

La vie et l'œuvre du compositeur autrichien Joseph Anton Bruckner (1896-2003)

AB 96 : Nécrologies

Après la mort d'Anton Bruckner, le contenu des nécrologies refléteront, sans grande surprise, les polémiques viennoises « fin de siècle » au sujet de son importance dans l'histoire de la musique.

« Le Ménestrel », année 62, n° 42 (octobre 1896)

Un des grands compositeurs contemporains, Anton Bruckner, vient de succomber subitement, à Vienne, dans l'après-midi du 11 octobre, aux suites d'une grave maladie de cœur qui le torturait depuis quelques années déjà. La mort a été plus clémente pour le vieux musicien que sa longue vie ; elle l'a cueilli sans aucune souffrance, presque sans aucun avertissement. La veille de sa mort, Bruckner avait encore fait une promenade dans le beau jardin français qui entoure le Palais Impérial du Haut-Belvédère, dans les communs duquel la fille de l'Empereur, l'archiduchesse Marie-Valérie, lui avait fait installer une délicieuse demeure. Et le jour même de sa mort, il s'était encore levé comme d'habitude, et avait médité longuement dans le fauteuil de son cabinet, d'où il jouissait d'une vue superbe. Dans l'après-midi, il s'était couché et avait demandé une tasse de thé ; après en avoir bu la moitié, il retomba sur son lit, soupira profondément et ne se réveilla plus.

La carrière de Bruckner a été des plus singulières et des moins heureuses. Il était né le 4 septembre 1824 à Ansfelden, village de la Haute-Autriche où son père était Maître d'école. À l'âge de 11 ans, il était orphelin et recueilli, comme enfant de chœur, par le chapitre de l'Abbaye de Saint-Florian (Haute-Autriche), où il reçut une forte éducation musicale. À 17 ans, on le plaça comme aide du Maître d'école de Windhag (Haute-Autriche) avec 100 sous d'appointments mensuels. Pour exister, le jeune musicien fut obligé de faire aussi fonction de ménétrier ; aux noces et fêtes patronales des environs de son village, il raclait souvent du violon pendant des nuits entières. Un hasard heureux le fit remarquer par Simon Sechter, un célèbre théoricien de l'art musical, qui découvrit en Bruckner, devenu organiste à Saint-Florian, une âme d'artiste et lui prodigua ses conseils. Après le dernier examen de Bruckner, un de ses examinateurs, le compositeur et chef d'orchestre Johann Herbeck, qui devint plus tard directeur de l'Opéra Impérial de Vienne, s'exclama : Mais ce garçon en sait 10 fois autant que moi ! et lui procura la place de suppléant d'organiste à la Chapelle Impériale, dont il devint plus tard le titulaire. Peu de temps après cette bonne fortune, il fut nommé professeur de contrepoint, d'harmonie et d'orgue au Conservatoire de Vienne et professeur de composition musicale à l'Université de cette ville. Il remplit ces fonctions presque jusqu'à l'âge de 70 ans. À cet âge avancé, l'Empereur François-Joseph le décora ; l'Université de Vienne lui conféra le titre de docteur « honoris causa » et la Diète de la Haute-Autriche lui octroya une pension décente. Ses dernières années furent donc relativement heureuses ; il paraît même que, célibataire, il a pu économiser 30,000 francs qu'il a légués à ses collatéraux et à la vieille bonne qui l'avait soigné jusqu'à la fin.

Pendant longtemps, on ne parla de Bruckner que comme organiste. Sa connaissance profonde du contrepoint et du répertoire de l'orgue et sa faculté prodigieuse d'improvisation sur cet instrument ont toujours émerveillé ses confrères.

À Paris, à Londres et à Nancy, il avait excité l'admiration des connaisseurs par ses improvisations et la puissance de son jeu ; en Allemagne, on n'hésita pas à dire que Bruckner était le plus grand organiste que le monde avait vu depuis Jean-Sébastien Bach. Mais le public ignora longtemps que Bruckner était un compositeur infatigable, qui amassait dans ses cartons des partitions qu'il ne réussissait pas à faire jouer. Il est vrai qu'il avait obtenu, en 1864, un prix pour un chœur à voix d'hommes et qu'il pouvait jouer à Saint-Florian sa propre musique sacrée, surtout sa Messe en ré mineur ; mais déjà, en 1865, Bruckner avait composé sa Ire Symphonie, en do mineur. En 1868, il la fit jouer à Linz ; l'exécution en fut tellement défectueuse que Bruckner profondément découragé ne travailla plus pendant quelque temps. Il sortit de cet état d'abattement pour composer sa célèbre Messe en fa mineur. En 1872, sa 2e Symphonie fut refusée par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, qui déclara simplement qu'on ne pouvait pas la jouer. Mais, en 1873, à l'occasion de l'Exposition universelle, le même orchestre l'exécuta avec un succès marqué, et on apprit alors que Vienne hébergeait un grand compositeur « ce dont on ne s'était guère douté ». La 3e Symphonie était dédiée à Richard Wagner, qui avait pressenti le génie de Bruckner dès 1872, lorsque le futur Maître de Bayreuth dirigea à Vienne un mémorable concert, où il fit jouer des fragments inédits de l'Anneau du Nibelung. Cette Symphonie eut un grand succès en Allemagne ; mais les œuvres suivantes de Bruckner se heurtèrent de nouveau à l'indifférence et aussi au mauvais vouloir des musiciens. Son plus grand triomphe comme compositeur, Bruckner l'obtint avec l'exécution de sa 7e Symphonie, en 1885, par Arthur Nikisch à Leipzig, et par Hermann Levi à Munich. Dans la capitale autrichienne, Hans Richter, grand admirateur de Bruckner, n'avait jamais cessé de jouer ses œuvres, mais leur succès y fut plus contesté qu'ailleurs malgré les efforts de ses partisans. À Vienne, Bruckner par suite de son admiration avérée pour le Maître de Bayreuth, passait pour un « wagnérien » forcené, et cela suffisait à une notable fraction du public pour battre froid au compositeur.

Anton Bruckner, qui n'a connu la gloire que pendant les 15 dernières années de sa vie, laisse un œuvre considérable. Il paraît même que le dernier mouvement de sa 9e Symphonie, qu'il a dédiée, dans sa profonde religiosité, au bon Dieu, est à peu près achevé ; dans son testament, il avait ordonné que son Te Deum devrait terminer cette 9e Symphonie, s'il ne parvenait pas à en écrire le dernier morceau. Le moment n'est pas encore venu pour dire le dernier mot sur ce compositeur si richement doué et si fécond, qui aurait pu devenir sous tous les rapports le successeur de Beethoven, si ses origines et les destinées de la moitié de sa vie avaient été plus propices à son développement. Il aurait alors sans doute pu acquérir le sens critique et la pondération qui font quelquefois défaut à ses compositions, trop touffues pour être accessibles à tous et pour être universellement appréciées.

Rien n'égalait d'ailleurs le manque de savoir-faire, l'ignorance du monde et la maladresse irrémédiable de Bruckner, si ce n'est sa modestie touchante et la sérénité presque enfantine de son âme. Cet homme puissamment bâti, au masque de César romain, aux yeux clairs reflétant la candeur et la bonté autant que les lueurs du génie, était timide et embarrassé comme un enfant quand le public l'acclamait et quand il fallait se montrer dans une salle de concert sur l'estrade d'un orchestre. Sa grande figure, d'aspect monacal, faisait alors penser à la surprise d'un humble moine auquel on apporterait dans sa cellule la pourpre cardinalice. Bruckner, qui va dormir à jamais dans l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian, au-dessous de l'orgue qu'il a si souvent fait retentir, survivra sans doute comme compositeur ; sa gloire posthume sera même, croyons-nous, plus répandue et moins contestée que celle même qui, de son vivant, a adouci les amertumes de sa vie si longtemps contristée.

(Docteur Oskar Berggruen.)

Anton Bruckner, le célèbre compositeur viennois dont nous avons annoncé la mort, a eu à ses obsèques des honneurs extraordinaires. À Vienne, le bourgmestre lui a consacré un panégyrique en pleine séance du conseil municipal, et le conseil a volé les frais de l'enterrement. Le Conservatoire a fait flotter, en signe de deuil, un drapeau noir au sommet du monument. La maison mortuaire, au Palais Impérial du Haut-Belvédère, avait été décorée, par ordre de l'Empereur, de fleurs et de plantes provenant des serres Impériales : la Société Richard Wagner, les orphéons « Wiener Männergesang-Verein » et « Schubertbund », l'Orchestre philharmonique, les étudiants de l'Université de Vienne et plusieurs Sociétés musicales de province avaient fait déposer des couronnes par des députations. Le corbillard, tout couvert de fleurs et de couronnes et attelé de 6 chevaux noirs, transporta le corps à l'église Saint-Charles Borromée, accompagné par la famille des représentants du gouvernement, de l'Université, du Conservatoire, du conseil municipal, de la surintendance générale des Théâtres impériaux, de l'Opéra Impérial, des Sociétés musicales, de tous les Théâtres viennois, ainsi que par les plus notables compositeurs et musiciens de la capitale autrichienne. Les Sociétés chorales ont chanté dans l'église un « Libera » et le beau chœur de Schubert : « Dors en paix » ; Hans Richter a fait finalement exécuter par des artistes de l'Orchestre philharmonique la musique funèbre intercalée dans l'Adagio de la 7^e Symphonie de Bruckner, qui produisit dans la vaste église un effet grandiose. Après le service à l'église Saint-Charles Borromée, l'enterrement a eu lieu à l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian (Haute-Autriche), où de grands honneurs ont été rendus à l'ancien organiste de cette église par l'abbé et les religieux, ainsi que par tout le clergé du diocèse. Plus de 50 curés de la Haute-Autriche assistaient à la solennité. Le corps de Bruckner, qui a été conservé par les soins d'un de ses amis, repose dans un splendide cercueil en cuivre qui restera exposé, selon les dernières volontés du défunt, sous l'orgue de l'église abbatiale. Promesse en avait été faite à l'artiste de son vivant. Les parutions autographes de ses œuvres principales, de ses 9 Symphonies, de ses 3 grandes Messes, de son fameux Quintette, du « Te Deum », du « Psaume 150 » et du chœur « Helgoland » sont léguées à la Bibliothèque Impériale de Vienne. C'est ainsi que Bruckner a royalement payé l'hospitalité que l'Empereur accorda à l'artiste pendant les dernières années de sa vie.

« Admettons donc toutes les imperfections (réelles ou imaginaires) de l'œuvre de Bruckner : ce qui reste est d'une telle puissance et d'une telle grandeur que ces imperfections sont rachetées au centuple, que dis-je, le triomphe de cette musique en apparaît plus éclatant encore. Quiconque a jamais ressenti véritablement cette musique ne peut se soustraire à sa force sacrée, sanctificatrice, à sa profondeur, à sa pureté. Quand on se plonge dans l'œuvre de Bruckner, les manques eux-mêmes semblent, dans une certaine mesure, nécessaires et faisant partie de l'œuvre.

Bruckner est, en effet, dans l'histoire de l'Art européen, un des très rares génies auquel le destin imposa de donner un corps au surnaturel, de s'emparer du divin, de le contraindre à faire irruption dans notre monde humain. Que cela soit dans la lutte des Démons ou dans les harmonies d'une transfiguration céleste, toute la pensée et la recherche spirituelle de cet homme étaient ardemment orientées vers le divin, en lui et au-dessus de lui. (Ce n'était pas un musicien.)

Ce musicien était, en réalité, un successeur de ces mystiques allemands qui ont nom Maître Eckhart, Jakob Böhme, etc. Quoi d'étonnant à ce qu'il soit toujours resté comme un étranger dans cette vie d'ici-bas, cette vie qu'il regardait sans la comprendre parce qu'il ne lui accordait pas d'intérêt, - au sens le plus profond ? Il connaissait quelque chose d'autre, de mieux. Et cela importe-t-il vraiment, alors, qu'un tel homme soit cordonnier, tel Böhme, ou Cantor autrichien ?

Des artistes comme Bruckner font l'effet, au sein de leur entourage, de blocs erratiques de souvenirs d'époques archaïques et d'une autre envergure. Ils semblent moins que d'autres liés au monde environnant et à ses contingences, moins explicables à partir de lui. C'est déjà par ce fait que s'explique le manque de compréhension auquel ils se heurtent et doivent se heurter leur vie durant. Mais c'est précisément à cause de cela qu'ils forcent tous et chacun, d'une certaine façon, à prendre position. On ne peut les aborder que directement, en tant qu'hommes d'aujourd'hui : les yeux dans les yeux - ou, alors, passer tout à fait à côté. Ils attendent et exigent aussi de l'auditeur ce don de soi et cette évasion du monde sans réserve qui portent en eux un fruit merveilleux. »

Jean Gallois, « Bruckner » , Éditions du Seuil (1971) :

Cette 9e Symphonie, c'est l'« Inachevée » de Bruckner, sa dernière œuvre qui, 70 ans après son modèle beethovénien, se veut réplique d'une même domination de l'espace et de l'élément sonores jusqu'en sa tonalité de ré mineur. Le musicien la désirait souveraine, pour concrétiser en un ultime chant sa conception architecturale et son langage symphonique, fidèle traducteur de son drame intérieur. Il la désirait surtout majestueuse, jusqu'à s'élever à l'archétype de la Symphonie afin qu'elle soit vraiment digne d'être dédiée au « bon Dieu » .

Dans cet ultime effort pour rejoindre l'absolu des choses avant de l'offrir à l'Absolu des êtres, Bruckner part à la recherche de son moi le plus intime pour, une fois s'être totalement reconnu, dépasser les limites de son âme et ainsi se transcender. De là, ces rappels presque textuels des thèmes les plus significatifs de sa création musicale et qui, jadis, avaient animé son discours : allusions au Finale de la 5e, au motif fondamental de la 7e, à l'Adagio de la 8e si profondément religieux. Mais, bien mieux encore, reviviscence du « Kyrie » ou du « Miserere » de la Messe en ré mineur, du « Benedictus » de la Messe en fa. Ces quelques exemples disent, mieux qu'un long discours, la vraie nature de cette 9e Symphonie : plus qu'aucune autre, elle est en effet une œuvre essentiellement religieuse, une célébration cultuelle, une Messe sans parole. Long cantique à la gloire du Seigneur, où, dépassée la vanité de la parole, demeure seul le chant immatériel de la musique.

Fidèle au cadre qu'il a fixé de la forme Sonate à 3 thèmes, Bruckner semble vouloir, dès le solennel et mystérieux initial, évoquer les origines du monde à travers un mystique clair-obscur : murmure des cordes sur pédale de contrebasse se prolongeant pendant l'énoncé des 1res cellules motiviques (A 1) de ce grave « prélude ». Le 1er thème véritable (A 2) n'intervient qu'à la mesure 63 sur 3 octaves (image de la Trinité Sainte ?) dans un colossal unisson suivi par un second élément ascendant, confié aux violons.

Le second groupe, lyrique d'expression (au violon bientôt doublé par la trompette) est pratiquement limité à un seul élément (B) tandis que le 3e groupe donne naissance à 2 idées exposées respectivement en ré mineur (C 1) et sol bémol (C 2) .

Si l'exposition se termine au relatif du ton principal (ré mineur) , Bruckner a soin de pimenter son harmonie d'un si bécarre imprévu qui donne à tout ce passage une coloration assez inquiétante. Le développement reprend alors l'essentiel des motifs exposés (A 1 - C - B - A 1) au cours d'un vaste Crescendo sonore et agogique d'une puissance titanesque et qui explose avec la ré-exposition ; celle-ci reprend alors dans un ordre logique (A 2 - B - C 1) les thèmes générateurs, les clame dans une fanfare cuivrée s'élevant aux confins du monde, comme pour mieux scruter le mystère de l'éternité.

L'on a écrit du Scherzo qu'il était « le plus cruel, le plus terrifiant de toute la littérature symphonique ». C'est, il est bien vrai, et comme le souligne Harry Halbreich, « un gouffre Dantesque, un enfer où se tordent ceux qui ont refusé l'espérance ». Thèmes impitoyables dans leur massive solidité ; harmonies altérées, orchestration acide ; rythmes lourds et implacables devançant d'une génération le Stravinski du « Sacre » , tout, ici, concourt à glacer d'effroi l'auditeur, à évoquer devant lui en couleurs crues les affres d'une Apocalypse qu'accuse encore, en opposition, la grâce toute séraphique du Trio.

Après ce monde grinçant entrevu par un Saint-Jean des sons, l'Adagio laisse pressentir l'orée d'un monde spirituel, paradisiaque, et prépare la montée vers le Saint des Saints. Écrit dans la tonalité générale de mi majeur, long de 243 mesures, ce mouvement conjugue l'exposition de forme Sonate et le développement en Rondo. Le groupe de tête (D) comprend en effet 3 graves et nobles phrases : (D 1) au violon solo, débutant par un saut de 9e et bientôt appuyé par les cors et cordes.

L'exposition du second groupe (E) ne comporte que 2 idées, l'une (E 1) aux violons en la bémol, d'une « divine longueur » (mais ici « l'homme n'a point de port, le temps n'a point de rive ») ; l'autre (E 2) plus animée, en groupe de doubles croches, donnant naissance à de nombreuses variations. Suit le développement, libre alternance des motifs (D) et (E) , jusqu'à un dernier assaut, vaste et puissant tutti dissonant (où se retrouvent presque tous les sons de la gamme chromatique) et qui s'inscrit comme les dernières manifestations d'une vie sur le point de quitter son enveloppe terrestre.

En ces ultimes mesures, « Tout meurt, l'âme s'enfuit et, reprenant son lieu Extatique, se pâme au giron de son Dieu. » . (Agripa d'Aubigné, « les Tragiques » , livre VII.)

Anton Bruckner avait l'intention de couronner son œuvre d'une immense double fugue qui eût, par sa Majesté, parfaitement illustré le sigle OAMGD porté sur la garde du manuscrit. Ses forces défaillantes ne le lui permirent pas. Ainsi, à l'instar de Bach ou de Mozart, ne put-il achever comme il l'entendait cette 3e cathédrale humaine qui chante (tout comme l' « Art de la Fugue » et le « Requiem » et comme eux, en ré mineur, ce ton de l'éternité) la quête de l'Homme assoiffé d'absolu et la grandeur de ses fins dernières.

Au fond, peut-être est-ce même mieux ainsi que ce chef-d'œuvre soit demeuré inachevé. Comme Richard Wagner après « Parsifal » , comme César Franck après le « 3e Choral » , Bruckner est parvenu si haut que l'on aurait pu craindre tout retour en arrière.

La Symphonie n° 9 en ré mineur est la dernière Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Celui-ci devait d'ailleurs le pressentir et la concevoir comme étant son œuvre ultime en la dédiant « à Dieu » (« dem lieben Gott ») tout en s'appliquant, dans une volonté de synthèse stylistique, à y mettre en œuvre toutes ses connaissances musicales. Par son envergure et son caractère d'épopée grandiose, la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner révèle une conception sonore somptueuse et Romantique de ses idées musicales ainsi que de son orchestration. En revanche, la 9e est davantage tournée vers une esthétique rude et plus austère qui n'exclut pas cependant certains moments de lyrisme généreux permettant de respirer au sein d'une œuvre dont le propos général est intensément métaphysique et eschatologique.

Entamée en 1887, aussitôt après l'achèvement de la 1re mouture de la 8e, la poursuite de la composition fut cependant longtemps retardée. En effet, le refus par le chef d'orchestre israélite Hermann Levi, en 1887, d'assurer la création de la 1re version de la 8e Symphonie fut probablement un élément déclencheur qui contraignit ensuite Bruckner, peu à peu, à devoir remettre l'œuvre en question et l'obligea à longuement retravailler la Symphonie en do mineur pendant encore 3 années. Bruckner, par ailleurs, s'occupa aussi de la révision et de l'édition de plusieurs de ses Symphonies précédentes, et composa 2 autres œuvres d'envergure pour chœur et orchestre : le « Psaume 150 » (1892) et Helgoland (1893) ; tout cela fut sans doute « fatal » à la réalisation complète du Finale de la 9e.

Cette Symphonie demeura en effet inachevée, et ne fut jouée pour la 1re fois qu'en 1903 à Vienne par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne sous la direction de Ferdinand Löwe sous une forme édulcorée et réorchestrée par ce chef d'orchestre, ancien élève de Bruckner. Il est difficile de mesurer l'influence réelle qu'eut cette création en son temps. Il est cependant certain que l'œuvre ultime de Bruckner annonçait déjà beaucoup des audaces harmoniques et stylistiques du siècle qui s'ouvrait.

La 9e Symphonie en ré mineur, conçue en 4 mouvements, n'a donc que 3 mouvements achevés ; leur exécution dure, selon les chefs, entre 50 et 80 minutes.

I. Feierlich, misterioso :

Tout comme dans les autres Symphonies, il s'agit d'une forme sonate « trithématique » . L'œuvre commence par une introduction lente et sombre, amenant le thème principal (Hauptthema, 1er groupe thématique) par un crescendo tendu et acerbe. Le second groupe thématique est d'un caractère opposé, lyrique et lumineux dans le ton de la majeur. Le 3e groupe thématique est une sorte de marche hypnotique et inexorable dont les humeurs changent en permanence, alternant entre contemplation, tendresse et héroïsme. Le développement est tout d'abord mystérieux (retour des idées du début) pour gagner, de plus en plus, en tension jusqu'à un climax brutal se concluant par une sorte d'atmosphère recueillie de désolation (suspense de dominante, cordes sur roulement de timbale) . Tout comme dans la 8e Symphonie (voire davantage) , la Coda est ici particulièrement rude et dissonante. Cette violence diffère fondamentalement du caractère affirmatif et triomphant des Codas des 4e, 5e, 6e ou 7e Symphonies. D'une certaine manière, on pourrait dire qu'il y a bien moins de soleil dans la 9e Symphonie que dans ses autres œuvres.

II. Scherzo. Bewegt, lebhaft - Trio. Schnell :

Le Scherzo est, à nouveau comme dans la 8e, en seconde position. Commencant par des pizzicati aux cordes et des enchaînements harmoniques particulièrement modernes pour l'époque. Il s'agit à la fois d'une danse infernale et d'une terrifiante course à l'abîme dont le caractère sauvage, voire primitif, semble préfigurer le « Sacre du Printemps » d'Igor Stravinsky ou la Suite « Scythe » de Sergueï Prokofiev.

C'est en écoutant un enregistrement de la 9e Symphonie que Igor Stravinsky, au soir de sa vie, a eu la révélation de la musique de Bruckner. Nul doute que le compositeur du « Sacre du Printemps » ait reconnu dans le Scherzo de la 9e Symphonie la préfiguration de son œuvre révolutionnaire.

Bruckner a composé 3 versions successives du Trio :

La 1re version de 1889 en fa majeur, aux allures de Ländler avec violon alto solo, rappelle quelque peu le Trio de la 8e. À noter : l'accompagnement en pizzicato par le motif du « Te Deum » que le compositeur reprendra dans les esquisses du Finale.

La 2e version de 1893 en fa dièse majeur, également avec violon alto solo, possède une allure plus éthérée. Sa partie centrale annonce celle de la version finale.

La version finale de 1894, également en fa dièse majeur, tonalité inconfortable pour les cordes, est plus rapide et déluré que ceux des autres Symphonies et baigne dans une atmosphère, à la fois, fantomatique et ironique.

Ces 3 versions du Trio ont été publiées par le musicologue Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

III. Adagio. Langsam, feierlich :

L'Adagio commence par une large phrase dont le 1er geste musical est basé sur un intervalle de 9e mineure très expressif, dont le renversement rappelle le thème du Finale de la 5e Symphonie. Après une présentation des 1res idées thématiques culminant fortissimo (tutti) , un choral de caractère funèbre surnommé par Bruckner « Adieu à la vie » (Abschied vom Leben) est entonné par les 4 tubas wagnériens. Le cheminement introspectif tour à tour contemplatif, méditatif ou profondément angoissé de ce mouvement, incluant une citation du Miserere nobis du Gloria de la Messe n° 1 de 1864, finit par atteindre une sorte de point de non retour qu'une impressionnante et large progression typiquement brucknérienne fait aboutir sur un terrible et brutal accord dissonant de 9 sons, probablement un des moments musicaux le plus perturbant et existentiel de toute l'histoire de la musique. L'Adagio se conclut ensuite dans une atmosphère irréelle, calme, comme désincarnée mais nullement apaisée, dans laquelle des fragments de l' « Adieu à la vie » sont joués une dernière fois par les bois et puis les tubas wagnériens et sont suivis par une citation de la Coda de l'Adagio de la 8e Symphonie et du thème principal de la 7e Symphonie.

L'œuvre étant inachevée, la plupart des concerts et enregistrements de la Symphonie se terminent par cet Adagio. Un bon nombre d'interprètes estime que l'œuvre prend une dimension expressive particulière et une signification tout à fait satisfaisante à sa conclusion de la sorte. Ce genre de considération encore dominante aujourd'hui parmi les chefs d'orchestre va cependant totalement à l'encontre de la volonté et du projet qu'avait le compositeur qui, malgré une santé mauvaise et inconstante, s'acharna obstinément durant les derniers mois de sa vie à mener à terme le Finale de la Symphonie.

Malgré 10 années d'efforts et de labeur, Anton Bruckner ne put achever sa 9e Symphonie. Les 3 1ers mouvements ne furent soumis à aucune relecture définitive et le Finale fut laissé en suspens en dépit d'un travail déjà bien avancé. Les raisons de cette gestation longue et complexe furent multiples. Le musicien connut au cours de sa dernière décennie des périodes d'exaltation et de dépression qui ralentirent son activité et portèrent parfois atteinte à sa dignité de créateur. Le rejet de sa 8e Symphonie par le chef d'orchestre Hermann Levi réveilla de vieilles angoisses, tels sa peur du jugement, sa crainte de l'imperfection et son manque patent de confiance en lui. Au lieu de se concentrer sur son nouvel Opus, Bruckner révisa une ultime fois sa partition, remettant à l'occasion sur le métier les 1re, 2e et 3e Symphonies ainsi que les Messes en mi et en fa mineur. Les attaques proférées par l'influent critique viennois Eduard Hanslick et les moqueries de Johannes Brahms (« Bruckner, un pauvre nigaud, un malheureux fou que les moines de Saint-Florian ont sur la conscience ») , le blessèrent par ailleurs profondément. Sur le plan affectif, il accumula les déboires amoureux, élaborant quelque vain projet de mariage avec des jeunes filles rencontrées au gré de ses tournées avant de se faire cruellement éconduire. Sa santé, enfin, se dégrada rapidement. Il fut la proie de fréquents accès de vertige et connut des crises d'étouffement ; lorsqu'il acheva l'Adagio de sa 9e Symphonie, au mois d'octobre 1894, les médecins diagnostiquèrent en outre une cirrhose du foie ainsi que du diabète. Ses derniers mois de vie apportèrent, seuls, quelque réconfort.

Après maintes péripéties, la 8e Symphonie fut créée avec un grand succès et suscita des témoignages d'admiration affluant de l'Autriche entière. Même Brahms, présent dans la salle, ne cacha pas son enthousiasme. Le Doctorat « honoris causa » de l'Université de Vienne lui fut remis devant près de 3,000 personnes puis le pays entier fêta avec un lustre exceptionnel son 70e anniversaire. Bruckner connut une nouvelle phase ascendante, caressant même un projet d'Opéra, « Astra », d'après une nouvelle de Richard Voss intitulée : « l'Île des morts » .

Un Opéra purement instrumental. C'est ce à quoi peut faire songer une 1re audition de la 9e Symphonie. Bien que ne comportant ni programme ni argument extra musical, l'ouvrage surprend par ses dimensions amples, ses changements incessants et parfois brutaux d'humeur, son ton tour à tour exalté ou serein, son caractère tantôt lyrique tantôt épique. L'Opus témoigne par ailleurs de la foi profonde du compositeur.

« J'ai dédié mes précédentes Symphonies à tel ou tel noble protecteur des arts. La dernière, ma 9e, ne doit être consacrée qu'à Dieu, si Il veut bien l'accepter » , a ainsi déclaré le musicien.

Au docteur Richard Heller qui l'accompagna dans ses dernières heures, Bruckner affirma que la Coda devait présenter un chant de louange. Ne parvenant à achever le dernier mouvement, il demanda par la suite à ce que l'on joue son « Te Deum » en guise de Finale.

Le vœu ne fut jamais exaucé : le chef d'orchestre Ferdinand Löwe, qui créa l'œuvre, se contenta de jouer les 3 1ers mouvements, inaugurant une pratique qui prévalut jusqu'à ce que des musicologues tentent, aujourd'hui, de reconstituer le Finale. La partition, enfin, peut prendre l'aspect d'un testament avec ses citations du « Te Deum » , des 7e et 8e Symphonies, et la présence d'un dessin sonnante comme un « Adieu à la vie » , ainsi que le déclarait Bruckner lui-même à propos d'un motif de cuivres entendu au début de l'Adagio.

Chacun des mouvements donne l'impression d'un développement continu, d'une avancée perpétuelle où les répétitions strictes sont bannies au profit d'un labeur thématique et d'un procédé de métamorphose constant. La beauté des harmonies, le nombre et la caractérisation des idées l'emportent désormais sur le sentiment de forme. Le 1er mouvement prend ainsi ses distances avec la structure traditionnelle par le nombre de ses éléments constitutifs, la démesure de ses proportions et le gauchissement de ses arêtes formelles. Le 1er groupe thématique s'étend ainsi sur 90 mesures et comprend 7 idées différentes exprimées dans des tonalités contrastantes et parfois fort éloignées. Commencé dans les nuances douces, par des trémolos de cordes et des appels mystérieux de cuivre, il mène au moyen d'un crescendo ininterrompu vers une lumière éblouissante - un point culminant étalé sur plus de 10 mesures et qui précède le second thème. Celui-ci démarre sur une phrase poétique des cordes et amène quelque apaisement par son lyrisme et son installation dans le mode majeur. Un 3e groupe thématique referme l'exposition dans la douceur et la sérénité grâce à une accalmie progressive du tempo et un déploiement d'arpèges fluides des bois et des cordes.

Si l'on perçoit aisément les procédures de développement qui suivent, on serait bien en peine de situer le commencement exact de la ré-exposition. L'auditeur est entraîné dans un flux continu où les péripéties s'enchaînent les unes aux autres, sans possibilité de répit. La Coda, amorcée par un choral des cuivres, devient le lieu d'une ultime transformation des thèmes puis d'un dernier sommet où se conjuguent toutes les forces orchestrales.

S'il adopte une structure plus conventionnelle, le Scherzo plonge l'auditeur dans un univers cauchemardesque peuplé de visions fantastiques et grimaçantes. Commencé et achevé par des dissonances, animé par les superpositions rythmiques les plus trépidantes, assombri par les étagements de timbres les plus oppressants, le mouvement ne connaît aucune détente à l'exception d'un épisode bref fondé sur un thème de « Ländler ». Même le Trio, partie centrale autrefois contrastante et divertissante, n'apporte pas le repos escompté : le tempo y est encore plus vif et les rythmes plus acérés. L'Adagio permet, seul, de quitter cette étrange danse macabre. L'ombre et la lumière alternent toutefois sans que l'une l'emporte sur l'autre, le ton demeurant souvent tourmenté. Les Ires mesures mettent en abyme le déroulement futur. Une mélodie sinueuse des violons serpente à travers des harmonies insolites, s'élève vers un sommet puis laisse place à une ligne inquiétante des basses définissant en l'espace de quelques secondes une opposition entre l'obscurité et la clarté. La trajectoire entière du mouvement (une montée vers un point culminant précédant une retombée finale vers le silence) est ainsi esquissée. La forme, toutefois, est l'une des plus complexes jamais imaginées par Bruckner. Tout repère traditionnel est aboli, toute reprise littérale évitée. On distingue certes une exposition puis un développement ample où les éléments sont variés, fragmentés, combinés ou renversés, mais l'on ne peut saisir nulle trace de ré-exposition dans la « bonne » tonalité. Le mouvement suit une courbe continue qui mène vers un point dramatique : un sommet d'une violence rare, où le récit, bloqué dans son développement, culmine sur un accord contenant la totalité des notes formant la gamme d'ut dièse mineur.

Comment conclure un tel voyage psychologique ou métaphysique ? L'énigme demeure même s'il subsiste du Finale une partition autographe entièrement numérotée par Bruckner mais ni achevée ni orchestrée. Des esquisses ont été retrouvées dans un ordre défiant parfois toute logique en raison d'une transmission lacunaire et aléatoire. Les possesseurs des différentes pages manuscrites ont en effet disséminé ces dernières, les offrant ou les vendant à travers le monde sans souci de rigueur. On ne sait toujours pas le nombre de documents réels existants ni s'il sera permis, un jour, de reconstituer entièrement le mouvement. À l'été 2003, un feuillet d'esquisse daté du mois de juin 1895 a ainsi été retrouvé dans la succession d'un critique munichois laissant espérer de futures découvertes. Au jour d'aujourd'hui, il a été possible de rétablir le contenu jusqu'à la fin du 32e feuillet sur une quarantaine de pages estimée. La totalité de l'exposition est orchestrée et l'on dispose de nombreux feuillets comprenant des notations sous une forme abrégée ou faisant figurer des notions plus ou moins développées quant à l'instrumentation. Des plans pour une fugue et quelques fragments d'un choral final ont également été mis à jour. Plusieurs musicologues, tels Alfred Orel, Fritz Öser, Ernst Märzendorfer, Edward D. R. Neill ou Nicola Samale ont tenté de reconstituer le mouvement. D'autres ont préconisé de jouer le « Te Deum » choral en guise de Finale ou ont conseillé de s'arrêter avec l'Adagio - soit 1 heure de musique déjà.

Il est troublant de penser que les vastes architectures de temps que sont les Symphonies de Bruckner s'achèvent sur une énigme ou une projection vers l'infini. L'Adagio, avec ses harmonies wagnériennes, sa forme sans retour, ses vastes proportions et ses questionnements ontologiques, demeure en effet sans suite. Il s'inscrit néanmoins par ses humeurs changeantes et ses dissonances inouïes dans une réalité viennoise contemporaine où l'analyse du sentiment, la conscience d'un langage en crise et la volonté d'une introspection toujours plus forte, prennent une place sans cesse croissante.

À sa manière, Anton Bruckner accompagne ou anticipe les travaux d'Ernest Mach et de Sigmund Freud, les écrits d'Arthur Schnitzler, d'Hugo von Hofmannsthal et de Karl Kraus, les peintures de Hans Makart et de Gustav Klimt dans l'idée d'un monde à la fois finissant et en complète mutation. « Le monde d'hier » selon le titre (et la jolie formule) d'un des écrits les plus saisissants de Stefan Zweig.

Peu de compositeurs peuvent se targuer d'avoir vécu une carrière si ascendante, quoique lente, que celle d'Anton Bruckner. Né de la plus petite paysannerie autrichienne, le 4 septembre 1824, il mourra à Vienne, cette grande capitale musicale européenne, le 11 octobre 1896, entouré d'honneurs. Ses funérailles attirèrent non moins de 200 dignitaires du monde musical viennois, ce qui n'est pas peu dire pour un personnage si controversé.

Certes, le parcours est hors normes. Musicien de village acclamé par son entourage, il devient organiste de réputation pan-européenne. Sa foi catholique profonde va marquer toute sa vie comme toutes ses œuvres. En tant que « provincial », c'est à la musique de Haydn, Mozart, Bach, Beethoven et Schubert qu'il sera formé. Cela va marquer ses improvisations à l'orgue (qui feront sa renommée incontestée) et sa musique religieuse des Ires années. La rencontre de Richard Wagner, d'abord en des Opéras tels « Tannhäuser », « Lohengrin » et « Tristan », va sceller son sort comme Symphoniste.

Wagner lui-même tenait Bruckner en haute estime. Non seulement pour avoir accepté la dédicace de la 3e Symphonie, mais également pour l'avoir encouragé au point où le grand Richard avait émis le projet de diriger toutes les Symphonies de son émule. Après les représentations de « Parsifal » à Bayreuth, en 1882, Wagner aurait avoué :

Pourtant, une certaine critique, opposée aux nouveaux courants jugés erratiques et trop avant-gardistes (le défenseur de Johannes Brahms, Eduard Hanslick, en tête), n'aura de cesse d'éreinter Bruckner. Cela aura 2 effets sur le compositeur.

Le 1er fut incontestablement de le faire sombrer dans un doute auto-critique et personnel maladif, voire morbide, sans fin ; Bruckner est en effet reconnu pour avoir eu parfois si peu confiance en lui qu'une bonne partie de sa carrière fut consacrée à la révision de ses partitions - d'où les périlleux problèmes de versions et d'éditions qui entourent ses Symphonies.

Le second, plus pernicieux, fut de le mettre malgré lui au centre d'une polémique esthétique entre les tenants de la musique de l'avenir et ceux de la tradition. Se sentant légataire de celle-ci et inspiré de celle-là, Bruckner n'a, par son caractère modeste et son inclination au doute, jamais su affirmer sa complète indépendance créatrice ; il fut, à son corps défendant, le jouet de la mode. Si cela relève de son temps, la postérité, elle, a rapidement oublié ces controverses et Bruckner occupe depuis longtemps une place qui n'a rien à envier à quiconque dans l'univers de la Symphonie allemande, de Haydn à Gustav Mahler.

La 9e Symphonie est commencée en 1889. Bruckner a alors 65 ans. Le chiffre « 9 » jette un long spectre sur l'univers de la Symphonie depuis la mort de Beethoven. Pour encore mieux souligner la filiation, Bruckner choisit la même tonalité que le Maître de Bonn, soit le ré mineur. La composition commence alors que Bruckner vit dans une sorte de valse-hésitation. Sa 7e Symphonie triomphe à chaque audition, ses œuvres sont jouées un peu partout en Europe et en Amérique (presque toujours dans une forme tronquée, malheureusement), et il n'est pas en reste d'honneurs officiels. Pension de l'État, de Sociétés d'industriels, du Conservatoire de Vienne, en plus des revenus d'éditions : le voici enfin homme relativement à l'abri du besoin.

Cela peut sembler idyllique, mais le manuscrit de sa 8e Symphonie reçoit de sévères critiques de celui qu'il appelle son « père artistique », le prestigieux chef d'orchestre Hermann Levi. Avec la collaboration de Franz Schalk, il prend donc encore une fois le chemin de révisions parfois importantes, autres fois mineures, ce qui attise son doute en ses capacités d'orchestrateur et de compositeur.

Sans pourtant ne jamais altérer la certitude de la nécessité qu'il a de son travail, pour Bruckner, composer est un geste à l'égal de sa foi en Dieu, un acte de dévotion quotidien, de communion intime avec le grandiose « Divin Dessein ». Une des plus belles preuves en est la notice « Ad majorem Dei gloriam » que porte le manuscrit de la 9e, et le fait que, sentant ses forces décliner et se sachant dans l'impossibilité de terminer son œuvre, malgré les nombreuses esquisses laissées pour le Finale, Bruckner suggérera, pour une éventuelle création post-mortem, d'utiliser son « Te Deum » en lieu et place d'une conclusion originale.

On peut regretter d'autant plus cet inachèvement que, pour une rare fois, Bruckner va placer l'Adagio en 3e place de la Symphonie. Cela indique généralement que le plus grand poids dramatique et formel sera porté vers le Finale. Ici, l'exemple, voire le modèle, de la 9e de Beethoven n'est pas innocent ! Et il ajoute même du bien-fondé et de la validité à ce que Bruckner ait sérieusement envisagé ajouter une œuvre chorale (le dit « Te Deum » composé dans l'allégresse du triomphe de sa 7e Symphonie) comme Finale d'éventuel « remplacement ».

Néanmoins, aucune solution envisagée tant par divers chefs que de nombreux musicologues pour parachever ce magnifique torse comparable aux « Esclaves » de Michel-Ange, ne satisfait autant que l'écoute de la partition « inachevée ». Ce fait impose 2 réflexions.

La 1re à savoir que les musiciens et l'Histoire ont toujours jugé l'œuvre ainsi entière. Si on parle de l'« Inachevée » de Schubert, par exemple, jamais ne verra-t-on quiconque traiter cette ultime Symphonie de Bruckner d'inachevée. On se contente de dire que le compositeur n'a pas terminé le Finale et, depuis sa création, on juge l'œuvre comme « entière en soi », tant musicalement qu'artistiquement et philosophiquement.

La seconde s'avère plus subtile. Si on considère cette Symphonie en 3 mouvements comme s'éteignant légitimement en un Adagio, chose incroyable à l'époque sauf lors de certaines codas, à l'instar des Symphonies à programme de Liszt, un compositeur comme Gustav Mahler se sentira donc légitimé de finir les siennes avec un mouvement lent et de ne pas respecter les 4 séparations Classiques. (On pense ici, à sa 3e et, surtout, à sa 9e, également en ré mineur - majeur) .

On tient donc, en ce cas, une sorte de prophétie non calculée que l'Histoire ne regarde pas comme un avatar du sort, mais plutôt comme une nouvelle possibilité de briser la carrure du genre. En ce sens, on peut alors se réjouir de l'état dans lequel Bruckner a laissé son œuvre, plutôt que se désoler de son non-parachèvement.

Ce qui marque cette dernière Symphonie de Bruckner réside dans la manière dont le compositeur ose encore aller plus avant dans toutes ses trouvailles architecturales et techniques de compositions. L'obsession des grands pans opposés (qu'on a souvent attribués à tort à sa formation d'organiste et qui relève bien davantage de la dramatisation du matériau et des changements harmoniques ainsi soulignés) se voit exacerbée, tant dans le 1er mouvement que dès le début du mouvement lent.

C'est ce qui peut faire dire que Bruckner est un « fauviste » de l'Orchestre, rejetant d'emblée les transitions (technique pourtant wagnérienne entre toutes !) au profit des chocs, de juxtapositions et d'oppositions. Cela rend parfois sa musique certes un peu « incohérente » au néophyte qui s'attarde à l'instant fluide ; pourtant, dès qu'on entre dans l'ordre de la durée, tout prend sa juste place.

Le Scherzo s'agite d'une brutale sauvagerie qu'on ne connaissait pas encore à Bruckner. Oui, ce mystique déjà miné par la maladie trouve les moyens de se faire prophète d'une énergie qui culminera ultimement dans les orgies païennes du « Sacre du printemps » . Et il y a aussi les jeux de symétries (que certains jugent encore trop « intellectuels ») dans le développement des motifs, jeux qui seront si chers à des compositeurs comme Anton Webern ou Igor Stravinsky et qui attireront l'attention d'un Pierre Boulez, qui ne dédaigne plus proposer ce répertoire, dépouillé de son folklore faussement bonasse, pour en retrouver la grandeur strictement musicale.

C'est donc plusieurs niveaux d'écoute qu'il faut exercer à l'audition de cette monumentale page. Surtout, il ne faut jamais perdre de vue que Bruckner, ayant déjà composé moult œuvres plus émotives et méditatives, Bruckner donc s'attarde ici plus à la réflexion et la prospection. En ce sens, cette Symphonie non terminée est bien plus ouverte sur l'avenir qu'on ne l'a souvent cru. Vouloir la limiter à un témoignage d'un passé révolu, à un simple testament, ou legs d'une somme de savoir, serait lui causer grande injustice. Comme le disait le compositeur de ses manuscrits originaux, cette Symphonie était bel et bien destinée pour des temps meilleurs (« Für bessere Zeit ») .

Bruckner commença la composition de sa 9e Symphonie en août 1887. Il y travaillait encore le jour de sa mort, 9 ans plus tard. Pourquoi le labeur fut-il aussi long ? Certes, sa santé déclinait ; pis, il était de plus en plus soumis au comportement nerveux, obsessionnel qui avait par le passé heurté ses amis. Il s'était, en outre, imposé diverses tâches professionnelles qui le détournaient de cette partition : des révisions profondes des 1re, 2e, 3e et 8e Symphonies et des Messes en mi mineur et fa mineur, et la composition de 2 pages chorales d'envergure, le « Psaume 150 » et la cantate « Helgoland ». Mais surtout, il y avait l'éclat brûlant de l'ouvrage entrepris. Bruckner voulait faire de sa 9e Symphonie le bilan des meilleurs moments de sa carrière, en incluant des citations de quelques-unes de ses œuvres les plus réussies. Il rendait également un hommage implicite à l'un de ses dieux musicaux. Dans l'une des conférences qu'il donna à l'Université de Vienne, Bruckner déclara ceci à l'auditoire :

Ses amis et ses collègues se rappellent de semblables remarques. Ainsi donc, alors que la plupart des compositeurs auraient évité de susciter toute comparaison avec la grandiose 9e de Beethoven (la Symphonie avec chœur), Bruckner les encourageait activement ! Mais cette démarche allait bien au-delà de l'arrogance. La dédicace de la Symphonie dédiée « au bon Dieu » (« dem lieben Gott ») montre que Bruckner voyait en sa 9e Symphonie l'expression particulière d'une foi catholique qui perdura tout au long de sa vie, peut-être pas aussi inébranlable qu'on a bien voulu le dire, mais qui fut certainement un guide puissant.

Richard Heller, le médecin qui soigna Bruckner au cours des 8 derniers mois de son existence, était persuadé que le compositeur « avait signé un pacte avec son " bon Dieu ". S'il désirait que la Symphonie, qui devait être en fait une hymne de louange à Dieu, soit achevée, " Il " accorderait à Bruckner le temps nécessaire à cette tâche ; si le compositeur décédait prématurément, laissant son offrande musicale inachevée, Dieu ne pourrait s'en prendre qu'à lui-même » .

Hélas ! Bruckner ne put achever la 9e Symphonie. L'immense Finale, presque totalement esquissé, semble finir en queue de poisson à quelques lignes de la fin. Certains exégètes en ont déduit que Bruckner ne savait comment terminer, qu'il ne savait comment se sortir de la Coda triomphale qu'il avait prévue et que le monde se porte certainement mieux avec l'œuvre telle qu'on la connaît : un magnifique tronc en 3 mouvements. Cette opinion est peut-être réconfortante, mais elle est presque certainement sans fondement.

Le docteur Heller décrit comment Bruckner « se mit au piano et lui joua des passages de la Symphonie de ses mains tremblantes, mais avec une précision et une force intactes ». Il ajoute : « J'ai souvent regretté de ne pas savoir reproduire à l'oreille ce que jouait quelqu'un ou le prendre en dictée, parce que j'aurais pu sinon donner une idée de la fin de la 9e Symphonie. » .

Le témoignage de Heller n'est pas isolé. Le biographe de Bruckner Max Auer affirme avoir vu une page de partition (à la fin ou près de la fin du Finale) dans laquelle apparaissaient tous les thèmes principaux « empilés les uns sur les autres, comme dans le Finale de la 8e Symphonie » .

In his very sure-footed Bruckner biography, published in 1944, Peter Raabe quoted Bruckner's physician Doctor Richard Heller :

« I believe, to be able to clarify some pronouncements from Bruckner, that, in his ideas, he had to some extent concluded a contract with God. If the " Dear Lord " wanted him to complete the Symphony, which is intended to be a canticle to God, then " He " must bestow life for as long as is needed ; should he die earlier, then it is God's own fault if " He " receives an uncompleted work. Devoutness was, by the way, a principal feature of this great genius. He prayed diligently, and, even when these prayers sometimes took on very peculiar forms, they were nevertheless deeply felt and piously brought forth. As no one could disturb him when he was at prayer, which he carried-out on his knees before his large crucifix, I had the opportunity several times, standing quietly in the room, to hear his prayers. He praised a number of " Our Fathers " and " Hail Marys " and closed with a fully freestyle prayer, such as, " Dear Lord, let me be in good health again soon, look, I need my health so that I can complete the 9th ", etc. He uttered this last passage in a somewhat impatient manner, closing with a triple Amen, whereby, on a few occasions, with the 3rd Amen, he struck against his thighs with both hands, such that one couldn't help but think that he thought to himself : " If the Dear Lord does not hear that now, then it is not my fault ! " »

Malheureusement, cette page cruciale a disparu et nous ne pouvons guère qu'imaginer l'effet qu'elle aurait pu produire. Malgré tout, les 3 mouvements que Bruckner a pu achever et orchestrer procurent déjà de remarquables satisfactions musicales, à l'instar des 2 mouvements restants de la fameuse Symphonie inachevée de Franz Schubert. La structure de ce « tronc » symphonique (2 longs mouvements à la pulsation lente, encadrant un Scherzo plus bref, plus rapide) est bien équilibrée. Le sommet d'intensité de l'Adagio est assez puissant pour former l'apogée d'une Symphonie durant 1 heure, et sa Coda calme et résignée, avec ses citations fugaces d'œuvres antérieures, peut être considérée comme une sorte de réponse à la quête angoissée du 1er mouvement et aux visions cauchemardesques du Scherzo. Lorsque l'élève de Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, acheva sa propre 9e Symphonie par un Adagio en proie à des luttes intenses et ne se résignant que dans les dernières mesures, il se peut bien qu'il ait eut en tête le modèle de celle de son Maître à penser. Quête angoissée, visions cauchemardesques : tel n'est pas le vocabulaire que l'on associe d'emblée à une « hymne de louange à Dieu » . Mais le voyage spirituel offert par la 9e Symphonie, dans sa forme en 3 mouvements, est des plus sombres. Il est difficile de ne pas céder à l'impression que son caractère a été façonné par des pensées de mort. Nul part ailleurs, dans l'œuvre de Bruckner, on ne rencontre ces harmonies ambiguës et dérangementes, ces lignes mélodiques torturées - le thème initial de l'Adagio, avec son « saut d'octave manqué » , est aussi douloureux que n'importe quel thème de Mahler. Pourtant, l'architecture musicale donne toujours la même impression de monumentalité, d'espace que dans les Symphonies antérieures - une qualité qui a conduit à décrire ces œuvres comme des « cathédrales sonores » .

Dans les 2 grands mouvements externes, le courant de fond se déploie lentement, aussi animée que puisse paraître la surface musicale. À première écoute, la structure du 1er mouvement peut paraître déconcertante : il présente tant de thèmes, change si souvent de direction qu'il devient difficile d'y discerner les contours rassurants de ce que les livres nomment la forme sonate (une structure musicale au cœur de la musique européenne des XVIIIe et XIXe siècles) . De surcroît, en certains passages particulièrement effrayants, les fondations tonales semblent se dérober sous nos pieds - tout cela ressemble davantage au dernier Mahler, voire à Alban Berg. Le rythme martelé et les dissonances grinçantes du Scherzo central ont suscité des comparaisons avec Béla Bartók, Sergueï Prokofiev ou Dimitri Chostakovitch.

L'Adagio renoue avec la véritable noblesse musicale brucknérienne, spécialement dans l'élégie en forme d'hymne confiée, après le 1er point culminant, aux 4 « tubas wagnériens » (des instruments qui s'apparentent plus à des cors ténors ou basses qu'à des tubas proprement dit) . Quelques moments éclatants se distinguent au milieu des crescendos angoissés et des longues mélodies glaciales. Mais le dernier sommet d'intensité présente le passage le plus tourmenté de la Symphonie entière : les trombones, le tuba et les autres instruments graves hurlent alors le thème de violon initial de l'Adagio, l'« octave manquée », fff. La dissonance la plus saillante reste suspendue en l'air, non résolue. Mais vient ensuite la Coda, apportant enfin un sentiment d'apaisement et de stabilité tonale. Il semble qu'un long chemin reste à parcourir jusqu'à l'hymne triomphale par laquelle Bruckner voulait apparemment achever sa 9e et dernière Symphonie ; peut-être ne s'agit-il que d'une fin par défaut, mais il s'agit d'une des fins les plus émouvantes de tout le répertoire symphonique.

« Soli Deo Gloria »

Ce temps que Bruckner demandait ne lui fut pas accordé. Sa 9e Symphonie resta inachevée, amputée d'un 4e mouvement qui devait être, dans un gigantesque contrepoint, une immense apothéose venant couronner non seulement les 3 mouvements précédents, mais toute l'œuvre et l'art de Bruckner. Nul doute, en effet, que, dans l'esprit du compositeur, cette partition capitale n'ait été conçue (comme avait pu l'être la Messe en si par Jean-Sébastien Bach à la fin de sa vie) à la fois comme une profession de foi, un commentaire théologique en musique et une éclatante synthèse des connaissances musicales qu'il avait acquises, récapitulation d'un passé et flèche vers l'avenir. Bruckner se met à la tâche dès l'achèvement de la 8e Symphonie à l'été de 1887. L'accueil désastreux fait à cette dernière plonge cependant le compositeur dans un doute profond, et, sur le conseil d'amis bien intentionnés, il en entreprend de vastes remaniements qui vont l'occuper à temps plein de 1888 à 1891. À cette date, il revient vers les esquisses de la 9e : le 3e mouvement est achevé le 30 novembre 1894. Les 2 années suivantes sont consacrées au travail sur le Finale, sans conteste le plus ambitieux imaginé par Bruckner, avec ses 8 thèmes principaux, ses dissonances exacerbées et sa Coda majestueuse qui devait mêler des thèmes de ses 5e, 7e et 8e Symphonies dans un spectaculaire contrepoint. Ce travail, commencé le 24 mai 1895, est brutalement interrompu le 11 octobre 1896 par la mort du compositeur.

Pendant 3 jours consécutifs, le corps de Bruckner est laissé dans sa chambre du « Kustodenstöckl », veillé par son pieux secrétaire personnel, Anton Meißner, qui accueille les amis et les étudiants venus lui rendre un dernier hommage et les encourage à emporter « en souvenir » quelques feuillets de manuscrits restés sur la table de composition du Maître, dispersant ainsi aux 4 vents son testament musical. Longtemps, sur la foi plein de bon sens du témoignage de ces amis et des membres de sa famille, l'idée s'est imposée selon laquelle Bruckner, malade et pratiquement sénile, n'avait pas été capable d'organiser de manière cohérente ses idées, qui, d'ailleurs, au regard des ambitions affichées pour le Finale de la 9e Symphonie, étaient considérées comme totalement irréalistes. Les morceaux épars de manuscrits subsistants furent jugés incohérents, et la Symphonie entière non seulement inachevée, mais intrinsèquement Aujourd'hui, alors que de nombreuses pages ont progressivement refait surface, et suscité l'étude rigoureuse et passionnée de quelques spécialistes, la vérité semble tout autre. Tout porte à croire, en effet, à l'existence d'une esquisse de composition complète du Finale, achevée au plus tard en juin 1896. La 9e serait donc une partition achevée, mais en partie perdue. Sur les 665 mesures estimées du Finale complet, nous possédons désormais, sous une forme ou sous une autre, un total de 569 mesures, soit 85 % du dernier mouvement, ce qui porte à l'échelle de l'œuvre à 5 % les parties manquantes (en comparaison, c'est plus de 22 % du « Requiem » de Mozart qui est de la plume de Süßmayr (et 90 % de son orchestration) . La majeure partie des 96 mesures manquantes concerne la Coda qui devait terminer l'œuvre en gloire (1) .

Car c'est bien de gloire qu'il s'agit dans cette Symphonie dédiée au « bon Dieu » , au contenu exégétique évident et affirmé, qui tente une synthèse magistrale de la musique ancienne et des formes sonores les plus hardies, à la limite de l'atonalité - à tel point que les 1res éditions des 3 lers mouvements, réalisées sous l'égide des bons amis du compositeur comme Josef et Franz Schalk ou encore Ferdinand Löwe, s'empressèrent de corriger voire de ré-orchestrer ces harmonies douloureuses qui heurtaient les oreilles.

De la musique ancienne, que Bruckner avait étudiée avec assiduité, c'est la symbolique, un ensemble de moyens mis-en-œuvre dans le cadre d'une sémantique musicale, que retient en particulier le compositeur, et ce, dès l' « Incipit » de l'œuvre, avec cette tonalité de ré, la 1re dans l'ordre des tonalités avant que l'ut ne la supplante au XVIIe siècle, qui se note « D » en allemand et qui signifie traditionnellement « Deus » . De la même façon, la récurrence à travers chaque mouvement des motifs en croix (2) , l'importance accordée à l'intervalle de triton, le « Diabolus in musica » des temps anciens, la prégnance dès le thème principal du 1er mouvement et plus encore dans celui du 3e du « Passus Duriusculus » Baroque, ce saut d'octave suivi de 5 demi-tons descendants qui peint l'angoisse et la douleur religieuse (3) , le recours aux notes pointées inlassablement répétées, symbole de la flagellation du Christ, sont autant de moyens rhétoriques empruntés aux Maîtres anciens pour dire l'ensemble des notions qui donnent sa signification à l'œuvre : Passion, Pêché, Pénitence, Salut, Jugement dernier et Résurrection. Mais, comme chez Bach encore avec la Messe en si, le parcours théologique et eschatologique, dans cette partition surprenante où tous les motifs de tous les mouvements sont issus du matériau des 74 lres mesures et développés l'un de l'autre, se double d'un réseau d'auto-citations qui recyclent et portent à une puissance supérieure des thèmes majeurs issus de ses partitions précédentes. On a dit la gageure contrapuntique que se proposait la Coda du Finale, aujourd'hui encore manquante. On trouve ainsi des citations du thème fugué du Finale de la 5e, du thème principal de la 7e et de l'Adagio de la 8e. Mais c'est surtout, conformément au sens profond de l'œuvre, de ses partitions religieuses que Bruckner puise la quintessence. Le motif qui irrigue tout le 1er mouvement et qui réapparaît aux trompettes au début de l'Adagio provient directement de l' « Agnus Dei » de la Messe en ré mineur. Surtout, c'est de son « Te Deum » que provient le tout 1er thème qui ouvre aux cors la partition entière. Ce motif en quinte, qu'on appelle en allemand « Horngang » , devait être appelé à jouer un rôle primordial dans le Finale. Symbole ancien de la nature cyclique des choses et de l'éternité, il devait ainsi refermer le parcours spirituel et donner son sens à cette Symphonie dont, selon le mot du chef d'orchestre Sergiù Celibidache, « la fin est au début » . Lorsqu'il jeta les bases de sa 9e Symphonie, aussitôt après l'achèvement de la 1re version de la 8e (1887), Bruckner avait conscience que ce serait là son œuvre ultime. Du moins, ne craignait-il pas, alors, de ne pouvoir la mener à son terme. La destinée devait en décider autrement : le rejet de la 8e et l'obligation où se trouva le compositeur de la remettre sur le métier fut fatal à la 9e, en accaparant pour 3 années encore ses forces déclinantes. Il avait encore 30 heures de cours par semaine, et s'occupait simultanément de réviser aussi sa 1re et sa 3e Symphonies, ainsi que 2 de ses Messes. Ce n'est qu'au début de 1891 qu'il put reprendre les esquisses vieilles de 4 ans déjà, et les poursuivre assidûment, terminant le 1er mouvement en partition d'orchestre le 14 octobre 1892.

Le Scherzo lui demanda tout l'hiver suivant : il recommença d'ailleurs 3 fois le Trio (les 2 Trios écartés (1) ont été publiés séparément). Entre temps, il avait pu assister au triomphe de la 8e Symphonie, et écrit également le « Psaume 150 » et le grand chœur d'hommes « Helgoland », dernière partition, donc, qu'il devait achever. L'année 1894, qui débuta par un dernier voyage à Berlin, fut celle de l'Adagio, terminé le 31 octobre - et, avec lui, la Symphonie telle qu'on l'entend couramment aujourd'hui. Le mois suivant, Bruckner doit abandonner son enseignement à l'Université (il s'était retiré du Conservatoire, 2 ans plus tôt) et, le 4 juillet 1895, c'est un vieil homme valétudinaire qui s'installe au pavillon de garde du château du Belvédère, qui lui est alloué par l'Empereur. Il est en proie à des crises de plus en plus alarmantes d'hydropisie mais, ô ironie, pour la 1re fois de sa vie, il peut enfin consacrer tout son temps à la composition ! Il songe à un Opéra, « Astra », d'après une nouvelle de Richard Voß intitulée « l'Île des Morts » - faut-il regretter qu'il n'ait pu l'entreprendre ... (2), et s'efforce patiemment et obstinément d'édifier son Finale, auquel il travaillera encore le matin même de sa mort, le 11 octobre 1896 (un dimanche).

La destinée posthume de la 9e Symphonie devait être à l'image des déboires qu'avait connus son auteur tout au long de sa vie. Les mouvements achevés, jugés trop aventureux pour être livrés au public dans leur état original, furent confiés à Ferdinand Löwe, qui crut devoir retoucher toute l'instrumentation et édulcorer nombre d'audaces harmoniques dans l'Adagio notamment. Ce fut lui qui en donna la primeur le 11 février 1903 ; simultanément, la partition parut sous cette forme (Ludwig Döblinger / Universal-Edition). Le manuscrit de Bruckner, néanmoins, était préservé « pour les temps futurs » (selon la propre expression du compositeur) ; et il appartient à Alfred Orel de le remettre au jour et d'en préparer la 1re édition, qui fut imprimée en 1934 par les soins de la « Bruckner-Gesellschaft » nouvellement créée. Dès le 2 avril 1932, avait eu lieu à Munich l'événement décisif quant à la redécouverte de l'authentique Bruckner : l'exécution consécutive, en un même concert, de la version Löwe et de la version originale de la 9e, dirigées par Siegmund von Hausegger. Si convaincante qu'aït été la confrontation, la partition originale dut attendre encore de nombreuses années pour s'imposer définitivement. C'est heureusement chose faite aujourd'hui. La dernière édition en date (Leopold Nowak, 1951) ne diffère de la précédente que par de minimes détails, principalement par la correction de fautes d'impression.

Il restait à ressusciter les esquisses du Finale. Plusieurs étapes ont déjà été accomplies. En 1934, l'édition critique d'Alfred Orel livra à la curiosité des spécialistes une reconstitution aussi fidèle que possible du travail de Bruckner, permettant ainsi d'en suivre le processus dans le moindre détail. Une synthèse des différents brouillons, établie sur 4 portées, figure à la fin du volume. Elle comprend plus de 400 mesures, ce qui amène le morceau au seuil même de sa péroraison. Cependant, il subsiste plusieurs lacunes, ainsi que des interférences entre des rédactions successives. Quant à l'instrumentation, Bruckner n'avait pu la mener très avant ; mais les pages existantes pouvaient néanmoins servir de modèle.

Le 1er, Fritz Öser proposa une réalisation orchestrale exécutable portant sur la moitié environ du texte manuscrit, très exactement 218 mesures. Ce qui couvre l'exposition, avec ses 3 groupes de thèmes, et aboutit à l'accalmie habituelle, où apparaît ici un détail émouvant, déjà signalé : la citation du motif rythmique du « Te Deum ». La présence de ce lien organique peut donner lieu à bien des spéculations, et notamment à l'hypothèse selon laquelle le Maître aurait pu souhaiter lui-même que ce fragment serve de portique à l'exécution du « Te Deum » en conclusion. C'est en vue d'une telle utilisation que l'adaptateur a explicitement intitulé le morceau « Ueberleitung zum Te Deum ». Cependant, des considérations élémentaires de forme et de relations tonales rendent cette solution inacceptable - elle n'a d'ailleurs été tentée, à notre connaissance, que 2 fois : l'une pour la création du fragment, le 12 octobre 1940 à Leipzig, l'autre le 11 juillet 1974 à Stuttgart, pour le Cent-cinquantième.

En revanche, 2 orchestrations complètes de l'esquisse existante ont été réalisées à ce jour (1977) ; leurs auteurs s'y sont penchés séparément, ce qui laisse à penser que d'autres ont pu être entreprises. En Autriche, Ernst Märzendorfer fit entendre sa réalisation en 1969, à Graz. En Italie, dès 1962, nos amis Edward D. R. Neill et Giuseppe Gastaldi avaient établi un excellent texte dont une copie est en notre possession, mais qui n'a pas encore été entendu. Quel que soit leur bien-fondé, ces travaux permettent aujourd'hui d'exécuter le Finale d'un seul tenant, avec tout son vaste développement-reprise en 3 volets, seul tenant, avec tout son vaste développement-reprise en 3 volets, parallèle à celui du 1er mouvement, mais avec ici une fugue centrale sur un sujet dérivé du thème principal. Le fragment (en tout 13 à 14 minutes de musique) s'interrompt au moment où vient de s'amorcer la reprise du dernier groupe (thème-choral) . La conclusion est et demeure inconnue.

Le sera-t-elle toujours ? On l'a cru jusqu'à maintenant. Il semble désormais qu'on ne puisse plus rien affirmer : et c'est ce qui ajoute, à l'inconnue musicale, une dimension spéculative. En effet, selon une hypothèse récente et que nos recherches ont corroborée, le compositeur aurait pu établir au moins un schéma complet en partition réduite (sur 3 ou 4 portées) , dont les derniers feuillets pourraient se trouver encore aujourd'hui dans des collections privées, ce qui autoriserait l'espoir qu'ils soient un jour redécouverts et publiés. (La possibilité existe aussi, malheureusement, qu'ils aient été détruits au cours d'une guerre) . Plusieurs arguments étayaient cette hypothèse. D'une part, le temps fut largement donné au compositeur de réaliser, suivant son habitude, une telle esquisse. En outre, le feuillet considéré comme le dernier (celui qui porte le retour du choral) est d'une écriture ferme, tout à fait exempte des tremblements qui affectent les manuscrits des derniers mois : il remonte donc au moins à 1895. Et, lorsqu'on entend le morceau, la poursuite du choral semble si bien « couler de source » qu'on a peine à croire que le Maître ne l'ait pas mise sur le papier.

Nous tenons pour certain que ce feuillet n'est pas la dernière musique composée par Bruckner, et que ce qui l'occupa jusqu'au seuil de la mort, ce fut, non l'esquisse elle-même, mais bien l'instrumentation, qu'il laissa fragmentaire. Enfin, le processus historique de la redécouverte des feuillets qui nous sont parvenus autorise à penser que d'autres ont pu exister et demeurer inconnus. À la mort de Bruckner, 4 pages seulement de la précieuse esquisse furent officiellement retrouvées. On savait que la plus grande partie (quelque 200 pages) était en possession de Josef Schalk, qui la légua à son frère Franz. Celui-ci la communiqua en 1911 à Max Auer pour l'analyser et éventuellement la retravailler : ce qu'il renonça à faire. Le monde musical ne devait en avoir connaissance qu'à la mort de Franz Schalk, 35 ans après celle de Bruckner. Il est donc plausible que d'autres familiers du Maître aient recueilli divers feuillets, et que l'avenir réserve encore des surprises.

En tout état de cause, le principal objet de discussion, dans la situation présente, consiste à se demander s'il est, ou non, légitime de rendre l'état actuel des esquisses accessible au public, et sous quelle forme. Comme l'a justement remarqué Paul Hamburger dans une causerie récemment prononcée à Londres (1974), le problème se pose ici d'une manière toute différente du cas de la 10e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler, pour laquelle on possède une esquisse continue : celle-ci a permis à Deryck Cooke de réaliser une « version exécutable » aussi proche que possible de l'esprit mahlérien, en suivant les directives d'instrumentation assez nombreuses portées, de place en place, par le compositeur lui-même. Chez Bruckner, l'obstacle majeur réside (outre l'absence, provisoire ou définitive, de la conclusion) dans l'existence de plusieurs lacunes, autrement dit dans le fait que les différents fragments connus ne se raccordent pas exactement. Et la reconstitution d'Alfred Orel fait apparaître au moins 4 de ces lacunes, au cours du développement et de la reprise (feuillets n° 15, 19, 24 et 29). Seule l'exposition est d'un seul tenant, et c'est la raison pour laquelle Fritz Öser avait limité là sa tentative de réalisation orchestrale. (Il existe, en outre, une section « surnuméraire », formant une variante abrégée du développement de la fugue.)

L'impossibilité où l'on se trouve de connaître la forme définitive que Bruckner aurait donnée à son Finale constitue donc l'argument majeur de ceux qui refusent toute tentative de restitution d'ensemble, qui, selon eux, comporterait inévitablement des apports étrangers tout à fait inacceptables. À titre musicologique seulement, ils admettent que les fragments existants soient entendus dans une version strictement conforme à la lettre du manuscrit, c'est-à-dire instrumentée seulement là où des indications suffisantes sont fournies par Bruckner lui-même. C'est ainsi que Hans-Hubert Schönzeler a réalisé 6 fragments qui ont été diffusés par la « BBC » comme illustration de la causerie mentionnée plus haut. La réponse des réalisateurs et des partisans d'une restitution plus avancée consiste à observer que l'importance historique et esthétique, autant que la valeur humaine de cet émouvant testament, justifient tout effort tendant à permettre qu'il soit entendu d'un seul tenant, et par le plus vaste auditoire possible : d'autant que la forme d'ensemble en est clairement perceptible, et que les seules additions nécessitées par les lacunes peuvent être facilement tirées des passages semblables de l'exposition - quitte à se priver, dans la reprise, de quelques-unes des variantes que Bruckner n'aurait pas manqué d'introduire.

(1) L'un en fa mineur, l'autre en fa dièse mineur avec solo d'alto.

(2) Ce n'était pas le 1er projet lyrique de Bruckner. On en connaît au moins 2 autres : « Ekkehard », d'après Joseph Victor von Scheffel ; et « Die Bürgerreuth », sur un livret de Franz Schumann. Suivant les exigences du musicien, chacun de ces projets devait comporter une scène-de-chasse et une scène dans une église, avec jeu d'orgue - et, bien sûr, être exempt de toute « impureté » .

At the time of his death, in October 1896, Bruckner had completed the 1st 3 movements and left copious sketches for the Finale.

Original version : The 1st 3 movements were composed between September 1887 and November 1894. Critical edition by Alfred Orel, in 1932. Leopold Nowak (1951) just corrects some few very minor typographical errors in the Orel edition.

Revised version of 1903 by Ferdinand Löwe, for the 1st Edition published by Ludwig Döblinger in the same year. It contains a large amount of changes never authorized by Bruckner.

It was the performance of this 9th Symphony, in 1932, by the Munich Philharmonic under Siegmund von Hausegger at a semi-private concert in both the Löwe and the Orel editions that provided the impetus for the support and funding of the Bruckner Society to prepare authentic versions of all of the Symphonies.

As Bruckner progressed on his 9th and last Symphony, he daily petitioned God for the strength to complete it, saying :

« If He takes the pen from my hand, it is His responsibility. »

From 1889 to 1896, the composer doggedly worked on the 9th. But on October 11, 1896, after a morning walk, Bruckner went home and quietly passed away, leaving behind what is possibly the greatest unfinished Symphony since Franz Schubert's.

The 9th is often cited as one of the most important musical links between the 19th and 20th Centuries, taking the innovations of Wagner's « Tristan » a step further. The pounding rhythms of the Scherzo seem to look ahead to Igor Stravinsky and Béla Bartók while the wide interval leaps and grinding dissonance look ahead to the Second Viennese School. Although the 3 movement torso is the standard format for presenting Bruckner's last Symphonic essay, the final sketches (which have been recorded along with a few « completed » versions of the Finale) show that despite failing health and occasional mental detachment, Bruckner's musical mind remained virile and imaginative to the end. The immense 4th movement would have surpassed even the 8th's in scale, utilizing a fugue and quotes from the « Te Deum » . Yet, there is something satisfying and up-lifting in closing with the Adagio.

The solemn drone against which the Symphony commences sets the stage for an otherworldly conflict, evolving into a whirlwind and erupting into the shattering main theme. This is followed by a characteristic hymn-like passage and a restless rocking-like 3rd theme ; in the development section, a twisting 6/8 motive emerges and will later be used as a propelling device against which the apocalyptic Coda plays-out, ending on a menacing open 5th. No hint of a peasant dance or earthly image is left in the pounding, demonic Scherzo, placed 2nd in order ; even the trio, while starting-out with elfin lightness, soon evolves into a mysterious, half-lit dreamscape of vague and unsettling images. The following Adagio is considered the composer's valedictory to life. The tortured leap of a 9th ushers in a slow unfolding vision which explodes, « Tristan » -like, into a climax of spiritual ecstasy. This is followed by a beautiful, autumnal song-theme which seems to radiate from a nostalgic looking-back on life's joys ; then, appears an austere March-like theme derived from the Symphony's opening. Against a stuttering 16th note figure, the autumnal theme makes a last appearance. It is gradually joined by a noble hymn-like theme which gradually sours with dissonance while becoming even more intense in its attempted fervor ; this works-up to the famous 7 note dissonance, grinding and terrible, and is followed by an even more terrible silence, as though staring into a void. But then, stealthily a motive from the movement's opening drifts the music to a final serene plane. In the Coda, Bruckner fondly quotes from his 8th and 7th Symphonies, taking an eloquent and affecting leave of the world.

During Anton Bruckner's whole artistic life, he struggled with the Symphonic form. At the end, he may have sensed that this work was in the process of bursting all conventions - its Finale remained incomplete. The composer decreed that, instead of the Finale, his « Te Deum » could be inserted, because the Symphony is « dedicated to the good Lord » .

God himself is to blame : The prophet has no honour (or, at least, little) in his own country ; especially in Vienna, be it Mozart, Schubert or Bruckner, who, for a long time, was treated as a village idiot that fabricated « Symphonic giant boas » (quote by Johannes Brahms) . But at the latest, in 1884-1885, with the overwhelming success of the 7th Symphony at its premiere under Arthur Nikisch, in Leipzig, and even more so under Hermann Levi, in Munich, then one could after all as a Viennese (by all curious preciosity of being embarrassed) be proud of the Austrian Anton Bruckner.

« Now, he is surely one of us ! » : Then along came big brother Germany and claimed Bruckner, as down to earth German blood, for itself. Famous has become the picture of a lonesome German « Hero and Leader » of Austrian ancestry (Adolf Hitler) before a bust of Anton Bruckner, the Germanic proto-genius drawing from mythical omnipotence. Thus the catastrophal « clinical case of necrophilia » (Erich Fromm) decorated himself with the down-to-earth heaven seeking symbol of creative religio. In his lifetime, and for a long period afterwards, almost all of Bruckner's works were played in revised and, in part, extremely falsified and deformed versions. Placed somewhat unfortunately in the interconnections of history, the discovery and publication of the overdue required original versions of the Bruckner works, from 1933 in Vienna by Robert Haas, one of the most commendable musicologists of the 20th Century, occurred together with the ascension of Adolf Hitler and the expansion of the 3rd « Reich » .

With the « Anschluß » of Austria in 1938, the head-office of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») was also immediately spirited away, from Vienna to Leipzig. This changed absolutely nothing on the artistic necessity of withdrawing from circulation the deformed arrangements and abridgements of the Bruckner Symphonies and replacing each of them with the original body of works, and here is where the immense life-time achievement of Robert Haas lies.

On the 2nd of April 1932, in Munich, Sigmund von Hausegger heralded in the new era of authentic Bruckner presentations, with the 1st performance of the original version of Bruckner's 9th Symphony - an irreversible process. At last, the musicians, the experts and the whole audience could acquire for themselves a realistic impression of Bruckner's true greatness. Finally, it became possible to discover the real dimensions of his creations to their full extent. From that date, a noteworthy Bruckner tradition came into being, which in Germany is associated with names such as Sigmund von Hausegger, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Carl Schuricht, Joseph Keilberth, Eugen Jochum, Herbert von Karajan, Günter Wand, Rafael Kubelik and, above all, Sergiu Celibidache. Naturally, there were also others, such as Hans Knappertsbusch, who continued to cling to the past and presented the adaptations.

Politically comprehensible, but in musical matters unacceptable, is the attempt being undertaken these days by New York circles around the conductor Leon Botstein to advocate that the disfigured versions from Josef Schalk and his peers, which were played in Bruckner's time, are on an equal footing with the original versions. Incidentally, the 1st countries outside Germany in which Bruckner's music had great success were the Netherlands and (little by little, with growing resonance) England. Later on, his music made its triumphal procession through the United States of America, to then conquer also the Scandinavian and Russian worlds and, eventually, to become a cultic object of Japanese Classical admiration.

After the Second World War, the great names of the authentic Bruckner movement, Siegmund von Hausegger and Robert Haas, were engulfed by the extinct 3rd « Reich », as if in a black hole. Now, back in Vienna, for the freshly started « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe »), a new editor was employed, Leopold Nowak, who undertook everything honest and dishonest to justify his existence on a par with the pioneer Robert Haas. Thereby, editions emerged which, in cases of doubt, to a great extent chose unfavourable and atypical solutions - simply to be different. Accordingly, after Nowak's resignation and under pressure from leading authorities, a reluctant start was made to tackle a 3rd print of the « Complete Edition », this time (more than a half Century after the epoch-making Haas editions) on the fundament of new findings and diverse research results. This 3rd edition now also forms the basis of the present new recording under Ivor Bolton.

According to today's synopsis, Bruckner wrote not simply 9 Symphonies only, such as before him Beethoven and after him Antonín Dvořák, Gustav Mahler and Ralph Vaughan Williams. He wrote 19 versions, and the leading Bruckner researcher and music publicist Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has placed them in a chronology, coming to 19 versions of 11 Symphonies (the 2 early Symphonies in F minor and D minor were no longer acknowledged by Bruckner himself). This timetable brings light onto a very entwined innovative route. Thus emerged from 1887-1889, between the 1st and 2nd versions of the 8th Symphony, the 4th version of the 4th Symphony and the 3rd version of the 3rd Symphony, and, from 1890-1891, as an insertion in composition of the 9th Symphony, the 2nd version of the 1st Symphony. It is not surprising that Bruckner did not come to an end with the 9th Symphony !

A great mythology has grown around Bruckner's 9th Symphony, his last and uncompleted, which he had dedicated to « the dear God ». In his very sure-footed Bruckner biography, published in 1944, Peter Raabe quoted Bruckner's physician Doctor Richard Heller :

« I believe, to be able to clarify some pronouncements from Bruckner, that, in his ideas, he had to some extent concluded a contract with God. If the " Dear Lord " wanted him to complete the Symphony, which is intended to be a canticle to God, then " He " must bestow life for as long as is needed ; should he die earlier, then it is God's own fault if " He " receives an uncompleted work. Devoutness was, by the way, a principal feature of this great genius. He prayed diligently, and, even when these prayers sometimes took on very peculiar forms, they were nevertheless deeply felt and piously brought forth. As no one could disturb him when he was at prayer, which he carried-out on his knees before his large crucifix, I had the opportunity several times, standing quietly in the room, to hear his prayers. He praised a number of " Our Fathers " and " Hail Marys " and closed with a fully freestyle prayer, such as, " Dear Lord, let me be in good health again soon, look, I need my health so that I can complete the 9th ", etc. He uttered this last passage in a somewhat impatient manner, closing with a triple Amen, whereby, on a few occasions, with the 3rd Amen, he struck against his thighs with both hands, such that one couldn't help but think that he thought to himself : " If the Dear Lord does not hear that now, then it is not my fault ! " »

Has the 9th actually remained unfinished ? Contemporary musicologists are of the opinion that it was on hand in at least a 1st, raw orchestral score and is probably still even in existence - in private ownership in Vienna. Time and again, scattered pages from the Finale have turned-up. The reason for this is that, after Bruckner's death, the testamentary administrator conducted a loose control and took no steps to ensure that the material remained in an orderly and connected condition. In the meantime, there is a group of musicologists who have, piece for piece, filled-out the empty spaces between the turned-up pages of the Finale and improved it, step by step. They will not succeed in giving the Symphony a really adequate Finale, but, as an attempt at reconstruction, it is a highly-interesting exercise in style, one being followed with great interest by many connoisseurs and musicians.

Anton Bruckner started work on his 9th Symphony in August 1887. He was still working on it on the day he died, 9 years later. Why this long, ultimately thwarted struggle ? For one thing, Bruckner's physical health was declining, and along with it his mental stability. As his anxiety about the 9th increased, so did the strange obsessive behaviour that had so worried friends in the past. And he would keep finding other things to do : extensive revisions of 4 Symphonies and 2 of his Masses ; plus, the composition of 2 big choral works : « Psalm 150 » and the Cantata « Helgoland » . Worthy projects, perhaps, but, in the end, diversions from the main task. Bruckner had good reason to take special pains over his 9th Symphony. This was to be nothing less than a summing-up of his life's achievement. There was also an element of tribute to one of his musical idols :

Bruckner told his students at the Vienna University :

« I'll write my last Symphony in D minor, just like Beethoven's 9th. Beethoven won't object. »

Beethoven might not complain, but others might (and did) make unflattering comparisons before they'd even heard a note of the work. Above all, the devoutly Roman Catholic Bruckner intended to dedicate his 9th Symphony « to dear God » (« dem lieben Gott ») . Small wonder, Bruckner was so desperate to get it right - or so ready to seek-out distractions.

At the same time, there are hints that Bruckner's faith was wavering. His doctor, Richard Heller, felt sure that the composer « had drawn-up a contract with his " dear God ". If " He " willed that the Symphony, which was indeed to be a hymn of praise to God, should be finished, " He " should give Bruckner the time he needed for his task ; if he died too soon and his musical offering was left incomplete, God had only himself to blame. »

It was to be a very close-run thing. When Bruckner died on 11 October 1896, he was almost certainly working on the last pages of the sketch-score. If so, where they ended-up is anyone's guess. In one of the most frustrating reminiscences in musical history Doctor Heller tells how Bruckner « went over to the piano and played me parts of the Symphony with shaking hands, but with undiminished accuracy and strength. I have often regretted the fact that I cannot play or write down music after one hearing because, then, I might be able to give some idea of the end of the 9th Symphony. »

Bruckner's biographer, Max Auer, also claimed that he saw a page of the score (either at or near the end of the Finale) in which all the leading themes are « piled on top of each other, as in the Finale of the 8th Symphony » .

A few precious extra leaves of sketch-score have turned-up in recent years, but, alas, this crucial page was not amongst them. But how tragic is this loss ? The 3 movements Bruckner did complete in full orchestral score do form a satisfying musical experience in their own right. In fact, the structure they form (2 long, slow-paced movements framing a compact, faster Scherzo with central Trio) is remarkably well-balanced. Moreover, the climax of the Adagio is quite powerful enough to form the high-point of an hour-long Symphony : though that terrifying dissonant fortississimo is surely a long way from the triumphant « hymn of praise » Bruckner intended as the culmination of his last Symphony. Yet, the quietly resigned Coda of the Adagio, with its fleeting tender references to some of his most successful earlier works, can be experienced as a kind of answer to the dark probing of the 1st movement and the nightmare visions of the Scherzo.

While the 9th Symphony has that grand, spacious feeling one so often finds in Bruckner (the quality that has led to his Symphonies being described as « Cathedrals in sound ») , the 1st movement's structure may initially seem baffling. In marked contrast to the concentrated, economical 1st movement of the 8th Symphony, there is a profusion of themes here, with many sudden changes in tempo and direction. At times, the very tonal foundations of this « Cathedral » seem to shake under our feet and, yet, Bruckner draws everything together in the movement's awe-inspiring final Crescendo.

2nd movement :

Formally, the central Scherzo is clarity itself. This is a big A-B-A structure, with a weirdly animated central Trio section. This Scherzo's pounding repetitive rhythms and harsh dissonances have invited comparison with Béla Bartók, Sergei Prokofiev or Dimitri Shostakovich. But the central Trio section inhabits a very different world. Instead of the idyllic Pastoral imagery Bruckner often evokes in his Trios, this music is feverish, disturbingly sensual, and, like the Scherzo, seems to peer half-nervously, half excitedly into the 20th Century.

The Adagio begins with more restless searching, initiated by an anguished violin motif, leaping upward just over an octave then plunging back downward. After the 1st climax, comes music of true Brucknerian nobility in a hymn-like elegy for the 4 Wagner tubas (more like tenor or bass horns than tubas) . In the impassioned spiritual journey that follows, here are moments of radiance amid tormented Crescendos and long wintry melodies. But the final build-up contains the most agonizing music in the whole Symphony, with trombones, tuba and the other bass instruments bellowing-out the Adagio's opening violin theme, now stretched even wider. The culminating discord is left hanging in the air, unresolved. Yet, somehow, the Coda manages to bring a sense of peace and long-sought stability. Bruckner never intended this to be the ending of his last Symphony, but it is hard to imagine a more moving farewell.

Few composers can boast of having risen from such lowly beginnings to such heights as did Anton Bruckner, though he rose slowly. He was born into the lowest-level of the Austrian peasantry on September 4, 1824. He died on October 11, 1896, in Vienna, that grand capital of European music, surrounded by honours ; no fewer than 200 dignitaries from the Viennese music world attended his funeral, which is not an inconsiderable number given how controversial he was.

Bruckner's journey was, indeed, an unusual one. He started-out as a village musician, acclaimed by his family and friends, and he became an organist known throughout Europe. His deep Catholic faith colored his entire life, and all his works. A « provincial » , he was shaped by the music of Franz-Joseph Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Johann Sebastian Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven, and Franz Schubert. Their influence could be heard in his improvisations on the organ (which won uncontested fame for him) and in the religious music that he wrote in his early years. Then, at Ist, through Operas such as « Tannhäuser » , « Lohengrin » , and « Tristan und Isolde » , he encountered Richard Wagner, and this sealed his fate as a Symphonist.

Wagner held Bruckner in high esteem. Not only did the great Richard accept the dedication of Bruckner's 3rd Symphony, but he also encouraged his emulator to the extent of proposing to conduct all of Bruckner's Symphonies. After the performances of « Parsifal » at Bayreuth, in 1882, Wagner declared :

« There is only one other composer whose Symphonies can be compared to Beethoven's, and that is Bruckner. »

Yet, there were also critics (the most prominent of whom was Eduard Hanslick, the defender of Johannes Brahms) who were hostile to the new trends, which they considered erratic and too avant-garde, and who continually panned Bruckner. This had 2 effects on the composer.

There is no question that criticism made Bruckner sink into morbid and continual self-doubt. He is, in fact, known for having spent a good deal of his career revising his scores - hence, the thorny problems of versions and editions that surround his Symphonies.

The 2nd and more pernicious effect was to place a reluctant Bruckner right in the center of the æsthetic controversy pitting the supporters of the music of the future against the supporters of tradition. Bruckner, who felt that he himself had both inherited from tradition and been inspired by modernism, and who was by nature modest and insecure, was never able to assert his complete creative independence. Unwillingly, he became a plaything of fashion. But that was then. Posterity has quickly forgotten these controversies and, for some time now, Bruckner has occupied an enviable place, alongside Haydn and Gustav Mahler, in the world of the German Symphony.

Anton Bruckner began his 9th Symphony in 1889, when he was 65 years old. The number « 9 » has cast a long shadow in the world of the Symphony ever since the death of Beethoven. Bruckner chose the same key, D minor, for his 9th Symphony as Beethoven had chosen for his, thus showing even more clearly his relationship to the Master from Bonn. When Bruckner began composing, his life was like a hesitation waltz. His 7th Symphony was a triumph every time it was performed ; his works were played just about everywhere in Europe and in America (though, unfortunately, almost always in abbreviated versions) ; and he received no end of official honours. With pensions from the State, from industrial Companies, and from the Vienna Conservatory, as well as income from publishing, here was a man who was relatively comfortable.

This may seem idyllic, but the manuscript of his 8th Symphony was severely criticized by the person whom Bruckner called his « artistic father », the prestigious conductor Hermann Levi. With the collaboration of Franz Schalk, Bruckner once again took on the task of making revisions (some major, others minor) which doubtless stirred-up his doubts about his capacities as an orchestrator and composer.

Yet, these doubts never eroded Bruckner's certainty that he needed to work. Composing, for Bruckner, was equal in importance to his faith in God : an act of daily devotion, of intimate communion with the great, divine plan. One of the best proofs of this attitude is the heading, « Ad Majorem Dei Gloriam », that he put at the top of the manuscript of the 9th. Another is the fact that, as he felt his strength declining, he realized that he would not be able to finish the work despite the numerous sketches he had left for the Finale, and so suggested that, if the work had to be completed after his death, his « Te Deum » be used in place of an original ending.

One could be sorry that this work is incomplete because Bruckner had placed the Adagio as the 3rd movement of the Symphony, something he rarely did. This placement generally indicates that the final movement will carry the greatest dramatic and formal weight ; this is the placement in, for example, Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Indeed, since Beethoven's work was Bruckner's model, the arrangement of the latter adds cogency and validity to the argument that Bruckner seriously planned to add a choral work (the afore mentioned « Te Deum », composed at a time of elation after the triumph of his 7th Symphony) as a possible « replacement » Finale.

Nevertheless, none of the solutions that various conductors or numerous musicologists have proposed for putting the finishing touches on this magnificent torso (it is comparable to Michelangelo's « Slaves ») can satisfy as much as listening to a performance of the « unfinished » score can. This fact compels us to make 2 remarks.

1st, both musicians and history have always considered the work to be complete as it is. We speak of Schubert's last Symphony as being « unfinished », but no one ever speaks like this about Bruckner's last Symphony. Rather, we just say that the composer did not finish the Finale. Since its 1st performance, the work as it is has been judged to be musically, artistically, and philosophically complete.

Our 2nd remark is subtler. If we consider this to be a Symphony that is in 3 movements, and that ends, legitimately, by fading away in an Adagio (an incredible choice for the period, rarely made except in the case of some Codas ; for example, in the Symphonies of Franz Liszt) then a composer like Gustav Mahler would consider himself justified in no longer respecting the Classical separation into 4 movements but finishing his Symphonies with a slow movement. (We are thinking here of Mahler's 2nd and, especially, of his 9th which, like Bruckner's, is also in D minor - major.)

This, then, is a case of unplanned prophecy - of an historical innovation that, rather than being a manifestation of some new type, is a new way of breaking the mould forming the old type. For this reason, we can be thankful rather than sorry for the unfinished state in which Bruckner left his work.

What's notable about Bruckner's last is how, in all his strokes of inspiration in the realms of architecture and compositional technique, the composer dares go farther still. The obsession with big opposing sections (often wrongly attributed to his training as an organist, but which really stems far more from his concern to dramatize material, and to stress harmonic changes) is intensified, both in the 1st movement and starting from the beginning of the slow movement.

It is this that can lead some to call Bruckner an orchestral fauvist ; that is, one who rejects out of hand all transitions (a rather Wagnerian technique, after all) in favor of shocks, juxtapositions, and oppositions. Sometimes, this makes his music a little incoherent for the neophyte who lingers over the fluid moment ; but, as soon as one enters into the ordered flow of the music, everything falls into place.

The Scherzo bustles about with a brutal wildness that we don't find anywhere else in Bruckner. Yes, this mystic, already consumed by illness, found ways to make himself a prophet of musical energy that would ultimately culminate in the pagan orgies of « The Rite of Spring » . He also plays with symmetries (which some consider to be too intellectual) in developing motifs. Later, such games came to be prized by composers such as Anton Webern or Igor Stravinsky ; and they drew the attention of Pierre Boulez, who did not scorn to offer this kind of repertoire, stripped of its fake good natured folklore, and to reveal its strictly musical « grandeur » .

Thus, listening to this work of Bruckner requires listening at several levels. Above all, one must never forget that Bruckner had already composed many more emotive and meditative works ; here, he is lingering over reflection and exploration. In this sense, this unfinished Symphony is much more open to the future than it was often believed to be. To see it only as a relic of the bygone past, as a simple testament or legacy of accumulated knowledge, would be to do it a grave injustice. As the composer said of his original manuscripts, this Symphony was well and truly destined for better times (« Für bessere Zeit ») .

Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor is the last Symphony upon which he worked, leaving the last movement incomplete at the time of his death, in 1896. The Symphony was premiered under conductor Ferdinand Löwe in Vienna, in 1903, after Bruckner's death. Bruckner dedicated this Symphony, « To the beloved God » (« Dem lieben Gott ») .

While it may seem logical to call this work « Symphony in D minor, Opus posthumous » , that usually refers to the Symphony No. « 0 » in D minor.

The Symphony has 4 movements, although the 4th is incomplete and fragmentary. Of this Finale, it seems that much material in full-score may have been lost very soon after the composer's death, and, therefore, some of the lost sections in full-score survived only in 2 to 4 stave sketch format. The placement of the Scherzo 2nd, and the key, D minor, are only 2 elements this work has in common with Beethoven's 9th Symphony.

The Symphony is so often performed without any sort of Finale that some authors describe « the form of this Symphony as a massive arch, 2 slow movements straddling an energetic Scherzo » .

The score calls for 3 each of flutes, oboes, clarinets in B-flat and A (Adagio only) , 2 bassoons and contrabassoon, with 8 horns (5-8 horns doubling on Wagner tubas) , 3 trumpets in F, 3 trombones, 1 contrabass tuba, timpani and strings.

1st movement : Bruckner's tendency to telescope Sonata form development and recapitulation finds its fullest realization in this movement, the form of which musicologist Robert Simpson describes as, « Statement, Counterstatement and Coda. » . An unusually large number of motifs are given in the 1st subject group, and these are substantially and richly developed on re-statement and in the Coda. Bruckner also cites material from his earlier works : at a point near the Coda, Bruckner quotes a passage from the 1st movement of his 7th Symphony. The concluding page of the movement, in addition to the usual tonic (I) and dominant (V) chords, given-out in a blaze of open 5ths, uses a Neapolitan flat (ii) in grinding dissonance with both I and V.

2nd movement : The opening chord of the Scherzo, often cited as prophetic of the harmonic advances of the 20th Century, is tonally ambiguous in regard to the principal D minor tonality of the movement. It could be said that folk elements are still in evidence, as in other Bruckner Scherzi, but this music is of such savagery that such « naïve » elements are easier to ignore, even if they were intended by the composer.

Bruckner has composed 3 successive versions of the Trio (edited by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs) :

The 1st version (1889) , in F major, in « Ländler » style with solo of viola, recalls some ideas of that of the 8th Symphony. Note the pizzicato accompaniment by the quarter notes at the outset of the « Te Deum » , which the composer will also use in the sketches of the Finale.

The 2nd version (1893) , in the remote key of F-sharp major, also in « Ländler » style with solo of viola, has a somewhat ethereal look. The mid-part contains a reminiscence to the « Hallelujah » from Georg Friedrich Händel's « Messiah » .

The final version (1894) , also in F-sharp major, is unusually fast in tempo for a Trio. The slower mid-part contains, as in the previous version, a reminiscence to the « Hallelujah » from Händel's « Messiah » .

3rd movement : Bruckner called this movement his « Farewell to Life » . It begins in tonal ambiguity, and is the most troubled opening to a Bruckner Adagio, yet, though within bars, it achieves lyrical serenity and awe. Throughout its course, the movement goes back to some of the troubled moods of the earlier movements. A dolente call by the oboe (a quote of the « Kyrie » of Mass No. 3) introduces the repeat of the 1st theme, which is underlined by dramatic trombone appeals. Shortly after, Bruckner also quotes, as a kind of supplication, the « Miserere nobis » from the «

Gloria » of his Mass in D minor. The following final climax, given by full Orchestra, concludes on the most dissonant chord. Thereafter, in the most serene Coda, yet, the music alludes to the Coda of the Adagio of the 8th Symphony, and also hints at the 7th Symphony. It is these measures of music which conclude most live performances and recordings of the Symphony, though Bruckner was insistent that they be succeeded by a final, 4th movement.

The lives of great creators always seem far too brief. While a fortunate few endure to complete their work and secure their reputation, far too many others depart leaving their full potential unattained and their fame unsettled.

Anton Bruckner faced a far crueler fate. At the height of his power, he spent his final years in a desperate struggle to craft a final Masterpiece that would both epitomize his ideals and extend his art into a new realm, but died in 1896 unable to achieve it. The destiny of the portion that would become his Symphony No. 9 fell to others. At 1st compromised by the misguided efforts of well-meaning friends, ultimately it would be rescued and enriched through the diverse inspirations of a later generation of interpreters.

His peasant roots, strict upbringing and teaching career led Bruckner to be highly-deferential and modest, with a deep respect for authority and an equally acute dread of criticism. Yet, he craved recognition. When colleagues implored him to simplify his work in the hope of getting it performed, Bruckner readily agreed, both accepting their « help » and undertaking broad revisions of his own, through cuts, rescoring and conventional harmony, so as to conform to the brighter colours and overt drama of the emerging Wagnerian style. Consequently, the little notice his Symphonies, garnered during his lifetime, was based on bowdlerized versions.

Significantly, the 1927 printing of Grove's « Dictionary of Music and Musicians » dismisses Bruckner with a single paragraph (1 page later, devoting 8 to his contemporary Alfred Bruneau) and derided his « inordinate leaning toward the manner of Wagner ». The balance is redressed in the 2001 edition : Bruckner gets 28 pages to Bruneau's 2.

Later advocates debate the superiority of the composer's initial concepts versus his subsequent reflections which, after all, could represent genuine attempts at refinement and growth rather than corruption under pressure.

His extraordinary Symphony No. 9 in D minor suffered a similar fate. While free from the composer's own misgivings and 2nd thoughts, its posthumous 1903 publication was « edited » by his disciple Ferdinand Löwe, who reduced the dissonances, added transitional modulations and tempered the brittle climaxes with smooth swells of sound. Fortunately, despite a lifetime of submission to others' tastes, Bruckner bequeathed his original manuscripts to the Austrian Imperial Library, thus ensuring their future availability.

The contrast was 1st unveiled in a revelatory 1932 Munich concert, when Siegmund von Hausegger conducted the 9th, twice : 1st, the Löwe edition and then, to huge acclaim, the world-premiere of the autograph. To Hausegger also fell the honour of the 1st recording. His 1938 set of « HMV » 78 rpm's with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra (now, on a « Preiser » CD) is thoroughly convincing, idomatic and solidly shaped. Steeped in German tradition, it projects an unmistakable image of repressed feeling seething beneath a superficially placid surface.

Since then, nearly all performances have been based on editions restored from the original materials, and Bruckner has emerged as a striking creative force with a distinctive Symphonic voice. The complexity of Bruckner's vision lay deep within his personality, surely among the most intriguing of any composer.

Bruckner's lifetime fame came not as a composer but as organist and pedagogue. Both roles pervade his music. His orchestration often evokes the « king of instruments » by layering massive planes of sound. He taught the theories of Simon Shecter that music was to be solidly founded in bass and « natural » harmonic progressions, and so his themes tend to consist of the notes of deep, elemental chords and his structures evolve steadily on a colossal scale. Bruckner was a methodical composer, always finishing one work before beginning the next. His scores are neat, his corrections precise. Ideas unfold with patience and logic. Emotions are always in check.

Bruckner took little interest in the world beyond musical theory and so his compositions are free of current trends or outside influences. A bachelor and probable virgin, his social life was largely limited to dining with students and pathetic attempts to propose marriage to teenaged girls, with whom he often became enamored. Bruckner was rigidly formal and had no tolerance for « risqué » humor. His music is severe, with an occasional touch of lyricism but little playfulness and never even a hint of sensuality.

Bruckner was obsessed with death. Although he rarely traveled, he sought to view the bodies of famous decedents and attended the exhumations of Beethoven and Schubert. He cherished a picture of his mother on her deathbed and planned his own funeral and burial in great detail. Such morbid thoughts must have guided him during the prolonged and draining effort over the 9th Symphony that consumed the last decade of his life.

Bruckner was deeply religious. He kept a log of his daily devotions, prayed before each performance, and stopped lessons when church bells rang. It has been suggested that the extreme length of his Symphonies was inspired by a need to elevate listeners' thoughts to a mood conducive to undistracted prayer. As his powers failed, Bruckner dedicated his final Symphony to God but could not understand how God could refuse him the strength and inspiration to finish it.

The 9th is incomplete in far more than the obvious sense of lacking a Finale. The 1st movement is fragmentary and rough ; the 2nd, acerbic and unsettled ; and the 3rd reaches toward eternity through distant harmonic spheres. Such wide-ranging and fertile material challenges interpreters to probe the vitality of Bruckner's complex inner life.

While most interpreters try to smooth the score into a cohesive whole comparable to his other work, a few seem willing to regard the 9th not as a failed attempt at an orderly artistic statement or personal closure but rather as a perfect depiction of a tortured and turbulent mind.

Above all other conductors, Wilhelm Furtwängler best mined this image of turmoil. A man of conscience deeply conflicted within the cauldron of Nazi Germany, Furtwängler identified fully with the composer's anguish and strife. His 1943 concert 9th with the Berlin Philharmonic (on « DGG » and « Music & Arts ») aches throughout with a tangible nervous pain, the rhythms unstable, the balances harsh and tense. He discounts transitions, boldly chopping the stormy 1st movement into disparate fragments and wrenching the mood from lilting grace to raw savagery, tempos from standstill to runaway and dynamics from inaudible to heavy overload. The Scherzo and Trio transcend the slightly menacing waltz under other batons to become a furiously driven, vertiginous plunge to damnation. The intensely chromatic concluding Adagio grinds massive planes of conflicting tonalities, heaves its way through feverish unrest to a fearsome dissonance, and withers its turbulent fragments into exhausted silence. Furtwängler's radical grasp of the 9th is one of the most devastating and demanding performances ever captured on record.

Oswald Kabasta, too, was charged with collaboration by the Allies but, rather than defend his choices, killed himself in 1946. While lacking the full measure of Furtwängler's manic intensity and volatile temperament (but with an even more terrifying Scherzo) , his War-time performance with the Munich Philharmonic (on the « Lys » label) reflects a similar outlook and temperament.

While the loyalties and activities of Hermann Abendroth during the War are shrouded in ambiguity, his 1951 concert with the Leipzig Radio Symphony (on the « Berlin Classics » label) also derives huge power from jarring conflicts of the type that beset the beleaguered composer.

Carl Schuricht also remained in Germany until the last year of the War, and led a somewhat less volatile, yet heartfelt, 1951 concert with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony (on the « Hänssler » label) in which sharp brass accents interrupt the continuity.

Jascha Horenstein, one of the least heralded of the great Brucknerians (surely reflecting the nomadic nature of his career rather than a lack of talent) . He conducts the Vienna Symphony Orchestra (1953) - « Vox » CD cut a taut 1953 studio recording with the Vienna Symphony of propulsive vigor coupled with a superb Mahler 1st. While a late « BBC » concert (on « BBC Legends » , with a spectacular Mahler 8th) is deeply atmospheric and alive with detail. A constant undercurrent of unrest throbs beneath its tightly controlled surface, as if to suggest the turbulent profundity which the seemingly « naïve » and reticent composer suppressed within his outwardly simple bearing.

The distinctive tympani accents that offset the moderated emotions, repressed climaxes and detail of Daniel Barenboim's Berlin Philharmonic concert (on the « Teldec » label) suggest the composer's straining against conventional inhibitions.

Similarly, the dramatic pauses and inflated dynamics of Eugen Jochum's « Staatskapelle Dresden » recording (on the « EMI » label) evoke the earnest urgency of Bruckner's desperate race against mortality.

The dour Yevgeny Mravinsky and the Leningrad Philharmonic (on « BMG - Melodiya ») lend their severe 1980 concert recording a brittle, sharp, acidic edge with chilly wind accents and harsh brass-heavy balances to suggest the bitterness of the composer's lonely dying toil.

At the opposite extreme stands Sergiù Celibidache and the Munich Philharmonic (on the « EMI » label) . Invoking his « Zen » beliefs, CD Celi slows the pace to a glacial 77 minutes. His inflexible, unremitting stride crafts a spiritual experience in which calm evolution supplants emotion. Passing details assume cosmic significance amid persistent monolithic planes of sound, suggesting the composer's numb resignation to his looming demise.

In a surprising departure from his reputation for expansive tempos and thick textures (fully evident in a 1950 concert on the « Tahra » label) , a 1958 Hans Knappertsbusch Bavarian State Orchestra concert (« Music & Arts ») is fleet, ardent and downright youthful at a mere 51 minutes, as if to evoke the composer's desperate fading memories of earlier times.

Interestingly, although all other conductors came to discredit it, Knappertsbusch clung to (and lets us hear) the Ferdinand Löwe edition, which complements his swift tempos with its vital and simplified rescoring.

While his earlier concert 9ths are also fleet, nimble and pointed, following a heart attack, Bruno Walter cut a 1959 studio 9th with a reduced Columbia Symphony (on the « Sony » label) that boasts luminous, transparent textures, finely-tuned balances and an utterly sweet outlook, as if strife and resistance against fate no longer seemed relevant after his brush with death. By coming to view even the most complex music as idealized, spiritual harmony, Walter illuminated the composer's « naïve » and sincere religious faith.

Zubin Mehta, in 1964 (on the « Decca » label) ; Carlo Maria Giulini (on « DGG ») ; and Leonard Bernstein, in 1990 (also on « DGG ») all led the Vienna Philharmonic in remarkably similar readings, tailored to that famed ensemble's smooth, blended sound. Their massive but deeply sensitive approaches emphasize magisterial power, with Mehta's fueled by volatile climaxes ; Bernstein's tempered by a somewhat warmer gloss ; and Giulini's fired by brass and tympani accents. Their Finales end on a breathtakingly smooth and gentle plane, as if to bid the composer a loving farewell and to grant him the eternal peace he never knew in life.

In a 1998 concert with the Berlin Philharmonic (on the « BMG » label) , Günter Wand sought to hold Bruckner's weighty materials in equilibrium to portray the monumentality of his conceptions, his withdrawal from life's demanding details and his inner truthfulness.

Otto Klemperer, who led the American premiere of the original version, in 1934, took a similarly massive, objective view with the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra (on the « EMI » label) .

Born in Vienna and trained by a Bruckner pupil, octogenarian Georg Tintner achieved as his sole major recording project a superb set of the complete Bruckner Symphonies, but then took his own life rather than suffer through a final illness (bone cancer) . The sheer poise of his 1997 9th with the Royal Scottish National Orchestra (on the « Naxos » label) perhaps reflects both his and Bruckner's final escapes into the solace of pure, abstract music from the anxiety of their respective worlds.

In leaving his 9th Symphony unrealized, Bruckner empowered future generations to apply their insights to build and complete an artistic legacy that explored and transcended the confines of his own life.

While we have come to accept the 3 movement 9th as definitive and emotionally whole, Bruckner actually left 180 pages comprising about 15 minutes of music for a Finale, ranging from sketches to fully orchestrated passages. Its coherence is compromised by entire missing blocks of pages thought to have been kept by associates as souvenirs. Several modern scholars have attempted to realize performing versions, but all are somewhat speculative and lack the special inspiration that Bruckner would have provided to meld these and, perhaps, other materials into a masterful structure.

The most successful presentation is a recording by Nikolaus Harnoncourt and the Vienna Philharmonic (on the « BMG » label) , coupling a decent performance of a « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the score with a performance of the surviving sections in the course of a fascinating lecture in which he explains the structure and leaves tantalizing clues as to the gaps, including a Coda in which Bruckner was to include references to several former Symphonies, as if to conclude what he knew would be his final work with a literal summary of his career.

In any event, despite some typically powerful « Brucknerian » themes, lyrical respites and intriguing implications, in years of toil Bruckner himself was never satisfied with the Finale, and so we can only wonder how (or even if) he would have brought the desperation and yearning of the 1st 3 movements to a suitable denouement.

Some scholars speculate that by adding the « Te Deum » at the end of the Adagio, Bruckner meant to signal that his earlier choral work of that title be used for a Finale, but its festive, ecstatic tone is wholly inappropriate to his grave, probing Symphony, and it seems far more likely that Bruckner meant his inscription to be taken literally as a sincere and fervent dedication - and, perhaps, supplication to God.

Bruckner's « failure » merely verifies the impossibility of the challenge he had created - the portion of the 9th that Bruckner did complete was so astoundingly powerful and far-reaching that not even he could have suitably concluded it. Although he reportedly was still working on his Finale the very day of his death, Bruckner's intentions, whatever they might have been, must remain consigned to eternal mystery.

Envisager la reconstruction du 4e mouvement est une chose mais disposer d'une documentation solide en est une autre. Les annotations et les données philologiques sont essentiels au processus. Pour le Finale de sa 9e Symphonie, Bruckner a utilisé 6 types de papier à musique de différents formats en provenance de son éditeur Josef Eberle à Vienne. La zone de pagination se situe dans la partie supérieure droite (« JE & Co. , n° 8. / 24 doublures ») . En examinant les entrées du compositeur, il devient assez facile d'établir l'ordre et d'identifier les 1res et les dernières pages. Des erreurs du secrétaire Meißner au niveau des préfixes apposés sur des feuilles non identiques sont devenues pour Alfred Orel une source de confusion. Alors qu'au contraire la diversité du matériel nous aide à mieux comprendre la méthode de composition du Maître.

La partition se présente sous forme de bi-folios (« Bogen » ou doubles feuillets) . On retrouve sur chaque page : une annotation sur portées, des entrées pré-déterminées pour l'instrumentation (organisées de haut en bas) comprenant les touches, le tempo et des séquences numérotées ininterrompues de 4 mesures (essentiellement préparées par Anton Meißner) . Les clarinettes sont notées en si bémol ; les cors et les trompettes en fa.

La partition de la seconde étape se compose aussi de bi-folios numérotés dans le coin supérieur droit. Anton Meißner avait préparé ces pages avec des mesures, des clefs et l'indication des instruments afin que son Maître puisse composer sur le champ. Des modifications majeures de la part de Bruckner se solderont par la renumérotation des demi-feuillets par son secrétaire. Dans de nombreux cas, il est impossible de distinguer les esquisses des annotations finales (Reinschrift) .

Lors d'une étape de la composition du Finale, Anton Bruckner avait décidé de subdiviser le très long bi-folio n° « 2F » (comportant maintenant un total de 36 mesures) en numéros « 2 » et « 3 » . Le tout, rédigé sur le tard, sur du papier à musique de type « E » ; donc postérieur à la pagination originale. Meißner a fort probablement effacé les anciens numéros en grattant la surface à l'aide d'une lame de rasoir.

Le problème du Finale de la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner

Bruckner jeta ses dernières forces dans la composition du Finale et y consacra quasiment les 2 dernières années de sa vie. Environ les 3 quarts du mouvement a été couché sur le papier (exposition - développement - ré-exposition) bien que l'orchestration soit incomplète en de nombreux endroits, le dernier bi-folio (double page comportant 24 portées sur chaque face et servant à l'orchestration) s'arrête juste avant la Coda. Bruckner a-t-il totalement esquissé celle-ci ? Des indices peuvent le laisser penser (datations et références manuscrites sur certains brouillons et bi-folios) . Selon le témoignage de Richard Heller, le médecin de Bruckner, ce dernier lui aurait joué de larges extraits du Finale au piano, dont la Coda entière, et ce vraisemblablement à l'automne ou l'hiver 1895. Malheureusement, des feuillets d'esquisse et de bi-folios ont été chapardés et dispersés par ses élèves, les exécutants testamentaires et des « chasseurs de souvenirs » . Certains éléments manuscrits ont heureusement été récemment retrouvés à Washington et à Munich.

Le musicologue australien John Alan Phillips a édité les fragments du Finale qui ont été retrouvés (526 mesures) , à savoir la totalité de l'exposition (mesures 1 à 278) , ainsi que la majorité du développement et de la ré-exposition (mesures 279 à 526) . 6 fragments manquent à l'appel : 8 mesures à la transition vers le développement, 8 mesures au milieu de la 1re partie du développement, 8 (ou 16) mesures à la fin de la seconde partie du développement (strette de la fugue) , 8 mesures à la transition vers la reprise du 3e groupe thématique (choral) , 16 mesures au milieu de la reprise du choral, et 8 (ou 16) mesures juste avant la Coda. 3 courts fragments de la Coda ont par ailleurs été retrouvés, respectivement 24, 4 et 16 mesures - le dernier fragment se terminant par un accord dissonant semblable à celui du climax du précédent Adagio.

Dans le Finale de la 9e Symphonie, le groupe thématique initial est largement exposé et développé. Il est suivi par un court 2e groupe thématique lyrique. Une transition constituée par un renversement du groupe thématique initial, qui ressemble au thème initial de la 1re Symphonie, est suivie par le 3e groupe thématique, un choral, qui rappelle l'Adieu à la vie du précédent Adagio et est accompagné en ostinato aux violons par le motif du « Te Deum ». Cet ostinato se poursuit jusque dans la 1re partie du développement, dans lequel le 1er thème est largement développé. La seconde partie du développement est une fugue complexe — dont la strette est manquante. Après une citation du Finale de la 6e Symphonie, le développement se termine par un climax, qui est suivi par la ré-exposition des 3 thèmes (la seconde partie de la ré-exposition du choral est manquante) et la transition vers la Coda. La Coda, dans laquelle le compositeur avait l'intention d'introduire, en guise de testament spirituel, du matériel des 5e, 7e et 8e Symphonies, est quasi totalement manquante. Les fragments retrouvés du Finale, qui font, comme les mouvements précédents, preuve d'une audace harmonique et formelle sans pareil, se distinguent de manière saillante par rapport aux Finales des autres Symphonies. S'ils font montre de quelques similitudes inévitables, ils révèlent surtout des importantes et novatrices différences.

Peu de temps avant sa mort, comprenant qu'il ne parviendrait sans doute pas à achever l'œuvre, Bruckner suggéra de faire jouer son « Te Deum » à la suite de l'Adagio (le 3e mouvement) et ce à la place du Finale. Bruckner imagina une autre solution et composa également une transition qui, à la fin de la ré-exposition du Finale (réapparition en ré majeur aux cordes du motif en quintes du « Te Deum » accompagnant le thème du choral servant ici de 3e groupe thématique), permet d'introduire le ton de do majeur et ainsi de faire surgir le chœur initial du « Te Deum ». Cette solution présente un problème formel important : quid de l'irruption du « Te Deum » d'une durée d'environ 25 minutes après approximativement 18 à 20 minutes d'un Finale dont les éléments thématiques, hormis le motif motorique d'accompagnement des cordes, n'ont rien à voir avec ceux du « Te Deum ». Cette étrangeté formelle se double d'une autre incohérence, celle du ton conclusif du « Te Deum » (en do majeur) et le ton principal de la Symphonie qui est en ré mineur.

Le chef Nikolaus Harnoncourt a, en 2002, enregistré avec la Philharmonique de Vienne un double CD chez RCA. Le 2e disque compact est consacré à un Workshop en version allemande et anglaise, dans lequel Harnoncourt exécute, après les avoir commentés, les fragments édités par John Alan Phillips - durée : 18 minutes. Harnoncourt ne retient pas les quelques courts fragments qui ont été retrouvés de la Coda, qu'il considère comme non significatifs, car ils ne concernent pas l'intention du compositeur. Cet enregistrement a le mérite de ne contenir que du matériel original, à l'inverse des diverses tentatives de reconstruction, en particulier celles de la Coda, dont on n'a jamais la garantie que leurs additions correspondent aux intentions du compositeur.

4th movement : Bruckner had conceived the entire movement ; whether the manuscripts he left would have made-up the final form of the Finale is debatable. Several bi-folios of the emerging autograph score survived, consecutively numbered by Bruckner himself, as well as numerous discarded bi-folios and particellos sketches. The surviving manuscripts were all systematically ordered and published in a notable fac-simile reprint, edited by John Alan Phillips, in the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , Vienna.

Because of Bruckner's individual composing habits, reconstructing the Finale is in some ways easier, and in some ways harder, than it would be to reconstruct an unfinished piece by another composer. Compounding the problem, collectible hunters ransacked Bruckner's house soon after his death. Sketches for the Finale have been found as far away from Austria as Washington D.C.

Large portions of the movement were almost completely orchestrated, and even some eminent sketches have been found for the Coda (the initial crescendo of 28 bars, and the progression towards the final cadence, even proceeding into the final tonic pedalpoint ; in all 32 bars) , but only hearsay suggesting the Coda would have integrated themes from all 4 movements. The Bruckner scholars Max Graf and Max Auer reported that they have actually seen such a sketch when they had access to the manuscripts, at that time in the possession of Franz Schalk. Today, such a sketch appears to be lost.

More importantly than the loss of the score bi-folios of the Coda itself, composer and Bruckner scholar Robert Simpson asserts in his book, « The Essence of Bruckner » , is that the sketches that survive do not support the momentum to support such a conclusion. Some people think that there is no real inner continuity or coherence inherent to indicate an organically growing musical structure. But, in fact, the publications of the « Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe » , edited by John Alan Phillips, revealed that Bruckner has left an emerging autograph score, numbered consecutively bi-folio by bi-folio, which constituted the intact score, at least up to the beginning of the Coda. Around 50 % of this final phase must be considered lost today.

Bruckner knew he might not live to complete this Symphony and suggested his « Te Deum » be played at the end of the concert. The presence in the sketches of the figuration heard in quarter notes at the outset of the « Te Deum » led to a supposition that Bruckner was composing a link or transition between the 2 works. In fact, the sketch for such a transition can be found on 2 bi-folios of the emerging autograph score. Some people think that, at best, this would have been a make-shift solution. The C major setting of the « Te Deum » conflicts with the D minor setting of the rest of the Symphony. Because of this tonal clash, the « Te Deum » is rarely used as the Finale. However, others think it better to follow the composer's own wish and so argue against the tonal clash theory, since the Adagio ends in another key (E major) as well.

Unlike most of his Symphonies, Bruckner did not produce multiple revisions of his 9th Symphony. However, there have been multiple editions of what Bruckner did write, as well as several attempts to complete the Symphony's 4th movement, which Bruckner left unfinished.

The Ferdinand Löwe edition (1906) was the 1st published edition of the 9th Symphony. It was also the version performed at the work's posthumous premiere, and the only version heard until 1932. Löwe made multiple unauthorized changes to the Symphony amounting to a wholesale recomposition of the work. In addition to 2nd guessing of Bruckner's orchestration, phrasing and dynamics, Ferdinand Löwe also dialed back Bruckner's more adventurous harmonies, such as the complete dominant 13th chord in the Adagio.

The Alfred Orel edition (1932) was the 1st Edition that attempted to reproduce what Bruckner actually wrote. This version was 1st performed in 1932, by Siegmund von Hausegger with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. In the concert, the Symphony was performed twice, 1st in Löwe's edition and then in the Alfred Orel version. It includes only the 1st 3 complete movements.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs edition (2000) : This new edition of the complete 3 movements has been recorded by Nikolaus Harnoncourt. It contains only minor differences from the Alfred Orel and Leopold Nowak editions, but corrects several printing errors and includes extensive comments in footnotes, explaining some of the editorial problems. The separate Critical Report of Cohrs contains numerous fac-simili from Movements 1 and 3. It also contains an edition of the 2 earlier Trios, for concert performance.

Although Bruckner suggested using his « Te Deum » as the Finale of the 9th Symphony, there have been several attempts to complete the Symphony with a 4th movement based on Bruckner's surviving manuscripts for the Finale. Indeed, Bruckner's suggestion has been used as a justification for completing the 4th movement, since it shows (according to some scholars such as John Alan Phillips) , as well of the sheer existence of the Finale fragment, that the composer did not want this work to end with the Adagio.

William Carragan's completion (1983, revised in 2003, revised in 2006, revised in 2010) : The 1st attempt of a performing version of the Finale, available on disc, was the one by William Carragan (who also has done work editing Bruckner's 2nd Symphony) . His 1983 completion was premiered by Moshe Atzmon conducting the American Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, in January 1985. The European premiere by the « Utrecht Symfonie Orkest » conducted by Hubert Soudant (Utrecht, April 1985) was the 1st to be recorded. Shortly afterwards, this version was recorded for CD release by Yoav Talmi and the Oslo Philharmonic. The revision of 2006 was subsequently recorded by Akira Naito. The further revision of 2010 has recently been recorded by Gerd Schaller.

The Samale and Mazzuca completion (1984, revised in 1985) : The team of Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca put together a new realization from 1983 to 1985, which was recorded 1986 by Eliahu Inbal and fits in with Inbal's recordings of early versions of Bruckner's Symphonies. The Coda of the Samale and Mazzuca realization has more in common with the corresponding passage of the 8th Symphony than it does with the later « SPCM » realization. The authors don't wish this version to be performed any longer.

« SPCM » completion (1992, revised in 1996, revised in 2005, revised in 2008, revised in 2011) : For this venture, Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca were joined by John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. This completion proposes one way to realize Bruckner's intention to combine themes from all 4 movements. This version has been recorded by Johannes Wildner (for « Naxos ») and also by Kurt Eichhorn with the Bruckner Orchestra of Linz (for the japanese « Camerata » label) .

A new, revised edition of this completion was published in 2005 by Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. Cohrs' latest research made it also possible to recover the musical content of one missing bi-folio in the Fugue fully from the partitello sketch. This new edition, in all 665 bars long, makes use of 569 bars from Bruckner himself. This version has been recorded by Marcus Bosch (for the label « Coviello Classics ») . A revised reprint of this was 1st performed by the Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra under Daniel Harding, on November 2007, in Stockholm.

A further revision was published in 2008 and has been recorded by conductor Friedemann Layer with the « Musikalische Akademie des Nationaltheater-Orchesters Mannheim ». Richard Lehnert explains the changes made for this version :

« A final revision was made in 2011, in particular including an entirely new conception of the Coda. The world-premiere of this new ending was given by the Dutch « Brabants Orkest » under the baton of Friedemann Layer in Breda, Holland, on 15 October 2011. It was performed in Berlin, on 9 February 2012, by Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic. This version was released on « EMI Classics », on 22 May 2012. Rattle conducted the American premiere at Carnegie Hall, on 24 February 2012.

Sébastien Letocart's completion (2008) : In 2008, the Belgian organist and composer Sébastien Letocart realized a new completion of the Finale, in 2007-2008. In the Coda, he included quotations of themes from the 5th, 7th and 8th Symphonies, the mid-subject of the Trio as a final « Halleluja », and at the end the combination of the 4 main themes from all 4 movements of the 9th.

Sébastien Letocart's completion, together with the 1st 3 parts of the Symphony, was recorded in 2008 by the French conductor Nicolas Couton with the « MÁV » Symphony Orchestra of Budapest.

Other tentative completions have been made by Ernst Märzendorfer (1969) , Heins-Gravesande (1969) , Marshall Fine (1979) and Nors S. Josephson (1992) .

The oldest complete performance (of the 3 completed movements) preserved on record is by Otto Klemperer with the New York Philharmonic, in 1934. The 1st commercial recording was made by Siegmund von Hausegger with the Munich Philharmonic, in 1938, for « HMV ». Both recordings used the Alfred Orel edition.

The inauthentic Ferdinand Löwe version is available by Hans Knappertsbusch and Frederick Charles Adler. These can be as short as 51 minutes.

A recording of the 3 movements in the Alfred Orel or Leopold Nowak edition on average lasts about 65 minutes, though a fast conductor like Carl Schuricht can get it down to 56 minutes. The earliest recordings of the Orel edition were Oswald Kabasta's live performance with the Munich Philharmonic in 1943, and Wilhelm Furtwängler's studio performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1944. After Bruno Walter's studio recording with the Columbia Symphony Orchestra, in 1959 for CBS, the Nowak edition was preferred. The most recent Orel edition recording was Daniel Barenboim's live performance with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1991.

Recordings of Finale realizations are usually coupled with the Leopold Nowak edition for the 1st 3 movements. Some of these also include recordings of the fragments Bruckner left so that the listener may determine for himself how much of the realization is what Bruckner actually wrote and how much is speculation by the editor. Yoav Talmi's recording of the William Carragan completion is one example of a recording that includes the fragments.

In 2003, Nikolaus Harnoncourt and the « Wiener Philharmoniker » recorded the 9th (Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs edition) as well as the Finale Fragment (for the « RCA » label) , but without the Coda sketches. In the same year, « Naxos » published a recommendable live recording with the New Philharmonia Orchestra of Westphalia under Johannes Wildner, including the 1992 « SPCM » version, revised in 1996. In 2012, « EMI Classics » released a live recording of the Conclusive Edition of the « SPCM » score with the « Berliner Philharmoniker » under Simon Rattle.

In 2006, Akira Naito with the Tokyo New City Orchestra recorded the 9th Symphony (Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs edition) with the Trio No. 2 of 1893, as well as the William Carragan Finale completion (revised in 2006) . There is as yet no commercial recording of the Trio No. 1 of 1889.

Anyone who loves Bruckner's music will want to hear this recording since it contains the Finale of his Symphony No. 9, the music which, according to Bruckner's musical executors, never existed except in the mind of the dying composer. But while that story fooled generations of conductors into performing a 3 movement version of the 9th, musicologists have long known that most of the Finale existed in score and sketch at Bruckner's death. But what the musicologists knew to be true has been almost completely ignored until this recording. Almost completely ignored because there have been three previous recordings of 9th's Finale over the past 20 years and all of them are far more compelling than this one by Nikolaus Harnoncourt and the Vienna Philharmonic. For one thing, all the other recordings of the Finales have been completed with the bits that Bruckner didn't finish filled in, while Harnoncourt's recordings only have the bits that Bruckner finished and interpolates a lecture to describe what's missing. While this may be musicologically more accurate, in performance it is at best disruptive, at worst dull. For another thing, all the other Finales are performed with the overwhelming need to compel belief in the Finale while Harnoncourt himself seems unconvinced of its merits. But then, Harnoncourt's recording of the 3 completed movements are just as unconvincing. In Harnoncourt's performance, his opening movement alternates long stretches of quiet tedium with short bursts of loud bombast, his Scherzo alternates long stretches of loud hammering with short bursts of quiet inanity, and his Adagio alternates long stretches of loud, painfully dissonant music with shot bursts of louder, more painfully dissonant music. Harnoncourt's recording doesn't make a case for a 4 movement 9th ; it doesn't even make a case for a 3 movement.

Bruckner Discoveries at the « Deutsches Rundfunkarchiv »

(By John F. Berky)

In recent years, I have had the good fortune to be able to comb through the Bruckner collection of the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » (DRA) in Frankfurt, Germany.

Much of this searching was simply done with an e-mail request and that was possible thanks to the fact that I had recovered some Bruckner recordings that the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » did not have and I sent the original transcription discs to them.

While most of the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » collection contains complete or partially complete performances (partially complete usually means that one or more 78 rpm transcriptions matrixes are missing for a set) , there were 2 very short recordings that offered sections of the Symphony No. 9 that peaked my interest. They were requested and quickly received.

The 1st one requested was a complete surprise. It took a second of recognition to realize that I was listening to the opening exposition to the Finale of the Bruckner Symphony No. 9. Since it was recorded on October 12th, 1940, this was clearly the 1st recording that the Finale had ever received ! The recording is just 3'16" long and was recorded in the studios of the « Reichssenders Leipzig » with Hans Weisbach conducting the « Großes Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig » . The score used was of the opening exposition prepared from the manuscript by Fritz Öser. The recording is described as a « versuchaufnahme » , or an experimental recording. These were made occasionally to test equipment or music but were not intended for broadcast. The recording is incomplete since the very opening is missing (the 1st matrix was lost) . But the short document is fascinating, not just because it is the 1st recording of any part of the Bruckner 9th Finale, but the fact that, in October of 1940, at a time when Germany's « Luftwaffe » was fully-engaged in the « Battle of Britain » , someone in Leipzig who had the authority to pull together the Leipzig Radio Symphony Orchestra for a « versuchaufnahme » was checking-out Bruckner's incomplete sketches. The work can be auditioned on the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » website at :

<http://www.dra.de/online/dokument/2007/november.html>

A few weeks later, I requested another such recording. This one contained some part of the Bruckner 9th but the performers were members of the Max Strub Quartet (Max Strub, violin ; Hermann Hubl, violin ; Hermann Herschfelder, viola ; Hans Münch-Holland, cello) plus the presence of Emil Seiler, viola. When this recording arrived, it was another revelation. The music being played was from the discarded Trios to the Scherzo. Bruckner completed 2 Trios prior to composing the Trio used in the actual publication. In the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » recording, Mister Strub prepared an A-B-A Scherzo of his own. He performed the 1st Trio, followed by the 2nd Trio and, then, completed the performance by playing the 1st Trio, again - sort of a Bruckner Scherzo of Trios ! Unfortunately, the 2nd playing of the 1st Trio is incomplete (another missing matrix) but I quickly pointed-out to my colleague at the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » that, since the 1st Trio was already performed, one just needed to use the 1st playing to recreate the 2nd playing. The work, once reconstructed, runs for 9 minutes 42 seconds.

<http://www.dra.de/online/dokument/2008/dok2008-1.html>

(Recording note from the October 12th, 1940, session showing that the entire recording was 6 minutes 49 secondes. Only 3 minutes 16 seconds of the recording still exists.)

As with the 1st recording, this was a « versuchaufnahme » . But the most interesting thing was that the recording was made in the « Reichssenders » Studios in Leipzig, on October 13th, 1940, just 1 day after the Orchestra recorded the Finale exposition. So, now, we have someone who is not only pulling in the entire Leipzig Radio Symphony Orchestra but Max Strub and his Quintet as well - all in a period of 2 days. Naturally, we wanted to know who this Bruckner enthusiast was and why were the recordings made at that time. My colleague at the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv », Jörg Wyrchow, began digging and while he was able to locate some documentation, he could not link the operation to any one person. However, what he did tell me was something quite simple.

At that time (October, 10th to 13th) , a Bruckner Festival took place in Leipzig, the « Zweites Leipziger Brucknerfest, veranstaltet von der Leipziger Bruckner-Gemeinschaft in Verbindung mit der NS-Gemeinschaft Kraft durch Freude, dem Gewandhaus zu Leipzig und dem Reichssender Leipzig ». Just how these 2 recordings were used in the Festival, we do not know but, at least, we now know why they were created.

According to Bruckner scholar, Crawford Howie, one of the background features of this Festival seems to have been a quasi-political struggle between the « Leipziger Bruckner-Gemeinde und Verlag » (Leipzig Bruckner Association and publishing-house ; they were opposed to the original versions of the Symphonies and had not been allowed to become part of the International Bruckner Society, IBG, in the mid- 1930's as a result) and the « Deutsche Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (DBG : Germany Bruckner Society) . The « Deutsche Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , supported by the Ministry for Propaganda, accused the « Leipziger Bruckner-Gemeinde und Verlag » of not including them in the planning of the Festival and, 3 weeks before the beginning of the Festival, the Ministry for Propaganda threatened to cancel the Festival unless the « Deutsche Bruckner-Gesellschaft » was involved.

This struggle between those in favour of the « original versions » versus those published by the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , under the editorship of Robert Haas, and those who wished to retain the 1st edition versions, seems to have continued for some time throughout the 1940's. However, the Ministry for Propaganda made it clear that they wanted to be involved in discussions with the different Bruckner Societies in Germany, at the time.

It may seem unusual that such activities would be taking place in Germany during the War. However, in 1940, the situation of the German Radio Symphony Orchestras was not as critical as one might imagine. Later in the War, most of the Orchestras were disbanded and the members had to fight at the front. But a few fortunate musicians continued to have the opportunity of playing in an Orchestra throughout the War. The « Berlin Rundfunkorchester » continued its operation right into 1945 and, by 1944, was beginning its series of « Stereo-Versuchsaufnahmen » including a portion of a Bruckner 8th conducted by Herbert von Karajan.

« Dem lieben Gott » : Die Erstaufnahme des Finale-Fragmentes der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner

« Nun widme ich der Majestät aller Majestäten, dem lieben Gott, mein letztes Werk, und hoffe, daß er mir noch so viel Zeit gönnen wird, es zu vollenden und meine Gabe gnädig aufnimmt. »

So soll sich Anton Bruckner gegenüber seinem letzten Arzt, Doktor Richard Heller, geäußert haben. Bruckners Hoffnung erfüllte sich nicht. Er starb am Nachmittag des 11. Oktober 1896 im Alter von 72 Jahren, ohne sein letztes Werk (die Sinfonie Nr. 9 in D-Moll) vollendet zu haben. Die ersten drei Sätze der Sinfonie waren weitestgehend ausgearbeitet. Es fehlte nur die endgültige Gesamtedition, mit der Bruckner seine Arbeiten abzuschließen pflegte. Das Finale blieb Fragment.

Wie weit die Arbeiten am Finale zum Zeitpunkt von Bruckners Tod fortgeschritten waren, läßt sich im einzelnen nicht mehr nachvollziehen, denn offensichtlich sind wertvolle Handschriften abhanden gekommen. Die Nachricht von Bruckners Tod verbreitete sich rasch in Wien. Richard Heller berichtet, daß sich sofort « Befugte und Unbefugte wie Geier auf seinen Nachlaß » gestürzt hätten. Leider wurde es versäumt, Bruckners Wohnung im « Kustoden-Stöckl » des Schloßes Belvedere rechtzeitig zu versiegeln. Darum konnten zahlreiche Manuskripte entwendet werden. Einige von ihnen tauchten im Laufe der Zeit wieder auf, andere müßen weiterhin als verschollen gelten. Die überlieferten Manuskripte zur 9. Sinfonie befinden sich heute in sieben verschiedenen Bibliotheken und im Privatbesitz.

Von den geschätzten 700 Takten, die das vollendete Finale wahrscheinlich umfaßt hätte, sind rund 500 in verschiedenen Entwurfsstadien überliefert : 172 Takte sind vollständig orchestriert, 200 weitere sind teilweise instrumentiert, das heißt der Streichersatz ist vollständig notiert sowie die Stimmen von führenden Instrumenten. Die « erste Abteilung », also die Exposition des Finales, konnte Bruckner noch weitgehend vollenden. Die übrigen Formteile sind bis zum dritten Thema in der Reprise unvollständig ausgearbeitet, dann reißt die Komposition ab. Der Schluß des Finales fehlt gänzlich. Allerdings wissen wir, daß Bruckner eine genaue Vorstellung davon gehabt hat, wie die Sinfonie enden sollte. Richard Heller berichtet, Bruckner habe vorgehabt, « das Allelujah des zweiten Satzes mit aller Macht wieder im Finale zu bringen, damit die Sinfonie mit einem Lob und Preislied an den lieben Gott endet. Und dann setzte er sich ans Klavier und spielte mir mit zitternden Händen, aber richtig und mit voller Kraft, Partien daraus vor. Oftmals habe ich bedauert, musikalisch nicht soweit gebildet zu sein, um einmal Gehörtes wiederzuspielen oder niederschreiben zu können, denn dann wäre es mir möglich gewesen, vielleicht den Schluß der neunten Sinfonie zu skizzieren » .

Die 9. Sinfonie erschien erstmals im Jahre 1934 im Rahmen der Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe. Seitdem wurden immer wieder Versuche unternommen, die überlieferten Teile des Finales in eine spielbare Fassung zu bringen oder sogar zu vollenden. Den Beginn machte Elke Krüger. Sie richtete die Fragmente bereits 1934 für zwei Klaviere ein. Im Jahre 1940 legte Fritz Öser eine aufführungspraktische Einrichtung der beinahe vollständig instrumentierten Exposition des Finales für Orchester vor. In dieser Form gelangte das Finale von Bruckners 9. Sinfonie am 12. Oktober 1940 erstmals zur Aufführung. Hans Weisbach leitete das Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig. Das Fragment des Finales stand am Beginn des Konzerts, danach folgten die vollendeten Sätze der 9. Sinfonie von Bruckner. Im Zusammenhang mit dieser Aufführung machte der Reichssender Leipzig eine Versuchsaufnahme von der Exposition des Finales. Das Ergebnis wurde auf zwei Schellackplatten festgehalten. Leider ist die erste der beiden Platten verschollen. Auf der zweiten Platte befindet sich das älteste Klangdokument, das vom Finale der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner überliefert ist.

Bis dato sind über zwanzig Bearbeitungen des Finales von Bruckners 9. Sinfonie vorgelegt worden. Die wenigsten davon konnten sich im Konzertleben durchsetzen. Sofern man das Finale überhaupt spielt, greift man heute meistens auf die Fassung von William Carragan (1984) oder auf die Bearbeitung der Autorengemeinschaft Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Giuseppe Mazzuca, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (1996ff) zurück. Auch heutzutage enden noch die meisten Aufführungen der 9. Sinfonie mit dem dritten Satz - entgegen Bruckners ausdrücklichem Willen. Er hatte verfügt, daß man sein 1884 vollendetes « Te Deum » als vierten Satz spielen soll, falls er das instrumentale Finale nicht mehr vollenden könne.

Die Trio-Entwürfe zum 2. Satz der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner

Als Torso überlieferte Kunstwerke üben seit jeher eine besondere Faszination aus. Das gilt auch für unvollendet gebliebene Kompositionen. Oftmals sind sie von der Aura eines romantisierenden Mystizismus umgeben, vor allem, wenn der Komponist verstarb, bevor er sein letztes Werk vollenden konnte. Eines der prominentesten Beispiele dafür ist Mozarts « Requiem ». Häufig sind musikalische Fragmente jedoch bloße kompositorische Vorarbeiten, die nicht unbedingt zur Ausarbeitung vorgesehen waren. Andere Kompositionen blieben unvollendet, weil sie im Zuge des Kompositionsvorgangs verworfen wurden oder weil der Aufführungsanlaß zwischenzeitlich entfallen war.

Die 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner ist in mehrfacher Hinsicht fragmentarisch überliefert. Sie blieb als Ganzes unvollendet. « Im Ende des Jahres 1894 waren die ersten drei Sätze fertig und der Finalsatz auch schon weitgehend. Insgesamt haben Bruckner wahrscheinlich zwei Monate Lebenszeit gefehlt, um die Sinfonie zu vollenden », vermutete Nikolaus Harnoncourt im Rahmen eines Gesprächskonzerts, das im Jahre 2002 in Salzburg stattgefunden hat. Bruckners letzte Sinfonie nährte den berühmten Mythos der « Neunten », den Arnold Schönberg 1912 in seiner berühmten Prager Rede über die « Neunte » von Gustav Mahler mit folgenden Worten umschrieb :

Zur 9. Sinfonie von Bruckner sind aber auch große Teile der kompositorischen Vorarbeiten erhalten geblieben. Bruckner hielt seine musikalische Grund-Konzeption zunächst in Particellform fest. Bei diesen Particell-Entwürfen handelte es sich aber keineswegs um die Skizzierung der vollständigen Sinfonie, sondern nur ihrer strukturell wichtigsten Teile. Als nächster Schritt erfolgte die Ausarbeitung der Partitur. Bruckner schrieb zunächst die Streicherstimmen und wichtige Verläufe in den Bläsern mit Bleistift nieder. Danach fixierte er die bereits notierten Stimmen mit Tinte und ergänzte blockweise die restlichen Instrumente. In einem letzten Arbeitsgang unterzog Bruckner die Komposition noch einmal einer kritischen Durchsicht und ergänzte alle spieltechnischen Anweisungen. Bei größeren Korrekturen sonderte er einzelne Partiturbögen aus und ersetzte sie durch komplett neu geschriebene. Von allen Kompositions- und Korrekturstadien der 9. Sinfonie liegt Quellenmaterial vor. In diesen Quellen finden sich auch musikalische Ideen, die letztendlich nicht in die Sinfonie eingegangen sind, so zum Beispiel zwei Trio-Entwürfe zum Scherzo, dem zweiten Satz der Sinfonie.

Der Erstentwurf zu Scherzo und Trio der 9. Sinfonie lag bereits am 4. Januar 1889 vollständig vor. Die eigentliche Ausarbeitung des Sinfoniesatzes stellte Bruckner dann aber zunächst zurück. Erst Anfang 1893 nahm er die Arbeiten wieder auf und komponierte am 27. Februar ein neues Trio, das er wenig später aber wieder verwarf. Die Arbeiten am Scherzo mit dem letztgültigen Trio schloß Bruckner am 15. Februar 1894 ab.

Die musikalische Grundsubstanz der beiden verworfenen Trios hat Bruckner vollständig ausgeformt, aber nicht mehr in Gänze instrumentiert. Im Jahre 1940 wurde die wahrscheinlich erste aufführungspraktische Einrichtung der Trios (eine Fassung für Streichquintett) erstellt. Am 13. Oktober 1940 präsentierte das bekannte Leipziger Strub-Quartett, verstärkt durch den Bratschisten Emil Seiler, diese Bearbeitung der Öffentlichkeit. Der Reichssender Leipzig hat die Aufführung im dortigen Landeskonservatorium mitgeschnitten und auf drei Schellackplatten festgehalten. Die Musikredakteure des Leipziger Senders scheinen zu dieser Zeit ein besonderes Interesse an den überlieferten Fragmenten zu Bruckners 9. Sinfonie gehabt zu haben, denn am Tag zuvor wurde das unvollendete Finale vom Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig unter Leitung von Hans Weisbach aus der Taufe gehoben.

Hörzeit (9'42'') : 2 Trioentwürfe zum Scherzo der Sinfonie Nr. 9 in D-Moll (WAB 109) :

Trio in F-Dur (1889) ; Trio in Fis-Dur (1893) ; Trio in F-Dur (Wiederholung) .

Aufnahmedatum : 13. Oktober 1940.

Die Trios erklangen bei dieser Aufführung in einem Zusammenhang, der von Bruckner in keiner Weise intendiert war. Aus den ohnehin ausgesonderten, voneinander unabhängigen Entwürfen ist ein neues, selbständiges Satzgefüge in Bogenform ohne Bezug zum eigentlichen Scherzo-Hauptteil gebildet worden. Zunächst wurde das Trio in F-Dur aus dem Jahre 1889 gespielt. Als Mittelteil firmierte das Trio in Fis-Dur aus dem Jahre 1893, und danach wurde das F-Dur Trio wiederholt.

Trotz der fragwürdigen Kompilation bietet die Aufnahme interessante Einblicke in die Genese des zweiten Satzes von Bruckners 9. Sinfonie. Das F-Dur Trio ist im typischen Ländler-Ton gehalten. Besonders prägnant für den Satz ist das Ostinato-Motiv aus dem « Te Deum » von 1884, das in der ganzen Sinfonie eine wichtige Rolle spielt und an dieser Stelle fast wörtlich zitiert wird. Im Fis-Dur Trio von 1893 wird der beschauliche Ländler-Ton beibehalten, das « Te Deum » Motiv ist in abgewandelter Form nach wie vor präsent, tritt aber etwas mehr in den Hintergrund. Im Mittelteil des Fis-Dur Trios findet sich bereits das thematische Material, das in die endgültige Fassung des Trios von 1894 eingegangen ist. In der Endfassung von 1894 erhält das Trio einen vollkommen anderen Charakter. Bruckner schreibt einen nach vorne drängenden Satz, der im Gegensatz zu den Vorläuferfassungen keinen Ruhepol zum Scherzo-Hauptteil darstellt. Das « Te Deum » Motiv ist nur noch latent in die Satzstruktur eingebunden.

Leider ist die Leipziger Rundfunkaufnahme mit der Streichquintettfassung der beiden Trio-Entwürfe nicht vollständig überliefert. Die letzte Platte aus einem Set von ursprünglich drei Schellackplatten ist verschollen. Somit liegt nur eine fragmentarische Aufnahme des musikalischen Fragmentes vor. Auf der verloren gegangenen Platte befand sich offensichtlich die Fortsetzung der Wiederholung des F-Dur Trios. Die fehlenden Takte konnten aus der ersten Platte rekonstruiert werden, so daß man sich ein vollständiges Bild der Aufführungsfassung von 1940 machen kann. Leider läßt die technische Qualität der Aufnahme stellenweise stark zu wünschen übrig. Die Aufnahmedokumentation des Reichssenders Leipzig belegt, daß die Einspielung explizit nicht für Sendezwecke gedacht war. Dennoch ist sie ein wichtiges Zeugnis der Bruckner-Rezeption. Schließlich handelt es sich um die Erstaufnahme der Trio-Entwürfe zum 2. Satz der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner.

William Carragan (1983 et révisions : 2003, 2006, 2010)

La Ire tentative de reconstruction du Finale a été celle de William Carragan : le musicologue spécialiste de Bruckner qui a également édité la version originale de 1872 de la 2e Symphonie. La Ire européenne au concert de la version de 1983 sous la direction d'Hubert Soudant à la tête de l' « Utrecht Symfonie Orkest » , en avril 1985, a été gravée sur disque 33 tours chez « Philips » . Une copie de ce disque vinyle peut être téléchargée sur abruckner.com . Peu après, cette reconstruction a été enregistrée sur disque compact par Yoav Talmi à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique d'Oslo , sur étiquette « Chandos » . La révision ultérieure de 2006 a été enregistrée par Akira Naito et celle de 2010 par Gerd Schaller.

Anton Bruckner's Symphonies 4, 7, 9 - and Finale of the 9th completed by William Carragan, 2010 Edition

Gerd Schaller, « Philharmonie Festiva - « Profil » Records PHI1028 (4 CDs) . 2008 / 2009 / 2011. Ememkut Zaotschnyj (4, 7) , Lutz Wildner (9) , producers ; Sandro Binetti (4, 7) , Herbert Frühbauer (9) , engineers, DDD. Totals : 65:43 (4) ; 64:52 (7) ; 83:41 (9) .

These performances were recorded at the Ebrach Festival, held annually in the small-town of Ebrach, Germany (an hour's drive North from Nuremberg or West from Bayreuth) , in the former Abbey Church of Ebrach, which comprised a Cistercian monastery (now, a prison) and a vast Gothic cathedral, built in the 13th Century, which now serves as the parish church. Many hear the phrases « Festival Orchestra » and « live recording » and expect the worst : flawed documents of under-rehearsed performances by hastily convened pick-up Orchestras in venues not designed for good sound, and plagued by coughs, sneezes, scraped chair legs, the inadvertent rustlings of hundreds of attendees, and a level of applause that might not conform to the response of the listener at home. Recording in a cathedral compounds these problems : the hard stone surfaces seem to magnify the sound of each dropped program, each cleared throat. Nor is all music suited to, or every conductor adept at accommodating, the long reverberations of such spaces, in which the sound seems to lift into the air to hover cloud-like, even as the Orchestra continues below. The nave of the « Abteikirche Ebrach » is 286 feet long ; a sound made in it takes, by my clock, nearly 6 seconds to die away - in orchestral music ... an eternity !

Anton Bruckner, a devout Catholic, was comfortable with eternities. He spent half his life in cathedrals, as congregant, music-director, and organist, and it has long been a truism of commentary on his Symphonies that they are suffused not only with the slow pace and pauses required to make music in such venues, but also with the terraced dynamics of organ music. One can easily make too much of this - Bruckner's writing for the various sections of the Orchestra is far more subtle and intricately contrapuntal than could be managed by any organist with only 2 hands and 2 feet - but there is some truth to it.

Conductor Gerd Schaller seems as comfortable with the spiritual eternities implied in Bruckner's music as with the briefer aural forevers of a cathedral acoustic. Though he has had a long career in Europe, where he began in Opera, Schaller is almost unknown here ; I have not heard him conduct anything else in any other hall, and it is difficult to know how much of his interpretation was determined by the Ebrach sanctuary. Regardless, these are not only the finest recordings I have heard of a full Orchestra in a cathedral but, perhaps, the finest recordings I have heard of a full Orchestra in any venue. Cathedral recordings are often too « wet », the sound devolving into impenetrable mud drowned in mounting layers of reverberation. Here, the opposite happens : the sound of the hall itself is palpable as a vast body of clear water, through which the music rises and falls like beams of sunlight - or like well-formed thoughts arcing through the calm of a stilled mind and a steady heart, Euclidian geometries of sound endlessly ramifying like a lesson in perspective or the architecture of Palladio. In such a hall, the many long rests and pauses Bruckner wrote into his scores, no matter how generously observed, are never entirely devoid of the music as it slowly fades, seeming to ever halve the time between it and a silence it never quite reaches before, at the last instant, the Orchestra resumes. Such limpid transparency leaves the orchestral players entirely exposed - every part can be heard, but with no lack of heft. In short, I have not heard better sound from a CD. In fact, halfway through Symphony No, 4, I double-checked discs and packaging and my Integra DTR-40.1's display to make sure I wasn't listening to the greatly expanded top end and harmonics audible from an SACD's high-resolution tracks. I wasn't.

Such clarity of sound and of musical thought results in interpretations that seem as much products of the secular Enlightenment as of the more spiritual variety, and bring to the fore Bruckner the Classicist, heir to the legacy of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert (as Bruckner considered himself to be) , rather than the late-Romantic acolyte of Richard Wagner he is more commonly taken for. But those are halves of a uniquely complex whole, and Schaller honours both : these performances embody even more Classical poise than do the elegant recordings of Georg Tintner, while lacking none of the weight or deep feeling of heavier, slower, more Romantic readings such as Sergiù Celibidache's. Schaller mostly eschews the many unscored ritardandi that have crept into standard interpretations of these works over the years, and this emphasizes his basically Classical style while making his few indulgences in this regard all the more expressive.

Schaller is immensely aided by the playing of the « Philharmonie Festiva » , which comprises musicians from the Munich Philharmonic, the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, and the Bavarian State Opera. Their playing is so virtually perfect that the expectation of a flubbed note or a ragged entrance creates a mounting tension of disbelief : can such flawlessness of execution be maintained until the end ? Evidently, it can. The sounds of horns and woodwinds and strings, singly or in vast choirs, never cease melting and morphing seamlessly into one another even as their distinct individual sonorities are retained. I can think of no other recording that reveals so much of the subtlety and clarity of Bruckner's voicings and orchestrations, and of no Orchestra that has played them with more poise and grace.

The recordings of Symphonies Nos. 4 (the 1886 Leopold Nowak edition, aka 1878-1880, as labeled here) and 7, released singly a few years ago, are of more or less standard length for Bruckner performance, at 66 and 65 minutes, respectively, but seem to unfold no faster than Celibidache's far longer readings of these works - and, for that matter, no slower than anyone else's. They seem to take precisely the amount of time they require, a duration not entirely measurable in minutes. These are Bruckner's sunniest, most popular Symphonies - like Beethoven's 7th or Schubert's 9th, perfect constructions full of light, air, grace, and, in 4, the spirit of the dance. In Schaller's hands, in the opening of the No. 4 (one of the most hushed, expectant beginnings of any Symphony), the senses of space and anticipation of great things to come (and come they do) is remarkable. As the solo horn finishes its call, the descending, diminishing scales in the low-strings disappear as much into the depth of the cathedral's vast space as into the bottom of the audible. Something of profound significance seems to conclude in near silence - and we are still only a minute into the work. This sets the tone for all that follows.

In the 1st movement of the 7th Symphony, the volleying brass choirs, that build to the 1st statement of the stern 2nd theme, have perhaps never been so clearly articulated, which makes an entirely different rhythmic sense for this passage. The Adagio has an inevitability of pace and development; the horn chorale, just before the lyrical 2nd subject, is all warm perfection, and the great chorale for brass and Wagner tubas, Bruckner's elegy for Wagner, is better played and shaped than I have ever heard it - it seems to emerge from the cathedral walls themselves to coalesce in space, as if great chunks of silent, sun-warmed stone had suddenly found voice. In the Scherzo, the intricate syncopation and counterpoint of strings, woodwinds, and trumpet is meticulously pointed.

My notes for Schaller's Symphony No. 9, released here for the 1st time, are a long list of similar moments. I'll mention only that, early in the Adagio, Bruckner's « Farewell to Life », for horns and Wagner tubas, has never sounded more tenderly elegiac or been so lingeringly long a leave-taking; the slow fugato section halfway through builds with a sense of stealthy awe I have not heard elsewhere; and the great dissonant chord, at 3:30 before the end, is so rich in tonal colours, so well balanced, that it sounds less like a dissonance than a hitherto unsuspected consonance built of precisely the same notes. Overall, Schaller leads a performance that can stand with the finest recordings of the traditional 3 movement version of this Symphony. The grace, delicacy, and inerrancy of the brasses alone make it worth hearing, but the woodwinds and strings are just as fine, and Schaller's shaping and pacing of the work's overall structure seem an ideal marriage of ardor, precision, and dignity. But while nothing sounds any less clear, this recording, taped by a different team than the documented Symphonies Nos. 4 and 7, has not quite the same qualities of air, light, and transparency.

The Symphony No. 9 concludes with Bruckner scholar William Carragan's latest 2010 version of his completion of the Finale. Bruckner either did not complete the Finale before his death, or did and those pages are now lost. William Carragan has been working on his completion for over 30 years. With the exception of the Coda (of which nothing but a few sketches survives), there is general agreement among Brucknerians about the precise lengths, in bars, of most of the missing passages. This means that the formal constraints on any completion attempting to hew closely to Bruckner's intentions, so far as those can be known or inferred, are considerable: compose, in Bruckner's late-style and the style of this Symphony, a passage of, say, 6 or 16 or 32 bars linking 2 much longer blocks of music, the 2nd of which begins in a manner very different from how the 1st ends.

William Carragan's links are invariably fascinating and sometimes brilliant, but less than half of them sound to me like something Bruckner himself might have composed. In the movement's latter half, a soft recurrence of the Finale's great chorale, here led by solo trumpet, is embroidered by William Carragan with woodwind obbligato that seem superfluous ; and, late in the movement, what William Carragan calls a « catastrophe » chord, immediately after the recurrence of the great peroration for brasses and strings, sounds melodramatic. The brass in the complex Coda, which is entirely William Carragan's, ring-out like an entire cathedral's worth of bells ; this is truly impressive, and in keeping with the sense of exultant exaltation Bruckner seems to have been building to all along. But, in several instances in which the number of bars missing is not so clear as elsewhere in Bruckner's manuscript, William Carragan assumes considerably wider gaps than do other scholars and completers of this work, which means that his completion contains more music wholly written by someone other than Bruckner than does any other. This would not necessarily be a problem did it not seem so clear (to my ears, at least) , in most cases, where Bruckner's hand rises from the score and William Carragan's descends ; the entire movement ends-up sounding patchy, episodic, less than the sum of its parts.

All of this is, of course, ultimately a matter of personal taste. For what it's worth, I never have such a reaction when listening to the 2008 edition of the Finale completion by Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, John Alan Phillips, and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, which sounds to me consistently like Bruckner from beginning to end. In February 2012, Simon Rattle will conduct the Berlin Philharmonic in the 2011 edition of the SMPC completion, in Berlin and New York. I hope that version is recorded as well.

Nonetheless, William Carragan's completion will probably never be better or more sympathetically performed than it is here, and I have never heard a better articulation of the Finale's difficult fugue. Consider William Carragan's Finale a bonus - those who recoil at a completion by any hand other than Bruckner's can, after all, stop their CD players after the 9th's Adagio and still be more than satisfied by and with this entire set : some of the finest orchestral recordings ever made of some of the finest performances ever played of 3 of the most important works of the standard repertoire.

20 August 2015 (8:00 pm) : « Sala Terrena » , Saint-Florian monastery, near Linz.

Anton Bruckner : Symphony No. 9 (with Finale completed by William Carragan) , arrangement for 2 pianos, 4 hands, by Karl Grunsky and Professor William Carragan with Till Alexander Körber and Reinhold Puri-Jobi, as soloists.

Something of the composer's extraordinary conception for this Finale had been brought to life by a spectacular performance on 2 pianos (4 hands) by Till Alexander Körber and Reinhold Puri-Jobi, the previous evening. This was a real triumph. The players gave a performance of the 1st 3 movements as transcribed by Karl Grunsky and, after the interval, Professor William Carragan gave a short introduction outlining the 3 principles of the completer's work : 1stly, to use all the latest surviving sources in the form in which they exist ; 2ndly, to fill the gaps and fill-out the texture appropriately ; and, 3rdly, to use such other information as is available. The 3 principles are in order of importance. Then, we heard the Finale as completed by Professor Carragan and transcribed for 2 pianos.

The pianists displayed extraordinary skill of ensemble, and of re-creation of orchestral sound. The opening tremolo (a frequent feature of Bruckner Symphonies that usually sounds too loud, too lumpy, and totally lacking in atmospheric magic when performed on pianos) was miraculously recreated, misty and distant and the perfect background for the rising horn theme. The piano cannot create the full-range of orchestral dynamics, but the pianists used every resource of energy and attack to bring the great climaxes to life. The rhythm of the inner-parts registers more strongly when presented on the piano, and this was especially true of the « Gesangsperiode » in the 1st movement, which thereby gained a glittering texture and forward moving lilt that was utterly beguiling. Indeed, the awareness of continuing rhythmic activity that is not quite so apparent from full-orchestra gave to the whole 1st movement an underlying unifying pulse.

The Finale benefitted similarly : the animated and restless toccata-like music was full of rhythmic vitality, and the very limitations of the piano transcription maybe helped to ensure that the Finale sounded entirely of a piece with previous 3 movements. Sustained notes, especially in the Adagio, were often achieved by repeated notes which also create rhythmic activity not delivered by the orchestral version, so the whole Symphony seemed to be wonderfully transported within a rolling, rarely interrupted rhythmic overlay.

The Scherzo was predictably percussive, and had plenty of bounce to it, though one missed something of the sustained woodwind in the opening pages, and the Trio was the only passage where I thought, perhaps, the pianists could have managed something a little more delicate, primarily in the repeated staccato quavers - but, nevertheless, the whole movement was gripping and suitably ominous.

The Adagio, which one might have thought would suffer most from the absence of sustained strings, was in the event deeply moving. The quieter passages had an affecting meditative quality, deriving from and strongly communicated by the concentration and sensitivity of the performers. The climax was very effectively paced, Karl Grunsky's transcription miraculous, and the wind-down leading to closing pages of peaceful beauty, the long held chord on brass in effect replaced by 4 pianissimo chords.

Maybe, it was the benefit of Professor Carragan's introduction which included a brief formal summary and, perhaps, it was an added benefit of hearing the piano transcription, or of the communicative power of the pianists, but never before has the formal clarity of the Finale been displayed to me with such focus and coherence. The double-dotted rhythms, that have obsessive pervasiveness in this movement, are well-presented by the percussive quality of the piano. Of course, you miss the trumpet shining-out atop of the chorale but, even so, it sounded good and strong. The complexities of the development somehow seemed to make complete sense, and the fugue gained a Beethovenian muscularity. The 2 great waves of Carragan's Coda attained considerable dramatic power, the Symphony sounded complete, its finish positive and triumphant. The audience responded with a standing ovation for the completer and the superlative performers !

21 August 2015 (8:00 pm) : Rémy Ballot conducts the Altomonte Orchestra in Bruckner's 9th Symphony at the Basilica of Saint-Florian monastery, near Linz.

The very heart of the celebration of Bruckner's music is today to be found at Saint-Florian, a vast Baroque monastery in Upper-Austria. This is entirely appropriate for it was Bruckner's favourite place, where he was brought-up by the monks as a teenager and where he could find refuge throughout his life from the vicissitudes of his situation as a socially ill-equipped composer, organist and teacher in Vienna. That heritage is now centred upon the « Bruckner Tage » (Bruckner Days) , a week-long Festival that, from small and inconspicuous beginnings, has flowered into a major event in the musical calendar, characterized by the adventurous and broad appeal of its programme, which focuses each year upon I Symphony, and where you will always hear a full orchestral performance, but will also have an opportunity to hear other approaches to the work, from piano transcriptions to jazz improvisations.

In recent years, the reputation of the Festival has been much enhanced by the work of Rémy Ballot whose recorded performances of Symphonies Nos. 3 and 8 have been received with great acclaim. They are characterized by a combination of very slow tempi and incandescent visionary power. For these reasons and others, expectations were very high for his performance of Bruckner's 9th Symphony in this year's Festival. The burden on the conductor of these expectations must be daunting. In the rehearsals, one sensed an interpretation of immense power emerging ; in the concert itself, this conception was not unceasingly available to the audience.

As with many ecclesiastical buildings, the acoustic is blessed and cursed with extreme reverberation, sounds ricocheting in all directions for several seconds. Slow tempi where the harmonic rhythm is active are essential, but not always enough to ensure coherence. In post-concert discussions, it became obvious that we had all been to different concerts depending primarily upon where, in the basilica, one found oneself seated. From my vantage point, I heard a performance of cataclysmic power, a Symphony reported to be dedicated to « the Dear God » here seemed to confront the Universe itself. The opening was especially powerful. The Symphony launched after a long preparatory silence, the opening horn theme rising nobly heavenward but already ominous and filled with dread. Come the vast unison octave drop of the 1st theme group climax, and its implacable final cadence, the extraordinary and courageous scale of the conductor's and Orchestra's aspirations were revealed.

Always in his opening and closing movements, Bruckner presents 3 theme groups, the 2nd of which is a lyrical section Bruckner called « Gesangsperiode » (Song section) which will often call for a slower tempo than the more dramatic music of the 1st and 3rd themes between which it is sandwiched. Already at a slow tempo, Mæstro Ballot nevertheless kept this tempo relationship, so that the « Gesangsperiode » at 1st seemed shockingly slow. But the glorious intensity of the playing of the Altomonte Orchestra became increasingly passionate and the structure of the exposition maintained its proportions. In the course of what Bruckner regarded as the 2nd part of the movement, primarily an elaborated re-statement, it was as though some overwhelming volcanic turbulence was with slow and inexorable power forcing its way through the crevices of a wasted landscape - only the even more passionate recapitulation of the « Gesangsperiode » offering succour to the human spirit. The idiosyncrasies of the acoustic forced shimmering, glinting and blazing orchestral sound unpredictably to the forefront, the high-strings suddenly emerging, all the climaxes delivered with indomitable strength.

Somehow, in this cavernous acoustic, the Scherzo must be made to bite, and the musicians were more effective in this in the « da capo » than in the 1st statement but, even so, it was, as a colleague put it, « as though the gates of hell had opened » and the frenetic trumpet fanfares of the closing bars embellished the full horror of it all. The Trio was able to be played somewhat faster because the harmony remains static, but I didn't quite feel that this new tempo had an organic relationship with that of the Scherzo sections.

The Adagio, that in rehearsal had hung together well, seemed on the night to have been extended to the point of fracture. Continuity through the long pauses was not guaranteed. Nevertheless, it was a performance of great beauty, the playing of the strings in their opening gesture, presented with a wonderfully clean rising 9th. In the lyrical 2nd subject, after the heartfelt descending chorale that Bruckner described as his « farewell to life », the string playing was especially moving. Progress did not come over as unremittingly purposeful but, nevertheless, the lyrical theme that had been so sweetly played was eventually transformed into an ominous and increasingly discordant rising sequence, and the shattering dissonance that crowns the movement, pulsated, screeched and thundered through the vast spaces of the vast church. The rhythmic pulse of the of winding down seemed a little uneven : maybe, it was necessary to shy away from requiring the long held E major chord on the brass to be extended beyond the capability of mere humans. It had been a performance to challenge the mere human capability of the audience, especially those sat on hard pews in the reverberant nightmare of the central nave. Even for those of us more kindly accommodated, the performance was a sobering experience, an uncompromising glimpse into the inhospitable world of a composer already very ill and haunted by the prospect of a death that would deny him the opportunity of finishing the work with the D major « Song of praise » and « Hallelujah » his religious faith may have granted.

Nicola Samale et Giuseppe Mazzuca (1983-1987)

Les musicologues italiens Nicola Samale et Giuseppe Mazzuca ont ensemble travaillé au Finale, de 1983 à 1985. Cette tentative de complétion a été enregistrée en 1986 par Eliahu Inbal, sur étiquette « Denon » . Les auteurs ont ensuite renié cette version, dont la Coda ressemble plus à celle du Finale de la 8e Symphonie que celle qu'ils ont ultérieurement réalisée lorsqu'ils se sont associés à messieurs John Alan Phillips et Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

The « SPCM » Finale

(Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs ; translated by colleague John Alan Phillips.)

To this day, Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony languishes in a purgatory of misunderstanding, false interpretation, appropriation, even barbaric mishandling, having long fallen « prey to taste » (Adorno) . Bruckner had scarcely taken his last breath when souvenir hunters swooped down on the manuscripts lying around the room where he died, which was only secured some time later. The executors of his Estate entrusted Bruckner's pupil Josef Schalk to inquire into the correlation of the remaining 75 score bi-folios for the Finale of the 9th. Josef died on 7th November 1900 without having undertaken the task. His brother Franz quietly took the manuscripts into his keeping, manuscripts which, according to Bruckner's Testament, should have belonged to the Court Library (today, the Austrian National Library) .

During rehearsals for the 1st performance in Vienna, on 11 February 1903, the conductor Ferdinand Löwe balked at the 9th's radical nature, completely re-orchestrating the 1st 3 movements ; still unresearched, the material for the Finale was dismissed. Löwe, « out of piety for the Master's wishes » , as he claimed, included in this performance the « Te Deum » , but he had not considered the stylistic discrepancy between his altered arrangement and the « Te Deum » , which was left in its original form. The « Te Deum » was excluded from his 1st edition, although Bruckner probably intended it to be published with the Symphony. Löwe even published his own arrangement without comment as Bruckner's authentic score. The editor's conviction, cited in his Foreword, that the 3 completed movements constituted, in themselves, a performable, closed unit, ultimately became dogma, for the distorted 1st editions maintained their validity on the concert podium for decades ; in the process, such opinions hardened into concrete.

It slowly became common knowledge among Bruckner scholars that « something wasn't right » about the 1st editions. In 1929, the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») was begun for just this reason, in 1934, publishing the original score of the 9th, edited by Alfred Orel, together with a study volume which, for the 1st time, contained transcriptions of many of the Finale manuscripts. But Orel omitted several sources, scattered as they were to the 4 winds ; his presentation was unclear and full of mistakes. Apart from that, his edition of the score, like Leopold Nowak's 1951 reprint of it, comprised only the 1st 3 movements. The « Te Deum » was 1st published, separately, in the « Complete Edition » , in 1961, without any reference as to its intended function with regard to the 9th, although Universal-Edition had published a study score of the 9th together with the « Te Deum » sometime prior to 1920, and thus to some extent realized Bruckner's intentions.

Proper critical discussion of Orel's edition never came about. Nonetheless, attempts to complete the Finale were repeatedly based on this defective source. Some were never published or later withdrawn ; other scores were occasionally performed or even published, but have not established themselves, and justifiably so : none of their authors ever published a detailed account of their activities, an absolute necessity in a critical case such as this. Apart from that, all these scores reveal egregious errors in their methodologies and astonishing carelessness in their handling of Bruckner's manuscript texts. On the one hand, the arrangers dispensed with significant original passages ; on the other, a high proportion of « free Brucknerian » writing can always be found. One arranger, for example, filled a demonstrably 16 measure long gap in the score, with no less than 100 measures of his own composition !

New steps in the resolution of this problem were 1st undertaken in 1985, as Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca published their « Ricostruzione » , the 1st soundly based and properly documented performing version of the Finale. This pioneering achievement provided impetus for long overdue research on all the manuscript sources for the 9th, which the director of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , Leopold Nowak, was no longer able to undertake. Shortly before his death, in 1991, he entrusted the task to the Australian musicologist and composer John Alan Phillips. This extensive project on the 9th comprises 10 volumes. Phillips painstakingly ordered and systematised the scattered manuscripts. His detailed investigations of paper and hand-writing resolved many details of the Finale's genesis. Moreover, Phillips was thoroughly acquainted with the theoretical systems on which Bruckner founded his compositional technique. The definitive performing version of the Finale, published in 1991 by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca, owes its validity primarily to his insights.

The composition of the Finale was not significantly different from that of Bruckner's earlier works. Bruckner had his music paper prepared for him by his secretary Anton Meißner, who wrote the names of the instruments, the clefs and key signatures, and ruled the barlines. Most of the bi-folios of the Finale score, therefore, have 4 measures per page, a fact which becomes significant for the reconstruction. Bruckner initially formulated his musical material in sketches and particello drafts, then notated the strings and main wind entries in score using the prepared bi-folios which he numbered and laid one after another, rather than interleaving them. He carefully regulated the period structure of the music as he went along by placing his so-called metrical numbers beneath each measure. The woodwind and brass parts were then systematically scored-out. Bruckner thus refined his conception of the music during its orchestration, at times discarding bi-folios and replacing them with new ones. In a final work phase, he would have gone through the composition again and added all the necessary performance directives (phrasing, articulation, dynamics, etc.) .

The Finale is hence no collection of disjointed sketches, as uninformed authors continue to claim, but the remains of a score left in the second-to-last phase of its completion. The composition, in all considerably longer than 600 measures, originally extended significantly further than what survives today, and was apparently largely complete by the summer of 1896. Although some of the later, definitive bi-folios have been lost, the continuity of approximately 560 measures, up to the end of the recapitulation of the chorale, can readily be demonstrated. The instrumentation of the circa 220 measure exposition was probably complete ; many bi-folios carry Bruckner's remark « finished » . In the 2nd half, the lost bi-folios 15, 20, 25, 28 and 31 constitute gaps in the score, the contents of which can largely be reconstructed from the foregoing sketches.

Furthermore, sketches have been found to the Coda, long believed lost - a crescendo passage of around 24 measures based on the opening motive and a brief ascending chorale phrase, as well as, most significantly, the movement's concluding 24 measure cadence. Finally, we know from the memoirs of Bruckner's last doctor, Richard Heller, that the Symphony was intended to conclude with a « song of praise » in D major, which Bruckner even played to him on the piano. In other words, although the final double barline cannot be found in the material which survives today, we still have a clear impression of the Finale as a whole. For only very few measures has no music whatsoever of Bruckner's survived.

The complex methods used in the reconstruction can hardly be adequately outlined here, but have been publicised elsewhere in appropriate scholarly fashion. Clues to the contents of the gaps are supplied by an analysis of the surrounding measures as well as, by a knowledge of Bruckner's rigorous compositional methodology, full understanding of which has to this day been overlooked by most musicologists. Precisely, this approach makes possible what would probably be a futile undertaking in the case of any other composer, namely, a comprehensive representation of the Finale as a completed whole, although necessarily speculative in regard to certain details. The minor gaps in this web could be filled from the surviving sketches and preliminary materials with astonishingly few question marks, the missing material « synthesized » from known material through the use of Bruckner's own compositional techniques. It is thus unjustified to speak of any kind of free, imitative composition having been undertaken.

Bruckner achieved a form in the Finale which took Sonata structure as a starting-point, but which, in its great daring and originality, brings the motivic developments of the 1st 3 movements to a conclusion ; the movement is thus indispensable to an understanding of the whole Symphony. The principal theme, with its powerful strides, defies all possibility of development by virtue of its repetitive structure. At the same time, it encompasses the entire spectrum of the chromatic scale and so claims for itself an all-embracing status. The 2nd theme, invariably called the « Gesangsperiode » (Song period) by Bruckner, is derived directly from the principal theme, a feature unique to this movement. The usually lush cantabile quality of the 2nd subject was here renounced by Bruckner, in favour of an intentionally barren « negative image » of the principal theme. All the more unforgettable is the impact of the 3rd theme, a resplendent resurrection of the choral theme of the Adagio, referred to by Bruckner as his « farewell to life », accompanied by the flames of its violin figuration. But, for now, this vision dies away ; the movement is not yet over. The well-known opening figure from the « Te Deum » appears hesitantly in the flute. Considerable stretches of the development section use this motive - a formal indication that it was probably intended to play a central role in the Coda as well. Then, in place of a true recapitulation, a daring fugue ensues based on elements of the principal theme. A further innovation is the emergence of an « epilogue theme », which is derived from the triplets of the principal theme of the whole Symphony. The 2nd group is richer in the recapitulation, towards the end introducing an allusion to the Easter hymn « Christ ist erstanden ». Following the recapitulation of the chorale, now combined in powerful symbolism with the string figuration of the « Te Deum », Bruckner returns to his epilogue theme. It would probably have led into a re-statement of the principal theme of the 1st movement which, as in the Finale of the 8th, would have completed the circle.

Following the crescendo passage sketched by Bruckner, at the outset of the Coda, the arrangers realized an overlay of the principal themes of each of the 4 movements as the 1st climax of the Coda, which certain early Bruckner scholars claim to have seen in a sketch since lost ; here, it constitutes a logical point of arrival. This is succeeded by the chorale theme in 8 measures (derived from Bruckner's harmonisation of the chorale by the strings during the recapitulation of the 2nd group) and an 8 measure realisation of Bruckner's ascending chorale passage. The realisation of the sketch for the cadence corresponds with the climax of the Adagio and the Coda of the 1st movement. This is followed immediately by Bruckner's concluding pedal-point. Above this, the arrangers realized a « song of praise », a concluding crescendo passage of 37 measures, corresponding precisely to the length of the final structural units of each of the 1st 3 movements and drawing on various clues from the « Te Deum », as well as from the Symphonic chorus « Helgoland » (1893) .

That Bruckner's own vision of this final glory died with him is undeniable. Every performing version, by foreign hands, is and remains provisional, a « work in progress », and it is, by no means, impossible that previously lost material for the Finale may come to light. But such a contingency solution as this, carefully and lovingly crafted, can still be regarded as preferable to giving-up this daring final movement as entirely lost. That so much of it has survived, given the transmission of the sources, is a minor miracle in itself.

The Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazucca score was 1st performed on 3rd December 1991 in Linz, Austria, and published in the same year. The sources for the entire 9th have been appearing successively in new publications in the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , since 1994. Since then, interest in this score has steadily increased. On the other hand, the music world, invoking a misunderstood notion of « Werktreue » (fidelity to the printed page) often refuses to acknowledge the wishes of a composer, not to speak of the recent findings of serious source scholarship. This, by no means, applies only to Bruckner : in general, dogmatic and, at the same time, uninformed adherents of the dubious notion that only a composer's final score has any validity enjoy rejecting completions of fragmentary works. Here, as the conductor and musicologist Peter Gülke once fittingly put it :

Bruckner himself expressly wished the 9th to conclude with the « Te Deum » as the « best substitute » , should he not complete the instrumental final movement ; a pronouncement for which we should actually be grateful, for what composer near death thinks to take such precautionary measures ? For this reason alone, there should be no question that a 3 movement performance of the 9th, in no way, corresponds to Bruckner's conception. To act retrospectively as if Bruckner needed to be spoken for, or to overrule his wishes, is not only to adopt a superior attitude, but is moreover an act of profound disrespect toward the composer and his musical legacy. Even in its surviving fragmentary state, the Finale is 1st and foremost Bruckner's own music (whether one welcomes or regrets the radicalism of its form and content) and represented for him an indispensable component of his last, 4 movement Symphony.

(# as entirely lost. That so much of it has survived, given the transmission of the sources, is a minor miracle in itself.)

Samale, Phillips, Cohrs et Mazzuca (« SPCM » 1992 et révisions : 1996, 2005, 2008, 2012)

Cette tentative de complétion est basée sur l'intention initiale de Bruckner d'y combiner les thèmes des 4 mouvements. Cette complétion (1992) a été enregistrée par Johannes Wildner, chez « Naxos » , et par Kurt Eichhorn à la tête de l'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz, sur étiquette japonaise « Camerata » .

La version révisée de 2005 inclut une esquisse supplémentaire de la fugue qui a été retrouvée dans l'intervalle. Cette nouvelle version (665 mesures dont 569 de Bruckner lui-même) a été enregistrée par Marcus Bosch, chez « Coviello Classics » . Une édition révisée de cette version a été exécutée par l'Orchestre symphonique de la radio suédoise sous la baguette de Daniel Harding à Stockholm, en novembre 2007.

La révision suivante de 2008 a été exécutée par Friedemann Layer à la tête de la « Musikalische Akademie des Nationaltheater-Orchesters Mannheim » .

La révision finale, éditée en 2012 (Conclusive Revised Edition 2012) , qui inclut entre autres une nouvelle conception de la Coda, a été enregistrée en concert par Simon Rattle avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, pour « EMI Classics » (2012) .

Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips, and Cohrs : the 1985 edition

Finale only with Symphony No. 5, Eliahu Inbal, Frankfurt Radio Symphony, « Teldec » 8.35785 (242 426-2) (2 CDs) .

Symphony No. 5, Total Time : 65:03 ; Finale : 20:44 (out of print) .

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca were still feeling their way in this, the 1st Edition of their long project of reconstruction. Some of the new linking passages are awkward and timid, not built fully or boldly enough to sound like much more than flimsy scaffolding connecting large blocks of ruins. The quotations from the earlier movements, and the very few from earlier Symphonies, sound perfunctory. All of which makes this 1st, rudimentary stage of this series of completions, in combination with Eliahu Inbal's brisk pace, sound less like a completion than a condensation. Still, Inbal is never less than deftly musical, with a cantabile feel very like that heard throughout his Mahler cycle but seldom heard in Bruckner, let alone any other completion of the Finale. The Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra sounds lovely in the spacious acoustic of Frankfurt's « Alte Oper ». For some reason, « Teldec » paired the Finale with Inbal's recording of Bruckner's Symphony 5. Inbal's recording with the Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra of the 1st 3 movements of Symphony 9, once available separately, is also out of print.

Kurt Eichhorn, Bruckner Orchester Linz, « Camerata Classic » 30CM-275-6 (2 CDs) . Total Time : 92:47 ; Finale : 30:11.

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca were joined by composer-scholars John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs to create this edition in which the Coda has been completely reworked, and now includes themes from Bruckner's 7th Symphony and the « Te Deum » . The result sounds like Bruckner almost all the way through, though parts of the new Coda still sound like boiler-plate musical rhetoric, however Brucknerian. (Those who have heard the Coda of Bruckner's original version of the 1st movement of his Symphony No. 8 will know what I mean.) This is partly the fault of the conductor, the late Kurt Eichhorn (1908-1994) , a Bruckner specialist of the craggy Hans Knappertsbusch school : i.e. , deep feeling married to a great sense of a work's overall structure and arc, but considerable disregard for polish and tight ensemble work. Though Eichhorn is unfailingly musical, his very slow pace, although never too slow , at times, simply loses momentum, most tellingly in some of the new transitional passages. But there are glorious moments here : the « sunrise » fanfare and its reprise get a more richly sumptuous treatment than in any other recording. The horn section alone seems to number dozens, all playing instruments of solid gold.

Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips, and Cohrs : the 1996 edition

Johannes Wildner, New Philharmonia Orchestra of Westphalia, « Naxos » 8.555933-34 (2 CDs) . Total Time : 82:47 ; Finale : 23:28.

Now incorporating themes from the 8th Symphony, as well, this is the 1st Edition of the Samale-Mazzuca-Phillips-Cohrs Finale that sounds entirely like Bruckner from beginning to end, with many of the new linking passages subtly revised to be brought more fully within the composer's idiom. Wildner's hand on the orchestral tiller is very sure, the Orchestra is disciplined, the sound very natural. Wildner has great control of orchestral ensemble and dynamics. Don't let the brevity of this capsule review dissuade you : this is a great 1st choice of completed version, following a full digestion of Harnoncourt's presentation of the fragments alone.

Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips, and Cohrs : the 2005 edition

Marcus Bosch, « Sinfonieorchester Aachen » , « Coviello Classics » COV 30711 (SACD / CD) . Total Time : 69:54 ; Finale : 20:19.

The Samale-Mazzuca-Phillips-Cohrs completion is further improved, especially in the Coda, as well as by the inspired insertion of a horn descant over the 1st, piano re-appearance of the chorale following the fugue and « sunrise » fanfare. The further development and « stacking » of themes from the 1st 3 movements just before the Coda proper has also been refined, each theme now more clearly voiced. However, while Marcus Bosch makes his brisk pace work well in the Finale, I found his tempos in the 1st 3 movements simply too fast for the music to register in any way that could be actually felt. And while the high-resolution sound is rich and lush, the acoustic of the sizable sanctuary in which this concert performance was too distantly miked, in combination with tempos too fast for the space as well as the music, result in a muddy, swimmy sound in which entire choirs of trombones or Wagner tubas are buried, virtually unheard under mounting layers of reverberation. Bosch is now more than halfway through a complete Bruckner cycle but, on the evidence of this recording, seems to have oddly little feel for or sympathy with the composer's music.

Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips, and Cohrs : the 2008 edition

Friedemann Layer, « Musikalische Akademie des Nationaltheater-Orchesters Mannheim » , « eingetragener Verein Deutschlandradio Kultur » (2 CDs) . Total Time : 83:24 ; Finale : 25:29 (available from www.abruckner.com) .

What lifts this most recent edition of the Samale-Mazzuca-Phillips-Cohrs completion into another league entirely from earlier editions and all other completions is the addition of a final restatement of the chorale, followed by an extended development in the brass of the leaping theme from the Finale's 1st few bars, and a considerably expanded final peroration, again in the full brass. And, in the recapitulation just before the Coda proper, Layer's combination of dynamic balance and slow tempo brings to the fore the quotation of a theme from the 8th Symphony (a chromatically descending 4 note passage for solo oboe, repeated in various modulations) in a way that balances the mounting excitement of the pre-figuring of the Coda to come with the certainty of its fulfillment. Here, for the 1st time, Bruckner's aural edifice sounds fully constructed as he might have intended, all scaffolding removed, and on a scale in proportion with the rest of this astonishing work. Also, for the 1st time, I can imagine someone familiar with all of Bruckner's other Symphonies except the 9th hearing this set, listening to all 4 movements, and never once thinking that Bruckner didn't actually write every note.

Conductor Friedemann Layer is fully up to the task, even if the Mannheim Orchestra is a bit rough in spots. His articulation of the fugue is terrific - the stretto is crystal clear. Here, apparently, Layer gave the violins detailed bowing instructions that bring-out references to the leaping theme from the movement's 1st bars ; hitherto this has seemed little more than a supporting figure, but it now sounds as important as the fugue's main subject, and adds another dimension to a fugue already overwhelming in its complexity.

In short, this recording, the most recent of any completion of the Finale, is also the most satisfying by far. It is the only completion with which, after listening to it, I have not found myself looking forward to the next edition's incremental improvements.

Bruckner's 9th Symphony may never be finished - indeed, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has just informed me that he and his colleagues are considering a new revision of the Coda. But here, in the 4 movements presented in Layer's recording, it sounds at last complete.

Preface to the conclusive revised edition of 2012

« Just a simple remark : if you don't approve of performing versions of composer's unfinished sketches, no one is holding your hand to the fire forcing you to listen. In the meantime, those of us with intellectual curiosity, although we know such things as this and other performing versions can never really exist as the composer would have completed them, would still rather hear the sketches in some way rather than having them remain mute in archive drawers. Again, no one is forcing you to listen. »

In 1983, Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca initiated the arduous task of completing the final movement of Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony in D minor, originally almost complete in its conception, but nowadays partially lost. A 1st phase, finished in 1985, was published by Ricordi and, subsequently, recorded for CD with Eliahu Inbal (on « Teldec ») and Gennadij Roshdestvenskij (on « Melodiya ») conducting. Giuseppe Mazzuca, after the 1985 Ricordi publication, showed no further interest in work on the Finale. At about the same time, Nicola Samale started a collaboration with Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and developed with him further phases of the score, recorded, among others, under Hubert Soudant for the Netherlands Broadcasting Company NCRV (Cornelis van Zwol, producer) and recorded live under Nicola Samale himself, released on CD by « Melodram » , in Italy. The latter already included important new features : apart from massive changes in instrumentation, also for the 1st time the realization of a final « Hallelujah » in D major. In 1990, Nicola Samale also started to collaborate with the Australian scholar John Alan Phillips, who re-checked the philological findings by Samale, Mazzuca, and Cohrs, and correlated them with his own research on the manuscripts. He later published his findings in his thesis (University of Adelaide, 2002) as well as in some volumes within the Bruckner Complete Edition. Of particular interest is his Fac-simile Edition of all Surviving Musical Autographs (FE) , which appeared in 1996 in the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna, making available all that survived from Bruckner's own hand for this movement for the very 1st time to a large public. It serves as an indispensable reference source for the Conclusive Revised Edition (CRE) . John Alan Phillips also edited the next phase of the score, which appeared as a self-publication, in 1992, in Adelaide and Bremen. It comprised the earlier results from 1983 until 1989, enriched with further new findings, later becoming known as the performing version by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca, or « SPCM » version (PV, 1992) .

almost 40 performances in 9 countries, by 17 Orchestras under 14 conductors, including a Studio CD Production (« Bruckner Orchester Linz » , Kurt Eichhorn on « Camerata » Label of Tokyo) , a Live CD Recording (« Neue Philharmonie Westfalen » , Johannes Wildner on « SonArte » & « Naxos » Labels) , a Studio Radio Production (« BBC ») and 3 Live Radio Recordings (Netherlands Broadcasting Company, Hilversum ; Deutschland Radio, Cologne ; « Bayerischer Rundfunk » , Munich) between 1991 and 2003. The Completed Performing Version gained additional support from the Documentation of the Finale Fragment (DFF) , edited by John Alan Phillips, 1st performed by the « Wiener Symphoniker » under Nikolaus Harnoncourt (Vienna, 1999) , and repeated by the same conductor with the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , performed in Salzburg, in 2002, and later issued on CD by « RCA / BMG Classics » . This production also contained, for the 1st time, the « Critical New Edition » of the 1st 3 movements, edited by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs for the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») .

However, both Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs have had the opportunity to conduct the 9th Symphony and the Finale, on various occasions since 1985 ; each performance brought new insights. Finally, in 2003, they became convinced that a revision of the entire score should be the next step, and Nicola Samale, as the initiator of this project, decided to prepare a new edition together with Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. This was published 2005 as Study Score 444 of the Repertoire Explorer series at « Musikproduktion Höfflich » , Munich. Unfortunately, some subsequent performances as well as new manuscript research undertaken by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in preparation of his dissertation (University of Hamburg, 2009) , brought further new insights, requiring various corrections and revisions, to be included in a revised reprint (published in 2008) . In this shape, the Finale received its premiere in Stockholm (8 and 9 November 2007) by the Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra under Daniel Harding.

Nevertheless, further insights led to a long and fruitful discussion between Nicola Samale, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and John Alan Phillips. The motivation to prepare a Conclusive Revised Edition we owe to Simon Rattle who decided to perform and record the 9th Symphony, including the performing version with the Berlin Philharmonic, and who charmingly wrote to the editors :

« I must say, at once, what a stunningly impressive piece of work you have done. I have been looking at the sketches in a very on and off fashion for some years, and heard another nameless reconstruction that almost put me off for life. It is undeniably very strange music, but what you have done has a ring of truth, and it is an extraordinary experience. I have programmed the complete Symphony with the Berlin Phil, in February 2012, also touring to New York. I feel increasingly convinced by your plastic surgery, and feel that it should be more widely heard and understood. This from a man who has abandoned the Mozart “ Requiem ” ! Congratulations again on your astonishing journey. »

In fact, already, the 1st 2 performances of the score under Friedemann Layer (with « Het Brabants Orkest » , Eindhoven and Breda, Netherlands, 15 and 16 October 2011) but, in particular, the performances of Rattle (with the German National Youth Orchestra in the Berlin « Philharmonie » , on 23 October 2011, and the Berlin Philharmonic in Berlin, « Philharmonie » , 7 to 9 February 2012, and New York, Carnegie Hall, 24 February 2012) as well as the recording (« EMI » 9 52969 2, May 2012) brought a fresh and widespread public attention. The more the authors felt obliged to publish then a score which should by all means be considered as their Conclusive Revised Edition (unless hitherto unknown, lost score bi-folios might turn-up in future) .

Such a protracted process of development and publication of a score may appear as being confusing to outsiders, however, it is not without precedent in History of Editions. An example taken from literature may serve as an illustration here. The scholar Stefan Schenk-Haupt demonstrated in his comprehensive study on A. Pope and T. S. Eliot (« Dulness Never Dies » , « Europäische Hochschulschriften » No. 399, Peter Lang, Frankfurt, 2003) that « The Dunciad » by Alexander Pope - a book holding a key position in the 18th Century - should not only be understood as work in progress, being developed between 1728 and 1743 (i.e. , circa 15 years) and, in at least 4 working phases, but also has been published during this time in 15 editions corrected or authorized by Pope himself as well as in 3 further pirate editions, in all, 18 editions and 59 further reprints, and many of them being available simultaneously on the market. Similarly, the CRE of the Finale represents a work in progress, which could be considered to be finished only under the condition that all lost score bi-folios had come back to light - apart from the fact that a final evaluation of details was rendered impossible by Bruckner's death anyway.

A collaboration of various authors and editors of much different talent and personality may demand much more time to come to conclusive results, including many errors, and new attempts, but it has certainly one advantage opposed to the work of a single author : already at the process of gestation, the collaboration creates a kind of peer reviewing, of mutual control of the results.

2 equally important approaches are needed to make this music performable : a) the sonic realisation of the surviving manuscripts themselves, as in the DFF edited by John Alan Phillips, suitable for workshop concerts, concert introductions or media presentation ; as well as : b) the completed performing version which would allow, at least, an approximate impression of the 9th Symphony as a 4 movement unity. While the DFF allows one to compare the surviving material with its completions in aural experience, listeners want to hear music in a concert, not philology. For this reason, one cannot understand the motivation to conflate these 2 approaches. Philological questions should certainly be addressed in scholarly debate, but what is the point of producing a score which would necessarily still include speculative reconstructions of lost portions, while not making any use of the substantial sketch material that survives for the Coda ? Apart from ignoring an audience which does not consist mainly of scholars, this approach could only replace the old legend of a 3 movement 9th as being sufficiently vollendet by a new myth of an Unfinished - this time with an even more clearly audible break.

Other fragments should have taught us that reality may be totally different from legend anyway : Johann Sebastian Bach's « Kunst der Fuge » , for instance, did not only survive in a complete, initial version (Christoph Wolff, Edition ; Peters 1986) much too rarely considered by performers - according to modern research, the famous, incomplete Quadruple Fugue was finished long before the composer's death, its conclusion being lost on its way to the engraver, who finally decided himself to fill-up the space reserved for the missing final section with other, fitting music of Bach. (In 2007, Ton Koopman even assumed that Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach did not include the ending of this fugue, in order to maintain the fragmentary character of the work !) The performing version of Contrapunctus XIV by David Schulenberg (1992, the only one based on philological research so far) has even been included in the « Bärenreiter Urtext » Edition (Klaus Hofmann, Edition, Kassel 1998) , but performers almost never dare to play such brave attempts at a completion, and people still prefer the abrupt stop - not to mention the fact that, as Butler pointed-out, the Quadruple Fugue was possibly not even the final piece of the cycle ; more likely, Bach intended to place the 4 canons at the end.

Some of the changes presented in this score are the result of new philological research and insight. Others merely represent variants and not necessarily improvements but, based on now, almost 30 years of experience in examining, discussing, editing and performing this music. This also comprises the new elaboration of what were hitherto believed to be gaps within the 2nd Theme of the Exposition and within the Fugue (now, fully established from the original sketches) as well as many refinements of instrumentation, phrasing, articulation, dynamics and tempi. Particularly in the Coda, many changes have been undertaken in order to give a more coherent impression of these important final bars. From a fresh re-examination of the manuscripts, it was possible to find some convincing new solutions, binding the music better together.

Philological research undertaken during the last decades had already revealed beyond doubt that Bruckner did not leave a pile of disconnected sketches for the Finale, but actually an emerging autograph score, which was most likely finished, at least in its primary work phase almost half a year before Bruckner's death. The surviving manuscripts constitute material from various working phases, which could be combined to a surprisingly complete extent ; for a very few bars only, no material survived at all. It was possible to cover such gaps not so much by using free composition, but merely a technique of synthesization (similar to reconstruction techniques in forensic medicine and plastic surgery) , in which the musical fabric of lost bars can be regained to a certain extent from deductive analysis, observing the material before and after the gap as well as Bruckner's own, strictly scientific approach of composing, hence to dispense with a free composition in the true sense of the expression.

Details of sources for, and for the gestation of the Finale have been provided by the various volumes which appeared in the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , in particular the FE and Reconstruction of the Autograph Score (RAS) , edited by John Alan Phillips. In order to fully understand the reconstruction procedures of this performing version, reference to these sources is indispensable. It may be also of help to consult the comprehensive « Musik-Konzepte » , Volumes 120-122, on the Finale topic edited by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in 2003 (« Bruckners Neunte im Fegefeuer der Rezeption ; München, 2003 ») ; there, in particular the Introduction into the Surviving Sources of the Finale, prepared by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and John Alan Phillips) and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs' dissertation « Das Finale der IX. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner » (« Wiener Bruckner Studien Nr. 3, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag Wien, 2012 ») , which includes a new Presentation of the Fragment in score.

The layout of the CRE is based on that established by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs in his « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the 9th (see : preface of that score, page XXII) , but was further modified here, for practical reasons. Terminology was used according to the principles given in other volumes of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») (see, in particular : RAS, page XXVff ; FE, page XIXff ; DFF, page XXVIIff) . Further information was provided by John Alan Phillips in his Commentary on the DFF (see there : page 85ff) . Various tables will be given in the CRE, providing information on concordances, bar numbers, page numbers, source material being used, Tempi and formal analysis of the Finale. Due to the relative availability of the PV 1992 (for instance, in some public and University libraries) and its documentation in publications and CD productions, it seemed to be indispensable that the Commentary on the CRE should not only address philological problems and explain the reconstruction and supplementation techniques being used therein, but also refer to the differences and changes, in comparison with the PV 1992. The layout of the discussion of sources in the Commentary itself was mainly adapted from the Critical Report on the 9th Symphony by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (see there : page XVI) . Since the sources for the Finale have been documented extremely well (thanks to the efforts of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » , « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » ; and the Musicological Publishers, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag ») , it seemed to be unnecessary to make the layout more complicated by using different sizes of notes, dotted lines or indications in brackets. The interested user of this score should compare it with the FE and the RAS. In order to avoid too much information, the Commentary does not indicate the numerous additions (such as accents, articulation, phrasing, dynamics) sign by sign or note by note but, on the contrary, those being left by Bruckner himself. Where it seemed appropriate, the notes provided here include extracts from earlier writings of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (« Musik-Konzepte » , CD-Booklets) . Annotations have not been included in this practical edition, except indications of the corresponding bi-folios from the autograph score.

Thanks are due, in the 1st place, to the sponsors and the Gutenberg Foundation, who made possible the typography of the 2005 edition, and to the typesetter Thomas Ohlendorf. Special thanks go to Ken Ward, Editor of « The Bruckner Journal » , and John F. Berky, the webmaster of www.abruckner.com, who both helped immensely with publishing materials and information on this performing version. We also wish to thank all those institutions, Orchestras, conductors, libraries, scholars, and various other enthusiasts, who have supported this work since 1983, with financial, logistical or moral support, publicity, comments and suggestions, or have even made the distribution, performance or recording of the CPV possible. However, in particular, we are indebted to Simon Rattle and the committed players of the Berlin Philharmonic, who brought this score to new life, in 2012. To express our gratitude appropriately, we dedicate this Conclusive Revised Edition to Sir Simon Rattle.

On Performing Practice

When making his score, Bruckner would have had in mind the practice of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , including a String Orchestra of around 14-12-10-8-8. With such a number of Strings, it was common practice to double the Woodwinds. Traditionally, the 2 Violin groups were placed on the left and right side of the rostrum ; the Double Basses, in one row behind the Orchestra ; Celli were sitting left, behind the 1st ; Violas, right behind the 2nd Violins. However, it might be helpful to reverse this and place the Violas left behind the 1st Violins, so that they can reflect their sound directly to the audience instead of to the rear wall. Furthermore, the 2nd Violins feel much more comfortable with Celli behind them. In so doing, the Tenor part, so important in Bruckner's voice leading and design, will be better audible, which contributes significantly to the spaciality of sound. Hence, it might be possible as well to place the Horns to the left, behind the Violas, Trumpets, Trombones ; and Tuba to the right, behind Celli. This would make the sound of the Brass less heavy. Regarding orchestral balance, one should also bear in mind that the Brass instruments, from around 1900, were much smaller, less heavy, but also much more colourful. Steel strings were common only in the 2nd half of the 20th Century ; gut strings are recommended, at least for the upper-Strings. The modern Maplenut Syrup Vibrato was as much uncommon as a permanent sostenuto playing. Nuances and Timbre were achieved by technique and flexible vibrato, and a slight portamento was by no means unwelcome. Common at that time was the natural harmonic intonation with pure 5ths and 3rds, as the bore and intonation of extant original woodwind instruments reveal. More interesting information on Viennese instruments, from around 1900, can be found in « Musikinstrumente und Musizierpraxis zur Zeit Gustav Mahlers, Edition Reinhold Kubik, Böhlau-Verlag, Wien-Köln-Weimar, 2007 » . (ISBN 978-3-2005-77696-3) The French pitch (a = 435) was common in Vienna.

« Just a simple remark - if you don't approve of performing versions of composer's unfinished sketches, no one is holding your hand to the fire forcing you to listen. In the meantime, those of us with intellectual curiosity, although we know such things as this and other performing versions can never really exist as the composer would have completed them, would still rather hear the sketches in some way rather than having them remain mute in archive drawers. Again: no one is forcing you to listen ... »

In 1983, Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca initiated the arduous task of completing the final movement of Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony in D minor, originally almost complete in its conception, but nowadays partially lost. A 1st phase, finished in 1985, was published by Ricordi and subsequently recorded for CD with Eliahu Inbal (on « Teldec ») and Gennadij Roshdestvenskij (on « Melodiya ») conducting. Giuseppe Mazzuca, after the 1985 Ricordi publication, showed no further interest in work on the Finale. At about the same time, Nicola Samale started a collaboration with Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and developed with him further phases of the score, recorded, among others, under Hubert Soudant for the Netherlands Broadcasting Company NCRV (Producer : Cornelis van Zwol) and recorded live under Samale himself, released on CD by « Melodram » , in Italy. The latter already included important new features - apart from massive changes in instrumentation, also for the 1st time, the realization of a final « Hallelujah » in D major. In 1990, Samale also started to collaborate with the Australian scholar John Alan Phillips, who re-checked the philological findings by Samale, Mazzuca, and Cohrs, and correlated them with his own research on the manuscripts. He later published his findings in his thesis (University of Adelaide, 2002) as well as in some volumes within the Bruckner Complete Edition. Of particular interest is his « Fac-simile Edition of all Surviving Musical Autographs » (FE) , which appeared in 1996 in the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna, making available all that survived from Bruckner's own hand for this movement for the very 1st time to a large public. It serves as an indispensable reference source for the Conclusive Revised Edition (CRE) . Phillips also edited the next phase of the score, which appeared as a self-publication, in 1992, in Adelaide and Bremen. It comprised the earlier results, from 1983 until 1989, enriched with further new findings, later becoming known as the performing version by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca, or « SPCM » version (PV, 1992) .

This version, premiered in 1991 by the « Bruckner-Orchester Linz » under Manfred Mayrhofer, was very successful - almost 40 performances in 9 countries, by 17 Orchestras under 14 conductors, including a Studio-CD-Production (« Bruckner Orchester Linz » , Kurt Eichhorn / « Camerata » , Tokyo) , a Live-CD-Recording (« Neue Philharmonie Westphalen » , Johannes Wildner / « SonArte » and « Naxos ») , a Studio-Radio-Production (« BBC ») and 3 Live-Radio-Recordings (Netherlands Broadcasting Company, Hilversum ; « DeutschlandRadio » , Cologne ; « Bayerischer Rundfunk » , Munich) , between 1991 and 2003. The Completed Performing Version gained additional support from the « Documentation of the Finale Fragment » (DFF) , edited by John Alan Phillips, 1st performed by the « Wiener Symphoniker » under Nikolaus Harnoncourt (Vienna, 1999) , and repeated by the same conductor with the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , performed in Salzburg, in 2002, and later issued on CD by RCA/BMG Classics. This production also contained, for the 1st time, the Critical New Edition of the 1st 3 movements, edited by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs for the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») .

However, both Samale and Cohrs have had the opportunity to conduct the 9th and the Finale on various occasions, since 1985 ; each performance brought new insights. Finally, in 2003, they became convinced that a revision of the entire score should be the next step, and Samale, as the initiator of this project, decided to prepare a new edition together with Cohrs. This was published in 2005 as Study Score 444 of the Repertoire Explorer series at « Musikproduktion Höflich » , Munich. Unfortunately, some subsequent performances as well as new manuscript research undertaken by Cohrs in preparation of his dissertation (University of Hamburg, 2009) brought further new insights, requiring various corrections and revisions, to be included in a revised reprint (published in 2008) . In this shape, the Finale received its premiere in Stockholm (8-9 November 2007 ; Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra, Daniel Harding) .

Nevertheless, further insights led to a long and fruitful discussion between Samale, Cohrs and Phillips. The motivation to prepare a « Conclusive Revised Edition » we owe to Sir Simon Rattle who decided to perform and record the 9th including the performing version with the Berlin Philharmonic, and who charmingly wrote to the editors :

« I must say, at once, what a stunningly impressive piece of work you have done. I have been looking at the sketches in a very on and off fashion for some years, and heard another nameless reconstruction (William Carragan ?) that almost put me off for life. It is undeniably very strange music, but what you have done has a ring of truth, and it is an extraordinary experience. I have programmed the complete Symphony with the Berlin Philharmonic in February 2012, also touring to New York. I feel increasingly convinced by your plastic surgery, and feel that it should be more widely heard and understood. This from a man who has abandoned the Mozart " Requiem " ! Congratulations again on your astonishing journey. »

In fact, already the 1st 2 performances of the score under Friedemann Layer (with the « Het Brabants Orkest » , in Eindhoven and Breda, Netherlands, on 15 and 16 October 2011) but, in particular, the performances of Rattle (with the German National Youth Orchestra in the « Berlin Philharmonie » , on 23 October 2011, and the Berlin Philharmonic in the « Berlin Philharmonie » , on 7 to 9 February 2012, and New York, Carnegie Hall, on 24 February 2012) as well as the recording (« EMI », 9 52969 2, May 2012) brought a fresh and widespread public attention. The more the authors felt obliged to publish then a score which should by all means be considered as their « Conclusive Revised Edition » (unless hitherto unknown, lost score bi-folios might turn-up in the future) .

Such a protracted process of development and publication of a score may appear as being confusing to outsiders, however, it is not without precedent in History of Editions. An example taken from literature may serve as an illustration here. The scholar Stefan Schenk-Haupt demonstrated in his comprehensive study on A. Pope and T. S. Eliot (Dulness Never Dies, « Europäische Hochschulschriften 399 », Peter Lang, Frankfurt 2003) that « The Dunciad » by Alexander Pope (a book holding a key position in the 18th Century) should not only be understood as « work in progress », being developed between 1728 and 1743 (i.e. : circa 15 years) , and in at least 4 working phases, but also has been published during this time in 15 editions corrected or authorized by Pope himself as well as in 3 further « pirate editions », in all, 18 editions and 59 further reprints, and many of them being available simultaneously on the market. Similarly, the CRE of the Finale represents a « work in progress », which could be considered to be finished only under the condition that all lost score bi-folios had come back to light - apart from the fact that a « final » evaluation of details was rendered impossible by Bruckner's death anyway.

A collaboration of various authors and editors of much different talent and personality may demand much more time to come to conclusive results, including many errors, and new attempts, but it has certainly one advantage opposed to the work of a single author : already at the process of gestation, the collaboration creates a kind of « peer reviewing », of mutual control of the results. The attempt to prepare a performing version of the Finale is also in some ways similar to making a movie : editorial decisions can be compared to the post-production decisions of the director. For the final cut, his earlier function is complete and instead he now has to put himself in the shoes of the audience. His selection and order of the filmed material determines the structure and also influences the effect of the movie on the audience. Sometimes it may happen that, years after the premiere, film directors decide to prepare a new « director's cut » of a movie, for reasons which are known to everyone who likes movies ; sometimes, new technology makes improvements possible ; sometimes a director restores scenes he had to take-out earlier on the demand of the producers - but, sometimes, he may also simply have come to new insights which would help to make the movie more convincing. (For this, Francis Ford Coppola's « Apocalypse now » : Redux may be a good example.) And it is similarly so in the case of this performing version, which has been fine-tuned over a period of, in all, almost 30 years.

2 equally important approaches are needed to make this music performable

- a) The sonic realisation of the surviving manuscripts themselves, as in the DFF edited by Phillips, suitable for workshop concerts, concert introductions or media presentation ; as well as ...
- b) the completed performing version which would allow at least an approximate impression of the 9th Symphony as a 4 movement unity.

While the DFF allows one to compare the surviving material with its completions in aural experience, listeners want to hear music in a concert, not philology. For this reason, one cannot understand the motivation to conflate these 2 approaches. Philological questions should certainly be addressed in scholarly debate, but what is the point of producing a score which would necessarily still include speculative reconstructions of lost portions, while not making any use of the substantial sketch material that survives for the Coda ? Apart from ignoring an audience which does not consist mainly of scholars, this approach could only replace the old legend of a 3 movement 9th as being sufficiently « vollendet » by a new myth of an « Unfinished » - this time with an even more clearly audible break.

Other fragments should have taught us that reality may be totally different from legend anyway : Bach's « Kunst der Fuge » , for instance, did not only survive in a complete, initial version (Christoph Wolff, Edited by Peters in 1986) much too rarely considered by performers - according to modern research, the famous, incomplete Quadruple Fugue was finished long before the composer's death, its conclusion being lost on its way to the engraver, who finally decided himself to fill-up the space reserved for the missing final section with other, fitting music of Bach. (In 2007, Ton Koopman even assumed that Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach did not include the ending of this fugue in order to maintain the fragmentary character of the work !) The performing version of Contrapunctus XIV by David Schulenberg (1992, the only one based on philological research so far) has even been included in the Bärenreiter « Urtext » Edition (Klaus Hofmann, Edited by Kassel in 1998) , but performers almost never dare to play such brave attempts at a completion, and people still prefer the abrupt stop - not to mention the fact that, as Butler pointed-out, the Quadruple Fugue was possibly not even the final piece of the cycle ; more likely, Bach intended to place the 4 canons at the end.

Some of the changes presented in this score are the result of new philological research and insight. Others merely represent variants and not necessarily « improvements » , but based on now almost 30 years of experience in examining, discussing, editing and performing this music. This also comprises the new elaboration of what were hitherto believed to be gaps within the 2nd Theme of the Exposition and within the Fugue (now fully established from the original sketches) as well as many refinements of instrumentation, phrasing, articulation, dynamics and tempi. Particularly in the Coda, many changes have been undertaken in order to give a more coherent impression of these important final bars. From a fresh re-examination of the manuscripts, it was possible to find some convincing new solutions, binding the music better together.

Philological research undertaken during the last decades had already revealed beyond doubt that Bruckner did not leave a pile of disconnected sketches for the Finale, but actually an emerging autograph score, which was most likely finished, at least in its primary work phase, almost half a year before Bruckner's death. The surviving manuscripts constitute material from various working phases, which could be combined to a surprisingly complete extent ; for a very few bars only, no material survived at all. It was possible to cover such gaps not so much by using « free composition » , but merely a technique of « synthesization » (similar to reconstruction techniques in forensic medicine and plastic surgery) , in which the musical fabric of lost bars can be regained to a certain extent from deductive analysis, observing the material before and after the gap as well as Bruckner's own, strictly « scientific » approach of composing, hence to dispense with a free composition in the true sense of the expression.

Details of sources for, and for the gestation of the Finale, have been provided by the various volumes which appeared in the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , in particular the FE and « Reconstruction of the Autograph Score » (RAS) , edited by John Phillips. In order to fully understand the reconstruction procedures of this performing version, reference to these sources is indispensable. It may be also of help to consult the comprehensive « Musik-Konzepte » Volumes 120-122 on the Finale topic edited by Cohrs, in 2003 (« Bruckners Neunte im Fegefeuer der Rezeption ; München, 2003 ») ; there, in particular, the « Introduction into the Surviving Sources of the Finale », prepared by Cohrs and Phillips) and Cohrs' dissertation « Das Finale der IX. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner » (« Wiener Bruckner Studien 3, Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag Wien, 2012 ») , which includes a new « Presentation of the Fragment » , in score.

The layout of the CRE is based on that established by Cohrs in his « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the 9th (see : preface of that score, page XXII) , but was further modified here for practical reasons. Terminology was used according to the principles given in other volumes of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») (see, in particular, RAS, page XXVff ; FE, page XIXff ; DFF, page XXVIIff) . Further information was provided by Phillips in his Commentary on the DFF (see there, page 85ff) . Various tables will be given in the CRE, providing information on concordances, bar numbers, page numbers, source material being used, Tempi and formal analysis of the Finale. Due to the relative availability of the PV 1992 (for instance, in some public and university libraries) and its documentation in publications and CD productions, it seemed to be indispensable that the Commentary on the CRE should not only address philological problems and explain the reconstruction and supplementation techniques being used therein, but also refer to the differences and changes in comparison with the PV 1992. The layout of the discussion of sources in the Commentary itself was mainly adapted from the Critical Report on the 9th by Cohrs (see there, page XVI) . Since the sources for the Finale have been documented extremely well (thanks to the efforts of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » , « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » , and Musicological Publishers , « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag ») , it seemed to be unnecessary to make the layout more complicated by using different sizes of notes, dotted lines or indications in brackets. The interested user of this score should compare it with the FE and the RAS. In order to avoid too much information, the Commentary does not indicate the numerous additions (such as accents, articulation, phrasing, dynamics) sign by sign or note by note but, on the contrary, those being left by Bruckner himself. Where it seemed appropriate, the notes provided here include extracts from earlier writings of Cohrs (« Musik-Konzepte » , CD-Booklets) . Annotations have not been included in this practical edition, except indications of the corresponding bi-folios from the autograph score.

Thanks are due, in the 1st place, to the sponsors and the Guttenberg Foundation, who made possible the typography of the 2005 edition, and to the typesetter Thomas Ohlendorf. Special thanks go to Ken Ward, Editor of The Bruckner Journal, and John F. Berky, the webmaster of www.abruckner.com, who both helped immensely with publishing materials and information on this performing version. We also wish to thank all those institutions, orchestras, conductors, libraries, scholars, and various other enthusiasts, who have supported this work since 1983, with financial, logistical or moral support, publicity, comments and suggestions, or have even made the distribution, performance or recording of the CPV possible. However, in particular we are indebted to Sir Simon Rattle and the committed players of the Berlin Philharmonic, who brought this score to new life, in 2012. To express our gratitude appropriately, we dedicate this Conclusive Revised Edition to Sir Simon Rattle.

This reconstruction of the 9th's Finale is the result of 30 years' work by Bruckner scholars Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and Giuseppe Mazzuca (« SPCM ») . For this new « Conclusive Revised Edition 2012 » , « SPCM » shortened by 18 bars the Coda, of which little of Bruckner's writing survives, and reworked it to include, based on Bruckner's description, a development of the trumpets' « Alleluia » in bar 5 of the Adagio. This works well, though the Coda now seems a bit short. A further « final » edition is in the works.

Some critics have felt distanced by this recording's almost super-human monumentality, but despite the Berlin Philharmonic's immense size and power (the Scherzo is implacably brutal) , this Bruckner to me sounds human scaled and deeply personal. This sense of intimacy on so vast a scale, especially in the 1st and 3rd movements, seems accomplished by giving rising string figures a slight crescendo on the way to the concluding, highest pitch, which is given an extra push of vibrato. The cumulative effect is of an anguished yearning that makes this severely formal music seem, even more, one soul's journey through death and beyond.

Here, that soul is clearly the dying Bruckner's ; there's never the sense of witnessing a conductor's drama. Speaking of the Finale, Simon Rattle has « absolutely no doubt that Bruckner was going through an existential crisis and a compositional crisis » . The Finale resolves those crises, but only just. Rattle rises to the challenge of this « astonishingly difficult » music with shapings of answering and supporting figures that make them speak with profound clarity. He falters only in the mounting passage just before the Finale's fugue ; the energy flags where it should tumble headlong, as in Johannes Wildner's and Kurt Eichhorn's recordings.

Even without a Finale, this is a deeply moving 9th. The thrashing violins twisting around the tragic nobility of the rising brass at the end of the 1st movement has never sounded more like the anguished dialogue of a conflicted soul. And in the long descent of brass in the « Farewell to Life » (Bruckner's description) , near the start of the Adagio, the irresolute 3 note string figures have never sounded so heartbreakingly like that soul's failure to console itself even as it accepts the inevitability of death.

The immense interior spaces defined by Bruckner's late Symphonies resonate the longer the more the stark logic of their sonic cantilevers is fully exposed, and the Berliners rip the shrouds from Bruckner's often nearly unplayable counterpoint (e.g. , just before the 1st movement's Coda) as well as I've heard it done, reminding us how precisely such passages must be played if they are not to become grandiloquent mush. The Berlin strings' pronounced sostenuto sometimes coats the sound in a hard glaze that consumes much « air » , but not nearly so much as in their and Rattle's recording of Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 (2007) .

Perhaps, the engineers have at last learned how to record in the Berlin « Philharmonie » , a cold and difficult space. This recording was assembled from 3 concerts and a patch-up session there. I heard one of those concerts, and a 4th in New York, and this disc evinces some fine editing : except for the spot mentioned above, the hesitancy I heard in those performances of the Finale is gone.

The Finale is the most complex, challenging music Bruckner wrote. This recording is the best argument, yet, for establishing it in the standard repertoire. Rattle says he will now conduct only 4 movement 9ths, and hopes his colleagues will follow suit. (Richard Lehnert)

When making his score, Bruckner would have had in mind the practice of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , including a String Orchestra of around 14-12-10-8-8. With such a number of Strings, it was common practice to double the Woodwinds. Traditionally, the 2 Violin groups were placed on the left and right side of the rostrum, the Double Basses in 1 row behind the Orchestra. Celli were sitting left behind the 1st, Violas right behind the 2nd Violins. However, it might be helpful to reverse this and place the Violas left behind the 1st Violins, so that they can reflect their sound directly to the audience instead of to the rear wall. Furthermore, the 2nd Violins feel much more comfortable with Celli behind them. In so doing, the Tenor part, so important in Bruckner's voice leading and design, will be better audible, which contributes significantly to the spaciality of sound. Hence, it might be possible as well to place the Horns to the left behind the Violas, Trumpets, Trombones and Tuba to the right, behind Celli. This would make the sound of the Brass less heavy. Regarding orchestral balance, one should also bear in mind that the Brass instruments from around 1900 were much smaller, less heavy, but also much more colourful. Steel strings were common only in the 2nd half of the 20th Century ; gut-strings are recommended, at least for the upper-Strings. The modern « Maplenut-Syrup-Vibrato » was as much uncommon as a permanent « sostenuto » playing. Nuances and Timbre were achieved by technique and flexible vibrato, and a slight « portamento » was, by no means, unwelcome. Common at that time was the natural-harmonic intonation with pure 5ths and 3rds, as the bore and intonation of extant original woodwind instruments reveal. More interesting information on Viennese instruments from around 1900 can be found in « Musikinstrumente und Musizierpraxis zur Zeit Gustav Mahlers, Ed. Reinhold Kubik, Böhlau-Verlag, Wien, Köln, Weimar, 2007 » . (ISBN 978-3-2005-77696-3) The french pitch (a = 435) was common in Vienna.

The Completion of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9

Bruckner's last 2 years were consumed with the creation of his transcendent 9th Symphony. But his last great work was left unfinished. He was well aware of his limited time, and the last movement was substantially composed, at least, in a 1st draft form, but the 9th Symphony was not completed before his death. He finished approximately 17 minutes of the last movement in full-score, not just sketches. Given Bruckner's propensity for revision (even when not pressured by outside forces) , it's likely that even that portion that exists would have been revisited had Bruckner lived long enough.

Though a « version » of the 9th Symphony, edited by Ferdinand Löwe, was published in 1903, the Symphony was left unpublished in its authentic form until 1934 when an edition by Alfred Orel, a predecessor of Robert Haas as the editor of the 1st Editions published by the International Bruckner Society, was issued. The later Leopold Nowak edition is identical except for the correction of 1 or 2 misprints. Only one version of the last movement was extant at the time of Bruckner's death ; largely because of all the time he would spent revising the 1st and 8th Symphonies during those last years. The incomplete last movement was not included in any of these published editions.

The 1st performing version of the unfinished last movement was prepared by William Carragan, and published in 1984. Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca completed a draft completion of the last movement, in 1987. This edition has since been superseded by a 2nd completion by Samale, Phillips, Mazzuca, and Cohrs, completed in 1992. William Carragan has been preparing a revision of his completion to include scholarship since the prior version which should be published soon.

The last movement is grand, some would say bombastic, even by Bruckner standards. The Symphony can be enjoyed in its unfinished state in a way that is, perhaps, similar to listening to Bach's « Art of the Fugue ». It certainly leads one to wonder how extensive the revision of the this movement would have been had Bruckner had a few more years to polish the Finale. Of course, it is impossible to say for sure, especially considering the other « big » Bruckner Symphonies that were written in full-score prior to their 1st performance and hardly touched thereafter : the 5th, 6th, 7th, and of course, the 1st 3 movements of the 9th. Few would suggest that these works are in need of revision. That Bruckner spent the last 2 years of his life on this music, and was working on it the day he died, is testimony to a determination to finish the 9th, his ultimate tribute to his religious conviction.

The lowest priority among the performing versions is the earlier work by Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca, which is the one recorded by Eliahu Inbal and the Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra for « Teldec » (4509-91446-2) . This is because the Samale-Mazzuca completion has been superseded by a more refined completion by Samale, John Alan Phillips, and Mazzuca, under the supervision of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and completed in 1992. This performing version has been recorded by Kurt Eichhorn and the Bruckner Orchester Linz, on a 2 disc set from the Japanese label « Camerata » (CM-275-276) .

In my opinion, the version truest to the Bruckner style is the 1983-1984 completion by William Carragan, which has been recorded by Yoav Talmi and the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra for « Chandos » (CHAN8468-69, re-issued as CHAN7051) . The recording is laid-out on 2 CDs, the 1st covering the 3 movements Bruckner completed, the 2nd contains performances of both the completion by Carragan and also Bruckner's original sketches for the last movement, so a direct comparison between the « original » and the Carragan completion can be made. In fact, both « completions » , are surprisingly similar in most respects, which I take as an indication that Bruckner had nearly finished the movement when he died. If you are seeking only one « completed » 9th, this is probably the version to hear.

Bruckner 9th Symphony, Finale : Alfred Orel and John Alan Phillips

At his death, Bruckner had completed the 1st 3 movements only. They were 1st published, in 1903, in an edition by one of Bruckner's disciple, Ferdinand Löwe, which differs from Bruckner's autograph in a number of ways. Bruckner's autograph of the 1st 3 movements was subsequently published in editions by Alfred Orel, Leopold Nowak, and Hans-Hubert Schönzeler.

Bruckner also composed 2 earlier versions of the Trio. Trio No. 1 in F was composed in 1889, while Trio No. 2 in F-sharp was composed in 1893. The final Trio No. 3 in F-sharp was composed in 1894. Complete details on all 3 Trios as well as the Scherzo have been published by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs in the « Complete Edition » (« Gesamtausgabe ») .

In the case of the Finale, Bruckner left full-score sketches for nearly the entire movement, and these were completely filled-out vertically for the A and C themes of the exposition. In addition, there are numerous sketches in short score, which fill in more detail. Unfortunately, some of the sketch bi-folios are now lost. The most familiar completions of the Finale are by 1) William Carragan 2) Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca and finally 3) Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and Giuseppe Mazzuca (known as the « SPCM » version) .

Sébastien Letocart (2008)

En 2008, le compositeur belge Sébastien Letocart a réalisé une nouvelle complétion du Finale. Dans la Coda, il a inclus les fragments originaux, des citations des 5e, 7e et 8e Symphonies, le thème central du Trio en guise d' « Halléluia » et, à sa fin, superpose les thèmes des 4 mouvements à la manière de la 8e Symphonie. Cette tentative de reconstruction ainsi que les 3 1ers mouvements de la Symphonie, ont été enregistrés en 2008 par le chef d'orchestre français Nicolas Couton avec l'Orchestre Symphonique MÁV de Budapest.

Sébastien Letocart, compositeur :

Ma complétion du Finale de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner est clairement et strictement basée sur le matériel thématique de Bruckner. J'ai orchestré ce mouvement aussi discrètement et le plus scrupuleusement que possible. Il y a 2 aspects principaux à distinguer pour comprendre le processus de cette complétion :

Premièrement, en plus du travail de « remplissage » de l'orchestration de passages déjà existants, il y a 6 parties manquantes dans la section développement / ré-exposition qui ont dû être spéculativement reconstruites et ce dans le but de recréer des liens cohérents. Ces « trous » sont localisés :

À la transition entre la fin de l'exposition et le développement (pédale sur mi : 7' 11" - 7' 57") .

Au milieu de la 1re partie du développement (8' 42" - 8' 55") .

À la fin de la fugue (stretto : 11' 13" - 11' 43") .

Dans la ré-exposition à la transition vers le 3e groupe thématique (16' 36" - 16' 47") .

Au milieu du 3e groupe (thème du choral au hautbois : 17' 40" - 18' 07") et au moment de la transition tendue vers la Coda (18' 38" - 19' 02") .

Ma thèse en préparation donnera une explication, mesure par mesure, de la réflexion musicologique et la signification de ma complétion et des ajouts mais également de donner les détails de l'aspect reconstruction du travail.

Deuxièmement, mon élaboration de la Coda ne correspond pas tout à fait à la même tâche ni ne pose la même question à propos de « ce que Bruckner aurait fait » car cela est tout simplement impossible à savoir ou à deviner. Nous n'avons que quelques esquisses et quelques vagues témoignages (le docteur Richard Heller, Max Auer et le critique viennois Max Graf) concernant la conclusion du Finale, et nous n'avons même pas une idée précise du nombre de mesures tant ces différentes sources donnent difficilement une idée de la structure globale que Bruckner avait à l'esprit. Cependant, j'ai senti que cette partie ultime du Finale devait avoir une envergure comparable au Finale des 5e et 8e Symphonies. Ma Coda « extrapolée » en 4 parties (respectivement de 36, 28, 36 et 59 mesures) utilise uniquement le contenu thématique et les motifs du Finale tout en étant partiellement inspirée des codas des 5e et 8e Symphonies.

La Coda commence par un long crescendo reprenant une esquisse de Bruckner de 24 mesures qui est construite sur une progression tritonique thématiquement liée au tout début du mouvement. Je l'ai prolongée jusqu'à 36 mesures en additionnant 12 mesures qui culminent avec la citation du thème principal de la 8e (1re partie : 19' 06" - 20' 22") .

La 2e partie commence (20' 23" - 21' 11") par la dernière apparition, i.e. , le thème principal du 3e groupe thématique, qui est traitée de la même manière que dans la 5e Symphonie avec des citations intégrées des thèmes principaux des 5e (20' 34" - 20' 39") et 7e Symphonies (20' 51" - 20' 57") .

La 3e partie (21' 12" - 22' 21") commence par une esquisse de 4 mesures de Bruckner rappelant la Coda (violons et cuivres) du Finale de la 4e Symphonie. Ce qui vient ensuite est basé sur le « saltus duriusculus » (répétition insistante de sixtes et 7es descendantes) du commencement du Finale (0' 48" - 1' 04", correspondant au passage dans la Coda : 21' 32" - 21' 46") . Cela est suivi par la même progression rythmique et thématique calquée sur la 1re présentation du 1er groupe thématique élaboré en se reconnectant à la dernière esquisse de Bruckner, datée de mai 1896. Cette dernière se résume à une ébauche harmonique d'une structure métrique de 16 mesures (21' 47" - 22' 21") . Le motif « héroïque » (trompettes) qui fut entendu pour la 1re fois à la fin du développement (cors : 12' 54") . Cette 3e partie s'interrompt brutalement par un accord dissonant (« climax, parrhesia abruptio » à 22' 15") .

La 4e partie, la « Coda de la Coda » (22' 23" - 24' 43") , bâtie sur une longue et statique pédale de ré comme Bruckner le prévoyait probablement, elle peut être considérée comme un retour mystérieux et éthéré de la Coda du 1er mouvement. Un long crescendo basé sur ce que j'ai identifié comme étant le thème « Hallelujah » (2 cors et 2 tubas wagnériens ténor à 22' 29" - 23' 11" et ensuite 2 trompettes à 23' 12" - 23' 30") . Richard Heller, médecin de Bruckner, attesta qu'un majestueux « Alléluia » devait conclure la 9e Symphonie. En effet, Bruckner expliqua à Heller que le Finale devait se terminer par « un chant de louange dédié au Seigneur » basé sur un thème du 2e mouvement. Toutefois, à l'époque où Bruckner joua au piano des passages du Finale à Heller, l'ordre des mouvements intérieurs était-il « scherzo - adagio » ou bien « adagio - scherzo » ? Nous n'avons aucune réponse claire et certaine à cette question. Selon moi, ce thème « Hallelujah » semble pouvoir trouver son origine dans le trio du scherzo (violons I, mesure 53 lettre B / idem, mesure 205 lettre H ; violoncelles - basson I, mesure 113 lettre D) et non dans l'Adagio.

Enfin, la Coda culmine sur la même dissonance napolitaine de mi bémol tout comme à la fin du 1er mouvement qui trouve sa résolution dans la « coagmentatio » en ré majeur des 4 thèmes principaux de l'œuvre (empilement des 4 thèmes à 24' 04"), couronnant ainsi l'œuvre entière exactement de la même façon que pour la 8e Symphonie. Il faut noter cependant que de légers détails ont été ré-écrits ou modifiés dans la partition après que l'enregistrement initial fut produit.

Concernant la « coagmentatio », Max Graf écrivit après avoir consulté d'hypothétiques manuscrits perdus en possession de Franz Schalk qu'il y avait « un thème principal (celui du 1er ou du 4e mouvement, ce n'est pas clair mais il s'agit probablement du 1er) , un thème de fugue (certainement celui du Finale) , un « Choral » (aussi certainement celui du Finale) et un « thème de quintes » du « Te Deum » et ces 4 thèmes sont combinés ensemble (« übereinandergestellt ») , sous forme d'une quadruple superposition (« eine vierfache Thürmung ») comme on peut en trouver une à la fin de la 8e Symphonie. Max Graf était un critique musical et Max Auer, qui mentionna également la même combinaison (répétant probablement ce qu'il lu de Graf) , était seulement un dilettante. On peut raisonnablement dire que ces 2 « amateurs » ne devraient pas être considérés comme des chercheurs critiques ou des musicologues. De plus, l'idée d'une « coagmentatio » des 4 thèmes de la Symphonie a maintenant été rejetée par le musicologue australien John Alan Phillips qui considère les écrits de Max Auer et de Max Graf à propos de ce sujet comme étant peu pertinents.

Néanmoins, n'ayant pas d'autre alternative satisfaisante, l'idée d'un thème « Hallelujah » culminant avec une « coagmentatio » des 4 thèmes principaux de la Symphonie restait pour moi, structurellement, la possibilité la plus convaincante et, musicalement, la plus efficace. 2 autres combinaisons utilisant le motif du « Te Deum » , le choral, le thème principal du 1er mouvement et le thème fugué du Finale tel que décrit par Graf / Auer a été aisément réalisée mais a été écartée cependant car, musicalement, insatisfaisante (voir ces 2 exemples dans ma thèse) .

Dans sa propre thèse, John Alan Phillips aborde le sujet à propos de la question d'une fin de substitution imaginée par Bruckner (qui était extrêmement préoccupé par l'idée de mourir) au milieu du 3e groupe thématique (ré-exposition) : une soudaine transition pour insérer l'entrée du « Te Deum » . Manifestement, cette solution ne peut sérieusement pas être prise en compte à cause des problèmes des proportions et de la cohérence musicale de l'ensemble : la durée du « Te Deum » est d'environ 25 minutes. Que pourrait bien pouvoir signifier une telle « intrusion » après avoir entendu les $\frac{3}{4}$ du Finale (entre 18 à 20 minutes de musique) ? Je pense que nous pouvons tenté de comprendre cette alternative comme étant une sorte de capitulation de la part du compositeur en réalisant qu'il n'aurait vraisemblablement pas la capacité d'élaborer la Coda d'une manière suffisante et qu'il ne pourrait par retravailler l'œuvre en profondeur comme cela était son habitude. Ne pouvant pas fixer ses idées sous une forme pleinement accomplie, il choisit alors comme solution de secours d'y ajouter une œuvre extérieure à la Symphonie. En fait, ce Finale peut parfois laissé les mêmes impressions d'une œuvre « pas tout à fait aboutie » ou une sorte de « encore à accomplir » tout comme les Ires versions des 3e (1873) , 4e (1874) et 8e Symphonies (1887) . Les raisons de ces difficultés à terminer sa 9e Symphonie furent probablement un conjonction de problèmes d'ordre physique et mentaux. Cependant, cette musique fascine toujours bien qu'incomplète, autant par sa grandeur, sa puissance que par la déchirante énigme de son inachèvement. Nous connaissons la même problématique avec une autre extraordinaire Symphonie qui, laissée inachevée à cause du décès du compositeur et dans ce cas complètement esquissée, laisse cette étrange et énigmatique sentiment d'un processus laissé en suspension pour toujours. Bien évidemment, je veux parler de la 10e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler.

Commentaire de Gert van Gelder

A few words on the sketches of the Finale of Bruckner 9th Symphony :

Of the Coda, 3 sketches have been found, which Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs brings to light in his « Documentation of the Finale Fragments » on a private CD where he conducts the Flanders Philharmonic. Jacques Roelands finds these sketches problematical, most probably because they don't give us too much of an idea how we would have the Coda, and also Nikolaus Harnoncourt did not use these sketches when he presented the « Documentation of the Finale Fragments » with the « Wiener Philharmoniker » before a live audience in Salzburg (on « RCA ») , for pretty much this reason. But as Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs once mentioned :

« If Nikolaus Harnoncourt and I would have met before the Salzburg event was recorded, Nikolaus Harnoncourt would have probably altered his " Documentation of the Fragments ". »

These are truly important sketches, even though admittedly they don't give us an exact idea about the music which would surround the sketches. William Carragan only uses one of them and, to my very humble opinion, perhaps not in the sense in which it might have been intended by Anton Bruckner.

In the work of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and the Flanders Philharmonic, the 1st sketch lasts 1 min 12 sec and is number 13 on CD 1/2. It is used by Juan Cahis in the files of this Anton Bruckner Club and named « CodaSketch B. mp3 » .

To me, personally, this piece of music might represent the actual transformation from earthly life to heaven. I think this music should be performed calm and solemnly, even though the tension is extreme and the music gradually leads to full orchestration. A huge expansion of music must follow this passage.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs narrates the « Documentation of the Finale Fragments » with text by John Alan Phillips, where he mentions it has provisionally been scored-out for strings.

In the performance of Johannes Wildner conducting the New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia (on « Naxos ») , this passage is between 19 min 23 sec and 20 min 13 sec. As with Lawrence Rennes conducting « Het Gelders Orkest » , Kurt Eichhorn conducting the « Bruckner Orchester Linz » and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs conducting the completion with the Flanders Philharmonic, it is my impression that the entrance of the woodwinds and the actual tempo in which this passage is performed could somehow turn-back some of the potential strength of the Crescendo passage. Therefore, I feel it is most effective in the « Documentation of the Fragments » by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and the Flanders Philharmonic where, of course, the strings get the upper-hand, since no other instrument is added there.

In the completion of William Carragan, recently performed by Akira Naito and Tokyo New City Orchestra, this passage is translated in orchestral form between 19 min 22 sec and 20 min 07 sec. William Carragan opted to use this music as a part of an orchestral voyage towards the end. It surprises me that, right after 20 min 07 sec, William Carragan comes in with the music which we hear in the opening movement and which carries the music there to ever stringent proportions near the end, hear movement one of Akira Naito conducting the Tokyo New City Orchestra between 21 min 47 sec and 22 min 07 sec. Cohrs-Samale-Phillips-Mazzuca, on the other hand, opted to let the Crescendo passage follow by a piece of music of which musicologists have reported in the beginning of the 20th Century.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs :

« This impressive Crescendo passage would have led into a 1st grade Climax of the Coda. Around the beginning of the 20th Century, several musicologists recalled having seen a sketch by Bruckner which contains some kind of simultaneous combination of the principal themes of the 9th Symphony. While this sketch is no longer extant, it might be possible that it had been lost since then. Apart from that, a contrapuntal overlay such as this is well within the bounds of Bruckner's musical style. The main themes of all the movements of the 9th Symphony can indeed be readily combined with each other admittedly not in the manner of a triumphant apotheosis but rather as a further catastrophic climax. »

However, the Symphony was not intended to end with such a catastrophe. Bruckner's last doctor, Richard Heller, recorded in his memoirs the following words of the composer :

« Now, I dedicate my last work to the Majesty of all majesties, to the dear Lord, and hope that he will grant me sufficient time to complete it and mercifully accept my gift. I therefore intend to introduce the " Allelujah " of the 2nd movement again in the Finale with great power in order that the Symphony end with a song of praise to the dear Lord. »

We can only speculate about this music as Bruckner seems not to have sketched this for him a clear point of arrival. It would appear that themes of his 2 choral songs of praise, the « Te Deum » and « Psalm 150 » , were to play an important role. Bruckner did however leave the indications of the manner in which he intended to lead into this song of praise. The surviving musical evidence as to the conclusion of the score comprises a 4 measure choral fragment and a broadly conceived cadence in 24 measures. These sketches too have been provisionally scored-out here for strings. The final 8 measures consist of a long held Tonic D upon which Bruckner would have begun to build the Final Glorious « Allelujah » . They recall the opening of the Symphony. The end of which lay in it's beginning. »

Then, the sketches are heard which last 1 min 28 sec. Take 15 of CD 1/2 in the « Documentation of the Finale Fragments » by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and the Flanders Philharmonic. In the CD of Johannes Wildner conducting New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia, we hear these sketches as follows : the music gently climbing-up it's way in which I seem to hear a quotation of « himmelsleiter » from Mozart's « Requiem » (20 min 54 sec till 21 min 02 sec) , a very intense Crescendo (21 min 27 sec till 21 min 47 sec) , and the opening of the Tonical D (21 min 50 sec till 22 min 12 sec) upon which the « Allelujah » motiv builds.

What was meant with « Allelujah of the 2nd movement » as Anton Bruckner explained Doctor Heller ?

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs :

« Max Auer quoted Doctor Heller's memories, referring to Bruckner's words of a " Allelujah of the 2nd movement " with a footnote speculating the Trio of the 8th could have been meant. But, in fact, it seems to be much more likely that Heller simply assumed the slow movement of the 9th would have to be the 2nd, as in most of the Romantic Symphonies of that time. Another possible explanation is that Bruckner was, for a time, not sure himself if he wanted to have the Scherzo as 2nd or as 3rd movement, as I have shown in the Critical report of the 9th. The evidence is musical at least : the phrase is in D major, it contains precisely the " non confundar / Allelujah " (D/fis/a/d/e/fis) , the Adagio ends with a mutated form of this motive (horns in the same rythm) , and also every Finale of Bruckner ends with this motive, as already observed by Oskar Lang in the 1930's. »

William Carragan about the Coda he realized, taken from the booklet of his CD in which Akira Naito conducts the Tokyo New City Orchestra :

« In this Completion, the 1st half of the Coda (beginning at 18 min 38 sec) is derived from the dark, gloomy descending scales continuing those which had already grown-out of the chorale in the 3rd theme group. At the same time, the opening theme of the Symphony, which has not been heard since the middle of the 1st movement, appears in canon, with allusions to the Scherzo and the " lightning bolts " from the beginning of the Finale, together with material from a further Bruckner sketch, quoting the " death clock " from the 8th (19 min 25 sec) , which fits in very well at this point.

At the climax, the stark, menacing unison of the 1st movement, with its crashing leap, embodies the 3rd and final crisis. But the mood is suddenly transformed into light with the sounding of the triumphant fanfare, recalling the Trio of the Scherzo, with which the 2nd half of the Coda begins (20 min 19 sec) . After 10 measures of brilliant writing in which the whole Orchestra plays above middle C, there ensues the grand final statement of the chorale (20 min 37 sec) , which serves as the harmonic framework for a soaring triadic transmutation of the anguished opening melody of the Adagio as a decant for the 3 trumpets. At the same time, the dotted theme of the Finale itself appears in the bass. In the 3rd phrase, the yearning theme of the Coda of the Adagio, which looks back to the similar music in the slow movement of the 2nd, rises above the appearance of the main Adagio theme and the lightning bolts in the brass (21 min 07 sec) .

As the canonic dotted figures valesce into chords, the 4th phrase of the chorale, now inverted, climbs through a 9th and leads to the culminating peroration (21 min 37 sec) where the opening theme of the Symphony, in the brass, is combined with the vocal melody of the " Te Deum " and the descending scales in organ and bell-like sonorities : " Te Deum laudamus, te Dominum confitemur " . Thus a joyous resolution, which for most of the Symphony has seemed impossibly remote, is attained at last. »

No doubt, William Carragan created a great construction for the Coda, where the road to the Glorious ending is marked by full orchestral events, whereas in the Cohrs-Samale-Phillips-Mazzuca completion quite other steps are taken in order to come to that conclusion.

Still, with William Carragan, I do miss some of the last found sketches of Anton Bruckner realized in which, to my opinion, Bruckner indicates that in the closing stages of the Symphony the music remains breathing, with the typical « pausen » Bruckner always realized. To my view, these stages also represent the transformation of the human body after death. The 1st grade Climax which follows then might even indicate the actual entering to paradise. The Cohrs-

Samale-Phillips-Mazzuca completion concludes this climax with the return of the chorale song of the Finale music, which is a good thought.

William Carragan doesn't bring back the Tonical D, as opposed to the sketches found by Bruckner. To my opinion, the return of the Tonical D is absolutely necessary, it serves as a resting point after the 1st grade Climax, but what a resting point. It contains an enormous tension as well, just as the mentioned Crescendo passage. It is only at the Tonical D that the glorious « Allelujah » might come to its existence, as performed in the Cohrs-Samale-Phillips-Mazzuca completion.

Peter Jan Marthé and the European Philharmonic Orchestra surely incorporated a long held Tonical D, near the end of their new Finale, and that is greatly performed. However, this Finale is far removed from any completional task to the scores of the 9th of Bruckner. But, even so at least, the Coda of Peter Jan Marthé is great music.

When I asked Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs if not the Tonical D should remain open for a while, he insisted that Anton Bruckner would always let it instantly follow by thematic material, not leave it open. A result of the huge study Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs realized on the work of Anton Bruckner.

I have great respect for William Carragan's completional work. However, I have a preference for the Finale completion of Cohrs, Samale, Phillips and Mazzuca, nowadays realized by Cohrs and Samale, because of their way of describing Anton Bruckner's life and last Symphony coming to its conclusion.

We all will have to await a recording of the revised Cohrs-Samale completion.

Le Finale inachevé

« See, I have already dedicated Symphonies to 2 Majesties, to poor King Ludwig and to our illustrious Emperor, as the highest earthly Majesty I recognise, and now I dedicate my last work to the Majesty of all Majesties, to the dear Lord, and hope that He will grant me sufficient time to complete it and mercifully accept my gift. I therefore intend to introduce the Allelujah (probably wanted to say Te Deum) of the 2nd movement again in the Finale with all power, in order that the Symphony end with a song of praise to the dear Lord. »

These were Bruckner's words to his physician Richard Heller, as they simply and convincingly efface the strongly rooted tradition of performing the 9th as an all inclusive 3 movement body that should finally end with those very last murmuring and utterly moving bars for horns and strings in the Adagio, the movement that so clearly marks the « Farewell to life » , its motto appearing for the 1st time, in bar 29.

Apart from the manuscript of the Finale that Bruckner left to posterity, his words to Richard Heller also reveal that the 9th was, in no way, intended and conceived solely from the perspective of a musical concept. On the contrary, Bruckner's unsurpassed semantics were religiously driven, and he commissioned his last work at the very peak of his creative powers to « der liebe Gott » . He must have known it, as he shaped the symbolism in his ultimate artistic gestures.

God is everywhere in the 9th, its ample indications demonstrating Bruckner's devotion to and his recognition of God's Majesty, in glorious moments of retrospection and farewell, adoration and ecstasy, humbleness and absolution, but also the Last Ordeal, « Dies Irae » , and the reality of the progressing shadows of death, the course of life coming to its closing chapter.

There can be no question that Bruckner's last Adagio contains the autobiographical elements anchored in his strong religious belief and, therefore, his reliance on God's mercy in the presence of death, a clear and outspoken artistic statement embedded in the complexities of ambiguous harmonic progressions, strong and radically Symphonic, not just sanctuary by fits and starts. The great chorale in tubas and horns bears Bruckner's own description : « Farewell to life » , and in this elusive hemisphere, without a completed Finale at hand, it is not hard to understand why the long performance tradition confined Bruckner's « Opus Ultimum » to the 1st 3 movements, with the Adagio as the conclusive confirmation that « all has been said » .

Do we really need Bruckner's own words to Richard Heller to feel and to comprehend what the composer wanted to express in his last Symphony ? Not at all. We notice instantly that this work delivers the gigantic forward thrust with its tremendous semantic expansion of transcendental proportions, that the message reaches-out to metaphysical borders, and that we do not need extensive program notes and exhaustive analysis to feel it all. This is the kind of music that has the spiritual resources really to uplift us, as in all great music from a great mind, be it, as in the case of the 9th, in the familiar 3 movement version, or (as it is now gradually recognised) as a full 4 movements Symphony, as it should be.

Bruckner died in Vienna, on 11 October 1896. It was Ferdinand Löwe, one of Bruckner's admirers and pupils, who conducted the 1st performance of the 3 movements at a concert of the Vienna Concert Society (now, the Vienna Symphony Orchestra) , on 11 February 1903. The performance in the « Musikvereinsaal » was no less than a triumph for Bruckner and Löwe, but it was seriously flawed by the many changes Löwe had made in the original score. His obvious reasoning was the success he wanted to achieve with this 1st performance and, in this sense, the performance was almost pre-programmed, with Löwe less interested in Bruckner's originality and more in « marketing » the Symphony. By polishing and softening the edgy instrumentation and by remodelling the bold progression of harmonics in the score, he thought he could increase the chances to glorify, and the history books would mention it. Löwe succeeded, although at the expense of the purity of Bruckner's heritage.

However, we should not forget that Bruckner's music had no fundamental part in Vienna's musical scene, with the mainstream of musicians and the public being indifferent or even hostile to the composer's creative output. Prominent critics like Eduard Hanslick had their share in the long and ongoing battle, taking each and every effort to condemn and to marginalise the modest composer, driving him to breakdowns and stimulating this poor man without adequate self-assertion to revise his works. Under these circumstances, it was no less than the act of a hero to take the 9th to the concert-hall and to lead the musician through the hardship of long rehearsals to get the best out of them. This was certainly one of Löwe's great achievements and, despite our criticism, we should be grateful for his advocacy of Bruckner's music, stubbornly knocking and heading against a strongly biased environment.

Löwe's concert ended with the « Te Deum », which was performed after the interval as a solitary work. In the program booklet, Löwe underlined that the « Te Deum » would be played in the right place and order, in accordance with Bruckner's wish. He did neither mention the changes he had made in the 1st 3 movements nor did he show any substantial interest in what Bruckner had left of the Finale.

Many reviews of this performance (and the interval must have played a part in this) did not mention that the choral work was set in C major, instead of in D major, the tonal scheme that should have concluded the D minor Symphony in all its splendour. Bruckner, although one of the great advocates of formal tonality schemes, had indeed suggested that the « Te Deum » would qualify to serve as the final movement for the Symphony, failing a better solution. His decision got some support from Max Kalbeck, one of the leading Viennese critics, who persisted that, after the closing bars of the Adagio in E major, the following C major did not sound better or worse compared to the usual D minor, and that there was no reason whatsoever to confine to the formal tonal scheme, with ample spiritual and esthetical arguments to left abandoning tonal unity (of the Classical scheme) in this particular case. This was written clearly against the intentions of Ferdinand Löwe and Robert Hirschfeld, who both suggested the Symphony should better be performed without the « Te Deum » at all, and that Löwe followed Bruckner's own suggestion only with « piety for the Master's decision » .

Hence the discussion focused on the idea that Bruckner's illness and death deprived him of the opportunity to finish the work, that the Adagio was Bruckner's real farewell to the world, the heartfelt conclusion of his work on earth and, at the same time, the quite moving announcement of the transition from suffering to transfiguration. Just from this perspective, the soft drum roll that starts the quirky Finale is hopelessly out of tune. The myth was created 100 years ago and is still alive today, heartily joined by most great Bruckner conductors and their compliant audiences.

In that long history of performing the 9th, the 3 movement version is always predominant. Löwe's voice still sounds : although the Symphony remained unfinished, it does not need to be finished. Or : the 3 movements say all that needs to be said, period. The myth is a very long preserved one, even after Alfred Orel had published a flow of so far unknown manuscript papers in his rather chaotic edition prepared for the « Bruckner Kritische Gesamtausgabe » .

Alfred Orel

Already, in 1921, the musicologist Alfred Orel had published a review in the Viennese leading music magazine « Der Merker » on the sketch material of the 9th : « Skizzen zum vierten Satz von Bruckners Neunter Symphonie » .

In 1929, the « Kritische Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » (Complete Critical Bruckner Edition) was launched and, in 1934, Alfred Orel presented both the original score of the 1st 3 movements of the 9th, together with a study score containing drafts and sketches of all 4 movements (« Entwürfe und Skizzen ») . Orel did not present a correct picture of the Finale manuscripts as already available at that time (Leopold Nowak made instant corrections by hand on his copy after its publication) . The score was to appear in 1932 already, but the publisher, (Doctor) Benno Filser, collapsed. This turned-out to be a good thing for Orel : the 1st proofs for his edition contained almost no music for the Finale at all, but then, in 1931, Franz Schalk died, and Orel got access to the Finale manuscripts through Schalk's widow. That he would have to prepare the Finale material, in such a short time, may explain some of his shortcomings.

A substantial number of sketch pages did not appear because Orel had no access or did not find them worthwhile, but it was, at least, the 1st attempt to present the Finale to scholars, performers and the public. Although a study score covering the 1st 3 movements and the « Te Deum » had already been published by Universal-Edition in 1911, it did not carry much significance, as it was solely based on Löwe's edition for the 1st performance of the work in 1903. (The « Te Deum » remained untouched in the 1st print.)

The premiere of the original 3 movement version took place on 2 April 1932, in Munich, conducted by Siegmund von Hausegger. He conducted 2 consecutive renditions of the 9th. In the 1st, he used the only existing printed edition with its typical almost creamy Wagnerian « soundscape », which was far from Bruckner's own manuscript. The 2nd performance was based on pre-copies of the new edition prepared for the « Kritische Gesamtausgabe » . Hans Weisbach conducted the premiere of the Finale's exposition based on an edition arranged and edited by Fritz Öser on 12 October 1940, in Leipzig, at the beginning of the concert, just before the 1st movement took-off.

Through the years, Orel's 1934 edition stimulated a mainstream of workshops, piano transcriptions, orchestral schemes or attempts to complete the Finale (in chronological order) , but most of these (except for the William Carragan and the « SPCM » orchestral completions) have lost their meaning, in the course of time :

1934 : Else Krüger - 2 pianos (fragments) .

One Finale, many arrangements

One of the largest projects ever undertaken was the reconstruction of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony and, also here, many scholars had (as can be imagined) different views : Ernst Křenek, Clinton Carpenter, Joseph Wheeler, Hans Wollschlager, Remo Mazetti Junior , Rusdolf Barshai, Giuseppe Mazzuca and Nicola Samale and, finally, the one whose edition finally made it dominantly to the concert-hall : Deryck Cooke. Indeed, there are still discussions about Cooke's final performing version, including some changes that had been made after his death (resulting in the well-known Cooke version III, published in 1989) , but all other versions have either been forgotten or strongly marginalised. It is the Cooke version that foremost appears on the orchestral desks.

All these editions, be it performing versions or not, bear such a variety in approach and interpretation, defensible or not, that it diminishes confidence in their artistic validity ; and even more so, when public access to the original sources is either restricted or impossible, with critical annotation non-existent. Under the yoke of such wilfully created obscurity, the question of who is right and who is wrong has lost its meaning.

Not even professional music-critics and performers take serious efforts to read all underlying documentation, if available. They express their views without knowing the facts and based on personal taste, preferences or dislike just caught by the ear. This can hardly be stimulating for any editor spending much time and efforts to explore Bruckner's manuscripts in all their detailing. There is always that basic discrepancy between scholarly craftsmanship and unprofessional critical attitude.

Bruckner's illness

Another controversy refers to Bruckner's alleged inadequate physical and (even more important) mental capacity to complete the Symphony. It wrongly suggests that he was not up to the task of composing a Finale of this magnitude and that the fragmented music that survived was the creation of a more or less mentally disabled man or, at least, a composer who had lost track at the end.

In or out of this context, there was the kind of « catastrophist thinking » in the early 1980's based on the assumption that Bruckner had lost his faith from 1892 onwards. The musicologist Harry Halbreich, supported by his colleague Paul-Gilbert Langevin, assumed that Bruckner's almost daily prayer entries already broke-off in 1892, suggesting that Bruckner had lost his faith and, consequentially, his main incentive to complete the Finale. Whatever it was worth, it became a non-issue anyway when, a decade later, Elisabeth Maier of the « International Bruckner Institute » , in Linz, revealed that, at least, a portion of Bruckner's prayer entries had been recovered, including those which Bruckner had written down after 1892, and even on the day before his death.

In March 1890, nearly 2½ years after he had started to compose the 9th, and 5 years before he took-up the Finale, Bruckner's doctors diagnosed chronic throat and larynx catarrh together with severe symptoms of nervousness. On 1 July 1892, arterial sclerosis, hepatitis and diabetes were diagnosed (the latter factually a death sentence) . In January or February 1893, Bruckner suffered from dropsy while working on the Scherzo movement, but, after instant surgery, his condition quickly improved. Nevertheless, his general physical condition remained to be so worrisome that, on 24 March 1894, the last sacraments were administered. He gradually recovered, but the planned reception to mark his birthday, on 4 September 1894 in Steyer, had to be cancelled.

After having completed the Adagio (which took him great pains and effort) , on 30 November 1894, he fell seriously ill again and, on 9 December, last sacraments were administered for the 2nd time. At Christmas, he was able to play on the organ in the monastery of Klosterneuburg, but, on his way back to Vienna, he suffered a pleurisy attack again, fulminating into pneumonia the very next month. The resulting shortness of breath made it impossible to ascend the stairs of the « Wohnhaus » 4 floor apartment building at Number 7 « Heßgasse », at the corner of « Schottenring » (Number 5) , in Vienna. In February, Anton Meißner (pupil and private secretary of Bruckner) asked the Count (Prince) Liechtenstein to provide new quarters without stairs for his Master. On 4 July 1895, Bruckner moved to the « Kustodenstöckl » lodge at the Belvedere Palace, where he would remain until his death.

Almost exactly 1 year later, on 9 July 1896, he had to face another attack of pneumonia and, on 17 July, the last sacraments were administered for the 3rd time, but his recoup was amazing again. However, his prayer entries, from early July onwards, show signs of confusion and difficulty in keeping track of days and dates, relieved by clear moments. In August (the last date in the score of the Finale is 11 August) , mental degradation was noted and, in September, Josef Schalk wrote to his brother Franz that Bruckner's spirit had left him and that he got more and more under the spell of religious delusions.

Between start and finish

Nothing is final unless the composer has decided so. Bruckner's 9th does not contain his final musical signature and it remains far from clear whether he was ultimately satisfied with the music he had put to paper.

Then, there the moral issue might be raised, in the sense that we should not touch a work heavily interrupted by sickness and, finally, stopped by death. It was not completed, Bruckner might have severely encroached it later on (although he did not so with the 5th, 6th and 7th) , or might even have drastically changed the overall concept he originally had in his mind (very unlikely) , provided he would have lived long enough.

The musicologists Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and John Alan Phillips have strongly argued that straight from the very beginning, Bruckner maintained a broad perspective of the schematic form, with less focus on the material that needed to be supplemented later. From the outset, he drafted all elements on basis of the conceptual form he already had clearly in his mind, and their individual position in the score in coherence with both the preceding and subsequent sections as well as the overall structure of the work. In later revisions, small or large, it therefore sufficed to enter just symbols or markings, in shorthand. This methodology reveals, indeed, that he had a very clear picture of the work's architecture as a whole. In short, Bruckner knew what he was heading for, although all his manuscripts show that he did not have Mozart's congenial ability just to write down what he had in mind, without much alteration. Bruckner's manuscripts commonly betray (like for instance Beethoven's) a long and difficult struggle.

Whatever the arguments pro or contra reconstructing an unfinished, fragmented musical score, the bare fact is and remains that professional, meticulous and foremost respectful, musicological approach may produce stunning results. And let us be fair : no one can work on such a painstakingly prepared project, which involves many years of intensive labour at high cost, without great love for Bruckner's music.

Bruckner's methodology

Let us look at Bruckner's methodology before further discussing the torso of the Finale :

Example A

Sketch in particello (3 to 4 staves) , ongoing musical argumentation, partially scarcely readable (thin and fleeting writing) .

Example B

Fully written-out score in bi-folio (or « Bogen ») , notation on staves, with, on each page, prefixed entries for the instruments from top to bottom in the correct order, together with keys, time and (also fixed) 4 bar lines (mostly prepared by his pupil and « secretary » Anton Meißner) , successively and continuously numbered. Clarinets notated in B-flat and horns and trumpets in F.

Example C

As above, but only containing the principal elements (strings, important woodwind and brass entries, often in pencil to facilitate later erasure and subsequent overwriting in ink) .

Example D

Continuity drafts (« Satzverlaufsentwürfe ») in rudimentary design (Bruckner also entered single melodic lines, mostly the violin part, into the full-score formatted sheets at hand) .

Examples E and F

Dates in the manuscripts in Bruckner's hand-writing help to determine the genesis and progression of the composition.

The final stage contained polishing such as phrasing, articulation, dynamics and last changes.

These were the basics of Bruckner's workmanship from the 8th Symphony onwards, with a variety of overlaps when the composer worked his way through from section to section, designing further particello sketches and exchanging bi-folios or sheets.

The scoring in the 2nd stage comprised subsequent bi-folios (double folded sheets) with the 1st page consecutively numbered in the upper-right corner. Meißner had prepared these pages with bar lines, indication of instruments, keys and clefs so that the composer could write down the notes instantly. When working on substantial revisions, the existing bi-folios were simply replaced by new ones. Clean score sheets were used when existing sheets had been severely compromised by heavy corrections. In many cases, no distinction can be made between completed sketches and final notation (« Reinschrift ») . Phillips adequately characterised the numbered score pages (including the continuity drafts) in their final, although incomplete shape as an « emerging autograph score » .

Deciphering Bruckner's sketch material is hampered by the quality of the paper and the use of glue and ink. Also, many sketches are scribbled with light pencil strokes or the hand-writing obscured by the composer's unsteady physical condition. Nevertheless it is astounding that age, severe health problems and consequentially his physical weakness did not affect Bruckner's capacity to design long stretches in an accurate and secure fashion. Philological investigation revealed that even his serious pneumonia in July 1896 did not deprive him of his abilities, and at least a few months prior to his death he was at intervals still able to demonstrate all his skills as a composer. His strict and straightforward working methods did not leave him until the final moment that he was no longer able to work.

Presenting a reconstruction of Bruckner's swan song is one thing, but adequately documenting it, quite another. John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs have repeatedly emphasised the importance of proper annotations on the nature and the results of all relevant philological endeavours. The proof is not in eating the pudding (hearing the music) , but in disclosing the exact course and particulars of the reconstruction project. Apart from that : no one is able to express meaningful criticism or make relevant observations without a solid basis 1st. In the same sense, it is imperative that the facts are available to anyone who is interested, and that the Brucknerian knows exactly to whom this music really belongs, apart from the equally important question whether the direction it takes in conformity with the composer's intentions.

Phillips ascertained that, for the Finale, Bruckner used a variety of 6 different types and formats of paper, but mainly the upper-right format with 24 systems from his publisher Josef Eberle, in Vienna (' JE & Co. , No 8. /24 linig ') . By verifying these papers with the composer's entries, it was fairly easy to establish which papers had been taken 1st (and last !) from the pile. Incidental inconsistencies in Anton Meißner's prefixes on the score sheets he had prepared for his Master, and the use of different paper do not resemble different versions Bruckner was working on (Alfred Orel was definitely wrong here) . On the contrary, also these various paper types appeared to be an important factor in determining Bruckner's genesis and chronology of composition.

Bruckner's remark on a calendar shows that he started working on the Finale on 24 May 1895. It had been a long way, from the 1st ideas written down for the opening movement of the Symphony, on 12 August 1887 ; 2 days after the completion of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony in C minor. In October, he got the news that not only the Jewish conductor Hermann Levi but also the 2 Schalk brothers had rejected it, which led to a deep mental crisis and, subsequently, to the 2nd version of the work. He also undertook revisions on his 1st, 3rd and 4th Symphonies, at the same time, continuing to work on the 9th. New works were also composed : « Helgoland » , « Psalm 150 » , « Das deutsche Lied » , « Träumen und Wachen » and « Vexilla Regis » .

The 1st movement of the 9th Symphony was completed on 23 December 1893, the beginning of which must have commenced in an early stage in full-score already. The exposition part was repeatedly redesigned as the composition process progressed. Bruckner finished the Scherzo with the final (3rd) Trio, on 15 February 1894, and the Adagio (which took him great pains and effort) , on 30 November.

24 May 1895 : Start of composition.

8 June 1895 : Sketches in particello of the 1st part (exposition) of the Finale, quickly followed by further detailing and working on the score (sheet 1A) .

Autumn 1895 : 2nd part up to the beginning of the fugue and completion of the instrumentation of the 1st part (exposition) , including rewriting of specific heavily over-written and adhered sheets. There are indications that Bruckner decided, at this point, to introduce the idea of the fugue, as preliminary sketches of the 2nd part consist of a set of variations on the main thematic motives in its reverse scheme, clearly leading to a non fugato reprise. In the composition process, the 2nd part was finally remoulded, with the fugue concept established. The final scoring extended to the very beginning of the fugue (date in the score on bi-folio 17 : 12 December 1895) .

16 December 1895 : Most probably the beginning of the 3rd stage, with drafting the fugue and its progression (the date is mentioned in the score in Bruckner's hand-writing) . At this time, Bruckner also decided to introduce a new epilogue theme of the fugue and chorale recapitulation, including the significant triplets from the main theme of the 1st movement. The work process was maintained until early summer of 1896, with the entire 2nd part scored for strings, and incidental markings for the wind instruments. Sketches for the Coda date from 18 to 23 May, corresponding with the statement of Franz Bayer, one of Bruckner's friends, in the « Steyrer Zeitung » that the composer had (just) completed the sketch of the 9th's Finale (10 May 1896) .

May and June 1896 : Final instrumentation and new parts of the exposition. At that stage, he had already reached the Coda, but sadly much of it got lost. Drafting part of the Coda and final cadenza : (Tuesday) 19, (Thursday) 21, (Friday) 22, (Saturday) 23 (this corresponds with May 1896) . Bruckner returned to the beginning of the movement, presumably wrote a clean 1st bi-folio and divided the contents of the 2nd bi-folio into 2 new bi-folios, renumbering all subsequent bi-folios by one higher. Further detailing of the instrumentation must have begun soon, thereafter, revising the development section (date : 14 June 1896) .

July 1896 : Although Bruckner recovered from his pneumonia and as from mid-July started to compose again, it is quite unlikely that he felt vigorous enough to work consistently from mid July onwards. However, the last date in the manuscript, 11 August, marks a very convincing extension of the beginning of the development section on 2 bi-folios ; the 1st numbered « 13a » by Bruckner, the continuing one, yet unnumbered.

It is likely that Bruckner finished the primary stage of the instrumentation in this period, with the main strings, woodwinds and brass lines noted down in his customary short hand-writing. We can distil this from the available bi-folios (including the continuity drafts or « Satzverlaufsentwürfe ») and his method of transferring the sketches directly to the score.

At the time of Bruckner's death, a total number of at least 40 bi-folios containing more than 600 bars of music, must have existed. Both the exposition and large portions of the development section had been fully completed.

Bruckner completed 206 (208) fully instrumented bars and 224 bars with strings and short-hand notes for woodwinds and brass. Furthermore, we have continuity drafts (« Satzverlaufsentwürfe ») of 122 bars. No such sketches survived of 111 bars, thus the music needed to be construed from both original (68 bars, by sequence, transposition, 1:1 repetition and adaptation) and free material (43 bars) , all together about 17 % of the Finale, or about 4 minutes of music. This all makes a total of 663 plus 2 optional bars.

The Fac-simile Edition also offers the closest approach to Bruckner's overall concept of the Finale, and although they are his « last words » on paper, we need to realise that they reflect his work in progress without the possibility to conclude it. Nothing in there can, therefore, be considered as final, not even the fully scored and instrumented portions, with passages either boldly over-written or cut, pasted and glued. Thus, we will never be able to grasp whether he had later on revised the Finale, or even the entire work, more or less. We deal with what is left, and it is of no use whatsoever to start speculating about what is not there. However, one should consider that already the surviving material contains numerous revisions and working phases, for instance, the 1st theme group survived in, at least, 6 different phases. Hence, it seems to be appropriate to assume that Bruckner, at least, came to a more or less « final » structure of the piece as such.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and Nicola Samale give a full outline of their considerations and decisions in their Main Features of the New Edition by Samale and Cohrs (SC 2004) , with the inclusion of tempi, instrumentation, dynamics, phrasing and articulation.

The William Carragan version

Although the American musicologist William Carragan had met Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in 1985, and John Alan Phillips, in 1996, he preferred to work on his own, saying that his decisions would be his own, and that he preferred not to share his responsibilities.

Carragan conceived his version of the Finale in 1979, and orchestrated it in 1983, with a minor revision in 1985. The premiere took place in New York's Carnegie Hall, on 8 January 1984, conducted by Moshe Atzmon. The European premiere was launched in April 1985, in Utrecht, Netherlands, by the Utrecht Symphony Orchestra conducted by Hubert Soudant. In 1986, the Symphony was performed at Saint-Florian, bringing this music almost symbolically back home.

After its New York premiere, Carragan's edition carried great impact in all main musical circles, and it put the Finale as a performing version, for the 1st time, on the map (although Ernst Märzendorfer had performed his edition of 670 bars already, in 1969) . This even accelerated after the 1st recording was released, in 1985, on the « Chandos » label (CD : 7051-2) with the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Yoav Talmi.

Carragan's completion was also highly-admired by reputed Bruckner scholars such as Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt and Alan Crawford Howie (UK) and Dermot Gault (Ireland) , but not everyone was enthusiastic. After the release of that recording, the well-known music-critic Dietmar Holland questioned in the « Neue Musik Zeitschrift » (on May 1987) the real benefit of hearing Bruckner's sketched music without the presentation of any critical annotation by Carragan, whereas the original sources were not accessible, at that time. He also noted :

William Carragan definitely presented his work as a completed version and not as a reconstruction, for performance purposes. He had studied the manuscripts in Vienna, had photographs of inaccessible parts at his disposal, and was (while working his way through the manuscripts) able to correct most of the errors in the Alfred Orel Edition and beyond.

There were discussions along the road, and particularly in Europe, about Carragan's rather flexible approach to the original score by introducing bars of his own, and, most of all, his long insertion connecting the Finale's 2nd and 3rd theme groups in the recapitulation that also marks the point where he brings back the theme of the Adagio. He was, of course, aware of the problem, at that time, but he felt he needed that insertion for structural reasons, longer than the 16 measures for which the numbering seemed to provide. Before applying the 16 measure strait jacket instead, he needed to be really sure that the numbering was correct and contemporaneous. At that time, Carragan assessed the available sources, and noticed that the numbers on many of the source's bi-folios were heavily over-written and the actual numbers themselves were highly-debatable over a wide range. Also, many of the early numbers and, perhaps, some of the later ones too, appeared not to be contemporaneous. However, he may not have realized that Bruckner simply used mainly discarded bi-folios as sketch paper, sometimes including the continuity of more than 1 bi-folio. It might also have helped when he would have used Bruckner's own metric figures.

He filled the gaps in the « Gesangperiode » (Song period) with only 8 bars, and, at the end of the exposition section, he entered 8 bars into the last preserved bi-folio 12C (pages 205-208 in the Fac-simile Edition) originating from Bruckner's later adaptation, adding to this the last 6 bars of 12C. He introduced 50 bars of his own at the end of the reprise of the « Gesangperiode » , from bar 481, although only 1 sheet appeared to be missing. These 50 bars were based on Bruckner's own material from the exposition section, but they simply did not sit well in their new frame.

Carragan also entered 143 bars (although partially based on Bruckner's material) to bring the Symphony to an aurally convincing end, but over-looking that his predecessor, Alfred Orel, had erroneously defined a bi-folio as « 21. Bg. E » , which was, in fact, part of the chorale reprise, with bi-folio 31 (16 bars) just missing. Carragan also used bi-folio 32 in his Edition's Coda (bar 673-688) , although it was not part of the choral reprise. However, he was the 1st musicologist to recognise the importance of the particello drafts of the Coda.

So, all in all, William Carragan's Edition sounds quite impressive, although it contained about 230 bars of his own, and, paradoxically, without utilising all of the substantial material Bruckner had left. It proved to be a hallmark leaving a great impression on the audience. In this respect, I only recall the performances in the Netherlands, on 14 April 1985 (Amsterdam, « Concertgebouw ») ; 16 April 1985 (Utrecht, Vredenburg) ; and 26-31 January 1987 (Hilversum, radio studio).

Leopold Nowak legacy

In May, 1991, not until shortly before his death, Leopold Nowak, the great and leading spirit behind the « Kritische Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » , since 1946, after he had taken-over Robert Haas' position as director of the precious music collection of the Austrian National Library, entrusted the Australian musicologist John Alan Phillips with editing Bruckner's 9th and, particularly, the Finale fragment, in order to have it officially published as part of the « Gesamtausgabe » . This was a critical decision for Leopold Nowak, as he was always far from being convinced of reconstructing and publishing the basically fragmented Finale. And the more so as Leopold Nowak, compared to Robert Haas, had, through the years, demonstrated a more critical and scientifically attitude to examining and editing Bruckner's creative output (Leopold Nowak is also the author of various essays on Bruckner's music) .

In the wake of his death, Leopold Nowak (Herbert Vogg would be his successor) had seriously reconsidered his long-standing resentments, he had made his checks and balances and he decided that John Alan Phillips should now go on with the project of the 9th, but to withhold publication until after still missing parts had been traced.

That was Leopold Nowak's basic idea, Phillips to take-up the task of revising and Alfred Orel's sketches and drafts for the 9th (1934) and not the corrected 1951 reprint, a project that Nowak had originally planned until after finalising the « Kritische Gesamtausgabe » (Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs would prepare a new annotated edition of the 1st 3 movements) . The final outcome should be in line with Nowak's principal goal that all of Bruckner's compositions be made available in transparent and reliable musical editions. The accompanying critical reports were to be scientific but, nevertheless, comprehensive and suitable and attainable for use in musical practice.

John Alan Phillips

John Alan Phillips was not the 1st scholar after Alfred Orel to take-up the Finale fragment : Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca started already their own courageous project, in 1983, at the time that the subject was still under strong taboo, and like Phillips, also in a profound manner.

From the outset, it was clear to him that, even without Bruckner's dedication to « the dear Lord » , the work contains the religious semantics, which creates the music's transcendental atmosphere and evokes the metaphysical tendency, in most if not all interpretations. Apart from formal and hermeneutic considerations, the term « absolute music » fails to comply with what this Symphony is really all about.

It became also clear to Phillips that the overall structural coherence of the Finale fragment was not in question and that its specific elements were based on virtually the same melodic and structural components as in Bruckner's last choral works (« Psalm 150 » , « Vexilla Regis » , « Das deutsche Lied » and « Helgoland ») , and (most important) in the preceding 3 movements of the 9th. This Symphony offers a striking resemblance with the 5th, both heading toward a huge Finale, which combines Sonata, Fugue and choral forms. The 9th's Finale (and this can be unquestionably distilled from the fragments) delivers at last (sec) the full structural stability for the entire work, radically and profoundly, its melodic and harmonic ambiguities coming close to a purgatory, and even more so after the Adagio with its « farewell » mystifications (another good reason to abandon the « workshop model » with the Finale performed as a solitary entity) .

According to Phillips, the reconstruction of the Finale was less a matter of dabble scholarship and more a question of practical implementation, i.e. , performing the music, at the same time offering new knowledge to anyone willing to listen and to appreciate a Masterwork that was obscured and kept from the public domain for almost a Century. This goes beyond the debate whether it was justifiable to take-up a work that was left uncompleted. In this particular case, Bruckner did not leave some fragments or sketches, but a work in progress containing long stretches in clearly defined form, partly even scored for instruments, with consecutive page numbering and even clear markings in the composer's hand-writing that specific parts in the manuscript were considered finished (« fertig ») . Obvious errors could be substituted by sketch material (also for the Coda) or previously completed parts, and all within the discourse and to the benefit of the ongoing musical argument. Frankly, this was already the result of the work by Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca, as given in their Critical Annotations to the « Ricostruzione Edition » , published by Ricordi, in 1986.

John Alan Phillips edited the following volumes (some are still under preparation, in particular a text book on the Finale and new transcriptions of the surviving sketches, drafts and discarded score bi-folios of the 1st and 3rd movements) :

Fac-simile Edition of Bruckner's full autograph, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna, 1996 (ISMN M-50025-133-0) .

Reconstruction of the autograph score, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna, 1994-1999 (ISMN M-50025-211-5) .

John Alan Phillips' documentary work was solely based on what Bruckner had left and, as far as it could be deciphered and interpreted, with no additions of its own, accompanied by extensive commentary. Missing pages remained blank in Phillips' Edition, the composition material gets thinner as the music progresses through the recapitulation section. Phillips also included the drafts for the Coda.

It got its 1st public performance, in November 1999, by the Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Nikolaus Harnoncourt, creating a sensation in musical circles and beyond, but the inevitable gaps disrupted the musical argument, in short, it had all the virtues and disadvantages of a typical « workshop » version (526 bars or about 18 minutes of fragmented music) . It is a pity only that Harnoncourt did not perform the Coda sketches (they were only included in the 1st complete performance of the « Documentation » by the « Philharmonia Hungarica » , conducted by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in April 2001, in Düsseldorf) .

The 1st recording on « RCA/BMG » label (82876 54332-2) of this Finale fragment was made at the Salzburg Festival, in August 2002, performed by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Harnoncourt, who also acted as the witty narrator during the workshop session. After the interval the familiar 3 movement version was performed, in the « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») prepared by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca

This « completion project » originally started in 1983, initiated by the Italian composer and conductor Nicola Samale, inspired by his French colleague and music-critic Paul-Gilbert Langevin.

From the very beginning, Samale worked together with the composer Giuseppe Mazzuca. In 1984, they studied Bruckner's manuscripts at the Austrian National Library, in Vienna, whereas Samale also got hold of the photographs of the sketch material, which had been transferred, in 1941, from the Prussian State Library to Silezia and finally rediscovered, in 1976, in the Jagiellonska Library, in Cracow. Their efforts finally led to the critically annotated « Ricostruzione Edition » (1985) , performing version (after William Carragan's although Completed Version) on the subject, published by Ricordi, in 1986 (Leopold Nowak had refused its publication as part of the « Kritische Gesamtausgabe » due to the individual additions to Bruckner's manuscripts for performance purposes) , and subsequently recorded by Elisha Inbal, in 1987, for « Teldec » (4509-91446-2) and Gennadi Rozjdestvenski, in 1988, for « Melodyia » (Japan BMG BVCX38015/16) .

Notwithstanding Leopold Nowak's refusal, it cannot be denied that Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca had executed their job very seriously. Samale punctually calligraphed the score in accordance with the original manuscript (including Bruckner's own page numbering and metric figures) and clearly separated the original text from the additions by use of different font sizes. One of the new edition's great virtues was the correction of many of Alfred Orel's mistakes. What was missing in the lost manuscript sheets had been cautiously supplemented with original parts from the material that Bruckner had previously considered but finally rejected, supplemented with « raw material » such as sketches and drafts that were available.

Critics did not render the Samale-Mazzuca Edition a warm welcome, as they were focusing on the imaginative solutions the team had adopted, just prior to the Coda, culminating in integrating and processing the main themes of all 4 movements, followed by the famous chorale theme and merging into a cadenza composed by Nicola Samale with the subsequent apotheosis on an ostinato model in D, being critically also on incidentally unstylish instrumentation, the unsatisfying ending (instead of a brilliant D major in the empty D minor quint D-A) and spurs of other unidiomatic solutions. However, the greatest asset of the new Edition was the kind of « pull-down menu » it offered, the Finale's 1st ever full panorama in a performing version that kept the additions (although unmistakably present) to a minimum, with the detailed critical annotations presented by the team.

Continuation without Giuseppe Mazzuca

In the next stage, from 1986 to 1989, when Giuseppe Mazzuca had lost interest in continuing the project, Nicola Samale was joined by the Bremen based conductor, musicologist and essayist Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, which led to 2 intermediate versions of the score. Their edition was also taken to the Netherlands, where it was performed on 2 and 3 September 1987, by the Dutch Radio Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Hubert Soudant, and broadcast on 6th September 1988.

There is also a live recording from a concert by the Polish National Radio Orchestra in Katowice, on 8 October 1988, conducted by Nicola Samale, and prepared with Cohrs' conducting assistance (« Melodram », CD : MEL 989/1-2) .

As we saw before, Leopold Nowak had assigned John Alan Phillips, in May 1991, with editing Bruckner's 9th and, particularly, the Finale fragment anew, in order to have it officially published as part of this « Gesamtausgabe » .

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs had introduced John Alan Phillips to Nicola Samale, in the early 1990's already and, in collaboration with Samale, and later also consulting Cohrs, Phillips conceived a new score, typeset it on his computer and finally published it in Adelaide (his home-town) and Bremen (Cohrs' home-town) , in 1992, in a private impression. This Edition became known as the « Completed Performing Version Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca » or (abbreviated) the « SPCM » version, which had nothing to do with Phillips' Edition of the fragments only, a workshop version for the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , in Vienna. The « SPCM » score appeared in Phillips' exclusive editorship merely for copyright reasons (the Samale-Mazzuca version was still under Ricordi's copyright regime, at that time, while the publisher was not interested in the « SPCM » score) .

The long title was adopted to give proper credit to the commitment of all the persons involved in the entire project, from its very beginning. The 1991 score (recorded in 1993 by the Bruckner Orchestra in Linz conducted by Kurt Eichhorn on the Japanese « Camerata » label (30CM 275-6) was subjected to a few minor revisions by Phillips, 2 of them suggested by Cohrs, in 1996, and was recorded again in 1998 (a live recording by the New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia conducted by Johannes Wildner on the « Naxos » label (2CD : 8.555933-34) . The differences between the 1991 and 1996 editions are very minor indeed. This performing version remained valid until 2004.

The New Critical Edition by Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (2005)

Already before 1996, both Cohrs and Samale felt uncomfortable with several passages in the completion and hence they both started a new debate of how to proceed. At that time, Cohrs also started his extensive philological work on the 9th in order to prepare his Critical Report and « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the 1st 3 movements for the Complete Critical Bruckner Edition. He tried out various changes when he had the chance to conduct the piece himself, in Tokyo (2001) and Gmunden (2002) .

Finally, in 2003, Samale and Cohrs asked Phillips to join them in order to prepare an entirely new version of the « Performing Edition » . However, Phillips showed no further interest in a collaboration and thus Cohrs and Samale prepared their own new edition of the « Finale Completion » , published in 2005 by « Musikproduktion Jürgen Höflich » , in Munich, as « Completed Performing Version Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazucca » (1983-1991) : « New Critical Edition » (1996-2004) by Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. It included also, for the very 1st time, a full Critical Commentary in both German and English.

The « New Critical Edition » also contains the replenishment with material from Bruckner's own sketches that solves 2 major gaps in the 2nd theme and the fugue.

Cohrs :

« The reconstruction of lost score bi-folios, the overall instrumentation, the elaboration of the Coda (again, largely recovered from Bruckner's own sketches) , tempi, dynamics and articulation were likewise thoroughly revised. 554 of the 665 bars of this “ New Critical Edition ” are original (208 bars finished, 224 bars incomplete scoring, 122 bars of continuity drafts and drafts) . From 111 bars of replenishment (circa 17 % of the Finale, 5.4 % of the Symphony, or approximately 4 minutes of music) , 68 were regained by repetition, sequencing, or transposition of original material. Only 43 bars were synthesised without concrete proof, less than 2/3 of the instrumentation required completion by the editors. »

The premiere took place in Fulham Town Hall, in Fulham, London, on 3 December 2005 by the Fulham Symphony Orchestra conducted by Marc Dooley.

It is fascinating to experience that Cohrs, who, like Phillips, had worked on Bruckner's 9th and its sources for many years, found a compelling argument for producing a new score on basis of new manuscript research and some surprise findings, one of these relating to dynamic and agogic detailing, which Bruckner habitually reserved until after completion of the entire work.

Various stages of the « SPCM » version

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) was already in his 40's when he composed his 1st « official » Symphony. Still about 30 years were in front of him. One of his greatest tragedies was that he was led to believe that his Symphonies needed « improvement » . His work was his life and, despite some victories, it was vehemently marginalised. He faced one of the severest crises, after having composed the 8th Symphony. He plagued himself in these many years with revisions, and major part of his Symphonic output appears to us as « work in progress » (he took-up the revision of his 1st Symphony as far as in 1891, 25 years after its genesis) .

We also see various phases in the reconstruction of the Finale of the 9th by Phillips, Samale, Cohrs and Mazzuca : no less than 4 phases can be ascertained so far, the most recent one already mentioned, the Completed Performing Version Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (1983-1991) : « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») (1996-2004) by Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

To some, this may create additional doubts about the Finale's musical viability in its reconstructive appearance, not quite appreciating that new insights, anecdotes and papers (like a previously unknown sketch paper from June 1895, which was found, in 2003, in the Estate of a Munich music-critic) and a healthy dosis of rethinking and « scholar investment » may direct to specific improvements. It cannot be over-looked that the continuous provisional status of the reconstruction work could degrade either its importance or its values in certain musical circles, but it adorns musicologists who are anxious to partially « overrule » their own previous version(s) , in order to make it (even) better. It reveals the kind of flexibility and zest needed as an important contributing factor to get an even more compelling result.

Fact is and remains that the Finale's material was not treated with utmost care after Bruckner's death and that the truncated, 3 movement form quickly gained momentum as a falsely accepted doctrine ruled by tradition, ignorance and indifference. Time has proven that it took enormous effort to get the 4 movement Symphony really performed. Even today, most « star conductors » are not willing to go beyond the lines of tradition. Maybe, they are, through the years, encapsulated in the Bruckner « clichés » and not able to adhere to Bruckner's unexpected boldness of composition in the Finale, or they have other doubts. Even in this domain, there is still a lot of work in progress ... and to do.

The Workshop Model

Conductors have different choices in performing the 9th : either the 3 movement or the 4 movement version, or the « Te Deum » as the apotheosis, or the reconstructed Finale as a separate entity in the kind of workshop environment (as presented by Nikolaus Harnoncourt) .

In Bruckner's lifetime, major part of his music was rejected as being « unplayable » . Harnoncourt and the Orchestra had virtually the same feeling when faced with the Finale in the John Alan Phillips Edition, for the very 1st time. When they had to play the music from the score for the 1st time, their basic feeling was :

« Something like this cannot be played. »

The 4th movement was new, carried no performance tradition, appeared bold and unpolished to them. Without defending all these encroaches in the very past, there is, at least, some notion of the reasons why Bruckner's music was found unplayable. It also explains why Bruckner revised his original concept thoroughly and vehemently, in order to get his work performed.

Bruckner compromised on the performance of his own work just by saying :

« Make the changes you like, as long as you perform it. »

However, he knew exactly what he was doing, he did not compromise on his scores when he said :

« I shall bequeath my manuscripts to the Court Library in the state as I composed. »

Appreciating that the 9th's Finale is the innovative « enfant terrible » in Bruckner's entire output and that it will take time to accept it at length, as part of the performance tradition, it is understandable that the workshop model is currently opted for, although it does not stimulate the understanding and appreciation of the Finale as the inseparable part of the 4 movement entity.

Conductors should also have a clear understanding of what the Finale is all about. For example, Riccardo Chailly, one of the few well-established Bruckner conductors, missed the point completely when he said :

« I've studied the Finale indeed and I have spoken to Mister Samale, who showed me the sketches. I have the score of the Finale. I intended to perform it once but then I changed my mind. I do feel that the Finale is a very interesting issue if it is played completely separately from the Symphony. If it's taken as a workshop concert, I could see the point ; but to try to sell it as the Finale of the Symphony, linked to the rest of the piece, I think is really not right. Samale showed me. The sketches are like playing cards, pages without numeration where you do not see any order and not any feeling of shape of the composition. There's also the discrepancy of the quality of music. What can you say at the end of the Adagio ? The quality of the music is so incredibly high ; then, you go back to a kind of sketchy, scholastic, almost rhetoric piece. It's my idea that it should be done in the morning of an evening concert. You do a workshop of 1 hour about the Finale, explaining the piece and, in the evening, you perform the Symphony in 3 movements. That, to me, is the only possibility. I think that Giuseppe Mazzuca and Nicola Samale did a very good job, and I admire their belief in what they did, because they have been very honest and very scrupulous. But that does not mean that the piece should be done with the rest of the Symphony. »

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs responded :

« Regarding Bruckner's Unfinished Finale, I should add that Mæstro Chailly was wrong in his memory, since I know from my friend and colleague Nicola Samale about their conversation in detail. Chailly mentioned " sketches like playing cards " ; in fact, this refers to a set of 13 x 20 centimeter photographs of the Cracow sketches to the entire 9th, which Samale took from the Microfilm for his studying purposes. These photos include only one sketch page for the Finale. In fact, the new philological research shows clearly, that the Finale material consists : a) of various particello sketches and drafts ; b) several rejected score bi-folios, and ; c) the subsequently numbered, valid score bi-folios of the emerging autograph score. Several of the valid score bi-folios, however, were stolen by souvenir hunters from Bruckner's dying bedroom. It was possible to reconstruct what remained from the Finale's autograph score on a solid philological fundament. The incomplete autograph score (not the sketches !!!) today breaks-off after circa 562 measures, shortly before the Coda, which survives in at least further 56 measures, including the final cadenza going back into the tonic. From the manuscript, it is evident that Bruckner must have completed the entire score at least in strings some time before his death ; also, the exposition (13 score bi-folios) must have been ready in full instrumentation. Several of the final, valid score bi-folios are lost today, most likely also including the very end of the movement, which was originally circa 700 measures long. Therefore, Mæstro Chailly is simply wrong where he states that the Finale consists of “ pages without numeration where you do not see any order and not any feeling of shape of the composition ”. »

Of course, it is always an easy ride for any conductor to perform the 3 movement version for an audience feeling quite comfortable with about 60 minutes of music, and, surely, when it concerns Bruckner's swan song. On top of that, the last notes of the Adagio and the subsequent almost sanctuary silence make the flesh creep. The real Finale as it now stands in front of us does not need emphatic pleas but its greatness simply speaks for itself. A workshop environment cannot do full justice to this phenomenon and should only be considered in view of the musicians and audiences getting accustomed to Bruckner's bold and unpolished concept.

The Bruckner Estate

Bruckner died on Sunday 11 October 1896, in the afternoon. The next day, his lawyer, Doctor Theodor Reisch, arrived at Bruckner's home in the Belvedere lodge, and ordered in his capacity of executor of the Last Will that all books and manuscripts be secured and sealed to prevent arbitrary circulation. Physician Richard Heller recalls :

« The poor man had scarcely closed his eyes, as the authorised and unauthorised fell upon his Estate like vultures. »

However, it took a further 5 days to draft an Estate report and to deliver, at least, part of the manuscripts to Reisch. All other objects were stored in a wall cabinet and sealed. Today, there is still no exact inventory description available.

In contrast with preliminary drafts and sketches of previous works, the compositional history of Bruckner's last Symphony happens to be well-documented by drafts and, in part, already fully scored fragments. The composer simply did not live long enough to destroy what he considered no longer needed ! Almost no sketch material survives of most of the Symphonies, only a couple of discarded bi-folios and pages. We have only extant, huge materials of the 8th and 9th Symphonies. However, it may be possible that, already in Bruckner's lifetime, he gave away discarded material for the 9th's Finale, at least, in one case : the 4 discarded score bi-folios found in the Estate of pianist Cyrill Hynais, one of Bruckner's former pupils.

The executor failed to hold the Estate together until all matters were properly settled. Only the scores of main works, which Bruckner had bequeathed to the Court Library in Vienna went there straight away. As a consequence, acquaintances, friends and societies got their share in this « equation at random » .

Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe got the opportunity to verify the manuscripts and other papers that Bruckner had left, and they decided that the less important relics (including books) were transferred to Bruckner's sister, Rosalie Hueber in « Vöcklabruck » (they were later acquired by Max Auer) . In 1902, a small case also containing part of Bruckner's correspondence was delivered to Bruckner's 1st biographer, August Göllerich, in Linz. He would return it after use to the Saint-Florian monastery.

Bruckner had already been through all the paper piles, at the time, that he was changing quarters, from the « Wohnhaus » 4 floor apartment building at Number 7 « Heßgasse », at the corner of « Schottenring » (Number 5) , to the Belvedere lodge. He ordered Anton Meißner to throw all the « superfluous » papers into the open fire, a rigorous act mainly affecting his early manuscripts. It is the customary act by people when moving to other premises, to get rid of each and everything that is no longer valuable, just to minimise the hassle of toil and moil. It appears that Anton Meißner kept a part to himself and gave away various manuscripts after Bruckner's death.

On 18 October 1896, Josef Schalk obtained in concert with Doctor Theodor Reisch' equation protocol what was left of the manuscripts of the Finale of the 9th to study their context. All other scores, drafts and sketches were, as far as they had not « disappeared » or given to other people, transferred to the Court Library in Vienna (currently the Austrian National Library) , all in accordance with Bruckner's Last Will.

After Josef Schalk's death, on 7 November 1900, the Finale's manuscripts went to his brother Franz. In 1911 they were lent to Max Auer for analysis. In 1914, 4 score bi-folios were transferred from pianist Cyrill Hynais to the Vienna City and State Library and classified as such, on 14 April 1915. Another bi-folio, also in private hands, was handed to the Music Academy in Vienna, in 1916.

In « Bruckner. Versuch eines Lebens » (Berlin, 1919) by Ernst Décey, also one of Bruckner's former pupils, a total number of 75 bi-folios of the Finale is mentioned for the 1st time. In 1927, Amalie Löwe, the widow of Ferdinand (he had died on 6 January 1925) , and Rosalie Hueber (Bruckner's sister) sold a number of manuscript pages of the 9th to the Vienna City and State Library. It was in the same year that the « Anton Bruckner Gesellschaft » was established. In 1933, followed another sale by Amalie Löwe, this time to the Prussian State Library, in Berlin, and, in 1939, by Lili Schalk, the widow of Franz, to the Austrian National Library.

Due to the pressing War situation, in 1941, the archives of the Prussian State Library were moved to Grussau, in Silezia, and sketch material of the Finale was « rediscovered » in 1976, in the Jagiellonska Library in Cracow.

Despite the various transfers of manuscripts from private sources to libraries, there were and are still parts missing. They may circulate and kept in private circles, or may have finally disappeared, in the course of time. In January 1966, the Austrian National Library obtained a bi-folio of the Finale from the Estate of Richard Strauß. In 1971, another bi-folio was transferred to the Austrian National Library. A sketch from June 1895 could be retrieved in 2003, from the Estate of a Munich music-critic.

The current status of what has been collected, retrieved and subsequently archived is as follows :

Austrian National Library, Vienna : 195 folios.

Vienna City and State Library : 10 folios.

Vienna Music Academy : 2 folios.

City of Vienna Historical Museum : 2 folios.

Jagiellonska Library, Cracow : 1 folio.

In private hands (registered) : 1 folio.

Wrong Notes

It took more or less a lifetime to prepare the Editions covering Bruckner's music. The continuing story of editing the 9th alone dates back from 1934, when the (partially erroneous) Alfred Orel Edition was published. Still today, 70 years later, musicologists are working on the project of the last Symphony, but it should be taken into account that a significant portion of the material came to light during several decades.

Nevertheless, it took more than half a Century since the publication of the Orel Edition (1934) that Leopold Nowak simply wanted John Alan Phillips to present all the existing material, as it was instantly clear to him after the Orel Edition was released that it suffered from many serious flaws (Nowak's 1951 Edition only contained a limited number of minor corrections) .

Also, the Symphony's 1st 3 movements revealed many (in the perspective of Werktreue important) disparities, edited and annotated by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs in the following editions :

Movements 1-3, score, new edition, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » ,Vienna, 2000 (ISMN M-50025-214-6) .

Movements 1-3, critical commentary, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » ,Vienna, 2000 (ISBN 3- 900270-53-8) .

Movement 2, study volume, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » ,Vienna, 1998 (ISMN M-50025-182-8) .

Ludwig Döblinger Verlag in Vienna published Cohrs' performing version and Kritischer Bericht (1998) of 2 earlier, discarded trios (ISMN M-012-18489-8) . Anton Bruckner had composed 2 earlier versions of the Trio for the 2nd movement of the 9th. No 1 in F major was composed in 1889 ; No 2 in F-sharp major dates from 1893 ; No 3, also in F-sharp major, from 1894 is the final version we are most familiar with.

As in so many scores and 1st Editions errors, were not timely and properly corrected, and they found their way in following editions until a new generation of musicologists and musicians with a more accurate opinion about Werktreue (instead of Partiturtreue !) made one discovery after the other. Even those well-established scores of Beethoven and Schubert were scrutinized, with often astonishing results.

In the case of Bruckner's music, the substantial discrepancies and their huge variety called for a critical review on scientific terms in order to introduce authentic performance standards. In 1929, after founding the Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft, IBG (International Bruckner Society) in Vienna, an immense workload was waiting. The editing of the 9th started in 1934 with Alfred Orel and is still in progress, more than 70 years later. It took until 2000 to dispose of a « clean » score for just the 1st 3 movements only, meaning that, yet, there is only one recording that does not contain textual errors : the already mentioned Nikolaus Harnoncourt performance on RCA/BMG label (82876 54332-282876) .

Entretien avec Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs

The Finale of the 9th is only available in one fashion : the particellos and bi-folios in Bruckner's own hand-writing as they have been published in the Fac-simile Edition. This is the autograph that should tell us everything, but it does not. 1st of all, a number of pages is (still) missing and so we do not know what is in there. 2ndly, major part of the instrumentation is left blank (Bruckner simply did not reach the process of writing-out the full-score in detail from start to finish) . And 3rdly, the movement could not be completed anyway.

Well. But the manuscript material indeed provides a lot of information, and much « more » information as it is the general belief. What did survive is at about 50 % of the emerging autograph score, but also circa 70 % of the music lost from the missing bi-folios could be recovered from sketches, drafts, discarded earlier versions and forensic studies. Amazing ! This score must have been preliminarily finished by Bruckner (at least, with all strings and some sketched wind motives) , due to one simple fact : the philological studies as, in particular undertaken by John Alan Phillips, revealed that, without doubt, Anton Bruckner renumbered the bi-folios of the score only in May and June 1896, after he had, at least, sketched the Coda, and we have even a date for this as an evidence : « 14.06.96 » , given on 13E/ « 14 » (Fac-simile Edition, page 225) . This renumbering was done, because, in this phase of the composition, he had decided to split-up the very long bi-folio 2F (which increased now to 36 bars) into a « 2 » and « 3 » , all written on the late-used E paper type, hence all subsequent bi-folios had to be renumbered. Most likely, his secretary Anton Meißner may have had the task to scratch-out the old consecutive numbers with a razor blade, which would be overwritten then with one number higher. We had noted something similar in the 1st movement already. Only after finishing its score for a 1st time (which had 23 numbered bi-folios in autumn 1892) , during a revision in autumn 1893, Bruckner decided to expand the bridge to the recapitulation of the « Gesangperiode » and to include a new bi-folio « 18 » (see : Critical Report, page 50ff) , which made it necessary to renumber all subsequent bi-folios from « 18 » to « 23 » into « 19 » to « 24 » . But (and this is the point) I believe such a procedure of renumbering would make sense only when the entire score was already there !

But if this renumbering in the Finale indeed happened in May and June 1896, it also gives us a clue to estimate the entire length of the original score, even if now partially lost, at least with a high degree of certainty. In one of the sketches for the Coda, we find the famous annotation of Bruckner « Bogen 36. 19. Ces » (FE, page 45) . This would read : On May 19th, Bruckner reached the Ces, the beginning of the « Final cadenza » , as 2 days later clearly re-sketched and further established (FE, page 47 : « am 21. Donnerstag, 22. Freitag, 23. Samstag ») . If we follow

Bruckner's usual practice, he would write such a bi-folio indication precisely at that point of the sketch where the new bi-folio (here : 36) would have to start. We have several other instances in the manuscripts where he did the same, note, for instance, the particello sketch of the exposition, FE page 33, where Bruckner writes « neuer Bog. » precisely at the same spot where the later 4C/ « 5 » started. But this indication was written in May, obviously « before » the renumbering ; he would have had overwritten the primary score bi-folios for the Coda, perhaps, immediately after sketching their content (again, this was part of his usual compositional practice : as soon as a music was clearly sketched, 1st lay it out in score, for strings ; it could be revised later anyway) and, only then after, returned to the exposition and renumber the bi-folios subsequently. Hence the bi-folio on which the cadenza had started was later to be a renumbered 36/ « 37 » . But this single indication of Bruckner in the sketch allows us now for almost « precisely » estimate the length of the gap between the final surviving score bi-folio 31E/ « 32 » and the cadenza beginning on the lost 36/ « 37 » ! 4 bi-folios must be missing here : 32E/ « 33 » , 33E/ « 34 » , 34E/ « 35 » , 35E/ « 36 » . Most likely, all on E-paper prepared with 16 bars each, implying a gap of 64 bars. Furthermore, we would know that, most likely, the chorale Bridge constituting the 8 bar Period before the Ces-cadenza would be, then, the 2nd half of the lost 35/ « 36 » .

What we do « not » know is, where exactly the Coda would have started, of which we have the beginning sketched (24 bars) , hence we do not know « exactly » how much music was between the last bar of 31E/ « 32 » and the 1st bar of the sketch for the beginning of the Coda, and how much music was there between the last bar of it and the 1st bar of this C major chorale fragment preparing the cadenza. We also do « not » know whether Bruckner himself followed strictly the 16 bar structure of the E paper bi-folios, or whether he would have inserted some further bar lines, as, for instance, already on the 1st page of « 2 » E which contains 6 instead of 4 bars. On the other hand, this is the only surviving E paper with such a sub-division at all, and the musical structure of 31E/ « 32 » and the cadenza sketch would only suggest one further of such subdivisions : the last period on 31E/ « 32 » ends with its 6th bar, and we do not know precisely whether Bruckner would have completed it with (-7-8) in an 8 bar period or not. But 36/ « 37 » would have started with the 1st bar of a period. If we consider Bruckner would have continued the lost music in periods of 4, 8 and 12 bars length, it is likely that he somewhere had to include 2 bars more, if he not decided somewhere to have 10 or 6 bars only, but this is more unlikely. However, the little annotation « Bogen 36. Ces » provides enough information to establish at least a hypothesis, based on facts and some fruitful deduction, and estimate the length of this huge gap, with perhaps only 2 bars in doubt.

Even more, the length of the very end of the Coda : Bruckner sketched a D pedal point following the cadenza, doubtless the final tonic. This would have started then on the lost 37/ « 38 » . If we consider that all previous movements had a sort of a « final capstone » of precisely 37 bars length, we can assume with some certainty that this was also planned for the Finale, following the sketched 8 bars of tonic pedal point some more 29 would have had to follow, in all, bringing the score to an end with 2 further lost bi-folios of 16 bars perhaps (37/ « 38 » and 38/ « 39 ») and 1 last page of a 39/ « 40 » with the final 5 bars. So, even if the final double bar-line is not included in the surviving material anymore, we can assume its position and a hint of the music at least from logical deduction.

So regarding the full length of the Finale, we have only a very few question marks : a) was the missing bi-folio « 1 » 16 or still 24 bars long ? we have sufficient arguments for the shorter version, however ; b) was the missing bi-folio « 4 » 16 or 18 bars long ? ; c) How long precisely was the missing 27/ « 28 » ; 20 or 24 bars ? we have again good reason to assume here 24 bars if we compare this passage with the surviving sketch for it, already containing 17 bars, and due to the structure of the periods ; d) did Bruckner stuck to the 16 bar standard length in the missing bi-folio « 33 » to « 36 » , or did he include, at least, 2 or more further bars ? ; e) was the final section really planned to be 37 bars long ? if we summarize the answers to these questions, we may say : 1) 8 bars in dispute ; 2) 2 bars in dispute ; 3) perhaps, 4 bars in dispute ; 4) at least, 2 bars in dispute ; 5) certainly not 29 bars in dispute, since the final pedal point would have been at least longer than the 8 bars sketched, in all circa 47 bars in question. This would bring the movement to a length of perhaps not more than 673 bars (if we accept the 24 bars version of the missing « 1 ») .

You may now say : well, this all sounds very nice, but is sheer speculation. But if we would have no piece of music here, and instead a person killed, with some parts of the corpse missing, and if we would be forensic investigators such as in the Television series « CSI » , we would accept the following idea : to collect all information which is still available, bring it together by scientific deduction, and try to establish a hypothesis sufficient enough to find-out why the one died, how the person had looked like before the birds of prey have eaten perhaps parts of his face and arms and legs, and then try to find the murderer. And this is indeed all we can do : take every single bit of information from Bruckner's own music, and present the results of our examination as well established as possible.

How did you proceed from the point where Bruckner did not provide full instrumentation, such as in the continuity drafts ? For example, bi-folio « # » D = « 5b » . In other cases, Bruckner could have added specific voices at a later stage, where he already writes in full-score (example such as : in bi-folio 4A, page 3) . There are numerous spots in the scoring with failing instrumentation markings, presumably because the composer did not need reminders for later instrumentation, in contrast with others being clearly laid-out, for instance for the viola, in case he might overlook or just forget later in the instrumentation process that this specific phrase was to be played by the viola. The divisi markings, where for instance celli need to play in double parts, also served as a reminder. Summarising, how could you fill it all in where Bruckner did not leave adequate hints in his manuscripts (particellos, bi-folios) .

Actually, there are, by far, more adequate hints by Bruckner himself as one may think ! Before starting such a discussion, we need to answer another question : « How full » was the instrumentation intended to be, or better, how much additions does the music require at all ? Regarding the bi-folio « # » D, which you have mentioned, Nicola Samale and I now simply regard it as an erroneous attempt to re-copy 4C/ « 5 » , and do not share doctor John Alan Phillips' construction of this as an indicated 16 bar expansion, as explained in the Commentary of our new Edition. This idea is simply not in line with the particello sketch and also not with Bruckner's usual style, if you compare the 1st part of the « Gesangperiode » (Song period) in exposition and recapitulation in all previous Symphonies (and the 1st movement of the 9th) . However, the surviving 4C/ « 5 » indicates a finished instrumentation with whole bar rests in all parts except strings and I.2. horn (see also, the 1st 2 pages of 4A) ; it was renumbered, in June 1896, into « 5 » and even marked as « Giltig » (valid) by Bruckner. Even if Bruckner may have changed this music any further, we have no reason to assume that he would have added more instruments, because the instrumentation remained unchanged in all previous phases of the composition. Or take the 1st 2 pages of 7C/ « 8 »

A very important insight about instrumentation was provided by John Alan Phillips during his work with Nicola Samale, in 1990-1991. Bruckner would often add melodies or motives only if the counterpoint fabric would allow such an addition, or if certain motives would undergo a process of mutation. A good example is the added counterpoint of the solo horn at the beginning of the Trio in the « Gesangperiode » , which would rhythmically compliment the fabric of the other parts and provide precisely the one missing element. This section is also an example for another significant idea. When Bruckner repeats such material, more or less literally in the recapitulation, he would enrich it with added instrumental colours, as, for instance, can be seen in the 1st movement. In this case, we have taken also the very similar Finale of the 6th Symphony as a model to provide a fuller instrumentation of the Trio in the recapitulation. On the other hand, Bruckner did not think in terms of « instrumentation » as we often do think about it ; simply like giving a nude person a dress. His idea on this is more like this. If you freeze, you would need a scarf and a hat and gloves. So a particular musical situation would require a certain instrumentation.

For instance, the Crescendo in the recapitulation, preparing the chorale theme from C-flat major / A-flat minor, is in the sketch only one single line in the violins, plus at the beginning a sketched self-imitation in diminution, both making use already of the chorale theme. Alone from the character of the music, we have already clues for the instrumentation. It should obviously start soft, and build-up an effective crescendo in order to prepare a violent break through of D minor, as at the end of the sketch marked « Schluß D-moll » by Bruckner, with the heavy weight of a 1st bar of a period. This is only a 1st climax, because the surviving 28E/ « 29 » brings a much more exalted, 2nd crescendo to prepare the chorale plus « Te Deum » . But if we imagine the D minor to be a tutti climax, we need to find stylistically appropriate models of how to build-up the crescendo itself. We find these models in the main theme itself (dotted rhythm in all strings, supporting, resonant line in the brass) and as well in a similar passage in the Finale of the 8th Symphony, after the recapitulation of the 1st theme group.

To give a voice in the score to a specific instrument or a combination of instruments is an important decision for any composer. Individual instrumental colours determine the music's mood to a great extent. How did you know that a specific voice line should be given to the oboe instead of the flute ? How did you establish that Bruckner had written a specific line for specific brass instruments, for instance for the horn ?

In some cases, it is simply guess work, and we don't know of course whether Bruckner would have chosen the same instrument, or not. But, at least, we have many clues how Bruckner wrote for his instruments, studying the music, finding similar passages, if possible 1stly from the Finale itself, then, from the other 3 movements, then, from music composed at the same time, and also considering the « Te Deum » and earlier Symphonies. Bruckner had some very particular habits to write for his Orchestra, which were also thoroughly examined by Dieter Michaël Backes recently, in his dissertation « Die Instrumentation und ihre Entwicklung in Anton Bruckners Symphonien » (Mainz, 1993) .

Take, as an example, the instrumentation of the chorale recapitulation (bi-folio 28E/ « 29 »), of which we have only Bruckner's strings and the 1st trumpet with the chorale melody. Many other completers have interpreted this as a soft reminiscence, but the manuscript provides in the 2 bars before the trumpet entry whole bar rests in « both » trumpet systems, which is a typical short hand-writing of Bruckner to indicate that all 3 trumpets should later play the melody, so he simply left-out the doubling in the lower system for writing convenience. The string texture itself, with the powerful « Te Deum » figure and viola tremolo, is a typical forte design, not soft, and most important is also Bruckner's own diminuendo (« dim. »), to be found in the 8th bar of the trumpet line, indicating that it should be loud earlier, but here become softer. So, we finally have simply adopted the brass parts from the exposition, and, in order to bring-out the diminuendo from the 9th bar onwards, have thinned-out the instrumentation, reducing the harmonic support to trombones, double bass-tuba, and starting the trumpet writing in 3 parts, leaving-out the horns. The last 2 bars of the bi-folio provide further information. The melody is taken over by the 1st oboe, the viola gives-up its tremolo, and goes with celli, double basses suddenly rest. This suggests a change of register and a further reduction of the dynamics. Since it would be untypical to have such a figure as the strings here without harmonic support by sustained notes, we have supported the oboe chorale with lower woodwinds, because, in such a soft passage, certainly this can't be the brass anymore.

As Dieter Michaël Backes further pointed-out, Bruckner's writing is so characteristic that even from a single line in the sketch we could very often easily deduce for which instrument it was intended. Very important here is the ambitus of the instrument, the lowest and highest note possible. This already limits the choice. But this is all basic knowledge of instrumentation. If you double a viola, you may use a horn, a bassoon or a clarinet, then consider dynamics and the colour, and make your choice. One of the reasons for us to reconsider the entire instrumentation, however, was the insight, that we would have to take in account those instruments which Bruckner himself wrote for. That is, not our days' modern, wide bored brass instruments, for instance, but thin, hand made Viennese horns, the large trumpet in F, Viennese tenor bass-trombones in E-flat, Viennese double bass tuba, the wooden, old Viennese flute, the Viennese oboe, clarinet and bassoon : instruments which sounded totally different from ours. You need to know about these instruments, how they sound, where their limitations are, and how Bruckner wrote for them, in order to accurately write for them in a Brucknerian way. For instance, for the flute, Bruckner would avoid tones above b''' and also the lowest register (d' is the lowest note in the 9th, and it appears only in the main theme of the 1st movement) which are no problem for a modern flute. In particular, due to my own interest in period performing practice, we have changed many passages in our new edition, in order to bring it in line with Bruckner's habits, overlooked in our earlier working phases.

I find it amazing that, until this day, no great Bruckner conductor (apart from Nikolaus Harnoncourt) has taken a serious effort to perform a 4 movement version of the 9th, as if it does not exist. The latest news I got on the subject was that the Bamberger Symphoniker under the baton of Jonathan Nott had planned a performance on 20 April using the latest « SPCM » edition, but it was cancelled without any explanation. I also understood that Nott got all the documentation to support the reconstruction, but it appeared to be in vain. Why do you think it is so difficult to get this greatest of Bruckner Finales performed ? Has it something to do with those many doubts that still exist ? That too much in the score is unclear, needs compromising, and that we shall never know the truth ?

In defence of Mister Nott, I must say that, recently, he wrote me an e-mail, explaining that to study the matter thoroughly would have required much more time as he had since he got the materials, and he is a very busy man ; the April 2006 concert was simply too early for him to come to a definitive decision, as he explained. But he remains to be interested, as he wrote. I would also like to point-out that many, at least quite well-known, conductors in fact did the completed 9th, as for instance Philippe Herreweghe, Johannes Wildner, Lawrence Renes and Günter Neuhold. But basically, you are right. The reasons are manifold. It is perhaps impossible to overcome those prejudices of 100 years of reception. As much as the Mozart-Süßmayr « Requiem » became a beloved part of the standard repertoire, as much Ferdinand Löwe's campaign was effective to establish the general belief that the Symphony is, in itself, complete as a torso, even if this is against the composers will and simply a habit. Even worse. He also successfully established that, against Bruckner's wish, the « Te Deum » should better « not » be performed following the Symphony, despite that some great conductors (even Herbert von Karajan) occasionally performed the 9th and, after a concert break, the « Te Deum » , which to me seems to be at least an appropriate solution better, and better than the torso alone. Another point is the radical nature of Bruckner's music itself. It is not easy to understand that the pathetic Adagio should be followed by a harsh, toccata-like « Inferno » , postponing the final salvation until the very last moment. There are simply too many misunderstandings and resentments against the music and the entire undertaking.

The performance of the Finale as an integrated part of Bruckner's last « Gesamtkunstwerk » is still in its infancy and needs full recognition before a performance tradition can hold. How do you think this can be established in time ? Great Bruckner conductors must have studied your score in the meantime, but there seems nobody yet (except Harnoncourt) to take-up the baton. I asked Hartmut Haenchen but he was not interested. There is still a lot of opposition against touching a musical torso and when people do not know the real facts behind what Bruckner left and how the reconstruction process goes, they are probably not going to give-up their resistance. Conductors are the 1st to make it happen, to create an electrifying event in the concert-hall, and to explain to the audience what they are trying to accomplish. Not in some kind of a workshop scenario, but in the 4 movement version Bruckner had it in mind. To understand and appreciate the real greatness of the Finale needs the 3 preceding movements. Where are they ?

There is perhaps not enough common knowledge about the facts, but, on the other hand, too much information. Imagine a poor « jet-set Maestro » would have to study a pile of books and scores 1st : the Fac-simile, the Documentation, the Completed Performing Version and, then, to decide what he should do. Those people even don't find the time to learn new repertory, travel around the world, do 120 concerts a year and endlessly repeat their standard pieces. Why, how and when should they re-learn the 9th in 4 movements ? What we would need is 2 or 3 well-known, open-minded chaps with major Orchestras who would like to do the completed 9th in a major capital, perhaps Harnoncourt (if he is ever to do the 9th again) , Claudio Abbado, Mariss Jansons, Esa Pekka Salonen, Seiji Ozawa, Pierre Boulez, Simon Rattle, or Paavo Järvi, who could do the piece so successfully that the simple fact would convince others that it is no crime any longer to use the Finale. This already worked remarkably well in the case of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony. Even Michaël Gielen who, only a few years ago, confessed he would never do anything else than the 1st Adagio, recently presented a fantastic new recording of the « Cooke et al. » completion.

But note. After I had conducted the workshop concert on the Finale in Tokyo, in 2001, with the Royal Flanders Philharmonic, Philippe Herreweghe came to me and said : « You know, the more often I hear the piece, the more I like it. » Then, he took the completed 9th on tour through Japan, and he did it, I think, 4 times there. But the reviews were rather conservative about the matter and, since 2001, he never again did the Finale at all, although he does Bruckner a lot. Which brings me to the next point. The Symphony in 4 movements lasts around 90 minutes. It would have to be programmed usually without anything else. Bruckner concerts are hard to sell anyway, and if then the beloved Mozart Concerto could not happen in the 1st part, and no intermission for drinks and chat, people would not come. And if then, a quarter of the piece appears to be 2nd hand Bruckner, it may be even more difficult to programme it in ordinary concert life. So, all we can hope for is that the quality of the music itself, sooner or later, would make the round. If I would be as rich as Gilbert Kaplan, who paid orchestras in the entire world to conduct solely his beloved Mahler « Resurrection » Symphony, I would go on tour to conduct the completed 9th wherever I could, but I am not rich. And which orchestral manager would dare to invite a « no name conductor » for a Bruckner 9th ? Unfortunately, we even were unsuccessful so far to raise enough money to give, at least, a proper performance of the completed 9th on period instruments with the fantastic New Queen's Hall Orchestra ; an idea we try to work out now for already 7 years, without success, and we would need only about 75,000 Euros for a proper concert and a live CD recording project.

Gustav Mahler once said : « Tradition ist Schlamperei. » This perfectly fits the performance tradition of Bruckner's Symphonies, in their various versions. The 1st version of the 8th (and I think it is superior to the 2nd one) is rarely played, as is the 1st version of the 3rd and the 4th. It seems to me that when a tradition has really established itself, huge powers are needed to change patterns, but it simply does not happen. This is not really hopeful when it comes to the 9th's Finale.

Don't lose your hope ! We may not forget that the initial versions of the 3rd, 4th and 8th were only published 30 years ago. Eliahu Inbal's « Teldec » recording of them was a pioneer's work, discussed highly-controversial by the critics. But now, the initial version of the 3rd is more and more recognized as a great, independent and coherent argument of the piece. Even Sergiu Celibidache had planned to perform it (unfortunately, he died before this could be realized) . I think the 4th and 8th will be likewise recognized sooner or later. Now, take the Finale of the 9th ; perhaps, it is simply still too early to come to lose hope. But I have hope. I receive so many letters and e-mails from Bruckner admirers in the entire world, offering support, asking for more performances, and some of them even took the initiative to write pertinently to concert organisers and conductors regarding the matter. And I am also happy that interested writers like yourself study the matter, come to their conclusions and publish their new insights. All this is very much of help for Bruckner's music.

How do you see « Werktreue » in the perspective of the reconstruction process ? This is a totally misunderstood concept, preserved from the late-Romantic æsthetics. The word represents the strange idea that a performance could come as close to a « correct interpretation of the text » . A relict from the secularisation in the Age of enlightenment, when culture became a surrogate for religious activity in society. This is as much against the nature of music as the common believe is against the human nature, that, in our entire life, we would need the « one and only person » which would make all our dreams come true. But, in fact, we live in a net of relationships with various people we continue to meet, relationships of all kind of quality. But why don't we learn to simply live « in love » , not to the « particular one and all » , but as a way of life ? Likewise, for musical interpretation. We can and we should learn as much we can about the nature of the music, but basically we should « live in music » . Reconstruction is part of our daily musical life and practice. In fact, every interpretation is a reconstruction. The musician reconstructs an experience in sound from the music he reads on the paper. Already, the various versions of Mahler's 10th Symphony are basically also interpretations of their editors and arrangers. The reconstruction and completion of the Bruckner Finale is precisely the same. We try to make it possible to experience Bruckner's own music in sound, to make it performable. If you wish so, this is « Werktreu » . Definitely, it is not « Werktreu » to undermine the ideas of Bruckner himself. If we dispense with the Finale of the 9th, why then not as well with that of the 7th, for instance ? Let's take away the Finale, put the Scherzo in the 2nd place and end with the Farewell to Richard Wagner. Who the hell would need a Finale for the 7th ? An absolutely absurd debate.

Do you think that your reconstruction work contributed to a much better understanding of the 1st 3 movements ? Why ? Many processes from the 1st 3 movements did not come to an end, yet, with the end of the Adagio. In fact, the end of the Adagio stimulate even some new processes continued in the Finale. This idea was actually very important for us. Observing the motivic development and see where it needs to be reconstructed, in order to bring it to a sufficient end. It is particularly fascinating how Anton Bruckner carefully seems to prepare the return of the main theme from the 1st movement in the Finale, by establishing its principal motives. Note that the motto from the beginning of the Finale already contains the inversion from the famous horn call at the beginning of the Symphony, then, the prominent triplet from the main theme is used. Note that the string figuration of the chorale theme seems to be directly taken from the figuration of the Coda of the 1st movement, again containing the triplet core. Note how the Epilogue theme of the Finale, 1st following the fugue, then following the chorale recapitulation, contains the « Non confundar / Alleluja » and, again, the triplet feature of the main theme. And this is only a small excerpt from the manifold processes of development which all aim for what already Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca had realized in their 1985 Edition : the synthesis of all main themes of the Symphony. We have a simple argument for this. It is perfectly possible to do so, following the structure of the themes as used, and as predictable as the famous idea of Nottebohm, that for the lost part of Johann Sebastian Bach's quadruple fugue the main theme was intended to be added. And, significantly, going beyond the argument at the end of the 8th, because there Bruckner only combined the head of the themes, and not original, but in a truncated manner, transposed into C major. But here we can combine the themes in their original condition ! The Scherzo theme is certainly merely a rhythm, even if containing the important triplet. But if we take the augmented Adagio theme, it matches perfectly well with the main theme of the 1st movement. The Finale theme would « not » match as in the exposition, but note that when Bruckner re-designed it for the fugue, he changed the 1st note of the 3rd bar from E to E-flat, and this would allow now to use it precisely in combination with the other themes, bringing the substantial D / E-flat clash.

Likewise, we have tried to bring-out other resolutions as indicated in the music. But this is only possible because Bruckner's own architectural thinking was so strong. Notice only that even the small choral fragment, preceding the cadenza Sketch for the Coda, is nothing else than the inversion of 4 bars at the end of the exposition of the main theme, shortly before this Choral Bridge to the « Gesangperiode » ! So, in particular in the Coda, we have tried to tie together things that remained to be unsolved yet. For instance, the way how we re-introduced the « Te Deum » motive in woodwinds is very similar to how Bruckner used it in the Development section, serving as a model for our Coda realisation. Or take the « Non confundar / Alleluja » , referring to the trumpets in the Adagio theme. By the way, your quoted lines from Doctor Richard Heller seem, in fact, refer to the slow movement, and not the Scherzo, since, I am sure, Heller was simply confused about the order of the movements. Note that Josef Schalk, who made the piano arrangement of the Symphony, gave the Adagio as a 2nd movement and the Scherzo as 3rd. I assume that Schalk worked from copies of the movements which are lost today, originally containing « Scherzo and Adagio » titles only, but not marked explicitly as « 2. Satz » , « 3. Satz » . It is even possible that Bruckner himself was not entirely sure about the position of the inner movements for some time, since it seems that on the 1st page of the Adagio autograph, the 3rd beam of the roman « III » in « III. Satz » has been added later !

In all, to present the Symphony without Finale seems to me like presenting a body without its head. Not a very nice picture indeed. The entire character of the work is changed by accepting the Finale ; from a pathetic « Adagio of Farewell » into a last struggle of life and death. The Finale is a toccata-like « Inferno » , an apocalyptic picture of the « Last Judgement » . Bruckner struggled hard to achieve at least a compositional coherence. He could not know that the material for the Finale would be obscured soon after his death. Should his last battle remain to be unacknowledged ? Hence, we also understand our reconstruction as an attempt to compensate for the disrespectful treatment of Bruckner's heritage. Imagine that, perhaps, some disrespectful autograph collectors may keep the lost bi-folios in their possession and hide them from us (if not already, some of the bi-folios have been destroyed immediately after Bruckner's death, for instance, by the religious fanatic Anton Meißner, perhaps from a false understanding of piety) . In this case, I have to admit to feel an almost diabolic pleasure that it was possible to « still » recover the Finale to such an extent from Bruckner's own back-up material, by following forensic methods and observing a strict methodology ! And I dare to predict that, even if some or all of the lost bi-folios would once come to light again, we may already have found, at least, the right music in many instances, even if we, of course, cannot have guessed everything all right. But even if we get an idea of the covering of only about 80 % of the original whole movement (and I don't talk about instrumentation now, only the composition itself) , we would have regained much more of Bruckner's music as if, 20 years ago, we could have ever dreamed of !

Bruckner's Symphony No.9 - Finally, a Finale ?

By Richard Lehnert (April 2, 2010) .

I know of only one composer who measures-up to Beethoven, and that is Bruckner. (Richard Wagner, 1882)
Anyone who has read the notes accompanying a performance or recording of Anton Bruckner's final work, the unfinished Symphony No.9, knows the story. Before he died, on the afternoon of October 11, 1896, Bruckner had been able to complete only preliminary and fragmentary sketches for the Symphony's 4th movement, the Finale, which he'd worked on that very morning. Those sketches show little musical, structural, or harmonic coherence - if there was any overall plan, it was still only in the mind of a man rapidly going senile. But even had Bruckner retained all of his faculties and lived another year, his vision for the 9th, and especially for this movement, was probably unrealizable, at least on this earthly plane. Besides, Bruckner had himself described the last movement he completed - the Adagio, with its anguished 11 tone row of a primary theme - as his « farewell to life » . What earthly music could possibly follow such an embodiment in sound of pain and suffering, followed by hard-won peace fading-out at the last into barely audible acceptance ? Surely, the 3 movement 9th, though left unfinished, has a completeness of its own.

The problem with this story is that so little of it is true. Gradually, in the 114 years since Bruckner's death, and especially since 1983, fragments of a more complete and accurate account of the work Bruckner had actually completed on the Finale have begun to cohere, as have the fragments of the movement itself. The real story is sadder, more interesting, and ultimately more hopeful.

When Bruckner died, his body lay in state for 3 days in his chambers, visited by friends, colleagues, and students paying their last respects. Bruckner's last « amanuensis » and secretary (also ancient pupil) , Anton Meißner, encouraged the mourners to take with them, as « memento mori » , various belongings of Bruckner's. Mostly these were sheets of musical manuscript from a stack near Bruckner's deathbed, and chiefly of his most recent work : the sketches, revisions, and final full orchestrations of the Finale of the 9th Symphony. What remained passed into the possession of 1st Josef Schalk, a pianist, writer, and former student of Bruckner's - and, 4 years later, when Schalk died, into the hands of his brother Franz, another of Bruckner's students who had also served as the composer's assistant, « protégé », and, sometime, editor. For the rest of his life, Franz Schalk would imply, or state outright, that Bruckner in those final years had not been in his right mind, that the Finale fragments made little sense, and that he had saved Bruckner's legacy from being embarrassed by the composer's own decline. In the absence of almost any evidence to the contrary (many actual pages of the manuscript now more or less scattered to the winds), there was little reason to doubt the word of one of Bruckner's closest intimates, and Schalk's version of Bruckner's last works and days became the generally accepted one.

Bruckner seems to have been cursed with friends and colleagues who deeply loved him and his work while having little respect (albeit much affection) for the former or understanding of the latter. The Schalks were chief among these, having earlier cut by half the massively fugal Finale of Bruckner's 5th Symphony, in an edition still occasionally performed today. While that was apparently done behind Bruckner's back, Bruckner was desperate enough to have his difficult and unfashionable works mounted that he is known to have said : « Do what you want, just perform them. » . But it now seems clear that Franz Schalk's bewildering later behavior was founded on his own bewilderment at what Bruckner was actually doing in his final work. Another of Bruckner's former pupils, Ferdinand Löwe, compounded this in the 1st performance, in 1903, of the 9th's 3 completed movements, which Löwe entirely re-orchestrated and « corrected » in an edition now universally condemned as wrong headed and spurious.

Over the last Century, however, and as recently as 2003, manuscript pages of the Finale (from Bruckner's sketches, revisions, and final, fully orchestrated autograph score) have continued to turn-up in private collections and libraries in Europe and the United States. From the evidence now available, it seems that Bruckner had actually finished a through-composed sketch of the entire Finale, sometime in June 1896. In fact, portions of as many as half a dozen sketched versions survive, though none in full. This might have left unresolved the dilemma of exactly how many bars of lost music might have originally linked the surviving fragments were it not for one of Bruckner's mental oddities - ironically, one that had also greatly delayed his completion of the 9th.

Throughout his life, Bruckner's apparently innate tendency toward rigorous formalism was intensified by a degree of what might now be called obsessive-compulsive disorder. Evidence of this ranged from his keeping careful lists of how many « Hail Marys » and « Our Fathers » he recited each night, through the precise mathematical symmetry of the numbers of measures in his Symphonies, to endless and often pointless revisions of earlier works. In fact, he interrupted work on the 9th for a year to completely revise his Symphony No. 1, a project most Bruckner scholars now agree was not worth the effort. But Bruckner's meticulous bar-counting has helped greatly in the reconstruction of the 9th's Finale. He wrote the final drafts of his Symphonies on large, consecutively numbered sheets of score paper, each single-folded sheet comprising 4 pages of 4 bars each in full orchestral staff. According to Bruckner scholar Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in his « The " SPCM " Completion to the Bruckner Symphony No. 9 », an exhaustive essay available at www.abruckner.com, the number of missing bars can thus be known almost precisely : 223 of a probable total of 665. The 442 extant bars are less « fragments » than substantial chunks of continuous music, mostly in full orchestration, and as long as 8 or 9 minutes, separated by gaps of only 8 or 16 or 24 bars. Not only that, sketches and revised sketches, in various states of completion, exist for 127 of those 223 missing bars, leaving only 96 bars, most of them in the Coda, for which nothing in Bruckner's hand survives.

Not everyone agrees that the Finale and its Coda should match the respective numbers of measures Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has come-up with - in particular, William Carragan, another Bruckner scholar, whose latest edition of his own completion of the Finale totals 717 measures. However, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs is probably correct when he states that only about 15 % of the Finale is missing in any form, these gaps comprising only 5% of the entire 4 movement Symphony. He compares this with Franz Süßmayr's completion of Mozart's « Requiem », which has been in the standard repertoire for more than 2 Centuries, and of which Süßmayr himself composed 22 % of the music and orchestrated more than 90 % .

But, until the last 2 decades, most scholars were loath to even contemplate a performing version of the fragments of the Finale of Bruckner's 9th, and conductors even more so ; even now, when such versions are beginning to be performed, no conductor of 1st rank stature has done so. It's not clear why this is so, given the present general acceptance of the Mozart-Süßmayr « Requiem », the Mahler-Cooke Symphony 10, the Puccini-Alfano « Turandot », and the Elgar-Payne Symphony 3, each of which (the Mahler excepted) contains far more music entirely written by someone other than the composer than do any of the completions of the Bruckner 9th discussed here (the Marthé excepted) . (Since the original publication of this article in the March 2010 « Stereophile », I have learned that performances and recordings of a 4 movement 9th are being planned by 2 « star » conductors. One of them is Simon Rattle.)

However, there are now enough of these completions, and enough decent recordings of them, to give the listener a very good idea of Bruckner's plan for his final work. Currently, 3 completions, 2 of them in multiple editions, are important, and are the only ones to have been recorded in any format now available : the 1st, by William Carragan ; the most recent, by Sébastien Letocart ; and, perhaps, most important, and the most extensive and most exhaustively researched (it is certainly the most rigorously argued) by Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca, later joined by John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. Here is what they have discovered.

For the Finale of the 9th, Bruckner, a devout Roman Catholic, had conceived what has often been described (though apparently not by the composer) as a vast cathedral of sound, dedicated by Bruckner « to the dear Lord » and capped by a Coda comprising the main themes not only of all of the Symphony's preceding movements, but also of his Symphonies 5, 7, and 8. Not all Bruckner scholars agree that Bruckner actually did intend to work in those themes from his earlier works, and the composer's alleged sketch of how all of those themes would overlap, which some claimed to have seen, has not survived, if indeed it ever existed. Still, on the strength of the evidence presented by the completions surveyed here, the music of the Finale almost defies description in its richness, density, and ambition, even for Bruckner. For example, the composer built most of his Symphonic movements on the statements, developments, and contrapuntal workings-through of 3 themes or theme groups : a 1st main theme, a more lyrical theme developed from the main theme, and a stormy 3rd theme, usually built on octave intervals. The Finale of the 9th has 8 main themes, many of them of a type new to his work - but it is Bruckner's rigorous developments and inter weavings of these themes, in a continuous organic process throughout the length of this long movement (20 to 30 minutes, depending on the conductor and the completion performed) , that are so astonishingly complex. In this Finale, Bruckner's various musical funds (of melodic and rhythmic ideas, advanced harmony and tonal color, and rigor of development and counterpoint) seem inexhaustible.

Bruckner continued to chart new harmonic territory throughout the 9th, but nowhere so much as in its Finale. Even those who have long known and loved the Symphony's 1st 3 movements will no doubt find at 1st, as I did, the opening of the Finale to be disturbing, even alarming, and perhaps feel some sympathy for poor Ferdinand Löwe as he « corrected » all of the 1st 3 movements' many dissonances - here, there are many more. Bruckner always structured his themes with great care, to ensure maximum flexibility in their later development via counterpoint and inversion, but, in this regard, the themes of the Finale are in a class by themselves. The extreme and angular intervals of the 1st 2 themes seem at once to leap upward and fall further downward, then shriek in the violins with near-hysterical anguish before subsiding into what sounds like a wallow of grief and despair. But, in this movement, every falling motif and figure later rises, every theme that 1st descends in angst later climbs to glory - and, almost always, these falling and rising figures at some point are overlaid to work against, then with each other to achieve a sense of great and ultimately triumphant striving against almost insurmountable odds. The Finale is one of the most thorough workings-through of musical logic I know of ; like the greatest works of Johann Sebastian Bach, Sacred or secular, it seems to demand to be heard as a spiritual journey.

But we are still at the beginning. A re-assuring figure in full strings then enters, followed by, perhaps, the most beautiful chorale Bruckner ever wrote, led in its descent, alternately chromatic and diatonic, by solo trumpet. Soon after, this comes a 4 part fugue whose density Bruckner compounds by condensing the rhythm of the main subject's last few bars ; this accelerates the end of each statement to launch the theme into its next statement in a crack-the-whip effect I've heard in no other fugue. The stretto is dauntingly dense. After further development of multiple themes in minor key there bursts, like a sunrise (or, this being Bruckner, the glory of God) , a remarkably circular fanfare passage in the major for full brass choirs, interspersed with upward-striving string figures. This subsides into a silence preceded by what sounds like an opening phrase for horn that is abruptly cut-off - an entrance original enough that early completers of the Finale muted it as much as possible with dynamic markings (Bruckner provided none) . Eventually, through more development, the chorale returns, then the « sunrise » fanfare completely reconfigured, then a restatement and combination of the main themes of the earlier movements, and a final statement of the chorale. What then follows is, or was, the Coda, the section for which no final draft pages survive. However, some of Bruckner's sketches for the Coda have recently resurfaced, and conform to a verbal description Bruckner gave his last physician, for whom he played them on piano. Here (and, especially, in the latest editions of the completions by Carragan and by Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips, and Cohrs) , the music does actually begin to sound like a vast cathedral by Calatrava or Gaudí, its high nave supported by asymmetric but structurally essential columns, arches, and cross-braces of sound. If architecture is frozen music, then this is music of a grandly flowing architectonics.

The finest examples of what is commonly called « absolute music » instill in the listener the sense of being told something of great importance that is as necessary as it is untranslatable. Listening over the last decade to Bruckner's dauntingly thorough working through of his musical and spiritual calculus in the various completions of the Finale, and many times more in preparing to write this survey, my sense has grown that this music says or embodies not only something that Bruckner stated in none of his other works, but that no one else has either. At some point in my listening, the Finale was no longer a jarring, bewildering addendum to a work whose 1st 3 movements I and most others had long considered « unfinished but complete » but, instead, now seemed a lifting onto another plane of all that had gone before - something that, in retrospect, put the long-familiar 1st 3 movements into a scale and proportion that now seems as « right » as it is new. The effect is at once exciting, expanding, and humbling. To paraphrase Ursula K. Le Guin on the fiction of John Crowley : those who enter this music are advised that they will leave it a different size than when they came in.

From being unable to conceive of the 9th with a Finale of any kind, I now find it difficult to conceive of it without this one, in these many versions of its lost true form - any more than I can imagine Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 without its final movement, which sums-up and transcends the 3 movements that precede it, even as it pulls them up after it onto its own loftier plane. The comparison is not idly chosen - the more I listen, the more the 2 works seem equal in scope, profundity, and originality. The various scholar-composers discussed below who have tried to bring us a version, in sound, of the last movement of Bruckner's last Symphony have done far more than add a footnote to the historical record, and even more than rescue a lost Masterpiece - they have retrieved from near oblivion the greatest work by one of our greatest composers.

The missing passages composed by the various « completers » surveyed below (particularly, the Coda, for which the least evidence in Bruckner's hand has survived) cannot be considered to be what Bruckner himself would have finally composed or approved or wanted performed. They are thus, ultimately, speculative interpolations, and can never be more than that. However, each completion gives us a good idea (some so good as to be utterly convincing) of, at least, the scale of the work Bruckner originally envisioned. And, in the best of them, every note is in Bruckner's own idiom, if not his hand.

In the brief description of each recording that follows, I discuss only the Finale. Unless otherwise noted, assume that the 1st 3 movements are one of the standard editions of the 9th Symphony, and that any remarks about the conducting or playing of the Finale, or the sound of the recording, can be applied to the 1st 3 movements as well. With the exception of the Eliahu Inbal recording, all include the Symphony's 1st 3 movements.

Most of these recordings are in print and easily available through Amazon.com or ArkivMusic.com. Others are available in the United States only through www.abruckner.com, a fascinating and comprehensive discographical website devoted to recordings of Bruckner's orchestral music ; I indicate which these are in the head matter.

I gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, William Carragan, and John F. Berky in the preparation, revising, and updating of this article.

The Fragments

Nikolaus Harnoncourt, Vienna Philharmonic, « RCA / BMG » 54332-2 (1 SACD / CD, 1 CD) . Total Time : 58:54 ;
Fragments : 17:58.

The best place to begin an exploration of the Finale is Nikolaus Harnoncourt's fascinating lecture-demonstration of only the fragments left fully orchestrated by Bruckner - about 18 minutes' worth of music. In his narration before a live audience, Harnoncourt, the highest-profile conductor to even approach « the Finale problem », however gingerly (he seems not to want to even consider performing any of the completions) , tells the story of Bruckner's last days, then conducts the 1st fragment, after which he explains how many bars are missing. He then conducts the next fragment, and so on. The entire sequence is recorded twice, once each with commentary in German and English. Also included is an alternate version of a fragment in which Bruckner's plangent dissonances were « corrected » by an early editor, to give an idea of how long it has taken for this music to be understood on its own terms. Harnoncourt ends with a heartfelt plea to anyone who might be hoarding any of the still-missing pages of the Finale to please send them along - anonymously if necessary, photocopies accepted. Since the release of this set, more fragments have indeed surfaced, but it remains a solid introduction to the task faced by the various completers, to exactly how much of the finished movement has come down to us in Bruckner's hand, and to how important this music is. Beautifully performed by the Vienna Philharmonic, in limpid high-resolution sound. (Peter Hirsch and the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra have also released, on « Sony Classical » SK 87316, a performance of the fragments. However, it was never released in the United States, is currently out of print, and I have not been able to track down a copy.)

An alternate Finale composed by Peter Jan Marthé

Peter Jan Marthé, European Philharmonic Orchestra, « Preiser Records » PR 90728 (2 CDs) . Total Time :
100:41 ; Finale : 30:14.

Peter Jan Marthé is a musico-mystical Austrian wildman of a conductor who recorded 3 of his Reloaded versions of Bruckner Symphonies (3, 5, 9) before his European Philharmonic Orchestra, disbanded in 2009. For the Finale of the 9th, instead of composing links no longer than needed to bridge Bruckner's surviving fragments and complete the orchestration, he came-up with his own free (and freewheeling) composition. It is only loosely based on the surviving fragments, some of which he re-writes, or discards altogether. He also adds cymbals, triangle, and contrabassoon to the entire Symphony. The result is based at least as much on Marthé's conviction that he was channeling Bruckner's spirit than on what Bruckner wrote. As he says in his liner note, Marthé believes that Bruckner composed not so much « Symphonies » as « shamanic ... archaic rituals of sounds ... the completed 9th is a 4 piece act of initiation » . Think of all that what you will, this needs to be heard to be believed. This 30 minute Finale sounds only intermittently like Bruckner and is, in a phrase, over the top. Marthé, at times, paints himself into musical corners from which he extracts himself only with the most extreme form of musical boot-strapping, with bombastic, even histrionic orchestral rhetoric that ends-up sounding less like Bruckner than what those who loathe the composer's music are convinced it sounds like.

Still, Marthé should not be automatically dismissed. Despite some fanfares that sound more like Gustav Mahler, there are moments of genuine inspiration : a new brass chorale Bruckner might not have been ashamed to have written, a final quote of the Adagio's main theme, and then a greatly extended Coda based on the climbing modulations of the Adagio of Symphony 7. No, they are not Bruckner, Marthé's composition doesn't ultimately hang together, and he doesn't know when to stop. But, as a conductor, he is a genuine Brucknerian who, to my ears, deeply understands what is most important about Bruckner's music (the combinations of richness and sparseness, sonority and space, silence and sumptuousness, vastness and humility) and, in the 1st 3 movements, proves his ability to get an Orchestra to embody it all in sound. His recording of the Reloaded Symphony 5 is probably one of the best ever made - Marthé makes the final double fugue of that Symphony « speak » more clearly than anyone since Sergiu Celibidache.

Marthé's recordings of Bruckner, including the 9th, are among the slowest, for reasons of his own taste and because all were recorded in the vast cathedral space of the « Stiftsbasilika Saint-Florian » , where Bruckner was organist for so many years and is now buried ; Marthé conducts the hall as much as his band. The sense of space is immense as, in the pauses between Bruckner's great periods, the reverberation seems to endlessly die away.

Yoav Talmi, Oslo Philharmonic, « Chandos » CHAN 7051(2) (2 CDs) . Total Time : 81:56 ; Finale : 21:58 ; Fragments : 15:53 (out of print on CD) .

This completion is elegantly idiomatic. A decided minimalist, William Carragan does as little as possible in constructing transitions between the fragments, and they are all the more convincing for it. Though, occasionally awkward, these are genuinely creative in sounding not as one would expect Bruckner to sound, but as one might expect to be surprised by Bruckner. This is one definition of creativity or genius : that which is utterly surprising while perfectly conforming to the voice or idiom already established. William Carragan has been careful to incorporate every note that Bruckner wrote, sacrificing nothing original. But Bruckner, of course, was not himself a minimalist : I find William Carragan's Coda, and his Finale overall, to at least feel too short - Coda, movement, and Symphony all seem to end too soon, skewing the scale of the entire work, which, at the close, sounds almost abruptly attenuated.

This set, like Harnoncourt's, includes separate recordings of the fully orchestrated fragments, though these are even more fragmentary - Harnoncourt had the benefit of another 2 decades' worth of further scholarship and rediscovered autograph pages. Yoav Talmi's sensitive leadership of the Oslo Philharmonic makes great sense of all 4 movements with clarity and careful phrasing, and the recording is warm, spacious, and luminous.

Akira Naito, Tokyo New City Orchestra, « Delta Entertainment » DCCA-0032 (CD) . Total Time : 77:36 ; Finale : 22:51 (available from www.abruckner.com) .

William Carragan's recent revision of his original completion is better in every way, though this recording is marred by too-forceful timpani strokes at the precise midpoint of the movement, in the great « sunrise » fanfare - a leap from mf to ff that obscures the bounding string figures that here so perfectly counterpoise the brass, and that fulfill such an important role throughout the movement. Still, the Coda is much improved, with pealing, cascading brass ; in fact, this is the most joyful of all attempts at a Coda, though in this recording it still sounds as if wrapped-up too soon. However, in a November 2009 performance in Scottsdale, Arizona, by Warren Cohen and « Musica-Nova », it worked astonishingly well. That event was the 1st performance of William Carragan's new, 2009 edition of the Finale, which, in summer 2010, will be performed and recorded at the Ebracher Festival, in Ebrach, Germany, by Gerd Schaller and the « Philharmonie Festiva ». Another curiosity of this disc is William Carragan's revision of the 2nd movement Scherzo, in which he has re-instated Bruckner's original and far inferior Trio, which the composer discarded early on. As far as I know, this is the only recording of this curiosity.

Although William Carragan's Finale is now the longest in sheer number of measures, it and the Coda still feel too short to me - Coda, movement, and Symphony all seem wrapped-up too soon. However, this may be as much a result of the tempo chosen as of the completion itself. William Carragan, who has made a study of the steady slowing of the tempos taken in Bruckner's Symphonies since the composer's time, insists on a brisk pace that I find too fast overall, at least, under Akira Naito's baton - ultimately, a matter of taste.

Nicolas Couton, MÁV Symphony, « Lirica » CD-107 (2 CDs) . Total Time : 82:04 ; Finale : 24:45 (available from www.abruckner.com) .

This intelligent and authentically Brucknerian completion by the Belgian-born composer Sébastien Letocart, still in his 30's (the completion and its exegesis comprise his Ph.D. thesis) , is intermittently somewhat awkward and extremely convincing. Overall, it works very well, but its real strength is its Coda. Letocart is, perhaps, the only completer to quote all of the themes from the Symphonies 5, 7, and 8 that Bruckner may or may not have intended to incorporate into the Coda. Here, Letocart has written some thrilling modulations and super-impositions of themes (as many as 4, at once) that not only work superbly on their own terms, but also within the contexts of movement and Symphony. And if Letocart's Coda is still not quite of the scale, Bruckner may have envisioned, it comes very close (but see : Samale-Mazzuca-Phillips-Cohrs, 2008) . I would love to hear a revision of this, should Letocart write one.

The conductor is 2nd rate ; the Orchestra 3rd rate ; the sound : muddy. However, the liner notes include not only references to the folio and bar numbers of the score, but also to the minutes and seconds of this recording. You can watch your CD player's time display to hear exactly where Bruckner leaves-off, Letocart picks-up, and Bruckner then resumes. (The only other recording to do this is the Carragan - Naito.)

Bruckner's 9th, a Final word ?

On the issue of the « Unfinished Finale » to Bruckner's 9th Symphony, several very worthwhile articles and essays have been written by experts, of which those written by the actual completors are primarily of interest here. The present essay was written by someone who is neither a musician nor a scholar in any way but who tries to present a « layman's view » . It was written without any pretence and should not be read as having any.

Virtually every creative artist in history has left unfinished or incomplete works (if only their last ones due to their having died before they could be completed) and, especially in older times, works that once were complete have reached us in an incomplete state. Several artists have left a considerable part of their « œuvre » incomplete. One may think of artists such as Michelangelo Buonarroti or Leonardo da Vinci. While one must deplore the fact that works were left incomplete or have survived incomplete, it does not necessarily mean that one cannot appreciate them because of their incompleteness. A work like Michelangelo's « Brutus » bust may be unfinished (at least, by the standards of its own time if not necessarily of ours) , but the sheer power it exudes cannot be missed. Leonardo's « The Adoration of the Magi » consists only of an underpainting (and even that is not complete) , so we will never know the splendour that it might have attained had it been completely finished by the artist ; nonetheless, one still can appreciate the work in the state that it has come down to us. The same artist's « Last Supper » fresco is today severely damaged, denying to us the full effect that it must have had on its 1st unveiling, but the power of Leonardo's genius still shines through. In some cases, one might even argue that the work, in its unfinished state, is more powerful than in what would have been its finished state ; one may think of Michelangelo's « Atlas » , or his « Saint-Matthew » , where the unfinished figures seem to wrestle mightily to wrench themselves from the stone that still encases them.

It may thus be concluded that the fact that a painting or sculpture that has come to us in an incomplete state (either by never having been finished by the artist or by having become damaged over time) does not necessarily mean that it will not suffer the fate of being discarded or ignored because of its incompleteness. How different the situation is in musical works that have been left to posterity in an incomplete form ! The one work with which this essay is concerned is the Unfinished Finale to the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner.

The final beginnings

It has been well-documented that Bruckner took more time to compose his last Symphony than any of his previous Symphonies (not counting the amount of time put into revisions) . He started work on the 9th sometime in 1888, and finished writing down the Adagio on the 30th of November 1896, after much toil and trouble. Bruckner's final 6 (or so) years were plagued by periods of increasing ill health which, in combination with his duties as professor at the Vienna Conservatory, took-up most of his energies. Working on the 9th was further greatly compromised by the refusal of the original version of the 8th Symphony by the conductor Hermann Levi, which resulted in Bruckner's extended revising not only of the 8th ; but also of the 3rd and 1st Symphonies, causing valuable time and energy to be lost. So, it was not until 1895 that Bruckner started work on the Finale of the 9th (although, I hope to argue further on that he had, at least, some conception of what the Finale was to be right from the start) . Considering his physical state, it is quite remarkable to see how much he got down on to paper, quite a bit of it even in a finished form as fully written out score. The total amount of material in the Finale as presently known apparently comprises several 100 pages of manuscript, ranging from sketches to short score to score drafts and finished orchestral score. Despite the fact that quite a bit is known to have been lost since Bruckner's death (or, at least, its whereabouts are currently unknown) , the total amount of material that we have in the Finale is vast indeed, considering that it was written by an old man in ill health, in little over 1 year.

But, 1st of all, do we need a Finale to Bruckner's 9th ? Many (still) seem to think not, choosing instead to believe that the 9th is a complete (enough) work in its 3 fully finished movements. One Doctor Max Steinitzer, in his introductory notes to an early set of scores of all the numbered Symphonies, calls the Adagio of the 9th :

In his 1940 essay, « The Life of Anton Bruckner » , the writer Gabriel Engel describes the 3 movements of the 9th in a way that, today, more than 70 years later, to many is still ultimate truth. He writes :

« From sketches found among his posthumous effects, we know it had been his intention to add to this glorious work a purely instrumental Finale, perhaps, in the manner of the closing portion of his “ Tragic ” Symphony.

Yet, little though he realized it, when the last note of this Adagio dies out there is no expectation unfulfilled. It is as if he has confessed all, poured-out his very soul in this music, so that the work he despaired of ever finishing, the work he died thinking incomplete, now strikes the listener as a perfect Symphony unit needing no prescribed Finale. »

Moreover, some even think that a Finale is not just unnecessary, but even undesirable. The late Georg Tintner, in his liner notes (written over 80 years after Steinitzer) to his (fine) recording of the Symphony writes :

« The already ailing Bruckner spent the last 2 years of his life trying frantically to complete the Finale of his 9th. It is not meant cruelly when I say that I, for one, am glad that Fate did not grant him his wish, because the material intended for the Finale is just as unworthy of what is, perhaps, Bruckner's greatest music as is the unfinished material of Schubert's 8th. The various efforts of the brilliant scholars who have recently made performing versions of Bruckner's Finale will be of entirely historical interest. I, for one, do not want to hear anything after this most moving of farewells. »

This (rather extreme) statement (which reminds one of the remarks written about the completion of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony, at a time before it had become commonly accepted) is perhaps just one example of the almost generally accepted vision that the 9th is complete, as it is, and that not only does it require no additional music in the form of a Finale but also that it is perhaps even better off without it ; a vision with which I cannot agree. In the words of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in his liner notes to the recording of the complete 9th on « Naxos » :

« To this day, Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony languishes in a purgatory of misunderstanding, false interpretation, even barbaric mishandling, having long fallen “ victim to prey ” (Adorno) . »

Musings on the 9th Symphony and its Finale

(Martyn Becker.)

Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony remains a strange hybrid of enigma and paradox. In the unfinished form that it has come down to us, it is undoubtedly one of its composer's triumphs exhibiting as it does a further enhancement of the Symphonic form that showed itself to be so spectacularly heaven-storming in the 8th. But here, in the 9th, there are fundamental differences. Yes, the huge bi-partite structure of Bruckner's unique post-Sonata form 1st movements is there, and even more grittily hewn than previously, but there is something else too : a fear, an uncertainty, a lack of surety about the musical direction that had always been there in his previous Symphonies ; hence, the potential paradoxes. We will see where this may have come from as we progress. But, of course, what marks this Symphony out from all its fellows is that fact that Bruckner did not on the face of it, complete it (or, at least, if he did, then it has not come down to us in that form. Hence, the enigma - was it finished but we no longer have access to all of its materials ? And if « completion » based on the extant materials is acceptable, then how close to the actual sound of Bruckner do any of the completions really get ? When the late Malcolm MacDonald orchestrated an aria from Havergal Brian's Opera « The Tigers » , in 1975, he did so assuming that the full-score had been lost. When the full-score turned-up just a couple of years later, Brian's actual scoring of the aria was so different to MacDonald's that the latter was immediately withdrawn. Granted, the Finale to Bruckner's 9th has a clear ground plan and many orchestrated stretches, so that, perhaps, more assumptions can be made. We will come to this in good time.

So : what about the portions of the 9th that were fully complete in their 1st versions ? I stress « 1st versions » because with only the exceptions of the 6th and 7th Symphonies, every mature Symphony was revised at some stage, and for some reason. It is, therefore, more than likely that once complete, the 9th may well have been revised also. Given the quality of what remains, this, then, is perhaps not a comfortable thought ! Composition was begun on the 9th Symphony within 2 weeks of the completion of the 1st version of the 8th, in 1887, and it occupied Bruckner, off and on, for the last 9 years of his life ; more semi-continuous work than for any other of his previous Symphonies. Conductor Hermann Levi's rejection of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony had precipitated almost a revision fever in Bruckner that resulted in immediate and extensive revision of the 8th, followed by further work on the 1st and 3rd Symphonies. These revisions occupied a significant proportion of his time, from 1890 until 1892, and were additional to the preparations for the Albert J. Gutmann publication of the 4th Symphony.

All the while, Bruckner was composing continuing to compose Motets and choral settings. His beautiful setting of Psalm 150 for chorus and orchestra dates from 1892 while his largest secular choral setting was undertaken the following year, when Bruckner fulfilled a commission to set August Silberstein's poem « Helgoland » for the Vienna Mens' Choir. Scored for male voice choir and a more normal-sized late-Romantic Orchestra, the orchestration included cymbals : only the 2nd time that he had scored for these instruments of his own volition, the 1st time having been in the 8th Symphony. If we accept the 9th Symphony as being incomplete, then « Helgoland » was Bruckner's last completed orchestral work.

The unsettling effect of Bruckner's almost constant revising process alongside the continuation of composition, at this time, must have taken undue toll on his mental processes and religious beliefs, because the struggle that was much in evidence in the 8th takes on almost a 3 dimensional quality in the 9th. Towards the end of his life, Bruckner was finding it more and more difficult to concentrate on his composing and frequently became confused, a situation exacerbated by physical frailty. The 9th, however, remained an overriding obsession with Bruckner and he expended huge amounts of effort on it ; he was still working on the composition of the Finale on the morning of his death, on October 11th 1896, although the last dated entry on the music was August 11th of that year.

The 8th Symphony had seen Bruckner standing astride the Symphonic world in Mastery : the 9th now took a metaphorical leap into interstellar space. The musical and formal expansion that had culminated in the composition of the 8th was still capable of producing music that was externally-focussed, in the sense that at no time does the listener feel that the music is « about » anything to do with its composer. There was a process of exploration and discovery at work in the 8th ; but it was not a personal discovery. Here, in the 9th, though, we can detect a deep and disturbing introspection and deep personal unease right from the outset. There are intrinsic dissonances, harmonic sideslips and a sense of weirdness that pervade the music throughout the completed movements. Gigantic intervals are part and parcel of the fabric of this last Symphony. These points all indicate a subtle if subconscious change of direction for Bruckner. This was clearly different to that between the 5th and 6th Symphonies : the change of direction there was intentional and experimental.

The harmonic language in the 8th had been becoming more daring but, here, in the 9th, Bruckner was treading a lonely path towards a dissonant abyss with the spectre of atonality not that far over the horizon.

Design

That Bruckner fully intended to complete his 9th has never been in doubt. Even so, the first three movements stand alone very well indeed; they do not appear to need the resolution of a Finale since the sublimity of the Adagio's coda almost appears to need no following. This is only an illusion though ; the previous 3 movements appear complete because they have always had to : there has been no complete Finale to round it all off. However, it is obvious that Bruckner intended the sort of huge Finale that had been provided for the 8th because a large amount of music exists for it, dating from the last 2 years of his life. It may be that Bruckner, with one eye on his mortality, may have designed the music such that the tensions set-up, in the earlier parts of the Symphony, may not have needed resolution in the Finale, if it transpired that it did not get completed. By itself, this indicates that maybe Bruckner was not as mentally frail as many have assumed.

If this was the case though, then why did he then suggest that the « Te Deum » of 1883 could be used as a Finale, if the music itself did not get completed ? This surely must have been something of a conscious red herring on Bruckner's part since the key structure, harmonic trend and musical logic just would not be satisfied by this approach - not to mention the change in musical language that had occurred in the elapsed time since the « Te Deum » , and the differences in orchestration. Given the sense of « non sequitur » that would be obvious from the performance of a C minor work as a Finale to a D minor Symphony, it is understandable that very few conductors would appear to have taken this suggestion up. Herbert von Karajan came close to it, in 1986, when he performed the incomplete 9th followed by the « Te Deum » in the succeeding concert, at that year's Salzburg Easter Festival.

As we shall see from the discussions on the Finale that follow, the music that remains for that movement forms, at the very least, the basis of a very coherent set of ideas on how the music was to have been. A very clear perspective has been put on this by Australian musicologist John Alan Phillips, who was commissioned by the Leopold Nowak and the International Bruckner Society, in the early 1990's, to work on the extant material of the Finale with a view to its inclusion in the complete Bruckner Edition. Phillips' perspective is that what remains are not « sketches » at all, but the remains of a draft complete « emerging » 1st score with parts of it missing. Bruckner's compositional methods have been described elsewhere by authors such as Paul Hawkshaw and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs as well as Phillips himself, such that it is not necessary to repeat them here. However, it is clear from their studies that given Bruckner's methods, a 1st draft continuous score likely did exist at some point prior to his death.

It has been speculated elsewhere that the music of the Finale perhaps appears to be at a lower level of inspiration than that of the 1st 3 movements, but this is surely moot. The level of invention remains high in the Finale, but it continues to move away from the traditional Bruckner model in the same way that the rest of the Symphony does. And there are clues to what was driving this thought process in the fabric of the music, which we will come to presently. Of course, it is also possible that rather than just drying-up as far as inspiration was concerned as a number of writers in the past (including Robert Simpson) have intimated, that the compositional task he had set himself was just too great ; but the circumstantial evidence from the fully-scored sections do not seem to bear this out. Bruckner undoubtedly saw the resolution of this Symphony in his mind's eye but it has not come down to us like that in complete form.

There is no doubt that Bruckner's physical condition was placing a great deal of strain on the compositional process. Indeed, the struggle, the terror that exists within the completed music of the 9th symphony itself was perhaps too much for its composer to handle. Whilst we can conjecture theories of why the music may not have come down to us in a complete written-down form, it seems that Bruckner himself did know how it was to finish. Bruckner's personal physician, Doctor Richard Heller indicates as much in his memoirs. Doctor Heller even says that Bruckner played him parts of a projected complete Finale on his beloved « Bösendorfer » concert piano that was to culminate in a hymn of praise to his « Dear Lord » based as it was stated to be, on the « Alleluia from the 2nd movement » . This reference is a little confusing since there does not seem to be any heavenly aspect whatsoever to the infernal 2nd movement : quite the reverse, in fact. Or was the great Adagio originally to be placed 2nd ? Or did Heller mishear Bruckner, who may have meant the 2nd movement of the 8th Symphony ? There are certainly a number of melodic candidates in that movement that would fit the bill, and these have been potentially identified by more recent scholastic efforts. Or, perhaps, the reference was more wishful thinking than actuality on Bruckner's part with regard to the « hymn of praise » , for the music of the completed movements appears to say something entirely different, as we will see.

The 9th, as it stands (including the Finale) , is scored for strings, triple woodwind, brass including 8 horns (4 doubling Wagner tubas in the Adagio and the projected last movement) , a bass tuba and timpani.

Feierlich : misterioso

The 1st movement is dreadful, in the truest sense of the word. There is a sense of fear and foreboding right from the outset of this enormous edifice that is built as a huge unit hinged in the middle between statement and counter-statement, in the same way that we saw previously in the 8th. The music itself opens with a baleful portent of doom on 8 horns, sung « mezzo forte » in unison over « tremolando » strings, following the woodwinds' intonation of a quiet D minor chord. It is a doleful, inhuman moan that seems to blow from the gates of Hell itself. Strangely, this opening motif of 6 notes describing a rising and then falling minor 3rd has resonances in many of Bruckner's previous Symphonies. The melodic shape is the same as that found at the start of Henry Purcell's sacred Motet « Hear my prayer, O Lord » , with an added introductory grace note on the tonic. Did Bruckner know Purcell's music ? Very possibly, given his extensive career as a church and cathedral organist. If so, did the sentiment of Purcell's Motet strike a chord of hope in the composer ? Again, possibly, but we shall come to this discussion. Then, there is the slow rhythm which is a slight variation of the rhythm that opened the 8th Symphony but, in this case, there is a flatter, less questing edge to it. It is almost as if it is a statement to which there is no possible reply rather than the opening of a Symphonic argument.

The musical build-up or « forhoftechnik » rears-up into a slow, deliberate crescendo with the orchestra racing furiously, but statically, in all sections over a rapid downward-moving 4 note semi-tonal shape, until the main theme crashes-out in stunning unison, fff. This main subject group contains many thematic elements which all play a part in the statement section of this massive bi-partite movement. The huge orchestral unison tutti delivers a monolithic D minor theme that is truly gigantic and awesome, and contains the 1st of the wide intervals that are such a feature of this Symphony. The orchestra in unison slams down 3 downward octave leaps within the space of a few bars, ending with an upward-moving brass shape that will form a crucial feature at the end of the Coda. There is a kind of « tierce de Picardie » which then fades into a tense quiet over rapidly fading tremolo strings, now in the major - or a version of it. Already, we are aware of the tension and agitated nature of the music. Raindrop pizzicati transport us back to the minor key and to the 2nd subject « gesangsperiode » , whose troubled and supplicating nature on massed strings does nothing to calm the tension created by the 1st subject. High violins plead uselessly as the movement begins to gather irresistible momentum, and mysterious horns and woodwind lead over « tremolando » strings, to the 3rd subject group that has been a continuous feature of Bruckner's Sonata form structure. To call this huge process « exposition » is simply not enough in this context. The Classical Sonata design of Haydn or Mozart is as far from this creation as a seagull is from a pteranodon. Tutti strings and brass over timpani thunder underline the feeling of uneasy terror that is building inexorably, with dissonant flute octave drops over horns and strings. A dangerous lull modulates around a tense horn / flute interchange within which a development process is obviously working.

The counter-statement then begins with a vast elaboration of the introduction that is metamorphosed in Bruckner's re-invented Sonata form almost unrecognisably into a nightmarish reflection of itself. The unison theme with its octaves is re-stated, but over a feverish activity in the strings that run up and down the scale as if trying to find an entry point into the huge edifice that is being presented in the brass. The woodwind restate the « gesangsperiode » over dogged pizzicato strings and the music moves onwards as if hypnotised : it is being drawn onwards like the jungle pig that falls prey to the hypnotic movements of an anaconda. The inevitability of the process is both obvious and terrifying : it is the way of things.

The music heaves and boils like a cauldron and the unison main theme is upon us again, vast and tortuous, with ff strings shrieking wildly in rapid chromatic scalic descents. Dissonance crashes against dissonance with a terror and ferocity hitherto unparalleled in Bruckner ; not even in the 8th. There is a pause for breath and then a dogged ascent to a terrifying climax begins, which is topped by high trumpets that ultimately plunge over a precipice into the chasm of a huge and fearsome minor tenth. The « gesangsperiode » reappears, beautifully ornamented ; but this cannot allay the demons that have been awakened. The violins, again, cry-out but are swallowed by lushly harmonic brass as the final climax of the counter-statement rears its dissonant head.

Forlorn brass introduce the massive coda that ultimately rears at us, vast, black and unforgiving. It unleashes a unison declamation, followed by dotted figures on horns and low brass that drive relentlessly to a trenchant bare-5th howl on the trumpets : a musical black hole into which the movement vanishes.

Scherzo : bewegt lebhaft. Trio : schnell

The Scherzo that follows is a world away from those of its kind that preceded it, even that of the 8th ; hardly the « light relief » that Scherzi are usually supposed to provide. Flickering chromatic wraiths in the woodwind based around a dissonant 2nd underpin nervous pizzicato strings. A crescendo propels the unnerved listener into a demonically stamping Scherzo motto after the pause of just a heartbeat in what is the start of a foreshortened Sonata-type structure. The noises in the whole orchestra suggest not so much the bucolic cavorting of dancing feet as a War dance of subterranean demons. It is dissonant, modulatory, fearsome and contains absolutely nothing of the pleasant rusticity of earlier Scherzi. That world seems universes away. Strings meander upward providing a different key base in virtually every bar, until the demons' cackling is heard again. The oboe tries to provide some light relief with a simple tune but it is hurried away by frightened violins, until a pause delivers us back into the stamping bacchanale.

The 3-8 trio breaks with Brucknerian tradition in actually being substantially faster in pulse than its surrounding Scherzo and it consciously tries to inject some levity into the proceedings with its miniature free Rondo. Grave strings introduce a note of caution but warbling woodwind over a robust chromatic cello line thumb their noses at it. The original sketches for this section indicates that Bruckner's original intention was actually for a slow central section dominated by a solo viola, but there is no doubt that the later inspiration is the more telling. Then, the demonic Scherzo returns in a literal repeat of its 1st appearance and all is chaos once more.

Adagio : langsam, feierlich

The Adagio that follows is not the grief-torn document that is the Adagio of the 8th : rather, it seems to embody the grave acceptance of a hopeless fate, although the music itself is by no means simple or resignatory. Founded on a basis of Sonata form, the Adagio opens with desperate searching for a tonality. A tortured upward 9th on the strings (pre-dating a similar opening in the slow movement of Mahler's 9th Symphony by over a decade) leads chromatically to a bright D major brass « arpeggio », which dissolves into mist. Ruminating cellos lead us through a magical modulatory passage fronted by the woodwind until one of the most astonishing and beautiful of all of Bruckner's orchestral passages shimmers into the soundscape. Short, fragmentary fanfares on antiphonal horns and trumpets shine-out over dissonant « tremolando » strings and thundering timpani, ff, producing a vision of eternity that itself seems timeless. Twice it sounds, and then gives way to a 4 note descending motif on the quartet of Wagner tubas and a pair of horns over bare string accompaniment. Bruckner marked this passage in the manuscript « lebewohl » (farewell to life) which, in fact, derives from a passage in the Finale of the 8th. Here, however, it is comfortless music that dissolves into apologetic fragmentary figures on tubas and strings.

Elegiac strings expound a beautiful, noble theme (related to the Miserere and Gloria from Bruckner's Mass in D minor) and the woodwind extend it into a development full of beautiful but barren harmonies. Cellos take-up the eulogy followed by violins and then brass in chorales over pizzicato strings, but it is all forlorn. The acceptance of fate casts a shadow on the entire proceedings ; things are, indeed, as they appear to be. There is a pause and the opening is recapitulated but, this time, without reaching the eternity music. It is as if Bruckner is saying that eternity is not the way forward here - that we must look for something else. In its place, we hear a flute inversion of the opening theme over strings, themselves un-inverted which produces weird dissonances. Again, this is an inspired moment.

A hollow march breaks in, like an overblown funeral « cortège » . The trumpet figure is very reminiscent of the final tonic / dominant / tonic motif at the end of the 3rd Symphony - except that the final tonic is elevated by a semi-tone, and then followed by a tonic on the next octave up. This shadow of the 3rd Symphony (which he was revising at around this time) is repeated and extended until there is, yet, another pause. Bruckner could here have been parodying his own inability to control this music such as he had been able to do in the past. Then, belatedly, the eternity music returns as if in some kind of redemption, but the music in the major fades-out into meanderings in the minor, unfulfilled. There is here a sense of hopelessness regarding the direction that is necessary to be taken. The oboe reminds us of the « lebewohl » and, then, the ascent to the movement's climax is on.

Some kind of hope should theoretically be in sight now, because Bruckner's slow movement climaxes have always cadenced into the major, towards salvation. Sure enough, we get feelings in the brass chorale that maybe we are indeed going to get a transition into the major but the question is how, because in reality salvation seems a million miles away. The ascent speeds-up and the brass heave. Woodwinds meander on a high plateau and radiant strings shine an unexpected beam of light into the gloom. Stubborn dissonant woodwind underpin chromatic sideslips in the cellos, and the elegiac 2nd subject returns over a purposeful bass.

The vast peak of the climax looms and hope builds : but, then, there is an unexpected tonal wrench sideways and the orchestral build-up rushes headlong not into a bright major resolution, but into utter catastrophe at its peak. The orchestra blares not salvation but a gigantic, fearsome negating chord that exposes 7 dissonant notes from the chromatic scale, including a « missed octave » of C-sharp to C-natural. It is violent, implacable, terrifying ; and the music thunders shakenly and fearfully to a standstill. Doom now seems assured ; but, out of the carnage, comes a strangely peaceful, benevolent ending to the movement. The ascent that took us to the initial vision of eternity appears again, making us think that eternity will appear, yet again, to cap this glorious, yet, fearsome movement - but Bruckner fools us again : it is not to be. The strings wriggle chromatically down to a calm and serene D major acceptance of things as they are, punctuated by very Schubertian horn interjections. So ends a movement that finally recalls allusions to themes from not only the 8th Symphony, but from the opening of the 7th as well.

Reception

Bruckner's pupils, Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe, could not leave what they knew of the Master's music alone and, in 1903, produced an edition of the completed 3 movements that falsely recasts much of the music, producing a version that was sanitised for public consumption. The work's dissonances were toned down, especially that of the 3rd movement's climax that was muted into a more usual minor 7th chord. The publication of the original score edited by Alfred Orel, in 1932, and the subsequent performance in Vienna, under Clemens Krauß, showed how daringly original Bruckner's own harmony was at this point, and what the world had been missing for 30 years. The edition by Orel (later re-edited by Leopold Nowak, in 1951, and limited mainly to typographical errors ; later by Hans-Hubert Schönzeler and then most recently by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in 2000) underlined the vindication of the vision of Bruckner's original, setting it in its place alongside the other Symphonies. Indeed, it was the back-to-back performance of both versions, the « old » Löwe score and the new Orel side-by-side in a semi-private concert, in 1932, by the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Siegmund von Hausegger that encouraged the International Bruckner Society, in Vienna, to authorise a « Complete Edition » (« Gesamtausgabe ») of authentic scores for all of Bruckner's Symphonies.

As an appendix to his 1932 score, Orel also cast what was known of the extant music from the Finale into a more-or-less continuous 4 stave short score so that its design could be studied. Imperfect though, the existing movements may be (and bearing in mind the fact that Bruckner would surely have revised the original draft) , it stands as his deepest testimonial to human life in general and his life in particular as he saw it. It was the culmination of his composing career that he must have known was to go no further.

Finale

Bruckner did not live to complete the Finale to his massive last Symphony and, as such, the work remained one of music's greatest shipwrecks for many years. That this Finale entailed an enormous mental struggle on the part of its composer is sometimes implied from what, on the surface, could be viewed as the sometimes pedestrian incompleteness of the extant material, and the relatively long space of time that Bruckner devoted entirely to its composition - nearly 2 years.

The question must be asked though ; does it only appear that way because Bruckner (and, specifically, the music that he was composing) was again in transition ? As noted above, and following the majestic triumph of the 5th Symphony, Bruckner changed direction somewhat in the 6th. Tools that he had used in the 5th such as the brass chorale were rested in the 6th which, itself, was altogether more energetic and enigmatic. Here, in the 9th, we can discern the same kind of process, although it is fascinating to contemplate what kind of change that Bruckner could have been thinking about in his declining years. To be sure, the construction (and re-construction) of the 8th Symphony must have taken its toll on Bruckner. And, in any case, what could possibly come after the apocalyptic 8th, which « soubriquet » has come to be attached to that Symphony ? We have already seen how the term « apocalyptic » has become associated with the 8th - some recordings even carry this word inaccurately as the Symphony's title - but we need to evaluate why this is.

With the 2 possible exceptions of the 4th and 8th Symphonies, there is precious little to suggest that Bruckner ever considered his music to be « inspired » by any specific literary or visual source. His waning health was obviously playing on his mind in terms of his mortality ; the « farewell to life » on the Wagner tubas in the 9th Symphony's Adagio has already been alluded to. That specific motifs and rhythms held particular significance for Bruckner must be obvious to any Brucknerphile : the repeated reference to tonic-dominant-tonic, the duplet / triplet « Bruckner rhythm » ; these devices appear almost unbidden throughout his œuvre. So while the composer may have been attempting to court popularity by assigning tentative programs to some of the Symphonies (just like Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe did by sanitising the scoring after Bruckner's death) , the real meaning of what the music meant to him was left to the unspoken programmes that he wove into the musical fabric, one Symphony to the next.

This matter crystallises in the unfinished Finale of the 9th in a way that shows how Bruckner was searching for a way out of the monster he was unwittingly creating. Is it fanciful to think that in the Finale of the 9th symphony, the composer was trying-out shapes and fragments from previous Symphonies, to see if there was something that would help him transfigure the nightmarish visions of the earlier movements into the kind of transcendent glory that he had achieved at the end of the 8th ? No more fanciful I think, than the postulated religious associations that some commentators have in the past made with reference to the music. Indeed, one of the forces behind one of the major performing versions of the 9th's Finale, John Alan Phillips has likened the Adagio and Finale to « death and transfiguration » or, perhaps, the « death and purgatory » of Catholic belief. One of Phillips' erstwhile « SPCM » reconstruction colleagues, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has also even gone so far in his 2005 paper on his revision of the Phillips' team's completion, to give a very fanciful interpretation of the Finale as representing Christ on the cross, resurrection and eternal glory, even to the extent of « identifying » a 4 note motif that he interprets as representing the cross. A Dutch commentator, Aart van der Wal, makes the same assertion. While I wholly admire Cohrs' scholarship and almost impeccable sense of direction in his latest revisions, I cannot agree with his programmatic assertions that assign overt religious symbolism to the unfinished Finale - especially, when there seems to be ample evidence in the tortured stretches of the music itself, that Bruckner was having severe doubts about his faith. Not only did the composer himself not make any programmatic references to the Finale, but that it would have been completely out of character for him to do so. Bruckner's doctor, Richard Heller, speaks of the composer saying that he was bringing back the « Hallelujah from the 2nd movement » to crown the Finale with praise - but then Bruckner would say that, wouldn't he. If the faith that you had held all your adult life was slipping away in the face of your mortality, would you not assign a major composition to the Dear Lord, as something of a backstop ? All of his Symphonies ended with strenuous affirmation of some kind or another, and the evidence suggests that the 9th would have been no different.

Which brings us to - what exists in the Finale that shows us what Bruckner's true inspiration might have been ? As indicated, the religious symbolism is surely fanciful and seems to have little basis in evidence - but the music itself surely gives the lie to where his inspiration was coming from. If we remember that Bruckner had been working on revisions of earlier Symphonies during the construction of the 9th then, maybe, it is not surprising to find some notable allusions. But, here, in the Finale, we have more than allusions. We see direct quotations from earlier Symphonies, perhaps one of the most obvious being the Adagio's « farewell to life » that derived from a passage in the Finale of the 8th. This « lebewohl » became transfigured in the 9th's Finale but it was not alone in its appearance, because there are obvious references to the 6th (a passage from the Finale) , the 3rd (the shape and harmonic treatment from the 1st movement) and, most obviously and extensively, the very opening of the 1st numbered Symphony.

The monothematic nature of the 9th's Finale has been stated to be obsessive by Bruckner scholars but I believe that the key to the thematic construction of this movement is not the downward-moving opening motif itself but the upward-moving clarinet response that immediately answers it. As well as almost being very close to a literal retrograde inversion of the opening flourish, this response has the exact shape, melodic and rhythmic content of the opening string motif of the 1st numbered Symphony. Not only that, it is repeated, again and again, often enough throughout the movement to indicate that it must have had substantial meaning for the composer. We know that he had a special place in his affections for his 1st Symphony (Bruckner never really counted his F minor « studiensinfonie » as his true « 1st »), so what might have been more natural in trying to bring this most difficult Symphony of all to closure, than to use the germ of his 1st Symphony to try to achieve it? The basis of the Finale's exposition was laid out at the end of the 1880's when Bruckner was still relatively fit and healthy, so that its inclusion here cannot be dismissed as the meanderings of a sick old man. It was a clear point of focus.

The extent to which the 1st Symphony influenced the 9th's Finale will be seen when we analyse the music more closely.

What remains of the Finale

The final emergence of Bruckner's late-Symphonic style as presented in the 7th, 8th and 9th Symphonies had taken on a form and significance that was unequalled in Symphonic music since Beethoven, and one that Bruckner himself was, perhaps, not fully equipped to handle in the last year or so of his life. The remnants of the final movement of this last Symphony present testimony to the compositional paradox that Bruckner had himself created.

The surviving completed movements of the 9th point the way to a ferociously complex Finale that was to have been pivoted at its centre in the same way as the 1st movement had been. At the end of his life, Bruckner may have been less capable of supplying the kind of mental focus necessary at this point in his life in order to complete the music as he had probably originally envisaged it in his mind's eye. If we had access to the continuous evolving score that is likely to have existed at one time in the evolution of the Finale, we would of course know better what the ultimate intent was. In context though, the task would have taxed a completely healthy man to his very limits. The work may have indeed been irreconcilable in normal Brucknerian fashion even then; hence the use of the 1st Symphony's motif in attempting to bind it all together.

Taken at face value then, what we know of the musical draft may not, on the surface, have seemed to indicate a Finale of a quality similar to that with which he had imbued the 1st 3 movements - but we must use caution here. Is the music, as we see it, simply uninspired, or is it deliberately spare and single-minded, awaiting revelation at the conclusion? Is it the conscious change of direction that we have already discussed? We must not forget that the music of the Finale was very much a 1st version « work in progress », and that what exists now may not even have been what finally appeared even as a 1st complete score. Unless and until the continuous score of the Finale reappears, we just cannot know. What we may perhaps see in the extant musical bi-folios, is Bruckner working to get the structural proportions right in terms of harmonic and rhythmic dimension before filling in other « smaller » details; such as, perhaps, the melodic interest.

It must also be stressed that, in all likelihood, the finished 1st version Symphony would have been completely revised in its entirety had Bruckner lived long enough, since that was what he had been doing in the main since the rejection of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony, in 1887. If as is likely the Finale of the 9th did in fact reach a complete continuous score form, then Bruckner would have identified any unintentional shortcomings that he may have thought that it had, and substantially re-composed it; indeed there is evidence in the Finale's re-workings of the statement exposition that he had already started doing this. Here, we are again assuming that what exists represents inferior musical thought, which may not actually be the case as we shall see. The music, therefore, represents comprehensive 1st thoughts on how this huge Symphony might have found its conclusion. Note the emphasis.

What have actually survived from 2 years of struggle with the music are some 550 plus bars of occasionally fully-scored manuscript bi-folios and, sometimes, some single harmonic lines. They display some fascinating ideas based around the musical subjects being built from much the same thematic idea. That it is a move away from the contrasting style of previous Symphonies is very clear, but it is not unusual within the context of this Symphony's musical content. For example, the « gesangsperiode » of the 1st movement was not the song-like interlude that we have heard in the past, but a restless and striving quest.

During a « BBC » broadcast of 1974 where the scored fragments plus others prepared by Hans-Hubert Schönzeler were played, Bruckner scholar Paul Hamburger called the music of the Finale « obsessive » ; the same word that has been used in the context of the « Bruckner rhythm » in the 4th and 8th Symphonies. If it is obsessive though, this could be the obsession to maintain the philosophical thrust of the music's construction - or maybe there is a different process to think about here. I have already suggested that the opening motif of the 1st Symphony is critical to the thrust of this Finale and there are other echoes of the 1st Symphony to be found in the music of the 9th, especially in the Adagio. It is a possibility that, in this Finale, the main falling theme of the movement is deliberately and retrospectively constructed from the motif in inversion, to create the opening shape. The 2nd subject of the Finale is clearly derived from the 1st and is ostensibly a pale shadow of it in the minor ; almost as if the lack of transcendent vision that we might have been expecting at the climax of the Adagio is still nagging away at the composer. If the 1st and 2nd subject groups were derived from the main theme of the 1st Symphony in reverse then this would explain why the entire movement is generated in the way that it seems to be. In other words, perhaps the theme's extension into the « gesangsperiode » was a deliberate ploy to begin the musical development even earlier than he had done previously : so, potentially, it may have been a further prototype development of the statement / counter-statement / coda model into something that would become ever more distant from the models of Mozart and Beethoven.

The main musical idea of the opening of the statement consists of 2 pairs of notes spread-out over the enormous interval of a 10th repeated over and over, this idea then invading the 2nd subject. Past opinion has had it that if the completed movement was to have been based on the material that has survived, Bruckner's mental condition at the time means that, perhaps, it is just as well that it was not completed. In this condition, the Finale would have been a disappointment after the imperfect but stunning 1st 3 movements. Is this really the case, though ? Spare, yes : tortured, definitely (but then, other composers who were near death did strange things in their music) just look at the parallel case of Tchaïkovsky who turned his Symphonic process on its head with the stunningly original « Pathétique » . The lie to what may have been in the back of Bruckner's mind might be indicated by those clarinet responses to the 1st utterings of the theme which trace the exact shape, melody and rhythm of the opening theme of the 1st Symphony of 30 years previously. It is really not too fanciful to think that a composer, aware of his mortality and very prone to quote himself in any case, consciously brought in allusions to his favourite « cheeky minx » (as he fondly called his 1st) in this Finale as well as in the preceding Adagio. In the composer's characteristic late telescoped and hinged Sonata form, then, the Finale might therefore have, perhaps, attempted to transform the « lebewohl » theme of the Adagio (which itself derived from the Finale of the 8th) through the medium of the 1st Symphony into a redemptory chorale for the brass and may have thus brought the whole work to an affirmatory conclusion.

The material that is extant actually indicates most of the way towards achieving this goal. What exists within the fragments that came to light in the more distant past and indeed more recently, is an emerging score whose continuity is demonstrable through a number of linked (or linkable) and performable orchestral fragments that would have accounted for, perhaps, up to 75 % of a completed movement. Without more recently-discovered bi-folios, the order of the orchestral fragments within the structure often had to be much of an educated guess with the exception of the exposition section of the statement. This, indeed, was the case with some of the earlier reconstruction attempts by William Carragan, Italian musicologists Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca. The exposition section itself of what was almost certainly designed as a typical late-Bruckner bi-partite Sonata structure is more or less complete in itself but the continuation into development is interrupted numerous times by small, at least 16 bar gaps, in the emerging score.

The material gives much more than mere glimpses of an intended structure and its ultimate end (or, at least, its construction) is fairly certain - although Bruckner had he lived would almost certainly have recast it. Indeed, as if beginning the process early, Bruckner made no fewer than 5 separate drafts of the opening exposition section or its components alone, of which the last is sadly lost. Indeed, it seems that he was not completely happy with the versions that he had constructed because of the changes of melodic and harmonic direction that appear between some of the drafts. It is only in the 3rd of the expositional fragments that the music's harmonic direction appears to be a little more complete. As was the norm during Bruckner's compositional process, more or less the last thing that was laid down was the melodic line, and that certainly seems to be a feature of this part of the movement also. This, indeed, may be why some past commentators thought that the material of the Finale was thin and uninspired : because the final strands of completion (the melodic lines) may not have been fleshed-out to the required extent. Because of the compositional stage of the movement as a whole, it is entirely feasible that much of the rhythmic subtlety that is normally a part of Bruckner's musical construction is, therefore, also missing, so that at least 2 of the 3 fundamental constructional blocks of melody, harmony and rhythm are in quite rudimentary form — which, of course, does not assist anyone with any reconstruction attempts.

The construction and direction of the music seems clear ; but many of the more detailed melodic aspects look to have been on Bruckner's mental drawing board when he died. The 4 note dropping motif may thus have been a shorthand version of a completed theme structure inspired by the 1st Symphony motif or, perhaps, some other kind of mnemonic. However, as we have seen, it may already be complete in itself because of the 4 note 1st Symphony woodwind motif that immediately answers the downward-directed opening. If the downward-directed motif is only a short-hand version of a 1st theme though, how could it be extended and still have such a perfect foil in the quotation from the 1st

Symphony ?

The concept of « completion »

To date, a number of « completions » of the sketches for the 9th's Finale have been attempted and many of these have been preserved in recordings. The concept of Symphonic completion itself is not new ; many Symphonies by well-known composers have been reconstructed and given performing editions. Pre-eminent among parallel cases is one that has been already mentioned ; Deryck Cooke's performing version of Mahler's 10th Symphony, plus others by other composers. Then, there exist Brian Newbould's versions of Schubert's 7th and incomplete 10th Symphonies - not to mention Deryck Cooke's rendition of the finished « Unfinished » . There is Semyon Bogatyrev's inspired reconstruction of an E-flat Symphony of 1892 by Tchaïkovsky, the (very) speculative reconstruction by Barry Cooper of the 1st movement of a 10th Symphony by Beethoven : and, most recently and perhaps most triumphantly of all, the splendid realization of the sketches for Elgar's 3rd Symphony by British composer Anthony Payne. The fact of life however is that this practice of « completion » creates a sharp division of opinion as to what should actually be done (if anything at all) with composers' incomplete musings.

The opinion has been expressed by eminent musicians including Bernard Haitink and Riccardo Chailly that, perhaps, the best thing to do with Bruckner's private, incomplete musical thoughts is to simply leave them alone because they were not their composer's final views on the matter ; that proliferation of them may give a false impression of what was ultimately intended. Whilst it is possible to appreciate this point of view, it denies anyone the opportunity of actually finding-out for themselves what the end of an incomplete Masterpiece may have sounded like. Certainly, the majority of Brucknerians would love to hear how the composer was thinking in terms of this final movement and this Symphony, even if a final complete version has not come down to us. Certainly, getting to know the music of the Finale adds another dimension to the appreciation of the 9th Symphony as a whole, and may even modify the holistic conception of the work as a 4 movement whole, as Sir Simon Rattle has ably demonstrated in concert performances and a recording. If the former school of thought held sway universally, we would not have performing versions of works such as Mozart's « Requiem » or Mahler's 10th, which have both become staples of the performing repertoire. Indeed, the Süßmayr completion of the Mozart « Requiem » is now coming back into vogue, even though there is much less Mozart in the « Requiem » than there is Bruckner in the Finale of the 9th Symphony. The logic of the realization of this Finale is the same as that for Anthony Payne's work on Elgar's sketches for his 3rd Symphony, which is rapidly becoming normal repertoire : a performing version of the extant score with portions of it in the manner of Bruckner, rather than a « completion » per se.

Given the resurgence of Süßmayr's Mozart, if the concept of studying whoever's sketches is therefore a valid one, another question then arises : how does the amateur musician with little knowledge of the art of score-reading get to know these sketches ? Performance is needed to set them and any performing versions of them into context. We have seen that the music of the Finale only arguably provides the kind of musical coherence and argument that are eminently present in the 1st 3 movements in often rudimentary form. Logic thus dictates that any « completion » perhaps should fail to provide the answers that the 1st 3 movements demand, because of the nature of the Finale's musical substance itself : it should.

Up to the 1980's, the completed portions that were extant had either been performed in 2 piano versions, or in orchestral guise where this was feasible. As noted above, Hans-Hubert Schönzeler, in 1974, conducted the then « BBC » Northern Symphony Orchestra (now, the « BBC » Philharmonic) in all of the playable orchestrated stretches of the Finale, amounting to some 12 minutes of music as part of a « BBC » Radio 3 lecture by Paul Hamburger that set the fragments in context. 2 reconstructions had in fact been attempted prior to this during 1969, by German conductor Ernst Märzendorfer who died in 2009, and Dutch conductor Hein's Gravesand who died the year following his work on the Finale, in 1970. No recordings of these completion attempts exist and, given the condition of the known fragments during Hamburger's lecture, in 1974, where even their order (besides the Exposition) was thought tentative at best, a substantial amount of author input would have had to have been necessary to achieve a continuous performing score : perhaps around 50 % of the movement's putative length.

2 major camps developed since the early 1980's with regard to the development of a continuous and complete Bruckner 9th Finale. The 1st of these was initiated by American musicologist and current Bruckner Edition editor William Carragan, assembled between 1979 and 1983, and just a couple of years after a completion by another American musicologist, Marshall Fine. The fact that Carragan's version has been updated 3 times in the last 10 years (most recently, in 2010) is evidence of Carragan's belief in the integrity of the musical torso and is an admirable piece of homage over a period of more than 30y years. Expertly crafted though it is, the 1983 version ultimately cannot make anything like a complete success of the extant material in the way that Bruckner ultimately might have had he lived. At that particular time, a more limited amount of material was available to work with that did not indicate specific linkages and continuities, such that a lot of what appeared in Carragan's 1st completed edition was naturally speculative. Carragan's early version has also received criticism for perhaps adding too much material of Carragan's own composition, in that the likely gaps in the source material were extended beyond what is thought to have been intended by a study of the probable periodicity of the missing bi-folios.

Carragan's 1983 score was recorded by Yoav Talmi and the Oslo Philharmonic Orchestra and issued on CD, coupled with the original playable score fragments which, by this time, were slightly more extensive than Schönzeler had performed 10 years previously. It seemed clear that while it would certainly be possible to link the fragments in Brucknerian style, there was a huge stumbling block in that as noted, there seemed to be nothing even sketched of what the Finale's coda may have looked like. As such, Carragan's coda for his 1983 completion was entirely speculative, although another by a 2nd major completist camp, Italian musicologists Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca started to interpret the sketched outlines and likely length that the coda may have been cast in. As the years have gone by, since the end of the 1980's however, more fragments have come to light, including material that has been clearly identified as being for the coda. This has resulted in something of an escalation of activity in recent years.

Another completion emerged in 1992 by Nors Josephson, which has not been subsequently updated since that time, although it was played in more recent times in west London, with Josephson present. Interestingly, Josephson's account of the Finale is marked « alla breve » , whereas the other completers have opted for a more « nicht schnell » approach. This very fast tempo linked to very spare and succinct linking passages that sometimes make for awkward-sounding joints and some rather un-Brucknerian construction in the transition to the coda and coda itself. This consequently produces a short playing time of less than a quarter of an hour which, perhaps, would not sit well in context with the timing of the remainder of the Symphony. Perhaps, this was conceived more as a stand-alone version of the Finale that inputs as minimally as possible in order to join the echt-Bruckner pieces together, rather than as a structural last movement to a vast Symphony.

Samale and Mazzuca were joined, in the early 1990's, by Australian musicologist John Alan Phillips and German musicologist and conductor Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs with the intent of taking the emerging score back to its philological roots and determining what could be interpreted from the fragments as they existed at the time, identifying the periodicity of the gaps between the fragments and what could be extrapolated from the extant bi-folios. As such, the 1st « SPCM » edition (Samale/Phillips/Cohrs/Mazzuca) was published in 1991. This edition, however, also suffered from a substantial lack of coda material. Updates to this version have been undertaken more recently that take into account more source material, enabling an assessment of the likely structure, length and some hints of actual musical material for the coda. William Carragan had also re-visited his completion, in the interim, in the light of new score fragments and what had been discovered on existing ones. In addition, in 2007-2008, a completely separate realization of the Finale was undertaken by the Belgian musicologist Sébastien Letocart. What is remarkable is that, in these later versions from Carragan and the « SPCM » members from the mid-2000's onwards, the sound of the versions, their harmony and direction were notably much closer than they had been, 15 to 20 years previously.

Also, Letocart's sound world was similar to this, although he did not apparently use any of the up-to-date scholarship for his version of the coda, which instead used a multi-level approach to combining multiple themes from the 9th Symphony and earlier, to create an extended coda that is very similar in construction and feel to that of the 5th Symphony.

The drawing-together of the sound of these different versions is, therefore, perhaps similar to the Darwinian concept of convergent evolution where different evolutionary paths converge to find a similar solution to an ecological problem ; but, here, the different conceptions of the Finale seem to be converging into a common conception of what the extant material of the Finale was pointing to.

On the face of it, all « completed » versions of this Finale could be (and, in the past, have been) seen to be hampered in the end by the same basic obstacle ; that much of the available music might be interpreted as being on an audibly lower level of inspiration than the 1st 3 movements, because of the lack of harmonic and melodic « filling-in » that, perhaps, remained to be done by Bruckner. Some of the extant material, therefore, hardly sounds inspired at all - but, then, we must not forget that much of it has not come down to us complete and is likely in places to be a bare-bones construction lacking rhythmic originality as well as the overlaying melodic and harmonic structure. The central « fugato » , for example (an idea perhaps based on the success of a similar section in the Finale of the 5th) , is somewhat stilted and does not stand direct comparison with its distinguished predecessor. It may be that Bruckner felt that a fugue was necessary, at this point, in the design and just put one together using the 1st subject with an appropriate harmonic basis just to fill a gap where this fugue should be - and nothing more at that point. The actual substance of the fugue could perhaps have been elaborated later. There is indeed a potential precedent for this perspective, since an anonymous Symphonic Prelude of 1876 that is possibly attributable to Bruckner could well have been a study for the fugue in the Finale of the 5th Symphony - and that is also hardly inspired, although the fugue in the 5th's Finale certainly is. So, if indeed the Prelude was by Bruckner, the fugue in the 9th's Finale could have been a « working title » for its final form in the same way that the Prelude had been for the 5th's Finale fugue (if, indeed, the Prelude is by Bruckner) but that is another story.

If this is all true, and given the range of constrictions within which the various scholars who undertook their performing versions have worked, their scores are, in fact, far more successful than one might at 1st imagine. As noted, Samale & Mazzuca's original Finale was elaborated and re-thought by a team led by John Alan Phillips using more up-to-date philological research. The « SPCM » realization was originally completed in 1991, updated in 1995 and given its 1st United Kingdom performance, in that form, in 1996 as part of the « BBC »'s Centenary celebrations of Bruckner's death under the Russian conductor Vassily Sinaisky. The « SPCM » score was further revisited and edited by Samale and Cohrs, in 2005, this edition being given its premiere in Sweden, in 2007, conducted by the young Briton Daniel Harding. As with Carragan, the work however has still continued, and a further revision that included a major re-think on the construction of the coda was published in 2011 and performed in Europe and the United States, in 2012, by the Berliner Philharmoniker under Sir Simon Rattle, and the performance released on CD. This is a substantial and high-profile imprimatur that has not been accorded to the versions by Carragan and Letocart. Cohrs has indicated that this is the final revision - unless and until more fragments turn-up.

As they stand then, the bare, disjointed bones of the musical fragments of the « emerging autograph score » (as termed by Phillips) give the impression of something like a newly-discovered incomplete Roman mosaic floor : the individual pieces separate and an overall view of the whole, impossible. Skilfully joined together, however, with other pieces in the original style, the floor would regain something of its former glory. Similarly, the completed Finale, in any of the most recent major versions, has a flow that has undeniable presence and conviction. Unfortunately, as with the Roman floor, the sections that are missing have to be « touched-in » in the most authentic manner so that the original appears correct. The analogy breaks down at this point, however, because archaeologists have much experience in restoring mosaic floors due to the number that have been restored of a similar type. Bruckner's 9th is unique even within Bruckner's own canon and, therefore, the musicologist is much more out on his own.

The interpolated sections by the various teams are so carefully and meticulously designed within the framework of the gaps that, in the most recent editions, it is often very difficult to distinguish between Bruckner and his imitators : not so, perhaps, with earlier versions. This is even more so with the Phillips team's later versions since the interpolated music has been adjusted and reconstructed to fit exactly with the gaps that were assessed to be present. This has unfortunately resulted in some ostensibly desperate-sounding modulations in order to join the sketches together without alteration in the later stages of the movement.

What about the musical style, though ? If Bruckner was developing forward once more, how should the music actually sound ? Can we actually base a reconstruction on the Bruckner we know from the 7th and, particularly, the 8th Symphonies ? There is no doubt that, after the harmonically daring and dissonant 1st 3 movements, the Finale's opening minutes seem to lapse back to a more familiar sound and tonality. This led to some unfortunate circumstances, in the earlier versions of the 1980's : Samale and Mazzuca's 1st version sounded relatively stilted in the interpolated sections, and because of the « at the time » complete lack of original material, the coda to Carragan's 1983 completion, even though authentically crafted, had an unfortunate tendency to over-blow the Finale's chorale theme in an attempt to make for a suitably impressive ending : it was even called « Hollywoodesque » in some circles. This has not been altered in the most recent revisions.

Elsewhere, Carragan, in his 1st version, seemed to alter some of the musical substance and tended not to respect the numbers of missing bars. It appeared that Carragan's own invention was extended significantly in the centre of the movement with little published in the way of explanation of his musical logic, as his « SPCM » colleagues were doing as they progressed. Then, the overtly Wagnerian descant trumpet counterpoint found in Carragan's coda does little for his argument as it just does not sound like Bruckner, for the composer in this Symphony is far indeed from Wagner's sound world. The feel of the projected ending to the Symphony, in the 1st « SPCM » version of 1991, appeared to be more in the psychological mood of the 1st movement, bringing an entirely different slant to the music. Here was the 1st attempt at presenting the themes of all 4 movements at the conclusion of the Symphony as had happened in the 8th. Bruckner had capped all of his Symphonic edifices since the 3rd Symphony with a re-statement of the 1st movement theme and, here, it is reasonable to think that he would, at least, use the same technique of combining all 4 movement themes together at the conclusion of the 9th, although John Alan Phillips' perspective seemed to be moving away from this rationale, in more recent times. It has to be said though that the inclusion of the quotations from the 1st movement, in the 1991 version at the height of the 2nd section, were maybe not that convincing.

The Finale justified ?

It is unfortunate that, in the efforts to make this music accessible to the general musical public, the different completed versions of a completed Finale, in fact, might, in a way, be seen to do more to help the « leave it alone » lobby than they do to help their own. All they perhaps do is help to confuse the listener ? Let us not forget though that the Bruckner lover has already had to contend with different versions and editions of most of the Symphonies, and has had to make a choice of preferred listening. Surely, it is the same here ? Indeed, having more than one performing version available should make the avid Brucknerian feel at home, for surely this is merely an extension of what he or she has had to do since being attracted to Bruckner's music, in the 1st place ! Constant re-thinking of the original 1980's Samale / Mazzuca original has meant that the 1995 « SPCM » version, derived from it, is subtly but noticeably different, as is the 2005 Cohrs / Samale revision to the 1995 version. With the availability now of the 2010 Carragan and 2011 Cohrs editions, to my mind the available choice adds to, rather than detracts from the mystique of this Finale.

The situation begs, yet, another question : which completed version is the more « authentic » and why ? For an explanation of that tricky subject, the musicologists themselves must justify their own actions and leave the judgement of them to posterity. It is not for one person to say « this one is better than that one » ; it is a subjective opinion and that is all the current author can express. It does not mean that it is correct or indeed incorrect. The basis of William Carragan's stated argument for his original 1983 completion was that the previous 3 movements display a strife that is obviously intended to be turned into salvation in the Finale through the medium of Bruckner's religion, a point that was touched on above in relation to the « SPCM » completion. Is this actually so, though ? There are 2 pieces of musical evidence from the Symphony and a simple piece of logic which would seem to contradict this

1stly, the logic. If Bruckner's previous Symphonies were not overtly religious (and I would submit that they are definitely not), then why should the 9th be? Yes, the 9th was dedicated « To My Dear God, if he will accept it » - but are these unsure words enough in themselves to apply a religious connotation to the work, or was it more of a matter of covering all of the bases, just in case? You can dedicate a book to your wife without the book having to be about the subject of marriage - I have indeed done so! So was this gesture, in fact, an act of consciously hopeful and speculative re-affirmation of his faith so that maybe the Symphony could be completed - whilst his subconscious actually told a different story? The 3 completed movements of the 9th give the impression of a tense, terrifying work that leaves little enough room for even the dimmest hope of salvation. A Finale would have to perform super-human feats to rescue salvation out of the depths into which the 1st 3 movements plunge the listener.

This then brings us to the 1st musical indication that I mentioned. Simply, that is the dissonant climax to the 3rd movement which blares negation rather than the hope we might have expected. Would not Bruckner here have given us a pointer as to the way that things were ultimately going to go? In the 8th, the Adagio's climax arrives in a clear E-flat major, although musical incidents prior to this are by no means clear-cut; and it takes the entire length of the Finale to find the radiant C major triumph at the end. Here, in the 9th, there is nothing but blackness at the equivalent point. No positive indications whatsoever.

2ndly, there is the actual material of the extant music of the Finale itself. The completing teams have ingeniously composed bridge passages between the existing stretches of the extant Finale and provided a speculative coda based on short-form sketches, in the case of the 1995 « SPCM » version and its subsequent revisions, and Carragan's most recent work. It may be argued that they have done what Deryck Cooke did for Mahler's 10th; that is, fill-out the bare bones of what the composer intended. But that argument contains a serious flaw, however. The music of Mahler's 10th was truly continuous. It was a draft of a complete work with all its melodic, harmonic and rhythmic parts, in at least a traceable path through the Symphony. In the Finale of Bruckner's 9th, this is not the case. The 1st 3 movements only (whilst with their own minor flaws) are complete and self-sufficient; but the Finale, for whatever reason is incomplete although it likely existed in a complete form, at some point. It seems likely that souvenir-hunters plundered Bruckner's room immediately after his death, taking away bi-folios that would complete the score of the Finale. How true this scenario actually is will probably never be known. Phillips et al. have postulated the most likely final shape and periodicity of the movement, but unless a continuous score or more bi-folios should come to light, we will not know this for certain.

The task that Bruckner had set himself, of completing a Symphony whose 1st 3 movements were so awesomely composed may, on the face of it, have been too much; and Bruckner may have known this subconsciously. As if to underline it all, as Robert Simpson says in « The Essence of Bruckner », it would be a brave man who would try to compose Bruckner's greatest climax for him, although the Phillips team appears to have gone as far as is humanly possible with what remains. What Bruckner would have ultimately composed will never be known because we do not know what was going on in his mind. Any performing version is, therefore, based on what the completer thinks that Bruckner's mind was thinking about, at the time, and it is here that things become even more complicated.

Perhaps, as Haitink and Chailly have indicated, it would have been kinder to have left things as they ultimately finished. Bruckner may have instinctively known that he would not live to finish the gigantic creation that he had started, although it certainly seems from his working methods that the continuous score stage for the entire movement had indeed been reached. Maybe the lie to the argument in favour of reconstruction is given by a parallel case that has already been mentioned, that came to fruition, in 1997 ; that of Anthony Payne's inspired performing version of the sketches for Sir Edward Elgar's 3rd Symphony. Whilst huge stretches of (predominantly, developmental) material are simply not there and there are precious few authentically scored passages, Payne manages to convince us that his score captures the essence of what Elgar was driving at. The music is powerful, touching and sounds right in much the way that John Alan Phillips and his team (and more latterly, Cohrs and Samale) manage with their version of the Bruckner 9th Finale. No-one pretends that it is absolutely authentic to the nth degree ; it is an outline structure that presents the extant original material in the best light possible.

But what of Carragan's and Letocart's versions ? As I said above, it is remarkable how the major camps have come together over the years, in terms of what the finished editions present. The 1st versions by Carragan and Samale / Mazzuca were in different sound worlds, with the « SPCM » team, in the 1990's, seeming to find perhaps a more authentic voice for the emerging score. Carragan's 1st version of 1983 just did not sound authentic when linked to the remainder of the 9th - or even on its own terms. There has clearly been substantial rethinking and re-alignment within the last 10 years, since Carragan's 2010 edition is much closer to the Cohrs / Samale model of 2005, even though Carragan still perversely uses spurious and atypical counter-melodies in his realization (especially, that trumpet descant in the coda) that militate against what sounds truly authentic. The putative coda begins after a general pause in 2 of the 3 versions (« SPCM » and Letocart) , in order to give breathing space for the coda to expand into a radiant conclusion in the Major : that, otherwise, there is too much of a jarring juxtaposition between the angst of the later stages of the counter-statement and the rise to serenity in the coda. This is exactly what Bruckner himself did in the Finale of the 8th and, at the end of the 1st movement of the 9th. However, having said this, the most recent 2011 « SPCM » edition edited by Cohrs removes the pause that was there, and makes such a juxtaposition in exactly the same way that Carragan does !

The Finale completed

Thus, the musical public will demand (and indeed deserve) an insight into Bruckner's final struggle, even if the way in which it is presented differs. The major versions contain the spirit of Bruckner's score as well as the completers' interpretation of what was in Bruckner's mind regarding the actual notes at the latest stage of the Finale's composition. For example, the « SPCM » version in its development, over the years, has tended to use philological detective work and reconstruction to determine where Bruckner was heading, at the time of his death, and in the process identifying likely gaps of bars and even inserting modifications to the musical logic of what appears in Bruckner's drafts. This appears to move away from the literal insertion of Bruckner's music in the more recent « SPCM » versions, since in one notable section at the movement's beginning, the periodicity and the melodic line has been interpreted as being different to what we had been used to with Carragan 1983 and Josephson. In this case, Carragan inserts the more traditional draft of the exposition's opening, even in his most recent edition, even though it is clear that having had 5 attempts, Bruckner himself was not happy with how any of them sounded. Whereas Carragan undertook a degree of harmonic sanitization, « à la Franz Schalk » , in 1983, the sound world in 2010 was now much more harmonised with the « SPCM » version. Given the processes of reconstruction over the years and the fact that we are used to hearing the 9th (incorrectly) as a 3 movement work, performances of the whole Symphony, with the Finale in place, can still sound odd - but mainly just because we are used to hearing the Adagio as the Symphony's ending, which was never Bruckner's intention. Perhaps, the way forward might be to treat the Adagio as an inner movement with the resolution being provided by the Finale, in the way that Daniel Harding did with the « SPCM » / CM Finale, in 2007, and Simon Rattle, in 2012, by investing the Adagio with less gravitas than is perhaps customary.

As noted above, Bruckner perhaps knew that he may not finish this Symphony. However, research into the Finale score by John Alan Phillips and his team in Vienna, in the 1980's, appears to indicate that the skeleton of the 9th's Finale may indeed have been completed prior to the composer's death, but that some of the bi-folio sheets have been lost ; or worse, looted. This conclusion is based upon the fact that Bruckner's compositional method consisted of laying-out a foundation for a complete movement on the strings or single woodwind in sequentially numbered bi-folios, then filling the sheets in afterward. This is a process that can be seen all through his compositional career. The fact that the linking pieces and the entire coda may well have existed in this fashion but were lost (or stolen) is very frustrating to think about. However, according to Phillips, the coda bi-folios were not the only place where Bruckner jotted down his ideas for the coda ; short scores on 2 staves and pencil sketches survive elsewhere amongst the bi-folios. Phillips asserts that about half of the coda can be identified in this way, in sketch form, thus giving the prospective completer a slightly more easy time in trying to put it all together and decide where it was ultimately heading. The « SPCM » performing version constructed by the Phillips team, therefore, ostensibly has assembled as close as we can get to an aural picture of what the 1st complete score of the Finale might possibly have been driving at, without the lost sheets themselves turning-up. Bearing in mind Bruckner's constant revision, there is no doubt whatsoever that had he lived longer then the material would likely have sounded noticeably different in any case after revision.

Because of the difference in approaches taken by Carragan, Letocart and the « SPCM » team (especially bearing in mind the recent 2011 Cohrs / Samale revision) overviews of the most recent editions of all 3 completions will be found here, plus an indication of how the scores differ. All of the scores are approximately the same length (around 20 to 25 minutes) and indicate that if they are anywhere near what Bruckner intended, then the completed work would have constituted Bruckner's longest Symphony at approximately an hour and a half or more.

The introductory « forhoftechnik » of this completed movement is all unadulterated Bruckner in the completed versions (although using different versions of the exposition, as we shall see) and starts over a timpani roll, an effect unique in Bruckner. Immediately, the violins give-out a 4 note dropping motif that is immediately bounced back in retrograde inversion by the clarinet. The clarinet response, as we have seen, has the exact contour, melodic shape and rhythm of the 1st subject of the 1st Symphony, so that this movement's opening motif is actually a modified inversion of the 1st Symphony reminiscence. This process is repeated and, then, the 2 utterances are repeated again, a tone lower - and, then, a tone lower again, resulting in 6 utterances of this dialogue. Horn harmony and a flute warble lead to a foreshortened crescendo which brings an impressive unison downward-moving variant of the opening violin dotted theme. A short bridge via sombre block harmony on the brass leads to the « gesangsperiode ». This is built from the same musical idea as the main theme and, therefore, does not introduce variation or relaxation into the melodic flow or rhythmic pulse of the music. High strings extend their ideas past a ruminating woodwind-and-horns combination to a rather banal, pseudo-jolly extension of itself. A crescendo initiated by an inspired inversion of the introductory theme (shades of the opening of the 1st Symphony) introduces the 3rd subject group, led by a brass chorale assisted by swirling strings which transmutes the Adagio's « lebewohl » into the major in an attempt at affirmation. This recedes onto the opening motto of the « Te Deum » of 1883 on a solo flute, and it is here that the 1st uninterrupted Bruckner sketch finishes.

At this point in the construction of the music, its direction appears clear. A change of key initiates a developmental phase, and what is clearly intended to be an energetic passage. We are now in Carragan's interpolation of a short period of missing bars. Development is obviously taking place within the main statement's framework though. Carragan has the horns intoning a fragment from the 1st movement's coda against a busy orchestral background, and woodwind and brass elaborate the chorale. An energetic string passage introduces an almost Elgarian phrase (which in the opinion of the « SPCM » editors is far too long an insertion based on the available evidence), before Bruckner breaks back in with a fugue (« à la » 5th Symphony) built again on the opening dropping phrase. This initially sounds rather routine and uninspired, although Carragan's alternative orchestration of the fugue subject on the horns adds interest, as does the fugue's extension. It is almost as if Bruckner is trying to unite the Symphony by attempting to emulate his success in the 5th's last movement; surely, his most successful Finale, structurally. At its height, Carragan inserts a tutti followed by a developmental high plateau. Bruckner's own material then brings in the welcome relief of the « Bruckner rhythm » in the brass, following a genuinely Brucknerian passage which is startlingly similar to one in the Finale of the 6th Symphony.

A pause; then strings and woodwind meander around the « gesangsperiode », sorrowfully extending into the « lebewohl » on strings until they introduce, yet, another allusion to a previous Symphony; the 1st movement of the 3rd. This allusion is interesting, as we have already heard a reference to the final bars during the 3rd movement Adagio. Then, there is a reminiscence of the flute warble from near the beginning of the exposition, a pause, and then a timpani roll into a crescendo passage built on the jagged ascent to the 1st subject. Rhythmic diminution takes place over a series of extensive modulations that lead to the 3rd subject group is repeated (the whole section being a Carragan insertion that extends beyond the number of missing bars postulated by the Phillips team). Instead of the chorale being repeated on full brass, a modulatory tutti passage leads to the chorale theme, p, on a solo trumpet over the « Te Deum » accompaniment on « arco » strings. It is a magical idea; and ostensibly pure Bruckner, although the emerging score can be interpreted in a different way here as we will see. Unfortunately, the solo trumpet line is unnecessarily embellished by a spurious flute counter-melody that although stated by Carragan to be derived from one of Bruckner's Masses, actually sounds as if it may have been quoted from the passionate 1st theme of Tchaïkovsky's 6th Symphony! An extension of the chorale theme, on full brass, leads to the last of Bruckner's fragments.

From here, the movement finishes with music that is largely by Carragan, without the benefit of the « SPCM » team's extensive philological research. A bridge passage based on the inversion of the main theme (the quotation from the 1st Symphony) moves straight into the coda which uses a coda figure from the 1st movement as a back-cloth for the crescendo. This breaks onto a re-statement of the chorale harmony on horns, but not the actual melody. This is supported by elaborate harmonised insertions of the main theme of the movement on tubas and unfortunate shades of « Tannhäuser » in the trumpet harmony. This over-inflates the coda substantially, even if it is a very skilful counterfeit.

The final bars combine the chorale / « lebewohl » motif, an inversion of the « Te Deum » accompaniment figure, and the « Alleluia » motif from Bruckner's Psalm 150 of 1892 into an affirmatory conclusion which, unfortunately, does not confirm victory or indeed does nothing to offset the overall mood of the work ; at least, not to this listener.

While Carragan inserted much speculative material into his completion, all of the allusions to past Symphonies, in this movement, were put there by Bruckner himself. This only serves to re-inforce the opinion that the composer was searching for a way of completing this vast work by recalling his past efforts. The fugal inspiration from 5th's Finale, because it was the most successful ; the passage from the Finale of the 8th which became the « lebewohl » of the 9th's Adagio ; the 1st and 3rd Symphonies because he had most recently revised them wholesale, and they thus may have been fresher in his mind – and, of course, that the 1st had always been a particular favourite.

Listening to the music in any completed form makes it clear (at least, to me) that the obsessive idea of the last movement was consciously intended by Bruckner to be based on an inversion of the 1st theme from the 1st Symphony, so that this theme in its different guises would begin and end what the composer saw as his Symphonic utterance. If this is the case, what if anything is the actual significance of this phrase ? Cohrs invests the dropping phrase with religious significance as a motif representing the cross, in the same way that Bach did in his « Passions » , but this must be purely speculative, especially if the phrase was reverse-engineered from the opening theme of the 1st Symphony. We will probably never know. In any event, the dissonances of the completed 3 movements do not find their resolution here in what remains unmistakably Carragan's much more diatonically pure view of the 9th Symphony's Finale.

The version originally undertaken by Giuseppe Mazzuca and Nicola Samale, in the 1980's, and then taken-up and extended by John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs is noticeably different, in several important respects. Its overall shape and length is similar to Carragan's but the order of the incorporated fragments is slightly altered according to more recent scholarship. The mood of the interpolated sections was also altogether different. The 1995 so-called « SPCM » revision produces a sound that is more integrated than Carragan's early version, including as much of the original material as possible even from alternative versions of the same sketched section, whereas Carragan had suppressed parts of the sketches and had not included them in his completion. The result in the « SPCM » version is, perhaps, more in keeping with the harmonic brittleness of the 1st 3 movements. It also seems to be more successful in integrating the score fragments with thoughts about how these fragments may have been put together, especially as more recently revised by Cohrs and Samale. In this way, a cyclic feeling is introduced, in the same manner as for the 8th Symphony Finale.

team thought was the intention in Bruckner's original final version of the exposition, although this unfortunately no longer extant. It starts over the same D timpani roll and, immediately, the violins give-out a 4 note dropping motif that is immediately bounced back in inversion by the clarinet. The clarinet response, as we have seen, has the contour, melodic shape and rhythm of the 1st subject of the 1st Symphony. Whereas with Carragan (who reproduces what Bruckner wrote in the earlier exposition sketches), this process was repeated, there is only a single utterance of each question-and-answer phrase in the latest CM edition before a single restatement, at lower pitch. There are 2 more utterances at semi-tone distances, resulting in a slightly different and shorter opening to Carragan's - and, indeed, to the 1995 « SPCM » version where the last 2 were in the same key.

This results in 4 utterances only of this dialogue rather than Carragan's 6. The tiny horn and flute interlude from Bruckner's original and Carragan's edition does not appear in this version since it is not felt necessary in directing the melodic and harmonic lines. The foreshortened crescendo appears which brings an impressive unison downward-moving variant of the opening violin dotted theme. A short bridge via sombre block harmony on the brass leads to the « gesangsperiode ». This is built from the same musical idea as the main theme, and incorporates variants of the theme from other extant versions of the exposition for the sake of material variety. Clarinet ruminations on the opening theme lead to the strings becoming more energetic. Brass rumblings re-introduce the timpani and a crescendo that is initiated by an inspired inversion of the introductory theme, making the 1st Symphony provenance obvious, and introducing the resplendent 3rd subject group. This is led by a brass chorale under-pinned by swirling strings which transmutes the Adagio's « lebewohl » into the major in an attempt at affirmation. This harmonious chorale suddenly recedes on dissonant snarling brass onto the opening motto of the « Te Deum » of 1883 on a solo flute, and it is here that the 1st swathe of uninterrupted Bruckner's original music finishes.

The editors now extend the transition over the « Te Deum » motif punctuated by the opening theme rhythm in the bassoons. At this point in the construction of the music, its direction appears clear. A change of key initiates a developmental phase, and what is clearly intended to be an energetic passage. A dissonant trumpet accompanying figure over strings working up and down an « arpeggio » figure, using a minor 9th resolving into an octave is retained here, where it was toned down « à la Schalk » in Carragan's original version but retained in the latest.

We are now in an interpolated section leading to another Bruckner fragment. Development in this fragment is obviously taking place within the main statement's framework. Strings become eloquent as the mood softens, and they rise-up against intoning trumpets, leading into the introduction of the fugal section, built again on the opening dropping phrase. This initially sounds rather routine and uninspired, although the detail of the fugal extension in the most recent research does increase the interest level. It is almost as if Bruckner is trying to unite the Symphony by attempting to emulate his success in the 5th's last movement ; surely, his most structurally successful Finale, if not his greatest. The editors' fugal interpolation based on Bruckner's material bring a full statement of Bruckner's own material which brings in the welcome presence of the « Bruckner rhythm » in the brass, following a genuinely Brucknerian passage which is startlingly similar to one in the Finale of the 6th Symphony.

Strings meander around the « gesangsperiode », sorrowfully extending into the « lebewohl » on strings until they introduce, yet, another allusion to a previous Symphony ; the 1st movement of the 3rd by way of the softer music we heard a moment previously. The Carragan-inserted ascent to the 3rd subject group is not present here : the ascent is achieved by the use of the extension of the material that sounds as if it came from the 3rd Symphony. A Brucknerian modulatory tutti passage leads to the chorale theme which, in the Carragan version, was presented piano on a solo trumpet (under that very odd solo flute, sounding as if it was reminiscing over the passionate violin theme from the Tchaïkovsky « Pathétique » !) over the « Te Deum » accompaniment on « arco » strings. The « SPCM » editors have interpreted Bruckner's markings to mean tutti trumpets, since there is a marked diminuendo in the 2nd phrase, which makes sense in performance terms.

The counter-statement's climax is preceded by use of sketches not used by Carragan in his original 1983 version, although Carragan has also now inserted them here, as their place in the score has now been confirmed by the order of the extant bi-folios. There is a pause after which the strings search upward using the 1st Symphony motif, this time accompanied by the « lebewohl » on oboes. The editors achieve the climax itself by combining themes and rhythms from all 4 movements in the style of the 8th Symphony, and although this is not explicitly indicated in the emerging score, it is impressively realized. It moves without a break into a restatement of the chorale theme, which then extends into a high plateau of sound which, in the 2005 version, ends in a dissonant climax reminiscent of the 3rd movement and breaks-off unfulfilled, into a deep chasm of a pause.

The coda steals in, immediately in the major with the « Te Deum » motif present in the strings. The brass ring-out in affirmation and the coda comes to an impressive end with 4 note « Hallelujahs » from the brass.

In 2010, Cohrs substantially changed his approach to the coda, shortening it considerably, and joining it onto the previous climax. The end of the movement here seems to come just a little too quickly given what has happened in the previous 20 minutes, and the swirling strings do not have the subsuming effect that they had in the 2005 version. For these reasons, my preference for the coda lies with the previous 2005 version.

Misterioso - nicht schnell (Letocart, 2008)

As noted previously, the bulk of the movement occupies the sound world of the later « SPCM » and Carragan completions, with what seems like much more active horn section ; the differences arrive once we reach the transition to the coda and the coda itself. The recapitulation of the chorale theme arrives in similar fashion, with the Bruckner fragments in the same order as « SPCM » . Then, there is a wrench ; an acceleration, and a pause. Then, we hear a slow meandering ascent as part of the transition to the coda which also builds to a climax, and the 1st level of coda, where the chorale is under-pinned by what sounds like an accompaniment figure straight-out of the 5th Symphony. Expansion and extension of some of the earlier harmonies bring us to the next coda level, where the upper-strings shriek-out their jagged figures from the 1st subject over slow jagged figures in deep brass. Again, there is a pause, and harmonies reminiscent of the 8th Symphony flit across the desolate landscape, followed by harmonies from the 9th's 1st movement. There is a crescendo based on an open 5th, and rhythmic diminution leads to a modulation from D minor to D major and a « Halleluja » motif derived from the middle-section of the 2nd movement's trio. The coda is, therefore, a substantial structure that seems to make the end of the movement top-heavy, and it just does not make the kind of glorious noise that the end of the 8th Symphony does, by virtue of its magical modulation.

As we have seen, all of the allusions to past Symphonies in this movement were put there by Bruckner, and the gaps have been filled in very impressive ways : speculative and, perhaps, some freely-composed sections by Carragan, and rigorously constructed music focused on what Bruckner actually left by Cohrs, Samale, Mazzuca and Phillips. Both completions only serve to re-inforce the opinion that the composer was searching for a way of completing this vast work by recalling his past efforts. The fugal inspiration from the 5th's Finale, because it was the most successful ; the passage from the Finale of the 8th which became the « lebewohl » of the 9th's Adagio ; the 3rd Symphony because he had most recently revised it wholesale. The 1st Symphony allusions are perhaps the most striking of all in the Adagio and Finale, given the insistent nature of the quotations from the main theme of the 1st movement.

There is one other « version » that should be mentioned in passing. In 2006, conductor Peter Jan Marthé produced what was referred to as a free re-composition of the 9th Symphony's Finale incorporating material from the sketches, which was marketed as « Bruckner Reloaded » . We will not deal extensively with this composition here, as much of it has little to do with what Bruckner left. There are a few snatches of the half-hour composition that clearly do come from Bruckner's fragments as sign posts to where we are in the movement, the main ones being the 2 appearances of the chorale theme in the statement and counter-statement. The remainder, however, appears to bear little relation to Bruckner's sound world or intent as documented in the emerging score of the Finale.

The Finale in context

Thus, we arrive at the speculative end-points of these re-constructions ; completions - the various editors term them differently. The journey taken to reach them has been different and the structure of the edifice viewed, also different. The obvious differences are plain ; to take the actual sketches 1st : the Phillips team incorporates them into the completed movement order as Bruckner left them, and develops them in what is deemed to be the most philologically correct way. This is actually very helpful in identifying what is echt Bruckner and what is not, both from the perspectives of sign posts within the Phillips team's own version and indicators of what is original Bruckner. Carragan took a slightly different view of the sketches, in 1983, in that although they were essentially as Bruckner left them, Carragan extended and sanitized them as a basis for his version. Thus, there were parts added to the orchestration and alterations of some of the harmonic backdrop, and some of the harmonic trends themselves. This has been changed in the recent editions to give a much more stark version that is closely aligned with the « SPCM » team's thinking.

In the Phillips team's version, the initial exposition section seems to be slightly altered and « regularised » as seen in the utterances of the initial theme, and the inferred harmonic trend at the end of the original sketch is adjusted to make a transition into the next sketch possible. Where this differs from Carragan is that the order of the sketches is not exactly the same and, thus, the harmony needs to be re-directed. The interpolated sections are expertly done but the mood of the music is disturbed by the dissonances present, as it was in the previous completed movements. The « lebewohl » chorale truly seems to have a battle on its hands in the « SPCM » version.

The transition to the coda and the coda itself in the « SPCM » version do not appear to even attempt the kind of glorious ending on the scale originally envisaged by Carragan, even in its latest version. In Samale and Mazzuca's original, elements of the 1st movement motifs mingle with the chorale descent in a passage strikingly similar to the coda of the 8th in execution, but in frightening harmony with the « Te Deum » shape battling away in the background. A cadential passage regularly used in the 8th's Finale moves the music into its final moments with the brass howling in bare 5ths as they did at the close of the 1st movement. There is little resolution here in the Carragan style ; the music is as troubled as it was in the 1st movement. The later « SPCM » version uses the identified coda sketches to build a more affirmatory ending, even though it is dissonant in keeping with the remainder of the Symphony. The Cohrs / Samale revision, from 2005, removes the allusions to the 1st movement completely from the coda, save for the passage where themes from all 4 movements are combined.

In the context of the Symphony as a whole then, perhaps, the Phillips team's interpretation of what the musical endpoint was thought to have been, is the more convincing (which is not to say that the completions by Carragan and Letocart are not impressive achievements in their own right) apart from the spurious and unnecessary flute and brass counter-melody interpolations in Carragan's coda. Indeed, as has been indicated, Phillips has referred to the concept of the Adagio followed by a completed Finale as « death and purgatory » .

This is not to denigrate Carragan's redemptory coda, which may be convincing in terms of the movement in isolation but, perhaps, not in terms of the Symphony as a whole. Whichever version appeals to the listener and whatever the shortcomings of its original material are however, a « completed » 9th Symphony with a Finale is, without doubt, a very valuable addition to Bruckner knowledge in understanding where the composer may have gone musically, had he lived further.

Bruckner 9th Symphony Finale Workshop

(A Classical Music project in Detroit, Michigan by Alonso del Arte.)

When Bruckner died in 1896, his 9th Symphony was complete in his mind. The 1st 3 movements were written down and fully orchestrated. He just needed time to write the Finale down. It is believed he might even have had written the entire Finale down in outline form. But souvenir hunters literally scattered the relevant sketches to the 4 winds, and so in the 20th Century, almost all performances of Bruckner's 9th ended with the Adagio, with everyone believing too little was left of the Finale to make any sense of it.

But over the past few decades, more and more sketches have been found and we have a jigsaw puzzle with just a few pieces missing. Many have tried to complete the Finale, and they have come-up with fairly consistent results for much of it. The divergences occur closer to the Coda, where speculations rather than sketches guide the various musicologists. This workshop will examine all available completions of the Finale of Bruckner's 9th Symphony and have people vote on which is the best one, and have it played in a concert. These are the choices I am aware of :

Fritz Öser bridge to the « Te Deum » (1940) .

Nicola Samale & Giuseppe Mazzuca realisation (1985) .

Nors S. Josephson reconstruction (1992) .

Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips & Cohrs realization, 1992 / 2005 / 2007 versions.

Sébastien Letocart realization (2008) .

William Carragan completion, 1983 / 2003 / 2006 / 2010 versions.

Joan Schukking Coda (2011) .

To hire a full orchestra, with Wagner tubas, is of course an expensive proposition. Bruckner's 9th requires, at least, about 30 wind players and at least 50 string players. Most horn players in America today don't have their own Wagner tubas, so a proper set (2 tenor and 2 bass) lent for this purpose would be a huge help. Worst case scenario we'd have to substitute baritones or euphoniums for the Wagner tubas.

If you have a credible completion of Bruckner's 9th (one based entirely on the sketches and Bruckner's own earlier music, and using only the instruments in the completed movements of the 9th) not listed above, please post it to IMSLP and send me a message about it.

The list of credible completions will be narrowed down to 4 or 5, based on the votes. These, along with the Öser bridge to the « Te Deum » (which, to my knowledge, has never been recorded) will be read through. The musicians will vote and thus it will be determined which the best completion is. That completion, together with the rest of the Symphony, will be rehearsed and played in a concert.

Heinz Winbeck's « Finale » finally performed

Several years ago, it was announced that the German composer, Heinz Winbeck, would be commissioned by the « Brucknerhaus », in Linz, to write a form of completion to the Bruckner 9th Symphony. The performance was scheduled several times but postponed. The most recent postponement was last fall when the work was now to be placed in front of a performance of the 9th Symphony. It turned-out that the work had evolved into a lengthy piece that would make the concert too long. So, the premiere was scheduled for March of 2010 and, on March 9th, it was finally performed. As the work evolved, it became more of an independent composition (in 3 movements) and less of a postscript to the Symphony No. 9.

The work is entitled, Symphony No. 9 « Now and in the Hour of Death », 3 fragments using motives in particular the Finale of the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner.

Winbeck's use of themes is very subtle. There is no quotation of the great chorale and, at the end, there is a quotation from Johann Strauß' « Blue Danube Waltz ». The performance timed in at around 55 minutes.

The 3 movements are :

1 - « Lord Stay with Us Because It Will Become evening and the Day Ends. »

2 - « Come Holy Spirit And Enflame. »

3 - « Now And in the Hour of Death. »

Happily, there are quite a few people who do not share that (ground-in) « standard » view, but rather think that not only is the Finale worth pursuing, but that doing so is essential if one is to get a fuller understanding of what Bruckner intended this Symphony to be - i.e. , that, in order to get a better grasp of the 1st 3 movements, it is vital to do the same with the 4th and, thus, the 9th Symphony as a whole. One may quote from an early Dutch (and very readable) biography of Bruckner :

« Without doubt, Bruckner had very special intentions with the Unfinished Finale, which would have become a “ Satz ” of even more gigantic dimensions than the final part of the 8th Symphony : something already evident in the fact that no less than 5 versions can be discerned in the sketches. What was floating before his mind’s eye was probably a synthesis of the Finale of the 5th and 8th Symphonies. We find in the sketches both the fugue and the chorale that determine the nature and architecture of the Finale to the 5th Symphony, as well as the for the 8th Symphony’s Finale characteristic combination of the main themes of all 4 movements. With this keystone to his œuvre, he wanted to give a final summary of everything that was dear to his heart. »

« The Finale should have gathered all elements once more into one grandiose climax, chorale and fugue should have testified, one more time, of the artistic intentions that are embodied in this « œuvre » , intentions that sought to declare the earthly and heavenly together as one complete reality without considering the material and the inanimate as something inferior for Man to flee from in order to remain true to his calling. Bruckner wanted to say in this Finale that Man should not forgot the material in order to maintain his original purity as a creature from God but that, on the contrary, the spiritualization of the material was the true task of Man. Bruckner’s wish to say this one more time was not granted ; he had to abandon his work with the solemn sounds of the Adagio. »

Bruckner’s Symphonies have been described as « cathedrals in sound » . In a way, that is true, in the sense that they evidence a very strong architectural sense in which everything is logically connected to everything else. Each element supports each other element and, therefore, each element only makes complete sense when it can be experienced within the complete framework of which it is part. Because of this alone, the 9th without its Finale is not just incomplete because of the lack of that Finale but also because the 1st 3 movements cannot be fully appreciated without the 4th, since there the various (and, in case of the 9th, unusually disparate) elements are brought to a logical whole. The various threads of the 1st 3 movements are tied together in the 4th (as in all Bruckner Symphonies) .

From the above, it may perhaps have become clear why I do believe that a Bruckner Symphony cannot be complete without a Finale, because this Finale is what ties the earlier parts together and gives them their full meaning. Since no Bruckner Symphony casts its view wider than the 9th, it is here that the Finale is most severely missed. We are given a presentation of the human, earthly, demonic plus a vision of the divine without the connecting final vision. It is impossible fully to understand the Symphony without the Finale. In the words of W. van Hengel :

« This intention to create a grand synthesis puts its mark on the 3 completed sections of the 9th. »

Bruckner's Symphonies aren't just complete structures in themselves ; the various Symphonies seen together are also connected. The way that I see it, there are 3 groups within the Symphonies (disregarding the « Study » Symphony in F minor) . 1st, there is an aborted group, consisting of the 1st and the Symphony in D minor (this Symphony has until very recently been regarded as preceding the 1st, having been revised after completing the 1st ; not so, for it was written in 1869, after the 1st) . The 1st Symphony is the work in which Bruckner's genius came to the fore completely, and in the process almost destroyed the composer. After completing it, he fell victim to, perhaps, the greatest mental breakdown of his life, to the level of contemplating suicide. This despair perhaps drove him to « safer waters » when writing his next Symphony. Ultimately, he must have come to the conclusion that this was not the « natural » way to follow, after which he abandoned that road, to start anew with a Symphony again in the most basic tonality of his musical nature. This Symphony then became the foundation of the cycle of Symphonies 2 to 7, each one rising a bit higher, its central tonality becoming a bit brighter and more colourful. These Symphonies, together, may perhaps be seen as the various (vertical) components of a giant cathedral in sound, the 1st of the series (i.e. , the 2nd Symphony) the almost subterranean foundation and crypt from which the view can only be straight-up, until the very highest vaults of the 7th, from which the view is almost horizontal, almost totally disconnected from the earth.

A note on tonalities here. As I see it, there are 3 series of Symphonies within Bruckner's Symphonic « œuvre » . An aborted 1st, starting in C minor, moving to D minor, an unfinished 3rd, again starting in C minor and moving to D minor. Only the 2nd cycle is complete, and also starts in C minor and moves on to D minor. Then, there are 4 major Symphonies, whose tonics are, I think, closely related.

I. The 4th is in E-flat, the 5th in B-flat ; a 5th apart ; the 6th is in A, the 7th in E ; again, a 5th apart.

II. The 4th is in E-flat, the 6th in A ; a diminished 5th apart ; the 5th is in B-flat, the 7th in E ; again, a diminished 5th apart.

III. The 4th is in E-flat, the 7th in E, a half-tone apart ; the 5th is in B-flat, the 6th is in A, a half-tone apart.

IV. The 4th starts in 3 flats ; the 5th gets « lighter » by losing a flat ; then, the 6th exchanges 2 flats for 3 sharps, becoming « lighter » ; still, after which the 7th adds a sharp. Moreover, the 4th and 5th are in « flattened » tonalities (E-flat and B-flat) , while the 6th and 7th are in « pure » tonalities (A and E) .

Moreover, A is considered a bright key, and E even brighter.

Is all this a coincidence ? I think not ; Bruckner's sense of tonality is too strong for this to be mere coincidence.

To continue on this line might have led, I believe, to a Symphony in C major (a 3rd below E) . Why ? Well, the « purest » tonality is that of C major (the « positive » of C minor) , in which there are no flattened or sharpened tones. Since Bruckner clearly had a « primitive » sense of tonal relationships (as exemplified in the notes I-IV above) , one may speculate that, if C major is the « purest » , C minor must be its opposite. In other words, if C minor be the « fundamental » or the lowest, C major must be the « crown » or the highest. Hence, the distance travelled from C minor to C major is the furthest. C major has no « colour » , being the purest « white » . Thus, C minor must be the opposite, or negative, hence is « black » . All other tonalities have a colour, due to « breaking the light » via flats or sharps. None reaches such purity as C major, but none starts as far from it as C minor.

One could perhaps say that a Symphony starting in C minor and moving to C major travels vertically, all other tonalities travelling in a diagonal.

All this implies that a Bruckner Symphony is a journey, with the minor key Symphonies an « open » journey (from the minor to the major) and the major key ones a closed one (from the major to the major) . This may be reflected in the fact that, in the minor key Symphonies, the weight is balanced between the 1st and last movements, whereas in the major key Symphonies the balance shifts to the inner movements, especially the Adagio (the 4th Symphony being something of an intermediate work here) . In the 7th Symphony, it feels as if this development has gone about as far in this direction as it could go, the Adagio having become the centrepiece, and the Finale becoming the slightest movement. This journey to « perfection » thus would have led, I believe, to a Symphony in C major, but this would be unachievable within the ground plan of a Bruckner Symphony. A work in C major would need to be « perfect » , i.e. , represent perfection and, hence, no « journey » . But, within the earth-bound workings of a Bruckner Symphony, this could not be so. Instead, a work of perfection would need to have no ties to the earthly, but be divine totally : something unachievable within a Symphony as Bruckner understood the form. So, what Bruckner wrote after the « near perfect » 7th Symphony was indeed a work in the « perfect » C major, and one completely devoted to the Divine : the « Te Deum » . This « Te Deum » is, to me, not just an isolated piece but truly a Finale to the Symphonic cycle represented by the Symphonies 2 to 7 . After reaching this, he could not, therefore, continue this line of Symphonies and had to start anew. In other words, with the 7th, he had put the roof on the cathedral (consisting of Symphonies 2 to 7) , and with the « Te Deum » dedicated it to the Divine. To continue, he had to start and build a new cathedral, in his logic of building the foundations 1st, i.e. , start the next Symphony (again) in C minor, to move on to D minor in the next.

But there are changes. I believe that the Symphonies 2 to 7 are a cycle that is based on the earthly, the physical, looking upwards. The next cycle is written by someone who has seen the (Divine) fulfilment and is looking down.

The difference in viewpoint makes for a change in the architecture : the Scherzo becomes the 2nd part, the Adagio the (much expanded) 3rd. This leads to a radical change in perspective. In the 1st (completed) series of Symphonies (2 to 7) , the 1st movement is a kind of basic statement : call this the thesis. Then, there follow 2 separate antitheses (themselves being a thesis - antithesis set) : the Adagio and the Scherzo. The Finale then forms the synthesis of the various components given in the thesis (movement 1) and antitheses (movements 2 and 3) .

Starting with the 8th Symphony, the thesis section of the Symphony is, for me, no longer made-up of the 1st movement only but of the 1st 2 together. The Scherzo forms a complementary part of the thesis, enhancing the 1st movement. More precisely, the 1st movement gives us a picture of the earthly and human ; and the tragic position of that without, or outside, the divine. The Scherzo enhances that picture with a presentation of the sardonic, if not demonic (i.e. , giving an idea where the human soul will end without the Divine) . The 3rd movement (the Adagio) then forms the antithesis to both separate (but complementary) presentations of the thesis. Because of obvious necessity, this 3rd movement is expanded when compared to the earlier Symphonies. The Finale then gives the synthesis as in the earlier Symphonies but, here again, because of the wider view of the whole Symphony, this movement is expanded.

Bruckner's methodology when writing the 9th's Finale was no different than that of the 1st 3 movements or, for that matter, any of his other work. Roughly, one may distinguish 4 stages :

I. An initial sketch (« Skizze ») on 3 or 4 staves, containing the « musical argument » with a few indications of instruments and such.

II. A translation of the initial sketch into a rudimentary designed score (« Satzenverlaufsentwürfe » , or continuity drafts) .

III. A more elaborate version of II, but with only the main lines fully written-out (usually strings, with important woodwind or brass entries) .

IV. Further elaboration of III, with gradual filling-out of secondary voices and filling in of various parts.

V. Finalisation of IV (« nuancieren » , in Bruckner's terms) , with addition of musical indications (slurs, dynamics and such-like) .

The score paper was prepared for Bruckner by his assistant and secretary, Anton Meißner, who wrote in all instruments and keys, and pre-ruled all pages with 4 bars.

A fully completed double sheet (« Bogen ») would have the entry « Fertig » (ready) written in by Bruckner, and subsequent sheets would be placed one after the other.

Changes would be possible at any stage but, naturally, more so in the earlier stages. If changes in a later stage turned out to be rather big, the sheet could be taken-out and replaced by a newly written one or, when the changes resulted in a more extended passage.

Unfortunately, when Bruckner died, he had not completed (i.e., brought to « Phase V ») the entire score of the Finale. More unfortunately still, his home was not secured immediately after his death, allowing « treasure hunters » to swoop down on the remaining pages of the Finale, then scattered around his place, to grab bits and pieces for the memorabilia market : this based on the old law that dead artists are more valuable than live ones.

So what do we have, and do we have a clue as to what has been lost (or, at least, is presently unavailable) ?

Fully written-out (i.e., finalised full-score « Phase V ») : at least, some dozen sheets (bi-folios of 4 pages each) , running to roughly 200 measures or approximately one 3rd of the entire movement. Of those sheets, some 8 are presently missing, thereby, creating 7 gaps. From the state of these finished pages, it is clear that the missing sheets are indeed missing, and not never written. For several parts of these gaps, the original sketches survive, enabling an educated guess as to what they contained. Bruckner's working method then allowed for a reasonable filling in of those gaps. After that, there are score sheets with string parts complete and woodwind entries written in (« Phase III ») for approximately another 240 measures. After that, we have continuity drafts (« Phase II ») for well over 100 measures.

This means that there is continuous material of various degrees of finalisation for some 550 measures, or right-up to the beginning of the Coda. Some subsequent sketches are preserved which indicate how the beginning of the Coda might have been intended. After that (i.e., the Coda proper) : nothing.

Whilst Bruckner did not systematically work through all the various phases (i.e., rounding-off one completely before embarking on the next) , the fact that a full-score existed for at least a 3rd of the Finale leads to the assumption that at least the sketches (« Phase I ») and, perhaps, some subsequent phases (such as « II » or even « III ») existed all the way to the end at the time of Bruckner's death, meaning that he did, at the very least, put down an idea of how the work was to end, and may have begun to work-out that very ending. Today, we have nothing of the Coda, so how the work ends is anyone's guess. But that a very substantial part of the Finale has come down to us in at least some form (and for a considerable part in final form) is clear ; quite sufficiently so, in fact, for it to be taken very seriously indeed and to fully refute the idea that what exists are some incoherent sketches and drafts, to say nothing of the notion that « there is no need for a Finale » .

The « Te Deum » as Finale ?

Did or did not Bruckner want his « Te Deum » to fulfil the role of Finale to his 9th Symphony, in case he could not complete the Finale that he was working on ? Opinions about this issue are as far apart as possible, while each extreme is put forward as hard fact. I will cite 2 examples, each representing an extreme.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in his essay connected to his 2008 revision of the Samale-Philips-Cohrs-Mazucca completion, writes :

« Bruckner even expressly ordered (what other composer was so far sighted ?) that, in the event of his premature death, his “ Te Deum ” should be played as the best possible substitute for the missing Finale. The “ Te Deum ” does actually constitute a worthy “ substitute Finale ” for many reasons. »

Doctor Max Steinitzer, on the other hand, in his preface to the complete miniature scores published by Ernst Eulenburg, in the early 1920's, writes :

« Ein Irrtum ist, daß er das Tedeum (sic) zum Finale der neunten bestimmt habe. Man fragte der todkranken, ob es as solches gespielt werden könnte, und er murmelte irgend etwas, ohne zu verneinen. Es ist viel früher geschrieben und in ganz anderen Stil. »

Finally, in the liner notes to the CD with the recording of his version of the Finale, Sébastien Letocart writes that, in the sketches, there is a point where Bruckner apparently tried to sketch a transition to the « Te Deum », as if to connect the completed fragment of the Finale to the « Te Deum » .

But does the « Te Deum » fit as a Finale, as Cohrs especially seems to think or, at least, seems to think Bruckner may have thought ? I, for one, do not believe it for one second. There are several reasons for this.

1st, and foremost, a Bruckner Symphony is, as we have already observed, a very tightly constructed architectural whole and, whilst the exact details differ from Symphony to Symphony, there are certain big set constructs that are identical for each. Just as all Gothic cathedrals differ from one another in detail, they have certain set « rules » by which they are constructed. For a Finale to any Bruckner Symphony, this means a construct along the lines of expanded Sonata form, with exposition with 1st theme, 2nd theme (« Gesangperiode ») , 3rd theme (chorale theme) , then the development section (sometimes containing a fugue, such as in the 5th) and, finally, the Coda. Whilst the « Te Deum » is, itself, tightly constructed, its construction in a way represents the architecture of the text and has nothing to do with the « standard » Sonata form structure of a Finale (although it does have a recurring « main motive » 1st played at the very beginning, which is to play a big role in the Finale to the 9th) . Thus, the form is not « fit » for a Symphonic Finale.

2nd, a Brucknerian Symphonic Finale ties together all (main) threads from the whole Symphony (i.e. , including the preceding 3 movements) . Thus, in it one can find main themes from earlier in the Symphony, often in combination(s) where, together with the themes from the Finale itself, they tie together the whole « argument » of the Symphony. Since the « Te Deum » contains none of the themes set forth in the 1st 3 movements of the 9th, it simply cannot be used to make a satisfactory conclusion to that Symphony.

The fact that Bruckner makes (rather great) use of motives from the « Te Deum » in the Finale to his 9th is not strange in itself. He used motives from his « great » Masses in his early Symphonies (especially, Nos. 1 and 2) . Likewise, he uses motives from Wagner in some of his Symphonies, but for symbolic reasons, such as the « Gesegnet sollst du schreiten » from Wagner's « Lohengrin » that he incorporates into the 3rd to pay homage to the revered Master. And it is here that we may find the « true » reason why Bruckner used motives from the « Te Deum » so extensively. His 9th was dedicated « To the Dear Lord » ; it was Bruckner's indication to various people that the work was intended to end with a « Song of Praise » , which then must be thought of as a « Song of Praise to the Dear Lord » . And, for a devout Catholic such as Bruckner was, the « Song of Praise » would be the « Te Deum » and, whilst the actual « Te Deum » setting could not be used as a Finale to the 9th, strong allusions to it by way of utilising some main motives, most noticeably the opening ostinato, would be a logical way in which to achieve this.

It may be that Bruckner, on his death bed, was not opposed to the playing of the « Te Deum » in conjunction with the (unfinished) 9th, but as a separate item rather than as an integral part of the Symphony. The 1st performance of the 9th, in 1903, had the « Te Deum » before the Symphony ; this idea, if one wishes to play only the 1st 3 movements of the 9th, seems to me to be a viable solution, but the « Te Deum » as Finale is most emphatically not so !

Filling-in and filling-out

So what does anyone wanting to complete the Finale have to provide ?

1. As to the fully finished sheets : nothing, barring some details.
2. As to the fully finished sheets that have gone missing : trying to fathom how those sheets may have looked from the sketches and such like and working them out orchestrally.
3. For the score sheets with strings and wind entries : filling-out, based on the material available (sketches, but also by using earlier material for guidance) .
4. For the continuity drafts : filling-out ditto.
5. Coda : here, nothing remains so, here, every completor has to make personal guesses and, until more material surfaces, none can be superior to others in « having the truth » .

At present, there are 3 « competitors » in presenting a completed version of the Finale, 2 of whom have been at it for several decades. They are, in chronological order :

William Carragan, who prepared a completion in 1979, orchestrating it in 1983, thus presenting the 1st completion of the Finale. When it was recorded by the Utrecht Symphony Orchestra under Hubert Soudant it was the 1st occasion on which a complete 4 movement version of the 9th Symphony became available to a world-wide audience.

Then, there is the « conglomerate » made of Nicola Samale, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, Giuseppe Mazzuca and John Alan Phillips (also known under the abbreviation « SPCM » : this abbreviation will henceforward be used) . These 4 have not continuously worked on the Finale as a team, but various members thereof have worked alone or in various combinations during several decades. Initial work was done by Mazzuca and Samale, in 1984, and the project has been running through various stages, the most recent (as of writing) having been brought-out in 2005, by Samale and Cohrs, which was somewhat revised by Cohrs, in 2008.

A comparative newcomer to the scene is the Belgian composer and musicologist Sébastien Letocart, who produced his version of the Finale in 2008 as his thesis. He has subsequently made some small changes.

These 3 versions all face the same « problems », as set-out at the beginning of this section, namely to fill out those (as yet) missing finished full-score pages comprising 7 gaps, filling-out those subsequent pages of which Bruckner wrote an incomplete score and finally finding a way to end the Symphony's Coda satisfactorily. Whilst for the gaps, there is material on which to draw from sketches and discarded material and the filling-out of incomplete score pages can be done by educated guesses based on previous material and Bruckner's well established modi operandi, the 3 versions are roughly comparable in constitution (even where rather noticeable differences exist) but the Codas are fully « educated guesses » by the completors and thus rather different (other than that all 3 have a final « Alleluia » ending, even when the how and what thereof differs) . As far as can be deduced, the various completors were / are aware of one another's solutions, but have operated virtually independently of one another. Whilst « SPCM » and Letocart have provided extensive material as to how each and every solution was obtained, William Carragan has, to my knowledge, not done so.

How, then, about the Finale as we have it ? Does it live-up to expectations ? Ist, again, let me emphasise that, in his 9th Symphony, Bruckner cast his vision wider then ever. The Ist movement is much more tragic and dark than in any of his other Symphonies. The ensuing Scherzo is wildly demonic, this quality still further emphasised by the Trio. To counter that, the Adagio is the most divine such movement in any Bruckner Symphony. Perhaps, this is why most people want to close the Symphony here. We have seen Heaven, so why return to earth ? But if we are to experience Man in music here (Man being capable of both Good and Bad) , we have to combine the Good with the Bad to arrive at the complete picture. Light cannot be appreciated without having experienced Dark.

Of course, the problem here is that Bruckner did not live to complete this Finale. Moreover, in his final years, his mental capacities were diminishing. How much of Bruckner's genius is in this Finale ?

I do believe that there is a lot of Bruckner in that Finale. I think that Bruckner had thought out most of his Symphonies before starting to commit anything beyond mere sketches and « aide-mémoires » to paper. Since all components of the Ist 3 movements had to come to full fruition in the Finale, he must have thought that Finale through pretty thoroughly before writing down the Ist 3 movements, i.e. , the end predicts (or even dictate) the beginning. Because of this, I believe the Finale to have been pretty much complete, at least in his head, when he wrote the Ist 3 movements. So perhaps (some of) the sketches to the Finale even predate the scoring of movements 1-3 ! Moreover, since it is clear that he finished the Adagio with full mental capacities intact, it seems unrealistic to think that he started working-out the Finale with suddenly severely diminished powers. So, at least, the initial stages of committing the Finale to paper must have been when he had full command of his powers.

But he did not complete the Finale in a fully definitive form (even when substantial parts are definitive !) ; at least, as far as we know at present. We do, however, know that what was complete at the time of his death was more than what we have today, for quite a bit of it was stolen right after his death. Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, for example, is said to know that there is at least one manuscript collector who has parts of this considered lost material (and keeps apparently them under terrible conditions) , but keeps it inaccessible due to fear of taxes. Fortunately, we do have his sketches for most parts that we lack in full-score. It would seem that the only part of which we have nothing (available) is the final part, the Coda.

But does it convince ? It is a piece that is rather different from his other Finales, much darker and more desperate. But then, in this Symphony's 1st 3 movements, Bruckner casts his visions further than ever before, necessitating a greater amount of trials and tribulations to get it all together. If one would put Romantic titles to the movements, one could say the 1st movement gives us the insecurities and disappointments of human life, the 2nd a depiction of utter despair and the 3rd the promise of salvation. In short : earthly life, hell and purgatorio. From this, it would be easily understandable why most people consider the Symphony to be « finished » as it stands and even having no desire for a 4th movement since, as is usual in a Bruckner Symphony, such a 4th movement would have to deal with the despairing and hellish aspects once more ; « better » , then, to be left in purgatory with a vision of Heaven in our minds ! Perhaps, we would not have been fooled into believing that the work was, or could be, finished in 3 movements had Bruckner laid out the Symphony as in his earlier ones, with the Adagio 2nd and the Scherzo 3rd !

Since the 9th Symphony seems to deal with the earthly life and visions of Hell and Heaven (or, at least, Salvation) , one must therefore expect a Finale that is more disparate than ever before. The Finale of the 8th Symphony is already quite different to his earlier ones, but that of the 9th is even more so. Part of the problem of accepting the Finale might be that the 9th, in its 3 movement form, is so very well-known, that one has, perhaps, a feeling about the kind of music that « should » follow. Also, the symmetry of the 1st and 3rd movement around the Scherzo (itself a symmetric shape !) might be alluring. And since nobody's mind works like Bruckner's, the Finale music as discovered might sound disappointing, especially if one has conjured up some sort of expectation of what the Finale should be like, based on what one knows about the 1st 3 movements. If we see the 1st 3 movements as Earth, Hell and Purgatory, one might suspect the Finale to be a glorious fulfilment of all this, making a sequence of Human Life and Inferno (movements I and II) , Purgatorio (III) , Paradiso (IV) , so we might expect the Finale to begin, for instance, with either a glittering shimmer from which the vision of the heavens might start to consolidate (something on the lines of the opening pages of the 7th Symphony) , or a glorious assertive “ fanfare ”. Those huge and terrifying falling brass outbursts in the 1st movement (truly, Tuba mirum !) are already changed into rising brass calls in the 3rd movement (Tuba mirum changed into Tuba mirabilis ?) , so perhaps we might now expect (or like to hear) something of a Tuba gloriosa, or something such as the opening of the 8th's last movement. Thinking along these lines (but only then !) , the idea of placing the « Te Deum » in substitution for the Finale might seem not only plausible but also even desirable. So, the actual opening of the Finale, based on such assumptions, may very well sound disappointing (even wrong !) for we are thrown back into the insecurity, the darkness and the turmoil of the opening 2 movements. The conflict of those 2 movements re-emerges, even more troubling than before. We have seen a vision of victory in the Adagio, but we are as yet not part thereof.

The opening, a tremolo on timpani, does indeed give the tremulous beginning familiar from so many Bruckner openings, but on the darkest level. Almost immediately, jagged figurations (a 2 note pattern that will dominate the Finale on an almost obsessive level) begin, and the battle is soon in full swing. The problem with the completion is that, whilst the Symphony does (or at least was intended to) end in victory (be it only at the very end) that very end is missing from the material as we have it and has had to be supplemented from scratch by those completing it. Since only Bruckner (as I believe, he did) knew how the Finale, and therefore the Symphony, was to end (an ending of a kind unprecedented in his « œuvre », at that !) and since nobody as yet may convincingly emulate the thinking of Bruckner, that very ending as provided may seem to lack some naturalness and conviction. Nevertheless, with subsequent hearings, the music, including its ending, begins to sound more convincing, even moving. So it may well be a simple question of getting to know this music better.

All this makes, at least to me, the question of how sound Bruckner's mind was when he was working on the Finale to be answered by pretty sound indeed ! I do not think that he was losing his grip on his material, and what we have is emphatically not of inferior quality but is indeed what he had in his (right !) mind. Judging from material that I have read, Bruckner's mental state at the end of his life may have been deteriorating in some aspects, but more on the level of loss of confidence, rather than a degradation of (compositional) competence. It seems clear that his general mental equilibrium was indeed deteriorating. But Bruckner had already suffered attacks of severe mental disruption several times, most severely so after completing the 1st Symphony, so it may well be that, had he lived, he might have regained his equilibrium. The rejection of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony by Hermann Levi and the Schalk brothers seems to have been the 2nd severe wrecking experience, which I believe may well have lasted until the end of his life and may even have influenced the content of the 9th Symphony.

Some final conclusions

1. Bruckner's Symphonies are 4 movement structures tightly connected within themselves. All movements within one Symphony are inter-connected at a deep level. Since, in all Symphonies, material from the 1st 3 movements comes together and finds its final « solution » in the Finale, the material from those 1st 3 movements must be formed in such a way that it can come together in the Finale. It, therefore, seems impossible that Bruckner (fully) worked-out the 1st 3 movements of the 9th Symphony without 1st having a very clear image of how its Finale was going to be. In other words, when starting work on the 9th, he must have had a clear image of how this Symphony was going to be in its entirety, even when many details were still to be thought and worked-out during the actual compositional work.

2. Bruckner worked, like most composers, from drafts « upwards » to the finished score. One may expect that the drafts for the Finale were made straight after completing the draft of the 3rd movement at the latest. Since that 3rd movement shows no signs of failing mental powers, one may assume that, at least, the drafts to the Finale were made while Bruckner was still in a relatively healthy state of mind. This, in combination with point 1 above, gives me the certainty that the plans as revealed in the drafts are genuine as to how Bruckner wanted the Finale to be.

3. Those parts of the final orchestral score that are preserved show in their hand-writing no sign of mental deterioration and only, in the very last parts, some sign of physical deterioration. People who suffer from dementia or similar afflictions usually lose some or all of their motoric skills as well, most acutely noticeable in their hand-writing. Bruckner's hand-writing in the score of the 9th Symphony shows no signs of deterioration up until the very last extant pages : indeed, rather the opposite. Published examples of the manuscript score are as meticulous as one might possibly wish, even most of the very late ones. In fact, if one takes into account Bruckner's physical state during the period that he worked on the Finale (and during work on much of the earlier parts, in fact, especially the Adagio) , it is a miracle that he managed to get the score on to paper at all, let alone in such immaculate hand-writing. The last dated page is from August 1896, just 2 months before his death and well into what is supposedly his « mentally disintegrated » period. Here, his hand-writing is clearly less-secure than on earlier pages but, considering the level of physical deterioration during his final year, even his last hand-writing looks remarkably steady. Writing such a vast, complex score in a state of mental degradation seems to be, to me at least, impossible.

Because of all this, I do believe that the sketches to the Finale (which are quite if not totally complete) are to be taken entirely seriously, on the level of similar sketches to, say, the Finale of Mahler's 10th Symphony. The score as we have it should also, I believe, be taken equally seriously. The problem faced is to fill-out those score pages that for the time being remain missing. This constitutes somewhat less than half the movement, as yet. Here, the editors had to construct an orchestral score from the sketches, being aware of the fact that Bruckner may have changed things between sketch and score ; and the Coda had to be made from scratch.

But even when one finds that the (re)constructed Finale is weak as opposed to the rest of the Symphony, I do believe that it is vitally important to incorporate it in a performance or recording, in order at least to give an idea of what the whole work is about, for even an « inferior » completed Finale changes one's impression of the Symphony and proves that the 3 movement version is not complete and, therefore, not fully understandable. The alternative to presenting the completion is to play only those bits that exist in a Bruckner score but, then, the problem would be that the Finale is represented in the form of a series of loose and abruptly starting and ending fragments without a connecting framework ; that framework being very important. The argument that the Finale should not be performed because it is incomplete is nonsense insofar as it would then be equally valid to state that the 1st 3 movements of the Symphony should not be performed either because the lack of the Finale makes the whole work incomplete, said Finale being an organic, even necessary, part of the whole structure.

With the Finale in place, the 9th Symphony is a most disturbing work, not at all « heroic » , since its Finale is not the jubilant concluding Finale that one might expect or desire. Victory is made at the end, but only at the very end, and barely so even then.

To consider the work complete in its 1st 3 movements is, after hearing them several times, followed by any of the various attempts at presenting the Symphony's Finale, so wrong that it is almost obscene. The Finale's contents are such that they change the whole perception of the entire Symphony. The work most definitely does not (and was not intended to) end with that almost unbearable vision of Heaven, on those soaring last chords with that reminiscence of the 7th Symphony's opening figure, as if it were the hand of Beatrice reaching-out to accompany us into the heavenly, divine sphere. Even to think that the work could end there is absurd. The idea that, after this, the « Te Deum » might be fit to follow is Romantic nonsense, fed by a (wilful ?) misunderstanding of Bruckner's intentions as laid down in the Finale (the extensive quotations of the opening ostinato from the « Te Deum ») . Some people would probably find it easier, or more satisfying, to their sense of pleasance, to end the Symphony with the Adagio, rather than confronting what Bruckner had intended to follow, for that Finale is perhaps the most shocking piece of music ever conceived by him. No heroic entrance as in the 8th Symphony Finale, but a dull drum roll as a grotesque version of that so familiar tremolo shimmer that opens several other Symphonies, after which there unfolds a vision of Hell itself, almost like a Brucknerian version of the Temptation of Saint-Augustine ; and no sugary, « tasteful » version suitable for the faint hearted, but rather like the one painted by Grünewald for the Isenheim Altarpiece .

To distance oneself wilfully from, or even deny the very existence of, this Finale is not wanting to hear what Bruckner desired to say and not wanting to understand what Bruckner had in mind. A complete vision of his final intentions will forever elude us because the composer died before he could complete this work but, at least, a good idea of what he intended can be got from the various attempts at filling in the gaps and providing an ending for this most shattering movement that Bruckner conceived.

Final recordings

Since various « completors » have had different ideas as to how to fill in the various gaps and provide a Coda, I do think it is vitally important to hear those various attempts by Samale-Cohrs-Mazzucca-Philips, by Sébastien Letocart and by William Carragan. Different versions of all these recordings (excepting Letocart) are available but, unfortunately, several of them are either not by the best performers, or not easy to come by, or both.

What does become quite clear from comparing all these various is how much they are, in fact, like one another. For those sections of which a finished full-score has survived, this is no surprise, but the sections that had to be fleshed-out also sound remarkably similar. Also, the solutions that each completor has found for the Coda (for which only sketches for the very beginning survive up to the beginning of the final pedal point, after which there is nothing) are quite comparable. In all cases, the size of the Finale is comparable to that of the 1st and 3rd movements, i.e. , around 23-24 minutes.

Whilst a detailed analysis of the Finale of Bruckner's 9th Symphony in any of its completions is outside the scope of this essay (and arguably outside the capabilities of the present writer, who is not a musician of any kind whatsoever) , a look at the general structure is, for this Finale is laid-out quite similarly to the Finales of Bruckner's other Symphonies, but most closely related to those of the 5th and 8th Symphonies. Roughly : an opening on a tremolo (on timpani solo, unique in Bruckner's « œuvre ») , a statement of the 1st theme (a very bare falling sequence of 4ths in a double dotted rhythm that will become one of the main building blocks of the movement to the point of obsession) , a more lyrical (although « lyrical » seems too sweet a term for the most bare of « song periods » in Bruckner's work) , a 3rd « chorale » theme (perhaps, one of his greatest) , a development incorporating a Fugue and, finally, a Coda on a pedal point leading to a « Song of Praise » to end the work in a glorious D major. What is remarkable in this movement are the various points at which the music more or less abruptly comes to a halt, sometimes by way of petering-out, sometimes by way of harshly breaking-off. In the 2nd Symphony, there are many such pauses too, but there they present structural « breathing moments » ; here, they tend rather to mark a point of running-out of breath, or momentum, or sheer hope. Rarely has the absence of music in a work (i.e. , silence) had such a shattering effect. The only thing comparable to it may be the way that the music repeatedly falls silent in the Aria « Aus Liebe will mein Heiland sterben » from Bach's « Matthäus Passion » .

Also, during the Finale, there are 3 points where the music reaches terrifying, devastating climaxes or, rather, crises where the music reaches grinding dissonances foreshadowing the huge 9 note chordal pile-ups in the outer movements of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony. The last and greatest such crisis occurs at the beginning of the Coda, after which the completors have the task of connecting this devastating « point of no hope at all » to a final section in which the work has to end (convincingly) on a « Song of Praise » . « SPCM » and Letocart have each chosen to insert another moment of silence, after which their pedal point pile-up begins from ppp. This is a very moving solution, as if the human soul, after reaching the point at which it seems utterly destroyed in its human nature, starts to perceive the final glory that awaits it in the life, hereafter. I think that this solution is very much in accordance with what Bruckner tries to « tell » us in his final Symphony : Man must perish, knows that he must perish and accepts that he must perish, in order for his soul to attain the higher goal ; only after fully shedding, his human nature can he enter into the glory of the divine.

William Carragan, on the other hand, has the turning point right on that final crisis, wrenching the utter negative suddenly into the utter positive, as if the soul after a long and arduous climb suddenly finds itself on the summit of a tall and dark mountain and sees the sun blazing.

On the various completions

In the course of the years, after the 1st authentic publication of the 9th Symphony, various people have been working on the material of the Finale. A list will suffice to show that trying to complete the Finale started pretty soon after that publication :

Else Krüger : 2 pianos, 1934 (fragments) .

Fritz Öser : orchestra, 1940 (exposition only) .

Hans Ferdinand Redlich : 2 pianos, 1948 (fragments) .

Edward D.R. Neill and Giuseppe Gastaldi : orchestra, 1962 (fragments) .

Ernst Märzendorfer : orchestra, 1968-1969 (completion) .

Hein's Gravesande : orchestra, 1969 (completion) .

Arthur D. Walker : orchestra, 1965-1970 (fragments) .

Hans-Hubert Schönzeler : orchestra, 1974 (fragments) .

Peter Ruzicka : orchestra, 1976 (fragments) .

Marshall Fine : orchestra, 1977-1979 (completion) .

William Carragan : orchestra, 1979-1984 (completion) .

William Carragan and Paul Nudelman : 2 pianos, 1979-1984 (completion) .

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca : orchestra, 1979-1985.

Nors P. Josephson orchestra : 1979-1992 (completion) .

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca (arrangement by Samale) : 2 pianos, 1985 (completion) .

Nicola Samale and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs : orchestra, 1986-1988 (completion) .

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca : orchestra, 1989-1991 (completion) .

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (arrangement by Phillips) : 2 pianos, 1991 (completion) .

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (revised by Phillips) : orchestra, 1996 (completion) .

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (revised by Cohrs and Samale) : orchestra, 1996-2005 (completion) .

John Alan Phillips : orchestra, 1999-2002 (fragments) .

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (revised by Cohrs and Samale ; arrangement by Thomas Schmoegner) : organ. 2005 (completion) .

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs : orchestra, 2006 (fragments) .

In the above list, the names Samale, Philips, Cohrs, Mazucca, and (in any combination and collectively referred to as « SPCM ») may be readily identified as those who have worked to the greatest extent on the Finale ; they seem to assume the role for Bruckner's last Symphony that Deryck Cooke, Colin Matthews and Berthold Goldschmidt have taken for Mahler's last Symphony.

There are several recordings of various completions. Unfortunately, since Bruckner's Finale, as completed in any form, is by no means accepted at present by most Bruckner conductors, these recordings are either hard to find, of less than ideal performance and / or recording or both. Here follows a « review » of some versions and recordings the present writer has in his possession.

Sébastien Letocart ; 2008 version. Movements 1 to 3 : from the 1896 Leopold Nowak Edition. MÁV Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Nicolas Couton. Issued on abruckner.com as BSVD-0104.

I like this version quite a bit. It seems to hang together rather cohesively, logically and naturally. This sense is helped by the fact that Letocart, in his notes, specifies precisely the times of the gaps in the musical text that he had to fill in and, at exactly what point, begins the Coda that he had to provide virtually from scratch. Letocart's version is at points (especially, in the 1st sections of the Coda) rather darker than the other 2 (William Carragan and « SPCM ») . His Coda is a rather extended one in 4 sections (each helpfully time specified in the liner notes) , which gives the Coda extended « space » in which to build itself up. The « crises » Letocart realises, at the beginning of the Coda, are the most desperate that I have heard and, a little later, this returns once more. Only after the final section (the « Coda of the Coda » , in Letocart's words) establishes itself, leading to a final pedal point where the music almost wrenches itself into a ray of hope and confidence at the very end, does ultimate resolution arrive. I do think that, at least in part, it is as the composer intended it to be from the very time that he began composing the Symphony. It is most discomforting music to listen to.

But then, the bad news. I do not greatly like the recording. The Orchestra (the MÁV Symphony Orchestra, Budapest) sounds thin (a quick check showed that it is indeed a smallish Orchestra) , quite lacking the full sonority so needed for Bruckner's music. Moreover, various instruments in the Orchestra sound, at times, quite weird ; I'm quite acquainted with the fact that, say, a Russian built clarinet sounds different from a French one or an American one but, here, there are some truly bizarre sounds, especially the brass ones which, at times, seem like something that I might expect from an ambulance rather than from a professional Orchestra. Also, the Orchestra seems not to have an entirely right feel for Bruckner, making the recording lack a certain Brucknerian colour and such. On top of that, the recording itself is of well below acceptable standard, sounding as it does as though it was made in 1958, rather than 2008, with acoustics that suggest that the nearest available shed was used, rather than a radio studio as specified. To top it off, the equipment with which the recording was made seems not to have been up to reproducing the more climactic moments, resulting in congested patches. So, it was a bit hard to listen through all that. In the liner notes, Letocart writes that, after this recording was made, some minor revisions were made to the score. One may hope that this revised version finds a (more) adequate performing Orchestra and a far finer recording thereof to do it justice.

William Carragan : 2006 version (revision of his 1983 version) .

Movements 1 to 3 : Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs 2000 completion with, instead of the familiar Trio, the 1st Trio Bruckner wrote for this movement (but, apparently, not completed) in the revision of William Carragan. Tokyo New City Orchestra conducted by Akira Naito (live recording) . Issued on Delta Entertainment, DCCA-0032.

Unfortunately, as far as I know, William Carragan did not provide any notes as to the how and why of his completion. Moreover, he seems, in his 1st version of 1983, to have produced sometimes rather (too) long insertions of his own for the various gaps. Whilst it is impossible to determine the precise number of bars on any of the music full-score sheets, these sheets were pre-ruled by Bruckner's assistant and private secretary Anton Meißner with 16 bars per bi-folio. Whilst Bruckner did sometimes split bars (in Aart van de Wal's essay on the Finale, there is a nice photograph of a full-score page from the Finale where the original 4 bars have been split into 8) , it seems unreasonable to fill in a single gap with 50, as Carragan did at one spot, in his 1st version. He did so on the notion of the structural necessity that he perceived. However, as these gaps represent bi-folios completed by Bruckner, the composer must have « solved » any structural problems to his satisfaction. Thus, although an exact number of measures cannot be established, an approximate maximum can. Since a bi-folio contained minimum of 16 measures and (with some jamming) , perhaps, as many as 32, it seems reasonable that no supplementing of those lost bi-folios contains more than 30 bars and, in most cases, rather fewer. In his 2nd version of 2006, he seems to have realized this and has made his fill-in section of a more correct length. Contrary to both Letocart and « SPCM » , he chooses the moment to start the final pedal point of the Coda at the very spot where the 3rd and last great climax in Bruckner's hand is to be found, thus, by way of an almighty wrench, forcing the utter negative into the utter positive.

All that notwithstanding, William Carragan's vision is a convincing one that perhaps gives us the most positive solution to the Coda, it being mostly a long « Steigerung » .

The recording of the Utrecht performance of William Carragan's original version has never been issued on CD so, for those wanting to have it, it is a matter of trying to find the record set 2nd hand. The 2nd version, in its Japanese premiere performance, is currently not easy to obtain (it is issued only on the Japanese market) .

The Utrecht performance is, in my opinion, a very fine one, even when one has to keep in mind that, in this version, Carragan has supplemented gaps in the score with stretches of music longer than they should be. The 2nd version has been considerably tightened and the « fillers » now seem to have a more correct length. The performance of this version is a rather good one if, perhaps, somewhat on the faster side (it is the only version of the complete 9th Symphony that, at 77 minutes, fits on one CD !) . The performance, at 1st impression, may seem to lack some of the drama and « grandeur » that one may encounter in a « European » performance (say Bernard Haitink and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra) , but that impression is not entirely true, for the performance, for all its « coolness » , is a very serious and dedicated one, but one which takes the expression farther than just below the surface, yielding it after some several serious hearings.

Both, the Utrecht 1st version and the Tokyo 2nd, are proof of the fact that William Carragan, too, must be taken quite seriously as completor of Bruckner's final Masterpiece. His is, perhaps, the most « optimistic » one, insofar, as his final pedal does not seem « stuck on » after the Finale has ground to a halt at its most despairing point as do both « SPCM » 's and Letocart's, something that might sound rather artificial but, instead, turns a black vision upside down into the most radiant light. That, in turn, might sound a bit too much like the « Deus ex Machina » from the antique plays and, as such, also somewhat artificial. However, in all 3 versions, this « turning point » has started to sound, at least to me, like the point at which Man has been struck down beyond salvage (and all his hopes and expectations with it) only to encounter a force greater than his resurrection. A powerful vision indeed !

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca : 1992 Performing version (revised in 1996) . New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia conducted by Johannes Wildner. « Naxos » , CD : 8.555933-34.

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca : Final Performing version (revised in 2008) . « Musikalische Akademie des Nationaltheater-Orchesters Mannheim » conducted by Friedemann Layer. Live recording.

Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca : Final Performing version (revised in 2008) . Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra conducted by Daniel Harding. Live recording. World-premiere performance of the 2008 version, on 9 November 2007.

The history of the Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca is a long and complex one, starting in 1983 and, for now, being finished in 2008 and on which, at no point along that 25 year history, did all 4 musicologists work together (!) . For the details and history of this version and its various stages (something that is too long and complex to present here) , the reader is kindly referred to the essay that Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has written on the subject in the published score (Explorer Series : score 444) .

The « Naxos » set presents an earlier version of the realisation ; the Mannheim and Swedish sets each present the (for now and until new material on the manuscript surfaces) final version.

As has been said, the « Naxos » recording is of an earlier version than that on the other 2 CDs ; and it shows. Although the booklet does not specify where the « fillers » are, where the autograph full-score breaks-off or where the manuscript sources break-off altogether, these places can be « felt » , because there the music becomes noticeably stiffer and less naturally flowing. This is most apparent in the Coda, for which (virtually) no autograph material is presently known and must, thus, be fully composed by the completor. Added to that is the fact that, in this particular recording, neither Orchestra nor conductor is ideal, even when they clearly do their best, which results in a slightly stiff performance. Unfortunately, too, « Naxos » has opted for putting movements 1 to 3 on CD 1 and the Finale on CD 2, thus separating the 9th Symphony as we once knew it from the completion of the Finale. All other double CDs have the Adagio and the Finale together (the « SRSO » / Harding CD set also has the Scherzo on CD2, due to the interview that is also on CD1, preceding the Symphony itself) , thus allowing the listener to go naturally from the former to the latter without any « break-up » due to having to switch CDs.

The « MANO » Mannheim - Layer and Swedish « RSO » - Harding CDs are each of the final version of the « SPCM » Finale, the performance under Harding being the actual world-premiere performance, thereof.

Despite the somewhat disadvantageous sound of the Swedish « RSO » - Harding recording, this is a formidable performance. The Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra is a very good one and Harding clearly has the right feel for this music, presenting, as he does, a stunning and gripping account of this music. The performance lays bare the spare and tragic quality of the music as well as the demonic, the moments of tenderness as open as the moments of blackest despair. Moreover, his rendering of the Finale is a natural one, thus making it a truly coherent 4 movement journey. Also, it is abundantly clear from this reading how very modern a composer Bruckner was and how far into the future he looked. Many things we find in (later !) , Gustav Mahler for example, find their origins here. There are a few orchestral mishaps, especially in the brass, but Bruckner was fully aware of instrumental limitations and how to push those instruments to those points ; and in no work more so than in the 9th Symphony. It is really to be hoped that the same combination will one day (soon !) be able to make an « official » recording of this work. If Daniel Harding's recording of Gustav Mahler's 10th (Deryck Cooke's 3rd version) on « DGG » , played by the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , is to be taken as an example, such a recording of Bruckner's final work would be a stunner and, hopefully, an ear opener to all those who as yet doubt the validity of its Finale.

The recording from Mannheim is of the same version as the Stockholm one and is also of decent quality. However, whilst in technical execution it may be better than the Stockholm one, it does not reach its intensity ; also, the Orchestra seems to be rather on the smallish size and the hall in which the recording was made sounds somewhat lacking in reverberation, making the sound a bit flat and lifeless. Still, it is a very nice recording and one that treats the work as a 4 movement whole.

Peter Jan Marthé recorded live in « Stiftskirche Sankt Florian » . Bruckner's 9th Symphony, movements 1 to 3 plus freely composed Finale by Peter Jan Marthé. « Preiser » records : PR70928.

I would advise those who have, so far, enjoyed the pleasant tone of writing in this essay and would not wish this impression to be invalidated, to skip the next bit, for in order to say what I feel needs be said about this I will need to use some pretty strong language.

Marthé, insofar as I can understand from his rather overheated booklet notes, seems to claim that he has not merely « completed » the Finale but rather written it as Bruckner had intended but could not ; moreover, he has apparently done this not merely from a personal impulse but was pressed to do so by no less than Bruckner himself who, one is intended to believe, appeared to him in some sort of visions, coaxing him on to write the Finale.

In writing his Finale, Marthé simply abandoned the idea of utilising the score as left by Bruckner, preferring instead to take various ideas from it to produce a new score. After listening to the product, I can only say that what Marthé produced is not so much a Finale to the 9th Symphony but more a hotchpotch (a big, overloaded and loud hotchpotch) of a contraption, and the best one can say about it is that it occasionally (but only occasionally !) manages to sound vaguely like Bruckner, sometimes even slightly of what actually exists of the Finale to the 9th Symphony. This contraption is stylistically all over the place, an amalgamation of disconnected bits and pieces that at best sound vaguely Brucknerish, Mahlerish and various other ishes, but mainly one hears Marthé. The impression that one derives after tortuously traversing this item is that of a huge amount of grandiloquence (something entirely alien to Bruckner !) and one that has little or nothing to do with what Bruckner left us of his Finale or, for that matter, with Bruckner in general. To add insult to injury, this whole shebang was performed and recorded in Saint-Florian itself, receptacle of Bruckner's earthly remains.

No doubt this piece (which Marthé himself describes as an example of « Bruckner reloaded » , whatever that may mean, was Bruckner some kind of firearm ?) has its supporters and admirers ; however, with any respect for the legacy of Bruckner or, for that matter, with Bruckner in general, this « Finale » has very little, if anything, to do. To be avoided !

Final thoughts

The journey through all of these various Finales has been exhilarating. One thing is for sure ; I cannot hear the 3 movement torso (for that is precisely what it is, an incomplete torso) as even approaching a complete work in itself. Of course, the full vision and full glory of this work died with Bruckner, and cannot be obtained note for note, but the various completions presently offered at least give some idea of what Bruckner intended with the Finale and, thus, with the whole work. Luckily, large parts of the Finale have come down to us in a fully worked-out state and, from what remains, a fairly good idea of the rest can be obtained. It is an eternal disgrace that considerable parts of the Finale have disappeared, but it may be hoped that (some of) those parts may resurface some day, thereby allowing for a clearer image yet.

Of course, there will always remain those who prefer, from a somewhat twisted sense of « respect for the composer » , not to perform or hear the completion of Bruckner's 9th Symphony, or any other completion (curiously, such people have no trouble performing or listening to Mozart's « Requiem ») . So, be it and it is their loss. Thankfully, there are those Orchestras and conductors who do want to know what might have been and present the results of research that has been accomplished. In the case of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony, the completed version has acquired a strong foothold in the canon of his Symphonies, with only a few rather zealous « puritans » denying its right to exist, yet in the case, of Bruckner's 9th Symphony things are, presently, nowhere near as far developed. One must accept that the very existence of a Finale is only just emerging, well over a Century after it was conceived. Happily, however, several people are determined that its remains contain enough to justify an attempt at completion and an increasing number of conductors seem willing to present it ; not unusually, and perhaps not surprisingly, these are of the younger if not youngest generation of conductors who have not (yet) a ground in opinion of what should or should not be done. This too happened with Mahler's 10th Symphony, in which case Simon Rattle, in particular, played an important role in presenting the Deryck Cooke and al. completion to the waiting world. Perhaps, and hopefully, something similar will also happen to the completed 9th Symphony of Bruckner. Personally, I would love to get a studio recording of the « SPCM » completion by the Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra under Daniel Harding, whose world-premiere performance thereof already greatly impresses. In case « BIS » is reading this ...

I would also love to obtain the Letocart completion performed by a truly « up to it » Orchestra and conductor (« Concertgebouw Orkest Amsterdam », anyone ?). Until then, the various presently available recordings more than sufficiently justify the worthiness (and, indeed, the necessity) of having that completion of the Finale. Anyone who is truly interested in Bruckner, the Symphonist in general, and the 9th Symphony, in particular, should get to know the whole work such as is now available, in any of the 3 completions and, preferably, all 3 versions !

Do I think that any one of those 3 versions may gain upper-hand (as with the Deryck Cooke and al. version for Mahler's 10th Symphony or, for that matter, Süßmayer's version of Mozart's « Requiem ») and, if so, which one would I think that would be, or should be ? I have no idea. But the versions are each so powerful and convincing that I'd be happy if all 3 would find their way to the Orchestras, conductors and audiences. Frankly, I do not care which one they play, as long as they play one. Surely, within the forest of versions of his Symphonies, Bruckner can suffer 3 versions of his 9th Symphony Finale ?

We can know a lot about Bruckner's complete 9th Symphony

(Alonso del Arte)

Introduction

There are a lot of lies, misunderstandings and misconceptions about Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D minor. Chief among these is saying « we can't know » Bruckner's intentions and, using that as an excuse, to only play the 3 movements of the Symphony that Bruckner completed.

That ignores Bruckner's own work on the score of the Finale of his Symphony ; he had gotten a lot farther with it than a lot of people realized. It also ignores his own suggestion to use the « Te Deum » as a make-shift Finale. Whether he finished the Finale or not, he never wanted his Symphony to end with the Adagio.

Those who try to justify the 3 movement version as respectful of Bruckner's wishes are, at best, misinformed, and, at worst, dishonest. There are also those who dismiss the Finale on their own personal æsthetic assessment, or they feel that Bruckner tried but time just ran-out.

The difference is that the latter are willing to consider new information and new approaches that come along, while the former tell us that we can't know anything further about the Finale, so we should just stop asking.

The truth is that we can know a lot about Bruckner's complete 9th Symphony. There are pages and pages of documents, from Bruckner's own sketches and the score, to analysis of the sketches and the score, and realizations and completions of the score. I emphasize again, the score of the Finale was quite close to complete when he died.

Not every listener wants to read all those pages and pages of documents, or has time to. It is my aim in this article to summarize what we know and what we can know about Bruckner's complete 9th Symphony, and to point the way for those who wish to become better informed.

This summary is no substitute for reading all those documents. But it is my hope that any question that can be answered today is, if not answered in this summary, it is answered in one of the documents mentioned in this summary.

At least, a few conductors are vaguely aware of their own hypocrisy in dismissing the Finale of Bruckner's 9th, for which there is a lot of material in Bruckner's hand-writing as somehow not being « really Bruckner », yet, have no trouble with Mozart's « Requiem », which is nowadays usually played in the completion by Franz Xaver Süssmayr.

Süssmayr's approach to completing the Mozart « Requiem » was nowhere as scientific as that of Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca in completing Bruckner's 9th, nor as carefully considered as that of William Carragan, also for Bruckner's 9th.

John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs later joined the Samale and Mazzuca team and created still more completions. There are also completions by Sébastien Letocart, Jacques Roelands and Nors P. Josephson to consider.

The Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » (the complete edition of Bruckner's works) will not publish anyone's completion. But they have published Bruckner's own score of the Finale as best as can be done with pages missing, both in fac-simile of Bruckner's hand-writing and typeset.

You don't have to take my word or anyone else's as to which completion most faithfully follows Bruckner's intentions. You can take the Finale documentation from the « Gesamtausgabe » and compare it against the score of the completion.

I myself had forgotten that Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, who has done so much to increase our understanding of Bruckner's complete 9th Symphony, has also worked on Mozart's « Requiem », figuring-out what Mozart was really getting at and clearing away the stylistic impositions of Süssmayr.

The story of Mozart's « Requiem » is more complex and checkered than I care to get into here. I only wanted to make the point that the Süssmayr completion, judged by the same standards that are used to dismiss other works left incomplete by their original authors, fails miserably, yet, is accepted too readily.

William Carragan has articulated certain ground rules for completing these kinds of works. I have a feeling that, if someone were to review Süssmayr's completion for compliance with Carragan's rule, they would find Süssmayr lacking.

If you challenge all the people who have worked on Bruckner's complete 9th to document what they copied directly from Bruckner, what they deduced from similar passages and what they invented outright, you will find that their presentations of the Finale consist mostly of what Bruckner himself wrote by his own hand.

At least, for the 1st 278 measures. That's almost 10 minutes of music for which the completers have nothing to do besides bring some of Bruckner's notational eccentricities into line with modern practice.

Then, there is a gap ; then, some more pages of pretty fully-orchestrated music ; more gaps and more pages with just the strings written in ; and more gaps.

The main reason the Finale continues to be debated today is that the very last page of the score is missing. Maybe, it is sitting in a pile of paper just waiting for someone to go through and discover it. Or, maybe it has been destroyed and there is no hope of recovering its contents. But I am not going to pretend that I know the answer to that question.

The last page was not blank. But neither was it fully filled-in. It most likely had the strings filled-in and indications as to what the winds and brass were to play.

Let's talk dollars and cents, making sure to keep the old « adage » , « time is money » , firmly in mind, from the score and parts, rehearsals, publicity, concert ... all the way to recording.

The conductor's score of the incomplete 9th, in its Alfred Orel edition from Luck's Music Library, costs $ 120. A set of parts costs $ 310, and should be sufficient for an orchestra with 8 1st violins, 8 2nd violins, 6 violas, 4 cellos and 2 double-basses.

Additional parts can be had for $ 8 each. The rental fee is $ 221, and requires notification 1 year in advance, though for this particular work, I imagine Luck's would be fine with slightly shorter notice.

Now, a world-class Orchestra like the New York Philharmonic or the Chicago Symphony surely already has all these materials ; or, maybe, they have the Leopold Nowak edition ; or, maybe, even both. Suppose they decide to acquire the score and parts for a complete 9th and it costs almost $ 1,000 total. They can afford that.

But there is also the work that comes with that. Maybe the musicians have bowings and other markings in the Orel or Nowak edition that they want transferred to the complete edition (such as the Cohrs edition with the Samale and al. Finale) , and maybe this can be accomplished almost automatically, notwithstanding the occasional hiccup, but it still would not be instantaneous.

Not that Cohrs recommends doing that, given that he has characterized the Nowak edition as being so full of mistakes that it is barely any better than Orel's edition.

There would certainly need to be more rehearsal time. I e-mailed a world-renowned conductor about this, and he said that, yes, of course, since it's adding about 20 minutes of music to the concert.

However, in terms of rehearsal time, the Finale of the 9th would be more expensive than some unrelated 20 minute composition that the Orchestra had to learn. The conductor has to understand how the Finale fits-in with the familiar 3 movements, and he has to teach this to his players.

There is also the concern that ticket sales could suffer if the program is just one Bruckner Symphony with a Finale regarded with suspicion by the un-informed.

Ideally, a concert runs 2 hours, including a 20 minute intermission. That leaves 100 minutes, 80 to 90 of which would be taken-up by the 9th.

I have a suggestion that could alleviate both ticket sales concerns and intermission concerns :

Start-off with Ron Grainer's theme music for « The Prisoner » . Immediately follow that with Michael Haydn's Introduction to « Der büßende Sünder » and, then, follow that immediately and also with barely any pause with Bruckner's 9th Symphony, up to the Scherzo. Then, intermission before the Adagio and Finale. Round this out with John Williams' music for « The Empire Strikes Back » end credits.

Maybe my suggestion sounds ridiculous but, at least, I am not sticking a composition by someone else in the middle of Bruckner's 9th and, then, pretending to be a guardian saint of « Urtext » piety.

A lot of publicity could be had for free, as the complete Bruckner 9th is still a new thing. For the Orchestra's marketing team, a complete Bruckner 9th would present no difficulty.

As for recording, in addition to needing more studio time, there is the issue of 1 CD or 2. If the whole thing turns-out to be way more than 80 minutes, you probably need 2 CD's, which entails certain expenses even if neither CD contains more than 50 minutes of music.

For Audio DVD and audio-files for download or streaming, I suppose there is no problem with a 90 minute recording ; some sellers put as many as 200 « tracks » on a single virtual « disc » .

Given the resistance to the complete Bruckner 9th, record producers may feel trepidation at taking on any of the completions. But they shouldn't. Bruckner fans are growing suspicious of the « complete in its incompleteness » nonsense, and they are buying recordings of the most recent completions at a faster pace than the producers had hoped for.

The 2012 recording by the Berlin Philharmonic, conducted by Sir Simon Rattle in the final Samale and al. completion on the « EMI » label, had an Amazon.com sales rank of 107,364 the last time I checked (December 28th, 2015) . The 2003 « Naxos » recording of Johannes Wildner conducting the New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia, in an earlier Samale and al. Completion, had a sales rank of 139,496.

By contrast, Simone Young's recent recording of the 3 completed movements had a sales rank of just 184,124. (If you want to support women conductors, by the way, I suggest you check-out her other Bruckner recordings.) Christoph von Dohnányi, live at the Salzburg Festival, fared a little better at 159,691.

Claudio Abbado's recording of the incomplete 9th with the Lucerne Festival Orchestra is currently at 25,476, but that's probably because it was named « Orchestral Recording of the Year » by « Gramophone » magazine.

I predict that the Abbado recording will, at some point in 2016, eventually plummet to around the levels of the Young and Dohnányi recordings, while the Rattle and Wildner recordings will continue to hold steady throughout the year, even if a new complete 9th recording comes-out.

The Gerd Schaller recording of the latest Carragan completion is not doing as well, but I think it's because it comes bundled with the 4th and the 7th, which are popular enough to be present even in the collection of someone who might consider himself only a casual Bruckner fan.

This applies equally to MP3 downloads : on Amazon.com, to buy the 9th from the Schaller album you also have to buy the 4th and the 7th. If they separated-out the 9th, I think it would sky-rocket past the Young and Dohnányi recordings.

It is true that Bruckner did not finish his 9th Symphony to his satisfaction. The score of the Finale was not ready to turn-over to a copyist. But Bruckner actually got a lot closer to finishing than the music appreciation racket has led us to believe.

Perhaps, the only morally valid objection to completing is this one presented by Hans-Hubert Schönzeler, and it goes something like this : since Bruckner dedicated the 9th Symphony to God, and God decided that Bruckner would not live to complete it, it is disrespectful to God to attempt to complete Bruckner's 9th.

This argument pre-supposes the existence of God, but since Bruckner believed in God, it does not matter if we don't believe in God as we try to be respectful of Bruckner's wishes. The problem with this argument is that it pre-supposes that God decides when people die of natural causes. This does not sit comfortably with the notion that God gives us free will. Then, death by natural causes is in part a consequence of the decisions of the deceased.

Bruckner was not an alcoholic, like Michael Haydn or Jean Sibelius, but he was not puritanical, like Leopold Mozart ; he did enjoy beer on a fairly regular basis. And he also enjoyed snuff on special occasions. Plus, his sexual abstinence spared him the problems that come with sexually transmitted diseases.

There was not as much health information in those days, though there is something to be said for not having to deal with a steady stream of contradictory studies like we do nowadays. Coffee, red wine, chocolate, these things are good or bad for you according to whatever news report you have last seen.

Prayer and church involvement are good for you, more than one study has concluded, and there is no doubt about Bruckner praying and being involved in church.

Maybe Bruckner prayed for a miracle to grant him more time to work on the 9th, and maybe God did grant a miracle at some point. But the miracle could still be seen as a consequence of Bruckner asking for the miracle.

So, when Bruckner died on October 11th, 1896, did he decide he did not want his 9th Symphony played at all ? Unlikely, given that he took steps to make sure the 3 completed movements were placed in the hands of a conductor.

Or did he, instead, decide that he wanted the « Te Deum » as a make-shift Finale, since he had been unable to complete the Finale ?

That's possible.

Or maybe he decided that, although he had not accounted for every single bar of the Finale, he had left clear enough indications of what he wanted that anyone with a modest « modicum » of orchestration knowledge could fill-in what he had not had time to take care of.

Maybe you are of the opinion that the Finale of Bruckner's 9th Symphony, even after making certain allowances, is not a satisfactory conclusion. We are all entitled to opinions. I am of the opinion that the Finale of the 4th Symphony, in whatever version, is an unsatisfactory conclusion for that work.

It is in the 5th, 7th and 8th Symphonies that Bruckner wrote Finales of unassailable suitability to conclude those respective works. The Finale of the 6th Symphony can only be faulted for its Coda not being as triumphant as the very optimistic Coda of the 1st movement led us to expect.

So, if you have a low opinion of the Finale of the 9th, I hope it is an opinion you arrived at after listening to all the available reconstructions and completions, and after learning at least the basic facts about the whole 9th Symphony, and not just accepting as your own the opinions of critics too lazy to research the matter, or worse, the opinions of people with a financial interest in an incomplete 9th.

John F. Berky, who runs the Bruckner Symphony Versions Discography, has probably listened to every completion that is commercially available and a few more besides that, so he is in a position to have an informed opinion.

Berky writes :

« While I have no doubt that Bruckner wanted to continue on and did so, I think he knew that the task before him might just be too much for him to accomplish and the ending of the Adagio may be a form of resigned farewell. So, while I look forward to every performance of the Symphony with its Finale, I still inherently feel that Bruckner knew that the 9th may just have to end after the Adagio. »

When someone has an informed opinion, even one that you disagree with, there is something to be learned. Robert Simpson, who fell for the « complete in its incompleteness » non-sense, had a very important point to make about the 1st 3 movements.

Some people are of the opinion that the 1st 3 movements constitute an irreproachable Masterpiece. But Simpson points-out quite a few awkward details in the 1st 3 movements that Bruckner would certainly have improved if he had time to write-down the whole Finale and look-back over everything.

By elevating the incomplete 9th to the pedestal for a Masterpiece, it becomes much easier to dismiss the Finale. But we must remember that Simpson wrote :

« The kind of precision that we find in Bruckner's most perfect work is not quite achieved in either the 1st movement or the Adagio of the 9th - but for all we can tell, they may simply be less unfinished than the Finale. »

There are many exciting and dramatic moments in the completed movements of the Ninth (I describe some of those in the "Overview of the musical narrative" section).

But there are also exciting and dramatic moments in the Finale, as well as many moments that connect the Finale to what has happened before, and which let us know that there was some advance planning that went into it long before Bruckner started on the score.

Another thing that we need to confront are the idiotic ideas we have in this society about originality and inspiration. Supposedly, we value originality, yet, one of the most famous compositions in our core repertoire is the Symphony in C major by Georges Bizet, a skillful plagiarism of the Symphony No. 1 in D major by Charles Gounod.

And inspiration is thought to come in sudden bursts. The composer hangs around doing nothing, until suddenly he gets a thunderbolt of inspiration, and must then rush to write it all down before the inspiration vanishes.

The reality is that a truly great composer can write music in the absence of inspiration, and that writing music involves a lot of advance planning. The roots of all the themes of Bruckner's 9th Symphony can be identified in the exposition of the 1st movement.

The idea that Bruckner didn't come-up with anything for the Finale until 1895, when his death was on the horizon, is highly suspect. If nothing else, Bruckner, at the very least, thought about how the Finale would integrate some important theme from the 1st movement into a crucial point in the Finale.

As early as 1887, when still enjoying the success of his 7th Symphony and looking forward to the success of his 8th Symphony, Bruckner had ideas about the Finale of the 9th.

Maybe not precise ideas as to content, but definitely at least vague ideas as to how the conflicts presented in the initial themes would be resolved in a resplendent Finale.

To truly understand the 9th Symphony, we must not just look at the 3 completed movements, nor just at the Finale. We must look at the whole thing as a coherent, organic entity from beginning to end, that, to be sure, has its flaws, but is also one of the most important Symphonies in the entire repertoire.

One more thing before getting more in depth :

Genesis and reception

The genesis of the 9th Symphony is still going on. The composer will probably not have anything new to add, but this does not completely rule-out that a previously lost page might come to light, or that there might be a new insight on the pages we currently have.

Bruckner started sketching his 9th Symphony on August 22nd, 1887. It had been less than 2 weeks prior that Karl Aiger finished copying the score of the 1st version of the 8th.

So, when on his birthday that year, Bruckner wrote a letter to Hermann Levi announcing the 8th Symphony, he was already working on his 9th.

This would be entirely consistent with what we know of Bruckner's tremendous confidence as a Symphonist, how he would start on a new Symphony before he had given the newly-completed work to a copyist, and before there was any hope for a performance.

And we can be sure that, in late-1887, he wasn't just thinking about the 1st movement of the 9th, he was planning the structure of the whole thing, coming-up with themes that he could assemble, modify, disassemble and re-assemble over the course of a big Symphony.

The story is now very well-known of how Levi was puzzled by the 8th Symphony, prompting Bruckner to not just revise the 8th, but also some of his earlier Symphonies. Plus, he was still expected to compose choral pieces for grand occasions, like « Psalm 150 » and « Helgoland ». And, on top of that, he was still an active professor.

So, with all these interruptions, the 1st movement was not completed until 1893. Maybe, we could have done without another version of the 3rd Symphony, but the revision of the 8th Symphony was beneficial to the 9th.

Bruckner finished work on the Scherzo that same year. For this Symphony, he seems to have had no doubt that the Scherzo should go 2nd, and he seems to have been fairly set on the content of the Scherzo proper.

The Trio was originally going to be in F major and in a slower tempo. Later on, he came-up with the idea of it being in F-sharp major. And, lastly, he decided it should be in F-sharp major and at a faster tempo than the surrounding Scherzo, completing it in 1894.

The 1st F-sharp major Trio stands in the middle between the original F major Trio and the finished F-sharp major Trio not only chronologically, but also as an in-between step in a mutation process.

The reason I know all this is because the original F major Trio and the 1st F-sharp major Trio have been both published as supplements to Volume 9 in the « Gesamtausgabe ». There is also a recording of these 2 discarded Trios in a chamber orchestra arrangement.

By November 1894, Bruckner had completed the Adagio. Many have compared the way this Adagio ends to how the Adagio of the 8th Symphony ends. But no one would dare suggest that the 8th Symphony is somehow complete without its Finale.

Another productive comparison is to the Adagio of the 1st Symphony. Those final bars sound much more earned in the 9th than they do in the 1st.

Illness kept him from working on the Finale until 1895, the same year he gave the conductor Karl Muck the manuscript score of the 3 movements he had completed thus far. Anton Meißner had copied the 1st 3 movements and would probably have copied the Finale as well, if Bruckner had lived long enough to finish it.

This is pure speculation on my part, but I think that, in December 1894, Bruckner thought he was going to die that month, and not live to see another year. Maybe, this is when Bruckner prayed to God most fervently for more time to finish the Symphony. And whether or not God answered those prayers, his friends were aware of his plight.

It is a fact that Emperor Franz-Josef became concerned about Bruckner's health, and generously provided him an apartment at a Palace hunting-lodge. No more stairs for the old man to climb. By May 1895, Bruckner was feeling much better and resumed work on the 9th Symphony, now turning to the Finale.

By June 1896, he had set-down on paper a fairly complete succession of musical events, with a clearly defined phrase structure and harmonic framework. Now, it was just a matter of filling-out the woodwind, brass and timpani parts, and tweaking the string parts.

In early July, Bruckner came-down with a terrible case of pneumonia. Still, he worked on the Finale whenever he could muster the physical strength to set on paper what was so clear in his mind.

On the day he died, he left some 300 bars of the Finale pretty much fully-orchestrated. The 1st 100 bars or so, he left with each of those bars containing either musical notes or a whole rest.

The whole rests are important because they show a particular instrument or voice is to be silent for that measure, ruling-out the possibility that the composer may have wanted to write some notes in that measure but didn't get around to it.

For roughly the 2nd half of this score, Bruckner wrote a lot for the strings but left most of the woodwind and brass measures completely blank. Still, it is quite reasonable to believe that Bruckner died feeling like he had left so good an indication of how he wanted this Finale to be that someone else could readily fill in what he could not.

Trouble was, Bruckner's estate was not properly secured immediately after his death the way it should have been. Souvenir-hunters helped themselves to several pages and, to this day, there are 5 major gaps in the manuscript score of the Finale.

I can only speculate as to what Ferdinand Löwe thought when he 1st looked at the score of the Finale. Did he notice the gaps caused by the souvenir hunters ? Did it occur to him to try to fill those gaps with his own free composition ?

Rightly or wrongly, Löwe has a reputation for bowdlerizing Bruckner's scores. Prior to Benjamin Marcuds Korstvedt's relatively recent research, the 1888 version of Bruckner's 4th Symphony was considered by many to be an inauthentic reworking by Löwe. This is a more complex issue than I can get into here, so if you are at all interested in it, seek Korstvedt's edition of the 1888 version in the « Gesamtausgabe » .

There is no doubt that Löwe re-worked the completed movements of the 9th Symphony, and at least one of his changes (softening a harsh chord in the Adagio) has been well-documented. But he probably decided that it too much to try to fill in the gaps in the Finale.

And, maybe, he also thought about Franz Schubert's Symphony No. 8 in B minor, now the most famous of Schubert's « unfinished » Symphonies. Schubert wrote 2 movements in 1822 and the score remained in obscurity until 1865, when Johann Herbeck conducted its premiere. (Herbeck, by the way, also conducted 2 of Richard Wagner's Operas and helped get Bruckner appointed to teach at the Vienna Conservatory.)

Schubert's popularity had grown steadily between 1822 and 1865, but the mystery of why the B minor Symphony was unfinished when he supposedly had time to complete it must surely have helped cement Schubert's place in the pantheon of the great composers.

So, perhaps, Löwe thought that Bruckner, who as late as his 9th Symphony showed the influence of Schubert, would be helped by having an « unfinished » Symphony of his own for which curious listeners could speculate as to the reason why the composer did not complete it.

Death is the most obvious reason, in Bruckner's case. But that hasn't stopped people as recently as 2015, like Kent Nagano, from suggesting that Bruckner had lost interest in or inspiration for the piece, thus, transferring to Bruckner an explanation that has been given for the incompleteness of Schubert's B minor.

Presumably, Löwe grieved for some time before getting to work on re-orchestrating the 3 completed movements of Bruckner's 9th. This, he got done in 1902, and it was in his 3 movement version that Bruckner's 9th was 1st presented to the public on February 11th, 1903.

And it was Löwe's version that continued to be heard until April 2nd, 1932, when Siegmund von Hausegger presented Löwe's version back to back with the 3 completed movements from Bruckner's manuscript score.

That 1932 concert created a moral imperative to publish Bruckner's music according to the manuscript scores he bequeathed to the Austrian National Library, without the well-meaning adjustments of his pupils (like Franz Schalk, who re-orchestrated Bruckner's 5th Symphony to include an off-stage brass band and cymbals) .

But that concert also re-inforced the very mistaken idea that what Bruckner wrote for the Finale consisted of just a few fragmentary and incoherent sketches, and that it would take too much free composition to turn these into a musically satisfying narrative.

Although the commonly heard version of the time was the major reworking by Löwe, a lot of the score of the Finale was in the possession of the Schalk family well into the 1930's.

When Alfred Orel published a supplement to Volume 9 of the « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » (complete edition) , in 1934, on the finale sketches, the material presented was so thin that completing the Finale seemed hopeless.

The 1st « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » was tainted by the Nazis. In order to use Bruckner as an exemplary Aryan artist, the Nazis needed to tweak Bruckner's biography to down-play his religious devotion.

Not only were Bruckner's great Masses and many Motets ignored by the Nazis, the idea of the « Te Deum » as a make-shift Finale for the 9th Symphony was not even mentioned.

The highly-praised recording of the 9th by Wilhelm Furtwängler, in 1944, was of only the 1st 3 movements ; this was the norm in Nazi Germany and continued to be the norm for the rest of the 20th Century.

One tid-bit from Cohrs that I am particularly grateful for is the fact that Furtwängler had actually wanted to conduct Fritz Öser's arrangement of the Finale exposition. But, due to intervention from Robert Haas, Furtwängler was prevented from this.

(After the War, Furtwängler's own Symphony No. 3 in C-sharp minor could have become another example of « complete in its incompleteness » , and was even recorded by Wolfgang Sawallisch as such, on a CD with 3 tracks : the last of which is the Adagio. That was in 1996 ; back in 1988, Alfred Walter had recorded the complete 4 movement Symphony on the « Marco Polo » imprint of « Naxos » .)

It is entirely reasonable to believe that some pages of the score of the Finale of Bruckner's 9th were lost or even destroyed during World War II, which makes it all the more amazing how much has actually survived to the present-day.

After World War II, as Bruckner's religious music was rediscovered (in great part thanks to Eugen Jochum) , but the idea of the « Te Deum » as make-shift Finale continued to be dismissed.

But no one wanted to dismiss that idea for the same reason as the Nazis while, at the same time, no one wanted to admit a financial objection to hiring a choir. So, then, it was that the 9th is in D minor and the « Te Deum » is in C major. End of story.

It seems no smart aleck has ever suggested transposing the « Te Deum » to D major. But others have suggested that, since the Adagio ends in E major, there is actually nothing wrong with appending a C major composition to serve as Finale.

The real problem with the « Te Deum » as a Finale goes much deeper than key-signatures. Since before World War II, it was known that, in the actual Finale of the 9th Symphony, Bruckner alluded to the « Te Deum » . But this is a one-way street : the « Te Deum » makes no allusion to the 9th Symphony.

Bruckner's fans who had seen nothing of the Finale sketches still had some ideas about the Finale of the 9th that they could easily deduce from earlier Symphonies. In the 3rd, for example, the D minor trumpet theme that Wagner liked in the 1st movement, recurs at the end, transfigured to D major.

And the 8th (in its 1890 version) concludes with a combination of the main-themes of all 4 movements in a resplendent fanfare.

It would be imprecise to call this « contrapuntal » , but it certainly is impressive and it certainly made sense that Bruckner would do something like that in the 9th Symphony.

Curiosity about the Finale of the 9th continued to grow. Gottfried von Einem's « Bruckner-Dialog », Opus 39, must have stoked that curiosity. The piece is appropriately called a dialogue because it is Bruckner and Einem having a conversation, and it is very clear that the chorale comes from Bruckner.

The beginning of that piece doesn't sound anything like Bruckner, and I am not sure how typical it is of Einem. But, then, there is the chorale from Bruckner's Finale sketches and, at this point, the music sounds like Einem has photocopied it straight-out of Bruckner's score.

As Bruckner's chorale is repeated later on in the piece, Einem adds more and more interjections of doubt and despair. But even if you haven't heard any completions, you will recognize the exhausted winding-down from the final statement of the chorale as coming from Bruckner, not Einem.

I believe that, if Robert Simpson had heard Einem's piece, he would have changed his mind on the viability of completing Bruckner's 9th. It wouldn't have been the 1st time Simpson changed his mind about a composer's final Symphony, having done almost an about-face on Carl Nielsen's 6th, nor was it the 1st time he changed his mind about Bruckner.

But the most significant work on the Finale of Bruckner's 9th didn't take place until 1983, when Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca reviewed all the materials available at the time and found there was a much clearer indication of the structure of the piece than had been previously thought.

Bruckner numbered the bi-folios, and, more importantly, numbered the bars of the bi-folios according to phrase structure. So, where gaps occur, we can have a very good idea of what is missing.

The 1st major gap in the Finale score is bi-folio number 15, which is still missing and might have even been destroyed. John Alan Phillips writes that its contents « must be left to our imagination », but he also writes that « the further 8 measures of this bi-folio would have continued the triplet figuration and augmented “ Te Deum ” motive, leading into the G-flat major chord which appears at the beginning of the next surviving bifolio. »

Sounds to me like a very reasonable description of what bi-folio number 15 probably contains. The later gaps are more difficult to reconstruct, and require more deduction, and possibly some invention.

It was at about that time that William Carragan also released a completion. Samale and Mazzuca added 1st John Alan Phillips and, later, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs to their team and released more versions as more material was found and previously available material was re-assessed.

Carragan also made more versions of his completion. Nors S. Josephson and Sébastien Letocart also got in on the game, and others still.

If we compare these completions, one thing is abundantly clear and worth repeating : for roughly the 1st half of the Finale, all these completions are essentially the same. That gives you an idea of how much Bruckner wrote and how little the editors had to deduce or invent.

Only now that we know so much about the Finale, can the reception of Bruckner's complete 9th begin to be properly assessed, though the long tradition of incomplete performance will continue to affect how the complete Symphony is received.

An issue that I honestly had never thought about it is that of formal balance. Many think that with only 3 movements, conductors felt the need to stretch-out the 1st movement to match the Adagio in duration and more neatly place the Scherzo in the middle.

With the Finale, the thinking goes, the 1st movement needs to be played faster. Well, tell that to Kurt Eichhorn, in whose 1993 recording with the « Bruckner Orchester Linz » the 1st movement clocks in at a little over 26 minutes, making it more than 1 minute longer than the Adagio. The Finale is a good half hour, so, obviously, this takes 2 CD's.

Not that it matters as much in the era of the iPod (and the Zune, Sansa and whatever other MP3 players are still fighting for a piece of that pie) , but I think it is important for a recording on CD of the complete 9th to either be all on 1 disc or to be on 2 discs with the 1st movement and the Scherzo on Disc 1, and the Adagio and Finale on Disc 2.

Such a 2 disc layout is preferable to having the 3 completed movements on Disc 1 and the Finale, by itself, on Disc 2. Having to manually remove Disc 1 after it spins-down from the Adagio to put in Disc 2 for the Finale reinforces the idea that the Finale is somehow foreign to the 9th Symphony.

By contrast, feeling physically energized after the last strike of the Scherzo, the changing of CD's is less jarring, and the Finale flows more logically from the end of the Adagio.

The complete 9th is gradually gaining acceptance. In European performances of the complete 9th, audiences are responding with standing ovations.

There is resistance, of course, considering the inertia to a performance tradition of almost a Century. Some critics in New York reacted with mild dismissiveness to the American premiere of the final version from the Samale and al. team.

There is no clear consensus among reviewers on Amazon.com on Simon Rattle's recording of the complete 9th with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

Manuel Pagan, for example, complains that the rendition of the 1st 3 movements is not quite on par with the Finale, « as if Sir Simon were waiting to spring the Finale on us and just going through the motions on the other 3 movements » .

A listener from Santa Fe seems to have an almost diametrically opposed opinion but, on reading his review, his objection comes more from his assessment that « Bruckner was a composer of such genius and originality that no group of musicologists has the remotest chance of completing his Masterpiece » .

But that comes after saying too many of the materials are lost and Bruckner's energy was flagging, which makes me wonder if he has actually looked at any of the Finale documentation in the « Gesamtausgabe » .

Joey Wang criticizes the « Conclusive Revised Edition » of the Samale and al. team as « not conclusive at all » , much preferring the Adagio as the ending.

There are also misgivings about making the principal theme of the 1st movement « the bad guy » of the Finale. That melody does occur as a crisis point close to the Coda in a lot of the completions but, in my opinion, it is inaccurate to call it a « bad guy » , especially given that if we accept the piling-up of themes as essential to the Finale Coda, then, that same 1st movement theme occurs one last time, fitted into a D major fanfare.

Could there be a silent majority here ? Maybe most people who have bought this disc (or MP3 album) are not yet been fully won over but neither are they ready to accept the dogma from Ferdinand Löwe. Maybe, they will be won over once they have had time to listen to the whole album from beginning to end a few times.

However much some people may like the incomplete Ninth, there is an increasing awareness that ending with the Adagio clearly goes against the composer's wishes.

On June 23rd, 2016, Riccardo Muti will close-out the Chicago Symphony Orchestra season with the 3 completed movements of Bruckner's 9th, followed by soloists and the Chicago Symphony Chorus joining the Orchestra for Bruckner's « Te Deum » .

The idea of using the « Te Deum » as Finale has also gained some credence on CD. There is a new Karajan release on the historic « Archipel » label, which is essentially a re-packaging of a 1962 recording with the Vienna Philharmonic (and the « Singverein der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien » , plus 4 vocal soloists and an organist) of the 3 completed movements of the 9th Symphony on Tracks 1, 2 and 3 ; and the « Te Deum » all on Track 4.

In spite of my familiarity and my awareness of what I was going to hear the 1st time, I popped in that « Archipel » disc, I still found the start of the « Te Deum » , after the conclusion of the Adagio, very jarring.

This is because the Adagio gradually winds-down to a quiet conclusion, and the sudden outburst at the beginning of the « Te Deum » , even though you know it's coming, is still surprising, and it still feels surprising because it is not in keeping with Bruckner's aesthetic for how a Finale should begin, notwithstanding the Finale of the 1st Symphony.

But, perhaps, even more jarring is the Daniel Barenboim recording of the 1st 3 movements of the 9th Symphony with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra on « Deutsche Grammophon » with the Chicago Symphony Chorus joining-in on Track 4 for « Psalm 150 » . I hope the CD has a good, long pause before « Psalm 150 » . On iTunes, I could either filter-out « Psalm 150 » or explicitly exclude it from Up-Next.

The next performance of the complete 9th won't be until March 20, 2016, in Belgium, according to Cochr's website. The next American performance probably won't be until 2017 at the earliest.

Clearly, there is much work left to be done in getting the truth out.

Overview of the musical narrative

« Concerto Grosso » in D minor for flute, 8 horns, and orchestra. That description misses the point of the tight Symphonic integration of the 9th Symphony, but it does give an idea of the importance of the flutes and the horns throughout the whole narrative.

If you wish to listen to a recording of the complete 9th and follow along with the score, it does not make much difference if you follow along with Robert Haas or Leopold Nowak for the 3 completed movements.

But for the Finale, if you don't have the score of the completion you are listening to, you can actually follow along pretty far, before becoming hopelessly lost, by using what your Library might call « Volume 9A » or « Volume 9B » of the « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » : the documentation of the Finale sketches edited by John Alan Phillips.

Just don't use the fac-simile of the hand-written score for following along with the recording, unless you think you are very good at reading the hand-writing of a physically weak old man. And, also, be prepared for the contrast of the paper. The Alfred Orel or Leopold Nowak might be quite yellowed, and might contain hand-written annotations from other people who have checked-out that score, while the Phillips will probably be a pristine and often sparse white.

I. Feierlich, misterioso

The strings start with a tremolo on the note D, and the woodwinds come in without adding any harmony, setting the stage for the 8 horns to intone this awe-inspiring theme in unison :

Unlike Beethoven who seems to create the themes as we listen, Bruckner starts with the themes already formed. Bruckner builds-up to a terrifying theme for the entire Orchestra :

(You will see accent marks for the winds instead of the down bow signs.)

Then, there is music with pizzicato strings that might remind you of the 3rd Symphony, but the mood has nothing to do with the naïve heroism of that earlier work. This leads to a lyrical theme in A major, but it is so full of melancholy and anxiety that it does not relieve the intensity of the atmosphere :

Maybe Bruckner had written horns « gestopft » (a German word for a special horn technique) before but, as far as I can recall, he used this technique only in the 1st movement of the 9th, producing a subtly menacing mood (when he writes « gestopft » notes later-on in the « development » , the effect is downright sinister) .

The 3rd theme brings things back down to D minor and closes the exposition with an air of weariness. Robert Simpson says it would be more accurate to call this a statement, and the rest of this movement a counter-statement.

And he is right, because although Bruckner was certainly thinking about development and recapitulation, the line between the 2 is blurred to such an extent that it really makes more sense to call it a counter-statement.

However, the statement is an exposition in the sense that it exposes themes for the entire Symphony ; every theme in the Scherzo, Adagio and Finale is mutated from a theme in this statement.

An important moment to highlight in the counter-statement is a very hazy allusion to the 7th Symphony. Also, notice how the themes of the statement are sometimes completely transformed in character by simple changes of intervals. With a grinding dissonance with E-flats, the 1st movement comes to a fatalistic and desperate end.

II. Scherzo e Trio

A dominant chord with omitted root, sharp 7th and flat 9th, is how I would describe the chord with which the Scherzo starts-off. Doesn't sound all that unique on paper, but it has impressed almost everyone who has written about the 9th Symphony, with many saying that it points ahead to the next Century.

With sneaky strings, Bruckner builds-up anticipation to this battering rhythm :

Soon, the entire Orchestra is on this rhythm and, then, the sneaky string-line is transformed into violence.

An oboe solo brings-down the the decibels but not the tension.

Then, we are led-back to the sneakiness and the battering rhythm. If you are directing a War movie with a battle scene during a major storm, this is probably the music you want on your template sound-track.

The Trio, faster than the Scherzo, is in F-sharp major and in 3/8 time. It looks simple on paper, and it took Bruckner a couple of tries to achieve that simplicity, but is so eery that it doesn't let us relax from the battering of the Scherzo. Note, in particular, the flutes.

For the middle-section of the Trio, Bruckner presents a lush theme, but this still has too much eeriness to be relaxing. Robert Simpson describes this Trio as being icy cold. Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has a radically different take than Simpson on the Trio, seeing it as an exalted vision of Heaven from Earth. I hear more the icy coldness.

And, so, the Trio ends in such a way that we are still just as on edge as we were at the beginning of the Scherzo, which is now repeated « da capo » .

III. Adagio

A pleading theme from the 1st violins begins the Adagio.

Note that the 5th and 6th horns have switched to tenor tubas in B-flat and the 7th and 8th horns have switched to bass tubas in F. These are the so-called Wagner tubas, those modified horns that Bruckner 1st used.

This leads to an ecstatic passage, a blinding source of light that says there is still some genuine hope. But, even here, there is an eeriness, coming mainly from the string sonority, that undermines the hopefulness.

After this winds down, it is a quieter passage that offers a more realistic sense of hope. But when the opening theme is repeated, you can tell Bruckner is setting-up a major crisis-point and, along the way to that crisis point, Bruckner gives pizzicato strings a very subtle allusion to the Scherzo. The culmination is a chord so discordant that Ferdinand Löwe felt it had to be smoothed-out.

After a pause and a bit too easily, the music turns calm and winds down. What a lot of commentators have failed to notice in this Coda is a tritone progression that will have consequences in the Finale. The Adagio ends with the horns and tubas playing an E major chord.

IV. Finale

It is with a soft drum-roll on G that Bruckner subtly brings us out of the Adagio. The wisp of a theme 1st served-up is nervous and hesitant, but also very clearly related to the 1st big theme of the 1st movement.

The similarity is even more inescapable for the principal theme of the Finale, presented in a unison like the principal theme of the 1st movement :

With this theme, the possibility of a triumphant rather than tragic conclusion seems likelier than at any prior point in the drama. The lyrical 2nd subject group still has a strong tinge of melancholy, but there is also a sense of more positive things to come.

This is even more so with the chorale quoted by Gottfried von Einem in his « Bruckner-Dialog » , accompanied there as here with triplets in the violins. This quotation condenses the horns' staves :

The use of a figuration from the « Te Deum » , at the beginning of the development, lends credence to Fritz Öser's idea of writing a « bridge » from the Finale fragments to the « Te Deum » . But this figuration, which comes from the barbaric beginning of the « Te Deum » , here acquires a charming sweetness as it accompanies a flute melody.

After developing the 2nd subject group themes a little bit, Bruckner starts a tense fugue based on the principal theme (Nikolaus Harnoncourt describes this fugue as « wild ») .

A horn theme appears, and although it feels new, it can clearly be traced back to previous themes.

Notice how far I have gotten without naming any specific completions ? There is a very Schubertian moment, somewhat more prominent in some completions than others ; it is not surprising to find Schubertian traits so late in Bruckner's « œuvre » , just as we should not be surprised to find Handelian traits in late-Beethoven.

The continuation of this Schubertian moment, and the moment itself, are nevertheless unmistakably Brucknerian. On the way to the Coda, the sketches provide a clear indication for one last crisis-point, which most of the completers have taken to mean a recurrence of the 2nd theme I quoted above for the 1st movement.

When John Alan Phillips published the Finale documentation, many thought there was nothing for the Coda other than descriptions in words from people like Max Auer or Doctor Richard Heller.

Though we do not have the last page of the Finale score, we do have sketches for the Coda, so that by taking into account the descriptions in words, it is possible to join together the themes of the 4 movements in a way similar to what happens in the Coda of the 8th Symphony in its 1890 version.

This is exciting and dramatic music, and it makes no sense to deprive ourselves of it just to protect the financial interests of a few people.

Weighing the completions

All the completions available on CD today give a very good idea of the 1st half of the Finale, because the editors did not have to invent much. After that, it takes either careful analysis of the available material or free composition to create a musically satisfying musical structure.

Some completions are better than others in the sense of coming closest to what Bruckner intended when he died. Others see a chance to sneak their own idiosyncratic ideas into a composition that has achieved an almost mythical stature.

Some conductors dismiss the idea of playing any Finale completion or even the fragments as « experimenting » . For others, the piousness of not playing any Bruckner score that has been meddled with by other hands outweighs the importance of presenting the 9th Symphony closer to the complete entity Bruckner intended.

Nikolaus Harnoncourt figured-out a way to have it both ways : play what we have of the Finale with spoken explanations in the gaps. Fortunately for those of us whose German isn't as good as we would like, Harnoncourt recorded his remarks in English, too. The missing pages could be found « tomorrow » , he declares.

But he must realize that, even if that happened, those pages would still require a modern musician to make decisions on many details, some of which may seem rather small to most listeners but are nevertheless details too big to be properly decided in rehearsal ; we are talking about details that need to be sorted-out before the 1st rehearsal.

Yoav Talmi has also recorded the Finale fragments that were available to him at the time. The disc also includes William Carragan's 1st completion of 1983, so that listeners may judge for themselves what it is that Carragan has added and whether or not they find it an appropriate deduction of what is missing from the available pages of Bruckner's score.

In the decades afterward, Carragan has edited some of Bruckner's other Symphonies for the « Gesamtausgabe » (such as the 2nd Symphony) , but the Finale of the 9th maintained its grip on his psyche and, in an appropriately Brucknerian twist, he as revised his completion over the years.

Gerd Schaller with the « Philharmonie Festiva » has recorded Carragan's 2010 edition of the Finale completion. The 4 disc-set also includes the 4th and 7th Symphonies, with the 9th occupying Discs 3 and 4. The Disc 3 / Disc 4 break appropriately occurs between the Scherzo and the Adagio.

Carragan is not the only one to try to complete the Finale nor the only one to revise his effort, though not all who try their hand at it lone wolf it like him.

Nicola Samale and Giuseppe Mazzuca did a realization in the 1980's which Eliahu Inbal recorded as part of his Bruckner cycle for « Teldec » , the cycle which gave the world some of the 1st recordings of earlier versions of Bruckner's other Symphonies. The Coda in this completion is appropriately like that of other 1st versions of Bruckner's Symphonies : essentially, a « sheet of sound » single-mindedly on the tonic chord, but without recalling themes from the previous movements (compare the 1887 version of the 8th Symphony for an instructive example) .

Mazzuca dropped-out of the team and, from 1986 onwards, Samale worked with Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and John Alan Phillips joined the team in 1990, producing a new version that was recorded by the « Bruckner Orchester Linz » conducted by Kurt Eichhorn, Cohrs explains.

To some extent, the revision being about 10 minutes longer is because Eichhorn's slower tempi (only slightly slower than Inbal for the 3 completed movements) but some should rightfully also be attributed to the team including more material.

In 2005, Samale and Cohrs released a new edition. Due in part to new philological insights, they revised again in 2008, and again in 2010 and 2011.

The Samale team figured-out a way to pull-off the combination of themes in the Coda, and that is what you hear in the Eichhorn recording. Their 1996 revision was recorded by Johannes Wildner on the « Naxos » label ; if you must build your Bruckner cycle on « Naxos » , this might mean Georg Tintner for most of the other Symphonies, but choose Wildner for the 9th.

One of the most recent, and most rounded-out recording of a completion is that of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Sir Simon Rattle on the « EMI » label, in 2012, using the « final impression » from the Samale team of 2011. Everything sounds correct up to the end, but there is somewhat a sense of fatigue for listeners at the final crisis-point.

Critics have blamed the unfamiliarity of the musicians with the Finale, which is in sharp contrast to their familiarity with the 3 movements Bruckner completed (the Berlin musicians have played that more familiar music) .

This is a problem for the listeners as well, which is why I am keen to emphasize that one should not listen to the Finale by itself, but rather in context with the 3 completed movements.

But there is another problem, and to be quite brutally frank, that is the danger of monotony. In the 8th Symphony, the potential for monotony is destroyed by the jubilant Scherzo with its serene Trio (which, however, does have precisely just the right shades of melancholy to not be out of place) .

In the 9th, the Scherzo is different in mood from the preceding movement, but its violence does nothing to relieve the prolonged intensity of the 1st movement. The Adagio, also, has its share of intensity but, at least, it also suggests the ending might not be tragic after all.

Guarding against monotony in an 80 minute Symphony must, at the same time, be balanced with making sure the triumphant Coda grows organically from what has happened before, and doesn't just feel tacked on and obligatory like in the Symphony No. « 0 » .

The missing pages preceding the Coda are, perhaps, even more crucial than the final pages, since those final pages could be deduced with a great deal of certainty even if they were irrevocably lost.

Given that Bruckner clearly meant to end the 9th with a triumphant conclusion, there are then 2 polar extremes of how the Finale could go wrong : on one end, we have the aforementioned tacked-on victory ; and on the other end, a victory that comes at the end of a battle fought long past the point people stopped caring.

The composer has to simultaneously show the light at the end of the tunnel but, at the same time, keep-up the suspense. Bruckner surely thought about these issues (though certainly not with these words) or, perhaps, not even at a conscious level.

There is no doubt in my mind that Carragan and the Samale team are motivated in their work by a genuine desire to produce as close as possible an image of what Bruckner had come-up with in 1896 with the available materials.

The members of the Samale team have carefully documented their decisions, so that we may see that they have been faithful to their understanding of the extant bi-folios, and limited free composition as much as possible.

Although Carragan has not documented his completions as profusely as Samale and al. , I am convinced that he is aware of his place in the big picture, and that he has not over-stepped the boundaries within which a completer must necessarily confine himself.

I can't say the same for Sébastien Letocart, but that is because I am not really informed as to his methods and his goals, and I have only heard an excerpt of his completion on YouTube ; I have not examined his score nor his documentation of his procedure (I am told his documentation is available only in French) . The 9th with the Letocart completion is available as a download from Amazon.com and from abruckner.com.

I have yet to listen to Jacques Roelands's completion, but from what Carragan has written, it sounds like Roelands' work must be taken seriously and be given full consideration.

For all my praise of Carragan, I must admit that I think that the Samale team has produced a much more convincing completion, one truer to Bruckner's spirit. But I could change my mind on this as I become more familiar with Carragan's latest completion.

Carragan's 1st version seemed somewhat weak to me (but that could be Yoav Talmi's fault) , while in the more dramatically powerful 2010 version, some elements closer to the Coda strike me as strangely Mahlerian (there is a difference between counterpoint and amorphous Nature murmurs) .

Still, Carragan has certainly done a much better job than Clinton Carpenter, whose completion of Mahler's 10th has certain details that give me the impression that Carpenter is stepping on Mahler's toes.

Warren Cohen, conductor of « Musica Nova Arizona » , would disagree with my assessment of Carragan in relation to the Samale team. In 2009, he conducted Bruckner's 9th with that Orchestra, and he chose the Carragan completion for the Finale.

Cohen wrote in the Orchestra's blog :

« The notes in the new edition of the Cohrs and al. version are terrifically informative and offer elaborate justifications for the choices the editors made in the parts where they contributed to the score. »

He adds :

« In reading their justifications, I was struck by the fact that as elaborate and well thought out as they are, they are often speculative. »

And goes on to say :

« In the final analysis, we are doing a performance, not a scholarly dissertation. »

Maybe I don't care which bi-folio of the sketches has what watermark, and maybe I don't care whether a particular bi-folio was in Franz Schalk's or Ferdinand Löwe's possession.

But I do care that anyone claiming to have completed Bruckner's 9th has looked after such minute details, and I appreciate the ability to examine those minute details for myself if I am so inclined.

For, after all, a composer could take some of the sketches, follow that up with some free composition with a couple of Bruckner's mannerisms thrown in for good measure and, then, claim that as a completion.

Cohen opines :

« Somehow, the extensive forensic analysis did not lead Cohrs and al. to a joyous conclusion to the work. The feeling of their Coda is majestic but the ending lacks the feeling of joy Bruckner said he wanted. »

This reminds me of Bruckner's « Volkfest » Finale for his 4th Symphony. To me, that doesn't sound like a « people's festival » at all, in fact, I hear an undercurrent of tragedy. Maybe, the Cohrs and al. Coda does have the mood that Bruckner was going for, even if we assess it as majestic rather than joyous.

While I may disagree with Warren Cohen on various minor points, we should nevertheless hold him up as an example for other conductors to emulate.

Instead of blindly accepting the pronouncement of the « 3 movement totality » by the music appreciation racket, Cohen has carefully examined the available performing versions and made his own decisions.

I have heard Cohen's performance on YouTube, and it might still be available there by the time you read this. It is a little bit hard to find, with John Berky's Bruckner discography website providing the most direct route I could find.

Nors S. Josephson is not as well-known as the other completers. His version is interesting for, aside from the highly-apocryphal inclusion of a snare-drum, what seemed to me on 1st hearing to be a stronger reference to the 1st movement as a crisis-point prior to the Coda than the other completers, a procedure very similar to what Mahler does in his 7th Symphony.

To my knowledge, Josephson's completion has only been recorded twice. The 1st time was by the « Deutsche Staatsphilharmonie Rheinland Pfalz » conducted by Ari Rasilainen, in 2007. The more recent recording is by the Aarhus Symphony Orchestra (known for their recordings of Vagn Holmboe's Symphonies) conducted by John Gibbons.

Rasilainen manages to get through the Finale in less than 14 minutes, perhaps suggesting how Carl Schuricht might have interpreted a Finale completion. The more leisurely pace of Gibbons's recording, clocking in at a little over 20 minutes, allows one to appreciate various contrapuntal details Josephson seems to have added to the source material, perhaps crossing the line into free composition. For the Gibbons recording, Josephson seems to have eliminated the snare-drum. But, at many points, Gibbons sounds almost dull compared to Rasilainen.

Joan Schukking may be the least known of the completers. Schukking's Coda sounds a lot like the one from the latest Samale and al. completion, but there are 1 or 2 new ideas in it worth considering. Having only done the Coda, Schukking's completion is only available as a MIDI file, though I imagine Schukking would gladly provide score and parts to an Orchestra if asked.

The same is probably also true of Jesus Masia, who has gone a few steps beyond Schukking and provided an MP3 of his own completion of the Coda made from such high-quality sample libraries that, at moments, you may almost be fooled into thinking you are listening to a real Orchestra.

But, as with most performances created with high-quality sample libraries, solo woodwind instruments in the softer passages are the dead giveaways that you are not hearing a real Orchestra, though there can also be clues in the more fully-orchestrated passages.

Masia includes references to the Finales of the 5th, 6th and 7th Symphonies, but I have to admit that as much as I like those, they don't sound like convincing interpolations into the 9th's Finale. But there are many interesting ideas that make me curious about hearing Masia's own original compositions.

Franz Sermann announced his own take on the Coda and presented an audio-file using less sophisticated samples than Masia, but I don't know if he has temporarily pulled it back for further tweaking or permanently withdrawn it.

Conclusion

All this, taken together with Bruckner's desperate suggestion of using the « Te Deum » as finale very clearly indicates Bruckner intended his 9th Symphony to be in 4 movements, and that he never considered the Coda of the Adagio a suitable way to end the entire Symphony.

Despite all this work of all these different musicologists to take what is available of the Finale of the 9th, there are those using their positions of authority to spread lies and misinformation about the Finale of the 9th, falsely characterizing Bruckner's own score, a work in progress that had progressed quite far, as merely sketches, and dismissing the work of the musicologists as somehow being « not really Bruckner » .

Despite souvenir-hunters helping themselves to pages of Bruckner's manuscript score of the Finale, today, we have a very good idea of just how close to finished the 9th actually was. If you can read music, you should look at the Finale documentation in the « Gesamtausgabe » and judge for yourself how much needs to be filled in to create a musically satisfying structure.

Once you have listened to as many available completions as you can get your hands on (making sure to hear the Finale in context after the Adagio) , and have reviewed the available documentation, you are ready to have an informed opinion on Bruckner's complete 9th.

Maybe you don't think the Finale Bruckner left is a valid conclusion to the 9th, even after listening to the reconstructions in context and making certain allowances and, maybe, you like it just fine as a 3 movement work.

But if that is the case, you need to be honest with yourself that your preference is not backed-up by the composer's wishes. Your preference is based on your own æsthetic assessment, and people can respect your opinion if you are upfront about that.

Another point to chew on : what if there were also gaps in the 3 completed movements ? Let's say, hypothetically, we were missing what Simpson describes as a « crudely scored apex » in the 1st movement, the reprise of the 1st Trio theme in the Scherzo, and roughly from bars 105 to 124 in the Adagio.

These passages could be reconstructed from sketches, or, if the sketches were also missing, they could still be reconstructed with great confidence on the basis of what happens around them, and also by comparison to similar moments in the 8th Symphony.

I am sure that if there were these gaps in the 1st 3 movements, there would be people who would lie to us, saying that hardly anything has survived of the 9th Symphony and, therefore, we should not bother trying to reconstruct it. They would say that, instead of a score, there are only sketches, and that there is no validity in taking the liberty to complete them.

If we listened to them in that alternate universe, then, we would deprive ourselves of music that some in this universe consider to form one of the greatest Symphonies in the entire repertoire.

Even if the people in that parallel universe accepted what they have of the 9th Symphony, there might be some who say that the missing pages contain much better music than what any musicologist can reconstruct.

And if those missing pages were somehow recovered after a performance tradition was established in which, say, the missing pages were just replaced by pauses, the music of the missing pages would sound rather unfamiliar and unconvincing, at least on 1st hearing.

But 2 of the gaps I have selected for this hypothetical scenario are precisely passages that Robert Simpson has described as not being quite on par with the quality we have come to expect from Bruckner.

Much worse scenarios than this could be our reality according to events at crucial junctures, in 1895 and 1896. Bruckner not giving Karl Muck anything of the 9th, the executor of his estate taking even longer, etc.

And, yet, another point to chew on : practically nothing you hear on a Classical music radio station today is played straight from the composer's original score.

Engraved music has rendered most musicians incapable of playing music from hand-written parts, however neat the hand-writing may be.

Also, many works of the core repertoire (Beethoven's, in particular) have been distorted by misprints from publishers and misinterpretations from conductors that have been accepted into the performance tradition as if they came directly from the composer. Editorial intervention is, then, necessary to restore what the composer actually meant.

Lastly, composers are not perfect, they make mistakes just like anyone else. Plus, they make assumptions about what is clear or not to their interpreters. Sometimes, these assumptions are understandable but it is still necessary for an editor to clarify what the composer meant by bringing the composer's notation into line with modern standards.

Other assumptions by the composer leave editors with puzzles that are not so easily resolved. Examples of both kinds of assumptions can be found even in Bruckner's completed works.

Sometimes, editors dial-down Bruckner's use of cautionary accidentals (some musicians go so far as to claim cautionary accidentals are never necessary) and change the way certain instruments are transposed (like cellos in the treble clef) .

And, sometimes, editors puzzle over whether a certain pattern of articulation is meant to recur when Bruckner repeats certain melodies (like with the 5th Symphony) .

Problems of this sort are not unique to Bruckner, plenty of examples can be found by reading the prefaces of various « Urtext » editions of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, etc. , from Bärenreiter.

If you are a conductor or an Orchestra board and you want to put on Bruckner's 9th, and you honestly want to respect the composer's wishes, you then only have 3 options :

Present the Finale fragments with spoken explanations between the gaps.

Perform a realization or completion.

Use the « Te Deum » as make-shift Finale.

But if you only want to play the 3 completed movements, with the end of the Adagio as the end of the concert, then, you need to be honest with yourself and with the audience that this is your personal preference and there is nothing from the composer himself to support it.

There is much in the Finale that is exciting, dramatic and thoroughly Brucknerian. Orchestral musicians and listeners alike are curious about this music, but conductors remain skeptical. In my opinion, there is no good reason to deprive ourselves of this music.

At the 2015 « Brucknertage », William Carragan said that the Finale, « even as a fragmented and patched-together assemblage, still has a great deal to tell us about the authentic inspiration and lofty goals of Anton Bruckner, and it is a pity not to take every opportunity offered to become familiar with it and its profound meaning » .

I am not going to recommend any specific completion.

Without having heard Roeland's completion, I am not informed enough to make such a recommendation. But I do strongly recommend.

For further study

As long as this document may seem, it is only a summary of what we know about Bruckner's complete 9th Symphony, a drop in the bucket of information now available on this previously obscured work. The wide margins help give an impression of greater length.

Further study should start with Volume 9 of the « Gesamtausgabe », including the various supplements : the « Revisionsbericht » for the the 3 completed movements detailing the manuscript score in minute detail ; documentation of the 2 discarded Trios for the Scherzo ; documentation of the Finale, including fac-similes of Bruckner's hand-written score ; and a score with explanations in words (in German and in English) to be spoken in a « workshop » concert (like Nikolaus Harnoncourt has done) .

Nowak is not the last word on the 3 completed movements. Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs says he has uncovered so much evidence to show that the 3 completed movements are even less finished than has been previously acknowledged and, in the « Gesamtausgabe », he has put-out a new score correcting many errors from the Alfred Orel and Leopold Nowak editions and accompanied by the most extensive « Revisionsbericht » in the entire « Gesamtausgabe » .

A lot of the scores of the « Gesamtausgabe » might be available at a university library near you, except perhaps the most recent, like the latest research from Cohrs on the 3 « completed » movements. For these, you might have to go to the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag Wien » (MWW) website, which has a page in English.

Any good completion of the Finale should have a thorough documentation of sources and methods, to inspire confidence that the completers went 1st according to Bruckner's score of the Finale, then, where that is lacking, according to the sketches, then, according to parallels from other Bruckner compositions, and only as an absolute last resort, free composition.

This is certainly the case with the final Samale and al. completion, available from « Musikproduktion Hœflich » . It seems to be the completion most open to detailed scrutiny, but I am not aware of anyone actually carrying-out such an examination.

There is also some documentation that deals specifically with the dispersal of the sketches, like Hans-Hubert Schönzeler's thin little book on the Krakow sketches (at the time this was published, it cemented the impression that completing the Finale was hopeless) .

I have not read the dissertation by John Alan Phillips for the University of Adelaide but I intend to as soon as I can get my hands on a copy.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs has produced several documents, some of them almost 300 pages, in German and in English, and he has provided me PDFs of some.

By comparison, the 80 page booklet Cohrs wrote for the Eichhorn recording is short, especially considering that it duplicates the same text in Japanese, English and German. Still shorter summaries are to be found in other recordings of the Samale and al. completion, as well as the Harmoncourt recording of the Finale fragments.

The only other completer to provide any sort of documentation that I am aware of is William Carragan, with his most recent essay being « Ground Rules for the Successful Completion of a Great Work » , which he presented at the 2015 « Brucknertage » .

And now, there are documents other than Bruckner's own that are hard to come by. The score from the 1st Samale and Mazzuca completion is now a relic very few people have.

There is more to list, but just what I have mentioned here makes for a lot to read. These documents include some speculation, but also a lot more hard facts than anyone could have imagined a Century ago.

Glossary

In discussing Bruckner, there are certain German words that you are going to run into sooner or later. In this article, I could certainly avoid using these words but, then, anyone wishing to investigate this topic beyond what I have covered here will certainly encounter these words, even if they stick to books and articles originally written in English.

Bogen : Bi-folios.

Gesamtausgabe : A complete edition of a composer's works, often including youthful works and incomplete works. The « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe » includes documentation of the Finale of the 9th Symphony as well as 2 volumes of Bruckner's letters (in German) .

Gesangsperiode : The more lyrical, song-like 2nd subject group of a Sonata-form movement, like the 1st movement of a Symphony. Bruckner is said to have coined this term, but it has also proven useful for other composers, like Gustav Mahler and Jean Sibelius.

Gestopft : A muting technique for the horn that makes for « a curiously nasal and metallic sound, with a sharp edge to it » (Kent Kennan) . Composers who use this effect more than Bruckner probably use the French word « bouché » or the Italian word « chiuso » .

Hauptthema : The principal theme.

Revisionsbericht : A critical report detailing in great detail, in some cases bar by bar, the contents of the manuscript sources and prior editions used for a new edition. Most listeners would probably only skim these, but knowing of the existence of these reports should assure listeners of the validity of the edition.

Stichvorlage : The engraver's copy of a score. Ideally, the composer reviews this copy before the publisher runs-off hundreds of copies.

Urtext : Literally, « original text » ; an edition that seeks to present as clearly as possible, the composer's original text, but in modern music notation. These editions are sometimes lacking in certain amenities, like rehearsal letters, which may or may not be easy to carry-over from an edition to the musicians are accustomed to playing from.

Bruckner : Eine kleine Einführung, Das Finale der 9ten Symphonie

Bruckners Leben und Werk (in weniger als 1000 Worten)

Wie ein Stein vom Mond sei Bruckner in die Romantik gefallen, sagt Nikolaus Harnoncourt (einer der großen zeitgenössischen Dirigenten) .

Tatsächlich :

Bruckner ist mit keinem Komponisten vor oder nach ihm zu vergleichen (obschon natürlich Bruckners Schüler und ihn verehrende Komponisten ihm klanglich/kompositorisch « nahestehen » und Bruckner selbst natürlich auch nicht unbeeinflusst von, beispielsweise, Richard Wagner und Ludwig van Beethoven war) .

Die (symphonische) Linie seit der Wiener Klassik von Haydn über Mozart, dann maßgeblich Beethoven bis hin zur Romantik, wirken alle wie eine « Entwicklung » (Nein : Nicht im Sinne von « Verbesserung » , denn schon Bach ist allerhöchste Vollendung) .

Bruckner passt jedoch kaum in das (Klang- , Melodie- und Harmonie-) Schema.

Obgleich er sich den gleichen Regeln unterwirft: So studierte er etwa den « traditionellen » barocken Kontrapunkt und Komposition, kreierte stets 4-sätzig Symphonien, traditionelle, absolute Musik.

Doch Bruckners Symphonik ist vollkommen eigen. Speziell die Symphonien sind ein in sich geschlossenes, und nach außen wirkend quasi « isoliertes » Oeuvre. Seine Werke, von den ersten Symphonien bis zu den beiden symphonischen Schlußwerken, die absolute Gipfelpunkte der Symphonik bilden, könnte fast eine eigene Stilrichtung definieren ...

Gipfelpunkte Bruckner Symphonien ?

Im Himalaya der « klassischen » Symphonie gibt es so einige impochale Höhenzüge ... Sagen wir mal die Neunte von Beethoven sei der Mount Everest, dann ist die 9. Bruckners der K2 und die 6. Tschaikowskys ist der Nanga Parbat.

So seltsam (und minderwertigkeitskomplexzerfressen...) Bruckner als « private » Person war, so genial und übergroß waren seine musikalischen Ideen und Umsetzungen.

Allein nur das Scherzo der 9. Symphonie ist wegweisend für die nachfolgende (klassische) Musik ohne dabei « bemüht » innovativ zu klingen : Expressiv, neu, nie dagewesen.

Die 9. Symphonie und das Finale

Insbesondere die 9. Symphonie hat in Bruckners Schaffen eine besondere Stellung, weil sie (vermutlich) unvollendet blieb.

Aber was heißt unvollendet ?

Anders als die berühmte (auch so titulierte) « Unvollendete » von Schubert (in H-Moll) oder Beethovens 10. Symphonie, ist der gewaltige Finalsatz der Neunten nahezu fertig komponiert worden.

Aber obgleich dies so ist (!) , gab es erst sehr spät Rekonstruktionen/Fertigstellungen des Finalsatzes.

Dies verwundert, weil es gerade bei Bruckners Kompositionsmethodik möglich ist - oder besser : Weniger schwierig als bei anderen Großmeistern - eine solche Synthese zu wagen.

Andere Torsos - wie etwa Mozarts Requiem, das weit weniger fortgeschritten komponiert war als das Finale der IX. Symphonie Bruckners und oft genug noch ohne den Hinweis auf den « echten » Komponisten (meist ist es eine Komposition von Süßmayr, einem Schüler Mozarts) - werden meist komplettiert aufgeführt und man hört quasi nie irgendwelches « Geschwafel » über die Rekonstruktion.

Heute ist insbesondere die vorzügliche Aufführungsfassung von Samale, Philips, Cohrs, Mazucca (abgekürzt als « SPCM ») in höchstem Maße zu empfehlen.

Die verschiedenen « Versionen » dieses « work in progress » wurde 1984 noch recht spröde begonnen und wurde 2008 als im Wesentlichen abgeschlossen erklärt. Doch auch weitere Korrekturen wurde seitdem vorgenommen, zuletzt 2011.

Für den « normalen » Hörer spielen diese Unterschiede nicht die große Rolle : Das Finale klingt seit der 1992er-Version bereits als hervorragend klingender Abschlussatz !

1984 fand in Frankfurt die Welturaufführung mit dem RSO Frankfurt unter Inbal statt (erschieden ist die Aufnahme bei Teldec) . Diese erste Aufführungsfassung wurde seitdem in Details (etwa wenn Skizzen, Particelle oder ganze Bögen wiedergefunden werden, was per se ähnlich spektakulär ist, wie bei den kürzlich in Australien gefunden Beatles-Memorabilien mit diversen Ton-Aufnahmen) weiterentwickelt und ist in fast allen Versionen auf CDs erhältlich. Dazu mehr im hinteren Teil.

Meines Erachtens sind alle Aufführungsfassungen seit 1992 von derart hoher « Bruckner-Authentizität » , daß es eigentlich keine aufgeführte Rumpfversonen mehr geben sollte.

Ich persönlich empfinde eine « 3-sätzliche » Darbietung jedenfalls als genauso unfertig, wie wenn ich Beethoven Symphonien nach dem 2. oder 3. Satz nicht weiterhören könnte.

Man stelle sich vor, ein Konzert spielt Mozarts Requiem oder Puccinis Turandot fragmentiert.

Selbst Elgars 3. Symphonie, Tchaikowskys 3. Klavierkonzert (respektiv seine 7. Symphonie) sind, allerdings mit einem hohem Spekulationsgrad der Rekonstrukteure (also wenig « authentisch ») , vervollständigt worden.

Auch Mahlers 10. Symphonie (weniger fortgeschritten komponiert als Bruckners Finalsatz, sprich mit erheblich mehr « Lücken » hinterlassen) wird mittlerweile überwiegend in « nachkomponierten » Fassungen aufgeführt (die bekannteste ist jene Kompletierung von Deryck Cooke, daneben haben aber auch die Komponisten Nicola Samale / Giuseppe Mazucca, Joseph Wheeler, Clinton Carpenter und Yoel Gamzou respektable, schöne Lösungen präsentiert) .

Und schließlich Beethoven ? Und selbst Beethovens 10. Symphonie (besser : dessen grob anskizzierte Kopfsatz) ist in einigen Aufführungs-Versionen versucht worden und sogar auf Tonträgern veröffentlicht worden (meines Erachtens allerdings in sehr unbefriedigender Weise, was darauf schließen läßt, daß wohl kaum verwertbare Materialien vorhanden sind, die einen « echten » Beethoven erkennen lassen !) .

Zwischen-Fazit

Der Sinn von Rekonstruktionen ist meines Erachtens sicherlich berechtigt bei Kompositionen von verworfenen Skizzen zu diskutieren.

Nicht aber, wenn der Komponist durch den Tod inmitten eines Vollendungsprozesses an der beabsichtigten Fertigstellung « gehindert » wurde.

Die Frage ist meines Erachtens in solchen Fällen also nur, mit welcher « Kunstfertigkeit » und « musikwissenschaftlicher ausgefeilter Synthese » eine Komplettierung geschaffen wird !

Was heißt eigentlich « unvollendet » ?

Peter Gülke, und andere ein Musikwissenschaftler, bemerkt zurecht, daß die englische Bezeichnung von Werken, die keinen Abschluß durch den Komponisten fanden, mit « Unfinished » (also « unbeendet ») sprachlich etwas treffender ist als die Bezeichnung « Unvollendet » .

Richtig ist :

Die ersten drei Sätze der 9. Symphonie Bruckners sind vollendet. Auch das Adagio der 4. Symphonie Bruckners ist vollendet ! Und die ersten 25 Takte der 6. Symphonie sind es, beispielsweise, auch !

Aber auch die auskomponierten Finale-Partiturteile muß man schlechterdings als phantastisch bezeichnen. Sie sind in einem Wort : Vollendet.

Die 9. Symphonie ist also in diesem Sinne « vollendet » .

Aber Sie wurde eben nicht von Bruckner selbst « beendet » , nicht « abgeschlossen » (zumindest anhand der derzeit bekannten Notentexte nicht) .

Und « vollendet » ist m.E. auch die Aufführungsfassung von SPCM.

Gleichwohl die Autoren, stets der aktuellen « Forschung » gemäß, mehrfach Revisionen ihrer eigenen Rekonstruktion vorlegten, was den Verdacht zuließe, man sei selbst nicht von dem bisher geleisteten überzeugt. Hier möge man aber den gleichen Maßstab auch bei den Originalgenies wie Beethoven und Bruckner anlegen, die ihre Werke im Schaffensprozess häufig « korrigierten » , veränderten und neufassten.

« Anyway » :

Die Aufführungsfassungen sind vollendet « schön » und deshalb setzen sich nachvollziehbar viele Bewunderer der Musik Bruckners (und im speziellen die Bewunderer der fulminanten 9. Symphonie) dafür ein, daß dieses Finale ein « kategorisches Muß » als Abschluß dieses Meisterwerks der Symphonik wird.

Sie ist akribisch wissenschaftlich auskomponiert, ergänzt und komplettiert und dabei eben auch künstlerisch und klangästhetisch außerordentlich wertvoll.

Sie wurde « vollendet » beendet - von den Fragmenten zum kompletten Satz. Gut so !

Es besteht Hoffnung, daß sich dereinst auch sogenannte « Hype-Maestros » davon überzeugen lassen.

Derzeit ist es zu oft anders :

Leider erlauben sich gerade « medienprominente Dirigenten » die schier unglaubliche Begründung, daß Bruckner bei der Erstellung des Finales debil gewesen sei und deshalb die Final-Fragmente nicht zu berücksichtigen seien.

Oder aber sie manifestieren die beliebte Legende, die Symphonie hätte mit dem Adagio bereits einen idealen Schlußpunkt (weil Bruckner die lapidare Bemerkung « Abschied vom Leben » zu dem Adagio notierte) .

Es sind allesamt dümmliche oder diffamierende Notargumente !!

Fakt ist

Bruckner hatte stets 4-sätzig Symphonien verwirklicht ! Und die Frage altermäßigen geistigen Unzurechnungsfähigkeit ist indiskutabel - denn dann ließe sich womöglich zu fast jedem Komponisten derartiges diskutieren.

« N.B. : Man muß das Finale sicher nicht « mögen », auch nicht die Torso-Neunte oder die Musik Bruckners insgesamt. Aber Unwahrheiten sollten bitteschön keine Begründung sein, um einen Rumpf quasi als « vollendet veredelten Spitzenkaffee » zu bezeichnen. »

Eine Interpretation der Neunten Symphonie Anton Bruckners und eine Aufführungsempfehlung an Veranstalter

Anton Bruckners Neunte Sinfonie ist per se « absolute Musik », das heißt Ihre Tonsprache spricht für sich, es gibt keine expliziten außermusikalischen Inhalte « (wie etwa der ton- « malerischen » Moldau und andere Werke der Romantik oder aber der Symphonie Nr. 6 von Beethoven - der « Pastoralen » - in denen Vögel, Gewitter und andere Stimmungen musikalisch dargestellt oder erzeugt werden) » .

Dennoch lässt Bruckners letztes Werk verschiedene (außermusikalische) Interpretationen zu, nicht zuletzt deshalb, weil Bruckner selbst den 3. Satz (« Adagio ») als « Abschied vom Leben » bezeichnet hatte.

Und genau in diesem Sinne ist diese Symphonie als außerordentlich « spirituelles » Werk zu verstehen.

In diesem Sinne ist die IX. Symphonie Bruckner wohl tatsächlich eine « Programmsymphonie » mit dem Programm « Religion : Diesseits und Jenseits » .

« Bemerkung zu “ spirituell ” und “ religiös ” :

Anton Bruckner war, seiner Zeit und seinem Wirkungsort entsprechend, ein besonders gläubiger Mensch. Bruckners Religiosität kann man, aus heutiger Sicht, sicher als naiv und absolut bezeichnen. Was allein an der kuriosen Widmung der gesamten Symphonie “ Dem lieben Gott ” abzulesen ist - was man im Übrigen weniger als “ vermessen ” sondern vielmehr als außerordentlich “ ergeben und devot ” verstehen darf.

Bruckner war Christ, katholischer Richtung, aber seine (wie jede andere auch) Musik ist nicht per se “ katholisch ” oder “ für Katholiken ” zu verstehen. Sie ist auch nicht im weiteren Sinne “ christlich ” (evangelisch, orthodox, etc.) oder allgemeiner abrahamitisch-monotheistisch (also islamisch, jüdisch) .

Musik ist über-religiös und kann die “ Seele ” eines Jeden ansprechen, der Ohren zum Hören hat :

Den fundamentalen Menoiten ebenso wie den Atheisten.

Lieben nicht japanische Buddhisten den lutheranischen Johann Sebastian Bach ?

Bewundern agnostisch-unreligiöse Musikbegeisterte nicht auch orthodox-gläubige russische Meister ?

Lieben nicht strikt-dogmatische Klerikale die Werke des Freigeists Beethoven ?

Und genießen esoterische Metrosexuelle nicht auch gregorianische Gesänge ? »

Die überlieferten Aussagen und Notationen Bruckners erlauben den Zugang zu einem Verständnis der Symphonie, dessen Bedeutung auch abseits der überwältigenden kompositorischen Meisterhand und den bedingungslos fulminat-schönen Klängen und Melodien zu sehen ist.

Damit verwerfe ich gleichzeitig auch alle « konstruierten » Interpretationen, die die 3-Sätzigkeit des vollendeten Rumpfes heranziehen und damit Fakten nach eigenem Gutdünken verdrehen :

Es gibt für eine 3-sätzig Interpretation keinen Anlass, jedenfalls nicht mehr, als wenn man beispielsweise auch Bruckners 7te mit dem Adagio enden läßt und behauptet, « Bruckner fühlte sich zu jener Zeit sehr krank und HÄTTE da ja sterben können - folglich schrieb seinen eigenen Trauermarsch als Abschied vom Leben » .

Dies hat (wohlgemerkt !) nichts damit zu tun, daß man nicht auch die mitunter hervorragenden Aufnahmen und Konzerte eines Torsos nicht ergriffen hören kann !

Man kann. Ich kann.

Sicher ist, daß jede Interpretation subjektiv ist - und die hier folgende ist es insbesondere !

Aber sie ignoriert keine Fakten, um sich den Rumpf « schön- beziehungsweise ideal » zu reden.

Die Struktur der Interpretation baut auf einem Pentagramm.

« N.B. : Das Pentagramm soll ansonsten aber (bitte sehr, Danke !) nicht von “ Robert-Langdons ” als Anlaß für eine rasante Autofahrt durch Linz, Wien, Bayreuth und London genommen werden. »

Thesen und Fakten

1. Die neunte Symphonie wurde von Anton Bruckner « Dem lieben Gott » gewidmet

2. Der letzte Satz wurde von Bruckner als « Abschied vom Leben » bezeichnet

Eine klar außermusikalischer Titel.

3. Bruckner arbeitete circa 2 Jahre an einem Finale der Symphonie

Maßgebliche Teile sind vorhanden, die die Erstellung einer authentischen Aufführungsfassung erlauben. Hierzu kann und andere die Kompositionsweise, der musikalische Personalstil Bruckners im allgemeinen, der Symphoniestil der IX. Symphonie insgesamt sowie die Charakteristika der zum Teil fertig auskomponierten Finalefragmente herangezogen werden.

4. Bruckner verfügte Monate vor seinem Tod, als er befürchte noch vor einer Vollendung seines « Opus magnum » zu sterben, daß man ersatzweise sein « Te Deum » als Schlußsatz spielen solle

Das « Te Deum » bezeichnete Bruckner zuvor als sein bestes Werk.

Auch das « Te Deum » wird (entgegen den Anweisungen des Komponisten) relativ selten mit der 9. Symphonie als Schlußsatz aufgeführt.

Keinsfalls ist es in Sinne des Komponisten Bruckners gewesen, daß der Rumpf der IX. Symphonie als « abgeschlossenes » Werk verstanden wird (und als solches durch schlicht weg falsche Interpretationen in den allgemeinen Konzert-Kanon eingegangen ist) .

5. Sämtliche Symphonien Bruckners sind (traditionell) 4-sätzig angelegt

Alle Beibuch-Texte und andere Abhandlungen, die eine vollendeten Symphonie nach dem dritten Satz kolportieren, sind vollkommen unverständliche Verfälschungen der Wahrheit. Ästhetisch mag man 3 Sätze hören können, aber sie entsprechen nicht dem Willen Bruckners und sie negieren die Tatsache, daß es ein Finale geben sollte.

6. In den Fragmenten des Finales zitiert Bruckner prominent das Kreuzmotiv aus dem « Te Deum »

Auf diesen Thesen basiert die Interpretation, die durch das Pentagramm symbolisiert wird :

Bruckner wollte mit seinem letzten Werk eine Symphonie schaffen, die eine würdige « Neunte » ist.

Die also als symphonisches Schlußwerk (eines herausragenden Symphonikers) verstanden werden sollte. Angesichts seines Alters und Gesundheitszustands war Bruckner sich selber absolut bewußt, daß hier ein Lebenswerk abgeschlossen werden würde.

Ferner sollte und MUSSTE sie seinem « Widmungsträger » sowohl gefällig sein als auch eine Essenz dessen sein, was (seine) Religion bedeutet und beschreibt : Jenseits-Orientierung.

Die IX. Symphonie ist ein Mantra/Karma und Vademekum des/seines Lebens und des Himmels.

Die Interpretation (hier : Kurzfassung, Stand Mai 2005) :

Die beiden ersten Sätze beschreiben das « Diesseitige » . Das Leben und das Irdische.

Die Sätze 3 und 4 beschreiben das « Jenseitige » . Das Sterben und den Himmel.

Das « Te Deum » ist der « Jubelgesang » als devote Ergebung seines Gottes.

1. Satz

Der erste Satz beginnt als « Schöpfungsprozeß » und ist prinzipiell aufgebaut, wie die meisten symphonischen Anfänge Bruckners : Dem sogenannten « Ur-Nebel » .

Aus diesem entwickelt sich allmählich das Thema und der symphonische Satz.

Die Entwicklung des gesamten Anfangs kann man als musikalische Umsetzung des Schöpfungsaktes aus der Tora (beziehungsweise des Buch Genesis) verstehen.

Der Satz insgesamt kann als irisches Paradis und Natur empfunden werden.

2. Satz

Der zweite Satz wird (nicht zu unrecht) als Bruckners ungewöhnlichster Satz überhaupt bezeichnet. Er ist formal eine fast expressionistische Satz mit schroffen Rhythmen und donnerndem Stakkato.

Das Trio im Mittelteil ist ein mystischer-diabolischer Tanz. Er kann als Intermezzo und Gegenpol zum Choral-Thema des ersten Satzes gedeutet werden, der als weihetvoll Verherrlichung des göttlichen verstanden werden kann.

In diesem Satz nimmt Bruckner die Zerstörung der Natur durch den Mensch vorweg und beschreibt fast lautmalerisch den Maschinen-Stampf des industriellen Zeitalters. Somit steht der zweite Satz als die vom Menschen (ins negative) veränderte Erde, im Gegensatz zum ersten Satz, der die göttliche Natur repräsentiert.

Die infernalischen Wiederholungen treiben impulsiv nach vorne.

Im Mittelteil hört man mit satanisch-filigran Luzifer tanzen, der quasi einen Freudenreigen seines Werkes feiert.

3. Satz

Der dritte Satz, den Bruckner als « Abschied vom Leben » beschrieb, ist ein melancholisches Vermächtnis daß zwischen Hoffnung (Himmelsreich) und Bangen (Purgatorium) schwankt - Schuld und Sühne sind zentrale Momente und Fundamente des Katholizismus. Deutlich pocht das « Schicksal » an Bruckners Pforte.

Zum Ende des Satz haucht der Lebensgeist aus dem Sterbenden. Der Tod.

4. Satz

Der vierte Satz beginnt, wie der dritte endete : Mit einem leisen anklingen.

Der Tote befindet sich in einem Übergangsstadium (würde Bruckner etwa dem hellenistischen Glauben zugesprochen haben, würde man den Fährer über den Styx bemühen wollen) .

Man/Er weiß noch nicht, welches « jenseitige Schicksal » ihn erwartet, ob seine Lebensleistung vor seinem Gott positiv angenommen oder als unwürdig verworfen wird.

Doch im Verlauf des Satzes entwickelt sich eine emphatisch erleichterte Haltung, der insbesondere durch den fulminanten unisono Choral eine überwältigende Wirkung hervorruft.

Wenn Bruckner jetzt das Kreuzmotiv (aus seinem « Te Deum ») zitiert, so deutet er damit den Dank an seinen Gott aus.

In der (nicht überlieferten oder verlorengegangenen) Coda (an dieser Stelle muß allerdings darauf hingewiesen werden, daß es sich um die Version Samale, Philips, Cohrs, Mazucca handelt !) wird deshalb (gleichsam musikästhetisch wie inhaltlich) zurecht diese zentrale Motiv als Basis (in den Streichern) verwendet.

Diese Coda verweist schließlich auf das « Te Deum » selbst hin.

Bruckner steigt innerhalb des Satzes also quasi gen Himmel ins jenseitige Paradies auf.

« Te Deum »

Das « Te Deum » als Abschluß gehört zwar nicht der Symphonie an sich an (dies widerspräche der strikten 4-Sätzigkeit der symphonischen Konstruktion Bruckners) aber sowohl durch die Motiv-Verwendung als auch durch Bruckners Anweisung selbst (ersatzweise also das « Te Deum » als Schluß der Symphonie zu verwenden) , erlauben es, das « Te Deum » interpretatorisch günstig respektive ideal als Ende der Symphonie zu denken.

Hier « singt » Bruckner sozusagen vor seinem Gott und bedankt sich, daß er an seine Seite treten darf.

Aufführungs-Ideal

Gleichwohl es immens viele Möglichkeiten zur künstlerischen Gestaltung gibt, halte ich (auch gerade im Hinblick auf die vorgestellte Interpretation) gewisse « Konditionen » für wichtig.

Da meine Interpretation mit quasi fünf Sätzen auch eminent lange dauert, ist auch eine signifikante Pause ziemlich unabdingbar, da schon jeder einzelne Satz eine hohe emotionale Konzentration abverlangt und erfordert.

Satz I : Sollte kraftvoll aber in stark gemäßigtem Tempo gespielt werden. 28 Minuten Aufführungsdauer müssen nicht zu lange sein.

Satz 2 : Sollte laut und resolut gespielt werden.

In den meisten Aufführungen wird der Satz zu verhalten in der Dynamik und/oder auch zu langsam gespielt (oder die anderen Sätze werden zu schnell dargeboten, was im Zweifel sogar mehr Schaden hinterläßt) .

Auch das Trio sollte meines Erachtens zügig, aber nicht hastig gespielt werden.

Die Wiederholung des « Scherzos » (Kleine Anmerkung : Der Titel « Scherzo » ist allein als Gattungsbegriff zu verstehen, denn mit einem musikalischen Scherz hat dieser 2. Satz nun wirklich nichts zu tun !) kann (obgleich keine anderen Akzentuierungen etc. vorgeschrieben sind) die Dramatik erhöhen, also noch prägnanter die Stakkati formulieren. Warum kein gefühltes « ffff » ?

Der 3. Satz : Erfordert eine hohe « transzendente » Spielkultur und tiefe « Traurigkeit » in der Intonation.

Die Disonanzen dürfen in diesem Sinne keinesfalls un-harmonisch, nicht zersetzend, sondern « angenehm schmerzend, aufwühlend » gespielt werden.

Die Legati erfordern eine breite Darstellung.

Die Coda muß hauchend ausklingen (« kraftlos » retardierend) .

Der Satz kann unendlich lang gespielt werden.

Der 4. Satz : Ist, als direkte Verbindung zum vorhergehenden Satz, nicht wesentlich anders zu spielen, auch wenn seine Aussage und Kraft zum Teil erheblich prägnanter zu präsentieren sind.

Dennoch sollte auch hier ein eher verhaltenes Tempo angestimmt werden und Pausen zum Atmen genutzt werden (im übertragenen, ebenso wie im wortwörtlichen Sinne) .

Das « Te Deum » soll kann/muß eine diametrale neue Stimmung verbreiten - eben als frischer, emphatischer Jubelgesang.

Aufgrund der Tonarten, aber auch, um eine entsprechende geistige Sammlung zu gewähren, sollte ein Intermezzo von einigen Minuten eingelegt werden, oder aber eine längerfristige Unterbrechung, gleichwohl diese die symphonisch-inhaltliche Anlage etwas auseinander reißen würde.

Die gesamte Aufführungsdauer der « Symphonie IX + » beträgt also idealerweise knapp 120 Minuten.

In 2011 and 2012, 7 performances of Bruckner's 9th including the 2010-2011 « SPCM » Finale completion are scheduled :

15 October 2011 : At the Chasse Theatre, in Breda.

16 October 2011 : At the « Muziekgebouw » , in Eindhoven, Netherlands. The « Het Brabants Orkest » will be conducted by Friedemann Layer (presentation of the world-premiere of the latest « SPCM » revision) .

23 October 2011 : At the « Philharmonie » , in Berlin. The « Bundesjugendorchester » (the National Youth Orchestra of Germany) will be conducted by Sir Simon Rattle.

Bruckner's 9th gets a stunning Finale with Simon Rattle and the German Youth Orchestra.

Submitted by Ken Ward, Editor of « The Bruckner Journal » , on 30th October 2011.

When Anton Bruckner died, in 1896, he had done much work on his 9th Symphony and the Finale was almost complete. Unfortunately, the executors failed to secure Bruckner's rooms, nor did they ensure that the Finale manuscripts were delivered to the Imperial Library. So many pages are missing, and those that do exist are in many locations world-wide. Very roughly speaking, 2/3 of the Finale exist in 5 fragments, with many sketches and discarded manuscript papers which help indicate what should fill the gaps. Various scholars have made attempts to produce a completed performing version, so that we can, at least, hear the music Bruckner worked so hard to compose during his final years.

With a week, there were 2 performances of Bruckner's 9th Symphony with the Finale in the completed performing version by the editorial team, Samale, Phillips, Cohrs and Mazzuca (« SPCM ») , in its latest revision : 1 performance in Eindhoven with the Brabant Symphony Orchestra conducted by Friedemann Layer, on 16 October, and this performance. Both performances were greeted with great enthusiasm and standing ovations. The Symphony as a 4 movement work is slowly but surely moving into the accepted repertoire, and more audiences are becoming acquainted with a Symphony now with the proportions which Bruckner had always intended.

This performance was by a very young Orchestra and it was a one-off project, not something fashioned and perfected over a long tour, but the work of merely a few days. So, the focus of the evening was upon this youth Orchestra event, perhaps, rather more than on the German premiere of a version of a 4 movement 9th. Rattle said backstage after the concert, of the Symphony, as a 4 movement work : « It's a monster ! » . Extraordinarily, those that sought to bring this monster to life were youngsters, merely 16 - 19 years old. Their achievement over the few days' rehearsal

(that included a workshop conducted by Doctor Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, elucidating many issues with respect to the sources and the completion) was magnificent. So, it really was their concert.

But this was a German premiere and, for the 1st time, this Finale was being conducted by a 1st rank conductor of one of the most famous Orchestras in the world, and as such represents a significant step towards bringing the 4th movement into the received canon. Rattle, after the concert, self-deprecatingly requested understanding that this was his 1st attempt at the work, the implication being that there are still many problems to solve. As such, it can be seen as a dry run for his forthcoming performances of the work with the « Berliner Philharmoniker », in February 2012. There was an enormous string section : 20 1st violins, 18 seconds, presumably to provide as much opportunity as possible for would-be orchestral players ; and they produced a glorious sound. But it has to be said that the woodwind and brass (who might have benefited from judicious doubling) were often unable to make themselves well-heard over the strings. Rattle, at times, had clarinets and oboes raise their bells high, a Mahler-ish gesture but, even so, they were often difficult to hear at all. In the tuttis, the brass often seemed subject to too great a restraint.

With such limitations, it becomes difficult to disentangle interpretation from expediency, and the attempt might, in the end, be irrelevant to the main thrust of the event. There was a tendency for Rattle to encourage very expressive playing in string passages, like the 2nd subject groups of the 1st and 3rd movements. In fact, the 1st movement « Gesangsperiode » (song period) was played with an intense passion of Mahlerian extremity and, in the Adagio, after a nicely played Wagner tuba chorale, Bruckner's « Farewell to Life », the 2nd theme was delivered with ravishing beauty. But it was hard to feel that either moment was part of a cogent whole, that the expressive power they were generating was harnessed to the overall logic of the Symphony. The Scherzo was strongly presented (more from the brass would have made it even better, but the Trio was really rather heavy, perhaps due to the large string section) , and didn't register such a dramatic contrast as it should. The 1st oboe solos in both the Scherzo and Adagio were played with great understanding and beauty that went straight to the heart.

Perhaps, surprisingly, the Finale came over as the most successful movement of the concert. It is partly that there isn't in the movement a lot of opportunity for lush Mahlerian string playing, so that much of the orchestration was less subject to sabotage by the uneven orchestral balance and, maybe, there was an added excitement on the part of conductor and players, in venturing into this new territory. The jagged plummeting main theme had plenty of dramatic power, and the spare version of it that constitutes the 2nd theme (though not as spare as a smaller string section would have made it) was, nevertheless, very eloquent in its melancholy, repetitive way. The trumpets and supporting brass rose to the occasion with Bruckner's great chorale and managed to ring-out above the bustling violin triplet-infested accompaniment. Central to the development is a wild fugue which, in this performance, hung together quite well (there is often a danger that intensity falls away during its somewhat convoluted progress) and the heroic horn motive that follows was gloriously sounded.

The surviving manuscripts provide very little information for how the Coda should be, so in any completion this must be the most conjectural section - but, for the completion to work, it is very important to come-up with an effective solution. This latest version of the « SPCM » Coda is more succinct than it was in the 2008 score. It is in 2 waves. The 1st one commencing with the inverted thematic fragments that opened the movement, above it comes a repeated falling motive on flutes and oboe (very expressively played on this occasion) climbing to a grinding overlay of the main themes of all movements, massively dissonant and of shattering power. Then, the 2nd wave climbs by means of the inverted main theme, trumpets sound fanfares (one that was 1st heard to introduce the fugue) and then comes a very dramatic, clinching moment when the 3 trumpets in unison break through with the confident rising D major theme of faith 1st heard in bar 5 of the Adagio, now in this completion constituting the final « Hallelujah » that Bruckner's personal doctor (Richard Heller) reported to be the crowning moment of the work when the aged composer had played the movement through to him. To me, this is a great advance on previous versions of this Coda : at last, the movement is provided with a destination worthy of the struggle that has preceded it, and a destination that it is not too difficult to feel is somewhere within reach of what Bruckner might have had in mind. The young people of the « Bundesjugendorchester » again rose to the occasion, their immense labour crowned with glory.

The « SPCM » Finale to Bruckner's 9th has come along way, since 1983. I sense that this 2011 version must be close to as far as their chosen strategy can go - barring the re-appearance of more lost manuscripts from Bruckner's own hand. The Brabant Symphony Orchestra and the « Bundesjugendorchester » have given an intimation of how powerful a work the completed 9th can be. It's now up to the « Berliner Philharmoniker » and Simon Rattle to present the overwhelming argument in Berlin and New York, on February 2012.

« This 2012 version essay replaces older ones. The text is a large extract from the English notes to Repertoire Explorer Study Score No. 444 (Revision 2008) , available on sale from www.musikmph.de. Some material was taken from earlier publications, such as booklet and programme notes, including texts which were originally conceived in collaboration between Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and John Alan Phillips, in particular from the “ Musik-Konzepte ” Volume 120-122. Some material was also written anew. It was prepared for abruckner.com, to provide all important information on the philological insights which led to the Conclusive Revised Edition, in order to better understand the nature of the reconstruction work being undertaken, as well as to inform about the differences between this and the older editions of the « SPCM » score. The conclusive impression of score and commentary shall be released in 2012. Kamdzhlov's visionary Heidelberg Finale

Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony, unfinished, received its 1st performance by Ferdinand Löwe in 1903, 7 years after the composer's death. Gustav Mahler, who knew the score but was not at the concert, wrote to his wife Alma in 1906, that it was « the highest culmination of nonsense » . Since then, however, those 3 movements have come to be regarded as amongst the greatest of Symphonic achievements of the 19th Century.

Now, 100 years later, we are slowly becoming familiar with what Bruckner was writing for the Finale up until the day he died. It is strange and disturbing music, and many of those devoted to the 3 movement performances find themselves echoing Mahler's response to the preceding movements : nonsense ! But the Symphony was always designed to chart a course from darkness to light, the desperate path through the darkness « swept with confused alarms of struggle and flight » , the blessing of a visionary transfiguration only to be bestowed at the very end. And there's the problem : the final pages were either never written down, or failed to survive the predations of vultures who descended on Bruckner's estate the day he died.

Think now of the challenge presented to the conductor and his musicians : to shatter our devotion to the 3 movement Symphony, interpreting it now in such a way that the Finale has become absolutely necessary ! And, then, to play it with such passionate conviction that Bruckner's music, as made performable by the forensic in-fills and additions of modern scholars, gives at least some shuddering apprehension of the extraordinary territory over which the composer sought to travel to his heaven-storming destination. It was in this Finale that Yordan Kamdzhhalov's prowess as a visionary conductor was revealed at its strongest, the structure and the pacing of the movement judged such that, for all its seemingly wayward diversions, its purposefulness was never in doubt, and the Coda that the « completers » had provided (in the absence of little more than a few reports and a few hints from Bruckner's manuscripts) gave us at least some intimation of the great « Song of praise » with which the Symphony was to have ended. I have now heard many performances of the Finale, including that by Sir Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic but, at this point, Kamdzhhalov outshone them all.

There had been much that was impressive in the early movements. The shaping and playing of the opening horn theme was glorious and the balancing of voices in the 2nd theme group particularly effective. It's good to hear the 1st violins' sustained melody sound so clearly out of the thick contrapuntal texture to start with and, thereafter, to be entranced by the changing colours of the orchestration as different voices are taken-up by strings and woodwinds. Kamdzhhalov launched the Coda, his arm extended to the woodwind, their jagged double-dotted leaps becoming totally mesmeric and, thereafter, he shaped the vast paragraph to devastating effect.

The Heidelberg Philharmonic has a characterful oboe, which at times could be a little obtrusive, but helped to make the dissonant held chord that opens the Scherzo sound really malevolent, and the great thumping « fortissimo » theme when it burst in had terrifying brutality. Even more unsettling was the swift Trio, scampering nightmarishly across the landscape before the stamping monsters returned. The strings acquitted themselves well here, which was not always the case in this performance where there were occasional imprecisions and a sense that some desks further back were not always as committed as their colleagues at the front.

The Adagio is, perhaps, the movement that needs most careful readjustment for a 4 movement performance. Maybe a long, drawn-out farewell at the end is now inappropriate, but the great dissonant climax must have full-power, it is the great crisis, the deepest moment of darkness out of which the Finale must lead, and it was here that I felt Kamdzhhalov's approach may have faltered. Although there had been some wonderful playing - the 2nd subject sang gloriously and the Wagner-tubas' « farewell to life » chorale (and indeed, the horn playing throughout) was as beautiful and as noble as you could wish - the movement didn't quite culminate as powerfully as it should. But this is an immense work, and it was amazing that the concentration and passion apparent as the Symphony began were maintained as Kamdzhhalov proceeded « attacca » into the Finale, and blazed with full-power through to the end.

This was Yordan Kamdzhaliy's final concert as General Music Director, Heidelberg and the « Burgermeister » made a speech. The concert's ambitious programming and earnest aspiration and, above all, the profundity of interpretative inspiration that sustained the performance, confirm that his departure is a great loss to the cultural life of this University city.

Concerts de la « Philharmonie » (7, 8, 9 février 2012)

Ce soir, 9 février 2012, la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner sera présentée par le Philharmonique de Berlin.

Difficile décision : donner de la 9e de Bruckner les seuls 3 mouvements achevés, ou se hasarder dans l'une des reconstructions spéculatives du 4e mouvement ?

Faire usage de l'une des nombreuses tentatives d'achèvement proposées par divers musicologues, musiciens et / ou compositeurs.

Pour son concert diffusé en « streaming » vidéo HD, ce soir 9 février à 20h, en direct de la « Philharmonie » de Berlin, Simon Rattle a choisi le 4e mouvement achevé par l'équipe Samale-Philips-Cohrs-Mazzuca, une réalisation commencée en 1985 et constamment remise sur le métier, jusques et y compris en 2011, et sans doute n'est-ce pas fini.

Il faut savoir que Bruckner avait laissé de très (trop ?) nombreuses esquisses de ce dernier mouvement, esquisses disséminées aux 4 coins de la planète à sa mort, dont il n'est absolument pas certain que toutes ont déjà refait surface. Certains contemporains de Bruckner affirment avoir vu des brouillons faisant état de ceci, de cela, tandis que d'autres affirment exactement le contraire, bref, un sac de nœuds. Certes, il avait lui-même achevé l'orchestration de nombreux passages, terminé le canevas de plusieurs autres, mais la structure générale manque. Sachant, de surcroît, qu'il avait pour usage de réviser ses propres œuvres de fond en comble bien des années après leur 1re publication, on se trouve devant un « puzzle » dont on ne connaît ni le nombre de pièces, le contour, les pièces manquantes et, pire, quelles pièces existantes en font partie ou non.

On Thursday, February 9th at 8 PM Berlin Time (2 PM here, East Standard Time) , the Berlin Philharmonic's Digital Concert Hall will stream the live video from that evening's concert. Sir Simon Rattle will perform the Bruckner Symphony No. 9 with the « SPMC » Finale. This performance will be slightly different from the concert done last year with the « Het Brabants Orkest » , in the Netherlands. « EMI » has also announced that the Berlin Philharmonic performance will be released on CD, in May 2012. If you miss the live digital stream, the BPO will place the video in their Digital Concert Hall Archive a few days later.

It is the unfinished works of great composers in particular that enjoy a mystical reverence. This is also the case with the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner, who after completing the 1st 3 movements, died while working on the Finale. But unlike Mozart's « Requiem » , for example, of which only a minimal part comes from the composer himself, there is a wealth of sketches by Bruckner for the final movement of the 9th Symphony. In more than 25 years of detective work, an international team of composers, conductors and musicologists developed these sketches into a breathtaking whole. The completed Symphony is now performed by the « Berliner Philharmoniker » and Sir Simon Rattle.

The fact that Bruckner's 9th Symphony is a farewell to the world is shown firstly in the composer's intention to dedicate the Symphony « to the beloved God » . But also in the large scale 1st movement, everything seems like the last word. The following Scherzo appears as a demonic dance of death ; the Adagio, a swan song of disconcerting fragility. And then, the Finale : of the 647 bars in the reconstruction, 208 are completely by Bruckner, for most of the remaining bars, string parts, drafts of the wind parts or initial sketches were available - there were only 37 bars for which there was no music at all by the composer. The completed movement reveals many disturbing moments as well as Bruckner-like scale. But, as Simon Rattle says :

« Everything that is strange about this Finale is 100 % Bruckner. And one can see the terror and the fear and the passion which he was going through in his life at that time. »

It is the unfinished works of great composers, in particular, that enjoy a mystical reverence. This is also the case with the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner, who after completing the 1st 3 movements, died while working on the Finale. But unlike Mozart's « Requiem » , for example, of which only a minimal part comes from the composer himself, there is a wealth of sketches by Bruckner for the final movement of the 9th Symphony.

Cette nuit, j'ai pu visionner le concert qu'a donné le " Berliner Philharmoniker " et son chef attitré, Simon Rattle, le 9 février dernier à la salle de la " Philharmonie ". Au programme : la 1re exécution mondiale de la révision de 2011 de la version dite « SPCM » du dernier mouvement (reconstitué) de la 9e Symphonie (œuvre ultime et visionnaire aux portes de l'au-delà) du grand compositeur post-Romantique autrichien, Anton Bruckner (en français, son nom serait Antoine Dupont) .

Berlin : l'après-concert historique

N'oublions pas « Youl » et les écoutes nocturnes de la 9e avec Otto Klemperer, directement du Lac Connely. (Phil Merrigan) possible) du Finale à partir des manuscrits laissés par le compositeur au jour de sa mort (le 11 octobre 1896) dans le pavillon du garde-chasse du Palais Impérial du Haut-Belvédère, à Vienne, une petite résidence attenante mis à sa disposition par l'Empereur François-Joseph d'Autriche. Si Bruckner avait réussi à vivre 2 mois de plus et que sa santé lui aurait permis, il est fort probable que son mouvement ultime serait aujourd'hui complété.

Après s'être dirigé vers tous ses pupitres pour serrer chaleureusement la main des principaux musiciens suite à une prestation sans faille, puissante, très nuancée et inspirée, le chef britannique, Sir Simon Rattle, fit une brève mais éloquente allocution (en allemand devant micro) à propos du dévouement et du travail de bénédictin de ces 4 artisans. Il invita donc messieurs Nicola Samale, John Alan Philips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs et Giuseppe Mazzuca à bien vouloir se lever pour venir saluer le public berlinois sur scène.

Le plus frappant et émouvant, c'est de voir ces humbles hommes (de différentes générations) qui ont contribué, chacun leur tour, à tenter de résoudre (sur une période de plus de 2 décennies) l'épineux problème des manuscrits laissés par le « Ménestrel de Dieu ». Évidemment, j'avais les larmes qui coulaient.

J'ai patiemment soutiré directement de la retransmission-vidéo sur digitalconcerthall.com un album de plus d'une centaine d'images qui résume assez bien le déroulement de cette cérémonie historique d'après-concert que j'ai, par la suite, édité sur ma page personnelle Facebook. Je vous invite fortement à aller y jeter un coup-d'œil. Il n'est jamais trop tard pour devenir un fervent Brucknérien. Et « Ich bin ein Berliner ! » .

Bruckner jeta ses dernières forces dans la composition du Finale et y consacra quasiment les 2 dernières années de sa vie. Environ les 3 quarts du mouvement a été couché sur le papier (exposition - développement - ré-exposition) bien que l'orchestration soit incomplète en de nombreux endroits, le dernier bi-folio (double page comportant 24 portées sur chaque face et servant à l'orchestration) s'arrête juste avant la Coda. Bruckner a-t-il totalement esquissé celle-ci ? Des indices peuvent le laisser penser (datations et références manuscrites sur certains brouillons et bi-folios) .

Selon le témoignage de Richard Heller, le médecin personnel de Bruckner, ce dernier lui aurait joué de larges extraits du Finale au piano, dont l'entière Coda, et ce vraisemblablement à l'automne ou l'hiver 1895. Malheureusement, des feuillets d'esquisse et de bi-folios ont été chapardés et dispersés par ses élèves, les exécutants testamentaires et des « chasseurs de souvenirs » . Certains éléments manuscrits ont heureusement été récemment retrouvés à Washington et à Munich.

Aux auditeurs intéressés par d'autres versions du 4e mouvement, nous suggérons vivement d'écouter la version proposée, ici, par le compositeur et organiste belge Sébastien Letocard, dans un enregistrement récent réalisé par Nicolas Couton à la tête de l'Orchestre « MÁV » de Budapest. Certaines hardiesses semblent outrageuses ; elles appartiennent pourtant aux parties orchestrées par Bruckner lui-même.

Sir Simon Rattle conducts the « Berliner Philharmoniker » in Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 including the world-premiere of the latest scholarly revision of the 4th movement that the composer left unfinished at his death.

« Sir Simon and the Orchestra unveiled the new version at Berlin's " Philharmonie ", in early February 2012, and at New York's Carnegie Hall, the same month. It was fascinating to hear this monumental Symphony performed with (its new) final movement. After a quizzical opening and a strong statement of the main theme, there are stretches of fitful counterpoint, brass chorales and ruminative passages that take you by surprise. Overall, the music pulses with a hard-wrought insistence that crests with a " Hallelujah " Coda. » (« The New York Times »)

On 11 October 1896, the day he died, Bruckner was still desperately trying to finish the final movement of his 9th Symphony. He had completed and orchestrated 1/3 of the movement and sketched the layout for the entire Finale. Unfortunately, for scholars attempting to construct the remaining 2/3 of the movement, many of the manuscript pages were subsequently stolen by autograph hunters. Some of these pages have re-surfaced, in recent years, and several attempts have been made to complete the last movement, including 4 prior versions by the current musicological team of Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs.

« From a fresh re-examination of the manuscripts, it was possible to find some convincing new solutions, binding the music even better together. » (Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs)

With the benefit of 25 years of scholarship, this latest version is arguably the most comprehensive realisation of Bruckner's sketches.

John Alan Phillips adds :

« The Finale is no musical curiosity, but an integral part of the work as its composer intended. Just as Beethoven designed his last Symphony around its choral Finale, Bruckner designed his 9th around this huge, ultimately triumphant movement, synthesizing Sonata form, fugue, and chorale. For the devoutly Catholic Bruckner, the Symphony was to be his " homage to Divine Majesty ". The Adagio, his " Farewell to Life ", traces a gradual process of dissolution that leads us, spellbound, into the enigmatic music of the Finale (which) would end with a " song of praise to the dear Lord ", a " Hallelujah " borrowed from earlier in the work. And it is with this " Hallelujah " theme (the 1st entry of the trumpets in the Adagio) that the 9th can so justly and so gloriously now conclude. »

In an interview for the Berlin Philharmonic's Digital Concert Hall, Simon Rattle expressed his faith in the newly assembled 4 movement version and begged audiences to be receptive to the new material.

« There's a kind of myth that there are only sketches left of the last movement. In fact, there was really an emerging full-score, complete almost to the end. » , Rattle said, adding that Bruckner was writing in his most radical, forward-looking style in the 9th, especially in the Finale.

According to « Gramophone », « to help listeners understand just how “ complete ” the Finale actually was, at the time of Bruckner’s death, Rattle compared the composer to an architect designing a cathedral. Indeed, Bruckner had the rather unique composition method of deciding how long his movements should be and then putting all the bars on the manuscript, numbered and with phrase lengths, even before writing the 1st note.

« So, actually, even when there are some empty pages, we know exactly how many bars there were and what kind of phrases there were. » , concluded Rattle, explaining how much of the manuscript evidence was strewn throughout various collections. He also said that, « had the composer lived another 2 months, the Finale would have been complete » .

Bruckner’s 9th gains a Finale in Berlin

Anton Bruckner spent the last decade of his life toiling over his 9th Symphony, a work that was to remain incomplete, at the time of his death.

On February 7, over a Century after the 1903 premiere of the work’s 1st 3 movements, the Berlin Philharmonic and its music-director Sir Simon Rattle performed the work with a newly reconstructed Finale.

Bruckner’s 9th has suffered a curious fate. Its 1st posthumous edition, in 1903, was prepared by the composer’s disciple Ferdinand Löwe, who streamlined the incomplete score and smoothed its rough edges. The manuscript of the 1st 3 movements was only uncovered, in 1932, by Siegmund von Hausegger, who became the 1st conductor to record the work, 6 years later, with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra.

Since the discovery in the 1980’s of sketches for a 4th movement (the evidence in existence totals 180 pages ranging from drafts to fully orchestrated material) , multiple attempts have been made to render as complete a performing version as possible. In 2002, Nikolaus Harnoncourt performed a « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») with the Vienna Philharmonic that included a « torso » of the Finale prepared by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. The 2012 reconstruction of the Finale, by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca and John Alan Phillips, brings to an end a quarter Century of musical sleuthing.

In an interview for the Berlin Philharmonic’s Digital Concert Hall given to « Gramophone » ahead of its broadcast, Simon Rattle expressed his faith in the newly assembled 4 movement version and begged audiences to be receptive to the new material :

« There’s a kind of myth that there are only sketches left of the last movement. In fact, there was really an emerging full-score, complete almost to the end. » , Rattle said, adding that Bruckner was writing in his most radical, forward-looking style in the 9th, especially in the Finale.

To help listeners understand just how complete the Finale actually was at the time of Bruckner’s death, Rattle compared the composer to an architect designing a cathedral. Indeed, Bruckner had the rather unique composition method of deciding how long his movements should be and then putting all the bars on the manuscript, numbered and with phrase lengths, even before writing the 1st note.

« So, actually, even when there are some empty pages, we know exactly how many bars there were and what kind of phrases there were. » , concluded Rattle, explaining how much of the manuscript evidence was strewn throughout various collections. He also said that, « had the composer lived another 2 months, the Finale would have been complete » .

Speaking to « Gramophone » before the concert, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, who is also co-editor of the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») , Vienna, explained how his team came-up with an entirely new conception of the Finale Coda, based on comparing Bruckner's composition technique in earlier Symphonies, specifically the 2nd and the 8th.

« The most important change is that we decided to take-out an earlier sudden pianissimo and crescendo, 16 bars, that really took all the energy off, and interrupted when it wanted to go to the peak. There must be a continuous spark from the beginning of the chorale recapitulation, up to the end of the Coda. To make that convincing is the real crucial task in our reconstruction. » , he explained.

Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs believes that Bruckner probably wouldn't have revised the Symphony very much had he lived longer.

« Because it was such a long process of composition, he actually revised within the composing process. » , he said.

Simon Rattle and his Orchestra will bring this Bruckner 9 redux to Carnegie Hall later this month, on February 24, 2012. The conductor is keen that listeners accustomed to the 3 movement version are receptive to a Finale that brings the work closer to Bruckner's real conception of his last, final Masterpiece. Continued Rattle :

« What a joy for us to be playing for the 1st time a whole new Symphonic movement by Bruckner, late-Bruckner and vintage, wonderful Bruckner. »

J'ajoute, en attaché, des images de son ultime lieu de résidence. Le petit pavillon du garde-chasse du Palais Impérial du Belvédère que l'Empereur François-Joseph lui avait généreusement légué pour vivre en paix ces dernières années. Porter une attention particulière à ce cliché sensationnel, que j'ai déniché par pur hasard sur Google Images, une diapo montrant la procession funéraire, dans les rues de Vienne, en octobre 1896, lors du décès du Maître : le « Ménestrel de Dieu » . L'enregistrement « EMI Classics » du « SPCM » donné à Berlin

Anton Bruckner Symphony No.9 in D minor with Performing Version of the Finale by Samale - Phillips - Cohrs - Mazzuca (1983-2012) : Conclusive Revised Edition, 2012.

The « Berliner Philharmoniker » conducted by Sir Simon Rattle. Recorded 7-9 February 2012, in the « Philharmonie, Berlin.

(« EMI » , CD : 9 52969 2 - Duration : 82 minutes.)

Les critiques

For music-lovers who discount the validity of any 4th movement to the Symphony No. 9, there is much to enjoy in the « Berliner Philharmoniker » 's performance of the 1st 3 movements :

« Mister Rattle and the Berlin players deftly balanced elements of Schubertian structure and Wagnerian turmoil in the mysterious 1st movement. The brutal power of the Scherzo's main theme was chilling, with the Orchestra pummelling the dense, thick, dissonance-tinged chords. And Mister Rattle laid-out the threads of chromatic counterpoint in an organic, glowing and, when appropriate, gnashing account of the Adagio. » (« The New York Times »)

For those with the intellectual curiosity to hear how accomplished Bruckner scholars have most recently realized the unfinished movement, it is performed here by the world-renowned team of Sir Simon Rattle and the « Berliner Philharmoniker » .

« The lustre of the Berlin Philharmonic's horns and strings is marvellous to behold ; phrasing often is velvet-smooth. Whatever the mood, Rattle's players deliver with passion. At the same time, Rattle's love of high-drama may be indulged a fraction too much. Rattle conducts with missionary zeal, as if he believes in every note. And so he should. » (« The Times » , 11th May.)

« While there is undeniable logicity in the endless climbing repetitions and the echoes of the vaunting Wagnerian touches from the 1st movement, the added movement does tend to detract from the particularly fine treatment of the 3rd movement Adagio. » (« The Independent » , 11th May 2012.)

« Rattle is less interventionist than one might expect and surer of the work's structure. Bruckner's harmonies were never so daring as they were here - the scream of pain in the Adagio really terrifies. But the effect (the Finale) has on one's perception of the earlier movements is harder to come to terms with. This is essential listening, though the Berlin brass are stunning in the last few minutes. » (« The Arts Desk » , 19th May 2012.)

« Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic played it for the 1st time, in February, and this recording is taken from those performances. Whether you like Rattle's approach or not (and sometimes, in the 1st movement especially, he pushes the music forward rather than letting it fill its natural space) the result seems authentic. » (« The Guardian » , 24th May 2012.)

« An 82 minute work complete with a final movement of sufficiently convincing Brucknerian Symphonic argument, sound and scale. In short, a revelation. Lingering doubts from earlier Brucknerian encounters with Rattle are swept away. Finer advocacy and a more transforming experience from these live performances are difficult to imagine. » (« International Record Review » , June 2012.)

« The performance, as a whole, is utterly compelling. Rattle fully engages with the gripping drama of Bruckner's music. The climax is thrillingly majestic - the truly triumphant ending that Bruckner wanted. Rattle proves emphatically that there should be no more excuses for depriving the work of its resounding Finale. » (Graham Rogers, bbc.co.uk, 10th July 2012.)

« Rattle's performance is consistently involving. The vast arches and sudden climate changes in the Adagio 3rd movement are particularly well-handled. I can't think of many recent releases that are more musically important than this. If you love Bruckner's 9th, you have a duty to hear it ; and if you don't as yet know it and learn it from Rattle's recording, then you're in a very privileged position. » (« Gramophone » Magazine, August 2012.)

« Rattle assuredly paces the music's long paragraphs and musters a sense of the monumental. His interpretation encompasses the full gamut of emotions from tenderness and nostalgia to some amazingly apocalyptic climaxes. » (« BBC Music Magazine » , September 2012.)

« Rattle gives the music the right amount of breadth but he also keeps it moving forward. It helps enormously that he has the peerless “ Berliner Philharmoniker ” at his disposal. The Majesty of Bruckner's great climaxes is enhanced by their sumptuous playing. » (« MusicWeb International » , June 2012.)

« Once you've heard Simon Rattle and the BPO in their glowing recent recording of the completed work, you may never wish to listen to the 3 movement version again. Even if you're not sold on the completion, Rattle's performance of the 1st 3 movements is excellent. » (« MusicWeb International » , 16th April 2013.)

Bruckner's 9th gains a Finale in Berlin : Simon Rattle premieres the latest edition of Bruckner's unfinished Symphony. (A. J. Goldmann from « Gramophone » Magazine.)

Ken Ward, Editor of « The Bruckner Journal »

The Adagio of Bruckner's 9th Symphony differs, in several ways, from its predecessors, one being that its climax is built on its most grief-stricken and agonised theme. The rising D major trumpet motive that might have delivered a glorious vision at the summit seems forgotten, and instead the wrenching leap of a 9th that opens the movement is piled-up into a massive dissonance. In these performances by the Berlin Philharmonic, it goes without saying that the orchestral sound was totally overwhelming. Simon Rattle's way with the seething and urgent « Steigerungen » (build-ups) to the various peaks in the movement had immense power and it was an extraordinary experience to hear this Orchestra in full cry, and see the whole violin section from front desks through to the very back desks playing with such energetic determination. After the stunned silence that follows the climax, the movement returns almost to its beginning, the oboe repeating the theme in a plaintive, numbed sort of way, Wagner tubas and horns comment balefully and, finally, the brass rise to a long-held pianissimo E major chord, and the movement ends. At this performance, it was perhaps a little perfunctory (it was somewhat more expressive in the previous evening) but it was clear this could not be an end to the Symphony.

It was certainly not the end of the Symphony for Bruckner. He finished his work on the Adagio, in November 1894, fell sick with pleurisy, but recovered quickly and, in May 1895, set to work on the Finale and was reportedly still working on it on the day he died. Although the Symphony remained unfinished, at least 2/3 of the movement was done, possibly more. The editorial team, Samale, Phillips, Cohrs and Mazzuca (all of whom appeared on stage for the 1st time together, at Tuesday's performance) have made it their generous ambition to let us hear what Bruckner wrote in the context of a completed movement. It has taken over 20 years for it to achieve its present form, which now has convinced Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic that its quality merits performance with the preceding 3 movements. The repute of conductor and Orchestra cannot do other than give added legitimacy to a project that many have claimed is not only impossible, but also unnecessary.

Such criticism was swept aside by these concerts. The Finale was performed with total conviction, its 3 themes characterised strongly. The 2nd theme is a pale, enervated variation on the jagged lightning-bolts of the 1st theme, and Rattle communicated its melancholy progress very movingly. A blazing brass chorale above frenetic triplet-infested string accompaniment constitutes the 3rd theme, and this is the sort of powerful, visionary music at which the Berlin Philharmonic excels. The double-dotted rhythm of the 1st 2 themes obsessively dominates much of the movement. Rattle ensured the rhythmic attack remained taut, and nowhere more so than in the wild fugue at the 1st theme's recapitulation, whereupon Bruckner introduces a new assertive and heroic theme on horns, with a triplet at its core : once again, the Berlin Philharmonic horns showed the sort of stuff they are made of. This theme returns after the 2nd and 3rd theme recapitulations - and shortly after, but for a few sketches, we reach the end of the manuscripts that have survived.

Discussion of how long the Coda needs to be, what exactly should be its constituents, could (and probably will) go on endlessly. Whatever it was to be probably went to the grave with Bruckner ; what is provided here has the limited but nevertheless ambitious function of providing an effective performing version. In this, it succeeds wonderfully : the 1st movement main theme, anticipated in that heroic horn theme and stamping triplets that are almost the last of Bruckner's notes, makes a return ; an inversion of the Finale main theme begins the crescendo into the Coda (as sketched by Bruckner) , there follows a dissonant grinding combination of all main themes of the movements, and then a breakthrough into D major, with the glorious rising trumpet theme from the Adagio at last coming into its own, reiterated thrice on 3 trumpets, and the movement ends in a blaze of fanfares. Rattle stood motionless, his arms aloft, the Orchestra suddenly frozen. It seemed forever but, slowly, he let his arms fall and the hall broke into stormy applause ; many were on their feet.

Simon Rattle's interpretation of the opening movement has become far more integrated and coherent since I heard him conduct the London Symphony Orchestra at the Barbican, in March 2011, the underlying pulse of the movement now never undermined. There were many very beautifully handled details. I liked the slight element of call-and-reply given to the opening horn theme by varying the dynamic and so creating a sense of the vast landscape upon which the forthcoming drama would be played-out ; and the exploration of the layering of the voices in the contrapuntally complex 2nd theme, each paragraph seeming to highlight a different voice, was a delight to experience. The 3rd theme as Rattle conceives it still seems a bit stolid, but the enormous tutti climaxes that arrive with increasing frequency in the 2nd half of the movement were absolutely shattering in their sheer power and orchestral colour. The stamping Scherzo featured a wonderfully timed general pause before its brutally dramatic theme made its last appearance ; the Trio was unusually light and playful.

Sometimes, the playing seemed just too beautiful, too wedded to a sostenuto style - something a little more rugged might have enabled a more potent communication of the work's profound confrontation of death and faith. But goodness me, what a glorious sound they make ! Bruckner's 9th, as the 4 movement work he always conceived it to be, has finally stormed into the mainstream orchestral repertoire.

I wanted to voice an opinion about the recent release of the 4 movement Bruckner 9th by « EMI » . I think what I have just witnessed deserves some comment. It certainly is amazing what a conductor like Simon Rattle can do ! Backed by an adoring (almost jingoistic) British press and lots of « EMI » marketing dollars, he has certainly put the Bruckner 9th Finale on the Classical music map. But, in the end, I have found it all a bit frightening.

What concerns me here is that the « over the top » reaction (as witnessed in « BBC Music » and « Gramophone » magazines) seems to have avoided some important facts. Over the top ? Well, when a reviewer begins to contemplate the obsolescence of the Karajan and Giulini 9th's, I consider that an over-reach. Also, the lack of any discussion of other completions and recent recordings seems to have side-stepped nearly 30 years of performance and recording history of the Finale.

In short, I expected more from these music journals. All of their usual thoughtful analysis went-out the window when it came to Rattle's popularity and « EMI » 's financial clout. It was a great opportunity for an interesting discussion. Instead, we were subjected to a media barrage. That's a rare thing with Bruckner's music.

Indeed, the Rattle recording is a significant document and an important and welcome addition to the Bruckner discography. But it would have been better if these highly-touted magazines could have handled the release in a more intelligent manner. It was a perfect time to look back at the Finale's history and to compare the approaches by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca, William Carragan, Sébastien Letocart, Nors P. Josephson and quite a few others. Chalk it up as an opportunity lost.

Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony is generally regarded as one of the great musical torsos, alongside other unfinished works such as Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony, Edward Elgar's 3rd, Mozart's « Requiem » and Operas such as Alban Berg's « Lulu » , Giacomo Puccini's « Turandot » and Ferruccio Busoni's « Doktor Faust » . The 9th is regularly performed as a 3 movement work, ending with the huge Adagio, or sometimes with Bruckner's « Te Deum » as a choral Finale but, in fact, the material for the 4th movement is almost complete ; it's fragmented, but the manuscript sketches require far less editorial intervention to create a continuous whole than either Mahler's 10th or Elgar's 3rd.

Over the last half Century, there have been at least 7 completions of the 9th, several of which have appeared on disc, but the one Simon Rattle has now recorded is the result of almost 30 years work by a quartet of Bruckner scholars led by Nicola Samale ; their « conclusive revised edition » runs to 653 bars, of which almost 600 are either fully scored by Bruckner or can be reconstructed from his sketches ; just 28 bars had to be composed by the editors, using Bruckner's own material.

Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic played it for the 1st time, in February, and this recording is taken from those performances. Whether you like Simon Rattle's approach or not (and sometimes, in the 1st movement especially, he pushes the music forward rather than letting it fill its natural space) the result seems authentic. The 22 minute Finale encompasses a chorale, a fugue and references to the hymn « Christ Ist Erstanden » as it steers the tonal structure of a Symphony that started in D minor towards a conclusive D major in its Coda, in which themes from all 4 movements as well as the « Te Deum » are brought together. It's massively affirmative and totally convincing.

Simon Rattle has been conducting Bruckner's 9th Symphony in its unfinished 3 movement state for a number of years. I wonder if his reading has been influenced by adding the reconstructed Finale.

The opening passages give a clue to the overall approach. Suitably mysterious at the start, Rattle builds dramatically to the 1st immense climax and, perhaps surprisingly for a conductor whose style usually incorporates regularity of pulse, the crescendo is accompanied by an increase of tempo. This is certainly exciting but the sense of inevitability engendered by firm, unhurried propulsion in the interpretations of such conductors as Günter Wand or Georg Tintner is not conveyed so strongly. With Rattle, the next subject settles to a slower tempo, great beauty is achieved, but not momentum.

This then is the nature of the interpretation, carefully, even lovingly shaped, full of feeling but unexpectedly flexible. The reading is just on the fast side of average : a justifiable approach because with the Finale waiting in the distance a more languorous view would not have been so suitable. I find the freedom of pulse a little surprising since it causes Bruckner's various thematic ideas to lose continuity and the composer's characteristic use of pauses also aids this division of sequences.

Another element to be considered is this is some of the most gorgeous sound that I have ever encountered in a Bruckner recording. It is immensely spacious with a superb acoustic, a large Orchestra recorded with great skill - the tone of all instruments is full and colourful and the balancing is immaculate. All the usual dangers are avoided : brass does not over-power strings and woodwind interjections successfully emerge causing new themes to take on subtle differences of colour. Such splendid recorded quality ensures that the penultimate climax of the 1st movement is an exciting experience, yet, it does not have the terrifying quality of Wilhelm Furtwängler's furious reading of this extraordinary music even though it can only be heard within the confines of a recording made during the World War II.

The Scherzo is another matter : here, Rattle chooses to be firm ; steady and menacing. I recall years ago a reviewer assessing the « Vox » recording by Jascha Horenstein and using the phrase : « This is giant's music. » This is how it is with Simon Rattle and, rarely, have I heard recorded timpani so superbly balanced and so natural in timbre. It is very important to have their quiet passages clearly in focus and this is an exemplary aspect. The nervous intensity of the Trio is underplayed in favour of its lyrical qualities - an approach that makes for a convincing juxtaposition of the 2 sections.

I much appreciate the 15 second pause before the start of the Adagio. Somehow, Rattle's considerate approach gives the impression of uncertainty but I do appreciate the way in which he gives the huge pauses their full value. The final, agonising, climax that then falls to a supremely sad close is a crucial moment. This applies to all performances, regardless of whether they are ending the incomplete 3 movement version or as here, prefacing the reconstructed Finale. Many conductors fashion these last 5 minutes of the Adagio in such a way as to affirm its finality : Bruckner's last words. This is where Günter Wand was superbly convincing and deeply moving : he interpreted the work as completed. A further movement would have come as a shock. Rattle remains gracious and sensitive but he ensures that the onset of the Finale does not come as a surprise.

For many years, the general opinion has been that it is not possible to reconstruct the folios left by Bruckner who worked on the Finale right up until his death. Now, the group of musicologists who effected the completion have been working on this project for nearly 30 years and have followed the tendency of the composer himself by constantly revising. There is significant evidence of their earlier attempts in a « Naxos » recording of the 4 movement version conducted by Johannes Wildner who gives an excellent (underrated) performance of the 1st 3 movements and for the 4th movement uses the 1996 revision of the Finale.

The task was enormous : the earlier parts of the score were the most complete although Bruckner's revisions of the various sections demanded consideration as to his final intentions. The question is : how much did Bruckner complete ? The answer varies and, as time goes on claims, as to the number of bars created by the composer tend to inflate. The booklet note goes into enormous detail about the amount of music completed, semi-completed, indicated and not written at all. This estimate is possible because we know that Bruckner was aiming at 653 bars. He fully scored approximately one 3rd, another 3rd was incompletely scored, and half the remainder was in draft but fully composed, leaving the final 100 bars or so to be recreated. This seems a fair amount of material to work with and, where the missing music is surrounded by other material, it is filled in by repetition of existing melodies but the big obstacle is that Bruckner never composed the Coda.

It is fascinating to compare the 1996 version with the Conclusive Revised Edition that Simon Rattle has recorded. Not surprisingly, the 2 are quite similar except for the Coda. But before reaching this problematical area how does the movement fare as a continuation of the familiar previous 3 ? Well, certainly the opening with the softest of drum rolls is effective and it is followed by 2 forceful announcements of Brucknerian severity. I have a slight problem at 2 min 20 sec where an 8 note descending passage phrased as 4 falling pairs appears and is repeated again and again in one orchestration or another, for 2 further minutes - its repetitive insistence is disturbing because it has no real melodic substance. Setting that aside, the movement has much « grandeur » in the louder parts but its structure seems to be divided into blocks of different moods.

Julian Horton's essay is very helpful and revealing, yet, I find it hard to accommodate his reference to the movement being in Sonata form. More than one hearing makes it possible to understand which theme will continue from a previous one but this is far from Classical Symphonic construction, the mere allusion to a previously stated theme is not the accurate equivalent to a Symphonic recapitulation and we only know that we are reaching the Coda when we hear the familiar Bruckner method of music climbing from quietness toward the tonic key.

And how is the problem of the missing Coda solved ? In 1996, the ascent led to a powerful tutti with flaring trumpets suddenly launching into the major key with repetition of affirmative phrases leading to a triumphant end, a good summing-up ; not ground-breaking but, nevertheless, much as Bruckner might conventionally have been expected to finish. The new revision chooses to reconstruct rather than recompose : here, the trumpets break-off and the music again climbs from silence but this time Bruckner's own themes are compressed to make an ending and they include borrowings from the Symphony's Adagio and from his « Te Deum » (which the composer said could be used as the Symphony's Finale) .

As yet, I still do not grasp the structure of the movement and did Bruckner really write such a huge number of tempo changes ? I must listen yet again, in the context of the entire Symphony to see if I can find a logic that so far escapes me.

The scholarship applied to rescuing Bruckner's final musical utterances is immense, the tying together of the many manuscripts into performable form has taken years, but will the result be accepted as happened (more or less) with Deryck Cooke's notable realisation of Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony ?

This is a fascinating release. The « Berliner Philharmoniker » is magnificent and the sound glows and is amazingly realistic. This is the very best of modern recording - and demands superior Hi-Fi equipment. Buy a bigger pair of speakers and listen to all 82 minutes.

A great performance of Bruckner's completed 9th Symphony from Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic

(5 September 2012)

The great Austrian composer Anton Bruckner died in 1896 leaving his 9th Symphony apparently incomplete. Even during his own life time, he was not always best served by those who endeavoured to support him with some, such as the brothers Franz and Josef Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe, altering his works to render them more « acceptable » . Bruckner left his manuscripts, in the form that he wanted them, to the « Hofbibliothek » for, as he put it, « times to come » , thus, showing that his own thoughts, however much they went against those trying to help him, were those he intended.

It comes as no surprise then that, after his death, Bruckner's 9th was subjected to the same tinkering. The 3 movements that were fully-completed were completely re-orchestrated by the conductor Ferdinand Löwe for a performance in Vienna, on 11th February 1903. It seems that the conductor found the 9th too radical. The manuscript of the Finale of the Symphony was cast aside « out of piety for the Master's wishes » and Bruckner's « Te Deum » substituted instead. It is true that the use of the « Te Deum » was Bruckner's preferred choice if he were unable to complete the Symphony but this solution is not without its problems given that the 9th Symphony is in D minor and the « Te Deum » in C major.

But was the last movement of the 9th actually incomplete ?

Bruckner was pretty methodical in his compositional methods. His music-paper was prepared for him by his secretary, Anton Meißner, who wrote in the names of the instruments, the clefs and key signatures and ruled the bar lines. Nearly all of the bi-folios (a single-sheet folded in half to make 2 leaves) for the 9th Symphony contain 4 bars per page.

Bruckner initially worked-out his musical material in sketches and particello (a score containing only the essential parts of the composition) . He, then, notated the strings and main wind entries into the prepared bi-folios which he numbered and placed one after another. The woodwind and brass parts were, then, scored-out. Bruckner would refine his ideas concerning the music as he went along by discarding a bi-folio and substituting with another. Finally, he would have gone through the whole movement again adding things such as phrasing, articulation and dynamics. When a bi-folio was completed to his satisfaction, Bruckner would often write « finished » on the page.

Throughout 1895 and 1896 and, indeed, even up until the morning of the day of his death, Bruckner was engaged in writing the Finale and, according to some contemporary reports, the last movement was near completion.

After Bruckner's death, although much of the manuscript and sketches for the Finale were entrusted to the care of Bruckner's pupil, Josef Schalk, many pages were lost to souvenir hunters.

Despite this, attempts at a reconstruction were undertaken such as in 1934 as part of the Bruckner Complete Edition when a study volume was published, edited by Alfred Orel, containing transcriptions of many of the Finale manuscripts. Unfortunately, there were many mistakes in this edition and several sources were omitted.

It was not until 1985 that any serious attempt to reconstruct the manuscripts and sketches was made when Nicola Samale and Guiseppe Mazzuca published their « Ricostruzione » . Their achievement led to Leopold Novak, director of the Bruckner Complete Edition, asking the Australian composer and musicologist, John Alan Phillips to undertake a systematic reconstruction of the material.

Phillips carefully gathered and ordered the scattered manuscripts, undertaking detailed research into the paper and hand-writing and, thus, resolving many issues. Importantly, sketches were found for the Coda, long thought lost, including the 24 bar concluding cadence.

Concurrent with this work, William Carragan produced a performing version in 1984 (revised in 2003, 2006 and 2010) but this has been considered more « compositionally liberal » .

Phillips' work led to the publication, in 1991, of a « definitive » performing version of the Finale by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca. It was this edition, with revisions made in 1996, that was recorded by the New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia conducted by Johannes Wildner, in 1998, and issued by « Naxos Records » , in 2003.

The complete final movement consists of 653 bars of which only 96 bars, where there were gaps, have been supplemented by the editors. It can be seen then that Bruckner had, indeed, virtually completed this work and, despite the use of the words « definitive » and « conclusive » used in the editions, there must still be the chance of further manuscripts or sketches being found.

Wildner's performance was certainly a good enough one to give the opportunity to hear a recording of the last movement in the Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca edition. Lasting over 82 minutes, this recording was spread over 2 CDs.

There have been other recordings such as Yoel Levi's 1985 Oslo Philharmonic performance for « Chandos » but this gave the William Carragan performing version of the Finale.

A new « Conclusive Revised Edition » of the Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca performing edition was published in 2012 and it is this edition that has now been recorded by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Simon Rattle. This « EMI » release, again over 82 minutes, is on 1 CD.

It must be said at the outset that Rattle's performance is no mere curiosity but a reading of sensitivity, power and weight. From the opening, Rattle brings a strange otherworldliness to the music with wonderfully hushed tones. There is also a great breadth to the climaxes with the conductor drawing a massive tautness from the Orchestra. The Coda of the 1st movement is full of mystery and strange harmonics before the tumultuous conclusion.

Rattle catches all the changing moods of the 2nd movement Scherzo with wonderful details. As throughout this performance, the control of dynamics is impressive.

It is surely in the Adagio that Bruckner shows how radically this Symphony would develop. Rattle's opening delivers more emotion than I have ever heard before and the finely controlled climaxes build naturally. There are many magically conceived quiet moments and Rattle brings-out the remarkable dissonances that, in this performance, seem to look forward to Gustav Mahler or even Arnold Schœnberg. The clashing dissonances in the climax, towards the end of this movement, are spectacular.

In the final movement, Bruckner ventures even further into new territory with a dotted rhythm that occurs throughout bringing an uncertainty and instability to the music. But this is still pure Bruckner with the brass soaring over the Orchestra in the climaxes. The harmonics are more advanced than ever before and, at times, it sounds as though Bruckner is struggling to overcome emotional doubts. In the Coda, dissonances build-up again but the composer finally casts aside any doubts with the music giving way to a triumphant conclusion.

Simon Rattle brings his usual attention to detail alongside a monumental vision of the whole work. This is a great performance of a work that surely now must remain in its intended 4 movement version. The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra is in superb form and the vivid live recording adds to the impact of the performance.

Bruckner 9, to finish or not to finish ? (Peter Bannister)

(8 November 2012.)

In as much as musicology is capable of generating major events, last month definitely saw one of the most significant of recent years : the publication by « Musikproduktion Höfflich » (Munich) of the « Conclusive Revised Edition » of the reconstructed Finale to Bruckner's 9th Symphony, the product of nearly 30 years of painstaking research by scholars Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs and Giuseppe Mazzuca. The « Conclusive Revised Edition » is dedicated to Sir Simon Rattle, who performed the 9th in its 4 movement version with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the Berlin « Philharmonie » and Carnegie Hall, in February 2012, with a live recording subsequently being released on « EMI Classics » , in May. Its fascinating introduction, including an extensive prefatory essay by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. Musical history is, of course, tantalizingly littered with « unfinished » works which might be said to constitute something of a genre in themselves. Johann Sebastian Bach's « Kunst der Fuge » , Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Requiem » , Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony or Scriabin's « Mysterium » have all become the stuff of legend, exercises in advanced metaphysics inviting endless speculation as to the reasons for their incompleteness and more general meditations on the question of human mortality and its relationship to Eternity. In the case of overtly religious works, there is additionally something deeply haunting about the idea (whether well-founded or not in individual cases) of composers who have peered round some metaphysical corner, obtaining a visionary glimpse of the beyond which they are only partially able (or allowed) to « bring back » to the rest of us. It is almost as if they have encountered an « apophatic » frontier where human discourse, whether verbal or musical, is doomed to fail, as in the final line of Arnold Schœnberg's unfinished « Moses und Aron » , « Oh Wort, du Wort, das mir fehlt » . There is a sense in which the higher the spiritual aspirations of the work, the less it can be finished, for the reason that its subject-matter is the Infinite. In few pieces is this more palpable than Bruckner's 9th, dedicated expressly as it is to « Dear God » (« dem lieben Gott ») . On reaching the shocking and shattering dissonance of the final climax to the 3rd movement (followed by a long silence, rather than a resolution) , the listener has the impression that we have indeed reached a point beyond which it is impossible to go. There is undoubtedly a singular poignancy in the fact that the composer did not live to complete the work, suggesting instead that his « Te Deum » be used as its 4th movement, a solution which has never been felt to be fully satisfactory given the abrupt change of key (C major) and the lack of common thematic material between the 2 pieces. However, as pointed-out by Cohrs (whose findings I am summarizing in most of what follows) , the idea that the 9th Symphony should be considered as a 3 movement work ending with the Adagio as the composer's « Farewell to Life » , beyond which lie only a few rough jottings of mediocre quality noted by an increasingly senile Bruckner, essentially flies in the face of the facts. It was Ferdinand Löwe, who directed the 1st performance of the 9th, in 1903, who effectively put into circulation the idea that the Bruckner's poor health, in his final years, meant that all the composer had left were incoherent sketches for the Finale. A startlingly different picture has emerged through the research of the Samale-Phillips-Mazzuca-Cohrs musicological quartet, and of other scholars starting with Alfred Orel, who produced admittedly flawed and incomplete transcriptions of many of the Finale's manuscripts in the 1930's. Bruckner had already spent 1 year working on the Finale before the onset of mental degenerescence in his last months, and had effectively generated a complete sketch of the movement that John Alan Phillips (whose work on the Finale formed a doctoral dissertation at the University of Adelaide, in 2002) has termed an « emergent autograph score » . (1) Indeed, there might well be no discussion whatever as to the existence of an essentially complete 4 movement 9th had the room in which Bruckner died not been raided shortly after his death before the executors of his Estate could protect his manuscript, leading to the loss of critical bi-folios from the material for the work's Finale. Although Bruckner's work on the Symphony, which had begun in 1887, was effectively halted by his pneumonia of July 1896, the « emergent autograph » , at the time of his death on October 11 that year, seems to have contained no fewer than 600 bars of music. The opening exposition (over 200 bars) had been completed in full-score, with the contributing scholars able to identify all but 96 bars of the « Conclusive Revised Edition » 's total of 653 from the remaining extant bi-folios and continuity drafts. Of these 96 bars (passages whose duration could be accurately identified on the basis of the general architecture of Bruckner's sketches) (2) , 83 could be filled by repetition / transposition of material from elsewhere, leaving a mere 13 to be written speculatively on the basis of an intimate acquaintance with Brucknerian style. It is this almost total freedom from the recourse to free composition which makes the « Conclusive Revised Edition » a document to be viewed with extreme seriousness, in terms of its proximity to Bruckner's intentions and style. To drive his point home, Cohrs makes a telling comparison between the scholarly reconstruction of the Finale of the 9th with Franz Xaver Süssmayr's completion of Mozart's « Requiem » (for which the composer only left 83 bars of full-score) , a version still virtually universally performed. Whereas Süssmayr contributed 189 out of the « Requiem » 's 866 bars (22 %) and orchestrated 783 of them, there is a mere 3% of extraneous material in the 2012 reconstruction of the Finale to Bruckner's 9th. It is certainly possible, indeed likely, that Bruckner composed music for the movement on the missing manuscript pages which is not included in the « Conclusive Revised Edition » , but the edition contains remarkably little that has no proven link with the composer. Simon Rattle is certainly not the 1st conductor to have taken-up the challenge of bringing the Finale of the 9th to life. Shortly after Ricordi published Samale's and Mazzuca's 1st attempt at a proper scholarly reconstruction, in 1985, it was recorded by Eliahu Inbal and Gennadi Rozhdestvensky, with a subsequent performing version from 1992, created with additional scholarship from Phillips and Cohrs, receiving some 40 performances by 17 Orchestras. A major boost to the cause of the revisionists came in 1999-2002 when Nikolaus Harnoncourt performed and recorded the « Documentation of the Finale Fragment » , 1st with the « Wiener Symphoniker » , then the « Wiener Philharmoniker » (CD on « RCA / BMG Classics ») . In 2003, Samale and Cohrs began a further revision, premiered by the Swedish Radio Symphony Orchestra and Daniel Harding, in November 2007.

Review from the www.allmusic.com Editor

Anton Bruckner left the Finale of his Symphony No. 9 in D minor incomplete upon his death and, for a Century or so, the 3 extant movements were regularly performed as a « torso » , with rare attempts to provide some kind of substitute ending. However, the Finale was more substantially composed than many hitherto realized, with large sections fully orchestrated by Bruckner or nearly realized in short score, and with only a few connecting episodes missing. Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and John Alan Philips have devoted years to fleshing-out different completions of Bruckner's Finale, piecing together all the available fragments, and the version used in this 2011 recording is a combined scholarly effort that is a compelling and convincing conclusion to the work. Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic play with genuine sympathy and deep feeling for Bruckner's intentions, and give the whole Symphony a coherent treatment. Rattle's special knack for Bruckner undoubtedly has a lot to do with the successful integration of the Finale into the 9th, and this recording may go a long way toward winning support for this completion. For listeners, the temptation to cut to the Finale will be great among eager Brucknerians who know the 9th well, but allow the whole recording to unfold and hear the Finale in the proper context to understand its appropriateness and consistency with the drama of the previous movements. Highly-recommended.

Presto Classical

One of the perennial quandaries facing musicians is what to do when a composer dies leaving a work unfinished. Should the incomplete torso be presented as it is, or should attempts be made to complete it? I suppose it depends on the work in question: few people nowadays object to Süßmayr's completion of Mozart's « Requiem », but pieces such as Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony and Edward Elgar's 3rd Symphony have, by no means, gained universal acceptance.

One such work left tantalisingly close to completion is the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner. While the 1st 3 movements were finished, only sketches and an incomplete full-score draft remain of the last. Normally, performances include just movements 1 to 3, but occasional efforts have been made to prepare a Finale from the available material, and it is one such attempt that we are presented with in a new recording from Simon Rattle and the « Berliner Philharmoniker ».

Here is not the place to go into too much detail, but suffice it to say that more than 90 % of the movement already existed in full-score or could be reconstructed from the sketches, and the musicologists involved claim that there were only 28 bars that had to be composed from scratch in order to form a coherent whole. As Rattle says in his opening apology :

« There is much more Bruckner here than there is Mozart in the “ Requiem ”. »

It's certainly very interesting stuff, although I must admit that I don't think it's consistently top-drawer Bruckner. While it has many moments that are, in my opinion, the equal of anything from the 7th or 8th Symphonies, I also felt that, just occasionally, there was the odd passage that began to outstay its welcome slightly. On the whole, though, it's very much worth investigating to hear what could have been, had Bruckner lived for just a few more weeks.

Regarding Rattle's overall conception of the Symphony, tempos are generally relatively brisk, especially in the 1st movement. His is quite an urgent reading, with a seeming insistence not to dwell over any particular phrase, lest accusations of stodginess arise. This is quite understandable, even preferable, given the circumstances, and because he has such a fine Orchestra at his command he is able to sustain this without sacrificing heft ; a noble horn sound and incisive trumpets add greatly to the impact.

Phillips' work led to the publication, in 1991, of a « definitive » performing version of the Finale by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca. It was this edition, with revisions made in 1996, that was recorded by the New Philharmonic Orchestra of Westphalia conducted by Johannes Wildner, in 1998, and issued by « Naxos Records », in 2003.

The complete final movement consists of 653 bars of which only 96 bars, where there were gaps, have been supplemented by the editors. It can be seen then that Bruckner had indeed virtually completed this work and, despite the use of the words « definitive » and « conclusive » used in the editions, there must still be the chance of further manuscripts or sketches being found.

Wildner's performance was certainly a good enough one to give the opportunity to hear a recording of the last movement in the Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca edition. Lasting over 82 minutes, this recording was spread over 2 CDs.

There have been other recordings such as Yoel Levi's 1985 Oslo Philharmonic performance for the « Chandos » label but this gave the William Carragan performing version of the Finale.

A new « Conclusive Revised Edition » of the Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca performing edition was published in 2012 and it is this edition that has now been recorded by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Simon Rattle. This « EMI Classics » release, again over 82 minutes, is on only one CD.

It must be said at the outset that Rattle's performance is no mere curiosity but a reading of sensitivity, power and weight. From the opening, Rattle brings a strange otherworldliness to the music with wonderfully hushed tones. There is also a great breadth to the climaxes with the conductor drawing a massive tautness from the Orchestra. The Coda of the 1st movement is full of mystery and strange harmonics before the tumultuous conclusion.

« Berliner Philharmoniker » , Simon Rattle : Bruckner Sinfonie Nr. 9 (mit Finale)

Wenn ich ehrlich bin, hätte ich heute lieber Ligetis gute, alte Atmosphères und dann eine Sinfonie Prokofjews gehört, aber nicht die fünfte. Ich habe noch nie eine Brucknersinfonie gehört, die ich von vorne der ersten bis zur letzten Note fesselnd gefunden hätte. An den Abend, an dem Thielemann mit den Wienern Philharmonikern hier in Berlin eine übermäßig verbrucknerte Achte aufführte und meine Langeweile sich in dem Maße vermehrte, wie die Gesamtzahl der gespielten Noten die 50 Millionen mit Leichtigkeit überstieg, erinnere ich mich nur ungerne. Und vor drei, vier Jahren fand ich bei Barenboims Bruckner die langsamen Sätze ungemein fesselnd, zur Zeit indes finde ich die langsamen Sätze unter Barenboim nicht so gut und die Ecksätze fesselnd. Liegt es an mir, an Barenboim oder an Bruckner ?

Dirigiert Simon Rattle Anton Bruckner, hört man immer Musik, und das ist nicht wenig. Es gibt Dirigenten, die dirigieren ausschließlich Bruckner, wenn sie Bruckner dirigieren, aber dafür keinen Takt Musik.

Die erste Kulminationsstelle im ersten Satz war typisch Rattle und typisch Philharmoniker. Ein fließender, farblich nicht fixierbarer, zugleich leidenschaftlicher und kontrollierter Klang, der walzenartig auf einen Höhepunkt zusteuert, durch den Kulminationspunkt hindurch- oder um ihn herumfließt (eine Spezialität Rattles, die meines Wissens sonst niemand so kann) und dann voll konzentriert mit der Formung der anschließenden Bewegung beschäftigt ist.

La 9e Symphonie (en 4 mouvements) donnée à Carnegie Hall (24 février 2012)

Carnegie Hall, in New York / The « Berliner Philharmoniker » conducted by Sir Simon Rattle.

Carnegie Hall's Director of Artistic Planning Jeremy Geffen and Sir Simon Rattle of the « Berliner Philharmoniker » introduce Bruckner's spiritual and sweeping 9th Symphony.

Written when he was aware of his approaching death, the Symphony's final movement (which Geffen describes « as expansive and heartfelt a piece as he ever wrote ») remained unfinished by the time Bruckner passed away, in October 1896. Sir Simon Rattle explains how that final movement has been reconstructed from the fragments left by Bruckner and which the « Berliner Philharmoniker » performs at Carnegie Hall, on February 24, 2012.

Carnegie Hall Presents the Berliner Philharmoniker and Sir Simon Rattle for 3 Concerts, on February 23-25

(This last concert will not only be part of the 120th anniversary season of Carnegie Hall but it will also be the American premiere of the Samale - Phillips - Cohrs - Mazzuca performance version.)

Highlights include U.S. Premiere of a « Newly Revised Complete Edition » (« Neue Gesamtausgabe ») of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 and Performance of Gustav Mahler's « Resurrection » Symphony with Soprano Camilla Tilling and Mezzo-Soprano Bernarda Fink. Music Director Sir Simon Rattle leads the « Berliner Philharmoniker » in 3 concerts at Carnegie Hall beginning Thursday, February 23 at 8:00 p.m. in Stern Auditorium / Perelman Stage with a robust program of late-Romantic era works : Claude Debussy's « Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune » ; Antonín Dvořák's « The Golden Spinning-Wheel » ; Arnold Schœnberg's « Verklärte Nacht » ; an Edward Elgar's « Enigma Variations » .

The following evening, on Friday, February 24 at 8:00 p.m. , Mæstro Rattle conducts the U.S. premiere of a newly revised completed performance edition of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 in D Minor by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca. Left incomplete upon Bruckner's death, in 1896, his 9th Symphony is a grand and deeply spiritual work filled with triumphant brass chorales and poignant lyricism. Preceding the February 24 performance, Columbia University Professor of Music Walter Frisch will present a pre-concert talk at 7:00 p.m. in Stern Auditorium / Perelman Stage.

Post-concert Reception at Carnegie Hall

(John F. Berky.)

This Friday night at Carnegie Hall, in New York, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Simon Rattle will be performing the Bruckner Symphony No. 9 with the 2011-2012 « SPCM » Finale completion.

For those of you attending the concert, I have made special arrangements with Carnegie Hall to host a post-concert reception for John Alan Phillips (the “ P ” in the « SPCM » Finale collaboration) .

There is still limited space available if you will be attending the concert and would like to meet Mister Phillips.

The event will take place in the « Shorin-Club Room » in Carnegie Hall (on the 1st tier) . The cost to attend is $ 20 (needed to cover the cost of the room rental) . There will be a cash bar in the room as well as some Bruckner-related hand-outs.

For those of you planning on attending the Carnegie Hall performance of the 4 movement Bruckner 9th with the Berlin Philharmonic, on February 24th, there is an opportunity for an informal get-together and an opportunity to meet John Alan Phillips, who collaborated in the « SPMC » edition being presented. If you plan to be there, please let me know and we'll see what we can arrange. The present plan is to meet around 5 PM (the pre-Concert talk is at 7 PM) . We may also be able to gather informally after the concert. (John F. Berky, abruckner.com)

An evening of receptions

(John F. Berky.)

This concert event was initially envisioned by me as a simple excursion from Connecticut with my « concert buddy »

Michaël Cucka. But as the event came closer, I was informed that John Alan Phillips (the P in « SPCM ») was going to be in New York for the concert and I was asked by one of his associates if I could assemble a small reception.

Our 1st plan was to meet him prior to the concert at a local restaurant and then I invited some other people I knew were attending. But then others could only meet after the concert and I began investigating post-concert options. Nothing looked very good until I contacted Carnegie Hall and was offered (at a huge discount) one of their rooms right off of the Rose Museum Room, on the 1st tier. My idea was that attendees could self-fund the expense of the room rental and the cash bar - and the security guard. So the word was sent-out and just enough people joined in to make this a financial possibility - although not without its risks. I took the plunge and scheduled the event, made the payments and then waded through all the paperwork and permits that Carnegie Hall can generate.

We met prior to the concert at the Carnegie Deli, a renowned dining spot right across the street from the hall. The deli is not just renowned for its good food but also for its insanely enormous portions. Everyone gathered according to plan and everyone had a good time getting to know each other as we struggled through our meals.

The Orchestra played very well (except for one horn wobble at the conclusion of the Adagio) and Rattle gave us one of the best orchestral presentations to date of the 4th movement in the new « SPCM » Finale. John Alan Phillips advised us over dinner that a one note adjustment was made in the rehearsal so the Carnegie Hall performance may be unique ; even to that of the « EMI » recording which has already been done. The appreciative audience gave a long ovation.

After briefly meeting with Simon Rattle back stage, Mike Cucka, John Alan Phillips and I went to the reception room where about 20 people had gathered to meet with Doctor Phillips. He made a short speech and there was a question and answer period that lasted until the event ended about 1 hour after the concert.

Overall, I think the evening was great. It is always wonderful to hear a great Orchestra sink its teeth into Bruckner and it is wonderful that Simon Rattle has championed the Finale so that it has been given some high-profile performances. The Finale needs to be heard more often.

I openly admit that I enjoy hearing the Finale completions that have been presented by « SPCM », William Carragan, and Sébastien Letocart. They are wonderful vehicles for us to hear Bruckner's final thoughts and everyone who listens to the 9th Symphony should come to it with an understanding that Bruckner's intention was clearly to compose a 4 movement Symphony. They should also be given the opportunity to hear what his plans were as presented in these completions. However, as wonderful as these completions are, I still come away feeling that Bruckner had compositionally « painted himself into a corner ». The task of capping-off the 1st 3 incredible movements with a Finale and Bruckner's declining health combined to deny us of a truly fitting conclusion. I feel that the material left for them by Bruckner doesn't measure-up what comes before. I have shared this opinion with all of the completers. I do not favor any one completion over another and I openly admit that it is just my opinion.

There was a pre-Concert talk by Professor Walter Frisch of Columbia University. Professor Frisch's discussion of the 1st 3 movements of the Bruckner 9th was fine. Historically, Bruckner 9th with a Finale completed by William Carragan was performed on January 8, 1984 by Moshe Atzmon and the American Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall. That sold-out concert was favorably reviewed in the « New York Times ». That's 28 years ago ! Other performances of that completion were presented in California and Arizona. Nors P. Josephson's Finale completion was also presented by Richard Rosenberg at the Hot Springs Music Festival, in Arkansas.

September 14th marked the 70th birthday of Nicola Samale, the originator of the « SPCM » completion to the Bruckner 9th Symphony Finale. According to Benjamin Gunnar-Cohrs, this is how that project started. About 30 years ago, Samale read the Bruckner book of Paul-Gilbert Langevin, in which the author wrote :

« I would be really curious to meet once the one who would dare to tackle a completion of the Finale. »

Later, Samale went to Paris, visited Langevin, rang his doorbell and when Langevin opened, he only said :

« I am the Man ! »

And thus, it started. If you wish to send Mister Samale a birthday greeting, simply send a card to me (or e-mail me) and I will send them to him. (John F. Berky, abruckner.com)

Filling in a Movement Bruckner Left Behind : Simon Rattle and Berlin Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall

(By Anthony Tommasini of « The New York Times » , February 26, 2012.)

In 1896, with his health steadily deteriorating, Anton Bruckner struggled to complete the final movement of his 9th Symphony, which he hoped would be his Masterpiece. On the last day of his life, he spent the morning working on sketches. Then, he took to his bed and quietly stopped breathing. He was 72.

Even in its incomplete 3 movement state, the 9th Symphony has held an honoured place in the repertory. Over many decades, there have been attempts to complete the Finale. On Friday night, at Carnegie Hall, the Berlin Philharmonic performed Bruckner's 9th with the American premiere of a recently completed version of the 4th movement, a result of 25 years of sleuthing and scholarship. In a video, Mister Rattle commends the completion and almost pleads with listeners to be open-minded.

In a program note, John Alan Phillips, one of 4 editors credited with this project, rebuts the notion that Bruckner left the last movement a shambles. One 3rd of it was finished and orchestrated. The layout for the entire Finale was sketched. After Bruckner's death many manuscript pages were stolen by autograph hunters. But some have turned-up in recent years.

It was fascinating to hear this monumental Symphony performed with an episodic, lurching final movement lasting 22 minutes. After a quizzical opening and a strong statement of the main theme, there are stretches of fitful counterpoint, brass chorales and ruminative passages that take you by surprise. Over all, the music pulses with a hard-wrought insistence that crests with a « Hallelujah » Coda.

Yet, it was hard to know what to make of this completed Finale. Bruckner compulsively revised his Symphonies. What he struggled with most was the overall structure of the pieces, which anticipate Mahler's later works in their scope and length. Sometimes, Bruckner connected themes and episodes with elaborate transitional passages. At other times, he just stopped what was happening and began something new. So, for a Bruckner movement to be missing, whole measures of connective materials is a terrible loss.

Perhaps, the Finale seemed more disappointing coming after the Orchestra's magnificent performance of the 3 familiar movements. Mister Rattle and the Berlin players deftly balanced elements of Schubertian structure and Wagnerian turmoil in the mysterious 1st movement.

The brutal power of the Scherzo's main theme was chilling, with the Orchestra pummeling the dense, thick, dissonance-tinged chords. And Mister Rattle laid-out the threads of chromatic counterpoint in an organic, glowing and, when appropriate, gnashing account of the Adagio.

Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic deliver Bruckner's 9th in all its restored, Majestic glory

(By Corinna da Fonseca-Wollheim, from « Classical Review » , February 26, 2012.)

Bruckner, by all accounts, was a modest man. Throughout his life, he acquiesced to substantial revisions of his Symphonies by conductors who felt they needed cutting and correcting to make them more palatable. He is quoted as saying :

« Do what you like, as long as they get performed. »

Given such generous license from the composer himself, it is ironic that it took-over a Century for Bruckner's last testament (the Finale of his Symphony No. 9) to be heard. Left incomplete at his death, in October 1896, and picked apart by autograph hunters in the following weeks, the score became a puzzle, which scholars mostly viewed with trepidation. On Friday night, at Carnegie Hall, Sir Simon Rattle led the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in a passionate performance of the most recent and persuasive reconstruction of Bruckner's 4 movement 9th.

In a way, scruples are to blame for the long delay. The problem to many of Bruckner's admirers wasn't so much the missing material (pages of which surfaced as recently as 2003) but rather the extant fragments themselves.

For generations, the epic « Farewell to Life » Adagio had served as the conclusion of the Symphony, which the devoutly Catholic Bruckner dedicated to the « Almighty Himself » . Now, according to the sketches, it was to be followed by a tormented, even bizarre, Finale. Full of strafing dissonances and unwieldy themes stacked on top of each other, it suggested, to many, an ailing Bruckner who was losing the thread of his last Symphony.

To the authors of the new performance version (Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and Giuseppe Mazzuca) the final movement only proves how far ahead of his time Bruckner was. Over the past 30 years, successive versions of their closing movement have been performed by adventurous conductors working, for the most part, with provincial German Orchestras. Now that Rattle and the « Berliner » have taken on the « final » reconstruction from 2011 (a recording will be released in May 2012) , the 4th movement will likely enter the canon. Less clear is whether other Orchestras can match the « Berliner » 's technical brilliance and wild energy, sustained over a performance of 80 minutes.

At Carnegie Hall, Friday night, they turned-out in full force, with a massive contingent of strings, and a battery of trombones centered between the trumpets and the horns. The 1st movement quickly established the full range of the color palette, from the initial subliminal timpani roll, half-felt like a subway rumble, to the big foaming climaxes with swirling strings crashing against towering brass chords. In a work with so many peaks, the challenge lies in the intervening quiet and developmental passages, to neither slack-off nor keep the tension so taut that the next outburst loses its shock value. Rattle steered a fine course - bringing a subtle flexibility to the singing 2nd theme, and leading a halting pianissimo scale downwards with no rush to find-out where it leads.

In the very brisk Scherzo, he changed gears with great fluidity, revealing something unhinged in the way that pounding rhythm morphs from savage to danceable at the drop of a hat. Few Orchestras are as physically animated as the « Berliners » , the violins swaying as one during the big luscious melodies, the double basses head-banging along to the fortissimo down-bows. In a passage, early on in the 3rd movement, the violins (playing only a supporting role to the winds) produced a juicy tremolo that saw them using a 3rd of the bow : an exhausting, big-hearted gesture considering they still had an hour to play.

The reconstructed Finale opens with a question-and-answer motif, then quickly rears-up into a « Dies Irae » -like theme. The 2nd theme is derived from the 1st, the dotted rhythm becoming more halting, then giving way to wistful variations in the strings. There are all the elements of a Bruckner Symphony movement, but piled almost on top of one another : a luscious string melody, a glorious chorale in the brass, a breathless fugue, a solo trumpet « Day-of-Reckoning » call. More than once, sharply dissonant chords bring the proceedings to an abrupt halt. A recurring Schumann-like development offers a few moments of reprieve but, on the whole, there is a sense of multiple impressions crashing into each other.

Someone once likened the 9th's final movement to Purgatory following the Adagio's farewell to life, but with quotations from the Symphony's previous movements, as well as earlier Bruckner works, it also fits the vision of a man's life flashing in review during his final moments. The very end is, of course, a jubilant one, with fiery brass chords proclaiming a triumphant D major resolution.

At close to an hour and a half running time, the reconstructed 9th has grown into the kind of Symphonic python that Johannes Brahms found so repulsive. But, as was evident from Simon Rattle's ardent performance and the stormy applause that followed it, there is more than just morbid fascination in hearing it uncoil to its full and newly restored magnitude.

Much of a Glorious Muchness (ConcertNet.com)

(By critic Harry Rolnick.)

Anton Bruckner : Symphony No. 9 in D minor (with reconstructed Finale, New York premiere) . Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Sir Simon Rattle (Music Director and Conductor) . 02.24.2012 - New York - Isaac Stern Auditorium, Carnegie Hall.

The revision quantities of Anton Bruckner's 9 Symphonies (some by himself, others by editors editing other editors) are literally incalculable. But no Symphony has become so contentious as the « 3 movement » final 9th Symphony which has been transformed these past decades into 4 complete movements.

Supposedly, Bruckner, suffering from pleurisy and / or feeling that he had made his peace with God, created the « last movement » as a final Adagio. The Symphony itself went through the usual revisions, but when it was discovered that Bruckner had left page after page of completely orchestrated passages of a 4th movement, then editors and musicologists had a 3-decade-long carnival of revisions, lasting to this day.

Actually, the « Final » revised Finale has been recorded several times. But even this has been (according to the annotators of this program) « exhaustively fine-tuned in multiple revisions ... to its definitive form », reconstructed by Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, in 1983 ; premiered, in 1999 ; and revised several times to new edition, in 2011.

That is an optimist's view. While Sir Simon Rattle's performance certainly seemed definitive, nothing nothing - in Brucknerian canon can possibly be called final.

Future redactors, scholars, discoveries of missing pages (apparently, some pages were stolen by autograph-hunters) , conductors will add another tympani roll, augment a 3 trumpet chorale with an added trombone, and add extra measures of quivering quivering strings.

In the meantime, though, Sir Simon is doing the honours, and last night, he turned the familiar opening 3 movements into a spacious extravaganza, reverberating in Carnegie Hall to a packed audience.

Nor was it anything but overwhelming to hear this massive Orchestra at its glorious loudest for the climaxes, to hear those trumpets calling to the heavens, and to wonder, as Sir Simon took these seething build-ups, up and down the scale.

Did Sir Simon sometimes turn the opening into a Concerto for tympani ? The percussionist let himself go wild under the agonizing themes. Did the 2nd movement sometimes seem a little Mendelssohnian ? Such wistfulness was part of it.

And if Sir Simon sometimes lost the line of the « final » Adagio, then let us allow Mister Bruckner his due, to have put as many feelings, climaxes, pastorales and perhaps confessions to his Lord as he could.

But that was of course not the problem. New Yorkers were hearing, for the 1st time, that final final final Finale. And to make sense, it had to say something which Bruckner didn't say in the 1st 3 movements.

I was not totally convinced. We had ecstatic chorales, more brass, and (most interesting of all) memories of Bruckner past. A direct quote from the 1st theme of the opening, another direct quote from the opening of his « Te Deum » (at 1st the descending chords seemed a quote from the last movement of Beethoven's 9th) .

Even the original themes seemed like descants from music of the preceding 3 movements.

It was held together by dotted rhythmic pulse which gave unity even when the music itself seemed a bit disjointed on 1st hearing.

But the main question is whether the new last movement added anything to Bruckner's religious orations in the original Symphony.

To those accustomed to the usual 3 movement work, the Finale might have seemed a much of a muchness, even a superfluity. On the other hand, Rattle conducted with such conviction, and the new themes were so spaciouly triumphant in themselves, that we could allow ourselves to indulge in another 25 odd minutes of Bruckner - like helping ourselves to another helping of delicious chocolate cake, even if the taste isn't quite so delicious.

A glorious Bruckner indeed. But the drops of pianissimo raindrops drops on New York's pavements was an equally glorious respite.

Symphony review : Berlin Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall

(By Arthur Kaptainis of the « National Post » , February 26, 2012.)

Anton Bruckner did not live to complete his 9th Symphony, although he left sketches for a Finale, these either a salad of inchoate scraps or a cogent blueprint, depending on the authority you consult. On Friday night, the Berlin Philharmonic, under Simon Rattle, took to the stage of Carnegie Hall to present the North American premiere of a completion created (and heartily endorsed) by the scholarly consortium of Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, Giuseppe Mazzuca, John Alan Phillips and Nicola Samale.

Whatever the facts and factoids, these gentlemen produce, as a pretext for their efforts, the actual result is a frightful mess of melodic misfires and harmonic zigzags, a betrayal of the composer (who never authorized the release of any of this material) and an exercise in futility to rank with Barry Cooper's long-forgotten attempt to fashion something under the rubric of Beethoven's 10th.

Which is not to say that the miscellany could not be heard with interest by those who were prepared to suppress their exasperation. The players gave it their all, with full shares of vigour, warmth and cohesion, qualities that were not necessarily as apparent in the presentation of the authorized movements. Funny, that reversal. Possibly, the « Berliners » understood that the jury-rigged Finale was the element that needed their advocacy most. The thought also occurs to me that non-structural « Bruckneriana » of this sort might be suited to Rattle's aptitudes a conductor.

But to return to the score : the only memorable materials were the quotations derived from earlier movements and other works. Elsewhere, there were gestures, gestures, gestures, apparently generated by Bruckner « Google » and assembled into a chain by « Harmony On Demand » . We were told, in the program notes, that the movement was « in the composer's customary Sonata form » , an assurance we required precisely because the materials were not distinctive enough to be perceived as adhering to any form at all. The commanding architecture that distinguishes real music by the real Bruckner (including those works judged by posterity to be less than fully successful) was absent. Surely, the acid test is this : Is there a single Finale in the authorized canon that we would be prepared to exchange for this hodge-podge ? And if the answer is no, how can we accept this as the putative Finale of Bruckner's valedictory Masterpiece ?

It would be nice to report that everything was glorious in the early going, but the properly « Misterioso » opening sounded fragmented. Winds did not blend ideally in the 1st movement and violins had an edge. Were some of those sudden dips in volume dictated by the « New Critical Edition » (« Neue Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») of the score ?

The Scherzo was loud and visceral, for those who like that kind of thing, but the sonority we equate with the Berlin name emerged in earnest the Adagio. Strings had a gripping quality and the dissonant climax was as intense as one could ask it to be. Still, the most most convincingly « Berlinesque » playing was, paradoxically, in that rogue Finale.

And Then, the Earth Shook and Trembled : Rattle, the BPO and Bruckner's 9th

(By Stan Metzger, February 27, 2012.)

Anton Bruckner : Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, Sir Simon Rattle (conductor) , Carnegie Hall, New York.

Bruckner - Symphony No. 9 in D Minor with the U.S. premiere of the final movement. Performance version by Samale-Phillips-Cohrs-Mazzuca (1983-2011) .

Carnegie Hall has been both blessed and cursed. The main concert-hall, officially the Isaac Stern Auditorium / Ronald O. Perelman Stage, is considered to be ideal acoustically. Unfortunately, it sometimes suffers from being right next to a subway station. There were moments in this concert when one thought a train had made a wrong turn and ended-up in the hall : the floor shook as far back as our seats in row W, but the vibrations came from the stage, not the subway.

The performance revealed an image of Bruckner, far from that of the country bumpkin who had childish ambitions of being the next « B » in the pantheon of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. He is still seen by some as the idiot savant who built pointless crescendo after crescendo, only to have nothing at the crescendo's peaks : a musical « Sisyphus » never quite reaching his goal. As to the caveats about his old-fashioned style of composing, which looked backward and not forward, one only had to hear Sir Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to ask if there has ever been a Scherzo more tragic and less Scherzo-like, or an Adagio more poignant and at the same time more apocalyptic. If Bruckner's life-long quest was to be the next Beethoven and to write a 9th Symphony, on the level of Beethoven's 9th, in this monumental work he was not far from his mentor's own Masterpiece.

Only rarely is there an interpretation that makes us want to re-examine a composer's works in a particular genre or even his entire output. Here, from the « ab initio » (or should we say « de profundis » ?) , tremolos played pianissimo to the final 3 pizzicati of the 3rd movement Adagio, the audience was held spellbound. Any Orchestra under any conductor can play loudly, but few can inject such raw terror into each sonic burst that it becomes almost too painful to hear.

Working with one of the great Orchestras of the world, Herbert von Karajan built the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra into a successful but tightly controlled group prepared to succeed in any environment. Rattle has deconstructed this model and rebuilt it in a different fashion. Every member played as if they were in a chamber music group. The violins swayed with abandonment that couldn't be imagined in Von Karajan's day. Conducting the entire work without a score, including the recently completed 4th movement, Rattle made gestures, here and there, but never imposed himself on the instrumentalists.

It seems only fair to suspend critical judgment on the U.S. premiere of the reconstructed 4th movement. Started in 1983, 1st performed in 1991 but still considered a work in progress until 2010, this Finale deserves to be heard several more times before it's reviewed. Unquestionably, it has the Bruckner signature sound, the grand crescendos, the prominence of the brass. Whether it matches Bruckner's other final movements and creates a conclusion that feels right remains a question. This premiere has generated much excitement and expectation, so mentioning the opinion of a detractor might add some balance. This is particularly important as it comes from one of the great Bruckner conductors, George Tintner :

« It is not meant cruelly when I say that I, for one, am glad that Fate did not grant him his wish (to complete the Symphony before he died) for the Finale is unworthy of what is, perhaps, Bruckner's greatest music. The various efforts of brilliant scholars who have recently made performing version of Bruckner's Finale will be of entirely historical interest. »

Frequently today, part of a music-critic's comments focus on how rude the audiences are. The sold-out audience for this concert was exemplary : barely a rustle, cough or « ahem » . It was 90 minutes of Bruckner, and the reception bodes well : the time may have finally arrived to place him on a pedestal next to Gustav Mahler.

Berlin Philharmonic and Bruckner's 9th (Complete)

In the orchestral repertoire, there has always been a special reverence for unfinished works : valedictory Masterpieces left incomplete, often due to the composer's demise. In many cases (such as with Mozart's « Requiem » , Béla Bartók's 3rd Piano Concerto, and Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony) , these works were later completed by students and scholars, using a combination of sketches, notes, and their own imagination.

For nearly a Century, Bruckner's 9th Symphony has been performed as a 3 movement fragment, left unfinished like Franz Schubert's 8th Symphony. The prevailing wisdom has been that what Bruckner left of the 4th movement Finale was too rough and scattered to re-assemble into a coherent whole - and it would be more fitting, at any rate, to end with the poignant Adagio, Bruckner's « Farewell to Life » .

We now know these assumptions couldn't be further from the truth. Since 1983, musicologists Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Cunnar Cohrs have pored-over the substantial material Bruckner left at his death, in 1896, to reconstruct the final movement. Of the 653 bars contained in the Finale, only 28 (about 2 minutes of music) had to be composed from scratch. Indeed, Bruckner himself had orchestrated more than 200 bars.

Why, then, has this music remained in the dark for so long ? The answer, according to Simon Rattle has to do with the « Bruckner Problem » : the tendency of Bruckner's well-meaning disciples to take his music and smooth-out the rough edges to make them more « digestible » . When his disciples found the Finale among his papers, they thought that Bruckner « had completely lost his mind » , according to Rattle :

« They said : “ It's too strange, it's too dissonant, this cannot be right. ” »

Of course, it was absolutely what Bruckner had intended : the final, visionary statement of a composer peering into the realm beyond his own death. In truth, Bruckner's Finale was no less strange than the final String Quartets of Beethoven, or the late paintings of William Turner. It was meant to be heard.

Last night, at Carnegie Hall, Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic made their case for the completed 9th Symphony, performing it, for the 1st time in the United States. (They performed it in Berlin, for the 1st time, 2 weeks ago.) Of course, having one of the world's great Orchestras perform this reconstruction is it's own validation ; in Rattle's view, they were simply honoring Bruckner's original intentions.

From the outset, Rattle (who conducted without a score) employed broad tempi, drawing-out the music for maximum effect while coaxing impossibly loud crescendi from the Orchestra. Throughout the 1st movement, the string players were all in perfect unison, digging into their instruments with mad intensity. At the end of the movement, the timpani (played by Wieland Welzel) started with an almost undetectable hum, signaling the final Coda with its furious trumpets and tubas, as if the Rapture were upon us. It was completely overwhelming : I was stunned, lost.

The 2nd movement Scherzo started innocently enough, with its winds and pizzicato strings playing a delicate, pastoral theme. Which, less than a minute later, is completely brutalized by staccato brass and timpani, pounding the strings into submission. It was like something out of Dimitri Shostakovich : furious and unforgiving, with the Orchestra gyrating like a huge, seething organism.

At 1st, the 3rd movement Adagio seems to offer some reprieve from the darkness, with its tender strings and glowing Wagner tubas. But, before long, the rolling timpani and searing brass join forces in a fanfare of frightening intensity. Back and forth the music went until, finally, Rattle exhorted the players to go for broke, strings and winds flying everywhere before crash landing on one of the harshest, most terrifying dissonances in all of music. Throughout, he kept the pace quicker than normal, refusing to milk the Adagio's pathos as if to telegraph there was still more to come.

Even so, it was strange not to hear applause after the soft, slow fade of the horns, so long familiar as the conclusion of this monumental Symphony. But, after a pause, Rattle raised his baton and struck the downbeat for the Finale, which was completely new to my ears. It started strangely, with dissonant chords and tempi that were all over the map. The music was clipped, restrained, as if someone were fumbling about in an unlit room. Finally, it came together with a loud, triumphant fanfare that reprised the central theme from the Adagio.

The mystery of how to deal with the Coda, for which almost no music was written, was resolved when Samale, Mazzuca, Phillips and Cohrs decided to follow Bruckner's standard blueprint by ending with all of the main themes from the preceding movements superimposed, one on top of the other, ending with a final, major key chorale. According to Rattle, there was literally only one way that all of the themes could fit together, so that the ending « almost wrote itself » .

As I sat there listening to the « Berliners » pour themselves into these final bars, I welled-up with pride. It was if they were saying :

« We'll take it from here. Well done. »

A 3 movement 9th will never sound the same again.

Cheating death : a review of Bruckner, Rattle, and the « Berliner Philharmoniker » at Carnegie

This concert featured Bruckner's death-haunted 9th Symphony, but with a difference. Although Bruckner died after completing only 3 of the 4 movements, the « Berliners » gave the American premiere of a Finale reconstructed by Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs, and Giuseppe Mazzuca (« SPCM ») . This is one of the great musicological undertakings of modern times, involving over 20 years of research and analysis of the sketches. The result overturns the conventional wisdom that Bruckner only completed fragments of the Finale, and restores some astounding passages of music, some of his greatest.

So I'm reluctant to report that, at least for me, the whole didn't quite work.

The « $ 64,000 question » is : how much of this reconstructed Finale is genuine Bruckner ? Anyone with the patience to delve into that question should read Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs' detailed introduction to the reconstruction. There's also the « Documentation of the Finale Fragment » , « SPCM » 's performing edition of the separate blocks of music Bruckner had fully completed ; this is included in Nikolaus Harnoncourt's recording of the 9th, on « RCA » . On May 22, « EMI » will release a recording of Rattle's performance of the fully reconstructed movement.

« SPCM » have demonstrated that Bruckner left behind much more of this music than we've been led to believe. Unfortunately, unlike Gustav Mahler's 10th, there's not enough to provide seamless musical continuity from beginning to end - there are still gaps (96 of the 653 bars) that « SPCM » had to fill with their own music, based on Bruckner's sketches. Only a few such sketches exist for the Coda. Nevertheless, there's enough to finally reveal the character of the Finale.

We might have expected a glorious affirmation like the « Te Deum » , since Bruckner suggested using that work as the Finale when he realized that he might not finish the Symphony. But no ; the Finale is what Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs calls a « toccata infernale » , propelled by an insistent dotted rhythm in the main theme, punctuated by a fugue after the development, and finally resolving in a « Hallelujah » Coda. Contrast is provided by the lyrical 2nd theme, and the 3rd theme, one of the most magnificent chorales Bruckner ever wrote. If the Adagio is a confrontation with Death itself, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs tells us that the Finale is the Last Judgment, capped by redemption. So, how was it ?

It goes without saying that the « Berliners » played beautifully. The blend of the strings, in pianissimo, is a wonder to hear, and the brasses were balanced within the Orchestra, even at their loudest. As a result, full Orchestra fortissimos had depth, as well as volume. It also goes without saying that Rattle is a superb conductor. Nuances abounded in this beautiful performance ; for instance, he had the strings drop to a mere whisper at the 2nd strain of the 1st movement's lyrical 2nd theme. Perhaps, the climaxes of the 1st movement, and the Scherzo, lacked the last degree of vehemence and violence found in the very best performances of the past. But, in the Coda to the 1st movement, and in the Adagio, the playing was on another level, magnificently focused and vividly characterized.

And the Finale ? The majority of the reconstruction is convincing. It has the daring harmonic shifts, harsh dissonances, and jagged melodic contours of the earlier movements, lending the music that peculiar combination of expansiveness, frenzy, and despair which distinguishes the 9th from Bruckner's other Symphonies. Amanda pointed-out, though, that the restless, chugging textures throughout the reconstructed Finale are unlike the preceding 3 movements, which feature simple textures that move slowly, accumulating power over long spans. (The only exception is the Trio of the 2nd movement, but even that is spare and short.)

For me, doubts begin to set in during the recapitulation, which has a few abrupt, jolting halts in momentum - nothing like the pregnant pauses which punctuate Bruckner's other Symphonies. Not surprisingly, the doubts take-over in the Coda, with the least amount of music in Bruckner's hand, the most « forensic » new composition by « SPCM » . And that's a pity, since the Coda is the resolution of the movement and the entire work.

Bruckner indicated that he planned to restate the main themes of the other movements here, and some of the music « SPCM » supplies (especially, the later elaboration of the combined themes against the rhythm of the Scherzo, pounded-out by the timpani) is wonderful. The problem is the lead-in ; I found that « SPCM » lurched suddenly into the 1st reprise of the 1st movement's main theme. This moment lacks the power of its model, a passage in the Finale of the 8th Symphony that inexorably builds tension into a thunderous restatement of the 1st movement's main theme, seen here (build-up begins at 1 min 00 ; restatement at 1 min 58) .

Similarly, the 9th's final « Halleluja » , the closing cadence, is introduced by a sudden turn to the major in the midst of a general tumult, after which the concluding phrases seem far too short to offer true redemption. Again, nothing like the astounding conclusion to the 8th (above, starting at 3 min 21) . I find it hard to believe that Bruckner's Mastery of form, that sense of sheer inevitability that marks all his greatest Finales, wouldn't have shaped the result here.

The « SPCM » reconstruction shows an amazing understanding of Bruckner's idiom. Even the weaker passages sound like his music. (Just not his best music.) Most of the movement is superb. Where it falls short, at least for me, is in form - in a natural sense of progression in the Coda. This isn't surprising, since form is the most elusive element of Bruckner's style, that alchemy which transforms repetition over long spans of time, punctuated by pauses, into an organic musical flow of immense power.

I'm tremendously grateful for « SPCM » 's magnificent achievement. I look forward to further performances and recordings of their work. But I don't think the 9th must be performed with this reconstructed Finale. I can't agree that this completed Finale gives us the full Symphony in what « SPCM » call : « its definitive form » . The reconstruction goes beyond what Bruckner left behind ; it claims to restore what death and neglect have denied to posterity. But anyone who has experienced loss knows that this is a futile endeavor. You can't cheat death.

Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic at Carnegie Hall

Even in its incomplete 3 movement state, the 9th Symphony has held an honoured place in the repertory. Over many decades, there have been attempts to complete the Finale. On Friday night, at Carnegie Hall, in the 2nd of 3 programs, Simon Rattle and the Berlin Philharmonic performed Bruckner's 9th with the American premiere of a recently completed version of the 4th movement, a result of 25 years of sleuthing and scholarship.

In a program note, John Alan Phillips, one of 4 editors credited with this project, rebuts the notion that Bruckner left the last movement a shambles. 1/3 of it was finished and orchestrated. The layout for the entire Finale was sketched. After Bruckner's death many manuscript pages were stolen by autograph hunters. But some have turned-up in recent years.

It was fascinating to hear this monumental Symphony performed with an episodic, lurching final movement lasting 22 minutes. After a quizzical opening and a strong statement of the main theme, there are stretches of fitful counterpoint, brass chorales and ruminative passages that take you by surprise. Over all, the music pulses with a hard-wrought insistence that crests with a « Hallelujah » Coda.

Yet, it was hard to know what to make of this completed Finale. Bruckner compulsively revised his Symphonies. What he struggled with most was the overall structure of the pieces, which anticipate Gustav Mahler's later works, in their scope and length. Sometimes, Bruckner connected themes and episodes with elaborate transitional passages. At other times, he just stopped what was happening and began something new. So, for a Bruckner movement to be missing whole measures of connective materials is a terrible loss.

Perhaps, the Finale seemed more disappointing coming after the Orchestra's magnificent performance of the 3 familiar movements. Mister Rattle and the Berlin players deftly balanced elements of Schubertian structure and Wagnerian turmoil in the mysterious 1st movement.

The brutal power of the Scherzo's main theme was chilling, with the Orchestra pummeling the dense, thick, dissonance-tinged chords. And Mister Rattle laid-out the threads of chromatic counterpoint in an organic, glowing and, when appropriate, gnashing account of the Adagio.

Mahler, Bruckner : The Berlin Philharmonic led by Simon Rattle at Carnegie Hall

Combined with Bruckner's 9th Symphony the previous night, in the U.S. debut of the latest scholarly revision of the 4th movement, the performances highlighted the amazing technical ability of the « Berliners ». The double-basses growled. The violins purred. The woodwinds sighed. The brass was noble - both on stage and from the rafters.

String players didn't just have the same bowings, their bodies all turned together at the same angles to produce their burnished, unified sound.

Bruckner died in 1896, before he could complete his 9th Symphony, and the 4th movement has always been a bit of a puzzle. Parts of it were orchestrated, some was only in sketch form.

Nicola Samale, Giuseppe Mazzuca, John Alan Phillips and Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs have produced 5 versions over 2 decades, the newest completed last year. After the stirring new Finale, the audience maintained silence for several seconds before the loud applause began.

AB 100 : Éditions de la 9e

En raison de son inachèvement, la 9e Symphonie n'a pas connu de révisions multiples comme certaines des Symphonies précédentes.

Il en existe présentement 4 éditions : Ludwig Döblinger (1903) - édition revue par le disciple de Bruckner Ferdinand Löwe - Alfred Orel (1932) - Leopold Nowak (1951) et Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (2000) .

La plupart des enregistrements sont basés sur l'édition de Leopold Nowak.

Les enregistrements plus anciens, dont ceux de Volkmar Andreae, de Wilhelm Fürtwängler et de Bruno Walter, sont basés sur l'édition d'Alfred Orel.

Quelques enregistrements les plus récents, dont ceux réalisés en 2002 par Nikolaus Harnoncourt avec le Philharmonique de Vienne et en 2006 par Akira Naito avec le « Tokyo New City Orchestra » sont basés sur l'édition de Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs. L'enregistrement de Naito comprend, par ailleurs, la 2e version du Trio.

Les enregistrements de Frederick Charles Adler, de Hans Knappertsbusch et de Josef Krips sont, par contre, basés sur l'édition inauthentique de Ferdinand Löwe.

AB 101 : Discographie (un bref survol)

La discographie de la 9e Symphonie est pléthorique.

Une analyse des principaux enregistrements de la 9e se retrouve sur www.Classicalnotes.net/classics/brucknerninth

Une discographie complète et détaillée est aussi disponible sur le site patachonf.free.fr/musique/bruckner/9e

Il y a les versions optant plutôt pour un parti pris monumental voire ampoulé et / ou statique : Otto Klemperer avec le « New Philharmonia Orchestra » sur étiquette « EMI » , Leonard Bernstein et Carlo Maria Giulini avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne sur étiquette « DGG » et, davantage encore, Sergiù Celibidache avec son Orchestre philharmonique de Munich sur étiquette « EMI Classics » .

Des lectures aux tempi plus nerveux, rapides et naturels sont proposées notamment par Siegmund von Hausegger, Oswald Kabasta, Hermann Abendroth (en monophonie) , Wilhelm Fürtwängler (lors d'un concert avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, en 1944) , Bruno Walter avec le « Columbia Symphony Orchestra » au début des années '40, Carl Schuricht, Sir John Barbirolli et Jascha Horenstein en version monophonique avec l'Orchestre Symphonique de Vienne.

D'autres versions comme celle de Herbert von Karajan soit le « Live » de 1975 avec la Philharmonie de Vienne est sans doute son enregistrement le plus convaincant et intense parmi ses divers enregistrements ; Rafael Kubelik ; Günter Wand avec 5 enregistrements dont un avec la Philharmonie de Berlin chez « RCA » ; un jeune et fougueux Zubin Mehta avec le Philharmonique de Vienne sur étiquette « Decca » ; Jascha Horenstein, en version stéréophonique, avec le « BBC Symphony Orchestra » de Londres ; et 2 enregistrements d'Eugen Jochum respectivement sur étiquettes « DGG » et « EMI » sont, chacune à leur façon, à mi-chemin entre le hiératisme et la souplesse.

Poussant plus en avant dans la discographie, l'auditeur découvrira également les enregistrements de Evgeni Mravinski, Eliahu Inbal sur étiquette « Denon » , Georg Tintner sur étiquette « Naxos » et, surtout, Eduard van Beinum avec l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam sur étiquette « Philips » (maintenant « Decca ») .

The « Gramophone » Choice

The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Nikolaus Harnoncourt.

« RCA Red Seal » 82876 54332-2 - DDD (131 minutes) . Includes a workshop live concert from the Salzburg Festival with commentary by Harnoncourt.

Harnoncourt's flirtations with Bruckner haven't always impressed. He didn't seem to « know » the Symphonies as the old Master Brucknerians did. But this live Salzburg 9th is glorious. There's no sense here of fallible rhythms or a conductor not being able to see the wood for the trees. Like all great interpreters of the 9th, Harnoncourt treats the opening movement as a vast tripartite structure (exposition, countervailing statement and Coda) which can be taken in a single glance. Nor is there any falling-off in the Scherzo or the great concluding Adagio, both of which are beautifully paced and expertly realized in terms of each new harmonic salient. In beauty of sound and accuracy and articulation of ensemble, the Vienna Philharmonic matches, even occasionally surpasses, its own high-standards in this work. All of which must have helped the « Teldec » engineers, who make the acoustically problematic « Grosses Festspielhaus » sound like one of the great Bruckner halls.

The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted live by Daniel Barenboim, in 1990.

« Warner Elatus » 0927 46746-2 - DDD (63 minutes) .

This is an outstanding version of Bruckner's 9th Symphony. Like Herbert von Karajan's reading on « DGG » , it's essentially a « central » account of the score that attempts neither extreme breadth of utterance nor sharp-edged drama. Rather, it's a reading that combines long lines, flowing but astutely nuanced, and sonorities that are full-bodied, yet, always finely balanced. The outer movements have great rhetorical and emotional power ; the Scherzo is thunderous and glinting by turns. The Adagio begins very slowly but, for once, Barenboim gets away with it, the movement growing organically rather than remaining stillborn near the start. This is a live performance and, as you would expect, it's superbly executed, the playing every bit as fine as it is on the Karajan recording. But even that doesn't compete with the natural splendours of this issue. This is superb Bruckner sound, spacious and clear, with strings, woodwind and brass at once unerringly « placed » and finely matched. Given good engineering and the kind of astute playing we have from Barenboim and the Berliners, the « Philharmonie » is far from being the acoustic lemon it's sometimes said to be. This is a front-runner for this Symphony.

À propos de Bruckner

Article de William Ritter sur le concert du 16 octobre 1907, paru en décembre dans le Bulletin de la Société française des amis de la musique.

Un concert hors pair hier soir, qui révèle à la fois un chef d'orchestre inconnu et une Symphonie de Bruckner méconnue. L'événement est de telle importance que je n'hésite pas à prendre exceptionnellement, dans la relation des faits musicaux de Munich, la place de mon ami, monsieur Marcel Montandon absent. Le 7 janvier passé, monsieur Schnéevoigt, qui n'est pas le 1er venu, assommait, malgré une interprétation figolée et nuancée à l'excès, le public des concerts Kaim avec cette même 5e de Bruckner dont il va s'agir, et commettait la bourde incroyable de la donner avec le Concerto de Beethoven en ut mineur et avec l'étonnant poème symphonique de monsieur Ernest Boehe « Taormina », lui aussi de dimensions respectables. Naturellement, de l'entassement de 3 pareilles pièces de résistance en 2 heures, sans préjudice des égards que méritait l'œuvre de monsieur Boehe présent, ce fut la formidable Symphonie du génie défunt qui pâtit. Escamotée grand train, elle parut monotone, pleine d'insupportables longueurs, et mit en fuite le public. Or, un jeune homme autrichien présent, monsieur Frenzdorff, passionné admirateur du vieux Maître, aujourd'hui docteur après la soutenance d'une brillante thèse musicale, et qui a fait de l'œuvre de Bruckner une étude spéciale, vient de relever justement la Symphonie tombée et de tenter la démonstration de la façon vraie de donner une œuvre pareille. Il est aujourd'hui prouvé que la musique de Bruckner en général et surtout les Symphonies démesurées, 5, 8, et 9, si on la fait suivre selon les intentions du Maître par son « Te Deum », nécessitent des conditions spéciales et en tous cas méritent comme les Symphonies 1, 2, 3 et 6 de Manier de remplir chacune pour soi un entier concert. Je laisse de côté l'impression en même temps d'intimité et de chapelle que monsieur Frenzdorff a créée en dissimulant l'orchestre derrière un rideau sombre et en exigeant l'extinction du lustre, et aussi divers autres détails d'organisation destinés à assurer le confort absolu des auditeurs. Je me permets toutefois d'attirer l'attention sur le fait qu'à œuvres, à salles et à moyens nouveaux, il est juste d'ajouter l'abolition de certaines routines. Du temps de Haydn, « la Création » se donnait à Vienne dans une salle de palais 18e siècle ; les Symphonies de Beethoven connurent les petites salles de concert Empire (on dit en Autriche : Vieux-Vienne) ; l'orchestre de Glazounov, de Bruckner, de Strauß, de Mahler et de Suk veut d'autres parallélépipèdes de temps et d'espace. Dès lors, pourquoi ne lui accorderait-on pas par surcroît tout ce qui assure l'appréciation intégrale des œuvres, tout ce qui aide à procurer le maximum de jouissance esthétique. Même s'il s'agit de s'asseoir à table 2 heures au lieu d'une, on a soin de différemment ménager son appétit, ses aises et aussi l'ordonnance du repas. Bref, cette Symphonie monstre qui n'avait guère dépassé 1 heure aux mains de monsieur Schnéevoigt a pris sous la nouvelle direction d'Alfred Westarp, pseudonyme de qui l'on sait, les proportions suivantes. On a commencé à 8 heures et quart précises, toutes portes closes, pas une place n'étant imposée debout. Sont restés debout ceux-là seuls qui y tenaient. Le rideau sombre a du moins cet avantage inappréciable d'empêcher l'orchestre de se préoccuper, lui, du public, inconvénient encore pire que la préoccupation de l'orchestre et de son chef de la part du public. Les musiciens ne jouent désormais plus que pour la musique et leur propre satisfaction. Le 1er mouvement, d'une telle ampleur passionnément religieuse, religieuse en pleine nature (on pense à du Wagner, à toute la passion de Wagner, déversée dans les interminables frises pompeuses des rubriques de Händel) s'est alors déroulé avec une lenteur fluviale, dans une atmosphère de délicat demi-ton et de respect infini pendant une grande demi-heure au moins. Puis, sans un applaudissement, la foule s'est écoulée dans les promenoirs pour un entracte de 10 minutes, 10 minutes où les exaltations sont entrées en contact. L'Andante et le Scherzo, donnés coup sur coup, formaient une seconde coupure. Puis encore 15 minutes d'entracte. Enfin, en 40 minutes à soi seul le prodigieux Finale, son pyramidal entassement (pyramide renversée), aboutissant d'assises en assises toujours plus majestueuses, au bronze pur de la grande plate-forme terminale, entablement surhumain et tout bronzé de trombones non pas furieux, mais calmes, omnipotents, victorieux dans la sérénité. Puis plus haut : l'air pur, l'espace, et, prolongé autant que possible, pianissimo, l'aire à grands circuits lents d'une paire d'ailes qui planent, éployées. Un des grands dangers de la musique de Bruckner, et surtout dans la Symphonie en question, c'est la quantité des pauses générales dont le Maître entrecoupe les alinéas de sa démonstration. Rien de plus lassant à une audition ordinaire : cela crée la sorte de gêne que l'on éprouve à assister aux efforts surhumains d'un asthmatique qui, pour gravir une côte ou abattre une tâche, ahanne et peine et doit à tout instant reprendre des forces. Nous avons vu hier l'interprétation à donner à cette ponctuation, le sens de ces espaces vides. Vides ils ne sont plus. Alfred Westarp au lieu de les sophistiquer les a au contraire étalés avec plus d'ampleur encore que Wagner n'en voulait aux silences des Ires lignes du prélude de « Tristan » . Il les a étalés le temps d'un « Ave Maria » et les voici remplis d'une immense signification. C'est le recueillement du génie et de la prière pour l'adoration : il y a de l'extase dans ces points de suspension, du ravissement de Saint-Jean écrivant une Apocalypse musicale qui serait claire et rayonnante. De même, le trio du Scherzo a été en quelque sorte isolé par une longue attente comme certains campaniles le sont par un grand espace de leur église. Autre vrai danger par les directions ordinaires. Elles semblent alors, ces Symphonies, tumultueuses, désordonnées et pleines de recommencements. Autre défaut d'intelligence ! C'est que le chef d'orchestre de chaque jour les scande exagérément, en met les saillies dans une évidence photographique et y projette la crue lumière d'une absolue incompréhension de leurs dessous mystiques. Or, à en faire des œuvres profanes, on les sort de leur ambiance. Monsieur Westarp, lui, en a tenu tous les éléments dans une cohésion parfaite. Rien jamais ne m'a paru plus un. Tout s'engendre, rien ne se rompt, rien ne se heurte. Ce sont les mille arceaux qui se succèdent et dans la perspective s'enjambent, des complications de l'art Gothique. Tout est tenu dans une perpétuelle fluctuation des pianissimo les plus moites, les plus subtilement estompés, à un forte chaleureux, ample et sourd, très ménagé, de façon à aboutir par des gradations d'une délicatesse qui les rend à peine sensibles, des gradations qui évoluent dans l'amplitude la plus magnanime, à l'excessif du Finale où l'on atteint à une intensité de fournaise et d'éblouissement, à la plénitude d'exaltation enfin, comme sans s'en douter, porté par une marée immense qui a duré tout le laps de la Symphonie. Le déluge dut monter ainsi. Et ce n'est pas autrement que cuit du lait ! Tant les moyens les plus naturels sont les derniers dont on s'avise. Combien y a-t-il de chefs d'orchestre qui se doutent que toute Symphonie a un point culminant et que tout doit être préparatoire et subordonné à cette minute d'apothéose. Dans toutes, ordinairement, il y a beaucoup de minutes palpitantes ; il n'y a qu'un paroxysme, et c'est leur manière d'unité. Mais d'unité poussée jusqu'à cette sublimité, je n'en connais pas d'autre exemple vraiment : le Scherzo y est encastré comme une horloge astronomique dans un beffroi. Et voici qu'enfin on commence à apercevoir la vraie forme de l'œuvre de Bruckner. On la jouait de plus en plus ces dernières années. Ou plutôt on l'investiguait avec précaution ; on en faisait le tour, des lanternes ou des piolets à la main. Les escarpements étaient si excessifs que l'on parlait de chaos. Sinon d'inondation, ou d'éruption volcanique. On l'envisageait, cette œuvre, un peu en cataclysme dans l'univers musical, en « sublime horreur » . Lui-même, le bon vieux, n'a jamais eu, je crois, d'idées bien précises sur l'exécution de ses Symphonies, d'intentions arrêtées pour leur mise-au-point. Lui vivant, c'est à peine si on le jouait. Il ne s'est peut-être pas entendu 10 fois, à l'orchestre, lui, qui laisse 9 Symphonies, sans compter celle qu'il brûla par modestie, se disant de bonne foi qu'il était un imbécile. On le lui cornait sans cesse aux oreilles ! Il restera à monsieur Westarp la gloire d'avoir été le 1er en Allemagne (et je crois qu'il est en progrès même sur messieurs Löwe et Göllerich, en Autriche) à entamer par l'énergie vitale, par l'âme même de l'œuvre, l'étude de l'œuvre, et non pas par le dénombrement de ses aspects extérieurs. L'étonnante étude préparatoire qu'il a publiée avec un luxe magnifique de ce monument symphonique, le plus discuté d'entre toutes ces Symphonies discutées jusqu'au déchirement et à la mise en charpie, témoigne à toute page de cette préoccupation de montrer en fonction cette force tout intérieure qui ordonne le soi-disant chaos, soulève le flot et provoque l'éruption. Certainement, si l'on peut lui contester d'avoir exactement suivi les indications de la partition imprimée (et il paraît qu'aux répétitions, l'orchestre se révoltait) personne ne lui disputera l'honneur et la béatitude d'être à l'heure actuelle l'homme qui se soit le plus rapproché du cœur de Bruckner, d'être devenu le confident du génie et du Saint, de s'être fait avec candeur et désintéressement le prêtre d'un culte nouveau.

Anton Bruckner (Eugen Segnitz)

Article paru dans « Le Courrier musical », édition du 1er mars 1906.

Plus nous nous éloignons de l'époque à laquelle ont été écrites les œuvres d'un grand musicien, plus nous sommes à même de pouvoir les juger sainement. Depuis la mort d'Anton Bruckner, la lutte a cessé, cette lutte qui jadis se poursuivait avec tant d'âpreté et d'acharnement, en Allemagne et en Autriche, et qui fut menée avec tant de parti pris, grâce au mot d'ordre parti de Vienne.

On sait avec quelle vivacité on chercha à opposer Anton Bruckner à Johannes Brahms : comme d'habitude, on voulut établir une comparaison entre 2 fortes personnalités qu'on n'aurait jamais dû mettre en parallèle. Car chacun de ces grands compositeurs possédait une haute individualité qui lui était propre.

En réalité, c'était une sorte d'opposition, de rivalité entre l'Allemagne du Nord et l'Allemagne du Sud qui se trouvait personnifiée dans la différence d'esthétique de ces 2 Maîtres. Brahms est le représentant de l'école de la « forme », de la pensée concentrée, s'exprimant sobrement et de la façon la plus concise. Sa ligne mélodique est souvent peu complaisante et de couleur sombre, la construction de ses œuvres toujours mesurée et logique. Il parle généralement une langue douce et sentimentale, sans rechercher des spéculations transcendantes. Au contraire l'imagination de Bruckner est tellement puissante qu'il lui arrive souvent, dans ses Symphonies, de s'écarter des idées principales et d'y mêler une foule de choses absolument neuves : il en résulte des longueurs et une sorte de confusion momentanée. Mais les 2 compositeurs ont du moins un point commun : ils sont les seuls parmi les successeurs de Beethoven qui aient pu écrire, en leur donnant un développement, des mouvements lents. Peut-être Bruckner était-il même supérieur en cela à Brahms, et c'est à juste titre qu'on a pu le nommer le « Maître de l'Adagio » .

La biographie de Bruckner est très simple. Né le 4 septembre 1824, à Ansfelden, près de Linz, en Autriche, fils d'un Maître d'école de village, il reçut les premières notions de musique de son père ; après la mort de celui-ci, en 1837, il entra comme enfant de chœur chez les Augustins de Saint-Florian d'Ebelsberg, y prit des leçons d'orgue et d'harmonie, tout en faisant ses études pour être, à son tour, Maître d'école. Il exerça ce dernier emploi à Windhag, où il dut, pour un salaire mensuel de 2 florins, être en même temps organiste, directeur de musique, et même ... sacristain. Pour gagner sa vie, il jouait du violon dans les fêtes de village. Envoyé à Kronstorf, près de Enn, puis organiste à Saint-Florian, il alla concourir à Vienne et fut nommé organiste à la cathédrale de Linz. Protégé par l'évêque de Linz, il put aller souvent à Vienne se perfectionner et prendre des leçons de composition près de Simon Sechter (1856-1860), puis d'Otto Kitzler, chef d'orchestre du théâtre. En octobre 1862, Kitzler dirigea 2 représentations de « Tannhäuser », à Linz, et Bruckner fit ainsi connaissance avec la musique de Wagner, pour lequel il professa, dès cette époque, une admiration enthousiaste, et qu'il vit en 1865, à la 1re représentation de « Tristan ». Déjà, il avait composé quelques œuvres, et on avait exécuté de lui une Messe en ré mineur et une Cantate. En 1868, Bruckner fut nommé organiste de l'église Saint-Étienne, à Vienne, et professeur d'orgue et d'harmonie au Conservatoire. Plus tard, en 1875, il entra comme « lecteur sur la théorie musicale » à l'Université.

C'est de Vienne que se répandit, en Allemagne, la renommée de Bruckner comme compositeur. Le public accueillit avec faveur ses grandes compositions, notamment ses 3 Ires Symphonies. Et dès lors commença à se faire jour cette opposition, menée par le célèbre critique Hanslick, et qui prit Brahms comme porte-drapeau. En Allemagne, c'est à Arthur Nikisch et à Gustav Mahler que revient le mérite d'avoir fait connaître les œuvres de Bruckner. Le Maître, qui sans relâche avait travaillé, sans s'inquiéter du bruit mené autour de lui et contre lui, s'éteignit à Vienne le 11 octobre 1896.

Anton Bruckner ne commença guère à être connu que dans sa 50e année : 10 ans après, il était célèbre : cas tout à fait rare dans l'histoire des musiciens. Le nombre de ses œuvres n'est pas extrêmement grand ; mais ces œuvres sont de la plus haute importance et de la plus haute valeur. Le Docteur Louis, dans son livre récent, nous montre que l'œuvre véritable du Maître, ce sont ses 9 Symphonies (numéros 1, 2, 8 en ut mineur, 3 et 9 en ré mineur, 4 en mi bémol, 6 en si bémol, 7 en en mi majeur, 5 en la majeur) . Bruckner est, croyons-nous, le plus grand Symphoniste que nous ayons eu depuis Beethoven. Dans le domaine de la musique religieuse, il écrivit également 3 Messes, 1 Ave Maria, plusieurs Motets, 1 « Te Deum » et le Psaume 150. Ajoutons à ces œuvres 2 chœurs pour voix d'hommes et orchestre, et plusieurs compositions « a cappella » .

Bruckner était un véritable artiste, une âme noble et généreuse. Il ne se souciait en rien du succès probable de ses œuvres, ni même de savoir si elles seraient exécutées. Son talent se développa lentement : il travaillait sans hâte, laissant mûrir peu à peu ses idées musicales, et retouchant, corrigeant, modifiant ce qu'il avait écrit. C'était un artiste probe et scrupuleux, digne de servir de modèle aux jeunes compositeurs.

Bruckner était, à l'orgue, un improvisateur merveilleux. Il fut très apprécié à Nancy, à Paris, où Gounod vint l'entendre, à Londres. Comme professeur, il se montrait très sévère sur l'application des règles du contrepoint. Parmi ses élèves, citons : Felix Mottl, Arthur Nikisch, Manier, Emil Paur, Friedrich Klose, etc.

Son admiration pour les œuvres de Wagner, qu'il manifestait ouvertement, lui causa de nombreuses inimitiés parmi ses collègues et même dans son entourage. Il ne manquait pas d'aller assister aux représentations de Bayreuth.

Bruckner était d'allure simple ; il menait une vie retirée et très modeste. Son aspect fut, toute sa vie, celui d'un brave Maître d'école de village autrichien dévot et timide. Il était d'abord charmant, très cordial et gardait une fidèle amitié à ceux qui l'avaient obligé.

C'était un croyant, et il avait gardé jusque dans sa vieillesse la foi naïve et absolue de l'enfance ; très catholique, mais en même temps très tolérant. C'est dans ce sentiment de naïve reconnaissance envers le Créateur qu'il écrivit sur la partition de sa dernière Symphonie : « Dédiée au Bon Dieu ! ».

De même, Bruckner aimait religieusement son art : la musique était pour lui une « révélation », un « mystère », l'entrée dans le monde divin des sons. Il professait une admiration absolue pour Bach, Beethoven, Wagner. Son œuvre en porte l'empreinte, en même temps qu'elle témoigne d'un penchant pour Franz Schubert. Elle n'ouvre nullement une nouvelle période musicale : elle clôt plutôt la période classique. En elle se reflète une âme de grand artiste, et l'une des personnalités musicales les plus grandes et les plus hautes de notre histoire musicale moderne.

Un grand Symphoniste catholique : Anton Bruckner

Un article de William Ritter paru en 1907, dans la « Revue générale », volume 85.

Il eut la foi de César Frank, le grand Symphoniste catholique français. Et c'est avoir du coup pas mal de choses communes avec lui, mais au plus profond de l'âme. Et seulement là. Il est mort vierge ; il vécut dans la médiocrité comme un Saint et fut accablé de misères ; il fut la vivante cible de tout ce que la clique viennoise amenée à Brahms par Hanslick comptait de farceurs et de vilains personnages ; il fut le bouc émissaire du wagnérisme, en ce sens que d'une part Wagner, à qui il avait dédié sa 3e Symphonie et qui l'appelait à son tour « le Symphoniste de l'avenir », ne daigna jamais s'occuper de lui et ne permit jamais aux wagnériens la moindre distraction à son propre culte ; et que d'autre, part, les adversaires de Wagner sentant impossible à blesser l'homme qui disposait d'un roi et ... aussi d'un royaume qui était bel et bien de ce monde, se vengèrent sur l'innocent vieillard de génie, beaucoup trop impressionnable et naïf, et le prirent pour souffre-douleur. Tout ce que l'on n'osait dire, ni pouvait faire au dieu de Bayreuth, on l'osait dire et faire à Bruckner. Hélas ! la sensibilité merveilleuse de cet homme excellent, qui eut du génie comme les petits enfants ont de la grâce, en fut là toute sa vie, de se soucier des coups de pied et des pétarades à son adresse du moindre âne « brahmine », comme on disait à Vienne, et de croire que la critique en général et Monsieur Hanslick en particulier existaient. Les « jugements » de celui-ci, grâce à Dieu, nous restent ! Il avait soin de les réunir en volumes ! Il demeure immortellement écrasé sous le poids de cette bibliothèque, un nouveau supplice dantesque, de cette bibliothèque où se trouvèrent conspués ou dédaignés les 2 plus grands noms de l'Autriche de son temps, Smetana, le créateur de l'Opéra tchèque et Bruckner. Brahms, qui n'était pas à tout prendre une âme basse, ne prenait pas part à la mêlée, mais pourtant laissait faire un mal dont il bénéficiait. Violent, bourru, irascible, grossier, gourmand et sensuel d'une façon tudesque, il n'eut jamais une parole de pitié pour la victime qui était la rançon de sa fortune. Quand Bruckner mourut, l'auteur du Requiem allemand vint montrer des yeux rouges à l'église ; mais c'est qu'il se sentait atteint, et il pleurait sur le prochain grand musicien que Vienne enterrerait. Comme il n'avait pas levé un doigt pour empêcher son âme damnée, Hanslick, de distiller son venin, il ne fit rien, lui qui pouvait tout, pour que la mort du Maître fût marquée de quelqu'une de ces grandes commémoraisons musicales qui sont l'usage de l'Autriche en pareil cas. Un an plus tard, il avait disparu à son tour, sa fin ayant été hâtée par sa goinfrerie. Alors on vit se produire ce que tous les spectateurs sincères et impartiaux de ces 2 vies avaient prévu. On rendit des honneurs énormes. Un temps on ne parla plus que de Brahms ; l'Allemagne d'après Wagner l'adopta pour son grand homme musical ... Puis, tout à coup, tantôt ici, tantôt là, on vit apparaître toujours plus fréquent le nom de Bruckner ; des chefs d'orchestre très malins, comme Sigismond de Hausegger ou Georges Schnéevoigt, se plurent à assembler certains concerts une Symphonie de Brahms et une de Bruckner, et c'était comme un tableau d'Ingres et un de Delacroix affrontés. Puis bientôt, l'invasion du nom de Bruckner fut si irrésistible, qu'aujourd'hui le seul fait de n'avoir pas écrit de Concertos et de Sonates qui puissent faire valoir des solistes, comme Brahms de qui l'on a 2 Concertos de piano, un de violon, un de violon et violoncelle et plusieurs Sonates pour piano et piano et violon, permet encore de dire que Brahms est plus joué que Bruckner. Or cette année, qui a apporté avec le 11 octobre le 10e anniversaire de sa mort, est plus que jamais favorable à l'étude de ses 9 Symphonies. Berlin donne la 4e et la 8e, Lubeck la 9e, à Munich, Schnéevoigt a donné la 3e et donnera les 5e et 6e, Mottl a donné la grande Messe en mineur et donnera la 2e ; Prague aura la 7e, et Vienne a consacré au vieux Maître le 1er concert de la saison en entier (1) . Notez que je n'annonce là (et je me cite d'une autre revue à laquelle j'ai procuré cette information) que ce dont la rumeur est venue à mes oreilles. Ainsi plus se fatigue la renommée de Brahms, le rival heureux et mesquin, qui en est à la phase où elle cesse de monter ; plus la vraie gloire vient au naïf et grand vieillard dont la carrière artistique, aussi humble et noble que celle du père Franck, connut toutes les entraves et les pires haines, celles imméritées, et celles (du reste qui ont leur consolation en soi) de la libre pensée sectaire contre le catholicisme. Bruckner eut a vrai dire une population presque entière contre lui, les catholiques à Vienne comme ailleurs ne bougeant jamais pour la défense de l'un d'entre eux : il n'eut de réconfort qu'en Dieu ; et voici que, pour ce grand croyant, semble déjà se justifier définitivement une parole qu'il connaissait bien, sans avoir l'orgueil de se l'appliquer, sur celui qui s'élève et sera abaissé, tandis que se relèvera celui qui fut humilié.

On sait les objections que fait la jeune école française et les critiques légitimes d'un Pierre Lalo, par exemple, à la musique de Brahms. Et voici les nôtres : elle sent trop souvent le renfermé. Elle ouvre, sur des vieux livres, de vieilles partitions, des jours de scoliaste et de rat de bibliothèque. Quand elle est personnelle et impulsive, elle exprime un caractère ombrageux et vindicatif, les passions et la disgrâce d'un homme taciturne, bourru et laid. La joie sublime qu'un Beethoven, également laid, bourru et taciturne, tirait comme Bruckner de la satisfaction de sa conscience et de la contemplation de la nature, Brahms ne la connaît pas. Il oublie rarement qu'il est docteur et professeur. Il bougonne et ratiocine et potasse en chambre. Il est peut-être nécessaire cependant de traverser son œuvre pour passer à celle de Bruckner. On y trouvera le plein soleil avec ivresse, l'enchantement d'une âme franciscaine en présence des beautés de la nature autrichienne ; on y trouvera l'inspiration ininterrompue d'un qui se cherche en son âme et le long des sentiers fleuris au lieu que dans les livres et les rues. Il y a quelque chose d'universitaire et de prussien en Brahms ; on dirait aussi en France qu'il a le style normalien. Bruckner est ivre de plein air, d'arôme de la forêt et de chants d'oiseaux. Il a le badinage énorme et délicat du Moyen-âge avec les couleurs modernes. Il est le fils direct de Beethoven ; lorsqu'on parle de l'un, presque tout ce qu'on en dit peut s'appliquer à l'autre : Beethoven gardant pour lui le supplice de la surdit  et de son amour d daign  ; Bruckner, sa foi intense, sa bonne gr ce inoffensive et son amour absolu plac  en Dieu. Il est le fils direct de Beethoven, oui ; et il est incontestablement le p re de Mahler. Mais il fut un Saint, je le r p te, et dans tout l' uvre cela se sent. Et c'est   ce parfum-l , comme on le verra, que l'adversaire se h rissait et imm diatement fon ait sur l'admirable innocent, le reine Thor, le Parsifal de la musique.

Lorsqu'il mourut,   l' ge de 72 ans, le 11 octobre 1896,   Vienne, dans cette d pendance du Haut-Belv d re o  la piti  de l'Empereur Fran ois-Joseph l'avait log  sur les instances de la charmante archiduchesse Marie-Val rie, on trouva dans ses papiers, qui furent class s   la Biblioth que de la Cour, une Symphonie inachev e en 3 parties et une sorte de testament-pri re o  il d diait ing nument, dans tout sa foi et sa candeur, cette 9e au bon Dieu, le priant d'accepter cette humble offrande en remerciement de tous ses bienfaits sur la terre et en lui demandant pardon de n'avoir pas eu le temps de l'achever. Il aurait voulu certes que ce f t sa plus belle  uvre, mais il avait fait ce qu'il avait pu. Aussi priait-il qu'on l'ex cut t autant que possible suivie de son « Te Deum » ... Et quand on respecte ainsi ses intentions, elle est vraiment la tr s digne s ur de l'autre 9e, celle de Beethoven. Les 3 morceaux forment, du reste, un ensemble hors ligne : une 1re partie, v h mente et passionn e   l' gal de la musique de Tristan ; le scherzo le plus cinglant, si je puis ainsi dire, le plus opini tre, le plus extraordinaire, le plus girant qui ait  t   crit avant ceux de Mahler ; et enfin un andante qui recule les limites du sublime et qui est vraiment les derniers adieux de Bruckner   la vie. Il n'y eut besoin d'aucun travail de coordination et de sertissage. On avait d clar  dans Vienne, avec la bienveillance accoutum e lorsqu'il s'agissait de Bruckner, que ce serait injouable, et du g tisme pur (les derniers temps de sa vie le pauvre vieux somnolait sans cesse) . Il en fallut rabattre ! C'est   Ferdinand L we que revient l'honneur de l'ex cution originale ; elle eut lieu le 11 f vrier 1903. Date   retenir. C'est ce jour qui marque   Vienne la r habilitation artistique du pauvre vieux Ma tre, et de ce jour que commence le crescendo triomphal qui aboutit   l'apoth ose universelle. Cette Symphonie (  la fois une seconde 9e et une seconde Inachev e) se r pandit comme une bonne nouvelle   travers l'Allemagne pendant l'hiver de 1903-1904 ; on ne jouait que cela. Elle commen a sa carri re allemande   Duisbourg, sous Josephson, le 24 mai 1903. Rien qu'  Munich, nous e mes l'occasion de l'entendre 3 fois. Linz, chef-lieu de la Haute-Autriche, province natale du Ma tre, est d sormais le foyer de son culte musical, gr ce   son  l ve et biographe Auguste G llerich. Il s'y donne toutes les ann es un Festival Bruckner, d'o  l'on accourt de tous les points de l'Allemagne respplendissent les Alpes, tandis que le vaste Danube s' pand dans les plaines au milieu d'inextricables saulaies et de grasses prairies. Et d s lors, les Symphonies de Bruckner auront ce caract re fluvial, ces d bordements, ces progressions essoufflantes pour les poitrines citadines, accoutum es   respirer des atmosph res moins vitales, et cet apparent d sordre qui n'est que l'ordre naturel avec la vari t  d'une cr ation, tous les recoins enchanteurs du bocage, les petites fleurs des pr s, le scintillement des neiges lointaines et les nuages au flanc de la montagne. Les plus beaux paysages musicaux qui existent, il les faut aller chercher aujourd'hui chez Mahler. Mais du temps de Bruckner les siens  taient les plus vastes et les plus vibrants. Ils d crivaient une terre d'Autriche vue   travers une  me qui en faisait un paradis terrestre autrichien (Symphonies II, III et IV notamment) .

Le jeune homme demeura 4 ans   Saint-Florian, o  sans doute l'instruction et l' ducation du c ur et de l'esprit furent plus soign es que l' ducation des manieres : je dois   la v rit  de d clarer que toute sa vie Bruckner mangea avec les doigts et prisait apr s les avoir l ch s. Cela ne change rien aux 9 Symphonies. Beethoven  tait   peine plus civilis .   partir de 1841, il dut gagner son pain comme Ma tre d' cole de village, ce qui  tait alors moins ais  qu'aujourd'hui. Ma tre d' cole   Windhaag-sur-Maltsch, il recevait 2 florins par mois (  peine 5 francs) . Le reste, il le gagnait à seconder un ménétrier qui faisait danser les paysans. Et les paysans continueront à danser dans les Symphonies ; mais qui les reconnaîtrait dans les trios ensoleillés des premières ! Je dis des premières, car, en avançant en âge, si le bon vieillard ne perdit rien de sa grâce, il prit du monde et de son art une conception encore plus élevée si possible, de telle sorte que l'on a de certains morceaux l'impression d'une descente du Saint-Esprit et que l'on a pu dire de la 7e Symphonie, par exemple, qu'elle « fait descendre la foudre ». Les « scherzo » deviennent alors des rondes de titans.

Il est prouvé qu'en promenade, dès ce temps-là, le jeune Maître d'école composait. On le rencontrait le long des sentiers tirant des rouleaux de papier de musique de son grand claque-oreilles. Je dois encore à la vérité de dire que Bruckner conserva toute sa vie une façon de se vêtir qui sentait sa province autant que celle de Brahms le pion et la tabagie. Mais j'aime autant cela que les « smoking » et les bérets de velours, que les robes de chambre de soie, dont le compte dormait chez les modistes de Vienne, de Wagner. Le second village où il enseigna fut Kronsdorf, près d'Enns. C'est là qu'enfin il put commencer à s'exercer régulièrement sur un piano, que lui prêta un indigène. En 1845, il arrive à une place de professeur, plus tard d'organiste suppléant, à Saint-Florian. Il poursuit ses études musicales seul, avec une ténacité de paysan, de telle sorte qu'en 1856, il sort vainqueur du concours pour la place très enviée d'organiste de la cathédrale à Linz. Et maintenant ce seront les plus heureuses années de sa vie. Car les méchantes attaques des collègues influents furent dans la suite bien plus pénibles au pauvre homme, qui ne savait rien des laideurs de l'envie et de la haine gratuite, que toutes les privations et les luttes de sa jeunesse. Et ces attaques commencèrent aussitôt qu'il eut fait acte de compositeur, preuve évidente de sa supériorité immédiatement affirmée. On ne s'acharne pas ainsi, sans raisons, contre un débutant inconnu. Mais voilà, en même temps que la pleine nature, Bruckner apportait le catholicisme dans la Symphonie, et le monde musical viennois, étant fait de juifs, d'esprits forts ou de timides, Hanslick aussitôt renâcla, il flairait le bon Dieu et une odeur d'encens dans cette musique « panthéiste » de la façon seule que la libre pensée ne pardonne pas. Plus tard ne parlera-t-il pas de Dieu à tout bout de champs dans ces cours d'Harmonie que nous avons suivis à l'Université de Vienne ?

Le bonheur que Linz lui apportait, c'était de pouvoir se livrer exclusivement à ses belles grandes orgues et à l'étude théorique. Tous les congés dont il pouvait disposer, il les passait régulièrement chez Sechter à Vienne (Sechter était professeur de contrepoint au Conservatoire : Schubert avait voulu être son élève. C'est lui que Bruckner devait remplacer). En 1861, Bruckner passe son examen de contrepoint au Conservatoire de Vienne. Et le Maître de chapelle de la Cour, Herbeck, épouvanté de sa force, s'écrie : « Mais c'est lui qui devrait nous examiner ! ». Il s'est trouvé plus tard des blancs-becs effrontément curvilignes pour nier qu'il sût la musique. Lui seul ne croit pas à sa Maîtrise, il étudie encore 2 ans, l'orchestration surtout, de sorte qu'il a 40 ans lorsqu'il se juge digne d'entreprendre une grande œuvre. C'est en 1864. Son dernier acte de composition devait être une prière et un chant de résignation. Sa Ire œuvre fut sa Ire Messe, celle en ré mineur. Et lorsqu'il apprend à connaître (on ignore au juste quand) l'œuvre de Wagner, mais il est de fait qu'en 1865, il se rend à Munich pour la première de « Tristan », il est du moins prouvé que son éducation musicale était achevée. La fraîcheur de son âme, la naïveté de son imagination, la piété sans exemple qui le soutenait, devaient lui permettre d'absorber le « philtre d'amour » sans en être troublé. Tout ce que Wagner mettait au service de ses passions, Bruckner allait lui le mettre également au service de la sienne. Mais la sienne était Dieu. Cependant, il restera toute sa vie reconnaissant au chantre d'Isolde et de Brunehilde de lui avoir appris jusqu'à quelle intensité la musique permet de pousser l'expression de l'amour. Les autres musiciens religieux feront de la musique d'église qui se confinera à la tribune de l'orgue. Le cri d'amour de Bruckner remplira la coupole céleste. Et, dans sa musique d'église à lui, jamais une sèche formule ne contiendra l'élan de son cœur. Pour d'autres, le texte de la Messe sera une entrave ; Bruckner en possède toutes les significations cachées, il s'en fera des ailes et s'envolera dans l'azur. C'est la musique qui traduisait les élans et les effusions de Sainte-Thérèse, ou le livre de l'Ami et de l'Aimé du bienheureux Raymond Lulle ; aussi n'a-t-elle rien de scolastique, de pédant, de momifié ... Tout y vit en une perpétuelle procession de Fête-Dieu ... Et c'est la toute-splendeur de la nature entière qu'il enferme dans sa prière ; il se sert des moyens du bon Dieu pour louer le bon Dieu. Il est de la lignée de Saint-François d'Assise encore bien plus que des mystiques espagnols. Son catholicisme est un acte d'amour perpétuel, et son âme musicale, un continuel sourire heureux. Et il sera bien étrange de constater que les œuvres musicales les plus empassionnées du XIXe siècle le sont de l'amour de Dieu. Et, en cet amour, les Symphonies et les Messes de Bruckner égalent et surpassent les actes les plus redoutables de Wagner en leurs amours à eux !

Et puisque j'ai parlé des rapports de Wagner et de Bruckner, il faut se garder d'exagérer leur influence sur le Symphoniste autrichien. Si Wagner n'avait pas existé, il n'y aurait pas grand' chose, peut-être rien, de changé dans l'œuvre de Bruckner : la dédicace de la 3e Symphonie tout au plus ; l'un et l'autre continuent Beethoven et bifurquent comme 2 frères d'égal génie qui s'en vont chacun à leurs affaires, l'un à son théâtre, l'autre à son église. Ce qui ressemble le plus à Parsifal est un « Tantum ergo » de Bruckner, de 1846, 30 ans donc avant l'ouverture du Théâtre de Bayreuth et 36 avant « Parsifal » . Il est même possible que Wagner l'ait connu, le terrible homme qui se servait de tout et de tous et ne rendait rien à personne, comme il connaissait l'Amen de Dresde et la Symphonie de la Réformation de Mendelssohn, où cet Amen, qui devint le thème du Graal, joue le rôle que l'on sait. Il reste certain que Wagner et Bruckner ont ceci de commun : l'orchestration la plus pleine, la plus dense, la plus charnue, si j'ose ainsi dire, qu'on ait entendue depuis Beethoven et Schubert. Bruckner n'a rien d'un ascète. Sa foi lui procure des jouissances surhumaines, et sa musique exprime ces jouissances. Elle ne se mortifie jamais. Au contraire, rien n'est assez beau, assez riche, assez grandiose pour la célébration de sa foi. Écrire une Symphonie pour Bruckner, je le répète, c'est faire honneur à Dieu des moyens que Dieu lui avait donnés. Il n'entendait pas « au jour du jugement dernier être traité de ' Lumpen ' (vagabond, paresseux) » .

Peu après la connaissance de Wagner, Bruckner, enfin, s'installe à Vienne. En 1867, Herbeck l'appelle à la chapelle de la Cour, après la mort de Sechter, et lui obtient au Conservatoire la place de professeur d'orgue, d'harmonie et de contrepoint. Dès ce moment, les tribulations vont commencer. L'illustre compositeur n'aura plus une minute de paix, plus une joie sans mélange. En apparence, tout allait bien, ou plutôt jamais les choses n'avaient si bien été. En 1869, Bruckner entreprend même le voyage de Nancy, à l'occasion du concours international des organistes ; il les surpassa tous, connut des triomphes à Paris, surtout pour ses improvisations. En 1871, il va à Londres, où il donne 11 concerts, et, après ces 2 voyages, il est classé le 1er organiste de son temps. Cependant, dès son arrivée à Vienne, le Maître passait par de pénibles luttes intérieures. La Ire Symphonie n'eut, à Linz, en 1868, aucun succès : trop modeste pour en accuser la seule exécution ou le manque de préparation du public, Bruckner commence à douter de lui-même et détruit sa vraie seconde Symphonie. Il ne retrouve quelque confiance et réconfort que dans la composition de sa formidable grande Messe en fa mineur (1868) , l'une de ses œuvres capitales. Je sors de l'entendre pour la seconde fois, sous la direction de Mottl. C'est le plus saisissant, le plus passionné commentaire du texte liturgique qui ait jamais été écrit. La belle Cantate du Vendredi-Saint de Max Reger procédera tout entière du « Et crucifixus » du Credo. Et j'aime citer le nom de Reger après celui de Mahler pour montrer que, tandis que l'influence de Brahms reste stérile, quelque chose de Bruckner se retrouve dans les plus grandes musiques de l'Allemagne d'aujourd'hui. En 1869 paraît sa 3e Messe, en mi mineur, pour chœur à 8 voix et orchestre d'instruments à vent. Mais, de longtemps, il ne se hasarderait pas à tenter une Symphonie autrement que pour détruire immédiatement ses projets. Enfin, la seconde actuelle vit tout de même le jour pendant l'hiver 1871-1872. Il s'y efforce à la plus grande simplicité, pour en faciliter l'exécution et l'acceptation. Vains efforts. La Philharmonie de Vienne se refuse, comme elle se refusera, plus tard, devant la Penthésilée d'Hugo Wolf. Le pauvre Bruckner trouve enfin une occasion de la faire entendre aux fêtes de clôture de l'Exposition internationale de Vienne. Alors Hanslick entre en scène. Il arrête le compte rendu du concert au moment de la Symphonie pour ne pas repenser à l'affront qui avait été fait à la salle du « Musikverein ». C'était un arrêt de mort. Il faut entendre cette adorable 2e, toute pénétrée d'enthousiasme pour la patrie autrichienne et les heures de gloire vers lesquelles elle paraissait marcher, pour comprendre la véritable mauvaise action dont le tout-puissant Hanslick endossait la responsabilité. On raconte que son nom faillit remplacer celui de Beckmesser dans la partition des « Maîtres-chanteurs ». Wagner eut raison de placer son dédain du critique au-dessus de cette vengeance. Les choses portent leur justice en soi. Le jugement de Hanslick est pour son dam inséparable à tout jamais de la 2e Symphonie. Le célèbre critique juif a d'autres piloris. Il ne lui reste que l'amitié de Brahms. Le souvenir de cette amitié plutôt. Car l'œuvre est morte. Cette critique est aujourd'hui illisible : elle ne contient ni un aperçu, ni une vue d'ensemble. C'est du papier noirci de méchancetés ou de compliments également banals. On ne s'explique pas le poids qu'elle a eu sur les opinions de contemporains. Il est certain que Francisque Sarcey fut un aigle auprès de Hanslick. Observons qu'en 1873, Brahms n'avait pas encore écrit de Symphonie ; mais il s'y apprêtait. Il fallait qu'il trouvât le terrain déblayé et que Hans de Bülow pût parler d'une « 10e de Beethoven » et lancer ses fameux « 3 B ». Elles étaient faites depuis longtemps les 10e, 11e et 12e de Beethoven quand la 1re de Brahms parut ! Et les « 3 grands B » de la musique, nous les avons ramassés. Oui, oui. Mais Bach, Beethoven et Bruckner, et non Brahms. Aujourd'hui, il est évident que, si l'on fait rendre leur suc dernier à la vendange de sottises qui ont été écrites sur Bruckner, le résidu est ceci : « Il fut un catholique. » .

Il nous appartient, soyons-en fier ! On a essayé de nous enlever Beethoven ; il serait trop ridicule qu'on essayât de Bruckner. Nos ennemis doivent être aujourd'hui bien embarrassés de leur ouvrage ! On a encore prétendu qu'à peine apparues les Symphonies de Brahms, on avait été obligé de cesser de jouer celles de Bruckner ; qu'elles ne supportaient pas la comparaison. Et aujourd'hui donc ? On voit ce qui arrive lorsqu'un directeur les produit côte à côte. Du reste, Bruckner cette fois ne se laissait plus décourager. Il comprenait qu'il s'agissait de gravir un chemin de croix. Il avait, du reste, entendu son ancien examinateur, Herbeck, après la répétition de cette seconde, s'écrier : « Si Brahms était en état d'écrire une Symphonie comme celle-là, la salle croulerait d'applaudissements. » .

Et 8 Symphonies vont se succéder sans jamais obtenir à Vienne leur exécution par la Philharmonie. C'est une guerre à mort contre le pauvre Bruckner. En tapant sur lui, on croit abattre Wagner. Wagner, derrière ce large rempart, s'en rit. De temps en temps, il donne un encouragement platonique, mais il se garde bien de faire exécuter, en Allemagne, une seule Symphonie. Bruckner jamais ne répond, jamais ne se défend, jamais ne tente la moindre contre-mine. Il succombe et pleure en silence. C'est d'abord le Conservatoire qu'on lui rend impossible. Il est obligé de résigner ses fonctions. L'Empereur le veut une fois décorer, Hanslick agite tant et si bien, que François-Joseph craint de se rendre impopulaire en poursuivant son dessein. L'application du clan Brahms (et comme il contenait tous les juifs et toute la haute finance de Vienne, il était aussi agissant que possible ; jugez-en par l'affaire Dreyfus) semble n'avoir pas d'autre préoccupation que d'évincer en tout et partout l'infortuné vieillard. Et voici que, malgré tout, son mérite pourtant forçait les murailles de l'Inpace où on cherchait à le claquemurer. Wagner avait accepté une dédicace. La jeunesse venait à lui. Hugo Wolf osait se réclamer de lui. Mahler, sans être directement son élève, tournait autour de lui, subissait son influence, réduisait à 4 mains une de ses Symphonies. En 1884-1885 même des Israélites hors de Vienne commencent à le porter au pavois. Nikisch et Levi donnent sa 7e à Leipzig et à Munich. Depuis 1875, il a trouvé une pitié en l'archiduchesse Marie-Valérie ; grâce à elle on lui a, malgré toutes les oppositions, accordé un cours d'harmonie de 2 heures le lundi soir à l'Université, dans cette même salle où les mardis, jeudis et samedis professe Hanslick. Et c'est là que nous l'allâmes rejoindre en 1888. Nous eûmes sa dernière leçon en 1896. En 1891, on l'avait nommé Docteur honoraire de cette même Université : il était assez humble de cœur pour en être fier. Et, enfin, quand la 8e Symphonie parut, Bruckner eut la satisfaction si longtemps désirée ... La Philharmonie l'exécuta. Seul Hanslick ne désarma point et mourut dans l'impénitence finale.

Voilà, à grands traits, la biographie du Symphoniste autrichien qu'il reste à la France, et qu'il serait l'honneur des catholiques de tous pays de célébrer dans leurs églises par l'exécution de plus en plus fréquente de ses 3 Messes, de ses 4 Graduels, de son 150e Psaume, du 114e, dont Monsieur Auguste Göllerich a donné une analyse si serrée dans un des derniers numéros de la revue « Die Musik », ou de son formidable « Te Deum ». Pour être complet dans l'indication des œuvres de Bruckner, signalons encore un grand chœur d'hommes avec solo de ténor sur le poème « Rêves et Veilles », de Grillparzer, 2 autres chœurs avec solide baryton et de ténor, la grande cantate « Helgoland », « le Cantique des Cantiques » pour chœurs d'hommes, ténor et orchestre, le lied « En Avril », d'après Geibel, un « Minuit », autre chœur sur un texte de Joseph Mendelssohn, un Quintette fameux, et un « Souvenir » pour piano, trouvé dans ses papiers après sa mort. Nous croyons être complet. Les œuvres posthumes seront assez nombreuses ; la piété de ses admirateurs, naturellement moins sévère à l'égard des moindres productions de Bruckner que Bruckner lui-même, nous réserve de grandes surprises. Comme tous les artistes, Bruckner était souvent tenté de détruire des choses excellentes. En tous cas, le soin de ces publications est entre bonnes mains : Messieurs Ferdinand Löwe, Auguste Stradal et August Göllerich sont des musiciens, pianistes et chefs d'orchestre de 1er ordre.

Et maintenant, il ne s'agit pas de terminer sans essayer de donner quelque idée de cette musique prodigieuse. Elle est si solide, si infrangible en son armature et pourtant si grandiose dans l'imprévu de ses développements, que Monsieur Marcel Montandon a pu lui appliquer à merveille les paroles de l'abbé Maury sur Bossuet : « Ses plans sont ordinairement vastes et heureux. On conçoit aisément qu'il ne peut guère se renfermer que dans un grand espace : encore cet espace est-il souvent trop étroit et son génie en sort comme par bonds. C'est ordinairement dans ses épisodes, ou, si l'on veut, dans ses écarts, qu'il est sublime ; mais alors l'admiration qu'il inspire justifie l'irrégularité de sa marche et fait sentir vivement le besoin qu'il avait de prendre son essor pour mettre ses sentiments ou ses idées en liberté. » . C'est dans ces élans passionnés, ces progressions à couper l'haleine, que le critique moderne a voulu voir quelque chose de bachique et de panthéiste ! Il a des fanfares radieuses qu'il écrivait en pensant à l'archange Saint-Michel, son « meilleur ami après le bon Dieu » ! Il a des arrêts subits en pleine fureur orchestrale, en plein délire imaginatif, où on l'entend murmurer une prière, un petit bout de choral. On pense à ces chapelles dans la forêt et à ces crucifix cloués aux arbres de son pays. Dès que quelque chose de trop profane lui paraît avoir passé dans son inspiration, vite un petit exorcisme. Du reste, il est parfaitement en règle avec sa conscience, et la joie sonne chez lui comme chez Beethoven, colossale, délirante, mais ingénue ; paysanne, mais jamais grossière : pleine de saillie, de chaleur et d'humour, jamais méchante ; malicieuse, bonhominique, jamais vulgaire. Bref, il sait se réjouir comme un Saint. Et à entendre les éclats de cette joie, surtout réservés à ses « scherzos », il arrive qu'on reste étourdi et qu'on se regarde, n'en revenant pas. Comment a-t-il pu trouver cela ? C'est à la fois d'un enfant et c'est à faire crier d'admiration les professionnels. Nous avons, Dieu merci, entendu pas mal de musiques modernes en tous pays ces 30 dernières années. Mais, venons-nous à prendre contact avec une nouvelle Symphonie de Bruckner, nous demeurons stupides à l'ouïe de ces accents, qui ne ressemblent encore à rien tant d'années après leur éclosion ! C'est encore et toujours ce mystérieux mot de génie qui dit tout mais n'explique rien, qu'il faut prononcer. Et, qu'on me permette de le faire observer, l'imagination d'un vieillard, je ne dis pas seulement chaste, mais vierge, se conserve autrement fraîche, vigoureuse et exaltée que celle du commun des mortels. On vante la nouveauté de vision des peintres impressionnistes ; pour un peu, on parlerait d'œil nouveau comme d'art nouveau. Or un esprit qui jamais n'a été attentif qu'à la beauté du ciel, du fleuve et de la montagne, des fleurs et des insectes, aux grandes cérémonies du culte sous les voûtes heureuses des belles églises d'Autriche, et dont la pensée se repaissait de Dieu sans cesse et avec la profondeur dont témoignent le Gloria et le Credo de la grande Messe en fa mineur, ne pouvait mettre dans ses conceptions qu'un reflet direct de la divinité. C'est ainsi que, le plus naturellement du monde, Bruckner écrivait, avec l'aisance d'un qui disposerait de Beethoven en lui, des choses qu'aucun autre au monde n'aurait pu écrire, puisqu'il y fallait le concours de ces 5 éléments : un tel amour de Dieu, une telle science, le paysage autrichien, une absolue virginité d'âme, et une ignorance absolue de tout ce qui aurait pu ternir cette fraîcheur de pensée et de sensation, s'interposer entre son Créateur et lui, entre lui et sa musique.

On lui a reproché des maladresses, surtout dans les surprenantes et complexes « Durchführungen », de ses énormes lents mouvements de Symphonie, et ce sont les mêmes gens qui se pâment d'admiration devant la sèche rhétorique de Brahms. Bruckner était tout aussi savant en contrepoint que Brahms, mais il n'avait pas de curiosité d'archéologue : il ne lui serait jamais venu à l'esprit de pasticher la passacaille de Bach dans un Finale de Symphonie, ni d'écrire des variations sur un thème d'Haydn. Il s'épanchait dans son œuvre et ne s'exerçait pas à des formules mortes ; il avait bien autre chose à faire : exprimer le trop-plein d'amour et d'enthousiasme dont son cœur débordait, se donner toute la joie musicale qu'il était capable d'éprouver. C'était l'esprit se bâtissant un corps ; l'âme se créant un domaine préparatoire au Paradis. Ah ! celui-là ne faisait ni mathématiques, ni mécanique, ni horlogerie, niorfèverie. Mais il faisait sa prière. Il a le lyrisme épique. Il lui faut les grandes proportions, tout l'espace possible, car il a tant à dire. Il n'a jamais fini de raconter encore et encore ce que les beaux thèmes signifient. Il porte un monde intérieur dont il aspire à communiquer la splendeur à ses frères. C'est d'une bien autre importance que de collectionner des curiosités de forme, des petites finesses de métier, des roueries archaïques, de se créer un vocabulaire difficile et d'aligner de petits fragments de soi sous diverses rubriques, au lieu de vivre une belle vie de chêne ou de fleuve. Bruckner auprès de Brahms, c'est le grand souffle de Victor Hugo auprès de la patiente émaillerie cloisonnée de Théophile Gautier ; c'est surtout le beau chevalier de Wagner auprès des « Maîtres-chanteurs » ; mais si Hanslick remplace Beckmesser, c'est Dieu qui remplace Eva !

J'ai dit la bonne humeur de fête populaire de ses « scherzos » ; il faudrait célébrer d'une tout autre façon ses andante, ses adagio. On l'a dit : la passion sous forme de repos. Et s'évaguant dans des paysages aux multiples plans avec des échappées subites sur des lointains radieux et d'intimes rêveries sous bois. C'est ici que le parallèle avec Brahms devient passionnant. Bien de plus étriqué que l'andante de Brahms auprès de celui de Bruckner. Presque pas de paysage chez l'un ; partout, l'état d'âme éprouvé dans de beaux sites autrichiens chez le second. Quant à ses triomphants Finales, conclusions merveilleuses de l'œuvre total, qui reçoivent toute leur signification de l'ensemble, Monsieur Max Morold leur a consacré une importante étude dans le second des numéros spéciaux que la belle revue berlinoise « Die Musik » a consacrés au Maître ; nous y renvoyons les curieux. De son côté, Monsieur Marcel Montandon vante « les motifs colossaux qu'il échafaudait dans ses Finales à 2, 3 ou 4 étages » .

Chose digne de remarque, c'est l'abus que nous faisons tous du nom de Beethoven dès que les enthousiastes parlent de Bruckner ou de Brahms ou de Wagner. Si tous trois sont également fils de Beethoven, ils ne sont point de la même mère ! Et l'on pourrait facilement démontrer que la musique de Wagner applique l'éducation reçue de Beethoven à la sensualité la plus violente ; Brahms, à la plus sèche abstraction ; Bruckner, au plus beau, au plus noble enthousiasme de l'âme, éprise de son créateur, et cherchant sa louange dans la création entière. Wagner, en composant, apaise et excite ses propres passions ; Brahms se complait à son érudition, décharge sa mauvaise humeur et pédantise ; Bruckner prie, adore, pleure et rit dans la main de Dieu et s'entretient de sa création avec lui dans la seule langue qu'il sache. Il lui confie tout : la lutte et les rancœurs, comme son amour et le bonheur qu'il éprouve à aimer ainsi ; et qu'il trouve le printemps exquis cette année et que les églises pleines d'encens sont traversées de prismes lumineux aux irisations miraculeuses, et qu'à l'auberge du village, les paysans dansent des « Ländler » bien rythmés de coups de talon et de claquements des mains sur les cuisses. Et il passe ainsi sans transition des plus hautes contemplations de sa foi sereine aux plus familiers détails de la vie provinciale, et l'œuvre s'anime dans toutes ses parties, se fait la mouvante, la vivante cathédrale plus ou moins fleurie et pleine d'oiseaux enchantés qu'est toute Symphonie. Jamais plus d'air, plus de lumière, plus de liberté et plus d'aisance n'étaient entrés dans cette forme qui permet tout aux génies et n'entrave que les médiocres.

Monsieur Rudolf Louis, seul, a la tendance de faire de ces 9 Symphonies un bloc à part dans toute l'histoire de la musique : c'est que sa précautieuse timidité est gênée par ce bloc. D'après lui, Bruckner ne viendrait pas de Beethoven et ne serait pas le père de Mahler, puisqu'il ne le serait de personne. Ce qui l'isolerait, je le sais bien, moi, et l'ai déjà dit. En outre, Monsieur Louis croit devoir excuser Bruckner d'avoir été un paysan, d'avoir manqué d'éducation ; à l'entendre, les Symphonies manqueraient de belles manières. Certes, elles ne portent ni gants, ni bottines vernies, ni sous-pieds ... Ce n'est la coutume, je crois, ni de la Pastorale ni de l'Héroïque. Et je pense que Beethoven lui-même n'était pas d'un abord si plein d'urbanité. Serait-ce peut-être que Brahms eût pu donner des leçons de politesse, de bonne tenue et d'atticisme à Bruckner ?

Qu'auraient-elles à faire des convenances, ces Symphonies, qui sont la nature elle-même dans toute son âpreté comme dans toutes ses grâces ?

En revanche, dans sa musique religieuse, Bruckner, seul de tous les grands Maîtres allemands, a l'air parfaitement chez lui à l'église. La « Missa solemnis » est surtout une bataille, un prodigieux effort de volonté. C'est une Héroïque de plus. Et c'est une Sixtine si l'on veut. Les Messes de Mozart et de Haydn sont souvent, sous leurs atours mondains, pleines de piété, mais sans vraie profondeur religieuse. Les Messes de Beethoven, à leur suite, seront purement humaines. Bruckner, lui, a naturellement le sens du divin. Il est le seul musicien qui aurait pu écrire la musique d'un paradis vraiment paradisiaque, difficulté ou plutôt impossibilité devant laquelle Liszt a reculé dans sa « Dante Symphonie », où il sut si bien représenter l'enfer ! Il se comporte dans ses Messes et son « Te Deum », en dehors du sentiment magnifique qui les inspire, en grandiose décorateur. Si l'on peut un moment se distraire de l'inconcevable émotion religieuse qu'il produit, il faut rendre justice au prodigieux artiste instinctif. C'est une marée diluvienne d'amour, de piété, d'effusion mystique qui déferle avec les masses chorales ; il y a des méditations prolongées et des oraisons jaculatoires ; il y a de tristes retours sur soi-même et des élans de reconnaissance où l'on sent la créature éperdue se rouler dans le sein de Dieu. Mais par-dessous ces chants, qu'il faut pour la piété ajouter aux plus belles pages catholiques qui aient été écrites, fût-ce l'imitation, règne l'ordonnance souveraine d'un organisateur de grandes pompes religieuses. L'orchestre encadre le flot de voix de dessins indéfiniment répétés, d'arabesques constantes. La même figure d'accompagnement sousbase le « Te Deum » entier, et cette figure répercute les 2 Ires mesures de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven et semble souder les 2 œuvres.

Et maintenant, je crois en avoir assez dit, non pas, hélas ! pour avoir expliqué Bruckner et son œuvre, ni même pour en avoir donné une idée suffisante, mais simplement pour avoir appris à quelques catholiques de plus une immense gloire catholique. Pour me résumer, je dirai : Qu'on imagine un Hello paysan, avec du soleil dans le cœur et de beaux paysages montagneux et forestiers dans les yeux, qui serait un grand poète, un grand créateur et qui disposerait d'une sorte d'omnipotence musicale, et l'on sera bien près de se représenter Bruckner. Il y a quelques mois, dans une bibliographie, une objection m'avait été posée : Comment pouvais-je mettre cet inconnu ou ce méconnu qui a eu nom Bruckner à la même hauteur d'admiration que Bach ou Beethoven. Il y avait quelqu'un qui aurait pu répondre à cette question avec les ressources d'une érudition musicale plus complète que la mienne : mon ami Monsieur Marcel Montaudan, et je l'en avais prié. Mais puisque j'avais été mis en cause, je me suis décidé à m'expliquer moi-même. Je tenais du reste à avoir dit une bonne fois à un public catholique qui est Bruckner. J'ai mis à le faire tout mon cœur et toute ma bonne volonté, et j'ose espérer que ces quelques pages auraient été une joie pour le bon vieux Maître qui, sa vie durant, ne fut jamais gâté. Aujourd'hui, nous sommes 100 et sommes 1,000 à chanter quelque chose qui voudrait être son « Te Deum » en remerciement du grand don qui a été fait à la terre de sa personne. Mais c'est trop tard. Il a appris à ne plus se soucier de l'opinion de Monsieur Hanslick. Et j'ai la ferme confiance que nous pouvons lui demander de prier pour nous.

Une Symphonie de Anton Bruckner

Un article de Jean Saint-Jean paru en 1908, dans la « Nouvelle Revue », année 29, tome 4.

Monsieur Louis Hasselmans, dont la jeune et déjà parfaite Maîtrise de chef d'orchestre s'est affirmée cette année encore avec éclat, nous a donné récemment la Ire audition d'une Symphonie de Bruckner, la 8e, en ut mineur. Depuis le dimanche de mai 1894, où Charles Lamoureux, jouant du Bruckner pour la Ire fois en France, nous avait fait entendre la 3e Symphonie, les œuvres du Maître autrichien n'avaient pas une fois reparu dans nos concerts ; comme tout s'oublie vite, et qu'il y a 14 ans de cela, on ne connaissait plus chez nous que le nom (et encore !) de celui que l'Allemagne considère aujourd'hui comme un des plus grands musiciens de l'époque moderne. Monsieur Louis Hasselmans a voulu combler cette lacune, secouer notre indifférence à l'égard de Bruckner et nous a révélé une de ses Symphonies les plus monumentales : événement musical important. Le jeune chef d'orchestre a magnifiquement mené à bout cette entreprise : son excellente exécution chaleureuse, lyrique, intelligente et précise suffira-t-elle à amener le public français au culte de Bruckner ? À vrai dire, j'en doute un peu, et je le regrette ; mais ce n'est pas impossible. Il en sera peut-être de la France comme de l'Allemagne, où Bruckner ne s'est pas imposé du 1er coup ; il y fut longtemps, non seulement ignoré, mais méprisé et haï ; sa mort même ne désarma pas l'hostilité générale ; il n'y a guère plus de 4 à 5 ans que le vent a tourné. Aujourd'hui, il est pour l'Allemagne le « Symphoniste de l'avenir », il entre dans la gloire. Ce revirement s'est produit dans des conditions si singulières, si paradoxales, que pour en saisir toute la saveur, il est nécessaire de donner sur la vie et l'œuvre du Maître quelques brèves indications.

Anton Bruckner, né à Ansfelden, en 1824, est le seul parmi les grands musiciens qui soit presque entièrement autodidacte. Son père, pauvre Maître d'école d'un village de la Haute-Autriche, lui enseigna tout ce qu'il savait de musique (pas grand chose : les rudiments) ; jusqu'à l'âge de 33 ans, Bruckner n'eut pour ainsi dire pas d'autre Maître. Ces 33 premières années de sa vie furent misérables et difficiles. Recueilli par charité, il fut successivement enfant de chœur, Maître d'études suppléant, organiste provisoire au chapitre de Saint-Florian ; sans se laisser décourager par ces débuts pénibles, Bruckner travaillait sans relâche. Enfin, en 1856, il passa un brillant concours, et fut nommé peu de temps après organiste à la cathédrale de Linz. Cette situation sinon lucrative, du moins indépendante, lui permit de se rendre de temps en temps à Vienne, pour travailler le contrepoint avec Simon Sechter et la composition avec Otto Kitzler. Quelques années plus tard, à la mort de Sechter, la recommandation d'amis dévoués le fit nommer organiste de la Chapelle de la Cour à Vienne ; puis professeur de composition, d'orgue et de contrepoint au Conservatoire de cette ville. Il conserva ces fonctions jusqu'à sa mort qui survint en 1896 ; il avait composé, outre un Quintette à cordes, 1 cantate pour chœur d'hommes, 3 Messes et des morceaux de musique religieuse, 9 grandes Symphonies.

Voilà bien, n'est-il pas vrai, la vie la moins Romanesque et la moins agitée, la plus sereine et la plus paisible qui soit ; c'est un peu la vie de César Franck chez nous, vie noble et digne, vie pieuse et mystique, partagée entre la tribune de l'orgue, et la chambre où le Maître enseignait ses élèves, selon son cœur. Bruckner et Franck furent les hommes de cette vie ; leur modestie et leur bonté sont pareilles, de même que leur esprit et que leurs cœurs. La persécution ne s'attacha pas à Franck comme à Bruckner ; mais il est probable que le « Pater seraphicus » l'eût supportée comme « le bon vieil Anton », avec douceur et simplicité. Car la vie de Bruckner ne fut paisible qu'à la surface ; Bruckner fut persécuté, littéralement persécuté, et cela depuis le jour où il arriva pour la 1re fois à faire jouer une œuvre de lui : c'était en 1884, le musicien avait 60 ans, et c'était déjà sa « 7e » Symphonie. La guerre commença aussitôt.

Les rares ouvrages français qui consacrent à Bruckner une notice biographique toujours très courte, disent simplement : « Il fut très discuté ; dans l'Allemagne du sud, on l'opposa à Brahms, apprécié surtout dans l'Allemagne du nord. » . Cela n'est exact qu'en apparence ; en tout cas, c'est insuffisant. Il est certain qu'on l'opposa à Brahms, ou plutôt que Brahms lui fut opposé ; mais il ne faudrait pas croire que la persécution musicale dirigée contre Bruckner soit née d'une lutte de l'esprit musical allemand contre l'esprit musical autrichien : elle est uniquement née d'une lutte nationaliste et religieuse. Bruckner était ardent catholique, et bon allemand, mais pas allemand dans le sens prussien, dans le sens « Los von Rom », allemand autrichien et ultra-montain. Après le bon Dieu, auquel il dédia sa 9e Symphonie, (« dem lieben Gott ») le vieil organiste ne tenait à rien tant qu'à son Autriche. Ses opinions étaient trop connues et trop nettes ; il ne les avait pas affichées, mais sa vie si franche, si « transparente », les avait démontrées : toute la bande juive, protestante, universitaire, libre-penseuse de Berlin, se dressa immédiatement contre lui. L'art, qui n'a pas de patrie, devrait encore moins avoir de Parti ; en France, les antipathies musicales sont (ou ont été) quelquefois aussi, dictées par des motifs tout à fait étrangers à l'art, cela est très regrettable ; mais chez nous, au moins, ces antipathies n'ont jamais dégénéré en lutte, encore moins en persécution, marquée surtout de ce cachet de férocité et de haine qui a caractérisé la cabale menée contre Bruckner. Ce fut Hanslick, haineux porte-parole de Brahms et de son clan judéo-allemand qui mena la chasse ; il y mit un acharnement incroyable, et fut réellement le bourreau de l'humble compositeur. Il ne discutait pas, il injuriait ; il ne critiquait pas seulement les œuvres, il insultait leur auteur : il trouvait ainsi de plus nombreuses occasions d'assommer son adversaire, car l'animosité du Prince des critiques contre le musicien, ayant effrayé les chefs d'orchestre, on ne jouait guère la musique de Bruckner. « Il ne s'est peut-être pas entendu 10 fois à l'orchestre », dit monsieur William Ritter. Cette lutte discourtoise manquait d'autant plus de générosité et de noblesse, que Bruckner était lui-même d'une modestie et d'une délicatesse extrêmes. Bafoué, vilipendé, il demeurait sans défense, un bon sourire aux lèvres, un peu triste cependant. Il croyait si peu à la méchanceté de ses adversaires, qu'il ne mit jamais en doute leur bonne foi ; il finit une fois par se persuader que leurs attaques étaient justifiées, et, modestement, il brûla une 10e Symphonie qu'il venait d'écrire, se croyant sincèrement un imbécile en musique ; on le lui avait reproché si souvent. Il en souffrait d'ailleurs moins dans son orgueil que dans sa dignité. Un jour, après l'audition d'une de ses Symphonies à Vienne, Bruckner fut reçu en audience privée par l'Empereur ; celui-ci qui estimait le caractère de l'homme autant que le génie de l'artiste, lui demanda : « Que puis-je faire pour vous ? » . Le bon Bruckner ne trouva d'abord rien à répondre ; mais se souvenant qu'Hanslick venait de faire sur lui un article encore plus violent que d'habitude, dans lequel il était dit qu'une salle de concert avait été souillée par sa musique, il formula seulement ce vœu charmant : « Sire, obtenez que monsieur Hanslick, lorsqu'il parle de moi, soit un peu plus objectif. » .

À la mort de Bruckner, et surtout à celle de Hanslick, la lutte cessa d'exister. Les élèves du Maître, Löwe, Göllerich, etc. , peu à peu firent entendre cette musique si longtemps méprisée. Linz fut le berceau de ce culte nouveau. Un « Festival Bruckner » y fut organisé en 1902 ; en 1904, la même ville vota une rente, destinée à subvenir aux frais d'exécution des œuvres de Bruckner, par la Société musicale de Linz, pendant un période de 20 années. Ce revirement fit rentrer en eux-mêmes les anciens adversaires du Maître défunt. Les chefs d'orchestre du nord, qui avaient aboyé contre lui à la suite de Hanslick, tentèrent de s'annexer le vieux compositeur ; bonnes âmes, ils se hâtèrent de passer l'éponge sur les querelles d'autrefois, et aujourd'hui, le mot est donné : par tous les moyens, on veut arracher Bruckner, comme on l'a fait de Beethoven, à toute religion de forme définie, en particulier à celle pour laquelle il souffrit la persécution ; et oubliant ou ignorant qu'il faut, pour interpréter exactement sa musique, comprendre, sinon partager son sens catholique, le Parti judéo-allemand s'est approprié l'admirable et déconcertant bonhomme. Dans quelques années, il sera persuadé l'avoir découvert et l'avoir soutenu toute sa vie. C'est toujours amusant.

Quoiqu'il en soit, Bruckner mort conquiert aujourd'hui l'Allemagne, et par un juste retour des choses d'ici bas, prend la place de Brahms dans la fameuse trinité des « B » (Bach - Beethoven - Bruckner) . Et mieux on le connaît, plus on voit clairement qu'il était inutile de recourir à des griefs politiques ou religieux pour l'opposer au musicien de Hambourg. Brahms, Classique de seconde main, a continué Beethoven, comme une photographie sèche et précise continue un paysage plein de vie. Privé de toute émotion intérieure, il prétend néanmoins à la profondeur ; mais c'est par le moyen de cette « complication pâteuse et vainc, qui n'est qu'une forme difficile de la facilité » ; et il se perd dans une nuageuse emphase, dans une sentimentalité fade, dans une lourde redondance où sombrent les substantielles qualités de la musique allemande d'autrefois. Bruckner, tout débordant d'une noble sensibilité, a dépouillé l'appareil extérieur et personnel de la tradition Classique ; mais quoique libéré, il en reste le fils. Il n'a pas pris comme Wagner « le torrent de la Symphonie pour le jeter dans le lit du poème dramatique » ; il a laissé dans son lit le torrent symphonique, mais il l'a formidablement élargi. Extérieurement d'abord. Les Symphonies de Bruckner sont la 1^{re} indication ou le 1^{er} exemple de cet art gigantesque, anormal, qui fait éclater les orchestres, les heures et les nerfs, de ce style « kolossal » qui sévit aujourd'hui en Allemagne, favorisé par un dédain du temps, de la mesure et du goût, si bien congénital à la race qu'un esprit sacrilège pourrait en relever des traces dans le grand Jean-Sébastien Bach lui-même. Assurément, Bruckner a été dépassé et les musiciens allemands d'aujourd'hui, Gustav Mahler par exemple, écrivent des Symphonies ou des poèmes symphoniques dont les dimensions sont beaucoup plus considérables ; certaines Symphonies récentes ont une durée qui dépasse 2 heures, et leur orchestration comprend tellement d'instruments de familles différentes que le format de leur partition d'orchestre doit ressembler à celui du grand livre de la dette publique.

Tout en étant moins démesurées, les Symphonies de Bruckner n'en ont pas moins une longueur respectable ; plusieurs d'entre elles, la 5^e la 8^e et la 9^e, surtout si l'on fait suivre cette dernière de l'immense « Te Deum » qui en est la conclusion chorale rêvée par le compositeur, méritent de remplir un concert tout entier. C'est là d'ailleurs, d'après monsieur William Ritter, brucknérien fervent, la vraie façon de les faire entendre, et c'est ainsi que les donnent en Allemagne les chefs d'orchestre qui sont entrés le plus profondément dans leur absolue compréhension. Les Symphonies de Bruckner ont, en général, la forme Classique ; la 9^e est inachevée, et Bruckner exprima dans son testament le désir que son « Te Deum » en formât la 4^e partie ; mais toutes les autres possèdent les 4 parties traditionnelles qui se succèdent dans l'ordre habituel. Le 1^{er} mouvement de la 5^e, suivant un exemple donné par Beethoven dans un de ses derniers Quatuors, est formé par un Adagio alternant avec un Allegro. C'est la seule exception ; toutes les autres Symphonies suivent à peu de chose près la division ordinaire. En revanche, le développement brise à chaque instant les étroites règles Classiques ; les idées de Bruckner sont trop frémissantes de vie : elles échappent sans cesse au frein de la tonalité, et le musicien n'a plus l'air de suivre que sa fantaisie ; sa richesse d'invention est extraordinaire et, souvent, il ne sait pas la modérer ; ses idées mélodiques, qui ont une tournure quelque peu wagnérienne, sont d'une belle ampleur passionnément religieuse : « On pense à du Wagner, dit monsieur William Ritter, à toute la passion de Wagner déversée dans les interminables frises pompeuses des rubriques de Händel. » . Mais leur longueur est telle qu'on ne sait le plus souvent où finit le thème, où commence le développement. Tout cela, fantaisie du développement, luxuriante abondance des épisodes, longueur exagérée des thèmes, déconcerte et donne parfois une impression d'incohérence, d'illogisme, de gaucherie et de vide ; même parfois aussi, et le plus fréquemment, l'impression du génie tout puissant, et vainqueur souvent des règles étroites qui cherchent à le brider.

Les Allegros sont admirables, soit qu'ils mettent aux prises comme celui de la 8^e Symphonie un thème « chevaleresque, héroïque et fier avec plusieurs thèmes de fatalité » de douleur et de mort ; soit qu'ils chantent, enfiévrés de passion religieuse, le tragique combat des puissances des ténèbres contre les puissances du jour, ou qu'ils se précipitent, exultant de la joie auguste « d'un Saint-Jean écrivant une apocalypse qui serait claire et rayonnante » . Les Adagios sont des prières lentes, ferventes, des extases mystérieuses, des ravissements mystiques, des souvenirs mélancoliques et doux ; celui de la 8^e est une Symphonie funèbre et triomphale d'une beauté épique ; et les Scherzos ont une violence inouïe qui n'a d'équivalent que dans ceux, de Beethoven ; le Scherzo de notre Symphonie est un des plus caractéristiques. Les brucknériens croient que leur Maître a voulu peindre les ébats grossiers et les danses lourdes du paysan d'Autriche. C'est une phrase de Bruckner qui justifie pour eux cette interprétation. « Der deutsche Michel träumt ins Land hinaus », a-t-il dit du trio du Scherzo. Par « Deutsche Michel », le Maître entendait le bon et brave paysan qu'il avait connu dans sa province natale, et qu'il avait mis, le bizarre et pieux musicien, sous l'invocation de « son meilleur ami, l'archange Saint-Michel ». De fait, ce thème martelé, si simple et d'allure si populaire (on pense aux notes si comiquement paysannes du basson dans la danse des villageois de la « Pastorale » mais, ici, elle n'ont pas le même air placide, et sont emportées dans un furieux élan), ces octaves massives qui ont l'air de fouler lourdement le sol, évoquent bien l'idée d'une danse villageoise, qui bondit, s'échauffe, et court jusqu'à l'essoufflement. Et le Trio est une rêverie délicieuse, en pleine nature ; de lointaines sonneries de cor prolongent jusqu'à l'infini l'horizon verdoyant. Quant aux Finales, à part celui de la 4e Symphonie (dite « Romantique ») qui est une chasse étincelante et vertigineuse, Bruckner en a fait de prodigieuses apothéoses ; ils sont l'éclatant aboutissement de toute la Symphonie.

Dixit monsieur William Ritter :

« Tout (dans le cours de la Symphonie), est tenu dans une perpétuelle fluctuation des pianissimo les plus moites, les plus subtilement estompés, à un forte chaleureux, ample et sourd, très ménagé, de façon à aboutir par des gradations d'une délicatesse qui les rend à peine sensibles, des gradations qui évoluent dans l'amplitude la plus magnanime, à l'excessif du Finale où l'on atteint à une intensité de fournaise et d'éblouissement, à la plénitude d'exaltation enfin, portée comme sans s'en douter par une marée immense qui a duré tout le laps de la Symphonie. Le déluge dut monter ainsi. Et ce n'est pas autrement que cuit du lait. »

Dans le Finale de la 8e Symphonie, construit sur 2 thèmes, l'un religieux et liturgique, l'autre guerrier, une progression titanique aboutit à une solennelle apothéose : les thèmes des 4 parties de l'œuvre y réapparaissent simultanément, magnifiés, sublimés, et comme purifiés à la flamme ardente d'un brasier.

Monsieur Louis Hasselmans, je l'ai déjà dit, a donné de cette œuvre monstre, une interprétation des plus remarquables en elle-même, et qui l'est encore plus si l'on songe que pour jouer les Symphonies de Bruckner, il n'existe ni tradition, ni indication d'aucune sorte. Bruckner lui-même n'avait aucune idée bien précise sur leur exécution, ni d'intentions bien arrêtées sur leur mise au point ; il ne s'entendait jamais à l'orchestre, et composait ses œuvres magistrales un peu comme Beethoven sourd composait ses derniers Quatuors. Il y a actuellement en Allemagne 2 écoles de chefs d'orchestre brucknériens : les uns représentent la littéralité, les autres l'interprétation. Car il faut souvent choisir entre les 2. On remarque en effet dans l'orchestration d'abord (qui d'ailleurs est admirable, ample, souple et fluide), des défauts étranges, telles qu'il faut passer outre des indications, sur des choses soit inexécutables, soit contradictoires, c'est-à-dire gâchant l'effet pour lequel elles sont écrites ; il y a ensuite ces contradictions fréquentes de style et d'écriture que je n'ai fait qu'indiquer plus haut, ce conflit perpétuel entre le génie qui cherche à s'évader, et le « schulmeister » consciencieux qui se raccroche aux antiques lois : lutte émouvante, mais qui donne à l'œuvre des heurts désagréables et lui enlève parfois l'unité de son caractère. En Allemagne, monsieur August Göllerich représente la littéralité, et monsieur Alfred Westarp (pseudonyme de Victor Egon Frenzdorff) l'interprétation, encore plus dans le sens Bruckner que Bruckner lui-même n'aurait osé s'y jeter, sous prétexte que le Maître a été continuellement entravé en tout, pour tout et par tous, ce qui est vrai. L'exécution de monsieur Hasselmans, tout en demeurant aussi respectueuse que possible du texte, a été dirigée plutôt dans le sens de l'interprétation ; et il faut féliciter l'excellent chef d'orchestre d'avoir tenté de nous faire pénétrer dans l'âme candide, héroïque et sainte du vieux Bruckner.

Alfred Westarp est l'auteur de :

« L'Âme des 9 Symphonies d'Antoine Bruckner » , paru en 1911 aux Éditions de la Renaissance Contemporaine (Revue musicale de Lyon) .

Extrait au sujet de la 4e Symphonie :

« ... de la candeur, de la fraîcheur enfantines, emportés à la grande aventure mystérieuse, digne du second Acte de " Siegfried ". Et maintenant, laissez-vous aller : ne vous demandez pas s'il serait possible d'user de tours de main (ou de bâton) plus adroits ; si cette construction sonore est conforme à l'esprit français. Nous n'en avons que faire ici de l'esprit français ! un bon géant naïf nous tient par la main et nous entraîne dans un dédale de forêts, de rochers, d'où les points de vue les plus riants apparaîtront au détour des fourrés. N'exigez pas la grande route, les ponts, les hôtels et les belvédères artificiels d'un art musical qui apprend comme on apprend à devenir ingénieur à l'École centrale. Vous êtes l'hôte de la nature vierge et votre guide à l'âme pieuse, tout à la fois débonnaire et violente, et agitée d'agrestes et graves pensées d'un montagnard styrien. De sa vie entière, qui fut de 72 ans, cet homme qui dédiait ses Symphonies aux Rois, aux Empereurs et au bon Dieu, n'a jamais mis sa tête dans un chapeau haute-forme et n'a jamais eu de frac. Mais il est de la lignée des génies, spontanés et débordants ; il fait tour à tour penser si l'on veut à Rabelais (pas dans cette Symphonie-ci) , à Corneille, à Bossuet, à Rousseau, à Chateaubriand, à Balzac, tous génies français, qui n'ont pas brillé précisément par le sens bien français de la mesure et de la pondération. En quoi d'allemand et d'autrichien, quels sites, quelles architectures, on peut encore l'apparier, je l'ai assez dit ailleurs pour n'y pas revenir.

Mon Dieu ! Si vous pouviez donc jouir de l'ordre et de l'élan, de la fougue et de la tendresse qu'un Löwe, seul, sait y mettre dans ces lers morceaux brucknériens ! Alors les grandes lignes définitives apparaissant, alors l'œuvre devient invulnérable. Écoutez cet orchestre : il a été la mine inépuisable dans laquelle se sert l'art allemand contemporain. Ici, Mahler a pris telle de ses habitudes ; ailleurs, Strauß a fait sa palette. Et les spécialistes, eux, vous diront à quel point il est rigoureux, cet ordre qui règne ici, et tout le pédantisme secret de Maître d'école titan, que cache cet apparent chaos, car le génie brut d'un Bruckner se complique d'un autodidactisme étroit auquel lui seul pouvait résister et échapper. Un Alfred Westarp serait polyphone si il était exposée à la crue lumière de l'intelligence qui a été jusqu'ici ennemi mortel du sentiment musical. Nous ne nous étonnons pas que le courage disharmonique de Bruckner fût, par conséquent, un peu affaibli. Ce sont les temps présents qui y remédieront. Malgré tout, Bruckner nous a donné des polyphonies assez expressives, par exemple dans les 6e, 8e et 9e Symphonies. À mesure que ses formations mélodiques s'affinent, ses formations harmoniques se compliquent comme autant de reflets de la délicatesse de son âme qui alla grandissante pendant toute sa vie. »

John F. Berky :

Brian Lamb in the Netherlands has sent to me an interesting old concert program. The title of the booklet is simply « Anton Bruckner Fünfte Symphonie » . The author is given as Alfred Westarp. It contains about 40 pages of excerpts of the 5th Symphony with explanation notes. The booklet was to accompany a concert given in Munich, in 1907. The inside cover of the booklet is signed by Victor Egon Frensdorff on October 15, 1907. From a clipping pasted to the inside cover, it appears that the concert was not well received. Further research (my thanks to Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt) indicates that Frensdorff was the actual author of this booklet and conductor of the concert.

Alfred Westarp was a pseudonym that he used for this and other publications. Mister Korstvedt continues by stating :

« A couple of years ago, I came across a report in the " Musikalischen Wochenblatt " about a " really nasty " (" recht böse ") Bruckner concert in Munich, in late 1907, in which the Kaim Orchester performed Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 under the direction of Alfred Westarp, who is identified as the author of a " peculiar interpretative essay " that puts down in black and white a " conception " of this mighty work that so entirely loses the spirit of the music that one should hardly waste any words on it. »

« In conjunction with the concert, Westarp apparently denounced Löwe and Schalk for " falsifying " Bruckner's manuscript version of the score. Yet, in his performance, he " turned everything on its head " making fortissimi into pianissimi, etc. in a " downright unbelievable " way. The reporter, Paul Ehlers, described it as a " perverse presentation " (which evidently placed the Trio before the Scherzo (!) , as is suggested in the booklet) that did more damage to Bruckner than anything Hanslick or Dömpke ever wrote. The music examples in the brochure, which are based on the so-called Schalk version of the Symphony but with extensive changes dynamics, articulations, phrasing, and expression markings, give some idea of how aggressively Westarp monkeyed with the Symphony. He willfully manipulated the character of many passages to fit his very idiosyncratic, fanciful idea of the Symphony's meaning. It is perverse - if perhaps interesting as a historical curiosity. »

Les Apôtres de Bruckner après sa mort

In the meantime, there were still premieres to be given, and major works still to be published. Unfortunately, both performances and publications maintained an uncertain relationship to Bruckner's manuscripts.

A victim of chronic asthma, Josef Schalk outlived Bruckner by only 4 years (he suffered his 1st asthma attack in 1889 ; his health worsened in 1890 and became significantly worse in 1897) .

His brother Franz, however, continued the distinguished career that was eventually to take him to Austria's most senior musical position, Director of the Vienna « Hofoper » , via posts in Prague and the « Kapellmeistership » of the Royal Opera in Berlin. In 1930, he received the title of « Generalmusikdirektor » as a mark of esteem. He was also, because of his close personal connection to Bruckner, an « unassailable authority in all things Brucknerian » , a situation that was not to last.

Franz undoubtedly made a positive contribution to the 1st of the 3 great controversies that dominated Bruckner reception in the 20th Century, the continuing struggle over the artistic worth of Bruckner's music. That this was a struggle that Bruckner eventually won is testified to by the experiences of millions of listeners world-wide, even if Bruckner continued for a long time to be a « cause » , a composer conductors either specialized in or left alone.

In the context of the 1889 version of the 3rd Symphony, Gustav Mahler had championed Bruckner's 1877 version, but the idea of Mahler as a defender of « original versions » is unfortunately not in accordance with the facts.

Hans Pfitzner

Pour le compositeur Hans Pfitzner, Anton Bruckner était encore, un siècle plus tard, un « monstrueux dilettante » .

Pfitzner de même que d'autres musiciens de sa génération ont (injustement) accusé Anton Bruckner d'avoir composé la même Symphonie « à 9 reprises » .

D'une écriture traditionnelle, Hans Pfitzner est considéré, avec son contemporain Richard Strauß, comme un des derniers représentants du Romantisme allemand. Tous deux cherchent une voie pour dépasser l'héritage wagnérien Outre des Opéras et de la musique de scène, Hans Pfitzner a composé de nombreuses pièces pour orchestre.

5 mai 1869 : Naissance à Moscou.

Après des études de piano et de composition à Francfort, Hans Pfitzner occupe divers postes de chef d'orchestre et de professeur à Mayence, Berlin, Munich et Strasbourg.

1895 : Création à Mayence de son Opéra « Der arme Heinrich » qui est très bien accueilli. Pfitzner est vite considéré en Allemagne comme un grand compositeur national.

1917 : Création à Munich, avec un vif succès, de son Opéra « Palestrina » dirigé par Bruno Walter sur un livret d'Hans Pfitzner lui-même. Cette même année, il écrit un pamphlet contre les idées modernes en matière musicale, notamment « Futuristengefahr » dirigé contre le compositeur Ferruccio Busoni.

Après la Première Guerre mondiale, il quitte Strasbourg pour enseigner à l'Académie des Arts de Berlin.

De 1929 à 1934 : On le trouve à Munich où il enseigne la composition à l'« Akademie der Tonkunst » .

Il devient un ardent défenseur du 3e « Reich » . Une « Association Hans Pfitzner » est créée à Berlin sous la présidence de Wilhelm Fürtwängler, en 1938.

1931 : Création à Berlin de l'Opéra « Das Hertz » , où Pfitzner se révèle un maître du fantastique et du Romantisme noir.

1944 : Il dédie l'Ouverture « Krakauer Begrüssung » à Hans Franck, le gouverneur meurtrier de la Pologne occupée et bénéficie du pouvoir nazi.

1948 : Hans Pfitzner passe devant la cour de dénazification de Munich. Il est acquitté en raison de son état physique et moral très délabré et meurt dans la misère, le 22 mai 1949, à Salzburg.

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Hans Erich Pfitzner est né à Moscou, le 5 mai 1869, et est mort à Salzbourg, le 22 mai 1949. Il commence sa carrière de chef d'orchestre au théâtre de Mayence, où il fait représenter son 1er Opéra, « Der arme Heinrich » .

En 1908, il est nommé directeur du Conservatoire de Strasbourg et chef des concerts d'abonnement de l'Orchestre municipal (futur Orchestre philharmonique de Strasbourg) . En 1910, il devient également directeur artistique de l'Opéra de Strasbourg. Il quitte Strasbourg en 1919.

Sa principale œuvre dramatique, « Palestrina » , fut créée à Munich en 1917 par le chef Bruno Walter. Cette œuvre qui s'inscrit dans la tradition wagnérienne tout en rendant hommage à un des Maîtres de la polyphonie de la Renaissance se veut un manifeste contre la nouvelle musique incarnée alors par Arnold Schönberg et Ferruccio Busoni.

Hans Pfitzner est un conservateur qui se regarde volontiers comme « le dernier survivant de la musique dans un monde devenu fou » (Claude Rostand) . Il entend poursuivre par une œuvre variée et abondante, aussi bien lyrique que Symphonique, la grande tradition du Romantisme allemand. Il apparaît sur la « Sonderliste » de la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste » en 1944.

Sa famille s'étant installée à Francfort en 1872, il fit ses études au Conservatoire de cette ville avec Iwan Knorr (en théorie musicale) et James Kwast (en piano) entre 1886 et 1890, et s'y lia avec James Grun, son futur librettiste. Nommé professeur au Conservatoire de Coblenz (1892) , puis chef d'orchestre au Théâtre de Mayence (1894) , il fit représenter dans cette ville, en 1895, son 1er Opéra, « Der arme Heinrich » . Il fut ensuite professeur au Conservatoire Stern de Berlin, séjourna à Munich, puis se fixa à Strasbourg en 1908, où il cumula les postes de directeur du Conservatoire, des concerts Symphoniques et de l'Opéra.

En 1917, son œuvre dramatique la plus importante, « Palestrina » , fut créée à Munich sous la direction du chef Bruno Walter. Cette œuvre, dans la tradition de l'Opéra wagnérien en même temps qu'hommage à la polyphonie de la Renaissance et à l'un de ses plus illustres représentants, Palestrina, est un manifeste d'opposition aux recherches de Arnold Schönberg et de Ferruccio Busoni. Le thème en est la solitude morale et la lutte du compositeur défendant ses principes artistiques.

La même année, Pfitzner écrivit son pamphlet polémique « Futuristengefahr » (le Danger futuriste) , dirigé contre Busoni. En 1919, il rédigea « Die neue Aesthetik der musikalischen Impotenz » , s'opposant ainsi aux idées exprimées par Paul Bekker dans son « Beethoven » . De 1929 à 1934, il enseigna à l'Académie musicale de Munich, puis effectua des tournées comme pianiste et chef d'orchestre. Après sa mort fut fondée la « Hans Pfitzner Gesellschaft » .

Homme d'opinions conservatrices, se considérant « comme le dernier survivant de la musique dans un monde devenu fou » (Claude Rostand) , Pfitzner poursuivit la tradition du Romantisme allemand issue de Schopenhauer, Schumann et Wagner. Outre ses œuvres scéniques, parmi lesquelles « Die Rose vom Liebesgarten » (1901) , il a écrit notamment de la musique de chambre, des œuvres Symphoniques, des Concertos pour piano, pour violon et pour violoncelle, la cantate « Von deutscher Seele » (1921) , et la fantaisie chorale « Das dunkle Reich » (1929) .

Par un amusant caprice de l'histoire, Hans Pfitzner, l'un des compositeurs allemands les plus ardemment nationalistes de sa génération, naquit le 5 mai 1869 à Moscou, où son père Robert était violoniste dans un orchestre de théâtre. En 1872, cependant, la famille rentra à Francfort-sur-le-Main, que Hans considéra à jamais comme sa ville natale. Robert Pfitzner devint 1er violon de l'Orchestre du « Stadttheater » .

Au « Hoch Konservatorium » de Francfort, le jeune Pfitzner étudia le piano avec James Kwast (également professeur d'Otto Klemperer et de Percy Grainger) et la composition avec Iwan Knorr, qui forma plusieurs autres compositeurs allemands (Walter Braunfels, Ernst Toch, Oskar Fried) mais aussi les membres de l'École de compositeurs britanniques de Francfort (notamment Roger Quilter, Cyril Scott, Balfour Gardiner et Norman O'Neill) et Ernest Bloch, né à Genève. Frais diplômé (1890) , Pfitzner se proposa de copier (avec son condisciple Carl Friedberg) les parties orchestrales de la toute dernière œuvre d'un autre professeur de composition au « Hoch Konservatorium » : « Hänsel und Gretel » d'Engelbert Humperdinck, créée à Weimar le 23 décembre 1893, sous la direction de Richard Strauß. Cette expérience le marqua durablement et son « Das Christ-Elflein » (1re version, 1906 ; version révisée, 1917) doit beaucoup à l'univers magique de la partition d'Humperdinck. Pfitzner demeure surtout connu pour ses Opéras, notamment « Palestrina » (originellement sous-titré « légende musicale ») , créé au « Prinzregententheater » de Munich par l'Orchestre de l'Opéra placé sous la baguette de Bruno Walter, en 1917. C'est grâce à cet Opéra que le nom de Pfitzner s'est maintenu au répertoire, surtout dans les pays germanophones. Sous le Nazisme, Pfitzner eut des relations de plus en plus difficiles avec Bruno Walter. Dans ce qui s'avéra sa dernière lettre (16 février 1962, la veille de sa mort) , celui-ci écrivit cependant à Mali, la veuve de Pfitzner :

« Malgré tous les sinistres événements de notre temps, je suis persuadé que " Palestrina durera ". Cette œuvre a tout pour être impérissable. »

L'allusion de Walter aux « sinistres événements » renvoie de manière désagréable mais fondamentale aux opinions et aux idées nationalistes de Pfitzner. En 1923, alors qu'il était hospitalisé à Munich pour une opération de la vésicule biliaire, Pfitzner reçut la visite d'Adolf Hitler, qu'il fit involontairement enrager et qui ne s'intéressa en rien à sa musique ; ce qui n'aida pas ses aspirations professionnelles à court terme mais contribua à sauver un peu sa réputation. Selon Michaël Kater dans « The Twisted Muse » , Hitler, à l'issue de cette rencontre, dit à son compagnon le poète Dieter Eckart, qu'il « ne voulait rien avoir à faire avec ce vieux rabbin, prenant à l'évidence le barbu Pfitzner pour un Juif » .

Pauvre Pfitzner. D'un côté, il partageait nombre des opinions des Nazis, ou du moins il en était sympathisant (et l'expression « vieux rabbin » sera utilisée, avec la plus amère ironie, par certains de ses détracteurs) ; de l'autre, Hitler lui-même (malgré de constantes rectifications de gens comme Goebbels) demeurait convaincu qu'il était en partie juif. Pfitzner pensait que sa brève rencontre avec Hitler, en 1923, avait été un franc-succès, aussi fut-il dévasté quand on lui retira son invitation à venir diriger la musique du grand rassemblement de Nuremberg, en 1934, au prétexte que Hitler était persuadé qu'il avait du sang juif. À maintes reprises, Pfitzner invita Hitler à ses concerts, mais il essuya rebuffade sur rebuffade et toutes ses tentatives pour obtenir un tête-à-tête furent contrecarrées. Étiqueté juif, il fit tout son possible pour s'enflammer publiquement pour le « Führer »

« Aujourd'hui, il n'est personne qui ait la force de corps, d'esprit et d'âme de celui en qui nous avons, depuis 10 ans, trouvé le " Führer " allemand. »

Mais même ce genre de flagornerie ne servit en rien son ambition de devenir un compositeur très estimé du 3^e « Reich » (bien sûr, sa jalousie latente à l'égard de Richard Strauß vira à l'obsession ; un de ses biographes et défenseurs alla jusqu'à qualifier Strauß de diable incarné) : non seulement Hitler détesta sa musique mais, apparemment, il demeura soupçonneux quant à ses origines. Bref, malgré des opinions à bien des égards repoussantes, Pfitzner n'obtint jamais de Hitler la reconnaissance tant sollicitée. La guerre le laissa brisé, sa maison munichoise avait été détruite et, pendant un moment, il résida dans un sanatorium à Garmisch, où vivait son vieux rival Strauß.

The German composer and self-described anti-modernist Hans (Erich) Pfitzner was born on 5 May 1869 in Moscow, Russia, and died on 22 May 1949). His best-known work is the post-Romantic Opera « Palestrina », loosely based on the life of the great 16th Century composer Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina.

Pfitzner was born where his father played violin in a Theatre Orchestra. The family returned to his father's native Frankfurt, in 1872, when Pfitzner was 2 years old, and he always considered Frankfurt his home-town. He received early instruction in violin from his father, and his earliest compositions were composed at age 11. In 1884, he wrote his 1st songs. From 1886 to 1890, he studied composition with Iwan Knorr and piano with James Kwast at the Hoch Conservatory, in Frankfurt. (He later married Kwast's daughter Mimi Kwast, a granddaughter of Ferdinand Hiller, after she had rejected the advances of Percy Grainger.) He taught piano and theory at the Koblenz Conservatory, from 1892 to 1893. In 1894, he was appointed conductor at the « Stadttheater » in Mainz where he worked for a few months. These were all low-paying jobs, and Pfitzner was working as « Erster (1st) Kapellmeister » with the « Berlin Theater des Westens » when he was appointed to a modestly prestigious post of Opera director and head of the « Straßburg Konzertvatorium », in 1908, when Pfitzner was almost 40 of age.

In Strasbourg, Pfitzner finally had some professional stability, and it was there he gained significant power to direct his own Operas. He viewed control over the stage direction to be his particular domain, and this view was to cause him particular difficulty for the rest of his career. The central event of Pfitzner's life was the annexation of Imperial Alsace (and with it, Strasbourg) by France, in the aftermath of World War I. Pfitzner lost his livelihood and was left destitute at age 50. This hardened several difficult traits in Pfitzner's personality : an elitism believing he was entitled to sinecures for his contributions to German art and for the hard work of his youth, notorious social awkwardness and a lack of tact, a sincere belief that his music was under-recognized and under-appreciated with a tendency for his sympathizers to form cults around him, a patronizing style with his publishers, and a feeling that he had been personally slighted by Germany's enemies. His bitterness and cultural pessimism, deepened in the 1920's, with the death of his wife, in 1926, and meningitis of his older son Paul, who was committed to institutionalized medical care.

In 1895, Richard Bruno Heydrich sang the title role in the premiere of Hans Pfitzner's 1st Opera, « Der arme Heinrich », based on the poem of the same name by Hartmann von Aue. More to the point, Heydrich « saved » the Opera. Pfitzner's « magnum opus » was Palestrina, which had its premiere in Munich on 12 June 1917 under the baton of Jewish conductor Bruno Walter. On the day before, he died in February 1962, Walter dictated his last letter, which ended :

« Despite all the dark experiences of today, I am still confident that Palestrina will remain. The work has all the elements of immortality. »

Easily, the most celebrated of Pfitzner's prose utterances is his pamphlet « Futuristengefahr » (Danger of Futurists), written in response to Ferruccio Busoni's « Sketch for a New Æsthetic of Music » .

Pfitzner complained :

« Busoni places all his hopes for Western music in the future and understands the present and past as a faltering beginning, as the preparation. But what if it were otherwise ? What if we find ourselves presently at a high-point, or even that we have already passed beyond it ? »

Pfitzner had a similar debate with the critic Paul Bekker.

Pfitzner dedicated his Violin Concerto in B minor, Opus 34 (1923) , to the Australian violinist Alma Moodie. She premiered it in Nuremberg, on 4 June 1924, with the composer conducting. Moodie became its leading exponent, and performed it over 50 times in Germany with conductors such as Pfitzner, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Hans Knappertsbusch, Hermann Scherchen, Karl Muck, Carl Schuricht, and Fritz Busch. At that time, the Pfitzner Concerto was considered the most important addition to the Violin Concerto repertoire since the 1st concerto of Max Bruch, although it is not played by most violinists these days. On one occasion, in 1927, conductor Peter Raabe programmed the Concerto for public broadcast and performance in Aachen but did not budget for copying of the sheet music ; as a result, the work was « withdrawn » at the last minute and replaced with the familiar Brahms Concerto.

Increasingly nationalistic in his middle and old age, Pfitzner was, at first, regarded sympathetically by important figures in the 3rd « Reich » , in particular by Hans Frank, with whom he remained on good terms. But he soon fell-out with chief Nazis, who were alienated by his long musical association with the Jewish conductor Bruno Walter. He incurred extra wrath from the Nazis by refusing to obey the regime's request to provide incidental music to Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » that could be used in place of the famous setting by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, unacceptable to the Nazis because of his Jewish origin. Pfitzner maintained that Mendelssohn's original was far better than anything he himself could offer as a substitute.

Hans Pfitzner and Adolf Hitler met during a hospital visit, as early as 1923. Pfitzner was recovering from a gall bladder operation when a mutual friend, Anton Drexler, arranged a visit. Hitler did most of the talking, but Pfitzner dared to contradict him regarding the homosexual and anti-Semitic thinker Otto Weininger, causing Hitler to leave in a huff. Hitler told Nazi cultural architect Alfred Rosenberg that he wanted « nothing further to do with this Jewish rabbi » . Pfitzner was unaware of the comment and believed Hitler was sympathetic to him. When the Nazis came to power, in 1933, Rosenberg recruited Pfitzner, a notoriously bad speaker, to lecture for the Militant League for German Culture (« Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur ») , that same year, and Pfitzner accepted, hoping it would help him find an influential position. Hitler, however, saw to it that the composer was passed over in favor of Party hacks for positions as Opera director in Düsseldorf and « Generalintendant » of the Berlin Municipal Opera, despite hints from authorities that both positions were being held for him.

In the early years of Hitler's rule, Pfitzner received an injunction from Bavarian Justice Minister Hans Frank and « Reich » Interior Minister Wilhelm Frick against traveling to the Salzburg Festival, in 1933, to conduct his Violin Concerto. Pfitzner had managed to gain a stable conducting contract from the Munich Opera, in 1928, but ran into demeaning treatment from chief conductor Hans Knappertsbusch and intendant Franckenstein. In 1934, he was forced into retirement and lost his positions as Opera conductor, stage director and academy professor. He was also given a minimal pension of a few hundred Marks a month, which he contested until 1937 when Josef Goebbels resolved the issue. He was rejected as conductor at a Nazi Party rally, in 1934, where he learned for the 1st time that Hitler considered him half-Jewish, as had been insinuated by Winifred Wagner, the director of the Bayreuth Festival and a confidante of Hitler. Pfitzner was forced to prove he had no Jewish ancestry and, by 1939, he was thoroughly disenchanted with the Nazi regime.

Pfitzner's views on « the Jewish Question » were both contradictory and illogical. He viewed Jewishness as a cultural trait rather than a racial one. A 1930 statement, that caused difficulty for him in the pension affair, was that although Jewry might pose « dangers to German spiritual life and German " Kultur " », many Jews had done a lot for Germany and that antisemitism per se was to be condemned. He was willing to make exceptions to a general policy of antisemitism. For example, he recommended the performance of Heinrich Marschner's Opera « Der Templer und die Jüdin » based on Scott's Ivanhoe, protected his Jewish pupil Felix Wolfes of Cologne, along with conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler aided the young conductor Hans Schwieger, who had a Jewish wife, and maintained his friendship with Bruno Walter and, especially, his childhood journalist friend Paul Cossman, a « self-loathing » non-practicing Jew who was incarcerated in 1933. Pfitzner's petitions, on behalf of Cossman, may have caused Gestapo chief Reinhard Heydrich, incidentally the son of the « Heldentenor » who premiered Pfitzner's 1st Opera, to investigate him. Pfitzner's petitions likely contributed to Cossman's release, in 1934, although he was eventually re-arrested in 1942 and died of dysentery in the Theresienstadt camp) . In 1938, Pfitzner joked that he was afraid to see a celebrated eye doctor in Munich because « his great-grandmother had once observed a quarter-Jew crossing the street » . He worked with Jewish musicians throughout his career. In the early 1930's, he often accompanied famed contralto Ottilie Metzger-Lattermann, later murdered in Auschwitz, in recitals and had dedicated his 4 Songs, Opus 19, to her as early as 1905. He had dedicated his Songs, Opus 24, to Jewish critic and Jewish cultural Society founder Arthur Eloesser, in 1909. Still, Pfitzner maintained close contact with virulent antisemites like music-critics Walter Abendroth and Victor Junk, and did not scruple to use anti-Semitic invective in pursuit of certain aims.

His home having been destroyed in the War and his membership in the Munich Academy of Music having been revoked for his speaking-out against Nazism, Pfitzner was left mentally ill and homeless. But after the War, he was denazified and re-pensioned, performance bans were lifted and he was granted residence in the old people's home in Salzburg, Austria, where he died. Wilhelm Furtwängler conducted a performance of his Symphony in C major at the Salzburg Festival with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, in the summer of 1949, just after the composer's death. Following long neglect, Pfitzner's music began to re-appear in Opera Houses, concert halls and recording studios during the 1990's, including a controversial performance of the Covent Garden production of « Palestrina » in Manhattan's Lincoln Center, in 1997.

Pfitzner's biographer Hans Peter Vogel wrote that Pfitzner was the only composer of the Nazi era who attempted to come to grips with National-Socialism, both intellectually and spiritually, after 1945. In 2001, Sabine Busch examined the ideological tug-of-war of the composer's involvement with the National-Socialists, based in part on previously unavailable material. She concluded that, although the composer was not exclusively pro-Nazi nor purely the anti-Semitic chauvinist often associated with his image, he engaged with Nazi powers whom he thought would promote his music and became embittered when the Nazis found the « elitist old Master's often morose music » to be « little propaganda-worthy » . The most comprehensive English-language account of Pfitzner's relations with the Nazis is by Michaël Kater.

His own music (including pieces in all the major genres except the Symphonic poem) was respected by contemporaries such as Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß, although neither man cared much for Pfitzner's innately acerbic manner (and Alma Mahler repaid his adoration with contempt, despite her agreement with his intuitive musical idealism, a fact evident in her letters to the wife of Alban Berg). Although Pfitzner's music betrays Wagnerian influences, the composer was not attracted to Bayreuth, and was personally despised by Cosima Wagner, in part because Pfitzner sought notice and recognition from such « anti-Wagnerian » composers as Max Bruch and Johannes Brahms.

Pfitzner's works combine Romantic and late-Romantic elements with extended thematic development, atmospheric music-drama, and the intimacy of chamber music. Columbia University musicologist Walter Frisch has described Pfitzner as a « regressive modernist ». His is a highly-personal off-shoot of the Classical / Romantic tradition as well as the conservative musical aesthetic and Pfitzner defended his style in his own writings. Particularly notable are Pfitzner's numerous and delicate lieder, influenced by Hugo Wolf, yet, with their own rather melancholy charm. Several of them were recorded during the 1930's by the distinguished baritone Gerhard Hüsch, with the composer at the piano. His 1st Symphony (the Symphony in C-sharp minor) underwent a strange genesis : it was not conceived in orchestral terms at all, but was a reworking of a String Quartet. The works betray a late pious inspiration and although they take on a late-Romantic qualities, they show others associated with the brooding unwieldiness of a modern idiom. For example, composer Arthur Honegger writes, in 1955, after criticizing too much polyphony and overly long orchestral writing in a long essay devoted to « Palestrina » :

« Musically, the work shows a superior design, which demands respect. The themes are clearly formed, which makes it easy to follow. »

Pfitzner's work was appreciated by contemporaries including Richard Strauß and Gustav Mahler, who explicitly described Pfitzner's 2nd String Quartet of 1902-1903 as a Masterpiece. Thomas Mann praised « Palestrina » in a short essay published in October 1917. He co-founded the Hans Pfitzner Association for German Music, in 1918. Tensions with Mann, however, developed and the 2 severed relations by 1926.

From the mid-1920's, Pfitzner's music increasingly fell in the shadow of Richard Strauß. His Opera, « Das Herz » of 1932 was unsuccessful. Pfitzner remained a peripheral figure in the musical life of the 3rd « Reich », and his music was performed less frequently than in the late days of the Weimar Republic.

German critic Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt, writing in 1969, viewed Pfitzner's music with extreme ambivalence : initiated with sharp dissonances and hard linear counterpoint determined to be taken as (and criticized for being) modernist. This became a conservative rebellion against all modernist conformity. Composer Wolfgang Rihm commented on the increasing popularity of Pfitzner's work, in 1981 :

« Pfitzner is too progressive, not simply, the way Korngold can be taken to be ; he is also too conservative, if that means to be influenced by someone like Schœnberg. All this has audible consequences. We cannot find the brokenness of today in his work, at 1st glance, but neither the unbroken yesterday. We find both, that is, none, and all attempts at classification falter. »

The composer Hans Pfitzner was born in Moscow, but moved with his ethnic German parents to Germany while he was still a toddler. His parents supported his musical talent, and his father was himself a violinist. After completing his musical studies, in Frankfurt, Pfitzner struggled to support himself and his family as a teacher in Berlin. His 1st break came in 1905, when his 2nd Opera, « Die Rose vom Liebesgarten » (The Rose from the Garden of Love) composed in 1901, was performed in Vienna under the direction of Gustav Mahler. Pfitzner was pleased with the result, which marked the beginning of his long friendship with Mahler and his family. Despite the Opera's success, however, the composer remained on the fringe of the German musical world, without either the money or respect that he felt was his due.

It was not until he was close to the age of 40 that Pfitzner was offered a respectable position, that of Opera director and head of the Strasbourg Conservatory, in Alsace-Lorraine. Directing performances in this far western outpost of German culture, Pfitzner saw himself as a bulwark defending the German nation, values, and culture against a « degenerate » and « corrupt » France. It was during his time here that probably his greatest composition, the Opera « Palestrina », premiered in 1917. The Opera was received enthusiastically, and it led to the development of a cult of followers of this « unrecognised genius ». The First World War, however, interfered with its expected fame and national success.

With Germany's defeat, in 1918, both Pfitzner's spiritual faith and his material security were destroyed. Germany lost Alsace to France, and he was forced to leave his possessions and his career behind. This proved to be a pivotal moment for the composer, who felt personally violated by his expulsion. It was during the Weimar years that the self-styled « Hans Pfitzner, the German » began actively to take-up arms against « enemies of the " Reich " ». An increasingly vocal anti-Semite, he believed that Weimar was the product of an international Jewish conspiracy, bemoaning the fact that during the shame and crime of a revolution. German workers, German people, allowed themselves to be seduced by Russian-Jewish criminals, showering them with an enthusiasm that they denied their German heroes and benefactors.

Seeing a direct link between the racial and political degeneracy of the Weimar era and its modernist musical trends, Pfitzner believed that German music was under vicious attack by the dual threats of atonality (he reserved a passionate hatred for the 12 tone system and its Master, Arnold Schoenberg) and jazz, the « musical expression of Americanism ». He greatly admired Richard Wagner, and saw the Jew as the basic opposite of the German, yet, developed a more subtle variety of antisemitism that distinguished between good German nationalist Jews and bad foreign Jews. Nonetheless, his allegiance remained clear. While Adolf Hitler was in jail after the failed Munich coup attempt, Pfitzner sent a book with the inscription : « To Adolf Hitler, the great German. Hans Pfitzner, April 1st, 1924. »

Pfitzner was unable, however, to find unqualified favour with the Nazi elite. In 1943, Josef Goebbels wrote in his diary that Hitler was « strongly opposed to Pfitzner. He thinks him to be a half-Jew, which, according to his personal records, he certainly is not ». In May 1934, on his 65th birthday, Pfitzner was « retired » with an offensively low pension. He tried to seek recognition among lower-level employees of the Nazi Party, and became active in Nazi organisations such as the German Labour Front. He conducted in the occupied lands after the War began, giving concerts for Germans living in Poland, Alsace, and Holland thus winning the patronage of the director of the « Generalgouvernement », Hans Frank. After he gave several successful concerts in Kraków, Frank wrote him a personal letter thanking him for his tremendous cultural-political favour, in the service of the fight for « Germandom in the East ». Despite these successes, however, he was deemed unreliable and unfriendly to the political aims of the « Reich ». He never joined the Nazi Party, and remained uninterested in Party politics. He also occasionally rejected Party requests : he refused to condemn some of the great Jewish artists he had worked with over the years, and turned down a commission to rewrite Mendelssohn's score for « A Midsummer Night's Dream », claiming he could not improve on the music (even though it had been composed by a Jew) .

Nonetheless, Pfitzner was one of most successful composers of the Nazi years, and performed frequently throughout Germany. Although he did not attain the success he desired, he survived the post-War years better than might have been expected. During his denazification trial, along with Wilhelm Furtwängler, Werner Egk and Richard Strauß, he was found not guilty. Pfitzner died in Salzburg, in May 1949.

Hans Pfitzner was one of the composers who carried the German Romantic tradition well into the 20th Century. Unlike those of his contemporaries Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß, his reputation never seemed to extend beyond the borders of his homeland. Yet, there is much that is individualistic and much to admire from his body of work - particularly in his best-known work, the Opera « Palestrina » .

Born in Russia of German parents, Pfitzner moved with his family to Frankfurt when he was only 3. His musical talent manifested itself early on, and he received his 1st training from his parents. At 14, he entered the Hoch Conservatory, studying composition with Iwan Knorr and piano with James Kwast. He then began his music career as a teacher, taking a position as a theatre conductor in Mainz ; the latter proved to be a strategic move, for although it was an unpaid position, it enabled him to have his 1st Opera, « Der arme Heinrich », performed. Paid positions now followed, culminating in a multi-position stay in Strasbourg ; he became director of the Conservatory there, as well as chief Symphony and Opera conductor. The security of a fixed income produced a creatively favourable environment ; he composed prolifically in all forms, favoring Opera.

The crown of Pfitzner's work is arguably his Opera « Palestrina » (1915) , based on the life of the Renaissance composer and quoting passages of that Master's music. Pfitzner may have seen himself in the Opera's protagonist, as a man who, sticking to his principles, upholds musical tradition against the depredations of power. (The Opera treats the legendary effort on Palestrina's part to compose a work beautiful and spiritual enough to foretell the banning of polyphony under consideration by the architects of the Counter Reformation.) Also noteworthy is Pfitzner's Cantata « Von deutscher Seele » (Of the German Soul) of 1920. Both works are in the highly-chromatic, richly sonorous tradition of post-Romanticism, and could never be mistaken for mere throwbacks to the 19th Century. That Pfitzner could work in a less imposing idiom can be gathered from such works as the concise, melodic Symphony in C (1940) .

But much of the non-German world's reluctance to hear Pfitzner's music may have been the result of his politics.

Always an ardent German patriot, he became enmeshed with the rise of the 3rd « Reich ». Yet, he counted among his Jewish friends and supporters Gustav Mahler, Bruno Walter, and Otto Klemperer, and he was an admirer of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. In any event, as Pfitzner became more disillusioned with Nazism, he expressed disapproval and was thus relieved of his life membership at the Munich Academy of Music, in 1934. This and various family tragedies took a toll on the composer's sanity. The War-time destruction of his Munich home left Pfitzner an aging, half-insane street person, but, after the War, a pension and residence were procured for the composer. He died in Salzburg, officially denazified and with the ban on performances of his music lifted.

Although the Romantic revival of the 1960's did not do for Pfitzner what it did for many of his contemporaries, there is much of his output worth hearing. At his best, Pfitzner spoke with the eloquence and intensity of one who consciously lives during the close of a glorious era.

Hans Erich Pfitzner (geboren 5. Mai 1869 in Moskau ; gestorben 22. Mai 1949 in Salzburg) war ein deutscher Komponist, Dirigent und Autor politischer und theoretischer Schriften.

Hans Pfitzner als Sohn des am Leipziger Konservatorium ausgebildeten Orchester-Violinisten und Musikdirektors Robert Pfitzner (1825-1904) und seiner Frau Wilhelmine Pfitzner, geborene Reimer (1841-1924) , geboren. Seine Eltern siedelten mit ihm 1872 nach Frankfurt am Main um. Er erhielt von seinem Vater ersten Musikunterricht. 1880 komponierte er seine ersten Werke, 1884 entstanden die ersten überlieferten Lieder. Von 1886 bis 1890 studierte Pfitzner am Hoch'schen Konservatorium in Frankfurt Komposition bei Iwan Knorr und Klavier bei James Kwast. Zu dieser Zeit wurde er Mitglied der Sängerschaft Sankt Pauli, die zur Deutschen Sängerschaft gehörte. Er unterrichtete von 1892 bis 1893 am Koblenzer Konservatorium. 1894 nahm er einen Posten als unbezahlter Kapellmeister am Stadttheater in Mainz an. 1895 wurden dort die ersten größeren Werke Pfitzners uraufgeführt, die Oper Der arme Heinrich und die Schauspielmusik zu Das Fest auf Solhaug von Henrik Ibsen.

1897 zog Pfitzner nach Berlin um und wurde Lehrer am Stern'schen Konservatorium. 1899 heiratete er Mimi Kwast, die Tochter seines ehemaligen Klavierlehrers. 1903 wurde Pfitzner zusätzlich erster Kapellmeister am Berliner Theater des Westens, sein erster Sohn Paul wurde geboren. Sein zweiter Sohn Peter wurde 1906 geboren, seine Tochter Agnes 1908.

Die Uraufführung von Pfitzners zweiter Oper Die Rose vom Liebesgarten fand 1901 im Elberfelder Stadttheater am Brausenwerth (heute zu Wuppertal) statt. An der Wiener Hofoper wurde die Oper 1905 unter der Leitung von Gustav Mahler nachgespielt.

Von 1907 bis 1908 war er Dirigent des Kaim-Orchesters in München. 1908 zog die Familie nach Straßburg. Pfitzner leitete dort das Städtische Konservatorium und die Sinfoniekonzerte der Straßburger Philharmoniker. 1910 übernahm er zugleich die musikalische Leitung der Straßburger Oper, wo er auch als Regisseur wirkte. 1913 erfolgte seine Ernennung zum Professor.

Im Ersten Weltkrieg meldete sich Pfitzner 1915 freiwillig zum Militär, wurde aber zurückgestellt.

1917 wurde im Münchner Prinzregententheater unter Bruno Walter die « Musikalische Legende » Palestrina uraufgeführt, die als Pfitzners bedeutendstes Werk gilt. Im Mittelpunkt des vielschichtigen Dramas steht das in die Renaissancezeit übertragene Spannungsverhältnis zwischen der Autonomie des Kunstwerks und Künstlers einerseits und den Forderungen der Gesellschaft andererseits. Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina soll eine Messe komponieren, um verfeindete Parteien des Klerus zu versöhnen. Da er ablehnt, muß er mit Verfolgung durch die Inquisitionsbehörde rechnen und denkt über Selbstmord nach. In völliger Vereinsamung erlebt er eine plötzliche Inspiration und schreibt das Werk - nicht mehr wegen des Auftrags, sondern um seiner selbst willen.

Nach der Rückgabe von Elsass-Lothringen an Frankreich zog Pfitzner 1919 nach Unterschondorf am Ammersee. 1919-1920 war er vorübergehend Dirigent der Münchner Philharmoniker. 1920 wurde er Leiter einer Meisterklaße für Komposition an der Preußischen Akademie der Künste.

Er komponierte seine romantische Kantate Von deutscher Seele (1921) nach Gedichten von Joseph von Eichendorff und seine wichtigsten Instrumentalwerke, das Klavierkonzert in Es-Dur (1922) , das Violinkonzert in H-Moll (1923) sowie das Streichquartett in Cis-Moll (1925) .

Nachdem er sich 1923 einer Gallenoperation unterziehen musste, besuchte ihn Adolf Hitler im Krankenhaus.

Das Streichquartett in Cis-Moll (1925) arbeitete er 1932 zur Sinfonie um. Nach dem Tod seiner Frau Mimi (1926) schrieb er die Chorfantasie Das dunkle Reich (1930) , eine Trauermusik nach Gedichten von Michelangelo, Gøethe, Conrad Ferdinand Meyer und Richard Dehmel.

Die Feiern und Ehrungen zu seinem 60. Geburtstag 1929 brachten Pfitzner noch einmal große öffentliche Anerkennung. Er verlegte 1930 seinen Wohnsitz nach München und schrieb im folgenden Jahr seine letzte Oper Das Herz. 1934 wurde er an der Staatlichen Akademie der Tonkunst in München pensioniert, wobei es aufgrund seiner überzogenen Alterssicherungsforderungen zu Auseinandersetzungen mit dem preußischen Ministerpräsidenten Hermann Göring kam. 1936 starb sein Sohn Paul. Im folgenden Jahr überwarf sich Pfitzner mit seinen Kindern Peter und Agnes, welche (wie ein schon im Babyalter verstorbener weiterer Sohn) den Komponisten nicht überleben sollten. Diese familiäre Konstellation dürfte den zunehmend unleidlichen Charakter Pfitzners erheblich mitgeprägt haben.

1939 ging Pfitzner eine zweite Ehe mit Mali Stoll ein. Die Feiern und Ehrungen zu seinem 70. Geburtstag waren weit weniger spektakulär als zehn Jahre zuvor. 1942 entgingen Pfitzner und seine Frau dem Tod durch einen Bombenangriff in der Nähe von Nürnberg, obwohl der Schlafwagen, in dem sie sich auf einer Fahrt befanden, völlig zerstört wurde. 1943 wurde sein Wohnhaus in München durch Bomben getroffen und er siedelte nach Wien-Rodaun über. Nachdem seine Tochter Agnes sich bereits 1939 das Leben genommen hatte, fiel sein zweiter Sohn Peter 1944 in Russland. Pfitzner floh 1945 nach Garmisch-Partenkirchen, wo er in einer Flüchtlingsunterkunft unterkam. Im Jahr darauf zog er in ein Altersheim in München-Ramersdorf. 1948 wurde er im Rahmen der Entnazifizierung von der Spruchkammer München als « vom Gesetz nicht betroffen » eingestuft.

Zu dieser Untersuchung waren unter anderem Ehrenerklärungen von den Komponisten und Dirigenten Walter Braunfels, Hans Franke, Hans Knappertsbusch, Hans Rosbaud, Arnold Schönberg und Bruno Walter eingegangen, ebenso von Alma Mahler-Werfel und Carl Zuckmayer.

1949 starb er auf einer Reise in Salzburg an einem zweiten Schlaganfall. Er wurde auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Gruppe 14 C, Nummer 16) in einem Ehrengrab beigesetzt.

Pfitzner verschloss sich in seinen theoretischen Schriften, nicht aber in Teilen seines Werkes, gegen zeitgenössische Einflüsse und vertrat eine anti-modernistische und antisemitische Haltung.

Bereits 1898 schrieb Pfitzner aus Berlin an Paul Nikolaus Cossmann :

« Vielleicht ist das die richtige Stelle, an der ich erwähnen kann, daß ich mich hier in Berlin ganz besonders als Antisemit ausgebildet habe ; man hat hier die Gefahr und die Macht so nahe vor Augen. »

Thomas Mann, der 1918 zum Eintritt in den neu gegründeten Hans-Pfitzner-Verein für deutsche Tonkunst aufgerufen hatte, bemerkte zum politischen Standpunkt Pfitzners 1919 :

« Der nationale Künstler hatte sich zum anti-demokratischen Nationalisten politisiert. »

Pfitzners musiktheoretische Schriften konstruierten in den 1920er Jahren einen Gegensatz zwischen deutscher Musik und ihren jüdischen Zersetzern. Pfitzner parallelisierte die politische und musikalische Entwicklung, wobei sich das « deutsche Volk » in der Revolution nach 1918 von « russisch-jüdischen Verbrechern » (Pfitzner) anführen ließ. Mit einer Art « musikalischer Dolchstoßlegende » (so die Musikwissenschaftlerin Annkatrin Dahm) prophezeite er das « Ende der deutschen Kunst » :

« In der Schmach und dem Frevel der Revolution erlebten wir mit Trauer, daß deutsche Arbeiter, deutsches Volk sich von russisch-jüdischen Verbrechern anführen ließen und ihnen eine Begeisterung zollten, wie sie sie noch keinem ihrer deutschen Helden und Wohltäter gönnten. In der Kunst erleben wir, daß ein deutscher Mann aus dem Volke, von so scharfem Verstande und reichem Wissen, wie Herr Bekker die international-jüdische Bewegung in der Kunst leitet. Ich sage : international-jüdisch, meine also nicht die Juden als Individuen. Es ist ein Unterschied zwischen Jude und Judentum. Der Grenzstrich der Scheidung in Deutschland geht nicht zwischen Jude und Nichtjude, sondern zwischen deutsch-national empfindend und international empfindend. »

Hans Pfitzner : Die neue Ästhetik der musikalischen Impotenz. Ein Verwesungssymptom (1920) , Seite 123.

Pfzner versuchte der Neuen Musik jegliche Legitimität in der Musiktradition abzusprechen und begründete dies öffentlichkeitswirksam antisemitisch. Pfzners antisemitische Polemik blieb nicht abstrakt, sondern richtete sich ganz konkret gegen Personen. Paul Bekker, der 1919 den Begriff « Neue Musik » prägte und als einflussreicher Musikkritiker der Berliner Neuesten Nachrichten, der Berliner Allgemeinen Zeitung und der Frankfurter Zeitung tätig war, war 1920 ein namentlich genannter Hauptgegner. Pfzners Ziel war die Rettung der deutschen romantischen Tradition vor dem vermeintlich Antideutschen, « in welcher Form es auch immer auftritt, als Atonalität, Internationalität, Amerikanismus ... ». In dieser Schrift prägte Pfzner das später von den Nationalsozialisten aufgegriffene Wort « Musikbolschewismus ».

1926 schrieb Pfzner in einem Interview für die Süddeutschen Monatshefte, deren Mitherausgeber er war und zu deren nationalistischer Agitation der Kampf gegen den Versailler Friedensvertrag, die Propagierung der « Kriegsschuldlüge » sowie besonders im April / Mai 1924 die « Dolchstoßlegende » gehörte :

« ... das, was jetzt noch in unserem Volke in guten Sinne deutsch genannt werden kann, wird (wie schon früher in der Geschichte) den alten Heroismus treu bewahren und auch ohne Hoffnung weiterkämpfen und sich treu bleiben. » (Hans Pfzner)

Von 1926 bis 1929 erschienen drei Bände Gesammelte Schriften von Pfzner, die nach Joseph Wulf eine Fülle von Stichworten enthalten, die späteren NS-Kulturmanagern vertraut waren : « Schicksal der nationalen Kunst » , « Erhaltung unserer Wesensart » , « internationale Seelenlosigkeit » , « anationaler Amerikanismus » , « Jazz-Flut » , « volksfremd » oder « wesensfremd » . Pfzner definiert « antideutsch » darin als « die Atonalität, Internationalität, Amerikanismus und deutscher Pazifismus » . Letzteres stammt aus seiner Schrift Neue Ästhetik der musikalischen Impotenz von 1920.

Im Januar 1933 erschien das letzte Themenheft der Süddeutschen Monatshefte unter Cossmann, im März wurden Redaktionsmitglieder verhaftet. Cossmann wurde am 5. April im Sanatorium Neuwittelsbach inhaftiert und im Sommer nach Stadelheim überstellt. Am 19. April 1934 wurde er freigelassen. Pfzner setzte sich beim Reichspräsidenten Hindenburg für den langjährigen Freund ein.

Im April 1933 war Pfzner Mitunterzeichner des « Protests der Richard-Wagner-Stadt München » gegen Thomas Mann, nachdem dieser am 13. Februar 1933 den Festvortrag Leiden und Größe Richard Wagners vor der Richard Wagner-Vereinigung Amsterdam gehalten hatte. Der gleiche Vortrag war in München unbeachtet geblieben. Der Aufruf gegen die « Verunglimpfung » Wagners, erschienen am 16. / 17. April 1933 in den Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten, unterzeichnet von Personen, die Mann bis zu diesem Moment für Freunde gehalten hatte und die teilweise mit ihm privat verkehrten, war ein Grund, daß Mann nach der Vortragsreise im Exil blieb. Thomas Mann brach den freundschaftlichen Kontakt zu Pfzner ab und schrieb noch 1947 von Pfzner als « Ein namhafter alter Tonsetzer in München, treudeutsch und bitterböse » .

Im Mai 1933 hatte eine Aktion von Alfred Rosenbergs Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur Erfolg. Alfred Heuss hatte in der April-Nummer der von ihm herausgegebenen Zeitschrift für Musik, eines « Kampfblatts für deutsche, gegen neue und internationale Musik » , einen Boykott Pfzners an der Staatsoper Berlin bemängelt. In der Mai-Ausgabe meldete er in einem Artikel « Erfüllte Anregungen und Wünsche » Erfolg : Der Kampfbund habe für die Entlassung des Generalmusikdirektors Otto Klemperer gesorgt und einen Gastauftritt Pfitzners in Berlin organisiert.

Ende Juli 1933 schickte Pfitzner an Hans Hinkel, Staatskommissar und zu diesem Zeitpunkt Reichsorganisationsleiter des Kampfbundes für deutsche Kultur und Dritter Geschäftsführer der Reichskulturkammer, drei Bände seiner 1926-1929 erschienenen Schriften und unterbreitete ihm Vorschläge, wie diese am einfachsten zu lesen seien. Besonders wies er auf die darin enthaltene Schrift Futuristengefahr hin.

Pfitzner sagte im Juli 1933 aus politischen Gründen, da er « keiner undeutschen Kunstangelegenheit » dienen möchte, ein Dirigat bei den Salzburger Festspielen ab und beteiligte sich für die Wahlen am 19. August 1934, am 29. März 1936 sowie zur Volksabstimmung über die Annexion Österreichs am 10. April 1938 mit Wahlkampfaufrufen für Hitlers Politik.

Nach dem Tod Hindenburgs gehörte Pfitzner 1934 zu den Unterzeichnern des Aufrufs der Kulturschaffenden zur « Volksabstimmung » über die Vereinigung des Reichspräsidenten- und Reichskanzleramts, der am 18. August 1934 im Völkischen Beobachter erschien.

Nach einer Aufführung von Pfitzners Oper Das Herz in Ulm 1938 und einer erneuten Klage wegen Vernachlässigung seiner Werke wurde Pfitzner nach dem Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs von führenden NS-Funktionären als « deutschester der zeitgenössischen deutschen Komponisten » eingeladen, seine Werke in den besetzten Gebieten wie den Niederlanden, dem Elsass und in Paris aufzuführen.

Am 20. Februar 1940 traf die Gauhauptstelle für politische Beurteilung der NSDAP (München) eine Beurteilung Pfitzners : « Dem Nationalsozialismus steht Pfitzner bejahend gegenüber. » .

Eine Mitgliedschaft in Parteiorganisationen sei nicht bekannt, aber auch nicht ausgeschlossen. Dagegen hatte aber das Dritte Reich kein großes Interesse an dem Komponisten ; so findet sich im Bundesarchiv Berlin (Akten der Reichskulturkammer) folgende Notiz :

Der « Führer » ist mit einer im bescheidenen Rahmen durchgeführten Ehrung Hans Pfitzners zu seinem 75. Geburtstag einverstanden. Es soll jedoch kein zu grosses Aufsehen um Pfitzner gemacht werden. « Soweit man bei Pfitzner von guten Stücken sprechen kann, sollen die besten aufgeführt werden. » In diesem Zusammenhang ist wieder die Frage aufgetaucht, ob Pfitzner Halb- oder Vierteljude ist. Ich bitte hierüber um Ihre Stellungnahme.

Seit 1936 gehörte Pfitzner dem (allerdings faktisch bedeutungslosen) Reichskultursenat an, der dazu dienen sollte, die Reichskulturkammer gegen innerparteiliche Kritik zu sichern.

Pfitzner nahm an repräsentativen Veranstaltungen und Ehrungen teil. Im besetzten Holland dirigierte er 1941 eigene Werke, und im besetzten Paris 1942 wohnte er einer Aufführung des Palestrina bei. Weiterhin erhielt er 1934 den Goethepreis der Stadt Frankfurt, 1935 die Brahms-Medaille der Freien und Hansestadt Hamburg, 1939 die Ehrenbürgerwürde der Stadt Froburg in Sachsen, 1942 den Wartheländischen Musikpreis, 1943 den Beethoven-Preis der Stadt Wien und 1944 den Ehrenring der Stadt Wien. Im Mai 1944 erhielt er von Hitler eine Dotation über 50.000

Mark. Im August 1944 wurde Pfitzner nicht nur in der Gottbegnadeten-Liste genannt, sondern auch in der von Hitler erstellten Sonderliste mit den drei wichtigsten Musikern unter den « Gottbegnadeten », die ihn von sämtlichen Kriegsverpflichtungen befreite.

1944 komponierte Pfitzner die Krakauer Begrüßung Opus 54 als Hommage an seinen Freund und Mäzen, den später wegen Kriegsverbrechen verurteilten Generalgouverneur des Generalgouvernements Hans Frank. Das Werk wurde Anfang Dezember 1944 in Krakau im besetzten Polen unter der Leitung von Hans Swarowsky uraufgeführt (bei der Wiederholung dirigierte Pfitzner selbst) . Es war nicht Pfitzners einzige einem Politiker gewidmete Komposition : Bereits 1916 hatte er Großadmiral Alfred von Tirpitz Zwei deutsche Gesänge (Opus 25 ; 1915-1916) gewidmet.

Inhaltlich bleiben politische Kontexte in Pfitzners musikalischem Werk aber unberührt - und das gilt für die Jahre vor dem Dritten Reich genauso wie für die Zeit zwischen 1933 und 1945.

Im Juni 1945 rechtfertigte Pfitzner in seiner Glosse zum II. Weltkrieg Hitlers Antisemitismus, indem er schrieb :

Das Weltjudentum ist ein Problem und zwar ein Rassenproblem, aber nicht nur ein solches, und es wird noch einmal aufgegriffen werden, wobei man sich Hitlers erinnern wird und ihn anders sehen, als jetzt, wo man dem gescheiterten Belsazar den bekannten Eselstritt versetzt. Es war sein angeborenes Proletentum, welches ihn gegenüber dem schwierigsten aller Menschenprobleme den Standpunkt des Kammerjägers einnehmen liess, der zum Vertilgen einer bestimmten Insektenart angefordert wird. Also nicht das « Warum » ist ihm vorzuwerfen, nicht, « daß er es getan », sondern nur das « wie » er die Aufgabe angefasst hat, die berserkerhafte Plumpheit, die ihn dann auch, im Verlauf der Ereignisse, zu den Grausamkeiten, die ihm vorgeworfen werden, führen musste.

Jens Malte Fischer kommentierte 2002 diese Aussage Pfitzners so :

Ein verbitterter alter Krakeeler wird sozusagen erst nach Kriegsende zum wirklichen Nationalsozialisten (der Partei hat er nie angehört) und ideologischen Spiessgesellen des Massenmordes. Auf jeden Fall wird man diese Geisteshaltung, wie sie auch in den wenigen Briefen zum Ausdruck kommt, die Pfitzner nach 1945 noch mit Bruno Walter gewechselt hat, nicht unbedingt als konsequente und nahtlose Weiterentwicklung seiner früheren Positionen bezeichnen können.

Im gleichen Text von Mitte 1945 schrieb Pfitzner :

Daß eine Menschenrasse von der Erdoberfläche ausgerottet werden kann, das hat die Weltgeschichte schon gesehen, in der Ausrottung der ursprünglich prachtvollen indianischen Rasse. Im Sinne der Völkermoral und der Kriegsbräuche konnte sich Hitler also eigentlich schon durch dies einzige Beispiel »gedeckt« fühlen ; das »wie« dieser Gewalthandlungen und Unterdrückungsmethoden ist freilich an und für sich verdammungswürdig, soweit es auf Wahrheit beruht und nicht geflissentlich stark übertrieben ist. In den KZ-Lagern mögen schreckliche Dinge geschehen sein, wie sie in solchen Umwälzungsperioden immer vorkommen, als vereinzelt Fälle und von Seiten subalternen Rohlinge, wie es sie immer und überall gibt, am wenigsten aber unter deutschen Menschen. Wenn wir Deutschen aber einmal eine Gegenrechnung der Grausamkeiten aufstellen wollten, die an uns verübt wurden, da würde sich das Verhältnis von Schuld und Anklage von Verbrechen und Richteramt gewaltig ändern und umkehren.

Jens Jessen kommentierte dieses Zitat so :

« Die Freunde des Komponisten seien allerdings gewarnt : Argumente für eine Reinwaschung des Komponisten werden sich daraus auch durch eine philologische Feinlektüre nicht gewinnen lassen. »

2010 wurde in Hamburg mit Wirkung vom 1. Januar 2011 die Pfitznerstraße wegen der NS-Nähe Pfitzners in Friedensallee umbenannt. Weitere Umbenennungen erfolgten im März 2012 (Hamm) und im Mai 2012 (Münster) .

Pfitzners Werk vereint romantische und spätromantische Elemente mit ausgedehnter thematischer Arbeit, stimmungstarker Musikdramatik und kammermusikalischer Intimität. Sie stellt einen eigenartigen Ausläufer der klassisch-romantischen Tradition dar, deren konservative Musikästhetik und Allgemeingültigkeit Pfitzner auch in seinen Schriften gegen zeitgenössische Richtungen vehement verteidigte. Die Werke des inspirationsgläubigen Spät-, ja Postromantikers zeigen große kompositorische Qualitäten und stehen mit manchen grüblerischen Sperrigkeiten einer modernen Tonsprache vielleicht sogar noch näher als von ihrem Schöpfer, nach seinen musikästhetischen Äußerungen zu urteilen, beabsichtigt. Arthur Honegger schreibt zum Beispiel 1955 trotz mancher Kritik an einem allzu polyphonen und bewegten Orchestersatz und teilweise überlangen Proportionen in seinem Aufsatz über Pfitzners Palestrina :

Musikalisch ist das Werk mit einer Überlegenheit gestaltet, die Respekt erheischt. Die Leitmotive sind klar geformt und ermöglichen es, ihnen leicht zu folgen ...

Pfitzners Werk wurde von zeitgenössischen Kollegen wie Gustav Mahler und Richard Strauß hoch geschätzt. So wurde sein zweites Streichquartett von 1902-1903 von Mahler ausdrücklich als Meisterwerk gelobt. Thomas Mann würdigte die Oper in einem kurzen, im Oktober 1917 erschienenen Essay Palestrina, den er später erweiterte und in seine Betrachtungen eines Unpolitischen aufnahm. Er gründete gemeinsam mit anderen Künstlern 1918 den Hans-Pfitzner-Verein für deutsche Tonkunst. Pfitzner galt im Jahrzehnt nach der Uraufführung seiner Oper Palestrina im Jahr 1917 als der führende Vertreter eines betont deutschen und entschieden antimodernistischen Musikbegriffs. So konstatierte sogar der zwei Jahre zuvor von Pfitzner in seiner Schrift Die neue Ästhetik der musikalischen Impotenz : Ein Verwesungssymptom ? scharf angegriffene Paul Bekker 1922 einen deutlichen Anstieg der künstlerischen Geltung Pfitzners bei einem gleichzeitigen Abstieg der bisherigen Galionsfigur der deutschen Musik, Richard Strauß.

Ab Mitte der 1920er Jahre geriet Pfitzners Werk zunehmend in den Schatten des Werks von Richard Strauß. Seine Oper Das Herz von 1932 war wenig erfolgreich. Im Musikleben des Dritten Reiches blieb er eine Randfigur, die von den Medien kaum beachtet wurde und deren Werke noch seltener als in der Spätphase der Weimarer Republik aufgeführt wurden. Der Pfitzner-Biograph Walter Abendroth schrieb trotzdem im Jahr 1935 enthusiastisch über dessen Palestrina :

Es läßt sich nicht nur behaupten, sondern auch beweisen, daß Pfitzners « Palestrina » als Dichtung an Größe der Empfindung, Genialität der Gestaltung, Schönheit der Sprache und Tiefe der Gedanken bei weitem alles überragt, was jemals als « Operntext » geschrieben worden ist.

Der mit Pfitzner auch nach 1945 weiter befreundete jüdische Dirigent Bruno Walter führte den Palestrina im amerikanischen Exil in New York erneut auf und schrieb 1947 :

Ich persönlich zähle die Aufführung des Palestrina, nach meiner Meinung eines der gewaltigsten musikalischen Bühnenwerke unserer Zeit, zu den großen Ereignissen meines Lebens.

Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt sieht Pfitzners Werk im Jahr 1969 als von extremer Ambivalenz geprägt, anfänglich von scharfen Dissonanzen und hartem linearen Kontrapunkt bestimmt und deswegen auch als modernistisch kritisiert, später aber eher konservativer Musikästhetik folgend und gegen jeglichen modernen Konformismus rebellierend. Der Komponist Wolfgang Rihm erklärt die geringe heutige Popularität von Pfitzners Werk im Jahr 1981 folgendermaßen :

Pfitzner ist zu progressiv, um einfach wie Korngold eingeschlüpft werden zu können, und er ist zu konservativ, um etwa wie Schönberg die Musik hörbar folgenreich beeinflusst zu haben. Wir finden nicht auf den ersten Blick das gebrochen Heutige in seinem Werk, aber auch nicht das ungebrochen Gestrige. Wir finden beides - also keines, und dies läßt Einordnungsversuche stocken.

Eine bei Metzler 2001 erschienene Untersuchung von Sabine Busch Hans Pfitzner und der Nationalsozialismus konnte mit umfassender Quellenrecherche das ideologische Tauziehen um die Verstrickungen des Komponisten im Dritten Reich transparent machen. In der FAZ schrieb dazu Rezensentin Ellen Kohlhaas, diese erste Dokumentation zu Pfitzners Wirken im Nationalsozialismus sei längst überfällig : Sabine Busch führe hier « nicht dezidiert und ausschließlich pronazistische Dokumente » vor, hüte sich aber, « Pfitzners Rempelen mit den Nazi-Bonzen » zu Heldentaten eines Regimegegners umzudeuten. Doch Buschs Auswertung aller bisher zugänglichen Dokumente, « darunter etlicher neu aufgefundener oder erstmals unzensiert im vollen Wortlaut veröffentlichter Materialien » , untermauern für die Rezensentin das bekannte Pfitzner-Bild vom « antisemitischen Chauvinisten » . Die Studie enthält nach Auskunft der Rezensentin makabre Beispiele für Pfitzners starrsinnige Unbelehrbarkeit auch nach 1945 ebenso wie Vertuschungsversuche seiner Kontakte mit Nazi-Größen wie Hans Frank. Sie belegt aber auch, daß die Nationalsozialisten selber Pfitzner gelegentlich lästig fanden, daß er mit seiner « elitären, oft altmeisterlich grämlichen Musik » für das Regime « wenig propagandatauglich » war.

Heutzutage ist Pfitzner ein vor allem außerhalb Deutschlands und Österreichs weithin vergessener und vernachlässigter Komponist. Der Pflege seines Werkes widmet sich die Hans Pfitzner-Gesellschaft eingetragener Verein, die auch jährlich erscheinende Mitteilungen veröffentlicht.

Richard Wetz

Le compositeur, professeur, pédagogue et chef d'orchestre allemand, Richard Wetz, est né le 26 février 1875 à Gleiwitz (aujourd'hui, Gliwice en Pologne) et est mort le 16 janvier 1935 à Erfurt. Son style d'essence post-Romantique, malgré l'époque, est fortement influencé par Franz Liszt et Anton Bruckner.

Wetz fait ses études musicales à Leipzig et à Munich avec De Thuille puis entre à l'Université de Munich en 1900. Il devient chef d'orchestre de théâtre à Straslund puis à Barmen. Il s'installe à Erfurt en 1906 pour diriger le « Musikverein » et la « Singakademie » jusqu'en 1925.

Parallèlement, il est professeur et, à partir de 1916, il enseigne à la Hochschule für Musik de Weimar.

Grâce à sa connexion avec Anton Bruckner, la musique de Richard Wetz sera favorisée (quelques années après sa mort) par le 3e « Reich ». Peter Raabe (1872-1945), le président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » (rattachée au Ministère de la Propagande de Josef Gœbbels), va promouvoir la création, en 1943, de la « Richard Wetz Gesellschaft » (Société Richard Wetz) à Gleiwitz, ville natale du compositeur, afin d'assurer la diffusion de ses œuvres.

The German late-Romantic composer Richard Wetz was born on 26 February 1875 to a merchant family in Gleiwitz, Upper-Silesia (now, Poland) ; and died on 16 January 1935 in Erfurt. He was best-known for his 3 Symphonies. In these works, he « seems to have aimed to be an immediate continuation of Bruckner, as a result of which he actually ended-up on the margin of music history » . Although his family owned a piano, no family member was particularly interested in music. The young Richard, who felt drawn to music early on, did not receive regular piano lessons until the age of 8, but quickly taught himself by composing smaller piano and song pieces. He later stated that he resolved to dedicate his life to music by the age of 13. After passing his final examinations, in 1897, he went to Leipzig to study at the Conservatory, under such tutors as Carl Reinecke and Salomon Jadassohn. After only 6 weeks, however, he discontinued his studies after suffering from disillusionment regarding what he considered overly Academic lessons. He instead took private lessons from Richard Hofmann, then leader of the Leipzig Music Academy, for half a year. At the same time, he took-up studies at the Leipzig University, including philosophy, psychology and literature. He studied poets such as Friedrich Hölderlin, Heinrich von Kleist and, particularly, Johann Wolfgang von Goethe who had great influence on his later work as a composer. Likewise, he became a follower of the philosophical ideas of Arthur Schopenhauer. In the Autumn of 1899, Wetz left Leipzig and moved to Munich, where he began to study music with Ludwig Thuille. Again, in 1900, Wetz interrupted his study and moved to Stralsund where Felix Weingartner found him employment as a theatrical band Master. After some months, he was in the same position in Barmen (now, Wuppertal) but, only a short time later, he found himself again unemployed in Leipzig. Here, he educated himself further in music history, also studying scores of Classical and modern composers. Anton Bruckner and Franz Liszt became his most important role models. Wetz was appointed a manager of the Erfurt music association, in 1906. He fell in love with the town and remained there for the rest of his life. Until this point, Wetz's published compositional works had almost exclusively been piano songs, though he twice tried to write Opera. He wrote the librettos for both works, « Judith » (Opus 13) and « The Eternal Fire » (Opus 19) . His 1 Act play, « The Eternal Fire » , was performed in 1907, in Hamburg and Düsseldorf, but with little success. In 1909, he received a better reception with his « Kleist-Ouverture » (Opus 16) which Arthur Nikisch conducted in Leipzig. During the following years, Wetz devoted himself to the music profession. He gave composition and history of music lessons at the Erfurt Conservatory, in 1911-1921, and honed his skills in conducting various choirs : the Erfurt Song Academy, in 1914-1915 ; the « Riedelscher Gesangverein » , in Leipzig ; and, after 1918, the « Engelbrechtscher Madrigalchor » . He also worked in composing choral music, a cappella, and orchestral accompaniments. Some of the most notable works of the period were the « Song of Life » (Opus 29) ; « Hyperion » (Opus 32) , after Friedrich Hölderlin ; and a setting of the 3rd Psalm (Opus 37) . However, his mature style had not yet fully developed. In 1917, Wetz became a lecturer (assistant professor) and, in 1920, professor of the history of music and composition to the ducal College for music, in Weimar. In 1917, he completed his 1st Symphony in C minor (Opus 40) . The Symphonies No. 2 in A major (Opus 47) and No. 3 in B-flat minor (described as B-flat major, Opus 48) followed in 1919 and 1922. In parallel, Wetz worked on his 2 String Quartets in F minor (Opus 43) and E minor (Opus 49) . Afterwards, he devoted himself to working on choral pieces. Thus originated the « Requiem » in B minor (Opus 50) and the Christmas Oratorio on Old-German poems (Opus 53) , possibly his most significant compositions. Wetz also wrote monographs about his models Anton Bruckner (1922) and Franz Liszt (1925) as well as Ludwig van Beethoven (1927) . In the mid- 1920's, the composer organized and led, in Erfurt, numerous music parties in which he performed his own works. He resigned the formal management of the Erfurt Music Association, in 1925, but remained the central figure of the musical life of the city. In 1928, Wetz and Igor Stravinsky were appointed foreign members of the Prussian Academy of the Arts. A short time later, Wetz was called to the Berlin College of Music where he rose to be one of the most successful composition teachers. He left, however, in favor of his posts in Erfurt and Weimar. During the last years of his life, the work at the Weimar College of music increasingly took-up his time. Nevertheless, he managed to produce further compositions. As his last great work, in 1933, he completed his Violin Concerto in B minor (Opus 57) . In 1934, the town appointed him the music representative of the city of Erfurt. In October of that year, Wetz was diagnosed with lung cancer, brought about by excessive smoking. Although strongly impaired, the composer continued with unbroken creative urge, working on the outlines of an Oratorio, « Love, Life, Eternity » , after the texts of Gœthe, which he wanted to be a monument to his favourite poet. The work, however, was left unfinished on his death. A 4th Symphony was also left in a fragmentary state, and a 3rd String Quartet was also found incomplete amongst his papers. Richard Wetz died on 16 January 1935 in Erfurt, aged 59. According to his will, the fragments of the « Gœthe Oratorio » were to be completed by the composer Werner Trenkner, who Wetz considered his greatest pupil. Trenkner failed at completing the work due to civil disputes, and the sketches have since been lost.

« My music is strange : where it rings-out, it seizes upon the deepest ; but it is rarely given the opportunity again. »

During Wetz's lifetime, his works remained little-known outside the circle of his devotees and music-lovers in his home region, to the point that he became nearly unknown after his death. Since that time, his compositions have continued to draw few fans despite the eagerness of his enthusiasts and his reputation as a great music pedagogue. Politically, Wetz made decisions towards the end of his life that may have had an effect on his standing after his death : after the end of the 1st World War, he became a confessed nationalist who saw the position of his vanquished Germany as a humiliation and longed for resurgence of national greatness, which seemed possible to him, in 1933, with the seizure of power by the National-Socialists. In May of that same year, he enrolled into the Nazi Party and took-over the leadership of the music department of the Erfurt branch of the « Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur » , where he hoped he could, thereby, gain the goodwill and the support of the Nazi rulers. This, however, had little influence on his ability to spread his work, leaving him the role of composing primarily propaganda pieces. His most significant interpreter was the conductor Peter Raabe, who performed for the 1st time all of the Wetz Symphonies, and was appointed, shortly after Wetz's death, in 1935, to be the Chairman of the Imperial music hall. It was Raabe who founded a Richard Wetz Society, in 1943, in Gleiwitz. Raabe's work remained greatly hampered, however, by the 2nd World War. In the post-War period, Wetz's reputation suffered from his identification with National-Socialist ideology, as well as the rapid developments of contemporary music, at that time, which had passed over the tradition-conscious late-Romantic. The fact that Wetz had preferred the life in provincial Erfurt to that of the real music metropolises, and that he was never moved to create popular compositions which could have increased his reputation, did little to bring Wetz and his works to the broader general public. Indeed, some conductors questioned the quality of his compositions until the 1990's (especially, during the arrangements for celebrations in his honour in Erfurt, in 1955, for the 20th anniversary of his death and what would be his 80th birthday) . Only recently have his creations been rediscovered. For example, the « Requiem » of the composer was performed, for the 1st time in 60 years, in September 2003, at the Erfurt church's music Festival, under the direction of George Alexander Albrecht.

If one considers the life of Richard Wetz, it is not surprising that, in the 1929 « Riemann Music Encyclopedia » , he was stated to have « arranged to be a loner » . His stature was less than other composers of the time and the new achievements of contemporaries such as Arnold Schönberg, Maurice Ravel or Franz Schreker left him behind. Increasingly, the accepted cultural pessimism violently railed against the kind of music that Wetz was writing. Wetz was more related in attitude with such keepers of 19th Century tradition such as Sergei Rachmaninov, Hans Pfitzner and Franz Schmidt, than his contemporaries. According to his own statements, he depended on familiar surroundings for his composition :

« I can compose only with myself at home. Neither on a summer holiday nor during longer vacations, I have ever created anything. »

Statements like this explain why Wetz began to devote himself increasingly to the composition of Symphonies and larger choral works only when he settled in Erfurt, but also why he later refused all offers for more lucrative positions and commissions. The seclusion (bordering on isolation) from the mainstream of the German music scene of the past allowed Wetz to concentrate completely upon the development of his own personal style. Wetz wrote only vocal works in his early days. He often returned to this style until his dying days, which explains why this is the largest part of his output. Wetz counts as one of the most important song composers of his generation. The authorities in this field that Wetz looked to were Franz Schubert, Franz Liszt, Peter Cornelius and Hugo Wolf. Liszt, especially, strongly influenced the tonal patterns of Wetz's early work, although even then Wetz was already forging his own path. This creative period culminates in 2 Operas and « Kleist-Ouverture » , an orchestral work inspired by the tragic destiny of the poet. From the beginning of Wetz's Erfurt years, his choral works moved away from Liszt's influence, bit by bit, and Anton Bruckner began to influence the composer. His striving to imitate Bruckner's tonal language shows in the fact that no stylistic break arises between these compositions and earlier works. Wetz learned even more from Bruckner, his clear form structures and the sense of an organic growth of the music without it being overwhelming. Nevertheless, a large measure due to Bruckner, he typically composed powerful and ceremonious effects without stylistic peculiarities. Wetz's 3 Symphonies are powerful, introverted works in the style of late-Romantic Symphonic music being cultivated at the time, yet, his works show their own distinct personalities separating them from the tradition. For Wetz, the subdued nature of the closing passages of his works confirm the integrity of these works. The 1st Symphony's end, for instance, begins in the key of C minor (as Bruckner did also) and almost dissolves in a bright major key before, after a recall of earlier music, an austere and minor mode conclusion not heard in any Bruckner Finale (closer to the mood of the conclusions to some Bruckner opening movements) comes around. This was certainly influenced by the spirit of the times in which he lived, which were certainly not typical. His Quartets follow the same techniques in form and gesture as his Symphonies, but these were invested with substantially more intense feeling than the more public Symphonies. In his later works, Richard Wetz increasingly refined his style. He began to use chromatic harmonies in even stronger measure in his tonal language. A change to a more polyphonic style already apparent in the String Quartets becomes apparent in other works, most notably in the organ piece « Passacaglia and Fugue », Opus 55 (1930) . After that point, the influence of Bruckner drops away. In his Masterpieces, the « Requiem » and the « Christmas Oratorio » , Wetz discovers a synthesis of Symphonic and vocal-music in which he summarizes his accumulated musical experience. The Violin Concerto shows what is probably the most daring formal arrangement in the whole output of the composer and is comparable to the similar Violin Concerto by Hans Pfitzner, written in the same key (B minor) . Although illness and death took Wetz prematurely, he remains nevertheless « One of the great and unmistakable talents of German Late-Romanticism » .

(By Eric Schissel.)

(Somewhat paraphrased and quoted from, variously, Eckhardt van den Hoogen's notes to the CPO label recording of Wetz's Symphony No. 2 and Kleist-overture, various contemporary reviews and concert-reviews of Wetz's works in the Neue Zeitschrift fuer Musik, and a quotation by the composer.)

The occasion of the recording, by Werner Andreas Albert and the Staatsphilharmonie Rheinland-Pfalz on the CPO label, of the 1st digital recording of Richard Wetz's 3rd Symphony, offers an opportunity to give an overview of the music of this interesting and often powerful composer.

Richard Wetz was born in Gleiwitz, Upper-Silesia (Austria) on February 26th, 1875, and died in Erfurt on January 16th, 1935. He began by self-teaching, then enrolled in the Leipzig Conservatory but stayed for only 6 weeks. He took instruction privately from Richard Hofmann, director of the Choral Society of Leipzig. In 1899, he headed to Munich to study with Ludwig Thuille, an instructor-composer perhaps best-known today for a Sextet, though it was Thuille's Violin Sonata overshadowed in the concert at which Max Reger's somewhat scandalous 4th Sonata had its premiere.

Felix Weingartner, another composer-conductor of repute, arranged a theatre conductor's post for Wetz in Stralsund the next year, which lasted only a few months ; after another try in Barmen (what is today Wuppertal) , Wetz returned to Leipzig. No work awaiting him there, he used the opportunity to do some listening instead, to Classical composers, to Anton Bruckner and to Franz Liszt (on whom he was later, in 1925, to write a book.)

He then wrote 2 Operas to his own librettos before receiving a post as the director of the Erfurt Music Society in 1906, and his career might be said then to have truly been launched.

The next few years saw both the failure, unfortunately, of the 2nd of his 2 Operas, but also the success of his « Kleist Overture » , Opus 16, premiered in Berlin in 1908 under Arthur Nikisch in a concert with Edward Elgar's Enigma Variations, and given this rather lukewarm review by Adolf Schultze in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik :

« Wetz's piece, clear and understandable at a glance, constructed with a skilful use of sound elements, left but few impressions, although it was interpreted resonantly and with passion. Serious, gloomy and passionate, but also light and soft is this music. Much in the way of inventive skills is not visible. At least, the work shows some important qualities, as in the melancholic-pathetic introduction of the piece, the passionately moving main theme of the Allegro and the virile warm-blooded melody of the subsidiary theme. »

With increasing success came, of course, further compositions - one singles out from the period before the 1917 premiere of his 1st Symphony in particular, his « Gesang des Lebens » (Opus 29, just recorded on CPO with the 3rd Symphony) Chorlied aus « Ædipus auf Colonos » (Opus 31) , « Hyperion » (on texts by Hölderlin) for baritone, mixed chorus and orchestra (Opus 32, 1912) and his Violin Sonata (Opus 33) .

Premiered by Liszt scholar and archivist Peter Raabe, the 1st Symphony in C, Opus 40, begins over a quiet and expectant rhythmic pulse, out of which develops naturally the movement's long-breathed main theme. Particularly notable in this movement is a dissonant clash around 15 minutes in, which leads to an expansive outburst of the 2nd theme. After the recapitulation subsides into the more active Coda, we are in a very different place. Frenetic downward scale fragments based on one of the subsidiary themes dispel any leisureliness from the forward motion of the work, and, over them, increasingly urgent reminiscences of that same theme provoke 1st a collision, then 2 Maestoso restatements, and ultimately resolution into several triumphant C major chords, and a pause followed by repeated, insistent, and very final minor 3rd descents of Eb-C, the last C held unisono.

The Scherzo, based on a theme reminiscent of the ostinato from the Scherzo of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, encloses a lyrical and chromatic trio, and has some wild moments. If it is too much of a cliché to say that the slow movement, in A-flat, is melodic and lyrical then it is at least worth remarking that the piece rises to some pointed and justified climaxes, is very fine and inspires affection and even perhaps love.

The C minor Finale is an impressive creation, continuing the tragic atmosphere that has never really left the 1st movement and enhancing it. Structural use is made, as in some Bruckner Symphonies and works by others as well, of the contrasting quantity of the chorale in this piece, and most effectively ; likewise, cyclic quotes from earlier movements (which have not been lacking in the Scherzo, for instance, either) . All leads from the somewhat un-Brucknerian opening through well-placed climaxes to a most memorable conclusion, as slowly gathering forces hit a dissonant nolle prosequi and descend to one last and most eloquent restatement of the 1st movement's main theme after which 4 chords : long, long, long, short !!! (also, loud-loud-loud-quiet) end this stunning Symphony. There is an excellent recording on the CPO label with Roland Bader conducting the Cracow Philharmonic.

Between these 1st 2 of his Symphonies, Wetz published his « Romantic Variations on an Original Theme » for piano, Opus 42. By then, a reviewer could write :

« Richard Wetz is no more the unknown ; he has his apostle, who often and with cordial pressure stands up for him. And certainly this serious, striving composer has earned, that we do not shove him aside without reason. This is his 1st work of chamber music to have crossed our path (the Opus 33 Violin Sonata apparently had not) , and we may say with pleasure, that his craft is still in the ascent. This piece requires proficient pianistic skill, to be safe of its success. The simple, intimate theme (only the downturn in the 3rd line seems to appear to us all too brusque) becomes, with the finest controlling technique, developed and reworked. »

Also, at this time, he published his setting of the 3rd Psalm for baritone solo, mixed chorus and orchestra (Opus 37) .

The 2nd Symphony, Opus 47, finished in late 1919 (his next works were to be his 3rd Symphony, Opus 48, and his 2nd String Quartet in E minor, Opus 49) is in A major, and separates into 3 movements : massig bewegt ; langsam, mit klagendem Ausdruck ; and Finale : Bewegt (Ruhige Halbe) . The 1st movement begins deceptively calmly, though the storms within are, one comes to feel, natural in origin and not artificially imposed by the composer. There, they are all the same. On brief acquaintance with this lovely movement, perhaps, I find somewhat more Brucknerian than anything in the 1st Symphony. The slow movement of the Symphony in D minor, has a sad dignity. The Finale has something, perhaps, of the tarantella about its minor mode main theme. The 2nd theme is also in minor, though rather less jolly in implication !

The 3rd Symphony in B-flat, in 4 movements, has had a previous recording on Deutsche Harmonia Mundi which is now available on a Sterling CD, with Erich Peter conducting the Berlin Symphony.

After Wetz's death, the « ADMV » (« Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein ») played the slow movement of the 3rd Symphony in a church concert. (They had previously played « Hyperion » in their annual concerts, back in 1913.)

The F minor String Quartet, Opus 43 (score at Loeb Library at Harvard) , the 1st of Richard Wetz's 2, earned these impressions from Otto Dorn after a 1920 concert : « with a touch of melancholy, warmly and naturally felt » .

The E minor String Quartet's score is at New York Public Library ; like the 1st Symphony, it alternates the Romantic and the chorale-liturgical with effect. Both Quartets should be worth hearing.

Those wishing to listen to Richard Wetz's music are recommended first to the exemplary recording of the 1st Symphony on CPO label, an excellent recording of an astounding piece. The 2nd Symphony is very much growing on this listener, as is the accompanying « Kleist-overture » , both very fine music well orchestrated. The composer's output extends to at least 57 published opera, of which only 5 have been recorded, meanwhile, and if there is an audience for these 3 CPO CDs then, perhaps, their fans might hope for recordings of the String Quartets, the (solo ?) Violin Sonata, the Christmas Oratorio, the Violin Concerto, « Hyperion » and the 3rd Psalm, the Romantic Variations for piano and the Prelude and Fugue in D minor for organ, « Trauersommernach » for womens' chorus and orchestra.

Those wondering at the sound of his music will find sometimes something of a mix, melodically, of Anton Bruckner, Franz Liszt, and Richard Wagner, and structural and harmonic similarities from time to time, as well. By no means, I think, will they find a particularly derivative composer, particularly in the 1st Symphony ; what gets said, how, in what order, why, and such questions the composer seems to have developed answers that are at least partially his own. In the 1st Symphony, though the mood is by no means uniformly bleak (one ought not in any event confuse tragedy in its Classic sense, with bleakness) , the techniques are put to the service of an overall tragic goal ; the 2nd Symphony has a quite different spirit, somewhat pastoral perhaps, quite positive overall even in its largely minor mode Finale.

The list of works of Richard Wetz contains 58 Opuses, in addition, there are a small number of compositions which were published without numbering. Opus 1-4 and Opus 6 are not considered discoverable any longer, and the composer declared some other early works provided with Opus figures as invalid.

Manfred Gurlitt

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Manfred Gurlitt est né le 6 septembre 1890 à Berlin. (Le compositeur Cornelius Gurlitt était son grand-oncle.) Après ses études au lycée à Berlin, il a appris la théorie de la musique avec Hans Hermann et Hugo Kaun, le piano avec Moritz Meyer-Mahr et Rudolf Maria Breithaupt, la composition avec Engelbert Humperdinck et la direction d'orchestre avec Karl Muck, qui l'a appelé comme assistant au Festival de Bayreuth. De 1908 à 1910, il a acquis sa première expérience en tant que répétiteur au « Staatsoper Unter den Linden ». En 1911, il a été directeur musical du théâtre à Essen, en 1912-1913, chef d'orchestre à Augsburg et, de 1914 à 1927, chef principal au Théâtre municipal de Brême. Il a fondé en 1920 la « Gesellschaft für Neue Musik » (Société de musique contemporaine) et il en a été le dirigeant. En 1924, il est nommé directeur musical de Brême. En 1926, son Opéra « Wozzeck » est créé. Au début de 1927, il s'installe à Berlin, où il travaille, à partir de 1928, en tant que chef-invité à l'Opéra national et à la radiodiffusion. Il fait de nombreux enregistrements pour la « Deutsche Grammophon » et pour « Odéon » .

Le 1er mai 1933, Manfred Gurlitt devient membre du Parti Nazi. En raison de son ascendance juive présumée, son appartenance est déclarée nulle et non avenue, le 3 mai 1937. En 1938, il est chef-invité du « Wiener Staatsoper » . En 1939, fuyant le régime du 3e « Reich » , il s'installe au Japon où il travaille comme chef d'orchestre à l'Opéra et à la radio. Il enseigne également à l'Académie Impériale de musique. Mais les Nazis ne cessent de le harceler et, en 1942, le gouvernement japonais lui retire ses responsabilités jusqu'à la fin de la guerre. Pour un journal de langue anglaise, il tient une chronique de critique musicale. En 1953, il fonde la « Gurlitt Opera Company » dans le but de faire connaître le répertoire européen au public japonais. Ses efforts déployés après la guerre pour revenir s'établir en Allemagne ont échoué. En 1969, il est nommé professeur à l'Université Showa de Musique de Tokyo. Il meurt 3 ans plus tard, le 29 avril 1973.

Manfred Gurlitt (1890-1973) fait partie de cette génération de musiciens allemands sacrifiés sur l'autel de la politique nationale-socialiste. Soupçonné d'être d'ascendance juive, par sa grand-mère paternelle, il ne dut son salut qu'à l'initiative de sa mère, confessant par écrit, que son père biologique n'était pas Fritz Gurlitt mais son actuel 2e mari et bon Aryen, Willi Waldecker (l'adultère a parfois du bon !) . Il crut opportun d'adhérer au Parti Nazi en 1933 mais cela ne suffit pas à le tenir à l'abri de déboires sérieux. Les raisons en sont peu claires mais il semble que son caractère ombrageux lui ait valu pas mal d'ennemis, prêts à dénoncer sa musique, auprès des services de la propagande nazie, comme non conforme à l'idéal du moment. Gurlitt fut démis de ses positions officielles et un compromis fut trouvé afin qu'il émigre, en 1938, au Japon !

On raconte que, nostalgique (?), il y fréquentait régulièrement l'ambassade d'Allemagne, si bien qu'au bilan, nul ne sait quels furent ses rapports exacts avec le régime. Il revint brièvement au pays, après la guerre, espérant une reconnaissance tardive mais sa musique fut jugée démodée et il se résigna à rejoindre définitivement Tokyo où il fonda sa propre Compagnie d'Opéra et enseigna au Showa College of Music.

Très doué, Gurlitt commença, très jeune, des études complètes, de piano, de direction d'orchestre et de composition auprès d'Engelbert Humperdinck (1854-1921) . Naturellement tenté par la scène d'Opéra, il lui consacra une bonne partie de son temps.

Au théâtre, il a gravi les échelons, un à un, gagnant sa vie comme répétiteur au « Staatsoper » de Berlin puis comme assistant de Karl Muck à Bayreuth. À partir de 1911, il devint second chef à Essen puis à Augsbourg, enfin chef principal à Brême.

Son activité de compositeur fait état de 8 Opéras que l'on tarde à redécouvrir, à la scène du moins :

Son « Wozzeck » (d'après Georg Büchner) , publié en 1926, quelques mois seulement après celui d'Alban Berg (1885-1935) , fut très bien accueilli par le public, mieux même que celui de son rival. Est-ce pour lui faire payer ce « camouflet » que l'histoire (jamais avare d'excès) s'est vengée, condamnant l'œuvre aux oubliettes ? Elle est pourtant remarquable en tous points et même si elle est peu novatrice pour son époque, elle le sera bien assez, à l'avenir, pour tous ceux qui ne souhaitent qu'une chose : entendre de la bonne musique.

Son « Soldaten » (d'après Jakob Lenz) , daté de 1930, a anticipé celui de Bern Aloïs Zimmermann et, là encore, l'histoire se répète. Que reproche-t-on au juste à cette musique ? À nouveau d'avoir déjà été entendue par le passé. Il est vrai que « Soldaten » fait davantage référence à Richard Strauß (Introduction) , Gustav Mahler (Interlude de l'Acte 1) et même Richard Wagner qu'à la Seconde École de Vienne mais en quoi serait-ce une tare ? L'histoire de l'art semble sans cesse répéter cette rengaine : « Du neuf, toujours du neuf, voilà ce qu'il nous faut ! » . Heureusement, avec le temps, ce genre de reproches a tendance à s'estomper mais l'artiste n'est plus là pour assister à la résurrection de son œuvre.

« Nana » (d'après Émile Zola) , daté de 1932, évoque également clairement le même sujet que « Lulu » d'Alban Berg (1885-1935) , publié la même année. Cet Opéra, par contre, attend toujours son 1er enregistrement, tout comme d'autres œuvres scéniques tombées dans un oubli encore plus profond : « Nächtlicher Spuk » (1936) , « Warum » (1936-1945) , « Nordische Ballade » (1934-1944) , « Wir schreiten aus » (1958) .

Manfred Gurlitt a aussi écrit de la musique instrumentale dont un Concerto pour violon et un autre pour violoncelle ainsi que 2 Symphonies : « Goya » et « Shakespeare » . L'étiquette « Phoenix » vient de publier la Symphonie « Goya » et les critiques enfin favorables montrent combien cette musique méritait de revivre.

Un sort versatile s'est bel et bien acharné sur Manfred Gurlitt. Sa musique fut jugée trop moderne voire dégénérée par les services de la propagande de Josef Gœbbels. La guerre terminée, on lui fit le procès inverse, lui reprochant de cultiver une esthétique dépassée ! C'en était trop pour un homme qui avait fondé en 1922, lors de son séjour à Brême, la « Gesellschaft für Neue Musik » , une Société de défense de la musique d'avant-garde.

Il eut beau contacter les milieux germaniques influents dont Wilhelm Fürtwängler, personne ne voulut prendre le risque de remonter l'un de ses Opéras et ce n'est pas « la Croix du Mérite » qu'il reçut, via l'ambassadeur d'Allemagne à Tokyo, qui pouvait changer quoi que ce soit à son amertume.

Même les Japonais reconnaissants de son influence décisive sur la scène nipponne ne purent véritablement le consoler : ce que Gurlitt aurait voulu, c'était la reconnaissance de ses pairs allemands et figurer sur la longue liste des grands musiciens dont ce pays s'enorgueillit. Au lieu de cela, il se retrouve à peine mentionné dans les encyclopédies musicales.

Qu'il se rassure, là où il repose, les encyclopédies sont rarement en avance sur leur temps et on trouve aujourd'hui des éditeurs courageux qui commencent à réparer les erreurs du passé. Les studios d'enregistrements résonnent enfin de sa musique, demain peut-être la scène ; elle le mérite amplement.

Martin Gurlitt étudie la composition avec Engelbert Humperdinck, la direction d'orchestre avec Karl Muck, et le piano avec Moritz Mayer-Mahr. Il est le petit-neveu du compositeur Cornelius Gurlitt.

De 1908 à 1910, il est nommé à l'Opéra Royal de Berlin. Il devient ensuite l'assistant de Karl Muck à Bayreuth. En 1911-1912, il est nommé second chef à Essen puis travaille à Augsbourg pour 2 ans. En 1914, on lui offre le poste de 1er chef au « Stadttheater » de Brême, poste qu'il va occuper jusqu'en 1924 comme directeur musical.

En 1920, il fonde à Brême une Société de musique contemporaine afin d'encourager l'avant-garde.

Son Opéra « Wozzeck » (1926) , basé sur la pièce de Georg Büchner, est apparu 4 mois après celui d'Alban Berg. La première fut donnée à Brême, le 22 avril 1926, et a beaucoup attiré l'attention à l'époque. L'œuvre marque l'apogée de la carrière de Gurlitt. Mais ce « Wozzeck » est toujours resté dans l'ombre de l'autre. Les détracteurs de Gurlitt l'accuse de promouvoir « une vie débauche totale » . Il est dans l'obligation de déménager à Berlin, en 1927. Là, il enseigne à la « Musikhochschule » de Charlottenburg, se joint à la « Staatsoper » , au « Kroll Oper » , au « Deutsches Theater » , à Max Reinhardt et la Radio de Berlin.

La musique de Gurlitt fut interdite par les Nazis lorsqu'ils ont pris le pouvoir en 1933. Sa présence à Berlin sera tolérée puisqu'il saura adapter sa musique à l'esthétique du 3^e « Reich ». Gurlitt devient un membre du Parti Nazi à partir du 1^{er} mai 1933. Il est éjecté du Parti, le 3 mai 1937, sur une décision du tribunal. Le parquet déclare (à tort) que Gurlitt est d'origine juive. Pour éviter d'être arrêté par la « Gestapo », il décide d'émigrer au Japon, en 1939, où il devient actif comme chef avec la Société Fujiwara Yoshie et l'Opéra de Fujiwara. En 1940, Gurlitt est nommé directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Tokyo.

Gurlitt est l'instigateur des premières japonaises de nombreuses œuvres du répertoire allemand ; entre autres, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Richard Wagner et Richard Strauß. L'attitude de Gurlitt envers le régime nazi demeure cependant équivoque. Il est un invité régulier de l'Ambassade d'Allemagne à Tokyo. En 1953, il fonde sa propre compagnie à Tokyo : la « Gurlitt Opera Company ». En 1969, il devient professeur de musique à l'Ordre Showa.

En 1955, Gurlitt retourne en Allemagne pour interpréter ses propres œuvres. L'événement ne s'avère pas fructueux. Son langage musical est jugé dépassé. L'année suivante, il reçoit la Croix du service du Mérite de la République fédérale allemande. A partir de là, il cesse de composer et remet plus jamais les pieds dans son pays natal.

Gurlitt est aussi l'auteur de l'Opéra « Soldaten » (1930) d'après la pièce de Jakob Michaël Lenz Reinhold ; et de « Nana » (1933) d'après le roman d'Émile Zola (œuvre contemporaine du « Lulu » de Berg) .

« Die Heilige » : Légende musicale en 3 parties, d'après Carl Hauptmann (1920) .

« Wozzeck » , Opus 16 : Tragédie musicale en 18 scènes et 1 épilogue, d'après Georg Büchner (1926) .

The German Opera composer, conductor and teacher, Manfred Gurlitt, was cousin of the eminent musicologist and editor, Wilibald Gurlitt. He studied in Berlin theory and composition with Hugo Kaun, composition with Engelbert Humperdinck, conducting with Karl Muck, and piano with Rudolf Breithaupt and Moritz Mayer-Mahr.

From 1908 to 1910, Manfred Gurlitt was a coach at the Berlin Court Opera, and then acted as musical assistant to Karl Muck at Bayreuth. In 1911-1912, he was 2nd conductor in Essen, then in Augsburg for 2 years. In 1914, he was given the post of 1st conductor at the « Bremen Stadttheater » , a job he held until 1924. In 1920, he founded a Society for New Music in Bremen to encourage avant-garde and rarely heard pre-Classical works. In 1924, he returned to Berlin and was granted the title of « Generalmusikdirektor » , appeared as a guest-conductor at the State Opera and on the Berlin Radio, and taught at the « Hochschule für Musik » (or « Charlottenburg Musikhochschule ») . Later, he appeared as guest Opera conductor in Germany and Spain.

After the Nazis came to power in 1933, Manfred Gurlitt was denounced as a « cultural Bolshevik » and lost his official posts. In order to avoid being arrested by the « Gestapo » , he emigrated to Japan in 1939 where he became active as an Opera conductor. In 1953, he founded his own Gurlitt Opera Company in Tokyo, and, in 1969, he became a professor at the Showa College of Music.

In 1956, Manfred Gurlitt was awarded the Distinguished Service Cross of the German Federal Republic's order of merit, however, he never returned to live in Germany, bitter at the neglect of his music in post-War Germany.

His Opera « Wozzeck » (1926) , after the play by Georg Büchner, appeared 4 months after the Opera of the same title by Alban Berg and has remained in its shadow. He also wrote « Soldaten » (1930) after the play by Jakob Michaël Reinhold Lenz and « Nana » (1933) after the novel by Émile Zola.

The odds were against him and it was bad luck for the composer and conductor Manfred Gurlitt who was born in Berlin, in 1890, and studied with Engelbert Humperdinck and Karl Muck. Under the Nazi regime, he lost his official posts, while opportunists like Werner Egk, Carl Orff, Hans Pfitzner and Richard Strauß were critically acclaimed. Gurlitt emigrated to Japan, where he returned to after the War when he failed to continue his professional career in his mother country. He died in Tokyo at 81. His music fell into oblivion : songs and chamber music, Symphonic and stage works. He created a distinct expressionist style embracing elements of late-Romanticism, neo-Classicism, 12 tone technique and free atonality.

Politically, Manfred Gurlitt was a leftist and the socially critical selection of his Opera themes qualified him, intellectually and literarily, as a differentiated personality. The duplicity of events became his fate. His setting of « Wozzeck » was staged at the « Bremer Stadttheater » during his term as general music-director only 4 months after the outstanding premiere, in 1925, at the « Berliner Staatsoper » of the Opera of the same title by Alban Berg.

5 years later, he composed the Opera « Soldaten » after the play by Jakob Michaël Reinhold Lenz which faced strong competition from the so far unprecedented avant-garde Opera of the same title by Bernd Alois Zimmermann written 3 decades later.

Gurlitt's « Wozzeck » is nevertheless a major work of expressionism : released on CD (Capriccio 60052-1, distributed by Delta Music) with great soloists, the RIAS chamber choir and « Rundfunkchor » in Berlin as well as the « Deutsche Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » under the baton of Gerd Albrecht. Good is definitely not the enemy of the better. Unlike Alban Berg who chose 15 of a total of 26 scenes from Georg Büchner's Woyzeck-Fragment (in the adaptation by Karl Emil Franzos using a different title, text and characters) and split them into 3 Acts, Manfred Gurlitt took 18 scenes from the same text source and added an epilogue. Formally, Gurlitt followed Büchner's intention more closely than Berg as he did not try to tone down the linguistic directness of the original text nor create seamless transitions with flamboyant interludes.

Manfred Gurlitt's Opera sets distinct accents in the characterization of figures, discovers events e.g. the main fairy tale - which Berg ignored. The cynism of humiliating medical trials is not dealt with. It is difficult to understand how this explosive work which uses very subtle, partly inconspicuous, partly flamboyant expressional techniques, could go unnoticed. Thanks to Albrecht : he opened a real treasure chest which could go down in history.

La toute Ire étude biographique consacrée à Anton Bruckner en langue française va paraître à Genève l'année de sa mort : elle était due au compositeur suisse Émile Jacques-Dalcroze, qui avait été son élève au Conservatoire de Vienne, de 1887 à 1889.

1897

Composed early in 1897, or possibly even in 1896, is the 1st version of the 22 year old Arnold Schœnberg's String Quartet in D major (1st movement) ; the work will not be put into its definitive form until after Alexander von Zemlinsky reviews it and offers criticism. Schœnberg later confirms during summer 1897 (after Johannes Brahms's death) as the date of composition of the Quartet, and the only surviving manuscript (the revised version) bears the date of October 1897, but Hanns Eisler (who will study with Schœnberg decades later) and Zemlinsky both indicate this work as the Quartet which Zemlinsky shows to Brahms, who is intrigued with the piece, so the discarded version of the Quartet had to be composed before Brahms died. When Zemlinsky tells Brahms that Schœnberg has been scraping-out a living by arranging and copying music, Brahms offers to pay Schœnberg's tuition to study at the Vienna Conservatory ; Schœnberg turns it down. Although the earlier version was apparently quite different from the revised one which we know, the Quartet in D is indeed the most significant early piece composed by Schœnberg, and the only one likely to attract such strong attention from Brahms. It is possible that this is the last piece of new music Brahms reviewed.

Arnold Schœnberg

Le compositeur, peintre et théoricien autrichien Arnold Schönberg est né le 13 septembre 1874 à Vienne, et mort le 13 juillet 1951 à Los Angeles. 2 siècles après Jean-Sébastien Bach et Jean-Philippe Rameau, qui avaient posé les fondements de la musique tonale, il émancipa la musique de la tonalité et inventa le dodécaphonisme, qui aura une influence marquante sur la musique du XXe siècle.

Arnold Schönberg fut avant tout autodidacte. Il reçut uniquement des leçons de contrepoint de celui qui devint son 1er beau-frère, le compositeur Alexander von Zemlinsky. Il fonda avec ses élèves Alban Berg et Anton Webern la « Seconde École de Vienne », avant de s'installer à Berlin pour y enseigner la musique. Pédagogue et théoricien de réputation mondiale, Schönberg eut pour autres élèves notamment Hanns Eisler, Egon Wellesz, Otto Klemperer, Theodor W. Adorno, Viktor Ullmann, Winfried Zillig, René Leibowitz, Nikos Skalkottas, Josef Rufer, Roberto Gerhard et John Cage avec lequel il entretenait une relation très amicale.

Après des œuvres qui procèdent de son admiration pour Richard Wagner et Richard Strauß, dont il a assimilé l'art avec une prodigieuse Maîtrise (« la Nuit transfigurée », sextuor à cordes, 1899 ; les « Gurrelieder », cantate profane en 2 parties pour chœurs, solistes et grand orchestre, 1900-1911 ; le Quatuor à cordes n° 1, 1905), il élimine au terme d'une profonde évolution (dont les étapes principales sont le Quatuor à cordes n° 2, 1908, avec sa partie pour soprano dans le dernier mouvement, sur un poème approprié de Stefan George affirmant « je respire l'air d'autres planètes » ; les 5 Pièces pour orchestre, 1909 ; les 6 Petites pièces pour piano, 1911) les relations tonales et élabore le mode de déclamation du « Sprechgesang » (chant parlé) avec « Pierrot lunaire » pour soprano et 8 instruments solistes, en 1912. Cette composition l'établit définitivement en tête des compositeurs les plus influents de son temps. Igor Stravinsky (3 Poésies de la lyrique japonaise) et Maurice Ravel (3 Poèmes de Stéphane Mallarmé) l'imitent, Darius Milhaud le fait jouer à Paris et Ernest Ansermet à Zürich, tandis que l'Europe musicale se divise en atonalistes et anti-atonalistes, ces derniers n'hésitant pas à perturber des concerts (« Skandalkonzert »), et à demander le renvoi de Schönberg de sa chaire de professeur.

The Austrian composer and painter Arnold Schönberg was born on 13 September 1874 into a lower middle-class Jewish family in the « Leopoldstadt » district (in earlier times, a Jewish ghetto) of Vienna, at « Obere Donaustraße Nr. 5 » ; and died on 13 July 1951. He was associated with the expressionist movement in German poetry and art, and leader of the « Second Viennese School ». With the rise of the Nazi Party, by 1938, Schönberg's works were labelled as « degenerate music » because he was Jewish. He moved to the United States in 1934.

Schönberg's approach, both in terms of harmony and development, has been one of the most influential of 20th Century musical thought. Many European and American composers from at least 3 generations have consciously extended his thinking, whereas others have passionately reacted against it.

Schönberg was known early in his career for simultaneously extending the traditionally opposed German Romantic styles of Johannes Brahms and Richard Wagner. Later, his name would come to personify innovations in atonality (although Schönberg himself detested that term) that would become the most polemical feature of 20th Century art music. In the 1920's, Schönberg developed the 12 tone technique, an influential compositional method of manipulating an ordered series of all 12 notes in the chromatic scale. He also coined the term developing variation and was the 1st modern composer to embrace ways of developing motifs without resorting to the dominance of a centralized melodic idea.

Schönberg was also a painter, an important music theorist, and an influential teacher of composition ; his students included Alban Berg, Anton Webern, Hanns Eisler, Egon Wellesz and, later, John Cage, Lou Harrison, Earl Kim, Leon Kirchner, and other prominent musicians. Many of Schönberg's practices, including the formalization of compositional method and his habit of openly inviting audiences to think analytically, are echoed in « avant-garde » musical thought throughout the 20th Century. His often polemical views of music history and aesthetics were crucial to many significant 20th Century musicologists and critics, including Theodor W. Adorno, Charles Rosen and Carl Dahlhaus, as well as the pianists Artur Schnabel, Rudolf Serkin, Eduard Steuermann and Glenn Gould.

Schönberg's archival legacy is collected at the « Arnold Schönberg Center » , in Vienna.

Schönberg's father, Samuel, a native of Bratislava, was a shop-keeper and his mother, Pauline, was native of Prague. Arnold was largely self-taught. He took only counterpoint lessons with the composer Alexander von Zemlinsky, who was to become his 1st brother-in-law.

In his 20's, Arnold Schönberg earned a living by orchestrating Operettas, while composing his own works, such as the String Sextet « Verklärte Nacht » (Transfigured Night) , in 1899. He later made an orchestral version of this, which became one of his most popular pieces. Both Richard Strauß and Gustav Mahler recognized Schönberg's significance as a composer ; Strauß when he encountered Schönberg's « Gurre-Lieder » , and Mahler after hearing several of Schönberg's early works.

Strauß turned to a more conservative idiom in his own work after 1909 and, at that point, dismissed Schönberg. Mahler adopted him as a « protégé » and continued to support him, even after Schönberg's style reached a point Mahler could no longer understand. Mahler worried about who would look after him after his death. Schönberg, who had initially despised and mocked Mahler's music, was converted by the « thunderbolt » of Mahler's 3rd Symphony, which he considered a work of genius. Afterward, he « spoke of Mahler as a Saint » .

In 1898, Schönberg converted to Christianity in the Lutheran church ; partly to strengthen his attachment to Western European cultural traditions, and partly as a means of self-defence « in a time of resurgent anti-Semitism » . In 1933, after long meditation, he returned to Judaism, because he realised that « his racial and religious heritage was inescapable » , and to take-up an unmistakable position on the side opposing Nazism. He would self-identify as a member of the Jewish religion later in life.

In October 1901, he married Mathilde Zemlinsky, the sister of the conductor and composer Alexander von Zemlinsky, with whom Schönberg had been studying since about 1894. He and Mathilde had 2 children : Gertrud (1902-1947) and Georg (1906-1974) . Gertrud would marry Schönberg's pupil, Felix Greißle, in 1921. During the summer of 1908, his wife Mathilde left him for several months for a young Austrian painter, Richard Gerstl. This period marked a distinct change in Schönberg's work. It was during the absence of his wife that he composed « Du lehnst wider eine Silberweide » (You lean against a silver-willow) , the 13th song in the cycle, « Das Buch der Hängenden Gärten » , Opus 15, based on the collection of the same name by the German mystical poet Stefan George. This was the 1st composition without any reference at all to a key. Also, in this year, he completed one of his most revolutionary compositions, the String Quartet No. 2, whose 1st 2 movements, though chromatic in colour, use traditional key-signatures, yet, whose final 2 movements, also settings of George, daringly weaken the links with traditional tonality. Both movements end on tonic chords, and the work is not fully non-tonal. Breaking with previous String Quartet practice, it incorporates a soprano vocal line.

During the summer of 1910, Schönberg wrote his « Harmonielehre » (Theory of Harmony) , which remains one of the most influential music-theory books. From about 1911, Schönberg belonged to a circle of artists and intellectuals who included Lene Schneider-Kainer, Franz Werfel, Herwarth Walden and the latter's wife, Else Lasker-Schüler.

In 1910, he met Edward Clark, an English music journalist then working in Germany. Clark became his sole English student and, in his later capacity as a producer for the BBC, he was responsible for introducing many of Schönberg's works, and Schönberg himself, to Britain (as well as Anton Webern, Alban Berg and others) .

Another of his most important works from this atonal or pan-tonal period is the highly-influential « Pierrot lunaire » , Opus 21, of 1912, a novel cycle of expressionist songs set to a German translation of poems by the Belgian-French poet Albert Giraud. Utilizing the technique of « Sprechstimme » , or melodramatically spoken recitation, the work pairs a female vocalist with a small ensemble of 5 musicians. The ensemble, which is now commonly referred to as the « Pierrot ensemble » , consists of flute (doubling on piccolo) , clarinet (doubling on bass clarinet) , violin (doubling on viola) , violoncello, speaker, and piano.

Wilhelm Bopp, director of the Vienna Conservatory from 1907, wanted a break from the stale environment personified for him by Robert Fuchs and Hermann Grædener. Having considered many candidates, he offered teaching positions to Schönberg and Franz Schreker, in 1912. At the time, Schönberg lived in Berlin. He was not completely cut-off from the Vienna Conservatory, having taught a private theory course 1 year earlier. He seriously considered the offer, but he declined. Writing afterward to Alban Berg, he cited his « aversion to Vienna » as the main reason for his decision, while contemplating that it might have been the wrong one financially, but having made it he felt content. A couple of months later, he wrote to Schreker suggesting that it might have been a bad idea for him as well to accept the teaching position.

23 février 1897 : Knowing that his being a Jew is the biggest obstacle to his career, Gustav Mahler is himself baptized into the Roman Catholic faith at « Little Michael » Church, in Hamburg. He is the most reluctant, the most resentful, of converts.

He tells Bruno Walter :

« I had to go through it. »

He informs Ludwig Karpath :

« This action which I took-out of self-preservation, and which I was fully-prepared to take, cost me a great deal. »

He tells a Hamburg writer :

« I've changed my coat. »

There is no false piety here, no pretense. Mahler is letting it be known for the record that he is a forced convert, one whose Jewish pride is undiminished, his essence unchanged.

He tells a critic :

« An artist who is a Jew has to achieve twice as much as one who is not, just as a swimmer with short arms has to make double efforts. »

After the act of conversion he never attends Mass, never goes to confession, never crosses himself. The only time he ever enters a church for a religious purpose is to get married. »

« He was born a Jew but has been described as a life-long agnostic. At one point, he converted to Catholicism, purely for the purpose of obtaining a job that he coveted - director of the Court Opera of Vienna. It was unthinkable for a Jew to hold such a prestigious position, hence, the utilitarian conversion to the State religion. »

(Warren Allen Smith. « Celebrities in Hell » , ChelCbooks, New York, 2002 ; pages 76-77.)

« Mahler had followed the common path of assimilationist Jews, particularly those who were German-speaking and University-educated : toward a dignified job, a position in the community, and a respectable income. Besides the fact that anti-Semitism was rife in Vienna, the post Mahler sought was a government position and normally open only to those who declared themselves to belong to the State religion : Catholicism. Mahler's superior, the intendant of the Vienna Opera, reported directly to the Emperor. Like the many Jews who were candidates for lesser government jobs, Mahler was officially baptized on 23 February 1897. His appointment arrived soon after. »

(Stuart Feder. « Mahler at Midnight » , « Gustav Mahler : A Life in Crisis » , Yale University Press, 2004 ; pages 63-64.)

« Gustav Mahler (1860-1911) was more of an agnostic than a believer, but the Symphonies which he wrote are deeply spiritual works. He was a Jew who became a Roman Catholic, a move perhaps dictated to some degree by political motives. »

« It is particularly poor salesmanship for Ms. Raabe to cite Mahler's supposed conversion from Judaism to Catholicism. In both law and common understanding, a choice made under duress is discounted as lacking in free will. Mahler converted as a mere formality under compulsion of a bigoted law that barred Jews from directorship of the Vienna " Hofoper ". Mahler, himself, joked about the conversion with his Jewish friends, and, no doubt, would view with bitter amusement the obtuseness of Ms. Raabe's understanding of the cruel choice forced on him : either convert to Christianity or forfeit the professional post for which you are supremely destined. When Mahler was asked why he never composed a Mass, he answered bluntly that he could never, with any degree of artistic or spiritual integrity, voice the “ Credo ”. He was a confirmed agnostic, a doubter and seeker, never a soul at rest or at peace. »

(Joel Martel. « Mahler and Religion ; Forced to Be Christian » , « The New York Times » .)

Mars 1897 : Preceded by a lecture about Gustav Mahler which was published as a booklet, in Berlin, Felix Weingartner conducts 2nd, 3rd, and 6th movements of Mahler's 3rd Symphony, before a full-house, to very mixed reviews. Later that month, in the midst of his 1st international concert tour, Mahler successfully performs the « Blumenstück » , in Budapest.

Hugo Wolf composes « Gedichte von Michelangelo » , songs on poems by Michelangelo.

3 avril 1897 : Founding of the « Vererinigug Bildender Künstler Österreichs » (Association of Austrian Fine-Artists) , commonly known as the « Secession » . Chiefly the idea of Gustav Klimt, Josef Engelhart, and Carl Moll, it is the most important event in the « fin de siècle » Vienna art-world.

Because of her ties to both Klimt and Moll, Alma Schindler is intimately involved with the « Secession » . Alma is considered by those in her social circle to be the « prettiest girl in Vienna » , and she is wooed by many older and well-established men, both single and married. Her strongest ambition is to make a mark as a great composer.

Mort de Johannes Brahms

3 avril 1897 : Décès de Johannes Brahms à Vienne à sa résidence du 4 de la « Karlsgasse » , à près de 64 ans, d'un cancer du foie selon quelques biographies, mais il s'agirait en réalité d'un cancer du pancréas. Il est inhumé au Cimetière central de Vienne, tout comme Ludwig van Beethoven et Franz Schubert.

The evening papers announced that Johannes Brahms had breathed his last ; the next day, the morning papers took-up the tale and Vienna's florists had cause to believe that they were having a good year. Perhaps, a measure of Brahms's more general popularity, or perhaps, reflecting the superiority of the spring flower supply, it took 5 wagons (as opposed to Anton Bruckner's 2) to carry the wreaths, which numbered more than 200. Unlike Bruckner, who had specified his last resting place in his will and caused his Viennese « cortège » to terminate at the railway station, Brahms left only an un-signed will and no written specifications for the disposal of his remains. This was probably a good thing for his Viennese friends, since, as reported in the « Neue Wiener Tagblatt » , he had repeatedly expressed a wish to have his body cremated, and this was by no means the local custom. An excuse for a burial, however, was found. It took this form :

« On the other hand, on the occasion of Billroth's funeral, pointing to the graves of Beethoven and Schubert, he uttered to Max Kalbeck : " One would rest well here ! " All these circumstances were discussed in his circle of friends ; finally, it was agreed that Brahms be committed to the ground. As soon as news of the Master's passing reached the Town Hall, the City of Vienna voted him a grave of honour. »

This was not the end of the matter, since it occasioned a lengthy discussion at a specially convened session of the directors of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » which, in lieu (rather than in spite) of relatives of the deceased, had undertaken to run the funeral. The result of this discussion, that the body would indeed be buried, was reported the next day in the « Neue Wiener Tagblatt » .

The funeral itself was held on 6 April. Brahms began his last journey at half past 2, a half hour earlier than Bruckner had begun his. Sealed in a metal coffin and carried in a glass-walled hearse drawn (like Bruckner's) by 6 horses, the body was taken from No. 4 « Karlsgasse » to the nearby « Karlskirche » . Unlike Bruckner, however, Brahms, being nominally protestant, did not go in. Nevertheless, by making this the point where the already enormous « cortège » gathered and marshalled even more persons, the Viennese gave Brahms (and themselves) the next best thing to a service in the « Karlskirche » . The procession itself included people at the head of Vienna's arts administration, such as the General Intendant, Baron Bezecny, and Privy Councillor Nikolaus Dumba, composers such as Antonín Dvořák and (much lower down the list) Ignaz Brüll, Eduard Schütt, Richard Heuberger, Hans Köbler, and Anton Rükauf, just about every chamber ensemble, instrumentalist, and singer (including Anton Stermans, whose career was really blossoming, thanks to the « Vier ernste Gesänge ») numerous representatives of major musical institutions outside Vienna, people whose businesses had done well out of Brahms, such as the concert-agents Alexander Rosé and Emil Gutmann, a considerable contingent from the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , representatives of choral and literary Societies, and a larger contingent of journalists than that noted as being present at Bruckner's funeral : Max Kalbeck, Robert Hirschfeld, Theodor Helm, Gustav Schönaich, and Albert Kauders, not to forget Richard Heuberger who was already listed as a composer. This is not to say that journalists other than Helm were not also at Bruckner's funeral, nor that other journalists than those listed were not present at Brahms's. Their listing, however, seems to imply an « official » presence indicating a larger number of journalists who were close to Brahms, as well as giving some indication of the ranking of journalists in terms of perceived importance. Although the wreath sent by the city of Vienna sat atop the coffin along with the wreath from Brahms's native city of Hamburg, there was not the prominence of city council presence which had characterized Bruckner's funeral. This was very much the day of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , Brahms's « family » .

The « cortège » , led by a standard-bearer in old Spanish dress, made its way across the « Karlsplatz » to the « Gesellschaft » 's own buildings, where it made a station so that Brahms could receive the official farewell of the vice-president of the « Gesellschaft » , Doctor Billing, and the director of the « Konzervatorium » , Johann Nepomuk Fuchs. The « Gesellschaft » 's Choral Society, the « Singverein » , sang Brahms's « Fahr wohl » . After this station, the procession continued through the streets, past the Opera and, eventually, to the protestant church on « Dorotheergasse » , where government and city dignitaries, including a representative of the education minister and the 2 vice-Mayors, the musician Otto Franz representing the Duke of Meiningen, Wilhelm Jahn, director of the Court Opera, and the composer Carl Goldmark, awaited its arrival. The papers reported that the church choir sang « Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath » by Felix Mendelssohn. This, however, is not correct ; the choir actually sang a Chorale, but the largely Roman Catholic congregation, not knowing it, did not join in. Pastor Zimmermann delivered a panegyric, the « Wiener Männergesangsverein » sang Carl Gottlieb Reissiger's « Wanderers Nachtfahrt » , as was its custom on such occasions, and the procession began the final leg of its journey to the « Zentralfriedhof » .

The « cortège » arrived at the cemetery gate at half past 5. Here, the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , once more, took charge of the proceedings. At the gate, its general secretary, Ludwig Koch, distributed wax candles to 12 men, including Max Kalbeck and Richard Heuberger, who conducted their revered Master to his final resting place, grave No. 27, opposite Ludwig van Beethoven and in the vicinity of Franz Schubert and Johann Herbeck. Brahms's pupil, Richard von Perger, had the last word and the funeral was ended. Subsequent memorials to Brahms will be performed during the concert season.

These later years for the composer saw him living a comfortable life. His music, since 1860 anyway, had sold well, and Brahms, far from flamboyant or excessive, lived a frugal life in his simple apartment. A shrewd investor, Brahms did well in the stock market. His wealth, however, was rivaled by his generosity, as Brahms often gave money to friends and young musical students.

Brahms' commitment to his craft showed he was a perfectionist. He often destroyed finished pieces he deemed unworthy, including some 20 String Quartets. In 1890, Brahms claimed he was giving up composing, but the stance was short-lived, and before long he was back at it again.

Over his last years, Brahms completed « Vier ernste Gesänge » , which drew on work from the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament. It was a revealing piece for the composer, damning what was found on earth and embracing death as a relief from the material world's excesses and pain.

Brahms himself certainly had death on his mind. On May 20, 1896, his old friend Clara Schumann passed away after several years of health problems. Around this time, Brahms' own health began to deteriorate. Doctors discovered that his liver was in poor condition. Brahms gave his last performance in March 1897, in Vienna. He died a month later, on April 3, 1897, from complications due to cancer.

...

In 1890, when Brahms was 57 years old, he decided to give-up composing. Nevertheless, he couldn't resist himself from the world of music and compositions and, in his last years before his death, he crafted a number of accredited Masterpieces. His admiration for Richard Mühlfeld (a German clarinetist) inspired Brahms to compose the « Clarinet Trio » ; « Clarinet Quintet » (1891) ; and the 2 « Clarinet Sonatas » (1894) . He also wrote several cycles of piano pieces ; « the 4 Serious Songs » (1896) ; and « the 11 Chorale Preludes » for organ (1896) . While completing the Opus 121 Songs, Brahms developed cancer (still unclear whether it was of the liver or pancreas) . His condition eventually deteriorated and he expired on April 3, 1897, at the age of 63. Brahms was buried in the « Zentralfriedhof » , in Vienna.

...

When he was about 60 years old, Brahms began to age rapidly, and his production decreased sharply. He often spoke of having arrived at the end of his creative activity. Nonetheless, the works of this last period are awesome in their magnificence and concentration, and the last of his published works, the « Vier ernste Gesänge » (4 Serious Songs) , are among the high-points of his career. Brahms's health took a turn for the worse after he heard the news of the death of Clara Schumann, in 1896. On April 3, 1897, he died of cancer of the liver. He was buried next to Beethoven and Franz Schubert (1797-1828) and was honoured by Vienna and the entire musical world.

...

While completing the Opus 121 Songs, Brahms developed cancer (sources differ on whether this was of the liver or pancreas) . His last appearance in public was on 3 March 1897, when he saw Hans Richter conduct his 4th Symphony. There was an ovation after each of the 4 movements. His condition gradually worsened and he died a month later, on 3 April 1897, aged 63. Brahms is buried in the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna, under a monument by Victor Horta and the sculptor Ilse von Twardowski-Conrat.

In 1896, when he was 63 years old, Johannes Brahms, who had always been demonstrably in good health, developed an icterus of increasing intensity together with a considerable enlargement of the liver and loss of weight. Since infectious hepatitis could scarcely come into the question, from the medical point of view a neoplasm in the region of the liver as well as cirrhosis of the liver were considered. While hepatic carcinoma is a relatively rare disease in Europe even today and Brahms, on the other hand, had consumed copious quantities of concentrated alcoholic drinks during his lifetime, cirrhosis of the liver is the most probable diagnosis, especially as at the end hemorrhages from esophageal varices and the lower intestinal segments occurred.

By all accounts, he was a short, bad-tempered, bearded fat guy who frequently drank too much, and who, later in life, acquired the habit of falling asleep in Vienna pastry shops at tea time, much to the amazed glee of passing tourists. This was Johannes Brahms ?

Too true, said researcher Mitchell Margolis. All of these well-documented Brahmsian traits, Margolis said, suggest that the composer of history's most famous lullaby suffered from obstructive sleep apnea - a sleeping disorder.

« The disorder was not known to medical science at the time, and he clearly went undiagnosed » , Margolis said.

« It had been described for decades or even Centuries, but it was not recognized as an adverse health disorder. »

But it is. Obstructive sleep apnea, Margolis said, occurs when someone's upper respiratory tract closes off during sleep, often because fatty tissue compresses the airway.

When it happens, most commonly with a supine sleeper, the victim will gurgle and snort, gulp, wake-up halfway and go back to sleep, usually snoring like a train, only to lurch again into semi-consciousness a few minutes later. This is not restful.

Margolis, a pulmonary physician at the University of Pennsylvania Veterans Affairs Medical Center in Philadelphia, is one of a significant group of scientists who, as a sidelight, study the illnesses of history's giants. In the case of Brahms, Margolis said, he sought a « further understanding of his life and music » .

Life, as Margolis pointed-out, could be fairly dreary after a night of apnea. It probably pushed Brahms toward chronic ill temper, general irritability, intermittent depression and a habit of nodding-off inconveniently during the day.

Brahms' final illness, which lasted more than a year, was characterized by jaundice. Although Brahms probably died of pancreatic cancer as researcher Mitchell Margolis concluded, he could also have had hepatic carcinoma. Because of Brahms' extensive life-long alcohol consumption, he could have had cirrhosis of the liver as a precursor to the liver cancer. As quoted by Franz Hermann Franken and Karel B. Absolon :

« He looked terribly miserable. The thin white beard, the withered face, the yellow eyes, the flabby thin body, his clothes hanging like on a hanger. »

Brahms' doctor was quoted to have said :

« After a careful repeated examination and after observation for 3 weeks, I found considerable swelling of the liver with complete obstruction of the biliary ducts. »

Therefore, there is no question that Brahms could have had either primary or metastatic cancer of the liver.

According to Franken and Absolon, Brahms' symptoms and clinical course make a primary liver cancer less likely. The jaundice present from the start is not typical for a primary cancer of the liver. On the other hand, an early obstruction of the common bile duct is usual in cancer of the head of the pancreas. Then, according to Franken and Absolon, Brahms did not die in a hepatic coma, which with liver metastases is fairly common.

It is interesting to note that Brahms had a close friend, Theodor Billroth (1829-1894) , the famous abdominal surgeon. Brahms never excused Billroth for « ... cutting out an autographed phrase from his A minor String Quartet (an innovative work dedicated to Billroth) . Billroth attached it to Brahms' photograph, framed and hung it in his office » .

Why Billroth did not operate on Brahms or was not consulted for Brahms' jaundice is a mystery to me. Whether Brahms' presumed obstructive sleep apnea had anything to do with his terminal illness, we will never know, but I doubt it.

Die letzten zwei Jahrzehnte seines Lebens war Brahms eine führende Persönlichkeit der internationalen Musikszene und wurde als Pianist, Dirigent und Komponist bewundert und verehrt. Zahlreiche Auszeichnungen und Ehrenmitgliedschaften wurden ihm verliehen, was Brahms mit den Worten kommentierte :

« Wenn mir eine hübsche Melodie einfällt, ist mir das lieber als ein Leopoldsorden. »

1889 wurde ihm die Ehrenbürgerschaft von Hamburg verliehen.

Im gleichen Jahr entstand ein Zeugnis besonderer Art : Am 2. Dezember 1889 spielte Brahms im Haus seines Freundes Doktor Richard Fellingner einen Teil des Ungarischen Tanzes Nummer 1 auf dem Klavier und wurde dabei mit einem Phonographen aufgenommen. Die Aufnahme bietet trotz ihrer schlechten Qualität das einzige authentische Zeugnis von Brahms eigenem Klavierspiel. Zudem könnte die Ansage teilweise von ihm selbst gesprochen worden sein.

Brahms starb am 3. April 1897 im Alter von 63 Jahren in Wieden (Wien) , Karlsgasse 4, nach Angaben einiger Biografien an Leberkrebs, nach jüngeren Angaben an einem Pankreaskarzinom. Er wurde in einem Ehrengrab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Gruppe 32A, Nummer 26) bestattet. Das von der Bildhauerin Ilse Conrat (1880-1942) gestaltete Grabdenkmal wurde am 7. Mai 1903, dem 70. Geburtstag Brahms, mit großer Feierlichkeit enthüllt.

Brahms : années 1895-1897

Few events remain for record in the life of Johannes Brahms nearly to the end of its progress. Of these few, several have the pathetic interest of last visits to dear and familiar places made, so far as appears, without presentiment that they were final. The composer was present at a 3 days' Festival held in Meiningen, on September 27-29 ; « the Festival of the 3 B's » , as it has sometimes been called, from the circumstance that the programmes were devoted to works by Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms. Those of Brahms selected for performance included the « Song of Triumph » ; the 4th Symphony ; the B-flat Pianoforte Concerto, with Eugène d'Albert as pianist ; the Clarinet Sonatas performed by the same artist with Richard Mühlfeld ; some of the Vocal Quartets ; amongst them, the early favourite « Alternative Dance Song » ; and others.

The Festival was an immense success, and the pleasure which the Master derived from the concerts is evident in the following lines written to Steinbach immediately after the last one :

« Dear Friend,

However tempted I may feel, I dare not break in upon your well-deserved rest ; but you shall find my hearty greeting awaiting you on your happy awakening ; how hearty and grateful it is there is no need to tell you in detail. You must have perceived each day that you gave me and all who took part in your splendid Festival, a quite exceptional pleasure. »

Brahms was, of course, a guest at the castle, and he remained on for a few days after the last concert. Leaving Meiningen, on October 3, he proceeded to Frankfurt on a flying visit to « Frau » Clara Schumann. Professor Hubert Ferdinand Kufferath of the Brussels Conservatoire, with Mr. and Mrs. Edward Speyer, accompanied him on the short journey, and were, by his particular suggestion, invited to spend the evening at « Frau » Schumann's house. Professor Kufferath, a pupil of Felix Mendelssohn at Leipzig and, on a very old footing of intimacy at the Schumanns', had been for more than 20 years on terms of cordial friendship with Brahms also, though the 2 men met but seldom. « Frau » Schumann's daughters, Marie and Eugénie, and Stockhausen, were the only others present. The hours were spent in pleasant chat as between old friends, and music was represented only by a few of Brahms' folk-songs sung by Mrs. Speyer (« Fräulein » Antonia Kufferath) to the Master's accompaniment.

Brahms left the next morning, but before his departure, he requested his old friend to play to him. 42 years had passed since Schumann had desired him to play for the 1st time to her, marking both musicians with inevitable outward signs. The traces of suffering and sorrow had deepened of late on « Frau » Schumann's countenance, but those who were happy enough to listen to her playing at this period, in the privacy of her home, knew that her spirit was still young, and Brahms' last remembrance of the great artist, the remembrance of an old age which had left the poetry of her genius untouched, will have fitly completed the long chain of personal associations begun when Schumann called his wife to rejoice with him in the daring power and Romantic enthusiasm of Johannes' inexperienced youth. When she rose from the piano on that October morning, the final link had been added. « Frau » Schumann and Brahms were not to meet again on earth.

A 4 days' Festival in October (19-22) to celebrate the inauguration of the new concert-hall at Zürich seems to carry us more than one stage nearer the end. It brought Brahms for the last time to Switzerland to conduct his « Triumphlied » ; a fine close (for as such it may almost be regarded) to a noble career.

Let us pause for a moment to picture the robust figure of the composer as he stands before the vast audience completely filling the brilliantly lighted hall, and leads with sure, quiet dignity the « masses of chorus and orchestra » that swell-out in proud tones of thankfulness for his country's glory. Listen ! for with the sounds of the grand old hymn « Now thank we all our God » the bells of victory are pealing, and a sensation of happiness spreads through the mass of hearers, a vibration that stirs something of the feeling which roused the great German audience at Cologne to enthusiasm as they listened 20 years ago to the same jubilant tones. Who so fitted to raise the strain as the patriot citizen of ancient Hamburg, the unique descendant of the mighty Bach, the musician of true, rich, loving spirit, conqueror of life and of himself, our Johannes Brahms ? Conqueror, too, of death ; for surely, we cannot be mistaken in accepting the likeness of the Master, that looks down with those of the greatest of his art from the painted ceiling of the new hall, as the symbol of a further life to be his even here on earth, when he has entered the darkness that is soon to cover him from our sight.

Brahms was in overflowing spirits during the entire Festival, enjoying the concerts, the private gatherings, the meetings with old friends, in a mood of harmless gaiety that recalls the Detmold Ducal Palace days.

« We have seen Brahms and Joachim together again, both in full vigour ; may we not hope for a prolongation of this happy state of things ? » , writes Steiner a few days after the Festival.

Josef Viktor Widmann was, of course, there, and stayed with Brahms at Hegar's house. When he bade the Master farewell on the day after the concert, the 2 friends clasped hands in a final grasp.

One of Brahms' late public appearances was on the occasion of the concert given in the « Börsendorfer » Hall, in Vienna, by Signorina Alice Barbi (now, the Baroness Wolff Homersee) shortly before her marriage. He pleased himself by acting as accompanist to the distinguished cantatrice, whose programme included a number of his songs. He held the « bâton » for the last time on a Vienna platform when he directed the performance of his « Academic Festival » Overture by the students of the Conservatory at the Festival concert given to celebrate the 25th anniversary (1895) of the opening of the present home of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » . He officiated for the last time in public at Eugène d'Albert's concert in Berlin, of January 10, 1896, conducting his 2 Pianoforte Concertos and the « Academic Festival » Overture, and was received with the usual enthusiasm. Charles Villiers Stanford speaks of being present at a dinner party given by Joseph Joachim during Brahms' brief visit.

« Joachim, in a few well-chosen words, was asking us not to lose the opportunity of drinking the health of the greatest composer - when, before he could say the name, Brahms started to his feet, glass in hand, and calling-out " Quite right ; here's to Mozart's health ", walked round clinking glasses with us all. His old hatred of personal eulogy was never more prettily expressed ... The last vision I had of him was as he sat beside the diminutive form of the aged Menzel, drinking in, like a school boy, every word the great old artist said with an attitude as full of unaffected reverence as of unconscious dignity. »

Of all modern painters, Adolph von Menzel was the most admired by Brahms. He visited him on several occasions, and spoke of him and his works with unflinching enthusiasm.

That the Master had realized a competence some years before his death (more than a competence for one of his extraordinarily simple habits) is generally known. How he regarded it, how he used it, may have been but little suspected outside a small circle. His friend and publisher, the late head of the firm of Simrock, shared his confidence on the subject more than anyone else, for it was often through his agency that Brahms' munificence was applied to its object ; the substantial help, perhaps, of a needy musician, or a promising talent. He contributed more than one large donation to the « Franz Liszt Pensionsverein » of Hamburg, a Society founded by Liszt, in 1840, for the benefit of aged or disabled members of the « Stadt Theater Orchester » . Several authentic stories are told by accidental witnesses of some of his particular acts of generosity. One has been related to the author by the « Landgraf » of Hesse, who was sitting with the Master one morning when a caller appeared with a tale of distress which touched his heart. He listened quietly, asked some questions, then went to his writing-table, and, handing his visitor the entire sum of money towards which he was asked for a contribution, said quietly :

« Take this from me ; I do not need it. I have more money than I want for myself. »

This was his usual formula on such occasions, « I do not need it » , to which was sometimes added :

« If you should ever have it in your power, you can pay me back. »

Brahms' heart was of gold, if ever such existed. He was rough sometimes (often, perhaps) let it be freely granted. The spoiled humours of his last 2 or 3 years have already been noted ; they do not amount to much. He permitted himself deliberately to repulse strangers or slight acquaintances when he felt so disposed ; necessarily, if his time and tranquillity were to be protected. Now and then, he was inconsiderate or blunt to his friends. The concentration of mind, the sacrifice of immediate inclination, the devotion of energy, involved in the fulfilment of the career of genius are often but imperfectly realized even by the friends of a famous man. The great poet, the great painter, the great musician, has his brilliant rewards. He has also his bitter disappointments, and one of the hardest of these (which is especially apportioned to the lot of the creative musician) is the discovery that, as in the case of other princes and sovereigns of the world, his path in life must be solitary. Brahms may sometimes have imagined he had reason for his impoliteness ; more frequently a gruff manner, an awkward joke, was the result of a constitutional want of presence of mind in trifling matters, which frequently caused him to be misunderstood. His real attitude is expressed in a note published after his death by Eduard Hanslick in the « Neue Freie Presse » article from which we have already more than once quoted. Hanslick had sent him a packet of letters to read, and had inadvertently enclosed in it one from a mutual friend which contained a comparison of Beethoven and Brahms. In it were these words :

« He is often offensively rough to his friends like Beethoven, and is as little able as Beethoven was to free himself entirely from the effects of a neglected education. »

Hanslick was very much upset on remembering what he had done, and immediately wrote to Brahms to throw himself on his mercy and beg his silence on the matter. The Master immediately answered :

« Dear Friend,

You need not be in the least uneasy. I scarcely read ... 's letter, but put it back at once into the cover, and only gently shook my head. I am not to say anything to him. Ah, dear friend, that happens, unfortunately, quite of itself in my case ! That one is taken even by old acquaintances and friends for something quite different from what one is (or, apparently, shows one's self in their eyes) is an old experience with me. I remember how I, startled and confounded, formerly kept silence in such cases ; now however, quite calmly and as a matter of course. That will sound harsh or severe to you, good and kind man - yet, I hope not to have wandered too far from Gœthe's saying, " Blessed is he who, without hate, shuts himself from the world. " »

Brahms was ready for another journey to Italy in the spring, but Widmann was unable to accompany him, and he passed his 63rd birthday anniversary in Vienna. When it dawned, the work that was, for a short time, generally accepted as his swan-song had been completed. Hermann Deiters writes that the immediate occasion of the composition of the « 4 Serious Songs » was the death of the artist Max Klinger's father, which occurred earlier in the year. The not unnatural assumption that has sometimes been seen in these solemn utterances of the great composer a presentiment of his own fast-approaching end may or may not represent a fact. It has not been accepted by those of his friends amongst whom he passed the last few months of his life, and certainly nothing that is known of his individuality lends likelihood to the notion of his going-out, as it were, to meet the thought of his death. On the other hand, his repeated assertion that the songs had been composed for his own birthday points to the possibility that his mind may have been under the influence of forebodings of which he was, perhaps, but vaguely conscious.

« Yes, Grüber, we are in the front line now. » , he said to his landlord on hearing of the death of some of the old people in the course of one of his last summers at Ischl.

The « 4 Serious Songs » were published in the summer of 1896 with a dedication to Max Klinger, his personal friend, of whose work, including that inspired by his own compositions, he became a warm admirer, though he at first disliked the painter's « Brahms Fantasie » .

3 of the songs deal grimly with the thought of death (Eccles. iii. 19-22, iv. 1-3 ; Eccles. xli. 1, 2) ; the 4th has for its text Saint-Paul's beautiful glorification of love (1 Cor. XIII. 1-3, 12, 13) :

« For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts ; as the one dieth, so dieth the other, for all is vanity ...

« Though I spake with the tongues of men and of angels, and had not love, I should be as sounding brass or a tinkling bell ... »

« We see now through a glass, in a dark word, but then face to face. Now, I know it partly, but then I shall know it as I am known. »

« Now, remain faith, hope, love ; but the greatest is love. »

It is certain that Brahms speaks to us in the songs from the depth of his convictions. « Herr Geheimrath Doktor » (Theodor Wilhelm) Engelmann arrived one evening in the course of the summer on a day's visit to Ischl. Brahms called at his hotel at 6 o'clock the next morning, and after breakfast brought his friend back to his rooms, where they spent several hours together. The composer was in delight over some lately-arrived volumes of the complete edition of Franz Schubert's works, then in progress, and could not sufficiently express his joy in their contents.

« See here, » , he said with his energetic enthusiasm, as he pointed to one place after another with beaming face and lightening eyes, « see here, what a splendid fellow he was ! People talk of him as a mere melodist, but look what material he had even in his early works ; look what the melodies are, how they grow. »

By-and-by, taking-up a copy of the « 4 Serious Songs » , he said :

« Have you seen my protest ? I wrote these for my birthday. »

The explanation of these words is that the Master viewed with mistrust, or even dislike, modern efforts to revivify and popularize the services of the Evangelical Church by the introduction of sacred musical works composed for the purpose, of which those of Heinrich von Herzogenberg may be taken as the type. Brahms, who subscribed to no church dogmas, regarded this tendency as artificial, and therefore as weak and unhealthy, and much as he admired Herzogenberg's powers, he regretted that they were dominated during the last 10 years of his creative activity by his strong ecclesiastical bias. Brahms' love of the Bible and his preference for Scriptural texts was, as we know, not that of what is conventionally called a « pietist » . He spoke in the language of the people's book as a realist who was, at the same time, an idealist. He has so arranged the texts of his « German Requiem » that it would be difficult to construe the work as the embodiment of a definite belief, and he expressly refused to enlarge it into an account of the Passion, Death, and Resurrection of Christ ; and yet, as we have endeavoured to show, it contains the presentiment, the inspiration, of something positive. From Brahms' stand-point, the attempt to go behind the mysteries of life and death, to construct the unspeakable, the unthinkable, into verbal formulæ, is not only pre-doomed to failure, but is almost irreverent. Yet, as we may remember, « he had his faith » , and if anything may be judged of it from the story of his life, the spirit of his works, this faith lay in acceptance of the immutability of truth, the sacredness of life, and the sovereignty of love.

Brahms had been settled in his rooms at Ischl scarcely a fortnight, when he was profoundly shaken by the tidings of « Frau » (Clara) Schumann's death. She passed away peacefully at her home in Frankfurt, on May 20, in the 77th year of her age, and was laid to rest by her husband's side at Bonn on Whit Sunday, May the 24th. The story of her life, triply crowned by fame, love, and sorrow, remains amongst the ideal possessions of the world.

A great crowd of musicians and friends assembled at the funeral, those of Frankfurt, Bonn, and Cologne being strongly represented. The custom of the ceremony had changed with time since Johannes had borne « Frau » Clara's laurel-wreath to Schumann's grave, and on the conclusion of the service, which consisted of the singing of chorales and an address by Doctor Sell of Bonn University, more than 200 floral tributes were piled-up around the spot. Joachim with Herzogenberg, bound by Italian engagements, had attended a service held in the Schumanns' house at Frankfurt. Woldemar Bargiel and Bernhard Scholz were at the cemetery, and of our own particular musicians, Julius Stockhausen and Brahms. Another last meeting.

On the termination of the service, Brahms, whose agitation had been very unpleasantly heightened during his journey from Ischl by the delay of a train, and his consequent anxiety lest he should be late, went to Honnef to stay till the next day with « Herr » and « Frau » Wehermann, the near relatives of his Crefeld friends, the von Beckeraths and von der Leyens, who were at the time on a visit there. Professor Richard Barth and his wife, Doctor Gustav Ophüls, and 2 of the Meiningen musicians, Concert Meister Eldering and « Herr » Piening, were also of the party. The Master was very much excited and overcome on his arrival at Honnef, but the soothing influence of the Rhine country, so closely associated with the recollections of his youth, did him good, and he prolonged his visit to nearly a week. Confiding to Barth the day after his arrival that he had with him something new, which he would like to play very quietly to 1 or 2 chosen listeners, his 3 most intimate friends retired with him to a room secure from interruption, impressed by his manner with the feeling that something unusual was about to ensue. When the little party had taken their places, Brahms, with every sign of the most profound emotion, which communicated itself to his companions, played through the « 4 Serious Songs » from the manuscript. « I wrote them for my birthday », he said in the same words which he afterwards used to Doctor Engelmann. He then played some new organ preludes (Opus 122) .

He was agreeably interested in Doctor Ophüls' project of arranging a collection of his composed texts :

« I have often wished for such a thing, for though I do not care to look closely at my music, it would be quite pleasant to recall it now and then by reading the texts. »

The collection was completed during the ensuing months, and the manuscript placed in the Master's hands.

Brahms appeared un-announced in Vienna in the middle of June to take part in the family celebration of Doctor and « Frau » Fellingner's silver wedding day. Returning immediately to Ischl, he spent the next few weeks in his usual fashion, though neither mind nor body really recovered the double shock of « Frau » Schumann's death and of the anxious journey to Bonn. He occupied himself still with his art and, on June 24th, had completed 7 Organ Preludes, which he played to Richard Heuberger on that date at Ischl.

« Splendid pieces » , says Heuberger's diary ; and, in another entry, dated July 5th :

« Brahms' things must have been sent away already, for he has promised to show me new compositions. »

These were, no doubt, some more Preludes. 11 were found after Brahms' death, the last 4 being written on a different kind of paper from that used for the 1st 7.

The « Elf Chorale-Vorspiele » (11 Chorale-Preludes) for organ are instrumental movements founded, as their name implies, upon some of the grand old church tunes for which Germany is famous. They are worked in florid counterpoint in a style which may be studied, also, in the Organ Preludes contained in the 3rd volume of the Leipzig Society's edition of Bach's works, and are written with an ease to which no other composer than Brahms has attained in this style since Bach's day. That the great modern Master had studied it, during the years of his retirement in the 50's, before he was in possession of the Society's volumes, seems certain, from the fact that 3 old books of Bach's Chorale-Preludes once belonging to Brahms are still in existence. One, bearing Brahms' pencil autograph, is in manuscript, possibly that of his father or brother ; the others are early published editions.

The majority of the Chorales selected for treatment, in 1896, have death for their subject, and are written in the profoundly serious vein to which we are accustomed in the composer's sacred works. The 4th Prelude, « Herzlich thut mich erfreuen » , is in a somewhat lighter vein than the others, but is, nonetheless, absolutely and distinctly Brahms. One of the most delicately touching is the 8th, « Es ist ein Ros' entsprungen » . « Herzlich thut mir » is the subject of 2 of the movements, « O Welt ich muß dich lassen » of 2, of which one is the 11th and last.

It is impossible that we can be mistaken in accepting the Chorale-Preludes, together with the « 4 Serious Songs » which immediately preceded them, as indicating the bent of the composer's thoughts during his last year of life, and we involuntarily apply to them the words used by Brahms in reference to Robert Schumann's theme. They speak to us « as the message of a spirit about to depart, and we think with reverence and emotion of the glorious man and artist » . Nevertheless, a note written by the composer to « Frau » Caroline, on August 13th, contains little sign of his depressed condition. It opens with charming, simple comments on his stepmother's last little budget of home news, urges a tour in Norway and Sweden on Fritz Schnack (« it would give me real pleasure if he would do it, and tell me all about it afterwards ») and ends :

« The summer is not exactly fine, but whoever, like myself, rises early and can go-out walking when he will, may be content and there are innumerable beautiful walks here. I hope you will continue so well and write sometimes to ...

Your heartily greeting Johannes. »

It had not escaped the notice of Brahms' friends, however, that his ruddy complexion had changed to a yellow colour, and some of them were courageous enough to speak to him about his health, and urge him to consult a doctor. At 1st, he showed much annoyance when the subject was broached, and turned it off impatiently with the reply that, as he never used a glass, he did not know how he looked. But the uneasiness felt about his condition increased, and he was at length persuaded to seek medical advice in Vienna. The doctor whom he consulted did not issue an alarmist report, but, pronouncing him to be suffering from jaundice, ordered him to Karlsbad for the « cure ». Much against his will, the Master, who hated the very idea of waters and cures, and who prided himself on never having been ill in his life, gave-up some pleasant Ischl engagements, and started on September 2nd, for Karlsbad. He was met at the station by 2 friends of Eduard Hanslick, « Herr » Emil Seling and « Musikdirektor » Alois Janetschek, who took him to the « Stadt Brussels », near the Hirschsprung. Here, during the fine autumn days which succeeded the wet summer, he made himself content, and even wrote cheerful reports to his friends, in which he expressed satisfaction at having been obliged to make the acquaintance of the celebrated watering-place. He was the object of much considerate and respectful attention, which seemed to cheer him ; and Bertha Faber came to be near him, accompanied him in his daily walks, and took tender care of him.

The report written to Hanslick by the distinguished Karlsbad physician Doctor Grünberger, after 3 weeks' careful observation, was ominous. There was considerable swelling of the liver, with complete blocking of the gall-passages, and the inevitable results - jaundice, indigestion, etc. The eminent medical authority could not but regard the condition of his patient as « very serious » .

No more definite name was given to the malady on the Master's return to Vienna after some 6 weeks' treatment at Karlsbad, and his request that he should be told « nothing unpleasant » was scrupulously observed. He went about as before, dining more frequently, however, with his most intimate friends the Fellingings, Fabers, Millers, Conrats, Straußs and von Hornbostels, and often accepting the offer from one and another of a seat in a box at the « Burg Theater ». He became very testy if asked how he was or if told that he looked better, and answered to every inquiry, « Each day, a little worse. », but continued in letters to his stepmother and other friends at a distance to keep-up the fiction that he was suffering from an ordinary jaundice which only needed patience. Those who loved him, however, looked with dismay at the alteration that was taking place in his appearance. The yellow colour, which had been the 1st striking symptom of his condition, was changing gradually to a darker hue, the bulky figure shrinking to terrible emaciation ; the firm gait was beginning to falter, the head was no longer held erect. A visit to Vienna, early in December, of Joseph Joachim and his colleagues of the Quartet gave him touching pleasure ; he was with them as much as possible during the day, and generally remained with them, after attending their concerts, until late at night. He continued to take interest in important new compositions, and begged Robert Hausmann to come to his rooms to play him Antonín Dvořák's Violoncello Concerto. He accompanied the entire work on the piano, and broke into enthusiastic admiration at the end of each movement, exclaiming after the last one :

« Had I known that such a Violoncello Concerto as that could be written, I would have tried to compose one myself ! »

He not only spent Christmas Eve with the Fellingings, but invited himself to dine with them also on December 25th, 26th, and 27th. « Frau » Fellinging gave him a « secco », a soft, short coat, as one of her Christmas presents, and it seemed a sort of comfort to him to put it on when he was at the house, where it was kept in readiness for his use, and to sit quietly in the family sitting-rooms without need of exerting himself. After dinner on the 27th, he raised his glass, saying, « To our meeting in the New Year », but by-and-by added, pointing downwards, « But I shall soon be there. » . He dined again on New Year's Day with the same dear friends, whose joy it was to feel that they were privileged to afford him some solace in his weakness and suffering.

The Joachim party returned to Vienna after a tour in the Austrian provinces, and gave 2 concluding concerts in the « Börsendorfer » Hall , on January 1st and 2nd, 1897. Ill as he was, Brahms not only attended both concerts, but came on the morning of the 2nd to Joachim's rooms at the « Hôtel Tegethof » to listen to the rehearsal of his G major Quintet, which was in the evening's programme. He derived peculiar pleasure from hearing it. « That is not a bad piece. » , he said, as though half ignoring that it was his own. The scene which took place after the performance of the work in the evening is remembered with emotion by those who took part in it. It was the final one in the friendship of Brahms and Joachim - a friendship as striking and interesting as any contained in the history of art. Its character may be suggested to the reader's imagination in a few words written to the author by the great musician whose love and recognition Brahms enjoyed from beginning to end of his career :

« He had great pleasure that evening in the G major Quintet. It was touching to see him come before the public to acknowledge the enthusiasm aroused by his work. The tears were in his eyes and he was very weak. The people cheered and cheered endlessly. »

Thus, the Master's state gradually changed for the worse. He dined with the Fellingings in the middle of the day, on February 7th, and seemed excited and restless throughout the meal. When it was at an end, he intimated that he wished to be alone with Doctor and « Frau » Fellinginger, and, retiring with them, began to speak about his affairs. He desired, he said, to make a new will, but dreaded the necessary formalities to such a degree that he knew not how to resolve to go through them. Would it not be possible to arrange his affairs quietly without having to speak about them with strangers ? Doctor Fellinginger said it could be done, and that by the Austrian law things could be so managed that there need not even be witnesses. The Master remained for 4 hours (from 2 till 6 o'clock) with Doctor and « Frau » Fellinginger, discussed his affairs in minute detail, and asked Doctor Fellinginger to be his curator. He seemed relieved at the end of the conversation, and stayed on with the family, chatting about other topics. The following morning, Doctor Fellinginger took to the composer at his rooms, at « Karlsgasse 4 » , the copy of a will which he had drawn-out to meet Brahms' expressed desires, and explained to him that he had only to write it out himself, date and sign his name to it, and it would be valid according to Austrian law. Brahms, who was on the point of starting-out to his dinner, expressed himself as glad and relieved, and placed the paper in a drawer of his writing-table ; and Doctor Fellinginger, pleased to have cheered him, returned home with the conviction that he would copy it without delay. The Master did not return to the subject at any future meeting with his friends, whilst they, believing the matter to have been finally settled, did not again allude to it.

February passed, and Brahms grew continually worse. Every day, he spent a good deal of time in looking through and destroying old letters and other papers. « It is so sad. » , he would say, when one or other intimate friend called and found him thus employed, his stove filled with ashes. He attended the Philharmonic concert, on March 7th, when Dvořák's Violoncello Concerto, played by Hugo Becker, and his own 4th Symphony in E minor were in the programme. Going into the concert-room, he met his old friend Josef Gänsbacher. He said to him :

« Ah, you have been so often to see me, and I cannot go to you, I am so suffering. »

Then, rousing himself a little, went on :

« You will hear a piece to-day, a piece by a man ! » (Dvořák's Concerto) .

The 4th Symphony had never become a favourite work in Vienna. Received with reserve on its 1st performance, it had not since gained much more from the general public of the city than the respect sure to be accorded there to an important work by Brahms. To-day, however, a storm of applause broke-out at the end of the 1st movement, not to be quieted until the composer, coming to the front of the « artists' » box in which he was seated, showed himself to the audience. The demonstration was renewed after the 2nd and the 3rd movements, and an extraordinary scene followed the conclusion of the work. The applauding, shouting house, its gaze riveted on the figure standing in the balcony, so familiar and, yet, in present aspect so strange, seemed unable to let him go. Tears ran down his cheeks as he stood there shrunken in form, with lined countenance, strained expression, white hair hanging lank ; and through the audience, there was a feeling as of a stifled sob, for each knew that they were saying farewell. Another outburst of applause and, yet, another ; one more acknowledgment from the Master ; and Brahms and his Vienna had parted for ever.

Brahms appeared after the concert at a luncheon-party given by « Excellenz » Nikolaus Dumba, a distinguished protector of art in Vienna. About 25 gentlemen, chiefly artists and art-lovers, and the ladies of the house were present. Brahms was placed near to several of his intimate friends (Friedrich Epstein, Ilse Conrat, Eduard Hanslick, Josef Gänsbacher, and Eusebius Mandyczewski) but he was not able to remain long. Within a few days, of this date his Ischl landlady received a postcard from him announcing his intention of going to Ischl earlier than usual, and desiring that his rooms might be got ready. The last Opera he heard was his friend Karl Goldmark's « Das Heimchen » ; he entered a theatre for the last time, on March 13th, sitting with Hanslick at the production of Johann Strauß' « Die Göttin der Vernunft » , but was obliged to leave at the end of the 2nd Act, and, much against his will, suffered a friend to accompany him home in a cab.

From this time, he grew rapidly worse. He complained that he could no longer remember what he read, but wished for (Julius Hermann) Moritz Busch's « Bismarck » , the last book with which he tried to occupy himself. He soon became unable to take a walk even in a friend's care, and Doktor Viktor von Miller called every day in his carriage to take him to drive in the « Prater » , where the fresh air somewhat revived him. His strength of will remained phenomenal to the last. He dragged himself to a rehearsal of the Roeger-Soldat Quartet party held at « Frau » Wittgenstein's less than a fortnight before his death, to hear Carl Maria von Weber's Clarinet Quintet with Richard Mühlfeld's co-operation. A performance of the work at Meiningen had particularly pleased him, and its inclusion in the Soldat programme was by his suggestion. In the same week, he paid his last visit to the Fabers, and, whilst ascending the staircase to their flat, nearly fainted with pain. « Herr » Faber revived him, and got him on to the drawing-room sofa, where he sat exhausted, his head on his breast. He was obliged to leave the family dinner-table of some other intimate friends, and, retiring to the next room, sank down in agony. « Frau » Fellingner was ill at this time, and unable to leave her room. Brahms' last call of inquiry at her house was made on March 19th.

The Master was very gentle during the last months of his life, and touchingly grateful for every attention shown him. His evenings were of necessity passed in his rooms, for he firmly refused all the entreaties of his friends that he would take-up his abode in one or another house. Every evening, at dusk, he used to place himself at the piano, and improvise softly for about half an hour, and when too tired to continue, would sit by the window gazing-out on the familiar scene till long after darkness had set in. On March 24th, « Frau » Door (wife of pianist Anton Door) , who had always been a favourite with him, called to take him a bunch of violets. She was not admitted, but, observing Doctor von Miller's carriage before the house door, waited near the entrance, hoping to see Brahms pass-out. He came down in about half an hour leaning on his friend's arm, and, noticing « Frau » Door, gave her his hand. « I am very ill. » (« Mir geht es sehr schlecht. ») , he answered faintly to her inquiry. He did not go-out again. The next day, Ilse Conrat was admitted, and was sitting talking quietly with him, when Brahms, who was on the sofa smoking, suddenly dropped his head. « There must be something in it. » , he muttered. Conrat gently left the room without disturbing him. On the 26th, the physician wrote word to « Frau » Fellingner that all chance of moving him was over. Brahms did not leave his bed again. His 2 or 3 closest friends were constantly at his side, whilst his landlady, « Frau » Celestina Truxa, was his faithful and devoted nurse. He spoke little during the last days, and was too weak to notice much of what was passing in his room, but he managed, on the 29th, to write a few pencil lines from his bed to « Frau » Caroline :

« D. M. For the sake of change, I am lying down a little and cannot, therefore, write comfortably. Otherwise, there is no alteration and as usual, I only need patience.

Affectionately your Joh. »

A few more weary days and nights, during which the beloved Master's life ebbed rapidly away, bring us to the early morning of April 3rd. He had lost consciousness several times in the night and been restored, and had recognised Bertha Faber, who, calling at about 6 o'clock and performing some slight service for him, caught the whispered words, « Du bist ein guter Mensch. » (You are a kind man.) It is now nearly 9 o'clock, and Brahms has fallen asleep. Early messages of inquiry have been answered, and the doctor, who has been at hand during the night, has departed, promising soon to return. The day has begun with the bright spring promise that the Master was wont to greet year after year with joyful welcome ; the sun shines, a soft breeze enters through the open window ; outside, there is a twittering of birds. Near the bed sits the untiring nurse, noticing the signs of the fast-approaching end. A movement from the bed claims her assistance. Brahms has opened his eyes, and tries to raise himself. With « Frau » Truxa's help, he attains a sitting posture, and, looking at her, tries to speak. The lips move, but the tongue has lost its power, and he can only utter an inarticulate sound. Great tears roll down his cheeks ; a last sigh, a last breath, and he sinks back, supported by gentle hands, on to his pillow, rid of his sufferings, passed quietly to his rest.

Doctor von Miller, whose house was in the vicinity, was the 1st of the friends to receive intelligence of the Master's decease. He hurried at once to « Karlsgasse » , and was immediately joined by Doctor Fellingner and « Herr » Faber. Many others called during the morning, some of whom were admitted to look at the still features, smoothed by the caress of death into an expression of noble serenity. A sketch was taken by the painter Ludwig Michalek, a mask by Professor Kundemann, a photograph by a private friend. The cause of death was certified, after a medical examination of the remains, as degeneration of the liver. The body, in evening dress, was placed the same afternoon in the coffin, and the room arranged with candelabra containing lighted candles ; on a crimson cushion were displayed the various orders of the deceased composer. The next day, the arrival began of the flowers, wreaths, crosses, and other floral tributes that transformed the room into a temple of beauty.

On the afternoon of the 4th General-Secretary Koch, Doctor Fellingner, and « Herr » Faber met in the dwelling, and searched for a will in the presence of a notary, but only found one written in May, 1891, on 2 sheets of paper, the last of them signed and dated, in the form of a letter to Simrock. This, a legally competent document in its original form, except for the slight omission of the signature on the 1st sheet of paper (which, under the indisputable circumstances establishing the authenticity of the will, would not have rendered it invalid) had been returned to the Master at his own request by Simrock some time subsequent to the death of his sister, Elise Grund, in 1892. It was found, however, to have been marked by Brahms in pencil, some of the clauses lined-out, whilst notes in the margin indicated designed alterations. These were in exact correspondence with the wishes expressed by Brahms, in February, to Doctor and « Frau » Fellingner, and embodied by Doctor Fellingner in the paper he had delivered into the hands of the composer to be copied by himself and signed. Another search was made the next day, therefore, but it proved fruitless. Only Doctor Fellingner's manuscript was found, and it must be presumed that Brahms had put-off the dreaded task, from day to day, in the hope of feeling more capable of it, until his strength was no longer equal to its fulfilment. Nothing remained, therefore, but to apply to the proper authorities for the nomination of a curator in order that the necessary arrangements might be proceeded with. This was done ; Doctor Fellingner was appointed and, on the afternoon of the 5th, the sitting-room which, with the small inner room leading from it, contained Brahms library, manuscripts, and other possessions, was formally sealed. The coffin was closed the same day.

As soon as the Master's death became known, the offer of an honorary grave was made by the city of Vienna. There was no hesitation in accepting it, but a deliberation was held as to whether the remains should be taken direct to the Central « Friedhof » or should be cremated at Gotha, according to directions contained in the letter to Simrock, and the ashes only deposited in Vienna. The remembrance of a few words dropped by Brahms himself when speaking of the « sacred spot » which contains the graves of Beethoven and Schubert decided the point. It was felt that he would have chosen to rest in the place selected for him : the particular garden of the « Friedhof » in which the remains of Beethoven and Schubert lie, and which is sacred also to the memory of Mozart.

« All musical Vienna accompanied the great dead to the grave on the afternoon of April 6 and a stranger not knowing the man's greatness might have measured it by the number of prominent artists mingling in the great assemblage of the funeral procession, by the celebrated men and women who came from afar to show the last honour to Brahms. »

Till the hour appointed for the « commencement » of the ceremony, deputations continued to arrive, from various parts of Europe, from the numerous Societies of which the composer had been an honorary member, and telegrams and messages to pour in. At 1 o'clock a deputation from the Hamburg Senate was admitted to the house to lay a magnificent wreath on the coffin, side by side with that from the Corporation of Vienna.

Wreaths had been sent by :

The Queen of Hanover ; the Duke of Cumberland ; the Princess Marie of Hanover ; Duke George of Saxe-Meiningen ; the Princess Marie of Saxe-Meiningen ; Helene, Baroness von Heldburg ; and innumerable private friends known and unknown to Brahms.

By the Society of Plastic Arts ; Committee of the Opera ; « Gesellschaft » , and other Societies of Vienna ; by the Philharmonic Society ; Society of Music-lovers ; Cecilia Society of Hamburg ; by the Royal Academy of Arts, Berlin.

By the various musical Societies of :

Berlin ; Leipzig ; Budapest ; Cologne ; Salzburg ; Mannheim ; Frankfurt ; Jena ; Laubach ; Lemberg ; Graz ; Saint-Petersburg ; Brussels ; Amsterdam ; Cambridge ; Basle ; Zürich ; and many other towns. Six cars scarcely sufficed to hold them.

The arrangements of the public funeral with which the city of Vienna honoured the remains of the great composer formed a singular contrast to the simplicity which had marked the daily habits of his life. Details may be read in the journals of the time. The « cortège » , followed by the long train of mourners, started from « Karlsgasse » about half-past 2, and, proceeding to the building of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , halted before the principal entrance, where arrangements had been made for a short ceremony, consisting of an address by « Herr Direktor » J. R. Fuchs, of the Conservatory, and the singing of Brahms' part-song « Fahr'wohl » , for unaccompanied chorus, under the direction of Richard von Perger, conductor of the « Singverein » . The procession then passed on to the Evangelical Church on « Dorotheenstraße » , where the clergy and choir and several of the city dignitaries were assembled. After the coffin had been carried into the church, the choir sang Felix Mendelssohn's « Es ist bestimmt in Gottes' Rath » (« Volkslied » , Opus 47, No. 4) . The funeral address was delivered by Doctor von Zimmermann, who especially dwelt on the inspiration derived by the deceased composer's art from the pages of the Bible, on his love for children and the child-like spirit, and on his sympathy with distress.

« Wherever he could bring support to the unknown sufferer, the laborious striver, the helpless, the dying, there, in the man who, in his own habits, was frugal to the verge of parsimony, was found the most eager benefactor. The Master Johannes Brahms is not dead. His spirit has conquered death and has entered into the light and blessed world of the pure harmonies of peace. »

At the entrance to the « Zentralfriedhof » , the coffin was surrounded by personal friends of the deceased composer, carrying lighted wind-torches, and was accompanied by them to the grave. They were :

Ignaz Brüll ; Antonín Dvořák ; Arthur Faber ; Doctor Richard Fellingner ; Robert Fuchs ; Richard Heuberger ; Max Kalbeck ; Ludwig Koch ; Eusebius Mandyczewski ; Doctor Viktor Ritter von Miller-Aichholz ; Richard von Perger.

At the grave-side, Doctor von Perger spoke a few words of last farewell :

« This sacred place is now to receive the mortal remains of our great contemporary. He who has so enriched and blessed the whole world, what has he been to us musicians ! In the light which streamed from his creative genius, his penetrating art-comprehension, we were able to look-up confidently to his incomparable Mastership, to his lofty, unbending artistic intelligence. Amid the countless paths and by-paths which to-day intersect the domain of musical art, we were guided by the torch held high and secure by the hand of her 1st priest. He has met his worthy spiritual brothers, indeed, for the 1st time to-day in this resting-place, but he was always a simple, sympathetic friend to his living colleagues in art, in spite of the great distance which raised him above them ; always a helper of uprising talent, a sure and faithful friend in adversity and suffering ... Here, thou restest now, thou blessed of heaven, in this vast, awful world-solitude ; clouds of light float above thee and that of thee which is immortal floats with them through eternal spaces. “ Ade Meister Johannes, fahr'wohl, fahr'wohl. ” »

Joseph Joachim was in England at the time of Brahms' death, fulfilling long-contracted engagements. Julius Stockhausen, now a man of 73, and not in strong health, was at this period unequal to a hurried and distressing journey from Frankfurt to Vienna.

Memorial performances were given by the « Cecilia Verein, Hamburg » , on April 5th, the day preceding the funeral ; by the « Wiener Gesellschaft » on the 11th ; by the « Beethoven-Haus Verein, Bonn » , in May ; by the Royal High-School for Music, Berlin, in the summer ; and by innumerable musical Societies of Europe and America, during the season 1897-1898. In nearly all instances, the « German Requiem » formed part of such concerts as were orchestral.

A clause in Brahms' will provided that any of his unpublished works found in his rooms after death should be the property of Simrock. There was one Opus only : the 11 Organ Preludes. With them were the arrangements, as pianoforte duets, of Joachim's 2 Overtures. All 3 works were published in 1902, a delay of 5 years having been caused by difficulties that arose in connection with the will. Apart from detail, these may be generally stated as follows :

Brahms is said to have left, besides his library, which included valuable autograph musical manuscripts, and a very few personal possessions, about £ 20,000 in investments. In the original will, 3 Societies (the « Liszt Pensions-Verein » of Hamburg ; the « Czerny Verein » ; and the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » of Vienna) were named as the inheritors, subject to the payment of a legacy to the composer's landlady, « Frau » Celestina Truxa, and of 2 life-annuities - one to his stepmother, « Frau » Caroline Brahms, to be continued after her death to her son, Fritz Schnack, for his life ; the other to Brahms' sister, Elise Grund. These would practically account for the time being for the income arising from the investments.

In the absence of any legally valid document, about 20 cousins of various degrees of kinship came forward, in answer to advertisements in the newspapers, as claimants to the property. Litigation ensued, and was protracted through several years. The original process and the 1st appeal were determined in favour of the Societies ; the 2nd appeal reversed these decisions, and declared the blood relations to be the heirs. To prevent the further expense and delay of another appeal, a compromise was now arrived at by the contending parties, and the general results of the will, the law-processes, and the compromise have been that the blood relations have been recognised as the heirs to all but the library, which is now in the possession of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » ; that « Frau » Truxa's legacy has been paid ; and that certain sums accepted by the Societies, by which they will ultimately benefit, have been invested, and the income arising from them secured for the payment of the life-annuity to « Herr » Schnack. (« Frau » Caroline Brahms died in the spring of 1902.)

Projects for the erection of memorials to the Master in Hamburg, Vienna, and Meiningen, were set on foot soon after his death. The 1st to be completed has been that now standing in the « English Garden » at Meiningen, the unveiling of which was made the occasion of a Memorial Festival, in October of 1899. The bust of the Master which it displays is the work of Professor Adolf von Hildebrandt.

The memorial erected at the grave by the heirs, after the final settlement of the property, designed and executed by « Fräulein » Ilse Conrat, was unveiled on May 7, 1903, the 70th anniversary of Brahms' birth. It consists of a marble bust and pedestal in front of a marble headstone, on which are allegorical figures in bas-relief.

Memorial tablets have been placed by the respective municipalities on the houses in which Brahms lived in Vienna, Ischl, and Thun, and the garden of the house at Mürz Zuschlag has been bought by the town and made into a music-garden. A bronze bust of the Master by « Frau » Doctor Fellingner stands in the musicians' pavilion.

A « Brahms-Haus » has been erected by Doctor von Miller-Aichholz in his private grounds at Gmünden, the rooms of which are constructed to the exact dimensions of those occupied by Brahms in Ischl, and furnished with the Ischl furniture as it used to stand. They contain an interesting collection of musical and other autographs of the Master, photographs, programmes, and other mementos.

A Brahms Society has been formed in Vienna for the purpose of collecting and preserving all available mementos in a special museum.

DEATH OF JOHANNES BRAHMS.

The Famous Pianist and Composer Dead in Vienna After a Long and Painful Illness.

VIENNA, April 3. - Johanne's Brahms, the well-known musical composer, is dead. He had been ill for a long time. He suffered from jaundice last Autumn and went to Karlsbad ; but the cure was ineffective, and he intended to go there again this Summer. The disease developed into cancer of the liver. The patient was able to read almost until he last, and was kept in ignorance of his serious condition.

Johannes Brahms returned to Ischl, at the end of May 1896, and began again to work on his compositions and to take the long walks that he always enjoyed. In the middle of June, he spent a few days in Vienna with his good friends the Fellingings, who were celebrating their silver wedding anniversary. He is said to have played the 1st and 7th (« Herzlich hut mich erfreuen » , in the original order) of the Chorale Preludes (for organ) for them and for his friend and editor, Eusebius Mandyczewski, who « wondered at their impersonality » . Shortly afterward, Brahms departed again for Ischl. The manuscript of 3 of the final 4 Chorale Preludes is dated « Juni 96 Ischl » , but these drafts were probably not finished until the very end of the month and seem not to have been actually prepared for publication at that time.

On June 24, Brahms was visited in Ischl by a former pupil, Richard Heuberger, a Viennese choral conductor, music-critic, and Opera composer. In his diary, Heuberger recorded that on that morning Brahms « played for me his manuscript Chorale Preludes. Splendid pieces ! One, a contrapuntal work, strophe after strophe worked-out fugally ... soon, the chorale enters and, from the developing chorale, a theme in the upper-5th follows through. With all its precision, this work is splendid music. True Brahms ? » Heuberger here seems to be referring to the 1st of the 7 Chorale Preludes, indeed an impressive contrapuntal essay. Heuberger visited Brahms again, on July 5, when he noted that « the package (namely the Chorale Preludes) must have already been sent away, for today Brahms told me he would show me some new compositions » . Unfortunately, Heuberger doesn't say what these were. They might indeed have been more Chorale Preludes, as some assume, but they could also have been some of the folk-song settings Brahms is thought to have also been working on at this time, which were later posthumously published. In either case, they were probably not all new - except, of course, to Heuberger. Despite his return to seeming normalcy after the emotional and physical stress of the trip to Frankfurt and Bonn, Brahms began to feel increasingly unwell and lacking in his usual stamina, and, in July, his friends, observing that he was noticeably jaundiced, finally persuaded him to see a physician.

He, in fact, saw several and was at 1st advised to « take the cure » at Karlsbad, which he did in September. A doctor in Vienna had found Brahms's liver to be enlarged, but apparently it was Doctor Grünberger, in Karlsbad, who made the fatal diagnosis of cancer of the liver - the same disease that had ended Brahms' father's life. It had probably been developing undetected for some time, for the « Merck Manual » , that Classic physician's reference book, states that « jaundice is uncommon early » . Even today, after more than a Century of medical progress, the prognosis for advanced hepatic cancer is still poor.

So it was for Brahms. In October, he returned to Vienna noticeably weaker but so determined not to be an invalid that, for at least a while, he continued his daily walks, attended concerts, and socialized with his increasingly concerned friends. In October, too, another distinguished Viennese composer, Anton Bruckner, died, and his funeral was held on the 14th of that month at the « Karlskirche » . Despite the fact that the church was just across the street from his home, Brahms arrived late. As he stood at the back of the church, he is said to have muttered some remark to the effect that it would not be long before his own funeral.

Eventually, the walks had to be given-up, but Brahms's loyal friends continued to take him for rides and entertain him in their homes, and he spent Christmas with the Fellinginger family, whose photographic hobby has provided us with some of the last images of Brahms. In January, he attended a performance by Joseph Joachim's ensemble of his String Quartet in G major and, in early March, a performance of his 4th Symphony in the « Vereinsaal » , at which the audience gave the now gravely ill composer a long and tumultuous ovation. But very shortly thereafter, he became bedridden. On March 30, Heinrich Herzogenberg, who had just sent Brahms a copy of a Piano Quartet dedicated to him, sadly wrote to Joachim that their dear friend was approaching his end. It came quietly on the morning of April 3, 1897.

Vienna honoured her adopted son with a funeral procession worthy of royalty, with a host of friends, students, fellow musicians, and his publisher carrying the funeral torches through the streets, followed by a large crowd of mourners. It began at his residence on the « Karlsplatz » (« Karlsgasse 4 ») and crossed the square to the buildings of the « Musikverein » , where members of the « Singverein » stood in the entrance to sing Brahms's own choral work, « Fahr wohl » . Then, it proceeded to the Lutheran Church in the narrow « Dorotheergasse » , near the city center, where Pastor Zimmerman conducted the funeral service, which included the reading of the scripture text on which Brahms had based the last movement of the « German Requiem » . Following this, the procession continued out the long road to the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna's Simmering district. In 1888, a special tree-shaded segment, near the main gate of this large landscaped cemetery, had been set apart for the city's notable musicians, and the remains of Beethoven and Schubert were moved there. There, Brahms also was laid to rest, to be joined, 2 years later, by his old friend Johann Strauß Junior, Vienna's beloved « Waltz King » , who is buried next to him. It is a hallowed spot for present-day music-lovers, as the floral offerings on the graves of the many « Musiker » interred there eloquently attest.

Johannes Brahms visited Vienna several times before he decided to make the city his permanent home, which he did in the early 1870's. In his day, the city was the musical capital of the Continent and, even today, is known as The Heart of Europe. On the 1st day of his 1st visit, in 1862, he went directly to the house at « Domgasse 5 » , next to Saint-Stephen's Cathedral, where Mozart had lived during the composition of his Opera, « The Marriage of Figaro » . That building, now a museum known as « The Figaro House » , is the only remaining Mozart dwelling in Vienna.

The lodging Brahms ultimately chose as his permanent home was a 3 room (later becoming a 4 room) apartment in a building at « Karlsgasse 4 » , directly around the corner from the « Karlskirche » (Saint-Charles Church) . Brahms' apartment building was demolished on April 3, 1907 - exactly 10 years, to the very date, after he died there. (The structure now on that site is part of Vienna's Technical College.)

The apartment Brahms took was originally a furnished one and, during his last 10 years there, his land-lady was « Frau » Celestine Truxa, who had 2 small children.

The entrance to Brahms' apartment was through the bedroom ; the place was difficult to heat in winter time ; and it had no lavatory of its own - but it admirably suited Brahms' needs, which were basic and simple. This is where he lived, happily and in simple comfort, for the last 26 years of his life.

A life-long bachelor, he was nevertheless fond of children. He was especially partial to those of poorer parents, feeling that these particular youngsters were having a more difficult early existence (just as he did) , without the luxuries afforded those who were born with the proverbial silver spoons in their mouths.

« Frau » Truxa, whom Brahms amiably called his « house-hostess » , traditionally set-up a Christmas tree in his apartment, at the holiday season, and trimmed it for him. Gifts for her 2 boys were placed under it. She said :

« The last Christmas, he was alive (1896) , I didn't have the heart to bother him with all that but, on the 22nd, he stopped me. “ How's this ? I find no Christmas tree in my rooms. ”, he asked abruptly. »

She assured him that there was so much to do, but that it would come.

« Of course I rushed-out, bought a tree, set it up as usual in there, and trimmed it. That Christmas Eve, one hardly noticed the terrible effort he made to cover-up his pain and exhaustion. Not for anything would he have cast a gloom over the children's party. So good and thoughtful was he ! »

Sometimes, sad sequels show us that our invitations and good wishes and intentions are extended not a month too soon : it was only the following spring that Brahms succumbed to cancer of the liver.

Brahms' humor could, at times, be very facetious, and one Christmas incident frightened him as much as his 2 little victims. Nearly 50 years afterward, the now-elderly « Frau » Truxa explained it thusly to a visitor (who ultimately wrote a biography of the composer) :

« Just before Christmas, the 1st year I was at “ Karlsgasse ” 4, Brahms found my 2 little boys playing together. He pulled a grievously long face and said :“ Oh, children, I have some sad news for you. The Christ Child has influenza and can't bring you anything this Christmas. Being quite young, the boys took him literally and burst into the most hideous howls of grief and despair. The Master had not meant his little joke to have such a powerful effect, and was greatly embarrassed. He rushed to his rooms for candy. But even that was no good. Then, he came helplessly to me and confessed :“ Look here, ' Frau ' Truxa, now I don't know any more which way to turn. Can you not pacify the children ? Assure them that the Christ Child has already recovered. ”Which I did with great success. »

In 1899, Maria Fellingner depicted Brahms in a highly-successful relief ; furthermore, she made an amusing statuette showing him holding a cigar, which was based on a photograph she had once taken. This was merely one of a large number of informal photographs she took of Brahms, showing him either by himself or together with other guests of the Fellingners at the so-called « Arenberg Palais » at 96 « Landstraße-Hauptstraße » , where they occupied a flat from September 1893 (at 1st, on the ground floor and, then, from 1896 upstairs) and where they also had a large garden at their disposal. It is evident from the photographs that Brahms felt very much at ease there ; a particularly charming one shows him with Marie Soldat. (The « Palais » was demolished, in 1958, and replaced by a modern building.)

However, it was at the Fellingings' flat at 2 « Apostelgasse » that the only known sound recording of Brahms playing the piano was made, on 2 December 1889, by Thomas Edison's agent Theo Wangemann. Brahms had reportedly practiced his « Rhapsody », Opus 79/2, for the session but, irritated by the lengthy preparations, he changed his mind and, instead, played a shortened version of the « Hungarian Dance », WoO 1/1, and his own paraphrase of Joseph Strauß's polka mazurka « Die Libelle » (Opus 204) . The Fellingings' Streicher grand piano, on which Brahms played on this occasion, has recently been carefully restored by Gert Hecher and is now at the Brahms Museum, in Mürzzuschlag. The recording itself has been issued, in a restored version, by :

The « Verlag der Osterreichische Akademie der Wissenschaften » ; « Tondokumente aus dem Phonogrammarchiv : Historische Stimmen aus Wien » , 5 : « Brahms spielt Klavier » (1997) - OEAW PHA CDS.

On its history, see especially the leaflet accompanying the recording, as well as the article published jointly by Helmut Kowar, Franz Lechleitner, and Dietrich Schüller (1984) in the « Phonographic Bulletin » , which dealt with an earlier re-recording.

Copies of some of Maria Fellingings' busts of Brahms were placed on sale, with the proceeds going to the Viennese Brahms Monument Fund.

She also published collections of her photographs of Brahms in Vienna, in 1900 ; and in a 2nd, enlarged edition at Leipzig, in 1911.

Palais Arenberg - 3. Bezirk, ehemaliger Landstraßer-Hauptstraße 96

Das Palais Arenberg war ein Palais im 3. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Landstraße an der Landstraßer-Hauptstraße 96.

1785 kaufte Fürst Nikolaus Esterházy an der Landstraße ein großes Grundstück von zirka 50.000 Quadratmetern und ließ einen Garten anlegen. An der Straßenfront ließ er drei Häuser abreißen und ein schlichtes Palais errichten. 1810 wurde der Besitz an Erzherzog Carl, der umfangreiche Umbauarbeiten vornehmen ließ und den Garten für die Bürger öffnete. Nach seiner Hochzeit zog er in das neu errichtete Schloß im Helenental und verkaufte den Besitz an den Großhändler Samuel Kaan. Ab 1842 scheint die Fürstin Sophie Karoline Arenberg als Besitzerin auf. Da sie gegen Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts das Palais nicht mehr benötigte und vermietet hatte, verkaufte sie es schließlich um 1900 an die Gemeinde Wien. Große Teile des Gartens wurden parzelliert und verbaut, der Rest ging im Arenbergpark auf. In ihm steht auch noch ein Pavillon aus dem Garten Esterházy's.

Das Palais diente dem Generaldirektor Fellingings der unweit gelegenen Siemens & Halske-Werke als Wohnsitz. Der Komponist Johannes Brahms war ein guter Bekannter des Herrn Fellingings und daher ein gern gesehener Gast im Palais. Das Palais war nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg Sitz des Jugendamtes und blieb bis 1958 bestehen, dann wurde es abgerissen um eine Verlängerung der Neulinggasse bis zur Landstraßer Hauptstraße zu ermöglichen.

Das Palais war ein einstöckiger schlichter Bau mit hohem Satteldach und Mansardenfenstern. Die Fenster der Beletage waren mit geraden Fensterüberdachungen auf Konsolen und dezenten Ornamenten an den Parapeten und Fensterstürzen versehen. Im Erdgeschoss zur Straßenseite wurden später Geschäftslokale eingerichtet. Dem Gartenausgang war ein hölzernen Vorbau mit Veranda angelagert. Darüber befand sich ein Geniengruppe mit Saturn als Giebelschmuck.

Um 1785 kaufte der kaiserliche Feldmarschall Fürst Nikolaus Esterházy (1714-1790) auf der Landstrasse mehrere Ackerflächen von insgesamt 50.000 Quadratmetern auf, liess einen Park anlegen und dessen Rand an Stelle von drei bisherigen Häusern ein Sommerpalais erbauen. Da der Fürst mehrere repräsentative Stadtpaläste besass, liess er das Sommerpalais der anbrechenden Biedermeierzeit Zeit gemäss eher schlicht gestalten. Nachdem der Fürst um 1810 für längere Zeit das Land verliess, verkaufte er die ganze Liegenschaft an Erzherzog Carl, welcher an dem Palais und im Park umfangreiche Verschönerungen vornehmen liess. Bald machte er den riesigen Garten für die Öffentlichkeit zugänglich. Doch nachdem der Erzherzog Henriette von Nassau-Weilburg geheiratet und in das für ihn errichtete Schloß Helenental umgezogen war, wurde das Landstrasser Palais Eigentum des jüdischen Grosshändlers Heinrich Samuel Kaan.

Um 1842 kaufte Fürstin Sophie von Arenberg, geborene Auersperg, das Gartenpalais mit dem Park. Unter ihrem Namen war das Palais fortan bekannt. Um 1900 kaufte die Stadt Wien das Palais und den Park, von welchem große Teile parzelliert und verbaut wurden. Der Rest wurde in einen offiziellen öffentlichen Park umgewandelt. Etwa zu dieser Zeit wohnte im Palais Arenberg der Generaldirektor der Firma Siemens & Halske Fellingner. Zu dieser Zeit war der Komponist Johannes Brahms als guter Freund des Hauses regelmässig im Palais Arenberg zu Gast, wovon noch heute eine Tafel zeugt. Viele seiner Werke wurde hier zum ersten Mal gespielt. Im Laufe der folgenden Jahrzehnte veränderte sich die Umgebung des Palais Arenberg drastisch und liess das einst noble Haus unauffällig erscheinen. Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges war hier bis 1955 das Jugendamt untergebracht. Um 1958 wurde das Palais demoliert und an der Stelle ein Wohnhaus errichtet.

Das Palais Arenberg war stets ein schlichter Bau mit wenig Ornamentik, denn zur Zeit der Erbauung hatte sich selbst in Österreich die Sucht nach Prunk und Pomp gelegt. Das Palais war ein zweigeschossiger Bau mit einem auffallend grossflächigen und steilen Dach. Lediglich einige Reliefs auf der Strassenseite und minimaler Fensterschmuck verliehen dem Haus etwas Zierliches. Auf der Gartenseite befand sich in der Mitte der Fassade ein Vorbau aus Holz, welcher den Eingangsbereich und einen darüber liegenden Balkon umfasste. Darüber am Dachrand stand eine Figurengruppe, welche Saturn zeigte, der auf einem Fels sitzt und von drei Genien umgeben wird. Im Innenhof befand sich ein Brunnen im Rokokostil.

Die Familie Fellingner hatte ihren Wohnsitz in Wien III., Landstraßer Hauptstraße 96, wo am 15. Juni 1896 dieses Bild entstand. Diese Photographie trägt die handschriftliche Notiz « Letzte Aufnahme ». Wo sich heute ein Neubau befindet, stand bis 1958 das in diesem Jahr abgetragene ehemalige Arenberg Palais, ursprünglich Esterhazy Palais.

Brahms war auch mit der Familie Fellingner befreundet, die zu dieser Zeit das ehemalige Arenbergschlössl, Landstraßer Hauptstraße 96, bewohnte. Unser Foto zeigt das sogenannte Brahms-Zimmer.

Das Musikfreunde stifteten für Johannes Brahms eine Gedenktafel, die an diese Freundschaft erinnert. Sie wurde an der Gartenfassade des Schlossls angebracht und ist auf dem untenstehenden Foto erkennbar.

Nach Abbruch des Gebäudes und Errichtung des Nachfolgebaues ist diese in der Einfahrt des Hauses zu sehen.

Im « Kleinen Volksblatt » vom 2. April 1958 findet man folgenden Kurzartikel :

Brahms bittet um Verzeihung : Der große Musiker Brahms war aufrichtig bis zur Grobheit. Passte ihm irgendeine Gesellschaft nicht, setzte er den Hut auf, und fort war er.

Bei einer solchen Gelegenheit wollte ihm die Hausfrau den Weg verlegen. « Sie werden doch nicht schon weggehen wollen ? »

« Freilich » , sagte Brahms unerschütterlich. « Falls ich vergessen haben sollte, einen der Anwesenden zu beleidigen, so bitte ich um Verzeihung ! »

...

Bis zum Jahre 1958 stand an der Stelle des heutigen Neubaus das Arenberg Palais, das ursprüngliche Esterhazypalais. Im Hauseingang befindet sich heute eine Gedenktafel mit einem Bronzerelief, das vom Bildhauer Franz Siegel geschaffen wurde. Der Text der Gedenktafel lautet :

« In diesem Hause verbrachte Johannes Brahms vom Jahre 1893 bis zu seinem Tode viele Stunden im Kreise der Familie Fellinger. Viele seiner Werke erklangen hier zum ersten Mal. »

Im 19. Jahrhundert wuchs mit der massiven Industrialisierung die Arbeiterschicht stark an, die Einwohnerzahl Wiens explodierte, vor allem auch durch den Zuzug aus den ländlichen Gebieten der Donaumonarchie. Die nötigen Wohnungen wurden nahezu ausschließlich von Privaten gewinnorientiert gebaut. Mietskasernen mit so genannten « Bassena-Wohnungen » (Zimmer, Küche, Wasser und WC auf dem Gang) entstanden. Viele mussten diese kleinen Wohnungen (zwischen 20 und 30 Quadratmeter) noch mit Bettgehern und Untermietern teilen, um die Miete zahlen zu können. In den Jahren des Ersten Weltkrieges stagnierte die Bautätigkeit.

Bis 1958 stand anstelle des heutigen Wohnhauses Landstraßer-Hauptstraße 96 das 1785 für den Fürsten Esterházy errichtete Gartenpalais Arenberg. Zum Anwesen gehörte auch das Grundstück Nummer 98 und eine prachtvolle Gartenanlage, von der ein kleiner Rest im Form des Arenbergparks überdauert hat. 1842 kaufte Fürstin Sophie von Arenberg die Anlage. Aus dieser Zeit stammen die noch heute gebräuchlichen Bezeichnungen. Sie ließ 1877 neben dem Palais das Wohnhaus Nummer 98 errichten. 1900 erwarb die Gemeinde Wien das gesamte Areal.

An der heutigen Anschrift Landstraßer-Hauptstraße 96 wurde 1785 ein Palais als Sommersitz für Fürst Nikolaus Esterházy (1714-1790), genannt « der Prachtliebende », erbaut, der auch sein Eisenstädter Stammschloß zu einem « ungarischen Versailles » ausbauen ließ.

Aus der Geschichte ist er als kaiserlicher Feldmarschall bekannt, der sich 1757 in der Schlacht bei Kolin auszeichnete.

Der von ihm hinter dem Palais angelegte Garten (heutiger Rest ist der Arenbergpark, der nach seiner Umgestaltung seit 1907 zur öffentlichen Benützung freigegeben ist) umschloss die Grundstücke des Ziehrer und Sebastianplatzes bis zu den Hinterfronten der Häuser an der Ungargasse.

In der Besitzerreihe findet sich ab 1810 Erzherzog Carl (1771-1847), der Sieger von Aspern. Ab 1842 gehören Palais und Park der Fürstenfamilie Arenberg.

Fürstin Sophie Karoline Arenberg, die offenbar zuletzt nicht mehr hier wohnte, sondern das Palais vermietet hatte, verkaufte 1900 die Liegenschaft an die Gemeinde Wien.

Einer dieser Mieter war von 1870 bis 1876 der Eisenbahntechniker Max Maria von Weber (1822-1881), Sohn des Komponisten Carl Maria von Weber.

Zu Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts bewohnte die aus Deutschland stammende Familie des Generaldirektors der Firma Siemens & Halske Fellingner das Haus. Johannes Brahms (1833-1897) war mit den Fellingners befreundet; es ist bekannt, daß Marie Fellingner den Komponisten mit seinen Lieblingsgerichten bewirtete und auch sonst hausmütterlich um sein leibliches Wohl besorgt war. Eine Gedenktafel erinnert hier an den Komponisten.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg war das Jugendamt für den 3. Bezirk bis 1955 hier untergebracht. 1958 wurde es abgebrochen und an seiner Stelle ein großes Wohnhaus errichtet.

L'enregistrement de Brahms

During the pioneer phase of the phonographic industry, the constant improvement of the recording and replaying machines remained in the foreground. The phonograms, whether in cylinder or record form, were merely a provisional concern. This was reflected in the available repertoire recorded during the phonogram's early phase. Initially, what was of true importance was to simply convince the people of the wonders of recorded and stored speech. Hence, Thomas Edison's representatives travelled the world, in 1878 and 1879, to demonstrate at phonograph shows what advertising posters announced as the « wonderful speaking-machines ». Visitors of these shows were allowed to speak some words into the funnel, which would then be replayed by the machine. Even statesmen such as the British Prime Minister William Ewart Gladstone or the German Chancellor Otto Bismarck, as well as crowned leaders such as the German

Emperor Wilhelm II and the Austrian Emperor Franz-Josef, donated a few words in the name of technological progress.²⁰

(The earliest sound recording still in existence is of the British General-Governor of Canada, Lord Stanley, whose opening words, spoken at the Industry Fair in Toronto of September 1888, were recorded.)

These early recordings had more documentary and historical value. This was probably also the reason for Thomas Edison's assistant, Theo Wangemann, to visit the Viennese composer Johannes Brahms, in December 1889, in order to record his piano playing on wax cylinder. The piece of the recording of the 1st « Hungarian Dance », which Brahms personally interpreted on the piano, was so miserable that one might think that the artist played behind a closed door. Mister Wangemann's announcement, « “ Herr ” Doctor Brahms plays the piano », is the clearest part of the entire recording.

(The original wax cylinder is now completely unusable, but a copy exists that was made in 1930 and recently digitally reconstructed in the Phonogram Archive of the Austrian Academy of Science.)

The sciences, too, became aware of the documentary function of the phonograph. Harvard professor Jesse Fewkes was the 1st ethnologist of music who, in 1890, recorded the singing of Passamaquoddy Indians, in Maine. Many ethnologists and anthropologists followed his lead, collecting folk-songs on wax cylinders, just like the composer and researcher of folk-songs Béla Bartók who, since 1906, with the help of the Edison-phonograph, conserved the folk-songs of his homeland Hungary and of neighboring people on wax cylinders.

All of these recording activities had no commercial interests in mind and, thus, cannot be counted as music industry activities. The delivery of music boxes with pre-recorded music cylinders was, however, the earliest field of application in which the music repertoire played a role. Companies were not interested in producing new and creative music ; instead, they recorded particularly popular songs and instrumental standards. « Columbia Phonograph » was especially active in the recording of such music. The United States Marine Band, conducted by John Philip Sousa, recorded popular Johann Strauß waltzes and Irish folk-songs such as « Little Annie Rooney » or « Down Went McGinty » . By 1892, « Columbia » already owned more than 100 recordings of the Marine Band, which were sold for $ 2 per cylinder (Reebee Garofalo, 1997 ; page 20) . The government employee and amateur whistler John AtLee was also well-liked ; he whistled such popular songs as « The Mockingbird » and « Home Sweet Home » onto wax cylinders. In addition to a few more musicians known by name, however, there are many artists during the early period of music recordings whose names do not appear either in the « Columbia » catalog or on the music cylinders. It was simply not necessary to name musicians who, at the time, did not financially share in the success of phonogram sales or received royalties based on copyright laws.

Royalties would not have made any sense to begin with, since music cylinders could be produced only in limited numbers and no collecting societies existed that could have controlled the number of public performances. But even when Emile Berliner introduced mass-produced records, they did not have labels identifying the recording artists. In 1900, the phonogram and the music repertoire it contained were not at the center of the companies' commercial interests. The phonographic industry simply published everything that was demanded by local music-box operators. Especially in demand were so-called « coon songs », which were rather yelled than sung, because it aided the then existing recording technology.

The competition shifted towards the level of the music repertoire only once the standardized technological design of the phonogram and the industry standard « record » prevailed as recording media. At 1st, however, artists, made popular through phonograms, were hired away by competing companies. Thus, « Victor » managed to obtain Fred Gaisberg, the « Columbia » stars Atlee, George J. Gasken, Russell Hunting, and the U.S. Marine Band for recordings. « Columbia » had to let go of their successful artists simply because exclusive recording contracts did not yet exist (Fred Gaisberg, 1943) .

The « Victor Talking Machine » and its European subsidiary, the « Gramophone Company » , were the 1st to comprehend the significance of the music repertoire. In 1901, they sent the brothers Fred and Will Gaisberg on a trip through European cities (London, Paris, Milan, Zürich, The Hague, Vienna, Budapest, Brussels, Lwow, Breslau, Königsberg, Saint-Petersburg, Stockholm, and Helsinki) in order to record in hotel rooms singers and musicians, selected by local agents, who enjoyed local popularity. After the recording, the produced matrices were immediately sent to the record plant in Hanover, where records were produced for each individual local market. After the Gaisbergs had exhausted the European centers, they turned their attention to more exotic parts of the world. They travelled to larger Russian cities and recorded prayer songs of Jewish cantors in Vilnius ; Tatar-songs in Kasan ; or Georgian choruses in Tiflis. In the fall of 1901, they travelled India, Burma, Thailand, China, and Japan to conquer these markets for the « Gramophone Company » as well. The recordings they made had no documentary character and were instead done for purely commercial reasons. The idea was to provide each geographic market with locally popular music. The Gaisberg brothers were so successful in « conquering the world market » that, before long, the capacities of the record plant in Hanover were insufficient, and branch plants in England, France, Spain, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and even India had to be built.

In the 1890's, the owners of a phonograph could choose from a wide range of recordings including banjo and cornet solos, humorous and sentimental songs and brass band selections. The « American Symphony Orchestra » had recorded « Yankiana Rag » and « Chiribiribin Waltz » .

However, it was not necessary to purchase recorded music. On the phonograph, it was easy to make recordings oneself. It worked like a cassette tape recorder. One could even record on the same cylinders many times. For this reason, many recordings never intended for sale have been preserved from the 19th Century. When the « improved phonograph » came on the market, in 1888, Thoams Edison's agents rushed to demonstrate the machine to prominent statesmen and artists, whose opinions were then quoted in newspaper advertisements. At the same time, trial recordings were made. In this way, such famous people as the German « Kaiser » , Pope Leo, Florence Nightingale, Gladstone and Bismarck had their voices immortalized.

Many of these recordings still exist. The earliest voice recording known to exist is the speech by the Governor-General of Canada, Lord Stanley, opening the Toronto Industrial Exhibition, in September 1888. There are rumours that even older recordings are preserved in the Edison company's archives in New Jersey, but no one has had access to them since the turn of the Century.

In December 1889, Edison's agent, Theo Wangemann, had the opportunity to demonstrate the machine to Johannes Brahms. The elderly composer agreed to play his « Hungarian Dance » No. I. Recently, the Austrian Academy of Sciences decided to restore this recording, using the latest digital technology. The original wax cylinder was completely ruined but, from a copy of it made in the 1930's, a faint sound of a piano could be heard in addition to the hissing. When the hiss was removed, there was not much left ; one might imagine oneself eavesdropping on Brahms's playing from behind a closed door.

At the beginning, one can clearly hear the eager agent introducing « Herr Doktor Brahms » , and the recording is the only audible relic of the composer, who died in April 3rd 1897.

Besides his involvement in the musical scene, there were novelties and amusements to keep Johannes Brahms occupied, if composing and performing did not. A few years before, the Herzogenbergs had introduced him to Thomas Edison's phonograph, and now the Fellingiers had a machine at their house.

« I have had the opportunity of hearing it often and quite pleasantly. » , Brahms wrote Clara Schumann.

« You must have read about this new miracle. It's like being in fairyland again. »

That December, he met an American named Theo Wangemann at the Fellingiers. Edison had dispatched this associate to record famous Europeans on his cylinder machine. Naturally, Wangemann asked Brahms to contribute. Brahms returned to the Fellingiers' a few days later to try-out this Yankee marvel. At 1st, he sat paralyzed by nerves when confronted by the apparatus, then suddenly, he went to the piano and, as Wangemann scrambled to get the machine going, played-off a section of the 1st « Hungarian Dance » and a Johann Strauß Polka. The recording survives in mangled condition, revealing a rhythmically free, bass-heavy kind of playing.

As intriguing is the voice at the beginning of the recording, so garbled that no one can tell who is speaking or quite what is said. At least, one haunting possibility is a mixture of German and English from the high-tenor of Brahms himself, shouting at the future :

« Grüsse an Herrn Doktor Edison ! I am Doktor Brahms, Johannes Brahms ! »

It was at a party, in those years, that he heard a young American woman playing a ragtime tune on a banjo. To a friend, Brahms recalled the evening wistfully, humming a few bars of what may have been, « Hello, Ma Baby » . He was fascinated by the effect of the instrument, and by the dancing syncopations of this new American Style.

Instinctively, he saw its rhythm as a fresh resource, as gypsy music had been for his generation. But, now, he was too old to do anything about it.

December 1889 : Adelbert Theodor Edward (« Theo ») Wangemann, a representative of Thomas Edison, recorded Brahms playing the piano at the house of the Fellinginger family. The Fellingingers were close friends of the composer.

15 June 1896 : The last photo of Johannes Brahms alive. The famous picture is part of a series of 6 taken by Maria Fellinginger in the garden of their house (the old Palais Arenberg) at 96 « Landstraßer-Hauptstraße », in Vienna's 3rd District.

A voice, most likely « Theo » Wangemann's, introduces the music with the words :

« December 1889, (I am in) the house of Doctor Fellinginger, and with me is Doctor Brahms, Johannes Brahms. »

Brahms then plays an excerpt from the « Hungarian Dance » No. 1 (starting, oddly enough, on the consequent of the 1st statement rather than at the beginning) and a paraphrase of « Libelle » by Johann Strauß.

The recording is extremely noisy and the piano is barely audible (the audio has been considerably de-noised, believe it or not) but it remains the 1st audio recording of a major composer making music and, from it, certain information can still be extracted : Brahms' decided tendency, for instance, to play dotted quarter and 8th rhythms as something more like triplet figures in the context of this piece.

Johannes Brahms' piano is a cross-strung, ebonized and 240 centimeter long grand has Viennese action and bears the inscription « J. B. Streicher & Sohn ». The piano with the serial number 8105 was sold, in 1880, to Doctor Richard and Maria Fellinginger, who had their residence in the so called « Arenbergschlössl » in Vienna 3rd District, on « Apostelgasse 12 ». The Fellingingers belonged to Brahms' closest friends in Vienna and he always enjoyed staying with them, especially when playing chamber music with Vienna's most talented musicians, e.g. , the clarinet player Richard Mühlfeld or cellist Robert Hausmann.

In 1889, on December 2nd, the famous phonographic recording of Brahms' playing took place in the Fellinginger residence. Doctor Fellinginger, who was the general director of Siemens & Halske, in Austria, invited Theo Wangemann, Thomas Alva Edison's representant in Europe, to take the recording.

Brahms had prepared his « Rhapsody » in G minor, Opus 79/2, but as he became impatient by the protracting preparations for the recording procedure, he played a shortened version of his 1st « Hungarian Dance », WoO 1/1. The 2nd piece he played was a paraphrase on the « Polka Mazur » « Die Libelle » (The Dragon-Fly) , Opus 204 by Joseph Strauß - the CD « Brahms spielt Klavier - Aufgenommen im Hause Fellingner 1889 » (Brahms Plays the Piano, recorded in 1889 in Doctor Fellingner's House) - edited by the « Verlag der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, Tondokumente aus dem Phonogrammarchiv, Reihe Historische Stimmen aus Wien », Volume 5, contains an interview with Doctor Imogen Fellingner, the last owner of the piano, given to Doctor Gerda Lechleitner, in 1996, and describing the circumstances of the recording.

For the identification of « Die Libelle », see : Helmut Kowar. « Zum Klavierspiel Johannes Brahms' », in : « Brahms Studien 8 », Wien (1990) .

On the Fellingner-piano also a lot of private 1st performances took place. The photographs show the music room in the Fellingner dwelling with the Streicher grand, with Brahms, Richard Hausmann or members of the family.

Brahms at the Piano

Sonic archeology : An analysis and transcription of the 1889 cylinder recording of Johannes Brahms performance of a segment of his 1st « Hungarian Dance » .

By Jonathan Berger - CCRMA, Stanford University.

Introduction

On December 2nd 1889, Theo Wangemann, a representative of Thomas Edison recorded Johannes Brahms performing 2 segments of music at the piano. The works recorded included part of a paraphrase of Johann Strauß' « Libelle », preceded by measures 13-72 of Brahms' 1872 arrangement of the 1st « Hungarian Dance » for solo piano.

While this unique historical document should have been hailed as an important « window » to the world of 19th Century music performance practices, the musical information was almost entirely masked by noise. The recording was, in fact, so noisy that musicologist Gregor Benko wrote that :

« Any musical value heard (in the cylinder recording) can be charitably described as the product of a pathological imagination. »

Indeed, despite various attempts at filtering and enhancing the recording, the poor quality of the cylinder recording resulted in a general consensus that the recording was of no significant musicological value.

Using an innovative approach to audio signal analysis (see : Berger, Coifman and Goldberg, 1994) Ph.D. candidate Charles Nichols and I were able to transcribe the music by painstakingly removing layers of noise to reveal the music embedded within.

Transcription was followed by careful analysis of the numerous performance nuances, agogic inflections, improvised segments and added elaborations.

Who was speaking ?

The spoken text, at the start of the cylinder recording, has been wrongly attributed as belonging to Brahms. Numerous writers, scholars and amateurs alike, have presumed that Brahms introduces himself with the words :

« I am Doctor Brahms, Johannes Brahms. »

However, a number of factors raise serious doubts as to who is speaking. The only mention of the recording by someone who was present (in the published memoirs of Fellingner's son) states that Brahms was introduced. Considering the time between the announcement and the start of the music, it seems improbable that the same person could segue from speech to playing so quickly particularly given the technological limitations.

The denoised excerpts reveals enough of the speech to suggest that the speaker (probably, Theo Wangemann) introduces Brahms as follows :

« ... Dezember Achtzehnhundertachtundneunzig. Haus von Herrn Doktor Fellingner, bei mir ist Doktor Brahms, Johannes Brahms. »

(... December 1889. House of Mister Fellingner, with me is Doctor Brahms, Johannes Brahms.)

Performance Analysis

In reconstructing the performance, we measured and compared various temporal aspects of Brahms' playing. Since the dance uses a limited number of rhythmic patterns, we sub-divided the data according to rhythmic types. The most recurrent of these is the dotted-quarter / eighth-note measure unit. There are 16 recurrences of this unit in 4 consecutive 6 measure phrases. Each of these phrases culminates with a half note accompanied by arpeggiation.

The 2nd section of the recorded segment of the dance is characterized by 2 4 measure phrases of sequential upper-neighbor melodic patterns in 3 groups of sixteenth-note, sixteenth-note, eighth-note separated by a measure of eighth-note, quarter-note, eighth-note. This section is cadenced by a 2 measure sixteenth-note sequence of descending conjunct tetrachords followed by a sixteenth-note pattern terminated with eighth-note, sixteenth-note, sixteenth-note, quarter-note. The score repeats the last phrase with the neighbor note embellishment replaced by octave skips and a sextuplet arpeggio replacing the sixteenth-note sequence.

For reasons not immediately obvious, Brahms commenced the recording of the « Ungarische Tanz » segment on the consequent of the 1st phrase, thus starting on a V9 harmony. The phrase structure and harmonic rhythm of measures 1-12 is :

$$[(((2 + 2) \text{ -- } 2) \text{ -- } (2 (1+ 1) + 2))]$$

$$i \text{ vii}^7 V \quad i \quad i \text{ V}^7/III \quad V^7/iv \quad iv$$

Brahms performance commences at measure 13, continuing the 6 measure phrases as follows :

$$[(((2 + 2) \text{ -- } 2) \text{ -- } (2 (1+ 1) + 2))]$$

$$V^9 \text{ ii}^4 \text{ ii}^6 \quad V \quad \text{ii}^6 \text{ V} \text{ V}^7 \quad i$$

Measures 25-48 continue the 6+6 phrase structure.

The 2nd section of the piece is sub-phrased into 4 measure groups preserving the 12 measure phrase structure as (4+4+4) rather than (6+6) . Although the recording ends at this point, the score follows with a transition of 1 (4+4+4) phrase followed by 1 (6+6) phrase that leads into a recapitulation of the opening section.

While the overall durations of the 3 large phrase groups that incorporate the dotted-quarter-eighth-note units (measures 13-24, 25-36 and 37-48) do not differ radically, the internal lengths and proportions of each measure unit is remarkably variable. Measures 13-24 have an overall duration of 10.82 seconds ; measures 25-36 are 9.28 seconds ; and measures 37-48, 9.86 seconds. Measure lengths range from .69 seconds (measure 21) to .93 seconds (measure 33) .

The most outstanding performance feature of this section is Brahms' tendency towards « underdotting » . The 8th note exceeds the duration of its preceding dotted-quarter in measures 14 and 19, and is approximately equal in duration in measures 20, 34 and 40. The dotted-quarter is given its full durational value only once in measure 38. The other distinctive performance practice is Brahms' elongation of the middle quarter note of the amphibrach figures of the 2nd section (measures 49-68) .

In addition to the agogic features of Brahms' performance, there are a number of instances where Brahms departs from the score, both by melodic insertion or alteration, and by modification of the phrase structure to facilitate closure at a non-terminal musical point.

Reconstruction

This data was used to reconstruct the entire, original 4 hand version of the piece in MIDI format playable on an acoustic reproducing piano such as the « Disklavier » .

Although the recording technology lacked the sensitivity to derive dynamics or pedal markings, the timings suggested distinct performance trends that used to create a good approximation of how Brahms would have played the piece.

The reconstructed performance along with the original transcription segments and a performance of the original 4 hand version of the piece as if performed by Brahms playing with himself was released on CD-Rom by the Yamaha Corporation, in 2003.

Johannes Brahms at the Lindström Recording Studio

(By Stephan Puille, from Berlin.)

Enhanced version of a lecture paper, held on May 9th 2010 by Stephan Puille, Berlin at the 11th International Conference of Discography (« 11. Diskografentag ») in Hildesheim (updated on March 12, 2013) .

On 15 June 1889, Adelbert Theodor Edward (« Theo ») Wangemann, Thomas Alva Edison's emissary for the introduction of the improved phonograph, started-out on a trip to Europe. (1) On 25 October 1889, after visiting Paris and Berlin, he arrived in Vienna, where he stayed at the Grand Hotel. The bearded Wangemann is seen standing behind Edison on an image taken in mid- June 1888.

In the forenoon, the phonograph was reserved for important artists and academics to make the instrument known and, of course, to make recordings, which Wangemann afterwards performed for free to notables and at public gatherings. 6 persons could always hear the phonograph, at the same time, through earphones. Demonstrations with mounted horn were also performed occasionally, but the sound was less true to the original, being much lower and metallic.

The visit of Johannes Brahms at the Vienna Grand Hotel, on 30 October 1889, was especially highlighted by the press. (2) Brahms heard, among other things, an aria sung by Lili Lehmann, a spoken telegram by Werner von Siemens and a piano piece. Filled with enthusiasm, he wrote to Clara Schumann : « It's as though one were living a fairy-tale. » (3) , and presented Wangemann a dedicated picture of himself. 3 days later, the mezzo-soprano Rosa Papier(-Paumgartner) recorded Brahms' « Sapphische Ode » , which was soon afterwards performed to the Austrian Emperor Franz-Josef I. A press report mentions the recording of some of Brahms' dances by the famous pianist Alfred Grünfeld with a newly introduced funnel, on 14 November 1889, which was mounted at the underside of the instrument. (4) On 2 December 1889, a few days after a private gathering at the house of Doctor Richard Albert Fellingner, the head of the Vienna branch of the firm of Siemens & Halske, Wangemann came back to demonstrate some of his latest cylinders and to record Johannes Brahms, as arranged with him before.

Richard Fellingner, one of Doctor Fellingner's sons, described the order of events :

« At 1st, Brahms was so excited that he felt unable to perform. When he was ready, he couldn't wait and teased poor Wangemann and his assistant, the mechanic Devrient of Siemens & Halske in Berlin, to hurry. As with Grünfeld, the funnel was mounted at the underside of the piano. Wangemann spoke an introduction in German. Suddenly, Brahms interrupted him calling-out :“ Gespielt von ' Frau ' Doktor Fellingner ! ”, and began playing. » (5)

A close inspection of the announcement on the Brahms cylinder revealed a most interesting result which supports Richard Fellingner's testimony ! Wangemann Istly named the date : « Dezember 1889. » . Shortly afterwards, the recording was interrupted and restarted after an unknown period of time. This time, it was clearly another, audibly excited and nervous voice which shouted :

« Im Haus von Herrn Doktor Fellingner, by (bei ?) Herrn Doktor Brahms, Johannes Brahms. »

This kind of announcement, for example naming the recorded person twice, is unparalleled in all-known recordings under the supervision of Wangemann. The Fellingners surely kept the remembrance of the adored Brahms recording in their music room alive. Even if we must take into account that Richard Fellingner wrote down his memories more than 40 years later, I cannot imagine that he errs in the important detail of Brahms announcing his own recording.

The use of « by » instead of the German form « von » , has already led to much speculation about the identity of the announcer in the past. In case it is really « by » and not a slip of the tongue (« bei ») , I cannot provide a solution but a possible explanation. Brahms heard a larger number of cylinders before he himself recorded. Wangemann probably recorded hundreds of notables during his stay in Europe and only a small fraction of their recordings came down to us. One of these could be important to solve the mystery, because « by » (« bei » ?) is also heard in Wangemann's announcement of the recording of the baritone Karl Mayer, accompanied by the pianist Franz Wüllner, in January 1890, in Cologne. I treat this and other recordings in my essay. Could it be that Brahms adopted Wangemann's diction in this detail ? I am, of course, open for further discussions on this matter.

The Brahms cylinder, presented by Wangemann to Doctor Fellingner on this evening, was long forgotten by the public when his son Richard Fellingner noted in his memoirs that it was extremely difficult to reproduce, because the sound was too weak and, despite of several attempts, a suitable method hadn't yet been found. (6) Obviously, the cylinder was played more than once on a phonograph the family had bought for that purpose. Early cylinders are comparatively soft, requiring a light-weight reproducer like the Edison « Standard » speaker, and are usually reproduced by ear-phones. The family members certainly had no clue about such technical refinement and stressed the groove with each play-back. Later, the phonograph was equipped with an electric reproducer, but the damage was already done.

The course of events, in January 1935, is controversial. Ludwig Koch, director of the culture department of Carl Lindström A.G. , claimed that Richard Fellingner approached him, asking if he would try to improve the recording by transferring it to disc. (7) Fritz Bose, director of the newly created music department of the Institute for Sound Research at the University of Berlin, which was founded on 1 April 1920 by Wilhelm Doegen as Archive of Sound, told another story. Thus, Bose had noticed a report on the Brahms cylinder and written Fellingner, on 12 January 1935, for his approval to dub it to disc, to which the same had consented 4 days later. (8) Be that as it may, Fellingner handed over the precious cylinder, padded with cotton wool, in a special box manufactured of mahogany and crystal glass.

When he was a boy, Ludwig Koch had met Johannes Brahms who told him about the cylinder of 1889, but the famous composer and pianist did not know what became of it. Naturally, Koch was extremely curious about the recording, but wrote in 1955 that the piano could hardly be distinguished through the loud noises due to inexperienced recording. (9) This was a posthumous slap in the face of Wangemann, responsible for Edison's recording department since 1888. Despite its obvious shortcomings, the cylinder was a national icon and Fritz Bose exploited its rediscovery and transfer in the press. As the galvanic copying process would have involved the destruction of the cylinder, it was decided to cut the Brahms recording on a wax disc. Each recording made for the collection of the Institute for Sound Research was documented in an application form. For the Brahms cylinder, Fritz Bose had approved serial number La 1415, recorded at a quarter past 6, in the evening of 23 January 1935, in the Lindström recording studio in Berlin. (10)

Although Bose claimed the carrying-out for himself, (11) Ludwig Koch was quite likely responsible for the transfer. He directly applied a microphone on the reproducer of an, purportedly, Edison phonograph type « Class M », driven by an electric motor. I infer this from Bose's statement, that an Edison phonograph, from the time of origin of the cylinder, had been employed. The signal output from the microphone was amplified and filtered from high and low frequency noises before it drove a cutting head to inscribe the sound in the wax. The sound level of the Strauß waltz was lower than the record groove noise, and the dubbing was therefore broken-off after the last bars of the preceding « Hungarian Dance » No. 1 in G minor (author's note) . After recording, an acetate was cut from the wax disc and kept by Ludwig Koch.

In a 2nd step, performed by Lindström's recording engineer Otto Birkhahn, whose acronym « OB » (12) followed by the sequence number « 9 » is carved in the dead wax under the serial number La 1415, a spoken introduction was added to the Brahms recording. Finally, by electro-plating the wax Master, a stamper was created to press a small number of shellac discs for the use of the Institute for Sound Research and very few other archives. All pressings had a paper label of the Institute for Sound Research with hand-written information. Instrumental recordings like the Brahms disc got an orange label ; voice recordings a green label. (13) The German inscription reads :

On 3 June 1937, under pressure from Fritz Bose who stirred-up hatred against the Fellingiers claiming that they deprived the Brahms recording from the German people, the cylinder was presented to Professor Georg Schünemann, director of the music department of the then Prussian State Library, in Berlin. (14) On 20 September 1938, only 3 and a half years after the 1st transfer, the Brahms cylinder was again dubbed on disc. At least 2 takes were recorded, this time also containing the Strauß waltz, and subsequently pressed by « Telefunken Platte G.m.b.H. » on a small number of double-sided shellac discs. The music department at Berlin State Library holds 2 samples of the « Telefunken » disc. (15)

All stampers kept in the Institute for Sound Research were melted down during the War and the Lindström pressings could neither be found in Berlin nor in other archives. Hence, it was thought that all that remained was the acetate presented by Ludwig Koch to the National Sound Archive in London, now a department of the British Library. Luckily, a short time ago, a genuine Lindström pressing of 1935, in good condition, surfaced which is now in my possession. If reproduced with the standard speed of 78 rpm, the « Hungarian Dance » is performed in the « wrong » key of A minor. I am grateful to Mister Roman Flury for pointing this out. Provided that Brahms did not change the key, it follows that the play-back speed of the Brahms cylinder was set too fast during transfer. (To correct the speed for the digital transfer, the added audio file of the Lindström disc was reproduced with a speed of only 71,5 rpm.) (16)

On 20 December 2010, at the Berlin State Library, I heard a transfer of both « Telefunken » discs on DAT tape, with the sad conclusion, that the Brahms cylinder had gotten much worse in the short period between 1935 and 1938. Only fragments of the piano playing, disturbed by numerous pops from cracks, could be identified. Besides physical damage by breakage, the cylinder was obviously played with the wrong reproducer before the small remnants were again dubbed on disc.

At least, the cylinder itself survived the War. On 30 March 2011, I examined the original Brahms cylinder at the Berlin State Library. Judging by optical evaluation, the light ochre wax substance is in good condition and free from mold, but many grooves, especially in and after the middle-section, are worn-out beyond reconstructibility. Furthermore, the cylinder is cracked several times over its entire length with loss of substance. A large piece from the left rim had broken-off, affecting the 1st 50 grooves, and was missing until 1997, when the cylinder was fixed and reconstructed with a mixture of wax and epoxy resin during an elaborate restoration at the Phonogram Archive in Vienna. As a positive result, the cylinder can now safely be handled and viewed from all sides. After the restoration, the cylinder was transferred at the Phonogram Archive and published on CD. (17)

Notes

(1) I wrote an essay about Wangemann's travels in Europe, between June 1889 and February 1890, in both English and German. The essay comprises a dozen sound files taken from cylinders recorded during Wangemann's trip, including the only recordings of Prince Otto von Bismarck and Count Helmuth von Moltke.

Deciphering the 1889 Brahms recordings

(By pianist Jack Gibbons.)

Until very recently, I had no idea there were 2 recordings in existence of Brahms playing the piano. I was familiar with his famous recording of the « Hungarian Dance » No.1 (sadly now, in a very deteriorated state) but I was very excited when I learned that Brahms had also recorded a Polka by Josef Strauß on that same day, in 1889 (though sadly, it's a recording that has also greatly deteriorated in quality over the years) .

On 30 October 1889, while touring Europe, Edison's recording engineer « Theo » Wangemann demonstrated Edison's remarkable recording machine at the Vienna Grand Hotel. Brahms was there and was amazed by what he heard, which included recordings of an aria sung by Lili Lehmann, a spoken telegram and a piano piece, and wrote to Clara Schumann that « it's as though one were living a fairy-tale ». A date was set to record Brahms himself a month later and, on Monday 2 December 1889, « Theo » Wangemann set-up his recording equipment in the Viennese home of Brahms' friends Doctor Richard and Maria Fellingner. Many years later, one of Doctor Fellingner's sons, Richard Fellingner, vividly described the events of that historic day when Brahms sat at the piano and played into the horn that « Theo Wangeman » had fitted beneath the Streicher grand piano in the Fellingner's drawing room. Apparently, at the start of the session, Brahms was so excited that he felt unable to perform. He had hoped to record his « Rhapsody » in G minor, Opus 79, No. 2, which he had been practising especially but, after growing impatient during the long set-up process, instead opted to play a shortened version of his « Hungarian Dance » No. 1 and a short extract of Josef Strauß's Polka-Mazurka « The Dragonfly » (« Die Libelle »). According to Richard Fellingner, when Wangemann began the recording with a spoken introduction in German, Brahms interrupted him with his own excited announcement and immediately began playing, as can be heard on the original cylinder. The fact that there are clearly 2 different voices in the spoken introduction, supports Fellingner's account (rather than the theory that Wangemann spoke the entire announcement himself). The 2nd voice (presumably that of Brahms) is evidently very excited, as recalled by Fellingner, and it seems unlikely that the Fellingner family, who were very close to Brahms, would wrongly remember such an important detail as the composer announcing his own recording.

Richard Fellingner also recalled the many futile attempts to reproduce the cylinder, which proved impossible because the sound of the piano on the recording was so weak. Little could the Fellingner family have known that they were also damaging the original recording with every play-back due to the comparatively soft texture of the cylinder. By the time the technology was in existence to copy the cylinder, in 1935, 46 years after it had been created, much of the damage had already been done through repeated playings. In the years since scientists have worked to improve the quality of the recording, and though it may be hard to believe, we can hear a lot more on the recording today than was possible in 1935.

Voice of Otto von Bismarck discovered

For the 1st time, 21st Century audiences are able to hear the voice of Otto von Bismarck, one of the 19th Century's most important figures.

The National Park Service announced this week that the German chancellor's voice has been identified among those found on a dozen recorded wax cylinders, each more than 120 years old, that were once stored near Thomas Edison's cot in his West Orange, New Jersey, laboratory. They include music and dignitaries, including the voice of the only person born in the 18th Century believed to be available on a recording.

The trove includes Bismarck's voice reciting songs and imploring his son to live morally and eat and drink in moderation.

« In the 18th Century, the human voice was described as one of the most noble capacities of human beings. »

Stephan Puille, the German researcher who identified Bismarck's voice, said in an e-mail :

« Bismarck is no longer mute. I think his voice allows a new access to him. »

« Sound is 3 dimensional. Heretofore, we only knew Bismarck from pictures and drawings. Now, we know him a little better. »

The people who study and collect early recordings knew they had been made, but did not know they still existed.

« Most early recordings I have read about had not survived. » , said Patrick Feaster, an Indiana University scholar who also helped crack the mystery of what was on the cylinders.

The recordings were made in 1889 and 1890 by Theo Wangemann, whom Edison sent to supervise the use of the Edison Phonograph Works machines on display at the Paris World's Fair, in 1889, before traveling to his native Germany. Feaster describes Wangemann as « the 1st serious professional recording engineer » . While in Paris, he recorded orchestras, pianists, a comedian and others. He even recorded on the then-new Eiffel Tower.

While sound recordings were made as early as 1859, the ones on Edison's wax phonographs were in the 1st generation of intended for play-back.

The trip yielded one of the best-known early recordings, of Johannes Brahms playing the piano. But, Feaster said, that cylinder has given early recordings a bad name :

« This poor recording was utterly worn-out before anyone copied it. » , he said.

« It's very noisy. You can barely hear there's a piano. »

Feaster says the newly identified recordings, by contrast, show what the then-new technology perfected by Edison could do.

Wangemann's other recordings from the trip were long sought after.

Biographies mentioned them. Wangemann himself referred to them, in 1906, when testifying at a patent trial. He said that, by then, some were broken, according to Jerry Fabris, the curator of the museum at the Thomas Edison National Historic Park. Ulrich Lappenkuper, managing director of the Otto von Bismarck Society in Friedrichsruh, Germany, said the search for one with the Chancellor has gone on for years - in vain.

The story of the fragile brown wax cylinders picks-up again in 1957, said Fabris. That was when the Edison home and laboratory were donated to the National Park Service.

At the time, there was a quick inventory of the lab's contents. A card attached to the wooden box said where it had been found. By then, Fabris said, some of the cylinders were broken by someone trying to try open the locked box, which had no labels but one enticing feature in the form of the 2 words scratched in the wood : « Edison » , and « Wangemann » .

Fabris became curator of the sound recording collection in 1994. 1 year later, he started the decade-long task of cataloging all 39,000 phonographs in the collection, moving from the easiest to identify to the oldest, most experimental (and often unlabeled) ones.

He said he 1st gave a close look to the Wangemann cylinders, in 2005. But, at the time, he didn't have the equipment needed to convert the sounds stored on those fragile pieces into digital files. By 2010, he had what was needed and was able to convert the dozen cylinders that weren't too badly broken.

« When I heard that it was German speaking » , he said, « that was a big clue that these might be something very important » .

To figure-out what it was, he called in Feaster, a lecturer in communication and culture at Indiana University, and, later, Puille, a conservator of archaeological finds at Berlin's University of Applied Sciences.

Puille said the words from the man speaking in a falsetto voice were hard to make-out but, when he transcribed them, he realized it was the Chancellor speaking less than a year before he was replaced as chancellor.

The discovery has sparked intense interest in Germany. The Bismarck Society's Lappenkuper described it in an e-mail as « hype » , which he said could « fertilize the historical research » .

He was interested to hear what the Chancellor chose to say for posterity's sake :

« Bismarck did not give any political advices but recitations of poems, lyrics ... and a personal suggestion to his son to be moderate in working, eating and drinking ! »

In Germany, the recording of Bismarck may be the most exciting. But another voice was also thrilling for Feaster to hear.

They captured Helmuth von Moltke, the long-time chief of staff for the Prussian army reciting lines from William Shakespeare and other literature.

It's ironic, Feaster said, that a man born in 1800 and known as « the Great Silent One » is the owner of the only voice born in the 18th Century known to be preserved.

Feaster said that find was a « coup » - but there are more to come in his field.

« There are always more holy grails » , he said.

« We're really at a moment where early sound recordings are turning-up and becoming audible at a rate much greater than ever before. »

Adelbert Theodor Wangemann

Adelbert Theodor Edward Wangemann was born on 13 February 1855 in Berlin and died June 1906. Known as Theo, this German emigrated to the United States. In 1888, he began working for Thomas Edison as an assistant at his laboratory in West Orange, New Jersey. In 1889, Edison sent Wangemann to keep the phonograph at the 1889 Paris « Expo » , in good working condition. The trip was extended and Wangemann made numerous early sound recordings on wax cylinders, some of which were lost for more than 100 years. Found in 1957, but not revealed until 2012, they include the only known recording of Otto von Bismarck.

The parents : Adalbert Theodor Wangemann (1815-1878) and Theodosia Sophie Ottilie Wangemann (née Rhenius) (?-1878) . He and his older brother, born on 23 September 1852, were named after their father. To distinguish them, he was called « Theo » ; his 1st name also had a slight spelling change. He and his brothers later added 3rd names, he added the name Edward ; and his brother, Emil. By 1900, his brother had also changed his 1st name to Albert. The family was musical ; his grandfather, Johannes Theodosius Wangemann, performed, directed, composed and taught music ; and his cousin, Otto Wangemann, was an organist, composer and musicologist. His uncle, Otto's father, was also an organist.

Wangemann composed music, played and occasionally performed at the piano. Wangemann's father had a business selling paper goods and a factory where he manufactured envelopes and embossed monograms on writing paper. Both Wangemann and his brother worked there. His brother took-over the business around 1876 but, after their parents died in 1878, the brothers emigrated to the United States, the following year : his brother in February and he, in August. He 1st settled in Chelsea, Massachusetts, and later moved to Boston. In 1884, he moved to New York City, where he became a naturalized citizen on October 11, 1884.

Wangemann began working as an assistant to Thomas Edison at his laboratory, in 1888, experimenting to find the best ways of recording music and voice. He has been called the world's 1st professional recording engineer. Recordings were made individually on wax cylinders, with no means of duplicating them. By December 1888, Wangemann had tried recording several originals at once, but this was insufficient to meet the request for the recordings, which were not yet being sold. Wangemann accompanied some performers on piano, ending with a brief 7 note « trademark » improvisation that annoyed some who heard these recordings. In March and April 1889, he recorded a number of musicians, including Hans von Bülow and John Knowles Paine.

The following year, after Edison learned that his phonograph exhibit sent to the 1889 Paris « Expo » was not operating properly, he sent Wangemann and a few assistants to Europe to ensure the phonographs worked properly, but later extended the trip ; Wangemann used the opportunity to make additional recordings for use in exhibitions.

While he was in Europe, more than 2,000 blank cylinders were sent to Wangemann for this purpose and he recorded a number of prominent individuals, musicians, comedians, singers and statesmen, and the trip turned into a public relations sensation. Beginning with artists who were at the Paris « Expo », Wangemann recorded pianist Édouard Risler, the popular French café-concert singer Paulus, and Charles-Marie Widor, an organist, among others. On August 29, 1889, he recorded 4 Hungarian singers, the Tacianu Sisters. This cylinder became a particular favourite of Wangemann's, and he lauded the « international value » of the new American invention, which enabled a German audience to hear a Russian melody once sung by a Hungarian quartet on a French stage.

Edison, also traveling to Europe, sent Wangemann to Berlin, where he was to show the phonograph to Werner von Siemens. Von Siemens, a friend and business partner of Edison's, provided a special room for Wangemann, as well as a German mechanic to assist him while he toured Germany and Austria-Hungary. Wangemann made a number of experimental recordings of prominent musicians and individuals. He also demonstrated the phonograph and recordings to different groups. On September 18, he gave a demonstration to scientists and professors in Heidelberg and, 2 days later, to a group of electro-technicians in Frankfurt. Wangemann's behavior at both of these events provoked some criticism from the audience. In Heidelberg, where Edison was the guest of honour, he took-over the address, during which some of his comments were viewed as out of turn. In Frankfurt, where he spoke to a wider audience in a packed hall, he condescendingly made them look unsophisticated and feel unworthy of his time.

During this period, Wangemann received invitations for demonstrations from Bismarck, Helmuth von Moltke, Wilhelm II and Czar Alexander III of Russia, then in Berlin. Wilhelm II did not make a recording, but his young sons, Wilhelm, Eitel Friedrich and Adalbert did record a cylinder. Wangemann's tour drew much attention, attracting additional invitations that made his schedule and budget difficult to maintain ; those extending the invitations were equally hard pressed for time, and visits often had to be scheduled more than once. Some also wanted repeat visits from Wangemann.

Edison and those traveling with him returned to the United States, on September 28 ; Wangemann and his wife, who accompanied him, stayed in Europe. The 1st attempt to meet with Bismarck having failed, a 2nd opportunity arose a week later for Wangemann and his wife to go to Friedrichsruh, to Bismarck's castle. While there, he recorded a wax cylinder, as reported in the press at the time, but which was then lost for more than 120 years. Bismarck, like everyone, was fascinated with the new invention and Wangemann spent several hours with him, even missing his train to Berlin. Wangemann met with Czar Alexander III, on October 12. After weeks of postponements, this invitation that had meant so much to Wangemann found the Czar little interested in the phonograph and not interested in making a recording. A 2nd visit took place, but shortly beforehand, the Czar was prevented from seeing Wangemann. While in Berlin, waiting to see the Czar, Wangemann gave day-time demonstrations to artists, scientists and civil servants ; in the evening, he gave demonstrations in private clubs to their invited members, often drawing crowds. Shortly before leaving Berlin, he organized a charity concert, where he charged admission, possibly his only European appearance with an entrance fee. Despite the 20 Mark entrance fee, then equivalent to an average working man's weekly wage, the hall was full, showing how eager people were to hear the voices of Bismarck and the German crown princes.

Wangemann, his wife and his assistants left Berlin on October 20 and, having been unable to see von Moltke on their 1st attempt, spent 2 days with him on the way to Vienna. Of the 4 cylinders recorded by von Moltke, only 2 are known to exist today. Wangemann's recordings of von Moltke are the only known recordings still audible of someone born in the 18th Century. Wangemann and his party arrived in Vienna on October 25, where Wangemann held more demonstrations and made more recordings, including that of Alfred Grünfeld and Johannes Brahms. His primary motivation for the trip, however, was the invitation from Franz-Josef I to show him the phonograph. Again, though, Wangemann had to wait days for the meeting, during which time, he gave interviews to journalists, 1 a day, very likely recording them in demonstrating their utility. The journalist granted the interview was to transcribe it and share it with other newspapers. Wangemann met with Franz-Josef I on 2 occasions, but did not record his voice. On December 2, 1889, the night before leaving Vienna, Wangemann recorded Brahms playing an abbreviated version of one of his compositions.

Wangemann returned to Berlin, at one point, borrowing money from Siemens & Halske. Edison, ordered him to return to the States not long after, having learned about the sums Wangemann had borrowed. Before leaving, Wangemann made some further recordings in Cologne, including one of Otto Neitzel, his only recording. Before Wangemann returned from Europe, Edison stopped the recording and experimentation at his laboratory. Wangemann work at the laboratory until June 1890, then, left for another exposition, after which he began working at the New York Phonograph Company, staying until 1893. He then stopped recording professionally, although he continued his own experiments at home, occasionally sharing them with Edison. Information about his work for the next several years is sketchy until he returned to Edison Laboratory, in 1902, eventually resuming his experiments in the room where he had previously worked, as photographs show.

Wangemann was killed in a train accident in Brooklyn, in early June 1906. Many of his recordings, in particular, the one of Bismarck, were considered lost for over 100 years. The wax cylinders were found in 1957, when Edison's home and laboratory were donated to the United States' National Park Service but they were unlabeled and remained unidentified until 2011, when 2 sound historians were able to deduce their identity. On January 30, 2012, the Thomas Edison National Historical Park announced that it had the original wax cylinder recordings of Bismarck, von Moltke, and others.

Wangemann married Anna L. Blake in Boston, on February 21, 1884. His uncle was Hermann Theodor Wangemann, who became director of the Berlin Missionary Society, in 1865. While visiting a relative in Altenkirchen, Ottilie Klaube (« née » Wangemann and called « Odo ») , Wangemann recorded a message, presumed to be to his brother. Julius and Ottilie Kaube also spoke on the recording, made on January 14, 1890.

He was a member of New York's Pleiades Club, where he played piano on certain occasions.

According to the Family Search International Genealogical Index which, in 1950, made a microfilm of parish documents held at the Lutheran church in Luisenstadt, a section of Berlin, an Adelbert Theodor Wangemann was born on February 13, 1855, and christened on April 13, 1855.

Theo Wangemann's 1889-1890 European Recordings

Theo Wangemann was the world's 1st professional sound recordist - the 1st person whose primary job was to coordinate musical recording sessions and to develop improved methods of capturing musical performances. Hired by Thomas Edison, in 1888, he oversaw the 1st methodical production of musical recordings for the wax cylinder phonograph at Edison's West Orange, New Jersey laboratory, in 1888-1889, and then played a prominent role in introducing the same invention to continental Europe. Until now, he has been best-known as the technician who recorded Johannes Brahms at the piano in Vienna, on December 2nd, 1889. This cylinder is of great historical interest, but it is badly damaged and does not do justice to Wangemann's legacy as an expert recordist.

In 2011, the National Park Service digitized a box of unique wax cylinder recordings made by Wangemann during his European trip of 1889-1890. The recordings include the voices of the eminent German historical figures Otto von Bismarck and Helmuth von Moltke, several performances by important musicians of the period, and even a home recording in which some of Wangemann's relatives send greetings to family members who had emigrated to America a decade earlier. The Moltke recordings have special interest as the only known examples we can listen to today of the voice of someone born in the 18th Century. Overall, these recordings give us a cross-section of the pioneering work of the 1st ever professional recording engineer.

The Recorded Sound Archive at Thomas Edison National Historical Park

The National Park Service preserves approximately 28,000 disc phonograph records, 11,000 cylinder phonograph records, and 9,800 disc metal molds at Thomas Edison National Historical Park. Over 100 recordings from the archive can be heard in MP3 format from the « Listen to Edison Sound Recordings » pages of the Thomas Edison National Historical Park website. A much larger number of recordings from the archive are available via the « Thomas Edison's Attic » radio program website. (« Thomas Edison's Attic » aired from May 2003 until October 2007 on WFMU, a non-profit radio station in Jersey City, New Jersey.)

Ever since his college days, Gustav Mahler has considered Vienna his home-town. His wish to return is finally fulfilled, in large part thanks to the support Johannes Brahms had provided, as he leaves Hamburg in May, at age 36, and becomes conductor and eventually Director and supreme tyrant of the Vienna Opera, beginning a decade of artistic achievement that will be remembered long afterward.

11 mai 1897 : Gustav Mahler makes his Vienna debut with Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » .

While looking for a permanent residence, Mahler rents a flat at « Universitätstraße Nr. 6 » , near his « alma mater » , the University of Vienna.

Mai 1897 : Needing to find new works to supplement the standard repertoire of the Opera, Gustav Mahler renews his friendship with Hugo Wolf after a 15 year hiatus, to discuss with him the possibility of producing his Opera, « Der Corregidor » .

29 mai 1897 : Erich Wolfgang Korngold is born in Brünn, the younger of the 2 sons of the eminent newspaper music-critic Julius.

The 21 year old Bruno Schlesinger secures a contract for the « Stadttheater » in Riga, to begin in 1898, but wants to leave Breslau immediately, so he obtains a post for the coming season as principal conductor in Preßburg (also known in Hungarian as Poszony ; now, Bratislava, Slovakia) .

Été 1897 : Bruno Schlesinger visits Mahler in Vienna, gets to know many of Mahler's friends, and feels that he belongs in Vienna, which he visits occasionally from Pressburg (only a short train ride away) .

Été 1897 : Contracting a bad sore throat, soon after arriving in Vienna, Mahler spends the summer convalescing and moving from one temporary residence to another, and does no composing.

Été 1897 : Hugo Wolf apparently exaggerates, in his mind, the definiteness of the Vienna premiere of his Opera, « Der Corregidor » .

Été 1897 : Arnold Schönberg, himself, gives the summer of 1897 as the date of composition of his String Quartet in D major (1st movement) - although apparently it must have originally been composed earlier and shown to Johannes Brahms. The 2nd movement is originally a Scherzo (composed from 27 July to 7 August) which will later be replaced, in accordance with Alexander von Zemlinsky's suggestion.

Été 1897 : Arnold Schönberg makes the piano-vocal score of Alexander von Zemlinsky's « Sarema » . Sometime during these years, Schönberg also becomes very well-acquainted with Richard Wagner's work, claiming later that, by the time he was 25 (1899) , he had seen each of Wagner's Operas 20 to 30 times, evidently mostly in performances that were conducted by Mahler.

Été 1897 : Alexander von Zemlinsky spends the summer composing his Symphony in B-flat major.

The 33 year old Richard Strauß composes « Don Quixote » , fantasy variations for cello and orchestra, Opus 35, which can be considered his 7th Symphonic poem.

11 août 1897 : Gustav Mahler rents an apartment on « Bartensteingasse » , a bit closer to the Opera House than his previous flat.

Thaddeus Cahill patents what is to become the « Telharmonium » or « Dynamophone » , which can be considered the 1st significant electronic musical instrument.

Samedi, 18 septembre 1897 : Anxious about the fact that a decision has not yet been made, Hugo Wolf goes to Gustav Mahler determined to get a date for the premiere of « Der Corregidor » , but the discussion becomes heated and Mahler criticizes Wolf's Opera harshly, then, leaves his office on a pretense.

Hugo Wolf suddenly believes that Mahler has been fired from his position at the Opera and that he, Wolf, is Mahler's replacement. Wolf rings the bell at Mahler's apartment and demands to be admitted as the Master of the house. He, then, goes to his friends and tells them the news of his appointment as Director. By Monday, he turns violent, and is put in a carriage and told that he will be taken to see Prince Liechtenstein to confirm his appointment as director. Instead, the carriage takes him to a mental asylum.

Gustav Mahler also contacts Alexander von Zemlinsky's music-publisher requesting a copy of « Sarema » . Zemlinsky, instead, proposes « Es war einmal » (Once upon a time) , the Opera on which he is currently working, based on Holger Drachmann's folk-tale comedy, « Der var engang » . Zemlinsky composes the Opera between August 1897 and June 1898.

Automne 1897 : Arnold Schœnberg shows his String Quartet in D major (1st movement) to Alexander von Zemlinsky. Subject to heavy revision after Zemlinsky's « critique » , Schœnberg composes the revisions of the 1st and 4th movements, and 2 entirely new movements, the 2nd (Intermezzo) and 3rd, in the fall. Sounding very much like Brahms (and, betraying Schœnberg's repertoire as a performer, even more like Antonín Dvořák) , but with some boldly abrupt modulations, the work will be successfully received at both its private and public premieres, the following year. It is Schœnberg's last « apprentice » work.

After finishing the Quartet, Arnold Schœnberg is inspired by the poetry of Richard Dehmel into writing songs which provoke his own more personal compositional tendencies (« Mädchenfrühling ») , with which he is now able to better integrate the techniques learned from Johannes Brahms.

Octobre 1897 : Alexander von Zemlinsky's 1st Opera, « Sarema » , is premiered in Munich. He also begins his 2nd Opera, « Es war einmal » (Once upon a time) .

The 62 year old Wilhelm Jahn, Director of the Vienna Court Opera, has failing eye-sight, and is ousted when the new season begins in the fall. Mahler is officially given his job on October 8th.

Fin 1897 : Gustav Mahler's friend Guido Adler, the musicologist, succeeds in getting a grant from a Bohemian art Society, to subsidize the publication of Mahler's 1st and 3rd Symphonies, which will be printed by Josef Eberle and published by « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » , during the next few years.

Décembre 1897 : Gustav Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » are published by « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » .

Weinberger is one of the founding members of the Vienna « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » , or AKM (Society of authors, composers and music-publishers) . Mahler becomes one of the original members.

With the following, all happening within the time-frame of a few months :

The deaths of Anton Bruckner and Johannes Brahms.

Gustav Mahler's appointment to the Vienna Opera.

The public emergence of Arnold Schönberg.

The founding of the « Secession » by their visual-artist compatriots.

The musical climate among many composers in Vienna quickly begins to shift toward a much more modern outlook, while the public's taste remains very largely conservative.

1898

Début 1898 : After a few months of treatment at the mental asylum, the doctors decide that Hugo Wolf is well enough to be released.

4 février 1898 : Le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige la version de Franz Schalk de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Ce 3e concert symphonique de la saison (débutant à 19h30) , donné à la « Kaim-Saal » , est une première en Allemagne.

1er mars 1898 : Le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige la version de Franz Schalk de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Le concert a lieu à 20 heures, à la « Großer Musikvereinssaal » . Une première viennoise.

Mars 1898 : In Prague, the 37 year old Gustav Mahler gives the 5th performance (the 1st successful one) of his 1st Symphony. Sylvain Dupuis conducts Mahler's 2nd Symphony, in Liège : the 1st performance of a complete Mahler Symphony without the composer's presence. It is so successful that a repeat is scheduled.

Mars 1898 : Arnold Schönberg's String Quartet in D major is premiered at a private « Tonkünstlerverein » concert, in Vienna. At this time, Schönberg also converts to Protestantism, being baptised as a Lutheran.

Printemps 1898 : Gustav Mahler completes what is intended to be the definitive revision of his youthful Cantata, « Das Klagende Lied » , with an eye toward its publication. Mahler is also offered, and seriously considers, a job as concert conductor and Director of the National Conservatory, in New York City (the job Antonín Dvořák had held from 1892 to 1895) .

The 26 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky gets on the Board of the « Wiener Tonkünstlerverein » (Viennese Tone-Artists Association) , and brings Arnold Schönberg in, as a member.

The « Gramophone Co. » , in England, is established in London by William Barry Owen and E. Trevor Lloyd Williams, to manufacture gramophones and records (discs) , in Europe.

In Hanover, Germany, the mass-production of phonograph disk records made of brittle shellac begins, and this will be the main material used for records until 1950.

Été 1898 : Gustav Mahler undergoes another operation to stop his more and more frequent hemorrhages, and spends the summer in pain at Vahrn, composing only the 3 « Wunderhorn Lieder » : « Lied des Verfolgten im Turm » (Song of the prisoner in the tower) , « Wo die schönen Trompeten blasen » (Where the proud trumpets blow) , and another unidentified one.

Été 1898 : Arnold Schönberg begins exploring ideas learned from the « New German School » , and works on a Symphonic poem called « Frühlings Tod » (The Death of Spring) , which he eventually abandons, and composes his 2 Songs, Opus 1. These pieces are more expansive than his previous ones, but Schönberg's style will change again with the works written in the next year, after powerful new poetic and personal stimuli (Richard Dehmel and Mathilde Zemlinsky, respectively) .

Été 1898 : Bruno Schlesinger spends the summer in Berlin.

Été 1898 : Gustav Mahler engages in secret negotiations with the committee which result in Hans Richter's resignation and in Mahler being offered the position in August.

Août 1898 : Bruno Schlesinger visits Gustav Mahler in Vienna, bringing along his piano-duet transcriptions of Mahler's 1st and 2nd Symphonies, then, at 22, becomes chief conductor at the Theater in Riga (Latvia) .

Hans Richter conducts Beethoven's « Eroica » Symphony at the last Vienna Philharmonic concert of the season, which will prove to be his last concert with that orchestra.

25 août 1898 : Gustav Mahler's sister, Emma, marries Eduard Rosé and they emigrate to America, where Eduard becomes cellist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Alexander von Zemlinsky finishes his 2nd opera, « Es war einmal » (Once upon a time) .

The 34 year old Richard Strauß composes his 8th and last Symphonic poem, « Ein Heldenleben » (A Hero's Life) .

The 17 year old Béla Bartók is accepted into the Vienna Conservatory, but he will only attend for 1 year.

24 octobre 1898 : Création berlinoise de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner par le chef Arthur Nikisch dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

6 novembre 1898 : Gustav Mahler opens the new season of the Vienna Philharmonic with (also) Beethoven's « Eroica » Symphony, in the version with his own instrumental retouchings, obviously showing the Orchestra and the public that there will be a new way of doing things.

The 48 year old Richard Heuberger hires Alexander von Zemlinsky and Arnold Schönberg to score his Operetta, « Der Opernball » , which is a big hit after its premiere in Munich.

10 novembre 1898 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schumann, transmise à l'occasion du mariage du chef Ferdinand Löwe, à Vienne, avec Amalie Zehetbauer.

Octobre 1898 : With the desire for the premiere of « Der Corregidor » still bothering his troubled mind, Hugo Wolf attempts to drown himself but lives, then, commits himself to the mental institution again, where he will live-out his remaining 6 years.

Décembre 1898 : The 24 year old Arnold Schönberg's String Quartet in D major is given its public premiere in Vienna, and is well-received. In his review of the concert, Eduard Hanslick remarks :

« There is a new Mozart growing-up in Vienna.

1898-1909

« Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft »

La « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » est une société d'édition de disques de musique Classique. Fondé en 1898, « Deutsche Gramophon » est, dans le monde, le plus ancien éditeur de musique enregistrée encore en activité.

La société « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » est créée le 6 décembre 1898 à Hanovre par Émile Berliner (l'inventeur du gramophone) et son frère Joseph. Dès le début du XXe siècle, la société produit plusieurs millions de disques chaque année. Parmi les artistes qui font alors le succès de la société, on peut citer Enrico Caruso, Feodor Chaliapine, Nellie Melba.

En 1941, la « Deutsche Grammophon » est rachetée par le groupe d'électronique « Siemens & Halske » et devient un « outil de propagande nazie » . Herbert von Karajan signe avec la maison de disques à cette époque avant de s'en éloigner après 1945 puis d'y revenir en 1959, date à partir de laquelle il enregistre près de 350 disques jusqu'à sa mort, devenant l'élément central de la marque et la base de son succès commercial. En 1962, « Siemens » et le groupe néerlandais « Philips » s'associent et regroupent toutes leurs activités musicales dans le groupe « DGG/PPI » qui donnera naissance à « PolyGram » , en 1971. « Philips » devient l'actionnaire majoritaire du groupe « PolyGram » suite au désengagement de Siemens, en 1987.

L'histoire de la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » remonte à la naissance de l'enregistrement. En juin 1898, la firme est fondée à Hanovre en même temps que la Ire fabrique de disques et de gramophones. Les directeurs en sont Emile Berliner (l'inventeur américain, originaire de Hanovre, à la fois du disque et du lecteur) et son frère Joseph. Leur usine utilise des presses hydrauliques de fabrication américaine pour produire des disques en gomme-laque destinés à la « Gramophone Company » , fondée un peu plus tôt cette même année à Londres par l'associé d'Emile, William Barry Owen, les enregistrements étant supervisés par l'associé américain d'Emile, Fred Gaisberg.

Dès 1900, lorsque la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » devient une Société par actions ayant son siège à Berlin, le disque de Berliner a éclipsé le cylindre de Thomas Edison et s'est imposé comme la norme de l'industrie, tandis que Gaisberg s'occupe d'assurer la respectabilité du nouveau support en engageant des artistes célèbres.

Enrico Caruso fait son 1er enregistrement pour la « Gramophone Company » à Milan, en 1902. Mattia Battistini, Emma Calvé, Alessandro Moreschi (le dernier castrat) , Antonio Scotti, Leo Slezak, Francesco Tamagno (le 1er « Otello » de Giuseppe Verdi) , Geraldine Farrar, Mary Garden et Elena Gerhardt sont parmi ceux qui suivent son exemple.

La basse russe Feodor Chaliapine devient le 1er chanteur dont la réputation est vraiment née du gramophone. En 1904, la firme réussit enfin à persuader la grande Nellie Melba d'enregistrer pour elle, et, l'an plus tard, Gaisberg vient avec son équipe technique et son matériel au château gallois d'Adelina Patti - la plus grande star lyrique au monde après Melba.

Consécration ultime : la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » est bientôt nommé fournisseur des maisons royales de Grande-Bretagne et d'Espagne. Dès 1907, l'usine de Hanovre fait fonctionner quelque 200 presses à disques et produit, cette année-là, les 1ers disques à double-face.

The « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » was founded, in 1898, by German-born american citizen Emile Berliner as the German branch of his « Berliner Gramophone Company » . Berliner sent his nephew Joseph Sanders from America to set-up operations. Based in the city of Hannover (the founder's birthplace) , the company had links with the United States « Victor Talking Machine Company » and the « British Gramophone Company » , but those links were severed at the onset of World War I.

In 1941, « Deutsche Grammophon » was purchased by the Siemens & Halske electronics company.

In 1949, « Deutsche Grammophon » sold the German rights of the « His Master's Voice » trademark to the « Electrola Records » unit of « EMI ». The dog and gramophone were replaced by the crown of tulips, designed by Siemens advertising consultant Hans Domizlaff.

In 1962, Siemens formed a joint venture with Netherlands-based « Philips » to create the DGG/PPI Record Group, which became « PolyGram Records », in 1972. By this time, « DGG » had built a solid reputation for high-quality recording in the Classical field as well as a very notable roster of contracted singers, musicians, and conductors. Through its subsidiary label « Archiv Produktion », it also stimulated interest in Western Medieval and Renaissance music, 15th and 16th Century choral polyphony, Gregorian chant, and pioneering use of historical instruments and performance practices in recordings.

« Deutsche Grammophon » pioneered the introduction of the compact disc to the mass market, debuting Classical music performed by Herbert von Karajan and the Berlin Philharmonic for sale in the new medium, in 1983, the 1st recording being Richard Strauß's « Eine Alpensinfonie » .

DGG/Polydor's entrance into the U.S. Market, in 1969 (« DGG » had distribution deals in the United States with « Decca Records » and « MGM Records » beforehand) came at a time when the big U.S. Classical labels « Columbia » (« Masterworks ») and « RCA » (« Red Seal » and « Victor ») were dropping their unprofitable Classical artists and making poor-quality pressings. The fine quality, both of recording and of pressings, helped « DGG » especially succeed and attract Arthur Fiedler and the Boston Pops Orchestra to DGG/Polydor. In 1987, Siemens sold-off its interest in « PolyGram », and « Philips » became the majority share-holder. In 1998, the Seagram Company Ltd. of Canada purchased « Deutsche Grammophon » and « PolyGram ». Since then, « Deutsche Grammophon » was merged into Universal Music Group, a division of Vivendi.

« Deutsche Grammophon » has a huge back-catalogue of notable recordings. The company is re-issuing a portion of it in its « Originals » series ; compact disc releases are noted for their vinyl record stylized design. It is also releasing some of American « Decca Records » ' albums from the 1940's and 1950's, such as those that Leonard Bernstein made for « Decca », in 1953. Along with the American « Decca Records » Classical music catalogue, « Deutsche Grammophon » also manages the Classical music catalogue of « ABC Records », including « Westminster Records » which, along with American « Decca », were part of MCA Records.

Although « Deutsche Grammophon » acquired the reputation of releasing mainstream Classical recordings, from the 1960's onwards, it released an increasing number of avant-garde recordings (initially, under the « avant-garde » imprint) , including Bruno Maderna, David Bedford, Cornelius Cardew, Luigi Nono. It also released the majority of the compositions of Karlheinz Stockhausen until the composer bought the rights to the recordings, and re-released them on his own label. Other German composers associated with the label included Paul Hindemith and Hans Werner Henze.

1870 : Emile Berliner, born on May 20, 1851, immigrates to the United States together with a friend of the family, Nathan Gotthelf. On arrival, he takes an interest in the newly developed telephone technology, creating an improved microphone for this device. The fact that Alexander Graham Bell acquires the patent for it, for the sum of $ 50,000, renders Berliner financially independent for the foreseeable future and enables him to open a laboratory. When he returns to Germany, for a short period, together with his brother Joseph, they found the « Joseph Berliner Telephone Co. » , the 1st such plant in Europe, at that time.

1887 : After his return to the United States, on September 26, Berliner applies for a patent on his fully operational « gramophone » recording system, based on a method of etching a lateral cut into a zinc disc. He is granted American Patent No. 15232, on November 8, 1887. Prior to this, there had been only 1 other vertical cut-type of record, submitted for patenting, on April 24, 1878, by Thomas A. Edison, and granted, as soon as August 6 of the same year (British Patent No. 1644) , but Edison's simultaneous application for an American patent was rejected, on the grounds of « British Priority » . Although the drafts supporting his application anticipate the « gramophone » , Edison could not provide an operational specimen.

The original Emile Berliner gramophone goes into serial production, in 1889, equipped with a horn made of « papier mâché » .

1893 : Emile Berliner founds the « United States Gramophone Company » . Fred Gaisberg, who is his 1st record producer, quickly wins world-fame.

1895 : On October 8, Emile Berliner founds the « Berliner Gramophone Company » , in Philadelphia. This time, he invites share-holders to provide an increase in share capital. To further enlarge the contract basis, this company merges with the « Victor Talking Machine Co. » , under Frank Seaman, in 1904. It is acquired, in 1929, by « RCA » , creating the label « RCA Victor » .

1896 : Emile Berliner transfers all United States rights of sale for 15 years to the « National Gramophone Company » , founded by Seaman, but based on the 1st fully operational spring-drive by Eldridge R. Johnson. Seaman's company also takes the job of producing and delivering all exports, but it soon meets considerable displeasure in the countries involved, on account of its exclusively American repertoire.

1897 : In consequence, Berliner commissions 2 United Kingdom partners, William Barry Owen and Trevor Williams, to create an international repertoire by founding the « U.K. Gramophone Company » , initially meant to be no more than an artist and repertoire centre.

In New York and Philadelphia, recording studios are established.

Hard-rubber is replaced by shellac, for pressing records.

1898 : Berliner's recording specialists, Fred Gaisberg and Joe Sanders, establish their 1st recording studio in Europe, in rooms of the Cockburn Hotel, in London, on Henrietta Street :

A lady pianist (seated on a pedestal, to be at the same height as the horn) in the 1st Emile Berliner studio in London, Cockburn Hotel, back entrance on Maiden Lane.

Berliner's U.S. production partner, Frank Seaman, is suspicious about of all this activity and stops delivering to Berliner's distribution network. Berliner calls-up an ad-hoc meeting with his closest associates, resulting in the decision to establish an improvised record production plant in the Hannover-based telephone factory of Berliner's brothers, Joseph and Jacob. J. Sanders is sent to Hannover to give a hand. The manœuvre succeeds and invalidates Seaman's attempts at an embargo. Contrary to all expectations, the initially make-shift production in Hannover flourishes, which induces Berliner to found the « Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » , through his brothers Joseph and Jacob (on December 6) . It includes a modest amount of record player construction, based on components from the United States. By the outbreak of World War I, Berliner's recording business has already turned into an international market leader.

1900 : In view of a patenting dispute in the United States, Berliner transfers his company headquarters to Canada and founds the « Gram-O-Phone Co. » , in the Saint-Henri suburb of Montreal. The « dog tag » is given the logo « His Master's Voice » .

27 June 1900 : « Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » is transformed into a corporation, founded by « Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » , « Orpheus Musikwerke GmbH, Leipzig » , and « U.K. Gramophone Company, London » , which soon acquires all shares.

Because of the change of name in London, the production plant in Hannover is temporarily renamed « Gramophone & Typewriter GmbH » (until 1908) .

The head-quarters of « Deutsche Grammophon AG » and the record player production are transferred on « Markgrafenstraße 76 » , in the centre of Berlin, including a recording studio with a workshop. Theodore B. Birnbaum, one of the founders of « Berliner Gramophone Co. » , in Philadelphia, is made managing director. Further subsidiaries are established in Russia and Austria.

Technically, etching in zinc is replaced by wax cutting :

For the production of the original, Berliner had, so far, used a zinc disc covered by a thin layer of hard fat. During the recording process, the pin connected with the membrane of the sound-box cuts through this layer, down to the metal surface, so that the waveform embossed into the fat layer precisely represents the musical undulations. The zinc disc, « inscribed » in this way, is submerged in an acidic solution which « bites » a deep, channel-shaped groove into the metal. The copper tools, father, mother and matrix, are made from this original by using well-known galvano-plastic procedures. But the resulting groove surfaces are not smooth enough, which causes considerable noise when the record is played. That is why this method is soon abandoned, in favor of the generally accepted one of cutting a V-shaped smooth groove into a massive, circular wax disc, by using a polished cutting stylus.

1901 : Extension of the disc format from 17 to 25 centimeters ; introduction of paper labels.

By this time, Berliner's Canadian « Gram-O-phone » has already sold 2 million records, established a « Nipper » decorated shop on Sainte-Catherine street, in downtown Montreal, and opened-up a lavishly equipped recording studio as well. This offers many jazz musicians the opportunity of undisturbed (and highly-successful) recording sessions due to the hate campaign launched in the United States by car manufacturer Henry Ford against jazz as « Jewish machinations » (see article by Lothar Baier in the German newspaper « Die Zeit ») .

An advert by « Deutsche Grammophon » promises :

« We offer you 5,000 records in all languages of the world ! » , thanks to Fred Gaisberg, the author of : « Strongest, most natural sound ! Hard discs, no soft cylinders ! » .

1902 : The 1st 6 records are made with the young tenor Enrico Caruso for a fee of just £ 100 (£ 1 equals 20 « Reichsmarks » : a wage of 10 days of work) .

Letter by the tenor Enrico Caruso (the record industry's 1st « star ») to « Deutsche Grammophon AG, Berlin » :

« I have just finished listening to the samples of my most recent American recordings, and I want to congratulate you sincerely. The utmost perfection of your reproduction of my new records proves the excellence of your recording system. »

This great success is followed by the 1st licensing agreement with contemporary star tenor Francesco Tamagno. Interest : 10 % of the retail price, which is £ 1 for each record.

For the 1st time, the diameter of the record measures 30 centimeters ; the playing time is around 5 minutes.

1901-1902 : The company pays a dividend of 25 % .

Owing to the dearth of space in the plant on « Kniestraße » , in Hannover, the company leases a site on « Podbielskistraße » . Before this, the plant had resided on « Celler Straße » , « Groß-Buchholz » , « Separatorenfabrik Franz Daseking » .

1903 : The « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » buys out its recent competitor « International Zonophon Company, Berlin » , and divides its supply policy into the upper-price bracket (« Deutsche Grammophon » Classics with emblem of « the writing angel ») and the lower-price bracket (« Zonophon » , light and folk music, distribution by wholesale) .

1904 : Birnbaum moves to London as director general of all European gramophone companies. His successor in Berlin is Norbert Mortime Rodkinson from the Saint-Petersburg subsidiary.

The 1st double-sided records appear.

The retail trade of records is gradually transferred from toy and bicycle shops to those selling music instruments, then, the specialist trade.

1906 : 200 presses are at work in Hanover with a daily output of 36,000 records.

1907 : The « Gramophone Co. » acquires a site with railway access in Hayes, near London, where a new, extensive plant is being built, because world-wide demand had turned the idea of producing records, in Hanover alone, obsolete.

February 1907 : The 1st cut of the spade for the head-office, the plant and the studios is made by tenor Edward Lloyd ; the laying of the foundation stone is executed by singer Nellie Melba.

Rodkinson leaves Berlin for India. After him, « Deutsche Grammophon AG » is directed by Leo B. Cohn. When he marries singer Elisabeth von Endert, he changes his family name to « Curt » .

The newest fad, at this time, are concerts via gramophone performed in large halls. To enhance the sound volume, « Deutsche Grammophon » technicians develop an « Auxetophon » , based on pneumatic amplification, but the amount of background noise it creates renders it ephemeral soon.

The 1st machines without horns appear, integrating the sound guiding devices into the cabinet.

1908 : The output before World War I is 6.2 million records a year.

The plant site on « Podbielskistraße » is now made the property of the company ; no longer just a lease. The company is given back its original name.

At this time, the workshop producing record players in Berlin employs more than 100 people, but drive mechanisms and sound boxes are still imported from the United States.

1909 : The emblem of « the writing angel » is replaced by « His Master's Voice » .

To provide business models for the retail trade, the « Grammophon Spezialhaus GmbH » is founded, opening subsidiaries in Berlin, Breslau, Düsseldorf, Köln, Königsberg, Kiel and Nürnberg.

1913 : Beethoven's 5th Symphony, played by a full Orchestra, the Berlin Philharmonic under Arthur Nikisch, is recorded for « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » on 4 double-sided records - a total novelty !

12 September 1913 : (Image) The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Doctor A. Hertz, on in the « studio » (the small factory building) of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , in Berlin, offering the same conditions as Nikisch had.

1914 : When World War I begins, German assets are confiscated in Great Britain. In retaliation, British property is sequestered in Germany and offered for sale, among others the DG AG as subsidiary of a British company.

24 April 1917 : « Polyphon Musikwerke » , founded in Leipzig-Wahren, on May 24, 1895, acquires « Deutsche Grammophon AG » . « Polyphon Musikwerke, Leipzig » had produced only musical boxes and « Orchestrions » before this.

1918 : Both companies trade under the name « Polyphon AG » and establish their head-offices in « Markgrafenstraße 76, Berlin » , enlarging the recording capacity to 3 rooms. Bruno Borchard is made director general, Hugo Wünsch former authorized signatory at « Polyphon Musikwerke, Leipzig » , since 1908, becomes head of the new subsidiary « Deutsche Grammophon AG » . Joseph Berliner remains a member of the boards until his retirement, in 1921. Leo B. Curt, executive director of « Deutsche Grammophon AG » , until 1918, takes the wheel at « Grammophon Spezialhaus GmbH » .

1919 : The Austrian subsidiary « Polyphon-Sprechmaschinen und Schallplatten GmbH » is founded in Vienna.

« Nordisk Polyphon A. S. » is founded in Kopenhagen ; in Stockholm, the Swedish subsidiary is called « Nordisk Polyphon A. B. » .

As large portions of the world-famous pre-War repertoire cannot be used on account of the divided rights of ownership between the previous British mother company and her German subsidiaries, a new repertoire has to be established, as quickly as possible. Karl Holy, director at the Berlin State Opera House, and Hans B. Haße, conductor and head of the recording department of the newly installed companies, work together with technician Walter Buhre and employees Blesche, Goile, Lehmann, König, Erich at creating a new, attractive catalog in a very short time.

Nevertheless, it persists until the end of World War II. They are ably supported by Maria Ivogün, Emmi Leisner, Heinrich Schlusnus, Tino Pattiera, Wilhelm Kempff, Wilhelm Backhaus, Raoul von Koczalski, Carl Flesch, Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, Leo Blech, Herman Abendroth, and others.

Recording sessions mostly take place in the music academy in « Berlin-Zoo » ; in the Bach Hall, on « Urbanstraße » ; in the « Liedertafel » , on « Alte Jakobstraße » ; in the Beethoven Hall and in the Cinema Hall, both on « Lützowstraße » . These rooms are damped as effectively as possible by carpets and curtains. Until 1946, all insiders in this line of business are convinced that acoustically authentic records must contain no other sounds but those made by the instruments or the voices of the singers (direct sound) . But, then, Keilholz manages to change this habit by introducing the lively acoustic atmosphere he had learnt to create during his years at the « Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft » by using modern broadband technology.

Robert Blanke is made head of the Hanover plant, in his capacity of authorized signatory.

1922 : 2 years prior to the introduction of the electro-acoustic recording and reproduction technologies, engineers of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » create wax records by using an experimentally developed electro-magnetic cutter head. Its source of modulation is not known. Perhaps, they used test tone signals, generated by an electro-mechanical device, or even experimental recording methods, relying on one of the 1st carbon mikes extracted from telephones.

Another detail from this period throws a bright light on the sheer unbelievable opportunities provided by our modern means of communication, although the names of the contemporary travellers are forgotten.

1924 : Emile Berliner sells his « Gram-O-phone Co. » , including the « Nipper » trademark, to the « Victor Talking Machine Co. » .

1925 : « Deutsche Grammophon » engineer Walter Buhre writes a lab report on the successful design of an electro-magnetic cutter capable of recording 100 to 4500 Hz.

The acousto-mechanical recording and reproduction system is gradually replaced by the electro-acoustico-magnetic system, in all broadcasting and recording studios world-wide.

The « Gramophone Co. » founds « Electrola GmbH » , in Nowawes, near Berlin, to replace its sequestered subsidiary , « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » . The new company's name refers to the world-wide technological change, occurring in that year. At the beginning, the recordings are imported by « HMV » , but record players and music chests are produced locally. « Electrola » integrates the record production of « Carl Lindström AG, Berlin » . Soon after the companies merge, « Lindström » is dissolved. In 1953, « Electrola » transfers its head-office to Cologne, trading under the name « EMI Electrola GmbH » from 1972 ; nowadays known as « EMI Music Germany GmbH & Co. KG » .

1926 : At « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , Doctor Waldemar Hagemann replaces graphiting of wax discs by electro-chemical silvering to render their surfaces conductive to galvanization.

In Berlin, Walter Buhre employs Walter Schindler as precision engineer, then, as head of the workshop.

1927 : The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler playing Beethoven's 5th Symphony is recorded for the 1st time.

A contract on matrix exchange is concluded between « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » and the « Brunswick-Balke-Collander Co. » , in Chicago, not only giving access to the most attractive jazz repertoire of the period, but also enabling the company to import electric record players from the United States.

1928 : Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » , played by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under the baton of Bruno Kittel, is recorded in its entirety on 11 30 centimeters diameter discs. At Christmas, 1 million copies of a 30 centimeters' disc of the « Archangel Gabriel proclaiming the birth of Christ to the shepherds » are sold - an unheard-of success !

In Tokyo, « Nippon Polydor Chikounki K. K. » is founded.

9 January 1929 : Recording expedition to Persia.

3 August 1929 : Emile Berliner dies in Washington, D.C.

« Victor Talking Machine Co. » sells all rights and labels, acquired from Emile Berliner, to « RCA » .

Headed by Herbert Borchardt and Erna Elchlepp, the « Société Phonographique Française Polydor S. A. » is founded.

At this time, the daily output of records in Hannover climbs to 83,000 copies from among a total production of 10 million discs.

« Deutsche Grammophon AG » takes an interest in « Klang-Film GmbH » , expecting future benefits for their recording business but, due to a negative prognosis, they already give-up their shares in 1932.

During the 1920's, the Board of Directors at « Deutsche Grammophon AG » consists of Doctor Gustav Stresemann ; former Imperial Chancellor Fehrenbach ; former Imperial Minister of Trade and Commerce Doctor von Raumer ; Cyrus Thomas Pott (« Union Corporation, London ») ; Gerrit Kreyenbroek (« Teixeira, Amsterdam ») ; Doctor Curt Sobernheim (« Kommerz & Privatbank AG ») ; Hans Arnhold (« Gebrüder Arnhold, Dresden/Berlin ») ; and Martin Schiff.

1930 : Due to the World Economic Crisis, which had already made itself felt in 1929, the company's extensive foreign activities are concentrated, in March, in a Swiss holding, the « Polyphon-Holding AG » . In 1932, this holding is renamed « Polydor Holding AG » .

1931 : The « Gramophone Co. » and « Columbia Gramophone Co. » merge to become « EMI » (« Electrical and Musical Industries ») . « Columbia Gramophone Co. » and « Carl Lindström » 's close connections in Germany are a 1st step towards the subsequent merger between « Electrola » and « Lindström » .

A common sound studio for « EMI » is established in Abbey Road, London, later gaining world-fame by « HMV » Classical music recordings. Top-flight specialists work in the newly-built laboratories and workshops to guarantee the quality of « EMI » products world-wide.

14 December 1931 : A. D. Blumlein, from « EMI » Research Labs, applies for a patent on his fundamental stereo recording system, which is granted on June 14, 1933, under the number BP 394325. The 45° / 45° cutting it suggests, later becomes LP stereo record standard.

1932 : On account of the catastrophic stagnation of the business in their plant, « Polyphon Werke AG, Leipzig » merges with « Deutsche Grammophon AG » , soon to be followed by the total shutdown of the production in Leipzig.

1933 : « Deutsche Grammophon AG » parts company with « Polydor Holding, Basel » , selling-off all their shares in it.

Under pressure from international copyright companies and technical innovations, such as broadcasting, technical set-ups for large events, the sound film, later also tape recorders, the record companies form a protective association, the « International Federation of the Phonographic Industry » (IFPI) , which soon gains considerable influence. Doctor Walter Betcke, manager at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , is its president, from 1961 to 1964 (at a much later stage) .

1934 : Due to the depression, the prestigious premises in Berlin, on « Markgrafenstraße » , are abandoned, in favor of modest offices on « Jerusalemer Straße 65-66 » .

1936 : Doctor Emil Duhme and A. Schaaf, from « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , provide the 1st systematic classification and quantitative analysis of record noises.

1937 : « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » 's principal share-holders emigrate to escape growing racial defamation, trying to sell their shares. An interim board of directors manages to bring about a capital merger as a 1st step towards recovery and enables a consortium of « Deutsche Bank » and « Telefunken Gesellschaft für drahtlose Telegraphie mbH » to start a re-development programme by liquidating « Deutsche Grammophon AG » and by founding « Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » . « Telefunken » is interested in this new company because their own « Telefunken Platte GmbH » , founded in 1932, has no production plant. This cooperation prepares the subsequent re-emergence of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft mbH » , too, especially by adding to it the total production of « Telefunken Platte » , in Hannover. This means that the ultra-modern « Telefunken » recording technology is there to be shared, insofar as it is not curtailed by temporary deficits.

1938 : Measures to rebuild Berlin (by Nazi architect Albert Speer, among others) induce « Deutsche Grammophon AG » to abandon its studios on « Lützowstraße » , and to move to the former « Zentraltheater » on the « Alte Jakobstraße » . Much better acoustic and technical conditions, than in their previous location, make-up for this change, initially seen as a form of humiliation. This is where a new high-class repertoire is recorded with works played by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the State Opera Orchestra.

The number of conductors already under contract (Paul van Kempen, Carl Schuricht, Richard Strauß) is joined by the young Herbert von Karajan, who produces his 1st recordings ever in the new studio. Soloists performing there are Wilhelm Kempff, Elly Ney, Alfred Sittard, Georg Kulenkampff, Erna Berger, Tiana Lemnitz, Viorica Ursuleac, Walther Ludwig, Julius Patzak, Helge Roswaenge, Heinrich Schlusnus, Franz Völker, and others.

These top-flight productions are traded under the label « Grammophon Meisterklatze » .

« Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » 's head-quarters are soon transferred to larger rooms on the « Ringbahnstraße 63 » , in « Berlin-Tempelhof » .

(Image) Herbert von Karajan at a recording session in the studio on « Alte Jakobstraße » , in Berlin (1938) .

1941 : A major contract between « Siemens » and « AEG » assigns all « Telefunken » shares to « AEG » , and all « Deutsche Grammophon » shares to « Siemens » , thereby, turning « Siemens » into the sole proprietor of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , a move which proves to introduce one of the most successful periods in company history. Doctor Ernst von Siemens and board-director Doctor Adolf Lohse subsequently take an avid interest in everything that happens at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » .

The unabbreviated « Saint-Matthew Passion » by Johann Sebastian Bach appears on 18 30 centimeters' discs, right in the middle of the War ; their matrices carried to Japan by a blockade-runner submarine. Until the end of the War, 17,000 copies are sold in Japan.

1942 : At « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , Doctor Emil Duhme, from « Siemens » , introduces vacuum-silvering to replace electro-silvering. Following the recommendation of Hans Domizlaff, « Siemens » ' advisor on matters of style and labels, all records produced in this way are given new imprints.

1943 : Classical music gets pale blue labels, called « Siemens Spezial » ; experimental record, using the new silvering process of the electro-acoustic research lab.

Light music is given a red label, called « Siemens Polydor » ; produced by electro-acoustic methods meant to provide a high-degree of purity of sound and an extended frequency response.

Several top-flight productions, such as : Beethoven's 7th Symphony with the State Opera Orchestra, Berlin, conducted by Herbert von Karajan ; and « Don Quixote » by and under Richard Strauß, with the Bavarian State Orchestra, are produced in this manner.

1 January 1944 : « Siemens » sends qualified engineer Helmut Härtel to « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » to become their deputy manager.

1944 : The Berlin studio and large sections of the Hannover plant fall victim to bombing during the last years of the War. Helmut Härtel and Robert Blanke organize the work of rebuilding them, so that a make-shift production can soon be resumed by using a number of presses that had remained intact, somehow.

1945 : The British Occupying Council authorizes « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » to employ 50 extra staff for cleaning-up operation. 1st stop-gap earnings are made by direct sale to members of the occupation army. Together with engineer Thieme (« Siemens, Hannover ») , P. K. Burkowitz, newly assigned to the electro-acoustic lab, on August 16, 1945, for a wage of 50 « Reichsmarks » per month (a mere pocket money) , starts building a make-shift mixing desk to enable the company to record music again. The desk, resembling V35 of « Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft » (RGG) , is finished early, in 1946, relying on available components, like shielded cables, which have to be extricated at night, from deserted « Flak » shelters.

May 1946 : G. Schöttler and A. Schaaf, from « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , introduce their version of extended play : modulation-controlled groove distance (patented on December 28, 1948) .

Heinrich Keilholz contributes his fundamental recording experience, gained during his years at « Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft » , by working as head of the recording department at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » . He will carry-on doing so until 1966. Using the new make-shift mixing desk (3 channel controls, 1 output control, level indicator with 10 ms attack time on a 40 dB scale) and 2 miraculously preserved Neumann « bottles » (a pressure gradient capsule and an M7) , he makes his 1st recordings at the Beethoven Hall, in Hannover ; and he is quite happy with the result.

When the ban on travelling is lifted, Burkowitz returns to his home-town Berlin, on August 31, to work for « RIAS » (« Rundfunk im amerikanischen Sektor ») , as sound engineer. His main contacts there are :

Albert Pösniiker (technical director) ; Otto Scheffler and Jörg Hinkel (technical development and construction) ; Professor Elsa Schiller (head of the Classical department) ; Fried Walter and Hans Carste (heads of the light-music department) ; Werner Müller (conductor of the dance music orchestra) ; Heinz Opitz, Fritz Ribbentrop, Alfred Schmidt, Helmut Hertlein and Helmut Krüger (sound engineers) .

At « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , Biers and A. Schaaf start using pressing materials without any filling or grinding additives.

From this time onwards, « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » produces all its recordings by using magnetic tape (the 1st post-War models from « AEG ») .

1948 : The logo « His Master's Voice » , no longer serviceable in international business, is sold to the previous owner, « The Gramophone Co. » and its German subsidiary « Electrola » .

Musicologist Doctor Fred Hamel starts building his « Archiv Produktion » , which will soon gain world-wide attention and fame.

In the United States, rival « Columbia » introduces its 1st 30 centimeters $33\frac{1}{3}$ rpm long-play records, in vinyl. This leads to a format competition with « RCA » , pinning its hopes on a 17 centimeters, 45 rpm model.

1949 : The combination of the company logo « Siemens » and the record labels, recognized as unsuitable, is abandoned. Following Domizlaff's suggestion, 2 new labels are introduced : the « yellow label » « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , for Classical music, and the red label « Polydor » for light-music.

1950 : Doctor Hans-Werner Steinhausen from « Telefunken-Platte GmbH » becomes managing director of the technical department of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » .

The production of light-music is transferred from Hannover to Hamburg, where it resides on the premises of « Studio Hamburg GmbH » , with Alfred Schmidt as head of the light-music recording activities.

« Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » makes its 1st stereo tape recordings for comparative tests, also testing their usefulness on records.

1951 : In the meantime, the company has managed to gain the cooperation of the following artists :

Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Christel Goltz, Josef Greindl, Elisabeth Höngen, Annelies Kupper, Fritz Lehmann, Wilma Lipp, Max Lorenz, Enrico Meinardi, Wolfgang Schneiderhan, Irmgard Seefried, Carl Seemann, Elfriede Trötschel, Hermann Uhde, Wolfgang Windgassen, Wilhelm Kempff, Leopold Ludwig, and Walther Ludwig.

The new synthetic LP with 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ rpm is now marketable in Germany, too.

12 new « yellow label » releases create quite a stir at the « Funkausstellung » , on account of their superlative quality and the placement of items like :

Felix Mendelssohn's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Ferenc Fricsay.

Brahms' 2nd Symphony with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Eugen Jochum.

Mozart's « Eine kleine Nachtmusik » with the Chamber Orchestra of the Bavarian Broadcast conducted by Eugen Jochum.

Brahms' « Variations on a Theme by Haydn » , Opus 56, with the « Württembergisches Staatsorchester Stuttgart » conducted by Ferdinand Leitner - on just 1 side of an LP !

1952 : Professor Elsa Schiller, former head of the music department at « RIAS, Berlin » , is made product manager for Classical music at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » .

The 1st complete Opera recorded on LP is Albert Lortzing's « Zar und Zimmermann » ; prelude to a long line of such recordings with the « yellow » label.

Kurt Richter is made head of the light-music department.

Heinrich Keilholz, head of the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » recording department, provides new decorative acoustic elements for the Vienna State Opera, which are highly-effective.

1953 : Doctor Ernst von Siemens is made head of the supervisory board at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » .

Doctor Ladislaus Veder (« Polydor » Light-Music Production) is made executive director ; P. K. Burkowitz (« RIAS » , Berlin) is made head of the recording department of « Electrola »

In the same year, « Carl Lindström » , in Cologne, merge to « Electrola GmbH » .

The 17 centimeters' 45 rpm is now introduced throughout the music industry.

1954 : « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » establishes a subsidiary in London : « Polydor U.K. , Ltd. » ; W. Riemer is made its managing director, formerly export division Hannover.

For the 1st time, « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » records a complete work of literature : Gøethe's « Faust » , on LP.

84 % of all deliveries are still 78 rpm shellac discs.

The plant in Hannover is enlarged by 1,000 square meters.

1956 : The head-quarters and the managing board of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » are transferred from Hannover to Hamburg.

After the successful introduction of portable modular stereo mixing desks for « Electrola, Cologne » , P. K. Burkowitz designs REDD-17 and REDD-37 for « EMI » .

Using one of the Cologne installations, P. K. Burkowitz makes the 1st stereo records for « Capitol Classics » , in the Grunewald Church, Berlin, published in 1957 :

Igor Stravinsky's « The Firebird » and « Petrouchka » with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Leopold Stokowski ; phase-proof I microphone technique with SM2 in cross figure-of-8 set-up, still used as teaching material.

1957 : The construction works for a new record manufacturing plant are started in Langenhagen, near Hannover.

After great success of Goethe's « Faust I » (Düsseldorf, Gründgens) , the « Literary Archive » (on the « green label ») is founded. Doctor Adolf Lohse, member of the Board of Directors, will take care for this label in the future.

1958 : « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » releases its 1st stereo LP record, although already at the industry's disposal for more than 1 year now. Due to the progressive pick-up technology, stereo LPs can be submitted to public use earlier than imagined because they are « mono compatible » (meaning they can also be played on mono sets) .

The production of shellac discs is abandoned. The vinyl formats (33 $\frac{1}{3}$ rpm LPs ; and 45 rpm singles) are firmly established by this time.

1959 : Herbert von Karajan is once more taken under a long-term contract by « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » .

The moulding record production starts in Langenhagen, next to the site of the future Emile Berliner Studios. At 1st, the daily output is 40,000 discs ; soon to surpass 120,000 ones.

1960 : The size of the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » catalogues, containing more than 5,000 titles by renowned artists, achieves a new top position in the music industry world-wide.

(Image) « Deutsche Grammophon » control-room on « Podbielskistraße » , Hannover (around 1960) .

1961 : Doctor Walter Betcke, managing director at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , is elected president of the « International Federation of the Phonographic Industry » for 1 term of tenure.

Horst Söding, head of the development department at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , introduces the 1st experimental video disc (for internal use only) .

1962 : « Siemens AG, München » , and « Philips Gloeilampen Fabrieken N.V. , Eindhoven/Netherlands » , decide to merge their subsidiaries « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » and « Philips Phonographische Industrie » economically while both maintaining legally independent.

They believe in considerable advantages from this move, « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » having a superlative repertoire, « Philips Phonographische Industrie » owning branches world-wide. The new company trades under the provisional name « GPG » (in Germany, « Grammophon-Philips-Gruppe » ; in Netherlands, « Gruppe Philips Grammophon ») .

Coen Solleveld is elected president ; F & A, Johannes van der Velden ; Distribution & Sales, Kurt Kinkele ; Engineering, Doctor H. W. Steinhausen ; « Polydor » International, Doctor Werner Vogelsang ; « Philips Phonographische Industrie » , Piet Schellevis ; « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » , Richard Busch ; « Philips » , Reinhard Klaassen.

The group acquires the company and label « Mercury » of the United States.

At « Grammophon-Philips-Gruppe » , in Hannover, Immelmann introduces a fully automatic electronic record control system.

22 March 1962 : P. K. Burkowitz at « EMI Electrola » is granted DBP No. 1113474, for which he had applied on January 16, 1960, for his « auto-adaptive compressor » (increasing programme level causes decreasing decay time - this reduces the pumping effect) .

1964 : At the end of his tenure, Doctor Walter Betcke surrenders his « International Federation of the Phonographic Industry » chairmanship to Richard Dawes, from « EMI » .

1965 : The production of music cassettes (MC) begins in Hannover.

1967 : P. K. Burkowitz is made head of « Groups Recording Management » (GRM) , in Hannover, alternatively in Baarn, Netherlands. Technical planning, construction and service capacities are distributed to both facilities, depending on demand and suitability. Coordinating measures are to be initiated on all decision levels. The studios of regional branches are supervised centrally, introducing adequate measures of standardization, modernization and coordination. There are exploratory talks with Doctor Steinhausen on the transfer of the sound engineering department from Hannover to Langenhagen into a new, yet, to be built administrative center. The favored solution of a separate building, especially appropriate for acoustic reasons (close proximity to the highway) , cannot be verified, owing to limited resources, but it is not rejected altogether, either.

1969 : The group acquires « Chappell Music Publishing » , in the United Kingdom and the United States.

The recording department sound engineering and « Groups Recording Management » move to Langenhagen, into the new administrative building.

C. Olms, head of « Polydor » studios, London, describes the principles and solutions of automatic repetition of work routines at the mixing desk.

During a U.S. Tour, P. K. Burkowitz scouts-out halls, studios and recording installation of the most renowned labels in New York, Chicago, Montreal, Detroit, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Nashville, Memphis, Boston, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. The news of an expiring contract between the Boston Symphony Orchestra and « RCA » , immediately transferred to Kurt Kinkele, in Hamburg, initiates a new long-term contract between « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, leading to the establishment of a separate control room for « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » (a novelty in the Symphony Hall) , with a modern analog transistor desk from the « Gruppe Philips Grammophon » workshop, audio engineering department Baarn. Local supervision in Boston is assigned to Paul Meister, « Grammophon-Philips-Gruppe » audio engineering department, Hannover.

1970 : The group acquires record label « RSO » from the United Kingdom.

1st 4 channel quadrophony discs.

In the Netherlands, the 1st world-wide meeting of « Group Recording Managers » (heads of regional companies) is arranged. Many participants see their colleagues from other countries for the 1st time ever. A great need for and real interest in timely technical information becomes apparent, leading to a regular service, including suggestions for practical and economically viable harmonization measures.

1971 : « Siemens » and « Philips » assign GPG to « PolyGram » .

After many years of international ground-work by Johann L. Ooms (former chief engineer for electro-acoustics at « Philips Phonographische Industrie ») and regional initiatives by P. K. Burkowitz and several technical heads of European companies inside the music industry, there is a 1st meeting of the « Audio Engineering Society » (AES) in Europe, convening in Cologne.

This event marks the beginnings of a new (and badly needed) international cooperation, providing information on and accounts of experiences with technological inventions. Burkowitz heads the 1st 3 meetings : 1971, in Cologne ; 1972, in Munich ; and 1973, in Rotterdam.

8 February 1971 : The control-room at the Boston Symphony Hall is officially opened in the presence of journalists.

1972 : The group acquires « Verve Records » and « MGM Records » , both from the United States.

The Classics teams of « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » and « Philips » (« PolyGram ») are now serially equipped with 8-channel, soon even 16-channel machines (« Studer ») .

1976 : The group acquires « UDC » (« United Distribution Corporation ») , of the United States, and concludes a distribution contract with « 20th Century Records » and « RCA » , outside the United States.

1977 : The group acquires 50 % of the label « Casablanca » .

L. Schmidt und Gorski, from « PolyGram - AED, Hannover » , create the 1st automatic mixing system with inter-track data recording and real-time data recovery.

« Decca London » builds proprietary digital tape recorders in their own workshop.

1978 : « PolyGram » equips its Classics teams and regional companies with marketable digital recorders and prepares switching to digital recording procedures.

1979-1980 : Under the technical supervision of Doctor Hermann R. Franz, « PolyGram » engineers Dieter Soiné (production technology) and Horst Söding (development department) design the complete technology of the CD production, based on their own lab experience in Hannover, going back as far as 1961. The markets are supplied from 1982 onwards.

The group acquires the remaining 50 % of « Casablanca » .

1980 : The group acquires « Decca, UK » with Reinhard Klaasen as managing director. « Decca » 's early start into the digital future means advantages for the use of the repertoire, but it also creates problems for the internal exchange.

1981 : « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » « Tonmeister » Karl-August Naegler receives a Grammy Award for his recording of Alban Berg's « Lulu » (with « l'Orchestre de l'Opéra de Paris » conducted by Pierre Boulez) , in the category : « Best Engineered Album, Classical » .

1983 : After reaching retirement age, and, a further year in an advisory capacity, P. K. Burkowitz surrenders his operational responsibility to Professor Doctor Hans Hirsch (head of the Classics department at « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft ») ; the technical field to engineer Han Tendeloo (head of group « Adva ») ; and the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » recording department to Klaus Hiemann.

1984 : The 1st CD-ROMs (read-only memory) are produced in Hannover.

1985 : A 6 year cooperation between « Philips » and « Dupont Optical » begins under the logo « PDO » .

1986 : After the retirement of R. Klaassen, Roland Kommerell is made managing director at « Decca » .

1987 : The CD-Video with analog picture and digital sound is created.

During the « Funkausstellung » , P. K. Burkowitz, invited for this purpose, explains to interested visitors the principles of recording in the « digital era » . This is followed by an exchange of ideas with Oliver Berliner about the situation and plans of the descendants of Emile Berliner and his views on subsequent developments.

1989 : The bit-rate for 2 channel recordings is increased from 16 to 24 bits.

1990 : Development of High-Capacity Discs (forerunners of the DVD) .

The 24 bits technology is also introduced for multi-track recordings (> 2) .

1991 : The remaining production facilities are transferred from Hannover (on « Podbielskistraße ») to Langenhagen. The 1st recordings in « 4D » technology are carried-out, with A/D (analog to digital) conversion as close to the microphone as possible, so that only digital signals are carried to the mixing desk via cable. (Resolution during both the recording and the mixing process should exceed the CD standard) .

« Deutsche Grammophon » producer Hans Weber receives a Grammy Award for his recording of Charles Ives' orchestra works (with the New York Philharmonic conducted by Leonard Bernstein) in the category : « Best Classical Album » . The « Tonmeister » was Klaus Scheibe.

1992 : « Deutsche Grammophon » « Tonmeister » Gregor Zielinsky receives a Grammy Award for his recording of Leonard Bernstein's « Candide » (with the London Symphony Orchestra conducted by Leonard Bernstein) in the category : « Best Engineered Album, Classical » .

1993 : Patenting of the CD recycling technology, a « PolyGram, Hannover » product.

1994 : The « PolyGram » plant « Hannover/Langenhagen » is renamed : « PolyGram Manufacturing & Distribution Centres GmbH » (PMDC) .

« Deutsche Grammophon » « Tonmeister » Rainer Maillard receives a Grammy Award for his recording of Bartók's « The Wooden Prince » and « Cantata Profana » (with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and Chorus conducted by Pierre Boulez) in the category : « Best Engineered Album, Classical » .

1995 : The 1st functional high-capacity discs are released.

1996 : The favourable business prospects and the closure of the administrative building, in Langenhagen, enable Klaus Hiemann to realize the old plan of building a separate accommodation for recording purposes and, also, to give it a truly appropriate name, independent from any commercial ups and downs : « The Emile Berliner House » .

After its completion, the recording centre of « PolyGram, Hannover » moves into the new building on the company premises, in Langenhagen. It is on the ground level throughout. Oliver Berliner is present at the official opening ceremony. Also the street in front of the Langenhagen premises is renamed ; so, there is now an official « Emil-Berliner-Straße » , in Hannover.

« PolyGram, Hannover » exceeds the mark of 1 billion CDs.

Production of DVDs with a memory capacity of 7 CD-ROMs (DVD-5) .

1998 : Celebration of « 100 years of record technology » .

« Seagram » , in the United States, acquires the « PolyGram » shares from « Philips » and integrates them into its global enterprise, creating the world's biggest music company inside this new holding.

The DVD-9 (equaling 13 CD-ROMs) is now produced serially.

The 1st recordings, at 96 kHz sampling frequency, are produced in the « Emile Berliner House » .

The 1st 96 kHz recordings were a true battle of material.

1999 : « PolyGram Manufacturing & Distribution Centres GmbH » is renamed « Universal Manufacturing & Logistics GmbH » (UML) . « PolyGram Recording Services » (PRS) are dubbed « Universal Recording Services » (URS) .

The repertoire is digitalized for the purposes of electronic commerce.

During a « Universal Recording Services » recording session with Max Raabe and his « Palast Orchester » , both modern condenser microphones and a historic Reisz microphone, from the late-1920, are used. The latter, borrowed from the museum of « Georg Neumann GmbH » , restored by Manfred Hibbing (« Sennheiser » electronic) . There is also the Neumann CMV 3, the 1st condenser microphone from approximately the same period. This recording presents the titles « Women always need a man friend » and « Avalon » .

2000 : The « Emile Berliner Studios » is now the name for all services of the previous Recording Centre, such as implementation of recording sessions, recording practice and technology, mastering of tapes and the keeping of archives.

As part of the Cannes Classical Awards, Klaus Hiemann is awarded « The Emile Berliner Memorial Award for Lifetime Achievement » .

The French company « Vivendi » merges with « Universal Music » to form « Vivendi-Universal » .

January 2001 : Since the end of 1996, more than 5 million DVDs have been produced.

The 1st DVD-Audio is made at the « Emile Berliner Studios » , but the 1st products are released not until 2003.

2002 : The department Media Authoring is a new addition to the existing services of « Emile Berliner Studios » , devoted to authoring the new sound carrier formats DVD-Audio and Super-Audio CD. It provides pioneer work and is subsequently complemented by the screen picture, together with the DVD-Video.

2002-2003 : Much ado about nothing : The experts and parts of the Hi-Fi/High-End scene are at cross purposes over the new recording format DSD, on which the Super-Audio CD is based, and possible advantages of this format in comparison to PCM, as it is used for CD and (in its high-resolution variety) for DVD-Audio, the rival format of SACD.

Whereas the discussion is marred by the use of unsuitable comparisons and untenable marketing slogans, « Emile Berliner Studios » really undertakes to compare the formats. They are the 1st (and, perhaps, the only) team world-wide to do so. During the recording of Mahler's 2nd Symphony (with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Gilbert Kaplan, released on « Deutsche Grammophon » CD 474 380-2 ; SACD 477 594-2) , in the « Musikvereinsaal, Vienna » , the whole recording sequence is carried-out by using both PCM and DSD technology following the microphone. To exclude sound variations by different A/D converters, the team uses special converters capable of dealing with both formats. The result of the subsequent listening comparisons by double-blind test is as straightforward as sobering : there is no difference whatsoever.

2005 : The « Universal » -owned plant for optical data carriers on the premises in Hannover/Langenhagen is sold to the American company « Entertainment Distribution Company » (EDC) .

2007 : « Deutsche Grammophon / Universal » gives-up large portions of its company-owned « Emile Berliner Studios » for « strategic reasons » . The departments Mastering and Media Authoring are closed down. They carry on as independent companies, managed by their respective executives (« East-side Mastering Studios Berlin GmbH » headed by Götz-Michaël Rieth and Dirk Niemeier ; « Platin Media Productions GmbH & Co. KG » headed by Harald Gericke) . By this time, the extensive company archive has already been disincorporated into a separate branch. Only the recording crew remains, still carrying-out assignments for « Deutsche Grammophon » and « Decca » .

2008 : By way of a management buy-out, « Emile Berliner Studios - Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » turns into the new independent company « Emile Berliner Studios Productions GmbH & Co. KG » , carrying on under the « Emile Berliner Studios » with more or less the same crew. In the meantime, Hannover/Langenhagen is getting emptier by the day : all tape archive stock is transferred to « Arvato Digital Services » (previously, « Sonopress ») in Gütersloh, Westfalia.

2009 : The management of « Emile Berliner Studios » decides to leave Hannover/Langenhagen and to move to Berlin. The premises there on the « Köthener Straße 38 » , close to the « Potsdamer Platz » , still house the historic « Meistersaal » and various other companies from the section « media production » . The studios are rebuilt completely, which takes as much as 9 months to be completed.

2010 : « Emile Berliner Studios » leaves the location Hannover/Langenhagen and moves to Berlin. On October 21, the crew celebrates the start into a new and hopeful era of its outstanding and complex history.

Die Deutsche Grammophon ist ein traditionsreiches deutsches Schallplattenlabel, aus dem 1972 die PolyGram hervorging, die 1998 wiederum in der Universal Music Group aufging.

Das Unternehmen galt im 20. Jahrhundert als Qualitätsführer im Bereich der Kunstmusik-LPs und war für seine hohen Ansprüche bekannt. Es produzierte zahlreiche berühmte Aufnahmen weltbekannter Orchester und Musiker.

Die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft wurde am 6. Dezember 1898 vom Deutsch-Amerikaner Emile Berliner und seinem Bruder Josef in ihrer Geburtsstadt Hannover gegründet. Von hier aus erschloss das Unternehmen den europäischen Markt für das von den Gebrüdern erfundene Grammophon. Als Muttergesellschaft gilt die im englischen Hayes ansässige Gramophone Company. Die Produktion begann neben der J. Berliner Telephon-Fabrik in der Kniestraße in Hannovers Nordstadt. Wegen zunehmender Enge (bis 1903 vertrieben die Brüder hier zeitgleich den Hackethal-Draht) entstand 1904 ein großes Werk auf noch freien Flächen entlang der Podbielskistraße im Stadtteil Klein-Buchholz.

Die Produktion nahm sofort enorme Ausmaße an. So wurden im ersten Jahr täglich rund 25.000 Schallplatten gepresst .

Am 1. Januar 1900 wurde die Gesellschaft in eine Aktiengesellschaft umgewandelt. 40 % der Aktien blieben in Hannover bei der Deutschen Grammophon AG, die übrigen Aktien gingen an die Gramophone Company in Hayes, England. Dies führte im Ersten Weltkrieg dazu, daß die Deutsche Grammophon AG und die Grammophon-Spezialhaus GmbH, die sich mehrheitlich in ausländischem Besitz befanden, vom Deutschen Reich beschlagnahmt wurden und die englische Gramophone Company enteignet wurde. Im Jahre 1917 wurde die Deutsche Grammophon AG an die Leipziger Polyphon Musikwerke AG verkauft und der Firmensitz von Hannover nach Berlin in die Markgrafenstraße 76 verlegt.

In den ersten Jahren war der eine Schallplatte beschreibende Engel das Markenzeichen für die Produkte der Firmen der Gebrüder Berliner. Dieser wurde durch den heute weltberühmten, vor dem Grammophon sitzenden Hund namens Nipper abgelöst. Das Markenzeichen His Master's Voice wurde im Mutterhaus nach einem Gemälde des Künstlers Francis Barraud geschaffen. Zunächst saß der Hund vor einem Phonographen von Edison. Nachdem die Firma Edison aber den Kauf ausgeschlagen hatte, wurde der Phonograph mit einem Grammophon von Berliner übermalt und das Bild anschließend den Brüdern Berliner zum Kauf angeboten. Diesen gefiel es so gut, daß sie es kauften und weitere Kopien davon bestellten.

Aufgrund der Bestimmungen des zum Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges ausgehandelten Versailler Vertrages durfte die inzwischen vom Mutterhaus unabhängige Deutsche Grammophon AG außerhalb des deutschen Reichsgebietes ihr Markenzeichen und den Namen « Grammophon » nicht mehr nutzen. Zum Export wurde daher das Label Polydor gegründet. Dem ehemaligen Mutterhaus, der englischen Gramophone Company, war es im Gegenzug wiederum nicht gestattet, ihre Markenzeichen und Namen in Deutschland zu nutzen, weshalb diese 1924 die Electrola-Gesellschaft in Nowawes gründete. Im Jahr 1933 fiel das Unternehmen der Arisierung zum Opfer. Die anschließende Emigration, zu der die Eigentümer und etliche der verpflichteten Künstler 1933 gezwungen waren, führte zu Einbußen in der künstlerischen Qualität sowie der Breite des Plattenrepertoires. 1937 übernahm Telefunken die DG, reichte die Anteile aber schon 1941 an Siemens & Halske weiter.

Während des Zweiten Weltkrieges wollte das NS-Regime die Plattenindustrie durch eine Altplattenverwertung mit den benötigten Werkstoffen am Leben erhalten. Dennoch brach um 1943 die Schallplattenproduktion weitgehend zusammen ; lediglich für den Bedarf des Rundfunks wurden bis Kriegsende Platten hergestellt.

In der Nachkriegszeit entwickelte sich die Deutsche Grammophon zur bedeutendsten deutschen Schallplattenfirma, die einen Großteil der bedeutenden deutschen und auch viele ausländische Künstler unter Vertrag hatte. 1962 tauschten Philips und Siemens & Halske ihre Anteile an den Labels Philips sowie Deutsche Grammophon je zur Hälfte, 1972 entstand hieraus der PolyGram-Konzern.

Ab 1968 gab die Deutsche Grammophon einige Jahre lang die Kundenzeitschrift Musik-Boutique heraus, die kostenlos in Schallplattenläden und Diskotheken auslag. Mit einer (fast) monatlichen Auflage von 500.000 Exemplaren war das Magazin zu dieser Zeit die zweitgrößte Musikzeitschrift nach der wöchentlich erscheinenden Bravo.

Nach einer Umstrukturierung der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft und der Philips Phonographische Industrie im Jahr 1971 folgte die Gründung der PolyGram mit Hauptsitz in Baarn (Niederlande) und Hamburg. Das 75. Firmenjubiläum wurde 1973 in der Stadthalle Hannover gefeiert. Neben James Last und seiner Big Band traten viele namhafte Interpreten aller Label auf. Auf dem Werksgelände in Langenhagen, das vorrangig als Zentrallager diente, begann am 17. August 1982 die CD-Produktion. 1986 gingen die Fertigungsanlagen in Hannover und Langenhagen (die ersten und größten Produzenten von CDs) als Teil eines Joint Venture mit dem Chemiekonzern DuPont von PolyGram an Philips über ; Hannover blieb jedoch der wichtigste Lieferant des Labels. Bis zu seiner Schließung im Jahr 1990 wurden im Werk an der Podbielskistraße in Hannover vorrangig Vinyl-Schallplatten gepresst. In vier Pressereien wurden 30-cm-Langspielplatten, in der Kassettenfertigung ab 1965 Compact Cassetten, und in einer Spritzgussfertigung 17-cm-Single-Platten gefertigt. Ab 1970 wurde hier an der Entwicklung der Bildplatte (in der Version einer Videoplatte) gearbeitet.

Die Deutsche Grammophon ist heute noch als Label präsent, jedoch als Teil der Universal Music Group, in der die PolyGram 1998 aufging. Das Deutsche-Grammophon-eigene Produktionsstudio in Hannover-Langenhagen, die Emile Berliner Studios (benannt nach Emile Berliner) , wurde im Zuge einer Neustrukturierung im Jahr 2008 aufgelöst, und aus den einzelnen Abteilungen entstanden verschiedene unabhängige Firmen. Der Recording-Bereich behielt den Namen Emile Berliner Studios und befindet sich mittlerweile als unabhängiges Unternehmen in Berlin.

Emile Berliner

L'ingénieur allemand (naturalisé américain) Emile Berliner est né le 20 mai 1851 à Hanovre, en Basse-Saxe ; et est mort le 3 août 1929 à Washington, dans le District de Columbia.

Travaillant d'abord comme imprimeur puis comme commis dans un atelier de tissage, il peut dès lors illustrer ses talents d'inventeur en développant une nouvelle machine à tisser. C'est sous l'influence d'un de ses amis que le jeune Emile décide de traverser l'océan Atlantique. Passionné par la science et les nouvelles découvertes, il fréquente assidûment les nombreuses bibliothèques et, particulièrement, celle du « Cooper Institute » où il s'adonne particulièrement aux recherches concernant l'électricité et l'acoustique.

C'est en 1876, lors de l'exposition-anniversaire du centenaire de la Révolution américaine à Philadelphie, qu'il découvre une invention due à Alexandre Graham Bell qui l'intéresse au plus haut point : le téléphone.

Sa démonstration échoue de peu, car le message qu'il voulait transmettre n'arrive pas clairement à destination. Le problème venant du transmetteur. Emile Berliner décide alors de travailler sur l'invention et reprend ses recherches avec la même passion. Son petit appartement situé dans la capitale se transforme alors en laboratoire d'électricité. Après de nombreuses semaines de recherche (allant même jusqu'à placer un téléphone entre son appartement et celui de sa logeuse), Berliner découvre un nouveau principe. Il développe un bon transmetteur fonctionnant quelle que soit la distance séparant l'émetteur du récepteur. Un brevet est déposé le 4 juin 1877. La « Bell Telephone » contacte immédiatement l'inventeur allemand et lui propose une grosse somme d'argent ainsi qu'un revenu mensuel en échange de l'utilisation de l'invention. Quelques années plus tard, Emile quitte la compagnie et revient s'installer à Washington. Il y achète une maison où il installe son laboratoire d'étude.

Il y invente alors un gramophone et une matrice pour imprimer les disques horizontaux. C'est par ce brevet qu'il deviendra célèbre. Il présente, pour la 1^{re} fois en public, ce projet de gramophone, au mois de mai 1888, au « Franklin Institute » de Philadelphie. Il commence alors à fabriquer des disques en quantités importantes. Il enregistre aussi pour de nombreux artistes.

Le gramophone est commercialisé pour la 1^{re} fois, en 1893, par une compagnie fondée par Berliner et quelques amis, sous le nom de « United States Gramophone Company ».

2 années se sont écoulées lorsqu'une nouvelle compagnie voit le jour à l'initiative d'importants hommes d'affaires. Ce sont les débuts de la « Berliner Gramophone Company ». Mais les ventes de gramophones sont peu élevées et la compagnie doit, à tout prix, moderniser le gramophone. Ce qui est fait la même année. Le système à manivelle est remplacé par un moteur à ressort. Mais, peu à peu, l'invention de Berliner va circuler de mains en mains, chacun voulant s'approprier la part la plus importante. Ainsi, 3 Sociétés gèrent l'invention : la « Berliner Gramophone Company », qui fabrique le gramophone et le disque horizontal, la « United States Gramophone Company », qui gère les droits des brevets, et, enfin, la « Seaman's National Gramophone », qui s'occupe de la mise en marché et de la publicité.

Le début du XX^e siècle est marqué par de nombreux ennuis pour l'inventeur allemand. « Seaman » essaie de s'approprier les ventes et, par une série de manipulations, il arrive à faire retirer le gramophone des ventes aux États-Unis. Berliner quitte alors les États-Unis et sa ville de Philadelphie pour aller s'installer à Montréal, choix loin d'être anodin puisque les liaisons avec Philadelphie étaient fréquentes. La Société connaît alors une sorte d'apogée, jusqu'à atteindre 2 millions de disques vendus durant l'année 1901. À la suite de la Première Guerre mondiale, la Société connaît une formidable expansion et l'usine de Berliner constitue l'une des plus modernes de Montréal. En 1924, la « Victor Talking Machine » rachète la Société. Berliner est lauréat de la médaille Franklin, en 1929, en récompense de ses travaux dans le domaine de l'enregistrement du son.

Le jeune Emile Berliner travaille d'abord comme imprimeur puis comme commis dans une boutique de tissus. C'est là qu'il manifeste, pour la 1^{re} fois, son talent d'inventeur en créant une nouvelle machine à tisser les tissus. En 1870, influencé par un ami qui avait précédemment immigré aux États-Unis, le jeune Berliner décide de traverser l'Atlantique. Il fréquente la bibliothèque du « Cooper Institute » où il consulte de nombreux ouvrages scientifiques, touchant particulièrement à l'électricité et à l'acoustique.

À l'été 1876, l'Exposition du centenaire de la révolution américaine de Philadelphie présente les toutes nouvelles découvertes scientifiques. À cette occasion, Alexandre Graham Bell (1847-1922) présente au public, pour la 1^{re} fois, le téléphone qui consistait en 2 boîtiers identiques abritant chacun un électro-aimant et une membrane reliés par un circuit électrique. Malheureusement pour Bell, le message transmis n'était pas clair. Son invention comptait sur un bon récepteur mais un mauvais transmetteur. Emile Berliner entreprend ses recherches dans son petit appartement de Washington, transformé en laboratoire d'électricité. Il y avait même installé un téléphone entre son appartement et celui de sa logeuse. Le principe que Berliner découvre dotait l'invention de Bell d'un bon transmetteur pour toutes les distances. Le 4 juin 1877, son invention est brevetée. En termes simples, Berliner avait mis au point un vrai microphone. En septembre 1877, la compagnie « Bell Telephone » de Boston offre à Berliner une somme d'argent et un salaire en échange de son invention. En 1883, il quitte la compagnie de téléphone et revient à Washington. Il acquiert une maison sur la rue « Columbia » et y installe son laboratoire de recherche. C'est dans ce laboratoire que Berliner invente son gramophone ainsi que le disque horizontal et la matrice pour imprimer les disques. Berliner enregistre le brevet de son gramophone, à la fin de 1887. Le 16 mai 1888, il le présente en public au « Franklin Institute » de Philadelphie. C'est à ce moment qu'il commence à manufacturer des disques. Il invite des musiciens à enregistrer sur des plaques de zinc. En 1890, la revue « Scientific American » publie un compte-rendu de sa découverte, illustré de gravures de son gramophone et de son appareil à enregistrer le son.

Le gramophone a pu être commercialisé en 1893 par une compagnie fondée par Emile Berliner et quelques amis sous le nom « The United States Gramophone Company ». À l'automne 1895, un groupe d'hommes d'affaire de Philadelphie fournit 25,000 $ pour mettre sur pied la « Berliner Gramophone Company » qui installe ses bureaux à Philadelphie. Emile Berliner était actionnaire minoritaire dans cette compagnie et les droits de brevet du disque demeuraient la propriété de la « United States Gramophone Company ». Les ventes du gramophone étant peu élevées, la compagnie comprend vite la nécessité d'améliorer le gramophone à manivelle en l'équipant d'un moteur à ressort. Eldridge R. Johnson de Camden, au New Jersey, en invente un et le manufacture pour la « Berliner Gramophone Company ». Entre 1896 et 1900, près de 25,000 moteurs de ce type furent ainsi manufacturés.

La « Berliner Gramophone Company », inexpérimentée dans la mise en marché, signe un contrat de publicité avec Frank Seaman de New York. L'invention de Emile Berliner est donc maintenant entre les mains de 3 compagnies : la « Berliner Gramophone Company » de Philadelphie, qui manufacture les gramophones et les disques ; la « Seaman's National Gramophone » de New York, qui se charge de la publicité ; et la « United States Gramophone Company » de Washington, qui contrôle les droits des brevets. Au début de 1900, « Seaman's National Gramophone » conclut un accord avec « American Graphophone » et « Columbia Phonograph » pour manufacturer le « Zonophone ». Emile Berliner voit cet accord comme une trahison face à leur contrat d'exclusivité de vente. Le 25 juin 1900, « Seaman » intente une injonction contre la « Berliner Gramophone Company » qui aura pour effet d'obliger Emile Berliner à se retirer de la vente de son gramophone dans tous les États-Unis. Ces problèmes expliquent, sans doute, une des raisons pour lesquelles Emile Berliner décide d'installer sa compagnie à Montréal. Son petit-fils, Oliver Berliner, explique en

Emile Berliner installe sa compagnie à Montréal, en 1900. On la retrouve, pour la 1^{re} fois, dans le « Lovell's Montreal Directory » de 1900. À ce moment, le magasin de vente au détail et les bureaux, situés au 2315 de la rue Sainte-Catherine, sont gérés par le gérant-général Emmanuel Blout. La manufacture de Berliner est située au 367-368 de la rue de l'Aqueduc (actuellement, la rue Lucien L'Allier). La plus ancienne publicité que nous ayons retracé date de novembre 1900 dans le « Canadian Magazine » et mentionne que les gramophones sont fabriqués à Montréal. Le 22 décembre 1900, la « Berliner Gram-o-Phone Company » (c'est sous cette orthographe que la compagnie fait sa publicité pendant de nombreuses années sur la devanture du magasin et dans les journaux) fait paraître une annonce publicitaire dans le journal « La Patrie » mentionnant des disques en français. Dans la publicité que la compagnie fait paraître, à l'automne de 1900, on mentionne une médaille gagnée à l'Exposition de Toronto pour l'année 1900. Le 16 juillet 1900, Emile Berliner enregistre aux bureaux des brevets la marque de commerce de sa compagnie, le chien « Nipper » écoutant un gramophone. Le peintre Francis James Barraud créa cette image utilisée pendant plus de 70 ans. Cette marque de commerce fut utilisée à Montréal dès 1900, sur le verso du disque n° 402 de Frank Bata, intitulé « Hello My Baby ». Emile Berliner aurait produit 2 000 disques durant ses deux premières années d'opération à Montréal. On aurait vendu plus de 2 millions de disques dans la seule année de 1901. En 1904, la compagnie installe un studio d'enregistrement au 138-A de la rue Peel. Par contre, la manufacture déménage au 201 de la ruelle des Fortifications tandis que le magasin et les bureaux sont toujours situés au 2315 de la rue Sainte-Catherine. Pendant la période allant de 1904 à 1906, la « Berliner Gramophone Company » produit différents types de gramophones à son usine de Montréal : le gramophone de modèle A ; le modèle B, surnommé « Ideal » ; le modèle E, surnommé « le Bijou » ; et le modèle C, surnommé « Grand ». La compagnie produit des disques de 7 pouces (18 centimètres) ; de 10 pouces (25.5 centimètres) ; et le disque « De Luxe », de 12 pouces (30 centimètres). Les 1^{ers} disques, gravés d'un seul côté, présentaient sur le verso l'image de « Nipper ». Ce n'est qu'en 1908 que l'on commence à les graver des 2 côtés. Joseph Saucier (1869-1941) aurait eu le privilège d'enregistrer le 1^{er} disque montréalais en chantant « la Marseillaise ».

Il faut situer la construction du 1^{er} édifice en brique de la rue Lenoir, vers 1908. À une période indéterminée entre 1908 et 1912, la compagnie fait construire une annexe-sud à son usine de la rue Lenoir dans le quartier Saint-Henri. Cet édifice, très moderne pour l'époque, construit en béton armé sur 4 étages est percé de très larges ouvertures. Une affiche publicitaire, placée sur le toit, met-en-vedette « Nipper » ainsi que les mots « The home of the Victrola ».

La compagnie connaît une importante expansion après la Première guerre mondiale et un agrandissement de l'usine de Saint-Henri. Avec la fin de la construction de l'édifice longeant la rue Saint-Antoine, en 1921, la « Berliner Gramophone » s'est dotée de l'une des usines les plus modernes de Montréal. L'usine de 50,000 pieds carrés fabrique des gramophones et des disques. En 1924, la « Victor Talking Machine » achète la compagnie qui se fusionnera, en 1929, à « RCA » pour devenir la « RCA Victor ». Emile Berliner est décédé des suites d'une crise cardiaque, le 3 août 1929.

Emile Berliner émigre aux États-Unis, en 1870. En 1877, l'an après l'invention du téléphone par Alexander Graham Bell, il conçoit un transmetteur et, en testant celui-ci, découvre que cet instrument peut servir de récepteur téléphonique.

À cette invention, Berliner en ajoute d'autres, permettant ainsi le développement du téléphone. En 1887, il s'intéresse au phonographe et apporte une amélioration majeure : le disque enregistré par gravure latérale. Il révolutionne ainsi le procédé de gravure verticale sur cylindre mis-au-point par Thomas Edison. L'invention de Berliner, qu'il appelle « gramophone », réduit les distorsions du son. Berliner invente aussi un procédé de matrice permettant la production en masse de disques, ce qui favorisera le développement de l'industrie musicale.

Par la suite, Berliner s'intéresse à l'aéronautique. En 1908, il met-au-point un moteur à combustion de faible poids. Sous sa direction, son fils, Henry Berliner, conçoit un hélicoptère qui parvient à voler dès 1919. Enfin, revenant sur la reproduction du son, Emile Berliner invente, en 1925, les panneaux isolants en forme de tuiles dont seront équipés les auditoriums et les salles de concerts.

The (German-born) American inventor Emile Berliner was born on 20 May 1851 in Hanover, Germany ; and died on 3 August 1929. He is best-known for developing the disc record gramophone (named phonograph in American English) . He founded the « Berliner Gramophone Company » , in 1895 ; « The Gramophone Company » in London, England, in 1897 ; the « Deutsche Grammophon » in Hanover, Germany, in 1898 ; and the « Berliner Gram-o-phone Company of Canada » , in Montreal, in 1899 (chartered in 1904) .

Berliner was born into a Jewish merchant family. Though raised in a Jewish family, he later became an agnostic. He completed an apprenticeship to become a merchant, as was family tradition. While his real hobby was invention, he worked as an accountant to make ends meet. To avoid being drafted for the Franco-Prussian War, Berliner migrated to the United States of America, in 1870, with a friend of his father's, in whose shop he worked in Washington, D.C. He moved to New York and, living-off temporary work, such as doing the paper route and cleaning bottles, he studied physics at night, at the Cooper Union Institute. After some time working in a livery stable, he became interested in the new audio technology of the telephone and phonograph, and invented an improved telephone transmitter (one of the 1st type of microphones) . The patent was acquired by the « Bell Telephone Company » . But, on February 27, 1901, the United States Court of Appeal declared the patent void. Berliner subsequently moved to Boston, in 1877, and worked for « Bell Telephone » until 1883, when he returned to Washington and established himself as a private researcher. Emile Berliner became a United States citizen, in 1881. Berliner also invented the telephone transmitter, in 1877.

In 1886, Berliner began experimenting with methods of sound recording. He was granted his 1st patent for what he called the « Gramophone » , in 1887. The patent described recording sound using horizontal modulation of a stylus as it traced a line on a rotating cylindrical surface coated with an unresisting opaque material such as lamp-black, subsequently fixed with varnish and used to photo-engrave a corresponding groove into the surface of a metal playback cylinder. In practice, Berliner opted for the disc format, which made the photo-engraving step much less difficult and offered the prospect of making multiple copies of the result by some simpler process such as electro-typing, molding or stamping. In 1888, Berliner was using a more direct recording method, in which the stylus traced a line through a very thin coating of wax on a zinc disc, which was then etched in acid to convert the line of bared metal into a playable groove.

By 1890, a Berliner licensee in Germany was manufacturing a toy- « Gramophone » and 5 inch hard-rubber discs (stamped-out replicas of etched zinc Master discs) , but because key U.S. patents were still pending, they were sold only in Europe. Berliner meant his « Gramophone » to be more than a mere toy and, in 1895, he persuaded a group of businessmen to invest $ 25,000, with which he started the « U.S. Berliner Gramophone Company » . He began marketing 7 inch records and a more substantial « Gramophone » , which was, however, still hand-propelled like the smaller toy machine.

The difficulty in using early hand-driven « Gramophones » was getting the turntable to rotate at an acceptably steady speed while playing a disc. Engineer Eldridge R. Johnson, the owner of a small machine shop in Camden, New Jersey, assisted Berliner in developing a suitable low-cost wind-up spring motor for the « Gramophone » and became Berliner's manufacturer. Berliner gave Frank Seaman the exclusive sales rights in the United States but, after disagreements, Seaman began selling his own version of the « Gramophone » , as well as unauthorized copies of Berliner's records, and Berliner was legally barred from selling his own products. The « U.S. Berliner Gramophone Company » shut down, in mid-1900, and Berliner moved to Canada. Following various legal maneuvers, the « Victor Talking Machine Company » was officially founded by Eldridge Johnson, in 1901, and the trade name « Gramophone » was completely and permanently abandoned in the United States, although its use continued elsewhere. The « Berliner Gramophone Co. of Canada » was chartered on 8 April 1904 and re-organized as the « Berliner Gramophone Co. » , in 1909.

Berliner's other inventions include a new type of loom for mass-production of cloth ; an acoustic tile ; and an early version of the helicopter. According to a July 1, 1909, report in « The New York Times » , a helicopter built by Berliner and J. Newton Williams of Derby, Connecticut, had lifted its operator (Williams) « from the ground, on 3 occasions » at Berliner's laboratory in the Brightwood neighborhood of Washington, D.C.

Emile Berliner, who suffered a nervous breakdown in 1914, was also active in advocating improvements in public health and sanitation.

Berliner was awarded the Franklin Institute's John Scott Medal, in 1897 ; and, later, the Elliott Cresson Medal, in 1913 ; and the Franklin Medal, in 1929.

Emile Berliner died of a heart attack, at the age of 78. He is buried in Rock Creek Cemetery, in Washington, D.C. - alongside his wife and a son.

Emile Berliner was 1 of 13 children born to Samuel and Sarah Fridman Berliner, 2 of whom died in infancy. His father was a merchant and a Talmudic scholar, and his mother was an amateur musician. From both parents, Berliner and his siblings inherited a great sense of integrity and a pride in accomplishment.

Following a few years of school, in Hanover, Berliner was sent to nearby Wolfenbüttel to attend the « Samsonscheule » from which he graduated, in 1865, at the age of 14. According to his own later statement, this marked the end of his formal schooling. Berliner then spent several years at odd jobs in Hanover, helping to support the large Berliner family. Enticed by the offer of a clerkship in a store, partly owned by a man named Behrend, a Hanoverian who had emigrated to the United States, some time earlier, and, perhaps, by a desire to escape the military duty that faced most young men in the year of the Franco-Prussian War, Berliner persuaded his parents to allow him to accept the job offer and to emigrate to America. In late March 1870, he left Hanover.

The dry-goods store for which he was destined was located in Washington, D.C. For 3 years, Berliner clerked for « Gotthelf, Behrend and Co. » , until in 1873, he decided a better opportunity awaited him in New York City. There Berliner, again, took-up onerous jobs during the day while trying to improve himself by studying privately, at night, at the « Cooper Institute » . After a brief career as a « drummer » (traveling salesman) for a « gents' furnishings » (men's clothing and accessories) establishment, in Milwaukee, Berliner, again, went back to New York where, this time, he was most fortunate in obtaining a position as general clean-up man in the laboratory of Constantine Fahlberg, the discoverer of saccharine. This experience in a research laboratory fired Berliner's ambition, and he decided that science, research, and invention were to be his destiny.

In 1876, Berliner returned to what was now « Behrend and Co. » , in Washington, and resumed his clerkship. That was the year of the American centennial celebrations and, among the outstanding events that took place in Washington, was a demonstration of the new telephone of Alexander Graham Bell. Berliner saw the instrument for the 1st time and was filled with enthusiasm. He commenced to study the telephone. To his inquiring mind, one of the instrument's weaknesses was its transmitter. Working alone in his rooming house, he fashioned a new type of transmitter which he called a « loose-contact » transmitter, a type of microphone, which increased the volume of the transmitted voice. That he was able to do this, while still possessing only a rudimentary knowledge of electricity and physics, was quite astounding. When the members of the newly-formed « American Bell Telephone Company » were advised that a young and entirely unknown man in Washington had submitted a caveat (Berliner wrote it himself, without the aid of a patent attorney) to the Patent Office covering a new transmitter, they could hardly believe it. Thomas Watson, the Mr. Watson of telephone fame, was sent to Washington to make inquiries. He returned such a glowing report of the transmitter and of Berliner himself that the company offered to buy the rights to the invention and to hire Berliner as a research assistant. For the next 7 years, Berliner was employed by the « ABT Co. » , 1st in New York City and, then, in Boston. During those years, Berliner worked on numerous problems associated with the fledgling telephone industry and developed into a 1st class theoretical electrician.

While working in Boston, in 1881, Berliner became an American citizen and, in the same year, married a young woman of German descent named Cora Adler. In 1884, Berliner decided to set himself-up as a private researcher and inventor, his cherished dream. He resigned from the « American Bell Telephone Company » and he and Cora left Boston and set-up housekeeping in Washington, D.C.

In his small house, in Washington, Berliner began working on additional improvements to Bell's telephone, selling the rights to his patents to the telephone company. Then, in 1886, he began working on the invention that was to prove his most important contribution to the world. This was the development of the gramophone, the recording and reproduction of sound by means of disc records. Among his other inventions was the acoustic tile.

As one who frequently attended orchestral concerts, Operas, and other musical events, as well as lectures, plays, and sermons, Berliner was well-aware of the poor acoustics of many halls, theatres, churches, and synagogues. Having studied acoustics for many years, he decided to do something about the situation. He soon came-up with a new type of tile that could be affixed to the existing walls of rooms. Acoustic tiles were, in the inventor's words, « composed of porous cement, are as hard as stone, and, yet, have the resonance of wood when vibrated by a tuning fork » . In 1926, he obtained Patent # 1,573,475 for these tiles. They were eminently successful in the days before public address systems. Among the buildings that added these tiles were the auditorium of Drexel University, in Philadelphia ; Stanley Theatre, in Jersey City ; the Church of the Messiah, in Montreal ; Leicester Theatre, in London ; Uptown Theatre, in Philadelphia ; the 2nd Presbyterian Church, in Pittsburgh ; and the board-room of the Karachi Port Trust, in what is now Pakistan.

Emile Berliner is not known to have had any testy relations with his inventor colleagues ; he appears to have been a man of remarkably even temperament. When certain slights came his way, it was not Berliner but some of his admirers who took-up arms in defence of his reputation. For instance, in the early years of the 20th Century, some writers took it upon themselves to declare that it was Thomas A. Edison who had invented the loose-contact telephone transmitter. Theodore Vail, president of the « American Telephone and Telegraph Company » , wrote a letter declaring that, to his certain knowledge, it was Emile Berliner who invented that type of microphone. Again, when Edison was presented with a statue of « Orpheus Discovering the Gramophone Record » , it was not Berliner but a host of his friends who complained, as they also did when Congress was considering awarding Edison a medal for the development of the gramophone, in addition to his numerous authentic inventions.

Still, that Berliner was concerned about his reputation and noted the dubious claims of others is evident from the Library of Congress's collections. The Library has a scrapbook apparently compiled by Berliner with articles and letters relating to Thomas Edison's receiving credit for Berliner's invention of the gramophone. Likewise, Berliner wrote in the front cover of a volume of telephone litigation that it might be necessary to preserve this book in order to protect his reputation.

Emile Berliner, for many years, took an active role in community and social causes, particularly, in the public health field. In 1909, he donated funds for an infirmary building at the Starmont Tuberculosis Sanitarium, in Washington Grove, Maryland, dedicated to the memory of his father. Berliner was president of the Washington Tuberculosis Association for some years. In 1924, he inaugurated the Bureau of Health Education to promote public hygiene and health education for mothers and children.

The subject of children's health was close to his heart. In 1900, his youngest daughter, Alice, became desperately ill, very likely from bacteria picked-up from some food or drink. Because of this illness, Berliner campaigned against the high-mortality rate of babies and young children. He became a fervent advocate of clean milk and, by all means at his disposal, he preached to mothers to « scald the milk » before serving it. He also became disgusted by what he perceived to be the neglect of cleanliness in children. In 1919, he and some of his associates wrote and published a book of colored drawings with accompanying rhymes illustrating what happens to children who neglect cleanliness. Entitled « Muddy Jim », the book was given to schools in the Washington area and elsewhere. All the rhymes were written by Emile Berliner. The book was soon translated into French, possibly for distribution in the Canadian province of Quebec.

Zionism was another cause that involved Emile Berliner deeply. Between 1913 and 1918, Berliner wrote 4 articles on the subject : « The Social Status of the Jews » ; « Zionism and the American Spirit » ; « Americanism and Zionism » ; and « Thoughts on Zionism » . In 1919, Berliner was named chairman of the Committee on Arrangements for a reception for the celebrated rabbi Stephen S. Wise. During the same year, he wrote a letter to the editors of both the « Washington Star » and the « Washington Post » concerning the 2nd commemoration of the 1917 declaration by British statesman Arthur Balfour that :

« His Majesty's Government favors establishment of a national home for the Jews in Palestine. »

In 1919, Berliner wrote another article on « A Study Towards the Solution of Industrial Problems in the New Zionist Commonwealth » .

Berliner inherited a great fondness for music from his mother and was an avid concert-goer. That he could play the piano is attested by one of his assistants in the gramophone laboratory who said that Berliner was the pianist on some of the very early recordings. In 1897, he wrote a song entitled « Columbian Anthem » in honour of the nation's capital, the District of Columbia. It was arranged for male quartet and was recorded, in 1897, on Berliner record No. 4288 and seems to have been re-recorded several times, before June 1900.

In a May 9, 1928, letter to his wife concerning the type of funeral he would want, Berliner expressed both his humanitarian and patriotic feelings :

« When I go, I do not want an expensive funeral. Elaborate funerals are almost a criminal waste of money. I should like Alice to play the 1st part of the “ Moonlight Sonata ” and, at the close, maybe Josephine will play Chopin's “ Funeral March ”. Give some money to some poor mothers with babies and bury me about sunset. I am grateful for having lived in the United States and I say to my children and grandchildren that peace of mind is what they should strive for. »

Emile Berliner died on August 3, 1929, in his 79th year.

Emile Berliner was an inventor best-known for developing the disc record gramophone. He founded « The Berliner Gramophone Company », in 1895. He also founded « The Gramophone Company », in London, England ; the « Deutsche Gramophone », in Hanover, Germany ; and the « Berliner Gram-o-phone Company of Canada » .

Emile Berliner was 1 of 13 children born to Samuel and Sarah Berliner. Following a few years of school in Hanover, Berliner was sent to Wolfenbützel from which he graduated, in 1865, at the age of 14. Berliner then spent several years there, after doing odd jobs in Hanover to help support the large Berliner family. He migrated to the United States of America, in 1870, where he lived in Washington, D.C. and officially turned a citizen, in 1881. He became interested in the new audio technology of the telephone and phonograph, and invented an improved telephone transmitter. In 1886, Berliner began experimenting with methods of sound recording. He was granted his 1st patent for what he called the « gramophone » , in 1887. Berliner's other inventions include a new type of loom for mass-production of cloth ; an acoustic tile ; and an early version of the helicopter.

Berliner started to compose as well. He expressed his love for America and the opportunities it had afforded him in a patriotic song which became a smash hit of its day : « The Columbian Anthem » , a song debuted in Washington on « Washington's Birthday » , at the 1897 national council of the « Daughters of the American Revolution » . As a composition, it ranks easily with the best national hymns ever written.

Berliner turned his attention to the violin. It is well-known that antique violins are consistently more brilliant over their entire range than new instruments. Berliner determined that the new instrument did not vibrate freely because the fibres of the wood under the bridge took much time to adjust to the uneven pressures transmitted by the strings through the bridge to the instrument's body.

In 1909, he donated funds for an infirmary building at the Starbuck Tuberculosis Sanitarium, in Washington Grove, Maryland, dedicated to the memory of his father. Berliner was president of the Washington Tuberculosis Association for some years. In 1920, Berliner endowed a silver cup as an annual award by the Tuberculosis Association to the city whose school children were most engaged in his health crusade.

In 1899, Berliner wrote a book, « Conclusions that speaks of his agnostic ideas on religion and philosophy » .

Berliner was also awarded the Franklin Institute's John Scott Medal, in 1897 ; and, later, the Elliott Cresson Medal, in 1913 ; and the Franklin Medal, in 1929.

Emile Berliner died of a heart attack, at the age of 78, and is buried in Rock Creek Cemetery in Washington, D.C. Through his innovations and inventions, he left invaluable legacies in communications, acoustics, and aeronautics to America and to the rest of the world.

Emile Berliner (englisch Emile Berliner ; geboren 20. Mai 1851 in Hannover ; gestorben 3. August 1929 in Washington, D.C.) gilt als Erfinder der Schallplatte und des Grammophons. Er erhielt auch Patente auf andere Erfindungen. 1881 erhielt er die US-amerikanische Staatsbürgerschaft.

Emils Urgroßvater, Jacob Abraham Joseph (gestorben 1811) , dessen Gattin Dina Friedberg (gestorbene 1840) , seine Mutter und eine Schwester hatten sich in den frühen 1770ern in der damals noch selbstständigen hannoverschen Neustadt niedergelassen. In der jüdischen Gemeinschaft wurde er, entsprechend seinem Geburtsort, Jokew (Jacob) Berlin genannt. 1776 erwarb er einen Schutzbrief. In ihrem Haus, Lange Straße 27, boten sie einen koscheren Mittagstisch an. Ihre Kinder waren Bella Betty (gestorbene 1778) und Moses (1786-1854) .

Moses konnte während der Gewerbefreiheit infolge der französischen Besatzung ein Textilgeschäft in der Bergstraße eröffnen. 1811 heiratete er Friederike Enoch aus Celle (1785-1838 ; die Tochter von Wolf Samuel Enoch (1747-1797) und Ester Berliner) , mit der er sechs Kinder hatte. 1833 zog er mit seinem Geschäft in die Lange Straße 33.

Moses ältester Sohn, Samuel Berliner (1813-1872) , betrieb ebenfalls ein Textilgeschäft. 1846 erwarben er und seine Gattin Sally Friedmann (1826-1903) die Bürgerrechte. Ihre Kinder waren :

Hermann (geboren 1848) ; Jacob (1849-1918) ; Adolph (geboren 1850) ; Emil (geboren 1851) ; Manfred (1853-1931) , Franzisca (geborene 1854 ; verheiratet Friedberg) ; Rebecka (geborene 1855) ; Moritz (geboren 1856) ; Johanne (geborene 1857, starb jung) ; Joseph (1858-1938) ; Rahel (geboren 1864) ; und Else (geborene 1869) . Emil wuchs mit seinen Geschwistern in bescheidenen Verhältnissen auf. Vier von Moses Söhnen blieben in Hannover.

Von 1861 bis 1865 besuchte er die Samson-Schule in Wolfenbüttel. Anschließend machte er eine kaufmännische Lehre und musste mit Arbeiten in einer Druckerei und später in einem Krawattengeschäft zum Unterhalt der Familie beitragen.

Er wanderte 1870 als junger Mann in die USA aus, um der preußischen Einberufung zu entgehen. Er begleitete einen Freund seines Vaters, Nathan Gotthelf, nach Washington und arbeitete drei Jahre in dessen Kurzwarengeschäft Gotthelf, Behrend and Co. Er zog dann nach New York, wo er sich mit Gelegenheitsarbeiten über Wasser hielt, 1875 letztendlich als Flaschenspüler im Labor von Constantin Fahlberg. Nachts studierte er am Cooper Institute (heute Cooper Union) . Später lebte er, nachdem er durch seine Erfindungen zu Geld gekommen war, allerdings wechselnd auch in Großbritannien, Kanada und Deutschland.

Vom Ertrag seiner ersten Erfindung bei den Bell Labs 1877, dem Berlinerschen Mikrophon für Fernsprecher, richtete er ein eigenes Labor ein. 1881-1883 besuchte er Hannover. 1887 meldete er ein Patent auf einen scheibenförmigen Tonträger an, in den von außen nach innen schneckenförmig und in Seitenschrift eine Rille geritzt und so die Schwingungen der Aufnahme-Membran analog konserviert wurden. Bestandteil des Patents war auch ein Aufnahme- und Abspielgerät, der Vorläufer des Grammophons. Er selbst bezeichnete die Scheibe in seiner deutschen Muttersprache als «

Schallplatte » .

Der große Vorteil der Scheibe gegenüber dem von Edison 1877 erfundenen und patentierten zylinderförmigen Tonträger war ihre Reproduzierbarkeit. Edisons Zylinder mussten einzeln bespielt werden und waren dadurch für den Normalverbraucher unerschwinglich, eine nach 1902 erfundene Methode, die Phonographen-Walzen in einem Gießverfahren in größeren Stückzahlen und damit billiger herstellen zu können, kam zu spät und war dem Pressen der Schellackplatte auch immer unterlegen.

Berliners Platte bestand ganz am Anfang aus Hartgummi, dann bald aus einem (viel preiswerteren) Gemisch aus Baumwollflocken, Schieferpulver, Ruß (daher die schwarze Farbe) und Schellack (daher die Zerbrechlichkeit) . Bei der heißen Pressung drückte sich der Schellack an die beiden Oberflächen und versiegelte damit die Rillen. Das ermöglichte die industrielle Fertigung großer Mengen, die er 1889 aufnahm und bis etwa 1910 nach und nach perfektionierte, zum Beispiel das Aufkleben von Papier-Etiketten und das Beschreiben beider Seiten.

Schellackplatten mit 78 Umdrehungen pro Minute wurden von ihrer Grundkonstruktion her faktisch unverändert mehr als 60 Jahre lang, von circa 1895 bis circa 1955, in der DDR und Osteuropa bis 1961 und in Teilen Asiens bis 1968, hergestellt und dann von Schallplatten aus Vinyl, 45er-Singles und 33er-LPs, abgelöst. Aber auch bei den Vinylplatten blieb - außer einem wesentlich engeren Abstand der Rillennachbarschaft (Füllschrift) , den das Kunststoffmaterial jetzt hergab und damit auch Stereo-Aufnahmen ermöglichte - das Grundprinzip Emil Berliners erhalten.

Berliner Helicopter No. 5 von 1924 von Henry Berliner ; an der Konstruktion war Emile Berliner beteiligt. Das Fluggerät ist heute im Besitz des Smithsonian Institute.

Emile Berliner machte eine Reihe weiterer Erfindungen. Darauf erhielt er zahlreiche Patente in den Vereinigten Staaten, beispielsweise am 4. September 1883 auf einen nach seiner Idee konzipierten Parkettboden.

Zwischen 1907 und 1926 arbeitete Berliner zusammen mit John Newton Williams und später auch mit seinem Sohn Henry Berliner an Helikoptern die er (aus heutiger Sicht irreführend) Gyrocopter nannte. Darunter verstehen wir heute die technisch unterschiedlichen Tragschrauber. Mit einem Testflug am 11. Juli 1908 bewies er, daß sein Flugapparat das Doppelte des eigenen Gewichts anheben konnte. Danach wendete er erstmals Umlaufmotoren in der Luftfahrt an, die er gemeinsam mit dem Spezialisten Adams-Farwell zu diesem Zweck weiterentwickelt hatte. Es folgten das größere Aeromobile und Arbeiten an Konzepten mit Koaxialrotor und koaxialem Tandemrotor. Letzterer, gebaut 1910, lieferte wichtige Grundlagen für die US-Doppelrotor-Hubschrauber der 1940er Jahre. Als Spin-Off dieser Entwicklungen gründete Emile Berliner 1909 eine Firma zum Bau von Umlaufmotoren für die Luftfahrt, die Gyro Motor Company in Washington, D.C. , welche sie bis etwa 1926 herstellte.

Sein Bruder Joseph Berliner, der in Hannover die Deutsche Gramophon Gesellschaft (eine Zweigniederlassung der in London gegründeten Gramophone Company) leitete und die Villa Simon bewohnte, stellte 1898 die ersten Tonträger in Massenproduktion her. Er hatte auch maßgeblichen Anteil an der Verbreitung des Telefons in Deutschland. 1914 stiftete Emile Berliner zu Ehren seiner Mutter das Sarah-Berliner-Stipendium (Sarah Berliner Research Fellowship) . Mit dieser Auszeichnung werden Frauen unterstützt, die einen akademischen Grad in Chemie, Physik oder Biologie haben. Seit 1928 wird das Stipendium von der American Association of University Women vergeben.

Die Emile Berliner Studios in Hannover-Langenhagen waren bis Mai 2008 das hauseigene Tonstudio des Klassiklabels Deutsche Grammophon (DG) ; dann verkaufte die DG sie im Rahmen eines Management-Buy-Out an die « EBS Productions GmbH & Co. KG » . Seitdem ist EBS (« Emile Berliner Studios ») ein unabhängiges Produktionsstudio für akustische Musik (Klassik- , Jazz- , Crossover- und Filmmusik-Produktionen) . Im Frühjahr 2010 zog EBS ins Zentrum von Berlin.

« La Voix de son Maître »

« His Master's Voice » (abbreviated : « HMV ») is a trademark in the music business and, for many years, was the name of a large record label. The name was coined in 1899 as the title of a painting of the dog named « Nipper listening to a wind-up gramophone. In the photograph on which the painting was based, the dog was listening to a phonograph cylinder.

The trademark image comes from a painting by English artist Francis Barraud, A.R.A. and titled : « His Master's Voice » . It was acquired from the artist, in 1899, by the newly formed « Gramophone Company » . According to contemporary « Gramophone Company » publicity material, the dog, a fox-terrier named « Nipper » , had originally belonged to Barraud's brother Mark. When Mark Barraud died, Francis inherited « Nipper » , along with a cylinder phonograph and a number of recordings of Mark's voice. Francis noted the peculiar interest that the dog took in the recorded voice of his late Master emanating from the trumpet, and conceived the idea of committing the scene to canvas.

In early 1899, Francis Barraud applied for copyright of the original painting using the descriptive working title : « Dog looking at and listening to a Phonograph » . He was unable to sell the work to any cylinder phonograph company, but « The Gramophone Company » purchased it, later that year, under the condition that Barraud modify it to show one of their disc machines. The image was first used on the company's catalogue dated December 1899, and additional copies were subsequently commissioned from the artist for various corporate purposes. Later, at the request of the gramophone's inventor, Emile Berliner, the American rights to the picture became owned by the « Victor Talking Machine Company » . « Victor » used the image more aggressively than its United Kingdom partner and, from 1902, all « Victor » records had a simplified drawing of the dog and gramophone from Barraud's painting on their labels. Magazine advertisements urged record buyers to : « Look for the dog » . The prize for the caption « His Master's Voice » was won by a British man named Ralph Mountain.

In British Commonwealth countries, the « Gramophone Company » did not use this design on its record labels, until 1909. The following year, the « Gramophone Company » replaced the « Recording Angel » trademark in the upper-half of the record labels by the Francis Barraud picture commonly referred to as « Nipper » , or « The Dog » .

The company was not formally called « HMV » or « His Master's Voice » , but was identified by that term because of its use of the trademark. Records issued by the company before February 1908 were generally referred to as « G&Ts », while those after that date are usually called « HMV » records.

This image continued to be used as a trademark by « Victor » in the United States, Canada and Latin America, and then by « Victor » 's successor « RCA » . In Commonwealth countries (except Canada) , it was used by subsidiaries of the « Gramophone Company » , which ultimately became part of « EMI » .

The trademark's ownership is divided among different companies in different countries, reducing its value in the globalised music market. The name « HMV » is used by a chain of music shops owned by « HMV » , mainly in the United Kingdom, Ireland, Canada, Singapore, Australia, Hong Kong, and Japan.

In 1921, the « Gramophone Company » opened the 1st « HMV » shop in London.

In 1929, « RCA » absorbed « Victor » , and with it a major shareholding in the « Gramophone Company » which « Victor » had owned since 1920.

In 1931, « RCA » was instrumental in the creation of « EMI » , which continued to own the « His Master's Voice » name and image in the United Kingdom. In 1935, « RCA » sold its stake in « EMI » but continued to own « Victor » and the rights to « His Master's Voice » in the Americas. « HMV » continued to distribute « RCA » recordings until « RCA » severed its ties with « EMI » , in 1957, which led « EMI » to purchase « Capitol Records » .

World War II fragmented the ownership of the name still further, as « RCA Victor » 's Japanese subsidiary « The Victor Company of Japan » (or « JVC ») became independent and, today, they still use the « Victor » brand and « Nipper » , in Japan only. In late 1968, « RCA » introduced a modern logo and restricted the use of « Nipper » to the album covers of « Red Seal Records » . The image was re-instated to most « RCA » record labels in the United States and in Canada, beginning in late 1976. The trademark was once again widely used in « RCA » advertising throughout the 1980's. « EMI » owned the « His Master's Voice » label in the United Kingdom until the 1980's, and the « HMV » shops until 1998.

In 1967, « EMI » converted the « HMV » label into an exclusive Classical music label and dropped its Pop series of popular music. « HMV » 's Pop series artists' roster was moved to « Columbia Graphophone and Parlophone » and licensed American Pop record deals to « Stateside Records » .

The globalized market for CDs pushed « EMI » into abandoning the « HMV » label in favour of « EMI Classics » , a name they could use world-wide ; however, it was revived between 1988 and 1992 for « Morrissey » recordings. The « HMV » trademark is now owned by the retail chain in the United Kingdom. The formal trademark transfer from « EMI » took place in 2003.

Meanwhile, « RCA » went into a financial decline. The dog and gramophone image, along with the « RCA » name, is now licensed by « RCA Records » and « RCA Victor » owner Sony Music Entertainment from Technicolor SA, which operates « RCA » 's consumer electronics business (still promoted by « Nipper, the dog ») that predecessor company Thomson SA bought from « General Electric » , in 1986, after « GE » bought « RCA » . The image of « His Master's Voice » now exists in the United States as a trademark only on radios and radios combined with phonographs, a trademark owned by Technicolor subsidiary « RCA » Trademark Management SA.

With that exception, the « His Master's Voice » dog and gramophone image is in the public domain in the United States, its american trademark registrations having expired in 1989 (for sound recordings and phonograph cabinets) ; in 1992 (television sets, television-radio combination sets) ; and in 1994 (sound recording and reproducing machines, needles, and records) .

Le chien « Nipper »

« Nipper » est le nom de ce petit fox-terrier qui semble écouter « la voix de son Maître » sortant du pavillon d'un gramophone. Ce chien a vraiment existé ! Né en 1884, à Bristol, en Angleterre, il tient son nom du fait qu'il aimait bien mordiller les jambes des visiteurs. Lorsque son Maître Mark Barraud est décédé, en 1887, « Nipper » a été donné à Francis James Barraud (1856-1924) , frère du 1er, et peintre de son état. Il remarqua que « Nipper » semblait médusé devant les sons qui sortaient du pavillon d'un phonographe. Il faut croire que cette image est restée gravée dans la mémoire du peintre car, 3 ans après la mort de « Nipper » (1895) , il coucha sur une toile : « Un chien regardant et écoutant un phonographe » .

En 1899, Barraud rebaptisa son œuvre « la voix de son Maître » et tenta, en vain, de l'exposer à l'Académie royale. Il n'eut pas plus de chance auprès de divers magazines. On lui répondait que personne ne saurait ce que le chien était en train de faire. Les gens d'« Edison-Bell » lui firent remarquer, avec beaucoup de réalisme mais peu de doigté, que les chiens n'écoutent pas les phonographes ! L'œuvre était trop sombre à leur goût et ils lui suggérèrent d'y mettre un peu de couleur. Suivant ce conseil, Barraud demanda à la « Gramophone Company » de Londres de lui prêter un pavillon en cuivre afin d'en orner sa peinture. Le directeur, William Barry Owen, lui offrit d'acheter son œuvre s'il peignait, à la place de l'appareil à cylindre, un gramophone qu'il allait lui prêter. Le 4 octobre 1899, Francis Barraud reçut £ 100 pour l'œuvre et les droits d'auteur.

La « Gramophone Company » s'en servit pour la 1re fois dans une publicité qui parut en janvier 1900. Lors d'une visite à Londres, Emile Berliner en obtint de Barry Owen les droits pour l'Amérique et fit enregistrer le logo de « Nipper » et le nom « His Master's Voice » , le 16 juillet 1900. Le logo apparaît sur les 1ers disques fabriqués à Montréal par Berliner et sera utilisé par la « Victor Talking Machine » , dès sa création en 1902. En Europe, la « Gramophone Company » en fait finalement sa marque de commerce, en 1908. Le logo sera utilisé dans plusieurs pays du monde, par la suite. « Nipper » demeurera un des symboles corporatifs les plus célèbres jusqu'au début des années 1970.

La peinture originale de Francis James Barraud est maintenant conservée dans l'édifice de « EMI Music » , sur Gloucester Place à Londres. Sous un certain éclairage, on peut encore apercevoir le phonographe original sous les couches de peinture. Quant à « Nipper » , il est enterré dans le jardin d'une petite boutique sur Eden Street, à Kingston-on-the-Thames.

La marque « Pathé-Marconi », plus connue sous son ancienne appellation « La Voix de son Maître » est symbolisée depuis le début du XXe siècle par le tableau du peintre Francis James Barraud : un petit chien face au pavillon du gramophone.

Après la mort, en 1887, et dans une extrême pauvreté de son grand frère Mark, décorateur de théâtre, le peintre Francis Barraud recueille chez lui, à Liverpool, 2 choses importantes :

Le petit chien de son aîné, surnommé « Nipper » (Gloucester, 1884 - Bristol, 1895) . Un « bull-terrier » avec des traces de « fox-terrier », « Nipper » avait ainsi été nommé pour son habitude de mordre les jarrets des visiteurs.

Un jour qu'il faisait marcher ce phonographe, il remarqua l'intérêt du chien qui semblait reconnaître l'appareil. Il peint cette scène touchante puis délaisse cette toile qu'il se décide à terminer en 1898, 3 ans après la mort de l'animal (à croire que cette scène l'avait fortement marqué !).

Le 11 février 1899, Francis met un « copyright » sur la peinture originale et la nomme « Dog looking at and listening to a Phonograph », puis « His master's voice » ; il tente sans succès de la présenter à l'Académie royale, puis la propose à des magazines, toujours sans succès (l'argument donné étant que personne ne comprendrait ce que fait le chien) . Il continue avec « The Edison Bell Company », et retourne à la maison encore bredouille. (Les chiens n'écoutent pas les phonographes.) On lui suggère de repeindre le pavillon couleur or, ce qui lui donne l'idée de se rendre à la toute nouvelle « Gramophone Company » de Londres, pour y emprunter un pavillon de bronze. Pour argumenter son emprunt, il emmène avec lui une photographie de ladite peinture (c'est tout ce qui reste du tableau d'origine, puisque la seconde version a été peinte sur la 1re) . Le directeur, William Barry Owen, s'en portera acquéreur, ainsi que des droits (le tout pour £ 100) , le 4 octobre 1899, à la condition que le phonographe soit remplacé par un gramophone (ce qui introduit une ineptie technique : le gramophone ne permet pas d'enregistrer et donc d'écouter la voix de son Maître, à moins que celui-ci soit chanteur, ce qui n'était pas le cas de Mark - mais pourrait l'être d'un chanteur propriétaire de chien) . Cette seconde toile connaîtra la renommée que l'on sait : le petit « bull » va remplacer la marque de fabrique précédente de la firme, un petit ange gravant un disque avec une plume. La scène et la marque « His master's voice » seront adoptés comme image de marque, dès 1900, aux États-Unis puis, progressivement, dans toute l'Europe. C'est aujourd'hui l'un des logotypes les plus connus dans le monde.

Francis Barraud passa le plus clair du reste de sa vie à peindre 24 copies de son original (on a rêvé mieux pour un artiste que de se recopier sans cesse) . Le tableau est aujourd'hui au siège de la compagnie « EMI » à Hayes (dans le Middlesex) . Quant à « Nipper », sa dépouille est enterrée à Kingston-upon-Thames, Surrey (où il avait passé le reste de sa vie avec la veuve de son 1er Maître) , dans un petit parc entouré de magnolias. Lorsque la Lloyds y installa plus tard une succursale, une plaque commémorative en bronze fut posée sur les murs du bâtiment.

Né à Bristol en 1884 , encore que les historiens n'aient jamais établi la date exacte, le chien « Nipper » n'était pas de race pure mais il avait en lui une forte proportion de « fox-terrier » . En tout cas il avait hérité des caractères de la race car, paraît-il, il était toujours partant pour une bagarre avec un autre chien, et selon des témoignages dignes de foi, quand il tenait le morceau, il était très difficile de lui faire lâcher prise. Un de ses passe-temps préférés était de pourchasser les rats, ce qui lui valut de perdre un œil dans un buisson d'épines lors d'une de ces chasses. Il lui arriva même de braconner un faisan dans le parc de Richmond.

« Nipper » eut comme 1er Maître l'acteur Marc Henri Barraud qui exerçait son art à Bristol. Il ne quittait jamais son Maître et il l'accompagnait même sur la scène. À la mort de l'acteur, « Nipper » s'attacha au frère de ce dernier, le peintre Francis James Barraud avec qui il vécut de nombreuses années. « Nipper » mourut en 1895 et reposerait, dit-on, sous un mûrier dans le village de Kingston-on-Thames.

Une vie de chien ordinaire en somme pour un animal que rien ne prédisposait à une gloire universelle, fût-elle posthume ...

En 1899, Francis Barraud, qui était un peintre de talent ou tout au moins un bon professionnel de la peinture, imagina de peindre un tableau représentant un chien écoutant un phonographe. Il se souvint qu'il possédait une photo de « Nipper » , disparu quelques années avant. Barraud racontait qu'il se souvenait de l'étonnement de « Nipper » quand il faisait marcher son phonographe à cylindres. La 1re version de l'œuvre représente donc le chien devant un phonographe « Edison Bell » à cylindres. Il intitula sa toile de façon ô combien appropriée :

« His Master's Voice » !

Mais le pavillon noir peu esthétique ne plaisait pas à Barraud qui chercha à se procurer un modèle de pavillon plus décoratif pour agrémenter son œuvre. Il se rendit donc, avec une photo de son tableau à la « Gramophone Company » pour essayer d'emprunter un pavillon plus esthétique (Barraud ne peignait jamais sans modèle) . Lorsqu'il vit la photo du tableau, Barry Owen, directeur de la compagnie, demanda au peintre si sa toile était à vendre et s'il pouvait remplacer le phono à cylindres par un appareil de leur fabrication. Francis Barraud accepta la proposition et se fit prêter un « Gramophone » à pavillon de laiton pour modifier son tableau.

Le 15 septembre, Barry Owen, pas chiche, offrait à Barraud la somme de £ 100 pour son tableau modifié ! « Nipper » apparut bientôt sur tous les disques et toutes les publicités de la marque et devint ainsi, post-mortem, le chien le plus célèbre du monde.

Au cours des années 1890, à la mort de son frère (le décorateur de théâtre Marc Barraud) l'artiste anglais Francis James Barraud a recueilli son petit fox-terrier « Nipper » et hérité de son phonographe.

Un jour qu'il faisait marcher ce phonographe, il remarqua l'intérêt du chien qui écoutait avec curiosité et semblait reconnaître l'appareil. Il a peint cette scène touchante et intitulé son tableau : « His Master's Voice » .

Francis Barraud amena sa peinture chez « Edison-Bell » et leur proposa de l'acheter (après tout, c'était leur phonographe qui était peint) . Mais chez « Edison » , on refusa l'achat, en argumentant que : « les chiens n'écoutent pas les phonographes » .

On conseilla à monsieur Barraud de remettre sa peinture au goût du jour en la repeignant avec un gramophone de dernier modèle.

Il alla donc en emprunter un à la récemment formée « Gramophone Company » de Londres, dirigée par William Barry Owen. Pour le remercier il montra son tableau terminé à monsieur Owen, qui décida immédiatement de le lui acheter avec tous ses droits.

Ainsi, le 15 septembre 1899, la « Gramophone Company » offrait £ 100 à Francis Barraud : £ 50 pour la peinture et £ 50 pour les droits de reproduction.

La peinture originale est aujourd'hui exposée à Hayes (dans le Middlesex) , dans les bureaux de « EMI » , le successeur de la « Gramophone Company » .

Le petit fox-terrier remplaça la marque de fabrique précédente de la firme, un petit ange gravant un disque avec une plume. La scène et la marque « His Master's Voice » furent adoptés comme image de marque dès 1900, aux États-Unis, puis progressivement dans toute l'Europe.

Le tableau a été enregistré à titre de marque commerciale au Canada (inscrite en vertu d'une Loi sur le Parlement, le 28 mai 1900) . La « Victor Talking Machine Company » a commencé à l'utiliser en tant que marque de commerce, en 1902 ; et la « Gramophone Company » a fait de même, en 1909.

(Image) Le certificat de propriété intellectuelle américain (n° 34,690) pour la marque « His Master's Voice » , déposée par Emile Berliner, le 10 juillet 1900.

Le logo a été repris durant des dizaines d'années. Les campagnes l'utilisant ou l'adaptant ont été des succès.

C'est ainsi que « Nipper » devint ainsi le chien le plus célèbre du monde !

Francis Barraud déclara, en 1916, dans la publication « The Strand » :

« Si “ Nipper ” savait cela, il agiterait fièrement sa petite queue. Il ne savait pas qu’il rentrerait dans l’histoire. Moi non plus d’ailleurs. “ Nipper ” semble vouloir continuer d’écouter pour l’éternité. »

...

« Nipper » est un petit « Jack Russell Terrier » , né en 1884. Il eut pour 1er Maître, Marc Henri Barraud, un acteur anglais originaire de Bristol mais, à la mort de l'acteur, c'est son frère, le peintre Francis James Barraud qui devint son plus fidèle ami.

Barry Owen directeur de la compagnie « Gramophone » lui demanda de remplacer le phono à cylindres par un de leurs appareils et lui acheta la toile pour la modique somme de £ 100.

Dès 1900, son image fut apposée sur tout les disques et toutes les publicités de la marque, il devint un des chiens les plus célèbres du globe.

« Nipper » serait enterré à Kingston-upon-Thames, Surrey, entouré de magnolias.

...

D'après la « BBC » , « Nipper » est un petit « Jack Russell Terrier » .

À Liverpool, le peintre anglais Francis James Barraud (1856-1924) photographie le chien de son défunt grand-frère Mark, surnommé « Nipper » (né en 1884) . Il en adapte une peinture et y ajoute le phonographe à cylindre de Thomas Edison (hérité de Mark) , commercialisé en Angleterre depuis 1877 (la 1re machine parlante) . « Nipper » écoute ainsi attentivement « la voix de son Maître » .

Francis Barraud se rend, en 1899, au siège de la toute jeune « Gramophone Company » pour essayer de vendre le tableau. William Barry Owen, le directeur, achète les droits, à condition que le phonographe à cylindres d'Edison soit remplacé par le modèle à disque de l'allemand Emile Berliner, qui vient de le breveter en Angleterre. Après sa démonstration de 1888, à Philadelphie, Emile Berliner s'attache en effet à développer l'exploitation commerciale aux États-Unis de son invention. Il se heurte à la concurrence du « Phonographe » à cylindres d'Edison, qui a pris de l'avance sur le marché, et connaît un bon succès malgré ses inconvénients.

Emile Berliner a mis au point un appareil simple lisant les disques de 30 centimètres, et lui invente le nom de « Gramophone » (avec un seul M) . Il fonde, en 1893, la « United States Gramophone Company » , à Washington, et fonde avec Owen la « Gramophone Company » de Londres, qui adopte « Nipper » (« His Master's Voice ») .

La demande de disque devenant importante, il se tourne vers l'Allemagne et sa ville natale : Hanovre. Pendant que Emile Berliner restait aux États-Unis, son frère Joseph prend en main les destinées de l'usine de Hanovre, qu'ils ont fondée tous 2, en 1881, sous le nom de « J. Berliner Telephonfabrik » .

Dépositaires en Europe des brevets du phonographe d'Edison, les frères Emile et Charles Pathé fondent, en 1896, la « Cie Gale des Phonographes » , à Paris. Les lers disques sont à l'effigie du Coq gaulois. En même temps, en 1898, est constitué à Paris la « Compagnie Française du Gramophone » , filiale française de la « Gramophone Company » britannique, dont les produits sont sous l'étiquette de « La Voix de Son Maître » .

Les frères Berliner fondent, en décembre 1898, la Société « Deutsche Grammophon » (avec 2 M) et débute une production à grande échelle. La famille Berliner manquant de capitaux, la Société est transformée, en 1900, en Société par actions. Actionnaires : les frères Berliner, l' « Orpheus Musikwerke » de Leipzig, et la « Gramophone Company » de Londres. Cette dernière Société, qui avait été créée par Emile Berliner, prend le contrôle de « Deutsche Grammophon » et lui fournit l'essentiel de son catalogue d'enregistrements. L'usine de Hanovre devient ainsi propriété anglaise. Le siège est transféré à Berlin, et des filiales sont créées en Russie et en Autriche.

Pendant la guerre de 1914-1918, les actions de « Deutsche Grammophon » , Société anglaise, sont rachetées par la « Polyphon Musikwerke » de Leipzig. Les contrats la liant avec la « Gramophone Company » de Londres sont rompus. « Deutsche Grammophon » doit donc reconstituer tout son catalogue.

Pour des raisons de concentration industrielle, la « Compagnie Générale des Phonographes » fusionne, en 1936, avec la « Compagnie Internationale du Gramophone » , quelques temps après l'absorption par cette dernière de la « Columbia Gramophone Company » . Les bases des « Electrical and Musical Industries » (« EMI ») sont ainsi jetées. La Société « Pathé » , devenue « Pathé-Marconi » , publie sous son nom les grandes réalisations de « La Voix de Son Maître » . La « Deutsche Grammophon » continue à produire ses disques sous l'étiquette de « La Voix de Son Maître » , qui est le sien depuis son association avec la « Gramophone » anglaise. Mais cette étiquette ne peut plus servir à l'étranger où il est l'exclusivité de la maison de Londres. La marque « Polydor » est créée pour l'exportation. En 1941, la firme « Siemens » rachète toutes les parts de la « Deutsche Grammophon » . Après la défaite de l'Allemagne, l'administration d'occupation anglaise accorde la licence indispensable pour que l'usine de Hanovre puisse redémarrer, en 1946.

En 1949, l'étiquette utilisée en Allemagne est cédée à « Electrola » , et les disques Classiques de « Deutsche Grammophon » portent le nouveau logo jaune avec sa couronne de tulipes. Les disques « DGG » étaient diffusés avant la Deuxième Guerre mondiale sur l'étiquette noir et or « Polydor » . Les lers microsillons « DGG » sont diffusés en France par la « Société Phonographique Philips » .

À partir de 1956, « DGG » crée sa propre Société française de diffusion, qui prend comme nom celui de l'ancienne marque de disques « Polydor » .

Les droits sur la marque « Nipper et le Gramophone » , et « La Voix de son Maître » sont détenus par 3 compagnies : sommairement, il s'agit de « EMI » (à l'origine, « Electric & Musical Industries Ltd. ») , « JVC » (« Japanese Victor Company ») , et « GE » (« General Electric Company ») .

« GE » commença a avoir des droits avec la « Victor Talking Machine Company » , dont « RCA » pris le contrôle, en mars 1929. Cette Société fut renommée « RCA Victor Company » , en décembre 1929, devenant une filiale de « RCA » qui devint donc propriétaire du logo du chien. En 1985, mouvements amenant à la fusion entre « GE » et « RCA » . La fusion fut terminée en juin 1986 : « GE » hérite donc des droits de « RCA » sur les 2 marques.

Les compagnies propriétaires des marques décident d'autoriser des licences d'utilisation, en gardant la propriété des marques.

La plus importante licence fut accordée, en 1986-1987, par « GE » : la « RCA Records Division » a été vendue à la Société allemande « Bertelsmann AG » , et « RCA/Victor Electronics Division » vendue au géant français de l'électronique « Thomson SA » . Ces Sociétés sont autorisées à utiliser les marques du chien et du gramophone et la marque « His Master's Voice » sur leurs produits sur tous les territoires où « GE » a cédé ses droits. Depuis, la compagnie « Thomson » est très active dans la production de souvenirs sur « Nipper » .

« Nipper » (1884-1895) was a dog who served as the model for a painting titled « His Master's Voice » . This image was the basis for the dog-and-gramophone logo used by several audio recording and associated brands : « Victor Talking Machine Company » , « His Master's Voice » , « HMV » , « EMI » , « RCA » , « RCA Victor » , « Victrola » , « Zonophone » , « JVC » and « Deutsche Grammophon » .

« Nipper » was born in 1884, in Bristol, England, and died in September 1895. It has been claimed in various sources that he was a « Jack Russell Terrier » , a « Fox Terrier » , or « part Bull Terrier » . He was named « Nipper » because he would bite the backs of visitors' legs.

« Nipper » originally lived with his owner, Mark Henry Barraud, in the Prince's Theatre where Barraud was a scenery designer. When Barraud died, in 1887, his brothers Philip and Francis took care of the dog. « Nipper » himself died in 1895 and was buried in Kingston-upon-Thames, on Clarence Street, in a small park surrounded by magnolia trees. As time progressed, the area was built upon, and a branch of Lloyds Bank now occupies the site. On the wall of the bank, just inside the entrance, a brass plaque commemorates the terrier that lies beneath the building.

On 10 March 2010, a small road near to the dog's resting place, in Kingston-upon-Thames, was named « Nipper Alley » , in commemoration of this resident.

In 1898, 3 years after « Nipper » 's death, Francis James Barraud, his last owner and brother of his 1st owner, painted a picture of « Nipper » listening intently to a wind-up « Edison-Bell » cylinder phonograph. Thinking the « Edison-Bell Company » located in New Jersey, USA, might find it useful, he presented it to James E. Hough, who promptly said :

« Dogs don't listen to phonographs. »

On May 31, 1899, Barraud went to the Maiden Lane offices of « The Gramophone Company » with the intention of borrowing a brass horn to replace the original black horn on the painting. Manager William Barry Owen (who later lived on Martha's Vineyard and has a town park named for him in Vineyard Haven) suggested that, if the artist replaced the machine with a « Berliner » disc gramophone, the company would buy the painting. The image became the successful trademark of the « Victor » and « HMV » record labels ; « HMV » music stores ; and « RCA » , after the acquisition of the « Victor Company » , in 1929. The trademark was registered by Berliner for use in the United States, on July 10, 1900.

The slogan « His Master's Voice » , along with the painting, was sold to « The Gramophone Company » for £ 100 : £ 50 pounds for the copyright ; and £ 50 for the painting itself. Francis Barraud said :

« It is difficult to say how the idea came to me beyond that fact that it suddenly occurred to me that to have my dog listening to the phonograph, with an intelligent and rather puzzled expression, and call it “ His Master's Voice ” would make an excellent subject. We had a phonograph and I often noticed how puzzled he was to make-out where the voice came from. It certainly was the happiest thought I ever had. »

The original oil painting hung in the « EMI » board room in Hayes, Middlesex, for many years.

Logo variations :

1910 : « Deutsche Grammophon » logo on Swedish disc.

1910 : « British Gramophone Company » .

1921 : « Victor Talking Machine Company » ad.

The revised painting substitutes a disc gramophone :

« RCA Nipper » logo introduced in 1977.

« JVC/RCA Victor Nipper » logo.

« HMV Nipper » logo.

(Image) The « Nipper » stained glass atop the « Nipper Building » : the former « RCA Building » No. 17, Camden, New Jersey.

The iconic image of a mixed fox/bull terrier, « Nipper », looking into a phonograph became an international symbol of quality and excellence for the « Victor Talking Machine Company ». « Nipper » lives on through the brand names ; he even appeared in ads on television with his « son », a puppy named « Chipper » who was added to the « RCA » family, in 1991. Real dogs continue to play the roles of « Nipper » and « Chipper », but « Chipper » has to be replaced much more frequently, since his character is a puppy.

« Nipper » continues to be the mascot of « HMV » stores in countries where the entertainment retailer has the rights to him. Both « RCA Records » and « EMI » have de-emphasized « Nipper » in the global music market due to the fragmented ownership of the trademark.

« Victor Company of Japan » (JVC) also uses a version of the dog and trumpet logo within Japan, which includes the « His Master's Voice » slogan. « HMV » is not allowed to use « Nipper », in Canada and Japan.

A huge, 4-ton « Nipper » can be seen on the roof of the old RTA (former RCA distributor) building now owned by « Arnoff Moving & Storage » and located at 991 Broadway in Albany, New York. A 2nd slightly smaller one, after spending many years on private property in Merrifield, Virginia, perched over Lee Highway (U.S. Route 29) , has now been returned to Baltimore, Maryland, where it originally graced the former « RCA Building », on Russell Street. « Nipper » now sits atop the « Maryland Historical Society » building at Park Avenue and West Centre Street, in Baltimore. Though smaller than the Albany « Nipper », Baltimore's is the only one of the 2 to include a gramophone for « Nipper » to listen to. The Baltimore « Nipper » was saved when the Virginia site where he briefly resided was sold to developers. It is currently the location of a group of town homes. The street leading to the development is named « Nipper Way ».

A small statue of « Nipper » can be seen perched above a door-way in the « Merchant Venturers Building », on the corner of Park Row and Woodland Road, in Bristol ; this building, part of the University of Bristol, stands near the site of the old Prince's Theatre.

« Nipper » was a stray dog found, in 1884, by Mark Barraud in Bristol, United Kingdom. When Mark died, 3 years later, « Nipper » (so named because of his tendency to nip the backs of visitors' legs) was taken to Liverpool by Mark's younger brother Francis James, who was a painter.

« Nipper » discovered the phonograph (a cylinder recording and playing machine) and Francis Barraud often noticed how puzzled he was to make-out where the voice came from. This scene must have been indelibly printed in Barraud's brain, for it was 3 years after « Nipper » died (in September 1895) that he committed it to canvas.

In its original form, completed in early 1899, the picture showed the dog listening to a phonograph with a black horn. This is the version which was submitted for copyright by Francis Barraud, on 11 February 1899, under the title « Dog looking at and listening to a phonograph ». Later, Barraud decided to rename the painting « His Master's Voice » . Barraud tried to exhibit it at the Royal Academy, but was turned down. He had no more luck trying to offer it for reproduction in magazines.

« No one would know what the dog was doing. » , was given as the reason !

Next on Barraud's list was the « Edison Bell Company » (leading manufacturer of the cylinder phonograph) , but again without success.

« Dogs don't listen to phonographs. » , the Company said.

A friend then suggested that Barraud could make the picture more attractive by replacing the black horn with a more modern brass one - and this might better his opportunity for a sale. Barraud visited the newly formed « Gramophone Company » , with a photograph of his painting and a request to borrow a brass horn to use as a model. The manager of the « Gramophone Company » , Gary Owen, liked the painting and offered to buy it if Barraud replaced the phonograph with a « Berliner Gramophone » for the Edison cylinder machine. The artist made the changes and the revised painting was delivered on 17 October 1899.

At his visit to London, in May 1900, Emile Berliner (the German-born and Washington-based inventor of the flat-disc record and the gramophone) saw the painting hanging on the wall in Owen's office, in the « Gramophone Company » . Berliner contacted Barraud and asked him to make a copy of the painting which he brought back to the United States and immediately sought a trademark for it, granted by the patent office, on July 10, 1900. Berliner passed the trademark on to his partner Eldridge R. Johnson (with whom he had worked on improving the gramophone) . Johnson's Company, the « Victor Talking Machine » , extended the trademark protection to Central and South America, the Far-East and Japan.

Advertising in the United States, the « Nipper » logo appeared on Johnson's « Victor Talking Machine » sales promotion novelties ; on letter headings ; on « Victor Record » catalogs ; and on the paper labels of the discs. It became the brand logo also of the « Gramophone Company » , in England, and it appeared on all Company literature. Although the « Gramophone Company » already had an icon (the « Recording Angel ») , the dog and trumpet appeared on all « Gramophone Record » labels.

In germany, the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » (DGG) introduced the logo with the german translation :

« Die stimme des Herrn »

These affiliations lasted roughly until the end of World War II. The icon survived the merger of « Victor » with « RCA » , in 1929.

Francis James Barraud

Au cours des années 1890, l'artiste anglais Francis James Barraud a peint un portrait du chien de son frère, « Nipper », écoutant un phonographe avec curiosité. Barraud espérait vendre la peinture à une compagnie de phonographes, mais aucune ne s'est montrée intéressée à l'acheter. On lui a suggéré alors de changer la couleur noire du pavillon et de donner à celui-ci un fini laiton. Il s'est rendu au bureau de la « Gramophone Company », à Londres, pour emprunter une machine afin de l'utiliser comme modèle. Il a expliqué sa démarche en montrant une photo de sa peinture. Le directeur, Barry Owen, a aimé la peinture et lui a demandé si elle était à vendre. Barraud lui a dit qu'elle était effectivement à vendre. Owen s'est dit prêt à l'acheter si le peintre pouvait remplacer le phonographe (à cylindre) par un gramophone (à disque plat) .

Lorsque Emile Berliner s'est rendu en Angleterre, en mai 1900, et qu'il a vu le portrait, il l'a aussitôt enregistré comme marque commerciale : aux États-Unis, le 26 mai ; et au Canada, le 16 juillet. La « Victor Talking Machine Company » a commencé à en faire sa marque de commerce, en 1902, et la « Gramophone Company » a fait de même, en 1909.

La peinture originale est exposée dans les bureaux de « EMI », le successeur de la « Gramophone Company ». Il s'agit de l'une des marques de commerce les plus reconnues et les plus précieuses du monde entier.

« If “ Nipper ” only knew that, he would wag his little stumpy tail so proudly. He did not know he was going to be handed down to posterity. No more did I. “ Nipper ” bids fair to go on listening into the ages. » (Francis James Barraud)

(« Si “ Nipper ” savait cela, il agiterait fièrement sa petite queue. Il ne savait pas qu'il passerait à l'histoire. Moi non plus d'ailleurs. “ Nipper ” semble vouloir continuer à écouter pour l'éternité. »)

The English painter and photographer Francis James Barraud was born on 16 June 1856 in Liverpool, England. His most famous painting, « His Master's Voice », is one of the most well-known commercial logos in the world, having inspired the music industry trademark depicting a dog (« Nipper ») and phonograph, which is used by several corporations, including « HMV », « RCA », and « JVC » .

The painting « His Master's Voice » originally showed the dog (who had, in fact, died some years previously) listening to a cylinder phonograph. This was a rare model, electrically driven and housed in a distinctive round-cornered case, known as the « Edison Commercial Phonograph » and produced by Edison's factory exclusively for the British market ; Barraud probably derived the idea of purchasing this model from Hubert von Herkomer who kept a similar machine in his studio. Barraud, afterwards, replaced the phonograph with a disc-machine on the suggestion of William Barry Owen of « The Gramophone Company » who, then, bought the picture. It was used in advertising by the « Gramophone Company » and by its U.S. Equivalent « Victor » and became one of the world's best-known trade marks, although it did not appear on British record labels until 1909.

« Nipper » was born in 1884 in Bristol, England, and died in September 1895. In the oil painting, once kept in the « EMI » board room in Hayes, Middlesex, « Nipper » and the gramophone were depicted on a polished surface with a curved front - supposedly it was his Master's coffin with the dog listening to Francis Barraud's painting of a fox-terrier to an early gramophone remains one of the oldest and best-known of trademarks and records logos. It was a brilliantly conceived piece of commercial art that has become one of the worlds most recognised trade marks.

« Nipper » was a stray dog found by Mark Barraud (Francis James Barraud's brother) , in 1884. He was called « Nipper » because he a habit of nipping at the back legs of any visitors. « Nipper » became Francis' pet, 3 years later when Mark died. The iconic « His Master's Voice » painting was made some time before 1899, although in the original « Nipper » was listening to an Edison phonograph.

On May 31, 1899, Barraud went to the Maiden Lane offices of « The Gramophone Company » with the intention of borrowing a brass horn to replace the original black horn on the painting. Manager William Barry Owen suggested that, if the artist replaced the machine with a « Berliner » disc gramophone, the Company would buy the painting. Since then, « Nipper » has been the face of a huge global brand the « His Master's Voice » painting is one of the most recognized trademarks in the world.

Francis James Barraud was born into a family of artists in London. He studied art at the Royal Academy School and in Antwerp. An accomplished technician, he was a frequent exhibitor at the Royal Academy and else where. One of his early works, « An encore Too Many » , is displayed in the Liverpool Walker Art Gallery, and the painting « His Master's Voice » brought him world-wide fame.

Barraud was never to recapture that success, however and by 1913, he was in financial straits. When he learned of this situation, Alfred Clark commissioned Barraud to paint a copy of « His Master's Voice » for the « Victor Company » . Thereafter, Barraud painted a total of 24 copies of his most famous work. In recognition of these services, the « Gramophone » and « Victor » Companies paid Barraud a pension. « His Master's Voice » remains one of the world's best-known trademarks.

Francis Barraud died in his 69th year, on 29 August 1924, having painted some 24 copies of his most famous work, commissioned by the « Gramophone » and « Victor » Companies for their branch-offices around the world.

Barraud was unlucky not to gain the copyrights of the modified « Nipper » painting, instead, he received 2 payments of £ 50 each. The 1st gave the Company sole reproduction rights, while the 2nd transferred Barraud's copyright to the « Gramophone Company Ltd. » . The original painting hangs in the offices of « EMI » , the successor of the « Gramophone Company » .

Francis James Barraud was born in Liverpool, England, on 16 June 1856, and came from a family of painters. His father, Henry (1811-1874) , had been a noted painter. And his Uncle William, Henry's older brother, had also been a noted painter. Most of their works covered wildlife, fox-hunting and the horses known as bay hunters. In fact, William and Henry collaborated on a number of paintings which were featured on various sporting magazine covers which, for better or worse, helped popularize fox hunting, before William's untimely death, in 1850.

Francis followed in his father's footsteps as did his older brother, Mark. Francis studied 1st at the Royal Academy Schools, then, at Heatherley's Art School, in London, and, finally, at Beaux-Arts in Antwerp, Belgium. Francis became a scenic artist while Mark eked-out a living painting stage sets. Francis originally set about painting scenes of fox-hunting producing his own « Bay Hunter » but, soon, branched-out into other areas. Francis, however, could not achieve his father's fame. Even today, many Henry Barraud portraits can be found on the internet (as can William's) but those of his son, with one notable exception, which we will be investigating at length, are very hard to come by. Times were changing and Henry was worried that his sons would not be able to find rich patrons to fund their art. But Francis was not deterred and continued trying to forge his own style and identity as an artist and found a degree of popularity with his oil paintings and watercolors.

Like many serious painters, Francis Barraud made money on the side as an illustrator. And like many serious painters, he found such work somewhat demeaning but it paid bills. His handy work as an illustrator for an 1882 edition of « Routledge's Every Girl's Annual » where he did both cover and inside pictures are quite lovely and competent.

Mark Barraud, however, lived on the edge of poverty, never achieving as much fame as his father or even the nominal fame of his brother. Life was not easy for him as a result and he was given to hard living, particularly drink, which took a toll on his health.

Sometime, in 1883 or 1884, a mixed « Bull / Fox-Terrier » (although it may have been part « Jack Russell Terrier ») was born somewhere around Bristol, England. He was a plucky little stray puppy when Mark Barraud encountered him, in 1884, while out on a jaunt. He took the dog home to his wife and they found him a faithful companion with the tendency to nip at backs of visitors' legs so they named the dog « Nipper » . For 3 years, Barraud and « Nipper » were man and man's best friend. Poverty and ill health, however, caught-up with Barraud and he died in Bristol, in 1887, at age 39. « Nipper » was taken to Liverpool, Lancashire where Francis lived.

Francis Barraud quickly became fond of « Nipper » whom he found amiable, curious and intelligent. He would take « Nipper » to the Richmond Park and the dog would frolic and chase other animals, once killing a pheasant that Barraud had not the chutzpah to tuck under his arm.

While Barraud was in his studio, working on a painting, he would play his phonograph, a cylinder machine. He got the idea from his noted contemporary Sir Hubert von Herkomer (1849-1914) who kept such a machine in his studio to set his subjects at ease while they posed. « Nipper » 's natural curiosity got the best of him and he would sit close to the horn speaker, ears pricked-up, ticking his head from side-to-side as he listened to the mysterious sounds and voices issue forth from the bell. To Barraud, it seemed as though the dog might have thought the voice coming from the horn was that of Mark Barraud.

« I had often noticed how puzzled he was to make-out where the voice came from. » , Francis later stated.

The image stayed with him.

In 1895, « Nipper » went to Kingston-upon-Thames, in Surrey, to keep company to Mark Barraud's widow but, alas, he died in September of that year, at the age of 11 or 12. He was buried in Kingston-upon-Thames.

3 years later, Francis Barraud was back in his studio listening to his phonograph when he thought of « Nipper » staring intently into the bell of the speaker horn. He remembered how he fancied that « Nipper » might have thought he was hearing his dead former owner. He began to work on a new painting depicting that scene. He painted « Nipper » seated before a cylinder-player staring into the bell.

Barraud titled the work « Dog Looking at and Listening to a Phonograph » and registered the painting under that title, in February of 1898. Going with his original impression of the dog hearing his dead Master's voice, Barraud retitled the painting : « His Master's Voice » . If this was in hopes that the Royal Academy would exhibit the work, Barraud was sadly mistaken. They turned him away. Barraud hoped to get « His Master's Voice » published in a few magazines but they said the painting did not make sense. Barraud went to the « Edison Bell Company » who made the phonograph seen in the painting. They were not interested in purchasing it because, they told him, « dogs don't listen to phonographs » (weird reasoning when « Nipper » did, indeed, listen to it and they could have easily told customers as a sales gimmick that if the machine can fool a dog's sharp ears imagine how real it must sound) .

A friend of Barraud's told him the horn was too dark to be properly seen and a nice golden brass one might spice-up the picture. Barraud saw the logic and thought the whole painting should be lighter. He called on the newly-formed « Gramophone Company » , at Maiden Lane, and spoke to the Company president, William Barry Owen, requesting a golden horn attachment for loan. Barraud showed Owen the painting and what changes he wanted to make. Owen, in turn, needed a trademark for his Company, knowing how important a good distinctive trademark is to the success of a business. Barraud recalled, years later, that Owen asked him if the painting was for sale and if he would mind changing the phonograph to a gramophone. This was, of course, precisely what Barraud was hoping for and replied that the painting was, indeed, for sale and immediately set to work the revising the picture as requested having secured a gramophone from the Company to employ as a model. When he finished the painting, Barraud dropped it off at Maiden Lane and waited nervously for a response.

He got one when a letter arrived from the « Gramophone Company » offices, on the 15th of September 1899, offering Barraud £ 50 for reproduction rights ; and another £ 50 for the artist's copyright. In short, they offered him £ 100 for the work. Not at all a bad sum in those days (in fact, not at all a bad sum these days, just ask any struggling artist) and Barraud happily and gratefully accepted. The « Gramophone Company » was now the legal owner of the painting and the image on it and Barraud, no doubt, did a bit of celebrating with his £ 100. Did he ever dare to guess how famous that painting would become ?

By the way, a few sources say that « Nipper » and gramophone are poised atop a coffin and that is why he thinks he hears his Master's voice coming from the horn. Other sources say that this is not true ; both subjects are depicted seated on a table-top in Barraud's studio. I'll leave that to the reader to decide which story sounds better.

« His Master's Voice » turned-up on the cover of a « Victor » catalog, dated January 1900. There were a few promotional items that also bore the image such as needle tins.

That year, the great inventor Emile Berliner, Owen's boss, came to Britain and requested that American and Canadian rights to the painting be granted to him as the inventor of the recording disc and gramophone. Owen sold Berliner the rights. Berliner's records were recorded only on the label side while the flip-side bore « His Master's Voice » .

The next year, Berliner requested the copyright go to the « Victor Talking Machine Company » . Owen obliged. « Victor » began putting « His Master's Voice » on their record labels, by 1902.

With « Victor » owning copyrights on « His Master's Voice » , « Victor of Japan » requested Japanese rights to the painting be granted to « Victor » 's Japanese subsidiary, in 1904. Owen sold « Victor of Japan » those rights. Latin America would also request its rights to the picture. The « Gramophone Company » letterhead began featuring « His Master's Voice » , in 1907. By 1909, the Commonwealth nations of Britain starting using « His Master's Voice » as a label. The following year, the image and title were registered as trademarks by the « Gramophone Company » which then changed its name to « His Master's Voice » or just « HMV » .

In 1929, with the crash of Wall Street, « Edison Records » folded and « RCA » bought the « Victor Talking Machine Company » and became « RCA Victor » . They also bought the right to use « Nipper » as a trademark and « His Master's Voice » was synonymous with « RCA Victor » and one of the most recognized trademarks in America, up to 1968, when « Nipper » was dropped.

The « Red Seal » , « RCA Victor » 's Classical music label, was begun by the « Gramophone Co. » in England, in 1902, as Monarch. The difference between the red and black labels other than the color was that the « Red Seal » said « His Master's Voice » under the image, while the black label did not. Eventually, « Victor » was dropped from the « Red Seal » label even though it still was an « RCA Victor » enterprise due to some legal problems with « Japanese Victor » , which had taken over « Victor Entertainment » .

1931 was a bleak year when bad economic times across the globe caught-up with both « Columbia Gramophone » and « HMV » . They merged and incorporated as « Electrical and Musical Industries Ltd. » (« EMI ») . They built the 1st true dedicated recording studio that year, now known as the Abbey Road studio.

By 1968, « His Master's Voice » was dropped as « RCA Victor » 's trademark and logo. There was an outcry among consumers when « Nipper » went away and « RCA » was forced to reinstate the old trademark in 1976. « Nipper » was once again « RCA Victor » 's mascot by simply superimposing him on the new style labels.

As for Francis Barraud, he spent the last 25 years of his life painting, at least, 2 dozen different versions of « His Master's Voice » at « Victor » 's behest. Despite it being the only painting he would ever be known for, Barraud was far from displeased. He was an artist of the people and was not trying to paint Masterpieces, like his father. He was a working artist who had to sell paintings to make a living and they had to be depictions the average person would find charming not something a rich patron would hang on his wall. In fact, « His Master's Voice » may be the most recognizable piece of pop-art of all time and so, is a Masterpiece in its own right. Every Masterpiece has a deeper meaning and there does appear to be one here even if Barraud himself may have been unaware it.

That the painting became world-famous is one of those what-ifs. What if someone other than William Barry Owen had run the « Gramophone Company » and told Barraud to get lost and take his lousy painting with him ? What if Emile Berliner did not go to London, specifically to get the rights to use « His Master's Voice » as an American trademark ? He could have as easily told Owen to « can » the painting and get a different trademark but, instead, he wanted it for his own use. What if Mark Barraud had never met « Nipper » ? What if « Nipper » had not been sent to live with Francis, or if Francis had decided not to take him in ? What if « Nipper » had not found the phonograph so fascinating ? Barraud had loved « Nipper » and, even 2 decades after « Nipper » 's death, he was still bringing Barraud a comfortable income on which he and his wife could live-out their lives not to mention a Masterpiece known every bit as well as the Sistine Chapel or the Mona Lisa. Quite a reward for Barraud taking in the dog when he had no place else to go.

When looking for other art by Francis James Barraud, be careful not to confuse him with Francis Philip Barraud (1824-1901) , another British artist. He was the younger brother of Charles Decimus Barraud (1822-1897) , or C. D. Barraud, an Englishman who spent most of his adult life in New Zealand and painted many beautiful scenes of that land. He, in turn, should not be confused with Charles Barraud an artist who lived from 1535-1612. Likewise, don't confuse Henry Barraud, the British artist, with Henry Barraud, the French composer (1900-1997) . To make matters even more complicated, Francis and Mark had another brother named Philip, so don't confuse him with Francis Philip Barraud either.

« His Master's Voice » became one of the most recognized trademarks of our time. It has been reproduced in every conceivable form and been lampooned countless times. Somehow I doubt that Barraud would have been angered.

The man behind the « Gramophone Victrola » was not Emile Berliner, even though he invented it. The true genius behind it was Eldridge R. Johnson of Camden, New Jersey. He invented the spring-loaded mechanism that made the « Victrolas » go. Without this mechanism, the « Victrola » was a paper-weight. He patented the mechanism, and so, Berliner merged his Company with Johnson, after a Court ruled in Johnson's favor. By 1900, Johnson was manufacturing « Victor » discs. His tiny shop at 108 North Front Street was moved to more spacious quarters at Cooper and 2nd Streets. When this building could no longer handle the volume of work, a new facility was built at 1 Market Street, by the Camden port. Started in 1906, the facility was completed in 1916. It was a mini-city that pressed the discs but also developed new recording and communication technologies (the radio back-packs worn by the « Apollo » astronauts were developed here) . Building No. 17 of the facility dominated the skyline of the port and became iconic. In 1992, all production ceased at the facility and it was abandoned. It fell into ruin and many of the old buildings were torn down. Building No. 17 remained standing only because it was declared a landmark but was badly vandalized. Using investment tax credit, Building No. 17 was converted to a complex of 341 loft apartments owned by Dranoff Properties who acquired the building, in 2003, saving the structure from complete deterioration. The renovation cost an astonishing $ 65 million !

The tower of Building No. 17 contained huge stained-glass depictions of « His Master's Voice » , on all 4 sides. These were built by D'Acenzo Studios of Philadelphia, and installed in 1915. When « Nipper » was retired as the « RCA Victor » logo, in 1968, the windows were removed and replaced with plywood bearing the new logo. When public outcry forced the Company to reinstate « Nipper » as the logo, in 1976, D'Acenzo Studios built new windows that were exact replicas of the originals. After the building was abandoned, vandals broke the windows out. When Dranoff renovated the building, they had new exact replicas installed in the tower where they remain to this day.

But where's the original « His Master's Voice » you ask ? A fair question and fortunately there is an answer. The original « His Master's Voice » bought from Barraud by Owen hangs at the Gloucester Place Headquarters of « EMI » . « Nipper » 's burial place is now part of a bank parking lot in Kingston-upon-Thames and a plaque, on one wall of the bank, commemorates « Nipper » 's burial. A similar plaque was to be placed on the house where « Nipper » grew-up but the owner won't allow it unless « EMI » buys the house.

Janvier 1899 : Gustav Mahler goes himself to Liège for another performance of his 2nd Symphony. Although the performers are not adequate, the audience is deeply impressed.

10 février 1899 : Le chef Siegmund von Hausegger dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich.

Février 1899 : In Vienna, « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » publishes the score of Gustav Mahler's 1st Symphony.

26 février 1899 : Création intégrale de la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner (dans une version légèrement abrégée par des coupures) avec le Philharmonique de Vienne sous la direction de Gustav Mahler.

Mars 1899 : Gustav Mahler conducts his 1st Symphony in Frankfurt-am-Main. The work is met with polite (rather than enthusiastic) applause, but the musicians like it, which pleases Mahler.

Mars 1899 : The 27 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky's Symphony in B-flat major is premiered in Vienna. At the end of the month, Zemlinsky withdraws from the « Israelitische Kultusgemeinde » and, at some later time, becomes baptised. Later in the year, he also becomes a Freemason. Some time during the year, the Zemlinsky family moves into an apartment at « Obere Weissgerberstraße Nr. 12 » , in the 3rd District.

Avril 1899 : Arnold Schönberg attends the Vienna premiere of Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony and, suprisingly, leaves unimpressed, as it is Mahler's 1st great success as a composer with the Viennese public, something he has dreamed about for nearly 20 years. The critics, however, agree with Schönberg, and roundly denounce the work and its creator.

During this time, Arnold Schönberg falls in love with Alexander von Zemlinsky's sister, Mathilde, and he becomes deeply engrossed in Richard Dehmel's book, « Weib und Welt » (Woman and World) , setting many of its erotic poems as songs, 3 of which appear in his 4 Songs, Opus 2 (« Erwartung » is number 2) and one in his 6 Songs, Opus 3. Schönberg's style changes dramatically, as he begins to incorporate compositional techniques learned from his study of Richard Wagner, Richard Strauß, and Hugo Wolf.

Mai 1899 : After the Vienna Philharmonic season, Mahler completes the final revisions of the 3rd Symphony and « Das Klagende Lied » , re-instating the off-stage band into the score of the latter. Returning home after a trip to Venice, Alma sees Mahler in the street and thinks it noteworthy enough to mention in her diary.

3 juin 1899 : Johann Strauß, Junior, dies in Vienna at age 73.

In Paris, the Pathé company's 1899 catalog features 1,500 wax cylinder selections. Cylinders are popular in France until 1908, whereas licensee's of Emile Berliner's gramophone make discs more popular in Britain and Germany.

Alexander von Zemlinsky's Opera, « Sarema » , is published by Emil Berté (E.B. & Cie) , in Leipzig.

The 24 year old Franz Schmidt composes his 1st Symphony.

Été 1899 : During his summer vacation at Aussee, in the « Salzkammergut » , Gustav Mahler composes « Revelge » , which he considers may be the most important of his lieder, and comes-up with a plan for his 4th Symphony, deciding to use, as the Finale, a song he wrote in 1892 (and which he had intended to use in the 3rd Symphony) , and he composes the 1st and 2nd movements. It is a much lighter work than his previous Symphonies, and seems to mark a change in his style (but the real change will come with the next work, his 5th) .

Several of Alma Schindler's friends go-out one night while she is ill and in bed ; when they return, they claim that they spent the night in Gustav Mahler's company, and that they sent her a postcard which he signed, but which she never receives. After 2 weeks, she finds-out that the whole story is a lie. Mahler finds-out about it too, and, enabling Alma to have the last laugh, actually does send her a card. A few days later, the 19 year old Alma and her friends happen to run into Mahler on a bicycle ride ; he hopes to be introduced, but she dashes-off ahead, wanting not to spoil her admiration for him as an artist by becoming acquainted with him as a man (and, presumably, learning of his flaws) . At this point, it is clear that Mahler is already very attracted to Alma.

Mahler finally has enough capital to have his own summer-house built, and the eminent Wagnerian soprano, Anna Bahr-Mildenburg, recommends an architect who convinces him to do so ; construction is begun on the « villa Mahler » at Maiernigg, on the Attersee, in the Austrian Alps, and also, of course, on a little « Hauschen » (composing-hut) in the woods some distance away from the house, up the hill from the lake.

The 33 year old Jean Sibelius composes his 1st Symphony.

The 14 year old Anton Webern writes his 1st compositions, mostly songs. The earliest one which survives is « Vorfrühling » (Earliest Spring) . This and many of Webern's other early-songs are on texts by Ferdinand Avenarius, whose style is an important influence on the composer.

The 18 year old Béla Bartók begins his studies at the Budapest Academy.

Ernst Décsey

The Austrian author and music-critic Professor Doctor Ernst Décsey (Pseudonym : Franz Heinrich) was born on 13 April 1870 in Hamburg and died on 12 March 1941 in Vienna.

He studied law at the Vienna University. At the same time, he completed professional training at the Vienna music school (« Konservatorium ») in piano, harmony and composition.

From 1899 on, Décsey worked as music-critic at the « Grazer Tagespost » (Graz's daily newspaper) and, subsequently, became its chief-editor. In addition to his journalistic work, Ernst Décsey also taught music history and esthetics at the Vienna music school and published a number of novels, short stories, plays, libretti and biographies. He co-authored (with Gustav Holm) a play called « Sissys Brautfahrt » (Sissy's bridal journey) which was later used for the libretto of the well-known Operetta « Sissy » by Ernst and Hubert Marischka ; and wrote the libretto for Erich Wolfgang Korngold's Opera « Die Kathrin » .

Peter Rosegger (1913 ?) .

« Bruckner - Versuch eines Lebens » (Bruckner - a tentative outline of his life) (1920) .

8 novembre 1899 : En vue du 5e concert de la saison, une répétition générale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner par le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester », sous la direction du chef Arthur Nikisch, est ouverte au public à la « Großer Saal » .

9 novembre 1899 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 5e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 5e concert de la saison.

Novembre 1899 : The 25 year old Arnold Schönberg composes his tone-poem « Verklärte Nacht » (Transfigured Night) , for string sextet, based on a poem from Richard Dehmel's « Weib und Welt » (Woman and World) . The piece is very evocative of the moods of the poem upon which it is based. It is obvious that Schönberg has, by now, already assimilated Richard Wagner and, musically, has reached a great level of maturity, and this becomes his 1st piece to attract the attention of publishers, and is destined to remain his most popular composition. It is also the 1st time Schönberg uses a large single-movement form, an idea which will preoccupy him for the next few years in his instrumental works.

A foreshadowing of things to come : because of one chord (a « dominant 9th » in « 4th inversion » position - i.e. , with the « 9th » in the bass - which is forbidden by the harmony text-books) , the Viennese ensemble scheduled to premiere it refuses. A critic's comment :

« It sounds like someone smeared the the score of “ Tristan ” while the ink was still wet. »

So, with the Wagner-Brahms controversy raging all around him (even though they are both dead, by now) , Arnold Schönberg, just as he was so often later to seem to be the virtual embodiment of paradox, while in his mid- 20's effortlessly combines his admiration for both composers, and it is reflected in his own compositions.

Novembre 1899 : Sigmund Freud publishes his book, « Die Traumdeutung » (The Interpretation of Dreams) .

Anton Bruckner died on Sunday, 11 October 1896, in an Imperial grace-and-favour apartment in the Upper-Belvedere where he had lived during his last 2 years ; the memorial plaque can be seen at « Prinz-Eugen-Straße Nr. 27 » . Since 1899, a bust, with the muse of music in attendance, has adorned the central « Stadtpark » , and there is another, dating from 1912, in the court-yard of the Vienna University.

1900

14 janvier 1900 : Giacomo Puccini's Opera, « Tosca » , is premiered at the « Teatro Costanzi » in Italy.

22 janvier 1900 : Gustav Mahler conducts the premiere of the 28 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky's 2nd Opera, « Es war einmal » (Once upon a time) , after suggesting, and helping Zemlinsky with, heavy revisions of the text and music. It is very well-received and has many performances.

28 janvier 1900 : Gustav Mahler conducts his own « revised version » of the 4th Symphony by Anton Bruckner with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, during the 6th subscription concert of the 1899-1900 season. At the same programme : a Mendelssohn Overture and Richard Wagner's « Kaisermarsch » .

Music-critic Theodor Helm accused Mahler of « wilfully re-arranging tempi and dynamics » , « exaggerating the accents » and, worst of all, « tearing the poetic and musical form of the work to shreds » , with substantial cuts in 2 of the 4 movements.

Février 1900 : The prestigious « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Society for the Friends of Music) presents the premiere of Alexander von Zemlinsky's Cantata, « Frühlingbegräbnis » (Springtime Funeral) with Zemlinsky conducting the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and the Chorus of the « Singverein » .

These 2 performances mark the height of Zemlinsky's career in Vienna ; unfortunately, a position he will never later reach again. Just at this point, Alma Schindler meets Zemlinsky. They develop a strong interest in each other, based at 1st on their mutual admiration for Richard Wagner and Gustav Mahler.

12 février 1900 : The 25 year old Arnold Schönberg begins composing a Symphony in G minor which will remain unfinished.

18 février 1900 : For the 1st time, Vienna hears Gustav Mahler's version of Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Newspaper-critic, Robert Hirschfeld, hates it and becomes hostile towards Mahler, while Alma loves it.

Franz Ritter von Jauner, director of the « Carltheater » , has had difficulty balancing the books.

23 février 1900 : Upon opening the « Carltheater » 's safe and finding it empty, Franz Ritter von Jauner shoots himself. The job for the upcoming season, in September, is offered to Alexander von Zemlinsky.

Mars 1900 : For a « Wiener Tonkünstlerverein » (Viennese Tone-Artists Association) competition in which Alexander von Zemlinsky is a judge, Arnold Schönberg begins his « Gurrelieder » as a cycle of 9 songs with piano. Either because he misses the deadline or because he feels he won't win, the songs are never submitted.

Avril 1900 : Disregarding Alexander von Zemlinsky's doubts, Arnold Schönberg changes his « Gurrelieder » , cycle of 9 songs with piano into a monumental Cantata-like work for soloists, choirs, and orchestra. Over the next year, he continues composing it, while doing hack-work orchestrating thousands of pages of Operettas for a living.

Mars 1900 : « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » publishes both the orchestral and piano versions of Gustav Mahler's complete set of songs from « Des Knaben Wunderhorn » , in 2 volumes each.

28 mars 1900 : Alexander von Zemlinsky's Opera « Es war einmal » (Once upon a time) receives its 10th performance in Vienna. Alma Schindler is there to hear Zemlinsky's music for the 1st time, and is impressed.

30 mars 1900 : The 15 year old Alban Berg's father dies of a heart attack.

Alban Berg

Le compositeur autrichien Alban (Maria Johannes) Berg est né le 9 février 1885 à Vienne et est mort dans la même ville le 24 décembre 1935.

Né dans une famille catholique, il fut, comme son aîné de 2 ans Anton Webern, l'élève d'Arnold Schönberg. Sous l'influence de ce dernier, il abandonne les fonctions tonales Classiques en 1909 et adopte la technique des 12 sons (dodécaphonisme) , en 1926. Berg a vécu l'essentiel de sa vie à Vienne où, grâce à son indépendance financière, il a consacré sa vie à la musique.

C'est en 1900, année qui marque la mort de son père qu'il compose de façon autodidacte ses 15 lers Lieder.

En 1904, âgé de 19 ans, Alban Berg devient élève d'Arnold Schönberg, il semble alors qu'il ne puisse exprimer son talent autrement que par la voix. Mais sous l'enseignement de ce Maître révolutionnaire de la musique moderne, Berg est transformé. Cette période charnière de sa vie débute par les « Sieben frühe Lieder » , composés entre 1905 et 1908, dans lequel il s'est imprégné des techniques nouvelles initiées par son Maître. La Sonate, Opus I (1908) , pour piano, n'est pas encore atonale.

De 1907 à 1911, Alban Berg compose, en autodidacte, environ 80 lieder dont il fait interdire une grande partie. Seulement 7 sont choisis pour être orchestrés et arrangés en cycles, en 1928. Et quelques œuvres pour piano à 4 mains sous l'influence du Romantisme germanique. Il a alors parmi ses idoles Gustav Mahler et Richard Wagner.

En 1908, il reviendra horrifié par le caractère mondain d'un pèlerinage à Bayreuth, comme ses amis Arnold Schönberg et Anton Webern.

C'est en 1910, avec son 3e Opus, le Quatuor à cordes n° 1, qu'il se sépare du piano et de la voix et adopte un atonalisme franc.

Il se marie à Hélène Nahowsky, le 3 mai 1911, son beau-père lui donnant sa fille contre une conversion au protestantisme. C'est la même année qu'il envisage le « SchönbergBuch » .

Il réalise un « Almanach » , en 1912, avec Vassily Kandinsky qui regroupe Kandinsky, Franz Marc et August Macke.

C'est en 1910 qu'il crée une association de littérature et de musique qui s'intégrera par la suite à la Société « Verein für Kunst und Kultur » (Société pour l'art et la culture) . Il fait partie, avec Arnold Schœnberg et Anton Webern, de la « Seconde École de Vienne » .

...

The Austrian composer Alban (Maria Johannes) Berg was born on 9 February 1885 in Vienna and died on 24 December 1935. He was a member of the « Second Viennese School » with Arnold Schœnberg and Anton Webern, and produced compositions that combined Mahlerian Romanticism with a personal adaptation of Schœnberg's 12 tone technique.

The 3rd of 4 children of Johanna and Conrad Berg. His family lived comfortably until the death of his father in 1900.

Alban Berg had little formal music education before he became a student of Arnold Schœnberg in October 1904. With Schœnberg he studied counterpoint, music theory, and harmony. By 1906, he was studying music full-time ; by 1907, he began composition lessons. His student compositions included 5 drafts for Piano Sonatas. He also wrote songs, including his 7 Early Songs (« Sieben Frühe Lieder ») , 3 of which were Berg's 1st publicly performed work in a concert that featured the music of Schœnberg's pupils in Vienna that year. The early Sonata sketches eventually culminated in Berg's Piano Sonata, Opus 1 (1907-1908) ; it is one of the most formidable « 1st » works ever written.

Berg studied with Schœnberg for 6 years until 1911. Berg admired him as a composer and mentor, and they remained close lifelong friends.

Among Schœnberg's teaching was the idea that the unity of a musical composition depends upon all its aspects being derived from a single basic idea ; this idea was later known as developing variation. Berg passed this on to his students, one of whom, Theodor W. Adorno, stated :

« The main principle he conveyed was that of variation : everything was supposed to develop out of something else and, yet, be intrinsically different. »

The Piano Sonata is an example : the whole composition is derived from the work's opening quartal gesture and its opening phrase.

Alban Berg was a part of Vienna's cultural elite during the heady « fin de siècle » period. His circle included the musicians Alexander von Zemlinsky and Franz Schreker, the painter Gustav Klimt, the writer and satirist Karl Kraus, the architect Adolf Loos, and the poet Peter Altenberg. In 1906, Berg met the singer Helene Nahowski, daughter of a wealthy family (said by some to be, in fact, the illegitimate daughter of Emperor Franz-Josef I of Austria from his liaison with Anna Nahowski) ; despite the outward hostility of her family, the 2 were married on May 3, 1911.

In 1913, 2 of Berg's « 5 Songs on Picture Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg » (1912) were premiered in Vienna, conducted by Schœnberg in the infamous « Skandalkonzert » . Settings of aphoristic poetic utterances, the songs are accompanied by a very large Orchestra. The performance caused a riot, and had to be halted. This was a crippling blow to Berg's self-confidence : he effectively withdrew the work, which is surely one of the most innovative and assured 1st orchestral compositions in the literature, and it was not performed in full until 1952. The full-score remained unpublished until 1966.

From 1915 to 1918, Berg served in the Austro-Hungarian Army and, during a period of leave in 1917, he accelerated work on his 1st Opera, « Wozzeck » . After the end of World War I, he settled again in Vienna where he taught private pupils. He also helped Schönberg run his « Society for Private Musical Performances » , which sought to create the ideal environment for the exploration and appreciation of unfamiliar new music by means of open rehearsals, repeat performances, and the exclusion of professional critics.

Berg had a particular interest in the number 23, using it to structure several works. Various suggestions have been made as to the reason for this interest : that he took it from the Biorhythms theory of Wilhelm Fließ, in which a 23 day cycle is considered significant, or because he 1st suffered an asthma attack on 23rd of the month.

Berg is remembered as one of the most important composers of the 20th Century and, to date, is the most widely performed Opera composer among the « Second Viennese School » . He is considered to have brought more human values to the 12 tone system, his works seen as more emotional than Schönberg's. Critically, he is seen to have preserved the Viennese tradition in his music. His popularity has been more easily secured than many other Modernists since he plausibly combined both Romantic and Expressionist idioms. Though Berg's Romanticism, at one time, seemed a drawback for some more modernist composers, the Berg scholar Douglas Jarman writes in the « New Grove Dictionary of Music » :

« As the 20th Century closed, the “ backward-looking ” Berg suddenly came as (George) Perle remarked, to look like its most forward-looking composer. »

Avril 1900 : Alma Schindler happens to run into Gustav Mahler while out walking with a friend. Mahler greets the friend, but stares at Alma.

Under Alexander von Zemlinsky's influence, Alma Schindler starts attending « Wiener Tonkünstlerverein » (Viennese Tone-Artists Association) concerts, and sees Arnold Schönberg at an after-concert dinner. Zemlinsky shows an interest in Alma's songs.

Mai 1900 : Alma Schindler decides that Josef Labor's emphasis on technique is not enough, and she will supplement his training with additional lessons from Alexander von Zemlinsky, to learn how to « capture the atmosphere of a poem » in her songs.

30 mai 1900 : The Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra re-elects Gustav Mahler, as music-director, by a vote of 86 to 3.

Juin 1900 : Gustav Mahler takes the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra to Paris and, indicating his interest in the 20 year old Alma Schindler already, sends her a postcard from there.

25 juin 1900 : Alma Schindler notes in her diary that Gustav Mahler is « my idol » .

Richard Strauß begins trying to convince Gustav Mahler to leave the Vienna « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » (Society of authors, composers and music-publishers) , saying that the music-publishers are setting the tone rather than the composers.

25 juin 1900 : Alexander von Zemlinsky's father dies, leaving Zemlinsky to take-over the leadership of the family ; thus, his position at the « Carltheater » comes at an opportune moment.

Été 1900 : Alban Berg writes his 1st songs and a few piano pieces, including « Mein erster Walzer » (My 1st waltz) .

Settling into his new composing-hut, in Maiernigg, Gustav Mahler completes his 4th Symphony with the 3rd movement Adagio, then, celebrates his 40th birthday, 1 month late, after finishing his work. Mahler regards the 1st 4 Symphonies as « a self-contained tetralogy » of which the 4th Symphony is the conclusion, and there are indeed strong thematic links between the 3rd and 4th - not surprising, since « Das Himmlische Leben » (the Finale of the 4th) was originally intended as the Finale to the 3rd. He also remarks that, upon resuming work on the Symphony this summer, he began at a point that was far in advance of the sketches he had made last year, invoking a « 2nd self » who was busy composing « in the background » during the Opera season while his « 1st self » was occupied with his regular conducting and administrative duties.

Mahler has also taken along the score of Hans Rott's Symphony, in hopes of performing it ; it never happens, but there are bits and pieces of Rott's piece echoed in Mahler's 1st, 2nd, 3rd, and 5th Symphonies. (For how long Mahler had this score in his possession ?)

Up until now, the Companies making wax cylinder records have taken little notice of Emile Berliner's gramophone, but now, they begin to get desperate and challenge Berliner's patents. In America, « The American Graphophone Co. » sues Frank Seaman (Berliner's chief-salesman) , and Seaman ends-up making and selling gramophones for the « American Graphophone » . Eldridge Johnson, who makes Berliner's motors, creates the wax-disc mastering process and founds « The Victor Talking Machine Co. » Eventually, Victor and the Berliner Companies pool their patents and dominate the record business for nearly 20 years. Cylinder sales drop-off sharply after 1901, and the disc « record » is triumphant.

(Recorded-audio-disk technology will improve in the mid- 1920's with electrical recording. In 1948, we assist at the the invention of the 33 1/3 rpm long-playing « LP » . Followed, in 1949, by the 45 rpm « 45 » , in a more convenient size for the 3 minute « single » . In 1950, we assist at the substitution of vinyl for the brittle shellac. In 1957, we assist at the invention of stereophonic sound. But, in terms of reproduction technique, it remains essentially unchanged until the invention of the digital « compact disc » or CD, in 1983.)

The 24 year old Bruno Schlesinger becomes conductor at the Berlin Opera. A new agent in Berlin feels that he is a rising-star and, also, secures his inaugural Symphony-concert with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He occasionally takes the long train journey to make visits to Gustav Mahler, in Vienna, and to see his « fiancé », in Basle, and quickly becomes unhappy with his job in Berlin.

15 juillet 1900 : Création américaine de la 3e Messe d'Anton Bruckner à l'église Saint-François de Sales, à Cincinnati (Ohio) . Parmi les chanteurs, on retrouve Martin G. Dumler qui deviendra Président de la « Bruckner Society of America » , à partir de 1932.

1er septembre 1900 : Franz Schalk is engaged by Gustav Mahler as conductor at the Vienna « Hofoper » (Court Opera House) .

Septembre 1900 : Just before his 29th birthday, Alexander von Zemlinsky begins his post at the Vienna « Carltheater » .

3 octobre 1900 : The 21 year old Alma Schindler takes her 1st counterpoint lesson with Josef Labor.

18 octobre 1900 : After having been apart for the whole summer, Alexander von Zemlinsky visits Alma Schindler.

20 octobre 1900 : Gustav Mahler conducts the Munich premiere of his 2nd Symphony, and it is a big success with both the audience and the press.

Around this time, Mahler decides that writing programs to explain his Symphonies does more harm than good, confusing the public rather than enlightening them as to the intellectual basis of his work.

After the Munich performance, Mahler makes the famous statement :

« Down with the program books ! »

He presents all subsequent Symphonic works (except the 8th Symphony and « Das Lied von der Erde » , which have overt texts) as pure music, allowing no explanatory text in the programs at the premieres, other than the list of movements with their initial tempo markings (which, especially in Mahler, doesn't signify much because his movements change tempo constantly) .

7 novembre 1900 : Décès, à 43 ans, du chef d'orchestre et disciple de Bruckner, Josef Schalk. Les manuscrits restants du Finale de la 9e Symphonie qu'il avait en sa possession (légés le 18 octobre 1896 par l'exécuteur testamentaire, le docteur Theodor Reisch) sont transmis à son frère Franz.

13 novembre 1900 : Dissatisfied with her progress under Josef Labor, and probably already very attracted to Alexander von Zemlinsky's musical talent and intelligence, Alma Schindler begins taking lessons with him. She also becomes friends with Arnold Schönberg, since he and Zemlinsky are constant companions. Over the course of the next few months, Alma falls in love with Zemlinsky.

18 novembre 1900 : Alma Schindler attends the Vienna premiere of Gustav Mahler's 1st Symphony. Amid booing and hissing from a few detractors, and loud applause from Mahler's cult following, the audience gives a generally enthusiastic response. But, for the newspaper-critics, it is a unanimous failure. Alma fails to recognize the value of Mahler's compositions, and Schönberg is also apparently there because, he too later, makes disparaging remarks about the work.

Décembre 1900 : Alma Schindler attends a lieder concert including songs by Alexander von Zemlinsky and the premiere of Arnold Schönberg's 2 Songs, Opus 1. She finds Zemlinsky's work to be the best on the program, and her opinion of Schönberg's pieces is that they are : « flabbergasting, mind-boggling, by no means uninteresting - but beautiful ? »

Zemlinsky, who is familiar with the monumental « Gurrelieder » nearing completion by Schönberg, says to her :

« You wait. Before long, the world will be talking about him. »

17 décembre 1900 : Le chef Siegmund von Hausegger dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Une première munichoise.

At that time, with only a few exceptions, Europe, and places colonized by European countries, were the only cultural areas whose music was characterized by the use of harmony. A clearly-defined system had been established whereby one particular note was felt to be the central, primary note over all the others, and a piece would be said to be « in the key of » that note. This type of music is referred to as « tonal » .

After several centuries (from around 1500 to 1900) of this, a few bold composers began writing music which did not give a single note primacy. The 2 earliest significant examples were Charles Ives, in America (notably, his « Unanswered Question » , composed originally in 1906) , and Arnold Schönberg, in Vienna. It's interesting that Schönberg and Ives were born within about a month of each other.

The 1st truly atonal pieces were Schönberg's 2nd Quartet 4th movement, 3 Piano Pieces, and song-cycle « Book of the Hanging Gardens » , all written in 1908. Ives's work could really be characterized more as « polytonal » , while Schönberg preferred the term « pan-tonal » for the pieces he composed which disregarded traditional ideas about tonality.

It was Schœnberg's belated but extreme admiration for Mahler's work and ideals, not to mention Mahler's selfless support, that encouraged Schœnberg to be true to himself, stick to his radical inspirations, and not be swayed by criticism ; he also learned from Mahler the importance of a polyphonic mode of composition, something that stayed with Schœnberg the rest of his life.

Apparently, Schœnberg's student, Anton Webern, was the one who really stimulated Schœnberg into giving full-rein to his most progressive tendencies and into finally abandoning traditional concepts of tonality. The pivotal period, when all this really began to emerge, was the summer of 1905 when Mahler wrote ...

1901 : Un des grands moments dans la carrière de Franz Xaver Bayer sera l'exécution, dans l'ancienne église paroissiale (« Alte Stadtpfarrkirche ») de Steyr, du « Te Deum » de Bruckner auquel toutes les Associations chorales de la localité (environ 200 chanteurs) ont pris part.

Début 1901 : Gustav Mahler is writing-out the fair-copy of his 4th Symphony.

Upon returning home, Mahler collapses with a severe internal hemorrhage. He is taken to the hospital and given a life-saving operation, then, spends the rest of the spring convalescing. This close brush with death marks a dramatic change in his subsequent music.

17 février 1901 : Gustav Mahler's early Cantata, « Das klagende Lied », is finally premiered in Vienna. It is a rousing success with the audience, but is unanimously attacked by the newspaper-critics. The 16 year old Alban Berg attends. It is his 1st exposure to Mahler's music and he feels it is « a magnificent work ! ». A few days later, Anton Webern notes in his diary his admiration for Mahler's 2nd and 4th Symphonies.

Février 1901 : The 26 year old Arnold Schönberg completes the un-orchestrated score of his stupendous « Gurrelieder », the epitome of what a composer steeped in the work of Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß could accomplish. Because of his need to earn money, Schönberg must put-off its orchestration, which will not be completed until 1910, and its performance will only occur in 1913, by which time Schönberg will have made his most radical advances, his style, by then, sounding vastly different from that of the « Gurrelieder » .

Dimanche, 24 février 1901 : Gustav Mahler conducts, in the afternoon, a heavily-cut version of Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony in his last Vienna Philharmonic concert. Zemlinsky and Alma are there, together.

That evening, Mahler conducts Mozart's « The Magic Flute » at the « Hofoper ». Then, upon returning home, he collapses with a severe internal hemorrhage. He is taken to the hospital and given a life-saving operation, then, spends the rest of the spring convalescing. This close brush with death marks a dramatic change in his subsequent music.

Anton Webern

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre autrichien Anton (Friedrich Wilhelm) von Webern (il abandonne la particule « von » en 1918) est né le 3 décembre 1883 à Vienne et est mort le 15 septembre 1945 à Mittersill. Un des 1ers élèves d'Arnold Schönberg, il appartient au 1er cercle de la « Seconde École de Vienne » .

Né dans une vieille famille noble de Vienne, Anton Webern étudie la musicologie avec Guido Adler à l'Université de Vienne (Institut d'Histoire de la musique) puis, entre 1904 et 1908, il étudie la composition avec Arnold Schönberg qui eut une grande influence sur sa musique et se lie d'amitié avec Alban Berg. En 1906, il obtient son doctorat en musicologie sur le « Choralis Constantinus » d'Heinrich Isaac. Il compose un nombre important d'œuvres de jeunesse, puis quelques pièces sous l'influence de Schönberg, mais son catalogue « officiel » débute avec sa « Passacaille » pour orchestre, Opus 1 (1908) . Il délaisse rapidement la tonalité, pour s'engager dans un style de musique atonale libre, en même temps que Schönberg et que Berg. Le 31 mars 1913, une de ses œuvres (les 6 pièces pour grand orchestre) fait partie du programme d'un mémorable concert qui fut un des scandales les plus retentissants de l'époque. 1 an après, la Guerre éclate, il est mobilisé. Réformé à cause de sa mauvaise vue, il se met à composer un nombre important de pièces vocales (Opus 12 à Opus 19) sur des textes du « Knaben Wunderhorn » ou des textes mystiques. Parallèlement, il mène une carrière de chef d'orchestre d'Opérettes, qui lui causera nombre de déboires tant professionnels que de santé. En 1924, il compose sa 1re œuvre dodécaphonique (un « Kinderstück » pour piano) qui, dès lors, deviendra son unique technique d'écriture.

En 1926, il fait la connaissance à Vienne de la poétesse Hildegard Jone (1891-1963) , qui écrira les textes de toutes ses œuvres vocales ultérieures (Lieder Opus 23 et 25 ; « Das Augenlicht » , Opus 26 ; Ire et 2e Cantates, Opus 29 et 31, ainsi qu'un fragment d'une 3e qui ne verra jamais le jour) . Sa carrière de chef d'orchestre prendra une importance grandissante pendant la période Sociale-Démocrate (dite période austro-marxiste) grâce à l'appui d'un ami de Schönberg, David Josef Bach, devenant malgré lui une des vitrines culturelles de l'austro-marxisme. En février 1934, une série d'émeutes et d'affrontements entre des miliciens fascistes nazis et des militants communistes embrasent Vienne et Linz. Le chancelier Engelbert Dollfuß décrète le couvre-feu et instaure l'état d'urgence : tous les élus Socio-Démocrates voient leur mandat annulé, les syndicats et associations ouvrières dissous. Webern perd alors son poste de chef d'orchestre à la RAVAG (la radio autrichienne) , ce qui le privera d'une partie de ses modestes revenus. Le 24 décembre 1935, Alban Berg meurt d'une septicémie. En 1936, Webern est pressenti pour diriger la création du Concerto « à la mémoire d'un ange » de Berg, à Barcelone, mais après quelques répétitions, Webern se sent incapable de continuer. De fait, cette œuvre sera créée par le chef Hermann Scherchen. Cet événement mettra une fin définitive à la carrière de chef de Webern.

En 1938, les Nazis annexent l'Autriche. Webern voit une grande partie de ses amis, de ses élèves juifs s'exiler. Ne prenant pas lui-même le chemin de l'exil, il reste en Autriche et sera alors mis au ban de la scène culturelle par les Nazis. Il fait partie des musiciens considérés comme « dégénérés » par les Nazis. Il se réfugie dans un exil intérieur, poursuivant inlassablement son œuvre, malgré les bombardements (à partir de l'automne 1943) , un enrôlement forcé (mais bref) dans la défense anti-aérienne. Il pourra néanmoins, à 2 reprises, quitter l'Autriche pour la Suisse : en 1940, pour assister à une reprise de sa « Passacaille » pour orchestre, Opus 1, puis, en 1943, pour la création de ses Variations pour orchestre, Opus 30, à Winterthur. Très démuné financièrement, il est contraint de solliciter à plusieurs reprises la « Künstlerdank » , une bourse de survie accordée aux musiciens nécessiteux par le Ministère nazi de la culture.

Après de nombreuses compositions tonales de jeunesse, en 1909 (5 Lieder, Opus 3) , il délaisse le système tonal, au profit d'une écriture atonale libre dans un style expressionniste. Il explore également la petite forme (aphorisme, on a même souvent associé l'esthétique webernienne à celle des Haïku japonais) , ainsi que la « Klangfarbenmelodie » élaborée par Schönberg dans ses propres 5 Pièces pour orchestre, Opus 16 (n° 3 : « Farben » ; et n° 5 : le récitatif obligé) . En 1924 (« Kinderstück ») , suivant de près Schönberg et Berg, Webern remplace la libre atonalité par la technique du dodécaphonisme.

À partir de ce moment, la musique de Webern se concentre vers une organisation de plus en plus rationalisée des sons non seulement dans leurs hauteurs (série) , mais d'une certaine façon également dans leurs durées, tout en faisant un emploi de plus en plus important du contrepoint : canons (Symphonie, Opus 21) ; fugue (Quatuor à cordes, Opus 28) . Dans ses « Variations » pour orchestre, Opus 30, et sa 2e Cantate, Opus 31, il élabore un traitement sériel en chaînes et réseaux, que sa mort l'empêcha de poursuivre.

Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, on a vu en Webern une nouvelle voie à suivre dans le domaine de la composition. La musique tonale ayant été assimilée par certains comme la musique du Nazisme et du Fascisme, il fallait dénazifier la culture, et d'aucuns avaient le sentiment que l'art ne pourrait plus être comme avant, ayant échoué à empêcher la « Shoah » .

Aujourd'hui, sa musique est jouée dans le monde entier. Et elle est appréciée dans sa sensibilité, au-delà des oppositions entre partisans et opposants de l'atonalité.

« Except for the violin pieces and a few of my orchestra pieces, all of my works, from the “ Passacaglia on, relate to the death of my mother. »

(Anton Webern, letter to Alban Berg.)

« Tell me, can one at all denote thinking and feeling as things entirely separable ? I cannot imagine a sublime intellect without the ardour of emotion. »

(Anton Webern writing to Schönberg, June 23, 1910.)

Anton Webern, March 6, 1934, in a letter to Ernst Křenek, responding to the latter's essay « Freedom and Responsibility » published in the Willi Reich's Music Journal No. 23. Křenek had advocated for « a Catholic Austrian “ avante-garde ” » in opposition to « the Austrian provincialism that National-Socialism wants to force on us » . Webern himself was Roman Catholic, and the leading « Vaterländische Front » positioned Austria with Fascist Italy, on the basis of religious and historical national identity in attempt to remain independent from Nazi Germany ; thus, the confusion that Webern refers to is the « social chaos » (Louis Krasner) of the Austrian Civil War, which the Social-Democrats' « Republikanischer Schutzbund » lost to the other side's « Heimwehr » , and he endorses Křenek's advocacy for an art, though certainly meaningful and relevant, relatively transcendent and universal as opposed to immanent and nationalistic. But beyond Křenek, Webern emphasizes a responsibility to an understood « heritage » and presses this appeal with marked wariness of « the confusion » .

Louis Krasner :

« Webern said to me :

“ It's only the superior old German culture that can save this world from the demoralized condition into which it has been thrown. ”

You see, during the 1920's and early 1930's, Germany and Austria were in social chaos. The United States experienced something similar at the time of the Vietnam War. Remember how it was. Students were rebelling, occupying campus buildings ; armed protesters were clashing with the police. People were wondering : how far will it go ? How's it going to turn-out ? It was that kind of climate in Central Europe, only much worse. Here, there was some sort of control, but there was no control in Vienna. The attitudes of young people were so cynical, and their behaviour in the “ cafés ” and on the streets was really worrisome to the older generations. People like Webern thought the world was lost.

Everything was so “ Bolshevik ” (so without discipline and cultivation) that only some kind of determined autocracy could solve society's problems and provide the salvation for all of Western humanity. If you asked Webern, “ Why does it have to be somebody like Hitler ? ”, his answer was, “ Who knows if these excesses we've been reading about are real ? As far as I'm concerned that's propaganda ! ” This conversation took place in 1936. It seems to me that, in the preceding years, there must have been a time when Webern felt the pull of great contradictions, a time when he was torn constantly. »

The Austrian composer and conductor Anton (Friedrich Wilhelm von) Webern was born on 3 December 1883 in Vienna and died 15 September 1945. Along with his mentor Arnold Schœnberg and his colleague Alban Berg, Webern comprised the core among those within and more peripheral to the circle of the « Second Viennese School », including Ernst Křenek and Theodor W. Adorno. As an exponent of atonality and 12 tone technique, Webern exerted influence on contemporaries Luigi Dallapiccola, Ernst Křenek, and even Arnold Schœnberg himself. As tutor, Webern guided and variously influenced Arnold Elston, Fré Focke, Philipp Herschkowitz, René Leibowitz, Humphrey Searle, Leopold Spinner, and Stefan Wolpe.

Anton Webern's music was the most radical of its « milieu » in its rigorous and resolute apprehension of 12 tone technique. His innovations in schematic organization of pitch, rhythm, register, timbre, dynamics, articulation, and melodic contour ; his eagerness to redefine imitative contrapuntal techniques such as canon and fugue ; and his inclination toward athenaticism, abstraction, concision, and lyricism all greatly informed and oriented post-War European, typically serial or « avant-garde » composers such as Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Luigi Nono, Bruno Maderna, Henri Pousseur, and György Ligeti. In the United States, meanwhile, Webern's music was very fruitfully re-introduced to Igor Stravinsky by Robert Craft ; and it attracted the interest of Milton Babbitt, although Babbitt ultimately found Schœnberg's 12 tone techniques more useful than those of Webern.

During and shortly after the post-War period, then, Webern was posthumously received with attention 1st diverted from his socio-cultural up-bringing and surroundings and, moreover, focused in a direction apparently antithetical to his participation in German Romanticism and Expressionism. A richer understanding of Webern began to emerge in the later half of the 20th Century, notably in the work of scholars Kathryn Bailey, Julian Johnson, and Anne Schreffler, as archivists and biographers (e.g. , Hans and Rosaleen Moldenhauer) regained access to sketches, letters, lectures, audio recordings, and other articles of and associated with Webern's Estate.

Anton Webern was the only surviving son of Carl von Webern, a civil servant, and Amelie (« née » Geer) who was a competent pianist and accomplished singer - the only obvious source of the future composer's talent. He never used his middle names and dropped the « von » , in 1918, as directed by the Austrian government's reforms after World War I.

Webern lived in Graz and Klagenfurt for much of his youth. But his distinct and lasting sense of « Heimat » was shaped by reading Peter Rosegger ; and, moreover, by frequent and extended retreats with his parents, sisters, and cousins to his family's country Estate, the « Preglhof » , which Webern's father had inherited upon the death of Webern's grandfather, in 1889.

Webern memorialized the « Preglhof » in a diary poem, « An der Preglhof » , and in the tone-poem « Im Sommerwind » (1904) , both after Bruno Wille's idyll. Once Webern's father sold the Estate, in 1912, Webern referred to it nostalgically as a « lost paradise » . He continued to revisit the « Preglhof » , the family cemetery in Schwabegg, and the surrounding landscape for the rest of his life ; and he clearly associated the area, which he took as his home, very closely with the memory of his mother Amelie, who had died in 1906 and whose loss also profoundly affected Webern for decades.

Art historian Ernst Dietz, Webern's cousin and, at that time, a student at Graz, may have introduced Webern to the work of Arnold Böcklin and Giovanni Segantini, which Webern came to admire. Segantini's work was a likely inspiration for Webern's 1905 single-movement String Quartet.

In 1902, Webern began attending classes at Vienna University. There, he studied musicology with Guido Adler, writing his thesis on the « Choralis Constantinus » of Heinrich Isaac. This interest in early-music would greatly influence his compositional technique in later years, especially in terms of his use of palindromic form on both the micro- and macro-scale and the economical use of musical materials.

He studied composition under Arnold Schönberg, writing his « Passacaglia » , Opus 1, as his graduation piece in 1908. He met Alban Berg, who was also a pupil of Schönberg. These 2 relationships would be the most important in his life in shaping his own musical direction.

After graduating, Webern took a series of conducting posts at Theatres in Ischl ; Teplitz (now, Teplice, in the Czech Republic) ; Danzig (now, Gdańsk, in Poland) ; Stettin (now, Szczecin, in Poland) ; and Prague, before moving back to Vienna. There, he helped run Schönberg's « Society for Private Musical Performances » , from 1918 through 1922, and conducted the « Vienna Workers Symphony Orchestra » , from 1922 to 1934.

In 1926, Webern noted his voluntary resignation as chorus Master of the Mödling Men's Choral Society, a paid position, in controversy over his hiring of a Jewish singer, Greta Wilhelm, to replace a sick one. Letters document their correspondence in many subsequent years, and she (among others) would in turn provide him with facilities in which to teach private lessons as a convenience to Webern, his family, and his students.

Anton Webern's compositions are concise, distilled, and select ; just 31 of his compositions were published in his lifetime and, when Pierre Boulez later oversaw a project to record all of his compositions, including some of those without Opus numbers, the results fit on just 6 CDs. Although Webern's music changed over time, as it often does in the case of long-time composers' music, it is typified by very spartan textures, in which every note can be clearly heard ; carefully chosen timbres, often resulting in very detailed instructions to the performers and use of extended instrumental techniques (flutter tonguing, col legno, and so on) ; wide-ranging melodic lines, often with leaps greater than an octave ; and brevity : the 6 Bagatelles for String Quartet of 1913, for instance, last about 3 minutes in total.

Webern's music does not fall into clearly demarcated periods of division because the concerns and techniques of his music were cohesive, interrelated, and only very gradually transformed with the overlap of old and new, particularly in the case of his middle-period lieder. For example, his 1st use of 12 tone technique was not especially stylistically significant and only eventually became realized as otherwise so in later works. As such, the divisions employed below are only a convenient simplification.

Webern published little of his early work in particular ; like Johannes Brahms, though perhaps for not entirely the same reasons, Webern was characteristically meticulous and revised extensively. Many juvenilia remained unknown until the work and findings of the Moldenhauers in the 1960's, effectively obscuring and undermining formative facets of Webern's musical identity, highly significant even more so in the case of an innovator whose music was crucially marked by rapid stylistic shifts. Thus, when Boulez 1st oversaw a project to record « all » of Webern's music, not including the juvenilia, the results fit on 3 rather than 6 CD's.

Webern's earliest works consist primarily of lieder, the genre that most belies his roots in Romanticism, specifically German Romanticism ; one in which the music yields brief but explicit, potent, and spoken meaning manifested only latently or programmatically in purely instrumental genres ; one marked by significant intimacy and lyricism ; and one which often associates nature, especially landscapes, with themes of home-sickness, solace, wistful yearning, distance, utopia, and belonging. Robert Schumann's « Mondnacht » is an iconic example ; Joseph von Eichendorff, whose lyric poetry inspired it, is not far removed from the poets (e.g. , Richard Dehmel, Gustav Falke, Theodor Storm) whose work inspired Webern and his contemporaries Alban Berg, Max Reger, Arnold Schönberg, Richard Strauß, Hugo Wolf, and Alexander von Zemlinsky. Wolf's « Mörike-Lieder » were especially influential on Webern's efforts from this period. But well beyond these lieder alone, all of Webern's music may be said to possess such concerns and qualities, as is evident from his sketches, albeit in an increasingly symbolic, abstract, spare, introverted, and idealized manner.

Other works include the orchestral tone-poem « Im Sommerwind » (1904) and the « Langsamer Satz » (1905) for String Quartet.

Webern's 1st piece after completing his studies with Arnold Schönberg was the « Passacaglia » for orchestra (1908) . Harmonically, it is a step forward into a more advanced language, and the orchestration is somewhat more distinctive than his earlier orchestral work. However, it bears little relation to the fully-mature works he is best-known for today. One element that is typical is the form itself : the « passacaglia » is a form which dates back to the 17th Century, and a distinguishing feature of Webern's later work was to be the use of traditional compositional techniques (especially canons) and forms (the Symphony, the Concerto, the String Trio, and String Quartet, and the piano and orchestral « Variations ») in a modern harmonic and melodic language.

For a number of years, Webern wrote pieces which were freely atonal, much in the style of Schönberg's early atonal works. Indeed, so in lockstep with Schönberg was Webern for much of his artistic development that Schönberg, in 1951, wrote that he sometimes no longer knew who he was, Webern had followed so well in his footsteps and shadow, occasionally outdoing or stepping ahead of Schönberg in execution of Schönberg's own or their shared ideas.

There are, however, important cases where Webern may have even more profoundly influenced Schönberg. Ethan Haimo marks the swift, radical influence in 1909 of Webern's novel and arresting 5 Pieces for String Quartet, Opus 5, on Schönberg's subsequent Piano Piece, Opus 11, No. 3 ; 5 Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 16 ; and the mono-drama « Erwartung » , Opus 17. This shift is distinctly pronounced in a letter Schönberg wrote to Ferruccio Busoni, which describes a rather Webernian aesthetic :

« Harmony is expression and nothing else. Away with Pathos ! Away with protracted 10 tone scores. My music must be brief. Concise ! In 2 notes : not built, but “ expressed ” !! And the results I wish for : no stylized and sterile protracted emotion. People are not like that : it is impossible for a person to have only one sensation at a time. One has thousands simultaneously. And this variegation, this multi-fariousness, this illogicality which our senses demonstrate, the illogicality presented by their interactions, set forth by some mounting rush of blood, by some reaction of the senses or the nerves, this I should like to have in my music. »

In 1949, Arnold Schönberg still remembered being « intoxicated by the enthusiasm of having freed music from the shackles of tonality » and believing with his pupils « that, now, music could renounce motivic features and remain coherent and comprehensible nonetheless » .

But, with Opuses 18 to 20, Schönberg turned-back and revived old techniques, very self-consciously returning to and transforming tradition by the concluding songs of « Pierrot lunaire » (1912) , Opus 21, with, e.g. , intricately interrelated canons in « Der Mondfleck » , clear waltz rhythms in « Serenade » , a barcarolle (« Heimfahrt ») , triadic harmony throughout « O alter Duft » . And, in particular, « Pierrot lunaire » was received by Webern as a direction for the composition of his own Opuses 14 to 16, most of all with respect to contrapuntal procedures (and to a lesser degree with respect to the diverse and innovative textural treatment among instruments in increasingly smaller ensembles) . « How much I owe to your “ Pierrot ” » , he wrote Schönberg upon completing a setting of George Trakl's « Abendland III » , Opus 14, No. 4, in which, rather unusually for Webern, there is no silence or rest until a pause at the concluding gesture. Indeed, a recurring theme of Webern's World War I settings is that of the wanderer, estranged or lost and seeking return to or, at least, retrieval from an earlier time and place ; and of some 56 songs on which Webern worked from 1914 to 1926, he ultimately finished and, later, published only 32 set in order as Opuses 12 to 19. This War-time theme of wandering in search of home ties in with 2 intricately involved concerns more broadly evident in Webern's work : 1st, the death and memory of members of Webern's family, especially his mother but also including his father and a nephew ; and 2nd, Webern's broad and complex sense of rural and spiritual « Heimat » . Their importance is marked by Webern's stage-play, « Tot » (October 1913) , which, over the course of 6 alpine scenes of reflection and self-consolation, draws on Emanuel Swedenborg's notion of correspondence to relate and to unite the 2 concerns, the 1st embodied but otherworldly and the 2nd concrete if increasingly abstracted and idealized.

The similarities between « Tot » and Webern's music are striking. In an often programmatic or cinematic fashion, Webern ordered his published movements, themselves dramatic or visual « tableaux » with melodies that frequently begin and end on weak beats, or else, settle into ostinati or the background. In them, tonality, useful for communicating direction and narrative in programmatic pieces, becomes more tenuous, fragmented, static, symbolic, and visual or spatial in function, thus mirroring the concerns and topics, explicit or implicit, of Webern's music and his selections for it from the poetry of Stefan George and, later, Georg Trakl. Webern's dynamics, orchestration, and timbre are given so as to produce a fragile, intimate, and often novel sound, despite distinctly recalling Gustav Mahler, not infrequently bordering on silence at a typical « ppp ». In some cases, Webern's choice of instrument in particular functions to represent or to allude to a female voice (e.g., the use of solo violin), to inward or outward luminosity or darkness (e.g., the use of the entire range of register within the ensemble; registral compression and expansion; the use of celesta, harp, and glockenspiel; the use of harmonics and antisteg directions), or to angels and heaven (e.g., the use of harp and trumpet in the circling ostinati of Opus 6, No. 5, and winding to conclusion at the very end of Opus 15, No. 5).

With the « Drei Volkstexte » (1925), Opus 17, Webern used Schönberg's 12 tone technique for the 1st time, and all his subsequent works used this technique. The String Trio (1926-1927), Opus 20, was both the 1st purely instrumental work using the 12 tone technique (the other pieces were songs) and the 1st cast in a traditional musical form.

Webern's music, like that of both Johannes Brahms and Arnold Schönberg, is marked by its emphasis on counterpoint and formal considerations; and Webern's commitment to systematic pitch organization in the 12 tone method is inseparable from this prior commitment. Webern's tone rows are often arranged to take advantage of internal symmetries; for example, a 12 tone row may be divisible into 4 groups of 3 pitches which are variations, such as inversions and retrogrades, of each other, thus creating invariance. This gives Webern's work considerable motivic unity, although this is often obscured by the fragmentation of the melodic lines. This fragmentation occurs through octave displacement (using intervals greater than an octave) and by moving the line rapidly from instrument to instrument in a technique referred to as « Klangfarbenmelodie ».

Webern's last pieces seem to indicate another development in style. The 2 late Cantatas, for example, use larger ensembles than earlier pieces, last longer (No. 1 : around 9 minutes; No. 2 : around 16 minutes), and are texturally somewhat denser.

In his youth (1903), Anton Webern orchestrated at least 5 of Franz Schubert's various Lieder, giving the piano accompaniment to an appropriately Schubertian Orchestra of strings and pairs of flutes, oboes, clarinets, bassoons, and horns : « Der Vollmond Strahlt auf Bergeshöhn » (the « Romanze » from « Rosamunde »); « Tränenregen » (from « Die schöne Müllerin »); « Der Wegweiser » (from « Winterreise »); « Du bist die Ruh », and « Ihr Bild ». In 1934, he did the same for Schubert's 6 « Deutsche Tänze » (German Dances) of 1824.

For Schönberg's « Society for Private Musical Performances », in 1921, Webern arranged, among other things, the 1888 « Schatz-Walzer » (Treasure Waltz) of Johann Strauß II's « Der Zigeunerbaron » (The Gypsy Baron) for string quartet, harmonium, and piano.

In 1924, Webern arranged Franz Liszt's « Arbeiterchor » (Workers' Chorus, composed around 1847-1848) for bass solo, mixed chorus, and large Orchestra ; it was premiered for the first time, in any form, on March 13 and 14, 1925, with Webern conducting the 1st full-length concert of the « Austrian Association of Workers Choir » . A review in the « Amtliche Wiener Zeitung » of March 28, 1925, read :

« Neu in jedem Sinne, frisch, unverbraucht, durch ihn zieht die Jugend, die Freude. »

(New in every respect, fresh, vital, pervaded by youth and joy.)

The text, in English translation, reads in part :

« Let us have the adorned spades and scoops, / Come along all, who wield a sword or pen, / Come here ye, industrious, brave and strong / All who create things great or small. »

Franz Liszt, initially inspired by his revolutionary countrymen, had left it in manuscript at music-publisher Carl Haslinger's discretion.

Webern insisted on lyricism, nuance, rubato, sensitivity, and both emotional and intellectual understanding in performance of music ; this is evidenced by anecdotes, correspondence, extant recordings of Franz Schubert's « Deutsche Tänze » (arranged by Webern) and Alban Berg's Violin Concerto under his direction, many such detailed markings in his scores, and, finally, by his compositional process as both publicly stated and, later, revealed in the musical and extra-musical metaphors and associations everywhere throughout his sketches. As both a composer and conductor, he was one of many (e.g. , Wilhelm Furtwängler, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Hermann Scherchen) in a contemporaneous tradition of conscientiously and non-literally handling notated musical figures, phrases, and even entire scores so as to maximize expressivity in performance and to cultivate audience engagement and understanding.

This aspect of Webern's work had been typically missed in his immediate post-War reception, however, even as it may radically affect the music's reception. For example, Pierre Boulez's « complete » recording of Webern's music yielded more to this æsthetic, the 2nd time after, largely missing it the 1st ; but conductor Elisha Inbal's rendition of Webern's Symphony with the « hr-Sinfonieorchester » is still far more within the spirit of the Late-Romantic performance tradition (which Webern seemingly intended for his music) , nearly slowing to half-tempo for the whole of 1st movement and taking care to delineate and shape each melodic strand and expressive gesture throughout the entirety of the work.

Günter Wand's 1966 recording of the Cantata No. 1 (1938-1940) , Opus 29, with the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » et al. , may likewise be contrasted with both of Boulez's renditions.

Webern's music started to spark some interest in the 1920's. By the mid-1940s, they were having a decisive effect on John Cage. However, Webern mostly remained the most obscure and arcane composer of the « Second Viennese School » in his lifetime.

After World War II, interest in Anton Webern increased, and his « œuvre » acquired what Alex Ross calls « a saintly, visionary aura ». When Webern's « Piano Variations » were performed in Darmstadt, in 1948, young composers listened in a quasi-religious trance.

Meanwhile, Webern's characteristically passionate pan-German nationalism and censurable, sordid political sympathies, however naive or delusional, were not widely-known or went unmentioned ; perhaps, in some parts due to his personal and political associations before, his degradation, mistreatment and disillusionment during, and then his fate immediately after the German « Reich ». Significantly as relates to his reception, Webern never compromised his artistic identity and values, as Igor Stravinsky was later to note.

In 1955, the 2nd issue of Herbert Eimert and Karlheinz Stockhausen's journal « Die Reihe » was devoted to Webern's « œuvre » and, in 1960, his lectures were published by Universal-Edition.

It has been suggested that the serialists' fascination with Webern's works came not for their audible content, but rather from the transparency of their scores, which made their musical analysis easier. One of the founders of European post-Webern serialism, Karel Goeyvaerts, wrote :

« The impression of the 1st time I heard Webern's music in a concert performance was the same as I was to experience, a few years later, when I 1st laid eyes on a Mondrian canvas : those things, of which I had acquired an extremely intimate knowledge, came across as crude and unfinished when seen in reality. »

Anton Webern's work was a seminal influence on that of Andr  Szerv nszky ; thus, Gy rgy Kurt g mimics and quotes both Webern and Szerv nszky himself variously throughout his own « Officium Breve in memoriam Andr  Szerv nszky » for string quartet, Opus 28, composed in 1988-1989.

Printemps 1901 : In America, the 33 year old Scott Joplin moves from Sedalia, Missouri, to Saint-Louis, where the « ragtime » style of piano-playing is thriving. America has imported many German musicians to lead its musical institutions, and most of them disdain « ragtime » and other American popular-music forms, but Alfred Ernst, conductor of the Saint-Louis Choral Symphony Society (the major musical institution there) , is greatly impressed by Joplin's acute ear, talent as a composer, education, and soft-spoken style. Joplin rapidly gains notice in the city's leading newspapers. His colleagues have little respect for his apparently substandard abilities as a pianist, but he is earning a decent living from royalties paid on his very popular « ragtime » compositions.

Avril   octobre 1901 : Alexander Zemlinsky composes the ballet-score of « Der Triumph der Zeit » (The Triumph of Time) .

Mai 1901 : On the anniversary of Richard Wagner's birthday (and just before his own 36th birthday) , Richard Strau  completes his 2nd Opera, « Feuersnot » (Fire famine) based on a libretto satirizing Munich's conservative music-lovers, written in Bavarian dialect by Ernst von Wolzogen (also from Munich) .

The plot :

« Bonfires are burning all across medieval Munich during Midsummer's Eve revelry, but amid the fun the people are troubled by a stranger named Kunrad, a sorcerer. Kunrad wants Diemut, the burgomaster's daughter, and he offends her with his erotic approaches. In revenge, she humiliates him, so he uses music for his magic and causes all the fires in the city to go-out. Kunrad tells the citizens that the fires can only be relit from « the body of a virgin in heat » . Under pressure from everyone, Diemut gives in to him, and her 1st orgasm relights the fires in a flash. »

Kunrad is the pupil of another magician, similarly trounced in Munich, called Reichart der Wagner. Strauß's 1st opera, « Guntram » , had flopped in Munich.

Ernst von Wolzogen, a writer, founds the « Überbrettel » (« over-boards » , a German pun with the less literal meaning of « super-theater ») , an artistic cabaret theater modelled somewhat after those in Montmartre (Paris) , during the 1880's and 1890's. Poetry by Wolzogen and others associated with the « Überbrettel » is published in a volume called « Deutsche Chansons » (« German Songs » , using the French word for « songs ») ; Arnold Schönberg sets several of these « Brettel Lieder » to music. When Wolzogen and the « Überbrettel » are on tour in Vienna, their conductor Oskar Fried hires Schönberg to substitute for him at the « Carltheater » , where Schönberg and Wolzogen meet. Wolzogen hears his « chansons » , and hires Schönberg to direct his theater, in Berlin, during the following season.

8 au 17 mai 1901 : Alexander von Zemlinsky composes « Ein Lichtstrahl » (A Ray of Light) , a mime-drama with piano accompaniment, for the « Carltheater » « Überbrettel » .

Samedi, 18 mai 1901 : The remains of Anton Bruckner's sister, Maria Anna (which died in 1870) , who accompanied him to Vienna, are transferred to the cemetery of Saint-Florian's monastery.

Samedi, 18 mai 1901 : Alma Schindler and her family go to Sankt Gilgen (on the Wolfgangsee) for their summer vacation. Immediately upon arriving, Alma rents a post-office box from which she will have a voluminous private correspondence with Zemlinsky.

Fin mai 1901 : Alexander von Zemlinsky's prospects for the Breslau post fall thru, and he renews his « Carltheater » contract for the upcoming season.

The Viennese music-publisher Ludwig Döblinger releases the Operettas « Das süße Mädel » by Heinrich Reinhardt and « Die Landstreicher » by Carl Michæl Ziehrer. They are hugely successful, and enable Döblinger's owner, Bernhard Herzmansky, to risk publishing works by contemporary « serious » composers, including Ernő Dohnányi, Alexander von Zemlinsky, and Gustav Mahler.

Dimanche 2 juin 1901 : Performance in Chicago of Anton Bruckner's « Te Deum » (WAB 45) under organist Wilhelm Middelschulte (born 3 April 1863 in Werve, Kreis Hamm - now part of Kamen ; died on 4 May 1943 in Dortmund) . He had previously directed the Mass in F minor (WAB 28) on Christmas-Day, 1900.

Juin 1901 : Gustav Mahler's music-publisher « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » and printer Josef Eberle and other major Vienna publishers found « Universal-Edition » , the publishing company which eventually takes on all of Mahler's Symphonies and much of the work of the « Second Viennese School » .

Juin 1901 : In Heidelberg, at the 37th Festival of the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » , Richard Strauß is elected President of the association. He puts the focus of the organization on the production of contemporary works.

After recovering from the hemorrhage and surgical operation, Gustav Mahler leaves Vienna early to begin his vacation in Maiernigg, on June 5th, and begins his 5th Symphony, with the 1st movement « Funeral March » , the stormy 2nd movement (with its big climax) , and the monumental 3rd movement Scherzo, which apparently was an earlier idea. Inspired by his near-death experience, and his study of Johann Sebastian Bach during his convalescence, this work marks a sharp change in style, and the Symphony is filled with counterpoint. He also composes 8 songs, including the « Rückert Lieder » .

Été 1901 : While vacationing in Rapallo, Italy, the 35 year old Jean Sibelius begins his 2nd Symphony and completes it at the end of the year, in Finland.

Août 1901 : Alexander von Zemlinsky travels widely, visiting Bayreuth to see « Parsifal » , then, Nuremberg and Munich, finally spending the rest of his vacation at Mattsee with his sister Mathilde and Schöenberg. Zemlinsky and Alma Schindler plan a secret « rendez-vous » in Bad Ischl, but Alma's mother goes there, the same day, and so they cancel it.

Hedwig Lachmann translates Oscar Wilde's « Salome » into German and it has its 1st performance in Germany.

Vendredi, 9 août 1901 : The founding of Universal-Edition is reported in the Viennese press. Among other works, the new company is to publish the music of « important modern Masters such as Anton Bruckner, Karl Goldmark, and Franz Liszt » .

Septembre 1901 : The 16 year old Otto Klemperer goes to Frankfurt to study piano at the Hoch Conservatory.

Gustav Mahler writes to the 25 year old Bruno Schlesinger offering him a job in Vienna, and he accepts, becoming once again Mahler's assistant. Dropping his last name, on Mahler's advice, so that it will sound less Jewish, Bruno Walter (Schlesinger) will remain in Vienna until 1912.

The 31 year old Oskar Straus becomes conductor for the « Überbrettel » in Berlin and writes several farces for it.

Septembre 1901 : Alexander von Zemlinsky resumes his post at the « Carltheater » . Alma Schindler's mother finds-out about the plans he and Alma had for a secret « rendez-vous » in Bad Ischl, and forbids Alma from seeing him again. Alma threatens suicide, and her mother capitulates.

18 septembre 1901 : Hugo von Hoffmannsthal meets with Gustav Mahler regarding the production of his ballet collaboration with Alexander von Zemlinsky, « Der Triumph der Zeit » (The Triumph of Time) , but Mahler, notoriously condescending towards ballet, and finding the symbolism of the text incomprehensible, is not interested. Zemlinsky pushes-on with the composition of the music anyway.

24 septembre 1901 : On the last day of her vacation, Alma Schindler longingly dreams about having sex with Alexander von Zemlinsky.

25 septembre 1901 : Alma Schindler and her family return to Vienna and move into their new villa, on the « Hohe Warte » .

5 octobre 1901 : Alexander von Zemlinsky visits Alma Schindler for the 1st time since May, and their music lessons resume on October 11th.

By the fall, Zemlinsky's sister Mathilde is 6 months pregnant by the 27 year old Arnold Schönberg. They marry on October 7th ; thus, Schönberg's former teacher becomes his brother-in-law.

14 octobre 1901 : On his 30th birthday, Alexander von Zemlinsky finishes the short-score of his 3 Act ballet, « Der Triumph der Zeit » (The Triumph of Time) . Act I is already orchestrated, and he immediately begins orchestration of Acts 2 and 3.

Lundi, 21 octobre 1901 : Richard Strauß conducts Anton Bruckner's 3rd Symphony at the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin. In a letter to his parents (dated November 7th) , he writes of an enormous success.

Lundi, 4 novembre 1901 : Franz Zeischka (1864-1909) conducts Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony in Teplitz (« Töplitz-Schönau ») .

6 novembre 1901 : The 22 year old Alma Schindler is totally in love with Alexander von Zemlinsky. He is becoming irritated with her, probably because she is such a flirt, but she reconciles with him and all is forgiven.

6 novembre 1901 : At a party, Alma Schindler formally meets and finally engages in conversation with the 41 year old Gustav Mahler. Alma chastises Mahler for holding-on to Zemlinsky's score of « Der Triumph der Zeit » (The Triumph of Time) for so long without giving the composer a response and, with Mahler criticizing the work, an argument develops. Nevertheless, Mahler falls head over heels for her and woos her like a love-crazed school boy, sending her an anonymous love-poem. Alma's admiration for Mahler quickly turns to love as he displaces Zemlinsky in her heart. Things move fast.

Vendredi, 15 novembre 1901 : Martin Spörr conducts Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony in Graz.

19 novembre 1901 : Alma Schindler realizes that the anonymous love-poem was by Gustav Mahler, and writes in her diary :

« Alex von Zemlinsky - who is he ? »

Novembre 1901 : Julius Korngold and his family move to Vienna, where he works at 1st as a lawyer.

21 novembre 1901 : Richard Strauß's Opera, « Feuersnot » , is premiered in Dresden under the direction of Ernst von Schuch.

25 novembre 1901 : In Munich, Gustav Mahler conducts the premiere of his 4th Symphony with the Kaim Orchestra ; the soprano is Margarete Michalek. It is the 1st new work of his to be performed since the 2nd Symphony, in 1895.

Where the public had, by now, come to appreciate the 2nd, and expected another large imposing work, they are baffled by the smaller scale and « antiquated style » of the 4th. The critics are almost universally hostile.

The Kaim Orchestra, then, goes on tour with Mahler's 4th under its regular conductor, Felix Weingartner. At one performance, Weingartner pleads illness, takes a break, and returns to conduct only the finale from Mahler's 4th. Audiences do not know what to make of the work, the tour is a disaster for Mahler's reputation, Mahler breaks his friendship with the conductor, and Weingartner never conducts a Mahler piece again.

Décembre 1901 : Julius Buths (7 May 1851 - 12 March 1920) conducts Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony in Düsseldorf, where he also directs Edward Elgar's « Dream of Gerontius » , in 1901 and 1902.

Dimanche, 1er décembre 1901 : Arnold Schönberg's Songs, Opus 2, are premiered in Vienna. Schönberg and Mathilde Zemlinsky move to Berlin, a few days later, where Schönberg begins his job as music-director of the « Überbrettel » ; his contract ends in July 1902.

Lundi, 2 décembre 1901 : Le chef Karl Muck dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » , dans le cadre d'un concert commandité par les Sociétés Richard Wagner de Berlin et de Berlin-Potsdam.

Vendredi, 13 décembre 1901 : Martin Spörr conducts Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony in Graz.

Décembre 1901 : Gustav Mahler conducts his 4th Symphony in Berlin, receiving a storm of boos and nasty reviews. His 2nd Symphony is performed in Dresden, under Ernst von Schuch, to warm applause but negative reviews. In Leipzig, Hermann Seemann publishes the 1st monograph on Mahler in his « Moderne Musiker » series ; a small book written by Ludwig Schiedermaier.

Décembre 1901 : According to Alma, she asks Arnold Schönberg (who is unaware of her relationship to Mahler) if he will be attending the performance of Mahler's 4th Symphony, and he answers :

« How can Mahler do anything with the 4th when he has already failed to do anything with the 1st ? »

It will be 3 more years before Schönberg appreciates Mahler's music.

À l'orgue : Paul Homeyer. Concert-gala donné en l'honneur d'Eugène d'Albert et d'Enrico Bossi, présents dans la salle.

Georg Göhler

Karl Georg Göhler (geboren 29. Juni 1874 in Zwickau ; gestorben 4. März 1954 in Lübeck) war ein deutscher Komponist, Dirigent, Musikerzieher und -kritiker.

Karl Georg Göhler studierte ab 1893 am Konservatorium Leipzig bei Hermann Kretzschmar Theorie, Komposition, Klavier und Orgel und promovierte dort 1896. Seine Erfahrungen als Dirigent konnte er bereits 1897 als Chorleiter des Riedel-Vereins in Leipzig sammeln. 1903 wurde er Hofkapellmeister am Landestheater Altenburg, wo er unter anderem Erstaufführungen von Opern an dieser Bühne leitete. Hierzu gehörten 1903 Jacques Offenbachs « Hoffmanns Erzählungen », 1910 Giacomo Puccinis « Madama Butterfly », sowie Bedřich Smetanas « Verkaufte Braut » und 1909 Richard Wagners « Ring des Nibelungen » .

Von 1907 bis 1909 war er Hofkapellmeister an der Großherzoglich Badischen Hofkapelle in Karlsruhe. Ab 1909 dirigierte er erneut in Leipzig den Riedel-Verein sowie das Orchester der Musikalischen Gesellschaft.

Zwischen 1913 und 1915 war er Leiter der Neuen Oper Hamburg und des Hamburger Lehrergesangvereins. Dort richtete er unter anderem Giuseppe Verdis Oper « La forza del destino » ein. 1915 wurde er Nachfolger von Wilhelm Furtwängler als Dirigent des Orchesters des Vereins der Musikfreunde in Lübeck. Er koordinierte in Lübeck die Sinfoniekonzerte, den Philharmonischen Chor und Volkskonzerte.

1922 kehrte er als Kapellmeister an das Landestheater Altenburg zurück und wurde dort 1925 zum Generalmusikdirektor ernannt. In dieser Zeit hat er auch wesentlich zur Verdi-Renaissance im Deutschland der 20er Jahre beigetragen : 1928 dirigierte er an der Dresdner Staatsoper Verdis « Macbeth » 81 Jahre nach der Uraufführung erstmals auf einer deutschen Bühne. Daneben leitete er die Philharmonischen Konzerte in Halle und wirkte als Gastdirigent bei mehreren Orchestern. 1932 zog er sich aus dem öffentlichen Musikleben zurück und widmete sich seiner Arbeit als Komponist und Musikwissenschaftler.

Göhler war ein Förderer der Musik von Anton Bruckner und vor allem von Gustav Mahler. Am 9. Januar 1914 dirigierte er in Leipzig die von Mahler selbst kurz vor seinem Tod fertiggestellte Neufassung der 5. Sinfonie als « Uraufführung der Neufassung » (Bucholtz ; Seite 142ff) .

Göhler hat ein umfangreiches Werk hinterlassen, darunter über 200 Lieder im traditionellen Stil. So schrieb er einfache Strophenlieder ebenso wie romantische Miniaturen und ausgeformte Kunstlieder. Darüber hinaus schuf er fünf Sinfonien, Klavier-, Violin- und Cellokonzerte, eine Oper und zahlreiche Kammermusikwerke. Er war ein Gegner jeder moderner Musik, die über die klassische und romantische Tradition hinausgehende Stilentwicklung hinausreicht, was letztlich dazu führte, daß seine zahlreichen Kompositionen trotz aller kompositionstechnischen Feinheiten heute praktisch vergeblich sind.

Er schrieb zahlreiche Artikel in Zeitungen und Zeitschriften und andere in Der Kunstwart, Die Zukunft (herausgegeben von Maximilian Harden) und in der Zeitschrift für Musik.

Sein Nachlaß, darunter über 23.000 Briefe, die seine Kontakte zu vielen Künstlerpersönlichkeiten seiner Zeit bezeugen, wird von der Ratsschulbibliothek Zwickau verwahrt.

1893 begann Georg Göhlers musikalische Laufbahn mit dem Studium an Konservatorium und Universität Leipzig. Hier wurde er 1896 promoviert und übernahm 1897 die Leitung des Riedel-Vereins. Daneben war er seit 1903

Hofkapellmeister in Altenburg, ging in dieser Eigenschaft 1907 nach Karlsruhe und wirkte seit 1909 erneut in Leipzig als Dirigent des Riedel-Vereins und der Musikalischen Gesellschaft. 1913-1915 Leiter der Neuen Oper und des Lehrergesangsvereins in Hamburg, wurde Göhler 1915 als Nachfolger Furtwänglers nach Lübeck berufen. 1922 kehrte er an das Landestheater Altenburg zurück, leitete die Philharmonischen Konzerte in Halle und reiste außerdem als Gastdirigent, ehe er sich 1932 vom öffentlichen Musikleben zurückzog und nur noch seinem Schaffen lebte. Während dem aufgeschlossenen Dirigenten der Einsatz für damals noch unbekanntere Verdi-Opern, für Anton Bruckner und vor allem für Gustav Mahler zu danken ist, nahm der Kritiker, Herausgeber und Komponist Göhler eine ausgesprochen retrospektive Haltung ein. Als Gegner jeder modernen, über die klassische und romantische Tradition hinausgehenden Stilentwicklung sah der Altersgenosse Arnold Schœnbergs in der Romantik seine geistige Heimat. Diese bewußte Rückschau prägte sein gesamtes Œuvre, dem trotz aller kompositionstechnischen Feinheiten aufgrund seines romantischen Stils überzeitliche Wirkung versagt blieb.

Der Nachlass des 1874 in Zwickau geborenen und 1954 in Lübeck gestorbenen Dirigenten, Komponisten und Musikwissenschaftlers Doktor Georg Göhler wird seit 50 Jahren in der Ratsschulbibliothek in Zwickau aufbewahrt. Er umfasst circa 23.000 Briefe an Georg Göhler, seine Kompositionen als Autographe und Notendrucke, seine Notenbibliothek, seine Musikbibliothek sowie zahlreiche Lebensdokumente. Zum Nachlass gehören auch 2 Zimmereinrichtungen : Göhlers Arbeitszimmer, und andere mit 2 Büsten (Mozart, Beethoven) des Leipziger Bildhauers Carl Seffner (1861-1932) und Göhlers Wohnzimmer (Biedermeiermöbel aus der Zeit um 1830 mit Sekretär, Tisch, 6 Stühlen, Kommode, Sofa, Lehnstuhl, Ofenschirm, Kissen, Teppich sowie Gemälden und Kupferstichen) .

Nach einer bereits in den 1960er Jahren erfolgten Inventarisierung soll in den kommenden Jahren der handschriftlich vorliegende Teil des Nachlasses (Kompositionsmanuskripte und Briefsammlung) formal und inhaltlich im Handschriftenkatalog der RSB (Allegro-HANS) erschlossen werden. Zeitgleich wird eine mehrteilige CD-Edition mit Einspielungen von Orchesterwerken Georg Göhlers nach den Originalmanuskripten und Notendruckten vorbereitet.

17 février 1902 : Le chef Hans Winderstein dirige le « Winderstein-Orchester » dans la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 10e concert philharmonique donné au « Alberthalle » du « Krystallpalast » de Leipzig.

Hans Winderstein

The German conductor and composer Hans Wilhelm Gustav Winderstein was born on 29 October 1856 in Lüneburg, Hanover ; and died on 23 June 1925.

Winderstein studied from 1877 to 1880 at the Leipzig « Conservatoire » , under Henry Schradieck and Friedrich Hermann (violin) ; Ernst Friedrich Richter and Wilhelm Rust (theory) . He also played in the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra. From 1880 to 1884, he led Baron von Derwies' private Orchestra, at Nice, after which he was violin teacher at the Winterthur « Conservatoire » , in Switzerland, until 1887. He, then, conducted an Orchestra at Nuremberg for 3 years. From 1890 to 1893, he conducted the concerts of the Philharmonic Societies of Nuremberg and Fürth. Between 1893 to 1896, Winderstein directed the newly-established « Kaim Orchester » . In Leipzig, in 1896, he organized the « Winderstein Orchester » . He conducted this group of 60 musicians continually until at least 1918.

Winderstein founded the Philharmonic concerts in Leipzig and Halle, and made successful concert-tours to other cities. From 1898 to 1899, he conducted the Leipzig « Singakademie » .

His compositions for Orchestra include « Trauermarsch » , « Valse-Caprice » , and « Ständchen » . Winderstein also wrote several works for violin and piano.

26 février 1902 : Le chef Georg Göhler dirige à la « Thomaskirche » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester », accompagné par le Chœur du « Riedel-Verein », dans la première allemande du « Psaume 150 » (WAB 38) d'Anton Bruckner. La soliste : la soprano Johanna Dietz. À l'orgue : Paul Homeyer. Il s'agit du 3e concert de la saison du « Riedel-Vereins » .

8 janvier 1902 : Arnold Schönberg's 1st child, daughter Gertrud, is born in Berlin.

Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony is published by Ludwig Döblinger, just before the Vienna premiere on January 12th. Alban Berg, not yet 17, attends and admires the music so much that he manages to steal Mahler's baton, which he keeps as a trophy for the rest of his life.

Alma still fails to recognize the greatness of Mahler's compositions, but since he is chasing her, she is magnetized by his powerful personality, genius as a conductor and, most of all, his profound intellectual prowess. Mahler had scheduled a performance of his 1st Symphony for a week later, but replaces it with another performance of the 4th, followed by the 2nd performance of « Das klagende Lied » ; the newspaper reviews are all negative.

25 janvier 1902 : The 27 year old Franz Schmidt conducts in Vienna the premiere of his 1st Symphony with the « Konzertvereinsorchester ». Schmidt has been a cellist in the Opera Orchestra under Mahler, who is still struggling for acceptance as a composer in Vienna, and the success of Schmidt's Symphony causes the press to play him off against Mahler. Partly because of this and partly because of the power which Mahler has vested in his concert Master Arnold Rosé, who doesn't like Schmidt, Schmidt's position in the Orchestra becomes difficult. Mahler openly prefers Schmidt's cello playing to all the other cellists, and always assigns the principal roles to Schmidt when he is conducting, but Rosé prefers Friedrich Buxbaum. Eventually, this leads to a confrontation between Schmidt and Mahler and, after that, Schmidt sits at the back-desk and stays there for the rest of his years with the Opera.

29 janvier 1902 : Gustav Mahler conducts the Vienna premiere of Richard Strauß's Opera, « Feuersnot ». With its ribald humour, the conservative Viennese musical press typically labels it « obscene » and responds negatively. The bad newspaper reviews keep the public away from subsequent performances, and it is dropped after only 3 productions. Mahler writes to Alma that his involvement with « Feuersnot » had « awakened my productive powers » .

Début février 1902 : The 30 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky, broken-hearted over his loss of Alma, and inspired by Richard Strauß's « Ein Heldenleben » to compose a large-piece for orchestra, begins his « orchestral fantasy » Symphonic poem « Die Seejungfrau » (The Mermaid) , after Hans Christian Andersen's fairy-tale, working on it for 1 year. Originally sketched as a single large movement, it eventually emerges in a 3 movement form by September.

Alma's chief ambition is to be a composer, but Gustav Mahler tells her bluntly that there will be only one great composer in their house. Alma tries to hold back her tears and accept her fate stoically, but she is heart-broken, and although she loves him and submits to his demand, she will remain bitter about this sacrifice for the rest of her years with Mahler.

Début février 1902 : Alma becomes pregnant by Mahler with their 1st child.

8 mars 1902 : Jean Sibelius conducts the Helsinki Philharmonic Orchestra in the premiere of his 2nd Symphony in Helsingfors (now, Helsinki) , Finland.

9 mars 1902 : Mahler and Alma marry ; so much for Zemlinsky. He accepts the situation as best he can, as he too recognizes Mahler's genius and understands Alma's attraction to it, and also because he feels somewhat obligated because Mahler also expresses a very active interest in Zemlinsky's own work. Mahler and Alma spend 3 weeks in Saint-Petersburg, Russia, on their honeymoon, where Mahler also conducts 3 concerts.

Début mars 1902 : The 17 year old Alban Berg gets one of the family's servant girls (Marie Scheuchl) pregnant.

18 mars 1902 : Long-awaited premiere of Arnold Schönberg's « Verklärte Nacht » , in Vienna. Schönberg himself, living in Berlin, is not able to attend, but the 18 year old Anton Webern is there, his family having moved to Vienna. Zemlinsky had shown this score to the music-critic Max Graf, who claims to have been the 1st to show it to Mahler, before the break in their friendship in early 1902. Mahler also misses the performance, as he and Alma are on their honeymoon in Saint-Petersburg, but it is clear that he has indeed seen the score and that it made an impression on him, and he says in a letter that he would have been very interested in hearing the piece.

It is also around this time that Anton Webern 1st hears the Opera « Tristan und Isolde » and becomes engulfed in Richard Wagner's musical world ; so, evidently, Webern began to be influenced by both Wagner and Schönberg at around the same time.

Avril 1902 : In Berlin, and probably through Ernst von Wolzogen, Arnold Schönberg meets Richard Strauß, and they become fairly close. Strauß recognizes Schönberg's talent, critiques « Verklärte Nacht » , and tries to help him earn money.

30 avril 1902 : Claude Debussy's Opera, « Pelléas et Mélisande » , is premiered at the Paris « Opéra-Comique » , with Jean Périer as Pelléas and Mary Garden as Mélisande in a performance conducted by André Messager, who was instrumental in getting the « Opéra-Comique » to stage the work. The only Opera Debussy ever completed. It rapidly becomes a big success at the box-office. It is considered a landmark in 20th Century music.

May 1902 : Alexander von Zemlinsky and the « Carltheater » company make a 4 week guest-appearance in Dresden. Zemlinsky, then, visits his sister Mathilde and Arnold Schönberg in Berlin.

1902 : Un boîtier contenant une partie de la correspondance d'Anton Bruckner est légué au 1er biographe de Bruckner, August Göllerich, de Linz. Ses lettres se trouvent aujourd'hui au monastère de Saint-Florian.

1902 : The Austrian music-critic and writer Theodor (Otto) Helm organizes a 3 year Bruckner Celebration with the collaboration of the « Akademische Gesangverein » , 6 years after the composer's death. However, the well-known annual Bruckner Festival wasn't founded until 1929.

1902 : Richard Strauß dirige à Zürich la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Tonkünstler-Orchester » de Berlin.

Juin 1902 : In Krefeld, Gustav Mahler finally premieres his 3rd Symphony at the 38th Festival of the « Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein » (German General Music Association) . This premiere has been enthusiastically anticipated, the hall is packed, and the Symphony is met with a thunderous ovation : this concert is the turning-point in Mahler's career, and really puts him « on the map » as a significant composer. For a few years after this, rather than having to solicit publications and performances of his works, he will be able to select from the handsome offers of music-publishers and concert directors.

Été 1902 : Over the 1st of what will be only 5 happy summers with his new family, Mahler retires to his villa, in Maiernigg, and spending the days in his « Hauschen » (composing-hut) , brings his 5th Symphony to completion with the famous 4th movement Adagietto (which, according to Willem Mengelberg, is a love-song to Alma) , and the 5th movement Rondo-Finale. This work thus finds a unique structural form, and ushers in the triptych of instrumental Symphonies of Mahler's « middle-period » .

Juillet 1902 : Arnold Schönberg's contract at the « Überbrettl Theater » runs-out and is not renewed, probably because Ernst von Wolzogen himself has left the « Theater » . Schönberg remains in Berlin anyway, and Richard Strauß helps him earn money by finding him jobs orchestrating and copying thousands of pages of Operettas.

Now finding the time to begin a large project, Arnold Schönberg asks Richard Strauß for advice on an Opera text, and Strauß proposes a German translation of Maurice Maeterlinck's play, « Pelléas et Mélisande » ; apparently, both of them are unaware of Claude Debussy's just-completed Opera on this text. Probably inspired by Alexander von Zemlinsky's contemporary work on « Die Seejungfrau » , Schönberg instead composes a large Symphonic poem on « Pelléas et Mélisande » , which is finished by early next year when he is 28. It is again a long single movement but, this time, Schönberg appropriates from Franz Liszt (i.e. , the B minor Piano Sonata) the idea of fusing all 4 traditional movements into a I movement form, amalgamating aspects of the other movements of Symphonic form (Scherzo, Adagio, Finale) with the 1st movement « Sonata-form », something Schœnberg will do again in his next 2 large pieces.

« Pelleas und Melisande » also marks Arnold Schœnberg's 1st really adventurous harmonic advances, using :

Progressions of augmented chords in contrary motion to produce hexads made-up of the entire « whole-tone scale », and tetrads built on stacked « 4ths » (whereas harmonic theory and practice had dictated since the time of Gioseffo Zarlino, around 1558, that chords be built on « 3rds ») . In 1910, Schœnberg will cite this example in his « Harmonielehre » (although the passage is transposed up one whole-tone, example 330) , and write about it :

« Quite isolated, they appear there just once, as expression of a mood whose singularity caused me against my will to find what was to me a new means of expression. Against my will - I still remember, even today, that I hesitated to notate this sound. The clarity with which it forced itself upon me, however, made it impossible for me to dismiss it. »

Alexander von Zemlinsky negotiates a good contract with the « Theater and der Wien » for the upcoming season, but is taken to Court by his « Carltheater » employer and is ordered to honour their verbal contract. He spends August with Arnold Schœnberg, Arthur Bodanzky, and Karl Weigl, at Altmünster on the Traunsee, and completes the orchestration of the 1st movement of « Die Seejungfrau » (The Mermaid) .

Août 1902 : Due to Eduard Hanslick's influence, Moritz Benedict hires the 41 year old Julius Korngold to succeed Hanslick as chief music-critic of the Vienna « Neue Freie Presse », dashing the hopes Richard Heuberger (the number 2 critic at the paper) had for obtaining the position. While most established critics, including Heuberger, oppose Gustav Mahler's changes at the Opera, Korngold writes a lead article supporting Mahler, which put Korngold's name in the public-eye, from then on. Julius' 5 year old son, Erich Wolfgang, has also, by now, already learned all the chords in all the keys on the piano, and begins taking piano lessons and music-theory lessons with Emil Lamm (a relative) , and soon writes his 1st compositions.

Début septembre 1902 : Alexander von Zemlinsky completes the short-score of his « orchestral fantasy » Symphonic poem « Die Seejungfrau » (The Mermaid) .

11 septembre 1902 : Anton Webern composes the song « Fromm » at his summer-home, at the « Preglhof » .

Septembre 1902 : The 52 year old Richard Heuberger becomes conductor of the « Männergesangverein », and is also appointed professor at the Vienna Conservatory.

Gustav Mahler is replaced as conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic Concerts by the 47 year old Josef Hellmesberger, Junior.

On the recommendation of Richard Strauß, Arnold Schönberg obtains a position as teacher of composition at the Stern Conservatory, in Berlin. (There seems to have no surviving record of his activity.)

The 17 year old Otto Klemperer also moves to Berlin, following his piano teacher to the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory.

Gustav Mahler's early Cantata, « Das klagende Lied » , is published by « Josef Weinberger Musikverlage » .

Automne 1902 : Gustav Mahler's 3rd Symphony is performed in several German cities.

23 octobre 1902 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 3e concert de la saison.

27 octobre 1902 : Création berlinoise de la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner par le chef Arthur Nikisch dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

3 novembre 1902 : Mahler and Alma's 1st daughter Maria is born.

4 décembre 1902 : The 17 year old Alban Berg's illegitimate daughter Albine is born.

16 décembre 1902 : Alma Mahler complains of her loneliness and the loss of her composing.

Hedwig Lachmann's German translation of Oscar Wilde's « Salome » has a long run in Berlin, by which time Richard Strauß has become inspired by it and has already begun composing an Opera based on it.

De 1902 à 1905, soit 6 ans après la mort d'Anton Bruckner, le critique musical et écrivain autrichien Theodor (Otto) Helm organise, en collaboration avec le « Wiener Akademische Gesangverein » , un événement exceptionnel appelé « Célébrations » , en hommage au compositeur de Saint-Florian. Par ailleurs, le Festival Bruckner annuel ne sera fondé qu'en 1929.

1903

Bruno Walter and Alma have been trying to convince Mahler of the value of Hans Pfitzner's work. Mahler, at least, likes Pfitzner's String Quartet (No. 1, Opus 13) which is performed in Vienna by the (Arnold) Rosé Quartet on January 13th.

11 février 1903 : Création au « Konzertverein » de Vienne des 3 mouvements achevés de la 9e Symphonie dans la révision du chef d'orchestre et élève de Bruckner, Ferdinand Löwe. Le « Te Deum » est joué en guise de conclusion.

According to the cellist Josef Laser, Löwe rehearsed with parts made from the original manuscript, but made numerous alterations in the course of the rehearsals, which eventually resulted in a comprehensive revision. Löwe decided that the cello accompaniment in bars 223-224 in the 1st movement needed to be extended for another 2 bars to support the horn in bars 225-226 ; and that several passages in the same movement (for instance, bars 245ff) needed an added timpani part; and that a new passage for oboe and clarinet was required to fill in the pause in bars 301-302. A contrabassoon is added, and the opening of the Scherzo is re-scored with wind replacing the quaver pizzicati. Other changes conform to the patterns set by the Schalkian interventions in that dynamic contrasts are moderated throughout, as for instance in the passages before letters M (bar 173) and T (bar 219) in the Adagio, where Bruckner's crescendo sempre indications are replaced by diminuendi.

Most glaringly, the main climax (bar 199, letter Q) is tamed into an augmented chord on E ; Bruckner's A natural is absent, the F-sharp is represented only by demi-semiquaver passing notes on the violins, and as even the C natural is only fleetingly present in a trumpet quaver on the 1st beat, the initial effect is of a plain E major (further weakened when dynamic « hairpins » replace Bruckner's unrelenting fortissimo) . Löwe's treatment of this passage is surely the defining statement of his pupils' lack of understanding of their Master's work.

(In Löwe's piano solo reduction, issued at the same time, the C natural is strongly stated in left-hand chords, which are also emphasized in the piano duet version made in collaboration with Josef Schalk, but these do not correspond to anything in the full-score.)

Le jeune Anton Webern assiste à cette première de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner.

18 février 1903 : Ferdinand Löwe conducts in Vienna Alexander von Zemlinsky's « Drei Balletstücke » (3 ballet-pieces) , which is one of the works Zemlinsky has salvaged from the wreckage of his abandoned project, « Der Triumph der Zeit » (The Triumph of Time) . Mahler and Alma are both there, and Mahler likes the piece.

Under the influence of Mahler's new circle of friends, via his wife (the artists of the Vienna « Secession » movement) , he becomes receptive to the most « avant-garde » artistic ideas.

21 février 1903 : Gustav Mahler's new production of « Tristan und Isolde » , in collaboration with imaginative new ideas in scenery, costumes, and especially lighting, by his new stage-director Alfred Roller, opens a new era in Opera production, becoming ever closer to Richard Wagner's « Gesamtkunstwerk » (Total artwork) concept.

22 février 1903 : Lettre de Anton Webern racontant son expérience de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner :

« The work is dedicated “ dem lieben Gott ”. With the Adagio, Bruckner bade farewell to the world - and, really, if you listen quite attentively, you imagine at the Adagio's end, which is wonderfully gentle and transfigured, seeing the dear man ascend to heaven, even farther and higher, until the heavenly abode opens itself to him with the last, softest, long, long held E-major chord of the tubas (5 !) and horns. There can hardly be anything more beautiful than this Adagio. »

Hans and Rosaleen Moldenhauer. « Anton von Webern - A Chronicle of his Life and Work » , Gollanz, London (1978) .

The 1st performance of Bruckner's Ninth was coupled with one of his Te Deum, in which several Vienna choruses, including the Academic Richard Wagner Society, participated. Webern had already been initiated into that group, on 30 October 1902, at the beginning of the season.

This 1st performance was the Ferdinand Löwe edition of the 9th, much altered and tamed-down from Bruckner's original manuscript. (The recorded performance of the work by Hans Knappertsbusch uses this altered edition.)

22 février 1903 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schaumann, transmise à l'occasion de la création donnée à Vienne de la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner sous la direction du chef Ferdinand Löwe.

22 février 1903 : Hugo Wolf dies in an asylum in the Vienna suburbs, just a few weeks before his 43rd birthday.

Début 1903 : Richard Strauß and several other composers form the « Genossenschaft deutscher Tonsetzer » (Cooperative of German Tone-Setters) , to keep account of concert performances and pay orchestral composers royalties in the same way Opera-composers receive them. Strauß tells Gustav Mahler that his membership is essential in getting the organization off the ground, and shows sincere concern for Mahler's financial rights as well. Mahler joins when his membership in the Vienna « Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger » (Society of authors, composers and music-publishers) expires at the end of the year.

Mars 1903 : Alexander von Zemlinsky completes the orchestration of his large « orchestral fantasy » , « Die Seejungfrau » (The Mermaid) . Since August, he has also been sketching a new Opera project called « Malva » , about an old man who leaves his wife for a younger woman who, in turn, falls in love with his son. Hoping to interest Mahler in producing it at the « Hofoper » , Mahler rejects it on April 21st, probably seeing the similarities of its plot to the Mahler / Alma / Zemlinsky situation, and Zemlinsky abandons the project.

10 avril 1903 : The 19 year old Anton Webern composes the song « Nachtgebet der Braut » at his summer-home at « Preglhof » .

Printemps 1903 : Arnold Schönberg's contract at the Stern Conservatory expires. Knowing he is badly in need of money, Richard Strauß hires Schönberg for himself, to copy the score and parts for his new work, « Taillefer » , for soloists, choir and large orchestra, composed as thanks to Heidelberg University for the festive occasion of conferring on Strauß an honorary doctorate, to be presented in October. Schönberg copies the Strauß piece while he is orchestrating his own « Pelleas und Melisande » and « Gurrelieder » .

26 mai 1903 : The Vienna Philharmonic elects Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, over Gustav Mahler, 70 to 13.

29 mai 1903 : Alexander von Zemlinsky conducts at the « Carltheater » for the last time. At the end of the concert season, Zemlinsky also resigns from the « Wiener Tonkünstlerverein » (Viennese Tone-Artists Association) , after they refused to play Arnold Schönberg's « Verklärte Nacht » (with Schönberg away in Berlin) . Later in the year, Zemlinsky accepts the invitation to become Music-Director of a new Music-Society formed with the intention of sponsoring « new music » in Vienna, the « Ansorge-Verein » , named after the composer Conrad Ansorge. The Society gives concerts for only 1 season before folding and, in any case, does not fulfill Zemlinsky's hopes.

Around this time, Alma is writing in her diary about nightmares she has, which can clearly be interpreted as an outlet of her feelings of being stifled by Mahler.

23 juin 1903 : In a letter to Arnold Schönberg, Alexander von Zemlinsky cites the Mahler-Roller team at the « Hofoper » (Court Opera House) as the only progressive musical force in Vienna, emphasizes the conservatism of all of Vienna's other musical institutions, and discourages Schönberg from returning to Vienna ... but with little prospect of earning income in Berlin, the Schönbergs see no reason to stay, and decide to return to Vienna in the fall. Schönberg spends the summer in Payberbach, orchestrating his « Gurrelieder » .

Juillet 1903 : Just after his 39th birthday, Richard Strauß completes his « Sinfonia Domestica » while vacationing on the Isle of Wight.

At the Academy of Music in Budapest, Hungary, the 22 year old Béla Bartók hears Richard Strauß's tone-poem, « Also Sprach Zarathustra » , and later says that it showed that :

« There was a way of composing which seemed to hold the seeds of a new life. »

Inspired by Strauß and Hungarian nationalism, Bartók composes his 1st major work, the Symphonic poem « Kossuth » , which honours the lawyer, journalist and politician Lajos Kossuth, hero of the Hungarian Revolution of 1848.

Été 1903 : Over the course of another happy summer in Maiernigg, the 43 year old Gustav Mahler composes the 1st 3 movements of his 6th Symphony from June 16 to July 18. About the lyrical 2nd theme of the 1st movement, Alma says that he tells her :

« I wrote you into my Symphony. »

It seems probable that Mahler got this idea from knowledge of Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » . I believe that, here and in each of his subsequent Symphonies, Mahler portrays himself and his wife in the principal and subordinate themes, respectively, of his 1st movements, thus, personifying the contrast between dramatic and the lyrical in the 2 main subjects of each Symphony.

The 18 year old Alban Berg fails his graduation examinations. This, together with his unintended fatherhood, prompts him to attempt suicide, but he lives - given Berg's flair for theatrical drama, it is possible that this is just a call for attention and is not meant to be successful.

Été 1903 : At the « Preglhof » for summer vacation, after his 1st year at the University, the 19 year old Anton Webern composes several songs, including « Aufblick » (Looking upwards) , on August 12th ; and « Sommerabend » (Summer evening) , on September 7th. In September, he composes « Siegfrieds Schwert » (Siegfried's Sword) for voice and orchestra on a poem by Johann Ludwig Uhland.

Août 1903 : Arnold Schœnberg and Mathilde leave their summer retreat in Payberbach and return to Vienna (according to some sources, sharing housing with the Zemlinsky family for a time to save money) , renting an apartment near the Zemlinsky's at « Liechtensteinstraße Nr. 68-70 » , in the 3rd District. Alexander Zemlinsky gets his own apartment on the same floor of the same building, shortly after. Eugenie Schwarzwald offers to let Schœnberg teach in her school, free of charge, and Schœnberg begins his long teaching career in earnest, holding harmony and counterpoint classes in Schwarzwald's school. Mainly due to Richard Strauß's influence, Schœnberg is awarded the Liszt Foundation fellowship.

Août 1903 : Arnold Schœnberg begins working on a String Quartet in D minor (different from Opus 7) which will remain incomplete ; its 1st movement is a big double-fugue.

Mi-septembre 1903 : Alma becomes pregnant by Mahler with their 2nd child. Mahler puts the finishing touches on the score of his 5th Symphony and sets a fee of 10,000 « Gulden » for its publication by Edition Peters.

Fin septembre 1903 : Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, is involved in a widely-publicized scandal with a young girl, resigns from his post with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and is dismissed from the Vienna Opera.

Octobre 1903 : The 29 year old Arnold Schœnberg's work is published for the 1st time : the 2 Songs, Opus 1 ; and 4 Songs, Opus 2, by « Verlag Dreililien » in Berlin, a publishing-house started by the Mahler-admirer and critic Max Marschalk.

Du 18 au 23 octobre 1903 : Gustav Mahler stays with Willem Mengelberg, in Holland, for the Amsterdam premiere (and its repeat the next day) of his 3rd Symphony. He rightly feels that Amsterdam is the 1st place where people really admire his work, and it becomes the earliest center of Mahler enthusiasm.

26 octobre 1903 : Création berlinoise de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner par le chef Arthur Nikisch dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

30 octobre 1903 : Hugo von Hofmannsthal's German version of Sophocles's « Electra » premieres at Max Reinhardt's « Kleines Theater » in Berlin. It is possible that Richard Strauß sees it around this time (we know for certain that he attends a performance in 1905) .

13 novembre 1903 : Le chef Bernhard Stavenhagen dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Une première munichoise.

21 novembre 1903 : In Vienna, Anton Webern composes the song « Heimgang in der Frühe » .

24 novembre 1903 : In Vienna, Anton Webern composes the song, « Der Tod » .

Entre novembre 1903 et mai 1904 : Arnold Schönberg composes several songs that will appear in later collections.

6 Songs, Opus 3 :

9 novembre 1903 : « Die Aufgeregten » (The excited ones) .

10 novembre 1903 : « Geübtes Herz » (Experienced Heart) .

8 Songs, Opus 6 :

18 décembre 1903 : « Traumleben » (Dream-life) .

19 décembre 1903 : « Verlassen » (Left behind) .

23 janvier 1904 : « Ghasel » .

6 Orchestral Songs, Opus 8 :

Esquissée le 26 novembre 1903 et complétée le 25 mai 1904 : « Das Wappenschild » (The Coat of Arms) .

Esquissée le 18 décembre 1903 et complétée le 7 mars 1904 : « Natur » (Nature) .

Novembre 1903 : Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony is performed with Julius Butts conducting in Düsseldorf.

28 décembre 1903 : John Louis Neumann is born in Budapest (Hungary, at that time, part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire) .

A decade later, his family will be granted nobility status and, after emigrating to America as John von Neumann, he will play a decisive role in the evolution of the 1st electronic digital computers « ENIAC » and « EDVAC » .

Anton Bruckner events in 1904 were dominated by concerts which featured the 9th Symphony (1st performed the previous year) , in conjunction with Bruckner's « Te Deum » . Writing in a spring edition of « Die Musik » , Anton Klima reported a performance in Töplitz-Schönau (Teplice) . On May 6, the 9th Symphony and « Te Deum » were given in Königsberg under the baton of Ernst Wendel ; 105 orchestral players and some 250 singers took part. But these forces were modest, compared to the 120 American players and 800-strong chorus who premiered the « Te Deum » in Cincinnati during Bruckner's lifetime. Richard Strauß conducted the 9th and the « Te Deum » in a Whit Sunday concert at the Bavarian Music Festival, in Regensburg. A correspondent to « Die Musik » expressed regret that, in Mannheim, the Orchestra of the Court Theatre had given Bruckner's 9th « without » the « Te Deum ». In the autumn of 1904, the 2 works were coupled once more at a Karlsruhe concert which opened with Johannes Brahms' « Song of Destiny ». They were also scheduled for a « Concert populaire », in Brussels. On November 24, Karl (Wilhelm) Pohlig conducted both compositions in Stuttgart.

In addition, the 9th Symphony and the « Te Deum » were often performed separately in 1904. Oskar Wermann directed Bruckner's « Te Deum » in the « Dresden Kreuzkirche », in January. That month saw the Leipzig premiere of the 9th, given by the City Orchestra of Chemnitz. On February 5, Richard Wagner's former associate Franz Fischer conducted the 9th Symphony in the Munich « Odeon ». An article on Bruckner by Alexander Reichel, with an analysis of the « Te Deum », appeared in the « Schweizerische Musikzeitung ». This followed a Berne performance in the winter. On February 19 and 20, Theodore Thomas conducted the North American premiere of Bruckner's 9th, in Chicago. On May 14, the work was played under his baton in Cincinnati. The « Te Deum » was given in Melbourne under the direction of George H. Clutsam (later to collaborate with Berté on the musical, « Lilac Time »).

Ferdinand Löwe, whose version of the 9th remained unchallenged for nearly 30 years, conducted performances of it with the Vienna « Konzertverein » Orchestra in Prague, Graz, Laibach/Ljubljana and Trieste. The critic Richard Batka wrote that, despite an « excellent » performance, the work met with little understanding in Prague. Nor was it greeted with universal delight in the Brahmsian stronghold of Hamburg, where Arthur Nikisch was reported as annoying concert patrons with a 2nd performance in November. Some of the more obtuse subscribers, according to Heinrich Chevalley, nicknamed the work « die Verworrene » (the muddle-headed). Hans Dorner directed Bruckner's « Te Deum » in Nuremberg, along with Franz Liszt's « Gran » Mass and Hugo Wolf's « Christnacht ».

Finally, « Die Musik » reported that, in 1905, the « Te Deum » would be heard at the Lithuanian Music Festival in Memel.

There were several English Bruckner events, in 1904. Hans Richter conducted the London Symphony Orchestra in Bruckner's 8th. In Manchester, he gave the 7th Symphony with the Hallé Orchestra (February 11). On June 26, a choir of railway officials from Vienna sang « Germanenzug » in Saint-James' Hall, London.

...

Alexander von Zemlinsky begins composing the music for his 3rd finished Opera, « Der Traumgörge », which will not be completed until October 1906.

Début 1904 : Béla Bartók hears a beautiful folk-melody being sung by a Transylvanian servant girl, and noticing how the notes of this song are different from the familiar « Gypsy » music he has known as « folk-music », it sparks his life-long interest in folk-music.

21 janvier 1904 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 14e concert de la saison.

17 février 1904 : The 1st version of Giacomo Puccini's Opera, « Madama Butterfly » is premiered at the « Teatro alla Scala », in Italy. He will go on to revise it several times, making 4 subsequent versions.

Mars 1904 : Arnold Schönberg's « Verklarte Nacht » is performed for the 2nd time in Vienna, by the chamber group headed by Arnold Rosé, Gustav Mahler's concert Master and brother-in-law. According to Max Graf, Mahler had seen and admired the score in 1902 ; Rosé, recognizing the quality of Schönberg's music, invites Mahler to the rehearsals, and Mahler is very impressed.

Mahler will support Schönberg's work from now until practically his last breath, even including the 1st atonal pieces which are beyond his understanding. Mahler's feelings for Schönberg run so strong partly because Schönberg is only 1 year younger than Mahler's brother, Otto, who, according to Mahler, was a talented composer and who had killed himself, 9 years before ; it seems possible that Mahler transferred his ambitions for Otto to Schönberg upon meeting the latter and learning his work ; together with Bruno Walter, who is slightly younger, the pair of musicians provide the outstanding composer/conductor Mahler was himself, and had hoped to see reproduced in his younger brother.

Fin mars 1904 : Arnold Schönberg begins his « Sketch-book I » with a String Quartet in D minor (different from Opus 7) , the Orchestra Lied Opus 8, « Der Wappenschild » , and the piece which he will eventually officially call his 1st String Quartet, Opus 7. He eventually abandons the « un-numbered » D minor Quartet, but will work on the 1st Quartet, on and off, for the next year and a half. Underlying the work is a « secret program » which describes not a story-line but rather a succession of moods.

Fin mars 1904 : Richard Strauß goes on his 1st concert tour of North America, conducting the world-premiere of his « Sinfonia Domestica » at Carnegie Hall, in New York.

1904 : Ire exécution dans l'ancienne église paroissiale (« Alte Stadtpfarrkirche ») de Steyr de la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner par le chef Franz Xaver Bayer.

27 mars 1904 : 8 ans après la mort d'Anton Bruckner, son ancien élève et confident, l'organiste Karl Waldeck, assiste à concert spécial du « dimanche des Rameaux » donné dans le cadre d'un Festival de musique à Linz. Le biographe personnel de Bruckner, August Göllerich fils, exécute la 6e Symphonie de même que la 3e Messe. Waldeck est profondément ému, surtout par la Messe en fa : une œuvre qui le ramène au cœur de sa création. Dans une lettre adressée à Franz Gräßlinger, Waldeck rappelle l'époque où Bruckner « lui a joué des parties de la Messe qui avait été composée à un moment fort tourmenté ; il vivait alors les émotions les plus douloureuses de sa vie » .

8 years after Bruckner's death, Karl Waldeck was present at a Festival Concert given in Linz, on Palm Sunday, 27 March 1904, at which August Göllerich conducted Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 and the F minor Mass. He was deeply moved particularly by the performance of the Mass as it brought back memories of the days of its conception. In a letter to Franz Gräßlinger, Waldeck recalled the time when Bruckner « played parts of his Mass which had been composed during a time of the most painful emotions and mental torment » .

Avril 1904 : Arnold Schœnberg's 6 Songs, Opus 3, are published by Dreililien. Schœnberg is awarded, for the 2nd time, the Liszt Foundation fellowship.

Avril 1904 : Alexander von Zemlinsky composes the song « Über eine Wiege » for the « Ansorge-Verein » (his only piece for that Society) , and leaves it soon after. After the demise of the « Ansorge-Verein » , Zemlinsky's main-goal is to obtain performances of 2 large orchestral works : his « Die Seejungfrau » and Arnold Schœnberg's « Pelleas und Melisande » . Schœnberg, Zemlinsky, Bruno Walter, Karl Weigl, and other leading-members of the Viennese « avant-garde » seek-out wealthy patrons, and form the « Vereinigung Schaffender Tonkünstler » (Union of Creative Tone-Artists) , modelled after the « Secession » , and name Gustav Mahler as honorary President ; despite initial promise, it will last only the 1 concert season of 1904-1905.

For the next 3 years, until Gustav Mahler's departure from Vienna, in 1907, Arnold Schœnberg and Alma's ex-boyfriend, Alexander von Zemlinsky, visit together regularly at Mahler's house. The evenings begin cordially but, in musical discussions afterwards, tempers flare and the argumentative and head-strong Schœnberg, who has not yet been able to appreciate Mahler's own compositions, repeatedly causes the 2 of them to be banished from the house because of his disrespect for the Master's opinions. Still, Mahler must be intrigued by the force of Schœnberg's logic, because he always invites them back.

During one of these conversations with Schœnberg, Mahler laments the loss of « mean-tone » as an international paradigm in European music :

« The loss of distinctive key colouration, which transforms the fixed pitch music of this (earlier) period with subtle colouristic distinctions impossible to imagine until one has heard them, is the great loss we have suffered in changing from “ mean-tone ” to the equal intervals and indistinguishable keys of equal temperament. »

This provides the only clue outside of the actual notation used in his scores (much of which has now been « simplified » by editors) as to Mahler's intentions regarding the tuning of his music. It must be remembered that he wrote almost exclusively for the orchestra, which has flexible intonation, and the frequent occurrence of « double-sharps » in his sketches may imply that he was often thinking in « mean-tone » rather than in 12-edo. (See : Yates, 1964 ; and Yates, 1990.)

The 54 year old Richard Heuberger becomes music-critic of the « Neue Musikalische Presse » .

The 23 year old Béla Bartók has the premieres of his Symphonic poem « Kossuth » , in Budapest and Manchester, and begins a a career as a pianist. He composes a Piano Quintet and 2 showpieces in the style of Franz Liszt : the « Rhapsody » , Opus 1 ; and the « Scherzo » (« Burlesque ») , Opus 2. He also makes his 1st transcription of Magyar folk-songs, realizing that this is the true folk-music of Hungary, and not the Gypsy-like music that Liszt had incorporated into his popular compositions.

The 20 year old Anton Webern has been composing a lot of songs and, on the advice of Guido Adler, his University teacher, he and Heinrich Jalowetz go to Berlin to meet the 35 year old Hans Pfitzner for the possibility of taken lessons. When Pfitzner disparages Gustav Mahler's music, Webern leaves in a rage, and Adler's 2nd recommendation is Arnold Schœnberg.

Juin 1904 : Mahler and Alma's 2nd and last child is born, their daughter Anna.

Alma is complaining in her diary of her boredom as « Frau Direktor » ; otherwise, they have another blissful summer vacation, and Mahler composes a lot :

Several lieder for the song-cycle « Kindertotenlieder » (Songs on the Death of Children) , which freaks-out Alma.

The 6th Symphony is completed with the Scherzo, where Alma says Gustav portrays his 2 daughters playing in their sand-box in the Trio, and its huge tragic 4th movement, with its bold harmonic experiments. Alma is troubled by the gloomy despair she hears in Mahler's 6th Symphony, with its « 3 blows of fate, the last of which fells the hero » , as Mahler described the last movement, composed during a time of such outward happiness. Indeed, this Symphony will be nick-named « the Tragic » and, again, will seem to be prophetic of the events in Mahler's life, in 1907.

The 2 « Nachtmusiken » (Night Musics) which will become the 2nd and 4th movements of his 7th Symphony.

Regarding a government move to re-organize the Vienna Conservatory, which has suffered from bad management, Gustav Mahler's friend, Guido Adler, the great musicologist who is also sympathetic to modern developments in music, endeavors to reform the institution, bringing Arnold Schœnberg and Alexander von Zemlinsky in as teachers, and to have Mahler appointed General-Director of a board overseeing all Viennese pedagogical establishments. Aware of the growing anti-Semitism in Vienna and Mahler's increasing dissatisfaction with his job, Adler works on these plans for the next 3 years, in hopes of keeping Mahler in Vienna in the event that his position at the Opera comes to an end ; as a result of political changes, the plan will eventually come to nothing.

Été 1904 : Anton Webern drafts 2 large movements for orchestra, which remain incomplete, and composes an orchestral tone-poem, « Im Sommerwind » (In the Summer-wind ») , his last and most significant composition before studying with Arnold Schœnberg.

Juillet 1904 : Arnold Schœnberg sets aside his work on the 1st section of the 1st String Quartet, to finish the 6 Orchestral Songs, Opus 8.

6 août 1904 : The influential Viennese music-critic and teacher, Eduard Hanslick, dies in Vienna at age 78. While Hanslick had been an anti-Wagnerian and not fond of Gustav Mahler's compositions, he admired Mahler's abilities as conductor and director, and his influence was so important to getting Mahler the job in Vienna. Perhaps, Hanslick's death during the composition of the 4th movement of the 6th Symphony may have caused Mahler to emphasize the tragic aspects of this music and conclude the piece in that mood, as a sort of tragic memorial to Hanslick.

Max Reger joins the « Vereinigung Schaffender Tonkünstler » (Union of Creative Tone-Artists) , and the plans to include his String Quartet in D minor, Opus 74, on a Union concert may have an influence on Arnold Schœnberg when, later in the year, he returns to the composition of his own 1st String Quartet (in the same key of D minor) , Opus 7, in his « Sketch-book I » , sketching the Scherzo theme, then, continuing work on the 1st section. (Walter Frisch, 1993 ; page 202 and pages 211-216.)

Automne 1904 : The 7 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold begins school. He also writes down his 1st compositions.

Automne 1904 : Arnold Schœnberg, now 30, begins teaching private lessons, taking on as his 1st students : Anton Webern, Heinrich Jalowitz, Alban Berg, and Erwin Stein. Webern and Berg will prove to be the most talented of all of Schœnberg's pupils, and the 3 of them will acknowledge that, together, they took part in the break-away from tonality.

Septembre 1904 : A pocket study-score of Gustav Mahler's 5th Symphony is published by Edition Peters. Later that month, with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, Mahler has 2 reading rehearsals of the work, which Arnold Schœnberg and Alexander von Zemlinsky attend. Realizing that his « new style demanded a new technique » , Mahler heavily revises the orchestration ; these changes are included in the full-score and parts published in November, but the early printing of the pocket-score leads to some confusion in subsequent editions.

Mi-octobre 1904 : Gustav Mahler travels to Köln (Cologne) for the world-premiere of his 5th Symphony on October 18th. Alma is supposed to meet him later but gets sick and stays home. Unfortunately, the 5th is such a failure at the Festival that Peters, who published it, refuses to publish anything else by him. Immediately after this, Mahler continues on to Holland.

10 novembre 1904 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 2e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 5e concert de la saison.

23 octobre 1904 : Amsterdam (Dutch) premiere of Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony with the composer conducting the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (which is so successful that it is played twice) . He conducts also 2 performances of his 2nd Symphony in Amsterdam.

10 octobre 1904 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

15 octobre 1904 : Arnold Schœnberg begins teaching a 4 hour harmony and counterpoint course, from 5 to 9 pm, at the Girl's « Gymnasium » on « Wallnerstraße Nr. 2 » , in central Vienna (1st District) , basing his course on Johann Gottfried Heinrich Bellermann's 1862 counterpoint treatise, « Der Contrapunkt » , most likely the 4th edition published in 1901.

The material in Bellermand's « Chapter 2 » apparently leads Schönberg to accept the overtone series as a reasonable explanation for the basis of musical harmony, and to formulate his important ideas about consonance and dissonance being « different in degree, not in kind » .

During the time that he teaches this class, Schönberg resumes work on the 1st half of his 1st String Quartet.

18 octobre 1904 : The 19 year old Alban Berg becomes an apprentice-accountant in the service of the Austrian government and, just after, begins taking lessons with Arnold Schönberg.

6 novembre 1904 : Walter Damrosch conducts the American premiere of Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony, in New York.

23 novembre 1904 : At the 1st « Vereinigung Schaffender Tonkünstler » (Union of Creative Tone-Artists) orchestral concert, Richard Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » has its Vienna premiere. Strauß was supposed to conduct it, but Mahler, as honorary President of the Union, does it instead. Mahler's reception of the « Domestica » has a powerful influence on his subsequent compositions, especially the very next one : his 7th Symphony (particularly, the 1st movement) .

11 décembre 1904 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige le « Psaume 150 » (WAB 38) de Bruckner avec le « Concert-Verein Heinrich Schwartz » , accompagné par l' « Orchester-Verein-Chor » et la soprano suédoise Valborg Svärdström. Violon-solo : Gustav Schulze. Une première munichoise. Il s'agit du 100e concert à se tenir à la salle de l'Odéon de Munich (« Königlich Odeon Konzerthaus ») . Début du concert : 17 heures.

12 décembre 1904 : Arnold Schönberg, Alexander von Zemlinsky, and pupils from Schönberg's class attend the final rehearsal of Gustav Mahler's 3rd Symphony, and are all swept-away and finally recognize Mahler's genius. Schönberg becomes so enthusiastic about Mahler's work that, he says later, that, in his admiration, he felt like a « school girl » . For the rest of his own long life, Schönberg will hold Mahler in the greatest esteem.

En janvier 1897, le « Verein der Musikfreunde » (Société des Amis de la Musique) de Lübeck, fondé en 1896, organisa un concours afin de nommer le chef d'un nouvel orchestre. 3 candidats se présentèrent : Ugo Afferni, Franz Kessel et Karl Franck. C'est Afferni qui l'emporta et qui dirigea son 1er concert, le 6 octobre. Son rôle consista à diriger les concerts symphoniques et les concerts populaires (il en dirigea 275 durant les 8 années de son activité dans la capitale hanséatique) de chaque saison. Sa femme, la violoniste May Brammer, fut la soliste de nombreux concerts et Arthur Nikisch fut appelé à 4 reprises comme chef-invité, ainsi que Richard Strauß accompagnant au piano sa femme, la cantatrice Pauline de Ahna.

Le 3 avril 1905, Afferni prit congé de Lübeck par l'exécution de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven. Le 25 avril, le « Verein » choisit Hermann Abendroth comme successeur. Il restera 6 saisons à Lübeck et sera appelé en novembre 1910 comme Directeur de la Musique à Essen. Pour le remplacer, 97 musiciens se manifestèrent. 4 furent choisis pour diriger un concert probatoire : Paul Scheinpflug, Karl Mennicke, Walter Unger et Rudolf Siegel. Scheinpflug s'étant retiré, un autre candidat fut choisi à la demande de Madame Ida Boy-Ed. Le 5 avril 1911, Wilhelm Furtwängler donnait ainsi son concert devant plus de 4,000 spectateurs et fut choisi à l'unanimité le 13, comme successeur de Abendroth. Il restera 5 ans à Lübeck, dirigeant également à 3 reprises à l'Opéra municipal, comme chef-invité (« Gastdirigent ») : « Fidelio », « die lustigen Weiber von Windsor » et « die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

Dans les « Lübeckische Blätter » de 1926, à l'occasion des festivités marquant le 700e anniversaire de la ville, il écrivit :

« Je me souviens avec joie de mes années d'apprentissage en tant que “ Kapellmeister ” à Lübeck, qui possédait un très bon orchestre et une intense activité musicale. »

Les successeurs de Furtwängler seront Georg Göhler, grand interprète mahlérien (il dirigea, à Berlin et Hambourg, les Ires exécutions allemandes de la 8e Symphonie) , et Franz von Hösslin.

Qui était Ida Boy-Ed dont le nom et l'énorme œuvre littéraire ont aujourd'hui quasiment disparu ?

Elle naquit le 17 avril 1852, à Bergedorf. Son père, Christophe Ed, était imprimeur et avait fondé son propre journal, le « Eisenbahn-Zeitung » . Elle épousa à 18 ans Carl Johann Boy, issu d'une famille patricienne de Lübeck. Ils eurent 4 enfants. Elle écrivit des feuilletons pour les journaux, en particulier « Thaddeas Erbe » pour le « Frankfurter Journal » . En 1882, parut son 1er livre, « ein Tropfen » mais son plus grand succès littéraire fut « ein königlicher Kaufmann » . Elle fut une grande amie de Thomas Mann et mourut le 13 mai 1928, dans un sanatorium de Travemünde.

Furtwängler écrivit à sa fille, le 18 mai :

« De la mort de votre mère, je ne puis rien dire sinon que, dans la douleur pour la perte d'un être si généreux et extraordinaire, je me sens intimement lié à vous. Personnellement, j'ai perdu en elle une amie comme je n'en retrouverai jamais et dont je garderai le souvenir éternellement. »

27 janvier 1905 : At the 2nd « Vereinigung Schaffender Tonkünstler » (Union of Creative Tone-Artists) orchestral concert in Vienna, Alexander von Zemlinsky conducts the premiere of his Symphonic poem, « Die Seejungfrau » (The Mermaid) , a Fantasy for orchestra after Hans Christian Andersen's fairy-tale and, on the same concert, the inexperienced Arnold Schönberg conducts the premiere of his Symphonic poem « Pelleas und Melisande » . Mahler is President of the Society and, at his insistence, the pieces are presented without their written programs, leaving the audience to judge them purely as « absolute music » ; thus, neither the audience nor the public suspect the personal tragedy which underlies Zemlinsky's score, but his is far preferred over Schönberg's.

Busy with his duties at the Vienna « Hofoper », Mahler misses the premiere but attends the final rehearsal on January 25th and follows « Pelleas » with the score ; he also tells Alma to invite Schönberg to his house and has him bring the score of « Pelleas ». Mahler already admits to having some difficulty comprehending the complex and not always harmonious counterpoint but, nonetheless, continues to champion Schönberg's cause.

The « Union » has a lieder concert scheduled for January 29th which premieres Gustav Mahler's « Kindertotenlieder ». The concert is sold-out, and so, tickets are also sold for the public to attend the final rehearsal on the 28th. It is a huge success for Mahler. The concert is repeated a few days later, on February 3rd, and Mahler is so pleased that he gives a banquet afterwards for the « Union » musicians, consisting mostly of Schönberg's pupils ; the 21 year old Anton Webern meets Mahler, there.

« Pelleas » requires a huge orchestra, and both Schönberg's and Zemlinsky's Symphonic poems demanded extra-rehearsal, so, as with the earlier « Polyhymnia » Society, one big project is enough to bankrupt the Association. After a few more concerts of chamber-music during the spring, notably featuring pieces by Bruno Walter (which, Mahler confided to Alma, were weak) , the 3rd planned orchestral concert of the « Vereinigung » has to be cancelled, and the « Union » folds after this single season, from lack of further financial support.

Février 1905 : Arthur Nikisch conducts Gustav Mahler's 5th Symphony in Berlin, in a performance not liked by Mahler.

20 février 1905 (?) : Dans le cadre du concert inaugural du 1er Festival Bruckner à se tenir à Munich, le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige les 4e et 9e Symphonies avec l'Orchestre philharmonique.

21 février 1905 : Dans le cadre du second concert du 1er Festival Bruckner à se tenir à Munich, le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige la 6e Symphonie et le « Psaume 150 » avec l'Orchestre philharmonique. Il s'agit d'une première munichoise pour les 2 œuvres.

Mars 1905 : Gustav Mahler seeks a visit from Oskar Fried, in Vienna, to see Franz Schalk conduct a performance of Fried's choral work, « Das trunkene Lied » (« The Drunken Song » with settings from Friedrich Nietzsche's « Also sprach Zarathustra ») . Mahler finds Fried's artistic ideas very compatible with his own, and wishes Fried to conduct future performances of his Symphonies. Also this month, Mahler conducts his 5th Symphony in Hamburg, and the work receives its American premiere with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra conducted by Frank van der Stucken.

25 mars 1905 : Décès à Linz de Karl (Borromäus) Waldeck. Il fut l'élève et le successeur immédiat d'Anton Bruckner comme organiste titulaire à la cathédrale de Linz.

Karl Borromäus Waldeck

L'organiste, professeur de musique et compositeur Karl (Borromäus) Waldeck est né le 21 septembre 1841 à Saint-Thomas de Blasenstein, un village du district de Perg, en Haute-Autriche.

En 1856-1857, Waldeck devient élève stagiaire d'Anton Bruckner à Linz ; il agira même occasionnellement comme organiste substitut (surtout pour la Messe du matin !).

En 1858, Waldeck fréquente l'École normale de Linz (« Präparandie »). Ses professeurs sont Johann August Dürrenberger et Engelbert Lanz.

De 1858 à 1861, il est engagé comme assistant professeur à Grünburg et à Frauenstein (Haute-Autriche).

De retour à Linz, en 1861, il enseigne et est organiste à la « Sankt Matthias - Kapuzinerkirche » (l'église des Capucins où se trouve le tombeau en marbre du Comte Montecuculi) mais il doit rapidement quitter ses fonctions pour des raisons de santé.

Die Kapuzinerkirche, auch Kirche Sankt Matthias, ist eine barocke römisch-katholische Kirche im Linzer Bezirk Römerberg-Margarethen. Die ehemalige Klosterkirche (Kapuzinerkloster Linz) ist heute Pfarrkirche der Pfarre Sankt Matthias. Sie steht seit 15. Oktober 2009 unter Denkmalschutz.

1606 bewilligte der Bischof von Passau zur Gründung eines Klosters in Linz. Dieses sollte auf Gründen außerhalb der Stadtmauern entstehen, die Gegend wurde damals « in der Poperleite » oder « im Weingarten » genannt. Hier hatte sich zuvor der Edelsitz Weingarting befunden. Von Abt Alexander a Lacu wurde am 21. September 1606 der Grundstein der Kirche gelegt. Sie war im Herbst 1612 fertiggestellt und wurde am 2. September 1612 zu Ehren des heilig Apostels Matthias vom Weihbischof von Passau, Johannes Prenner, geweiht.

Die Kirche wurde ab 1660 neu errichtet. Die neuerliche Segnung (1662) nahm Martin Geiger, Bischof von Passau, vor.

Durch die Kirchenreform Kaiser Josephs II. wurde die Kapuzinerkirche 1784 zur Pfarrkirche umfunktioniert. Dabei wurde die Kirche auch umgestaltet, wie heute noch an der Jahreszahl « 1786 » am Turm erkennbar ist.

Renovierungen fanden 1960 und 1985 statt.

Das Bauwerk ist eine typische Barockkirche mit klassizistischem Fassadenturm. Sie ist ein rechteckiger, schmuckloser Bau mit Satteldach und eingezogenem geschlossenem Chor. Quadratische Kapellen mit Walmdächern sind beiderseits des Langhauses in der Mitte angefügt.

An der Nordseite befindet sich ein quadratischer Turm mit dem Hauptportal der Kirche ; diese wurde im Zuge des Umbaus 1786 von der Längsseite hierher versetzt. Der Kupferhelm in Barockform wurde Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts aufgesetzt ; zuvor war dort ein einfacher Pyramidenhelm.

Typische barocke Kapuzinerkirche mit klassizistischem Fassadenturm. Die heutige Pfarrkirche Sankt Matthias ist ein schmuckloser, rechteckiger Bau mit Satteldach, eingezogenem geschlossenem Chor, gleichfalls mit Satteldach. In der Mitte des Langhauses sind beiderseits quadratische Kapellen mit Walmdächern angefügt.

Vor die Schauseite steht ein quadratischer Turm, der an der Nordseite das ursprüngliche Hauptportal des Kirchenbaues von 1660, das von der Schauseite übertragen wurde, enthält. Der mehrfach geschweifte Kupferhelm in Barockform wurde Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts aufgesetzt, vorher bestand ein einfacher Pyramidenhelm.

An das Langhaus schließt östlich eine kleine Kapelle des heilig Antonius von Padua an.

1606 bewilligte der Bischof von Passau die Gründung eines Klosters im Weingarten zu Linz. Im selben Jahr übernahmen die Kapuziner den Grund und am 21. September legte Abt Alexander a Lacu den Grundstein an Stelle eines Jagdhauses. Den Bau von Kirche und Kloster führte Christoph Martin Spaz aus. Im Herbst 1612 war die Kirche vollendet. Der Weihbischof von Passau, Johannes Prenner, nahm die Weihe der Kirche mit Hochaltar und einer Kapelle an der rechten Langhausseite vor.

Nach 1660 wurde die Kirche vergrößert. Durch die Kirchenreform Kaiser Josephs II. wurde die Kapuzinerkirche 1785 zur Pfarrkirche bestimmt. Der Dachreiter wurde abgetragen und an die Schauseite der Turm gefügt, der die Jahreszahl 1786 trägt.

Die Kirche wurde mit 15. Oktober 2009 unter Denkmalschutz gestellt.

Die Kirche Sankt Matthias liegt etwas erhöht an einer der von Süden nach Norden führenden Hauptverkehrslinien von Linz. Ehemals befand sich dieses Gebiet außerhalb der Stadtmauern « in der Poperleite » (im Weingarten) . Erzherzog Matthias wies den Kapuzinern 1606 ein Grundstück für die Errichtung eines Klosters zu. Zentrales Anliegen war die katholische Erneuerung von Linz als dem Zentrum der protestantischen Landstände. Vom Standort Linz aus gingen die Kapuziner nach Wien und Prag. Die Pläne für den Bau der Kapuzinerkirche erstellte Baumeister Christoph Martin Spaz.

Kirchenpatron wurde der heilig Apostel Matthias, der Namenspatron des Stifters. Bereits wenige Jahrzehnte später erfolgte ein Neubau, den Johann Peisser von Wartenau, Bürgermeister von Linz, finanzierte. 1662 wurde die Kirche geweiht. 1784 wurde die Klosterkirche zur Pfarrkirche. Das Kloster blieb bis zur Auflösung der Provinz im Jahr 1991 bestehen. Der letzte Kapuzinerpater, Franz Fink, trat 1991 in den Dienst der Diözese ein und wirkt weiterhin als Pfarrer von Sankt Matthias. Die Kirche zeigt sich (der Einfachheit des Ordens verpflichtet) als weitgehend schmucklose einschiffige Saalkirche, die von einem Tonnengewölbe abgeschlossen wird. Der Innenraum ist das Ergebnis einer wechselvollen Ausstattungsgeschichte. Das letzte einheitliche - aus dem 19. Jahrhundert stammende - Ausstattungsensemble wurde bei den Renovierungen 1960 und 1985 entfernt.

Waldeck accompagne souvent Bruckner lors des longues promenades du dimanche après-midi. Si le temps n'est pas clémente, il se rend chez lui pour écouter au piano des extraits de ses dernières compositions :

« Parce que je montrais beaucoup d'intérêt pour le jeu de Bruckner et que je le recommandais chaleureusement à mon entourage comme professeur de piano, nous devîmes proches. J'assistais aux célébrations à la cathédrale pour l'entendre jouer de l'orgue. Et, généralement, j'allais marcher en sa compagnie après les "Vêpres". Si le temps était maussade, je me rendais chez lui et il me jouait alors les grandes lignes de ses dernières compositions. Un jour, alors qu'il aborda l'esquisse du "Credo" de sa Messe en fa mineur, il me demande mon avis. Je lui dis que le thème du "Et incarnatus est" ne me semblait pas être du même (haut) niveau que les autres parties du "Credo". Après brève réflexion, Bruckner me dit : "Comment cela sonne-t-il ?" Puis, il improvisa un thème pour ténor soliste avec un accompagnement de croches dans un haut-registre. Cela me semblait être beaucoup mieux. Bruckner coucha immédiatement ce passage sur papier afin de le conserver. Chaque fois que Bruckner improvisait au piano, la lumière devait être éteinte. Il me demandait toujours de lui jouer mes propres compositions ; et j'étais toujours complimenté. À une occasion, je le questionnai sur le niveau d'effort exigé pour arriver à une telle maîtrise des thèmes, du contrepoint, et de l'art de l'improvisation. Bruckner me dit : « Lorsque vous écrirez ma biographie, vous pourrez dire qu'à Saint-Florian, je pratiquais le piano pendant 10 heures, et le grand orgue pendant 3 heures, et ce presque tous les jours ; en plus de passer de nombreuses heures, la nuit, à étudier la musique. » (Récit de Karl Waldeck à Franz Gräflinger.)

Lors de ses retrouvailles avec le Maître de Saint-Florian, Waldeck est un témoin privilégié de ses « affaires de cœur inopinées ». Il raconte comment, durant la sombre période de 1866-1867 (avec, entre autres, l'affaire Josefine Lang), il a trouvé son pauvre ami dans un champ essayant de compter les feuilles sur un arbre. Il explique les raisons de ce surmenage (TOC) par les efforts de concentration qu'exige l'improvisation contrapuntique à l'orgue :

« En dépit de sa condition physique robuste et de sa volonté de réussir, Bruckner a montré des signes de désordre mental. Il a beaucoup souffert de mélancolie et d'idées fixes. »

Karl Waldeck (automne 1867) :

« Un jour, Bruckner est entré chez moi sans frapper. Il s'est alors assis au piano et a joué pendant un bon moment. Lorsque je lui ai demandé le titre de la pièce, il me dit : " Le ' Kyrie ' de ma nouvelle Messe. " La plupart des gens qui étaient présents furent amusés par son comportement étrange. Je me fis un devoir de prendre le malheureux homme sous mon aile, tentant de lui donner le plus d'agrément possible. Au moment où je voulus le quitter (car il était tard dans la nuit) , il me pria de demeurer à ses côtés car, laissé seul avec lui-même, il serait de nouveau troublé par ses fixations. »

Pendant la composition de sa 3e Messe en fa, suite à sa récente sortie du sanatorium de Bad Kreuzen, Bruckner était tellement possédé par l'inspiration qu'il entra un jour « en coup de vent » chez son élève Karl Waldeck et se mit à en jouer de grands passages. Waldeck lui faisant quelques critiques, il improvisa sur-le-champ un nouvel « Et incarnatus est » , sous les yeux émerveillés de son jeune ami.

21 novembre 1867 : Karl Waldeck mentionne que Bruckner a improvisé au piano, des parties du « Credo » de sa 3e Messe en fa mineur. (August Göllerich - Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner, ein Lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » , Regensburg ; pages 472-473.)

Juin 1868 : Karl Waldeck succède comme organiste titulaire, et à la vieille cathédrale et à l'église paroissiale (sur recommandation de Bruckner) , à son « mentor » qui, lui, a pris définitivement le chemin de Vienne. Il agira comme « Kapellmeister » de 1890 jusqu'à son décès, le 25 mars 1905.

Malgré le style inspiré de Palestrina de sa 2e Messe, Anton Bruckner avait très peu de sympathie pour le mouvement conservateur (et régressif) Cécilien des années 1870. Son successeur à Linz, Karl Waldeck, dira plus tard de Bruckner qu'il était un « Anticécilien » . Pour le Maître de Saint-Florian, le Cécilianisme était, selon lui, une véritable « maladie » .

Toujours selon Waldeck, les œuvres préférées de Bruckner étaient le « Requiem » de Mozart, l' « Héroïque » de Beethoven et la Marche funèbre du « Götterdämmerung » de Wagner.

Octobre 1871 : Anton Bruckner est dans un état de forte anxiété à l'heure où il risque de faire face à une action disciplinaire de la part de l'administration du Collège Saint-Anne (pour la formation des jeunes enseignantes) , suite à la plainte d'une étudiante qui s'est sentie lésée. Bruckner tient à remercier Waldeck pour son soutien, en ses temps difficiles, et lui assure qu'il n'a pas l'intention de récupérer son poste d'organiste de Linz.

Le talentueux et artistique abbé Alois Dörfer, responsable de la construction du grand-orgue du monastère de Wilhering, attribuera au facteur autrichien Leopold Reinbauer (un élève du réputé Friedrich Ladegast) le mandat d'entreprendre le monumental ouvrage. Karl Waldeck en donnera le concert inaugural en 1884. L'expertise de Waldeck aura permis de définir la position de l'instrument dans ce vaste espace. (Waldeck composera une œuvre pour 2 orgues basée sur l'acoustique de l'église abbatiale de Wilhering.)

Printemps 1891 : Anton Bruckner va passer le temps pascal, comme d'habitude, au monastère de Saint-Florian.

Dimanche, 29 mars 1891 : Jour de Pâques, Bruckner doit exceptionnellement tenir l'orgue à la cathédrale de Linz. Dans une lettre adressée à l'organiste titulaire, Karl Waldeck, il lui confirme qu'il arrivera à temps pour la célébration.

Pendant ses années à Vienne, Bruckner est demeuré en contact avec Karl Waldeck. Il se fera un point d'honneur de lui écrire le jour de son anniversaire et trouvera des occasions pour le rencontrer.

2 novembre 1894 : Karl Waldeck accompagne Anton Bruckner à une représentation du « Requiem » de Mozart, à la « Hofkapelle ». Ils assisteront également à la répétition générale.

4 novembre 1894 : Karl Waldeck assiste à Vienne, en compagnie du Maître de Saint-Florian, à l'exécution de la Messe en fa mineur, sous la baguette de Wilhelm Gericke, dans le cadre d'un concert spécial offert par la Société des Amis de la Musique (« Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ») pour marquer le 70e anniversaire de naissance de Bruckner. Il s'agira de l'une de ses dernières apparitions en public.

5 novembre 1894 : Dans une conférence prononcée à l'Université de Vienne, le professeur Bruckner revient sur le concert de la veille dirigé par Wilhelm Gericke, auquel il a assisté. Il rappelle que Karl Waldeck fut le principal responsable de la forme définitive du « Et incarnatus est » de la Messe en fa, après que le jeune musicien eut comparé la proposition originale du Maître avec un passage similaire tiré de la Ire Messe en ré mineur.

Waldeck fut un adversaire farouche du Cécilianisme. Parmi ses compositions, on retrouve des Messes, l « Requiem », l « Te Deum », des Graduels, des Offertoires, des œuvres pour orgue et des pièces pour piano.

Parmi ses élèves, mentionnons Martin Einfalt, August Amadé von Pereira ainsi que son neveu, le Linzoi Ignaz Gruber (26 février 1868 - 17 janvier 1937) , qui lui succédera de 1905 à 1924.

One of Anton Bruckner's acquaintances in Linz was Karl (Borromäus) Waldeck. Waldeck first came to Linz as a student teacher in 1856-1857 when he had organ lessons from Bruckner and deputized for him at the early morning Mass. From 1858 to 1861, he was employed as an assistant teacher outside Linz but returned in 1861 to take-up a teaching position in the town and to be organist at the Capuchin church.

On renewing his acquaintance with Bruckner, Waldeck was the witness of many of the latter's hasty « affairs of the heart ». He often accompanied the composer on Sunday afternoon walks or, if the weather was poor, would spend time with him in his rooms listening to excerpts from his latest compositions :

« As a result of showing great interest in Bruckner's playing and of taking the opportunity of recommending him as a piano teacher, I came into favour again. I attended the cathedral services to hear him play and usually went walking with him after "Vespers". If the weather was bad, he would play me sketches from his compositions of which only the outer-parts were generally available in outline form. After he had played me the sketch of the “ Credo ” from his F minor Mass, one day, he asked for my opinion. I said that the “ Et incarnatus est ” seemed to me not to be on the same high-level as the other parts of the “ Credo ”. After reflecting for a short time, Bruckner said, “ How would this be ? ”, whereupon he improvised a theme for solo tenor with quaver accompaniment in a high-register. This struck me as being much better, and Bruckner immediately wrote it down and retained it. Whenever Bruckner improvised on the piano, the light had to be put out. I had to play my own attempts at composition to him and I was always praised. When the conversation turned on one occasion to the subject of how much effort was involved in being able to play thematically, contrapuntally, and extempore, Bruckner said, “ When you come to write my biography, you can say that, in Saint-Florian, I practised the piano for 10 hours, and the large organ for 3 hours almost every day, as well as spending many hours at night studying music. » (From Waldeck’s account, as related to Franz Gräflinger.)

Karl Waldeck (autumn 1867) :

« On one occasion, Bruckner came into my house without knocking at the door or introducing himself, sat down at the piano, and played for a while. When I asked him what he was playing, he said : “ The ' Kyrie ' of my new (F minor) Mass.” Most people were amused by his behaviour, but I took the unfortunate man under my wing and provided him with as much company as I could. When I wished to leave him, late at night, he begged me to stay with him because, left on his own, he would be troubled by his fixations. »

21 November 1867 : Karl Waldeck reports that Bruckner improvised, at the piano, parts of the « Credo » from his 3rd Mass in F minor. (August Göllerich - Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner, ein Lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » , Regensburg ; pages 472-473.)

Karl Waldeck also had some 1st hand experience of Anton Bruckner’s fixations and tendency to numeromania, a type of obsessive-compulsive disorder (OCD) that was one of the symptoms of the illness leading to his breakdown, in 1867 :

« In spite of his strong constitution and healthy appetite, such over-exertion (namely, hours spent in instrumental practice and in completing Simon Sechter’s theory course) had its consequences. Bruckner suffered a great deal from mental disturbances, depressions, fixations, etc. For instance, during a walk he would stand next to a tree in order to count its leaves. On one occasion, he came into my house without knocking at the door or introducing himself, sat down at the piano, and played for a while. When I asked him what he was playing, he said “ The Kyrie of my new (F minor) Mass. ” Most people were amused by his behaviour, but I took the unfortunate man under my wing and provided him with as much company as I could. When I wished to leave him, late at night, he begged me to stay with him because, left on his own, he would be troubled by his fixations. As can be seen from his letters, Bruckner, to his dying day, was grateful to me for supporting him during the saddest period of his life. He also promised me that, when he became Court music-director (which was nothing less than he deserved) , he would bring me to Vienna as Court organist. »

In October 1856, Anton Bruckner provided, at Bishop Franz-Josef Rüdiger's request, information about the condition of the organ of the « Alter Dom » with a view to its eventual repair. By the beginning of 1857, however, a decision had been made to rebuild the organ. Bruckner referred to this in a letter to the Bishop's office and stressed the need for the provision of 2 or 3 more 8 foot and 16 foot stops, as well as an immediate tuning of the instrument. It took 11 years for the rebuilding work to be completed, and the organ builder responsible was Josef Breinbauer. Bruckner's successor at Linz, Karl Waldeck, requested a slight change in the stop disposition in 1892, and it can be surmised that he consulted Bruckner in advance. The alteration work was carried-out by Josef Breinbauer's son, Leopold. One man who had a very high-opinion of Bruckner's organ playing was Franz-Josef Rüdiger who, after spending 2 years as prebendary of Brixen Cathedral, was appointed diocesan bishop of Linz, in 1852. Bishop Rüdiger would often slip into the cathedral to listen to Bruckner practising and is known to have derived great spiritual comfort from his improvisations.

The Mass No. 2 in E minor for voices in 8 parts with wind accompaniment of Bruckner, written for the dedication of the « Motivkapelle », is finished. As the consecration ceremony did not take place until 29 September 1869, Bruckner had to wait almost 3 years for the 1st performance of the Mass. By this time, he was in Vienna and he had to ask Johann Schiedermayr, the dean of the Cathedral, to arrange preliminary rehearsals of the work. In a letter dated 20 May 1869, he suggested that the Leidertafel « Frohsinn » and « Musikverein » choirs would have to start rehearsing immediately because of the great difficulty of the Mass. A further letter of 19 June was more urgent in tone :

« Weilnböck wrote to me that Waldeck had said that, if the Mass was not studied now with the “ Musikverein ” students, its performance was out of the question ; and they cannot postpone rehearsal until later, as it is difficult. »

Anton Bruckner had little sympathy with the Cecilian movement of the 1870's. His successor in Linz, Karl Waldeck, later described Bruckner as an « Anticäcilianer » for whom Cecilianism was a « disease » .

According to Karl Waldeck, Anton Bruckner named Mozart's « Requiem » , Beethoven's « Eroica » Symphony and the Funeral March from Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » as his favourite music.

Bruckner's « old flame » , Josefine Lang (1844-1930) , married Josef Weilnböck, a merchant, in 1870. On 21 April 1891, Anton Bruckner wrote to Caroline, recalling the pleasant day he had spent, as well as to her mother. See : HSABB, Volume 2 (page 134) , for the texts of both letters ; the originals are in the « Oberösterreichisches Landesmuseum, Linz » . See, also : HSABB, Volume 2 (pages 157, 160-161) for an exchange of letters between Karl Waldeck and Bruckner, dated Linz, 11 November and Vienna, 20 November 1891, respectively, in which « Fräulein C. » is almost certainly a reference to Caroline, and « Anton L. » a reference to Anton Lang, Caroline's uncle ; the original of Waldeck's letter is in Saint-Florian and the original of Bruckner's letter is not extant but « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , Vienna, possesses a copy.

When Bruckner moved from Linz to Vienna, in 1868, Bishop Rüdiger agreed to keep the position of cathedral organist open for 2 years, in the event of a decision on Bruckner's part to return to Linz. Waldeck became provisional cathedral organist, and then, on Bruckner's recommendation, was appointed to the post on a permanent basis when Bruckner finally resigned, in July 1870.

At the end of July, Bruckner informed the church authorities in Linz that he had accepted a position at the Vienna Conservatory. Just as he had earlier asked Friedrich Mayr at Saint-Florian to hold his old organist post in reserve, until he had become firmly established in Linz, he now requested that his Linz position be held in reserve, for some time, adding that it would bring him « great comfort » and « great peace of mind » if his request was granted. Thanks to the supportive intervention of Bishop Rüdiger, Bruckner was given 2 years' grace and was able to leave Linz without any nagging doubts about his future security.

See : « HSABB » , Volume I (page 101f) , for Bishop Rüdiger's letter to the Government offices in Linz, dated Linz, 25 August 1868, in which the Bishop draws attention to Bruckner's « excellent qualities and merits » ; the original of this letter is in the « Ordinariatsarchiv, Linz » . See, also : Elisabeth Maier. « ABDS, Nr. 15, Dokumente » , for the draft of a letter to Bruckner, dated 24 September 1868, in which his request was officially granted. Karl Waldeck, one of Bruckner's former pupils, was his provisional replacement as organist of Linz Cathedral. See : Elisabeth Maier. « ABDS, Nr. 15, Dokumente » (pages 342-344) , for the documentation regarding Waldeck's appointment (August - September, 1868) . After Bruckner wrote to the church authorities, on 18 July 1870, formally resigning from his former position and thanking them for holding it in reserve, Waldeck was formally appointed. as definitive organist. See : « HSABB » Volume I (page 125) , for this letter. The location of the original is unknown ; it was 1st printed in : « ABB » , page 113.

During his years in Vienna, Bruckner kept in touch with Waldeck, writing to him on his Name-Day and occasionally meeting him. In October 1871, for instance, when Bruckner was in very low spirits because of the threat of disciplinary action being taken against him (by the Saint-Anna College administration) following an alleged « pass » at a female student, he thanked Waldeck for his support during « days of severe trial » and assured him that he would not be trying to get his old job back in Linz !

See : « HSABB » , Volume I (page 133ff) , for the texts of 2 letters from Bruckner to Waldeck, dated Vienna, 21 and 28 October 1871, respectively. The original of the former (1st published in the « Neue musikalische Presse, 14 » , 1905) is not extant, but the original of the latter is in the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » .

In 1891, Bruckner spent Easter, as usual, at Saint-Florian. He was to play the organ at Linz Cathedral on Easter Sunday, 29 March, however, and, in a letter to Waldeck, confirmed that he would arrive in Linz, in good time for the service.

See : « HSABB » , Volume 2 (page 242) for the text of this letter, dated Saint-Florian, 27 March 1891. It was 1st published in the « Neue musikalische Presse, 14 » (1905) , No. 3 ; the original is not extant.

Waldeck was present at the Vienna performance of the F minor Mass conducted by Wilhelm Gericke, on 4 November 1894. He also accompanied Bruckner to a performance of Mozart's « Requiem » in the « Hofkapelle », 2 days earlier, and attended the final rehearsal of the Mass. It was the last time the 2 old friends met. In a University lecture he gave on 5 November 1894, Bruckner referred to the performance of the Mass and recalled how Waldeck had been primarily responsible for the « Et incarnatus est » section, as it now stood, having compared the original setting unfavourably with the parallel passage in the D minor Mass.

For an account of this lecture, see : August Göllerich and Max Auer. « Anton Bruckner, ein Lebens- und Schaffens-Bild » , Band IV/3 (1936) ; page 444f.

The performance of the F minor Mass at a « Gesellschaft » concert in Vienna, on 4 November 1894, was intended as a 70th birthday celebration and, in fact, was one of Bruckner's last public appearances.

For Bruckner's own account of the performance (and his recollection of Karl Waldeck's criticism of the original « Et incarnatus est ») during his penultimate University lecture, on 5 November, see : Göllerich - Auer, Band IV/3, page 444f. See, also : « GrBL » (page 114) , for Waldeck's own recollection of his criticism ; and Stephen Johnson. « Bruckner Remembered » (page 109) , Faber & Faber, London (1998) , for an English translation.

His health deteriorated rapidly in mid-November and, although there was a partial recovery, the remaining months of his life were a continual swing between relapse and slight improvement. Bruckner's last words on the Mass are contained in a letter to Siegfried Ochs, the conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic choir, who had directed 2 very successful performances of the « Te Deum » , in May 1891 and January 1894, and was now contemplating a possible performance of the Mass :

« Bruckner is getting old and would really like to hear the F minor Mass again ! Please, please ! That would be the high-point of my life. But there are many changes which don't appear in the score. At the D-flat major passage in the « Credo » (“ Deum verum de Deo vero ”) - full organ, please ! Spare no stops ! And the cellist should be prominent with a very rich, warm tone at the beginning of the “ Benedictus ”. When shall I hear it ? Please reply. » (Anton Bruckner)

« In humble admiration and with greetings to the excellent Orchestra, the wonderful choir, and you, their great director. » (Anton Bruckner)

See : « HSABB » , Volume 2 (page 303) , for this letter, dated Vienna, 14 April 1895. The original has been lost ; it was 1st published in : « ABB » , page 283f.

8 years after Bruckner's death, Karl Waldeck was present at a Festival Concert given in Linz on Palm Sunday, 27 March 1904, at which August Göllerich conducted Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 and the F minor Mass. He was deeply moved, particularly by the performance of the Mass as it brought back memories of the days of its conception. In a letter to Franz Gräßlinger, Waldeck recalled the time when Bruckner « played parts of his Mass which had been composed during a time of the most painful emotions and mental torment » .

Part of this is quoted in ; « GrBL » , page 118. Waldeck also wrote a letter to Göllicher, on the day after the performance. This is quoted in : August Göllicher - Max Auer, Band III/1, page 624. Further information about Waldeck can be gleaned from Franz Gräßlinger. « Karl Waldeck » , Linz (1905) ; Franz Gräßlinger. « Karl Waldeck. Karl Borromäus Waldeck : geboren 21.09.1841 Sankt Thomas am Blasenstein ; gestorben 25.03.1905 Linz. Organist, Musiklehrer, Komponist. Besuchte bis 1858 die Normalschule in Linz, wo er Musikunterricht von Johann August Dürrnberger und Engelbert Lanz erhielt, anschließend war er Schulgehilfe in Grünburg / Oberösterreich und Frauenstein / Oberösterreich. Circa 1856 lernte Waldeck Anton Bruckner kennen, dessen Schüler er wurde und den er gelegentlich als Organist vertrat. 1861 kam er an eine Linzer Schule, musste seine Unterrichtstätigkeit jedoch aus gesundheitlichen Gründen bald beenden. 1868-1890 war er in Bruckners Nachfolge Linzer Dom- und Stadtpfarrorganist und 1890-1905 Domkapellmeister (als solcher Gegner des Cäcilianismus) . Zu seinen Schülern zählten Martin Einfalt, August Amadé von Pereira und Waldeck Heybal sowie sein Neffe und Nachfolger als Domkapellmeister (1905-1924) , Ignaz Gruber (geboren 26.02.1868 Linz ; gestorben 17.01.1937 Linz) .

Werke : Messen, Requiem, Te Deum, Gradualien und Offertorien, Orgelwerke (siehe Tbsp.) , Klavierstücke, Bearbeitungen.

Karl Waldeck : (Dom-)Organist und Komponist ; Sankt Thomas am Blasenstein / Linz.

Linzer Dom- und Stadtpfarrkapellmeister - 1890 folgte ihm Karl Waldeck nach.

Die Wurzeln seiner überaus herben Melancholie sind in keinen äußeren Tatsachen zu ergraben. Was lag vor ? Die Menge der Privatstunden schrumpfte zusammen und mit ihnen der Geldsäckel, aber ein Zuschuß zum Kurgebrauch wurde erbeten und gewährt, der Wunsch nach Gehaltsaufbesserung wurde gewagt in der Hoffnung, nicht taube Ohren zu finden. Bewerbungen um einen zusätzlichen Posten in der Stadt beim heruntergewirtschafteten Musikverein waren an Bruckners künstlerischen Bedingungen gescheitert (die Sänger sollten wenigstens für eine Stunde wöchentlich auf Ehrenwort pünktlich erscheinen) , Bewerbungen nach außerhalb, so um die Stelle des verstorbenen Hoforganisten Abmayr oder die um eine Beschäftigung unter König Ludwig von Bayern, schlugen fehl, aber immerhin waren die Hochherzigen in Linz nicht träge geworden. Der Kreiskommissär, der Bischof, der Domdechant Johann Baptist Schiedermayr (1778-1840) blieben ihm gewogen, den Feldzeugmeister Grafen Huyn versetzte er bei einem Besuch durch sein Orgelspiel in eine Stimmung : Ehrfurcht ! Ehrfurcht ! Ihnen voran hielt, ihm unverbrüchlich verschworen, ein Schüler aus, sein einstiger Amtsnachfolger Karl (Borromäus) Waldeck (1841-1905) . Bruckner stieß ihn einmal im Zorn über unpünktliche Meßhilfe von sich, Waldeck aber vermittelte ihm Arbeit, immer treu.

In Wien die Gesellschaft des Domdechanten Johann Baptist Schiedermayr (1778-1840) vermissen zu müssen, beunruhigte ihn bei seiner schlechten Nervenverfassung. Den Schmerz über den Tod seiner Schwester Nani, die ihm die Wirtschaft geführt hatte, meldete er Schiedermayr mit der Bitte : « In Euer Gnaden so tief fühlendes Herz lege ich meine schmerzlichen Gefühle ganz offen darnieder und bitte, Euer Gnaden wollen selbe einmal beim Heiligsten Meßopfer dem Herrn der Welt zu Füßen legen. » . Nach einer Wohltat schrieb er ihm : « Dank, ewiger Dank dem Herrn der Welt ! In dem verlassensten Zustande sandte er mir Hilfe, würdig der eines Engels ! Das habe nur ich damals empfunden ! - und jetzt staune ich, sehe ich es ein und begreife es ! Halleluja !!! » . Dem Wohltäter selbst wünschte er zum Namenstage, Gott möge seine hohen Verdienste um Kirche und Staat zum Teil schon hier auf Erden krönen. « Um die jenseitige Belohnung wollen wir beten ! » Seine festlichste Gabe für Vertraute wie seinen Linzer Nachfolger Karl (Borromäus) Waldeck (1841-1905) war die Hoffnung auf ein Leben zur Verherrlichung Gottes. Bischof Rüdiger war nach seinem Tode Bruckners Fürbitter. Er half ihm aus dem Himmel geschwind in Krankheit und Nöten, und als Rüdiger seliggesprochen werden sollte, wurde Bruckner über die Art der jenseitigen Hilfe befragt.

Der Komponist war ein Freund Bruckners und sein direkter (und von Bruckner empfohlener) Nachfolger an der herrlichen Chrismann-Breinbauer-Orgel im alten Dom zu Linz, die für mich optisch und klanglich zu den schönsten Orgeln aller Zeiten zählt.

Diese Orgel wurde 1760 von Franz Xaver Chrismann als Hauptorgel der Stiftskirche Engelszell errichtet.

1787 wurde sie von ihrem Erbauer persönlich in die Linzer Jesuitenkirche, die zum Dom erhoben wurde, übertragen und mit der dortigen Orgel, die aus dem Jahr 1684 stammte, kombiniert.

1857 wurde sie auf Anregung des Linzer Domorganisten Anton Bruckner von Josef Breinbauer umgebaut und in Richtung Romantik erweitert.

Diese zu Recht berühmte « Bruckner-Orgel » besitzt heute 31 Register, verteilt auf 3 Manuale und Pedal und stellt eine äußerst gelungene Synthese aus barocker und romantischer Orgel dar.

Bernhard Prammer stellt mit der sogenannten Bruckner-Orgel im Alten Dom zu Linz ein weiteres musikhistorisch bedeutsames Instrument in den Mittelpunkt seiner Einspielung. Es wurde um 1780 von Franz Xaver Krisman zunächst für die Stiftskirche Engelszell angefertigt. Von dem aufgelassenen Zisterzienserstift gelangte sie nach Linz und wurde eingepasst. Anton Bruckner, der von 1855 bis 1868 als Domorganist tätig war, veranlasste durch die Orgelbaufamilie Breinbauer mehrere Umbauten speziell nach seinen Wünschen. Es erklingen hier ausschließlich Werke von Komponisten, die für diese Orgel komponierten oder als Organisten im Alten Dom wirkten. Eine einzigartige Symbiose von Instrument und Musik.

Fin avril 1905 : Arnold Schönberg has completed the draft of the 1st half of his single-movement 1st String Quartet, up to the Trio of the Scherzo (having finished the « Sketchbook I ») , on April 20th, and continuing his draft at the beginning of « Sketchbook II ») . (Walter Frisch, 1993 ; page 202.)

This piece makes extensive use of the « whole-tone scale » (= 6-edo) , and its tonal contrasts are not those of different keys as much as those between tonal and atonal passages.

Fin avril 1905 : During his Easter vacation in Abazzia (now Opatija, Croatia) , Gustav Mahler writes-out the fair-copy manuscript of his 6th Symphony.

Around Hans Pfitzner's 36th birthday (on May 5th) , Gustav Mahler conducts the Vienna premiere of Pfitzner's Opera, « Der Rose vom Liebesgarten » (The Rose in the Love-garden) . Initially unreceptive to Pfitzner's Opera, Mahler is eventually convinced of its merits by Alma and Bruno Walter, who both admire Pfitzner's work. Mahler also takes a liking to Pfitzner's String Quartet, which is dedicated to Alma. Pfitzner is only one in a long line of men who are enchanted by Alma's beauty and intelligence, even while she is married to Mahler.

Mai 1905 : Gustav Mahler's 5th Symphony and Richard Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » are teamed-up at a Straßburg music Festival. Exposed to the « Domestica » for the 2nd time, Mahler's interest in the Strauß piece is a big influence on the rest of his 7th Symphony, most of which he composes in the following months. Mahler also hears Strauß play and sing his new Opera, « Salome » in a piano-score, and he is deeply impressed, and begins campaigning to have the premiere given in Vienna ; he will be unsuccessful in this because of the conservatism of Austrian royalty.

Mai 1905 : After many delays, Arnold Schönberg's Verklärte Nacht, op.4 is finally published, by Dreililien. (Pelleas und Melisande is tagged as op.5, but Marschalk does not accept it for Dreililien, and it will not be published until 1912 by Peters.) When the music-theory class he has been teaching concludes on May 15, Schönberg works on completing his 1st String Quartet over the summer.

The « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » (German General Music Association) Festival is held from June 1st to 4th, in Graz ; and June 5th to 7th, in Vienna. At the opening concert, 13 of Gustav Mahler's songs are performed and are very successful, leading to a generous offer from « Christian Friedrich Kahnt Verlag » to publish the 6th Symphony for 30,000 « Kronen » (nearly his annual Opera salary) , which Mahler readily accepts, signing the contract on July 15th.

Juin 1905 : In a letter to Alma Mahler, the 33 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky 1st announces his engagement to marry the 24 year old Ida Guttmann, younger sister of his former girl-friend Melanie, whom he had been seeing just before his involvement with Alma, in 1900-1901.

Physicist Albert Einstein, working as a clerk in a Swiss Patent Office, publishes several papers expounding his « Special Theory of Relativity » , a momentous discovery which will change science.

Einstein, an amateur violinist, had this to say about his theory :

« It occurred to me by intuition, and music was the driving force behind that intuition. My discovery was the result of musical perception. »

Juin 1905 : During Pentecost holiday, the 21 year old Anton Webern and his cousin Wilhelmine fall in love with each other (which will eventually lead to their marriage) . Under this inspiration, Webern composes a « Langsamer Satz » (slow movement) for string quartet.

Juillet 1905 : After leaving Vienna for summer vacation in « Preglhof » , and melancholy over his separation from Wilhelmine and inspired by a painting of Giovanni Segantini, Anton Webern writes a much larger String Quartet in I movement. This Quartet has a climactic section, which occurs twice, that is really impossible to analyze in terms of keys : still a lot of late-Romantic rhetoric in the style, but the ultra-chromatic counterpoint produces chords with clashing notes that cannot be analyzed in terms of traditional harmony. Recalling the criticisms about Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony and Arnold Schœnberg's « Verklärte Nacht » , one might say that this Webern Quartet sounds like « Tristan » on acid ... good stuff ! In some places, this Webern piece is far more advanced harmonically than Schœnberg's String Quartet of the same period.

Été 1905 : After Arnold Schœnberg finishes his 1st String Quartet, he begins a choral piece « Georg von Frundsberg » , and another String Quintet, both of which are left unfinished.

Été 1905 : Gustav Mahler composes the 1st, 3rd, and 5th movements of his 7th Symphony, completing the draft-score on August 15th. These movements are full of brazenly dissonant polyphony and chords, and melodic passages using successive « 4ths » . It is clear that his familiarity with Arnold Schœnberg's experiments has emboldened Mahler to stretch his naturally progressive tendencies even further. This Symphony has had a difficult reception from audiences since the beginning ; Mahler experienced considerable difficulty finding a publisher for it and, to this day, the 7th is still the least popular of all his works ; unjustly so.

The themes of the 1st movement of Mahler 7th Symphony seem to me unmistakably to be inspired by the idea of making sonic portraits of himself, his daughter Maria, and wife Alma - a concept which undoubtedly Mahler got from his familiarity with Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » .

Mahler also makes a revision of the 4th Symphony. His 2nd Symphony is performed in Düsseldorf under Julius Butts at the Lower-Rhine Music Festival.

In Berlin, the firm of Gose & Tessloff publishes a monograph on Gustav Mahler by Richard Specht in its « Modern Essays » series.

The 20 year old Otto Klemperer switches to the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, and studies composition with the 36 year old Hans Pfitzner.

Arnold Schönberg takes on Egon Wellesz as a pupil.

Septembre et octobre 1905 : Arnold Schönberg composes several of the 8 Songs, Opus 6 :

« Alles » ; « Der Wanderer » ; « Am Wegrund » ; « Lockung » ; « Mädchenlied » .

16 octobre 1905 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

Fin octobre - début novembre 1905 : Arnold Schönberg also drafts a programmatic Piano Quintet, called « Ein Stelldichein » (a « rendez-vous ») , based on a Richard Dehmel poem, which will remain incomplete.

Automne 1905 : In Berlin, Richard Strauß sees Max Reinhardt's production of Hugo Hofmannsthal's « Elektra » , immediately recognizes the similarities with « Salome » , and the dramatic possibilities, and decides to write an Opera on it. (It is possible that Strauß had already seen it in late-1903, when it opened.)

8 novembre 1905 : Performance of Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony in Berlin, with Oskar Fried conducting and Otto Klemperer directing the off-stage instruments. Mahler goes to Berlin, sees the dress-rehearsal, tells Fried that his tempi were all wrong, complains to Klemperer of the incorrect dynamics, and goes over the work in detail. Fried will eventually go on to make the 1st complete recording of a Mahler Symphony, with this work (the 2nd) , in 1924.

When Klemperer seeks advice from Fried on how to get Mahler's attention, Fried tells him to focus on Mahler's own creative work - so, Klemperer writes a 2 hand piano arrangement of Mahler's 2nd Symphony (never published and now lost) .

Also in Berlin, Arthur Nikisch conducts the Philharmonic Orchestra with Friedrich Weidemann singing in Mahler's « Kindertotenlieder » , again, not to Mahler's taste.

La musique de Mahler sur rouleaux de piano

On his way back to Vienna from Berlin, Gustav Mahler stopped for a few hours in Leipzig, where he had an appointment with the inventors of a new music recording process of great future potential, and which had already caused a stir in Germany and even abroad. The « Welte-Mignon » piano roll recording system had been developed by the firm of Welte of Freiburg-im-Breisgau, who called it « Mignon » to underline its compactness compared to the more cumbersome devices the firm had built and hitherto marketed.

The adventure had begun in 1832, in Vöhrenbach, a little village in the Black Forest, when Michæl Welte (1807-1880) , founder of the Welte dynasty, had developed the mechanism of a musical clock which played elaborate tunes on a set of little wooden organ pipes. Soon after, Welte, a great lover of music, expanded his workshop and decided to improve the « Viennese mechanical organ » , the instrument which had acquired the summit of respectability when Mozart wrote 2 compositions for it, at the end of his life. After 3 years of work, Michæl Welte had created a monumental instrument, the « Orchestrion » , with no less than 1,100 pipes, which he presented at the international exhibition in Karlsruhe, in 1849, and later throughout the world. This instrument, a veritable Masterpiece of contemporary technique, laid the ground work for all the organs and mechanical pianos of the late-19th Century.

In 1872, the firm moved to Freiburg-im-Breisgau, capital of the Grand Duchy of Baden. Around 1885, Berthold, Michæl's son, developed a new system, later called the « Pianola » in its American version, in which the music-box cylinder (the « Orchestrion » had 3) is replaced by a paper roll whose perforations release streams of air which activate the keys of a piano through a system of pneumatic transmission. For the next 15 years, the paper rolls were made by hand by an artisan who traced on the paper with ink the positions and lengths of the future perforations by calculating with a metronome the exact timing and duration of each note in the score, and without any attempt to introduce artistic or personal considerations.

In those days, recording techniques, whether cylinders or records, still required the horn. They remained primitive, particularly for the piano (Thomas Edison's « talking machine » was mainly destined for the spoken or singing voice) . For the purposes of recording, pianists were obliged to play fortissimo, without felt dampers, and the result was consequently very disappointing. Emil Welte (1841-1923) , his son Edwin (1876-1958) , and his Alsatian son-in-law, Karl Bockisch (1874-1952) , therefore concentrated their efforts on improving Berthold Welte's mechanical piano so as to reproduce not only the notes, but the other traits particular to the performing pianist: attack accentuation, dynamics, pedal. Bockisch worked on the problem from 1901 to 1904, and in liaison with the principal German piano manufacturers developed an entirely new system capable of capturing all the nuances of a pianist's performance.

« The freedom of movement, the natural flow, the impetus of conception, the often surprising, and yet, enchanting change of tempo, in short, the things that make a performance “ artistic ”, “ personal ”. »

The 2 inventors felt their new and revolutionary machine was able to reproduce all these delicate features. The patent for the « Reproduktionsclavier » was registered on 21 May 1904. Thereafter, the firm concerned itself with building-up a repertory for the « Welte-Mignon » . Its creators showed both taste and imagination by appealing not only to the leading pianists of the time but also to the most famous composers, who were thus given the opportunity of setting an authoritative example for the interpretation of their works.

9 novembre 1905 : Gustav Mahler makes player-piano recordings of 3 of his songs, including the Finale of the 4th Symphony, and the 1st movement « Funeral March » of the 5th Symphony, at the « Welte-Mignon » Company, in Vienna. They are the only reproducible recordings that Mahler ever made of his work as an interpreter.

« Ging Heut' Morgens ubers Feld »

« Ich ging mit Lust durch einen grunen Wald »

Symphony No. 4 (4th movement) .

Symphony No. 5 (1st movement) .

Mahler's distress over the lack of understanding of his work by contemporary conductors explains his acceptance of Welte's invitation. The greatest pianists of the era were already listed in Welte's catalogue in 1905 and 1906, and the composers included Gabriel Fauré, Edvard Grieg, Engelbert Humperdinck, Ruggiero Leoncavallo, Wilhelm Kienzl, Max Reger, Camille Saint-Saëns, and Richard Strauß. Welte had already set-up recording studios in Leipzig, Paris, and Saint-Petersburg, and by 1911, 140 artists had left living testimonies of their art to posterity on « Welte-Mignon » rolls. They remained expensive for the prospective purchaser, who had to buy a piano equipped with an apparatus patented by Welte before the First World War. The rolls themselves cost approximately 15 dollars each. Nevertheless, they were in great demand, especially in the United States. Edwin Welte and his brother-in-law Karl Bockisch toured Europe with their « Vorsetzer » in order to reproduce for concert audiences the playing of pianists and composers in their catalogue.

All the archives of the Welte Company disappeared during the bombing of Freiburg, so no documents remain describing Mahler's stop-over in Leipzig, on 9 November 1905, nor the recording session which probably took place in the show-rooms of Popper and Company, on the « Reichstraße » , using a Feurich piano. That autumn, many series of rolls by different artists were recorded, and it is likely that Edwin Welte or Karl Bockisch welcomed the renowned Director of the Vienna Opera and directed the recording session in person.

What happened during the recording session ? According to texts published by the Welte Company, the artist was seated before a grand piano equipped with the Welte system. A bath of mercury, in which electrodes connected to each key were immersed, was located beneath the keyboard ; and behind the piano, a long, narrow wooden box was placed just above the keyboard. Each key was provided with a little carbon rod which, when depressed, dipped more or less deeply into the mercury. The electric contact was prolonged as required by the « Vorsetzer » , which simultaneously printed an ink mark of corresponding size on a matrix band. On top of a flat surface next to the piano was a black-box with 2 holes apparently (according to contemporary photographs) covered with a membrane, not unlike present-day loudspeakers. Connected to the piano by wires, it completed the ultra-secret, patented invention of the Weltes. Unfortunately, the secret of this mechanism is only partly disclosed, since all the original recording instruments were destroyed during the bombardments.

Once the matrix band was imprinted by a marking crayon, the artist was invited to wait in an adjacent hall for the colloidal graphite ink to « fix ». Then, he returned to hear the roll played back by the « Vorsetzer ». Karl Bockisch's extraordinary invention resembled a dresser or very low upright piano. It contained the same number of felt « fingers » as the piano keyboard, each as long as a human finger measured from the wrist to the tip of the nail. It was also furnished with 2 felt-shod « feet » which worked the pedals. The « Vorsetzer », then, read the matrix band and reproduced the artist's playing. To judge from the enthusiastic comments in the company's visitors' book, most of the artists were greatly impressed by the faithfulness of the reproduction. Once the artist had approved the original band, an artisan copied each perforation by hand onto a roll which was then sold, to be played either by a « Vorsetzer » or by a mechanism fitted into the piano itself. Mahler's comments in Welte's visitor's book are briefer than those of most of Welte's other recording artists, but nevertheless, show that he was deeply impressed :

« In astonishment and admiration, I join those who have preceded me (in this book) . Gustav Mahler. »

After this experience, of whose importance he was probably not fully aware, Mahler returned to Vienna early, on 10 November, to resume preparations for the Mozart Festival, scheduled to open 2 weeks later with « Così fan tutte ». Before the end of the year, 4 more performances of Mahler's works were scheduled, of which only the 1st took place in Mahler's absence, in Strasbourg.

Mahler had hoped to give the world-premiere of Richard Strauß's « Salome », in Vienna, but, on December 9th, Ernst von Schuch conducts the premiere in Dresden. The critics are negative, but the Opera is wildly successful with the public and performers. Mahler's heroic efforts to have the work performed in Vienna are crushed by the censor, and « Salome » will not appear in Vienna until 1918, long after Mahler's death.

Gustav Mahler represents one of the keenest losses to early Classical recordings. Despite his present fame as the last of the great German Symphonic composers, during his lifetime, Mahler was better-known as a profoundly influential conductor. His obsessive intensity on the podium fueled headstrong, expressive performances of huge individuality. Mahler was the last and, perhaps, most extraordinary of all the authentic late-Romantic conductors, who never hesitated to mold or even re-write music to their own taste. Mahler records would provide an enormously valuable key toward reconstructing and understanding the lost performing style of his era. And yet, Mahler died in his prime in 1911, at age 51, without having recorded.

True, these are piano rolls, a medium with a deservedly bad reputation. The integrity of many rolls was compromised by extensive doctoring, both to correct wrong or mistimed notes and to « enhance » the original with new harmonies, runs and doublings. Even when un-corrupted, standard rolls had no quality, as all notes sounded at the same volume and with the same flat, staccato tone. Fine for a bar-room, but hardly genuine art.

Mahler's rolls, though, were made in the new Welte-Mignon system, perfected in Germany in 1903. How did it work ? We really don't know, since the proprietary process was a closely-guarded secret and the equipment was secured after each session. Apparently, the master (matrix) was made with ink markings that were then punched as 2 sets of holes - one for each note and the other for its volume. The latter was a crucial component which transformed the bland mechanical clanking of the traditional piano roll into a genuine performance which replicated the accents, dynamics and overall atmosphere of the original.

Reproduction is achieved not through a player piano, but with a so-called « vorsetzer » unit, which actually plays a concert grand using felt-tipped « fingers » activated by varying degrees of pneumatic pressure triggered by the sets of holes. The result is uncannily realistic and far superior to the limited range of the acoustic disc in conveying the « touch » of an artist. Except for a slight pumping background sound of the pneumatic bellows, the present disc has the full nuance of a genuine performance.

Mahler recorded all 4 of his rolls in a single session on November 9, 1905. He chose 2 of his songs, the vocal finale to his 4th Symphony 4 and the 1st movement of his 5th Symphony (which he had completed the previous year) , all in arrangements for piano solo. The readings are fast, impulsive and full of highly individual touches, presumably suggesting the manner in which Mahler intended his own works to be interpreted - far more akin to the hysterical passion of Jascha Horenstein or Leonard Bernstein than the cool modern approach of Herbert von Karajan or Bernard Haitink.

It may be unfair to infer Mahler's podium style, particularly with respect to other composer's works, from his piano rolls. It is far easier to whip-up instantaneous interpretive extremes using only your own hands on a piano than to impart such impulsive desires to an entire ensemble. But whether or not Mahler actually conducted this way, the rolls are our only tangible evidence of his artistic ideals and, thus, provide invaluable guidance to modern performers who strive for authenticity. And such authenticity is important, as composers of every era wrote with the intention that their works would be performed by artists familiar with the æsthetic norms of their time.

This really is a historic « Historic » CD. In November 1905, Mahler made 4 piano rolls for M. Welte & Sohne in Leipzig, piano rolls that properly reproduced can give us an incredibly accurate and detailed impression of how Mahler played the music. (At least, how he played it in piano transcription.)

Over the years, the performances have appeared in various LP incarnations - bafflingly so, since timings tended to vary from transfer to transfer. Now, at long last, under the supervision of that indefatigable Mahlerian Gilbert Kaplan, we have what are probably the definitive reproductions.

The transfers have been overseen by the leading authority on Welte-Mignon piano rolls, Hans Schmitz. 2 factors are of particular note. 1st, there is the fail-safe speed check - Welte-Mignon's own tempo-control test roll complemented by a distance check that was not specified by the manufacturer but which Welte technicians always used. 2nd, there is the use, not of a piano with an in-built Welte-Mignon device, but of a modern Model-D Steinway attached to a meticulously restored Welte-Mignon « Vorsetzer » - a free-standing control unit that drives the piano of one's choice. The results of all this, recorded in Frankfurt and transferred to CD in New York, are superb. At last, we really can have Mahler the pianist as our house-guest. Interpretatively, the play-throughs have an interest that is both enormous and limited. Yet, whatever the limitations (Mahler making a one-off recording for a strange new-fangled device on a day in November 1905), there is no doubting the exhilaration and sweetness of his way with the 4th Symphony's Finale, or the authority and daunting power of his playing of the 1st movement of the 5th Symphony.

Le rouleau de piano pneumatique

Un rouleau de piano pneumatique est un support d'enregistrement permettant d'actionner un piano mécanique.

C'est une bande de papier perforée dont les trous représentent les notes ainsi que d'autres données de contrôle grâce à la position et la longueur des perforations. Ces rouleaux peuvent être rejoués avec un appareil de lecture appelé « flûte de pan », dont les premiers modèles disposaient de 58 trous, puis étendu à 65, et enfin à 88 trous : un pour chaque touche du piano et mécanismes annexes, pédales, etc. Quand les perforations passent devant les trous, les notes correspondantes sont jouées ou les pédales actionnées. Les pianos pneumatiques à 65 et 88 trous ont co-existé concurremment et certains modèles étaient équipés d'une flûte de pan de lecture à 2 rangées de trous permettant la lecture des 2 types de rouleaux.

Le rouleau de piano pneumatique a été le 1er média qui pouvait être produit et copié industriellement et a permis de diffuser rapidement et facilement de la musique.

Les premiers rouleaux ont été utilisés par Welte & Sons dans leur « Orchestrons » dès 1883. Par la suite, des centaines d'entreprises exploitèrent ce créneau florissant produisant des rouleaux ayant des tailles et des perforations différentes ; devant cette multiplicité un peu anarchique, les fabricants américains de rouleaux et de pianos pneumatiques ont établi une norme au cours de la convention de Buffalo du 10 décembre 1908.

Les rouleaux de pianos pneumatiques ont été produits en série de 1896 à 2009.

De nos jours, remplaçant facilement les rouleaux de pianos pneumatiques, les fichiers MIDI constituent un moyen moderne d'enregistrer le jeu des interprètes. Les fichiers MIDI réalisent numériquement et électroniquement ce que les rouleaux font pneumatiquement. Les logiciels d'enregistrement en données MIDI proposent également une fonction montrant l'enregistrement sous forme graphique : représentation sur écran d'un rouleau virtuel ou partition notée imprimable.

« Pianola » était une marque déposée en 1895 à Détroit par la Société Æolian de New York. Au cours des décennies suivantes, elle est devenue un nom générique pour les pianos pneumatiques, puisque Æolian fut la 1re Société à réellement commercialiser ses modèles dans le monde entier. De nombreuses autres sociétés fabriquaient des pianos pneumatiques, mais, en Europe de l'Ouest, seule la marque « Phonola », développée par la société allemande Hupfeld, concourait dans le langage populaire. Le pianola a d'abord été présenté sous le nom de « push-up player » ou « vorsetzer » mais en France, c'est l'expression « piano player » qui s'imposa. C'était une machine de la taille d'un meuble de bureau qui était positionnée devant le clavier d'un piano ordinaire, jouant sur les touches avec des leviers en bois. L'aspiration est assurée par 2 pédales, activant des soufflets ou pompes d'aspiration en bois recouvert de tissu pour imperméables ou toile enduite. L'expression (du pianissimo au forte) peut être obtenue en faisant varier la force et la vitesse du pédalage. De même, parce que les rouleaux sont perforés à un intervalle de temps constant, toutes les fluctuations de phrasé et rubato doivent être introduites au moyen d'un levier de tempo, souvent actionné par la main droite, contrôlant la vitesse du rouleau de papier lequel est entraîné au moyen d'un petit moteur pneumatique à bielles et vilebrequin. D'autres leviers manuels existent pour contrôler les pédales douce et forté du piano.

La Société Æolian mit sur le marché des pianos avec un mécanisme pneumatique intégré dès les années 1890, et continua la production de pianos de ce type jusque dans les années 1980.

Les rouleaux arrangés sont réalisés simplement en coupant des trous dans le papier à l'aide d'un couteau et d'une règle, en utilisant une partition ou d'autres arrangements comme guide. Il en résulte un rouleau sonnante quelque peu mécaniquement.

Les « rouleaux enregistrés » (ou encodés) sont réalisés avec un piano disposant d'un dispositif d'enregistrement pneumatique ou électro-pneumatique équipé de stylets encreurs qui marquent le papier quand le pianiste joue. Des notes additionnelles peuvent ensuite être ajoutées ; de même les erreurs d'exécution sont corrigées après l'enregistrement. Le document obtenu (ou poncif) est alors utilisé comme patron lorsque les trous sont perforés sur les rouleaux destinés à la vente avec un perforateur mécano-pneumatique piloté par le patron. Cette méthode a été utilisée dès 1904 par la Société Welte, en Allemagne, avec leur piano de reproduction Welte-Mignon, qui a enregistré de célèbres pianistes comme Camille Saint-Saëns, Richard Strauß, Alexander Scriabin et George Gershwin. La Société Welte-Mignon, entre autres, a fait d'incalculables enregistrements historiques du jeu d'interprètes de renom, dont il n'existe pas d'enregistrements discographiques.

Aux alentours de 1911 commençait aux États-Unis la production de rouleaux enregistrés et expressifs permettant de restituer assez fidèlement la dynamique propre au jeu du pianiste. En fait, le Welte-Mignon, par exemple, ne permettait la variation que de 2 intensités différentes à la fois, (partie inférieure et supérieure du clavier, avec entre les 2 une frontière intermédiaire librement déplaçable), mais il y avait certaines astuces pour donner à une note isolée sa propre dynamique.

En plus de ces 2 types de rouleaux clairement différenciés, il y en avait d'autres qui comblaient l'abîme entre ces 2 instruments. Les « rouleaux enregistrés » reproduisent la valeur des notes d'un pianiste en direct, mais sans contrôle dynamique automatique, et cela permet aux propriétaires de pianola de recréer l'interprétation des experts, sans peine.

Toutefois, puisque les rouleaux n'étaient pas systématiquement enregistrés par un artiste jouant en direct, il était possible de créer de la musique impossible à jouer pour un artiste ou, plus exactement, de la musique qui n'était pas conçue pour être jouée par un seul pianiste voire inexécutable. Plus d'une centaine de compositeurs ont écrit de la musique spécialement pour des pianos mécaniques au cours du XXe siècle, notamment Conlon Nancarrow, Igor Stravinsky, Alfredo Casella et Paul Hindemith.

Les rouleaux pour les dispositifs Duo-art, Ampico et Welte-Mignon, lesquels étaient connus comme pianos reproducteurs, pouvaient assez précisément reproduire le toucher et la dynamique de l'artiste, quand ils étaient rejoués par des pianos équipés des systèmes pneumatiques propres à chacune de ces marques lesquels ne sont pas compatibles entre eux : les trous correspondants aux variations d'intensité n'ont jamais été normalisés contrairement aux trous de lecture de notes.

Le Duo-Art avaient comme vedette des artistes comme Ignacy Paderewski, George Gershwin, Teresa Carreño, Maurice Ravel, Percy Grainger, Leopold Godowsky et Ferruccio Busoni. Les vedettes de la marque Ampico étaient Sergei Rachmaninoff, Leo Ornstein, Winifred MacBride, et Marguerite Volavy. Welte-Mignon faisait jouer des artistes tels que Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy et Alexander Scriabin.

Des centaines de Sociétés du monde entier produisaient des rouleaux durant l'apogée de ce mode d'enregistrement (1900-1927) .

D'autres, n'utilisant pas la méthode de reproduction en direct, ont produit bon nombre d'artistes. Les plus mémorables marques américaines sont les suivantes :

QRS Company : James P. Johnson, Fats Waller, Zez Confrey, J. Lawrence Cook, Pete Wendling et Victor Arden.

U.S. Music Roll Company : Lee Sims, Robert Billings.

Imperial : Charley Straight, Roy Bargy.

Vocalstyle : Jelly Roll Morton, Walter Davison, Clarence Jones, Luckey Roberts, Charles « Cow Cow » Davenport.

Capitol/Columbia : Jimmy Blythe, Clarence Johnson.

Les rouleaux pour les pianos reproducteurs étaient généralement réalisés à partir du jeu de musiciens célèbres. Habituellement, un pianiste s'assoie à un piano d'enregistrement spécialement équipé, et la hauteur et la durée de toutes les notes jouées sont soit marquées, soit directement perforées sur un rouleau vierge. La commande des pédales douce et forté est également enregistrée.

Les pianos reproducteurs peuvent également recréer les dynamiques du jeu d'un pianiste au moyen d'un contrôle encodé spécialement, sous la forme de perforations situées sur les bords du rouleau, mais cet encodage n'était jamais enregistré automatiquement. Les diverses Sociétés avaient différents types de notations, certains techniquement élaborés (pas nécessairement plus efficace) , certains secrets et d'autres dépendants entièrement des notes manuscrites du producteur de l'enregistrement, mais dans tous les cas ces « hiéroglyphes » de dynamique devaient être habilement traduit dans des codes spéciaux sous forme de perforations nécessaires aux différents types d'instrument.

Les rouleaux enregistrés sont joués à une vitesse spécifique. Imprimée sur l'amorce du rouleau, par exemple 70, signifie une vitesse de défilement de 7 pieds par minute au début du rouleau. Sur tous les pianos pneumatiques, le papier s'enroule sur une bobine de réception, et plus il s'enroule plus le diamètre effectif de cette bobine augmente, avec de fait la vitesse de défilement du papier, la vitesse du moteur pneumatique d'entraînement (par le biais d'une chaîne dite « galle » et d'un train d'engrenages de réduction) restant constante.

Les concepteurs des pianos pneumatiques étaient bien conscients de cette particularité, comme en témoignent de nombreux brevets de l'époque. Mais comme les enregistrements de piano de reproduction étaient généralement faits avec le même type de bobine, le tempo de la musique enregistrée est fidèlement reproduit, malgré l'augmentation progressive de la vitesse linéaire du papier.

Le jeu de pianistes et compositeurs célèbres est conservé sur des rouleaux pour pianos reproducteurs. Gustav Mahler, Edvard Grieg, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Teresa Carreño, Scott Joplin, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Alexander Nikolayevich Scriabin et George Gershwin sont parmi les compositeurs ayant été enregistrés de cette façon.

A piano-roll is a music storage medium used to operate a player piano, piano player or reproducing piano. A piano-roll is a continuous roll of paper with perforations (holes) punched into it. The perforations represent note control data. The roll moves over a reading system known as a « tracker bar » and the playing cycle for each musical note is triggered when a perforation crosses the bar and is read.

The majority of piano-rolls play on 3 distinct musical scales. The 65-note (with a playing range of A-1 to C#7) format was introduced in 1896 in the United States specifically for piano music. In 1900, a USA format playing all 88-notes of the standard piano scale was introduced. In 1902, a German 72-note scale (F-1, G-1 to E7) was introduced. All of these scales were subject to being operated by piano-rolls of varying dimensions. The 1908 Buffalo Convention of U.S. manufacturers standardized the U.S. industry to the 88-note scale and fixed the physical dimensions for that scale.

Piano-rolls were in continuous mass-production from around 1896 to 2008, and are still available today, with QRS Music claiming to have 45,000 titles available with « new titles being added on a regular basis ». Largely replacing piano-rolls, which are no longer mass-produced today, MIDI files represent a modern way in which musical performance data can be stored. MIDI files accomplish digitally and electronically what piano-rolls do mechanically. Software for editing a performance stored as MIDI data often has a feature to show the music in a piano-roll representation.

The 1st paper rolls were used commercially by Welte & Sons in their « Orchestrions » beginning in 1883.

A rollography is a listing of piano-rolls, especially made by a single performer, analogous to a discography.

The Buffalo Convention of December 10, 1908, established 2 future roll formats for the U.S. producers of piano-rolls for self-playing pianos. The 2 formats had different punchings of 65 and 88 notes, but the same width (1 1/4 inches or 285 millimeters) ; thus, 65-note rolls would be perforated at 6 holes to the inch, and 88-note rolls at 9 holes to the inch, leaving margins at both ends for future developments. This made it possible to play the piano-rolls on any self-playing instrument built according to the convention, albeit sometimes with a loss of special functionality. This format became a loose world standard.

Metronomic or arranged rolls are rolls produced by positioning the music slots without real-time input. The music, when played back, is typically purely metronomical. Metronomically arranged music rolls are deliberately left metronomic so as to enable a player-pianist to create their own musical performance via the hand controls that are a feature of all player pianos.

Hand played rolls are created by capturing in real-time the hand-played performance of one or more pianists upon a piano connected to a recording machine. The production roll reproduced the real-time performance of the original recording when played back at a constant speed. It is industry convention for recordings of music intended to be used for dancing to be regularized into strict tempo despite the original performance having the slight tempo fluctuations of all human performances.

Reproducing rolls are the same as hand-played rolls but have additional control codes to operate the dynamic modifying systems specific to whichever brand of reproducing piano it is designed to be played back on. The roll plays back at a fixed constant speed to preserve the inter-relationship of these control codes and the time it takes for the pianos dynamic mechanisms to operate between sequential control codes.

The player piano gives the opportunity to create music that is impossible for humans to play, or, more correctly, music that was not conceived in terms of performance by hand. Over 100 composers wrote music specially for the player piano during the course of the 20th Century. Many mainstream composers experimented with its possibilities, including Igor Stravinsky, Alfredo Casella, and Paul Hindemith ; others, including Conlon Nancarrow, made it their primary milieu.

The Duo-Art, Ampico, and Welte-Mignon brands were known as « reproducing » piano-rolls, as they could accurately reproduce the touch and dynamics of the artist as well as the notes struck, when played back on capable pianos.

Rolls for the reproducing piano were generally made from the recorded performances of famous musicians. Typically, a pianist would sit at a specially designed recording piano, and the pitch and duration of any notes played would be either marked or perforated on a blank roll, together with the duration of the sustaining and soft pedal.

Reproducing pianos can also re-create the dynamics of a pianist's performance by means of specially encoded control perforations placed towards the edges of a music roll, but this coding was never recorded automatically. Different companies had different ways of notating dynamics, some technically advanced (though not necessarily more effective) , some secret, and some dependent entirely on a recording producer's hand-written notes but, in all cases, these dynamic hieroglyphics had to be skillfully converted into the specialized perforated codes needed by the different types of instrument.

Recorded rolls play at a specific, marked speed, where for example, 70 signifies 7 feet of paper travel in 1 minute, at the start of the roll. On all pneumatic player pianos, the paper is pulled on to a take-up spool, and as more paper winds on, so the effective diameter of the spool increases, and with it the paper speed. Player piano engineers were well aware of this, as can be seen from many patents of the time, but since reproducing piano recordings were generally made with a similar take-up spool drive, the tempo of the recorded performance is faithfully reproduced, despite the gradually increasing paper speed.

The playing of many pianists and composers is preserved on reproducing piano-roll. Gustav Mahler, Camille Saint-Saëns, Edvard Grieg, Teresa Carreño, Claude Debussy, Manuel de Falla, Scott Joplin, Sergei Rachmaninoff, Sergei Prokofiev, Alexander Nikolayevich Scriabin, Jelly Roll Morton and George Gershwin are amongst the composers and pianists who have had their performances recorded in this way.

Grieg recorded for the Welte-Mignon in April 1906, only 1 year before he died. There were 3 rolls, 2 of his « Lyric Pieces » and the « Norwegian Bridal Procession ». The « Lyric Piece », Opus 43, No. 1, « the Butterfly », is a model of phrasing ; nowadays, pianists are unlikely to play so freely, but Grieg's Mastery of his own music paints a vivid and delicate picture of a real butterfly, flitting impulsively from flower to flower.

By the time the Welte Company came to record Enrique Granados, they had considerably more experience of their own recording process, and the subtlety of dynamic shading on this roll is quite remarkable. There are many theories concerning the dynamic recording process used by Welte, but from the detail that was captured in this performance, it is clear that some form of automatic procedure was involved.

The Welte recording piano was taken to Russia in 1910, as far as we know to Saint-Petersburg and Moscow. Glazounov, Liapounov and Scriabin recorded their own works, and many pianists were represented as well, including Pouishnoff and Borowski. A notable achievement was the 1st ever recording of Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » by Vladimir Rebikow G. Romanowsky. In early February, Scriabin recorded about 7 or 8 rolls, 6 of which were issued, including several of his Opus 11 Preludes. His playing of the « Poème », Opus 32, No. 1, has an almost improvisatory quality ; but, then, the piece had been in existence for less than 7 years when he came to record it.

No-one yet knows for sure where Welte's Paris rolls were recorded, though the most likely studio would have been the premises of the piano firm of Eugène Moullé, who were the Welte agents in France at the time, around 1913. Gabriel Fauré was one of the French composers who paid a visit, in his late 60's, and he recorded 6 rolls, 5 of which were published, including this remarkably straight performance of his « Nocturne » in A-flat. Fauré's use of the sustaining pedal is intriguing ; he holds the pedal down over some of the changes of harmony, which was to some degree a French characteristic of the time, and yet in other sections of the music, he allows the harmonic structure to resonate much more clearly. Such is authenticity !

Duo-Art featured artists such as Ignace Jan Paderewski, George Gershwin, Maurice Ravel, Teresa Carreño, Percy Grainger, Leopold Godowsky and Ferruccio Busoni. The Ampico brand's featured artists included Sergei Rachmaninoff, Leo Ornstein, Mischa Levitzki, Winifred MacBride, and Marguerite Volavy. For Welte-Mignon, the 1st reproducing system, there played artists such as Gustav Mahler, Camille Saint-Saëns, Claude Debussy, Manuel de Falla, Alexander Scriabin, Enrique Granados, Eugène d'Albert, Josef Lhévinne, Raoul Pugno, and Carl Reinecke (who was the earliest-born pianist to record in any media format) .

Nikolai Medtner recorded for both Welte and Duo-Art, the latter being the Æolian Company's reproducing piano, introduced in March 1914. The recording of dynamics for the Duo-Art involved a musical producer, sitting at the side of the piano, and controlling 2 large dials, which transmitted an interpretation of the artist's dynamics to the recording machine. Æolian was able to perforate an « original » roll in real time, and after a few copies had been made, this was worked on repeatedly, until the pianist was content with the result. Percy Grainger often remarked that the Duo-Art represented him not as he actually played, but as he would like to have played. Such rolls are portraits rather than photographs, but they can be equally telling.

Josef Hofmann recorded rolls for a number of companies but, in the end, signed an exclusive contract with Æolian, where he was on very friendly terms with the main Duo-Art recording producer, W. Creary Woods. Hofmann's technical Mastery of the keyboard was legendary, although unlike Rachmaninov, his hands were not especially large. Sometimes, his piano rolls can be disappointing, perhaps, because he achieved so much in his early life, so that later projects lacked the excitement of youth. He was a true Renaissance Man, an expert mechanical engineer, and his Hofmann Automobile Springs were really successful in their day. This recording shows something of his sparkling sense of humour - the tip-toeing smuggler is clearly trying to avoid the authorities !

Ernest Schelling was an American, born in Belvidere, New Jersey, who studied the piano in the United States and Europe and became a good friend of Paderewski, who recorded his « Nocturne a Ragusa » (Dubrovnik) for Duo-Art. Schelling recorded Duo-Art rolls himself, but also played for Welte quite early on, in 1907. He went on to become an orchestral conductor, with a particular love of children's concerts, perhaps, fitting for a man whose own music and style of playing are rather gentle. His performance of this Chopin « Étude » has a quite magical joyfulness - what a miracle such recordings must have seemed 100 years ago !

There were hundreds of companies world-wide producing rolls during the peak period of their popularity (1900-1927) . Some other non-reproducing rolls makers of live performances are listed below together with their most memorable recording artistes.

QRS Company : James P Johnson, Fats Waller, Zez Confrey, J. Lawrence Cook, Pete Wendling and Victor Arden.

Mastertouch Piano Roll Co. Australia.

U.S. Music Roll Company : Lee Sims, Robert Billings.

Imperial : Charley Straight, Roy Bargy.

Vocalstyle : Jelly Roll Morton, Walter Davison, Clarence Jones, Luckey Roberts, Charles « Cow Cow » Davenport.

Capitol/Columbia : Jimmy Blythe, Clarence Johnson.

White-Smith Music Publishing Company versus Apollo Company, 209 U.S. 1 (1908) , was a decision by the Supreme Court of the United States which ruled that manufacturers of music rolls for player pianos did not have to pay royalties to the composers. The ruling was based on a holding that the piano-rolls were not copies of the plaintiffs' copyrighted sheet music, but were instead parts of the machine that reproduced the music.

This case was subsequently eclipsed by Congress's intervention in the form of an amendment to the Copyright Act of 1909, protecting them and introducing a compulsory license for the manufacture and distribution of such « mechanical » embodiments of musical works.

The Reproducing Piano - Early Experiments

Introduction

What marked-out the beginnings of the reproducing piano, as opposed to the normal player piano, were the early attempts to record and play-back the actual playing of pianists at the keyboard, by means of paper rolls which could be copied and to some degree mass produced. The very earliest piano recordings on paper strips were made as a means of transcribing musical ideas on to sheet music, thus, allowing the ephemeral art of improvisation to be captured on the printed page.

One can trace rudimentary mechanisms involving lead pencils or crayons back as far as the 18th Century, and Doctor Burney describes an instrument made by a German musician, Johann Hohlfeld, which he encountered on a visit to Berlin, which consisted of 2 cylinders, moving paper between them, on which, by means of a crayon, each key when pressed down by the player caused a mark to be made. The 1st attempt to develop a marking piano in any modern sense came in 1863, when an Englishman, Joseph Beverley Fenby, invented an Electro-Magnetic Phonograph, which used solenoids and inked wheels to mark-up a moving roll. The use of inked wheels is particularly important, since this was the way in which Welte was subsequently said to have produced its original master (matrix) rolls.

Jules Carpentier's Melograph and Melotrope

Other marking machines followed, though still with the aim of converting improvisation into printed form. Then, in 1881, the French electrical and telegraph engineer, Jules Carpentier, demonstrated his « Mélographe Répétiteur » at the « Exposition Internationale de l'Électricité » in Paris. This highly-ingenuous device was actually the 1st real-time perforating machine, cutting slots in moving paper by means of pairs of mechanical cutters, rotating at high-speed as the appropriate areas of the paper were pressed up against them by means of solenoids. The rolls produced in this way had a range of 50 notes, quite advanced in comparison to the contemporary American instruments. Carpentier's machines were placed in the category of Precision Instruments, and the inventor reported that his construction team worked to tolerances of 1/100 of a millimeter, somewhat less than half a thousandth of an inch.

At this early stage, the corresponding play-back mechanism, the « Mélotrope » , was permanently installed inside the same harmonium used for the recording process but, by 1887, Carpentier had modified both devices, restricting the range to 3 octaves, allowing for the « Mélotrope » to be attached to any style of keyboard instrument, and designing and constructing an automatic perforating machine for mass-production.

It was mass-production that shaped the international market for music rolls at this time, and 1887 also saw the foundation of the Æolian Company in Meriden, Connecticut, as an effective merger of the Mechanical Organette Company of New York and the Automatic Music Paper Company of Boston. Without some automatic reproduction of dynamics, recorded music rolls for use with pianos tended to remain the preserve of enthusiasts at this early stage.

Real-Time Perforating Machines

The system was designed and built by William Thaulé, an American composer who lived in Dresden at the turn of the 20th Century, and who can be seen supervising the recording process, marked-up a blank roll of paper using pens and ink but, as early as 1894, there were real-time perforating machines in the United States which could instantly produce rolls from the playing of pianists. George Howlett Davis, an American engineer who worked for a while in the 1890's for the Automaton Piano Company of New York, patented at least 2 designs for perforating machines which could be operated from a piano keyboard. In a British patent which he applied for in 1900, he speaks of working to an accuracy of 2,200 perforations per minute, roughly 1/37th of a second. Given that player pianos can reproduce complicated music with many notes simultaneously, this is not so much worse than our present-day MIDI, which, if it is subjected to the 20 note chords sometimes played by duettists, can only manage 1/50th of a second.

But we should not jump to the conclusion that these machines were designed solely to reproduce the playing of great pianists. Whatever the intentions of their inventors, they were initially used in order to speed-up the process of manufacturing normal pianola rolls. The player-piano industry in 1900 was geared-up to produce instruments which gave the owner the ability to play music as he or she desired, and the jump had not yet been made to a form of recording which allowed only passive participation on the part of the listener. Rolls supposedly « played » by Scott Joplin, George Gershwin and many others can be clearly seen to be metronomic, meaning that every single beat has exactly the same number of perforation rows. Every case is different, of course : it is highly-unlikely that Scott Joplin recorded most of his piano rolls, while Gershwin may have transferred his playing to stencil rolls by means of some factory piano and perforating machine, but the results would then have been used as the equivalent of written-out manuscript, to be turned into normal, non-recorded and thoroughly regularized rolls. The recording of the « Rhapsody in Blue » is perhaps an exception, but once again, it is not clear how the jazz-band accompaniment found its way on to the issued rolls, and the most likely method would have been for a musical technician to have perforated it by hand on the master stencil.

The Æolian Company kept such an early recording piano in operation at its factory in Hayes, England, as late as 1911, when the above photograph was taken, though it seems clear, from the mechanical nature of the design, that it would have been hard-pressed to operate in real time. The paper on the perforating machine is the wider style with sprocket holes, used for the stencil rolls, and the system would appear to be a modification of the normal production perforating machines then in use. The playing of such heavy piano actions at a consistent speed, surrounded by oil, grease and noisy machinery, is probably far closer to Gershwin's early experiences than the elegant recording studios of Welte or Duo-Art.

Dynamic Recording

Very little in the way of recording dynamics seems to have occurred before the Welte-Mignon came on to the scene in 1904, but 2 earlier inventions foreshadowed one of the methods that Welte, and indeed others, were to use, namely the drawing of a seismographic line according to the displacement of piano keys. The 1st team to achieve this goal was a pair of Frenchmen, Alfred Binet and Jules Courtier, who used the line mainly as a means of studying the minute inflections of tempo in apparently regular piano playing. As any key was played, it squeezed a rubber tube laid underneath both the black and white sections of the keyboard, and the resulting in movement of air displaced a diaphragm, connected in turn to a pen recorder.

Carl Wilhelm Nyström of Karlstad, in Sweden, seems to have been the 1st really to have dipped his toe in the water, or, more correctly, his stylus in the wax. Nyström designed a system of dynamic recording for electric pianos by means of electrical resistances and solenoids, for which he received a Swedish patent in October 1898. It is not clear that his invention could possibly have worked in an accurate way, since it recorded a groove in a thick, wax-coated paper roll, by moving a stylus sideways in accordance with the depth of key depression, so that only the speed of displacement of the groove indicated a dynamic level, whereas it used a similar stylus to read the groove on play-back, apparently taking the actual groove position as the dynamic indicator, rather than the speed of change. Nevertheless, it takes a brave man to be the 1st to jump, and Nyström's name is deservedly represented in our historical narrative. In any case, he came back with a better idea a few years later, though by then there were other inventors in the field.

Le procédé Welte-Mignon

M. Welte & Sons, Freiburg and New York was a manufacturer of « Orchestrions » , organs and reproducing pianos, established in Vöhrenbach by Michæl Welte (1807-1880) in 1832.

From 1832 until 1932, the firm produced mechanical musical instruments of the highest quality. The firm's founder, Michæl Welte (1807-1880) , and his company were prominent in the technical development and construction of « Orchestrions » from 1850, until the early 20th Century.

In 1872, the firm moved from the remote Black Forest town of Vöhrenbach into a newly-developed business complex beneath the main railway station in Freiburg, Germany. They created an epoch-making development when they substituted the playing gear of their instruments from fragile wood pinned cylinders to perforated paper rolls. In 1883, Emil Welte (1841-1923) , the eldest son of Michael, who had emigrated to the United States in 1865, patented the paper roll method (U.S. Patent 287,599) , the model of the later piano-roll. In 1889, the technique was further perfected, and again protected through patents. Later, Welte built only instruments using the new technique, which was also licensed to other companies. With branches in New York and Moscow, and representatives throughout the world, Welte became very well known.

The firm was already famous for its inventions in the field of the reproduction of music when Welte introduced the Welte-Mignon reproducing piano in 1904.

« It automatically replayed the tempo, phrasing, dynamics and pedalling of a particular performance, and not just the notes of the music, as was the case with other player pianos of the time. »

In September, 1904, the Mignon was demonstrated in the Leipzig Trade Fair. In March 1905, it became better known when showcased « at the showrooms of Hugo Popper, a manufacturer of roll-operated « Orchestrions » . By 1906, the Mignon was also exported to the United States, installed to pianos by the firms Feurich and Steinway & Sons. As a result of this invention by Edwin Welte (1876-1958) and his brother-in-law Karl Bockisch (1874-1952) , one could now record and reproduce the music played by a pianist as true to life as was technologically possible at the time.

From 1911 on, a similar system for organs branded « Welte Philharmonic-Organ » was produced. 13 well-known European organist-composers of the era, among them Alfred Hollins, Eugene Gigout and Max Reger were photographed recording for the organ, distinguished organists like Edwin Lemare, Clarence Eddy and Joseph Bonnet were recorded too. The largest Philharmonic Organ ever built is at the Salomons Estate of the Markerstudy Group. This instrument was built in 1914 for Sir David Lionel Salomons to play not only rolls for the organ but also for his Welte « Orchestrion » No. 10 from about 1900, which he traded in for the organ. One of these organs can also be seen in the Scotty's Castle museum in Death Valley where it is played regularly during museum tours. An organ built for the HMHS Britannic never made its way to Belfast due to the outbreak of the First World War. Today, it is playing in the Swiss National Museum in Seewen.

In 1912, a new company was founded, the « M. Welte & Sons, Inc. » in New York, and a new factory was built in Poughkeepsie, New York. Shareholders were predominantly family members in the U.S. and Germany, among them Barney Dreyfuss, Edwin's brother-in-law.

As a result of the Alien Property Custodian enactment, during the First World War, the company lost their American branch and all of their U.S. patents. This caused the company great economic hardship. Later, the depression and the mass-production of new technologies like the radio and the electric record player in the 1920's virtually brought about the demise of the firm and its expensive instruments. Other companies with similar products like American Piano Company (Ampico) and Duo-Art also began to fade from the scene at this time.

From 1919 on, Welte also built theatre organs, in particular for installation in cinemas. With the introduction of « talkies » around 1927, the demand for these also began to diminish and, by 1931, production of such instruments had been severely curtailed. The last big theatre organ was a custom-built instrument for the « Norddeutscher Rundfunk » (NORAG) broadcasting company in Hamburg, still in place and still playing today. A number of other Welte theatre organs survive in museums.

In 1932, the firm, now with Karl Bockisch as sole owner, barely escaped bankruptcy, and began to concentrate on the production of church and other speciality organs.

The last project of Edwin Welte was an electronic organ equipped with photo-cells, the « Lichttonorgel » or « Phototone-Organ ». This instrument was the 1st ever to use analogue sampled sound.

In 1936, a prototype of this type of organ was demonstrated at a concert in the « Berliner Alte Philharmonie ». The production of these organs (in cooperation with the Telefunken Company) was halted by the Nazi-government because the inventor, Edwin Welte, was married to Betty Dreyfuss, who was Jewish.

The business complex in Freiburg was bombed and completely destroyed in November 1944. This event seemed to obliterate the closely kept secrets of the firm and their recording apparatus and recording process appeared lost forever. But, in recent years, parts of the recording apparatus for the Welte Philharmonic-Organs and documents were found in the United States. It was, then, possible to theoretically reconstruct the recording process. The « Augustiner Museum » of Freiburg keeps the legacy of the company - all that survived the Second World War.

Welte-Mignon made several organs for important churches as did Welte-Tripp. One of the last surviving instruments is in the Church of the Covenant in Boston, Massachusetts. This was restored by Austin several years ago - supposedly to the original state. It was altered by an organist in 1959 or 1960. Until that time, it has been carefully restored and re-leathered by the Reed-Treanor organ company. This included the entire combination action in the console and the manual relays in the church basement and the repair of the massive 25 HP DC motor that powered the Spencer Turbine blower. During the 2 years they cared for the organ, no tonal or structural changes were made.

Introduction

During the 2nd half of the 19th Century, the firm of Michael Welte und Söhne in Freiburg-im-Breisgau, southern Germany, achieved world renown as a manufacturer of « Orchestrions ». Over several decades, it built-up a skilled work-force, both for the construction of the instruments and for the arrangement of the music rolls which caused them to play. So, at the turn of the 20th Century, it was ideally placed to develop an experimental piano playing device, with the aim of reproducing the recorded performances of the finest pianists of the day. Edwin Welte, son of the main director of the firm, Berthold Welte, and Edwin's former school friend, Karl Bockisch, together experimented and produced the 1st reproducing piano in the world. What we now know as the Welte-Mignon was originally called, quite simply, the Mignon, an essentially French word meaning both small and pleasing, to distinguish it from the firm's other instruments, which were all considerably larger.

The one is a device fitting in front of a normal piano, and the other a piano with the player works built inside its case. In a sense, the original Welte-Mignon was neither of these or, at the very least, it was a most unusual player piano, since it had no keyboard, and looked for all the world like an ornate side-board, often decorated in ways to complement the owner's own furnishings. Nevertheless, it was rightly regarded as the 1st true reproducing piano, in that it automatically replayed the tempo, phrasing, dynamics and pedalling of a particular performance, and not just the notes of the music, as was the case with other player pianos of the time. Its main introduction to the public took place in Leipzig, Germany in early March 1905, at the showrooms of Hugo Popper, a manufacturer of roll-operated « Orchestrions ». However, it had been demonstrated, with a limited number of recordings, at the Autumn Trade Fair in that city, in September 1904. It was launched in the United States in 1906 and, in due course, the Mignon mechanism was installed into normal pianos, especially the Steinway and the Feurich.

Musical Example

The earliest born pianist ever to record on music roll was Carl Reinecke, who came into the world on 23 June 1824, 3 years before the death of Beethoven. Reinecke was a friend of Schumann, was helped in his career by Mendelssohn, knew Brahms as a young man, and probably heard Chopin play in Paris. His 1st concert tour, of Scandinavia, took place in 1843. He taught, amongst others, Albeniz, Grieg, Karg-Elert, Sinding, Sullivan, Thalberg and Cosima Wagner. That we, in the 21st Century, should be able to hear his playing at all is a wonder in itself, but the real miracle is the quality of recording developed so early on by Welte in Germany. The Company regarded its Mignon recordings as something akin to photographs ; wrong notes were as often as not left uncorrected, and it is likely that the dynamics were automatically recorded and remained similarly un-edited. Reinecke's rolls were recorded in January 1905, when he was already 80 years old ; to be sure, one hears the uneven playing of an elderly man, but it is a man with a style of performance formed and perfected in the early-19th Century.

Mechanical Operation

In February 1909, the « Illustrierte Zeitung » of Leipzig published an article on roll-operated instruments, which included clear illustrations of the workings of a Welte cabinet player. This was a later variety of Mignon which fitted in front of a normal piano, and played it by means of felt-covered wooden fingers, the roll side 1st. It is readily apparent that the instrument was both complicated and substantial, not something to be moved about without the aid of household staff.

As with nearly all player and reproducing pianos, the Welte-Mignon is powered by suction, and that simple fact may be enough for you. It uses pneumatic valves and motors, just like any other player piano, although its valves are a little different from most. But the more complex mechanisms found within it are those which control the dynamics of the music, according to coded perforations located towards the edges of the rolls. The Mignon splits its pneumatic mechanism into 2 sections, with the division occurring between F-sharp and G above middle C. The historical reasons for this break point are not immediately clear, especially since most player pianos are divided between the E and F just below this, which is the actual halfway point of the normal keyboard.

A number of reproducing pianos make use of what are known as lock and cancel valves, allowing perforations on the roll to be only momentary, but to have a lasting effect. This avoids the need for extended perforations, which can lead to weakness of the paper and the consequent risk of malfunction. The firm of Michael Welte and Sons was already using such devices for its organs and « Orchestrions », and so their application to the Welte-Mignon was quite a natural progression. There are 3 pairs of lock and cancel valves on each side of the Welte-Mignon dynamic control mechanism.

The Welte-Mignon Dynamic Valve Box

This animation shows only one pair of valves working, for the sake of simplicity, and to help establish an understanding of the way in which lock and cancel valves operate. The view is a cross-section through a wooden valve box, with the input signals coming via tubing from the tracker-bar, and entering the box through the 6 holes at the bottom. Above the inputs are 6 thin leather diaphragms, known as pouches, and above them the main suction supply chamber. At the side of each pouch, though too small to be sensibly illustrated, is a tiny bleed hole, whose purpose is to channel a small amount of suction to its respective tracker bar opening. The air allowed through the tracker bar by a perforation in the roll is far greater than the suction provided through the bleed hole, so it does not stop the valve from lifting as appropriate, but when the roll perforation closes, the bleed suction provides just enough to evacuate the passage to the tracker bar, thus, equalizing the pressures and allowing the valve to fall again.

Valves 1, 2, 3 and 5 have 2 functions, one of which, not illustrated in this 1st diagram, plays a part in governing the Welte-Mignon dynamic control mechanism. All the valves contribute towards locking or cancelling the operation of the 1st valve of each pair, by means of the diaphragm at the top. Short lengths of tubing channel the output of each valve to small chambers, either above or below the locking diaphragms.

The Welte-Mignon Recording Process

The Welte Company in Germany kept its recording processes a closely guarded secret and, for many years, the accepted explanation of its technique was based on the ideas of Richard Simonton, an American who had visited Edwin Welte and Karl Bockisch in the late-1940's and 1950's. In particular, Ben M. Hall, the sleeve note writer for an American series of LP recordings inspired by Simonton, entitled « The Welte Legacy of Piano Treasures », created a detailed description of the recording process, complete with explanatory photographs and drawings.

But although Richard Simonton was a real enthusiast in the promotion of Welte's « lost » musical archive, his energy and personal charm were not matched by a similar expertise on the history or technical operation of player pianos, and in the light of new documentary evidence, the theories that have been accepted for so many years have become unconvincing.

Recording the Pitches and Durations of the Notes

As the pianist played a particular note, a thin rod of metal or carbon, attached to the underside of each key, was dipped into a small cup of mercury, located in a trough under the key-bed of the piano, which spanned the whole width of roughly 7 octaves. In this way, an electrical contact was made, without greatly affecting the touch of the recording piano, which had to remain sensitive enough for the most fastidious pianist. The system used must have been very similar to Charles Fuller Stoddard's 1908 design for the Ampico recording piano, illustrated in U.S. Patent 1,095,128.

One can certainly see a wooden compartment of some sort under the keyboard in many of the Welte recording photographs, and it is particularly clear in the case of Ferruccio Busoni's 1907 recording session in Freiburg. Also present are a number of relevant people : on the left of Busoni is Edwin Welte, followed by Karl Bockisch, whose arm is resting on the roll recording machine. Although these 2 are generally recognized as the inventors of the Welte-Mignon, modern researchers have suggested that other earlier engineers might well also have played a part. The bearded gentleman on the right, in morning dress, is Berthold Welte, who was the director of Michael Welte und Söhne in Germany. Towards the far wall is a display stand, containing the various medals the firm had been awarded, and against the wall an original Welte-Mignon keyless piano.

Despite the element of secrecy and the implied uniqueness of Welte's recording process, it is worth noting that a very similar trough can be seen in the recording photographs for the Philipps' Duca reproducing piano, so Welte were certainly not alone in this feature of their design. Arthur Friedheim, shown below, was a pupil of Franz Liszt, and at one time his assistant and secretary.

Unlike Duo-Art, Welte did not perforate music rolls in real time, but instead made ink or carbon traces on an original roll as the notes were played, and these were subsequently punched-out by hand. It is likely that the paper for these originals was white, and that it was pre-printed with 100 continuous lines, in the positions where each pitch was located. A number of similar master rolls recorded for the Welte Philharmonic Organ have survived, and one can still see the pencil and recorded ink traces, which provided a roll editor with a clear indication of where to punch-out each note.

The machine reputedly used for marking out these Welte organ rolls has survived, and today forms part of the collection at the Museum of Music Automats, at Seewen in Switzerland. It used small metal wheels which rotated as they marked the note durations, thereby, avoiding any drag on the moving roll. The following photograph was taken while the machine was still in a workshop in New Jersey, and reproduced in a CD booklet which accompanied a recording of Gustav Mahler's Welte-Mignon rolls, published in the United States in the mid-1990's. As can partly be seen, the take-up spool had adjustable edge guides, making it suitable for a variety of different sizes of roll, so there is no technical reason why it should have been restricted to recordings for the organ, as opposed to the piano. At the top left is a speed governor, similar to those found in gramophone equipment of the time and, at the front, are the individual note trackers, operated by solenoids in a lower-part of the machine, which rocked the note wheel levers and so brought the inked marking wheels into contact with the paper.

Such machines were not as uncommon as we might perhaps think. A German engineer from Berlin, Paul Böhm, had already patented a very similar mechanism in 1886, significantly at the very time Welte had begun producing paper rolls for its « Orchestrions » , and an almost identical device was still in use in that city in the years preceding the First World War. The recording process for the Virtuola expression piano, manufactured by the Römheldt-Heilbrunn Company, of Berlin and Weimar, and exported to France under the name of « Mélodia », was depicted, in a somewhat Romantic combination of artist's drawing and retouched photograph, in an advertisement in « l'Illustration », published in Paris in late-1913.

Looking at the « Mélodia » recording mechanism in detail, the same style of trackers is immediately apparent, with what appears to be a set of thin wheels on the opposite side of a rigid metal comb, and the finished roll ends-up on a take-up spool in exactly the same position as that on the Welte machine. The note traces have been touched-up by an artist, since in practice they would have been much smaller and lighter but, in general terms, this is a note-recording machine that must have been very similar to that used by Welte in Freiburg and elsewhere. Tantalizingly, the « Mélodia » advertisement informs the Parisian public that the recording machine will be demonstrated on request, every afternoon, at the Company's studios at 39, « rue la Boétie » - how frustrating that neither the machine nor indeed the building should still be there !

Recording the Dynamic Information

In the absence of modern audio methods, the only means available of capturing music roll dynamic information in the early-1900's was to record either the length of time taken to play each individual note, or the force exerted in playing it. Generally speaking, the louder a note is to sound, the faster the key has to be struck, and the greater the energy that must be expended by the pianist in order to accelerate the fingers and arms accordingly. These fleeting variations of time or exerted force need to be measured, recorded, and converted to the 2 constantly varying tracks of dynamic coding that are all a reproducing piano can respond to. Many reproducing piano companies had no automatic means of doing this, relying instead on information noted down by a human recording producer, either as undulating pencil lines on a musical score, or, in the case of the Duo-Art, as perforated coding triggered by the use of 2 manually operated control mechanisms.

All the surviving evidence for the Welte-Mignon suggests that Welte's recording methods were relatively straightforward, using materials and mechanical designs that were already in use and readily available at its factory in Freiburg. However, since the company kept its dynamic recording processes secret, there is no authoritative description that was written by the original inventors or operators. It is abundantly clear, however, to any musician studying the performances on original Welte-Mignon music rolls, that the company had to have developed some means of recording and converting the dynamic information quite automatically. With most other reproducing piano systems, there is often the feeling that the dynamics have been carefully crafted by a roll editor ; there is a tendency to use the complete gamut, from pianissimo to fortissimo, for every roll, just to prove that the particular system can do it. In the case of the Welte-Mignon, however, there can be astounding realism at some of the most insignificant moments and, on occasions, a certain lack of detail when the musical texture becomes too complex - both signs of an automated process.

Welte dynamic coding is also difficult to edit effectively, since it is based on crescendos and diminuendos, which have an effect on all subsequent notes, until one of the various dynamic limits is reached. Ampico was not dissimilar, but it had an extensive and well-documented editing department, with dozens of musicians and technicians, whose traces remained in existence well into the 1990's, whereas Welte simply did not. And Welte, uniquely amongst the main 4 roll recording companies, did not encourage its pianists to participate in the editing process. Indeed, there was virtually no editing process : pianists could listen to their rolls once perforated, and if they were unsatisfied with them, they could choose to record them again, but there was no suggestion of the original recordings being alterable in any way. The Welte recording contract of the British pianist, Fanny Davies, which has survived at the Royal College of Music in London, spells these conditions out very clearly.

The clearest original report that we now have is an account published in 1986 by a former audio engineer and historian of recorded sound who lived in Freiburg from the early-1950's onwards, and who had dealt personally with Karl Bockisch in the 1930's, in connection with a whole series of broadcasts of Welte-Mignon rolls on the German Radio. The engineer, Horst Wahl, informs us that in the early days of the reproducing piano, a trained musician was sometimes employed to mark-up a score with the pianist's dynamics, since the earliest automatic systems were not able to provide sufficiently musical results. This is roughly what happened at Ampico, for example. However, « Herr » Wahl then goes on to say that Welte and Bockisch did their best to avoid such a process (in our translation) :

« Welte and Bockisch worked tirelessly over several years in order to eliminate this unsatisfactory method, and they finally developed a (pneumatic action) rail with a whole series of finely graded holes, which regulated the passage of air, responded in proportion to the various loudnesses and, thereby, provided a different way of recording the dynamic shadings. »

This elusive note, hidden away in a multi-volume work on the history of the gramophone, and spotted in 2014 by Gerhard Dangel of the « Augustiner Museum » in Freiburg, neatly confirms the description.

The Welte dynamic recording process most likely occurred in the following way. For each key, there were not one, but 2 sets of electrical contacts, operating at different times and positions during the playing of the particular note. One contact set, the metal rod and mercury described above, operated immediately the key was struck, and the other, a fine wire contact at the back of the piano action, was not made until the hammer had more or less reached the piano string. The 1st contact triggered a pair of small electro-pneumatic valves, of a sort commonly found in Welte organs of the time, and these did 2 things : the 1st valve operated a pneumatic mechanism which marked a note line on the master roll, and the 2nd caused suction to pass between a pair of small pneumatic motors, of roughly the same size as the note pneumatics on the early Welte-Mignon play-back mechanism.

At rest, when the recording machine was not in operation, both pneumatics of each pair were held open by springs, but in use, when no note was playing, one pneumatic was fully open, and the other fully-closed by suction, a position equivalent to the loudest fortissimo that could be measured. As soon as the 1st electrical contact was made, the 2 pneumatics began to reverse their state, through one or more carefully adjusted small orifices, similar to, but a little larger than the « bleed holes » found in normal player pianos, with the open pneumatic being gradually evacuated, and the closed pneumatic gradually opening. Over the time interval necessary to move the key slowly enough to produce the quietest possible pianissimo, the state of the 2 pneumatics would completely reverse, with other dynamic levels being reflected by smoothly varying intermediate positions.

When the 2nd contact, at the back of the piano action, came into operation as the note began to sound, another set of electro-pneumatic valves was triggered, which also had 2 functions. Firstly, it inhibited any further change in the position of the dynamic capture pneumatics, which therefore mirrored the dynamic force with which the particular note had been played. But this individual note dynamic then had to be amalgamated with the dynamics from any other notes being played, and this was done by allowing both pneumatics of the pair to briefly pass whatever suction remained in them to a secondary pneumatic pair, of the same capacity, though not necessarily the same dimensions, as the 1st. Both pneumatics of this secondary pair were normally fully-opened by springs, but on their being closed by suction, small arms fixed to their moving surfaces potentially came into contact with the 2 blades of a light and rigid cylindrical rotor, which thereby rotated to a position reflecting the average dynamic of all notes playing in either the bass or treble section of the recording piano. As soon as the transfer of suction had taken place, and the rotor had been moved accordingly, the secondary pneumatic pair opened again, and the primary pair was reset to its potential fortissimo state.

Located at the end of each dynamic rotor was a double registering pneumatic with a movable centre board, something like one of the component pneumatics on the roll motors of late Æolian push-up Pianolas, and the 2 mechanisms were connected by means of a slide valve, attached to the centre board of the pneumatic. If the rotor slowly moved one surface of the slide valve in either direction, it uncovered a single port, which caused a fixed length of either the crescendo or decrescendo dynamic coding to be marked on the master roll. At the same time, it caused one side of the double pneumatic to be gradually evacuated, thereby, rotating the other surface of the slide valve until the port closed again. At this point, however, and assuming the rotor had not moved its position further, the double pneumatic continued to operate slowly, until the corresponding port at the other extremity of the slide valve was opened. The opposing dynamic coding would then be marked on the roll, and the double pneumatic would reverse its direction. In this way, the dynamic coding on the master roll could be made to hover, albeit rather slowly, at any dynamic level.

However, the Welte dynamic control system also allowed for accents of considerable subtlety. On the slide valve there were 2 further ports, only uncovered if the dynamic rotor changed its position substantially. The uncovering of either of these inner-ports would cause the marking of a forzando or forzando piano trace on the master roll, but only for as long as the port remained open. At the same time, it would cause the appropriate side of the double pneumatic to be evacuated quickly, thereby closing-off the open port. A further feature of the double regulators was a connection to marking pens at the sides of the master roll, allowing 2 oscillating traces to be printed in synchronism with the variations in dynamic levels. Such a trace can clearly be seen on the rather grainy photograph of the original master for Welte-Mignon roll 4119, « Moment Exotique », by Vladimir Horowitz, which is taken from a book entitled « Reproducing Pianos Past and Present », by Kent Holliday, published in 1989 by the Edward Mellen Press. This master roll is the only original Welte-Mignon master known to have survived beyond the Second World War. Unfortunately, although it was in Austin, Texas, in the 1980's, when this photograph was taken, since the credits in the book confirm this location, all trace of it has now disappeared. Kent Holliday has kindly provided a copy of the original photograph.

One final feature of the Welte-Mignon's creation of dynamics was its use of what is known in English as a mezzo-forte hook, allowing the mechanism to be restricted if desired, either above or below a fixed mezzo-forte level. 1 of 2 perforations in the roll causes either the bass or treble hook to be brought into operation, and the dynamic regulator is then held within a particular section of its overall range. The main usage of this device occurs when the music is generally loud, since it allows for substantial accents to be achieved more speedily than might otherwise be the case. However, it would be foolhardy to insert the necessary coding into the master roll after the recording had been made, since every other subsequent dynamic command would then have to be edited as well. It is much more likely that an operator switched on the equivalent hooks in the recording cabinet, which would not only have marked-up the master roll, but also have affected the double regulators and, thereby, altered the subsequent coding on the roll quite automatically.

Clearly, it was very important that the operator should make the switch while the mechanism was already in the correct part of its range, or the hook would have the reverse effect of that desired. During the 1st 16 months or so of non-experimental recording for the Welte-Mignon, most of which took place at the Popper show-rooms in Leipzig, either Karl Bockisch or Edwin Welte can be seen sitting at the recording cabinet, in a position to observe the workings of the mechanism within. There is always, without exception, someone sitting at the controls of the cabinet in the photographs taken at this time. Soon after the return of recording operations to the factory in Freiburg, however, an alteration was made to the cabinet, to allow the 2 dynamic rotors to be sited where their positions could more easily be seen at a distance, so that an operator with a remote control could sit at a table, or look over the pianist's shoulder and follow the musical score, pressing the mezzo-forte hook buttons in the secure knowledge that the mechanism was correctly positioned. The 2 holes for the indicators can clearly be seen in many recording photographs of the time, and in the photo above, of a recording by Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler, it is also possible to see a remote cable attached to the side of the cabinet. In photos taken after the extension to the cabinet was introduced, the operator is generally standing, not sitting, and there is normally no sign of a chair, which would no longer have been essential at the cabinet itself. One may remark that the lady standing behind the recording cabinet in the photograph above is Edwin Welte's sister, Frieda, who was married to Karl Bockisch.

This, then, is the probable way in which Welte-Mignon rolls were recorded. There may have been differences of detail, but the system would have been perfectly capable of marking-up both the note and dynamic traces on master rolls, with no human intervention after the time of recording, save the punching-out of perforations as indicated by the ink traces. Careful use of measuring calipers would allow the marked dynamic information to be punched in advance of its respective notes, keeping the length of any such mark intact, but offsetting it so that the end of the resulting perforated slot terminated just a little in advance of the start of its corresponding inked marking. Once an original roll was complete, it was copied to a batch of 2nd master rolls, which were subsequently used in perforating production copies. Some musical editing of Welte rolls may have taken place, of course, but not much, given the wrong notes which turn-up with surprising frequency. By contrast, it is clear from Welte factory rolls which survive in Germany and California, that a good deal of simple editing was carried-out on the 2nd masters in the early 1920's, prior to the issuing of recordings for the later Mignon system that used green rolls, but this was done mainly for technical reasons connected with the differing ways in which the 2 systems responded to the pedalling signals. Where dynamic changes were occasionally made, a play-back mechanism could be used to mark a dynamic line on a 2nd master roll for checking purposes from the collection at the University of Southern California.

Musical Editors

The recording producers and editors employed by Welte are not quite as well-known as those of some of the other reproducing piano companies, and it seems clear from most of the early company photographs that Edwin Welte and Karl Bockisch operated the recording machine themselves for the 1st 2 years or more. However, at least some information has survived the passage of time, and the name of Franz Xaver Franz (1857-1920), an oboist in the Freiburg town orchestra, appears on master rolls for the Welte Philharmonic Organ. The Freiburg directories show that Franz 1st moved to the town around 1878, and the fact that he should have been there so early, and that he is known to have arranged organ rolls by hand, suggests that he might well have begun working for the firm from the late-1880's, at the time it began to use music rolls for its « Orchestrons », in place of the earlier pinned barrels.

The Freiburg Orchestra was clearly a good source of part-time musical talent, and another Welte musician from within its ranks, mentioned by the organist Alfred Hollins, was Friedrich Buchali, who moved to Freiburg a little before 1905, the year in which the Welte-Mignon was launched. It is tempting to surmise that Buchali might have been the trained musician who marked-up dynamics in the earliest days of the Welte-Mignon, and he was certainly involved in notating changes of registration for the Philharmonic Organ as the organist played, since Alfred Hollins is very clear in saying so. From 1910 until 1932, Max Schreier, the Orchestra's trumpeter, marked-up the master rolls for perforation.

During the 1920's, when the new Welte 98 system was introduced on green paper rolls, it is known that the German pianist and composer, Hans Haaß, was employed as a recording producer and house pianist, and there are some signs that the master rolls were more thoroughly edited during his employ. Certainly, there must have been a great deal of work involved with the transfer of music from the Red to the Green system. Haaß can be seen in the photograph standing behind the piano, with a rather older Karl Bockisch steadying himself on Vladimir Horowitz's chair-back.

Pianists and Repertoire

The 3 German reproducing piano systems for which rolls were recorded between 1904 and the outbreak of the First World War (Welte, Hupfeld, Philipps) had a very great advantage over their subsequent American and British competitors, in that the performances of a whole previous generation of pianists were captured, so that a remarkable glimpse of the piano traditions of the 19th Century was preserved. When a new Century succeeds the previous one, it quite naturally generates a nostalgia for times past, and one can sense that the styles of piano playing, particularly in Europe, at the start of the 20th Century were firmly rooted in an earlier tradition.

The novelty and incredible fidelity of Welte's piano roll recording, as compared to early cylinders and discs, persuaded a veritable galaxy of pianists to preserve their performances at the recording piano. Franz Liszt's pupils were in the prime of their lives, and many agreed to record, 1 or 2 even attempting to play in the style of their late Master. As we have seen, Carl Reinecke (born in 1824) was the earliest-born pianist to record for Welte, followed by Theodor Leschetizky (born in 1830) , and Camille Saint-Saëns (born in 1835) , all with styles of playing fashioned in the 1st half of the 19th Century. Grieg, Fauré and de Pachmann follow from the 1840's, though with remarkably dissimilar ways of bringing the keyboard to life. Grieg, in particular, sounds less ancient than his contemporaries, and it is to be regretted that his wonderful fluidity of phrasing is absent from most present-day interpretations of his works. All too often, « authenticity » is a synonym for applying a modern, un-Romantic style of playing to every type of Classical music.

In all, some 30 pianists born before 1860 made their way on to Welte rolls, but the historical importance of the Welte-Mignon is not limited to such early exponents of the piano. Composers such as Debussy, Reger, Scriabin, Puccini, Glazounov and Mahler recorded their own compositions, the superstars Paderewski, Hofmann and Lhévinne became best-sellers, and young giants from Vladimir Horowitz to Rudolf Serkin visited the Welte studios, in Freiburg, at the very beginnings of their careers. The repertoire they all chose was not as carefully regulated as we might expect from today's ultra-organized concert artists and, in many cases, seems almost to have been selected at the last moment. But taken overall, a library of over 3,000 important Classical recordings emerged from the enigmatic Welte recording pianos over a period of some 25 years.

Towards the end of the reproducing piano era, in the late-1920's, the Festivals at Donaueschingen and Baden-Baden set the scene for a number of special compositions for Welte-Mignon, by Paul Hindemith, Ernst Toch and other young composers, with Hindemith also using the Welte Philharmonic Organ as an accompaniment to his « Triadisches Ballett » , choreographed by Oskar Schlemmer of the « Bauhaus » in Dessau. But such esoteric music was not typical of the Mignon, which in general covered the standard Classical and Romantic repertoire, with the singular advantage that its rolls were longer than those for the later systems, so that more extended compositions could be included, without the need for hastily edited cuts. In the 1930's and the Second World War, the Welte-Mignon languished, and it was re-discovered for the world by Richard Simonton, an American who initially made recordings from Edwin Welte's own Steinway in Freiburg, and who later acquired some of the « 2nd master » rolls, taking them back to Los Angeles, where they remain today, in the care of the library of the University of Southern California. The remainder of Edwin Welte's private collection was donated by his family to the « Augustiner Museum » , in his home town of Freiburg-im-Breisgau.

Welte-Mignon Instruments

The original Welte-Mignon was a keyboardless piano, built in to a rather solid-looking case, and designed for the homes of the wealthy, where space was not a consideration. It could be supplied in a variety of designs, or built to order to fit in with a client's existing furnishings. Quite early on, Welte entered into a contract to supply the original Mignon for use on the transatlantic steamships operated by the Norddeutscher Lloyd company, including the « Kaiser » Wilhelm II. , « Kronprinzessin » Cecilie and George Washington. The grand « Gesellschaftszimmer » of the « Kaiser » Wilhelm II. bears witness to a style of living that has long since disappeared, with an ornate Bechstein grand piano in the foreground, and a Welte-Mignon in pride of place at the far end of the saloon.

Daily recitals were given on board ship in the afternoons and evenings, as can be seen from a programme from the «

Kaiser » Wilhelm II. , which dates from around 1906, to judge by the recording dates of the rolls being played. One wonders whether, even in those august circles, audiences listened in respectful silence to the musical performances ? It is all too easy to treat perforated rolls as mere background music, even when played by Paderewski !

« Welte und Söhne » were not piano-makers themselves, and the earliest Welte-Mignon instruments were based on pianos manufactured by Julius Feurich of Leipzig, who also made the piano used in the early recording sessions. Indeed, a rather proud « Herr » Feurich can often be seen in the Leipzig recording photographs, such as that of Paderewski, in which he is standing behind the piano. But, by the end of 1907, Welte were also building what were then known as cabinet players, which we would today call push-ups, fitting in front of the client's existing piano.

By the spring of 1908 and, perhaps, in response to the Hupfeld DEA, an upright reproducing piano which had been introduced by Ludwig Hupfeld in November 1907, the Mignon mechanism was being installed into upright pianos with their own keyboards, both Feurich and Steinway. These were initially much taller than normal uprights, in order to accommodate the pump at the top of the instrument, with the expression mechanisms installed under the keyboard. The piano (photo) is so ornate that the keyboard and roll mechanism are hidden behind heavily carved doors, and the whole instrument looks rather like an antique French « armoire » !

Such unusually tall upright pianos were not universally popular, however, so by Christmas 1911, the Mignon mechanism had been adapted to fit into smaller models, and this more compact style gradually took precedence. The upright in the photo below is shown in one of the display windows of the Steinway show-rooms in Hamburg, Germany, around 1920. The covers of the piano have been removed in order to reveal the mechanism, and the large 3 exhauster pump, which originated in Welte's « Orchestrions » , can just be seen at the bottom of the instrument. On the right is a display of 4 contrasting Mignon recordings of Chopin's « Nocturne » in F-sharp, Opus 15, No. 2, played by Xaver Scharwenka, Raoul Pugno, Ferruccio Busoni and Camille Saint-Saëns.

The Æolian Company in America had introduced its Grand Pianola Piano in 1909, and Melville Clark had produced an Apollo Grand as early as 1906, so there must have been some pressure on Welte to develop a version of its Mignon that would fit into a Feurich or Steinway grand. The 1st Steinway grand Weltes to be manufactured were shipped at the end of 1913, and almost all of them were built into the medium-sized « O » model. Edwin Welte himself had a Steinway Welte grand, keeping it to the very end of his life, when it was recorded for both « Columbia » in the United States and « Telefunken » in Germany.

The Welte-Mignon in Perspective

Since the Second World War, the Welte-Mignon has served as the standard bearer for the cause of the reproducing piano, and it is true that it was the 1st such instrument to be fully-developed, though only by 1 year or 2, which is not so much when seen from the distance of a whole Century. It also had the best commercial organization in the United States of all the German player-piano manufacturers, and as a result became better-known and sold more instruments than its Teutonic competitors, thereby, becoming a more likely candidate for rediscovery after the Second World War. But, in considering the Mignon's miraculous legacy, we should not ignore the equally stunning catalogues of the Hupfeld DEA and the Philipps Duca, which have been thoroughly ignored by musicians for many years. The University of Frankfurt, which had an almost complete set of Philipps Duca rolls, sold many of them off as late as the 1990's, apparently unaware of their potential musical significance. It would be re-assuring to think that the renaissance of the Welte-Mignon might stimulate similar research and restoration of the other early reproducing piano systems.

Technically, the Mignon presents more of a challenge than, for example, the Ampico or Duo-Art. The latter 2 were designed with mass-production in mind, and so the adjustments and regulations necessary for faithful reproduction were more exactly documented at the time. Welte rolls are rarer than those for other systems, so the combination of good rolls with a good instrument has, until the recent developments of roll scanning and re-perforation, been largely a matter of chance. No reproducing grand piano responds well to being transported to a concert-hall or recording studio, because its pneumatic valves, which work to tolerances of a few thousandths of an inch, are inevitably disturbed and take many months to settle properly. It is possible that the Ampico, with its unit valves, is hardier than most, but the Welte-Mignon in particular does not like to be moved. There are 1 or 2 push-up instruments, used in combination with normal grand pianos, and these are very occasionally used in public concerts in Europe but, in general, the musical world must rely on audio-recordings to explore the range and fidelity of the Welte-Mignon repertoire.

Unfortunately, the Welte has not been well-served by the many recordings that have been made on inadequate instruments, right-up to the 21st Century. An enormous wealth of knowledge and experience was lost when Welte ended its days of recording around 1930, so the coarseness of play-back caused by a renewed learning curve amongst musicians and technical experts in the 1950's and early-1960's can perhaps be forgiven.

A Welte roll recorded by Manuel de Falla in Paris (around 1912) : it almost beggars belief that such subtlety of playing can have been captured nearly 100 years ago. There are several currently available CDs of Welte-Mignon performances, ranging from the excellent to the decidedly poor.

Das Welte-Mignon-Reproduktionsklavier war der erste mechanische Musikautomat, der die weitgehend authentische Wiedergabe von Klavierstücken ermöglichte.

Die Firma M. Welte & Söhne in Freiburg im Breisgau war durch ihre Entwicklungen auf dem Gebiet der automatischen Musikwiedergabe mit Programmträgern und ihre Orchestrien bereits berühmt, als sie sich 1904 das Wiedergabeverfahren für das von ihnen entwickelte Reproduktionsklavier patentieren ließ. 1905 kam dieses unter dem Namen Mignon, wenig später als « Welte-Mignon-Reproduktionsklavier » auf den Markt. Dieses Instrument benutzte als Tonträger Lochstreifen aus Papier, die sogenannte « Notenrolle » oder « Klavierrolle ». Die Reproduktionseinrichtung war eine Gemeinschaftsentwicklung von Edwin Welte und Karl Bockisch.

Damit war es möglich, das einmal eingespielte Spiel eines Pianisten inklusive der Anschlagdynamik weitestgehend originalgetreu wiederzugeben. Dieses technische Wunderwerk war damals wie heute eine Sensation und erlaubt mit den sehr wenigen wieder gut instandgesetzten Instrumenten eine authentische Wiedergabe dieser Aufnahmen. Da diese Instrumente, wie auch die Notenrollen, extrem aufwändig und teuer waren, waren sie nur für wohlhabende Kreise erschwinglich. Für den rechts unten abgebildeten Ibach-Welte-Flügel waren laut Preisliste von 1924 über 8.000 Reichsmark zu bezahlen.

In der Firmengeschichte gab es bei Welte für die Reproduktionsklaviere zwei Rollensysteme, T-100 (nach dem vorwiegend roten Rollenpapier Welte-rot genannt) und T-98 (Welte-grün genannt). Das System T-100 benutzte 100 Steuerungslöcher bei einer Rollenbreite von $12 \frac{7}{8}$ Zoll = 329 millimeter. Das System T-98 wurde später entwickelt und kam ab 1919 auf den Markt. Die Steuerung kam jetzt mit 98 Spuren aus, konnte dafür aber auch die normalen Pianola-Notenrollen mit einer Breite von $11 \frac{1}{4}$ Zoll = (rund) 286 millimeter nach dem Standard der Buffalo Convention abspielen.

1904 wurden die ersten Aufnahmen gemacht. In der Folge wurden die bekanntesten Pianisten der damaligen Zeit zu Aufnahmen für Welte-Mignon engagiert. Insgesamt bot die Firma M. Welte & Söhne bis 1932 etwa 5.300 Aufnahmen an, darunter zahlreiche Opern- und Operettenpotpourris, aber auch Unterhaltungsstücke, Schlager, Märsche und Tanzmusik.

Von 1905 bis 1909 hatte Welte & Söhne ein zweites Aufnahmestudio in Leipzig bei ihrem damaligen Generalvertreter Hugo Popper.

Im Repertoire der Welte-Klavierrollen von 1905 bis 1928 befinden sich beispielsweise Aufnahmen von Carl Reinecke, Ignacy Jan Paderewski, Ferruccio Busoni, Teresa Carreño, Artur Schnabel, Edwin Fischer, Tchélicoupe Lambrino oder Walter Gieseking. Kurz vor dem Ende der Ära der Reproduktionsklaviere um 1930 spielten noch einige der großartigsten Pianisten des 20. Jahrhunderts für Welte, darunter Vladimir Horowitz im Frühjahr 1926 - es sind die ältesten Aufnahmen dieses Pianisten. 1928 erfolgten die letzten Aufnahmen klassischer Musik mit Rudolf Serkin und Lubka Kolessa. Von da an bis zum Ende der Rollenproduktion 1932 wurde nur noch Unterhaltungsmusik aufgenommen. Zahlreiche Komponisten spielten eigene Werke ein, darunter Claude Debussy, Camille Saint-Saëns, Alexander Skrjabin, Max Reger, Edvard Grieg, Enrique Granados, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß und George Gershwin.

1926 komponierten Paul Hindemith, Ernst Toch und Gerhart Münch für die « Donaueschinger Musiktage (Kammermusikfest Donaueschingen) » Stücke für mechanisches Klavier « Welte-Mignon ». Die Uraufführung war am 25. Juli 1926.

Diese Stücke waren nicht von Hand spielbar. Die Möglichkeit, bei einem solchen Klavier über die Programmierung der Notenrollen fast beliebige Tonfolgen zu erzeugen, gab den Komponisten neue Freiheiten der Klanggestaltung. Folgende Werke wurden uraufgeführt :

Paul Hindemith : Rondo aus der Klaviermusik Opus 37. Bearbeitet für mechanisches Klavier.

Paul Hindemith : Toccata für mechanisches Klavier Opus 40, Nr. 1. Originalkomposition für Welte-Mignon.

Ernst Toch : Studie I. Originalkomposition für Welte-Mignon.

Ernst Toch : Studie II. Originalkomposition für Welte-Mignon.

Ernst Toch : Studie III. Originalkomposition für Welte-Mignon.

Ernst Toch : Studie IV. Der Jongleur. Für mechanisches Klavier bearbeitet.

Gerhart Münch : Sechs Studien - Polyphone Etuden für mechanisches Klavier. Introduzione Mæstoso - Prestissimo - Largo - Jazz - Andantino - Fugato. Originalkomposition für Welte-Mignon.

Für die im folgenden Jahr in Baden-Baden stattfindende Folgeveranstaltung, die « Deutsche Kammermusik Baden-Baden 1927 » vom 15.-17. Juli 1927, arrangierten und komponierten weitere Musiker der Avantgarde Stücke für Welte-Mignon. Vorgestellt wurden diese Stücke in einem Aufsehen erregenden Konzert am 16. Juli 1927, das ausschließlich Originalwerken für mechanische Instrumente gewidmet war.

George Antheil arrangierte den I. Teil seines « Ballet Mécanique » für das Welte-Mignon-Klavier.

Nikolai Lopatnikoff schrieb ein eigens dafür komponiertes Scherzo sowie eine Toccata für Klavier, die er für mechanisches Klavier bearbeitete und auf die Notenrolle zeichnete.

Hans Haaß schrieb eine Capriccio-Fuge und ein Intermezzo, beide für mechanisches Klavier.

Außerdem kamen Werke für mechanische Orgel (Welte-Philharmonie-Orgel) von Ernst Toch und Paul Hindemith zur Aufführung.

Ab 1912 gab es ein gleichartiges System für Orgeln, genannt « Welte-Philharmonie-Orgel ». Diese Orgeln waren extrem aufwändige Instrumente und meist sowohl mit automatischer Spieleinrichtung als auch von Organisten herkömmlich bespielbar. In der reichen Oberschicht bestellten Industrielle und Adelige, aber auch etwa Hotels der Spitzenklasse diese selbstspielenden Orgeln in immer größeren Dimensionen. Diese wurden meist in Räumen eingebaut, die speziell für die Orgeln geschaffen waren.

Inzwischen ist die Welte-Philharmonie-Orgel des Schwesterschiffes der Titanic, der Britannic, wiederentdeckt worden.

Der Stapellauf des Schiffes war 26. Februar 1914, am 4. August 1914 erklärte Großbritannien dem Deutschen Reich den Krieg. Es ist also unwahrscheinlich, dass das Instrument, dessen Herstellung viele Monate dauerte, überhaupt jemals nach Belfast kam. Nach dem Ersten Weltkrieg wurde das Instrument 1920 an den Stuttgarter Kamera-Fabrikanten August Nagel verkauft. Um 1935 kam die Orgel wieder zu Welte zurück und wurde 1937 im « Radium Lampenwerk Wipperfürth » eingebaut. 1969 wurde das Instrument von dem Schweizer Sammler Heinrich Weiß erworben, dessen Sammlung heute das Museum für Musikautomaten in Seewen bildet. Von den Orgelbauern, die kein Englisch konnten, wurden die Bauteile mit « Britanik » gekennzeichnet. Die Kennzeichnung erfolgte ähnlich wie bei den Reproduktionsklavieren mit ins Holz eingeschlagenen Buchstaben und Zahlen, um so die Bauteile der in der Firma gleichzeitig gefertigten Instrumente nachher wieder identifizieren zu können. Da dies ein Prestigeprojekt war, wurde die Entwurfszeichnung bereits um 1912 oder 1913 in den Firmenprospekten für die Philharmonieorgel abgebildet, zusammen mit Photos und Zeichnungen anderer Philharmonie-Organen.

Die komplizierteste und größte Philharmonie-Organ wurde für den Theatersaal von Sir David Lionel Goldsmid-Stern-Salomons' Anwesen in Broomhill bei Royal Tunbridge Wells gebaut. Das Instrument mit 32 Registern hat zwei Spielapparate. Einen für die Welte-Organ-Rollen und den anderen für das größte Welte-Orchestrion, den Typ No. 10, das er bereits seit 1900 besaß. Außerdem ist die Organ von Hand spielbar. Der Spieltisch der Organ, der in der Mitte des Instrumentes hinter einem mannshohen Paneel verborgen ist, hat neben dem Pedal drei Manuale. Das große Eichengehäuse mit den gewaltigen Ausmaßen von über 9 Metern Breite und 6 Metern Höhe enthält rund 2.000 Pfeifen sowie diverse Perkussionsinstrumente.

Als besonderes Merkmal ist diese Philharmonie-Organ mit einer separaten Echo-Organ ausgestattet, die mit ihren 349 Pfeifen in einem speziellen Raum oberhalb der Galerie am rückwärtigen Ende des Saales steht. Auch diese Organ wurde beinahe ein Opfer des Krieges. Am 27. April 1914 war Sir David Lionel nach Freiburg gereist, um sich über den Fortschritt der Arbeiten zu informieren. Im Juli 1914 wurde das Instrument in Broomhill angeliefert. Nach dem Kriegsausbruch am 4. August wurde der für Welte in England zur Montage weilende Organbauer Johann Kaut aus Waldkirch zum Aufbau des Instrumentes herangezogen, der das Instrument mit Hilfskräften zusammen spielfertig machte. Anschließend war er bis zum Ende der Feindseligkeiten auf der Isle of Man interniert. Heute ist das Anwesen als Salomon-Centre ein Teil des Canterbury Christ Church University College. Die Organ, die seit 1940 stumm war, wurde 2005 bis 2007 aufwändig restauriert und im April 2007 der Öffentlichkeit vorgestellt. 2011 erschien eine CD mit Aufnahmen des Instrumentes, sowohl mit Arrangements für ein Orchestrion aus der Zeit um 1890, mit Aufnahmen von Edwin Lemare von 1913 sowie Organisten der Royal Academy of Music.

Für die Welte-Philharmonie-Organ wurden wie beim Reproduktionsklavier von zahlreichen bekannten Organisten Musikstücke aufgenommen und als Notenrollen verkauft. Zu diesen Organisten gehörten unter anderen Marco Enrico Bossi, Eugène Gigout, Max Reger, Alfred Hollins, Edwin Lemare, Alfred Sittard und Karl Straube.

Le procédé Philipps Duca

Introduction

« J. D. Philipps und Söhne » mirrored in Frankfurt what « Welte und Söhne » were doing in Freiburg-im-Breisgau. Johann Daniel Philipps had set-up in business on his own in 1886, having split from his existing partner, as a manufacturer of « Orchestrions » and pianos, later taking his sons into the family business. The firm was a very large one ; by 1910, it had manufactured 47 different models of « Orchestrion » , 12 different electrical pianos, 12 player pianos, 7 expression pianos, and even a roll-playing piano and harmonium combination for cinemas, not to mention its normal pianos and harmoniums, and it was introducing 5 models of the new Duca, a fully-automatic reproducing piano, on to the market.

The 1st recordings for the Duca took place in late-1908, implying that the instrument was ready for general sale by 1909, which makes it the 3rd and last of the early German reproducing piano systems to be put on sale. As was the practice at Hupfeld, the recordings made by pianists were used not only for the full-reproducing pianos, in this case the Duca, but also for the various expression and normal player pianos which the company manufactured. By the time, the Duca came on to the market, Welte was already installing its reproducing system into upright pianos, and it is likely that the Duca cabinet model was simply one of a number of variants produced at roughly the same time, and did not precede the internal players, as was the case with the Welte-Mignon.

Musical Example

Since the Philipps Duca is so little known, there is at present no musical example, but it seems clear that the Duca was a remarkably faithful system. It is sometimes very difficult to interpret a pianist's actual sentiments behind the florid language of printed testimonials, but Frederic Lamond, a Scottish pianist who was nobody's fool, and who had recorded for Welte in 1905, was prepared in mid-1909 to assert that the Duca was « the best reproducing piano of the present time » .

The Duca Recording Process

Precious little is known about the details of recording for the Duca. In various Philipps catalogues, there are clear illustrations of the recording machine, which appears to have marked-up blank paper as the pianist played, although the only significant visible details are the feed spool, the electrical connections to a junction block underneath the piano, and what appears to be a transformer or rectifier with supply cables attached.

As with the Welte-Mignon, the connections to the piano were made electrically, not so surprising for a company which went on to develop and manufacture electrical motors and solenoids. In the photograph of Willy Rehberg at the recording piano, in May 1909, 2 separate cables can be seen running from the marking machine to points below the piano case. One is clearly a multi-core cable, perhaps with one connection for each note, joined to some form of electrical or pneumatic primary signal block, and the other is perhaps a supply cable to the presumed contacts under the keys.

The physical details of this recording process are only visible on photographs taken in 1908 or 1909, so, it is possible that the methods changed over time. By the date when Raoul Pugno made the journey to Frankfurt, in January 1910, the piano had been moved, and the marking machine was no longer visible in the recording studio. Also, in these early shots is a recording producer, shown following the score of the music being played, and on occasions marking it in pencil.

Pianists and Repertoire

Given the general lack of knowledge about the Philipps Duca, the catalogue of music rolls that was recorded was surprisingly wide-ranging. Roughly, 2 thousand titles were produced, of which some 1,400 were of Classical and light Classical music, played by the well-known pianists of the time. Inevitably, there was much duplication with the other German companies of Welte and Hupfeld, with d'Albert, Busoni, Carreño, Friedheim, Gabrilowitsch, Grünfeld, Lamond, Pugno, Saint-Saëns, Scharwenka and Schnabel being amongst the best-known to have recorded for all 3 systems.

One of the 1st pianists to record for the Duca was Carl Friedberg (1872-1955), who studied with Clara Schumann, and who was an outstanding exponent of Brahms, having formed a particular friendship with the elderly composer. He was a student and later professor at the Frankfurt Conservatory, so, it is perhaps not so surprising that he should have been amongst the 1st to try-out the local recording piano. With the piano tightly in the corner of the recording room, and the large roll of blank paper in close proximity, Friedberg would have needed considerable reserves of inspiration to turn in a suitably musical performance !

It is good to have a photograph of Artur Schnabel at a recording piano, since there has been a widely circulated rumour for many years that he did not like the reproducing piano at all. In fact, his reported quip, that he had 17 degrees of touch, whereas one particular piano only had 16, was most likely a sharp piece of black propaganda put out by Ampico, for whom he recorded in the 1920's, to give the impression that Æolian's Duo-Art worked in steps, whereas the Ampico had smooth dynamic changes. This technical distinction is not borne-out in practice, since the Duo-Art's notional steps function like miniature crescendos and diminuendos, and their effect is modified by the number of notes being played at any one time. At any rate, Schnabel recorded at least 56 rolls, for 4 different companies.

(Photo) Artur Schnabel about to record for the Philipps Duca on 15 February 1912, in Frankfurt. It must have had at least 17 degrees of touch !

Philipps Duca instruments

There were 4 main variants of the Duca, as there were of the Welte-Mignon, each with its own niche amongst the ranks of wealthy European society. Similar to the original Welte-Mignon was the cabinet model, with no keyboard, which could be finished in a decorative style to suit the existing furnishings of its prospective purchaser.

2 models of upright piano were produced at 1st, the larger looking very much like the early Hupfeld Dea uprights.

The Duca grand reproducing piano may have been the 1st such instrument to have been developed, since Welte did not install its Mignon into Steinway grand pianos until the autumn of 1913.

Finally, for those who had their own piano which they wished to keep and use for listening to Duca recordings, the push-up model fitted in front of a normal piano, and played by means of a set of felt-covered fingers, rather like the original Pianola some 15 years before.

The Philipps Duca in Perspective

The Duca has been the least well-known of the 3 German reproducing pianos from the period before the First World War. It was the last to be developed, and its catalogue was smaller than the others, though still quite substantial. Those of us who are involved with the Pianola Institute have heard hundreds of different reproducing pianos over a period of 30 or more years, and it is quite clear that only in very recent times has the expertise towards these instruments come anywhere near that of the original musicians and technicians. It is to be hoped that someone will take-up the challenge of restoring a Duca to 1st class playing condition, and ideally a restorer who is thoughtful enough to listen to and act upon musical advice.

For a start, a process of research needs to be instigated to locate collections of Duca rolls, and to prevent public institutions from selling or destroying them, as has happened in the past. It will be a most interesting process to observe.

Le procédé Ampico

Introduction

The phenomenal commercial success and sheer size of the Æolian, Weber Piano and Pianola Company, founded in the summer of 1903 by H.B. Tremaine and his colleagues, gave many of the other American piano manufacturers pause for thought. Much of the piano industry consisted of family businesses, formed in many cases in the aftermath of the Civil War, which had flourished in the late-19th Century, but which increasingly needed to amalgamate in order to survive in the world of mass-production and the consumer economy. Æolian's main competitor came to be the American Piano Company, established in 1908 as a merger between Chickering & Sons of Boston, William Knabe of Baltimore, and Haines Brothers, Marshall & Wendell, and Foster, Armstrong & Company, all of Rochester, New York. At a very early stage in its development, the new business recognized the commercial advantage of the reproducing piano, and it purchased the invention and expertise of Charles Fuller Stoddard, a young firebrand of an engineer who had begun work on patenting a practicable piano recording and play-back system by 1908 at the very latest.

At the time Charles Stoddard was designing his roll-playing instruments, which were initially known as Artigraphic players, the only existing reproducing pianos were the Welte-Mignon and the Hupfeld DEA, and it was the latter from which Stoddard seems to have drawn his inspiration, revealingly hinted at by the small but significant number of Hupfeld recordings which were converted under licence to the Ampico system. The Artigraphic was 1st launched around September 1911 and, after about a year, the name was changed to the Stoddard-Ampico, though it took a while for the change to work its way through the American piano industry. These earlier systems were simpler than the later Ampico reproducing pianos and, indeed, the Ampico was refined and modified more extensively than any of its main competitors.

By 1916, the cumbersome titles of « Ampico Artigraphic » and « Stoddard-Ampico » were quietly dropped, and the instrument became universally known as the Ampico, taking the initial letters from the name of the American Piano Company (or Ampico) . At the same time, the dynamic coding system was expanded, and a public demonstration was held at the Hotel Biltmore in New York City, on 8 October 1916, as one of the Hotel's regular series of piano recitals. Introduced by his fellow pianist and Ampico recording artist, Victor Wittgenstein, Leopold Godowsky gave a carefully prepared recital, in which he alternated with the Ampico in the same musical repertoire, with the aim of demonstrating to sceptical ears the absolute fidelity of the new instrument. The New York Globe summed-up both the novelty and the success of the event :

« The affair at the Biltmore held last Sunday would have been a scandal 5 years ago. For fancy, that great pianist Leopold Godowsky actually permitted a music roll record of his renditions to be heard on the Ampico immediately after he personally had performed them. Indeed, as remarkable as the experiment itself is the extraordinary success achieved by the almost human instrument. »

The American Piano Company had scored a notable publicity coup, and had established the Ampico as one of the 2 major American reproducing pianos, though perhaps for copyright reasons, it always described its instruments not as reproducing, but as re-enacting the artists which recorded for it.

Musical Example

The most famous pianist to entrust his interpretations to the Ampico was Sergei Rachmaninov, whose 1st rolls were issued in 1919, a couple of years after he had left his homeland for ever. In the 1980's, the Decca Record Company published long-playing records, since transferred to CD, of Rachmaninov playing by means of an Ampico concert grand piano, constructed by Norman Evans, regulated by Denis Hall of the Pianola Institute, and recorded at the Kingsway Hall in London.

Mechanical Operation

Whereas the Hupfeld DEA controlled its dynamic output by means of 6 fixed levels, on treble and bass independently, with fast or slow crescendos and decrescendos providing intermediate shading, the Ampico used its crescendo mechanisms to provide the overall levels, modifying these by means of 6 super-imposed intensities, again on treble and bass independently. One might think of the DEA as a pair of fully-extended 6 rung stepladders on an even floor, with acrobats jumping from one rung to any other at carefully chosen speeds, whereas the Ampico provided 2 parallel floors that moved constantly up and down, with 2 6 rung stepladders whose extensions constantly varied in order to fill in the gap between the floors and the immovable ceiling. Neither system has the theoretical advantage but, in practice, the Ampico was far more commercially successful than the DEA, not least because it was manufactured and sold mainly in the United States, where the available market was much greater.

Such a similarity between the 2 types of piano suggests that Charles Stoddard based his original designs on the German system. Since the advent of digital computers, Ampico experts have for years considered that the use of 3 intensity pneumatics to create only 6, rather than 7 intensities, was something of a failure on Stoddard's part to exploit the full binary potential of his own design. However, in the light of the similarities to the DEA and the fact that Ampico published some DEA recordings under licence, the total of 6 intensities seems far more likely to have been a deliberate choice.

The Ampico Recording Process

Charles Stoddard documented his recording processes more fully than any other reproducing piano inventor, so, it is relatively easy to be exact with regard to his methods. At the outset, he patented 2 designs for recording pianos, one a somewhat impracticable upright which would have necessitated a great deal of mechanism between the piano strings and the sound-board, and the other a later modification, allowing the recording system to be installed in a grand piano, and transcribing dynamic information on to a 2nd roll, quite separately from the note information.

In the 1st design, electrical contact was made by a set of 2 small metal rods and 2 mercury cups connected to each hammer shank. By carefully calibrating and adjusting the exact positions at which the 2 sets of contacts made and broke the electrical circuit, Charles Stoddard was able to record 2 lines on a constantly moving paper roll for each note played. At rest, and at the point where the hammer struck the piano string, one or the other contact was opened, so that no circuit was made, but during the travel of the hammer towards the string, and after the note had sounded, as long as the key remained depressed, then electricity flowed, and a line was marked on a blank roll by a stylus pressing the paper against a carbon-impregnated roller. This ingenious system resulted in a short line at the start of each note, which was inversely proportional to the force with which the pianist struck the key. The 2nd line began the instant the hammer had struck the string and begun to rebound, and so indicated the note's duration.

The 2nd design, clearly modified in the light of practical experience, used 4 rods and 4 mercury cups for each note, 1 pair of contacts marking the duration of the note on a roll moving at normal speed, and the 2nd pair completing a circuit only while the key was travelling towards its lower limit, thereby, indicating the duration of travel on a roll moving at a higher-speed. Although both these designs bear witness to an ingenious intellect, the dynamic recording process seems not to have been successful in practice, because in interviews in the 1970's, former members of Ampico's musical staff talked of the Company's early recording producers marking the sheet music with wavy lines, according to the pianist's dynamics, and made no mention of Charles Stoddard's automatic mechanisms.

One advantage of the neat electrical construction was that the contacts needed space only above the keybed of the piano, so that there was no wooden compartment to get in the way of the pianist's knees, as happened with the Welte-Mignon and the Philipps Duca. Over the years, there was more than one Ampico recording piano. In the drawer of the adjoining table was a control-box, with a press-button switch to signal to the recording machine operator in the next room that the pianist was ready to play, as well as a indicator lamp which confirmed that the recorder was in operation, and that the pianist could proceed.

In 1925 and 1926, a new Ampico recording machine was developed by Clarence N. Hickman, a young engineer taken on by the Company in 1924, who had a Ph.D. in engineering, unlike Charles Stoddard, who was largely self-taught. Stoddard's influence can nevertheless be seen in the new machine, which maintained the principle of recording a pianist's performance on 2 rolls, one for the notes and the other for the dynamic information. However, instead of measuring the speed of key travel and marking it by inking a normal paper roll, this new apparatus used the discharge of electrical sparks through chemically prepared paper, and was able to measure the duration of the final 8th of an inch of hammer travel, to an accuracy measured in 1/1,000 of a second. The Ampico spark chronograph was widely documented in musical and scientific literature of the time, notably in a copiously illustrated article in the Scientific American of November 1927.

It is one thing to be able to measure the force with which a particular note is played, but quite another to convert this information into the 2 sets of perforated dynamic codes, one for treble and one for bass, which is all that a reproducing piano can respond to. If one is to believe the Scientific American article, then, a not inconsiderable army of musical technicians was employed by Ampico, measuring and transcribing the information on the spark chronograph rolls, and converting it by means of tables and charts into pre-ordained crescendo, decrescendo and intensity coding. Charles Stoddard was rather proud of the fact that the Schulz-Evler arrangement of Johann Strauß's « Blue Danube », as recorded by Joseph Lhévinne, took-over 5 weeks to produce, and needed over 100,000 separate operations. According to Mister Stoddard, there were 7,915 notes, each of which required 13 or more operations to prepare, although the British computer expert, Anthony Robinson, states that 8,106 is a more exact figure !

But Mister Stoddard was a wily bird, not above placing a redundant red light on his master perforating machine to impress visiting journalists, and it might perhaps be wise to take his statistics with a pinch of salt or, at least, not to extrapolate them to the whole Ampico catalogue. The spark chronograph came relatively late in the history of the Ampico, and most Ampico rolls were prepared in the older way, with musical editors marking-up scores and using their instinct and judgment to create effective dynamics.

These members of the musical staff should not be passed over without a mention ; Theodore Henrion, a Belgian who had studied with Godowsky in Vienna, was the 1st chief recording producer, until he succumbed to the New York flu epidemic around 1918. His relationship with Godowsky may well-explain why the older man played an important part in the public launch of the Ampico in 1916. Henrion was succeeded by Milton Suskind, a young Polish-German American who joined Ampico in 1916, at the age of 18, and duly changed his name to Edgar Fairchild, the surname being a rough translation of the original German. Fairchild became Rachmaninov's « personal » roll producer, and was also responsible for the editing of rolls by Lhévinne, Artur Rubinstein, Moiseiwitsch and Levitzki, amongst many others. Rumour has it that he lost his job as a result of arriving late for an important meeting with Rachmaninov, but it seems unlikely that such drastic action would have been taken simply as a result of one lapse of business etiquette. Whatever the case, he left Ampico at around the time the spark chronograph was introduced.

Other roll editors included the Czech concert pianist, Marguerite Volavy, who left her muscular mark on many rolls, and was generally known as « Madame » to her colleagues, not so much out of politeness, but because she was said to resemble the « madame » of a brothel. Adam Carroll and J. Milton Delcamp had both worked as musicians and arrangers at the Autopiano Company, and both made the move to Ampico at the outset of the 1920's.

There was clearly an indefinable « buzz » , a sense of excitement at the Ampico recording studios in the 1920's, which is less easy to express in words. One way of touching this atmosphere is to watch a surviving film (by the British Pathé) of Edgar Fairchild playing 2 piano music with Robert Lindholm ; the latter had no connection with Ampico, but Fairchild's almost child-like delight in his own virtuosity leaps-out across the decades.

Pianists and Repertoire

Although the Stoddard Ampico was in existence for at least a couple of years before Æolian's Duo-Art was launched in March 1914, it was not at that time a major reproducing piano with a large roster of international pianists, and Æolian had lost no time in signing-up as many well-known artists as it could find, mostly on exclusive contracts. This left Ampico with less of a representative selection of pianists to call upon, though it was lucky to acquire the services of Rachmaninov, who moved to the United States about 1 year after the Ampico's main public launch in 1916. Perhaps, the Russian composer preferred to be the top dog with Ampico, rather than living in the shadow of Paderewski at Æolian.

Leopold Godowsky also migrated to Ampico, as did Josef Lhévinne, Moriz Rosenthal and Ernő Dohnányi. Rachmaninov's friend, the violinist Fritz Kreisler, was a 1st rate pianist, and made several Ampico rolls of his own compositions, and, rather bizarrely, Richard Strauß recorded the accompaniment to a number of his own songs.

From a Classical perspective, the Ampico catalogue was populated mainly by recordings from a younger generation of pianists, such as Alexander Brailowsky, Mischa Levitzki, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Erwin Nyiregyhazi, Leo Ornstein, Olga Samaroff and Robert Schmitz. Ampico also had an arrangement with the firm of Ludwig Hupfeld in Leipzig, by which it published a number of Hupfeld DEA recordings under licence, and by this means it acquired another dozen or so artists, including Grieg and Saint-Saëns. The DEA dynamic coding was not unlike the early Ampico system, so it made sense to co-operate in this way.

But where the Ampico really shone was in its repertoire of popular music. The mechanism of the Ampico, with its double valve units and carefully thought out pneumatic capacities, was snappier than the Duo-Art, and by design or good fortune, a lively band of musical arrangers and « hot » pianists gravitated around the Ampico Studios, and not only recorded their versions of the latest hits but, in many cases, created musical arrangements that almost no-one could have played by hand. Zez Confrey and Ferdie Grofé, who was Paul Whiteman's pianist, were regular Ampico recording artists, and the ingenuity of the Company's publicity department can be seen by the fact that the only musician shown in the 1925 Ampico roll catalogue actually sitting with his hands on the keyboard of the recording piano was Vincent Lopez, a dance band leader whose rolls were generally arranged by hand and not directly recorded.

Le procédé Duo-Art

Introduction

The Æolian Company was a relatively late entrant to the world of reproducing pianos, bringing the Duo-Art before the musical public in March 1914. By that time, the Welte-Mignon had been on sale for 9 years, and various American manufacturers had already stepped into the market, such as the American Piano Company, with its Stoddard-Ampico system, which is reputed to have been launched in 1911.

There would seem to be 2 reasons for this un-characteristic tardiness on the part of Æolian, namely an unsuccessful attempt to produce a synchronized phonograph and player piano, which occupied the Æolian experimental department for many years, and an apparent belief that most music-lovers wanted to create their own interpretations on the pianola, rather than to listen passively to the performances of the great Masters. It is, perhaps, significant that, at the very outset, Æolian sought to emphasize the triple nature of its new instrument, allowing for automatic performance, personal control of standard rolls, and the direct playing of the piano by hand. Such an instrument might more aptly have been called a Trio-Art, whereas the name Duo-Art would have ideally suited a combined phonograph and player piano.

Musical Example

As was the case with the Ampico for most of its existence, the Duo-Art recording machine did not record the pianist's dynamics automatically, and so the skill and experience of the musical editors was paramount in determining how faithful a particular roll might be. This example was recorded by the young Chilean pianist, Rosita Renard, and published in the summer of 1918. It is sometimes said that the highly-edited Duo-Art rolls are more akin to portraits than to photographs, but a portrait can often be the more telling of the 2.

Mechanical Operation

Like the Themodist Pianola, the Duo-Art divided its playing mechanism into 2 halves, although the border from bass to treble occurred between E-flat and E above middle C, one note lower than on most other systems. The reasons for this difference were not documented at the time, but may have been influenced by the phonograph/player piano project mentioned above, which adopted an 85 note piano as the standard, leaving the top 3 note tracks on a normal 88 note roll to be used for synchronization purposes. The centre of such a piano would fit more closely with the Duo-Art division.

In all normal reproducing pianos, an electric suction pump powers the playing mechanism, and supplies a sufficient level of suction for the maximum loudness needed by the piano. Proprietary dynamic control mechanisms reduce this suction level in various sophisticated ways, so that a wide variety of dynamic effects is possible.

Diagram : Air is evacuated from the Duo-Art playing mechanism (the pneumatic stack) through a pipe on the left, passing through various windways inside the expression box, and thence to an electric suction pump by means of the pipe at the top of the diagram. The layout below is not necessarily representative of an actual Duo-Art installation.

Part of the Dynamic Control Mechanism of the Duo-Art

At the right, a perforated music roll passes over a tracker bar, which has holes in it connected via many small tubes to the individual note mechanisms of the instrument. At the left-hand edge of the music roll (and also at the right-hand, which is not shown) , there are 4 special perforation positions which do not operate notes, but which instead allow atmospheric air to pass through elongated tracker bar holes, operating the valves to control one of 2 accordion pneumatics, as Æolian called them.

Each accordion has 4 separate sections, which progressively double in span, from top to bottom. Thus, Duo-Art power 1, which is operated by the outermost dynamic coding perforation on the roll, causes the top-section of the accordion to collapse, moving the left-hand end of the knife valve arm by 1/16th of an inch. Powers 2, 4 and 8, operated by adjacent perforations on the roll, collapse by 1/8, 1/4 and 1/2 of an inch respectively. The 4 dynamic coding perforations on the roll can be combined, allowing for 16 degrees of dynamic control.

An Overall Diagram of the Duo-Art Expression Mechanism

The Accordion pulls on a small wooden arm which is connected, via a rotating rod, to one end of a knife valve inside the expression box. This valve slides over a port (usually, a round hole in the case of the Duo-Art) and, as it opens the port, it allows suction from the pump to enter the large regulator pneumatic. The pneumatic closes in opposition to a coil spring, and, by means of a rod attached to its inner-surface, moves the other end of the knife valve until it also closes. Thus, a state of equilibrium is reached, with the suction applied to the stack dependent mainly on the force exerted by the regulator spring, and also to some degree on the maximum level supplied by the pump.

This binary to analogue decoding was central to the Duo-Art, and in combination with separate Theme and Accompaniment regulators, switched by Themodist style perforations at the edges of the rolls, it had the potential for creating 32 different theoretical dynamic levels. In practice, since reproducing pianos do not operate at anything like the speed of computer systems, the 32 powers were more like miniature crescendos and decrescendos, in many cases dependent on the length of the perforations which operated them, and so, the actual subtlety of dynamic shading was far greater than the theory might suggest. Besides, the response of the Duo-Art to its dynamic coding is modified by the number of notes being played, and even by any notes already played but held on by perforations that are still open. One should always remember that Duo-Art rolls were without exception edited on the pianos of the time, until they sounded right to the pianists and editors involved, and not to some theoretical standard, either of dynamics or piano tone, a point that both computer and player piano specialists should note well, before they embark on projects to bring the Duo-Art up to date.

The Duo-Art Recording Process

From the outset of the Duo-Art, in 1914, and, perhaps, a little earlier, there was a piano roll recording studio at Æolian Hall, in New York, initially at the 42nd Street premises. The 1st recording producers were W. Creary Woods and Arno Lachmund, who seem to have divided the work equally between them, if the hand-written notes on the surviving original rolls at the International Piano Archive in Maryland are to be believed. Both men were trained musicians ; Lachmund's father was a concert pianist and pupil of Franz Liszt, and Woods went on to become the Principal of the Delaware College of Music.

A similar studio was set-up in London, England, at the end of 1919, and there, the post of recording producer was taken by Reginald Reynolds, who had lately succeeded Easthope Martin as the British Æolian Company's chief Pianolist. Laurence Crump, seconded from the player department of the Æolian factory at Hayes, Middlesex, became the perforating machine engineer.

Unlike many other reproducing piano systems, the Duo-Art used a real-time perforator to produce an original roll as the artist played. This machine, patented by Edwin Votey, was capable of punching at around 3,600 perforation rows per minute, giving an accuracy, on this 1st roll, of 1/60th of a second. Dynamics were not recorded automatically, but were created on the roll as the artist played, by 2 dials and their associated mechanisms, controlled by the recording producer, who sat to the left and slightly behind the pianist.

Under the keys of the recording piano was a series of electrical contacts which ran through a cable to a separate room, where the rather noisy perforating machine was housed. Until the early-1920's, there were 2 contacts for each note, but half of these were subsequently removed in order to improve the touch of the piano action. According to Gordon Iles, who worked at Æolian in London for a short period in the late-1920's, there were also 2 piano-type pedals attached to the recording console, and it seems likely that these were used in the early days, in conjunction with the extra-note contacts, as a means of automatically punching Themodist perforations in synchronization with any notes which the recording producer selected.

Once a Duo-Art original had been perforated, it was copied to a much longer stencil roll, on thicker paper, which was then used to produce several copies for editing purposes, known as trials. During the recording process, the original was pulled through on to a take-up spool, and so the paper speed slowly accelerated, and since the recording perforating machine punched at a regular 60 cycles per second, it can be clearly seen on all surviving recorded originals that the spacing between punch rows gradually increased. However, the trial rolls were produced on normal perforating machines, whose punch spacing was either 21 or 31.5 punches per inch, depending on the date of recording, and this lack of synchronization introduced a certain « fuzziness » into the trials, just as the different line standards on United States and European televisions used to mean that video-tapes copied from one system to the other were not quite as clear as the originals. Much editing time was taken-up with minute corrections of this nature, especially before 1923, when the finer perforation spacing was introduced. There is a surviving letter from Paderewski to the Æolian Company, in which he asks them to tidy-up some of his arpeggios and, in the past, this has been wrongly attributed to a lack of precision on Paderewski's part.

Whereas Welte in Germany did not invite pianists to assist with the editing of their own rolls, Æolian made a feature of asking its well-known recording artists to help polish their performances. Percy Grainger observed that the Duo-Art represented him not as he actually played, but as he would like to have played. Harold Bauer and Rudolph Ganz gave extended press interviews on the subject of piano roll editing, which Æolian then used in its advertising for the new instrument.

At the end of the editing process, the final trial was approved and signed by the pianist, and became a pattern, to be used as a proofing copy in the manufacture of the roll for commercial sale. Of course, all corrections to a trial had to be copied across to its associated stencil, since this was the style of master roll used on the production perforating machines.

Duo-Art roll speeds vary from about 50 to 120, being 5 and 12 feet per minute respectively at the start of the roll, though mostly they keep to within a range of 60 to 90. As a rough guide, a roll speed of 80, with a perforation spacing of 31.5 rows per inch, gives an accuracy in time of about 1/50 of a second at the start of the roll.

Pianists and Repertoire

The haste with which the Æolian Company introduced the Duo-Art in March 1914 is confirmed by the paucity of rolls in its 1st year. By December of 1914, there were just 100 Classical titles available, and the emphasis was on what might be termed « salon » music, rather than anything too demanding. There were also very few pianists of note in the earliest catalogue and, at the outset, Æolian was reduced to converting Grieg's Autograph-Metrostyle roll of « Papillon » in order to associate the Duo-Art with at least one great composer. Many of these early rolls were recorded by Felix Arndt, a composer of light-music and member of the Æolian Company's New York staff, who died in 1918, in the influenza epidemic. As might also be expected from a system where the musicianship and experience of the recording producers played such an important part, these early rolls are not as musically successful as later Duo-Art recordings.

In the minds of the Æolian Company's musical staff, the repertoire of the Duo-Art consisted of a number of distinct musical styles. The Classical and Light Classical rolls were allocated a particular numbering system, while lighter-music, songs and accompaniments each had their own area of the catalogue. Separate recordings were made in New York and London, with the numbers of the British Duo-Art series beginning with the letter « O » , presumably for « Orchestrelle » , the name of the Æolian Company's British subsidiary at the time the Duo-Art was launched, and not the numeral « 0 » , as is often wrongly assumed. However, some of the recordings made in London were, in fact, issued in the main American series, and probably edited in the United States as well.

Slowly, a number of better known pianists began to visit the Æolian Company's studios, as they happened to be passing through New York. Teresa Carreño, Ferruccio Busoni and Camille Saint-Saëns all made early American rolls on a non-exclusive basis. Then, Percy Grainger moved to the United States in 1915 and, since he was already in contact with the Æolian Company in London, having arranged 2 folk-songs directly for Pianola, his transition to exclusive Duo-Art recording was a very natural progression. Harold Bauer, an Englishman born in Kingston-upon-Thames, and Rudolph Ganz, from Switzerland, had similarly chosen America as their new home, and so, were persuaded to become early entrants to the Duo-Art catalogue. Then, in 1918, Paderewski signed an exclusive contract with Æolian, and gave the Company the opportunity of presenting its new reproducing piano as the world leader, rivalled only by Ampico, for which the slightly younger Rachmaninov exclusively recorded. The 3rd most highly-regarded pianist of the time, Josef Hofmann, also joined the ranks of Duo-Art artists around 1918, and so, by 1920, Æolian had created a substantial roster of pianists, and the decade of the roaring 1920's saw the greatest flourishing of Duo-Art pianos and rolls.

By 1930, when serious Duo-Art recording all but stopped, there were about 2,000 rolls in the American Classical series, and a roughly similar number of popular titles. The Æolian Company in London recorded some 350 rolls, with a mostly Classical bias, and it also perforated American series rolls for sale in Europe and the British Empire, including about a thousand popular titles for which it established its own numbering system. The style of dynamic coding used by Reginald Reynolds, the British Duo-Art recording producer, is quite different from the U.S. pattern, and from the way that individual pianos respond to these coded perforations, one can assess that British Duo-Art pianos were generally set-up to play differently (a little louder, and with a less quickly responsive sustaining pedal mechanism) from their American counterparts. During the 1930's, new popular rolls were still produced in the United States, though typically by a modified metronomic marking-up process, and not by recording at a piano. Indeed, Duo-Art dance rolls, and these include most of Gershwin's output, are not at all hand-played in the sense that they might actually represent what the performer played. Instead, musicians used a simple factory recording piano as a speedy way of notating their arrangements, and the resulting marked-up rolls were used like written-out musical manuscripts, as a basis for creating metronomic arrangements which would play consistently for singing and dancing.

Duo-Art Instruments

From the launch in March 1914, Duo-Art mechanisms were installed into Steinway upright pianos, and demonstrations were held in the Steinway salon at Æolian Hall, New York. Whereas advertisements for the Pianola and Pianola Piano had shown music-lovers as active contributors to their own enjoyment, the new style of Duo-Art advertising sought to represent a couple, or a family in deeply pensive mood, brought on by the acquisition of a new Duo-Art Pianola.

Although the Duo-Art was launched by means of upright Pianola Pianos, it took only 6 months or so for Æolian to have grands on sale as well. Like the original Welte, but unlike the Ampico and Welte Licensee, the grand pianos house the roll spool-box in a compartment above the keyboard. The earliest Steinway Duo-Art grand piano known to have survived is No. 168475, made around September 1914, and the top of the spool-box can be seen over the keyboard fall.

By 1915, Weber Duo-Art pianos were also available, and the range gradually spread to include Steck and Æolian in the United States and Britain, Gabriel Gaveau in France, and Ibach in Germany. Art-cased instruments, with ornate and expensive decoration, were especially popular in America, and many attractive designs were created and manufactured at the Æolian Company's factories.

South America was fertile ground for exports, and there were strong Æolian agencies in all the major countries. Alfredo Molina, President of El Salvador, owned a Weber Duo-Art upright, and is seen here in the early part of 1925, listening with rapt attention to his newly-acquired treasure. One may note that the Metrostyle pointer, utterly redundant in the case of Duo-Art rolls, is nevertheless standing to attention at the front of the spool-box !

Most of the grand pianos used for the Duo-Art were of small or medium size, but there were nevertheless a few concert instruments as well. In the late-1920's, Duo-Art mechanisms were installed into a small number of Steinway « D » grand pianos, but for its own concert purposes the Æolian Company built a series of Weber 9 foot grands around 1917. At least 2 of these have survived, one facilitating the return in 1985 of the late Rudolph Ganz to Symphony Hall, Chicago, where he appeared as posthumous soloist in the Liszt E-flat Piano Concerto, with the Chicago Youth Symphony Orchestra.

Another Duo-Art concert grand belonged to Queen Elizabeth of the Belgians and was, for many years, to be found in the Royal Palace at Læken, near Brussels. This instrument is now in private hands, and it formed part of the special exhibition of player pianos at the Musical Instrument Museum in Brussels, in the summer of 2007. It is shown in a photograph taken from an advertisement by the Æolian Company in Paris, which appeared several times throughout the 1920s, in the fashionable magazine, l'Illustration.

The original purpose of these full-sized grand pianos was as a means of publicity, and memorable advertising was certainly one of the areas in which the Æolian Company excelled. The auditorium in its Æolian Hall at West 42nd Street, in Manhattan, was the permanent home of the New York Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Walter Damrosch, and, in 1917, it arranged with the Orchestra to stage a concert in which Harold Bauer played the Saint-Saëns 2nd Piano Concerto. However, while Harold Bauer's playing issued forth from the concert grand Duo-Art in New York, the pianist himself was in Chicago, having been replaced by his recorded music rolls. Such Concertos were subsequently organized, from time to time, by both Æolian and Ampico, but the evening of Saturday 17 November 1917, seems to have been the very 1st example.

In the 1920's, not everyone had access to an adequate electricity supply, and foot-operated Duo-Art pianos were manufactured to fill this gap. These were also less expensive, and controlled only the Accompaniment side of the dynamic mechanism automatically, leaving the operator to create a dynamic level for the Theme notes by means of the foot pedals. The Steck was manufactured at the Æolian Company's factory in Hayes, Middlesex, close to the present-day location of Heathrow airport.

Towards the end of the Duo-Art period, in the very late-1920's and early-1930's, a number of innovations were brought in, partly to help keep the market going, and partly as a result of new technology. The Concertola Duo-Art console allowed a quantity of rolls to be pre-loaded on to multiple spools and, then, played in any order by means of a remote control device. In some late Duo-Art pianos, the familiar accordion pneumatic was modified so that it opened radially, like a book, and not longitudinally, as had previously been the case.

In 1932, the Æolian Company effectively took-over its main competitor, the American Piano Corporation, in an unequal merger in which Æolian was the dominant partner. Many retail and manufacturing properties were sold-off, and piano and roll manufacture was transferred to the former Ampico factory at East Rochester, New York. Ironically, the retention of the Ampico work-force and design team meant that Ampico features predominated in 1930's instruments, even though the major capital of the company had come from Æolian sources. For example, late Duo-Art grand pianos were manufactured with the rolls placed in a drawer mechanism under the keyboard, as had always been the case with Ampico grands, and by means of a larger take-up spool and electric roll drive, both based on the Ampico « B » design, it became possible to play much longer Duo-Art rolls.

But these novelties were not ever wide-spread, and the 1930's saw the gradual decline of the Duo-Art, as indeed of all other reproducing pianos. The recording studio in New York was closed and, in the end, rolls were simply marked-up by hand, mostly by Frank Milne, a Scotsman who had emigrated to the United States early in the 20th Century, and who ended-up in charge of the musical side of roll production at the East Rochester factory. Of course, the manufacture of normal pianos continued apace, and only in April 1985 was the work-force finally laid-off. George and Elmer Brooks ran the factory for many years.

The AudioGraphic Project

As the decade of the 1920's progressed, all piano companies must have gone through relatively hard times, and Æolian encountered particular difficulties as a result of the British subsidiary losing a very substantial amount of money around 1923. Rumour has it that the deputy works manager at the Company's factory in Hayes, Middlesex, was misappropriating whole barge-loads of expensive timber and selling them off on the side. Whatever the case, Æolian made strenuous efforts to keep its piano and pianola sales buoyant, and one of the ways it chose to do this was to concentrate on the educational uses of the Duo-Art.

For many years, song rolls had been produced by various companies, with the lyric of a ballad printed at the treble side of a music roll, so that the assembled company gathered round the pianola would find it easier to sing along with the music. This was an early form of what we would now call Karaoke, and the rolls sometimes included simple illustrations.

In the mid-1920's, Percy Scholes, a well-known British music-critic and author, had the idea of extending the printed material on roll to include descriptions of the music and explanatory notes. Scholes persuaded George W.F. Reed of the Æolian Company in London to present the idea to the parent company in the United States. In a photograph, George Reed is standing 3rd from the left, and Percy Scholes 6th. For the record, the others standing are Ernest Newman, Jean Chantavoine, Isidor Philipp and Lodewijk Martelmans, all musicians or musical writers, and at the right Sir Humphrey Milford, director of the Oxford University Press.

An initial set of educational rolls was produced in England, in 1925, and Scholes gave a series of musical lectures for children at Æolian Hall, broadcast by the BBC, and preserved in his book, « The Appreciation of Music by Means of the Pianola and Duo-Art ». This roll-based activity soon led to the publication of a full-series of AudioGraphic rolls, as they came to be known, and a grand banquet was held in 1926 to launch the project publicly. Many musical writers and academic specialists were invited to contribute programme notes, which were printed at the start of each roll, and a series of artists was commissioned to produce wood-cuts for the accompanying illustrations. Photographs were also included on the rolls, especially of composers and pianists.

Most of the rolls were published in 2 editions, Duo-Art and Pianola, with consecutive catalogue numbers. Rolls D-717 and D-718, published in September 1928, were a Children's Centenary Roll of Franz Schubert, who died in 1828. Virtually, the only difference between the 2 rolls was the inclusion or omission of the automatic Duo-Art dynamic coding. Although many different musicians contributed programme notes for the rolls, Percy Scholes himself chose to address the children on this Schubert issue, and his natural good humour and wit are readily apparent.

The roll leader typically lists the pianists and musical scholars who had contributed to the AudioGraphic series, including the members of a number of international committees brought together for the purpose. In Britain, the Honorary Advisory Committee on the Educational Use of Piano Player Rolls was already in existence, and consisted of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, formerly Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, Doctor J.B. McEwen, his successor, Sir Hugh Allen, Director of the Royal College of Music, Sir Landon Ronald, Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, Sir Henry Wood, Conductor of the Queen's Hall Orchestra, Professor C.H. Kitson, Professor of Music at the University of Durham, Robin Legge, Music-Critic of the Daily Telegraph, and J. Aikman Forsyth, Committee Secretary. Similar committees had been founded in France, Germany, Spain, Belgium, the United States and the Argentine. Although these gatherings of the great and the good were formed mainly in order to give the AudioGraphic series a certain international standing, one should not forget that the important musicians of the day were quite genuinely enthusiastic towards the player piano as an educational device.

After a number of titles and printed introductions, the music on the roll begins with an abbreviated performance of Schubert's « Marche Militaire » , played by Harold Bauer and Ossip Gabrilowitsch. Since the roll being used for these illustrations is the Pianola version, there is no Duo-Art dynamic coding, but instead, instructions for expression are given to the pianist. Coloured lines mark-out the start of each bar, and delineate the various musical themes.

On the right of the roll, a series of very small perforations can be seen, punched at the start of every bar, and used to trigger a special machine at the roll factory, patented by Reginald Reynolds, which printed blue bar lines throughout the roll, very helpful to the pianist, and also useful to those following the music with a printed score.

Amongst further performances of Schubert's piano music by Paderewski, Ignaz Friedman and Alfred Cortot, there are many wood-cut illustrations of Schubert's life, and descriptions which set his music in context, all directed towards the younger listener, since this is designed as a Children's Roll. Finally, a short quiz tests the young listeners to find-out how much they have learned, and the Oxford University Press takes the opportunity to remind parents of the 3 recently published « Books of the Great Musicians » .

A separate AudioGraphic series of rolls was published in the United States, supervised by the musical educator, Charles Farnsworth, but despite the prodigious amount of work involved in the design and production of these attractive rolls, they came too late in the history of the reproducing piano to have more than a transitory effect. Significant collections of rolls were donated to various educational establishments, including the Royal Academy of Music in London, and we are lucky that more or less complete sets of both the British and American AudioGraphic rolls were deposited at the Library of Congress in Washington.

The Duo-Art in Perspective

Of all the commonly found reproducing pianos, the Ampico copes best with a lack of regulation. When such pianos were initially re-discovered in the 1950's and 1960's, therefore, the Ampico tended to play better than the rest, and this often led to its being unfairly regarded as the best system. In truth, however, all reproducing pianos have their advantages and disadvantages, and a really well-adjusted Duo-Art is the match of any Ampico. But the fine musical adjustment of a reproducing piano is the least understood art in the player piano world, and one only has to listen to many widely available CD's and LP's to be uncomfortably aware of this. It may well be that, even in the 1920's, many pianos were sold that did not live-up to the musical potential of the best rolls. The British Æolian Company's Duo-Arts responded somewhat differently to the dynamic coding than did their American counterparts. W. Creary Woods, in charge of the musical side of Duo-Art recording in New York, was well-aware of this, since he corresponded on the subject with Harold Bauer, who, as an international concert pianist, had detailed experience of the pianos on both sides of the Atlantic. That these 2 experts should have known of the problem, and that it nevertheless persisted throughout the 1920's, shows that the Company which manufactured the Duo-Art was not greatly influenced by the subtleties of interpretation. How much less likely are we, today, to find more than a tiny number of Duo-Arts in perfect condition !

The Duo-Art is, above all, a system which depends on the skill of its musical editors, since it never recorded dynamics automatically. Later rolls are, therefore, generally better than earlier ones, and this applies equally to London and to New York. The best rolls are stunningly lifelike - Percy Grainger playing Cyril Scott's « Lotus Land » , Paderewski in the wistful little Chopin « Mazurka » , Opus 17, No. 4. And yet, it is a shared and instinctive perception of our Pianola Institute audiences that the Ampico appeals to our sense of excitement, the Duo-Art fascinates our intellect, but the Welte-Mignon touches our soul. We hope this discussion of the Duo-Art will whet the appetites of those who in the past have doubted the artistic validity of the reproducing piano, of whichever system.

One of this writer's favourite Duo-Art rolls : Josef Hofmann playing one of his own compositions. A clever man, Hofmann ; it is not always known that he was also a very fine engineer and inventor, with a patented design of automobile springs that was widely used in the United States during the 1920's.

Le procédé Artrio-Angelus

Introduction

The Artrio-Angelus was a development of the normal Angelus player piano, manufactured in Meriden, Connecticut, by the firm of Wilcox and White. In the 19th Century, Meriden had grown wealthy on the back of the silver trade, with many famous plating factories situated in and around the city. Indeed, it was known as the « Silver City » for many years. Wilcox and White founded their company in Meriden, in 1877, and derived their initial capital mainly from Horace Wilcox, whose various silver companies had made him the richest man in town. The White family, on the other hand, were the experts in musical instrument manufacture, 2 generations having worked at the Estey Organ Company's factory in Brattleboro, Vermont.

As the era of the player piano dawned in the late-1890's, Wilcox and White created the Angelus, and subsequently argued unceasingly that they had been the 1st to develop such a piano player. Around 1914, when the reproducing piano began to take-over, the Company quite naturally wanted its own product to compete in the market-place, and so, Frank C. White, grandson of the founder, and the firm's technical director, set about inventing the Artrio Angelus, perhaps, deliberately choosing the name in order to be one up on the Æolian Company's Duo-Art. As happened in so many player piano companies, the recording producers for the new automatic instruments were recruited from the ranks of the expert foot-pedallers, and so, it was that Percival Van Yorx, the leading Angelus player, took on the responsibility of creating Artrio rolls from the playing of a worthy selection of fine pianists.

The Artrio Angelus was launched gradually over a period of 2 or 3 years, with a notable introduction to the music trade in New York, in June 1916. Its high-point was arguably a well-received public concert at Carnegie Hall, in February 1921, at which the Hungarian pianist, Yolandé Merö, alternated with the Artrio in the playing of the Liszt Hungarian Fantasia, accompanied by the National Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Willem Mengelberg. However, the piano was not destined for a long career, since Wilcox and White succumbed to bankruptcy in early 1922, being sold at auction to the Hallet and Davis Piano Company. For another 3 years, the recording of Artrio rolls continued as before in Meriden, with new studios in Colony Street in the downtown area, while the reproducing mechanisms were manufactured by the Simplex Company in Worcester, Mass. Finally, in 1925, the roll department was taken-over by the QRS Music Co. of Chicago, and the repertoire was, thereby, merged with that company's Recordo expression piano.

Mechanical Operation

The pneumatic playing mechanism of the Artrio-Angelus was, in many respects, very similar to those of other reproducing pianos, with note pneumatics and valves assembled together in a pneumatic stack. Unusually, in the grand piano version of the instrument, the whole stack and expression mechanism were mounted in a drawer under the keyboard, with a cunningly designed set of pivoting rods which transmitted the movement of the note pneumatics to the piano action. There were similarities to the normal Angelus player, with its series of adjustable dynamic restrictors, and to the Duo-Art, since the Artrio used a Solo and Accompaniment system, though it had separate mechanisms for regulating the treble and the bass accompaniment levels.

The Artrio Recording Process

Since the Artrio recording department was rather small, it was inevitable that the technical means of recording and reproducing dynamics should have been tailored to suit the abilities of the Company's chief musical editor, Percival Van Yorx. Van Yorx was a very experienced player pianist, initially with Æolian and Apollo, and then, from 1901 onwards, as a demonstrator and manager for the Angelus in various American cities. In this connection, he was employed from 1906 by Wanamaker's in New York, performing regularly in the department store's large concert auditorium. When Wilcox and White began recording hand-played rolls around 1911, publishing them on the Voltem label, they took on Van Yorx to supervise the process, which grew quite naturally into the production of fully-automatic rolls for the Artrio.

It is not surprising, therefore, that the dynamic recording process developed and patented by Frank White should have been designed around a foot-pedalled player piano. 1st of all, a hand-played roll was recorded, with the note placements marked and perforated, and no doubt with indications of the pianist's dynamics notated by Van Yorx on a printed score, as was the custom at Ampico for many years. However, instead of laboriously transforming this marked-up short-hand into actual dynamic coding by hand, Van Yorx took the initial perforated roll and pedalled it at a special recording piano, and the suction levels which he generated were automatically perforated on to the edges of a master roll, while the notes were copied across at the same time. In order to be faithful to the original performance, this demanded a good deal of skill on the part of the operator, but given Van Yorx's widely recognized musicianship, it was probably very effective.

20 novembre 1905 : Le chef Carl Pohlig dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin dans le cadre d'un concert commandité par les Sociétés Richard Wagner de Berlin et de Berlin-Potsdam.

Décembre 1905 : Gustav Mahler conducts the Vienna premiere of his own 5th Symphony. The audience is quite receptive, but the newspaper-critics give it extremely negative reviews.

Autour de Noël 1905 : Mathilde Schœnberg becomes pregnant with their 2nd child. Inspired by his happy feelings, the 31 year old Arnold Schœnberg begins his « Kammer-symphonie » (Chamber Symphony) . In the 1st edition of his « Harmonielehre » , written in 1910, Schœnberg will characterize the main opening horn theme as « stürmisch und aufwärtsstrebend » (stormily and upward-striving) , in the revised edition of 1922 as « stürmischer Jubel » (stormy rejoicing) .

Schœnberg's « Kammer-symphonie » (Chamber Symphony) is saturated (perhaps, more than any other piece in musical history) with the « 4th chords » which he had 1st tentatively used in « Pelleas und Melisande » . In 1910, he will write in his « Harmonielehre » , after describing the instance in « Pelleas » :

« Then, not until long afterwards (4 years) , in my “ Kammer-symphonie ” did I take-up 4th chords again, without recalling the previous case (i.e. , “ Pelleas ”) , and without having got to know, in the meantime, the music of Claude Debussy or Paul Dukas. Springing from an entirely different expressive urge.

Invented as a stormily upward-striving horn theme, they spread themselves out architectonically over the whole piece, and place their stamp on everything that happens. Thus, it turns-out that they do not appear here merely as melody or as a purely impressionistic chord effect ; their character permeates the total harmonic structure, and they are chords like all others. »

(Joe Monzo translation of Schœnberg, 1911 ; pages 450-451 - adapted from Schœnberg, 1978 ; pages 403-404.)

The earliest sketch of the « Kammer-symphonie » opens with a cadence on E, whereas the final version of this beginning cadences on F ; Walter Frisch maintains that, eventually, Schönberg pitted the juxtaposition of F against E as the main tonal basis of the piece ; this seems to me too similar to the characteristic cadences in the 1st movement of Gustav Mahler's 7th Symphony to be a coincidence. For this and other reasons (chiefly having to do with similarities in intricate details of formal structure, and the prevalence of the « 4th chords ») , Schönberg was rather more familiar with Mahler's work of the previous summer on that 1st movement than he later admitted.

All in all, a real banner year for modern music, in Vienna.

Début 1906 : Richard Strauß approaches Hugo von Hofmannsthal about using his version of « Elektra » for an Opera.

Universal-Edition issues a series of reprints of all of the Mahler Symphonies now in its catalog, re-publishing the 3rd and 4th, in January ; the 2nd, in April ; and the 1st, in May. Mahler's 6th is also published in March, by « Christian Friedrich Kahnt Verlag » .

11 janvier 1906 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 12e concert de la saison.

Février 1906 : Wilhelm Gericke conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra in performances of Gustav Mahler's 5th Symphony in Boston, Philadelphia, and New York. The newspapers report good performances but very mixed receptions from the audience.

19 février 1906 : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich.

Avril 1906 : Arnold Schönberg, having used-up all the pages in his « Sketch-book II » , continues work on his « Kammer-symphonie » (1st Chamber Symphony) at the beginning of his « Sketch-book III » with the strangely beautiful lyrical theme. Schönberg has apparently either heard about, or seen the score of, Stein's « Konzertstücke » , because on the very 1st page of the sketch-book, there is a « Bezeichnung für die Vierteltöne » (notation for the quarter-tones) accompanied by a sketch of notes descending by quarter-tones from C to B-flat and, then, back-up again, in which Schönberg uses the « greater-than » and « less than » mathematical symbols to represent quarter-tone deviations from 12-tone equal-temperament by having the open-end of the symbol point towards the higher-pitch which comes either before or after the quarter-tone. This is not really a systematically logical way to use these symbols as accidentals, and may, perhaps, be the reason why he abandoned the idea.

Autour de Pâques 1906 : While on his Easter vacation, Julius Korngold receives in the mail a Cantata, called « Gold » (now lost) , written by his 8 year old son Erich Wolfgang. This finally convinces Julius of his son's talent, and he is sent to study with Robert Fuchs.

18 avril 1906 (in the early morning hours) : In America, a strong earthquake occurs in Northern California, and the earthquake and resultant fire practically destroy the city of San Francisco. Because New York banks send a lot of financial aid to San Francisco, it also becomes one of the factors which precipitate the financial crises of the next year.

The 24 year old German composer Richard H. Stein uses quarter-tones in the cello part of his « Zwei Konzertstücke » for cello and piano, Opus 26, the 1st quarter-tone piece published in the European tradition.

1er juin 1906 : Article sur Linz, la capitale de la Haute-Autriche, paru dans le « Musical Times » de Londres ...

(LINZ) Some years ago, the Town Council of this little city on the beautiful blue Danube, at the suggestion of « Herr » August Göllerich, voted a sum of money ; the interest from which, for 25 years, was to be devoted to a bi-annual Anton Bruckner Festival Concert, at popular prices. Up to the present, the 1st 6 Symphonies of the composer have been given at these concerts. Bruckner was organist at Linz Cathedral, from 1855 to 1867, when he succeeded Simon Sechter, organist of the « Hofkapelle » , becoming at the same time a professor at the Vienna « Conservatorium » . Bruckner was born, on September 4th, 1824, in Ansfelden, in the Archduchy of Upper-Austria, of which Linz is the capital. There is, consequently, some method in the Linz Town Council's madness : a laudable desire to do honour to the memory of an artist who, after suffering cruel neglect in his lifetime, is now becoming more and more appreciated in Austria and Germany, and even spoken of as the greatest Symphonist since Beethoven. The 5th of the concerts was given on April 7th, 1906, by the Linz « Musikverein » Orchestra, the program consisting of the 7th Symphony, the « Te Deum » , and a setting, for 5 part chorus and 3 trombones, of « Psalm 114 » . The last-named was performed for the 1st time, though its composition dates from the period in the 1850's when Bruckner was still organist at the « Stift » (Abbey) of Saint-Florian where, as a boy, he was a chorister. The performances of the 3 works were exceedingly fine, that of the gigantic Symphony especially creating the greatest enthusiasm. The concert attracted many visitors from Vienna and other Austrian towns, and its striking success reflects the greatest credit on the Linz « Musikverein » no less than on the little cathedral town itself, with its 60,000 inhabitants.

Juin 1906 : Just after his 9th birthday, the young Erich Wolfgang Korngold plays « Gold » for Gustav Mahler, who follows the score while Korngold plays and keeps proclaiming that the boy is « a genius ! » . Mahler urgently presses Korngold's father to send him to Alexander von Zemlinsky for the proper development of his talent, but Julius keeps Erich studying with Robert Fuchs, for 2 more years, to give him a solid grounding in traditional musical technique. Young Erich idolizes Mahler : every time someone asks him what he wants to be when he grows-up, he replies :

« Direktor Mahler ! »

Juin 1906 : Anton Webern graduates from the Vienna University with his Doctorate in Musicology, having studied mainly under Guido Adler. His dissertation is on the « Choralis Constantinus » of Dutch Renaissance composer Heinrich Isaac.

Été 1906 : During his last joyful summer vacation in the Alps, and at the peak of his life as composer, conductor, Opera director, husband, and father, Gustav Mahler composes his stupendous 8th Symphony (beginning of Part I, beginning of Part 2) in a tremendous 6 week burst of inspiration. Mahler writes in a famous letter to Willem Mengelberg :

« Try to imagine the whole universe beginning to ring and resound. These are no longer human voices, but planets and suns revolving. »

And to Richard Specht, he said about the 8th :

« All my earlier Symphonies are only preludes to this one. In the other works, everything is subjectively tragic - this one is a great bestower of joy. »

Été 1906 : On vacation in the mountains during the summer, the 31 year old Arnold Schœnberg finishes his « Chamber Symphony » , which explores the outer-reaches of tonality, and about which Anton Webern wrote :

« It made a colossal impression. I'd been his pupil for 3 years (it had really been 2) , and immediately felt, “ you must write something like that too ! ”. Under the influence of the work, I wrote a Sonata movement the very next day. In that movement, I reached the farthest limits of tonality. Both of us sensed that, in this Sonata movement, I'd broken through to a material for which the situation wasn't yet ripe. »

Webern is obviously very inspired and begins several different pieces, for both piano and string quartet, and finishes a number of them ; it is difficult to determine which one he was describing in the above statement. One possible candidate is a piece, entitled « Sonatensatz » (Sonata movement) .

Août 1906 : Hard on the heels of his 1st « Chamber Symphony » , Schœnberg begins and composes much of a 2nd « Chamber Symphony » , which he will work on intermittently while also beginning the composition of the 2nd String Quartet, whose 1st theme's rhythm has a curious resemblance to the Anton Webern's « Sonatensatz » referred to above. Schœnberg will eventually lay aside the 2nd « Chamber Symphony » in favour of finishing the Quartet, and not complete it until 1939, in America.

Août 1906 : Despite Alma's story about Gustav Mahler's revulsion from Friedrich Nietzsche, a newspaper interview given by Mahler (published after his death) clearly illustrates his continuing reverence for, at least, some aspects of the philosopher's work.

Septembre 1906 : Anton Webern's mother dies. This event has a profound effect on the composer, and will haunt him for the rest of his life. Webern claims that all his subsequent music is written in memory of her.

22 septembre 1906 : Arnold Schœnberg's 2nd child, son Georg, is born.

Octobre 1906 : Oskar Fried conducts Gustav Mahler's 6th Symphony, in Berlin.

Octobre 1906 : Alexander von Zemlinsky finishes in Vienna (after nearly 3 years) his 3rd Opera, « Der Traumgörge » .

Octobre 1906 : Alban Berg is able to quit his job and to devote his life to music, because some real estate inherited by his mother provides the family with an income. He attends 6 performances of Richard Strauß's « Salome » .

Arnold Schönberg meets a young artist named Richard Gerstl and he and his wife both take painting lessons. (While Gerstl is 9 years younger than Schönberg, their birthdays are only 1 day apart.)

29 octobre 1906 : Création berlinoise de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner par le chef Arthur Nikisch dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

15 novembre 1906 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 6e concert de la saison.

6 décembre 1906 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schumann, à l'occasion d'un récital donné à Vienne par la soliste Amalie Löwe accompagné par son mari (Ferdinand) au piano.

8 décembre 1906 : Le chef Eduard Kremser dirige la Cantate « Helgoland » de Bruckner (WAB 71) avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin accompagné du « Wiener Männergesang-Verein » (Société chorale masculine de Vienne) appuyé également par les meilleures voix de la Société austro-hongroise auxiliaire de Berlin.

Décembre 1906 : A series of strokes incapacitates Cosima Wagner, leaving her unable to run the Bayreuth Festival.

Eduard Kremser

The distinguished Austrian conductor, composer, arranger, music-critic, editor/compiler of folk and popular music, Eduard (Edward) Kremser, was born on 10 April 1838 in Vienna, and died on 26 November 1914 in Vienna. His grave of honour is situated at the Central Cemetery (« Zentralfriedhof, Wien II, Kleine Stadtgutgasse 10 ») : Section 32A, No. 48. Kremser gained great importance as a collector and editor of traditional Viennese songs.

Kremser attended business school, studied piano and music theory, and sang in amateur Choral Societies in Vienna. In 1861, he joined the famous « Männergesangverein » as rehearsal accompanist and member of the solo quartet.

In 1869, he was appointed one of several co-directors (with, for example, Max von Weinzierl but, most importantly, Rudolph Weinwurm who was apparently principal conductor from 1880 to 1899) and, upon retirement, honoured as « emeritus » conductor. Kremser co-directed with Richard Heuberger (1850-1914) during the acclaimed American concert tour of 1907.

The Dresden Male Choral Society named him an honorary member.

The city of Vienna commissioned Kremser (with the assistance of Ludwig Gruber) to put together an anthology of Viennese music to preserve this traditional heritage. The Viennese citizens were invited to submit material. Manuscripts were handed to them. A wide-range of compositions was assembled from different periods, in addition to vocal music and instrumental music. From 1911 to 1925, 3 volumes of Viennese songs and dances were published. They are called : the Kremser albums (« Kremser Alben ») . They are among the most important collections of Viennese songs. At the end of the 1970's, the Opera and concert singer, Eberhard Kummer, interpreted many of these pieces through concerts and recordings. Since then, these songs were taken-up by several other artists.

Eduard Kremser was socially and politically involved. He was named vice-President and 1st Honorary Member of the Austrian Society of Authors, Composers and Publishers (« Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger ») . In 1910, he became Honorary Member of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien » . On 14 June 1913, he was elected President of the newly-founded Austrian Society of Composers (« Komponistenbund ») . Kremser was also assistant to the Court music-director Carl Michaël Ziehrer.

Works

Kremser gained notoriety for its effective treatment of 6 old Dutch folk-songs, including the Old Dutch thanksgiving « We come to pray » by Adriæn Valéry. He has also created even greater number of male choral works with orchestral accompaniment (old Christmas song, « Pictures of Balkans » , « Prince Eugen » , « Life is a dance ») , lieder, songs for mixed choirs, Operettas, and piano pieces.

Eduard Kremser (geboren 10. April 1838 in Wien ; gestorben 26. November 1914 ebenda) war ein österreichischer Komponist, Arrangeur und Dirigent. Große Bedeutung erwarb er sich als Sammler traditioneller Wienerlieder.

Der gebürtige Wiener Eduard Kremser wirkte von 1869 bis 1899 als Chormeister des Wiener Männergesangsvereins, der ihn später zum Ehrenchormeister ernannte. Der Dresdner Männergesangsverein ernannte ihn ebenfalls zum Ehrenmitglied. Bekanntheit erlangte Kremser durch seine wirkungsvolle Bearbeitung von sechs altniederländischen Volksliedern, darunter dem Altniederländischen Dankgebet Wir treten zum Beten von Adriaen Valéry. Er schuf zudem selbst mehrere größere Männerchorwerke mit Orchesterbegleitung (Altes Weihnachtslied, Balkanbilder, Prinz Eugen, Das Leben ein Tanz) , Gesänge für gemischten Chor, Operetten, Lieder und Klavierstücke.

Die Stadt Wien beauftragte ihn damit, einen Sammelband zur Wienermusik zusammenzustellen und herauszugeben, um dieses traditionelle Kulturgut zu bewahren. Gemeinsam mit Ludwig Gruber trug Kremser in der Folge eine Fülle von Kompositionen aus verschiedensten Zeiten zusammen, neben Vokalmusik auch Instrumentalmusik. Dabei fand auch lediglich handschriftlich überliefertes Eingang. Auch die Wiener Bürger waren aufgerufen worden, Material einzusenden. So entstanden zwischen 1911 und 1925 drei Bände Wiener Lieder und Tänze, kurz Kremser-Alben genannt. Sie gehören heute zu den wichtigsten Wienerliedsammlungen. Am Ende der 1970er Jahre hat der Opern- und Konzertsänger Eberhard Kummer zahlreiche Werke aus dieser Sammlung wiederentdeckt und bearbeitet und sie in Konzerten und Einspielungen präsentiert. Seither wurden die Lieder in diesen Alben von mehreren anderen Künstlern aufgegriffen und bearbeitet.

Daneben hat sich Kremser gesellschaftlich und standespolitisch engagiert. Er war Vizepräsident und erstes Ehrenmitglied der Gesellschaft der Autoren, Komponisten und Musikverleger (AKM) , ab 1910 Ehrenmitglied der traditionsreichen Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien und wurde am 14. Juni 1913 zum Präsidenten des neugegründeten Österreichischen Komponistenbunds gewählt ; Vizepräsident war Hofmusikdirektor Carl Michaël Ziehrer. Kremser hatte diese Ämter bis zu seinem Tod am 26. November 1914 inne. Seine Grabstätte auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof ist von der Stadt Wien zum Ehrengrab erklärt worden.

Studierte nach der Handelsakademie, die er auf Wunsch seiner Eltern besucht hatte, Klavier und Musiktheorie. Nach Tätigkeit bei der Wiener Liedertafel und dem Sängerverein Leopoldstadt wurde er 1861 Korrepetitor und Mitglied des Gesangquartetts des Wiener Männergesangvereins. Seit 1869 (1869-1899) Chormeister des Wiener Männergesangvereins, erregte Aufsehen durch seine wirkungsvolle Bearbeitung von sechs altniederländischen Volksliedern und schrieb eine Reihe größerer Männerchorwerke mit Orchester (« Balkanbilder » , « Prinz Eugen » , « Das Leben ein Tanz » , « Altes Weihnachtslied ») , Operetten, Gesänge für gemischten Chor, Lieder, Klaviersachen, etc. Sammelte und edierte traditionelle Wienerlieder (« Kremser-Alben ») . 1878-1880 war Kremser Konzertdirektor des Singvereins der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. 1897 bis zu seinem Tod Vizepräsident der neu gegründeten AKM, in deren Auftrag er Grundlagen für die Bewertung der Musikwerke, sohin deren Classification ausarbeitete. 1899-1910 als Ehrenchormeister (gemeinsam mit Rudolph Weinwurm beziehungsweise Max von Weinzierl) leitete ; 1910 legte er dieses Amt offiziell nieder, leitete jedoch noch weiterhin Konzerte. 1913-1914 auch erster Präsident des neu gegründeten Österreichischen Komponistenbundes, Nachfolger nach seinem Tod wurde Heinrich Reinhardt. Bekannt wurde Kremser durch sein Eintreten für das Wienerlied (« Kremser-Alben ») .

« At these concerts, I also listened to a Symphony of Bruckner. Beyond its “ heavenly length ”, I can remember nothing of it, except its conclusion. The Finale was cast in the shape of a formidably dull fugue and, as it showed signs of approaching its peroration, I thought to myself that, seldom or never, had I heard any orchestra pile-up such a prodigious volume of sound. It was at this precise moment that an army corps of brass instruments, which must have been crouching furtively behind the percussion, arose in their might and weighed-in over the top with a chorale, probably intended by the pious composer as an invocation to “ Der alte Deutsche Gott ”. The crash of silence at the sudden cessation of this din was as shattering upon the ears as the blow of a sand-bag. »

1907

4 janvier 1907 : Gustav Mahler conducts the Vienna premiere of his 6th Symphony, the last time he conducts that work. Having visited Breslau, Munich, Brünn, and Graz (twice) , at the end of 1906, to conduct his own Symphonies.

6 au 23 janvier 1907 : Gustav Mahler asks for 2 1/2 weeks leave to give further performances, and conducts his :

1st Symphony, in Reichenberg.

3rd Symphony, in Berlin (January 14th) .

4th Symphony, in Frankfurt.

1st, again, in Linz.

These extended absences are the catalyst for a heated campaign against Mahler in the Viennese press while he is gone, which will contribute to his decision to resign from the Vienna Opera, later in the year.

While Gustav Mahler is in Berlin, the 21 year old Otto Klemperer gets a chance to spend some time with him by showing him the way to Richard Strauß's home.

In America, Ferruccio Busoni learns of Thaddeus Cahill's « Telharmonium », a fore-runner of the synthesizer. This is an electric instrument which is capable of dividing the pitch-continuum in any desired way. It is a big inspiration to Busoni, who, after returning to Berlin, writes his little book « Sketch of a New Æsthetic of Music », in which he speculates on the most progressive musical ideas. In it, he examines possibilities for over 100 new scales which are different from the traditional major and minor, and also proposes 36-tET as a new tuning giving a mixture of 2 scales of « 3rd-tones » a semi-tone apart. The book is published, in January 1907, by Trieste publisher « Carlo Schmidl & Co. », printed in Berlin, and distributed by Busoni himself.

Janvier 1907 : Arnold Schœnberg's 8 Songs, Opus 6, are published by Dreililien.

Début 1907 : Arnold Schœnberg begins painting seriously.

1907 : Le chef Karl Muck dirige la première américaine de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, dans la version révisée de Ferdinand Löwe, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York.

5 février 1907 : The Rosé Quartet premieres Arnold Schœnberg's 1st String Quartet, in Vienna. (A few weeks later, the work is published by Dreililien, as his Opus 7.)

8 février 1907 : The Rosé Quartet premieres Arnold Schœnberg's 1st « Chamber Symphony », in Vienna.

The concerts provoke 2 of the most notorious scandals in Viennese concert history ; at both of them, Gustav Mahler loudly applauds amid the booing and hissing, and nearly gets into a fist-fight.

Mahler confesses to Alma after the « Chamber Symphony » performance that he, himself, can no longer follow Arnold Schœnberg's development. He blames it on his « old age » : 46 years. Mahler had gotten into an argument with Schœnberg, at one point, over whether or not it was possible to create a « Klangfarbenmelodie » (melody of tone colours : « timbres ») by constantly shifting the orchestration of a single note ; Schœnberg was to carry-out this idea, in 1909, in the 3rd of his « Funf Orchesterstücke ». With this dispute in mind, Mahler's remark about being too old to have an ear for Schœnberg's music was, perhaps, referring directly to his loss of the ability to hear high-frequencies, due to aging and daily exposure to the volume of 100 piece Orchestras. In any case, the logic in Schœnberg's thought and music are convincing, and Mahler continues to support him all the same.

Gustav Mahler's outspoken support of Arnold Schœnberg, at a time when Mahler feels the pressure of attacks from both other musicians and the press-critics, only makes his situation at the Vienna Opera House more difficult.

11 février 1907 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à Berlin la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans le cadre des « Concerts du Philharmonique » .

9 mars 1907 : Arnold Schœnberg completes his « Friede auf Erden », and also begins his 2nd String Quartet, then, writes the 2 Ballades, Opus 12 (« Der verlorene Haufen » - The lost heap ; and « Jane Grey ») , which he composes in hopes of winning a competition. Other than these few vocal pieces, since 1905, Schönberg has not written many settings of poetry, searching through a variety of poets without finding one with a large body of work to which he is sympathetic, as he had been earlier by Richard Dehmel.

Début mars 1907 : Arnold Schönberg interrupts work on the 2nd « Chamber Symphony » , to compose the choral work « Friede auf Erden » (Peace on Earth) , Opus 13. (Schönberg frequently visited Mahler during these years ; could he have been inspired to compose a piece for choir from knowledge of Mahler's most recent 8th Symphony ?)

Mars 1907 : Gustav Mahler secretly assigns a prominent role in an up-coming ballet to an unknown talented actress, Grete Wiesenthal, in defiance of the choice made by the ballet Master, Josef Haßreiter. This causes a rift between Mahler and Alfred, 2nd Prince of Montenuovo, the Court official who is in charge of the Opera, and who, up until now, has always supported Mahler. They secretly discuss the possibility of Mahler's resignation and, from this point on, Mahler steers his plans for the future in the direction of leaving Vienna.

29 mars 1907 (Vendredi-Saint) : Alban Berg talks Helene Nahowski's brother into orchestrating an official meeting. Helene's father does not approve of Berg but, after a difficult courtship, they will finally marry 4 years later. Under this heavy inspiration, Berg composes several songs, including « Die Nachtigall » .

Début du printemps 1907 : The 22 year old Alban Berg meets Helene Nahowski, who is the same age, and quickly falls in love with her.

Printemps 1907 : The 23 year old Anton Webern composes a Quintet for string quartet and piano. It is the earliest of his works for which he retains a fondness later in life and, for 20 years after his death, it is the only piece of Webern juvenilia that will be known, until the discovery of a large cache of manuscripts, in 1965.

Printemps 1907 : While visiting Vienna, on tour, Otto Klemperer gets a recommendation from Gustav Mahler which « will open all doors for me » , and he keeps it in his wallet for the rest of his long life. On Mahler's recommendation, Klemperer is appointed Chorus Master and, subsequently, conductor at the « Deutsches Landestheater » , in Prague, making his debut with Carl Maria von Weber's Opera, « Der Freischütz » .

26 avril 1907 : The composer and conductor Josef Hellmesberger, Junior, dies in Vienna at age 52.

Juin 1907 : In America, the 39 year old Scott Joplin leaves Saint-Louis, spends some time in Texarkana with his family, and in Chicago.

21 juin 1907 : The 35 year old Alexander von Zemlinsky marries Ida Gutmann.

1907 is a terrible year for Gustav Mahler :

After a 10 year reign as the Emperor of the artistic world in Europe, he finally tires of the anti-Semitic attacks and the hard work entailed by his position of responsibility and decides he's had enough of the Vienna intrigues to dethrone him. With a financially attractive offer from New York, he decides to leave his beloved Vienna and work in America, where he expects to make a large amount of money in a few short years and, then, retire to the Viennese country-side, so that he can devote the rest of his life to composing full-time. He faces this decision with an understandable mixture of happiness and regret.

Mahler and his family go to Maiernigg, on June 29th. Right at the beginning of their vacation, Mahler's eldest daughter Maria gets sick, and dies after a little more than a week, on July 12th, before reaching her 5th birthday. Maria meant much to Mahler, and his whole world crumbles. Bruno Walter later comments on this, saying that outwardly one cannot tell, but one who knows Mahler well can sense that inwardly he is « ganz fertig » (completely finished) . As if that weren't enough, his doctor discovers that Mahler, himself, has a serious heart problem, and the doctor advises drastic changes in Mahler's active lifestyle.

The Mahlers abandon their villa in Maiernigg forever, spending the rest of the summer in Schluderbach. Again, Mahler's music, this time the 6th Symphony, seems to have foretold tragic events in his life ; awareness of having had this premonition certainly does nothing to alleviate his suffering.

Alma says that Mahler finds some consolation in reading « Die chinesische Flöte » (The Chinese Flute) , Hans Bethge's German translation of the « T'ang » Dynasty Chinese poetry. Some of these poems become the basis of his next (and, in many ways, most beautiful) piece, « Das Lied von der Erde » (The Song of the Earth) , which Alma says he begins sketching in Schluderbach as summer ends. However, « The Chinese Flute » only appears in print on October 5th, after Mahler's return to Vienna (only 2 weeks before his trip to Russia and Finland) , and the manuscript evidence seems to confirm Alfred Roller's statement that :

« That summer (1907) yielded no artistic fruit. In the summer of 1908, his creative drive returned. »

The Mahlers will stay in Europe until early December, so, it is possible that Mahler reads the book and begins conceiving « Das Lied von der Erde » in his mind sometime during the autumn of 1907, in Vienna, particularly since the manuscript seems to show that the 1st piece to be composed the following summer (July 1908) is the one entitled « Der Einsame im Herbst » (The Lonely Man in Autumn) .

Juillet 1907 : Arnold Schœnberg resumes composition of both the 1st movement of his 2nd String Quartet, Opus 10, and the 2nd « Chamber Symphony » . He drafts most of the 1st and 2nd movements of the 2nd « Chamber Symphony » , and drafts the 1st and 2nd movements of the 2nd String Quartet ; at this point, he stops work on the Symphony (until the late-1930's) and continues with the String Quartet.

Juillet 1907 : Scott Joplin makes a big move to New York.

The 26 year old Béla Bartók becomes Professor of Piano at the Budapest Royal Academy, which allows him to stay in Hungary and continue his studies of local folk-songs, particular those from Transylvania.

1er septembre 1907 : The 1st movement of Arnold Schönberg's 2nd String Quartet, Opus 10, retains only the most tenuous links to tonality.

The 37 year old Oskar Straus composes his Operetta, « Waltz Dream » , which is a huge success. It is published by Ludwig Döblinger, in Vienna.

The 10 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold composes several waltzes and other piano pieces and songs. One of these is a Cantata entitled « Der Tod » (Death) , which he will utilize 2 years later as the opening piece (« Don Quixote's Dreams of Heroic Deeds ») of the Suite « Don Quixote : 6 Characteristic Pieces » , which his father Julius encourages Erich to write after he begins reading « Don Quixote » .

17 septembre 1907 : Ignaz Brüll dies in Vienna, at age 60.

Automne 1907 : In Vienna, plans for Gustav Mahler to become Director of the Conservatory collapse, since he decides to take the lucrative offer from New York. Mahler's friend, Guido Adler, who had been the primary force behind the proposed Conservatory re-organization, seeks to blame Alma's desire for a sumptuous lifestyle as the cause for Mahler's decision, but Mahler reassures him that he needs to make this move for his own reasons. Mahler's primary intention is to make as much money as possible in a few short seasons, so that he can build a house in the country close to Vienna, retire from conducting, and devote all of his time to composing.

3 octobre 1907 : Le chef Egon Victor Frensdorff (pseudonyme : Alfred Westarp) dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Le concert a lieu à la « Tonhalle » , auparavant appelée « Kaim-Saal » .

Brian Lamb, in the Netherlands, has sent to me an interesting old concert program. The title of the booklet is simply « Anton Bruckner Fuenfte Symphonie » . The author is given as Alfred Westarp. It contains about 40 pages of excerpts of the 5th Symphony with explanation notes. The booklet was to accompany a concert given in Munich, in 1907.

The inside cover of the booklet is signed by Victor Egon Frensdorf on October 15, 1907.

From a clipping pasted to the inside cover, it appears that the concert was not well received.

Further research (my thanks to Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt) indicates that Frensdorf was the actual author of this booklet and conductor of the concert. Alfred Westarp was a pseudonym that he used for this and other publications.

Mister Korstvedt continues by stating that :

« A couple of years ago, I came across a report in the “ Musikalischen Wochenblatt ” about a “ really nasty ” (“ recht böse ”) Bruckner concert in Munich, in late-1907, in which the “ Kaim Orchester ” performed Bruckner's Symphony No. 5 under the direction of Alfred Westarp, who is identified as the author of a “ peculiar interpretative essay that puts down in black and white a “ conception ” of this mighty work that so entirely loses the spirit of the music that one should hardly waste any words on it ”. In conjunction with the concert, Westarp apparently denounced Löwe and Schalk for “ falsifying ” Bruckner’s manuscript version of the score. Yet, in his performance, he “ turned everything on its head ” making fortissimi into pianissimi, etc. , in a “ downright unbelievable ” way. The reporter, Paul Ehlers, described it as a “ perverse presentation ” (which evidently placed the Trio before the Scherzo (!) , as is suggested in the booklet) that did more damage to Bruckner than anything Hanslick or Dömpke ever wrote.

The music examples in the brochure, which are based on the so-called Schalk version of the Symphony, but with extensive changes dynamics, articulations, phrasing, and expression markings, give some idea of how aggressively Westarp monkeyed with the Symphony. He willfully manipulated the character of many passages to fit his very idiosyncratic, fanciful idea of the Symphony's meaning. It is perverse - if, perhaps, interesting as a historical curiosity. »

Bernhard Stavenhagen

Le pianiste, compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Bernhard Stavenhagen est né le 24 novembre 1862 à Greiz, Reuss-Greiz, en Allemagne, et est mort d'une affection pulmonaire le 25 décembre 1914 à Genève, en Suisse. Après sa mort, son corps est transféré à Weimar, où se trouve son tombeau. Sa musique a été fortement influencée par Franz Liszt. En tant que chef d'orchestre, il a été un ardent défenseur de la musique nouvelle de son époque.

Stavenhagen commence l'étude du piano à 6 ans avec Wilhelm Urban (1868) . Sa famille s'installe à Berlin lorsqu'il a 12 ans, en 1874. Il est admis exceptionnellement à la « Hochschule für Musik » , en 1878. Il étudie la composition et la théorie (en leçons privées) avec Fiedrich Kiel et le piano avec Ernst Rudorff. En 1880, il reçoit le prix Mendelssohn (« Mendelssohn-Preis für ausübende Tonkunst ») couronnant ses études. Suivent une série de concerts à travers l'Allemagne.

En 1885, Stavenhagen devient un disciple de Franz Liszt à Weimar, qui le considère comme un de ses élèves préférés. Il voyage avec lui lors de tournées de récitals ou concerts, à Rome, Budapest, Paris, Londres et Bayreuth. Après la mort de Liszt, en 1886, Stavenhagen entreprend, sur une période d'une dizaine d'années, plusieurs tournées de concerts qui le mènent à travers l'Europe, en Russie et en Amérique du Nord. Il est considéré comme un des grands virtuoses de son temps.

En avril 1890, Stavenhagen est employé à la cour du Duc de Saxe-Weimar. En juillet de la même année, il épouse Agnès Denninghof (connue comme : Agnes Denis-Stavenhagen, 1860-1945), soprano à l'Opéra de la Cour de Weimar. En 1893, il compose son 3e Concerto pour piano en si mineur. Chef d'orchestre à Weimar, il est nommé « Kapellmeister », en 1895, en reconnaissance de ses mérites. Il y dirige les premières de 6 nouveaux Opéras sur une période de 18 mois.

Après avoir démissionné de ce poste en 1898, à cause des tracasseries des membres réactionnaires de la Cour, il décroche les mêmes fonctions à Munich, après seulement 6 mois d'activité - et ce, jusqu'en 1902. Dès 1901, il se consacre à l'éducation, dans une classe de Maîtrise à l'Académie de musique de Munich et assume la direction de l'institution, la ré-organisant complètement.

En 1907, il s'installe à Genève et prend en charge les classes de piano au Conservatoire (où Liszt avait lui aussi enseigné) jusqu'à sa mort, en 1914. Il dirige l'Orchestre municipale lors des concerts d'abonnement, et donne les Ires exécutions d'œuvres de Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schœnberg, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel et Paul Dukas.

L'école de musique à Greiz, sa ville natale, porte son nom depuis 1980.

L'œuvre de Stavenhagen, qu'il considérait comme secondaire parmi toutes ses activités artistiques, est peu abondante. Les Concertos étaient souvent interprétés par ses élèves ou lui-même, avant sa disparition. Les Lieder sont dans la droite filiation de Franz Schubert jusqu'à Gustav Mahler, avec des textes au Romantisme sensible.

Parmi ses « enregistrements » sur rouleaux (procédé Welte-Mignon), on trouve une interprétation de la « Rhapsodie hongroise », Opus 122 (de 1905). Cet enregistrement suggère ce qu'il avait entendu lorsque Franz Liszt jouait la même pièce. Outre Liszt, il était réputé comme interprète de Frédéric Chopin : on retrouve (toujours sur un piano Welte-Mignon) le 5e des 6 « Chants polonais », « Mein Freuden », et la « Mélodie polonaise », Opus 74, n° 5 (dite « Gdzie lubi ») dans un arrangement de Liszt ; ainsi que Beethoven. Le critique musical viennois Eduard Hanslick le considère comme un pianiste hors-pair.

Bernhard Stavenhagen : Franz Liszt disciple, Court pianist, and conductor who was a strong supporter of preserving Liszt's legacy and debuting new composers.

He was one of Franz Liszt's pupils and confidantes, traveling with him around the world. He claimed that his Welte-Mignon piano-roll recording of the « Hungarian Rhapsody » No. 12 was a precise reflection of how Liszt had played it.

He became Court pianist, in April 1890, to the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar.

He married a soprano in the Weimar Court Opera, Agnes Denninghof, in July 1890.

He premiered the works of many composers as a conductor, including Claude Debussy.

...

The German pianist, composer and conductor Bernhard Stavenhagen was born on 24 November 1862, in Greiz, Reuss-Greiz (Germany) and died on 25 December 1914 in Geneva (Switzerland) . He played in the virtuoso style of Franz Liszt.

His 1st music education took place in his native town under Wilhelm Urban ; at the age of 12, when his family moved to Berlin, he studied with Theodor Kullak and was exceptionally admitted to the « Hochschule für Musik » , in 1878, where he studied composition and theory with Friedrich Kiel and piano with Ernst Rudorff. Being an offspring of Reinecke's piano school, Rudorff had a rather conservative approach to piano technique, promoting the principle of the « calm hand » . During his Berlin period, Stavenhagen was awarded the Mendelssohn Prize for his pianistic activity (1880) .

After the success in Berlin of Liszt's students, Arthur Friedheim and Eugène d'Albert, Stavenhagen moved to Weimar in 1885, where he soon became one of Liszt's favourite students. There, he established friendly relationships with other students of Liszt, including Moritz Rosenthal, Emil Sauer and Arthur Friedheim, with whom he visited Xaver Scharwenka in Leipzig. He followed the Master in most of his last journeys (including those to Rome, Budapest, Paris, London and Bayreuth) , acting as his secretary but also performing many of his works in important venues. Their friendship is documented by several photographs which show the intense affection between the old Master and his young student, who was later to write interesting memories about Liszt's performance and teaching, and to record a few of Liszt's piano works, among others the « Hungarian Rhapsody » No. 12 ; on several of these rolls, he added the remark « according to personal memory of Liszt » (1905) . His performance of Wagner/Liszt's « Isolde Liebestod » is an important document of the practice of a synchronization of both hands in piano performance of the late-Romantic Era, although Rattalino heavily criticizes the nature and extent of Stavenhagen's interventions on the text, in the virtuoso style, as documented by his surviving recordings.

On April 10th, 1886, Stavenhagen was chosen as the soloist in Liszt's 1st Piano Concerto during an all-Liszt programme at London's Crystal Palace, which was followed, 6 days later, by a Liszt-marathon for solo piano marking Stavenhagen's solo debut in London. The impressive programme (especially in consideration of the pianist's young age at that time : he was only 23 years old) included : « Funérailles » , « Sposalizio » , the « BACH Fantasy and Fugue » , both « Legends » , 2 Paganini « Études » , a « Petrarch Sonnet » and the « Huguenots Fantasy » . This programme was considered as standing at the crossroads of « 2 cultures, combining “ abstract ” pieces, studies and transcriptions » . When Liszt died on July 31st of the very same year, Stavenhagen was at his bedside, and he read the funeral oration at the Master's memorial service. He was later to edit many works by Liszt, and it was Stavenhagen who gave the title « Malédiction » to the work by Liszt which is now known with this name.

The following 10 years saw Stavenhagen touring central Europe, Russia and North America : he performed the « Konzertstück » by Carl Maria von Weber at the Crystal Palace, in 1886, being praised for his « rare technical ability » . However, there is a funny anecdote about Stavenhagen's habit of changing the titles of the pieces he played more often. When asked by a young lady to write a line on her autograph books, Stavenhagen turned to Rosenthal for inspiration, and he acidly suggested that Stavenhagen, having to write just one line, could simply write down his repertoire. Already, in 1887, he was invited again to London to perform Liszt's 1st Concerto at the Crystal Palace :

Stavenhagen gradually became one of the most important international virtuosos of his time and was particularly appreciated for his Chopin interpretations : for Eduard Hanslick, he was simply « the perfect pianist » , and he was highly-appreciated by Hans von Bülow, who conducted him in Beethoven's 3rd Piano Concerto (19 and 23 January 1899) , in a programme featuring works by Georges Bizet, Richard Strauß, Richard Wagner, Camille Saint-Saëns and a few of Liszt's solo piano works performed by Stavenhagen. The cadenzas written by Stavenhagen for Beethoven's 2nd and 3rd Piano Concertos were highly-appreciated at his time and are sometimes used by pianist until now.

In 1890 (the year of his marriage with singer Agnes Denninghof, 1860-1945) , the 1st important official recognition came for Stavenhagen, who was appointed the Court Pianist to the Grand Duke of Weimar and received the Order of the White Falcon, 2 years later ; in 1895, he became « Kapellmeister » of the « Hofoper » , where he premiered 6 new Operas within 18 months : such artistic choices, which promoted many works of contemporary composers elicited strong disagreement, and eventually led to his resigning in 1898. The very same year, however, he became Court Music Director in Munich, following Richard Strauß's directorship, and maintained the appointment until 1902.

In 1901, he had become Director of the « Akademie der Tonkunst » in Munich, following Karl Freiherr von Perfall's directorship and preceding Felix Mottl and Hans Bussmeyer ; here, he taught many students who were to constitute the next generation of performers and conductors, among which Ernest Hutcheson and Édouard Risler, thus handing down the Lisztean tradition into the 20th Century. Having left the post in Munich in 1903, from 1904 to 1907, he was active as a conductor and music-director in Weimar, and later in Geneva, where he also became director of the piano Master-class at the Conservatory. In Geneva, too, he continued his activity in favour of contemporary music, with works by Richard Strauß, Antonín Dvořák, Hans Pfitzner, Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Paul Dukas, Ferruccio Busoni (who was a good friend of Stavenhagen) , Mily Balakirev, Sergei Taneev and Arnold Schönberg, among others. Under Stavenhagen's management, which was defined as « splendid » , the « Popular Concerts » at Geneva had become « a veritable school of musical education » .

His interest in contemporary works is demonstrated by Stavenhagen's foundation of the « Moderne Abende » , a cycle of concerts featuring modern works ; the effectiveness of his activity for the promotion of new music is demonstrated by Carl Orff's enthusiasm after having listened to Claude Debussy's « Nocturnes » . He had also been interested in Alexander Scriabin's works, and had been one of the 1st to perform Johannes Brahms's Opus 116 : Stavenhagen's mother-in-law had been a good friend of Brahms during their youth. Stavenhagen remained in Geneva until his untimely death by pneumonia, in 1914 ; his body was later transferred to Weimar, and buried there.

Although reminiscences of most of the greatest composers of his time are discernible in Stavenhagen's compositional output, undeniably the impact of Liszt's style was the strongest and most influential : his Piano Concerto in B minor, Opus 4, is a perfect example of how the principles of cyclic form and thematic/motivic elaboration had a strong impact on Stavenhagen's style. For Maurice Hinson, it is an « impassioned transposition of the spirit of the Liszt Symphonic poem to the 3 movement Concerto format » . This Concerto, composed in 1893, was the 1st of 3 composed by Stavenhagen ; however, one of them is lost, and the other survives as a 2 piano reduction manuscript. The Concerto was performed together with Gustav Mahler's 1st Symphony at one of the very 1st performances of the « Titan » on 3 June 1894, in Weimar, during a gigantic concert in which other works by Franz Liszt, Anton Rubinstein, Richard Wagner and Hans von Bülow were performed. Stavenhagen, as reported by his former student Klaus Pringsheim, had been one of the 1st German conductors who actively promoted the music by Gustav Mahler.

This Concerto is close in style to those by Christian Sinding (Opus 6) and Moritz Moszkowski (Opus 59) ; it was published in 1904 by Ries & Erler and Edwin A. Fleischer, lasting approximately 25 minutes. Hinson appreciates particularly the « complex harmonic and structural scheme » which « is cleverly carried-out » , as well as the « memorable » melodies, especially the « lofty, widespread, almost Brahmsian main idea, which threads through the 2 outer movements » . Stavenhagen's Concerto was recorded by the American pianist Michael Ponti in the 1970's for « Vox » , with other Concertos by late-Romantic composers. This work, featuring a large Orchestra which is masterfully exploited by Stavenhagen in a very refined orchestration, is in a highly-virtuoso style which explores the whole range of technical options of the post-Lisztian pianism. Although the work is clearly indebted to Liszt both concerning the formal organization (evidently inspired by Liszt's B minor Sonata) as well as the motivic elaboration, Stavenhagen succeeds in reconciling the « modern » approach with elements derived from the style of Johannes Brahms.

Throughout the Concerto, an extensive emotional palette is employed by the composer, ranging from the solemn pathos of the opening motif to moments of genuine playfulness, from an important fugato and Baroque-like section to episodes of pure tenderness and religious mysticism.

The 2nd movement, in particular, includes a beautiful chorale which clearly refers to the slow movement of Brahms' 1st Piano Concerto, and which alludes to the Romantic idea of the Baroque style. Among the numerous exquisite ideas of this piece, Stavenhagen inserted a quotation of Richard Wagner's « Isolden Liebestod » , which was, incidentally, a favourite of his own concert repertoire in Liszt's transcription. The Leitmotif technique is extensively used by Stavenhagen and gives extraordinary unity to the Concerto. The 3rd movement, which acts as the « recapitulation » in the gigantic Sonata form of the Concerto, is therefore strictly linked to the 1st movement ; it is characterized by a frequent use of chromaticism, often highlighted by octave scales in the piano part, and by many quotations from the preceding movements, including a dreamy fragment inspired by the 2nd movement's atmosphere.

Stavenhagen here employs an impressive range of modulations, some of which are extremely skilful ; in the final Coda, the homage to the close of Brahms's 2nd Concerto could not be more evident and, once more, acts as an ideal link between the apparently opposing worlds of Liszt and Brahms.

Bernhard Stavenhagen was a German pianist, composer and conductor. His musical style was influenced by Franz Liszt, and as a conductor he was a strong advocate of new music.

Born in Greiz, he commenced piano study in 1868. His family moved to Berlin in 1874 where he began studying with Theodor Kullak. He entered University there, in 1878, privately studying composition with Friedrich Kiel.

In 1885, Stavenhagen became a pupil of Franz Liszt in Weimar, travelling with him to Rome, Budapest, Paris, London and Bayreuth. After Liszt's death, in 1886, Stavenhagen embarked on a 10 year series of piano concert tours in Europe and to North America. In April 1890, he was appointed Court pianist to the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar and, the following July, he married Agnes Denninghof (better known as Agnes Denis-Stavenhagen, 1860-1945), a soprano with the Weimar Court Opera. In 1893, he composed his 3rd Piano Concerto in B minor.

He fulfilled conducting appointments in Weimar, where he was appointed Court « Kapellmeister » and conducted Weimar premieres of 6 new Operas in 18 months and, from 1898, a similar appointment in Munich. Then, in 1907, he moved to Geneva, taking-over the piano Master-classes at the Conservatoire there, until his death in 1914. In subscription concerts, he conducted premieres of works by composers ranging from Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner and Gustav Mahler to Arnold Schœnberg, Ernest Bloch, Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel.

After his death, his body was transferred to Weimar where he was buried.

The house where Bernhard Stavenhagen was born is located on the corner of Von-Westernhagen-Square and Brauhausgasse. Around the turn of the 19th Century, he was a well-known personality in the international music scene, and has gone down in the annals of music history as a Master student of Franz Liszt, an outstanding pianist and composer. Every November, the City of Greiz holds the Stavenhagen Competition in his honour. The city's music school carries his name.

Among his piano-roll recordings is a performance of Franz Liszt's « Hungarian Rhapsody » No. 12 ; he annotated this recording to suggest that it was how he had heard Liszt play it.

Bernhard Stavenhagen was one of Franz Liszt's last pupils (1885-1886) and gave the oration at Liszt's funeral in Bayreuth. From 1886 to 1900, he toured most European countries and America. He was Court conductor at Weimar from 1895 to 1898, and at the Munich Opera, from 1898 to 1907. From 1907 until his death, he taught piano at the Geneva Conservatory and conducted the Municipal Orchestra of that city. He was known for his interpretation of the works of Frédéric Chopin, and his cadenzas for Ludwig van Beethoven's 2nd and 3rd Piano Concertos are still played occasionally today.

...

German pianist, who was born at Greiz. Stavenhagen began his musical studies at an early age. His 1st teacher was Professor Rudolf, who had charge of him until he was 12, when he entered the Berlin High-School, where he pursued his studies under Frederick Kiel and Ernst Rudorff, and gained the Mendelssohn prize for harmony and thorough-bass. In 1885, he went to Franz Liszt at Weimar, and remained with him until Liszt's death, in 1886. Liszt took a deep interest in him and, from him, Stavenhagen learned much of his style of playing. He accompanied Liszt to England on his last tour in 1886, also to Rome, Budapest, Paris and to Bayreuth, where Liszt died. Stavenhagen has made many successful tours through Europe, playing with striking success at Crystal Palace and at Prince's Hall, in London, and in other cities in Great Britain and on the European Continent. He met with less success as a pianist than his talents deserved, although his playing was greatly admired. He was appointed Court pianist to the Grand Duke of Saxe-

Weimar, and succeeded Eugène d'Albert as Court conductor at Weimar and, since 1898, has been Court conductor at Munich and director of the Royal Academy of Music at Munich. Stavenhagen has gained a great reputation as a conductor since giving-up his career of pianist.

Bernhard Stavenhagen was a pupil of Frederick Kiel, at the « Meisterschule » , and of Ernst Rudorff, at the « Hochschule » , in Berlin, where he won the Mendelssohn prize for pianoforte playing in 1880.

He remained in Berlin for 5 years but, eventually, went to Weimar where he became a favorite pupil of Franz Liszt. He remained with Liszt, accompanying him on all his tours, until Liszt died in Weimar.

In 1890, Stavenhagen became Court pianist to the Grand Duke at Weimar and, in 1895, he became « Kapellmeister » .

Stavenhagen left Weimar in 1898 to go to Munich, as « Kapellmeister » , and was eventually elected director of the Royal Academy (1901) in that city.

In 1904, however, he retired and returned to Weimar, where lived as a teacher, pianist, and conductor.

He made several brilliantly successful piano tours through Germany, Austria, Hungary, France, Holland, England and the United States (1894-1895) .

Stavenhagen has composed a few piano pieces, of which the best-known are the « Caprice » and the « Menuetto Scherzando » .

He was an intellectual pianist of a very high-order, and is undoubtedly one of the most brilliant of the Liszt pupils.

Bernhard Stavenhagen (geboren 24. November 1862 in Greiz ; gestorben 25. Dezember 1914 in Genf) war ein deutscher Komponist und Pianist.

Stavenhagen erhielt ersten Klavierunterricht durch Theodor Kullak und studierte dann bei Ernst Rudorff Klavier und bei Friedrich Kiel Musiktheorie und Komposition. Im Jahr 1879 wurde er für sein Klavierkonzert in C-Dur mit dem Mendelssohn-Preis ausgezeichnet. 1885 ging Stavenhagen nach Weimar, um bei Franz Liszt zu studieren und diesen nach Rom, Budapest, Paris, London und Bayreuth zu begleiten. Er gilt als Liszts letzter und bedeutendster Schüler und hielt auch 1886 dessen Grabrede. Nach Aussage von Zeitgenossen stand sein Spiel dem seines Lehrers Liszt am nächsten.

In den folgenden zehn Jahren unternahm er Konzertreisen durch Europa und Nordamerika. 1890 wurde er zum Hofpianisten des Großherzogs von Sachsen-Weimar ernannt, 1894 zum Hofkapellmeister. Im Juli 1890 heiratete er in Weimar Agnes Denninghoff, eine Sopranistin am Weimarer Hoftheater.[1] 1898 wurde er Kapellmeister am Münchener Hoftheater, 1899 königlicher Hofkapellmeister. Von 1901 bis 1904 war er Direktor der Akademie der Tonkunst. [2]

1907 übersiedelte er nach Genf, wo er bis 1914 die Meisterklassen für Klavier am Konservatorium leitete. Sein Nachfolger wurde José Vianna da Motta.

Als Dirigent der Abonnementskonzerte brachte er die Ur- und Erstaufführungen zahlreicher Werke und andere von Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Gabriel Fauré, Sergei Tanejew, Mili Balakirew und Ernest Bloch zur Aufführung. Er galt als Verfechter zeitgenössischer Musik.

Sein Klavierspiel ist mit Hilfe des Welte-Mignon-Verfahrens für die Nachwelt konserviert worden.

Sein Leichnam wurde in Weimar beigesetzt.

Im Jahr 1980 wurde die Musikschule (jetzt Kreismusikschule) Greiz nach Stavenhagen benannt.

Bernhard Stavenhagen wurde am 24. November 1862 in Greiz geboren. Seine erste musikalische Ausbildung erhielt er in seiner Geburtsstadt von Wilhelm Urban ; im Alter von 12 Jahren, nach dem Umzug seiner Familie nach Berlin, wurde er zunächst von Theodor Kullak unterrichtet und war an der dortigen Hochschule sehr anerkannt. Dort studierte er Komposition und Theorie bei Friedrich Kiel sowie Klavier bei Ernst Rudorff, der als Anhänger der Schule Reineckes eher einen konservativen Ansatz der Klaviertechnik vertrat und das Prinzip der « ruhigen Hand » förderte. Während seiner Zeit in Berlin wurde Stavenhagen der Mendelssohn - Preis für seine pianistischen Aktivitäten verliehen (1880) .

Nach dem Berliner Erfolg der Liszt-Schüler Arthur Friedheim und Eugene d'Albert zog Stavenhagen 1885 nach Weimar, wo er schnell einer von Liszts Lieblingsschülern wurde. Dort ging er freundschaftliche Beziehungen mit anderen Liszt-Schülern wie zum Beispiel Moritz Rosenthal, Emil Sauer und Arthur Friedheim ein ; mit letzterem stattete er Xaver Scharwenka in Leipzig einen Besuch ab. Er begleitete seinen Lehrer bei den vielen seiner späten Reisen (und andere Rom, Budapest, Paris, London und Bayreuth) , war sein Sekretär, führte aber auch viele Werke Liszts bei wichtigen Veranstaltungen auf. Die Freundschaft wurde durch zahlreiche Fotos dokumentiert, die die starke Zuneigung zwischen dem alten Lehrer und dem jungen Studenten zeigen. Stavenhagen schrieb später interessante Memoiren über Liszt's Aufführungen und seinen Unterricht und spielte einige von Liszt's Klavierwerken ein, darunter die Ungarische Rhapsodie Nr. 12 ; bei einigen dieser Aufnahmen merkte er « nach Liszt's eigener Erinnerung » an (1905) . Seine Aufführung von Wagner/Liszts Isoldes Liebestod ist ein bedeutendes Dokument für die Anwendung des asynchronen Gebrauchs beider Hände in der Klavierliteratur der Spätromantik I, obwohl Rattalino Art und Ausmaß von Stavenhagen's Eingriffen in den Text, wie sie in den erhaltenen Aufnahmen dokumentiert sind, stark kritisiert.

Am 10. April 1886 spielte Stavenhagen den Solopart in Liszt's. Klavierkonzert während eines reinen Liszt-Konzertprogrammes im Crystal Palace in London. Sechs Tage später gab Stavenhagen mit einem Liszt-Marathon-Klavierabend sein Solodebüt in London. Das eindrucksvolle Programm, insbesondere in Anbetracht des jugendlichen Alters des Pianisten (er war zu diesem Zeitpunkt erst 23 Jahre alt) beinhaltete « Funérailles » , Sposalizio, die BACH-Fantasie und Fuge, beide Legenden, zwei Paganini-Etüden, ein Petrarca-Sonnett und die Hugenotten-Fantasie. Dieses Programm galt als Wegscheide zwischen « zwei Kulturen, die “ abstrakte ” Stücke, Studien und Transkriptionen miteinander kombinieren » . Als Liszt am 31. Juli desselben Jahres starb, saß Stavenhagen am Sterbebett ; auch hielt er die Traueransprache bei Liszt's Gedenkgottesdienst. Stavenhagen edierte zahlreiche Werke Liszt's. Er war es, der Liszts Komposition Malédiction ihren Namen gab.

Die folgenden zehn Jahre reiste Stavenhagen durch Europa, Russland und Nordamerika. Er führte das Konzertstück von Weber 1886 im Crystal Palace auf und wurde für sein « außergewöhnliches technisches Können » gefeiert. Indessen gibt es eine lustige Anekdote über Stavenhagen's Angewohnheit, Titel von Stücken, die er häufiger spielte, zu ändern. Als er von einer jungen Dame gebeten wurde, eine Zeile in ihr Autogrammbuch zu schreiben, wandte sich Stavenhagen zur Inspiration an Rosenthal, der säuerlich vorschlug, daß Stavenhagen, wenn er nur eine Zeile schreiben dürfe, einfach nur sein Repertoire notieren könne. 4 Schon 1887 wurde er erneut nach London eingeladen, um Liszt's I. Klavierkonzert im Crystal Palace aufzuführen. Allmählich wurde Stavenhagen einer der bedeutendsten Virtuosen seiner Zeit, der besonders für seine Chopin-Interpretationen geschätzt wurde. Für Hanslick war er einfach « der perfekte Pianist ». Auch Hans von Bülow schätzte ihn sehr und dirigierte ihn in Beethoven's Drittem Klavierkonzert (19. und 23. Januar 1899) . Das Programm enthielt zudem Werke von Georges Bizet, Richard Strauß, Richard Wagner, Camille Saint-Saëns sowie einige von Liszt's Kompositionen für Klavier solo, die Stavenhagen spielte. Seine Kadenzen zum zweiten und dritten Klavierkonzert von Beethoven waren zu seiner Zeit hochgeschätzt und werden noch bis heute von Pianisten eingesetzt.

1890 (im Jahr seiner Hochzeit mit der Sängerin Agnes Denninghof - 1860-1945) erhielt Stavenhagen seine erste wichtige Anstellung als Hofpianist beim Großherzog von Weimar, zwei Jahre später wurde ihm der Hausorden vom Weißen Falken verliehen. 1895 ernannte man ihn zum Kapellmeister der Hofoper, an der er innerhalb von achtzehn Monaten sechs neue Opern uraufführte. Derlei künstlerische Entscheidungen, die Aufführungen zahlreicher Werke zeitgenössischer Komponisten zu fördern, riefen heftige Unstimmigkeiten hervor und führten letztendlich 1898 zu seinem Rücktritt. Noch im gleichen Jahr wurde er als Nachfolger von Richard Strauß Hofmusikdirektor in München und behielt diese Anstellung bis 1902. 1901 wurde er in Nachfolge von Perfall und als Vorgänger von Felix Mottl und Hans Bussmeyer Direktor der Akademie der Tonkunst in München. Hier unterrichtete er viele Studenten, die die nachfolgende Generation von Musikern und Dirigenten bildeten (zum Beispiel Ernest Hutcheson und Édouard Risler, die somit die Traditionen Liszts ins 20. Jahrhundert hinübertrugen) . Nachdem er diese Stellung 1903 verlassen hatte, war er von 1904 bis 1907 Dirigent und Musikdirektor in Weimar und später in Genf, wo er ebenfalls Leiter der Klavier-Meisterklasse des Konservatoriums wurde. Auch in Genf engagierte er sich weiterhin für zeitgenössische Musik mit Werken von Richard Strauß, Antonín Dvořák, Hans Pfitzner, Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Paul Dukas, Ferruccio Busoni (der ein guter Freund Stavenhagens war) , Mily Balakirev, Sergeij Taneev und Arnold Schönberg. Unter Stavenhagens Leitung, die als « hervorragend » bezeichnet wurde, entwickelten sich die Abonnementskonzerte in Genf zu « einer echten Schule für musikalische Erziehung » . Sein Interesse an zeitgenössischen Werken schlug sich auch in der Gründung der Modernen Abende nieder, einem Konzertzyklus mit aktuellen Werken ; die Wirkung seiner Förderung der neuen Musik zeigt auch an Carl Orffs Enthusiasmus, nachdem dieser eine Aufführung von Debussys Nocturnes gehört hatte. Darüberhinaus zeigte Stavenhagen Interesse an den Werken Scriabins, und war einer der ersten, der Brahms' Opus 116 aufführte (Stavenhagens Schwiegermutter war eine enge Jugendfreundin Brahms') . Stavenhagen blieb bis zu seinem frühzeitigen Tod 1914 (er starb an einer Lungenentzündung) in Genf. Seine sterblichen Überreste wurden später nach Weimar überführt und dort beigesetzt.

Obwohl Reminiszenzen an die meisten großen Komponisten seiner Zeit in Stavenhagens Kompositionen unverkennbar sind, sind die Auswirkungen des Lisztschen Stils zweifellos die stärksten und einflussreichsten. Sein Klavierkonzert in H-Moll, Opus 4, ist ein exzellentes Beispiel dafür, wie Prinzipien der zyklischen Form und thematisch-motivische Ausarbeitung starke Auswirkungen auf Stavenhagens Stil hatten. Für Hinson ist es eine « leidenschaftliche Transposition des Geistes der Lisztschen Sinfonischen Dichtung in die drei Sätze der Konzertform » . Dieses Konzert, 1893 komponiert, ist das erste von dreien aus der Feder Stavenhagens ; allerdings ist eines davon verschollen und das andere nur als Manuskript in der Fassung für zwei Klaviere überliefert.

Das Klavierkonzert Opus 4 wurde zusammen mit der Ersten Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler bei einer der ersten Aufführungen des Titan (3. Juni 1894 in Weimar) gemeinsam mit Werken von Franz Liszt, Anton Rubinstein, Richard Wagner und Hans von Bülow gespielt. Stavenhagen war, so berichtete sein ehemaliger Schüler Klaus Pringsheim, einer der ersten deutschen Dirigenten, der aktiv die Musik Gustav Mahlers unterstützte. Das Konzert ist nah am Stil der Werke von Christian Sinding (Opus 6) und Moritz Moszkowski (Opus 59) . Es wurde 1904 von Ries & Erler sowie Edwin A. Fleischer veröffentlicht und dauert circa 25 Minuten. Maurice Hinson schätzte besonders « die komplexe Harmonik sowie die kluge strukturelle Anlage » und die « einprägsamen » Melodien, insbesondere die « weite, erhabene, fast brahmsische Hauptidee, die sie in den beiden Außensätzen wiederfindet » . Stavenhagens Konzert wurde in den 1970er Jahren vom amerikanischen Pianisten Michaël Pontin zusammen mit weiteren Konzerten spätromantischer Komponisten für Vox eingespielt.

Das Werk erfordert ein großes Orchester, welches Stavenhagen meisterhaft mit äußerst raffinierten Orchestrierung einsetzt. Der hochvirtuose Stil nutzt die gesamte Bandbreite technischer Möglichkeiten der Post-Lisztschen Klavierkunst. Obwohl das Werk formal (offensichtlich von Franz Liszt's H-Moll Sonate inspiriert) als auch in motivischer Verarbeitung eindeutig Liszt verpflichtet ist, gelingt Stavenhagen die Verbindung eines « modernen » Ansatzes mit Elementen, die von Johannes Brahms abgeleitet sind. Durch das Konzert hindurch verwendet der Komponist eine große Palette emotionaler Ausdrucksformen, vom feierlichen Pathos des Eröffnungsmotivs bis hin zu Momenten genuiner Verspieltheit, von einem bedeutenden Fugato und barocken Abschnitten bis hin zu Episoden reiner Zärtlichkeit und religiöser Mystik. Insbesondere der zweite Satz enthält einen schönen Choral, der sich eindeutig auf den langsamen Satz von Brahms' erstem Klavierkonzert bezieht und der auf die romantische Idee im barocken Stil anspielt. Unter den zahllosen erlesenen Ideen fügte Stavenhagen ein Zitat von Richard Wagners Isolde Liebestod ein, das übrigens in der Transkription von Liszt ein Favorit in seinen eigenen Konzertprogrammen war. Die Leitmotivtechnik wird von Stavenhagen ausgiebig eingesetzt und gibt dem Konzert eine außergewöhnliche Geschlossenheit. Der dritte Satz, der die Reprise des Konzertes in einer riesigen Sonatenform darstellt, ist deshalb streng mit dem ersten Satz verbunden. Er ist durch den häufigen Gebrauch von Chromatik, oft hervorgehoben durch Oktav-Tonleitern im Klavierpart sowie viele Zitate aus den vorhergehenden Sätzen einschließlich eines verträumten Fragments, das durch die Atmosphäre des zweiten Satzes inspiriert ist, gekennzeichnet. Stavenhagen setzt hier eine eindrucksvolle Bandbreite von Modulationen ein, von denen einige sehr geschickt sind. In der abschließenden Coda könnte die Hommage an den Schluß von Brahms' zweitem Klavierkonzert nicht offensichtlicher sein und fungiert erneut als ideale Verbindung zwischen den scheinbar gegensätzlichen Welten von Liszt und Brahms.

9 décembre 1907 : Mahler and Alma depart Vienna triumphantly to spend their 1st season in America. An impromptu gathering of admirers, mainly made-up of Schönberg's students, sees them off at the train station. They travel to Paris where they spend a few days, then, sail during the middle-weeks of the month.

Felix Weingartner succeeds Gustav Mahler as Director of the Vienna Court Opera. He retained the conductorship of the Vienna Philharmonic until 1927.

Arnold Schönberg feels a serious sense of loss with Gustav Mahler's departure from Vienna, as it was mainly Mahler who supported the work of him and his pupils ; this is a large part of the even bigger crisis experienced by Schönberg over the next year. It seems very possible that Schönberg is aware of Mahler's association of the tune « Ach, du lieber Augustin » (Ah, you dear Augustine) with tragedy, as Schönberg quotes a deliberately distorted version of this tune at the point where he writes « all is lost » in the score of the 2nd movement of his 2nd String Quartet, on which he is currently working - could this even be a personal message from Schönberg to Mahler ?

At the same time, without Mahler around to criticize his ideas, Schönberg suddenly feels the confidence to realize a new ideal of expression that he's had in mind, and finally finding a poet with whose work he feels a great deal of sympathy, he becomes strongly inspired by the style of Stefan George's poetry.

17 décembre 1907 : While Mahler and Alma are on the ship to America, Schönberg composes the 1st of his many settings of Stefan George poems, and the 1st piece to really display the hallmarks of « atonality » : « Ich darf nicht denkend » , the 1st of 2 Songs, Opus 14.

1er janvier 1908 : Gustav Mahler makes his « Metropolitan » Opera debut, in New York, conducting Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » .

Austria formally annexes its colony of Bosnia-Herzegovina, making it fully a province of the Austrian Empire.

2 février 1908 : Arnold Schönberg composes « In diesen Wintertagen » , the 2nd of the 2 Songs, Opus 14, in a style reminiscent of his earlier tonal work. The 2nd movement of the 2nd String Quartet is mostly drafted by now, and he begins sketching the 3rd and 4th movements, which eventually will each employ a vocal part, setting Stefan George's « Litanei » (Litany) and « Entrückung » (Rapture) , respectively. These 2 movements are originally planned to be in the reverse order in which they will eventually appear in the Quartet.

Février 1908 : Just before his 27th birthday, Béla Bartók embraces pantheism, which causes Stefi Geyer to break-off her relationship with him. Bartók contemplates suicide, then, pours his emotions into his 1st String Quartet, written during the latter part of the year. This is also his 1st major composition to show the influence of his studies into Hungarian, Romanian, and Slovak folk-songs.

16 février 1908 : Over in America, Gustav Mahler witnesses the funeral of a fireman from his 11th floor apartment, in New York. A single loud drum-stroke, which is muffled by the time it reaches Mahler's ears, leaves such an impression on him that, 2 years later, he will write it into his 10th Symphony.

5 mars 1908 : The « New York Age » newspaper publishes an article about Scott Joplin and his work on his Opera, « Treemonisha » . In a later interview, Gustav Mahler discusses « Negro music » and denounces its claim as « American folk-music » , which seems to indicate that he was, at least, a little familiar with « ragtime » . Given his old habit of reading newspaper reviews of his concerts, it's quite likely that Mahler could have read articles about Joplin in the New York papers.

At this point, the poetry of Stefan George has become a big inspiration for Arnold Schönberg.

Mars 1908 : Arnold Schönberg begins setting a non-cyclical group of 4 Stefan George poems from the cycle « Das Buch der hängenden Gärten » (Book of the Hanging Gardens) which will later be expanded into his Opus 15 :

« Da meine Lippen » (There my lips) , Opus 15, No. 4.

« Saget mir » (Say to me) , Opus 15, No. 5.

« Als Neuling trat ich » (As a beginner I stepped) , Opus 15, No. 3.

« Wenn ich heut nicht deinen Leib » (If I today not your body) , Opus 15, No. 8.

Later, Schönberg sketches another manuscript with 3 more songs :

« Friedensabend » (Peace evening) ; which will remain incomplete.

« Angst und Hoffen » (Fear and hoping) , Opus 15, No. 7.

« Jedem Werke bin ich fürder tot » (Each works am I for that dead) , Opus 15, No. 6.

Schönberg also makes sketches for settings of many other poets and for « Und Pippa tanzt » , an un-realized Opera project, while continuing to work on the 2nd String Quartet.

Printemps 1908 : The 24 year old Anton Webern is most likely finished with the composition of his « Passacaglia » for orchestra, Opus 1. This piece is frequently referred to as Webern's « graduation » work, upon finishing his lessons with Schönberg - it is not ! (That distinction goes to his next piece.)

23 avril 1908 : Mahler and Alma leave New York to sail-back to Europe.

2 mai 1908 : Mahler and Alma arrive at Cuxhaven (the sea-port near Hamburg) . They spend a few days in Hamburg. Mahler visits old friends. Alma spends time with her family. Mahler goes on to Wiesbaden.

8 mai 1908 : Alma joins Mahler in Wiesbaden for a concert which he conducts.

10 mai 1908 : Mahler and Alma arrive in Vienna. Mahler almost certainly resumes his contact with Arnold Schönberg at this time. Mahler spends only 1 week in Vienna, then, travels to Prague.

23 mai 1908 : Mahler conducts a concert in Prague. He also makes arrangements for the premiere of his 7th Symphony.

Début juin 1908 : Mahler and Alma are, again, in Vienna. The city is buzzing with preparation for Emperor Franz-Josef's « Jubilee » celebration, on June 12th. Wanting to escape the commotion, Mahler and Alma decide to spend their summer at a farm-house in Toblach (now, Dobbiacco, in Italy) .

10 juin 1908 : Mahler and Alma leave for Toblach.

11 juin 1908 : Back in the Alps for summer vacation, the mood is now one of resignation rather than joy for Gustav Mahler who complains to Bruno Walter of how lonely he feels, and how ... « Now, at the end of a life, I must learn to stand and walk as a beginner. » ; a reference to his Doctor's orders to moderate his amount of exercise. This is a particularly difficult blow for Mahler, whose spiritual demons in the past led him to take vigorous hikes in the forests and mountains, during which he received most of his musical inspiration.

Juin 1908 : Ferruccio Busoni writes a letter to his publisher Johannes Schmidl about an expanded version of his book, « Sketch of a New Æsthetic of Music » . But this version is never issued.

Julius Korngold finally sends his 11 year old prodigy son, Erich Wolfgang, to study with Alexander von Zemlinsky. Erich writes the 1st 2 movements of his Piano Sonata in D minor, which he later plays for Gustav Mahler, who is very impressed. Mahler also asks the young Korngold to play something his new teacher had assigned to him (a Passacaglia on a theme by Zemlinsky) and recommends that Erich use it as the Finale for the Sonata, which he does.

Été 1908 : Gustav Mahler's banker, Paul Hammerschlag, visits during the summer. Mahler expresses his interest in Chinese music. Back in Vienna, Hammerschlag buys some phonograph cylinders of Chinese music and gives them to Mahler.

Été 1908 : The summer in Gmunden is disruptive for Arnold Schönberg : he discovers his wife Mathilde and Richard Gerstl in bed together.

Été à hiver 1908 : The 23 year old Alban Berg composes 5 single-movement « Piano Sonatas » , and some remaining fragmentary, before tackling his real « Piano Sonata » , Opus I, later in the year.

Mi-juillet 1908 : Gustav Mahler apparently begins work on « Das Lied von der Erde » (The Song of the Earth) , considered by many to be his greatest work. He works on it feverishly during the rest of his vacation.

27 août 1908 : Mathilde leaves Arnold Schönberg and the children and goes back to Vienna with Richard Gerstl.

30 août 1908 : Arnold Schönberg returns with the children to Vienna, but stays without Mathilde for at least 1 month.

Spurred on by this crisis, Schönberg enters the most productive and most creative period of his career.

1908 : Le chef Willem Mengelberg dirige à 5 reprises des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » .

Willem Mengelberg

Le chef d'orchestre néerlandais Joseph Wilhelm Mengelberg est né le 28 mars 1871 à Utrecht et est mort le 21 mars 1951 à Zuort, Sent (une commune suisse de la Basse-Engadine dans le canton suisse des Grisons) .

D'origine allemande, il est le 4e d'une famille de 16 enfants. Il étudie le piano et la composition au conservatoire de Cologne. Dans les années 1920, il compose tout en dirigeant à Lucerne une école musicale, un orchestre et un chœur.

À la tête de l'Orchestre Royal du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam pendant 50 ans (1895-1945) , il est universellement reconnu comme un interprète original et puissant de Jean-Sébastien Bach, Ludwig van Beethoven, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski, Richard Strauß et Gustav Mahler, dont il a été un proche dès 1902.

En raison de sa coopération avec le régime nazi lors de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, Mengelberg se voit interdire de diriger aux Pays-Bas, après 1945, pour une durée de 6 ans. Il se retire en Suisse où il attend, frustré et sans comprendre la raison de cette sanction, d'être rappelé par « son » « Concertgebouw » , mais il meurt quelques mois avant la levée de l'interdiction.

Il est l'oncle du musicologue et compositeur Rudolf Mengelberg ainsi que du compositeur, chef d'orchestre et critique Karel Mengelberg (père du pianiste et compositeur Misha Mengelberg) .

Ses enregistrements sont marqués par une grande expressivité et une liberté dans les variations de tempo. Wilhelm Furtwängler et Leonard Bernstein ont sensiblement la même approche.

Il a notamment assuré la création du 2e Concerto pour violon de Béla Bartók.

...

Les Pays-Bas possèdent, grâce à Willem Mengelberg, l'un des meilleurs Orchestres du monde : pendant 46 ans, Mengelberg a été à la tête de l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam qui n'avait que 7 ans d'existence lorsqu'il en prit la direction. Patiemment, il a effectué un long travail pour le hisser au niveau des plus grands, son exigence n'ayant d'égale que son enthousiasme communicatif pour la musique. Par une judicieuse répartition des programmes et des chefs invités pendant son absence, Mengelberg a fait du « Concertgebouw » l'un des rares Orchestres du monde capables de s'adapter aussi aisément aux répertoires germaniques et français, et aux musiques de toutes les époques. Il a imposé les œuvres de Gustav Mahler et Richard Strauß, qui ont souvent dirigé eux-mêmes à Amsterdam. Il a vécu en contact permanent avec la musique de son temps, faisant connaître aussi bien Tchaïkovsky, en 1896 ; que Debussy, Ravel, Schönberg et Stravinski, au début du XXe siècle ; ou Bartók, Kodály et Tansman, entre les 2 guerres mondiales.

Willem Mengelberg est né à Utrecht, le 28 mars 1871, dans une famille d'origine allemande. Il travaille avec Richard Hol, Henry Wilhelm Petri et Anton Averkamp dans sa ville natale, puis au Conservatoire de Cologne avec Franz Wüllner, Gustav Jensen et Isidor Seiss, qui lui donnent une solide formation de pianiste et compositeur. Les Ires années de sa carrière sont consacrées au piano mais il est vite attiré par la direction d'orchestre et est nommé directeur de la musique à Lucerne (1891) . Il revient aux Pays-Bas, en 1895, pour remplacer Willem Kes à la tête du «

Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam. En 1897, il prend, en outre, la direction du « Toonkunstkoor » avec lequel il donne chaque année « la Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Jean-Sébastien Bach. De 1907 à 1920, il est à la tête des « Museumkonzerten » de Francfort et, entre 1911 et 1914, il dirige régulièrement les concerts de la « Royal Philharmonic Society » à Londres. En 1905, il effectue son 1er séjour aux États-Unis.

Pendant 50 ans, Willem Mengelberg a dirigé l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam qui n'avait que quelques années d'existence lorsqu'il en prit la direction en 1895.

Il a effectué un travail remarquable pour le hisser au niveau des plus grands Orchestres, son exigence n'ayant d'égale que son enthousiasme communicatif pour la musique.

En quelques années, Mengelberg a fait du « Concertgebouw » l'un des rares Orchestres du monde capables de s'adapter aisément à tous les styles et aux musiques de toutes les époques.

Il s'est engagé passionnément pour l'œuvre de Gustav Mahler et celle de Richard Strauß, qui ont souvent dirigé eux-mêmes à Amsterdam. Contrairement à ses collègues, Mengelberg s'est beaucoup intéressé à Jean-Sébastien Bach dont il a donné de nombreuses œuvres (Suites, Concertos, Cantates, Passions) . Il a été très curieux et intéressé par la musique de son temps, faisant connaître aussi bien Tchaïkovsky, en 1896, que Debussy, Ravel, Schœnberg et Stravinsky, au début du 20e siècle, ou encore Bartók, Hindemith, Kodály et Tansman entre les 2 Guerres.

Willem Mengelberg est né à Utrecht, le 28 mars 1871, dans une famille d'origine allemande. Il travaille avec Richard Hol, Henry Wilhelm Petri et Anton Averkamp dans sa ville natale, puis au Conservatoire de Cologne où il étudie la direction, la théorie et la composition avec Franz Wüllner (1832-1902) , ami et élève d'Anton Schindler qui avait été lui-même l'ami et le secrétaire de Beethoven. Il étudie le piano avec Isidor Seiss (1840-1905) qui avait travaillé avec Friedrich Wieck, le père de Clara Schumann.

Les Ires années de sa carrière sont consacrées au piano mais il est vite attiré par la direction d'orchestre et est nommé directeur de la musique à Lucerne, en 1891 (il est âgé de 20 ans !) , grâce aux chaleureuses recommandations de ses professeurs.

Il revient aux Pays-Bas, en 1895, pour remplacer Willem Kes à la tête du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam. En 1897, il prend également la direction du « Toonkunstkoor » avec lequel il donnera, chaque année, la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Jean-Sébastien Bach et de nombreuses œuvres chorales.

Il dirige pour la 1re fois à Paris, en 1907, à Rome, en 1908, et se rend régulièrement à Moscou et Saint-Pétersbourg, à partir de 1909. C'est là qu'il rencontrera Modeste Tchaïkovsky qui, enthousiasmé par ses interprétations, lui confiera le manuscrit revu et corrigé de la 5e Symphonie de son frère, Piotr Ilitch. C'est cette version, négligée aujourd'hui, que Mengelberg dirigera.

De 1907 à 1920, il est à la tête des « Musuemkonzerten » de Francfort et, entre 1911 et 1914, il dirige régulièrement les concerts de la « Royal Philharmonic Society » de Londres.

En 1905, il effectue son 1er séjour aux États-Unis où il retourne régulièrement avant de prendre la direction du « National Symphony Orchestra » (1921-1929) qui deviendra, sous son instigation, l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York. Il dirige de nombreuses lres américaines.

Son répertoire varié se compose d'œuvres de :

Jean-Sébastien Bach.

Anton Bruckner (la 9e Symphonie, le 1er décembre 1927) .

Claude Debussy (« la Mer ») .

Alexandre Glazounov (la 4e Symphonie) .

Gustav Mahler (les Symphonies n° 2, 5 et 7 et « le Chant de la Terre ») .

Darius Milhaud.

Ottorino Respighi.

Albert Roussel.

Richard Strauß.

Igor Stravinsky.

Jan Pieterszoon Sweelinck.

Karol Szymanowski.

Alexandre Tansmann.

Antonio Vivaldi.

Il partagera quelques saisons avec Wilhelm Furtwängler, mais l'arrivée désastreuse d'Arturo Toscanini mettra fin à cette ère. La grande tournée européenne pour laquelle Mengelberg avait tant travaillé sera finalement dirigée par Toscanini. Suite aux intrigues du chef italien, ni Mengelberg, ni Furtwängler ne retourneront aux États-Unis.

Mengelberg apparaît à la tête des plus grands Orchestres européens et son succès est considérable.

C'est en 1933 que l'Université d'Utrecht crée une chaire à son intention.

Mengelberg a été celui qui a le plus œuvré en faveur de la musique de Gustav Mahler. Pour ses 25 ans à la tête du « Concertgebouw », en 1920, il dirigea l'intégrale des œuvres de Mahler.

Il organisa des Festivals consacrées, entre autres, à la musique française (1922) et à la musique néerlandaise (1902, 1913, 1935) .

Le compositeur Richard Strauß lui a dédié son poème symphonique « Ein Heldenleben » (Une Vie de Héros) ; Sergueï Rachmaninov, « les Cloches » ; et Zoltán Kodály, « les Variations Peacock » .

Parmi les œuvres du 20e siècle qu'il a créées, on peut citer le 2e Concerto pour violon de Béla Bartók (1939) ; le Concerto pour violon de Paul Hindemith (1940) ; « Háy János » et « les Variations Peacock » de Zoltán Kodály.

Willem Mengelberg a laissé de nombreux enregistrements d'une qualité technique remarquable. Avec l'Orchestre du « Concertgeouw », il enregistra pour les firmes « Columbia » et « Telefunken » . La radiodiffusion néerlandaise a conservé de nombreux enregistrements de concerts (1935-1944) dont la majeure partie est disponible.

The Dutch conductor Joseph Willem Mengelberg was born on 28 March 1871 in Utrecht, Holland, and died on 21 March 1951 in Zuort, in the Swiss canton of Graubünden. He was famous for his performances of Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam.

Mengelberg was the 4th of 15 children of German-born parents in Utrecht, Netherlands. His father was the well-known Dutch-German sculptor Friedrich Wilhelm Mengelberg. After studies in Utrecht with the composer and conductor Richard Hol, the composer Anton Averkamp (1861-1934) and the violinist Henri Wilhelm Petri (1856-1914) , he went on to study piano and composition at the Cologne Conservatory (now, the « Hochschule für Musik Köln ») , where his principal teachers were Franz Wüllner, Isidor Seiss and Adolf Jensen.

In 1891, when he was 20, he was chosen as General Music Director of the city of Lucerne (Switzerland) , where he conducted an orchestra and a choir, directed a music school, taught piano lessons and continued to compose.

4 years later, in 1895, when he was 24, Mengelberg was appointed principal conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in Amsterdam, a position he held until 1945.

In this position, Mengelberg was to premiere a number of Masterpieces. For example, in 1898, Richard Strauß dedicated his tone poem « Ein Heldenleben » to Mengelberg and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, telling journalists that he « had, at last, found an Orchestra capable of playing all passages, so that he no longer needed to feel embarrassed when writing difficulties » . Among other notable premieres were those on March 29, 1939, when Mengelberg conducted the premiere of the Violin Concerto No. 2 by Béla Bartók with violinist Zoltán Székely and, on November 23, 1939, he premiered the « Peacock Variations » of Zoltán Kodály.

Mengelberg founded the long-standing Mahler tradition of the « Concertgebouw ». He met and befriended Gustav Mahler, in 1902, and invited Mahler to conduct his 3rd Symphony in Amsterdam, in 1903 ; and, on October 23, 1904, Mahler led the Orchestra in his 4th Symphony, twice in one concert, with no other work on the program. Mahler wrote to his wife Alma Mahler that this programming idea (presumably, Mengelberg's) was a « stroke of genius ». Mahler regularly visited the Netherlands to introduce his work to Dutch audiences, including also his 1st, 5th, and 7th Symphonies, as well as « Das Klagende Lied » and « Kindertotenlieder ». Mahler edited some of his Symphonies while rehearsing them with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, making them sound better for the acoustics of the « Concertgebouw ». This is, perhaps, one reason that this concert-hall and its Orchestra is renowned for its Mahler tradition. In 1920, Mengelberg instituted a Mahler Festival in which all the composer's music was performed in 9 concerts.

Mengelberg also founded, in 1899, the annual « Concertgebouw » tradition of performing the « Saint-Matthew Passion » of Johann Sebastian Bach, on Palm Sunday.

One criticism of Mengelberg's influence over Dutch musical life, most clearly articulated by the composer Willem Pijper, was that Mengelberg did not particularly champion Dutch composers during his « Concertgebouw » tenure, especially after 1920.

Mengelberg was music-director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1922 to 1928. Beginning in January 1926, he shared the podium with Arturo Toscanini ; Toscanini biographer, Harvey Sachs, has documented that Mengelberg and Toscanini clashed over interpretations of music and even rehearsal techniques, creating division among the musicians that eventually resulted in Mengelberg leaving the Orchestra. However, the Mæstro did make a series of recordings with the Philharmonic for both the « Victor Talking Machine Company » and « Brunswick Records », including a 1928 electrical recording of Richard Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben » that was later reissued on LP and CD. One of his 1st electrical recordings, for « Victor », was a 2 disc set devoted to « A Victory Ball » by Ernest Schelling.

Mengelberg was described by Fred Goldbeck as « the perfect dictator / conductor, a Napoleon of the Orchestra » ; Alan Sanders writes :

« His treatment of the Orchestra was autocratic. In later years, his behaviour became extreme, and there are extraordinary stories of abusive verbal exchanges between him and his players at rehearsal. »

Berta Geißmar records an incident, in 1938, when Mengelberg rehearsed the London Philharmonic Orchestra in the « Vorspiel und Liebestod » from « Tristan » and he gave them tortuous lectures as though they had never seen the music before.

The most controversial aspect of Mengelberg's biography centers on his actions and behavior during the years of the Nazi occupation of Holland, between 1940 and 1945. His biographer, Fritz Zwart, writes (for Radio Nederland) of an interview Mengelberg had given with the “ Völkische Beobachter ”, the German Nazi newspaper ; the gist of it was that, on hearing of the Dutch surrender to the German invaders, on May 10, 1940, he had brought a toast with a glass of champagne and had also spoken about the close bond existing between the Netherlands and Germany » .

Zwart also notes that Mengelberg conducted in Germany and in German-occupied countries throughout the War, and was photographed in the company of Nazis such as Arthur Seyß-Inquart. Explanations have ranged from political « naïveté » in general, to a general « blind spot » for criticism of anything German, given his own ancestry. After the War, in 1945, the Netherlands' Honour Council for Music banned him from conducting in the Netherlands for life ; in 1947, after an appeal by his lawyers, the Council reduced his ban to 6 years though, also in 1947, Queen Wilhelmina withdrew his Gold Medal of Honour. This notwithstanding, he continued to draw a pension from the Orchestra until 1949 when cut-off by the city council of Amsterdam. Mengelberg retreated in exile to Zuort, Sent, Switzerland, where he remained until his death in 1951, just 2 months before the expiration of his exile order.

Willem Mengelberg was the uncle of the musicologist and composer Rudolf Mengelberg and of the conductor, composer and critic Karel Mengelberg, who was himself the father of the improvising pianist and composer Misha Mengelberg.

The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians (1980) entry on Mengelberg describes him as a « martinet addicted to meticulous and voluble rehearsals » ; it also notes that he did not hesitate to make what he called changes to a composer's scores when he felt it would aid clarity.

Mengelberg's recordings with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra are marked by frequent use of an unusually prominent portamento, the sliding of the string players' left fingers from one note to another. The scholar Robert Philip has shown that Mengelberg's recordings with other Orchestras do not show this portamento, and that « the unusual approach to portamento was a stylistic feature which he developed with the “ Concertgebouw ” over a long period of rehearsal, and that it was not a style which could be transferred to other Orchestras when Mengelberg visited them » . Philip also notes that this portamento required the strings to use uniform fingering prescribed by Mengelberg, and that this was also unusual for the time, when much orchestral fingering was typically « free » , with different players fingering a passage differently. Freely bowed portamento sounded lighter than that we hear in Mengelberg's recordings, as not all players would slide on the same notes. Philip mentions recordings by the Vienna Philharmonic under Bruno Walter as examples of this style.

In addition, Mengelberg employed fluctuations of tempo that were extreme, even in an era in which tempo fluctuation was more common than in modern practice. While admirers of Mengelberg value his tempo inflections, detractors have criticized them. For example, the musicologist and music theorist Walter Frisch has argued that :

« In the Brahms performances recorded by Willem Mengelberg, tempo fluctuation too often tends to obscure the broader shape of a passage or movement. »

Frisch argues that this obscuring of structure does not result from the tempo fluctuations of 2 conductors he admires who also used much tempo inflection, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hermann Abendroth.

Beethoven, Tchaikovski and Brahms, and Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

His most characteristic performances are marked by a tremendous expressiveness and freedom of tempo, perhaps most remarkable in his recording of Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony but certainly present in the afore mentioned « Saint-Matthew Passion » and other performances as well. These qualities, shared (perhaps, to a lesser extent) by only a handful of other conductors of the era of sound recording, such as Wilhelm Furtwängler and Leonard Bernstein, make much of his work unusually controversial among Classical music listeners ; recordings that more mainstream listeners consider unlistenable will be hailed by others as among the greatest recordings ever made.

Many of his recorded performances, including some live concerts in Amsterdam during World War II, have been re-issued on LP and CD. While he was known for his recordings of the German repertoire, « Capitol Records » issued a powerful, nearly high-fidelity recording of César Franck's Symphony in D minor, recorded in the 1940's by « Telefunken » with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

Due to the Dutch government's 6 year ban on Mengelberg's conducting activities, he made no more recordings after 1945. Some of his performances, in Amsterdam, were recorded on the innovative German tape recorder, the « Magnetophon » , resulting in unusually high-fidelity for the time.

Sound films of Mengelberg conducting the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, during live concerts in Amsterdam, have survived. Among these are a 1931 performance of Carl Maria von Weber's « Oberon » Overture and a 1939 performance of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

Mengelberg's early education was in his native city of Utrecht where he studied under the tutelage of Richard Hol, Henri Wilhelm Pertri, and Anton Averkamp. Mengelberg continued his studies with Franz Wüllner and Adolf Jensen, in Cologne, where he earned prizes as a pianist, violinist, and conductor. In 1891, Mengelberg assumed the directorship of the Lucerne City Conservatory. It would not take long for the young conductor to garner an excellent reputation and, in 1895, became the music-director of the prestigious « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, where he would serve until 1945. Concurrently, Mengelberg served as chief conductor of the Amsterdam « Toonkunst » Choir, an ensemble he found invaluable, marshaling his resources to perform such choral Masterpieces as Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

In 1902, Mengelberg met and befriended the great Gustav Mahler and, consequently, became a devoted champion of the legendary Austrian composer's music. During his time, Mengelberg was widely respected as a foremost interpreter of Mahler's scores. In 1920, in celebration of the « Concertgebouw » 's 25th season, he led the Orchestra in a cycle that presented all of Mahler's Symphonies. From 1907 to 1920, Mengelberg served as the director of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts and, in 1921, became the conductor of the New York International Symphony Orchestra, which he would conduct until 1929. From 1922 to 1930, Mengelberg was the principal conductor of the New York Philharmonic and, for the 1928-1929 season, shared the podium with Arturo Toscanini, a relationship that was strained and led to Mengelberg's return to Amsterdam. He was an avid supporter of contemporary music, and conducted the premieres of many notable works by such influential composers as Zoltán Kodály, Darius Milhaud, Henk Badings, Paul Hindemith, Béla Bartók, Max Reger, and Ottorino Respighi.

Mengelberg's discography is extensive, and is represented by a host of renowned Orchestras including the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra, Berlin Radio Orchestra, Paris Radio Orchestra, New York Philharmonic and, of course, the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. The conductor's popularity was widespread, and was exemplified by Richard Strauß' dedication of his « Ein Heldenleben » , to the Dutch conductor. In an unfortunate incident, Mengelberg was deemed a Nazi sympathizer, and was eventually exiled to Switzerland for 6 years. Consequent to his exile, his tenure at the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra was revoked, and the Gold Medal of Arts and Sciences he had been awarded was withdrawn and reclaimed by Queen Wilhelmina. While Mengelberg was banned from his native Holland, he did receive requests to conduct elsewhere, including the Soviet Union. The conductor could not accept such offers however, as his passport had been surrendered to the Dutch government. Willem Mengelberg undoubtedly was an important figure in music. His dedication to the work of Gustav Mahler and advocacy for the artistic output of his contemporaries solidified his reputation and established his career as one of the most influential of his time.

...

Willem Mengelberg was a perfectionist who meticulously rehearsed his Orchestras. He was associated with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » for most of his career, but was also much in demand as a guest-conductor. The Dutch conductor 1st led the Philharmonic during the 1905-1906 season ; from 1921 to 1930, he arranged his Amsterdam schedule to allow for annual trips to New York in order to conduct the Philharmonic there. The remainder of each season was handled by various guest-conductors, including Igor Stravinsky, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Arturo Toscanini, Sir Thomas Beecham and Fritz Reiner.

Mengelberg was a dynamic interpreter of the Romantic repertoire, Tchaïkovsky in particular, but also Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß, who dedicated « Ein Heldenleben » to him. Under Mengelberg, the Philharmonic recorded for the « Victor » label, including uncut performances of Beethoven's « Coriolanus » Overture and Liszt's « les Préludes » . (With a limit of 4 minutes per side, substantial cuts were more usual.) Mengelberg's live performances exhibited thrilling orchestral precision, although the players often complained about his inordinate speechifying during rehearsals. During Mengelberg's years as conductor, the Orchestra merged with a rival ensemble, Walter Damrosch's Symphony Society. As a conductor, Damrosch was in no position to compete with the Philharmonic's current stars, Mengelberg and Toscanini. But just as Mengelberg rose to the fore by being a guest-conductor under Josef Stránský, so too was Toscanini's willfull personality beginning to eclipse Mengelberg's.

During the Second World War, Mengelberg accepted invitations to conduct in Germany ; his conciliatory attitude to the Nazis was bitterly resented and, after 1945, he was forbidden to conduct in Holland. He retired to Switzerland.

Willem Mengelberg's parents were both German by birth, but worked in Holland, establishing a studio for the production of church furnishings at Utrecht, in 1869. The 4th of 16 children, several of whom died young, Willem learnt to play the organ and the piano in Utrecht, and although he was trained in the work of his father, it soon became apparent that he possessed musical skills which justified formal instruction. He, therefore, entered the Cologne Conservatory, where he studied piano under Isidor Seiss (who, in turn, had studied with Friedrich Wieck the father of Clara Schumann) and composition and conducting with Franz Wüllner, as well as music theory and composition with Gustav Jensen. Mengelberg left the Conservatory with prizes for composition, conducting and piano playing and both Wüllner and Seiss envisaged him developing his career as a pianist. His 1st professional work took place in Lucerne where, from 1892, he conducted a choir and an orchestra, directed a music school, gave piano lessons and composed. On average, he conducted one orchestral concert each month, and soon learnt that to gain the confidence of orchestral players, it was important to possess a working knowledge of all orchestral instruments.

After 3 years in Lucerne, Mengelberg was approached with the offer of the conductorship of the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in succession to Willem Kes. His initial years with the Orchestra were not always easy : his individual interpretative ideas attracted criticism and there was occasional conflict with orchestral players. During this period, he often consulted Wüllner, who not only had studied with Beethoven's friend and secretary Anton Schindler but had also known Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms well ; he advised Mengelberg on the performance of major works such as Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » and Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » . After working with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, for several years, and establishing himself, Mengelberg began to receive invitations to conduct outside Holland : he appeared at the Richard Strauß Festival in London, in 1903, when the « Sunday Spectator » remarked that it might have been better if Mengelberg had conducted more and Strauß less ! With the Philharmonic Society of New York, he made his debut, in 1905, once again conducting the music of Richard Strauß with great success ; and, henceforth, he conducted throughout Europe, appearing in Paris (1907) ; Rome (1908) ; Moscow and Saint-Petersburg (1909) ; and London, again, in 1911. In addition, he took on the conductorship of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts, in 1907, and of the Amsterdam Philharmonic Choir, in 1908.

Having been 1st approached to accept a permanent position by the New York Philharmonic Society, in 1910, Mengelberg eventually occupied such a post after World War I, initially with the recently-established National Symphony Orchestra for the 1920-1921 season. Despite enormous success, the costs of this body were too great for its backers to sustain, and it merged with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1922 ; Mengelberg became one of its permanent conductors alongside Josef Stránský. It was largely Mengelberg's fastidious training that created an Orchestra of the 1st rank, as his 1928 recording of Richard Strauß's « Ein Heldenleben » clearly demonstrates. (A 3rd Orchestra, Walter Damrosch's New York Symphony Orchestra, had also merged with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra at the beginning of 1928.) The arrival of Arturo Toscanini, in 1926, with whom Mengelberg shared the post of chief conductor, resulted in the latter's programmes becoming more adventurous, with a strong showing by contemporary American as well as European composers ; but as had been the case with Mahler at the Metropolitan Opera before World War I, so Mengelberg too was unable to resist the influence of Toscanini, and left the Orchestra, in 1930. It was Toscanini who conducted all the concerts given by the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra on its highly-influential European tour of that year.

Henceforth, Mengelberg's work was focused upon Europe and especially Amsterdam, where he had scored a major success with the Mahler Festival of 1920 at which all the Mahler Symphonies were performed. This followed his 1st appearances with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. At the 1st concert with this Orchestra, which took place on 30 December 1917, he conducted Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde », after which Alma Mahler gave him 2 manuscripts of one of the work's movements, « Der Abschied » (one a preliminary version and other in full-score) , with the following flattering dedication :

« To the Friend of Gustav Mahler. The most wonderful interpreter of his work : Willem Mengelberg. »

At the 2nd concert, given on New Year's Day 1918, he conducted Mahler's Symphony No. 4 and Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben » .

Throughout the inter-War years, Mengelberg was a popular hero in Holland : everything he did and everywhere he travelled was news. He received numerous honours : in 1934, he was made a Grand Officer of the Order of Orange-Nassau as well as a professor of music at the University of Utrecht. However, the rise of the National-Socialist movement throughout Europe and, especially, the German occupation of Holland revealed a startling naïvety on the part of Mengelberg. In 1940, photographs were published of him as a tourist in Berlin and, 5 days later, an interview which he had given to the Nazi newspaper, the « Völkischer Beobachter » , was re-published in Holland. Mengelberg compounded the negative impression thus created by fraternising with the Nazi leaders in occupied Holland, Arthur Seyß-Inquart and Hendrik Jan Woudenberg, and by accepting conducting engagements, both in Germany and in countries occupied by the Germans. Mengelberg's bland response to criticism, that « as the sun shone indiscriminately for everyone so too was music made for all people » , ignored the reality that, under the Nazis, the sun did not shine for everyone, and that, to quote his biographer Frits Zwart :

« Even musicians, composers and their work were forced into a scheme of things which placed no value on freedom. »

Even as late as 1946, Mengelberg failed to accept any personal responsibility for his actions during World War II, writing to a friend :

« If I had done something, I could understand it, but I never got involved in anything ! »

In 1945, the Dutch authorities forbade him to conduct in Holland ever again ; this ban was commuted to 6 years, in 1947, but he was indeed never to conduct again.

Mengelberg was a highly-idiosyncratic conductor who, through extensive and detailed rehearsal, achieved by current standards the most personal of performances. His approach to interpretation is exemplified by his comments that, « the performer must help the creator » , and « faithfulness to the notes is a recent invention » . He used the several playing norms of the period, such as rubato (tempo adjustments) and portamento (sliding from one note to another, generally on the strings) in such a way as to deliberately intensify his interpretations and, frequently, adjusted dynamic markings and orchestrations with the same aim. His sense of phrasing was similar to that which might be more generally expected of a virtuoso pianist, which Mengelberg of course was. In general, he cultivated a highly-dynamic style of performance which emphasised extreme variation in order to achieve powerful emotional effects. His conducting, for instance of the Symphonies of Tchaïkovsky, may sound to modern ears almost hysterical in its intensity, but there is no denying that these readings are effective on their own terms. Mengelberg was a close personal friend of many of the most notable composers of his day, such as Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, Alphons Diepenbrock and Ernest Schelling. His correspondence with Mahler reveals the depths of this friendship : in gratitude for Mengelberg's extraordinary efforts in preparing works by Mahler which the composer was to conduct in Amsterdam, the composer wrote to him :

« I am so grateful to you for your fresh and energetic initiative, your deeply sympathetic interpretation and penetrating understanding of my work. »

Richard Strauß was equally admiring of Mengelberg's work, dedicating one of his finest compositions, « Ein Heldenleben », to Mengelberg and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

Mengelberg's discography is one of the largest for a conductor of his generation. He was contracted to several recording companies during his career, which covered the eras of both acoustic and electrical recording. Before its take-over by « The Gramophone Company » to form « EMI », he recorded extensively for the British « Columbia » label, from 1926 onwards, and, during the 1930's and 1940's, he made numerous recordings for the German « Telefunken » company, some of which are exceptionally rare in their original form because of the exigencies of War-time production. In addition, recordings have survived of many broadcasts, including his monumental interpretation of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion ». Mengelberg's troubled personal history has worked against a careful and reasoned critique of his achievements as a musician, and his large discography, both official and unofficial, has yet to be fully assessed. The recordings of Mengelberg's broadcast concerts include many vital sound documents of the 20th Century, such as the 1st performances of Béla Bartók's Violin Concerto No. 2 (with Zoltán Székely) and of Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto (with Ferdinand Hellmann) ; Mahler's Symphony No. 4 ; all the Beethoven Symphonies ; « Ein Deutsches Requiem » of Brahms ; and works by numerous Dutch composers who were contemporaries of the conductor, as well as other composers of Mengelberg's generation such as Sergei Rachmaninov, Maurice Ravel, Zoltán Kodály, Hans Pfitzner, Paul Hindemith and Ernst Bloch. It is impossible to consider the history of orchestral performance in the 20th Century without taking into account the achievements of Mengelberg and the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and thus his recordings are of considerable significance, whilst also constituting highly-individual interpretations, possessed of an intensity rarely encountered.

...

After the Germans had occupied the Netherlands in 1940, Willem Mengelberg continued to conduct « his » « Saint-Matthew Passion » on subsequent Palm Sundays, except for the last 2 years of the War. And he continued performing for the Dutch Radio. And he continued recording for the « Telefunken » label : Symphony No. 3, « Eroica », by Beethoven) on November 11-13, 1940 ; Symphony in C and « Unfinished » Symphony by Schubert in November 1942. Just before the invasion, he had recorded « Ein Heldenleben » by Richard Strauß, and Symphony No. 9 (5) , « Aus der neuen Welt » (From the New World) by Dvořák. During the War, Mengelberg received financial and organizational help from the occupier for performances, concerts and travels. His last recording was made in November 1942, conducting « Eine kleine Nachtmusik » (A Little Night Music) by Mozart. During the War, many performances by the «

Concertgebouw » Orchestra continued to be recorded, also with Eduard van Beinum, Paul van Kempen, Eugen Jochum, and Herbert von Karajan.

When the War had started, numerous artists, especially of the younger generation and those who had just started to make a name for themselves, did not want to give-up their careers. When the War was over, many musicians like pianist Cor de Groot (Arthur Seyß-Inquart's favourite pianist) ; organist Piet van Egmond ; conductor Willem van Otterloo ; and also composer Henk Badings (director of the « Rijksconservatorium » in The Hague, from 1941 to 1944) , who all had been members of the Dutch « Kulturkammer » (Culture Chamber) , were forbidden to perform for 1 or more years but most of them were soon cleared of alledged misconduct, they were de-nazified.

Mengelberg had chosen not to deprive himself of what he had accomplished as a conductor. In order to be able to continue to do what he loved most, namely conducting « his » « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, he worked together with and for the Germans. This, despite his age. In 1940, Mengelberg was 69, an age when retirement under the given circumstances would have been logical or, at least, would have been wise. Mengelberg, like Wilhelm Furtwängler (who also did not understand the signs of the time) and many others, did not go into exile. To go to America, where Arturo Toscanini was number 1, was no option for Willem Mengelberg. He stayed in Amsterdam and secured his position.

His art was deeply rooted in the Austro-German culture. He could not deny that this was part of his own existence. However, the question of working together with and for the German occupier is not of an artistic nature. The question is a moral one :

How strong are you mentally ? How much insight do you have in a given political situation ? How far do you go in making use of the regulations ? And how far do you go in answering to the demands of the occupier ?

« How far can you go ? » seemed to be an individual matter with personal consequences. Many people believed that the Nazis would soon be stopped and, therefore, they did not work for, nor with, the occupier. But the Nazis were stopped only much later. And if Mengelberg would have helped saving the lives of 29 Jewish musicians, it was for artistic reasons only and not for a political or moral argument.

Right from the beginning, Mengelberg showed what his position was. Many judged his behaviour as « ambivalent » , as he was not taking a firm stand. He was not politically engaged and cared solely for his music business. When, in May 1940, the Netherlands were invaded by the Germans, Mengelberg was in Germany, in Bad Gastein, taking the cure and he later traveled to Frankfurt. He did not see a possibility to return to Amsterdam immediately. Sources say that he did not see the necessity to return. He 1st traveled to Austria and, from there, in early July, to Berlin to participate in the Festivities to commemorate Tchaikovsky's 100th Birthday. And it was there that he recorded Tchaikovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 in B-flat minor, Opus 23, with pianist Conrad Hansen, just 2 months after the Germans had invaded the Netherlands on May 10th, and had bombed and burned the heart of the city of Rotterdam on May 14th, 1940. In an interview in the Nazi newspaper « Völkische Beobachter » , Mengelberg said that Europe was going « in a new direction » . The new direction was even more evident later, in 1940. In November of that year, when he conducted the Orchestra at the occasion of the founding of a section of the « NVV » : the Dutch Labour Union. The section was named « Joy and Work » (« Vreugde en Arbeid ») which was the equivalent of « Kraft durch Freude » (« KdF ») of the German NSDAP : the National-Socialist Workers' Party. It is no wonder that, sometime later, Mengelberg conducted a concert for « Reichskommissar » Arthur Seyß-Inquart and other German officials. And there was no resistance from most of the Orchestra members when the Orchestra was to be « arianized » , purged from Jewish influences, sometime later.

This was all in stark contrast to Arturo Toscanini's attitude who did not want to conduct his Orchestra playing « Giovanezza » , the Fascist hymn, for dictator Benito Mussolini, and he left Italy for good, in 1936, to live in the United States taking his assistant, the Hungarian conductor Laszlo Halasz, with him.

Willem Mengelberg, however, wrote letters addressed to the occupier, expressing his thanks for this or that arrangement, for a supply, or for a contribution. Willem Mengelberg was allowed to travel with his Orchestra to Paris to be filmed in performance. He and pianist Cor De Groot traveled to Salzburg to perform at the « Salzburger Festspiele » (Salzburg Festival) , on August 16, 1942 ; Cor De Groot being the soloist in Beethoven's « Emperor » Piano Concerto No. 5, Opus 73.

Mengelberg was even allowed to travel to Spain and Portugal, as Dutch journalist Dick Verkijk mentions in his extensive documentation, « Radio Hilversum 1940-1945 » (Amsterdam, 1974) , while others had to follow difficult tracks, sometimes via Switzerland and through the Pyrenean Mountains, in order to reach Spain. For them, this was the only way to avoid execution, the only way to finally reach England to report to the government in exile, or to join the Allied Forces eventually. De Groot also performed in Riga (Latvia) . And, in April, 1942, the entire « Concertgebouw » Orchestra with Willem Mengelberg and Cor De Groot traveled to Vienna to celebrate the Centenary of the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , on March 1942. Cor De Groot was the soloist in the « Variations symphoniques » by César Franck, Mengelberg conducting. After the War, it was argued that Cor de Groot, by accepting many privileges and « collaborating » with the German occupier, was able to protect the lives of 2 people important to his relatives.

There were many performers, composers and artists, who did not want to become a member of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , the music-section of the « Reichskulturkammer » (Culture Chamber) , the institution which set the rules for performances and stipulated what material could be performed and what was « degenerate art » (« Entartete Kunst ») . Those who did not want to join were not allowed to perform and could hardly earn a living. (Nevertheless, the Germans were sabotaged time and time again, and the « Kulturkammer » never had a firm grip on the artistic life in the Netherlands.)

Lies the meaning of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » solely in « the most beautiful music that was ever written » ? Was the appeal (as Mengelberg put it) « die Schönste Musik die je geschrieben wurde » ? Did the magnificent work of Johann Sebastian Bach not relate to a deeper consciousness ? Were there no aspects of a human and also of a political nature ? Jesus was the rebel, the society's critic. Was Mengelberg the servant of Caiaphas ?

Right from the start of his conductorship (in 1895, when he was only 24 years of age) , it became clear that the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra had a genius at its head, a director who was a great organizer, a man who had an eye for detail when executing a work, planning a performance, or starting a tour, and a musician who could instantly be inspired by the score he had laid eyes on.

Through the years, Willem Mengelberg became not only internationally recognized ; also nationally, he was a prominent personality who did appear every so often in magazines and newspapers. He was a popular celebrity. When returning from a tour abroad and arriving at Amsterdam Central Station, newspapers would announce the arrival accompanied with a picture of the man. In magazine articles, Mengelberg checked the modern recording techniques, did take part as a juror of a contest, was photographed at a farewell dinner just before boarding a steamer to New York, etc. Mengelberg gradually became an institution and as such played a most significant role.

What would the Orchestra have become without this important but also presumptuous conductor who molded the institution to high-standards and brought it to world fame ? It probably would have been a 2nd rate ensemble.

That is why, from 1940 on, Mengelberg's foremost aim was the preservation of his Orchestra and securing his own position - no matter what. That included the well-being of his musicians ; among them, several Jews. His concern was only partly just, of course. He could have made other choices. But he did not. Leaving the country meant leaving the Orchestra that he had built during the last 45 years. That was no option. It would be a mental blow which would affect his whole being if he left his creation behind.

Because of his prominence, he was judged more severely than any other artist who had manipulated himself through the 5 year War.

How severely ? After the liberation of the Netherlands by the Allied Forces and after the Germans had capitulated in 1945, the name of Willem Mengelberg was hardly ever mentioned, except in private conversations, one would say. He was banned, his personality ridiculed. In 1947, a new dictionary of composers and compositions with the title « Muzikale Ommegang » (Musical Round-up) was published. In the paragraph about Gustav Mahler, there is no mention of Willem Mengelberg, despite the fact that he had been instrumental in promoting Mahler's music in the Netherlands, in Europe and, also, in America. Proof was the organization by Mengelberg and staff of the « Mahler Feest » (Mahler Festival) . Oddly enough, composer Henk Badings gets extensive coverage in the book, notwithstanding his alleged inclination towards the ideas of the occupier.

In the 1949 edition of « Radio Encyclopedie » , the only entry with the name « Mengelberg » is of composer and musicologist Doctor Kurt Rudolf Mengelberg, nephew of the former conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Kurt Rudolph Mengelberg was artistic-director of the « Concertgebouw » , from 1925 until 1935 ; and general-director, from 1935 until 1954.

The question is also why the ideas of certain conductors, composers and instrumentalists, are often on the political right side. Maybe, it is because they do not have the time to study political ideas and the evolution of society thoroughly. But, most of all, many tend to think only in structured music, of ideas organized in sound in which, for them, there is no place for external influences. This is applicable for the purely Classically-oriented musicians. Those who roamed the realm of modernistic and « avant-garde » music styles are generally rebellious.

Willem Mengelberg's behavior had not only become problematic to the Dutch music scene but also to the entire nation. In 1945, he was declared unworthy to keep his post of principal-conductor of « his » Orchestra. This verdict became definitive in 1947 ; the year in which bans on several other prominent people with questionable behavior during the War were lifted. (In Germany, the prominent conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler was allowed to perform again, in 1947.)

Mengelberg was living in Switzerland when the 1947 announcement was made that, for the next 6 years, he was not allowed to return to the Netherlands, not even for challenging the verdict. He did no longer have a valid passport.

The Dutch government did not have an eye for gray-tones but only could see black and white at the time, and the leaders announced that Eduard van Beinum was to be principal-conductor of the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

Mengelberg spent the remainder of his life in exile, in Switzerland, in his chalet, the « Chasa Mengelberg » (« Hof Zuort ») , in Graubünden. In 1950, Michæl Thomas of the Cherubini Society in London corresponded with the conductor and proposed making recordings. On August 14th, 1950, Mengelberg wrote :

« Dear Mister Thomas,

My manager Mister Johann Köning, who has shortly visited me, informed me that I still have obligations towards the “Telefunken” Company. This being the case, it is impossible for me to sign any other contract at present. I am extremely sorry to have to disappoint you and sincerely hope that we may come to some agreement later. At last, I have received a passport on condition that I do not conduct anywhere without having previously obtained a special permit from the Dutch government and which is only valid for the Benelux countries, Switzerland and Italy (not England) . However, it is a beginning and I trust further difficulties will be removed in the near future.

Believe me, dear Mister Thomas,

Yours sincerely Professor Doctor Willem Mengelberg. »

The « near future » was very short for a man his age. And it is suspected that Mister Johann Köning, did not want to burn his fingers on the possibility of making recordings by Willem Mengelberg and used the contract as a pretext. Mengelberg died on March 22nd, 1951, in Switzerland. That was, in fact, 2 years before the presentation in 1953 of the sound recording of his 1939 performance of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

By the end of the 1940's, several intellectuals and government officials had been discussing Mengelberg's position and his importance and were proposing that the ban should be lifted. Yet, a positive action taken by the government came too late.

Dutch composer, musicologist and journalist Wouter Paap (1908-1981) is the author of a small but comprehensive 80 page illustrated biography of Willem Mengelberg, published by the Elsevier Company. The book was written in conjunction with the Mengelberg « Documenta Musicæ » LP series, issued by the « Philips Phonografische Industrie » , in 1960. The book included a 7 inch 45 RPM disc with the performance by Willem Mengelberg and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of « Oud Nederlandse Dansen » (Old Dutch Dances) composed by Julius Röntgen. On the last pages, Paap recounts that, on the day Willem Mengelberg would have been 80, on March 22nd, his actual birthday, farmers of Zuort had put his body on a sleigh and brought him on the snowy path to the valley while bells were ringing. In the « Hofkirche » , in Lucerne, the Funeral Mass of Dutch composer Johannes Verhulst was performed. Ferdinand Helman, former Concert-Master of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, played the 2nd Movement from Bach's Violin Concerto.

On the afternoon of Saturday, March 31st, 1951, a concert was given in memory of Willem Mengelberg by the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra conducted by Otto Klemperer. The program was well-chosen and opened with Mozart's « Maurerische Trauermusik » (Masonic Funeral Music) . Then, Dutch contralto Roos Boelsma was soloist in « Der Abschied » (The Farewell) , the last song from « Das Lied von der Erde » (The Song of the Earth) . The Amsterdam « Toonkunstkoor » sang the Choral « Wenn ich einmal soll scheiden » (When I must depart one day) from Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » . The last work on the program was Beethoven's 3rd Symphony, the « Eroica » , with the « Marcia funebre » . It is true, Mengelberg led an intense and heroic life that he spent in the service of music and, despite everything, in the service of humanity.

The parents of Willem Mengelberg, Friedrich Wilhelm Mengelberg and Helena Schrattenholz, both German by birth, established themselves with their atelier for church art in Utrecht, in 1869. The immediate reason for their move to the Netherlands lay in the fact that Mengelberg senior had obtained the commission to make the church furniture for the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Utrecht after he had made the bishop's throne for the same cathedral, in 1868. He equipped numberless churches in the Netherlands with furniture. The complete furniture of the Saint-Nicholas church, in Jutphaas, designed by Alfred Tepe, came from the Mengelberg workshop. He also provided furniture for many other Roman Catholic churches including ones in Utrecht, Schalkwijk, Ijsselstein, Raalte, Abcoude, Arnhem, Kortenhoeft, Houten, Mijdrecht, Workum and Amsterdam. Altar pieces were also made in the atelier for such churches as those in Zwolle, Amsterdam, Hilversum, Harlingen, Abcoude and Apeldoorn. In Germany, work from the Mengelberg workshop found its way to Bonn, Frankfurt am Main, Cologne, München-Gladbach, Paderborn and other places. For the cathedral in Cologne, he fashioned work representations of the stations of the cross, the bronze doors for the North door and many other works of art, mostly church furniture. The increase in commissions for the work of Mengelberg was especially the result of the belief of the priest Gerardus Wilhelminus van Heukelum (1834-1910) in the work of Mengelberg and in his artistic ideals. Van Heukelum acted as the unofficial adviser to the Bishop of Utrecht, Monseigneur Andreas Ignatius Schaepman in matters of church art which, naturally, led to the work of Mengelberg coming to the attention of the bishop.

On the 28th of March 1871, Willem (actually, Joseph Wilhelm) Mengelberg was born in Utrecht. His parents were married on the 14th of February 1866. They had 16 children, born between 1867 and 1890, 8 sons and 8 daughters, some of whom died young. Willem was the 4th child. Like his brothers and sisters, he was initiated in the crafts practised in the father's atelier, but his natural musicality gained the upper-hand. With time, his parents recognised that a professional musical training was not to be avoided. Artistic talent can be observed throughout the family trees of both the parental families.

The foundation of Mengelberg's career was laid in the Conservatory, in Cologne. He developed as a talented and hard-working pupil. For his main subjects, he studied piano under Isidor Seiss (1840-1905) who, in turn, had studied with Friedrich Wieck, the father of Clara Schumann, and composition with Doctor Franz Wüllner (1832-1902). The latter was also his teacher for conducting and he studied music theory and composition with Gustav Jensen. Mengelberg's study was a great success and he completed the course with brilliant results for piano, composition and conducting. The commendations of his teachers, Wüllner and Seiss, are mainly in the direction of a career in piano playing. Later, Mengelberg declared :

« I am much indebted to my teachers at the Cologne Conservatory and if ever I became a good musician, it is thanks to my teachers Franz Wüllner and Isidor Seiss, teachers of a rare quality with which one seldom meets. »

From 1892 onwards, Mengelberg worked in Lucerne where he could develop his many talents. There, he conducted a choir and an orchestra, directed a music school, gave piano lessons and gave concerts with his ensembles. He even found time to devote to composition. In general, one can say that his time in Lucerne was a busy one in which he gained valuable experience as a conductor, both choral and orchestral. The extent of his activities in the latter fields was, nonetheless, only of small demands in comparison with the work he was to do in Amsterdam. On average, in Lucerne, he conducted one orchestral concert a month. But the influence on his development for the future was of great importance, an importance he increased by his own curiosity to learn :

« As a young choir Master in Lucerne then, I soon noticed that I could not demonstrate on various instruments and I immediately saw that this was an unacceptable problem. I then took lessons from all the musicians in order to learn the holds from them. »

In 1895, Mengelberg was presented with the honourable request to become conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in Amsterdam. This ensemble had been founded in 1888, and had acquired a good name under the conductor Willem Kes. Kes, however, had found an improved position in Scotland. Mengelberg came to stand before the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra as a young man of 24. His 1st years in Amsterdam can not have always been easy for him. Complaints were made about his changing ideas about some scores, the members of the Orchestra sometimes behaved in a difficult manner and his health was not everything it might have been. Yet, Mengelberg's popularity grew steadily. In 1897, one of the critics of the Dutch press mentioned Mengelberg as « an artist of God's mercy ». With his interpretations, he managed to persuade his concert-going public and he succeeded in raising the level of the Orchestra. Gradually, his musical gifts became recognised in the Netherlands and his position grew rapidly. He became conductor of the « Diligentia » Concerts in the Hague, of the Saint-Cecilia Society and of the Philharmonic Choir, in Amsterdam.

It was especially in his 1st years in Amsterdam that he sought the advice of his teacher Franz Wüllner. He was an influential interpreter of Beethoven because he had known Beethoven's friend and secretary Anton Schindler (1795-1864) well and had studied with him but had also known Robert Schumann and Johannes Brahms well. It was no wonder that Wüllner's musical ideas were standards for Mengelberg and probably also for his fellow students. But Mengelberg also went to his former teacher for advice on Bach interpretation. Wüllner could advice on tempos in such works as the « Missa solemnis » of Beethoven, practical solutions for instrumentation in Bach's Cantatas and for soloists for the « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

After working with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra for a number of years, Mengelberg began to make a name and requests gradually came for him to be the guest-conductor elsewhere. When the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra took part in the Strauß Festival in London, in 1903, the « Sunday Spectator » remarked that it might have been better if Mengelberg had conducted more and Strauß less. Mengelberg received an important invitation to come to conduct the Orchestra of the Philharmonic Society in New York, in November 1905. After his performance, the « Musical Courier » described his interpretation of « Ein Heldenleben » the best there was in New York, at that moment, including that of Strauß himself. From that time onwards, the world stood open for him. He conducted for the 1st time in Paris, in 1907, and, in the same year, he took on the position as conductor of the « Frankfurter Museums-gesellschaft » and, a year later, was given the directorship of a choir equivalent to the Philharmonic Choir in Amsterdam. In 1908, he conducted in Rome. From 1909 onwards, for a number of years, he conducted in Moscow and Saint-Petersburg. In 1910, he conducted in various Italian cities and, in 1911, in London. However, because of his obligations in Amsterdam and Frankfurt, he had to refuse many invitations.

On many occasions, Mengelberg was asked to be conductor or guest-conductor of other Orchestras. In 1910, an attempt was made to engage him as permanent conductor of the Philharmonic Society in New York where Gustav Mahler then had a position. In general, Mengelberg made high financial demands in such situations and commanded the salaries of other much asked for conductors of the day such as Arthur Nikisch and Vladimir Safonoff.

In the period between 1921 and 1930, Mengelberg was working in New York for about half the concert season. He was able to train the combined former New York Philharmonic and National Symphony Orchestras to be a perfect ensemble. His spectacular recording of « Ein Heldenleben » by Richard Strauß with this Orchestra, in 1928, gives unequivocal evidence for this. From 1927 onwards, Arturo Toscanini was also conductor of this Orchestra. It is worth noting that, with the arrival of Toscanini, Mengelberg's programmes became increasingly adventurous. Yet, already before Toscanini arrived, Mengelberg involved himself far more in the work of American composers than Toscanini was ever to do.

In New York, Mengelberg gave « Original Performances » of music by Kurt Atterberg, Nicolai Beresovski, Simon Bucharoff, Alfredo Casella, Gaspar Cassadó, Darius Milhaud, Ottorino Respighi, Ernest Schelling, Bernard Wagenaar and Emerson Withorne. Besides the tested Symphonic repertoire, he also presented many 1st performances in New York or in America. Names of such composers as Ernst Bloch, James Dunn, Manuel de Falla, Pierre Ferroud, Paolo Gallico, Samuel Gardner, Heinrich Gebhard, Rubin Goldmark, Henry Hadley, Howard Hanson, Heinrich Kaminsky, Riccardo Pick-Mangiali, John Powell, Henri Rabaud, Lazare Saminsky, Karol Szymanowsky, Germaine Tailleferre, Alexandre Tansman, Deems Taylor, George Templeton-Strong and Hermann Hans Wetzler show that Mengelberg renewed the repertoire with a certain regularity over the years. Of course, Mengelberg also performed much of this repertoire in Amsterdam.

As a result of the unavoidable rivalry between the supporters of Mengelberg and Toscanini, Mengelberg left New York after a last performance with the New York Orchestra, in 1930. The proposed European concert tour of the Orchestra of the Philharmonic Society for which Mengelberg had done so much for so long, was realized in that year. But it was Toscanini who could claim the crown of success because it was he who conducted all the concerts.

It hardly need be said that many friendships grew-up over the years with the musicians and composers with whom Mengelberg worked. Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, Alphons Diepenbrock, Ernest Schelling and Alexander Siloti are but a few of those friends. There were, of course also, many of those from the better circles of Amsterdam who liked to be considered a friend of Mengelberg. These were naturally mostly music lovers and the admirers of the conductor and, indeed, Mengelberg kept-up close relationships with many of them including Charles Boissevain (and his associates) , Jo Beukers-Van Ogtrop and Ellie Bysterus Heemskerk, sometimes friends at 1st sight but above all friends for life.

Amongst these were also the governors of the « Concertgebouw » such as the members of the De Marez Oyens family, Hendrik de Booy (1867-1964) and R. van Rees.

The correspondence between Mahler and Mengelberg shows that it was not long after they had met at a professional level that they struck-up a friendship. Mahler was very taken-up with the lot of his Dutch colleague, whether it was to do with Mengelberg's success in America or with the final upshot of the famous « Concertgebouw » conflict of 1903-1904. It is not seldom that, through his letters, Mahler's concern can be felt. He knew only too well how difficult it was as an Orchestra conductor to get on, from day to day, with 70 or 80 musicians. Knowing of this feeling of comradeship, it is amusing to read that Mahler was happy to take-over the cellist Isaac Mossel in his Viennese Orchestra. At the height of the conflict, Mengelberg had demanded that Isaac Mossel be thrown-out of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Mahler was convinced that he could gain Mastery over Mossel. There was also the friendship with Richard Strauß. Mengelberg inspired him with enthusiasm to collect glass and « verre églomisé » (gilded glass) and shared with him an interest in antiques and art.

As the years went by, Mengelberg developed a friendship with Alphons Diepenbrock that was fed by their common musical interests. Mengelberg very often performed Diepenbrock's music. But despite the fact that Diepenbrock could not initially get on so well with Mengelberg's personality, a personal relation did gradually grow. It was for the copper wedding of Willem and Tilly Mengelberg, on the 5th of January 1913, that Diepenbrock composed the wedding song, « In the chilly, rough high North » with the text by Jo Beukers (1865-1948) .

Mengelberg was the conductor when the pianist Alexander Siloti, a pupil of Franz Liszt, made his debut in the Netherlands, in November 1897. When Mengelberg was engaged as guest-conductor for a number of consecutive seasons in Russia, beginning in 1909, he performed in the series of Siloti and stayed at his home. Before and after this co-operation, Siloti and Mengelberg regularly wrote to each other. Ernest Schelling was also a gifted pianist. He had studied with Ignacy Jan Paderewski and was frequently engaged by Mengelberg. This also led to a warm relationship. Like Mengelberg, Schelling had a country house in Switzerland where he enjoyed receiving his friends. Mengelberg was often his guest. He frequently conducted Schelling's music in Amsterdam and in New York.

A number of the members of the Board of Governors of the « Concertgebouw » who served a term of office during the period in which Mengelberg conducted there, can, without exaggeration, be counted amongst his most trusted friends. The « Gedenkboek Mengelberg » (1895-1920) contains various references to these friendships. It is clear that for many Mengelberg was not immediately an easy friend. Of the many Dutch friends, a number are mentioned here who meant much to him and whose friendship lasted a number of years. Charles Boissevain was a member of the Board of the « Concertgebouw » and one of the first friends of Mengelberg when he came to Amsterdam. Together with him and members of his family, Mengelberg would make excursions down to the Rhine valley in the quiet week before Easter when the performances of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » were done with. Mengelberg sometimes went on a cure with Boissevain, in Karlsbad. Jo Beukers-Van Ogtrop was the president of the Philharmonic Choir in Amsterdam and a friend of both, Willem and Tilly Mengelberg. She was a central figure in the Philharmonic Choir and was particularly instrumental in the organisation of the concert tours made by the choir and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra to Brussels, Paris and elsewhere. Ellie Bysterus-Heemskerk also gradually meant more and more to Mengelberg and his wife. She was a violinist with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra through which she got to know Mengelberg. Together with her mother, she accompanied Mengelberg to America, already in the 1920's. Later, she was especially involved with the care of his scores. After Mengelberg's death, in 1951, she was gradually given the responsibility for what was later to become the Mengelberg archive, a responsibility she undertook with considerable dedication. Like other friends, she was Mengelberg's guest at his « Chasa Mengelberg » in Graubünden, Switzerland. An inscription on a photo of « Chasa Mengelberg », written by Willem Mengelberg, shows that he already counted her amongst his best friends, in 1918 :

« To “ Aunt ” Ellie Heemskerk, in memory of “ Chasa M ”. »

« To Aunt Ellie - “ work donkey ” at the “ Chasa ” from her thankful “ work horse ” OH. 31st August 1922. »

« Chasa Mengelberg » was the chalet which Mengelberg had built to his own design in Switzerland. The house was situated at an altitude of just over 7,000 feet in the Swiss canton of Graubünden. Mengelberg usually spent his holiday there, between the months of June and September. After a period of rest by himself, he would receive his guests. The numerous guests once included Hendrik, the Prince Consort. The guests were expected to write something original in the guest book, on arrival or as they left. The 1st of these books was begun in 1914.

During the years in which Mengelberg conducted the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, his popularity grew to such an extent that he occupied the position of a national hero, perhaps best compared today with the positions of film stars and sports idols. He gradually came to belong to the category of « well-known Dutchmen ». Mengelberg was news and his triumphs in foreign countries were usually broadly publicised in the national press. Even when the famous man was ill or suffered some minor accident, had his birthday or some anniversary, his name was in the papers. Many an opportunity was taken to celebrate him and numerous honours and presents were showered on him : wreaths, beautiful albums written in calligraphy and even a car were given to him. The supreme moment was, of course, the overwhelming honour paid to him at the Mahler Festival, in 1920, but, even then, there were many impressive celebrations to come.

Mengelberg was swamped with honours and decorations. In the Netherlands, he received the following decorations :

1898 : Knight of the Order of Oranje Nassau.

1902 : Officer of the Order of Oranje Nassau.

1907 : Knight of the Order of the Dutch Lion.

1907 : Silver Medal for Arts and Sciences in the House Order of Oranje Nassau.

1913 : Gold Medal for Arts and Sciences in the House Order of Oranje Nassau.

1920 : Commander in the Order of Oranje Nassau.

1934 : Grand Officer in the Order of Oranje Nassau.

He could call himself Professor Mengelberg after being made extraordinary professor of musicology at the State University of Utrecht, in 1934. A few years before that, he had already been given an honorary doctorate at the University of Columbia, in New York. In the same period, he received royal and governmental decorations in Belgium, France, Italy, Spain and Denmark. Academic institutions and all sorts of musical Societies gave him honorary membership or an honorary position. Mengelberg's portrait was painted by such well-known artists of the day as Pier Pander, Jan Toorop, Jan Sluijters and Kees van Dongen.

Mengelberg's fame rested on his musical genius as it was expressed in his performances, many of which were recorded for posterity. One of the monuments which contributed to his fame was the yearly performance of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » by Johann Sebastian Bach. It is a pity that there is no earlier recording than the one made in 1939. There are some other distressing gaps in the rich phonographic inheritance from Mengelberg. The music of Gustav Mahler is, by no means, fully represented in recordings and it is particularly sad that there is no record of « Das Lied von der Erde » , the work which achieved singular perfection in the hands of Mengelberg, with Ilona Durigo and Jacques Urlus singing as the soloists in Mengelberg's performances for many seasons. It was with « Das Lied von der Erde » that Mengelberg made his successful 1st appearance in Vienna, in 2 performances with the Vienna Philharmonic. At the 1st concert, given on the 30th December 1917, the fanatically applauded performance was rewarded by a generous gift from Alma Mahler. This consisted of 2 manuscripts of « Der Abschied » from « Das Lied von der Erde » , one of a preliminary version and one in full-score, with the following flattering dedication :

« To the Friend of Gustav Mahler. The most wonderful interpreter of his work Willem Mengelberg. Given by Alma Maria on the 30th December 1917. »

At the 2nd concert with the Vienna Philharmonic, given on New Year's Day 1918, Mengelberg conducted Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony and « Ein Heldenleben » by Richard Strauß.

At the end of the 1930's and before he became professor, the Amsterdam musicologist Bernet Kempers made a plea to the Dutch government to give financial support to make a recording of Mengelberg's interpretation of « Das Lied von der Erde ». Sadly, this project was never to be realized.

The most controversial and often discussed part of Willem Mengelberg's career is the period between 1940 and 1945. A number of publications which came-out, shortly after the German invasion of the Netherlands in 1940, ensured that Mengelberg's unrivalled popularity disappeared for good for a large part of the Dutch nation. It was especially the article which appeared in the newspaper « De Telegraaf », on the 10th of July 1940, which compromised Mengelberg. It was a version of an interview which had appeared in the « Völkischer Beobachter », the German National-Socialist paper, on the 5th of July. The version published in « De Telegraaf » was commented upon with indignation in the Dutch press.

Whoever saw the photo series made by Mauritius Hartmann in Berlin, in 1940, and which was partly published in the German magazine « Der Silberspiegel », would again have had reason to turn his back on Mengelberg. On one of the photos, Mengelberg and his wife, both smiling, are looking at a poster on which his concert of the 5th of July 1940 with the Berlin Philharmonic is advertised. On other photos, Mengelberg can be seen as a tourist in Berlin. On his return from Berlin, Mengelberg gave an interview to « De Telegraaf » which appeared on the 2nd of August 1940. Mengelberg's damaged reputation was certainly not improved by this interview. The contrary was the case. The final remark ran as follows :

« I shall stay for a while in the Netherlands to have some discussions about Dutch musical life and hope to do some useful work to continue its improvement. »

Other remarks also gave, and still give, an uncomfortable feeling.

The reputation of Mengelberg was also not improved by photos of him together with such men as State commissioner Arthur Seyß-Inquart or NVV leader Woudenberg, taken on special occasions. Whether or not it was true, many people were given the impression that Mengelberg was in an animated conversation with this company.

The programmes for the music, which Mengelberg conducted during the War, show that he not only continued with his concerts in the Netherlands but also carried on as guest-conductor in other countries occupied by the Germans and in Germany itself. Famous soloists were often at his side such as the singer Henriëtte Sala, the pianists Branka Musulin, Dinu Lipatti, Soulima Stravinsky (the son of Igor Stravinsky) , the cellist Paul Tortelier and the violinist Willi (probably, Wolfgang) Schneiderhan. (The critics, a few days later, in the « Pariser Zeitung » by Doctor Heinrich Strobel shows no doubt that it handles indeed about Wolfgang. J. L.) Mengelberg's justification for his concerts in Germany and elsewhere lay in his principle, which he had openly expressed, that just as the sun shone indiscriminately for everyone, so too was music made for all people. Nonetheless, the music on the repertoire gradually became thinned down. On the 5th of July 1940, Mengelberg could give a « Special Concert » of music by Tchaïkovsky to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the birth of the composer. Then, Mengelberg could also make recordings of Tchaïkovsky's music for the German company « Telefunken ». But, in February 1944, special permission had to be asked from the state commissioner « Reichskommissar » - the highest authority, in order to give a couple of performances of Tchaïkovsky's music. He was, after all, an « enemy » composer.

Mengelberg is often described as a man of boundless naïveté in order to explain and to play down his position in the Second World War. But it must sadly be admitted that this « naïveté » was effectively bad. It allowed Mengelberg to ignore political significance and to continue his work as a musician unabated. This, in turn, allowed the Germans to use him for their propaganda. It was, perhaps, the same borderless « naïveté » which led him to put music by Gustav Mahler on his programmes, in the Autumn of 1940. The music of his friend Mahler, as a Jewish composer, was forbidden. The « Reichskommissar » became annoyed on hearing of Mengelberg's unthinking intention to perform works by Mahler. But, as a special exception, one work by him was allowed and Mahler's Symphony No.1 was heard again.

The same « naïveté » which led him to approach the German authorities in the Netherlands on behalf of many people, Jewish and otherwise. These included the violinist Carl Flesch, the flutist Hubert Bahrwahser, Professor Ernst Laqueur, the pianist Sara Bosmans-Benedicts and many others. Whoever came to Mengelberg could count on his mediation. But the requests for help do not appear to have shaken him into awareness.

It is an extraordinary paradox that the man who had fought so hard to persuade not only musicians but also the national and international public of the importance of the music of Gustav Mahler should later acquiesce in the prejudice of a tyrant. Mengelberg somehow did not allow himself to see that the sun did not shine for everyone, that even musicians, composers and their work were forced into a scheme of things which placed no value on freedom. It cannot be doubted that the findings of the Honorary Council for music, in 1945, and the Central Honorary Council for Art, in 1947, to a large extent determined feelings about Mengelberg during his exile in Switzerland. For his attitude during the occupation, the council of 1945 imposed a sentence which forbade him to ever conduct in the Netherlands again.

Mengelberg's defence, in 1945, and his appeal, in 1947, both presented by his lawyer J. A. J. Bottenheim, the son of Mengelberg's former secretary Salomon Adriaan Maria Bottenheim, demanded a lengthy and thought provoking process. Much attention was paid to whether Mengelberg should be given the necessary documents to travel outside Switzerland, for instance to the Netherlands. Mengelberg was plagued by sickness and was often physically weak. The withdrawal of the Royal decoration, « The Honorary Gold Medal for the Arts and Sciences in the Order of the House of Orange » by Royal decree, on the 19th of March 1947, must have caused Mengelberg considerable distress at his home, in Switzerland, especially then when there appeared to be some hope that his sentence might be completely revoked or, at least, changed. This distress was increased by the decision of the Central Honorary Council. The appeal case, which was opened before the Central Honorary Council, in May 1947, ended on the 20th of October 1947 with a reduction of Mengelberg's sentence from a life-time ban to one of 6 years, until July 1951.

Until his death, on 21 March 1951, Mengelberg remained in his chalet in Switzerland. Apparently, his friends were unable to successfully make clear to him exactly what had gone wrong and the reasons for all the radical measures and decisions. His feeling of being misunderstood is expressed in his own words :

« I have never done anything wrong against my country, was always and still am a loyal subject of Her Majesty. Everything I did and did not do during almost 50 years of working in the Netherlands, including the War period, was directly or indirectly for and on behalf of my country, Amsterdam and the “ Concertgebouw ” Orchestra. Thinking that this was sufficiently understood made the shock at discovering that the opposite was thought of me deeper still. »

In 1946, his astounding « naïveté » was still apparent in words he wrote to Ellie Bysterus Heemskerk :

« If I had done something, I could understand it, but I never got involved in anything ! » (Frits Zwart)

...

Well into the 6th decade after the terrible events that wracked an entire world, the reputation of Willem Mengelberg continues to suffer from false charges of collaboration with the Nazis. Even as late as the 1978 (6th) edition of Baker's « Biographical Dictionary of Musicians » could state :

« During the occupation of Holland by the Germans, Mengelberg openly expressed his sympathies with the Nazis, and lost the high respect and admiration that his compatriots had felt for him. »

Perhaps, only with the passing of the generation that experienced this War 1st hand can emotion be separated from fact ; this it is something which must be done.

The general presumption goes something like this : Willem Mengelberg was of German stock, was German-trained and admired all things German. He actively supported his Nazi conquerors, in return for favor and high honours.

As with most myths, there are some facts that appear to support the charges. He did indeed lead the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra throughout the War, right up to the liberation of Holland, at which time he precipitously departed for Switzerland. Many of his concerts were attended by uniformed Nazi officials (as were orchestral concerts all in other occupied capitals) . Those officials, unasked, enrolled him in their cultural organizations, and he was photographed in the company of these same officials.

Mengelberg's actions were, however, hardly those of a political zealot, and the damning appearances were, to a great extent, the careful creation of the Nazi propaganda machine. Just as Sir Thomas Beecham appeared to be in the presence of Adolf Hitler, during his 1936 visit to Berlin (in fact a pasted-together photographic montage, Beecham being at his hotel that evening) , the tone of Mengelberg's supposed « collaboration » was established at the beginning of the War through falsehood. Major Dutch newspapers published a report that the conductor, then on vacation at Bad Gastein, had toasted the fall of Holland with a glass of champagne, something that was widely believed both during and after the War. A lack of repudiation (at the time) has always been held against Mengelberg, despite the fact that when this « news » article appeared there was no longer a free press in Holland and certainly no forum in which to make any rebuttal. The accompanying photograph showing the conductor with glass raised was an old one, taken after a rehearsal (not the claimed « toast ») . The « event » never happened.

It is certain that Mengelberg led an active musical life during occupation, not only in Holland, but also through tours to France, Austria, Hungary, Italy and Germany in various years. He even recorded the Tchaïkovsky 5th Symphony with the Berlin Philharmonic for « Telefunken », in July 1940, which may have been the final straw, a continuing affront to Dutch political sensitivity.

In Mengelberg's defense, his admirers cite political « naïveté » and his totally apolitical nature, for which there is considerable anecdotal evidence. His humor could be scathing and did not stop at topics that were politically acceptable to the occupying powers. One concert, in October 1940, featured the banned Mahler 1st Symphony, and he was generally aggressive in protection of all artistic matters. While it was not something talked about during the War, Mengelberg quietly used his reputation to save Jewish members of his Orchestra from deportation. After the War, when voices were needed to speak-up in his defense, public disapproval of his person was so intense that those saved were not willing to step into the spotlight of public approbation.

Mengelberg's problem was that, in June 1945, immediately after liberation when scapegoats were needed, nobody was willing to believe anything good of him. While living in Switzerland, he was brought in absentia before a military committee and sentenced to permanent exile in Switzerland, where he had a summer home near the borders with Austria and Italy. Aside from exile, his « Concertgebouw » pension was revoked and Queen Wilhelmina withdrew a previously awarded Gold Medal of Honour for Arts and Sciences. Mengelberg later decided to fight, and received quiet support from members of the musical community.

In 1947, a group of musicians, including Mengelberg's successor, Eduard van Beinum (who had seen 1st hand what happened within the Orchestra) , sent the following petition to the « Centrale Eereraad » (Central Honour Council for the Arts) :

« The undersigned artists and music lovers, having learned that the case of Professor Willem Mengelberg will shortly come-up before the Honour Council, feel compelled to bear witness to their feeling of deep acknowledgement for everything that Mengelberg has done for Dutch musical life. In the course of 50 years, he made Holland one of the most important musical centers in the world and raised our musical life to a level at which the names of the “ Concertgebouw ” Orchestra and the Amsterdam Choir were internationally known. They are convinced that it is a primary Dutch interest that the name of Willem Mengelberg, which has been symbolic of our country for half a Century, should be removed from the atmosphere of political controversy and passion in which it has become through tragic circumstances and should be returned to art, which is its historic place. »

Even in 1947, this petition caused an uproar, and while careful investigation found no pro-Nazi political activity whatsoever (or support for any degree of collaboration) , as a highly-regarded artist Mengelberg was held to a standard of enlightened perception, in which the Court decided that he should have been aware of the appearance his continuing to concertize had on public opinion. To this day, there are older Dutch citizens who believe he should have resigned from his position at the « Concertgebouw » for the duration of the War. In effect, he was sentenced for not resisting, rather than for any provable act. Despite a harsh written judgement, his exile was then commuted to 6 years, to end in July 1951.

As it was, the term of exile proved to be a death sentence. Not every country that suffered German aggression was concerned by Mengelberg's War-time activities ; offers of engagements from as far away as the Soviet Union were received, but could not be accepted because the conductor's passport was held by Dutch authorities ; without it, he could not leave Switzerland. Had he ventured forth, he would have functioned as a Stateless person but, in the stubborn Dutch way, he accepted what had been handed down and lived quietly until his death, a week short of his 80th birthday.

Mengelberg was not forgotten. New American Classical labels such as « Mercury » struck deals with German labels like « Telefunken » for U.S. issue (on 78 rpm discs) of a few of his War-time recordings, and « Telefunken » eventually released some of these on early LP's under their own name. « Philips » also selected « Concertgebouw » radio broadcasts for a Dutch LP series, and gave the Schubert 9th and Mahler 4th Symphonies wider circulation. These transfers eventually made their appearance on CD, and have circulated intermittently. In the digital age the conductors' legacy has been most effectively promoted by small companies offering historic reissues.

Had Mengelberg chosen to « sit out » the War or, at least, restrict his activities to his home Orchestra, perhaps things might have been different. Wilhelm Furtwängler did not live much longer than Mengelberg (although, of course, he was younger, and in better health) , but once the German was declared free of Nazi taint, he became one of the most sought-after conductors in Europe ; in fact, his widow believes Furtwängler's inability to say « no » led to overwork that contributed to his final illness. From his later studio recordings and many taped concerts grew the cult of his art that flourishes today. Mengelberg suffered heart problems during the War, but had he survived it with his reputation intact, doubtless would have been offered new recording opportunities (on tape) , and with them a new public. As it is, while he has not been forgotten, Willem Mengelberg has become a specialist favourite, one whose high-powered recordings of familiar Classics must be heard through 78 rpm clicks or acetate crackle, or more dimly when these supposed defects are filtered. Luckily for us, techniques of 78 rpm transfer have shown great improvement in the last few years, and the best reveal more than ever before of his greatness. It is to be hoped that the final judgement of history will rest on what Willem Mengelberg accomplished, not on untruth and misrepresentation.

Long may his art be preserved.

Joseph Willem Mengelberg was a Dutch conductor, famous for his performances of Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Mengelberg was the 4th of 15 children of German-born parents in Utrecht, Netherlands. His father was the well-known Dutch-German sculptor Friedrich Wilhelm Mengelberg. After studies in Utrecht with the composer and conductor Richard Hol, the composer Anton Averkamp (1861-1934) and the violinist Henri Wilhelm Petri (1856-1914) , he went on to study piano and composition at the Cologne Conservatory (now, the « Hochschule für Musik Köln ») , where his principal teachers were Franz Wüllner, Isidor Seiß and Adolf Jensen. In 1891, when he was 20, he was chosen as General Music-Director of the city of Lucerne, in Switzerland, where he conducted an Orchestra and a choir, directed a music-school, taught piano lessons and continued to compose. 4 years later, in 1895, when he was 24, Mengelberg was appointed principal conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, a position he held until 1945.

In this position, Mengelberg was to premiere a number of Masterpieces. For example, in 1898, Richard Strauß dedicated his tone-poem « Ein Heldenleben » to Mengelberg and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, telling journalists that he « had at last found an Orchestra capable of playing all passages, so that he no longer needed to feel embarrassed when writing difficulties » . Among other notable premieres were those on March 29th, 1939, when Mengelberg conducted the premiere of the Violin Concerto No. 2 by Béla Bartók with violinist Zoltán Székely ; and, on November 23rd, 1939, he premiered the « Peacock Variations » of Zoltán Kodály.

Mengelberg founded the long-standing Mahler tradition of the « Concertgebouw » . He met and befriended Gustav Mahler in 1902, and invited Mahler to conduct his 3rd Symphony in Amsterdam, in 1903 ; and, on October 23rd, 1904, Mahler led the Orchestra in his 4th Symphony twice in 1 concert, with no other work on the program. Mahler wrote to his wife Alma Mahler that this programming idea (presumably Mengelberg's) was a « stroke of genius » . Mahler regularly visited The Netherlands to introduce his work to Dutch audiences, including also his 1st, 5th, and 7th Symphonies, as well as « Das Klagende Lied » and « Kindertotenlieder » . Mahler edited some of his Symphonies while rehearsing them with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, making them sound better for the acoustics of the « Concertgebouw » . This is, perhaps, one reason that this concert-hall and its Orchestra is renowned for its Mahler tradition. In 1920, Mengelberg instituted a Mahler Festival in which all the composer's music was performed in 9 concerts.

Mengelberg also founded, in 1899, the annual « Concertgebouw » tradition of performing the « Saint-Matthew Passion » of Johann Sebastian Bach on Palm Sunday. One criticism of Mengelberg's influence over Dutch musical life, most clearly articulated by the composer Willem Pijper, was that Mengelberg did not particularly champion Dutch composers during his « Concertgebouw » tenure, especially after 1920.

Mengelberg was music-director of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1922 to 1928. Beginning in January 1926, he shared the podium with Arturo Toscanini ; Toscanini biographer Harvey Sachs has documented that Mengelberg and Toscanini clashed over interpretations of music and even rehearsal techniques, creating division among the musicians that eventually resulted in Mengelberg leaving the Orchestra. However, the Mæstro did make a series of recordings with the Philharmonic for both the « Victor Talking Machine Company » and « Brunswick Records » , including a 1928 electrical recording of Richard Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben » that was later re-issued on LP and CD. One of his 1st electrical recordings, for « Victor » , was a 2 disc set devoted to « A Victory Ball » by Ernest Schelling.

Mengelberg was described by Fred Goldbeck as « the perfect dictator/conductor, a Napoleon of the Orchestra » .

Alan Sanders writes :

« His treatment of the Orchestra was autocratic. In later years, his behaviour became extreme, and there are extraordinary stories of abusive verbal exchanges between him and his players at rehearsal. »

Berta Geißmar records an incident in 1938 when Mengelberg rehearsed the London Philharmonic Orchestra in the « Vorspiel und Liebestod » from « Tristan und Isolde » and he gave them tortuous lectures as though they had never seen the music before.

The most controversial aspect of Mengelberg's biography centers on his actions and behaviour during the years of the Nazi occupation of Holland, between 1940 and 1945. His biographer Fritz Zwart writes (for Radio Nederland) of an « interview Mengelberg had given with the “Völkische Beobachter”, the German Nazi newspaper. The gist of it was that, on hearing of the Dutch surrender to the German invaders on May 10th, 1940, he had brought a toast with a glass of champagne and had also spoken about the close bond existing between the Netherlands and Germany. » Zwart also notes that Mengelberg conducted in Germany and in German-occupied countries throughout the War, and was photographed in the company of Nazis such as Arthur Seyß-Inquart. Explanations have ranged from political « naïveté » in general, to a general « blind spot » for criticism of anything German, given his own ancestry. After the War, in 1945, the Netherlands' Honour Council for Music banned him from conducting in the Netherlands for life ; in 1947, after an appeal by his lawyers, the Council reduced his ban to 6 years, though also in 1947, Queen Wilhelmina withdrew his Gold Medal of Honour. This notwithstanding, he continued to draw a pension from the Orchestra until 1949 when cut-off by the City Council of Amsterdam. Mengelberg retreated in exile to Zuort, Sent, Switzerland, where he remained until his death in 1951, just 2 months before the expiration of his exile order. Willem Mengelberg was the uncle of the musicologist and composer Rudolf Mengelberg and of the conductor, composer and critic Karel Mengelberg, who was himself the father of the improvising pianist and composer Misha Mengelberg.

Mengelberg's recordings with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra are marked by frequent use of an unusually prominent « portamento », the sliding of the string players' left fingers from one note to another. The scholar Robert Philip has shown that Mengelberg's recordings with other Orchestras do not show this « portamento », and that « the unusual approach to “ portamento ” was a stylistic feature which he developed with the “ Concertgebouw ” over a long period of rehearsal, and that it was not a style which could be transferred to other Orchestras when Mengelberg visited them ». Philip also notes that this « portamento » required the strings to use uniform fingering prescribed by Mengelberg, and that this was also unusual for the time, when much orchestral fingering was typically « free », with different players fingering a passage differently. Freely-bowed « portamento » sounded lighter than that we hear in Mengelberg's recordings, as not all players would slide on the same notes. Philip mentions recordings by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, under Bruno Walter, as examples of this style.

In addition, Mengelberg employed fluctuations of tempo that were extreme even in an era in which tempo fluctuation was more common than in modern practice. While admirers of Mengelberg value his tempo inflections, detractors have criticized them. For example, the musicologist and music theorist Walter Frisch has argued that « in the Brahms performances recorded by Willem Mengelberg, tempo fluctuation too often tends to obscure the broader shape of a passage or movement ». Frisch argues that this obscuring of structure does not result from the tempo fluctuations of 2 conductors he admires who also used much tempo inflection : Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hermann Abendroth.

Mengelberg made commercial recordings in the United States with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for « Victor » (1922-1930) and « Brunswick » (1926-1927) . In Amsterdam with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, he made a series of records issued in various countries on the « Columbia » and « Odeon » labels (1926-1932) as well as 2 works recorded for the Dutch branch of « Decca », in 1935. Mengelberg recorded with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra for « Telefunken » (1937-1942) . After his death, « Philips » issued recordings of live-performances recorded by Dutch radio services, and these have been re-issued by « Decca » . In addition to his recordings of Richard Strauß's « Ein Heldenleben » , Mengelberg left discs of Symphonies by Beethoven, Tchaikovsky and Brahms, and Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

His most characteristic performances are marked by a tremendous expressiveness and freedom of tempo, perhaps most remarkable in his recording of Mahler's 4th Symphony but certainly present in the aforementioned « Saint-Matthew Passion » and other performances as well. These qualities, shared (perhaps, to a lesser extent) by only a handful of other conductors of the era of sound recording, such as Wilhelm Furtwängler and Leonard Bernstein, make much of his work unusually controversial among Classical music listeners ; recordings that more main-stream listeners consider unlistenable will be hailed by others as among the greatest recordings ever made.

Many of his recorded performances, including some live-concerts in Amsterdam during World War II, have been re-issued on LP and CD. While he was known for his recordings of the German repertoire, « Capitol Records » issued a powerful, nearly High-Fidelity recording of César Franck's Symphony in D minor, recorded in the 1940's by « Telefunken » with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Due to the Dutch government's 6 year ban on Mengelberg's conducting activities, he made no more recordings after 1945. Some of his performances in Amsterdam were recorded on the innovative German tape-recorder, the « Magnetophon » , resulting in unusually High-Fidelity for the time. Sound films of Mengelberg conducting the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, during live-concerts in Amsterdam, have survived. Among these are a 1931 performance of Weber's « Oberon » Overture and a 1939 performance of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » .

The celebrated Dutch conductor, Josef Willem Mengelberg, studied in Utrecht under Richard Hol, Henri Wilhelm Petri and Anton Averkamp and then went to the Music School in Cologne to study under Franz Wüllner and Adolf Jensen ; he took 1st prize in piano, composition and orchestral conducting.

Willem Mengelberg made his debut as a pianist, at a very young age, and took-over leadership of the Lucerne City Conservatory, in 1891. Only 4 years later, in 1895, he was nominated musical director of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam, and did not leave this post until 1945. At the same time, he became conductor of the internationally famous Amsterdam « Toonkunst » choir, which he incorporated into performances of orchestral works requiring large choirs, such as his annual performance of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » (BWV 244) by Johann Sebastian Bach. He met and befriended Gustav Mahler, in 1902, after which date Mengelberg tirelessly promoted Mahler's works. From 1907 to 1920, he conducted the Frankfurt Museum concerts and, from 1921 to 1929, the New York National Symphony Orchestra. During this time, he entrusted the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra to various principal guest-conductors, such as Bruno Walter, Karl Muck and Pierre Monteux. Mengelberg then returned to Amsterdam after differences with Arturo Toscanini, with whom he had conducted the New York Orchestra on equal terms (1928-1929) . Utrecht University set-up a chair for him, in 1933, but he never taught there other than holding his inaugural lecture. He was forbidden to work in Holland, in 1945, due to his co-operation with the occupation troops and went to Switzerland for the rest of his life.

Willem Mengelberg is one of the most important Gustav Mahler interpreters of his generation. In 1920, he conducted the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam in all 10 Mahler Symphonies, in 9 concerts for his 25th anniversary with the Orchestra. He promoted contemporary music and conducted 1st performances of the works of the following composers : Henk Badings Symphony No. 1 (1930) and Symphony No. 3 (1935) ; Béla Bartók 2nd Violin Concerto (1939) with Zoltán Székely ; Paul Hindemith « Der Schwanendreher » (1935) with assistance from the composer and « Konzert für Violine und Orchester » (1940) ; Zoltán Kodály Suite from « Hary Janos » (1927) and « Felszallott a pava » (1939) ; Darius Milhaud « Carnaval d'Aix » (1926) ; Max Reger « Konzert im alten Stil » (1912) ; and Ottorino Respighi « Concerto in modo misolido » (1924) .

During his half-Century with Amsterdam's « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg was at the epicentre of Dutch music making. The blazing intensity of his performances and his imposing stage presence won him legions of adoring fans. His inspired use of rubato, or « borrowed » time, is still widely admired. His rise to fame was rapid and comprehensive. He studied in Utrecht and Cologne before being appointed general music-director of the city of Lucerne, aged just 20, where he conducted an orchestra and choir, directed a music school and gave piano lessons. 4 years later, in 1895, he found himself at the helm of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

Within a short time, Mengelberg had turned the « Concertgebouw » into a world-class outfit. His achievements seem all the more astonishing considering his young age and relative inexperience. Even the notoriously exacting Gustav Mahler was bowled over by the « Concertgebouw » 's performances of his 1st and 3rd Symphonies during a visit to the Netherlands, in 1903. He considered Mengelberg an unparalleled interpreter of his music. In 1898, Richard Strauß dedicated his swashbuckling « Ein Heldenleben » to Mengelberg and his Orchestra. Sergei Rachmaninov (who had played his 2nd and 3rd Piano Concertos under Mengelberg) followed suit, in 1913, with his Choral Symphony « The Bells » .

Mengelberg conducted the world-premiere of Béla Bartók's 2nd Violin Concerto with Zoltán Székely, in 1939. He was now at the height of his powers and in demand throughout Europe and America as a guest artist. However, his cooperative relationship with Nazi Germany left him with few friends. He was banned from conducting in the Netherlands and stripped of his Dutch passport, in 1945. He spent the remainder of his life in exile in Switzerland. His hypnotic style of conducting is captured in compelling recordings of Richard Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben and Franz Liszt's « les Préludes » . But for full immersion, his heartfelt rethink of Gustav Mahler's 4th Symphony is an experience that should not be missed.

Mengelberg developed a prominent portamento (sliding between notes) techniques with the strings of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, which can be clearly heard on his recordings.

The Dutch Symphonic conductor Willem Mengelberg was formed in the Romantic tradition. During his tenure with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (1895-1945) , he developed it into one of the world's finest ensembles.

Trained as a pianist at the Cologne Conservatory, he became a conductor at Luzern (Switzerland) , in 1891. He became renowned as an interpreter of Ludwig van Beethoven, Gustav Mahler, and Richard Strauß, who dedicated his tone poem « Ein Heldenleben » (A Hero's Life) to Mengelberg. He toured widely with the « Concertgebouw » , was regular conductor (1911-1914) of the London Symphony and the Royal Philharmonic Society, and was guest-conductor (1921-1930) of the New York Philharmonic (and of its predecessor, the National Symphony, before the merger of both) , serving, for several years, as co-conductor with Arturo Toscanini.

Near the end of World War II, Mengelberg fled the Netherlands for Switzerland. In 1945, a Dutch Council convicted him, « in absentia » , of having been a Nazi collaborator and sentenced him to exile for life (later reduced to exile for 6 years) .

Wilhelm Furtwängler's only contemporary to approach and even, perhaps, surpass him on occasion was the Dutch conductor, Willem Mengelberg. His recordings, too, have witnessed a spectacular come-back, although in his case the Jews are far more uncomfortable. Henry Fogel cannot bring himself to utter a dispensatory word on his behalf. While Furtwängler was little more than emotionally or artistically sympathetic to National-Socialism, Mengelberg was dedicated heart and soul to Adolf Hitler. He coined 1940's German invasion of Holland as his country's liberation from Jewish tyranny. Like Furtwängler, his reputation was world-wide and he would have been welcomed in the United States, where he could have lived-out his life in safety. Instead, he publicly endorsed the greatness of National-Socialism at every occasion and performed all over the « Reich » . Even so, he was a vigorous champion of Dutch music and all of Holland's best modern composers owed their early success to him.

Mengelberg was dedicated heart and soul to Adolf Hitler.

Like Furtwängler, Josef Willem Mengelberg's reputation was world-wide !

No less importantly, Mengelberg molded the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra into what many regarded as the finest Symphonic ensemble ever put together. The man's contributions to music are staggering. Even so, he never joined any National-Socialist organisation (Dutch or German) , and did not work for the War effort, save to perform concerts for troops on R&R , German as well as Dutch, and all the other Aryan nationalities who banded together under the Swastika to fight Soviet Communism. He was content to lend the weight of his legendary reputation to support National-Socialism and did what he could for it with the thing he knew best : conducting great music better than anyone else in the world !

For this harmless involvement in the Movement, Willem Mengelberg was sentenced to death in absentia (i.e. , condemned without a hearing) by Holland's Allied-dominated Supreme Court after the War. Fleeing for his life, he found refuge in Spain. It is to Francisco Franco's eternal credit that he refused to turn-over the proscribed musician to the Dutch authorities for extradition and execution. Broken in spirit and health, the Mæstro never again lifted his baton to call forth the incomparably magnificent sounds only he knew how to conjure from an orchestra. He died in exile 6 years later, condemned and despised by his own countrymen, but cherished and protected by beloved foreigners. The once supreme Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » he created declined under the mediocrity of more politically-correct directors like bland Bernard Haitink, until the orchestra scarcely rated as a world-class organisation. Yet, his ghost is avenging itself on all these post-War no-accounts, who are rapidly being forgotten, while Mengelberg's recordings enjoy a resurgence of unprecedented popularity.

Willem Mengelberg (geboren 28. März 1871 in Utrecht ; gestorben 22. März 1951 in Zuort, Sent, Graubünden ; eigentlich Joseph Wilhelm Mengelberg) war ein niederländischer Dirigent und Komponist.

Mengelbergs Eltern Friedrich Wilhelm Mengelberg und Helena Schrattenholz waren von Geburt Deutsche und waren 1869, zwei Jahre vor seiner Geburt, von Köln nach Utrecht gezogen, wo sie ein Atelier zur Herstellung von Kirchenmöbeln und Altargegenständen begründeten. Mengelberg war das vierte Kind und hatte 15 Geschwister. Er studierte Klavier und Komposition an der Hochschule für Musik Köln. Sein erster Auftritt als Dirigent erfolgte mit dem dortigen Gürzenich-Orchester. 1892 wurde er Generalmusikdirektor in Luzern. 1895 wurde er als Nachfolger von Willem Kes, der eine damals als besser geltende Stellung beim Scottish Orchestra antrat, Leiter des Concertgebouw-Orchesters in Amsterdam. Von 1907 bis 1920 nahm er darüber hinaus eine Tätigkeit als Dirigent des Frankfurter Museumsorchesters an. Mengelberg war danach auch in den USA tätig, von 1922 bis 1928 als Musikdirektor der New Yorker Philharmoniker und damit als Rivale von Arturo Toscanini, der seit 1926 ebenfalls dieses Orchester dirigierte. Mengelberg gab die Stelle auf, nachdem sich aufgrund grundsätzlicher Differenzen mit Toscanini das Orchester in ein Toscanini- und ein Mengelberg-Lager zu spalten begann. Außerdem verlangte man von ihm häufigere Programmwechsel, wofür Mengelberg (der ausgiebig probte und während der Proben außerdem noch lange Ausführungen über den Komponisten machte) die Probenzeit nicht für ausreichend bemessen hielt.

In den Niederlanden war Mengelberg, der das Concertgebouw-Orchester zu einem der virtuosesten Orchester der Welt machte, zu dieser Zeit ein Nationalheld, der mit Ehrungen überschüttet wurde. Man machte ihn 1898 zum Ritter des Ordens von Oranien-Nassau, 1902 zum Offizier desselben, 1907 zum Ritter des Ordens vom Niederländischen Löwen. Außerdem erhielt er 1907 die Silber- und 1913 die Goldmedaille der Künste und Wissenschaften im Hausorden von Oranien. 1920 wurde er Komtur, 1934 Großkomtur des Ordens von Oranien-Nassau. Außerdem erhielt er 1934 eine außerordentliche Professur für Musikwissenschaft an der staatlichen Universität Utrecht. Porträts von Mengelberg wurden durch die Künstler Pier Pander, Jan Toorop, Jan Sluijters und Kees van Dongen erstellt.

Anfang Juli 1940 sank sein Stern in den Niederlanden, nachdem ein Interview mit dem Völkischen Beobachter im De Telegraaf nachgedruckt wurde, ebenso durch ein weiteres Interview im August 1940 mit dem Telegraaf, das als abfällig gegenüber dem niederländischen Musikleben gedeutet wurde, sowie durch eine Fotoserie, die ihn in Berlin, und andere vor einem Konzertplakat mit den Berliner Philharmonikern zeigte. Mengelberg kooperierte während der Besatzungszeit 1940 bis 1945 mit den Deutschen und gab Konzerte für führende Nationalsozialisten wie Arthur Seyß-Inquart, was ihm internationale Kritik eintrug. Mengelberg rechtfertigte seine internationale Tätigkeit mit dem Vergleich, daß, so wie die

Sonne für alle scheine, die Musik für alle Völker da sei. Noch im Herbst 1940 führte er die 1. Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler auf. Außerdem verhandelte er für Juden und niederländische Staatsbürger (Carl Flesch, den Flötisten Hubert Barwahser, Ernst Laqueur, die Pianistin Sara Bosmans-Benedicts und viele weitere) mit den deutschen Besatzungsbehörden. Aufgrund dessen erging zu Mengelbergs 70. Geburtstag 1941 eine Anweisung an die deutsche Presse, den Geburtstag mit einer gewissen Reserviertheit zu begehen, da Mengelberg sich « sein Leben lang für Gustav Mahler eingesetzt (hat) », sich in München abfällig über Deutschland geäußert (hat) und heute noch (1941) 12 Juden in seinem Orchester beschäftigt » .

Mengelberg erhielt 1945 im Rahmen der Entnazifizierung ein zunächst lebenslanges, nach der Berufungsverhandlung 1947 auf sechs Jahre reduziertes Auftrittsverbot in den Niederlanden. Sein Pass wurde eingezogen, und man erkannte ihm seine Ehrungen ab. Mengelberg begriff diese Maßnahmen nicht. Er berief sich darauf, daß seine gesamte Tätigkeit in 50 Berufsjahren nur dem Wohle der Niederlande, der Stadt Amsterdam und des Concertgebouw-Orchesters gedient habe und daß er fälschlicherweise geglaubt habe, dies sei in der Öffentlichkeit auch verstanden worden. 1946 schrieb er an Ellie Bysterus Heemskerk (eine Geigerin im Concertgebouw-Orchester) :

« Wenn ich etwas getan hätte, würde ich es verstehen, aber ich bin nie in etwas verstrickt gewesen. »

In seinem Exil in Zuort in der Schweiz erhielt er bis 1949 noch die Pension des Concertgebouw-Orchesters, bis der Rat der Stadt Amsterdam auch diese strich. Mengelberg starb zwei Monate vor dem Ende des verkürzten Auftrittsverbots. Nach Mengelbergs Tode dirigierte Otto Klemperer für ihn ein Gedächtniskonzert. Klemperer bewunderte Mengelberg eher als einen musikalischen beziehungsweise einen Orchestertrainer denn als einen Dirigenten. Ein Glückwunschtelegramm, das Mengelberg an Hitler gesandt haben soll, bezeichnete Klemperer als eine « Dummheit » .

Mengelberg, der unter dem Einfluss seines Kompositions- und Dirigierlehrers Wüllner stand, war ein begeisterter Anhänger von Richard Strauß, dessen Ein Heldenleben ihm gewidmet ist. Er bevorzugte unter den Komponisten aber nicht nur Strauß sowie Beethoven. Auch dem Werk von Schönberg, Pijper, Hindemith, Reger und Diepenbrock verhalf er zu Anerkennung, zum Teil durch niederländische Erstaufführungen.

Er begründete 1899 jährliche Aufführungen von Bachs Matthäus-Passion am Palmsonntag und einen jährlichen Beethoven-Zyklus und widmete Künstlern wie Mahler und Strauß auch zahlreiche Musikfeste.

Mit Mahler, dessen Musik er 1903 kennengelernt hatte, war er befreundet. Er förderte ihn durch die Aufführung seiner Werke in den Niederlanden. Ein Höhepunkt war das Mahlerfest in Amsterdam zum 25-jährigen Dirigentenjubiläum Willem Mengelbergs im Jahr 1920. Mengelberg hatte Mahlers Sinfonien mit dem Komponisten selbst studiert und die Partituren Takt für Takt mit Bemerkungen versehen. Mengelbergs Aufnahme von Mahlers 4. Sinfonie gilt daher als den Intentionen des Komponisten besonders nahestehend.

1960 ist mit den Einspielungen Mengelbergs aus den Jahren 1939 bis 1940 die erste Gesamtausgabe von Beethovens Sinfonien erschienen. Mengelberg tritt darin als ein konservativer Tonkünstler hervor, schmissig, aber auch (etwa in der 6. Sinfonie) einfühlsam, ja, verspielt bis hin zur Ironie.

Insgesamt nahm Mengelberg für eine Reihe von Plattenfirmen etwa 90 Werke kommerziell auf, außerdem etwa 40 weitere für den niederländischen Rundfunk.

L'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam

L'Orchestre royal du « Concertgebouw » (« Koninklijk Concertgebouworkest ») est l'Orchestre symphonique le plus important et le plus célèbre des Pays-Bas.

Son nom provient du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam, le bâtiment (réputé pour son acoustique) où il donne la plupart de ses concerts. Son titre « royal » lui a été conféré par la reine Beatrix en 1988.

Le « Concertgebouw » est inauguré le 11 avril 1888 mais ce n'est que quelques mois plus tard que l'Orchestre du même nom est fondé. Son 1er concert a lieu le 3 novembre 1888, l'Orchestre étant alors dirigé par Willem Kes.

7 ans plus tard, c'est Willem Mengelberg qui en devient le principal chef d'orchestre. Il reste à sa tête jusqu'en 1945, soit durant 50 ans, un laps de temps assez inhabituel pour un directeur musical (2 autres exemples célèbres sont Evgeni Mravinski à l'Orchestre philharmonique de Léningrad et Eugene Ormandy à l'Orchestre de Philadelphie) .

Mengelberg est généralement considéré comme le chef ayant donné à l'Orchestre sa carrure internationale. Durant son « règne » , on compte parmi les invités de l'Orchestre les noms prestigieux de Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy, Igor Stravinsky, Béla Bartók, Edward Elgar, Serge Rachmaninov, Serge Prokofiev.

En 1945, c'est Eduard van Beinum qui succède à Mengelberg. Après son décès subit, en 1959, Bernard Haitink et Eugen Jochum se partagent la direction ; le 1er restant le chef principal jusqu'en 1988.

L'Orchestre est sous le patronage de la reine consort Máxima, épouse du roi Willem-Alexander des Pays-Bas.

Les œuvres du Romantisme tardif font partie du répertoire de prédilection de l'Orchestre royal du « Concertgebouw » . Ses interprétations de Gustav Mahler, Anton Bruckner et Richard Strauß font particulièrement référence. L'Orchestre est régulièrement cité comme l'un des meilleurs du monde. Sa sonorité soyeuse, sa transparence, la chaleur et la beauté de ses pupitres, l'ampleur de ses grands tutti en ont fait un Orchestre de légende, comparable dans sa perfection et sa « signature sonore » aux Philharmoniques de Vienne et de Berlin.

...

The Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (in Dutch : « Koninklijk Concertgebouworkest ») is the 1st Symphony Orchestra of the Netherlands, based at the Royal « Concertgebouw » (concert-hall) in Amsterdam. In 1988, Queen Beatrix conferred the « Royal » title upon the Orchestra.

The « Concertgebouw » opened on 11 April 1888. The « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, however, was not founded until a little later. It gave its 1st concert in the « Concertgebouw » , on 3 November 1888, under the principal conductor for its 1st 7 years, Willem Kes.

In 1895, Willem Mengelberg became chief conductor and remained in this position with the organization for 50 years, an unusually long tenure for a music-director. He is generally regarded as having brought the Orchestra to a level of major international significance, with a particular championing of such (then) contemporary composers as Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß.

For approximately its 1st 75 years, the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra had a somewhat complicated roster of conductors. In addition to the chief conductor, the Orchestra had conductor positions titled « eerste dirigent » (1st conductor) , who assisted the chief conductor with programming, and « tweede dirigent » (2nd conductor) , who did « what he was told » . During Mengelberg's time as chief conductor, several of these 1st conductors included : Karl Muck (1921-1925) ; Pierre Monteux (1924-1934) ; Bruno Walter (1934-1939) ; and Eugen Jochum (1941-1943) . Musicians who served as « 2nd conductor » included composers : Cornelis Dopfer, Evert Cornelis and Eduard van Beinum.

In 1945, because of the controversy over his relationship with the Nazi occupying forces during the German occupation of the Netherlands, during World War II, Mengelberg was removed as chief conductor and, subsequently, banned from conducting. The ban was initially imposed for the remainder of his life, but after an appeal, reduced to 6 years, applied retroactively from 1945. Mengelberg died in 1951 just before the end of his sentence, thus never conducting the Orchestra after 1945.

From 1945 to 1959, the Orchestra's principal conductor was Eduard van Beinum, who had debuted with the Orchestra, in 1929. He had become the 2nd conductor of the Orchestra, in 1931, and co-principal conductor, in 1938. One of his specialties was the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner, and Van Beinum made commercial recordings with the Orchestra of Bruckner's 8th and 9th Symphonies for the « Philips » Records. Van Beinum served as sole chief conductor of the Orchestra after World War II until his sudden death on the « Concertgebouw » podium, from a fatal heart attack in April 1959.

Bernard Haitink made his debut with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, on 7 November 1956. After Van Beinum's death, from 1961 to 1963, Haitink and Eugen Jochum shared the post of chief conductor of the Orchestra. Haitink became sole chief conductor, in 1963, and served in this post until 1988. At some point, during Haitink's time, the conductor system was simplified to have an assistant conductor instead of 1st and 2nd conductors. Conductors who served in this capacity included Edo de Waart and Hans Vonk. The recording profile of the Orchestra increased most dramatically under Haitink, with many recordings for the « Philips » Records, as well as « EMI » and « Columbia » Records. In the early 1980's, the Dutch government threatened the Orchestra with reductions in its government subsidy that could potentially have led to the dismissal of 23 musicians from the Orchestra. Haitink threatened to resign in protest, and the financial situation was eventually settled. In 1999, Haitink was named the Orchestra's Conductor Laureate.

Riccardo Chailly made his debut with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in 1985, and was elected that year as their next chief conductor to succeed Haitink. As the 1st non-Dutchman to hold the post, Chailly served as chief conductor from 1988 to 2004. His recordings with the Orchestra include complete Mahler and Brahms Symphony cycles and several Bruckner Symphonies. He is a strong advocate of modern music and recorded shorter works of Shostakovich, the complete « Kammermusiken » of Paul Hindemith, and the orchestral works of Igor Stravinsky, Olivier Messiaen and Edgard Varèse. After his departure, in 2004, Chailly was named Conductor Emeritus of the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

The Orchestra enjoyed a close relationship with Gustav Mahler and championed many of his Symphonies, with an especially worthy Festival of his music being the 1920 Mahler Festival. Other conductors who worked closely with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra included Pierre Monteux, Eugen Jochum, George Szell and Kirill Kondrashin, who was the « permanent guest-conductor » , from 1978 until his death in 1981.

Another factor in creating the Orchestra's distinct character is that the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra has had only 6 chief conductors, setting it apart from Orchestras of similar age and caliber. The nearly 1,000 recordings that the Orchestra has to its credit have also contributed to this reputation. The Orchestra also serves as one of the Opera Orchestras for productions of the Dutch National Opera.

L'édifice du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam

Le « Concertgebouw » (« bâtiment de concert » , en néerlandais) est une salle de concert d'Amsterdam située dans l'arrondissement d'Oud-Zuid. Elle sert notamment de résidence à l'Orchestre royal du « Concertgebouw » .

Grâce à sa superbe acoustique, elle est considérée comme l'une des meilleures du monde pour la musique symphonique, aux côtés du « Musikverein » de Vienne et du « Symphony Hall » de Boston. Près de 800 concerts s'y tiennent par année, pour un total de 850,000 personnes accueillies, ce qui en fait l'une des salles de concert les plus visitées du monde.

La décision de construire une grande salle de concert à Amsterdam est prise en 1881 par 6 citoyens notables de la ville. La cause invoquée est l'état désastreux de la vie musicale de la capitale des Pays-Bas, qui ne compte à l'époque que de petites salles, à l'acoustique très pauvre. Est alors choisi pour construire cette nouvelle salle l'architecte néerlandais le plus en vue à l'époque à Amsterdam : Adolf Leonard (Dolf) van Gendt. Il s'inspire du « Neue Gewandhaus » de Leipzig (construit 2 ans auparavant mais détruit en 1943 par des bombardements) pour dessiner un bâtiment dans le style néo-Classique. La construction commence en 1883, dans un pré situé bien au-delà de ce qui étaient alors les limites de la ville. 2,186 piliers de 12 à 30 mètres de profondeur sont implantés dans le sol, qui, sableux, ne se prédisposait pas à une telle construction. Celle-ci s'achève en 1886 mais la salle est contrainte de rester fermée pendant 2 ans, pour cause de querelles incessantes entre les commanditaires et le Conseil municipal qui ne s'entendent pas, notamment sur la construction des routes d'accès et sur l'éclairage public à apporter à celles-ci.

La salle du « Concertgebouw » ouvre enfin ses portes, le 11 avril 1888, par un concert inaugural. Un Orchestre de 120 musiciens et un chœur de 500 personnes est assemblé pour l'occasion, pour un programme rassemblant des œuvres de Wagner, Händel, Bach et Beethoven.

Dès son ouverture, on a regretté que la salle ne disposât pas d'un orgue. L'argent nécessaire à l'achat d'un tel instrument a été réuni en 1890, à la suite de l'organisation d'un concert et d'une loterie. C'est le facteur d'orgue d'Utrecht, Michaël Maarschalkerweerd, qui fut choisi pour réaliser l'instrument. L'architecte Dolf van Gendt fut, quant à lui, rappelé pour dessiner le buffet.

L'orgue a été soigneusement restauré à la fin du 20e siècle par Flentrop Orgelbouw. 2 ans et demi de travail ont été nécessaires pour moderniser le mécanisme et redonner à l'instrument toute sa sonorité d'origine. Une inauguration après cette restauration a eu lieu le 18 mars 1993.

Le bâtiment du « Concertgebouw » est constitué de 2 salles :

La Ire, d'une capacité de 2,000 places environ, est appelée grande salle (« Grote Zaal ») . C'est celle qui accueille les concerts de musique symphonique - et que l'on désigne, la plupart du temps, quand on emploie le terme de « Concertgebouw » . Sa forme est du type « boîte à chaussures » (Shoe Box) et ses dimensions sont les suivantes : 44 mètres de long par 28 mètres de large et 17,5 mètres de haut.

Le temps de réverbération y est de 2,8 secondes sans public et de 2,2 secondes avec, ce qui rend la salle idéale pour le répertoire symphonique en général et, plus particulièrement, pour le répertoire post-Romantique (comme, par exemple : Bruckner, Mahler et Strauß) . Cette excellente acoustique a rendu la grande salle du « Concertgebouw » célèbre dans le monde entier sans que l'on ne connaisse exactement les raisons de ce miracle sonore.

Les noms de nombreux compositeurs Classiques sont inscrits sur les corniches des balcons et les murs de cette salle :

The Royal « Concertgebouw » (in Dutch : « Koninklijk Concertgebouw ») is a concert-hall in Amsterdam, Holland. The Dutch term « Concertgebouw » literally translates into English as « concert building » . On 11 April 2013, on occasion of the building's 125th anniversary, Queen Beatrix bestowed the Royal Title « Koninklijk » upon the building, as she did previously on to the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Because of its highly-regarded acoustics, the « Concertgebouw » is considered one of the finest concert halls in the world, along with places such as Boston's « Symphony Hall » and the « Musikverein » in Vienna.

The architect of the building was Adolf Leonard van Gendt, who was inspired by the « Gewandhaus » in Leipzig, built 2 years earlier (and destroyed in 1943 by Allies bombing) .

Construction began in 1883 in a pasture that was then outside the city, in Nieuwer-Amstel, a municipality that, in 1964, became Amstelveen. 2,186 piles of 12 to 13 metres (40 to 43 feet) in length were sunk into the soil.

The hall opened on 11 April 1888 with an inaugural concert, in which an Orchestra of 120 musicians and a chorus of 500 singers participated, performing works of Wagner, Händel, Bach, and Beethoven. The resident Orchestra of the « Concertgebouw » is the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (« Koninklijk Concertgebouworkest ») , which gave its 1st concert in the hall, on 3 November 1888, as the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (« Concertgebouworkest ») . The Main Hall (« Grote Zaal ») seats 1,974, and is 44 metres (144 feet) long by 28 metres (92 feet) wide, and 17 metres (56 feet) high. Its reverberation time is 2.8 seconds without audience, 2.2 seconds with, making it ideal for the late-Romantic repertoire such as Bruckner, Mahler and Strauß.

A smaller, oval-shaped venue, the Recital Hall (« Kleine Zaal »), is located behind the Main Hall. The Recital Hall is 20 metres (66 feet) long by 15 metres (50 feet) wide. Its more intimate space is well-suited for chamber music and Lieder. The Recital Hall possess 437 seats.

When the « Concertgebouw » was built, acoustics were something of a black art. As in ship building, designers drew upon what had worked in the past without entirely understanding the underlying science. When the building was completed, the acoustics were not perfect, and a lot of effort went into fine-tuning the aural ambience. During later restorations, particular care has been taken not to alter the materials used for interior decoration with this in mind. In the 1980's, the hall embarked on extensive fund raising for renovations after the hall was found to be slowly sinking into the ground. Pi de Bruijn was the architect for the contemporary annex to the original hall.

Today, some 900 concerts and other events per year take place in the « Concertgebouw », for a public of over 700,000, making it one of the most-visited concert halls in the world.

1er septembre 1908 : Arnold Schönberg finishes his 2nd String Quartet, the work which, more than any other, documents the breakaway from traditional concepts of tonality. He dedicates this score to his wife, Mathilde.

Schönberg quotes a distorted version of the popular tune « Ach, du lieber Augustin » (Ah, you dear Augustine) in the 2nd movement of his 2nd String Quartet, at a point where he writes : « All is lost. » - perhaps, a personal message to Mahler ? Schönberg revamps the 3rd and 4th movements so that each include a vocal-part setting on poems by Stefan George, and switches their order, and finally abandons the workings of traditional tonality in the last movement of this piece, writing the 1st piece of truly atonal music, to George's words :

« I feel the air of other planets. »

Richard Strauß finishes his Opera, « Elektra », which will be his last work in a progressive style.

The 15 year old Alois Hába enters the teacher's training college in Kromeriz, begins to develop an interest in Czech nationalism, and hears the works of Bedřich Smetana and Richard Wagner for the 1st time.

5 septembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler travels to Prague for rehearsals of his 7th Symphony.

Début septembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler completes « Das Lied von der Erde » .

Mahler tells Bruno Walter :

« I believe it is the most personal thing I have yet created. »

Again, there is a drastic change in his style, as he enters his « 3rd (and final) period ». Alma in her book recalls how, when their 4 year old daughter Maria had a tracheotomy in 1907, Mahler had paced back and forth in the next room, and as he approached the door to Maria's room, he recoiled each time he heard the horrible wheezing sound of her breathing.

The flutter-tonguing of the woodwinds at the beginning of the 1st movement, « Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde » (The Drinking-song of Earthly Sorrow) may be intended to portray Mahler's recollection of this event.

The entire piece is a setting of poems from Hans Bethge's « The Chinese Flute », which are German adaptations of ancient Chinese poems, with several of Mahler's own additions and adaptations to the text, and forms a sort of synthesis of song-cycle and Symphony.

19 septembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler conducts in Prague the premiere of his 7th Symphony with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, receiving only a lukewarm reception. Arnold Schönberg misses the premiere, remaining in Vienna alone due to his marital crisis, but several of his students are among the group of young Mahler admirers who attend. During rehearsals and after the performance, Mahler revises the score. The public reception of Mahler's last 3 Symphonies has been cool, and it will take 1 year of corresponding with publishers to find one (the small firm of Bote & Bock) willing to print the 7th. He returns the Toblach, the next day, and, over the next 3 weeks, completes the orchestral score to « Das Lied von der Erde » .

Automne 1908 : Anton Webern writes-out his own copy of Arnold Schönberg's « Friede auf Erden », and it is most likely around this time that he composes « Entflieht auf leichten Kähnen » (Flee in light boats) , Opus 2, which is likewise for a cappella chorus, on a text by Stefan George. This piece, and not the « Passacaglia », is the last one Webern composed under the guidance of Schönberg.

In his 1st work written after « graduation » from Schönberg's teaching, but still following very closely in Schönberg's footsteps, Webern is also inspired to set 14 of Stefan George's poems as songs, over the next year. Some of these are eventually published about a decade later as 5 Songs from « Der siebente Ring », Opus 3, and 5 Songs on poems of Stefan George, Opus 4, the other 4 being discovered posthumously and published in 1970. As with Schönberg, the George poems open-up Webern's style, and are also his 1st « atonal » compositions. (Sketches of 2 of them also indicate Webern's passing interest in micro-tonality.)

Arnold Schönberg threatens to commit suicide if Mathilde does not return to him.

27 septembre 1908 : Betraying a further evolution of his style, Arnold Schönberg composes the draft of Opus 15, No. 13, « Du lehnest wider eine Silberweide », the 1st piece without any reference to a key, setting a text which describes the lover getting in a boat while his beloved refuses to join him as he drifts away under the weeping willows. It seems that Schönberg's interest in micro-tonal vocals, as inferred from Anton Webern's experiments with the same (no micro-tonal sketches survive from Schœnberg) , probably began at this time, with this change in style : the vocal part of this song is declamatory, with no trace of the lyricism in Schœnberg's previous songs.

Octobre 1908 : Mainly at the instigation of Anton Webern, Mathilde leaves Richard Gerstl and comes-back home to Arnold Schœnberg. This sours Mathilde's relationship with Webern for the rest of her life.

Now with a much more cynical attitude about love, because of his wife's affair, Schœnberg decides to expand his settings of « Das Buch der hängenden Gärten » (Book of the Hanging Gardens) , of which he has already completed Opus 15, Nos. 3 to 8, into a full cycle of 15 songs, utilizing the whole central section of Stefan George's book, which is an interlude about the discovery of love, whose mood progresses from lyrical to menacing.

19 octobre 1908 : Gustav Mahler travels to Munich to rehearse his 7th Symphony in prevision of its Munich premiere.

27 octobre 1908 : Gustav Mahler conducts the 2nd performance of his 7th Symphony for its Munich premiere.

Début novembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler returns to Vienna for 1 more week.

Richard Gerstl waits, in vain, for an invitation to the up-coming concert of music by Arnold Schœnberg's students. Having disrupted Schœnberg's marriage, of course, he never receives one.

4 novembre 1908 : The distraught Richard Gerstl commits suicide at age 25, making a bonfire of his paintings in his apartment and, then, hanging himself in front of a mirror (rumour also has it that he stabbed himself 1st) .

5 novembre 1908 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 5e concert de la saison.

5 novembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler leaves Vienna, stops over in Berlin, then, visits with old friends upon arriving in Hamburg for an up-coming concert. Alma and daughter Anna (with her governess) arrive a few days later.

8 novembre 1908 : A concert is given in Vienna featuring works by Arnold Schœnberg's students, including the premieres of Anton Webern's « Passacaglia » , Opus 1, and Alban Berg's 12 « Variations on an Original Theme » for piano. Gustav Mahler possibly attends this concert and, also, probably witnesses an early rehearsal of Schœnberg's 2nd String Quartet which he finds difficult to follow.

The Gerstl suicide and the events which precipitated it (his wife's affair with Gerstl) appear to have a powerful effect on Schœnberg ; during the next year, he will compose 4 incredibly original major pieces at an astonishingly fast pace.

Initiating a long-range project, Schœnberg begins sketching his music-drama, « Die glückliche Hand » (literally, « The Lucky Hand » , meaning something like : « The Magic Touch » , in idiomatic English) , which is based very closely on the Gerstl-affair. He also writes the libretto, as well as very elaborate directions for lighting, with deliberate correlations between colour and sound. The characters include 12 « spectral voices » (right at the time when he began putting into practice his radically new idea of using the 12 tones of the 12-edo chromatic scale as independent elements of the harmonic fabric) and a « mythical beast », and the work is, perhaps, the eeriest product of « expressionism » (a genre already noted for eeriness) . He will return to this piece on and off for 5 years, completing it finally in 1913.

9 novembre 1908 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

9 novembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler conducts, in Vienna, the concert featuring Beethoven's 7th Symphony.

12 novembre 1908 : The Mahlers depart from Cuxhaven, for Mahler's 2nd season in America.

16 novembre 1908 : In New York, the « Metropolitan » Opera season begins with Arturo Toscanini conducting Giuseppe Verdi's « Aida » (while Gustav Mahler is still on the ship) . It is a tremendous success for Toscanini who, from this point, on will be at odds with the other conductor at the « MET » : Mahler.

18 novembre 1908 : Le chef Siegfried Ochs dirige la création berlinoise du « Psaume 150 » de Bruckner (WAB 38) avec l'Orchestre et le Chœur du Philharmonique, accompagnés par la soprano Jeanette Grumbacher-de Jong.

22 novembre 1908 : The Mahlers arrive in New York, this time living at the « Hotel Savoy » at the corner of 59th Street and 5th Avenue. Mahler has negotiated to begin his season by conducting 3 concerts with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

Du 6 jusqu'au 17 décembre 1908 : Anton Webern is in Berlin, looking for work. At this time, he loves Claude Debussy's Opera, « Pelléas et Mélisande » .

8 décembre 1908 : Gustav Mahler gives the American premiere of his 2nd Symphony with the New York Symphony Orchestra.

21 décembre 1908 : Premiere, in Vienna, of Arnold Schönberg's 2nd String Quartet by the Rosé Quartet. Again, the Schönberg premiere causes a scandal, with more shouting than music. Rosé answers the outcry by scheduling a repeat in January 1909. Schönberg's published attacks to the critics's behavior mark the beginning of his long literary career.

Autour du 25 décembre 1908 : In Vienna, the 11 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold begins serious work on his pantomime, « Der Schneemann » (The Snowman) , the plot of which is written by he and his father, and which will occupy him until Easter of 1909.

25 janvier 1909 : Richard Strauß's Opera, « Elektra » (his most progressive music-score) , is premiered in Dresden, under Ernst von Schuch.

Février 1909 : The 34 year old Arnold Schönberg sketches the song, « Am Strande » (On the beach) , which will remain incomplete, and finishes his song-cycle, « Das Buch der Hangenden Garten » (Book of the hanging gardens) , Opus 15, which contains the 1st pieces which do not refer to traditional tonality at all, and about which he says :

« I have succeeded for the 1st time in achieving an ideal of form and expression that I have had in mind for quite some time, but for which I had previously lacked the courage to execute. »

A letter written later this year shows that Schönberg had been interested in micro-tonality. Considering his later comments on lack of instruments to play micro-tones (in « Harmonielehre ») , and the possible similarities with Anton Webern's work discussed below, his interest in them was probably in connection with the dispassionate declamatory style of the vocal parts written during the 2nd phase of composition of the Stefan George Lieder, Opus 15 (September 1908 - February 1909, particularly in No. 13 « Du lehnest wider eine Silberweide » and « 14 Sprich nicht ») , since both works after Opus 15 will be for instruments alone.

Sketches for 2 of Anton Webern's George-songs, « An Bachesranft » (At the brook's edge) and « Das lockere Saatgefilde » (The relaxed seed-realms) , contain indications for micro-tonal pitches, which are eventually abandoned. At the end of the « Bachesranft » sketch, Webern wrote the same micro-tonal accidentals Schönberg used (see : Arnold Schönberg's letter to Ferruccio Busoni, from 24 August 1909) , showing how true Schönberg's statement was that :

« I have to keep all of my new ideas secret from Webern, because he steals everything as soon as I mention it. »

But, apparently, this worked both ways ...

Webern's notation for the micro-tonal pitches uses little crosses in place of note-heads, which are identical to the notation used a few years later by Schönberg for the « Sprechstimme » (speech-voice) in the published scores of his « Gurrelieder » , « Pierrot lunaire » , and « Die glückliche Hand » and which, therefore, seems to indicate that Webern was the one who originated this idea at least 1 year before Schönberg used it.

13 février 1909 : Arnold Schönberg pays for the 1st publication of his 2nd String Quartet.

19 et 22 février 1909, respectivement : Arnold Schönberg is eager to apply his new melodic and harmonic techniques to instrumental forms, and also composes the 1st and 2nd of his 3 Piano Pieces, Opus 11.

The 1st of these is considered to be the 1st completely atonal composition. Schönberg detests the term « atonal » with which the critics tag his work, preferring « pantonal » , but the negative term sticks like glue and, in later years, Schönberg will use it himself in his own writings.

Mars 1909 : Première américaine de la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner donnée par le chef allemand Max Fiedler à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston.

Max Fiedler

The German conductor and composer Max Fiedler (born August Max Fiedler) was born on 31 December 1859 in Zittau, Saxony, Germany (near the current Czech and Polish borders) ; and died on 1 December 1939 in Stockholm, Sweden. He was especially noted as an interpreter of Johannes Brahms.

Fiedler 1st studied the piano with his father, who conducted the accompanying Orchestra when Max made his 1st public appearance at the age of 10, in 1870, playing Mozart's Piano Concerto in A (K. 488) . Continuing his musical studies in Zittau with the organist Gustav Albrecht, who had been a pupil of Felix Mendelssohn, Fiedler then entered the Leipzig Conservatory in 1877, where the director, Carl Reinecke, was his piano teacher. He graduated in 1882, with exceptional honours, alongside his friend and colleague Karl Muck. Fiedler also studied composition and was active in the city's musical life, developing a close relationship with Julius Spengel, a friend of Brahms.

Fiedler himself knew Brahms sufficiently well for the composer to ask him to substitute for him in a performance of his Piano Concerto No. 2, an invitation which Fiedler politely declined. He almost certainly heard Brahms conduct the 1st Leipzig performances of his Symphony No. 2, early in 1878 (though Ethel Smyth later wrote that Brahms « had the knack of rubbing Orchestras the wrong way. Moreover, the “ Gewandhaus ” musicians were antagonistic to his music ») and his Violin Concerto on New Year's Day, 1879, with the dedicatee, Joseph Joachim, as soloist, though Jan Swafford writes that it « turned-out a scrambling affair, with Joachim unnerved by all the last-minute revisions and Brahms even more tense on the podium than usual » . As a young man, he conducted Brahms' Symphonies in the presence of the composer who, not given to reticence when expressing himself, does not appear to have complained of Fiedler's interpretations.

Having found work teaching at the Hamburg Conservatory, Fiedler was soon much in demand as a pianist, winning high-praise for his « soft tone » . His 1st appearance on the conductor's podium came during the 1885-1886 season in a performance of his own composition (a Symphony) , and his 1st complete concert in late-1886. Encouraged to persevere by his 1st wife, he soon became one of the most popular conductors active in Hamburg, alongside Hans von Bülow, whose musicianship he admired and whose baton technique he adopted. While it was not to be until 1903 that he took-over the direction of the Hamburg Conservatory and, 1904, that of the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1898 onwards, Fiedler was active abroad as a guest-conductor, appearing in Russia (where he was compared to Arthur Nikisch and Felix Weingartner) , Madrid (1899) , Paris (1901) , Turin (1904) , Rome (1906, 1908) and London (1907, 1908) . Throughout this period, he developed a reputation as a major interpreter of the music of Brahms, as well as a conductor with « complete Mastery » of the Orchestra.

In 1908, Karl Muck, then the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, recommended Fiedler as his successor as conductor of the Orchestra, and he was duly appointed, having already appeared in the United States during 1905, when he had conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra alongside Willem Mengelberg and a year before the guest appearance of a German conductor noted for his Brahms, Fritz Steinbach. Although he spent 4 years at the helm in Boston, his conducting attracted some criticism, especially for his volatility as an interpreter, which was viewed as pleasing « the general public » rather than « connoisseurs » . Among his achievements there, he conducted in 1909 the world-premiere of Paderewski's massive Symphony in B minor, entitled « Polonia » .

Fiedler returned to Hamburg in 1912, where Siegmund von Hausegger was now in charge of the Philharmonic Orchestra ; and since co-residence was likely to be difficult, given his own status as a former conductor of this Orchestra, Fiedler withdrew to Berlin, where he became an active guest-conductor of the city's various Orchestras. In 1916, a Berlin music-critic hailed him as « the greatest Brahms conductor of the present-day » and, during the same year, he accepted the position of conductor of the Essen Orchestra, in succession to Hermann Abendroth, who was moving to Cologne to replace Steinbach.

In Essen, Fiedler consolidated his reputation as a major figure in German musical life, conducting a wide repertoire that included contemporary composers such as Walter Braunfels, Karol Szymanowski and Arthur Honegger, as well as each year organizing a Festival devoted to a major single composer. In addition, he guest-conducted the Berlin Philharmonic occasionally and, from 1927, was co-conductor of the Essen « Folkwangschule » . In 1929, he married for the 2nd time and, in 1934, gave-up his position in Essen, returning once more to Berlin where he conducted the Berlin Radio Orchestra, as well as that of Hamburg. During 1939, he made a series of farewell appearances in Berlin and Essen but, towards the end of the year, he became fatally ill, dying in Stockholm, Sweden, just a few weeks short of his 88th birthday.

Fiedler made several commercial recordings, all of music by Brahms, apart from 2 Overtures by Carl Maria von Weber. He recorded the « Academic Festival Overture » , the Symphony No. 2, 2 movements from the Piano Concerto No. 2 and the Symphony No. 4 with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. In addition, a number of his later radio performances have been preserved : these include accounts of Brahms' Violin Concerto and Schumann's Symphony No. 1, from Berlin. Because of his contemporary stature as an interpreter of Brahms and his direct contact with the composer, it is easy to consider Fiedler's performances of Brahms as being in some way « authentic » . However, the English writer Christopher Dymont has written that, while Fiedler was a conductor who « most fully explored every facet of Brahms' emotional world » , nevertheless, his performances, because of their constant shifts of tempo and mannered phrasing (for instance, the frequent introduction of unwritten « luftpausen ») reflected an interpretative model that owed far more to von Bülow than to Brahms. Dymont concluded that, in Fiedler's recording of the Symphony No. 4, for instance, « Brahms' demands for flexibility are here supplied in over-abundance » . On the other hand, it is known that Brahms conducted his music with occasional unwritten tempo changes. Nonetheless, even if Fiedler's recordings do represent a highly-individualised interpretative approach, they still allow a fascinating glimpse into a world of musical performance only imperfectly chronicled, for historical reasons, by the gramophone.

Fiedler's own compositions include a Symphony, an Overture, a Piano Quintet, a String Quartet, piano pieces and songs.

Fiedler had a son named Max George Fiedler (1898-1977) . The younger Fiedler came to the United States in about 1925. From 1930 on, he was engaged in advanced diesel engine research in the hopes of building a cleaner, quieter, and lighter automotive diesel engine. He gave a paper entitled, « A New Theory of Diesel Combustion » , in 1939, the year his father died, at the Franklin Institute in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. A paper discussing Fiedler's work and putting it into a modern context by Baxter and Hiltner was published by ASME, in 2001.

Max Fiedler was born in Zittau, Saxony, where his father was « Musikdirektor ». Max's brother, Hermann Fiedler (1862-1945), and sister, Elise Fiedler, were scholars who moved to England for University teaching. Hermann Fiedler became Head of the German Department of Oxford University. Max Fiedler studied piano and conducting in Leipzig and, then, beginning in 1882, at the Hamburg Conservatory. Max Fiedler made his 1st appearance with the Berlin Philharmonic in 1897. He conducted the Hamburg Philharmonic from 1904 to 1908. In 1905, Fiedler was the 1st German conductor to guest at the Augusteo Orchestra of Rome. He made his American debut with the New York Philharmonic Society, in December, 1905; and the London Symphony Orchestra, in June, 1907. This led to his invitation to conduct the Boston Symphony, it was widely said at the recommendation of Karl Muck. Incidentally, Max Fiedler was not a relation to Arthur Fiedler, the later « Boston Pops » conductor. Unlike his predecessors, Fiedler's conducting experience was orchestral, not with the Opera. In Boston, Fiedler programmed contemporary music, such as Richard Strauß (1864-1949), Alexander Glazunov (1865-1936), Claude Debussy (1862-1918), Jean Sibelius (1865-1957) and Frederick Delius (1862-1934), as well as the Austro-Germanic core repertoire. Fiedler and the Boston Symphony were also the 1st to perform the Bruckner Symphony No. 8 in the United States, in March, 1909. However, not all critics were favourable to Fiedler in Boston :

« Fiedler was selected because of his warm personal friendship with Doctor Muck and as a result of the latter's suggestion. Friendship, however, is no mark of merit. »

Observers said that Fiedler introduced marked accelerations and extremes of tempo in a way, some critics felt, not as called for by the score. This may have resemblances to what some feel to be the mannered interpretations of Willem Mengelberg. Fiedler, according to more than one source, also had the reputation as being something of a « martinet » with Orchestras. After Boston, Fiedler returned to Germany, where he became Music Director of the Essen Orchestra, from 1916 to 1933. Max Fiedler also continued to teach, including in Cologne, and among his students was Einar Hansen, future 1st violin with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, from 1926 to 1965. Max Fiedler continued to conduct a number of German Orchestras and make recordings well into the period of the 3rd « Reich ».

Max Fiedler (1859-1939) is one of only 2 conductors with a direct link to Johannes Brahms to have recorded his works; the other is Felix Weingartner. Yet, as Christopher Dymont pointed-out in a pair of articles published in « Classical Record Collector », a decade ago (Summer and Autumn, 2002), it would be an over-statement to call him a « protégé » of the composer. Fiedler knew Brahms personally, and likely heard him conduct on a few occasions; however, it was as a follower of Hans von Bülow that Fiedler learned what he believed to be the authentic Brahms style, a highly-subjective, rhythmically free approach that was at odds with the more restrained Classicism of Fritz Steinbach, who provided a model for the young Weingartner. Nevertheless, by early in the 20th Century, Fiedler had earned the reputation in Germany as a Brahms specialist, and it was in that capacity that he made his only commercial records for « Grammophon / Polydor », all of which are presented here.

The B-flat Concerto set has an interesting history. Originally recorded over 3 days, in June of 1939, with 4 takes made for nearly every side, Ney was unhappy with some of the results, and wrote to the conductor in the fall of that year about scheduling a remake session. Fiedler was on tour in Stockholm at the time, and replied that it would have to wait until his return. However, his death there, in December of that year, appeared to doom the project.

Ultimately, « Grammophon » scheduled a session for April of the following year with a « ghost » conductor (who remains unknown, although Alois Melichar has been suggested as a likely suspect) . 5 of the 12 sides were done over, with the original Fiedler-conducted takes remaining on Side 3 of the 1st movement (CD 2, Track 3, 8:41 to 13:11) , all of the 2nd and 3rd movements, and the 1st side of the 4th movement (to 3:18 on Track 6) . As far as I am aware, this is the 1st release to acknowledge the extent of Fiedler's participation.

Multiple sources were assembled for each recording, and the best portions of each were used for transfer. The overture and the 4th Symphony came from laminated American Brunswicks ; the 2nd Symphony mostly from black label 1930's « Polydor » pressings ; and the Concerto from 3 different 1940's « Grammophon » and « Polydor » editions. Even so, some inescapable noise and distortion inherent in the original recordings remain.

Like his near contemporary, Fritz Steinbach, whose conducting the composer specially approved, Max Fiedler was a famous Brahmsian. Alas, Steinbach died in 1916, at the age of 61, leaving behind him disciples (Arturo Toscanini, among others) but no recordings. Fiedler, by contrast, died a few weeks before his 80th birthday, leaving behind revered recordings of the 2nd and 4th Symphonies, recordings which have long been of absorbing interest to students of Brahms interpretation as well as to students of late-19th Century performance practice. In this sense, no Brahms library can properly be said to be complete without them.

It was because of this that I was rather taken aback by a remark in the printed insert which accompanies « Beulah » 's new 2-CD set. After criticizing earlier transfer engineers for taking-out too much surface noise and with it the « guts » of the Berlin sound, the writer adds :

« I suppose the tempos remain but that is about all. »

All ? My dear fellow, the interest of these performances lies 1st and foremost (not to mention finally and most importantly) in the tempos : in the way they are chosen, established, and shrewdly modified by Fiedler in the course of performances which so interestingly live, move and have their being. There are other points of interest. The nature of the use of string portamentos : in the case of Fiedler and the Berlin Philharmonic, the selective and highly-discriminating use of it. But it is tempo which is of paramount interest.

Ironically, it is this which enables one to give the present set a qualified welcome. The sound may be awful, but the tempos are plainly audible. « Beulah » 's transfers are unsatisfactory, not because of the decision to leave in high-levels of surface noise, but because of the generally poor and distractingly dissimilar quality of the various 78rpm discs from which the CDs have been made. Since « Biddulph » 's transfers (WHL003/4) are equally unsatisfactory, a search should be initiated forthwith by a skilled transfer engineer for a good clean set of 78's of these remarkable and historically important performances.

Like George Henschel and Arthur Nikisch, the kindly-eyed Max Fiedler, Saxon-born, busy in Hamburg, a friend of Johannes Brahms, had a term of service with the Boston Symphony, from 1908 to 1912. Later, he landed in Essen, conducting in this musically-speaking rather obscure territory for many years before winding-up his career as a freelance in Berlin during the 1930's, running into trouble with the Nazis for programming the Mendelssohn Violin Concerto. He died in Stockholm, shortly after the Second World War started in 1939, he was guest-conducting there regularly and shopping perhaps, like the expatriate « Berliner » , Leo Blech (who had no choice in the matter !) for a Scandinavian haven.

20 years ago, one could write that Fiedler was a virtually forgotten conductor : yes, he had shared repertorial protein with Richard Strauß, Oskar Fried and Hans Pfitzner during « Polydor » 's heyday of electrical recording in the last years of Weimar Berlin, but his fabled « 78's » of Brahms' 2nd and 4th Symphonies, with the « Academic Festival Overture » , acting as an encore, skipped the vinyl years so far as I know. Recently, the return of these gems on CD (plus, the 1939 Brahms' 2nd Piano Concerto with Elly Ney, the Berlin broadcasts of Schumann's « Spring Symphony » , Mozart's C minor Concerto with Lubka Kolessa, and the Brahms' Violin Concerto with Siegfried Borries) have awakened aficionados to the treasure. The ultimate Brahmsian has been found - even if he's only left us the horn call from the 1st Symphony under his wing-collared portrait.

Fiedler's way, of course, is not the only way, but his genial, tender, big-boned style (he would ask his basses to dig in to produce a deep Rembrandtian colour, and he loved the 3rd horn when, with a little extra encouragement, it might take full-toned flight in tandem with lyric strings) remains mightily convincing. Proper Fiedlerites understand that his fluid tissue of tempo modification fits hand-to-glove with Brahms' frequent changes in mood and texture. The modifications are generous, and he doesn't cover his tracks every time, but be advised that Fiedler was a perfectionist of rhythm, he creates a structure in which freedom equals grace.

No better introduction to Fiedler's generous gallery of rubati than a stroll (sometimes a run) through his Berlin Philharmonic Brahms' 4th, dated 1930. The allegro non troppo announces the score and Fiedler, noticing the gentle tidal flow of the opening theme in the violins with its lovely downward-then-upward yawns, begins no faster than an innocent andante, a non-literalism that sounds for all its « wrongness » utterly right. Felicitous deceptions like this happen all the time. Now, Fiedler's non allegro is a tempo conducive to audible remarks from supporting players and when, at measure 5, the horn department turns from harmony to melody, or at any rate near-melody, providing with the 3rd and 4th horns' linked and sloping whole notes a kind of beacon in sound, Fiedler the light-house keeper lets it shine forth with unusual clarity and size. Involved here is the same 3rd horn smiled upon by a lyrical Fiedler in Brahms' 2nd Symphony as it answers more prominently than usual the soaring piano dolce of the 1st violins, at bar 46 in the opening movement.

But Fiedler's opening tempo in the 4th is, he knows very well, not a practical long term investment given the thrust of pages to follow, so he finds an escape phrase soon as he can : Brahms provides it in the 8th bar with the arrival of ardent hairpin'd sequences in the violins, this is where Fiedler shifts to allegro in a flash, as if the wind had suddenly come-up. A daring shift, but cloaked amazingly by the altered configuration of Brahms' innocent page.

Now, Fiedler is in the ballpark of tempo (well, there's still some broadening along the way) which will work for that heavens-eyeing theme in cellos and horns at Letter C, a theme he phrases warmly, luxuriantly, passionately, just a wisp of resignation hovering behind its B minor : Brahms is almost Mozartian here, facing the expressive content of the music in more than one direction.

The theme at Letter C would be lyricism enough for any self-respecting 2nd subject in a Sonata form movement, but Brahms like Mozart has more, a small colony of thematic inspiration in fact. Following a syncopated intra-subject transition dissolving into the sweetest of sequence-strewn benedictions, he floats a wonderfully engaging melody across the orchestral sky, mezzo-forte in flute, clarinet and horn, minor turned to major. Fiedler seizes on the wistfulness that seems the core emotion here, furthering his lyric cause with an « allegretto » (infrequently chosen by conductors, alas) perhaps, a 3rd of the way-up, the metronome from that slow tidal opening toward the high-gear of his Letter C.

Brahms still full of invention as his 1st movement exposition approaches its close offers overlapping « adieux » of high-winds and horn, a light fanfare over trilling timpani, then, quick little motivic fragments pp ma ben marcato. Fiedler makes the pauses around these fragments just a little longer than we expect, like an extra-glance at the forbidden. Then, his tempo boils-up and he's ready for the cross-cuttings of Brahms' cinematic development, several brief variations in which lively contrasts are packaged into a pocket drama easily submitting to generous tempo modification. Fiedler has a field day here, convincing us even when he abandons slightly his respect for a totally organic line.

Up and down the tempo goes, like a chart of profit and loss.

Now, with Brahms' elliptically entered recapitulation moving toward the heightened tragic rush of the movement's Coda, Fiedler is relatively more pressing than in the exposition. The gruff and terrifying canon made from a chopped-up, granitized opening theme, we are at measure 393, he treats as a major obstacle, a jagged wall of sound that must be pryed from the page, as if with a crowbar (and then, sprung from a magnificent tension) , he speeds on, joltless as is his preference, reaching a near-dizzy tempo (40 beats to the minute faster than his bar 1) before Brahms' Coda pounds to its close.

The passacaglia Finale of the 4th with its assorted dramas and micro-climates as its variations unfold is always an interesting interpretive challenge : Erich Leinsdorf in his ultra-conservative « The Composer's Advocate » preaches a straight and narrow path for this music in terms of tempo (which he, himself, was quite capable of abandoning !) but life is not so simple, the artistic life at any rate, as Max Fiedler reminds us with his « No Expressivity Left Behind » performance - and this is not to suggest that his account of the passacaglia is in any way overdone. Although those who say po-tah-to instead of po-ta-to doubtless will, and that is their privilege.

Conductors, Liberal and Conservative alike, can't help noticing that this telescopic wonder has elements suggestive at least of a slow introduction (theme) , 1st subject (variations 1, 2, 3) , slow movement (4, 5, 6) , Scherzo (7, 8, 9) , slow again (especially, 10 and 14-15, also somewhat 12) . In line with this thinking, Fiedler strides very broadly through the giant chords of the 1st 8 measures, becoming even slower as he goes, invoking more the energico e passionato of Brahms' direction than the allegro.

With the 1st variation, he is a little faster, and with the 2nd, a little faster again, as the music seems to unwind like balls of string toyed with by cool kittens in the wind department. Brahms subtitles the 4th variation largamente and this not illogically produces a slightly slower tempo from Fiedler as he positively dances to the dotted rhythm. The stormy weather, at variation 7, with equal logic produces a bit of acceleration, then, at the long-noted and quiet number 10 with its magically dark close, he is sostenuto as can be, and with the piano dolce espressivo Brahms requests for the famous and much argued-over flute solo he takes his time. The depths of « adagio » are reached, however, in the espressivo of the quiet brass chords in 14 and 15, music that seems to reach for some ineffable cleansing of the soul.

In 1931, Fiedler followed his landmark 4th with an equally distinguished Brahms 2nd and it includes one marvelous detail, a secret almost, that I want to share with you. Note that he is just made of the 2nd's opening page a seamless yawn of lyricism. Then, at the deceptively innocent milepost of measure 20, where the melodic motion of the winds gives way to broad support-chords, Fiedler seeing clearly that the crescendo begun in the winds 3 measures earlier from the level of piano has now peaked, says the score, on nothing more than another piano followed immediately by a diminuendo (!) , it seems utterly appropriate, he reasons (and Brahms, himself, might be leaning over his shoulder here and egging him on) to ask his 1st violins who are going about their own business, a big p dolce statement, to suggest, ever so subtly, an increase in gentleness just here, a 3rd or more of the way through a poetically suspended note, this judicious and infrequently invoked option having the effect of allowing us to see spread before us the most blessed Elysian CLEARING, the violins shedding critical hairs of weight from their tone, floating more than they did a mini-moment before as they attacked the beginning of their promontorial note. A case here, perhaps, of May I Nibble at the Neighbors' Diminuendo ? To spell-out all the magic of dynamics in a score can tie a composer in knots. So who comes to the rescue ? That fellow with a baton or fingers to wave at the Orchestra.

Come to think about it, if this commentator with a truck-load of phantom nuances in his listening notes may be so bold : a more palpable violin diminuendo at measure 20 would not unhinge the Earth from its moorings. More praise for Fiedler : his Brahms 2nd Piano Concerto with Elly Ney is a lovely performance, imperturbable but never bland, the music cradled, deposited on a number of Cloud Nines, with a Finale unrivalled perhaps in my experience for its embracing of the grazioso in Brahms' allegretto marking.

No less fine is the Berlin Radio Schumann « Spring » Symphony with its drum and bass-oriented textures, Germanic but not pejoratively so. Verdant chords are as mellow as the euphonious thud of a Mercedes door closing. The Symphony's introduction is delightfully suspenseful : spring will burst all over !

Max Fiedler (1859-1939) was a friend of Johannes Brahms, known as an exemplar of authentic Brahms interpretation, directly influenced by his hearing the composer's own performances. His 1st important post was with the Hamburg Philharmonic, in 1904. He was a guest with the New York Philharmonic during the 1905-1906 season, conducting the London Symphony in 1907, and becoming music-director of the Boston Symphony in 1908. He made few commercial recordings and we are fortunate to have these previously unpublished recordings of his art. He was already 76 at the time these recordings were made ; however, the 1st impression of these recordings is one of youthful abandon, tempered by years of experience with this repertoire. Those who are familiar with Fiedler's commercial recordings will note the similarities, such as the wide range of tempos employed and the pervasive warm expression of his music making.

Siegfried Borries (1912-1980) plays here with unbridled Romanticism, full of juicy slides. It makes him a good match for Fiedler, who is firmly in the late-19th Century tradition of tempo extremes, frequent adjustments of basic tempos, stark contrasts, and a penchant for heart-on-sleeve expressiveness. This is Brahms as rarely (if ever) heard nowadays, though probably this is how Brahms, himself, heard his music performed, and likely similar to how he conducted it himself. The high-quality of both the soloist and Orchestra is shown by their largely flawless performance in concert. It's a truly great reading that every aficionado of Romanticism needs to hear.

For a number of reasons, the performances fascinate. Fiedler, who knew Brahms and was considered a major exponent of his music, here gives support in the composer's Violin Concerto that is as fine as any I know. A similar fascination is provided by Fiedler's account of the Schumann. Here is an interpretive style that is not likely to be heard today. Fiedler favours a wide parameter of tempos within a movement, almost halting the pulse for a 2nd subject, only to whip it up again at the end of a key structural section welcome animation and pointed sparkle contribute to making the reading attractive as well as historically important.

August Max Fiedler (geboren 31. Dezember 1859 in Zittau, Oberlausitz ; gestorben 1. Dezember 1939 in Stockholm) war ein deutscher Dirigent, Komponist und Pianist.

Er erhielt Unterricht bei seinem Vater, dem sorbischen Musiklehrer Karl August Fiedler, und später am Leipziger Konservatorium von 1877 bis 1880 bei Gustav Albrecht. Von 1882 bis 1908 war er am Hamburger Konservatorium als Professor tätig. 1904 wurde er dort auch Dirigent der Philharmoniker. Er unternahm ausgedehnte Konzertreisen. Nach seinem Debüt in Amerika 1905 trat er häufig mit den New Yorker Philharmonikern auf. Von 1908 bis 1912 war Fiedler Leiter des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Nach seiner Rückkehr nach Deutschland wurde er Generalmusikdirektor der Stadt Essen. Dieses Amt hatte er bis 1934 inne. In seinen letzten Lebensjahren war er vor allem in Berlin und Stockholm als Gastdirigent tätig.

Printemps 1909 : Alban Berg completes his Piano Sonata, Opus 1, and also composes the 2nd and 3rd songs of his 4 Songs, Opus 2.

9 avril 1909 : Mahler and Alma leave New York to sail-back to Europe.

19 avril 1909 : Mahler and Alma arrive in Paris, where they will spend the rest of the month. This is their only long stay in Paris during which Mahler has no commitments and, so, they are mainly tourists.

Autour de Pâques 1909 : A little before his 12th birthday on Mai 29th, Erich Korngold completes the piano version of his pantomime, « Der Schneemann », the piece which will make him famous as a child prodigy. As a result of several music-critics being impressed upon receiving the private printing of Erich's compositions from his father Julius, articles begin appearing in newspapers in cities, near Vienna. Moritz Benedikt, editor of the « Neue Freie Presse », realizes that his paper can no longer ignore Erich's talent but, also, that it would be improper to have Erich's father write the article, so Ernst Décsey is hired.

The 28 year old Béla Bartók and the 26 year old Zoltán Kodály travel into the Hungarian country-side to collect and research old Magyar folk-melodies. Bartók marries his piano student, Márta Ziegler.

Avril 1909 : Le beau-père d'Alma Mahler, le peintre Carl Moll, souhaitait que Rodin réalisât le portrait de Gustav Mahler pour rendre hommage au musicien à la suite de son départ de l'Opéra de Vienne en 1907. La rencontre entre les artistes, tous 2 au faite de leur gloire à cette époque, fut arrangée, et Rodin fit poser Mahler une douzaine de fois à partir du mois d'avril 1909.

2 versions du portrait virent alors le jour, l'une traitée dans un style traditionnel et réaliste, qui servit notamment pour la réalisation du marbre connu sous le nom d'« Homme du XVIIIe siècle » ou « Mozart » :

Ce portrait est inspiré par la tête du compositeur Gustav Mahler, dont Rodin avait réalisé le buste en bronze en 1909. Présenté au Salon de la Société nationale des Beaux-arts de la même année sous le titre « Buste XVIIIe siècle, il prit, dès 1914, celui de Buste marbre sous le nom de Mozart. Comme dans beaucoup d'œuvres de cette période, la tête émerge d'un bloc de marbre peu dégrossi, le sculpteur jouant du contraste des surfaces ainsi créé.

La manière particulière dont Rodin conçoit le portrait est intéressante : le visage de Gustav Mahler devient celui de la Musique qu'incarne le musicien absolu qu'est Mozart. On passe ainsi d'un portrait à une sorte d'allégorie, ce qui n'est pas rare chez Rodin ; on peut en effet songer à « La France », à « L'Aurore » avec le visage de Camille Claudel ou à des portraits détournés de « Mrs » Russell.

L'autre intitulé « Gustav Mahler », au modelé plus vif et nerveux conférant au visage une forte expressivité, traduite ici en bronze. Par l'ajout de matière sur le front et autour des yeux, le sculpteur rend le regard du compositeur et chef d'orchestre plus aigu, faisant écho aux propos de celui-ci lorsqu'il affirmait :

« Si je n'étais pas obligé de porter des lunettes, je dirigerais avec mes yeux. » (Paul Clémenceau, 1989)

Une série de bronze fut réalisée par la fonderie Rudier à partir de 1910 et l'œuvre fut exposée avec succès dans toute l'Europe dès 1911.

Rodin qui ignorait tout de Mahler, son modèle, réalisa plâtre puis bronzes. De mémoire, le sculpteur exécuta post-mortem le portrait émergeant du bloc brut sans socle de marmor. Le cou s'érigeait du marbre rugueux, la chevelure finement burinée casquait le visage apaisé. Son front poli s'émancipait de la pierre.

Carl Moll has commissioned a bust of Gustav Mahler from Auguste Rodin, and so, Mahler meets and sits for Rodin every morning during his stay in Paris. Rodin sculpts a clay bust of Mahler and makes several bronze copies. During this time, Mahler also meets the 25 year old Alfredo Casella for the 1st time. Casella has studied all 6 of Mahler's published Symphonies, and Mahler is impressed with Casella's own compositions (his 2nd Symphony is very imitative of Mahler) and authorizes Casella to write the 2 piano 4 hand arrangement of his 7th Symphony.

The composer Gustav Mahler and the sculptor Auguste Rodin, arguably the greatest composer and the greatest sculptor of the time, met in Paris. Both were transitional figures in their respective fields, representing the end of an era in their creative work. Their respective legacies nevertheless also inaugurated new ideas and inspired younger composers and sculptors. Rodin sculpted 2 portraits of Mahler, one of which (in pure white marble) is the main focus of the article. The refinement and beauty of this work is different from Rodin's male portraits in that the head is stylised like many of his female portraits, an ambiguity compounded by the fact that Alma Mahler, the composer's wife, wrote in her memoirs that Rodin fell in love with his model during the sittings. An understanding of the marble bust calls for an analysis of the life and work of the composer, fraught with ambiguities — as reflected in that superb portrait.

Composer Gustav Mahler and sculptor Auguste Rodin met briefly in Paris, just long enough for Mahler to sit for a bust by Rodin. Both were transitional figures in terms of their art. The 49 year old Mahler who sat for Rodin was a man full of contradictions in both his life and his art. Setting eyes on Mahler Rodin must have perceived the individual configuration of his face, shaped by his life and art. As an experienced portraitist Rodin must have realised that :

« The face, indeed, symbolizes the self and signifies many different facets of the self. » (John Synnott, 1989 ; page 607.)

However, it is not clear how much he knew about the actual circumstances of the composer. An understanding of Rodin's portraits of Mahler calls for an in-depth analysis of his life and work, both fraught with ambiguities - as reflected especially in the marble bust.

Mahler's time was not altogether spent with musicians. The account of his 12 sittings for Auguste Rodin, in April 1909, is fascinating. Both men were previously unaware of the other's existence, never mind fame : they were informed of both by friends - a task made easier, not more difficult, by Rodin's ignorance of German and Mahler's of French.

1er mai 1909 : Mahler and Alma return to Vienna.

Frederick Delius may have met Gustav Mahler in Leipzig in the 1880's, and certainly did at the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein » in Essen, in 1906 (performances of « Sea-Drift » and Mahler 6th Symphony) . He tried in 1908 to organize a Festival of New Music in Liverpool, and asked Mahler to come and conduct his 2nd Symphony. There was a friendly exchange of letters but the event never came-off. A more long lasting friend was Ferruccio Busoni, whom Mahler had already known for some years. They met again in New York, at New Year of 1910. Mahler immediately offered to conduct Busoni's « Turandot Suite », which he did that same March. Busoni also appeared as soloist under Mahler's baton. The warmth of their friendship is reflected in Busoni's letters to his wife. And he was there, at the end : the Italian composer travelled on the boat which took Mahler on his last journey back to Europe.

Gustav Mahler's links with Charles Ives are altogether more tenuous. Round a minimum of fact about Ives's 3rd Symphony, which Mahler may or may not have seen in a copyist's office, has been woven a cloud of myth. Dispelling this « might have been » demonstrates Henry-Louis de La Grange's forensic skill at its briskest and most rigorous.

Gustav Mahler arrivait de son séjour parisien. Il avait posé tous les jours chez Auguste Rodin. Edgard Varèse le visitant à Vienne, lui a-t-il confié qu'il fut quelques semaines le secrétaire, ou le modèle de Rodin ?

He also met Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel around this time. He continued to support himself and his wife by copying music. He met Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß during this period, and Strauß made representations, on Varèse's behalf, to help him find work. In 1910, Varèse's daughter, Claude, was born. On December 15, 1910, « Bourgogne » was performed in Berlin, where its reception was stormy. Varèse would later destroy the score, his last link with his pre-War past.

Edgard Varèse rencontre Gustav Mahler

Early 1909 : The 25 year old Frenchman Edgard Varèse finished his Symphony for large orchestra (composed between 1907 and early 1909) inspired by the style of Richard Strauß. It is titled « Bourgogne », with the dedication : « À mon grand-père, Claude Cortot. » (the grandfather to the pianist Alfred Cortot, a 1st cousin of Varèse) . Varèse was also working on a previous Symphonic poem, « Gargantua » , that will remained unfinished.

31 mai 1909 : Edgard Varèse knocks on Gustav Mahler's door in Vienna, and spends the afternoon showing him the music-score of « Bourgogne », his recent Symphony for large orchestra. He hopes Mahler will accept to give the premiere (Varèse was less interested in Mahler's compositions) . Mahler was impressed, but he found the piece too complicated, and his heavy conducting schedule for the year ahead was full, in any case. So, he sent Varèse on his way with kind words and a letter of recommendation. The 2 men will never meet again. (Varèse will destroy the manuscript of « Bourgogne » in 1962.)

(If Mahler had felt more certain of his position with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, it is possible that he might have dared a performance. Much closer to his heart was Mahler's championship of Arnold Schœnberg.)

During these years, Varèse became acquainted with Erik Satie and Richard Strauß, as well as with Claude Debussy and Ferruccio Busoni, who particularly influenced him at the time. He also gained the friendship and support of Romain Rolland and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, whose « Œdipus und die Sphinx » he began setting as an Opera that was never completed.

...

« Cher Monsieur, j'ai vu Mahler qui a été très gentil et me charge de bien vous saluer. »

(Edgard Varèse à Hugo von Hofmannsthal)

Avant de publier « Amériques », Edgard Varèse avait écrit de nombreuses œuvres sous influence straussienne, dont il ne reste qu' « Un grand sommeil noir », un chef-d'œuvre sur un texte de Paul Verlaine. En 1909, il était allé rendre visite à Gustav Mahler à Vienne pour lui montrer la partition de « Bourgogne », autre poème symphonique d'inspiration straussienne pour grand orchestre. Au lendemain de la première de l'œuvre donnée par Josef Stránský à Berlin, le 15 décembre 1910, Varèse décidait de détruire tous ses manuscrits et entrait dans une période de silence de 5 ans.

C'est à l'initiative de Richard Strauß que le chef bohémien Josef Stránský (un ancien élève d'Anton Bruckner et de Robert Fuchs au Conservatoire de Vienne) dirige, le 15 décembre 1910, l'Orchestre « Blüthner » de Berlin lors de la création du 1er Poème symphonique d'Edgar Varèse, « Bourgogne » .

En 1902, Josef Stránský rencontre dans l'un des bars de Berlin une jolie jeune fille et lui promet de lui faire parvenir un billet pour l'Opéra ; ce qu'il ne pas fait. Furieuse, elle rédige une lettre à Richard Strauß qui est interceptée par la jalouse Paula de Ahna. L'épouse demande alors le divorce. Après de nombreuses années, sur la base de cet épisode véridique, Strauß écrit l'Opéra, « Intermezzo » .

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur tchèque Josef (Joseph) Stránský est né le 9 septembre 1872 à Humpolecz, en Bohême (Humpolec se trouve 16 kilomètres au nord-est de Pelhřimov, à 23 kilomètres au nord-ouest de Jihlava et à 89 kilomètres au sud-est de Prague en République tchèque) ; et est mort le 6 mars 1936 à New York. Sa tombe se trouve au Woodlawn Cemetery dans le Bronx. Il a été aussi un collectionneur et marchand d'art. Il s'est installé aux États-Unis et a dirigé le « New York Philharmonic Orchestra », de 1911 à 1923.

Stránský passe son enfance à Humpolec. Il commence à étudier la médecine, d'abord à Prague et puis à Leipzig. C'est là qu'il est l'élève en théorie de Salomon Jadassohn, ainsi qu'avec Antonín Dvořák et Zdeněk Fibich ; puis il part étudier au Conservatoire de Vienne avec Robert Fuchs et Anton Bruckner. En 1896, il retourne à Prague et passe son diplôme d'État de médecine. Ensuite, il se consacre exclusivement à la musique.

En 1898, il décroche le poste de « Kapellmeister » au Théâtre allemand (« Deutsche Theater ») de Prague, dirigé par Angelo Neumann. En 1903, il obtient le même poste au Théâtre Municipal de Hambourg. En 1909 et 1910, il est invité à diriger l'Orchestre « Blüthner » de Berlin.

En 1911, Stránský est choisi par le « New York Philharmonic Orchestra » pour remplacer Gustav Mahler lors de la mort de celui-ci, en 1911. Certains commentateurs ne voient pas Stránský comme un digne successeur de Mahler.

Richard Strauß d'abord, qui pensait que Stránský donnait plutôt une mauvaise réputation de l'Allemagne à l'étranger (en Allemagne, il était considéré comme un bohémien et, à New York, considéré comme un Allemand un peu guindé) .

Aux États-Unis, le périodique « Musical America » écrit :

« Après beaucoup de bouleversements, de recherche et de négociation, le “ New York Philharmonic ” a engagé Josef Stránský. Sans manquer de respect à Monsieur Stránský, il y a des raisons dans ces circonstances qui évoquent une des fables d'Ésope, lorsqu'une montagne a finalement accouché d'une souris. »

Un autre article, cette fois dans le « New York Times » à propos du salaire du chef, commence ainsi :

« Les bailleurs de fonds de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York seront intéressés d'apprendre que le monde artistique allemand est rempli d'étonnement sur l'engagement de Josef Stránský de Berlin, en tant que successeur du dernier, Gustav Mahler. »

On prétend que Stránský a été choisi au détriment d'autres candidats tels que Oskar Fried (que Mahler lui-même voulait comme successeur) , Gustav Brecher et Bruno Walter, en raison de ses exigences financières plus faibles.

Cependant, durant son mandat avec l'Orchestre philharmonique, Stránský reçoit des éloges pour ses interprétations de Franz Liszt et Richard Strauß par l'éminent critique Henry T. Finck du « New York Evening Post » .

Cependant, Daniel Gregory Mason (du même journal) exprime son mécontentement avec ce qu'il a appelé « le Wagnérien, Lisztien et Tchaïkovskien servi à la louche pour nous, par Stránský de la “ Philharmonic Society ” » , et ose appeler le chef d'orchestre un « total incompetent en musique » .

Dans une critique encore plus acerbe publiée dans l' « American Mercury Magazine » de Henry Louis (H.L.) Mencken, le critique D. W. Sinclair écrit :

« Succédant à une des plus grandes figures de la musique moderne, Gustav Mahler, Stránský se maintint pendant si longtemps, non pas tant par ses aptitudes musicales que par son charme personnel et son intelligence sociale. »

Henry-Louis de La Grange caractérise Josef Stránský comme un chef « consciencieux mais sans intérêt » , qui a permis au niveau élevé atteint par Gustav Mahler, de retomber.

De son installation en 1911 jusqu'à la fin de la saison 1919-1920, Josef Stránský a dirigé tous les concerts du « New York Philharmonic » . Il a dirigé le 1er enregistrement de l'Orchestre, produit par « Columbia Records » . Il a été élu membre honoraire de la « Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia Fraternity » , la fraternité nationale pour l'homme en musique, et, en 1917, est accueilli par la « Fraternity's Alpha Chapter » au « New England Conservatory of Music » de Boston. En 1921, le « New York Philharmonic » fusionne avec le « National Symphony » , dirigé par Willem Mengelberg ; c'est la création du tout nouveau « State Symphony Orchestra of New York » . Pour la saison 1922-1923, Josef Stránský dirige la 1^{re} moitié de saison ; et Mengelberg, la seconde. Stránský quitte ensuite l'Orchestre. Il laisse finalement la carrière musicale pour devenir marchand d'art, spécialisé dans la « Période rose » de Pablo Picasso.

The 1st performance (the only one of his early orchestral works to be properly performed in his lifetime) of the Symphonic poem « Bourgogne » in Berlin, on 5 January 1911 (the work is dedicated to Varèse grandfather, Claude Cortot, who died the week before) , caused a scandal. Most of his other early-scores were lost, but « Bourgogne » survived, only to be destroyed 40 years later by the composer himself in a fit of depression. Could the work have provided some early evidence as to how the Varèse of the later radical experiments in sound came to be ?

As things stand, we know little about the early development of Varèse. Other than a single song, the earliest work of his that survives is « Amériques » , which was composed in 1921 when he was already 38 years old. It was the 1st piece he composed in New York, after leaving Europe in 1915. Varèse described the work as a new start in a new idiom and publicly rejected the 15 or so named compositions he had composed earlier in Paris and Berlin.

What happened to those pieces ? Incredibly, most of them were destroyed by a warehouse fire at his publishers, in 1918, during the Berlin up-risings that marked the end of the First World War. Only « Bourgogne » , and a single song, « Un grand sommeil noir » survived, because Varèse had kept the scores with him. « Bourgogne » was written in 1907 and premiered at the « Bluthner Hall » in Berlin, 3 years later - it was the 1st of his compositions to be performed in public. And it caused a riot : the original of many riots caused over the years by Varèse first performances.

Varèse had studied in Paris, between 1904 and 1907, where his teachers were Vincent d'Indy at the « Schola Cantorum » (1903-1905) ; Jules Massenet and Charles Marie Widor at the « Paris Conservatoire » (1905-1907) . Although d'Indy was initially supportive, the gap between the 2 inevitably widened - d'Indy wanted to create disciples, and Varèse would have none of it.

He later told Igor Stravinsky :

« The teachers, in Paris, were all ruled like music-paper. »

Others were more sympathetic. The poet and librettist Hugo von Hoffmannstahl, the composer Richard Strauß, and the novelist Romain Rolland used their combined influence to help secure the 1st performance of « Bourgogne » . Ferruccio Busoni was in the audience for the premiere, and Claude Debussy corresponded with Varèse sympathetically both before and after the event.

Inspired by the wild area of Burgundy (Bourgogne) where he grew-up, the Symphonic poem seems likely to have included some Impressionist and Romantic influences, in spite of the composer's resistance to turning into « a little d'Indy » . Reviewing the performance, however, the Berlin music-critic Bruno Schrader described it as « an infernal din, mere caterwauling » . On the other hand, Alfred Kerr thought it « full of fascinating beauties » . The audience rioted far more than they did at the performance of Arnold Schœnberg's « Pelléas et Mélisande » , which was played in the same week. In any case, by 1913, Varèse was a veteran of such scandals, to the extent that he could sit through the famous premiere of « le Sacre du printemps » , on May 29th, with no surprise.

Varèse biographer, Fernand Ouellette, comments :

« He simply thought of the Russian composer as having done his duty. »

Edgard Varèse

Originaire d'Italie et de Bourgogne, Edgard Varèse reconnaît avoir été fortement marqué par l'architecture romane de l'abbaye de Saint-Philibert de Tournus. Il y a un rapprochement à établir entre la nature des murs, la puissance des gros piliers et sa musique.

« S'il y a quelque beauté ou quelque force dans ma musique, c'est à Saint-Philibert de Tournus que je le dois. »

(Varèse)

Son père Henri, un ingénieur, lui interdisant la musique, Edgard Varèse (maintenant arrivé à 18 ans) quitte ses études d'ingénierie à la Polytechnique de Turin et reçoit des leçons informelles de Giovanni Bolzoni, le directeur du Conservatoire de Turin. Ensuite, il s'inscrit à la « Schola Cantorum » (institution fondée par des élèves de César Franck) où il étudie avec Vincent d'Indy et Albert Roussel (1903-1905) ; puis se dirige vers le Conservatoire de Paris (1905-1907) où ses professeurs sont Jules Massenet and Charles Marie Widor (en composition) . Varèse n'achèvera pas ses études.

Il se déplace à Berlin, où il rencontre notamment Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni et le chef Karl Muck. En 1913 il revient à Paris, où il fait la connaissance de Romain Rolland et de Claude Debussy. Ces diverses rencontres sont décisives pour son développement futur. Mais, en 1915, déçu par les moyens offerts aux compositeurs, il décide d'émigrer à New York.

Depuis son arrivée à Paris, Varèse avait su s'entourer de l'élite artistique : Picasso, Cocteau, Appolinaire, Modigliani qui tous cherchaient à rompre avec le passé. Mais malgré ce bouillonnement culturel, il décide de quitter Paris pour aller vivre à Berlin où il espère trouver un public plus large d'esprit et apte à comprendre sa musique.

Varèse n'est guère affecté par le Romantisme finissant de Gustav Mahler ou de Richard Strauß. Il se lie avec Claude Debussy, sera très marqué par « le Sacre du Printemps » d'Igor Stravinsky (créé en 1913) , découvrira Arnold Schönberg et la musique atonale lors de son séjour berlinois du début des années 1910, ce contemporain de Béla Bartók (influences de la musique populaire) et d'Olivier Messiaen (un peu plus jeune, dont il partage finalement assez peu l'esthétique) , marquera fortement les compositeurs avant-gardistes d'après 1945 : György Ligeti, Iannis Xenakis, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Pierre Boulez, Pierre Henry.

Né le 22 décembre 1883 à Paris, Edgard Varèse est le fils d'un ingénieur, ancien polytechnicien, Henri Varèse, et de sa femme Blanche-Marie Cortot. Il passe une partie de sa jeunesse à Villars, dans le sud de la Bourgogne, où il est élevé par son grand-père maternel, Claude Cortot. En 1892, Edgard doit suivre ses parents à Turin. Après le décès de sa mère, et alors que les conflits avec son père atteignent leur paroxysme, notre protagoniste quitte Turin pour sa ville natale, en 1903.

Dès l'année suivante, il est reçu à la « Schola Cantorum » où il suit notamment les cours de Vincent d'Indy (composition, analyse musicale et direction d'orchestre) ou d'Albert Roussel (contrepoint et fugue) . Si les relations avec le premier ne tardent pas à se dégrader, une longue amitié le liera au second. Profitant des ressources de la bibliothèque de la « Schola » où il travaille désormais (recommandé, pour l'anecdote, par son cousin, le pianiste Alfred Cortot) , le musicien développe en parallèle un intérêt particulier pour l'histoire de la musique ainsi que pour l'œuvre des « Maîtres du passé » comme Guillaume de Machaut, Claudio Monteverdi, Henrich Schütz ou encore Marc-Antoine Charpentier, qui influenceront notamment sa carrière de chef d'orchestre, débutée à Turin où il avait remplacé au pied levé un chef d'orchestre pour une représentation de « Rigoletto » .

Lorsqu'il est reçu au Conservatoire, le 8 janvier 1906, Varèse y voit l'occasion de s'éloigner de d'Indy et il quitte la « Schola » . C'est en effet Charles-Marie Widor qui va désormais lui enseigner la composition, avec succès : le jeune homme se montre particulièrement à l'aise avec la technique du contrepoint. Il compose déjà (son 1er Opéra, « Martin Pas » , date de 1895) , mais sans qu'on connaisse aucune de ses créations : ainsi, la 1re œuvre qu'il ne détruira pas (ou qui ne sera pas perdue) sera « Amériques » , bien des années plus tard.

Bien qu'il ait reçu une bourse de la ville de Paris, en 1907, et que cette ville lui permette de fréquenter d'autres grands artistes tels que Picasso, Apollinaire, l'actrice Suzanne Bing (dont il partagera la vie jusqu'en 1913) ou, bien sûr, des homologues compositeurs, Varèse juge cette ville inadaptée à ses aspirations musicales. Ainsi, à partir 1908, il voyage entre Paris et Berlin, rencontrant et sympathisant pendant cette période nombre d'autres contemporains tels que Claude Debussy, Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni ou encore Romain Rolland, et assistant à Paris à la création du « Sacre du Printemps » d'Igor Stravinski (on retrouvera l'influence du Russe dans « Amériques » ou au sein de la plus tardive « Arcana ») . Mais, lorsque la Première Guerre mondiale éclate et qu'il se voit réformé pour raisons de santé, Edgar Varèse décide de rejoindre les États-Unis où il débarque le 29 décembre 1915.

Lorsque Edgard Varèse disparut à New York, ce grand créateur solitaire était depuis longtemps considéré, malgré les scandales qu'il avait provoqués, comme un de ceux ayant le plus profondément marqué le passage du XXe siècle. Né d'une mère bourguignonne et d'un père d'origine italienne, il commença à travailler (en cachette de son père) l'harmonie et le contrepoint à Turin, où sa famille s'était installée en 1892. Ayant regagné Paris en 1903, il entra à la « Schola Cantorum » en 1904, étudiant auprès de Vincent d'Indy et Albert Roussel ; puis au Conservatoire en 1905, auprès de Charles Marie Widor. Il écrivit en 1905 « Prélude à la fin d'un jour » , pour 120 musiciens ; et, en 1906, une « Rhapsodie romane » , pour orchestre. L'année 1906 le vit aussi fonder la chorale de l'Université populaire du faubourg Saint-Antoine, avec laquelle il donna des concerts publics.

De 1907 à 1914, Varèse vécut principalement à Berlin, où il se lia avec Ferruccio Busoni, Richard Strauß, le chef Karl Muck et l'écrivain Hugo von Hofmannsthal. En 1908, il fit à Paris la connaissance de Claude Debussy, à qui il révéla les Ires œuvres atonales de Arnold Schœnberg, et commença « Œdipe et le Sphinx », Opéra sur un livret de Hofmannsthal (il devait y travailler jusqu'en 1914) . Le Poème symphonique « Gargantua » devait, lui aussi, demeurer inachevé, mais un autre, « Bourgogne », fut créé à Berlin le 15 décembre 1910 (Varèse ne devait détruire le manuscrit qu'en 1962) . En 1911, il entreprit « Mehr Licht », qui, remanié, prit place l'année suivante dans l'Opéra « les Cycles du Nord » . Le 4 janvier 1914, il dirigea avec grand succès un concert de musique française à Prague. La Guerre le surprit à Paris, et tous ses manuscrits demeurés à Berlin devaient y être détruits par l'incendie d'un entrepôt.

Mobilisé durant 6 mois, puis réformé, Varèse partit pour les États-Unis en décembre 1915.

Edgard Varèse (« Edgar » pour les Américains) naît à Paris d'une mère française. Mais c'est sans doute dans la relation avec son père, ingénieur italien, que le jeune Varèse construit son rapport radical à l'Histoire : un rapport positif, voire scientifique, animé par un désir d'arrachement au présent. Ingénieur, voilà certes le modèle des sciences que le compositeur ne reniera jamais ; pourtant à 20 ans, en 1903, lorsqu'il quitte l'École Polytechnique de Turin pour regagner Paris, Varèse n'hésite pas à rompre simultanément toute relation avec son ingénieur de père, de même que, plus tard, il brisera radicalement les liens avec la tradition musicale. Du père, si l'on veut, Varèse garde le souvenir des lumières scientifiques et rejette la loi ; de même que, de l'histoire, il garde l'esprit de lumière prophétique et dénonce le poids patrimonial.

Paris retrouvé, il étudie d'abord avec Vincent d'Indy à la « Schola Cantorum » (jusqu'en 1905) , alors toute jeune école privée pour « esprits libres » et ne fréquente qu'après la classe de Charles Marie Widor, au Conservatoire (entre 1905 et 1907) . Un séjour à Berlin lui permettra de connaître Ferruccio Busoni, lequel lui conseillera de « trouver des formes personnelles en premier lieu » . De retour à Paris, il assiste à la création du « Sacre du Printemps » d'Igor Stravinsky (en 1913) dont l'ostinato puissant l'aura profondément secoué et l'influencera longtemps.

Edgard (Victor Achille Charles Varèse) was born in Paris, but when he was only a few weeks old, he was sent to be raised by his great-uncle and other relations in the small town of Le Villars, in the Burgundy region of France. There, he developed a very strong attachment to his maternal grandfather, Claude Cortot (also grandfather to the pianist Alfred Cortot, a 1st cousin of Varèse) . His affection for his grandfather out-shone anything he felt for his own parents.

After being reclaimed by his parents in the late-1880's, young Edgard was forced, in 1893, to relocate with them to Turin, Italy, in part, to live amongst his paternal relatives, since his father was of Italian descent. It was here that he had his 1st real musical lessons, with the long-time director of Turin's Conservatory, Giovanni Bolzoni. In 1895, he composed his 1st Opera, « Martin Pas », which has since been lost. Now, in his teen years, Edgard, influenced by his father, an engineer, enrolled at the Polytechnic of Turin and started studying engineering, as his father disapproved of his interest in music, and demanded an absolute dedication to engineering studies. This conflict grew bigger and bigger, especially after the death of his mother in 1900. Varèse left home for Paris, in 1903.

From 1904, he was a student at the « Schola Cantorum » (founded by pupils of César Franck) , where his teachers included Albert Roussel and Vincent d'Indy ; afterwards, he went to study composition with Charles-Marie Widor at the Paris Conservatoire. During this period, he composed a number of ambitious orchestral works, but these were only performed by Varèse in piano transcriptions. One such work was his « Rhapsodie romane » , from about 1905, which was inspired by the Romanesque architecture of the cathedral of Saint-Philibert in Tournus. In 1907, he moved to Berlin and, in the same year, he married the actress Suzanne Bing, with whom he had 1 child, a daughter. They divorced in 1913.

After being invalided-out of the French Army during World War I, Varèse moved to the United States, in December 1915.

Edgar (Victor Achille Charles) Varèse (he would later add a « d » to his 1st name) was born in Paris on December 22, 1883 ; his father was from the Piedmont region and his mother was a Parisienne. As his father's work entailed much travel, Varèse was several weeks old when he was entrusted to the care of his uncle Joseph and his wife, who lived in Villars. When Varèse was 7, his father moved his family to Turin. Varèse felt very isolated there and grew estranged from his father. Varèse attended his 1st concerts in Turin and was exposed to the music of Richard Wagner, Richard Strauß, Claude Debussy, and Jean Sibelius. Varèse began, when he was 17, to spend his pocket money secretly taking harmony and counterpoint lessons from the Director of the Conservatory, Giovanni Bolzoni.

When Varèse was 11, he composed his 1st « Opera » , « Martin Paz » , based on a Jules Verne novel, to amuse his friends. His childhood was divided between Paris and relations in Burgundy. Varèse's father attempted to mold his son into following him in business, insisting that he take courses in engineering and mathematics. His father was not pleased with Varèse's choice of profession, preferring him rather to pursue a career in either mathematics or science. When Varèse found his son becoming too interested in the grand piano in the family home, he locked the keyboard shut. The strain between Varèse and his father grew so great that, after Varèse moved to Paris, he never saw his father again. By the age of 14, Varèse had already set his sights on being a composer.

In 1903, Varèse left home for Paris and, the following year, entered the « Schola Cantorum » . Varèse left the school in 1905, and entered the « Conservatoire National de Musique et de Déclamation » to study composition under Charles Marie Widor. Varèse supported himself during these hard times by working as a musical copyist and later found employment in a library.

While at the « Schola Cantorum » , Varèse met « avant-garde » artists from fields other than music ; he numbered Max Jacob, Pablo Picasso, and Juan Gris among his acquaintances. Varèse's sources of inspiration frequently came from outside the musical sphere ; he studied topics as diverse as alchemy and Leonardo da Vinci's note-books. He later observed that music was the « art-science » . Given his scientific education, he was particularly drawn to the work of physicists. Unfortunately, none of his works from this period has survived. In 1906, Varèse founded the Choral Society of the People's University, an educational establishment for working-class people in the « faubourg Saint-Antoine » . Varèse's personal life was also settling down ; on November 5, 1907, he married Suzanne Bing.

In late-1907, Varèse left Paris for Berlin, where he would remain for most of the next 6 years ; he had been impressed by Ferruccio Busoni's « A New Æsthetic of Music » and wanted to study under him. Busoni encouraged Varèse, and Varèse was later to state :

« I owe him a debt of gratitude. »

He also met Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel around this time. In early 1909, Varèse finished his Symphony, titled « Bourgogne » and began work on a Symphonic poem, « Gargantua » . He continued to support himself and his wife by copying music. He met Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß during this period, and Strauß made representations, on Varèse's behalf, to help him find work. In 1910, Varèse's daughter, Claude, was born. On December 15, 1910, « Bourgogne » was performed in Berlin, where its reception was stormy. Varèse would later destroy the score, his last link with his pre-War past.

Despite the controversy, Varèse continued composing. 3 years later, Suzanne Varèse decided to return to Paris to resume her acting career, and they were amicably divorced. The outbreak of World War I caught Varèse in Paris, and he was unable to return to Berlin until after the War, in 1922, when he discovered that the warehouse in which his manuscripts had been stored had been completely destroyed by fire.

Varèse entered the military in April, 1915 ; after 6 months he asked for a transfer, but a medical ...

Beset by domestic difficulties, the family of Edgard (Victor Achille Charles) Varèse entrusted him to the care of his maternal aunt and uncle who lived in Villars, Burgundy. Varèse split his early years between Paris and Burgundy until his family settled in Turin, Italy, in 1893. Although his father strongly discouraged his interests in music, Varèse soon became enamored of late-Romantic composers such as Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß as well as Impressionist composers such as Claude Debussy and Paul Dukas. At age 12, Varèse composed an « Opera » based on a novel by Jules Verne for performance by his schoolmates. He later received informal music lessons from Giovanni Bolzoni, director of Turin Conservatory, and, at age of 19, decided to pursue a career in music despite the urging of his father to study engineering. Varèse, nevertheless, remained interested in science and technology, which played a major role in his musical development.
