by over 100 new Chapters, between 1919 and 1937, mainly in Germany and the new Eastern European countries. However, in 1937, « Schlaraffia » suffered a major blow to its existence, when Adolf Hitler ordered the closing and dissolution of all « Schlaraffia » Chapters, in Germany and Austria. Only the Chapters in Switzerland, North and South America were still in existence and meeting regularly.

After the War, members in Eastern Europe had to meet secretly because « Schlaraffia » was outlawed by the Communists. Also in the United States, « Schlaraffia » was looked upon with suspicion from time to time, when many a politician viewed U.S. citizens of German descent with mistrust. All this was ungrounded and proved to be total nonsense. « Schlaraffia » has no goals, it is not a lodge or fraternity pursuing whatever agenda. « Schlaraffia » is an idealistic Society based on friendship and tolerance. The members, called « Schlaraffen » , firmly believe in the give and take between human beings. They don't care if and where a man prays, what profession he has or what his political views are. Rivalry and jealousy have no place. Humour and the appreciation of arts are essential values. While originally most of the members were artists, today's « Schlaraffia » rosters range from Opera singers and actors to painters, engineers, inventors, factory workers and teachers, who all think of themselves as the last knights of Romantic past Centuries. They do not consider everything and in particular themselves with profound seriousness, but always try to give each other joy and friendship through the arts and with subtle humour.

Therefore, it is not surprising that the ideals and values of « Schlaraffia » survived near annihilation. The Society resurrected from the ashes of the Second World War strongly and, 155 years after its founding, is young and real as before. The umbrella organization, called « Allschlaraffia » is headquarterd in Berne, Switzerland. Today, a 15-member board represents the 5 zones of « Schlaraffia » : Germany, Austria, Switzerland, North America and Latin America with a grand total of 261 Chapters. The 26 Chapters in North America have 586 members. The language spoken during the meetings world-wide is German, however, the members do not have to be Germans, but must know the language well enough to follow the meetings.

One additional observation is noteworthy :

The embodiment of wisdom, humour and virtue for « Schlaraffia » is the « Eagle-Owl » . Every Chapter has a stuffed or carved large eagle-owl as « Schlaraffia » 's symbol on display right next to the entrance of the meeting-room. When « Schlaraffen » bow to this symbol before they start their meeting, they do not pray to an owl, they do not show reference to a stuffed bird, they bow to the sphere of a playing field, they bow to theirs and the others desire to start the evening in « Schlaraffia » and they say with a winking eye :

« I am ready, let's play ! »

...

Die Schlaraffia ist eine am 10. Oktober 1859 in Prag gegründete, weltweite deutschsprachige Vereinigung zur Pflege von Freundschaft, Kunst und Humor. Das Wort « Schlaraffe » soll vom mittelhochdeutschen Wort « Slur-Affe » abgeleitet sein, was damals so viel hieß wie « sorgloser Genießer » (vergleiche Schlaraffenland) . Der Wahlspruch der Vereinigung lautet « In arte voluptas » (etwa : in der Kunst liegt Vergnügen) . Der Begriff « Schlaraffia » ist durch den « Allschlaraffenrat » (Vorstand des weltweiten Verbandes « Allschlaraffia ») markenrechtlich geschützt worden und kann demnach mit einem ® in allen Veröffentlichungen des Vereines geführt werden. Zu anderen Markennamen, die den Begriff Schlaraffia enthalten (etwa Schlaraffia-Matratzen) gibt es keinen Bezug. Eine Verbindung zur Freimaurerei besteht nicht, und auch von Service-Clubs, wie etwa Lions-Club oder Rotary International sowie von Karnevalsvereinen und ähnlichen Vereinigungen grenzen sich Schlaraffen deutlich ab. In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus sowie später unter der Regierung der DDR mußten viele « Reyche » zwangsweise den Vereinsbetrieb einstellen und konnten nur in sehr vereinzelt Fällen durch geheime Treffen in sicherer Umgebung (meist Privatwohnungen) diese Zeiten überstehen. Durch die Flucht und Vertreibung Deutscher aus Mittel- und Osteuropa 1945-1950 kam es in der Bundesrepublik zu vielen Neugründungen.

Als 1859 der Direktor des Deutschen (Landständischen) Theaters, Franz Thomé, einen seiner jungen Künstler, den Bassisten Albert Eilers (1830-1896) , in die Prager Künstlervereinigung « Arcadia » einführen wollte, wurde dieser wegen seiner Mittellosigkeit als angeblicher Proletarier abgelehnt. Aus Protest gründeten Eilers und seine Theaterkollegen einen Stammtisch, den sie spöttisch « Proletarier-Club » benannten. Daraus entwickelte sich nach manchen Umwegen und Rückschlägen die heutige weltumspannende « Schlaraffia » .

Die Schlaraffen, ein Männerbund (« ... ausschließlich Männer in gesicherter Position ... ») , treffen sich in der sogenannten Winterung (Nordhalbkugel : 1. Oktober bis 30. April ; Südhalbkugel : 1. Mai bis 30. Oktober) einmal pro Woche an einem festgelegten Wochentag in ihrer « Schlaraffenburg » , dem im Stil eines mittelalterlichen Rittersaales ausgestatteten Vereinslokal, zu Sippungen. Diese Zusammenkünfte werden nach festgelegtem Zeremoniell in Form eines Ritterspieles mit wohlgedachten Regeln in zwei Teilen (einem im Ablauf stets gleichen, auf wiederkehrende Regularien bedachten ersten und einem freier zu gestaltenden, eher künstlerischen zweiten) abgehalten. Sturmhauben, Helme und Rüstungen sind aus buntem Stoff in den festgelegten Reychsfarben, die Waffen wie Junkerdolch oder Ritterschwert zumeist aus Holz. Während der Sippungen wird sowohl der Alltag persifliert als auch durch Vorträge in literarischer bzw. musikalischer oder künstlerisch-darstellender Form (Fechtsungen genannt) das Interesse an der Kunst wachgehalten. Eine antiquierte Sprache mit eigenen Ausdrücken für alltägliche Dinge (Schlaraffenlatein) gibt den Sippungen ihre eigene, humorvolle Note. Alles außerhalb des schlaraffischen Spieles ist « profan » / die « Profanei » .

Schlaraffisches Symbol für Weisheit, Humor und Tugend ist der Uhu, der in jeder Burg zu finden ist. Beim Betreten derselben grüßen die Schlaraffen ihn mit einer tiefen Verbeugung, was zugleich das Abstreifen « profaner Schlacken » (also das Sich-ganz-Einlassen auf das schlaraffische Spiel) symbolisiert. Auch gehört eine besondere Zeitrechnung zum schlaraffischen Spiel : Im Gegensatz etwa zur Zeitrechnung nach christlichem Maßstab (nach Christus oder A.D.) orientieren sich Schlaraffen am Gründungsjahr ihrer Vereinigung - demzufolge bezeichnen sie 2012 als das Jahr a.U. (« anno Uhui ») 153.

Obgleich die Schlaraffia vielerorts ein eher zurückgezogener Idealverein ist, treten einige Reych (Vereine) mit öffentlichen Kulturveranstaltungen in ihren Heimorten auf. So betreibt zum Beispiel die Schlaraffia Oldenburgia (Oldenburg) seit 2004 eine Kleinkunsthöhne und veranstaltet Sonntagsmatinee mit Konzerten, Kabarett, Lesung und Theater.

Alle Rahmenbedingungen des schlaraffischen Spieles sind im Regelwerk « Schlaraffen-Spiegel und Ceremoniale » festgelegt. Die Bezeichnung Spiegel für « Gesetzeswerk » spielt auf eine seit der griechischen Antike vielfach neu belebte literarische Tradition an. Man hält sich selbst, einem Fürsten oder einer ethnischen Gemeinschaft den Spiegel vor, um zu erkennen, wer man sei - beziehungsweise wer und wie man sein sollte (vergleiche Spiegel - Literatur) .

Diese offizielle Satzung des Weltverbandes « Allschlaraffia » , die seit 1867 in verschiedenen Neuauflagen überarbeitet und den neuen politischen Verhältnissen angepasst wurde, ist durch die große Tradition von Fürstenspiegel, Sachsenspiegel, Narrenspiegel, Eulenspiegel, Ritterspiegel und Märchenspiegel präformiert worden.

Für Außenstehende sind Schlaraffen außerhalb ihrer Sippungen an der « Rolandnadel » , einer kleinen weißen Perle, die am linken Revers getragen wird, oder an einem am Fahrzeug befestigten Aufkleber erkennbar, der einen blinzelnden Uhukopf zeigt.

Der Gruß der Schlaraffen lautet Lulu. Das lautmalerische Kunstwort wird in den Sippungen auch als eine Interjektion (Einwurf) der Zustimmung und des Lobes verwendet. Nach dem Volkskundler Erich Kaessmayer gibt es für den Gruß zwei Erklärungen :

Es ist die Abkürzung der Übersetzung von « Spielt das Spiel ! » ins Lateinische - « ludum ludite ! »

Da fast alle Gründungsmitglieder der Praga (siehe unten « Reych ») Bühnenprofis waren, verwendeten sie passende Textzitate in ihren heiteren Stammtischgesprächen. Aus Schillers « Wallensteins Lager » wurde die Textzeile « Lustig, lustig, da kommen die Prager ! » zitiert. Als Kurzform blieb schließlich « Lulu » übrig.

Die Buchstabenumkehr « Ulul » bedeutet einen Zuruf der Ablehnung und des Tadels.

Örtliche Gruppen der Schlaraffia in Städten werden von Schlaraffen « Reyche » genannt. Das erste Schlaraffenreych entstand in Prag (deshalb « Praga » genannt) , von deutschen Künstlern gegründet. Dort war ihre letzte Heimstatt in der Stefansgasse (Stepanska ul.) 36 (jetzt Hotel Alcron) . Inzwischen existieren weltweit derzeit 261 « Reyche » und « Colonien » (lokale Vereine) , in denen ausschließlich Deutsch gesprochen wird (wobei die Mitglieder keineswegs Deutsche sein müssen) und die in engem Kontakt zueinander stehen. Sie sind in der « Allschlaraffia » zusammengefasst, welche auch die « Allschlaraffische Stammrolle » herausgibt, ein über 1200 Seiten umfassendes Buch, das jeder Schlaraffe jährlich aktualisiert erhält und das einen Überblick über alle (auch untergegangenen) Reyche, Colonien und ihre Vorstufen (Stammtisch und Feldlager) sowie die « Sassen » (Mitglieder) bietet. Jeder Schlaraffe ist in jedem Reych der Welt jederzeit willkommen.

Momentan bestehen Reyche in Deutschland, Österreich, der Schweiz, Italien, Spanien, Frankreich, Belgien, Schweden, den USA, Kanada, Mexiko, Venezuela, Kolumbien, Ecuador, Brasilien, Argentinien, Thailand, Südafrika und Australien. Die einzelnen Reyche und Colonien sind in der Reihenfolge ihres Entstehungsdatums nummeriert.

Neue Mitglieder müssen durch einen Schlaraffen-Ritter (« Pate ») als « Pilger » eingeführt werden und eine Prüflingszeit absolvieren, ehe sie durch allgemeine Abstimmung, die sogenannte Kugelung, aufgenommen werden und als Knappe ihre Laufbahn beginnen, die über den Stand des Junkers zum Ritter führt (Ritterschlag) . Im Jahr 2013 sind rund 10.300 Schlaraffen in der gültigen Stammrolle registriert, davon im LV (Landesverband) Austria 2.519 ; im LV Deutschland 6.517 ; im LV Helvetica 466 ; im LV Lateinamerika 198 ; im LV Nordamerika 608. (Stand : 1. Juni 2013.)

Die schlaraffischen Zusammenkünfte werden Sippung genannt (das Verb lautet sippen) und laufen überall nach dem gleichen Muster ab. Sie bestehen aus zwei Teilen :

Der erste Teil ist den « Amtshandlungen » gewidmet. Dazu gehören die feierliche Eröffnung der Sippung durch den fungierenden Oberschlaraffen, die Begrüßung der eingerittenen Gäste, das heißt Sassen anderer Reyche, die Verlesung des amtlichen Protokolls der vergangenen Sippung durch den Marschall sowie eines nicht-amtlichen Protokolls (« NAP ») durch einen in der Woche zuvor bestimmten Sassen.

Nach dem Abschluß des ersten Teils folgt eine Schmus- und Atzungspause. Während derselben oder auch schon während des ersten Teils wird die Fechsungsliste heringereicht, auf welche sich jeder Sasse eintragen kann, der plant, im zweiten Teil auf die Rostra (Rednerpult) zu steigen und etwas vorzutragen.

Im zweiten Teil der Sippung werden Fechsungen vorgetragen, das heißt, jeder kann etwas zum Besten geben - gleich ob Prosa, in Versform oder musikalisch (Ausnahme : lediglich Witze zu erzählen, ist verpönt) . Dies kann etwas Gefechstes, also Selbstverfasstes, sein, oder man trägt ein Werk eines anderen Autors vor. Die Sippungen stehen in vielen Fällen unter einem besonderen Thema, zu dem man etwas fechten kann, aber nicht muß.

Einen Überblick über alle Veranstaltungen samt Kontaktdaten bietet die Broschüre Sippungsfolgen, welche jährlich vom ASR herausgegeben wird.

Die Schlaraffia zeichnet sich, wie oben schon angedeutet, durch eine eigene Sprache aus, die Schlaraffenlatein genannt wird, obschon die schlaraffische Sprache auf der ganzen Welt das Deutsche ist. Dieses Deutsch enthält eine Reihe von bewusst altertümlich gewählten Ausdrücken und Wendungen, die die ritterliche, mittelalterliche Atmosphäre hervorheben sollen. Dazu gehört auch die Anrede « Ihr », die während der Sippungen durchwegs zu verwenden ist, auch wenn man sich in der « Profanei » duzt.

Ein paar Beispiele des Schlaraffenlateins :

Atzung und Labung = Essen und Trinken (Verben : atzen und laben) .

Quell = Bier.

Lethe = Wein.

Schaumlethe = Sekt.

Schmauchtopf = Tabakspfeife.

Lunte = Zigarre.

Luntette = Zigarette.

Bangk = Rhythmische Ehrerweisung, die einem Schlaraffen entgegengebracht wird.

Pön = Geldstrafe, die verhängt wird, wenn man sich ungebührlich verhält oder gegen Spiegel und Ceremoniale verstößt (Verb : pönen ; von lateinisch poena, Strafe) .

Benzinross = Auto.

Benzinelefant = Reisebus.

Dampfross = Eisenbahn.

Troß = Familie.

Burgfrau = Ehefrau.

Burgschreck = Schwiegermutter.

Burgwonne = Freundin Lebensgefährtin.

Burgmaid = Tochter.

Burgknäpplein = Sohn.

Clavicimbel = Klavier.

Zinkenmeister = Derjenige, der das Clavicimbel bedient.

Seufzerholz = Geige.

Kniewinsel = Violoncello.

Minneholz = Gitarre.

Quasselstrippe = Telefon.

Sendbote = Brief.

Sendwisch = Postkarte.

Krystalline = Geselliges Zusammensein außerhalb der Sippungen.

Vademecum = Jährlich erscheinende Broschüre, die alle Angaben und Veranstaltungshinweise des herausgebenden Reyches enthält.

Stammrolle = Mitgliederverzeichnis.

Rüstung = Helm und Schärpe, eventuell Rittermantel.

Schwalbenschwanz = Frack.

Grabinschrift für Eduard Schmidt-Weißfels am Stadtfriedhof Bozen-Oberau mit Schlaraffia-Nennung.

Künstler, Schauspieler, Schriftsteller und andere Persönlichkeiten des öffentlichen Lebens waren und sind Schlaraffen, unter anderen :

Der Prager Theaterdirektor Franz Thomé, Gründer der Schlaraffia.

Die Komponisten Nico Dostal, Alfred Grünfeld, Karl Komzák junior, Franz Lehár, Hans Pfitzner, Oscar Straus.

Die Direktoren der Wiener Staatsoper Wilhelm Jahn, Gustav Mahler.

Die Opernsänger Anton Arnold, Eduard Bachmann, Walter Berry, Oskar Hillebrandt, Franz Innozenz Nachbaur, Louis Treumann (Operette und Schauspiel) , Fritz Windgassen.

Die Musiker Erwin Bootz, Joseph Keilberth, Norbert Pawlicki, Otto Schulhof, Horst Winter.

Die Schauspieler Gustl Bayrhammer, Roland Eugen Beiküfner, Richard Eybner, Alexander Girardi, Konrad Adolf Hallenstein, Attila und Paul Hörbiger.

Die Schriftsteller Ludwig Ganghofer, Rudolf Lothar, Karl Morré, Peter Rosegger, Eduard Schmidt-Weißenfels, Albert Sixtus, Rudolf Stürzer, Karl Heinrich Tinti.

Die Bildhauer Hans Brandstetter und Bernhard Kremser.

Die Architekten Ludwig Baumann, Richard Gach.

Die Maler Leo Sebastian Humer, Hugo Kunz und Jochen Kusber.

Der Kriminalist Max Edelbacher.

Der ZDF-Meteorologe Uwe Wesp.

Die Kabarettisten und Texter Fritz Grünbaum, Fritz Riha, Peter Wehle.

Der Kinderchirurg Hans Peter Hümmer.

Im Rahmen des Schlaraffenspieles werden darüber hinaus auch zahlreiche, nicht mehr lebende Persönlichkeiten namentlich verewigt, indem sie postum zu Ehrenscharaffen (ES) erkoren und immer wieder rezitiert werden, so zum Beispiel Heinz Erhardt (ES Alberich von Schalk) , Hermann Löns (ES Mümmelmann) , Robert Stolz (ES Servus Du) , Johann Wolfgang von Goethe (ES Faust) , Friedrich von Schiller (ES Funke) , Karl May (ES Kara Ben Nemesi) oder Peter Paul Rubens (ES Malerfürst) .

...

Schlaraffia ist eine erträumte und ersonnene humane Welt. Schlaraffia ist eine inniglich-herzlich-in-sich verbundene Gemeinschaft. Schlaraffia ist eine treue Gemeinschaft mit dem Hauptgrundsatz der Hochhaltung der Freundschaft.

Schlaraffia ist eine geistige Gemeinschaft mit dem Bestreben reine Freude am Edeltum der Künste und feines Ergötzen am liebevollen Wesen des Humors zu pflegen.

Schlaraffia ist eine fröhliche Gemeinschaft in der sich die Herzen öffnen zur Jubelhymne der Lebensfreude.

Ritter der lustigen Eicht

Ritter-der-lustigen-EichtStatut für die Verleihung des Willkomm-Ordens « Ritter der lustigen Eicht » .

Artikel 1

Das Reych Schlaraffia Paixhanslia an der Vechlapruggen stiftet den Willkomm-Orden « Ritter der lustigen Eicht » .

Artikel 2

Diese Stiftung soll :

Die Freundschaft unter den Sassen vertiefen.

Den Kontakt zu den oberösterreichischen Reychen pflegen.

Das ehrende Andenken bewahren an den unvergessenen großen oberösterreichischen Mundartdichter Franz Stelzhamer, Ehrenscharaffe Piesenham, der Ehrenmitglied der Paixhanslia war und ihr das Lied « A lustigö Eicht » als Motto gewidmet hat.

Artikel 3

Der Orden besteht aus einer runden Metallplakette, Durchmesser 6 centimeter, mit der Umschrift « 315 Paixhanslia - Ritter der lustigen Eicht » am äußeren goldfarbenen Teil. In der Mitte ist ein Bildnis des Mundartdichters Franz Stelzhamer auf einem silberfarbenen Teil dargestellt. Die beiden verschiedenfarbigen Teile des Ordens sind durch 8 freistehende Stege miteinander verbunden.

Er wird als Halsorden an einem 30 millimeter breitem Band in den Reychsfarben rot-schwarz-rot getragen.

Artikel 4

Der Orden wird verliehen, wenn in einer Winterung in allen oberösterreichischen Schlaraffenreychen zumindest einmal eingeritten und eine humorvolle Fechsung dargebracht wird.

Ritter der schönen oberösterreichischen Reyche :

Linzia 13 ; Styria 32 ; Ovilabis 132 ; Gamundia 205 ; Scardinga 211 ; Iscula 215 ; Brundunum 234 ; Castellum Palustre 314 ; Paixhanslia a.d.V. 315 ; Castellum Erolatium 380 ; müßen diese Bedingungen jedoch in zwei Winterungen erfüllen, um diesen Orden verliehen zu bekommen.

Artikel 5

Für die Anrechnung der Einritte ist maßgebend, daß an einem Sippungstag nur ein Reyche besucht werden darf. Es zählen alle Sippungen ab der Winterung « anno Uhui » 146/147, die im Vademekum eine Sippungsnummer tragen und vor der Verleihungssippung im Hohen Reyche Paixhanslia stattfinden. Die Verleihungssippung im Hohen Reyche Paixhanslia zählt nicht dazu.

Artikel 6

Der Orden wird gegen Berappung der Gestehungskosten verliehen.

Artikel 7

Die Verleihung findet nur einmal in einer Winterung (im Ostermond) im Hohen Reyche Paixhanslia statt. Die Verleihung erfolgt nur in dieser im Vademekum vermerkten Sippung durch den fungierenden Oberschlaraffen.

Artikel 8

Der Orden kann nur an Ritter verliehen werden. Einritte als Knappen und Junker werden jedoch nach dem Ritterschlag angerechnet.

Artikel 9

Der Nachweis der Einritte geschieht durch den Schlaraffenpaß.

Die Ordenswerber haben spätestens drei Wochen vor der Verleihungssippung dem Marschall der Paixhanslia eine Einrittliste vorzulegen, aus der die besuchten Reyche, das Datum der Einritte und die Bestätigung der Richtigkeit hervorgehen. Um die Bestätigung der Richtigkeit auf Grund des Schlaraffenpasses wird der Kantzler des Reyches, dem der Ordenswerber angehört, ersucht.

Artikel 10

Über die Verleihung wird eine Urkunde ausgestellt. Unterfertigung erfolgt nach den üblichen Regeln für Ordensurkunden.

Artikel 11

Die Ordensmatrikel ist vom Marschall des Hohen Reych Paixhanslia zu führen.

Artikel 12

Der Schriftverkehr über den Orden ist vom Kantzelar des Hohen Reych Paixhanslia zu führen. Er verständigt auch die jeweiligen Landesverbände Allschlaraffias von der Verleihung.

Artikel 13

Die Verwaltung (Anschaffung) der Orden erfolgt durch den Wappen- und Adelsmarschall des Hohen Reych Paixhanslia.

Artikel 14

Die Eintragung in die Stammrolle lautet : « Ritter der lustigen Eicht » .

Gegeben im Hohen Reych Paixhanslia an der Vechlapruggen im Lenzmond « anno Uhui » 146.

Änderung des Statuts (Artikel 4) .

Gegeben im Hohen Reych Paixhanslia an der Vechlapruggen im Lethemond « anno Uhui » 152.

Genehmigt vom ASR am 15. des Windmondes « anno Uhui » 152.

Qualm

ASR

Vorsitzender des SRA.

Was ist Schlaraffia ?

Schlaraffia ist eine weltweite Vereinigung von Männern, die der Pflege von Kunst, Freundschaft und Humor verpflichtet sind. Ihr Leitspruch heisst « In arte voluptas » , « In der Kunst liegt das Vergnügen » .

Sollte mich je ein Unwissender fragen :

Was macht ihr Schlaraffen ? Ich würde ihm sagen :

Wir sind Freunde, musisch meist,
Lachen gerne über Spaß mit Geist.

Wir sitzen beisammen, es wird nicht geprahlt,
Wer mehr verdient, wer mehr bezahlt.

Es gilt nicht das Alter, nicht die Position,
Dafür mehr der Stil, der gute Ton.

Alles Dinge, die in der heutigen Zeit
Registriert werden unter « Vergangenheit » .

Wenn andere meinen, sowas kann man nur träumen,
Sei ihnen gesagt, daß sie vieles versäumen,

Wenn sie nicht, wie wir seit Jahren,
Der Welt zum Trotz, dies alles bewahren.

Wenn Sie selbst gerne rezitieren, musizieren, dichten, komponieren, zuhören und zusehen, gerne malen, zaubern oder anderen Künsten nachgehen dann bietet Ihnen Schlaraffia ein Forum, das Ihnen mit Toleranz, Geist, und Humor ein Wunderland des Geistes eröffnet. Die Beiträge der Sassen (Mitglieder Schlaraffias) sind teils ernst, teils heiter und sollten humorvollen Ergänzungen, Kommentaren und Wortspielen durch die Zuhörerschaft durchaus Raum geben.

Heute gibt es circa 260 Reyche (Ortsvereine der Schlaraffen) mit über 10.000 Mitgliedern in Europa davon überwiegend in Deutschland, Österreich, Schweiz, Nord- und Südamerika, Südafrika, Thailand und Australien. In jedem dieser Reyche wird deutsch gesprochen.

Wenn Sie gerne zuhören wollen, wenn Sie bereit sind Leistungen anderer Sassen tolerant zu würdigen und sich einige Stunden nicht über Politik, Beruf und Religion zu unterhalten, dann sollten Sie den nächsten Schritt tun und sich weiter über Schlaraffia informieren.

Wie entstand Schlaraffia ?

Schlaraffia wurde 1859 in Prag gegründet. Dort traf sich eine zunächst vorwiegend aus Künstlern bestehende Runde, die nicht nur den schönen Künsten huldigte, sondern mit satirischer Lust die Überheblichkeit des Adels und die dünkelfhafte Titels- und Ordenssucht des tonangebenden Beamtentums aufs Korn nahm.

Damals wie heute geht es uns Schlaraffen um die Persiflage der alltäglichen « Wichtigkeiten » , die wir im normalen Leben eigentlich gar nicht mehr erkennen, in denen wir aber praktisch gefangen sind. Es geht darum, diese alltäglichen « Wichtigkeiten » spielerisch zu überzeichnen, aufzubauschen, dadurch erkennbar zu machen, sie durch den Kakao zu ziehen und damit uns und unser Umfeld ein wenig auf den Arm zu nehmen, ohne zu verletzen. Wer dabei erkennt, daß man sich selbst nicht so ernst und so wichtig nehmen sollte, daß man auch über sich selbst lachen kann, der hat fast schon das ganze Spiel begriffen.

Gibt es Spielregeln ?

Ja, natürlich kann auch das schlaraffische Spiel nicht ohne Regeln gespielt werden. Die wichtigsten Regeln sind :

Achtung und Respekt vor dem Mitspieler bewahren.

Humor ist erwünscht, der Sarkasmus muß aber vor der Tür bleiben.

Ironie ist erlaubt, darf den Mitspieler aber nie verletzen.

Berufliches, Politik und Religion sind keine Spielthemen, bleiben Tabus.

Unser Spiel baut auf ein tolerantes und freundschaftliches Miteinander.

Warum ist Schlaraffia nur ein Männerverein ?

Die Schlaraffen spielen ihr Spiel im Winterhalbjahr (bis auf wenige Abende) nur unter Männern. Wir sind überzeugt, daß dies eines der Erfolgsrezepte der Schlaraffia war und ist - unsere (gespielte) Rivalität bleibt so garantiert problemlos. Tatsächlich schätzen es unsere Frauen sehr, wenn ihre Männer nach einem Abend in Schlaraffia fröhlich wieder heimkehren. Dass durch Schlaraffia viele private und enge Freundschaften zwischen den Familien entstehen, spricht für die hohe Akzeptanz dieser Regel. Übrigens : zweimal pro Winterung an speziellen Anlässen sowie während des Sommers, zum Beispiel auf unseren gemeinsamen Reisen sind die Partnerinnen herzlich eingeladen.

Ein Abend in Schlaraffia soll das Gemüt erhöhen !

Die Gründerväter Schlaraffias haben den Zusammenkünften den Rahmen eines Ritterspiels gegeben, als Persiflage auf die Eitelkeiten der Gesellschaft. Die Mitglieder, Sassen genannt, tragen deshalb auch eine « ritterliche Rüstung », aus Stoff. Im ersten Teil der Sippung erfolgen eine ironisch feierliche Eröffnung und die Begrüßung aller Gäste. Im zweiten Teil folgen dann die individuellen Beiträge der Sassen und Gäste, auch Fechtungen genannt. Es ist jedem Sassen freigestellt, ob und was er zum Gelingen der Sippung beitragen möchte. Natürlich lebt die ganze Sippung nur von der regen Beteiligung der Sassen.

Wann trifft man sich ?

Schlaraffia ist in Reychen organisiert. Die Treffen, « Sippungen » genannt, finden in Europa und Nordamerika im Winterhalbjahr vom 1. Oktober bis zum 30. April in jedem örtlichen Verein einmal pro Woche statt. In Lateinamerika, Australien und Südafrika, wo der Winter während unserer Sommerzeit stattfindet, wird in unseren Sommermonaten gesippt.

Schlaraffia ist für jeden offen aber keine öffentliche Institution !

Wenn Sie unser Spiel und den Ablauf eines Abends einmal erleben möchten, dann sind Sie herzlich eingeladen in Begleitung eines Schlaraffen teilzunehmen. Sie werden dann unverbindlich als « Pilger » eingeführt. Daraus ergeben sich für Sie keinerlei Verpflichtungen. Sollten Sie gefallen an unserem Spiel finden, haben Sie die Möglichkeit, weitere Abende als « Pilger » zu besuchen. Reift in Ihnen der Wunsch, unserem Bund beizutreten, dann folgt eine Zeit, in der Sie als « Prüfling » die Sassen des Vereins besser kennenlernen können und umgekehrt.

Schauen Sie in der Website nach wo der nächstgelegene Verein von ihrem Wohnort entfernt angesiedelt ist. Egal ob beim deutschen, österreichischen, dem schweizerischen oder gar dem nordamerikanischen oder lateinamerikanischen Landesverband, sie sind überall herzlich willkommen. Suchen Sie auf der entsprechenden Website der Reyche das in Ihrer Nähe liegt den Kontakt zum Kantzler des Vereins. Er wird Ihnen das Wichtigste mitteilen und Sie herzlich willkommen heissen.

(Der Allschlaraffenrat)

Wie wird man Schlaraffe

Die Informationen auf dieser Webseite sollen dem Besucher einen guten Überblick über den Männerbund Schlaraffia geben. Sicherlich gibt es noch viele zusätzliche Fragen, und die Mehrzahl dieser Fragen können sicherlich am besten dann beantwortet werden, wenn man an einem der informellen Zusammenkünfte der Schlaraffen in den Sommermonaten oder bei einem der formalen winterlichen Treffen, einer sogenannten « Sippung » teilnimmt. Auf die Frage : kann ich Schlaraffe werden gibt es zunächst zwei Grundfragen, deren Antworten wesentlich für die weiteren Schritte sind :

Zuerst sollten die folgenden Fragen hauptsächlich mit « Ja » beantwortet werden :

Haben Sie Sinn für Humor ?

Lieben Sie die Kunst - in jeder Form ?

Schätzen Sie die Freundschaft hoch ein ?

Sind Sie in der Lage anderen zuzuhören ?

Weiterhin gibt es zwei Voraussetzungen, die erfüllt werden müssen :

Sie müssen Deutsch sprechen und verstehen können.

Sie müssen ein Mann von unbescholtenem Ruf sein.

Sollten Sie dann interessiert sein, ein Mitglied der Schlaraffia zu werden, gibt es einen seit Bestehen der Schlaraffia vorgeschriebenen Vorgang. Er gibt beiden Seiten die Möglichkeit gegenseitigen Prüfens und die Gewissheit einen wirklichen Schlaraffen in den Bund aufzunehmen.

Kontakt herstellen

Der Interessent sollte mit dem Kantzler desjenigen Reyches das am nächsten von seinem Wohnsitz entfernt ist Kontakt aufnehmen. Der Kantzler wird ihm einen persönlichen Gesprächspartner vermitteln. Hier wird ihm die Möglichkeit gegeben alle offenen Fragen zu stellen und er kann sicher sein, detaillierte Antworten zu bekommen. Mehrere dieser informalen Gespräche und Zusammentreffen können folgen, und dann kommt der Zeitpunkt, wo beide Seiten sich zum nächsten Schritt entscheiden.

Pilger werden

Ein Schlaraffe, der ein « Ritter » des lokalen Vereins (des « Reyches »), sein muß, führt den Interessenten zu einem formalen Treffen des Vereins, einer « Sippung », ein und stellt ihn allen anwesenden Mitgliedern, den « Sassen », als neuen « Pilger » vor. Als der « Pate » des Pilgers versichert er die Unbescholtenheit des Pilgers und führt ihn von nun an durch die folgenden Sippungen mit vielen persönlichen Ratschlägen und Erklärungen. Es ist auch wichtig zu wissen, daß der Pilger an vielen Vorgängen des schlaraffischen Spiels aktiv teilnehmen kann und soll.

Prüfling werden

Hat der Pilger mindestens sechsmal an Sippungen teilgenommen, kann das Reych auf Empfehlung des Paten den Pilger zum nächsten Schritt vorschlagen. Nachdem der Pilger das formelle Anmeldeformular ausgefüllt hat und die Sassen des Reyches ihre Zustimmung gegeben haben, wird der Pilger zum « Prüfling » ernannt. Dies wird dann in der Schlaraffenzeitung veröffentlicht, und alle Schlaraffen weltweit können hierzu Stellung nehmen.

Die Knappenzeit

Die Zeit als Prüfling nutzt das Reych als auch der Prüfling, die schlaraffischen Ideale und Werte zu prüfen. Ohne eingehende Opposition von Schlaraffen aus anderen Reychen kann der Prüfling auf Empfehlung der Schlaraffen des Reyches zum « Knappen » vorgeschlagen werden. Hierzu muß der Prüfling mindestens einige Male innerhalb eines Jahres an Sippungen teilgenommen haben. In einer humorvollen Zeremonie wird über das Aufnahme-begehren des Prüflings durch eine sogenannte « Kugelung » abgestimmt. Dabei werden entweder weiße oder schwarze Kugeln von den Sassen verdeckt in einen Behälter gesteckt. Enthält beim Auszählen der Behälter mehr weiße Kugeln als schwarze ist der Prüfling zum Knappen erhoben worden. Der neue Knappe des Reyches ist von diesem Zeitpunkt an ein echter Schlaraffe, bekommt den sogenannten Schlaraffenpass und die Insignien des Knappen : Sturmhaube und Hellebarde.

Die Junkerzeit

Nach angemessener Zeit als Knappe wird er erstmals durch den Schulrat auf sein schlaraffisches Wissen geprüft. Hat er diese Prüfung hinter sich, beginnt die Zeit als Junker. Der Junker soll Vorbild an der Junkertafel sein und weiß nun schon sehr viel über das schlaraffische Spiel. Einmal pro Winter wird die Junkertafel in vielen Reychen den Thron erobern und selbst eine Sitzung leiten. Die Knappen und Junker haben nun auch schon das Rüstzeug Vorträge oder eigens geschriebene Gedichte vorzutragen.

Der Ritterschlag

Dieser naht, sobald der Junker seine Prüfung, die der Schulrat durchführt, absolviert hat. Anschliessend erhält der Junker von den Oberschlaraffen ein Thema für die zu schreibende Ritterarbeit die der Junker meist ein paar Wochen vor dem Ritterschlag im Verein (Reich) vorträgt. Und nun kommt der Tag an dem der Junker seine höchste Ehre entgegennehmen darf, nämlich den Ritterschlag. Eine gar feierliche Zeremonie wo der zum Ritter zu schlagende Junker seine höchste Ehrbezeugung erhält. Nämlich seine Insignien als Ritter und den Ritternamen mit dem er in Zukunft und immerdar gerufen wird.

(Der Allschlaraffenrat)

L'historique de « Schlaraffia » (textes allemands)

Männer sind lustige Gesellen. Sie wollen ganz oben sein, wollen mehr Geld haben und vornehmer geboren sein als alle anderen, und wenn sie dann mehr Geld haben und vornehmer geboren sind, sehen sie auf die anderen herab und machen sich über sie lustig. Männer hocken gern gesellig beieinander bei Speis und Trank und deftiger Rede, die mit weniger Geld aber und von minderer Geburt, die sollen bitte anderswo hocken und nicht bei ihnen. Auch sonst halten Männer die alten Werte hoch, sie lieben die Kunst und gute Musik und pflegen ew'ge Freundschaft, und falls es jemand wagen sollte, einem der ihren Schmach und Kränkung zuzufügen, dann steh'n sie zusammen wie ein Mann und wissen sich zu wehren.

Ein großer ausgestopfter Uhu :

Anno 1859, im ersten Jahr des Uhus, geschah es zu Prag, daß Franz Thomé, der Direktor des Deutschen Theaters, seinen Bassisten Albert Eilers zur Aufnahme in den elitären Künstlerclub « Arcadia » empfahl. Dort jedoch wollten die vornehm gebor'nen Herren von dem minder bemittelten Eilers nichts wissen, er wurde abgelehnt, wobei das böse Wort « Proletarier » fiel. Erzürnt sagte Direktor Thomé dem Club Adieu, einige seiner Freunde nahm er mit sich, und dann gründeten sie einen Konkurrenzverein, den sie zuerst (trotzhalber) « Proletarier-Club » nannten. Weil aber ein Mann mit Trotz und Konkurrenz allein nicht glücklich sein kann, dachten sich unsere tapf'ren Recken für ihre Zusammenkünfte einen vornehmen Zweck aus, die Pflege nämlich von Kunst, Freundschaft und Humor. Und weil sie ihr Vorhaben sehr idyllisch dünkte, gaben sie dem Verein gleich auch noch den Namen, den er heut' noch hat. Aus den « Proletariern » wurde « Schlaraffia ». Dies geschah am 10. Oktober 1859 zu Prag.

...

Franz Thomé, Schauspieler, Regisseur und Theaterdirektor, geboren am 24.11.1807 in Wien ; gestorben am 22.05.1872 in Prag. Thomé debütierte als Siebzehnjähriger in Wien und war anschließend an verschiedenen Wiener Theatern, und andere auch als Regisseur, tätig. Er schloß sich der deutschen Operngesellschaft an, wirkte einige Zeit in Paris und erhielt 1837 ein Engagement in Pest. Nach einem kurzen Aufenthalt in Nürnberg, wurde er Direktor der Bühnen Klagenfurt, Laibach und Triest. Anschließend leitete er Theater in Graz, Riga und von 1858 bis 1866 das Landestheater in Prag, wo er Initiator des Prager Neustädter Theaters war. Zwischen 1867 und 1870 war er Direktor des Linzer Theaters und übersiedelte anschließend wieder nach Prag.

...

Von nun an trafen die Schlaraffen einander regelmäßig zu Speis und Trank und kunstvollem Tun, und weil an der Wand, heißt es, ihres Gasthauses ein großer, ausgestopfter Uhu hing, sei einer von ihnen auf die Idee verfallen, den Vogel zum Clubmaskottchen zu nehmen und vor allem : ihre Zeitrechnung nach ihm zu richten.

Seither gilt den Schlaraffen das Jahr ihrer Gründung als « Jahr I des Uhus - Anno Uhui » .

Ritter Taktfest, der Tönebanner :

Und die Schlaraffen stellten fest, daß sie ohne « Schlaraffia » nicht sein konnten. Sobald einer von ihnen in die Welt hinauszog, gründete er an seinem neuen Heimatort sofort einen neuen Schlaraffen-Club. Heute zählt man weltweit an die zehntausend Schlaraffen in 257 Clubs, wobei allerdings die Schlaraffen sie gar nicht « Clubs » nennen, sondern, in ihrer eigenen, künstlich antiquierten Schlaraffensprache : « Reyche » . Sie selber tragen klangvolle Namen wie « Ritter Taktfest, der Tönebanner » oder « Graf Schneidertödter von der Pegnitz » , auf ihren Treffen, « Sippungen » genannt, essen sie nicht noch trinken sie, vielmehr « atzen » und « laben » sie sich, und wenn dabei Musik erklingt, heißen sie das Klavier ein « Clavicimbel » und die Gitarre ein « Minneholz » . Über seinem Alltagsgewand trägt der Schlaraffe am Sippungsabend einen bunten Umhang mit Ritterhelm und Schwert, und wiewohl « Schlaraffia » streng genommen immer noch ein reines Männerreich ist, freut man sich, wenn zuweilen ein paar Burgfrauen und -maidlein ihre Zusammenkünfte ins optisch Angenehme heben. Es geht vergnüglich zu bei den Schlaraffen, und überhaupt nicht elitär. Das hat man gelernt aus der Geschichte, damals, im Jahre eins des Uhus.

...

Die « Schlaraffia » ist eine am 10. Oktober 1859 in Prag gegründete, weltweite deutschsprachige Vereinigung zur Pflege von Freundschaft, Kunst und Humor. Das Wort « Schlaraffe » soll vom mittelhochdeutschen Wort « Slur-Affe » abgeleitet sein, was damals so viel hieß wie « sorgloser Genießer » (vergleiche Schlaraffenland) . Der Wahlspruch der Vereinigung lautet « In arte voluptas » (etwa : in der Kunst liegt Vergnügen) . Der Begriff « Schlaraffia » ist durch den « Allschlaraffenrat » (Vorstand des weltweiten Verbandes « Allschlaraffia ») markenrechtlich geschützt worden und kann demnach mit einem « ® » in allen Veröffentlichungen des Vereines geführt werden. Zu anderen Markennamen, die den Begriff « Schlaraffia » enthalten (etwa « Schlaraffia » -Matratzen) gibt es keinen Bezug. Eine Verbindung zur Freimaurerei besteht nicht, und auch von Service-Clubs, wie etwa Lions-Club oder Rotary International sowie von Karnevalsvereinen grenzen sich Schlaraffen deutlich ab. In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus sowie später unter der Regierung der DDR mußten viele « Reyche » zwangsweise den Vereinsbetrieb einstellen und konnten nur in sehr vereinzelt Fällen durch geheime Treffen in sicherer Umgebung (meist Privatwohnungen) diese Zeiten überstehen. Durch die Vertreibung und Flucht aus den deutschen Ostgebieten kam es nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg in der Bundesrepublik zu vielen Neugründungen.

Als 1859 der Direktor des Deutschen (Landständischen) Theaters, Franz Thomé, einen seiner jungen Künstler, den Bassisten Albert Eilers, in die Prager Künstlervereinigung « Arcadia » einführen wollte, wurde dieser wegen seiner Mittellosigkeit als « Proletarier » abgelehnt. Aus Protest gründeten seine Theaterkollegen einen Stammtisch, den sie spöttisch « Proletarier-Club » benannten. Daraus entwickelte sich nach manchen Umwegen und Rückschlägen die heutige weltumspannende « Schlaraffia » .

Die Schlaraffen, ein Männerbund (« ausschließlich Männer in gesicherter Position ») , treffen sich in der sogenannten Winterung (Nordhalbkugel : 1. Oktober bis 30. April ; Südhalbkugel : 1. Mai bis 30. Oktober) einmal pro Woche an einem festgelegten Wochentag in ihrer « Schlaraffenburg » , dem im Stil eines mittelalterlichen Rittersaales ausgestatteten Vereinslokal, zu Sippungen. Diese Zusammenkünfte werden nach festgelegtem Zeremoniell in Form eines Ritterspieles mit wohlgedachten Regeln in zwei Teilen (einem im Ablauf stets gleichen, auf wiederkehrende Regularien bedachten ersten und einem freier zu gestaltenden, eher künstlerischen zweiten) abgehalten. Sturmhauben, Helme und Rüstungen sind aus buntem Stoff in den festgelegten Reichsfarben, die Waffen wie Junkerdolch oder Ritterschwert zumeist aus Holz. Während der Sippungen wird sowohl der Alltag persifliert als auch durch Vorträge in literarischer beziehungsweise musikalischer oder künstlerisch-darstellender Form (Fechungen genannt) das Interesse an der Kunst wachgehalten. Eine antiquierte Sprache mit eigenen Ausdrücken für alltägliche Dinge (Schlaraffenlatein) gibt den Sippungen ihre eigene, humorvolle Note. Alles außerhalb des schlaraffischen Spieles ist « profan » / die « Profanei » .

Schlaraffisches Symbol für Weisheit, Humor und Tugend ist der Uhu, der in jeder Burg zu finden ist. Beim Betreten derselben grüßen die Schlaraffen ihn mit einer tiefen Verbeugung, was zugleich das Abstreifen « profaner Schlacken » (also das Sich-ganz-Einlassen auf das schlaraffische Spiel) symbolisiert. Auch gehört eine besondere Zeitrechnung zum schlaraffischen Spiel : Im Gegensatz etwa zur Zeitrechnung nach christlichem Maßstab (nach Christus oder A. D.) orientieren sich Schlaraffen am Gründungsjahr ihrer Vereinigung - demzufolge bezeichnen sie 2012 als das Jahr anno Uhu 153.

Obgleich die « Schlaraffia » vielerorts ein eher zurückgezogener Idealverein ist, treten einige Reiche (Vereine) mit öffentlichen Kulturveranstaltungen in ihren Heimatorten auf. So betreibt zum Beispiel die « Schlaraffia » Oldenburgia (Oldenburg) seit 2004 eine von der GEMA anerkannte Kleinkunstabühne und veranstaltet Sonntagsmatineen mit Konzerten, Kabarett, Lesung und Theater.

Alle Rahmenbedingungen des schlaraffischen Spieles sind im Regelwerk « Schlaraffen-Spiegel und Ceremoniale » festgelegt. Die Bezeichnung Spiegel für « Gesetzeswerk » spielt auf eine seit der griechischen Antike vielfach neu belebte literarische Tradition an. Man hält sich selbst, einem Fürsten oder einer ethnischen Gemeinschaft den Spiegel vor, um zu erkennen, wer man sei - beziehungsweise wer und wie man sein sollte (vergleiche Spiegel - Literatur) .

Diese offizielle Satzung des Weltverbandes « Allschlaraffia » , die seit 1867 in verschiedenen Neuauflagen überarbeitet und den neuen politischen Verhältnissen angepasst wurde, ist durch die große Tradition von Fürstenspiegel, Sachsenspiegel, Narrenspiegel, Eulenspiegel, Ritterspiegel und Märchenspiegel präformiert worden.

Für Außenstehende sind Schlaraffen außerhalb ihrer Sippungen an der « Rolandnadel », einer kleinen weißen Perle, die am linken Revers getragen wird, oder an einem am Fahrzeug befestigten Aufkleber erkennbar, der einen blinzelnden Uhukopf zeigt.

Der schlaraffische Gruß lautet : « Lulu » . Dieses Kunstwort wird in den Sippungen (siehe dort) auch als Interjektion der Zustimmung und des Lobes verwendet. Nach dem Volkskundler Erich Kaesmayer gibt es zwei Erklärungen :

Es ist die Abkürzung der Übersetzung von « Spielt das Spiel ! » ins Lateinische - « ludum ludite ! » .

Da fast alle Gründungsmitglieder der Praga (siehe unten « Reyche ») Bühnenprofis waren, verwendeten sie passende Textzitate in ihren heiteren Stammtischgesprächen. Aus Schillers « Wallensteins Lager » wurde die Textzeile « Lustig, lustig, da kommen die Prager ! » zitiert. Als Kurzform blieb schließlich « Lulu » übrig.

Die Buchstabenumkehr « Ulul » bedeutet einen Zuruf der Ablehnung und des Tadels.

Örtliche Gruppen der « Schlaraffia » in Städten werden von Schlaraffen « Reyche » genannt. Das erste Schlaraffenreych entstand in Prag (deshalb « Praga » genannt) , von deutschen Künstlern gegründet. Dort war ihre letzte Heimstatt in der Stefansgasse (Stepanska ul.) 36 (jetzt Hotel Alcron) . Inzwischen existieren weltweit derzeit 261 « Reyche » und « Colonien » (lokale Vereine) , in denen ausschließlich Deutsch gesprochen wird (wobei die Mitglieder keineswegs Deutsche sein müssen) und die in engem Kontakt zueinander stehen. Sie sind in der « Allschlaraffia » zusammengefasst, welche auch die « Allschlaraffische Stammrolle » herausgibt, ein über 1200 Seiten umfassendes Buch, das jeder Schlaraffe jährlich aktualisiert erhält und das einen Überblick über alle (auch untergegangenen) Reyche, Colonien und ihre Vorstufen (Stammtisch und Feldlager) sowie die « Sassen » (Mitglieder) bietet. Jeder Schlaraffe ist in jedem Reych der Welt jederzeit willkommen.

Momentan bestehen Reyche in Deutschland, Österreich, der Schweiz, Italien, Spanien, Frankreich, Belgien, Schweden, den USA, Kanada, Mexiko, Venezuela, Kolumbien, Ecuador, Brasilien, Argentinien, Thailand, Südafrika und Australien. Die einzelnen Reyche und Colonien sind in der Reihenfolge ihres Entstehungsdatums nummeriert.

Neue Mitglieder müssen durch einen Schlaraffen-Ritter (« Pate ») als « Pilger » eingeführt werden und eine Prüflingszeit absolvieren, ehe sie durch allgemeine Abstimmung, die sogenannte Kugelung, aufgenommen werden und als Knappe ihre Laufbahn beginnen, die über den Stand des Junkers zum Ritter führt (Ritterschlag) . Im Jahr 2013 sind rund 10.300 Schlaraffen in der gültigen Stammrolle registriert, davon im Landesverband Austria 2.519, im Landesverband Deutschland 6.517, im Landesverband Helvetica 466, im Landesverband Lateinamerika 198, im Landesverband Nordamerika 608 (Stand : 1. Juni 2013) .

Die schlaraffischen Zusammenkünfte werden Sippung genannt (das Verb lautet sippen) und laufen überall nach dem gleichen Muster ab. Sie bestehen aus zwei Teilen :

Der erste Teil ist den « Amtshandlungen » gewidmet. Dazu gehören die feierliche Eröffnung der Sippung durch den fungierenden Oberschlaraffen, die Begrüßung der eingerittenen Gäste, das heißt Sassen anderer Reyche, die Verlesung des amtlichen Protokolls der vergangenen Sippung durch den Marschall sowie eines nicht-amtlichen Protokolls durch einen in der Woche zuvor bestimmten Sassen.

Nach dem Abschluß des ersten Teils folgt eine Schmus- und Atzungspause. Während derselben oder auch schon während des ersten Teils wird die Fechsungsliste herumgereicht, auf welche sich jeder Sasse eintragen kann, der plant, im zweiten Teil auf die Rostra (Rednerpult) zu steigen und etwas vorzutragen.

Im zweiten Teil der Sippung werden Fechsungen vorgetragen, das heißt, jeder kann etwas zum Besten geben - gleich ob Prosa, in Versform oder musikalisch (Ausnahme : lediglich Witze zu erzählen, ist verpönt) . Dies kann etwas Gefechstes, also Selbstverfasstes, sein, oder man trägt ein Werk eines anderen Autors vor. Die Sippungen stehen in vielen Fällen unter einem besonderen Thema, zu dem man etwas fechsen kann, aber nicht muß.

Einen Überblick über alle Veranstaltungen samt Kontaktdaten bietet die Broschüre Sippungsfolgen, welche jährlich vom ASR herausgegeben wird.

Die « Schlaraffia » zeichnet sich, wie oben schon angedeutet, durch eine eigene Sprache aus, die Schlaraffenlatein genannt wird, obschon die schlaraffische Sprache auf der ganzen Welt das Deutsche ist. Dieses Deutsch enthält eine Reihe von bewusst altertümlich gewählten Ausdrücken und Wendungen, die die ritterliche, mittelalterliche Atmosphäre hervorheben sollen. Dazu gehört auch die Anrede « Ihr » , die während der Sippungen durchwegs zu verwenden ist, auch wenn man sich in der « Profanei » duzt.

Chapitres autrichiens de « Schlaraffia »

4 : Grazia.

13 : Linzia.

24 : Vindobona.

30 : Ćnipontana.

32 : Styria.

77 : Neostadia.

80 : Aquæ Thermæ.

114 : Veltcuria.

122 : Juvavia.

124 : Hippolytana.

126 : Claudium forum.

132 : Ovilabis.

165 : Kremisia Wachaviæ.

168 : Dornbirna.

174 : Villa ad aquas.

181 : Castellum Cornoviæ.

205 : Gamundia.

207 : Castrum Brigantium.

211 : Scardinga.

212 : Medelike.

215 : Iscula.

216 : Porta Tirolia.

217 : An der Pruggen.

219 : Ferrochalybsia.

221 : An der Klausen.

230 : Claustroneoburga.

231 : Ferrostadia.

234 : Brundunum.

239 : An der Leuben.

289 : First im Felde.

296 : Auf der Mauer.

315 : « Paixhanslia » .

318 : Aquae Salis.

319 : Stella Alpina.

352 : Don Quijote.

355 : Castellum Auri Africæ.

361 : Am Grimmingtor.

362 : Alta Carinthia.

363 : Im Zillertal.

366 : Barcinonensia.

371 : Malmöhus.

375 : Am schönen Bronnen.

377 : Castellum Cellense.

378 : Grætz an der Mur.

379 : Altenhoffen.

381 : Castra Montana.

400 : Monte Lunach.

407 : Am Cap der Guten Hoffnung.

419 : Medina Mayurca.

422 : Perla Costa Blanca.

423 : Zu den Vinokraten.

Le canon « Paixhans »

Der « Paixhans », eine sogenannte Bombenkanone, mit großem Kaliber und kegelförmiger Kammer, führt seinen Namen nach seinem Erfinder, dem am 22. Jänner 1783 in Metz geborenen Ingenieur Henri Joseph Paixhans (I). Warum sich die « Paixhanslia » nach dieser Kanone benannte, ist unter es begann 1855 nachzulesen.

Bombenkanone für eiserne Explosivgeschosse von 24 Pfund im Schnitt.

Die Bombenkanone, eine 1824 erstmals nach Plänen des Franzosen Paixhans aus dem Jahre 1822 gegossene Haubitze, die Bomben (Explosivgeschosse) im Flachschiß gegen Schiffe verfeuern konnte. Dieser Vorderlader war ein Glattrohrgeschütz mit sich verengendem Laderaum. Bomben waren bis dahin nur von Mörsern im Steilfeuer von Bombadiergalioten eingesetzt worden. Bombenkanonen wurden meist in den Kalibergößen 20 und 28 cm hergestellt. Die max. Schußweite betrug 1200 bis 2000 m. Ab 1838 konstruierte man langrohrige 21 cm Geschütze, die sowohl Vollkugeln als auch Explosivgeschosse verschießen konnten.

Als Bombenkanonen erreichten die glatten Geschütze ihre höchste Wirksamkeit gegenüber Holzschiffen. Die verheerende Wirkung der Explosivgeschosse unter Einsatz der Bombenkanonen wurde zuerst während des Dänisch-Deutschen Krieges (1848 bis 1851) und dann während des Krimkrieges (1853 bis 1856) offenbar. Das führte in der Folge zur Panzerung von Schiffen.

La tradition au sein de « Paixhanslia »

Gründungsritter Großfürst Ritter Schieberramsch war Ritter des erloschenen Reyches Budovicia (Reych Nummer 41) . In Gedenken an dieses Reych nennt sich « Paixhanslia » deshalb auch Traditionsreych der Budovicia.

Die « alte » « Paixhanslia » hat sich im Uhuversum sofort wohl gefühlt, Bande zu anderen Reychen geknüpft und schon kurz nach der Gründung mit den heilig Reychen Ovilabis, Castellum Palustre und « Paixhanslia » eine Gemeinschaftssippung gegründet (CaPa-Pai-0) , weiters wurde die Gemeinschaftssippung der Oberösterreich Mittwochreych ins Leben gerufen. Weit bekannt im Uhuversum wurde die Paixhansliatische Arkeley seit anno Uhu 111 und als jüngste Gründung die Mutter-Töchter Sippung anno Uhu 141.

« Paixhanslia » begründet und pflegt Traditionen !

« Paixhanslia » : Surmorden

Die « Paixhanslia » verleiht seit über 50 Jahren den « Surmorden » Allerdings gab es bis vor kurzem keinerlei Richtlinien für die Verleihung. Solche liegen nun vor (Beschluss des Großen Schlaraffenrates vom 24. Lethemond anno Uhu 153) . « Paixhanslia » definiert « Surm » im Sinne von Stelzhamer in Königin Not :

« Kreuzlustige Eichtn voll Surm und Saus. »

Demnach wird in Verbindung mit dem schlaraffischen Humor der Surmorden an jene Ritter verliehen, die in den Sippungen mit Humor, Witz und Geist spontan auf Augenblicks-Situationen reagieren, damit den Guldernen Ball in Schwung setzen und so zur fröhlichen Stimmung in der Sippung beitragen, ohne dabei verletzend zu sein.

Der Surmorden ist ein aus grün lasiertem keramischem Material gefechster Schild am Band auf dem ein Vöcklabrucker Stadtturm dargestellt ist. Der Surmorden wird, je nach dem wie ein Schlaraffe den Guldernen Ball beherrscht, in zwei Klassen verliehen, die sich in der Größe unterscheiden.

Der Surmorden II. Klasse (kleine Ausführung) wird Sassen verliehen, die gute Ansätze zeigen, es einstens zur Meisterschaft des Guldernen Balles zu bringen und was sich zum Beispiel durch den Erhalt von « Blitz-Ahnen » ankündigt.

Der Surmorden I. Klasse (große Ausführung) wird an Meister des Guldernen Balles verliehen. Der Meister zeichnet sich nicht nur durch die Anzahl, sondern vor allem durch die Qualität seiner Wortmeldungen aus.

Der Surmorden wird vom vom Ordenskapitel einmal jährlich taxfrei verliehen. Alle Inhaber dieses Surmordens bilden den Humor-Adel der « Paixhanslia » .

Der Surmorden wird in die Stammrolle als Titel « Surm I » oder « Surm II » eingetragen.

Vorschau Krystallinen anno Uhu 155.

Ritterbund Rosengarten zue Lintz lädt ein zu einem Ehrenkapitel für Schlaraffenreych und 45. Ritterjubiläum Dietrich von der Rosen am Samstag, 10. Wonnemond anno Uhu 155.

Alle Sassen Paixhanslias (mit Burgfrauen) sind eingeladen, an diesem Festkapitel teilzunehmen. « Paixhanslia » veranstaltet dafür eine Krystalline, über Anmeldung und gemeinsame Fahrgelegenheiten wird noch durch Ritter Pragmatikuß informiert.

Paixhansliatische Arkeley

Gründung : Die Paixhansliatische Arkeley wurde anno Uhu III von weiland Ritter Pontifex der Umfahrer gegründet. Im Einvernehmen mit dem Oberschlaraffat des hohen Reyches « Paixhanslia » an der Vechlapruggen und nach Genehmigung durch den Allschlaraffenrat wurde das Ceremoniale über Mitgliedschaft, Vergaberichtlinien sowie Dienstgrade und Rangabzeichen in einer eigenen Paixhansliatischen Wehrgesetzverordnung festgehalten.

Sinn der Arkeley : Der Gründungsgedanke bezweckt, einreitenden Schlaraffenfreunden, die eine weite Einrittstrecke (über 400 km Luftlinie) von ihrem Heimatreych bis in die Gemarkungen Paixhanslias zu bewältigen haben, Dank und Anerkennung für ihre Mühe auszudrücken. Die Arkeley dient der verdienstvollen Förderung des Ausrittgedankens und bedeutet wahre Freundschaftspflege.

Der Begriff Arkeley ist dem Militärischen entlehnt. Arkeley nannte man in einer Armee des Mittelalters alles was schießt. « Paixhanslia » hat als Reichssymbol eine Kanone im Reichswappen, das Militärische war aber zu jeder Zeit nur eine schlaraffische Persiflage, wie auch die Dienstgrade der Arkeley (Kanonier, Kornett, Zeugmeister, Hau-Bitzler, Mörs-Erich, Kapazunder) beweisen. Die Arkeley ist durch und durch von schlaraffischem Geist getragen, das Militärische ist nur ein humorvoller Spielrahmen.

Die Paixhansliatische Arkeley ist ein schlaraffischer Freundschaftsbund, in dem Humor und Persiflage besonders gepflegt werden und wo Schlaraffenbrüder, die aus großer Entfernung anreiten, besonders belohnt werden sollen.

Dieser Einrittssorden umfasst also alle Reyche weltweit, die mehr als 400 km Luftlinie vom hohen Reich « Paixhanslia » entfernt liegen. In den 42 Jahren des Bestandes der Paixhansliatischen Arkeley wurden (streng gelistet nach Soldbuchnummern) 468 Schlaraffen in diesen Freundschaftsbund aufgenommen. Leider sind viele Recken schon gen Ahall geritten oder von « Schlaraffia » ausgeschieden, doch umfasst die aktuelle, noch aktive Zahl der Mitglieder derzeit 228 Freunde aus 90 Reichen weltweit.

CaPa-Pai-0 - Sippung (Castellum Palustre-Paixhanslia-Ovilabis - Sippung)

Bald nach Aufnahme der « Paixhanslia » in Allschlaraffia anno Uhu 90 wurden rege Freundschaftsbande zu den Nachbarreichen geknüpft, besonders zum hohen Reich Ovilabis.

Der Oberschlaraffe Play von Egmont des hohen Reiches Castellum Palustre trat damals an die beiden Reyche mit dem Ausspruch heran : « Lasst uns sein in Eurem Bunde der Dritte ! » .

Dieser Wunsch fand freudig Gehör und am 23. Lethemond anno Uhu 93 zelebrierte das Oberschlaraffen-Dreigestirn Ritter Play (Castellum Palustre) Ritter Schieberramsch (« Paixhanslia ») und Ritter Arrestanteles (Ovilabis) in der Paixburg die erste CaPa-Pai-0 - Sippung .

Ritter und Ehrenscharaffe Daheim (« Paixhanslia ») hat aus Anlass dieses Ereignisses eine eigene CaPa-Pai-0 - Hymne getextet, die seither bei jeder gemeinsamen Sippung dieser drei Reyche zur Melodie des Prinz-Eugen-Marsches mit Begeisterung gesungen wird.

Diese bemerkenswerte Sippung findet bereits durch sechs Jahrzehnte hindurch ohne Unterbrechung in jeder Winterung abwechselnd in einem der drei Reyche statt und ist somit über Generationen hinweg ein eindrucksvolles Zeugnis für schlaraffische Beständigkeit, Treue und Freundschaft.

Mutter-Töchter-Sippung (32, 165, 315)

Die Initialzündung zu dieser Gemeinschaftssippung ging vom großartigen 50. Stiftungsfest der « Paixhanslia » (mit über 320 Gästen) am 25. Lenzmond anno Uhu 141 aus. Aus Anlaß dieses schlaraffischen Geburtstages wurden wir von der Mutter Styria und unserer Schwester Kremisia Wachaviae überaus fürstlich beschenkt. Mutter Styria spendete einen namhaften Geldbetrag zum Ankauf der neuen Burg und von der Schwester Kremisia Wachaviae bekamen wir einen wunderbar geschnitzten Uhu als Halter für unsere Blaue Kerze. Geschaffen wurde dieses Prachtstück von Ritter Skulptur, Sasse des Schwesterreyches Kremisia Wachaviae.

In seinem Dankschreiben an die Schwester bedauerte Ritter Murxl, damals Oberschlaraffe des Innern, daß der Kontakt zur Schwester wegen der Entfernung und der Tatsache, daß beide Reyche (damals noch) am Mittwoch sippen, recht spärlich sei und regte regelmäßige gemeinsame Sippungen an.

Sie sollten jährlich, abwechselnd auf Gozzoburg (nunmehr auf Lethe-Feste Crembs) und Paixburg stattfinden. Die Kremisen griffen das sofort auf. Durch die Zusage der Mutter Styria, ihre beiden Töchter bei diesem Unterfangen zu unterstützen, war der Weg zur Mutter-Töchter-Sippung geebnet.

Am 10. Eismond anno Uhu 142 war es dann soweit : 26 Paixhansln mit Reychorchester, ein stattliches Fähnlein der Mutter und die Sassen der Kremisia Wachaviae hoben die erste Mutter-Töchter-Sippung auf Gozzoburg aus der Taufe. Der Chronist berichtet von einem grandiosen Fest, das mehr als vier Stunden dauerte und exzellent vom Fungierenden Ritter Simandl zelebriert wurde. Fröhlichkeit, Musik, Humor ; gute Atzung und Labung waren die Zutaten für dieses unbeschwerte und fröhliche schlaraffische Verwandtschaftsfest. Das Sippungsschlusslied wurde weit nach der Mitternachtsstunde gesungen und die Paixhansln erreichten erst um Glock 4 des Morgens wieder die heimatlichen Gemarkungen.

Die ersten drei Gemeinschaftssippungen fanden noch jede Winterung statt. Seit anno Uhu 146 sippen wir im Zweijahresrhythmus.

Gemeinschaftssippung der Mittwoch-Reyche

Die Idee zu dieser Gemeinschaftssippung - die in der « Paixhanslia » auf fruchtbaren Boden fiel - hatte anno Uhu 123 der damalige Kantzler der « Paixhanslia » Ritter Dietzrich von Joka-hama.

Es wurde mit den Reychen Scardinga und Castellum Erolatium Kontakt aufgenommen, die sofort und begeistert diese Idee aufgriffen, eröffnete sich doch die Möglichkeit, als Mittwochreyche zumindest einmal im Jahr zu einer Gemeinschaftssippung zusammenzutreffen.

Als ältestes Reyche zelebrierte die hohe Scardinga am 19. Eismond anno Uhu 124 die erste Mittwoch-Reyche-Sippung. Die folgenden Sippungen wurden in jeder Winterung zelebriert, und zwar abwechselnd in einem der drei Reyche. Ritter Dietzrich hat anno Uhu 136 in einem Vortrag über die Entstehung dieser Gemeinschaftssippung nicht sich, sondern die anno Uhu 123 amtierenden Oberschlaraffen Ritter Ali Pram (Scardinga) Ritter Schnauz (Castellum Erolatium) und Ritter Kantorl (« Paixhanslia ») als Gründungsmitglieder bezeichnet.

Die mitbegründende « Paixhanslia » sippt seit der Winterung anno Uhu 144/145 an einem Montag. Die Tradition der Gemeinschaftssippung der Mittwoch-Reyche wird derzeit von den Reychen Juvavia, Gamundia, Scardinga und Castellum Erolatium gepflegt.

Rainer Marsch

Professor Hans Schmid (1893-1987) komponierte 1915 den bekannten und auch in der « Paixhanslia » sehr beliebten Rainermarsch. Gesungen wurde bis anno Uhu 154 der von Josef Schopper verfaßte Kriegstext.

Der Komponist äußerte öfter den Wunsch, den auf den I. Weltkrieg bezogenen Urtext durch einen zeitgemäßen Text zu ersetzen.

Sein Neffe Karl Achleitner tat das. Zum 110 Geburtstag des Komponisten verfaßte er das Salzburger Heimatlied, das seit 2003 zur Melodie des Rainer Marsches gesungen wird.

Auch in der « Paixhanslia » gab es schon seit längerem den Wunsch, den Kriegstext durch einen auf die « Paixhanslia » passenden Text zu ersetzen.

Und so entstand der Paix-Marsch welcher seit 23. Eismond anno Uhu 154 zur beliebten Melodie des Rainer Marsches mit dem neuen Text der Ritter Emsig (1. Strophe) und Ritter Murxl (2. Strophe) mit viel Begeisterung gesungen wird.

« Paixhanslia » die Hohe, als fröhlich all bekannt, durch Frohsinn, gute Laune, wird Trübsal hier gebannt. Die Spießer wir vertreiben, es herrscht nur Freude vor, es fliegt der Ball der güldne, es sprüht hier der Humor.

Die Profanei muß weichen, « Schlaraffia » unser Ziel, es leben alle Sassen für 's frohe Uhu-Spiel. Ein Hoch dem hehren Bunde, ein donnerndes Lulu. Ehe all' uns'ren Freunden, das Herz gehört dazu.

Ehrenritter im hohen Reyche « Paixhanslia »

Ritter Carneoli der kuli-narrische, 132.

Ritter CondeQuent der strattheolingische Grenzgänger, 398.

Ritter Didi-di-Pyhrn, 381.

Ritter Dü-Bell, 289.

Ritter eF-De-L von der Dampfrosshalle, 215.

Ritter I-gitt-arius der Wackere, 234.

Ritter Kabelwurm der Wallseer, 32.

Ritter Petrolius - Oberleerer der Peip Lein, 278.

Ritter Pinguin der Luxusschiffer, 32.

Ritter Plombadour der Nervenkiller, 226.

Ritter Prozenti der Allgemeine, 13.

Ritter Recherl der Fee-lerhafte, 215.

Ritter Rom Ram Edler vom Bildschirm, 205.

Ritter Sensibus der Nebelreiter, 205.

Ritter Seppikur der Tassilo Lauser, 132.

Ritter Simandl der Aufmüpfige, 165.

Ritter Triabl der Viel-Lacher, 174.

Sippungsfolge anno Uhu 155

6. Oktober 1873 : * Eröffnungsschlaraffiade, Wiegenfest Spätlese.

13. Oktober 1874 : Sippung.

20. Oktober 1874 : Sippung entfällt.

21. Oktober 1874 : Ausritt i.d. Hohen Reych Linzia (13) .

1875 : 41937 Sa, * 8. Herbstmanöver der « Paixhanslia » Arkeley.

27. Oktober 1876 : Sippung « Bring deine Freunde mit » .

31. Oktober 1876, Freitag : Gräberbesuch - Glock 4 d. N.

3. November 1877 :  Schlaraffiade, Ahallafeyer.

10. November 1878 : Einritt des h. R. Castellum Erolatium.

14. November 1878 : Ausritt * 62. CaPa-Pai-O Sippung im h. R. Castra Palustre.

17. November 1879 : Sippung.

24. November 1880 : Sippung.

1. Dezember 1881 : * Schlaraffiade.

8. Dezember 1881 : Sippung entfällt.

15. Dezember 1882 : * Stiftungsgedenken, 65 Jahre « Schlaraffia » « Paixhanslia » .

22. December 1883 :  Uhubaumfeyer m. Bgfr. Anmeldung bis 15.12. erforderlich Beginn Glock 7 d. A.

29. Dezember 1884 : Sippung zum Jahresausklang Sippungsfolge anno Uhu 156.

5. Januar 1885 : * Schlaraffiade, Ehe Neujahr, Knappenexamen.

12. Januar 1886 :  GU3b-Feyer Ritter Aufguß.

15. Januar 1886 : Ausritt i.d. Hohen Reych Vindobona (24) .

19. Januar 1887 : Turney um die Musi-Kas-Trophäe.

26. Januar 1888 : Sippung.

2. Februar 1889 : * Schlaraffiade.

9. Februar 1890 : Junkertafelsippung.

16. Februar 1891 : Rosenmontag Heringschmaus mit Burgfrauen - Anm. Erforderlich Beginn Glock 7 d. A.

23. Februar 1892 :  Empfang unserer ER, BO und AM.

2. März 1893 : * Schlaraffiade, Passverlängerung.

9. März 1894 : Sippung, Gedenken ES Freidhof.

16. März 1895 : Einritt der Hohen Reych Castra Noricum (328) .

23. März 1895 : Ausritt in der Hohen Reych Castra Batava (Stoßquell) Paixburg geschlossen.

30. März 1896 :  Ordensfest.

6. April 1896 : Ostermontag, Sippung entfällt.

13. April 1897 : * Schlaraffiade.

15. April 1897 : Ausritt in der Hohen Reych Kremisia Wachaviae.

* Mutter-Töchter-Sipp (32, 165, 315) .

20. April 1898 : Wahlwerbung und  Ordenssippung des Ordens « Ritter der lustigen Eicht » .

27. April 1899 : Glock 6 d. A. Generalversammlung Teilnahme nur für Paix-Mitglieder * Glock 8 d. A. Wahl- und Schluß Schlaraffiade

OI : Ritter Epithel.

OK : Ritter Contra-Fey.

OÄ : Ritter's Basst-E.

K : Ritter Emsig.

Sch : Ritter Tiftl.

J : Ritter Wagerl.

M : Ritter Luckerle.

C : Ritter Kombüsier.

Ritter Atzletherl da Wirt.

Ritter Aufguß der Saunier.

Ritter Ausserdem bin i so.

Ritter Bau Schreck der Hof(g)rätige.

Ritter Bungi der Mechanische.

Ritter Charm-Öhrl der Fetzig.

Ritter Contra-Fey der Tiefenscharfe.

Ritter Dia-Lekte der Biviertler.

Ritter Dietzrich von Joka-hama.

Ritter Don Waldi der Immergrüne.

Ritter Doppelnull der Schlichte.

Ritter Drah-di der Tannhüsler.

Ritter Emsig der Phil-Viel-Sucher.

Ritter Epithel der Einschichtige.

Ritter Fex-l-nix der Lasterhafte.

Ritter Halifax der Knallige.

Ritter Isidor der Schlankschlemmer.

Ritter Kombüsier der Windreimer.

Ritter Kulant von der Wehr.

Ritter Lord Thai der Beflügelte.

Ritter Luckerle der Kanonenbändiger.

Ritter Lug und Klug der Mili-Derische.

Ritter Murxl der Tintinger.

Ritter Net-z-laut der im Takte.

Ritter Pakt A der Westbahnschläfer.

Ritter Paukerl der Atter-Seher.

Ritter Pragmatikuß der Querdenker.

Ritter's Basst-E vom Raunzereck.

Ritter Schlummerl der Fundamentale.

Ritter Seenator unter Rosenwind.

Ritter So Keiner der Beinamenlose.

Ritter Specht der Thronklopfer.

Ritter Spitzfeder der Erdverbundene.

Ritter Tiftl der Bi-Lanzierte.

Ritter Ton Golli vom Gla-surm-ien.

Ritter Viel-Klang der Stimmungsvolle.

Ritter Wagerl der Quetschfidele.

Jk Heli der Vor-Bild-liche.

Jk Stefan der Spätheimkehrer.

Jk Walter der Splendide.

Knappe 109.

Knappe 110.

Richtlinien für die Vergabe von Einrittsorden

- 1) Grundlage : OR-Beschlüsse vom 1. Oktober anno Uhu 131 und vom 29. Dezember anno Uhu 150.
- 2) Form : siehe Bild.
- 3) Verleihungsstufen : 50 - 100 - 250 - 315 - 500 Einritte.
- 4) Die Verleihung der jeweiligen Stufe des Ordens ist mit Urkunde zu bescheinigen.
- 5) Jeder, der eine Stufe dieses Ordens beansprucht, hat diese beim Marschall spätestens 1 Monat vor dem Ordensfest zu beantragen und nachzuweisen. Der Marschall hat dem Ordenskapitel hievon Meldung zu erstatten.
- 6) Die Verleihung findet nur 1 mal im Jahr beim Ordensfest nach Zuerkennung durch das Ordenskapitel statt.
- 7) Die Zahlenplättchen bleiben beim Sassen, bei Erreichen einer höheren Stufe muß das Plättchen mit der niedrigeren Zahl nicht zurückgegeben werden.

Richtlinien für die Vergabe von Ausrittsorden

- 1) Grundlage : OR-Beschlüsse vom 1. Oktober anno Uhu 131 und vom 19. Januar anno Uhu 151.
- 2) Form : siehe Bild.
- 3) Verleihungsstufen : 100, 250, 500, 750 und 1000 Ausritte.
- 4) Die Verleihung der jeweiligen Stufe des Ordens ist mit Urkunde zu bescheinigen.
- 5) Jeder, der eine Stufe dieses Ordens beansprucht, hat diese beim Marschall spätestens 1 Monat vor dem Ordensfest zu beantragen und nachzuweisen. Der Marschall hat dem Ordenskapitel hievon Meldung zu erstatten.
- 6) Die Verleihung findet nur 1 mal im Jahr beim Ordensfest nach Zuerkennung durch das Ordenskapitel statt.

7) Die Zahlenplättchen bleiben beim Sassen, bei Erreichen einer höheren Stufe muß das Plättchen mit der niedrigeren Zahl nicht zurückgegeben werden.

Zertifikate für über 1000 Ausritte

1) Grundlage : OR-Beschluß vom 6. April anno Uhu 151.

2) Form : Zertifikat A 4.

Papier : 100 g weiß (bis 2000 Ausritte) .

Papier : 120 g marmoriert (über 2000 Ausritte) .

3) Verleihungsstufen : 1200 - 1400 - 1600 - 1800 - 2000 - 2100 - 2200 - 2300 - 2400 - 2500 Ausritte.

4) Die Verleihung der jeweiligen Stufe ist mit Zertifikat zu bescheinigen.

5) Jeder, der eine Stufe dieses Zertifikats beansprucht, hat diese beim Marschall zu beantragen und nachzuweisen. Der Marschall hat dem Oberschlaraffat hievon Meldung zu erstatten.

6) Die Verleihung findet immer nur in einer Schlaraffiade statt.

Orden « Ritter der lustigen Eicht »

Willkomm-Orden Gestiftet anno Uhu 146 vom hohen Reych « Paixhanslia » an der Vechlapruggen.

Ziel der Stiftung :

a) Die Freundschaft unter den Sassen vertiefen.

b) Den Kontakt zu den Oberösterreich Reychen pflegen.

c) Das ehrende Andenken an den großen Oberösterreich. Mundartdichter Franz Stelzhamer bewahren (Ehrenmitglied der « Paixhanslia » und Ehrenscharaffe Piesenham) .

Ein paar Beispiele des Schlaraffenlateins

Atzung und Labung = Essen und Trinken (Verben : atzen und laben) .

Bangk = Rhythmische Ehrerweisung, die einem Schlaraffen entgegengebracht wird.

Benzinelefant = Reisebus.

Benzinross = Auto.

Burgfrau = Ehefrau.

Burgknäpplein = Sohn.

Burgmaid = Tochter.

Burgschreck = Schwiegermutter.

Burgwonne = Freundin Lebensgefährtin.

Clavicimbel = Klavier.

Dampfross = Eisenbahn.

Lethe = Wein.

Quell = Bier.

Kniewinsel = Violoncello.

Krystalline = Geselliges Zusammensein außerhalb der Sippungen.

Lunte = Zigarre.

Luntette = Zigarette.

Minneholz = Gitarre.

Pön = Geldstrafe, die verhängt wird, wenn man sich ungebührlich verhält oder gegen Spiegel und Ceremoniale verstößt (Verben : pönen) .

Quasselstrippe = Telefon.

Rüstung = Helm und Schärpe, eventuell Rittermantel.

Schaumlethe = Sekt.

Schmauchtopf = Tabakspfeife.

Schwalbenschwanz = Frack.

Sendbote = Brief.

Sendwisch = Postkarte.

Seufzerholz = Geige.

Stammrolle = Mitgliederverzeichnis.

Troß = Familie.

Vademecum = Jährlich erscheinende Broschüre, die alle Angaben und Veranstaltungshinweise des herausgebenden Reiches enthält.

Zinkenmeister = Derjenige, der das Clavicimbel bedient.

...

4 septembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner célèbre son 60e anniversaire à Vöcklabruck, en achevant sa 8e Symphonie.

5 septembre 1884 : Anton Bruckner achève sa 7e Symphonie à Saint-Florian.

11 septembre 1884 : A setting of the 3rd « Christus factus est » (WAB 11) , for chorus, by Anton Bruckner is performed for the 1st time, at the Vienna « Hofkapelle » .

Marie Demar

La 8e Symphonie sera dédiée à l'Empereur François-Joseph d'Autriche bien que Bruckner, âgé de 63 ans, ait d'abord pensé l'offrir à une ravissante jeune fille de 17 ans aux yeux bruns, provenant de Steyr, du nom de Marie Demar (1865-1946) , qu'il a rencontrée lors d'une représentation à l'Opéra de Vienne.

Elle va marier, ultimement, Wilhelm Blasdiek, en 1890.

Une lettre passionnée de Bruckner qui lui est adressée, nous permet de faire un lien entre sexualité, morbidité et obsession :

« Merci de tout cœur pour votre superbe photo ! Ah, ces beaux yeux exprimant la confiance ... combien de fois ils m'ont réconforté ! Et avec quelle joie je les ai si souvent regardés. Je conserverai cette précieuse " relique " (« Reliquie ») jusqu'à la fin de mes jours. »

Le choix du mot « relique » (« Reliquie ») est plutôt insolite puisqu'il fait essentiellement partie du lexique des Saints dans l'Église catholique. L'utilisation du terme « Andenken » (objet souvenir) serait ici beaucoup plus appropriée. Mais Bruckner associe inconsciemment l'image de son objet de désir avec l'excitation démesurée qu'il manifeste devant la morbidité et les cadavres. Le compositeur arrive ainsi à contenir la souffrance que lui cause le célibat en se repliant sur sa collection de photographies de jeunes filles.

...

Marie Demar (1865-1946) : Female friend of Bruckner who lives at « Loco Wieden Waaggasse 9 » , in Vienna. Bruckner greatly admired her, so much so that their friendship became quite a serious matter (in 1885-1886) , and it was reciprocal. From all accounts, he felt that he had found his soul mate. Nevertheless, she declined his proposal of marriage, left his heart and ego in disrepair, and ultimately married someone else (Wilhelm Blasdiek) , in 1890.

...

In his single volume biography, Max Auer begins by remarking on the inspiring young women around Bruckner in Vöcklabruck. Bruckner hired a room with a piano from the local iron-monger and, upon learning that he had a pretty stepdaughter, apparently remarked :

« Oh that makes me happy : I can compose there ! »

Every day, he sent a bunch of flowers to a « Fraulein » von Rottenberger, and addressed the daughter of lawyer Doctor Alois Scherer as, « My pearl ! » . Auer speculates that these affections were then portrayed in the aspiring theme of the 1st movement « Gesangsperiode » . Certainly, at the time of the composition of the 8th, especially whilst composing the Adagio, from November 1884 to February 1885, he was in love with a young woman called Marie Demar and, by his own testimony, the inspiration for the Adagio-theme came when he « gazed too deeply into a maiden's eyes » .

Bruckner was 61 when writing the Adagio, and according to Max Auer, in love « zu einem jungen, schönen, kaum der Schule erwachsenen Mädchen » (a pretty young girl barely out of school) or « kaum dem Kindesalter entwachsene Marie Demar » (hardly more than a child, Marie Demar) - although, giving no reference, Constantin Floros says she was 20 years old. They met-up during the intervals in the 4th gallery at the Viennese Court Opera, where they would discuss together the Richard Wagner Opera and he would ply her with « Linzer-Torte » (reputedly one of the oldest cakes, for which Linz is famous and of which the « Bakewell Tart » is a distant relative.) She was obviously very musical to have gone willingly to the Opera and, later, a student at the « Conservatoire » , and was apparently very taken with Bruckner, no doubt much flattered that the famous organist, University professor and composer should take time-out to talk with her. Looking through the « Hofoper » programmes, I see, for example, that Lilli Lehman sang Isolde, on 16th January 1885, and it could well have been that they both were there. The image that Max Auer describes is of the couple walking in the spring of 1885 in the large Vierma amusement park, the « Prater » , with her parents behind, and Bruckner whistling the « Dance of the Apprentices » from « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , as Marie danced around him.

Shortly after finishing the 1st compositional work on the Adagio of the 8th Symphony, Bruckner sent his house-keeper « Frau Kathi » (Katherina Kachelmayer) to her house with a photograph of himself, and a message as follows:

« Dedicated to my highly-esteemed, dearest friend and comrade in art , Miss Marie Demar, as a small memento. »

And « Kathi » was instructed to solicit Marie to return the favour with a picture of herself.

As reported in Göllerich-Auer :

With pleasure and pride, the young lady fulfilled this request. Blissfully happy at this, Bruckner sent her the following registered letter (from anxiety, he would register all his letters) :

Most kind, most generous friend, Miss Marie ! Heartfelt thanks for your splendid picture. Those innocent, beautiful eyes ! How often they console me ! Till the end of my life, this keepsake will be beloved and priceless to me. And what joy from having frequent sight of it ! Etc.

Also, I ask for your so dear friendship, dearest young lady ! May the same never be withdrawn. Of mine, you are assured for all eternity.

I have just thanked the King of Bavaria for his acceptance of the dedication (of the 7th Symphony) . Levi's work.

Once again, I send my heartfelt thanks and devoutly kiss on your kind, fair hands.

Your exceedingly admiring friend,

Anton Bruckner. »

I don't know if it was as a result of this letter but, at some stage, the relationship was interrupted until her re-appearance as a pupil of Ferdinand Löwe at the Vienna Conservatory, in 1886-1887, so they had been friends then for 2 years. Bruckner now proposed to dedicate the 8th Symphony to her. When one considers the dedication of the 7th to King Ludwig of Bavaria, the eventual dedication of the 8th to the Emperor Franz-Josef, and the reported dedication of the 9th to « dear God » , one has some measure of the intensity of Bruckner's feelings for Marie. So, he proposed marriage and that was the end of it.

Given the frequency with which Bruckner fell for young women, presumably one could find similar affections at the time of the composition of many of his Symphonies. Nevertheless, I don't think it is legitimate to dismiss them as « banal », or of no interest when discussing the emotional origins or impact of the music. It may well be that the imagined triumph of his dreams is what is celebrated in those 6 cymbal clashes that crown the 1st version of the Adagio of the 8th.

WAB 108 : Symphonie n° 8

1884-1887 : WAB 108 - Symphonie n° 8 « Die Apokalyptische » en do mineur pour 3 flûtes (la 3e peut être remplacée par 1 piccolo) , 3 hautbois, 3 clarinettes en si bémol, 3 bassons (le 3e peut être un contre-basson) , 4 cors en fa, 3 trompettes en fa, 3 trombones (ATB) , 2 tubas wagnériens ténor en si bémol (positions 5 et 6) , 2 tubas wagnériens basses en fa (positions 7 et 8) , 1 tuba, timbales, cymbales, triangle, 3 harpes et cordes.

L'exécution de la Symphonie dure selon les versions et les chefs (sauf exception) entre 75 et 85 minutes. Ce qui en fait la plus longue de Bruckner.

Amorcé en 1884, dès l'achèvement de sa 7e Symphonie et dans l'euphorie du succès remporté par celle-ci, la 8e Symphonie aura, par contre, une histoire difficile. Terminée en 1887, son rejet par le chef et ami Hermann Levi (qui avait pourtant eu un rôle déterminant dans le triomphe de la 7e) qui ne la comprend pas, faillit mener Bruckner, rarement aussi satisfait de lui-même, jusqu'au suicide, tant dans son esprit sa nouvelle partition représentait un absolu aboutissement.

Comme la majorité des autres Symphonies de Bruckner, la 8e existe sous différentes versions. L'instrumentation est légèrement modifiée également :

La version originale de 1887 fut publiée par Leopold Nowak, en 1972. Cette version, refusée par le chef Hermann Levi, représente le matériau brut. Quelques chefs, dont Eliahu Inbal et Georg Tintner ont voulu, en l'enregistrant, revenir en quelque sorte aux sources de Bruckner.

Création de la version originale (1884-1887) à Londres, le 2 septembre 1973.

La Symphonie subira 2 révisions successives :

Bruckner effectue une 1re révision de l'Adagio l'année suivante. Révision de 1888 : Nouvel Adagio.

La version intermédiaire de l'Adagio de 1888 a été éditée par Dermot Gault et Takanobu Kawasaki. La version intermédiaire des autres mouvements fut reconstituée par William Carragan et exécutée par Gert Schaller.

La version de 1890 est profondément modifiée. En plus des « inévitables » coupures, quelques passages aux harmonies trop futuristes sont modifiés. Le Trio est plus mélodique ; il possède moins de harpe ; et, comme déjà dans sa version intermédiaire de 1888, le climax de l'Adagio est dans une tonalité différente : mi bémol majeur au lieu de do majeur dans celle de 1887 ; et il a aussi moins de coups de cymbales. Cette nouvelle version requiert, par ailleurs, un élargissement des bois (un 3e est ajouté dans les 3 lers mouvements) dans les différentes parties ce qui lui donne une allure moins austère. Dans cette version, la Symphonie demande, en plus d'un grand orchestre de cordes, 3 flûtes traversières, 3 hautbois, 3 clarinettes, 3 bassons (dont 1 contrebasson) ; et comme cuivres : 4 cors, 3 trompettes, 3 trombones, 1 tuba et 4 tubas wagnériens, ainsi que cymbales, timbales, 3 harpes et 1 triangle.

La version de 1890 fut publiée par Leopold Nowak en 1955. Nowak rejeta les idées et retouches de Haas, et publia une version qu'il considéra comme authentique. Cette version est à la base de la nouvelle édition critique préparée par Paul Hawkshaw pour la Société Internationale Bruckner.

Édition : Leopold Nowak (1955) .

La « version mixte » de 1887-1890 fut publiée par Robert Haas en 1939. C'est la version la plus souvent enregistrée et qui garde la faveur de nombreux chefs et mélomanes. Longtemps considérée comme une tentative de synthèse entre les versions de 1887 et de 1890, elle a été rejetée par les spécialistes. Il est cependant apparu que plusieurs passages, que Haas avait soi-disant repris de la version 1887, étaient simplement rayés dans le manuscrit de la version 1890, et que Bruckner avait, par ailleurs, écrit dans une lettre adressée au chef d'orchestre Felix Weingartner, qu'il espérait que ces passages apparaîtraient « valides pour la postérité » .

Édition : Robert Haas (1939) .

La version dite « de Franz Schalk » contient de légers changements par rapport à celle de 1890, dont on ne sait dans quelle mesure ils ont été ou non approuvés par le compositeur. L'œuvre connut un grand succès lors de sa création à Vienne, le 18 décembre 1892, par l'Orchestre Philharmonique sous la direction du chef Hans Richter ; des critiques la qualifiant même de « Symphonie des Symphonies » ou « Sommet de la Symphonie Romantique » .

La version de 1892 diffère, en de nombreux endroits, de celles de Robert Haas et de Leopold Nowak. Dans « Bruckner Symphonie n° 8, Cambridge Music Guides » (Cambridge University Press, 2000) , le musicologue Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt affirme que le nombre considérable de changements de tempo additionnels, en particulier dans le Finale, a permis de mettre en lumière les pratiques de l'époque au moment de la création d'une Symphonie de Bruckner. La Ire édition nous montre une interprétation beaucoup plus explicite et musicalement convaincante par rapport aux partitions manuscrites des versions de 1887 et de 1890 et des éditions critiques modernes de Robert Haas et de Leopold Nowak.

Ire édition publiée : Franz Schalk et Max von Oberleithner, Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau, Vienne (1892) .

S 8288a, Ernst Eulenburg, édition Max Steinitzer, Leipzig (1912) .

...

Composée à Vienne (1884-1887) ; révision (1888-1890) .

Version originale (1884-1887) :

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) VIII/1, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Leopold Nowak (1972) ; sur la page-titre : « Fassung von 1887 » .

Ernst Eulenburg (466) , édition Leopold Nowak (1994) .

(1) Allegro moderato ; (2) Scherzo. Allegro moderato ; Trio. Langsam ; (3) Adagio. Feierlich langsam, doch nicht schleppend ; (4) Finale. Feierlich, nicht schnell.

2e version (1888-1890) :

NGA (« Neuen Gesamtausgabe ») : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) VIII/2, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Leopold Nowak (1955) ; sur la page-titre : « Fassung von 1890 » .

Ernst Eulenburg (1526) , édition Leopold Nowak (1992) .

Source des tempi utilisés : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) VIII/1.

Version hybride à partir des 1re et 2e versions :

Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag, édition Robert Haas (1939) ; ré-édition Brucknerverlag (1949) . G/A (August Göllerich / Max Auer) : VIII.

Breitkopf et Härtel (3622) , édition Robert Haas (1949) .

Source des tempi utilisés : « Anton Bruckner Sämtliche Werke » (ABSW) VIII/1 et ABSW VIII/2 mais indications métronomiques : minim = 69, ajoutées au Finale.

1re version publiée :

S 8288, édition Haslinger-Schlesinger (1892) .

S 8288a, Ernst Eulenburg (66) , édition Max Steinitzer (1912) .

UE 2495, Philharmonia (212) , Universal-Edition, Vienne ; Wiener Philharmoniker Verlag 212, nouvellement révisée par Josef Venantius von WöB (1927) .

Ernst Eulenburg (466) , édition Wilhelm Altmann (vers 1930) .

10398, édition Peters (3840h) .

Source des tempi utilisés : version hybride, faite à partir des 1re et 2e versions.

...

Par la démesure de ses dimensions et la profondeur de sa vision, la 8e est considérée, par certains, comme étant le sommet de la Symphonie : le couronnement et l'épilogue de toute l'aventure humaine à l'aube d'un nouveau siècle.

La Symphonie est en 4 mouvements, le cœur étant constitué par l'association des 2 derniers mouvements, colossaux, Adagio et Finale. C'est sans doute pour créer cette union extraordinaire que Bruckner, suivant l'exemple de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven, a inversé l'ordre traditionnel des mouvements en permutant le Scherzo et l'Adagio.

Allegro moderato :

Le 1er mouvement, à l'atmosphère sombre et presque funèbre, se termine dans la version originale par un fortissimo. Dans la version de 1890, cette Coda est supprimée, le mouvement s'achèvant ainsi sur un lent decrescendo au caractère de glas menaçant qui renforce sa vision pessimiste.

Bruckner described the Coda of the 1st movement as a grim scene :

« This is how it is when one is on his deathbed, and opposite hangs a clock, which, while his life comes to its end, beats on ever steadily : tick, tock, tick, tock. »

Scherzo, Allegro moderato - Trio, Langsam :

Le Scherzo, vif et enjoué, est censé dépeindre la figure populaire du « Deutscher Michel » , le bon paysan germanique, d'après le programme imagé que Bruckner a donné a posteriori sur l'insistance de ses amis et élèves, notamment Franz Schalk. Le thème est celui de la partie de pédalier du prélude pour orgue en do majeur de Georg Böhm, qui avait déjà été utilisé dans le Credo de sa 2e Messe : chez Bruckner, l'organiste n'est jamais loin !

Dans la version de 1887, le trio est accompagné par des trilles des violons, et, dans les versions ultérieures plus mélodiques, par des arpèges de harpe.

Dans le Scherzo, Bruckner peint le paysan têtu de Haute-Autriche, en le baptisant « Der deutsche Micherl » .

Un jour qu'il devait sortir par mauvais temps, il prit soin de mettre une housse sur le précieux manuscrit demeuré sur son piano :

« ... de peur qu'il ne s'enrhume en mon absence. »

Adagio - Feierlich langsam, doch nicht schleppend :

L'Adagio, dont le thème avait été trouvé « dans l'œil d'une jeune fille », disait Bruckner, a la forme d'une quête méditative intérieure, tendue vers un idéal inaccessible.

L'accompagnement du 1er thème est basé sur le rythme brucknérien typique « 2+3 » .

Un beau passage solo des tubas wagnériens suivi par les bois et des arpèges de harpe, qui précédait la ré-exposition du second thème, a malheureusement été supprimé dans la version de 1890. Le climax du mouvement, ponctué dans la version de 1887 par 6 coups de cymbales, ne l'est plus que par 2 dans les versions ultérieures.

Le mouvement se termine, en pianissimo, par le 1er motif que seuls les cuivres (cors et tubas wagnériens) chantent encore.

Le disciple de Bruckner, Friedrich Eckstein, se souvient :

« Concerning the Trio of the Scherzo, which Bruckner loved, he said : « Micherl dreams » . The 4 bars before F he called « Micherl's prayer » . He didn't say much about the Adagio 3rd movement. He only said that he came-up with the theme in Sierning near Steyr when « looking deeply into a young girl's eyes » . Regarding the 4th movement, on the other hand, he fell back into the strangest fantasies again. Apparently, he had in mind the coming together of the 3 Emperors at Skiemewice, near Brünn, when writing the introduction to the movement, the entrance of the Monarchs of Germany, Austria and Russia. »

There is no a tempo before letter N in either the manuscript or the 1st edition. Friedrich Eckstein's letter M should perhaps be letter L, and his a tempo letter M. Presumably, « Michel » takes-up the fight at letter N (August Göllerich / Max Auer : 4/3, pages 16-17.)

« Looking deeply into a young girl's eyes. » : A statement that would seem to offer more psychological scope than his statement to Carl Hrubý that the theme had come to him « after a glass of Pilsener beer » . (Carl Hrubý, page 37.)

Bruckner used harps for the 1st time in this Symphony. He had long believed, as Friedrich Eckstein recalled, that while the harp may have been appropriate in a Symphonic poem, it did not belong in « a proper Symphony », but, here, he changed his mind. He told Eckstein that he felt compelled to use harps in this work :

« I simply had to, there was no other solution. »

Finale - Feierlich, nicht schnell :

Le Finale, d'une puissance écrasante, sonne comme une résolution après la longue méditation. Le début en 3 vagues représente, dit-on, une rencontre récente entre les Empereurs d'Allemagne, de Russie et d'Autriche-Hongrie (la Symphonie est d'ailleurs dédiée à François-Joseph Ier d'Autriche) . Ceci étant et nonobstant la dédicace (qui, contrairement à celle de sa fameuse 9e, « Dédicée au bon Dieu » (oralement) , ne nous renseigne pas le moins du monde sur son intention) , cette description serait certainement très réductrice des messages que tout un chacun peut entendre dans cette œuvre.

La Coda foudroyante qui le conclut, avec la reprise des principaux thèmes de chaque mouvement, renforce cette idée d'ultime aboutissement de la Symphonie, au moment où celle-ci commence à se déconstruire et où émergent de nouvelles formes. Une mauvaise interprétation de cette fin monumentale a fait accoler parfois à la Symphonie le surnom, tout à fait apocryphe, d' « Apocalyptique » ; le terme pourrait à la rigueur être gardé dans son sens originel de révélation, plus proche du message brucknérien.

...

The composition of the Finale of the 8th Symphony gave Bruckner more trouble than did the other movements, and many observers, beginning with Hermann Levi, have not found the movement wholly convincing. Bruckner did not share this opinion. The day he finished composing it, he described it as « the most significant movement of my life » , and he resisted all suggestions to revise it radically.

Most superficially, at its 1st performance in December 1892, the Symphony was accompanied by a long, unsigned program written by Josef Schalk :

« The figure of Æschylus' Prometheus. Vague, resentful defiance, with a presumptuous, titanic feeling of inner strength elevating itself above gods and fate. Soon, the Oceanides' words of consolation. Terrible loneliness and silence. Soliloquy : gentle complaint rising to outbursts of delirious grief, occasionally shaken by the premonition of the bliss of redemption to come. Brazenly and unbidden the dreadful power of fate rears-up. Prometheus grindingly succumbs to the will of the hostile Cronides, and, sinking down, he cries-out :

So hurl lightning's fiery snake down upon me, the thunderous quake of Wild wind's rage convulses the air. And the cruel whirlpool of Fate casts my body down to black Tartarus :

Yet, he cannot kill me !

The ideal elements of the 1st movement come forth in realistic depiction. The deeds and sorrows of Prometheus appear parodic, reduced to a meager scale. The composer himself gave this movement the odd name " German Michaël

”

The sphere of solemn, calm sublimity. Like the silent workings of divinity throned in splendor high above all earthly woe and all earthly joy. Not Zeus-Cronos, the inaccessible, no ; the all-loving father of humanity is given to us in his entire, incalculable Grace.

The sun resounds in age-old fashion. With brother spheres in hymnic sound. And fulfills his pre-ordained round with thunderous progression.

Heroism in service of the Divine. No longer battling, suffering and succumbing solely as the bearer of his own inner strength, but as the messenger of eternal sacred Truth, herald of the idea of God. The work reaches its triumphant conclusion in a combination of all the main-themes, from which “ German Michaël ” is not absent ; in fact, now in gleaming armor and with a swinging sword, like his namesake the Archangel, he is at the head of the flock. »

Schalk's program has not often found a warm reception. Reviewers of the 1st performance easily identified it as the work of Schalk and were content to dismiss it as banal, if not ridiculous. Eduard Hanslick and Max Kalbeck both mocked it, and Bruckner's supporter Carl Hrubý criticized Schalk for merely providing critics with easy targets.

...

WAB 108 (1884-1887) : Symphony No. 8 in C minor (« Die Apokalyptische ») with Wagner tubas, triangle, cymbals and harps. 1888 version : new Adagio ; 1890 version : 3rd woodwind in 1st 3 movements, fewer cymbal clashes in Adagio, harps in Trio.

In 1887, an elated Anton Bruckner sent the score of his 8th Symphony to his newly found champion, conductor Hermann Levi. The accompanying letter read, « To my artistic father. Alleluia ! May it find grace ! » . Nevertheless, this immense Symphony, dwarfing anything in history before it, was greeted with trepidation by the conductor. After the recent breakthrough success of the Symphony No. 7, Levi was reluctant to hurt the composer's feelings, so he sent a friend to break the news to Bruckner. The result was a nervous collapse on the part of the sensitive, self-doubting composer ; and, upon recuperation, an extensive revision of the Symphony. In its new form (somewhat pruned and with many dramatic new features ; including a different ending to the 1st movement and a new Trio) , the still imposing work was premiered, in 1892, under conductor Hans Richter with the Vienna Philharmonic. A more complete triumph could hardly have been hoped for. Bruckner's rival, Johannes Brahms, heartily joined in the long ovation, while the critic Hanslick, the bane of Bruckner's existence, fled the hall amidst jeers and hisses from the audience.

Even in its revised form, the work was the longest Symphony on record, with a performance time of roughly 80 minutes. The stern character of the work earned it the nickname « Apocalyptic » (a subtitle which has largely fallen by the wayside) , and, indeed, there is the impression of an eruption as the highly-chromatic opening theme thunders out in the full Orchestra. A complex of solemn themes unfolds, and an almost cosmic battle occurs in the development section ; the recapitulation reaches an awesome climax against an obstinate brass figure ; the grim, fading Coda, appended in the revision, was described by the composer as a « wake » .

The immense Scherzo, one of Bruckner's best, is constructed around an infectious carillon-like figure, and was said by the composer to represent the German national figure « Cousin Michaël » . The Trio is expansive and dreamlike in quality.

The following Adagio is perhaps the longest in the literature and it unfolds in visions of religious ecstasy, reaching a climax similar but structurally surpassing that of the Symphony No. 7. The serenity of its Coda is jarringly contrasted with the opening of the Finale in which the opening urgency of the 1st movement returns with even greater intensity. Militant fanfares hammer-out the main-theme against a jabbing ostinato ; a meditative 2nd theme and a rhythmic 3rd are worked-out on a vast scale ; the sudden return of the opening theme in the recapitulation is one of the most terrifying moments in all of Bruckner's music. The Coda to the entire Symphony is perhaps Bruckner's greatest orchestral achievement. Over a slow, inexorable build-up the main-theme of each movement is re-worked in a major key and played in counterpoint with the others, bringing this titanic work to an awe-inspiring close.

...

1887 Version (Nowak) .

Circa 1888 Adagio (unpublished) .

1890 Version ([Haas], Nowak) .

1892 Version (1892) .

The 1st version of the 8th Symphony, begun in July 1884, was completed in August 1887. This version did not find favour with the conductor Hermann Levi, so, Bruckner decided to revise the Symphony. The 1890 version, begun in March 1889, was completed in March 1890.

In between the 1887 and 1890 versions, there is at least an intermediate version of the Adagio ; a copy score of this movement is now Mus.Hs. 34614/b. (Mus.Hs. 34614/a is a copy of the 1887 Adagio made by the same copyist.) As documentary evidence indicates that Bruckner began revising the 8th by mid-October 1887 and had made considerable progress by February 1888, one might assume a date of 1888 for the intermediate Adagio. According to Takanobu Kawasaki, the 1888 Adagio consists of 315 measures (compared to 329 measures in 1887 and 291 measures in 1890) . As in the 1890 Adagio, the climax of the 1888 Adagio is in E-flat major (compared to a C major climax in the 1887 Adagio) . This form of the Adagio should be taken seriously, since Bruckner thought enough of it to pay to have it copied. In July 2000, it was performed on 4 electones in Tokyo.

The 1892 version contains some slight revisions made by Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner that may have been subsequently approved by Bruckner. Also, some of the revisions could have been made by Bruckner. Among the changes are alterations in length in the Finale : measures 93-98 of the 1890 Finale are cut, and measures 519-520 of the 1890 Finale are repeated. There are also some changes in orchestration and dynamics. But at least one modification suggested by Schalk and Oberleithner (a large cut in the Finale) was rejected by Bruckner. The cut in the Finale's exposition (measures 93-98) is similar to, but not identical to, a cut that Bruckner made in the recapitulation. If the cut in the 1892 printing corresponded to measures 89-98, then, the cuts in the exposition and recapitulation would be identical.

The Robert Haas edition is primarily based on the 1890 version with a passage from the 1887 Adagio mixed-in. In addition, Haas restored 4 passages from the autograph score of the 1890 Finale that originated from the 1887 version, which were crossed-out by Bruckner. The Finale also contains a passage written by Haas, based on a sketch by Bruckner (according to Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt) . In making these revisions, Haas cut 13 measures of the 1890 Finale that were composed by Bruckner.

...

Original version, composed from October 1884 to August 1885. Many and important revisions take place until July 3, 1887. The 1st publication of this rarely performed version was by Leopold Nowak (1977) .

1890 version, prepared by Bruckner and Josef Schalk. The critical edition is Nowak (1955) . It includes a re-writing of the end of 1st movement (so that it gains a soft ending instead of the loud ending of the original version) , and substantial changes in the Adagio and the Trio. Also, some cuts were made with advice from Schalk. The Nowak edition includes all these changes and cuts, and considers them as representing the final decisions of Bruckner. Haas edition (1935) , if we leave aside some minor complications, can be said to be basically a combination of 1887 and 1890 versions. Haas accepted the re-writings and changes as being Bruckner's genuine decisions, but restored all the cuts introduced under the alleged influence of Schalk. Because of that, it is somewhat longer than Nowak's. This, among all Bruckner Symphonies, is the one that presents the largest differences when it comes to the Haas or Nowak editions, and the preferences of conductors are evenly distributed among them.

Revised version of 1892, prepared for the publication of the 1st Edition by Robert Lienau, in that same year. Further cuts were made at the suggestion of Schalk, who also introduced changes of dynamics, phrasing, and orchestration. This was the version played in the 1st performance, by Hans Richter, in Vienna on December 18, 1892.

...

Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 in C minor is the last Symphony the composer completed. It exists in 2 major versions of 1887 and 1890. It was premiered under conductor Hans Richter in 1892, in Vienna. It is dedicated to the Emperor Franz-Josef I of Austria. Although, at one stage, the repeatedly lovelorn 63 year old Bruckner sought to dedicate it to a young girl he met at the Opera, named Marie Demar.

We can speculate on Anton Bruckner's attitudes towards sex and death within a general obsessive condition. Possible evidence of this connection is glimpsed in a letter to another of his potential « love flames » , Maria Demar :

« Heartfelt thanks for your marvellous picture ! The beautiful, trusting eyes ! How frequently it comforts me ! This relic (“ Reliquie ”) will be dear and precious to me to the end of my life. And with what joy have I so often looked upon it ! »

The choice of the word « Reliquie » is striking and most unusual in this context, since it literally, and most commonly, signifies relics in precisely the Catholic, ritualistic sense. Certainly, it is quite distinct from the more appropriate « Andenken », which would simply imply a memento. Bruckner's attitude towards the photograph thus seems subconsciously tied to his curiosity about the relics of death. The compulsion that controls obsessional thoughts of death by grasping its physical relics finds a parallel here in the attempt to contain a fear of loneliness by assigning an almost religious value to the mementos of a potentially reciprocated desire.

The 8th Symphony is sometimes nicknamed « The Apocalyptic », but (as with the nicknames « The Tragic » for the 5th Symphony ; « The Philosophic » for the 6th ; and « The Lyric » for the 7th) this was not a name Bruckner gave to the work himself.

Anton Bruckner began work on the 8th Symphony, in July 1884. Working mainly during the summer vacations from his duties at the University of Vienna and the Vienna Conservatory, the composer had all 4 movements completed in draft form by August 1885. The orchestration of the work took Bruckner until April 1887 to complete : during this stage of composition, the order of the inner movements was reversed, leaving the Scherzo 2nd and the Adagio as the 3rd movement.

In September 1887, Bruckner had the score copied and sent to conductor Hermann Levi. Levi was one of Bruckner's closest collaborators, having given a performance of the 7th Symphony in Munich that was « the greatest triumph Bruckner had yet experienced ». He had also arranged for Bruckner's career to be supported in other ways, including financial assistance from the nobility, and an honorary doctorate from the University of Vienna. However, the conductor wrote back to Bruckner that :

« I find it impossible to perform the 8th in its current form. I just can't make it my own ! As much as the themes are magnificent and direct, their working out seems to me dubious ; indeed, I consider the orchestration quite impossible. Don't lose your courage, take another look at your work, talk it over with your friends, with Schalk, maybe a reworking can achieve something. »

By January 1888, Bruckner had come to agree with Hermann Levi that the Symphony would benefit from further work. He began work on the revision, in March 1889, and completed the new version of the Symphony, in March 1890. Once the revision was completed, the composer wrote to Emperor Franz-Josef for permission to dedicate the Symphony to him. The Emperor accepted Bruckner's request and also offered to help pay for the work's publication. Bruckner had some trouble finding a publisher for the work but, in late 1890, the Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau company agreed to undertake publication. Bruckner's associates Josef Schalk and Max von Oberleithner (1868-1935) assisted with the publication process : Franz Schalk prepared the musical text to be sent to the printer while doctor Max von Oberleithner corrected the proofs and also provided financial support. The Symphony was eventually published, in March 1892. It was the only one of Bruckner's Symphonies to be published before its 1st performance.

By the time the 1890 revision was complete, Hermann Levi was no longer conducting concerts in Munich : as a result, he recommended that his « protégé » Felix Weingartner, « Kapellmeister » of Mannheim, lead the 1st performance of the Symphony. The premiere was twice scheduled to occur under the young conductor's direction during 1891 but, each time, Weingartner substituted another work at the last minute. Eventually, the conductor told Bruckner that he was unable to undertake the performance because he was about to take-up a new position at the Berlin Opera. However, Weingartner admitted, in a letter to Levi, that the real reason that he was unable to perform the Symphony was because the work was too difficult and he did not have enough rehearsal time : in particular, the Wagner tuba players in his Orchestra did not have enough experience to cope with their parts.

After a possible Munich performance by Hermann Levi was canceled because of a feared outbreak of cholera, Anton Bruckner focused his efforts on securing a Vienna premiere for the Symphony. At last, Hans Richter, subscription conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, agreed to conduct the work. The 1st performance took place on 18 December 1892. Although some of the more conservative members of the audience left at the end of each movement, many of Bruckner's supporters were also present, including Hugo Wolf and Johann Strauß.

The well-known critic Eduard Hanslick left after the slow movement. His review described the Symphony as :

« Interesting in detail, but strange as a whole, indeed repellent. The peculiarity of this work consists, to put it briefly, in importing Wagner's dramatic style into the Symphony. »

(Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt points-out that this was less negative than Hanslick's reviews of Bruckner's earlier Symphonies.)

There were also many positive reviews from Bruckner's admirers. One anonymous writer described the Symphony as

« The crown of music in our time. »

Hugo Wolf wrote to a friend that the Symphony was :

« The work of a giant “ that ” surpasses the other Symphonies of the Master in intellectual scope, awesomeness, and greatness. »

The Symphony was slow to enter the orchestral repertoire. Only 2 further performances occurred during Bruckner's lifetime. The American premiere did not take place until 1909, while the Symphony had to wait until 1929 for its 1st London performance.

The 1887 version requires an instrumentation of 3 each of the following woodwind : flutes (the 3rd doubling as piccolo) , oboes, clarinets, bassoons (the 3rd doubling as contrabassoon) - the triple woodwinds, however, only enter in the Finale (with double woodwind for the earlier movements) - in addition to 8 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones, a quartet of Wagner tubas, which double as Horns 5-8 in the Finale, and a single contrabass tuba, along with timpani, cymbals, triangle, 3 harps, and strings. The 1890 version deletes the piccolo part, and extends the triple woodwinds on all 4 movements. In addition, the 1890 score calls for 8 horns, 4 of which double as Wagner tubas at various points in the Symphony for all movements. This was, in total, the largest Orchestra Bruckner ever used (since the 9th Symphony, which uses an otherwise identical Orchestra, does not require harps and percussion other than timpani) .

The Symphony is in 4 movements. The total duration varies by performance and the edition of the score used, but is typically around 80 minutes.

1st movement : The beginning of the Symphony. According to theorist Heinrich Schenker, this passage is « like the beginning of the world » .

The Symphony begins in a tonally ambiguous manner with a theme rhythmically reminiscent of the main-theme of the 1st movement of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in D minor, and of the March in D minor of 1862. A more song-like 2nd subject group uses the Bruckner rhythm. The 3rd subject group, which is strikingly dissonant, forms a smooth transition to the development. In structure, the opening movement is, therefore, a typically Brucknerian 3 subject Sonata form, though handled with more panache than in his previous works. The development was substantially refined, in 1890. In both versions, this section of the movement is most notable for its massive, augmented 3 part statement of the main-theme, impressively given on full Orchestra, in combination with the Bruckner rhythm of the 2nd subject group.

The beginning of the 2nd principal theme of the 1st movement : the « Bruckner rhythm » occurs in the melody, in the 1st and 3rd bars.

In the recapitulation, the 3rd theme leads to a great climax for the entire Orchestra, in which the bare rhythm of the main-theme is dominant. This suddenly breaks-off, leaving just the trumpets and 3 of the horns hammering-out the rhythm, timpani thundering beneath. When the strings and woodwinds rejoin, it is in a very dejected mood. At this juncture, the 2 versions differ significantly. In the 1887 version, this solemn passage leads to what many consider an unconvincingly premature victory Coda, which sounds the main-theme in C major. For the 1890 version, the triumphant ending was cut, and the despondent passage extended by a few bars to form a pianissimo Coda in itself (thus, becoming the only instance of a 1st movement ending softly in Bruckner's Symphonic œuvre) . This quiet, sombre ending is for low winds and low strings in a thoroughly bleak C minor, and there is no doubt from contemporary letters of Bruckner that it represented death in some way.

It has been suggested by some scholars that the Coda was inspired by the climax of the « Flying Dutchman » 's monologue in Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » , with the words : « Ihr Welten endet euren Lauf, ewige Vernichtung, nimm mich auf ! » .

2nd movement : The 1st appearance of the « Deutscher Michel » theme in the Scherzo. The « Deutscher Michel » theme is a reminiscence of the Credo of the Mass in E minor.

The main part of the Scherzo is fundamentally the same in both versions, though somewhat more repetitive in the 1st version. The orchestration and dynamics are more refined in the 2nd version, helping to give the movement a rich and original sound. The Trios, however, are quite different : the 1890 version was re-written as an adumbration of the ensuing Adagio movement, featuring the harps, and the tempo was slowed down. In both versions, this Scherzo is Bruckner's largest, lasting around 14 or 15 minutes in most performances.

3rd movement : The main difference between versions is at the climax, for which in the 1887 version Bruckner managed to insert 6 cymbal clashes. He must have thought that excessive, as he pared it down to 2, in the 1890 version. The key of this climax was also altered from C major, in 1887, to E-flat major, in 1890. The Coda of this movement is recalled in the Adagio of the 9th Symphony.

This Adagio differs from those in other Symphonies by the composer in that the 2nd thematic group is not presented in a more flowing tempo. The 2 themes are, 1st, a recollection of the slow movement of Franz Schubert's « Wanderer Fantasie » for pianoforte and an answering descending passage, both over throbbing, richly scored strings ; and, secondly, a tonally unstable passage radiant with ecstasy. The structure and scale of the Adagio as it develops these themes is grander than any of Bruckner's previous slow movements.

The Adagio is the most controversial of all the movements, in terms of different versions. For example, Robert Haas inserted one quiet, solemn passage in his edition of the 1890 score which restored a cut between 2 loud passages (before the main climax of the movement) , whereas in the Leopold Nowak edition these 2 loud passages are joined. This difference greatly affects the impression given to the listener for this section of the movement as it heads towards the great E-flat major climax. The 1890 Adagio, in both the edition of Robert Haas and that of Leopold Nowak, remains shorter than the 1887 original.

4th movement : Beginning belligerently (by Bruckner's standards) , this movement reaches a triumphant conclusion using themes (or, at least, rhythmic impressions of these) from all 4 movements. The form of this movement is complex, derived from a 3 subject Sonata structure but, like the opening movement of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, highly-individualised. The scale and complexity of this movement are both on a different level from that in the opening of the 7th Symphony, however, not least in that this movement must synthesise the entire Symphony (as it reworks old ideas and new ones into a coherent whole) , and forms what must be a satisfactory conclusion for the whole work.

The opening theme is a powerful chorale, originally given over a March, in which the rhythmic thundering of the timpani recalls certain passages in the opening movement. The 2nd subject, a song theme, is remarkable in that it recalls not only its counterpart in the 1st movement but also the Adagio. The 3rd subject is a March theme, which is a direct reworking of the introduction to the 3rd subject group of the opening movement. In the recapitulation, this 3rd theme is presented as a fugue which leads to the solemn Coda and the splendid, bright finish to the Symphony.

The development presents these 3 themes and other elements in ways which recollect earlier parts of the Symphony, both episodically and in simultaneously parallel combinations. The thematic treatment is subtle and counterpoint is frequently used in the presentation of themes. It, therefore, seems natural that such a synthesis concludes by contrapuntally combining all the main-themes of the Symphony : the Coda begins in a solemn C minor in which the opening theme of the Finale reaches a powerful climax. This is answered quietly by the woodwind giving-out the same theme, then more optimistically by the full Orchestra, from which, in a flurry of trumpets and timpani, the Scherzo theme heralds a remarkably succinct combination of all the themes in C major. For all its « grandeur », the ending is remarkably concise, and the perorations are more terse than those of, say, Bruckner's own Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major.

2 complete autograph manuscripts of the Symphony exist, dating from 1887 and 1890 respectively. More sketches exist from all phases of work on this Symphony than for most of Bruckner's works. For example, thanks to the sketches, we can see the evolution of the opening theme. Part scores show that the tonal ambiguity of the Symphony's opening was not how Bruckner originally envisaged the main-theme : the rhythm was to fit an arpeggiated contour in C minor. The final opening is much less defined and hovers in more of a B-flat major region, though it suggests several keys.

The 1887 version : Bruckner's 1st version of the Symphony, but was not published until 1972, in an edition edited by Leopold Nowak. It has some significant differences from the more familiar later versions, including a loud ending to the 1st movement and a different tonality for the climax of the slow movement. It is also notably longer than the 1890 version, and has a different instrumentation (the most significant consistent difference being that the 1890 version has triple rather than double woodwind throughout the 1st 3 movements) . The double woodwind of the 1887 version gives a somewhat more austere character to the overall sound of the work.

Some scholars support this version of the Symphony. Bryan Gilliam, for example, argues that the later version (from 1890) is shorter and smoother, and is hence a dubious concession to the Brahms loving « bourgeoisie » of the time. It was premiered by Hans-Hubert Schönzeler for the « BBC », in 1973, and has been recorded by Dennis Russell Davies, Vladimir Fedoseyev, Eliahu Inbal, Georg Tintner, Michaël Gielen and Simone Young.

The 1888 version : A fair copy of an intermediate version of the Adagio with an estimated date of 1888 exists in the Austrian National Library. It has been recorded by Akira Naito with the Tokyo New City Orchestra. The other movements have been recently reconstituted by William Carragan and performed by conductor Gert Schaller.

The 1890 version : Some scholars, such as Deryck Cooke and Robert Haas, have suggested that the 1890 revision was the product of Anton Bruckner's insecurity and pressure from his colleagues such as Josef Schalk : Cooke even referred to it as the « Bruckner & Schalk revision » . Against this, Leopold Nowak has pointed-out that there is no evidence of any hand-writing other than Bruckner's own in the 1890 manuscript. According to the testimony of Bruckner's friends and associates the composer was extremely resistant to outside interference.

The scoring of the 1890 version is fuller and more grandiloquent than the 1887 version, with subtler textures and harmonies in the woodwind in particular, allowed for by the increased size of this section of the Orchestra. It was published in 1955, in an edition edited by Leopold Nowak.

The 1892 edition : The 1st publication of the Symphony, and was also the version used at the 1st performance. It contains some relatively minor changes from the 1890 manuscript, the most notable being a 6 measure cut and a 2 bar repeated passage in the Finale. The alterations were made by Josef Schalk and doctor Max von Oberleithner (1868-1935) , almost certainly without Bruckner's direct involvement, but were probably approved by the composer before publication. Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt writes that while the 1892 edition may not be « pure Bruckner » (whatever that might be) to all appearances Bruckner authorized it, and for that reason it needs to be taken seriously. This edition is available in complete recordings by Wilhelm Furtwängler, Hans Knappertsbusch, Josef Krips, William Steinberg, George Szell, Bruno Walter and Takeo Noguchi. Serge Koussevitzky also used this edition in his severely cut broadcast performance of 1947 ; this performance, which has been preserved on disc, amounts to a wholly new « edition » .

Robert Haas published his edition of the 8th Symphony, in 1939. Haas mainly based his work on the 1890 autograph but also included some passages from the 1887 version that were changed or omitted in the 1890 score.

Haas argued that Hermann Levi's comments were a crippling blow to Bruckner's artistic confidence, even leading him to « entertain suicidal notions » , although Haas had no evidence for this. This led, Haas maintained, to Bruckner's 3 year effort to revise the 8th Symphony and many of his earlier works. This line of thought supports Robert Haas' editorial methods. Haas took what he admired from Bruckner's different versions and rolled them into his own version. He justified the rejection of various features of Bruckner's 1890 revision on biographical grounds : they are the ideas of a Bruckner who mistrusted his own judgment and, therefore, non Brucknerian.

The most significant omissions that Anton Bruckner made (and, therefore, of Haas's restorations) are in the Adagio and Finale of the work. In addition, Robert Haas inserted 8 measures into the Finale that he appears to have composed himself by combining the harmonies of the 1887 manuscript with material Bruckner penciled into the margin of the 1890 score, discarding 5 measures of Bruckner's own music in the process. There were no footnotes or other indication in Haas's edition that these changes had been made. Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt has described these interventions as « exceeding reasonable limits of scholarly responsibility » . Despite its dubious scholarship, Haas's edition has proved enduringly popular : conductors such as Herbert von Karajan, Bernard Haitink and Günter Wand continued to use it even after the Leopold Nowak 1890 edition was published, while noted Bruckner conductor Georg Tintner has written that the Haas edition is « the best » version of the Symphony and referred to Haas himself as « brilliant » . On the other hand, Eugen Jochum used Haas's edition for his 1st recording, made in 1949, before Leopold Nowak published his edition, and Nowak's for his subsequent recordings, while Wilhelm Furtwängler, despite having given the premiere of the Haas score, reverted to the 1892 edition, in his final years.

The controversy over the Robert Haas edition centers on the fact that its musical text was a fabrication of the editor and was never approved by Bruckner himself. In particular Leopold Nowak, who succeeded Haas as principal editor of the Bruckner Complete Works, argued that there is little evidence for the psychological breakdown that Haas claimed Bruckner suffered upon Hermann Levi's rejection of the work. Bruckner's letters, at the time, suggest that he was frustrated by Levi's judgment (dismissing Levi as having a « hard time grasping things ») and psychologically healthy. Bruckner's revisions, according to this view, are the result of his artistic perfectionism. Nowak, therefore, rejected Haas' approach by sticking closely to Bruckner's autograph scores. Since its publication, Nowak's edition of the 1890 version has become more popular than Haas's, although Haas's is still often performed.

However, on examining the microfilm of the original manuscript of 1890 version, the passages allegedly added by Robert Haas, from the 1887 version, are virtually all there. What Haas actually did was to restore certain passages that Anton Bruckner had crossed-out. In a letter, Bruckner wrote to the conductor Felix Weingartner, on January 1891, he mentioned the hope that these cut passages would prove « valid for posterity, and for a circle of friends and connoisseurs ». According to Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, however, this commentary actually applies to cuts in the Finale suggested to Weingartner, in October 1890, now lost, with the request, on March 1891, of not modifying physically the score so that the orchestral parts remain unaltered for publication.

In an 1891 letter to conductor Felix Weingartner, Bruckner gave extra-musical associations to several parts of the Symphony :

« In the 1st movement, the trumpet and horn passage based on the rhythm of the main-theme in the “ Todesverkündigung ” (the Annunciation of Death) , which gradually grows stronger, and finally emerges very strongly. At the end : surrender. Scherzo : Main theme named “ Deutscher Michel ”. In the 2nd part, the fellow wants to sleep, and in his dreamy state cannot find his tune : finally, he plaintively turns back. Finale : At the time, our Emperor received the visit of the Czars at Olmütz ; thus, strings : the Cossacks ; brass : military music ; trumpets : fanfares, as the Majesties meet. In closing, all themes thus as “ Deutscher Michel ” arrives home from his journey, everything is already gloriously brilliant. In the Finale, there is also the death March and then brass transfiguration. »

« Deutscher Michel » is a national symbol reflecting the Germans' conception of their own character. « Deutscher Michel » started-out in the 16th Century as a sleepy country person. Over time, the image and its meaning have changed to represent political opposition, innocent victims and many other aspects of German social life. The image can, in some ways, be compared to others such as the British « John Bull » , the American « Uncle Sam » and the French « Marianne » . Now, « Deutscher Michel » is portrayed as a sleepy character with a night cap.

...

« Der Deutsche Michel » (The German Michel) is a figure representing the national character of the German people, rather as « John Bull » represents the British and « Uncle Sam » represent the Americans.

Such figures differ from those that serve as personifications of the nation itself, as « Germania » did the German nation and « Marianne » the French. He is usually depicted wearing a nightcap and nightgown, sometimes in the colours of the German flag, and represents the Germans' conception of themselves, especially in his easy-going nature and « Everyman » appearance. In German, « Michel » is also the short form of « Michaël » , though quite rare today.

Bruckner's associates report other comments that the composer is said to have made about the Symphony. The Coda to the 1st movement is how it is when one is on his deathbed, and opposite hangs a clock, which, while his life comes to an end, beats on ever steadily : tick, tock, tick, tock while, in the slow movement : « I have gazed too deeply into a maiden's eyes. » .

In an unsigned programme note, at the 1892 1st performance, Josef Schalk elaborated Bruckner's program, adding references to Greek mythology (Aeschylus's Prometheus, Zeus or Kronos) mixed with a few Christian references such as the « Archangel Michaël » .

Over the recorded lifetime of this Symphony, significantly different approaches have been taken, including tempo choices and the choice of score.

Wilhelm Furtwängler, in a live performance with the Vienna Philharmonic in 1944, used a modified Haas edition.

On 29 September 1944, the « Preussische Staatskapelle Berlin » , conducted by Herbert von Karajan, recorded the last 3 movements of the 8th Symphony with the Finale in experimental stereophonic sound. In his interpretation, Karajan kept strict metre whereas « recordings from the 1940's typically present this passage (the reprise of the 3rd subject group in the Finale) as a grand accelerando - rallentando, with a tempo increase of as much as 20 % » , while Karajan's recording « is a notable exception » .

The 1st commercial recording of the complete Symphony was made by Eugen Jochum with the Hamburg State Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1949, for « Deutsche Grammophon » . Jochum later recorded it in studio with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1964, for « Deutsche Grammophon » and, in 1976, with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » for « EMI » using the Leopold Nowak 1890 edition, both times. Karl Böhm, in a studio recording with the Vienna Philharmonic, in 1976, for « Deutsche Grammophon » used the Nowak 1890 edition, but with one Haas passage in the Finale.

In the last 2 decades of the 20th Century, recordings tended to « set a broader basic tempo, abstain from dramatic tempo fluctuations (especially increases) and place great store by fullness of tone, precise ensemble, and textural clarity » .

Typically, this work lasts about 80 minutes, although there are performances running as long as 103 minutes. Herbert von Karajan and the aforementioned Günter Wand each recorded the Robert Haas hybrid version more than once. After Elisha Inbal recorded the 1887 version, for the 1st time, other conductors have followed. Takashi Asahina has recorded a disc comparing excerpts from the Robert Haas and Leopold Nowak editions.

...

A contemporary critic slated its « nightmarish hang-over style » , but Bruckner's last completed Symphony contains music of sheer, breathtaking magnificence.

Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony is the last he would complete. He never lived to finish his 9th (although, he came agonisingly close to completing the Finale, music that's still shamefully little heard in concert halls) , so the 8th is the summation of his Symphonic journey. And what a summit the 8th is ! Bruckner himself said when he finished the work's gigantic, revelatory Finale : « Hallelujah ! » . « The Finale is the most significant movement of my life. » Themes from all of the work's huge movements sound together at the end of the Symphony, a moment that burns with what Robert Simpson calls a « blazing calm » . It's the end point of a 75 minute (well, up to 100 minutes, if you are conductor Sergiù Celibidache) Symphonic journey, and it's one of the most existentially thrilling experiences a Symphony has ever created. Bruckner's achievement is to make you feel, when you get there, that the whole experience of the piece is contained and transfigured in this crowning coming together of Symphonic space and time, and that the work's sublime darkneses (like the terrifying abysses of dissonance in the 1st movement, the kind of music that conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler described as Bruckner's « battle of demons ») and its equally transcendent light, like the climax of the slow movement, are simultaneously vindicated and vanquished by the sheer, breathtaking magnificence of this music, the last Symphonic Coda that Bruckner would ever compose.

But Bruckner's journey to the work's 1st performance, by the Vienna Philharmonic in 1892, was as tortuous as the music is (sometimes) serene. He finished a 1st version of the piece in 1887, and sent it to the conductor Hermann Levi, « my artistic father » , who had already conducted the 7th Symphony with huge success in Munich. Levi rejected the piece, saying it was basically unperformable ; Bruckner was wounded, but returned to the piece to effectively recompose it over the next few years. And instead of the weak minded naif who never got over people's criticism (as Bruckner is sometimes described) his revision amounts to a much deeper act of recomposition than simply answering Levi's concerns. The 1st movement ended in 1887 with a major-key triumph ; in 1892, the audience heard instead music that winds down in minor key desolation with a repeated, exhausted, death rattle of a sigh in the violas. Bruckner himself wrote about this desperate moment, the only time in his life that he composed a Symphonic 1st movement that didn't end with a fanfare of fortissimo power : « This is how it is when one is on his deathbed, and opposite hangs a clock, which, while his life comes to its end, beats on ever steadily : tick, tock, tick, tock. » . The other movements were also subtly but profoundly recalibrated ; the effect is an intensification and sharpening of focus of Bruckner's musical ideas.

So all should have been set for the greatest night of his life at the premiere. And while the « Musikverein » was full of the great and good, including Johannes Brahms, Hugo Wolf and Johann Strauß, and with Bruckner's partisan supporters out in force, the naysayers were there as well. Brahms thought of Bruckner's works as « Symphonic bo-constrictors » , and the critic Eduard Hanslick (who left before the Symphony's Finale) wrote grudgingly, « In each of the 4 movements, especially the 1st and 3rd, some interesting passages, flashes of genius, shine through. If only the rest of it was not there ! It is not impossible that the future belongs to this nightmarish hangover style - a future we therefore do not envy ! » . Just as well he didn't stay till the end, Bruckner thought ; he would only have become « even angrier » .

Today, Bruckner's 8th should still be controversial. This is a piece that is attempting something so extraordinary that if you're not prepared to encounter its expressive demons, or to be shocked and awed by the places Bruckner's imagination takes you, then you're missing out on the essential experience of the Symphony. If you think of Bruckner only as a creator of Symphonic cathedrals of mindful (or mindless, according to taste) spiritual contemplation, who wields huge chunks of musical material around like an orchestral stone mason with implacable, monumental perfection, then you won't hear the profoundly disturbing drama of what he's really up to. That unsettling darkness is sounded right at the start of this Symphony. Instead of setting out on a journey in which the outcome is certain, in which everything is its rightful place in the Symphonic, tonal, and structural universe, Bruckner builds his grandest Symphonic edifice on musical quicksand. The 8th starts with an unstable tremor of a semi-tone in the violas, cellos, and basses, which turns into a snaking, searching, chromatic collection of fragments. It's not so much a theme as a series of atomic musical explorations, and all of them in the wrong key. This is a Symphony « in » C minor, and, yet, in the early stages of the 1st movement, that home key is confirmed more by how much Bruckner avoids it instead of how much he inhabits it. You can describe the progress of this whole opening movement in terms of sonata forms and 2nd and 3rd themes and the other trainspotting jargon of the Symphonic rulebook, but that scarcely relates to the experience of living inside this music, which is what you will feel happens when you hear it. One special moment to listen out for : the cataclysm at the centre of the movement that results in one of the emptiest, most desolate musical landscapes Bruckner, or anyone else, ever conceived : a single flute that somehow survives the onslaught to play a remnant of the orchestral tutti over tolling, funereal tattoos in the trumpets and chromatic sighs in the basses.

All of this intensity invites a search for meaning. Bruckner's music is open to our imaginations, and he even suggested possible interpretations himself for the Symphony. In a letter to the conductor Felix Weingartner, he said that the Scherzo, which comes 2nd in this Symphony (the 1st time Bruckner places the Scherzo before the slow movement in a Symphony) is a portrait of the figure of « German Michaël » , a bucolic rustic from German folk tradition. The somnolent, radiant, harp-haloed Trio section of the Scherzo depicts Michaël dreaming, Bruckner says.

The opening of the Finale is inspired by the Cossacks, as the Russians had recently visited the Austrian Emperor, to whom the 8th is dedicated ; this movement also features « the death march and then (brass) transfiguration » . Bruckner doesn't talk about the slow movement, but the Adagio, the 3rd movement, is the huge, generous heart of the Symphony ; a consoling, palpitating dream in D flat major whose opening is the closest Bruckner ever came to an evocation of the erotic ; yet, that bodily experience is transfigured into a blindingly radiant climax that seems to speak for the universe rather than mere individual figures.

Or maybe that's just me : you will make-up your own mind, because the power of this piece can't be limited by any single interpretation, whether that's Bruckner's words, or the vision a particular conductor has of this Symphony. But as you listen to that awe inspiring but intimate, visionary but coherent Finale (whose drama again can't be explicated by the crude pigeonholes of musical rules and regulations ; instead, its « form » is phenomenological, something you just have to experience) I think you should hear the darkness as much as the « blazing calm » of the Coda. It's in its acceptance of doubt, darkness, and despair that this Symphony achieves its real glory. Bruckner's 8th is an act of enormous empathetic consolation because it's unafraid to confront and to recognise sublime terror and darkness as well as light. Just like him when he wrote the piece, you need to feel engaged in that « battle of demons » when you're listening.

...

The Upper-Austrian Youth Symphony Orchestra, composed of approximately 130 musicians with an average age of 17 performed the Symphony No. 8 at the « Stiftsbasilika Sankt Florian » with the conductor Rémy Ballot. The unanimously positive response from audience and music-critics alike can be gathered from the following quotes from reviews :

« Suddenly, the doors to Paradise stood wide open, the eternal transfiguration promised in the beyond is now palpable ! And who is playing ? Not some aesthetically unapproachable Vienna, Berlin or Munich Philharmonic, but the Upper-Austrian Youth Symphony Orchestra consisting of about 130 members and conducted by Rémy Ballot, who achieved the miracle of this production with the way he shaped his tempos and his subtle dynamics. »

(Upper-Austrian composer, Balduin Sulzer)

The doyen of Upper-Austrian music-criticism, Doctor Franz Zamazal, wrote :

« The “ Sankt Florian Bruckertage ” made the unbelievable achievable : the Upper-Austrian Youth Symphony Orchestra, under the French conductor Rémy Ballot, in the Saint-Florian abbey church made an enormous impression with its performance of the mighty Symphony No. 8 by Anton Bruckner. Intense, thrilling playing with a powerful sound, vested with considerable joy of playing, were experienced. The conductor Rémy Ballot's actions were free from any posturing and he led the Orchestra calmly through the score. The 8th Symphony required 104 minutes (!) to unfold fully, which flew by and was entirely in accord with the church's architecture and its acoustic. The grandiose Adagio exhibited long arcs that were embedded in the manifold and expressive dramatic course without loss of tension. The Finale followed Bruckner's instructions, joining the 1st 3 movements into a tremendous structure full of the hopes and fears of an artist, connected moreover to an overwhelming effect. Seconds of silence were followed by roaring applause. The concert showed that the Upper-Austrian Youth Symphony Orchestra is excellently positioned. »

The performance also caused a sensation internationally. Here is an extract from the review by Ken Ward, editor of the world-renowned « Bruckner Journal » (London, August 2014) :

« The triumphant close of Bruckner's vast 8th Symphony, where (as conductor Rémy Ballot wrote in the programme booklet) there is “ in truth, no ending, but a final ‘ baptism in light ’, a vision of eternity, of hope, of the elevation of humanity into a timeless dimension ”, was not only Bruckner's triumph, but that of the quite superlative Upper-Austrian Youth Orchestra. In this mighty Coda, paced at a grandly slow tempo, each internal paragraph shaped and measured to perfection, they presented with indomitable power the superimposition of the main-themes of each movement in a resplendent C major : it resounded through the Abbey, pulsating with energy and shining like silver and gold.

It was as long a performance of this Symphony as you are likely to hear, lasting over 1 hour 44 minutes. Partly, this was because Mæstro Ballot did what the score asks for : the Finale is to begin ‘ Solemnly, not fast ’ - it did ; and the indication for the 2nd theme is 'Slower' - it was ; and there is nothing to say that the 3rd theme group should quicken-up - and it sounded very slow indeed. It's a little march-like theme that suddenly stops for a 'long pause', whereupon, out of the silence, a wonderful visionary chorale on high-strings and winds descends as though from heaven : the Youth Orchestra played it as though they were angels ; it was (as the saying goes) 'a moment to die for.'

Partly, the length was due to the need to perform to the special acoustic of this vast, reverberant sacred building : it's pointless ploughing on at speed if the music flounders within its own echo, and the conductor responded with patience and creative integrity to the voice of Bruckner's church. Of course, it's risky to go so slow, but the benefits were manifold. There are some woodwind solos (the oboe in the 1st movement development, the flute and clarinets' descending scale in the Adagio 2nd theme) that were played with such slow, passionate inwardness that one hardly dared breathe for fear of destroying the holy silence by which they were surrounded. And, at this slow tempo, the massive climaxes were as though spelt-out syllable by syllable, the young musicians voicing the old composer's message of holy dread.

The Adagio was, for me, as perfect a performance as I'm likely to hear, over half an hour of some of the most beautiful and visionary music the composer ever wrote. The passionately expressive string playing this Orchestra provided for its conductor belied their immaturity. That they could rehearse and perform such a sustained and intense performance as this seemed nothing short of miraculous. »

« My 8th is a mystery ! »

Like all of Anton Bruckner's works, the 8th Symphony also has a dramatic biography : begun in 1884, the Master at 60 years of age was at his peak, having at long last arrived at his arduous, hard-won life's goal. This was the year of the world-wide triumph of his 7th Symphony, which arose only after decades of demoralizing debacles, failures, humiliation, lack of understanding, deliberate hostilities and unwanted musical ideologies. It was with the 7th, in 1884, that Bruckner achieved his absolute, incontrovertible world-wide breakthrough as a « Symphonist ». Reveling in this good fortune, he could hardly divine the major set-back that was to come.

Now confirmed as one of the world's leading Symphonist, Bruckner planned his 8th Symphony as a crowning achievement - which, only after years of labor pains, was to become the key-work of the 19th Century that was coming to a close.

Bruckner proudly sent the 1st version of the 8th to his favourite conductor and significant supporter, Hermann Levi, where it met with complete (initially justified ?) incomprehension. Levi touchingly undertook thoughtful attempts (with the written aid of the Schalk brothers) to articulate his irritation and weighty concerns to the initially optimistic Master, in empathy, assured sympathy, and with all reverence for the composer. Despite all caution, these messages resulted in despondency, self-doubt and excessive (self-destructive ?), furious revision of his scores - naturally, going back many years and affecting several Symphonies. As is well-known, the (life-)time that fell victim to this « revision mania » brought Bruckner (and us) to the end of the Finale of the 9th Symphony : Bruckner had begun working on this movement already, in 1887, which underwent 9 years (the 9th !) of continuous and ultimately incomplete composition.

Returning to the successful revision of the 8th. Following long-delayed emotional re-assurance and the composer's tenuously rediscovered self-confidence, the 2nd version was completed. This version achieved all compositional goals of the « great Symphonic tradition » under the motto « Per aspera ad astra » (A rough road leads to the stars) . As the Bruckner scholar Professor Paul Hawkshaw (from Yale School of Music, USA) once showed in a Symposium in Saint-Florian dedicated to the 8th Symphony, the aid of Bruckner's well-known « students » , the Schalk brothers, in the labor-intensive revision of the major work turned-out to be (for once) thoroughly constructive. The famous « Totenuhr » (deathwatch) , the closing of the 1st movement which fades to nothing, thus, 1st appears in Franz Schalk's handwriting and was, later, incorporated into the score by Bruckner.

Bruckner expressed his gratitude to Levi :

« Surely, I have reason to be ashamed of myself (this time, at least) for the 8th. What an ass I am !!! Now, it already looks different. »

Among the many reasons for the uniqueness of this Symphony, one stands-out in particular : in the end, all 4 main-themes from all 4 movements are played simultaneously. « The beginning lies in the end, the end lies in the beginning. » (Conductor Sergiù Celibidache) . All contradictions are resolved, all oppositions united into a triumphant apotheosis - an incomparable moment in Symphonic history. During his 1885 summer vacation, in the 2nd year of work on the 8th, Bruckner « experimented » in the « Stadtpfarrh » of Steyr on this thematic « 4 layeredness » (sic !), which was to transform the 8th into a musical and architectural circle. In the margin, the elated experimenter noted :

« Steyr, Stadtpfarrhof 16. August 1885. A. Bruckner mp. Halleluja ! »

The world-premiere of the 8th Symphony, on 18 December 1892, was Bruckner's 1st major triumph in Vienna. The conductor Hans Richter and the brilliant Vienna Philharmonic observed all of the daring and self-confident instructions called for by the composer :

« ... as a single piece of music ! No so-called virtuoso pieces whatsoever ! Neither before nor after ! The Symphony itself requires, at least, 80 minutes ! »

(From Bruckner's letters to Hans Richter, published in 2013 by the Anton Bruckner Institut Linz - ABIL.)

Emperor Franz-Josef accepted the dedication and generously assumed the printing costs, yet as always prioritized his beloved hobby of hunting over attending the concert.

Following the world-premiere, Hugo Wolf wrote :

« This Symphony is the creation of a giant. It was a complete victory of light over darkness ! »

Johann Strauß telegraphed to Bruckner :

« I am completely shaken. It was one of the greatest impressions in my life ! »

The day after the epochal premiere, Johann Strauß called to a friend of Bruckner's on the street :

« Hey, yesterday, I heard a Symphony by Bruckner ! It was simply great ! Bring him to me one of these days ! »

Feeling honoured, Bruckner accepted the invitation of the most-performed composer in music history and addressed Johann Strauß in his well-known submissive manner with « Großmeister » (grand Master) . Yet, Strauß staved-off the subservience with his usual poise and adroitness and replied in a respectful, collegial tone :

« Now, now, you are the grand Master. I'm just a simple sub-urban composer. The Symphony was truly wonderful ! »

In the presence of the sculptor Viktor Oskar Tilgner, who created the Bruckner bust, the evening reached convivially Symphonic dimensions.

Empathy, Inspiration, Resolution, Light

(Thoughts on the 8th Symphony by conductor Rémy Ballot.)

Filled with gratitude and a feeling of self-worth as a Symphonist for the 1st time, Bruckner commenced work on the 8th, his last completed Symphony, his « Masterpiece » . Composed 6 years prior to his death (did he presage his end ?) in retrospect, it appears like his life's balance sheet, entirely unflinchingly directed towards an ultimate victory over death and darkness. « Per aspera ad astra ! » Like all great music, it expresses a truth that reaches beyond the boundaries of humanly graspable dimensions. The 8th would unite the qualities of all of Bruckner's previous Symphonies : the mysticism of the 5th ; the conciseness of the 4th ; the harmonic and thematic inventiveness of the 7th ; and, of course, the 4th and its resolution in the Coda.

What do we hear, feel, experience in the 8th ? Longing ? Grief ? Love ?

When the 2nd theme of the 1st movement sings, can one feel an August day, one on which night falls over the apple trees full of ripe fruits ? Happiness, only imaginary, tinged by longing, hardly lived ? Failed love ? The scent of freshly cut hay ? The innocence of feelings of people who only know country life ? All of this is expressed in only a few notes. It is characteristic of this Symphony that Bruckner never lingers at the suggested impressions but rather fluidly and with a perfect sense of proportion elides from one musical image to the next. The « genius out of nowhere » composed this Symphony, as always, with exceptionally economical, concisely interrelated thematic material. In the whole diversity of this work, the uniformity of all thematic building blocks that spans over all 4 movements is still without comparison to this day.

One of the fascinating characteristic traits of the 8th Symphony is the dynamics, designed with great architectural farsightedness : contrary to the original meaning of the word, they grow-out of neither a mobilizing of power nor sonic force. Rather, the dynamics are much more akin to a cosmic ladder, strengthened in their thematic homogeneity by unshakable confidence. The dynamics are also achieved through harmonic progressions that are breathtaking to this day. The rich instrumentation and the presence of tubas and harps lend the Orchestral sound at once a dark and yet bright, sometimes unreal colour. How could one not feel the breath of the cosmos or even experience weightlessness when the « annunciation of death » (as the Master referred to it several times in his letters) is played by the horns and later the tubas ? And, immediately thereafter, when in the course of the unfolding musical events, it reverts briefly to felicity ? And, at the end of the 1st movement (described by Bruckner as a « Totenuhr » , a deathwatch) , ebbing away into nothingness.

In the Scherzo, the middle-section, the Trio, might thoroughly conform to a « program » , as was customary at the time, perhaps describing contemporary country life in Upper-Austria. The theme exhibits nostalgic intensity and, possibly, illustrates the composer's great life disappointments - moments of happiness that can only be lived in imagination and creativity. Yet, a regal motive follows, played by the brass - we suddenly find ourselves in the middle of a village, sunlit, in Festival clothing, the church square richly decorated, the ladies adorned with flower wreaths : the bridal couple is ready to enter the church.

The 3rd movement, Adagio, with its slow and salutary « Buddhist » breathing, is ostensibly full of beauty, yet, at the same time, it derives from futile erotic passion. The genesis of this movement has been handed-down by Bruckner himself :

« I probably once looked a girl too deeply in her eyes. » ...

whereby, the rejection by the venerated Viennese young lady Marie Demar is meant. Sublimated compositionally, in its thematic development, it describes a path to another world. The eroticism melds with the divine, the inner-conflict manifests itself in the music. The strings accompaniment at the beginning of the movement (a written-out heartbeat) is, of course, reminiscent of the 2nd scene of Act 2 of « Tristan » , yet, in an entirely different function and connotation. The strings' lyrical themes could entirely mirror openly incurable wounds such as those of Amfortas in « Parsifal » . They heal only at the end of the movement, in the Coda. They awaken in us compassion and empathy. They remind us of our own mortality - phenomena that we find in all previous great Symphonic Masterworks.

In the Finale, there is (like, later, in the 9th Symphony) a Gothic-Medieval character, often typical of Bruckner, in the 3rd theme played by the strings in unison - as a final approach, a final path to the monumental Coda. This penitent pilgrim's path, which following the grandly composed return of the opening theme leads to the rhythmic return of the 1st movement's « annunciation of death » , dissolves in extended agony - expressed by the twilight of the harmonic characteristic style of the violin as an epilog. It also encompasses (immediately prior to the Coda) all suffering, all desperation, all of the sins of the world through the articulation of the lonely « lifeless flutes » , all the way to the nearly inaudible strikes of the timpani in order to extinguish into emptiness, into nothingness, into a vacuum.

Yet, like earlier in the 4th and 5th Symphonies, when all the tensions that arise from the compositional diversity are resolved following the structural climax (the return of the very 1st theme) and « the work is thereby complete », the phoenix rises one last time out of the ashes to reach its summit in the union of the main-themes of all 4 movements. And, in reality, there will be no end ; this is one last « baptism by light », a vision of eternity, hope, the elevation of humankind to a timeless dimension.

Personal reflections on the work by Patrick C. Waller

Introduction

I have long since given-up hope of being invited onto Desert Island Discs but allow myself occasional fantasies. Over the years, my 8 discs would have changed considerably ... and I would now find it almost impossible to choose them. However, the piece I would choose for the « if you could only take only one » disc has remained unchanged for many years : Bruckner's 8th Symphony. This article attempts to explain why. I will also describe the work from a listener's perspective and consider the merits of some of the recordings which have been made. I am a music-lover rather than a musician or musicologist, so please don't expect anything erudite. If you know and love this work, there is probably little I can add to your understanding. My target audience is people who are discovering Bruckner and my aim is to help them to get to know this great Symphony.

In 1976, I was a student in Sheffield and a season-ticket holder for the Philharmonic concerts held in the City Hall. The resident Orchestra was the « Hallé » and their chief conductor James Loughran. One Friday night, Bruckner's music was on the programme - a composer I had not even heard of previously. Had I looked him up in my copy of the 9th edition of the Oxford Companion to Music (as I probably did) , I would have read the following quote :

« He was half Cæsar and half a village school Master : such men are, in art or life, difficult to place. »

Hardly words which would have produced great expectations. The piece being played was his most popular work (the 4th Symphony) and, at the concert, I was quite simply blown away by the music. By 10 o'clock the next morning, I was the owner of a tape of Karajan's then recent « DGG » recording and, by that evening, I had played it several times.

Of course, I then wanted to hear more of this composer and, soon afterwards, came across (and immediately bought) LPs of the 7th and 8th Symphonies in recordings conducted by Eduard van Beinum and Jascha Horenstein, respectively. Initially, the 7th Symphony appealed to me more but a friend to whom I lent the discs was immediately taken with the Adagio of the 8th. I soon came to understand that, and the 8th Symphony became a work which I played frequently. Since the work lasts for around 80 minutes, I invested a lot of time in getting to know it. 28 years later, my enthusiasm is undimmed.

A year or so later, I was delighted to see the 8th Symphony on the programme of a « Hallé » concert (under Loughran) and I heard it live for the 1st time. Alfred Brendel played Robert Schumann Piano Concerto in the 1st half. This was one of the most memorable concerts I have yet been to. I used to sit in the « choir » behind the Orchestra and recall that, as the Orchestra began the great crescendo in the Coda of the Finale (about a minute or so from the end of the work) , an elderly lady in the stalls got up and trotted-out, presumably to catch the last bus. Probably, the greatest live performance I have yet heard was at the 1985 « Proms » when Günter Wand conducted the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra.

Composition and Editions

In order to understand the composition of the 8th Symphony, some background is necessary. Bruckner was a devout Catholic, a rather simple man and a late developer. He was about 40 before he attempted Symphonic composition and his 1st four numbered attempts (there are 2 prior attempts, often known as No. 0 and No. 00) , written between 1866 and 1880, taxed him greatly. All were subject to revisions and there is scope for endless debate about which edition is best and what the composer's final intentions were (some of the revisions having being suggested or made by others) . Obviously, Bruckner wanted his works performed and the length of his Symphonies was a barrier. Many of the revisions were, therefore, cuts and often they added to structural problems which Bruckner had not quite solved. Curiously, a major revision of the 1st Symphony was undertaken after completion of the 8th. Many Brucknerians prefer the earlier version of the 1st and wish that he had spent the time on the 9th Symphony (which remained incomplete at his death) . The 5th, 6th and 7th Symphonies, however, flowed more easily between 1878 and 1883 and were not subject to significant revisions. The 7th was played in the « Leipzig Gewandhaus » under the baton of Arthur Nikisch, in 1884, and, for the 1st time, Bruckner triumphed. Sadly, he was never to hear the 5th played.

Bruckner set to work on the 8th, in 1884, and it was complete in 1887. He sent the score to one of his admirers, the conductor Hermann Levi and was distraught at his less than enthusiastic response. Nevertheless, he spent 3 years revising the Symphony in many ways. Most importantly, he omitted his traditional « blaze-up » Coda of the 1st movement and introduced a quiet ending. He also completely replaced the Trio in the 2nd movement. Most people (including me) take the view that Bruckner improved the work markedly - an inspired response to criticism. The 2nd version of 1890 is almost invariably played in preference to the 1st version but there is the complicating factor of editions.

In the 1930's, Robert Haas produced editions of most of Bruckner's Symphonies for the International Bruckner Society. In trying to put together the « best » versions for performance, he had a lot of difficult decisions to make about some of them but had no difficulty in opting for the 2nd version of the 8th. However, he believed a few of revisions, made between 1887 and 1890, were disadvantageous to the structure and / or the specific suggestions of others, notably Josef Schalk. He, therefore, added some passages from the 1st edition, which had been excised, back into the 2nd version.

In the 1950's, Leopold Nowak took-over and set-out to produce editions representing Bruckner's final intentions. In 1955, he published the 2nd version of the 8th as Bruckner left it and, since then, there has been much debate about the merits of Haas versus Nowak. In 1972, Nowak also published the 1st version of the score and this was then performed for the 1st time and recorded. Haas's edition is probably still the most widely played and, certainly, the most recorded version of the work. His version lasts about 90 seconds longer than Nowak's and musicologists tend to argue that it is preferable. As a listener, I agree, primarily because the build-up to the great climax of the adagio seems more effective. However, I am happy to listen to the work in either version and, for me, this should not be a major factor for or against a particular recording. One practical point, however, is that if you want a score, buying the Nowak is easy whereas finding Haas may be more of a challenge.

A brief guide to the work

Bruckner's 8th has no programme but I have occasionally come across the soubriquet « Apocalyptic » (for example, in the 9th edition of the Oxford Companion to Music) . I do not know where this comes from and suspect it could be exclusive to the English-speaking world (as for Beethoven's « Emperor » Concerto) . In the sense of the word meaning « revelation » , it might be appropriate but this Symphony is not about the end of the world !

This work is in 4 movements with the Adagio placed 3rd. The key is C minor (with the Adagio in D-flat) and it is of interest that Bruckner's 1st 2 numbered Symphonies were both in C minor and that he had not since returned to the key. Tonality is very important, the 1st, 2nd and last movements are rooted in the home key and the Adagio is in D-flat, providing a markedly contrasting atmosphere. When Bruckner composed this work the world was just a few years away from atonal music - but, despite very imaginative harmonies, it seems light years away when you listen to it. The 1st 2 movements both last about 15 minutes, the Adagio is immensely long-breathed and takes about 25 minutes and the Finale takes, at least, 20 minutes. As with all Bruckner's works, a large Orchestra is required but this is the only one in which he used a harp ; to great effect, notably in the Trio and Adagio.

Below, I shall attempt to describe the main features of the work. It is intended that this could be read whilst listening to the work. A score is not necessary but would obviously be an advantage. Since it is one of the most readily available recordings, timings are taken from Karajan's 1988 « DGG » recording. If, as they might well do, any passing musicologist should spot glaring errors, please forgive them.

I. Allegro moderato.

Over a tremolando on the violins, the 1st theme enters immediately and quietly in the lower-strings. At 58 seconds, the tremolando is repeated fortissimo and the main-theme iterated majestically in the brass. After a long diminuendo, at 2 minutes, 10 seconds, the gently rising 2nd theme appears in the 1st violins with string accompaniment. Intensely beautiful and expressive, this seems to emerge-out of nothing, despite the absence of any pause. The 1st bar suggests D or G major but the final 3 bars take us back to the home-key. The woodwinds and, then, brass answer in music that, in just a few bars, conveys many moods, varying from sombre to exultant. After some development, there are 5 bars of increasingly prominent pizzicato on the strings before, at 4 minutes, 27 seconds, the 3rd theme bursts in fortissimo on the brass. This is based on a very simple downward progression in triplets but, by repeating it several times a tone higher and layering the sound between the instruments, Bruckner achieves a monumental effect.

Eventually, harmony is restored at 5 minutes, 20 seconds with a massive climax using a relative major (E-flat) chord. The music rapidly dies to pianissimo and returns to the 1st theme. Initially mysterious, Bruckner, here, conveys a very different mood to the opening - almost pastoral but ever ambiguous. The thematic material is shared between brass and woodwind, the upper-strings play tremolando and lower ones, pizzicato. Eventually, there is a diminuendo and it is time to return to the 2nd theme (7 minutes, 45 seconds) . As before, this emerges from nowhere in the 1st violins but, here, it is inverted (i.e. , downward moving) . The expressive calm of this theme is only brief as Bruckner is soon moving steadily towards a massive climax (which occurs at 9 minutes, 13 seconds) , primarily based on material from the 1st theme. Ultimately, this dies to a premonition of the ending, at 9 minutes, 44 seconds, following which Bruckner prepares us for a return to the 2nd theme in its original form. This occurs at 12 minutes, 13 seconds, and is played, here, in the relative major. As before, this leads into the 1st theme (13 minutes, 59 seconds) 1st stated boldly but, then, dropping to pianissimo before building to a massive climax at 14 minutes, 52 seconds. This ends with repeated Cs in the brass, giving-out the underlying dotted rhythm. At 15 minutes, 47 seconds, the music suddenly breaks-off and gives way to the powerful quiet Coda which is so much more effective than in the 1st version. Wisps of the 1st theme are played by the clarinet, the timpani trills at piano-pianissimo and the strings convey an intense feeling of mystery before ending with repeated pizzicatos in the tonic key. Some spice is added by the violas. The 1st movement of all Bruckner's other Symphonies ends in a blaze of sound but this passage seems so conclusive that it now seems hard to believe that he initially conceived a loud ending.

2. Scherzo: Allegro moderato ; Trio : Langsam.

A repeated appoggiatura on the horn and downward chromatic progression in the violins lead into the simple main-theme on the violas and cellos, after just 2 bars. Unlike the 1st movement, where tonality is initially ambiguous, this is firmly in the home-key. The theme is built on repetition, as is the whole of the 1st section. The punctuating appoggiaturas are repeated on the oboes and, soon, the main-theme is transferred to the brass. Gradually, a huge climax builds but the music breaks-off abruptly after, at 1 minutes, 50 seconds, and, in the 2nd section, the woodwinds muse whilst the strings play an inverted version of their underlying progression. At 3 minutes, 58 seconds, the mood is broken by a crescendo of pizzicatos in the violins, leading to a return of the main-theme, at 4 minutes, 15 seconds. A variant of the opening section leads to a massive climax and a repeat of the abrupt ending of the 1st section (at 6 minutes, 2 seconds) . After 2 beats of silence, the Trio provides a much contrasting, plaintive atmosphere in duple time. Initially, the strings dominate but, at 7 minutes, 11 seconds, the brass enter and rapidly build a climax which dies away amongst rising figures in the strings which are answered in the woodwind. At 7 minutes, 41 seconds, the harp enters to accompany a gentle motif in the horns and pizzicato strings. This is followed by the violins returning to the plaintive feeling of the opening (at 8 minutes, 1 second) before the main-theme of the Trio is recapitulated, at 8 minutes, 51 seconds. The brass climax is also repeated before the harp and flutes bring the Trio to an end, in pastoral vein. The Scherzo is then repeated unchanged.

3. Adagio : Feierlich langsam, doch nicht schleppend.

The main-theme enters on the 1st violins in the 3rd bar over a tonic chord (D-flat) played by the other strings. As in the previous movement, the theme has very simple roots but the music derived from it is ultimately profound. Initially, although beginning on the A-flat above middle C, it is played on the G-string. The woodwind and brass enter at the end of the 6th bar, accompanying the violins in a chromatic downward scale which imparts an elegiac mood. At 1 minutes, 17 seconds, a climax is reached with a rhetorical upward arpeggio following which the violins leap downwards to A natural (or is it B double flat ? , Bruckner gives both in the score) . This leads to a peaceful interlude based on development of the initial material in which the harp is prominent. From 2 minutes, 44 seconds, there is a section of recapitulation before the cellos introduce the 2nd theme, at 4 minutes, 30 seconds. This is long-breathed and quite majestic. At 6 minutes, 3 seconds, the horns play a variant and, gradually, the music builds to a climax (at 6 minutes, 54 seconds) in which the 2nd theme is partially iterated in the lower-strings and brass. But, here, Bruckner breaks-off and introduces a questioning, ambiguous passage in triple time based on material from both 1st and 2nd themes and concluding with 4 bars of heart-rending accented string music. After a pause of 1 beat, the opening theme returns and Bruckner takes a long time to build a climax. This is reached at 10 minutes, 41 seconds but is foreshortened and dies away after just 4 bars to a quiet iteration of the downward scale theme in the violins. This gets louder and faster before giving way to a short woodwind passage which returns us to the original tempo and leads to a re-statement of the 2nd theme, at 11 minutes, 46 seconds. At 13 minutes, 19 seconds, the tenor trombone gets the tune and leads into an abrupt and anguished climax (at 13 minutes, 44 seconds) following which the violins play the 2nd theme and give it a quite different, more hopeful character. The mood gradually becomes calmer until, at 15 minutes, 9 seconds, the 1st theme re-enters. Almost immediately, dark overtones are added and the music builds to an anguished climax with the brass most prominent. At 17 minutes, 5 seconds, the 1st of the passages that Robert Haas re-inserted from the 1st edition is played. The effect of this passage is to bridge 2 climaxes by adding some music which builds towards the 2nd. The 2nd climax (at 17 minutes, 49 seconds) is more hopeful in character and brief. Soon, the strings are building towards another but it proves a false alarm. At 19 minutes, 9 seconds, a calm interlude briefly intervenes. Finally, we are moving towards the ultimate peak and this is reached at 20 minutes, 5 seconds with 5 bars of glorious blaze following which the Orchestra quietens immediately to leave the harp to conclude. Without a pause, the violins play a C-flat triple forte (at 20 minutes, 32 seconds) by way of introduction to a dark iteration of the 1st theme. These 8 bars of music are stunning in conception and must be difficult to bring-off in performance. A more peaceful mood gradually prevails over the next 8 bars with the harp again prominent. At 21 minutes, 50 seconds, after a long pause, we enter the Coda, initially with the 2nd theme played on the 1st violins. Horns play a prominent accompanying role as the strings play music of exquisite simplicity, ending with a simple downward tonic scale played very quietly. The mood is restful and ethereal.

4. Finale : Feierlich, nicht schnell

The opening of the Finale never fails to thrill me and, indeed, the contrast between the sublime close to the Adagio and blazing fanfares of the 1st section of the Finale is immensely striking. The fanfares are an unusual mixture of major and minor keys and, throughout the strings, play crotchets with chromatic appoggiaturas, establishing a very clear rhythm base. The feeling provoked is one akin to setting-out on an epic journey. At 1 minutes, 45 seconds, a slower section begins with deeply felt string writing. The mood is initially dark but there are flashes of light. The initial tempo is soon resumed and a pastoral interlude inter-spersed with semi-quaver figures on the flute and clarinet leads, at 4 minutes, 8 seconds, to important new material where the strings provide a plain rhythmic base and the woodwind and brass introduce a long descending 3rd main-theme. There is a gradual development to a climax following which, at 4 minutes, 56 seconds, the music breaks-off. After a long pause, the downward theme is played slowly and expressively. After another pause, Bruckner seems to be building a climax but it is a false alarm again and then suddenly, at 5 minutes, 47 seconds, the brass are raging and anguished brass give vent to their feelings in triple-dotted rhythms. Eventually, the music dies and, at 6 minutes, 36 seconds, there is a pastoral interlude which is one of the passages Robert Haas re-inserted from the 1st edition. A brass chorale, at 7 minutes, 10 seconds, brings us back together with Leopold Nowak and is followed by a minor key rendition of the downward 3rd theme played with immense feeling on the strings. At the end of this is another additional passage in Haas (from 7 minutes, 54 seconds to 8 minutes, 6 seconds) - a kind of answering section just a few bars long. There follows then a return to the opening material but it is highly-developed and the climax comes on the strings. Here, Bruckner weaves in material from the various sections until, at 10 minutes, 6 seconds, there is another sudden blaze and, from 10 minutes, 44 seconds, several more concerted climaxes. At 11 minutes, 25 seconds, the music becomes peaceful and primarily based on the opening material. An emotional climax builds without the brass. At 12 minutes, 36 seconds, the music breaks-off and the brass quietly intone material reminiscent of the 1st movement and an ambiguous but beautiful passage gradually dies. At 14 minutes, 3 seconds, there is a proper recapitulation of the opening and if anything, an even greater climax, finally blazing in C major, in a foretaste of the ending. At 15 minutes, 17 seconds, the music is suddenly quiet, brooding and, then, building to a loud and positive sounding iteration of the downward theme of 3rd section. All the material is starting to come together here but there is time for recapitulation of the 2nd section, again, in a slower tempo (at 17 minutes, 5 seconds) . From 17 minutes, 47 seconds to 18 minutes, 17 seconds is the final additional passage in Haas, giving an extra brief mini-climax following which there is a link passage which dies away to lead us to a final recapitulation of the 3rd section (from 19 minutes, 3 seconds) . A climax is built and the 1st theme of the 1st movement appears in the brass at 20 minutes, 12 seconds, as preparations for the Coda are made. There is time for an iteration of the emotional string writing of the 2nd section. Then, a long pause is needed before the Coda steals in quietly, at 20 minutes, 28 seconds. This builds and builds and uses every block in the Symphony to achieve one of the most powerful endings in all music. Initially in the minor, C major bursts in providing majesty and hope. A sustained climax is reached and the work ends with the notes E, D, C - played fortissimo and tutti, simplicity itself ... but to quote Robert Simpson, it has « tremendous finality » .

Selected recordings

Bruckner's 8th Symphony has been recorded many times, perhaps, by as many as a hundred different conductors, some of whom have had several attempts. There is an excellent discography of his Symphonies, here. A check of a UK Classical CD sales website reveals that there are about 20 versions readily available, not counting those which are part of complete sets. Here, I will only consider the versions that I own, these are conducted by Jascha Horenstein, Bernard Haitink, Herbert von Karajan, Georg Tintner, Pierre Boulez and Günter Wand. I have heard other versions and there are some that I am still looking-out for so it should not be regarded as a comprehensive review - merely personal experience and choice.

The Horenstein recording is his studio version made for « Vox » with the « Pro Musica » Orchestra in the mid-1950's (a extraordinary live recording from 1970 is available on « BBC Legends ») . It was probably the 1st recorded version of Leopold Nowak's edition (which was published in March 1955) . Unfortunately, I do not think it is currently obtainable - I imported the CDs from the United States, a few years ago, and the postage cost almost as much as the discs (it is coupled with Franz Liszt's « Faust Symphony ») . The sound is mediocre for the period and the Orchestra not in the same class as the Berlin or Vienna Philharmonics. And, yet, there is no doubt that this is a great interpretation. Perhaps, I am biased because this is the 1st version I ever heard but, in my view, this version should still have a place in the catalogue even though there are now many excellent alternatives. Horenstein's conception of the work is seamless and tempi are perfectly judged. Although he does not linger in the 1st movement, an essential sense of mystery is retained. His Adagio is perfectly poised, simply ethereal at the close and the Finale as fine as in any other version I have heard.

Bernard Haitink has rightly gained a reputation for his conducting of Bruckner but his 1st recording of the 8th, made in 1969, has been considered a relative flop. I have it as part of the complete set of « Concertgebouw » recordings he made in the 1960's and 1970's. When re-issued, about 10 years ago, Richard Osborne commented favourably on the whole set in the « Gramophone » but suggested that « you will need another version of the 8th » . That goes without saying but, personally, I would not write-off this version. At just under 74 minutes, it is the fastest reading I have heard but I do not have a problem with any of its speeds. For me, this work can legitimately last anywhere from, say, 73 to 88 minutes, without necessarily being too fast or slow. Haitink's reading has both vigour and structural coherence, and it is very well-played. I don't feel it detracts at all from the complete set. Interestingly, Haitink's 1995 version with the Vienna Philharmonic is a very different conception and, in some ways, it has the best sound of any of the recordings I have heard. This version runs for over 83 minutes and is evidently the product of long experience. Again, it has not really been given its due by some critics but it is currently available on a « Philips Duo » coupled with a magnificent version of the 3rd symphony at bargain price.

It would not be possible to have a discussion of recordings of this Symphony without considering those made by Herbert von Karajan. He made 3 studio versions and there is also a live version which has been reviewed recently on MusicWeb. Unlike Haitink, Karajan's conception did not vary dramatically over the years although he exhibited more urgency when performing live. If you can find his earlier studio versions cheaply, they are worth having but the 1988 reading with Vienna Philharmonic is the most desirable, particularly as it has recently become more affordable ; previously, the 2 discs were at full price without a coupling. This was one of Karajan's last recordings and was 1st issued around the time of his death, in 1989. The music-making affects you in a way that can't easily be described and this factor underlies the « Rosette » awarded in the « Penguin Guide » . In places, there is an « earthiness » that is not normally part of Karajan's make-up ; he had a special affection for the work and surely knew that this was his last time. The playing and sound are marvellous throughout and this version is well worthy of the praise that has been heaped upon it.

Georg Tintner's recording is one of only 4 that have yet been made using Nowak's edition of the 1st version of 1887. Whereas Eliahu Inbal, who made the 1st recording of this score, did so because he was recording a cycle of 1st versions for « Telefunken » , Tintner apparently did so because he believed that it was preferable to the 1890 version. He doesn't convince me but I am glad he made the recording since listening to it is a good way of exploring and understanding the origins of the work. Tintner adopts rather slow tempi throughout and the Adagio lasts for over half an hour. The playing of the National Symphony Orchestra of Ireland and recorded sound are fine. The coupled Symphony No. 0 is a bonus and, being on the « Naxos » label, this will not break the bank.

Pierre Boulez made his recording with the Vienna Philharmonic live at Saint-Florian Monastery Church (where the young Bruckner was a chorister ; he later became the organist and is buried there) on the 100th anniversary of his death, in 1996. As far I am aware, he had not previously recorded any Bruckner nor conducted this Symphony. He brings surprising freshness and great coherence to the work, and his reading is highly-recommendable. It is available on CD or DVD video - I have the latter which also contains an interview with Boulez and has the benefit of displaying the wonderful surroundings. These provide some indications of the inspiration behind Bruckner's « cathedral of sound »

Last and, certainly not least, there is Günter Wand's final recording, made live with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 2001. As with Karajan's 1988 version, it was one of his last recordings and a fitting memorial. Wand and Karajan had little in common but their last readings are not dramatically dissimilar in overall approach. Wand's tempi are slightly broader and, to my ears, he brings rather more humility and humanity. Ultimately, this may be why at the moment, I prefer this recording by Wand to any other version. This is my current single choice for the desert island.

Postscript

