(22) For example, after comprising a mere 10 % of the repertory in the Vienna Philharmonic, during the early and middle 1930's, Bruckner's music formed an average of 22 % , in 1941-1945. The total fell to between 12 and 13 % , in the late-1940's and 1950's. His place in the repertory of the Vienna Symphony underwent a similar, if less extreme, upswing after the « Anschluß » . Desmond Mark. « Zur Bestandaufnahme des Wiener Orchesterrepertaires » , Universal-Edition, Vienna (1979) , pages 32, 40, and 50. Also, during the 1920's, the « Zeitschrift für Musik » , for example, published fewer than a dozen articles on Bruckner. After 1932, the number rose sharply and peaked with a total of 21 contributions on Bruckner, in 1936.

(22) Max Auer's striking rhetoric merits lengthy quotation :

« For 4 years, destruction was visited upon Europe (i.e. , the First World War) . Out of deepest need, the people called out for guidance. False leaders brought nations and peoples to the edge of the precipice, in the following decades. It became apparent that, without spiritual renewal, recuperation was not possible. A yearning for elevation out of the misery, caused by the crass materialism of the preceding Century, grew ever greater. Artistic Bolshevism was carried to extremes. Against all this, there was but one remedy : a return to the pure sources ! What art was purer than that born of the deep religiosity of Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner. Especially, Bruckner's God-consecrated art, now found a fertile soil, at last, it was rightly understood. For many thousands, it was the guide (« Führer ») to a beautiful, spiritual World and, thereby, the foundations of a healthy and strong Bruckner movement were laid which is only now, after the World War, succeeding with elemental power. » (August Göllerich - Max Auer, Band IV/4, pages 61-62.)

(27) Facets of the legacy of German Bruckner reception in the 1930's and 1940's, including most of Robert Haas's study, have proven to be of more lasting value. Several books of continuing importance were published including the 3rd and 4th volumes (the Linz and Vienna years) of the August Göllerich - Max Auer biography, as well as Robert Haas' study of the composer.

(45) Robert Haas made this claim, in a private lecture that preceded the Viennese premiere of his edition of the 5th Symphony, on 15 March 1936. Paul Stefan reported that Haas claimed that :

« In the last years of his life, Bruckner was under the threat of sanctions (« Sanktionsdrohnungen ») to alter his early works or to allow them to be altered. »

Robert Haas responded that he did not actually make this statement but had « related the experience with the 8th and the events around the publication of the 4th to the nervous crisis (« Nervenkrise ») of 1890. « Die neue Bruckner-Bewegung » , page 1184.

(48) Even the debates about the « Gesamtausgabe » were seen, by some, in racial terms. In declaring victory by the « neue Bruckner-Bewegung » (i.e. , the supporters of the new « Gesamtausgabe ») in the battle over the Bruckner Symphonies, Max Auer referred to « the veritable witch-hunt against the “ real ” Bruckner, that the Jewish Viennese press, above all, could not do enough to support » . « Furtwängler setzt den Schlußpunkt zum Streit um die Fassungen

(50) Although Ferdinand Löwe was of Jewish descent, he was not always identified as such. He is listed as a « Halbjude » in : « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » , edited by Theophil Stengel and Herbert Gerigk, Hahnefeld, Berlin (1941) , page 164.

In some Nazi-era books on Bruckner, in which the names of Jews were marked with asterisks, Löwe's name was not so marked. See, for example : Fritz Öser. « Die Klangstruktur tier Bruckner-Symphonie. Eine Studie zur Frage der Originalfassungen » , « Musikwissenschaftliche Verlag » , Leipzig (1939) , page 33 ; and Peter Raabe. « Wege zu Bruckner » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1944) , page 239. (I am indebted to Brian Robison of Cornell University for his help with the information in the « Lexikon » .)

Although the Schalk brothers were « Gentiles » , they were often mistaken for Jews, both during their lives and posthumously. August Göllerich - Max Auer, Band IV/1 , page 570 ; and Ernst Décsey. « Hugo Wolf » , Schuster & Loeffler, Berlin (1906) , pages 3 and 4, pointedly identified the Schalk family as « Christian » . As Thomas Leibnitz pointed-out, the Schalks' physical appearance, which was easily caricatured with anti-Semitic stereotypes, may have helped perpetuate the supposition that they were Jewish. « Die Brüder Schalk und Anton Bruckner » , Hans Schneider Verlag, (1988) , pages 30-31.

(62) Fritz Öser. « Die Klangstruktur » , pages 11-12. This work struck a responsive chord with the editors of the « Gesumtausgabe » . It was Öser's Ph.D. Dissertation, « Die Klangstruktur und ihre Aufgabe in Bruckners Symphonik » , University of Leipzig (1939) , before it was published by the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » . During this period, Öser also assisted Robert Haas with the preparation of his editions of the 8th Symphony (published in 1939) and the Mass in E minor (published in 1940) . In 1941, the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » published Öser's edition of Antonín Dvořák's 8th Symphony. After the War, Öser prepared the 1st modern edition of the 1878 version of the 3rd Symphony, « Anton Bruckner 3. Symphonie in D-Moll, 2. Fassung van 1878. Mit Einführung und den Hauptvarianten der Endfassung » , « Brucknerverlag » , Wiesbaden (1950) . More recently, Öser has prepared controversial editions of Georges Bizet's « Carmen » , Alkor, Kassel (1964) and Jacques Offenbach's « Tales of Hoffmann » , Alkor, Kassel (1977) . For a sustained critique of the former, see : Winton Dean. « The True Carmen ? » , « Musical Times » , No. 106 (1965) , pages 846-855 ; revised in : Dean. « Essays on Opera » , Oxford University Press (1990) , pages 281-300.

Although Klose's statement reflects the climate of Bruckner reception, a certain irony in his preference for the 1st edition of the 9th Symphony should be noted. It was edited by Ferdinand Löwe and published in 1903, 7 years after Bruckner's death ; it cannot be claimed to represent Bruckner's intentions.

Anton Bruckner's friends and pupils repeatedly requested the Master's approval for retouchings and changes which, often of a quite intrusive nature, affecting form, instrumentation and articulation, were intended to make his quite unprecedented sound-world more accessible to contemporary audiences. We have every reason to be grateful to these friends and pupils for their missionary zeal ; after all, the motivation behind the changes was the wider propagation and promotion of Bruckner's music. In order to smooth the path for his works to be performed and published, Bruckner did give his provisional agreement to adaptations designed to bring his music closer into line with the prevailing spirit of the times. But his agreement was only provisional. When he entrusted his manuscripts to the Imperial and Royal Court Library (the present-day Austrian National Library) , he bequeathed his music to us in the form in which he « according to his last will and testament » wished it to be passed on to posterity.

After Bruckner's death, the glaring discrepancies between the autograph manuscripts and the music being heard in concert led to a call for a Critical « Complete Edition » (« Kritische Gesamtausgabe ») to provide the basis for authentic performing material. In 1929, the « International Bruckner Society » (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » ; « IBG » , for short) was founded in Vienna ; 1930 witnessed the publication by Benno Filser Verlag, in Augsburg, of the 1st works in the Complete Bruckner Edition (« Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe ») , namely the « Requiem » and the « Missa solennis » (Robert Haas) .

2 April 1932 : Siegmund von Hausegger gave 2 consecutive renditions of the 9th Symphony. In the 1st, he used the only printed edition then in existence, which had been produced with the intention of making Bruckner's music sound Wagnerian and consequently differed quite radically from Bruckner's manuscript ; the 2nd performance was based on the autograph musical text as prepared for the « Complete Edition » (« Gesamtausgabe ») .

1933 : By which time, the Filser publishing house had ceased to exist, the « Internationale-Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (or « IBG ») founded the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » (« MWV » ; literally, « musicological publishers ») for the express purpose of publishing the « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») . Robert Haas, Director of the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library, was appointed General Editor, with Alfred Orel as his right-hand man.

The preparatory work which had already been under way for many years previously made it possible for numerous volumes to be published in quick succession.

1937 : Leopold Nowak joined the house as co-General Editor.

Février 1934 : Le chef Fritz Zaun dirige le Scherzo de la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1891, éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1893) , avec l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Berlin. Le mouvement occupe 1 face de 78 tours.

14 février 1934 : Le chef Eugen Papst dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Eugen Papst

Le chef d'orchestre, compositeur et professeur de musique allemand Eugen Papst est né le 24 décembre 1886 à Oberammergau et est mort le 2 janvier 1956 à Oberammergau.

Fils du pédagogue Eugen Papst (1855-1923) , qui a plus tard donné son nom à l'École Eugen Papst (« Eugen-Papst-Förderschule ») de Germering, il fréquente l'École normale de Freising et étudie, dès 1907, à l'Académie de composition de Munich.

En 1910, il travaille au théâtre d'Allenstein et, à partir de 1911, il est directeur musical du Théâtre de Berne. Il est nommé à Hambourg, en 1922, où il dirige le « Hamburger Philharmonie » en collaboration avec Karl Muck, jusqu'à sa fermeture par les Nazis, en 1934. À l'automne de 1934, il occupe tout d'abord le poste de directeur musical de Münster, avant de devenir, dès 1935, chef du chœur d'hommes de Cologne et, peu après, avec le soutien de son ami Richard Strauß, le successeur de Hermann Abendroth au poste de directeur musical de l'Orchestre de Gürzenich. En parallèle, il donne des cours de direction d'orchestre à l'École supérieure de musique de Cologne. En 1946, la ville nomme Günter Wand au poste de directeur musical malgré son contrat avec Papst, au motif que ce dernier devenait de plus en plus « une figure de proue du conservatisme dans la musique » .

Papst donne également des classes de Maître de direction d'orchestre à la « Nordwestdeutsche Musikakademie » de Detmold.

En 1950, il ré-arrange les « Oberammergauer Passionsspiele » de Rochus Dedler (1779-1822) , qui furent jouées de cette façon jusqu'en 1990 et, depuis, révisées et complétées par le directeur musical Markus Zwick.

Parmi ses autres œuvres, on compte des œuvres orchestrales, des chœurs et des Lieder, qui n'ont été que partiellement publiés.

En 1933, Eugen Papst reçoit la médaille Johannes Brahms de la ville de Hambourg.

On trouve des rues qui portent son nom à Munich, Germering et Oberammergau.

Eugen Papst (geboren 24. Dezember 1886, in Oberammergau ; gestorben 2. Januar 1956, ebenda) war ein deutscher Komponist und Professor für Musik.

Der Sohn des gleichnamigen Pädagogen und Oberlehrers Eugen Papst (1855-1923) , nach dem später die Eugen-Papst-Förderschule in Germering benannt wurde, besuchte das Lehrerseminar in Freising und studierte ab 1907 an der Akademie der Tonkunst in München.

1910 wirkte er am Theater in Allenstein und ab 1911 in Bern als Musikalischer Leiter des Stadttheaters. 1922 wurde er nach Hamburg berufen, wo er gemeinsam mit Karl Muck die Hamburger Philharmoniker leitete, bis diese 1934 durch die Nationalsozialisten aufgelöst wurden. Papst ging zunächst im Herbst 1934 als Generalmusikdirektor nach Münster, wurde aber schon 1935 Leiter des Kölner Männergesangsvereins und kurz darauf mit Unterstützung seines Freundes Richard Strauß auch als Nachfolger von Hermann Abendroth städtischer Generalmusikdirektor des Gürzenich-Orchesters. Außerdem unterrichtete er Dirigieren an der Musikhochschule Köln. Nach Kriegsende kam es zu Auseinandersetzungen um seine Stelle als Generalmusikdirektor, weil die Stadt Köln trotz eines laufenden Vertrages mit Papst 1946 Günter Wand berief. Nach dessen Ansicht wurde Papst mehr und mehr « zur musikalischen Leitfigur der Ewiggestrigen » .

Papst nahm einen Ruf an die Nordwestdeutsche Musikakademie nach Detmold an, wo er Meisterkurse im Dirigieren hielt.

Für die Oberammergauer Passionsspiele 1950 schuf er eine Bearbeitung der Passionsmusik von Rochus Dedler (1779-1822) , die bis 1990 unverändert gespielt wurde und mit Revisionen und Ergänzungen des jetzigen musikalischen Leiters Markus Zwick im Wesentlichen bis heute in Gebrauch ist.

Eugen Papst wurde am 24. Dezember 1886 in Oberammergau geboren und entstammt einer alten bayrischen Lehrerfamilie. Sein Vater, ein tüchtiger Musiker, wurde der erste Lehrer seines Sohnes in Klavier, Orgel und Komposition und schon mit 13 Jahren instrumentierte der junge Papst die Kompositionen seines Vaters und wagte sich an selbständige Versuche. Papst besuchte zunächst ein Lehrerseminar, ging dann aber 1907 an die Akademie der Tonkunst in München und wurde Dirigenschüler von Felix Mottl. Schon 2 Jahre später wurde er mit dem Rheinberger-Preis für Komposition, Dirigieren und Orgel ausgezeichnet. Im Jahre 1910 ging er an das Theater in Allenstein. Von 1911-1922 leitete er das Berner Stadttheater und den dortigen Orchesterverein, nur unterbrochen durch den Kriegsdienst 1915-

Eugen Papst, Dirigent (römisch-katholisch) : geboren 24. Dezember 1886 in Oberammergau ; gestorben 2. Januar 1956, ebenda.

Die ersten musikalischen Unterweisungen in Klavier, Orgel und Komposition erhielt Papst von seinem Vater. Nach dem Besuch des Lehrerseminars in Freising kam er 1907 an die Akademie der Tonkunst in München, wo er Dirigierschüler von Felix Mottl (1856-1911) wurde. Bereits zwei Jahre später erhielt er den Rheinberger-Preis für Komposition, Dirigieren und Orgel. 1910 ging Papst für eine Spielzeit an das Theater in Allenstein, danach war er Leiter des Berner Stadttheaters und des dortigen Orchestervereins. 1922 erhielt er einen Ruf nach Hamburg, wo er zusammen mit Karl Muck (1859-1940) als Generalmusikdirektor die Philharmonie bis zu deren Auflösung 1934 leitete. Er dirigierte dort die wöchentlichen Symphoniekonzerte, die Volks- , Schüler- und Erwerbslosenkonzerte, ein Kammerorchester, die Chorkonzerte der Hamburger Singakademie und den Lehrergesangverein. Als Nachfolger Georg Ludwig Jochums (1909-1971) erhielt Papst im Herbst 1934 einen Ruf als Generalmusikdirektor nach Münster, womit die Leitung des gesamten städtischen Musiklebens verbunden war. 1935 wurde er zum Dirigenten des Kölner Männer-Gesang-Vereins gewählt ; er nahm das Amt an, blieb aber weiterhin auch in Münster tätig. 1936 trat er die Nachfolge von Hermann Abendroth als Generalmusikdirektor der Stadt Köln und Leiter der Gürzenich-Konzerte an, und übernahm eine Meisterklaße für Dirigieren an der Staatlichen Hochschule für Musik in Köln.

Nach Kriegsende blieb Papst die Rückkehr in sein Amt als Generalmusikdirektor (trotz seiner Entlastung im Zuge der Entnazifizierung und trotz des bestehenden Vertrags) versagt : Die Stadt Köln hatte in der Zwischenzeit einen neuen Vertrag mit Günter Wand abgeschlossen. Papst folgte schließlich einem Ruf an die Nordwestdeutsche Musikakademie in Detmold, wo er eine Meisterklaße für Dirigieren leitete. 1947-1949 trat er gelegentlich auch wieder als Dirigent des Gesangsvereins auf. 1950 bearbeitete er für die Passionsspiele seiner Heimatstadt die Passionsspielmusik von Rochus Dedler (1779-1822) , die bis heute die Grundlage für die Aufführungen bildet. Außerdem schrieb er Orchesterstücke, Chöre und Lieder, die jedoch größtenteils nicht im Druck erschienen.

Le « Putsch » de juillet à Vienne

Engelbert Dollfuß se retrouve seul Maître au pouvoir. Le pays est en partie détruit et il est désormais vu comme un dictateur sanguinaire : il perd peu à peu ses soutiens internationaux. De plus, les Socialistes sont désormais évincés.

Il met officiellement en place, le 1er mai 1934, une nouvelle constitution : l'Autriche cesse d'être une République et devient un « État corporatif » et autoritaire, où des élections auraient lieu « quand les circonstances le permettront ».

Dollfuß tente un dernier rapprochement avec les Sociaux-Démocrates le 11 juillet 1934 et renvoie son très impopulaire ministre de l'Intérieur, Emil Fey. Mais la situation continue à se dégrader. Son dernier soutien est alors Benito Mussolini qui, au grand regret de Adolf Hitler furieux de voir que Dollfuß a dissous le Parti nazi autrichien et envoyé ses leaders dans des camps de concentration, ne partage pas les mêmes idées sur l'Autriche.

Le 25 juillet 1934, des Nazis autrichiens membre du « régiment SS 89 », déguisés en militaires, prévoient de prendre en otage le Conseil des ministres, le président Wilhelm Miklas, ainsi que les responsables des principaux médias du pays. Mais la tentative de ce « Putsch » de juillet échoue grâce à l'intervention de Fey qui prévient à temps Dollfuß. Celui-ci tente alors de s'enfuir de la Chancellerie mais il est surpris par les Nazis, grièvement blessé et meurt dans la journée de ses blessures. Profondément choquée par cet assassinat, l'opinion publique le voit désormais comme un héros ayant fermement combattu le Nazisme.

Kurt von Schuschnigg lui succède à la Chancellerie et poursuit son œuvre jusqu'à ce que l'« Anschluß » mette un terme à cette politique.

En janvier 1933, l'élection d'Adolf Hitler au poste de Chancelier en Allemagne menace l'État autrichien. Le 4 mars 1933, le Chancelier Engelbert Dollfuß (appartenant au Parti Chrétien-Social) dissout le Parlement autrichien. Dans un vote serré (concernant les salaires des travailleurs des chemins de fer) au Conseil national, chacun des 3 présidents du parlement ont démissionné de leur poste afin de voter, ne laissant personne pour présider la réunion. Même si les statuts aurait pu résoudre cette situation, Dollfuß saisit cette occasion pour déclarer que le parlement avait cessé de fonctionner, et bloque toutes les tentatives de le convoquer à nouveau. Le Parti Social-Démocrate perd ainsi sa plateforme d'action politique. Les Conservateurs, face à la pression et la violence, non seulement de la gauche mais aussi de Nazis infiltrés venus d'Allemagne, peuvent désormais gouverner par décret, sur la base d'une loi d'urgence de 1917. Les libertés civiles sont alors suspendues et le Parti Social-Démocrate interdit, plusieurs de ses membres étant par ailleurs arrêtés.

Le 12 février 1934, l'« Heimwehr », commandée par Emil Fey, entreprend une marche sur l'Hôtel Schiff à Linz, une propriété du Parti Social-Démocrate (dirigé Richard Bernaschek), marche qui dégénère en affrontements. La police, la gendarmerie et l'armée fédérale (« Bundesheer ») viennent épauler cette dernière. Après de brefs combats, le bâtiment est envahi par les conservateurs.

De nombreuses escarmouches ont alors lieu dans toute l'Autriche entre Socialistes et Conservateurs. Les Socialistes se barricadent dans les zones urbaines (« Gemeindebauten ») formant les bastions du mouvement socialiste en Autriche, comme le « Karl-Marx-Hof ». La police et les para-militaires ont pris position en dehors de ces ensembles fortifiés avant d'échanger des tirs avec ces derniers à l'arme légère. Des combats ont également lieu dans les villes industrielles telles que Steyr, Sankt Pölten, Weiz, Eggenberg bei Graz, Kapfenberg, Bruck an der Mur, Graz, Ebensee et Wörgl.

L'intervention de l'armée autrichienne, jusqu'alors neutre, marque le tournant du conflit. Le Chancelier Dollfuß ordonne le bombardement du « Karl-Marx-Hof », mettant en danger la vie de milliers de civils et détruisant de nombreux appartements avant de forcer les combattants socialistes à se rendre. Les combats dans la capitale prennent fin le 13 février mais perdurent dans les villes de Styrie, en particulier dans Bruck an der Mur et dans Judenburg, jusqu'au 14 ou 15 février.

Après cette date, il ne reste alors que quelques groupes socialistes qui combattent encore contre l'armée, ou sont en pleine déroute. La guerre civile autrichienne prend fin le 16 février.

Plusieurs centaines de personnes (y compris les para-militaires, membres des forces de sécurité et des civils) sont morts durant le conflit, auxquelles s'ajoutent plus de 300 blessés.

Les autorités arrêtent et exécutent 9 dirigeants du Parti Social-Démocrate en vertu des dispositions de la loi martiale. On dénombre, en outre, plus de 1,500 arrestations et les principaux Socialistes, comme Otto Bauer, sont contraints à l'exil.

Une fois éliminée la principale force d'opposition, le pays connaît l'instauration de l'austro-fascisme. Le « Front patriotique », résultat de la fusion de l'« Heimwehr » et du Parti Chrétien-Social, devient le seul Parti politique légal (Parti unique) sous le nouveau régime autoritaire, le « Ständestaat ».

En juillet 1934, les Nazis autrichiens tentent un coup d'État qui échoue et fait environ 270 morts. 13 personnes sont exécutées et 4 se suicident avant leur exécution. Le Chancelier Dollfuß est assassiné, Kurt von Schuschnigg lui succède et reste à la Chancellerie jusqu'en mars 1938 (date de l'« Anschluss »). Pendant ce coup d'État, l'Allemagne reste neutre car elle ne sent pas encore assez forte militairement pour intervenir. Benito Mussolini, alors encore hostile et méfiant vis-à-vis du 3e « Reich », envoie des soldats à la frontière autrichienne pour protéger l'indépendance de l'Autriche si elle venait à être menacée, cette dernière étant liée à l'Italie par une alliance.

La guerre civile autrichienne s'est néanmoins révélée un moment décisif dans l'histoire de la République. Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, lorsque l'Autriche est ré-apparue dans le paysage politique en tant que nation souveraine en 1945, la politique retombe sous la domination des Sociaux-Démocrates et les Conservateurs, désormais au sein du Parti populaire autrichien (ÖVP). Toutefois, afin d'éviter un retour des divisions amères de la Ire République, les dirigeants de la 2e République ont été déterminés à mettre l'idée d'un large consensus au cœur du nouveau système politique : la « Grande Coalition », regroupant des membres des 2 Partis.

Adolf Hitler himself planned a failed Nazi « coup », in 1934, that culminated in the assassination of the Austrian Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß, according to new findings by a Viennese historian.

Based on journal entries by close Hitler associate Josef Gœbbels, historian Kurt Bauer concluded the thwarted « July putsch » of 1934 was devised « with great likelihood by Adolf Hitler personally », in a newly-published article.

On July 25, 1934, Austrian Nazi partisans attacked the Chancellery in Vienna, hoping to force the government to resign and install a regime favourable to Adolf Hitler's Germany.

The « coup » failed but Engelbert Dollfuß was shot and killed.

Until now, the action was seen as a local initiative by Austrian Nazis.

After a high-level meeting with Hitler, on July 22, 1934, in Bayreuth, southern Germany, Bauer found that Gœbbels wrote in his diary :

« Sunday : at the “ Führer's ” ... Austrian question. Whether it will work ? I'm very sceptical. »

On the day of the « coup », Gœbbels added :

« At the “ Führer's ” : alarm from Austria. Chancellery occupied ... great suspense. Horrible waiting. »

He later concluded :

« Dollfuß dead. Then, an honourable retreat by the insurgents. Then, victory for the government. Lost ! »

According to Bauer, one of the main reasons behind Hitler's putsch decision was an impending visit by Dollfuß to Italy and France, which the Nazi leader feared could lead to Germany's isolation.

Dollfuß installed an authoritarian regime in Austria after coming to power in 1932 but, also, staunchly opposed its annexation to Nazi Germany under Hitler.

The « July Putsch » was a failed « coup d'État » attempt against the Austro-fascist regime by Austrian Nazis, which took place between the 25 and 30 July 1934.

The Nazi « Machtergreifung » in Germany, on 30 January 1933, when President Paul von Hindenburg appointed Adolf Hitler Chancellor, gave an enormous boost to Austrian Nazis. When the Austrian Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß obstructed further sessions of the National Council parliament on 4 March 1933, the Nazis responded with demands for a new election, massive propaganda and a wave of bomb terror. Dollfuß responded to these actions with authoritarian measures such as house searches and arrests. The situation was exacerbated by the Bavarian Minister of Justice, the Nazi lawyer Hans Frank, who in a public speech on March 8 threatened the Austrian government with an armed intervention by NSDAP forces. Nevertheless, the Right-wing Dollfuß government initially concentrated on the ban of the Communist Party and the Social-Democratic « Republikanischer Schutzbund » para-military organisation. When Hans

Frank, together with his Party fellows Hanns Kerrl and Roland Freisler, on 13 May 1933, personally entered the country to speak in Vienna (where he behaved himself) as well as Graz (where he openly spoke against Dollfuß regime and addressed Austrian Germans encouraging civic disobedience) , after a 2 day tour, on 15 May 1933, he was allegedly deported and the Austrian Nazi Party banned, on 19 June 1933. Many Nazis fled to Germany and joined the Austrian Legion, while others remained in Austria and continued their actions illegally. Hitler's government reacted with harsh economic sanctions aimed at Austrian tourism.

On 25 July 1934, in the midst of difficult social and political tensions, and with the knowledge of official German positions, 154 « SS » men disguised as « Bundesheer » soldiers and policemen pushed into the Austrian Chancellery. Chancellor Dollfuß was killed by 2 bullets. The rest of the government was able to escape. Another group of the putschists occupied the RAVAG radio building and broadcast a false report about the putative transfer of power from Dollfuß to Anton Rintelen. This was to have been the call for Nazis all over Austria to begin the uprising against the State. There were several days of fighting in parts of Carinthia, Styria and Upper-Austria, as well as smaller uprisings in Salzburg. There was fighting in Upper-Styria, both the industrial area between Judenburg and Leoben and, in Enns, the « Deutschlandsberg » District in south-western Styria and in south-eastern Styria by Bad Radkersburg. Bloody clashes took place in and around Schladming and Leoben. In Carinthia, the centers of the « coup » were in Lower-Carinthia and Sankt Paul im Lavanttal. In Upper-Austria, in addition to individual actions in the « Salzkammergut » , the fighting was concentrated in the Pyhrn Pass and in the « Mühlviertel » where, on the night of 26 July, in the Kollerschlag area on the Bavarian-Austrian border, a division of the Austrian Legion invaded Austrian territory and attacked the customs guard and a police station.

Early on 26 July, a German courier was arrested at the border crossing in Kollerschlag, carrying precise instructions for the putsch. Called the « Kollerschlag Document » , it testified to a clear connection between Bavaria and the « July Putsch » .

The « coup » was finally crushed by the police, military and para-military units loyal to the government. There is varying information regarding the number of fatalities. Gerhard Jagschitz took-over the work of military historian Erwin Steinböck. In 1965, his figures claimed that the « July Coup » and its immediate consequences lead to the deaths of 270 people : 153 Nazi supporters died (including 13 executed and 7 people who committed suicide) ; 104 died on the Government side, along with 13 civilians. In contrast, Kurt Bauer's extensive studies concluded that there were 223 deaths : 111 Nazi supporters ; 101 on the Government side ; and 11 civilians. The number of injured is estimated at 500 to 600 people.

On 26 July 1934, military tribunals took place to prosecute rebels. 13 were executed. 4,000 Nazi supporters had been detained. Many fled to Yugoslavia or to Germany. Kurt von Schuschnigg became the new Chancellor and Ernst Rüdiger Starhemberg remained as vice-Chancellor.

Der Juliputsch war ein gescheiterter nationalsozialistischer Umsturzversuch in Österreich. Er begann am 25. Juli 1934 mit dem Überfall von als Soldaten des Bundesheeres und Polizisten verkleideten SS-Männern auf das Bundeskanzleramt in Wien. Gleichzeitig drang eine andere Gruppe von Putschisten in die Wiener Senderäume der RAVAG ein und erzwang die Sendung der Falschmeldung, daß Bundeskanzler Engelbert Dollfuß die Regierungsgeschäfte an den ehemaligen steirischen Landeshauptmann Anton Rintelen übergeben habe. Diese Nachricht war das vereinbarte Signal, auf das hin Nationalsozialisten in ganz Österreich mit einer « Erhebung » beginnen sollten. Tatsächlich aber erfolgte diese erst mit einiger Verzögerung und auch nur in Teilen Österreichs. Vor allem in der Steiermark und Kärnten sowie Teilen Oberösterreichs und Salzburgs kam es in den folgenden Tagen zu teils heftigen Gefechten zwischen den Nationalsozialisten und den Streitkräften der Bundesregierung, zu denen neben dem Bundesheer, die Polizei, die Gendarmerie, das Freiwillige Schutzkorps und selbstständig operierende Einheiten regierungstreuer Wehrverbände, namentlich der Heimwehr, zählten. In den übrigen Bundesländern blieb es hingegen weitgehend ruhig. Der Putsch, an dem sich auch einige Kampftruppen der im Deutschen Reich stationierten Österreichischen Legion beteiligt hatten, wurde schließlich bis zum 30. Juli niedergeschlagen. Mehr als 200 Menschen waren im Zuge der Kampfhandlungen getötet worden, darunter auch Bundeskanzler Dollfuß als prominentestes Opfer. Nach der Niederschlagung des Juliputsches wurden rund 4.000 Nationalsozialisten von den am 26. Juli eigens zu diesem Zweck geschaffenen Militärgerichten abgeurteilt oder sofort in Anhaltelager eingewiesen, 13 Putschisten wurden hingerichtet. Viele andere entzogen sich ihrer Verhaftung und Verurteilung durch die Flucht ins Deutsche Reich oder nach Jugoslawien.

Die « Machtergreifung » Adolf Hitlers am 30. Januar 1933 in Deutschland gab den österreichischen Nationalsozialisten enormen Aufschwung. Als es am 4. März 1933 zur damals so genannten « Selbstausschaltung des Parlaments » und in der Folgezeit zum Einschlagen eines « autoritären Kurses » durch die Regierung Dollfuß kam, sahen sich die Nationalsozialisten jedoch der Möglichkeit beraubt, nach deutschem Muster durch Neuwahlen auch in Österreich die Macht zu erringen. Nachdem die Bundesregierung als eine ihrer ersten Maßnahmen die Pressefreiheit eingeschränkt und beginnend mit 8. März 1933 ein Versammlungs- und Aufmarschverbot erlassen hatte, ordneten die NS-Gauleitungen im Gegenzug an, dieses Verbot durch Ausschöpfung aller noch legalen Betätigungsmöglichkeiten, wie zum Beispiel Vereinsversammlungen, Vorträgen und Filmvorführungen sowie verstärkter Propaganda von Haus zu Haus zu unterlaufen. Es zeigte sich bereits in dieser Zeit, daß die NS-Führung keinesfalls gewillt war ihren Aktionismus, der eines der wesentlichen Mittel war, um die Dynamik der Bewegung und die Moral der Anhänger aufrechterhalten, einschränken zu lassen. Vielmehr sollte durch verstärkte Aktivitäten aller Art demonstriert werden, daß die Partei « Trotz Verbot nicht tot ! » war, wie ein bekannter NS-Slogan aus der Zeit der bald folgenden Illegalität lautete.

Der politische « Hauptstoß » der Bundesregierung galt aber zunächst der Sozialdemokratie, was wohl als wesentlicher Grund dafür gelten kann, daß der März und auch der April 1933 innenpolitisch relativ ruhig verliefen. Eine wesentliche Änderung des innenpolitischen Klimas brachte die von der Bundesregierung angeordnete Ausweisung des bayerischen Justizministers Hans Frank am 15. Mai mit sich, der als « Antwort » von reichsdeutscher Seite am 27. Mai die Verhängung der « Tausend-Mark-Sperre » zum Boykott des österreichischen Fremdenverkehrs folgte. Die Konfliktsituation zwischen den beiden Staaten führte schließlich zu einer mit 12. Juni einsetzenden nationalsozialistischen Terrorwelle im gesamten österreichischen Bundesgebiet, der in den folgenden Tagen drei Menschen zum Opfer fielen. Die Bundesregierung reagierte darauf mit Hausdurchsuchungen bei NS-Funktionären und in den Parteilokalen der NSDAP sowie einer groß angelegten Verhaftungsaktion im gesamten Bundesgebiet. Bis 17. Juni waren bereits rund 2.500 Nationalsozialisten, darunter nahezu alle wichtigen Funktionäre der Partei, verhaftet worden.

Als zwei Nationalsozialisten am 19. Juni 1933 in der Gemeinde Krems einen Handgranatenanschlag auf eine Gruppe christlich-deutscher Turner verübten, bei dem 30 Turner verletzt wurden, wurde der NSDAP und dem mit ihr paktierenden Steirischen Heimatschutz noch am selben Tag jegliche Betätigung in Österreich untersagt, was de facto einem Verbot beider Organisationen gleichkam. Das Betätigungsverbot hatte die österreichischen Nationalsozialisten zwar unvorbereitet, aber doch nicht gänzlich unerwartet getroffen. Es gelang der NS-Bewegung, ihren inneren organisatorischen Zusammenhang zu wahren, indem ihre Mitglieder vordergründig unpolitischen Organisationen beitraten, sie also unterwanderten ; oder indem sie bereits von ihnen vereinnahmte Vereine des deutschnationalen Lagers (wie die deutschnationalen Turnvereine, der Deutsche Schulverein Südmark, der Alpenverein und andere) nun in relativ kurzer Zeit zu organisatorischen Plattformen für den « Kampf » in der Illegalität umfunktionierten. Am 5. Juli 1933 schwor die ins Reich geflüchtete NS-Landesleitung für Österreich in einer Außendung ihre Anhänger auf einen mit allen Mitteln und « rücksichtsloser Härte zu führenden Kampf » gegen die Bundesregierung ein, bis das Ziel der « Befreiung Österreichs » erreicht sei.

Waren die illegalen NS-Aktivitäten infolge des Betätigungsverbots zunächst abgeebbt, so begannen sie im Laufe des Sommers 1933 wieder stark anzusteigen. Die Bundesregierung sah sich daher veranlaßt, eine Reihe so genannter « Notverordnungen » zur Bekämpfung der NS-Tätigkeit in Kraft zu setzen. Um den zunehmenden Anschlägen auf für die Allgemeinheit wichtigen Infrastruktureinrichtungen zu begegnen, trat im Juli 1933 eine Verordnung in Kraft, die es ermöglichte, künftig die Ausführenden dieser Anschläge nicht mehr durch ein ordentliches Gerichtsverfahren, sondern im wesentlich schneller ablaufenden Verwaltungsverfahren abzustrafen, wobei ausschließlich Freiheitsstrafen in der Dauer von drei bis sechs Monaten verhängt werden sollten. Im September 1933 wurde eine Verordnung erlassen, die es ermöglichte, jene Personen, die im Verdacht einer « staatsgefährlichen » Betätigung standen, präventiv « anzuhalten » . Durch die Einweisung in ein Anhaltelager konnten diese ab sofort auf unbestimmte Zeit festgesetzt werden. Ab Ende 1933 ging man dazu über, nach Anschlägen und anderen NS-Aktionen, deren Täter unbekannt blieben, stellvertretend prominente Nationalsozialisten des Orts, in dem sich diese ereignet hatten, festzunehmen und in ein Anhaltelager zu überstellen. Die Exekutive wiederum, die durch die immer häufiger werdenden Bereitschaftsdienste, Patrouillengänge, Sicherungs- und Überwachungsaufgaben aller Art bald an die Grenzen ihrer personellen Möglichkeiten gelangte, wurde im September 1933 durch die erstmals erfolgte Indienststellung von 200 Mann des Freiwilligen Schutzkorps entlastet.

Eine wesentliche Beeinträchtigung der NS-Aktivitäten konnte aber auch durch diese Maßnahmen der Bundesregierung nicht erreicht werden. Vielmehr bestärkten diese die Nationalsozialisten in ihrer ablehnenden Haltung gegenüber der Eigenstaatlichkeit Österreichs und ließen sie ab dem 31. Dezember 1933 mit einer noch stärkeren Terrorwelle antworten, in deren Verlauf allein bis 8. Jänner 1934 nicht weniger als 140 Böller- und Sprengstoffanschläge verübt wurden. Vorrangiges Ziel dieser Anschläge war die Störung des wirtschaftlichen Lebens durch die Beeinträchtigung des Fremdenverkehrs und die Zerstörung von für die Allgemeinheit wichtigen Einrichtungen sowie eine allgemeine Beunruhigung der Bevölkerung. Nach dieser ersten großen Terrorphase zu Beginn des Jahres 1934 kam es im gesamten Bundesgebiet zu einer Beruhigung der Lage, bis im April erneut eine gewaltige Terrorwelle einsetzte, die sich mit ständig wechselnder Intensität und wechselnden Schwerpunkten bis zum Juliputsch fortsetzte.

Nationalsozialistische Gewalt und staatliche Gegengewalt entwickelten in den Monaten bis zum Juliputsch eine immer stärkere Eigendynamik, die in absehbarer Zeit weder für die Bundesregierung noch für die Nationalsozialisten eine Rückkehr zur Normalität wahrscheinlich machte. Die Nationalsozialisten mussten allerdings zunehmend erkennen, daß die Bundesregierung mit terroristischen Mitteln allein nicht zu Fall zu bringen war. Die scheinbar in immer weitere Ferne rückende « Machtergreifung » in Österreich führte auf ihrer Seite zu einer wachsenden Frustration, die sich wiederum in einem immer zügelloser werdenden Terror Luft machte.

Hans Schafranek warnt jedoch davor, den Juliputsch vereinfachend « als direktes Resultat jener (zunehmend eskalierenden) Entwicklung, als Höhepunkt einer überaus gewalttätigen Eskalationsstrategie zu interpretieren » , da es falsch sei « die psychologischen Dispositionen und die technisch-organisatorischen Voraussetzungen für einen bewaffneten Aufstand umstandslos gleich(zu)setzen » .

Im März 1934 unterstellte Fridolin Glaß, der Kommandant der Wiener SS-Standarte 89, seine Einheit direkt der SS-Führung in Berlin. Bis zu diesem Zeitpunkt war die SS-Standarte 89, die großteils aus ehemaligen Bundesheer-Angehörigen bestand, dem SA-Oberabschnitt XI in München zugeordnet. Diese Aktion löste starke Rivalitäten zwischen SS und SA aus, SA-Obergruppenführer Hermann Reschny bezichtigte Glaß der Meuterei und ließ ihn in München kurzzeitig sogar verhaften. Ebenso wie zwei andere führende Putschisten, Otto Wächter und Rudolf Weydenhammer, war Glaß nun in einer weitgehend isolierten Position. Um NS-intern wieder Einfluß zu gewinnen, trat er mit dem SS-Gruppenführer Alfred Rodenbücher und dem Stabschef der NS-Landesleitung für Österreich und ehemaligen Heimatschutz-Führer, Hanns Albin Rauter in Kontakt. In diesem Personenkreis wurden die Putschpläne entwickelt, während die österreichische SA im Vorfeld des Putsches weitgehend ignoriert beziehungsweise bewußt in die Irre geführt wurde. Beispielsweise informierte August Edler von Meyszner, wie Rauter aus dem Steirischen Heimatschutz stammender Kommandant der SA-Standarte 27, seinen Stab bewußt nicht über die Planungen. Theo Habicht konspirierte zudem mit ehemaligen Funktionären des Landbundes, und andere mit Vizekanzler Franz Winkler, der sich dem Putsch nicht zuletzt aus finanziellen Motiven heraus anschloß. An der Aufstandsbewegung im Juli 1934 nahmen in der Steiermark auch circa 1.500 Mann der Bauernwehr teil. Die strategischen Eckpunkte der Putschplanung wurden auf einer Konferenz in Zürich am 25. Juni festgelegt. Anwesend waren Glaß als militärischer Leiter des Putsches, Wächter als dessen politischer Verantwortlicher, Weydenhammer, der die Verbindung zur Landesleitung in München und zu Rintelen halten sollte, und Habicht.

Eine explizite Zustimmung Adolf Hitlers für diese Pläne gab es nicht, er hatte Habicht lediglich gestattet, sich einem eventuellen Putsch des Bundesheeres anzuschließen. In der Folge holte Hitler jedoch die Einschätzung hoher Militärs und NS-Funktionäre (und andere von Hermann Reschny) ein, die ihm versicherten, ein Putsch des Bundesheeres sei äußerst unwahrscheinlich. Demnach war Hitler die tatsächliche Situation schon im Juni bekannt, er tat allerdings nichts, um Habichts Planungen zu stoppen. Nach neuen Forschungsergebnissen Kurt Bauers befahl Hitler dagegen den Juli-Putsch « mit großer Wahrscheinlichkeit persönlich » . Bauer stützt seine These insbesondere auf die 1992 entdeckten und 2005

publizierten Tagebücher des deutschen Propagandaministers Josef Goebbels. Aus dessen Eintrag über eine « hochrangige Besprechung » in Bayreuth vom 22. Juli 1934, also zwei Tage vor dem Putsch, schließt Bauer, daß « Hitler die Sache sehr ernst nahm. Bei dieser Besprechung muß er seine letzte Zustimmung zu dem Coup gegeben haben. Die Möglichkeit, daß er nur oberflächlich und nebenbei darüber informiert gewesen sein könnte, scheidet damit aus. »

Bereits in den letzten Juni-Tagen begannen die Vorbereitungen bei den beteiligten Einheiten ; die österreichische SA-Führung und die Gauleiter wurden erst zwischen 10. und 17. Juli von den Plänen in Kenntnis gesetzt, jedoch nicht über den genauen Zeitpunkt der geplanten Aktion. Die Absprachen mit Landbund, Heimatschutz, SS und Anton Rintelen wurden vor der SA-Führung geheim gehalten ; allerdings gelangte die Zürcher Konferenz zur Kenntnis der österreichischen Sicherheitsbehörden. Ebenfalls wußte man von einem Memorandum eines ungarischen Diplomaten, der durch den österreichischen Militärattaché in Paris, den NS-Sympathisanten Lothar Rendulic, von einer geplanten Aktion informiert worden war. Am weitesten gediehen die Planungen in der Steiermark, wo Gauleiter Walther Oberhaidacher am 20. Juli noch zusätzlich eine Tagung der Kreisleiter einberief und detaillierte Instruktionen ausgab. Unter anderem wurde ein Radioabhör-Dienst eingerichtet, um die Rundfunkmeldung nach der RAVAG-Besetzung (die das Signal für den allgemeinen Aufstand sein sollte) nicht zu versäumen.

Seit Mitte 1933 waren von verschiedensten nationalsozialistischen Seiten mehr oder weniger ausgereifte Pläne für eine gewaltsame « Machtergreifung » in Österreich ausgearbeitet worden. Diesbezügliche Gerüchte und Planungsdetails sickerten immer wieder auch zu den Sicherheitsbehörden durch (entweder als Folge der geleisteten Aufklärungsarbeit oder aber durch Verrat von nationalsozialistischer Seite) und hatten dort wiederholt die Anordnung erhöhter Alarmbereitschaft zur Folge. Die daraus resultierende allmähliche « Alarmmüdigkeit » aufseiten der Exekutive ist sicher auch ein nicht unwesentlicher Grund für die Anfangserfolge der Nationalsozialisten am 25. Juli 1934.

Am 25. Juli 1934 sammelten sich die Putschisten, weil viele Mitglieder des Turnerbundes waren, in der Turnerbundhalle Siebensterngasse in Wien-Neubau, wo sie mit Waffen und Uniformen ausgerüstet wurden. Von dort aus drangen mit Wissen deutscher offizieller Stellen 154 als Soldaten des Bundesheeres und als Polizisten verkleidete SS-Männer in das Bundeskanzleramt ein, wobei Bundeskanzler Engelbert Dollfuß von zwei Schüssen tödlich getroffen wurde. Die übrige Regierung konnte entkommen. Eine andere Gruppe der Putschisten hatte das RAVAG-Gebäude (Radioverkehrs AG) besetzt und eine Falschmeldung über die angebliche Machtübergabe von Dollfuß an Anton Rintelen senden lassen. Dies sollte der Aufruf für die Nationalsozialisten in ganz Österreich sein, mit der Erhebung gegen die Staatsmacht zu beginnen. Es kam zu mehrtägigen Kämpfen in Teilen Kärntens, der Steiermark und Oberösterreichs und zu kleineren Aufständen in Salzburg. Schwerpunkte der Kämpfe waren die Obersteiermark, und zwar sowohl das Industriegebiet zwischen Judenburg und Leoben als auch das steirische Ennstal, der Bezirk Deutschlandsberg in der Südweststeiermark und die Südoststeiermark um Bad Radkersburg. Die blutigsten Auseinandersetzungen fanden in und um Schladming und im Raum Leoben-Donawitz statt. In Kärnten waren die Zentren des Putsches Unterkärnten und das Lavanttal. In Oberösterreich konzentrierten sich die Kämpfe, neben einzelnen Aktionen im Salzkammergut, auf den Pyhrnpass und auf das obere Mühlviertel, wo im Raum Kollerschlag in der Nacht vom 26. Juli auf den 27. Juli an der bayrischen-österreichischen Grenze eine Abteilung der Österreichischen Legion auf österreichisches Staatsgebiet eindrang und die Zollwache und einen Gendarmerieposten überfiel.

Bereits am frühen Morgen des 26. Juli war hinter dem Grenzübergang Kollerschlag ein aus Deutschland kommender Kurier verhaftet worden, der genaue Putschinstruktionen, das sogenannte Kollerschlager Dokument, bei sich trug, das deutliche Verbindungen des Juliputsches nach Bayern bezeugte.

Schon die Ausgangslage des Putschunternehmens war von den Planern völlig falsch eingeschätzt worden. Als die Erhebung in den Bundesländern voll in Gang kam, war keine der drei für ihr Gelingen als unumgänglich angesehenen Voraussetzungen mehr gegeben : So war es weder gelungen, die gesamte Bundesregierung gefangen zu nehmen, noch konnte man des Bundespräsidenten Wilhelm Miklas habhaft werden ; die österreichische Exekutive und das Militär waren weder zu den Putschisten übergelaufen, noch neutral geblieben, sondern hatten sich von Anfang an gegen die Putschisten gestellt ; und auch die von ihnen erhoffte spontane « Volkserhebung » war ausgeblieben. Angesichts dieser Tatsachen war es im Nachhinein betrachtet geradezu selbstmörderisch, daß mit dem Aufstand in den Bundesländern überhaupt erst begonnen wurde. Wie irrational die Erwartungen und wie grenzenlos die Siegesgewissheit aber auf NS-Seite waren, verdeutlicht das Beispiel der SA-Standarte 47, deren Kommandostab sich in Leibnitz befand, anschaulich. Ihr von Anfang an völlig siegesgewiss auftretender SA-Standartenführer hatte nach der Radiomeldung vom Rücktritt der Regierung alle ihm zur Verfügung stehenden Melder zur Alarmierung der ihm unterstellten NS-Ortsgruppen und SA-Formationen ausgesandt. Als bekannt wurde, daß Rintelen sich von den Putschisten distanziert hatte und damit feststand, daß das Unternehmen nicht wie geplant verlief, standen dem Standartenführer nun keine Melder mehr zur Verfügung, um die an die Ortsgruppen und Kampfformationen ergangenen Befehle zu widerrufen. Für den Fall eventuell auftretender Schwierigkeiten zumindest einen Melder in Reserve zu halten, war der Standartenführung offenbar überhaupt nicht in den Sinn gekommen.

Wie der Verlauf der « Erhebung » zeigte, waren aber auch die militärische Stärke und Schlagkraft der NS-Bewegung vielfach überschätzt worden. Zum Teil lag das auch daran, daß die NS-Unterführer vielfach übertriebene Angaben bezüglich der Stärke und Bewaffnung der ihnen unterstellten Truppen gemacht hatten, um bei ihren militärischen Vorgesetzten gut dazustehen. Die höhere militärische Führung war daher in diesem Zusammenhang nicht selten von völlig falschen Voraussetzungen ausgegangen. Da laut NS-Planern die Bewaffnung der Bundesländer erst im September 1934 abgeschlossen gewesen wäre, standen den Putschisten lediglich in der Obersteiermark und in Kärnten Waffen in einigermaßen ausreichender Zahl zur Verfügung. In vielen Orten aber stellte der Mangel an Waffen und Munition die Putschisten von Anfang an vor beträchtliche Probleme, die nur durch äußerst zeit- und personalaufwendige « Beschaffungsaktionen » vor Ort, etwa durch Plünderung von Waffendepots der Heimwehr und Beschlagnahmen bei Privatpersonen, einigermaßen zufriedenstellend gelöst werden konnten. Ein weiteres Problem war, daß am Tag des Putsches zahlreiche Angehörige der SA-Stürme und nicht selten auch deren Anführer gar nicht an den Sammelorten erschienen waren. Zudem standen viele angesehene und bewährte politische und militärische NS-Führer am Tag des Putsches aufgrund ihrer Einweisung in ein Anhaltelager nicht zur Verfügung. In manchen Orten, wie zum Beispiel in Schladming, gelang es daher völlig Ortsfremden die Befehlsgewalt an sich zu reißen, welche sich dann beim ersten Anzeichen von Schwierigkeiten davonmachten.

Viele der militärischen Kommandanten der Putschisten waren den Anforderungen, welche die Kampfhandlungen mit sich brachten, nicht gewachsen. Die häufig unklaren Führungskompetenzen und das unzulängliche Verbindungs- und Meldewesen führten dazu, daß sie oft weder über die Gesamtlage noch über die Lage in der unmittelbaren Nachbarschaft unterrichtet waren. Meist waren sie auch nicht in der Lage zu kontrollieren, ob von ihnen durch Melder übermittelte Befehle ausgeführt worden waren oder nicht. Die Unklarheit, die vielerorts herrschte, begünstigte die Entstehung zahlreicher Gerüchte, welche die Kampfmoral beeinträchtigten und für zusätzliche Verwirrung sorgten. Den NS-Mannschaften wiederum fehlte es vielfach an der nötigen Disziplin. Sie waren zwar dem « Soldatenspielen » bei der illegalen SA gewachsen, nicht aber den Anforderungen einer Kampfsituation, wie sie am Putschtag in vielen Orten eintrat. Trotz entsprechender Anordnungen ihrer Vorgesetzten wurden Wach- und Sicherungsaufgaben oft nicht oder nur nachlässig befolgt, Straßen- und Telefonverbindungen häufig nicht unterbrochen, sodaß die Bundesregierung nicht nur völlig ungehindert Truppenverschiebungen durchführen, sondern auch von vielen eingeschlossenen Gendarmerieposten und Postämtern detaillierte Berichte über die Lage vor Ort erhalten konnte.

Angesichts der Unzahl von Fehlern, Pannen und Unzulänglichkeiten aufseiten der Aufständischen scheint die Einschätzung des Bundesheers, es beispielsweise in der Steiermark mit einem « gut ausgerüsteten, im Gebrauche der Waffe geübten » Gegner zu tun gehabt zu haben, auch etwas Propaganda in eigener Sache zu sein. « Für einige SA-Einheiten mochte diese Einschätzung richtig sein, für die Masse der an der “ Erhebung ” beteiligten SA-Verbände, insbesondere aber die zahlreichen sonstigen “ Kämpfer ”, die sich ihr angeschlossen hatten, dürfte sie kaum Gültigkeit gehabt haben. »

Für die österreichischen Nationalsozialisten war der gescheiterte Juliputsch eine Katastrophe. Angesichts der Tatsache, daß die NS-Bewegung, die vielen ihrer Anhänger als unüberwindlich erschienen war, in nur wenigen Tagen nahezu völlig zusammengebrochen war, herrschte unter der Anhängerschaft « lähmendes Entsetzen und Verwirrung » , wie es beispielsweise in einem Bericht des steirischen Sicherheitsdirektors heißt. Tausende Parteifunktionäre, Aktivisten und Anhänger waren nach dem Putsch entweder verhaftet worden oder aber ins Deutsche Reich oder nach Jugoslawien geflüchtet. Organisatorisch stand die österreichische NSDAP damit faktisch vor einem Neuanfang. Was jedoch blieb, waren die schon vor dem Juliputsch vorhandenen Gegensätze zwischen der eigentlichen politischen Organisation der Partei, der SA und der SS. Im weiter schwelenden internen Machtkampf gerieten die politische Organisation und die SA aber schon bald gegenüber der zunehmend einflußreicher werdenden SS ins Hintertreffen. Ins Gewicht fiel auch, daß man sich NS-intern auch über die nun gegenüber der österreichischen Bundesregierung einzuschlagende Strategie völlig uneins war. Während die Politische Organisation prinzipiell einem Versöhnungskurs nicht abgeneigt war, setzte die SA weiter auf einen Konfrontationskurs.

Adolf Hitler, für den das Scheitern des Putsches in Österreich eine immense außenpolitische Belastung bedeutete, ging nach dem Putsch auf völlige Distanz zu den österreichischen Nationalsozialisten. Bereits am 27. Juli 1934 verbot er allen mit österreichischen Angelegenheiten befaßten politischen Leitern im Deutschen Reich jegliche weitere Betätigung oder Unterstützung der österreichischen Aufständischen. Kurz darauf, am 3. August, wurde die österreichische Landesleitung der NSDAP aufgelöst, die seiner Auffassung nach die alleinige Verantwortung für den gescheiterten Putsch trug. Ihr Leiter, Theo Habicht, verlor alle seine Parteifunktionen. Die Österreichische Legion wurde entwaffnet und von ihren Standorten nahe der Grenze zu Österreich abgezogen. Untersuchungen mit dem Ziel, die Schuldigen für das Scheitern des Putsches zu ermitteln wurden zwar eingeleitet, auf Geheiß Heinrich Himmlers aber schon bald wieder eingestellt, um die parteiinternen Querelen nicht weiter anzufachen. Die ins Deutsche Reich geflohenen Anstifter des Putsches schoben sich nämlich gegenseitig die Schuld für sein Scheitern zu, versuchten aber sich persönlich so weit als möglich reinzuwaschen.

Die nach dem Juliputsch verhafteten Nationalsozialisten wurden von den Sicherheitsbehörden und (falls sie angezeigt wurden) der Staatsanwaltschaft in « schwerer » und « minder Beteiligte » geschieden. Die Schwerebeteiligten (Anführer, Mitkämpfer, Kuriere und so weiter) wurden gemäß dem am 26. Juli 1934 in Kraft getretenen Gesetz über die Einführung eines Militärgerichtshofs auch dann, wenn bereits ein Verfahren vor einem ordentlichen oder einem Standgericht anhängig war, dem Militärgericht zur Aburteilung ihrer mit dem Putsch im Zusammenhang stehenden Vergehen überstellt. Für die Minderbeteiligten kam ein am 30. Juli erlaßenes Gesetz zum Tragen, dem zufolge sie unbeschadet einer strafrechtlichen Verfolgung bei Beschlagnahme ihres Vermögens in ein Anhaltelager einzuweisen waren. Aufgrund dieses Gesetzes blieb auch die große Mehrheit der Juliputschisten von einem Prozess verschont. Die Anhaltung zahlreicher Familienväter, Brüder und Söhne bedeutete jedoch vielerorts einen empfindlichen Ausfall an Arbeitskräften, weswegen am 25. August ein « Runderlaß » der Generaldirektion für die öffentliche Sicherheit erging, dem zufolge alle nach dem Gesetz vom 30. Juli Angehaltenen zur Besorgung dringend notwendiger landwirtschaftlicher Arbeiten beurlaubt werden konnten.

Die Militärgerichtsprozesse bildeten in den folgenden Monaten auch ein Schwerpunktthema in der Berichterstattung diverser österreichischer Tageszeitungen. Der Tendenzjustizcharakter dieser Prozesse ist nicht zu übersehen. In den Verhandlungen kommt immer wieder die Voreingenommenheit der Richter zum Ausdruck, bis hin zur Diktion. Zumeist wurden nur möglichst anklagekonforme Tatzeugen zu den Verhandlungen geladen. Die Verteidiger, die so gut wie nie genügend Zeit gehabt hatten, sich mit dem Fall zu beschäftigen, wurden möglichst behindert und im Allgemeinen der Entlastung der Angeklagten dienenden Beweisanträge abgeschmettert. Für den Tathergang wichtige Fragen wurden nur selten geklärt, vorrangig ging es darum, möglichst schnell ein Urteil zu fällen. Gemessen an den begangenen Straftaten waren die verkündeten Urteile nicht selten von drakonischer Härte, auch deswegen, weil die Militärgerichtsprozesse als abschreckendes Exempel wirken sollten. Nicht zuletzt deshalb wurden auch zahlreiche Todesurteile verkündet, von denen auch 13 vollstreckt wurden. Die im Eilverfahren abgewickelten Militärgerichtsprozesse halfen jedenfalls sicherzustellen, daß die auf Regierungsseite während des Putsches zu Tage getretenen Mängel, Pannen und Ungereimtheiten unter den Tisch gekehrt werden konnten und niemals einer breiteren Öffentlichkeit bekannt wurden.

Aufgrund von Verdachtsmomenten wurden ferner gegen zahlreiche weitere Personen Untersuchungen eingeleitet. Vor allem jene des öffentlichen Dienstes, aus dessen Reihen nicht wenige Putschisten gekommen waren, waren davon betroffen. Zahlreichen öffentlich Angestellten, darunter vielen Lehrern, wurden die Dienstbezüge gesperrt, nicht wenige wurden auch entlassen. Grundsätzlich konnte auch das Vermögen aller gerichtlich verurteilten, ins Ausland geflüchteten und angehaltenen Aufständischen beschlagnahmt werden, Berufungsmöglichkeit gab es dagegen keine. Zusätzlich verschärfend wirkte, daß sogar die finanziellen Mittel der Familienangehörigen von Putschisten auf das Lebensnotwendigste beschränkt werden konnten. Durch solche « Sühnemaßnahmen » trachtete die Regierung zumindest einen Teil der im Zusammenhang mit der Niederschlagung des Putsches stehenden Kosten einzubringen. Diesem Zweck dienten auch die so genannten « Schadenersatzvorschreibungen » an begüterte Nationalsozialisten, NS-Sympathisanten und nationalsozialistisch eingeschätzte Betriebe. Die Summen dieser von den Sicherheitsdirektoren vorgeschriebenen « Ersatzleistungen » richteten sich nach dem Vermögen der betreffenden Person oder des Betriebsinhabers und konnten beträchtliche Höhen erreichen.

Zur Zahl der Todesopfer gibt es unterschiedliche Angaben. Gerhard Jagschitz übernahm in seiner Studie die vom Militärhistoriker Erwin Steinböck 1965 vorgelegten Zahlen, auf die sich auch Wolfgang Etschmann stützt : durch den Juliputsch und seine unmittelbaren Folgen seien insgesamt 270 Menschen gestorben. Auf NS-Seite starben demnach 153 (einschließlich 13 Hingerichteter und 7 Personen, die Selbstmord verübten oder Fememorden zum Opfer fielen) , auf Regierungsseite 117 Menschen, darunter 13 Zivilisten. Demgegenüber kommt Kurt Bauer auf Basis umfangreicher Quellenstudien zum Schluß, daß es insgesamt « nur » 223 Tote gegeben habe : 111 auf NS-Seite (inklusive der 13 Hingerichteten) , 101 auf Regierungsseite, und dazu noch 11 Zivilisten. Die Zahl der Verletzten wird mit 500 bis 600 Personen angegeben.

Neuer Bundeskanzler wurde Kurt Schuschnigg, neuer Vorsitzender der Vaterländischen Front und Vizekanzler wurde Ernst Rüdiger Starhemberg.

Nahezu unmittelbar nach seinem Ende setzte seitens der österreichischen Regierung und dem sie unterstützenden « vaterländisch » eingestellten Teil der Bevölkerung ein Prozess der mythischen Überhöhung der Ereignisse des Juliputsches ein. Im Mittelpunkt stand dabei der ermordete Bundeskanzler Engelbert Dollfuß, dessen Tod als ein « Opfertod für Österreich » interpretiert wurde. Dollfuß wurde zum « Heldenkanzler » , zum « Märtyrer für Österreich » , zu einem von Gott gesandten « Retter Österreichs » verklärt und erhielt sukzessive quasi überirdische Attribute, ähnlich wie sie im Allgemeinen einem Heiligen zugeschrieben werden. Sichtbarer Ausdruck dieses grotesken und religiös verbrämten Dollfußkults waren die in der Folgezeit in vielen Städten, Märkten und Dörfern entstehenden Dollfußstraßen, -plätze, -kirchen, -kapellen, -kreuze und -büsten. Am Grazer Opernring beispielsweise wurde im Juli 1937 ein vom Bildhauer Gustinus Ambrosi geschaffenes Dollfuß-Denkmal eingeweiht, das aus einem nahezu mannsgroßen Kopf des Kanzlers bestand, der auf einem mehrere Meter hohen Sockel angebracht war. Dabei verband sich mit der Errichtung solcher Denkmäler nicht nur das Bestreben, den ermordeten Bundeskanzler zu glorifizieren, sondern auch die Absicht, solcherart « Orientierungspunkte für österreichisches Geschichts- und Selbstbewusstsein im öffentlichen Raum zu lancieren, die sich zugleich als Leitbilder der ständestaatlichen Ideologie eigneten » .

Im Wesentlichen dabeilbe Muster findet sich auch beim nationalsozialistischen Putschmythos. Dieser entstand ebenfalls schon bald nach dem Juliputsch, konnte sich in Österreich aber erst nach dem « Anschluß » voll entfalten. Im Mittelpunkt standen dabei die bei den Kämpfen getöteten, vor allem aber nach der Niederschlagung des Putsches hingerichteten Nationalsozialisten. Unter dem Motto « Und ihr habt doch gesiegt ! » wurde ihr Tod zu einem heroischen « Opfergang aufrechter Deutscher » stilisiert, die nichts anderes getan hätten, als sich gegen ein Unrechtsregime zu wehren, womit der gescheiterte Putsch im Nachhinein zu einem sinnvollen Unternehmen umfunktioniert wurde, das mitgeholfen habe, den Sieg des Nationalsozialismus in Österreich herbeizuführen. Dementsprechend wurden bereits unmittelbar nach dem « Anschluß » so gut wie alle « Dollfuß-Weihestätten » abgetragen oder vernichtet und zahlreiche Straßen und Plätze wieder umbenannt, diesmal nach den getöteten und hingerichteten Nationalsozialisten. Nicht nur in den Orten, in denen es 1934 zu Kampfhandlungen gekommen war, wurden unzählige Feiern abgehalten und auf diese Weise der « Helden » des 25. Juli gedacht. Die lebenden Juliputschisten hingegen wurden nach der kurzen Zeit, in der sie im Mittelpunkt des öffentlichen Interesses stehen durften, zumeist stillschweigend abgeschoben, da mittlerweile andere ihren Platz eingenommen hatten und man keine Verwendung mehr für sie hatte.

Zur selben Zeit nahm abseits der Öffentlichkeit auch eine vom Reichsführer SS eingerichtete « Kommission zur geschichtlichen Feststellung über die Erhebung vom 25. Juli 1934 in Österreich » ihre Tätigkeit auf. Diese « Historische Kommission » sollte « die Ereignisse bei der Erhebung klären, die Schuldigen sowohl auf nationalsozialistischer wie auf gegnerischer Seite fest stellen » sowie die Verantwortlichen für die gegen die SS-Putschisten verhängten schweren Strafen ermitteln. Eine Folge der Tätigkeit dieser Kommission war, daß innerhalb der NSDAP schon bald wieder alte Konflikte aufbrachen, die 1934 nur mühsam unterdrückt worden waren. Nachdem sogar der « Führer » selbst wegen seiner damals eingenommenen zwiespältigen Haltung zum Juliputsch belastet zu werden drohte, ordnete er persönlich im Mai 1938 an, daß die Untersuchungen einzustellen und alle Beteiligten zu Stillschweigen und strikter Geheimhaltung verpflichtet seien. Die Kommission arbeitete aber dennoch im Geheimen weiter und schloß ihre Tätigkeit erst im März 1939 mit einem ausführlichen Bericht ab. Zur Erhellung der Hintergründe des Juliputsches konnte aber auch dieser Bericht nichts Wesentliches beitragen.

2 (ou 4) septembre 1934 : Création à Aix-la-Chapelle (« Aachen ») de la version de Linz de la 1re Symphonie (édition de Robert Haas) sous la direction du chef Peter Raabe qui sera l'auteur d'une biographie sur Bruckner : « Wege zu Bruckner » (Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg, 1942, 1944, 211 pages) .

Peter Raabe

Le compositeur, chef d'orchestre et pédagogue allemand Peter Raabe est né le 27 novembre 1872 à Francfort-sur-l'Oder. Il aura une carrière acceptable comme chef, sans être des plus spectaculaires. Il sera diplômé de l'École de musique supérieur à Berlin et des Universités de Munich et d'Iéna. Sa thèse de doctorat portera sur le compositeur Franz Liszt. De 1894 à 1898, Raabe s'associe aux Opéras de Königsberg, d'Elberfeld et de Zwickau. De 1899 à 1903, il se retrouve à la tête de l'Opéra de Hollande à Amsterdam. De 1903 à 1907, il dirige les orchestres de Kaim et de Mannheim. De 1907 à 1920, il devient le 1er directeur de l'Orchestre de la Cour à Weimar. Il donne également des concerts au Royaume-Uni, en Belgique et au Pays-Bas. À partir de 1910, il est nommé conservateur du « Musée Franz Liszt » (il va d'ailleurs rédiger 2 livres sur lui) . Présidant le comité de rédaction, c'est sous le règne de cet érudit que la 1re édition complète des œuvres de Liszt sera publiée. (Quant à lui, Raabe sera l'auteur de lieder et de pièces pour piano.) Raabe va défendre son jeune protégé de talent, Paul Kletzki, jusqu'à l'arrivée des Nazis au pouvoir en 1933. De 1920 à 1934, il va occuper le poste de directeur musical à Aix-la-Chapelle, en plus d'enseigner à l'Université technique. Devenu professeur émérite, il décide de prendre sa retraite lorsqu'il voit sa carrière être éclipsée par la montée fulgurante du jeune Herbert von Karajan alors en poste depuis seulement quelques mois à la tête de l'Opéra municipal. Le 19 juillet 1935, Peter Raabe reçoit un appel du docteur Josef Gœbbels qui lui offre sur un plateau d'argent la chaise de « Generalmusikdirektor » du « Reichsmusikkammer » (l'Institut de la Musique du « Reich ») suite au congédiement du compositeur Richard Strauß. Bien que Raabe n'adhérera au NSDAP que le 21 mai 1937 (il devient alors officiellement le n° 3.934.040), il était déjà un fanatique d'Adolf Hitler et de sa politique culturelle. Contrairement à Strauß, Raabe sera influencé par son idole Franz Liszt dont les innovations harmoniques anticipent l'atonalité d'un Arnold Schönberg. Attiré par les compositeurs modernes, Raabe verra sa « faiblesse » exploitée efficacement par Gœbbels. Durant presque une décennie, il deviendra la marionnette « par excellence » du puissant Ministre de la Culture et de la Propagande.

Mais Peter Raabe ne sera pas la seule devanture dans l'organigramme complexe de la culture musicale du « Reich ». En 1936, Josef Gœbbels va nommer Heinz Drewes, le directeur général de la musique d'Altenburg, à la tête d'un département de musique rattaché au Ministère de la Propagande ; ce qui entraînera de la confusion et le chevauchement des prises de décision. Raabe va tenter de démissionner en 1938 mais cela lui sera refusé. Il devra donc se résigner à être au service du « Reich » jusqu'à sa chute en 1945. Peter Raabe va mourir le 12 avril 1945 à Weimar.

La Chambre de la culture du « Reich » (« Reichskulturkammer ») fut créée le 15 novembre 1933 dans le but de promouvoir l'art « aryen » selon les idéaux du Parti National-Socialiste. Elle était placée sous la tutelle de Josef Gœbbels et de son ministère du « Reich » à l'Éducation du peuple et à la Propagande.

Il existait également un Sénat de la culture du « Reich » (« Reichskultursenat »), présenté par Gœbbels comme un « forum représentatif » de la culture allemande.

La Chambre de la culture du « Reich » était subdivisée selon 7 spécialités :

Et, enfin, le « Reichsmusikkammer » ou « RMK » :

La Chambre de la musique du « Reich » devait essentiellement faire la promotion des œuvres de Beethoven, Wagner, Bach, Mozart, Haydn et Brahms. Josef Gœbbels et d'autres hauts gradés nazis avaient le plein contrôle du « RMK » ; des présidents et vice-présidents de prestige seront nommés pour de simples raisons de relations publiques.

Dû à sa renommée internationale, le compositeur Richard Strauß, bien que critique du régime en privé, sera nommé, en novembre 1933, le 1er président du « Reichsmusikkammer » . Les motivations de Strauß visaient, en grande partie, la protection de sa belle-fille et de ses petits-enfants ; tous d'origine juive. Il voulait en plus préserver et diriger la musique des « compositeurs interdits » comme Gustav Mahler, Claude Debussy et Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. Strauß sera démis de ses fonctions, en juin 1935, par un Josef Gœbbels en furie lorsqu'une lettre fort critique envers le profilage racial, adressée à son librettiste juif Stefan Zweig, sera intercepté par la « Gestapo » . La presse justifiera le départ de Strauß par des raisons de « vieillesse » et « de santé défaillante » .

The German composer, conductor and Liszt scholar Peter Raabe was born on 27 November 1872 in Frankfurt an der Oder and died on 12 April 1945 in Weimar. He graduated from the Higher Musical School, in Berlin, and the Universities of Munich and Jena. From 1894 to 1898, Raabe conducted Opera Houses in Königsberg, Elberfeld and Zwickau. From 1899 to 1903, he was associated with the Dutch Opera House of Amsterdam. From 1903 to 1907, he conducted Orchestras in Kaim and Mannheim. From 1907 to 1920, Raabe became the 1st Court Conductor in Weimar. During this period, he also gave concerts in the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands. From 1910, he became the curator of the Liszt Museum. He wrote 2 volumes on the composer. As Chairman of the editorial board, Raabe will provide the 1st Franz Liszt « complete edition » . From 1920 to 1934, he became musical director in Aachen. Paul Kletzki was singled-out as a young compositional talent by Raabe until the Nazis came to power. (As for himself, Peter Raabe composed songs and piano pieces.) On 19 July 1935, Peter Raabe superseded to the resigning President Richard Strauß of the office of the « Reichsmusikkammer » : the Nazi State Music Institute. For almost 10 years, Raabe will be directing the music activity of the 3rd « Reich » . Due to the Bruckner connection, Richard Wetz's music was much in favor during the 3rd « Reich » , so much so that Peter Raabe caused a Richard Wetz Society to be founded in 1943, in the composer's home-town of Gleiwitz.

In March 1933, when Richard Strauß was 68, Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party rose to power. Strauß never joined the Nazi Party, and studiously avoided Nazi forms of greeting. For reasons of expediency, however, he was initially drawn into cooperating with the early Nazi regime in the hope that Adolf Hitler (an ardent Wagnerian and music lover who had admired Strauß's work since viewing « Salome » , in 1907) would promote German art and culture. Strauß's need to protect his Jewish daughter-in-law and Jewish grandchildren also motivated his behavior, in addition to his determination to preserve and conduct the music of banned composers such as Gustav Mahler and Claude Debussy.

In 1933, Strauß wrote in his private notebook :

« I consider the Streicher-Gœbbels Jew-baiting as a disgrace to German honour, as evidence of incompetence - the basest weapon of untalented, lazy mediocrity against a higher intelligence and greater talent. »

Meanwhile, far from being an admirer of Strauß's work, Josef Gœbbels maintained expedient cordiality with Strauß only for a period. Gœbbels wrote in his diary :

« Unfortunately, we still need him but, one day, we shall have our own music and then we shall have no further need of this decadent neurotic. »

Nevertheless, because of Strauß's international eminence, in November 1933, he was appointed to the post of president of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , the State Music Bureau. Strauß, who had lived through numerous political regimes and had no interest in politics, decided to accept the position but to remain apolitical, a decision which would eventually become untenable. He wrote to his family

« I made music under the " Kaiser ", and under (Friedrich) Ebert. I'll survive under this one as well. »

In 1935, he wrote in his journal :

« In November of 1933, the minister Gœbbels nominated me president of the " Reichsmusikkammer " without obtaining my prior agreement. I was not consulted. I accepted this honorary office because I hoped that I would be able to do some good and prevent worse misfortunes, if from now onwards German musical life were going to be, as it was said, " reorganized " by amateurs and ignorant place-seekers. »

Strauß privately scorned Gœbbels and called him « a pipsqueak » . However, in 1933, Strauß dedicated an orchestral song, « Das Bächlein » (The Little Brook) to Gœbbels, in order to gain his cooperation in extending German music copyright laws from 30 years to 50 years.

Strauß attempted to ignore Nazi bans on performances of works by Debussy, Mahler, and Mendelssohn. He also continued to work on a Comic Opera, « Die schweigsame Frau » , with his Jewish friend and librettist Stefan Zweig. When the Opera was premiered in Dresden, in 1935, Strauß insisted that Zweig's name appear on the theatrical billing, much to the ire of the Nazi regime. Hitler and Gœbbels avoided attending the Opera, and it was halted after 3 performances and subsequently banned by the 3rd « Reich » .

On 17 June 1935, Strauß wrote a letter to Stefan Zweig, in which he stated :

« Do you believe I am ever, in any of my actions, guided by the thought that I am " German " ? Do you suppose Mozart was consciously " Aryan " when he composed ? I recognise only 2 types of people : those who have talent and those who have none. »

This letter to Zweig was intercepted by the « Gestapo » and sent to Hitler. Strauß was subsequently dismissed from his post as « Reichsmusikkammer » president, in 1935. The 1936 Berlin Summer Olympics nevertheless used Strauß's « Olympische Hymne », which he had composed in 1934. Strauß's seeming relationship with the Nazis in the 1930's attracted criticism from some noted musicians, including Arturo Toscanini, who, in 1933, had said when Strauß had accepted the presidency of the « Reichsmusikkammer » :

« To Strauß the composer, I take-off my hat ; to Strauß the man, I put it back on again. »

Much of Strauß's motivation in his conduct during the 3rd « Reich » was, however, to protect his Jewish daughter-in-law Alice and his Jewish grandchildren from persecution. Both of his grandsons were bullied at school, but Strauß used his considerable influence to prevent the boys or their mother being sent to concentration camps.

Le chef d'orchestre Wilhelm Fürtwängler, nommé vice-président du « RMK » en 1933, va refuser de se conformer à l'interdiction de jouer la Symphonie « Mathis le peintre » de Paul Hindemith. Il remettra à son tour sa démission, en 1934, condamnant l'institutionnalisation de l'antisémitisme. Paul Graener prendra la relève mais il va démissionner 7 ans plus tard (soit en 1941) .

28 septembre 1934 : Concert à Stettin. Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Au même programme, de Beethoven : l'Ouverture « Egmont » et la Symphonie n° 1.

30 septembre et 1 octobre 1934 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec la Philharmonie, à Berlin. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Obéron » de Weber ; la soprano Elisabeth Rethberg chante un air tiré de « Obéron », l'air « il re pastore » de Mozart et la cantate « non sa che sia dolore » de Bach (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

Dans son livre, « the Baton and the Jackboot », la secrétaire de Fürtwängler, Bertha Geißmar, écrit :

applaudissements sans fin retentirent. Göring savait ce que cela signifiait et informa Hitler de cet incident. »

Cette information est également reprise par Hans-Hubert Schönzeler et Berndt Wilhelm Wessling. Mais il semble que Bertha Geißmar se trompe ! En effet, selon les archives du « Staatsoper », il n'y eut pas de « Tristan », le 25 novembre, mais une représentation de la « Tosca », avec Jan Kiepura sous la direction de Robert Heger. Il y a peut-être une confusion avec le « Tristan », donné quelques jours plus tard, le 2 décembre.

Le même fait est cité dans le livre de Heinz Tiessen, « Eduard Erdmann in seiner Zeit » :

11-14 octobre 1934 : Le chef Otto Klemperer dirige à « Carnegie Hall » la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version originale de 1894, éditée par Alfred Orel en 1932, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York. Le concert est radiodiffusé (étiquette : « The New York Philharmonic Historic Broadcasts, 1923-1987 », CD 1) .

Anyone with interest in the music of Anton Bruckner will want to hear the Klemperer performance. Is this a great Bruckner performance ? Probably not for everyone but, for me, it was very moving.

8 novembre 1934 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 4e concert de la saison.

4 décembre 1934 : Face à « l'Affaire Hindemith », Wilhelm Furtwängler démissionne de toutes ses fonctions et se retire dans les Alpes bavaroises pour commencer l'écriture de son Concerto pour piano. La nouvelle n'est rendue publique que le 10. Le chef Erich Kleiber, en signe de solidarité, avait immédiatement annulé le concert qu'il devait donner avec la Philharmonie, le 5 décembre.

12 décembre 1934 : Le chef Bruno Kittel dirige le « Te Deum » de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, accompagné de son propre ensemble : le « Bruno Kittel'scher Chor ». Les solistes : Else Schœn, Maria Peschken, Walther Ludwig, Fred Drissen, Siegfried Borries. À l'orgue : Friedrich Kausch.

5, 7 janvier 1935 : Le chef Eugene Ormandy dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885), avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Minneapolis (étiquette « Victor » américain) .

Eugene Ormandy

Le chef d'orchestre et violoniste américain d'origine hongroise Eugene Ormandy est né le 18 novembre 1899 à Budapest et est décédé le 12 mars 1985 à Philadelphie des suites d'une pneumonie.

Né et d'origine juive, son véritable nom est Jenő Blau (en hongrois : Blau-Ormány Jenő) . Son père, un dentiste, est violoniste amateur et a prénommé son fils Jenő en hommage au célèbre violoniste hongrois Jenő Hubay, formé lui-même par Josef Joachim et Henri Vieuxtemps. Enfant prodige, il commence à jouer du violon à l'âge de 3 ans et étudie le violon avec son père. Il entre à l'Académie royale de musique de Budapest à l'âge de 5 ans, et commence à étudier à 9 ans avec Jenő Hubay. Parmi ses autres professeurs, on compte Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály et Leo Weiner. Il reçoit un diplôme de violon en 1914 et un certificat d'enseignant de l'Académie royale en 1917. En 1917, il fait une tournée en Hongrie et en Allemagne en tant que soliste avec le « Blüthner Orchester » de Berlin puis retourne à Budapest.

En 1920 et 1921, il entreprend une tournée en tant que violoniste en Autriche et en France, au cours de laquelle il semble utiliser pour la 1^{re} fois le surnom « Ormandy » . Ormandy sera toujours réticent à expliquer l'origine de ce surnom, qui est demeurée obscure. Pour certains, il s'agirait d'un 2^e nom de la famille paternelle ou maternelle. Selon le site de la bibliothèque de l'Université de Pennsylvanie consacrée à Ormandy, ce surnom pourrait être lié à l'existence d'une ville située à l'ouest de la Hongrie, ville appelée « Ormány » et d'où serait originaire une partie de la famille d'Ormandy. En hongrois, l'ajout de la lettre « y » à la fin du nom de la ville signifie « originaire d'Ormány » . Quant au prénom « Eugene » (qu'il adoptera une fois installé aux États-Unis) , il est l'équivalent anglais du prénom Jenő.

En 1921, il accepte une proposition l'invitant à se rendre aux États-Unis (il adoptera la nationalité américaine en 1926, exactement 5 ans et 90 jours après son arrivée, soit le minimum légal pour devenir citoyen américain) . Il est à peine arrivé que son rêve de grande carrière s'évanouit, la tournée de concerts pour laquelle on l'avait invité n'ayant probablement jamais existé. Il est alors engagé par le chef Ernő Rapée, un ancien ami de Budapest et camarade de promotion à l'Académie de musique, comme violoniste dans l'orchestre du « Capitol Theatre » à New York, un ensemble de 77 musiciens qui accompagne les films muets. Il en devient le violon solo 5 jours après avoir été recruté et y restera 2 ans et demi. Il fait ses débuts de chef à la tête de cet Orchestre en septembre 1924 et, en 1926, il est nommé directeur musical associé. Entre 1923 et 1929, Ormandy réalise en tant que violoniste 16 enregistrements, la moitié d'entre eux utilisant le procédé acoustique.

En 1929, il dirige l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York au « Lewisohn Stadium » . En 1930, il est invité à diriger le « Robin Hood Dell Orchestra » , à Philadelphie. Le 30 octobre 1931, il remplace Arturo Toscanini tombé malade pour diriger un concert à la tête de l'Orchestre de Philadelphie, grâce à l'appui d'Arthur Judson, l'un des plus puissants impresarii de la scène musicale Classique américaine au cours des années 1930. La même année, il est nommé directeur musical et chef permanent de l'Orchestre symphonique de Minneapolis.

Ormandy est le chef d'orchestre de l'Orchestre symphonique de Minneapolis, maintenant Orchestre du Minnesota, jusqu'en 1936. Pendant les jours sombres de la Grande Dépression, « RCA Victor » prend sous contrat Ormandy et l'Orchestre symphonique de Minneapolis pour de nombreux enregistrements discographiques. Une clause dans le contrat des musiciens leur impose de jouer un minimum d'heures chaque semaine (que ce soit en répétition, lors de concerts, d'émissions radiophoniques ou d'enregistrements) . N'ayant pas à payer les musiciens, « RCA » peut se permettre d'envoyer ses meilleurs techniciens et équipements pour les enregistrements qui ont lieu à Minneapolis, du 16 janvier 1934 au 16 janvier 1935. Parmi ceux-ci, on compte quelques premières discographiques mondiales : « Adventures in a Perambulator » de John Alden Carpenter, la suite « Háy János » de Zoltán Kodály, « la Nuit transfigurée » de Arnold Schoenberg et un enregistrement spécialement commandé de l' « American Overture » de Roy Harris sur le thème populaire « When Johnny Comes Marching Home » . L'excellence de ces enregistrements contribue à doter Ormandy d'une exceptionnelle réputation de musicien et ses lectures de la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner et la 2e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler deviennent vite très célèbres.

C'est au cours de cette période qu'Ormandy rencontre pour la 1re fois le pianiste et compositeur Serge Rachmaninov, à l'occasion d'un concert où ce dernier joue en soliste avec l'Orchestre Symphonique de Minneapolis. Durant le concert, Rachmaninov a un trou de mémoire qu'Ormandy parvient à si bien masquer que le public ne s'en aperçoit pas. Reconnaisant, Rachmaninov ne tarit pas d'éloges sur le chef et contribue à établir sa réputation aux États-Unis.

Mais ce sont ses 44 années passées à l'Orchestre de Philadelphie qui font toute la renommée d'Ormandy. Nommé chef associé de cet Orchestre à partir de 1936 (avec Leopold Stokowski) , il en devient, le 28 septembre 1938, l'unique directeur et chef principal jusqu'à son départ en 1980 (Stokowski continue à diriger ponctuellement l'Orchestre de Philadelphie jusqu'en 1941, notamment pour enregistrer la bande originale du film « Fantasia » de Walt Disney, puis reviendra en tant que chef-invité à partir de 1960) .

Ormandy dirige entre 100 et 180 concerts chaque année à Philadelphie et entraîne l'Orchestre dans des tournées américaines en 1937, 1946, 1948, 1957, 1962, 1964, 1971, 1974 et 1977. En 1949, il fait une longue tournée en Angleterre ; au printemps 1955, dans 10 pays européens (notamment en Finlande où Ormandy et des membres de l'Orchestre rendent visite au compositeur Jean Sibelius, alors âgé de 89 ans ; au cours de l'été 1958, une autre tournée européenne (notamment en Russie) ; ainsi qu'en Australie (été 1944) ; en Amérique du Sud (été 1946) ; en Amérique latine (1966) ; en Extrême-Orient (1967, 1978) et au Japon (1972) . En 1973, il effectue avec l'Orchestre de Philadelphie une tournée en Chine où il donne des concerts dans plusieurs villes : c'est la 1re fois qu'un Orchestre symphonique américain se produit en République populaire de Chine.

Après 42 saisons comme directeur musical de l'Orchestre de Philadelphie, il se retire à la fin de la saison 1979-1980 et est nommé chef d'orchestre lauréat. Il continue ponctuellement à diriger d'autres Orchestres et à effectuer quelques enregistrements. Il donne son dernier concert le 10 janvier 1984 au « Carnegie Hall » de New York, à la tête de l'Orchestre de Philadelphie.

Ses papiers, y compris ses partitions annotées et des arrangements musicaux, remplissent 501 boîtes dans les archives de la Bibliothèque de l'Université de Pennsylvanie. Son épouse Margaret est décédée en 1998.

The Hungarian-born conductor and violinist Eugene Ormandy was born on November 18, 1899, in Budapest, Austria-

Hungary, and died on March 12, 1985, in Philadelphia. He became internationally famous as the music-director and conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra. The Maestro's 44 year long association with the Philadelphia is one of the longest enjoyed by any conductor with a single Orchestra. Under his baton, the Philadelphia had 3 gold records and won 2 Grammy Awards.

Ormandy was born Jenő Ormándy-Blau, the son of Jewish parents Rosalie and Benjamin Blau, a dentist who was also an amateur violinist. Ormandy began studying violin at the Royal National Hungarian Academy of Music (now, the Franz Liszt Academy of Music) at the age of 5. He gave his 1st concerts as a violinist at age 7 and, studying with Jenő Hubay, graduated at 14 with a Master's degree. In 1920, he obtained a University degree in Philosophy. In 1921, he moved to the United States of America. Around this time, Blau changed his name to « Eugene Ormandy », « Eugene » being the equivalent of the Hungarian « Jenő ». Accounts differ on the origin of « Ormandy » ; it may have either been Blau's own middle name at birth, or his mother's. He was 1st engaged by conductor Ernő Rapée, a former Budapest friend and fellow Academy graduate, as a violinist in the Orchestra of the Capitol Theatre in New York City, a 77 player ensemble which accompanied silent movies. He became the concert Master within 5 days of joining and soon became one of the conductors of this group. Ormandy also made 16 recordings as a violinist between 1923 and 1929, half of them using the acoustic process.

Arthur Judson, the most powerful manager of American Classical music during the 1930's, greatly assisted Ormandy's career. When Arturo Toscanini was too ill to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra, in 1931, Judson asked Ormandy to stand in. This led to Ormandy's 1st major appointment as a conductor, in Minneapolis.

Ormandy served until 1936 as conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, now the Minnesota Orchestra. During the depths of the Great Depression, « RCA Victor » contracted Ormandy and the Minneapolis Symphony for many recordings. A clause in the musicians' contract required them to earn their salaries by performing a certain number of hours each week (whether it be rehearsals, concerts, broadcasts, or recording) . Since « Victor » did not need to pay the musicians, it could afford to send its best technicians and equipment to record in Minneapolis. Recordings were made between January 16, 1934, and January 16, 1935. There were several premiere recordings made in Minneapolis : John Alden Carpenter's « Adventures in a Perambulator » ; Zoltán Kodály's « Háry János » Suite ; Arnold Schönberg's « Verklärte Nacht » and a specially commissioned recording of Roy Harris's « American Overture » based on « When Johnny Comes Marching Home » . Ormandy's recordings also included readings of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 2, which became extremely well-known.

Ormandy's 44 year tenure with the Philadelphia Orchestra began in 1936 and became the source of much of his lasting reputation and fame. 2 years after his appointment as associate conductor under Leopold Stokowski, he became its music-director. (Stokowski continued to conduct some concerts in Philadelphia until 1941 ; he returned as a guest-conductor in 1960.) As music-director, Ormandy conducted from 100 to 180 concerts each year in Philadelphia. Upon his retirement in 1980, he was made conductor laureate.

Ormandy was a quick learner of scores, often conducting from memory and without a baton. He demonstrated exceptional musical and personal integrity, exceptional leadership skills, and a formal and reserved podium manner in the style of his idol and friend, Arturo Toscanini. One Orchestra musician complimented him by saying :

« He doesn't try to conduct every note as some conductors do. »

Under Ormandy's direction, the Philadelphia Orchestra continued the lush, legato style originated by Stokowski and for which the Orchestra was well-known. Ormandy's conducting style was praised for its opulent sound, but also was criticized for supposedly lacking any real individual touch. In the book « Dinner with Lenny », containing one of the last interviews of Leonard Bernstein, Ormandy is criticized by Bernstein for applying the same lush sound to every piece that he conducted, even if the composer of the piece in question did not call for it, a criticism that Bernstein voiced indirectly in « The Sound of an Orchestra », one of the « Young People's Concerts » .

Ormandy was particularly noted for conducting Late-Romantic and early 20th Century music. He particularly favored Bruckner, Debussy, Dvořák, Ravel, Richard Strauß, Tchaïkovsky, Sibelius, and transcriptions of Bach. His performances of Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, and Mozart were considered less successful by some critics, especially when he applied the lush, so-called « Philadelphia Sound » to them. On the other hand, Donald Peck, principal flute of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, reports that a fellow flutist was won over when Ormandy conducted the Chicago in Beethoven's 9th Symphony ; he told Peck that it was the greatest 9th he had ever heard. He was particularly noted as a champion of Sergei Rachmaninoff's music, conducting the premiere of his « Symphonic Dances » and leading the Orchestra in the composer's own recordings of 3 of his Piano Concertos in 1939-1940. He also directed the American premiere of several Symphonies by Dmitri Shostakovich. He made the 1st recording of Deryck Cooke's 1st performing edition of the complete Mahler 10th Symphony, which many critics praised. His recording of Camille Saint-Saëns' 3rd Symphony received stellar reviews and is held in high-regard. He also performed a great deal of American music and gave many premieres of works by Samuel Barber, Paul Creston, David Diamond, Howard Hanson, Walter Piston, Ned Rorem, William Schuman, Roger Sessions, Virgil Thomson, and Richard Yardumian.

The conductor Kenneth Woods ranked Ormandy 14th of the « Real Top 20 of Conducting » , saying :

« Critics hate Ormandy. It must be the 1st " fact " they teach at critic school - always work in an Ormandy slam into every article you write. Record collectors hate him, too. I just don't get it. The film of him looks pretty impressive - Classical and classy conducting technique, not at all showy. His Philadelphia Orchestra was the only real rival to Karajan's Berlin for sonic beauty between the 1950's and 1970's, but was also a tighter and more versatile band.

In 1947, Ormandy appeared in the feature film « Night Song » in which he conducted Leith Stevens' Piano Concerto, with Arthur Rubinstein as soloist.

Ormandy visited Finland several times.

The Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy's direction frequently performed outside of Philadelphia, in New York and other American cities, and undertook a number of foreign tours. During a 1955 tour of Finland, Ormandy and many of the Orchestra's members visited the elderly composer Jean Sibelius at his country estate ; Ormandy was photographed with Sibelius and the picture later appeared on the cover of his 1962 stereo recording of the composer's 1st Symphony. During a 1973 tour of the People's Republic of China, the Orchestra performed to enthusiastic audiences that had been isolated from Western Classical music for many decades.

Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra, as well as smaller ensembles composed of its members, often collaborated with Richard P. Condie (and later Jerold Ottley) and the Mormon Tabernacle Choir to produce many recordings still considered definitive today, most notably the Grammy-winning recording of the Peter Wilhousky arrangement of the « Battle Hymn of the Republic » .

After Ormandy officially retired as music-director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in 1980, he served as a guest-conductor of other Orchestras and made a few recordings.

His papers, including his marked scores and complete arrangements, fill 501 boxes in the archives of the University of Pennsylvania Library.

Eugene Ormandy's many recordings spanned the acoustic to the electrical to the digital age. From 1936 until his death, Ormandy made hundreds of recordings with the Philadelphia Orchestra, spanning almost every Classical music genre. Writing in « Audoin » (1999) , Richard Freed reported :

« Ormandy came about as close as any conductor anywhere to recording the " Complete Works of Everybody ", with more than a few works recorded 3 and 4 times to keep-up with advances in technology and /or to accommodate a new soloist or to commemorate a move to a new label. »

Thomas Frost, the producer of many of Ormandy's Columbia recordings, called Ormandy :

« The easiest conductor I've ever worked with. He has less of an ego problem than any of them. Everything was controlled, professional, organized. We recorded more music per hour than any other Orchestra ever has. »

In 1 day, March 11, 1962, Ormandy and the Philadelphia recorded Sibelius's Symphony No. 1 ; the Semyon Bogatyryov arrangement of Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 7 (for which Ormandy had given the Western hemisphere premiere performance) ; and Frederick Delius' « On Hearing the 1st Cuckoo in Spring » .

The Orchestra's performing venue at the Academy of Music (Philadelphia) was seldom employed for recording, because record producers believed that its dry acoustics were less than ideal. Moreover, Ormandy felt that the remodeling of the Academy of Music in the mid- 1950's had ruined its acoustics. The Philadelphia Orchestra instead recorded in the ballroom of Philadelphia's Broadwood Hotel / Philadelphia Hotel, the Philadelphia Athletic Club at Broad and Race Streets, and in Town Hall / Scottish Rite Cathedral on North Broad Street near the Franklin Parkway. The latter venue featured a 1692 seat auditorium with bright resonant acoustics that made for impressive-sounding « High-Fidelity » recordings. A 4th venue was the « Old Met » (Metropolitan Opera House) used for later « EMI » recording sessions.

Recordings were produced for the following record labels : « RCA Victor Red Seal » (1936 to 1942 ; 1968 to 1980) , « Columbia Masterworks Records » (1944 to 1968) , and « EMI / Angel Records » (1977-on) . 3 late albums were also recorded for « Telarc » (1980) and « Delos » (1981) . His 1st digital recording was an April 16, 1979 ; a performance of Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra for « RCA » .

He recorded for also for « RCA Victor » in Minneapolis (in 1934 and 1935) and continued with the label until 1942, when an American Federation of Musicians ban on recordings caused the Philadelphia Orchestra to switch to « Columbia » , which had reached an agreement with the union in 1944, before « RCA » did so. Among his 1st recordings for « Columbia » was a spirited performance of Borodin's « Polovtsian Dances » . Ormandy conducted his 1st stereophonic recordings in 1957 ; these were not the Orchestra's 1st stereo recordings because Leopold Stokowski had conducted experimental sessions in the early 1930's and multi-track recordings for the soundtrack of Walt Disney's 1940 feature film « Fantasia » . In 1968, Ormandy and the Philadelphia Orchestra returned to « RCA » ; among their 1st projects was a new performance of Tchaïkovsky's 6th symphony, the « Pathétique » .

His recordings of Camille Saint-Saëns' Symphony No. 3 with Organ were considered the best ever produced by « Fanfare Magazine » which remarked of the recording with renowned organist Virgil Fox :

« This beautifully played performance out-classes all versions of this Symphony. »

The « Telarc » recording of the Symphony with Michaël Murray (organist) is also highly-praised.

World premiere recordings made by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy's baton included :

Gustav Mahler, Symphony No. 10. « Columbia » , November 1965. 1st commercial recording of all 5 movements, using Deryck Cooke's performing version.

Sergei Prokofiev, « Alexander Nevsky » , Jennie Tourel (mezzo-soprano) , Westminster Choir. « RCA Victor » , May 1945 ; Prokofiev, Symphony No. 6. « Columbia » , January 1950.

Prokofiev, Symphony No. 7. « Columbia » , April 1953.

Dmitri Shostakovich, Cello Concerto No. 1, Mstislav Rostropovich (cello) . « Columbia » , November 1959.

Ormandy also conducted the premiere American recordings of :

Paul Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » Symphony.

Carl Orff's « Catulli Carmina » (which won the Grammy Award for Best Classical Choral Performance in 1968) .

Shostakovich's Symphonies Nos. 4, 13, 14, and 15.

Carl Nielsen's Symphonies I and 6.

Anton Webern's « Im Sommerwind » .

Krzysztof Penderecki's « Utrenja » .

Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 10.

Ormandy also commissioned a version of Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » which he and the Philadelphia Orchestra could call their own, since the Maurice Ravel arrangement was, at that time, still very much the property of Serge Koussevitzky, who had commissioned it, made its 1st recording with the Boston Symphony, and published the score. So, Ormandy asked Lucien Cailliet (1891-1984) , the Philadelphia Orchestra's « house arranger » and a member of its woodwind section, to provide a new orchestration of « Pictures at an Exhibition » and he conducted its premiere on 5 February 1937, recording it for « RCA Victor » , later that same year. (It has been re-issued on CD by Biddulph.) However, Ormandy eventually returned to the Ravel arrangement and recorded it 3 times (1953, 1966 and 1973) .

Other notable recordings :

Among the Ormandy / Philadelphia recordings which are highly-regarded include (year of recording included) :

Franz Konwitschny

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Franz Konwitschny est né le 14 août 1901 à Fulnek, en Moravie du Nord, et est mort le 28 juillet 1962 à Belgrade.

Il étudie le violon à l'école allemande du « Musikverein » de Brünn (Brno) , avant d'entrer au Conservatoire de Leipzig (1923-1925) . Encore étudiant, il est violoniste dans l'illustre Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig et devient aussi altiste du Quatuor Fitzner à Vienne (1925) . Il assumera successivement les responsabilités de « Generalmusikdirektor » à Fribourg-en-Brisgau, à l'Opéra de Francfort puis à l'Opéra de Hanovre (1945) . En 1949, il devient 1er chef d'orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig avec lequel il réalisera quelques enregistrements discographiques. À l'Opéra de Dresde (1953-1955) puis à l'Opéra de Berlin-Est (1955-1962) , il occupera, à nouveau, les plus hautes fonctions. Le fait qu'il ait travaillé sous le régime hitlérien ne semble pas, paradoxalement, avoir affecté la suite de sa carrière dans une Allemagne de l'Est d'obédience communiste.

Franz Konwitschny incarnait un type de direction d'orchestre, désormais (semble-t-il) , disparu et évoluait essentiellement dans le répertoire Classique et Romantique austro-allemand.

The eminent German conductor and violist Franz Konwitschny was born on 14 August 1901 in Fulnek, Moravia (now in the Czech Republic) , and died on 28 July 1962 in Belgrade, Yugoslavia.

He started his career on the viola, playing in the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler. In 1925, he moved to Vienna, where he played the viola with the Fitzner Quartet. He also began teaching at the « Wiener Volkskonservatorium » . He later became a conductor, joining the Stuttgart Opera, in 1927. From 1949 until his death, he was principal conductor of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra. From 1953 until 1955, he was also principal conductor of the « Dresden Staatskapelle » and, from 1955 onward, he led the Berlin State Opera.

Like Wilhelm Furtwängler, Franz Konwitschny used « expansive gestures » and had a « dislike of an exact beat » . Konwitschny recorded a complete cycle of Beethoven Symphonies.

He was given the nickname « Kon-whisky » because of his heavy drinking habits.

His son Peter Konwitschny is a leading Opera director, in Germany.

Richard Wagner : « Tristan und Isolde » , with Ludwig Suthaus, Gottlob Frick, Margarete Bäumer, Karl Wolfram, Erna Westenberger, and the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra on « Walhall » , Eternity Series : WLCD 0118 (21-23 October 1950) .

Richard Wagner : « Tannhäuser » , with Hans Hopf, Gottlob Frick, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Elisabeth Grümmer, and the « Staatskapelle Berlin und Chor der Berliner Staatsoper » . Recorded in October 1960.

Richard Wagner : « Der fliegende Holländer » , with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Marianne Schech, Rudolf Schock, Gottlob Frick, Fritz Wunderlich, and the « Staatskapelle Berlin und Chor der Deutschen Staatsoper » . Berlin, 1960.

For « EMI » , his recordings of « Der fliegende Holländer » and « Tannhäuser » are compelling, despite casting deficiencies in both title roles. The majority of his recordings were made for the East German branch of « Philips » , and the company's successor, « Berlin Classics » , honoured his memory with the release of an 11-CD box set of his performances in 2001.

Franz Konwitschny was born to a family consisting of several members who were professional musicians. He studied violin at the German « Musikverein » School in Brünn (Brno) and at the Leipzig Conservatory (1923-1925) . While a student, he played viola and violin at the Theatre Orchestra and the « Gewandhausorchester Leipzig » under the direction of Wilhelm Furtwängler. In 1925, he moved to Vienna, where he played the viola with the Fitzner Quartet. He also began teaching at the « Wiener Volkskonservatorium » . Within 2 years, he had decided to become a conductor.

Franz Konwitschny became « répétiteur » (assistant conductor) at the Stuttgart Opera, in 1927, rising to Chief Conductor in 1930. After serving as « Generalmusikdirektor » in Freiburg and Breisgau (1933-1938), he assumed that position with the Frankfurt am Main Opera « Museumgesellschaft » Concerts, in 1938, and then with the Hannover Opera, in 1945. From 1949 until his death, he was Principal Conductor of the « Gewandhausorchester Leipzig ». From 1953 until 1955, he was also Principal Conductor of the « Dresden Staatskapelle » and, from 1955 onward, he led the East-Berlin State Opera. His dual positions made him one of the Eastern bloc's most authoritative and celebrated musicians. In the years shortly before his death, Konwitschny appeared abroad in such venues as Salzburg and London and toured elsewhere in Austria, West Germany, Poland, Soviet Russia, and Japan. As an interpreter, he eschewed the precise attacks expected of Western conductors in favour of deeper tone coloring and a spontaneous search for meaning. Like Wilhelm Furtwängler, Konwitschny used « expansive gestures » and had a « dislike of an exact beat » .

Franz Konwitschny was a yeoman conductor. Not a stellar podium personality, but a musician who respected the need for craftsmanship and still managed to probe deeply into the scores that held greatest meaning to him. While the music of his own time appealed to him less than the Masterworks of the Classical and Romantic ages, he still made time for the works of such composers as Paul Dessau and Hanns Eisler. Although he held posts under both the Nazi and Communist regimes, he successfully avoided political encounters. He died while on tour and was given a State funeral by the German Democratic Republic (GDR) . His request for a « Requiem Mass » was honoured, much to the chagrin of the authorities. Konwitschny's early death came as a blow to an art form that needed individuals of such gifts and such devotion to high purpose. His son Peter Konwitschny is a leading Opera director in Germany.

Franz Konwitschny (geboren 14. August 1901 in Fulnek, Nordmähren ; gestorben 28. Juli 1962 in Belgrad) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Konwitschny entstammte einer mährischen Musikerfamilie. Von 1920 bis 1923 nahm er zunächst Geigenunterricht an der Akademie des Musikvereins in Brünn, bevor er von April 1923 bis 1925 Schüler von Hans Bassermann (geboren 1888) am Konservatorium der Musik in Leipzig wurde. Während dieser Zeit war er aushilfsweise als Geiger und Bratscher im Gewandhausorchester beschäftigt. 1925 wurde Konwitschny als Bratscher Mitglied des 1894 gegründeten Fitzner-Quartetts in Wien ; 1927 ging er nach Stuttgart, zunächst als Korrepetitor, ab 1930 als Erster Kapellmeister am Staatstheater. Mit Beginn der Spielzeit 1933-1934 wurde er musikalischer Oberleiter des Philharmonischen Orchesters Freiburg in Freiburg im Breisgau, wo er 1934 zum Generalmusikdirektor ernannt wurde. 1938 übernahm er die Position Musikdirektor und musikalischer Leiter der Oper in Frankfurt am Main.

Konwitschny trat am 1. Juli 1923 in Fulnek, Kreis Mährisch-Ostrau erstmals der NSDAP bei (Mitglieds-Nummer 2.756) . Seine damalige politische Überzeugung kam auch in einer Freiburger Fidelio-Aufführung vom 1934 zum Ausdruck, wo er anlässlich von Hitlers Geburtstag SA-Männer und SA-Fahnen auf die Bühne bringen wollte, was aber von der Intendanz untersagt wurde. Andererseits dirigierte er im November desselben Jahres in einem Abonnementskonzert die Sinfonie Mathis der Maler des verfeimten Komponisten Paul Hindemith. Zum 1. August 1937 trat Konwitschny erneut in die NSDAP ein (Nummer 5 508.995) . Am 16. Oktober 1937 dirigierte Konwitschny bei der Schlusskundgebung der unter dem Motto « Rasse und Kultur » stehenden 2. Badischen Gaukulturwoche vor der Rede Alfred Rosenbergs den Germanenzug von Bruckner. Im Dezember 1942 war Konwitschny Gastdirigent in der Ghetto-Stadt Łódź, wobei nach der Litzmannstädter Zeitung vom 17. Dezember 1942 der « von stärkster Vitalität getragene Musizierstil » faszinierte.

Er wirkte auch an der Staatsoper in Hamburg und war in den Kriegsjahren 1943-1944 Chefdirigent des Orchesters in Ludwigshafen, der heutigen Staatsphilharmonie Rheinland-Pfalz.

Konwitschny setzte seine Karriere nach 1945 unbeschadet fort, 1946 berief ihn die Stadt Hannover als musikalischen Oberleiter von Oper und Konzert (bis 1949). Von 1949 bis 1962 wirkte er als Gewandhauskapellmeister in Leipzig. Gleichzeitig besetzte er von 1953 bis 1955 das Amt des Generalmusikdirektors der Dresdner Staatsoper sowie von 1955 bis 1962 das Amt des Generalmusikdirektors der Deutschen Staatsoper in Berlin. 1951 wurde ihm der Professoren-Titel verliehen. 1951, 1956 und 1960 wurde er mit dem Nationalpreis der DDR ausgezeichnet. Am 14. August 1961 wurde er Ehrenmitglied des Gewandhausorchesters.

Franz Konwitschny verstarb während einer Konzertreise am 28. Juli 1962 in Belgrad. Er wurde in einem Ehrengrab auf dem Leipziger Südfriedhof beigesetzt.

Sein Sohn Peter Konwitschny (geboren 1945) ist ein bekannter Opernregisseur.

Alban Berg composes 3 more major pieces : his « Lyric Suite » , for string sextet ; the slightly unfinished Opera, « Lulu » ; and the Violin Concerto « To the memory of an angel » , and dies on December 24th, 1935. Anton Webern is accidentally killed by an American soldier during the occupation of Austria just after World War II ends in 1945. Arnold Schoenberg, thus, outlives both of his most famous students.

The increased importance of Bruckner to musical scholarship in the 3rd « Reich » is evident in the remarkable inflation in the number of articles on Bruckner and related topics that were published in the « Zeitschrift für Musik » . In the decade of the 1920's, the « Zeitschrift für Musik » published fewer than a dozen articles on Bruckner but, after 1932, the volume rose sharply, peaking, in 1936, with 21 contributions on Bruckner, in that year alone.

1936 : 3 Bruckner Festivals were held in Germany alone : « Brucknerfest in Leipzig » , « Bruckner-Feier der Stadt Leipzig » , and « Deutsches Bruckner-Fest in Berlin » . See : Fred Prieberg. « Musik im NS-Staat » , Fischer, Frankfurt (1982) , pages 282-283.

9 janvier 1936 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 10e concert de la saison.

7 février 1936 : Le chef Werner Richter-Reichhelm dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Le concert a lieu à la « Funkhaus » .

Richter-Reichhelm fut le directeur musical du « Hofer Symphoniker » (l'Orchestre symphonique de Hof, en Allemagne) de 1955 à 1967.

Juin 1936 : Le chef Karl Böhm dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1878-1880, éditée par Robert Haas (1936) , avec l'Orchestre de la « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » (étiquette « Electrola ») .

KARL BÖHM ET UN MOMENT D'HISTOIRE DANS L'ENREGISTREMENT BRUCKNÉRIEN

Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) : Symphonie n°4 en mi bémol majeur « Romantique » ; Symphonie n°5 en si bémol majeur. Orchestre de la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, direction : Karl Böhm. 2 CD « Profil Hänssler » PH09025. Enregistré en juin 1936 (4e) et juin 1937 (5e) à l'Opéra d'État de Dresde. Notice bilingue (anglais-allemand) . Durée : 130 minutes.

Ce double album « Profil Hänssler » nous ramène à l'aube de l'enregistrement des immenses Symphonies de Bruckner, à une époque, le milieu des années '30 du siècle dernier, où les facilités quasi illimitées de notre XXe siècle n'existaient pas et où se lancer dans l'aventure discographique était faire œuvre de pionnier. C'est d'ailleurs exactement et peut-être avant tout, ce que nous raconte cet album, grâce à sa notice fort bien documentée, qui nous fait ainsi remonter le temps avec moult détails sur la façon dont ont été enregistrées ces 2 Symphonies, des critiques d'époque, sans oublier des notes sur les éditions des Symphonies de Bruckner puisqu'il s'agit ici des toutes les exécutions de ces 2 Symphonies dans l'édition critique due à Robert Haas, dont un article daté de 1940 publié dans le programme du 2e Festival Bruckner de Leipzig figure dans le livret. Il est à noter que, plus tard, le chef emploiera également les éditions Nowak postérieures de ces mêmes Symphonies.

Du point de vue de la qualité purement sonore de ces documents, il faut louer le travail de restauration effectué ici car, s'il y a bien des grattements, et heureusement, il reste une assez bonne dynamique et des timbres parfaitement lisibles et, du coup, la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde est bien présente. Bien sûr, on est loin de l'exceptionnelle qualité des enregistrements de studio que le même chef fera 4 décennies plus tard avec un formidable Philharmonique de Vienne (Symphonies n°3, n°4, n°7 et n°8) , mais, rapporté aux dates d'enregistrement de 1936-1937, ce qu'on entend ici est tout simplement remarquable. Musicalement, ce qui frappe, c'est à la fois la vitalité et le Classicisme de la direction de Karl Böhm, sans doute plus vigoureuse et mobile dans les mouvements extrêmes que, plus tard, dans les enregistrements de référence « DGG » ou « Decca » , alors que les mouvements lents et les Scherzos sont moins originaux. Ceux qui connaissent le célèbre enregistrement viennois de la « Romantique » (1974) trouveront ici moins de perfection mais plus d'engagement, le tempo ne traîne jamais et il y a même des accélérations qu'on n'entendra quasiment plus ensuite. On retrouve la même fougue de « jeune homme » dans la 5e qui offre en plus l'intérêt d'être, sauf erreur, l'unique enregistrement jamais réalisé par Böhm de cette extraordinaire Symphonie. De nouveau, ce sont les mouvements extrêmes qui intéressent et surprennent le plus et, par leur constante animation, ils se rapprochent, sans en atteindre l'exceptionnel niveau de réussite, de ce que fit Furtwängler dans le fameux enregistrement de 1942. C'est dire si ces enregistrements presque incunables apportent un éclairage original sur l'art du chef autrichien qui était alors tout juste quarantenaire, que le grand public connaît sûrement mieux aujourd'hui en docte octogénaire.

Si on ne recommandera pas ces disques comme versions premières pour découvrir ces œuvres, les discophiles trouveront néanmoins ici de superbes ré-éditions d'enregistrements réellement historiques, qui plus est reproduits dans une intégralité dont les acquéreurs des énormes albums 78 tours n'ont pu profiter à l'époque puisque, pour des raisons d'économie de galettes et donc de gros sous, les reprises « da cappo » des Scherzo, bien qu'enregistrées et reproduites ici en CD, n'étaient pas incluses dans les disques originaux, les « utilisateurs » étant alors priés de remettre sur la platine les galettes du début de mouvements.

Karl Böhm

Karl Böhm fut l'ultime représentant des chefs d'orchestre autrichiens et allemands qui avaient connu les derniers compositeurs post-Romantiques ainsi que les créateurs des chefs-d'œuvre de Brahms, de Bruckner et de Wagner. Avec lui a disparu une conception de l'interprétation transmise de Maître à Disciple, dans le respect d'une tradition vivante. Au cours de sa carrière, ses interprétations ont peu évolué ; elles se sont approfondies et constituent un témoignage irremplaçable d'un certain style de direction d'orchestre hérité du post-Romantisme. Ses enregistrements de l'œuvre de Richard Strauß comptent parmi les plus authentiques en raison des liens étroits qui unissaient les 2 hommes.

Le chef d'orchestre autrichien Karl (August Leopold) Böhm est né le 28 août 1894 à Graz et est mort le 14 août 1981 à Salzbourg.

Après des études de droit et l'obtention d'un doctorat dans cette matière, Böhm étudie la musique au Conservatoire de musique de Graz, puis celui de Vienne où il étudie avec Eusebius Mandyczewski.

Engagé d'abord par Bruno Walter à l'Opéra d'État de Bavière, en 1921, il occupera ensuite des postes de chef d'orchestre à Darmstadt (1927) et à Hambourg (1931) . En 1934, il succède à Fritz Busch à la tête de l'Opéra « Semper » de Dresde. Il devient directeur musical de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne, en 1943.

Nationaliste convaincu, Karl Böhm paraît avoir sympathisé avant 1933, puis jusqu'à la fin de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, avec les thèses du Parti national-socialiste. Il n'est cependant jamais devenu membre du Parti nazi.

Après la guerre, Böhm se distingue particulièrement comme chef d'orchestre à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne et durant le Festival de Salzbourg. Il est connu et apprécié pour ses interprétations des Symphonies de Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert et Brahms.

Sa lecture des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner fait figure de référence. Il défendit les partitions originales de Bruckner dès qu'elles furent éditées. En novembre 1973, l'enregistrement de la 4e Symphonie avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, sur étiquette « Decca », fit l'objet des meilleures critiques. Deryck Cooke la salua par ces mots :

Karl Böhm s'est également illustré dans la direction d'Opéra, de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart à Richard Strauß, en passant par Richard Wagner au Festival de Bayreuth, dont il a ardemment défendu l'œuvre scénique. Il laisse une grande quantité d'enregistrements à la tête des plus grands Orchestres européens, parmi lesquels l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Bon nombre de ces enregistrements ont paru chez « Deutsche Grammophon » .

Au regard de la France, il vint à Orange dans le cadre des Chorégies d'Orange. C'est grâce à lui que, le 7 juillet 1973, « Tristan und Isolde » de Richard Wagner fut joué avec la soprano Birgit Nilson et le ténor Jon Vickers.

D'aucuns ont souligné la précision rythmique de la direction de Karl Böhm (« Avec lui, on percevait toujours la valeur des notes » , a dit de lui Christa Ludwig) , d'autres ont parfois contesté une battue excessivement « métronomique » .

Il est le père de l'acteur Karlheinz Böhm, connu notamment pour son rôle principal dans « le Voyeur » (« Peeping Tom ») de Michaël Powell (1960) , mais aussi pour avoir joué dans les années 1950 le rôle de l'Empereur François-Joseph dans la série des films « Sissi » avec Romy Schneider.

Karl Böhm voit le jour à Graz, le 28 août 1894, dans une famille de juristes dont l'idole se nomme Richard Wagner. Il travaille au Conservatoire de sa ville natale, où il étudie le piano, puis à Vienne, avec Eusebius Mandyczewski, l'ami fidèle de Johannes Brahms, qui l'initie à la théorie. Après un séjour de 2 années dans l'armée, au début de la Première Guerre mondiale, il est réformé et, en 1916, devient répétiteur au Théâtre municipal de Graz, où il fait ses débuts de chef lyrique, le 17 octobre 1917, dans « Der Trompeter von Säkkingen » de Viktor Nessler. Il y est nommé 2e chef, en 1919, et 1er chef, en 1920 ; il effectue en même temps des études juridiques, sanctionnées en 1919 par un doctorat.

En 1921, Bruno Walter lui offre une place de 3e chef à l'Opéra de Munich. Böhm découvre de nouvelles conditions de travail dans l'un des plus grands théâtres de l'époque. Walter l'initie à l'art mozartien et éveille en lui une véritable passion. Un an plus tard, Walter est remplacé par Hans Knappertsbusch, que Mozart intéresse peu ; Böhm obtient de diriger ses Opéras. À la même époque, il a son 1er contact avec la musique de Richard Strauß, qui jouera un rôle déterminant au cours de sa carrière ; il dirige « Ariane à Naxos » , en 1923, et « le Chevalier à la rose » , en 1925.

De son vivant, déjà, Böhm faisait partie de la légende des grands chefs d'orchestre. Ses colères étaient réputées, mais ceux qui savaient découvrir l'autre aspect de son caractère connaissaient un homme généreux, spontané et profondément intransigeant à l'égard de la musique. Il avait perdu l'usage d'un œil depuis très longtemps et, sa vue s'affaiblissant, dirigeait sans lire la musique. Les contacts étaient parfois difficiles et il est certain que les musiciens viennois et berlinois entretenaient avec lui des relations beaucoup plus cordiales que les Parisiens, qui ne l'avaient connu qu'assez tard.

Karl Böhm avait reçu de Bruno Walter un sens du phrasé et de l'allègement des masses propre à servir Mozart. Richard Strauß lui avait donné le sens du temps exact, adapté à chaque œuvre mais aussi à chaque circonstance. Il avait également profité des conseils de Karl Muck, dont il vénérât la direction wagnérienne. Chef de tradition, fidèle à lui-même et à la musique qu'il servait, Böhm était une exception au sein d'une époque où domine la remise en question permanente. Ses interprétations sont restées étonnamment proches les unes des autres tout au long de sa carrière : point de ces grandes fluctuations auxquelles nous ont habitués Charles Münch, Herbert von Karajan ou Leonard Bernstein, mais une marche lente et progressive vers un idéal artistique impossible à atteindre.

Sa conception mozartienne étonne par sa vie intérieure, mais elle continue de dérouter dans le contexte actuel. De même, sa vision de Richard Strauß (la plus authentique que nous connaissions, probablement) peut sembler dépassée par la lecture brillante et tempétueuse de certains de ses successeurs (Karajan, Solti, Sinopoli, Carlos Kleiber) . Böhm a refusé de suivre l'évolution d'une époque pour rester lui-même.

Le XXe siècle ne peut éviter le chef d'orchestre Karl Böhm pour les interprétations de Mozart, Beethoven, Richard Strauß, Richard Wagner. Dans la lignée des Bruno Walter et Wilhelm Furtwängler, Karl Böhm dirige avec grandeur et simplicité les grands Maîtres qu'il sert avec humilité et précision.

Fils de juriste, Karl Böhm étudie le droit avant d'étudier la musique au Conservatoire de Graz (piano) puis de Vienne (théorie) avec Eusebius Mandyczewski, ami de Johannes Brahms. Il est appelé à servir dans l'armée autrichienne durant la Première Guerre mondiale. C'est à Graz, dans sa ville natale, de 1917 à 1920, qu'il fait ses premiers pas de direction d'orchestre, d'abord répétiteur, puis second chef, enfin 1er chef. Il est appelé par Bruno Walter à Munich, en 1921. Sa carrière progresse vite, il occupe successivement le poste de directeur de la musique à Darmstadt, Hambourg, à l'Opéra de Dresde et à l'Opéra de Vienne.

A l'Opéra de Dresde, il dirige les créations mondiales de Richard Strauß : « la Femme silencieuse » en 1935 ; « Daphné » en 1938 ; le 2e Concerto pour cor en 1943. Le 11 juin 1944, il dirigera « Ariane à Naxos » lors du concert anniversaire pour les 80 ans de son ami Richard Strauß.

À partir de 1938, il dirige chaque année dans le cadre du Festival de Salzbourg.

Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, accusé à tort d'avoir adhéré au régime nazi de manière passive, sa carrière est interrompue jusqu'à 1947, date de son blanchiment.

En 1948, il fait ses débuts à la Scala de Milan avec le « Don Giovanni » de Mozart.

Il part pour l'Argentine en 1950 au Teatro Colón de Buenos Aires où il dirige un répertoire lyrique allemand ; son interprétation du « Wozzeck » de Alban Berg fait événement dans la presse.

De retour en Europe en 1954, il est de nouveau 1er chef à l'Opéra de Vienne. Le 5 novembre 1955, il dirige le « Fidelio » de Beethoven pour la ré-ouverture de l'Opéra reconstruit.

Il donne son 1er concert aux États-Unis en 1956, à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago. En 1957, il dirige pour la 1re fois au « Metropolitan Opera House » de New York.

En 1962, il fait ses débuts au Festival de Bayreuth. Lors de sa tournée au Japon en 1965 avec l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin, il dirige « Fidelio » à Tokyo.

En France, au cours des années 1970, il dirige à l'Opéra de Paris (« la Femme sans ombre », « Elektra », « la Flûte enchantée ») et dans le cadre des chorégies d'Orange, il dirige l'Orchestre National de Radio France dans son répertoire favori, « Tristan et Isolde » .

Karl Böhm a reçu de nombreux honneurs et distinctions au cours de sa longue carrière (Médaille d'or Mozart, Médaille Brahms, l'Anneau Bruckner) . En 1974, pour son 80e anniversaire, les villes de Salzbourg et Vienne lui ont rendu hommage par des manifestations spéciales.

The Austrian conductor Karl (August Leopold) Böhm was born on August 28, 1894 in Graz and died on August 14, 1981, in Salzburg. He is widely considered to be one of the greatest conductors of the 20th Century.

The son of a lawyer, Karl Böhm studied law and earned a doctorate in this subject before entering the music Conservatory in his home-town of Graz. (His father was originally a German-speaking Bohemian from Egerland, while his mother was from Alsace.) He later enrolled at the Vienna Conservatory, where he studied under Eusebius Mandyczewski, a friend of Johannes Brahms.

In 1917, Karl Böhm became a rehearsal assistant in his home-town, in 1919, the assistant director of music, and, in 1920, the senior director of music. On the recommendation of Karl Muck, Bruno Walter engaged him at Munich's Bavarian State Opera, in 1921. His 1st assignment here was Mozart's « Entführung aus dem Serail » , with a cast including Maria Ivogun, Paul Bender and Richard Tauber - source : « Karl Böhm, Ich erinnere mich genau » , Zürich (1968) . In 1927, he was appointed as chief musical director in Darmstadt. From 1931 to 1934, he fulfilled the same function at the Hamburg Opera and was appointed professor.

In 1933, he conducted in Vienna for the 1st time, in « Tristan und Isolde » by Richard Wagner. He succeeded Fritz Busch, who had gone into exile, as head of Dresden's « Semper Oper » , in 1934, a position he held until 1942. This was an important period for him, in which he conducted the 1st performances of works by Richard Strauß : « Die schweigsame Frau » (1935) and « Daphne » (1938) , which is dedicated to him. He also conducted the 1st performances of « Romeo und Julia » (1940) and « Die Zauberinsel » (1942) by Heinrich Sutermeister, and Strauß' Horn Concerto No. 2 (1943) .

In 1938, he took part in the Salzburg Festival for the 1st time, conducting « Don Giovanni » and, thereafter, he became a permanent guest-conductor. He secured a top post at the Vienna State Opera, in 1943, eventually becoming music-director. On the occasion of the 80th birthday of Richard Strauß, in 1944, he conducted the Salzburg Festival performance of « Ariadne auf Naxos » .

After he had completed a 2 year post-War denazification ban, Böhm led « Don Giovanni » at Milan's « Teatro alla Scala » (1948) and gave a guest performance in Paris with the Vienna State Opera company (1949) . From 1950 to 1953, he directed the German season at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires, and he conducted the 1st Spanish performance of the Opera « Wozzeck » by Alban Berg, translated into Spanish for the occasion. In 1953, he was responsible for the 1st performance of Gottfried von Einem's work « Der Prozess » . From 1954 to 1956, he directed the Vienna State Opera at its reconstructed home. He additionally resumed ties post-War in Dresden, at the « Staatskapelle » .

In 1957, he made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, conducting « Don Giovanni » , and quickly became one of the favourite conductors of the Rudolf Bing era, leading, all told, 262 performances, including the house premieres of « Wozzeck » , « Ariadne auf Naxos » and « Die Frau ohne Schatten » , which was the 1st major success in the new house at Lincoln Center. Böhm led many other major new productions in New York, such as « Fidelio » for the Beethoven bi-centennial, « Tristan und Isolde » (including the house debut performance of Birgit Nilsson, in 1959) , « Lohengrin » , « Otello » , « Der Rosenkavalier » , « Salome » , and « Elektra » . His repertoire there also included « Le nozze di Figaro » , « Parsifal » , « Der fliegende Holländer » , « Die Walküre » , and « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » .

Karl Böhm made his debut at the Bayreuth Festival, in 1962, with « Tristan und Isolde » , which he conducted until 1970. In 1964, he led Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » there and, from 1965 to 1967, the composer's « Der Ring des Nibelungen » cycle, which was the last production by Wieland Wagner. These appearances resulted in critically acclaimed recordings of the « Ring » and « Tristan » . In 1965, Böhm conducted « Fidelio » in Tokyo. In 1971, he gave performances in Moscow and led Wagner's « Flying Dutchman » in Bayreuth.

Late in life, he began a guest-conducting relationship with the London Symphony Orchestra in a 1973 appearance at the Salzburg Festival. Several recordings were made with the Orchestra for « Deutsche Grammophon » . Böhm was given the title of « LSO » President, which he held until his death. During the 1970's, the conductor led performances at the Royal Opera House in Covent Garden.

Karl Böhm died in Salzburg. Perhaps, Böhm's greatest contribution to music lay in bringing to life the Operas of his close colleague Richard Strauß. He conducted the premieres of Strauß' late works « Die schweigsame Frau » (1935) and « Daphne » (1938) , of which he is the dedicatee, recorded all of the major Operas (but often made cuts to the scores) , and regularly revived Strauß' Operas with strong casts during his tenures in Vienna and Dresden, as well as at the Salzburg Festival.

Karl Böhm was praised for his rhythmically robust interpretations of the Operas and Symphonies of Mozart and, in the 1960's, he was entrusted with recording all the Mozart Symphonies with the Berlin Philharmonic. His brisk, straightforward way with Wagner won adherents, as did his readings of the Symphonies of Brahms, Bruckner and Schubert. His 1971 complete recording of the Beethoven Symphonies with the Vienna Philharmonic was also highly-regarded. On a less common front, he championed and recorded Alban Berg's avant-garde Operas « Wozzeck » and « Lulu » before they gained a foothold in the standard repertory. Böhm mentioned in the notes to his recordings of these works that he and Berg discussed the orchestrations, leading to changes in the score (as he had similarly done, previously, with Richard Strauß) .

Karl Böhm received numerous honours, among them 1st Austrian « Generalmusikdirektor » , in 1964. He was widely feted on his 80th birthday, 10 years later ; his colleague Herbert von Karajan presented him with a clock to mark that occasion.

His son was actor Karlheinz Böhm who is remembered for his roles as the young Emperor Franz-Josef in the 3 « Sissi » movies, as the psychopath in « Peeping Tom » (1960) , and for playing Jacob Grimm opposite Laurence Harvey's Wilhelm Grimm in « The Wonderful World of the Brothers Grimm » (1962) .

Although suspected by some of being an early sympathizer of the Nazi Party, Böhm never became a member. According to British music journalist Norman Lebrecht, in November 1923, Böhm stopped a rehearsal in the Munich Opera House in order, reportedly, to watch Adolf Hitler's « Beer-Hall Putsch » . In 1930, he is said to have become angry when his wife was accused by Nazi brown-shirts of being Jewish during the premiere of Arnold Schönberg's Opera « Von heute auf morgen » and to have stated that he would « tell Hitler about this » . In the wake of the Nazi annexation of Austria, he gave the Hitler salute during a concert with the Vienna Philharmonic, ironically violating Nazi rules about places where the greeting was appropriate. After the referendum controlled by the Nazis to justify the annexation (« Anschluß ») , the conductor allegedly declared that « anyone who does not approve this act of our “ Führer ” with a “ 100 % YES ” does not deserve to bear the honourable name of a German ! » . Lebrecht, in making these charges, fails to provide documentary evidence for them. While music-director in Dresden, Böhm allegedly « poured forth rhetoric glorifying the Nazi regime and its cultural aims » . In 1939, he contributed to the Newspapers of the Comradeship of German Artists special congratulatory edition on the occasion of Adolf Hitler's 50th birthday. « The path of today's music in the sphere of Symphonic works has been marked and paved by the ideology of National-Socialism. »

On the other hand, Böhm's programming of modern works was disliked by the Nazis, and his collaborations with anti-Nazi directors and designers « could have been interpreted by enemies of the Nazi regime as a brave attempt to preserve the principle of artistic freedom » , and Böhm, apparently preparing for eventual flight and exile, sent his son Karlheinz to Switzerland. According to historian Michaël H. Kater, Böhm belongs in that group of artists of whom « we also find conflicting elements of resistance, accommodation, and service to the regime, so that, in the end, they cannot be definitively painted as either Nazis or non-Nazis » .

Karl Böhm was born in Graz in Austria of German-Bohemian descent through his father (Böhm may be translated as meaning « Bohemian ») , and of French-Alsatian lineage on his mother's side. His uncle, General Stiger-Steiner, had been a Minister for War in the Austrian government, while his father was a lawyer and, although an active amateur musician and friend of the conductor Hans Richter, believed that if his son wished to pursue a musical career he should also possess a professional qualification. Thus, Böhm studied law at the University of Graz, while also taking lessons in piano and theory at the Graz Conservatory. He went on to study at the Vienna Conservatory, between 1913 and 1914, with Eusebius Mandyczewski, who had been a close colleague of Brahms, and with Guido Adler. Böhm served in the Austrian army during World War I, returning to civilian life after sustaining an injury. He continued his twin-track career, on the one hand working as a « répétiteur » from 1917 at the Graz Opera and, on the other continuing his legal studies, receiving a doctorate in law from the University of Graz in 1919.

Karl Böhm did not have any formal training as a conductor, acknowledging Hans Richter's belief that he would know immediately if he had the capability to succeed in this profession simply by standing in front of an orchestra. He made his conducting debut in 1917 at the Graz Opera with Victor Nessler's now forgotten « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » . In 1919, he was appointed as 1st conductor at Graz, giving-up law altogether and, in the following year, he was made chief conductor at Graz. While conducting an intensively prepared performance there of « Lohengrin » , he was heard by the distinguished German conductor Karl Muck, who offered to coach him in the music of Richard Wagner. With Muck, Böhm studied the « Ring » cycle, « Parsifal » , « Tristan und Isolde » , and « Die Meistersinger » . This tutelage stood Böhm in good stead, especially in relation to « Tristan » , a work with which he was to become closely identified. Muck also recommended him to Bruno Walter, at this time general music-director at the Munich Opera and one of the most important younger conductors in Germany.

Bruno Walter engaged Böhm as an assistant and he remained in Munich for 6 years, from 1921 to 1927. He later described this experience, of being an assistant conductor in a 1st rate Opera company, as being a vital element in his education. In Munich, Böhm worked initially with Walter and, later, with Hans Knappertsbusch, and he conducted 528 performances there of 73 different Operas. In 1927, he was appointed chief conductor at the Darmstadt Opera where he stayed until 1931. Here he was noted for his championing of contemporary music, in 1928, presenting Alban Berg's Opera, « Wozzeck » , with the composer attending the final day of rehearsals. Böhm was to become as famous for his interpretations of Berg's 2 Operas as he was for his Wagner performances.

In 1931, he moved to Hamburg, again as chief conductor at the Opera, succeeding Egon Pollak. A year of great significance followed for Böhm in 1933. Istly, he met Richard Strauß, when the composer came to Hamburg to assist in the preparation of performances of his Opera « Arabella » . The 2 developed a close relationship that was to last for the remainder of Strauß' life and, through Strauß, Böhm developed a deep understanding of Mozart. During this period, Bohm had also been building-up his concert career, for instance, with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. In April 1933, Clemens Krauß resigned from the Vienna Philharmonic as conductor and Böhm stepped into the breach for a concert. He also conducted « Tristan und Isolde » at the Vienna State Opera. This was to be the beginning of a significant musical partnership with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra that was to last until Böhm's death. Finally, in 1933, following his debut at the Dresden Opera, he was invited to succeed Fritz Busch as chief conductor, with effect from 1934. He stayed at Dresden until 1943, enjoying excellent working conditions with a fine roster of singers and an orchestra of exceptional quality. Here his friendship with Strauß deepened : he conducted the premieres of « Die schweigsame Frau » , in 1935, and of « Daphne » , which Strauß dedicated to him, in 1938. In 1936, Strauß, Böhm and the Dresden Opera made a very successful visit to England and, in 1938, Böhm made his 1st appearance at the Salzburg Festival, conducting « Don Giovanni » . During this period, he also made a series of very distinguished recordings for the German gramophone company « Électrola » , which covered both the Operatic and the concert repertoires.

At the beginning of 1943, Karl Böhm took-over as chief conductor of the Vienna State Opera, where he maintained and developed the high-standards of the company, as many contemporary radio recordings attest. The performance of « Ariadne auf Naxos » arranged to celebrate Strauß's 80th birthday, in 1944, probably marks the high-point musically, if not politically, of Böhm's 1st Viennese period. With the collapse of Germany and the Allied victory at the end of World War II, he was forbidden to conduct in Germany and Austria until 1947. However, he gradually rebuilt his conducting career in Europe and, between 1950 and 1953, was responsible for the German repertoire at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires. In 1954, he was preferred to his rival Clemens Krauß for the post of chief conductor at the Vienna State Opera, and he opened the rebuilt Opera House in 1955 with an incandescent performance of Beethoven's « Fidelio » . His 2nd period at the helm in Vienna did not last long : he resigned in 1956, in the face of intense criticism for his absences from the city.

Henceforth, Böhm was to hold no further permanent musical posts, preferring to guest-conduct exclusively. In 1957, he was engaged by Rudolf Bing, who had worked with him previously at Darmstadt, to appear at the Metropolitan Opera, New York. He made his debut in October that year with « Don Giovanni » , which was highly-praised. Later, he was to conduct many notable productions at the Met, including « Die Frau ohne Schatten » , « Die Meistersinger » and « Wozzeck » . In 1962, he appeared at the Bayreuth Festival conducting a powerful interpretation of « Tristan » , which was followed by « Die Meistersinger » , in 1964, and by « Der Ring des Nibelungen » , in 1965. In 1970, he was named as general music-director of Austria and, in 1977, as president of the London Symphony Orchestra, with whom he had appeared at the Salzburg Festival. Throughout this period, he was active as a guest-conductor with Orchestras such as the Berlin Philharmonic, the Berlin Radio Symphony, the London Symphony, the « Dresden Staatskapelle » , the Vienna Symphony, and the Vienna Philharmonic. He also was very active in the recording studio, recording for several labels, most notably « Deutsche Grammophon » . In 1981, he suffered a stroke from which he never fully-recovered, dying in August of that year in Salzburg.

Karl Böhm was a precise and undemonstrative conductor from whom any form of musical exaggeration was rare in performance. As with many great conductors, the essential work had been done earlier in rehearsal, where he was found by many orchestras to be a hard, if ultimately fair, task Master, able to draw performances of great refinement and strength from the ensembles with which he worked. His discography is huge, and contains many exceptional performances. Of particular note are his recordings of Strauß's Opera « Die Frau ohne Schatten » for the « Decca » label, Mozart's Opera « Così fan tutte » made for « EMI » with Walter Legge and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, and his Beethoven and Mozart Symphony cycles made with the Vienna and Berlin Philharmonic Orchestras, respectively for « Deutsche Grammophon ». His pre-War recording of the 3rd Act of « Die Meistersinger » remains an outstanding musical document, as do his recordings from all periods of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner.

Karl Böhm was one of the greatest conductors of the 20th Century in the German tradition. He studied music as a child and continued to work and study in music while serving in the Austrian Army during World War I - and while completing a doctorate in law. He coached singers at the Graz Opera and was permitted to conduct a performance of Nessler's « Der Trompeter von Sackingen ». He never had conducting lessons, but made close studies of the work of both Bruno Walter and Karl Muck.

In 1921, he was hired by the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, and then he became « Generalmusikdirektor » in both Darmstadt (1927) and Hamburg (1931-1933) . He gained a reputation for his fine performances of Mozart, Richard Wagner, and Richard Strauß, as well as his championing of modern German music, including operas by Ernst Křenek and Alban Berg. Böhm debuted in Vienna, in 1933, leading Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » . In 1934, he became director of the Dresden State Opera, Richard Strauß's favourite Theatre. There, Böhm conducted premieres of Strauß' « Die schweigsame Frau » (1935) and « Daphne » (1938) . He remained at the helm in Dresden through 1943, at which point he became director of the Vienna State Opera (1943-1945) . Richard Strauß was not in official favor, and Josef Gœbbels banned any recognition of the great composer's 80th birthday, in 1944. However, Böhm participated in a « de facto » observance, as a large number of Strauß's orchestral and Operatic works « just happened » to be played about the time of the birthday.

After the War, Böhm was forbidden to perform until he underwent « de-Nazification » , a procedure whereby prominent Austro-Germans were investigated for complicity in Nazi crimes. He was eventually cleared of any suspicion, and was permitted to resume work in 1947.

Karl Böhm oversaw the German repertory at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires (1950-1953) , and again served as director of the Vienna State Opera (1954-1956) . He debuted in the United States at New York's Metropolitan Opera with Mozart's « Don Giovanni » in 1957, and took prominent German orchestras and Opera companies on tour. The Vienna Philharmonic bestowed on him the title « Ehrendirigent » , and he was proclaimed « Generalmusikdirektor » of Austria. He left a legacy of many great recordings, including a complete Wagner « Ring » cycle considered by many critics to be the best. While his Wagner and Strauß were sumptuously Romantic, his Mozart was scrupulously Classical in approach.

Karl Böhm : The Underappreciated Mæstro

(Kevin Lamb)

Karl Böhm, the Austrian-born conductor and director of the Vienna State Opera, is an under-appreciated Mæstro among top-tier conductors of the last half Century. His Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, and Schubert cycles from the 1960's and 1970's (on « Deutsche Grammophon ») are considered by many critics to be some of the finest recordings of these renowned Symphonies.

Throughout his distinguished career, Böhm recorded with Europe's leading Orchestras, including the Vienna Philharmonic, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, and the « Westdeutscher » Symphony Orchestra of Cologne. He also served as a principal conductor of the « Sächsische Staatskapelle Dresden » and as president of the London Symphony Orchestra.

The vast catalog of Böhm's recordings offers a treasure trove of fine readings of Romantic-era Classical music. The « Orfeo » label has issued a number of live performances from the annual Salzburg Festival (many in stereo) , where Böhm conducted for 37 summers, between 1938 and 1980. Among his 56 orchestral concerts at Salzburg are superb performances of the Beethoven 4th and Schumann 4th with the Vienna Philharmonic from 1969.

In 2002, the « Andante » label released a 4 disk set of live stereo recordings of performances with Böhm conducting the London Symphony Orchestra from the Salzburg Festival during the mid-1970's. One exceptional performance in this series includes the London Symphony Orchestra's 1973 debut as the 1st British Orchestra to appear on the program at the legendary Salzburg Festival. The program included Mozart's « Haffner » Symphony, Brahms 2nd Symphony, and a sizzling recital of Mozart's 7th Violin Concerto by Polish virtuoso Henryk Szeryng.

The pinnacle of Böhm's recorded repertoire is arguably the recording of Anton Bruckner's 4th symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic, from November 1973, on the « Decca » label. It remains on critics' short list of the « crème de la crème » of performances of the Bruckner 4th. Reviewers in « American Record Guide » , a leading publication of reviews of Classical music, generally refer to Böhm's 1973 rendition as a bench-mark recording to which other Bruckner 4th recordings are compared.

Recently released live stereo recordings of Bruckner's 7th and 8th Symphonies under the « Audite » label re-affirm Böhm's status as a Master of the baton. Critics have given both of these premiere recordings top-scores in terms of sound quality and performance. These Bruckner recordings with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra have been awarded several prizes. The Bruckner 8th was recently nominated for the prestigious MIDEM Classical award.

Karl Böhm's past as an Austrian conductor was rumoured to be ideologically sympathetic with the National-Socialist regime. Several accounts of the period, including David Monod's « Settling Scores : German Music, Denazification, and the Americans, 1945-1953 » and Richard Strauß biographer Matthew Boyden, have emphasized Böhm's sympathetic support of the 3rd « Reich » despite the fact that no record exists of Böhm's membership in the National-Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) .

In his memoirs, « Karl Böhm : A Life Remembered » , the conductor denied being a Nazi Party member and condemned the National-Socialist regime. He admitted that he decided to continue to work and earn a modest living in his chosen profession under the 3rd « Reich » rather than abandon his conducting post, as did Herbert von Karajan and Wilhelm Furtwängler. Considering the fact that Böhm's post-War career established his reputation as an exceptional conductor, should questionable allegations of his pre-War years in Germany prompt Classical music stations to prohibit the airing of Böhm's outstanding post-War recordings ?

The « Audite » label issued a recent statement, « Discussion about Karl Böhm » , defending the Austrian conductor and answering critics of the decision to issue these previously unreleased recordings Böhm recordings.

Artists deserve to be judged by a common set of standards, which should be confined to evaluating the quality of their work. As a conductor driven to perfection, Karl Böhm deserves recognition (and additional air time) for enhancing the performing arts with a rich legacy of fine Classical recordings. Western culture is much better off as a result.

Karl August Leopold Böhm (geboren 28. August 1894 in Graz ; gestorben 14. August 1981 in Salzburg) war ein österreichischer und deutscher Dirigent und einer der großen Wagnerinterpreten.

Böhm stammt väterlicherseits von Deutschböhmen aus dem Egerland und mütterlicherseits von französischen Elsässern ab. Er studierte zunächst wie sein Vater, ein Rechtsanwalt, die Jurisprudenz und promovierte zum Doktor der Rechte. Sein Ziel war es in seiner frühen Jugend noch, Pianist zu werden, doch änderte sich dieses bald durch seine Erkenntnis, für den Dirigentenberuf geschaffen zu sein. Und so studierte er am Wiener und am Grazer Konservatorium Klavier und Musiktheorie.

Seine Dirigentenkarriere begann 1917 in seiner Heimatstadt Graz. Mit der Unterstützung von Bruno Walter berief man ihn 1921 nach München.

1927 wurde er Generalmusikdirektor in Darmstadt, ab 1931 in derselben Funktion in Hamburg.

1934 wurde er Nachfolger von Fritz Busch an der Dresdner Semperoper. Diese Stelle hatte er bis 1943 inne, als er das erste Mal Direktor der Wiener Staatsoper wurde. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn von einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

1945 entfernten ihn die alliierten Besatzungsbehörden wegen zu großer Nähe zum Nazi-Regime aus dem Amt des Direktors der Wiener Staatsoper und belegten ihn mit einem Auftrittsverbot (ähnlich wie es Herbert von Karajan erhielt) .

Von 1955 (genau nach Ende der Besatzungszeit) bis 1956 wurde er dann ein zweites Mal mit diesem Amt betraut. Vorwürfe, er sei zu wenig in Wien präsent, sowie Protestkundgebungen während von ihm dirigierter Vorstellungen bewogen Böhm schließlich, das Amt niederzulegen. Sein Nachfolger wurde Karajan. In einem offenen Brief bestritt Böhm anschließend Probleme zwischen ihm und dem Ensemble und sprach diesem und dem Wiener Publikum ausdrücklich Dank und Anerkennung aus.

Vor allem seit den 1960er Jahren trat er wieder in der Staatsoper als Dirigent auf.

Im Juni 1979 leitete er seine letzte Premiere an diesem Haus : Die Entführung aus dem Serail von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (Regie Dieter Dorn, Bühnenbild und Kostüme Jürgen Rose ; mit Edita Gruberová, Horst Laubenthal und Rolf Boysen als Bassa Selim) .

1980 dirigierte er bei einer Staatsopern-Tournee in Japan Ariadne auf Naxos von Richard Strauß, und im Frühjahr 1981 fanden seine letzten Auftritte in der Öffentlichkeit statt, als er in der Staatsoper eine Reihe von Aufführungen von Mozarts Le nozze di Figaro leitete. Wenige Wochen vor seinem Tod dirigierte Böhm noch einmal die Wiener Philharmoniker bei der Einspielung der Tonspur für die Elektra-Verfilmung von Götz Friedrich. Den Termin für sein ursprünglich geplantes Abschiedskonzert Anfang September anlässlich der Wiedereröffnung der Alten Oper in Frankfurt am Main erlebte er nicht mehr.

Er starb 86-jährig am 14. August 1981 während der Proben zu Richard Strauß' Oper Elektra.

Einziges Kind aus der Ehe mit der Sopranistin Thea Linhard ist der Schauspieler Karlheinz Böhm. Seine Grabstätte befindet sich auf dem Steinfeldfriedhof in Graz.

Karl Böhm war kein Mitglied der NSDAP. Er war Mitglied in dem (von Alfred Rosenberg gegründeten) Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur, der im Juni 1934 im Zuge der gesellschaftlichen Gleichschaltung mit anderen Organisationen fusionierte. Auf Fürsprache Adolf Hitlers wurde Böhm aus seinem Vertrag als Hamburger Generalmusikdirektor entlassen, um 1934 Nachfolger von Fritz Busch in Dresden werden zu können, den die Nazis aus politischen Gründen zum Rücktritt und zur Emigration gezwungen hatten.

Am 2. August 1935 schrieb Böhm dem Reichsdramaturgen Rainer Schlösser :

« Da ich von Geburt aus Österreicher bin, jetzt seit zwölf Jahren reichsdeutscher Staatsangehöriger, und natürlich in Wien viele Anhänger, besonders im nationalsozialistischen Lager habe, glaube ich, daß diese Konzerte propagandistisch von größtem Vorteil für Deutschland sein können. Mit deutschem Gruß, Karl Böhm. »

In einem weiteren Schreiben zur Erlangung der Auftrittsgenehmigung in Wien vom 13. August 1935 erklärte er :

« Es ist sicher im Sinne der Regierung gelegen, wenn ich als deutscher Dirigent nach Wien gehe, um dort den zahlreichen Anhängern der nationalsozialistischen Idee neue Anregung zu geben, umsomehr als ich gebürtiger Österreicher bin. Heil Hitler ! »

Nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs dirigierte Böhm am 30. März 1938 im Wiener Konzerthaus die Wiener Symphoniker beim « Ersten festlichen Konzert im neuen deutschen Reich » und begrüßte das Publikum mit dem Hitlergruß (ohne dazu verpflichtet gewesen zu sein) und ließ einleitend das Horst-Wessel-Lied spielen. Zur « Volksabstimmung » über den « Anschluß » Österreichs schrieb Böhm in April 1938 :

In einem Artikel (veröffentlicht April 1939) schrieb Böhm, daß « der Weg der heutigen Musik gebahnt ist durch die Weltanschauung des Nationalsozialismus », und befürwortete, daß « alle etwaigen künstlerischen " Entgleisungen ", die dem Volksempfinden nicht Rechnung trügen, von vornherein unmöglich gemacht werden » .

1941 wurde Böhm im Buch Künstler plaudern wie folgt zitiert :

Infolge der Intervention von Reichsleiter Baldur von Schirach erhielten Karl Böhm und seine Frau Thea eine arisierte Villa in Wien 18, Sternwartestrasse 70, deren rechtmäßige Eigentümer nach dem Krieg entschädigt wurden. 1944, in der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs, als viele Künstler zum Kriegsdienst eingezogen oder zum Arbeitseinsatz an der « Heimatfront » verpflichtet wurden, nahm ihn Hitler in die Gottbegnadeten-Liste als einen der 15 wichtigsten Dirigenten auf, was einer Freistellung gleichkam.

Später schrieb Böhm in seinen Memoiren :

« Die Tatsache, daß ich nicht emigriert bin, hat man mir später ebenfalls verübelt. Ich hatte damals leider kein Angebot von der Met oder von Covent Garden. Ich glaube aber im Verlaufe meiner Tätigkeiten sowohl in Dresden sowie später in Wien bewiesen zu haben, auf welcher Seite ich immer gestanden bin. »

Folgende antisemitische Äußerung ist von Böhm bekannt :

Dagegen ist (Stand 2010) laut dem Historiker Oliver Rathkolb von Böhm « keine antisemitische Äußerung bekannt » .

Gegenüber progressiven Opernregisseuren zeigte sich der allgemein als schwierig bekannte Böhm (dessen sarkastische oder zynische Bemerkungen legendär sind) bis zuletzt sehr aufgeschlossen. Er konzentrierte sich auf die musikalischen Aspekte einer Inszenierung und vermied es, sich in die Inszenierung einzumischen. So arbeitete er problemlos und wiederholt mit Wieland Wagner, Günther Rennert, Otto Schenk, Jean-Pierre Ponnelle, August Everding oder Dieter Dorn. Seine kongeniale Zusammenarbeit mit Wieland Wagner bei den Bayreuther Festspielen machte ihn insbesondere in Wagnerianerkreisen als einen der großen Wagnerinterpreten bekannt.

Karl Böhm dirigierte zahlreiche berühmte Orchester (vor allem die Wiener Philharmoniker, machte aber auch viele Plattenaufnahmen mit den Berliner Philharmonikern, darunter eine Gesamtaufnahme aller Mozart-Sinfonien) sowie an vielen namhaften Opernhäusern in Europa und den USA - etwa an der Metropolitan Opera in New York City. Jahrzehntlang verbunden war er auch der Deutschen Oper Berlin und vielen bedeutenden Musikfestspielen (und andere den Bayreuther Festspielen und vor allem den Salzburger Festspielen) . Besonders eng war seine jahrzehntelange Beziehung zu den Wiener Philharmonikern, mit denen er zahlreiche Plattenaufnahmen realisierte, von denen einige auch als Film erhalten sind. Der Schwerpunkt seines Repertoires lag auf der österreichischen und deutschen Musik der Klassik und Romantik. Ihm wurde eine Vorliebe zur Musik Mozarts (den er, eigener Aussage zufolge, für einen Revolutionär hielt) nachgesagt, zu Richard Strauß unterhielt er seit seiner Zeit in Dresden eine freundschaftliche Beziehung und dirigierte einige Uraufführungen Strauß'scher Werke. In der Öffentlichkeit wurde Böhm im Kontrast zu seinem als mondän geltenden Landsmann Herbert von Karajan eher als bodenständiger Musiker wahrgenommen.

30. Jänner 1943 : Kriegsverdienstkreuz II. Klasse ohne Schwerter.

1957 : Mozartmedaille durch die Mozartgemeinde Wien.

1958 : Großes Silbernes Ehrenzeichen für Verdienste um die Republik Österreich.

1976 : Kommandeurkreuz der Ehrenlegion.

1991 : Österreichische 500-Schilling-Gedenkmünze Karl Böhm in Silber Ehrenring des Landes Steiermark Goldener Ehrenring der Stadt Bayreuth.

In seinem Namen wurde ein Doktor Karl-Böhm-Preis für junge österreichische Dirigenten zwischen 1975 und 1981 viermal vergeben. Seit 1989 vergibt das Land Steiermark den Karl-Böhm-Interpretationspreis für herausragende Leistungen an Musikinterpreten.

30 juillet 1936 : Le chef Adolf Mennerich dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1888, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec l' « Orchester des Reichssenders Stuttgart » à la « Sendesaal » . Le concert est enregistré.

Adolf Mennerich

Le chef d'orchestre, chef de chœur, « Kapellmeister » , pianiste et pédagogue Adolf Mennerich est né le 23 juin 1902 à Hambourg et est décédé le 29 novembre 1966 à Munich.

Comme violoniste, il a enregistré la « Méditation de Thaïs » de Jules Massenet.

Il a travaillé dans les villes de Brême (où il a dirigé au « Stadttheater » le « Peer Gynt » d'Edvard Grieg, le 5 mai 1926) , de Leipzig, de Munich (où il a dirigé le Philharmonique) et de Berlin. Il a enregistré pour l'étiquette « Mercury » un poème symphonique de Franz Liszt avec le « Munchner Philharmoniker » .

(Adolf Mennerich recorded from the playbill for a performance on 8 June 1926. According to the « Deutscher Bühnenspielplan » , performances were given on 5, 13 and 19 May, 4, 8 and 29 June 1926.)

1930 : Franz Schalk, un autre élève du Maître, la programmera avec la même phalange munichoise.

27 mars 1936 : Le chef Adolf Mennerich dirige la version originale de la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Il s'agit d'une première munichoise.

Wie bei den bisherigen Streifzügen durch die Rezeptionsgeschichte der Symphonien Anton Bruckners bei den Münchner Philharmonikern stehen auch in diesem Beitrag über die « Sechste » historisch wichtige Aufführungen im Mittelpunkt : Erste Aufführung am 21. Februar 1905 unter dem Bruckner-Schüler Ferdinand Löwe, weitere Wiedergaben durch Bruckners zweiten bedeutenden Schüler Franz Schalk (1930) und Adolf Mennerich, Dirigent der Münchner Erstaufführung der Originalfassung am 27. März 1936.

Le journal de musique « Le Ménestrel » rapporte le programme dirigé par Adolf Mennerich, le samedi 3 décembre 1938, dans le cadre des « Concerts Padeloup » :

« Ce concert nous a valu d'entendre une pianiste fort remarquable : mademoiselle Nybia Bellini. Cette jeune virtuose, coiffée comme une infante de Velasquez et vêtue de rose, s'est jouée des difficultés du Concerto en mi bémol de Liszt avec une imperturbable Maîtrise qui mérite une sérieuse attention. Accompagnée avec beaucoup de précision et de tenue par monsieur Adolf Mennerich, qui dirigeait l'Orchestre, elle nous a donné de ce Concerto (beaucoup moins joué qu'on se plaît souvent à le dire) une interprétation d'un éclat, d'un charme, d'une puissance, d'une solidité rythmique qui justifient pleinement le succès dont elle a bénéficié. La plus dramatique des Polonaises, jouée en bis, est venue nous prouver que mademoiselle Nybia Bellini (quelle force augurale en ce nom) possède un souffle égal à son courage et à son talent.

La Ire Symphonie de Brahms, la préférée parfois des fanatiques du musicien de Hambourg, a mis efficacement en lumière les qualités du jeune chef d'orchestre munichois Adolf Mennerich, qualités que l'Ouverture du " Freischütz " et quelques fragments symphoniques des " Maîtres-chanteurs " donnés en tête de programme avaient fait pressentir. »

Eugen Jochum

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Eugen Jochum est né le 1er novembre 1902 à Babenhausen (Souabe) et est décédé le 26 mars 1987 à Munich. Il étudie le piano et l'orgue à Augsburg et la direction d'orchestre à Munich. Son 1er emploi est répétiteur de piano à l'Opéra de Munich, puis à Kiel. Il fait ses débuts de chef d'orchestre avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich en 1926 et, la même année, il est nommé directeur de la musique à Kiel. Puis, il dirige plusieurs orchestres, à Duisbourg, à la radio Berlinoise, à l'Opéra de Hambourg, où il travaille avec des compositeurs comme Paul Hindemith et Béla Bartók bannis ailleurs par les Nazis. Dès 1932, il effectue des concerts et des enregistrements avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, formation qu'il conduira régulièrement pendant plus de 50 ans en concert ou en tournée. Il forme plus tard l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise de Munich qu'il dirige de 1949 à 1960, puis rejoint l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam en lien avec le jeune Bernard Haitink. En 1969, il prend la direction de l'Orchestre symphonique de Bamberg jusqu'en 1973, tout en dirigeant souvent aux Festivals de Bayreuth et de Salzbourg. Il termine sa carrière de chef à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Londres en 1975, puis invité à la tête des prestigieuses phalanges européennes, notamment à Dresde et Amsterdam. Ses derniers enregistrements ont été réalisés avec les Orchestres de Bamberg et du Concertgebouw d'Amsterdam.

Catholique fervent, traditionaliste assumé, Eugen Jochum est considéré comme un spécialiste du répertoire austro-germanique, principalement symphonique, du XIXe siècle. Ses enregistrements des Symphonies et de la musique religieuse d'Anton Bruckner, dont il a été l'un des premiers champions fidèle aux versions originales, continuent de faire autorité. Les sommets de la discographie de Jochum se situent également du côté de ses enregistrements des Symphonies de Franz-Josef Haydn, des œuvres orchestrales de Johannes Brahms (y compris le fameux enregistrement des Concertos pour piano avec Emil Gilels), des œuvres vocales de Jean-Sébastien Bach et des lectures chaleureuses et vigoureuses des Opéras de Richard Wagner. Son frère Georg-Ludwig, moins connu, a été également chef d'orchestre en Allemagne et en Autriche où il a dirigé en particulier l'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz.

Dernier des grands chefs d'orchestre allemands formés dans la tradition Post-Romantique, Eugen Jochum naît à Babenhausen, en Bavière, le 1er novembre 1902. Les 3 frères Jochum feront carrière dans la musique : Otto Jochum (1898-1969) comme compositeur, Georg-Ludwig Jochum (1909-1970) comme chef d'orchestre. Eugen travaille d'abord le piano et l'orgue à Augsburg (1914-1922), puis il va étudier à l'Académie de musique de Munich, où il est l'élève de Siegmund von Hausegger (direction d'orchestre) et de Hermann von Waltershausen (composition). Munich deviendra son véritable foyer musical. Il y découvre, grâce à von Hausegger, la musique de Bruckner, dont la plupart des Symphonies avaient été créées par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Pendant la saison 1924-1925, il est répétiteur à l'Opéra de Munich puis occupe les mêmes fonctions à Mönchengladbach et à Kiel, en 1926, où il est nommé chef d'orchestre (1927-1929). Pour son 1er concert, en 1926, à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich, il dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner, qui deviendra son œuvre fétiche. Pendant qu'il est à Kiel, il dirige les concerts symphoniques à la « Musikverein » de Lübeck (où Wilhelm Fürtwängler et Hermann Abendroth avaient dirigé avant lui) puis est nommé à l'Opéra de Mannheim (1929-1930) avant de devenir directeur général de la musique à Duisbourg (1930-1932). En 1932, il est nommé directeur musical à la Radio de Berlin et il dirige régulièrement à l'Opéra. Mais il quitte la ville 2 ans plus tard devant la montée nazie. À Hambourg, il succède à Karl Böhm comme directeur général de la musique (1934-1949). Puis, en 1949, il est appelé à fonder l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio bavaroise à Munich, à la tête duquel il reste jusqu'en 1960 et qui devient, sous sa direction, l'un des meilleurs orchestres allemands. Entre 1961 et 1964, il partage avec le jeune Bernard Haitink la direction musicale de l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam.

En 1932, il est nommé directeur musical à la Radio de Berlin et il dirige régulièrement à l'Opéra. Mais il quitte la ville, 2 ans plus tard, devant la montée nazie. Entre 1961 et 1964, il partage avec Bernard Haitink la direction musicale de l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam. On le retrouve chef permanent de l'Orchestre symphonique de Bamberg (1969-1973) , formation avec laquelle il conservera des liens privilégiés jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, notamment lors de tournées dans le monde entier ; puis il sera chef d'orchestre « lauréat » de l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres (1975-1978) et restera en activité jusqu'à ses derniers jours. Il meurt à Munich, le 27 mars 1987. Il est le père de la pianiste Veronica Jochum (née en 1932) .

Parmi les dates importantes de sa carrière, il faut aussi retenir ses apparitions aux Festivals de Bayreuth (« Tristan und Isolde » , en 1953 ; « Tannhäuser » et « Lohengrin » , en 1954 ; « Parsifal » , en 1971-1973) et de Salzbourg. Homme du grand répertoire Romantique allemand, il mena une carrière discographique impressionnante qui avait débuté en 1932 par l'enregistrement d'un Concerto pour piano de Mozart avec Edwin Fischer. Il avait gravé 2 intégrales des Symphonies de Beethoven et, surtout, 2 intégrales des Symphonies de Bruckner, l'une avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio bavaroise, dans les années 1960 ; l'autre avec la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, à la fin des années 1970. À l'époque du disque 78 tours, il avait déjà enregistré les Symphonies numéros 4 et 5 à Hambourg, et la 7e avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Entre ces 2 intégrales, une autre version de la 5e, avec le « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam, sera publiée. Véritable Apôtre de cette musique, qu'il dirigeait toujours dans l'édition de Leopold Nowak, symbole d'une tradition héritée de von Hausegger, Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe (les brucknériens de la 1re génération) , qui délaissait le texte original rétabli par Robert (Maria) Haas, Jochum avait dirigé la 1re audition en France de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner, en 1969, avec l'Orchestre national.

Dans le domaine de la musique contemporaine, il avait créé la « Suite française » (1950) de Werner Egk, la Symphonie n° 6 (1953) de Karl Amadeus Hartmann, qui lui est dédiée, et le « Tanz Rondo » (1959) de Gottfried von Einem. Il fut également le 1er à enregistrer le fameux triptyque de Carl Orff : « Carmina Burana », « Catulli Carmina » et « le Triomphe d'Aphrodite » .

La direction d'Eugen Jochum était essentiellement instinctive. Il suffisait de voir cet homme grand, au regard malicieux, dont la robustesse physique trahissait des racines paysannes alors que toute son expression n'était que raffinement, pour comprendre qu'il se situait aux antipodes d'une approche intellectuelle. Ses convictions religieuses le guidaient naturellement vers la musique de Bach et de Bruckner. Mais le théâtre lui avait donné un instinct dramatique profond, un sens des progressions, un art de la fluctuation des tempi et du phrasé qui lui a d'ailleurs été largement reproché, à une époque où la rigueur était devenue la règle. Il changeait facilement de tempo au sein d'un même mouvement de Symphonie, ce qui convenait parfaitement bien à Bruckner, mais un tel procédé semblait archaïque chez Mozart ou Beethoven. Pourtant, il savait tirer de ces effets une tension dramatique issue en droite ligne de Furtwängler. Peu lui importaient les recherches historiques ou musicologiques : Jochum vivait dans son univers et le temps n'avait aucune prise sur lui. Titulaire des médailles Brahms et Bruckner, il avait été élu président de la section allemande de la Société Bruckner et avait reçu, en 1967, le « Würzburg Kulturpreis » .

The eminent German conductor Eugen Jochum was born on November 1st, 1902 to a Roman Catholic family in Babenhausen, near Augsburg (Schwaben) , Germany. His father was an organist and conductor. Jochum studied the piano and organ in Augsburg, enrolling in its Academy of Music from 1914 to 1922. He then studied at the Munich Conservatory, with his composition teacher being Hermann von Waltershausen. It was there that he changed his focus to conducting, his teacher being Siegmund von Hausegger, who conducted the 1st performance of the original version of the 9th Symphony of Anton Bruckner and made the 1st recording of it. Jochum's 1st post was as a rehearsal pianist at Mönchen-Gladbach, and then in Kiel.

Eugen Jochum made his conducting debut with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1926, in a program which included Bruckner's 7th Symphony. In the same year, he was appointed conductor at the Kiel Opera House, where he conducted 17 Operas in his 1st season, including « The Flying Dutchman » , « Der Rosenkavalier » and « Turandot » . After Kiel, he went to Mannheim, where Wilhelm Fürtwängler praised his conducting. He turned down an offer to conduct 12 concerts with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, believing that his repertory and experience were not yet equal to it. (He did not appear in America until 1958.) His next appointment was as music-director in Duisburg, from 1930 to 1932. In 1932, he became chief of the Berlin Radio Orchestra, also conducting 16 concerts a season with the Berlin Philharmonic, and at the « Deutsche Oper » . In 1934, Jochum succeeded Karl Böhm as musical director of the Hamburg State Opera and the Hamburg Philharmonic.

Throughout the Nazi era, Hamburg remained, as Jochum put it, « reasonably Liberal » , so that he was able to keep his post despite not joining the Party. He performed music by composers such as Paul Hindemith and Béla Bartók elsewhere banned by the Nazis. In the post-War Denazification initiatives, however, British and American authorities had a « high-level disagreement » over Jochum that was « an exception » to the usual pattern of British authorities following the American lead : after « initially clearing » Jochum and selecting him to conduct the Munich Philharmonic, in May 1945, the American authorities temporarily black listed him on grounds that he « had done exceptionally well » during the War and that his brothers had been « fanatical » Nazis ; but British authorities « found no fault » with Jochum, arguing that he had never been a member of the Nazi Party, SS or « Sturmabteilung » , had remained a « convinced Roman Catholic » , and had « not compromised his artistic integrity » . By 1948, the American authorities had determined that they could find no evidence of his joining any Nazi organizations.

Jochum continued to serve at Hamburg until 1949, when he left to become the 1st chief conductor of the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra. Jochum was also a regular guest-conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in Amsterdam, and served as the Orchestra's « 1st conductor » (« Eerste dirigent ») from 1941 to 1943, during the chief conductorship of Willem Mengelberg. From 1961 to 1963, Jochum was joint chief conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra alongside Bernard Haitink. He conducted frequently in London, with the London Philharmonic Orchestra and the London Symphony Orchestra. In 1975, the London Symphony Orchestra appointed him conductor laureate, a position he held until 1978. Jochum served as principal conductor of the Bamberg Symphony from 1969 to 1973. He later worked regularly with the « Staatskapelle Dresden » , with which he recorded the complete Symphonies of Bruckner and « London » Symphonies of Franz-Josef Haydn. He appeared regularly at the Salzburg Festival. He also, in 1953-1954 and 1971, conducted at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » ; he made his debut conducting « Tristan und Isolde » .

Jochum led the World premieres of various works, including the Concerto for Strings by Boris Blacher ; the « Concerte per il principe Eugenio » by Alberto Bruno Tedeschi ; the « Suite Française » by Werner Egk ; the « Tanz-Rondo » Opus 27 by Gottfried von Einem ; and the Symphony No. 6 by Karl Amadeus Hartmann.

Jochum was a regular recording artist, from his 1st records in 1932 (the Mozart D minor Piano Concerto with Edwin Fischer) . In the Stereo LP era, he recorded mainly for Deutsche Grammophon. His « DG » cycle of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner, split between the Berlin Philharmonic and Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, has remained in the record catalogs ever since its 1st issue in the 1960's. This cycle and a later Jochum Bruckner cycle, with the « Staatskapelle Dresden » for « EMI » , have been widely and frequently acclaimed and have caused his name to be especially associated with this composer. In addition, he was president of the International Bruckner Society from 1950, and wrote extensively about Bruckner interpretation.

Still, according to his « New York Times » obituary, he said in a 1983 interview :

« Today, everyone thinks of me as a specialist in Bruckner's Symphonies. But I began with the music of Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. And it is to their music that I still feel closest. »

His recordings of Bach's Mass in B minor and of the « Saint-John Passion » are frequently counted among the finest of these works to use large choral and orchestral forces. His 3 complete recordings of the Beethoven Symphonies have also received strong praise : they were made with the Berlin Philharmonic and Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra in the 1950's for Deutsche Grammophon, with the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in the late-1960's for Philips, and with the London Symphony Orchestra in the 1970's for « EMI » . Jochum also made 2 complete recordings of the Symphonies of Johannes Brahms, one with the Berlin Philharmonic in the mid-1950's, the other with the London Philharmonic, in 1977. On the strengths of these sets, the conductor Kenneth Woods called him « the greatest Brahms conductor who ever lived » . He also recorded the Brahms Piano Concertos with Emil Gilels, a recording that is often listed among the finest made of these works.

His recordings of Mozart, Haydn, Schumann, Wagner and Carl Orff have also been highly-praised. His 1967 recording of « Carmina Burana » is considered by Bill Alford to be an authoritative interpretation, as Orff himself was present at the recording and endorsed the final record.

Regarding his podium technique, Kenneth Woods blogs, « Look at his hands ; very small and focused motions but so powerful » . Woods also states that, « his sense of rubato, while still incredibly daring, is perhaps more un-erring than that of even Wilhelm Fürtwängler » .

Eugen Jochum's older brother Otto Jochum (1898-1969) was a composer and choral conductor ; his younger brother Georg-Ludwig Jochum (1909-1970) was, like Jochum, an orchestral conductor. His daughter Veronica Jochum is a pianist on the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music in Boston, Massachusetts. Jochum died on 26 March 1987 in Munich, at the age of 84. His wife Maria predeceased him, in 1985.

Eugen Jochum (geboren 1. November 1902 in Babenhausen im Unterallgäu ; gestorben 26. März 1987 in München) war ein deutscher Dirigent und zählt zu den bekanntesten Interpreten der Werke Anton Bruckners.

Der Sohn eines Lehrers, Organisten, Chorregenten und Leiters des Orchester- und Theatervereins wuchs in einem katholischen Elternhaus zusammen mit seinen Brüdern Otto und Georg-Ludwig auf. Bereits mit vier Jahren erhielt er den ersten Klavier- und mit sechs den ersten Orgelunterricht; mit neun half er in den Kirchen seiner Heimat aus. Auf diese Weise entstand der ursprüngliche Berufswunsch Kirchenmusiker. Er studierte zunächst am Augsburger Leopold-Mozart-Konservatorium (Orgel, Klavier) und von 1922 bis 1925 an der Münchner Musikakademie bei Siegmund von Hausegger und Hermann von Waltershausen Orchesterleitung und Komposition und bei Emanuel Gatscher Orgel. Daneben arbeitete er als Korrepetitor an der Münchner Oper.

Sein erfolgreiches Debüt als Dirigent am 16. März 1926 mit den Münchner Philharmonikern mit Bruckners 7. Sinfonie bestimmte dann seinen weiteren Lebensweg. Erste Engagements als Kapellmeister führten ihn nach Mönchengladbach, an das Opernhaus Kiel (1927-1929) , und nach Lübeck, wo er die Leitung der Sinfoniekonzerte des Vereins der Musikfreunde übernahm, und an das Nationaltheater Mannheim. 1930-1932 hatte er den Posten eines Generalmusikdirektors am Theater Duisburg und bei den Duisburger Sinfonikern, den er 1932-1934 auch bei der Städtischen Oper Berlin innehatte. Dazu war Jochum musikalischer Leiter der Sendung « Funkstunde » , dirigierte die

Berliner Philharmoniker und beim Sender Berlin. Als Nachfolger von Karl Böhm war er von 1934 bis 1949 Generalmusikdirektor der Hamburgischen Staatsoper und Leiter des Philharmonischen Orchesters.

Während der NS-Zeit trat er mehrmals bei Konzerten im Rahmen von Veranstaltungen der NSDAP sowie in besetzten Gebieten auf, war aber selbst kein Parteimitglied. So dirigierte er mit dem Philharmonischen Staatsorchester Hamburg Konzerte zu Hitlers Geburtstag 1933 und beim Besuch Hitlers am 17. August 1934 in Hamburg Arno Parduns Kampflied Volk ans Gewehr. Am 15. Januar 1935 leitete Jochum « in Anbetracht der nationalen Bedeutung » des Tages der Saarabstimmung ein Konzert der Berliner Philharmoniker. Am 24. November 1936 dirigierte der in diesem Jahr von Hitler zum Staatskapellmeister ernannte Jochum für die DAF die Münchner Philharmoniker im I. KdF-Konzert. Weitere KdF-Konzerte leitete er am 6. Februar und 12. Oktober 1938 in Berlin. Zum Tag der « Deutschen Kunst » gab er am 15. Juli 1939 ein Konzert am Münchner Königsplatz. In die von der deutschen Wehrmacht besetzten Gebiete unternahm er 1941 eine Tournee mit den Berliner Philharmonikern und konzertierte in Brüssel und Paris. 1943 dirigierte er in Paris ein Konzert des Konservatoriumsorchesters. Andererseits gelang es ihm auch gegen den politischen Druck Werke der vom Regime verfeimten Komponisten wie Béla Bartók, Paul Hindemith oder Igor Strawinski aufzuführen, zumindest bis Ende der 1930er-Jahre. Jochums Name steht in der im August 1944 von Hitler genehmigten Gottbegnadeten-Liste.

1949 gründete er das Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks, das er bis 1960 auch leitete und zu einem der führenden Orchester Deutschlands machte, daneben trat er oft als Gastdirigent an der Münchner Oper auf. Zu den Bayreuther Festspielen wurde er in den Jahren 1953 für Tristan, 1954 für Lohengrin und Tannhäuser und 1971 bis 1973 für Parsifal eingeladen.

Nach seiner Tätigkeit in München teilte er sich 1960 bis 1963 mit Bernard Haitink die Führung des Concertgebouw-Orchesters in Amsterdam, mit dem er 1961 eine zweimonatige vielumjubelte Konzertreise durch die USA unternahm. Als Nachfolger Joseph Keilberths hatte er ab 1969 die künstlerische Leitung der Bamberger Symphoniker inne, deren Chefdirigent er von 1971 bis 1973 war und die ihn zu ihrem Ehrendirigenten ernannten. In den 1960er und 1970er Jahren gastierte er auch vielfach an der Deutschen Oper in Berlin, an der Bayerischen Staatsoper und der Wiener Staatsoper. Jochum zählte in jenen Jahren zu den bekanntesten Dirigenten und wurde von allen führenden Orchestern der Welt verpflichtet.

Eugen Jochum, einer der herausragenden Dirigenten des 20. Jahrhunderts, war noch vom Ende der deutschen Romantik beeinflusst. Neben den von ihm besonders geschätzten Komponisten wie Johann Sebastian Bach, Franz-Josef Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms und Wagner galt seine Vorliebe hauptsächlich dem Werk von Bruckner. Er widmete sich dabei auch den Chorwerken und spielte zwischen 1959 und 1967 erstmals alle neun Sinfonien Bruckners auf Schallplatte ein, die erstmals Ende 1967 als Subskriptionsausgabe und ein weiteres Mal 1973 von der Deutschen Grammophon im Rahmen ihrer 75-Jahr-Jubiläumsedition in einer Kassette als Gesamtaufnahme erschienen. Bei seinen Interpretationen bevorzugte er Originalfassungen in der Notenedition von Leopold Nowak, da « die Brucknerschen Symphonien nur in der ursprünglichen Form möglich sind ». Ab 1950 war er auch Präsident der deutschen Sektion der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft. Dem Musikschaffen des 20. Jahrhunderts konnte Jochum nur wenig abgewinnen (« Das widerspricht allen meinen Vorstellungen von Musik »), war aber nicht allem verschlossen. Neben den von ihm auch aufgenommenen Werken Orffs (Carmina Burana, Catulli Carmina) und Höllers (Sinfonische Fantasie, Sweelinck-Variationen) zählen zu den unter seiner Leitung stattgefundenen Uraufführungen folgende Kompositionen : Blachers Konzert für Streicher (1942) , Egks Suite française (1950) , Alberto Bruno Tedeschis Concerto per il principe Eugenio (1951) , Hartmanns 6. Sinfonie (24. April 1953) und Einems Tanz-Rondo Opus 27 (13. November 1959) , die beiden letztgenannten Werke jeweils mit dem Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks in München.

« Meine musikalische Begabung betrachte ich als Geschenk von oben. Ich möchte, daß sie nie Selbstzweck werde, und ich glaube, daß ich die Aufgabe habe zu dienen - Medium zu sein für die Gedanken der großen Meister, die ihrerseits Gedanken des höchsten Wesens aussprechen. » (Eugen Jochum)

From 1915 to 1923, he studied his « humanities » at the College of the Cloister of the Benedictine Monks (« Benediktinerklosters Metten ») . From 1923 to 1928, he attended philosophical and theological studies in Regensburg. He was ordained priest in 1928. 1928-1929, he moved to Kaplan, Kulmain. From 1929 to 1933, he studied at the State Academy of Fine-Arts and at the Ludwig Maximilian's University, in Munich (church music with Ludwig Berberich ; composition with Joseph Haas ; music science with Gustav Friedrich Schmidt and Rudolf von Ficker) . He graduated in 1933. In 1933-1934, he became Prefect and Lecturer at the Church School of Music in Regensburg.

Karl Förster led the Choir of Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral, in Berlin, from 1934 to 1963, as « Große Kapellmeister » . In 1951, Förster became Papal Secret Treasurer and, in 1961, Papal House Honorary Prelate. From 1952 to 1963, he was director of music studies at the Free and Technical University of Berlin and directed the College of Music, there. In 1953, Förster had already receive the Music Prize of the City of Berlin.

Karl Förster presented the newly-formed Boy's Choir (almost 60 members) of the Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral. At the same time, the mixed-choir (of around 35 members) continued to perform. Both choirs became detached from the religious service at the Cathedral, joining forces to give impressive concerts at the Philharmonic Hall. Even during hard times, the work with the Choir of Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral meant everything for Förster : it was his great passion. The members of the Choir sacrificed all their energy, regardless of the ever more unfavorable socio-political context within the singing community. Above all, the Boy's Choir suffered the effects of the National-Socialist policy and, finally, the War. In 1943, due to Nazi anti-clerical ideology, the ensemble was forbidden to perform. The conclusion came in 1943 with the destruction of the Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral.

The Choir of Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral ceased its official activities after Berlin was destroyed. In July 1945, the Choir sang its inaugural post-War concert at the new Berlin Broadcasting House. On September 1945, it offered its inaugural post-War « a cappella » concert. As the only « surviving » vocal ensemble in Berlin, it sang the Masterpieces of the choral literature at sacred services and public concerts. It became essentially the spritual ambassador of the City. With the establishment of the German Democratic Republic (GDR) when Berlin became the « 4 sector territory » , the Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral fell into the East-sector. From now on, the Choir was attached to the « Johannes-Basilika » , in Kreuzberg ; the rehearsals took place in the hall of Saint-Clemens Church. With time, the choirists (originating from the East-sector) became more and more restrained in their movements. After the erection of the Berlin Wall, on 13 August 1961, it was impossible for them to participate to rehearsals and performances in West-Berlin. But with its countless broadcasting events, concert tours and, above all, commercial recordings (which belonged to the highest-level of performance and production) , the Choir was able to restore the luster of Berlin. Because its repertoire was large enough, the concerts of the Choir of Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral became a permanent constituent of the city's whole music life. From the old Masters and the Classical composers, up to the Modern ones like : Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schoenberg, Paul Hindemith, Luigi Dallapiccola, Boris Blacher and Benjamin Britten.

Förster emphasized on strict Bach's programmes. He developed his Choir-style on pure « a cappella » tradition, which is characterized by great objectivity of lecture. His creative inspiration originated from his qualities as a great artist, a devoted priest and an exceptional human being. He understood the liturgical character of the choral repertoire and successfully transposed it to the concert-hall. The high-point of his career (and the Choir of Saint-Hedwig's Cathedral) was a performance during a private audience with Pope Johannes XXIII, in May 1961. Since the Renaissance period, it was the 1st time that a concert in the private room of the Vatican took place.

Karl Förster's implication with the modern medias of broadcasting and recording determined another page of his legacy. Particularly during the recording sessions of great sacred music works, he left a impressive stylistic testimony : from the Gregorian and Netherlands polyphony, the sacred works of Anton Bruckner, to Edward Elgar's « Dream of Gerontius » , Igor Stravinsky's « Symphony of Psalms » , Béla Bartók's « Cantata Profana » , and Luigi Dallapiccola's « Canti di Prigionia » .

Karl Förster (geboren 1904 in Großklenau bei Tirschenreuth / Oberpfalz ; gestorben 1963 in Tirschenreuth) zählte zu den herausragendsten Persönlichkeiten Berlins nach dem 2. Weltkrieg. In seiner oberpfälzischen Heimat aufgewachsen (ihr blieb er sein Leben lang aufs engste verbunden) , übernahm Förster nach Studien in Regensburg und München 1934 in Berlin den Chor der Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedrale. Diesen führte er durch die schwere Zeit der Nationalsozialismus und schuf ihn nach 1945 über den liturgischen Dienst hinaus zu einem Konzert- und Oratorienchor von internationaler Geltung. Wenngleich im Laufe der Jahre auch immer mehr von seiner Ost-Berliner Mutterkirche getrennt, wuchs der Chor zu einem Kraftfeld des Berliner Musiklebens und wurde zu einem der stärksten und überzeugendsten Symbole für den künstlerischen Lebenswillen des neuen, auf utopischen Grundlagen gebauten Berlin.

Der Päpstliche Geheimkämmerer und Päpstliche Hausprälat Doktor Karl Förster, Universitätsmusikdirektor der Freien und Technischen Universität Berlin, wurde 1953 mit dem Berliner Musikpreis ausgezeichnet. Der bei aller geistigen Aktivität schlichte, der heiteren Sinnhaftigkeit der Musik zugetane Künstler zeugte für die Weltoffenheit der Kirche. Er wirkte auch selbst als Komponist und hinterließ zahlreiche Rundfunk und Schallplattenaufnahmen mit seinem Chor, die inzwischen auf Compact Disc wiederveröffentlicht werden.

Alban Berg completed the orchestration of only the 1st 2 Acts of his later 3 Act Opera, « Lulu » , before he died. The 1st 2 Acts were successfully premiered on 2 June 1937 at the « Stadttheater » in Zürich but, for personal reasons, Helene Berg subsequently imposed a ban on any attempt to « complete » the final Act, which Berg had in fact completed in particello (short-score) format. An orchestration was, therefore, commissioned in secret from Friedrich Cerha and premiered in Paris (under the baton of Pierre Boulez) only in 1979, soon after Helene Berg's own death. The complete Opera has rapidly entered the repertoire as one of the landmarks of contemporary music and, like « Wozzeck » , remains a consistent audience draw.

Heinz Schubert

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Heinz (Richard) Schubert est né le 8 avril 1908 à Dessau et est mort en 1945, au combat.

Schubert a étudié à Dessau auprès de Franz von Hœßlin et Arthur Seidl, ainsi qu'à Munich auprès de Hugo Röhr et Heinrich Kaminski. De 1926 à 1929, il a été assistant de Siegmund von Hausegger et Joseph Haas à l'« Akademie der Tonkunst » de Munich.

En 1929, Schubert devient chef aux Théâtres de Dortmund et d'Hildesheim. Après la « Machtergreifung » (prise du pouvoir) des Nazis, en 1933, il est entré au NSDAP (numéro 3.119.361) et est devenu, la même année, chef à Flensburg.

Bien que, comme chef d'orchestre à l'époque du Nazisme, il aurait pu poursuivre une carrière brillante, à l'exemple de Kaminski, il a refusé dans son travail de compositeur de faire des concessions au pouvoir en place. Cependant, il a continué à diriger la musique de Kaminski, alors que ce dernier avait été déclaré demi-Juif avec interdiction de l'interpréter. Schubert s'est trouvé de plus en plus en situation difficile dans les années 1940 à cause de la distance qu'il avait prise à l'égard du régime, alors que jusqu'au début de la Guerre, il a été relativement à l'abri grâce à l'influence de Wilhelm Furtwängler. La dernière année de la Guerre, Schubert a été incorporé dans la « Volkssturm » . Les dernières nouvelles que nous avons de lui, remontent au 28 février 1945. Il est probablement tombé lors de la bataille de l'Oder. Officiellement, il est porté disparu à la fin de 1945 et a été déclaré mort le 31 décembre 1945.

Heinz Richard Schubert (geboren 8. April 1908 in Dessau ; gestorben 1945) war ein deutscher Komponist und Dirigent.

Schubert studierte in Dessau bei Franz von Hœßlin und Arthur Seidl und in München bei Hugo Röhr und Heinrich Kaminski. Von 1926 bis 1929 war er Meisterschüler bei Siegmund von Hausegger und Joseph Haas an der Münchner Akademie der Tonkunst.

1929 wurde Schubert Theaterkapellmeister in Dortmund und Hildesheim, Nach der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten 1933 trat er der NSDAP bei (Parteinummer 3.119.361) und wurde noch im selben Jahr Kapellmeister in Flensburg. 1936 wurde sein Oratorium Das ewige Reich auf einen Text von Wilhelm Raabe für Bariton, Männerchor und Orgel, ein Auftragswerk anlässlich der Reichstagung der Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde, uraufgeführt. Von 1938 bis 1945 war er (mit einer Unterbrechung 1942, wo er in Münster wirkte) Städtischer Musikdirektor und Musikalischer Oberleiter am Theater in Rostock.

Obwohl er als Dirigent in der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus eine erfolgreiche Karriere machen konnte, verweigerte Heinz Schubert, darin seinem Vorbild Kaminski folgend, im kompositorischen Schaffen Konzessionen an die Machthaber. Außerdem dirigierte er auch dann noch Musik von Kaminski, nachdem dieser als vermeintlicher « Halbjude » mit einem Aufführungsverbot belegt worden war.

Schubert geriet in den 40er Jahren durch seine innere Distanz zum Regime immer stärker in Bedrängnis, jedoch blieb er vor allem durch den Einfluß seines Förderers Wilhelm Furtwängler bis kurz vor Kriegsende weitgehend unbehelligt. So brachte Furtwängler in Konzerten der Berliner Philharmoniker zwei Werke Schuberts zur Aufführung ; am 5. Februar 1939 Schuberts Präludium und Toccata für Streichorchester und am 6. Dezember 1942 Schuberts Hymnisches Konzert für Sopran, Tenor, Orgel und Orchester.

Im letzten Kriegsjahr wurde Schubert zum Volkssturm eingezogen und war zuletzt als Kanonier bei der Einheit Feldpostnummer 44.380C registriert. Seine letzte Nachricht stammt vom 28. Februar 1945. Er fiel vermutlich bei der Schlacht im Oderbruch. Offiziell gilt er seit Ende 1945 als vermisst und wurde zum 31. Dezember 1945 für tot erklärt.

Nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges geriet sein Werk weitgehend in Vergessenheit. Die meisten Partitурhandschriften Schuberts waren zudem durch Kriegseinwirkungen vernichtet worden.

Zu den wenigen zeitgenössischen Aufnahmen gehören zwei Schallplattenaufnahmen der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft aus dem Jahr 1940 mit den Berliner Philharmonikern unter der Leitung des Komponisten : eine Einspielung von Präludium und Toccata für Streichtrio und doppeltes Streichorchester mit Erich Röhn, Violine, Reinhard Wolf, Viola und Tibor de Machula, Cello, und eine Einspielung der Concertanten Suite für Violine und Kammerorchester mit dem Geiger Heinz Stanske sowie eine Rundfunk-Aufnahme seines Hymnischen Konzertes als Konzertmitschnitt mit den Berliner Philharmonikern, der Sopranistin Erna Berger, dem Tenor Walther Ludwig und dem Organisten Fritz Heitmann unter dem Dirigat Wilhelm Furtwänglers vom Dezember 1942. Der Bayerische Rundfunk produzierte dann in den siebziger Jahren noch das Ambrosianische Konzert mit dem Pianisten Gerhard Puchelt.

Im Zuge der Wiederentdeckung von Komponisten wie Heinrich Kaminski und Reinhard Schwarz-Schilling erhielt in jüngster Zeit auch das Werk Schuberts späte Anerkennung, was sich und andere in Neudrucken mehrerer Kompositionen niederschlug.

29 et 30 décembre 1937 : In Berlin, the Prisca String Quartet with Siegfried Meincke (viola) record for the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » (in Room VIII, on « Lützowstraße Nr. 111 ») the String Quintet in F major by Anton Bruckner.

The members of the Prisca Quartet on this recording are : Walter Schulze-Prisca and Heinz Schkommodan (violins) ; Carl Eugen Körner (viola) ; and Hans Münch-Holland (cello) . Münch-Holland also played on a competing recording of the Bruckner Quintet, by the Strub Quartet on « Electrola » , made a few years later.

Issued in October 1938, in Germany, as « Grammophon » 15165 through 15170 ; in Italy, as « Cetra » OR-5117 through OR-5122 ; and, in England, as « Decca » X-220 through X-225. The set was deleted by June, 1946.

The recording was issued as 12 inch records.

Side 10 (Matrix 553 1/2 G0) : Movement IV (Finale) , Part 2.

Side 11 (554 1/2 GO) : Movement IV (Finale) , Part 3.

In order to get the Scherzo on I side, a cut of 20 bars (measures 63 to 82) is made (as authorized in the score) , the repeat in the Trio is not taken, and the return of the Scherzo after the Trio begins at letter G (measure 83) . A similarly authorized cut in the 1st movement, however, is not taken.

The filler, recorded October 4, 1937 on matrix 723 1/2 GS, was the Serenade from Haydn's Quartet in F, Op. 3, No. 5. The Decca label erroneously credits Meincke, the second violist in the Quintet, as playing on this piece.

The Prisca Quartet, which appears to have been based in Cologne, also made several recordings of complete String Quartets for the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » during the 1930's :

Beethoven's String Quartet, Opus 59, No. 2.

Haydn's String Quartet, Opus 76, No. 4.

Mozart's String Quartets K. 428, 499 and 575.

Schubert's early String Quartet No. 4 in C.

Verdi's String Quartet E minor.

A peculiarity of most of these sets is that they were in the smaller 10 inch size, even the Beethoven (on 6 discs !).

Artur Rodziński

Le chef d'orchestre polonais Artur Rodziński est né le 1er janvier 1892 à Spalato, la capitale de la Dalmatie (plus tard, Split, en Yougoslavie), et est mort le 27 novembre 1958 à Boston.

Il grandit à Lviv (alors en Autriche-Hongrie, aujourd'hui en Ukraine) où il étudie le droit à l'Université. En 1914, toute la famille déménage à Vienne, où conjointement à ses études, Rodziński entre à l'Académie de musique de Vienne. Il apprend le piano auprès d'Emil Sauer, la composition avec Franz Schreker et la direction avec Franz Schalk. En 1916, il devient docteur en droit.

Après la Première Guerre mondiale, il retourne à Lviv devenue polonaise, et devient chef d'orchestre avec son 1er Opéra dirigé, « Ernani » de Giuseppe Verdi. En 1920, il est engagé au Grand Théâtre de Varsovie.

Il décide de rejoindre les États-Unis pour travailler avec le déjà célèbre Leopold Stokowski à Philadelphie, de 1925 à 1929. Il devient ensuite chef de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles pendant 4 ans, puis de l'Orchestre de Cleveland pendant 10 ans.

En 1935, il réalise la première américaine de l'Opéra « Lady Macbeth de Mtsensk » de Dmitri Chostakowitch dont il est un interprète inspiré. Un enregistrement de la 5e Symphonie du compositeur russe avec le « Cleveland Orchestra » est également à connaître pour ses tempos diaboliques.

En 1937, il participe, à New York, à la fondation de l'Orchestre symphonique de la « NBC » qu'il prépare pour Arturo Toscanini.

En 1943, il est appelé à la direction du prestigieux Orchestre philharmonique de New York avant de terminer sa carrière à Chicago, en 1947.

The Polish conductor of Opera and Symphonic music Artur Rodziński was born on January 1, 1892, in Spalato, the capital of Dalmatia (later, Split in Yugoslavia) ; and died on November 27, 1958. He is especially noted for his tenures as music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic in the 1930's and 1940's.

Soon after his birth, his father, of Polish descent, and a general in the army of the Habsburg Empire returned with his family to Lwów, Poland. Artur studied music in Lwów, and then law in Vienna, where he simultaneously enrolled at the Academy of Music ; his teachers there included Josef Marx and Franz Schreker (composition) , Franz Schalk (conducting) , and Emil von Sauer and Jerzy Lalewicz (piano) . He returned to Lwów where he was engaged as chorus Master at the Opera House, making his debut as a conductor, in 1920, with Giuseppe Verdi's « Ernani » . The following year saw him conducting the Warsaw Philharmonic Orchestra and at the Warsaw Opera House. While visiting Poland, Leopold Stokowski heard Rodziński leading a performance of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » and exclaimed : « I have found that rare thing, a born conductor ! » , and invited him to conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Between 1925 and 1929, he served as Stokowski's assistant, conducted for the Philadelphia Grand Opera and directed the Opera and orchestral departments at the Curtis Institute of Music. From 1929 to 1933, Rodziński became the music-director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, garnering praise not only for his interpretations but for his innovative programming. From 1933 to 1943, he was music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra, developing it into one of the foremost Orchestras in America. He engaged new musicians and raised the playing standards to a very high-level. His programs were innovative, offering works such as the 1st performance in America of Dimitri Shostakovich's Opera « Lady Macbeth of the Mtsensk District » , which gained the Orchestra national attention. Between December 1939 and February 1942, Rodziński and the Cleveland Orchestra made an extensive series of recordings for the « Columbia Records » label.

During this time, he appeared with the New York Philharmonic, in 1934 and 1937, when his concert performance of Richard Strauß's « Elektra » (which was recorded) aroused great enthusiasm. Rodziński was also active in Europe, becoming the 1st naturalized American citizen to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic at the Salzburg Festival, in 1936 and 1937. At Arturo Toscanini's recommendation, Rodziński was engaged by the « NBC » to select the musicians for the new « NBC » Symphony Orchestra. He rigorously trained the Orchestra and conducted its 1st concerts in 1937, before the arrival of Toscanini.

Rodziński was appointed music-director of the New York Philharmonic, in 1943. Though his 4 year tenure was marked by struggles with Arthur Judson, the powerful manager of the Orchestra, Rodziński achieved high-standards of performance. The renowned music-critic and composer Virgil Thomson wrote about Rodziński's tenure at the Philharmonic : « We now have an Orchestra that is a joy to hear and we owe it all to Artur Rodziński. » . During Rodziński's time on the podium, the Philharmonic recorded extensively, again for « Columbia » , performed weekly live broadcasts on « CBS » Radio, and appeared in the feature film « Carnegie Hall » .

However, despite the quality of the Orchestra's performances, numerous artistic matters such as the prerogative of the music-director to dismiss musicians, select soloists and determine repertoire were persistent grounds of contention. Not willing to compromise on these matters, Rodziński resigned in 1947. His reputation as a conductor was so prominent at this time that his resignation was the subject of a cover story in « Time » magazine, in February 1947.

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra had been wooing Rodziński for some time and, now, he decided to immediately accept the leadership of that Orchestra starting with the 1947-1948 season. Here again, an inability to work with the Board resulted in his swift departure after only 1 season. His short tenure still had a significant impact upon the Orchestra and local audiences through performances such as a legendary account of Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » with Kirsten Flagstad.

After his departure from Chicago, Rodziński's health began to deteriorate. There was little recording activity available to him in the United States and he settled in Europe once more. Here, his status as a major musician was recognized and he was invited to lead significant productions, such as the 1953 1st performance of Sergei Prokofiev's « War and Peace » at the « Maggio Musicale » in Florence, as well as traditional repertoire works. He conducted at « La Scala » and also worked extensively for Italian radio, conducting well received readings of Wagner's « Tannhäuser » and « Tristan » , and Modeste Mussorgsky's « Boris Godunov » and « Khovanshchina » . He re-established his presence as a recording artist through a contract with « Westminster Records » , for whom he recorded extensively with Royal Philharmonic Orchestra in London from 1955. His final recordings were for « EMI » , in 1958.

By this time, Rodziński's health was fragile. He was warned by his Italian doctor that further conducting activity would put his life at risk. However, he returned to Chicago, in 1958, to conduct « Tristan » once again, this time with the Chicago Lyric Opera and soprano Birgit Nilsson. His return was a triumph, but these were his last performances and he died shortly afterwards.

Rodziński was married twice and had 2 sons. In 1917, he married the concert pianist Madame Ilse and, in 1918, they had a son, Witold Rodziński, who became an historian, sinologist and diplomat. In 1934, while living in Cleveland, he married Halina Lilpop Wieniawski (1905-1993) , who was from a well-known Warsaw family. Their son Richard as an infant was the subject of Arnold Schönberg's amusing canon : « I am almost sure, when your nurse will change your diapers. » . Richard served as artistic administrator at the San Francisco Opera and Metropolitan Opera companies in the 1960's and 1970's. He retired from his position as president of the Van Cliburn Foundation and in 2009 became the General Director of the International Tchaïkovsky Competition. In 1976, Halina Rodziński wrote an autobiography, « Our Two Lives » , which is still the most extensive published account of Rodziński's life and career.

Rodziński recorded for « Columbia Records » (with the Cleveland Orchestra and the New York Philharmonic) ; « RCA

Victor » (with the Chicago Symphony) ; « Westminster Records » (with the Royal Philharmonic) ; and « EMI » . A few of his later recordings were taped in stereo and have remained in circulation to this day. His complete recording of Tchaïkovsky's « The Nutcracker » for « Westminster » was recorded in stereo, in 1956. The stereo version was originally released as a 2 track reel-to-reel audio-tape recording but, on LP, it was released only in mono, as stereo record albums were not yet possible in 1956. The recording recently was made available in stereo on CD. Live recordings of some of his broadcast performances with the New York Philharmonic and the « RAI » Radio Italiana Orchestra have also become available on independent labels.

Artur Rodziński was one of the most important conductors in the United States during his time.

His father was an army surgeon. Artur received his early musical training in Lwow. He found himself attracted to a career in music, but he studied law in Vienna, at the same time pursuing musical studies privately, including conducting with Franz Schalk.

After World War I military service, he returned to Lwow as a choral conductor. In 1920, he conducted at the Opera, debuting in Verdi's « Ernani » . In Warsaw, he gave the Polish premieres of Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » , Maurice Ravel's « L'heure espagnole » , and Ermanno Wolf-Ferrari's « I gioielli della madonna » . He also conducted orchestral concerts.

Leopold Stokowski invited him to come to Philadelphia to guest conduct in November 1925 and hired him as assistant conductor, starting in 1926. Rodziński, at the same time, joined the faculty of the Curtis Institute of Music as head of the Opera and orchestral departments.

He was appointed music-director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic in 1929, and of the Cleveland Orchestra in 1933, beginning its rise as a top-rank ensemble. He made some notable recordings, particularly of Dimitri Shostakovich Symphonies, and gave the American premiere of the same composer's Opera « Lady Macbeth of Mtsensk » , in 1935. He made sensational appearances with the New York Philharmonic, and in Salzburg and Vienna.

In 1937, the « NBC » Broadcasting Network formed its own Symphony Orchestra and hired Arturo Toscanini to lead it. Rodziński was given the job of actually choosing, assembling, and training the musicians. Rodziński understood that Toscanini, who was stepping down from his leadership of the New York Philharmonic to take the « NBC » job, would see Rodziński appointed as his successor.

But the manager, Arthur Judson, had his own candidate, John Barbirolli, who got the job. A faction of the Orchestra and audience (not to mention critics) who favored Rodziński made Barbirolli's tenure unusually difficult. Barbirolli left at an urgent request to take over Manchester's Hallé Orchestra, and Rodziński was hired at the Philharmonic in 1942. His 1st action was to fire 14 members of the Orchestra, including the concert Master. When his contract was up, in 1947, he raised some issues of policy that he knew Judson would oppose, then confronted the Board with the proposition that it was him or Judson. While this was going on, word got-out that he was secretly negotiating to take over the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and the Board had no trouble choosing Judson.

He only conducted in Chicago for 1 season. The Board there fired him for arbitrarily making last-minute program changes causing confusion and expense and doing Opera concerts, with the additional unauthorized expense of bringing in the singers. However, one of these was a « Tristan » that was legendary and brought Kirsten Flagstad back to the United States.

After he was dismissed, he guest conducted, especially in Latin America, but ill health curtailed his activities. He is credited not only with building the Cleveland Orchestra, but immediately restoring the New York Philharmonic and Chicago Symphony from periods of decline.

Artur Rodziński knew how to build great Orchestras. In the 1930's, he had shaped the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Cleveland Orchestra, and prepared the NBC Symphony for Arturo Toscanini. When Rodziński assumed the leadership of the New York Philharmonic, in 1943 (after 2 seasons of guest-conductors) , he was given the newly created title of Musical Director, which underscored his responsibility for season programming and for the overall structure of the Orchestra. He promptly dismissed 14 players, including the concert Master. This increased tension between him and Arthur Judson, the Philharmonic's manager (their relationship during Rodziński's 4 year tenure was often stormy) but resulted in an Orchestra that played with renewed brilliance.

Rodziński favored a clean sound and his conductorial gestures reflected this by being straightforward, streamlined, and modern. This suited his choice of repertoire, and Rodziński often championed new American music. During his brief tenure, 19 American compositions were given their world premieres, including works by Roy Harris, Walter Piston, William Grant Still, and Lukas Foss. Rodziński also had a fondness for American popular music. He conducted the premiere of the Violin Concerto by Vladimir Dukelsky (aka Vernon Duke) and commissioned and premiered Jerome Kern's Scenario for Orchestra on Themes from « Show Boat » .

During Rodziński's term, the New York Philharmonic's budget 1st topped the $ 1,000,000 mark. The Orchestra also expanded its CBS radio broadcasts to include the summer months, making them a household event every Sunday afternoon of the year.

« Le texte de la plaquette de Leopold Nowak, écrit en 1951, situe bien l'importance historique de Hausegger, pionnier (en 1932) du retour à la partition originale de la 9e, ignorant les surcharges de Ferdinand Löwe et devenant ainsi le 1er d'une longue lignée de chefs. Hausegger ouvrit la voie à l'interprétation brucknérienne moderne. Hausegger joue davantage sur la ligne et la phrase que sur les masses sonores et caractérise parfaitement les changements rythmiques et dynamiques. Certes, le 1er mouvement n'apporte pas réellement un éclairage nouveau, mais l'accélération post-introductive, cultivée par Fürtwängler, semble être une idée de Hausegger et les équilibres orchestraux dans la préparation de la Coda sont idéaux. La véritable « dimension supérieure », nous l'abordons à partir du 2e mouvement, nerveux et sec et dans un « Finale » d'une beauté étreignante, avec une simplicité (voire une austérité) de moyens confondante. Pour ces 2 mouvements-là, les collectionneurs brucknériens ne voudront pas manquer cet hommage majeur. » (Christophe Huss, Répertoire n° 66)

Anton Bruckner - Symphony No. 9, Munich Philharmonic Orchestra / Siegmund von Hausegger (« Preiser » Records, Vienna ; CD : PR90148) .

This recording should be of especial interest to all Brucknerians, as it is of a performance by the conductor who gave the 1st performance, in Munich on April 2nd, 1932, of the original version of the score. That performance made a strong and moving impression on the specially invited audience who heard it and it revealed, for the 1st time, the true, authentic character of Bruckner's orchestral scoring, freed at long last from the alterations and modifications perpetrated, in the case of the 9th, by Ferdinand Löwe, who gave the 1st performance of his revised version on the work, in Vienna, on 11th February, 1903, almost 6 and a half years after Bruckner's death. It was Siegmund von Hausegger who was the 1st conductor to reveal the full extent of the dissonances at the climax of the Adagio of the 9th (bars 203-206 ; especially, 206) , which had been considerably toned down by Löwe. Von Hausegger's reading, therefore, is consonant with the then new critical edition of the score by Alfred Orel and Robert Haas, published in 1934, by the newly-formed (Leipzig, 1927) International Bruckner Society. The later edition prepared by Doctor Leopold Nowak (Vienna, 1951) is virtually identical with the Orel/Haas score (the only difference being the correction of misprints) (1) and coheres, therefore, with the von Hausegger recording in every respect. Since then, there has been a new critical edition in the context of the Anton Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » , published in 2000, taking account of Orel and Nowak's work, by Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (editor) .

(I) One of the misprints in Nowak's score (Vienna 1951) is in bar 200 of the 1st movement (page 28) where an unnecessary accidental (suggesting E-flat) has crept into the 2nd trombone part ; the 2nd trombone is, of course, continuing to hold the D-flat from the previous bar so that there is no need for any modification by use of an accidental. This is corrected in Cohrs' score (Vienna, 2000) .

If I may be allowed to intrude a personal reminiscence at this juncture, I remember possessing von Hausegger's recording on 78 rpm. discs (14 sides) , while still a student, in the days before LPs had become available ; and, I also remember where each break came (and, subconsciously, still expect them to happen) ; more importantly, however, I remember confronting (not quite for the 1st time) the « grandeur » , the mystery, and the cosmic vastness of this work, which described a world in which blindly impersonal psychic forces were at work, in which the individual seemed often little more than a speck of dust. That I was aware of these things, which are undoubtedly of the essence of the work, was, I now recognize, as much owing to the commitment and involvement of von Hausegger's interpretation as to the substance of Bruckner's score.

Indeed, this performance is still as compelling and vivid to me as many a later recording, including Karajan, Jochum, and many others I admire. He is also a good deal less idiosyncratic or eccentric than some, which does not mean that von Hausegger is, in any way, dull or pedestrian. On the contrary, he reveals himself as a typically Teutonic Master-craftsman, thorough and intense, who lets the music speak for itself without undue interference or imposition of director's ego (« control freakishness ») . In this, he is akin such Masters as Karl Böhm, Rudolf Kempe, and Wolfgang Sawallisch, which is high-praise indeed. Of course, the recorded sound, per se, cannot be compared with that of later recordings, from the mid 1950's and beyond ; although it is remarkably good for the 1930's, and makes a better sound than that of the London Symphony Orchestra in Edward Elgar's Violin Concerto (with the young Yehudi Menuhin as soloist) recorded during that same decade. There is also less surface noise (unavoidable, to some extent, with recordings that were done onto 78 rpm discs) than on that more famous performance.

Siegfried von Hausegger was the son of Friedrich von Hausegger, author of « Die Musik als Ausdruck » (Music as Expression) , published in 1884, was born in Graz, in 1872 ; and died in Munich, in 1948. In addition to his conducting activities (including the Kaim Orchestra, in Munich ; and posts in Frankfurt, Glasgow, and Edinburgh) , he was a prolific composer, whose works include pieces based on Germanic history and legend (« Barbarossa Symphony » ; « Natursymphonie » ; « Wieland der Schmied and Aufklänge » , all for Orchestra ; the Opera « Zinnober » , as well as his « Dionysische Phantasie » , « Choral Mass » and « Requiem » , and many other choral works, both large and small.) While I have not been able to hear or to see scores of any of these works (although the « Natursymphonie » is available on CD, on the « CPO » label - SACD 777237) , it is clear that von Hausegger was someone steeped in the Teutonic ethos emanating from Richard Wagner (who, once, contemplated an Opera based on « Wieland der Schmied ») ; the music of Anton Bruckner, therefore, especially the Symphonies, must have had profound resonances for him, revealing the essence of the Teutonic « Urwelt » (in all senses, both literal and figurative) in all its heroic splendour, pathos, and mysticism. A predisposition towards these things is always an advantage in a Bruckner conductor, provided that it is allied to perfect technical control and fine musicianship, both of which are amply manifested in this performance.

At the time of my discovery of von Hausegger's recording (on 78 rpm discs) , I remember reading a book on Bruckner, for the 1st time. This was « Anton Bruckner : Rustic Genius » by Werner Wolff, published in 1942, which is eminently readable, and as good a general introduction to Bruckner as can be read in English, intelligent, perceptive, radiating both love and understanding (which is to say emotional and intellectual perception in equal measure) . 2 quotations from the book's 1st page, immediately arrest the attention, and are worth quoting here :

« Only in his works did Bruckner disclose his true nature. In comparison with his creations everything else is unimportant and carries with it the danger of making him appear in a wrong light before a public which has not fully-recognized his “ grandeur ”. »

Those opening words of Wolff's book are actually a quotation from a letter to Werner Wolff from Bruckner's pupil, Friedrich Klose (1862-1943) (2) ; but they are as true today as when they were written ; my 2nd quotation (from Wolff himself) is as follows :

« An immense reserve of psychic forces, originating in a realm not subject to any influence from the outside, must have been stored in the man, gifted with so great a creative power. »

(2) See the reminiscences of Bruckner from Klose in : Stephen Johnson. « Bruckner Remembered » , Faber & Faber (1998) ; pages 51-54 and 123-126.

That goes to the heart of things, and to the 9th Symphony in particular, in which Bruckner reveals a state of awareness transcending anything he had achieved hitherto. The von Hausegger performance has « grandeur » , intensity, and spaciousness, but without ponderousness ; there is a searing quality about the string tone which comes (I suspect) from too few players playing over-intensely, perhaps, with more vibrato than one is accustomed to nowadays. In the 1st movement, it is a pleasure to note the perfect intonation of the timpani, which can be a problem (not always happily solved, as in the Eugen Jochum recording with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » , for example) owing to the frequent re-tunings required by Bruckner. (3)

(3) In the 1st movement, there are at least 12 tuning changes for the timpani, many of which need to be effected, i.e. , pre-tested, during the performance, while the rest of the Orchestra are busy making all kinds of other sounds. The Scherzo is more straightforward in this respect, requiring the D and A only, although the Trio asks for a low F-sharp. The Adagio requires 4 pitches : F# a bar 17, immediately switching to F§ at 25, and E at 33 : thereafter, G at 121, and G# at 199.

Another fascinating detail in the 1st movement, superbly enunciated by von Hausegger, is the alien B natural, pizzicato, in the 2nd violins (1st desks only, double on flute) which is attempting, near the end of the Exposition (the tonality having settled on F) to discountenance the sustained pedal-point in the bass (bars 219 to 222) . This sounds, literally, « quasi col legno » , and no other performance that I have heard makes this subtle point so vividly and tellingly.

Von Hausegger's Scherzo has a dynamism and a vitality about it that almost makes one think of Arturo Toscanini ; although I would have preferred greater definition in the trombones as they cut incisively across the pounding Ds of the strings, at bar 444, on an alien chord. Perhaps, we should be thankful for small mercies, for some conductors don't seem to notice that the trombones are there at all (in fact, one wonders whether some of them can read music) . The general character of this Scherzo resembles those dreams in which everything is either exaggeratedly, grotesquely big, or exaggeratedly minusculely small (Brobdingnagian / Lilliputian) . This brings me to the mercurial, elfin-like Trio section (« Schnell ») , utterly unlike any other Trio in the Bruckner Symphonies. Incidentally, these « Trio » sections, no 2 alike, are among the most original and imaginative things in Bruckner's work. Each one of them inhabits a dream-like world of pure enchantment which is wholly removed from that of the Scherzo proper on each side of them. The one in the 9th exhibits a delight in pure musical fantasy, grotesque and bizarre perhaps, but not (in my view) malevolent, although the juxtaposition with the nightmarish visions of the Scherzo is bound to create its own peculiar psychological effect. (4)

(4) Robert Simpson finds this Trio « icy » , and says it both « compels and repels as it snakes quickly across the scene » . A few lines later on, he speaks of « slyly feline evils » . I do not agree with this view, perhaps, because I am a cat-lover, although I can understand perfectly what he is getting at. Perhaps, this demonstrates the unsuitability of verbal images when describing music.

Von Hausegger's account is vivid, incisive, and gives precise attention to minor changes of tempo, e.g. , « allmählig bewegter » in the Scherzo, at bars 147-149, « as if gazing into nothingness » (lecture delivered by the writer, on 9 March 2008) , and « Langsamer » in the Trio, at bars 137 to 142. What the flutes are doing between bar 113 (letter D) and 136 does not bear close investigation - not that it does in most other performances, as what Bruckner has written is well nigh impossible at the speed required, some corners being more awkward than others.

Von Hausegger's slow movement is everything one would expect, after the experience of the other movements. Once again, one notes the magisterial intensity, both of pace and tone-quality ; and the peculiar spiritual aspects of the movement (as of a soul passionately searching for God and seeking ultimate union with Him) are movingly presented. It does not seem supererogatory to mention the frequent use of the figure 3 in this movement, meaning the threefold use in sequence of a phrase or short motive, symbolizing the Trinity ; and nowhere is this more powerful, both in all Bruckner's music and in von Hausegger's interpretation than at the final, agonized climax which is contained in bars 199-200, 201-202, and 203-205, this 3rd segment being itself tripartite ; and I wonder whether Bruckner here was thinking, if subconsciously, of Christ's last words on the Cross, « Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani » ? And also, not for the 1st time, I am reminded of lines of the marvellous Victorian English poet, Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-1889) , a Catholic like Bruckner, who was possessed of an equivalent fiery intensity of vision and passion (5) :

Thou mastering me
God ! giver of breath and bread ;
World's strand, sway of the sea ;
Lord of living and dead ;

Thou has bound bones and veins in me, fastened me in flesh,
And after it almost unmade, what with dread,
Thy doing : and dost thou touch me afresh ?
Over again I feel thy finger and find thee.

Ernst Prade

Am 12. November 1985 starb in Gerlingen bei Stuttgart Ernst Prade, der bis Januar 1945 Erster Kapellmeister und Leiter der Abteilung Musik am Reichssender Breslau war.

Der in Reichenberg (Sudetenland) gebürtige Prade erhielt ab seinem sechsten Lebensjahr Geigenunterricht ; nach dem Besuch der Gewerbeschule mit Chemiker-Fachausbildung studierte er Violine und Dirigieren am Sternschen Konservatorium in Berlin. In seiner Heimatstadt spielte er Kammermusik, war Geigensolist und leitete einen Chor ; manchmal dirigierte er die Kapelle Pochmann.

Am 1. Mai 1926 wurde er als Geiger zur kleinen Funkkapelle nach Breslau geholt, die er bald auch dirigierte. Auf Wunsch des Intendanten Friedrich Bischoff gründete er 1929 den Funkchor, den er bis 1935 leitete. In jenen Anfangsjahren des Rundfunks wurde experimentiert ; alte und neue Musik wurden gesendet, und die Musikprogramme waren weltoffen.

Ernst Prade wurde dank seiner Kenntnisse in Physik und Akustik und nach einem Kurs in Berlin 1930 der erste Tonmeister der « Schlesischen Funkstunde » . Ab 1930 dirigierte er mehrmals die Schlesische Philharmonie bei Rundfunk-Sinfoniekonzerten.

Im Januar 1934 wurde er (als Sudetendeutscher mit tschechischem Pass bis 1938) als Nachfolger von Professor Doktor Hermann Matzke zum Leiter der Abteilung Musik und zum Ersten Kapellmeister ernannt. Er erhielt den Auftrag, die Funkkapelle (deren Musiker schon 1932 alle Mitglieder der NSDAP waren) zu einem Großen Orchester mit 70 Mitgliedern zu erweitern. Da er jedoch nicht nur Parteigenossen einstellte, war er bald massiven Angriffen aus den Reihen der Partei ausgesetzt. Nun waren Sendungen der großen Musikkultur möglich.

Die schlesischen Komponisten erhielten immer wieder Kompositionsaufträge und erlebten viele Uraufführungen ihrer

Werke, so zum Beispiel Hermann Buchal, Johannes Rietz und der von Ernst Prade im Jahre 1934 entdeckte Günter Bialas. Werke des Hauskomponisten Karl Sczuka, der unerschöpflich in seinem musikalischen Einfallsreichtum war, wurden in großer Zahl gesendet, darunter viele Hörspielmusiken ; ferner Mundartkantaten mit Texten von Ernst Schenke oder von Hans Christoph Kaergel, die oft selbst die Rezitation übernahmen.

Ab Dezember 1935 wurden auch Opern in Direktsendungen in das Programm des Breslauer Senders aufgenommen. Die besten Sänger aus Breslau und von anderen deutschen Bühnen wirkten mit.

Entgegen dem strikten Verbot des Reichspropagandaministeriums leitete Ernst Prade auch einige Kirchenkonzerte. Prade erwarb sich als Gastdirigent in Budapest, Riga und Reval hohes Ansehen. Bei den Berliner Philharmonikern dirigierte er 1937 Bach und Bruckner sowie 1944 zwei Werke von Julius Weismann.

Am 25. Januar 1945 verließ Intendant Fricke mit einigen leitenden Mitarbeitern und Technikern das Funkhaus. Die Stilllegung des Reichssenders Breslau erfolgte am 26. Januar. Es sollte in Dresden weiter gesendet werden. Ende Februar entschied man in der RRG (Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft) Berlin, daß Ernst Prade in Leipzig mitarbeiten sollte, die anderen in Berlin und Prag.

Am Mitteldeutschen Rundfunk in Leipzig wurde Prade Tonmeister und Zweiter Konzertmeister bis Januar 1948. Danach übersiedelte er nach Gerlingen und arbeitete beim Süddeutschen Rundfunk, später bei der Württembergischen Staatsoper Stuttgart (bis 1967) .

Ernst Prade erwarb sich besondere Verdienste aufgrund seiner Interpretationen zeitgenössischer Musik, vor allem der schlesischen und auch der sudetendeutschen Musik.

Als Dirigent konnte Ernst Prade den Orchesterklang positiv gestalten, denn er hatte ein Orchesterinstrument studiert und das Handwerk eines Tonmeisters erlernt und ausgeübt. Davon zeugt Webers « Freischütz » vom Januar 1939, der nach der Sendung vom 31.12.2000 in HR 2 Plus mit folgenden Worten gelobt wird : « Eine außerordentliche Rarität. »

8 et 9 novembre 1938 : Concert spécial à Leipzig. Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la version originale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. En début de programme : l'Ouverture « Léonore » n° 2 de Beethoven.

10 novembre 1938 : Le chef Adolf Mennerich dirige la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Il s'agit de la création munichoise de la version originale.

12 et 13 novembre 1938 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la version originale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. En début de programme : la Suite n° 2 de Bach.

Arthur Seyß-Inquart

L'homme politique autrichien, partisan du National-Socialisme, Arthur Seyß-Inquart, est né le 22 juillet 1892 à Stannern (Stonařov) , en Moravie ; et est mort, par pendaison, le 16 octobre 1946. Il favorisa l' « Anschluß » en 1938, et fut gouverneur des Pays-Bas pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Il obtint le rang honorifique de « Gruppenführer » au sein de la SS. Il fut condamné à mort, à la suite du procès de Nuremberg.

Seyß-Inquart s'établit comme avocat à Vienne, en 1921. Il commença à militer très tôt pour l' « Anschluß » , terme qui désigne le rattachement de l'Autriche à l'Allemagne, au nom d'une culture germanique commune. Fondateur du Parti national-socialiste autrichien, entretenant des liens très étroits avec son homologue allemand, il fut imposé au chancelier Schuschnigg (convoqué par Hitler, à Berchtesgaden) comme ministre de l'Intérieur et de la Sécurité, le 15 février 1938.

Dans la logique du « protocole Hossbach » , qui, dès 1937, prévoyait d'instaurer la Grande Allemagne, Hitler multiplia les pressions sur le gouvernement autrichien et obtint la démission de Schuschnigg. Seyß-Inquart, qui le remplaça immédiatement à la Chancellerie, fit alors appel au « Reich » et, le 12 mars 1938, les troupes allemandes entrèrent dans Vienne, où elles reçurent un accueil triomphal. Nommé peu après gouverneur de l'Autriche (« Reichstatthalter ») , puis représentant du gouverneur général de Pologne, Hans Frank, à Cracovie (1939) , il fut nommé, le 18 mai 1940, commissaire du « Reich » dans les Pays-Bas occupés. Fidèle exécutant, il mena alors une politique combinant pillage économique, persécutions raciales et déportations, ce qui provoqua des rébellions de la part des Hollandais comme le fameux épisode de la Grève de février 1941, qui fut durement réprimée par les occupants. Arrêté à la Libération, il fut condamné à mort lors du procès de Nuremberg pour crimes contre la paix, crimes de guerre et crimes contre l'humanité et exécuté peu après par pendaison.

The Austrian Nazi politician Arthur Seyß-Inquart was born on 22 July 1892 in Stonařov (at that time, Stannern) , a German-speaking village in the neighbourhood of the predominantly German-speaking town of Jihlava (Iglau) .

Seyß-Inquart served as Chancellor of Austria for 2 days (from March 11 until March 13, 1938) before the « Anschluß » annexation of Austria by Nazi Germany, signing the constitutional law as acting head of State upon the resignation of President Wilhelm Miklas.

During World War II, he served the 3rd « Reich » in the General Government of occupied Poland and as « Reichskommissar », in the Netherlands. At the Nuremberg Trials, he was found guilty of crimes against humanity and sentenced to death. He died on 16 October 1946.

The area of Stannern constituted a German linguistic island in the midst of a Czech-speaking environment and this situation may have contributed to the outspoken national consciousness of the family and the young Arthur, in particular. Iglau was an important town in Moravia, one of the Czech provinces of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, in which an increasing competition between Germans and Czechs was going on. His parents were the school principal Emil Seyß-Inquart and Augusta Hirenbach.

The family moved to Vienna, in 1907. Seyß-Inquart later went to study law at the University of Vienna. At the beginning of World War I, in August 1914, Seyß-Inquart enlisted with the Austrian Army and was given a commission with the Tyrolean « Kaiserjäger », subsequently serving in Russia, Romania and Italy. He was decorated for bravery on a number of occasions and, while recovering from wounds in 1917, he completed his final examinations for his degree. Seyß-Inquart had 5 older siblings : Hedwig (born in 1881) ; Richard (born on 3 April 1883, became a Catholic priest, but left the Church and ministry, married in civil ceremony and became « Oberregierungsrat » and prison superior by 1940, in the « Ostmark ») ; Irene (born in 1885) ; Henriette (born in 1887) ; and Robert (born in 1891) .

In 1911, Seyß-Inquart met Gertrud Maschka. The couple married in December 1916 and had 3 children : Ingeborg Carolina Augusta Seyß-Inquart (born on 18 September 1917) ; Richard Seyß-Inquart (born on 22 August 1921) ; and Dorothea Seyß-Inquart (born on 7 May 1928) .

He went into law after the War and, in 1921, set-up his own practice. During the early years of the Austrian 1st Republic, he was close to the « Vaterländische » Front. A successful lawyer, he was invited to join the cabinet of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuß, in 1933. Following Dollfuß' murder, in 1934, he became a State Councillor, from 1937, under Kurt von Schuschnigg. A keen mountaineer, Seyß-Inquart became the head of the German-Austrian Alpine Club. He later became a devotee of Heinrich Himmler's concepts of racial purity and sponsored various expeditions to Tibet and other parts of Asia, in hopes of proving Aryan racial concepts and theories. He was not initially a member of the Austrian National-Socialist Party, though he was sympathetic to many of their views and actions. By 1938, however, Seyß-Inquart knew which way the political wind was blowing and became a respectable frontman for the Austrian National-Socialists.

In February 1938, Seyß-Inquart was appointed Minister of the Interior by Schuschnigg, after Adolf Hitler had threatened Schuschnigg with military actions against Austria, in the event of non-compliance. On 11 March 1938, faced with a German invasion aimed at preventing a plebiscite of independence, Schuschnigg resigned as Austrian Chancellor and Seyß-Inquart was reluctantly appointed to the position by Austrian President Wilhelm Miklas. On the next day, German troops crossed the border of Austria, at the telegraphed invitation of Seyß-Inquart, the latter « communiqué » having been arranged after the troops had begun to march, so as to justify the action in the eyes of the international community. Before his triumphant entry into Vienna, Hitler had planned to leave Austria as a puppet State, with an independent but pro-Nazi government headed by Seyß-Inquart. He was carried away, however, by the wild reception given to the German army by the majority of the Austrian population and shortly decreed that Austria would be incorporated into the 3rd « Reich » , as the province of « Ostmark » . Only then, on 13 March 1938, did Seyß-Inquart join the Nazi Party.

Seyß-Inquart drafted the legislative act reducing Austria to a province of Germany and signed it into law, on 13 March. With Hitler's approval, he became Governor (« Reichsstatthalter ») of the newly named « Ostmark » , with Ernst Kaltenbrunner, his chief minister, and Josef Burckel as Commissioner for the Reunion of Austria (concerned with the « Jewish Question ») . Seyß-Inquart also received an honorary SS rank of « Gruppenführer » and, in May 1939, he was made a Minister without portfolio in Hitler's cabinet. Almost as soon as he took office, he ordered the confiscation of Jewish property and sent Jews to concentration camps. Late in his regime, he collaborated in the deportation of Jews from Austria.

Following the invasion of Poland, Seyß-Inquart became administrative chief for Southern Poland, but did not take-up that post before the General Government was created, in which he became a deputy to the Governor General Hans Frank. He fully supported the heavy-handed policies put into effect by Frank, including persecution of Jews. He was also aware of the Abwehr's murder of dozens of Polish intellectuals.

Following the capitulation of the Low-Countries, Seyß-Inquart was appointed « Reichskommissar » for the Occupied Netherlands, in May 1940, charged with directing the civil administration, with creating close economic collaboration with Germany and with defending the interests of the « Reich » . Among the Dutch people, he was mockingly referred to as « Zes en een kwart » (6 and a quart) : a play on his name. He supported the Dutch « NSB » and allowed them to create a para-military « Landwacht » , which acted as an auxiliary police force. Other political parties were banned in late-1941 and many former government officials were imprisoned at Sint-Michielsgestel. The administration of the country was controlled by Seyß-Inquart himself and he answered directly to Hitler. He oversaw the politicization of cultural groups from the Nederlandsche « Kultuurkamer » « right down to the chess-players' club » , and set-up a number of other politicised associations.

He introduced measures to combat resistance and, when a widespread strike took place in Amsterdam, Arnhem and Hilversum in May 1943, special summary Court-martial procedures were brought in and a collective fine of 18 million guilders was imposed. Up until the liberation, Seyß-Inquart authorized the execution of around 800 people, although some reports put this total at over 1,500, including the executions of people under the so-called « Hostage Law » , the death of political prisoners who were close to being liberated, the Putten raid, and the reprisal executions of 117 Dutchmen for the attack on SS and Police Leader Hanns Albin Rauter. Although the majority of Seyß-Inquart's powers were transferred to the military commander in the Netherlands and the Gestapo, in July 1944, he remained a force to be reckoned with.

There were 2 small concentration camps in the Netherlands : « KZ Herzogenbusch » near Vught, « Kamp Amersfoort » near Amersfoort, and Westerbork transit camp (a « Jewish assembly camp ») ; there were a number of other camps variously controlled by the military, the police, the SS or Seyß-Inquart's administration. These included a « voluntary labour recruitment » camp, at Ommen (« Camp Erika ») . In total, around 530,000 Dutch civilians forcibly worked for the Germans, of whom 250,000 were sent to factories in Germany. There was an unsuccessful attempt by Seyß-Inquart to send only workers, aged 21 to 23, to Germany and he refused demands, in 1944, for a further 250,000 Dutch workers and, in that year, sent only 12,000 people.

Objects ridiculed Seyß-Inquart, including a cigarette extinguisher made of 6 and a quarter coins. « Zes-en-een-kwart » was a commonly used nickname for Seyß-Inquart. The quarter also refers to his crippled leg.

Seyß-Inquart was an unwavering anti-Semite : within a few months of his arrival in the Netherlands, he took measures to remove Jews from the government, the press and leading positions in industry. Anti-Jewish measures intensified after 1941 : approximately 140,000 Jews were registered, a « ghetto » was created in Amsterdam and a transit camp was set-up at Westerbork. Subsequently, in February 1941, 600 Jews were sent to Buchenwald and Mauthausen concentration camps. Later, the Dutch Jews were sent to Auschwitz. As Allied forces approached, in September 1944, the remaining Jews at Westerbork were removed to Theresienstadt. Of 140,000 registered, only 30,000 Dutch Jews survived the War.

When the Allies advanced into the Netherlands, in late-1944, the Nazi regime had attempted to enact a scorched earth policy, and some docks and harbours were destroyed. Seyß-Inquart, however, was in agreement with Armaments Minister Albert Speer over the futility of such actions and, with the open connivance of many military commanders, they greatly limited the implementation of the scorched earth orders. At the very end of the « hunger winter » , in April 1945, Seyß-Inquart was with difficulty persuaded by the Allies to allow airplanes to drop food for the hungry people of the occupied northwest of the country. Although he knew the War was lost, Seyß-Inquart did not want to surrender. This led General Walter Bedell Smith to snap :

« Well, in any case, you are going to be shot. »

« That leaves me cold. » , Seyß-Inquart replied.

To which Smith then retorted :

« It will. »

Before Hitler committed suicide, in April 1945, he named a new government headed by Grand Admiral Karl Dönitz in his last will and testament, in which Seyß-Inquart replaced Joachim von Ribbentrop, who had long since fallen-out of favour, as Foreign Minister. It was a tribute to the high-regard Hitler felt for his Austrian comrade, at a time when he was rapidly disowning or being abandoned by so many of the other key lieutenants of the 3rd « Reich » . Unsurprisingly, at such a late stage in the War, Seyß-Inquart failed to achieve anything in his new office.

He remained in his posts until 7 May 1945, when, after a meeting with Dönitz to confirm his blocking of the scorched earth orders, he was arrested on the Elbe Bridge, at Hamburg, by 2 members of the Royal Welch Fusiliers, one of whom was Norman Miller (birth name : Norbert Mueller) , a German Jew from Nuremberg who had escaped to Britain at the age of 15, on a « kindertransport » just before the War and, then, returned to Germany as part of the British occupation forces. Miller's entire family had been killed at the « Jungfernhof » Camp in Riga, Latvia, in March 1942.

At the Nuremberg Trials, Seyß-Inquart was defended by Gustav Steinbauer and faced charges of conspiracy to commit crimes against peace ; planning, initiating and waging wars of aggression ; War crimes ; and crimes against humanity.

During the trial, Gustave Gilbert, an American army psychologist, was allowed to examine the Nazi leaders who were tried at Nuremberg for War crimes. Among other tests, a German version of the « Wechsler-Bellevue IQ » test was administered. Arthur Seyß-Inquart scored 141, the 2nd highest among the defendants, behind Hjalmar Schacht.

Seyß-Inquart was found guilty of all charges, save conspiracy. The final judgment against him cited his involvement in harsh suppression of Nazi opponents and atrocities against the Jews during all his billets, but particularly stressed his reign of terror in the Netherlands. He was sentenced to death by hanging.

Upon hearing of his death sentence, Seyß-Inquart was fatalistic :

« Death by hanging ... well, in view of the whole situation, I never expected anything different. It's all right. »

He was hanged on 16 October 1946, at the age of 54, together with 9 other Nuremberg defendants. He was the last to mount the scaffold, and his last words were the following :

« I hope that this execution is the last act of the tragedy of the Second World War and that the lesson taken from this World War will be that peace and understanding should exist between peoples. I believe in Germany. »

Before his execution, Seyß-Inquart had returned to Catholicism, receiving absolution in the sacrament of confession from prison chaplain Father Bruno Spitzl.

26, 28 février et 1, 3, 10 mai 1938 : Le chef Carl Schuricht dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885) en plus de quelques modifications, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (étiquettes « Polydor » ; « Iron Needle » , CD : 1388) .

Carl Schuricht

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Carl Schuricht est né le 3 juillet 1880 à Dantzig, alors en Prusse-Occidentale, et est mort le 7 janvier 1967 à Vevey, en Suisse.

Compositeur à ses débuts où il bénéficie de l'aide de Max Reger, il devient rapidement un chef d'orchestre itinérant (en dehors d'un bref passage à Dresde en tant que chef permanent) qui dirige dans toute l'Europe.

Spécialiste du répertoire austro-allemand de Franz Schubert à Gustav Mahler. À la fois rigoureux sur le plan technique et fantasque au niveau de l'exécution, d'un dynamisme juvénile mais contrôlé jusqu'à un âge très avancé, ce chef nomade, grandement admiré par le pourtant peu tolérant Sergiù Celibidache a laissé des enregistrements mémorables avec divers orchestres (Vienne, Stuttgart, Paris, Besançon) .

Sa lecture enflammée des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner (dont une extraordinaire 5e avec Vienne en 1963, peut-être la plus belle de toute la discographie) offre un contraste saisissant avec celle, plus mystique, d'Eugen Jochum.

Hommage à Martha Schuricht née Banz (10 juillet 1916 - 21 mai 2011)

(Gaye Rickenbacher)

« Mademoiselle Banz, il me semble que vous êtes en plein chagrin d'amour - je connais un excellent remède : la “ Missa solemnis ” de Beethoven ! » (Carl Schuricht)

La Lucernoise Martha Banz avait 27 ans lorsque Carl Schuricht descendit à l'hôtel zurichois où elle travaillait pendant la Guerre de 39-45, comme secrétaire du directeur, son oncle. Sans doute pensa-t-elle que ce vieux monsieur de Wiesbaden (portant le titre de « Generalmusikdirektor ») n'avait pas à intervenir dans sa vie privée ; elle dut même le trouver bien impertinent. Lorsqu'elle reçut de lui 2 invitations pour le concert de la « Missa solemnis » à Lucerne, elle décida malgré tout de s'y rendre, avec sa tante. Il faut dire que Martha était devenue mélomane pendant ses années zurichoises, grâce aux Concerts populaires dirigés par Volkmar Andreae.

Dans le cadre du Festival de Lucerne, Carl Schuricht avait été invité pour la 1re fois (à la suggestion d'Ernest Ansermet) à diriger la « Missa solemnis » à la « Jesuitenkirche » . L'exécution de cette grande œuvre fut inoubliable : la salle exultait et Martha, bouleversée, trouva soudain son cœur rempli de dévotion pour cet extraordinaire vieux monsieur. 6 mois plus tard, au printemps 1944, c'est dans cette même église qu'était célébré leur mariage, malgré l'opposition de sa mère (Martha épousait un Allemand, protestant, de 36 ans plus âgé qu'elle, divorcé 3 fois, et qui, de surcroît, était un artiste) , par un prêtre qui connaissait Martha depuis son enfance à Lucerne. Leur vie conjugale devait durer 23 ans, jusqu'à la disparition du célèbre chef d'orchestre en 1967.

Les nouveaux mariés partent alors pour l'Allemagne, où Carl Schuricht continue à diriger des concerts dans des conditions impensables, avec d'interminables voyages en train, à travers un pays dévasté par les bombes. Fin 1944, Ernest Ansermet, qui juge la situation de son ami et collègue plus que précaire, invite Schuricht à diriger l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande à Genève. Le lendemain du concert, un médecin est appelé pour constater que Schuricht, malade, ne peut pas voyager. Ansermet organise tout pour que le couple puisse rester en Suisse. Martha, en épousant un Allemand, avait perdu sa nationalité suisse ; un visa était de rigueur, pour chaque voyage du couple en Suisse ; après l'obtention d'une autorisation de séjour, il lui fallut encore faire renouveler chaque mois leur visa ! Le couple trouve alors refuge à Crans-Montana, jusqu'à la capitulation de l'Allemagne et la fin de la Guerre.

The German conductor Carl (Adolph) Schuricht was born on 3 July 1880 in Danzig (Gdańsk) , German Empire ; and died on 7 January 1967, aged 86, in his home at Corseaux-sur-Vevey, Switzerland. He was buried in Wiesbaden, as an honorary citizen of that city.

His father's family had been respected organ-builders. His mother, Amanda Wusinowska, a widow soon after her marriage (Carl's father, Carl Conrad Schuricht, drowned in the Baltic Sea while saving a friend, 3 weeks before he was born) , brought-up her son alone.

His childhood was surrounded by music :

« Every Sunday, in summer, we used to hire 3 large open carriages and go-out into the country. After the picnic, we would join in singing choral works by Bach, Händel and Mendelssohn. »

He showed a talent for music at an early age, studying piano and violin from the age of 6. By 11, he was composing, and continued his academic and musical studies when his mother moved to Berlin, then, to Wiesbaden.

At 20, he obtained the post of « Korrepetitor » at the « Stadttheater » in Mainz and, 2 years later, won the Kuczynski Foundation prize for composition and a Felix von Mendelssohn scholarship. He, then, returned to Berlin to study piano under Ernst Rudorff and composition with Heinrich van Eyken (and not Engelbert Humperdink) , later working under Max Reger in Leipzig, publishing chamber pieces, sonatas and lieder. Attracted by the profession of conductor, he undertook tours in Germany conducting Operettas, Operas, Choral Societies and Symphony concerts. During this time, he had the chance to watch, at rehearsal and in concert, such figures as Arthur Nikisch, Felix Weingartner, Ernst von Schuch, Felix Mottl, Hans Richter, Karl Muck and Gustav Mahler.

In 1906, he heard Frederick Delius's « Sea Drift » in Essen, with the composer present, and promised to Delius that when he had his own orchestra, he would conduct it himself, which he did in Frankfurt with Delius, again, in the audience. In 1909, he succeeded Siegfried Ochs as director of the « Rühlscher Oratorienverein » in Frankfurt-am-Main and, at 31, was appointed musical director of the Municipal Orchestra in Wiesbaden ; festivals of modern music (Richard Strauß, Max Reger, Gustav Mahler, Frederick Delius and Arnold Schönberg) made Wiesbaden an internationally renowned centre for music.

Schuricht said of this time :

« The German public was no more avid than any other for the novelties which I wanted to give it. I have to prepare it for them gently, convince without bludgeoning, cajole and seduce. I managed this by prefacing concerts of modern music by lectures, which I illustrated with extracts played by myself at the piano or by the orchestra. »

His career was not that of a star but he was loved both by the orchestra members and audience. As music-director at Wiesbaden (from 1923 to 1944) , he conducted performances of Mahler's Symphonies, although they were not as popular at the time as they are now and were eventually banned under the Nazis because of the composer's Jewish background. Schuricht continued to conduct Mahler outside Germany. In October 1939, during the « Phoney War » , a performance of his with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » was disrupted by a woman heckler who called-out : « Deutschland über alles, Herr Schuricht » . Schuricht worked at the Hague/Scheveningen Music Festival, from 1930 to 1939, and was guest-conductor with the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1942 to 1944. He was expected to take-over as director of the orchestra, from 1 October 1944, but escalation of the War meant that the orchestra was closed down and Schuricht himself received a warning that he was about to be arrested, and he fled to Switzerland. He settled in Zürich where he married Maria Martha Banz and worked with « l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande » .

During the late-1940's and 1950's, Schuricht conducted throughout Switzerland ; at the re-opening of the Salzburg Festival, in 1946 ; in Paris ; and at the Festivals of Holland, Lucerne, Aix-en-Provence and Montreux. He regularly conducted the South German Radio Symphony Orchestra, from 1950 to 1966. When the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra made their 1st tour to the United States, in 1956, Schuricht replaced Erich Kleiber, sharing the conducting during the 6 weeks with André Cluytens.

...

Carl Schuricht was among the most distinguished German conductors of the inter- and post-War years.

His family was musical and gave him his initial musical training. His father was an organ manufacturer and his mother was a pianist. He studied composition with Heinrich van Eyken (and not Engelbert Humperdink) at the « Hochschule für Musik » in Berlin ; and, then, with Max Reger in Leipzig.

He had the typical German conductor's apprenticeship, beginning as an assistant in a provincial Opera House and working his way up to music-director in progressively more important locations.

He became music-director in Wiesbaden in 1911, and elected to stay there until 1944. From this base, he made frequent guest-conducting appearances elsewhere and appeared at many Summer Music Festivals. He was known for his interest in French music and other modern compositions. He frequently played the music of Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Arnold Schönberg, and Igor Stravinsky.

He toured abroad often, and made his 1st U.S. appearance in 1927. For many years, he conducted annual Summer Concert series in Scheveningen (near The Hague) , Holland, a resort town next to the capital city, The Hague. In recognition of this, the Dutch government gave him the Order of Orange-Nassau in 1938.

In 1942, he was appointed conductor of the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra. He often opposed the Nazi government's policies and, in 1944, fled to Switzerland, where he resided thereafter. As many German conductors who had favoured modern music in the inter-War years did, he settled firmly to the traditional Symphonic repertory in the post-War years and, thereafter, became strongly associated with performances in the Romantic tradition, with rhythmic freedom and a smooth, beautiful and expressive sound.

He was chosen to conduct the re-opening after the War of the Salzburg Festival in Austria, in 1946, and continued his frequent guest-conducting appearances and associations with Summer Festivals, including the Ravinia Festival in Chicago and the Tanglewood Festival with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Massachusetts. He often conducted the London Philharmonic Orchestra and the BBC Symphony Orchestra. He was chosen to share conducting duties with André Cluytens when the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra made its 1st American tour, in 1956. In later years, he often took the podium with that Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and frequently conducted the Stuttgart Radio Symphony Orchestra.

He was little-known as a composer, writing orchestral music, piano works, and songs.

Carl Schuricht was born into a family of organ-builders. He commenced his musical studies with the violin and piano at the age of 6, started to compose when he was 11, and to conduct when he was 15. His 1st professional engagement, which he held during 1901 and 1902, was as a « répétiteur » at Mainz ; but having won a composition prize from the Kuszynki Foundation in 1902, he was awarded a scholarship by Franz von Mendelssohn which enabled him to continue to study composition with Heinrich van Eyken (and not Engelbert Humperdink) and piano with Ernst Rudorff at the High-School for Music in Berlin, followed by further composition study with Max Reger in Leipzig. Following the publication of several works in Berlin, Schuricht was appointed Operetta conductor at Zwickau for the 1907-1908 season. He succeeded Siegfried Ochs as the conductor of the Rühlschen Oratorio Choir of Frankfurt in 1909 and, 3 years later, was appointed as chief-conductor at Wiesbaden, where he conducted in 1913 Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 8.

Although he had been invited to conduct in London and at La Scala, Milan, during 1914, Schuricht's career appears to have been dormant for the years of World War I. It recommenced in 1921 when he directed a Brahms Festival with Wilhelm Furtwängler. In 1923, he became chief-conductor of the Wiesbaden Symphony Orchestra, a post which he retained until 1944. During the inter-War years, he pursued an active career conducting in Germany and abroad, appearing at the 1st German Mahler Festival in Wiesbaden (1923) ; in Saint-Louis, Missouri (1927) ; in London (1931) ; and at the Summer Symphony Concerts in Scheveningen (near The Hague) , near The Hague in Holland (1930-1939) . In 1933, he was appointed conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Choir, conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra for the 1st time in the following year, and served as principal guest-conductor of the Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra from 1937 to 1944, and of the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra during 1943 and 1944, followed by a short period as its chief-conductor. However, as World War II drew to a close, he left Germany during the autumn of 1944 and settled in Switzerland, where he began to work with « l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande » .

At the re-opening of the Salzburg Festival in 1946, Schuricht conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and, 10 years later, he led the same orchestra in both the Furtwängler Memorial Concert in Vienna at the beginning of 1956 and in a concert during the January Mozart Week in Salzburg. With the unexpected death immediately afterwards of Erich Kleiber, Schuricht was invited by the « Philharmoniker » to share the conducting of its forthcoming tour of America with André Cluytens, leading 12 concerts ; and, during the same year (1956) , he conducted all the Beethoven Symphonies at the Lyon Music Festival Festival, in France. He was invited to conduct, in 1957, at the Chicago Symphony Summer Festival in Ravinia ; appearing also as a guest-conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Berkshire Music Festival, in Tanglewood. He conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on another tour, this time of Europe, in 1958 ; and, on his 80th birthday, the Orchestra conferred upon him honorary membership. During his final years, he made guest-appearances in London and Berlin, and continued to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra ; he also participated in the Salzburg Festival, giving his last concert there, in 1965.

Compared with his more famous contemporaries, such as Sir Thomas Beecham, Wilhelm Furtwängler, and Arturo Toscanini, Schuricht's style as a conductor was understated. He described his essentially instinctive approach to performance thus :

« The interpretative artist should be endowed, first and foremost, with that kind of spiritual musical intuition which permits him to sense the original impulse of the work he is interpreting ; and secondly, with the gift of making clear in his own presentation the essence of what he sees. If the interpretative artist is fortunate enough to touch the “ active nucleus ” of the musical cell, whence stem all the forces which govern the work, this “ nucleus ” will guide him even in the smallest details. »

When successful, this approach to performance produced excellent results : for instance, the British music-critic Colin Mason described Schuricht's 1964 account of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 with the London Symphony Orchestra as « an immensely dramatic and exciting performance » .

Schuricht's recording career was extensive. Already established as a conductor of note during the acoustic era, he recorded Beethoven using this process with the Berlin Municipal Orchestra. His electrical 78rpm recordings, made with all the major Orchestras of Berlin, included such large-scale works as Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 3, 6, 7 and 9 ; Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 7 and 9 ; and Richard Strauß's « Sinfonia Domestica » and « Tod und Verklärung » , as well as many shorter pieces. After World War II, he recorded both 78rpm and long-playing records for « Decca » , working initially with Swiss Orchestras and, later, with the Paris « Conservatoire » and Vienna Philharmonic Orchestras. Towards the end of his life, Schuricht recorded for « EMI » , committing to disc once again his interpretations of Beethoven and Bruckner. A wide cross-section of repertoire was also recorded by the « Concert-Hall » Record Club, including music by Bach and Händel as well as by Schumann, Brahms, Wagner and Johann Strauß II. In addition, many of his radio recordings have been published. Schuricht's interpretations at their best have an unforced, natural and deeply-felt quality that is most appealing. As he himself noted, he was « essentially an exponent of the old tradition » .

Comments by Carl Schuricht :

« Between 1900 and 1910, the music of Strauß, Mahler and Bruckner was still arousing much controversy. I would say the same for that of Debussy, Reger, Stravinsky, Schönberg, Ravel and Delius. A little later Hindemith, Bartók and Honegger entered the lists. If you glance through the programmes of my Wiesbaden days, you will find all these names, and many others now famous. And you will observe that I gave the 1st performances of many works which afterwards became Classics. Do for your generation, my dear friend, what I did for mine. If you have rendered no service to the art of your contemporaries you will have done nothing of any value. It is better to serve than to exploit.

A few lines back, I wrote the name of Delius. A British subject but of German origin, Delius had been intended by his parents for a commercial career. At the age of 20, he was working an orange plantation in Florida. It was there that he began to study music on his own, and then he left America to settle in Europe. I heard his " Sea Drift ", based on the poem by Walt Whitman, performed at a Festival held in Essen, in 1906, with the composer present. As I listened to this music, which is so undeservedly sneered at nowadays, I forgot Orchestra, singers and audience and lost myself in a dream from which I only awoke the next morning I went to see Delius. He was a charming man, natural, sensitive and good-hearted. " I am like Brünnhilde ", he said to me : " I have 8 sisters." . As for me, I declared to him, " I haven't got an Orchestra yet but, as soon as I have, the 1st work I'll play is your Sea Drift ! ". And I kept my promise, at Frankfurt, though I slightly re-arranged the orchestration which I considered imperfect. Delius was in the audience again that evening. He embraced me and said, " You did well to re-touch the orchestration. It's something I should never have given anyone permission to do, but with you it's different, because I realize you are fond of me." . At this point, I think, the young musician for whom these words are intended will pluck me by the sleeve and tell me that he does not know how to take this anecdote. Take it, then, as a proof that one can sometimes put love for a musical work in the place of respect for the text. " Sometimes ", I said. »

« Here now are a few pieces of practical advice : I hope they will obscure the memory of over-long digressions. For me, reading affords a rest from music. I have devoured entire libraries, musical and non-musical. For professional study, that is, the art of conducting, the writings of Wagner and Weingartner have been of great use to me. But Plato, the Greek tragedians, all great writers in general and a few whimsical ones in particular have enriched or amused me very seasonably. Read too, and show those who know you that one can be at the same time a good musician and a cultured man. »

(Schuricht admired Josef von Eichendorff and Adalbert Stifter.)

Excerpt from a text by Carl Schuricht titled « Creation and Re-creation » :

« The interpretative artist should be endowed, 1st and foremost, with that kind of spiritual musical intuition which permits him to sense the original impulse of the work he is interpreting ; and, secondly, with the gift of making clear in his own presentation the essence which he sees.

We know that to a talented interpretative musician illumination often comes at the 1st reading of a score. It does not consist in escape from his own being but rather in the apparent awakening by the rays of the creator's genius of congenial forces in the interpreter, and these point him along the path of re-creation.

Such illumination loses nothing of its absolute character nor of its intensity in the period when the interpreter is penetrating the structure and details of the work ; throughout his exploration, he seems to be ever joined to the creator by a wonderful link that leads him through the creative process which the work itself underwent.

If the interpretative artist is fortunate enough to touch the " active nucleus " of the musical cell, whence stem all the forces which govern the work, this " nucleus " will guide him even in the smallest details. And, then, the general conception, the tempos and nuances, the ways by which the force in the work is to be expressed, will impose themselves on him as it were of their own accord ; and all apparent freedom of interpretation will thus follow logically from the relationships of those forces which form the texture of the work.

And, eventually, the interpretative artist will transmit " pure music " to the listener, winning for him a conviction in his deepest soul of possessing something ineffable.

Of course, if the governing inspiration of a work is not apparent to the interpreter at 1st reading, he will endeavour to discover by slow plodding the interpretation and the " active nucleus " which will make plain to him the essence of the work and open-up to him the road to unknown territories. » (Letter to the « Wiener Philharmoniker » in March, 1955.)

« In attempting to to express the feelings that were awakened in the depths of my soul by your incomparable art and wonderful dedication, I have become ever more aware that words cannot do justice to such an experience. I stand before you, my heart overflowing with gratitude and admiration ; and, yet, it is impossible to express what I feel concerning the unforgettable experience of the perfection with which your mastery moulded Beethoven and Bruckner. Permit me, this time in spirit, to shake your hands most warmly." (Confided to David Drew, in 1956.)

« When I was young, I concentrated on the modern composers : Stravinsky, Bartók Hindemith, and so on. I still love them, of course, but, nowadays, I am more and more in demand as an interpreter of the Classical and Romantic composers. I am an exponent of an old tradition. I have nothing against the music of today, but I feel it is important to rejuvenate the sense of tradition. »

After Paul von Kempen's resignation, the 1942-1943 and 1943-1944 seasons were entrusted to guest-conductors. The list included Otto Matzerath (music-director of the « Badisches Staatstheater » , in Karlsruhe) , Bernardino Molinari (principal conductor of the « Augusteo » Orchestra , in Rome) , Kurt Eichhorn and, most important of all, Carl Schuricht who was something of a permanent guest-conductor, thus assuming the duties of principal conductor in an unofficial capacity. The Orchestra owes it largely to Schuricht that its high-standard was maintained and that concerts were taking place under increasingly difficult War-time conditions. So, it was only logical that Schuricht should be appointed to succeed van Kempen, in July 1944. However, he was not able to take-over his new position because the war ruled-out any further concert activities. Following Josef Gœbbels's declaration of « Total War » , artistic institutions were closed, and the « Dresdner Philharmonie » was disbanded. A major portion of the players were drafted into the army and the remainder assigned to jobs in the armaments industry. In the autumn of 1944, Schuricht left Germany for Switzerland. The terrible air raids carried-out on the night of 13 February 1945 put a temporary end to a successful chapter of Dresden's musical history. The « Gewerbehäus » , home to the Orchestra, was reduced to rubble like the rest of the city.

With its approximately 60 concerts in the Festival Hall of the « Dresden Kulturpalast » , the « Dresdner Philharmonie » essentially characterizes the cultural life of the city. The concerts of the Orchestra, which emerged the central attraction for thousands of Dresdners and for the guests of the metropolis on the Elbe, so called the « Florence on the Elbe » .

Guest conductors and soloists play together with the Orchestra in its home-town. For their part, the Philharmonic Orchestra is sought-after on the concert stages world-wide. Tours have so far taken the members of the Philharmonic to Japan, Israel, South America and the United States.

The « Dresdner Philharmonie » traces its formation back to the formal opening of the 1st Concert Hall on November 29th, 1870, in Dresden. This marked a new stage, a change away from the aristocracy to the performing of concerts for general public. From 1885, the then « Gewerbehausorchester » gave Philharmonic concerts in Dresden, which earned them the title « Dresdner Philharmonie Orchester » , in 1915.

In the past, Johannes Brahms, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky, Antonín Dvořák and Richard Strauß, amongst others, have conducted their works with the Orchestra. Distinguished persons such as Hans von Bülow, Anton Rubinstein, Bruno Walter, Fritz Busch, Arthur Nikisch, Hermann Scherchen, Erich Kleiber, Willem Mengelberg have conducted the Orchestra. Previous music directors have included, amongst others, Paul van Kempen, Carl Schuricht, as well as Heinz Bongartz, Horst Förster, Kurt Masur, Günther Herbig and Herbert Kegel.

Carl Adolph Schuricht (geboren 3. Juli 1880 in Danzig ; gestorben 7. Januar 1967 in Corseaux-sur-Vevey, Kanton Waadt) war ein deutscher Komponist und Dirigent. Er war einer der bedeutendsten Orchesterleiter des 20. Jahrhunderts. Aufgrund seiner Geburt besaß er von 1920 bis 1939 die Danziger Staatsbürgerschaft.

Von 1923 bis 1944 war er Generalmusikdirektor von Wiesbaden, wo er durch die Interpretation der Werke Gustav Mahlers internationales Ansehen erlangte. Zudem war er Chefdirigent des Leipziger Sinfonieorchesters (1931-1933) und der Dresdner Philharmonie (1944) sowie künstlerischer Leiter des Philharmonischen Chores Berlin (1933-1934). Vor Kriegsende verließ er Deutschland und ließ sich in der Schweiz nieder.

Schuricht wirkte fortan als Gastdirigent, unter anderem mit dem Concertgebouw-Orchester, dem Orchestre de la Suisse Romande und den Berliner Philharmonikern. Besonders intensiv pflegte er die Beziehung zu den Wiener Philharmonikern, zu deren Ehrendirigenten er 1960 ernannt wurde. Mehrmals trat er mit ihnen bei den Salzburger Festspielen auf und feierte internationale Erfolge bei Auslandstourneen.

Er galt als bedeutender Interpret der Werke der Wiener Klassik und der Sinfonien Anton Bruckners.

Carl Adolph Schuricht wurde 1880 als Sohn des Organisten und Orgelbauers Carl Conrad Schuricht und der polnischen Oratoriensängerin und Pianistin Amanda Ludowika Alwine Schuricht, geborene Wusinowska, in Danzig geboren. Der Großvater besaß eine Orgelfabrik, in der Carl Conrad arbeitete. Da Carl Adolphs Vater drei Wochen vor seiner Geburt in der Ostsee erkrankte und die Mutter nicht erneut heiratete, wurde er vom Onkel großgezogen.

Schuricht besuchte ab 1886 das Friedrichs-Realgymnasium in Berlin und ab 1892 das Königliche Realgymnasium in Wiesbaden. Er interessierte sich für die Dichter Joseph von Eichendorff und Adalbert Stifter. Schuricht lernte ab dem sechsten Lebensjahr Violine und Klavier, im Alter von elf Jahren komponierte er seine ersten Stücke (und schrieb die Libretti für zwei Opern) und mit fünfzehn begann er zu dirigieren. Sein erster Lehrer war der Wiesbadener Hofkapellmeister Franz Mannstädt.

Im Jahr 1902 erhielt er den Kompositionspreis der Kuszynski-Stiftung und ein Stipendium von Franz von Mendelssohn (Neffe von Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy). Damit studierte er von 1901 bis 1903 Klavier bei Ernst Rudorff und Komposition bei Engelbert Humperdinck und Heinrich van Eyken am Stern'schen Konservatorium in Berlin sowie bei Max Reger, der ihm freundschaftlich verbunden blieb, am Königlichen Konservatorium der Musik in Leipzig. Außerdem stand er im engen Kontakt zum Komponisten Henri Marteau und Schriftsteller Friedrich Lienhard.

In der Saison 1901-1902 war Schuricht Korrepetitor am Staatstheater Mainz. Von 1904 bis 1906 konnte er seiner Arbeit krankheitsbedingt nicht nachgehen. Für eine Spielzeit war er 1906 in Vertretung von Georg Hüttner Dirigent der Dortmunder Philharmoniker. Als Operettenkapellmeister wirkte Schuricht 1907-1908 am Stadttheater Zwickau. Dem folgten eine Dirigententätigkeit beim Kurorchester Bad Kreuznach und die Leitung der Oratorien- und Männerchorkonzerte in Goslar. Er setzte sich unter anderem für die Verbreitung der Werke von Frederick Delius in Deutschland ein.

Im Jahr 1909 wurde Carl Schuricht Nachfolger von Siegfried Ochs als Chorleiter des Rühl'schen Oratorienvereins in Frankfurt am Main. Von 1912 bis 1944 war er Musikdirektor (ab 1922 Generalmusikdirektor) von Wiesbaden. Von 1928 bis 1933 wohnte Schuricht im Hotel Oranien. Er leitete zwischen 1930 und 1939 das Städtische Orchester bei dessen Zyklus- und Sinfoniekonzerten im Kurhaus Wiesbaden. Schuricht setzte klassische und romantische sowie moderne Musik von Alban Berg, Claude Debussy, Paul Hindemith, Maurice Ravel, Max Reger, Arnold Schönberg und Igor Strawinski auf den Spielplan. Deutschlandweit bekannt machte ihn 1913 seine Erstaufführung von Mahlers 8. Sinfonie in Wiesbaden.

Ein Jahr später debütierte er mit Brahms I. Sinfonie in der Queen's Hall in London und im Teatro alla Scala in Mailand (erneut mehrmals in den 1940er Jahren). Zum ersten Mal leitete er 1921 die Berliner Philharmoniker, deren Abonnementskonzerte er gemeinsam mit Bruno Walter ab 1925 dirigierte. Auf dem Programm stand Mahlers 6. Sinfonie. Im Sommer 1921 dirigierte er zwei von vier Konzerten (zusammen mit Wilhelm Furtwängler) beim 4. Brahms-Fest in Wiesbaden. Beim Ersten Deutschen Mahlerfest in Wiesbaden war er 1923 Dirigent. Im Jahr 1927 gastierte er beim Saint-Louis Symphony Orchestra in den USA. Im Sommer 1929 gab er Dirigierkurse im Schloß Charlottenburg für das Deutsche Musikinstitut für Ausländer unter dem Protektorat des Preußischen Ministeriums für Wissenschaft, Kunst und Volksbildung. Von 1930 bis 1939 dirigierte er die Sommerkonzerte in Scheveningen in den Niederlanden und war eng mit dem Concertgebouw-Orchester und Residenz Orchesters Den Haag verbunden.

In Leipzig konkurrierte Schuricht Anfang der 1930er Jahre mit Günther Ramín, dem späteren Thomaskantor, um das Chefdirigat des rundfunkeigenen Orchesters. Von 1931 bis 1933 war er Chefdirigent des Leipziger Rundfunkorchesters. Sein Vorgänger Alfred Szendrei war zuvor wegen seiner jüdischen Herkunft vom Rundfunk aus dem Amt gedrängt worden. Unter Schurichts Leitung stieg das Orchester zum besten Rundfunkorchester in Deutschland auf. Danach war er ein Kandidat für das Amt des Gewandhauskapellmeisters, bei dessen Orchester er mehrmals gastierte. Das Gewandhaus-Direktorium entschied sich 1934 für Hermann Abendroth.

Von Otto Klemperer übernahm Schuricht 1933 den Philharmonischen Chor Berlin, den er bis 1934 leitete. Ihm oblagen die Uraufführungen von Poots Allégo sinfonique und Blachers Konzertante Musik (Blachers großer Durchbruch) sowie Blachers Hamlet und Höllers Violinkonzert in der Berliner Philharmonie. Im Jahr 1934 dirigierte er erstmals die Wiener Philharmoniker. Zwischen 1937 und 1944 war er zudem erster Gastdirigent des Radio-Sinfonie-Orchesters Frankfurt. Beim Orchestre National de France gastierte er 1942 und 1943 im besetzten Paris.

Nach dem Weggang von Paul van Kempen war er von 1943 bis 1944 erster Gastdirigent der Dresdner Philharmonie. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs (August 1944) wurde er in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn von einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte. Am 1. Oktober 1944 wurde er Chefdirigent der Dresdner Philharmonie. Der Musikkritiker Karl Laux schrieb im Juli des Jahres in der Dresdner Zeitung einen euphorischen Kommentar über Carl Schuricht. Er sah ihn als einen der « allerersten Dirigenten unserer Zeit » und attestierte ihm ausreichend Kenntnis um die Dresdner Musikkultur.

Schuricht konnte das Amt in Dresden nicht mehr ausüben, auch weil viele Musiker zum Kriegsdienst eingezogen wurden. In den 40er Jahren stiegen die Differenzen zum nationalsozialistischen Regime, so unterstützte er seine jüdische Ex-Frau, von der er sich auf politischen Druck hin im September 1933 hatte scheiden lassen, bei der Emigration ins Ausland. Schuricht sollte 1944 in ein Lager eingeliefert werden, wurde aber vorher von einem ihm bekannten Gestapo-Soldaten gewarnt und verließ im November 1944 Deutschland. Der Musikschriftsteller Fred Hamel sprach dabei von Vertreibung aus Deutschland. Der Publizist Thomas Keilberth bewertete Schurichts Haltung zum Regime als Innere Emigration und die Historikerin Marianne Buder zog einen Vergleich mit den « schwierigen Zeitverhältnissen » des Thomaskantors Günther Ramin. Der Musikwissenschaftler Hans Heinz Stuckenschmidt konnte in Schurichts Dirigaten « unerwünschter Komponisten » sogar Widerstand erkennen. Der Musikhistoriker Fred K. Prieberg hingegen sah Carl Schurichts Werdegang kritischer, da er seiner Ansicht nach bis 1944 von den Verhältnissen im NS-System profitiert hat.

Schuricht zog in die Schweiz und siedelte Ende 1944 in Crans-Montana im Kanton Wallis. Er ehelichte die Schweizerin Maria Martha Banz in Zürich, die er zuvor beim Lucerne Festival kennengelernt hatte. Er folgte einer Einladung von Ernest Ansermet zum Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, mit dem er mehrere Jahre bei über 60 Konzerten zusammenarbeitete. Sein Einsatz für Mahler und Bruckner brachte ihm Kritik aus der konservativen lokalen Musikwissenschaft ein.

Anlässlich der Wiedereröffnung der Salzburger Festspiele im Jahr 1946 brachte Schuricht mit den Wiener Philharmonikern Werke von Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner und Mozart. Bei den Salzburger Festspielen war er 1960, 1961, 1964 und 1965 erneut zu Gast. In den Jahren 1956 und 1968 dirigierte er das Furtwängler-Gedächtnis-Konzert im Wiener Musikverein und die Salzburger Mozartwochen. Erst in dieser Zeit wurde ihm internationaler Ruhm zuteil.

Nach dem Tod Erich Kleibers tourte er gemeinsam mit André Cluytens mit den Wiener Philharmonikern erstmals nach dem Krieg durch die USA und Kanada (so DAR Constitution Hall in Washington und Carnegie Hall in New York) . Dabei erklangen Beethoven, Berg, Bruckner, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Strauß und Weber. Anlässlich des Tages der Menschenrechte am 10. Dezember trat er vor der Generalversammlung der Vereinten Nationen auf. Mit dem Walzer An der schönen blauen Donau von Johann Strauß eröffnete Schuricht 1957 den Philharmonikerball, 1958 trat er erneut mit den Wienern bei Konzerten in der Schweiz, Frankreich, Österreich und Spanien auf.

In den 1950er und 1960er Jahren dirigierte Schuricht mehrmals das Radio-Sinfonieorchester Stuttgart. Außerdem spielte er mit dem NDR Sinfonieorchester, dem Radio-Sinfonie-Orchester Frankfurt, dem Deutschen Symphonie-Orchester Berlin und dem Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks. Im Jahre 1957 war er Gastdirigent beim Ravinia Festival des Chicago Symphony Orchestra in Highland Park, Illinois und beim Berkshire Mountain Music Festival des Boston Symphony Orchestra in Tanglewood, Massachusetts. Er dirigierte 1963 und 1965 das London Symphony Orchestra in der Royal Festival Hall in London.

Schuricht besaß seit 1943 eine Villa in Corseaux-sur-Vevey am Genfersee. Er verstarb am 7. Januar 1967 in einem Schweizer Krankenhaus. Im Jahr 2011 wurde seine Urne in ein Ehrengrab auf dem Nordfriedhof in Wiesbaden überführt.

Schuricht hatte ein breites Repertoire. Er verschrieb sich insbesondere der Wiener Klassik und Spätromantik, wenig begeisterte er sich für die Werke von Richard Wagner. Große musikalische Hingabe verspürte er zu Gustav Mahler. Die rege Zusammenarbeit mit den Berliner und Wiener Philharmonikern im Rahmen der Salzburger Festspiele machte ihn weltberühmt. Die internationale Presse nannte ihn in einer Reihe mit Bruno Walter und Wilhelm Furtwängler, aber auch mit Clemens Krauß, Arturo Toscanini und Otto Klemperer. Als Dirigent stand er für Sachlichkeit. Der Stuttgarter Musikredakteur Götz Thieme verglich die Klarheit seines Schlages mit der von Pierre Boulez. Schurichts Devise war stets : « Einer Sache dienen ist besser, als sich ihrer bedienen. » . Der Musikwissenschaftler Bernard Gavoty beschrieb den Dirigenten als werktreu, maßvoll und beweglich. Er urteilte 1955 in der Reihe Die großen Interpreten positiv über Schuricht. Er zählte ihn zu den « drei oder vier grössten Dirigenten unserer Zeit » mit der Fähigkeit alle Sinnesebenen des Zuhörers anzusprechen. Die Musikwissenschaftler Richard Schaal und Willy Tapolet sprachen vom « Hang zu starker Vergeistigung der Interpretation » . Der Musikwissenschaftler Matthias Meyer nannte seine Interpretationen « ausgeglichen und formvollendet » . Und der Operndirektor Rudolf Schulz-Dornburg sagte über Schuricht :

« Wirken und Musizieren des statürlich kleinen Mannes war von einer künstlerischen Bescheidenheit geprägt, die ihn ganz vor dem Werk eines Komponisten zurücktreten ließ. »

Im Gegensatz zum jüngeren Herbert von Karajan waren seine Schallplattenaufnahmen wegen des fehlenden ständigen Orchesters überschaubar. Wichtige Aufnahmen liegen jedoch mit den Wiener Philharmonikern (Bruckner-Sinfonien) und dem Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire (Beethoven-Sinfonien) vor. Der Musikwissenschaftler Fritz Öser deutete seine Beethoven-Einspielungen als solche, in denen sich « die allerstrenge männliche Sachlichkeit mit einer ungeheuren Besessenheit paart » .

Carl Schuricht vermachte in seinem Testament von 1955 sein gesamtes Vermögen seiner vierten Frau (seit 1944) Martha Schuricht geb. Banz (1916-2011) . Dagegen klagte später Helmut Weisbach geboren Johannes Schuricht (geboren 1916 ; nannte sich später Helmut Schuricht) , Sohn aus den Ehejahren von 1908 bis 1922 mit Frederike Heinemann und Adoptivkind von Hans Weisbach.

Schuricht zweifelte stets an der Vaterschaft am Kind und beschränkte sich zu Lebzeiten auf eine Fürsorgeleistung von insgesamt 30.000 Schweizer Franken an seine Schwiegertochter und Enkelkinder. Die Zivilkammer des Kantonsgerichts Waadt entschied 1969 zugunsten des Klägers. Martha Schuricht legte gegen die Entscheidung Revision ein, die 1971 vom Schweizerische Bundesgericht mit folgender Begründung zurückgewiesen wurde :

« Das Geld, das ein Vater der geschiedenen Frau und den Kindern seines Sohnes zahlt, um für ihren Unterhalt zu sorgen, unterliegt nicht der Ausgleichung. » (BGE 97 II 209)

After the « Anshluß » of 1938 had incorporated Austria into Adolf Hitler's Germany, the « MWV » (« Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag ») and « IBG » (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») were dissolved. The « Complete Edition » (« Gesamtausgabe ») was transferred to Leipzig, where the stocks of the publishing house were destroyed in an air-raid, in 1945, shortly before the end of the War.

Alex Steinweiss

La grande majorité des pochettes illustrées à la main sont l'œuvre du graphiste américain Alex Steinweiss (24 mars 1917, Brooklyn ; 17 juillet 2011, Sarasota, Floride) . Il fut le 1er directeur artistique de la « Columbia Records » à partir de 1938. Il sortira de l'anonymat les pochettes de disque vinyle qui étaient jusqu'alors présentées sur fond neutre (souvent texturé ou toilé) . Son style est unique et remarquable. Il est, sans contredit, le « père » de la pochette de disque moderne.

« J'aime tellement la musique et j'avais tellement d'ambition que j'étais prêt à en faire beaucoup plus que ce pour quoi on pouvait bien me payer. Je voulais que les gens entendent la musique en voyant l'œuvre d'art. » (Alex Steinweiss)

Alex Steinweiss a inventé la pochette de disque telle que nous la connaissons aujourd'hui, créant une nouvelle forme d'art graphique. En 1940, récemment engagé, ce jeune directeur artistique de « Columbia Record » s lance une idée : et si on habillait la bête pochette marron habituelle d'une illustration accrocheuse ? La compagnie décide de prendre le risque, et, en quelques mois, augmente ses ventes de disques de 800 % . Les pochettes de Steinweiss pour la « Columbia » , mêlant une typographie audacieuse à des illustrations élégantes et modernes, ont remporté un succès considérable dans l'industrie du disque et révolutionné la manière dont les disques étaient vendus.

En 30 ans, Steinweiss a réalisé des milliers d'œuvres originales pour des pochettes de disques classiques, jazz ou de variétés pour les firmes « Columbia » , « Decca » , « London » , « Remington » et « Everest » , ainsi que des logos, des étiquettes, des supports publicitaires, et même sa propre police de caractère, la « Steinweiss Scrawl » . C'est lui qui a lancé l'âge d'or du graphisme de pochette d'album, influençant par la suite des générations de graphistes. Moins bien connus, ses affiches pour la U.S. Navy, ses emballages et étiquettes pour des groupes de spiritueux, ses séquences de titres de films, ainsi que sa propre production artistique.

Né à Brooklyn en 1917, Alex Steinweiss entra au lycée Abraham Lincoln au plus fort de la Grande dépression. Il se retrouva là sous l'aile protectrice du directeur du département d'art, Leon Friend, qui eut également comme élèves Seymour Chwast, Gene Federico et William Taubin. Après être sorti diplômé de la « Parsons School of Art and Design » , Steinweiss fut, pendant 3 ans, l'assistant du graphiste autrichien Joseph Binder. En 1939, il devint le 1er directeur artistique de la « Columbia Records » et inventa la pochette d'album. Pendant la Seconde Guerre mondiale, Steinweiss s'engagea dans la Marine, y dessinant des affiches, le jour, et continuant à travailler pour « Columbia » , la nuit. Après la guerre, il trouva de nouveaux clients non seulement dans l'industrie du disque (« London », « Decca », « RCA », « Everest »), mais aussi parmi des distilleries, des studios de cinéma, des revues ou des laboratoires médicaux. Son œuvre a été exposée dans tous les États-Unis, et, parmi de nombreuses récompenses, il s'est vu attribuer la médaille de l'« American Institute of Graphic Arts » (ou AIGA) ainsi que le prix du « Art Directors Hall of Fame » pour l'ensemble de son œuvre.

Before Alex Steinweiss invented the album cover, in 1938, at the age of 23, all albums came in plain brown wrappers. Steinweiss's idea to create a package that had something visual on the outside to lure the consumer was a huge success.

That simple idea revolutionized the record business and spawned an entire new field of illustration album cover art - that is now inseparable from the product it announces. Steinweiss' covers are still regarded as icons of the genre. He designed them as miniature posters, with eye-catching graphics, distinctive and vivid colours, and creative, original typography. He was an accomplished illustrator, and he incorporated original artwork into most of his pieces. The Steinweiss style went, hand in hand, with the golden age of Jazz, Classical, and Popular music.

The graphic design artist Alexander « Alex » Steinweiss was born on 24 March 1917 in Brooklyn and died on 17 July 2011 in Sarasota, Florida. He was known for inventing record album cover art.

His father was a women's shoe designer from Warsaw and his mother was a seamstress from Riga, Latvia. They moved to the Lower-East Side of Manhattan and, eventually, settled in the Brighton Beach section of Brooklyn. Steinweiss said he was destined to be a commercial artist. In high-school, he marveled at his classmates who « could take a brush, dip it in some paint and make letters », he recalled. « So, I said to myself : “ If some day, I could become a good sign painter, that would be terrific ! ” » Steinweiss earned a scholarship to the Parsons School of Design.

After graduation, Steinweiss worked for 3 years for the Austrian poster designer Joseph Binder, whose flat color and simplified human figures were popular at the time and influenced his own work. During World War II, Steinweiss became « Columbia » Records' advertising manager. He left for a job at the Navy's Training and Development Center in New York City, where he produced teaching materials and cautionary posters.

After the War, Steinweiss freelanced for « Columbia ». During one lunch meeting there, the company's president, Ted Wallerstein, introduced him to an innovation that the company was about to unveil : the long-playing record. But there was a problem. The heavy, folded kraft paper used to protect 78 rpm records left marks on the vinyl microgroove when 33 1/3 rpm LP's were stacked.

Steinweiss was asked to develop a jacket for the new format and, with help from his brother-in-law, found a manufacturer willing to invest about $ 250,000 in equipment. Steinweiss had the original patent for what became the industry packaging standard (he did not develop the inner sleeve, only the outer package) , but under his contract with « Columbia » , he had to waive all rights to any inventions made while working there.

In the 1930's, recorded music was sold in plain packaging, or record shop advertising « bags » ; sets of discs were also usually issued in plain albums. However, colored artwork had been used on special albums, from World War I. This was separately printed and pasted onto album covers and occasionally inside the albums : for example, « HMV » 's issue of Liza Lehmann's « In a Persian Garden » and Operettas by Edward German and Gilbert & Sullivan were all available, by 1918, in such decorated albums.

In 1939, Alex Steinweiss was the 1st art director for « Columbia » Records, where he introduced a wider application of album covers and cover art. « They were so drab, so unattractive. » , said Steinweiss, « I convinced the executives to let me design a few. » . Steinweiss was active in record cover design from 1939 until 1973, when he semi-retired to devote himself to painting. By his own admission, he designed roughly 2,500 covers.

Steinweiss' career can be divided into roughly 5 periods. From 1939 to perhaps 1945, he designed all the covers for « Columbia » . During this period, he developed the entire graphic « language » of album design.

The 2nd period is from 1945 to roughly 1950, during which he was no longer the sole designer for « Columbia » . He also began designing for other companies. This period is sometimes described as the « 1st Golden Age » of the album cover.

Steinweiss' signature type font, the « Steinweiss scrawl » , 1st appeared in roughly 1947. Steinweiss claims to have invented the LP cover, which 1st appeared in 1948.

Starting in around 1950, Steinweiss did the covers and record label for « Remington » , and began a more than 20 year association with both « Decca » and « London Records » . Like his earlier periods, most of his early 1950's designs are drawn, for « Columbia » , « RCA » , « Remington » , « Decca » and « London » . This is his 3rd period, when he did drawing, lettering, and layout that was often brilliant but perhaps not as memorable as his late-1940's period. It was during this period that he collaborated with Margaret Bourke-White on a memorable series of covers for « Columbia » .

Starting in the mid- 1950's, Steinweiss added photography to his palette. Steinweiss's photographic covers are remarkably distinctive. He utilized strange garish colours, odd lighting, and numerous visual puns and reference points. He continued to work for « Decca » and « London » , and did the entire series of covers (and the logo and label) for the startup « Everest » label, from 1958 until roughly 1960. This was his 4th period, characterized by photography but continuing to use the entire range of tools he had developed. Steinweiss' final period of record cover design was from 1960 to roughly 1973, again working for « Decca » and « London » . His new developments of the period were in die-cut designs and collage.

Steinweiss also designed liquor bottles, posters, magazine, pamphlet, book covers and titles for TV shows. He remained semi-active, having designed at least 1 book cover in the 1980's and 4 CD covers for « Harmonie Ensemble / New York » , Steven Richman, conductor.

Igor Stravinsky : « l'Histoire du Soldat » , « Rarities and Premieres » (2001) .

Dvořák Day Concert, « Bridge Records » (2001) .

Dvořák Festival Orchestra of New York, Steven Richman, conductor, « Music & Arts » (2001) .

Aaron Copland : « Rarities and Premieres » , « Koch International Classics » (2004) .

Symphonic Jazz : Ferde Grofé and George Gershwin in Original Paul Whiteman Orchestra Versions, « Bridge Records » (2006) .

Steinweiss's cover for the original Broadway cast recording of « South Pacific » (1949) has been in almost continuous use ever since for the 78 rpm set, for the LP, for the 45 rpm set, for various tape formats and for the CD. The only other graphic design in America to be used for so many years is the Coca-Cola bottle.

In 1942, Steinweiss hired Jim Flora, which launched Flora's 40+ year career as a commercial artist.

In 1998, Steinweiss was inducted into the « Art Directors Club » Hall of Fame.

In 2001, Steinweiss was featured in Carlo McCormick's gallery show « The LP Show » , originating in New York's « Exit Art » and then, in 2002, traveling to the « Experience Music Project » in Seattle and « The Andy Warhol Museum » in Pittsburgh.

In 2003, CMP Information and the International Recording Media Association created the « Alex Awards for Excellence » in album cover art, which were named in honour of Alex Steinweiss.

He was interviewed for a chapter in « Sound Unbound : Sampling Digital Music and Culture » , edited by Paul D. Miller (aka D.J. Spooky) , The MIT Press (2008) .

His death was confirmed by his son. In addition to his son, he is survived by a daughter, Hazel Steinweiss, 6 grandchildren, and 3 great-grandchildren.

Alex Steinweiss, father of the album cover, lived to be ninety-four, but his legacy will endure for centuries to come. The record sleeves and album artwork we know and love, and have come to take for granted, owe their existence to the iconic designer, who in 1940 created the first illustrated 78 rpm album package as a young art director at Columbia Records. The company took a chance on his idea — to replace the standard plain brown wrapper with an eye-catching poster-like illustration — and increased its record sales eightfold in mere months. His covers, blending bold typography with elegant, graphically ambitious artwork, forever changed not only the way albums were sold, but also the way audiences related to recorded music. He made, as critics now frequently say, “music for the eyes.”

I love music so much and I had such ambition that I was willing to go way beyond what the hell they paid me for. I wanted people to look at the artwork and hear the music.” ~ Alex Steinweiss

Steinweiss' extraordinary work and legacy live on in Alex Steinweiss: The Inventor of the Modern Album Cover — a lavish Taschen volume by triple Grammy Award-winning art director Kevin Reagan and prolific design writer Steven Heller (yes, him again), cataloguing three decades' worth of Steinweiss's magnificent classical, jazz and popular records, as well as logos, labels, advertising ephemera and even his very own typeface, contextualized with essays that illuminate their historical importance, visual innovation and cultural legacy.

Alex Steinweiss and other Artists and Designers

(Image) Alex Steinweiss 1st 78 rpm illustrated album for « Columbia » Records, in 1939.

In the beginning for many LP records, a convenient basic design was used which only needed filling in names of artist(s) , composer(s) , compositions and reference number on the tombstone of « Columbia » 's covers.

(Image) The Steinweiss cover for the 10 inch « Columbia » release, in 1950, of music by Sibelius and Rachmaninoff performed by Eugene Ormandy and The Philadelphia Orchestra.

Steinweiss designed the 1952 fall « Remington » Record Catalog.

(Image) The 1st label Alex Steinweiss designed for « Remington » Records. Inc. It is « Remington » 's 3rd label and has Don Gabor's signature. It also shows the crown which was retained from the early label. But the style bears Alex Steinweiss's signature.

In 1939, 22 year old Alexander Steinweiss proposed to « Columbia » to make a change in the presentation and packaging of the 78 rpm record albums. Sleeves for single disks were often made of plain paper or had more elaborate designs which served as advertisements not directly linked to the recorded music pressed on the disk. Big record companies everywhere put their disks in sleeves with elaborate designs.

(Images) Here, 4 examples of European 78 rpm record sleeves from the 1930's : « Columbia » (Great Britain) ; « Polydor » (« Deutsche Grammophon ») ; « His Master's Voice » (advertising the « HMV » re-entrant horn) ; and « Telefunken » (with the image of violinist Georg Kulenkampff) .

(Image) Multi-record releases in albums were rather simple if compared to the stylish 78 rpm sleeves. Below is the « Columbia album » No. CX 120, later renamed MX-120, of Franz Liszt's « Todtentanz » , performed by pianist Edward Kilenyi and conductor Selmar Meyrowitz, on 2 x 12 " 78 rpm disks.

So, why not adorn these albums with graphics too ? Steinweiss's idea was to use original artwork (drawings and paintings) on the front of the albums specifically related to the recorded work(s).

This approach was quite a change, even if compared to the more luxurious gold or silver imprint of the nomenclature in a serif or gothic font on the black, green, brown or beige heavy books.

The design of the albums was derived from the photo album design with a plain and simple layout and lettering as this European release of « HMV » (« Victor » in the United States) shows.

(Image) Pianist Oscar Levant plays George Gershwin's « Rhapsody in Blue » with the Philadelphia Orchestra under Eugene Ormandy on « Columbia » MX251 (LP : ML4026) .

This is not the world's 1st album cover ever, because that was for a 1939 collection of songs by Rodgers and Hart. It is also not the factual best selling cover of the « Rhapsody » played by Alec Templeton with André Kostelanetz which I only have in its plain edition and was released only much later on LP, in January 1952 (ML4455) . The Templeton album which was illustrated by Steinweiss shows a small, white piano under a street lamp which is, in fact, a trumpet, the suggestion of the New York skyline in black, plus the lettering which is, as always with Steinweiss, an integral part of the design.

Even though Steinweiss' idea seems a logical step, the idea itself was revolutionnary and had a vast impact on the record business. The new look sky-rocketed the sales of a Rodgers & Hart album (with Orchestra conducted by Richard Rogers) which was already on the shelves but now it was appealing even more.

From that day on, of every new release sales were boosted above average and the artistic packaging became an important part of the record. Soon, this idea was adopted by every record company.

Imagine, being that young and your idea is accepted by an important company. The idea is provocative, it is revolutionary, and it links a commercial concept to a high artistic quality. That is thrilling. At 1st sight, there is a slight reminiscence of cubism and art deco, but it follows its own development. It breaks with old fashioned thinking. Now, the liner notes of the albums are also styled in a modern way as is shown by the later release of a box with 2 x 12 in. shellac records with the recording of Suite No. 1 from « Peer Gynt » (Edvard Grieg) , Eugene Ormandy conducting the Philadelphia Orchestra (« Columbia Masterworks » , Set MX-291) .

In 1948, almost 10 years after Alex Steinweiss proposed the illustrated album cover, « Columbia » presented the LP format to the public. The advantage over the 78 rpm album was 1st of all the increased capacity. A Symphony on 4 x 78 rpm records could now be engraved on a single long-playing disc. The new medium did not need the fat, heavy albums any longer but could do with a simpler sleeve. Many standard sleeves for 78 rpm records in albums were made of « Kraft » (brown) paper, folded together and glued either at the spine and top, or at the top or bottom and, as some state, with a strip folded inside the sleeve. If this method was applied to sleeves for the new LP record, it could damage the vinyl. (In my collection of 78's, all albums and sleeves, post- and pre-War, have so called flip-back seams, this means that the seams or strips were glued on the outside instead of the inside !)

Now, a new sleeve had to be designed for the LP. « Columbia » asked Steinweiss to design a cover specifically for a single Long-Playing Record. That is what he did. He also designed the box-set, both for 33 rpm records and for shellac as is shown in the picture of Set MX 291.

Alex Steinweiss (born March 24, 1917, in Brooklyn, New York) graduated from Abraham Lincoln High-School and was trained by Leon Friend, the school's 1st art department chairman. Young, Alex received a scholarship from Parsons School of Design (New York) . He graduated in 1937 and was, for 2 years, assistant to Joseph Binder. In 1939, he was retained as Art Director at « Columbia » Records, and was appointed Advertising Manager for « Columbia » Records, in 1943. From 1943 until the end of the War, he was Exhibits Engineer in the U.S. Navy « TADC » (Tactical Air Direction Center) . In 1945, he settled as a free lance designer and consultant, painter and ceramist, working for a variety of companies and industries, including « Columbia » Records, and was a free lancer ever since. In 1981, he was appointed to the Board of Trustees of the Ringling School of Art, Sarasota, Florida. He was appointed honorary member of the Board of Directors of Asclo Opera, also in Sarasota. Numerous are the entries in reference books, and articles in magazines, beginning in 1940, in « Printer's Ink » (1940) ; « Art and Industry » (1942) ; « Who's Who in America » (supplement, October 1943) ; « Down Beat » (1947) ; « Graphis Annual » , « Professional Cartooning » , « Modern Publicity » , etc. He exhibited in galleries and museums in the United States and Europe (Great Britain, France, Germany, and other countries) . Right from 1939 on, he received many awards, a total of at least 20, the last was in 1993, in Sarasota, where he was honoured by Temple Emanu-el along with 9 other Sarasota visual artists.

(Image) The 1st design was a sleeve made of rather thin « Kraft » paper with the opening at the top (1948) .

Later, Steinweiss came-up with the folded cardboard which became the standard of the industry, in the United States. His basic design was soon varied upon (in all sorts of forms with the fold at the spine ; the 2 separate sheets with a re-inforcement at the spine ; and / or a re-inforcement at the top and bottom seam) , but it remained, in essence, the same, up to this day.

Generally, a larger sheet with the printed art was folded and glued over the edges. The square sheet with the liner notes was glued on the back, as the drawing shows. The reverse way was also done : the sheet with the liner notes, larger than the actual cardboard, was folded over the edges and the square sheet with the artwork was glued on the front. In some designs, the top and bottom seams were re-inforced with a small strip of some strong fabric which was glued into the seam.

In Europe, various solutions were devised. Early Dutch « Philips » covers were of the gatefold kind, as were several « VOX » productions from Great Britain. « Deutsche Grammophon » had the gatefold with the record compartment glued at the edges with blue linen tape. The records were slipped into a compartment made of somewhat less rough paper. « Electrola » had a gatefold similar to that of « Deutsche Grammophon » , also later lined with a plastic sheet (polyurethane ?) , however not stitched but glued at the edges and the seams bonded with a light colored linen tape.

In later editions of « Deutsche Grammophon » , from about 1954 on, the gatefold had the stitched compartment lined with plastic sheet. This design had an appeal of quality but, many times, it was the cause of a damaged, scuffed or scratched record as the LP had to be grabbed at the periphery and pulled-out of the flat opening of the compartment. Often, the sheets were not opened correctly and the record was slipped in wrongly. The best way to go about is to place the right part of the cover on a flat surface, open the gatefold, then separate the plastic lining and gently take-out the record. Form follows function. In hindsight, this Adagio did not entirely apply to the « Deutsche Grammophon » covers. The designers may have thought differently at the time, the same as so many designs of today forget about the functionality. Go to the super-market and get irritated by products with a confusing, weird packaging, so the client gets lost. Or browse the world-wide web and stumble upon several didactically ill designed pages which take-up too much time for the visitor who has to find-out and understand the way of thought of the person who built the page and who makes navigation more difficult than is, in fact, necessary. Not with Alex Steinweiss. His design solutions are practical. His artwork is communicative, almost interactive in the modern sense, because of balanced composition and fine detail.

The 7 ", 10 " and 12 " of the popular « Polydor » records had simple covers, also stitched at the sides, the opening at the top. This was, in fact, a follow-up of the heavy felt-like covers of the 78 rpm quality labels from before World War II which were stitched also at the sides.

Later « EMI » , « Decca » and « Philips » , in England, and Dutch « Philips » were put in so called flip-back covers. In Germany, « Telefunken » and « RCA » had also a folded cover. The fold was at the bottom and the sides were glued together. The opening was at the top.

As said, in the United States however, many « Columbia » LP records (and in the beginning those of most manufacturers) were put into flimsy, all purpose sleeves with a basic graphic design. It sufficed to print the names of the artists, the title and the reference number on the front and some liner notes or a list of other available records on the back. Many early « Remington » releases, in 1950 and 1951, were also slipped into thin, floppy all purpose, generic sleeves with only different titles printed on the front. Some of the early recordings had already their own art created specifically in relation to the music.

Many of the designs for the early « Remington » red-label productions were made by a man named Freeman. Other names that came-up were of Sherman Alpert, Raboni, and for « Plymouth » , it was Roy E. La Gione. When profits had been made, the product's appeal could be improved upon to further boost the turnover. Now, new sleeves were designed by someone whose initials were E.D.L. , by Einhorn and already by Curt John Witt who also made many covers for the « Plymouth » releases which often contained the recorded material originally issued on « Remington » . Instead of pictures of the artists and listings of other recordings available, now, the covers had liner notes. As no initials or a name of the author was mentioned, it is unclear who wrote the liner notes. It is possible that, also, some were written by George Curtiss, Don Gabor's cousin and managing director of the Webster pressing plant in Massachusetts.

As the competition was growing, producer Don Gabor was convinced that he needed the full attention of the buyer and that he should have covers that were well-designed and that the style should have distinctive features in order to be recognized so the discs would be able to compete with the products of the big companies. So why not ask the man who designed the covers for « Columbia Masterworks » , Alex Steinweiss, to develop a corporate image and a basic design for the covers and the label of « Remington » records.

Alex Steinweiss designed a new basic layout for the label, the covers of Remington LP's, and for the company's business presentation. In fact, Steinweiss designed a complete corporate image for Don Gabor's company. He designed the 3rd « Remington » label, the black-gold label with the letters « REMINGTON » placed in boxes arranged in a circle at the periphery of the label, including a box with a crown. Above, the nomenclature (in the upper-half of the label) the text « A Don Gabor Production » was placed in Steinweiss hand-drawn lettering, later copyrighted as « Steinweiss Scrawl » .

The same elements adorned the covers. On the left, the letters « REMINGTON » were placed in boxes in a vertical row, topped by a box with the same « A Don Gabor Production » and, at the bottom, a box with the crown. Furthermore, the logo with laurels was replaced by a new oval emblem with the text « Complete Audible Range Reproduction » , a logo that was to suggest the same quality as « Full Frequency Range Recording » or « ffr » (English « Decca » and « London ») , « New Orthophonic High-Fidelity » (« RCA ») , « Living Presence » (« Mercury ») , Full Dimensional Sound (« Capitol ») .

Designed by Alex Steinweiss : « A Don Gabor Production » , the crown, the vertical row of boxes which spelled « REMINGTON » , plus the heading on the stationery (and other documents) with the slogan « music for millions » , the capital « R » on the catalog with the « Remington » logo, and the black and gold sticker with the important text « factory sealed » , they were, from July 1952 on, the elements defining the corporate image of « Remington » Records Inc. The « Musirama » recordings were announced in the 1953 catalog and the new label was introduced in the following year.

When better recordings were made under the supervision of both László Halasz and Don Gabor, and improved microphone placement was used (and probably devised) by Gabor's technician Robert Blake (Blake later recorded for the « Everest » label as a few covers indicate) . This microphone technique was named « MUSIRAMA » , indicated by a triangular logo put on the cover. « MUSIRAMA » was also added to the label. The earlier « A Don Gabor Production » logo with laurels was replaced by the atomic symbol and the wording « 3 dimensional sound » .

The graphics of the labels are extremely beautiful because of the combination of a serif typeface for the label name (« REMINGTON ») and a sans serif, gothic type for reference numbers and the description of the contents of the recording. Steinweiss also designed a basic layout for the back of the cover to complement the new style of the « MUSIRAMA » editions : frames, typefaces for titles, liner notes and reference numbers, positioning of logo, etc.

Alex Steinweiss is noted for his « Columbia » covers and one easily gets the impression that this was the only label he worked for. But it is significant that he designed the covers for other labels as well. And he worked with other designers and artists like Curt John Witt (later covers indicate « Curt John Witt Design House » ; he also designed for « Allegro Royale » and « Opera Society ») , Leonard Slonevski, Watty and Otto Rado. And Albitz and H. Kaebitz. From Kaebitz's hand is the cover of « Symphony fantastique » . It displays a sinister purple color, and a cross adorned with faces. He also designed the covers for the « Young Violinist's Edition » of Alice and Theodore Pashkus. Albitz is the artist of Kilenyi's Franz Liszt album where on a purple background the shapes of a grand piano and candles with flickering flames indicate the Romanticism which was seen a couple of years earlier in the 1945 biopic of Liszt's contemporary Chopin, « A song to Remember » , where Merle Oberon (as George Sand) walked into the non-lit room and places the candelabras on the grand piano, thus revealing that Frederick Chopin (Cornel Wilde) was playing instead of Franz Liszt, what everybody expected. (The piano part was played by José Iturbi) .

Don Gabor and László Halasz supervised the « MUSIRAMA » recordings made with the « RIAS » Symphony, in Berlin. It is not sure if Gabor was present during all recordings, but it is known from the « Varèse-Sarabande » , « The Remington Series » , that Gabor visited Berlin in any case, on several occasions, while Halasz was always present when recordings of the Orchestra were made. At times also, « Remington » recording engineer, Robert Blake, traveled to Berlin.

Both Gabor and Halasz were of European origin and they certainly took part in the Berlin cultural life after production hours. There was still a lot of suffering going on, because of the vast destruction of the city during the years of War. But there was also a new « élan » to rebuild Berlin and its culture, and a new Germany. The will to move forward and make things better was also illustrated in 1953 with the up-rising in the Russian sector. That was the Berlin in which Gabor and Halasz arrived and were going to make recordings in 1954, in West Berlin.

Gabor and Halasz were moving in artistic circles meeting other producers (for example, those of the Bertelsmann firm) , radio people (when negotiating the recording of the Glazunov Violin Concerto with Roman Totenberg) , musicians, various conductors they engaged, and artists. In this way, they got acquainted with the artistic and intellectual life in Berlin of 1954. It is very plausible that they met with Ruth Geiss who was married to Hans Albitz. Hans and Ruth Albitz were a young designer couple in their early 1930's, at the time, and had made a name in Germany already.

It is known that Gabor (together with Steinweiss) supervised the creation of record covers. Records were pressed in the « Remington » pressing plant, in Massachusetts. The covers were printed there as well. Spending time in Berlin making recordings would postpone several releases of new material. And that is why Gabor could have asked the Albitz couple, or specifically Ruth Albitz, to do a few covers for recordings that were in the making or had been done with the « RIAS » Symphony. Another reason could be that Gabor always had an eye for the unusual to have the « Remington » label stand-out. Covers designed in Europe could add to the quality. And, on top of that, Gabor loved art.

The covers for the recordings of the « RIAS » Symphony Orchestra with Manuel Rosenthal, Edward Kilenyi and Jonel Perlea, and the recording with Gerhard Becker, bear the name Albitz. Although there are American people with the name Albitz, these covers must have been designed by the Albitz couple, and specifically the Gerhard Becker recording by Ruth Albitz. The style of that cover reminds one of the cover for the book, « Sei Schön und Charmant » (Be Beautiful and Charming) , by author Alma Archer, with drawings by Ruth Albitz-Geiss. The influence of her husband is seen in the more formal designs.

Note that the cover for the recording of French Overtures conducted by Gerhard Becker does not indicate the designer, and that the cover for the orchestral Medley from « The Beggar Student » , also conducted by Gerhard Becker, was designed by Otto Rado.

Gabor could have followed the same procedure in case of the covers for the recordings of George Sebastian (« Symphonie fantastique » , « Wagner Overtures » , « Wagner Favorites ») . This would indicate that H. Kaebitz is also a German graphic designer, recruited during one of Gabor's stays. Kaebitz is also responsible for the cover for the recording of « la Boîte à Joujoux » conducted by Manuel Rosenthal. H. Kaebitz made the covers for the « Young Violinist's Series » (edited by Shermont and Schulhof) as well.

Rudolph de Harak (1924-2002) designed 3 covers for Don Gabor, 2 for a « Remington » releases and another for a « Pontiac » release, around 1952. He later became famous for designs for the Metropolitan Museum, the United States Pavilion at the Osaka World Fair, for « Man Planet Space » during Expo 1967, in Montreal. He also designed the « Quadra » typeface and more than 400 book jackets for McGraw-Hill's book division.

Also an artist named Riser provided record jacket art.

Steinweiss himself designed covers, and he coordinated the work of the other artists as well. In the beginning, existing covers were adapted to the new layout. But as soon as new recordings were to be released, new artwork was made and even particular covers that were already restyled, were replaced by covers with new artwork. The most significant example is Edward Kilenyi's recording of the « Chopin Waltzes » which could be obtained in (at least) 2 different editions.

Another noted cover by Alex Steinweiss for « Remington » (R-199-126) with the « Steinweiss Scrawl » typeface in abundance : violinist Michèle Auclair plays « Kreisler Encores » accompanied by pianist Otto Schulhof.

The designs made by Steinweiss for « Remington » are not always as elaborate as most of the covers he did for «

Columbia » Records. But there are exceptions of course. An example is the beautiful cover for R-199-128 with violinist Michèle Auclair and cellist Gaspar Cassado playing gems.

However, the similarities in style are obvious. The « Remington » covers have an originality of their own which is also brought about by the vertical logo (designed by Steinweiss) , on the left of the cover, which had to be « integrated » in the artwork. Integration also applied to the triangle of the « MUSIRAMA » logo which was added later on.

The designs of the « Remington » covers are, at times, a bit simple and reflect a somewhat childish optimism, one could say. To a large extent, this style was imposed by the technique of plate production and the printing process available in those days, a technique which had its restrictions. The intensity and shade of colours varied as in those days the « Pantone Matching System » (or PMS) - which was devised by Lawrence Herbert, in 1963, and has been the reference for designers, art directors, and printers ever since - did not yet exist. The mixing of the paint was not always done in the same manner. So, if you encounter a pale cover, there is no deliberate argument behind it. It is just a print from ink / paint of a different mix.

Many covers witness the personalities of the various designing artists who (often guided by Steinweiss) and reflected the nature of the music in their work.

(Image) A « golden » laminated cover by Steinweiss at the occasion of the 5th Anniversary of « Columbia » 's Long-Playing record (September 1953) , with popular music of Tchaïkovsky conducted by Eugene Ormandy. The style for the LP's of « Columbia » is often more sophisticated and more serious by the use of darker tones. By exception, this cover has the designer's name written in his famous « scrawl » which is unusual for « Columbia » covers.

As free lance art director of « Columbia » , Alex Steinweiss also supervised the work of other artists like he supervised several designers for the « Remington » label.

(Image) Cover of Gershwin's Concerto in F with pianist Oscar Levant and Andre Kostelanetz conducting the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York on « Columbia » (ML 4025) is by artist Velde and created in 1950, more or less in the Steinweiss vein.

Steinweiss's covers distinguish themselves by the hand-writing (the « Steinweiss Scrawl ») : names of artists, location of recording, the works recorded. So, even if his name is not mentioned, the original artist is generally recognized. Steinweiss is the one who, at times, uses more pastel colours and fine lines as for the covers of « Scheherazade » with the « RIAS » Symphony Orchestra and the cover of « Piano Encores » .

Publisher « Taschen » , from Los Angeles, prepared a new publication about Alex Steinweiss and his work : « The Inventor of the Modern Album Cover » compiled and written by Kevin Reagan, Steven Heller and Alex Steinweiss, published in October 2009. It is a celebration of 90 year old Alexander Steinweiss who personally signed every book (which has the shape of an old illustrated 78 rpm record album but is somewhat larger in size) . The book itself is extremely well-designed and printed, and is overflowing with innumerable reproductions of covers and other Steinweiss graphics.

Curt John Witt who did many covers for « Remington » , has his own signature of style. His designs initially have calmness and simplicity like the cover for Beethoven's « Pastoral » Symphony. He also designed one of the covers for the « Waltzes of Chopin » (R-199-82) . Later on, his designs have bright and intense colours and straight lines : Chopin's « 4 Scherzi » played by Jorge Bolet and the recording with music of American composers Ward and Stein. He just uses a few colours evoking the modernism of Gershwin's Concerto in F. He could have been the artist who designed the Prokofiev cover on which no name is mentioned. Some covers just state Curt John Witt, while other covers mention : « Design House - Curt John Witt » . Witt worked for other labels as well. He designed the cover for « The Opera Society » 's edition of the 2 x 10 in. LP-set in a gatefold of Gluck's « Orpheus and Eurydice » performed by The Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra and Chorus under Nicolas Goldschmidt and Dutch singers Léon Combé, Corry Bijster and Anette de la Bije. (« The Opera Society » was a label of the « Concert Hall Society / Musical Masterpieces Society » .) His work can also be found on many covers of Eli Oberstein's Pseudonyms on « Allegro / Royale » releases.

The cover Otto Rado did for « Westminster » 's release of Rimsky-Korsakov's « Scheherazade » conducted by Argeo Quadri and the front of the album of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » conducted by Hermann Scherchen, also for « Westminster » .

He also did the cover for « Urania » (7112) , released in 1954, with Fritz Kirmse performing Malipiero's Violin Concerto with Rudolf Kleinert conducting the Orchestra of Radio Leipzig, and Saschko Grawiloff as soloist in Rakov's Violin Concerto with the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra conducted by Arthur Rother.

Slonevski and Wattly use styles which have a more common and plain quality if compared to the other, brighter designs. And Rudolph de Harak designed in a sober style.

On the cover of the recording of Dvořák's 4th Symphony (today, the 8th) , designer Otto Rado beautifully expressed a pastoral mood. In that way, he accentuates the sense of beauty. His love for the use of gold can also be seen in the cover for « Westminster » 's 1953 « Scheherazade » release (WL 5234, Argeo Quadri conducting) . For « Westminster » 's recording of Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » , under Hermann Scherchen, he created a simple illustration with an added perspective of the divine light (WAL 401) . Rado also worked for the « Urania » label as illustrated by the release of the Violin Concertos of Rakov and Malipiero. Extraordinary is his art for the 3 LP « Remington » box-set of Verdi's « Aida » conducted by Franco Capuana. That is a collectible item for reasons of both performance and cover design.

An example of (obviously) a new creative phase in the output of Alexander Steinweiss : The cover of the recording of Benjamin Britten's « les Illuminations » and Norman Dello Joio's « Meditations Ecclesiastes » . Signed in the famous « Steinweiss scrawl » as used for early « Columbia » and « Remington » records.

(Image) Janice Harsanyi, Soprano, and the Princeton Chamber Orchestra conducted by Nicholas Harsanyi - « Decca » (DL 710138) . The arrangement of the label name and graphic motifs, in a circle, was more or less initiated by Steinweiss in the creation of the style for the « Remington » labels. From then on, this arrangement is a trait of Steinweiss's style. He applied the same idea in the labels for American « Decca » . The inner sleeves have a luxurious design explaining to the eye that it is about a recording in « Decca » 's « Gold Label » Series.

The very personal style of Alex Steinweiss is also seen in the early album covers for Bob Whyte's « Everest » records and the design of the early labels of the « Everest » releases. Again, he arranged the label's name in a circle and he choose specific colours. To add to the significance of the « Everest » releases, the label mentioned « A CERTIFIED STEREO-MASTER RECORDING » (somewhat like the « CARR » emblem and the « MUSIRAMA » logo on the « Remington » labels) . The early « Everest » issues had this very distinctive basic design, the specific fonts included.

The silver / green / black label was the original label designed by Steinweiss and matched the basic layout for the covers with 2 blue stripes. The same typeface was used on label and cover. Both the box of Gustav Mahler's 5th Symphony with Rudolf Schwarz (SDBR 3014-2) , and the cover of « Around the World in 80 Days » (SDBR 1020) state : Cover design by Alex Steinweiss. , as does the cover of Leopold Stokowski conducting Villa-Lobos' Masterpiece « Uirapuru » (SDBR 3016) .

Positioning a record label in the market is not just done by hiring able artists and selecting interesting repertoire. It is the total package that counts. In order to catch the eye of the prospective buyer, « Everest » started with the most luxurious album design : silver back, silver inner sleeve with a dowel for the release of Raoul Poliakin's album with « Waltz Masterpieces » (SDBR 3025) .

In the long run, it turned-out to be an expensive construction to manufacture. But not only that. The opening of the inner sleeve was not at the top « à la française » , but positioned at the spine of the cover. In practice, the record could force itself through the spine and easily damage cover and record.

The label for the Khachaturian Piano Concerto with Peter Katin and Hugo Rignold had a less elaborate label ; less costly in creating and printing it (SDBR 3055) .

The layout of the liner notes about the music and performers consisted of 3 colums. The technical information was also framed in 3 columns but printed in a different font.

When only stereo compatible issues were released the dominant indication « STEREO » was omitted as the cover of the « Petrouchka » recording by Sir Eugene Goossens shows (SDBR 3033) . But then, also, the quality of the pressings became less and less and eventually the label became the budget label where quality of Mastering and vinyl did not matter and « Everest » lost the glory it originally had.

The labels on the « Columbia » records were actually simple and plain. They followed a common pattern. But that was going to evolve. In this context, it would be logical to assume that the later labels for « Columbia » , mentioning composers, works, and performers, reference numbers, Side 1 and 2, etc. were designed by Alex Steinweiss as well. That is however not the case. The famous « Columbia » « 6-Eye » labels were created by famous designer Sadamitsu Neil Fujita when working for « Columbia » Records in the 1950's. He started off as a painter but chose for design to make a living and designed for « Columbia » . After he had left « Columbia » , in 1957, he worked for « Command » Records, and various publishing houses.

The application of artwork and the use of very distinctive graphics for the early « Everest » covers is the more remarkable while, by that time, the trend was gradually changing towards the use of photographs combined with graphics and finally just using pictures with lettering.

In the early years of advertising, objects and people were depicted in drawings in black and white and, later, in color.

When new, more cost effective printing techniques became available, art directors and copywriters started to work together with photographers who were commissioned to shoot photos along the lines of the art director's concept. Gradually, the graphic artist was replaced by the photographer completely. The art director designed the basic layout and chose the picture and the various typefaces. This trend was initiated by « RCA » , in the early 1950's, and was followed by many a record company.

The cover of « RCA » (LM-1815) « With Love From A Chorus » was listed in September 1954. It set the trend of using photography instead of graphics and specific artwork.

Famous are the covers of Ravel's « Daphnis et Chloé » performed by the Boston Symphony under Charles Münch (LM-1893) , from 1955, and « My True Love Sings » (LM-1998) , released in 1956.

« Victor » (LM-1817) from 1954 with an inspiring, sexy photograph covering « Gaité parisienne » performed by the Boston « Pops » Orchestra conducted by Arthur Fiedler. This recording was one of the 1st « RCA » stereo recordings but could only be released as a « Living Stereo » issue, in 1958, when the stereo format was launched. Later, another recording was done with Fiedler and released on LSC 2267 with a new cover.

The earliest examples of the use of photographs exclusively can be found on several « RCA » covers. From 1954 is the release of « With Love From A Chorus » (LM-1815) , sung by the Robert Shaw Chorale. Also famous is the cover of Ravel's « Daphnis et Chloé » by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the Robert Shaw Chorale under conductor Charles Münch (LM-1893) , from 1955. It has a distinct new style, as has the « RCA » cover of the 1956 release of « My True Love Sings » again by the Robert Shaw Chorale (LM-1998) . From then on also, older recordings were re-issued in covers adorned with photographs. This was, however, not the case with the release of Offenbach's « Gaité parisienne » conducted by Arthur Fiedler of which there was an earlier recording from 1950 issued on LM-1001. The release on LM-1817 was a new recording and had a sexy picture of a voluptuous leg of a « can-can » dancer.

The early designs with the Robert Shaw Chorale on « RCA » , from 1954 and 1956, may have inspired many a photographer and designer, like famous Dutch photographer Paul Huf when he made the covers for the « Philips » S-L Series with model Ann Pickford from England and typography by Harry van Borssum, launched in 1956.

Proof of this inspiration could be Huf's cover for the Piano Concertos of Franz Liszt performed by pianist Cor de Groot and the Recidency Orchestra conducted by Willem van Otterloo, reminiscing the lady in red on the early « RCA » cover. The same applies to his cover for « Ballet Music » by Léo Delibes and Charles Gounod with conductor Jean Fournet. Nevertheless, Paul Huf's is a very artistic and imaginative, and above all a very original style. In a similar style is the photography for the « Philips » S-L edition of « Scheherazade » played by the Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Eugene Ormandy.

« Columbia » naturally had covers designed in the same vein which was pioneered by « RCA » as shows the late release on LP of Oscar Levant's Gershwin recordings originally made in the 78 rpm era. The photographer was Hal Reif.

(Images) « The Huckle-Buck » and « Robin's Nest » : 2 different covers for Buck Clayton's most famous « Jam Session » on « Philips » (B 07022 L) : Buck Clayton and Joe Newman (trumpets) , Urbie Green and Henderson Chambers (trombones) , Lem Davis (alto sax) , Julian Dash (tenor sax) , Charlie Fowlkes (baritone sax) , Sir Charles Thompson (piano) , Freddie Green (piano) , Walter Page (bass) , and Jo Jones (drums) .

An example of the new trend to use photography in combination with graphics, and the use of plain photography is the release by « Philips » of the « Columbia » recording CL-548 which was 1st issued in the spring of 1954. The early hybrid design (graphics and pictures) of « Philips » B-07022-L, was eventually replaced by a powerful picture of Buck Clayton playing the trumpet. The 2nd edition was pressed from new plates and released around 1957. Although Alex Steinweiss already combined graphics and bits of photographic images in the 1940's, on the 78 rpm albums.

In the late-1950's, many old « Remington » recordings had a new disguise with a photograph on the cover and were now available on one or several of Gabor's other labels like : « Masterseal » , « Paris » , « Webster » , and « Palace » . In 1958, the « Remington » label was discontinued.

(Image) Cover of « Palace » M-601 with Tchaïkovsky (« Romeo and Juliet » Overture) and Grieg (« Peer Gynt » Suite No. 1) , played with the Viennese Symphonic Orchestra under fake conductor Kurt Baumann, a substitute for Kurt Wöb (in the Tchaïkovsky) as well as H. Arthur Brown (in the Grieg) .

When Don Gabor had revived his « Continental » label, in the 1960's, he once in a while issued a beautiful gatefold edition like the disk with « Gypsy Music » played by Markoff and his Romany Strings (CST-2005) .

After the craze of using photography had more or less passed, new generations of artists were designing labels and covers and corporate house-styles. Now, all styles and techniques were used, side by side, many times inspired by the pioneers of the early days.

Many record collectors and artists regret that the small size of the jewel case of the CD gives less opportunity to make an artistic cover. But, within the restrictions, there are quite a few remarkable CD covers and booklets. Yet, the CD with artwork and the small lettering is sometimes qualified as neat or cute, while an LP cover can be utterly impressive.

Remarkable is that the great Alex Steinweiss was the creator of the basic design for a budget label like Don Gabor's « Remington » LP records.

He did this from 1952 on, till about 1958, when the « Remington » label ceased to exist. By doing this, he added to the importance of the label and made « Remington » records easily recognizable. His basic concept had to be filled in by other artists and designers as well. He gave them enough freedom to express their own artistry.

1939 : Le chef Eduard van Beinum dirige, à 2 reprises, des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » .

Le chef d'orchestre néerlandais Eduard van Beinum est né le 3 septembre 1900 à Arnhem et est mort le 13 avril 1959 à Amsterdam.

Il étudie le violon et le piano dès son plus jeune âge. Il devient l'élève de Sem Dresden au Conservatoire d'Amsterdam. Il est engagé comme violoniste dans l'Orchestre d'Arnhem, en 1918, avant d'en devenir le chef, de 1927 à 1931. Puis, il rejoint l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam comme chef assistant de Willem Mengelberg jusqu'en 1938, date à laquelle il devient chef principal à ses côtés. Il va lui succéder de 1945 jusqu'à son décès inattendu lors d'une répétition à seulement 58 ans.

Sa carrière internationale le conduit à effectuer de fréquentes tournées en Europe et en Amérique. En 1947, il devient chef de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Londres mais revient très vite à Amsterdam afin d'y assumer seul la direction musicale. En 1956, il est nommé chef de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles, mais renonce à ce poste pour revenir en Europe.

Il reste bien moins connu que son prédécesseur Willem Mengelberg ou son successeur Bernard Haitink, en raison d'une direction Classique et respectueuse de la partition.

Avec une technique claire et analytique, Eduard van Beinum a souvent défendu les grandes œuvres contemporaines. Il fut aussi un très grand interprète d'Anton Bruckner. On retiendra 2 disques superbes, les 8e et 9e, avec l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam.

The Dutch conductor Eduard van Beinum was born on 3 September 1901 in Arnhem, Netherlands, and died on 13 April 1959 in Amsterdam.

He received his 1st violin and piano lessons at an early age. He joined the Arnhem Orchestra as a violinist, in 1918. His grandfather was conductor of a military band. His father played the double bass in the local Symphony Orchestra, the « Arnhemse Orkest » (later, « Het Gelders Orkest ») . His brother Co van Beinum was a violinist, and the 2 brothers performed as a violin - piano duo in concerts. As a student at the Amsterdam Conservatoire, he gained conducting experience with several concerts by amateur ensembles in Schiedam and Zutphen. He also conducted concerts by the choir of the church of Saint-Nicholas in Amsterdam.

Eduard van Beinum was the conductor of the Haarlem Orchestral Society, from 1927 to 1931. He 1st conducted the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in 1929. He became 2nd conductor of the « Concertgebouw » , in 1931, under the supervision of Willem Mengelberg. In 1938, he was named co-principal conductor, alongside Mengelberg. After World War II, Mengelberg was dismissed as principal conductor because of controversy over his (still-disputed) behavior and attitude towards the Nazi occupiers in the Netherlands. According to Kees Wisse, van Beinum « detested the Nazis and kept himself as aloof as he could » . Van Beinum did receive a reprimand after the post-War de-Nazification activities, but this was not so severe as to keep him from his post with the « Concertgebouw » . Van Beinum remained as sole principal conductor of the Orchestra after the War.

In 1947, he took-over the leadership of the London Philharmonic Orchestra, but left after 2 successful seasons. According to Michaël Kennedy in his biography of Sir Adrian Boult, van Beinum was « not well », which led the London Philharmonic Orchestra to seek Boult as a successor to him. In general, van Beinum suffered from health problems, including a heart condition, which left him unable to conduct for much of the 1950-1951 season of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

Eduard van Beinum made his U.S. guest conducting debut, in 1954, with the Philadelphia Orchestra. He took the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra on its 1st American tour, later in 1954. In 1956, the year of van Beinum's 25th anniversary with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, he was invested as a Grand Officer of the Order of Orange Nassau, and also received an honorary doctorate from the University of Amsterdam. Outside of the Netherlands, he also served as music-director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, from 1956 to 1959.

Eduard van Beinum suffered a fatal heart attack on 13 April 1959 on the « Concertgebouw » podium while rehearsing the Orchestra for a performance of Johannes Brahms' Symphony No. 1. He was buried in Garderen, located in the Veluwe region, where he maintained a residence. After his death, the Eduard van Beinum Foundation was established in 1960.

Eduard van Beinum was married to Sepha Jansen, a violinist with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. In 2000, their son, Bart van Beinum, published a book about his father, Eduard van Beinum, over « zijn leven en werk ». Van Beinum's recordings with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra are available on the « Philips » and « Decca » labels.

Born in Arnhem, in 1901, Eduard van Beinum mastered several instruments by the age of 14, with a particular emphasis on the piano. By the time he was 16, he was playing viola in an Arnhem based Orchestra led by his father. After entering the Amsterdam Conservatoire, Beinum began to conduct local choruses and provincial Orchestras throughout the Netherlands. Beinum's talents as a pianist brought him to the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw », in 1927, and he made his debut as a guest-conductor there, in 1929. In 1931, he was named to the post of assistant to chief conductor Willem Mengelberg. In 1938, Eduard van Beinum was promoted to joint leadership of the « Concertgebouw » alongside Mengelberg, but did not take full control of the Orchestra until 1945 when Mengelberg was suspended from his post and exiled after being declared a Nazi collaborator.

Musicians responded strongly to Beinum's leadership. He represented the antithesis of Mengelberg's autocratic manner. Beinum preferred to work with an Orchestra in a collaborative sense, and his evenhanded approach was what the « Concertgebouw » needed in the post-War period, when tensions were running high. In 1949, Beinum was named principal conductor of the London Philharmonic, premiering several works of Benjamin Britten and encouraging the efforts of aspiring composer Malcolm Arnold. Beinum took the « Concertgebouw » on a successful tour of the United States, in 1956, dividing the conducting duties with Rafael Kubelik. Beinum also accepted the job of musical director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, beginning in 1956. It was during a rehearsal with the « Concertgebouw », in April 1959, that Beinum suffered a fatal heart attack at age 58.

Beinum is first heard in radio air checks from 1939, and his full-fledged recording career did not get underway until « Telefunken » recorded him with the « Concertgebouw », in November 1941. Beinum made-up for lost time quickly at War's end, recording frequently and well for the English « Decca » and « Philips » labels, primarily with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » and the London Philharmonic. His recorded output is well invested in Romantic literature, and his interpretations of Beethoven's « Die Geschöpfe des Prometheus » and Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 are justly famous. But Beinum was also greatly interested in the contemporary music of his time, making many first recordings of works by Willem Pijper, Alphons Diepenbrock, Henk Badings, and Hendrik Andriessen, in addition to those of Béla Bartók, Benjamin Britten, and Igor Stravinsky.

Eduard van Beinum's family was very musical, his father being a double-bass player in the Arnhem Orchestra. Eduard learnt to play the piano, violin and viola, and, by the age of 16, he was performing in the viola section of his father's Orchestra. His elder brother was himself a violinist and choir Master, and he taught Eduard the rudiments of music. Eduard went on to study at the Amsterdam Conservatory, where a performance that he gave as a pianist of Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 1 drew a favourable response from the academic staff. His principal interest however was conducting, and he launched into this by directing amateur choirs and orchestras, notably at Schiedam and Zutphen. In 1927, he was appointed as conductor of the Haarlem Symphony Orchestra. Here, he learnt the back-bone of the orchestral repertoire and conducted many Dutch contemporary works. He left Haarlem for Amsterdam, in 1931, when he was appointed the 2nd conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, with which he had already appeared as a pianist and guest-conductor.

At the « Concertgebouw », he was able to observe not only the legendary chief conductor of the Orchestra, Willem Mengelberg, but also its numerous distinguished guest-conductors, such as Bruno Walter and Pierre Monteux. He maintained a strong individual profile and appeared as a guest abroad, notably with the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1937. In 1938, he was appointed principal conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, now working alongside Mengelberg. Following the end of World War II and the ban on conducting imposed upon Mengelberg as a result of his pro-Nazi stance, van Beinum took-over the musical direction of the « Concertgebouw » in 1945, remaining as chief conductor of the Orchestra for the rest of his life. In 1946, he happened to be in London discussing a visit by the Orchestra when Albert Coates, who was scheduled to conduct a concert with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, fell ill ; van Beinum stepped in and made an immediate impression. After further guest engagements with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, he was invited to become its chief conductor, a post which he held between 1949 and 1951, despite having to retire for 1 year, in 1950, because of ill health.

During 1954, van Beinum and the « Concertgebouw » made a highly-successful tour of America and American engagements quickly followed. Rather than accept a handful of concerts as a guest, van Beinum preferred to work extensively with 1 Orchestra. Thus, in 1955, he conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in 8 concerts at the Ravinia Festival ; and, in 1956, again after a series of successful guest engagements, he was appointed chief conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, with whom he was to spend 2 months of each year. However, van Beinum's career was cut short by poor health. In 1959, while conducting the « Concertgebouw » in a rehearsal of Brahms's Symphony No. 1, he suffered a fatal heart attack.

Eduard van Beinum earned the admiration of orchestral musicians by his style of conducting, which has been described by a member of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra as « stroking » the Orchestra rather than « hitting » it. A fine chamber musician, a role which he took frequently with his wife, the violinist Sepha Jansen, his driving philosophy was that he and the members of the Orchestra were making music together. Possessing an unflinching sense of musical style across the principal areas of the Symphonic repertoire, van Beinum was one of the 1st conductors of international standing to record for « Decca » Records with its « Full Frequency Range Recording » (FFRR) system. The resulting recordings, several of which have been re-issued, remain outstanding examples of his art, and include fine performances of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 (which he recorded twice for « Decca ») , Berlioz's « Symphonie fantastique » , and Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra (a very recent work at the time of recording) . He went on to record with the Dutch company « Philips » , with whom his recorded repertoire continued to reflect his life-long interest in composers such as Bruckner and Brahms as well as other composers, such as Debussy, whose music he had not recorded with « Decca » . An enthusiastic supporter of contemporary music and especially of Dutch composers, van Beinum gave the 1st performances of many new works, including the world-premiere, in 1949, of Benjamin Britten's Spring Symphony.

Eduard Van Beinum (1901-1958) was the principal conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam for 2 decades, succeeding Willem Mengelberg as Music Director. Van Beinum's style of conducting was direct but sensitive. An unassuming, solid musician, he sought to grasp the music's inner motivations, transform them into sound through his own energy, so that the music was conveyed to listeners as directly and purely as possible.

He was not an authoritarian like Mengelberg and when he 1st assumed leadership of the « Concertgebouw » , he was criticized for being so unassuming. He would be totally out-of-place in today's superficial world of conductors. His career was based on solid musicianship and a total lack of self-glorification, the antithesis of the pompous Herbert von Karajan in decades past, and some other pretentious conductors of the present.

On the occasion of receiving an honorary doctorate, from the University of Amsterdam, he described his task as conductor :

« To serve as an intermediary between the listener and the composer, whose musical thoughts must be expressed as purely and honestly as possible, to achieve this through an ideal unity, an ideal co-operation between the intentions of the conductor and the Orchestra. »

Van Beinum respected his musicians and considered them to be colleagues. His concept was that he and his Orchestra were making music together. Bart van Beinum, the composer's son, described his father's attitude concisely and accurately by pointing-out that, for him, it was less a matter of « interpreting » a score than of « realizing » it. He sought to grasp its inner motivations, transform them into sound through his own energy, so that the music was conveyed to listeners as directly and purely as possible.

Eduard van Beinum's colorful 1948 recording of Béla Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra was the 2nd recording of the work (the 1st was Fritz Reiner's, the work's dedicatee, with the Pittsburgh Symphony, for « Columbia » Records) . Beinum's incredibly dynamic interpretation of Igor Stravinsky's « Rite of Spring » is one of the most exciting of all ; unfortunately, from a sound standpoint, this is one of the least successful early « Decca / London » recordings. Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 24 is an example of Van Beinum's superb gifts as an accompanist. The 1947 recording of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 is his 1st of the work ; with the advent of LP, he recorded it again, in May 1953, although some collectors feel the earlier one is superior. Another work he recorded twice is the set of orchestral excerpts from Benjamin Britten's « Peter Grimes » . His 1st recording, dating from September 1947, and issued only on 78 rpm's, is included here ; his later recording was made in September 1953, issued on LP (actually on CD as well, briefly, when « Decca » released the « Peter Grimes » Interludes (but not the Passacaglia) coupled with the premiere performance of Britten's « Spring » Symphony, recorded live July 9, 1949 (440 063) . The « Symphonie fantastique » of Hector Berlioz was a great favourite of Van Beinum's ; he actually recorded it 3 times. The 1st was in September 1943 for « DGG / Polydor » , and never issued. His 2nd is the one heard in this set, recorded for « Decca / London » , in September 1946, issued on 6 x 78 rpm discs. He made a 3rd recording, in September 1951, issued on « Decca / London » LP. The technical reconstruction was made, in 1999, by Maggi Payne.

Eduard Alexander van Beinum (geboren 3. September 1900 in Arnhem ; gestorben 13. April 1959 in Amsterdam) war ein niederländischer Dirigent.

Eduard van Beinum begann als Bratscher in der Arnhemse Orkestvereniging, wo schon sein Vater Kontrabass und sein Brüder Geige spielte. Außerdem spielte er Klavier und trat sowohl solo wie auch mit seinem Brüder zusammen auf. Er wurde zunächst Dirigent des Haarlem Symfonieorkest (1927-1931) , das er zu einem höheren Standard führte. 1929 erhielt er die erste Einladung des Concertgebouw-Orchesters Amsterdam, 1931 rückte er dort auf die freigewordene Stelle des Zweiten Dirigenten. Van Beinum wurde schnell von den Orchestermusikern verehrt, da er sie als Partner sah und ihnen nicht seinen eigenen Willen aufzwang wie Chefdirigent Willem Mengelberg. Das Publikum war zu dieser Zeit allerdings weniger von van Beinum überzeugt, da sie eine unbedingte Persönlichkeit wie Mengelberg gewohnt waren und auch van Beinums objektive Lesarten im Verhältnis zu Mengelbergs kalt und oberflächlich fanden.

Van Beinum erhielt laufend Angebote für Chefdirigentenposten anderer niederländischer Orchester ; als 1937 das Residentie Orkest Den Haag, das als das zweitbeste in den Niederlanden nach dem Concertgebouw-Orchester galt, anfragte, war van Beinum zunächst nicht abgeneigt. Die Musiker und die Verwaltung des Concertgebouw-Orchester wollten ihn aber unbedingt halten und machten ihn zum Zweiten Chefdirigenten neben Mengelberg. Nachdem gegen Mengelberg aufgrund seiner Deutschland-freundlichen Haltung während des Krieges in den Niederlanden 1945 ein sechsjähriges Exil verhängt wurde, blieb die Rolle des nunmehr einzigen Chefdirigenten bei van Beinum. Daneben hielt er den gleichen Posten 1948 und 1949 beim London Philharmonic Orchestra.

Bereits in dieser Zeit litt van Beinum an Herzproblemen, so daß sich dieses Orchester einen anderen Dirigenten suchte. Während der Saison 1950-1951 konnte er kaum auftreten. Von 1956 bis zu seinem Tode war er auch Musikdirektor des Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. Van Beinum starb 1959 während einer Probe von Brahms I. Sinfonie mit dem Concertgebouw-Orchester an einem Herzinfarkt. Er wurde an seinem Wohnort in dem Dorf Garderen in der Veluwe-Region beigesetzt. Als Nachfolger beim Concertgebouw-Orchester hatte er (nicht offiziell) Bernard Haitink vorgesehen.

Van Beinum war das Gegenteil des eigenwilligen und dominanten Mengelberg. Er respektierte die Orchestermusiker und erlaubte ihnen viele interpretatorische Freiheiten. Sein Stil war sehr objektiv, aber (auch aufgrund seiner meist raschen Tempi) dennoch selten langweilig. Er war der Ansicht, daß sich der Gehalt eines Werkes stärker verdeutliche, wenn man die Musik für sich selbst sprechen lässt und nicht jede Nuance betont. Die großartige Virtuosität des Concertgebouw-Orchesters aus der langen Mengelberg-Phase konnte er halten, erreichte aber darüber hinaus eine außerordentliche Schönheit des Klanges sowie große Natürlichkeit und permanente Spannung des musikalischen Flusses.

Van Beinums Tonaufnahmen, die zum größten Teil in mono sind (Philips begann erst 1957 mit Stereo-Aufnahmen) hielten sich noch bis in die Sechziger Jahre im Katalog, solange Mono-Abspielgeräte weit verbreitet waren. Später gerieten sie in Vergessenheit, da van Beinum nicht den Ruhm eines historisch bedeutsamen Dirigenten wie Arturo Toscanini oder Furtwängler genoss und wurden im Wesentlichen erst seit den Neunziger Jahren auf CD wiederveröffentlicht. Zu seinen bedeutendsten Aufnahmen zählen die Sinfonien von Johannes Brahms und die letzten drei Sinfonien von Anton Bruckner für Philips. Auch französische Musik (vor andere Berlioz, Debussy und Ravel) dirigierte er häufig, auch für Tonaufnahmen, daneben viele zeitgenössische niederländische Komponisten, darunter viele in Uraufführungen.

1958 : Großes Goldenes Ehrenzeichen für Verdienste um die Republik Österreich.

20 avril 1939 : For his 50th birthday, several leading industrialists presented Adolf Hitler with a case containing the original scores of some of Richard Wagner's music. They had paid nearly 1 million « Reichmarks » for the collection. Towards the end of the War, « Frau » Winifred Wagner asked Hitler to transfer these manuscripts to Bayreuth. Hitler refused, saying he had placed them in a far safer place. The manuscripts involved included the Opera scores of :

« Die Feen » ; « Das Liebesverbot » ; « Reinzi » ; « Das Rheingold » ; « Die Valküre » and the orchestral sketch of « Der fliegende Holländer » . These lost documents have never been found.

8-9 ou 10-11 mai 1939 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne (étiquette « Telefunken » , 78 tours : SK3000/7 ; étiquette « Hänssler » , « Classic Masterpiece Series » , CD : 94.043) .

This performance of Bruckner's mighty 7th originates from the « SWR » archives. Hänssler claim this is the 1st time it has been available (presumably, they mean on CD, as they give the original « Telefunken » 78 rpm numbers, SK3000/7 on the inside front cover !) , and so, this is clearly a valuable historical document.

Eugen Jochum's Bruckner interpretations have caused some controversy, frequently being contrasted with Wilhelm Furtwängler's more architectural approach. A stop-start account can fall flat on its face but, luckily, there are enough redeeming qualities here to make this 7th a fascinating experience. There are famous studio accounts from Dresden and Berlin by Jochum (« EMI » and « DGG » , respectively) . Here, Hänssler provide what is effectively a supplement to these, an early 1939 performance with the Vienna Philharmonic.

The transfer is in general acceptable, the only major stumbling block being a tendency to crowd at climaxes. In addition, the 3rd movement Scherzo suffers from problems of level. The opening lower-strings are all but inaudible, meaning that if one cranks-up the volume, the louder passages become, at best, uncomfortable (Track 3) .

The 1st movement is expansive (listen to the initial ascending horn / cello arpeggiation, on Track 1) . It is soon clear that there is a remarkable control of the Orchestra in evidence here - but that control is put at the service of some very impulsive accelerandi (from 11 minutes onwards, there is almost the impression of skidding-out of control !) .

The famous Adagio is the redeeming factor in this account (Track 2) . There is a real warmth to the sound that manages to crawl its way across the decades, coupled with Jochum's innate harmonic sensitivity. Coming complete with cymbal crash, there is a predominant confidence that only falters again at around the 11 minute mark. It is almost worth the price of the disc for the lead in to the entrance of the Wagner tubas (who, alas, enter rather unsubtly at 21 min 46 sec and mar the moment) . In addition to the problem of sound level mentioned above, the Scherzo and Trio suffers from an overly serious slant. Jochum attempts to whip-up some excitement prior to the Trio, which he milks too much (a sign of the times, perhaps : there are even some syrupy portamenti) . Ensemble between horns and violins is not entirely accurate, either.

The Finale is brisk, but not so breezy. Although, initially, it feels that there is an underlying intensity proceeding in tandem with Jochum's chosen pulse, in the final analysis the cumulative energy inherent in this score fails to appear. Distortion in the heftier moments does not help.

An interesting document, then, but definitely not a 1st choice.

Here's an unusual surprise from « Hänssler » , a label not known for releasing historical material. Fans of historical recordings will say : « Oh boy, a Classic 1939 Jochum Bruckner 7 ! » . Everyone else will say : « Oh god ! Not another Jochum Bruckner 7 ! » . The former won't be terribly interested in the following facts : they will want this disc anyway. If you fall into the latter camp or, perhaps, are sitting on the fence, then this review is for you.

Fact No. 1 : Jochum always was a marvelous Bruckner conductor, but this performance tells us nothing that we can't hear in much better sound in any of his numerous later recordings (both « official » and « live ») , save for the fact that he played the Symphony about 1 minute faster for each movement, in 1939, than he did later on.

Fact No. 2 : Where differences do exist, the advantage usually lies with the later performances. Take, for example, the curious way in which he whips the 1st movement's dance-like 3rd subject into a lather and, then, overshoots the big brass fanfare to which it leads.

Fact No. 3 : The Vienna Philharmonic, in 1939, was hardly world-class by today's standards, even in music such as this which they knew quite well and that hardly tests an Orchestra's virtuosity (horns excepted) to any untoward degree. Much of the brass playing (what you can hear of it) is frankly poor. The horns crack pretty frequently in embarrassing places, such as the 1st movement's coda and at various points in the Scherzo. Sectional balances are simply terrible (the trumpets have a particularly hard time) .

Sonically, this judiciously made transfer from someone's 78 rpm's ranges from surprisingly clear and present (1st movement) to just plain awful (Adagio and Scherzo) . In the Adagio, the compressed dynamic range makes nonsense of its great climax (though the sensationally captured cymbal crash and triangle roll seem added from an entirely different performance) , while the lack of low-frequency timbral differentiation turns the Scherzo into a series of static repetitions of its « cock crow » theme devoid of textural underpinning. Jochum's finest Bruckner 7th remains his last, with the « Staatskapelle Dresden » on « EMI » . That performance, in addition to the natural advantage conferred by having Germany's greatest Orchestra, offers the most luminous and transcendent account of the Symphony's Adagio on disc. But if you must have mono or believe it's been all downhill since the late-1950's, Tahra has issued Jochum's superb Berlin recording from 1952.

26 mai 1939 : Le chef Adolf Mennerich dirige le Scherzo de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1889, éditée par Theodor Rättig (1890) , avec le « Großes Orchester des Reichssenders München » . Un enregistrement existe.

9 juin 1939 : Le chef Fritz Lehmann dirige la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1891, éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1893) , avec le « Großes Orchester des reichsenders Stuttgart » . The last 78 rpm side of the Finale is missing.

Fritz Lehmann

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Fritz Lehmann est né en 1904 à Mannheim et est mort en 1956 à Munich. Il mena de front des études musicales à la « Hochschule für Musik » de Mannheim (1918-1921) et une éducation générale aux Universités de Heidelberg et de Göttingen. Il fut chef d'orchestre au Théâtre de Göttingen (1923-1927) , avant de se tourner vers l'enseignement, à la « Folkwangschule » d'Essen (1927-1929) . À la fois chef de chœur et d'orchestre à Hildesheim (1927-1928) , puis à Hanovre (1929-1938) , il prit, en 1934, à la suite de Oskar Hagen, la direction musicale du Festival Händel de Göttingen. Après avoir été successivement directeur général de la musique à Bad Pyrmont (1935-1938) , à Wuppertal (1938-1947) et de nouveau à Göttingen (1947-1950) , il revint à l'enseignement de la direction d'orchestre à partir de 1953, à la « Hochschule für Musik » de Munich. Les enregistrements qu'il réalisa à la tête de la Philharmonie de Berlin ou des phalanges de Bamberg et de Vienne sont des modèles d'équilibre et de pudeur, particulièrement appropriés à l'univers d'un Händel ou d'un Mozart, ses auteurs de prédilection.

The noted German conductor Fritz (Ludwig) Lehmann was born on 17 May 1904 in Mannheim and died on 30 March 1956. His career was cut short by his early death at the age of 51. His repertoire ranged from the Baroque through to contemporary works, in both the concert-hall and the Opera House. He was an early advocate of period performance practice, and founded the « Berliner Motettenchor ». He is best-known through a number of recordings he left.

Lehmann was the son of an organist and choir Master. He studied at the « Hochschule für Musik » there, from 1918 to 1921, and at the Universities of Heidelberg and Göttingen. He made his professional debut as a pianist in 1918.

He conducted at Göttingen (1923-1927) , Istly as choir Master and later as conductor of the Municipal Theatre. In Essen, he was head of the classes for Opera and orchestra at the « Folkwangschule » . He also conducted in Hildesheim and Hanover, until 1938. In 1934, he became conductor of the Göttingen International Händel Festival, where he conducted the 1st modern production of Händel's « Tolomeo » , on 19 June 1938. He resigned after conflict with the Nazi authorities, in 1944.

Lehmann was « Generalmusikdirektor » in Bad Pyrmont (1934-1938) , and Wuppertal (1938-1947) . He returned to the Göttingen International Händel Festival, in 1946, remaining there until 1953. On 29 June 1947, he led the 1st modern production of Händel's « Teseo » .

He founded the « Berliner Motettenchor » (Berlin Motet Choir) to perform mainly works of Johann Sebastian Bach. He recorded several Bach Cantatas with the Berlin Philharmonic and soloists including Helmut Krebs and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, who also appeared in his 1949 recording of the Saint-Matthew Passion for « les Discophiles Français » , as the Evangelist and « Vox Christi » (voice of Christ) .

From 1953, he taught at the Munich « Hochschule für Musik und Theater » . He simultaneously had an active career as a guest-conductor in various European countries and Argentina, and led the Bamberg Symphony on a tour of Spain.

During the interval while conducting the Saint-Matthew Passion in Munich, on Good Friday, 30 March 1956, Lehmann collapsed and died of a heart attack, aged only 51. Another conductor took-over for the 2nd half, the audience not being informed of Lehmann's death until the end of the performance. Lehmann had begun to record Bach's Christmas Oratorio with the « Berliner Motettenchor » and the « RIAS Kammerchor » , the Berlin Philharmonic and soloists Gunthild Weber, Sieglinde Wagner, Helmut Krebs and Heinz Rehfuss, in 1955. It was unfinished when he died ; Günther Arndt conducted parts 5 and 6 in 1956.

The son of an organist and choirmaster, Fritz Lehmann studied at the Mannheim Conservatory and at the Universities of Göttingen and Heidelberg between 1918 and 1921. Having made his professional debut as a pianist, in 1918, and subsequently worked as a choral coach in Heidelberg, between 1923 and 1927, he was engaged as a conductor at the Göttingen Theatre. Lehmann moved to Hildesheim, in 1927, and to Hanover, in 1929, as a conductor before appointments as chief conductor at Bad Pyrmont, in 1935, Wuppertal, in 1938, and at Göttingen, in 1946.

During the 1923-1924 winter semester of his time at Göttingen University, Lehmann came into contact with Oskar Hagen, the professor of art history at the University, who had himself studied composition with Carl Schuricht and Engelbert Humperdinck and who, in 1920, had founded the Göttingen Händel Festival, an event which was instrumental in reviving many Händel Operas. Lehmann was appointed director of the Göttingen Händel Festival in 1934, holding the position until 1953 with a brief break between 1944 and 1946, following disagreement with the National-Socialist authorities. During the post-War era, he was instrumental in rebuilding the reputations of both the Göttingen Theatre and of the Händel Festival, as well as of music more generally in Germany. In addition, he enjoyed an active career as a guest-conductor, appearing in Austria, Belgium, France, Holland and Switzerland ; he led a tour by the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra to Spain, and also conducted in Argentina. From 1953, Lehmann directed the conducting class at the Munich Academy of Music. His sudden death was the result of a heart attack and occurred during the interval of a performance of Bach's Saint-Matthew Passion which he was conducting in Munich.

Lehmann was a most musical conductor, with a wide repertoire that stretched from the 17th Century to the present-day. With his experience at the Göttingen Händel Festival, he was an early exponent of period performance practice, relying upon a combination of modern scholarship and following the score as written to expunge extraneous Romantic ideas from the performance of Baroque music. He recorded extensively, although as a result of his death having occurred shortly before the large-scale commercial introduction of stereophonic recording, many of his records have subsequently vanished from sight : most of them were made for the « Deutsche Grammophon » label, with several different Orchestras. Of particular interest are his readings of choral works : his accounts of Bach's Saint-Matthew Passion (which stands directly in the line of the Mendelssohn school of interpretation) , B minor Mass and Christmas Oratorio, and Brahms' « Ein Deutsches Requiem » , are notable. Beyond this repertoire, he was a persuasive exponent of both Operatic and Symphonic works and was a sympathetic accompanist. Lehmann also recorded numerous shorter works and Operatic aria accompaniments, which appeared as post-War releases in « Deutsche Grammophon » 's 78 rpm and 45 rpm formats, as well as that of the long-playing (33 rpm) record. Lehmann was a 1st class « Kapellmeister » in the best sense of the word, whose recordings are unfailingly satisfying.

Fritz Lehmann's recordings include :

Johann Sebastian Bach :

Cantatas BWV 1, 4, 19, 21, 39, 56, 79, 82, 105, 170, 189.

Mass in B minor.

Saint-Matthew Passion.

Saint-John Passion.

Christmas Oratorio.

Brahms : A German Requiem.

Corelli : Concerto Grosso No. I.

Joseph Haydn : Symphony No. 45, in F-sharp minor.

Humperdinck : « Hänsel und Gretel » with Rita Streich, and the Munich Philharmonic.

Korngold : « Die tote Stadt » recorded in September 1952.

Mozart :

Concert Rondo in D major, K. 382, with pianist Carl Seemann and the Bamberg Symphony.

Piano Concerto in D major (« Coronation ») , K. 537, with Carl Seemann and the Berlin Philharmonic.

Schubert : Music for « Rosamunde » and « Die Zauberharfe » .

Fritz Lehmann (geboren 17. Mai 1904 in Mannheim ; gestorben 30. März 1956 in München) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Hochschullehrer.

Fritz Lehmann, Sohn eines Organisten und Lehrers, studierte von 1918 bis 1921 an der Hochschule für Musik in Mannheim, danach Musikwissenschaft an den Universitäten Heidelberg und Göttingen. Von 1923 bis 1927 war er zuerst Chorleiter, bald aber auch Kapellmeister am Stadttheater in Göttingen. Dann wechselte er nach Essen und übernahm dort die Leitung der Kapellmeisterklasse sowie der Opern- und Orchesterschule an der Essener Folkwangschule. Anschließend arbeitete er bis 1934 als Orchester- und Chordirigent in Hildesheim und danach, 1934 bis 1938 als Leiter des in Hannover neugegründeten Niedersachsenorchesters. 1934 übernahm er zusätzlich die künstlerische Leitung der Göttinger Händel-Festspiele, die er 1944 nach einem Konflikt mit dem Kreisleiter der NSDAP niederlegte. Von 1935 bis 1938 wirkte Fritz Lehmann, der 1937 der NSDAP beigetreten war, als Generalmusikdirektor in Bad Pyrmont, von 1939 bis 1946 in Wuppertal. Während des Zweiten Weltkriegs trat er auch in den von Deutschen Truppen besetzten Gebieten auf, so in Brüssel und in Paris.

Nach dem Krieg berief man Lehmann 1946 erneut zum Leiter der Göttinger Händel-Festspiele, ein Amt, das er bis 1953 ausgeübt hat. Gleichzeitig, ebenfalls ab 1946, wirkte er als Intendant und Generalmusikdirektor am Stadttheater

Göttingen. 1950 endete diese Tätigkeit mit der aus Kostengründen erzwungenen Schließung des Opern- und Operettenbetriebs. Lehmann baute sich danach eine sehr erfolgreiche Karriere als gesuchter Gastdirigent auf. Viele Rundfunk- und Schallplattenaufnahmen entstanden in dieser Zeit.

1953 verlegte er endgültig seinen festen Wohnsitz nach München und übernahm dort die Leitung einer Dirigentenklasse an der Hochschule für Musik. Während einer Aufführung der Matthäus-Passion am Karfreitag 1956 erlitt Fritz Lehmann einen Herzinfarkt. Ein zweiter Dirigent, Jürgen Popp, Leiter des Münchner Lehrergesangsvereins, führte das Konzert zu Ende. Erst am Schluss der Aufführung, nach dem Verklingen des Schlusschors Ruhet sanft, erfuhr das Publikum von Konzertmeister Herbert Becker, daß Fritz Lehmann verstorben war.

Beerdigt ist er in Pullach.

Discours de Wilhelm Furtwängler sur Anton Bruckner

« Über das Wesen Anton Bruckners » (About the nature of Anton Bruckner) : Speech made on the occasion of the German Bruckner Society Festival, in Vienna.

The following is the revised translated text prepared for the September 1974 issue of « Music and Musicians » . The translation was based on : Wilhelm Furtwängler. Johannes Brahms / Anton Bruckner, Reclam : Stuttgart (1952) , and published with the kind permission of Elisabeth Furtwängler.

I CLAIM THE RIGHT to say something about Bruckner not as president of the German Bruckner Society but simply as a musician and because Bruckner's works have accompanied me through the whole of my musical life. Bruckner's 9th Symphony was the 1st work I conducted (for better or worse) at the age of 20, and I have had many more opportunities to act as his advocate since.

Even here, I shall be speaking to you as a musician. One can try to approach a person like Bruckner from various angles, but all that should concern us is the fate of his « music », and the errors and misunderstandings to which it has always been subject.

Bruckner's great art has already become a vital element for Germans, today. Perhaps, it is « contemporary » music precisely because it tends towards timelessness. It forces us to jettison our usual historical critical methods which literally weigh down a direct relationship with the arts of the past. This is not to deny that Bruckner was a child of his age. But whereas his 2 contemporaries, Wagner and Brahms, played a major part in actually shaping their epoch, the one pushing forwards and the other slowing things down, Bruckner stood to one side. What he did was not for his own day ; his thinking and his creativity were focused entirely on timeless matters. Thus, he became the most misunderstood of the great composers.

Bruckner was altogether different from other Masters, down to the external details of his life and creative development. He began at a mature age - an age when other composers already had a life's work behind them. At that stage of life when Schubert and Mozart had already completed their « œuvre », Bruckner was still writing studies in counterpoint. Of course, we do know of others who achieved great things as old men ; one is tempted to say of Haydn or Verdi that they stayed young to the last. But Bruckner presents the unique case of an artist who realized his own creative potential only at an advanced age. This will come to seem very significant when we consider the nature of his music.

And what a curious and puzzling personality Bruckner was ! On the one hand, we have these profound works, original and self-assured in every detail ; on the other, a man of seemingly peasant narrowness, child-like and unsure of himself - typically, all he asked of his Emperor was to protect him from a critic he feared. How can this be reconciled with the maxim of the unity between the man and the artist which every great artist confirms ?

The fate of his music corresponds to Bruckner himself : seemingly paradoxical, deviating from the norm. When it first appeared, it was challenged and disputed as no other music was, while even later-on, it never achieved a really decided success. Its appreciation by the audiences of the time was based upon a misunderstanding from the start. In the great contest between Wagner and Brahms (the contest between dramatic and absolute music) , Bruckner was associated with the wrong-side, namely Wagner's. Certainly, there were reasons for this, but really, he was no less of an absolute musician than Brahms was. Subsequently, however, it was the anti-Brahms campaign, re-inforced by the activities of « friends » of either party, which determined Bruckner's position in the minds of the public.

To those who, during his lifetime, took upon themselves the thankless task of explaining his music to their contemporaries, staging performance after performance, we can never be grateful enough. Belatedly, there is indirect but particularly striking evidence of how difficult the task was, and how great the abyss which once yawned between Bruckner's kind of music and that of the rest of Vienna, a city brought-up chiefly on Brahms and Wagner. I am referring to the publication of the original versions of Bruckner's Symphonies. Today, over 40 years after the Master's death, they have become known through the dedicated work of various people, latterly above all Robert Haas.

Serious and objective minds, musicians like Schalk and Löwe who knew, loved and venerated the Master, patently considered it impossible at the time to present his works to the public in their original form and despaired of making them immediately comprehensible. They tried to build bridges, to mediate ; and their arrangements represent such bridges, such acts of mediation. The question of the composer's own views on this, of how far he was involved or merely put-up with or even objected to it, is unlikely ever to be resolved. As yet, we cannot foresee the future significance of the original versions that are now appearing, but there can be no doubt that the battle for Bruckner's music was really waged and won by means of the early-published editions. Nevertheless, the original versions are very important and revealing for our understanding of Bruckner's musical language, his style and his sensibility. There are differences both in instrumentation and in the tempi ; in both respects, there is a greater simplicity, uniformity and regularity in the originals which seems more in line with the Master's sense of spaciousness. Generally, one also has the impression of greater organic coherence where the numerous cuts have been opened-up again in the original versions, and not only within individual passages (from bar to bar, as it were) but, above all, with regard to the whole every time. It is just where the cuts were most ruthless (originally, the Finale of the 5th Symphony was 122 bars longer) that the greater power, clarity and effectiveness of the original version are beyond question. We have been given an altogether new picture of the most monumental Finale in music.

But how curious it is that these different versions exist ! With what other musician do we find such a continual reworking of the same compositions ? We know that Beethoven worked slowly and laboriously. But once the creative process was finished, so was the composition. With Bruckner, on the other hand, does it not actually seem as though in his heart he never regarded a work as entirely complete ? As though it were of the essence of this ever expanding music never, in its efforts to transcend itself, to become quite complete, quite « definitive » ?

Comparatively speaking, the development of the pro-Bruckner movement took an unusual, singular course. Certainly, Bruckner's music gradually established itself as more and more conductors, following in the footsteps of Löwe, Schalk and Nikisch, mastered the great and rewarding tasks with which these Symphonies presented them. But the printed word also played an important part in promoting a deeper understanding of Bruckner. What I mean by this is not purely biographical writing but the efforts of prominent musicians and scholars to explain Bruckner's art and to give it a theoretical foundation. A whole literature sprang-up in order to forge the equipment with which to defend this unworldly music in arguments. It was for this purpose that August Halm introduced his concept of 2 music cultures, distinguishing between Bruckner's world (which, for Halm, was also that of Bach) and the world of Mozart and Beethoven, i.e. : the real Classical composers. Halm's influence was considerable, especially as this quiet, original Swabian musician had a decided talent for expressing things of musical substance in words. Whereas Bruckner's music, in his own day, had been opposed by those arguing in favour of the Classical composers (pressure meeting with resistance) , so, the Classical composers and particularly Beethoven were now, in turn, to be dethroned in the name of Bruckner. In the wake of the activities of Halm and his followers, the view did in fact become widely established that Bruckner had not only equalled Beethoven and carried-on his work as a creator of Symphonic forms but had actually surpassed him.

One's response to this must be that it is not appropriate to apply Brucknerian standards to Beethoven, or else, Beethovenian standards could be applied equally well to Bruckner. Once the idea of 2 musical cultures has been acknowledged, let us avoid comparing 2 incomparable composers. This kind of propaganda does not do Bruckner a service. Later on, incidentally, Halm largely revised his earlier stance towards Beethoven, in the book on Beethoven that was published in the last years of his life.

All the same, there is no denying that the Bruckner movement is well on the way towards securing for him the recognition he had to forgo in his lifetime. Overshooting its target, it has developed into a kind of orthodoxy. This, however, has both a positive and a negative side. The Wagner and Brahms cults, the so-called « Wagnerianer » and « Brahmsianer » (necessary though these may have been in their day) , have really done nothing but damage in the long-run. We already find Gœthe complaining about the Germans' unfortunate habit of forever playing-off one person against another and racking their brains over who was the greater writer, he or Schiller, instead of being glad to have 2 such « fellows » .

From an objective angle, the Wagner versus Brahms conflict was resolved long ago. We know that music-drama and absolute music are perfectly capable of co-existing without the one excluding the other. Yet, the Wagner and Brahms cults refuse to die-out. Somehow, the old hostilities are still pursued, and it seems almost as though they were intended to live on through the Brahms-Bruckner conflict, which is derived from them to some extent. Do not misunderstand me : I have nothing against enthusiastic support for an acknowledged Master. I much prefer it to a « blasé » and pseudo-historical scale of relative values. Art is connected to love, and it is true to say that the greater the love, the deeper the perception. But I fail to see why the love of one artistic achievement should rule-out the love of another.

In other respects, too, the slogans tell us little about Bruckner. People may look-up to him on religious grounds or see in him an embodiment of the Upper-Austrian countryside, and although this may all be right in itself, it will never do justice to the broad reality of his presence. Nor is one saying much about Bruckner by claiming him as a particular illustration of the Germanic musical mind ; that claim is equally suited to Brahms. It is worrying to find him (evidently because of the often very tendentious anecdotes in circulation about him) being praised as a naive artist rooted in his childhood faith, who as such may be extremely touching but is not on the whole to be taken quite seriously. We are all acquainted with the jealousy shown by « bourgeois » mediocracy towards those giants whose greatness cannot be disputed, but whom one likes to belittle for that very reason. Wagner's « bad character » ; Beethoven's « pathological bitterness » ; Brahms' « narrow-mindedness » ; Bruckner's « intellectual inferiority » - all these are part of the same attitude.

But what seems particularly questionable is that Bruckner's originality and his religious faith should be spoken of so admiringly by the very people who have the tiniest amount of faith and originality, namely those metropolitan sceptics and intellectuals with whom Bruckner seems to have been in fashion for a while. No great work of art can be created without the greatest strength of mind and sense of responsibility. The artist who goes into a trance and produces a work exceeding his normal intellectual capabilities has never existed. If Bruckner appears to be a stranger to our world, that is only because he is too little mindful of it and because he is far more at home in another.

Here, we see the negative side of the literary streak that is characteristic of the Bruckner movement. This gives rise to a false, mendacious picture of Bruckner only too easily. The true « grandeur » of the simple and venerable figure of this great artist is in danger of turning into « literature » . Does Bruckner call for that ?

As an admirer of Bruckner, one must face facts, and the fact is that, in some way, the success of his music has always been limited. We must not imagine that it was the reviews of « Herr » Hanslick alone which accounted for the initial lack of success. Reviews just do not have the power to do that. One must always remember that it was rather the finest musicians of the period, a whole generation - not only your Bülow and your Brahms (who, as we know, greatly admired Wagner) but also Weingartner, Wüllner and a host of others - who showed no comprehension of Bruckner's music.

And it is still the same today. Whereas Brahms has attained a status hardly short of Wagner's all over the world, Bruckner's influence has been restricted basically to the immediate German-speaking cultural sphere. I myself have conducted Bruckner Symphonies in America, England and Italy - everywhere, the same lack of understanding. And it seems to me that we cannot expect a radical change in the foreseeable future. In Latin countries, especially, audiences constantly talk of Bruckner's formlessness ; musicians find fault with the excessive use of the device of sequencing, the stereotyped endings, and so on.

It would be going beyond the scope of this talk for me to go more closely into the accusations which can be levelled against Bruckner with real or seeming justification. What does need saying, however (and not only to Germans but to musically minded people everywhere) , is that all these things are ultimately irrelevant. It is not a work's correctness, its lack of defects, which determines its importance (only born critics and philistines hold this belief) , but the strength and magnitude of the musical statement. The polish, the absence of weak-points can make a work more accessible and more quickly-known internationally but have little bearing on its intrinsic value.

I recall an enquiry that was launched over 20 years ago as to which was the most important work in the world's entire musical literature. The question was answered by a carefully selected international panel, and they agreed upon (not, say, the « Saint-Matthew Passion » , the 9th Symphony or the « Meistersinger ») but the Opera « Carmen » . This was not a random choice. Where elegance and perfection, where something « well-made » is the main-requirement, « Carmen » deserves to be singled-out. But there are also other criteria which are more appropriate to us Germans, in particular.

Even allowing for all the real or imagined short-comings of Bruckner's works, what remains is of such power and magnitude as to make-up for these short-comings a hundred times over and, indeed, to render this music's victory all the greater. Nobody who has ever truly experienced the hallowedness, the depth and the purity of this musical language can escape it. Even the short-comings appear, if one immerses oneself in Bruckner's works, somehow necessary, somehow to belong there. Bruckner is one of those very rare geniuses in the whole of European history whose pre-ordained fate it was to make the preternatural a reality, to draw the divine down by force into our human world. Whether in a battle between demons or in sounds of blissful transfiguration, this man's entire thinking and searching was basically focused on the divinity within and above him. He was not a musician at all. This musician was really descended from the German mystics like Meister Eckhart, Jakob Böhme, and so on. Is it surprising that he was always a stranger in this world, which he faced uncomprehendingly, because he was in the deeper sense disinterested ? Bruckner knew other and better things. And is it, then, not truly a matter of indifference whether such a genius (like Bœhme) is a cobbler or an Austrian cantor ?

Viewed in the context of their surroundings, artists of Bruckner's type look like erratic blocks, like reminders of a greater, bygone age. They seem to be less closely bound-up with their environment and its historical limitations than others, less dependent on it and less explicable in terms of it. That accounts for the incomprehension with which they are always sure to meet during their lifetime. But precisely for that reason, they force every one of us into some kind of response. One can only confront them directly, as someone living now, and look them straight in the eye, or else, walk straight past them. They expect and, indeed, demand of the listener that total surrender and rapture which does, to be sure, bring marvellous rewards with it.

The human race has no idea what it means for an artist of this type to follow such a destiny. He is truly bearing his crown of thorns. But it behoves us to remember in humility and gratitude that divine Providence has bestowed upon us and our nation such mediators, such heralds on our behalf.

Let us now go on to ask how an artist like Bruckner can assist us in our own progress and what he means to our futures. At the same time, we will be asking not least a question about ourselves.

Biologically speaking, as I have already suggested, Bruckner presents a peculiar mixture : a peasant and child of the people, on the one hand ; and a sensitive artist receptive to all the most sublime ecstasies, on the other. This combination of the most robust, primitive qualities with intense spirituality is not uncommon among German-speaking composers. In this respect, Bruckner has fore-runners in Haydn, Beethoven, Schubert and Brahms - although it may appear that, in his case, the down-to-earth streak is often even more naive and direct, the spiritual element even more sublime and other-worldly. Nowadays, it is often said that such a combination is impossible, that a highly subtle mind and peasant-like simplicity are contradictions. But this is not so. Experience shows that the most fertile geniuses unite these features particularly often, and this is especially true of musicians. At all events, this has some connection with the peculiar bent of Bruckner's genius and his instinctive tendency towards simple « grandeur », monumentality, the « universal validity of the statement » .

Bruckner is heir to all the artistic resources of High-Romanticism. He stands in the middle of an era in which the world of sound was already dissolving into individual stimuli and fragmented sensations. He does not hesitate to use the devices of his time wherever and however he finds them ; he, by no means, avoids them - and yet, he remains the person he is. He alone of his contemporaries seems capable of subordinating to his own aims a musical world and harmonic language which Richard Wagner created for quite different purposes. He alone can wear Siegfried's ring, the downfall of everyone else, without being destroyed by its curse. Hence, he became the great man born-out of season that, even today, he still is, the one who nevertheless touches upon « the age's deepest need » . And that is a universality of artistic expression going beyond the mere whims of genius and personal preference, the « binding » statement to which Bruckner commits himself no less than his great fellow-sufferer Brahms, no less than his great predecessors. This is the point where his destiny appears to be linked to ours, and our destiny to him.

Let us make no mistake : the striving after what, for want of a better term, I call the « universally valid » - this striving has now become rare. Theorists everywhere may have been calling for general intelligibility, for « art for the people » , etc. , but that is not the same thing. Rather, it is evidence of the extent to which the modern artist « has lost touch » on the deeper level with anything to do with « the people » .

For one must realize that « universal validity » and « general intelligibility » (as I shall put it) are 2 different things, as distinct as a Beethoven melody and an international hit-tune. General intelligibility, or intelligibility on the level of general banality, accords very well with the most extreme individualism and, indeed, « belongs to it » like 2 sides of the same coin. Even an artist entirely wrapped-up with his own irresponsible self is still, in some way, a member of a community. It is just that this community no longer provides him with a task and a purpose, a sense of exaltation and of deliverance, and that he is no longer « productive » through it and with it. So, he abandons it to banality and convention. It is not the agreement with society in itself that matters, but the terms on which it is achieved. The striving for universal validity, on the other hand, aims at a « real » agreement of minds. And that is the sign of a great artist.

Let me give you an example. If we look at the historical evidence, we find that this universal validity was prevalent in the periods of early, naive art far more than in later periods. The more evolution advances, and the more sophisticated the artistic ideas and techniques, the more rare this universality will become. And, gradually, the paradoxical situation arises that it is no longer the artist who comes from and stands for the mass of humanity, no longer the « simple soul » honouring the tastes of his day to whom it is given to make the great and simple, « universally valid » statement, but only the great and original genius. In periods that have lost their innocence (and that applies above all to our own period) , only the hardest spirit can penetrate beyond the riot of received and merely acquired ideas. Complex works have become the convention of the age. Only the greatest artists do not become bogged-down in this convention and fight their way through to the simple statement. A particular kind of simple statement, to be sure, with which « humanity is given its soul back » .

Thus, the idea of the creative « genius » that was 1st conceived in the 18th Century takes on a special resonance for late-comers like ourselves. The man of genius has « become a necessity for us » ; he enables us to find ourselves.

It is all the more important to stress this because there is no denying that the very notion of « genius » has become highly-suspect today. There is a good reason for this. There was bound to be resistance to a situation where many people depended on the insights of a few - not on the part of ordinary people or, in a narrower context, the « audience » , for this has always been a natural medium for any veneration, any cult of genius. No, the resistance comes from those who are directly involved in the world of the arts, and especially the mediocre artist. But if the combined efforts of the artists, theorists, historians and the rest have still not succeeded in unseating genius, this is basically just a sign (one of the few signs) that the arts are still a real necessity for us.

Perhaps, it would be worth investigating more closely why and how it was in the twilight of the Rococo-period that the « genius » appeared, was fated to appear. The idea developed in close association with that other concept which the age of Gœthe gave us and which more or less dominated the entire 19th Century : the concept of the « Classical » . Today, this too has been thoroughly discredited. I mean the term as Gœthe defined it, in the sense of a perfection, of something altogether exemplary, an « ideal » which pre-supposes the cultivation of firm « value » judgements, whereby we say that this, and this alone, is good and right and best. And, by making such judgements, one is involuntarily bearing witness to oneself.

It is becoming clear that, not only such ideas as « genius » and « Classical » , but also what I have called the « universally valid » in the arts, are intimately related and have a common root. They are all unfashionable for the same reason. A major cause of this change in the situation was the « historical » outlook which evolved together with Romanticism. For Classicism (which, in my present use of the word, has nothing to do with Ancient Greece, and which embraces Beethoven and Kleist as much as Gœthe and Schiller) is emphatically unhistorical, indeed, consciously and essentially anti-historical.

Now, there can be no doubt that the ability to interpret artistic manifestations from their historical determinants is what most distinguishes our own period from earlier ages, and even from the 19th Century. Perhaps, we would not be wrong in describing a capacity for historical thinking as the greatest intellectual achievement of the age. Yet, at the same time precisely, this type of thought is turning-out to be a positively treacherous gift for modern man to pursue.

Those who set store in life by immediacy and innocence have already pointed-out often enough that, by seeing something as being historically determined, we are ruining our own, hitherto unconditional relationship to it. If we view manifestations of the age primarily in relation to their surroundings, their relationship to ourselves will have to come second, and we will be depriving ourselves of a chance to respond directly. Instead of actively living our lives and making value judgements, we will suddenly turn into by-standers, into mere « spectators » . Spectators of life with infinitely broader horizons, admittedly, but living infinitely less intensely.

Whenever a new work of art is produced, it has to be classified and registered before anything else. Whether it is large or small, old or new, our 1st impulse is to decide where to « place » it. The question of what a work or a person means « within a historical context » is more important than what they mean for « us » , for those who are alive today.

Does not this kind of outlook, when taken to extremes, not lead us into evading our obligation to offer a response, a « judgement » of our own ? Indeed, is this outlook not already pervading our whole thinking and feeling so much that (and this seems a downright perverse consequence) we are no longer daring to be ourselves and are seriously beginning to doubt ourselves ?

« This » state of affairs, I assure you, is the only one which, historically considered, has never existed before in the course of the ages. It amounts to saying that nothing is left which is truly decisive and binding for modern man, which really expresses him, by and within which he recognizes himself. He no longer encounters the « language of his destiny » in the arts.

Once they have reached this stage, however, the arts have become inherently superfluous. Their time is over. They have become, once and for all, a matter of breeding and luxury - a breeding which is a luxury because it might just as well be dispensed with.

The whole process is already so far advanced that it was inevitable that we should start to weave theories around this as well. Never before was there as much talk of the community and community art as there is today. The only thing that we fail to agree on is « how » to achieve such an art. But absolutely everything depends upon that.

To go into this subject in more detail now would take us too far. Everything, at the moment obviously, remains mere theory. Musicians, whether creators or performers, are endeavouring (sometimes rather furtively and shamefacedly) to continue along the paths they began to follow 30 years ago. Apparently, they are not yet able to draw practical conclusions from their theoretical perceptions of the present. And this is equally true of the state of public opinion, especially in the big cities, which is unaffected by this constant talk of objectivity, community art and the like, and goes on indulging in unbridled individualism and tawdry hero-worship.

Fundamentally, however, the following also needs to be said. Conscious willing and the search for a supra-individual style do not of themselves indicate a universal validity of expression, for such efforts are undertaken largely by the intellect, leaving untouched that vital sphere where art truly originates. Genuine universality, on the other hand, has to do with the « whole » man. The inevitable result of narrowly intellectual endeavours is that the vital sphere does not figure sufficiently in the artist's urge to communicate and, hence, ceases to be the source and origin of art and, as I have already said, lapses into banality. This gives rise to an unbridgeable gap which was never quite there before today : the gap between serious and light-music. The one expressing an only too troublous existence ; the other, an only too frivolous pleasure.

Genuine universality, I repeat, can exist only where the higher and lower faculties are not irreconcilable opposites, where the nobility of the divine spark is felt at the humblest popular level, where even at his loftiest and most sublime, the artist never loses his footing on the native soil of his beloved earth.

And this (to return to our starting-point) is the case with Anton Bruckner. It is for this that we love him. There is not one note in his music, a music ranging over the whole gamut of human sensations, which is not genuinely and directly connected with timeless concerns. He has proved to us that even modern man can aspire to universality in the higher-sense and that a striving for simplicity is still possible, as too are purity, « grandeur » and strength of expression.

Ladies and gentlemen ! This evening began with music, opened by my dear friend Wilhelm Kempff with the sounds of Johann Sebastian Bach. I shall now hand-over to his true pupil and successor, the composer to whom these remarks were mainly devoted. Let the Adagio from Bruckner's Quintet transport you into what is actually the great Master's celestial homeland, into the joyousness of another world which is there for us today, tomorrow and for evermore, and which Goethe paraphrases so neatly in the lines :

Frohe Zeiten zu gewahren
Wird der Erdkreis nimmer müde -
Schon seit vielen tausend Jahren Spricht der Himmelsbogen « Friede » !

...

Joyful times conferred by
Earth's orb will never cease -
For countless years already Rainbows have been saying « Peace » !

1940-1949

Après le début de la Seconde Guerre mondiale, face à la pénurie de matières premières, la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » stagne de nouveau - avant d'être repris en 1941 par la firme d'électronique Siemens & Halske. Malgré une production limitée, les projets d'enregistrement se réalisent, notamment une « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de

Bach, relativement complète, dirigée par Bruno Kittel en 1942 (les matrices sont transportées par sous-marin au Japon, où « Polydor Japon » a commandé 17,000 coffrets) .

Le 9 mai 1942, la Gestapo interdit officiellement à la « DGG » de produire des matrices avec des artistes juifs et ordonne la destruction de tous les disques où ils sont présents.

Certains enregistrements continuent de paraître au cours de cette année et de la suivante, notamment avec Herbert von Karajan à la tête de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam, du Philharmonique de Berlin et de l'Orchestre de la « RAI » de Turin. En 1943 sort également « Une vie de héros » de Richard Strauß, sous la direction du compositeur.

À la fin de la guerre, une petite fabrique de disques ouvre à Berlin, tandis qu'on reconstruit l'usine et les bâtiments administratifs détruits de Hanovre.

En 1946, la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » devient la 1re firme à faire tous ses enregistrements sur bande magnétique. L'année suivante, « Archiv Produktion » est fondé pour promouvoir la musique ancienne - les 1ers disques sont consacrés à Bach, joué à la « Jakobikirche » de Lübeck par l'organiste Helmut Walcha, qui restera étroitement lié à l'étiquette pendant 30 ans.

En 1949, le droit exclusif d'utiliser la marque « la Voix de son Maître » en Allemagne est cédé à « Electrola » (« EMI » en Allemagne) , et « DGG » introduit son logo jaune avec la tulipe couronnée.

Eugen Jochum, Ferenc Fricsay (qui sera l'un des piliers de la firme dans les années '50) et Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau font leurs 1ers enregistrements pour la « DGG » .

4 janvier 1940 : À Berlin, le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler donne une conférence sur Anton Bruckner, dans la « Beethovensaal » , au profit de la « Lessing Hochschule » . La partie musicale de la soirée est assurée par le Quatuor Strub et le pianiste Wilhelm Kempff.

8 janvier 1940 : Le chef nazi Otto Wartsch (1893-1969) dirige un extrait du 1er mouvement de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Sudetendeutsche Philharmonie » . Un enregistrement existe.

Otto Wartsch

Otto Alexander Hermann Wartsch (geboren 18. November 1893 in Magdeburg ; gestorben 29. April 1969 in Wolftratshausen) war ein deutscher Dirigent, Komponist und Mitglied der NSDAP.

Im Jahr 1930 promovierte Otto Wartsch über die Studien zur Harmonik des musikalischen Impressionismus zum Doktor philosophie. Ebenfalls 1930 wurde er Mitglied der NSDAP (Mitglieds-Nummer : 400.618) . Nach der Machtübernahme der Nationalsozialisten wurde er als SA-Standartenführer Nachfolger von Carl Corbach von 1934-1939 Kapellmeister der Hofkapelle und der Dirigenten des Loh-Orchesters Sondershausen. Während des Zweiten Weltkrieges wurde er als SA-Oberführer Intendant des Kattowitzer Opernhauses. Wartisch organisierte in Zusammenarbeit mit dem KZ Auschwitz « Truppenbetreuungsveranstaltungen » für das dortige KZ-Personal, so wurde am 5. April 1943 der Schwank Gitta hat einen Vogel und am 2. Oktober 1943 der Schwank Gestörte Hochzeitsnacht aufgeführt. Musikabende fanden zu den Themen Beschwingte Musik sowie Musikalische Köstlichkeiten aus Oper und Operette statt. Wartisch widmete dem Verleger des antisemitischen Hetzblatts Der Stürmer Julius Streicher die Komposition Deutsche Rhapsodie. Anschließend wurde er Konzertdirigent in München, im Jahr 1951 gelangte sein Werk Scharlott fährt gen Himmel in Bremen zu Uraufführung.

1933 : Not only career-conscious composers but also instrumentalists and conductors who, for lack of talent, had been failures in the pre-Nazi period now attempted to use the Party badge or other regime paraphernalia to pursue their goal. They still failed because of incompetence. Doris Kaehler, at 38 not the youngest contralto in the business, traveled from Berlin to Berchtesgaden, where she beleaguered Adolf Hitler at his « Berghof » , hoping that a chance to sing for him might lead to a spot at State radio. Kaehler was a Nazi « Old Fighter » (one of those who had joined the Party before January 1933) and the daughter of a minor Party functionary, but her artistic credentials were wanting. Paul de Néve, who in the « Marxist-Jewish “ Reich ” » had directed musical events for the Party for free, was hoping for restitution ; yet, he remained merely a candidate for « Künstlerdank » for, in 1938, he was already 57 and had no particular artistic merits. Party comrade Otto Wartisch, a conductor, failed dismally to land a contractual post at the Munich Philharmonic, in 1936, as did Party comrade Fritz Müller-Rehrmann, hoping for a post as conductor, composer, or music professor anywhere in Germany, in 1937. Typically, artists such as Wartisch and Müller-Rehrmann over estimated their chances and, on the basis of their Nazi pedigrees, aspired to positions they could never do justice to, even at the pleasure of benevolently minded dictators, as Josef Gœbbels himself correctly observed in late 1936. The composer Paul Hindemith at the start of the Nazis' regime declared that :

« Bad works can't be pushed indefinitely, and the people they are now digging-out are all complete mediocrities. »

10 février 1940 : Le chef Bruno Walter dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Ferdinand Löwe (1888) , éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec le « NBC Symphony Orchestra » (étiquette « Pearl » , CD : 9131 et étiquette « Music & Arts ») .

Bruno Walter's « Romantic »

The 1940 live performance of the Bruckner 4th is of particular interest to both Brucknerians and Walterians. The Walter discography contains only 2 versions of this score : the live one and the conductor's studio recording with the Columbia Symphony Orchestra, recorded from February 13 to 25, 1960. (The discography of the CSO is complex, because Columbia used that moniker for several different studio orchestras in various locales. In Walter's case, the monaural recordings are with a reduced contingent of the New York Philharmonic and other local musicians, while his stereo recordings are with a core ensemble drawn from the Los Angeles Philharmonic and the Los Angeles Festival Orchestra, supplemented by members of various Hollywood film Studio Orchestras.)

What is most remarkable is how radically Walter's conception of this piece changed over 20 years, with the respective timings providing an initial indication : 16:32, 14:32, 8:27, and 18:32 versus 18:40, 15:37, 10:59, and 20:46. Walter does use different editions of the score - the 1888-1889 Löwe/Guttmann version in 1940, and the 1936 Haas edition of the 1878-1880 version in 1960. (For the 1960 recording, I am taking the word of John F. Berky on his abruckner.com discography site over that of Sony, which states in its CD booklet that Walter used the 1953 Nowak edition.) However, this in no way accounts for the differences, as most of them are matters of instrumental detail (e.g. , the radically reduced orchestration in the Scherzo at 8:13-8:16 in the 1940 performance as compared to the same passage at 8:20-8:23 in the 1960 recording) rather than cuts in the score. Instead, Walter's earlier interpretation is far more volatile, not only in terms of significantly faster tempi but also in more generous use of accelerandi and other tempo modifications. For example, in 1940, there is an adrenaline rush on an ascending scale from 1:41 to 1:52, not employed in 1960, while in the 4th movement, the 1940 performance takes only a mild ritardando at 8:13 to 8:16 but, in 1960, a very emphatic one in the same passage at 8:20 to 8:23. In 1940, the Scherzo movement is taken at an exceptionally brisk pace whereas, in 1960, it is stately, with the Trio section being positively languorous. Similarly, whereas, in 1960, Walter squares-off phrases in the more emphatic manner common to most Bruckner performances nowadays, demarcating discrete units as aural equivalents of the giant stone blocks used to construct Gothic cathedrals, in 1940, the phrasing is noticeably more fluid and linear, particularly in woodwind runs that ripple like rapidly flowing rivulets (see at 15:24, in the 1st movement) . How much these changes owe to the oft-noted differences in Walter's recordings made before and after his March 1957 heart attack, and how much they may owe to the conductor possibly seeking to elaborate greater distinctions between his approaches to Bruckner and Mahler, can only be a subject of speculation. In any case, in these respects, the 1940 performance is akin to the relatively few complete Bruckner Symphony performances that survive from before WW II, and suggest an earlier school of performance which is now well-nigh extinct. Both for that reason, and for the intriguing snapshot of how Walter's interpretation of this piece shifted over the years, the 1940 recording is of particular interest for collectors of historical performances.

9 avril 1940 : Création à Leipzig de la version originale de la Messe en mi mineur sous la direction du compositeur autrichien, Johann Nepomuk David.

Johann Nepomuk David

Le compositeur autrichien Johann Nepomuk David est né le 30 novembre 1895 à Eferding et est mort le 22 décembre

1977 à Stuttgart. Organiste de formation très influencé par la musique de Bach, il est bien oublié de nos jours.

David débute sa carrière musicale au monastère de Saint-Florian. Il fut l'élève du compositeur Joseph Marx. Il écrit un certain nombre d'œuvres orchestrales dont 8 Symphonies, plusieurs concertos (dont un Concerto pour orgue et 3 Concertos pour violon) , des œuvres instrumentales (dont certaines comprenant également un orgue) en plus de nombreuses œuvres chorales. Le style modal observé dans les 2 Ires Symphonies fera place à un style plus acerbe, mais toujours tonal, dans les compositions ultérieures. Johann Nepomuk David meurt à l'âge de 83 ans. Son fils, Thomas Christian David (1925-2006) , sera aussi compositeur.

German composer and conductor with Austrian origin. He received his 1st education at the Augustinian monastery of Saint-Florian near Linz and the Benedictine « Gymnasium » at Kremsmünster. From 1921 to 1923, he studied composition with Joseph Marx at the Vienna Academy of Music, where he also came under the influence of Arnold Schoenberg and his school. Since 1924, he worked in Wels as a primary school teacher, organist and choir Master. In 1934, he was appointed to the staff of the Leipzig « Landeskonservatorium » (later, « Hochschule für Musik ») , where he was made director, in 1942. After a short time at the Salzburg Mozarteum, David became professor of composition at the Stuttgart « Hochschule für Musik » (1948-1963) . He received membership of the academies of arts in Berlin, Munich, Vienna and Hamburg.

The Austrian composer Johann Nepomuk David was born on 30 November 1895 in Eferding and died on 22 December 1977 in Stuttgart. He began his musical career in the monastery of Saint-Florian, and was a composition student of Joseph Marx. He wrote a number of orchestral works including 8 Symphonies (of which the 5th has been recorded, as have some other works including a disc of organ music) , several Concertos including an Organ Concerto and 3 Violin Concertos, instrumental works including many for or with organ, and many choral works. His general style changed from the modal tendencies seen in his 1st 2 Symphonies to the more acerbic though still tonal sound of the later ones. David died, aged 83. His son, Thomas Christian David (1925-2006) was also a composer.

Johann Nepomuk David usually gets no more than a very passing mention, if even that, in any discussion of Austrian or German music in the 20th Century. Along with composers like Karl Holler (a fellow composer for the organ and of choral as well as orchestral music) David appeared to have been largely forgotten, dismissed as a reactionary after around 1950.

Haus des Rundfunks : Masurenallee 9-14, 14057 Berlin - <http://www.haus-des-rundfunks.de/>

On June 28th 1940, Fritz Lehmann (1904-1956) conducted the Orchester des Deutschlandsenders und Reichssenders Berlin in a performance of the 4th movement of Bruckner's Symphony No. 3. This was the 1st recording of any part of the Symphony No. 3 with the exception of its brief use (for wordless women's chorus) in the opening credits of the 1933 film, « Supernatural » .

The recording was made on 3 x 78 rpm transcription discs. For years, the Deutsche Rundfunk Archive in Weisbaden (now relocated in Frankfurt) only owned 2 of the 3 matrixes. In 2009, 2 discs of this recording appeared on Ebay and I purchased them. When it was determined that one of the discs was the missing matrix from the DRA, I donated it. The complete recording of the final movement was finally restored.

« Haus des Rundfunks » de Berlin

La « Haus des Rundfunks » (Maison de radiodiffusion) , ou HdR, est située dans « Westend » , un des quartiers de Berlin-Ouest (Berlin-Charlottenbourg) , c'est la plus ancienne station de radiodiffusion autonome du monde.

Le bâtiment a été conçu par Hans Pöelzig, en 1929, après avoir remporté un prix d'architecture. Le bâtiment fait face à la « Funkturm » (tour de la radio) et contient en son sein 3 grands studios de radiodiffusion, protégés des bruits de la ville par une aile du bâtiment destinée aux bureaux. Il est aujourd'hui utilisé par le radiodiffuseur « Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg » (RBB) , membre de l'ARD, et il s'y produit des programmes radios pour les chaînes « RadioBerlin » , « Kulturradio » , et « Inforadio » . Des concerts se tiennent occasionnellement dans les studios du bâtiment.

Le bâtiment a été conçu en forme de triangle arrondi avec une façade en tuiles de céramique longue de 150 mètres. Sa construction date des années 1929-1930 et il a été inauguré le 22 janvier 1931 en tant que siège du « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . Le grand studio central a été achevé en 1933. Le 22 mars 1935, la 1re émission régulière de télévision a commencé ici, mais elle a été ensuite déplacée dans un bâtiment séparé proche de la place « Theodor-Heuss » . La « Haus des Rundfunks » a également eu une influence déterminante sur le développement du son stéréophonique et sur son adoption dans la radiodiffusion.

Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, la « Haus des Rundfunks » est devenue un enjeu de la Guerre Froide. Bien qu'il soit situé dans le secteur anglais de Berlin-Ouest, il a été utilisé par la station radio « Berliner Rundfunk » , contrôlée par les forces soviétiques, jusqu'à ce qu'elle soit déplacée à Berlin-Est, en 1953. Le bâtiment n'est revenu sous le contrôle du maire de Berlin-Ouest, Otto Suhr, que le 5 juillet 1956. Après une lourde rénovation, il est utilisé depuis fin 1957 comme station de diffusion par le diffuseur « Sender Freies Berlin » (SFB) , qui a fusionné le 1er mai 2003 avec le « Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg » (RBB) .

La « Haus des Rundfunks » fut l'un des premiers bâtiments en Europe à être entièrement consacré à la radiodiffusion, seul le « Münchner Funkhaus » est plus ancien. Il est d'ailleurs particulièrement remarquable que ce bâtiment offre, encore de nos jours, des conditions idéales à la production d'émissions radio. À cette époque, Hans Pöelzig ne pouvait s'inspirer d'aucune réalisation existante, mais il a su développer des innovations qui restent utilisées de nos jours.

Les bureaux et salles de rédaction sont situés sur les parties extérieures du bâtiment et entourent le grand complexe des studios. Le plus grand studio forme le cœur du bâtiment, et à l'écart se trouvent un plus petit studio d'enregistrement ainsi qu'un espace consacré au théâtre radiophonique qui possède diverses caractéristiques acoustiques.

Hans Pöelzig a porté une attention toute particulière à l'acoustique des studios. Par exemple, les sièges du grand studio ont été conçus de manière à avoir des qualités d'absorption acoustique identiques, que les sièges soient occupés ou non. Dans le petit studio, une centaine de panneaux muraux peuvent être retournés : sur un côté, ils absorbent les sons ; de l'autre côté, ils les reflètent. Différents effets de réverbération peuvent ainsi être créés.

La « Haus des Rundfunks » est l'un des premiers bâtiments de radio d'Europe. Construit d'après les plans de l'architecte Hans Pöelzig, il fut inauguré en 1931 après 2 années de construction. La structure de l'édifice fermé est parfaitement adaptée à l'isolation phonique des auditoriums. Ils se trouvent notamment dans l'intérieur de la cour du bâtiment triangulaire ce qui, en conséquence, les protège complètement du bruit de la rue. L'imposante façade longeant la rue fait 150 mètres et est décorée de briques vernissées noires et de carreaux de céramique brun-rouge.

D'un point de vue historique aussi, la Maison de la radio est une institution berlinoise. C'est de là que le premier programme télévisé régulier a débuté dans les années '30. Durant l'Après-guerre, les puissances d'occupation soviétique et britannique entre les fronts se disputèrent la radio, jusqu'à ce que la Maison, après des travaux de rénovation, puisse définitivement être utilisée par la radio « Sender Freies Berlin » (SFB) comme siège de ses programmes radio. Actuellement, la Maison de la radio de Berlin est le siège du « Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg » (RBB) .

La Maison de la radio est située à Berlin-Charlottenbourg, à proximité de la Tour de la radio et du Parc des expositions. Dans la cour intérieure se dresse un nouveau moulage de la sculpture en bronze « Große Nacht » de Georg Kolbe dont l'original se trouvait déjà ici dans les années '30 mais qui fut rapidement enlevé par les Nazis.

Les auditoriums sont également employés pour des concerts et des enregistrements radio. Le « Deutsche Symphonie-Orchester » joue, par exemple, régulièrement dans le grand auditorium (« Große Sendesaal ») qui dispose de 900 places. En outre, le petit auditorium (« Kleine Sendesaal ») , d'une capacité de 150 places, est ouvert aux concerts publics.

The « Haus des Rundfunks » (House of Broadcasting) , located in the Westend district of Berlin, is the oldest self-contained broadcasting house in the world. It was designed by Hans Pöelzig, in 1929, after winning an architectural competition. The building « vis-à-vis » the « Funkturm » (radio tower) contains 3 large broadcasting rooms located in the centre, shielded from street noise by the surrounding office wings. It is now used by the local ARD broadcaster Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg (RBB) and produces radio programs for the channels « Radio-Berlin » , « Kulturradio » , and « Inforadio » . The building's broadcasting rooms are occasionally also used to host concerts.

The building, designed with a plan shape of a rounded triangle with a 150 metres (490 feet) long façade of ceramic tiles, was constructed from 1929 to 1930 and inaugurated on 22 January 1931, as the seat of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . The large, central broadcasting room was finished in 1933. On the 22 March 1935, the 1st regular television service in Germany, « Fernsehsender Paul Nipkow » , was started here, but moved to a separate building on nearby « Theodor-Heuss-Platz » , in 1937. The « Haus des Rundfunks » also had an important influence on the development of Stereophonic sound and its adoption to broadcasting.

After World War II, the « Haus des Rundfunks » became something of a Cold War issue. Though it was situated in the British Sector of West-Berlin, it was used by the « Berliner Rundfunk » radio station, controlled by the Soviet occupation forces, until it moved to East-Berlin, in 1952. Not until 5 July 1956, the building was handed over to the West-Berlin mayor Otto Suhr by the Soviet military command. After considerable renovation work, it was used from the end of 1957 as the home of « Sender Freies Berlins » broadcasting programmes which, on 1 May 2003, merged into the « Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg » (RBB) .

The « Haus des Rundfunks » was one of the 1st buildings in Europe solely dedicated to broadcasting, exceeded in age only by the « Münchner Funkhaus » . It is thus especially noteworthy that the building still offers ideal conditions for broadcasting productions today. At the time, Hans Pöelzig had almost no examples to emulate, but he developed ideas which are still valid today : the office and editorial rooms are located on the outer areas of the building and surround the 3 large studio complexes. The largest broadcasting room comprises the heart of the building and, aside from this, there is also a smaller broadcasting room and an area for radio dramas which possesses a diversity of acoustic characteristics.

Pöelzig put a great deal of thought into the acoustics of the rooms. The chairs in the large broadcasting room were specially designed so that seats had the same sound-absorbing qualities whether they were occupied or not. In the smaller broadcasting room, 100 wall panels could be flipped. One side of the panels absorbed sound ; the other reflected it. In this way, very different reverberation effects could be created.

Das Haus des Rundfunks ist ein architektonisch und rundfunkgeschichtlich bedeutendes Gebäude gegenüber dem Funkturm im Berliner Ortsteil Westend des Bezirks Charlottenburg-Wilmersdorf. Seine Hauptfassade erstreckt sich entlang der Masurenallee. Seit Mai 2003 ist es Sitz des Rundfunks Berlin-Brandenburg (RBB) . Im Haus des Rundfunks werden die Hörfunkprogramme Radio Berlin 88,8, Kulturradio und Inforadio produziert. Die beiden Sendesäle dienen auch für öffentliche Konzerte.

Das von Hans Pöelzig entworfene Gebäude mit dem Grundriss eines an zwei Seiten abgerundeten Dreiecks wurde in den Jahren 1929-1930 unter der Bauleitung von Pöelzigs Meisterschüler Max H. Berling (ursprünglich Max Henry Berliner) errichtet. Verantwortlich für die Innengestaltung war Kurt Liebknecht, der zwei Jahrzehnte später als erster Präsident der Deutschen Bauakademie die Ausrichtung des Architekturstudiums in der frühen DDR maßgeblich beeinflussen sollte. Das Haus des Rundfunks wurde am 22. Januar 1931 eingeweiht. Das Gelände wird nördlich begrenzt von der Bredtschneiderstraße, östlich daneben stehen auf der Fläche zwei moderne Einzelgebäude mit jeweils acht Stockwerken sowie ein viergeschossiges Parkhaus. Die Soorstraße bildet die Begrenzung. Ab 1931 sendeten die Funk-Stunde Berlin, die Deutsche Welle GmbH (ab 1933 : Deutschlandsender) und die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft aus dem Haus des Rundfunks. Am 22. März 1935 begann dort der Deutsche Fernseh-Rundfunk (DFR) seinen Betrieb. Das erste reguläre Fernsehprogramm in Deutschland wurde über den benachbarten Funkturm vom Fernsehsender Paul Nipkow ausgestrahlt (Geschichte des Fernsehens in Deutschland) . Ab 1937 wurde das DFR-Programm im Deutschlandhaus am nahegelegenen Adolf-Hitler-Platz (heute : Theodor-Heuss-Platz) produziert. Von 1939 bis 1945 war das Haus des Rundfunks die Zentrale des Großdeutschen Rundfunks.

Am 2. Mai 1945 besetzte Major Popow mit einer Kompanie der Roten Armee das Haus des Rundfunks. Als Rundfunkfachmann kannte er das Gebäude, da er von 1931 bis 1933 als Ingenieur-Praktikant hier gearbeitet hatte. Ab 4. Mai wurden unter sowjetischer Leitung erste Aufrufe und Nachrichten gesendet. Am 13. Mai 1945 begann wieder ein regulärer Sendebetrieb.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde das Haus zum Spielball des Kalten Krieges. Mit der Aufteilung in vier Sektoren begannen Briten, Franzosen und Amerikaner in Ihren Sektoren mit eigenen Rundfunkprogrammen (Nordwestdeutscher Rundfunk und RIAS) .

Obwohl im britischen Sektor gelegen, diente es bis 1950 dem von der sowjetischen Besatzungsmacht kontrollierten Berliner Rundfunk. Im Haus des Rundfunks bauten die Sowjets in aller Stille die technische Einrichtung ab und verbrachten sie in ihren Sektor in das neu gebaute Funkhaus Nalepastraße im Ostteil Berlins.

Im Jahr 1952 sperrte die Britische Armee es als Reaktion auf die Abriegelung Steinstückens ab.

Bis zur Übergabe von der sowjetischen Militärkommandantur am 5. Juli 1956 an den Berliner Senat, vertreten durch den West-Berliner Regierenden Bürgermeister Otto Suhr, wechselte sich alle 14 Tage ein jeweils 10- bis 15-köpfiges Wachkommando in der Bewachung des leeren Gebäudes ab. In dieser Zeit sind vermutlich die kyrillischen Schriftzeichen in den Putz geritzt worden. Diese « Graffiti » wurden bei Sanierungsarbeiten an der Fassade 1998-1999 entdeckt und wegen ihrer Bedeutung als Dokument für die wechselvolle Geschichte des Hauses konserviert und dokumentiert.

Nach umfangreichen Renovierungsarbeiten diente das Gebäude ab Ende 1957 dem Sender Freies Berlin (SFB) zur Produktion und Ausstrahlung seiner Hörfunkprogramme. Da die Sowjets die gesamte Studioteknik demontiert und mitgenommen hatten, musste das Gebäude mit komplett neuer Technik ausgestattet werden. Dadurch wurde der SFB im Haus des Rundfunks zum Vorreiter für die Entwicklung der Stereophonie und ihren Einsatz im Hörfunk. Am 1. Mai 2003 ging der SFB mit seinen Programmen und Gebäuden im Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg (RBB) auf.

Bauliche Würdigung

Das Haus des Rundfunks war 1930 eines der ersten Rundfunkgebäude in Europa, älter ist nur das Münchner Funkhaus. Besonders bemerkenswert ist daher, daß das Gebäude noch immer ideale räumliche Bedingungen für den Hörfunkbetrieb bietet. Hans Pöelzig hatte damals kaum Vorbilder und stellte Überlegungen an, die bis heute Gültigkeit haben : Die Büro- und Redaktionsräume befinden sich an den Außenseiten des Gebäudes und umschließen die drei großen Studiokomplexe, die damit vom Straßenlärm weitgehend abgeschirmt sind. Im Büro- und Redaktionstrakt sind nur die Außenwände tragend ; sämtliche Zwischenwände können daher je nach Bedarf der Raumgröße variabel herausgenommen und eingebaut werden. Da sich in der Zusammensetzung der Redaktionen häufig Veränderungen ergeben und Zwischenwände versetzt werden, variiert die genaue Anzahl der Räume ständig.

Großer Sendesaal

Der Große Sendesaal ist das Herzstück des Gebäudes. Er ging 1931 in Betrieb und präsentiert sich im 21. Jahrhundert im Erscheinungsbild von 1959. Die Wandtäfelung besteht aus Ruster-Furnier einer einzigen schottischen Ulme um ein gleichmäßiges Altern des Holzes gewährleisten zu können. Ein großer Teil der 1081 Klappsitze erhielt bereits damals unterschiedliche Lochungen, wodurch sie im unbesetzten Zustand fast dasselbe Absorptionsverhalten wie bei Anwesenheit eines Zuschauers besitzen. So ist die Akustik des Saales im besetzten und unbesetzten Zustand sehr ähnlich, was die Vorbereitung der Tonaufnahmen erleichtert. Der Nachhall beträgt 1,6 Sekunden. Der Große Sendesaal verfügt zudem über ein eigenes (vom Rest des Gebäudes unabhängiges) Fundament, um so die Übertragung von Schwingungen durch den Boden zu verhindern. Da die Bedeutung der Orchestermusik im Hörfunk in den vergangenen Jahrzehnten immer weiter gesunken ist, finden nunmehr erheblich weniger öffentliche Konzerte als in den 1960er und 1970er Jahren statt. Der Große Sendesaal dient aber auch als Probestätte für das Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin.

Kleiner Sendesaal

Der Kleine Sendesaal befindet sich im Zustand des Eröffnungsjahres 1931. Die Wände sind hier mit Klappenelementen ausgestattet. Die eine Seite reflektiert, die andere Seite absorbiert den Schall. So lassen sich die unterschiedlichsten Nachhallzeiten einstellen. Der Saal wird inzwischen für Kammermusik, Jazzkonzerte und eine Reihe von Sonderveranstaltungen genutzt.

Hörspielkomplex

Spiegelbildlich zum Kleinen Sendesaal liegt der Hörspielkomplex, der im Jahr 2005 räumlich und technisch komplett modernisiert wurde. Hier gibt es einen großen Aufnahmerraum mit längerer Nachhallzeit und einer Treppe mit unterschiedlichen Belägen. Dieser Saal wird auch für kleinere Publikumsveranstaltungen genutzt, zum Beispiel zur Voraufführung von Hörspielen und Features. Ein mittelgroßer Aufnahmerraum in etwa der Größe eines Wohnzimmers verfügt über umklappbare Wandelemente zur Veränderung der Akustik, außerdem existieren weitere für Tonaufnahmen optimierte Einbauten, wie eine Küche und ein WC. All diese Räume haben keine parallelen Wände, um die Bildung von Flatterechos zu verhindern. Außerdem ermöglicht ein reflexionsarmer Raum die Nachbildung der Akustik, wie sie außerhalb von geschlossenen Gebäuden herrscht. In diesem Raum sind unterschiedliche begehbare Flächen wie Holzdielen und Kies vorhanden, um eine möglichst realistische Akustik erzeugen zu können. Der gesamte Hörspielkomplex ist als Haus-in-Haus-Konstruktion von den Umgebungsgeräuschen abgekoppelt. Alle Räume sind technisch (zum Teil auch über Studiofenster) mit dem Regieraum verbunden, in dem der Toningenieur und der Hörspiel-Regisseur die Aufnahme gestalten und überwachen.

Das Haus

Donnerstag, 22. Januar 1931 : Eröffnung des Haus des Rundfunks (HdR) an der Charlottenburger Masurenallee. Mit dem Bau in der Nähe des Ausstellungsgeländes endet für die regionale Rundfunkgesellschaft « Berliner Funk-Stunde » ein Provisorium. Der mit sieben Jahren älteste Radio-Programmdienst des Deutschen Reiches erhält ein Gebäude, das ausschließlich dem Rundfunk und seinen Bedürfnissen dient. Das HdR ist in seiner Größe und Ausstattung einzigartig in Europa : Der massive Ziegelbau in Form eines gleichschenkligen Dreiecks mit Klinker- und Keramikplattenverblendung beherbergt neben unzähligen Büroräumen drei große Sendesäle in seinem Inneren, außerdem mehr als zehn Aufnahmestudios sowie Proben- und Schalträume.

Der Architekt

Architekt des neuen Funkhauses ist Hans Pöelzig. Der 1869 geborene Berliner (seit 1923 Professor an der Technischen Hochschule) vereint visionäre Architektur mit den Anforderungen moderner Büro- und Studiobauten. Erfahrungen aus früheren Projekten wie Max Reinhardts Großem Schauspielhaus in Berlin oder dem Breslauer Konzertsaal dienen dem Vertreter der Klassischen Moderne beim Bau des Charlottenburger Rundfunkhauses, dessen Grundsteinlegung am 29. Mai 1929 gefeiert wird. 19 Monate später übergibt Pöelzig, der zeitgleich auch das IG-Farben-Haus in Frankfurt am Main (heute Johann Wolfgang Goethe-Universität) errichtet, den rund 5 Mio. Reichsmark teuren Bau.

...

Hans Pöelzig (geboren 30. April 1869 in Berlin ; gestorben 14. Juni 1936 ebenda) war ein deutscher Architekt, Maler, Bühnenbildner, Filmarchitekt und Hochschullehrer. Vor allem seine Beiträge zur expressionistischen Architektur und zur Neuen Sachlichkeit machten ihn bekannt.

Seine Kinder waren der Architekt Peter Pöelzig, die Schauspielerin Ruth Pöelzig sowie aus seiner zweiten Ehe mit Marlene Moeschke-Pöelzig der Schauspieler und Darmstädter Schauspielregisseur Jochen Pöelzig.

Hans Pöelzig wurde am 30. April 1869 in Berlin (andere Quellen nennen Pölzig) als sechstes Kind von Gräfin Clara Henriette von Pöelzig geboren. Seine Mutter war die Tochter von Alexander von Hanstein Graf von Pölzig und Beiersdorf. Ihr Mann, der britische Reeder George Acland Ames, bestritt jedoch die Vaterschaft und ließ sich drei Monate nach der Geburt des Kindes von Clara scheiden. Hans wurde daher mit Nachnamen nicht Ames, sondern Pöelzig genannt und von Pflegeeltern, einem Chordirigenten und seiner Frau, in Stolpe, heute ein Ortsteil von Berlin-Wannsee, aufgezogen.

Von 1889 bis 1894 studierte Pöelzig Hochbau an der Technischen Hochschule (Berlin-) Charlottenburg. 1899 wurde er als Regierungsbaumeister (Assessor) im preußischen Ministerium der öffentlichen Arbeiten beschäftigt. Im gleichen Jahr heiratete er Maria Voss, mit der er vier Kinder bekam.

Pöelzigs Karriere begann mit der Berufung als Lehrer für Stilkunde an die Königliche Kunst- und Kunstgewerbeschule in Breslau ; 1903 wurde er deren Direktor. Bereits stark dem Expressionismus verpflichtet, machte er die ab 1911 Königliche Akademie für Bau- und Kunstgewerbe genannte Einrichtung zu einer der fortschrittlichsten Architektur- und Kunstschulen in Deutschland. 1916 wurde Pöelzig als Nachfolger von Hans Erlwein Stadtbaurat in Dresden und 1919 Vorsitzender des Deutschen Werkbundes, den er wesentlich mitprägte und der heute auch stellvertretend für die Neue Sachlichkeit steht.

Ab 1920 arbeitete er wieder in Berlin und leitete ein Meisteratelier für Architektur an der Akademie der Künste zu Berlin. 1921 beteiligte er sich an dem in die Architekturgeschichte eingegangenen Wettbewerb für die Neubebauung eines prominent platzierten Areals am Bahnhof Berlin Friedrichstraße. Zwei Jahre später wurde er als Professor an die Technische Hochschule Berlin berufen. Hier entwickelte sich zwischen Pöelzig und dem einst von ihm geförderten Heinrich Tessenow ein heftiger Diskurs über Inhalte und Art der Ausbildung junger Architekten.

Im Wandel von der handwerklich geprägten Produktion zur industriellen Fertigung rezipierte Pöelzig diese Entwicklung in seinen Berliner Jahren und schuf hier die Grundlagen für die Neue Sachlichkeit in der Architektur. Der von ihm so genannte Materialstil brachte durch seine Schlichtheit die Eigenschaften der verwendeten Materialien viel stärker zur Geltung als der ornamental geprägte Stil der Zeit. 1926 wurde Pöelzig Vorstandsmitglied im Bund Deutscher Architekten (BDA) und 1929 verlieh ihm die Technische Hochschule Stuttgart die Ehrendoktorwürde.

Die Berliner Akademie der Künste gestaltete 1931 die Ausstellung « Pöelzig und seine Schule ». Ab dem 1. Januar 1933 war er Direktor der Vereinigten Staatsschulen für Freie und Angewandte Kunst in Berlin, die er aber am 10. April auf Veranlassung der Nationalsozialisten wieder verlassen musste.

Nachdem die Repressionen des NS-Staates immer größer wurden, wollte Pöelzig 1936 nach Ankara in die Türkei emigrieren, wo man ihm einen Lehrstuhl angeboten hatte; kurz vor der Ausreise starb er.

Hans Pöelzig wurde auf dem Alten Friedhof Wannsee bestattet. Das von der Stadt Berlin betreute Ehrengrab befindet sich in der Abteilung 9W.

Die Akademie der Künste ehrte Hans Pöelzig im Jahre 2008 erneut in einer Ausstellung, in der Werke und der Nachlass des Künstlers gezeigt wurden.

Die Eröffnung

Ruhe im Äther : Für den Umzug der Rundfunkmacher aus Deutschlands erstem Studiogebäude, dem Vox-Haus an der Potsdamer Straße, schweigt die Berliner Funk-Stunde zwei volle Tage - die Mitarbeiter packen Umzugskisten und verstauen Mikrophone. Dann die feierliche Eröffnung : « Das Schiff ist klar zur Fahrt - Kommandant, geben Sie Befehl zum Start ! » ruft Radiopionier Alfred Braun dem Rundfunk-Kommissar Doktor Hans Bredow zu. Neben der Funk-Stunde bietet das HdR zu dieser Zeit vier weiteren Institutionen Platz : der Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft mbH, die als Dachgesellschaft des Rundfunks in Deutschland fungiert, dem nationalen Hörfunkanbieter Deutsche Welle GmbH, dem vom Reichspostministerium zur Rundfunkaufsicht eingesetzten Rundfunk-Kommissar sowie einem (für das junge Medium noch einzurichtenden) Rundfunk-Museum.

Radio - Ein erfolgreiches Medium

Anfang 1932 gibt es bereits mehr als vier Millionen registrierte Rundfunkteilnehmer. Allein im Sendegebiet der Berliner Funk-Stunde, das neben der Hauptstadt und der Provinz Brandenburg auch einen Teil Pommerns abdeckt, verfügt ein Viertel bis ein Drittel aller Haushalte über ein Radio. Obwohl Rundfunk für die meisten nicht gerade preiswert ist. Die monatliche Gebühr beträgt zwei Mark, die Kosten für ein Gerät bis zu einigen hundert - ein Vermögen bei einem durchschnittlichen Arbeitereinkommen von 68,13 Mark monatlich (1927-1928) .

Der Rundfunk in der Krise

Der Rundfunk befindet sich in der Endphase der Weimarer Republik in einer ersten Krise. Mit dem Ende der kurzen ökonomischen Scheinblüte Deutschlands 1929 gerät auch das eigentlich wirtschaftlich stabile Medium in eine Rationalisierungsdebatte - die Folge : Programmkürzungen und eine stärkere Konzentration auf die « Hauptabhörzeiten » . Die politischen Begehrlichkeiten nehmen ebenfalls zu. Die Zahl so genannter Auflagesendungen steigt rapide an - die Reichs- und Länderregierungen nutzen den Rundfunk intensiv für ihre Interessen. Dadurch werden die Sender zum Sprachrohr der Politik und drohen außerdem durch Eingriffe in die Programmstruktur im Chaos zu versinken.

Die Kontrolle des Programms

Der staatliche Zugriff auf den Rundfunk erlebt seinen Höhepunkt im Jahr 1932. Ab 11. Juni verfügen die Staatsorgane, daß täglich zur besten Sendezeit deutschlandweit eine 30-minütige « Stunde der Reichsregierung » ausgestrahlt wird. Diese Sendung ist Vorboten einer neuen Rundfunkordnung, die ab August zu strukturellen Konsequenzen führt. Urheber der « Rundfunkreform » ist Erich Scholz, NSDAP-Mitglied und Referent im Reichsministerium des Innern. Unter den Stichworten Zentralisierung und Verstaatlichung werden und andere private Rundfunk-Investitionen untersagt, den Rundfunkgesellschaften Staatskommissare an die Seite gestellt - und Scholz wird neben Hans Bredow zum zweiten Rundfunkkommissar ernannt, zuständig für die Kontrolle des Programms. Die ersten Pflöcke der nationalsozialistischen Rundfunkpolitik sind eingeschlagen.

Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft

Die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft mbH (RRG) wurde am 15. Mai 1925 in Berlin als Dachorganisation der regionalen Rundfunkgesellschaften in Deutschland gegründet und bestand bis zu ihrer Liquidation nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg.

Neun Rundfunkgesellschaften, die sich ab Ende 1923 geografisch von München über Frankfurt am Main und Leipzig bis nach Breslau und Königsberg erstreckten, arbeiteten ab 15. Mai 1925 in der RRG zusammen. Die Mehrheit der Geschäftsanteile übernahm 1926 die Deutsche Reichspost, als deren Vertreter in der RRG Hans Bredow fungierte. Die RRG (beziehungsweise damit indirekt die Reichspost) hielt ihrerseits die Mehrheit an den Sendegesellschaften. Geschäftsführer der RRG waren Kurt Magnus und Heinrich Giesecke. Ab 1931 sendete die RRG aus dem Haus des Rundfunks.

Nachdem 1933 die Nationalsozialisten in Deutschland die Regierung übernommen hatten, mussten die Sendegesellschaften ihre Anteile an der RRG an das Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda abgeben, das auch die Vertretung des Reichs von der Post übernahm. Die Sender wurden zu Filialen der RRG. Diese « Gleichschaltung » verdeutlichte auch die Umbenennung der Sender in « Reichssender » zum 1. April 1934. Programmdirektor der RRG beziehungsweise « Reichssendeleiter » war ab 1933 Eugen Hadamovsky ; 1937 wurde mit Heinrich Glasmeier ein Generaldirektor berufen. Von dem Rundfunkgebührenaufkommen, das sich Post- und Propagandaministerium teilten, erhielt die RRG, also der Rundfunk, im Laufe der Zeit immer weniger. Gleichzeitig nahm der Einfluss des Propagandaministeriums auf die RRG zu. Auf Veranlassung von Josef Goebbels wurde zum 1. Januar 1939 für den Reichsrundfunk die Bezeichnung Großdeutscher Rundfunk eingeführt, für das Ausland wurden Programme unter dem Namen Germany Calling produziert.

1951 wurde die Liquidation der RRG beschlossen, die sich bis 1961 hinzog. Das Programmvermögen der RRG mit 3.600 Tonbändern befindet sich heute im Deutschen Rundfunkarchiv (DRA) am Standort Frankfurt am Main.

Folgende Rundfunkgesellschaften waren bis 1934 in der RRG zusammengeschlossen :

Funk-Stunde AG, Berlin : Programmaufnahme am 29. Oktober 1923 als « Deutsche Stunde, Gesellschaft für drahtlose Belehrung und Unterhaltung mbH » (später Gründung der « Radio-Stunde AG » , die 1924 unter dem Namen « Funk-Stunde AG » ins Handelsregister eingetragen wurde) .

Mitteldeutsche Rundfunk AG (MIRAG) , Leipzig : Programmaufnahme am 2. März 1924.

Deutsche Stunde in Bayern GmbH, München : Programmaufnahme am 30. März 1924 (zum 1. Januar 1931 in « Bayerischer Rundfunk GmbH » umbenannt ; erst zum 1. April 1931 der RRG beigetreten) .

Südwestdeutsche Rundfunkdienst AG (SÜWRAG) , Frankfurt am Main : Programmaufnahme am 31. März 1924.

Nordische Rundfunk AG (NORAG) , Hamburg und später Bremen : Programmaufnahme am 2. Mai 1924.

Süddeutsche Rundfunk AG (SÜRAG) , Stuttgart : Programmaufnahme am 11. Mai 1924.

Schlesische Funkstunde AG (SFAG) , Breslau : Programmaufnahme am 26. Mai 1924.

Ostmarken Rundfunk AG (ORAG) , Königsberg : Programmaufnahme am 14. Juni 1924.

Westdeutsche Rundfunk AG (WERAG) , Köln : Programmaufnahme am 10. Oktober 1924 als « Westdeutsche Funkstunde AG » (WEFAG) , Münster in Westfalen (Umszug nach Köln und Umbenennung in WERAG zum 1. Januar 1927)
Am 1. Oktober 1932 ging die Drahtloser Dienst AG (Dradag) in der RRG auf.

Mit Wirkung zum 1. Januar 1933 wurden die Aktiengesellschaften in Gesellschaften mit beschränkter Haftung umgewandelt.

Nach dem « Anschluß » des Saargebiets an das Reich wurde im Mai 1935 der Reichssender Saarbrücken eingerichtet, der ebenfalls Bestandteil der RRG wurde.

Stereophonie bei der RRG (Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft) .

Veröffentlicht am 13. August 2010 von Cream of Audio Stereophonie bei der RRG.

Im Gedenken an die Stereo-Pioniere der Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft.

Schon Anfang der 30er Jahre liefen nicht nur in Deutschland Anstrengungen, ein raumplastisches Aufnahmeverfahren zu entwickeln und anzuwenden. Das enge Monofenster in der Wiedergabe sollte buchstäblich durchstoßen und aufgeweitet werden. Mit dem Beginn der 30er Jahre arbeiteten Alan Dower Blumlein bei der « EMI » sowie Arthur C. Keller und Irad S. Rafuse bei den Bell Laboratories mit theoretischen und praktischen Versuchen an der Stereoaufnahmetechnik. So gelang bereits dem Team um Keller mit Leopold Stokowski und dem Philadelphia Orchestra im Dezember 1931 und März 1932 (sowie der « EMI » im Jahre 1934 mit der Aufnahme von Mozarts 41. Symphonie unter Sir Thomas Beecham) jeweils eine echte Stereoaufnahme. Bereits im Jahre 1931 ließ sich Alan D. Blumlein die Zwei-Komponenten-Schrift für die Stereoplatte patentieren. Es war die Kombination aus Edisons Tiefenschriftverfahren von 1877 mit vertikaler Auslenkung der Graviernadel und Emil Berliners Seitenschriftverfahren aus dem Jahre 1887 mit horizontaler Auslenkung der Graviernadel. Die Kombination aus beiden Schriften sollte bereits das auch heute noch verwendete Stereoschriftverfahren der Langspielplatte bilden.

Ein großes Problem seinerzeit war die absolut synchrone Aufzeichnung der zwei Kanäle, die man für das raumplastische Aufnahmeverfahren benötigte. Nach der Entwicklung des Magnetophons und Eduard Schüllers Zwillingskopf, der allerdings ursprünglich für die Aufteilung des Frequenzbereiches auf zwei Spuren konstruiert wurde, um die Dynamik der Bandaufzeichnung zu verbessern, kam nun dieser Zwillingskopf für die Stereoaufnahmen der RRG noch einmal zum Einsatz. Der Zwillingskopf hatte eine 1mm breite Trennspur zwischen den jeweils 2,75 mm breiten Tonspuren. Die beiden Einzelköpfe wurden durch ein Kupfer- und Messingblech zwecks Verbesserung der Übersprechdämpfung der beiden Kanäle voneinander abgeschirmt. Ab Januar 1943 wurden dann bei der RRG von den Toningenieuren Helmut Krüger und Doktor Ludwig Heck Stereoaufnahmen für Archivzwecke gefertigt. Welch eine wahrlich kühne Vision - stand doch nicht einmal auf der Abspielseite für den Privatbedarf Stereoequipment, geschweige denn ein Trägermedium zur Verfügung ! Die Stereoschallplatte sollte erst 1958 den Markt erobern.

Welche Magnetophonvarianten bei den oben genannten Aufnahmen Verwendung fanden, ist nur lückenhaft dokumentiert. Vermutlich wurden Standardgeräte vom Typ R 22 und R 22a mit paarweise eingesetzten V 5-Wiedergabe- und V7b-Aufnahmeverstärkern eingesetzt. Im Verstärkerlabor der RRG wurden aber auch zu jener Zeit zweikanalige Aufnahme mit einem gemeinsamen HF-Generator und Wiedergabeverstärker mit jeweils eigenem Netzteil entwickelt. Das hatte den Vorteil gegenüber dem Einsatz von jeweils einem eigenen HF-Generator pro Kanal, daß nun bei einer geringfügigen Verstimmung der HF-Generatorfrequenz keine unangenehmen Pfeiftöne mehr entstehen konnten. Die Löschfrequenz lag bei 60 kHz.

Abgehört wurden diese Aufnahmen über zwei separate Breitbandlautsprecher mit der Braunbuchbezeichnung O 15/15a, die kurz zuvor von dem RRG-Ingenieur Hans Eckmiller entwickelt wurden. An Microphonen wurde dazu das bekannte Neumann CMV 3 mit seiner noch Jahrzehnte später eingesetzten Kapsel M 7 verwendet. Bis zum Herbst 1944 sollen nach Angaben von Helmut Krüger etwa 250 Stereoaufnahmen gefertigt worden sein. Darunter die Opern Romeo und Julia, Margarete, Tosca, Tannhäuser und der Meistersinger jeweils in Bayreuth 1943 unter Hermann Abendroth und 1944 unter Wilhelm Furtwängler. Als die alliierten Luftangriffe auf Berlin 1944 verstärkt wurden, verlegte man das Zentrallabor der RRG nach Kosten im Wartheland. Hans Joachim von Braunmühl, der spätere Chef des SWF, veranstaltete dort noch Musikabende für die Ärzte eines nahegelegenen Lazarettes. An dieser Stelle verlieren sich nun bis zum heutigen Tage die Spuren der Stereobänder und der eingesetzten Geräte der RRG. Nur fünf Stereoaufnahmen der RRG überlebten vermutlich die Wirren der letzten Kriegstage - und wie das Bernsteinzimmer werden sie sicher für immer verloren bleiben, was wohl ebenfalls zu den schwersten kulturellen Verlusten des Zweiten Weltkrieges gezählt werden kann.

Der russische Funkkommandant Oberst Popow besetzt am 2. Mai 1945 das Funkhaus mit 200 Soldaten ohne auf Widerstand zu stoßen. Popow hatte von 1931-33 selbst im Funkhaus als Techniker gearbeitet und es noch im Mai 1941 als Mitglied einer sowjetischen Delegation besichtigt.

Das Haus des Rundfunks : Film von Jürgen Buch und Thomas Zimolong

Das Haus des Rundfunks in Berlin-Charlottenburg ist ein imposanter Bau mit seiner 150 Meter langen, mächtigen Fassade, mit seinen Hunderten von Räumen, den endlosen Gängen und tiefen Kellern. Das Funkhaus wirkt von außen geheimnisvoll : Die Fassade lenkt den Blick nach oben, monumental und auch etwas abweisend wirkt sie, dunkel steht es da - das « HdR » .

Hinter der Fassade wird seit 80 Jahren Radio gemacht - fast ohne Unterbrechung. Das Haus des Rundfunks ist eine Bühne für Schicksale, Träume und Machtversessenheit. Vor 80 Jahren, am 22. Januar 1931, wird das HdR eingeweiht. Es ist ein Symbol des Aufbruchs : für ein neues Medium und eine neue Zeit. Im Haus des Rundfunks soll Radio fürs Volk entstehen. Das Vox-Haus am Potsdamer Platz, die Wiege des deutschen Rundfunks, ist zu klein geworden - und der Potsdamer Platz ist zu laut.

Das größte Rundfunkhaus Europas entsteht gegenüber dem Funkturm. Albert Einstein gibt hier dem jungen Rundfunk den Wunsch mit auf den Weg, er möge der Völkerverständigung dienen. Ein frommer Wunsch, denn schnell wird das Haus zum Spielball politischer Interessen. Die Nazis ziehen ein, auf dem Dach werden Hakenkreuzfahnen gehisst. Und das Haus wandelt sich zu einem Zentrum der totalitären, nationalsozialistischen Propaganda.

Nach dem Krieg übernehmen die Sowjets das Funkhaus. Schon am 13. Mai 1945, wenige Tage nach der deutschen Kapitulation, geht der « Berliner Rundfunk » auf Sendung. Mehrere Jahre bleibt das Haus eine sowjetische Insel in West-Berlin. 1952 räumt der Sender das Haus. Die letzte sowjetische Wachmannschaft verlässt 1956 das Gebäude. Dann kommt der Sender Freies Berlin (SFB) , er macht hier fast 50 Jahre Programm und fusioniert 2003 mit dem Ostdeutschen Rundfunk Brandenburg (ORB) zum Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg (RBB) . Kein Rundfunkgebäude in Deutschland ist länger in Betrieb.

Das Haus des Rundfunks war über Jahrzehnte hinweg ein Brennpunkt deutscher Radiogeschichte. Die Dokumentation stellt Menschen vor, die dem Haus des Rundfunks eng verbunden sind. Der spätere Geiger Walter Levin nimmt 1931 an der Eröffnung teil. Peter Bosse ist Mitte der 30er Jahre ein Kinderstar im Radio. Richard Baier erlebt als junger Sprecher den 20. Juli 1944 und die letzten Kriegstage mit. Friedrich-Wilhelm von Sell ist dabei, als der SFB hier einzieht. Helmut Lehnert organisiert im November 1989 ein Popkonzert zum Mauerfall.

Die Grundsteinlegung war am 29.5.1929, feierlich eröffnet wurde das Haus des Architekten Hans Pöelzig am 22.1.1931 für die älteste Rundfunkgesellschaft des Deutschen Reiches, die 1924 im Vox-Haus an der Potsdamer Straße gegründete Berliner Funk-Stunde. Außerdem zogen die Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft mbH, die Deutsche Welle GmbH und das Rundfunk-Museum ein.

Der Gebäudekomplex ist eine geschlossene Anlage in Form eines gleichschenkligen Dreiecks, die Schenkel in konvexen Bögen. Der Klinkerbau ist mit blauschwarz changierenden Keramikfliesen verkleidet. Die Hauptfassade an der Masurenallee ist 150 m lang. Im Innenhof gibt es drei trapezförmige Sendesäle, die vom Haupteingang und -treppenhaus aus durch einen großen Lichthof erreichbar sind. Hier stand seit 1931 die Bronzeplastik « Große Nacht » von Georg Kolbe, die 1933 entfernt und 1965 durch einen Neuguss ersetzt wurde.

Unmittelbar nach der Machtübernahme am 30.01.1933 übernahmen die Nationalsozialisten auch den Rundfunk und arbeiteten mit Hochdruck an der Einführung des Fernsehens. Am 22.03.1935 wurde im Großen Sitzungssaal der erste regelmäßige Fernsehprogramm Dienst der Welt eröffnet. Seit 1938 hieß das Gebäude an der Masurenallee « Zentrale des Großdeutschen Rundfunks », und ab dem 09.07.1940 wurde nur noch ein Reichsprogramm verbreitet.

Am 02.05.1945 besetzt eine 200 Mann starke Abteilung der Roten Armee das Haus und sendet am 13.05.1945 ein einstündiges Programm mit einer Ansprache des sowjetischen Stadtkommandanten Generaloberst Nikolaj Bersarin an die Berliner Bevölkerung. Am 18.5.1945 findet im Großen Sendesaal das erste öffentliche Rundfunkkonzert nach dem Krieg statt. Vom 22.05.1945 an sendet der Berliner Rundfunk täglich ein 19-stündiges Programm. Am 03.06.1952 riegelte britisches Militär das Haus des Rundfunks ab, die letzten 42 Radiomitarbeiter verlassen am 09.07.1952 das « Haus des Schweigens ». Aber die Sowjets halten es bis zum 05.07.1956 besetzt.

Am 04.12.1957 wurde das Haus vom Sender Freies Berlin (SFB) wieder eröffnet, der als Nachfolger des NWDR bereits seit dem 01.06.1954 aus dem Haus am Heidelberger Platz gesendet hatte. Neben zwei Rundfunkprogrammen, SFB 1 und SFB 2, startete 1958 die erste regionale Nachrichtensendung der ARD, die Berliner Abendschau, die später in das 1961-1971 errichtete Fernsehzentrum Theodor-Heuss-Platz umzog. 1963 fanden im Haus des Rundfunks die ersten deutschen Stereo-Versuchssendungen statt. 1967 ging der Jugendsender s-f-beat auf Sendung, seit 1974 gibt es Sendungen für die in Berlin lebenden Türken und Jugoslawen. Aus dem « Radiofrühling » am 01.04.1979 ging mit SFB 3 ein gehobenes Kulturradio hervor, das unter anderem « Klassik zum Frühstück » sendet. 1986-1987 wurden der Lichthof und der Große Sendesaal nach den Plänen von Pöelzig wieder hergestellt. Hier finden öffentliche Konzerte und andere Veranstaltungen statt.

Am 01.01.1992 wurde der SFB Landesrundfunkanstalt für ganz Berlin, und der ORB (Ostdeutscher Rundfunk Brandenburg) nahm seinen Sendebetrieb auf. Am 01.05.2003 startete als Nachfolger von SFB und ORB der Rundfunk Berlin-Brandenburg RBB. Mit Dagmar Reim wurde erstmals eine Frau Intendantin einer öffentlich-rechtlichen Rundfunkanstalt.

Das älteste (eigenständige) Funkhaus der Welt steht in Berlin-Charlottenburg. Hans Pöelzig hatte sich 1929 in einem Wettbewerb mit einem Entwurf durchgesetzt, der vorbildhaft werden sollte. Seine im wahrsten Sinne des Wortes zentrale Idee war die Platzierung der drei großen Sendesäle in der Gebäudemitte, vom Straßenlärm abgeschirmt durch umliegende Bürotrakte.

Von den Enden der 150 Meter langen Hauptfront an der Masurenallee schwingen zwei Flügel konvex nach hinten und bilden so ein stumpfes Dreieck. In der Mitte liegen drei trapezförmige Sendesäle, die vom großen Lichthof hinter der Hauptfront radial ausgehen, somit vier Innenhöfe bildend. Beeindruckend ist die fünfgeschossige Hauptfront, deren mittlere 32 Achsen um ein Geschoß erhöht sind.

Der monumentale Baukörper ist ausschließlich vertikal gegliedert - mit rotbraunen Keramikplatten verkleidete Streifen springen aus den schwarz geklinkerten Wandflächen hervor. Seit 1987 erstrahlt die über fünf Geschosse reichende Haupthalle mit ihren gelb geklinkerten Galerien und den beiden markanten Leuchten wieder in alter Pracht. Im Zentrum steht Georg Kolbes Skulptur « Große Nacht » von 1930.

Hans Pöelzig

Hans Pöelzig (1869-1936) gehört zu den bedeutendsten Architekten des frühen 20. Jahrhunderts. Er gilt als Wegbereiter der Moderne und einer der Hauptvertreter der expressionistischen Architektur. Als Leiter der Kunstakademie in Breslau, Vorsitzender des Deutschen Werkbundes und Professor an der Technischen Hochschule Berlin prägte er eine ganze Generation von Architekten. Zu seinen Schülern zählen und andere Rudolf Schwarz, Helmut Hentrich und Egon Eiermann.

Einige seiner wichtigsten Bauwerke sind die chemische Fabrik in Luban bei Posen (1909-1910) , in Berlin das Große Schauspielhaus für Max Reinhardt (1919, 1986 zerstört) und das Haus des Rundfunks (1928-1929) , sowie das Verwaltungsgebäude der IG-Farben in Frankfurt am Main (1929, heute Pöelzig-Bau der Goethe-Universität) . Daneben wirkte Pöelzig auch als Bühnenbildner für Max Reinhardt und als Filmarchitekt für den expressionistischen Filmklassiker « Der Golem » von Paul Wegener (1920) .

Hans Pöelzig (1869-1936) was a pioneer of Expressionism, an architect who created some of the most extraordinary and fantastic buildings of the early 20th Century including the fantasy landscape of the « Große Schauspielhaus » in Berlin and an ominous-looking chemical works in Luban (now Poznan, Poland) . His work became more severe and functional through the inter-War period. The vast, stripped-down IG Farben building (1930-1931) in Frankfurt exemplifies this shift and also proved to be his last great building.

The simple lever he designed for it in 1930 displays a more human, less mechanical version of Modernism than the self-consciously functionalist and geometric designs of many of his contemporaries.

The German architect, painter and set-designer Hans Pöelzig was born on 30 April 1869 in Berlin and died on 14 June 1936.

Pöelzig was born to the countess Clara Henrietta Maria Pöelzig (daughter of Alexander von Hanstein, Count of Pölzig and Beiersdorf) while she was married to George Acland Ames, an Englishman. Uncertain of his paternity, Ames refused to acknowledge Hans as his son and consequently he was brought-up by a local choir Master and his wife. In 1899, he married Maria Voss with whom they had 4 children.

In 1903, he became a teacher and director at the Breslau Academy of Art and Design (« Kunst- und Gewerbeschule Breslau » ; today, Wrocław, Poland) . From 1920 to 1935, he taught at the Technical University of Berlin (« Technische Hochschule Berlin ») . Director of the Architecture Department of the Prussian Academy of Arts, in Berlin.

After finishing his architectural education around the turn of the 20th Century, Pöelzig designed many industrial buildings. He designed the 51.2 metres tall Upper-Silesia Tower in Posen (today, Poznań) for an industrial fair, in 1911. It later became a water tower. He was appointed city architect of Dresden, in 1916. He was an influential member of the « Deutscher Werkbund » .

Pöelzig was also known for his distinctive 1919 interior re-design of the « Berlin Grosses Schauspielhaus » for Weimar impresario Max Reinhardt, and for his vast architectural set designs for the 1920 UFA film production of « The Golem : How He Came Into the World » . (Pöelzig mentored Edgar Ulmer on that film ; when Ulmer directed the 1934 « film noir » Universal Studios production of « The Black Cat » , he returned the favor by naming the architect-Satanic-high-priest villain character « Hjalmar Pöelzig » , played by actor Boris Karloff.)

With his Weimar architect contemporaries like Bruno Taut and Ernst May, Pöelzig's work developed through Expressionism and the « New Objectivity » in the mid-1920's before arriving at a more conventional, economical style. In 1927, he was one of the exhibitors in the 1st International Style project, the Weissenhof Estate in Stuttgart. In the 1920's, he ran the « Studio Pöelzig » in partnership with his wife Marlene (Nee Moeschke) (1894-1985) . Pöelzig also designed the 1929 Broadcasting House (« Haus des Rundfunks ») in the Berlin suburb of Charlottenburg, a landmark of architecture, and Cold War and engineering history.

Pöelzig's single best-known building is the enormous and legendary I.G. Farben Building, completed in 1931, as the administration building for IG Farben in Frankfurt am Main, now known as the Pöelzig Building at G ethe University. In March 1945, the building was occupied by American Allied forces under General Dwight (David) Eisenhower, became his headquarters, and remained in American hands until 1995. Some of his designs that were never built included one for the Palace of the Soviets and one for the League of Nations headquarters at Geneva.

In 1933, Pöelzig served as the interim director of the « Vereinigte Staatsschulen f ur freie und angewandete Kunst » (United State School for Fine and Applied Art) , after the expulsion of founding director Bruno Paul by the National-Socialists. Pöelzig died in Berlin, in June 1936, shortly before his planned departure for Ankara.

L'architecte, peintre et décorateur allemand Hans Pöelzig est né le 30 avril 1869 à Berlin et est mort le 14 juin 1936 à Berlin. Il fut actif durant les années de la République de Weimar. Il emprunta le nom de jeune fille de sa mère qui était fille de Comtesse.

En 1903, Pöelzig devint enseignant et directeur de l'Académie des arts de Breslau (« Kunst und Gewerbeschule, Breslau ») . De 1920 à 1935, il enseigna à l'Université technique de Berlin (« Technische Hochschule, Berlin ») et dirigea un département architectural à l'Académie des arts (« Preußische Akademie der Künste ») de Berlin.

Au tournant du 20e siècle, après la fin de sa formation, Pöelzig dessina beaucoup de bâtiments industriels. Il dessina un château d'eau de 51,2 mètres de haut, à Posen, pour l'Exposition industrielle de 1911. Elle deviendra un château d'eau. Il fut nommé architecte municipal de Dresde, en 1916. Il devint un membre important du « Deutscher Werkbund » .

Pöelzig fut aussi connu pour avoir réaménagé, en 1919, l'intérieur du « Großes Schauspielhaus » de Berlin pour Max Reinhardt, impresario de Weimar, ainsi que pour les décors du film « Der Golem » , une production de l'UFA.

Avec ses contemporains architectes à Weimar, comme Bruno Taut ou Ernst May, l'œuvre de Pöelzig s'est développée au milieu des années 1920 à travers l'Expressionnisme et la Nouvelle Objectivité avant l'arrivée d'un style plus conventionnel et plus économe de moyen. En 1927, il fut un des protagonistes du « Weißenhofsiedlung » à Stuttgart, lre manifestation de ce qui allait devenir le Style international. Dans les années 1920, il dirigea une agence d'architecture en partenariat avec sa seconde femme, Marlene Pöelzig (née Moeschke) (1894-1985) . Pöelzig dessina aussi la Maison de la radiodiffusion dans le quartier de Charlottenburg à Berlin, un bâtiment remarquable à la fois dans l'histoire de l'architecture, de la Guerre froide et de l'ingénierie.

Le bâtiment de Pöelzig le plus connu est l'énorme et légendaire bâtiment de l'IG Farben, achevé en 1931, bâtiment construit pour l'administration de la compagnie IG Farben à Francfort-sur-le-Main, aujourd'hui connu comme étant le bâtiment « Pöelzig » de l'Université Goethe. En mars 1945, le bâtiment fut occupé par les forces alliées américaines, devenant le quartier-général de Dwight (David) Eisenhower et demeurant occupé par les Américains jusqu'en 1995.

Quelques-uns de ses projets ne virent jamais le jour : c'est le cas du Palais des Soviets et de celui de la Société des Nations, à Genève.

Pöelzig mourut à Berlin en juin 1936.

« Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG)

The « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG) , translated as the « Reich » Broadcasting Corporation, was a national network of German regional public broadcasting companies, active from 1925 until 1945. « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » 's broadcasts were receivable in all parts of the country and were used extensively for Nazi propaganda, after 1933.

Historical recordings of « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » broadcasts are today held by the German Broadcasting Archive.

The company was established in Berlin, on 1 May 1925, as an umbrella organisation by 9 regional broadcasters covering various states of the Weimar Republic. From 1926, a majority share was held by the State-owned « Deutsche Reichspost » authority, represented by RF engineer and « Reichspostministerium » official, Hans Bredow, as chairman in the rank of a « Reichs-Rundfunk-Kommissar » .

An official broadcast receiving licence was required for the reception of radio broadcasts at a monthly fee of 2 « Reichsmark » .

Programming was originally provided by the following regional broadcasting companies :

« Funk-Stunde AG, Berlin » : the 1st regular broadcaster in Germany (on the air since 29 October 1923) . Covering the Prussian provinces of Brandenburg, western Pomerania (Stettin) and the northern Province of Saxony (Magdeburg) as well as the eastern parts of Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Mecklenburg-Strelitz.

« Mitteldeutsche Rundfunk AG, Leipzig » (MIRAG) (on the air since 2 March 1924) . Covering the Saxony, Thuringia, and the southern part of the Prussian Province of Saxony (Halle) .

« Deutsche Stunde in Bayern GmbH, München » , in Bavaria (on the air since 30 March 1924) . Renamed « Bayerischer Rundfunk GmbH » , on 1 January 1931. It joined the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » , on 1 April 1931.

« Südwestdeutsche Rundfunkdienst AG, Frankfurt am Main » (SÜWRAG) (on the air since 31 March 1924) . In the People's State of Hesse and the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau.

« Nordische Rundfunk AG, Hamburg » (NORAG) (on the air since 2 May 1924, in Hamburg ; and since 30 November 1924, in Bremen) . Covering the Prussian provinces of Schleswig-Holstein and Hanover, as well as the Free State of Brunswick, the Free State of Oldenburg and western Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Became « Norddeutsche Rundfunk GmbH » , in November 1932.

« Süddeutsche Rundfunk AG, Stuttgart » (SÜRAG) (on the air since 11 May 1924) . Covering Württemberg, Baden and the Prussian Province of Hohenzollern.

« Schlesische Funkstunde AG, Breslau » (SFAG) (on the air since 26 May 1924, in Breslau ; and since 1 November 1925, in Gleiwitz) . Covering the Prussian provinces of Lower- and Upper-Silesia.

« Ostmarken Rundfunk AG, Königsberg » (ORAG) (on the air since 14 June 1924) . Covering the Prussian provinces of East Prussia and eastern Pomerania (Köslin) , as well as the Free City of Danzig (see also, « Radio Königsberg ») .

« Westdeutsche Funkstunde AG, Münster » (WEFAG) (since 10 October 1924) . Covering the Prussian Rhine Province and the Province of Westphalia. Renamed « Westdeutsche Rundfunk AG » (WERAG) , in 1926 ; the headquarters moved to Cologne.

An additional nationwide programme known as the « Deutschlandsender » was broadcast on long-wave from the « Königs Wusterhausen » radio transmitter of « Deutsche Welle GmbH » (a separate company which was, however, 70 % owned by the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft ») .

Regular television programmes were transmitted from Berlin by the « Fernsehsender Paul Nipkow » .

On 22 January 1931, the « Haus des Rundfunks » (House of Broadcasting) , on Masurenallee in Berlin-Westend, was inaugurated as the official seat of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . Designed in 1929 by the architect Hans Pöelzig (1869-1936) , it was the world's 1st self-contained broadcasting centre and included a large and a small concert-hall.

The triangular-shaped building also housed the broadcaster « Deutsche Welle GmbH » and, from 1935 until its relocation in 1937, the « Fernsehsender Paul Nipkow » television station.

In 1932, the German government under Chancellor Franz von Papen made several attempts to gain control over the broadcasting companies and enforced the regular reading of official statements. The management board had to admit a representative delegated by the Minister of the Interior, Wilhelm von Gayl.

In the course of the « Gleichschaltung » process, after the « Machtergreifung » in 1933, the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » was nationalized by the Nazi government and was used extensively by the Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda under Josef Goebbels. On 30 January 1933, while the new Minister of the Interior, Wilhelm Frick, enforced the live broadcast of the torchlight parades, the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » chairman Hans Bredow resigned and was replaced by Eugen Hadamovsky. Several former managers were arrested and imprisoned. With effect from 1 April 1934, the regional broadcasting companies were incorporated as « Reichssender » .

Upon the affiliation of the Saar territory, in 1935, the regional broadcaster was incorporated as « Reichssender Saarbrücken » . Likewise, after the Austrian « Anschluß » , in 1938, the former « Radio Verkehrs AG » in Vienna became the « Reichssender Wien » . On 1 January 1939, the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » was renamed « Großdeutscher Rundfunk » .

After the invasion of Poland, on 1 September 1939, upon the staged Gleiwitz incident, the former « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » became a vital instrument of War-time propaganda, especially by the daily « Wehrmachtsbericht » and the popular request show « Wunschkonzert für die Wehrmacht » . From 9 July 1940 onwards, all « Reichssender » aired the same uniform nationwide program, which ended with the occupation of the « Haus des Rundfunks » by the Red Army during the Battle of Berlin, on 2 May 1945.

« Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » engineers were responsible for important advances in sound-recording technology.

Walter Weber, while working for Hans Joachim von Braunmühl at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft », made many improvements in the field of magnetic tape sound recording. The most widely significant was the discovery of high frequency bias. This provided a major improvement in the fidelity of recordings. Ironically, others made the same discovery of HF bias before and after, but it was Weber's work that became widely used.

Paul van Kempen

Le chef d'orchestre néerlandais Paul van Kempen est né le 16 mai 1893 à Zoeterwoude et est mort le 8 décembre 1955 à Amsterdam. Il a étudié au Conservatoire d'Amsterdam, de 1910 à 1913, dont la composition et la direction d'orchestre avec Julius Roentgen et Bernard Zweers, ainsi que le violon avec Louis Zimmerman. En 1913, il est devenu second violon à l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » et, l'année suivante, est passé au pupitre des lers violons. Après 1916, il a commencé sa carrière en Allemagne et est devenu 1er violon solo dans des Orchestres à Poznań, Bad Nauheim et à l'Orchestre philharmonique de Dortmund.

En 1932, van Kempen a été naturalisé allemand. Il a été directeur musical à Oberhausen pendant 2 ans. De 1934 à 1942, il a été le chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Dresde. En 1942, il a succédé à Herbert von Karajan en tant que « Kapellmeister » à Aix-la-Chapelle, servant jusqu'en 1944.

En 1949, van Kempen est retourné aux Pays-Bas comme chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de la radio néerlandaise, basé à Hilversum. Cependant, son activité de chef durant la Seconde Guerre mondiale a en fait une figure controversée au Pays-Bas, à cause des concerts donnés pour la « Wehrmacht » . À une occasion, en 1951, van Kempen été engagé comme chef remplaçant de l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » à la place d'Eduard van Beinum malade. Le 1er soir, des personnes dans le public ont protesté fortement, mais le concert a eu lieu. Le second soir, les interventions du public ont été si importantes que 62 musiciens ont refusé de continuer à jouer. En 1953, van Kempen est devenu directeur général de la musique de la ville de Brême.

Les enregistrements de van Kempen comprennent les Symphonies Nos. 3, 7 et 8 de Beethoven, les 5 Concertos pour piano de Beethoven avec Wilhelm Kempff, et la Symphonie No. 6 de Tchaïkovsky.

The Dutch conductor Paul van Kempen was born on 16 May 1893 in Zoeterwoude, Netherlands, and died on 8 December 1955 in Amsterdam, aged 62.

He studied at the Amsterdam Conservatory from 1910 to 1913, including composition and conducting with Julius Roentgen and Bernard Zweers, as well as violin with Louis Zimmerman. From 1913, he was a 2nd violinist with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. 1 year later, he was in the 1st violin section. After 1916, he began to make his career more in Germany, and served as concert Master in Orchestras in Posen, Bad Nauheim und Dortmund. In 1932, van Kempen became a German citizen.

Van Kempen was music-director in Oberhausen for 2 years. From 1934 to 1942, he was principal conductor of the Dresden Philharmonic. In 1942, he succeeded Herbert von Karajan as « Kapellmeister » in Aachen, serving through 1944. In 1949, van Kempen returned to the Netherlands as principal conductor of the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra, based in Hilversum. Moreover, his conducting activities during World War II made him a controversial figure in the Netherlands, such as conducting concerts for the « Wehrmacht » . On one occasion, in 1951, van Kempen was engaged as a substitute conductor at the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in place of the ill Eduard van Beinum. During the 1st night, audience members protested strongly, but the concert took place. On the 2nd night, the audience disruptions were so severe that 62 musicians left the stage and refused to continue. In 1953, van Kempen became general music-director of the city of Bremen.

Paul van Kempen (geboren 16. Mai 1893 in Zoeterwoude, Südholland ; gestorben 8. Dezember 1955 in Amsterdam) war ein niederländisch-deutscher Dirigent.

Kempen studierte am Amsterdamer Konservatorium von 1910-1913, Komposition und Dirigieren bei Julius Röntgen und Bernard Zweers, Violine bei Louis Zimmerman.

Ab 1913 spielte er mit nur 20 Jahren zweite Geige im Concertgebouw-Orchester unter Willem Mengelberg, ein Jahr später erste Geige.

1916 wandte er sich aufgrund seines Zugehörigkeitsgefühls zur deutschen Kultur deutschen Orchestern zu und war und andere Konzertmeister in Posen, Bad Nauheim und Dortmund.

1932 nahm er die deutsche Staatsbürgerschaft an.

Nach zwei Jahren als Musikdirektor in Oberhausen war er von 1934 bis 1942 Chefdirigent der Dresdner Philharmonie. Das Orchester entwickelte sich unter seiner Ägide zu einem der besten in Deutschland. 1942 folgte er Herbert von Karajan als Generalmusikdirektor des Sinfonieorchesters Aachen nach, die Tätigkeit endete 1944 mit dem kriegsbedingten Zusammenbruch des deutschen Kulturlebens.

Nach dem Krieg wurde er 1949 Dirigent des Philharmonischen Rundfunkorchesters Hilversum, war jedoch in den Niederlanden aufgrund seiner vorigen Tätigkeit in Deutschland recht unbeliebt.

Ein Konzert im Concertgebouw musste 1951 aufgrund von Tumulten abgebrochen werden, seine Ambitionen auf eine feste Dirigententätigkeit beim Concertgebouw-Orchester waren aussichtslos.

1953 kehrte er daher als Generalmusikdirektor in Bremen nach Deutschland zurück.

Er starb 1955 in einem Amsterdamer Krankenhaus an einer Lebererkrankung im Alter von nur 62 Jahren, als seine Karriere gerade wieder im Ansteigen begriffen war.

Van Kempen, ein großer Bewunderer von Willem Mengelberg, gehörte noch einer romantisch-freien Dirigentengeneration an, die durch Temposchwankungen und eigenwillige Auslegungen eine persönliche Interpretation anstrebten. Während seiner Zeit in Dresden machte er für die Deutsche Grammophon eine Reihe von Aufnahmen sinfonischer Werke und einiger Instrumentalkonzerte mit den Solisten Wilhelm Kempff und Enrico Mainardi. Nach dem Krieg wurden seine wild-düsteren Aufnahmen der fünften und sechsten Sinfonie von Tschaikowski und kürzerer Werke wie der Ouvertüre 1812 berühmt, die die ersten der 1950 neu gegründeten Philips Phonographische Industrie mit dem Concertgebouw-Orchester waren, außerdem die dritte, siebte und achte Beethoven-Symphonie für das gleiche Label.

Avril 1941 : Arnold Schœnberg becomes a citizen of the United States.

Octobre 1941 : The Deputy-Acting « Reich » -Protector (« Stellvertretender Reichsprotector ») of Bohemia and Moravia (in what is now the Czech Republic) , Reinhard Heydrich, became patron of the German Philharmonic Orchestra and re-opened the German Concert Hall in Prague, the « Rudolfinum » , founded in the 19th Century, but converted into the Czech Chamber of Deputies after the Great War.

16 octobre 1941 : At the festive opening of the newly-renovated « Rudolfinum » to which Reinhard Heydrich had invited the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra to perform Ludwig van Beethoven's 9th Symphony, he reiterated his firm conviction that culture and politics were inseparably intertwined, a point he sought to underline by pointing to the history of the « Rudolfinum » itself. Heydrich recalled that Anton Bruckner had played the organ here, but noted sadly that, after 1918, musical life had become « Czechified » and had, therefore, « degenerated ». After 20 years of darkness, the « Rudolfinum » was now, once more, a « site of German art » .

16 octobre 1941 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la version originale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

30 octobre 1941 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner Il s'agit du 4e concert de la saison.

14, 15, 16 décembre 1941 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige, à l' « Alte Philharmonie » , la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1888, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , de même que les 3 lers mouvements de la 7e avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Enregistrement incomplet ; the acetates were made with only 1 cutter (« Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » Transcriptions, CD) .

Au même programme : la Sérénade n° 10 de Mozart (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

17 décembre 1941 : À Hambourg, le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1888, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Au même programme : la Sérénade n° 10 de Mozart.

In 1941, when the 3rd « Reich » was still in its ascendancy, Wilhelm Fürtwängler was actively conducting the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra for German audiences. While these live performances were not recorded in their entirety, they do provide us with the earliest examples of Fürtwängler's Bruckner and they provide an example of his interpretations when he was at the peak of his abilities. The sound quality of these recordings do not match the quality of other recordings from this time and place, but they provide an important sound document for anyone interested in Bruckner's music and Fürtwängler's interpretations.

25 décembre 1941 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige des extraits de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique de Vienne, au « Wiener Staatsoper » . Ce concert est enregistré.

3 et 4 janvier 1942 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1888, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : la Sérénade n° 10 de Mozart.

22 janvier 1942 : Concert spécial pour souligner le 20e anniversaire de la mort du chef Arthur Nikisch, survenue le 23 janvier 1922. Fritz Reiner

Le chef d'orchestre hongrois Fritz Reiner est né le 19 décembre 1888 à Budapest et est mort le 15 novembre 1963 à New York. Il fut naturalisé américain en 1928.

Il étudie tout d'abord le piano en Hongrie, avant d'obtenir à 16 ans, en 1905, son diplôme au Conservatoire de Budapest. À partir de 1909, il devient chef d'orchestre à Budapest, puis à l'Opéra de Dresde.

Comme son compatriote Eugene Ormandy, il s'expatrie aux États-Unis, où il dirige, de 1922 à 1931, l'Orchestre symphonique de Cincinnati. Par la suite, il prend la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh, dont il est le directeur musical, de 1938 à 1948, tout en dirigeant au Metropolitan Opera. Pendant cette période, il enseigne la direction d'orchestre au Curtis Institute of Music à des étudiants comme Leonard Bernstein ou Lukas Foss.

Sa consécration arrive lorsqu'il est nommé chef permanent de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, qu'il dirige de 1953 à 1963. Il fait de cet ensemble l'un des meilleurs des États-Unis et réalise avec lui des enregistrements qui constituent encore aujourd'hui des références.

Son répertoire assez Classique ne l'empêche pas de défendre la musique de son compatriote Béla Bartók ou de Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler (4e Symphonie, « Das Lied von der Erde ») ou Dmitri Chostakovitch (6e Symphonie avec l'Orchestre de Pittsburgh). Ses interprétations des Symphonies de Beethoven restent également en tête des discographies comparées.

À l'Académie Franz-Liszt de Budapest, il étudie le piano avec Istvan Thoman et la composition avec Hans Koessler (qui furent également les professeurs de Bartók), tout en poursuivant des études de droit. Il débute à l'Opéra-Comique de Budapest en dirigeant « Carmen », en 1909. Il est successivement chef d'orchestre du « Landestheater » de Laibach, en 1910 (aujourd'hui Ljubljana), du « Volksoper » de Budapest (1911-1914), où il donne la 1re audition hongroise de « Parsifal », et du « Hofoper » de Dresde, où il succède à Ernst von Schuch comme chef principal (1914-1921). Quelques rencontres le marquent profondément : celles des chefs d'orchestre Arthur Nikisch et Karl Muck, des compositeurs Richard Strauß (il dirige, en 1919, la 1re allemande de « la Femme sans ombre ») et Gustav Mahler, qu'il s'attachera à faire connaître aux États-Unis où il émigre en 1922, pour succéder à Eugène Ysaÿe à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Cincinnati. Il y donne notamment les premières américaines de la Suite de danses (1925), de la Suite du « Mandarin merveilleux » (1926) et du 1er Concerto pour piano (1928) de Béla Bartók avant d'être, en 1943, le créateur auprès du compositeur et de sa femme du Concerto pour 2 pianos, percussion et orchestre, tiré de la Sonate pour 2 pianos et percussion.

Se consacrant essentiellement à l'enseignement, de 1931 à 1938, au sein du Curtis Institute de Philadelphie (Leonard Bernstein compte parmi ses élèves) , il se produit régulièrement avec l'Orchestre symphonique local, celui de Chicago et le Philharmonique de New York. Il dirige à Philadelphie, en 1937, la création d' « Amelia au bal » de Gian Carlo Menotti. De 1938 à 1948, il prend en main les destinées de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh, dirige au Metropolitan Opera de New York de 1948 à 1953 (notamment, en 1953, la première américaine du « Rake's Progress » de Stravinski) et, à partir de 1953, l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, qui devient sous sa baguette l'un des meilleurs du monde.

Au milieu du XXe siècle, une série de chefs d'orchestre hongrois de grands talents vont émigrer aux États-Unis, où ils contribueront à jeter les bases d'une vie symphonique de haut niveau. Fritz Reiner fut l'un des premiers à faire ce parcours avant ses compatriotes George Szell, Eugene Ormandy et Antal Dorati.

À l'Académie Franz Liszt de sa ville natale, Fritz Reiner étudie le piano avec István Thomán et Béla Bartók et la composition avec Hans Koessler. Il donne son 1er concert à l'âge de 13 ans, jouant la partie soliste d'un Concerto pour piano de Mozart. Fritz Reiner fera également des études juridiques. Mais le compositeur Leo Weiner l'a convaincu de se consacrer à la direction d'orchestre. Fritz Reiner est engagé comme répétiteur au « Népszínház-Vigopera » de Budapest, où il débute dans « Carmen » en 1909, en remplaçant au pied levé un chef d'orchestre malade. En 1910 et 1911, il dirige au « Landestheater » de Laibach (aujourd'hui Ljubljana, en Slovénie) , où il donne notamment la 1re locale de « Parsifal » . De 1910 à 1914, Fritz Reiner dirige au « Népora » de Budapest. En 1914, il est nommé directeur musical de la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde, qui assure également les services de la « Hofoper » de Dresde, où il débute en dirigeant la Tétralogie de Wagner sans la moindre répétition. Fritz Reiner restera à Dresde jusqu'en 1921. C'est là qu'il découvre la musique de Richard Strauss, dont 3 grands Opéras ont été créés sur la scène de la « Hofoper » : « Salomé » , « Elektra » , « Le Chevalier à la rose » ; il a l'occasion de les diriger régulièrement. C'est Fritz Reiner qui est au pupitre pour la 1re allemande de « la Femme sans ombre » , le 23 octobre 1919. Il est invité à Hambourg, Berlin, Vienne, Rome et Barcelone. En 1922, Fritz Reiner se voit offrir la succession d'Eugène Ysaÿe comme directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de Cincinnati, poste qu'il conservera jusqu'en 1931, faisant de cet Orchestre une phalange respectée. Il apporte la tradition austro-allemande du répertoire Classique et Romantique et crée un véritable style d'exécution de cette musique, alors totalement absent dans les Orchestres américains en dehors des grandes métropoles. Fritz Reiner adopte la nationalité américaine en 1928.

Fritz Reiner est engagé comme professeur de direction d'orchestre au Curtis Institute of Music de Philadelphie (1931-1941) , où il comptera notamment parmi ses élèves des personnalités aussi diverses que Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss, Nino Rota, Vincent Persichetti, Walter Hendl, Felix Slatkin, Richard Purvis. En 1935, il commence à diriger à l'Opéra de San Francisco, où Fritz Reiner reviendra régulièrement jusqu'en 1938. Au cours de la saison 1936-1937, il dirige au Covent Garden de Londres des représentations mémorables de « Tristan und Isolde » pour les débuts londoniens de Kirsten Flagstad, avec Lauritz Melchior. Puis, Fritz Reiner prend la direction de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh (1938-1948) ; il dirige ensuite régulièrement au Metropolitan Opera de New York (1948-1953) , où il débute avec « Salomé » de Richard Strauß ; pendant 5 saisons, il y conduira 143 représentations, principalement les Opéras de Mozart, Wagner et Richard Strauß, mais aussi « Carmen » , et la première américaine du « Rake's Progress » de Stravinski, en 1953. En 1955, Fritz Reiner est invité à diriger « les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg » de Wagner à la « Staatsoper » de Vienne pour la saison inaugurale du nouveau Théâtre reconstruit. Devenu directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago (1953-1962) , son exigence, sa recherche de la perfection et des moyens non négligeables lui permettent de s'entourer d'instrumentistes de très haut niveau et de faire de cet Orchestre l'une des plus belles phalanges du monde. La perfection d'exécution est alors une réalité, avec une sonorité brillante et incisive devenue depuis le standard américain en la matière. Son caractère impitoyable, son refus du compromis constituent l'envers d'une légende truffée d'anecdotes qui révèlent une personnalité difficile, dotée d'une sensibilité masquée mais aussi d'un charisme indéniable. Fritz Reiner meurt après avoir contracté une pneumonie pendant les répétitions du « Crépuscule des dieux » au Met, en 1963.

The prominent conductor of Opera and Symphonic music in the 20th Century, Frederick Martin (Fritz) Reiner, was born on 19 December 1888 in Budapest, Austria-Hungary, and died on 15 November 1963 in New York City.

Hungarian born and trained, Reiner emigrated to the United States, in 1922, where he rose to prominence as a conductor with several Orchestras. He reached the pinnacle of his career while music-director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in the 1950's and early 1960's.

Reiner was born into a secular Jewish family that resided in the Pest area of the city. After preliminary studies in law at his father's urging, Reiner pursued the study of piano, piano pedagogy, and composition at the Franz Liszt Academy. During his last 2 years there, his piano teacher was the young Béla Bartók. After early engagements at Opera Houses in Budapest and Dresden, where he worked closely with Richard Strauß, he moved to the United States of America in 1922 to take the post of Principal Conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. He remained until 1931, having become a naturalized citizen in 1928, then began to teach at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, where his pupils included Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss. He conducted the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, from 1938 to 1948, and made a few recordings with them for « Columbia » Records, then spent several years at the Metropolitan Opera, where he conducted a historic production of Strauß' « Salome » , in 1949, with the Bulgarian soprano Ljuba Welitsch in the title role, and the American premiere of Igor Stravinsky's « The Rake's Progress » , in 1951. He also conducted and made a recording of the famous 1952 Metropolitan Opera production of Bizet's « Carmen » , starring Rise Stevens. The production was telecast on closed circuit television that year. At the time of his death, he was preparing the Met's new production of Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » .

In 1947, Reiner appeared on camera in the film « Carnegie Hall » , in which he conducted the New York Philharmonic Orchestra as they accompanied violinist Jascha Heifetz in an abbreviated version of the 1st movement of Tchaïkovsky's Violin Concerto. 10 years later, Heifetz and Reiner recorded the full Tchaïkovsky Concerto in stereo for « RCA Victor » , in Chicago.

Reiner's music-making had been largely American-focused since his arrival in Cincinnati. But after the Second World War, he began markedly increasing his European activity. When he became music-director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, in 1953, he had an international reputation. By common consent, the 10 years that he spent in Chicago mark the pinnacle of his career, and are best-remembered today through the many recordings he made in Chicago's Orchestra Hall for « RCA Victor », from 1954 to 1963. The 1st of these (« Ein Heldenleben » by Richard Strauß) occurred on March 6, 1954, and was among « RCA »'s 1st to use stereophonic sound. His last concerts in Chicago took place in the spring of 1963.

One of his last recordings, released in a special Reader's Digest box-set, was a performance of Brahms' 4th Symphony, recorded with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, in October 1962, in London's Kingsway Hall. This recording was later reissued on LP by « Quintessence » and on CD by « Chesky ». On September 13 and 16, 1963, Reiner conducted a group of New York musicians in Haydn's Symphony No. 101 in D major ; this was followed by September 18 and 20, 1963, sessions devoted to Haydn's Symphony No. 95 in C minor.

He also appeared with members of the Chicago Symphony in a series of telecasts on Chicago's WGN-TV, in 1953-1954, and a later series of nationally syndicated programs called « Music from Chicago ». Some of these performances have been issued on DVD. The videos clearly show his stern, disciplined demeanor, but at the conclusion of a piece, Reiner would turn to the audience and smile at them as he bowed.

Reiner was married 3 times (one of them to a daughter of Etelka Gerster) and had 3 daughters. His health deteriorated after a heart attack, in October 1960. He died in New York City on November 15, 1963, at the age of 74.

Reiner was especially noted as an interpreter of Richard Strauß and Béla Bartók and was often seen as a modernist in his musical taste ; he and his compatriot Joseph Szigeti convinced Serge Koussevitzky to commission the Concerto for Orchestra from Bartók. In reality, he had a very wide repertory and was known to admire Mozart's music above all else.

Reiner's conducting technique was defined by its precision and economy, in the manner of Arthur Nikisch and Arturo Toscanini. It typically employed quite small gestures (it has been said that the beat indicated by the tip of his baton could be contained in the area of a postage stamp) although, from the perspective of the players, it was extremely expressive. The response he drew from Orchestras was one of astonishing richness, brilliance, and clarity of texture. Igor Stravinsky called the Chicago Symphony under Reiner « the most precise and flexible Orchestra in the world » ; it was more often than not achieved with tactics that bordered on the personally abusive, as Kenneth Morgan documents in 2005 biography of the conductor. Chicago musicians have spoken of Reiner's autocratic methods ; trumpeter Adolph Herseth told National Public Radio that Reiner often tested him and other musicians.

Even though his music-making had been American-focused since his arrival in Cincinnati, Fritz Reiner became active in Europe after World War II. When he became Music Director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, he had a completely international reputation. He achieved the peak of his success as a conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which he served as music-director, from 1953 to 1962, and which he brought-up to the point of impeccably fine performance in both Classical and modern music. His striving for perfection created for him the reputation of a ruthless Master of the Orchestra; he was given to explosions of temper, but musicians and critics agreed that it was because of his uncompromising drive toward the optimum of orchestral playing that the Chicago Symphony Orchestra achieved a very high-rank among American Symphonic organizations. Those 10 years are best-remembered today through the many landmark, stereophonic recordings he made in Chicago's Orchestra Hall for « RCA Victor », from 1954 to 1962. His last concerts in Chicago were in the spring of 1963.

Fritz Reiner was a National Patron of Delta Omicron, an international professional music fraternity. He was married 3 times (one of them was a daughter of Etelka Gerster) and fathered 3 daughters, a 3rd daughter out of wedlock. In his last years, Reiner's health deteriorated as a result of a major heart attack he suffered in October 1960. He died in New York City, at the age of 74.

Fritz Reiner was a legend among conductors. Universally admired for his music-making, widely disliked for his aggressive and exacting temperament, and survived by a legacy of definitive recorded performances, he was largely responsible for the artistic ascendancy of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and exerted considerable influence on generations of musicians.

Born in Budapest, in 1888, he studied piano with his mother and, at the age of 15, entered the Franz Liszt Academy : an institution that also boasts Béla Bartók, Zoltan Kodály, Ernst von Dohnányi, George Szell, Eugene Ormandy, Georg Solti and Antal Dorati as graduates. Reiner gained conducting experience at a number of regional Opera Houses before eventually returning to Budapest, in 1911, to serve at the city's « Volksoper » , where his reputation as a conductor of special abilities finally emerged.

In 1914, Reiner accepted a position at the Dresden Court Opera, where he formed a fortuitous relationship with both the conductor Arthur Nikisch and the composer Richard Strauß ; Reiner would eventually give the German premiere of Strauß' « Die Frau ohne Schatten » , and would remain a devoted interpreter of the composer's works throughout his career. The economic chaos and emergent anti-Semitism that followed the First World War made Reiner anxious to leave Europe, and an invitation (in 1921) to become the music-director of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra provided just the right opportunity. From that point onward, Reiner's career was firmly rooted in the United States, where he became a citizen in 1928.

After resigning his post at Cincinnati, Reiner became a professor of conducting at the Curtis Institute of Music in Philadelphia, where his students included both the young Leonard Bernstein and Lukas Foss ; Bernstein, in particular, credited Reiner with a great deal of influence in his development.

In 1938, he became the director of the Pittsburgh Symphony ; one of several positions that established Reiner as a fine builder of Orchestras, with a talent for steering ensembles toward new levels of quality and success. A number of Reiner's well-known recordings stem from his tenure there. Guest appearances during his Pittsburgh years include those at Covent Garden and the San Francisco Symphony. From Pittsburgh, he moved to the Metropolitan Opera, where he remained on the conductor roster until 1953 ; his advocacy of Strauss' Operas was especially strong there, and his performances of « Salome » and « Elektra » number among the most memorable evenings in the Met's history.

1953 was a watershed year for Reiner, since it was then that he assumed the directorship of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. This was to become his signature partnership, and the position that would establish his lasting legacy. His relationship with the Orchestra was never a smooth one (he was known for hostility and impatience in rehearsal, and for firing musicians for mistakes in concerts) but he undeniably raised the ensemble from its status as a good American Orchestra to that of one of the finest in the world. Unlike a number of other prominent conductors who excelled in narrow corners of the musical canon, Reiner maintained his excellent standards and clarifying precision throughout an especially broad repertory that crossed boundaries of nationality and style. He was as renowned for his performances of new works, such as Bartók's Concerto for Orchestra (a piece that Reiner himself commissioned from the dying composer) and Alan Hovhaness' « Mysterious Mountain » as he was for his Mahler, Strauss and Haydn. His tenure in Chicago also resulted in what was then an unprecedented volume of fine recordings, some of which still remain as favorites, despite the improved fidelity of modern competitors. Reiner resigned from Chicago, in 1962 (after only 9 seasons) , and died the following year of heart failure.

Fritz Reiner was born into a mercantile family, although his mother was a keen amateur musician and he himself began to study the piano when he was 6, soon showing signs of musical gifts and a highly-retentive memory. At the age of 10, he became a pupil at the Franz Liszt Academy in Budapest, where he was an active student, taking the solo part in Piano Concertos and playing percussion in the student Orchestra. His teachers included Béla Bartók and Leo Weiner, who encouraged him to think of conducting as a future career. Despite his father's preference for him to pursue law as a profession, Reiner became a « répétiteur » at the Budapest Comic Opera, making his conducting debut there when he was 19, with Bizet's « Carmen » , in the time-honoured fashion of replacing a sick colleague. Later, he said that this was « the hardest thing I ever did » . He was appointed as a staff conductor at the Ljubljana Opera House for the 1910-1911 season, where the 1st conductor was Václav Talich (like Reiner, a great admirer of Arthur Nikisch) ; and, in 1911, he secured a position at the « Népopera » in Budapest, a large-scale private enterprise separate from the Royal Hungarian Opera, whose performances were aimed at a widely-based popular audience. Here, Reiner initially conducted Operetta and, later, grand Opera, including the 1st performance of Wagner's « Parsifal » in Europe following the expiry of its copyright at the end of 1913.

This helped to advance his reputation and, in the summer of 1914, Reiner was invited to conduct at the Saxon Court Opera (the Semper Opera House in Dresden) on a trial basis, following the death of Ernst von Schuch. Immediately after his 1st performance, of « Rigoletto », he was offered a contract for a permanent position, working alongside the Theatre's 2 other conductors and conducting Symphony concerts as well as Operas. At Dresden, he formed a close relationship with Richard Strauß, conducting the 1st performance of his Opera « Die Frau ohne Schatten » after its Viennese premiere of 1919. Because of the city's proximity to Berlin and Leipzig, he was also able to attend many performances conducted by Arthur Nikisch, whom he observed closely. However, Reiner gradually became restless in Dresden, aspiring to, but not being offered, the post of chief conductor ; and, in November 1921, he resigned his position there. After conducting engagements in Italy and Spain, he accepted without hesitation an offer from the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra to become its chief conductor, with effect from the start of the 1922-1923 season.

Reiner's career in the United States, where he lived for the rest of his life (he took American citizenship in 1928) , was based upon the long-term musical directorship of 3 major Symphony Orchestras : the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, from 1922 to 1931 ; the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, from 1938 to 1948 ; and, last but certainly by no means least, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, from 1953 to 1963. In each instance, he raised the playing standards of these Orchestras to a very high-level and, with the last 2, made a considerable number of commercial recordings. Between 1948 and 1953, he was on the conducting staff of the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, where he led the 1st American performances of Stravinsky's « The Rake's Progress » . In addition to these permanent appointments, Reiner was active as a guest-conductor and as a teacher. Between the 2 World Wars, he conducted Opera in both Europe and South America ; a recording of his « Tristan und Isolde » at Covent Garden, in 1936, has been preserved, and he also appeared at the Vienna State Opera, conducting « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , in 1955. Between 1931 and 1941, he taught conducting as the head of the Opera and orchestral departments at the Curtis Institute in Philadelphia, where his pupils included Leonard Bernstein, Lukas Foss and Walter Hendl. At Curtis, Reiner encouraged his students to sing and conduct the recitatives from Mozart's Operas in order to develop a sense of vocal rhythm. In the autumn of 1959, he suffered a massive heart attack which forced him to cancel nearly all of his performances with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra during the 1959-1960 season. When he ultimately returned to the podium, he was noticeably thinner and weaker and had to conduct from a sitting position. No longer a well man, he stepped-down as chief conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, at the end of the 1962-1963 season, to be succeeded by Jean Martinon.

Apart from his superb musicianship, Reiner was famous as a conductor for 2 things : his spare conducting style and his menacing temperament. He learnt the value of economical gestures from his idol Nikisch, and was reputed to have commented about his conducting style : « They say I have a small beat, but it is a good one. » . The purpose of these tiny gestures was to focus the attention of his orchestral players upon himself alone. He used a long baton, and would indicate the phrasing which he sought with small movements made within the overall delineation of the beat. His players were left in no doubt as to his intentions : he possessed a virtuoso stock of small but meaningful physical signals, such as puffing-out his cheeks to indicate an entry for the wind players and, all the time, he would be looking remorselessly at the individual members of the Orchestra with the most penetrating gaze. The stories about his legendary temper are legion : one player commented that « any day he failed to lose his temper was a day when he was too sick to conduct » . At the same time, he had a rather dark sense of humour. His biographer Philip Hart tells a story of the day of his 1st rehearsal as chief conductor with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra : a violist introduced himself with the words « it's a pleasure, Doctor Reiner. » , to which Reiner ominously replied : « We'll see. » .

The key characteristic of Reiner's performances was their extraordinary level of technical accuracy, manifested in the precise observation of tempi, dynamics and phrasing. His preparation was exhaustive and complete, and the exacting standards that he held for himself were also applied to the musicians of the Orchestras which he commanded. With his Mastery of architectural structure and his precise sense of rhythm, Reiner was able to create performances that were expertly structured, superbly detailed, immaculately executed and, overall, performed with an appropriate sense of style. Although he made numerous recordings with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra during the 1940's, many of which exhibit these characteristics, their full manifestation on disc was only realized with the advent of « RCA's Living Stereo » engineering, which was used for his recordings with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The timing of his appointment to the Chicago post coincided exactly with « RCA » 's plans for the development of stereophonic sound, which involved the company recording this Orchestra in stereo, from 1954 onwards. Reiner's insistence on intensive preparation, the virtuosity of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and the superb sound achieved by « RCA » producers Richard Mohr and John Pfeiffer resulted in some of the finest commercial recordings of Classical music ever made. Virtually all of these recordings can be recommended without hesitation, as can the more limited number of recordings for other labels and from live performances that have appeared commercially. Reiner's achievement was aptly summed-up by Harold C. Schönberg, who wrote of him :

« As a musical intellect, as an incomparable musician, as the possessor of an ear virtually unparalleled in his field, Fritz Reiner held a unique spot in 20th Century musical life and thought. »

Fritz Reiner (geboren 19. Dezember 1888 in Budapest ; gestorben 15. November 1963 in New York City) war ein amerikanischer Dirigent ungarischer Herkunft.

Fritz Reiner, einer assimilierten jüdischen Familie aus Pest entstammend, studierte auf Drängen seines Vaters zuerst an der Budapester Universität einige Jahre Jura, bevor er die Franz-Liszt-Musikakademie besuchte, um sich bei István Thomán im Klavierspiel und bei Hans Koessler in der Kompositionslehre ausbilden zu lassen. Seit 1909 Korrepetitor an der Budapester Oper, debütierte er dort 1910 als Dirigent, als er für einen erkrankten Kollegen einsprang und eine Vorstellung von Carmen erfolgreich übernahm. Darauf hin wurde er als Erster Kapellmeister an die Oper von Laibach berufen. 1911-1914 gehörte er der Budapester Volksoper an, wo er unter anderem Parsifal dirigierte.

1922 ließ er sich in den USA nieder und wurde als Nachfolger von Eugène Ysaÿe Chefdirigent des Cincinnati Symphony Orchestras bis 1931. Einladungen führten ihn auch nach San Francisco, Philadelphia und Chicago, in der Saison 1936-1937 gastierte er im Londoner Covent Garden am Royal Opera House.

Anschließend war er für zehn Jahre Chefdirigent des Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra (1938-1948) und unterrichtete in Philadelphia von 1931 bis 1941 am Curtis Institute of Music (Abteilungen Oper und Orchester), mit dessen Orchester er auch Opernaufführungen erarbeitete. Zu seinen Schülern zählten auch die später berühmt gewordenen Musiker Lukas Foss und Leonard Bernstein. (Als Bernstein ihn einmal als « Fritz » ansprach, antwortete Reiner : « It's Mr. Reiner. »)

Ab 1948 war er für sieben Jahre an der New Yorker Metropolitan Opera engagiert, wo er unter anderem 1949 die berühmt gewordenen Vorstellungen von Salome mit Ljuba Welitsch in der Titelrolle und 1951 die amerikanische Erstaufführung von The Rake's Progress dirigierte. Ebenso trat er in Konzerten mit den New Yorker Philharmonikern in der Carnegie Hall auf. Er setzte auch seine internationale Karriere fort, 1955 leitete er etwa Aufführungen von den Meistersingern in der wieder aufgebauten Wiener Staatsoper.

Größten Nachhall, auch heute noch auf zahlreichen Tonträgern zu hören, erzielte Reiner aber als Chefdirigent des Chicago Symphony Orchestra, dem er von 1953 bis 1963 vorstand. Im Frühjahr 1963 dirigierte er sein letztes Konzert mit diesem Orchester ; seit einem Herzinfarkt im Oktober 1960 war seine Gesundheit angeschlagen. Noch kurz vor seinem Tod war er mit einer Neuproduktion der Götterdämmerung an der Met beschäftigt.

Seine ersten beiden Ehen führte er mit Töchtern der ungarischen Sopranistin Elka Gerster. In erster Ehe war er mit der jüngeren Tochter Elca (1911-1916), in zweiter Ehe von 1921-1922 bis 1930 mit Berthe, der älteren, verheiratet. Mit seiner dritten Frau, Carlotta, lebte er in Rambleside, Westport (Connecticut).

Reiner war ein Dirigent mit außerordentlich hohen Standards ; viele seiner Aufnahmen suchen an orchestraler Präzision und Glanz bis heute ihresgleichen. Orchestermusiker fürchteten ihn wegen dieser Präzisionsbesessenheit und seines jähzornigen Temperaments. Er hinterließ mehrere Tonaufnahmen mit dem Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, legendär sind aber die meisten seiner zahlreichen Aufnahmen mit dem Chicago Symphony Orchestra, die von RCA bereits von 1954 an auf außerordentlich gut klingenden Schallplatten in Stereophonie aufgenommen wurden und von denen einige noch heute als Referenzeinspielungen gelten, wie Bartóks Konzert für Orchester, Strauß' Ein Heldenleben oder Prokofjews Alexander Newski.

Die musikalische Leitung übernahm er bei den Uraufführungen folgender Werke :

Ottorino Respighi - Antiche arie e danze per liuto (1924) .

Arthur Bliss - Hymn to Apollo (1927) .

Gian Carlo Menotti - Amelia Goes to the Ball ; Amelia geht zum Ball (1937) .

Béla Bartók : Konzert für 2 Klaviere, Schlagzeug und Orchester (1943) ; der Komponist widmete das Werk Fritz Reiner.

Richard Strauß - Symphonisches Fragment aus Josephs Legende (1949) .

« Les discophiles retrouvent donc aujourd'hui un pan réduit du legs de Furtwängler, mais un pan important par la teneur de cet Adagio de la 7e de Bruckner. Tout comme dans la 9e du même auteur, le chef allemand se livre dans cet Adagio à une réflexion musicale d'une émotion presque insoutenable sur le destin, la vie, la mort, la souffrance. La couleur abyssale des cuivres (écoutez la montée à partir de 16 min 40 ou celle à 19 min 10) , les cordes qui empoignent gravement ou furieusement la musique sont les stigmates bouleversants des documents Furtwängler de guerre. On déplorera la demi-seconde de suspension artificielle dans la transition de l'Adagio de la 7e, correspondant au 1er changement de face de 78 tours, le raccord le plus important, justement le seul mal géré au disque ! » (Christophe Huss, Répertoire n° 59, page 36, juin 1993.)

Upon his arrival in Prague, the Deputy-Acting « Reich » -Protector (« Stellvertretender Reichsprotektor ») of Bohemia and Moravia (in what is now the Czech Republic) , Reinhard Heydrich,, sought to eliminate opposition to the Nazi occupation by suppressing Czech culture and deporting and executing members of the Czech resistance.

Heydrich wanted to start a new cultural tradition by establishing Prague's « Cultural Week » as « a festive manifestation of German power » . This was to be a week-long display of German cultural achievements, particularly in the field of music, which he considered a source of spiritual recreation « in great times of struggle » . He firmly believed that such a display of cultural superiority, coupled with the political message of abandoning Slavic influences in the Protectorate, would have « the greatest impact on the Slav ; it testifies to our power and culture and eases the integration of the racially desired part of the (Czech) population » .

15 mai 1942 : As patron of the Prague Festival, Reinhard Heydrich opened the inaugural concert with Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony performed by the German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague (« Deutsche philharmonische Orchester Prags ») and their head-conductor Joseph Keilberth (with whom Heydrich occasionally played « house music » in his country mansion) .

Joseph Keilberth begann 1925 seine Karriere am Badischen Staatstheater in Karlsruhe, zunächst als Korrepetitor für die Badische Staatskapelle Karlsruhe, ehe er zum Kapellmeister ernannt wurde. 1935 bewarb er sich um den Posten des Generalmusikdirektors in seiner Heimatstadt und setzte sich gegen seinen Mitbewerber Herbert von Karajan durch. Ob er bereits vor der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten oder überhaupt dem völkisch gesinnten Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur und später der Nachfolgeorganisation, der Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde, angehörte, wie Fred K. Prieberg behauptet, ist zweifelhaft, da eine Beitrittserklärung mit der Unterschrift bisher nicht vorliegt. Bei der Bewertung von Dokumenten wäre zudem zu berücksichtigen, daß Keilberth den gleichen Vornamen wie sein Vater führte, zum fraglichen Zeitpunkt unter der gleichen Adresse wohnte und noch dazu am gleichen Theater engagiert war. Gesichert ist hingegen, daß Keilberth bis zum Zeitpunkt des Verbots der Karlsruher Schlaraffengesellschaft noch immer als « Ritter Kla-Mottl der zartbesaitete » Mitglied der « Schlaraffia Carolsuhu » war. Noch im Januar 1939 führte er mit dem Karlsruher Orchester ein Werk Igor Strawinskys auf, der von den Nationalsozialisten als Kulturbolschewist bezeichnet und abgelehnt wurde.

1940 übernahm Keilberth auf Empfehlung Wilhelm Furtwänglers als Generalmusikdirektor das Deutsche Philharmonische Orchester in Prag, das dort schon in der k.k. Monarchie bestanden hatte und nun im so genannten Reichsprotektorat Böhmen und Mähren weiter existierte. Ein Konzert Keilberths, das in Zusammenhang mit Adolf Hitlers Geburtstag steht, ist nicht bekannt. Er dirigierte das Prager Orchester bei circa 400 Auftritten, Musik von erst durch die Nationalsozialisten geförderten Komponisten fand Eingang in etwa 20 Programme. Da es Keilberth gelang, für den Prager Klangkörper eine Einstufung als « u.k. » (« unabkömmlich ») zu erreichen, was eine Einberufung von Musikern verhinderte, bestand das Orchester bis in die letzten Tage des Zweiten Weltkriegs fort und konnte noch am 1. Mai 1945 einen Beethoven-Abend in Prag geben. Laut Prieberg war Keilberth von 1942 bis 1945 Landesleiter der Reichsmusikkammer im Reichsprotektorat Böhmen und Mähren. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn vor einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

25 mai 1942 : The « Gauleiter » of Upper-Austria August Eigruber is named Regional Governor of Labour.

30 août 1942 : Dans le cadre du Festival de musique de la station thermale de Bad Kissingen, le chef Adolf Mennerich dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Il s'agit du dernier concert à avoir lieu durant la guerre.

24-27 septembre 1942 : Le chef Oswald Kabasta dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich (étiquette « Electrola » , LP ; étiquette « Pearl » , CD) .

Oswald Kabasta

Oswald Kabasta est né le 29 décembre 1896 à Mistelbach et est mort le 6 février 1946 à Kufstein. Il fut l'un des plus grands chefs d'orchestre autrichiens du XXe siècle. Il étudie la composition à l'Académie de musique et des arts du spectacle de Vienne auprès de Joseph Marx et du chef d'orchestre Ferdinand Löwe, ancien élève et ardent disciple d'Anton Bruckner, et a pris des cours privés auprès de Franz Schmidt. C'est en Allemagne qu'il réalise l'essentiel de sa carrière. Il prend la direction musicale en 1924 de l'Opéra de Baden puis dirige l'Orchestre de Graz durant 5 années (1926-1931) avant d'accéder, à partir de 1931, à la tête de l'Orchestre de l'Académie de Vienne et de celui de la Radio. Il s'occupe des « Wiener Singverein » (petits chanteurs de Vienne) de 1935 à 1937.

Celui qui a adhéré tôt, et avec enthousiasme, au Parti National-Socialiste se voit récompenser pour son talent et son engagement : il obtient la consécration de sa carrière en étant nommé à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich, en 1938. Suite à l'« Anschluß », il va toujours conclure sa correspondance avec l'expression consacrée, « Heil Hitler ! » . Il dirige des compositions modernes : celles de Franz Schmidt (il va créer, en 1934, la 4e Symphonie qui lui est dédiée et, en 1938, l'Oratorio « le Livre des 7 Sceaux ») ; celles de Béla Bartók et ce, malgré l'interdiction officielle du régime (il se fera la main avec la Musique pour cordes, percussion et célesta) ; et, surtout, la musique d'Anton Bruckner.

Ses interprétations de Bruckner, notamment de la 4e Symphonie dite « Romantique » , sont admirées pour leur intensité et leur conduite rythmique. Nous lui devons également des enregistrements de Beethoven (dont la célèbre Symphonie « Héroïque ») , de Mozart, de Schubert et de Verdi (« la Force du destin » du 18 janvier 1939) sans oublier sa superbe interprétation au disque de la 9e Symphonie d'Antonín Dvořák avec sa phalange de Munich. Kabasta dirigera des concerts jusqu'à ce que les « Alliés » détruisent la ville.

Oswald Kabasta sera le contemporain de plusieurs autres chefs provenant du Sud de l'Allemagne : les Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm, Hans Rosbaud et Eugen Jochum deviendront beaucoup plus connus que lui. Kabasta n'était pas plus « Nazi » que Karl Böhm qui terminait aussi ses lettres avec le fameux « Heil Hitler ! » (tout en faisant beaucoup plus de courbettes en présence du « Führer ») . L'avantage que Böhm va détenir sur son collègue sera d'avoir réussi à poursuivre sa carrière à Dresde et à Vienne ; des villes relativement éloignées des grands centres favorisés par le « Reich » . Kabasta va passer sa carrière à Munich : le berceau du mouvement National-Socialiste, en plus d'être une scène privilégiée par Adolf Hitler. Le Philharmonique de Munich sous Kabasta sera reconnue comme « l'Orchestre de la capitale du mouvement nazi » . Réputé et admiré, Kabasta sera sévèrement « épuré » en octobre 1945 après son admission d'avoir voulu devenir un membre en règle du Parti, en 1937. Mais pour se défendre, il ira jusqu'à affirmer être opposé au régime dans son fort intérieur. En contrepartie, Herbert von Karajan, sera autorisé après la guerre à poursuivre sa carrière comme si de rien n'était.

Oswald Kabasta sera démis de ses fonctions sans salaire par la ville de Munich et se verra « interdire à vie » de diriger un orchestre. C'est pour cette raison qu'il se donnera la mort à Kufstein, en Autriche, le 6 février 1946 (à l'âge de 49 ans, 1 mois et 8 jours) , en absorbant une forte dose de somnifère.

...

Around 1931, Oswald Kabasta served as musical director of the Vienna Radio. He enjoyed the public approbation of the British conductor Adrian Boult, who announced in a 1938 radio broadcast :

« The present high reputation of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra is due to Professor Kabasta who, with Sir Henry Wood and Doctor Mengelberg, commands our admiration by virtue of sheer Mastery in the business of conducting. Quite apart from their merits as musicians and artists, they are superb craftsmen. »

Oswald Kabasta was an enthusiastic supporter of the Nazi regime. After the « Anschluß » of 1938, he signed all his letters with, « Heil Hitler ! » . After the end of World War II, Kabasta was forbidden to work as a conductor by the Allies when he admitted that he had applied to join the Nazi Party (although he claimed to be « inwardly anti-Nazi ») . In October 1945, the denazification authorities ordered the city of Munich to discontinue his salary. Devastated by his dismissal, and his relegation to the status of « common laborer » , he committed suicide in Kufstein, Austria in 1946.

Repertoire and Style

Oswald Kabasta was considered, at its time, like an exceptional director, especially during last the 8 years of its race, in which was to the front of Philharmonic Orchestra of Munich. During this period, it emphasized like great interpreter of Anton Bruckner, thus contiuando with the long tradition Bruckneriana of the orchestra, demonstrating the high-level acquired in a series of local tours and abroad. Kabasta was also an enthusiastic director of Contemporary music. He directed, in 1934, to the opening of Franz Schmidt 4th Symphony (dedicated to him) and the one of the Oratorio « the Book of 7 Seals » of the same author, in 1938. Some years later, in 1943, and, in spite of the official prohibition of the music of Béla Bartók, Kabasta tried and directed the « Music for strings, percussion and celesta » .

Their generally fast interpretations offered tempi, strong accents and clarity in the internal parts. Although the basic pulse always felt strongly, Kabasta could exhibit a great rythmical freedom within this pulse. Music became absolutely flexible when it was necessary, directed by a baton of high accuracy.

Controversy

Oswald Kabasta was contemporary of several South wing Germanic conductors, such as Herbert von Karajan, Karl Böhm, Hans Rosbaud and Eugen Jochum : all of them far better remembered than him. Kabasta was not a Nazi more ardent than Böhm, that also signed its correspondence with « Heil Hitler ! » and who flattered very shamelessly more to the « Führer » . But whereas Böhm developed to its race like director in Dresden and Vienna (relatively moved away from cities of the great centers of the 3rd « Reich ») , Kabasta passed those years in Munich, the birthplace of the Nazi movement and the scene for the grandiloquent artistic schemes of Adolf Hitler. The Munich Philharmonic under Kabasta got to be well-known like, « The Orchestra of the Capital of the Nazi Movement » . Because of this context, Kabasta had a Nazi profile more prominent than the one of any other director. Old members of the Party, like Karajan, were authorized to continue with their races after the War.

Fürtwängler dirige également l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie (étiquette « Telefunken » , 78 rpm : SK 3230-3232, matrices 026378 à 026383 ; étiquette « Tahra - Furt » , CD : 1007 ; étiquette « SWF » , CD : 963) .

Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Alceste » de Gluck ; et le Concerto pour violoncelle de Schumann, avec le soliste Tibor de Machula (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

There is more interesting competition here, in the form of a Testament release that purports to be the 1st (and, so far, only) edition taken from the original German Radio master tape. Presumably, the source for all others is an off-the-air tape. Interestingly, this recording has always been noted for better sound than virtually all other War-time Fürtwängler broadcasts, so the Testament advantage is less significant than one might anticipate. Then, there is the issue of Testament's decision to assume that the Berlin Philharmonic participated in or agreed to the decision of a 1939 international pitch standardizing conference held in London, which established a pitch of A = 440 Hz. It is hard to imagine the Berlin Philharmonic, given their quite extraordinary (and justified) institutional self-confidence, permitting anyone to tell them what correct pitch should be. Although it is not a major difference (others have assumed the Berlin Philharmonic's A = 444 Hz) , the result of Testament's decision is a slight dulling of the orchestral sound. (For the curious, the difference in performance duration is 67:45 for the Eduardo Chibas transfer and 69:00 for Testament's) . Because I think this is one of Fürtwängler's finest Bruckner performances (along with the 1944 8th) , I spent time listening to Chibas' transfer, and comparing whole movements with both Testament and Pristine. All 3 provide a satisfactory picture of the majesty and breadth of this remarkable reading but, once again, if I had to live with one, it would be Chibas'. For one thing, Chibas' concentration on timpani presence is particularly valuable in the Finale. Overall, the naturalness of the orchestral sonority, the beauty and focus of the string sound in the slow movement, the presence of mid-bass throughout, all combine to make one forget that one is listening to a broadcast from the early 1940's.

Hans Gillesberger

Le chef de chœur autrichien Hans Gillesberger est né le 29 novembre 1909 à Ebensee, en Haute-Autriche ; et est mort le 4 mars 1986 à Vienne.

Gillesberger a fait ses études à la fois en musique religieuse et en droit à Innsbruck et à Vienne. Il a dirigé les Petits-Chanteurs de Vienne de 1942 à 1945, puis est devenu directeur-adjoint de l'Opéra d'État de Vienne. Il a également enseigné à l'Académie de musique et d'arts du spectacle de Vienne. Il est retourné chez les Petits-Chanteurs de Vienne en tant que directeur artistique en 1965. Il a été appelé « l'un des chefs de chœur les plus importants de l'après-guerre » .

Il a enregistré essentiellement les œuvres de Johann Sebastian Bach, Franz-Josef Haydn, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz Schubert, Franz Liszt, et Anton Bruckner.

The Austrian choir director Hans Gillesberger was born on 29 November 1909 in Ebensee, Upper-Austria ; and died on 4 March 1986 in Vienna. He directed the Vienna Boys' Choir from 1942 to 1945, then, becoming deputy-director for the Vienna State Opera. He also taught at the University of Music and Performing Arts, Vienna. He returned to the Vienna Boys' Choir as artistic director in 1965. He has been called « one of the most important choral conductors of the post-War period » .

...

Considered one of the most important choral conductors of the post-War period, Hans Gillesberger began his formal studies in both church music and jurisprudence in Innsbruck and in Vienna. Gillesberger was the musical director of the Vienna Boy's Choir from 1942 to 1945. He, then, was engaged in the position of deputy director of the choir for the Vienna State Opera. In 1961, he became a professor at the « Wiener Musikhochschule » (Vienna Academy of Music) and, in 1965, he was again associated with the « Wiener Sängerknaben » (Vienna Boy's Choir) , in the position of artistic director. His recorded work focuses especially on the works of Johann Sebastian Bach ; the Classical period works of Franz-Josef Haydn and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart ; and the Romantic era expressed through the compositions of Franz Schubert, Franz Liszt, and Anton Bruckner.

From 1942 to 1945, Hans Gillesberger was one of the choir Masters of the Vienna Boys' Choir. In 1964, he became their artistic director, at Ferdinand Großmann's suggestion. 7 years later, in 1971, Gillesberger was appointed artistic director of the Chapel Imperial.

Gillesberger, kind-hearted and personable, knew how to talk to the boys, after all, he had been a choir-boy himself at the cathedral in Salzburg. And he knew how to bring-out the best in them. His rehearsal style has been documented in films ; focussed, and always friendly. « His » choir-boys remember him with affection. In a solo rehearsal, Gillesberger once told choirboy Gerald Wirth, « We little people have to stick together » , referring to his own size.

In the 1970's, Gillesberger conducted the Chapel Imperial in several recordings of sacred works by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz-Josef Haydn, and Franz Schubert. His version of Mozart's famous « Requiem » , recorded in 1976, is still available. In the 1990's, the « Penguin Guide to Recored Classical Music » listed it as one of the best interpretations of the piece ; commending it for its energy and focus, « the surprise version is Gillesberger's » .

Gillesberger recorded Motets by Anton Bruckner with the boys and the big boys of the « Chorus Viennensis » , and an 8-part Renaissance mass by Jacobus Gallus which he himself had edited.

Gillesberger's collaboration with Nikolaus Harnoncourt and his « Concentus musicus Wien » resulted in recordings of rare works by Heinrich Ignaz Franz Biber, but the recordings of Johann Sebastian Bach's Cantatas, Passions, the Mass in B minor, and the « Christmas Oratorio » probably had the biggest impact. Gillesberger liked a transparent sound, and he used few singers ; between 3 and 8 boys sing the soprano and alto parts in the choir. This is pure « Gilles » : the voice sound as if they are dancing.

Hans Gillesberger (geboren 29. November 1909 in Ebensee, Oberösterreich ; gestorben 4. März 1986 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Chorleiter. Er gilt als einer der bedeutendsten Chorleiter der Nachkriegszeit, der in seiner pädagogischen

Tätigkeit mehrere Generationen österreichischer Musiker und Musikerzieher ausbildete und prägte.

Zwischen 1918 und 1925 war Hans Gillesberger Kapellknabe am Salzburger Dom. Von 1920 bis 1928 besuchte er das Humanistische Gymnasium Borromäum Salzburg an welchem er Musikunterricht bei Joseph Meßner erhielt. Zwischen 1926 und 1928 leitete er den Institutschor am Borromäum. Es folgte eine Ausbildung an der Musikakademie in Wien bei Josef Lechthaler, Ferdinand Großmann und Karl Josef Walter, an welcher er 1940 die Lehramtsprüfung für Musik ablegte. Danach studierte er Jura in Innsbruck und Wien mit der Promotion im Jahr 1946.

Ab 1935 war Gillesberger als Regens Chori an der Piaristenkirche in Wien tätig. Zwischen 1939 und 1942 hatte er die Leitung der Wiener Bachgemeinde inne. Von 1942 bis 1945 war er Kapellmeister der Wiener Sängerknaben. Im Jahr 1945 gründete Hans Gillesberger die Wiener Kantorei. Zwischen 1945 und 1953 war er Chordirektorstellvertreter an der Wiener Staatsoper. Von 1947 bis 1980 hatte er die Professur an der Akademie für Musik in Wien (Kirchen- und Schulmusik) inne, wo er seit 1968 ordentlicher Professor war. Er unterrichtete dort viele nunmehr bedeutende Chorleiter und Dirigenten (und andere Erwin Ortner und Raimund Hug) .

Die Zeit während der NS-Zeit war für Hans Gillesberger und die Wiener Sängerknaben eine sehr wechselvolle Periode. Zitat aus dem Buch « Dem Gesang ich dien', meine Stadt heißt Wien » .Wiener Sängerknaben 1938-1945 :

« Am 13. März, an dem jedes Jahr die glorreiche „ Heimkehr “ ins Reich mit feierlicher Eintracht begangen wurde, dirigierte Gillesberger ebenfalls im Musikvereinsgebäude das „ Konzert der Wiener Sängerknaben “. Selbst an diesem Gedenktag war vom Chor kein einziges „ Nazilied “ zu hören. » (Grobauer ; Seite 231.)

Von 1953 bis 1968 war Gillesberger Chordirektor der Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft und als solcher Leiter der Wiener Singakademie und des Wiener Kammerchores. Unter seiner Leitung erreichten beide Chöre internationales Niveau. Er initiierte zahlreiche Konzerte und Uraufführungen (und andere Werke von Johann Nepomuk David, Anton Heiller, Paul Hindemith) , unternahm Auslandsreisen und erwirkte viele Schallplattenaufnahmen. Ab 1964 war er künstlerischer Leiter der Wiener Sängerknaben und ab 1971 künstlerischer Leiter der Hofmusikkapelle.

Hans Gillesberger wurde auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (47F-14-6) in einem ehrenhalber gewidmeten Grab bestattet.

Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg

Le chef de chœur, chef d'orchestre, enseignant et pédagogue allemand Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg est né le 15 avril 1906 à Stuttgart et est mort le 1er avril 1985 à Hambourg.

Son père, Max Brückner-Rüggeberg, était un comédien, chanteur et régisseur bien connu, sa mère était pianiste et chanteuse.

Après ses études à la « Münchner Musikhochschule » (entre autres, auprès de Siegmund von Hausegger et August Schmid-Lindner) , Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg débute en 1929 comme assistant-répétiteur auprès de Hans Knappertsbusch à l'Opéra d'État de Munich.

Après des engagements à Essen, Oberhausen, Dortmund, Gera et Rudolstadt, il est, en 1935, nommé « Erster Kapellmeister » à Ulm (où il succède à Herbert von Karajan) .

Ayant protégé le chef d'orchestre Felix Wolfes (d'origine juive) et l'ayant aidé à émigrer d'abord en France puis aux USA, il est arrêté, puis, il lui est interdit de diriger : pendant plusieurs années, sa seule activité vraiment autorisée va être celle de directeur-musical du Festival de Weissenburg, en Bavière, de 1934 à 1939.

En 1938, il obtient toutefois la permission d'être engagé à l'Opéra d'État de Hambourg, où il est bientôt nommé « Erster Kapellmeister » : il va rester attaché à cette ville pour le restant de sa carrière, et va avoir une influence très importante sur la vie musicale de cette région.

Dès 1940, il dirige en plus le « Hamburger Lehrer-Gesangverein HLG » et, peu après, en 1943, commence à enseigner la direction à la « Städtische Schule für Musik und Theater ». En 1960, il est nommé professeur à la « Hochschule für Musik und darstellende Kunst » de Hambourg. Parmi ses élèves, on peut citer : Gerd Albrecht, Christoph Eschenbach, Christoph Prick, Ulf Schirmer, Justus Frantz, Klaus Arp et Reinhard Peters.

Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg a également eu une activité importante de pédagogue auprès de diverses établissements : une de ses passions était de rendre la musique compréhensible à tous.

Son répertoire était extrêmement vaste, du Classique au contemporain. Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg est resté connu avant tout pour ses enregistrements de diverses œuvres de Kurt Weil, réalisés entre 1956 et 1960, avec, entre autres, Lotte Lenya comme soliste : ce sont ces enregistrements que l'on trouve aujourd'hui encore au catalogue.

La soeur de Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg, Else Brückner-Rüggeberg (1910-1981), fut d'abord comédienne, puis, après la guerre, avant tout active auprès de la radio « SWF » de Baden-Baden. Son frère, Friedrich Brückner-Rüggeberg (1915-2003), a fait une carrière de ténor et a laissé de nombreux enregistrements, par exemple dans « L'Incoronazione di Poppea » sous la direction de Walter Gøehr.

Son épouse Ludmilla Schirmer était chanteuse, une mezzo-soprano ; leur fille Claudia est également devenue une mezzo-soprano, puis professeur de chant à la « Folkwangschule » de Essen. Elle enseigne aujourd'hui à la « Universität für Musik und darstellende Kunst » de Graz.

He also frequently appeared as a guest-conductor in South America, conducting the 1st South American performance of Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » in Rio de Janeiro, in 1969. Today, he is mainly known as the conductor of several commercial recordings of German Operettas by Kurt Weill, issued from 1956 to 1960, featuring Lotte Lenya.

Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg (geboren 15. April 1906 in Stuttgart ; gestorben 1. April 1985 in Hamburg) war ein deutscher Dirigent, Chorleiter, Musikpädagoge.

Seinen Hang zur Oper hatte Wilhelm Brückner-Rüggeberg von seinem Vater dem Hofchauspieler und Regisseur Max Brückner-Rüggeberg geerbt. Er stand schon als Kind als Knabe im Wilhelm Tell auf der Bühne und bedingt durch das Wanderleben der Theaterfamilie wechselte er nicht weniger als dreizehnmal die Schulen.

Brückner-Rüggeberg begann seine Laufbahn 1929 in München als Assistent von Hans Knappertsbusch. Weitere Stationen waren Essen 1929-1930, Oberhausen 1930-1931, Dortmund 1931-1933, Gera / Rudolstadt 1933-1934 als 1. Kapellmeister, wo er fast ausschließlich Oper dirigierte. Über mehrere Stationen kam er 1934 als Nachfolger von Herbert von Karajan als Erster Kapellmeister nach Ulm und schließlich 1938 nach Hamburg, wo er den Hamburger Lehrgesangsverein leitete und von 1943 an als Dozent, von 1960 an als Professor an der Hochschule für Musik und Theater Hamburg lehrte. In Hamburg hat er bis 1971 weit über 2.000 Aufführungen dirigiert. In über 700 Gesprächskonzerten für Hamburger Schulen, die sogenannten Hamburger Schülerkonzerte, integriert in den schulischen Musikunterricht setzte er sich mit den Hamburger Philharmonikern für das Verständnis für Musik ein und erläuterte und dirigierte Klassik.

Seine Grabstätte befindet sich auf dem Waldfriedhof in Wohldorf-Ohlstedt.

Paul Schmitz

Paul Schmitz (geboren 16. April 1898 in Hamburg, Oberrealschule Baden-Baden ; gestorben 6. Februar 1992 in München) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Generalmusikdirektor.

Schmitz studierte neben Klavier und Orgel auch Komposition bei Ernst Toch (1887-1964) und lernte bei Wilhelm Furtwängler das Dirigieren. Nach Abschluß seiner Studien war er zunächst als Korrepetitor und Liedbegleiter tätig, spielte aber auch als Pianist in einer Unterhaltungskapelle. 1921 wurde er Kapellmeister in Weimar (siehe auch hier) und später an der Stuttgarter Oper. 1927 wurde er als Erster Staatskapellmeister der Münchner Staatsoper engagiert und folgte dort auf Karl Böhm. 1933 trat er als Nachfolger des aus Deutschland geflohenen Bruno Walter die Stelle als Generalmusikdirektor in Leipzig an ; diese behielt er bis 1951. Er folgte dann einem Angebot aus Westdeutschland und arbeitete bis 1963 als Generalmusikdirektor in Kassel, kehrte jedoch nach seiner dortigen Pensionierung zunächst mit Gastspielen und schließlich erneut als Generalmusikdirektor nach Leipzig zurück, wo er 1973 auch seine Karriere beendete.

In seiner frühen Zeit in Leipzig sind eine Reihe von Schellack-Aufnahmen entstanden.

Paul Schmitz war einer von 15 Dirigenten auf der so genannt Gottbegnadeten-Liste des Reichsministeriums für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda.

...

Über einen Zeitraum von vier Jahrzehnten hinweg war der Dirigent Paul Schmitz mit dem Leipziger Musikleben verbunden - nicht immer unter den glücklichsten Umständen. Er wurde am 16. April 1898 in Hamburg geboren und starb am 6. Februar 1992 in München. Zu seinen Lehrern gehörten der Komponist Ernst Toch und Wilhelm Furtwängler. Seine Dirigentenlaufbahn begann als Kapellmeister in Weimar. Es folgten Engagements an den Opernhäusern in Stuttgart und München. 1933 folgte Schmitz einem Ruf nach Leipzig, wo er die musikalische Leitung des Opernhauses übernahm. Nach den Vorstellungen des Intendanten und des Oberbürgermeisters sollte er auch noch dem wegen seiner jüdischen Abstammung vertriebenen Bruno Walter als Gewandhauskapellmeister nachfolgen. Die zuständige Berufungskommission lehnt mit dem Hinweis auf die mangelnde Erfahrung von Schmitz als Konzertdirigent ab. Ungeachtet dessen leitete er die Gewandhauskammerkonzerte und arbeitete auch regelmäßig als Gastdirigent mit den Orchester selbst bei Sinfoniekonzerten zusammen. Schmitz war einer von 15 Dirigenten auf der sogenannten Gottbegnadeten-Liste des von Josef Goebbels geführten Propagandaministeriums. Bis 1951 behielt Schmitz seine Ämter in Leipzig, siedelte dann nach Kassel über, wo er Generalmusikdirektor wurde. Nach seiner Pensionierung zog es Schmitz wieder nach Leipzig - vorerst zu mehreren Gastspielen, bis er schließlich erneut das Amt des Generalmusikdirektor der Oper, nunmehr im Neubau des Hauses, übernahm. Mit einer Aufführung von Giuseppe Verdis « La Traviata » beendete er seine Karriere. Danach blieb er dem Opernhaus weiterhin verbunden und beteiligte sich auch maßgeblich an der Einstudierung von Richard Wagner « Ring des Nibelungen » in der Inszenierung von Joachim Herz, die zwischen 1973 und 1976 großes Aufsehen erregte und als Vorläuferin des Jahrhundert-Rings von Patrice Chéreau in Bayreuth 1976 gilt. Aus Altersgründen konnte Schmitz die Aufführung selbst nicht mehr dirigieren. Diese Aufgabe übernahm Gert Bahner.

Im Forum ist Schmitz mehrfach erwähnt worden, meist im Zusammenhang mit der Gesamtaufnahme von Eugène d'Alberts « Tiefland » . Darüber hinaus sind auch etliche andere Opern unter seiner Leitung eingespielt worden. Nicht alle haben es auf CD geschafft, meisten lagern sie im Deutschen Rundfunkarchiv. Orchestermusik, darunter von Franz-Josef Haydn, erschien schon auf Schellacks.

Paul Schmitz - Der zweimalige Leipziger Generalmusikdirektor

Paul Schmitz stammt aus einem kaufmännischen Elternhaus. Musikalisch vorbelastet ist er nicht. Zum Glück aber wird die Begabung des Jungen schon frühzeitig erkannt und gefördert.

Seine Lehrer sind Ernst Toch für Komposition, Willy Rehberg für Klavier, Arno Landmann für Orgel und Wilhelm Furtwängler für Dirigieren. Das praktische « Handwerkszeug » hält eine erste Tätigkeit als Korrepetitor in Kiel für ihn bereit. Es folgen jugendliche « Wanderjahre » , die ihn als Liedbegleiter bis in die USA führen.

Wieder zurück in Deutschland verdient sich Schmitz seinen Unterhalt in Ermangelung einer geeigneten Anstellung als Pianist einer Unterhaltungskapelle. 1921 bekommt er dann endlich die erste solide Anstellung für zwei Jahre als Kapellmeister in Weimar und danach bis 1927 als Zweiter Kapellmeister am Stuttgarter Opernhaus.

Der bedeutungsvolle Karrieresprung folgt schließlich 1927 mit der Ernennung zum Ersten Staatskapellmeister der Staatsoper München. Damit tritt er die Nachfolge von Bruno Walter, Hans Knappertsbusch und seinem unmittelbaren Vorgänger Karl Böhm an.

1933 erreicht ihn unerwartet die Berufung als Generalmusikdirektor und musikalischer Oberleiter an das Opernhaus

Leipzig.

Ein Wunsch des Leipziger Opernintendanten Hans Schüler und des Leipziger Oberbürgermeister Carl Gørdeler, ihm auch das Amt des Gewandhauskapellmeisters als Nachfolger des wegen seiner jüdischen Abstammung vertriebenen Bruno Walter anzuvertrauen, scheidet im zuständigen Berufungsgremium wegen seines jungen Alters und der noch fehlenden Erfahrung als Konzertdirigent einerseits, andererseits aber auch wegen der Doppelbelastung durch beide Ämter, die schon Arthur Nikisch beklagt hatte, als er ab 1905 für ein Jahr diese Doppelfunktion ausübte.

Nichtsdestotrotz übernimmt er die Leitung des Gewandhauskammerorchesters (Aufnahmen von diesem werden ebenfalls in der Edition Gewandhausorchester erscheinen) . Zudem veranstaltet Schmitz Opernhauskonzerte und ist in jeder Gewandhaus-saison als Gastdirigent vertreten.

In den achtzehn Jahren seiner ersten Leipziger Amtszeit bringt er das Gewandhausorchester in der Oper künstlerisch weiter voran, so daß Leipzig (nicht zuletzt durch Sänger wie Margarete Bäumer, Irma Beilke, Friedrich - auch Frederick - Dalberg und August Seider) unter den führenden Städten der deutschen Opernszene rangiert.

Daneben sind es die Uraufführungen, durch die das Leipziger Opernensemble und Schmitz für Furore sorgen : Carl Orffs « Catulli Carmina » hatten wir an anderer Stelle schon genannt, dazu kommen heute so gut wie vergessene Opern wie « Die pfiffige Magd » von Julius Weismann, « Die Windsbraut » von Winfried Zillig, « Schlaraffenhochzeit » von Siegfried Walther Müller oder dann 1948 « Die Nachtschwalbe » von Boris Blacher. Und Schmitz setzt sich auch für Werke ein, die im Dritten Reich verboten waren. So ist er der erste Dirigent, der Paul Hindemiths « Cardillac » , Piotr Ilitch Tschaikowskis « Zauberin » und « Eugen Onegin » sowie Modest Mussorgskis « Boris Godunow » im Interimstheater « Drei Linden » in Leipzig-Lindenau wieder auf die Bühne bringt.

Der Abschied aus dem Amt und von Leipzig im Jahre 1951 fällt nicht nur ihm, sondern auch dem Gewandhausorchester und seinem Publikum schwer. Zu seinen Ehren ist die Bühne üppig mit Blumen geschmückt. Das Ensemble, als deßen große Stärke in den letzten Jahrzehnten seine Geschlossenheit angesehen wurde, beginnt mehr und mehr zu zerfallen. Namhafte Sänger entfliehen einer sich ausbreitenden kulturpolitischen Doktrin und der geistigen Enge in der DDR.

Auch Schmitz folgt schweren Herzens (aber letztlich einer humanistischen Ausbildung seiner beiden Töchter zuliebe) einem Angebot aus dem Westen Deutschlands. Er geht als Nachfolger Karl Elmendorffs nach Kassel und kann als Generalmusikdirektor und musikalischer Oberleiter des Staatstheaters nun auch die Leitung der Symphoniekonzerte übernehmen. Eben noch mit der Gøthe-Plakette gewürdigt, schickt ihn das Land Hessen 1963 in Pension, weil er das Rentenalter erreicht hat.

Das aber ist die willkommene Gelegenheit für Leipzig, ihn erneut an die Musikstadt zu binden. Also zögert er keine Sekunde und wird nach einem Gastspielvertrag im Jahr darauf zum zweiten Mal Generalmusikdirektor der Oper Leipzig. Diesmal tritt er das Amt im ersten Opern-Neubau der DDR an. Das 1960 eingeweihte Opernhaus steht an gleicher Stelle wie der im November 1943 nach Bombentreffern ausgebrannte Langhanssche klassizistische Opernbau, dessen Untergang Schmitz schmerzlich miterleben mußte.

Mit Giuseppe Verdis « La Traviata » steht Schmitz 1973 ein letztes Mal vor « seinem » Gewandhausorchester im Orchestergraben und beendet damit ein künstlerisch hochechtes Berufsleben. Den legendär gewordenen « Joachim-Herz-Ring » studiert Paul Schmitz mit dem Ensemble noch musikalisch ein. Ihn zu dirigieren, traut ihm die Leipziger Generalintendanz dann doch nicht mehr zu ; altershalber.

Musterplatten mit dem Leipziger Gewandhauskammerorchester unter Paul Schmitz

Als es Thomas Alvar Edison im Jahre 1877 erstmals mit seinem Phonographen gelang, Schallwellen zu fixieren und wiederzugeben, konnte man die Formulierung « Schall und Rauch » nur noch bedingt als Symbol für das Flüchtige und Unwiederbringliche bemühen. Seit seiner bahnbrechenden Erfindung war es möglich, Schall mit technischen Mitteln dauerhaft festzuhalten. In den letzten 130 Jahren wurden diese technischen Mittel sowohl hinsichtlich der Aufnahmequalität als auch der Reproduzierbarkeit kontinuierlich verbessert. Heutzutage übersteigen Aufzeichnungs- und Wiedergabequalität bereits die Leitungsfähigkeit des menschlichen Ohrs, und die leichte Reproduzierbarkeit bereitet der phonographischen Industrie Kopfzerbrechen, weil ihr ihrer Ansicht nach durch massenhaftes Raubkopieren großer finanzieller Schaden entsteht. Auch der Signalmanipulation sind kaum mehr Grenzen gesetzt. Mit Hilfe moderner Schnitt- und Abmischungsverfahren, mit künstlicher Verhallung, elektronischen Begrenzern etc. können Aufnahmen nachträglich bis zur Perfektion geschönt und zum Beispiel Spielfehler eliminiert werden.

Im Zeitalter der Schellackplatte (circa 1900-1950) sah die Situation noch anders aus. Nachträgliche Signalmanipulationen waren nicht möglich. Man konnte nur ganze Matrizen austauschen, für den Fall, daß während der Aufnahme oder des Produktionsprozesses etwas Unvorhergesehenes passiert. Die Gewinnung einer pressfähigen Matrize war komplex und störanfällig : die mit der Tonschrift versehene Urmatrize aus Wachs wurde elektrisch leitend gemacht, also zum Beispiel mit einer feinen Goldschicht überzogen. Von dieser Urmatrize wurde elektrolytisch eine Folgematrize aus Kupfer gewonnen. Diese Matrize war bereits pressfähig, wurde aber in der industriellen Fertigung der Schellackplatten nicht verwandt, weil sie sich im laufenden Produktionsprozess zu schnell abgenutzt hätte. Die eigentliche Plattenpressung erfolgte von Kopien der Kupfermatrize. Wenn die Kopien abgenutzt waren, konnten immer wieder neue Reproduktionen von der originalen Kupfermatrize angefertigt und die verbrauchten Matrizen ersetzt werden.

Während des aufwendigen Produktionsprozesses konnten die Matrizen leicht Schaden nehmen. Darum mußten die Künstler im Aufnahmestudio ihre Musikstücke gleich zwei- bis viermal hintereinander aufnehmen. Falls die Herstellung einer Matrize misslang, dienten diese mehrfachen « Takes » als Ersatz. Sofern alle Takes erfolgreich auf pressfähige Matrizen fixiert werden konnten, lag ein musikalisches Werk in mindestens zwei kompletten Einspielungen vor. Die Schallplattenproduzenten mussten dann entscheiden, welche der Takes veröffentlicht werden sollten. Zu diesem Zweck wurden von allen Matrizen Probepressungen auf Musterplatten gemacht. Beim Abhören der Platten wurde ermittelt, welche Takes technisch und künstlerisch am besten gelungen waren. Diese Takes wurden für die Plattenproduktion verwandt, die Ersatzaufnahmen blieben in der Regel unveröffentlicht. Sie sind meist nur erhalten, wenn die Musterplatten überliefert sind.

Im Jahre 2006 kam das Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv durch eine Schenkung in den Besitz einer Reihe von Musterplatten aus dem Nachlaß des Dirigenten Paul Schmitz (1898-1992) . Schmitz war von 1927 an erster Kapellmeister an der Münchener Staatsoper in der Nachfolge Karl Böhms. Im Jahre 1933 folgte er einem Ruf nach Leipzig. Als Generalmusikdirektor und Leiter des Gewandhauskammerorchesters blieb er der sächsischen Metropole vierzig Jahre verbunden. Mit dem Gewandhauskammerorchester machte Schmitz zahlreiche Aufnahmen für den Leipziger Rundfunk und für die Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft. Die in der Schenkung befindlichen Musterplatten der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft beinhalten sowohl veröffentlichte als auch unveröffentlichte Takes. Wir haben somit die seltene Gelegenheit, die unterschiedlichen Takes miteinander zu vergleichen.

Im August 1941 nahm Paul Schmitz mit dem Gewandhauskammerorchester die Sinfonie in C-Dur Hob. I:90 von Franz-Josef Haydn auf. Diese weniger bekannte Sinfonie entstand im Jahre 1788 als eines der Einzelwerke zwischen den berühmten Zyklen der « Pariser » und « Londoner » Sinfonien. Von der Sinfonie Hob. I:90 befanden sich neben den regulär veröffentlichten Schellackplatten der Deutschen Grammophon Gesellschaft auch die Musterplatten mit den unterschiedlichen Takes in der Schenkung. Paul Schmitz hatte damals die Sinfonie zweimal takeweise aufgenommen. Für die Veröffentlichung erstellte man eine Mischung aus beiden Aufnahmen. Für die erste Plattenseite wählte man die Matrize der Zweitaufnahme. Die restlichen fünf Plattenseiten wurden ausnahmslos mit den Matrizen der Erstaufnahme gepresst.

Die Erstaufnahme des Finale-Fragments der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner

Sinfonie Nr. 9 in D-Moll (WAB 109) mit Teilen des Finalefragments und Frühfassungen des Scherzos (CD Nummer mu08)

Als Anton Bruckner am 11. Oktober 1896 verstarb, hinterließ er sein letztes Werk, die 9. Sinfonie in D-Moll, als Fragment : die ersten drei Sätze waren ausgearbeitet, es fehlte nur die Gesamtedaktion ; das Finale jedoch war unvollständig geblieben. Auf der vorliegenden CD erklingen die drei vollendeten Sätze in ihrer Originalgestalt mit den Münchener Philharmonikern unter Leitung des Bruckner-Experten Oswald Kabasta. Darüber hinaus enthält sie das früheste Tondokument vom Finale-Fragment sowie die Erstaufnahme der beiden Frühfassungen vom Trio zum Scherzo. Die drei historisch wertvollen Live-Aufnahmen hat der deutsche Rundfunk in den 1940er Jahren gemacht.

Text im Begleittext der CD, herausgegeben vom Deutschen Rundfunkarchiv, Frankfurt-am-Main.

« Nun widme ich der Majestät aller Majestäten, dem lieben Gott, mein letztes Werk, und hoffe, daß er mir noch so viel Zeit gönnen wird, es zu vollenden und meine Gabe gnädig aufnimmt. »

So soll sich Anton Bruckner gegenüber seinem letzten Arzt, Doktor Richard Heller, geäußert haben. Bruckners Hoffnung erfüllte sich nicht. Er starb am Nachmittag des 11. Oktober 1896 im Alter von 72 Jahren, ohne sein letztes Werk (die Sinfonie Nr. 9 in D-Moll) vollendet zu haben. Die ersten drei Sätze der Sinfonie waren weitestgehend ausgearbeitet. Es fehlte nur die endgültige Gesamtedition, mit der Bruckner seine Arbeiten abzuschließen pflegte. Das Finale blieb Fragment.

Wie weit die Arbeiten am Finale zum Zeitpunkt von Bruckners Tod fortgeschritten waren, läßt sich im einzelnen nicht mehr nachvollziehen, denn offensichtlich sind wertvolle Handschriften abhanden gekommen. Die Nachricht von Bruckners Tod verbreitete sich rasch in Wien. Richard Heller berichtet, daß sich sofort « Befugte und Unbefugte wie Geier auf seinen Nachlaß » gestürzt hätten. Leider wurde es versäumt, Bruckners Wohnung im « Kustoden-Stöckl » des Schloßes Belvedere rechtzeitig zu versiegeln. Darum konnten zahlreiche Manuskripte entwendet werden. Einige von ihnen tauchten im Laufe der Zeit wieder auf, andere müßen weiterhin als verschollen gelten. Die überlieferten Manuskripte zur 9.

Von den geschätzten 700 Takten, die das vollendete Finale wahrscheinlich umfaßt hätte, sind rund 500 in verschiedenen Entwurfsstadien überliefert : 172 Takte sind vollständig orchestriert, 200 weitere sind teilweise instrumentiert, das heißt der Streichersatz ist vollständig notiert sowie die Stimmen von führenden Instrumenten. Die « erste Abteilung », also die Exposition des Finales, konnte Bruckner noch weitgehend vollenden. Die übrigen Formteile sind bis zum dritten Thema in der Reprise unvollständig ausgearbeitet, dann reißt die Komposition ab. Der Schluß des Finales fehlt gänzlich. Allerdings wissen wir, daß Bruckner eine genaue Vorstellung davon gehabt hat, wie die Sinfonie enden sollte. Richard Heller berichtet, Bruckner habe vorgehabt, « das Allelujah des zweiten Satzes mit aller Macht wieder im Finale zu bringen, damit die Sinfonie mit einem Lob und Preislied an den lieben Gott endet. Und dann setzte er sich ans Klavier und spielte mir mit zitternden Händen, aber richtig und mit voller Kraft, Partien daraus vor. Oftmals habe ich bedauert, musikalisch nicht soweit gebildet zu sein, um einmal Gehörtes wiederspielen oder niederschreiben zu können, denn dann wäre es mir möglich gewesen, vielleicht den Schluß der neunten Sinfonie zu skizzieren. »

Die 9. Sinfonie erschien erstmals im Jahre 1934 im Rahmen der Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe. Seitdem wurden immer wieder Versuche unternommen, die überlieferten Teile des Finales in eine spielbare Fassung zu bringen oder sogar zu vollenden. Den Beginn machte Elke Krüger. Sie richtete die Fragmente bereits 1934 für zwei Klaviere ein. Im Jahre 1940 legte Fritz Öser eine aufführungspraktische Einrichtung der beinahe vollständig instrumentierten Exposition des Finales für Orchester vor. In dieser Form gelangte das Finale von Bruckners 9. Sinfonie am 12. Oktober 1940 erstmals zur Aufführung. Hans Weisbach leitete das Orchester des Reichssenders Leipzig. Das Fragment des Finales stand am Beginn des Konzerts, danach folgten die vollendeten Sätze der 9. Sinfonie von Bruckner. Im Zusammenhang mit dieser Aufführung machte der Reichssender Leipzig eine Versuchsaufnahme von der Exposition des Finales. Das Ergebnis wurde auf zwei Schellackplatten festgehalten. Leider ist die erste der beiden Platten verschollen. Auf der zweiten Platte befindet sich das älteste Klangdokument, das vom Finale der 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner überliefert ist.

Bis dato sind über zwanzig Bearbeitungen des Finales von Bruckners 9. Sinfonie vorgelegt worden. Die wenigsten davon konnten sich im Konzertleben durchsetzen. Sofern man das Finale überhaupt spielt, greift man heute meistens auf die Fassung von William Carragan (1984) oder auf die Bearbeitung der Autorengemeinschaft Nicola Samale, John Alan Phillips, Giuseppe Mazzuca, Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs (1996ff) zurück. Auch heutzutage enden noch die meisten Aufführungen der 9. Sinfonie mit dem dritten Satz - entgegen Bruckners ausdrücklichem Willen. Er hatte verfügt, daß man sein 1884 vollendetes « Te Deum » als vierten Satz spielen soll, falls er das instrumentale Finale nicht mehr vollenden könne.

15 May 2016 : Newsletter from abruckner.com

You would think that finding the date of a recording would be a relatively straightforward process. Usually it is. But over the last 10 days, the date of one legendary recording was becoming anything but straightforward.

For years, the War-time recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 4 with Hans Knappertsbusch conducting the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra has been of great interest. The actual « Reich Radio Gesellschaft » (RRG) recording was confiscated by the Soviets during the fall of Berlin, in 1945, and was transported back to the USSR. In the early 1990's, the recording (along with 1,500 other tapes) was returned to Germany. At that time, the date of September 8th, 1944, was notated within the transfer documents. Until last week, that was considered correct and several commercial releases used that date.

But then, on May 5th, an essay was published in the « New York Times » that discussed how music and some German radio broadcasts helped to tie 2 people together during the Nazi oppression. The essay focused on a broadcast of Richard Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » that took place on Sunday, April 2nd of 1944, but it also mentioned a Bruckner 4th with Knappertsbusch the following week.

Some astute readers suddenly saw a problem. How could a recording be broadcast in April of 1944 if the recording wasn't made ... until September ?

The e-mails started flying and anyone with information regarding this recording was digging into old documents. Thanks to the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » in Frankfurt, we were able to confirm that the Bruckner 4th by Knappertsbusch was, indeed, broadcast on April 9th of 1944 and that the recording in their archive was dated September 8th of that year.

But some digging into the Berlin Philharmonic's archive determined that the performance and the recording took place on April 10th (both a rehearsal and a concert) . Some further digging into the diary of an Orchestra member seems to indicate that the rehearsal may have occurred the day before. Also the BPO archive indicates that on September 8th of 1944, Knappertsbusch was not with the Orchestra.

So, in the end, the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » has updated their database listing April 10th as the probable date, this discography has done the same and the forces of Brucknerian discographic accuracy have won a small battle.

My thanks to Edwin Banta, George Zepos and Jeorg Wyrchow for their help in this saga.

The « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » (DRA) , in Frankfurt, produced a listing of this 1944 broadcast series. Indeed, the Bruckner 4th was broadcast on April 9, 1944.

The listing confirmed that the « Tristan » performance was broadcast during the Sunday concert of April 2nd, 1944. That performance was recorded on May 15-19 of 1943. But the Bruckner concert broadcast the following week (April 9, 1944) and performed by Hans Knappertsbusch and the Berlin Philharmonic was shown to be recorded (according to the DRA) on September 8th, 1944 - a full 5 months later !!!

The DRA dated this recording as September 8th, 1944, since the papers that documented the transfer of these historic « Reich Radio Gesellschaft » (RRG) recordings back to Germany from the former USSR indicated that date. But now, it was becoming increasingly clear that this date (which had been linked to this recording for years) might be incorrect.

Further research into the archives of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra revealed that Knappertsbusch rehearsed and performed the Bruckner 4th on March 10th, 1944 and that the RRG recorded both the rehearsal and performance. That date was before the documented April 9th broadcast. Furthermore, the Philharmonic's archive shows that the Orchestra was being led by Rudolf Kressalt on September 8th.

Given this information, the « Deutsche Rundfunkarchiv » officially changed the date of the Knappertsbusch Berlin Philharmonic recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 4 to March 10, 1944. It has now been changed in this discography.

A « Fanfare » using Bruckner's Symphony No. 3 (performed by Eugene List) has been preserved but that « Fanfare » was recorded in 1937 for the « Day of German Art » broadcasts. It is also taken from the opening theme of the 1st movement. The « Fanfare » for the 1944 broadcasts is said to be taken from the 3rd movement. No copy is known to exist.

My thanks to Edwin Banta and George Zepos for bringing this to my attention.

Knappertsbusch and Bruckner

Hans Knappertsbusch has always aroused controversy over his performance of the works of Anton Bruckner, both for his often-broad tempi and his allegiance to the 1st published editions. Certainly, in terms of tempi, Karajan, Giulini, and Celibidache have long since surpassed any perceived excesses in Knappertsbusch's Bruckner performances. Those named, along with Günter Wand, exemplify what musicologist Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt describes as :

« The dominant modern approach to Bruckner interpretation which emphasizes monumental sonorities, sets steady, generally slow tempi, and presents Bruckner's forms with architectural severity rather than dynamic sweep. »

Listeners only superficially familiar with Knappertsbusch's conducting might be tempted to include him in the same category. However, Knappertsbusch truly represents the earlier generation of Bruckner interpreters who, according to Korstvedt :

« Exemplify a quite different approach to the music, one much more concerned with shaping Bruckner's music gesturally and dynamically, and with conveying not the massive coherence of Bruckner's music but its mercurial drama. »

This tradition of Bruckner performances dates to his earliest advocates, Arthur Nikisch, Hermann Levi, and Hans Richter (Knappertsbusch assisted Richter's final appearances at Bayreuth, in 1911-1912) . Other examples of this Bruckner performance tradition include Wilhelm Furtwängler (1886-1954) ; Eugen Jochum (1904-1987) ; Georg-Ludwig Jochum (1909-1970) ; Lovro von Matačić (1899-1984) ; Carl Schuricht (1880-1967) ; and Jascha Horenstein (1898-1973) . (1)

Tempo flexibility, dynamic contouring, and rhetorical gesture are part and parcel of Bruckner's music as promulgated in the 1st published editions used by Knappertsbusch, until the end of his life. John Rockwell wrote :

Granted, Knappertsbusch did not always follow the letter of the 1st printings in his realizations. His predilection for dramatic underlining however reflects the same tradition that infuses the old scores with various refinements of tempi, phrasing, and dynamics.

Knappertsbusch was neither the only nor the last conductor to use the 1st published Bruckner editions after the critical scores appeared. Frederick Charles Adler recorded the 1st, 3rd, and 9th Symphonies in the 1st editions, in 1952-1955. Volkmar Andreae performed the 1st editions of the 4th, 7th, and 8th in Vienna, after the War. Heinz Bongartz conducted the 1896 1st edition of the 5th in Leipzig, in 1946, finding it more effective than the Haas edition. Post-War concert recordings exist of Wilhelm Furtwängler performing the 4th and 8th 1st editions with the Vienna Philharmonic (1951 and 1954) . Josef Krips conducted the 1st editions of the 3rd, 4th, and 8th with the New York Philharmonic, in 1961-1964. Carl Schuricht recorded the 1st editions of the 7th and 3rd Symphonies, in 1964-1966. As recently as 1992, Jerzy Semkov conducted the 1889 Gutmann edition of the 4th, in Detroit and Pittsburgh. Leon Botstein has performed the 1896 Döblinger score of the 5th Symphony with the American Symphony, and recorded that version in London (for « Teldec ») . The current Bruckner publisher, « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , is reportedly about to undertake a new printing of the 1st editions, in order to address a rekindling of scholarly interest in the traditions and heritage that produced these scores.

Before 1990, one could scarcely find scholarly writing that discusses the old editions in other than anecdotal terms. Many critics attributed the rise in Bruckner's popularity to the publication of the critical editions. H. C. Robbins Landon claimed this was the case even in Austria, the composer's homeland. However, it was actually the early editions that established Bruckner's reputation. Alfred Orel tabulated an amazing total of 67 Bruckner performances by the Vienna Philharmonic, between 1920 and 1931 (the year of Franz Schalk's death) . From 1942 to 1953, when all of the Symphonies were available in critical editions, the Philharmonic played Bruckner 54 times. Astonishingly, only 15 of these later performances actually used the critical edition instead of an earlier publication. (3)

Landon stated :

« I have never felt a more charged atmosphere in any concert-hall than I did in the Musikverein, after Furtwängler's performance with the Philharmonic, shortly before his death, of the Bruckner 8th. » (4)

He apparently was unaware that, on this occasion, Furtwängler performed the 1892 edition, as documented on a tape of the performance maintained in the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra archive.

A common practice of Knappertsbusch's contemporaries Furtwängler and Schuricht, among others, was the incorporation of certain details from the 1st editions into performances of the later critical scores. Knappertsbusch and his contemporaries were also not above adding their own emendations to the published scores.

Hans Knappertsbusch

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hans Knappertsbusch est né le 12 mars 1888 à Elberfeld (aujourd'hui, Wuppertal) et est mort le 25 octobre 1965 à Munich.

Après des études de philosophie et de musique, il débute comme « Kapellmeister » (Maître de chapelle) au Théâtre de Mülheim, en 1910, avant d'assister Siegfried Wagner à Bayreuth, puis de gravir les échelons du monde orchestral germano-autrichien (Leipzig, Munich, puis Vienne) . Pendant la période nazie, Knappertsbusch se fait mal voir des autorités par son refus persistant de jouer le « Horst-Wessel-Lied » avant chaque concert, ainsi que cela était exigé.

Spécialiste de Richard Wagner, il dirigea au Festival de Bayreuth en 1951-1952, puis de 1954 à 1965. Il fut le dernier chef d'orchestre à y diriger gratuitement. Du fait de sa discographie pléthorique, il passe pour un grand-prêtre de « Parsifal », mais il a aussi laissé plusieurs « Ring » complets, dont celui de 1958 est souvent considéré comme le meilleur. Son « Parsifal », en 1951, après la reprise du Festival de Bayreuth, est considéré comme l'un des meilleurs enregistrements de ce « Festival scénique sacré », sans oublier d'autres aussi excellents, par exemple celui de 1962.

Hans Knappertsbusch détestait les répétitions : il préférait travailler ses partitions chez lui et attendait des musiciens et des interprètes qu'ils soient prêts le jour de la représentation. Grâce à son charisme, la grande concentration qu'il dégageait et la lisibilité de ses gestes simples et expressifs, cette approche est généralement appréciée pour les Opéras de Wagner mais la même méthode, appliquée aux Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner, a donné des résultats controversés.

Admirable beethovénien, il a laissé des enregistrements des Symphonies n° 2, n° 3 « Héroïque », n° 4, n° 5, n° 7 et n° 8, et des Concertos pour piano et orchestre n° 3, n° 4 et n° 5 « Empereur », ainsi que des Ouvertures de « Léonore » n° 3 et de « Coriolan », d'une grandeur de style et d'une puissance d'expression incomparables.

Les enregistrements de Hans Knappertsbusch sont réputés pour leur lenteur particulière, et, de fait, des chanteurs comme Astrid Varnay éprouvaient parfois de la difficulté à s'adapter à sa rythmique personnelle. Cependant, on observe une accélération assez nette du tempo d'ensemble, par exemple entre le « Parsifal » de 1951 et celui de 1962.

Hans Knappertsbusch est inhumé au cimetière de Bogenhausen, près de Munich.

L'étude de la philosophie à Bonn précède celle de la musique, entreprise en 1908, au Conservatoire de Cologne, avec comme professeurs Fritz Steinbach, Otto Lohse et Lazzaro Uzielli. Il est nommé chef d'orchestre du Théâtre de Mühlheim, dans la Ruhr (1910-1912), avant de diriger l'Opéra de sa ville natale (1913-1918). Les Opéras de Leipzig (1918) et Dessau (1919-1921) accueillent le jeune chef qui succède, en 1922, à Bruno Walter à la tête de l'Opéra de Munich. Chassé par les événements, il se réfugie en 1936 à Vienne et travaille au « Staatsoper ». Après la guerre, Munich accueille de nouveau celui qui va devenir son chef préféré, alors que Bayreuth (où il fut pourtant l'assistant de Hans Richter et Siegfried Wagner, de 1910 à 1912) attendra la ré-ouverture de 1951 pour l'inviter à diriger un « Parsifal » mémorable et à partager la direction de la Tétralogie avec Herbert von Karajan (il devait la diriger ensuite 2 fois à Paris : en 1955 et en 1957). Wagner, mais aussi Richard Strauß et Beethoven, furent admirablement servis par les lectures de Knappertsbusch, à la fois scrupuleuses et soulevées par une ample respiration.

Hans Knappertsbusch fut chassé de Munich par les Nazis, en 1936, pour avoir refusé de diriger l'Hymne « Horst-Wessel-Lied » avant chaque concert, ainsi que cela était exigé. À son retour après la guerre, à la Ire répétition avec le même Orchestre, celui de l'Opéra, le Mæstro leur annonça :

« Les 1,000 ans du régime sont accomplis, me voici de retour. »

Chef d'orchestre allemand formé dans la tradition wagnérienne de Bayreuth, dont il était l'un des derniers détenteurs en ligne directe.

Né à Elberfeld, le 12 mars 1888, il fait des études de philosophie à Bonn avant de s'orienter vers la musique : il travaille avec Fritz Steinbach et Otto Lohse au Conservatoire de Cologne (1908-1912) . Il obtient un 1er poste de chef d'orchestre à Mülheim (1910-1912) qui lui permet, chaque été, de travailler à Bayreuth comme assistant de Hans Richter et de Siegfried Wagner. Il dirige ensuite à Bochum (1912-1913) . En 1914, au cours d'un Festival Wagner, organisé aux Pays-Bas, il est le 1er chef allemand à diriger intégralement « Parsifal » , en dehors de Bayreuth. Il est ensuite « Operndirektor » à Elberfeld (1913-1918) , 1er chef à l'Opéra de Leipzig (1918-1919) et directeur général de la musique au « Friedrich Theater » de Dessau (1919-1922) . Puis, il est nommé directeur général de la musique à l'Opéra de Munich, où il succède à Bruno Walter (1922-1936) et s'impose, en quelques années, comme l'une des principales figures de l'école allemande. Malgré la notoriété qu'il avait alors acquise, il dirige assez peu à l'étranger. Démis de ses fonctions à cause de ses positions anti-nazies, il accepte quelques invitations dans les pays latins et en Grande-Bretagne (il dirige « Salomé » à Covent Garden, en 1937) . Il est ensuite l'adjoint du directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne, Erwin Kerber (1937-1945) , succédant à nouveau à Bruno Walter. Il dirige régulièrement les concerts de l'Orchestre philharmonique, mais il entre à nouveau en conflit avec le régime. Après la guerre, il mène une carrière de chef-invité, notamment à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne et au Festival de Salzbourg (1947-1950, puis 1954-1955) . En 1954, il accepte de reprendre la direction musicale de l'Opéra de Munich, mais démissionne aussitôt devant la lenteur des travaux de reconstruction. À Bayreuth, il dirige notamment une série de représentations mémorables de « Parsifal » presque sans interruption.

The German conductor Hans Knappertsbusch was born on 12 March 1888 in Elberfeld (present-day, Wuppertal) and died on 25 October 1965 in Munich. He was best-known for his performances of the music of Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Richard Strauß.

He studied philosophy at Bonn University and conducting at the Cologne Conservatory with Fritz Steinbach. For a few summers, he assisted Siegfried Wagner and Hans Richter at Bayreuth. He began his career with conducting jobs in Elberfeld (1913-1918) , Leipzig (1918-1919) and Dessau (1919-1922) . When Bruno Walter left Munich for New York, Knappertsbusch succeeded him as General Music Director of the Bavarian State Opera.

Knappertsbusch incurred the wrath of Josef Goebbels by asking a German diplomat in the Netherlands whether he was a « Muss-Nazi » (someone who was forced to join the Nazi Party for career reasons) : as a result, his Munich contract was revoked. In the late-1930's, he went to Vienna to conduct at the « Wiener Staatsoper » , thus, ignoring the Nazis' policy of not allowing German artists to work in Austria. At the same time, he became one of the emerging artists of the Salzburg Festival. Knappertsbusch continued to appear in Vienna and Salzburg during the German occupation of Austria.

When World War II ended, Knappertsbusch returned to Munich, but continued to guest conduct in Vienna, as well as to make appearances at the Bayreuth Festival. He was one of the favourite conductors of the « Wiener Philharmoniker », leading the Orchestra in Vienna, Salzburg and on tour abroad although, generally, he rarely toured outside the German-speaking world. He disliked long rehearsals, and was sometimes accused of laziness.

Knappertsbusch died in Munich, in 1965. Many of his recordings have been re-released on CD. His 1951 and 1962 recordings of « Parsifal » are generally considered definitive of that work.

Hans Knappertsbusch (1888-1965) is rightly viewed as one of the grand old Masters among Bruckner conductors. Born in Elberfeld, his early career was spent in provincial German Opera Houses (Mulheim, Bochum, Elberfeld, and Dessau) . His early interest in Richard Wagner manifested itself in a dissertation on the role of Kundry in « Parsifal » ; this was not however accepted toward a degree. In 1911-1912, he assisted at Bayreuth and met the venerable Hans Richter. Knappertsbusch's 1st major post came in 1922, succeeding Bruno Walter as « Generalmusikdirektor » in Munich. In 1925, he began his recording career with Franz-Josef Haydn's « Oxford » Symphony, an acoustic recording with the Berlin « Staatskapelle » for the German « Grammophon » Company.

Knappertsbusch's career appeared to be blossoming ; he began to appear frequently in Berlin and Vienna, in addition to his Munich engagements. However, he had not counted upon the animosity of Adolf Hitler. On January 1, 1936, Knappertsbusch was summarily pensioned-off and forbidden to work anywhere in Bavaria. Hitler installed his hand-picked successor, Clemens Krauß, in Munich. Knappertsbusch then moved to the Vienna State Opera, where he was temporarily able to put the Munich unpleasantness behind him. After the « Anschluß » , in 1938, he remarked :

« Now, they've reconquered me. » (I)

The Vienna Philharmonic players committee managed to obtain permission for Knappertsbusch to again perform in Germany, but the Munich ban remained. Knappertsbusch also became a regular guest with the Berlin Philharmonic, where Wilhelm Furtwängler had resigned as music-director, following his own clash with the Nazis.

Michaël Kater attempted to portray Knappertsbusch as one who « no doubt wanted to be a good National-Socialist, if only the rat-pack would let him » . Typical of Kater's « evidence » is Knappertsbusch's outrage over some intemperate remarks by Thomas Mann concerning Wagner. It seems not to have crossed Kater's mind that Knappertsbusch might have disagreed with Mann on musical, rather than political, grounds. Kater does admit that Knappertsbusch never joined the Party, but explains his black-listing from work in Munich by citing the less than compelling reasons of administrative neglect and acceptance of outside engagements. (2)

Once the Nazi regime collapsed, Knappertsbusch made his belated return to the Munich podium on August 17, 1945, opening the concert with Felix Mendelssohn's « Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage » .

However, like Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch was then forbidden from conducting for 2 years until cleared of allegations of collaboration. Following his reappearance in 1947, Knappertsbusch again became an essential part of the Austrian and German musical scene, eventually conducting the Vienna Philharmonic over 200 times and the Berlin Philharmonic more than 180. Knappertsbusch also conducted many of the newly formed German Radio Orchestras, such as the « NDR » Orchestra, in Hamburg ; the « WDR » Orchestra, in Cologne ; and the Hessian Radio Orchestra, in Frankfurt. In addition to renewing his relationship with Munich's Opera and concert life (including the State Opera, Bavarian State Orchestra, and Munich Philharmonic) , Knappertsbusch became a regular at the Bayreuth and Salzburg Festivals. His freelance status also promoted the occasional outing with groups such as the Bremer Philharmonic and « Dresden Staatskapelle » .

Knappertsbusch recorded for the British « Decca » Company following the War, first with l' « Orchestre de la Suisse Romande » , later with the Vienna Philharmonic. After « Decca » dropped him, in favor of the up-and-coming Georg Solti, Knappertsbusch made several records in Munich for the American « Westminster » firm (1961-1963) . His final recording was a massive reading of Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony, made with the Munich Philharmonic, in January 1963.

He bade farewell to Munich with « Fidelio » on July 6, 1964, and aptly led « Parsifal » in his final appearance, given at Bayreuth, on August 13. Knappertsbusch died in Munich, on October 25, 1965.

Born on March 12, 1888, in Elberfeld, Hans Knappertsbusch had studied philosophy at the University of Bonn. From 1909 through 1912, the young Knappertsbusch studied with Fritz Steinbach and Otto Lohse at the Cologne Conservatory. His graduation thesis was on the character of Kundry in « Parsifal » . He was an assistant at the Bayreuth Festivals and came into contact with Hans Richter who had been in charge of the Festivals, since 1876, and was chosen by the Wagners to take-over after his death. This early association with the music of Wagner left a profound impression on the aspiring conductor. This early association with Bayreuth was directly responsible for the 50 year relationship Knappertsbusch had with the Festival. Knappertsbusch's conducting career began with his appointment to the post at Muhlheim-on-Ruhr, in 1910. He became the director of the Oberfeld Opera, in 1913. In 1914, he directed a Wagner Festival in Holland. He was engaged to conduct at the Leipzig State Theatre, in 1918, and, in 1919, he went to Dessau. Before long, he had established himself as one of the leading conductors of his generation. He was called to lead the Munich Opera, in 1922, as successor to Bruno Walter where he remained until 1936. His debut was with a performance of « Tristan und Isolde » . Knappertsbusch went on to become a life-long fixture in Munich's musical life and was the chief conductor of the Bavarian State Opera. In 1936, he was dismissed from his Munich post by the Nazi authorities and Vienna became the centre of his activities through the War years, though he continued to share conducting at the Salzburg Festival with Karl Böhm until 1942, when Clemens Krauß took-over. From 1938 on, he appeared at the Vienna State Opera and the Salzburg Festivals. On 29 August 1929, that he was 1st engaged to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic in a concert at the Salzburg Festival, this marked the beginning of an association that was to last 35 years, and was one of the happiest in that illustrious Orchestra's history. « Kna », as he was affectionately known by players and audiences shared duties in Salzburg and Vienna with the likes of Furtwängler, Toscanini and Walter. He had a long relationship with the Vienna Philharmonic where he was regarded as the foremost conductor of Wagner, as well as Bruckner, Beethoven and Strauß during the last decades of his life. After WWII, Knappertsbusch returned to Bayreuth where he was director of the Festival, from 1951 until 1956. He was at the helm of the Bavarian Opera, from 1954 until his death in Munich on October 26, 1965. When the strict terms of Wagner's will made it possible to produce « Parsifal » on stages, outside of Bayreuth, Hans Knappertsbusch received the honour of being the 1st German conductor to perform it on a stage outside of Germany. His repertoire was a wide one running the gamut from the lesser-known Operatic works, the Symphonies and even lighter works (the « Nutcracker » Suite was one of his favorites) . He was a guiding force in rebuilding Bayreuth after WWII with the composers grandson, Wieland Wagner. He was known for the slow broad sound he obtain from many Orchestras through his almost mystical conducting style. Commentator Erich Deiber once gave this exaggerated description of the Mæstro's method of conducting :

« Knappertsbusch is the only conductor who can transform a pianissimo into a fortissimo by moving his cuff links. »

« Kna » once said :

« I am neither gymnast or breast stroke swimmer, oarsman nor carpet beater. I endeavour to be a conductor. »

As well as a profound knowledge and love of music, the qualities that endeared Knappertsbusch was his dry wit, respect for his players, and a reluctance to rehearse. His aversion to rehearsing was born not out of laziness or a casual approach to the music but out of view that the players he worked with knew the tradition in which he himself was nurtured, and also a belief that inspiration of the moment was half the joy of making music. During a performance, he never lost site of the the musical architecture. Knappertsbusch was a firm believer in musical tradition. He only worked with Orchestras he knew-well and almost always avoided the grind of conducting on the international circuit. He has been called a Master of improvisation who could produce unexpected and overwhelming moments during his readings. His spontaneity at live concerts made him a difficult artist to capture in the recording studio. In « Ring Resounding » , « Decca » producer John Culshaw wrote :

« The truth was that Knappertsbusch took very badly to recording conditions, and, no matter what we did, the genius which he so certainly revealed in the theatre refused to come alive in studio conditions. He never complained. He told the funniest obscene stories I have ever heard. Everybody loved him. But the essence of Knappertsbusch simply refused to show itself. He needed the smell of grease paint, and the waft of air from backstage. We tried to drag him, kicking and screaming, into the 20th Century of the gramophone record, the theatre of the listener-at-home who hears without any visual aid and without the community of the theatre. It was an alien world for him. He was a 19th Century professional, and, to the end of his life, the gramophone was a new-fangled toy. »

During his distinguished career, he has been made a Chevalier of the French legion of Honour and an Honorary Citizen of Bayreuth and Munich. His famed LP recordings of the 1950's and early 1960's on « Decca - London », « Westminster » and « Philips » are highly-treasured.

Hans Knappertsbusch was born into a prosperous family whose wealth was gained from manufacturing. While still at school, he conducted various Orchestras, but, as a result of paternal opposition to a career in music, he studied philosophy at Bonn University. Nonetheless, he also studied music at the Cologne Conservatory, where his teachers included Fritz Steinbach, one of the foremost interpreters of the music of Johannes Brahms. During 1910, Knappertsbusch worked as an unpaid assistant to Siegfried Wagner and Hans Richter at the Bayreuth Festival, and, in the same year, he accepted a permanent conducting position at the Opera House at Muhlheim, staying there until 1912 when he moved to a similar position at Bochum. He returned to his home-town, Elbersfeld, in 1913, as permanent conductor at the local Opera House, and also led one of the 1st productions of Wagner's « Parsifal » to be given outside Germany, in Holland.

Throughout World War I, Knappertsbusch stayed at Elbersfeld and, in 1918, was appointed 1st conductor at the « Leipzig Stadttheater ». The following year, he moved to a similar position at Dessau, where he was promoted to chief conductor in 1920, becoming one of the youngest conductors to hold such a position in Germany, at this time. 2 years later, he made his debut in Munich, conducting orchestral concerts, and was invited to succeed Bruno Walter as chief conductor at the Bavarian State Opera where he made his debut with Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde », in October 1922. He also appeared at the « Zoppot » Opera Festival, known as the Bayreuth of the North. Knappertsbusch made another successful debut in Vienna with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, during the following year, and 1st conducted the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1929, at the Salzburg Festival. Here, he enjoyed great success and was invited to return for the Festival the following year, also appearing in the Vienna Philharmonic's subscription series for the 1st time, in 1934, alongside conductors of the calibre of Furtwängler, Toscanini and Walter.

Following the assumption of power in Germany by the National Socialist Party, and his subsequent refusal to join it, Knappertsbusch was forced to resign from his position at the Opera in Munich, in 1936. He moved to Vienna where he was active at the State Opera and the Salzburg Festival, as well as with the Vienna Philharmonic ; and, at the invitation of Sir Thomas Beecham, he made his debut at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1937, conducting Richard Strauss's « Salome ». During World War II, Knappertsbusch remained in Vienna, but also broadcast and recorded with German Orchestras such as the Berlin Philharmonic. He conducted the last performance at the Vienna State Opera prior to its destruction by bombing : Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » (30 June 1944) .

In 1945, Knappertsbusch returned to Munich. But, after giving several orchestral concerts, he was banned from conducting by the Allied forces. However, he was cleared of collaboration with the Nazis in 1947 and, still in Munich, re-commenced his activities, leading the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra in the celebrations of the 50th anniversary of Brahms's death. He participated at the Salzburg Festival each year, between 1949 and 1955, and, in 1951, he returned to the Bayreuth Festival to conduct Wieland Wagner's legendary production of « Parsifal » ; thereafter, he appeared at Bayreuth annually, except for 1 year, up to 1964, being a noted exponent of the « Ring » cycle, there. Knappertsbusch took-up his old post of chief conductor at the Bavarian State Opera, once again in 1954, retaining this until his death, and returned to the Vienna State Opera to conduct « Der Rosenkavalier » , as one of the productions given to mark the re-opening of the Theatre, in the autumn of 1955. A rare appearance outside Austria and Germany occurred in 1956 when he conducted « Tristan und Isolde » with Astrid Varnay at the Paris Opera. Having suffered a bad fall in 1964, from which he never fully recovered, he died in 1965.

Hans Knappertsbusch was one of the most renowned and beloved conductors of the German Romantic repertoire in the middle of the 20th Century. Although he grew-up playing and loving music, his parents objected to the notion of a musical career. Thus, Knappertsbusch studied philosophy at Bonn University. In 1908, however, he entered the Cologne Conservatory and took conducting courses with Fritz Steinbach.

Knappertsbusch began his career as a staff conductor at the Mülheim-Ruhr Theatre (1910-1912) and then as Opera director in his home-town of Elberfeld. Equally important to his development were his forays into the temple of Wagnerism. He spent several summers as an assistant to director Siegfried Wagner and conductor Hans Richter at the Bayreuth Festival and took part in the Netherlands Wagner Festivals, in 1913 and 1914. After the end of World War I, Knappertsbusch worked in Dessau and Leipzig and, in 1922, he was asked to succeed Bruno Walter as music-director of the Munich Opera.

Knappertsbusch's personality was easy-going ; he was notably free of the restlessness and undue ambition that often attended a rising career such as his. He was content mainly to stay in Munich, with the result that he never became as well-known as many of his colleagues. In any case, Munich fully appreciated Knappertsbusch's talents, and he was named conductor for life. However, he refused several demands made by the Nazis and was fired from his lifetime post, in 1936. He conducted a memorable « Salome » in Covent Garden, in 1936 and 1937, and made some guest appearances elsewhere in Germany, but was content to maintain a low-profile during the Nazi regime. He left Germany after the Munich debacle, settling in Vienna where he frequently conducted the Philharmonic and the Vienna State Opera. Knappertsbusch's career was again affected by the Nazis when Germany took-over Austria, in 1938, but he was mostly able to steer clear of trouble.

Knappertsbusch gained a reputation for broad, magisterial performances of Anton Bruckner and, more and more, seemed emerge as the representative of the traditional style of unhurried Wagner performances. He was famous for disliking rehearsals, often cutting them short ; his orchestral players maintained that this was not the result of laziness, but of complete security in his interpretation and trust of the players. His performances were, therefore, not rigidly pre-conceived but, instead, had a remarkable freshness and spontaneity.

When the Bayreuth Festival re-opened in 1951, Knappertsbusch worked closely with Wieland Wagner on orchestral matters (though the conductor was known to dislike the director's spare, revolutionary stage productions) . Perhaps, Knappertsbusch's most notable recording is his stereo account of Wagner's « Parsifal » from the Bayreuth stage.

Knappertsbusch and Wagner

The name of Hans Knappertsbusch awakens a connotation with Bayreuth as no other does. During a long musical life, Knappertsbusch has explored the works of the great Classical composers more profoundly than most but as he says himself, it is to Wagner's music-dramas that he devotes « his most and his deepest » . This is scarcely surprising. Knappertsbusch's association with Bayreuth began in the period 1909-1912 when, as a student of musicology - his thesis was written on the character of Kundry in « Parsifal » . He became assistant to that most illustrious of Wagner conductors, Hans Richter. Richter, under Wagner's personal supervision, had conducted the very 1st Bayreuth Festival (1876) and, by the time Knappertsbusch appeared, he was uniquely qualified to transmit to some younger man an authentic view of the Master. It was Knappertsbusch who earned the right to become custodian of this developing tradition. As much was recognised when, in 1914, Knappertsbusch was entrusted with the supervision of the Wagner Festival, in Holland. From here, after appointments at Leipzig and Dessau, Knappertsbusch succeeded Bruno Walter as conductor of the Munich Opera, where he launched a life-time's work with that company by a performance of « Tristan und Isolde » , on October 5, 1922. Yet, his spiritual home was Bayreuth. Here, as elsewhere, he proved Wagner's warmest advocate and most perceptive interpreter. His conducting at Bayreuth constitutes the kind of respect for tradition which only those who have shared in its creation fully comprehend. Wieland Wagner, struggled to find words of praise sufficiently strong to express his appreciation of one Knappertsbusch performance, was helped by a significant but wholly typical suggestion :

« I think that Richter would have been quite pleased, don't you ? » , said Knappertsbusch.

A face noble and Northern, austere but harboring perhaps a chink of humor, a face that looked as if a sculptor had just finished it, leaving a loose ringlet of hair to fall against the tall forehead met by high cheekbone. Yes, a face that suggested a military tunic belonged just below it rather than the perennial bow tie and, in rehearsal pictures at least (not that he liked to rehearse that much) , a prominent pair of suspenders. But while Knappertsbusch, or « Kna » as he was called in the trade, could growl like the most stentorian of parade ground sergeants (and his vocabulary of scarcely printable epithets wasn't paltry either) , such behavior was to a large extent a façade. « Kna » spoke roughly, the great bass baritone Hans Hotter remembers, but with a twinkle :

« He was bluntly direct, but scrupulously fair. »

And beneath the rather alarming exterior, performers in his charge found an unsuspected gentleness. Courtly, cussing Knappertsbusch's dry sense of humor left a trail of anecdotes that follows him still in assorted memoirs. One records too that his obstinate integrity got him in hot water with the Nazis and out of a job as music-director of the Bavarian State Opera, a post in which he succeeded Bruno Walter in the early 1920's. So, he took his music off to Vienna, performances reflecting both his craggy exterior and the rather soft center inside.

Often with a « Kna » performance, the ear is taken along a hard-surfaced musical line, a sort of orchestral « pan forte », but likely as not it's modulated by emotional warmth and a friendliness of spirit. Then, there's his tendency to keep the music alert with an extra « sforzando » or 2. His performances were full of wonderful little passing gestures of color or dynamics that might be missed if one wasn't paying attention. He was, of course, never preaching an orchestral style. As Wieland Wagner, the great « enfant terrible » of post-War Bayreuth put it

: « “ Kna ” didn't do, he just was. »

There are no great Operatic tempo systems « à la Furtwängler », although « Kna » would, occasionally, set a moment on the expressive pedestal of a considerable « ritenuto » .

A good example occurs in his Vienna Philharmonic recording of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony from the 1950's. While Furtwängler, in Stuttgart, ranges well ,up and down the metronome, to convey his vision of such diverse Brucknerian elements as the soulful-pastoral horn call at the outset, the rather combative octaves at letters A and D, the somewhat leisurely of the theme at B which is said to refer to chickadees, then, the poetical downward scale pointing toward the development at G - you can find him at 60, 76, 60, 88 and even 48 beats to the changeable minute - Knappertsbusch transacts all this expressive business between half = 63 and 72, except that he permits a wispy variation on that downward scale to be frozen at a lovely and very low-lying 40 (!) to the minute, pathos-bright. This is bars 209-217, highlighting flute and clarinet and to be played, Bruckner notes, calmly.

Which brings us to an anecdote. Wilhelm Furtwängler and the beret-sporting Ludwig Suthaus, the Tristan of their 1952 studio recording with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, were having a conversation about breathing in slow tempos, and Furtwängler is alleged to have said, with his own twinkle under bushy eyebrow :

« Go and try singing this under Knappertsbusch in Munich (post-War, that is) , he's even slower than I am. » .

But « Kna » 's Wagner timings can now and again be shorter - remember, too, that a longer timing of a performance by any rubato-savvy conductor might reflect the cooking-up of several creeping passages with almost as many that are relatively swift. « Kna » 's tempos for « Tristan und Isolde » while adhering quite carefully to Richard Wagner's numerous calls for acceleration and retardation do average a little slower than those in what for want of a better term we might call normal performances, but such mathematical comparisons mean nothing in the face of the urgency of his 1950 Munich « Tristan » . Here, from the start, is the agony and the warmth of this ever-fascinating tale, culminating in a « My God, What Have We Done ? » welling-out of the « Prinz Regenten » pit as Act I stumbles to its final questioning note in a splintering euphony, the potion drunk, the fate of the lovers sealed. This is a fluid, conversational, organic « Tristan » , practical and domestic rather than lofty and stylized in the Furtwängler mode, human rather than spiritual, muscular yes but without the streaming Furtwänglerian weight that remains. In that London studio, under the perfectionist eye of the producer Walter Legge forever statuesque, a mischievous footnote :

« I sat near Legge at dinner in Zürich once. In 2 words : he held court. But onward ! »

Dangerous, sinuous and rapturous is Knappertsbusch's unfolding of the 2nd Act and we can only thank this slow conductor for zipping through the optional pages leading to the meat of the lovers' great duet, pages these which are an integral part of the composer's concept to be sure but can if not handled succinctly wear out singers and listeners alike.

Now, the roll call of Knappertsbusch's discography. Almost without exception, the composers he attended to were main line Austro-Germanic and substantial : Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Richard Strauß, Wagner. But there is a « William Tell » Overture, from 1928, with a delightful hunting horn atmosphere in that sizzling Finale. And the « Nutcracker » Suite, a 1950's recording out of Vienna, why this is a gem from 1st to last. Note an Overture with short, mincing steps, full of anticipation, a naughty boy skip, and a deliciously nonchalant Chinese Dance. The summum is a « Waltz of the Flowers » in which the harp's preamble is in its windup measures as crisp as Knappertsbusch's entrance into the Orchestra pit, which usually took the form of giving the downbeat a surprising several seconds before welcoming applause had fully receded. The efficient ripple here is a dead pan foil to an oom-pah-pah entering with ravishing lightness and an accent on the 2nd syllable so keenly Viennese.

And the list of Knappertsbusch's « lollipops » would be incomplete without mention of the diffident cello and demure winds at the opening of Weber's « Invitation to the Dance » , an event peopled by chattering woodwind chaperones while half-lunging violins beg for recognition.

On now to Beethoven. The Knappertsbusch listener who associates this conductor primarily with, say, the 1951 Bayreuth « Parsifal » in which tempos can lie embedded in a sort of lirico-ethereo cement, well, that listener might be surprised to encounter the lightness, charm and a considerable ration of briskness in his Beethoven's « Pastoral » Symphony with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » . This could be Clemens Krauß or Franz Schalk at the helm, old style Viennese as can be. The rhythm maybe just a wee bit loose. The glory, of course, is in the details. 1st movement, a confiding « poco diminuendo » (not in the score) just after the bar 4 « fermata » sets the tone of tenderness. This movement runs in the fast pack, averaging pretty near a folksy-feisty 60 beats to the minute. Then melt in the « Scene by the Brook » to a series of Knappertsbuschian felicities : at bar 13, the tremble of vibrant and generous tone in a benedictory moment for the 1st violins (marked « dolce » by Beethoven) with the woodwinds and horns having melted away to give them a brief spotlight pastorale ; then, in bar 28, as the music moves ardently toward the movement's 2nd key, a subtle and lovely « diminuendo » (not in the score) at the top of an upward « arpeggio » in those busy 1st violins. Such unnotated « diminuendi » are intimacy enhancers, great little boons to love scenes such as this. And how rarely conductors take the risk. Of the scores of conductors, I've encountered in the « Pastoral » only Knappertsbusch and Erich Kleiber have skirted the dynamic straight and narrow on that enchanting page containing bar 28.

About the picnic movement of the « Pastoral » , Knappertsbusch initiates at Beethoven's marking, dotted half = 108, and the composer's « presto » before the nastily intruding storm is absolutely taken at its word and-then-some. The storm itself, running considerably faster than the composer's marking, extremely big and urgent, is obviously modeled on a Wagnerian tempest, the Wagnerian tempest Beethoven predicted. Yes, I will take Hans Knappertsbusch and Leopold Stokowski to the desert island in this music. The tension is so great that, in what you might call Beethoven's aftershocks passage, « Kna » conjures a kind of sigh or moan midway at bar 141, on the syncopation-like « diminuendo » of violins and violas. And then, as if to prove to followers of received wisdom that this is the familiar slow Knappertsbusch after all, he takes the hummy roll of melody in the Thanksgiving movement at 50 rather than the composer's 60 beats to the post-storm minute.

The time-taking, « Kna » returns in a forceful Beethoven 5th, live from Berlin in 1956. The opening movement is passionate, endangered, sculpted with a metallic « grandeur » and pathos, the three-dots-and-a-dash taking in their instrumental exchanges alternate voices of pleading and compassion. An almost laughably vigorous delivery of the lower-strings' churning counterpoint in the 3rd movement trio, sounding a good notch above Beethoven's « forte », brings a smile.

Then, the best of all. In the last phase of the snaking transition to the grand Finale, that sinuous limbo, just after bar 350, « Kna » takes Beethoven's « sempre pianissimo » of finger-tapping timpani and meandering violins and lowers it to his own personal « ppp », as if to squeeze the music through some exquisite needle of near-silence, the last kilometer of a tunnel of expectancy, an end of the endurance so to speak, before the parade ground sunshine of the big bang « allegro » to come. Or, perhaps, he just liked the sound of that diminuendo. At all events, the effect is rather like Willem Mengelberg taking a significant breath before launching into the climax of the « Lohengrin » prelude from an old « Columbia » 78 rpm.

Knappertsbusch's « Eroica » : interesting that, in 2 broadcast performances (Munich 1950 and Bremen 1951) , he sets forth even more slowly than late studio recording of Otto Klemperer, staying mostly in this ball-park of high-spaciousness but finding with the exultancies of the recapitulation a good excuse to ease the tempo significantly while not jarringly upward. Impulse or design ? Probably, the latter. Even in the case of a conductor who felt strongly that rehearsing with its tendency toward boring the players, and himself of course, should be held to a minimum.

A more creative interpretation is seen in a 1958 Schubert « Unfinished » Symphony broadcast with the Orchestra of the Munich Opera. It comes-out from nowhere, rather in the manner of the 3rd act of « Der Meistersinger » , other music in these players' fingers and souls. Under wraps, this « Unfinished » proceeds, veiled, guarded, exceedingly poetical-Romantic. And then, thanks to broad pacing and intensity with shiny shafts of trademark (Knappertsbuschian orchestral artillery) , the development builds to a great lament. But what's most interesting about this performance is that by emphasizing the « moderato » in the posted « allegro moderato » of Schubert's 1st movement, and the « con moto » of the composer's « andante con moto » in the 2nd, Knappertsbusch with a slower than usual 1st movement and a faster than usual 2nd movement re-invents this sawed-off while hugely viable symphony as a virtual « introduction and allegro » , or, in emotional terms, tragedy and release, with one big weight removed. No chance of near-twin movements running together. Special delight : the hummily curving line of « Kna » 's lovingly « melodioso » phrasing, at the start of movement 2. Unique !

And for more in the « sui generis » department : a step back to 1925 and an early electrical recording of Haydn's 92nd Symphony in which a slightly cloying but engaging introduction gives way to an « allegro spiritoso » so urgently on point in its phrasing as to evoke a hyper-ventilating lover. Pacing is fast here but not as fast as « Kna »'s inflection suggests. After this exhibition, the succeeding « adagio » unfolds very slowly, con amore, almost a Mendelssohnian nocturne.

Next of my pile of Knappertsbuschiana is a Bach 3rd Suite with the Vienna Philharmonic players dating from the month the Allies forces were hitting the Normandy beaches. Hounded-out of Munich by the Nazis, in 1936, « Kna » had retreated to the Sympho-Operatic heaven of the « Ringstraße » and environs where he could conduct in relative peace. Rather big-band Bach, of course, done with the jolly determination. The famous air is « andante vibratissimo », and the « bourrée » unusually broad, sly and perky, becoming very festive.

Now, I'm listening to a 1952 Robert Schumann 4th Symphony with the Munich Philharmonic. « Kna »'s broad and jaunty way with the Finale echoes his festive treatment of the Finale of Beethoven's 5th, and thinking about this connection one can't help wondering if Schumann wasn't using Beethoven as a model here : sinuous transition, brassy Finale, great zebras of churning notes « à la Leonore » No. 3 Overture toward Symphony's end.

More fast Knappertsbusch tempos to report, the Finale for instance of a Mozart « Jupiter » Symphony, live from Vienna in 1941. His 1929 studio recording of Mozart's 39th Symphony with the « Berlin Staatskapelle » opens with an introduction absolutely majestic while almost falling over itself, full to the brim with sweetly bounding flourishes. And the 2nd movement, nominally an « andante » : « Kna »'s courtly and decidedly up-tempo performance is so refreshing as to suggest a dance out of pride and prejudice.

And now, we come to Brahms, perhaps Knappertsbusch's greatest glory as much or more than his famous erector sets of Wagner where knee-jerk snailish tempos (he wasn't always slow in this canon) can lose their rationale. Knappertsbusch shared with Brahms a personality blended with grit and warmth, a taste for big-bone musical structures and no-nonsense behavior, so they were truly made for each other and it often shows. Although truth to say the 1st Knappertsbusch Brahms 1st pulled-off the shelf, a 4th Symphony from Cologne 1953, claims a rather plain 1st movement. This is not Brahms in the Oskar Fried lane, the tempo struck is characteristically a little broad and frequently maintained. « Kna » has run around the left or right end of those complex and highly-dramatical interpretations that can be wonderfully interesting and moving.

There's a haunting moment at bar 258, the quiet tidal recapitulation about to begin and « Kna » pauses just that extra Max Fiedlerish amount to make the actual sounding of the recapitulation when it does come in all the juicier. And then, more moments. With the warm-throated recapitulation of the 2nd movement's ever flow 2nd theme, « Kna » gruffly digs this music out of its hiding place, stern but mellow underneath ; and when this music takes on greater weight in the score he gathers it into an Elgarian peroration worthy of « Nimrod » . « Kna » is warming to his task, complexity is growing. In the great « passacaglia » , he's a naughty boy at bar 9, the timpani's trill into a « staccato » 8th punctuated with a snappish unscored « sforzando » on said 8th, bang ! And then, we know we're in for an interesting ride, fevered in fact, sustained and humming hairpins in variation 10 very trembly indeed, the flute in No.

12 brisk (!) but plaintive, the « espressivo » dialogs in 13 woebegone plus, the « legato arpeggios » of sub-brass strings in 14 breast-stroking very slowly upstream, undulous orchestral serfs.

Brahms' 3rd Symphony was, I'm told, Knappertsbusch's special favourite, he wanted the slow movement played at his funeral. To say that his Stuttgart Radio broadcast of the 3rd from late 1963 is a remarkable piece of work is, I think, an understatement, because here is music translated into the journey of a soul. The protagonist in that Wuerttemberg studio may have been aware that his earthly days were numbered, and like the proverbial drowning man reviewing his life and hopefully adjusting as-best-he-can to its alternative - only it's done here in slow motion ! Knappertsbusch conjures his own shall-we-call-it a « Liebsted » ? The heroic grip of the opening of Brahms' 3rd came naturally to such a muscular and unhurried conductor as Knappertsbusch, so the epic strength of its jumbo lift-off comes as no surprise. But there's more, a floating in great waves of resignation, the music clothed in a pathos very close to despair. All is in order, though, and when the recapitulation arrives on the crest of Brahms' elaborate taxi toward the tonic it's as if the Gates of Heaven had truly opened, the Orchestra is so comforting and golden while necessarily stark.

There are several other Knappertsbusch Brahms 3rd's out there, and comparisons (we're looking closely, here, at the 1st movement) are interesting. At the Salzburg Festival in 1955, an 8 years younger « Kna » had the same blueprint of this music in mind but his mind was in a different place, so this performance while strong and scrappy and sometimes warm as fudge right out of the oven is more a performance than the confession of 1963. It is sweeter and more innocent because the man on the podium is not a condemned man ! And different circumstances, in 1942, when « Kna » recorded Brahms' 3rd in Berlin for « Electrola » , having presumably taken a rumbling train up from Vienna, past Brno, Prague, Dresden, the great old places, along the innocent Elbe. And you know what, practical happy old « Kna » had decided to rise above all this and in that Berlin recording session he launched into a 3rd that's more pastoral « Eroica » , the mellowest of the lot, far from the maddening War.

This is the « Kna » who could find a place for the « Der Meistersinger » 's apprentices, well, a reminder thereof in his 50's, Paris recording of Strauß's « Don Juan » , not long after the great oboe scene. And that reminds me : one day in Paris, I was innocently walking along « Avenue Niel » , in the 17th « arrondissement » and who should be strolling along this leafy boulevard in the other direction, at an implacable « tempo moderato » causing this pedestrian to weigh the consequences of being run down, but the great « Kna » himself. He was as natty as ever in his Churchillian bow tie and seemed with his tall superstructure as monumental a figure as an old Cunard liner. He was probably thinking of Brahms. Or, how he almost became a philosophy professor. Or, was it simply Paris ? About this time in Munich, he prepared a notable production of that most un-Germanic of Operas, Gustave Charpentier's « Louise » , a love letter to the city of « Gauloises » , onion tarts and song-writers' « Aprils » .

Hans Knappertsbusch : The Keeper of the Seal

(By David Patmore.)

Influences and Style

The early influences of Fritz Steinbach and Hans Richter, 2 of the most pre-eminent conductors in the period before the 1st World War, must have been very strong upon Hans Knappertsbusch. Perhaps, even more profound would have been contact (through Richter) with the conducting style preferred by Wagner himself and outlined in his slim pamphlet « On Conducting ». In this, Wagner railed against metronomic conducting (identifying this with the lighter music of Mendelssohn) and, instead, urged the adoption of a flexible style, in which the main criterion was to be the beauty of the moment : « The law of beauty is the sole measure of what is possible. » Wagner strongly urged a spontaneous approach to the performance of his music.

« Kna », as Knappertsbusch was often affectionately known, certainly followed this lead, believing firmly in the inspiration of the moment. As the historian of the Vienna Philharmonic, Otto Straßer, has pointed-out, he believed that the doctrine contained within Wagner's idea of tempo modification was central to every performance. « Kna » was thus likely to adjust tempi if he felt that the results sounded particularly beautiful, and this imparted a pronounced individuality to his interpretation of a work. This stylistic approach stands centrally within Wagner's own preferred conducting method. An extension of this conducting style is the characteristic of positively seeking spontaneity of expression. Thus, throughout his life, « Kna » would continually surprise audiences with impromptu discoveries within even well-known scores. This revelation of previously obscured detail was still set within a careful moulding of the overall architecture of the piece.

Technically, Knappertsbusch seems to have been highly-undemonstrative as a conductor. Comparison with Richard Strauß was often made. At his debut, in 1923, with the Vienna Symphony, his restrained style of conducting was noted and favourably commented upon. As the commentator Erich Deiber noted laconically :

« Knappertsbusch is the only conductor who can transform a pianissimo into a fortissimo by moving his cufflinks. »

(Another conductor of the same vintage but from an extremely different stylistic background, Fritz Reiner, also possessed a very disciplined and small-scale baton technique. And also, like Knappertsbusch, he was both a friend of Richard Strauß and a fine interpreter of his music.)

With this lack of rostrum showmanship went a high-degree of platform modesty. Contemporaries noted that « Kna » rarely allowed himself and his Orchestra more than 2 curtain calls.

Knappertsbusch's reliance on feelings and musical instinct, drawn from the Wagnerian interpretative æsthetic and manifesting itself in the search for spontaneous expression and tempo modification, naturally led to a positive dislike of rehearsals as an inhibiting influence. The influence of many years of working within the old German Operatic system can also be observed in this trait, when conductors were frequently expected to take command of often complex works without rehearsal. To survive in such circumstances was an acid test of ability as a conductor. But success bred tremendous confidence, and this was immediately noticed when « Kna » took the stand, for instance, when he made his debut in Vienna. It also gave rise to numerous anecdotes, typical of which is the following quoted in Roger Vaughan's biography of Herbert von Karajan :

« One time, he was going over Tchaïkovsky's 5th with the Vienna Philharmonic. He came to the 2nd movement, with the horn solo, and said :“ Let's start.” He did a few bars, stopped, and said :“ See you his evening. You know the piece, I know the hall.” The solo horn protested :“ I am new, I have never played this piece in concert.” Knappertsbusch said :“ It is beautiful music - you will love it.” »

It would be wrong however to think of Knappertsbusch as lax in performance. In his obituary of « Kna » written for « Opera » magazine, Hans Hotter tells the story of how, having inadvertently omitted a crucial sung sentence in a certain Opera, at subsequent performances, he noticed that :

« “ Kna ’ had risen from his stool to his full height, turned his baton upside down and was shaking the thick end of it at me with a threatening and meaningful gesture. It would not have needed much more to make me forget my part again ! »

The same scene was re-enacted in a series of performances of this Opera throughout the following years.

Given his particular artistic personality, it is hardly surprising that Knappertsbusch was uncomfortable with recording - an æsthetic based on spontaneity and variation stands in complete opposition to one based on exact repetition both in recording and in reproduction. Knappertsbusch's reputation from the late-1960's was dealt a severe blow (certainly, unintentionally) by John Culshaw's comments about his dislike of rehearsal and recording in « Ring Resounding » , his account of the recording of the « Decca Ring » . Culshaw clearly had great admiration for Knappertsbusch, particularly in the theatre, but the descriptions of him recording for instance the 1st act of « Die Walküre » with Svanholm and Flagstad, portrayed a conductor who was obviously very uncomfortable with the fundamental necessity of recording : exact repetition on every dimension as required. Nothing could be more unspontaneous and inimical to variation. In order to produce records to his particular standards, Culshaw needed conductors who could exact highly-accurate readings from Orchestras, time after time, and continuously at performance levels of intensity. Musicians such as Georg Solti, coming from a completely different background, that of the Liszt Academy in Budapest where the emphasis was upon technical exactitude and discipline, were at home with this process. « Kna » was not.

Another comparison which does « Kna » less than justice is with Wilhelm Furtwängler. Frequent parallels have been drawn between the 2 conductors, principally because they shared a similar stylistic approach, characterised by spontaneity and tempo modification. However, Furtwängler's performances tend to be much more highly-strung, almost neurotic, than Knappertsbusch's. The latter rely on a broad underpinning of orchestral mass, and move at a different pace and with a different tone and atmosphere to Furtwängler's readings. Both conductors are highly-individual in their own ways.

The misunderstanding of Knappertsbusch's æsthetic and powers, as a conductor, has been further compounded by his later recordings for the « Westminster » label, made in the twilight of his career in Munich, and when his tempi had become inordinately slow. Both the major works of this contract (a complete recording of Beethoven's « Fidelio » and Bruckner's 8th Symphony) do Knappertsbusch little justice. By contrast, it is interesting to note that the reviews of his post-War recordings for « Decca » were almost always enthusiastic. But the studio recordings are, in many respects now, an addendum to the increasingly rich legacy of recordings of live performances - a far more appropriate means of understanding Knappertsbusch's high-risk strategy of relying on the magic of the moment to reveal musical insights. In this respect, the formal hierarchy of the gramophone (studio recording above live performance) is neatly reversed.

The recordings

Given that many of Knappertsbusch's live recordings have emerged from unauthorised sources, such as radio broadcasts, quite a few of the same performances have appeared under different labels both at different times and simultaneously. The disc references given below may therefore be just one among several.

Opera

In the field of Opera, the Knappertsbusch legacy is inevitably focused upon Bayreuth, which may be seen as his spiritual home. His readings of « Parsifal » (1951) and « Der Ring des Nibelungen » (for instance, 1957) are fine examples of his Wagner conducting. From Munich, there exist recordings of characteristic performances of « Tristan und Isolde » (1950) and « Der Rosenkavalier » (1957) , and the latter Opera from Vienna also, given in 1955. A commercial recording from « Decca » with the American bass-baritone George London of Wotan's Farewell from « Die Walküre » is very powerful. The corner-stone of Knappertsbusch's Symphonic repertoire was the music of Anton Bruckner. As early as the 1920's and 1930's, he was conducting « Bruckner Evenings » throughout Germany, and his live discography is extensive : of especial value is the performance of the Symphony No. 7, given at the Salzburg Festival, in 1949, with the Vienna Philharmonic. Also of note are a Munich performance of the Symphony No. 3 (1954) , and a very powerful, granite-like, Symphony No. 9 with the Berlin Philharmonic from 1950. « Decca » recorded Symphonies Nos. 3, 4 and 5 with Knappertsbusch and the Vienna Philharmonic, and these are strong readings, if without the cumulative power of the live performances. Among much fine Brahms from Knappertsbusch is an immensely powerful performance of the Symphony No. 3 coupled with the « Tragic » Overture, given with the Vienna Philharmonic at the Salzburg Festival, in 1955. Zubin Mehta, who observed Knappertsbusch while a student in Vienna, noted how he was able to inject great tension into the music which he was conducting :

« He could play the Brahms Symphony No. 3 at half the tempo and you'd still not be bored, because it would make musical sense. »

Knappertsbusch's success with heavy-weight works and composers has obscured his penchant for lighter music. 2 late « Decca » stereo LP's featured this repertoire and contain some extraordinary readings of music by Johann Strauß II and minor Masters such as Karl Michaël Ziehrer and Karel Komzák (who would have been contemporaries of « Kna »'s youth) . Also of note are his accompaniments to 3 Concerto's recordings by Sir Clifford Curzon, of Beethoven's Piano Concertos Nos. 4 and 5 and Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 2. Recordings of live performances of these 2 Beethoven Concertos with another Master of the keyboard, Wilhelm Backhaus, have also been preserved.

In the field of Opera, the Knappertsbusch legacy is inevitably focused upon Bayreuth, which may be seen as his spiritual home. His 1957 reading of the « Ring » was released on the Italian « Cetra-Live » label, in 1978 - LP : L058-61 (10/78) - and continues to reappear regularly (e.g. , CD : « Laudis » LCD 44010-13) . The massiveness and « grandeur » of this performance have a particular power of their own. « Music & Arts » have recently released the 1956 Bayreuth « Ring » (CD-1009) , and the 1952 « Die Meistersinger » , which has attracted particular praise (CD-1014) . Also of note are « Der fliegende Holländer » of 1955 with Varnay and Uhde - a realization of great strength (CD-876) . The 2 commercially available recordings of « Parsifal » - that of 1951 from « Decca / Teldec » (CD : 9031 76047) and 1962 from « Philips » (CD : 416 390) are excellent examples of « Kna » 's art at its finest. The readings are by no means identical, the later one being for instance 20 minutes faster. Although « Kna » may have not been totally in sympathy with Wieland Wagner's stage production with its emphasis upon the internal psychology of the characters rather than just straightforward action, his musical insight into this mystical Masterpiece was as equally perceptive.

The other major Opera Houses that were central to Knappertsbusch's career were those of Munich and Vienna. As with Bayreuth, the recorded legacy is surprisingly rich. From Munich, the 1950 « Tristan und Isolde » , recorded from a performance at the « Prinzregenttheater » , is a highly-idiomatic realization, less febrile and mercurial than Furtwängler's, and more monumental in approach. This reading is representative of « Kna » at his best (« Orfeo » , CD : 355 943) . « Orfeo » have also released 2 further live performances from Munich, both from 1955 : « Götterdämmerung » with Nilsson and Aldenhoff (CD : 356 944) and another « Meistersinger » (CD : 462 974) , with Lisa della Casa, as at Bayreuth in 1952. Available at one time on LP from « Discocorp » (LP : RR 482) is a splendidly vigorous, as well as surprisingly subtle, « Der Rosenkavalier » , recorded at the 1957 Munich Festival, with Marianne Schech as the Marschallin and Hertha Topper as Octavian. This performance is an excellent example of the way « Kna » could cast new light into the recesses of well-known scores.

The vaults of the Vienna State Opera House, and especially the May archive, have yielded many treasures from performances of the 1930's and early 1940's, and one of the « Koch-Schwann » double CD volumes in this series is devoted to performances directed by Knappertsbusch (CD : 3-1467-2) . Although the actual circumstances of recording cause these extracts to stop and start arbitrarily, what we have is magnificent, even if the sound is not good. There is a very exciting sliver of « Elektra » with Rose Pauly, some magnificent « Lohengrin » with Paul Kotter, Margarethe Teschemacher and Anny Konetzni, and more brilliant « Rosenkavalier » , from 1936 and 1937. An oddity is a group of brief excerpts from Wolf-Ferrari's « The Jewels of the Madonna » . This set is highly-recommended as a strong antidote to all the received opinions about Knappertsbusch - for instance, throughout, there is a high-degree of lyricism. An interesting pendant to this set is a radio broadcast in highly-variable sound of Act 3 of « Le nozze di Figaro » , from the 1939 Salzburg Festival (« Radio Years 75 ») . Again, this shows that « Kna » was no slouch, ably supporting an outstanding cast led by Maria Reining and Ezio Pinza.

The official Operatic legacy of Knappertsbusch on « Decca » contains some excellent items, pride of place within which must go to 2 relatively late recital discs, the 1st with George London, originally on LXT 5478 / SXL 2068 (3/59) . This contains one of the most brilliantly conducted performances of « Wotan's Farewell » on record, with the Vienna Philharmonic in particularly fine form. Of almost equal intensity is a recital disc of excerpts from « Tristan und Isolde

» with Birgit Nilsson and the Vienna Philharmonic, again - originally on LXT 5559 / SXL 2184 (3/60) , re-issued on CD : 452-896-2. The « Decca » « Meistersinger » , recorded in Vienna in 1950, has a fine cast, but is hampered by an early LP balance which places the voices too far forward, with a resultant loss of orchestral sound and detail. Paul Schöffler as Sachs is however extremely fine - originally released on LXT 2659-64 complete (2/52) , re-issued on CD : 440-057-2. One of the weakest of the « Decca » Opera recordings conducted by « Kna » is Act I of « Die Walküre » - LXT5429-30/SXL2074-5 (6/59) - , which with the 3rd Act conducted by Georg Solti acted as a test run for the 1st studio recording of « Das Rheingold » and, ultimately, the complete « Decca Ring » . This is one of the few « Decca » recordings by « Kna » which just does not come-off.

The Symphonic repertoire

The corner-stone of Knappertsbusch's Symphonic repertoire was the music of Anton Bruckner. As early as the 1920's and 1930's, he was conducting « Bruckner Evenings » throughout Germany. Not surprisingly, he saw Bruckner through a Wagnerian lens and conducted throughout his life the now discredited Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe versions of the Symphonies. They adjusted certain Symphonies in orchestral and structural terms to give them a more Wagnerian (and, therefore, less Brucknerian) flavour. The live discography is quite extensive and of especial value is the performance of the 7th Symphony, given at the Salzburg Festival, in 1949, with the Vienna Philharmonic (« Music & Arts » , CD-209) . The 7th is notable in existing in only one basic version and, therefore, « Kna » 's conducting is probably closer to Bruckner's intentions than his more Wagnerian view of the other Symphonies. Also of note are a Munich performance of the 3rd Symphony (« Music & Arts » , CD-257) , and a very powerful, granite-like, 9th with the Berlin Philharmonic from 1950 (« Music & Arts » , CD-219) . « Decca » recorded Symphonies Nos. 3, 4 and 5 with Knappertsbusch and the Vienna Philharmonic - the 5th is available on CD in the original stereo recording not previously released in the United Kingdom (CD : 448-581-2) . This is a strong performance, if without the cumulative power of the live performances.

« Kna » 's recordings of Beethoven and Brahms, and the many re-issues from various sources are too numerous to comment upon individually, but mention should be made of certain outstanding performances. « Tahra » have recently issued a 2 disc set with the Berlin Philharmonic containing the 8th Symphonies of Beethoven and Schubert in uniformly fine readings (CD : TAH 214/215) . A War-time « Eroica » , again with the Berlin Philharmonic, is currently available on « Iron Needle » (CD : IN 1322) . Nothing points-up the difference between Knappertsbusch and Furtwängler more distinctly than comparison between this performance and Furtwängler's from the same period. Among the many fine Brahms readings is an immensely powerful performance of the 3rd Symphony coupled with the « Tragic » Overture, given with the Vienna Philharmonic at the Salzburg Festival, in 1955 (« Orfeo » , CD : 329 931) . Zubin Mehta, who observed Knappertsbusch while a student in Vienna, noted how he was able to inject great tension into the music which he was conducting :

« He could play the Brahms 3rd Symphony at half the tempo and you'd still not be bored, because it would make musical sense. »

This performance is an excellent example of Zubin Mehta's point. The 3rd has also been available in another excellent reading with the « Dresden Staatskapelle », coupled with the Schumann 4th (« Arkadia », CD 724) . Mention should also be made of a studio recording for « Decca » of several of Brahms' shorter works, including a very moving « Alto Rhapsody » with Lucretia West - originally on LP : LXT 5394 (3/59) .

Knappertsbusch's success with heavy-weight works and composers has obscured his penchant for lighter music - 2 late « Decca » stereo LP's featuring this repertoire have been issued on a double CD (440 624-2) and contain some extraordinary readings of music by Johann Strauß II, Tchaïkovsky, and minor masters such as Ziehrer and Komzák (who would have been contemporaries in « Kna » 's youth) . These are not readings for the faint-hearted, but they are great fun.

« Kna » was an intimate friend of Richard Strauß, frequently playing cards with him until Strauß gave the premiere of « Arabella » to Clemens Krauß. Sadly, his Strauß discography is small but not to be over-looked. « Decca » recorded an interesting coupling of « Kna » conducting the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra in « Don Juan » and « Tod und Verklärung », in 1956. At the same time, as the early Solti-Tchaïkovsky 5th (when Solti was less than complementary about the Orchestra's discipline) , originally issued on LP : LXT 5239 (11/59) . Another knock-out reading of « Tod und Verklärung » with the « Dresden Staatskapelle », from 1959, has been available on « Pilz Historic » (CD : 78003) . The 1928 78 rpm recordings of « Till Eulenspiegel » and excerpts from « Intermezzo » and « Salome » have been re-issued on « Preiser » CD : 90260.

The Concertos

Throughout the 1950's, Knappertsbusch was probably most well-known in the United Kingdom for his accompaniments to Clifford Curzon's magisterial readings of the Beethoven 4th and 5th and the Brahms 2nd Piano Concertos - originally released on LP : LXT 2948 (10/54) , LXT 539 (1/58) / SXL2002 (10/58) , and LXT 5434 (7/58) respectively. When accompanying the necessary discipline of working with a soloist seems to have revealed a slightly different aspect of Knappertsbusch's musical character : more precise and often more sensitive. These latter characteristics are even more apparent in several off-air performances of the same repertoire with Wilhelm Backhaus. Backhaus came from a similar musical background as Knappertsbusch (he was only 4 years older than « Kna » , and shared with him an especial reverence for Brahms) and, certainly, their collaborations were extra-special. The Beethoven 4th Concerto has been available on LP : « Baton » 1002 and CD : « Stradavarius » 10002, while the 5th has appeared on LP : « I Grandi Concerti » 17 and CD : « Orfeo » 385 961 (different performances) .

Conclusion

This article has sought to suggest an approach to understanding the music-making of a conductor from a past era, and representative of a style of performance reliant upon the inspiration of the moment. Although fraught with risk, this approach in the right hands certainly yielded performances of great individuality. It is an approach with which the process of recording has found it difficult to co-exist. Recording requires accuracy and intensity, time after time, whereas for the inspirational conductor every performance is subject to the mood of the moment. It is a style infrequently encountered today, if at all. Fortunately, there are in existence a reasonable number of recordings conducted by Knappertsbusch available, mainly of live performances, which attest to its validity. While the principal issues have been mentioned, there are many more available on either a new or 2nd hand basis which are well-worth investigating.

Perhaps, the last word should rest with Wieland Wagner, the founder of New Bayreuth, who wrote the following tribute to Knappertsbusch :

« His name awakens love and reverence. His life means service to music, dedication to the great Masters of the past. He is not of this time and age, in the real sense of the word : he is aristocratic, idealistic, self-assured and humble. His secret is the absolute belief in the work, which he knows to transmit to musicians and listeners in a truly magic manner and thus creates a congregation of believers. In the centre of his being stands the works of Richard Wagner, primarily “ Götterdämmerung ” and “ Parsifal ”. Nobody at all is more chosen than he to interpret this mystic, mythical, but also gay and idyllic music of Richard Wagner. »

Hans Knappertsbusch « In Memoriam »

An appreciation by Hans Hotter in « Opera » magazine (January 1966) ; pages 21-23.

On 13 August 1964, Hans Knappertsbusch conducted for the last time : it was « Parsifal » in the « Festspielhaus » , at Bayreuth. In the interval, he asked me to see him and confided to me that it was planned to make a film about him and his work. He asked whether I would like to speak the commentary and I agreed with enthusiasm. He then concluded in his rough way, belied by the twinkling eyes :

« Now, get-off to your dressing-room, let's have a beautiful “ Good Friday ” spell ! See you again for the “ Holländer ”, in Munich. No production jokes, please ! It's Wagner's Opera : let's present him and not ourselves ! »

I did not then realize that these would be the last words he would ever speak to me. The planned co-operation, to which I had looked forward with such happy anticipation, never materialized. Even in the autumn of 1964, illness prevented him from conducting « Der fliegende Holländer » - my 1st commission as a producer in the Munich Opera House. Now, approximately 1 year later, on November 7, with a « Parsifal » at the Vienna State Opera in his memory, we have said good-bye in our own way to a truly great conductor. Throughout the performance, I had the feeling that he was with us in spirit, and all the evening long the thought of him would not leave me.

Knappertsbusch was one of those strong personalities which had a direct and indirect influence on my artistic career from the time of my youth. We have all learnt how lasting and decisive can be the impressions gained from musical experiences in our early years. As a student in Munich, I had the good fortune to hear my 1st Operas in that era of the 1920's which, under the musical direction of the young Knappertsbusch, became part of the brilliant history of the Munich Opera. Even then, from an admiring distance, never dreaming how my career would develop, I felt something of the breaths of Olympian air which surrounded this extraordinary man.

I have never really lost this feeling of respectful admiration throughout the later years of close co-operation. Perhaps, this was due to a certain reserve which presents intimate friendship between 2 persons but which usually proves to be the ideal prerequisite for a fruitful and harmonious working basis. I respected his authority, even when I did not agree with him - or, shall we say, when my inexperience led me to disagree with him. When he remarked briefly, after the 19 year old youth had attended an audition at the Munich Opera, arranged by well-meaning friends :

« The lad should just get on with his studies. »

The student swallowed his disappointment that a personal meeting had not resulted ; but, later, the Wotan or Dutchman on the stage felt pleasure in seeing one of those typically elegant gestures from the rostrum which meant that « our “ Kna ” » was well-satisfied. This rigorous man, who poured the relentless wrath of the gods over my head when my voice failed at the end of a performance through hay fever and bronchitis, was big enough to come on to the stage after a successful performance, a few months later, and to say to me, in the presence of the rest of the cast :

« You were excellent. I behave stupidly, a short time ago. »

The purpose of these few lines is not to enumerate or describe the artistic and human qualities of this great conductor. But, perhaps, a few remarks and some events, either from personal experience or as related by reliable witnesses, will help to make a clearer and more complete picture of this man for the future. Those who knew him, and have heard one or other of the many anecdotes, will perhaps still find pleasure in remembering what they have heard and perhaps experienced themselves.

There is repeated evidence of how strong were the authoritative, some times magical rays which radiated from this aristocratic Master of the art of conducting, and how nobody could escape being aware of them. In private life, too, one felt them. There were 2 things which I always noticed about him. There was his blunt directness, often tending to caprice, brooking no opposition and occasionally having the power to hurt, yet, linked with a genuine sense of just objectivity to everybody, including himself. Parallel with this, there was a gentleness which one would never have suspected behind the rough exterior of his brusque manner. Most of the stories which were already Classics during his life-time illustrate this point. They will live on, spiced with the dry humour of his Westphalian homeland, often near the bounds of politeness and sometimes going beyond them.

Famous names meant nothing to him ; the only thing that counted was ability. On the other hand, he always had understanding for the needs and circumstances of the « small fry » , who never appear in the front row of an Opera company. There is, for example, the revealing story of the prompter and the stage band which lost its place. During the interval, Knappertsbusch made one of his rare appearances on the stage and, in a rough and angry voice, asked which idiot had given the stage band the wrong cue. He was given the name of the culprit, a reliable, quietly modest but easily offended prompter. Knappertsbusch said quietly :

« Well, better say nothing to him, he might take offence ! »

He turned to go but suddenly spun round and, in a somewhat louder voice added :

« But, at the next performance, when we get to that spot, lock the fellow in the ... »

He could be trenchant about the musical interpretations of some of his fellow-conductors. Once the conductor of a certain performance of « Tristan und Isolde » heard that Knappertsbusch had been in the auditorium for a short while. Flattered by the presence of the distinguished visitor, he asked next day :

« Well, Professor, how did you like my “ Tristan ” ? »

Knappertsbusch's reply was :

« I never knew you had composed one too ! »

Then, there was the spitefully ironic conversation with another famous conductor :

« Oh, you mean X ? Yes, my dear colleague, he is excellent, better than I, in fact, almost as good as you ! »

Once something happened to me in a performance whilst he was conducting, something which happens occasionally to any singer - even though I had sung the part more than a hundred times, in a momentary lack of concentration memory failed, the words were forgotten and an important sentence was just not sung. On this occasion a few strong words of displeasure penetrated audibly through the music from the conductor's stand. That was all. No reproaches after the performance, no reaction during the next few days.

Weeks later, I appeared in the same part with « Kna » again on the rostrum. We came to the same passage and I waited with every effort of concentration, really on my toes, for the entry. Suddenly, I noticed that he had risen from his stool to his full height, turned his baton upside down and was shaking the thick end of it at me with a threatening and meaningful gesture. It would not have needed much more to make me forget my part again ! The same scene was re-enacted in a series of performances of this Opera, throughout the following years. A string of such stories could be told about him. The great magician of the rostrum is no longer with us. In the minds of those who were able to work with him, however, the memory lives on : sitting there, upright and carefully considering, giving his unique, precise sign, small, hardly noticeable, suddenly demanding and dominating, forceful, growling, shouting and, then again, radiantly happy, never forgetting the brief little gesture of thanks to the company - an exceptional man in an age which has become so poor in real individualism.

Munich paid tribute to Hans Knappertsbusch in a short, but impressive, ceremony in the National Theatre, on October 31. Although it was a fine Sunday morning, the theatre was packed with representatives of every section of public life, to say nothing of music-lovers and admirers of « Kna », as he was known here. In a speech, Rudolf Hartmann (administrator of the Bavarian State Opera) characterized Knappertsbusch as « one of the few for whom constructive devotion to the work of art meant more than the obtrusion of his own personality ». Meinhard von Zallinger conducted the « andante » from Brahms's 3rd symphony ; Robert Heger conducted the chorus in the Titular music from « Parsifal » ; and Joseph Keilberth concluded with the funeral music from « Götterdämmerung » .

A tribute to Hans Knappertsbusch by John Culshaw (Grammophone)

When the news of Hans Knappertsbusch's death reached Vienna, on the morning of October 26th, the Austrian musical public, in general, and the Vienna Philharmonic, in particular, felt much as their British colleagues did when the death of Thomas Beecham was announced. The 2 conductors had much in common. Both were aristocratic in bearing ; both were connoisseurs of food, wine and gracious living ; both had enormous humour, and that flair for improvisation which is part of the technique of the complete professional. Where they differed is that, while Beecham had an international career, Knappertsbusch's renown as a public performer after the War was limited in the main to Germany, Austria and France. He was the least ambitious and certainly the most lovable of the great old school of Central European conductors.

It is as hard to write about him accurately as it was to record the special qualities of his performances in the studio. He was essentially a man of the theatre and the concert-hall, and it is appropriate that the real testimonies of his art are the 2 live recordings of « Parsifal » made in the theatre, at Bayreuth. He was famous for his disinclination to rehearse (he would say to the Orchestra : « You know it, and I know it, so why don't we just play it ? ») and the routine of the recording studio confused him. Once, when asked if he would like to hear a play-back of the piece he had just recorded, he said :

« Why ? I've just heard it out here. »

Thus the very special qualities he brought, especially to Wagner and Strauß, really emerged only in the theatre or concert-hall where he could either immerse himself in the music and bring-off a performance of shattering power, or abandon all interest in the proceedings and leave the platform muttering obscenities in all directions. A few years ago, having been press-ganged into what he considered an unnecessary rehearsal of a Haydn Symphony, he merely played through the work and called-out a few instructions as it went along, including those about repeats. Some of the Orchestra either did not hear or forgot, with the result that, at the public performance, half the Orchestra went back for a repeated passage while the rest went on. As he left the platform, Knappertsbusch was heard to grumble :

« Wouldn't have happened if we hadn't had that rehearsal ! »

Like many conductors of the old school, his main concern was for line and structure in performance ; detail and precise ensemble were to some extent secondary. On the right day, he could build a climax like no other conductor I have heard. The end of « Tod und Verklärung » , the resolution of the « Liebestod » and the last movement of Bruckner's 8th Symphony brought-out the best in him. He had a way of holding a climax to the bursting point - and then, when you felt that no more reserves of sound could possibly exist, he would top the crescendo with a crescendissimo, so to speak, that left his audience limp and his players goggle-eyed with admiration. He did it, of course, through his incredible control - a sense of timing coupled with an eye and stick technique which made players under his command conserve their resources and then, at his glance, give their utmost. Brass players, in particular, say that no other conductor could get them to sustain as he did. In the Opera House, he would conduct sitting down until a climax approached, and then, his huge figure would slowly rise and just about transfix whichever group of players he wished to emphasize. He was loved in Vienna and Munich, and feted in Paris ; yet, his only appearance in the new Vienna State Opera was for 3 performances of « Der Rosenkavalier » , at each of which he had a different Baron Ochs. Many people in Vienna still say that these were the best performances of the opening weeks. He continued to visit Vienna, once or twice a season, to conduct the Philharmonic and to make recordings, but he did not care for travel. Until last year (1965) , he conducted the Bayreuth « Parsifal » regularly though, years ago, he abandoned the « Ring » because he disagreed with the production. He loved Johann Strauß and, like Thomas Beecham, had some unexpected enthusiasms : Gustave Charpentier's « Louise » was one of them. He was a man of immense dignity and kindness, but he was above all an individualist. He was too much a native of Bavaria to leave Germany during the Nazi regime, but he managed to express his contempt in a 100 ways which are now legends in Munich and Vienna. He once gave a signed photograph to a colleague of mine, who had a habit of lining his office with such pictures, bearing the inscription :

« Not to be hung between those Nazis and the names in question being those of 2 extremely famous conductors of the same era. »

And his modesty was genuine : he hated applause, and had no time at all for the modern conception of the conductor as a star. He was probably happiest at Bayreuth where, in shirt-sleeves and braces, he remained invisible to the audience.

« Parsifal » , in either recorded version, remains a great monument to him. Of his other records, there is a lovely performance of the « Wesendonk Lieder » with Flagstad and the Vienna Philharmonic, and an eccentric but valuable « Tod und Verklärung » made in Paris, many years ago, in which you can hear his passionate snorts and grunts whenever the music gets intense. While we were making that record, we used to have lunch together every day at a Paris bistro and it was there that, after a very long, and for me, highly-instructive talk about the music of Richard Strauß, for which he had a profound devotion, I ventured to ask him what Strauß had been like as a man :

« I played cards with him every day for years, and he was a pig. » said Knappertsbusch.

That was the end of the conversation.

On the morning of October 26th 1965, the Vienna Philharmonic assembled for a session in the « Sofiensaal » and it was then that the President, Professor Otto Straßer, broke the news of Knappertsbusch's death. Georg Solti, who was conducting the session, then spoke movingly of the time when he, as a young Hungarian refugee immediately after the War, had been placed in charge of the Munich Opera ; and of the fact that in all the turbulence of that period, the one man who went-out of his way to help and guide the newcomer was Hans Knappertsbusch. Then, the Vienna Philharmonic stood for a minute's silence. One of the younger players said to me, in the interval :

« It isn't like losing another conductor. I feel as if I have lost a father. »

True to his character, he left instructions for a simple funeral with no pomp and ceremony. He was a very dear man, and it is the world's loss that he chose to confine himself, during his greatest years, to the Orchestras he loved, and to those which loved him.

Hans Knappertsbusch (geboren 12. März 1888 in Elberfeld (heute : Wuppertal) ; gestorben 25. Oktober 1965 in München) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Hans Knappertsbusch wurde als Sohn eines Elberfelder Spirituosen-Fabrikanten geboren. Sein Interesse für das Dirigier-Handwerk zeigt er bereits als Schüler, indem er das Orchester des örtlichen Gymnasiums leitete. Nach dem Schulabschluss studierte er (gegen den Willen seiner Eltern) am Konservatorium in Köln. Das Dirigieren erlernte er dort bei dem damals berühmten Fritz Steinbach. Stationen seines frühen Wirkens als Kapellmeister waren ab 1909 Mülheim an der Ruhr, Bochum, Elberfeld und Leipzig. Parallel dazu assistierte er von 1909 bis 1912 in Bayreuth dem damaligen Festspielleiter Siegfried Wagner und vor allem auch dem Wagner-Dirigenten Hans Richter. Dies war eine Zeit, die prägenden Einfluss auf seinen musikalischen Interpretationsstil hatte und seine Entwicklung zum Wagner-Dirigenten von internationalem Format einleitete. 1914 errang er erstes Aufsehen durch die Leitung der Wagnerfestspiele in Holland. Sein Weg führte ihn sodann über die Dessauer Hofoper, wo er 1919 Deutschlands jüngster Generalmusikdirektor wurde, nach München. Hier wurde er 1922 Nachfolger von Bruno Walter als Leiter der Bayerischen Staatsoper und der Akademiekonzerte im Odeon, eine Position, welche er bis 1935 innehatte. 1924 erfolgte seine Ernennung zum Professor.

Als 1933 Thomas Mann zu Richard Wagners 50. Todestag in München einen Vortrag unter dem Titel Leiden und Größe Richard Wagners hielt, in der er Wagner und sein Werk einerseits würdigte, aber auch einer vielschichtigen Kritik unterzog, fühlte sich der leidenschaftliche Wagnerverehrer Knappertsbusch herausgefordert, sein Idol zu verteidigen, und verfasste unter Mitwirkung von Hans Pfitzner einen « Protest der Richard-Wagner-Stadt München », in dem die Kritik Manns in scharfen Worten zurückgewiesen wurde, vor allem aber die Unterstützung Manns für die Weimarer Republik denunziert wurde. Die Protestnote wurde von etwa 40 namhaften Kulturträgern der Stadt München, unter anderem auch von Richard Strauß, sowie von politischen Repräsentanten unterzeichnet und im Rundfunk sowie in den « Münchner Neuesten Nachrichten » veröffentlicht.

Knappertsbuschs Einstellung war deutsch-national, er war aber kein Mitglied der NSDAP. Er stand dem Nationalsozialismus auch nicht mit Sympathie gegenüber und nahm kein Blatt vor den Mund. Seine persönliche Antipathie gegenüber der Partei führte dazu, daß er von den Nationalsozialisten schon bald als « politisch unzuverlässig » eingestuft wurde. Da er zudem nicht davor zurückschreckte, in seiner unverblünten Art Hitler persönlich vor den Kopf zu stoßen, blieben die Konsequenzen nicht lange aus : 1935 wurde er als Münchner Opernchef abgesetzt und mit Arbeitsverbot belegt, ein Verbot, welches allerdings durch den Mangel an hervorragenden Dirigenten im Dritten Reich bald wieder aufgehoben wurde. Sein Nachfolger als Operndirektor wurde 1937 der von Hitler favorisierte und politisch fügsamere Clemens Krauß.

Motiviert durch die Münchner Vorgänge verlagerte Knappertsbusch seinen Wirkungsschwerpunkt nun nach Österreich. 1936 trat er erstmals an der Wiener Staatsoper auf, wo er zum ständigen Gastdirigenten avancierte und dort auch, obwohl ohne offizielles Amt, an der Geschäftsführung der Staatsoper bis 1944 wesentlich beteiligt war. Auch bei den Salzburger Festspielen, bei denen er 1929 debütiert hatte, wirkte er ab 1937 wieder mit. Ebenfalls von 1937 an bis zu seinem Tod dirigierte er viele Male die Wiener Philharmoniker. Nach dem Anschluß Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich 1938 arbeitete Knappertsbusch nach und nach wieder auf deutschem Gebiet und unternahm während der Kriegszeit auch einige Tourneen in die von Deutschland besetzten oder mit Deutschland befreundeten Länder, hauptsächlich mit den Berliner Philharmonikern mit Konzerten, deren Leitung Wilhelm Furtwängler abgelehnt hatte.

Trotz seines gespannten Verhältnisses zu den Nationalsozialisten beteiligte er sich zuweilen auch an NS-nahen Veranstaltungen, wie etwa zwei Konzerten zur Feier von Hitlers Geburtstag 1943 und 1944. Am 30. Januar 1943 wurde ihm von Hitler das Kriegsverdienstkreuz II. Klasse ohne Schwerter verliehen. Knappertsbuschs Problematik während der NS-Zeit war damit ähnlich gelagert wie bei seinem nahezu gleichaltrigen Dirigenten-Kollegen Wilhelm Furtwängler : Tief in deutscher Kultur und Kunst verwurzelt, konnte und wollte er sich nicht vorstellen zu emigrieren. Für eine künstlerische Tätigkeit im nationalsozialistischen Deutschland war es aber für einen namhaften Dirigenten auf Dauer unmöglich, sich der Inbeschlagnahme durch das Regime zu entziehen ; somit sah er sich zu einer zweifellos nicht gerne eingegangenen Kooperation genötigt. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn von einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

Nach dem Krieg übernahm er 1945 zunächst wieder das Amt des Generalmusikdirektors der Bayerischen Staatsoper, bekleidete es allerdings nicht allzu lange : Bedingt durch seine berufliche Betätigung während des Dritten Reiches verhängten die Amerikaner im Herbst 1945 ein Berufsverbot über ihn, welches jedoch Anfang 1947 (von diesen als Irrtum erkannt) mit entsprechenden Entschuldigungen wieder zurückgenommen wurde. Sein Nachfolger als Generalmusikdirektor in München war jedoch 1946 Georg Solti geworden. Nach seiner Rehabilitierung nahm Knappertsbusch keine feste Stelle mehr an. Die Schwerpunkte seines Wirkens waren von da an München, Wien und ab 1951 Bayreuth. Als Domizil wählte er nach dem Kriege zunächst Bayreuth, dann München.

Von 1947 bis 1950 arbeitete er auch im Theater an der Wien, dem Ausweichquartier der Wiener Staatsoper und ab November 1955 leitete er wieder Aufführungen an der nach dem Wiederaufbau neu eröffneten Staatsoper. Dies waren jedoch seine letzten Auftritte im Haus am Ring, der 1956 antretende Direktor Herbert von Karajan engagierte ihn nicht mehr. Die lieb gewonnene Zusammenarbeit mit den Wiener Philharmonikern setzte er ab 1947 fort, insbesondere auch als Dirigent von Schallplattenaufnahmen sowie in Orchesterkonzerten im Theater an der Wien und bei den Salzburger Festspielen.

Eine weiterer Wirkungsschwerpunkt zeichnete sich 1951 ab : Die neuen Festspielleiter von Bayreuth, Wieland Wagner und Wolfgang Wagner, engagierten ihn zur Wiedereröffnung der Bayreuther Festspiele nach dem Krieg. Mit Ausnahme 1953 trat er dort bis 1964 jedes Jahr auf und dirigierte den Ring, den Fliegenden Holländer sowie die Meistersinger von Nürnberg, vor allem aber Parsifal. Mit Parsifal hatte er auch am 13. August 1964 seinen letzten Auftritt.

Hans Knappertsbusch starb am 25. Oktober 1965 in München an den langwährenden Folgen eines Oberschenkelhalsbruches und wurde auf dem alten Bogenhausener Friedhof in München beigesetzt (Grab Mauer links Nummer 53) .

Berühmt wurde Knappertsbusch für seine Aufnahmen von Werken von Ludwig van Beethoven, Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms und Richard Strauß, die von großer innerer Ruhe und langem, spannungsgeladenem Atem sind. Vor allem jedoch wird er als einer der bedeutendsten Wagner-Interpreten des letzten Jahrhunderts angesehen. Die Werke Richard Wagners lagen ihm sehr am Herzen und seinem künstlerischen Empfinden wohl am nächsten : Als er in der Nachkriegszeit bei den Bayreuther Festspielen dirigierte, war es ihm eine Ehre, dem Vermächtnis Wagners zu dienen und dort ohne Gage zu dirigieren. Am meisten liebte er Parsifal, von den 95 Auftritten, die er in Bayreuth absolvierte, war dieses Werk 55 Mal vertreten.

Die künstlerische Ausrichtung des weltanschaulich konservativen Knappertsbusch war an der Tradition orientiert, mit Neuerungen konnte er wenig anfangen, moderne Inszenierungen der Nachkriegszeit etwa waren ihm ein Gräuel. In seinen jüngeren Jahren war er jedoch auch den zeitgenössischen Werken durchaus aufgeschlossen, wenn sie auch mit zunehmendem Alter nicht mehr im Zentrum seines Interesses standen. So stand er in seiner Zeit als Münchner Generalmusikdirektor bei der Uraufführung von sieben Opern am Pult : Don Gil von den grünen Hosen von Braunfels, Das Himmelskleid von Wolf-Ferrari, Samuel Pepys von Coates, Die geliebte Stimme von Weinberger, Lucedia von Giannini und Das Herz von Pfitzner.

Die Schwerpunkte seiner Tätigkeit waren zwar die Länder des deutschsprachigen Raumes, jedoch führten den auch international sehr gefragten Dirigenten zahlreiche Gastspiele an Opernhäuser in ganz Europa. Im Verlauf seiner Karriere erstreckte sich seine Tätigkeit von Petersburg bis Madrid, von Stockholm bis Neapel. Nach dem Krieg war er insbesondere oft in Paris tätig. Engagements außerhalb Europas nahm er jedoch nicht an, auch ein Angebot der Metropolitan Opera in New York lehnte er ab.

Knappertsbusch probte nur ungerne und sehr ökonomisch und verließ sich lieber auf die Intuition während der Aufführung. Obwohl seine Gestik beim Dirigieren meist sparsam war, gelang es ihm, kraft seiner suggestiven Persönlichkeit, das Orchester zu Höchstleistungen anzuspornen. Manchmal reichten ihm Blicke und Mienenspiel, um den Musikern seinen Willen mitzuteilen. Da er die Spontaneität des Augenblicks bei der Wiedergabe der musikalischen Werke liebte, war er auch kein großer Freund von Studioaufnahmen für die Schallplattenindustrie, von denen es relativ wenige gibt. Jedoch sind zahlreiche Live-Mitschnitte seiner Aufführungen erhalten.

Knappertsbusch gab ein für einen Dirigenten ungewöhnliches Erscheinungsbild ab : Sein uneitles, geradliniges, auch bärbeißiges Wesen, kombiniert mit einer gewissen imperatorhaften Aura, die er ausstrahlte, und seine im Alter entwickelte Menschenscheu brachten dem Mann aus dem Bergischen Land in München und Wien eine auch über Opernkreise hinausgehende ungewöhnliche Popularität ein ; ihm wurde « die Ehre der Volkstümlichkeit zuteil » . Im Volksmund wurde er einfach « der Kna » genannt.

Wie bei vielen Künstlerpersönlichkeiten vereinten sich in Knappertsbusch ambivalente Wesenszüge. Sein Charakter war bestimmt durch Kraft, Eigenwilligkeit und derbe Robustheit, denen aber eine hohe Empfindsamkeit und eine leichte Verstörbarkeit gegenüberstanden. Bei Publikum und Orchester war er beliebt wegen seiner unkomplizierten und vergleichsweise bescheidenen Wesensart. Am Ende einer Aufführung verbeugte er sich zunächst vor dem Orchester, damit dokumentierend, daß diesem ein wesentlicher Anteil am Gelingen zuzuordnen ist. Die Musiker behandelte er nicht als Untergebene, sondern als Mitarbeiter. Aus der unmittelbaren, entbehrungsreichen Nachkriegszeit ist bekannt, daß er wesentliche Teile seiner Gagen zur Unterstützung seiner Musiker verwendete. Erst spät wurde bekannt, daß Knappertsbusch während der nationalsozialistischen Herrschaft Verfolgte unterstützt hat.

Auf der anderen Seite war er auch bekannt und bei manchem gefürchtet für seine Derbheit und seine ungehobelte und auch nachtragende Wesensart. Der Zorn des Maestros war zuweilen leicht zu entzünden, recht ordentliche verbale Entgleisungen waren dann keine Seltenheit. Insbesondere wurden die Sängerinnen und Sänger bei Fehlern selbst während der Aufführung oft mit lautstarken Obszönitäten bedacht, wie zum Beispiel die berühmte Sopranistin Birgit Nilsson zu berichten weiß. Berüchtigt sind auch seine Beschimpfungen der Nazi-Machthaber, wobei ihm nur aufgrund seiner prominenten Stellung keine lebensgefährdenden Probleme erwuchsen.

Knappertsbusch war zweimal verheiratet. 1918 heiratete er Ellen Selma Neuhaus aus Elberfeld (1896-1987) . Aus dieser Ehe ging eine Tochter, Anita (1919-1938) , hervor, die schon in jungen Jahren an einem Gehirntumor starb. Die Ehe mit Ellen wurde 1925 geschieden. 1926 ehelichte er Marion von Leipzig (1898-1984) , mit der er bis zu seinem Lebensende verheiratet war.

Freundschaften pflegte Knappertsbusch mit den Komponisten Hans Pfitzner, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Richard Strauß und dem Dirigenten Leo Blech.

Elektra unter Knappertsbusch ? Seit Anfang 2012 gibt es Gerüchte über eine Gesamtaufnahme « Elektra » aus München unter Knappertsbusch aus dem Jahre 1955. Siehe auch :

<http://www.tamino-klassikforum.at> ; <http://www.kna-club.com/>

Das Opernregister der Bayerischen Staatsoper vermerkt, daß Knappertsbusch im Jahr 1955 keine Elektra an der Bayerischen Staatsoper dirigierte. Die Elektra wurde an der Staatsoper 1955 nur ein einziges Mal aufgeführt, nämlich während der Opernfestspiele am 26.08. unter der Leitung von Karl Böhm. Die Sänger-Besetzung dieser Aufführung stimmt mit der auf der Labelbeschriftung dieser angeblichen Gesamtaufnahme unter Knappertsbusch angegebenen überein.

Verfügbar von einer « Elektra » unter Knappertsbusch sind bis dato lediglich einige kurze Liveauschnitte von Aufführungen, die Knappertsbusch 1936 und 1941 an der Wiener Staatsoper dirigierte. Die Aufnahmen stammen von Hermann May, aufgenommen auf Wachsmatrizen, sind also qualitativ nicht überragend.

Veröffentlicht von dem Label « Koch-Schwann » : 3-1467-2 und 3-1466-2.

Mai 1944 : La revue « L'illustrazione italiana » écrit :

« La fameuse Philharmonie de Berlin et son chef Wilhelm Furtwängler seront les protagonistes d'un film produit par " Tobis ". Paul Verhoeven sera le metteur en scène. La musique de Bruckner, Beethoven et Liszt ne sera pas uniquement le commentaire sonore du film mais constituera aussi sa structure sur la base du film américain " Fantasia ", produit par Walt Disney. »

Cette information n'est pas exacte : en effet, Furtwängler refusa de participer à ce film (baptisé « Philharmoniker » et produit par la « Tobis Filmkunst », en 1943-1944) qui fut présenté officiellement à Berlin, le 5 décembre 1944. Il y apparaît néanmoins ... grâce à son portrait ! Il s'agit d'une aimable fiction : les destins contradictoires de 2 frères violonistes (l'un membre de la Philharmonie et l'autre non) déchirés par l'amour d'une même femme. S'il est à la gloire de la Philharmonie, il est vierge de toute référence explicite à l'Allemagne hitlérienne, l'action se situant au début des années '30. Pour ces raisons, on a du mal à comprendre pourquoi Furtwängler ne souhaite pas y figurer. L'intérêt se porte donc sur la musique et ceux qui l'interprètent : Eugen Jochum, Karl Böhm, Hans Knappertsbusch et Richard Strauß.

4 mai 1944 : Soirée musicale au monastère de Saint-Florian en l'honneur du « Staatsrat » Wilhelm Furtwängler.

13-15 mai 1944 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1889, éditée par Theodor Rättig (1890), l'Orchestre philharmonique d'État de Hambourg (étiquette « Music & Arts », CD : I100).

25 mai 1944 : Le chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1876-1878, éditée par Robert Haas (1935), avec le « Bruckner Orchester Linz ». Un enregistrement existe.

26 juin 1944 : Le chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1881, éditée par Robert Haas (1935), avec le « Bruckner Orchester Linz » dans un enregistrement de la Radio du « Reich » (étiquettes : « Urania », LP : URLP-7041 / « Belter-Urania », LP : 30.011 / « Classics Club », LP : x141 / « Forgotten Records », CD : FR 297).

La 8e de Karajan

28 juin et 29 septembre 1944 : Le chef Herbert von Karajan dirige dans le grand auditorium de 900 places (« Der große Sendesaal : Saal I ») de la « Haus des Rundfunks » (Maison de la radiodiffusion) la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version hybride (1887-1890) éditée par Robert Haas (1935-1939), avec la « Preussische Staatskapelle » de Berlin (« Berliner Staatsoper »). L'enregistrement du 2e mouvement est en monophonie tandis que l'enregistrement du 4e mouvement est en stéréophonie expérimentale ! (Ingénieur du son : Helmut Krüger.)

Karajan, ø 28 juin (II. & III.) & 29 septembre (IV. en stéréo) 1944 « Staatskapelle Berlin ».

Étiquettes : « Koch Swann " Legacy " », 3-1448-2 / « Iron Needle », IN 1407 / « Magic Master », 37038 / « Hunt », 705 (4e mouvement seulement).

Durées : I. perdu ; II. 16 min 10 ; III. 27 min 21 ; IV. 27 min 34 = 71 minutes.

« Ce document, d'un intérêt historique évident, n'apporte aucune clé discographique supplémentaire par rapport à l'œuvre : c'est typiquement une archive pour karajanolâtres. »

« La bande qui nous occupe possède 2 particularités : le 1er mouvement est perdu et le dernier est en stéréo expérimentale. On est frappé à nouveau par la précocité de la maturité du jeune Karajan (le « jeune freluquet autrichien » comme l'appelait le sinistre Adolf Hitler). Le " Scherzo " est conduit avec une animation organique qui n'exclut jamais la respiration et la construction d'ensemble et le sublime " Adagio " révèle une poésie expressive alliée à une grandeur dynamique, le contrôle des masses sonores et la plénitude du déploiement, aboutissent à une émotion plus proche de son dernier enregistrement viennois que de celui de Berlin, trop narcissique et wagnérisant pour certains. Le Finale, bien que capté quelques mois plus tard, véhicule la même charge spirituelle et démontre les mêmes qualités d'architecture. Moins tendue que celle de Wilhelm Furtwängler, l'interprétation de Karajan atteint presque la même profondeur. Notre quotation se doit cependant de tenir compte de l'absence du 1er mouvement. »

This over 60 years old tape was transfered directly to digital equipment without any processing !

An historic Stereo recording by Mister Helmut Krüger made at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG) in Berlin, in the early 1940's with the « AEG-Telefunken » K7 stereo tape recoder. Krüger was nicknamed by his radio colleagues « Krüger-Krüger » , in witty reference to his habit to record everything in Stereo.

The Soviets brought the complete « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » archive to Moscow, in 1945. Unfortunately, from the approximately 300 Stereo recordings (mainly Symphonies and Operas) , only a handful found their way back to Berlin ; and in a very bad condition ! This acoustic equivalent of the lost « Amber Room » is another of the culturally painful costs of the Second World War.

Herbert von Karajan's performances of Anton Bruckner's music started in the 1930's and lasted until the end of his life. His last public conducting appearance was in a performance of the 7th Symphony, in April 1989, 3 months before he died.

His relationship with the 8th Symphony, which some would say he loved and revered above all others, produced 63 performances and 5 celebrated recordings spanning the years 1937 to 1989. His interpretations always acknowledged the grand architectural structure of the music which in unsuccessful performances can often sound disjointed and lacking in unity.

« We see and hear him now at the height of his powers, superbly able to keep a Bruckner Symphony spinning not like a top but rather like some celestial sphere - massive, glowing, and infused with cosmic power. »

« This is a remarkable recording which keeps popping-up on different labels. Karajan recorded it in 1944 relatively soon before his escape to Italy away from the « Reich ». We know that Karajan experienced the anxiety of those days like all of his contemporaries, yet, this recording communicates an inner feeling of imperturbable calm. The recorded sound is amazingly clear and the Finale was recorded in a very early version of stereo ! The recording sadly lacks the 1st movement, but, as always with this work, it is the mighty slow movement that matters most and, in this, Karajan is at his mesmerizing best. It is amazing how relatively little his interpretation changed over the many decades in which he performed this work. If anything, however, the sense of calm and assuredness comes across more clearly in this earliest recording of the work. There is nothing hurried in this performance - the slow movement checks in at over 27 minutes. Karajan was, of course, one of the greatest conductors of the last Century and the Bruckner 8th, more than any other work in his large repertoire, was one which he virtually made his own. This remarkable recording proves that, even very early in his career, he had a Master's grasp on this « Everest » of Symphonies. »

...

« Karajan had a life-long affair with the Bruckner 8th. Here is the 1st act of consummation. Indeed, when was he not the Master of this Symphony down to its last quaver ? Like Athena, did he spring fully formed from Zeus ?

The Scherzo and Adagio here were recorded in mono, in June 1944, whereas the Finale, resplendent in stereo, dates from September 1944 when Germany was befalling " Götterdämmerung ". And who would have thought that a headless horror (the 1st movement is missing) would be such a stupendous success ? One hardly notices its absence.

The Scherzo is marginally quicker than the 1988 performance on " DGG ". And while it is monophonic, it sounds like one of those Walter Legge specials. It is very listenable. Such is its clockwork precision (accompanied by poetry) , one could liken this performance to the " Harmony of the Spheres ". It suffers nothing in comparison with the later recordings. Its sheer vitality reconciles one to the loss of the 1st movement.

The Adagio is self-assured in the extreme. Karajan takes us on a journey which culminates in a " Vision of the One " - or of some higher cosmic unity if you do not ascribe to Bruckner's eschatology.

The greatest marvel here is the last movement (27 minutes 34 seconds compared with the 23 minutes 59 seconds, in 1988) . It is long-breathed, which always signifies Mastery in Bruckner. It is astounding that at this dark hour, such a rendition could be so celestially peaceful ; perhaps, one and all (and not least the conductor) were mindful of Ajax's last words : " Light, Light, if only to die in. ". Again, I cannot say that it was surpassed by the later versions : it exhibits a tranquillity that is remarkable.

The sound itself would pass for muster as a mid- 1970's analogue recording. But it is better than that : it has a depth which is staggering.

The " Staatskapelle " play-out of their skins - it is surely their greatest recording ever. Perhaps, each one of them was anxious to remain in the Orchestra. They play as to the " Festung " born.

The Coda to the last movement (a Parousia in itself) is better than any of the other Karajan's, or Furtwängler (in 1944 or 1954) , or Guilini or Wand or Böhm or Tennstedt. None of them are in the same league. »

« This valuable release stems from 2 different sessions with Herbert von Karajan, in his 30's at an early stage of his career and working in relative obscurity, with the Prussian " Staatskapelle ", dating from 1944. The disc contains the final 3 movements of Anton Bruckner's massive 8th Symphony : the Scherzo and Adagio done in June and the Finale done that September. The thought of music-making continuing on in Berlin during 1944 seems hallucinatory, with Allied air raids arriving each evening and a collapsing eastern front marking each day as one step closer to doom. In this charged situation, Karajan and his Orchestra did their jobs.

Is this an exceptional Bruckner disc ? I don't like it as much as some of the other reviewers but the Adagio is remarkable and the Finale is very good. The Scherzo is unremarkable, with Karajan taking it slowly for a somewhat plodding interpretation. Karajan had a masterful way with the 8th's Adagio and this is a particularly good version. Through the Adagio and the Finale there is a remarkable sense of a continuous line, as if Bruckner begins a melody and almost half-an-hour later brings it to a close. One highlight of the disc is the recap of the Adagio's sensuous opening theme, including the transition into the recap (about 16 minutes into track 2) , brilliantly handled by Karajan and the Orchestra. The Adagio is a remarkable concatenation of evocative luxury and long, drawn-out architecture, all taken at a slow tempo. The Finale has many of the same virtues. It is also taken a bit slowly, like the rest of the 8th here, and resembles Karajan's later recordings of the movement from the 1970's and 1980's. It has " grandeur " and shape and an excellent sense of line.

How is the sound quality ? It's historical sound, but OK. The mid-range is good and rich, the treble contains some harshness and the bass is a bit muddy. It's a pretty good recording for 1944, with a good remastering job from the Koch label. For me, this is a historically-interesting early Karajan performance, with an exceptional Adagio and a very good Finale. »

« This 1944 performance was apparently sent to the Soviet Union so the Nazi regime would not confiscate it. It is missing the 1st movement so we only have movements 2, 3 and 4. 2 and 3 are in monophonic sound but the Finale is in stereo. Karajan's tempos are slow, just like his 1988 Vienna Philharmonic benchmark recording for " DGG ". The Orchestra is not the Vienna Philharmonic, but still makes a really nice sound. For those who are interested this is a welcome addition to your Bruckner library. The 1988 performance still would be my primary recommendation, although many other great conductors have proven themselves to be Masters of the Bruckner 8th (including Jascha Horenstein) .

Auf verschlungenen Wegen erreichte vor einiger Zeit den Autor dieser Artikelserie eine Kopie des Finalsatzes aus Bruckners 8. Sinfonie, die im September 1944 mit der Staatskapelle unter Herbert von Karajan im Sendesaal I an der Masurenallee von der RRG in Stereo aufgezeichnet wurde, während die ersten drei Sätze aus den Aufnahmesitzungen Juni/Juli 1944 leider nur in Mono vorliegen. Die Aufnahmequalität dieser Stereoaufnahme ist atemberaubend gut und die machtvolle Interpretation Karajans des Brucknerschen Finalsatzes spricht dabei für sich. In einem Brief an seine Mutter aus dem Juli 1944 schrieb er : « ... es wäre jetzt die Zeit gekommen, wo man sich von der Last der irdischen Dinge befreien und Musik wieder auf die geistigen Höhen bringen sollte, von denen sie gekommen sei » . Genau diese Absicht und das Bestreben, so scheint es, ist Karajan wohl noch einmal durch den Kopf gegangen, als er im September des gleichen Jahres zu dieser gewaltigen Interpretation des Brucknerschen Finalsatzes fand. Die Stimmung des Finalsatzes kann man als ehrfurchterbietend und gleichzeitig durchtränkt von unerschütterlicher Ruhe bezeichnen. Sie ist ein Zeugnis der enormen Selbstbeherrschungskräfte, zu denen Karajan in der Lage war. Hans Fritsche, der Leiter der Rundfunkabteilung im damaligen Propagandaministerium, wäre vielleicht gut beraten gewesen, wenn er den trickreichen Bestrebungen Karajans nach einer Neuaufnahme der ersten drei Sätze aus Bruckners 8. Sinfonie (diesmal in Stereo) zugestimmt hätte. Wie dem auch immer sei und was alles gewesen wäre wenn - ich halte es auf jeden Fall beim Hören dieses Finalsatzes, insbesondere der Anfangspassage, für nicht unmöglich, daß bei so manchem erfahrenen Hörer angesichts dieser 65 Jahre alten Aufzeichnung schlicht und spontan die Kinnlade nach unten klappen würde.

Kurz vor dieser Aufnahme in Berlin hatte Karajan noch ein denkwürdiges Erlebnis in der Krypta von Sankt Florian (Österreich) , einem Kloster bei Linz, das nach dem Willen Hitlers der ein Liebhaber der Musik Bruckners war, in einen Brucknerschrein verwandelt werden sollte-ähnlich wie Bayreuth für Wagner stand. Nach einer Probe der 8. Sinfonie für ein Konzert vor den höchsten Vertretern des Reiches ging der Reichsrundfunkangestellte und Leiter des Projektes « Linzer Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » Heinrich Glasmeier mit ihm in die Krypta des Klosters, wo die sterblichen Überreste Bruckners bestattet sind. « Sie befinden sich jetzt genau unter der Stelle, wo das Orchester spielen wird » , sagte der Mann. « Bruckner hat seine 8. Sinfonie niemals selber hören können (was nicht stimmt, Anm. der Autors) . Sie haben nun die Möglichkeit, sie für ihn zu spielen. Ich lasse sie jetzt zehn Minuten mit ihm allein. » Er schloß die Tür und ließ Karajan dort im Dunkeln zurück. Mit der Ausstrahlung der 7. Sinfonie Bruckners-Hitlers Lieblingsinfonie- als letzte Sendung der Reichsrundfunkgesellschaft endete wenige Monate später die Geschichte des Deutschen Reiches und der Zweite Weltkrieg.

A History of Audio Engineering and Magnetic Recording Before 1943

Heinz Thiele chaired a session on « Audio History and Technology » at the 94th AES Convention in Berlin, in March 1993. 12 papers were read, and a magnetic tape Stereo recording from 1943 was played to demonstrate the progress of the technology up to that date.

Introduction to the Session (Heinz H. K. Thiele)

The 1st stereophonic recording with 2 separate channels on 1 magnetic tape were made in 1943. This was planned and executed by members of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG) , in Berlin. The recorder consisted of an AEG Magnetophone K7 tape transport, equipped with 2 track recording and reproducing heads, 2 V7b recording amplifiers modified for ac-bias, and 2 V5 reproducing amplifiers. 3 Neumann condenser microphones were used for the sound pick-up.

With that technology and equipment, excellent frequency response, non-linear distortion, and dynamic range were achieved. Approximately 200 recordings, mainly of Classical music, were made at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . Only 5 of these recordings remain in existence today ; the others could not be found after World War II.

50 years ago, consumer stereo reproducers did not exist, and only monophonic radio transmission was possible. However, play-back equipment could be set-up so that the stereophonic recordings could be played, for example, in hospitals. On the occasion of the 50 year anniversary of this important step in magnetic recording, the AES 94th Convention presented and described these historic recordings. A live play-back of the recordings took place at the end of the historical session.

In the 12 paper presentations, the authors showed the development of magnetic audio recording and storage technology to 1943, beginning in the United States and continuing with audio technology in Berlin. The authors spoke about the 1st principles and the resulting components of magnetic recorders, which led to astonishing results even from today's point of view. Historical equipment, apparatus, and components were exhibited during the convention in conjunction with this session.

Audio Technology in the United States to 1943 and its Relationship to Magnetic Recording (Mark Clark)

This paper reviewed the history of the development of audio technology in the United States from its origins in Alexander Graham Bell's telephone to the War-time work of the American electronics industry. It includes a comprehensive review of American contributions, including developments in electronic amplifiers, microphones, loudspeakers, and phonographic, optical, and magnetic recorders. The paper placed these technical developments in the overall context of American developments in audio engineering during this period, and showed how social and economic factors retarded the growth of magnetic recording technology in the United States.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Microphones (Ernst Weiß)

The history of Berlin of the past 100 years shows a great many names, inventions, and developments in the fields of science, fine-art, and technology. This also refers to audio with regard to telephone, film, disk records, radio, and television. For the electroacoustic transmission, the microphone is the 1st link of a long chain. The presentation addressed the contributions made in Berlin, from 1880 through 1943, up to the development of the transducer. Were discussed : the simple carbon granule microphone, the Reisz microphone, the rf-condenser microphone, the kathodophone, the ribbon microphone, and the condenser microphones with dc polarization.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Development of Vacuum Tubes (Manfred Krause)

In 1908, Robert von Lieben invented the Electronic Relais, a bulb in which an electric current could be modulated by a grid electrode. Soon, the new principle was improved upon. During the 2nd decade of the 20th Century, the process of developing electron tubes for radio transmitters and receivers was amazing. Twin and triple systems connected internally in 1 bulb were the beginning of integrated circuits, used in amplifiers and receivers. By improving the performance stability tubes, more complex electronics problems could be solved.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Amplifiers (Klaus Harder)

The development of audio amplifier techniques from the beginning (for example the Lieben 1 tube amplifier) to the amplifiers of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG V5 ; RRG V 7b) was explained by specific examples. The special tasks, the basic functional principles, as well as the date and the circumstances of the applications were explained.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Headphones and Loudspeakers (Martin Schildbach)

In 1877, Werner von Siemens invented the electronic acoustic transducer based on the electrodynamic principle - according to the principle of the plunger coil generally applied today. Initially, the transducer was used as a telephone receiver. With the appearance of power amplifiers, around 1920, the Siemens laboratories began to manufacture a number of different designs, which eventually gave rise to the loudspeaker combination Euronor of Klangfilm GmbH, in 1937. Other trend-setting loudspeakers by Berlin inventors worthy of mention include the electroacoustic Statophon by Hans Vogt, dating from 1921, and the O 15 with coaxial bass and treble chassis, by Hans Eckmiller, used at « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » Studios, from 1943 onward.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Recording and Playing Equipment (Werner Hinz)

Around the turn of the 20th Century, Emile Berliner's phonograph record, parallel to Thomas Edison's cylinder, had established a firm footing all over the world. What had originally been a curiosity could be found in millions of homes. However, apart from the name « Berliner » and the fact that numerous firms were producing both cylinders and disks and players in large quantities in Berlin, the city took no part in the promotion of this new entertainment medium. It was only in the special utilization of the phonograph record as the sound carrier for the acoustic accompaniment of « living pictures » (as movies were called in their early beginnings) , that original ideas began to emerge from the German capital.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Optical Sound (Jürgen Ristow)

Optical sound track recording has a history of over 100 years. A survey of the fundamental steps of progress was given. The landmarks described included : the variable-density technique by Ruhmer ; the technology and techniques of the Triegon system and its importance to the following development ; the foundation of the Klangfilm GmbH by Siemens and AEG ; and the Eurocard-recorder and the Klarton voiceless system. The origins of the analog stereophonic optical sound were discussed.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : Magnetic Sound Activities (Heinz H. K. Thiele)

In 1900, the Berlin company Mix & Genest began manufacturing magnetic sound recorders. The further development of Poulsen's Telegraphon did not take place until tube amplifiers became available in the early 1920's. Typical Berlin recorders, all of them with information carriers made of steel, were the Vox dictating machine, the Stille SEP MAG transport, the Echophone Dailygraph, and the Lorenz Stahlton-Bandmaschine (Steel-tone-Tapemachine) . In 1935, the AEG Magnetophon KI started the magnetic tape era and by introducing ac biasing, in 1940, and 2 channel stereophonic technology, in 1943, a previously unknown reproduction quality was obtained.

Acoustical and Recording Techniques of the 1st Broadcasting Studios in Germany (Ernst-Joachim Voelker)

The 1st official radio transmission in Germany took place in October 1923, broadcast from a small studio which was acoustically prepared on a temporary basis with horse blankets, crumpled silk paper, and curtains. For the recording, a Reiss microphone was used, as well as a VOX phonograph which irradiated the sound via a trumpet directly into the microphone. The VOX building at « Postdamer-Platz » , in Berlin, was full of studios with different acoustical properties, such as the so-called Schaeffer tent. In 1931, the Broadcasting House (« Haus des Rundfunks ») was opened with new studios and the 1st large recording studio for Symphony Orchestras. The 1st microphone was that of Reiss, in 1864. Together with the telephone of Graham Bell, the 1st acoustical transmission took place when the Eiffel Tower was completed in Paris, in 1881. Recording and transmission techniques, sound absorption and sound-proofing, cinemas, and the 1st radio studios were described as well as the work of the architects, artist and technicians who opened the way for the new media : radio.

Walter Weber's Technical Innovation at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (Friedrich Engel)

Abstract

Walter Weber (1907-1944) was one of the highly-innovative engineers at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG, or German Broadcasting Company) . Judging from today's vantage point, his most important contribution to the development of audio technology was the implementation (not the invention) of high-frequency biasing in practice. With this single stroke, magnetic recording became the most favourable method in sound recording, both in terms of reliability and quality. Subsequently, Weber combined magnetic tape recording and stereophony, reflecting the advanced state of recording technology at « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » , at the time.

The « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » (RRG) was founded in Berlin, in 1925, and existed for 20 years, the last 12 of these as the official propaganda organ for the 3rd « Reich » . In spite of this, however, artistic and, in particular, technical heights were attained in Berlin that determined the future of radio in Germany long after 1945. The « technical side » took the new task of presenting artistically important productions to a non-homogeneous audience surprisingly seriously. The cooperative efforts of both artistically interested technicians and technically open-minded program production staffs was certainly one of the finest legacies of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » .

A scientist noted for his « extraordinary breadth of knowledge and great musical talent » joined the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » in 1930 : Hans Joachim von Braunmühl, later to become the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » Electroacoustic Laboratories Chief Engineer.

Shortly after joining the firm, he brought a young engineer he had met at the Siemens und Halske AG Central Laboratory, Walter Weber, to work with him. For the next 14 years, the 2 men's cooperative efforts would prove to be unusually productive. Looking back, it is hard to determine how much of the intensive efforts were specifically attributable to one man or the other. We must assume, though, that von Braunmühl's repeated assertions that Weber was responsible for the development of the Magnetophon were, indeed, true.

Walter Weber was born in Gelsenkirchen, in 1907. He received his initial technical training from 1925 to 1927 at the « Ingenieur-Akademie » in Oldenburg. After 2 years with Siemens und Halske, he transferred to the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . His education continued parallel to his regular duties, and he completed his O-Levels by Easter, 1932, before studying 3 semesters at the Charlottenburg Technical College and 4 semesters at the University of Berlin. In 1938, he was awarded his doctorate, having been mentored by the respected acoustic scientist Friedrich Trendelenburg. (1) Von Braunmühl described Weber's dissertation as « an especially valuable work that gained the attention of many colleagues » .

Initial Work at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft »

What appears to be the beginning of a promising career, such as development of the dual tone measurement method and publishing the article, « Disturbances Caused by Non-Linear Distortion » , (2) were really only 2 of Weber's many efforts on behalf of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » . The latter is of particular interest due to the difficulties arising from the subjective nature of the topic. In 1935, Weber developed an condenser microphone with switchable (3) omni-directional and cardioid directional characteristics that would later be built by the Berlin company, Neumann. (4) He may have developed the measurement techniques used in his dissertation at that time. It is easy to imagine that the team of von Braunmühl and Weber was only able to complete its next project in 1936 after, as they reported, « many nights of too little sleep » : Their book, « Introduction to Applied Acoustics, Especially Pertaining to New Problems in Sound Measurement, Transmission and Recording » (5) would « soon become the standard text for everyone working in broadcast technology » .

Chapter 5, « The Sound Recording Process » , closes with the following prophetic words :

« It has recently become possible to replace expensive and heavy steel tape with a film-like sound carrier backed with a magnetizable coating. It would appear that simultaneous improvements in the (new) tape quality and reductions in the size of the apparatus will permit magnetic sound recording to be used for new tasks.»

These words basically set Weber's efforts into motion for the next decade.

The Sound Recording Methods at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft »

It should be remembered that, from the earliest days of radio, programmers were aware of the advantages that recording offered. Von Braunmühl listed the most important uses :

To record rehearsals to instruct performers concerning errors in their presentation.

To check reports prior to broadcast, especially for censorship purposes.

To broadcast programs at sites without program lines.

To play-back performances at times when the majority of listeners can hear them in stead of at the pre-determined time of performance.

To make better use of prominent performers who have other commitments during the primary listening times.

To repeat broadcasts which, due to their importance, deserve to be broadcast several times.

To exchange programs with other broadcast organizations by shipping sound carriers instead of requiring land lines.

To archive valuable recordings for future generations. (6)

The pressure on technicians to discover an ideal means of recording was correspondingly powerful. None of the then-known processes (wax records, the Lorenz « Stahlton-Bandmaschine » - steel tape machine -, sound foil, sound film and the lab-tested mechanical-optical Philips-Miller procedure) were adequate.

Magnetic Sound Recording at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » : The Beginnings

In 1936, the scepticism shown towards magnetic recording was understandable ; the few steel wire machines on the market barely achieved dictation quality. The steel tape machine, « Stahlton-Bandmaschine » , built in 1934 by Semi Joseph Begun, at the Berlin company C. Lorenz, (7) provided broadcast quality, but its enormous weight and horrendously expensive steel tapes, imported from Sweden, far out-stripped the operational advantages over wax records. A playing time of 30 minutes and less sensitivity to vibration were desired, but not on those terms. (8)

The « Magnetophon » was introduced at the German Broadcast Exhibition in Berlin, in 1935. It was a co-development of AEG, Berlin and IG Farben, Ludwigshafen, today better-known as BASF. (9) The relatively light and inexpensive « Magnetophon K I » (10) machine and the grey « Magnetophonband Type C » (costing only 1/7 the price of steel tape) naturally caught radio's attention and was tested in the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » 's laboratories. But, the newcomer was marketed as a dictation machine and its loud background noise and obvious distortion, despite use of Poulsen's DC biasing, caused the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » to reject it as unacceptable. This remained the case till 1936, when further developments in tape and machine made a 2nd test worthwhile. In 1938, the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » was the world's 1st broadcaster to introduce the Magnetophon into service on a test basis. The sound quality, at the time, was approximately equal to that of sound foil. « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » and AEG together developed the broadcast machine HTS, « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » designation R 22, based upon the Magnetophon K 4.

Unfortunately, a large portion of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » technical files were destroyed after the war so that the final decision in favor of Magnetophon cannot be reconstructed in detail. Von Braunmühl reported, however, that Walter Weber was the « driving force, involved in all advances » of development, something confirmed by a long list of patents and patent applications which accompany the Magnetophon's decade-long development process.

Improvements in Magnetophon Dynamic Range

Of primary importance was Weber's attempt, in late 1937, to improve dynamic range, and thus quality, independent of AEG. He assumed that the uneven magnetic tape coating (both mechanically and magnetically) would cause irregular fluctuations in the magnetic flux in the record head, inducing unwelcome signals and, therefore, increasing the noise. By bridging an active record head to a dummy head (Figure 2) , the negative feedback voltage was to be returned to the recording circuit via an amplifier. (11) The resulting 3 dB noise reduction was certainly no breakthrough. However, by also factory-smoothing the tape coating surface, another 3 dB were gained, creating a more acceptable 6 dB improvement.

Negative feedback and push-pull processes are common means of improving amplifiers' efficiency. In this vein, Fritz Pfleumer, the actual inventor of magnetic tape, had already tried recording using a push-pull technique although without noticeable success. (12) The most creative mind on the AEG Magnetophon team, Eduard Schüller, replaced the unreliable transducer used by Pfleumer with a 2-track version of his own invention, the ring head which had the special advantage that both gaps were exactly aligned. (13)

The tape width was now divided into 2 recording tracks (see also : Figure 7) .

Using the 2-track ring head, Weber attempted something analogous to modern loudspeaker construction : he divided the frequency range to be recorded into 2 bands and recorded each component on a separate tape track. (14) This had the advantage, to use modern terminology, of allowing him to adjust (DC) bias individually and minimize noise by adjusting the equalization. In any case, as Ernst Augustin, Weber's later partner, dryly commented, what mattered was, « the desired result, not the means needed to achieve it » .

Nonetheless, the Magnetophon had the potential to both expand and to simplify radio broadcast operations while making them more reliable, in the process. Attractive advantages were :

The 20 minute playing time of a 400 gram (approximately, 1 pound) tape compared to a wax record weighing 10 times as much, but with a playing time of only 4 minutes 30 seconds. Additionally, these recordings could, with good conscience, only be played once (and even then, only with an electromagnetic pick-up co-developed by von Braunmühl in 1932) : (15)

The ability to immediately play-back a recording, even directly from the play-back head (although this was never mentioned) .

The re-usability of magnetic tape by erasing unusable or unneeded recordings.

Easy editing, as with films, to remove or re-arrange portions of the recording.

Still, as Weber wrote :

« The process was not especially well received and its use in broadcasting was, therefore, low. The Magnetophon's high-level of background noise made all other advantages moot. » (16)

« High Frequency Treatment » Improves Dynamic Range

Perhaps, it was this challenge that drove Walter Weber, a typical research-oriented personality, to re-examine experiments with negative feedback, probably in mid-April 1940. At some point during the series of experiments, a minor accident occurred in the laboratory ; apparently a simple mistake, otherwise easily corrected and forgotten. Its unexpected effect, however, was noticed, analyzed and placed into practice by the creative genius. Weber described it thus :

« While experimenting with negative feedback, the test circuit began to oscillate under high degrees of feedback. When oscillation began, a dramatic decrease in background noise was observed. The 1st experiment (noise reduction using high frequencies) was conducted merely combining high and low frequencies together at the recording head. It was expected that the low frequencies would be missing from the recording, but this was not the case. On the contrary, the lower frequencies were very clean and recorded with a much lower noise level. Tests showed a noise reduction of 10 dB with a non-linear harmonic distortion coefficient reduction from 10 % to 3 % with the same voltage on the play-back head as reference. This phenomenon was further developed and resulted in an entirely new recording technique. Expanding the frequency curve to 10 kHz, a dynamic range of 60 dB was reached with a distortion factor of 1.5 % at 1,000 Hz. » (17)

This means : Weber 1st found an amazing improvement in « noise reduction » of about 10 dB. Furthermore, HF biasing dramatically improved the tape's recording properties at high audio frequencies, giving the opportunity to redesign the record equalization circuit resulting in a further improvement in dynamics of about 10 dB. With DC bias, the frequency response of the recording amplifier above about 3 kHz had to show a sloping characteristic. Using AC biasing, a part of the necessary high-frequency gain can be carried-out by the recording amplifier. This reduces the amount of high-frequency gain in the play-back amplifier (which inevitably raises the tape noise, too) , resulting in improved dynamics.

For Weber and his supportive supervisor, von Braunmühl, it was clear in July, 1940, that they had so dramatically improved the Magnetophon, « that play-back quality now far exceeds that of any other recording process » . Within 10 months, the 1st prototype was ready for operation. This delay was not caused solely by the outbreak of the Second World War the year before. Ist, the positive operational conditions had to be determined ; in other words, methods of establishing the optimum bias and adjusting the equalization had to be found. In any event, these initial ideas in cooperation with AEG became the basis for a new generation of machines, the tape recorder R 22 and its accompanying amplifiers, and tape recorder R 26, as mentioned elsewhere. (19) The result :

« No other operational work process has ever been so quickly and enthusiastically accepted, in particular, by the programming staff. »

By 1944, German broadcasting « is unthinkable without high frequency Magnetophons » .

Thus, it was 3 men from Berlin who were primarily responsible for perfecting the magnetic tape recording process : Eduard Schüller of AEG built the machines ; the native Berliner Friedrich Matthias developed and made the tape at IG Farben in Ludwigshafen ; and Walter Weber, from the Berlin « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » , was responsible for creating 4 decades of matchless recording quality thanks to the high frequency biasing process.

Patents and 1st Applications

In February, 1941, von Braunmühl and Weber signed a licensing agreement with AEG Berlin for a total of 6 patents. (20) Among these was an idea for magnetic sound recording in place of optical sound on sprocketed film, a forerunner of later magnetic film recording techniques. The most valuable suggestion proved, understandably, to be « High Frequency Treatment of Magnetogramm Carriers » , later to become Patent DE 743 411. (21) Thus, it was AEG that presented the « new magnetic sound recording process for especially noise-free, high quality sound recording and play-back » at the Berlin movie theatre equipped with the best PA system, « Ufa-Palast am Zoo » , on June 10, 1941. The trade press wrote enthusiastically about the recording quality (« The highest quality electrical recording process it will result in the complete revolution of sound recording ») and spoke of a technical procedure for « high frequency treatment of the sound carrier during the recording » or « high frequency influence of the sound carrier » . Richard Schmidt (FTZ, Filmtechnische Zentralstelle) was to report on the « Applications of the Process in Sound Film » at the Ufa-Palast, in which he would explain :

« It's main purpose is in the production of primary (Master) tapes. These tapes and the operational advantages of magnetic recording help make film production easier. » (22)

The « HF Patent » DE 743 411

The chaotic natural law requiring everything worthwhile to be invented twice is confirmed repeatedly in the history of magnetic tape technology. The magnetic recording process was 1st formulated in 1878 by Oberlin Smith (23) and 1st demonstrated 20 years later by Valdemar Poulsen, when he also mentioned a method to produce something like the modern magnetic tape (1898) . (24) It was Pfleumer, however, who received German Patent DE 500 900 (25) (« Lautschriftträger » , « Sound Recording Carrier » , filed in 1928) in 1930 but whose patent was nullified in 1936 when it was discovered that an American named O'Neill (26) had patented the basic idea (although in a non-workable form) 5 weeks earlier than his German counterpart.

It should come as no surprise, then, that, strictly speaking, by 1940 « High Frequency Treatment » was hardly a new idea. Without going into details, mention should be made of the American patents awarded to Carlson - Carpenter (27) and Alverson (28) (although the latter recommended using modulation instead of heterodyning) . The Japanese Igarashi, Ishikawa and Nagai were also awarded a patent in 1938. (29) For this reason, it is no longer possible to determine how HF Patent DE 743 411 could have been awarded, again. In all probability, Weber made his discovery independently and 1st learned of these predecessors during the patent approval process. Unlike the others, though, Weber and von Braunmühl were the 1st to recognize the true potential of their findings, as can be seen by the rapid series of patent applications in wide-ranging areas during the fall of 1940. 2ndly, and more important, they did what was necessary to make their developments quickly and effectively practical to as wide an range of users as possible. It is, in this respect, that historians see their most valuable efforts.

The irony of technical history is such that still another man of comparable importance, Marvin Camras in the United States also invented the concept of HF biasing, this time in late 1941. (30)

Synchronization of Magnetic Tape and Film

Working together with Ernst Augustin, who had left the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » to join the TOBIS film company, Weber continued to explore synchronizing magnetic tape sound with film. This led to 2 patent applications, in 1943. Unlike previous magnetic film recording machines, which had 1st been patented in 1941, (32) the new attempts were with non-perforated material using « an optical, magnetic, or mechanical carrier frequency from the sound medium » to maintain synchronization. Drawings show a magnetic tape with light and dark stripes printed on the backing, (33) much like tapes still used in the 1970's to synchronize tape machines. The recommendation that « magnetic impulses recorded alongside and in addition to the actual sound recording » can clearly be seen as the precursor of the pilot tone recording process. (34)

Stereophonic Recording

As early as June, 1941, a report concerning the Ufa-Palast presentation mentioned that the high frequency Magnetophon process could also be used to produce stereo sound and, according to UFA notes, (35) the « Reichs-

Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » was able to present stereo recordings in late 1941. An American report made after the war (36) appears to confirm this. The report indicates that the machine used was an « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » R 22a with recording amplifiers (in pairs) V 5 and play-back amplifiers V 7b. Judging by the meagre information available, (37) however, it was not until 1942-1943 that real stereo-capable machines were operational, based on a Magnetophon K 7 with a synchronous capstan motor and 2-channel recording and play-back amplifiers using separate power supplies. After initial in-house presentations of « space depth recordings » at the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » , in January, 1943, these presentations were made public at the end of April, (38) simultaneously demonstrating the wide spectrum loudspeakers newly developed by the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » Engineer, Hans Eckmiller.

The critical components of the stereo Magnetophon were the 2-track heads that Weber had AEG develop from the « twin head » he had used in his 2-track recording experiments. To reduce crosstalk, a 1 millimeter separating track was required, created by building a brass strip into the head. This meant that the 6.5 millimeters wide tape (a little bit wider than quarter inch) was then divided into 2 tracks of 2.75 millimeters. While a full-track recording at tape speed of 77 centimeters per second (30.2 ips) offered a dynamic range of 60 dB, this dropped to 42 dB on stereo recordings, although the surviving « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » stereo productions sound subjectively much better than the figures would indicate. Of the approximately 300 « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » stereo recordings made (mainly Symphonies, Operas and so on) , only a very few tapes still exist. This acoustic equivalent of the lost « Amber Room » (39) is another of the culturally painful costs of the Second World War.

During the course of the War, the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » laboratory was moved to Kosten, near Posen. The employees there were stunned to receive the following notification on 20 July, 1944 :

« At the peak of his successful endeavours, our Chief Engineer Doctor Walter Weber was suddenly and unexpectedly torn from us by death on the 18th of July. A vigilant spirit, a fighter for fundamental knowledge in science as well as in life, a real comrade and true friend was, abruptly and without warning, taken from his desk and laboratory at the age of 37, his notebooks still open and his machinery still running. » (40)

How did this tragedy occur ? Following a meeting on the evening of July 18, Weber went for a swim but, on leaving the pool, suffered a heart attack and collapsed. A doctor was called immediately but could do nothing to save the stricken man. In a eulogy printed in the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » in-house magazine, Hans Joachim von Braunmühl described his colleague as a universally respected man of honourable character and remarkable humility :

« During 12 years of creative efforts, he carried-out an incredible amount of scientific research and technical development. These accomplishments alone already made his name nationally and internationally renowned, but it was especially in recent years that his unusually prolific idea of introducing high frequency biasing to magnetic recording led to dramatic improvements in electro-acoustical technology. Doctor Weber's name will forever remain tied with the high frequency Magnetophon, currently the highest quality means of recording voice and music. Its superb sound quality will reach circles far outside those of science, where this new means (of sound reproduction) will be implemented for artistic purposes. » (41)

Since the technical records of the « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » have, for the most part, been lost, the preceding presentation was based primarily on such publications as patent reports and articles printed in the « Reichs-Rundfunk » Magazine as well as on files from the AEG and BASF archives. In particular, I am especially grateful for the generous permission to use the personal files of Doctor Jörg Weber, Walter Weber's youngest son.

Early Stereo Recordings on Magnetic Tape (1943-1944) and their State of Preservation (Dietrich Schüller)

The age, the historical and the artistic relevance, and the specific history of « Reichs-Rundfunk-Gesellschaft » tapes draw immediate attention to their preserved state. This paper described these tapes within the general framework of magnetic tape preservation. In addition, the paper developed perspectives for more intensive studies into the field of preservation and rejuvenation of historical tape materials.

Audio Technology in Berlin to 1943 : 50 Years of Stereo Recording on Magnetic Tapes (Klaus Lang)

Almost exactly 50 years before the 1993 Convention, on April 6, 1943, the 1st 2-channel recording had been made in the « Sender Freies Berlin » (SFB) concert-hall. This documentary recording had been lost and has now been returned to Berlin. Far more important stereophonic recordings from 1944 are Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 5 (with Walter Gieseking) and the final movement of Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony (conducted by the young Herbert von Karajan). Helmut Krueger, the former Sound Engineer talked about the origin of these tracks as well as Hans-Ludwig Feldgen, the Sound Engineer of the first Stereophonic Live-Broadcast.

La Stéréophonie

Clément Ader eut semble-t-il, en 1er, l'idée d'une diffusion binaurale, en 1881. En 1884, 7 ans seulement après l'invention du téléphone, le théatrophone permettait à des auditeurs d'écouter, avec un écouteur par oreille et un micro par écouteur, la musique jouée à l'Opéra Garnier, à Paris, depuis un bâtiment voisin.

Le terme stéréophonie apparaît en France, en 1924. « Elle sera pour l'oreille ce que les yeux attendent du cinéma en relief » écrit, en 1930, l'ingénieur du son Georges-Clément Lévy.

En 1931, Alan Blumlein conçoit en Angleterre le 1er système de son binaural, avec 2 canaux. Il prend un brevet pour une prise-de-son par paire de micros à directivité en 8, installés au même point ; l'enregistrement sur 1 seule piste de disque avec les 2 signaux à 45°, de part et d'autre de la verticale ; et le matricage des signaux permet d'obtenir des signaux de somme, monophonique, et de différence gauche-droite. Tous ces principes seront à la base de la stéréophonie, telle qu'elle se développe après la Seconde Guerre mondiale.

Outre-Atlantique, à la même époque, les équipes des laboratoires Bell travaillent sur des systèmes multi-canaux de perspective auditive. Ces travaux incluent une évaluation psycho-acoustique de la localisation des sons.

À la fin des années 1930, la stéréophonie, avec d'autres qualificatifs techniques que le public est peu en mesure de comprendre, comme super-hétérodyne et contre-réaction, est un argument de vente pour les récepteurs de radio ; ces appareils dirigent certaines fréquences sur des haut-parleurs orientés dans une direction différente des autres.

En 1940, les studios « Walt Disney Pictures » créent et montrent en stéréophonie 3 canaux plus 1 de contrôle le film musical « Fantasia ». Cependant, le système stéréophonique baptisé « Fantasound » exigeait une longue installation du matériel, les projecteurs ordinaires n'étant en rien compatibles avec le système, et les salles étant équipées d'un seul haut-parleur derrière l'écran. Après une tournée de démonstration dans 14 salles, Disney distribua une version monophonique qui devint celle de référence.

La diffusion des électrophones remplaçant les anciens gramophones mécanique rend possible le disque microsillon, qui devient stéréophonique en 1958 suivant le système « Blumlein », avec les disques « Decca » et « Erato ». Le disque est mono-compatible grâce au déphasage des canaux, les électrophones monophoniques sensibles uniquement au déplacement latéral de la pointe transcrivant ainsi la somme des canaux droite et gauche. Les 1ers enregistrements stéréophoniques sur disque microsillon ayant fait date dans la distribution au grand public furent ceux du chef Antal Dorati, à la toute fin des années 1950, pour la maison « Mercury » . Ce dernier enregistra l'Ouverture solennelle 1812 avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Minneapolis, en 1958, puis « la Victoire de Wellington » avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres, en 1960. Dans ces 2 cas, la stéréophonie permet de rendre l'effet obtenu en concert d'opposition entre les 2 camps des guerres napoléoniennes. Ces 2 enregistrements stéréophoniques ont été effectués par les ingénieurs du son de « Philips Phonografic Industries » .

Clément Ader demonstrated the 1st 2-channel audio system in Paris, in 1881, with a series of telephone transmitters connected from the stage of the Paris Opera to a suite of rooms at the Paris Electrical Exhibition, where listeners could hear a live transmission of performances through receivers for each ear. Scientific American reported :

« Every one who has been fortunate enough to hear the telephones at the " Palais de l'Industrie " has remarked that, in listening with both ears at the 2 telephones, the sound takes a special character of relief and localization which a single receiver cannot produce. This phenomenon is very curious, it approximates to the theory of binauricular audition, and has never been applied, we believe, before to produce this remarkable illusion to which may almost be given the name of auditive perspective. »

This 2-channel telephonic process was commercialized in France, from 1890 to 1932, as the « Théâtrophone » and in England, from 1895 to 1925, as the « Electrophone » . Both were services available by coin-operated receivers at hotels and cafés, or by subscription to private homes.

Modern stereophonic technology was invented in the 1930's by British engineer Alan Blumlein at « EMI » (Electric & Musical Industries) , who patented stereo records, stereo films, and also surround sound.

In early 1931, Blumlein and his wife were at a local cinema. The sound reproduction systems of the early « talkies » invariably only had a single set of speakers - which could lead to the somewhat disconcerting effect of the actor being on one side of the screen whilst his voice appeared to come from the other. Blumlein declared to his wife that he had found a way to make the sound follow the actor across the screen.

The genesis of these ideas is uncertain, but he explained them to Isaac Shoenberg, in the late summer of 1931. His earliest notes on the subject are dated 25 September 1931, and his patent had the title « Improvements in and relating to Sound-transmission, Sound-recording and Sound-reproducing Systems » . The application was dated 14 December 1931, and was accepted on 14 June 1933 as United Kingdom patent number : 394,325.

Whereas work led by Harvey Fletcher at Bell Labs at about the same time considered sound systems using multiple channels, Blumlein always aimed at a system with just 2 channels.

The patent covered many ideas in stereo, some of which are used today and some not. Some 70 claims include :

A « shuffling » circuit, which aimed to preserve the directional effect when sound from a spaced pair of microphones was reproduced via stereo headphones instead of a pair of loudspeakers.

The use of a coincident pair of velocity microphones with their axes at right angles to each other, which is still known as a « Blumlein Pair » .

Recording 2 channels in the single groove of a record using the 2 groove walls at right angles to each other and 45 degrees to the vertical.

A stereo disc-cutting head.

Using hybrid transformers to matrix between left and right signals and sum and difference signals.

He began binaural experiments as early as 1933, and the 1st stereo discs were cut later the same year, 25 years before that method became the standard for stereo phonograph discs. These discs used the 2 walls of the groove at right angles in order to carry the 2 channels.

Much of the development work on this system for cinematic use did not reach completion until 1935. In a few short test films (most notably, « Trains At Hayes Station » and, « The Walking & Talking Film ») , Blumlein's original intent of having the sound follow the actor was fully realized.

In 1934, Blumlein recorded Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Jupiter » Symphony conducted by Sir Thomas Beecham at the « EMI » Abbey Road Studio, using his vertical-lateral technique.

The vertical-lateral system was conceived by Alan Blumlein, in 1931, and was patented in the United Kingdom, the same year, but was not reduced to actual practice as was a requirement for patenting in the United States and elsewhere at that time. (Blumlein was killed in a plane crash while testing radar equipment during WWII, and he, therefore, never reduced the system to actual practice through both a recording and a reproducing means.) « EMI » cut the 1st stereo test discs using the system, in 1933, but it was not applied commercially until a quarter of a Century later, and by another company (Westrex division of Litton Industries Inc. , as a successor to Western Electric Company) , and dubbed « Stereo-Disk » . Stereo sound provides a more natural listening experience, since the spatial location of the source of a sound is (at least, in part) reproduced.

In the United States, Harvey Fletcher of Bell Laboratories was also investigating techniques for stereophonic recording and reproduction. One of the techniques investigated was the « wall of sound » , which used an enormous array of microphones hung in a line across the front of an orchestra. Up to 80 microphones were used, and each fed a corresponding loudspeaker, placed in an identical position, in a separate listening room. Several stereophonic test recordings, using 2 microphones connected to 2 styli cutting 2 separate grooves on the same wax disc, were made with Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra at Philadelphia's Academy of Music, in March 1932. The 1st (made on March 12, 1932) , of Alexander Scriabin's « Prometheus : Poem of Fire » , is the earliest known surviving intentional stereo recording.

The Philadelphia Orchestra conducted by Leopold Stokowski began performing live on NBC's radio network in 1929, but Stokowski was unhappy with the fidelity of these early broadcasts, and approached physicist Harvey Fletcher at Bell Laboratories seeking ways to improve the transmissions. Bell Labs had been involved with developing improved sound recording and reproduction since 1915, and was willing to record Stokowski and the Orchestra among other test subjects, and so, in 1931 and 1932, 100 experimental high-fidelity, long playing, and stereophonic recordings of the Philadelphia Orchestra were produced. These recordings, being excerpted passages rather than full works, were experimental and not intended for commercial release at the time. However, over 40 years later, engineer Ward Marston transferred the original metal stampers to tape, and, in 1979, Bell Labs celebrated these early technological advances with a vinyl issue in 2 volumes. As part of this release, Stanford University hosted a special conference and received a commemorative box containing a metal part (of unknown origin, perhaps from the 1930's session, but more likely for one of the 1979 LP discs) .

Harvey Fletcher

The American physicist Harvey Fletcher was born on 11 September 1884 in Provo, Utah, and died on 23 July 1981 (after a stroke) . Known as the « father of stereophonic sound » he is credited with the invention of the audiometer and hearing aid. He is remembered as a trail-blazing investigator into the nature of speech and hearing, and for his numerous contributions in acoustics, electrical engineering, speech, medicine, music, atomic physics, sound pictures, and education.

Fletcher graduated from Brigham Young High-School, in 1904. He enrolled at Brigham Young University (BYU) and graduated, in 1907, with a bachelor's degree. As a graduate student at the University of Chicago, his dissertation research was on methods to determine the charge of an electron. This included the now famous oil drop experiment commonly attributed to his advisor and collaborator, Robert Andrews Millikan. Professor Millikan took sole credit, in return for Fletcher claiming full authorship on a related result for his dissertation. Fletcher's contributions were detail-oriented but necessary for a successful experiment, in which he incorporated, among other things, experience with projection lanterns. Millikan went on to win the 1923 Nobel Prize for Physics, in part for this work, and Fletcher kept the agreement a secret until his death.

Among the work that he is best known for are Fletcher's contributions to the theory of speech perception. He showed that speech features are usually spread over a wide frequency range, and developed the articulation index to approximately quantify the quality of a speech channel. He also developed the concepts of equal-loudness contours (commonly known as Fletcher-Munson curves) , loudness scaling and summation, and the critical band. As Director of Research at Bell Labs, he oversaw research in electrical sound recording, including more than 100 stereo recordings with conductor Leopold Stokowski in 1931-1932.

Much of his research is considered to be authoritative, and his books, « Speech and Hearing » and « Speech and Hearing in Communication » , are landmark treatises on the subject.

Doctor Fletcher was elected an honorary fellow of Acoustical Society of America, in 1949, the 2nd person to receive this honour after Thomas Edison, 20 years earlier. He was president of the American Society for Hard of Hearing, an honorary member of the American Otological Society and an honorary member of the Audio Engineering Society. In 1924, he was awarded the Louis E. Levy Medal for physical measurements of audition by the Franklin Institute. He was President of the American Physical Society which is the leading Physics Society in America. In 1937, he was elected vice-president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. He was a member of the National Academy of Sciences. He was also a member of the National Hearing Division Committee of Medical Sciences. He was given the Progress Medal Award by the American Academy of Motion Pictures, in Hollywood. For 8 years, he acted as National Councilor for the Ohio State University Research Foundation.

In 2010, Fletcher was honoured by BYU as the Founding Dean of the BYU College of Engineering (now, the Ira A. Fulton College of Engineering and Technology) .

Bell Laboratories gave a demonstration of 3-channel stereophonic sound on April 27, 1933, with a live transmission of the Philadelphia Orchestra from Philadelphia to Constitution Hall in Washington, D.C. over multiple Class A telephone lines. Leopold Stokowski, normally the orchestra's conductor, was present in Constitution Hall to control the sound mix. 5 years later, the same system would be expanded onto multi-channel film recording and used from the concert-hall in Philadelphia to the recording labs at Bell Labs, in New Jersey, in order to record Walt Disney's « Fantasia » (1940) in what Disney called : « Fantasound » .

Later that same year, Bell Labs also demonstrated binaural sound, at the Chicago World's Fair, in 1933, using a dummy with microphones instead of ears. The 2 signals were sent-out over separate AM station bands.

Utilizing selections recorded by the Philadelphia Orchestra, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski, intended for but not used in Walt Disney's « Fantasia » , the Carnegie Hall demonstration by Bell Laboratories, on April 9 and 10, 1940, used 3 huge speaker systems. Synchronization was achieved by making the recordings in the form of 3 motion picture soundtracks recorded on a single piece of film with a 4th track being used to regulate volume expansion.

This was necessary due to the limitations of dynamic range on optical motion picture film of the period, however the volume compression and expansion were not fully automatic, but were designed to allow manual studio « enhancement » ; i.e. , the artistic adjustment of overall volume and the relative volume of each track in relation to the others. Stokowski, who was always interested in sound reproduction technology personally participated in the « enhancement » of the sound, at the demonstration.

The speakers produced sound levels of up to 100 decibels, and the demonstration held the audience « spellbound, and at times not a little terrified » , according to one report. Sergei Rachmaninoff, who was present at the demonstration, commented that it was « marvellous » but « somehow unmusical because of the loudness » .

He said :

« Take that " Pictures at an Exhibition ", I didn't know what it was until they got well into the piece. Too much " enhancing ", too much Stokowski. »

In 1937, Bell Laboratories, in New York City, gave a demonstration of 2-channel stereophonic motion pictures, developed by Bell Labs and Electrical Research Products, Inc. Once again, conductor Leopold Stokowski was on hand to try-out the new technology, recording onto a special proprietary 9-track sound system at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, during the making of the movie « 100 Men and a Girl » for Universal Pictures, in 1937, after which the tracks were mixed-down to one for the final soundtrack. 1 year later, Metro-Goldwin-Mayer (MGM) started using 3 tracks instead of 1 to record the musical selections of movie soundtracks, and very quickly upgraded to 4. 1 track was used for dialogue, 2 for music, and 1 for sound effects. The purpose for this form of multi-track recording was to make mixing-down to a single optical track easier and was not intended to be a recording for stereophonic purposes. The very 1st 2-track recording MGM made (although released in mono) was « It Never Rains But What It Pours » by Judy Garland, recorded on June 21, 1938, for the movie « Love Finds Andy Hardy » .

Walt Disney began experimenting with multi-channel sound in the early 1930's. The 1st commercial motion picture to be exhibited with stereophonic sound was Walt Disney's « Fantasia » , released in November 1940, for which a specialized sound process (« Fantasound ») was developed. As in the Carnegie Hall demonstrations 6 months earlier, « Fantasound » used a separate film containing 4 optical sound tracks. 3 of the tracks were used to carry left, center and right audio, while the 4th track carried 3 tones which individually controlled the volume level of the other 3. The film was not a financial success, however, and, after 2 months of road-show exhibition in selected cities, its soundtrack was remixed into mono sound for general release. It was not until its 1956 re-release that stereo sound was restored to the film. In the early 1940's, composer-conductor Alfred Newman directed the construction of a sound stage equipped for multi-channel recording for 20th Century Fox studios. Several soundtracks from this era still exist in their multi-channel elements, some of which have been released on DVD, including « How Green Was My Valley » , « Anna and the King of Siam » , « The Day the Earth Stood Still » and « Sun Valley Serenade » which, along with Orchestra Wives, feature the only stereophonic recordings of the Glenn Miller Orchestra as it was during its heyday of the Swing Era.

The advent of multi-track magnetic tape and film recording made high-fidelity synchronized multi-channel recording more technically straightforward, though costly. By the early 1950's, all of the major studios were recording on 35 mm magnetic film for mixing purposes, and many of these so-called individual angles still survive, allowing for soundtracks to be remixed into Stereo or even Surround.

Thomas Edison had been recording in a hill-and-dale or vertically modulated format on his cylinders and discs since 1877, and Emile Berliner had been recording in a side-to-side or lateral format since shortly thereafter. Each format developed onto its own trajectory until the late-1920's when electric recording on disc, utilizing a microphone surpassed acoustic recording where the performer needed to shout or play very loudly into what basically amounted to a megaphone in reverse.

At that time, AM radio had been around for roughly a decade, and broadcasters were looking for both better materials from which to make phonograph records as well as a better format in which to record them to play over the narrow and thus inherently noisy radio channel. As radio had been playing the same shellacque discs available to the public, it was found that, even though the play-back system was now electric rather than acoustic, the surface noise on the disc would mask the music after just a few plays.

Enter Acetate Bakelite and Vinyl and Radio Broadcast Transcriptions. Once these considerably more quiet compounds were developed, it was discovered that the rubber-idler-wheel driven turntables of the period had a great deal of low-frequency rumble - but only in the lateral plane. So, even though with all other factors being equal, the lateral plane of recording on disc had the higher fidelity, it was decided to record vertically to produce higher-fidelity recordings on these new « silent-surface » materials, for 2 reasons : the increase in fidelity and the incompatibility with home phonographs which, with their lateral-only play-back systems, would only produce silence from a vertically modulated disc.

After 33-1/3 RPM recording had been perfected for the movies in 1927, the speed of radio program transcriptions was reduced to match, once again to inhibit play-back of the discs on normal home consumer equipment. Even though the stylus size remained the same as consumer records at either 3 millimeters or 2.7 millimeters, the disc size was increased from 12 inches to the same 16 inches as those used in early talking pictures in order to inhibit the practice even further. Now, not only could the records not be played on home equipment due to incompatible recording format and speed, they wouldn't even fit on the player either, which suited the copyright holders just fine.

During the same period, engineers got a bright idea. Split the signal into 2 parts, bass and treble, and record the treble on its own track near the edge of the disc in a lateral format so that there would be no high-frequency distortion, and then record the bass on its own track in a vertical fashion to get rid of the rumble. Unfortunately, vertical grooves take-up more space than lateral grooves ; so when the bass track was full, starting halfway through the disc and ending-up at the center, the treble track had a large amount of unused space at the end. The alternative was to record it at a wider pitch (i.e. lines-per-inch) in order to match-up with the bass track and keep both styli in the same place, limiting the playing time to slightly longer than a single even at 33-1/3 RPM on a 12 inch disc.

Another failed experiment in the late-1920's and early 1930's involved recording the left channel on the left side of the disc (when held vertically with its edge facing the user) and recording the right channel on the right side of the disc. These were manufactured on twin film-company recording lathes which ran in perfect sync with one another with no variation, and were capable of not only outside-in as well as inside-out recordings but also counter-clockwise as well as conventional clockwise recording by mounting the cutting head wrong-way-out with a special adapter. One master was recorded conventionally and the other was recorded counter-clockwise, each master was run separately through the plating process, lined-up to match, and subsequently mounted in a press. This recording method was later used to record counter-clockwise discs by the « Mattel » Toy Co. , for one of its answers to the GAF Talking View-Master in the mid- 1960's.

The dual-sided stereo disc was then played vertically, 1st in a system that featured 2 tone-arms on the same post facing one another and, later, on in an offset system where one tone-arm was placed conventionally and the other tone-arm was placed opposite - i.e. not only on the other side of the mechanism, but facing the other way as well so that both tone-arms could start at the edge and play to the center. But, even with playing the disc vertically in a rotating clamp, the same trouble was observed with keeping the 2 tone-arms in their respective synchronous revolutions. The system was developed further however and adapted so that a single tone-arm could play one side of a record or the other, in jukeboxes of the late-1930's and early 1940's.

5 years later, Bell Labs was experimenting with a 2-channel Lateral-Vertical system, where the left channel was recorded laterally and the right channel was recorded vertically, still utilizing a standard 3 millimeter 78-RPM groove, over 3 times larger than the modern LP stylus of the late-20th Century. The trouble with that was, once again, all the low-frequency rumble was in the left channel and all the high-frequency distortion was in the right channel. Over a quarter of a Century later, it was decided to tilt the recording head 45 degrees off to the right side so that both the low frequency rumble and high frequency distortion were shared equally by both channels, producing the 45/45 system we know today.

Stereo magnetic tape recording was demonstrated on standard 1/4 inch tape for the 1st time, in 1952, using 2 sets of recording and play-back heads, upside-down and offset from one another. 1 year later, « Remington Records » began recording a number of its sessions in stereo, including performances by Thor Johnson and the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

Later, that same year, more experimental stereo recordings were conducted with Leopold Stokowski and a group of New York studio musicians at RCA Victor Studios, in New York City. In February 1954, the label also recorded a performance of Hector Berlioz' Masterpiece « la Damnation de Faust » by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Charles Münch, the success of which led to the practice of regularly recording sessions in stereo.

Shortly afterwards, the last 2 public concerts directed by famed conductor Arturo Toscanini were recorded on stereophonic magnetic tape, however, they were not released as such until 1987 and 2007, respectively. In the United Kingdom, « Decca Records » began recording sessions in stereo in mid- 1954 and, by that time, even smaller labels in the United States such as « Concertapes » , « Bel Canto » and « Westminster » , along with major labels such as « RCA Victor » began releasing stereophonic recordings on 2-track prerecorded reel-to-reel magnetic tape, priced at twice or 3 times the cost of monaural recordings, which retailed for around $ 2.95 to $ 3.95 a piece for a standard monaural LP. Even 2-track monaural tape which had to be flipped over halfway through and carried exactly the same information as the monaural LP (but without the crackles and pops) were being sold for $ 6.95.

One has to understand that, in the United States, the average working man, in 1954, might be taking home $ 50 to $ 60 a week, if he was lucky, and paying $ 75 to $100 a month in rent for his 2-room apartment. Therefore, the price of a great deal of 2-track stereo tape recordings of the period being upwards of $ 12.95 to $ 18.95 a piece for a full-length album when the corresponding mono LP was only $ 3.95, would be prohibitive. In addition, the cost of the stereophonic recorder upon which to play them may have been equal to or greater than the cost of a new car.

However, audiophiles, with little or no regard for the cost, bought them and the players anyway, and stereophonic sound came to at least a select few living rooms of the mid- 1950's. Stereo recording became widespread in the music business by the 3rd quarter of 1957.

In May 1954, « Decca » recorded, in stereo, Rimsky-Korsakov's « Antar » Symphony with Ernest Ansermet and « l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande » . It took 4 years for the 1st stereo LP to be sold.

Bell Laboratories

Stokowski's Interest in Broadcasting Technology

In 1929, the Philadelphia Orchestra began live broadcasts of concerts from the Academy of Music, Philadelphia via the NBC radio network. Arthur Judson, the famous orchestra manager had been urging Stokowski to broadcast for some time, but Stokowski was dissatisfied by the sound of these early broadcasts.

About this same time, Stokowski approached Doctor Harvey Fletcher (1884-1981) at the Bell Laboratories seeking ways to improve this transmission.

Harvey Fletcher and the Bell Laboratories Research in Recording Technology

Harvey Fletcher was a brilliant physicist who had studied and worked at the University of Chicago, where he aided Doctor Robert A. Millikan (1868-1953) in his research. Millikan was famous for his measurement of the charge of the electron (aided by Harvey Fletcher) , and for his work on the photo-electric effect (confirming Albert Einstein's theory of the photon theory of light) . Harvey Fletcher's contribution to this work on the charge of the electron may have been understated 16, 17, but was a key part of Millikan's work. Millikan was awarded the Nobel Prize in Physics, in 1923, for his measurement of the electron charge, one of the fundamental physical constants in particle physics. Millikan then went on to serve as president of the California Institute of Technology from 1921 to 1945.

Harvey Fletcher received his Ph.D. in Physics from the University of Chicago, in 1911, summa cum laude. Harvey Fletcher later became Director of Research at Bell Laboratories, where he oversaw 3 decades of research and improvement in sound, hearing, transmission, and sound reproduction.

At Bell Laboratories, Fletcher oversaw research by, among others : Joseph P. Maxfield, Henry C. Harrison, Edward Christopher (« E.C. ») Wentz, K. P. Secord, Rogers H. Galt, Harold Black (who invented the negative feedback amplifier, in 1927) , Arthur C. Keller and others working on amplification, electronic sound transmission, recording and reproduction.

Harrison and Maxfield made a number of developments which, together, allowed the creation of an electrical sound recording system. One of these was the development of a matched-impedance electronic system, with a carbon microphone, linked to a tube or valve amplifier, driving a moving magnet (called also a « moving armature ») cutting head to scribe the sound in the wax master.

This matched-impedance electrical recording system had a recording bandwidth from 50 Hertz to 6,000 Hertz, beyond which its sensitivity declined. The new electrical recording system dramatically improved on the acoustic recording system, invented by Thomas Edison and gradually improved until it could record approximately from 250 Hertz to about 2,400 Hertz (sometimes) . This new and wider bandwidth of the electrical recording system added another octave of sound reproduction, compared with the acoustic process, and greatly reduced the harmonic distortion of the acoustic process, and produced a generally more realistic sound image.

Harvey Fletcher, K. P. Secord, and Rogers H. Galt at the Bell Laboratories

In a 1981 « BBC » Radio 3 interview, Arthur C. Keller, who worked for Henry Harrison, told of his and the Bell Lab's early sound and recording efforts and those of his colleagues in the 1920's and 1930's at the Bell Laboratories. They were working initially on long line transmission with better sound fidelity and, later, on high-fidelity and binaural or stereophonic recording. In the interview, Keller spoke of Bell Laboratories work with Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in test recordings to achieve high quality recordings and broadcast transmissions from the Academy of Music in Philadelphia, in 1930 and 1931.

1931 - Bell Laboratories Experimental Recordings of Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra

In April, 1931, Bell Labs began recording Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in the Academy of Music, using new equipment installed in the basement, with Stokowski's permission. This equipment did not use the conventional lateral cutting heads used for contemporary 78 rpm disks. Keller's disk cutting equipment used a vertical cut (« hill and dale ») recording method, using a magnetic moving coil pick-up fitted with a sapphire stylus cutting the wax master.

The vertical cutting device improved stylus tracking and, thereby, reduced harmonic distortion. It also helped to expand the dynamic range of the recording.

Moving coil microphones, capable of capturing frequencies above 10,000 Hz, developed by Bell Laboratories were used in both the monophonic and « binaural » (or stereophonic) recordings. Reportedly, more than 1,000 78 rpm sides were cut in the Academy of Music, during the 1931 and 1932 experimental Philadelphia Orchestra recordings.

Bell Labs had also earlier determined that surface noise on 78 wax recording masters (called the « matrix ») was caused by the graphite which was deposited on the wax surface during the manufacturing process. Later, graphite was adopted. The graphite allowed the surface of the master to become conductive, so it could be electroplated, preliminary to the later steps in producing record « stampers » . This electro-plating technique was the key to permitting creation of multiple versions of « masters » , used in the mass-production of records.

Arthur C. Keller and A. G. Russell devised the approach of processing the wax masters by means of gold sputtering in a vacuum chamber, which laid-down a 1 molecule thickness of gold onto surface of the wax. This conductive layer allowed them to electroplate a copper layer onto the gold surface, thus bypassing the need for the conductive graphite surface. This eliminated the surface noise resulting from the graphite on the surface of the recording.

Pressings of the recordings from these quiet masters were then made using cellulose acetate disks, rather than the typical noisy shellac material of the usual 78 rpm disks of that era.

In December, 1931, the 1st electrical recordings with this improved process were made and the experiments continued throughout the 1931-1932 concert season. The audio spectrum was extended 1st to 9,000 Hertz and, then, to 10,000 Hertz, giving for the 1st time good fidelity in the overtones and treble range of instruments.

Bell Laboratories asked Arthur C. Keller to come-out of retirement, in 1979, to catalogue and assist in transcribing some of the gold sputtered disks still in storage. Keller identified « Stokowski - Philadelphia » recordings from among 600 metal masters at the Bell Laboratories in Murray Hill, New Jersey. Of these, more than 100 were preserved by transcription, done by the legendary remastering engineer Ward Marston. We should add that Arthur C. Keller in his interviews does not give the proper recognition of the contributions of Ward Marston in restoring and, therefore, making available these historic and wonderful recordings.

Ward Marston, Arthur C. Keller and their associates were able to save many of the old metal masters. These masters were then cataloged and transcribed, including some of the stereo masters. Based on Ward Marston and Arthur Keller's work, Bell Telephone issued 2 commemorative albums with some of these transcriptions, in 1979 and 1980 : Bell Telephone BTL-7901 and BTL-8001. As far as we know, all of the CDs and other media which circulate with some of this material come from these Bell LP disks compiled by Arthur C. Keller and Ward Marston, whatever these « knock-off » CDs may claim (or leave unsaid) . The Bell Laboratories disks are the only sources of this pioneering recordings (at least, so far) and we are indebted to Bell Laboratories of 1979-1981, and to Keller and Marston for the superb examples of these important early sound experiments.

Ward Marston's Restoration of the Experimental Bell Labs Recordings

The 1979-1980 restoration project of Ward Marston on these gold-splattered metal masters was a massive and difficult task. Ward Marston's friend and famous restoration colleague Mark Obert-Thorn worked with Ward Marston to restore excerpts of Fritz Reiner recordings with the Philadelphia Orchestra and the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company made on 27, 28 November 1931 (Philadelphia Orchestra) , and 18 February 1932 (Philadelphia Grand Opera) by Bell Laboratories equipment. These were issued by the Fritz Reiner Society, in 1988, and Mark Obert-Thorn wrote a letter to the Society President Stephen C. Hillyer about these restorations at that time :

« When Ward Marston was preparing the 2 Bell Labs LP's of « Stokowski - Philadelphia Orchestra » material, in 1979 and 1980, he taped all the discs recorded by both the Orchestra and the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company.

For the last 8 years (1981-1988) , I've been trying to cajole Ward into making a copy of the Reiner material for me, but he had always begged-off. Finally, on April 1st (Good Friday, appropriately enough, considering some of the repertoire involved) , we got together in his studio and spent an entire day assembling the tapes from the November, 1931, concert discs.

As we got involved in the project, I realized why Ward had been reluctant to undertake the editing of the tapes for so long. Although recorded on 33 1/3 rpm vertical-cut discs which generally played for about 8.5 minutes each, very few were copied straight through onto the tape. At every point which was forte or louder, the recording distorted. This had force Ward to make a stylus change at each such point when recording the original discs. The best of these snippets now had to be painstakingly reassembled into a coherent performance.

Because this concert was one of the 1st Bell Labs recorded in the Academy of Music, the engineers discovered many " bugs " that were still to be worked-out (regarding recording levels) . At one point, for example, in the middle of the " O ! Diese Sonne ! " section of the " Tristan " excerpts, the play-back stylus simply could not track the disc at all. (As a result, 1 bar is missing here, although we tried to devise a solution to keep the music flowing so its lack would not be quite so noticeable.) You will also hear what sounds like one of the mikes being turned-off after a loud passage in the " Parsifal " Act I " Transformation Music ", as well as an occasional cowbell-like sound, caused by the bumping of one of the tubes in the recording apparatus, and some electrical hum.

But while the recordings are not as polished as those Bell Labs would be producing later on in that season, the performances are of such sustained high quality as to make one overlook the imperfections of the sound. I now believe that this " Good Friday Spell " equals the best I've heard, while the Act III " Meistersinger " Prelude is absolutely unrivaled. (How unfortunate and frustrating that neither is complete !) »

This account by Mark Obert-Thorn makes clear the difficulties of the restorations done by Ward Marston, and also whets our appetite for the future possibilities of more from these extraordinary pioneering Bell Laboratories recording sessions.

The 1981 Bell Laboratories LP of 1931 and 1932 Philadelphia Performances

1931 Roman Carnival Overture

Hector Berlioz's « Roman Carnival » Overture was recorded December 5, 1931, in the Academy of Music, without the knowledge of the Orchestra members. The musicians likely did not notice anything unusual, since radio microphones were routinely hanging from the Academy of Music ceiling. Arthur C. Keller had installed his recording equipment in the basement below the Orchestra stage, where the Victor Talking Machine Company electrical recording equipment had also been installed, in 1926. Leopold Stokowski later said, when he heard the « Roman Carnival » recording at the Bell Laboratories, in New York City, that it was the best quality recording he had ever heard.

Arthur C. Keller said that their recorded response in the « Roman Carnival » extended to 13,000 Hertz, the highest frequency response achieved up until that time by Bell Laboratories. The restored recordings were done by the mastering and restoration engineer Marcos Abreu, from the original Bell Labs LP disks and they are both excellent and subtle restorations.

1932 Bell Laboratories Stereophonic Recordings

As well as developing higher-fidelity sound reproduction with expanded frequency range and reduced harmonic distortion, Bell Laboratories also developed and used stereophonic recording technology for the 1st time. In March, 1932, Bell Laboratories recorded the Philadelphia Orchestra in « binaural » or stereophonic sound, by connecting 2 different microphones each to its own cutting stylus, with each moving magnet cutting stylus. The 2 cutting styli were each in its own arm, parallel to the other, but one recording from the outer edge of the wax disk (as was normal) , and the other beginning half-way into the disk. As a result, each stylus would cut half of the 78 rpm disk with a record groove containing a right or a left audio channel. Playback was the reverse process, using 2 play-back styli.

Using this stereophonic equipment, the Bell Laboratories engineers recorded Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra in a Russian program on March 12, 1932, in the Academy of Music. They recorded the « Poem of Fire » Opus 60 by Alexander Scriabin (1874-1915) and the Mussorgsky-Ravel « Pictures at an Exhibition » in this format. These recordings are the earliest surviving examples of stereophonic recording.

March 1932 : Modest Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition »

On March 12, 1932, the Bell Laboratories experimental equipment recorded Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra performing Maurice Ravel's orchestration of « les Tableaux d'une Exposition » in both their high-fidelity and stereophonic recording technology.

The original composition was written by Modest Mussorgsky in 1874 and were his musical impressions of 10 (or perhaps 11) pictures, or « tableaux » by Mussorgsky's friend, Viktor Hartmann (1834-1873) , shown at a retrospective exhibition of Hartmann's works. Hartmann had died unexpectedly of an aneurysm the year before Mussorgsky wrote «

Pictures at an Exhibition » . Hartmann's death is said to have made a deep impression on Mussorgsky, and Mussorgsky (who also died young, 1839-1881) later recounted that he composed these piano pieces in only 6 weeks.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky commissioned Maurice Ravel to orchestrate the « Tableaux d'une Exposition » . After Koussevitzky's exclusive period of performance of the transcription ended in the late-1920's, Stokowski performed the Ravel transcription a number of times.

However, Stokowski was not totally satisfied with Ravel's orchestration. He did not commercially record the full Ravel orchestration but, rather, made his own orchestration.

The March 12, 1932, performances of « les Tableaux d'une Exposition » resulted in 4 excerpts from the work which Ward Marston was able to expertly assemble together to provide these satisfying, extended excerpts.

These excerpts have been restored from the Bell Laboratories LP recording by the mastering and restoration engineer Marcos Abreu in an excellent and subtle restoration :

1. The conclusion of the initial Promenade, leading into the full movement of Gnomus, which constitute most of the music of the 1st 2 sections of « Tableaux » . This track is a stereophonic recording.
2. Most of Il vecchio castello (the Old Castle) , missing a few seconds at the beginning and the end. This track is a stereophonic recording.
3. The conclusion of Bydlo (the Polish wooden cart) , the Promenade transition and the complete « Ballet des poussins dans leur coque » (Ballet of the Unhatched Chicks) , and the beginning of Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle. The laughter of the audience in this live recording at the end of the « Ballet des poussins » indicates that the audience was not yet familiar with this work. This track is a monophonic recording.
4. All of « la Cabane sur des pattes de poule » (Baba Yaga's Hut on Fowls' Legs) and « la Grande porte de Kiev » (The Great Gate of Kiev) , except perhaps the 1st 2nd of Baba Yaga. Also, Stokowski makes cuts at the conclusion of « la Grande porte de Kiev » . This track is a monophonic recording.

Those who know « les Tableaux d'une Exposition » well will notice that both « les Tuileries » (the 3rd « picture ») and « Limoges, le marché » (the 7th « picture ») are not included in these excerpts. This is because Stokowski did not perform them. He seems to have formed the theory that these 2 pictures were not really intended by Mussorgsky, but rather inserted by Ravel from other music. Stokowski also found Ravel's orchestration, in these 2 cases, too French and not sufficiently dark and Slavic. So, he did not include them when he performed the Ravel orchestration. He also did not include these « tableaux » at all in his own later orchestration of « Tableaux d'une Exposition » .

April 29, 30, 1932 : Performances of Music from Wagner's « Ring des Nibelungen »

On Friday April 29 and Saturday April 30, 1932, Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave 2 performances of music from Wagner's « Ring des Nibelungen ». Bell Laboratories recorded excerpts of these concerts in what are likely the best Wagner performances Stokowski made with the Philadelphia Orchestra during the 1930's. These excerpts were from « Die Walküre », « Siegfried », and « Die Götterdämmerung » .

Ward Marston in his notes to the Bell Laboratories LP writes :

« Portions of the Saturday performance were recorded in 2-band stereo and, in every case, these stereo excerpts have been incorporated here - however fleeting in duration they may be. Throughout the 1st side of this record (the " Die Walküre " excerpts and the " Siegfried Forest Murmurs ") , the listener will be aware of a change in sound from monaural into stereo, and back again. This approach was adopted to maintain musical continuity while preserving what stereophonic excerpts survive. »

« Die Walküre » : Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music

As Ward Marston's notes remark, this famous excerpt from « Die Walküre » : Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music, recorded during concerts of 29 and 30 April 1932, are partially in stereo. This dramatic scene from the Finale of the Opera (Act 3) represents the confrontation between Wotan and his daughter Brünnhilde, when he condemns her to mortality and to a magic sleep. However, he relents and surrounds her with a magic fire, so that only the bravest hero (here, the Siegfried motif is heard in the music) will penetrate the ring of fire to save Brünnhilde.

This performance is poignant and magical, as of course it should be. The sound, amazing for this era, and of a « live » performance is yet more striking.

Ward Marston in his notes for the Bell LP states :

« In this recording, a 17 second gap in the Magic Fire Music has been filled from a 1939 recording, with the kind permission of RCA Records, and there is a 90 second gap near the beginning of Wotan's Farewell, which was impossible to fill from any other " Stokowski - Philadelphia " source. »

29, 30 April 1932 : « Siegfried » Forest Murmurs

Concluding the 1st half of the April 29 and 30, 1932 all Wagner concert was the Siegfried Forest Murmurs scene from Act 2 of « Siegfried » when Siegfried is in the woods in front of Fafner's cave. After slaying the dragon, Siegfried's hand touches the dragon's blood, allowing him to understand the song of the birds, who tell him of Brünnhilde. This wonderfully evocative music is played with beauty and sensitivity by Stokowski and the Philadelphians.

29, 30 April 1932 : « Götterdämmerung » Finale

Another beautiful extended excerpt from Wagner's « Ring des Nibelungen » from this concert was the Finale of « Die

Götterdämmerung » . This includes some of the most dramatic music of the « Ring » . It depicts the funeral and the funeral pyre of Siegfried, where Brünnhilde sings of her love for Siegfried. She then rides her steed Grane onto the funeral pyre. The Rhine overflows, Hagen attempts to seize the ring, but the Rhine maidens regain it. In the distance, the sky is filled with fire, and « Walhalla » is revealed consumed in flames. « Walhalla » then collapses with Wotan and the gods seated within. Brünnhilde, through her love for Siegfried has cleansed the world of its corruption. Underlining this transformation, the key of the final music changes from E-flat to D-flat, concluding Wagner's 4 Operas telling the story of the « Ring » .

Incidentally, in this excerpt, there is a very faint audio image of what seems to be an soprano Operatic voice singing faintly in the background at about 6 minutes into these excerpts. This is present on every pressing of the Bell Laboratories 33 rpm long-playing disk I have heard, so I conclude it intruded in some way into the master tape of this excellent transcription of the original 78 rpm master disks. It is noticeable only at elevated volumes, however, and should not detract from the enjoyment these performances provide, more than 75 years after the original live concerts.

29, 30 April 1932 : Die Walküre Ride of the Valkyries

Also from this concert is the famous Ride of the Valkyries from « Die Walküre » . This excerpt is partially in stereo. This has been restored from the Bell Laboratories LP recording by the mastering and restoration engineer Marcos Abreu, in an excellent and subtle restoration.

Arthur C. Keller and Bell Laboratories 45° Stereophonic Grooves

Arthur C. Keller later had the inspiration of a technique to record 2 channels of stereophonic signal in 1 record groove. His idea was to record each channels at 45 degrees from vertical, and 90 degrees from each other. Keller was awarded US patent No. 2,114,471 for this method. Alan Blumlein working for « EMI » , in Britain, also developed this idea but it would seem that Arthur C. Keller and Bell Labs probably were the 1st. This seems yet another example of the many in science and technology of 2 independent minds reaching the same idea or discovery at about the same time.

45 degree

The 45 degree stereophonic recording of 2 channels within 1 record groove was not exploited commercially in the 1930's or 1940's, and Arthur C. Keller's patent eventually lapsed, and seemed to have been forgotten. This solution to stereophonic reproduction seems to have been re-invented in the 1950's by Westrex of Hollywood, California. This Westrex was a later spin-off of Bell Labs technology. Westrex of Hollywood, California used the the 45 degree stereophonic recording system for their Westrex stereo LP long-playing « Stereo-Disks » .

Alan Blumlein

Another early pioneer of stereophonic recording was done at « EMI » in Hayes, Middlesex, United Kingdom, by the brilliant young scientist Alan Blumlein.

Blumlein had joined the Columbia Graphophone Company in March, 1929, reporting to another great man and engineer, Isaac Schœnberg (in 1962, Sir Isaac Schœnberg) who had become General Manager of Columbia, in 1928. Schœnberg had previously been General Manager of the Marconi Wireless and Telegraph Company.

Schœnberg, who had emigrated from Russia to England, in 1914, hired Blumlein to join him at Columbia « Gramophone ». He assigned Blumlein the job of inventing a new electrical recording process not dependent on the Bell Labs / Western Electric technology and patents. The United Kingdom Columbia company had purchased the failing U.S. Columbia company, in 1924, and had then licensed the Westrex process from Western Electric (who initially licensed only American firms), in early 1925, somewhat before the Victor Talking Machine Company. This Columbia license may have influenced Victor also to license the Western Electric process.

In 1929 and 1930, Blumlein developed a superior disk cutting technology, using moving coil cutting heads, rather than the moving magnet technology of the Western Electric process. Blumlein also developed a moving coil microphone at about this time. Interestingly, Edward Christopher (« E.C. ») Wente of Bell Laboratories had developed a moving coil microphone, in 1928, which received U.S. Patent No. 1,766,473, in 1931. Wente's Western Electric Model 618A of 1931 was nearly flat in response from 30 to 15,000 Hertz, and its low impedance (30 Ohm) allowed long cables without significant signal loss.

These inventions by Blumlein eliminated the royalties paid to Western Electric on each disk using the Westrex process. These inventions are particularly impressive, given that Blumlein was working for the most part alone, with some assistants, whereas E. C. Wente, Joseph P. Maxfield, Henry C. Harrison were working as part of a large Bell Laboratories team. Blumlein, as well as saving « EMI » the Westrex royalty payment, developed a moving coil cutting head which was superior to the Westrex system, since it reduced distortion and increased frequency response, and tended to be more linear in frequency response during the critical step of cutting the wax master.

In 1931, in part because of the effects of the great depression, the « Gramophone Company » (« HMV ») merged with Blumlein's employer, Columbia Gramophone Company (« Columbia ») to form Electric and Musical Industries : « EMI ». In November, 1931, « EMI » also built the famous new recording studios at 3 Abbey Road, in Saint-John's Wood, London, at that time, the largest recording studio in the world.

In 1933, using the stereophonic developments which Blumlein patented (patent issued in June 14, 1933), « EMI » cut a stereophonic disk with 2 channels in 1 groove, 90 degrees apart. Blumlein's 1st recording apparatus is described by A. J. Lodge of « EMI » Labs, in Russell W. Burn's excellent, « The Life and Times of A. D. Blumlein » :

« The stereo wax cutter survives as well. It was made from 2 Western Electric moving-armature units coupled to a single stylus by a lightweight lever system, so that one unit moved the stylus vertically, and the other horizontally. The 1st calibration of the recorder is believed to have been on 12th July 1933. Band-width is reported to have been about 4kHz. It was with this set-up that the well-known " walking " and " talking " records, the 1st complex-cut stereo records ever, were made some time before 16th December 1933. The signals feeding the 2 cutters were sum, for the lateral cutter, and difference for the vertical. »

This technique was similar to Arthur C. Keller's patent, but slightly different. Keller's patent, written in 1931 and 1932, but not submitted until 1936, taught having both channels cut 45 degrees from vertical, and 90 degrees from each other.

So, Blumlein's pioneering stereo work resulted in the 1st pressing of a stereophonic disk with 2 channels in 1 groove.

It is interesting that Keller had conceived of this 45 degree rotation so that each channel would have potentially similar reproduction, since he found that cutting purely vertical and horizontal grooves having differences in reproduction. In contrast, the 1st « EMI » stereo disk had 1 channel cut horizontally, and the other vertically. This was similar to combining the old « hill and dale » cutting method of companies such as « Pathé » with the horizontal cutting of companies such as « Victor » and « Columbia ». Additionally, Blumlein did later work on 45 degree oriented grooves, which have the advantage of avoiding channel differences arising from factors such as rumble and vibration.

The 2 channels in 1 groove and the 45 degree orientation seems to have been forgotten until the period 1954-1958, when Westrex of Hollywood, California, re-invented the technique. Westrex, a spin-off of Western Electric, was sold to Litton Industries. It prospered for a time in both stereo recording and Hollywood sound systems. Westrex developed the stereo Westrex groove design, re-inventing the 45 degree orientation.

1933 : Long Distance Concert - Philadelphia to Washington

On April 27, 1933, Bell Labs, Harvey Fletcher and Arthur C. Keller also arranged long distance transmission of high quality stereophonic sound across telephone long lines capable of sound transmission up to 10,000 Hz. It is interesting to note that what must have been the 1st telephone transmission of music also involved the Academy of Music. As cited in Gerson's Music in Philadelphia :

« Mister Bocovitz, the renowned pianist, played " Home Sweet Home " and other airs in New York. The audience heard this program via telephone at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. »

A concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the Academy of Music, sponsored by AT&T was captured by 3 microphones spaced across the front of the Orchestra and transmitted via 3 long lines to Constitution Hall, in Washington D.C. , where 3 amplified loudspeakers reproduced the Orchestra sound. The Orchestra was conducted by Alexander Smallens, assistant conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, with Leopold Stokowski controlling the sound balance.

The Washington D.C. broadcast concert was advertised as demonstrating « the recent advances in high-quality telephonic transmission and reproduction of music ». On April 9 and April 10, 1940, Harvey Fletcher and Leopold Stokowski arranged another demonstration of stereo sound in New York's Carnegie Hall with music recorded onto a 3 channel system using sound recorded optically on film with a frequency range of 30 Hz to 15,000 Hz.

14 août 1944 : Festival de Salzbourg. Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige, au « Festspielhaus », la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne.

5-7 septembre 1944 : Le chef Georg-Ludwig Jochum dirige la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner dans une version hybride éditée par Robert Haas (1938), avec le « Bruckner Orchester Linz » (étiquette « Saga », LP : XID 5102/03).

Georg-Ludwig Jochum's recording of the Symphony No. 2 (in the Haas Edition) was recorded by the « Reich » Radio in Vienna, on September 5-7, 1944. It was released after the War on a « Urania » LP (UR-402). Later, the same recording was released by Urania in a pseudo-stereo pressing (US-5243).

Appeared, also, on the « Saga » label : (LP) XID5102/3

The performance by the Orchestra of Bruckner's home-town has some roughnesses but, in general, seems to me very fine. This is just the sort of spacious playing Bruckner needs. It says on the disc that these recordings were 1st published in 1961 but the fact is that America could buy this Bruckner recording, at least, by 1952. These are not records for the « Hi-Fi » specialists, and no one should expect a full, rich sound from these discs. But the quality, though poor by present-day standards, is quite good enough to allow you to get to know this really splendid music and, after all, these are very cheap discs. (Roger Fiske)

6 septembre 1944 : Arnold Schönberg est mis à la retraite par l'Université de Californie où il enseignait depuis 1936, ce qui le pousse à donner des cours particuliers. En parallèle, il écrit des œuvres qui démontrent son intérêt pour un retour à une forme de tonalité : achèvement de la Seconde « Symphonie de chambre » (« Kammermusik », commencée en 1906, terminée en 1939), composition d'œuvres vocales d'inspiration religieuse juive : « Kol Nidre » en 1938 ; Psaume 130 et Psaume moderne (« moderner Psalm ») en 1950.

7 octobre 1944 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige, à la « Beethovensaal », la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version originale, éditée par Alfred Orel (1932), avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (étiquettes : « DG »)

« Fürtwängler imprime à la Philharmonie de Berlin des tensions dynamiques et des accélérations vertigineuses. Son sens de l'urgence et de la catastrophe imminente est sans cesse propulsé par des tempos contrastés et des scansion abruptes. Les cuivres de Berlin ont des couleurs menaçantes qui confèrent à son interprétation une atmosphère dramatique violente. La Coda du 1er mouvement est réellement inspirée par le souffle visionnaire de Fürtwängler et le Scherzo, un des plus vifs de la discographie, fascine par le sentiment d'oppression terrifiante qu'il suscite. Cette expérience musicale unique débouche sur un Adagio d'une grandeur et d'une noblesse surhumaines. Malgré la prise de son monophonique (convenable, malgré tout) et quelques fluctuations sur l'orchestre assez secoué par cette force ravageuse, il s'agit là d'un des plus grands disques brucknériens, jamais réalisés. » (Jean-Marie Brohm, Répertoire n° 50, page 14.)

« Lorsque Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirigea son 1er concert à l'âge de 20 ans, à Munich, le programme qu'il choisit était le suivant : de Beethoven , « la Consécration de la maison » , de Fürtwängler lui-même, un Adagio d'une Symphonie qu'il ne termina jamais, et la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner. En dehors de ce que ce programme peut avoir de symbolique, il indique clairement la prédilection de Fürtwängler pour Bruckner. 30 ans plus tard, devenu le président de l'Association allemande des amis d'Anton Bruckner, Fürtwängler attestait :

" L'œuvre de Bruckner a été associée à toute ma carrière artistique. "

L'analyse de l'art de Bruckner que fit Fürtwängler à l'occasion d'un concert de cette association est, en 20 pages, l'une des meilleures que l'on ait jamais consacrées au compositeur. Dans le remarquable essai de Fürtwängler, le témoignage d'une compréhension profonde qui explique une interprétation aujourd'hui encore non surpassée. » (Gérard Gefen, « Fürtwängler, une Biographie par le disque » , édité chez Belfond, 1986.)

11 octobre 1944 : Concert-anniversaire de la mort de Bruckner, à l'église abbatiale de Saint-Florian. Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie avec l'Orchestre « Bruckner » de Linz.

The concert was recorded and deposited in what became the Ross/Weiß/Ross (later, « ORF ») archives, and that the transcription still existed, but in poor condition.

This information was reported by a former member of the « Reichs-Bruckner-Orchester » . However, Hanns Kreczi's book chronicling the Orchestra's activities, including recordings made by the Orchestra, does « not » list such a recording. The « ORF » archive actually holds relatively few War-time recordings, since most extant « RRG » tapes, in Vienna, were taken away by the Soviets. For instance, the Bruckner 2nd and 6th Symphonies under Georg-Ludwig Jochum were issued by « Urania » from tapes provided by the East-German Radio, where many of the original « RRG » tapes ended-up. Only a handful of tapes from the 93 documented recordings by the « Bruckner-Orchester » still exist. The post-War Vienna radio station was « BTW Rot-Weiß-Rot » .

Furtwängler dirigea le « Linzer Bruckner Orchester » qu'une seule fois. Son chef principal était Georg-Ludwig Jochum, l'un des 3 frères Jochum. Avec cet Orchestre et le Chœur « Bruckner » de Linz (dirigé par Günther Ramin) , Hitler voulait produire les programmes musicaux de la « Radio de la Grande Allemagne » . L'Orchestre « Bruckner » de Linz fut aussi appelé l'Orchestre du « Führer » .

De nombreux journaux évoquèrent ce concert. En particulier : le « Oberdonau-Zeitung » , le « Schlesische Zeitung » , le « Brüner Tageblatt » , et le « Königsberger Allgemeine Zeitung » .

Herbert Caspers écrivit dans le « Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung » :

Dans une lettre à Max Auer, datée du 22 novembre 1952, Furtwängler écrivit :

« Inoubliable m'est restée l'interprétation de cette œuvre incomparable que j'ai pu jouer dans l'église de “ Sankt Florian ”, au cours des dernières et pires années de cette maudite guerre. »

14, 15 et 16 octobre 1944 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige, à la « Musikvereinssaal » , la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. En début de programme : l'Ouverture « Léonore » n° 2 de Beethoven.

16 octobre 1944 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige à la « Staatsoper » la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Étiquettes : « EMI Japon » : CE 285757-58 (au diapason et constant) ; DG « Original Masters » : 474 030-2 ; « Double » : 445 415-2 (+ 4e de Stuttgart, 1951) / 431 878-2 ; « Music & Arts » , CD : 764 ; « Grammofofon » , GRM 78696-7 (diapason trop bas et fluctuations) ; « LYS » : 106-107 (hors diapason) ; « Originals » : 854 ; « Magic Talent » : 48067 ; « Musical Concepts » ; « Tahra » .

La technique pose des problèmes pour cet enregistrement :

« On parle de copies russes faites à double vitesse pour expliquer la dégradation de la qualité de son, mais il est certain que la version publiée par DG et copiée par tout le monde sauf « EMI » / Toshiba a (entre autres) des problèmes de vitesse inconstante. Il faut noter que la version DG n'est pas consistante dans son défaut et que l'écart de vitesse varie d'un mouvement sur l'autre (de 1.2 à 1.6 % pour les mouvements I, III et IV, 0.6 % pour le Scherzo) . De plus, la sonorité est plus dure alors que le CD « EMI » a plus de basses et procure un son plus plein et plus naturel à mon goût qui permet d'apprécier davantage l'interprétation. Il y a bien sûr des avis contraires qui ressentent plus de tension dans le transfert DG. Enfin, on n'a pas bien le choix, car le transfert « EMI » n'est disponible qu'au Japon. » (Lionel Tacchini)

De Wilhelm Fürtwängler, il nous reste 4 enregistrements (de qualité inégale) de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1890 (« Version mixte ») éditée par Robert Haas (1939) . L'interprétation la plus vivante et la mieux réussie est celle avec le Philharmonique de Vienne, en 1944 ; mais celle du 14 mars 1949 (avec le Philharmonique de Berlin) est plus structurée, plus rationnelle dans sa construction. Celle du lendemain (15 mars) souffre d'une prise de son moyenne et de bruits parasites envahissants. Enfin, celle de 1954 est à éviter : l'interprétation manque de tension et l'acoustique est peu soignée. Cependant, Fürtwängler y utilise la partition de Franz Schalk datant de 1892, au lieu de sa « variante personnelle » basée sur celle de Robert Haas.

If I had to choose one Fürtwängler Bruckner performance to live with, it would be this one a Masterpiece of structural shaping, and of marrying moment-to-moment intensity with a sense of overall architecture. Earlier climaxes are powerful, but something is held in reserve for the final Coda, so there is a feeling of having arrived at a destination at the end. I first heard this performance on a set of Unicorn LP's, and then on LP and CD releases by « DG » , « Dante » , and « Music & Arts » . All were plagued by flutter, and by pitching that was sharp. Then Toshiba, a Japanese « EMI » division, released a 2 CD set that was properly pitched and eliminated most of the flutter, and that was the standard for many years, until Pristine's recent issue, which was a slight, but meaningful, improvement. Now along comes Eduardo Chibas' work, and we have another advance. The difference between this and Pristine's is evident mainly in matters of orchestral timbre and dynamic range. Some, who really favor warmth over everything, might find themselves preferring the Pristine version, and I wouldn't criticize that preference. But neither would I share it. Describing orchestral sound and color with words is tricky but when I made an A-B comparison of Pristine's and Chibas' issues, words like « mushy » or « unfocussed » came to mind regarding Pristine's work. The problem is that sounds more definitive and serious than it is. We're talking a matter of degrees here and not that many degrees. But after hearing both through from beginning to end, one after the other, I do find Chibas' firmer focus, and stronger timpani, bass, and cello presence, along with the somewhat wider dynamic range, to be the preferred version. Chibas also minimizes the flutter better than the others (though he can't eliminate it entirely listen to the Wagner tuben at the end of the slow movement) .

12 décembre 1944 : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique de Berlin, à l' « Admiralspalast » (« Gemeindehaus Berlin-Dalhem ») . Le concert est enregistré par la « Sender Freies Berlin » (étiquettes : « Archipel » ; « DGG » : 474030-2 ; « Tahra - Furt » : 1084-1087 ; « Testament ») .

The politicization of the 1st « Gesamtausgabe » intensified toward the end of World War II. As a result of the collapse of the 3rd « Reich » , Robert Haas was removed from his post as chief-editor.

Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, l'opinion publique penchera en faveur de la dénazification de la musique d'Anton Bruckner. Le compositeur émergera alors comme une sorte de « génie mystique dans le corps d'un simple villageois autrichien au comportement étrange » . Bien que son association avec le 3e « Reich » mit le frein sur une reconnaissance au plan international, les années 1960 et 1970 corrigeront le tir.

23 février 1945 : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige, à la « Stadthausaal » de Winterthur, la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Stadtorchester » de l'endroit.

2 concerts étaient prévus avec l'Orchestre de la « Tonhalle » de Zürich (les 20 et 25 février) mais ils furent annulés. Un énorme scandale éclata à cette occasion dans la presse suisse, en particulier dans des journaux tels « Volksrecht » et dura tout le mois ! Ce dernier, par exemple, dans son numéro du 24 février, pose ouvertement la question : « Furtwängler est-il nazi ? » , produisant à cet effet un matériel qualifié d' « authentique » ! Le « Journal de Genève » , francophone, a, dans son numéro 47 des 24/25 février, fort bien résumé la situation de « l'Affaire Furtwängler » :

« L'interdiction, par le Conseil d'État, des 2 concerts que Wilhelm Furtwängler devait donner cette semaine à la " Tonhalle ", a soulevé dans le public une vive émotion. Il semble que, d'une manière générale, on regrette cette mesure, suggérée au Gouvernement par le Conseil-exécutif de la Ville et arrachée à ces 2 autorités par les menaces du Parti du travail et de l'extrême-gauche. Aussi, les protestations n'ont-elles pas tardé. La " Nouvelle Gazette " de Zürich et " die Tat ", organe des indépendants, se sont immédiatement insurgés contre cette immixtion des passions partisans dans la vie de l'esprit, donnant un fâcheux exemple d'intolérance. S'il est un domaine où la Suisse a toujours tenu à rester au-dessus de la mêlée, c'est bien le domaine de l'Art et, tout spécialement, celui de la musique. Il est regrettable que les autorités aient paru céder aux entreprises de démagogues désireux d'exploiter, dans un but évident de surenchère, l'aversion générale et justifiée pour un régime politique étranger. »

Cet ouvrage minutieux se réfère aux travaux du musicologue Max Auer, et à d'autres sources proches du compositeur. Une biographie situe l'œuvre dans son contexte historique. Analyse de la totalité des Symphonies. Éléments d'analyse pour les autres œuvres, instrumentales et vocales, essentiellement religieuses. Une étude de l'esthétique de Bruckner signale les influences reçues (Beethoven, Wagner, les thèmes populaires) , sa conception de l'instrumentation et l'incidence sur la construction des œuvres.

Le musicologue français Armand Roger Gaston Machabey (Armand Machabey) est né le 7 mai 1886 à Pont-de-Roide (Doubs) et est mort le 31 août 1966 à Paris. Élève de Vincent d'Indy à la « Schola Cantorum » de Paris et d'André Pirro à la Sorbonne, sa thèse « Histoire et évolution des formules musicales du 1er Au XVIe siècle de l'ère chrétienne » (soutenue en 1928) , accordait une place importante à la musique de Guillaume de Machaut dont il fut l'un des spécialistes en publiant la 2e édition complète de la Messe de Notre-Dame, en 1948 (juste après Jacques Chailly) , et en rédigeant, en 1955, une importante monographie en 2 volumes « Guillaume de Machaut, 1300?-1377 : La vie et l'œuvre musical » . Il est aussi l'auteur d'un « Traité de la critique musicale » , et d'un « Traité sur la musicologie » , ainsi que plusieurs biographies de compositeurs dont son Maître Vincent d'Indy, Anton Bruckner, Maurice Ravel et Girolamo Frescobaldi.

The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra's darkest hour

In January 1945, Wilhelm Furtwängler was conducting in Vienna, and fled from there to Switzerland where he remained until the Battle of Berlin ended in the defeat of the Nazis. The musicians of his Orchestra remained in Berlin during its darkest hour. Here is their story :

On 28th March 1945, the Russian forces commanded by Marshal Georgy Zhukov were just 20 miles to the east of Berlin. A month previously, Albert Speer had been replaced as Nazi armaments minister after trying to persuade Hitler that defeat was inevitable. Speer now turned his energies to preventing the musicians of his adored Berlin Philharmonic from perishing in the inevitable final battle. « Reich Commissioner » Doctor Josef Goebbels, who was in charge of the defence of Berlin, had ordered the entire Orchestra to be drafted into the « Volkssturm » , the Home Guard responsible for the final desperate defence of the doomed city. To delay their drafting, Speer sent his liaison officer to remove and destroy the musician's papers while he put in place a plan to save the Orchestra.

During the day, on 28th March, a convoy of lorries left the besieged city to take many of the Orchestra's scores, pianos, harps, Wagner tubas, and the musician's dress suits south to the relative safety of Plassenburg, near Bayreuth. In the evening, the Orchestra was to give a concert, conducted by Robert Heger, in the « Beethoven-Saal » (next to the « Alte Philharmonie ») , which was miraculously still standing surrounded by ruins. The scheduled programme was Beethoven's « Egmont » Overture, the Brahms Double Concerto, and Richard Strauß' « Tod und Verklärung » . But it had previously been agreed that a change to another programme would be the signal that this was the final concert, and that the musicians were to leave the city after the final work. They were, then, to travel by coach to the Bayreuth area which was about to be taken by American forces, leaving them at a safe distance from the dreaded Soviet Army. The new programme was appropriately the final scene from Richard Wagner's « Die Götterdämmerung » , the Beethoven Violin Concerto played by Gerhard Taschner, and to conclude Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony, « the Romantic » .

The concert-hall was packed for the 5:00 PM start, despite the danger from air-raids and the absence of any heating. The electricity in Berlin was normally cut-off in the evenings, but Speer had arranged for it to remain connected. The hall was in darkness and illumination came only from the lights on the music stands. There was only one unexpected event in this final evening of music making. As the rapturous applause for the Bruckner Symphony died away, the Orchestra did not leave for southern Germany as arranged. They had voted to remain in the city to face the dreadful final days with the other Berliners. Only Gerhard Taschner left in a car driven by Speer's « chauffeur » , taking with him his wife, 2 children, and the daughter of another musician.

The other brave musicians stayed to face their own « Twilight of the Gods » . As the audience left, they were offered cyanide capsules (suicide pills) from baskets held by children wearing « Hitler-Jugend » (HJ ; or Hitler Youth) uniforms. Unimaginable wickedness and horror ended to the sound of sublime music.

Of the 125,000 Berliners who died in the final battle for their city 6,400 committed suicide. Many of the suicides were women and girls who had been raped by Soviet troops. Over 90,000 women visited doctors and clinics as a result of being raped.

Gerhard Taschner was only 23, in 1945. He had travelled to America before the War, and was said to have been encouraged to stay in Berlin by Wilhelm Furtwängler. After the War, his career continued as soloist, teacher and chamber musician, although it was hampered by the absence of a major recording contract. He is particularly linked with Wolfgang Fortner's Violin Concerto which he premiered in 1947, and went on to champion. Taschner died aged only 54, in 1976.

As for Robert Heger, he continued his career both as conductor and composer after the War. He died in Munich, in 1978.

13-20 avril 1945 : At the end of WWII, the American troops enter the city of Leipzig. American G.I.'s scouted the deserted « Neues Rathaus » and reported as follow :

« There's some civilian stiffs upstairs. »

In his solid mayoral chair sat City Council (« Volksturm ») Deputy Mayor (« Oberbürgermeister ») Alfred Freiberg, his sightless eyes fixed on the carved ceiling. In armchairs beside him, waxen-faced in death, sat his matronly wife and bespectacled daughter. It was a suicide from cyanide.

In an adjoining room (« Stadtkämmerer ») , City Treasurer « Doktor Kurt Lisso » , member of Nazi Party since 1932, The rigid bodies of 4 « Volkstürmers » sprawled in other offices. 2, it was plain, had sat across a table, sipping brandy until one had drunk enough to pick-up a machine pistol, shoot his comrade and then himself.

Germany is stricken by a series of unprecedented waves of suicides during the final days of the Nazi regime. The reasons for these waves of suicides are numerous and include the effects of Nazi propaganda, the example of the suicide of Adolf Hitler, victims' attachment to the ideals of the Nazi Party, and a reaction to the loss of the War and, consequently, the anticipated Allied occupation of Nazi Germany.

When it became apparent that the Nazis were about to lose the War, Germany's leaders (including Josef Gœbbels and Adolf Hitler) spoke publicly in favour of suicide as an option. Hitler declared on 30 August 1944 during a military briefing :

« It's only (the fraction) of a second. Then, one is redeemed of everything and finds tranquility and eternal peace. »

In contrast to Imperial Japan, the Nazis refused to surrender and continued to fight on, led by Hitler's vision of only 2 possible outcomes : victory or destruction.

More than 7,000 suicides were reported in Berlin alone, in 1945, though the actual number of suicides that year in the city is thought to be much greater.

See : Christian Goesche. « Suicide in Nazi Germany » , Oxford University Press (2009) .

« Life Magazine » wrote about the suicides :

« In the last days of the War, the overwhelming realization of utter defeat was too much for many Germans. Stripped of the bayonets and bombast which had given them power, they could not face a reckoning with either their conquerors or their consciences. These found the quickest and surest escape in what Germans call “selbstmord” (self-murder) . »

The Catholic psychiatrist Erich Menninger-Lerchenthal noted the existence of « organised mass suicide on a large-scale which had previously not occurred in the history of Europe. There are suicides which do not have anything to do with mental illness or some moral and intellectual deviance, but predominantly with the continuity of a heavy political defeat and the fear of being held responsible. »

Peter Porter (1929-2010) was born in Australia and emigrated to the United Kingdom, in 1951. The poem, « May 1945 » (which has to do with the fall of Nazi Germany) was first published in 1972 in a collection entitled, « Preaching to the Converted » . It is also available in his « Collected Poems » in 2 volumes, Oxford University Press, Oxford and Melbourne (1999) .

Adolf Hitler seemingly tainted the art ; he made it dubious. No music was more suspect than the « Führer » 's favourite late-Romantic strains of Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner, and Richard Strauß, a few bars of which are enough to give Holocaust survivors flash-backs of horror. Conversely, it was thought that no music resisted the Nazi taint more thoroughly than the modernist school that Hitler detested. Thus, did Arnold Schænberg, the inventor of atonality and of 12 tone composition, become a heroic figure in the post-War years ; he had stayed, it seemed, absolutely pure. After 1945, a new morality of music evolved, based on 2 questionable but potent syllogisms : (1) if Hitler liked it, it must be bad ; (2) if Hitler hated it, it must be good. There are many things to be said against this way of thinking, the 1st of which is, « So what ? » . The fact that Hitler loved music says as much about the nature of his crimes as the fact that he loved dogs. All it really tells us is that he emerged-out of a culture that had already made music a religion. Hitler loved Beethoven because everyone loved Beethoven. The Orchestras of « Auschwitz » and « Theresienstadt » played Beethoven, too, with desperate devotion. The threadbare ranks of the German resistance had as many music-lovers as the entire upper-echelon of the Nazi Party. Hans von Dohnányi, one of those who plotted against Hitler, was the son of the composer Ernst von Dohnányi and the father of the future conductor, Christoph von Dohnányi ; he, too, listened to Beethoven as he dreamed. Roman Polanski's film, « The Pianist » , tells the true story of the Polish-Jewish pianist Wladyslaw Szpilman, who was saved from certain death by an anti-Nazi « Wehrmacht » officer named Wilm Hosenfeld. As Szpilman plays Frederic Chopin's « Ballade » in G Minor for his enemy, each man seems to save the other. What this magnificent movie suggests is that music was in the end a neutral ground - another of the compromised geographies on which the Second World War was fought. Today, younger composers can avail themselves of Wagner and Strauß without any sense that they are treading on forbidden territory. Except, in Germany : there, a deep mistrust of the musical past lingers. After « Auschwitz » , the thinking goes, the comfort of C major is taboo. The entire Classical and Romantic tradition remains roped-off, like a crime scene under investigation. Spending time in Berlin, last fall, I noticed how often Nazism was invoked in artistic matters - not as history but as a negative example for contemporary style. I heard an architectural guide condemn one of the new buildings in « Potsdamer Platz » for having too many right angles and, thereby, reviving a totalitarian aesthetic. Much the same critique extends to new music that uses too many major and minor chords : even a few of these are liable to raise suspicions of neo-Fascist « kitsch » . It is understandable that such extreme attitudes took hold immediately after the War, when Germany felt the need to wipe the slate clean and build anew. But why are they so pervasive 5 decades later ? Why do German composers still fetishize dissonance and make a virtue of the ugly ? This over-weening self-denial has become absurd, and has contributed to the wide-spread perception that German music came to a sudden end with the death of Richard Strauß, in 1949.

The Bamberg Symphony (« Bamberger Symphoniker » ; « Bayerische Staatsphilharmonie ») is a German Orchestra based in Bamberg. The Orchestra was formed in 1946 mainly from German musicians expelled from Czechoslovakia under the Beneš decrees, who had previously been members of the German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague. The Orchestra received the title of Bavarian State Philharmonic (« Bayerische Staatsphilharmonie ») in 1993. The Orchestra commemorated its 60th anniversary on 16 March 2006.

Since 1993, the home of the Orchestra is the « Konzert- und Kongresshalle » (Concert and Congress Hall) , which has the nickname « Sinfonie an der Regnitz » (Symphony on the Regnitz) . Concerts before 1993 were given at the « Dominikanerbau » . The Orchestra receives financial support from the Free State of Bavaria, the city of Bamberg, Oberfranken district and the district of Bamberg. The government of Bavaria retired the Orchestra's financial debts in 2003.

Joseph Keilberth was the Orchestra's 1st principal conductor. Other principal conductors have included Eugen Jochum, James Loughran and Horst Stein, all of whom also held the title of honorary conductor of the Orchestra. Since January 2000, Jonathan Nott has been principal conductor of the Orchestra. Several years after his 2009 extension of his Bamberg contract to 2012, in August 2011, the Orchestra further extended Nott's contract through the 2015-2016 season. Nott is scheduled to stand-down as the Orchestra's principal conductor after the 2015-2016 season. In September 2015, the Orchestra announced the appointment of Jakub Hrůša as its next principal conductor, effective with the 2016-2017 season, with an initial contract of 5 years, following 5 previous appearances as guest-conductor with the Orchestra. Herbert Blomstedt was named honorary conductor of the Orchestra in March 2006. Robin Ticciati became the Orchestra's principal guest-conductor in the 2010-2011 season.

The Orchestra is associated with the triennial Gustav Mahler Conducting Prize, established during Nott's tenure, and the 1st competition laureate in 2004 was Gustavo Dudamel. The Orchestra has made a number of recordings for « Vox Records » with János Fürst, some of which have been reissued on CD. It also recorded music of Joaquin Turina for « RCA Records » with conductor Antonio de Almeida.

From Prague to Bamberg

It isn't known for certain how Orchestras manage to maintain their sound, despite playing for different conductors and constantly taking new members into their ranks. It would surely be instructive to investigate and pin-point the mysterious factors that underlie distinctive orchestral profiles. It might even throw-up a rather obvious conclusion : namely, that strong oral traditions still operate in this domain of musical life - think, for instance, of a section leader in the 1st violins, still rooted in the Austro-Hungarian performing tradition, handing on knowledge and, especially, musical intuition to younger colleagues.

The Bamberg Symphony Orchestra would make a great experimental subject for anyone setting-out to test the oral transmission hypothesis. Essentially, its roots (as recent research has shown) go back to the Orchestra which, in 1787, premiered Mozart's « Don Giovanni » in Prague's Estates Theatre. A later, Bohemian descendant of that ensemble was the Orchestra of Prague's German Opera ; drawn to the modern and the experimental, it played under Gustav Mahler, was subsequently disbanded, only to enjoy a brief heyday until the end of World War II as the German Philharmonic Orchestra, under the young Joseph Keilberth.

It was again Joseph Keilberth who, from 1950 to 1968, was the 1st Principal Conductor of the Bamberg Symphony, founded in 1946 from a pool including some of those former Prague players, and who kept the Bohemian tradition alive in Franconia's new Orchestra. The last Bamberg Symphony player who originally came from Prague, the violinist Rudolf Hauer, retired in 1980, but today the Orchestra's sound is still characterized by rich strings, warm woodwinds and typically well-blended brass. Similarities to the musical accents of the Czech Philharmonic and Vienna Philharmonic are anything but coincidental.

Bamberg in Bavaria is a perfect jewel of a city in the very heart of Europe. A UNESCO World Heritage city, in its 1,000 year history Bamberg has produced stunning architecture, a Holy Roman Emperor, a Pope, and a world-class Orchestra. Admired for its characteristic deep, rich yet brilliant sound, the Bamberg Symphony thrills audiences all over the world from the United States to Japan, performing both the great Classical repertoire and cutting-edge modern and contemporary music. Truly, an extraordinary Orchestra from an extraordinary city.

« Where would Bamberg be without its Orchestra ? » It's no idle question.

Bamberg, UNESCO World Heritage city, built on 7 hills, like Rome, the only German city in which a Pope lies buried, city of cloisters, court-yards and a 1,000 year old cathedral, the religious, political and cultural capital of the Holy Roman Emperor Heinrich II, with 1,500 protected buildings ! Bamberg is Germany's history, in stone ; the Orchestra is a mere stripling by comparison. So where would Bamberg be without it ?

Without its Orchestra, Bamberg would be deprived of something vital, something as basic as the air it breathes. True, Bambergers lived without it for more than a millennium, from 902, when the city was founded, to the founding of the Orchestra in 1946.

Die Bamberger Symphoniker - Bayerische Staatsphilharmonie sind ein bedeutendes deutsches A-Orchester, das seit seiner Gründung 1946 in Bamberg beheimatet ist.

Das Magazin Cicero zählte die Bamberger Symphoniker in der Ausgabe vom Januar 2014 zu den « Aufsteigern des Jahres » , und die Zeitschrift Focus hatte im Januar 2009 die Bamberger Symphoniker unter den zehn führenden Symphonieorchestern Deutschlands auf Rang 6 gelistet.

Die Neue Zürcher Zeitung schrieb der 2009 erschienenen Aufnahme von Gustav Mahlers Sinfonie Nr. 9, vorgelegt von den Bamberger Symphonikern mit ihrem Chefdirigenten Jonathan Nott, eine Ausnahmestellung unter den Einspielungen dieses Werkes zu. In einem Ranking des französischen Klassik-Magazins « Classica » landete die gleiche CD unter acht ausgewählten Aufnahmen auf dem zweiten Platz. Darüber hinaus wurde die besagte CD-Produktion und andere mit dem MIDEM Classical Award 2010 und dem Internationalen Schallplattenpreis « Toblacher Komponierhäuschen » 2009 ausgezeichnet.

Gegründet wurden die Bamberger Symphoniker 1946 unter den Bedingungen der Nachkriegszeit von Orchestermusikern, die im Zuge der Flüchtlingsbewegungen von Ost nach West und aus deutschen Städten nach Bamberg gelangten. Den « Kern » des Orchesters bildeten ehemalige Mitglieder des Deutschen Philharmonischen Orchesters Prag, das am 1. Mai 1945 unter seinem Generalmusikdirektor Joseph Keilberth, im unmittelbaren zeitlichen Vorfeld des Prager Volksaufstands und des Endes des Zweiten Weltkriegs, sein letztes Konzert gab.

Schon kurz nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs hatte es in Bamberg Bestrebungen für eine Orchestergründung gegeben ;

1946 verdichteten sich die Bemühungen von Anton Hergenröder und Peter Schneider. Nach dem Aufbau des Klangkörpers fand im März 1946 der erste öffentliche Auftritt der Bamberger Symphoniker, damals noch unter dem Namen « Bamberger Tonkünstlerorchester », im Bamberger Zentralsaal statt. Die musikalische Leitung dieses Konzertes lag bei Bertil Wetzelsberger, Generalmusikdirektor der Bayerischen Staatsoper in München. Aufgeführt wurden im Rahmen eines Beethoven-Abends die Leonoren-Ouvertüre Nr. 3, das Violinkonzert mit dem Konzertmeister Otto Büchner als Solist und die Sinfonie Nr. 7. Das Konzert wurde in der Presse als überwältigendes Ereignis gefeiert :

« Einen Klangkörper von solch hohen Qualitäten konnte man dann und wann nur als Gast in Bamberg begrüßen. Ihn nunmehr als “ künstlerisches Eigentum ” ständig hier zu haben, mutet fast wie ein Geschenk der Musen an Ein Orchester von Großstadtrang ist nun den Musikfreunden unserer Stadt überantwortet. Es liegt jetzt an ihnen, sich dieser einzigartigen Tatsache würdig zu erweisen und die Existenz des Orchesters zu sichern. »

Eine entscheidende Persönlichkeit, eine Schlüsselfigur in der Geschichte der Bamberger Symphoniker, war Joseph Keilberth. Als Generalmusikdirektor der Sächsischen Staatsoper in Dresden und Musikalischer Leiter der Berliner Staatsoper dirigierte er am 9. März 1949 sein erstes Konzert der Bamberger Symphoniker. Auf dem Programm standen Werke von Christoph Willibald Gluck, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart und Ludwig van Beethoven. Aufgrund seiner früheren Tätigkeit als Chefdirigent des Deutschen Philharmonischen Orchesters Prag kannte er bereits einen Großteil der Musiker, die sich in Bamberg zu dem neuen Klangkörper formiert hatten. « Ergreifendes Wiedersehen mit den Pragern. Sehr gutes Orchester » , notierte er in seinem Dirigiertagebuch über das erste von ihm geleitete Konzert, das Signalwirkung für die weitere Entwicklung des Orchesters besaß und entsprechend in der Presse kommentiert wurde :

« Was bei diesem Wiedersehen in den Herzen aufbrach, wurde zum Klang. Die Größe dieser Stunde riß die Bamberger Symphoniker über sich selbst hinaus Mit dem in allen Teilen des Klangkörpers unvergleichlich spielenden Orchester (samt Kœckert-Quartett) teilte sich Joseph Keilberth, sichtlich tief bewegt, in einen Beifall ohne Beispiel. »

Im Januar 1950 trat Joseph Keilberth offiziell das Chefamt in Bamberg an. Seine künstlerische Arbeit, sein Renommee und seine konsequente Programmgestaltung waren von kaum zu überschätzender Bedeutung für die Konsolidierung und nationale wie internationale Profilierung der Bamberger Symphoniker, deren Historie untrennbar mit seinem Namen verbunden ist. Mit ihm knüpfte das Orchester nicht nur an die alte Prager Tradition an, auch die namhaften Gastdirigenten und Solisten, die den Einladungen der Bamberger Symphoniker folgten, belegen den wachsenden Ruhm des Klangkörpers, dessen Ruf rasch auch über Bamberg und Franken hinaus ausstrahlte. Joseph Keilberth hatte seine Position bis zu seinem plötzlichen Tod am 20. Juli 1968 inne.

Nach dem tragischen Ereignis übernahm Eugen Jochum die künstlerische Verantwortung für das Orchester. Über einen Zeitraum von 40 Jahren stand er immer wieder am Pult der Bamberger Symphoniker, dies nicht allein in Deutschland und Europa, sondern und andere auch auf überaus erfolgreichen Japan- und USA-Tourneen.

1946 : Le chef Leopold Ludwig dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885) , avec l' « Orchester des ehemaligen Städtischen Opernhauses » (« Staatskapelle Berlin ») . Un enregistrement existe.

Leopold Ludwig

The leading Austrian conductor Leopold Ludwig was born on 12 January 1908 in Witkowitz, Ostrava (Czech Republic) , and died on 25 April 1979 in Lüneburg, Germany. Particularly well-known as an Opera conductor, he was also one of the 1st to make Stereo LP recordings of Symphonies of Gustav Mahler.

He learned piano as a boy and continued to study the instrument at the Vienna Conservatory with Emil Pauer. He began his conducting career in the traditional German manner, working himself up through a number of coaching and then conducting positions in provincial Opera Houses in South Germany and in Brno, Czechoslovakia.

He became the Music Director of the Oldenburg « Staatsoper » , in 1936. Frequent guest conducting appearances in Berlin brought him to national attention, leading to his appointment as Principal Conductor of the Vienna « Staatsoper » , in 1939. He became Principal Conductor of the Berlin « Städtische Oper » , in 1943. After the War, he continued in that position until 1951, and also frequently conducted at the Berlin « Staatsoper » .

In 1950, Ludwig was appointed General Music Director of the Hamburg « Staatsoper » , effective 1951. This was the base for his expanding international reputation, and he remained there until 1971. He was an active and effective administrator, and improved its artistic and musical standards. In 1952, he took it on an important Festival visit, to the Edinburgh Festival in the United Kingdom, beginning a practice of taking to major foreign venues and Festivals. Another of the company's most important overseas visits was to the Lincoln Center Festival, in New York, in 1967. He also modernized and broadened the company's repertory.

He also made notable guest conducting appearances. He debuted in the United States at the San Francisco Opera in 1958, frequently returning there through 1968. He led the Glyndebourne (England) Festival Opera's 1st production of Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » , in 1959. He championed Paul Hindemith's Opera « Mathis der Maler » in a series of performances in 1967, though a series of cuts he made in it were considered questionable. His 1st appearance with the Metropolitan Opera House, in New York, was in 1970, leading Wagner's « Parsifal » .

He conducted in concerts with many leading Orchestras. With the London Symphony Orchestra, he made a pioneering recording of Mahler's 9th Symphony, and conducted such leading Orchestras as the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. He was known for his calm platform demeanor and lack of flashiness. He was always praised for his competence and way with balancing orchestral sounds to make outstanding effects, though some detractors sometimes rated him as highly-competent and sometimes less than inspired.

At the time of Leopold Ludwig's birth, his home-town Witkowitz, located in Moravia, was a part of the Habsburg Empire. Active as a church organist by the age of 10, he went on to study piano at the Vienna Academy of Music with Emil Paur, between 1927 and 1930, and decided to seek a career as a conductor after hearing a radio broadcast from the 1931 Bayreuth Festival of Furtwängler conducting « Tristan und Isolde » . Having made his conducting debut in the Silesian town of Opava before moving on to Brno (then, the capital of the province of Moravia / Silesia) , he obtained his 1st major appointment in 1936 when he accepted the post of chief conductor of the Oldenburg Opera in Northern Germany. Soon, Ludwig was conducting as a guest in Berlin before moving to Vienna as a permanent conductor at the State Opera, in 1939 ; here, he stayed for 4 years before returning to Germany and to Berlin to take-up a similar position with the « Städtische Oper » (later to become the « Deutsche Oper ») .

Following the collapse of the 3rd « Reich » , Ludwig continued to conduct in Berlin as a guest at both the « Städtische Oper » and the « Staatsoper » ; but the appointment through which he is best-known, as chief conductor of the Hamburg State Opera, commenced in 1950. He stayed with this company until 1971, working closely with its intendant and chief producer Günther Rennert. Under Ludwig's musical leadership the Hamburg company flourished, appearing in 1952 at the Edinburgh Festival, where it presented the 1st performance in Britain of Paul Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » , and later at Sadler's Wells in London, where its repertoire included the company's famous production of Alban Berg's « Lulu » (which was recorded by « EMI ») . During his time at Hamburg, Ludwig was also active as a guest-conductor internationally : he made his debut with the San Francisco Opera in 1958, and 1st appeared at the Glyndebourne Festival, in 1959, conducting Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » that year and the next ; at the 1966 Festival, he led Rennert's stark production of Händel's « Jephtha » . He conducted the Hamburg company when it appeared at the Lincoln Center Festival in New York, in 1967, once again featuring « Mathis der Maler » , and made his Metropolitan Opera debut, in 1970, with Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » . Ludwig had been active as a guest-conductor at the Vienna State Opera from 1963 onwards, and after giving-up the post of chief conductor at Hamburg, he stayed with the company as chief guest-conductor until 1973, serving also as musical adviser to the Basle Symphony Orchestra for the 1969-1970 season.

Ludwig was a fine example of the German « Kapellmeister » in the best sense of the word. In both the Opera House and the concert-hall, he could be relied upon to deliver fully realized performances, both technically and dramatically. His conducting style was clear and undemonstrative, with quite a wide beat. He conducted a large repertoire and was a notable exponent of contemporary German music, leading the first performances of Ernst Křenek's « Pallas Athene weint » (1955) , Hans Werner Henze's « Der Prinz von Homburg » (1960) and Giselher Klebe's « Figaro lässt sich scheiden » (1963) and « Jacobowsky und der Oberst » (1965) . His gramophone career commenced before World War II with recordings for the « Polydor » and « HMV » labels in which he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic, Berlin « Staatsoper » and Dresden Philharmonic Orchestras in repertoire that consisted predominantly of orchestral items from Operas.

After the War, his name appeared on several « Urania » issues of material that had originated in Berlin, including the baritone Josef Metternich's account of Gustav Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » , and von Weber's « Abu Hassan » with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Erich Witte and Michaël Bohnen. He was active conducting accompaniments for both the « Deutsche Grammophon » and « Columbia » (United Kingdom) labels ; these included several recordings of Piano Concertos by Liszt, Rachmaninov and Tchaikovsky with the Hungarian pianist Andor Foldes (for « Deutsche Grammophon ») and exceptionally fine readings of Beethoven's Piano Concertos Nos. 4 and 5 with Emil Gilels, as well as excerpts from Wagner's Operas with Hans Hotter and Birgit Nilsson (all for « EMI ») . 2 of his most interesting « Deutsche Grammophon » releases were an early recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 4 with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » and Anny Schlemm, and excerpts from « Mathis der Maler » with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and the Berlin « RIAS » Orchestra.

At the dawn of the Stereo era, Ludwig made several notable recordings of major orchestral works for the short-lived « Everest » label. These included another early Mahler recording, of the Symphony No. 9, and Richard Strauß' « Ein Heldenleben » ; as well as popular Symphonies by Dvořák, Mozart and Schubert. He also conducted several records published by the Hamburg-based and American-financed « Miller International » label, and « CBS » published an account of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 (Choral) with the Berlin Symphony Orchestra. Several broadcasts of complete Opera performances which Ludwig conducted have appeared, for instance of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » , Richard Strauß' « Elektra » , Wagner's « Tannhäuser » and von Weber's « Der Freischütz » , all examples of the weighty repertoire in which he excelled. The « EMI » recording of the unfinished version of Berg's « Lulu » , with Anneliese Rothenberger in the title role and the forces of the Hamburg State Opera, is perhaps his most outstanding monument on record.

Leopold Ludwig (geboren 12. Januar 1908 in Witkowitz ; gestorben 25. April 1979 in Lüneburg) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Ludwig spielte bereits als Kind Klavier und Orgel, studierte dann in Wien das Fach Klavier und Komposition. Seinen ersten Auftritt als Dirigent hatte er 1931 in Troppau ; nach Stationen in Gablonz, Teplitz-Schönau und Oldenburg trat er 1939 eine Stelle als Erster Kapellmeister an der Staatsoper Wien an. Am 20. April 1942 ernannte ihn Adolf Hitler zum Staatskapellmeister. 1943 kam eine Tätigkeit als Dirigent an der Städtischen Oper Berlin hinzu. Während seiner Berliner Zeit entstand unter anderem 1944 eine Rundfunkaufnahme des Abu Hassan von Carl Maria von Weber.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im April 1946 von einem britischen Militärgericht zu eineinhalb Jahren Gefängnis mit Bewährung und einer Geldstrafe verurteilt, weil er im Fragebogen seine seit 1937 bestehende Mitgliedschaft in der NSDAP verschwiegen hatte.

Nach einer Tätigkeit als Gastdirigent an der Städtischen Oper Berlin und der Berliner Staatsoper war Ludwig von 1951 bis 1971 Generalmusikdirektor an der Hamburgischen Staatsoper. Sein umfangreiches Repertoire umfasste Werke vom Barock bis zur Moderne, wobei er auch verschiedene Uraufführungen leitete, wie Der Prinz von Homburg von Hans Werner Henze (1960) oder Jacobowsky und der Oberst von Giselher Klebe (1965) .

Ludwig war auch international tätig und gastierte unter anderem 1952 beim Edinburgh Festival. 1959 dirigierte er beim Glydebourne Festival den Rosenkavalier. Ferner gastierte er in Neapel, Buenos Aires, Montevideo und Santiago de Chile. Nach seinem erfolgreichen Hamburger Parsifal 1968 wurde er an die New Yorker Metropolitan Opera berufen, wo er 1970 den Parsifal dirigierte.

Neben seiner Tätigkeit als Operndirigent leitete er Konzerte und spielte verschiedene Schallplatten ein, darunter die 4. und 9. Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler.

1958 wurde Leopold Ludwig in Hamburg mit der Johannes-Brahms-Medaille ausgezeichnet, 1968 verlieh ihm der Hamburger Senat den Titel Professor.

Nach Beendigung seiner Dirigentenlaufbahn lebte Leopold Ludwig im Ruhestand in Lüneburg.

Arnold Schönberg has an influential teaching career at UCLA, even counting George Gershwin among his students and friends ; still, he has much difficulty obtaining both recognition from his colleagues and much-needed financial stability. He suffers a « temporary death » in August 1946, and composes 2 of his most powerful works after his revival : the String Trio, which he said was specifically meant to depict his « death » , and « A Survivor from Warsaw » , based on a story related to him by an actual survivor of the Nazi extermination policy.

2 août 1946 : Le compositeur Arnold Schönberg faillit mourir d'un arrêt cardiaque à la suite d'une violente crise d'asthme et s'en sort grâce à une injection médicamenteuse.

Arnold Schönberg suffered a nearly fatal heart attack. Shortly afterward, almost as though in reaction, he set to work on the String Trio, Opus 45, composed between August 20 and September 23. Commissioned by Harvard University, the String Trio was partially mapped-out prior to the composer's heart attack ; still, Schönberg explained to friends and students that he wrote the work with clear programmatic intent specifically related to his infirmity and recovery. The Trio is filled with extreme contrasts and what appear to be nonsequiturs. Schönberg's one-time pupil Leonard Stein later explained that :

« The many juxtapositions of unlike material within the Trio are reflections of the delirium which the composer suffered during parts of his illness. These unusual juxtapositions also represent the alternate phases of “ pain and suffering ” and “ peace and repose ” that Schönberg experienced. »

In an unpublished essay, Schönberg provided another perspective on the work :

« I began the Trio, of which I have told many people that it is a “ humorous ” representation of my sickness, soon after I was over the worst. »

Schönberg undoubtedly kept these comments private because of his inherent mistrust of program music.

The 12 tone Trio unfolds as a single-movement in 3 sections : the 1st of these functions as an exposition ; the 2nd as a sort of development ; and the last as a shortened recapitulation and Coda. The 1st 2 of these parts are further divided into 2 sections each. Colour and timbre are of the utmost importance in the Trio ; in addition to normal bowing, Schönberg draws upon an extensive palette of playing techniques, including ponticello, pizzicato, harmonics, and col legno.

The harmonic and melodic material are derived from a single primary row and its permutations. After the opening trills, Schönberg immediately sets into relief the extreme registers of the cello and violin. A sudden change in dynamic and tempo announces the 2nd part of the 1st section, which begins with a Wagnerian phrase in the violin, harmonized by the viola and cello. Throughout this lengthy slow passage, numerous attempts to re-establish the opening tempo fail. A change in pulse marks the beginning of the 2nd section, while a canonic passage distinguishes the 2nd part. A new melody, which also re-appears in the Coda, recalls a passage from Act 2 of the composer's Opera, « Moses und Aron » (1930-1932) associated with a woman healed by faith. Schönberg described the recapitulation to Erwin Stein as « the going back and “ reliving ” (the portion of his life portrayed in the 1st section) with the calmness and perspective of good health. »

Beginning note for note like the 1st section, the recapitulation immediately undergoes variation. Schönberg presents some measures that exactly replicate the original while leaving others out entirely, in effect creating a shortened reprise that recalls but does not reproduce earlier events.

The String Trio, Opus 45, was commissioned by the music department of Harvard University for a symposium on Musical Criticism in spring of 1947. It was premiered by members of the Walden String Quartet at Harvard (in Cambridge, Massachusetts) , on 1 May 1947. Also contributing new works for the occasion were : Paul Hindemith (« Apparebit Repentina Dies ») ; Gian Francesco Malipiero (« La Terra ») ; Aaron Copland (« In the Beginning ») ; and Bohuslav Martinů (6th String Quartet) . Arnold Schönberg had begun work on the piece already in June 1946, but the majority was composed between 20 August (i.e. , only 2 and a half weeks after Schönberg suffered a severe heart attack) and 23 September. This traumatic episode, which Schönberg survived only through an injection directly into his heart, took its toll on the 71 year old composer, and Schönberg told Thomas Mann (as reported in « Die Entstehung des Doktor Faustus ») that his Trio reflected his physical and psychological suffering during this period. The single-movement work is divided into 5 sections : 3 « parts » and 2 « episodes » . Part 3 begins like Part 1 and recapitulates aspects of the whole work. Thematic development is spread throughout the work. The piece ends with a 12 note statement in the violin in which the basic motifs are presented. The variety of surface details (abrupt dynamic contrasts, expressionistic string effects, variations in tone) stand in contrast to the rigorous serialism that under-girds the work's structure.

In a burst of creativity following a near fatal collapse on 2 August 1946, Arnold Schönberg composed 3 important works in a row : the String Trio ; « A Survivor from Warsaw » ; and « Phantasy » . Although the Trio was written after the collapse, the commission from Arthur Tillman Merritt of Harvard University came earlier ; Schönberg had already begun plans for the piece, in June 1946. Musicians and audiences have speculated about the « auto-biographical » nature of this composition, but it is good to know what Arnold Schönberg wrote, in 1949, about what he jokingly called : « my fatality » ...

« I awoke with a terrible pain in my chest. I sprang from the bed and sat-down in my arm-chair. (I must correct this, for I just remembered that it was different : I awoke with an extremely unpleasant feeling, but without a definite pain, but I hurried in spite of it (!) to my armchair.) I became continually worse. We called doctors. I had believed that I had a heart-attack or heart spasm. But Doctor Jones determined that this was not the case and gave me an injection of Dilaudid “ in order to bring the patient at ease ”. It worked very quickly. The pain went away. Then, I must have lost consciousness. For the last thing that I heard was my wife saying “ you take his feet and I will take his shoulders ” and, apparently, they returned me to the bed. I do not know how long I was unconscious. It must have been several hours, for the 1st thing I remember was that a man with coal-black hair was bending over me and making every effort to feed me something. My wife said (to keep me from being alarmed !) : “ This is the doctor ! ” But I remember having been astonished since Doctor Jones had silver-white hair. It was Gene, the male nurse. An enormous person, a former boxer, who could pick me up and put me down again like a sofa cushion. »

The Trio, which Schönberg described to many people as « a “ humorous ” representation of my sickness » , was begun on 20 August, only 3 weeks after the episode, and was completed on 23 September 1946. The sketches include the writing and re-writing of the 12 note set on which the piece is based. Schönberg often started in this fashion, but atypically there is a detailed chart, measure by measure, of the form of the piece. The Trio contains some of the most virtuosic string writing in his entire output, which the composer recognized by providing various ossia in all 3 parts. Thomas Mann, in his account of the origins of « Doctor Faustus », reported a conversation with Schönberg :

« The work was extremely difficult to play, he said, in fact, almost impossible or, at best, only for 3 players of virtuoso rank ; but, on the other hand, the music was very rewarding because of its extraordinary tonal effects. »

The music is deep enough to bear-up to any kind of listening. It can be heard in the context of common practice harmony, as a melodic and textural essay, or as a story which describes a near death experience, an injection to the heart, and Gene, the male nurse.

Joseph Keilberth

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Joseph Keilberth est né le 19 avril 1908 à Karlsruhe et est mort le 20 juillet 1968 à Munich. Il est un spécialiste de Richard Wagner notamment, qu'il dirigea fréquemment au Festival de Bayreuth à partir de 1952. De 1950 à sa mort, il a été à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Bamberg, ville de taille modeste mais dotée d'une des phalanges les plus prestigieuses d'Allemagne. Immensément doué (Sergiu Celibidache l'admirait beaucoup) mais peu enclin aux répétitions, Keilberth a laissé, à l'instar de Hans Knappertsbusch, des enregistrements où le coup de génie voisine avec le laisser-aller le plus consternant, sur un mode cependant plus aimable et souriant que celui de son illustre aîné. Keilberth est fréquemment apparu en tant que chef-invité au Festival de Salzbourg. Il mourut d'une crise cardiaque, la baguette à la main, en dirigeant « Tristan und Isolde » à Munich. 21 ans plus tard, sur la même estrade, le chef italien Giuseppe Patanè connut le même sort en dirigeant « le Barbier de Séville » .

The German conductor Joseph Keilberth was born on April 19, 1908, in Karlsruhe and died on July 20, 1968, in Munich. He specialized in the Opera repertoire. He started his career in the State Theatre of his native city, Karlsruhe. In 1940, he became director of the German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague. Near the end of World War II, he was appointed principal conductor of the venerable Saxon State Opera Orchestra in Dresden. In 1949, he became chief conductor of the Bamberg Symphony, formed mainly of German musicians expelled from post-War Czechoslovakia under the Beneš decrees. He died in Munich in 1968 after collapsing while conducting Wagner's Opera « Tristan und Isolde » in exactly the same place as Felix Mottl was similarly fatally stricken in 1911. His final recording, a « Meistersinger » , at the Bavarian State Opera, on June 21st, came 1 month before his death.

Keilberth was a regular at Bayreuth in the early 1950's, with complete « Ring » cycles from 1952, 1953, and 1955, as well as a well-regarded recording of « Die Walküre » from 1954 (the whereabouts of rest of the cycle are unclear) in which Martha Mödl, perhaps the greatest Wagnerian actress and tragedian, performs her only recorded « Sieglinde » . He made the 1st stereo recording of Wagner's « Ring Cycle » in 1955, as well as a so-called « 2nd cycle » with Mödl, rather than Astrid Varnay, as « Brünnhilde » . Mödl's accounts of « Brünnhilde » , from the 1953 « Ring » as well as the 1955 « 2nd cycle » , are her only recordings of the role other than Wilhelm Fürtwängler's 1953 Rome « Ring » .

Among his other recordings, his interpretations of Wagner's « Lohengrin » at the 1953 Bayreuth Festival released on « Decca - London » , Weber's « Der Freischütz » made in 1958 for « EMI » , and a « live » set of Richard Strauß's « Arabella » (featuring Lisa Della Casa and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau) made in 1963 for « DG » are still considered among the best versions. He conducted the TV broadcast German-translation performance of « The Barber of Seville » , featuring Fritz Wunderlich, Hermann Prey, and Hans Hotter. His Haydn 85th Symphony and Brahms 4th Symphony recordings on Telefunken are no less distinguished.

Joseph Keilberth was a German conductor active during the mid- 20th Century. His talents developed early : he pursued a general education and musical training in Karlsruhe and, at the age of 17, he joined the Karlsruhe State Theatre as a « répétiteur » (vocal coach : a common starting place for European conductors) . He remained with the theatre and, 10 years later, he was appointed general music-director. He remained there until 1940, when he was appointed chief conductor of the German Philharmonic Orchestra of Prague. He became chief conductor of the Dresden State Opera in 1945. With a minimum of disruption for de-Nazification (official Allied certification that he was not implicated in Nazi crimes) , he remained in that position until 1950. In 1949, he became chief conductor of the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra, which was in fact a reunion. After the War, the German population of the « Sudetenland » (the German-speaking part of Czechoslovakia) , which had been the excuse for Adolf Hitler's occupation of the country, were returned to Germany and, with them, went the German Philharmonic of Prague, Keilberth's old orchestra, which settled in Bamberg. Causing unwary biographers some confusion, he also became the chief conductor of the Hamburg Philharmonic in 1950. He frequently appeared as a guest-conductor elsewhere in Germany, notably with the Berlin Philharmonic and, beginning in 1952, the Bayreuth Festival, and appeared regularly at the Salzburg and Lucerne Festivals. In 1952, he also led his 1st performance in the Edinburgh Festival with the Hamburg State Opera. He was a favored conductor for the « Ring » and other Operas through 1956. In 1959, he succeeded Ferenc Fricsay at the helm of the Bavarian State Opera, in Munich. There, history repeated itself. Keilberth died after collapsing during a performance of Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » , just as Felix Mottl (conductor at the same theatre) had done in 1911. Keilberth was very strong in Mozart and in the Wagnerian repertory, and in later German Classics such as Anton Bruckner, Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner, Max Reger and Paul Hindemith. His Classic recordings included Hindemith's Opera « Cardillac » .

Joseph Keilberth (geboren 19. April 1908 in Karlsruhe ; gestorben 20. Juli 1968 in München) war ein deutscher Konzert- und Operndirigent. Seine Familie stammte aus der Oberpfalz. Der Großvater war Militärmusikmeister (Dirigent) in München, der Vater Solocellist an der Badischen Hofkapelle Karlsruhe. Er ist auf dem Waldfriedhof in Grünwald bei München beigeetzt.

Joseph Keilberth begann 1925 seine Karriere am Badischen Staatstheater in Karlsruhe, zunächst als Korrepetitor für die Badische Staatskapelle Karlsruhe, ehe er zum Kapellmeister ernannt wurde. 1935 bewarb er sich um den Posten des Generalmusikdirektors in seiner Heimatstadt und setzte sich gegen seinen Mitbewerber Herbert von Karajan durch. Ob er bereits vor der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten oder überhaupt dem völkisch gesinnten Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur und später der Nachfolgeorganisation, der Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde, angehörte, wie Fred K. Prieberg behauptet, ist zweifelhaft, da eine Beitrittserklärung mit der Unterschrift bisher nicht vorliegt. Bei der Bewertung von Dokumenten wäre zudem zu berücksichtigen, daß Keilberth den gleichen Vornamen wie sein Vater führte, zum fraglichen Zeitpunkt unter der gleichen Adresse wohnte und noch dazu am gleichen Theater engagiert war. Gesichert ist hingegen, daß Keilberth bis zum Zeitpunkt des Verbots der Karlsruher Schlaraffengesellschaft noch immer als « Ritter Kla-Mottl der zartbesaitete » Mitglied der « Schlaraffia Carolsuhu » war. Noch im Januar 1939 führte er mit dem Karlsruher Orchester ein Werk Igor Strawinskys auf, der von den Nationalsozialisten als Kulturbolschewist bezeichnet und abgelehnt wurde.

1940 übernahm Keilberth auf Empfehlung Wilhelm Furtwänglers als Generalmusikdirektor das Deutsche Philharmonische Orchester in Prag, das dort schon in der kaiserlich und königlich Monarchie bestanden hatte und nun im sogenannten Reichsprotektorat Böhmen und Mähren weiter existierte. Ein Konzert Keilberths, das in Zusammenhang mit Adolf Hitlers Geburtstag steht, ist nicht bekannt. Er dirigierte das Prager Orchester bei circa 400 Auftritten, Musik von erst durch die Nationalsozialisten geförderten Komponisten fand Eingang in etwa 20 Programme. Da es Keilberth gelang, für den Prager Klangkörper eine Einstufung als « u. k. » (« unabhkömmlich ») zu erreichen, was eine Einberufung von Musikern verhinderte, bestand das Orchester bis in die letzten Tage des Zweiten Weltkriegs fort und konnte noch am 1. Mai 1945 einen Beethoven-Abend in Prag geben. Laut Prieberg war Keilberth von 1942 bis 1945 Landesleiter der Reichsmusikkammer im Reichsprotektorat Böhmen und Mähren. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn vor einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

Nach Inhaftierung und Zwangsarbeit wurde Joseph Keilberth mit seiner Familie nach Sachsen abgeschoben und erreichte am 10. Juni 1945 Dresden. Er wurde umgehend zum Oberleiter der Sächsischen Staatskapelle Dresden berufen und eröffnete die Konzertsaison am 16. Juli 1945. Keilberth hatte die Position bis 1949 inne, blieb aber bis 1950 in Dresden. Außerdem wirkte er von 1948 bis 1951 als Leitender Kapellmeister der Staatskapelle Berlin, die zu dieser Zeit im Admiralspalast spielte, da die Lindenoper zerstört war und erst am 4. September 1955 wieder eröffnet wurde.

Ab 1950 bis zu seinem Tod 1968 wirkte Joseph Keilberth als Chefdirigent der Bamberger Symphoniker, die nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg in Bamberg aus seinem Prager Orchester hervorgegangen waren. Von 1951 bis 1959 amtierte er als Hamburgischer Generalmusikdirektor und Leiter des Philharmonischen Staatsorchesters Hamburg. 1959 wechselte er auf den Posten des Bayerischen Generalmusikdirektors an der Bayerischen Staatsoper in München. Keilberth starb 1968 am Dirigentenpult während einer Festspielaufführung von Richard Wagners Tristan und Isolde im Nationaltheater München. Bis heute war er der einzige Dirigent, der in Bayern zweien der führenden Orchester des Landes gleichzeitig vorstand.

Von 1952 bis 1956 dirigierte Joseph Keilberth insgesamt 56 Vorstellungen bei den Richard-Wagner Festspielen in Bayreuth. 1955 nahm er dort den gesamten Ring des Nibelungen im Auftrag der Firma « Decca » zum ersten Mal als Live-Mitschnitt in Stereo auf. Aus rechtlichen Gründen (inzwischen hatte die Firma « EMI » die Exklusivrechte für Aufnahmen aus Bayreuth erworben) durften diese Aufnahmen nicht veröffentlicht werden. Die Aufnahmen verschwanden im Archiv und wurden erst 2006 zum ersten Mal veröffentlicht. Außerdem trat er ab 1957 bei den Salzburger Festspielen sowie beim Lucerne Festival und den Wiener Festwochen auf. Als ständiger Gast arbeitete er ab 1936 mit den Berliner Philharmonikern und den Münchner Philharmonikern, ab 1943 mit den Wiener Symphonikern, ab 1944 mit den Wiener Philharmonikern, ab 1951 mit dem Musikkollegium Winterthur sowie ab 1965 mit dem NHK Symphony Orchestra Tokyo. Daneben gab es zahlreiche Produktionen und Konzerte beim Bayerischen Rundfunk, dem Westdeutschen Rundfunk in Köln und dem Süddeutschen Rundfunk in Stuttgart.

Joseph Keilberth wurde insbesondere durch seine Mozart-, Beethoven- und Wagner-Interpretationen sowie durch Aufführungen der Werke von Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms, Bedřich Smetana, Antonín Dvořák, Max Reger, Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner und Paul Hindemith bekannt. Auf zahlreichen Gastspielreisen war er außerordentlich erfolgreich. Er hat mit den namhaftesten Orchestern sowie Gesangs- und Instrumentalsolisten eine beachtliche Zahl von Schallplatten produziert, die eine wichtige Epoche deutscher Musikkultur dokumentieren.

Der Joseph-Keilberth-Saal der Konzerthalle Bamberg ist seit 1993 die neue Heimstatt der Bamberger Symphoniker - Bayerische Staatsphilharmonie. Auch ein Saal im Wohnstift Karlsruhe-Rüppurr ist nach ihm benannt, ebenso eine Grundschule im Norden Münchens. Straßen in Dresden, Grünwald und München tragen ebenfalls den Namen des Dirigenten.

Manche meinten, als Wilhelm Furtwängler gestorben war, hätte Joseph Keilberth sein Nachfolger werden müssen. Tatsächlich dirigierte Keilberth und nicht Karajan das Gedächtniskonzert der Berliner Philharmoniker für den siebzigjährigen Furtwängler und die Uraufführung seiner nachgelassenen Symphonie. In Furtwänglers angestammtem Bereich, das heißt mit der Darstellung Beethovens, legitimierte sich Keilberth schon, als er während der dreißiger Jahre zum erstenmal als Gast aus Karlsruhe in der Berliner Philharmonie erschien. Zwar war der neue Klang einer jüngeren Generation damals so wenig zu überhören wie heute, wenn Keilberth in Bayreuth Richard Wagners Musik dirigierte. Aber die männliche Kraft, die Frische und Bewegtheit, mit der dieser Musiker die Form und nicht eine Deutung hinstellte, das hatte von Anfang an auch eine echte Beziehung zum Geist der großen Tradition. So ist es nicht verwunderlich, daß Keilberth heute in seinen Hamburger Philharmonischen Konzerten konsequent einen bestimmten Programmteil jener « Zwischengeneration » einräumt, der sich der hamburgische Generalmusikdirektor innerlich verbunden fühlt : Max Reger, Gustav Mahler, Hans Pfitzner, Richard Strauß.

Keilberth ist ebenso alt wie Herbert von Karajan. Sie wurden 1908 geboren. Doch an Keilberths Nam' und Art haftet gar nichts Sensationelles. Vom Weltpodium Bayreuth aus, wo er die Hauptlast der musikalischen Leitung trägt, dringt sein Ruhm in aller Herren Länder. Indessen steht der breitschultrige Mann selbst, ein junges, frisches Gesicht unter weißmeliertem Haar, irgendwo abseits mit einem Bekannten im Gespräch, von niemandem bemerkt, während als Stars der Pausen-Publicity die Begum und die Sänger umringt werden. Wer Keilberths Neigungen kennt, der weiß, daß ein Zufluchtsort für ihn seine Bibliothek ist, daß Schopenhauer und Thomas Mann dort seine bevorzugten Gesellschafter sind.

Dieses innere Wesensbild tritt mit zunehmenden Jahren auch als Erscheinungsbild hervor. Anfangs machte Keilberth eher den Eindruck eines vorwiegend musikantischen, vitalen, fast vierschrotigen Mannes. Mit drei Sprüngen vollzog sich sein Aufstieg. In Karlsruhe, seiner Vaterstadt, begann Joseph Keilberth mit 17 Jahren als Korrepetitor am Badischen Staatstheater. Mit 27 wurde er Generalmusikdirektor dieses Instituts, mit 37 musikalischer Oberleiter der Dresdener Staatsoper. Das war allerdings im Jahre 1945, als das zerstörte Dresden von den Russen besetzt war. Dazwischen lag Prag. 1940 hatte Keilberth den Auftrag erhalten, ein Deutsches Philharmonisches Orchester in Prag zu gründen und zu leiten - eine heikle Aufgabe. Dieser junge, künstlerische Repräsentationskörper des Deutschtums hatte (von der politischen Hypothek ganz abgesehen) die Konkurrenz der berühmten Tschechischen Philharmonie unter Václav Talich abzuhalten. Hier konnte sich nur ein Vollblutmusiker und ein Kämpfer wie Keilberth behaupten. Bei Kriegsende müssen seine persönlichen Erlebnisse dann entsetzlich gewesen sein. Daß mit 37 Jahren sein Haar ergraute, führt Keilberth auf jene Ereignisse zurück. Als sich noch im Jahre des Zusammenbruchs die Dresdener Opernleitung und daneben regelmäßige Gastspiele an der Ostberliner Oper als Brücke des Entkommens anboten, dürfte sich Keilberth keiner Täuschung mehr hingeeben haben. Den « Nationalpreis » der Sowjetzone, mit dem er dekoriert wurde, gab er sofort an die Dresdner Staatskapelle weiter - ein für die Machthaber peinlicher Präzedenzfall, der sofort für die Zukunft unterbunden wurde. 1951 nahm Joseph Keilberth dann den Ruf nach Hamburg als Leiter des Philharmonischen Staatsorchesters und seiner Symphoniekonzerte an.

Aus der Prager Saat ist aber doch noch eine deutsche Frucht gereift. Als « Bamberger Symphoniker » sammelten sich die Reste von Keilberths Prager Orchester in Franken. Es komplettierte sich zu einem hervorragenden Konzertorchester. Keilberth übernahm neben seiner Hamburger Tätigkeit wieder die Oberleitung und führte dieses inzwischen international renommierte Ensemble bis nach Amerika. So ist Keilberth, auch darin Furtwängler vergleichbar, hauptamtlich zum Konzertdirigenten geworden, ist die Oper in Bayreuth und mit den Münchner Festspielen an den allerdings bedeutungsvollen Rand seiner Tätigkeit gerückt. Günther Rennert sicherte sich neuerdings die außerordentliche Potenz des Operndirigenten Keilberth wenigstens mit einem Gastvertrag für die Hamburgische Staatsoper. Als Keilberth in diesem Rahmen Mozarts « Così fan tutte » einstudiert hatte, da spürten beglückt auch in Hamburg Sänger und Hörer : Fast noch mehr als im Spiel mit den Instrumenten blüht Keilberth auf, gibt er Letztes beispielhaft in der Führung menschlicher Stimmen.

9. März 1949 : Joseph Keilberth als Gastdirigent bei den Bamberger Symphoniker.

Bamberg wurde für viele Flüchtlinge und Vertriebene aus dem Osten, aber auch für Fliehende aus den zerbombten westdeutschen Städten eine neue Heimat. Für eine Vielzahl von Musikern des ehemaligen Deutschen Philharmonischen Orchesters Prag, aber auch anderen vertriebenen oder geflohenen Künstlern bot Bamberg eine Zukunft, da man sich dort, angeregt durch Doktor Etzel (Mitglied des Bamberger Bürgerkomitees) um die Einrichtung eines Orchesters bemühte. Sein Debüt (einen Beethoven-Abend) gab das Bamberger Tonkünstlerorchester am 16. März 1946 unter Leitung von Bertil Wetzelsberger. Mit Hans Knappertsbusch am Dirigentenpult erreichte das Ensemble, das inzwischen in Joseph Keilberth Bamberger Symphoniker Am Ende dieses Konzertabends stand die Eroica von Ludwig van Beethoven, das Stück, mit dem die Arbeit von Keilberth und dem Deutschen Philharmoniker Orchester vier Jahre zuvor geendet hatte. umbenannt worden war, bereits zwischen 1947 und 1949 erste große Erfolge. Als Josef Keilberth für ein Gastdirigat gewonnen werden konnte, waren der ehemalige Dirigent und große Teile des Deutschen Philharmonischen Orchesters in Prag wiedervereint, denn es war Joseph Keilberth gewesen, der am 5. Mai 1945 eine für diesen Tag angesetzte Orchesterprobe wegen antideutscher Ausschreitungen in Prag absagen hatte müssen und damit die Auflösung des Ensembles eingeleitet hatte. Kurze Zeit nach seinem Gastauftritt konnte Joseph Keilberth am 27. Januar 1950 als Chefdirigent der Bamberger Symphoniker verpflichtet werden. 1950 erhielt das Ensemble seinen ersten eigenen Konzertraum : die ehemalige Dominikanerkirche, die Symphoniker für 43 Jahre (bis zur Einweihung der Sinfonie an der Regnitz) nutzten.

Bis zu 120 Konzerte in rund 70 Städten pro Jahr gehören heute zum Alltag des Orchesters. Werke von bis zu 45 Komponisten zählen dabei zum Repertoire. Dazu kommen jährlich etwa 40 Tage Rundfunk- und Schallplattenaufnahmen mit weiteren oft zeitgenössischen Werken. Eine Besonderheit im Tourneekalender stellte 1991 eine Konzertreise nach Prag dar. Zum erstenmal konnte das Orchester an den Ort seines musikalischen Ursprungs zurückkehren und obwohl zu dieser Zeit keiner der „Prager“ mehr aktiv im Ensemble wirkte, begleiteten viele als Pensionäre die Bamberger Symphoniker.

Le « RIAS Symphonie Orchester »

L'Orchestre symphonique allemand de Berlin ou « Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » (DSO-Berlin) fut créé en 1946.

Le « DSO-Berlin » est l'un des 9 Orchestres de Berlin. Il présente la particularité d'avoir déjà changé plusieurs fois de nom dans sa relativement courte existence en raison de l'histoire de son pays et de sa ville. Ces précisions sont importantes pour l'identification de l'Orchestre.

En 1946, Berlin est occupé par 4 puissances étrangères qui se partagent la ville en autant de secteurs. Les États-Unis dotent leur secteur d'une station de radio (« Rundfunk im amerikanischen Sektor », ou « RIAS »), elle-même dotée d'un Orchestre, qui prend donc le nom de « RIAS-Symphonie-Orchester ». Son 1er chef principal est le Hongrois Ferenc Fricsay, de 1948 à son décès en 1963 - avec une interruption de 1954 à 1959.

Avec la partition de l'Allemagne, les 3 secteurs des pays alliés sont réunis pour former Berlin-Ouest. Le secteur américain n'existant plus en tant que tel, l'Orchestre est renommé, en 1956, « Radio-Symphonie-Orchester Berlin »

(RSO-Berlin) . Pendant ce temps, l'autre Orchestre radio-symphonique, le « Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin » (fondé en 1923) , appartient à Berlin-Est, donc à la République Démocratique Allemande.

Après la réunification de l'Allemagne et de Berlin, l'Orchestre change une nouvelle fois de nom, pour éviter l'homonymie avec l'autre « RSO » . C'est en 1993 qu'il devient le « DSO-Berlin » , le « Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester » , plus ancien, gardant son nom.

Chefs principaux :

Ingo Metzmacher (2007-2010) .

Kent Nagano (2000-2006) .

Vladimir Ashkenazy (1989-1999) .

Riccardo Chailly (1982-1989) .

Lorin Maazel (1964-1975) .

Ferenc Fricsay (1959-1963) .

Ferenc Fricsay (1948-1954) .

The « Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » is an Orchestra based in Berlin, Germany. It was founded in 1946 by American occupation forces as the « RIAS-Symphonie-Orchester » (« RIAS » being an acronym for « Rundfunk im amerikanischen Sektor » : Radio In the American Sector) . It was also known as the « American Sector Symphony Orchestra » . In 1956, the Radio Orchestra was renamed the « Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra » (« Radio-Symphonie-Orchester Berlin ») . In 1993, the Orchestra took on its present name. The Orchestra's 1st principal conductor was Ferenc Fricsay.

Between the chief conductorships of Lorin Maazel and Riccardo Chailly, the Orchestra did not have a single chief conductor. The major conductors who worked with the Orchestra during this period, from 1976 to 1982, were Erich Leinsdorf, Eugen Jochum, Gerd Albrecht, Gennady Rozhdestvensky and Neville Marriner. The Orchestra returned to having a single chief conductor in 1982 with Riccardo Chailly. Ingo Metzmacher became principal conductor as of the 2007-2008 season, with an original initial contract was until 2011. However, after reports of disputes over financing and a threatened reduction in the size of the Orchestra, in March 2009, Metzmacher announced his early resignation from the « DSO-Berlin » principal conductorship as of the summer of 2010. His final concerts as the Orchestra's principal conductor were in June 2010, in Berlin ; and in August 2010, at « The Proms » .

The « DSO-Berlin » has recorded commercially for several labels, including « Harmonia Mundi » .

The « Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » (DSO-Berlin) is one of the 3 fine international class Orchestras located in the capital city of the re-unified German Federal Republic and has a history growing-out of the separation of the city and nation. The American authorities established a station called « RIAS » (Radio in the American Sector) , which established the « RIAS-Symphony Orchestra » , in 1946. It soon became known, in particular for its performances of modern Classics. Its most important early conductor was the talented Hungarian Ferenc Fricsay, who did much towards establishing the post-War reputation of his countryman Béla Bartók through his performances and recordings with the Orchestra. He was music-director in 1948-1954, and again in 1960-1963. The American Lorin Maazel (1964-1975) continued this tradition.

West-Berlin was given a separate government in the 1950's and, to reflect that, the « RIAS Orchestra » eventually changed its name to « Berlin-Radio Symphony Orchestra » . Many members of the Orchestra happened to live in East-Berlin and could no longer travel to their jobs, on the other side of the Berlin Wall ; the converse was true of West-Berlin residents who worked for the 2 Opera Houses and the Orchestra in East-Berlin (including its own Radio Orchestra) . In effect, all these ensembles and organizations swapped much of their membership.

The « Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra » continued its position as the 2d Orchestra of West-Berlin with music-director Riccardo Chailly (1982-1988) , whose fine recording of the Bruckner 7th Symphony showed a richness and smoothness of sound, in no way inferior to that of the vaunted Berlin Philharmonic. After Chailly, Vladimir Ashkenazy became music-director (1989-1999) .

Following the collapse of East Germany, destruction of the Wall, and the resulting reunification, the « Berlin-RSO » renamed itself the « Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester Berlin » . It became part of an organization named ROC : « Rundfunk-Orchester und -Chöre GmbH Berlin » (Radio Orchestras and Choruses Corporation of Berlin) . ROC is essentially a contractor that puts on its own concerts and provides its five ensembles for broadcasting work by the various radio organizations of the city. These 5 ensembles are the « RIAS » Big-Band, « RIAS-Kammerchor » (« RIAS » Chamber Choir) , the « Rundfunkchor Berlin » (Berlin Broadcasting Chorus) , the « DSO-Berlin » , and the « Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin » (Berlin Broadcasting Symphony Orchestra, the present identity of the former East Germany's Berlin Radio Orchestra) .

The « Deutsches Symphonie-Orchester » continues to play a mix of standard repertoire, 20th Century Masterworks with an emphasis on German and Austrian Classics, and the most recent orchestral repertory. It gives concerts in the « Philharmonie » , the « Gendarmenmarkt » Concert House, and the major broadcasting companies' large concert studios. In the new Century, the « DSO-Berlin » 's chief conductor and artistic director position has been held by Kent Nagano (2000-2006) and Ingo Metzmacher (2007-2010) .

Das Deutsche Symphonie-Orchester Berlin (DSO) ist eines der größten Orchester in der deutschen Bundeshauptstadt Berlin. Es ist Mitglied der 1994 gegründeten Rundfunk-Orchester und -Chöre GmbH (ROC) .

Als nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg im US-amerikanischen Sektor der DIAS (Drahtfunk im amerikanischen Sektor) und später der RIAS begründet wurden, entstand 1946 auch das RIAS-Symphonie-Orchester (RSO) .

1956 wurde das Orchester in Radio-Symphonie-Orchester Berlin umbenannt, da der zwei Jahre zuvor gegründete Sender Freies Berlin mit einem Produktionsvertrag bei dem Orchester einstieg und eine Namensänderung wünschte.

1993 kam es zum erneuten Namenswechsel zum Deutschen Symphonie-Orchester Berlin, um Verwechslungen mit dem Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin (RSB) zu vermeiden, ebenfalls einem Mitglied der ROC.

Ende 2009 gab es kurzzeitig einen Plan, mit Beginn der Saison 2011-2012 das Deutsche Symphonie-Orchester Berlin mit dem Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin zu einem Klangkörper zu fusionieren, der dann unter der Leitung von Marek Janowski stehen sollte. Aufgrund des großen Widerstands wurde der Plan jedoch wieder verworfen.

2009 verzeichnete das Orchester mit 87.090 Besuchern bei 51 Konzerten einen absoluten Besucherrekord. Damit wurde jedes Konzert von 1.453 Zuhörern besucht, die damit für eine Auslastung von rund 84 Prozent sorgten. Der Ticketverkauf konnte 2009 um 243.000 Euro auf rund 1,66 Millionen Euro gesteigert werden.

Nachdem Chefdirigent Ingo Metzmacher aus Protest gegen Etatkürzungen sein Engagement nicht über die Spielzeit 2009-2010 hinaus verlängerte, war das Orchester vorübergehend ohne Chefdirigent.

À la fin de janvier 1946, Wilhelm Furtwängler alla à Vienne où eut lieu, au début de mars, la dénazification autrichienne. La dénazification allemande eut lieu à Berlin, les 11 et 17 décembre 1946.

Le 28 décembre 1946, Furtwängler rendit visite à Carl Jung dans sa propriété de Rüdeshheim (appelée : Château Boosenburg) . Était également présent Walter Giesecking qui donna un petit concert en interprétant des œuvres de Bach, Ravel et Debussy. Auparavant, Furtwängler l'avait accompagné dans les Variations pour 2 pianos, Opus 56b, de Brahms. Au même moment, le Docteur Jung reçut un télégramme de Hans Pfitzner : « M'avez-vous oublié ? » Il s'agissait d'une livraison de vin ! Furtwängler était d'excellente humeur car il raconta de manière « humoristique » (sic) ses procès en dénazification.

Un intéressant échange de correspondance entre Jung et Furtwängler (de 1946 à 1949) existe. Il est en particulier fait mention de « propos » du violoniste Gerhard Taschner que Furtwängler avait nommé 1er violon de la Philharmonie de Berlin. Ainsi, Furtwängler écrit le 23 juin, à Jung :

« Taschner s'est exprimé de manière très “ négative ” sur l'Orchestre et moi-même. »

Et, le même jour, à Taschner lui-même :

« Ce que vous avez dit durant ma dénazification n'est pas très beau mais je considère que c'est du domaine du passé. »

Carl Jung avait pris la succession de son père qui avait fondé, en 1868, la firme « Jung », célèbre pour sa production de vin sans alcool. Il avait étudié la musique et était, depuis 1917, un ami de Paul Hindemith. Il avait épousé, en 1919, Elisabeth von Zwerger qui lui donna 3 fils. La famille s'installa en 1939 à Rüdesheim qui, après la guerre, fut le lieu de rencontre de nombreux et célèbres musiciens (Ludwig Hoelscher, Walter Giesecking, le compositeur Wolfgang Fortner, Gerhard Taschner et sa femme Gerda Nette) . Le Boosenburg fut le théâtre de mémorables soirées de musique de chambre avec le trio Hoelscher, Giesecking et Taschner.

Nachruf in der Zeitung und Würdigung Hans Vogt und Wolfgang Rehm.

Bekannt wurde er vor allem durch musikkritische Neuausgaben der Opern « Carmen » , von Georges Bizet 1964 und « Hoffmanns Erzählungen » von Jacques Offenbach 1976, zu denen er jeweils ausführliche kritische Berichte erstellte.

Fritz Öser widmete sich, zeitweise auch unter dem Pseudonym « Paul Friedrich » (vornehmlich in der Funktion des Übersetzers, aber auch in der des Bearbeiters) Bühnenwerken von Ján Cikker, Christoph Willibald Gluck, Carl Millöcker, Nikolai Rimski-Korsakow, Peter Iljitsch Tschaikowski oder von Gioachino Rossini, wobei er sich in vielen Fällen, wie schon bei der « Carmen » , der Mitarbeit bedeutender Regisseure seiner Generation, wie etwa Walter Felsenstein und Günther Rennert, vergewisserte.

Leighton Lucas

The English conductor and composer Leighton Lucas was born on 5 January 1903 and died on 1 November 1982.

He was born into a musical family : his father, Clarence Lucas, was also a noted composer. Leighton began his career as a dancer for Sergei Diaghilev's « Ballets Russes » (1918-1921) . He became a ballet conductor at 19, as well as a self-taught composer of religious works and film music.

He is particularly noted for his film compositions, including the scores for « Target for Tonight » (1941) , Alfred Hitchcock's « Stage Fright » (1950) , « Ice-Cold in Alex » (1958) and the incidental music for « The Dam Busters » (based on the title March by composer Eric Coates) .

Benjamin Britten wrote that Lucas's « Partita » for piano and chamber orchestra (1934) was « very interesting, especially quite lovely Sarabande » . Lucas's « Sinfonia Brevis » for horn and 11 instruments (1936 ?) may be one of the earliest British scores to incorporate Balinese gamelan effects (it was heard by Benjamin Britten who went on to use such effects in his music from « Paul Bunyan ») .

Volkmar Andreae

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre suisse Volkmar Andreae est né le 5 juillet 1879 à Berne et est mort le 19 juin 1962 à Zürich. Il apprend le piano et est l'élève de Karl Munzinger. De 1897 à 1900, il étudie à la « Hochschule für Musik » de Cologne où il est élève de Fritz Brun, Franz Wüllner et Friedrich Wilhelm Franke. En 1900, il est répétiteur à la « Hofoper » de Munich.

En 1902, il reprend la direction du « Gemischten Chores Zürich », et cela jusqu'en 1949. En parallèle, il assure la direction du « Stadsängerverein Winterthur » de 1902 à 1914 et, de 1904 à 1914, du « Männerchores Zürich ». En outre, de 1906 à 1949, il est chef titulaire de l'Orchestre de la « Tonhalle » et, de 1914 à 1939, directeur du Conservatoire de Zürich.

Ensuite, il est chef d'orchestre, enseignant et compositeur à Vienne. Sa prédilection était pour les Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner dont il fut le 1er à jouer, en 1953, l'intégralité pour la Radio autrichienne avec les « Wiener Symphoniker » (l'Orchestre Symphonique de Vienne). Il les a aussi jouées avec l'Orchestre Symphonique d'État autrichien et avec la « Tonhalle » de Zürich. Le cycle a été publié pour la 1re fois en CD, en 2009.

Volkmar Andreæ est mort à Zürich, le 19 juin 1962.

Les propres compositions d'Andreæ comprennent des Opéras, des œuvres symphoniques, de la musique de chambre, des Concertos pour piano, pour violon et pour hautbois, de la musique pour piano, pour chœur et des lieder.

The Swiss conductor and composer Volkmar Andreæ was born on 5 July 1879 in Bern and died on 18 June 1962. He received piano instruction as a child and his 1st lessons in composition with Karl Munzinger. From 1897 to 1900, he studied at the Cologne Conservatory and was a student of Fritz Brun, Franz Wüllner, Isidor Seiss and Friedrich Wilhelm Franke. In 1900, he was a soloist tutor at the Munich « Hofoper ». In 1902, he took-over the leadership of the Mixed Choir of Zürich (« Gemischten Chores Zürich »), where he remained until 1949, also leading the « Stadsängerverein Winterthur », from 1902 to 1914, and the « Männerchores Zürich », from 1904 to 1914.

From 1906 to 1949, he led the « Tonhalle » Orchestra Zürich and, from 1914 to 1939, the Conservatory of Zürich. Later, he worked as freelance composer in Vienna and worked internationally as a conductor (especially, with the works of Anton Bruckner). He died in Zürich, on 19 June 1962.

Volkmar Andreæ was born July 5, 1879, in Bern and died on 18 June, 1962, in Zürich. He was the son of Philipp Andreæ, a chemist, and Adelina Perroni. Andreæ spent his early childhood in Bern and was instructed in piano under Selma Stämpfli from the age of 5, until the completion of his under-graduate education in 1897. He then studied under Ernst Denhof and Dominik von Reding at the « Musikschule Bern » (Bern School of Music). Karl Munzinger (1842-1911) instructed Andreæ in composition and theory. Further education (1897-1900) followed at the Conservatory in Cologne, attended simultaneously by Fritz Brun. Andreæ studied composition under Franz Wüllner (1832-1902) and under Friedrich Wilhelm Franke (1862-1932).

In 1900, Volkmar Andreæ was engaged as solo répétiteur at the « Hofoper » in Munich, returning subsequently to Bern to study philosophy for a short period at Bern University. In 1901, he enlisted into the armed forces. After having completed his recruitment training, in 1899, he intended to dedicate his life to the military but was prevented from this by his friends Joseph Viktor Widmann and Friedrich Hegar. Andreæ was often released from his responsibilities at the « Tonhalle » in Zürich due to military service, particularly during the First World War. He was commander of the 3rd Infantry Battalion, in 1913. Andreæ 1st appeared in public in Bern on December 22, 1901, with the cantata « Charons Nachen », Opus 3. From 1902 until 1949, he conducted the « Gemischten Chor Zürich » after succeeding Hermann Suter (1870-1926) who went on to conduct the « Allgemeinen Musikgesellschaft » in Basel. Shortly after, Andreæ became the 2nd conductor, alongside Carl Attenhofer (1837-1914), of the « Männerchor Zürich », a choir which he was to become permanent conductor of, on of July 1, 1904, and remain so until 1924. In addition to this, he conducted the « Stadsängerverein Winterthur », from 1902 until 1914.

After substituting Friedrich Hegar a number of times due to illness, in 1904, and filling other obligations of his in following years, Volkmar Andreæ took-over the position of « Kapellmeister » of the « Tonhalleorchester » when Hegar stepped down, in 1906. Only in 1949, at the age of 70, did Andreæ retire from this post. He not only accomplished countless subscription concerts while in this position but was also responsible for the Musician's Festival of the General German Music Association, in 1901, and for the implementation of the International Bruckner Festival, in 1936. On May 14, 1907, Andreæ married Elisabeth Landis who bore him 3 children ; Hans, Ruth and Marianne. Andreæ was offered, but refused, the position of succeeding Gustav Mahler as conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1911. He was the conductor of the « Zürcher Studentengesangsvereins », between 1913 and 1917. This engagement presented him, like his predecessor Carl Attenhofer, with the post of a University Music Director. The associated « venia legendi » allowed him to lecture for 2 semesters on the musical form of Beethoven. The University of Zürich conferred the academic title of « Doctor Honoris Causa » to Andreæ on April 18, 1914. In the same year, he succeeded Carl Attenhofer (1837-1914) as the director of Zürich Conservatory where he taught not only score playing, but also conducting and composition. Since 1919, Andreæ worked together with Carl Vogler (1874-1951) who succeeded him on the Board of Directors in 1939, remaining there until 1945.

Andreæ's popularity grew during the 1920's and, with this, so the number of engagements he received from abroad, he was able thereby to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1922, leading subsequently to a concert tour through Switzerland with this Orchestra. Andreæ's dedication to professional Swiss musicians was made evident through his commitment to the Association of Swiss Musicians (ASM). Founded in 1900, he 1st became a member of the Board of Directors of the ASM, in 1909 ; from 1918 until 1920, vice president ; and, from 1920 until 1925, president thereof. On retiring from this position, he was officially nominated the 1st honorary president of the ASM. Important performances of his own work, for instance the Opera « Abenteuer des Casanova » (1924, Dresden), were being presented abroad. He increased his activities as a guest-conductor in foreign countries following his retirement from the « Tonhalle » in Zürich, where he also permitted many performances of contemporary music including works by his good friend Othmar Schöck. Besides concerts in Germany, Italy, France and Spain, others worthy of mention are those, particularly since the end of the War, with the « Wiener Philharmonikern ». This work was honoured by the presentation of the « Nicolai-Medaille ».

Volkmar Andreæ was, in his day, one of the leading conductors in Central Europe. As conductor of the Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra, he dominated Swiss music life for almost half a Century, while he was one of the 1st men anywhere to champion the Symphonies of Gustav Mahler. But his real gift lay in composition. His early style was influenced by Richard Strauß, but his music soon developed its own brand of Late-Romanticism. By turns, exuberant and melancholic and always sumptuously orchestrated, Andreæ's music is a major rediscovery. He composed Opera, Symphony and chamber music, piano, violin, and oboe Concertos, piano music, as well as choir music and songs.

Volkmar Andreæ is mentioned in Chapter XXI of Thomas Mann's novel « Doctor Faustus » , where he is cited as conducting the 13 Brentano Lieder by the fictional composer Adrian Leverkühn. This fictional concert is said to have taken place in 1922 in the « Tonhalle » , in Zürich.

Volkmar Andreae (geboren 5. Juli 1879 in Bern ; gestorben 19. Juni 1962 in Zürich) war ein Schweizer Dirigent und Komponist.

Andreae erhielt bereits als Kind Klavierunterricht und seinen ersten Kompositionsunterricht bei Karl Munzinger. Von 1897 bis 1900 studierte er an der Hochschule für Musik Köln und war Schüler von Fritz Brun, Franz Wüllner und Friedrich Wilhelm Franke. 1900 wurde er Solorepetitor der Münchener Hofoper. 1902 übernahm er die Leitung des Gemischten Chores Zürich, dem er bis 1949 vorstand, daneben von 1902 bis 1914 die Leitung des Sängerverein Winterthur und von 1904 bis 1914 des Männerchores Zürich. Von 1906 bis 1949 leitete er das Tonhalle-Orchester und von 1914 bis 1939 das Konservatorium von Zürich. Später lebte er als Lektor und freischaffender Komponist in Wien und trat international als Dirigent auf. Seine besondere Vorliebe galt den Sinfonien Anton Bruckners, von denen er auch 1953 für den österreichischen Rundfunk mit den Wiener Symphonikern die erste Gesamteinspielung überhaupt vorlegte. Da dieser Zyklus erst 2009 auf CD erschien, blieb Andreaes Einsatz für Bruckner allerdings lange wenig bekannt.

Andreaes kompositorisches Schaffen umfasst Opern, sinfonische und kammermusikalische Werke, ein Klavier- , ein Violin- und ein Oboenkonzert, Klaviermusik sowie Chormusik und Lieder.

10 septembre 1947 : Le chef Eduard van Beinum dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1885) , avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » (étiquette « Decca » ; étiquette « Dutton Laboratories » , CDK 1205) ; étiquette « Tahra » mono, CD : TAH 252) .

After the Second World War the only set of Bruckner's 7th Symphony was an eloquent, glowing performance by Eduard van Beinum and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, which sounded sumptuous at the time - and still does. It has just appeared in a very natural transfer by an unnamed engineer but side-jobs are nowhere near as expertly negotiated as in the recent « Dutton » transfer which is the one to have. « Dutton » does much greater justice to the richness of texture and orchestral detail on this set. Not having heard it since the 1950's, I had forgotten just how humane and radiant this performance is, simple and direct in utterance.

5 octobre 1947 : Le chef Winfried Zillig dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1876-1878, éditée par Robert Haas (1935) , avec le « Radio Symphonie Orchester Frankfurt » . Concert radiodiffusé. Some repeats not taken in the Scherzo.

Winfried Zillig

The German composer, music theorist, and conductor Winfried Zillig was born on 1 April 1905 in Würzburg and died on 18 December 1963, in Hamburg.

After leaving school, Zillig studied law and music. One of his teachers there was Hermann Zilcher. In Vienna, he was a private pupil of Arnold Schönberg, later following him to Berlin. His 1st compositions date from this time.

In 1927, he became the assistant of Erich Kleiber at the Berlin State Opera. A short time later, he became « répétiteur » to the Oldenburg Opera. In the years 1932 to 1937, he acted as « répétiteur » and « Kapellmeister » at the « Düsseldorf Oper » . Positions followed as « Kapellmeister » in Essen and, at the beginning of the 1940's, as the musical leader of the Posen Opera. After the end of World War II, he became the 1st « Kapellmeister » of the « Düsseldorfer Oper » . In the years 1947 to 1951, he occupied the position of conductor at the « HR-Sinfonieorchester » . After 1959, he led the musical division of « Norddeutscher Rundfunk » .

Winfried Zillig was very productive as a composer. His output includes Operas, Oratorios, Passions, choral music, serenades, String Quartets, and other chamber music, as well as lieder and suites. He was also responsible for completing the score of the Oratorio « Die Jakobsleiter » , which his former teacher Arnold Schönberg had left unfinished, at the request of Schönberg's widow. Furthermore, he made a name for himself as a music theorist with an emphasis on 12 tone technique.

Winfried Petrus Ignatius Zillig (geboren 1. April 1905 in Würzburg ; gestorben 18. Dezember 1963 in Hamburg) war ein deutscher Komponist, Musiktheoretiker und Dirigent.

Zillig, der Sohn eines Lehrers, studierte nach dem Besuch des Gymnasiums Rechtswissenschaften und Musik in Würzburg. Einer seiner Lehrer dort war Hermann Zilcher. In Wien wurde er Privatschüler von Arnold Schönberg, später folgte er ihm nach Berlin. Aus dieser Zeit stammen seine ersten Kompositionen.

1927 wurde er Assistent von Erich Kleiber an der Berliner Staatsoper. Kurze Zeit später ging er als Solorepetitor an das Oldenburgische Staatstheater. In den Jahren 1932 bis 1937 war er als Solorepetitor und Kapellmeister am Düsseldorfer Opernhaus unter Walter Bruno Iltz tätig. Es folgten Stellungen als Kapellmeister in Essen. Von 1939 bis 1943 war er Erster Kapellmeister an der Posener Oper, bevor er im Rahmen der Truppenbetreuung hauptsächlich in Berlin tätig war. 1940 wurde er innerhalb der Reichsmusikkammer Leiter der Fachschaft I des Gau's Wartheland.

In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus war Zillig Mitglied der Reichsmusikkammer und konnte sich als Komponist, besonders von Filmmusik, durchsetzen. 1934 schrieb er die Musik zum Historienfilm Schwarzer Jäger Johanna, der in der Nachkriegszeit durch die alliierten Militärbehörden verboten wurde. Sein Concerto grosso wurde 1935 zwiespältig aufgenommen. Trotzdem komponierte er seit 1935 mehrere Auftragswerke der Nationalsozialistischen Kulturgemeinde wie die Musik zum Schauspiel Europa brennt, die Filmmusik zu Rheinsymphonie und die Romantische Sinfonie in C-Dur, die im Rahmen der Reichstagung der NSKG uraufgeführt wurde. Seine 1937 in Hamburg uraufgeführte Oper Das Opfer dagegen wurde nach vier Aufführungen abgesetzt, nicht zuletzt wegen der ablehnenden Kritiken der NS-Presse, die ihm wegen der scharfen Dissonanzen und Atonalität einen « Irrweg » vorwarf. 1939 komponierte er, wie verschiedene andere Komponisten, eine Ersatzmusik zu Shakespeares Komödie Ein Sommernachtstraum, da Mendelssohns Bühnenmusik nicht mehr aufgeführt werden durfte. Seine 1941 in Leipzig uraufgeführte Oper Die Windsbraut schließlich gehörte stilistisch der Zwölftonmusik an, die er dem NS-Regime gegenüber in den Leipziger Neuesten Nachrichten als ein « Gestaltungsprinzip » verkaufte, das es « heute möglich macht ein großes Opus ganz streng aus einem einzigen Grundgedanken zu entwickeln, so streng, daß man jede Note, jede Melodie, irgendwie darauf beziehen oder davon ableiten kann ». 1943 schließlich komponierte er die Musik zu dem Propagandafilm Posen, Stadt im Aufbau sowie zu Kopernikus, wofür er den Sonderpreis des Reichspropagandaministeriums erhielt.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde Zillig Erster Kapellmeister an der Düsseldorfer Oper. In den Jahren 1947 bis 1951 war er Dirigent beim Sinfonie-Orchester des Hessischen Rundfunks, wobei er sich vor allem um die Aufführung von Werken der Neuen Musik verdient machte, die in der NS-Zeit verboten waren. Von 1958 bis 1963 leitete er die Musikabteilung beim Norddeutschen Rundfunk. In seinem Todesjahr 1963 erhielt er den Kulturpreis der Stadt Nürnberg.

Als Komponist war Winfried Zillig sehr produktiv. Sein kompositorisches Schaffen umfasst unter anderem Opern, Oratorien, Passionen, Choräle, Serenaden, Streichquartette und weitere Kammermusik sowie Lieder und Suiten. Darüber hinaus vollendete er die Partitur zum Oratorium Die Jakobsleiter, die sein einstiger Lehrer Arnold Schönberg unvollendet gelassen hatte. Dies geschah auf Wunsch von dessen Witwe. Auch erstellte Zillig die Klavierauszüge zu den Schönberg-Opern Moses und Aron (Kl. am Mainz 1957) sowie Von heute auf Morgen (Kl. Am Mainz 1961) . Zillig schuf außerdem etliche Filmmusiken, unter anderem zum zweiteiligen Dokumentarfilm Traumstrasse der Welt und dem experimentellen Spielfilm Jonas (1957) . Er machte sich auch als Musiktheoretiker mit dem Schwerpunkt Zwölftontechnik einen Namen.

Hermann Abendroth

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hermann (Paul Maximilian) Abendroth est né le 19 janvier 1883 à Francfort-sur-le-Main et est mort le 29 mai 1956 à Jéna. Il a admirablement servi la grande tradition symphonique allemande de Haydn à Brahms et à Bruckner.

Entre 1900 et 1903, il étudie la théorie musicale, la composition et le piano à Munich ; c'est le wagnérien Felix Mottl qui lui enseigne la direction d'orchestre avant qu'il ne devienne « Kapellmeister » à Lübeck, de 1905 à 1911, remplacé par Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Après un passage à Essen, il devient « Kapellmeister » à Cologne, de 1915 à 1934, dirige l'Orchestre du « Gürzenich » et le Conservatoire de la ville (1925-1934) . Avec cet orchestre, il établit sa réputation dans toute l'Europe et est invité plusieurs fois à diriger l'Orchestre symphonique de l'URSS ou l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres. Démis de ses fonctions à Cologne, en 1934, pour amitié supposée avec les Soviétiques, il est nommé à la tête du prestigieux Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig, en remplacement de Bruno Walter, lui-même démis en raison de ses origines juives. Il réalise un certain nombre d'enregistrements à la tête de l'Orchestre de chambre de Cologne, notamment d'œuvres de Vivaldi, Händel et Mozart. Abendroth occupe ce poste jusqu'en 1945, date à laquelle il quitte également la direction du Conservatoire de Leipzig où il avait été nommé en 1941.

Hermann Abendroth fut arrêté par la police à cause de ses convictions Libérales d'avant 1933. Il finit par adhérer au NSDAP afin de pouvoir exercer son métier. Il a toujours affirmé n'avoir jamais assisté à aucun rassemblement politique. Après la guerre, il devient le directeur musical de la ville de Weimar, de 1945 à 1956, puis revient à Leipzig afin d'y diriger l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Leipzig, de 1949 à 1956. Son dernier poste l'amène à Berlin, à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Berlin (Berlin-Est) , de 1953 à 1956. Il devient ainsi l'un des Maestros les plus appréciés de la République démocratique allemande (RDA) .

Très à l'aise dans le répertoire germanique, Hermann Abendroth a laissé des enregistrements des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner particulièrement réussis où il laisse exprimer son sens de la précision dans des tempos pourtant endiablés. Ses lectures, fiévreuses et nerveuses, sont à découvrir grâce à des enregistrements monophoniques de bonne qualité. On notera, entre autres, sa lecture exceptionnelle de la Ire Symphonie de Johannes Brahms, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (1941) , qui a récemment été ré-éditée à partir des archives, ou celle de la Symphonie n° 97 de Franz-Josef Haydn, enregistrée le 20 janvier 1955.

The German conductor Hermann (Paul Maximilian) Abendroth was born on 19 January 1883 in Frankfurt and died on 29 May 1956 in Jena.

Abendroth was the son of a book-seller. Several other members of the family were artists in diverse disciplines. After finishing his school studies at the Frankfurt « Gymnasium », Abendroth traveled to Munich for originally accomplishing the 1 year long studies of librarian, but he instead followed the music career at the Conservatory of Munich, the « Münchner Konservatorium », from 1900 to 1903, studying theory and composition with Ludwig Thuille, piano with Anna Hirtzel-Langendam, and developing his conducting skills working with Felix Mottl.

Still an undergraduate, Hermann Abendroth's 1st stable assignment of conducting was from 1903 to 1904, for the Orchestral Society of Munich. From 1905 to 1911, he moved to Lübeck, high-lighting as the « Kapellmeister » of the « Theater Lübeck ». From 1911 to 1914, he was the « Generalmusikdirektor » of the city of Essen. From 1915 to 1934, he was the « Kapellmeister » of the « Gürzenich » Orchestra of Cologne and, then, also director of the Cologne Conservatory (1925-1934), which was reformed with his help, to become the Cologne « Musikhochschule ». He also became the general music-director of Cologne, in 1918, and was a professor, in 1919. He also was the general music-director of Bonn, from 1930 to 1933. In 1922, Abendroth was the director of the Lower-Rhenish Music Festival.

Abendroth was invited to conduct in other countries as well, and visited the USSR and conducted the USSR State Symphony Orchestra in 1925, 1927 and 1928. From 1926 to 1937, he visited England and regularly conducted the London Symphony Orchestra. Abendroth is known for performing Classical and Romantic compositions, including Beethoven, Brahms, and Bruckner. Nonetheless, he conducted other contemporary pieces in their premieres, for instance for Béla Bartók and Igor Stravinsky.

In 1934, the Nazi Party seized the city council of Cologne, and the liberally minded Abendroth was promptly removed from the public function and detained. Nonetheless, other personalities of the Arts interceded, and Abendroth was restituted into the public function, to head the department of education of the Nazi « Reichsmusikkammer ». Accepting such charge, Abendroth was criticized for relinquishing his ideals. Nevertheless, he formally joined the Nazi Party in 1937. In 1934, Hermann Abendroth was appointed « Kapellmeister » of the « Gewandhausorchester Leipzig », replacing Bruno Walter, who was dismissed by the newly installed Nazi authorities because of being Jewish. From 1934 to 1945, Abendroth also was professor of the Leipzig Conservatory (« Leipzig Musikhochschule »), from 1941 to 1945. In 1943 and 1944, he took part in the traditional Bayreuth Festival, conducting « Die Meistersinger », its only Opera for those 2 years. Adolf Hitler officialized and organized the festivity.

After World War II, the Communist new authorities of Saxony rescinded all Abendroth's contracts of Leipzig, and so (with his past of the Nazi Party) he wouldn't manage to get a new stable position anywhere else in Germany either. Abendroth then claimed that he had never attended any political meeting, and his fortune then would change at Thuringia, whose government appointed Abendroth for music-director of Weimar, from 1945 to 1956. In 1950 and 1954, Abendroth was elected the People's Chamber of the « German Democratic Republic » for a 4 year mandate ending in 1954 as a representative of the Cultural Association of the « GDR ». Such opportunity would help cleansing Abendroth's name, about his Nazi past, and so he returned to Leipzig, in charge of its Radio Symphony Orchestra, from 1949 to 1956. As Abendroth, a heavy-smoker, was becoming a prominent artist of East-Germany, he was the only person allowed to smoke within the building of the radio station of Leipzig, by the Communist authorities. Abendroth toured throughout the Communist Europe. He was the 1st German, invited to conduct in the Soviet Union after the War, and also toured Finland and Switzerland. In 1951, he conducted for the Prague Spring International Music Festival. From 1953 to 1956, he conducted the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra (East-Berlin). Ironically, such new celebrity status of Abendroth awoke suspicion about his new political affinity, and some locations of West Germany banned his presentations such as in Düsseldorf and the release of Abendroth's records on the « Eterna » label was quite limited in Western Europe.

Hermann Abendroth died of a stroke, during a surgical procedure, in Jena, on 29 May 1956. A state funeral was then granted for him.

Abendroth was amongst the 1st German music directors who released studio records regularly. His production spanned from mid- 1920's, until his death. Nowadays, Abendroth is being successfully rediscovered by a collection of CDs, published since the mid- 1990's, consisting mainly of his works for the Radio Symphony Orchestra of Leipzig of since 1953.

Though by no means a star conductor, Hermann Abendroth has undergone revisionist treatment with the release of numerous discs of performances hitherto largely unknown to the general public. These recordings, many from Germany's Nazi era, reveal a musical mind many notches above concert Master level. Indeed, some of them indicate that, absent the charismatic Wilhelm Fürtwängler and the brilliant Clemens Krauß, Abendroth might have been still more highly-regarded. As more is known of his work during his prime years, assessments have risen. In Munich, Abendroth studied piano with Anna Langenhan-Hirzel and pursued music theory with Ludwig Thuille. For further training, Abendroth worked with conductor and composer Felix Mottl and received coursework in other subjects at the Frankfurt « Gymnasium ». Upon finishing his formal schooling, he earned a living as a book-seller but, in 1903, he became conductor of the Orchestral Society of Munich, an amateur organization, but a capable one. He later became conductor of the « Verein der Musikfreunde » and, for several seasons, beginning in 1907, principal conductor of the « Städtische Oper ». After conducting orchestral concerts in Essen, between 1911 and 1914, he moved to Cologne where, in 1915, he succeeded Fritz Steinbach as Conservatory director and music-director of the celebrated « Gürzenich » Concerts. In 1918, Abendroth was appointed general music-director and, the following year, was made a professor of music. In 1922, Abendroth won acclaim for his directorship of the Lower-Rhine Music Festival and, subsequently, presented orchestral concerts with players from the « Berlin Staatsoper ».

For the decade beginning in 1926, he established a positive relationship with the London Symphony Orchestra, conducting that ensemble on a regular basis. When Bruno Walter's career in Germany was blocked by the National-Socialists, the post of conductor in Leipzig passed to Abendroth. For the next decade, he served as principal conductor of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra and taught at the Leipzig Conservatory. Abendroth remained in Leipzig until the end of WWII, also appearing at the 1943 Bayreuth Festival when a new production of « Die Meistersinger » was unveiled. « Meistersinger » was the Festival's only offering that year (a move bearing the official approval of Adolf Hitler) and Abendroth's leadership seems, on the evidence of a recording preserved from one of that year's performances, to have been exceptionally fine and beautifully detailed, yet, flowing and unfussy.

Following WWII, Abendroth's work was concentrated in East Germany. He was appointed general music-director for the regime and music-director of the Weimar Symphony Orchestra. During this period, he became the 1st German conductor to receive an invitation to visit the Soviet Union since the War (Dimitri Shostakovich recalled in « Testimony » that the conductor was among several Western musicians to have been exposed to the brutal cold of unheated Russian concert venues) .

Following his death by a stroke, Abendroth was accorded the honour of a State funeral. A reputation that might have remained obscure to succeeding generations has been clarified by Abendroth's recorded legacy, some of it from live performance. With little doubt, his sympathies lie with the core Central European repertory, primarily of the Classical and Romantic periods. What emerges most clearly is a non-interventionist approach, a gift for allowing the music to speak for itself without extra-musical burdens. Whether War-time or post-War, most of Abendroth's recordings exist in reasonable sound, sufficient to confirm his considerable art.

The precursor ensemble of « Staatskapelle Weimar » dates from 1482, with the formation of a musical ensemble in service of the Weimar « Fürsten » (Prince) . In 1602, the ensemble attained resident status at the Weimar Court, as the « Herzoglichen Hofkapelle » (Ducal Court Ensemble) . Notable musicians in the early history of the « Staatskapelle Weimar » included Johann Schein (1615-1616) and Johann Sebastian Bach (1705, 1708-1717) , both from the Sankt Thomas Church, Leipzig. Bach particularly worked as resident organist and « Kapellmeister » .

Johann Nepomuk Hummel served as the ensemble's « Kapellmeister » from 1819 to 1837, on the appointment by the Grand Duchess Maria Pavlovna. Franz Liszt began his tenure as « Kapellmeister » , in 1842, and championed the music of Richard Wagner, Hector Berlioz, Peter Cornelius. Through this and his teaching activities, Liszt enhanced the prestige of Weimar as a musical hub, notably conducting the world premieres of Wagner's « Lohengrin » , in 1850, and Peter Cornelius's « Der Barbier von Bagdad » , in 1858.

After Liszt left in 1858, he was succeeded by Eduard Lassen who remained as director until his retirement in 1895. Lassen conducted several world premieres during his tenure, including the 1st performance of Camille Saint-Saëns's « Samson et Dalila », in 1877. Richard Strauß served as 2nd « Kapellmeister » under Lassen, from 1889 to 1894, and led the premieres of his own « Guntram » and Engelbert Humperdinck's « Hänsel und Gretel » .

Peter Raabe became « Kapellmeister » , in 1907. With the end of World War I and the dismantling of the German Empire, the ensemble was renamed the « Weimar Staatskapelle » . Ernst Prætorius directed concert and Opera programming from 1924 to 1933. Because his wife was Jewish, Prætorius left the post after the National-Socialists ascended to power in Germany, in 1933. Paul Sixt directed activities there during the Nazi regime.

After World War II and the end of the Nazi regime, Hermann Abendroth became « Generalmusikdirektor » and chief conductor of the ensemble, serving from 1945 to 1956. Successive « Generalmusikdirektor » 's of the ensemble have included Gerhard Pflüger (1957-1973) , Lothar Seyfarth (1973-1979) , Rolf Reuter (1979-1980) , Peter Gülke (1981-1982) , Hans-Peter Frank (1988-1996) , George Alexander Albrecht (1996-2002) , Jac van Steen (2002-2005) and Carl Saint-Clair (2005-2008) . Hermann Paul Maximilian Abendroth (geboren 19. Januar 1883 in Frankfurt am Main ; gestorben 29. Mai 1956 in Jena) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Musikpädagoge.

Er zählte zu den bedeutendsten Orchesterleitern des 20. Jahrhunderts. Er war ab 1905 Musikdirektor in Lübeck und ab 1911 in Essen sowie von 1915 bis 1934 Chefdirigent des Gürzenich-Orchesters und Direktor des Kölner Konservatoriums. Seine Ernennung zum Generalmusikdirektor erfolgte 1918. Als Nachfolger von Bruno Walter dirigierte er bis Kriegsende das renommierte Gewandhausorchester zu Leipzig. Abendroth konnte nach 1945 an seine Erfolge im Dritten Reich anknüpfen. Er übernahm 1945 die Staatskapelle Weimar und leitete gleichzeitig bis zu seinem Tod die Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Leipzig und Berlin.

Abendroth hat sich insbesondere als Interpret von Werken Beethovens, Brahms', Bruckners und Mozarts verdient gemacht. Es existieren nicht viele Schallplattenaufnahmen von Abendroth, der beim breiten Publikum rasch in Vergessenheit geriet. Hermann Abendroth wurde am 19. Januar 1883 als Sohn des Buchhändlers August Moritz Abendroth und seiner Frau Henriette Frohmann, Tochter eines Spielwarenfabrikanten, in Frankfurt am Main geboren. Er wuchs in einem kulturbegeisterten Elternhaus auf. Abendroth besuchte von 1888 bis 1900 das Wöhler-Realgymnasium und die Handelsschule in Frankfurt. Zu seinen Schulfreunden gehörte der Komponist Walter Braunfels. Von 1900 bis 1901 wurde er auf Wunsch des Vaters als Buchhändler in München, wo auch seine Schwester wohnte, ausgebildet.

Im « Anschluß » studierte Abendroth bis 1904 Musiktheorie und Komposition bei Ludwig Thuille, Klavier bei Anna Hirzel-Langenhan (Schülerin von Teodor Leszetycki) und Dirigieren bei Direktor Felix Mottl an der Königlichen Akademie der Tonkunst. Außerdem besuchte er Philosophievorlesungen an der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München. Seine Lehrer waren mehrheitlich durch die Neuromantik geprägt. Bereits als Student 1903 wurde Abendroth Mitglied im von Richard Strauß geführten Allgemeinen deutschen Musikverein (ADVM), der ihm viele Kontakte zu Musikerpersönlichkeiten ermöglichte. Ab 1910 saß er im Musikausschuss des ADVM und war damit qua Amt auch Vorstandsmitglied. Zudem leitete er den Chor des Münchner Orchestervereins und den Münchner Orchesterverein Wilde Gungl.

Von 1905 bis 1911 war er Dirigent des Philharmonischen Orchesters des Vereins der Musikfreunde im Konzerthaus Fünfhausen und Kolosseum sowie ab 1907 erster Kapellmeister für Konzerte und Opern am Stadttheater Lübeck und ab 1910 Leiter des Philharmonischen Chores Lübeck. Daneben assistierte er Mottl bei Wagner-Aufführungen am Prinzregententheater in München und Bayreuth. Finanziell gefördert wurde er, wie auch Wilhelm Fürtwängler, durch die Schriftstellerin Ida Boy-Ed.

Boy-Ed verfasste aus Bewunderung für Abendroth ein Gedicht :

Was du mir warst - spät sei er noch gesagt -
Du warst mir Glanz und Lebenshelle,
Der Graue Unmut war verjagt,
Wenn du betratest meine Schwelle -
Dir gab ein Gott so lichtiges Wesen,
Daß - wer Dein Freund war -
Durfte daran genesen.

Im Jahr 1911 heiratete er die Schauspielerin Elisabeth Walter, Tochter des Neustrelitzer Theaterdirektors Hugo Julius Franz Walter. Mit ihr war er 1926 zum 51. Geburtstag von Thomas Mann in das Haus seiner Mäzenin nach Lübeck eingeladen. Zu den Feierlichkeiten erschien und andere der Bildhauer Fritz Behn.

Von 1911 bis 1914 war Abendroth als Städtischer Musikdirektor Essens Nachfolger von Georg Hendrik Witte und dirigierte bis 1916 die Essener Philharmoniker. Er reformierte die Programmgestaltung und ließ romantische und zeitgenössische Komponisten spielen. Im Jahr 1914 wirkte er als Dirigent am 49. Tonkünstlerfest des ADVM mit, wo er Kontakte zu Max von Schillings, Jean Louis Nicodé, Siegmund von Hausegger und Artur Schnabel knüpfte. Weitere Gäste in seinem Hause waren Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Max Reger und Hans Pfitzner.

Von 1914 bis 1934 war er künstlerischer Leiter des Gürzenich-Orchesters und des angeschlossenen Gürzenich-Chores Köln. Abendroth wurde Mitglied im Rotary Club Köln. Er verkehrte mit Persönlichkeiten wie Felix Weingartner, Otto Klemperer, Heinz Tiessen und Alfred Høhn. Zu seinem 50. Geburtstag erhielt er von seinen Musikerfreunden die Originalpartitur der 7. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner. Richard Strauß schlug Abendroth 1918 als Nachfolger von Generalmusikdirektor Fritz Steinbach vor. Im selben Jahr ernannte ihn der Oberbürgermeister Konrad Adenauer zum Generalmusikdirektor von Köln. Ein Jahr später wurde er Professor für Dirigieren an der Staatlichen Hochschule für Musik Köln und übernahm 1925 gemeinsam mit Walter Braunfels die Direktion der Kölner Musikhochschule. Sie bauten sie zu einem der modernsten Konservatorien in Deutschland aus. 1922 dirigierte er das Niederrheinische Musikfest in Köln, und von 1922 bis 1923 gab er zusätzlich Konzerte bei der Staatskapelle Berlin.

Mit dem Gürzenich-Orchester entstanden keine Schallplattenaufnahmen. Ansehen erlangte er durch Uraufführungen, darunter das Te Deum (1922) von Walter Braunfels, Das Dunkle Reich (1930) von Hans Pfitzner (1930) und die Kantate Mitte des Lebens (1932) von Egon Wellesz. 1929 leitete er zudem die deutsche Erstaufführung von Schostakowitschs I. Sinfonie. Gastspiele führten ihn nach Amsterdam (1920), Moskau und Leningrad (1925 und 1927-1928), England (1926), Magdeburg (1929), Venedig (1929), Stettin (1931), Chemnitz und Dresden (1933), Mannheim und Karlsruhe (1933 und 1934) und Norwegen (1934). Im Vereinigten Königreich stand er am Pult des London Symphony Orchestra und in Sowjetrußland beim Staatlichen Sinfonieorchester der UdSSR. Über seine Konzerte in der Sowjetunion hielt er später Vorträge an der Universität zu Köln und veröffentlichte die Erinnerungsschrift Meine Erlebnisse in Rußland. Von 1930 bis 1933 war er neben seiner Tätigkeit in Köln Generalmusikdirektor in Bonn und leitete interim das Beethoven Orchester.

Abendroths Repertoire umfaßte nicht nur klassische und romantische Komponisten, sondern ebenso Komponisten wie Béla Bartók, Paul Hindemith, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schreker und Igor Strawinsky. Noch im Jahr 1928 antwortete er auf eine Einladung zur Ehrenmitgliedschaft in der deutsch-nationalen Vortragsbühne des Westens, « Daß ich nicht gewillt bin, dem von Ihnen geplanten Ehrenausschuss beizutreten. Zwar bin ich Arier von Geburt, und auch meine Weltanschauung ruht auf dieser Basis, ich bin aber nicht geneigt, mich an einem Unternehmen zu beteiligen, das das Judentum planmäßig boykottiert. »

In der Spielzeit 1933-1934 wurde sein Mitdirektor und Freund Walter Braunfels von den Nationalsozialisten als « Halbjude » entlassen. Auch Abendroth stand in den 1930er Jahren unter Beobachtung der Kulturfunktionäre. Er passte sich an und trat 1933 der Reichsmusikkammer (RMK) bei, in der er von 1933 bis 1945 die Fachschaft Musikerzieher und Chorleiter leitete. Außerdem wurde er Mitglied des Verwaltungsausschusses der RMK. Abendroth dirigierte zwar am 21. März 1933 das Gürzenich-Orchester zur « Feier der Nationalen Erhebung », aber sein Einsatz für jüdische Komponisten und die Tournées in die Sowjetunion führten später zu Auseinandersetzungen mit dem Gauleiter von Köln-Aachen Josef Grohé. Die SA übte erheblichen Druck auf das gesamte Professorenkollegium aus (Abendroth wurde als Kulturbolschewist beschimpft). Abendroth weigerte sich jedoch, in die NSDAP einzutreten. Er wurde schließlich 1934 vom Oberbürgermeister Günter Riesen entlassen. Danach war er zunächst als Reisedirigent aktiv.

Werken von Bach, Beethoven und Brahms. Ausnahmen bildeten die Uraufführungen der 3. Sinfonie (1934) von Johann Nepomuk David und der Mozart-Variationen (1935) von Philipp Jarnach.

In Leipzig verkehrte er unter anderem mit Karl Höller, Julius Weismann, Karl Straube, Max Strub, Günther Ramin, Georg Kulenkampff und Walther Davisson. 1933 wurde er zum Professor für Dirigieren am Landeskonservatorium der Musik ernannt. 1935 war er auch kurzzeitig künstlerischer Leiter des Orchesters der kulturpolitischen Abteilung der NSDAP-Kreisleitung Leipzig. 1938 wurde er vom Präsidenten der RKK als Reichskultursenator vorgeschlagen. Seine kulturpolitischen Abhandlungen erschienen in Zeitschriften wie Deutsche Kultur-Wacht, Nationalsozialistische Monatshefte oder Deutsches Volkstum. 1938 begrüßte er den Einmarsch in Österreich und den sogenannten « Anschluß » mit folgenden Worten :

« In der Musik gab es niemals eine Trennung zwischen Deutschland und Oesterreich. Daß die Zusammengehörigkeit dank der einzigartigen Tat des Führers nunmehr auch politisch vollzogen ist, dafür wird gerade die deutsche Musikerschaft dem “ Führer ” Dank wissen. »

Seit den 1930er Jahren war er Gastdirigent bei den Berliner Philharmonikern. Gastspiele führten ihn 1936 nach Südosteuropa sowie zu den Reichsmusiktagen 1938 nach Düsseldorf und zum Tag der Deutschen Kunst nach München. Am 1. Mai 1937 trat er der NSDAP (Mitgliedsnummer : 5.893.093) bei. Gleichzeitig wurden Peter Raabe, Werner Hübschmann und Walter Wiora aufgenommen. Danach folgten weitere Verpflichtungen, so ab 1938 als künstlerischer Leiter des GewandhausChors, er übernahm das Chefdirigat beim Orchester des Landestheaters Darmstadt und 1941 beim Rhein-Mainischen Landesorchester Frankfurt. 1943-1944 dirigierte er Wagners Meistersinger bei den Bayreuther Festspielen. Er trat regelmäßig in den von Deutschen besetzten Gebieten auf, unter anderem in Dänemark (1940) , in den Niederlanden (1941) , in Frankreich (1942 und 1943) , auf dem Balkan (1943) und in Belgien (1944) . 1943, 1944 und 1945 schlossen sich Auftritte bei den sogenannten « Kraft durch Freude-Konzerten » an. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs (August 1944) wurde er in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn vor einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

Laut einem Artikel im Kölner Stadt-Anzeiger wird Abendroth bis heute in der Öffentlichkeit « als politisch windiger Opportunist und Karrierist abgetan » . Der Historiker Michaël H. Kater verglich Abendroths politische Gesinnung mit dem Opportunismus von Hans Pfitzner und Siegmund von Hausegger. Besonders scharf kritisierte 2004 der Musikhistoriker Fred K. Prieberg den milden Umgang mit Abendroths NS-Vergangenheit. Er widersprach vereinzelt Darstellungen, wonach Abendroth der NSDAP beitreten musste, um Gewandhauskapellmeister zu werden, und verwies auf erfolgreiche Dirigenten der Zeit, die nicht Parteimitglieder geworden sind.

Andererseits kämpfte Abendroth von Anfang an gegen die von den Nationalsozialisten angestrebte Auflösung des ADMV. Er setzte sich für Werke sogenannter « entarteter » Komponisten wie Ernst Toch, Hans Gál und Alban Berg ein. Sein privates Engagement für die Künstler Günter Raphael und Wolfgang Kühne zeichnet ein differenzierteres Bild von Hermann Abendroth. Die Musikwissenschaftlerin Irina Lucke-Kaminiarz, die 2007 eine Biografie über ihn veröffentlichte, sieht in Abendroths Handlungen gar eine Tendenz zur Inneren Emigration. Beispielsweise argumentiert sie, daß ihn der fehlende « Ariernachweis » seiner Frau (Ablehnung des Antrages auf Ariernachweis durch Amtsgericht Berlin 1938) und die damit verbundene Ungewissheit zum Parteieintritt bewogen hat.

Wegen seiner Parteimitgliedschaft verlor er am 5. November 1945 sein Leipziger Amt. Zu den Vorgängen äußerte er sich am 20. November mit folgenden Zeilen :

« Ich habe nie ein Parteibuch gehabt, habe nie an Parteiversammlungen teilgenommen, mich auch sonst in der Partei in keiner Weise betätigt und habe nie außer den üblichen, den Mitgliedern auferlegte Spenden, der NSDAP einen Sonderbetrag zukommen lassen. Ich bin also nur " nominelles " zahlendes Mitglied und habe zu der Weltanschauung des Dritten Reiches mich immer nur ablehnend verhalten. Mein ganzes Interesse hat stets und einzig und allein meinen beruflichen und künstlerischen Aufgaben gegolten. »

Obwohl er also kurzfristig auf der « Schwarzen Liste » der US-Militärregierung stand, konnte er nach Abzug der Amerikaner an seine früheren Aufgaben anknüpfen. Insbesondere seine früheren Besuche in der Sowjetunion kamen ihm dabei zugute. In der Leningrader Philharmonie hing sogar seit den 1920er Jahren ein Bild von Hermann Abendroth. Der Verwaltungschef der Sowjetischen Militäradministration, General Iwan Kolesnitschenko, baute auf ihn. Schon 1948 erhielt er einen Persilschein (eingestuft als « nicht belastet ») des Personalprüfungsamts des Ministeriums des Innern des Landes Thüringen.

In der Musikstadt Leipzig wurde er aus politischen Gründen vorerst nicht mehr eingesetzt. Stattdessen wurde er 1945 musikalischer Oberleiter des Deutschen Nationaltheaters und damit der Staatskapelle Weimar ; ab 1947 als Generalmusikdirektor. Er vergrößerte das Orchester und erhöhte die Honorare der Musiker. Zu seinem Repertoire gehörten Werke russischer Komponisten wie Pjotr Tschaikowski, Dmitri Schostakowitsch, Igor Strawinski und Modest Mussorgski. Er brachte den Italien-Hymnus von Ottmar Gerster und das Konzert für Klavier und Orchester von Johann Cilenšek zur Uraufführung. Außerdem leitete er die deutsche Erstaufführung von Lutosławskis Mala suite. In Jena leitete er die Akademischen Konzerte. Konzerttourneen führten ihn durch alle Staaten des Ostblocks, die Sowjetunion (als erster deutscher Dirigent nach 1945) , nach Finnland, die BRD und in die Schweiz. Des Weiteren dirigierte er 1950 beim Gründungsjubiläum der Kölner Musikhochschule und 1951 beim Prager Frühling. Der Pianist Bruno Hinze-Reinhold sah Abendroths Leistung darin, daß « aus dem guten Provinzorchester ein erstrangiger Klangkörper geschaffen » wurde.

Zusätzlich war er Leiter der Dirigentenklasse an der Staatlichen Hochschule für Musik Weimar. Er setzte sich für die Stiftung des Franz-Liszt-Staatspreises des Landes Thüringen ein. Weitere Aufgaben waren die Leitung des Thüringer Musikwesens und Kustos des Liszt-Museums. Abendroth war designierter Präsident der 1957 gegründeten Robert-Schumann-Gesellschaft. In Weimar hatte er Kontakte zu Gerhard Bosse und Hans Joachim Moser. Im Ausland traf er auf Tichon Chrennikow, Arvīds Jansons, Swjatoslaw Richter und Dmitri Schostakowitsch (Sowjetunion) , Witold Lutosławski (Polen) und Zoltán Kodály (Ungarn) . Schostakowitsch sah in Abendroth einen erstklassigen Interpreten Beethovens.

Im Jahr 1949 übernahm er als Nachfolger von Gerhart Wiesenhütter die Leitung des Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchesters Leipzig und 1953 des Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchesters Berlin. Abendroth dirigierte in der Saison 1955-1956 insgesamt 14 Anrechtskonzerte in Sachsen. Insbesondere mit dem Leipziger Rundfunkorchester entstanden zahlreiche Rundfunk- und Schallplattenaufnahmen (Brahms, Bruckner, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Strauß, Wagner, Tschaikowski, Kalinnikow, Mozart und Haydn) . Er war ein überzeugter Raucher. Deshalb handelte er vor Beginn seines Dirigats mit dem Leipziger Rundfunk einen schriftlichen Vertrag aus, der ihm als Einzigem in der ganzen Liegenschaft den Konsum ermöglichte.

Ab 1949 war Abendroth Mitglied der Blockpartei NDPD, der SED (Sozialistische Einheitspartei Deutschlands) hingegen weigerte er sich beizutreten. Er wurde 1949 in den Deutschen Volkskongress gewählt. Von 1949 bis 1950 gehörte er als Einzelmitglied der Provisorischen Volkskammer und von 1950 bis 1954 für den Kulturbund der I. Volkskammer der DDR an. Im Jahr 1951 wurde er als Mitglied in die Staatliche Kommission für Kunstangelegenheiten aufgenommen. Der Dirigent Christian Thielemann beschrieb 2012 in seinem Buch Mein Leben mit Wagner :

Hermann Abendroth verstarb nach kurzer schwerer Krankheit am 29. Mai 1956 im Universitätsklinikum Jena.

Abendroths letzte Ruhestätte liegt auf dem Ehrengräberfeld des Historischen Friedhofs in Weimar. Die Trauerrede hielt Superintendent in Weimar Ingo Braecklein. Die Ehrenwache beim Staatsbegräbnis setzte sich aus den Musikern Richard Münnich, Helmuth Holzauer, Gerhard Pflüger, Max Butting und Johann Cilenšek zusammen. Der bekannte sowjetische Geiger Dawid Oistrach verfasste einen Nachruf auf Abendroth : Für ihn war er ein « gewaltiger Künstler » . Von der Stadt Weimar wurde der Grabstein in Form eines Findlings gestiftet, der als einzigen Schmuck eine vergoldete Inschrift mit dem Namen Abendroths enthielt.

Anlässlich Abendroths ersten Todestages brachte die Deutsche Post der DDR eine Sondermarke heraus. In Köln-Seeberg (Abendrothstraße) und Weimar (Hermann-Abendroth-Straße) wurden Straßen nach ihm benannt.

Abendroths Witwe und Alleinerbin übergab 1970 und 1971 die Nationalpreisträger-Hermann-Abendroth-Schenkung in Höhe von 300.000 Deutschen Mark an die Marie-Seebach-Stiftung. Sie diente der Finanzierung bedürftiger Musiker.

Die Hochschule für Musik Franz Liszt Weimar vergab zum 50. Todestag (2006) im Rahmen eines Dirigentenwettbewerbs den mit 5.000 Euro dotierten Hermann-Abendroth-Preis an Hendrik Vestmann.

Sein schriftlicher Nachlass befindet sich heute im Hochschularchiv / Thüringischen Landesmusikarchiv Weimar.

Abendroth wurde unter anderem mit seinem Zeitgenossen Wilhelm Fürtwängler verglichen und einmal als « Fürtwängler der DDR » betitelt. Der Musikpublizist Friedrich Herzfeld bezeichnete ihn als den « Typus des kraftvoll-gesunden, teutschen Stabmeisters » . Er stehe in einer « sächsischen Tradition » mit Franz Konwitschny und Kurt Masur. Von sogenannten « Pultvirtuosen » hielt er wenig, er strebte vielmehr Werktreue an. Nach dem Musikkritiker Karl Laux gelang es ihm, « in wenigen Proben auch ein minder hochstehendes Orch. zu Höchstleistungen anzufeuern » . Der Komponist Rudolf Wagner-Régeny schrieb ihm 1956 folgende Charaktereigenschaften zu : Aufrichtigkeit, Geradlinigkeit, Exaktheit und Routiniertheit. Der Dirigent Bernhard Böttner erinnerte sich bei Abendroth an « sein distanziertes, aber stets vorbildliches Wesen » , seine « natürliche Autorität » und seine « physische und geistige Ausstrahlung » . Der Musikkritiker Gottfried Schmiedel hob Abendroths « Einfachheit » , « Sinn für Humor » und « Offenherzigkeit » hervor.

Abendroth pflegte besonders das klassisch-romantische Repertoire von Beethoven, Brahms und Bruckner, aber auch von Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann und Tschaikowski. Zeitgenössische Musik führte er vor allem von Johann Nepomuk David, Wolfgang Fortner, Ottmar Gerster und Karl Höller auf. Der Solo-Cellist des Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchesters Berlin Fritz Klingenstein sah in Abendroth « einen ausgezeichneten Dirigenten, aber hauptsächlich für klassische Werke, nicht für moderne Musik » .

C'est à ce moment qu'il commence à se présenter comme chef d'orchestre et à s'intéresser à la musique contemporaine. De 1929 à 1937, il dirige l'Orchestre de la radio de Francfort et joue souvent des œuvres d'Arnold Schøenberg, Béla Bartók, Igor Stravinski, Paul Hindemith et Ernst Křenek.

Au cours de la période nazie, la liberté de Rosbaud de présenter la nouvelle musique est restreinte, mais il poursuit une brillante carrière de chef d'orchestre. En 1937, il devient le directeur musical de la ville de Münster. En 1941, il prend la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Strasbourg.

Après la Guerre, il dirige l'Orchestre de la radio « Südwestfunk » (SWR) à Baden-Baden, et exerce une très grande influence sur Pierre Boulez. Il prend un temps la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Strasbourg et dirige fréquemment au cours du Festival d'Aix-en-Provence.

Hans Rosbaud étudia le piano et la composition à Francfort, et, dès le début de sa carrière de chef, montra un intérêt spécial pour la musique contemporaine. Il fut successivement directeur de l'École de musique de Mayence et chef des concerts de cette ville (1921) ; directeur de la musique à la radio de Francfort (ce qui le fit entrer en contact avec Arnold Schönberg, Anton Webern, Alban Berg, Béla Bartók et Igor Stravinski) ; directeur de la musique à Münster (1937-1941) ; puis, à Strasbourg (1941-1944) ; et chef du Philharmonique de Munich (1945-1948) . De 1948 à sa mort, il dirigea l'Orchestre du « Südwestfunk » de Baden-Baden, ce qui l'associa étroitement au Festival de Donaueschingen. Il dirigea à Aix-en-Provence, dans les Ires années du Festival, « les Noces de Figaro » et « Don Giovanni » de Mozart, ainsi que « Platée » de Rameau. Il créa notamment les « Quatre Chants » pour orchestre, Opus 22, de Schönberg, en 1933 ; et, l'année suivante, avec le compositeur au piano, le 2e Concerto de Bartók. Après la Guerre, il créa l'Opéra « Moïse et Aron » de Schönberg à la radio de Hambourg, en 1954 ; puis, à la scène à Zürich, en 1957. À Donaueschingen, ainsi qu'aux Festivals de la Société internationale pour la musique contemporaine (S.I.M.C.) (dont il reçut la médaille Schönberg, en 1952) , il dirigea Boulez et Stockhausen ; et, en 1960, assura la création à Donaueschingen de « Chronochromie » d'Olivier Messiaen. Musicien précis et objectif, il ne fut pas sans influencer Boulez, le chef d'orchestre, et excella également dans Haydn et dans Sibelius, compositeur qu'il estimait au même titre que ceux de l'École viennoise.

The Austrian conductor Hans (Johann R.) Rosbaud was born on 22 July 1895 in Graz and died on 29 December 1962 in Lugano, in the Tyrol in Switzerland. He was particularly associated with the music of the 20th Century.

As children, Hans and his brother Paul Rosbaud performed with their mother, who taught piano. Hans continued studying music at the « Hoch » Conservatory in Frankfurt-am-Main, under the tutelage of Bernhard Sekles, in composition, and Alfred Høehn, in piano.

Rosbaud's 1st professional post was in Mainz, starting in 1921, as the music-director of the City's new School of Music, which included conducting the Municipal Symphony concerts. He became the 1st chief-conductor of the « Hessischer Rundfunk » Symphony Orchestra (later, the « Hr-Sinfonieorchester ») of Frankfurt, in 1928. During the 1920's and 1930's, he presented premieres of works by Arnold Schönberg and Béla Bartók. During the Nazi era, his freedom to present new music was restricted. In 1937, he became the general music-director of the city of Münster. In 1941, Rosbaud took the same position in Strasbourg, heading « l'Orchestre philharmonique » .

In 1945, he was named music-director of the Munich Philharmonic by the United States occupation authorities. In 1948, Rosbaud's contract with the Munich Orchestra was allowed to lapse because the city authorities wanted to move the Orchestra's repertoire in a conservative direction. That year, Rosbaud became the 1st chief-conductor of the South-West German Radio Orchestra, in Baden-Baden, where he remained for the rest of his life. In 1954, he conducted the 1st performance of Arnold Schœnberg's Opera « Moses und Aron » , at 8 days' notice ; this performance was issued on a 1957 commercial recording for the « Philips » label. He regularly took the « SWR » Symphony Orchestra to Festivals of contemporary music, such as at Donaueschingen.

« Gramophone » Magazine recently remarked that :

« Rosbaud was one of the unsung heroes of mid- 20th Century music, who gave thoroughly rehearsed and assimilated performances and premieres of the widest possible range of music. »

In « Fanfare » Magazine, Peter J. Rabinowitz pointed to range of his sympathies, claiming :

« It was greater than that of just about any of his contemporaries except perhaps Bernstein, Scherchen, and Stokowski. Rosbaud is best-remembered, probably, for his Mahler, his Bruckner, his work with the Second Vienna School and, especially, his commitment to the post-War avant-garde. But he was a world-class Mozartian, too (his Aix-en-Provence Mozart Operas from the 1950's hold-up far better today than the better-known Fritz Busch recordings from Glyndebourne) - and he championed earlier music as well (he recorded Gluck's « Orphée » and Rameau's « Platée ») . What's more striking is that he was able to give his performances of each of these composers an entirely different signature. »

Rosbaud was a highly-cultured man, widely read and varied in his intellectual interests. Putting himself at the service of music he chose to perform, he commanded the respect of numerous notable composers of the 20th Century. Prominent in his legacy are recordings of the music of Bruckner, Mahler, Stravinsky and Boulez. A tireless advocate of new music, he was closely associated with Karl Amadeus Hartmann, conducting premiere performances of Hartmann's Opera « Simplicius Simplicissimus » and his 2nd and 4th Symphonies, amongst others.

Hans Rosbaud was one of the best-known conductors in Europe, particularly for his pioneering performances of 20th Century music.

He studied at the « Hoch » Conservatory, in Frankfurt, where his piano instructor was Alfred Hœhn and his composition instructor Bernhard Sekles. He chose an academic career, becoming director of the State Music School (« Städtische Musikschule ») , in Mainz. There, he also frequently conducted the Municipal Orchestra. During his 1st year there, he conducted music by Paul Hindemith, then one of the most rapidly rising young stars in the German music, and a teacher of his for 3 years, and scheduled other new music.

In 1928, he took the position of Musical Director of Frankfurt Radio, a position he held until 1938 ; simultaneously, he was 1st « Kapellmeister » of Frankfurt's « Museumgesellschaft » concerts. In both positions, he made Frankfurt one of the most exciting venues for new music. He frequently scheduled music of Schœnberg, Berg, Webern, Bartók, Stravinsky, and others. He presented the premiere performances of Arnold Schœnberg's « Four Songs » with Orchestra, Opus 22 (1932) , and Béla Bartók's 2nd Piano Concerto with the composer as soloist (1932) . After 1933, Nazi rule forced him to curtail performances of Jewish composers and those labeled as « cultural Bolsheviks » . He also shifted to less prominent positions as « Generalmusikdirektor » in Münster (1937-1941) ; and in Strasbourg (1941-1944) . After the War, he again returned to conducting in a major city, as Principal Conductor of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra (1945-1948) .

But his preference was for radio, where he could schedule more innovative concerts and reach a wide audience with modern music. Therefore, in 1948, he accepted the position as Chief-Conductor of the South-West German Radio Orchestra (SWR) , in Baden-Baden. German radio was based on strong regional companies whose programs were also carried elsewhere in the country. Baden-Baden, with a history as one of the most Liberal corners of Germany and a strong interest in arts, was ideal for Rosbaud's purposes. Furthermore, the identification by the Nazis of their opposition to certain kinds of music gave that music a strong prestige and support among, particularly among the younger audience. These factors, and a sense of a need to learn about music currents that had passed Germany by when Adolf Hitler and Josef Gœbbels transformed the country into a cultural backwater, combined to create a strong audience for Rosbaud's programming.

He made the provincial Orchestra into a strong and precise ensemble, with a lean, anti-Romantic sound. Success on radio led immediately to demand for phonograph recordings. He participated in the 1st Aix-en-Provence Festival, in 1948, and remained associated with it, often appeared in the Donaueschingen Festival, Europe's primary avant-garde music Festival (where he supported the music of Pierre Boulez, Karlheinz Stockhausen, and their circle) , and performed regularly at the annual Festivals of the International Society for Contemporary Music (SIMC) . He gave the 1st performances (concert and staged) of Schœnberg's Opera « Moses und Aron » . In 1957, he added the position of Music-Director of the Zürich « Tönhalle » Orchestra.

His performances were highly-objective, clear, and intellectual, frequently seeming now to a lack of warmth.

Hans Rosbaud received his 1st music lessons from his mother, who was an accomplished musician. His academic education was founded upon Classical languages and culture, but he also learnt to play several string and wind instruments, entering the « Hoch » Conservatory in Frankfurt, where his teachers included Bernhard Sekles for composition, and Alfred Hœhn for piano. He also studied conducting and began his professional career in 1921, at Mainz, having been selected from a wide field as the director of the newly-formed municipal School of music, which soon developed a strong reputation throughout Germany ; he also conducted some of the municipal Symphony concerts in the city. Rosbaud was appointed chief-conductor at Radio Frankfurt, in 1929. Major contemporary composers were regular participants in the station's concerts and among the 1st performances which Rosbaud conducted were those of Bartók's Piano Concerto No. 2 (with the composer as soloist) ; Stravinsky's « Symphony of Psalms » ; Hindemith's «

Concert Music for Brass and Strings » ; and Schönberg's « Variations » , Opus 31.

The establishment of the Nazi government resulted in Rosbaud coming under increasing political pressure and, in 1937, he left Frankfurt to become chief-conductor in Münster, where his responsibilities included Opera as well as Symphonic performances. 4 years later, he took-up a similar position in Strasbourg, which had been annexed by Germany. Here, once again, Rosbaud developed a flourishing musical life, despite numerous obstacles being placed in his way by the political authorities ; and his persistent efforts on behalf of members of his Orchestra, who suffered persecution by the authorities, won him the respect and support of the population. Following the end of World War II, he was appointed chief-conductor of the Munich Radio Orchestra and of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra by the American military authorities, who gave him considerable support in his work of rebuilding musical life in the devastated city. He was the 1st conductor from Germany to be invited to appear in France after the War, and was warmly-received. He left Munich, in 1948, to take-up the position of chief-conductor of the South-West German Radio Orchestra (SWF) , Baden-Baden, where he was based for the rest of his life.

A prime mover in the establishment of the Aix-en-Provence Festival, from 1948 onwards, Rosbaud appeared there annually until 1959. He added to his responsibilities, in 1950, when he became conductor of the Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra and at the Zürich Opera, assuming the role of chief-conductor of the « Tonhalle » , in 1957. His successes at Baden-Baden and at the neighbouring Donaueschingen Festival of Contemporary Music, following its resumption in 1950, led to his international recognition. During the 1950's, he became especially noted for his performances of the music of Arnold Schönberg : at only 8 days' notice, he took-over from Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt as the conductor of the 1st performance (which was recorded) of Schönberg's Opera « Moses und Aron » in 1954, in Hamburg, and he conducted the work's stage premiere at Zürich, in 1957. Rosbaud's fame was reflected in his activity as a guest-conductor of the major European Orchestras and in his concert tours abroad, notably to South America, South Africa and the United States. He made a particularly strong impression with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra and was seriously considered as a successor to Fritz Reiner, a move that was prevented by his untimely death, in 1962.

Rosbaud was an undemonstrative conductor. Bernard Haitink has recalled that :

« As he approached the podium, you thought, surely that can't be the conductor. » , yet, he achieved excellent results.

As the Chicago-based critic Robert C. Marsh commented in a review of Rosbaud's 1st concert with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, in January 1959 :

« This modest, self-effacing conductor has authority, an ear for color and a sense of style. He is a musician to hear rather than watch. He seems to have the most naive idea of showmanship, but his musicianship cannot be questioned. »

The esteem in which he was held by his contemporaries was illustrated by the composer Francis Poulenc's comment, quoted in « Paris-Match » , in November 1954 :

« The taste of music buffs little resembles that of professional musicians. Music buffs believe that the greatest living conductor is Toscanini ; musicians know that it is Hans Rosbaud. »

And another major French composer, Pierre Boulez, regards Rosbaud as a model of what a conductor should be.

His success as a trail-blazer in the performance of contemporary music, and the numerous resulting recordings which he made, overshadowed to a certain extent the recognition of Rosbaud's great skills as an interpreter of the traditional repertory. Here, his commercial recordings are fewer, although fortunately many of the numerous radio recordings which he made, predominantly for South West German Radio, have been released. He was an excellent conductor of Jean Sibelius, where his lean and forensic conducting style perfectly suited the brooding atmosphere of this composer's music. This stripped-back approach to performance also resulted in stylish performances of the music of the Classical and early-Romantic era, such as the Symphonies of Haydn and the Piano Concertos of Mozart and Beethoven. His readings of the Symphonies of Mahler and Bruckner stand at the opposite pole to the intense style adopted by other contemporary conductors, but the power of the music remains. Rosbaud's performances from Aix-en-Provence of several of the Mozart Operas were commercially recorded and remain models of style, as does his account of the tenor version of Gluck's « Orphée et Euridice » with Léopold Simoneau in the title-role. A man of wide learning and interests, Rosbaud included the study of nuclear physics among his hobbies.

Hans (Johann R.) Rosbaud (geboren 22. Juli 1895 in Graz, Österreich ; gestorben 29. Dezember 1962 in Lugano, Tirol, Schweiz) war ein österreichischer Dirigent, Komponist und Pianist.

Er stammte aus einer Musikerfamilie. Seine Mutter, eine geschätzte Pianistin, erteilte ihm schon sehr früh Klavierunterricht. Später studierte er Komposition bei Bernhard Sekles und Klavier bei Alfred Høhn an Doktor Hoch's Konservatorium in Frankfurt am Main. 1920 berief man ihn als Direktor an die Städtische Musikschule nach Mainz, bis er im Herbst 1929 erster Kapellmeister des neu gegründeten Frankfurter Rundfunk-Symphonie-Orchesters wurde. 1937 erhielt er einen Ruf nach Münster, wo er insgesamt vier Jahre als Generalmusikdirektor wirkte. Trotzdem leitete er noch 1938 in Frankfurt Konzerte und nahm im Februar Leopold von Schenkendorfs Hymne Gott sei mit unserm Führer mit dem Chor und Orchester des Frankfurter Rundfunks auf. Im Anschluß an eine dreijährige Zeit an der Spitze der Straßburger Philharmoniker waren nach dem Krieg die Münchner Philharmoniker, das neugegründete Sinfonie-Orchester Baden-Baden und das Tonhalle-Orchester Zürich weitere Stationen des Dirigenten. Nach 1950 war Hans Rosbaud als Leiter des Sinfonieorchesters des Südwestfunks maßgeblich am Neubeginn der Donaueschinger Musiktage beteiligt. Er machte sich 1954 um die konzertante und 1957 um die szenische Uraufführung von Schönbergs Oper Moses und Aron verdient. 1955 brachte er Pierre Boulez' « le Marteau sans Maître » in Baden-Baden mit Solisten des SWF-Symphonieorchesters zur Uraufführung.

Rosbaud war der erste große « Radio-Dirigent » . Er verstand es schon 1929 in Frankfurt, in politisch zunehmend schwierigen Zeiten, alle Chancen des neuen Mediums zu nutzen. Neben den ausgewiesenen hohen künstlerischen Qualitäten war er auch pädagogisch engagiert. So erklärte er den Radiohörern etwa die Instrumente und versuchte immer wieder, zeitgenössische Musik « sendefähig » aufzubereiten. Uraufführungen von Hindemith, Křenek, Penderecki, Strawinski, Veerhoff und Schœnberg gehörten für ihn zu seiner Zeit ebenso zur täglichen Arbeit wie die Aufführung von Werken der Vergangenheit. Bemerkenswert war Rosbauds Zusammenarbeit mit Arnold Schœnberg, aber ebenso seine Anpassungsfähigkeit an die neuen Umstände in der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus.

Der aus einer Musikerfamilie stammende Hans Rosbaud studierte am Hoch'schen Konservatorium in Frankfurt am Main (Klavier bei Alfred Hœhn, Komposition und theoretische Fächer bei Bernhard Sekles) . 1921-1928 Direktor der städtischen Musikschule Mainz, Dirigierverpflichtungen in Konzert und Oper, 1929-1937 Leiter der Musikabteilung beim Frankfurter Rundfunk und erster Kapellmeister des Rundfunk-Symphonie-Orchesters. Danach Generalmusikdirektor in Münster (1937-1941) und Straßburg (1941-1944) . 1945-1948 war Rosbaud Chefdirigent der Münchner Philharmoniker. 1948 bis zu seinem Tod Chefdirigent des Südwestfunk-Orchesters Baden-Baden, mit dem er zahlreiche Konzerttourneen unternahm. Als Gast dirigierte Rosbaud in der Spielzeit 1951-1952 erstmals am Stadttheater Zürich (anlässlich der Neuinszenierung von Mozarts « Die Zauberflöte » durch Oskar Wälterlin) . Dort leitete er 1952-1953 Richard Strauß' « Elektra » (mit Inge Borkh) und 1953-1954 dessen « Frau ohne Schatten » sowie die Schweizer Erstaufführungen von Rolf Liebermanns « Penelope » (1954) und « Die Schule der Frauen » (1957) . 1955-1957 war Rosbaud am selben Haus musikalischer Oberleiter und begeisterte durch seine Interpretationen von Beethovens « Fidelio » , Bergs « Wozzeck » (mit Willy Ferenz) , Arthur Honeggers « Antigone » , Mozarts « Don Giovanni » und « Die Zauberflöte » , Johann Strauß' « Die Fledermaus » , Richard Strauß' « Salome » und Richard Wagners « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » und « Parsifal » . Das herausragende Ereignis dieser Ära war die szenische Uraufführung von Schœnbergs « Moses und Aron » (6. Juni 1957) , die Rosbaud in Zusammenarbeit mit Karl-Heinz Krahl (Regie) und Paul Haferung (Ausstattung) leitete. Dieses Werk hatte er bereits am 12. März 1954 in der Musikhalle Hamburg zur konzertanten Uraufführung gebracht. Die Musik Schœnbergs, mit dem Rosbaud persönlich befreundet war, lag ihm besonders am Herzen. Im Rahmen des Holland Festivals 1958 in Amsterdam und Den Haag dirigierte er dessen Kurzopern « Erwartung » und « Von heute auf morgen » . Seit 1948 enge Zusammenarbeit mit dem Festival von Aix-en-Provence, wo er nicht nur zahlreiche Konzerte gab, sondern auch besondere Reputation als Dirigent Mozart'scher Opern erwarb. Rosbaud setzte sich als bedeutender Vermittler der Moderne von Anbeginn beharrlich für zeitgenössische Musik ein und gelangte mit Paul Hindemith, Igor Strawinsky, Béla Bartók, Anton Webern, Alban Berg, Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Boris Blacher und anderen in engen Kontakt. Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg internationale Karriere als Konzertdirigent (Europa, Nord- und Südamerika) . Im November 1949 leitete Rosbaud erstmals das Tonhalleorchester Zürich, das er fortan jährlich in rund zwanzig Konzerten dirigierte. Seit 1957 wirkte er (parallel zu seiner Tätigkeit in Baden-Baden) als Chefdirigent der Tonhallegesellschaft Zürich. Klassik, Spätromantik (Anton Bruckner, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler) , Moderne und zeitgenössische Musik (darunter zahlreiche Uraufführungen von Schweizer Komponisten) waren die Pfeiler seiner Zürcher Programmgestaltung.

Über die Bedeutung Hans Rosbauds als Förderer der zeitgenössischen Musik wird man nicht streiten, wenn es dessen bedurft hätte, so ist sicher Pierre Boulez' Widmung von « le Marteau sans Maître » der verdiente Ritterschlag. Doch werden die Informationen seltsamerweise sehr dürr, wenn man sich um die Jahre 1933-1945 kümmert. In Priebergs « Musik im NS-Staat » taucht er gerade an zwei Stellen auf - und doch umreißen sie, liest man sie mit dem entsprechenden Vorwissen, seine Rolle im Dritten Reich.

Zweimal Rosbaud in Straßburg, wo er von 1941 bis 1944 Generalmusikdirektor war. Und auch jedesmal zeitgenössische, zeitgemäße Musik, wenn auch von fast diametralen Charakter. Nun war Straßburg als dritte Station nach Frankfurt und Münster alles andere als eine nebensächliche Position. Eine kulturelle Tätigkeit in Straßburg hatte symbolischen Charakter. 1872 war in Straßburg nach der Vereinnahmung ins Deutsche Reich der erste Germanistik-Lehrstuhl begründet und mit einer so hervorragenden Persönlichkeit wie Wilhelm Scherer besetzt worden, der sich dem Preußisch-Nationalem verschrieben hatte. Und ebenso sorgfältig war die Auswahl der Personen, die nach der Vereinnahmung von Elsaß-Lothringen in die kulturellen Schaltstellen gesetzt wurden. Jemand, an dem die NS-Kulturbürokratie auch nur einen leisen Zweifel gehabt hätte, wäre nie dort zum Einsatz gelangt.

Der Bedeutung seiner Tätigkeit war sich Hans Rosbaud bewusst :

Und so kann man die Propagierung des deutschesten aller Gegenwartskomponisten, Hans Pfitzner, konsequent aus seiner Aufgabe verstehen, an diesem Vorposten der deutschen Kultur das Land wieder urbar zu machen für die deutsche Kunst und die deutsche Kultur. Festzuhalten ist allerdings, daß die Zeit Rosbauds in Straßburg von den Franzosen selbst positiv gesehen wird. Überliefert ist, daß Rosbaud mit den französischen Mitgliedern des Orchesters französisch sprach. Sobald Rosbaud nach dem Krieg wieder einreisen konnte, war er in Frankreich ein gern gesehener Gast.

Rosbauds Liebe zur modernen Musik war unter dem NS-Regime offenbar kein Nachteil für ihn. Daß moderne Kompositionsweisen, selbst atonale, im Dritten Reich nicht verfolgt wurden, obwohl es von konservativer Seite (wie wir schon bei Elly Ney sehen durften) erbitterten Widerstand gab, muß an dieser Stelle betont werden. Verfolgt wurde die « entartete Kunst » vor allem aus rassistischen Gründen (und deshalb konnten etwa Igor Strawinsky und Béla Bartók aufgeführt werden und Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy nicht) . Die kompositorische « Bravheit » der regimetreuen Musik störte eigentlich die Kulturverantwortlichen mehr, als daß sie ihr Beifall zollten. Das faschistische Italien hatte gezeigt, wie faschistische Überzeugung und moderne Kunst Hand in Hand gehen konnten.

Hans Rosbaud (geboren 1895) gehörte zu den jungen Dirigenten wie Herbert von Karajan (geboren 1908) und Karl Böhm (geboren 1894) , die das Vakuum nutzen konnten, das die vertriebenen und ermordeten Künstler im Deutschen Reich hinterließen. Jeder von ihnen machte auf seine Weise Karriere, profitierte von der brutalen NS-Politik, ohne sich erkennbar schuldig zu machen - oder zu fühlen. Do gehörte Rosbaud zu den Musikern im amerikanischen Sektor, die von der Information Control Division (ICD) einvernommen wurden. Zunächst waren alle Nutznießer des Nationalsozialismus (darunter Wilhelm Furtwängler, Joseph Keilberth, Rudolf Kempe, Clemens Krauß, Karl Böhm, Oswald Kabasta, Herbert von Karajan, Eugen Jochum, Karl Elmendorff, Hans Knappertsbusch) auf eine schwarze Liste gesetzt worden, hatten Auftrittsverbot, ohne daß es gegen diese Maßnahme eine Möglichkeit des Einspruchs gab. Deutlich unterschiedlich zu dem drakonischen Verfahren, wie es Møller in München praktizierte, waren die in Bad Orb durchgeführten Gespräche, bei denen es darum ging, verlässliche « cadre of German intellectuals » zu finden. Nur drei Musiker waren unter den Auserwählten : Carl Orff, Hans Rosbaud und Bertil Wetzelsberger.

Der amerikanische Standpunkt war der, daß jemand, der führender Repräsentant der Kultur im Nationalsozialismus war (und das betraf auch Rosbaud) , ebenso schuldig war wie ein aktives Parteimitglied, während Rosbaud etwa Beweggründe weniger im Nazismus als in Egoismus, Profitgier und Opportunismus sah. Um den Rigorismus des amerikanischen Standpunktw 1946 am Beispiel Furtwänglers deutlich zu machen : Ein ICD-Offizier schrieb :

« Greatness obliges a man with the intelligence of Furtwängler to be judged differently from the small minded people. In the eyes of Germany and the whole world, Furtwängler was the exponent of German music. It should create the worst impression if we would allow that such a man come-back without punishment. »

It took nearly half a Century after the demise of the 3rd « Reich » for scholars to begin a serious investigation of this area of cultural activity requires some explanation, especially given the detailed attention that has been accorded to most of the other arts during that era. Although there is little doubt that the pioneering studies of Joseph Wulff (1969) and Fred K. Prieberg (1982) managed to expose both the barbarous methods of the regime and the opportunistic activities of those musicians who lent varying degrees of support to its policies, very few German musicologists took-up the invitation to explore in greater depth some of the issues posed by these books. Perhaps, such reluctance was understandable. To present such potentially controversial material in an objective and balanced manner must have seemed impossible, not least because too many members of the music establishment, in both West Germany and the former GDR, had vested interests in trying to cover-up anything from their murky past.

The social historian Michael H. Kater alludes to the problem in the introduction to this valuable book. Invited to Munich in the early 1990's by the « Carl-Orff Zentrum » to deliver a paper on the composer's ambiguous relationship with the 3rd « Reich » , he encountered a stubborn refusal on the part of the authorities to publish the fruits of his research. He was later able to present and expand on this material in 2 important books : « The Twisted Muse » (New York, 1997) and « Composers of the Nazi Era » (New York, 2000) . However, his desire to bring a wider body of scholars into the frame, including many from Germany, prompted him to organize an international conference in Toronto, Canada, in October 1999, the papers from which appear in the present book.

One of the major advantages of such a symposium is that it affords scholars the opportunity to focus their attention on a specialized topic, rather than adopt the broad brush strokes that have characterized previous books on this subject. The depth of enquiry offered in each of the 16 essays is variable, with some breaking new ground and others revisiting familiar territory. One might argue that exploring the relationship between Adolf Hitler and Richard Wagner falls very much into the latter category. But, in fact, Hans Rudolf Veget's « Hitler's Wagner : Musical Discourse as Cultural Space » provides much food for thought. Arguing that the true import of Hitler's cult of Wagner is, by no means, self-evident from the most recent biographical studies of the « Führer » , and that it is far too simplistic to scapegoat Wagner as the progenitor of the Holocaust, Veget discusses the possibility that Hitler regarded Wagner's anti-Semitism as being insufficiently radical. Nonetheless, he does not challenge the point that Hitler's Wagnerian mission encompassed the elimination of Judaism from German life, and that, by appropriating the role of Parsifal as healer and that of Siegfried as liberating hero, Hitler could lay claim to being Wagner's political heir.

As the most obvious Nazi musical icon, the Bayreuth Master inevitably reappears elsewhere in the book, notably in Stephen McClatchie's painstaking exploration of the activities of the « Richard-Wagner-Forschungsstätte » , a research organization unveiled by Hitler, in 1938. The focus of his enquiry is the work of the largely discredited Nazi musicologist Otto Strobel, who directed its activities during the War. As in his admirable study of Alfred Lorenz, McClatchie adopts a judiciously even-handed appraisal of Strobel's achievements, defending his positivistic source-driven publications, as well as condemning those that were ideologically tainted.

3 of the major figures in German music of the 1930's, Richard Strauß, Paul Hindemith, and Hans Pfitzner, are subjected to detailed scrutiny. Jens Malte Fischer has, perhaps, the most difficult task of all in trying to rationalize Pfitzner's ideas and his music.

Mit der Übergabe der Verfahren an die Spruchkammern wurden Fragen der individuellen Schuld in den Mittelpunkt gestellt : Waren die Musiker aktive Rassisten, aktive Parteimitglieder, hatten sie den Nationalsozialismus propagiert, waren sie chauvinistisch in Hinsicht auf die Kunst anderer Länder ? Die Niederlage, die das ICD im Falle Furtwängler erlitt, eröffnete den Weg einer breiten Denazifizierung - nicht zuletzt notwendig, weil der kalte Krieg begonnen hatte und man sehr schnell stabile Verhältnisse in Deutschland herstellen wollte.

Erst wieder Michæl H. Kater setzt sich mit dem moralischen Rigorismus Moellers in « Die mißbrauchte Muse. Musiker im Dritten Reich » ausführlich mit der Karriere Hans Rosbauds auseinander. Die beginnt 1929 beim Frankfurter Rundfunk. Dort ist er Leiter der Musikabteilung und I. Kapellmeister. Bei Sekles hatte er studiert, mit Hindemith war er befreundet, Arnold Schönberg verehrte er.

Er hatte also zunächst eine erhebliche Distanz zum Dritten Reich und seine Äußerungen sind (bei seinen Vorlieben verständlich) auch erst einmal eher defensiv.

So schreibt er Béla Bartók über die Schwierigkeiten, seine Werke aufzuführen, und daß er in diesem Zusammenhang sich vor den heftigsten Angriffen schützen müsse.

Doch so unbeliebt war der « nichtdeutsche » Bartók beim NS-Regime nicht - und Bartók hatte weit mehr damit zu tun, Aufführungen seiner Werke im Dritten Reich zu verhindern (denn sie wurden gegen seinen Willen in NS-Deutschland gespielt) , als sich in die Skrupel eines Dirigenten einzufühlen, der sie in Deutschland durchsetzen wollte.

Schwierigkeiten hatte Rosbaud, ein ihm unterstellter Dirigent, ein « Alter Kämpfer von bescheidenen Gaben und Einfluß » (Michæl H. Kater, Seite 132) bezichtigte ihn, Jude zu sein. Doch da half ihm ein Freund und Gönner, Prinz Alexander Friedrich von Heßen, der zugunsten Rosbauds versicherte, « daß ihm unter keinen Umständen der Vorwurf des Judentums und undeutscher Gesinnung gemacht werden kann » .

Als 1935 Jazz auf die Verbotsliste kam und die NS-Rundfunkadministratoren eine Polemik verfassten, die am 9. Dezember 1935 beim Frankfurter Rundfunk gesendet wurde, steuerte Rosbaud die geeigneten Musikbeispiele bei, die « die erotisch-perverse Seite des Jazz » bewiesen und « den Gegensatz von Negerjazz und deutschem Wesen belegten » .

1937 hatte Rosbaud (bei einem Auslandsaufenthalt) Schönberg geschrieben :

« Ich möchte Ihnen gerne häufiger schreiben, aber es ist nicht immer ganz einfach, Sie verstehen. »

Es gab eine Initiative von Freunden in den USA, die ihn zur Emigration aufforderten, vielleicht wäre er dem auch gefolgt, wenn er eine deutlichere Unterstützung verspürt hätte.

Aber inzwischen war er auf den Posten des Generalmusikdirektors in Münster gewechselt, der deutlich einträglicher war als der beim Rundfunk. Die größere künstlerische Freiheit, die er sich hier erhoffte, bewies er in Gefälligkeiten für die Nazi-Hierarchie, Konzerten für die örtliche Parteiführung einschließlich einer Führerehrung 1939 und der Eröffnung der Gaukulturwoche im Mai 1940 mit dem Meistersinger-Vorspiel. Die großen Kriegsaufgaben, die die deutsche Kunst nach der Meinung des Münsteraner Gauleiters Alfred Meyer hatte, warteten auf ihn in Straßburg.

Kater geht sehr ausführlich auf das Programm der Germanisierung von Elsaß-Lothringen ein : Alles sollte ausgerottet werden, was den Beigeschmack von französischem Einfluß hatte, und durch Deutschtum ersetzt werden. Diese Politik der Germanisierung galt auch für die Musik (und die Namen der Komponisten, die Rosbaud uraufführte, weisen deutlich in diese Richtung) . Ein großes Vorbild gab es : vor dem I. Weltkrieg hatte Hans Pfitzner mit dieser Zielrichtung in Straßburg gearbeitet, ihn entsprechend zu ehren, war da nur konsequent.

Wilhelm Furtwängler hatte sich geweigert, diesen Posten in Straßburg anzutreten und brachte dies auch nach dem Krieg zu seiner Entlastung an. Rosbaud rechtfertigte sich nach dem Untergang des Dritten Reiches : er habe den armen Menschen im Elsaß Freude gebracht, er habe einigen aus diversen politischen Schwierigkeiten herausgeholfen, er habe darauf bestanden, französischstämmige Elsässer im Orchester zu behalten, die sonst in die Wehrmacht eingezogen worden wären.

Nun, die Musik, mit der Rosbaud den Menschen im Elsaß über ihre schweren Tage half, war deutsche Musik, Musik etwa von Bresgen, Johann Nepomuk David, Kurt Hessenberg, Hermann Reutter und Winfried Zillig, ansonsten war das Programm traditionell deutsch mit einem Schwerpunkt auf Pfitzner. Das Niveau, das Rosbaud allerdings musikalisch in seinen Konzerten erreichte, war sehr hoch. André Tubeuf schreibt :

Die anderen Entschuldigungsgründe sind schwer nachprüfbar, treffen aber offensichtlich zu - wie die Reaktion der Franzosen nach dem Krieg zeigte.

« En comparant les 2 prises du 14 et du 15 mars 1949, il faut bien dire que les 2 interprétations sont très proches, mouvements par mouvement, au point que prétendre les départager me semble un exercice assez vain. Néanmoins, on apprécie d'entendre la version du 14 mars, aussi sombre, véhémement et tragique que celle du 15, mais bénéficiant, à mon sens, d'une prise de son moins confuse dans les fortissimos. » (Jean-Claude Hulot, Diapason n° 442, page 84, novembre 1997.)

« Cette interprétation est très proche, par le choix du texte et des tempos et par la conception d'ensemble, de celle de 1944. Furtwängler va cependant encore plus loin dans une conception tendue, noire (et la pâte sonore de Berlin est naturellement plus sombre que celle de Vienne) en usant d'un rubato extrême comme dans l'Adagio, où la sévérité contemporaine des Ires pages s'oppose à la rapidité véhémement, frénésie que l'on retrouve d'ailleurs dans la Coda du Finale. Malheureusement, cette vision aussi impressionnante que personnelle est trahie par un qualité technique déplorable ; tous les fortissimos sont dénaturés par des saturations, tandis que les toux de l'auditoire parviennent à couvrir les ultimes mesures du 1er mouvement. » (Jean-Claude Hulot, Diapason n° 422, page 89, janvier 1996.)

Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise de Munich

1er juillet 1949 : Création officielle à Munich de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise (« Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks ») par le chef Eugen Jochum, en remplacement du « Radio München Orchester » . Jochum va en assurer la direction musicale jusqu'en 1960. Ce nouvel ensemble est l'un des principaux Orchestres de la ville de Munich, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich et l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Bavière. Le « BRSO » est aujourd'hui encore considéré comme l'un des meilleurs au monde.

L'Orchestre symphonique de la radio bavaroise est le dernier-né des Orchestres de radio allemands qui ont vu le jour au lendemain de la Seconde Guerre mondiale. Son histoire peut être résumée par les 5 noms prestigieux qui se sont succédé à sa tête : Eugen Jochum (1949-1960) ; Rafael Kubelík (1961-1979) ; Colin Davis (1983-1992) ; Lorin Maazel (1993-2002) ; et Mariss Jansons (2003-) . Eugen Jochum en a été le bâtisseur, autour de Beethoven, Brahms et Bruckner ; Rafael Kubelík a fait découvrir à l'Orchestre un répertoire alors mal connu : Mahler, Janáček, Stravinski ; Colin Davis, lui, a révélé Mozart et Berlioz ; Lorin Maazel l'a transformé en une formation polyvalente de niveau international, peut-être moins marquée par l'héritage de la tradition germanique que les autres Orchestres allemands. Mariss Jansons l'a ouvert plus largement au répertoire contemporain. En Allemagne, cet Orchestre est désormais généralement considéré comme l'un des plus prestigieux, immédiatement après l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde.

La musique contemporaine a toujours occupé une place importante dans son répertoire, grâce aux commandes de la radio bavaroise qu'il a créées : œuvres de Karl Amadeus Hartmann (3e, 4e, 6e Symphonies, respectivement de 1948, 1948, 1953 ; « Symphonisches Hymnen » , 1975 ; « Sinfonia Tragica » , 1989) ; Ernst Křenek (« Der Zauberspiegel » , 1968) ; Carl Orff (« De temporum fine comoedia » , nouvelle version de 1980) ; Iannis Xenakis (« Pièce 000 » , 1980 ; « AIS » , 1981) ; Gunther Schuller (Concerto pour piano, 1981) ; Arvo Pärt (« Passion selon Saint-Jean » , 1982) ; Isang Yun (Concerto pour clarinette, 1982) ; Heiner Göbbels (« Eislermaterial » , 1998) ; Jean-Claude Risset (« Escalas » , 2002) ; Pascal Dusapin (« Exeo » , 2003) ; Georg Friedrich Haas (Concerto pour violoncelle et orchestre, 2004 ; Concerto Grosso n° 1, 2014) ; Friedrich Cerha (« Momente » , 2006) ; Mauricio Kagel (« In der Matratzengruft » , 2009) ; Tristan Murail (« le Désenchantement du monde » , 2012) ; Philippe Manoury (Concerto pour 2 pianos, 2013) .

Plusieurs formations de musique de chambre sont issues de ses rangs, notamment le « Nonetto » de Munich et le Quatuor Kœckert (« Kœckert Quartett ») , fondé par Rudolf Kœckert et constitué autour du 1er violon solo de l'Orchestre.

The Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra (« Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks ») is based in Munich, one of 2 full-size Symphony Orchestras operated under the auspices of the Bavarian Broadcasting (« Bayerischer Rundfunk ») , known as « BR ») . Its primary concert venues today are the « Philharmonie am Gasteig » and the « Herkulesaal » in the « Residenz » .

The Orchestra was founded on 1st July 1949, with members of an earlier Radio Orchestra in Munich as the core personnel. Eugen Jochum was the Orchestra's 1st chief-conductor, from 1949 until 1960. Subsequent chief conductors have included : Rafael Kubelik, Sir Colin Davis and Lorin Maazel. Since 2003, the Orchestra's chief-conductor has been Mariss Jansons, whose current contract extends through 2021. Jansons has regularly campaigned for a new concert-hall for the Orchestra since the start of his « BRSO » tenure.

To this day, the Orchestra participates in the « Musica Viva » concerts, originally founded by the composer Karl Amadeus Hartmann.

The Orchestra has recorded for a number of commercial labels, including « Deutsche Grammophon » , « RCA » , and « EMI » . The Orchestra received the 2006 « Grammy Award » for Best Orchestral Performance for its recording of Dimitri Shostakovich's 13th Symphony. The Orchestra has recently begun to produce recordings under its own « BR-Klassik » label.

Soon after it was founded by Eugen Jochum, in 1949, the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » developed into an internationally-renowned Orchestra, its fame continuously expanded and fortified by its intensive touring activities. The Orchestra owes its extraordinarily wide-ranging repertoire and sound spectrum to the program preferences of its previous chief-conductors as well as to the great flexibility and solid stylistic security of each individual musician.

Fostering new music has an especially long tradition at the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » with appearances in conjunction with the « Musica Viva » series, founded in 1945 by Karl Amadeus Hartmann, as one of the Orchestra's main assignments right from the start. At these concerts, Munich audiences have witnessed legendary performances of contemporary works at which the composers themselves generally stood on the podium of the Orchestra. These included : Igor Stravinsky, Darius Milhaud, Paul Hindemith, Pierre Boulez, as well as, more recently, Karlheinz Stockhausen, Mauricio Kagel, Luciano Berio and Peter Eötvös.

Over the past few years, the « Symphonieorchester » has also pursued new approaches to early-music and now collaborates regularly with such experts in historical performance practice as Thomas Hengelbrock, Nikolaus Harnoncourt and Ton Koopman. Many renowned guest-conductors, such as Clemens Krauß, Erich and Carlos Kleiber, Charles Münch, Ferenc Fricsay, Otto Klemperer, Karl Böhm, Günter Wand, Sir Georg Solti, Carlo Maria Giulini, Kurt Sanderling and Wolfgang Sawallisch have left indelible imprints on the « Symphonieorchester » in the past. Today, Bernard Haitink, Riccardo Muti, Esa-Pekka Salonen, Franz Welser-Möst, Daniel Harding and Andris Nelsons number amongst the significant partners who regularly mount the podium in Munich. The « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » was also the only German Orchestra with which Leonard Bernstein regularly collaborated for many years.

Besides the many performances and recordings in Munich and other cities in the station's broadcast range, extensive concert tours are central components in the everyday life of the Orchestra today. Tours have taken the Orchestra to virtually every European country, to Asia as well as to North and South America. It makes regular appearances in New York's Carnegie Hall and in the renowned concert halls in Japan's musical capitals. Since 2004, the « Symphonieorchester » under the direction of its current Chief-Conductor, Mariss Jansons, is additionally the Orchestra in residence at the Easter Festival in Lucerne.

A further special feature is the encouragement of up-and-coming young musicians. In conjunction with the ARD International Music Competition, the « Symphonieorchester » accompanies young musicians both in the final rounds as well as in the Symphonic closing-concert featuring the prize winners. Since October of 2001, the Academy of the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » has been doing valuable educational work by preparing young musicians for their later careers and, thus, building a solid bridge between education and professional activity. Beyond this, the « Symphonieorchester » maintains an encouragement program for young people with many activities designed toward the worthy goal of bringing the younger generation closer together with Classical music.

The history of the « Symphonieorchester » is closely intertwined with the names of its previous chief-conductors, who were always concurrently Chief-Conductors of the « Chor des Bayerischen Rundfunks » . The founder, Eugen Jochum, led the Orchestra for 11 years (from 1949 to 1960) . He built-up the Orchestra completely with top-grade musicians and established it's world-wide reputation on its initial foreign tours. Munich audiences have him to thank for incomparable interpretations of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner. Besides Bruckner, Eugen Jochum devoted special attention to the performance of sacred music, and also made regular appearances on the podium of « Musica Viva » .

Rafael Kubelik, who headed the Orchestra for 18 years (1961 to 1979) , remained closely associated with the Orchestra as a guest-conductor beyond that period. He expanded the repertoire to include works by Slavic composers like Bedřich Smetana, Leoš Janáček and Antonín Dvořák, as well as spearheading the cause of 20th Century composers such as Karl Amadeus Hartmann and conducting the 1st Mahler cycle with a German Orchestra, which was then recorded on « DGG » . His impulsive, emotional approach to music won the hearts of all the musicians and made the Kubelik era one of the most fruitful ones in the history of the ensemble.

When his already designated successor Kyrill Kondrashin, unexpectedly died in Amsterdam, the Orchestra turned to Sir Colin Davis, thus gaining a recognized Berlioz specialist as chief-conductor (1983 to 1992) , who likewise proved an excellent advocate for the Viennese Classical Era as well as the works of English composers, especially Edward Elgar, Michael Tippett and Ralph Vaughan Williams.

From 1993 to 2002, Lorin Maazel led the « Symphonieorchester » . He set new styles of programming by performing cycles of Symphonic works by Beethoven (1995 and 2000) ; Brahms (1998) ; Bruckner (1999) ; and Schubert (2001) . He took his leave of his Orchestra with a Mahler cycle, in 2002.

A new and mutually pleasurable chapter in the history of the « Symphonieorchester » began in October of 2003 when the acknowledged favourite candidate of all the musicians, Mariss Jansons, assumed his post as the new Chief-Conductor of the « Chor » and the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » . In no time, he succeeded in creating an atmosphere of the highest-artistic standards and a close emotional tie with the Orchestra. He regularly receives enthusiastic reviews both for his concerts and Munich and the many guest-appearances in the leading musical capitals of Europe, America and Japan. Mariss Jansons conducts a wide repertoire, covering the Classical and Romantic eras and continuing on to 20th Century music and works by contemporary composers. He regularly earns enthusiastic reviews for his concerts in Munich as well as the numerous guest-appearances in virtually all the major European musical capitals.

With a high-number of CD releases, among others a series of live recordings of Munich concerts, Mariss Jansons continues to expand the Orchestra's vast discography. The recording of Dimitri Shostakovich's 13th Symphony won the « Grammy Award » for « Best Orchestral Performance » , in 2006. Since September of 2009, the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » has been releasing CD's and DVD's on the Bavarian Broadcasting's own label, « BR-KLASSIK » .

In a number of different surveys of music-critics, the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » has numbered among the top 10 Orchestras in the world, most recently in the 2008 Orchestra ranking by the British music magazine « Gramophone » , (6th place) ; and, in 2010, in the Japanese music magazine « Mostly Classic » (4th place)

In August 2013, the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » got awarded the « ECHO Klassik » for the recording of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 9 with Bernard Haitink as well as the « Preis der Deutschen Schallplattenkritik » (Award of German Record's Review) for Antonín Dvořák's Symphony No. 9 conducted by Andris Nelsons.

Das Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks (BRSO) in München ist der größte Klangkörper des Bayerischen Rundfunks. Es wurde 1949 gegründet.

Das BRSO zählt zu den besten Orchestern Deutschlands und genießt auch international höchstes Ansehen. Ein Gremium von Chefredakteuren führender europäischer Musikzeitschriften wählte es im Jahr 2006 auf Platz 6 aller europäischen Orchester. Das britische Fachmagazin Gramophone wählte es im Jahr 2008 durch eine Befragung von Musikkritikern auf Platz 6 aller Orchester der Welt. Joseph Meßner

Joseph Meßner was born on 27 February 1893 in Schwaz, Austria, not far from Innsbruck ; and died on 23 February 1969 in Sankt Jakob am Thurn, a short distance from Salzburg.

Meßner was the 2nd son of Jakob Meßner and Maria Speckbacher. A deep religious man, Joseph was ordained a priest in 1916, studied composition and organ at the Munich Academy of Music (« Münchner Akademie für Tonkunst ») to become an organist, a prolific composer and, eventually, a famous conductor of mostly religious works.

In 1923, he was appointed organist and, in 1926, « Kapellmeister » at the « Domkirche » in Salzburg. And, since 1932, he conducted the so-called « Dom » Concerts of the Salzburg Festival (« Salzburger Festspiele ») .

Right after the annexation of Austria (« Anschluß ») by Germany, on March 12th, 1938, Joseph Meßner had been degraded by the Nazis and was not allowed to perform any longer.

There is mention of a concert with Joseph Meßner conducting the « Mozarteum » Orchestra during World War II. It is a concert under the auspices of the « NSDAP » (National-Socialist German Workers' Party) held on August 24th, 1942, when Meßner's « Scherzo » and « 3 Songs » for baritone and orchestra with the title : « Schicksal der Deutschen » (Fate of the Germans) , on poems by Heinrich Lersch, were performed. Soloist in the songs entitled « Fahneid » (Oath to the Flag) , « Grabschrift » (Epitaph) , and « Bekenntnis » (Declared belief) was baritone Hans Herbert Fiedler. The other conductor of the program was Willem van Hoogstraten (former husband of pianist Elly Ney) . That was about the time when Willem Mengelberg conducted 2 concerts at the Salzburg Festival (one concert with pianist Cor de Groot in Beethoven's « Emperor Concerto » , Opus 73) .

The fact that Meßner conducted, then and there, when the Nazis were in charge, gave many a critic the idea that Meßner would have been on the wrong-side, politically, which, apparently, was a false accusation. The poems could be interpreted in more than one way. When, in 1945, the Austrian cultural life and also the Salzburg community should make a fresh start, the Americans choose Joseph Meßner to conduct the 1st concert of the Salzburg Festival (« Salzburger Festspiele ») . Could well be that they did not know about the 1942 event. Or, that they were told but did not adhere any significance to it.

On August 31st, 1945, Meßner conducted for the 1st time a performance of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Requiem » (KV 626) , in the Great Hall of the Salzburg « Mozarteum » . Singers were : Gertrude Erhardt, soprano ; Erna Kreuzer, contralto ; Julius Patzak, tenor ; Ludwig Weber, bass. The organist was Anton Dawidowicz. They performed together with the « Salzburger Domchor » and the « Mozarteum » Orchestra.

Each and every year, Meßner was present at the Salzburg Festival. He conducted for the last time in Salzburg, on August 13th, 1967, with (again) a performance of Mozart's « Requiem » (KV 626) . The singers were : Laurence Dutoit, soprano ; Friederike Baumgartner, contralto ; Lorenz Fehenberger, tenor ; and Max Pröbstl, bass. The organist was Gerhard Zukriegel.

After a full-life and 45 years of devoted music making, Joseph Meßner passed away.

According to the excellent website of the « Salzburger Festspiele » , Joseph Meßner's repertory was extensive and did not just include Giovanni Battista Pergolesi, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz-Josef Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Giacomo Rossini, Franz Schubert, Johannes Brahms, and Anton Bruckner. On July 7th, 1945, he led the 1st concert of the « Mozarteum » Orchestra after the War, performing compositions by Georges Bizet, Max Bruch and Piotr Ilitch Tchaikovsky.

Meßner was not only a devoted conductor and choir-leader. As an organist, he gave concerts in many a European city. Furthermore, he composed over 200 works of all kinds and forms : church music, secular music, choral works, songs, Concertos, Symphonies and chamber music. He wrote the « Missa poëtica » on texts by Ilse von Stach ; « Zwei Marienlegenden » (2 Mary Legends) ; a Symphony for organ ; « Esther » , a so-called Church Opera ; he composed the Opera « Hadassa » ; and also Violin Concertos and piano music. He wrote the stage-music for « Jedermann » (« Everyman, Elckerlyc ») , the play about « The Dying of the Rich Man » written by Hugo von Hofmannsthal.

Joseph Meßner (Josef, as printed on the « Remington » boxes with Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Requiem » and Franz-Josef Haydn's « 7 Last Words ») was one of the great conductors to lead the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Salzburg Dome Choir (« Salzburger Domchor ») in several series of religious concerts, and this for more than 20 years, starting in 1945. Several of Meßner's early performances appeared on « Remington Records » of which Marcel Prawy was the producer in Vienna and Salzburg. However, Prawy never mentions the name of Joseph Meßner in his book, « Marcel Prawy talks about his life » (« Marcel Prawy erzählt aus seinem Leben ») .

(When, in a letter dated September 25th, 1950, Prawy asks conductor Paul Sacher to make recordings for the « Remington » label, Prawy writes that :

« We have an exclusive contract with the « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Viennese « Tonkünstler Orchestra. »

An argument to persuade Paul Sacher. And it is not clear if Prawy wanted Sacher to conduct the Salzburg «

Mozarteum » Orchestra in specific works for « Remington Records » . Despite Prawy's bid, Paul Sacher never recorded for « Remington Records » .)

It is probable that the recordings of the great works by Mozart, Haydn, Händel and Rossini conducted by Joseph Meßner, were not supervised by Prawy himself, or just in a few instances. He may have bought recordings from the organization of the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Festival, or even directly from the « Österreichischer Rundfunk » (Austrian Public Broadcasting Service) .

The recording of Joseph Meßner conducting Mozart's « Requiem » on August 9th, 1931, is neither listed in « The Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music » of 1942, nor in the 1948 edition. The performance which was transferred to CD by « Orfeo » must be a live-recording from the Austrian Broadcasting Service. In that performance, the singers were : Hanna Seebach-Ziegler, soprano ; Jella von Braun-Fernwald, contralto ; Hermann Gallos, tenor ; Richard Mayr, bass, the « Salzburger Domchor » and the Orchestra of the « Dom-Musikverein » , and the (pre-War) « Mozarteum » Orchestra.

The later performance of Mozart's « Requiem » Mass with Hilde Güden, soprano ; Julius Patzak, tenor ; Rosette Anday, contralto ; Josef Greindl, bass ; conducted by Joseph Meßner, on August 27th, 1950, was issued on « Remington Records » .

Warren DeMotte said about the recording :

« Meßner's performance is impressively lofty, but on two 12 inch disks. »

From 1933 up to and including World War II, the Nazi influence in the arts was not only restricted to the celebration of Richard Wagner at Bayreuth, and in the condemnation and prohibition of modernistic, so-called : « Degenerated Art » (« Entartete Kunst ») and « Degenerated Music » (« Entartete Musik ») . Also books and manuscripts were edited, complete encyclopedias were re-written and entries in existing encyclopedia were omitted or changed. Also the text of Mozart's « Requiem » Mass had to suffer.

It was « Polydor » (originally, the German division of « The Gramophone Company » named « Deutsche Grammophon ») that had made a recording of Mozart's « Requiem » Mass (KV 626) , in 1941, with singers Tilla Briem, soprano ; Gertrude Freimuth, contralto ; Walter Ludwig, tenor ; and Fred Drissen, bass. Used was an alternate Nazi-text (according to « The Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music ») .

« The New York Times » later wrote :

« All references to the Jewish roots of Christianity are purged. “ Quam olim Abrahæ promisisti ” (As was promised to Abraham) becomes “ Quam olim homini promisisti ” (As was promised to man) . “ Deus in Sion ” (God in Zion) becomes “ Deus in cælis ” (God in Heaven) . »

The only recording of Joseph Meßner in the era of the 78 RPM shellac records, is a 12 inch disc : « His Master's Voice » , DB 5054. He conducts an Orchestra accompanying soprano Eidé Noréna singing « Care Selve » from « Atalanta » by Georg Friedrich Händel. This recording of Noréna (Andre Karoline Hansen) was probably made in 1939 when she sang during the Salzburg Festival.

In « The New Guide to Recorded Music » (1950) , Irving Kolodin wrote :

« All singers save Noréna by using an English version of the Italian text, which was one more reason for retaining a preference for her version. However, Noréna, whose singing of Opera has not often moved me, is an inspired artist on this disk. »

Maybe, Joseph Meßner's conducting had an inspiring influence.

There is a recording of Orazio Benevoli's « Messe solennelle pour 53 voix et hymne pour la consécration de la Cathédrale de Salzbourg » (Solemn Mass for 53 voices and hymn for the consecration of the Salzburg Cathedral ; « Festmesse und Hymnus zur Einweihung des Domes in Salzburg, 1628 ») written in 1628, conducted by Joseph Meßner, on « Philips » A 00622/3 L (a 2 LP set) from 1954. Issued in the United States on a single-disc, « Epic » LC 3035, in April 1954 (without the hymn) ; released in Great Britain, in August 1955, on « Philips » ABR 4015/6, two 10 inch discs. The performers are the « Salzburger Dom-Chor » , the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and organist Franz Sauer.

Recordings of Joseph Meßner on the « Remington » label

R-199-66/2 : Franz-Josef Haydn's « The 7 Last Words of Christ » . Joseph Meßner conducts the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Salzburg « Dom-Chor » . Soloists : Hilde Güden, soprano ; Clara Ötschläger, contralto ; Julius Patzak, tenor ; Hans Braun, baritone ; Ernst Reichert, harpsichord. Recorded live at the Salzburg Festival on 30 July 1950, in the « Aula Academica » . Released in May 1952 on the « Remington » label (199-66) . In France, released on the « Concerteum » label (Album 284) .

In « The Long-Playing Record Guide » , Warren DeMotte writes about this recording :

« The Oratorio is available in 1 recording. Meßner leads a performance of solid virtues and sensible pacing, in a surprisingly open recording. However, there is little tension, and this may be inherent in the Oratorio version. »

In the « High-Fidelity » magazine of September 1954, C.G. Burke writes about this recording :

« “ The 7 Last Words ”, in its final vocal setting, is compulsive in spite of the minor damage undergone in recording a public performance. »

R-199-69/3 : Georg Friedrich Händel's Oratorio « Messiah » , in the so-called Mozart-Hiller version for which Mozart added to the instrumentation, made cuts and made a few changes. Joseph Meßner conducts the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Salzburg « Dom-Chor » . Soloists : Anneliese Kupper, soprano ; Rosette Anday, contralto ; Lorenz Fehenberger, tenor ; Josef Greindl, bass. Recorded live at the Salzburg Festival on 28 August 1949, in the « Aula Academica » . Released in May 1952 on the « Remington » label, in the « Music Plus » Series (MP-100-18) , with a comment by Sigmund Spæth. In France, released on the « Concerteum » label (Album 205) .

R-199-96/2 : Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Requiem » . Joseph Meßner conducts the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Salzburg « Dom-Chor » . Soloists : Hilde Güden, soprano ; Rosette Anday, contralto ; Julius Patzak, tenor ; Josef Greindl, bass. Recorded live at the Salzburg Festival on 27 August 1950, at the « Aula Academica » . Ist listed in the « Schwann » catalogue of July 1952. In France, released on the « Concerteum » label (CR 221) .

In the 4th instalment of his discography of recordings of works by Mozart, « Mozart on microgroove » , published in the « High-Fidelity » magazine of November-December 1953, C.G. Burke comments on the live-performance on « Remington » :

« For “ Remington ”, the Salzburg specialist Professor Meßner has produced a beautiful compromise suitable for churches, wherein a devout acknowledgement of God's power ascends over the human revolt of a dying man against the omnipotence that ends him. Splendid soloists and confident, expertise in the performance carried by a recording in which good and bad battle to our exasperation. The violins cut and the bass is inflated for service on the poorest phonographs. There is an oppressive low-frequency background noise more distracting than the occasional coughs of the audience at this public performance. Withal, direct and tonal phalanxes. On the most resourceful phonographs, the sound can be disciplined to impress us ; and, on bad phonographs, the sound has a meretricious effectiveness. Owners of middling, respectable apparatus should be wary of this recording. »

R-199-111/2 : Giacomo Rossini's « Stabat Mater » . Joseph Meßner conducts the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Salzburg « Dom-Chor » . Soloists : Irmgard Seefried, soprano ; Rosette Anday, contralto ; Lorenz Fehenberger, tenor ; Ferdinand Franz, bass. Recorded live at the Salzburg Festival on 7 August 1949, at the « Aula Academica » . Released in the course of 1953. In France, released on the « Concerteum » label (CR 291) .

Music-critic Warren DeMotte wrote :

« Meßner is devotional and tones down the Operatic aspect of the score. »

Joseph Meßner, österreichischer Musiker, Komponist und Priester : geboren 27. Februar 1893 in Schwaz ; gestorben 23. Februar 1969 in Sankt Jakob am Thurn.

Joseph Meßner, Bruder des Sozialethikers Johannes Meßner, wurde in Schwaz / Tirol als Sohn eines Knappen (im Silberbergwerk Schwaz) und einer Tabakarbeiterin geboren. Er bekam bereits früh Musikunterricht in Gesang, Geige, Klavier und Orgel. Zwölfjährig übersiedelte er 1905 nach Salzburg und erhielt fortan seine musikalische Ausbildung im

Kapellhaus, Sigmund-Haffner-Gasse 20, danach am Mozarteum. Nach der Reifeprüfung am Borromäum studierte er Theologie und wurde 1916 zum Priester geweiht. Später bildete er sich in München bei Friedrich Klose (Komposition) und Rheinberger-Schüler Josef Becht (Orgel) weiter.

In den 20er Jahren des 20. Jahrhunderts feierte Meßner vor allem in Deutschland große Erfolge als Komponist. In mehreren Städten fanden « Joseph Meßner Orgelfeste » statt, in Duisburg wurden 1924 die « Joseph-Meßner-Tage » veranstaltet, bei denen seine Sinfonietta für Klavier uraufgeführt wurde. Erzbischof Ignatius Rieder berief ihn 1922 zum zweiten Domorganisten am Salzburger Dom, bestellte und bezahlte ihn allerdings als Kooperator von Pfarrwerfen. Im Jahr 1926 wurde er schließlich Domkapellmeister in Salzburg - eine Funktion, die er bis zu seinem Tod innehatte.

In den 30er Jahren vollzog Meßner eine Glättung seiner sonst revolutionären Tonsprache, indem er seine « dissonanzreiche Kontrapunktik » durch « Wohllaute des Tonikadreiklages » ersetzte. Diesen Wandel vollzog er anscheinend unter dem Eindruck « großdeutscher Kulturideale ». Tatsächlich unterstützte Joseph Meßner, im Gegensatz zu seinem Bruder Johannes Meßner, den Anschluß Österreichs an das Deutsche Reich.

Nach dem Krieg versuchte Meßner an seine früheren Erfolge anzuknüpfen, was ihm nicht gelang. Beruflich fühlte er sich mehrmals übergangen oder ausgebremst, so 1946 bei der erhofften Berufung zum Rektor der Musikhochschule Mozarteum und bei seinen Domkonzerten, die man 1968 aus dem offiziellen Festspielprogramm strich.

Am 20. August 1968 wurde ihm die Ehrendoktorwürde der Universität Salzburg verliehen.

Joseph Meßner verstarb 1969 überraschend in seinem Einfamilienhaus in Sankt Jakob am Thurn, wo er mehrere Jahrzehnte mit der Sängerin Evi Klemens gewohnt hatte.

Er ruht auf dem Salzburger Kommunalfriedhof.

Joseph Meßner hinterließ ein umfangreiches Werk, darunter die Salzburger Festspielfanfane, deren Langfassung bis 1980 bei allen Rundfunkübertragungen der Salzburger Festspiele als akustisches Signet verwendet wurde ; die Bombenmesse, die an die Zerstörung des Salzburger Doms im Jahr 1944 erinnert, wobei der Komponist vorgab, sie selbst an der Domorgel miterlebt zu haben ; zahlreiche Bläserfanfaren. Darüber hinaus komponierte er drei Symphonien (in C-Moll, F-Dur und A-Dur) , mehrere Instrumental- und Orchesterwerke (darunter die Salzburger Suite, die als Programm verschiedene Sehenswürdigkeiten in Salzburg beschreibt) , vier Opern (darunter eine über die Person der Esther) , zahlreiche Lieder sowie eine große Zahl geistlicher Werke (Messen, Propriumsmusik, Motetten, geistliche Lieder und so weiter) . Als Orgelvirtuose war er international anerkannt, obwohl er (ähnlich wie Bruckner) nur wenige Orgelwerke komponierte, sondern bei seinen Orgelkonzerten durch seine Improvisationskunst beeindruckte. Heute sind nur mehr wenige Mitschnitte mit Improvisationen Meßners erhalten (Archiv des Forschungsinstituts für Salzburger Musikgeschichte an der Abteilung für Musik- und Tanzwissenschaft der Universität Salzburg) .

Andrew Rose (Pristine Audio) :

When it became known that I was working on a series of recordings of Wilhelm Furtwängler conducting Anton Bruckner's Symphonies, there was a certain degree of lobbying by e-mail for which recording might be chosen. I had already made considerable progress on the 1951 « Cairo » recording when I noticed repeated mentions both in e-mails and elsewhere referring to his 1949 Berlin recording as the one. Though not unanimous, it certainly made it worth investigating.

This is the earliest complete recording we have of Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 by Furtwängler. There is a fragmentary 1941 live-recording, and the 1942 « Telefunken » studio recording of the Adagio (available on : PASC257) ; thereafter, 2 radio recordings from 1951 : the 1st in Cairo ; the 2nd in Rome, all with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, have seen numerous re-issues.

But it is this recording and performance which is, for many, the best of them. Certainly, from a technical point of view, it's remarkably good. Despite a somewhat cramped and occasionally overly strident original sound, a product of uneven frequency responses in the recording equipment, all the ingredients were present for a really quite wonderful « XR » remastering - with deep, clear bass and brilliant top-end detail preserved if previously obscured by a « woolly » sound, at both ends of the spectrum.

That's not to say it was without fault. I've removed some quite intrusive traffic-noise, and dealt with top-end « flutter » - where the signal levels fluctuate rapidly in the higher-frequencies. This latter problem was particularly heard during the 2nd movement, and it has been possible to eliminate almost all of it, though there is a section where it may still just be detected.

Overall, though, the sound is crisp, clear, immediate and vibrant - and, as such, delivers almost as well as the great conductor himself.

22 octobre 1949 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique de Vienne, à la « Musikvereinssaal ». Le concert est enregistré (étiquette « DGG », CD) .

25 et 26 octobre 1949 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Basel. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Léonore » n° 2 de Beethoven ; et le Concerto « Grosso » n° 10 de Händel.

16 novembre 1949 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1878-1880, éditée par Robert Haas (1936) , avec le « Radio Symphonie Orchester Leipzig » (étiquette « Urania » , LP : URLP 401) .

19 décembre 1949 : Le chef Hans Knappertsbusch dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich. Il s'agit d'un concert spécial donné à la « Große Aula » de l'Université de Munich (« Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität ») .

1950-1959

En 1950, on voit paraître des disques « 78 tours » avec jusqu'à 9 minutes par face, grâce aux sillons variables inventés par la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » et, l'année suivante, la firme produit ses 1ers disques « 33 tours longue durée » (également appelés : microsillons) .

Wilhelm Kempff commence une nouvelle intégrale des Sonates pour piano de Beethoven en 1950 et grave les Concertos de Beethoven en 1953 (il ré-enregistrera les 2 cycles en stéréo dans les années '60) .

Wilhelm Furtwängler reprend sa collaboration avec la « DGG » , en 1951. Le Quatuor Amadeus et le violoniste Wolfgang Schneiderhan font leurs 1ers enregistrements « DGG » , en 1951 et 1952, respectivement. En 1959, ayant déjà gravé Brahms, Haydn, Mozart et Schubert, le Quatuor Amadeus se lance dans une intégrale en stéréo des Quatuors de Beethoven. Cette même année, Herbert von Karajan quitte « EMI » pour revenir à la firme - il signera quelque 330 disques pour « DGG » au cours des 30 années suivantes, dont 3 intégrales Beethoven et un « Ring » complet.

2 autres chefs d'orchestre jouent un rôle significatif après la guerre en consolidant la position de la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » dans le répertoire Classique et Romantique : Karl Böhm (surtout dans Mozart et dans Richard Strauß, dont le chef est l'ami) et Rafael Kubelik (surtout dans Dvořák et Smetana, « Lohengrin »), et une intégrale Mahler).

Le chef d'orchestre américain polyvalent Lorin Maazel signe avec la « DGG », en 1957. « Archiv » fait quelques enregistrements pionniers de musique du Moyen-âge et de la Renaissance dans ses 1^{res} décennies ; mais l'étiquette se concentre surtout sur le Baroque, notamment les œuvres complètes pour orgue de Bach avec Walcha et le répertoire allemand et italien dirigé par Rudolf Baumgartner, Fritz Lehmann, August Wenzinger et Karl Richter, qui, après la mort de Lehmann, devient le principal interprète Bach chez « DGG ».

En 1956, la firme transfère son siège à Hambourg, tandis que les usines de production restent à Hanovre. L'année suivante, la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » introduit sa nouvelle marque déposée : le « cadre jaune ». L'initiatrice de ce logo est la directrice de l'entreprise (qui est d'origine juive) qui emprunte la couleur de « l'Étoile de David » des Juifs, persécutés par les Nazis.

Bruno Walter : previously unissued Bruckner 9th

3 février 1950 : Bruno Walter conducts Bruckner's 9th Symphony with the Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York.

« What adjectives shall we apply to this, Bruckner's last Symphony ? It is the one of which he finished 3 movements, praying the Lord God to accept his " Te Deum " for the final movement, if he did not live to finish the score. And this has been followed on some occasions. But the better plan, as this incomplete Symphony stands today, seems to be to perform the 3 instrumental movements as they are, without a Finale. And we will discount adjectives about the work, pro or con, and content ourselves for the moment with a conditional clause : if we are to have Bruckner, let it be as he is interpreted by Mister Walter » (« The New York Times »)

Could this be Bruno Walter's finest Bruckner 9th ever ? The collector and Walter expert who provided these recordings stated his firm opinion that it is - a live recording preserved, unheard, for 65 years, now XR-remastered for « Pristine Audio » (PASC446) by Andrew Rose and sounding magnificent.

9 février 1950 : Le chef Ferdinand Leitner dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 9^e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 1^{er} concert de la saison.

23 février 1950 : Le chef Paul Schmitz dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 3^e

Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 12e concert de la saison.

23 mars 1950 : Le chef Günther Ramín dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester », accompagné du « Gewandhauschor » et du « Thomaner Chor », dans la 7e Symphonie et le « Te Deum » d'Anton Bruckner. Les solistes : Edith Laux, Eva Fleischer, Gert Lutze et Friedrich Härtel. Il s'agit du 14e concert de la saison.

1950 : Le chef Volkmar Andreae dirige à la « Mastersaal » la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1891, éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1893), avec le « Niederösterreich Tonkünstler-Orchester ». Un enregistrement existe.

1950 : Le chef Zoltán Fekete (1909-1978) dirige dans la salle de concert du « Mozarteum » de Salzbourg la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1889 (révision de Bruckner avec les frères Schalk), éditée par Theodor Rättig (1890); (étiquettes : « Remington », LP : R-199-138 / « Concerteum », LP : CR 223 / « Concert Hall », LP : CHC 65 et CHC 1065 / « Forgotten Records », CD : FR 194).

It is definitely not a « Remington MUSIRAMA » recording as is suggested by cover and label. In Great Britain, the Fekete recording was released on « Concert Artist » (LPA 1018). Many years later, it also appeared on « Qualiton » (« Hungaroton ») LP : HLPX 1047.

From 1950 on, this recording had been available on « Concert Hall Society » (CHS 1065).

In the beginning of 1954, CHS 1065 was no longer available and had been deleted from the « Schwann Long Playing Record Catalog ». The reason was that « Concert Hall » had now recorded a Bruckner 3rd with Walter Gøehr conducting the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra which was released on « Concert Hall » (CHS 1195) and was well received by the critics. In « High-Fidelity Magazine » of April 1954, critic Paul Affelder wrote :

« Walter Gøehr conducts a compact, intense performance that is played in fine fashion by the Netherlands Philharmonic. »

Zoltán Fekete

In 1950, producer Marcel Prawy asked Viennese conductor Bernard Paumgartner to make recordings for « Remington » and as a bait Prawy mentions the contract he has for making recordings with the « Mozarteum » Orchestra of Salzburg which was eventually conducted by Joseph Meßner. However, Prawy did not mention the name of Zoltán Fekete, the Hungarian conductor who conducted the « Mozarteum » on several occasions, but whose biography remains an obscurity. Zoltán Fekete was not a specific « Remington » artist in the sense that Kurt Wöb, Hine Arthur Brown, Joseph Meßner, or later, Thor Johnson was.

Information about Zoltán Fekete is very scarce, in fact, it is practically non-existent. Encyclopedias do not mention the man. Grove's does not have an entry on Fekete. And liner notes on the LP releases often merely mention his name and, only in 2 cases, 1 or 2 facts which may allude to an existing biography. On the « Remington » cover of Bruckner's Symphony No. 3 (on R-199-138) , there are just a few lines which indicate that Zoltán Fekete came to the United States, apparently just before World War II, and that he must have obtained American citizenship :

« This American-Hungarian conductor 1st penetrated the musical consciousness of New York through a series of concerts with the Midtown and New York City Orchestras. »

After the War, he returned to Vienna as Wanda C. von Rudolph writes on the back of the cover of « Colosseum » (CLPS 1012) with Suites of music by Georg Friedrich Händel arranged and conducted by Zoltán Fekete :

Zoltán Fekete to whom we are indebted for the suites presented here, conducted this performance with the Vienna State Symphony Orchestra. A Hungarian by birth his musical education includes study in the Budapest Academy of Music and in Vienna. Mister Fekete has devoted a great deal of research to the final period of Händel's creations. In his arrangements, he has kept faithfully to the original melodies and harmonies, transposing them into forms which are easily understandable today. Mister Fekete is also a composer, one of his compositions on another « Colosseum » record is his « Caucasus Ballet Suite » (CLPS 1011) .

Other numbers conducted by him are :

« Snow White Ballet Suite » (CLPS 1011) , and the « Grand Duo » , Opus 140, arranged by Fritz Öser as the « Gastein Symphony » (CLPS 1013) also Béla Bartók's early work (1905) - 1st Orchestra Suite, Opus 3 (CLPS 1010) .

Zoltán Fekete is arranger of Mozart's Fantasy and of Suites by Händel. He conducted works by Bartók, Bruckner, Mahler and Tchaïkovsky, and he is the composer of « Caucasus » Ballet Suite and « Snow White » Ballet Suite.

Zoltán Fekete was born on 25 July 1909, in Budapest, Hungary. He studied with Zoltán Kodály and Béla Bartók in Budapest and later in Vienna. The recordings of Zoltán Fekete are not many. They have been released in various countries on different record labels. Reviewers were not always appreciative of his conducting. I suspect that the poor technique of most recordings led to this opinion. Some of Fekete's performances show that he certainly had the needed authority to lead an Orchestra in an inspiring way. He surely did not have the wish to build a career solely as a conductor forcing him to lead performances of an extensive repertory with many different styles.

Apparently, Fekete was the man who preferred to appear, from time to time, in front of an Orchestra, would arrange works from others and would compose orchestral scores of his own. How many works he wrote in total is not known. Also, the exact date of his passing away is not found. But Teri Noel Towe told me that Fekete died in the late-1970's. He was living in Munich. His wife was Alma Høehn, the legendary dealer in collectable 78 rpm shellac records and vinyl LPs. She died around 1988.

Zoltán Fekete's « Remington » recordings :

R-149-2 : Elisabeth Wysor in Contralto Arias : Mozart, Meyerbeer, Verdi, Wagner ; the Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Zoltán Fekete. It was originally released by Don Gabor on « Continental » (CLP 1002) in 1950 (« Songs of the Great Masters ») . It also became available on « Halo » (50312) , in 1957. Edward Tatnall Canby noted reviewed this disc in « Saturday Review » of November 1950 :

« This is a very great voice, rich, with phenominal range, perfect control (like that of the great voices of the turn of the Century) ; musicianship excellent, too, with impeccably accurate pitch. Wagner items « Tristan » , « Rheingold » are most in style but unusual « Clemenza de Tito » . Mozart is well done. Tone is bit monotonous, diction not too good. Orchestral backing weak. Decidedly a worthwhile record, at any price. » (Edward Tatnall Canby)

R-149-25 : Mozart's Music to « Thamos, Koenig in Aegypten » with the Austrian Symphony Orchestra conducted by Zoltán Fekete, coupled with « Finlandia » by Sibelius, conducted by Kurt Wöb.

Fekete's name was a convenience name as the conductor stated in a letter to « Saturday Review » that he never recorded « Thamos » for any record company.

R-199-2 : Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, KV 608 (arrangment by Fekete) with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Zoltán Fekete, coupled with Symphony No. 1 by Schubert, conducted by Kurt Wöb.

R-199-55 (1st released in the winter of 1951-1952) : Tchaïkovsky's « Tempest » (Symphonic Fantasia, Opus 18) with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra conducted by Zoltán Fekete, coupled with « le Coq d'or » by Rimsky-Korsakov, conducted by George Singer.

The recording was also released by Gabor on the « Etude » label (reference 706 ; again coupled with « le Coq d'or ») but, then, « le Coq d'or » was attributed to Zoltán Fekete who protested about this in « Saturday Review » writing to the editor :

« Sir, I have never heard of this " Etude " company and wish to state categorically that I have no contract with them whatsoever. »

And he writes that he never in his life has conducted selections from « Thamos, King of Egypt » and has never recorded for any company Rimsky-Korsakov's « le Coq d'or » .

In April of 1955, the recording of « The Tempest » was issued in Great Britain on « Concert Artist » (LPA 1022) , but here coupled with Fekete's own composition « Caucasus Ballet Suite » . The issue in England had nothing to do with « Remington » as Zoltán Fekete owned copyright on both sound recordings. Although a « Concert Artist » release, reviewer Roger Fiske exactly described the « Remington » like sound character and the quality of the performance of this recording in the April 1955 issue of « The Gramophone » :

« The performance is reasonably good, though lacking in precision of attack, but the balance of the instruments is not satisfactory. There is no mellowness about the string tone - and after all they are Viennese violins and cannot really sound like this. The microphone, presumably too close, is picking-up too much from too few desks, and the result is edgy tone with some distortion on climaxes.

On the other side, there is a piece by the conductor who is not known by " Grove " or any other book of reference that I can find. Readers will notice that he has been doing a lot of recording in Vienna lately. According to the sleeve, he is a Hungarian who has lived in America since just before the War. Had I not been told, I would have guessed that his " Caucasus " was the work of a pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov writing in the 1890's. It seems to me to be quite without merit. (Roger Fiske)

You may disagree somewhat with the reviewer's qualification of the performance of « The Tempest » as being « reasonably good » . It suffice to listen to the (indeed badly recorded) but exhilarating performance on the « Remington » disc. The harsh string tone can certainly be corrected somewhat. But it is clear that Fekete is in full command of the Orchestra and the players show that they really can cope with the virtuoso passages of the storm building-up and raging. Noteworthy is the brass section of the Orchestra of the Viennese Symphonic Society. It is not a polished recording, that's for sure, yet, Fekete's is a strong and captivating performance and reminds one of the suspense generated by the sound track of an old 1950's B movie, indicating the important influence of European, Eastern European and Russian artists, musicians and composers in Hollywood at the time.

A curiosity is « Concerteum » (CR 326) on which Zoltán Fekete conducts « Orchestral Suite » (« Suite d'orchestre » , Opus 3) by Béla Bartók. Although the Bartók Suite recording appeared on « Concerteum » with the specific « Remington » prefix CR, the Suite never appeared on « Remington » but was released on « Colosseum » (CLPS 1010) in the United States. A release on « Remington » was maybe planned but did not go through. It could well be that the plates were cut in the « Webster » pressing plant or, at least, by the same engineer who cut the lacquers of other « Remingtons » .

1950 : Le chef Henry Swoboda dirige le « Psaume 150 » de Bruckner avec le « Wiener Akademie-Kammerchor » et le « Wiener Symphoniker » (1er enregistrement commercial sur étiquette « Westminster » , LP : WAL-201) (aussi sur étiquettes : « Donauland » , LP : 4035 / « Nixa » , LP : WLP 6201 / « Vega » , LP : C 30 S 230 / « Westminster » , LP : W 9700) . En complément : le « Psaume 112 » et la 6e Symphonie.

1950 : Le chef Henry Swoboda dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1881, éditée par Robert Haas (1935) , avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne. 1er enregistrement commercial (étiquette « Westminster » , LP : WL-30001 avec, en complément, les Psaumes 112 et 150 ; étiquette « Forgotten Records » , CD : FR 169) .

On its 1st issue, the 6th Symphony spread over 3 sides and the set was completed with Bruckner's settings of Psalms 112 and 150.

A casual visitor to the John F. Berky site, measuring Henry Swoboda's unusual timings against his almost non-existent reputation as an interpreter, might assume this 1st recording of the Bruckner 6th to have been a brave but misguided attempt by a conductor who didn't really know what he was doing. Such an assumption does not withstand actual listening. The performance is completely convincing, though it must be admitted that problems of balancing and ensemble, especially in the 1st movement, have not all been overcome. The recording is pretty good for its date.

If Henry Swoboda hasn't turned tables in the 1st movement to produce the fastest performance of all, he's not far off, while his Finale is round about average. The most striking conclusion is that, while « slow » conductors are usually slow in all movements, and « fast » conductors are usually fast in all movements, the fact that Swoboda belongs to the 1st category in the middle-movements and to the 2nd in the outer-movements means that the Symphony has completely different proportions in his hands compared with all others, the long-drawn, epic slow movement and gauntly iconoclastic Scherzo flanked by warmly flowing, far from monumental outer movements.

The issue of tempo relationships in the outer-movements is also fundamental. In particular, how to interpret the direction « Bedeutender langsam » (considerably slower) for secondary material in the 1st movement. Jascha Horenstein and Hans Rosbaud are 2 who take the extreme solution of exactly halving the tempo. Swoboda relaxes in a more natural way. Indeed, one is struck both here and in the Finale by the conversational ease with which he slips in and out of the different tempi, all the time maintaining the long line, the structural goals well in view. This is noble, instinctive Bruckner conducting in the Carl Schuricht mould, though Schuricht (whose interpretation of the 6th seems not to have survived) would surely have done the middle-movements very differently.

Henry Swoboda's remains « sui generis » in a number of respects. At 10 min 12, the Scherzo is very nearly the slowest ever. John F. Berky gives longer timings only for Charles Adler in 1952 (10 min 38) and Atsushi Takahashi in 1995 (10 min 16) . Colin Davis came close in 2002 (10 min 02) . Typical timings from conductors with a particular reputation in this music are :

07 min 37 (Wilhelm Furtwängler, in 1943) ; 7 min 51 (Bernard Haitink, in 1970) ; 7 min 52 (Herbert von Karajan, in 1979) ; 7 min 55 (Eugen Jochum, in 1966) ; 7 min 58 (Eugen Jochum, in 1978) ; 8 min 02 (William Steinberg, in 1970) ; 8 min 18 (Sergiu Celibidache, in 1991) ; 8 min 34 (Jascha Horenstein, in 1963) ; 8 min 36 (Bernard Haitink, in 2003) ; 8 min 48 (Günter Wand, in 1996) ; 8 min 52 (Georg Solti, in 1979) ; 8 min 55 (Georg Tintner, in 1995) ;

9 min 23 (Otto Klemperer, in 1964) ; 9 min 48 (Hans Rosbaud, in 1961) .

One is initially taken aback as Svoboda digs into the repeated low. As at the start, rather like John Barbirolli launching Mahler 6th. High caution in a work the Orchestra didn't know very well ? I don't think so. On other recordings of other music, Svoboda showed himself capable of pitching in with a dashing fast tempo, regardless of whether the Orchestra could play all the notes. He certainly plays this as if he means it. More than anyone else, he recalls Deryck Cooke's maxim that, behind all Bruckner's fast tempi, there's an underlying slow tempo. The Scherzo, as Svoboda sees it, is in the triplet quavers, which go at about the speed of a typical Beethoven Scherzo. The backdrop to this Scherzo is a trudging, menacing nocturnal « Ländler » . Taken on its own terms, I find it terrifically, even terrifyingly, convincing.

The 2nd movement is another interesting case, timed at 21 min 10. Longer versions come from Sergiù Celibidache in 1991 (different performances from the same year vary from 22 min 01 to 22 min 40) and, very marginally, Atsushi Takahashi in 1995 (21 min 12) .

12 min 43 (Otto Klemperer with the « Concertgebouw » , in 1961) ; 14 min 42 (Otto Klemperer, in 1964) ; 15 min 45 (Günter Wand, in 1996) ; 16 min 15 (William Steinberg, in 1970) ; 16 min 20 (Wilhelm Furtwängler, in 1943) ; 16 min 50 (Jascha Horenstein, in 1963) ; 16 min 55 (Colin Davis, in 2002) ; 17 min 02 (Frederick Charles Adler, in 1952) ; 17 min 08 (Eugen Jochum, in 1966) ; 17 min 19 (Bernard Haitink, in 2003) ; 17 min 25 (Bernard Haitink, in 1970) ; 18 min 20 (Hans Rosbaud, in 1961) ; 18 min 36 (Eugen Jochum, in 1978) ; 18 min 46 (Georg Tintner, in 1995) ; 18 min 58 (Herbert von Karajan, in 1979) ; 19 min 22 (Georg Solti, in 1979) .

Those who feel that Otto Klemperer's 1964 studio recording (I haven't heard the live « Concertgebouw » one) takes this movement too fast for the wailing oboe theme near the beginning to have its proper space will rejoice in Svoboda's long-drawn opening. Moreover, he maintains it nobly, justifying it with phrasing of heart-felt warmth, rather than rarefied spirituality Celibidache-style. I didn't find it hung fire. Indeed, while I immediately noted that it was slower than Klemperer (the latest I had listened to) , I was astounded to find it was considerably slower than everyone else too, except Celibidache.

If the conclusion so far is that Svoboda liked his Bruckner almighty slow, there are surprises in store in the outer movements. It is true that his 1st movement, at 15 min 16, is broader than William Steinberg in 1970 (14 min 53) and identical to Bernard Haitink in 1970 and Herbert von Karajan in 1979 (both 15 min 16) .

On the other hand, it is swifter than :

Bernard Haitink, in 2003 (15 min 56) ; Jascha Horenstein, in 1963 (15 min 59) ; Frederick Charles Adler, in 1952 (16 min 04) ; Eugen Jochum, in 1978 (16 min 11) ; Hans Rosbaud, in 1961 (16 min 28) ; Günter Wand, in 1996 (16 min 30) ; Eugen Jochum, in 1966 (16 min 31) ; Colin Davis, in 2002 (16 min 55) ; Sergiù Celibidache, in 1991 (17 min 02) ; Otto Klemperer, in 1964 (17 min 02) ; Georg Tintner, in 1995 (17 min 02) ; Hiroki Takahashi (17 min 35) ; and Georg Solti, in 1979 (17 min 41) .

Similarly, his Finale, at 13 min 59, is longer than Wilhelm Furtwängler, in 1943 (12 min 14) ; William Steinberg, in 1970 (13 min 05) ; Eugen Jochum, in 1966 (13 min 20) ; Bernard Haitink, in 1970 (13 min 27) ; Eugen Jochum, in 1978 (13 min 35) ; Otto Klemperer, in 1964 (13 min 48) ; Günter Wand, in 1996 (13 min 57) ; but faster than Hans Rosbaud, in 1961 (14 min 04) ; Frederick Charles Adler, in 1952 (14 min 17) ; Bernard Haitink, in 2003 (14 min 39) ; Jascha Horenstein, in 1963 (14 min 39) ; Georg Tintner, in 1995 (14 min 44) ; Colin Davis, in 2002 (15 min 02) ; Sergiù Celibidache, in 1991 (15 min 08) ; Herbert von Karajan, in 1979 (15 min 13) ; Georg Solti, in 1979 (15 min 14) ; and Hiroki Takahashi (17 min 36) .

Henry Swoboda

The Czech conductor and musicologist Henry Swoboda was born on 29 October 29 1897 and died on 13 August 1990. He made many recordings for the « Westminster » label, including the 1st commercially available record of Bruckner's 6th Symphony. He worked from 1927 to 1931 for « Electrola, Berlin » and, later, as conductor for « Radio-Prag » . He was a guest professor at the University of Southern California between 1931-1939 and emigrated 1939 to the United States.

As Henry Swoboda, the new conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra, greets you, he shoots-out his baton hand with disarming speed. The gesture lacks the pointless effusiveness one so often encounters. Swoboda is disarming in other ways as well. After launching into a musical idea with open feeling, he immediately backtracks by demanding :

« Do you see what I mean ? »

Swoboda refuses to be polemical about his ideas. « I am not for a system as a system. » , he says regarding contemporary music. Swoboda thinks that the exact direction modern music is now following is a very open question. Another example of his undogmatic approach is his feeling that American music's private enterprise « system » may work-out its future comfortably without the excellent European subsidy « system » .

Swoboda grew-up in Czechoslovakia, and as Zoltán Kodály's « Hány János » Suite's presence on his 1st program indicates, he feels part of old Austria's heritage. After attending the Music Conservatory in Prague, he took a Ph.D. at the University there and became assistant conductor at the Prague Opera. He then became conductor and program director for the Prague broadcasting station. Guest conducting took him to Edinburgh, Berlin, Dresden, and Vienna.

Swoboda came to the United States, in 1939. Although he became an american citizen in the mid- 1940's, Swoboda has appeared primarily in Europe, with tours of many continental Orchestras. He also toured South and Central America, but did not appear in this country until he conducted at the « Empire State Music Festival » , in 1960. Since then, he has led the « Symphony of the Air » in New York and made recordings with them for « Decca » .

Concert management has enormous complexities in this country, and this hurdle indeed helped delay Swoboda's appearance here. But he subscribes to no program for changing the system. He remarks that the dangers which the whimsy of Society patrons raise are the same as those brought on by government subsidy, where a failure to make selection rigorous could mean « any Congressman's niece could get on stage » . European State sponsorship has worked well because it has generally fixed strict standards for its grants, but Swoboda feels that American antagonism to active government has enough power to prevent State intervention. And, in the end, he feels « it is really hard to say which " system " is better » .

Swoboda feels himself a member of an older generation, but one who is trying to span the gap with the new one :

« I have been a revolutionary all my life, always for the avant-garde. »

But if he has respect for the « abstract feelings » of modern 12 tone music and for its distance from the « material world » , this sympathy has its limits. Swoboda feels that « every system is in the end based on tonality » , and ridicules the break with traditional training in composition of Karlheinz Stockhausen.

He maintains, on one hand, that there are Masters whose Classic discipline is essential to composition, and on the other, that in the end « all these things have nothing to do with logic » , that is, that composition must not be tied to intellect.

When Swoboda says that « music is not a sideline for me ; it is my life » , the statement is not just a sentimental wandering. For he goes on to point-out that people's absorption with a particular art changes often. He speculates that « the modern man is maybe more functional » and so requires the physical presence of painting and architecture. But for many others, music is the most compelling art because it is more a human companion than a functional one. He observes further that today both painting and music have become abstract and act as one's continual surroundings, be it material or spiritual. Thus, the question whether music is integral to you « is a question whether you choose to live with music or not ; or whether music chooses to live with you or not » .

For many readers, the name of Henry Swoboda will come in tandem with that of Clara Haskil. He was the conductor for 3 of her earlier Concerto recordings. These have been re-issued on various labels dedicated to historical material.

But who was Henry Swoboda ?

Such information is sketchy. Wikipedia's brief stub gives as its reference « Sources relating to the history of émigré musicians » , edited by Horst Weber and Manuela Schwartz, Munich (2005) . A profile and interview by William A. Weber (« The Harvard Crimson » , 2 november 1962) followed Swoboda's appointment as conductor of the Harvard-

Radcliffe Orchestra.

Some of this material is contradictory, so it would be interesting to hear from anyone who knows more or better. Briefly, Henry Swoboda was born in Prague on 29 October 1897. He studied under Václav Talich there, and also in Vienna. He was an assistant conductor at the Prague Opera (1921-1923), worked for « Electrola » in Berlin (1927-1931), guest conducted in Edinburgh, Berlin, Dresden and Vienna and was a conductor and programme planner for Prague Radio (1931-1938). He settled in the United States in 1939 and became an American citizen in the 1940's. Post-War, he appeared in Europe and Southern America but did not actually conduct publicly in the United States till 1960, when he appeared at the « Empire State Music Festival ». Thereafter, he was conductor of the Harvard-Radcliffe Orchestra (1962-1964), visiting professor and conductor of Texas University Orchestra (1964-1968) and, one supposes, drifted-out of the scene with encroaching old age. He died on 13 August 1990.

Swoboda's pre-War career had involved administration and organization as well as conducting. Post-War, he was one of the founder-members of the « Westminster » recording company, in 1949. He recorded prolifically for this in the early 1950's as well as for « Concert Hall » and its associated « Musical Masterpieces Society » and « la Guilde Internationale du Disque ». On one slightly later recording (1959), he accompanied Ruth Slenczynska in Saint-Saëns' 2nd Piano Concerto, conducting the « Symphony of the Air », issued on « Decca ».

Given Swoboda's part-ownership of « Westminster », this might look like a partly vanity career. If there was any element of this, then he used it well. Of the works he set down for « Westminster », several were 1st recordings and, apart from some Concertos with noted soloists, practically none were easily obtainable in other versions at the time. Whereas « Concert Hall » and, in particular, the « Musical Masterpieces Society », were interested in making available cheap versions of repertoire works. Swoboda set-down a number of popular items for them, in particular Symphonies by Haydn and Mozart. « Westminster » also undertook (presumably under Swoboda's influence) the promotion and preservation of the art of several conductors not otherwise well-documented by the record industry, especially Hermann Scherchen. The « Westminster » recordings were mainly (and, in Swoboda's case, exclusively) made in Vienna with the Symphony Orchestra or the State Opera Orchestra. Some of the earlier « Concert Hall » and « Musical Masterpieces Society » recordings use pseudonymous groups such as the « Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra ». Properly identified Orchestras were the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra and the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra. The latter was a pick-up band using players from various Dutch radio Orchestras, unrelated to the present-day Orchestra of the same name. As we shall see, Clara Haskil was not the only distinguished soloist apparently happy to be accompanied by Swoboda. He proved an excellent collaborator in every case.

Swoboda's recordings can be obtained from a number of download sources, all of which I wish to thank for their dedication and efforts. In particular, « Mon Musée Musical », a fascinating and very well-organized French language site run by René Gagnaux; « The European Archive », a site offering a lot of material but sometimes depending on damaged LP copies; « Random Classics » and « Squirrel's Nest », 2 sites which, for reasons explained therein, may not remain visible much longer. The willingness of these collectors of rare (and out-of-copyright) records to share their treasured possessions in this way is a beacon of light in an ungenerous world, the more so since there would probably be little or no profit to be gained by re-issuing most of these old LP's as commercial CDs.

The material I have found does not quite amount to Swoboda's complete recorded output, but it would seem enough to get an idea of his qualities. These enthusiasts are working from old LP's, not Master tapes, many of which may not have survived anyway. To avoid repeating ad nauseam comments such as « the recording is reasonable for its age » , I shall discuss recording or transfer quality only if it seems exceptionally good or a real stumbling-block to appreciation of the performance.

I have not been able to provide exact dates for these recordings. In a postscript, I have shown the « Werm » edition or supplement in which they are 1st listed. From this, it can be seen that a few of these recordings were on sale by April 1950, almost all of the rest by the end of 1952. Swoboda's recording career was therefore intense while it lasted, but concentrated within a period running from the end of the 1940's to the very early 1950's.

Bach's 1st Orchestral Suite is a performance strictly of its time. The strings of the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra seem pretty numerous, there's no continuo that I could discern and little dynamic variation. It has a certain vibrancy in its favour (MMS-74) .

Swoboda's recording of Vivaldi's « The 4 Seasons » , on the other hand, has a number of claims to fame. The story is told in several places on the internet, most fully at the Naxos site.

The violinist is Louis Kaufman, described as one of the most recorded violinists of all time, on account of his participation in hundreds of Hollywood film scores. Post-War, he moved to Europe and gave a number of major premieres, including works by Bohuslav Martinů and Darius Milhaud. This was not, as sometimes stated, the 1st ever recording of « The 4 Seasons » , having been pre-dated by a version under Bernardino Molinari, in 1942. But it was the one that caught the popular imagination, converting Vivaldi almost overnight from a peripheral figure in the history books into a household name. It won the « Grand Prix du Disque » , in 1950, and entered the « Grammy » Hall of Fame, in 2002.

Billed as played by the « Musical Masterpiece String Orchestra » , this was one of Swoboda's few recordings set-down outside Europe, the band consisting of moonlighting members of the New York Philharmonic playing in the Carnegie Hall. And moonlighting is the word, since the recordings were set-down after midnight during the last week of 1947 ; the venue was fully booked at all other hours. At the time, Kaufman was unaware that these Concertos were the 1st 4 from a set of 12. On learning this, he embarked upon a quest to Europe and, on the advice of Gian Francesco Malipiero, tracked-down an early edition of the complete set in Brussels. His recordings of the other 8, in 1950, belong to another story since the conductor was Clemens Dahinden.

The revised edition of « The Record Guide » , from 1956, tells us that, « Louis Kaufman has made a special study of the stylistic problems involved in playing Vivaldi's music » . The many violinists who have made such studies in more recent years have not, however, concluded that the historical sources justify a rich vibrato and a degree of swooping portamento that might now be considered bad manners in Max Bruch. Similarly, we would today expect a harpsichord continuo all through. At 1st, there seems to be no continuo at all. An organ appears in the far distance in « Summer

» , to rather spectral effect, detected, at times, in « Winter » too. A harpsichord suddenly turns-up in « Autumn » , strumming away with its lute stop during the middle movement. Combined with Kaufman's swooning approach and the lush New York Philharmonic strings, the effect is as ripely Romantic as anything Ottorino Respighi, or even Joaquín Rodrigo, ever imagined. Most modern ears will get the idea they are not listening to real Vivaldi at all but Concertos « in the old style » by Respighi or another early 20th Century Italian post-Romantic. On the other hand, it is all marvellously imaginative and alive. This goes for Swoboda just as much as Kaufman. Few versions since have had the same capacity as these to astound and involve the listener. Their place in the history of recorded music, and in the revival of the Italian Baroque, would seem unquestioned (MMS-56) .

« WERM » shows that Swoboda set-down a few more Concertos from the Italian Baroque.

Swoboda showed at least a passing interest in the transitional period between Baroque and Classical. In a « Piano Concerto » in A minor by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, the pianist Franz Holletschek (to use the spelling on the disc label) and the conductor seem uncertain how to treat this music and content themselves with a generalized liveliness. Listeners today are likely to find, in alternation, passages where the modern grand piano works surprisingly well and others (probably the majority) where it doesn't convince at all, possibly because the pianist seems to feel the same way.

On the other side are 2 Symphonies (H. 663 and H. 659) . These are musically much more interesting than the Concerto, indeed fascinatingly unpredictable. Swoboda seems much more convinced here, inspiring the Vienna Symphony Orchestra to play them with fire and real point. « Westminster » (LPG 8324) , recorded on 27 July 1950.

The Vienna Symphony Orchestra also plays a « Sinfonia Concertante » in F by Carl Stamitz. This proves an amiable piece and rather more than that in the middle movements, which go very nicely. Swoboda puts plenty of vim and vigour into the tutti passages of 1st movement but lets the tempo slacken when the unnamed soloists enter, somewhat dissipating the effect. The same happens in the Finale to a lesser extent. « Westminster » (WL-50-17) , recorded on 19 December 1949.

In a coupling of Haydn's Symphonies Nos. 77 and 78, very likely 1st recordings, No. 77 gets an unhurried but lively performance, with a beaming, good-hearted appreciation of the music. The ensemble of the so-called « Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra » is far from tight at times. No. 78 is a tougher, minor-key work and gets a suitably vigorous performance (CHC-30) .

For the « Musical Masterpieces Society » , Swoboda led the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra in a popular coupling of Symphonies No. 94 (« Surprise ») and No. 100 (« Military ») . After a thoughtful introduction, No. 94 is much lighter and jollier than was the norm at the time, with infectious rhythms and a real bounce to the minuet. In No. 100, he goes beyond mere jokiness. The « military » instruments impinge on the innocent lilt of the 2nd movement and the jollity of the last with brutal, devastating effect. In this Symphony, Swoboda opts for a very relaxed minuet. 2 very fine performances (MMS-59) .

With harpsichordist Hans Andrae, violinist Peter Rybar and the « Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra », Swoboda also recorded Haydn's Double Concerto (Hob. XVIII : 6) . As often with Haydn, a Concerto seems less interesting than most of his Symphonies. It doesn't help that it is played in a very formal, Rococo style that seems to stem from the harpsichordist, whose rigid, heavily-registered (and closely recorded) playing negates the advantage of having the « proper » instrument (CHS-1081) .

Swoboda in Mozart inevitably evokes the name of Clara Haskil, whom he accompanied in the Concertos K. 459 and K. 466. In the former, Haskil's unruffled, seemingly laid-back but somehow very « complete » performance needs an Orchestra of like refinement. Swoboda does his best, coaxing light Papageno-like textures from the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra in the 1st movement and assisting the soloist's gentle expressiveness in the 2nd. In K. 466, Haskil offers calm, poised playing in a Concerto which would seem to demand something more, yet, with an inner light that makes it convincing in its own terms. Swoboda goes along with the soloist's view very skilfully and the Orchestra plays better than in K. 459, perhaps because the piece itself was more familiar to them. « Westminster » (LPG 8329) , recorded on 1 September 1950.

Haskil was not the only distinguished soloist to record Mozart with Swoboda. Mozart's Flute Concerto K. 314 gets a lovely performance from Aurèle Nicolet, in which Swoboda and the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra fully share. However, while the flute is well caught, the recording is congested and distorted in tuttis so one is bound to prefer later recordings by this flautist (MMS-87) .

The gem of Swoboda's Mozart Concerto recordings, though, is that of K. 413 with the pianist Artur Balsam, who combines outward calm with inner vivacity and superbly pointed characterization. This is one of the finest performances of a Mozart Piano Concerto I have ever heard. After a slightly bland opening, Swoboda and the « Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra » provide real collaboration, not just backing (CHS-1116) . This team also set-down K. 415, which I have not been able to hear.

On his own, Swoboda gives a vigorous, fiery performance of the brief Symphony No. 23, with a nicely paced central section. There is some poor intonation from the Vienna Symphony Orchestra winds at times and the oboe's recorded tone is a little odd. « Westminster » (LPG-8321) , recorded on 1 December 1949.

Symphony No. 29 gets a lovely performance from the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. Though not lacking in energy, the abiding impression is of an unhurried, old-world graciousness. The recording is incredibly reverberant (MMS-75) .

With the same Orchestra, Swoboda gives a totally different sort of performance of Symphony No. 34. An up-front 1st movement has fiercely jabbed accents and a fairly staccato style, abetted by raucous (as recorded) oboes and trumpets. The 2nd movement has a Gluckian serenity at a quite flowing tempo while the Finale is a knockout : a real presto, finely controlled (no actual rushing) . Overall, this fiercely passionate performance is uncomfortable but extraordinarily stimulating (MMS-65) .

The one common feature between this latter and Symphony No. 35, with the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra, is a sense of great conviction. This is a slowish performance, majestic and stately but well-phrased and rhythmically alive. The leisurely gait illuminates in particular the lead into the recapitulation in the 1st movement. The 2nd movement is lovingly tended (MMS-75) .

The Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra also plays Symphony No. 40. This has well judged tempi, allowing drive in the outer movements but not so speedy as to disallow properly breathed second subjects. The 2nd movement has an attractive, stately flow. By unerringly avoiding the many pitfalls of this Symphony, Swoboda actually came-up with one of the best versions of the early LP era (MMS-65) .

With the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and unnamed soloists, Swoboda gave an unhurried, elegant performance of the Concertone in C. Alas, here caution is in order. The LP copy used by the European Archive uploader has both repeating and skidding grooves-up to the middle of the 1st movement. One can only hope that a better source will emerge for this likeable performance. « Westminster » (LPG 8321) .

The extreme contrast between Swoboda's individual performances of Haydn and Mozart, and, in particular, between the latter's 34th and 35th Symphonies, is fascinating but puzzling. Did his own mood swing from one performance to another ? Or did he have strong views on the different characters of the single Symphonies ? « Werm » shows that he set-down several other Symphonies by both composers, generally from among the lesser-known ones. It would be interesting to hear them.

Beethoven's 3rd Concerto with Haskil and the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra is another Swoboda recording that has remained in the general view. Haskil plays with surprising command where Beethoven forces her to do so, notably in the 1st movement Cadenza and the Coda to the last movement. There are moments in the outer movements where she veers towards the merely agreeable. On the whole, though, she stays the right side of the divide between the understated and the insufficiently stated. The slow movement is certainly inspired. Swoboda backs her very well. The Orchestra is not the world's greatest, but today's hip conscious world may look more favourably on its reduced size than critics did at the time. « Westminster » (WL 5057) .

For the « Musical Masterpieces Society » , Swoboda set-down the 1st recording of Beethoven's Oratorio « Christ on the Mount of Olives » (the 2nd was Hermann Scherchen's for « Westminster ») . Conducting the Vienna Chamber Choir and the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, he gave a well-paced, vital account : the opening orchestral introduction shows him as a Beethovenian of good pedigree. The soloists were all members of the Vienna State Opera. The soprano and tenor, Margit Opawsky and Radko Delorco, perform well, though it can be heard that the bass, Walter Berry, was the one with something extra ; both his tone and his phrasing are that much more focused. The recording becomes distorted under the impact of the final chorus but is otherwise fair for the date (MMS-2024) .

Schubert's 1st Symphony, with the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra, also seems to have been a recording premiere : the 1st edition of « Werm » shows no other version. It has an imposing introduction followed by a lithe, energetic Allegro. The Finale, too, has excellent spin and the Orchestra is on best form. The 2nd movement is mobile and lyrical while the minuet is slow and majestic (MMS-2) .

Schubert's Rondo in A for violin and strings was a slightly odd coupling for Édouard Lalo's Violin Concerto. Miriam Solovieff, of whom more under Lalo, gives the overlong piece a well-turned performance. The Vienna State Opera Orchestra plays (CHS-1143) .

To judge from his performance of the Serenade No. 1, Brahms was not a composer who brought the best out of Swoboda. This is an enthusiastic, rambunctious if messy affair in which the « Concert Hall Symphony Orchestra » appears to have a thin complement of strings. The 1st movement tears away, dropping the pace in 2nd subject territory and the 3rd movement goes at an uncomfortable speed similar to that for which Adrian Boult's late recording has been much criticized. This approach works best in the Finale. The 2nd movement, however, is steady and galumphing, allowing the syncopations to tell. This would be my one motive for returning to the performance. The uploader at the European Archive had a poor copy, with a jumping groove in the 3rd movement and the 5th faded out just before the end, presumably to disguise some intractable problem (CHS-1087) . « Werm » also lists a recording of the 2nd Serenade under Swoboda.

Much more pleasure is to be had from Karl Goldmark's « Rustic Wedding » Symphony, with the Vienna State Opera Orchestra. Surprisingly, this lively, well-turned performance was by no means a 1st recording, Robert Heger having set it down, in 1931, and it had the misfortune to be followed only about a year later by a Classic version under Thomas Beecham (CHS-1138) .

Tchaïkovsky's 3rd Symphony « Polish » already had a number of recordings to its credit, starting with Albert Coates' of 1932, though the 2nd edition of « The Record Guide » , in 1955, lists it, without enthusiasm, as the only one available in the United Kingdom, at that time. The outer movements have good energy levels while lyrical themes are affectionately shaped. The playing, by the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, is pretty scrappy at times, especially in the Finale where Swoboda rightly drives his players regardless of whether they know the notes. Missing is a sense of Symphonic sweep. This is arguably lacking from Tchaïkovsky himself in this early work, but conductors such as Igor Markevich have managed to create an impression that it is present after all. A goodish recording which has served its day (CHS-1139) .

Another fairly rare Tchaïkovsky piece set-down by Swoboda was the « Souvenir de Florence » . Played with the full complement of the Vienna State Opera Orchestra strings, this Sextet original sounds bottom- and middle- heavy, with the upper-strings sometimes unrelated to the rest. The Orchestra's less than immaculate playing is also a drawback. Against this is to be counted the fine passion and real conviction Swoboda brings to the proceedings. « Westminster » (WL 5083) .

Swoboda's Czech birth and studies with Václav Talich would suggest he had a natural authority in Dvořák. He conducted the 1st recordings of the 3rd and 4th (then unnumbered) Symphonies. I have been able to hear only the former.

The glory of Dvořák's 3rd Symphony is its 1st movement. Swoboda does reasonable justice to it. Transitions have some scruffy playing from the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, suggesting this was not much more than sight-reading-plus, but the proper conviction is there. The 2nd movement is admittedly too long for its own good, but Swoboda's fast tempo : 9 min 59 (compared with Václav Neumann's 14 min 43, his analogue cycle ; Václav Smetáček's expansive 16 min 28) sounds merely perfunctory. The music just doesn't breathe. The Finale could be more dashing (Swoboda takes 9 min 15 as against Smetáček's 07 min 34) but it is lively and buoyant and Neumann took a similar view : 9 min 22. The 2nd recording of this Symphony, by Smetáček published in 1961, was certainly preferable, but at least Swoboda left his listeners in no doubt as to the splendours of the 1st movement. « Westminster » (LPG 8332) .

Completing this disc is the « Scherzo Capriccioso » . Here, Swoboda understood perfectly Dvořák's heady brew of impulsive panache and nature poetry ; the central theme is memorably introduced. The hard working Vienna Symphony Orchestra struggle at times and the recording is somewhat dim.

Swoboda seems to have been the 1st to set-down Dvořák's Overture cycle « Amid Nature » , « Carnival » and « Othello » as a sequence, though they had all been set-down singly by both Václav Talich and Rafael Kubelik. They show Swoboda at his finest. The performances breathe the sort of total identification with Dvořák's poetry that we find in old-world Czech Maestros such as Sejna. It is easy to believe here that Swoboda was a pupil of Talich. The Vienna State Opera Orchestra is superior to the Vienna Symphony Orchestra in the « Scherzo Capriccioso » and the recording, apart from compressed dynamic range in Fortes, is reasonable for its age. A Dvořák record to cherish alongside the early « Supraphons » . It was completed by the Nocturne for strings, lovingly unfolded (CHS-1141) .

With the « Winterthur » Symphony Orchestra, Swoboda set-down a relaxed, yet, vital and passionate performance of Dvořák's « Czech Suite » (CHS.1157) .

Another possible recording premiere was of Giuseppe Verdi's « 4 Pezzi Sacri » , recorded with the Vienna Chamber Choir and the Vienna State Opera Orchestra ; the date would have to be checked of the Aachen version under Theodor Bernhard Rehmann which entered « Werm » , at the same time. As most collectors know, Viennese choirs in the early 1950's used a strong vibrato in the female department which doesn't always please English listeners. This is a matter of taste, obviously. Some will find it more « Verdian » than the typical « straight » English choral sound. Granted that this is how they sing, only in a few tough passages are the sopranos momentarily unsteady or below pitch. In general, this is finely nuanced, disciplined singing. Swoboda would appear to have had considerable gifts as a choral conductor. Furthermore, his interpretation has an authentically Verdian mix of devotion, fervour, fire and drama. For as long as things stay under a mezzo-forte, the recording copes well, allowing more detail and a better choral-orchestral balance than one might expect for the date. Above mezzo-forte, the dynamics are clawed-back and distortion reigns. This is obviously most serious in the « Te Deum » which, one dimly realizes, is actually getting a glorious performance. This is a case where whoever holds the original Master tapes (if anyone does) might profitably investigate their quality. The performances themselves must be among the best these works have received (CHS-1136) .

Édouard Lalo's Violin Concerto (not to be confused with the « Symphonie Espagnole ») was a 1st recording and there haven't been all that many since. The soloist, Miriam Solovieff, would deserve an article to herself in this series if we had a few more discs to remember her by. Born in San Francisco, in 1922, she was a family friend of Oscar Shumsky, whose son Eric she taught in Paris in the 1980's. Most of the little information available, in fact, is to be found at Eric Shumsky's site ; he considers her a « great violinist and a superb teacher » . One incredible piece of information he gives us is that, while Miriam was still a child prodigy, her father murdered all her family in front of her. She herself narrowly escaped, after which her father took his own life. Her mother, on her deathbed, pleaded with Miriam to go ahead with her New York debut, planned for the city's Town Hall a few days later. Miriam did this, with great success.

During the 1960's, Solovieff recorded the Brahms Violin Sonatas with Julius Katchen, but suffered some kind of breakdown towards the end of the sessions, which were never completed or issued. Apparently, private copies exist. Katchen later set-down these works with Josef Suk. Apart from the Lalo / Schubert coupling, she can be heard playing the violin solos in Rimsky-Korsakov's « Scheherazade » in the « Vanguard » recording conducted by Mario Rossi.

In the Lalo, Solovieff and Swoboda, conducting the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, caress winningly the lyrical moments of the Concerto, give the dramatic gestures in the 1st movement their full weight and evidently enjoy the Finale. In the 2nd movement, at least, they convince me they've struck gold (CHS-1143) .

Edward MacDowell's 2nd Piano Concerto, issued in 1952, has been claimed as a premiere, though the version by Jesús María Sanromá appeared earlier in the « Werm » listings. The pianist was Alexander Jenner (born in 1929) , an Austrian artist who made quite a few recordings in the 1950's and then concentrated on teaching. Both Jenner and Swoboda, conducting the Vienna State Opera Orchestra, agree to make the work sound as much like proto-Rachmaninov as possible ; it actually predates any of the Rachmaninov Concertos. Slightly later, Vivian Rifkin, with her then husband Dean Dixon conducting, set-down a more lyrical performance, and a little more mercurial in the central Scherzo. Both artists prove their point persuasively (CHS 1137) .

Swoboda's discography extended to a number of middle-of-the-road then-contemporaries. In Paul Hindemith's « The 4 Temperaments » Piano Concerto the soloist was Franz Holletschek. It was coupled with the 4th « Kammermusik » Concerto, in which the violin soloist was Peter Rybar. « The 4 Temperaments » is likeably done ; « Kammermusik » No. 4, surely the more significant work of the 2, is played with strong conviction. Neither performance is immaculate, both offer the sort of unexceptionably musical presentation of a contemporary work that radio stations have been adept at providing down the years (Westminster :WL 5074) .

The Jacques Ibert disc starts disappointingly with a raucous (in the wrong way) and ill-balanced rendition of the « Divertissement » by the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra which substitutes hearty vigour for Gallic wit. The last 2 sections suffer least, but the « gendarme » 's whistle is inaudible. Conductor and Orchestra seem better attuned to the breezy charm of the « Capriccio » , a less ironic work that comes over like an unbuttoned piece of Maurice Ravel. Even the recording seems better here.

Better still is the « Suite Élisabétaine » , recorded in Vienna, on 26 October 1950, with the women's voices from the Vienna Academy Chamber Choir and the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. There is also a soprano solo taken by Emmy Loose. This is a delightful piece, assembled from music Ibert wrote for a production of « A Midsummer Night's Dream

» . It incorporates old English themes, and the Westminster chimes, in a sort of Respighi-meets-René Clair confection. The Viennese forces are not immaculate but they seem to be enjoying themselves (Westminster : WL 5061) .

The major item on the Zoltán Kodály disc is the rousing « Te Deum » . It is given with suitably Slavonic fervour by the « Vienna Choir » and the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. Sieglinde Wagner, Rudolf Christ and Alfred Poell sing well, while on the soprano line Sena Jurinac provides all the luscious soaring tones one might expect. The recording copes up to a point but climaxes often degenerate into inchoate noise, from which only the trumpets stand-out. Jurinac fans who don't know the work are warned that the soprano part only amounts to a few minutes.

This disc is completed by the Theatre Overture. Kodály wrote this, quite unnecessarily most people think, for a later production of Hány János. It is too long and ramshackle in its construction, but the performance is lively and affectionate (Westminster : WL 50-1) . These both seem to be 1st recordings.

In Bohuslav Martinů's Concerto for Double String Orchestra, Piano and Timpani, the rather surprising soloist is Artur Balsam. The « Concert Hall Society Orchestra » give an energetic, gutsy rendering. The recording doesn't give the timpani much of a look-in. There are a couple of brazen tape-edits (Concert Hall : DL-9) .

Other 20th Century composers recorded by Swoboda, but which I haven't been able to hear, include Janáček, quite a lot more Martinů, Milhaud, Prokofief, Roussel and some Americans.

In the Harvard Crimson interview referred to above, Swoboda stated that he had been « a revolutionary all my life - always for the avant-garde » . However, he ridiculed the latest developments from Karlheinz Stockhausen. The picture we get is of a capable musician with wide sympathies and a far from predictable approach to the few works from the regular repertoire that we have from him. The strong differences between his performances of the different Mozart Symphonies, for example, may remind us of Hermann Scherchen. Bearing in mind that the « Westminster » label, of which Swoboda was a founder, ended-up by promoting Scherchen far more than Swoboda himself, we may wonder if this conductor, rather than Swoboda's early teacher Václav Talich, might not have provided Swoboda with a role-model.

« Concert Hall » Society, Inc. , New York, and « Musical Masterpiece » Society

(<http://www.soundfountain.com/concert-hall/concerthall.html>)

As early as 1950, « Concert Hall Society, Inc. » , advertised in Schwann Long-Playing Record Catalog, the new monthly publication for music listeners and record collectors published by William Schwann. Initially, the advertisements were on half pages but, from December 1950 on, these were full-page ads on the 1st page of the catalog. The ads say that « Concert Hall » is located at 250 West 57th Street, New York 19, NY. « Concert Hall » was the record company of 2 brothers, Samuel and David Josefowitz, 2 well-educated people. David studied the violin.

Händel Society

In the June 1952 issue of Schwann Long-Playing Record Catalog, a full-page advertisement of the « Händel Society » appeared instead of the « Concert Hall » ad. The « Händel Society » was located at the same address and was a sister label of « Concert Hall » and was, of course, maintained by the brothers Samuel and David Josefowitz.

The « Händel Society » label had been introduced in the fall of 1951 and, in December of that year, the 1st 2 releases with references HDL-1 and HDL-2 were listed : « Israel in Egypt » and « Acis and Galatea » respectively, conducted by Walter Gøehr and with singers Margareth Ritchie (soprano) , William Herbert (tenor) , Richard Lewis (tenor) , and Trevor Anthony (bass) . Performances of various « Händel Societies » in the United States, Great Britain and the Netherlands were recorded.

Chamber Music Society Licensed by « Concert Hall Society »

In May 1952, a 3rd label was introduced, « Chamber Music Society » (Long-Play True Sound Transcription) . The label was 1st listed in « Schwann » of June 1952. The label stated : « licensed by “ Concert Hall Society ” for Non-commercial Use » . Like the early « Concert Hall Society » pressings, the « Chamber Music Society » disks were pressed on red vinyl. On CM-4 Beethoven's Quintet, Opus 29, is released with the Pascal Quartet and Walter Gerhard (2nd viola) . But a few years later, this same recording was issued on « Concert Hall » CHS 1214 despite the fact that the « Chamber Music Society » label continued to be listed in the record catalogs.

An oddity in the « Chamber Music Society » catalog, I found, is the recording of cellist Janos Starker performing the Sonata for Violoncello and Piano No. 1 in E minor, Opus 38, of Johannes Brahms with, on Side One, Violin Sonata No. 1, Opus 78, performed by Louis Kaufman. Kaufman is accompanied by pianist Helene Pignari. Starker's pianist is Abba Bogin. Both « The Long-Player » and « Schwann Long-Playing Record Catalog » do not mention this record. Janos Starker and Louis Kaufman play Brahms.

A Starker recording with Bogin is 1st mentioned in the Spring of 1954, and that one is released on the « Period » label, reference SPL 593. When Starker started recording for « Period » , either the CMS recording was bought from the « Chamber Music Society » or the Sonata No. 1 was recorded anew.

I still have to check if the recording of the 1st Sonata on « Period » is that of the early « Chamber Music Society » disk. The « Period » recording of the Cello Sonatas of Johannes Brahms were available in Great-Britain on the « Nixa » label (PLP 593) . These same performances were eventually issued by « Everest » , on SDBR 3235 (in electronic simulated stereo) , and on the « Saga » label (XID 5164) .

Janos Starker also appeared on the « Chamber Music Society » 3 LP Set CMS-32, with violinist Agi Jambor and altist Victor Aitay, performing the complete Mozart Trios. Also, this set is never listed as a « Chamber Music Society » recording, but is already available in the Spring of 1951 as « Period » 521/2/3. Could it be that the « Chamber Music Society » borrowed these recordings to press a short-run as a special offer for buyers of « Chamber Music Society » LP's ?

« Shellac » Recordings

« Concert Hall » existed already in the 78 rpm shellac era.

According to « The Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music » (New York, 1948) , the label did not make recordings with Walter Gøehr or the Pascal String Quartet in the early years. Gøehr, then, recorded for « Victor » and « Parlophone » (« Columbia » in the United States) , the Pascal String Quartet for « Odeon » and « Lumen » . The Winterthur Municipal Orchestra could be found on « His Master's Voice » , and the Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra was on « Decca » . Violinist Ricardo Odnoposof appeared on « Columbia » and on « Victor » . Pianist Robert Goldsand recorded for English « Decca » as did pianist Noel Mewton-Wood. On « Decca » K 1038/40 Mewton-Wood plays Carl Maria von Weber's Sonata No. 1 and Chopin's « Tarantella » . On « Decca » K 959 he accompanies violinist Ida Hændel in Beethoven's Sonata for Piano and Violin No. 8 (Opus 30, No. 3) .

1st Editions

The 78 rpm records are not too many as David and Sam Josefowitz had just started their company (mail-order business) and the listings in the « Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music » (1948) are of the 1st year of the business. What is different is that the company will turn-out only 2,000 copies of each album as it presses the records directly from the Master matrix, eliminating the « mother » and « stampers » as was reported by « Time Magazine » , on November 25th, 1946. Furthermore, « Concert Hall » will specialize in un-common, previously un-recorded material. The records can be obtained by subscribing to a series of 12 titles. An advantage of the plastic was of course that shipment was less hazardous if compared to sending shellac discs to subscribers. The great advantage for the brothers Josefowitz was that shellac was a scarcity in those days.

Listings

The recordings are not easily spotted in the « Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music », 1948 edition. These 78 rpm albums have somewhat odd reference numbers indicating a specific series of 12 records. Violinist Daniel Guilet (who played music of Johannes Brahms for « Vox » and later founded the Beaux-Arts Trio) is already contracted by « Concert Hall » in the 78 rpm era. He and his fellow musicians, Jac Gorodetsky (violin) , Frank Brieff (viola) , and Lucien Laporte (cello) , recorded Béla Bartók's String Quartet No. 4, issued with reference « AS » . The Guilet Quartet also played the 4th Quartet of Paul Hindemith on discs with reference « B2 » , and Franz Schubert's « Unfinished » String Quartet No. 10 has reference « AE » . These were all 78 rpm records, of course.

Various Artists

Pianist Rudolf Firkusny apparently left « VOX » to make records for « Concert Hall » before he switched to « Columbia » and to « Capitol » in the LP era. He is the soloist in the Concertino for Piano, Strings and Wind Instruments by Leoš Janáček on 4 x 12 inch discs, reference « B10 » . Shura Cherkassky, who recorded Glinka, Ljadov, Medtner, Prokofiev, Shostakovich, Tchaikovsky and Liszt for the « VOX » label, could now be found on 4 x 12 inch CH-AM performing Piano Concerto No. 2, Opus 44, of Tchaikovsky with Jacques Rachmilovich and the Santa Monica Symphony. This recording was later issued on LP with reference CHC-3. Cherkassky's recording would later be replaced in December 1951 (according to the December 1951 edition of « Long-Playing Record Catalog ») by the recording of Noel Mewton-Wood and Walter Gøehr on CHS 1125. You can listen to a sound-clip of pianist Noel Mewton-Wood and Walter Gøehr performing Tchaikovsky on « The Treasure Trove » .

From Schumann to Schuman

There is also pianist Ray Lev who recorded Johannes Brahms's Sonata No. 1 and 2 Chorale-Prelude, Opus 122, issued on CH-A7. From her hands are also Prokofiev's Children's Pieces (CH-AC) and Schubert's Unfinished Sonata in C major (from 1825) on 4 x 12 inch discs, reference CHC-B3. Russian cellist and Pablo Casals pupil, Raya Garbousova (Garbusova) , had been a « Victor » artist but, now, she recorded for « Concert Hall » . She is the soloist in Samuel Barber's « Capricorn » Concerto with the Saldenberg Little Symphony (reference A4) . She plays Barber's Cello Sonata accompanied by Erich-Igor Kahn (reference B1) , and Claude Debussy's Minuet and Cello Sonata (reference A10) , and Edward Grieg's A minor Sonata (reference AD) , accompanied by pianist Artur Balsam. Like so many recordings from the early years, also Garbousova's recordings were later re-issued on the « Concert Hall » label. Debussy's Cello Sonata landed on the « Chamber Music Society » label. Pianist Paul Loyonnet accompanies flutist René le Roy who blows Franz-Josef Haydn's Sonata in G major on 4 x 12 inch discs, reference B8. Loyonnet also recorded Robert Schumann's « Humoreske » , Opus 20, issued on 3 x 12 inch discs, reference A1, and François Couperin's « Suite du 6e Ordre » , reference B14. Symphony for Strings by American composer William Schuman is recorded by the « Concert Hall » Symphony Orchestra (whatever collection of musicians that may have been) conducted by Edgar Schenkman on 4 x 12 inch discs, reference AL1. Schuman's String Quartet No. 3 is played by the Gordon String Quartet (led by violinist Jacques Gordon) on reference AB.

78 rpm Vinyl Records

While 78 rpm records generally were pressed on black shellac, the disks on the newly-founded « Concert Hall » label were pressed on vinyl. Samuel Josefowitz recalls in an interesting article, written by Michelle Owens and published in « Rensselaer Magazine », that his father was offered a load of plastic at a very low-price. That triggered the idea to make and distribute records.

In hindsight, the plastic they acquired was a gift. While other record manufacturers struggled with the scarcity of shellac and started using a mix of shellac and plastic to cut the price of manufacturing, as Don Gabor of « Remington Records » did for the records pressed in the pressing plant of his Record Corporation of New England, the Josefowitz brothers were extremely lucky. Some records were pressed on black vinyl and others on red vinyl. No doubt that the red colour was chosen for publicity reasons so the « Concert Hall » disks could easily be distinguished and could help improve sales. Yet, Samuel says in the article :

« For the 1st 2 years it was a hobby. We didn't make any money. Then, with the arrival of the long-playing record, our business took-off. »

Know-How

An asset in this respect was the knowledge of David Josefowitz. He had not only studied the violin in Berlin (Europe) but, after he had come to live in the United States, he studied chemistry and chemical engineering at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (MIT) and, later, at the Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute. And Samuel had received a degree from « Rensselaer » in industrial engineering.

The Long-Playing Record

After the introduction of the Long-Playing record, « Concert Hall » switched to the new medium and expanded the catalog with many recordings made in Europe as so many American record companies did in those days. Vienna, Zürich, Winterthur, and Hilversum became the recording venues where various Orchestras and groups of musicians were hired : Vienna State Opera Orchestra, Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra, Winterthur Symphony Orchestra, Utrecht Symphony and Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra and, on occasion, Haarlem Symphony Orchestra (« Haarlemse Orkest Vereniging ») . The fact that these records are being listed in the editions of « Schwann Long-Playing Record Catalog » suggests that they were available in shops and, therefore, they were reviewed in « High-Fidelity Magazine » .

Livia Rev plays Schumann « Kreisleriana » on « Concert Hall Society » records. Principal conductors were Otto Ackermann, Victor Desarzens, Henry Swoboda, Carl Bamberger and, foremost, Walter Gøehr. There were several conductors of Dutch origin like Henk Spruit and Paul Hupperts.

Performances

The one conductor that was hired only for recording the Cello Concerto of Edouard Lalo with cellist Bernard Michelin was Toon Verhey (Verheij) who, himself, had studied the cello and played in various Orchestras before he became principle conductor of the Residency Orchestra (The Hague) and, later, of « De Haarlemse Orkest Vereniging » , renamed « Provinciaal Orkest » , in 1952. Conductor Toon Verhey yet cover and label of CHS 1162 mention Haarlem Symphony Orchestra.

The hiring of Verhey and his Orchestra was probably for reasons of convenience. On that same disc, Michelin plays « Élégie » by Gabriel Fauré with the Utrecht Symphony Orchestra conducted by Paul Hupperts.

The name Ignaz Neumark is not a mystery name as is sometimes thought. Also Neumark appeared only once on « Concert Hall » , conducting Symphony No. 9, « The Great » of Franz Schubert. He was originally from Poland but also lived in the Netherlands, in Hilversum to be more precise, next door (so to speak) to the Tesselschade Church and the church of the Reformed Apostolic Congregation, the churches where many recordings were taped.

And pianist Ray Lev continued to record. Existing 78 rpm recordings of Artur Balsam and others were dubbed to LP and new performances were taped.

The « Carnival of Animals » of Camille Saint-Saëns performed by Jean Antonietti and Isja Rossican, the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Walter Gøehr, coupled with the Piano Concerto No. 3 played by Pina Pozzi and the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra, Victor Desarzens conducting (CHS 1178) .

Releases and covers came in a variety of styles and designs. Cover of the American « Release No. CHS-61 » with Fritz Busch conducting the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra in Symphony No. 5 in B-flat major of Franz Schubert, and Scherzo in G minor, Opus 20, of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. This cover is similar to the M-series with the same oval « Concert Hall Society » emblem printed in orange.

« Concert Hall » in Great Britain

Editions of « The Gramophone Long-Paying Classical Record Catalogue » show that (as early as 1952) « Concert Hall Society » issues were released in England on the « Nixa » label by the company that also dealt with « Vanguard » recordings. The prefix for 12 inch records was « CLP » , a prefix later used by « HMV » . « Nixa » stopped pressing « Concert Hall » records in the 2nd half of the 1950's, probably around 1956. From then on, « Concert Hall » was registered as a label. The « Concert Hall » editions differed in style from the U.S. issues. Label of a relatively late issue, reference CM-LE-16, with works by Ernst Bloch (4 Episodes for Chamber Orchestra) ; Arnold Schönberg (« Begleitmusik ») ; Alban Berg (7 Early Songs and 4 Pieces for Clarinet and Piano) performed by conductors Thomas Scherman, Charles Frederick Adler, Walter Gøehr, soprano Kathryn Harvey, clarinetist Herbert Tichman, and pianist Ruth Budnevich. The 7 Early Songs and 4 Pieces had earlier been issued in the United States on release C-12. CM-LE-16 contained a program of relatively modern music. The liner-notes were written by composer Nicholas Maw. The cover indicated : « A 1st edition of 3,000 copies » and « This record bears the number 1953 » .

« Concert Hall » in The Netherlands

The recordings were also licensed to 1 or 2 record companies abroad. Many « Concert Hall » recordings appeared in France on the « Classic » label and the available records were listed in the French catalog « Disques de longue-durée », published in the fall of 1955. Ready pressed records were exported to small foreign markets like the Netherlands. On the ochre colour Dutch cover of CHS 10, with pianist Noel Mewton-Wood playing Beethoven's Piano Concerto No. 4 together with Walter Gøehr conducting the Utrecht Symphony Orchestra, the following New York address is printed : 250 West 57th Street. This means that this Dutch issue is from before 1953, before « Concert Hall » moved to 507 West 56th Street. Name and address of the importer for the Netherlands is printed underneath the « Concert Hall » address in the United States. The importer was M. Stibbe & Co. , Amstel 222, Amsterdam-C, Telephone : K 20-41260.

Note for Dutch readers : K meant « kengetal » or numerical code. So, K 20 was Amsterdam (which is 020, today) .

At age 19, Wim van Es, who is originally from Amsterdam, 1st started working for a jazz store named « Discotone », in Amsterdam. In 1956, he was employed by the company of Mister Stibbe. He remembers :

« Then, « Concert Hall » was no longer represented by Stibbe & Co. The labels he imported were “ Erato ”, “ Cetra ”, “ Odeon ”, “ Parlophone ”, “ Discophiles français ”, “ Metronome ”, “ Prestige ” and “ Savoy ”. In 1956, when I joined the company, “ Concert Hall ” had disappeared from the list. »

Enter « Musical Masterpiece Society »

In 1951 and 1952, when David and Sam Josefowitz launched their « Händel Society » and « Chamber Music Society » labels, they had the brilliant idea to start the « MMS » subscription label in the United States. Potential clients were lured into buying a sampler-disc at an affordable introductory price, or were offered a selection of records at $ 1 a piece or even just $ 1.

In the early advertisements, the series is named « Musical Masterworks Society » . Like Don Gabor with his « Masterworks » label, obviously also the Josefowitz brothers were told by « Columbia » that the word « Masterwork » could not be used in the name. « Masterworks » had been in use by « Columbia » already, since the 1930's. Gabor changed « Masterworks » into « Masterseal » . The Josefowitz brothers change « Masterworks » into « Masterpiece » and the undertaking is, then, called : « Musical Masterpiece Society » .

The success of « MMS » makes it necessary to find larger offices. Maintaining a series with a growing number of subscribers asks for more administrative office-work and also for manual labour. And, eventually, more space for storing records was needed. The move is effectuated 1 year later, in the spring of 1953. The new address is : 507 West 56th Street. The growth of the company leads to another move 2 years later. Then, the offices are re-located to a building at 45 Columbus Avenue. In 1957, the address did change again. Now, it was : 71, 5th Avenue.

Cover of the recording of the Piano Concerto No. 1 and « Variations sérieuses » of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy performed by Frank Pelleg and Walter Gøehr conducting the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra, on CHS 1127. As a « Concert Hall Society » recording, it was removed from the catalog in 1953 so it could re-appear later on the new label.

New Idea

Starting a subscription series in 1952 was not so much a new idea. Record Clubs and subscription series had existed all along and had been selling esoteric record subscription series material (as « Concert Hall » did) , or children's records, « Billboard Magazine » explained. But the idea of selling the standard repertory was quite new and it inspired many an American entrepreneur to start a record club : « Greystone Press » , « Book of the Month Club » , « Music Treasures of the World » , « World Record Club » , and various other series which had a longer or shorter life, came into existence. Even « Columbia » had a Record Club. A « Musical Masterpiece Society » advertisement from 1954 offering 8 « Masterpieces » for $ 1. The ad reads :

« Send Coupon at Once, and the buyer will receive the “ Masterpieces ” on record and a brochure, “ Music in Your Home ”, written by famous critic and musicologist Olin Downes. »

The address 43 West 61st Street, is obviously the warehouse from where the discs are being shipped.

« Music Treasures of the World »

Release of « Music Treasures of the World » :

Piotr Ilitch Tchaikovsky (Overture 1812) and Alexander Borodin (Symphony No. 2) performed by the Leipzig Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Gert Pflüger, on MT 551-44, Variable Pitch.

Edward Grieg's Piano Concerto, Opus 16, played by Margaret Mitchell and the « Music Treasures » Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra conducted by William Strickland, coupled with « la Mer » of Claude Debussy, conducted by Ernest Borsansky, on MT 30, Variable Pitch.

Margaret Mitchell also performed Sergei Rachmaninoff's Concerto No. 2, Opus 18, on MT 26, with William Strickland, coupled with Georges Enesco's « Romanian Rhapsody » No. 1 conducted by Hans Swarowsky.

« MMS » Goes Europe

An article in « Billboard Magazine » of March 26, 1955, says that :

« “ Concert Hall ” with its “ Musical Masterpiece Society ”, “ Opera Society ” and “ Jazztone ” is operating in virtually all European countries : Holland, France, Germany, Italy. The biggest operation is in West Germany. There most of the records are pressed. »

« Concert Hall » claims a membership stateside of 300,000 and a European membership of 250,000.

The article suggests that « Musical Masterpiece Society » was set-up in Europe in 1954 which is substantiated by the « MMS » listings in « Discopedie 1955 » compiled by Dutch journalist and reviewer Ralph N. Degens who gave the year of release of many recordings. The 1955 catalog contains several « MMS » recordings released in 1954, yet, « Concert Hall Society » recordings were still listed in this 1st edition of « Discopedie ». However, in the 1956 supplementary edition, no « Concert Hall » discs were listed and, obviously, they were no longer available. The « Jazztone » label followed the same marketing technique.

« Concert Hall » in Germany

The « Jazztone » label, as such, existed until 1960 (in any case, in Europe) according to Gerhard Klussmeier from Germany who researched the register of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Frankfurt. Gerhard Klussmeier sent me an advertisement from the late-1950's offering a sample record with 6 important works for free : « So you can discover the true magic of High-Fidelity » (« Damit Sie den wahren Zauber der High-Fidelity entdecken können ») . The subscription label is still named « Concert Hall » (misspelled in the body-text as « Concert Hall ») and, on top of that, the ad pictured the « MMS » label !

« Guilde internationale »

The name « Musical Masterpiece Society » could easily be used in many countries, except in France, for the French are very culture conscious, and still are, even if they like speaking « franglais », today. If « MMS » would be translated into French, it would be called « La Société musicale du chef-d'œuvre », or something similar. That sounds rather haughty and is not very much inviting to join the Club. However, the word « Club » could not be used as, in France, there existed : « le Club français du disque » and « Club national du disque » (CND) . So, a brilliant, yet, somewhat similar label name was thought-up and, in France, the « MMS » recordings were released on « Guilde internationale du disque », a name which had a nice flavour that suggested importance and quality. The license agreement with the « Classic » label was terminated. Yet, the original « Concert Hall » recordings released on the « Classic » label were still listed in the French catalog, « Disques de longue-durée », issued in the fall of 1955.

Success

In France, the establishment of the subscription series started already in 1954, according to Jean-Pierre Mathieu from Paris who grew-up with the records bought by his parents and the gramophone offered by the « Guilde internationale du disque » which they acquired in 1958. The French subsidiary was opened in 1954. The records could also be bought directly in shops. Every important city had one or more « Guilde du disque » shops. The most famous shop in Paris was at 222, « rue de Rivoli, Paris 8e ». The success of « la Guilde Internationale du disque » resulted in 1967, in opening a huge center at Evreux, in Normandy. The Paris address was still operating in the early 1980's and, in 1986, « la Guilde » merged with « Édition Atlas » , Mathieu told.

The success of « la Guilde internationale du disque » was immense and may have inspired other entrepreneurs to start, around 1958, « la Guilde européenne du microsillon » which issued popular and Classical music as well, and lasted until the mid- 1960's. It is not sure if « la Guilde européenne du microsillon » found its origin in « les Mélomanes français » which had pianist Serge Petitgirard on their rostrum.

« Club Internacional del Disco »

The enterprise also landed in Spain where, on the 5th floor of the building at Calle Alcalá No. 45, in Madrid, « Club Internacional del Disco (España) » held office. The Spanish label did not have much in common with the « Concert Hall » and the « Musical Masterpiece Society » label design. It looked as if somewhat inspired by « RCA » 's French label design.

Box of Beethoven's 1st Symphony, 5th Symphony and 9th Symphony (« Novena Sinfonia con Coro ») with Walter Gøehr conducting « Coros y Orquesta Filharmónica Néerlandesa » and singers Corry Bijster, Elisabeth Pritchard, David Garen, and Leonard Wolovsky. The records were pressed by « Iberofon S.A. » .

10 Inch Records

The « MMS » discs had the small 10 inch format and they were extremely thin if compared to the heavy 12 inch « Concert Hall » pressings. So, the « MMS » discs were cheaper to manufacture as less plastic was involved. For the covers, a standard layout was designed. Only the names of the composers, the titles, and the performers had to be printed on this « generic » sleeve. Thus, another vast saving was made as no additional well-chosen artwork had to be commissioned (as illustrated by the « Concert Hall » cover of CHS 1155 with « El Cid » of Jules Massenet and « Tzar Sultan Suite » of Rimsky-Korsakov conducted by Henk Spruit ; and the Saint-Saëns program, on CHS 1178) . Furthermore, it was decided that no full colour printing was necessary as music-lovers did not have to be persuaded through artistic covers to buy this or that recording. The low-price of the product and the convenience of receiving the discs in the mail were the main incentives.

Strategies

Starting the « Händel Society » label, in 1951, was probably inspired by the existence of the « Haydn Society » from Boston. The « Händel Society » was not a strict American affair in that respect that only a few recordings were made with conductors Robert Hull and Maurice Abravanel. « Judas Maccabaeus » with Maurice Abravanel conducting the Utah University Chorus and Orchestra was issued on « Händel » HDL-12. This recording was released in France on the « Classic » label and, in 1955, in the Netherlands on « Concert Hall » HDL 12. « Alexander's Feast » was recorded with Professor Robert Hull conducting the Cornell University Chorus and the « Händel Society » Orchestra. This issue was also released in France on the « Classic » label. Harpsichordist Frank Pelleg performed the Händel Concertos for harpsichord on the label. Pelleg was accompanied by Walter Gœhr conducting the Orchestra of Radio Zürich.

The « Händel » label did not flourish, probably because all the energy went into the main activities of the « MMS » subscription series. And, of course, the number of specific collectors who would consult a list of Händel's music was too small, no doubt, to keep the label economically alive. As a result, in « Schwann Long-Playing Record Catalog » of June 1957, the « Händel Society » listings were marked with a small diamond which meant that the recordings were (as the catalog stated in the legend) « to be discontinued by manufacturer as soon as supply is gone ; will be dropped from future issues of this catalog » .

Forgotten Recordings and Unknown Artists

Not only all « Händel Society » recordings were deleted from « Schwann » , but also a number of « Concert Hall » disks. At the same time, new recordings were listed, like CHS 1501 with pianist Philippe Entremont and conductor Carl Bamberger performing the « Symphonic Variations » of César Franck and the Piano Concerto No. 2 of Sergei Rachmaninoff with the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra. This one and other new recordings were also listed in the small catalog accompanying the 12 inch sampler from 1957. Such a sampler for the American market was quite a luxurious item if compared to the light weight and flimsy Dutch sampler with music of Bach, Vivaldi, Beethoven, Mozart, Chopin, and Berlioz. A thin 10 inch disc was already much more than the usual 7 inch disc named « Klassiek Kompas » with Szymon Goldberg conducting the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra in Mozart's « Eine Kleine Nachtmusik » used by « Philips » for promotional purposes.

Several American « Concert Hall » disks were re-issued later on the « MMS » label, like the Beethoven Quartets and those of Mozart performed by the Pascal String Quartet.

Also a series of recordings originating from Russia with David Oistrakh, Emil Gilels, Leonid Kogan, Sviatoslav Richter, Kyrill Kondrashin, Alexander Gauk, Samuil Samosud were deleted ; now, they were available on the French « Chant du Monde » label. When checking the deletions in « Schwann » June 1957 edition, many familiar names and recordings came-up.

Sale of « Concert Hall » to Crowell-Collier

Susan Nelson wrote to me that she had done research on the subject and had found that the « Concert Hall » catalog was sold to Crowell-Collier Publishing Company according to « Billboard Magazine » and « The New York Times » . She writes that, in July, 1956, « Concert Hall Society » and its various American off-shoots were purchased by the Crowell-Collier Publishing Company (publisher of Collier's and many other magazines as well as Collier's Encyclopedia) which had its own record club division. The following year, New York's « Record Hunter » advertised « Concert Hall Society » recordings at a reduced price ($ 1.97) noting :

« These 12 inch singles and albums have been discontinued by the manufacturer, and may never again be available from the manufacturer at any price. » (« The New York Times » , 24 February 1957 ; page 119.)

Pre-recorded Tapes

The sale to Crowell-Collier was also mentioned in « High-Fidelity Magazine » of September 1956, on page 51. « Billboard Magazine » had already reported on the deal in their August 4, 1956, issue where it was stated that :

« Crowell Collier purchased the American record interests of the Josefowitz familie. These included the “ Concert Hall Society ” label and 5 mail-order record club operations : “ Musical Masterpieces Society ”, “ Opera Society ”, “ Jazztone Society ”, “ Chamber Music Society ” and “ Händel Society ”. The deal involved an amount of 7 figures. »

It also included an immediate entry in the pre-recorded tape business which had already been planned by the brothers. After Collier will release 12 tapes immediately, 6 new tapes will be issued each month. This deal only effected the American market. In Canada, the brothers continued as usual and they will continue to be involved in the business in Europe. There, the Josefowitz brothers do not run the business directly but own a substantial number of shares. They also will be involved in the American Crowell Collier enterprise as advisors.

In « High-Fidelity Magazine » of September 1956, Roland Gelatt wrote on his « Music-Makers » page about the sale of the « Concert Hall » label and added that « Concert Hall » 's chief fall program centered on its new series of binaural tape recordings. As several « Concert Hall » recordings appeared on the « Musical Masterpiece Society » 's label, it is clear that not all tapes and plates were sold to Crowell-Collier. An example is the Mendelssohn-Pelleg recording. The sale may have prompted the editors of « Schwann Record Catalog » to stop listing the label, while the competitor « The Long-Player » continued listing « Concert Hall » in the 1959 editions of their catalogs.

Reviews in Record Magazines

Early on, a number of « MMS » disks was reviewed, at least in the Netherlands. An example was Paul Tortelier's recording of Antonín Dvořák's Cello Concerto, on MMS 13. The reviewer complained about the technical aspects of the recording (bad microphone placement and « hard » sound) but, in the end, he praised Tortelier for his playing. When it was clear that the records could only be obtained through membership of the club, the « MMS » disks were no longer listed in record catalogs and magazines. One exception is that they were listed in « Discopedie » but this was a publication by a Dutch reviewer, but not an official catalog issued on a regular basis.

Dutch record monthly « Luister ! » refused to review the « MMS » releases when they were only available to members of the « Klassieke Luisterkring » (Classical Listening Circle) which issued a monthly magazine « De Kring » which was, in fact, a small 8 page booklet. It listed the records on offer accompanied by « reviews » written by the « MMS » sales department. If the records would have been positively reviewed in magazines, it would have been mere advertising for « MMS » by urging the reader to subscribe to the club. That would give « MMS » an advantage over regular record labels.

Selection

Every month, a list of records was sent to each and every member of the club who could chose the recordings they were interested in. Then, these records were sent to the member's home and, even then, members were allowed to return some or even all of the records offered. Only if over a longer period of time no records had been bought, « MMS » would cancel a membership.

The « Opera Society »

« Opera Society » was another label issuing the existing Opera catalog and adding new recordings. It is remarkable and amazing that so many standard repertory Operas were performed in front of the « MMS » microphones. Of course, some performances (like the earlier Russian recordings) were remastered from tapes made available by other record companies or were obtained from radio broadcast corporations. But, most of the time, they were performed by the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra renamed for the occasion « The Opera Society Orchestra » .

The 2 x 10 inch LP gatefold (reference M141-OP24, « Guilde internationale du disque » SMS 141) of Giacomo Puccini's « la Bohème » from 1955. Singers were Marilyn Tyler (soprano) , David Garen (tenor) , Leonardo Wolovsky (bass) , Corry Bijster (soprano) , Paolo Gorin (baritone) , Gerard Holthaus (baritone) , and Henk Angenent (bass) . Conductor was Carl Bamberger. Bamberger also led the « Nord Deutsche » Symphony Orchestra and Radio Chorus in Beethoven's « Fidelio » with Gladys Kuchta, Julius Patzak, Heinz Rehfuss and Melita Muszely, on MMS 2120.

Familiar and unfamiliar voices could be found on the « Opera Society » and « MMS » releases : Annie Delorie, Heinz Refuss, Julius Patzak, Maria Stader, Ernst Hæfliger, Uta Graf, Hedda Heusser, Mathias Schmid, Anneke van der Graf, Siemen Jongma, Albert Kunz, Cora Canne Meyer, Rudolf Gonszar, Karl Liebl, Broc Peters, Margaret Tynes.

One of the designers of the covers for « MMS » and the « Opera Society » was Curt John Witt, who also designed for the « Allegro-Royale » issues and for Don Gabor's « Remington » and « Plymouth » labels.

Performances of famous artists and conductors, who generally recorded for quality labels, appeared on « MMS » . Either recordings were made by « MMS » , or they were bought from radio stations or from other labels. The result was that recordings of conductors Antal Dorati (Minneapolis Orchestra) , Paul Paray (Detroit Symphony Orchestra) and Carl Schuricht, pianist Vasso Devetzi, and cellist Pierre Fournier (accompanied by Dorel Handman) , appeared on the label.

Sound Quality and Number of Pressings

In early advertisements, « Concert Hall Society » promised that :

« This recording was issued in a Limited Edition of only 3,000 copies, of which this is number ... »

No more than 3,000 copies will be pressed of a specific record. They obviously mean that, for every new batch of 3,000 records, a new plate will be used. The statement suggests that other manufacturers press more than 3,000 records using the same plate. There are, of course, companies that did so. « Remington Records » is an example. But the technicians and production managers of companies that produce quality records of Classical music know that, in principle, no more than 1,500 or 2,000 records, at the most, should be pressed using the same plate. Quality control is the only way to determine if a plate can be used for another few 100 records. The rule is if more records are pressed, the matrix will get dull and the records will sound adequately. It is possible to compensate for the loss of high-frequencies and detail by applying equalization, by boosting the high-frequency content and cut a disc with restricted dynamics resulting in a lean bass. In that way, more music can be engraved per side and the high-frequencies will be more prominent. Choosing a vinyl compound with a specific hardness can also give the suggestion of high-fidelity when played on simple gramophones. The measures taken are audible in the final product. Most certainly, in the records of « Musical Masterpiece Society » with its 450,000 members world-wide.

Amplifier Tone Controls

Already in the early « Concert Hall » LP days, when the discs were listed in catalogs and were reviewed in magazines, the music-critics had much to say about the quality of the recorded sound, the Orchestras and the final product spinning on their turntables. Sometimes, the quality of the work of the recording technician, the pressings and the quality of the playing of musicians were confounded. But, in general, most knew well what they were writing about and were not always pleased with the « Concert Hall » discs. However, in those days, amplifiers had tone controls for bass and treble which often had to be used generously. An example : when reviewing the « Orchestral Suites » of Tchaikovsky, well directed by Walter Gøehr, « High-Fidelity Magazine » 's J. F. Indcox wrote :

« “ Concert Hall's ” sound is rather undernourished, lacking in resonance, and the balance is not always ideal. »

Praise

Walter Gøehr conducted Suites Nos. 1 (CHS 1121) and 2 (CHS 1122) with the Winterthur Symphony. There existed already a « Westminster » recording of Suite No. 3, therefore, the Winterthur Symphony Orchestra was renamed « Concert Hall » Symphony Orchestra for the 3rd Suite, on CHS 1144. While the reviewer's description applied to the recordings of the Suites, the same quality could be encountered on several other « Concert Hall » discs with Symphonic music and Concertos. Chamber music recordings often favour a better sound. In « High-Fidelity Magazine » of December 1957, Harold C. Schonberg wrote about Robert Schumann's Piano Quintet, on MMS 41 :

« On a much cheaper 10 inch disc, Hannes Kann and the Pascal Quartet offer a well-recorded, spirited performance that is without eccentricity. I would put this in a best-buy category. »

Exit « MMS »

From 1956 on, the « Concert Hall » label is no longer available in Europe.

In the Netherlands (in the 1950's) , the offices of « MMS » (« Muzikale Meesterwerken Serie » N.V.) are 1st located at Herengracht 536, Amsterdam, but 1 year later, at Paulus Potterstraat 12, Amsterdam. For the convenience of the subscribers and for promoting the sales, there were 4 shops where one could register for membership and where members could buy records. In Amsterdam, of course, at the aforementioned address ; in Rotterdam, at Westblaak 26 ; in The Hague, at Torenstraat 136 ; and, in Utrecht, at Zadelstraat 17, to be precise.

When, in September 1958, the stereo record was introduced more record companies and record clubs found it too much of an investment to set-up a catalog with stereo recordings on short notice. One of them was « MMS » .

In the summer of 1959, the « Concert Hall Society » label was also deleted from « The Long-Player » , the competitor of « Schwann » . The label name will reappear much later, in the 1970's, presenting the « Synchro Stereo » issues.

David Josefowitz can also be found on « Synchro Stereo » disc SMS-2744. He conducts the Monte Carlo National Orchestra in works by Modest Mussorgsky (« Pictures From An Exhibition ») and Michæl Glinka (Overtures to « A Life For The Czar » and « Russlan and Ludmilla ») .

Japanese release of « Concert Hall Society » record

Japanese « Concert Hall Society » releases Franz Liszt's « Hungarian Rhapsodies » conducted by Hans Swarowsky.

Naturally, « MMS » and « Concert Hall Society » records were also available in Israel. Offices were located at 63, Ibn Gvirol Street, Tel-Aviv.

Label of the German issue with Mendelssohn's Symphony No. 4, conducted by Sir John Barbirolli ; and Symphony No. 1 played by « l'Orchestre du Théâtre national de l'Opéra de Paris » , conducted by David Josefowitz.

The original German liner notes say :

« David Josefowitz, who conducts the captivating First Symphony of Mendelssohn, is not just a gifted violinist but also a conductor whose great musicality, feeling for refined sound, and firm sense of style, result in a remarkably tangible rendering of this youth composition. His many faceted work also extends to the field of sound research: many outstanding records, which found recognition with the international critics, originated under his musical and technical directorship. »

By the end of the 1960's, when stereo discs were marketed, in France, la « Guilde internationale du disque » made available to its members a complete stereo-set consisting of turntable, amplifier and 2 loudspeaker enclosures for an initial payment of FF 298, plus 11 installments of FF 100. The advertisement gave the details. The player had 4 speeds, the amplifier delivered 24 watt per channel, and each loudspeaker was equipped with a 20 cm (8 inch) low-mid unit plus a 11 cm (4.3 inch) tweeter.

In order to recruit new members and to intensify the link with existing subscribers, the company offered gramophone record players (turntables with built-in amplification) , all at an affordable prices.

Binaural Stacked Reel To Reel Tapes

From September 1956 on, « High-Fidelity Magazine » started publishing reviews of pre-recorded reel to reel tapes. In that section, « Concert Hall » tapes (now issued by Crowel Collier) are also mentioned and often get positive reviews in case the sound quality is good and/or the performance is noteworthy. An example, in the issue of July 1957, the Symphony No. 2 of Johannes Brahms in the performance of the Frankfurt Opera Orchestra conducted by Carl Bamberger, receives praise and is more or less preferred over the « RCA » Charles Munch recording. The Frankfurt Orchestra is less accurate, but Bamberger's performance is more individual, provocative, and dramatic. The « Concert Hall » recording gives « a boldly sculptured delineation » , as the reviewer writes. Philippe Entremont's recording of the Piano Concerto No. 2 is another release on tape. It was recorded before Entremont joint « CBS » (« Columbia ») . There were other issues on tape. A few will be added later.

Binaural (stereophonic) « Concert Hall » edition of the Piano Concerto No. 2 of Franz Liszt performed by Philippe Entremont and the Radio Zürich Orchestra conducted by Walter Gøehr, reference CHT/BN-6.

Binaural means that, from 1957 on (or even earlier) , recordings were made in stereo which also explains the appearance of many an old recording as a « Synchro Stereo » issue, in later years. « Synchro Stereo » meant in fact « Stereo Compatible » , the denomination used by the regular record labels and, in several cases, it meant electronically enhanced to recreate stereo.

Cover of the « Synchro Stereo » LP release of Bernard Greenhouse's performance of the Cello Concerto of Antonín Dvořák with Hans Swarowsky conducting, on SMS-2322. His fellow member of the Guilet Trio and Beaux-Arts Trio, pianist Menahem Pressler, made various recordings for the label of Sam and David Josefowitz, well before the Trio started recording for « Phonogram » (as the « Philips » record company was then named) . One of the 1st « Philips » recordings was the disk with the Complete (2) Trios of Felix Mendelssohn, still with Daniel Guilet, on 802 802 LY (1967) .

In 2011, I asked Maestro Pressler about the « Concert Hall Society » label and if he knew Davis and Samuel Josefowitz. He replied :

« Knew ? I know them ! »

He also told me that, in the early years the Trio, of which he was the pianist of course, recorded a Mendelssohn Trio and Dvořák's « Dumky » Trio for the « Concert Hall » label. I asked him :

« That was the Guilet Trio ?

He said :

« Yes, with Daniel Guilet, he came from the Calvet Quartet, you know, and with Bernard Greenhouse. It was quite a hectic, 3 hour session. But, afterwards, we received a “ Grand Prix du Disque ” for these performances ! »

Apparently, the execution had the right drive and intensity. If they only knew ...

Pressler also told me that he recorded Frederic Chopin's Concerto No. 1 with David Josefowitz conducting. That too was a hectic affair. David conducted at a rather high-tempo which Menahem Pressler did not like too much. He added as a sort of mitigating circumstance :

« He is very fond of the Concerto, you know. »

The disc also contains the « Andante spianato et Grande polonaise » , on SMS 2408.

When researching data and material, I had come across another « Concert Hall » release of Menahem Pressler playing the Piano Concerto in A, Opus 16, by Edward Grieg, with Jean-Marie Auberson conducting the Vienna Festival Orchestra (coupled with the « Holberg Suite » played by the Ramat-Gan Chamber Orchestra conducted by Eliahu Inbal) .

Light Music Series

On an early « MMS » Light-Music Series release with green label and reference POP-8, violinist Ricardo Odnoposoff plays Fritz Kreisler « Favourites » , accompanied by pianist Jean Antonietti.

The Most Beautiful Music of All Time

Inspired by the LP boxed-sets of the « Reader's Digest » and « RCA » , the « Concert Hall » record label compiled their earlier released recordings and bought existing recordings from other labels to be issued together in thick and heavy albums. Dutch editions were :

« De wereld van de opera » (The World of the Opera, pressed in Germany and issued there as « Zauberwelt der Oper ») .

« De mooiste muziek van alle tijden » (The Most Beautiful Music of All Time, pressed in France by « EMI ») . The booklet of the latter edition contained several pictures of artists.

For French subscribers, « la Guilde internationale du disque » produced special historical documentaries.

Linen album containing a book and 3 x 12 inch LPs of « la Révolution française » (the French Revolution) , reference M-2262. Actors read the commentary. André Charlin, the recording engineer, who is famous for his use of electro-static microphones, made the sound recordings of musical excerpts and pieces by Bécourt, Berlioz, Cambini, Catel, Cherubini, Dalayrac, Gaveaux, Gébauer, Gossec, Gély, Lesueur, Mehul, and music by a number of anonymous composers. « La Révolution française » received a « Grand Prix - Académie du disque français » .

Other releases were about World War I (« la Grande Guerre ») , on M 2344 ; « Napoléon Bonaparte » , on M-2265 ; « the Century of Louis XIV » (« le Siècle de Louis XIV ») . It is reported that no more than 5,000 copies of each of these editions were made. They were probably also bought by schools.

What happened to the « Concert Hall Society » label in the end ? Jean-Pierre Mathieu wrote :

« In France, “ la Guilde Internationale du disque ” was sold to “ Éditions Atlas ” , in 1987-1988, who belong currently to the Italian Group, Agostini. From time to time, they re-issue some recordings on CD. »

Does this mean that, also, original « Concert Hall » recordings are owned by Agostini ? That needs further investigation.

For several recordings the Radio Philharmonic Orchestra of the Dutch Broadcasting Union (NRU) was renamed Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra. This was Paul van Kempen's ensemble.

And, from 1955 on, Bernard Haitink was principal conductor.

Fritz Rieger

Le chef d'orchestre allemand « Fritz » (Friedrich Edmund) Rieger est né le 28 juin 1910 à Oberaltstadt (Riesengebirge) , dans le massif de Karkonosze en Bohême (Empire austro-hongrois) ; et mort le 30 septembre 1978 à Bonn, en Allemagne.

Rieger étudie au Conservatoire de Prague avec Fidelio Friedrich Finke et George Szell. Il devient ensuite Maître de Chapelle au Théâtre allemand de Prague, puis dirige dans les maisons d'Opéras de Außig et de Brême. En 1947, il est nommé chef de l'Orchestre du Théâtre de Mannheim.

En 1949, il obtient la direction du prestigieux Orchestre philharmonique de Munich à la suite de Felix von Weingartner, Oswald Kabasta et Hans Rosbaud notamment. Pendant plus de 15 ans, il accueille les plus grands interprètes à Munich, tels le violoniste David Oïstrakh ou le baryton Hermann Prey.

Fritz Rieger occupe le poste de directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de Melbourne, de 1971 à 1972.

The German conductor Friedrich (« Fritz ») Edmund Rieger was born on 28 June 1910 in Oberaltstadt (Riesengebirge) , Karkonosze, Bohemia (Austria-Hungary) ; and died on 30 September 1978 in Bonn, Germany.

From 1931 to 1938, Rieger worked in Prague. In August 1941, he became director of the Bremen Opera and, in August 1944, he took-up the position of director of the Bremen Philharmonic Orchestra. Rieger was a member of the Nazi Party.

In 1949, Rieger was announced as the chief-conductor of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra by the city government, replacing the « modernist » Hans Rosbaud who had been appointed by the U.S. occupation authorities. According to author David Monod, the decision to release Rosbaud and replace him with the « young and relatively unknown but suitably conservative » Rieger was caused by a desire to attract larger audiences with more traditional programs, a necessity in the wake of currency reform in the western part of Germany. In 1952, Rieger announced that the Orchestra would eliminate almost all modern music from its concerts. Rieger continued to lead the Munich Orchestra until 1966.

Fritz Rieger was chief-conductor of the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra, from 1971 to 1972.

Rafael Kubelik

Le chef d'orchestre tchèque (naturalisé suisse, en 1967) Rafael Jeroným Kubelik est né le 29 juin 1914 à Býchory, près de Prague, et est mort le 11 août 1996 à Kastanienbaum, dans le Canton de Lucerne.

Fils du violoniste Jan Kubelik et d'une aristocrate hongroise, il assiste à l'âge de 14 ans aux obsèques de Leoš Janáček, musicien qui l'influencera profondément par la suite. Il étudie au Conservatoire de Prague. Il donne son 1er concert avec l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque, le 24 juin 1937. Il est nommé directeur du Théâtre national de Brno, puis, en 1942, directeur musical à la Philharmonie tchèque, succédant à Vaclav Talich. À l'arrivée des communistes, il s'exile en 1948 en Angleterre, puis aux États-Unis. Il devient alors directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de Chicago, directeur musical de Covent Garden. Il dirige également régulièrement l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne et l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Il est nommé, à partir de 1961, directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise de Munich, poste qu'il occupera pendant près de 20 ans. En 1967, il est naturalisé suisse. Après la chute du rideau de fer, il dirige, en 1990, le concert d'ouverture du Festival du Printemps de Prague.

Son répertoire s'étend de Jean-Sébastien Bach aux contemporains, avec une prédilection pour la musique tchèque : Antonín Dvořák, Bedřich Smetana, Leoš Janáček et Bohuslav Martinů dont il crée plusieurs œuvres. Ses enregistrements les plus marquants sont ceux réalisés avec l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque et avec l'Orchestre de la radio bavaroise.

C'est un des chefs d'orchestre à l'origine de la redécouverte de l'Opéra « les Troyens » d'Hector Berlioz, qu'il présentera dans toute l'Europe en plusieurs langues.

L'activité de Kubelík comme compositeur est beaucoup moins connue, même si elle n'est pas négligeable quantitativement : 5 Opéras, 2 Symphonies, 5 Concertos (pour piano, pour violon) , plusieurs pièces de musique religieuse, ainsi que de la musique de chambre.

...

Le nom de Rafael Kubelík est resté longtemps indissociable de la musique de Gustav Mahler, dont il fut le 1er à enregistrer l'intégrale des Symphonies pour « DGG » . Mais c'est surtout l'image d'un grand propagateur de la culture musicale d'Europe centrale que l'on retiendra.

Fils du célèbre violoniste tchèque Jan Kubelík (1880-1940) et d'une comtesse hongroise, Marianne Csaky-Szell, Rafael Jeroným Kubelík naît en Bohême, à Býchory, près de Kolín, le 29 juin 1914. Il étudie le violon avec son père et, de 1928 à 1933, poursuit sa formation musicale (piano, violon, direction d'orchestre et composition) au Conservatoire de Prague, avec notamment Otakar Šín et Pavel Dědeček. Le 24 janvier 1934, à Prague, il dirige son 1er concert à la tête de la Philharmonie tchèque. Pendant 1 an, il est l'accompagnateur de son père, au piano, période qu'il considère comme la plus enrichissante de ses années de formation. Puis, Vacláv Talich l'engage à ses côtés comme chef d'orchestre à la Philharmonie tchèque. D'emblée, Kubelík trouve des conditions de travail exceptionnelles : les conseils de l'un des plus grands formateurs d'orchestres de l'époque et la possibilité de diriger l'un des meilleurs ensembles d'Europe centrale. Il devient ensuite directeur musical du Národní Divadlo (Théâtre national) de Brno (1939-1941) puis est nommé, en 1941, 1er chef de la Philharmonie tchèque, poste qu'il occupera jusqu'en 1948.

C'est l'une des périodes les plus difficiles de l'histoire de cet Orchestre. Kubelik refuse de collaborer avec les autorités d'occupation nazies et, à partir de 1945, commence à reconstruire un Orchestre mutilé par la guerre et la disparition des instrumentistes juifs. Il ouvre le répertoire à la musique nouvelle, notamment celle de Bohuslav Martinů, dont il crée « Polní Mše » (Messe de campagne, 1946) et la 5e Symphonie (1947) . Il participe, en 1946, à la fondation du Printemps musical de Prague. Mais lorsque les communistes prennent le pouvoir, en 1948, il décide d'émigrer en Occident.

The Czech-born conductor and composer Rafael Jeroným Kubelik was born on 29 June 1914 in the family castle in Býchory, 60 kilometers from Kolin, next to Prague, Bohemia, Austria-Hungary (today's Czech Republic) , and died on 11 August 1996 in « Kastanienbaum » , in the Canton of Lucerne, Switzerland.

Son of a well-known violinist, Jan Kubelik, he was trained in Prague, and made his debut with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, at the age of 19. Having managed to maintain a career in Czechoslovakia under the Nazi occupation, he declined to work under what he considered a 2nd tyranny after the Communist Czechoslovak « coup d'état » of 1948, and took refuge in Britain. He became a Swiss citizen, in 1967.

Kubelik was music-director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (1950-1953) ; musical director of The Royal Opera, Covent Garden (1955-1958) ; and music-director of the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra (1961-1979) ; and was a frequent guest-conductor for leading Orchestras in Europe and America.

As a composer, Kubelik wrote in a neo-Romantic idiom. His works include 5 Operas, 3 Symphonies, chamber music, choral works, and songs.

He was the 6th child of the Bohemian violinist Jan Kubelik, whom the younger Kubelik described as « a kind of God to me » . His mother was a Hungarian countess, Anna Julie Marie Széll von Bessenyo. Kubelik studied the violin with his father, and entered the Prague Conservatory at the age of 14, studying violin, piano, composition, and conducting. He graduated from the Conservatory, in 1933, at the age of 19 ; at his graduation concert, he played a Paganini Concerto and a composition of his own for violin and orchestra. Kubelik was also an accomplished pianist, and served as his father's accompanist on a tour of the United States, in 1935.

In 1939, Kubelik became music-director of the Brno Opera, a position he held until the Nazis shut the company down in November 1941. The Nazis allowed the Czech Philharmonic to continue operating ; Kubelik, who had 1st conducted the Orchestra when he was 19, became its principal conductor. In 1943, he married the Czech violinist Ludmilla Bertlová, with whom he had 1 son.

In 1944, after various incidents, including one in which he declined to greet the Nazi « Reichsprotektor » Karl Hermann Frank with a Hitler salute, along with his refusal to conduct Richard Wagner during the War, Kubelik « deemed it advisable to disappear from Prague and to spend a few months undercover in the countryside so as not to fall into the clutches of the SS or “ Gestapo ” » . Kubelik conducted the Orchestra's 1st post-War concert, in May 1945. In 1946, he helped found the Prague Spring Festival, and conducted its opening concert.

After the Communist coup of February 1948, Kubelik left Czechoslovakia, vowing not to return until the country was liberated. « I had lived through one form of bestial tyranny, Nazism » , he told an interviewer, « As a matter of principle, I was not going to live through another. » . He defected during a trip to Britain, where he had flown to conduct Mozart's « Don Giovanni » with the Glyndebourne company at the Edinburgh Festival. He had been engaged on the recommendation of Bruno Walter, whom Kubelik had assisted in this work at the 1937 Salzburg Festival. Kubelik told his wife of his decision to defect as their plane left Czechoslovakia.

In 1953, the Communist government convicted the couple in absentia of « taking illicit leave » abroad. In 1956, the regime invited him back « with promises of freedom to do anything I wanted » , said Kubelik, but he refused the invitation. In a 1957 letter to « The Times » , Kubelik said he would seriously consider returning only when all the country's political prisoners were freed and all « émigrés » were given as much freedom as he would have possessed. He was invited back by the regime, in 1966, but again refused ; in 1968, after the Prague Spring had ended by the Soviet invasion, he organised an international boycott, in which many of the major Classical artists of the West participated.

In 1950, Kubelik became music-director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, choosing the position over an offer from the « BBC » to succeed Sir Adrian Boult as chief conductor of the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra. He left the post, in 1953. Some hold that he was « hounded-out of the Chicago job » (to quote « Time » magazine) by the « savage attacks » (to quote the « New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ») of the « Chicago Tribune » music-critic Claudia Cassidy. But « Chicago Sun-Times » music-critic, Robert C. Marsh, argued, in 1972, that it was the Chicago Symphony trustees who were behind the departure. Their foremost complaint, and that of Cassidy as well, was that Kubelik introduced too many contemporary works (about 70) to the Orchestra ; there were also objections to his demanding exhaustive rehearsals and engaging several black artists. Many recordings made by Kubelik in Chicago for « Mercury Records » are available on CD, and have received critical praise.

After leaving Chicago, Kubelik toured the United States with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and, in the words of Lionel Salter in the « Grove Dictionary » , « had a brilliant success with Janáček's “ Kát'a Kabanová ” at Sadler's Wells in London, in 1954 » . Kubelik became musical director of The Royal Opera, Covent Garden, from 1955 to 1958. Among his achievements, there was, in 1957 : the 1st practically complete production in any Opera House of Berlioz's « les Troyens » . Although Covent Garden sought to renew his contract, he chose to leave, partly because of a campaign by Sir Thomas Beecham against the engagement of foreign artists at Covent Garden. In 1961, Kubelik accepted the position of music-director of the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra (« BRSO ») in Munich. He remained with the « BRSO » until 1979, when he retired. Salter considers this 18 year association the high-point of Kubelik's career, both artistically and professionally.

In 1961, Ludmilla Kubelik died after a car crash. In 1963, Kubelik married the Australian soprano Elsie Morison (born in 1924) . In 1967, he became a Swiss citizen, and began an association with the Lucerne Festival, in addition to his work with the « BRSO » .

In 1971, Göran Gentele, the new general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, New York, asked Kubelik to accept the position of music-director. Kubelik accepted partly because of his strong artistic relationship with Gentele. The 1st production he conducted as the Met's music-director was « les Troyens » . The death of Gentele in a road accident, in 1972, undermined Kubelik's reasons for working at the Opera House. He had prior conducting commitments away from the Met in his 1st season there, which diverted his attention. He resigned from the Met, in 1974, after only 6 months in post.

In his post-Czechoslovakian career, Kubelik worked with the Berlin Philharmonic, Boston Symphony, Chicago Symphony, Cleveland, Israel Philharmonic, London Symphony, New York Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic and Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestras, among others. His final concert was with the Czech Philharmonic.

In 1985, ill-health (notably, severe arthritis in his back) caused Kubelik to retire from full-time conducting but, after the fall of Communism in his native land, led him to accept a 1990 invitation to return to conduct the Czech Philharmonic at the Festival he had founded, the Prague Spring Festival. He recorded Bedřich Smetana's « Má Vlast » live with the Czech Philharmonic for « Supraphon » , his 5th recording of the piece. He also recorded the Mozart « Prague » Symphony and Antonín Dvořák's « New World » Symphony at the Festival. During the rehearsal of the « New World » , he told the Czech Philharmonic, « It is my joy to hear this. I always wanted it to sound like this but never really found it with any other Orchestra in the world. That 8th note is great ! » .

Kubelik's last Chicago Symphony Concert was a Saturday « Pops » performance which concluded with the playing of John Philip Sousa's « Stars and Stripes Forever » . At the conclusion, the predominantly Czech audience stood as one, shouting, applauding and crying. There was an encore. The subsequent applause lasted for at least 15 minutes, and the perpetual criticism of Caludia Cassidy, in fact, resulted in a great loss to Chicago.

Kubelik died aged 82. His ashes are interred next to the grave of his father in Slavín, Vyšehrad cemetery in Prague.

Among Kubelik's compositions are 5 Operas, 3 Symphonies, 3 settings of the « Requiem » , other choral works, many pieces of chamber music, and songs. Salter describes his musical style as « neo-Romantic » .

Kubelik recorded a large repertory, in many cases more than once per work. There are 2 complete recordings of his traversals of 3 major Symphony cycles - those of Brahms, Schumann, and Beethoven. When Kubelik recorded his 1st complete Beethoven Symphony cycle for « Deutsche Grammophon » , he employed 9 different Orchestras, one for each Symphony. His complete cycle of Gustav Mahler's Symphonies (recorded from 1967 to 1971 with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra) is highly-regarded. Of his Mahler, Daniel Barenboim remarked :

« I often thought I was missing something in Mahler until I listened to Kubelik. There is a lot more to be discovered in these pieces than just a generalized form of extrovert excitement. That is what Kubelik showed. »

Kubelík also left much-admired recordings of Operas by Verdi (his « Rigoletto » was recorded at La Scala with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau) , Mozart, Janáček, Dvořák and others, including Wagner, whose music he had shunned during the War, but which he conducted in later years.

Kubelík's complete discography is enormous, with music ranging from Malcolm Arnold to Jan Dismas Zelenka, with recordings both, in the studio and in concert. In addition to complete cycles of Beethoven, Brahms, Dvořák, and Mahler, Kubelík made recordings of orchestral and Operatic works by Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Tchaïkovsky, Wagner, Verdi and many others, including modern composers.

A top conductor of large orchestral works of the late-19th Century, Rafael Kubelík was born near Prague, in 1914. The son of violinist Jan Kubelík (1880-1940) , he studied violin, piano, composition, and conducting at the Prague Conservatory. He made his debut before the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, at age 19, and, in 1939, became the music-director of the National Opera in Brno, Czechoslovakia. In 1941, he became the music-director of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, a post he held until 1948. In 1948, with the establishment of a Communist dictatorship in Czechoslovakia, Kubelík left his homeland and became an exile for the next 40 years.

Kubelík's 3 years with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, beginning in 1950, were frustrating. A persuasive rather than a dictatorial figure and a diplomat rather than a martinet, he lacked the ability to control the Orchestra. Additionally, Kubelík's musical sensibilities had been shaped in the early 20th Century rather than the late-19th, as had been the case with his immediate predecessors, and he programmed far too much modern music for the taste of critics and subscribers. Kubelík was fortunate that his appointment coincided with the Orchestra making its 1st move into long-playing records for the « Mercury » label. Among his 2 dozen recordings with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra was a riveting performance of Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » and one of Smetana's « My Fatherland » . Ultimately, the fit just wasn't right between Kubelík and the Orchestra, and he gave-up the appointment.

Kubelík served for 3 years, from 1955 through 1958, as music-director of the Covent Garden Opera, in London, where he conducted the British premieres of Janáček's « Jenůfa » and Berlioz's « les Troyens » . From 1961 until 1979, he was music-director of the Bavarian Radio Symphony, in Munich, with which he also recorded extensively (for « Deutsche Grammophon ») , and was the principal conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York, during the 1973-1974 season as well. He was a most-welcomed guest-conductor in Chicago on many occasions throughout his later career, appeared with virtually all of the world's major Orchestras, and recorded extensively in England, America, and Germany. In 1967, he became a Swiss citizen.

Rafael Kubelík embodied a tradition of robust post-Romantic music-making that was ideally suited to the recording medium as well as the concert-hall. He was celebrated as a Master of rich orchestral color, which was brought-out most vividly in the late-Romantic and post-Romantic scores for which he was most popular. This included much of the Russian repertory and virtually all of the nationalist music of the era, especially the work of his fellow countrymen Antonín Dvořák, Leoš Janáček, and Bedřich Smetana. He recorded the latter's « Má Vlast » , at least 4 times, on as many different labels, the last at a live performance in Prague, during 1990, at a concert commemorating the liberation of the country from Communist rule released on the « Supraphon » label. The sheer number of his recordings that remain in print, and their equal distribution between the « historical » and modern sections of Classical music departments, speaks volumes about his enduring popularity and the validity of his performances and interpretations. His complete Beethoven and Mahler cycles remained in print for many years. Although relatively little of his Operatic work was preserved on record, the small number of these are also well-regarded, especially his « Rigoletto » .

With the fall of the Communist dictatorship, Kubelík, who had been intermittently ill for several years, returned to Czechoslovakia, for the 1st time in 4 decades, with the intention of resuming composing full-time. As it was, he had authored 5 Operas, several Symphonies, and various works for soloist and orchestra, vocal works, and chamber pieces.

The Czech conductor and composer, Rafael Jeroným Kubelík, was the 6th child of the Bohemian violinist Jan Kubelík, whom the younger Kubelík described as « a kind of God to me » . His mother was a Hungarian countess, Anna Julie Marie Széll von Bessenyő. Kubelík studied violin with his father, and later violin, composition, and conducting at the Prague Conservatory. He graduated from the Conservatory, in 1933, at the age of 19 ; at his graduation concert, he played a Paganini Concerto and a composition of his own for violin and orchestra. Kubelík was also an accomplished pianist, and served as his father's piano accompanist on a tour of the United States, in 1935.

In 1939, Rafael Kubelík became music-director of the Brno Opera, a position he held until the Nazis shut the company down on November 12, 1941. The Nazis allowed the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra to continue operating, and Kubelík became its principal conductor. (He had 1st conducted the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra on February 16, 1934, when he was 19 year old.) In 1944, after various incidents, including one in which he declined to greet the Nazi « Reichsprotektor » Karl Hermann Frank with a Hitler salute (along with his refusal to conduct Richard Wagner during the War) , Kubelík « deemed it advisable to disappear from Prague and to spend a few months undercover in the countryside so as not to fall into the clutches of the SS or “ Gestapo ” » . Kubelík conducted the Orchestra's 1st post-War concert, in May 1945. In 1946, he helped found the Prague Spring Festival, and conducted its opening concert.

After the Communist coup of February 1948, Rafael Kubelík left Czechoslovakia, vowing not to return until the country was liberated. « I had lived through one form of bestial tyranny, Nazism » , he told an interviewer, « As a matter of principle, I was not going to live through another. » . He defected during a trip to the United Kingdom, where he had flown to conduct Mozart's « Don Giovanni » at the Glyndebourne Festival, where he had been engaged on the recommendation of Bruno Walter (whom Kubelík had assisted in this work at the 1937 Salzburg Festival) . Kubelík told his wife of his decision to defect as their plane left Czechoslovakia. Upon arriving in London, Kubelík and his wife surrendered their Czech passports.

In 1953, the Communist government convicted the couple in absentia of « taking illicit leave » abroad. In 1956, the regime invited him back « with promises of freedom to do anything I wanted » , said Kubelík, but he refused the invitation. In a 1957 letter to « The Times » of London, Kubelik said he would seriously consider returning only when all the country's political prisoners were freed and all Czechs were given as much freedom as he was being promised. He was invited back by the regime, in 1966, but again refused ; in 1968, after the Prague Spring had ended by the Soviet invasion, he organized an international boycott, in which many of the major Classical artists of the West participated.

Rafael Kubelik eventually did return to Prague after the fall of Communism, leading the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra in the Prague Spring Festival, in 1990. In 1950, Kubelik became music-director of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, choosing the position over an offer from the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra to succeed Sir Adrian Boult as Chief Conductor. He left the post, in 1953. Some hold that he was « hounded-out of the Chicago job » (to quote « Time » Magazine) by the « savage attacks » (to quote the « New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians ») of the « Chicago Tribune » music-critic Claudia Cassidy. But « Chicago Sun-Times » music-critic Robert C. Marsh argued, in 1972, that it was the Chicago Symphony Orchestra trustees who were behind the departure. Their foremost complaint, and that of Cassidy as well, was that Kubelik introduced too many contemporary works (about 70) to the Orchestra. Recordings made by Kubelik in Chicago for « Mercury » Records, many available on CD, are now greatly admired by critics.

After leaving Chicago, Rafael Kubelik became Music Director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, from 1955 to 1958. Among his notable conducting achievements there was the 1957 production of Hector Berlioz's « les Troyens » , performed on a single evening. Although Covent Garden sought to renew his contract, he chose to leave, partly because of a letter to the newspapers by the aged Sir Thomas Beecham decrying the engagement of « foreign » artists at the Royal Opera. He also supported (the not so popular) repertory approach to casting, as opposed to bringing in « Stars » for a few 1st performances (in fact, he opposed the « Star-System » all his life) especially as far as he himself was concerned. Kubelik then accepted the position of Music Director of the « Bayerischer Rundfunk Symphonieorchester » , in 1961. He remained Musical Director until 1979, and continued as Principal Guest Conductor until his retirement in 1985 (in fact, fulfilled the position of music-director until his successor took-over, in 1983) . Kubelik's association with the « Bayerischer Rundfunk Symphonieorchester » is generally regarded as the high-point of his career, both artistically and professionally.

In 1971, Göran Gentele, the new general manager of the Metropolitan Opera, New York City, asked Rafael Kubelik to accept the newly created position of Music Director of the Met. Kubelik accepted partly because of his strong artistic relationship with Gentele. The death of Gentele in an automobile accident, in 1972, undermined Kubelik's reasons for working at the Opera House. The 1st production that Kubelik conducted as the Met's Music Director was « les Troyens » . Kubelik had prior conducting commitments away from the Met, in his 1st season in New York City, and these so diverted his attention from the Met that the Opera company began to experience stresses that undermined their situation, and Kubelik's position. Thus Kubelik resigned from Met, in 1974, after only 6 months as Music Director.

In his post-Czechoslovakian career, Rafael Kubelik worked closely with such Orchestras as the « Berliner Philharmoniker » , Boston Symphony Orchestra, New York Philharmonic Orchestra, Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (he conducted over 150 concerts, in the 1950's, toured the United States, in 1954, and continued to conduct them into the 1980's) , « Wiener Philharmoniker » (apart from concerts in Vienna and at the Salzburg Festival, various European tours) , Israel Philharmonic Orchestra (including series of concerts in Tel-Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and various Kibbutzim, in 1953, 1958 [series commemorating 10 years of Israeli Statehood] , another series of concerts in the 1950's, 1961, 1963, 1964, 1974, 1980, 1983) , « Orchestre de Paris » , and Chicago Symphony Orchestra. His penultimate conducting appearance, in October 1991, was with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra ; at the end, the Orchestra gave him an honorary fanfare, a tribute it had offered conductors only rarely in its history. His final concert was with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra.

In 1985, ill-health (notably, severe arthritis in his joints) caused Rafael Kubelik to retire from full-time conducting, but the fall of Communism in his homeland led him to accept a 1990 invitation to return to conduct the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra at the Festival he had founded, the Prague Spring Festival. He recorded Bedřich Smetana's « Má Vlast » live with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra for « Supraphon » , his 5th recording of the piece. He also recorded the Mozart « Prague » Symphony and Antonín Dvořák's « New World » Symphony at the Festival. During the rehearsal of the « New World » , he told the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, « It is my joy to hear this. I always wanted it to sound like this but never really found it with any other Orchestra in the world. That 8th note is great ! »

Among Rafael Kubelik's compositions are 5 Operas, a number of Symphonies, 3 settings of the « Requiem » text, other choral works, and many works of chamber music.

Rafael Kubelik recorded a large repertoire, in many cases more than once per work. We have 2 complete recordings of his traversals of 3 major symphony cycles - those of Johannes Brahms, Robert Schumann, and Ludwig van Beethoven. When Kubelik recorded his 1st complete Beethoven Symphony cycle for « Deutsche Grammophon » , he insisted on using 9 different Orchestras, one for each Symphony. His complete cycle of Gustav Mahler's Symphonies (recorded from 1967 to 1971 with the « Bayerischer Rundfunk Symphonieorchester ») is widely regarded as one of the essential Mahler sets. Of his Mahler, Daniel Barenboim remarked :

« I often thought I was missing something in Mahler until I listened to Kubelik. There is a lot more to be discovered in these pieces than just a generalized form of extrovert excitement. That is what Kubelik showed. »

Kubelik also left much-admired recordings of Operas by Verdi (his « Rigoletto » was recorded at La Scala with Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau) , Mozart, Janáček, Dvořák and others, including Wagner, whose music he had shunned during the War, but which he led to great effect in later years. Kubelik's complete discography is enormous, with music ranging from Malcolm Arnold through Jan Dismas Zelenka, with recordings both in the studio and in concert. Aside from complete cycles of Beethoven, Brahms, Dvořák, and Mahler, Kubelik made recordings of great orchestral and Operatic works by composers such as Bach, Mozart, Haydn, Tchaïkovsky, Wagner, Verdi and many others, including many modern composers.

Rafael Kubelik married the Czech violinist Ludmilla Bertlová, in 1942. Their son, Martin Kubelik (born in 1946) is an architectural historian. Bertlová died in 1961 from post-operative complications in Switzerland, where the couple resided. In 1963, Kubelik married the Australian soprano Elsie Morrison (born in 1924) . Rafael Kubelik died in 1996, aged 82, in Kastanienbaum, in the Canton of Lucerne, Switzerland. His ashes are interred next to the grave of his father, in Vyšehrad cemetery in Prague.

Kubelik was the 6th of the 8 sons of the distinguished Czech violinist Jan Kubelik and the Hungarian-born Countess Marianne Csaky-Szell. Between 1921 and 1929, he studied the orchestral repertoire daily by playing 4 hand piano arrangements with his uncle František Kubelik, prompting this comment from his father, in 1926 :

« He could realise great things. He is 11, plays splendidly violin, piano, sight-reading scores and has a good knowledge of the orchestra. Some time ago, he had a look to one of my orchestral works and asked me to add a horn to a particular part : he was right ! »

He entered the Prague Conservatory, in 1929, where, for the next 4 years, he studied piano, violin and composition.

At the beginning of 1934, Kubelik made his 1st appearance as a conductor with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, in a programme that included his own Fantasy, Opus 2, played by his father, and Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 4. He accompanied his father at the piano on recital tours through Romania, Italy and America, during 1935 and 1936, appeared with the Czech Philharmonic playing a Mozart Violin Concerto himself, and was appointed as a conductor with the Orchestra, in 1936. Václav Talich, the Orchestra's chief conductor, sent him on tour with the Orchestra to the United Kingdom, in 1937 and 1938, and he also appeared as a guest-conductor in America, during 1937, turning down the offer of a permanent position there. Kubelik was the chief conductor of the Brno Opera, between 1939 and 1941, staging the 1st Czech performances of Berlioz's « les Troyens » there, but after the National-Socialist administration closed the Theatre, he returned to Prague, where he held the position of chief conductor of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1941 to 1948, in succession to Talich.

Resisting political interference in the Orchestra's affairs, Kubelik conducted a wide repertory with it that included much Czech music. At the end of World War II, he led the Orchestra in a performance of Smetana's « Má vlast » (My Country) in Prague's Old Town Hall Square, supported the nationalisation of the Orchestra, in 1945, and assisted with the establishment of the Prague Spring Festival ; but, following the establishment of the Communist regime in what was to become Czechoslovakia, he decided to defect while conducting Mozart's « Don Giovanni » with the Glyndebourne Festival Opera, at the Edinburgh Festival in 1948. Kubelik commented about working under extreme political conditions :

« I am an anti-communist and anti-fascist. I do not think that artistic freedom can cope with a totalitarian regime. Individuals cannot do anything in a totalitarian country ; people who think they can (from their own merits) are really naïve. »

He accepted engagements with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and also appeared in South America and England, where he was much admired by the members of the « BBC » Symphony and « Philharmonia » Orchestras.

Kubelik 1st appeared at the head of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, in 1949, and made such a positive impression that he was invited to be the Orchestra's chief conductor with effect from 1950, but after 3 seasons with the Orchestra, he resigned in 1953 as a result of virulent press attacks from the critic Claudia Cassidy, who disliked the number of contemporary works which he programmed and the employment of black musicians. Having enjoyed great success conducting Janáček's « Kát'a Kabanová » with the Sadler's Wells Opera Company in London, in 1954, Kubelik was appointed chief conductor of the Covent Garden Opera Company at the Royal Opera House, in 1955. Here, he conducted the 1st complete performance in the United Kingdom of « les Troyens » as well as legendary stagings of Verdi's « Otello » and Janáček's « Jenůfa » ; and also vigorously promoted the idea of a resident company of permanent singers, which lasted more or less intact until the end of Sir Georg Solti's regime. Once again, however, he reacted strongly to personal attacks, which this time came from a former director of Opera at Covent Garden, Sir Thomas Beecham, who criticised the employment of foreign conductors : ironically, Kubelik was to make some very successful recordings with Beecham's own post-War Orchestra, the Royal Philharmonic.

After resigning from Covent Garden, in 1958, Kubelik concentrated on recording and working with many of the finest Orchestras in the world, such as those of Berlin and Vienna. Following the death of his 1st wife as a consequence of a car accident, he married the Australian soprano Elsie Morison, who may be heard in his recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 4 with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra. Kubelik had 1st conducted this Orchestra, in 1960, in a concert of music by Martinů, Mozart and Beethoven, and became its chief conductor the following year, remaining with it until 1979. These were to be highly-productive years : the Orchestra's status as a Radio Orchestra allowed it to give Kubelik the extensive rehearsal time which had been the subject of criticism in Chicago and London ; and freed from commercial constraints, its repertoire could be more adventurous than that of most rival Orchestras. His programming was extremely original : for instance, in individual seasons, he would present religious pieces from Palestrina to Stravinsky (1967-1968) ; a Symphony by Haydn in each concert (1970-1971) ; dedicate each concert to a single composer (1971-1972) ; or a complete season to 20th Century music (1972-1973) ; or to Symphonic poems (1973-1974) . He conducted a wide range of Operas with the Orchestra, including « Iphigénie en Tauride » by Gluck ; « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , « Lohengrin » and « Parsifal » by Wagner ; « Oberon » by Weber ; « Dalibor » by Smetana ; « Palestrina » by Pfitzner ; « Mathis der Maler » by Hindemith ; « Prometheus » and « Œdipus der Tyrann » by Orff ; and « Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor » by Nicolai. He made numerous recordings with the Orchestra and toured with it often.

Kubelik took Swiss citizenship in 1967, becoming involved with the Lucerne Festival ; and, for a short period, was chief conductor of the Metropolitan Opera in New York (1973-1974) , an appointment made by a new general director, Göran Gentele, who died before he was able to take-up his post. During the 1970's and early 1980's, Kubelik suffered increasingly from poor health, especially arthritis and, by 1985, had effectively ceased to conduct ; but he returned to the podium, in 1990, to celebrate the transition of his home country to democracy and, once again, led the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra in a performance of « Má vlast » (My Country) at the Prague Spring Festival. A distinguished composer himself, he gave numerous 1st performances, including Martinů's « 3 Frescoes of Piero della Francesca » ; Frank Martin's « Sechs Monologe aus " Jedermann " » ; Schönberg's « Die Jakobsleiter » ; and Hartmann's Symphony No. 8. He was critical of his own genius as a conductor, noting :

« There has not been a single concert in my life of which I could say that every thing matched my hopes, and I gave thousands ! »

On the podium, Kubelik conducted with great energy, « throwing the beat off himself » to quote the graphic description of Sir Charles Mackerras. He was not a disciplinarian, and his style was aptly described as that of « the velvet hand in the velvet glove ». His flexibility was ideally suited to the music of late-Romantic composers such as Mahler, and expressiveness was occasionally achieved at the price of rhythmic drive. Kubelik was liked by Orchestras across the world, which would all play for him in a heart-warming style that represented the absolute best of the Czech school of musicianship. His discography is large, extending across the whole of the era of the long-playing record, from the late-1940's to the early 1980's. After making a number of 78 rpm recordings for « EMI », he recorded an extensive repertoire with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra for the American company « Mercury », from 1951 onwards. With the ending of his formal relationship with the Chicago Orchestra and, therefore, with « Mercury », he recorded for « Decca », including a notable series of recordings with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra ; and, towards the end of the 1950's, he returned to « EMI », before moving to « Deutsche Grammophon », the company which had the closest relationship at this time with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra through its founder and 1st chief conductor, Eugen Jochum.

Since Kubelik's death, a wide range of radio recordings has been released, which has further extended his already substantial recorded repertoire. Among the numerous highlights of his discography are the complete Symphonies of Beethoven (each with a different Orchestra) , Brahms, Mahler and Schumann ; Pfitzner's « Palestrina » ; Schœnberg's « Gurrelieder » ; Verdi's « Rigoletto » ; Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , « Lohengrin » and « Parsifal » ; together with individual works by Bartók, Dvořák, Janáček, Martinů, Mozart, and Smetana. Although he recorded relatively few Concertos, those that stand-out are Brahms's Piano Concerto No. 1 with the British pianist Solomon ; 4 of the Mozart Piano Concertos with Clifford Curzon, and Schœnberg's Piano and Violin Concertos with Alfred Brendel and Zvi Zeitlin, respectively.

Born on 29 June 1914, the day after the Sarajevo assassination, Rafael Kubelik was the 6th of the 8 children of one of the most famous violinists at the beginning of the 20th Century, Jan Kubelik (1880-1940) and Marianne Csaky-Szell, previously a Hungarian countess, and grand' child of an amateur musician. He became one of the most important figures of conducting in the 2nd part of the 20th Century.

From 1921 to 1929, he studied daily the Symphonic repertoire, playing 4 hands on the piano with his uncle Frantisek Kubelik. Rafael Kubelik followed piano, violin and composition studies at the Prague Conservatory (1929-1933) . His father declared in 1926 :

« My oldest son is the most gifted. He could realize great things. He is 11, plays splendidly violin, piano, sightseeing scores and has a good knowledge of the orchestra. Some time ago, he had a look to one of my orchestration works and asked me to add a horn to a particular part : he was right ! »

He joined the Prague Conservatory at 14 and concentrated on composition, violin and conducting, studying the piano on the side. 4 years later, in 1933, he completed his studies ; in his 2 final concerts, he played a Paganini Concerto, his own Fantasy, Opus 2, for violin and orchestra and Dvořák's « Othello » Overture.

He began at the head of the Czech Philharmonic at 20, on January 24th, 1934, with Beethoven's Violin Concerto, his own Fantasy played by his father and Tchaïkovsky's 4th Symphony. He accompanied his father, on piano, in 1935-1936 in United States, Italy and Romania.

In 1936, on his return to Prague, Rafael Kubelík was appointed permanent conductor of the Czech Philharmonic, which was still headed by Vaclav Talich. In 1937, Talich, ill, put him on a journey towards England, Scotland and Belgium, conducting the Czech Philharmonic for a prestigious 20 concerts series, which will be redone the year after. Thus, he will stay Czech Orchestra's permanent conductor, from 1936 to 1939. In 1937, he gave a concert tour with American Orchestras, invited to become permanent conductor there, which he did not accept.

In 1939, he was appointed Chief of the National Theatre (« Janáčkova opera Zemského divadla ») in Brno and will stay in this position until its closure by the Nazi, in 1941. His father, Jan Kubelík, died on 5 December 1940 ; Rafael was then 26. He became Musical director of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1939 to 1948. On 20 June 1945, on occasion of the end of the Second World War, he conducted Smetana's « Má vlast » in a concert on Old Town Square. He gave among many other works : the « Bartered Bride » , « Dalibor » and « The Kiss » by Smetana ; « Jacobin » and « Rusalka » by Dvořák ; « Zauberflöte » , « Jenůfa » and « les Troyens » . Kubelík had to struggle with the Nazi regime and was accused of at least passive resistance - he refused to conduct Richard Wagner music for instance. In 1944, he even disappears from Prague so as not to fall in the clutches of the Nazis.

He will get married, in 1942, with the violinist Ludmila Bartlova, with whom he had 1 son, Martin. He fought to maintain the Czech Philharmonic during the War, supporting Czech music in his programs. He contributed to its nationalization (22 October 1945) and to the transformation of the Musical May of Prague, created by Talich, for the Czech philharmonic 50th Anniversary (1946) . He conducted the Czech repertoire, for example the Slavonic Dances for plant workers. He conducted for the last time « Má vlast » , on July 5th, for the Sokol Assembly. One can notice his support to contemporary Czech composers, as Vítězslava Kaprálová.

He left his country, on 17 July 1948, to escape from the communist regime installed in February - taking advantage of a tour in England to conduct « Don Giovanni » , in Glyndebourne, on Bruno Walter's recommendation. « I had lived through one form of bestial tyranny, Nazism » , he told an interviewer about his decision to leave after the Communist take-over.

« As a matter of principle, I was not going to live through another. I left Czechoslovakia, in 1948, vowing that I would never return until Communist rule was driven from my homeland. They have invited me back several times (in 1956 and 1966) with promises of freedom to do anything I wanted. But so long as that system of government rules anywhere, I refuse to set foot on that soil. »

He will appear with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in Amsterdam. One thing was to conduct under the Nazis but he estimated it was even worse that his country became totalitarian.

« I am an anti-communist and anti-fascist. I do not think that artistic freedom can cope with a totalitarian regime. Individuals cannot do anything in a totalitarian country ; people who think they can - from their own merits are really naive. »

Since the early 1950's, he had numerous invitations to return to Czechoslovakia, which he always refused with the insistence that his return would only be possible if all political prisoners were freed and the same freedom promised to him would be granted to all citizens of Czechoslovakia. He made many recordings in London for « EMI » , till 1952, under Walter Legge, then recorded exclusively for « Decca » , for some years. He was asked for by young players from the « Philharmonia » which considered him as the most talented conductor besides Herbert von Karajan and the « BBC » was considering him as Adran Boult's successor. But he then became, for 3 years (17 November 1949 to 1953) chief of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra (he was 36 years old when nominated) , creating 70 works in 3 seasons and recording the 1st high-fidelity recording, and then would be put away. His plan to remake the Orchestra, by replacing 22 of its players, met immediate opposition. So did his ambitious programming of contemporary music. During his 3 years, he conducted 60 new works in Chicago, including pieces by Lukas Foss, Roy Harris, William Schuman and Aaron Copland. He failed to win champions among the critics ; indeed, his departure from the post is often ascribed to the implacable opposition of Claudia Cassidy, the chief critic of the « Chicago Tribune » . He will return several times in Chicago, his last appearance being in October 18, 1991, with the « Hussika » Overture by Dvořák for the last commemorative concert of the Orchestra Centennial, a re-creation of the 1st concert in October 16, 1891. He had been in charge for 2 years of Covent Garden (1955-1958) ; season begun with « Kát'a Kabanová » with a great success. But his London career had not be helped by the son of the creator of the Beecham's pills. After « EMI » , Kubelík made records with Vienna for « Decca » (1st recording : Slavonic Dances, in 1954) . He had a serious car accident, in spring of 1956. From 1957, he will regularly conduct the Berlin philharmonic.

After having refused to conduct in Germany, for more than 20 years, he gave his 1st concert with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, on 12 February 1960, with the « Sinfonia Concertante » by Martinů, Mozart and Beethoven's 7th Symphony. In 1961, he is nominated Director of the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, until his dismiss in 1979 ; he will though stay its principal conductor, until 7 June 1985 ; he will then resign for illness reasons, judging his health could not allow him to fulfil his artistic goals anymore (I remember seeing this colossus completely worn-out after a Gustav Mahler concert in Paris, in the 1980's) . He gave with the Bavarian forces a 1st concert tour in Japan, in 1965. In 1968, he gathered around 150 world famous musicians to boycott all communist countries after the military occupation by the Warsaw Pact Countries of the Czechoslovak Republic, on 21 August 1968. In 1969, he gave commemorative medals to all members of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, on occasion of their visit to the Lucerne International Festival as commemoration of the 50th Anniversary of the Czechoslovak Republic (these medals were confiscated by the Czechoslovak authorities upon the return of the Orchestra) .

Kubelík acquired the Swiss nationality, in 1967, having lived there from 1953 in Lucerne, and later, from 1968 in nearby Kastanienbaum, directly on Lake Lucerne. He will marry the Australian soprano Elsie Morison after his 1st wife's death from sequels after a car accident.

Mutual understanding between Kubelík and the Munich Orchestra has been immediate. He gave in Munich the most varied and intelligent programs for that period. His repertory extended from Palestrina to 20th Century music, Oratorios from Bach to Britten, Operas from Händel to Janáček, Symphonies from Zelenka to Hartmann or Henze. (A brief passage to the Metropolitan Opera has to be mentioned, since he became its Musical director from August 1973 to 1974 ; he will give-up after a memorable version of Berlioz « les Troyens ».) One can hear his clear and singing voice on the Bavarian Radio site, during a rehearsal of Beethoven 1st Symphony ,in 1966, or during this interview. Numerous musical cycles have been done during that blessing period : in 1966-1967, the Beethoven Symphonies cycle in chronological order ; in 1967-1968, religious pieces from Palestrina to Stravinsky ; in 1968-1969, Hindemith's « Kammermusik » and Bach Suites ; in 1969-1970, Concertos by Mozart, ending with the « Requiem » in 1970-1971, each concert presented a Symphony by Haydn ; in 1971-1972, each concert was dedicated to a single composer ; 1972-1973 season was dedicated to 20th Century music ; 1973-1974 to Symphonic poems, and so on.

Programs included also : Britten's « War Requiem » ; « les Béatitudes » by Franck ; « Manfred » by Schumann ; « From the House of the Dead » by Janáček ; « Jeanne d'Arc au bûcher » by Honegger ; « Pelléas et Mélisande » by Debussy ; « Gurrelieder » by Schönberg ; « Œdipus Rex » by Stravinsky ; « Xerxès » by Händel ; « Iphigénie en Tauride » by Gluck ; « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , « Lohengrin » and « Parsifal » by Wagner ; « Oberon » by Weber ; « Dalibor » by Smetana ; « Palestrina » by Pfitzner ; « Mathis der Maler » by Hindemith ; « Prometheus » and « Œdipus Der Tyrann » by Orff ; « Die Lustige Weiber von Windsor » by Nicolai.

Kubelik created numerous works as :

Martinů's « Field Mass » (1946) , « les Fresques » (1956) , the 5th Symphony (1947) ; the 6 « Monologues de Jedermann » by Frank Martin (1949) ; « Jakobsleiter » by Schönberg (1961) ; the 8th Symphony (1963) and the « Symphonic Hymns » (1975) by Karl Amadeus Hartmann.

Musical Prize : Madame-Léonie-Sonning (Danemark) , in 1984, 2 years before Pierre Boulez (and the gold medal from The Royal Philharmonic Society, in 1995)

Kubelik gave several concerts in Paris, specially the beginning of a memorable Gustav Mahler Symphonies cycle in the 1980's with « l'Orchestre de Paris » . He was very critic about his own talent :

« There has not been a single concert in my life from which I could say everything matched my hope, and I gave thousands ! »

He was a friend of numerous conductors : George Szell, Wolfgang Sawallisch, Václav Neumann, Ernest Ansermet, Rudolf Kempe, among others ; like Otto Klemperer with whom he used to play chests.

His own works include :

5 Operas (« Veronika » , 19 April 1947, Brno ; « Tagensanbruch » , 1958 ; « Cornelia Faroni » , 1972) ; 2 Symphonies (« Séquences » , « Orphikon ») ; 3 « Requiems » (« Pro memoria patris » , 1941 ; « Pro memoria patriae » , 1955 ; « Pro memoria Uxoris » , 1962) ; several Cantatas (« Libera nos » , 1963) ; 2 Masses (1955 and 1957) ; a Fantasy for violin and orchestra (1932-1933) ; 2 Violin Concertos (1932-1933 and 1951) ; a Concerto for flute and chamber orchestra (1943) ; a Cello Concerto (1944) ; a Piano Concerto (1950) ; 6 String Quartets (see : 2nd) ; a Piano Trio (1988, created in 1989, in Cologne, by the Altenberg Trio) ; chamber music (Sonata for piano and violin, 1931-1932) ; Songs ; 3 « Stabat Mater » ; a Symphonic « Peripeteia » for organ and orchestra ; and a Sonatine for piano (1957) .

Kubelík will retire in 1985, going often in California (« La Quinta ») for health reasons. His « Indian spring » of 1990 apart, he just made public appearances to attend to some of his works creation.

He will only go back to his homeland, in 1990, for the greatest Czech event, musical and emotional, since the War : his conducting of « Má vlast » , on May 12, 1990, at the head of the Czech Philharmonic. He was then named « honorary conductor of the Czech Philharmonic » , doctor honoris causa of the Charles University and also Honour citizen of Prague ; he gave, later on, some concerts in Japan.

On June 9th, he gave another concert in the Saint Venceslas Plaza, which gathered musicians from Prague, Slovakia and Brno, a remake of a concert given in 29 June 1945 :

« A bird does not song in a cage. I left my homeland not to have to quit my people. Spirit should not be tied by politic. »

Kubelík gave a last concert, on 11 October 1991, to the profit of the Olga Havlova Foundation. On the program : Mozart and Dvořák's « New World » Symphony.

Rafael Kubelík died on 11 August 1996 in « Kastanienbaum » , in the Canton of Lucerne, Switzerland. He is buried in the Vyšehrad cemetery, besides Antonín Dvořák, Alfons Maria Mucha, Bedřich Smetana and his father, Jan Kubelík.

Václav Havel wrote :

« I admired Rafael Kubelík at the highest level, not only for all the glory he brought to Czech music, but also because he was an extraordinary character and a patriot. »

George Szell

Le chef d'orchestre et pianiste américain (d'origine hongroise) George Szell (György Széll) est né le 7 juin 1897 à Budapest et est mort le 30 juillet 1970 à Cleveland.

Sa famille s'installe à Vienne alors qu'il est encore enfant. Il y travaille le piano et la direction d'orchestre. Enfant prodige, Szell donne des récitals de piano à l'âge de 11 ans, suscitant l'admiration de Richard Strauß, dont il fut ultérieurement le collègue et l'interprète. Il étudie la composition et la direction d'orchestre à Vienne puis travaille à Berlin. Il dirige (à 17 ans) l'Orchestre philharmonique de Strasbourg (où il succède à Otto Klemperer) , celle de Prague, de Düsseldorf, de Darmstadt et de La Haye.

Juif, il quitte l'Europe en 1939 pour les États-Unis.

De 1942 à 1946, il est chef d'orchestre invité au « Metropolitan Opera » de New York et dirige l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York, en 1944 et 1945. Mais son nom reste attaché à l'Orchestre de Cleveland, dont il a été le directeur musical de 1946 jusqu'à sa mort et dont il a fait une phalange internationalement reconnue. En outre, il a été conseiller musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York, de 1969 à 1970, et a été l'invité régulier de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne durant de nombreuses années.

Son legs discographique (Franz-Josef Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Robert Schumann, Anton Bruckner, Johann Strauß fils, Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler) recèle des merveilles (« Des Knaben Wunderhorn ») , avec Elisabeth Schwarzkopf et Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau) , ainsi que les plus éminents solistes comme Vladimir Horowitz, Isaac Stern, David Oistrakh et Mstislav Rostropovitch.

Élève à Vienne de Eusebius Mandyczewski (théorie musicale) , de Josef Bohuslav Fœrster (composition) et de Richard Robert (piano) , et, à Leipzig, de Max Reger, George Szell joue, à 11 ans, ses Ires œuvres pour piano et, à 16, dirige l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne. Engagé par Richard Strauß comme répétiteur au « Staatsoper » de Berlin (1915-1917) , il y revient comme 1er chef, de 1924 à 1929, après avoir fait ses classes à Darmstadt (1921) , à Düsseldorf (1922) , à Strasbourg et à Prague, où il est directeur général de la musique, de 1929 à 1937. Jusqu'en 1946, il mène une carrière de chef-invité, notamment à Glasgow, où il dirige l'Orchestre écossais (1937-1939) , à La Haye avec l'Orchestre de la Résidence, et aux États-Unis, où il dirige à New York l'Orchestre de la « NBC » (1941-1942) , le « Metropolitan Opera » (1942-1946) et l'Orchestre philharmonique (1943-1956) .

Mais son plus grand titre de gloire reste d'avoir dirigé, de 1946 à 1970, l'Orchestre de Cleveland, devenu sous son règne l'une des meilleures phalanges américaines. À force de discipline, il en a façonné le son et l'âme de manière exemplaire, comme pûrent en juger à 3 reprises les mélomanes européens (1957, 1965 et 1967) . De 1946 à 1970, George Szell dirige un cours de direction d'orchestre de grande renommée, d'où sont issus notamment James Levine, Louis Lane, Matthias Bamert. Chef invité du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam (à partir de 1958) , conseiller musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York, il crée au Festival de Salzbourg 2 œuvres de Rolf Liebermann, « Pénélope » (1954) et « l'École des femmes » (1957) , en plus de « Légende irlandaise » de Werner Egl (1955) . Essentiellement tourné vers le répertoire Classique et Romantique, il vise dans ses interprétations à une objectivité respectueuse du texte musical, se refusant à « verser de la crème au chocolat sur les asperges » .

Venu relativement tard sur l'échiquier des grands Orchestres américains, l'Orchestre de Cleveland (« The Cleveland Orchestra ») s'est imposé, surtout grâce à George Szell qui en a été le directeur pendant un quart de siècle, comme l'une des meilleures formations du monde.

Fondé en 1918, il sera dirigé jusqu'en 1970 par des chefs d'origine slave ou d'Europe centrale : un Russe, Nikolai Sokoloff (1918-1933) , un Polonais, Artur Rodzinski (1933-1943) , un Autrichien, Erich Leinsdorf (1943-1946) et un Hongrois, George Szell (1946-1970) , qui adopteront la nationalité américaine. Cet éclectisme joue un rôle déterminant dans l'évolution de l'Orchestre, qui ne puise pas l'essentiel de ses racines dans la tradition germanique ou française comme les autres grandes formations américaines. Mais c'est surtout George Szell qui l'a amené au niveau où il se trouve actuellement par un travail méticuleux et d'une intransigeance légendaire : il entretenait avec les musiciens des rapports d'autorité à la limite du conflictuel mais savait obtenir le meilleur d'eux-mêmes, se montrant notamment intraitable dans le domaine de la précision, de la justesse et de la couleur sonore.

Ouvert à tous les répertoires, l'Orchestre a créé des œuvres de compositeurs aussi divers que Jean Rivier, Ernest Bloch (Concerto pour violon, 1938, avec Joseph Szigeti) , William Walton (Concerto pour violon, 1939, avec Jascha Heifetz) , William Schuman (4e Symphonie, 1942) , Bohuslav Martinů, Paul Hindemith (Concerto pour piano, 1947) ou Peter Mennin (7e Symphonie, 1964) . Rodzinski avait pris l'habitude de diriger chaque saison plusieurs Opéras en version de concert, donnant ainsi, en 1935, la 1re audition américaine de « Lady Macbeth de Mzensk » de Chostakovitch. Plusieurs compositeurs ont reçu des commandes pour les anniversaires importants de l'Orchestre, notamment Henri Dutilleul (« Métaboles ») , Paul Creston (Toccata, Opus 66) , Bohuslav Martinů (« le Rocher ») , Boris Blacher (« Music for Cleveland ») , Gottfried von Einem et Howard Hanson (« Mosaïcs ») pour le 40e Anniversaire (1958) .

En 1968, Pierre Boulez est nommé premier chef-invité, puis conseiller musical après la mort de George Szell, en 1970, poste qu'il conservera jusqu'en 1972. Lorin Maazel (1972-1982) le supplante à la tête de l'Orchestre malgré le souhait des musiciens. Il est 1er chef américain à assurer la direction de l'Orchestre de Cleveland.

The Hungarian-born American conductor and composer George Szell (originally, György Széll, György Endre Szél, or Georg Szell) was born on 7 June 1897 in Budapest and died on 30 July 1970 in Cleveland. He is widely considered one of the 20th Century's greatest conductors. He is remembered today for his long and successful tenure as music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra, and for the recordings of the standard Classical repertoire he made in Cleveland and with other Orchestras.

Szell came to Cleveland in 1946 to take-over a respected if undersized Orchestra, which was struggling to recover from the disruptions of World War II. By the time of his death, he was credited, to quote the critic Donal Henahan, with having built it into « what many critics regarded as the world's keenest Symphonic instrument ». Through his recordings, Szell has remained a presence in the Classical music world long after his death, and his name remains synonymous with that of the Cleveland Orchestra. While on tour with the Orchestra, in the late-1980's, then-Music Director Christoph von Dohnányi remarked :

« We give a great concert, and George Szell gets a great review. »

Szell grew-up in Vienna. He began his formal music training as a pianist, studying with Richard Robert. One of Robert's other students was Rudolf Serkin ; Szell and Serkin became life-long friends and musical collaborators. In addition to the piano, Szell studied composition with Eusebius Mandyczewski (a personal friend of Johannes Brahms) , and with Max Reger for a brief period. Although his work as a composer is virtually unknown today, when he was 14, Szell signed a 10 year exclusive publishing contract with Universal-Edition, in Vienna. In addition to writing original pieces, he arranged Bedřich Smetana's String Quartet No. 1, « From My Life » , for orchestra.

At age 11, Szell began touring Europe as a pianist and composer, making his London debut at that age. Newspapers declared him « the next Mozart ». Throughout his teenage years, he performed with Orchestras in this dual role, eventually making appearances as composer, pianist and conductor, as he did with the Berlin Philharmonic, at age 17.

Szell quickly realized that he was never going to make a career out of being a composer or pianist, and that he much preferred the artistic control he could achieve as a conductor. He made an unplanned public conducting debut when he was 17, while vacationing with his family at a summer resort. The Vienna Symphony's conductor had injured his arm, and Szell was asked to substitute. Szell quickly turned to conducting full-time. Though he abandoned composing, throughout the rest of his life, he occasionally played the piano with chamber ensembles and as an accompanist. Despite his rare appearances as a pianist after his teens, he remained in good form. During his Cleveland years, he occasionally would demonstrate to guest pianists how he thought they should play a certain passage.

In 1915, at the age of 18, Szell won an appointment with Berlin's Royal Court Opera (now known as the « Staatsoper ») . There, he was befriended by its Music Director, Richard Strauß. Strauß instantly recognized Szell's talent and was particularly impressed with how well the teenager conducted Strauß' music. Strauß once said that he could die a happy man knowing that there was someone who performed his music so perfectly. In fact, Szell ended-up conducting part of the world-premiere recording of « Don Juan » for Strauß. The composer had arranged for Szell to rehearse the Orchestra for him, but having overslept, showed-up 1 hour late to the recording session. Since the recording session was already paid for, and only Szell was there, Szell conducted the 1st half of the recording (since no more than 4 minutes of music could fit onto one side of a 78 rpm, the music was broken-up into 4 sections) . Strauß arrived as Szell was finishing conducting the 2nd part ; he exclaimed that what he heard was so good that it could go out under his own name. Strauß went on to record the last 2 parts, leaving the Szell-conducted half as part of the full world-premiere recording of « Don Juan » .

Szell credited Strauß as being a major influence on his conducting style. Much of his baton technique, the Cleveland Orchestra's lean, transparent sound, and Szell's willingness to be an Orchestra builder all came from Strauß. The 2 remained friends after Szell left the Royal Court Opera, in 1919 ; even after World War II, when Szell had settled in the United States, Strauß kept track of how his « protégé » was doing.

In the 15 years during and after World War I, Szell worked with Opera Houses and Orchestras in Europe : in Berlin, Strasbourg (where he succeeded Otto Klemperer at the Municipal Theatre) , Prague, Darmstadt, and Düsseldorf, before becoming principal conductor, in 1924, of the Berlin « Staatsoper » , which had replaced the Royal Opera. In 1930, Szell made his United States debut with the Saint-Louis Symphony Orchestra. At this time, he was better-known as an Opera conductor than an Orchestral one. He was conductor of the Scottish Orchestra (which later became the Royal Scottish National Orchestra) in Glasgow, for 3 seasons (1936-1939) .

At the outbreak of the War in Europe, in 1939, Szell was returning via the United States from an Australian tour ; he ended-up settling with his family in New York City. After spending 1 year teaching, Szell began to receive frequent guest conducting invitations. Important among these invitations was a series of 4 concerts with Arturo Toscanini's « NBC » Symphony Orchestra, in 1941. In 1942, he made his Metropolitan Opera debut ; he conducted the company regularly for the next 4 years. In 1943, he made his New York Philharmonic debut. In 1946, he became a naturalized citizen of the United States.

In 1946, Szell was asked to become the Music Director of the Cleveland Orchestra. At the time, the Cleveland Orchestra was a highly-regarded regional American Orchestra (the top-tier American Orchestras were Philadelphia Orchestra, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chicago Symphony Orchestra, New York Philharmonic and NBC Symphony Orchestra) . For Szell, working in Cleveland would represent an opportunity to create his own personal ideal Orchestra, one which would combine the virtuosity of the best American ensembles, with the homogeneity of tone of the best European Orchestras. Szell made it clear to the trustees of the Orchestra that if they wanted him to be their next conductor, they would have to agree to give him total artistic control of the Orchestra ; they agreed. He held this post until his death.

The next decade was spent firing musicians, carefully hiring replacements, increasing the Orchestra's roster to over 100 players, and relentlessly drilling the Orchestra. Szell's rehearsals were legendary for their intensity. Absolute perfection was demanded from every player. Musicians would be dismissed on the spot for making too many mistakes or simply questioning Szell's authority. Although Szell was not alone in this practice (Toscanini was nothing if not dictatorial) such firings would not happen today : musicians' Unions are much stronger now than they were then. If Szell heard a player practicing backstage before a concert and did not like what he heard, he would not hesitate to berate the musician and give detailed notes on how the music should be played, despite the concert being minutes away. Szell's autocratic style extended to giving suggestions to the Severance Hall janitorial staff on mopping technique and what brand of toilet paper to use in the restrooms.

Szell proudly boasted :

« The Cleveland Orchestra gives 7 concerts a week and the public is invited to 2. »

Some critics found the Orchestra to sound over-rehearsed in concert, lacking spontaneity. Szell conceded this critique, saying that the Orchestra did much of its best work during rehearsals. But Szell's high standards paid off. According to music-critic Ted Libbey :

« Szell's formidable musicianship and paternal authority commanded equal measures of respect from the Cleveland players who, under his baton, achieved what was probably the highest executant standard of any Orchestra in the world. »

By the end of the 1950's, it became clear to the world that the Cleveland Orchestra, noted for its flawless precision and chamber-like sound, had taken its place alongside the greatest Orchestras in America and Europe. In addition to taking the Orchestra on annual tours to Carnegie Hall and the East Coast, Szell led the Orchestra on its 1st international tours to Europe, the Soviet Union, Australia, and Japan. Among the awards, he received in his lifetime was that of an honorary Commander of the Order of the British Empire (CBE) , in 1963. He was also made « Chevalier de la Légion d'honneur » .

Szell's manner in rehearsal was that of an autocratic task Master. He meticulously prepared for rehearsals and could play the entire score on the piano from memory. Preoccupied with phrasing, transparency, balance and architecture, Szell also insisted upon hitherto unheard of rhythmic discipline from his players. The result was often a level of precision and ensemble playing normally found only in the best String Quartets. For all Szell's absolutist methods, many of the Orchestra's players were proud of the musical integrity to which he aspired. Video footage also shows that Szell took care to explain what he wanted and why, expressed delight when the Orchestra produced what he was aiming for, and avoided over-rehearsing parts that were in good shape. His left-hand, which he used to shape each sound, was often called the most graceful in music.

As a result of Szell's exactitude and very thorough rehearsals, some critics (such as Donald Vroon, editor of American Record Guide) have censured Szell's music-making as lacking emotion. In response to such criticism, Szell expressed this credo :

« The borderline is very thin between clarity and coolness, self-discipline and severity. There exist different nuances of warmth - from the chaste warmth of Mozart to the sensuous warmth of Tchaïkovsky, from the noble passion of “ Fidelio ” to the lascivious passion of “ Salome ”. I cannot pour chocolate sauce over asparagus. »

He further stated :

« It is perfectly legitimate to prefer the hectic, the arhythmic, the untidy. But to my mind, great artistry is not disorderliness. »

He has been described as a « literalist » , playing only what is in the score. However, Szell was quite prepared to play music in unconventional ways if he thought the music needed these ; and, like most other conductors before and since, he made many small modifications to orchestrations and even notes in the works of Beethoven, Schubert and others. His recordings of the 4 Schumann Symphonies contain changes to the composer's orchestration (slight changes, admittedly, and fewer than most other prominent conductors have made) .

A stickler for perfection, Szell could, at times, seem almost absurdly stubborn, but he always aimed only to get the best results. His great expertise regarding instrumental techniques assisted him in this respect.

Cloyd Duff, timpanist with the Cleveland Orchestra, once recalled how Szell had insisted that he play the snare drum part in Béla Bartók's « Concerto for Orchestra » , an instrument which he was not supposed to play. 1 month after having recorded the Concerto in Cleveland (October 1959) , it was to be performed at Carnegie Hall, as part of an annual 2 week tour of the Eastern United States along with Prokofiev's Symphony No. 5. Szell had begun getting increasingly irritated about the side drum part in the 2nd movement and, by the time they reached New York, Szell's escalation was going off the scale :

« Starting with the one who had played on the recording, Szell tried-out each of the staff percussionists on the side drum part. He made them so nervous that, one by one, they all stumbled. Finally, Szell turned to timpanist Cloyd Duff. »

This is the story as Duff tells it :

« Szell came to me and said to me, " Cloyd, I want you to play the snare drum part. I remember how you played these things in Philadelphia (over 20 years earlier, at the Robin Hood Dell, when Szell was guest-conductor and Duff was a student at Curtis) ." He had an awfully good memory, he liked my percussion playing. He said, " I want you to play the part ", and I really blew my lid. I said, " You're ruining the whole section. Nobody can make a diminuendo to please you because they're so nervous. Every one of those men is capable of doing that. " He said, " Even so, I want you to play the part. " I said, " Do you realize how silly that will look, to see me get-up from the timpani to go over to the snare drum and then back to the timpani and back to the snare drum at the end ? " I said, " It's really uncalled for ", or words to that effect. But, he said, " OK, but I want you to play that part. It's very important that we do it just right. " I said, " OK, I'll play it for you, but don't you dare look at me. " So when I played it, I played it louder than they had played it before so I had more room to make a diminuendo. Everybody was a little bit shocked that I had played it as loudly as I did. But Szell, true to his word, looked away, didn't look at me once and I didn't look at him under the circumstances. »

Szell's reputation as a perfectionist was well-known, but his knowledge of instruments was deep and in-depth. The Cleveland trumpeter Bernard Adelstein recounted Szell's knowledge of the trumpet :

« He knew all the fingerings on the trumpet. For example, on the C-trumpet, the " E " on the 4th space is played open, with no valve, and it's a flat note. But there are 2 other options on the C-trumpet. You can play the same note with the 1st and 2nd valves or the 3rd valve. Both of them sound sharp. The 3rd valve is a little sharp and the 1st and 2nd valves together sounds even sharper. And he knew that. He called me in once when we were playing an octave in " Don Juan ". He said. " The ' E ' is a flat note on the C-trumpet. " I said, " Yes, that's why I play it on 1 and 2. " He said, " But 1 and 2 is sharp, isn't it ? " I said, " Yes, but I make an adjustment, by lengthening the 1st slide a little bit. " And he said, " Ah, yes, but it's still out of tune. " »

Szell primarily conducted works from the core Austro-German Classical and Romantic repertoire, from Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, through Mendelssohn, Schumann and Brahms, and on to Bruckner, Mahler and Strauß. He said once that as he got older he consciously narrowed his repertoire, feeling it was « actually my task to do those works which I thought I'm best qualified to do, and for which a certain tradition is disappearing with the disappearance of the great conductors who were my contemporaries and my idols and my unpaid teachers. »

He did however program contemporary music ; he gave numerous world premieres in Cleveland, and he was particularly associated with such composers as Dutilleux, Walton, Prokofiev, Hindemith and Bartók. Szell also helped initiate the Cleveland Orchestra's long association with composer-conductor and avant-garde icon Pierre Boulez. At the same time, Szell championed the music of Haydn and Mozart in a period when those composers were little represented in concert programs.

After World War II, Szell became closely associated with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam, where he was a frequent guest-conductor and made a number of recordings. He also regularly appeared with the London Symphony Orchestra, Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic, and at the Salzburg Festival. From 1942 to 1955, he was an annual guest-conductor of the New York Philharmonic and served as Musical Advisor and senior guest-conductor of that Orchestra, in the last year of his life.

Szell married twice. The 1st, in 1920, to Olga Band, another of Richard Robert's pupils, ended in divorce in 1926. His 2nd marriage, in 1938, to Helene Schultz Teltsch, originally from Prague, was much happier, and lasted until his death. When not making music, he was a gourmet cook and an automobile enthusiast. He regularly refused the services of the Orchestra's « chauffeur » and drove his own Cadillac to rehearsal until almost the end of his life. He died from bone-marrow cancer in Cleveland, in 1970. His body was cremated, and his ashes were buried, in Atlanta, along with his wife upon her death, in 1990.

Most of Szell's recordings were made with the Cleveland Orchestra for « Epic / Columbia Masterworks » (now, « Sony Classical ») . He also made recordings with the New York Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic and the Amsterdam «

Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Few of his mono recordings have been re-issued. Many live stereo recordings of repertoire Szell never conducted in the studio exist, both with the Cleveland Orchestra and other Orchestras.

George Szell's music-loving family moved to Vienna, in 1900, where 4 years later, already showing signs of exceptional musical gifts, he became a piano student of Richard Robert. In addition, he studied composition and music theory with Josef Bohuslav Fœrster, Eusebius Mandyczewski and Max Reger. Szell made his debut as both a pianist and a composer with the Vienna « Tonkünstler » Orchestra, in 1908, and then, hailed as « the new Mozart » , he undertook a tour of Europe during the 1909-1910 concert season which included a visit to London. He signed a 10 year contract with the Viennese music publishing company Universal-Edition, in 1912, and, in the same year, gave the 1st performance of his Piano Quartet, Opus 1, with the Rosé Quartet. His (unplanned) debut as a conductor came during the following year while staying with his family at the resort of Bad Kissingen, when the regular conductor of the spa's summer concerts injured his arm.

This was followed, in 1914, by a successful debut with the « Blüthner » Orchestra, in Berlin, as composer, conductor, and pianist. Between 1915 and 1917, Szell worked as a « répétiteur » at the Court Opera, in Berlin, where he came into close contact with Richard Strauß, who recommended him to Hans Pfitzner as the replacement for Otto Klemperer as 1st conductor at Strasbourg (1917-1918) . From 1919 to 1921, he was an assistant conductor at the German Opera House, in Prague, before moving successively to conducting positions at Darmstadt (1921-1922) and Düsseldorf (1922-1924) . Szell was then appointed 1st conductor at the Berlin State Opera (« Staatsoper ») under Erich Kleiber, remaining there for 5 years before returning to Prague to take-up the position of chief conductor at the German Opera House, conducting in addition the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra. He made his American debut with the Saint-Louis Symphony Orchestra, in 1930, and he also appeared as a guest-conductor with the Courtauld-Sargent Concerts, in London, and with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, in Amsterdam.

As the political situation in Central Europe deteriorated, Szell left Prague, in 1937, to become conductor of the Scottish Orchestra for 2 seasons while also serving as guest-conductor of the Hague « Residentie » Orchestra. During the summer months of 1938 and 1939, he also conducted the Orchestras of the Australian Broadcasting Corporation before moving to the United States where he settled permanently, arriving in New York during August 1939 by way of Vancouver. During the following year, he taught at the Mannes School and the New School for Social Research before resuming his conducting career during the 1940-1941 season with concerts with the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, with the Detroit and « NBC » Symphony Orchestras and at the Ravinia and Robin Hood Dell Festivals. He made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera, New York, in 1942, conducting Richard Strauß' Opera « Salome » , and he returned regularly as a guest-conductor, until 1954, while also appearing with the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras.

During the 1944-1945 and 1945-1946 seasons, Szell appeared as guest-conductor with the Cleveland Orchestra before being invited to become its chief conductor from the 1946-1947 season, having taken American citizenship, in 1946. He remained at the head of the Cleveland Orchestra for the rest of his life, transforming it into one of the finest Symphony Orchestras in the world. During the summer months, he would return regularly to Europe to appear with major Orchestras at Festivals such as those in Holland, Lucerne, and Salzburg, and to record. He died in 1970, following an exhausting tour of the American West Coast and the Far East with the Cleveland Orchestra.

Szell was a ruthless orchestral disciplinarian, the results of which may be heard in his numerous recordings with the Cleveland Orchestra, virtually all of which were made for the American « Columbia » label. His desire for musical and technical perfection was so great that occasionally he would over-rehearse a work, and members of the Cleveland Orchestra would claim that the best performances which it gave were often those at the start of a rehearsal period. Szell was equally adept at interpreting a very wide repertoire. His Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven were tightly controlled but vigorous ; his Mozart Concerto recordings with his close friend and fellow Richard Robert pupil, Rudolf Serkin, remain outstanding. In the repertoire of the 19th Century, Szell was pre-eminent : powerful in Wagner and highly-empathetic in Brahms, Schumann and Dvořák, to name just 3 composers from this period. He was, in addition, a staunch advocate of contemporary composers, leading the 1st performances at Cleveland and Salzburg of works by composers such as Dutilleux, Egk, Hindemith, Liebermann and Walton. Among the relatively few live recordings of Szell in concert, that have been published, those from the Cleveland Orchestra's legendary European tour of 1967, when it visited the Edinburgh, Lucerne and Salzburg Festivals, are especially outstanding, conveying unparalleled virtuosity, control and musical insight. Several of these performances have been published on the Swiss labels « Ermitage » and « Aura » .

Part of the wave of great Hungarian conductors who took-over American musical life just before and after World War II (the others included Fritz Reiner, Antal Dorati, and Eugene Ormandy) , George Szell quickly transformed a middling Mid-western Orchestra into one of the nation's « Big 5 » . His cultivation of the Cleveland Orchestra set an example of discipline and hard work that gradually helped raise the standards of Orchestras across America.

Although born in Hungary, Szell was raised in Vienna where he studied composition with Eusebius Mandyczewski, and piano with Richard Robert ; he also studied composition in Prague with Josef Bohuslav Fœrster. Szell was a « wunderkind » , playing a Mozart Piano Concerto with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra when he was 10, and composing a number of solid chamber and orchestral works in a lush, late-Romantic style as a child and teenager. He was 17 when he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic in a program that included one of his own compositions.

Despite these early successes, Szell rose through the conducting ranks in the traditional way of the period, with a series of Opera positions : Royal Opera of Berlin (1915-1917) , Strasbourg (1917-1918) , Prague (1919-1921) , Darmstadt (1921-1922) , and Düsseldorf (1922-1924) . Szell's 1st prestigious post came to him in 1924, when he was named 1st conductor of the Berlin State Opera (« Staatsoper ») ; he simultaneously served as a professor at Berlin's « Hochschule für Musik » . In 1929, he moved on to become general music-director of the German Opera and Philharmonic in Prague, where he remained until 1937.

Szell began focusing more on orchestral repertory in the 1930's ; he made his american debut as guest-conductor of the Saint-Louis Symphony, in 1930, and, in 1937, he was appointed conductor of the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow, while maintaining a steady relationship with the « Residentie Orkest » in The Hague. Szell was in America, in 1939, when war broke-out in Europe ; he remained in the United States through the War, 1st depending on guest engagements and, then, in 1942, becoming a regular conductor at the Metropolitan Opera, where he was especially praised for his Wagner performances. In 1946, Szell took American citizenship and became music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra, a post he held for 24 years. He was also the New York Philharmonic's music advisor and senior guest-conductor during the last 2 years of his life.

Although Szell made a recordings in Europe in the 1950's and 1960's for « Decca » , and in Cleveland at the end of his life for « EMI » , the bulk of his substantial discography was the result of his long collaboration with « Columbia » Records, in Cleveland. There, Szell had inherited an able but ordinary Orchestra and, through sheer determination, molded it into one of America's finest. A Szell performance was remarkable for its textural clarity, chamber-like balances, and precision of attack and release. He drilled his Orchestra mercilessly, even in works it had performed with him not long before. Szell was particularly admired for his performances of Austro-Germanic Classics from Haydn to Richard Strauß, his sharp renderings of works by a select group of 20th Century composers including Bartók, Prokofiev, Janáček, and Walton) , and his idiomatic way with Dvořák. Indeed, some collectors maintain that Szell's monaural, early 1950's recording of Dvořák's 8th Symphony with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra has never been equaled. His treatment of French composers, on the other hand, was criticized for its lack of atmosphere, and detractors maintained that he achieved precision at the expense of emotional expression. To those who demanded a warmer approach to his beloved Mozart, however, Szell is said to have retorted :

« One does not pour chocolate sauce over asparagus. »

« George Szell : A Life of Music » by Michaël Charry, University of Illinois Press (June, 2011) .

This book is the 1st full biography of George Szell, one of the greatest Orchestra and Opera conductors of the 20th Century. From child prodigy pianist and composer to world-renowned conductor, Szell's career spanned 7 decades, and he led most of the great Orchestras and Opera companies of the world, including the New York Philharmonic, the « NBC » and Chicago Symphonies, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Vienna Philharmonic and Opera, and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam. A « protégé » of composer-conductor Richard Strauß at the Berlin State Opera, his crowning achievement was his 24 year tenure as musical director of the Cleveland Orchestra. Under Szell's baton, the Orchestra developed into one of the world's greatest ensembles, recording extensively and touring triumphantly in the United States, Europe, the Soviet Union, South Korea, and Japan.

Michaël Charry, a conductor who worked with Szell and interviewed him, his family, and his associates over several decades, draws on this 1st hand material and correspondence, Orchestra records, reviews, and other archival sources to construct a lively and balanced portrait of Szell's life and work from his birth, in 1897, in Budapest to his death, in 1970, in Cleveland.

Readers will follow Szell from his career in Europe, Great Britain, and Australia to his guest conducting at the New York Philharmonic and his distinguished tenure at the Metropolitan Opera and Cleveland Orchestra. Charry details Szell's personal and musical qualities, his recordings and broadcast concerts, his approach to the great works of the orchestral repertoire, and his famous orchestrational changes and interpretation of the Symphonies of Robert Schumann. The book also lists Szell's conducting repertoire and includes a comprehensive discography.

In highlighting Szell's legacy as a teacher and mentor as well as his contributions to Orchestral and Opera history, this biography will be of lasting interest to concert-goers, music lovers, conductors, musicians inspired by Szell's many great performances, and new generations who will come to know those performances through Szell's recorded legacy.

« A discerning and highly-informed new biography. Charry makes a convincing case for admiring his subject's skill in musical matters without concealing Szell's many personality flaws. » (Forward)

« A magnificent achievement. I was especially impressed by Mister Charry's skill in conveying a deep admiration for his subject without falling into the trap of fawning or idol worshipping - a quality seldom encountered in biographies of great conductors. » (Stephen C. Hillyer, past president of the Fritz Reiner Society.)

George Szell (eigentlich György Széll, geboren 7. Juni 1897 in Budapest, Österreich-Ungarn ; gestorben 30. Juli 1970 in Cleveland) war ein austroamerikanischer Dirigent, Pianist und Komponist.

György Széll, György Endre Szél, oder Georg Szell wurde am 7. Juni 1897 in Budapest, damals Österreich-Ungarn geboren, wuchs jedoch ab circa 1900 in Wien auf. Über seine Eltern ist bisher nichts bekannt.

Die Quellen geben als Geburtsnamen unterschiedliche Varianten wieder, bedingt durch die Sprachenvielfalt im damaligen Österreich-Ungarn der Kaiserlich und Königlich -Zeit.

Spätestens seit seiner Ankunft in Amerika 1939 nannte er sich George Szell.

Er begann seine Ausbildung in Wien zunächst bei Richard Robert als Pianist. Hier lernte er Rudolf Serkin kennen. Er wurde sein musikalischer Kooperationspartner und ein lebenslanger Freund. Neben dem Klavier studierte Szell Komposition bei Eusebius Mandyczewski, einem persönliche Freund von Brahms, und bei Max Reger. Im Alter von 14 Jahren unterschrieb Szell einen Zehn-Jahres-Exklusiv-Vertrag mit dem Wiener Verlag Universal-Edition. Neben eigenen Kompositionen arrangierte er Bedřich Smetanas I. Streichquartett, Aus meinem Leben, für Orchester.

Bereits 1908, also mit elf Jahren, gab er seinen ersten öffentlichen Auftritt als Pianist und Komponist. Sein Debüt als Dirigent gab er 16-jährig mit dem Wiener Symphonie Orchester. Als Siebzehnjähriger leitete er selbst die Aufführung einer eigenen Komposition durch die Berliner Philharmoniker. Noch vor seinem 20. Geburtstag arbeitete er mit den Berliner Philharmonikern sowohl als Pianist, Komponist als auch als Dirigent zusammen. Richard Strauß holte ihn als Korrepetitor an die Berliner Oper (1914-1917) . Anschließend wurde Szell als Nachfolger Otto Klemperers Chefdirigent der Straßburger Philharmoniker (1917-1919) . Es folgten Stationen beim Deutschen Theater in Prag (1919-1921) , in Darmstadt (1921-1922) und in Düsseldorf (1922-1924) , bevor er als Erster Kapellmeister an die Staatsoper Berlin engagiert wurde (1924-1929) . Gleichzeitig leitete er das Rundfunk-Symphonieorchester Berlin und unterrichtete an der Berliner Hochschule für Musik (1927-1930) und machte auch Aufnahmen mit den Wiener Philharmonikern.

1936-1939 übernahm er die Leitung des Scottish National Orchestras und 1937-1939 gleichzeitig das Residenzorchester von Den Haag. 1939 kehrte Szell als Generalmusikdirektor und Opernchef nach Prag zurück.

Nach Ausbruch des II. Weltkriegs 1939, Szell beendete gerade eine Tournee durch Australien, ließ er sich mit seiner Familie in New York nieder. Ein Jahr lang unterrichtete er, dann erhielt er vereinzelt Einladungen als Gast-Dirigent. Wichtig unter diesen Einladungen waren 1941 vier Konzerte mit Arturo Toscaninis « NBC » Symphony Orchestra. 1942 erfolgte das Metropolitan Opera Debut ; er dirigierte das Orchester in den darauffolgenden vier Jahren regelmäßig. 1943 erfolgte das New York Philharmonic Debut.

In den Jahren 1940-1942 spielte er als Pianist mit Paul Hindemith und Rudolf Serkin als Partnern auch Kammermusik. 1940 dirigierte er erstmals die New York Philharmonic. Von 1942 bis 1946 arbeitete Szell regelmäßig an der Met und von 1943 bis 1956 mit den New Yorker Philharmonikern.

Zu Beginn der Saison 1969-1970 wurde er Music Advisor des New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

Mit dem Cleveland Orchestra nahm er hauptsächlich für Epic Records fast das komplette Standard-Repertoire der klassischen Musik auf, erreichte dabei aber fast nie die Verkaufszahlen von Leonard Bernstein, der mit den New Yorker Philharmonikern für Columbia Records und damit für denselben Mutterkonzern (CBS) aufnahm. Der CBS-Geschäftsleitung wird in diesem Zusammenhang das Wortspiel « Szell never sells » (« Szell verkauft sich nicht ») zugeschrieben. Stark dagegen spricht allerdings, daß CBS ihn die großen Klassiker massenweise einspielen ließ und viele Aufnahmen auch heute noch verfügbar sind, und andere alle Beethoven-Sinfonien und Konzerte (mit Leon Fleisher, ein zweites Mal für « EMI » mit Gilels am Klavier) , alle Brahms-Sinfonien und die Konzerte (mit Leon Fleisher sowie auch hier ein zweites Mal mit Serkin am Klavier, Oistrach und Rostropowitsch an der Violine und am Cello) , die Dvorak-Sinfonien 7-9, alle

Schumann-Sinfonien (in eigener Bearbeitung) , die « Unvollendete » und die « Große » von Schubert, Haydn und viele Werke von Mozart (Sinfonien Nr. 28, 33, 35, 39, 40 und 41, Posthornserenade, « Eine kleine Nachmusik » und andere) .

In Leon Fleisher fand Szell in den 1950er und frühen 1960er Jahren seinen idealen Interpreten für das Klavierkonzert-Repertoire. Von herausragender Qualität sind die Aufnahmen der Klavierkonzerte von Beethoven und Brahms, daneben des Klavierkonzertes Nr. 25 von Mozart sowie der Klavierkonzerte von Grieg und Schumann, den « Symphonischen Variationen » von Cesar Franck und Rachmaninows « Paganini Rhapsody » . Weiter arbeitete er zusammen mit Gilels, Serkin, Oistrach und Rostropowitsch.

In den 1950er und 1960er Jahren konzertierte er häufig mit dem Cellisten Pierre Fournier, mit dem er auch das Dvořák-Cellokonzert mit den Berliner Philharmonikern aufnahm.

Zu seinen Schülern gehörten und andere James Levine, die in Berlin geborene Komponistin Ursula Mamlok, sowie Robert Shaw. James Levine wurde später Leiter der Met, der Münchner Philharmoniker und des Boston Symphony Orchestra. Er war in den 1960er Jahren George Szell's Assistent. Ursula Mamlok unterrichtete Komposition an der New York University, der Temple University und über 40 Jahre an der Manhattan School of Music in New York. Durch die Leitung des Chors des Cleveland Orchestra wurde Robert Shaw bekannt. Er leitete später das Atlanta Symphony Orchestra.

Bereits 1908, also mit elf Jahren, gab er seinen ersten öffentlichen Auftritt als Pianist und Komponist. Er schrieb eine Sinfonie in Es-Dur, ein Quintett in D-Dur, ein Rondo für Klavier und andere Werke. Neben seinen eigenen Kompositionen bearbeitete er auch bekannte Werke der klassischen Musik : Diese spielte er auf Schallplatte ein, so und andere Smetanas Streichquartett « Aus meinem Leben » und seine Bearbeitung der vier Sinfonien von Schumann.

Seit dem Jahre 1990 wurden viele Aufnahmen von Szell durch Sony BMG Music Entertainment, das Teile von « CBS » übernahm, durch die Reihe « Essentials Classics » digital remastered zu recht günstigem Preis (circa 5 Euro) der jüngeren Generation zugänglich gemacht und sorgten für eine Wiederentdeckung Szells durch die jüngere Generation. Weitere Aufnahmen von Szell findet man bei Phillips mit dem Concertgebouw-Orchester, bei « Decca » mit seinem Clevelander Orchester und mit dem London Symphony Orchestra.

Szell war der Dirigent, der nach Eugene Ormandy am längsten im 20. Jahrhundert eines der amerikanischen « Big Five » -Orchester leitete, und der aus dem Cleveland Orchester erst ein Orchester von Weltruhm machte. Neben Solti, Ormandy, Dorati und Reiner war er Teil der « hungarian connection » , welche die amerikanischen Orchester ab der Mitte des 20. Jahrhunderts auf ein Niveau brachte, das dem der europäischen Orchester ebenbürtig war, in spieltechnischer Hinsicht vielleicht sogar überlegen.

Seine Probenarbeit war gefürchtet. Bekannt geworden ist sein Satz :

« The Cleveland Orchestra gives 7 concerts a week and the public is invited to 2. » (Das Cleveland Orchestra gibt sieben Konzerte pro Woche, das Publikum ist (nur) zu zweien eingeladen.)

So eilte ihm der Ruf voraus, als Dirigent mit sich und seinen Musikern unerbittlich streng umzugehen. Seine autoritäre Art wurde nicht von allen Orchestern akzeptiert, führte aber nicht selten zu herausragenden Ergebnissen. Sofern sich diese seiner Meinung nach nicht einstellten, untersagte er die Veröffentlichung der Aufnahme, so geschehen bei einer Aufnahme der 4. Sinfonie von Tschaiakovsky mit dem London Symphony Orchestra, die erst Jahre nach seinem Tod erschien, und als eine der besten dieses Werkes gilt. Ebenfalls hochgerühmt werden zum Beispiel seine Aufnahmen der Sinfonien von Dvořák Haydn und Brahms, sowie die Brahms Klavierkonzerte (mit Serkin und Fleisher) .

Szell war nicht nur für seine autoritäre Art gefürchtet.

Rudolf Bing, der langjährige Leiter der Metropolitan Opera, meinte auf Szells Aussage hin, daß er (Szell) sich selbst sein (Szells) größter Feind sei : « Nicht, solange ich lebe. » .

Berühmt geworden ist auch seine Reaktion auf die euphorische Besprechung (in den Zeitungen) der Leistungen seines Solo-Hornisten Myron Bloom anlässlich einiger Konzerte. Als er diesen danach im Fahrstuhl traf, fragt er nur kurz, ob er diesen einmal berühren dürfe. Bloom sagte Jahre später : « Klarer konnte man es nicht ausdrücken. » .

Eine weitere typische Anekdote ist aus dem Jahr 1957 überliefert. In Cleveland wurde Beethovens 2. Klavierkonzert geprobt, Solist war Glenn Gould. Dieser reiste nie ohne seinen eigenen Klavierstuhl, der durch eine Federmechanik sehr sensibel auf Goulds Bewegungen reagierte. Scheinbar schraubte Gould während der Probe an seinem Stuhl herum, was Szell zu der Aussage veranlasste : « Wenn Sie vielleicht ein Sechzehntel Inch von Ihrem Allerwertesten abkratzen, Mr. Gould, könnten wir endlich mit dieser Probe fortfahren. » . Da Glenn Gould den Satz nach eigener Aussage nicht wahrnahm, kam es zu keinerlei Zerwürfnis. Die Erinnerungen, wie deftig Szell Goulds Hintern titulierte, gehen auseinander.

The famous Adagio of Bruckner's 7th Symphony, missing the cymbal crash that Bruckner never put there to begin with. In 1951, this was hardly common knowledge, but even more interesting is the substitution of 4 alphorns for Bruckner's evidently unobtainable Wagner tubas, the sound of these rather recalcitrant instruments being remarkable indeed. Mengelberg's conducting here is flowing and serene, strikingly without his usual mannerisms.

L'appellation d'origine « Mont-d'Or » désigne un fromage au lait (thermisé) de vache, à pâte molle à croûte lavée, produit dans une zone contiguë dans le massif du Jura, plus précisément dans le canton de Vaud. Il est appelé « Vacherin Mont-d'Or » ou simplement « Vacherin ». Il faut 7 litres de lait pour fabriquer un kilogramme de fromage.

Ce fromage à pâte molle, particulièrement coulant (surtout en fin d'affinage), a la particularité d'être ceinturé par une sangle en écorce d'épicéa fabriquée artisanalement, à l'origine afin d'en faciliter le transport et d'être livré dans une boîte en bois du même arbre.

La plus ancienne mention de ce type de fromage sanglé remonte à 1280, et concerne les fromages savoyards. Peu d'écrits permettent de connaître l'origine de ce vacherin. Il existe une lettre d'Eugène Droz adressée à Antoine Parmentier, datant de 1799, sur lequel il fait état du « fromage de boîte ». À la fin du XVIIIe siècle, ce fromage était inscrit dans l'inventaire départemental des activités fromagères.

À l'origine, les vaches redescendaient dans les étables passer l'hiver et la production de lait devenant moindre. Il n'était donc plus possible de fabriquer de grosses meules de comté, particulièrement gourmandes en lait. On produisait alors le vacherin.

Quant au mot « vacherin », il provient du mot vache et apparaît dans les écrits franco-provençaux dès le XVe siècle. C'est dès 1865 (et la fondation de la Société de Laiterie des Charbonnières) que ce fromage acquit sa réputation et son succès commercial hors de sa zone de production. Il fut primé aux expositions d'Yverdon, en 1876 ; de Genève, en 1880 ; et de Zürich, en 1883.

L'Hôtel du « Val Sinestra » est situé dans la région de Basse-Engadine, en Suisse.

Outre le cadre verdoyant des lieux et son altitude (1,500 mètres), cet ancien sanatorium, aménagé en hôtel en 1978, est connu pour avoir été le théâtre de nombreuses manifestations de l'Au-Delà.

Il faut avoir le cœur bien accroché pour oser passer une nuit sur place, d'autant plus que le village le plus proche est situé à 6 kilomètres ! Inutile donc d'espérer obtenir du secours rapidement, en plein milieu de la nuit !

Pour la majorité des habitants de la région, tout ceci ne sont que des légendes, mais les médiums ayant séjourné sur les lieux sont formels : cet hôtel est véritablement hanté.

La presse locale à bien entendu saisi l'affaire rapidement. Cependant, Wanda Hopman, l'actuelle directrice, affirme ne pas chercher à se faire de la publicité, surtout que les histoires de fantômes ce n'est pas toujours très vendeur !

La clientèle de cet hôtel est composée à 90 % de Hollandais qui ignorent l'histoire de ce fantôme belge. Comment affirmons-nous cela ? C'est tout simplement grâce à un médium qui leur a rendu visite en janvier 1979 et qui a pu réussir à établir le contact avec l'entité.

Il s'agit du fantôme d'un homme qui parlait allemand avec un accent néerlandais. Il s'appelait « Guillon » et était belge. Sa famille était dans le textile et ils avaient beaucoup d'argent.

Les séances de spiritisme étaient organisées au sous-sol de cet ancien sanatorium, à l'endroit-même où les pensionnaires étaient soignés. Hasard ou coïncidence, il se trouve que « Guillon » s'était rendu plusieurs fois au même endroit, pour y soigner sa tuberculose, lorsqu'il était vivant.

Dans les années 1920, alors qu'il se trouve en soins, il croise Maria, une des employées de l'établissement. Très vite, ils tombent amoureux.

Cependant, « Guillon » mettra du temps pour se confier au médium à ce sujet, car à cette époque, lorsqu'un patient sortait avec un membre du personnel hospitalier, c'était assez mal vu.

Pendant plusieurs mois, le médium et « Guillon » communiquent par le biais du spiritisme. Les lumières ainsi que les appareils électriques s'allument et s'éteignent seuls.

Les gens de la région, ainsi que les touristes, commençaient à avoir peur, mais le médium assura que « Guillon » était un gentil fantôme qui avait, tout simplement, peur de la foule.

The « Val Sinestra » (Romansh, literally : « left valley ») is a valley of the Swiss Alps, located in the Engadin, between the Silvretta and the Samnaun ranges. The valley is drained by La Brancla, a tributary of the Inn basin, near Ramosch. The highest mountains in the Val Sinestra are the Muttler (3,293 meters) , Piz Tschütta (3,254 meters) and Piz Tasna (3,179 meters) . The valley is approximately 10 kilometres long.

The valley belongs to the municipalities of Sent and Ramosch, in the Swiss canton of Graubünden. The main localities in Val Sinestra are Zuort and Vnà.

The Val Sinestra is connected to the Val Fenga by the 2,608 metre high-pass named Cuolmen d'Fenga.

...

From time immemorial, the place name « Zuort » has referred to a gently rising forest clearing at the back of the Val Sinestra. The Estate, a small hamlet at 1,711 meters, rises-up suddenly and unexpectedly 4 kilometers above the village of Vnà, a bright clearing among the dark pines. Zuort was 1st documented as a fief belonging to the community of Sent, in 1482 ; for Centuries, the alpine farm also served as a customs station. Its more recent history is closely tied to the Dutch conductor and composer Willem Mengelberg (1871-1951) . He had a chalet built above the inn, in 1911, and he and his friends, including Richard Strauß and the Prince of the Netherlands, spent their summer vacations here. In 1920, he acquired the Estate with 13 hectares of land and hired a farmer from Sent as his tenant. With his help, a votive chapel, a one-of-a-kind place of worship in the Norwegian style with alpine wood carvings, was constructed. The chapel, which opened in 1928, was also intended as a reminder of Switzerland and the Netherlands being spared during Word War I. For half a Century, after Mengelberg's death, a foundation which he had set-up placed the « Chasa Mengelberg » as a vacation home at the disposal of Dutch musicians. In 2010, the complex was sold with the goal of preserving « Zuort » as an ensemble for future generations and to allow it to function as a sensibly managed collective property. The inn and the chalet as its annex are open year round. 8 guest rooms with historic furniture as well as period rooms with valuable wooden floors, paneling and ceilings from earlier Centuries offer guests the atmosphere, vanished long since just about everywhere else, of an old Engadine mountain farmstead and a « Belle Époque » chalet. « Hof Zuort » has been a member of Swiss Historic Hotels, since 2012.

...

The Dutch conductor, Willem Mengelberg used to live on the « Zuort » farm, in the Engadiner mountains. Recently, a doctor from Saint-Moritz bought the areal and had it authentically restored. A dream holiday location away from the piste.

When you drive a few miles into the Swiss Canton Graubünden from Austria, you take a direct turn into the mountains, arriving at a mountain village called Vnà, which gets its name from the Romansh region this area belongs to. The houses are built of stone, the people speak a language that only the locals can understand (Romansh) and then we meet-up with Salvatore, who smells strongly of a stable, and who will drive us to the Zuort farm in a red Landrover Defender.

The farm itself has an idyllic location in a valley, the Sinestra Val, that can only be reached on foot, or with Salvatore's Defender. If you were to keep driving, you would eventually reach the ski regions of Ischgl and Samnaun. However, the Zuort Project is the complete opposite of the « après-ski » magic of Ischgl. As Salvatore carries our few pieces of luggage past the stable and the 3 pretty Haflinger horses and deposits them in the warm parlour, you get an inkling of what a stay here is all about : to feel the ghosts of the past and soak-up the nature.

It's quite funny really : The farm and the chalet above it (which can be rented completely) , used to belong to the famous Dutch conductor, Willem Mengelberg. He came here for a holiday, in 1910, and fell in love with the raw landscape, bought the 400 year old farm and had a chalet called « Chasa Mengelberg » built just above it. After Mengelberg's death, in 1951, the hamlet of Zuort was administered by the Mengelberg Foundation, and the 16 hectare of farming land and the guest-house were operated by various tenants. Then, in 2010, Doctor Peter Robert Berry IV, a doctor from Saint-Moritz read an announcement that the Mengelberg Foundation were selling the complete areal. Berry jumped at the chance and found something in Zuort that had been missing completely in Saint-Moritz for the last 20 years : authenticity, tranquillity and nature.

He had all the rooms in the farm renovated, displaying a fine feeling for « real » Engadiner mountain architecture, but left the conductor's chalet in its original state. Visitors to the chalet can admire clothing, notes, books and original autographs of the Mæstro. It seems to be more of a museum than a holiday resort. Doctor Berry said that his intention was « to preserve the hamlet of Zuort in its entirety for future generations » . He even had an eccentric sauna built in the personnel house, « Drachenhaus » (Dragon House) , and visitors can sleep overnight in hay beds next door.

Ideal for : People who want to switch-off, who want to experience real and authentic nature and who have no problem sharing a bathroom with their neighbour, because the rooms only have communal showers (and, unfortunately, these don't match the style of the current, successful furnishings) .

Best time to travel : In winter (especially, in February and March) for snow shoe hiking and Skit tours. And because of the marvelous hiking possibilities, the farm is to be also recommended in summer, but especially in autumn, which is reckoned to be Graubünden's loveliest season.

Height : About 1,700 metres above sea level.

Prices : In a double room, about 95 euros per person (from the 2nd night, 80 euros) , the 4 bedroom under the roof is a bit cheaper, but also very small. The « Chasa Melgelberg » can be rented on request.

...

De Chasa Mengelberg is een chalet dat de Nederlandse dirigent Willem Mengelberg (1871-1951) begin 20e eeuw liet bouwen in het bergdal Unterengadin in het kanton Graubünden, Zwitserland. Mengelberg verbleef er vooral tijdens vakanties en ontving er regelmatig (voornaam) gasten. Na diens dood diende het als gastenverblijf. De Chasa met de bijbehorende kapel, boerderij en personeelsverblijf vormen het gehucht Zuort. « Chasa » betekent « huis » in het Reto-Romaans, de lokale taal.

De boerderij Hof Zuort waarnaar het gehucht is vernoemd, wordt voor het eerst genoemd in het jaar 1482 als erfelijk leengoed van het nabij gelegen plaatsje Sent. De wens van de chef-dirigent van het Concertgebouworkest Willem

Mengelberg om zijn eigen huis te bouwen, ontstond in de zomer van 1910. Zoals gebruikelijk verbleef hij in Zwitserland om te kuren en te genieten van de natuur. In dat bewuste jaar bracht hij zijn vakantie door in Val Sinestra, een kuuroord in hetzelfde dal, niet ver van Sent. Tijdens een wandeling in de omgeving kwam Mengelberg terecht in het op 1711 meter boven zeeniveau liggende Zuort. Het stelde niet veel voor ; er stond maar één huis, de boerderij Hof Zuort. Mengelberg was van het gebied rond Val Sinestra en Zuort zó onder de indruk, dat hij zijn vrouw Mathilde (1875-1943) schreef :

Hier is 'n heerlijk oord voor jou !! De baden zijn goddelijk. (...) De bron is (...) juist voor jou geschikt. Een van de aller beste bronnen, die er op de heele wereld te vinden zijn voor zenuw zwakke of enigszins afgetobde mensen. ik geloof dat voor jou dit bad in (de) toekomst - je badplaats zal zijn. Daarbij de heerlijke frissche lucht, en de wandelwegen in de bosschen, ook naar Zuort - heel gewoon - niets bergbeklimmer achtigs, maar voor elke oude tante - zooals jij - gemakkelijk te bewandelen.

De wens van Mengelberg kwam uit. In 1911 werd begonnen met de bouw van zijn Chasa, dat hij zelf ontworpen had. Die vaardigheid had hij overgehouden aan de opleiding die zijn vader, de kunstenaar Friedrich Wilhelm (1837-1919) hem in zijn atelier had gegeven. Zijn vader ontwierp en bouwde onder andere enkele onderdelen van de Keulse Dom.

In etappes werd de Chasa gebouwd. Pas in 1922 kwam de Chasa in zijn huidige omvang gereed. In het eerste jaar begon men de bouwwerkzaamheden met de benedenverdieping en de kelder. In 1912 kwam er een verdieping bij met de gastenkamers. Vanaf 1914 was die gereed om gasten te kunnen ontvangen. In de winter van 1915-1916 kwam Mengelbergs eigen verdieping er nog bovenop. Daar had hij zijn eigen slaapkamer, een klein balkonnetje en een eigen badkamer met ligbad. In de jaren tot 1922 volgden nog enkele kleine toevoegingen waaronder een kleine kapel die Mengelberg in de jaren 1920-1924 heeft laten bouwen uit dankbaarheid voor het feit dat zowel Nederland als Zwitserland van de Eerste Wereldoorlog verschoond was gebleven. Het carillon van de kapel werd dagelijks bespeeld. Daarbij werd - hoog in de Zwitserse bergen - ook regelmatig het Wilhelmus ten gehore gebracht. Pas vele jaren later, in 1986, zou de Chasa aangesloten worden op het lichtnet.

In de zomermaanden verbleef Mengelberg in de Chasa. Vele beroemde bezoekers waren er te gast, onder wie Richard Strauß, Pierre Monteux, Fritz Kreisler, Frederick Steinway (een zoon van de pianobouwer Steinway) en de zangeressen Ilona Durigo en Aaltje Noordewier-Reddingius. Minister van Buitenlandse Zaken Herman van Karnebeek en kamerheer Willem F. Röell brachten eveneens een bezoek aan de Chasa, net als prins Hendrik der Nederlanden.

Willem Mengelberg overleed hier op 21 maart 1951, een week voor zijn 80e verjaardag. Kort daarop zou een eind zijn gekomen aan het dirigeerverbod dat hem na de zuivering was opgelegd.

Voordat Mengelberg stierf had hij de toekomst van de Chasa al verzekerd. Hij had de nadrukkelijke wens dat de Chasa na zijn dood een zomerverblijf voor Musiker aller Welt zou worden. De Zwitserse Chasa Mengelberg Stiftung werd verantwoordelijk voor het onderhoud van de huis. De Nederlandse Chasa Mengelberg Stichting kreeg de opdracht de zorg voor het gastenverblijf op zich te nemen. Tot en met 2003 bleef het gastenverblijf in stand, mede dankzij twee gepensioneerde musici van het Concertgebouworkest : tot 1983 de eerste violiste Elly Bijsterus Heemskerk (1889-1987) en daarna de hoornist Adriaan van Woudenberg (1925) .

In 2010 verkocht de Stiftung om financiële redenen de Chasa en alle bijbehorende gebouwen aan dr. Peter R. Berry te Sankt Moritz. Deze voormalige arts verklaarde in februari 2010 nauwe contacten te willen onderhouden met de Willem Mengelberg Stiftung. Tevens is hij voornemens gezamenlijk culturele projecten op te zetten in Unterengadin. De nieuwe eigenaar gaf ook aan dat hij de bijbehorende historische boerderij Hof Zuort waarin ook een pension en een « Stube » zijn gevestigd, als zodanig wil blijven exploiteren. Het is ook zijn bedoeling dat de Chasa en de bijgebouwen betekenis zullen houden in culturele zin en ook als gastenverblijf. De verkoop werd ondersteund door de gemeenten Sent en Ramosch. In de zomer van 2010 heeft de dirigent Riccardo Chailly voor het eerst een bezoek gebracht aan de Chasa.

In Nederland wordt de herinnering aan Willem Mengelberg levend gehouden door de Willem Mengelberg Vereniging.

En 1945, Spruit fonde l'Orchestre de chambre de la principauté d'Utrecht et donne de nombreux concerts pour la radio nationale. La même année, il devient chef principal de l'Orchestre municipal d'Utrecht (1945-1949) .

Le 1er janvier 1948, il est nommé directeur musical de l' « Omroep Orkest » d'Hilversum de même que de l'Ensemble à cordes hollandais.

Outre l' « Omroeporkest » (1948-1971), Spruit a dirigé l'Orchestre de la radiodiffusion (un ensemble composé de jeunes musiciens), fondée en 1960 par Pieter Hellendaal.

Hendrik Willem Christiaan (Henk) Spruit (Utrecht, 19 februari 1906 - De Bilt, 6 januari 1998) was een Nederlands dirigent.

Henk Spruit studeerde viool aan het conservatorium in Utrecht bij Gerard Veerman en Hendrik Rijnbergen. Op 22-jarige leeftijd werd hij directeur van de muziekschool in Harderwijk. In 1933 werd hij 1e violist bij het Utrechts Stedelijk Orkest (U.S.O.). Een jaar later volgde zijn benoeming als docent viool, altviool en pedagogie aan het conservatorium in Utrecht. Hij werd daarnaast dirigent van het conservatoriumorkest.

In 1945 richtte hij het Stichts Kamerorkest op, dat vele concerten voor de radio gaf. In hetzelfde jaar werd hij ook dirigent bij het U.S.O.

Op 1 januari 1948 kwam Henk Spruit in dienst van de toenmalige NRU als dirigent van het Omroep Orkest. In 1971 ging Henk Spruit met pensioen. Bij zijn afscheid werd zijn veelzijdigheid geroemd. « U hebt de NOS een melodieuze, een welluidende klank verleend », aldus programmacommissaris radio, de heer Wagenaar, in zijn afscheidsrede.

In een interview met de Gooi- en Eemlander van 15 maart 1971 zei hij over de 22 jaar bij het Omroep Orkest :

« Ik heb de hele ontwikkeling van het orkest meegemaakt. Het vormt nu een gesloten harmonisch geheel en voordat een orkest zo ver is gaan er heel wat jaren overheen. En al die tijd, dat ik voor het orkest heb gestaan is er nooit een onvertogen woord gevallen ; de samenwerking tussen ons was niet gebaseerd op 'n Pruisische bevel- en gehoorzaam-mentaliteit, maar op doodgewone menselijke verhoudingen. »

Het was voor hem een fijne tijd en een fijn orkest. Maar ook een tijd van ontzettend hard werken, van honderd concerten per jaar geven.

Naast het Omroep Orkest dirigeerde hij het in 1960 gevormde Kamerorkest Pieter Hellendaal, een ensemble voor jonge omroepmusici.

Hoogtepunten uit zijn carrière zijn voor Henk Spruit de uitvoeringen van de « Missa solemnis » van Ludwig van Beethoven ; « Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher » van Arthur Honegger ; de « Missa Glagolská » van Leoš Janáček (met het Groot Omroepkoor) ; « The dream of Gerontius » van Edward Elgar ; en « La Damnation de Faust » van Hector Berlioz.

Hij heeft ook veel werken van Nederlandse componisten gedirigeerd. Voor een groot deel waren dat eerste uitvoeringen. Na aan het hart lagen hem de werken van Oscar van Hemel, Alphons Diepenbrock en Henk Badings. Diens radiofonische opera Orestes, in opdracht van de NRU en opgenomen onder leiding van Henk Spruit, won in 1954 de Prix Italia en werd door een groot aantal Amerikaanse radiostations uitgezonden.

« Fürtwängler, comme Eugen Jochum, est le chef idéal pour aborder Bruckner. En même temps, par les dimensions mystiques qu'il dévoie, il nous en donne infiniment plus que beaucoup d'autres. Dans les moments d'exception (9e ou 5e de guerre) , la flamme se transforme en véritable furia, bourrasque musicale qui emporte tout sur son passage. Ce climat baigne (presque) la 7e Symphonie, dont les climax de l' « Adagio » et du « Finale » (oyez l'aplomb de la ponctuation) atteignent une tension extraordinaire, et dont la gradation du 4 « Scherzo » balaye toute la concurrence. Le coffret « DG » couplant la 7e et la 9e est un « must » absolu de la discothèque furtwänglienne et de la discothèque tout court. Qu'importe quelque rare accroc parmi les cuivre dans la 7e (2e et 4e mouvements) : la vie transcende ces naturels incidents de concert. » (Christophe Huss, Répertoire n° 71 page 30, juillet 1994.)

« Le grand Furt, un des interprètes historiques de Bruckner, est ici à peu près totalement défiguré par une prise de son « historique » que l'éditeur lui-même (Music & Arts) a l'honnêteté de présenter comme insuffisante : distorsions, compressions et chutes dynamiques, timbres délavés et agressifs, bruits de surface, sans compter dans le 1er mouvement à 48 secondes un bruit parasite d'une durée de 2 ou 3 secondes. Il est difficile dans ces conditions d'apprécier le rubato des cordes, la respiration brucknérienne, la noblesse et la grandeur des graduations, les sens prophétique de Furt, ou de se laisser griser par la beauté hymnique de l'Orchestre brucknérien avec sa plénitude sonore (Adagio) . L'Orchestre de Berlin sonne ici de manière très quelconque avec une dominante harmonique sur les violons et aussi quelques « pains » étonnants (par exemple en IV, à 7 min 28) , ce qui donne de cette magnifique Symphonie une image à la fois dynamiquement rétrécie et harmoniquement déséquilibrée. L'originalité et le génie brucknériens de Furt ne peuvent ainsi qu'être irrémédiablement compromis par un tel appauvrissement du spectre. » (Jean-Marie Brohm, Répertoire n° 47, page 35, mai 1992.)

Vivant dans un certain dénuement, Arnold Schœnberg continue d'enseigner jusqu'à sa mort. C'est à des mécènes comme Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge et à des musiciens comme Leopold Stokowski, le pianiste Eduard Steuermann ou encore le violoniste et beau-frère du compositeur Rudolf Kolisch que nous devons les commandes de la plupart de ses œuvres de la période américaine.

Bien qu'installé à seulement quelques pâtés de maisons de Igor Stravinsky, Schœnberg, qui le détestait car il le jugeait futile, refusait obstinément de le voir ou même d'entendre parler de lui. Stravinsky le lui rendait bien, mais ne s'opposa plus à ses théories après sa mort, et sut lui rendre hommage.

Vendredi, 13 juillet 1951 : Death of Arnold Schönberg, shortly before midnight.

Schönberg had stayed in bed all day, sick, anxious and depressed. His wife Gertrud reported in a telegram to her sister-in-law Otilie, the next day, that Arnold died at 11:45 pm, 15 minutes before midnight.

In a letter to Otilie, dated 4 August 1951, Gertrud explained :

« About a quarter to 12, I looked at the clock and said to myself : another quarter of an hour and, then, the worst is over. Then, the doctor called me. Arnold's throat rattled twice, his heart gave a powerful beat and that was the end. »

Arnold Schönberg's superstitious nature may have triggered his death. The composer had triskaidekaphobia (the fear of the number 13) and, according to friend Katia Mann, he feared he would die during a year that was a multiple of 13. He dreaded his 65th birthday, in 1939, so much that a friend asked the composer and astrologer Dane Rudhyar to prepare Schönberg's horoscope. Rudhyar did this and told Schönberg that the year was dangerous, but not fatal.

But, in 1950, on his 76th birthday, an astrologer wrote Schönberg a note warning him that the year was a critical one : $7 + 6 = 13$. This stunned and depressed the composer, for up to that point he had only been wary of multiples of 13 and never considered adding the digits of his age.

Schönberg's ashes were later interred at the « Zentralfriedhof » in Vienna, on 6 June 1974.

On his part, Erich Wolfgang Korngold dies in 1957. Pierre Boulez's notorious obituary, entitled « Schönberg est mort » (Schönberg is dead) , heralds an era from the 1950's to 1980's, centered mainly in Paris and New York but affecting academic musical circles all over the world, during which Anton Webern is the most admired of modern composers. Boulez's « le Marteau sans Maître » (The Hammer without a Master) is widely considered to be one culmination of this movement.

Le concert public est enregistré par la « ORF » (étiquette « EMI » , CDM 565750-2) .

20 août 1951 : Conférence de Fürtwängler au Festival, intitulée : « Nous et Beethoven » .

4-5 octobre 1951 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la version originale de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise de Munich. Il s'agit du 1er concert de la saison, donné à la « Große Aula » de l'Université de Munich (« Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität ») .

7 au 14 octobre 1951 : Concerts à Salzbourg de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radiodiffusion bavaroise de Munich avec son chef Eugen Jochum.

Tournée de la Philharmonie de Vienne

14 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Hambourg.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : l'Ouverture du « Freischütz » de Weber ; et la Symphonie n° 1 de Schumann.

17 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Wuppertal.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : l'Ouverture du « Freischütz » de Weber ; et la « Rapsodie espagnole » de Ravel.

18 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Düsseldorf.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : la 4e Symphonie de Brahms.

Le 18 octobre, le directeur du « Metropolitan Opera » de New York, Rudolf Bing, écrit à Fürtwängler, lui demandant d'inaugurer la saison 1952 par une nouvelle production de « Lohengrin » avec un autre Opéra de son choix ; comme « Tristan und Isolde » ou les « Maîtres-chanteurs » . Pendant cette tournée avec la Philharmonie de Berlin, Fürtwängler apprend que Arturo Toscanini s'objecte à sa venue de toutes les façons possibles. Ainsi, une fois de plus, son souhait de faire une tournée américaine avec son Orchestre s'évanouit.

19 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Wiesbaden.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : la Symphonie n° 88 de Haydn ; et la « Rhapsodie espagnole » de Ravel.

21 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Frankfurt-am-Main.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : la 4e Symphonie de Brahms.

22 octobre 1951 : (Arrêt à Stuttgart.) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Ferdinand Löwe (1888) , éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec le Philharmonique de Vienne. Au même programme : la Symphonie n° 88 de Haydn ; et la « Rhapsodie espagnole » de Ravel.

Furtwängler habitually used the « Schalk-Löwe » edition but, as noted by « Music & Arts », the Maestro refers to the 1888 « Gutmann » version, for this concert.

Astounding (and virtually cough-free !) sound quality in this XR remaster.

My main aims with this recording were 2 fold. 1st and foremost : the sound, although clear for its age, suffered from quite a hard « edge » and, as a result, a certain flatness or lack of dimension. I suspected rightly that this would be alleviated by XR remastering as it would almost certainly have been caused by an uneven frequency response in the recording equipment (most probably the microphone) rather than any shortcomings in the tape medium itself. Thus, by correcting the frequency response as a part of the XR process, I was able to solve this hardness, as well as extending the previously-constricted bottom end of the recording. The effect is to open-out the whole recording and give a real sense of air and space around the instruments, something further experienced in our Ambient Stereo version.

The 2nd issue anyone listening to this recording would surely have with it in its original form would be the almost constant intrusion from audience coughs and other noises. It seemed the good people of Stuttgart were having a particularly bronchial evening during this concert, especially during the quieter sections, and I've worked hard to either eliminate completely or reduce considerably hundreds of these unwanted interruptions. Unfortunately, not all could be excised without risking damage to the musical content - thus, you will not hear a completely cough-free performance, but, certainly, a much quieter audience than was actually the case on the night in question.

The Stuttgart 4th performance given by the Vienna Philharmonic, on 21 October 1951. As a performance, it is possibly superior to the in any case less well-recorded one in Munich, which was given a week later. The Munich performance is not quite as responsive or as well-played even though the immensity of the transitions will compel interest either pro or contra. The audience is rather restive especially, of course, in the slow movement in Munich. But, in Stuttgart, the audience was quieter and the orchestral sound stage was more immediate ; the performance, therefore, blazes with an extra-intensity. Furtwängler habitually used the « Schalk-Löwe » edition but, as noted by Music & Arts, it as the 1888 « Gutmann » version.

Le « Deutsches Museum » de Munich

Le « Deutsches Museum » de Munich est l'un des plus grands musées des sciences et de la technique au monde. Son bâtiment principal se situe à Munich, sur une île de l'Isar.

Il a été créé le 28 juin 1903 lors d'une conférence de la « Verein Deutscher Ingenieure » à l'initiative d'Oskar von Miller. Son bâtiment a été construit par Gabriel von Seidl et, après sa mort, par son frère Emmanuel. Il a été terminé en 1925.

The « Deutsches Museum » in Munich is the world's largest museum of science and technology. It was founded on June 28, 1903, at a meeting of the Association of German Engineers (« Verein Deutscher Ingenieure ») as an initiative of Oskar von Miller. Its official name is « Deutsches Museum von Meisterwerken der Naturwissenschaft und Technik » (German Museum of Masterpieces of Science and Technology) . It is the largest museum in Munich.

The main site of the Deutsches Museum is a small island in the Isar river, which had been used for rafting wood since the Middle-Ages. The island did not have any buildings before 1772 because it was regularly flooded prior to the building of the « Sylvensteinspeicher » .

In 1772, the Isar barracks were built on the island and, after the flooding of 1899, the buildings were rebuilt with flood protection. In 1903, the City council announced that they would donate the island for the newly built « Deutsches Museum » . The island formerly known as « Kohleninsel » (Coal island) was, then, renamed : « Museumsinsel » (Museum island) .

Oskar von Miller studied electrical engineering and is, otherwise, known for building the 1st high-voltage line from Miesbach to Munich (57 kilometers) , in 1882, for the electrical technology exhibition at the « Glaspalast » , in Munich. In 1883, he joined AEG and founded an engineering office in Munich. The Frankfurt electricity exhibition, in 1891, and several power plants contributed to the reputation of Oskar von Miller. In the early years, the exhibition and the collection of the « Deutsches Museum » were strongly influenced personally by Oskar von Miller.

A few months before the 1903 meeting of the Society of German Engineers, Oskar von Miller gathered a small group who supported his desire to found a science and technology museum. In a showing of support, this group spontaneously donated 260,000 Marks to the cause and elected a « Provisional Committee » to get the ball rolling.

In June 1903, Prince Ludwig agreed to act as patron of the museum and the city of Munich donated Coal Island as a site for the project. In addition, exhibits began to arrive from Munich and abroad, including collections from the Bavarian Academy. As no dedicated museum building existed, the exhibits were displayed in the National Museum.

On November 12, 1906, the temporary exhibits at the National Museum are ceremonially opened to the public and, on November 13, the foundation stone was laid for the permanent museum.

The 1st name of the museum, the « German Museum for Masterpieces of Natural Science and Technology », was not meant to limit the museum to German advances in science and technology, but to express the importance of science and technology to the German people.

Oskar von Miller opened the new museum on his 70th birthday, on 2 May 1925, after a delay of almost 10 years. From the beginning, the museum displays are backed-up by documents available in a public library and archives, which are open 7 days a week to ensure access to the working public.

Before and during World War II, the museum was put on a shoe-string budget by the Nazi Party and many exhibits were allowed to get-out of date with a few exceptions such as the new automobile room dedicated on 7 May 1937. By the end of 1944, the museum was badly damaged by air bombings with 80 % of the buildings and 20 % of the exhibits damaged or destroyed. As Allied troops marched into Munich, in April 1945, museum director Karl Bässler barely managed to keep the last standing bridge to Museum Island from being blown-up by retreating German troops.

Following the War, the museum had to be closed for repairs and temporary tenants, such as the College of Technology and the Post-Office used museum space as their own buildings were being reconstructed. The Museum was also home to the Central Committee of the Liberated Jews, representing Jewish displaced persons in the American Zone of Germany, after the War.

In November 1945, the library was able to re-open, followed by the congress hall, in January 1946. A special exhibit on 50 years of the Diesel engine was able to open in October 1947 and the regular exhibits began re-opening in May 1948. Not until 1965, more than 20 years after the end of the War in Germany, did the exhibit area match (and, then, exceed) pre-War size.

Édition complète des Symphonies (1951)

After the end of the War, the « MWV » (« Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag ») , « IBG » (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») and « Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Bruckner Gesamtausgabe ») returned to Austria. In 1951, Leopold Nowak, now General Editor, brought out the 1st volume of the « New Bruckner Complete Edition » (« Neue Bruckner Gesamtausgabe »), a corrected reprint of Alfred Orel's edition of the 9th Symphony. In the 1st instance, Nowak devoted himself to revising the scores which had been edited before 1945, incorporating newly-discovered sources and eliminating printing errors. It soon became clear that Nowak's veritably philological faithfulness to the musical texts bequeathed by Bruckner to posterity (repeatedly revised by the composer, it must be remembered) was quite incompatible with Haas's attempts to produce a kind of « ideal version » of the 2nd and the 8th by mixing the composer's versions. True to his principles, Nowak published the Symphony No. 8 in its 2 quite decisively different versions in 2 separate volumes and, furthermore, published a revised Symphony No. 7 in full accordance with the « last will and testament » autograph, replacing the earlier edition in which Haas had decided to ignore the amendments Bruckner had effected by sticking new music in over the old, or by erasing the old with a razor-blade.

Frederick Charles Adler

The English-German conductor Frederick Charles Adler (usually known as F. Charles Adler) was born on 2 July 1889 in London and died 16 February 1959 in Vienna.

Adler studied with Gustav Mahler and served as chorus Master at the premiere of Mahler's 8th Symphony. He was held at Ruhleben internment camp during World War I. He worked as a conductor in Germany, in the 1920's, and emigrated to the United States, in 1933. He made many recordings of the works of Gustav Mahler and Anton Bruckner. He made the 1st commercial recordings of Mahler's 3rd and 6th Symphonies. His recordings of Bruckner Symphonies are unusual in that they use the 1st published editions rather than the later critical editions. (Hans Knappertsbusch was the only other major conductor to stick with the 1st editions consistently.) His recording of Bruckner's 6th Symphony is, as of 2006, the only recording ever made of the 1899 1st published edition. His recording of Bruckner's 9th Symphony is one of only 2 available to use the 1st edition prepared by Ferdinand Löwe, in 1903, following Bruckner's death on October 1896.

Adler also promoted much modern music, both in the « SPA » Music Festival he led in Saratoga Springs, N.Y. , and for various record labels (including « SPA » , « Unicorn » , and « CRI ») . Adler's recordings were made in Vienna, mostly with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra under a variety of pseudonyms for contractual reasons (e.g. , Vienna Philharmonia Orchestra, Vienna Orchestra, Vienna Konzertverein) .

Whether or not intended as the climax of this year's Aldeburgh Festival, this performance of Charles Ives's fabled Universe Symphony made for an impressive rounding off of what, even by the standard of this event over the past 25 years, was a varied and imaginative programme which said much for the artistic directorship of Pierre-Laurent Aimard.

As with that other mythical product of its composer's late maturity, Scriabin's Mysterium, the Universe Symphony has suffered from a perception that Ives was only half-serious about its completion - not least as the very concept appeared to change during its gestation (roughly 1915 to 1928) towards a utopian undertaking well in advance even of such ambitious works as the 4th Symphony; a perception abetted, moreover, by Ives's oft-quoted and equally misunderstood remark that others might like to try finishing off what he had already started. Others have indeed taken up the challenge - that by Larry Austin having been heard in Europe (not least a memorable hearing at the Warsaw Autumn Festival in 1995), while that by Johnny Reinhardt garnered much attention at a New York performance in 1996. Compared, however, to the former's essentially original composition or the latter's overbearing microtone fest, the realisation by David G. Porter follows almost entirely the sketches as Ives left them and is thus the most inherently and audibly Ivesian in consequence.

Having earlier made realisations of both the Emerson Concerto and (in collaboration with Nors S. Josephson) the 3rd Orchestral Set - the latter given its belated public première by the Ealing Symphony just last year - Porter was ideally placed to do likewise with the Universe Symphony, though he has focussed only on those sections which are intact in the composer's sketches (much as are the 1st and 3rd movements of Mahler's 10th Symphony).

Hence his edition opens with the 1st Prelude for 20 percussionists - its palindromic cycle of increasing then decreasing complexity being heard twice in (subtly altered) succession, followed by the entire Section A (representing Past: Formation of the Waters and Mountains) then the coda to Section C (representing Future: Heaven, the Rise of All to the Spiritual) which had been the intended conclusion to the piece.

The outcome, while playing for barely 30 minutes, is a powerful affirmation of Ives's underlying convictions - the 1st Prelude building on the percussive continuum hitherto explored in the finale of the 4th Symphony as intensively as Section A builds on that work's 2nd movement in a kaleidoscopic interplay of orchestral textures dominated by the elemental sound of brass, before the coda to Section C provides an ideal conclusion (given the curtailed context) with its hieratic chorale on woodwind and strings which seems to tail off into the infinite.

Even in this truncated form, the majesty of Ives's conception and the sheer quality of his music came through unabated - a tribute to the dedication with which James Sinclair had prepared this sizable amalgamation of students so that little was left to chance. A pity that erratic weather conditions meant the percussion Prelude was not able to be performed outside as intended, yet its impact indoors proved commensurate with the piece as a whole. Porter's recent and untimely death likely means that a realisation of the whole work along these lines is unlikely, though what remains should hopefully be set down by Sinclair as part of his ongoing project (for Naxos) to record Ives's orchestral output in the latest critical editions.

If and when he does, the 2nd Symphony could prove an ideal coupling. Conceived at the turn of the last century, but probably put into its present shape between 1907 and 1909 (the Ives chronology being scarcely less intractable than that of Johann Sebastian Bach), its combining of American folk and popular melodies within a European symphonic ethos has made it the most directly appealing among Ives's larger works and this account had its measure. Nominally in 5 movements, the 1st and 4th are essentially slow introductions to those that follow : Sinclair gave them with a seriousness which was never portentous, while the 2nd movement was finely shaped and awkward transitions skilfully negotiated. The Adagio, one of the finest such movements after Brahms, exuded real pathos and Sinclair was mindful that the high spirits of the finale were kept in check until the uproarious coda, in which not even the tendency to muddiness of the Maltings acoustic could offset an irresistible surge through to the explosive final dischord.

Frederick Charles Adler's mother was a pupil of Franz Liszt, and his father a banker. From the former, he inherited a love of music and, from the latter, a strong entrepreneurial streak. His father initially wanted Adler to enter commerce, but he resisted this idea, and secured tuition from the Royal Academy of Music in Munich, where he was taught by Felix Mottl ; he was also a private pupil of Gustav Mahler in Vienna, between 1908 and 1911. Adler was sent by his father to South America to further his commercial career but instead he secured a post with the State Opera in Mexico City. Subsequently, he was active internationally as a conductor of Opera, touring extensively with artists such as Caruso, as well as holding permanent appointments at the Opera Houses of Düsseldorf and Ljubljana, and working as an assistant at the Bayreuth Festival. Undoubtedly a high-point in his early career was when he acted as chorus Master at the 1st performance of the Symphony No. 8 of Mahler, conducted by the composer in Munich, in 1910 ; an event of major importance. In 1913, he substituted for Ferdinand Löwe at the Queen's Hall in London, conducting Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner.

After World War I, during which he was interned, Adler was extremely active, conducting regularly in Berlin, Hamburg and Munich, as well as touring extensively and working in the then new medium of radio. Between 1924 and 1931, he was head of serious music broadcasting for German State Radio, based in Berlin. He created a publishing company, « Adler-Berlin », notable for its promotion of contemporary American composers. In 1933, he left Germany for New York, where he gradually re-established his career, principally through music publishing. With the advent of the long-playing record after World War II, Adler and his wife co-founded with Norman Fox the « SPA » record label that became known for its pioneering catalogue. After « SPA » stopped producing new recordings, in 1954, Adler went on to record for another short-lived label, « Unicorn » Records of Boston, as well as for other labels such as « CRI », « Vanguard » and « VOX ». Once again, the repertoire with which he was associated was highly-eclectic. « SPA » published many 1st recordings, including the Piano Concerto of Artur Schnabel and the Symphony No. 2 of Charles Ives. Also of note were Adler's recordings of the Symphonies Nos 1, 3 and 9 of Anton Bruckner. Among the most distinguished recordings on this label were Adler's readings of the Symphonies Nos. 3 and 6 by his mentor Gustav Mahler. The Symphony No. 3, in particular, achieved a grandeur that has eluded many subsequent recordings. Adler was a significant musical pioneer, if not a conductor of the 1st rank.

Entre le 4 mars 1952 et 1954 : Le chef Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (pseudonyme : Gerd Rubahn) dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1878, éditée par Fritz Öser (1950) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (étiquette « Royale » , LP : 1597) .

À l'époque où les chefs enregistraient en exclusivité pour une firme, les disques « Allegro Royale » réalisèrent un certain nombre de disques « pirates » signés sous des noms d'emprunt.

Gerd Rubahn n'a jamais existé. La majorité des spécialistes attribuent cette 3e de Bruckner à Leopold Ludwig bien que John (Frederick Berky) semble en douter.

Ces fausses attributions sont des épices dont se délectent les collectionneurs. Manie d'autant plus innocente que contrairement aux timbres erronés, le prix de ces vinyles demeure dérisoire.

...

Pour ce qui est du disque de la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner, bien que pendant très longtemps, la conviction était que les interprètes en étaient le Philharmonique de Berlin sous la direction de Leopold Ludwig, il semble désormais établi qu'il s'agit de l'Orchestre de la radio de Hambourg sous la direction de Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt.

The Mystery of the « Gerd Rubahn » Symphony No. 3

The history of the commercially recorded Bruckner Symphonies is peppered with instances where the true identity of the performers has been in question. The discography is filled with names such as Henri Adolf, Cesare Cantieri, Jan Tubbs, etc. , who are conductors that no one has even seen. There are also recordings by such ensembles as the South German Philharmonic and the Hastings Symphony that have never given a public concert.

For this article, I am going to focus in on one recording of which it had been thought the true performers had been positively identified, but recent evidence seems to prove otherwise. The recording in question is the « Allegro Royale » LP 1597. The recording was released in 1954 and featured a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3 as performed by Gerd Rubahn and the Berlin Symphony Orchestra. The « Allegro Royale » label was one of the 1st budget LP labels to reach the market after the advent of the LP. It was the creation of Eli Oberstein of the Record Corporation of America (or RCA) but not to be confused with the Radio Corporation of America, the real « RCA ». To keep the production price down, producers of this genre of LP resorted to low royalty recordings or used pseudonyms to cover-up the real performers. Mister Oberstein claimed to have a « Berlin source » for many of his productions. When this 1st LP of the Bruckner 3rd was released, there was a good deal of speculation regarding the real performers on this disc and there was one important clue - the performance on this LP used the newly-published 1878 version of the 3rd Symphony as edited by Fritz Öser.

In an article in the ARSC Journal, Ernst A. Lumpe continues the story :

« Allegro Royale 1597 - One of the few records of “ RCA ” which has been more widely commented on and was thought to capture a live performance with Jascha Horenstein (as suggested by the late Jack Diether) , a conductor who championed the 1878 version. The Orchestra in this performance is clearly one of the “ big ” ones. There was a performance of this version in Germany, some time after its publication, which was carried-out by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, marked expressly in the program as “ premiere of 2nd version from 1878 ”. The event took place in Berlin’s “ Titania-Palast ” on March 2 and 3, 1952, Leopold Ludwig conducting. Apparently, Ludwig and the BPO were the 1st to study and perform the recently published version. Given the “ Berlin contact ” of Oberstein, it is more than likely that this “ Allegro/Royale ” disc has captured one of these performances. An original tape of the live performance no longer exists, probably because “ RIAS Berlin ” had made a studio recording of the work a few days later with the same forces and the same conductor. This tape is extant and could not be inspected for a stylistic comparison with this live version. »

Based on this article, the general conclusion was that the « Allegro Royale » was, indeed, a copy of the 1952 Leopold Ludwig performance with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra.

In recent weeks, I attempted to provide more concrete evidence for this theory. Lumpe certainly had made a strong case for his identification, but the only way to be sure was to listen to the « RIAS » studio recording. Through the cooperation of « Deutschlandradio » (DLR) who maintains the « RIAS » archive, an audition copy of the March 6th, 1952, studio recording in the « Christuskirche, Berlin » was made available in order to make the long-awaited comparison.

The results of this comparison indicated 2 important facts :

1) The LP record was, indeed, a concert performance. While the audience was well-behaved, there are clear indications that an audience is present. The « RIAS » recording had no audience noise. There was not doubt that these were not recordings of the same performance. That finding coincided with Ernst Lumpe’s theory.

2) Further examination, however, indicated that the « Allegro Royale » recording was probably NOT by Ludwig and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. While many elements of the 2 performances are similar, there are some distinct differences that would typically not show-up in a recording made within the week of a concert. Timings alone show the wide variation :

« Allegro Royale » : 21:06 ; 15:50 ; 6:38 ; 14:53.

« Ludwig and BPO » in studio : 19:53 16:42 6:13 13:46

Difference: + 1:09 - 0:52 + 0:25 + 1:07

With Ludwig and the Berliners now out of the running as the performers on the Allegro Royale LP, I began to look to other Öser editions that were performed during this time. Comparisons were made with recordings by Jascha Horenstein (remembering Jack Diether's earlier suggestion) , Rafael Kubelik and Carl Buente, the conductor of the (West) Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra.

Öser Edition Performances of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3 (Timings) ...

Based on these timings, there seemed to be little correlation between any of these performances and the Rubahn recording. The stylistic differences between Ludwig and Rubahn, apart from the timings, were too great. While the Buente timing was fairly close, only one movement was available for comparison and the 1957 performance was the conductor's 1st performance of the Symphony and was, thus, too late to be the source of the « Allegro Royale » recording.

Further, in recent e-mail communications with Misha Horenstein, the cousin of conductor Jascha Horenstein, it has become clear that Horenstein had not been introduced to the Öser Edition until the BBC scheduled his performance with the BBC Symphony Orchestra, on November 9th, 1957. And, at that point, Horenstein had his doubts about the edition.

He wrote to the BBC, on October 25th :

« I do not trust Öser, and his edition is not convincing as far as I am concerned. I would prefer the " old " Rättig edition to the " new " Öser-Edition, " faute de mieux " ; still waiting for the final version. The fact that Öser's edition contains 100 bars more in the Finale does not necessarily mean that Bruckner wanted them included. The bars missing in the Rättig edition could NOT have been excluded without Bruckner's consent ! Therefore, I prefer an edition Bruckner has used himself, has known and accepted, Mahler has used for his piano-score, to one of a " Herr " Öser ! »

Eventually, the BBC recruited Robert Simpson to convince Horenstein to use the Öser-Edition, but it is certain that Horenstein was not conducting the Öser-Edition prior to the 1954 LP release.

Additional research has shown that several conductors were performing the Öser-Edition in the 1960's and could have performed it earlier. In addition to those mentioned above, they include : Klaus Bernbacher, Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, Lovro von Matačić and Harry Newstone.

In spite of the differences in timing, this author is beginning to lean towards the probability that Rafael Kubelik was the conductor. There are several stylistic similarities, most notably the use of extra-percussion and the fact that Kubelik was actively touring with the Symphony as early as January 28th, 1954, when the performance with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra was recorded.

So, as of this writing, the mystery still lingers ...

« Allegro Royale No. 1597 - One of the few records of “ RCA ” which has been more widely commented on and was thought to capture a live performance with Jascha Horenstein (as suggested by the late Jack Diether) , a conductor who championed the 1878 version. The Orchestra in this performance is clearly one of the “ big ” ones. There was a performance of this version in Germany some time after its publication which was carried-out by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, marked expressly in the program as “ premiere of 2nd version from 1878 ”. The event took place in Berlin’s “ Titania-Palast ”, on March 2 and 3, 1952, Leopold Ludwig conducting. Apparently, Ludwig and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra were the 1st to study and perform the recently published version. Given the “ Berlin contact ” of Oberstein it is more than likely that this “ Allegro / Royale ” disc has captured one of these performances. An original tape of the live performance no longer exists, probably because “ RIAS Berlin ” had made a studio recording of the work a few days later with the same forces and the same conductor. This tape is extant and could not be inspected for a stylistic comparison with this live version. »

Based on this article, the general conclusion was that the « Allegro Royale » LP was indeed a copy of the 1952 Leopold Ludwig performance with the Berlin Philharmonic.

Given this information, I attempted to provide more concrete evidence for this theory. Lumpe certainly had made a strong case for his identification, but the only way to be sure was to listen to the « RIAS » studio recording. Through the cooperation of « Deutschlandradio » who maintains the « RIAS » archive, an audition copy of the March 6, 1952, studio recording in the « Christuskirche » , in Berlin, was made available in order to make the long-awaited comparison. The results of this comparison indicated 2 important facts :

The LP record was indeed a concert performance. While the audience was well behaved, there are clear indications that an audience is present. The « RIAS » recording had no audience noise. There was not doubt that these were not recordings of the same performance. That finding coincided with Ernst Lumpe's theory.

Further examination, however, indicated that the « Allegro Royale » recording was probably NOT by Leopold Ludwig and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. While many elements of the 2 performances are similar, there are some distinct differences that would typically not show-up in a recording made within the week of a concert. Timings alone show the wide variation :

« Allegro Royale » : 21 min 06 ; 15 min 50 ; 6 min 38 ; 14 min 53.

« Ludwig / BPO » Studio : 19 min 53 ; 16 min 42 ; 6 min 13 ; 13 min 46.

Difference : + 1 min 09 ; 0 min 52 ; 0 min 25 ; 1 min 07.

With « Ludwig / BPO » now out of the running as the performers on the « Allegro Royale » LP, I began to look to other Fritz Öser editions of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3 that were performed during this time. Comparisons were made with recordings by Jascha Horenstein (remembering Jack Diether's earlier suggestion) , Rafael Kubelik and Carl August Bunte, the conductor of the West-Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra.

Based on these timings, there seemed to be little correlation between any of these performances and the Rubahn recording. The stylistic differences between Ludwig and Rubahn, apart from the timings, were too great. While the Bunte timing was fairly close, only one movement was available for comparison and the 1957 performance was the conductor's 1st performance of the Symphony and was thus too late to be the source of the « Allegro Royale » recording.

Further, in recent e-mail communications with Misha Horenstein, the cousin of conductor Jascha Horenstein, it has become clear that Horenstein had not been introduced to the Öser Edition until the « BBC » scheduled his performance with the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra, on 9 November 1957. And, at that point, Horenstein had his doubts about the edition. He wrote to the « BBC », on October 25th :

« I do not trust Öser, and his edition is not convincing as far as I am concerned. I would prefer the “ old ” Rättig edition to the “ new ” Öser edition, faute de mieux ; still waiting for the final version. The fact that Öser’s edition contains 100 bars more in the Finale does not necessarily mean that Bruckner wanted them included. The bars missing in the Rättig edition could NOT have been excluded without Bruckner’s consent ! Therefore, I prefer an edition Bruckner has used himself, has known and accepted, Mahler has used for his piano score, to one of a Herr Öser ! »

Eventually, the « BBC » recruited Robert Simpson to convince Horenstein to use the Öser Edition, but it is certain that Horenstein was not conducting the Öser Edition prior to the 1954 LP release.

Additional research has shown that several conductors were performing the Öser Edition in the 1960’s and could have performed it earlier. In addition to those mentioned above, they include : Klaus Bernbacher, Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt, Lovro von Matačić and Harry Newstone.

In spite of many attempts to obtain copies of earlier performances of the 1878 Öser Edition of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3, no other recordings showed-up and information requests regarding performances by other conductors during this time were running into dead ends. One recording (from December 1966) did arrive, but since the recording date was 12 years past the release of the « Allegro Royale » LP, no comparisons were made.

But then, some information from Sami-Alexander Habra, in France, made me pull-out the 1966 recording for some comparisons. The similarities are striking :

« Allegro Royale » : 21 min 06 ; 15 min 50 ; 6 min 38 ; 14 min 53.

1966 Recording : 21 min 18 ; 15 min 13 ; 7 min 11 ; 14 min 05.

Difference : - 0 min 12 ; + 0 min 37 ; - 0 min 33 ; + 0 min 48.

In addition to the very similar timings, the overall styles of the 2 performances are extremely close. In many cases, the direct A-B comparison gave the impression that one was listening to the same recording, but in better sound.

This 1966 performance featured Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (1900-1973) conducting the Northwest German Radio Symphony Orchestra, an ensemble that Schmidt-Isserstedt founded in 1945 and served for subsequent years as its music-director. The « Nordwestdeutscher Rundfunk » (NWDR) was established in 1945, at the conclusion of World War II, and continued its operation until December 31, 1955, when it was divided into the North German Radio (« NDR-Hamburg ») and West German Radio (« WDR-Köln ») .

Of course, stylistic similarities and timings are not a clear indication for identification, but then Mister Habra provided more details. Mister Habra served as an assistant for Mæstro Schmidt-Isserstedt and he confirmed that the conductor embraced the new Öser Edition soon after its publication and performed this Symphony in 1952, shortly after the Leopold Ludwig premiere. That performance was recorded by the « NWDR » .

The tape, however, was stolen along with several other recordings from the radio archive and sold to pirate editors, including Eli Oberstein of the Record Corporation of America (« Allegro Royale ») . Eventually, a radio engineer and his wife were implicated in the theft. They were dismissed from their jobs and were imprisoned. In addition to the Bruckner Symphony No. 3, the other recordings that were stolen included a Mozart Piano Concerto, excerpts from « Fidelio » , and the Bach Mass in B minor.

With this information in hand, we can now safely confirm that Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt conducting the Northwest German Radio Symphony Orchestra are the performers on the « Allegro Royale » LP. The performance took place in 1952 soon after the edition's premiere in March of that year.

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt est né le 5 mai 1900 à Berlin et est mort le 28 mai 1973 à Holm-Holstein, près de Hambourg.

Il étudie d'abord la composition avec Franz Schreker au Conservatoire de Berlin.

Il dirige les Opéras de Rostock (1928-1931) , de Darmstadt (1931-1933) , puis de Hambourg (1935-1943) , avant d'être nommé à la tête du prestigieux Opéra de Berlin, en 1944.

En 1945, il crée l'Orchestre symphonique de la « NDR » (Orchestre de la Radio ouest-allemande) qu'il dirige jusqu'en 1971, lors de tournées dans le monde entier. Il dirige également l'Orchestre philharmonique Royal de Stockholm, de 1955 à 1964, tout en dirigeant de nombreux concerts à Covent Garden et à l'Opéra de Bavière.

Spécialiste de la musique Romantique allemande, avec notamment une intégrale raffinée des Concertos pour piano de Beethoven avec Wilhelm Backhaus, il aussi défendu la musique de ses contemporains Béla Bartók, Igor Stravinsky et Paul Hindemith.

Sami Habra raconte Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt

Plus de 30 ans après sa disparition, le chef allemand Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (1900-1973) , le Docteur Jekyll et Mister Hyde de la direction d'orchestre, continue de fasciner les mélomanes connaisseurs. Alternant au fil des interprétations une intense élégance à une fougue débridée, il écoutait de bonne grâce les conseils d'interprétation de Sami Habra, son ami pendant les 12 dernières années de sa vie, et en tenait souvent compte. Rencontre avec ce sujet de Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté Britannique, né en Palestine, que Schmidt-Isserstedt appelait Habra ... von Versailles.

ResMusica : Comment êtes-vous entré dans l'intimité d'une figure telle que Schmidt-Isserstedt, qui est l'incarnation du « Kapellmeister », c'est à dire le chef d'orchestre de grande tradition germanique ?

Sami Habra : Je cherchais à connaître les grands chefs du passé, Arthur Nikisch, Felix Weingartner, ou encore Karl Muck. Schmidt-Isserstedt avait étudié auprès d'eux. À l'issue d'un concert à Paris, en 1961, où il avait dirigé la « Leonore » III, je suis allé dans sa loge. Je connaissais bien ses interprétations notamment par ses superbes 78 tours d'avant-guerre. Beaucoup de gens se pressaient avec leur programme pour obtenir un autographe. Pour ma part, j'avais seulement des questions à poser sur l'enregistrement qu'il avait réalisé de la Symphonie n° 2 de Jean Sibelius. Cela le surprit. Il feignit de ne pas se souvenir de sa conception de cette œuvre, mais il me fit rester, utilisant mon dos comme écritoire pour signer la suite des autographes. Puis, il m'emmena au restaurant avec son fils. Là, je compris qu'il se souvenait parfaitement de son interprétation, mais qu'il n'avait pas souhaité en parler en public ; Sibelius était pour lui un Maître alors que ce compositeur était méconnu en France. 2 semaines plus tard, je suis allé entendre Schmidt-Isserstedt diriger à Hambourg, et puis ensuite, dans d'autres villes. Nous avons poursuivi nos discussions tout au long des 12 années qui suivirent. Je l'aidais dans les préparatifs de ses répétitions, nous analysions ses concerts au restaurant jusqu'à 3 ou 4 heures du matin, il appréciait mon opinion et en tenait compte.

ResMusica : Comment caractérisez-vous le style de Schmidt-Isserstedt ?

Sami Habra : Un style double. Tantôt une élégance et un équilibre fabuleux, ce serait son côté Docteur Jekyll. Tantôt une fougue invraisemblable, ce qui en faisait une sorte de Mister Hyde - ce n'est pas péjoratif ici. Il n'était pas un chef régulier. Il a raconté sur Radio-Hambourg que, parfois, il oubliait de diriger, étant absorbé par l'élaboration d'une de ses compositions. Ceci dit, il ne perdait jamais sa concentration pour une Symphonie de Mozart : il dirigeait la main sur le cœur d'un bout à l'autre, avec sur les lèvres un sourire extasié, et quelques fois avec une petite larme.

ResMusica : Il était compositeur ? Avez-vous eu accès ou entendu ses œuvres ?

Sami Habra : Lorsque j'ai abordé le sujet, il a évacué ma question d'un geste de la main : « Oubliez ça ! ». Pourtant, dans ses interprétations, on sent bien qu'il pénètre la pensée musicale avec la connaissance intime du processus de composition, que seul un compositeur possède.

ResMusica : Vous parliez de Mozart, Sibelius, quelle était l'étendue de son répertoire ?

Sami Habra : Anton Bruckner comptait également parmi ses 3 compositeurs fétiches, mais son répertoire était extrêmement vaste. À l'instar d'Hermann Scherchen, il commandait tout le temps des œuvres contemporaines, à Karlheinz Stockhausen, à Hans Werner Henze, et même Miklos Rosza lui a dédié son Concerto pour violon. Il a assuré la création de « Carmina Burana » de Carl Orff et la première britannique du « Marteau sans Maître » de Boulez à Édimbourg, et de belle façon à mon avis - j'y étais. Il comprenait la musique contemporaine, mais je ne dirais pas qu'il l'aimait. Peu après le concert d'Édimbourg, nous étions tous les 2 à Paris pour la création de « Pli selon pli » par Boulez. À la fin de l'œuvre, la moitié du public huait, et l'autre moitié applaudissait frénétiquement. Pour ma part, je ne savais absolument pas quoi penser.

Je confiai à Schmidt-Isserstedt :

« Je vois des gens qui sont furieux, d'autres qui sont enthousiastes, moi je n'ai rien compris. J'ai l'impression d'être le seul âne dans cette salle. »

Il me confia alors :

« Nous sommes 2. »

ResMusica : Comment sa carrière a-t-elle commencé ?

Sami Habra : Tous les dimanches après-midi, il assistait aux concerts de la Philharmonie de Berlin sous la direction d'Arthur Nikisch. Il ne faisait pas partie de l'orchestre mais se faufilait dans la dernière rangée de violonistes avec son instrument, et apprenait comme ça. Parfois, il jouait ; parfois, il faisait juste semblant. Nikisch l'a remarqué et a accepté de lui donner des leçons. Il estimait qu'il devait tout à Nikisch. Quand Schmidt-Isserstedt ratait un concert, il disait que c'était sa propre faute. Quand il réussissait, il en attribuait le mérite à Nikisch.

ResMusica : Il avait donc une formation de violoniste ?

Sami Habra : Oui, il avait eu comme professeur le grand violoniste Eugène Ysaÿe, comme David Oïstrakh, ce qui vous donne une indication du niveau que Schmidt-Isserstedt avait atteint. Mais il s'effaçait devant Oïstrakh, qu'il révérait. Siegfried Borries, le 1er violon de la Philharmonie de Berlin m'a rapporté cette boutade qui est un hommage à Oïstrakh.

Schmidt-Isserstedt disait :

« Pour être un grand violoniste, il faut remplir 3 conditions. Premièrement, être né à Odessa. Deuxièmement, être juif. Troisièmement, avoir étudié avec Eugène Ysaÿe. Je ne remplis que la 3e condition, donc je ne peux pas être un grand violoniste. »

ResMusica : La Seconde Guerre mondiale a imposé des choix cruciaux aux artistes allemands de cette époque, partir ou rester en Allemagne, s'associer au régime nazi ou lui résister. Où Schmidt-Isserstedt s'est-il situé ?

Sami Habra : Je vais vous raconter une anecdote. Schmidt-Isserstedt avait la gouaille des Berlinoïses. Il boitillait aussi un peu. En 1938, il donnait un concert avec la Philharmonie de Berlin et Josef Goebbels était dans la salle. À l'époque, Goebbels cherchait à évincer Furtwängler, considéré comme peu fiable. Convaincu à la fin du concert qu'il disposait en

Schmidt-Isserstedt d'un remplaçant de talent, Goebbels monta sur la scène pour aller le féliciter. Goebbels était maigre et boitait fortement. Schmidt-Isserstedt comprit immédiatement la portée politique du geste de Goebbels, et se dirigea aussitôt vers lui, en forçant son boitement pour imiter celui de Goebbels. Gros rires dans la salle. Goebbels était furieux. Schmidt-Isserstedt justifia son boitement en expliquant qu'il avait été atteint d'une polio dans son enfance, mais sans convaincre Goebbels bien entendu. Schmidt-Isserstedt quitta alors Berlin pour Hambourg.

ResMusica : Schmidt-Isserstedt a donc continué à diriger dans l'Allemagne nazie ?

Sami Habra : Hambourg était à part en Allemagne. Ainsi, quand Furtwängler dirigea Mendelssohn à Berlin en 1934, soit l'an après l'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler au pouvoir, c'était déjà une véritable provocation, en raison de l'origine juive du compositeur. Schmidt-Isserstedt, lui, a dirigé Mendelssohn tout au long de la Guerre sans être inquiété. Ce qui était impensable à Berlin était possible dans cette ville.

ResMusica : Quelles étaient ses relations avec les chefs de son temps ?

Sami Habra : À Hambourg, ils étaient 4 chefs et amis. Eugen Jochum, Leopold Ludwig, Joseph Keilberth et lui-même. Jochum et Keilberth ne juraient que par Furtwängler, Ludwig que par Schmidt-Isserstedt, et Schmidt-Isserstedt que par Nikisch. Günter Wand, que l'on célèbre aujourd'hui, était alors simple assistant de Schmidt-Isserstedt.

ResMusica : En répétition, quel chef était-il ?

Sami Habra : Les musiciens l'adoraient. Les Berlinoises (la Philharmonie de Berlin), notamment pour son talent ; avec les Viennoises (la Philharmonie de Vienne), il ne perdait pas une occasion de partager avec eux, en pleine répétition, les histoires d'alcôves du moment. Alors vous pensez ... Schmidt-Isserstedt avait beaucoup de succès avec les femmes. Dans sa jeunesse, on le surnommait même le « voyou de Berlin ».

ResMusica : Et sur un plan plus personnel ?

Sami Habra : Comme dans ses interprétations, il alternait l'élégance et cette fameuse gouaille berlinoise. Après un concert où il avait joué avec l'élégance qui le caractérisait, un couple de mes amis est venu le voir. L'homme était plus petit que la femme, et Schmidt-Isserstedt, un peu surpris, a fait une remarque sur ce sujet. Sans se décontenancer, l'homme a répondu avec malice que dans la position horizontale cette différence n'avait pas d'importance. Schmidt-Isserstedt éclata de rire, un rire énorme, guttural, un rire de fumeur d'opium du Caire ! Le couple en fut stupéfié. Ils ne pouvaient pas croire que c'était le même homme qui quelques instants auparavant avait dirigé avec un raffinement suprême.

ResMusica : Peu d'enregistrements sont aujourd'hui disponibles, est-ce parce qu'il a peu enregistré ?

Sami Habra : Il a fait peu d'enregistrements de studios, mais il existe des centaines de bandes de ses concerts à Hambourg. Il a aussi manqué des occasions incroyables, comme un « Parsifal » à Bayreuth que lui avait proposé

Wieland Wagner. Schmidt-Isserstedt déclina l'invitation au motif qu'il avait déjà un engagement avec Glyndebourne. Wieland Wagner insista, et expliqua que cela n'était pas un problème, car les représentations à Bayreuth et à Glyndebourne étaient en alternance ce qui laissait assez de temps à Schmidt-Isserstedt pour après chaque représentation prendre l'avion et préparer la représentation suivante. Schmidt-Isserstedt n'était pas du tout intéressé par ces allers et retours qu'il jugeait frénétiques.

« Vous me prenez pour Karajan ou quoi ? », rétorqua-t-il.

ResMusica : Pour qui souhaite découvrir l'art de Schmidt-Isserstedt, quels disques recommanderiez-vous ou souhaiteriez-vous voir réédités ?

Sami Habra : Dans Beethoven, les Concertos pour piano avec Wilhelm Backhaus (Decca) constituent une référence solidement établie. Son intégrale des Symphonies n'est hélas pas au même niveau, car Decca lui avait imposé des temps de répétition trop courts qui ne lui permettaient pas de réaliser ce qu'il souhaitait. L'exception fut la Symphonie n° 7 qu'il enregistra en dernier. Pour celle-ci, il menaça de ne pas l'enregistrer si on ne lui donnait pas les répétitions nécessaires. Ne pas enregistrer la n° 7, et tout le cycle s'effondrait, alors Decca accepta ses conditions. Il en résulte une version phénoménale. Les Symphonies numéros 1, 2, 4 et 8, qui exigent moins de préparation, se distinguent aussi nettement. Et Schmidt-Isserstedt a pu sauver les 2 premiers mouvements de la 9e, qui sont fabuleux. Il faut connaître également sa « Missa solemnis », dirigée dans un exceptionnel état de grâce (chez Tahra, à ré-éditer) .

ResMusica : Et dans Mozart, dont vous nous parliez tout à l'heure ?

Sami Habra : La Symphonie « Jupiter » donne un bon exemple des différentes facettes de son style. Il la dirige avec amour avec le NDR (chez EMI) , de manière incisive avec le London Symphony Orchestra (Mercury) , et il est shakespearien à Moscou avec le NDR (Melodya) . Et il y a des trésors qui n'ont jamais été édités, comme la Symphonie n° 29.

ResMusica : Connaissez-vous des inédits qu'il faudrait découvrir ?

Sami Habra : Oui, « l'Italienne » de Mendelssohn par exemple. La n° 3 de Bruckner et la n° 2 de Mahler sont de parfaites illustrations du déchaînement dont il pouvait être capable.

ResMusica : Y a-t-il des enregistrements disponibles qui montre le chef dans son style débridé, son côté « Mister Hyde » ?

Sami Habra : Oui, la Symphonie n° 2 de Sibelius avec l'Orchestre de la NDR, en 1953. Elle a plus de fougue que celle la version de 1969 avec le même orchestre (Capitol) qui, elle, a plus de grandeur. Un assistant de Celibidache m'avait dit considérer cette seconde version comme l'archétype de la grande interprétation. Elle est souvent utilisée à la Scala de Milan dans cette optique, pour les concerts symphoniques de l'Orchestre.

ResMusica : Et pour illustrer le Schmidt-Isserstedt « grande manière » ?

Sami Habra : Son interprétation de la Symphonie n° 3 de Brahms (chez Tahra, à ré-éditer) est la meilleure que je connaisse, après celle de Furtwängler. La Symphonie n° 103 de Haydn, que vient d'éditer Tahra est une merveille. Il faut citer de Bruckner les Symphonies n° 4, n° 7 (chez Tahra, à ré-éditer) et n° 9 (Tahra) de Bruckner ; et pour Mahler, les Symphonies numéros 1 et 4 (Dante) - la n° 1 avec la BBC (à éditer) . Un chef comme Mahler a évolué au long de sa vie d'un style excessif vers un style mûri, contrôlé, ce qui est une évolution somme toute logique. Schmidt-Isserstedt, lui, a alterné ces 2 styles tout au long de sa carrière d'artiste.

The German conductor and composer Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt was born on 5 May 1900 in Berlin and died on 28 May 1973 in Holm-Holstein, near Hamburg.

He was a « répétiteur » at the Wuppertal Opera, starting in 1923. He held conducting positions at the Opera Houses of Rostock (1928-1931) and Darmstadt (1931-1933) . He had the post of 1st conductor at the Hamburg State Opera, from 1935 to 1943. In 1944, he was named music-director at the Berlin State Opera.

In 1945, after the end of World War II, the British military authorities invited Schmidt-Isserstedt (who had avoided joining the Nazi Party) to found an Orchestra for the North German Radio, in Hamburg. 6 months later, he assembled the North German Radio Symphony Orchestra and conducted its 1st concert, in November 1945. He was subsequently the Orchestra's first principal conductor. During his years in this role, he became an advocate of music by composers whose music had been outlawed in Germany during the 3rd « Reich » : such as Béla Bartók, Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith. His favourite composer, however, was Mozart, and he made several recordings and gave many notable performances of his works. In particular, his recordings of Mozart's Operas « Idomeneo » and « La finta giardiniera » are greatly admired.

From 1955 to 1964, he was principal conductor also of the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra. He conducted memorable performances of « The Marriage of Figaro » at the Glyndebourne Festival, in 1958, and of « Tristan und Isolde » at The Royal Opera, Covent Garden, in 1962.

He made a well-regarded recording of all the Beethoven Symphonies. In Germany, he was a noted champion of the music of Michaël Tippett.

Schmidt-Isserstedt's own compositions included songs, the Opera « Hassan gewinnt » (Rostock, 1928) , and orchestral works. His son was the British record producer Erik Smith.

In 1937, Schmidt-Isserstedt conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and Georg Kulenkampff in a rendition of Robert Schumann's Violin Concerto in D minor. The original has been restored and re-issued by « Heritage » Records.

In 2002, « Decca » Records issued a box-set of Schmidt-Isserstedt's recordings of all Beethoven's Symphonies, Piano Concertos, some Overtures and his Violin Concerto.

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt is one of those conductors whose work was renowned far more among the ranks of his peers (and of very serious listeners) than among the general Classical audiences of his era. A believer in strict rhythmic precision, transparent orchestral textures, and the avoidance of excessive mannerisms, Schmidt-Isserstedt and his work were loved by fellow musicians and listeners committed enough to seek it out, eclipsed as it often was by his more flamboyant and well-known rivals. It is a measure of his place in the pantheon of early and middle 20th Century conductors that, while only 2 or 3 of his recordings are represented on CDs from major labels, dozens of his performances appear on private collectors labels.

Schmidt-Isserstedt was born in Berlin, in 1900, and studied music in Berlin at the University. Although his interest in music extended into modern and contemporary works, his 1st love was Mozart and he authored a dissertation on the Italian influences in Mozart's early Operas. He conducted in different theatres and also composed music during the earlier part of his career, including several orchestral works, Lieder, chamber pieces, and 1 Opera (« Hassan gewinnt »), which was performed for the 1st time, in 1928. During the 1930's, he began recording regularly, most notably in a series of Concertos with the legendary violin virtuoso Georg Kulenkampff, in which he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic. Schmidt-Isserstedt remained in Germany during the period of the Nazi regime and, in 1935, was appointed principal « Kappelmeister » at the Hamburg State Opera. He became the Opera director at the « Deutsche Oper » in Berlin, in 1943, and the company's general music-director, in 1944.

Schmidt-Isserstedt was among the less-controversial musicians working in Germany during the War, and his work and career continued virtually uninterrupted by the Allied victory and the fall of the Nazi regime, in 1945. He founded the North German Radio (or « NDR ») Symphony Orchestra in Hamburg, during 1945, which he directed until his retirement, in 1971. Schmidt-Isserstedt successfully took the « NDR » Symphony Orchestra on tour in Europe, the Soviet Union, and the United States during the 1950's. He also began recording regularly for the British « Decca / London » label with several different Orchestras, including the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. From 1955 until 1964, he was also the principal conductor of the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic and made appearances as a guest-conductor with more than 100 Orchestras around the world, in all of the world's major cities, and with the Glyndebourne Opera (« The Marriage of Figaro », in 1958) and Covent Garden (« Tristan und Isolde », in 1962). During this period, he was also a fervent advocate for the music of Béla Bartók, Igor Stravinsky, and Paul Hindemith.

Schmidt-Isserstedt was popular throughout Europe and his recordings were usually more easily available there than in the United States, where he was most familiar to a cadre of serious listeners. His Beethoven Symphonic cycle with the Vienna Philharmonic (which featured some of the most consistently fine and inspired playing in the Orchestra's history), however, was readily available in the American catalog for many years and is still highly-regarded. His recording of the Symphony No. 9, in particular, is still singled-out for critical praise. For many years, it was considered one of the 2 or 3 finest available on LP (back in the 1970's, if you found this record in someone's collection, you could be certain that they really knew their stuff and cared about their music) . In the 1990's, the CD version of this performance was chosen by the author of « The Beethoven Companion » as the one through which the interactive computer software operates and lifts its cues. His recordings of the Mozart Operas, most notably « Idomeneo » (his last, released in 1972) and « La finta giardiniera » (recorded in the then extant German translation, as « Die Gartnerin aus Liebe ») remain among the choicest performances of these works.

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt never courted publicity or glory in the way that his contemporaries, such as Wilhelm Furtwängler or younger rivals like Herbert von Karajan, did. As a result, he was never a household name. Working quietly, however, and building an Orchestra and a post-War reputation from the ground up, he ended-up leaving behind a handful of recordings whose worth speaks loudly, even in the digital era, some decades after his death.

As a child, Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt learnt to play the violin, and went on to study at the Berlin High-School for Music and Berlin University, where the subject of his doctoral dissertation was the Italian influence upon instrumentation in Mozart's youthful Operas. As was the case with many other significant figures in 20th Century music, he decided to become a conductor after hearing Arthur Nikisch in concert. He began his musical career as a « répétiteur » at Wuppertal, from 1923 to 1928, where he also played in the Orchestra as a violinist and where his Opera « Hassan gewinnt » received its 1st performance, in 1928. This period was followed by a typical series of appointments as he worked his way up the musical ladder in Germany : conductor at Rostock, from 1928 to 1931, and at Darmstadt, from 1931 to 1933 ; 1st conductor at Hamburg, from 1935 to 1942 ; and, finally, chief conductor at the « Deutsche Oper » , in Berlin, from 1943 to 1944.

Having remained politically neutral throughout the period of the Nazi regime, Schmidt-Isserstedt was invited by Hugh Carlton Greene of the British occupying authorities in Germany (brother of the writer Graham Greene and a future Chairman of the « BBC ») to found the Symphony Orchestra of North German Radio (« NDRSO ») based in Hamburg, and he served as chief conductor of this Orchestra, from 1945 to 1971, when he became its honorary conductor. With the « NDRSO » , Schmidt-Isserstedt toured extensively, visiting England, France, the USSR and the United States. From 1955 to 1964, he was also chief conductor of the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra, and worked extensively as a guest-conductor throughout Europe, appearing with more than 100 different Orchestras : his concerts with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra were major events in Vienna for both the Orchestra and the audience. Schmidt-Isserstedt's British Operatic appearances were regrettably few but most memorable : they included Mozart's « Le nozze di Figaro » at Glyndebourne, in 1958, and Wagner's « Tristan und Isolde » and « Der fliegende Holländer » at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1962 and 1972. In his later years, he also often appeared in London with the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra.

Together with Herbert von Karajan, Otto Klemperer and Hans Rosbaud, Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt was a distinguished representative of the Austro-German reaction against the subjectivity of interpretation epitomised by Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hermann Abendroth. His baton technique was exemplary, always clear in both phrasing and rhythm, with a wide dynamic sweep. His performances were notable for their acute sense of appropriate tempo, lyrical phrasing, rhythmic firmness and sustained tension. A completely dependable musician, he made numerous commercial studio recordings throughout his career and left a notable recorded legacy.

For « Decca », he recorded a complete cycle of the Beethoven Symphonies with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra ; this contained especially fine accounts of the Symphonies Nos. 7 and 9 (Choral) .

For « Mercury », he made notable recordings of Symphonies by Mozart and Schubert with the London Symphony Orchestra and for « Tono » of 2 symphonies by Franz Berwald with the Royal Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra.

Undoubtedly, his richest legacy of recordings lies with the North German Radio Symphony Orchestra : commercially released issues included, for « Decca », excellent accounts of Brahms' Symphony No. 4, Dvořák's Symphony No. 7 and Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5.

More recently, North German Radio has released many radio recordings which include the complete Brahms Symphonies and Piano Concertos with Claudio Arrau, Tchaïkovsky's Symphonies Nos. 4, 5, and 6 « Pathétique », and Dvořák's Symphonies Nos. 8 and 9 « From the New World », as well as works by Igor Stravinsky, Béla Bartók, and Paul Hindemith, for all of whom Schmidt-Isserstedt was a most sympathetic interpreter.

His strengths as an Opera conductor are fully revealed in several post-War radio recordings made in Hamburg : these include Operas by Beethoven (« Fidelio », excerpts) , Verdi (« Aida » and « La forza del destino ») , Wagner (« Tristan und Isolde ») and Mozart (« La finta giardinera » and « Idomeneo ») , all of which admirably amplify his limited commercially made Operatic repertoire, and completely justify the verdict of Ande Anderson, resident producer at Covent Garden during the 1960's and 1970's, that Schmidt-Isserstedt was « the real thing » .

Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt (geboren 5. Mai 1900 in Berlin ; gestorben 28. Mai 1973 in Holm, Kreis Pinneberg) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Der Kaufmannssohn erhielt früh Violin- und Musikunterricht in Berlin, studierte Musikwissenschaft in Berlin, Heidelberg und Münster und wurde 1923 zum Doktor Philosophie promoviert. 1920 bis 1923 war er Kompositionsschüler bei Franz Schreker in Berlin, widmete sich dann jedoch dem Dirigieren. 1928 bis 1931 war er Dirigent an der Oper Rostock, 1931 bis 1933 an der Oper am von Gustav Hartung geleiteten Hessischen Landestheater in Darmstadt.

1933 wurde Schmidt-Isserstedt in Darmstadt fristlos entlassen und fand nach einem Jahr der Arbeitslosigkeit eine Anstellung an der « Deutschen Musikbühne », einer Wanderbühne des Erbprinzen Heinrich XLV. Reuß. Nach einem weiteren Jahr der Arbeitslosigkeit Schmidt-Isserstedts gelang es dem Intendanten der Hamburgischen Staatsoper Heinrich Karl Strohm 1935 bei der NSDAP das Engagement Schmidt-Isserstedts als Erster Kapellmeister durchzusetzen. 1943 wurde er an die Spitze des Deutschen Opernhauses Berlin berufen, wo er 1944 Generalmusikdirektor wurde.

Im Jahr 1935 ließ er sich von seiner jüdischen Ehefrau Gerta Herz scheiden. Er hatte mit ihr zwei Kinder, darunter den späteren Produzenten der englischen Schallplattenfirma « Decca », Erik (geboren 25. März 1931 ; gestorben 4. Mai 2004) , der mit seiner Mutter 1936 nach England emigrierte und seinen Namen in Smith anglisierte. Zum Führergeburtstag 1938 wurde ihm der Titel Staatskapellmeister verliehen. Im Oktober 1940 gastierte er im besetzten Oslo in Anwesenheit von Reichskommissar Josef Terboven und des norwegischen Nazi-Führers Vidkun Quisling. In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn vor einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

Schmidt-Isserstedt setzte seine Karriere unmittelbar nach Kriegsende unbeschadet fort. Mit Schreiben vom 29. April 1948 bescheinigte man ihm von Seiten der Militärregierung explizit eine saubere Vergangenheit. Er war in der Tat einer der wenigen in Deutschland verbliebenen Dirigenten ersten Ranges ohne eine NSDAP-Mitgliedschaft. Vom britischen Militär wurde er deswegen schon 1945 beauftragt, das Hamburger (Rundfunk-) Musikwesen zu reorganisieren. Er gründete daher noch in diesem Jahr das NDR Sinfonieorchester, das er bis 1971 leitete. 1955-1964 stand er ebenfalls an der Spitze des Königlichen philharmonischen Orchesters in Stockholm und leitete nebenbei zahlreiche Konzerte in Covent Garden oder an der Bayerischen Staatsoper.

Schmidt-Isserstedt galt als Spezialist der deutsch-österreichischen Musik des 19. Jahrhunderts (insbesondere Ludwig van Beethoven und Johannes Brahms) , setzte sich aber auch für die Werke seiner Zeitgenossen Béla Bartók, Igor Strawinski, Paul Hindemith und Bernhard Kaun ein.

Im Jahre 2002 veröffentlichte « Decca Records » eine « box » der von Schmidt-Isserstedt mit den Wiener Philharmonikern und dem Pianisten Wilhelm Backhaus beziehungsweise dem Geiger Henryk Szeryng aufgenommenen Werke Ludwig van Beethovens (alle Symphonien und Klavierkonzerte, das Violinkonzert und einige Ouvertüren) .

Sein erstes Engagement erhielt er als Korrepetitor am Stadttheater Breslau, wo er 1926 Erster Kapellmeister wurde. 1929 ging er an das Opernhaus Frankfurt-am-Main unter Clemens Krauß. Nach einem erfolgreichen Probegastspiel mit Richard Wagners Götterdämmerung erhielt er in Dessau die Stelle des Generalmusikdirektors als Nachfolger von Arthur Rother. Seydelmann wirkte von 1934 bis 1951 als Generalmusikdirektor am Dessauer Theater. Am 29. Mai 1938 dirigierte er zur Eröffnung des Theaters am heutigen Friedensplatz Car Maria von Webers Der Freischütz. Mit der Schließung aller Theater 1944 wurde er zum Kriegsdienst einberufen. Nach dem Krieg gehörte er zu den Initiatoren für die Wiederaufnahme des Spielbetriebs, die Weihnachten 1945 mit Ludwig van Beethovens Fidelio im Kristallpalast Dessau erfolgen konnte.

Zur Wiedereröffnung des Großen Hauses im August 1949 dirigierte er Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts Die Zauberflöte. Mit Intendant Willy Bodenstein begründete er die Wagner-Pflege in Dessau. Er heiratete die Solotänzerin Ursula Cain (Schülerin von Mary Wigman), die mit ihm nach Leipzig ging. 1951 berief man ihn zum Generalmusikdirektor des Theaters der Stadt Leipzig und des Gewandhausorchesters. In seiner Leipziger Amtszeit dirigierte er mehr als 25 Premieren, darunter die deutsche Erstaufführung von Wladimir Nikolajewitsch Krjukows Der Postmeister und die Uraufführung von Alan Bushs Wat Tyler. Er widmete sich auch der Händel-Pflege mit Einstudierungen von Rodelinda und Radamisto in der Inszenierung von Heinz Rückert, dem Mitbegründer der Händel-Renaissance in Halle. Zur Eröffnung des neuen Leipziger Opernhauses im Oktober 1960 dirigierte er Wagners Meistersinger von Nürnberg in der legendären Inszenierung von Operndirektor Joachim Herz.

1961 folgte er dem Ruf nach Berlin. Nach einer glänzenden Aufführung von Beethovens 9. Sinfonie zur Eröffnung der Berliner Festtage 1961 wurde er im November 1961 als Generalmusikdirektor an die Deutsche Staatsoper Berlin berufen, starb aber bereits im Januar 1962 im Alter von nur 51 Jahren in Berlin. Er war Träger des Nationalpreises der DDR.

1953 : Le chef Ferdinand Großmann dirige la 3e Messe de Bruckner (en fa mineur) avec le Chœur de l'Académie de Vienne et l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne. Les solistes : Dorothea Siebert, Dagmar Herrmann, Erich Majkut, and Otto Wiener (étiquette « Vox » , United Kingdom LP : P-7940) .

This old « Vox » LP, from 1953, features the renowned Viennese choral conductor Ferdinand Großmann. He was Vienna's leading choral conductor from before the War and into the 1960's. Director of the famed Vienna Boys Choir, he also founded the Academy Choir and led that group in a whole slew of recordings issued for « Vox » , the Austrian Radio (ORF) , Philips, and other labels. Importantly, Großmann was a direct link to the 19th Century as he was one of Bruckner's choristers while a boy soprano with the famed Choir Boys. Großmann enjoyed relating stories of Bruckner, highlighting the gentle and generous way in which he worked with his young choristers. As such, Großmann's style of interpretation is probably as close to the Master's intentions as we will ever get. For that reason alone, this is a vital document.

This performance is generally quite good, the chorus being the strongest partner here. The Vienna Symphony struggles in areas, probably as a result of little, if no rehearsal, and the lack of a firm orchestral hand at the helm. The soloists are competent if not especially virtuosic. The music is, of course, powerful and majestic and Großmann's understanding of this work, based on over 50 years of familiarity with the piece, is beyond reproach. Sound is typical early 1950's « Vox » ... if you know what I mean.

This performance belongs on your shelf, in spite of the performance and sonic limitations.

Ferdinand Großmann

The Austrian choral conductor, vocal teacher and composer Ferdinand Großmann was born on 4 July 1887 in Tulln (Austria) , and died on 5 December 1970 in Vienna.

Großmann was a direct link to the 19th Century as he was one of Bruckner's choristers while a boy soprano with the famed Choir Boys. Großmann enjoyed relating stories of Bruckner, highlighting the gentle and generous way in which he worked with his young choristers.

Großmann studied music in Linz with Anton Bruckner's student and personal biographer, August Göllerich (1902-1906) . Some years later, in Vienna, he attended a class of conducting given by Felix Weingartner.

In 1923, he established the « Wiener Volkskonservatorium » . He later became the artistic director of the « Wiener Saengerknaben » , and led the choir to gain international reputation.

The famous Austrian choral conductor, vocal teacher, and composer, Ferdinand Großmann, studied music in Linz (Upper-Austria) . Some years later, in Vienna, he attended a class of conducting given by Felix Weingartner. Großmann's family originated in part from the idyllic town of Gmunden, on the verge of the Salzkammergut, a short journey South of Linz.

In 1923, at the age of 36, Ferdinand Großmann founded the « Volkskonservatorium » , in Vienna. 4 years later, in 1927, Viktor Maiwald founded the « Konzertvereinigung Wiener Staatsoperchor » . Upon his death, in 1931, Großmann, who had in the interim risen to fame, was called upon to head the « Konzertvereinigung » as their director. Fortunately, Clemens Krauß, the director of the Vienna State Opera, showed much understanding for the plans of the « Konzertvereinigung » . In 1935, Felix Weingartner became new director of the Vienna State Opera, and Großmann worked successfully together with Arturo Toscanini, Josef Krips, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hans Knappertsbusch. Then, he won the « Grand Prix » at the choral competition during the Paris World exhibition under the baton of Bruno Walter with the « Konzertvereinigung » . In 1940, Großmann finally terminated his work with the « Konzertvereinigung » since he had just taken on the challenging responsibility of running the « Wiener Sängerknaben » , in the year before. With the « Zusammenbruch » (War of extermination) , at the end of World War II, operations with the « Wiener Sängerknaben » were temporarily suspended.

In 1946, Ferdinand Großmann organized the Chamber Chorus of the Vienna Academy of Music and he toured with the choir within Europe and America. He composed a Germann Mass for Chorus (1952) . In 1956, Großmann took-over the Chorus « Viennensis » from its founder Josef Schnitt, who had been Rector of the « Burgkapelle » , at the time. The Chorus « Viennensis » is a male choir only consisting of former members of the « Wiener Sängerknaben » being intended to compliment the Boys' Choir. At the age of 76, Großmann retired from his official duties.

Kurt Equiluz, long time tenor at the Vienna State Opera, summed it all up by commenting :

« The many years of singing under this wonderful director of the Vienna Boys Choir has filled me with unspeakable wealth. »

Ferdinand Großmann zählt zu den bedeutendsten österreichischen Musikerpersönlichkeiten des 20. Jahrhunderts. Das Buch « Den Sängern ein Vater » (von Désirée Hornek / 1987 ; ISBN 3-85058-014-8) erzählt die wichtigsten Stationen seines künstlerischen Schaffens.

Für den Chorus Viennensis hat Großmann Aufbauarbeit geleistet, hat Stimmbildung forciert und den Schwerpunkt auf Tongebung und Phrasierung gesetzt. Es wurde anspruchsvolle Männerchorliteratur gesungen. Besonders hervorzuheben ist eine Aufführung von Bachs Matthäuspassion gemeinsam mit den Wiener Sängerknaben in der Wiener Hofburgkapelle. Unter seiner Leitung entstanden einige Schallplatten.

« Acclaimed conductor with whom music has regained its rightful place, the 1st » (J. J. Vlasselaer, Ottawa.)

Agnes Großmann has been, in the 30 year span of her conducting career, Artistic Director of several illustrious organizations : « Wiener Singakademie » (1983-1986) , Chamber Players of Toronto (1984-1990) , Montreal Metropolitan Orchestra and Choir (1986-1995) , ProCoro Canada, Edmonton, Alberta (1995-1997) , the Vienna Choir Boys (1996-1998) and the Orford Arts Centre (1989-1995 and 1999-2004) . Critics have been unanimous in praising the musical power of her interpretations as well as the remarkable building process she achieved in all the organizations she directed, bringing them to new heights musically, technically and stylistically. Her versatility was also reflected in her imaginative programming and audience building. In addition, Agnes Großmann has guest conducted Orchestras and choirs in Canada, Japan, Taiwan and Europe, including Orchestras of Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary, Canadian Chamber Ensemble, the National Arts Center Orchestra in Ottawa, the « Jeunesses Musicales » World Youth Orchestra, the Arcadia Choir and Orchestra in Osaka (Japan) , the Osaka Philharmonic, the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra and the Vienna Chamber Orchestra.

Agnes Großmann started her career as a pianist touring the United States, Canada, Europe, the Middle-East and Japan with Columbia Artists Management. In 1972, she won the Mozart Interpretation Prize in Vienna. As a result of a hand injury, she was forced to abandon her pianistic career, and soon turned her attention to conducting. Since that time, « Her profound, inborn musicianship and irresistible temperament » (Gerhard Rosenthaler, Vienna) has had her conquering her public wherever she has concertized. By 1987, the City of Montreal named her « Woman of the Year in the Arts » . Ms. Großmann has received many honours, including the Silver Cross for Outstanding Achievements in the Arts from the Austrian Government (1992) , and the Golden Cross of the City of Vienna (1995) , an Honorary Doctorate from Mount Saint-Vincent University, Halifax, Nova-Scotia (1994) and Ottawa University (2004) , and the « Chevalier de la Pléiade » conferred by the Quebec Government (2003) .

In 1990, she took the Toronto Chamber Players on a highly-praised European tour, where concerts were given in Berlin, Prague, Vienna, Graz among others.

1953 : Le chef Jascha Horenstein, à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique « Pro Musica » de Vienne, grave sur étiquette « Vox Turnabout » la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner dans la version de Leopold Nowak.

« Pro Musica » rassemble des musiciens de plusieurs formations et témoigne de la renaissance d'après-guerre de l'interprétation brucknérienne.

« Horenstein est inspiré de bout en bout, avec des tempos dans l'ensemble assez rapides, mais très équilibrés et un sens authentique de la grandeur brucknérienne (son Scherzo est magnifique) . Haletante et fiévreuse, cette lecture culmine dans l'Adagio déchiré, profondément lyrique. Une très belle interprétation malheureusement handicapée par la prise de son monophonique qui empêche l'aération de la mise en perspective. » (J.-M. Brohm, « Répertoire » n° 50, page 15.)

1953 : Le chef Rudolf Kempe dirige la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version hybride éditée par Robert Haas (1938) , avec le « Sinfonieorchester des Hessischen Rundfunks » . Un enregistrement existe.

Rudolf Kempe

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Rudolf Kempe est né le 14 juin 1910 à Dresde et est mort le 12 mai 1976 à Zürich. Il était un spécialiste du répertoire post-Romantique germano-autrichien (Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner, Johannes Brahms et, plus encore, Richard Strauß) .

Après des études musicales à Dresde, il débuta comme hautboïste à Dortmund, en 1928. De 1929 à 1936, il était 1er hautboïste et pianiste de l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig, où il entama sa carrière de chef à l'âge de 27 ans. Après la guerre, il dirigea comme chef principal et / ou directeur musical les Orchestres de Dresde, Londres, Zürich et Munich ainsi que l'Opéra de Munich, et fut fréquemment invité à New York, à Milan et au Festival de Bayreuth. À sa mort prématurée, ce fut Sergiù Celibidache qui lui succéda à la tête de la célèbre phalange bavaroise.

Comme chef d'orchestre, Rudolf Kempe était attaché au beau son, mais sans fétichisme. Toujours vigoureux, souvent brillant, jamais brouillon, c'était un chef d'orchestre dans la tradition allemande du « Kapellmeister » : respectueux du compositeur et de l'œuvre qu'il jouait derrière laquelle il s'effaçait avec le plus grand naturel. Avec Kempe, plus que « d'interprétation » , il faut parler de « lecture » des œuvres qu'il jouait. Chef lyrique par excellence, il a progressivement renoncé, à partir des années 1955, à prendre des responsabilités dans une grande maison d'Opéra alors que le poste de directeur musical de Covent Garden lui était offert, en 1955, par Sir David Webster. Il s'est alors tourné de plus en plus vers le concert. Pourtant, jusqu'à la fin de sa vie, on l'a retrouvé, de temps à autre, dans la fosse en quelques grandes occasions. Entre 1960 et 1967, à Bayreuth et à Covent Garden ; en 1954-1955, au Metropolitan Opera ; en 1966, à Munich ; en 1974, aux Chorégies d'Orange, où il dirigea une « Salomé » d'anthologie avec Leonie Rysanek et Jon Vickers ; et l'année suivante, en 1975, dans « la Walkyrie » .

The German conductor Rudolf Kempe was born on 14 June 1910 in Dresden and died on 12 May 1976 in Zürich.

From the age of 14, Kempe studied at the Dresden State Opera School. He played oboe in the Opera Orchestra of Dortmund and, then, in the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, from 1929. In addition to oboe, he played the piano regularly, as a soloist, in chamber music or accompanying, as a result of which, in 1933, the new Director of the Leipzig Opera invited Kempe to become a « répétiteur » and, later, a conductor for the Opera.

During the Second World War, Kempe was conscripted into the army, but instead of active service was directed into musical activities, playing for the troops and, later, taking over the chief conductorship of the Chemnitz Opera House.

Kempe directed the Dresden Opera and the « Staatskapelle Dresden », from 1949 to 1952, making his 1st records, including « Der Rosenkavalier », « Die Meistersinger » and « Der Freischütz ». « He obtains some superlative playing from the Dresden Orchestra », commented « The Record Guide ». He maintained a relationship with the Dresden Orchestra for the rest of his life, making some of his best-known records with them during the stereo era.

His international career began with engagements at the Vienna State Opera in the 1951 season, for which he conducted « Die Zauberflöte », « Simon Boccanegra », and « Capriccio ».

He was invited to succeed Georg Solti as chief conductor of the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, from 1952 to 1954, and was permitted by the East German authorities to do so without severing his ties with Dresden. In 1953, Kempe appeared with the Munich company at the Royal Opera House in London, where the General Administrator, Sir David Webster, quickly decided that Kempe would be an ideal Musical Director for the Covent Garden company. Kempe resisted the appointment, and did not accept the top job at any Opera House after leaving Munich, in 1954. He nonetheless conducted frequently at Covent Garden and was immensely popular there, conducting among other works, « Salome », « Elektra », « Der Rosenkavalier », « Der Ring des Nibelungen », « Un Ballo in Maschera » and « Madama Butterfly », of which the critic Andrew Porter compared Kempe's conducting favourably with that of Arturo Toscanini and Victor de Sabata. As a guest-conductor, Kempe frequently revisited Munich conducting mostly the Italian repertory.

Kempe's « début » at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » was in 1960. The « Ring » cycle he conducted there in that year was notable for multiple casting, with the role of Wotan split between Hermann Uhde and Jerome Hines, and Brünnhilde between Astrid Varnay and Birgit Nilsson.

Kempe was associated with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1955. In 1960, he became its Associate Conductor, chosen by the Orchestra's founder, Sir Thomas Beecham. From 1961 to 1962, he was Principal Conductor of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra and, from 1963 to 1975, its Artistic Director. A member of the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra later said of Kempe :

« He was a wonderful controller of the Orchestra, and a very great accompanist. Kempe was like someone driving a racing-car, following the piano round the bends. »

Kempe abolished Beecham's male-only rule, introducing women into the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. He said :

« An Orchestra without them always reminds me of the army. »

In 1970, the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra named him « Conductor for Life » but, in 1975, he resigned his post with the Orchestra.

From 1965 to 1972, Kempe worked with the « Tonhalle Orchester Zürich » and, from 1967 to his death, conducted the Munich Philharmonic, with whom he made international tours and recorded the 1st quadraphonic set of the Beethoven Symphonies.

In the final months of his life, Kempe was the chief conductor of the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra. The opening concert of the Henry Wood Promenade Concerts, on 16 July 1976, in which he was to have conducted his « BBC » forces in Beethoven's « Missa solemnis », became a memorial concert for him following Kempe's death in Zürich, aged 65.

One of the great unsung conductors of the middle 20th Century, Rudolf Kempe enjoyed a strong reputation in England but never quite achieved the international acclaim that he might have had with more aggressive management, promotion, and recording. Not well enough known to be a celebrity but too widely respected to count as a cult figure, Kempe is perhaps best remembered as a connoisseur's conductor, one valued for his strong creative temperament rather than for any personal mystique.

He studied oboe as a child, performed with the Dortmund Opera, and, in 1929, barely out of his teens, he became 1st oboist of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra. His conducting debut came in 1936, at the Leipzig Opera ; this performance of Lortzing's « Der Wildschütz » was so successful that the Leipzig Opera hired him as a « répétiteur » . Kempe served in the German army during World War II, but much of his duty was out of the line of fire ; in 1942, he was assigned to a music post at the Chemnitz Opera. After the War, untainted by Nazi activities, he returned to Chemnitz as director of the Opera (1945-1948) , and then moved on to the Weimar National Theatre (1948-1949) . From 1949 to 1953, he served as general music-director of the « Staatskapelle Dresden » , East Germany's finest Orchestra. He then moved to the identical position at the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, from 1952 to 1954, succeeding the young and upwardly mobile Georg Solti. During this period, he was also making guest appearances outside of Germany, mainly in Opera : in Vienna (1951) , at London's Covent Garden (1953) , and at New York's Metropolitan Opera (1954) , to mention only the highlights. Although he conducted Wagner extensively, especially at Covent Garden, Kempe did not make his Bayreuth debut until 1960. As an Opera conductor, he was greatly concerned with balance and texture, and singers particularly appreciated his efforts on their behalf.

Kempe made a great impression in England and, in 1960, Sir Thomas Beecham named him associate conductor of the London's Royal Philharmonic. Kempe became the Orchestra's principal conductor upon Beecham's death, the following year, and, after the Orchestra was re-organized, served as its artistic director from 1963 to 1975. He was also the chief conductor of the Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra, from 1965 to 1972, and of the Munich Philharmonic, from 1967 until his death in 1976. During the last year of his life, he also entered into a close association with the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra.

Interpretively, Kempe was something of a « German Beecham » . He was at his best (lively, incisive, warm, expressive, but never even remotely self-indulgent) in the Austro-Germanic and Czech repertory. Opera lovers prize his versions of « Lohengrin » , « Die Meistersinger » , and « Ariadne auf Naxos » . His greatest recorded legacy, accomplished during the last 4 or 5 years of his life, was the multi-volume « EMI » box-set of the orchestral works and Concertos of Richard Strauß, performed with the highly-idiomatic « Dresden Staatskapelle » . These recordings were only intermittently available outside of Europe in the LP days but, in the 1990's, « EMI » issued them on 9 compact discs.

Rudolf Kempe was born into a family in which music played little part but, when he was 6, he began to have piano lessons, taking-up the violin when he was 12 and also the oboe ; his teacher was Johann König, the 1st oboe of the « Dresden Staatskapelle » . 2 years later, he enrolled at the Music High-School in Dresden, where he continued to study with König as well as with Fritz Busch, Karl Schütte, Theodor Blumer and Kurt Striegel, and learnt the accordion as well as his other instruments. Having been engaged as the 1st oboist in the Orchestra of the Dortmund Opera, in 1928, 2 months later, Kempe accepted the same position in the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra (also the Orchestra of the Leipzig Opera) , in which he played under many distinguished conductors including Thomas Beecham, Fritz Busch, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer, Carl Schuricht, Richard Strauß and Bruno Walter : often during rehearsals, he would have the full-score on his desk as well as his own instrumental part. Kempe has revealed in interview how he came to be a conductor during 1935 :

« We were rehearsing " Le nozze di Figaro ". Paul Schmitz who was principal guest-conductor at the " Gewandhaus " wanted to listen to the 2nd Act from the back of the hall. There was no assistant conductor present, so he asked if anyone in the Orchestra was ready to conduct the 2nd Act. At length, he settled on me to take the podium. 14 days later, I had to conduct Lortzing's " Der Wildschütz ", and that's when I decided to quit the Orchestra and to devote myself entirely to conducting. »

After joining the Leipzig Opera as a « répétiteur » and assistant conductor, Kempe was soon entrusted with substantial repertoire works such as « Der Freischütz » , « Carmen » , « Le nozze di Figaro » , « Arabella » , and « Madama Butterfly » .

Although Kempe entered military service, in 1942, he was quickly given unofficial permanent leave to work at the Chemnitz Opera as a « répétiteur » and conductor ; and after his discharge from the army, in 1945, he returned there as 1st conductor and, subsequently, as chief conductor from 1946 to 1948. In addition, he conducted at the Berlin « Staatsoper » and in concert in Berlin, Dresden and Leipzig. For the 1948-1949 season, he worked alongside Hermann Abendroth at the National Theatre Weimar, after which he was invited by Joseph Keilberth to join the Dresden Opera, initially as 1st conductor, and after Keilberth's departure as chief conductor. Kempe's earliest recordings date from this period and include a complete account of Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » . During 1951 and 1952, he conducted at the Vienna State Opera in the latter year, succeeding Georg Solti as chief conductor at the Munich State Opera, where he stayed until 1954. He made his British debut conducting this company in a highly-successful series of performances of Strauß' « Arabella » at Covent Garden in the autumn of 1953, after which he was invited back to conduct at the Royal Opera House regularly, his 1st appearance with the Covent Garden company in fact taking place during the following month with Strauß' « Salome » . Kempe was invited to conduct Wagner's « Ring » cycle at Covent Garden, in 1954, which he did with great success, preparing for these performances by conducting a cycle in Spain with an Orchestra which required intensive coaching. He also made his debut at the Metropolitan Opera in New York, in 1954, conducting « Arabella » (in English) , « Tannhäuser » , and « Tristan und Isolde » ; and appeared at the Salzburg Festival, in 1955, leading Hans Pfitzner's « Palestrina » .

Despite serious illness, in 1956, Kempe now began to appear frequently as a guest-conductor in the major international music centres, and to record an extensive repertoire for « EMI » , predominantly with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He also continued to appear regularly at Covent Garden, until 1960, the year in which he made his debut at the Bayreuth Festival, conducting the « Ring » . As Sir Thomas Beecham's health declined during 1960, bringing the future of his Royal Philharmonic Orchestra into question, Beecham took advice and offered Kempe the associate conductorship of the Orchestra, which he accepted over a hastily arranged lunch in London. Kempe became the chief conductor of the Orchestra after Beecham's death, in 1961, and remained with it, apart from a short hiatus in 1963, until 1975. Together, Orchestra and conductor gave many memorable concerts in the United Kingdom and abroad ; an early assignment, of which regrettably no sound recordings appear to have survived, was a series of concerts conducting the music of Frederick Delius at the 1962 Bradford Delius Festival.

Following the death of Hans Rosbaud, in 1962, Kempe was appointed principal guest-conductor of the Zürich « Tonhalle » Orchestra, becoming the Orchestra's chief conductor in 1965 and remaining with it, in this position, until 1972 despite his activities being once more curtailed by illness during 1963 and 1964. He was invited to become chief conductor of the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1967, a position he held for the rest of his life and, in the following year, began work on his monumental survey with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » of Richard Strauß' orchestral works for « EMI » . He returned to Covent Garden for a memorable series of performances of Strauß' « Elektra » , in 1973, and conducted « Salome » at the Orange Festival, in 1974. Kempe was invited to become chief conductor of the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra with effect from the autumn of 1975, but gave only a handful of concerts with this Orchestra before his untimely death in May 1976.

Kempe was greatly admired by orchestral players, often the harshest of critics. On the one hand in rehearsal, he was quiet and undemonstrative, rarely raising his voice, always extremely courteous and very clear about his requirements ; yet, in performance, his extraordinary technical clarity, his musical flexibility and infallibility, and his innate sense of drama could result in readings of great power. Kempe combined all the key assets of the great conductor, above all being able to draw from the forces at his disposal performances which technically and interpretatively exceeded their own expectations of what they could achieve : the results were invariably music-making of the highest quality. His discography was very large indeed and has increased since his death as recordings of radio broadcasts and of live Opera and concert performances have become available. Kempe's recordings of Richard Strauß' music, which demand true conductorial virtuosity, probably stand as his greatest monument. To set beside his superb account of all the orchestral works with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » already mentioned, there are fine recordings of « Don Quixote » and « Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche » with the Berlin Philharmonic, and an excellent account of « Ariadne auf Naxos » . His 1st recording of « Ein Alpensinfonie » , made for « RCA » with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, is breathtaking, as are his recordings for Reader's Digest, also with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra, of « Don Juan », which was coupled with Ottorino Respighi's « I pini di Roma ». Of his live Opera performances, those of « Elektra » from London, in 1958, and of « Salome » from Orange, in 1974, capture some of the intensity of his conducting in the Opera House. Equally outstanding are Kempe's recordings of Operas by Richard Wagner : his studio accounts of « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » and of « Lohengrin » for « EMI » have long held centre stage in the commercial catalogue. 2 recordings from the Bayreuth Festival are of note : his 1960 « Ring » and the 1967 « Lohengrin », which featured the Ulster soprano Heather Harper in radiant form. The 1954 « Tannhäuser » from the Metropolitan Opera has also appeared un-officially. Of other Operas mention should be made of an early recording from Dresden of « Der Freischütz », and of Smetana's « The Bartered Bride », which he recorded for « EMI » with the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra.

Kempe recorded all the Beethoven Symphonies for « EMI » with the Munich Philharmonic, in the early days of quadraphonic sound, and as an adjunct to this set an earlier recording of the Symphony No. 3 « Eroica » with the Berlin Philharmonic should also be noted. He was an especially sympathetic interpreter of Johannes Brahms and his « EMI » recordings of the 4 Symphonies, the Violin Concerto with Yehudi Menuhin, and of « Ein Deutsches Requiem » with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra are outstanding. Kempe's qualities as a conductor made him particularly impressive in Anton Bruckner's music also ; his ability to present the architecture of a work as a single span, together with his deep musical concentration, resulted in outstanding performances of the Symphonies. His recordings of music by Mozart are regrettably few in number : an early (1955) Berlin account of the « Requiem » is the most substantial. Kempe was always strongly drawn to Slavonic music and his recordings of Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5, Dvořák's Symphony No. 9 « From the New World » and Janáček's « Glagolitic Mass » are very powerful. Of less familiar repertoire, 2 recordings stand-out : Othmar Schöck's Cantata « Vom Fischer und syner Fru », and Erich Wolfgang Korngold's Symphony in F-sharp, both with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. Kempe also recorded many lighter pieces for « EMI ». 2 collections of Viennese music with the Vienna Philharmonic are notable, Kempe himself being of the opinion that one of his very best recordings was the account of Franz Lehár's « Gold und Silber Walzer » which he made with this Orchestra.

Rudolf Kempe (geboren 14. Juni 1910 in Dresden ; gestorben 12. Mai 1976 in Zürich) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Er galt als Spezialist des spätromantischen deutsch-österreichischen Repertoires, insbesondere Richard Wagners, Anton Bruckners, Johannes Brahms' und, mehr noch, Richard Strauß'.

Kempe studierte an der Orchesterschule in Dresden und begann 1928 als Oboist in Dortmund. Von 1929 bis 1936 war er erster Oboist und Pianist am Leipziger Gewandhausorchester und begann dort mit 27 Jahren seine Dirigentenlaufbahn. 1949 wurde er Dresdner Generalmusikdirektor, 1951 auch Leiter der dortigen Oper. Von 1952 bis 1954 war er Generalmusikdirektor der Bayerischen Staatsoper in München, in den 60er Jahren leitete er das Royal Philharmonic Orchestra und das Tonhalle-Orchester Zürich und war in dieser Zeit einer der weltweit gefragtesten Dirigenten (New York, Buenos Aires, Mailand, Salzburg) . Sein frühzeitiger Tod verhinderte eine längere Zusammenarbeit mit den Münchner Philharmonikern, deren Generalmusikdirektor er 1967 geworden war. Sein Nachfolger wurde Sergiu Celibidache.

Kempe war ein selbstbeherrschter Dirigent, der sein großes technisches Können ganz in den Dienst der Orchester, der Musiker und Sänger stellte. Er sah und erlebte Musik weniger als publikumswirksame Veranstaltung, sondern eher aus der Perspektive der gemeinsam Musizierenden. Daher war er auch ein Anhänger des Ensembletheaters. Seine klare Zeichengebung unterstützte seinen strukturalistischen Interpretationsstil, den man gut daran erkennen kann, daß er gerade in den großen spätromantischen Partituren die kammermusikalischen Qualitäten, die Nebenstimmen und die feinen Klangschattierungen hörbar machte.

Er wurde auf dem Bogenhausener Friedhof in München beigesetzt. Die Urne wurde im März 2007 nach Stratford-upon-Avon zu seiner Witwe Cordula Kempe verbracht, die dort in der Rudolf Kempe-Society tätig ist. Der Grabstein wurde entfernt.

« VOLKMAR ANDREAE CONDUCTS BRUCKNER » : Symphonies Nos. 1-9 & « Te Deum » . Recording of the 1953 cycle with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra. From the Archives of the « ORF / Radio, Österreich » . (Digital restoration by Aaron Z. Snyder, in 2009.)

The Swiss conductor and composer Volkmar Andreae has a small, concentrated discography. Violin aficionados remember him fondly for his accompaniment to compatriot Stefi Geyer in Othmar Schöck's Violin Concerto. He also conducted Pierre Fournier in the same composer's Cello Concerto, though this was an off-air 1949 traversal. There were other recordings, often with distinguished soloists, principally in the expected pieces : Edwin Fischer and Marcelle Meyer in the Beethoven Emperor Concerto, for instance (the latter is on « Tahra » : TAH580) ; the Vienna Symphony in the « Missa solemnis » with stellar singers ; Walter Gieseking in Mozart's K488 ; Karl Engel in Chopin's 1st Piano Concerto ; and Friedrich Gulda in the Schumann Concerto and Weber « Konzertstück » . But there was also Fritz Brun's (1878-1959) 9th Symphony to swell the discography as well as Andreae's own « Kleine Suite » . But the conductor's greatest legacy resides in his championship of Anton Bruckner.

This Vienna Symphony cycle was performed and broadcast in January and February 1953. It constitutes an important addition to the discography and a fascinating perspective on Andreae's individual and collective approaches to the composer's music. To sum-up, these crudely, I would characterise Andreae's conducting as un-mannered, linear, strong, dramatic, crisp, devoid of hallowed sanctimony, and intensely vital. There is a powerful sense of a conductor whose reach extends from 1st to last, and who sees the Symphonies as part of a continuum of architectural and expressive development. He neither inflates the earlier Symphonies nor bloats the last ones ; instead, he vests the music with a real sense of life-giving exultation, and whilst this summary might suggest that he thereby downplays the solemnity and Gothic depth of the music, I would argue that this is not so. It has been an immensely valuable experience to listen to the canon under his direction.

I began my journey with the 7th, which is characterized by fresh and verdant wind playing. It's a feature of these performances that Andreæ coaxes some flowing wind paragraphs from the « Wiener Symphoniker ». This is not a monumental 7, but nor is it a timid affair either. Tempi are fluid, forward-moving, as lissom sometimes as a stream. Orchestral textures are well calibrated and not over-vibrated ; string unison figures are not vehement. There's no dawdling in the Finale where the vivid sense of the music is finely put across.

The marvellously architectural acuity that characterises Andreæ's performances is perhaps at its most penetrating in the 8th. There are no longueurs here at all, or any sense of undue haste. Andreæ develops his own momentum, leading from paragraph point to paragraph point with utter naturalness. The wind and string cantilever in the Scherzo, and the refined and noble elevation of the Adagio attest to a supremely human countenance.

One thing that he does is immediately to establish a sense of dynamism and direction. Rhythm is underway from the 1st second. This is especially true in the case of the 6th which starts with a kind of tensely flowing tempo (an Andreæ speciality) that lies at the heart of his music-making. There is great buoyancy here. Though his tempi are generally fast they don't seem so, so well pointed are they. It is an example of incision, of accenting, of lifting phrases forward without hustling them. Flexibility and control go hand-in-hand and no stasis is allowed to impede the natural musical current that runs throughout the 6th's Adagio.

The 5th receives another splendid performance. The pizzicati in the 2nd movement underlie the plangent and never indulged lyric line above. Passion here is co-opted to lissom and invigorating dynamism. It is playing once again of life-affirming directness. The Scherzo's bold accelerando attests to the unrigid, tensile quality Andreæ evokes. There's a big echo which adds to the tension of the performance, and an occasional murmur from Andreæ which amplifies his expressive engagement with the music's sweep and dynamism. The « Ländler » is affectionately drawn.

He is generally much quicker than say Wilhelm Fürtwängler throughout, where comparison exists, and roughly aligned in terms of tempo relations with Hans Knappertsbusch, though Andreæ tends to be definitively fleeter in slow movements. He strives for a sense of Symphonic proportion. Thus, his 4th may seem brisk when judged against some of his contemporaries' performances, but it never sounds brusque. The same applies to the 9th. It's certainly fast, but its rapidity brings a galvanic fluidity, and exciting directional contour that sweeps all before it. There's a conventional tempo for the Scherzo, but Andreæ is even faster in the last movement than he had been in the opening, taking-off 6 minutes in this movement alone from the timings of « Furt » and « Kna » .

The 1st 3 Symphonies share, clearly, this proportionate and vital approach. The 3rd in particular has great elegance of expression. The rise and fall of the Adagio is movingly conveyed, the taut elasticity that is so much a feature of the conducting - graphically so, in this case. There are some unusually expansive examples of portamenti in the Scherzo. We also have a marvellously strong « Te Deum » . The line-up of stellar vocal talent may remind one of Hermann Scherchen directed performances on disc but the ethos is all Andreæ's. Rhythmic surety and sonorous choral contributions reign supreme throughout.

There are bilingual (English / German) notes with pertinent commentaries on editions used by the conductor, his discography, biography and a background to his Bruckner performances. The transfers are by Aaron Z. Snyder who may have had good quality digital transfers with which to work, but has also had to work hard at removing extraneous noise and correcting balances. Snyder is one of the best in his field at the moment and he lives-up to his reputation with restoration work that never draws attention to itself. If you're looking for a Bruckner cycle in resplendent SACD you will not have read even the 1st paragraph of this review. To appreciate this set requires belief in Brucknerian electricity and a « just » balance between expressive nobility and dramatic dynamism. Among historic cycles this one now ranks high, indeed.

The name Volkmar Andreae (1879-1962) may be unfamiliar to most « Fanfare » readers but, in his time, the Swiss conductor was one of the most important proponents of Bruckner's music. Andreae was born in Berne and, as a young musician, he often played piano for Brahms, a friend of Andreae's parents. After studies in Cologne (1897-1900) and a 2 year stint as a « répétiteur » at the Munich Opera, Andreae returned to Switzerland and worked as a choral conductor in Winterthur and Zürich.

Andreae, then, attended a concert that completely altered the focus of his career. As he explained in 1951 :

« It all started when I heard Richard Strauß conducting Bruckner's 3rd Symphony with the Berlin " Tonkünstler " Orchestra in Zürich, in 1902. Deeply impressed by the music of Bruckner, I decided to dedicate my life to the service of the Austrian composer, who had died a few years before, virtually unknown outside of his native country. Since I assumed the post of musical director of the Zürich " Tonhalle ", in 1906, I have introduced at least 1 Bruckner Symphony, every year. By 1911, I had performed all of them and, from then on, I regularly conducted all 9 Symphonies, in each 3 year period. 3 times, I have led all of them in a single season. Some I have directed more than 40 times. »

During his very lengthy tenure (1906-1949) at the Zürich « Tonhalle » , Andreae was also head of the Zürich Conservatory (1914-1939) and kept active as a composer (his chamber works have a distinctly Brahms-like flavour) .

There are perhaps 2 main reasons why Andreae is not better-known today : his aversion to making studio recordings (« I hate canned music. ») and an apparent lack of interest in developing an international career. However, this was not due to lack of demand for his talents or unwillingness to travel. Again, as he wrote in 1951 :

« I regret deeply that I have not yet had a chance to present Anton Bruckner to musical audiences in the United States. When Gustav Mahler, who had heard one of my concerts, invited me to be his successor as conductor of the New York Philharmonic, I was unable to obtain a leave of absence from the Swiss Army, of which I was an officer. »

This cycle of Bruckner's 9 numbered Symphonies comes from radio broadcasts made for « RAVAG » (« Radio Verkehrs AG ») , in the Soviet zone of then-occupied Vienna. All of them were taped in multiple sessions during January and February 1953. Andreae's Bruckner style can be described as very direct, urgently swift, uncommonly lyrical, and expressive, with climaxes that are incredibly dramatic. All of these attributes exude a profound grasp of the music's structure and a total familiarity with every musical nuance in the scores.

The CD booklet's illuminating essay by Mark W. Kluge notes :

« The playing in the broadcast cycle is of higher-order than we have sometimes heard on record from the Vienna Symphony, indicating that ample rehearsal time was allocated. Balances are, by and large, just (the horns are occasionally backward) , and one often marvels at the transparent layers of scoring detail that Andreae reveals. There are few instances of audible splices in the original recordings. We can, thus, infer that the music was recorded in long takes or complete movements. In combination with the concentrated span during which the recordings were made, this leads to an overall impression of unified, distilled conception and realization - possibly unique among recorded Bruckner cycles. »

As for the sound, these transfers by Aaron Z. Snyder are uniformly excellent and clearly better than the previous issues of Nos. 1 and 2 (« Amadeo » LPs) and No. 4 (on CDs from « Orfeo » and « Bearac ») ; Nos. 3, 5-9 and the « Te Deum » , here, are 1st ever releases.

Due to review space restrictions, what follows must be only a quick list of the texts used by Andreae, short verdicts on the performances, and abbreviated references to a few other recordings of the same editions by other conductors born during Bruckner's lifetime.

Symphony No. 1 (1877 « Linz » version, 1935 Haas edition) - This recording, when on an « Amadeo » LP, was my « imprint » version of the work, along with Andreae's 1951 studio account with the Lower-Austrian « Tonkünstler » Orchestra (issued on a « Masterseal » LP that used the later « Vienna » version of 1891) . This wonderfully agile and sensitively inflected 1953 reading is still my favourite Bruckner 1st.

Symphony No. 2 (1877 version, 1938 Haas edition) - Andreae, here, uses the Haas edition, but omits all the sections added by Haas from the original 1872 manuscript. He also plays only the brief 1st repeats in the Scherzo and Trio. I still prefer the complete Haas edition in this work. Despite its questionable musicology, that edition restores many gorgeous passages from the original, such as a recollection of the work's opening in the Finale, and it uses a horn solo in the Adagio's Coda (the later Nowak edition employs a less eloquent clarinet) . Andreae's account is a winner in all respects. For the full Haas edition (with all Scherzo / Trio repeats) , my preference is the 1956 Hans Rosbaud / Southwest German Radio (a private tape) that's in great need of commercial CD release. Rosbaud recorded Symphonies Nos. 2 to 9, but most of them have never been issued.

Symphony No. 3 (1889 version, 1890 Röttig edition) - The dramatic 1953 account is even finer than the 1955 Andreae / Vienna Symphony Orchestra that was issued long ago on an « Epic » LP (it was the conductor's 2nd and last Bruckner studio recording) . The 1953 provides a more expressive Adagio and doesn't have the awful « pre-echo » that afflicted the LPs. It's one of my 2 favourites in the Röttig edition, along with the much slower but very potent live 1962 Hans Knappertsbusch / NDR Hamburg (« Music & Arts » 1028) . The 1965 Carl Schuricht (now on a « Medici » CD reviewed elsewhere) is not interpretively as compelling as what's heard from Andreae and « Kna » , but it has stereo sound, a great orchestra (the Vienna Philharmonic) , and divided violins that reveal some intriguing antiphonal effects.

Symphony No. 4 (1878-1880 version, 1936 Haas edition) - This very rustic reading is one of my special favourites, along with the still unpublished 1961 Hans Rosbaud, the late-1960's live Robert Heger / Berlin Philharmonic (« Maximas ») , and the live 1966 Otto Klemperer / Bavarian Radio (« EMI ») . Both of the last 2 use the very slightly different Nowak edition.

Symphony No. 5 (1878 version, 1935 Haas edition) - Andreae apparently employs extra-brass players as re-inforcements in the Finale's magnificent chorale. This causes the pace to slow-down a bit more than I prefer, but the result is hugely exciting. My favourite mono 5ths are the 1963 Carl Schuricht / Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (deleted « DGG ») , this one from Andreae, and the live 1942 Wilhelm Furtwängler (« Music & Arts ») . In stereo, there is a rather grand live 1968 Otto Klemperer / Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra in a multi-disc set (on « Testament ») that benefits from the use of divided violins.

Symphony No. 6 (1881 version, 1935 Haas edition) - Andreae's deft handling of tempos puts his 6th among the finest ever recorded ; it's one of the major highlights of this set. Other « collectible » accounts : the incomplete Furtwängler (« Music & Arts » , without the 1st movement) , the 1964 Klemperer (« EMI ») , the impassioned 1964 Heinz Bongartz / Leipzig « Gewandhaus » (« Berlin Classics » , despite a too-bright CD transfer) , and the « sui generis » 1952 Charles Adler / Vienna Symphony Orchestra, which uses the 1899 Hynais edition (deleted « Tahra » CD) .

Symphony No. 7 (1885 version, 1885 Gutmann edition) - Andreae is one of only 2 conductors I've heard to observe a slower tempo for the 1st movement's 3rd subject as per the early score's metronome markings (the other is Otto Klemperer) . The Adagio has a thrilling climax, and the last measures are quite moving. This is now one of my 2 top choices in the Gutmann 7th, along with the deeply-felt 1964 stereo Carl Schuricht / Hague Philharmonic (Japanese « Denon ») , where divided violins pay big dividends in the Adagio.

Symphony No. 8 (1892 version, 1892 Lienau edition) - Andreae sticks with the 1st published edition, as do the 1951 Hans Knappertsbusch / Berlin Philharmonic (« Music & Arts ») and the valedictory 1954 Wilhelm Furtwängler / Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra (« Andante » or « Opus Kura ») . All 3 are wonderful.

Symphony No. 9 (1894 version, 1932 Orel edition) - Andreae, here, delivers a powerful, forward-moving 1st movement and an altogether stunning Scherzo, but the Adagio is a little on the fast side for my taste. The extraordinary live 1944 Wilhelm Furtwängler (« Music & Arts ») remains my personal favourite, but I'm very glad to have the Andreae too.

« Te Deum » (1885 version) - Andreae's perfectly paced conducting and a terrific team of vocalists make this my new « Desert Island » account. A joyous conclusion to a great set !

For those who can tolerate mono sound and occasionally scrappy execution, this set from one of Bruckner's greatest advocates will be a source of enduring pleasure. I suspect that the style of playing heard here, with its tremendous vitality, discreet but lovely « echt-Wien » string portamento, and sheer poetry of nuance is about as close as we'll ever get to what Bruckner's music sounded like during the composer's lifetime. This set warrants the very highest recommendation.

This complete set of Bruckner Symphonies is in monophonic sound, taken from live Vienna performances in January and February 1953 by « Radio Wien » . Directing the Vienna Symphony (not the much more famous « Philharmoniker ») is Volkmar Andreae (1879-1962) . He was a Swiss conductor who spent much of his time working in Austria, eschewing recording and disliking the jet-set lifestyle of the international conductor. Hence, his lack of notoriety. He was also a composer and teacher of some note.

So, not much to go on with this historical gem of a CD set.

I heard about it through Audiophilia contributor, James Norris. He called me from London very excited about this new « Music & Arts » release. Jim is as much a Bruckner enthusiast as me and thought they would be to my taste. I quickly put an S.O.S. out to « Naxos » (the distributor) for a quick download. As always, they came through. In minutes, the entire 9 CD set (as FLAC files) was in my Antipodes DSI music server.

Andreae's vision for Bruckner became very clear. In all the Symphonies, there is a firm grasp of the structure - it's not « precious » as so many present-day conductors attempt. All glory and heaven. Andreae doesn't hang around to find-out if you're having a good time. Tempos are generally quick and the climaxes are not highlighted. But, they are just as intense. And, they make sense. Melodies unfold beautifully, the big moments are preceded by a slight emphasis of the preceding chord or note, and nothing sounds funereal. Much of it is heartbreaking, though.

There will be lots written about different editions of the Symphonies in this set by Bruckner « scholars » . Bruckner was unsophisticated and got pushed around a lot where his publisher was concerned. But, even Robert Haas, Leopold Nowak, Franz Schalk and all the others who had a crack at « improving » Bruckner are a nevermind. Bruckner's music is eternal. The meddling of editors is not. Just ignore the verbosity and adore the music.

The recordings ? Mono, but still detailed and warm. Some compression and a lot of added « acoustic » . You won't be getting this set for the sound, but with the volume turned-up, the set had power and some heft. And, enough detail to recognize the excellence of the flute, clarinet and horn and the fact that the poor oboist must have been going through a nervous breakdown at the time. He consistently has « bad days » . Strings and brass get the job done for the most part.

Bruckner wrote 5 great symphonies (4, 5, 7, 8, 9) , and all 5 receive knock-out performances. The good 6th is also very well done. Symphonies 1, 2 and 3 are youthful and sound here as Bruckner must have intended. As such, Andreae gets the great arc of Bruckner's life music beautifully. « Music & Arts » adds the « Te Deum » as a bonus.

For me, this set is a great discovery. A unique perspective on Bruckner missing from today's jet-set conductors. Many lose the arc and present a road map in bas-relief. Here a climax, there a climax, everywhere a climax. The unsung Andreae presents what Bruckner may have envisaged. The nutty audiophile in me does not mind the mono sound as the performances take you on one hell of a ride. Fresh and new, but from another era. Highly-recommended.

Willem van Otterloo

The Dutch conductor, cellist and composer Jan Willem van Otterloo was born on 27 December 1907 in Winterswijk, Gelderland, in the Netherlands, and died on 27 July 1978 in the Melbourne suburb of East Saint-Kilda.

Van Otterloo was the son of William Frederik van Otterloo, a railway inspector, and his wife Anna Catharina van Otterloo (« née » Enderlé) . He qualified to study medicine at Utrecht University but switched to studying cello and composition at the Amsterdam Conservatory. While playing as a cellist in the Utrecht « Stedelijk Orkest » , he won a composition prize from the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra for his Suite No. 3, which he presented in his 1932 conducting debut, also with that Orchestra. He held posts with the Utrecht « Stedelijk Orkest » , before being appointed chief conductor of the « Residentie Orkest » in The Hague (1949-1973) .

He spent his last 11 years in Australia. From 1967 to 1970, he was chief conductor of the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra and, in 1971, he was appointed chief conductor of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, where he remained for the rest of his life.

Particularly prized for his performances of 19th and 20th Century music, he made numerous commercial recordings, mostly for « Philips » Records, with « Residentie Orkest » , « Concertgebouworkest » , Berlin Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, Vienna Symphony, Orchestre Lamoureux and (on much rarer occasions) the Sydney Symphony.

He died in 1978 from injuries suffered in an automobile accident. His body was flown to The Hague for cremation.

His notable students include Graham George and Miroslav Miletić.

Van Otterloo was married and divorced 4 times in the Netherlands. He married Elisabeth ter Hoeve, on 1 August 1935 (divorce 1938) . On 22 April 1941, he married Anette Jacoba Adriana Heukers, with whom, in December of that year, he had a son, Rogier van Otterloo (1941-1988) , who would become a well-known conductor in the Netherlands as well. He and Anette divorced in April 1943, but remarried on 28 April 1944. They would have another son and 2 daughters, but divorced again on 20 September 1954. 10 days later, he married Susanne Maria Anna Wildmann with whom he had another daughter. A month after his 4th divorce, he married Carola Gertie Ludewig (born 1945) on 12 August 1970, in Australia.

...

Willem van Otterloo initially studied medicine before changing to music. He entered the Amsterdam Conservatory in 1928, studying cello with Max Orobio de Castro and composition with Sem Dresden and Hendrik Andriessen ; after graduating, he joined the Utrecht Orchestra as a cellist. One of his compositions, the Suite No. 3, won a prize promoted by the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and he made his conducting debut directing this Orchestra in a performance of the work, in 1932. The following year, van Otterloo was appointed as assistant conductor of the Utrecht « Stedelijk » (Municipal) Orchestra, being promoted to chief conductor, in 1937, and remaining with this Orchestra throughout World War II, until 1947. He then was active conducting Operas in Amsterdam before becoming chief conductor of The Hague « Residentie » Orchestra (also known as The Hague Residence Orchestra or The Hague Philharmonic Orchestra) in 1949, a post which he retained until 1973. With the decision of the Dutch electrical company « Philips » to enter the market for commercial sound recordings following the introduction of the long-playing record, both conductor and Orchestra were featured in numerous recordings made by this company. These in turn reflected the high-standards of performance achieved by van Otterloo and his players, who, in 1963, undertook together a tour of the United States.

In 1967, van Otterloo was invited to become the chief conductor of the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra, a position he held for 2 years before becoming the Orchestra's principal guest-conductor. He revisited North America with this Orchestra, in 1967, when it performed at « Expo 67 » in Montreal, Canada, and again, in 1970, when it toured the United States. The following year, van Otterloo was appointed as chief conductor of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra, a post which he held until his untimely death in a car accident ; he was also chief conductor of the Düsseldorf Symphony Orchestra, from 1974. His son Rogier van Otterloo was Holland's leading arranger and composer of popular music during the 1970's and 1980's.

As a composer, van Otterloo was widely admired, and he was an effective interpreter of contemporary music as well as of the traditional repertoire. In addition to his work on the podium and composing, he was active as a teacher of conducting, principally at the Royal Conservatory of The Hague. A strict conductor, his detailed knowledge of the scores which he conducted could make life at times uncomfortable for orchestral musicians. His performances, at all times extremely musical, often possessed considerable flair, as his famous interpretation of Hector Berlioz's « Symphonie Fantastique » well demonstrated. The withdrawal of the « Philips » company from the record industry, and subsequent take-overs and acquisitions, have resulted in the disappearance from the catalogue of most of van Otterloo's extensive discography, which contained many fine performances of works from the traditional repertoire, as well as recordings of music by Dutch composers such as Alphons Diepenbrock, Willem Pijper and Johan Wagenaar. However, in 2006, a comprehensive survey of van Otterloo's recordings was released on the Dutch label, « Challenge Classics » , with the title « Willem van Otterloo : The Original Recordings 1950-1960 » . A radio broadcast of van Otterloo conducting his own Symphonietta for 16 wind instruments (1943) has also been released as part of a survey of the radio recordings of the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, from 1935 to 1950.

Jan William van Otterloo was the son of William Frederik van Otterloo, railways inspector, and his wife Anna Catharina, née Enderlé. He qualified to study medicine at the University of Utrecht but subsequently switched to cello and composition at the Amsterdam Conservatory. Awarded a prize by the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra for his Suite No. 3, he conducted its 1st performance in 1932. He was appointed assistant conductor of the Utrecht Municipal Orchestra (in which he had played the cello) in 1933, and, 4 years, later became joint chief conductor.

From 1949 until 1973, Willem van Otterloo was chief conductor of The Hague « Residentie-Orkest ». He made many recordings with the Orchestra, especially in the 1950's, and toured widely with it in Europe and the United States, as well as conducting the leading Orchestras of many countries. His own compositions included 1 Symphony, 3 Suites, 1 String Quartet and 1 Trio. In recognition of his outstanding contribution to European music, van Otterloo was, among other honours, appointed to the orders of Oranje-Nassau and the Lion of the Netherlands, and the Dannebrog (Denmark) , and to the « Légion d'honneur » (France) .

After successful tours of Australia for the Australian Broadcasting Commission (ABC) , in 1962 and 1965, van Otterloo was chief conductor of the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra (1967-1968) . In 1967, he took the Orchestra on its 1st overseas tour, to North America, where it performed twice at the World Exhibition Fair (« Expo 67 ») at Montreal, Canada. As principal guest-conductor, in 1970, he again toured with the Orchestra. The quality of its 30 performances in Washington, New York and other cities of the United States established Australia's musical reputation. In 1973, van Otterloo became chief conductor of the Sydney Symphony Orchestra (while remaining conductor of the Düsseldorf Symphony Orchestra) . He led the Sydney Symphony Orchestra on its 1974 tour of Britain and Europe. Sympathetic to contemporary music, he incorporated new works of such Australian composers as Peter Sculthorpe, Don Banks, John Anthill and Robert Hughes into the concerts overseas.

Australian musicians revered van Otterloo for his vast musical knowledge, genuineness, empathetic musicality and strong discipline. His ability to train Orchestras to professional standards and to aspire to world-class performance was a special gift. As a conductor, he was one of the « dry-stick » school, but his reputation in Australia was as a musician capable of great emotion, who elicited the best from his players, even if he was reserved and punctilious. His style exacted a fine orchestral sound which avoided the spectacular.

Blue-eyed, silver-haired and handsome, his bearing « courtly and gracious » , van Otterloo looked « like an elderly European statesman » . He loved the music of Bach as well as Bruckner and was an authority on the traditional orchestral repertoire of the 19th and early 20th Centuries. In private, he enjoyed listening to jazz. Other passions were fast cars, fine food and beautiful women. He had been married twice in the Netherlands, both marriages ending in divorce. On 12 August 1970, he married Carola Gertie Ludewig, a 25 year old German-born air hostess, at the office of the government statist, Melbourne. He died from the effects of injuries received in a motorcar accident, on 27 July 1978, at East Saint-Kilda, Melbourne. His body was flown to The Hague for cremation. He was survived by his wife, and by 2 sons and 1 daughter of his 1st marriage and 2 daughters of his 2nd.

The career of conductor Willem van Otterloo was a distinguished one, albeit mostly tucked away in Holland till his last years, which were spent even further out of sight in Australia. Born in 1907, he won 1st prize for a composition to be played by the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in 1932. It was to have been conducted by Willem Mengelberg, who fell ill with the result that van Otterloo conducted it himself. After various smaller posts in Holland, he was appointed to the « Residentie » Orchestra, in 1949, quickly raising its standards. The very informative notes by Otto Ketting stress the fact that, in those days, a chief conductor really was that, dedicating most of his time, right round the year, to conducting and organizing the Orchestra. By January 1961, van Otterloo had already conducted a thousand concerts with Hague « Residentie » Orchestra. He remained their conductor until 1972.

He was disappointed, however, in that he failed to achieve Holland's greatest musical prize, conductorship of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. This fell vacant with the untimely death of Eduard van Beinum, in 1959. After a short hiatus, the decision was made in 1961 to jump a generation and appoint the young Bernard Haitink, then so inexperienced that he had to be « assisted » during his 1st years by the senior (and non-Dutch) conductor Jochum. Van Otterloo was understandably wounded at being passed over and eventually left Holland. His last appointment was with the Sydney Symphony Orchestra.

Even before he became conductor of the « Residentie » Orchestra, van Otterloo had made several recordings with it for « Decca » . He conducted the 1st « Philips » LP with the Orchestra and recorded prolifically for this label until 1961. Most of the discs were with the Hague « Residentie » Orchestra, but set-down in the hall of the « Concertgebouw » for acoustic reasons. There was also a substantial number with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and a few with the Lamoureux Orchestra.

A few discs were made over the next decade for « DGG » and for « MMS / Concert Hall » ; the latter include a Beethoven 7th. But van Otterloo's recording career really picked-up again after his move to Australia. Most of these recordings were for the fledgling « Chandos » label, then linked with « RCA » . Until very recently, any conductor who took-up a post in Australia, New Zealand or Canada fell-out of the bottom of the recording world. I'm not sure how far these late LP's circulated in the Northern Hemisphere at all and precious few seem to have made it to CD. Van Otterloo died in 1978, following a car crash in Melbourne. 2 days earlier, he had completed « The Rite of Spring » with the Sydney Symphony Orchestra. A projected Beethoven cycle had covered Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6.

Otto Ketting's observation that van Otterloo belonged to an age when a chief conductor was really that has already been remarked. The conductor's extensive series of recordings for « Philips » , in the 1950's, would seem to reflect another aspect of a bygone age : a time when a purely national market would repay recording investments. I seriously wonder how many of these LP's reached the United Kingdom market, for example. A fair number of the present recordings already existed when the 1955 edition of « The Record Guide » came-out, yet, van Otterloo's name doesn't appear anywhere in it that I can find. Nor can I find any of his recordings in the 1963 « Art of Record Buying » beyond the 3 I've mentioned. The implication is that they just weren't issued in Great Britain. Some seem to have come-out in the United States on the « Mercury » label.

I also wonder how widely he guest conducted. A thousand concerts with I Orchestra in 12 years do not seem to leave time for much else. Still, as I noted above, he conducted a concert in Naples, in 1961, so he was not entirely unknown outside Holland.

And thus van Otterloo might have remained, a footnote to Dutch orchestral history, or a conductor who sometimes cropped-up as accompanist to more famous names such as Clara Haskil. The Willem van Otterloo Foundation, a Board of 7 Directors, is essentially the creation of van Otterloo's daughter Gaby and her husband Otto Ketting, a composer and trumpeter. An act of filial piety ? It's not quite that simple.

Personal relationships may not have been van Otterloo's strong point since he had 4 divorces and 5 wives. I'm not sure which of the marriages Gaby belongs to, but not the last since she experienced the drama of divorce as a child. As is likely with a young girl, she took her mother's part and, in fact, scarcely knew her father. Furthermore, her husband-to-be had played under van Otterloo as an orchestral trumpeter and disliked him at the time. Later, he came to state that, if he could meet him again, he would take-off his hat to his sheer professionalism. Van Otterloo was an introverted man with a foul temper, and it was this latter that cost him the conductorship of the « Concertgebouw » . Given that the performances presented here reveal a conductor of a similar stature to van Beinum and Haitink, it seems only too likely that his drawback was his personality rather than his musicality.

So far, the Willem van Otterloo Foundation, through « Challenge Classics » , has issued a record of van Otterloo's compositions (CC72180) and a 13-CD set of re-issues (CC 72142) which John Quinn reviewed enthusiastically and chose for « Record of the Month » status. This follow-up likewise contains excellent re-masterings of « Philips » originals. All recordings sound at least as good as you would expect from a commercial recording of that date and, in most cases, much better.

1954 : Le chef Walter Gøehr dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1889, éditée par Theodor Rättig (1890) , avec le « Nederlands Philharmonisch Orkest » (étiquette « Concert Hall Society ») .

Cet enregistrement de la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner est paru dans la série « Concert Hall Society » (numéros : CHS-1195 et CHS-2018, respectivement) ; puis, « Musical Masterpiece Society » (numéro : MMS-2018) .

Ces microsillons 33 tours ont été cités pour la 1re fois dans le 3e supplément du « WERM » (1953-1955) ; ce qui en situe la parution, au plus tôt, fin-1952 et, au plus tard, en 1955. Selon d'autres sources, l'enregistrement date de 1954. L'Orchestre baptisé « Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra » n'a rien à voir avec l'ensemble actuel portant le même nom. À l'époque, il s'agissait d'un regroupement (temporaire) de musiciens provenant de 3 Orchestres différents de la radio néerlandaise.

In the beginning of 1954, the Fekete Bruckner 3rd recording (CHS 1065) was no longer available and had been deleted from the « Schwann Long Playing Record Catalog » . The reason was that « Concert Hall » had now recorded a Bruckner 3rd with Walter Gøehr conducting the Netherlands Philharmonic Orchestra which was released on « Concert Hall » (CHS 1195) and was well received by the critics. In « High-Fidelity Magazine » of April 1954, critic Paul Affelder wrote :

« Walter Gøehr conducts a compact, intense performance that is played in fine fashion by the Netherlands Philharmonic. »

In the 1950's and 1960's, the « Concert Hall Society » Label was active releasing LP's and they included a number of interesting Bruckner performances. One of their earlier releases was of a 1954 recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3, performed by Walter Gøehr (1903-1960) and the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra. This was one of the earliest recordings of the Bruckner 3rd on disc and used the Theodor Rättig edition of the score.

Walter Gøehr

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand (naturalisé anglais) Walter Gøehr est né le 28 mai 1903 à Berlin et est décédé le 4 décembre 1960 à Sheffield.

Gøehr a d'abord étudié avec Ernst Křenek puis à l'Académie des arts de Berlin avec Arnold Schönberg et s'est lancé dans une carrière de chef d'orchestre en travaillant pour la Radio de Berlin, de 1925 à 1932. Il est forcé comme juif de chercher un emploi en dehors de l'Allemagne et se fixe en Angleterre, en 1933, sous le nom de Georg Walter jusqu'en 1948. Il a travaillé pour la « Columbia Record Company » (1933-1939) . En 1937, il a dirigé l'Orchestre philharmonique de Londres dans le 1er enregistrement de la Symphonie en ut de Georges Bizet.

Il était l'un des nombreux musiciens d'origine européenne et de grande formation recrutés par Michaël Tippett pour faire partie du personnel enseignant du Morley College, de 1943 à 1960. En plus d'enseigner la composition, il a également formé des élèves à la direction d'orchestre, dont l'une était la jeune Wally Stott, plus tard connue comme Angela Morley.

Entre 1946 et 1949, il a été chef de l'Orchestre du Théâtre de la « BBC » (le prédécesseur de l'actuel Orchestre symphonique de la « BBC ») et il a dirigé la plupart des orchestres londoniens.

Gøehr a effectué de nombreuses créations importantes à Morley, dont la 1re représentation britannique des « Vespro della Beata Vergine » de Claudio Monteverdi. En 1952, il a réalisé le 1er enregistrement de « L'incoronazione di Poppea » du même compositeur, dirigeant l'Orchestre de la « Tonhalle » de Zürich lors d'une représentation sur scène. Le vinyle 33 tours, paru en 1954, a remporté le « Grand Prix du Disque » la même année.

Le 15 octobre 1943, Gøehr a créé la Sérénade pour ténor, cor et cordes de Benjamin Britten. Le 19 mars 1944, « A Child of Our Time » de Michaël Tippett, à Londres. Il a dirigé la 1re britannique de la « Turangalīla-Symphonie » d'Olivier Messiaen, en 1953.

Gøehr est mort à l'Hôtel-de-ville de Sheffield, au Royaume-Uni, le 4 décembre 1960, immédiatement après la fin d'une exécution du « Messie » de Händel.

Sa Ire œuvre à être couronnée de succès a été « Malpopita », en 1931 ; un Opéra spécialement conçu pour être radiodiffusé. Cette œuvre a été créée à Berlin, le 6 mai 2004, à Berlin (Prenzlauer Berg, Abspannwerk Humboldt) .

En 1942, Walter Gœhr compose une nouvelle orchestration de la Suite pour piano des « Tableaux d'une exposition » de Modeste Moussorgski, comprenant une partie de piano auxiliaire. En 1946, il a orchestré un certain nombre de pièces pour piano de Moussorgski dans une Suite pour orchestre appelée « Pictures from the Crimea » . En 1947, il a composé la musique pour le film-à-succès « les Grandes Espérances » , réalisé par David Lean. Il a également écrit la musique de « David Golder » , un film français réalisé par Julien Duvivier, paru en 1931 ; celle du « Voyage au-delà des vivants » , un film de Gottfried Reinhardt, paru en 1954.

Il fut également bien connu comme chef d'orchestre de musiques de films. Citons « A Canterbury Tale » , composé par son ami Allan Gray.

Il a publié de nouvelles éditions des « Vespro della Beata Vergine » et de « L'incoronazione di Poppea » de Claudio Monteverdi.

(Son fils Alexander Gœhr est un compositeur qui vit au Royaume-Uni.)

...

The German composer and conductor Walter Gœhr was born on 28 May 1903 in Berlin and died on 4 December 1960 in Sheffield.

He studied with Arnold Schönberg in Berlin and embarked on a conducting career, before being forced as a Jew to seek employment outside Germany after working for Berlin-Radio, in 1932. He was invited to become music-director for the « Gramophone » Company (later « EMI ») , so he moved to London. In 1937, he conducted the London Philharmonic Orchestra in the premiere recording of Georges Bizet's Symphony in C. During his years as a staff conductor for « EMI » , he conducted the Orchestra for many recordings, including accompaniments for arias sung by Beniamino Gigli, Richard Tauber and Joseph Schmidt. In more popular items, his name appears on the record labels as « G. Walter » . In addition, he conducted for many Concerto recordings, including some by Benno Moiseiwitsch, Myra Hess and others. After the War, he conducted for several smaller recording companies based in Europe, including for the Concerto recordings of short-lived Australian pianist Noel Mewton-Wood.

As well as teaching composition in Britain, he also instructed pupils in conducting, one of whom was the young Wally Stott, later known as Angela Morley. In England, he worked for the « Columbia » Record Company and, between 1945 and 1948, was conductor of the « BBC » Theatre Orchestra (the predecessor of today's « BBC » Concert Orchestra) ; he was also a skilled arranger. He was one of many musicians of European origin and training recruited by Michael Tippett for the staff of Morley College. Gœhr conducted many important premieres at Morley, including the 1st British performance of Claudio Monteverdi « Vespers of 1610 » .

His 1st successful work was « Malpopita » , in 1931 ; an Opera especially designed for radio broadcast. This work was not scheduled for its 1st live performance until 6 May 2004, in Berlin, Prenzlauer Berg, Abspannwerk Humboldt.

In 1942, he made a new arrangement of Modest Mussorgsky's piano suite « Pictures at an Exhibition » with a subsidiary piano part. In 1946, he arranged a number of Mussorgsky's piano pieces into the orchestral suite called « Pictures from the Crimea » . In 1947, Gøehr composed the music for the much acclaimed film « Great Expectations » , directed by David Lean. He wrote several other film scores. He was also well-known for conducting film soundtracks, including « A Canterbury Tale » , for which his friend Allan Gray had composed the score.

In 1952, Gøehr conducted the 1st recording of « L'incoronazione di Poppea » , conducting the « Tonhalle-Orchester Zürich » in a live stage performance. The LP version, issued in 1954, won a « Grand Prix du Disque » , in 1954.

He also conducted the United Kingdom premiere of Olivier Messiaen's « Turangalila-Symphonie » , in 1953.

Gøehr died in City Hall, Sheffield, United Kingdom, on 4 December 1960, immediately after conducting a performance of Händel's « Messiah » .

His son, Alexander Gøehr, is a composer living in the United Kingdom.

Born into a German-Jewish mercantile family, Walter Gøehr showed early signs of exceptional musical gifts. After studying in Berlin at the Stern Academy and at the Prussian Academy of Arts, where he was a pupil of Arnold Schönberg, he became musical director of the « Reinhardt Theater » in Berlin. Here, in 1927, he conducted Kurt Weill's incidental music for a production of Strindberg's play « Gustav III » directed by Victor Barnowsky. Between 1925 and 1931, Gøehr was a staff conductor for Berlin-Radio, where he composed the music for an early radio Opera, « Malpopita » . With the rise to power of the National-Socialist Party, he left Germany and emigrated to England, where, until 1948, he was known professionally as George Walter. Having been appointed musical director for the « Columbia Graphophone Company » , by then a part of « EMI » , in 1933, Gøehr remained with the company until 1939 and recorded extensively for both the « Columbia » and « HMV » labels. In 1943, he became conductor of the Morley College concerts, a position which he retained for the rest of his life and, in addition, was the conductor of the « BBC Theatre Orchestra » , from 1945 to 1948.

As well as being a proponent of composers such as Arnold Schönberg and Hanns Eisler, Gøehr was also a strong supporter of emerging British composers. He conducted the 1st performances of Benjamin Britten's Serenade with Peter Pears and Dennis Brain (1943) , Michaël Tippett's « A Child of Our Time » (1944) , Mátyás Seiber's « Ulysses » (1949) , and « The Deluge » composed by his own son Alexander (1959) . He was himself an active composer, writing music for films, such as the British productions « Spellbound » (1940) and « Great Expectations » (1946) , and for numerous radio programmes, for which he would also often skilfully adapt music from many different sources. He orchestrated Modest Mussorgsky's « Pictures at an Exhibition » ; and edited for performance Claudio Monteverdi's «

L'incoronazione di Poppea » , which he recorded, and the « Vespers of 1610 » , which he conducted at York, in 1954. He conducted the 1st British performance of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 6, in 1950.

During the last decade of his life, Gœhr made a huge number of recordings for the « Concert Hall Society » , founded by the Josefowitz brothers. These records were sold by mail-order in the United States, Europe and Australia on a variety of labels such as « Musical Masterpiece Society » , « la Guilde Internationale du Disque » and « Concert Hall » . The recordings were also licensed to many other labels, with occasional changes to the performers' credits : on the « Classics Club » label, for instance, Gœhr's name was occasionally adapted to Werner Tergorsky. His considerable experience as a radio and recording conductor, able to extract from Orchestras polished performances under studio conditions and often without the luxury of extensive retakes, was clearly a factor in explaining his success in this role. However, not many of these recordings received either media coverage or extensive reviewing, and so Gœhr's achievement has tended to be significantly under-rated. He died unexpectedly, at the end of 1960, as a result of a heart attack, in Sheffield Town Hall where he was conducting a performance of Händel's « Messiah » .

Many of Gœhr's recordings show a strong musician at work, and often his performances contain a satisfying balance of style and energy. Among his pre-War recordings of note are Georges Bizet's Symphony in C, recorded with the London Philharmonic Orchestra for the « HMV » label, and many Concerto accompaniments, such as the Schumann Piano Concerto with Dame Myra Hess, Mendelssohn's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Ania Dorfman, and Tchaïkovsky's Piano Concerto No. 1 with Egon Petri, all of which were published on the « Columbia » label. Later, « EMI » issued a recording of Gœhr conducting the Philharmonia Orchestra in Michaël Tippett's Concerto for Double String Orchestra, which helped to establish the composer's name. Among the highlights of his « Concert Hall » discography are Haydn's Symphonies Nos. 46 and 96, Mozart's Divertimenti in D, B-flat and F, Beethoven's Symphony No. 5, Bruckner's Symphony No. 3, Tchaïkovsky's Suites Nos. 1, 2 and 3 and « The Voyevoda » , Elgar's « Enigma » Variations, complete accounts of Bach's Mass in B minor, Haydn's « Die Jahreszeiten » , and Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » , and excerpts from Monteverdi's « L'incoronazione di Poppea » , to name just a few.

Gœhr was also a prolific accompanist for the label, making many recordings with soloists such as the violinists Riccardo Odnoposoff and Manoug Parikian, cellist Paul Tortelier, and pianists Artur Balsam and Grant Johannesen. Of especial interest among this group of recordings are those which Gœhr made with the Australian pianist Noel Mewton-Wood. These included Beethoven's Concerto No. 4, Chopin's Concertos Nos. 1 and 2, the Concertos by Schumann, Stravinsky and Bliss, Tchaïkovsky's Concertos Nos. 1, 2, 3 and the « Concert Fantasy » , and Shostakovich's Concerto No. 1 for Piano and Trumpet. The commercial penetration of the « Concert Hall » organisation was extensive, and through his numerous recordings for the label, Walter Gœhr became a significant figure in the general public's post-War musical world.

Walter Gœhr (geboren 28. Mai 1903 in Berlin ; gestorben 4. Dezember 1960 in Sheffield) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Komponist, der nach England emigrierte.

Walter Gøehr studierte zunächst bei Ernst Křenek und war danach von 1925 bis 1928 Meisterschüler bei Arnold Schøenberg an der Preußischen Akademie Berlin. Zugleich arbeitete er bereits ab 1925 als Dirigent beim Berliner Rundfunk. 1932 verlor Gøehr wegen seiner jüdischen Herkunft diese Arbeitsstelle. Er erhielt danach die Stelle eines Musikdirektors bei der Gramophone Company (der späteren « EMI »), und übersiedelte 1933 nach London.

In England arbeitete Gøehr auch für den Rundfunk und dirigierte Konzerte in der Londoner Wigmore Hall. 1945 bis 1948 leitete er das Theaterorchester der « BBC ». Als Dirigent setzte er sich bevorzugt für zeitgenössische Musik ein, beispielsweise für Benjamin Britten oder Michaël Tippett. Unter anderem dirigierte er 1944 die Uraufführung von Tippetts Oratorium A Child of Our Time und 1950 die erste englische Aufführung von Mahlers 6. Sinfonie sowie die Uraufführung der Deutschen Sinfonie von Hanns Eisler am 24. April 1959 in der Staatsoper in Ost-Berlin. Zu seinen Dirigierschülern zählte die englische Komponistin und Dirigentin Angela Morley.

Gøehr verstarb am 4. Dezember 1960 im Rathaus von Sheffield, unmittelbar nachdem er eine Aufführung des Messias von Händel dirigiert hatte.

Sein Sohn Alexander Gøehr ist ein in England lebender Komponist.

Der Werkkatalog von Gøehr, der seinen Schwerpunkt auf Dirigiertätigkeit legte, ist verhältnismäßig schmal. Seine Musiksprache knüpft bei Hindemith, Ravel und dem befreundeten Weill an. 1931 wurde seine Funkoper Malpopita erfolgreich gesendet (das Werk erlebte seine erste szenische Aufführung 2004 in Berlin). Daneben schrieb er sinfonische und kammermusikalische Werke sowie Gelegenheitskompositionen für Film und Theater.

Gøehr erstellte ferner Neuausgaben von Monteverdis Marienvesper und L'incoronazione di Poppea sowie eine Orchesterversion der Bilder einer Ausstellung von Mussorgski.

(The actual conductor and performer have not been identified and, with the number of Bruckner 4th Symphonies being performed, it will be very difficult to find-out.)

The history of the commercially recorded Bruckner Symphonies is peppered with instances where the true identity of the performers has been in question. There are also recordings by such ensembles as the South German Philharmonic and the Hastings Symphony that have never given a public concert.

« Cette bande a soulevé bien des controverses, certains discographes de Fürtwängler mettant en doute la paternité de cette interprétation pour l'attribuer à Hans Kapperstbusch. Pourtant, en ce soir du 10 avril 1954, c'est bien le grand Furt qui était à la tête de la Philharmonie de Vienne, et seul un mauvais archivage de la bande peut-être mise en cause. Les intuitions géniales en matière de rubato, surtout dans le Scherzo et le Finale, semblent bien porter la signature, alors que Kna pratiquait habituellement une lecture plus stable dans la verticalité. Mais au fond, au-delà des discussions de collectionneurs fanatiques, ce qui importe est bien la qualité de ce concert, et là nous sommes servis. Tout y est, puissance évocatrice, spiritualité exacerbée, élan et pulsation dévastateurs, urgence de l'émotion. Bref, une grande version rendue dans des conditions techniques très correctes. Même si la subjectivité immense de cette vision ne lui permet pas de prétendre à la référence absolue, ce document doit absolument être connu. » (Philippe de Souza, Répertoire n° 64, page 41, décembre 1993.)

Lovro von Matačić

Le chef d'orchestre croate Lovro von Matačić est né le 14 février 1899 à Sušak, Autriche-Hongrie (aujourd'hui, Rijeka en Croatie) et est mort le 4 janvier 1985 à Zagreb, en Croatie

Pur produit de la musique viennoise où il a été membre du Chœur de garçons de Vienne avant d'y étudier la musique, il est reconnu comme spécialiste de la musique germanique du XIXe siècle, en particulier d'Anton Bruckner, mais aussi de Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky. De haute et massive silhouette, sa direction précise et dynamique était particulièrement appréciée au Japon. Grâce à ses liens de longue date avec l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque, il fut le 1er chef non-tchèque à diriger le traditionnel concert d'ouverture du Festival du Printemps de Prague, en mai 1984.

Il a été régulièrement invité par l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque ou le « Philharmonia » de Londres avec lequel il a dirigé, à 84 ans, un concert d'anthologie (la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner) . Parmi ses enregistrements, on compte également « la Veuve joyeuse » de Franz Lehár, avec Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, et « Der Freischütz » de Carl Maria von Weber, avec Gottlob Frick. Il a dirigé aussi l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres dans le Concerto pour violon et orchestre n° 1 en sol mineur de Max Bruch et le Concerto pour violon n° 1 en ré majeur de Serge Prokofiev ; les 2 avec le soliste David Oistrakh.

Le chef d'orchestre croate Lovro von Matačić voit le jour le 14 février 1899 à Sušak, près de Rijeka (alors Fiume) , en plein Empire austro-hongrois. Il fait ses études dans la capitale de l'Empire, où il fait partie des Petits-Chanteurs de Vienne (« Wiener Sängerknaben ») avant de travailler, à la « Hochschule für Musik » , le piano et l'orgue avec Dietrich, la théorie avec Walker, la composition et la direction d'orchestre avec Herbst. Mais son véritable Maître dans ce domaine est un disciple de Antonín Dvořák, le Tchèque Oskar Nedbal (1874-1930) .

En 1919, il débute à l'Opéra de Cologne une carrière qui sera essentiellement placée sous le signe du théâtre lyrique. À la fondation du Festival de Salzbourg, il est engagé comme chef des chœurs. De retour dans son pays natal, qui a entretemps acquis son indépendance, il dirige à l'Opéra de Ljubljana (1924-1926) , à celui de Belgrade (1926-1931) et à celui de Zagreb (1932-1938) . Il devient directeur général de la musique à l'Opéra de Belgrade (1938-1942) . Entre 1942 et 1945, il dirige à l'Opéra de Vienne, tout en résidant à Zagreb, alors capitale d'un État croate pro-Nazi. Il y acquiert le grade de colonel dans l'armée des oustachis, distinction que les Serbes ne lui pardonneront jamais, refusant de le laisser diriger à Belgrade après la guerre. Il participe à la fondation des Festivals de Split et de Dubrovnik et de l'Opéra de Skopje.

Sa carrière internationale (timidement amorcée en 1930 lorsqu'il était venu diriger « Boris Godounov » , à Paris) prend son essor au milieu des années 1950 : Walter Legge, directeur artistique de « la Voix de son Maître » , toujours en quête de talents nouveaux, lui confie l'enregistrement d' « Arabella » de Richard Strauß, avec Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, déjà au sommet de sa gloire (il la retrouvera quelques années plus tard dans une gravure légendaire de « la Veuve joyeuse » de Franz Lehár) . La réussite de ce disque attire l'attention sur lui. Il succède à Franz Konwitschny à la tête de la « Staatskapelle » de Dresde (1956-1958) .

The Croatian conductor and composer Lovro von Matačić was born on 14 February 1899 in Sušak, in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and died on 4 January 1985 in Zagreb, Croatia.

He was born to a family that was granted a noble title in the early 17th Century. Growing-up, he was always surrounded by music and art : his father had a career as an Opera singer, and his mother as an actress. After his parents' divorce, the family moved to Vienna where Lovro joined the Vienna Boys Choir of the Royal Court Chapel at the age of 8. The Choir's repertoire must have influenced his later affinities, but most of all through the music of Anton Bruckner. In the Piarists' « Gymnasium », in Vienna, he received training in piano, organ and music theory. His music education continued under distinguished teachers at the Vienna « Hochschule für Musik » which he never attended formally, and at which he did not obtain any degrees.

Matačić proved his talent in practice when, in 1916, he started volunteering as an accompanist at the Cologne Opera. When the 1st War broke-out, however, he volunteered for the army and also became an active revolutionary : in 1918, he joined the circle of left-oriented intellectuals in Vienna who recognized his artistic talent. He already had several works ready ; he recited the poem « Vigilia » to his colleagues, and he was 16 when the « Tonkünstlerorchester » of the Vienna « Musikverein » conducted by Bernhard Paumgartner premiered his Fantasy for orchestra.

Not many of Matačić's compositions have been completely preserved, although he did include some of them in his programs after becoming a distinguished conductor ; such as the « Confrontation Symphony » or the « Konjuh planina » Cantata. After the War, he made a living mostly by playing in cafés, writing reviews, and by short-term conducting engagements in Osijek, Zagreb and Novi Sad where he served the required military service as a military musician. Even then, his performances were marked with Opera pieces and a vocal repertoire, but he did not find a permanent position until 1922 when he was employed by the Ljubljana Opera. In the meantime, he married a Czech singer Karla Dubska who introduced him to the golden portion of Czech music. His 1st success in Ljubljana was the performance of Leoš Janáček's Opera « Jenůfa » , which would subsequently become one of the most often performed Operas of Matačić's repertoire.

After Ljubljana, his engagements and successes lined-up : with the Belgrade Opera and the Obilić Academic Choir, his 1st appearance in front of the Zagreb Philharmonic Orchestra (1927) and the Vienna Symphonic Orchestra at the « Konzerthaus » (1928) , the Letonic State Opera in Riga, and the more permanent move to Zagreb, in 1932, where he spread his activities to Opera, Symphony, and choir repertoire.

In 1936, Matačić conducted the Berlin Philharmonic and became the Orchestra's regular guest. In 1938, he left the position of the permanent conductor at the Croatian National Theatre, in Zagreb, to become the director of the Belgrade Opera and the chief conductor of the Belgrade Philharmonic.

During World War II, Matačić spent most of the time in Zagreb as an army officer, but also continued conducting : he appeared in Zagreb with all major local Orchestras, as well as in Vienna and Berlin. He was the Inspector of Croatian Army's music ensembles and was in charge of the entire corpus of military music in Croatia. His last concert before he was arrested was 2 weeks prior to the capitulation of Germany, on 23 April 1945, he appeared with the State Radio Orchestra. He has always declined to comment in detail on his status during and after the War. In more than a year spent in prison, he was once again given a chance to work in music ; he led the prison orchestra and choir. After his 2nd wife Elizabeta Lilly Levenson, whom he married in 1933, managed to obtain a pardon for him, he was relocated to Skopje, in 1948.

Until 1954, when he managed to get an approval from Tito to be issued a passport, his activities in the former country were limited to Rijeka and Ljubljana, but soon his career gained full international momentum. The recording of Richard Strauß' « Arabella » , in London, for the « Columbia » label marked a new beginning in the conductor's life. He replaced Herbert von Karajan for that recording and, afterwards, signed a 5 year contract with the record company. The following year, he replaced Karl Böhm at the Bavarian State Opera, in Munich, for a triumphal performance of Strauß' « Ariadne of Naxos » . Appearances in Berlin, Stuttgart, Augsburg, Salzburg, Graz and elsewhere followed, where he conducted concert programs, Operas, and often even directed the productions. He was invited to the « Dresden Staatskapelle » , East-Berlin « Staatsoper » , and to tours around Europe, including Ljubljana, Split, and Dubrovnik.

After leaving Dresden, in 1958, Matačić strengthened his ties to Vienna, debuted at Bayreuth where he also started a long-term collaboration with Opera director and Richard Wagner's grandson, Wieland Wagner. He finally travelled to the United States, where he performed at the Chicago Opera. Matačić has won over the Italian audience, too (in 1961, at the Rome Opera, he performed Wagner's « Ring of the Nibelung ») . In 1961, in Frankfurt, he became the chief conductor of the « Städtische Oper » and the prestigious series of Museum Concerts.

He continued working in multiple fields : he recorded for the « RAI » , in Turin, and simultaneously managed the Dubrovnik Summer Festival. He was named Honorary Life-Time Conductor of the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra in Tokyo, conducted Orchestras such as the « Philharmonie » , the Czech, Berlin, and Munich philharmonic Orchestras. He appeared at the Bavarian State Opera, « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires, the « Staatsoper » and « Volksoper » of Vienna. At the « Musikverein » , he regularly conducted the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, sat on the jury for Karajan's conducting competition and, in 1974, became the chief conductor of the National Opera Orchestra of Monte Carlo. The list goes on with his appointment as the chief conductor of the Zagreb Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1970, with which he realized a number of ambitious plans, including support for young conductors through a special series, « Presenting Young Conductors » .

The musicians he collaborated with include Sviatoslav Richter, Arthur Rubinstein, Christian Ferras and Rudolf Buchbinder, Marijana Radev, Ruža Pospíš Baldani, Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Christa Ludwig, Renata Tebaldi, Birgit Nilsson, Leontyne Price, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. He recorded for labels such as « Columbia » and « Supraphon » , covering a vast repertoire. Although Anton Bruckner was at the top of the list for his Symphony and concert repertoire and Richard Wagner, along with his favourite « Orpheus and Eurydice » by Christoph Willibald Gluck and Leoš Janáček's « Jenůfa » at the top of his Opera repertoire, Lovro von Matačić's interest covered a huge span from Palestrina, Monteverdi and Purcell, through Händel, Mozart, Haydn and Beethoven to Mussorgsky, Mahler, Janáček, Smetana, Richard Strauß, Wagner, Verdi and others.

He was especially dedicated to performing the work of Croatian composers. His 1st appearances with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1936, already included a suite from Krešimir Baranović's ballet « Gingerbread Heart » and Jakov Gotovac's Symphonic « Kolo » . The programs of his subsequent international and Croatian performances also included the works of Josip Hatze, Blagoje Bersa, Božidar Širola, Božidar Kunc, Boris Papandopulo, Antun Dobronić and Josip Štolcer-Slavenski, Bruno Bjelinski. Matačić once said :

« One day, when they draw a line, it will not matter what I did for international composers, but how I contributed to Croatian music. »

His numerous efforts in that respect should definitely include his last will and testimony by which he established the Lovro & Lilly Matačić Foundation.

For his anthological interpretations (especially of works by Bruckner and Wagner and of major works of the Slavic repertoire) , he was awarded the Bruckner Medal of the International Bruckner Society, Bruckner Ring of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, Janáček and Smetana Medals of the Czechoslovak Government, Cross of the 1st Order for Arts and Sciences of the President of the Republic of Austria, Hans von Bülow Medal of the Berlin Philharmonic as well as many other awards.

Von Matačić was also active as a composer. His most significant composition is his « Symphony of Confrontations » (« Symphonie der Konfrontationen » ; 1979, revised in 1984) , an hour-long work in 4 movements for 2 pianos, large string orchestra and enormous percussion sections. It deals with the threat of destruction by nuclear weapons in a harsh musical language that includes quotes from the « Dies Irae » theme from Hector Berlioz' « Symphonie Fantastique » .

Lovro von Matačić was one of the great conductors who preserved the authentic late-Romantic tradition into the late-Romantic age.

He was a member of the Vienna Boys' Choir, then studied at the Vienna « Hochschule für Musik » . There, he studied piano, organ, composition, and conducting. His teachers included Herbst and Nedbal. After graduation, he obtained one of the typical entry-level job for young conductors in the Central European tradition, as an Operatic chorus director. This was in the Cologne Opera, where he was considered promising enough that he was given a chance to conduct there, in 1919, his conducting debut.

He worked at the Salzburg Festival on the music staff, and then returned to Yugoslavia which, at the end of World War I, had finally obtained its independence from Austria.

He became the Music Director of the Opera House in Osijek, continuing his career advancement through Opera Houses in the larger cities, Novi Sad, Ljubljana, Zagreb, and, in 1938, the capital, Belgrade. In the same year, he also became the conductor of the Belgrade Philharmonic Orchestra.

After the German invasion of 1941, he resigned his position at the Belgrade Opera (1942) and, from 1942 to 1945, he was conductor of the Vienna « Volksoper » .

After the War, he became the « Generalmusikdirektor » in Skopje. He organized the annual Dubrovnik and Split Festivals. He was permanent guest-conductor at the Opera Houses of Munich and Vienna. From 1956 to 1958, he was « Generalmusikdirektor » of the Dresden « Staatsoper » and « Staatskapelle » Orchestra and, with Franz Konwitschny, co- « Generalmusikdirektor » of the East-Berlin « Staatsoper » .

He appeared in America with the Chicago Lyric Opera, in 1959.

In 1961, Matačić succeeded Georg Solti as « Generalmusikdirektor » of the Frankfurt Opera and Orchestra, remaining there through 1966. In 1965, he was appointed Honorary Chief Conductor of the Tokyo « NHK » (Japanese Radio and Television) Orchestra, in 1965. He was Music Director of the Zagreb Philharmonic, from 1970 to 1980, and of the Monte Carlo Opera, from 1974 to 1979. At the end of these tenures, he became honorary conductor for life of both organizations.

He guest conducted extensively and at various times was principal guest-conductor or permanent guest-conductor at various times of the Berlin Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, London Philharmonic, and Prague Philharmonic. He began conducting Orchestras in America frequently, and led Opera performances at La Scala, the Bayreuth Festival, Opera di Roma, and various other European and Japanese venues.

He was best-known for the late-Romantic repertory, particularly the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner and the music of Richard Wagner, as well as for music of Slavic composers. He received the Bruckner Medal of the International Bruckner Association, the Bruckner Ring of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, the Janáček Medal and the Smetana Medal (awarded by the government of Czechoslovakia) , the Cross of the 1st Order for Arts and Sciences of the President of the Republic of Austria, and the Berlin Philharmonic's Hans von Bülow Medal.

He recorded frequently, and many « dall vivo » recordings of his live and broadcast performances exist. He was especially praised for his control over the immense formal structures of Bruckner's Symphonies and his masterly control of phrasing. However, he also included in his favourite repertory music of the whole Romantic era and the music of Beethoven, Mozart, and Haydn. His reputation with the most serious music of the era did not preclude him from having a light touch where recalled ; his recording of Franz Léhar's « The Merry Widow » , with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, is particularly prized.

As a composer, Matačić was not prolific, but his music was highly-expressive in a highly-chromatic post-Romantic style.

At the age of 9, Lovro von Matačić joined the Vienna Boys' Choir, remaining a member for 3 years. He then entered the Vienna Academy of Music, where he studied piano, organ, composition and conducting, and where his teachers included Herbst and Nedbal. His 1st professional post was that of « répétiteur » and chorus Master at the Cologne Opera, where he made his conducting debut in 1919 ; this was followed by a series of appointments as a conductor in various Opera Houses in the Balkan States : Osijek (1919-1920) , Novi Sad (1920-1922) , Ljubljana (1924-1926) and Belgrade (1926-1932) . Matačić was 1st conductor at the Zagreb Opera, from 1932 to 1938, the year in which he was appointed chief conductor of the Belgrade Opera and of the Belgrade Philharmonic Orchestra ; during this period, he was also a member of the music staff of the Salzburg Festival. He moved to Vienna as a conductor at the Vienna State Opera, in 1942, remaining there until the collapse of the Axis powers. From this period, there exists a sizzling account of the final scene from Richard Strauß's Opera « Salome » with the Bulgarian soprano Ljuba Welitsch, in which Matačić conducts the Vienna Radio Orchestra.

After the end of World War II, he returned to what was now Yugoslavia under the rule of Marshall Tito, playing a significant part in rebuilding musical life there : he helped to found the music Festivals at Split and Dubrovnik, and was chief conductor at Skopje. Invited by Walter Legge to record for « EMI » , in 1954, his 1st recording was of excerpts from Richard Strauß' « Arabella » with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra : a recording which has retained a prominent place in the catalogue for many years. Shortly afterwards, he conducted the London Symphony Orchestra, both in the studio and in concert in London. In 1956, Matačić succeeded Franz Konwitschny as chief conductor in Dresden and of the Dresden « Staatskapelle » and, also during this period (1956-1958) , shared with him the duties of the post of chief conductor at the Berlin State Opera. He developed a busy career as a guest-conductor, appearing at La Scala, Milan, the Rome Opera, the Vienna State Opera, and the Chicago Lyric Opera ; in 1959, he conducted a luminous reading of Wagner's « Lohengrin » at the Bayreuth Festival. At the Frankfurt Opera, he succeeded Georg Solti as chief conductor, in 1961, remaining there until 1966, and leading the company in performances of Strauß' « Salome » and Mozart's « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » at the Sadler's Wells Theatre in London, in 1963. He 1st appeared in Japan, in 1965, later becoming the honorary chief conductor of the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra (Japanese Radio and Television) .

During the late-1950's and early 1960's, Matačić made a number of fine Operatic recordings for « EMI » and the German company « Eurodisc » : these included complete accounts of Puccini's « La fanciulla del West » and Leoncavallo's « Pagliacci » with the forces of La Scala, Milan ; Lehár's « Die lustige Witwe » with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra ; and Weber's « Der Freischütz » and excerpts from Beethoven's « Fidelio » , both with the Frankfurt Opera. He returned to Yugoslavia, in 1970, holding the post of chief conductor of the Zagreb Philharmonic Orchestra until 1980 and, from 1973 to 1979, he was in addition chief conductor of the Monte Carlo Opera Orchestra. At the very end of his life, he returned to the podium in London, conducting the « Philharmonia » Orchestra in a series of concerts which have retained a considerable reputation.

Matačić was a survivor of the Austro-Hungarian Empire and of its musical traditions ; the soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf commented upon his old-fashioned courtesy, typical of the Habsburg way of life. As a musician, he preferred for instance to conduct Anton Bruckner in the editions that were current at the beginning of the 20th Century, having little time for the scholarship of later eras. A man of considerable size, he brought to his performances a surprising degree of physical vitality, and his interpretations possessed the ebb and flow of tempi that were typical of performances before World War II. His recorded legacy may be most easily divided into studio and live recordings. Matačić's Operatic studio recordings, already mentioned, are uniformly excellent. The early recordings for « EMI » are all of considerable note, even though, at the time of their original release, they did not sell well. These include powerful performances of Bruckner's Symphony No. 4, Rimsky-Korsakov's « Sheherazade » , Tchaïkovsky's « Hamlet » and the Theme and Variations from the Suite No. 3, as well as numerous shorter pieces from the Russian repertoire. He recorded a notable series of performances with the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra for the « Supraphon » label, including readings of Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 5, 7 and 9 and of Tchaïkovsky's Symphonies Nos. 5 and 6 which certainly represent him at both his best and his most typical stylistically. His few Concerto recordings included the Violin Concertos No. 1 of both Max Bruch and Sergei Prokofiev with David Oistrakh, and both Grieg's and Schumann's Piano Concertos with Sviatoslav Richter.

Of the many live recordings published, several are outstanding : these include excellent accounts from the Vienna State Opera of Giordano's « Andrea Chénier » , with Renata Tebaldi and Franco Corelli, and of Tchaïkovsky's « Eugene Onegin » with Sena Jurinac, Anton Dermota and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau. A highly-characteristic reading of one of Matačić's « signature » works, Bruckner's Symphony No. 3, has appeared from his late-period with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, and a concert of works by Haydn, Schubert and Gottfried von Einem, with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, has also been published. Recordings of Matačić, especially those of live performances, remain important sound documents, containing as they do a style of interpretation characteristic of the earlier part of the 20th Century, which unexpectedly lived on through such recordings until the late years of that Century.

Lovro von Matačić (geboren 14. Februar 1899 in Sušak, Rijeka, damals Österreich-Ungarn, heute Kroatien ; gestorben 4. Januar 1985 in Zagreb - andere Quellen : Belgrad beziehungsweise Dubrovnik -, damals Jugoslawien) , war ein jugoslawischer Dirigent und Komponist.

Matačić war zunächst Wiener Sängerknabe bevor er in der österreichischen Hauptstadt Komposition und Dirigieren erlernte. Zeit seines Lebens blieb er an das österreichische Repertoire von Joseph Haydn bis Anton Bruckner gebunden, wofür er 1981 von den Wiener Symphonikern mit dem « Brucknerring » geehrt wurde.

In den Jahren 1948 bis 1954 war er als Opern- und Orchesterdirigent in Skopje und Rijeka tätig. 1956 bis 1958 war er Chefdirigent der Dresdner Staatskapelle, 1961 bis 1966 Generalmusikdirektor der Oper Frankfurt, 1972 bis 1979 Generalmusikdirektor des Orchesters Monte Carlo. Er dirigierte auch häufig in Prag, sowie regelmäßig in Berlin, London und Paris, wobei es zu vielen Aufnahmen von Sinfonien und Opern kam. Lovro von Matačić's herkulische Gestalt und dynamische, präzise Orchesterleitung erfreuten sich insbesondere in Japan großer Beliebtheit. Von 1970 bis 1980 war er Hauptdirigent der Zagreber Philharmonie.

Als Operndirigent nahm Matačić unter anderem den Freischütz (mit Rudolf Schock und Gottlob Frick) sowie Die lustige Witwe (mit Elisabeth Schwarzkopf) auf. Nach seinem Tod wurde er auf dem Mirogoj-Friedhof in Zagreb beigesetzt.

Von Matačić trat auch als Komponist von Werken im zeitgenössischen Stil hervor. Sein bedeutendstes Werk auf diesem Gebiet ist die « Symphonie der Konfrontationen» (1979, überarbeitet 1984) , eine viersätzig, einstündige Komposition für zwei Konzertsflügel, großes Streichorchester und riesigem Schlagwerkapparat. Das Werk thematisiert in einer sehr harschen Sprache die weltweite atomare Bedrohung und zitiert das « Dies Irae » - Thema der Symphonie fantastique von Hector Berlioz.

23 octobre 1954 : Le chef Willem van Otterloo dirige au « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam l'Ouverture en sol mineur de Bruckner dans la version de 1878-1880, éditée par Robert Haas (1936) , avec le « Het Residentie Orkest » de La Haye (étiquettes : « Philips » , LP : A00249L / « Épic » , LP : SC 6006 / « Forgotten Records » , CD : FR 156) .

23-26 octobre 1954 : Le chef Willem van Otterloo dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Robert Haas (1944) , avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne (étiquettes « Philips » , LP : A00249/50L / « Épic » , LP : SC 6006 / « Forgotten Records » , CD : FR 144) .

Otto Ketting remarks on Willem van Otterloo's very broad tempo for the Adagio, 2 minutes longer than Günter Wand's 1980 recording and about 7 longer than Carl Schuricht's « MMS » recording with « Residentie » Orchestra. To which I might add that it's also about 2 minutes longer than Wilhelm Furtwängler's Cairo performance and 4 minutes longer than Hans Rosbaud's « VOX » recording.

To my ears, this Adagio is the glory of the performance and a major reason for reviving this recording. Van Otterloo is certainly slow, but never reverential or heavy. The music gently wafts onwards from the opening bars and so it builds up, patiently but inexorably, the climaxes mighty but unforced. Even conductors who begin slowly often opt for a more flowing tempo when the 2nd theme arrives. Many of them cannot resist some sort of accelerando in the big crescendos. Van Otterloo holds steady, triumphantly vindicating the strength of Bruckner's construction. Interestingly, not only is the controversial cymbal clash eschewed, but I believe that, for van Otterloo, the actual climax to the whole movement is not the place where the cymbal clash was inserted by Franz Schalk or whomever, since in his hands the music goes on growing beyond that point till the actual diminuendo begins a few bars later.

Also highly-effective is the Scherzo, vigorous but not hectic. This part of the movement is effective under most conductors. The Trio is more problematic. Van Otterloo is as fine as I've heard, very slow and loving but not sticky or sentimental. A sort of golden nostalgia clings to the notes.

With the 1st movement, I have to nail my colours to the Furtwängler mast. From a slow beginning, he allows the music gradually to gather pace. By the time he reaches the lolling dance material, he's forging ahead pretty fast and he succeeds in transporting the listener in a tide of emotion right through the movement. Theoretically, that's wrong, of course. Van Otterloo builds the movement more patiently, never hurrying, never flagging. And, theoretically, that's right. I don't think van Otterloo loses his way, but I think Bruckner does. Maybe the problem is mine. This is my least favourite Bruckner 1st movement. Beautiful as the opening theme is, later on, it gets gunged-up with fumbling harmonic transitions where Bruckner seems to be getting stuck on purpose. Furtwängler manages to disguise this. Van Otterloo tells it as it is, which has its limitations when it would be better if it wasn't.

With the Finale, van Otterloo again tells it as it is. This time, though, I'm not sure that Furtwängler or anybody else has found a better solution. I belong to that fraternity for whom Bruckner's most perfect Symphony is the 9th because it hasn't got a Finale. Though I get on better with some of his other Finales than with this one. If you don't agree, I should think you'll find van Otterloo ideal in all 4 movements.

This is, however, one recording where sonic limitations may affect our perceptions. The dynamic range is limited and, while the effect is pleasant, the great climaxes just don't envelop the listener as one would wish.

Müller-Kray lernte noch während seiner Schulzeit das Klavier- und Cellospiel. Nach dem Abschluß der Volksschule und des Gymnasiums studierte er an der Folkwangschule Komposition und Theorie. Er absolvierte die Abschlussprüfung als staatlich geprüfter Musiklehrer und übernahm die Leitung der Volkschöre in Essen-Werden und Essen-Steele.

In dieser Doppelfunktion war er bis zu seinem Tode tätig. Unter seiner Leitung wurde nun das sinfonische Repertoire in seiner ganzen Breite gepflegt. Hans Müller-Kray widmete sich vor allem Werken der neueren Musik, die während der Zeit der nationalsozialistischen Kulturpolitik in Deutschland bisher noch nicht zu hören waren. Außerdem beschäftigte er sich mit der Oper und so entstanden über 30 Gesamteinspielungen.

Schüchter studied piano at the « Hochschule für Musik Köln » , composition with Philipp Jarnach, and orchestral conducting with Hermann Abendroth. His debut was at the « Landestheater » of Coburg in Mascagni's « Cavalleria rusticana » and Leoncavallo's « Pagliacci » .

His last position was « Generalmusikdirektor » , in 1962, of the « Dortmunder Philharmoniker » and, since 1966, also Intendant of the Dortmund Opera. He improved the quality of the Orchestra and opened the new Opera House with a performance of « Der Rosenkavalier » by Richard Strauss, with Elisabeth Grümmer as Marschallin, Teresa Zylis-Gara as Octavian and Kurt Böhme as Ochs. In 1967, he conducted the premiere of the Opera « Eli » of Walter Steffens after the drama of Nelly Sachs, a commission of the city of Dortmund.

In 1954, Wilhelm Schüchter conducted recordings of Händel's Organ Concertos with Geraint Jones and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra.

He recorded Operas and excerpts of Operas (« Querschnitte ») for « EMI » , typically sung in German by notable soloists such as Elisabeth Grümmer and Erika Köth.

In 1951, he recorded Richard Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » with Hans Hotter in the title role, Kurt Böhme as Daland, Helene Werth as Senta, Bernd Aldenhoff as Erik, Res Fischer as Mary and Helmut Krebs as Steuermann, with North German Radio Symphony Orchestra and Choir.

With the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » , he recorded excerpts of Gounod's « Margarete » (with Hilde Güden) , Mascagni's « Cavalleria rusticana » at the « Deutsche Oper Berlin » with Leonie Rysanek, Rudolf Schock and Josef Metternich, and Nicolai's « Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor » with Erika Köth, Gottlob Frick and Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau.

He also conducted radio productions, namely for the « NDR » and the « WDR » .

Wilhelm Schuchter was one of those prodigiously talented German conductors who had the misfortune to live in a time filled with geniuses at the podium : Furtwängler, Walter, Abendroth, von Karajan, Krauß, Böhm, Knappertsbusch, Kempe, Schmidt-Isserstedt, and Klemperer. In such company, he never had a chance to move into the forefront of his profession outside of Germany. Despite his lack of international success, however, Schuchter managed to leave behind one major recording of « Lohengrin » that deserves to be a part of any serious Wagner collection.

Born in Bonn, Germany, and educated at the « Hochschule für Musik Köln », he studied with Hermann Abendroth. He made his debut at the podium in Coburg, in 1937, conducting « Cavalleria rusticana » and « I Pagliacci ». His 1st major appointment came that same year, as conductor in the Opera House in Würzburg, where he stayed for 3 years. In 1940, he took an appointed conductor at the Opera House in Aachen, a post he held for 2 years, working under Herbert von Karajan. 2 years later, he joined the Berlin State Opera.

Following the Allied victory and the re-organization of German cultural life, in 1947, Schuchter joined the North German Radio Orchestra as a conductor and deputy to Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt. His major recording career began soon after, principally for « EMI » during the late 78 rpm and early LP era. With the Berlin State Opera Orchestra, he recorded highlights (in an era when complete Opera recordings were rare) from Mozart's « The Marriage of Figaro », « The Magic Flute », and « The Abduction From the Seraglio » ; Rossini's « The Barber of Seville » ; Offenbach's « The Tales of Hoffmann » ; Puccini's « La Bohème » ; and Bizet's « Carmen », among other Operas. With the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, he recorded excerpts from Richard Strauß' « Der Rosenkavalier » and Johann Strauß' « Die Fledermaus ». These were all polished recordings, well-representing key portions of the Operas involved. As an orchestral conductor, Schuchter recorded Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5, Dvorák's Symphony No. 9, Smetana's « The Moldau », and Grieg's « Peer Gynt » .

His major activities and his most significant legacy, however, were in the Operatic field. In 1953, Schuchter conducted « EMI » 's 1st recording of a complete version of Wagner's « Lohengrin » with his North German Radio Orchestra and Rudolf Schock in the title role, Gottlob Frick as King Henry, Maud Cunitz as Elsa, and Josef Metternich as Friedrich. This performance, re-issued on compact disc, in 1995, by « EMI » on its « Références » historical line, remains one of the most finely crafted recordings of the Opera ever laid down and is competitive with all subsequent stereo and digital recordings. The singing has a warmth and power that resounds more than 40 years later and the playing is extraordinary, a match for any Orchestra in the world. Moreover, the sound (despite being limited to monophony) is extraordinary for its era, being both rich and close.

Unfortunately, Schuchter never got to record another complete Opera, eclipsed as he was outside of Germany by figures such as Karajan and Klemperer. His career in the concert-hall was more successful ; in 1958, he took a 3 year appointment as the chief conductor of the NHK Symphony Orchestra, in Tokyo, and after his return to Germany in 1962, he was made music-director of Dortmund. It was in this post, in just 3 years, that Schuchter achieved fame in Germany, raising the musical standards in Dortmund so high that he was promoted in 1965 to artistic director and general manager of the Dortmund State Opera. He remained in this position for the rest of his life and Schuchter was acclaimed for the excellence of the productions mounted by the company and its overall rise to prominence within Germany. His Wagnerian performances in particular were singled-out for praise by critics.

Schuchter was among the 1st generation of conductors in Germany who understood the use of the Orchestra in the studio and this is reflected in his recordings. In contrast to Wilhelm Furtwängler or Hans Knappertsbusch, he saw the intrinsic value of recording and he paid special attention to the spaciousness and opulence of the sound he achieved. When working with sympathetic producers and engineers, as on his « Lohengrin » , the results were extraordinary.

Wilhelm Schüchter (geboren 15. Dezember 1911 in Bonn ; gestorben 27. Mai 1974 in Dortmund) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Der Sohn eines Chorleiters studierte an der Hochschule für Musik in Köln Klavier, Komposition (bei Philipp Jarnach) und Orchesterleitung (bei Hermann Abendroth) . Anschließend debütierte er 1937 am Landestheater Coburg mit der Sizilianischen Bauernehre von Mascagni und Leoncavallos Der Bajazzo. In der Saison 1940-1941 war er am Stadttheater Würzburg engagiert, in der darauffolgenden Saison wirkte er unter Karajan am Stadttheater Aachen. 1943-1944 war er als Erster Kapellmeister am Theater am Nollendorfplatz in Berlin tätig. Von 1945 bis 1957 war er neben Hans Schmidt-Isserstedt stellvertretender Dirigent des Sinfonieorchesters von Radio Hamburg, dem späteren NWDR-Sinfonieorchester beziehungsweise ab 1956 dem NDR Sinfonieorchester. 1953-1955 wirkte Schüchter daneben auch noch als Chefdirigent der Nordwestdeutschen Philharmonie in Herford. In den Jahren 1959-1962 leitete er des NHK-Sinfonieorchester in Tokio. Zuletzt war er von 1962 bis 1974 GMD des Philharmonischen Orchesters der Stadt Dortmund, heute : Dortmunder Philharmoniker, ab 1966 war er auch Künstlerischer Leiter der Oper Dortmund.

Er war eine autoritäre Persönlichkeit und forderte eine Präzision von den Musikern, die eine brillante und oftmals nahezu opulente Klangentfaltung bewirkte und ihn zu einem hervorragenden Orchestererzieher machte. Die Dortmunder Philharmoniker erlebten unter seiner Leitung einen deutlichen Qualitätssprung.

Vor allem für « EMI » spielte er zahlreiche Konzertaufnahmen (Philharmonia Orchestra, Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie) und Opern-Querschnitte ein, vornehmlich in deutscher Sprache mit den wichtigsten deutschen Künstlern seiner Zeit (Erna Berger, Elisabeth Grümmer, Erika Köth, Gottlob Frick, Rudolf Schock) .

Siehe dazu weiter unten den umfangreichen Eintrag im Katalog des Deutschen Musikarchivs. Darüber hinaus befinden sich zahlreiche Produktionen mit ihm in den Archiven deutscher Rundfunkanstalten, namentlich des NDR und des WDR.

Eugen Szenkár

The Hungarian conductor and arranger Eugen Szenkár (actually, Jenő Szenkár) was born on 9 April 1891 in Budapest and died on 28 March 1977 in Düsseldorf.

He originally studied music with his father, a prominent organist. Later, he attended classes at the Academy of Music in Budapest.

He conducted at the « Deutsches Landestheater » in Prague (1911-1913) , the Budapest « Volksoper » (1913-1915) , the Salzburg « Mozarteum » (1915-1916) , in Altenburg (1916-1920) , at the « Frankfurt am Main Oper » (1920-1923) , the Berlin « Volksoper » (1923-1924) , and the « Köln Oper » (1924-1933) . With the advent of the Nazi regime, he was forced, as a Jew, to leave Germany in 1933. He lived in Russia until 1933 and, from 1944, conducted the Brazilian Symphony Orchestra, in Rio de Janeiro. He returned to Germany in 1950, conducted the Mannheim Opera (1950-1951) and was « Generalmusikdirektor » in Düsseldorf, from 1952 to 1960. He also conducted in Tel-Aviv.

Though almost forgotten, Eugen Szenkár was a widely estimated and renowned conductor before World War II. Among others, composers like Béla Bartók, Sergei Prokofiev, Aram Khachaturian were personal friends of him, some of their works he even premiered. Apart from some radio recordings (Hamburg, Cologne) , the musical heritage of Szenkár is in the hand of private collectors.

Eugen Szenkár, ungarisch Jenő Szenkár (geboren 9. April 1891 in Budapest ; gestorben 25. März 1977 in Düsseldorf) war ein ungarischer Dirigent.

Der Sohn des Dirigenten und Komponisten Nándor Szenkár trat bereits im Kindesalter als Pianist und Dirigent auf. Er wurde 1907 in die Kompositionsklasse von Victor von Herzfeld an der Königlichen Musikakademie in Budapest aufgenommen und trat 1911 seine erste Stelle als Korrepetitor an der Volksoper an.

1912 erhielt er einen dreijährigen Vertrag am Deutschen Landestheater in Prag, zunächst als Chorleiter, später als Kapellmeister. Hier war ihm Erich Kleiber als Korrepetitor unterstellt. 1915 kehrte er als Erster Kapellmeister an die Budapester Volksoper zurück, während ihm in Prag Anton von Webern nachfolgte.

1916 wurde Szenkár Hofkapellmeister in Dresden. Hier führte er an der Oper und andere Wagners Ring des Nibelungen und die Opern Richard Strauß' und mit der Staatskapelle die Sinfonien Gustav Mahlers auf. Der Vertrag wurde 1918 beendet.

1920 wurde Szenkár Chefdirigent der Frankfurter Oper, deren Kapellmeister zu der Zeit der Bratschist Paul Hindemith war. In Frankfurt leitete er die Uraufführung von Egon Wellesz' Oper Die Prinzessin Girnara sowie die deutsche Erstaufführung von Bela Bartóks Oper Herzog Blaubarts Burg und des Tanzspiels Der holzgeschnitzte Prinz. Er wurde in Deutschland zum Wegbereiter der Werke Bartóks, mit dem ihn eine Duzfreundschaft verband.

Von 1923 bis 1924 war Szenkár Oberspielleiter der Großen Volksoper in Berlin. 1924 wurde er Nachfolger von Otto Klemperer an der Kölner Oper. Hier leitete er und andere die deutsche Erstaufführung von Sergei Prokofjews Oper Die Liebe zu den drei Orangen und Zoltan Kodalys Singspiel Hóry János, sowie Aufführungen von Wagners Ring des Nibelungen und von fünf Mozart-Opern. Bartóks Pantomime Der wunderbare Mandarin wurde nach der Uraufführung auf Anweisung von Oberbürgermeister Konrad Adenauer vom Spielplan abgesetzt.

Bei Opernhaus-Konzerten führte Szenkár Mahlers 2. , 3. , 4. und siebente Sinfonie auf, dazu die 8. Sinfonie mit 800 Sängern und Arnold Schönbergs Gurre-Lieder mit fast 1000 Mitwirkenden. 1928 gab die Kölner Oper ein Gastspiel an der Wiener Staatsoper mit Mozarts Cosi fan tutte, Händels Julius Cäsar und Debussys Pelléas et Mélisande, das mit Begeisterung aufgenommen wurde. Im gleichen Jahr entstand zum 100. Todestag Beethovens eine Plattenaufnahme von dessen 5. Sinfonie. 1928 und 1932 gab Szenkár Gastspielkonzerte am Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires.

1933 flüchtete er vor den Nationalsozialisten nach Wien. Hier leitete er eine Aufführung von Mahlers 3. Sinfonie mit den Wiener Philharmonikern und eine Aufführung von Wagners Oper Der fliegende Holländer.

1934 folgte Szenkár einer Einladung nach Moskau, wo er das Staatliche Philharmonische Orchester leitete und Gastdirigate am Bolschoi-Theater hatte. Außerdem leitete er eine Meisterklaße für Dirigenten am Staatlichen Konservatorium. Sein bedeutendster Schüler war Kyrill Petrowitsch Kondraschin.

Freundschaften verbanden Szenkár mit Aram Chatschaturjan, Sergei Prokofjew und Nikolai Mjaskowski. Er leitete die Uraufführung der 1. Sinfonie Chatschaturjans, des Zweiten Violinkonzerts Prokofjews und der 16. Sinfonie Mjaskowskis. Auf seine Anregung entstand die Orchesterfassung von Prokofjews Peter und der Wolf.

1937 und 1938 leitete Szenkár Konzerte mit dem von Bronisław Huberman gegründeten Palästinaorchester in Tel-Aviv, Haifa, Jerusalem, Kairo und Alexandria. 1939 kam er als Dirigent des Teatro Municipal nach Rio de Janeiro. Hier gründete er 1940 das Orquestra Sinfônica Brasileira, mit dem er bis 1949 jährlich 80 Konzerte gab.

1949 kehrte Szenkár nach Europa zurück, ließ sich in Köln nieder und dirigierte die Orchester des NWDR in Köln und Hamburg. Von 1952 bis 1956 war er Operndirektor am Düsseldorfer Opernhaus unter dem Generalintendanten Walter Bruno Iltz, daneben bis 1960 Generalmusikdirektor von Düsseldorf. Bei einem Konzert in der Royal Festival Hall führte er 1954 Bruckners 7. Sinfonie unter Standing Ovationen auf. 1958 leitete er die Uraufführung von Egon Wellesz' 5. Sinfonie. 1960 trat er aus Altersgründen als Generalmusikdirektor von Düsseldorf zurück.

William Steinberg displayed early talent as a violinist, pianist, and composer, conducting his own choral / orchestral composition based on texts from Ovid's « Metamorphoses » , at age 13. In 1914, he began studies at the Cologne Conservatory, where his piano teacher was the Clara Schumann pupil Lazzaro Uzielli and his conducting mentor was Hermann Abendroth. He graduated with distinction, winning the Wüllner Prize for conducting, in 1919. He immediately became a 2nd violinist in the Cologne Opera Orchestra, but was dismissed from the position by Otto Klemperer for using his own bowings. He was soon hired by Klemperer as an assistant and, in 1922, conducted Fromental Halévy's « la Juive » as a substitute. When Klemperer left, in 1924, Steinberg served as Principal Conductor. He left 1 year later, in 1925, for Prague, where he was conductor of the German Theatre. He next took the position of music-director of the Frankfurt Opera. In 1930, in Frankfurt, he conducted the world-premiere of Arnold Schönberg's « Von heute auf morgen » .

He was relieved of his post, in 1933, by the 3rd « Reich » because he was Jewish. According to the grandson of composer Ernst Toch, Steinberg was « rehearsing the Opera " Der Fächer " (The Fan) in Cologne, when Nazi brownshirts came storming into the hall and literally lifted the baton out of his hand » . Steinberg, who had married Lotte Stern in Frankfurt, in 1934, was then restricted to conducting concerts for the Jewish Culture League, in Frankfurt and Berlin. The Steinbergs left Germany, in 1936, for the British Mandate of Palestine, which is now Israel. Eventually, with co-founder Bronisław Huberman, Steinberg trained the Palestine Symphony Orchestra, which would later be known as the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. Steinberg was conducting the Orchestra when Arturo Toscanini visited there, in 1936. So delighted was Toscanini with Steinberg's preliminary groundwork for his concerts that he chose him as an assistant in preparing for the « NBC » Symphony Orchestra radio broadcasts.

Steinberg emigrated to the United States, in 1938. He conducted a number of concerts with the « NBC » Symphony Orchestra, from 1938 to 1940. Steinberg conducted summer concerts at Lewisohn Stadium in New York (1940-1941) , led the New York Philharmonic concerts, in 1943-1944, and also conducted at the San Francisco Opera. He became an american citizen, in 1944, and was engaged as music-director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1945 to 1952. He is best-known for his tenure as music-director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, from 1952 to 1976. Steinberg's Pittsburgh appearances, in January 1952, were so impressive that he was quickly both engaged as music-director and signed to a contract with « Capitol » Records. Thereafter, Pittsburgh was the center of his activity although he held other important positions. From 1958 to 1960, he also conducted the London Philharmonic Orchestra, but eventually resigned that post because the added workload led to problems with his arm. He led the New York Philharmonic for 12 weeks while on sabbatical leave from Pittsburgh, in 1964-1965, which led to his engagement as the Philharmonic's principal guest-conductor, from 1966 to 1968. From 1969 to 1972, Steinberg was music-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (with which he had achieved earlier success as guest-conductor) while maintaining his Pittsburgh post. He toured Europe with the Boston Symphony in April 1971.

These additional engagements often led to rumors that Steinberg would leave Pittsburgh for a full-time position elsewhere. In 1968, though he declared :

« We are too closely wed, the Pittsburgh Symphony and I, to contemplate any divorce. »

On another occasion, Steinberg said that conducting had become the profession of a traveling salesman :

« A conductor has to stay put to educate an Orchestra. »

Steinberg guest-conducted most of the major american Orchestras, including the Chicago Symphony, Cincinnati Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, Dallas Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic, San Francisco Symphony, Seattle Symphony, and Philadelphia Orchestra. Abroad, he conducted the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, the Berlin Philharmonic, the Frankfurt Opera and Museum Orchestra, the Frankfurt Radio Symphony Orchestra, the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, « l'Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire » , the « Orchestra dell'Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia » , the « RAI » Orchestra of Rome, the Royal « Concertgebouw » Orchestra (in their 1955 Beethoven cycle) , the Royal Liverpool Philharmonic, the « Tonhalle Orchester Zürich » , the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra, and the « WDR » Symphony Orchestra Cologne. He also appeared at summer Festivals in the United States and Canada (Ambler Temple University Festival, Hollywood Bowl, Ojai, Ravinia, Robin Hood Dell, Saratoga, Tanglewood, and Vancouver) , as well as in Europe (Salzburg, Lucerne, Montreux) . He conducted the Metropolitan Opera in several productions including Samuel Barber's « Vanessa » , Giuseppe Verdi's « Aida » , and Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » during his sabbatical, in 1964-1965.

Steinberg recorded « Don Juan » and his own Suite from « Der Rosenkavalier » with Walter Legge's « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in the summer of 1957. The following year, he conducted them in concerts at Lucerne before assuming the conductorship of the London Philharmonic Orchestra. Steinberg's 1st recording was however made in 1928, when he accompanied Bronisław Huberman in Tchaïkovsky's Violin Concerto with the « Staatskapelle Berlin ». In 1940, Steinberg recorded excerpts from Wagner's « Lohengrin », « Tristan und Isolde », and « Tannhäuser », as well as Mozart's « The Marriage of Figaro », with Metropolitan Opera members, issued anonymously on « World's Greatest Opera » records. After the War, Steinberg made a single album for the « Musicraft » label with the Buffalo Philharmonic : the premiere recording of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 7, in 1946. He led several accompaniments for Concerto recordings on « RCA Victor » by Alexander Brailowsky, Jascha Heifetz, William Kapell, and Arthur Rubinstein.

Steinberg made numerous recordings for « Capitol » Records, all but 2 of them with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. The exceptions included a recording with the Los Angeles Woodwinds of Mozart's « Gran Partita », K. 361, taped in Hollywood, in August 1952, and the aforementioned Richard Strauß disc with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra. His Pittsburgh recordings for « Capitol », all made in the Syria Mosque, included Concertos with Nathan Milstein and Rudolf Firkušný, as well as a cross-section of the Symphonic repertoire from Beethoven to Wagner. Nearly all of Steinberg's « Capitol » recordings were reissued in a 20-CD box set by « EMI », in September 2011.

In February 1960, Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra moved to « Everest » Records but, by mutual agreement, this contract was terminated after 3 releases since « Everest » abandoned their Classical recording program. A casualty of this decision was a planned recording of Gustav Mahler's 6th Symphony with the London Philharmonic Orchestra, which was to have been made in conjunction with Steinberg's performance given as part of the Mahler Centenary, in London. Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, in March 1961, signed a pact with Enoch Light's « Command » label. Light had attended a Steinberg concert in Danbury, Connecticut, a few years before and told the conductor he'd like to record the Orchestra. After the « Everest » contract lapsed, Steinberg subsequently made a number of technically acclaimed records for « Command » on 35mm film recording stock. The « Command » releases, hailed as « outstanding examples of contemporary recording », were made in the Soldiers and Sailors Memorial Hall, in Pittsburgh. Light preferred the sound of this hall to the Syria Mosque for recording. The initial « Command » recordings, Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and Rachmaninoff's Symphony No. 2, were taped on 1-2 May 1961. Steinberg's recording of the Brahms' Symphony No. 2 was nominated for a « Grammy » for Classical Album of the Year in 1962.

Steinberg's « Command » recordings eventually included complete cycles of the Beethoven and Brahms Symphonies, along with a diverse list of other works. « Command »'s Pittsburgh Symphony activity ended after Steinberg recorded Bruckner's 7th Symphony and his early Overture in G minor, 2 arrangements by Robert Russell Bennett, and Dimitri Shostakovich's Symphony No. 1, in April 1968. When Steinberg assumed his post with the Boston Symphony, in 1969, he made several recordings 1st for « RCA », then for « Deutsche Grammophon », which contracted the Boston Symphony upon expiration of the « RCA » pact. His Boston recordings were of the 1st rank, both musically and technically.

Steinberg received numerous awards, including both the Kilenyi Bruckner Medal and the Kilenyi Mahler Medal from The Bruckner Society of America. He was named a member of the International Institute of Arts and Letters, in 1960. Steinberg was given a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame, the same year. The Pittsburgh Chamber of Commerce named Steinberg « Man of the Year » for 1964, for his contributions to the city's cultural life, and for leading the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra on a triumphant tour of Europe and the Middle-East. He was also an honorary member of « Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia », the national fraternity for men in music. Steinberg received an honorary doctorate of music from Carnegie Institute of Technology, in 1954, an honorary doctorate of music from Duquesne University, in 1964, and an honorary doctorate of humanities from the University of Pittsburgh, in 1966. He was named Sanford Professor of Music at Yale University, in 1974. Steinberg died in New York City on May 16, 1978, having entered the hospital after conducting a New York Philharmonic concert on May 1, featuring violinist Isaac Stern.

William Steinberg was noted throughout his career for his straightforward, yet, expressive musical style, leading familiar works with integrity and authority such that they sounded fresh and vital. Despite the dynamic drive of his interpretations, his podium manner was a model of restraint. Steinberg said of his interpretive philosophy :

« One must always respect the character of the music and never try to grow lush foliage in a well tempered English garden. »

Referring to some of his more acrobatic colleagues, Steinberg remarked :

« The more they move around, the quieter I get. »

Pittsburgh principal flute Bernard Goldberg told how Steinberg « looked forward to being 70 years old because only then did a conductor know what he was doing » . Armando Ghitalla, distinguished Boston Symphony principal trumpet, from 1966-1979, said of Steinberg that « his musical taste was one of the finest I've ever heard » . Boston Symphony concert Master Joseph Silverstein said Steinberg was « as sophisticated a musician as I have ever known » .

Steinberg had a wide range of repertoire, including a sympathy for the English music of Elgar and Vaughan Williams. He led several important premieres, including the American premiere of Anton Webern's 6 Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6. During his 1st Pittsburgh season, Steinberg conducted works by Béla Bartók, Alban Berg, Ernst Bloch, Benjamin Britten, Aaron Copland, Roy Harris, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, William Schuman, Igor Stravinsky, Ralph Vaughan Williams, and Heitor Villa-Lobos at the Pittsburgh International Contemporary Music Festival (all of these performances appeared on record, and the Bloch, Schuman, and Vaughan Williams were licensed by « Capitol ») . He was also admired as an interpreter of Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, Mahler, Strauß, and Wagner. He made a famous recording of Holst's « The Planets » with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for « Deutsche Grammophon » , after learning the piece at the age of 70. Unusual for a conductor born in Europe, Steinberg was a sympathetic conductor of George Gershwin's music (he made Gershwin recordings for 3 different labels) . His last Metropolitan Opera appearances were 3 performances of Wagner's « Parsifal » , in April 1974.

Although sometimes criticized for his unusual programming, Steinberg was a champion of certain lesser-known works including Berlioz's « Roméo et Juliette » , Tchaïkovsky's « Manfred » Symphony, Reger's Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart, and his own orchestral transcription of Verdi's String Quartet in E minor. Steinberg said :

« The literature is so enormous. I look into what my colleagues won't. Actually, I am not success minded. I merely dare. I take a risk. Criticism I get anyway. »

Steinberg's prestige, however, filled Carnegie Hall to 80 % capacity under the unlikely circumstance of the 1st all-Schœnberg Orchestral program ever, given in New York.

Steinberg once remarked to a San Francisco Symphony musician he corrected :

« I may be wrong, but I don't think so. »

Violinist David Schneider said :

« This quality of not taking himself too seriously endeared him to the musicians. »

Although all business on the podium, Steinberg was not above a bit of clowning in public ; at one Pittsburgh Symphony fundraiser, he donned a blonde wig on his bald head that Johnny Carson jokingly presented him. Steinberg's puckish humor was often in evidence, as when he told « Time Magazine » that he had conceived « something for the New York snobs : an all-Mendelssohn program. This is really the height of snobbishness, the wonderful answer to the question of just what do the snobs need. »

He said that he spoke 4 and a half languages : the half being English.

Of his habit of eating a steak before every concert he conducted, Steinberg told a columnist :

« So, you see, it's an expensive business ; this concert conducting. »

Referring to a disagreement with violinist Nathan Milstein that led to Milstein walking-out of a rehearsal, Steinberg said :

« He decided he would not stay and I decided I would not have him. »

Concerning acoustics, he said :

« If the hall is resonant, the tempos must be changed. If the acoustics are too bad, you go fast in order to go home quickly ! »

To an interviewer who said he had heard that the conductor did not care for giving interviews, Steinberg replied that it was fine as long as the subject was one that interested him : « For instance, myself. » .

William Steinberg (born Wilhelm Hans Steinberg) was a conductor and an exceptional orchestra builder and interpreter of the Romantic to early 20th Century repertory.

He developed precociously as a musician. At the age of 13, he composed and conducted a Cantata for chorus and orchestra based on selections of Ovid's « Metamorphoses ». He was also a fast-developing pianist and violinist. He studied at Cologne Conservatory with Franz Bölsche in music theory, Lazzaro Uzielli in piano, and Hermann Abendroth in conducting. He won the Wüllner prize in conducting in his graduation year of 1920.

He obtained a position conducting at Cologne Opera, where he was assistant to Otto Klemperer. When Klemperer left, in 1924, Steinberg received the appointment as Principal Conductor. In 1925, he accepted the post of conductor of the German Theatre in Prague. In 1929, he became musical director of the Frankfurt Opera. His tenure there was marked by an interest in modern Opera. His productions included Berg's « Wozzeck », Schönberg's « Von heute auf Morgen », Antheil's « Transatlantic », and Weill's « Aufstieg und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny » .

The advent of Nazi rule, in 1933, effectively ended his German career. He was restricted to conducting concerts for the Jewish Culture League, in Frankfurt and Berlin. This was an insidious creation of the Nazis that both furthered its institutionalized anti-Semitism by creating a segregated organization for a segregated Orchestra, while preserving the illusion that the Nazis goals went no further than ethnic separation. Steinberg left Germany in 1936 for Palestine, where he conducted the new Orchestra there that eventually became the Israel Philharmonic. The Palestine Philharmonic's 1st concert was conducted by Arturo Toscanini. After working with Steinberg, Toscanini invited him to come to the United States as associate conductor of his « NBC » Symphony Orchestra. Steinberg took-up that position in 1938.

Toscanini and Klemperer were Steinberg's 2 mentors. He adopted their clear, faithful approach to the Classic scores and, like Klemperer, lost much of his early interest in modern music. Steinberg guest conducted regularly during his tenure with the « NBC » Symphony Orchestra. In 1945, he became Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1952, he obtained the major appointment of his career, as music-director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. He restored that Orchestra to an artistic high-point. Concurrently, he was musical director of the London Philharmonic Orchestra (1958-1960) .

In 1960, he scored a great success guest conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was the preferred choice of its board for their next music-director, as Charles Münch was stepping down from the position. However, « RCA », the Orchestra's record company, successfully pressured them to appoint Erich Leinsdorf, already on their roster of conductors. After Leinsdorf's tenure, one of mixed success, ended, they did appoint Steinberg to the post, effective in 1969. This was also only a partial success, because then health problems interfered with his abilities and caused frequent substitutions. He left the position in 1972 and restricted his activities.

William Steinberg was born Hans Wilhelm Steinberg in Cologne, Germany, on August 1, 1899. During World War I, Steinberg was in a German military band, playing the horn. From 1918 to 1920, Steinberg studied at the Cologne Conservatory where, in 1920, he won the Heinz Wülner conducting prize. In the 1920's, Steinberg followed the Classic German path for the training of a conductor : a series of provincial Opera posts. Ist was the Cologne Opera, where in 1920, Steinberg was appointed Otto Klemperer's conducting assistant. When Klemperer left Cologne, in 1924, Steinberg was appointed his successor. Cologne was followed by 4 years (1925-1929) in Czechoslovakia at the Prague State Opera (the German Opera in Prague) . While there, Steinberg made his 1st recording in 1928, for « Columbia » , with Bronisław Huberman of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto with the Berlin « Staatskapelle » Orchestra, a famous recording, never out of circulation until today. After Prague, Steinberg then graduated to one of the 1st ranked German Opera companies, the Frankfurt Opera, from 1929 to 1933. In 1933, following the accession to power of the Nazi government, Steinberg was excluded from conducting groups other than of Jewish musicians. Consequently, Steinberg left Germany for Palestine where, with its founder Bronisław Huberman (1882-1947) , William Steinberg began the Palestine Symphony Orchestra, in 1936, and was its 1st Music Director. On December 26, 1936, the Palestine Symphony gave its 1st concert with Arturo Toscanini conducting. Toscanini was impressed by the orchestral preparation done by William Steinberg, and invited Steinberg to become his assistant at the NBC Symphony. As a result, Steinberg arrived in New York City, in 1938, as assistant conductor. From 1945 to 1952, Steinberg was Music Director of the Buffalo Philharmonic. This was followed by the position for which Steinberg is likely most remembered : Music Director of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, from 1952 to 1976. While still Music Director in Pittsburgh, William Steinberg was appointed Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Steinberg toured extensively with both, the Pittsburgh Symphony and the Boston Symphony. Pittsburgh toured Europe for an amazing 11 weeks, from August 10 to November 1, 1964. In April 1971, Steinberg and the Boston Symphony Orchestra also toured Europe. Then, in 1973, Steinberg and the Pittsburgh Symphony toured Oregon, Alaska and Japan, participating in the 1973 Osaka Music Festival. Steinberg's tenure at the Boston Symphony was also beneficial to Seiji Ozawa, because Steinberg had no interest in Tanglewood, and left the running of the Tanglewood Music Center to Ozawa and Gunther Schuller. At the end of the 1971-1972 season, Steinberg relinquished the Boston Music Director position, as he did the Pittsburgh position at the end of the 1975-1976 season, after 24 seasons as Music Director. In December 1977, Steinberg made his last orchestral appearance with the Pittsburgh Symphony. I found the Steinberg concerts with different orchestras, as well as his Boston and Pittsburgh recordings to be competent, yet basically uninspired, including his Bruckner, for which he was often praised. However, I would not share the extreme opinion of a friend who claimed that he believed Steinberg must be deaf (probably he was not serious).

Steinberg hearing Steinberg hearing problem ? (just joking)

Steinberg was appreciated by his colleagues for his wry sense of humor, including about himself. William Steinberg died in New York City, six months after his final appearance with the Pittsburgh Symphony.

William Steinberg was clear about the future direction of his life from an early age : when he was only 13 years old, he conducted his own setting for chorus and orchestra of excerpts from Ovid's « Metamorphoses » , in addition to being active as a pianist and violinist. He studied piano, theory and conducting at the Cologne Conservatory, where his tutors included Hermann Abendroth, and graduated in 1919, winning the Wüllner Prize for conducting. He immediately joined the Cologne Orchestra as a 2nd violinist, only to be dismissed by Otto Klemperer for using his own bowings. Shortly afterwards, however, Klemperer took him on as an unpaid assistant and, in June 1922, he conducted Halévy's « la Juive » at short notice. Promoted to the post of principal conductor at Cologne in 1924, during the following year, Steinberg succeeded Alexander Zemlinsky at the German Theatre in Prague ; and after making his debut with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, at the beginning of 1929, he was appointed chief conductor of the Frankfurt Opera. Here, he led the 1st performances of George Antheil's « Transatlantic » and Schönberg's « Von Heute auf Morgen » , as well as the local premieres of Berg's « Wozzeck » and Weill's « Aufsteig und Fall der Stadt Mahagonny » . In addition, he appeared regularly in Berlin at the « Staatsoper » .

As a result of the assumption of power by the Nazi Party, in 1933, Steinberg was sacked from his post in Frankfurt, but was permitted to conduct for the Jewish Culture League. He became chief conductor of the Berlin branch of this organization, in 1936, the year in which he managed to leave Germany, travelling to Palestine by way of Antwerp, Stockholm and Vienna, in each of which, he enjoyed success as a conductor. In Palestine, he took charge of the Orchestra formed by his colleague the violinist Bronisław Huberman and prepared it for concerts with Arturo Toscanini, at the end of 1936, as well as conducting it from 1937 : Toscanini was sufficiently impressed with Steinberg's work to invite him to take-over from Artur Rodziński, as assistant conductor of the « NBC » Symphony Orchestra in New York. Steinberg 1st conducted this Orchestra during June 1938 and broadcast with it until the end of 1940.

Helped by colleagues from Europe, such as the brothers Adolf and Fritz Busch, Steinberg soon began to gain guest engagements in America : he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra, in 1941, and the New York Philharmonic, in 1943, and served as permanent guest-conductor of the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, from 1944 to 1948, alongside Pierre Monteux. On Toscanini's recommendation, he was appointed as chief conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1945. Referring to himself during his period with the Orchestra, 1945 to 1953, as « Buffalo Bill » , having already taken American citizenship in 1944, he recruited many players from Europe and, through his relentless demand for impeccable performance, he raised the standard of the Orchestra significantly, as may be heard in its 1st recording, that of Shostakovich's Symphony No. 7 « Leningrad » .

Steinberg's success in Buffalo established his name as a conductor of note in the United States and, in 1952, he was appointed to his most significant position, as chief conductor of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. He remained with this Orchestra effectively for the rest of his life, until 1976, and, to quote the critic Richard Freed, it was he who gave it « definition » . In addition to his work in Pittsburgh, he also held several other important posts, as chief conductor of the London Philharmonic Orchestra (1958-1960) , principal guest-conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra (1966-1968) , and chief conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1969-1972) , by which time, he was already suffering from poor health.

Steinberg expressed his vision of the ideal artistic interpreter eloquently in print in 1965 :

« I think it is only he who is capable of making the work speak entirely for itself, who, besides integrity, possesses all implied spiritual traits and virtues of character which he polishes in the furnace of intuition and inspiration, and he who can muster enough modesty to hide himself from the eyes of a crowd craving to be entertained or provoked. »

As a conductor, he shared the philosophy of Toscanini in that it was the conductor's 1st responsibility to reveal as far as possible the intentions of the composer without any personal gloss. At his best, he was held to possess an exemplary command of the baton in terms of clarity and precision and his recordings faithfully reflect his straightforward, uncluttered and deeply considered approach to performance.

For the « Capitol » label, Steinberg made numerous recordings with the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra ; these included powerful accounts of Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 6 « Pathétique » , as well as eloquent readings of 2 excerpts from Wagner's « Götterdämmerung » , and Elgar's « Enigma » Variations. His support for the contemporary music of his lifetime is well exemplified by his recordings of Vaughan Williams's 5 « Tudor Portraits » (an unusual recording taken from a live concert) , Hindemith's « Mathis der Maler » Symphony and the Symphony No. 3 of Ernst Toch, commissioned and 1st performed by Steinberg, in 1955, and notable for its highly-unusual orchestration, including a « hisser » , a tank of carbon dioxide which produces sound by the release of a valve, and a contraption filled with wooden balls set in motion by a rotating crank.

After the Orchestra's relationship with « Capitol » and « EMI » ended, it made a number of excellent « audiophile » recordings for the « Command Classics » label, several of which show Steinberg and the Pittsburghers at their very considerable best. These included the complete Symphonies of Brahms, Bruckner's Symphony No. 7, Rachmaninov's Symphony No. 2, and Stravinsky's « Petrushka » . During his short time with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Steinberg made a number of recordings for « RCA » and « Deutsche Grammophon » . These included typically strong-boned accounts of Holst's « The Planets » , Richard Strauß' « Also sprach Zarathustra » , Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 and Schubert's Symphony No. 9, the « Great C major » . A vivid image of Steinberg's character as a musician has been given by one of his players in the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra :

« He was giving something to the people, handing it gently to them, beautifully. »

24 mai 1956 : Le chef Franz Konwitschny dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 20e concert de la saison.

2-6 juin 1956 : Le chef Hans Knappertsbusch dirige à la « Sofiensaal » la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Franz Schalk (1894) , éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1896) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne (étiquettes : « Decca » stéréo, LP : LXT 5255/6 / « ECM » , LP : 530 / « Universal Classics » , CD : UCCD 9201) .

For several reasons, this was the conductor's least successful Bruckner recording. « Decca » changed their recording site from the familiar « Musikvereinssaal » to the « Sofiensaal » and installed a new recording team there, just as producer Victor Olof resigned from the firm to move to « EMI » . The Orchestra's discomfiture over these events was aggravated by lackluster technical work and a lack of engagement from the podium. Passages such as the crushing octave leaps at bars 329-330 (opening movement) or the build-up to the 1st movement Coda fall flat from want of conductorial thrust. Indicative of the occasional malaise was the horn passage at the a tempo, in bar 403 of the 1st movement. This simply disappeared, not from a Schalk excision, but from a missed entrance that no one bothered to fix.

1956 : Le « Wiener Konzerthaus Quartett » (Anton Kamper, 1er violon ; Carl Maria Tilze, second violon ; Erich Weis, alto ; Franz Kvarda, violoncelle ; accompagné du second alto Ferdinand Stangler) interprète, à la « Mozartsaal » du « Konzerthaus » de Vienne, le Quintette à cordes en fa majeur (WAB 112) de même que l'Intermezzo en ré mineur (sans le Trio) (WAB 113) de Bruckner (étiquettes : « Amadeo » , LP : AVRS 6030 / « Vanguard » , LP : VRS 480 / « Forgotten Records » , CD : FR 436) .

(Ce Quatuor a été fondé en 1934. Ses membres sont des musiciens de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Il s'est produit à ses débuts sous le nom de « Kamper-Kwarda Quartett » . L'ensemble à existé jusqu'en 1967.)

Thierfelder war Kapellmeister am Staatstheater Wiesbaden, sowie nachmaliger Chefdirigent (ab 1938) des 1934 gegründeten Niedersächsischen Symphonie-Orchesters in Hannover, das er bis 1964 leitete. Durch sein außergewöhnliches Durchsetzungsvermögen gegenüber der Stadt Hannover und dem Land Niedersachsen gelang ihm 1950 - nachdem der größte Teil des Orchesters im neugegründeten Rundfunkorchester Hannover des NWDR (heutiger Name NDR Radiophilharmonie) aufging -, die Neugründung des NSO durch die finanzielle Sicherstellung durch die Stadt Hannover und des Landes Niedersachsen zu erreichen. Als Gastdirigent trat Thierfelder im In- und Ausland auf.

27, 30 décembre 1957 : Le chef Hans Rosbaud dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Robert Haas (1944), avec le « Südwest Rundfunk Symphonie Orchester Baden-Baden » (stéréo - étiquettes : « Vox

While most recordings have a fairly straightforward release history, others, because of numerous licensing agreements, can have a torturous one. There is no better example of this than the Hans Rosbaud recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 with the Southwest German Radio Symphony Orchestra.

Between 1955 and 1962, Hans Rosbaud (1895-1962) made a series of Bruckner Symphony recordings with the SW German Radio Symphony Orchestra. Prior to his death, in December of 1962, he had recorded Symphonies 2 to 9. All of the recordings (made for radio broadcast) were recorded in monaural with the exception of the Symphony No. 7 which was recorded in stereo for possible commercial release. One of the 1st commercial appearances of the recording was on a « Tandberg » open-reel tape in their series of « Stereo Tapes for the Perfectionist » . It was also released on a « Vox - Turnabout » LP.

But, over time, things got confusing. The recording has since shown-up on a variety of labels (« Andromeda » / « Parnass » / « Tuxedo » / « Turnabout » / « Membran » / « Quadromania » / « Concert Royale » / « Designo » / « Eurodisc » / « ZYX » , etc.) and the quality has varied considerably. Some, like the « Turnabout » LP have provided the recording as « electronically enhanced for stereo » even though the original was recorded in stereo. That particular LP is even more baffling since some of the movements sound like real stereo while others are poor examples of « electronic stereo » processing. In a 4 CD « Designo » set, the « enhancements » are so bad that they qualified for my « Discographic Horrors » Section.

However, one label (« ZYX » , out of Germany) seems to have put their hands on a good stereo copy and released it in their now out-of-print « GOLD » series. The label also states « Dolby Surround » but none of that is evident in the recording.

Over the years, many Bruckner collectors have owned this recording in one form or another, but here is the best recording available so far (download in .flac format) . (John F. Berky)

1958

1958 : Le compositeur Paul Hindemith dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Turin. Un enregistrement existe.

1958 : Le compositeur Paul Hindemith dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête du « Radio-Sinfonieorchester Stuttgart des SWR » (étiquette « Hänssler SCM » : série « Archiv Reihe ») .

Hindemith was an all-round musician, composer, educator, violinist, violist, as well as having mastered all the instruments of the orchestra to a more or less professional level of proficiency, all of which was more than adequate to prepare him as an orchestral conductor as well. Hindemith's debut as a conductor came at the age of 21, but only after the Second World War, he devoted himself intensively to conducting, attracting invitations from the most famous orchestras. Hindemith's conducting style was strongly influenced by Wilhelm Furtwängler ; he placed the highest value on continuing a living tradition of interpretation. The current album features Hindemith's 1958 recording of Bruckner, and as is apparent in this performance, the mature Master locates Bruckner's achievements as a high-point on the between Bach and his own work.

1958 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version originale, éditée par Alfred Orel (1932) ou Leopold Nowak (1951) , avec le « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » . Un enregistrement existe.

Des coupures sont effectuées dans le Scherzo et le Finale. Charles Münch

Le chef d'orchestre français (né allemand) Charles Münch naît le 26 septembre 1891 à Strasbourg et meurt dans son sommeil le 6 novembre 1968 à Richmond, en Virginie.

Venant d'une famille de musiciens, il fait ses Ires armes au violon dès l'âge de 5 ans avec son père Ernest Münch et au Conservatoire de sa ville natale. Son père est le fondateur du chœur de l'Église Saint-Guillaume de Strasbourg.

En 1905, il rencontre le compositeur Vincent d'Indy venu à Strasbourg. Il étudie le violon avec Lucien Capet à Paris, malgré une inscription à la faculté de médecine. Il effectue un stage avec Carl Flesch à Berlin.

Mobilisé dans l'armée Impériale durant la Première Guerre mondiale, il est gazé à Verdun en 1916.

En 1919, à la signature du traité de Versailles, il devient citoyen français et la lettre « ü » de « Münch » perd son tréma. Jusqu'en 1925, il est professeur de violon au Conservatoire de Strasbourg et 1er violon à l'Orchestre municipal, sous la direction de Guy Ropartz.

De 1925 à 1932, il est 1er violon solo du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig sous la direction de Wilhelm Furtwängler et Bruno Walter. À cette occasion, il étudie la direction d'orchestre et fait ses débuts lors d'un concert historique.

De retour en France, il dirige quelques concerts en louant, grâce au soutien financier de son épouse Geneviève, les services de l'Orchestre des concerts Straram avant de prendre, en 1935, la direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Paris, ensemble constitué à l'initiative d'Alfred Cortot. L'été, il assure les concerts de la saison à Biarritz. Il est nommé professeur de violon à l'École normale de musique de Paris (1936) .

Il est invité à Berlin par la Société Internationale de Musique Contemporaine (1937) . En 1938, il est nommé directeur de l'Orchestre de la Société des concerts du Conservatoire, avec lequel il enregistre la musique de nombreux films français (notamment celle des « Enfants du paradis ») . En 1939, il est nommé professeur de direction au Conservatoire de Paris et effectue ses débuts aux États-Unis avec l'Orchestre de Saint-Louis.

À la fin de la guerre, en 1945, il reçoit la Légion d'honneur pour son rôle de résistant durant l'Occupation. Débuts à Prague avec l'Orchestre philharmonique tchèque.

1946 : 1ers enregistrements pour la maison « Decca » avec l'Orchestre de la Société des concerts du Conservatoire (30 disques) . 1re tournée américaine et canadienne.

1948 : Tournée triomphale aux États-Unis et au Canada à la tête de l'Orchestre national de la « RTF » , ce qui le fait connaître et lui vaudra son engagement à Boston.

En 1949, il effectue une autre tournée aux États-Unis avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York et l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, dont il devient le directeur musical en 1949, succédant ainsi à Serge Koussevitzky. Dès lors, une grande amitié liera Charles Münch et « son » Orchestre de Boston.

En 1952, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston effectue avec son chef sa 1re tournée européenne (Dublin, Édinbourg, Prague, Vienne, Paris, Chartres, Strasbourg) .

En 1955, il participe au Festival de Salzbourg et dirige l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. L'année suivante, l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston se rend en tournée en Europe et en Union Soviétique dans un contexte de Guerre Froide. C'est le 1er Orchestre occidental à se faire entendre à Léninegrad et à Moscou. De 1956 à 1958, il est également président-chef d'orchestre des Concerts Colonne.

1960 : Tournée au Japon et en Australie.

En mai 1962, Münch quitte son poste à Boston après une tournée d'adieu en Extrême-Orient et au Japon. Il revient en France, pour y diriger notamment l'Orchestre national de France. Il devient président de l'École normale de musique.

En 1967, avec Serge Baudo, il fonde (après la dissolution de l'Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire) l'Orchestre de Paris, dont il devient le directeur musical. L'Orchestre part en tournée à l'étranger, notamment en Union Soviétique, où la santé de Münch se dégrade. Il est remplacé pour certains concerts par Paul Paray.

Lors d'une tournée triomphale aux États-Unis avec l'Orchestre de Paris (New York, Philadelphie, Washington) , il décède d'une crise cardiaque, le 6 novembre 1968, à Richmond en Virginie.

Charles Münch est certainement l'une des personnalités les plus marquantes de la direction d'orchestre du XXe siècle : d'une grande élégance, il dégageait une énergie sans bornes, faisant de chacun de ses concerts « un événement, une occasion » (témoignage de Vic Firth, percussionniste de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston) .

Ses interprétations de la musique française, des Romantiques et post-Romantiques (Hector Berlioz, César Franck, Ernest Chausson) aux compositeurs de son temps (Albert Roussel, Maurice Ravel, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Henri Dutilleux) , sont de véritables trésors, témoignant de la vitalité et de la fraîcheur de sa direction.

The French symphonic conductor and violinist Charles Münch (née Münch) was born on 26 September 1891 in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine (at that period annexed by the German Empire) , and died on 6 November 1968 in Richmond, Virginia. He was noted for his Mastery of the French orchestral repertoire, he was best-known as music-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The son of organist and choir director Ernst Münch, he was the 5h in a family of 6 children. He was the brother of conductor Fritz Münch and the cousin of conductor and composer Hans Münch. Although his 1st ambition was to be a locomotive engineer, he studied violin at the Strasbourg Conservatoire. His father Ernst was a professor of organ at the Conservatoire and performed at the cathedral ; he also directed an orchestra with his son Charles in the 2nd violins.

After receiving his diploma, in 1912, Charles studied with Carl Flesch in Berlin and Lucien Capet at the Conservatoire de Paris. He was conscripted into the German army in World War I, serving as a sergeant gunner. He was gassed at Péronne and wounded at Verdun.

In 1920, he became professor of violin at the Strasbourg Conservatoire and assistant concert Master of the Strasbourg Philharmonic Orchestra under Joseph Guy Ropartz, who directed the Conservatory. In the early 1920's, he was concert Master for Hermann Abendroth's Gürzenich Orchestra, in Cologne. He then served as concert Master of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter, from 1926 to 1933.

At the age of 41, Münch made his conducting debut in Paris, on 1 November 1932. Münch's fiancée, Geneviève Maury, granddaughter of a founder of the Nestlé Chocolate Company, rented the hall and hired the Walther Straram Concerts Orchestra. She was also an accomplished translator of Thomas Mann. Münch also studied conducting with Czech conductor Fritz Zweig who had fled Berlin during his tenure at Berlin's « Kroll Oper » .

Following this success, he conducted the Concerts Siohan, « l'Orchestre Lamoureux » , the new « Orchestre Symphonique de Paris » , the Biarritz Orchestra (summer 1933) , the « Société Philharmonique de Paris » (1935 to 1938) , and the « Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire » (1937 to 1946) . He became known as a champion of Hector Berlioz, and befriended Arthur Honegger, Albert Roussel, and Francis Poulenc. During these years, Münch gave 1st performances of works by Honegger, Jean Roger-Ducasse, Joseph Guy Ropartz, Roussel, and Florent Schmitt. He became director of the « Société Philharmonique de Paris » , in 1938, and taught conducting at the « Conservatoire de Paris » , from 1937 to 1945.

Münch remained in France conducting the Conservatoire Orchestra during the German occupation, believing it best to maintain the morale of the French people. He refused conducting engagements in Germany and also refused to perform contemporary German works. He protected members of his Orchestra from the Gestapo and contributed from his income to the French « Résistance » . For this, he received the « Légion d'honneur » with the red ribbon, in 1945, and the degree of « Commandeur » , in 1952.

Münch made his début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on 27 December 1946. He was its Music Director from 1949 to 1962. Münch was also Director of the Berkshire Music Festival and Berkshire Music Center (in Tanglewood) , from 1951 through 1962. He led relaxed rehearsals which Orchestra members appreciated after the authoritarian Serge Koussevitzky. Münch also received honorary degrees from Boston College, Boston University, Brandeis University, Harvard University, and the New England Conservatory of Music.

Münch excelled in the modern French repertoire, especially Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel, and was considered to be an authoritative performer of Hector Berlioz. However, Münch's programs also regularly featured works by composers such as Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and Wagner. His 13 year tenure in Boston included 39 world premieres and 58 American 1st performances, and offered audiences 168 contemporary works. 14 of these premieres were works commissioned by the Boston Symphony and the Koussevitzky Music Foundation to celebrate the Orchestra's 75th anniversary, in 1956. (A 15th commission was never completed.)

Münch invited former Boston Symphony music-director Pierre Monteux to guest conduct, record, and tour with the Orchestra after an absence of more than 25 years. Under Münch, guest-conductors became an integral part of the Boston Symphony's programming, both in Boston and at Tanglewood.

Münch led the Boston Symphony on its 1st transcontinental tour of the United States, in 1953. He became the 1st conductor to take them on tour overseas : Europe, in 1952 and 1956 ; and East Asia and Australia, in 1960. During the 1956 tour, the Boston Symphony was the 1st American Orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union.

The Boston Symphony under Münch made a series of recordings for « RCA Victor » , from 1949 to 1953, in monaural sound and, from 1954 to 1962, in both monaural and stereophonic versions.

Selections from Boston Symphony rehearsals under Leonard Bernstein, Serge Koussevitzky, and Charles Münch were broadcast nationally on the « NBC » Radio Network, from 1948 to 1951. « NBC » carried portions of the Orchestra's performances, from 1955 to 1957. Beginning in 1951, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was broadcast over local radio stations in the Boston area. Starting in 1957, Boston Symphony performances under Münch and guest-conductors were disseminated regionally, nationally, and internationally through the Boston Symphony Transcription Trust. And, under Münch, the Boston Symphony 1st appeared on television.

Münch returned to France and, in 1963, became president of the « École Normale de Musique » . He was also named president of the « Guilde Française des Artistes Solistes » . During the 1960's, Münch appeared regularly as a guest-conductor throughout America, Europe, and Japan. In 1967, at the request of France's Minister of Culture, André Malraux, he founded the 1st full-time salaried French Orchestra, the « Orchestre de Paris » , and conducted its 1st concert on 14 November 1967. The following year, he died of a heart attack suffered at his hotel in Richmond, Virginia, while on an American tour with his new Orchestra. His remains were returned to France where he is buried in the « Cimetière de Louveciennes » . « EMI » recorded his final sessions, including Maurice Ravel's Piano Concerto in G, with this Orchestra, and released them posthumously.

In 1955, Oxford University Press published « I Am a Conductor » by Münch in a translation by Leonard Burkat. It was originally issued in 1954, in French, as « Je suis chef d'orchestre » . The work is a collection of Münch's thoughts on conducting and the role of a conductor.

Dallas Kern Holoman wrote Münch's 1st biography in English, « Charles Münch » . It was published by Oxford University Press, in 2011.

Münch's discography is extensive, both in Boston on « RCA Victor » and at his various European posts and guest conducting assignments on various labels, including English « Decca » , « EMI » , « Nonesuch » , « Erato » and « Auvidis-Valois » .

Münch began making records in Paris before the War, for « EMI » . Münch then made a renowned series of « Decca Full Frequency Range Recordings » (FFRR) in the late-1940's. After several recordings with the New York Philharmonic for « Columbia » , Münch began making recordings for « RCA Victor » soon after his arrival in Boston as Music Director. These included memorable Berlioz, Honegger, Roussel, and Saint-Saëns tapings.

His 1st stereophonic recording with the Boston Symphony, in Boston's Symphony Hall, in February 1954, was devoted to a complete version of « The Damnation of Faust » by Hector Berlioz and was made simultaneously in monaural and experimental stereophonic sound, although only the mono recording was released commercially. The stereo tape survives only fragmentarily. The monaural version of this recording was added to the Library of Congress's national registry of sound. Among his final recordings in Boston was a 1962 performance of César Franck's Symphonic poem « Le chasseur maudit » .

Upon Münch's return to Paris, he made « Erato » discs with the « Orchestre Lamoureux » , and with the « Orchestre de Paris » ; he again recorded for « EMI » . He also made recordings for a number of other companies including « Decca / London » .

A number of Münch's recordings have been available continuously since their original releases, among them Saint-Saëns's Organ Symphony and Ravel's « Daphnis et Chloé » . « RCA » re-issued « Münch Conducts Berlioz » in a multi-disc set, including all of their Münch recordings. « BMG / Japan » has issued 2 different editions of Münch's recordings on CD, 1998 and 2006. The latter was made-up of 41 CDs and encompassed all but a handful of Münch recordings with the Boston Symphony. It made available a number of recordings from the 1st 10 years of Münch's tenure in Boston for the 1st time in more than 50 years.

The Boston Symphony appeared on television with Münch locally on WGBH-TV, Boston, and nationally through a syndicated series. « NHK » broadcast throughout Japan the opening concert of the Boston Symphony's tour of Japan, in 1960. Münch also appeared on film or television with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the Czech Philharmonic, the Hungarian Radio and Television Orchestra, the « Orchestre National de l'ORTF » , and the « Orchestre de Radio-Canada » in Montreal. Several of these performances have been issued on DVD.

A genial conductor with a particular gift for French music, Charles Münch extended the Boston Symphony's glory years (begun under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky) into the early 1960's. Münch was born in the province of Alsace-Lorraine which, at the time (1891) , was controlled by Germany and has long hovered between 2 cultural worlds. Münch himself benefited from both French and German musical training, and his 1st important musical posts were in Germany. Yet, he came to be regarded as the quintessential French conductor, and his recordings of French repertory with the Boston Symphony remain standards by which others are judged. Münch studied violin at the Strasbourg Conservatory, where his father was a professor, and, from 1912, in Paris with Lucien Capet. As an Alsatian, he was conscripted into the German army at the outbreak of World War I. Gassed and wounded as an artillery sergeant, he nevertheless survived the War through sheer resiliency. In 1919, upon returning to Alsace-Lorraine (now, back in French hands) , he took French citizenship, and a violin professorship in Strasbourg. Nevertheless, his professional interests soon sent him to Germany ; he studied violin with Carl Flesch, in Berlin, then moved to Leipzig to take a violin professorship at the Conservatory there, and then became concert Master of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, from 1926 to 1933, during Wilhelm Furtwängler's tenure.

But it was back in Paris, in 1933, where Münch made his successful conducting debut in a self-financed concert with the Straram Orchestra. He conducted the Paris « Orchestre de la Société Philharmonique » (1935-1938) and, in 1937, was named director of the « Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris » , a post he held through World War II. Münch introduced many new works, including, in 1945, Olivier Messiaen's « L'Ascension » ; he quickly became known as a conductor attentive to music's larger formal structures, as well as details of color and sonority. Despite his allegiances, 25 years before, Münch refused to collaborate with the Nazis, and indeed supported the French « Résistance » ; he was awarded the « Légion d'honneur » , in 1945.

Münch's career quickly accelerated after the War. In 1946, he made his debut with the Boston Symphony (and several other American Orchestras) as a guest-conductor, and he toured America with the French National Radio Orchestra in 1948. The following year, he was appointed music-director of the Boston Symphony, which he took on an unprecedented tour of the Soviet Union, in 1956. Münch retired from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1962, but continued to guest conduct, and helped Serge Baudo launch the « Orchestre de Paris », in 1967. On tour in America with that Orchestra, he died the following year.

Münch was easy going in rehearsal, reluctant to drill the spontaneity out of an Orchestra. He was particularly noted as an elegant, colorful interpreter of French music of the 19th and 20th Centuries ; his recordings of that material with the Boston Symphony for « RCA » are still regarded as Classics of their kind. He was a strong advocate for the Franco-Swiss composers of his own generation, especially Roussel, Milhaud, and Honegger. But he also had a good touch with the conservative contemporary music of other lands, as may be heard in his few but important recordings of Bohuslav Martinů, Walter Piston, and Samuel Barber. Indeed, during his Boston years, Münch's commitment to American music was almost as strong as his allegiance to new French works.

Charles Münch's uncle was the distinguished missionary and organist Albert Schweitzer, and his father was the Alsatian choral conductor and organist Ernst Münch (1859-1928) , who gave his son his 1st music lessons on the violin. Charles studied the violin at the Strasbourg Conservatoire, where his father was a professor, and continued with Lucien Capet in Paris, in 1912, and Carl Flesch in Berlin. As Alsace was part of Germany at the outbreak of World War I, he was conscripted into the German army and saw active service : he was made a sergeant of artillery, was gassed at Péronne and wounded at Verdun. Following the end of hostilities, he returned to Alsace-Lorraine (now part of France) , and took French citizenship. Münch became a professor of violin at the Strasbourg Conservatoire, in 1919, and leader of the Strasbourg Municipal Orchestra. He took-up the same position at the Leipzig Conservatory, in 1925, serving also as the leader of the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, whose conductors during this period included Fritz Busch, Wilhelm Furtwängler and Bruno Walter. It was in Leipzig that he had his 1st experience of conducting.

Having returned to France, in 1932, Münch made his Paris debut as a conductor in a self-financed concert (which he later said he had not been able to fund earlier) with the Straram Orchestra. This was sufficiently successful to confirm his decision to pursue a career as a conductor and, in 1935, he became chief conductor of the newly formed Paris Philharmonic Orchestra which he conducted until 1938. Meanwhile, he continued to teach the violin, being made a professor of violin at the « École Normale » , in 1936. He was invited to conduct at the 1937 meeting of the International Society of Contemporary Music in Berlin and, in the following year, was appointed chief conductor of Paris's oldest Orchestra, the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra (« Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire ») ; he also appeared in London at the head of the « BBC » Symphony Orchestra and made his American conducting debut, in 1939, with the Saint-Louis Symphony Orchestra. With the outbreak of World War II, Münch threw himself into his work as conductor of the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, commenting :

« My role is to raise spirits to happier worlds. »

During the War, he refused to collaborate with the Nazi regime, and gave his earnings to the French « Résistance » ; he was made a member of the « Légion d'honneur » , in 1945.

With the coming of peace, Münch's international career took-off rapidly : he appeared in Prague, in 1945, at the 50th celebrations of the foundation of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra and, during the following year, appeared at the Salzburg Festival with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, toured America with the « Orchestre National de Radio France » , the principal French radio Orchestra, and spent a month in London recording for « Decca » with the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra. Having relinquished his post with the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra, in 1946, he appeared for the 1st time with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1947, and with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, in 1948 ; the following year, he succeeded Serge Koussevitzky as chief conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and, in 1952, as director of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, holding both these posts until 1962. He toured with the Boston Symphony Orchestra across Europe, in 1952 and 1956, when it became the 1st American Orchestra to visit the USSR. Münch appeared in Europe sporadically during this period : he conducted the Vienna Philharmonic, again at the Salzburg Festival in 1955, and accepted the presidency of the Concerts Colonne, from 1956 to 1958. Following his departure from America, he conducted little : in 1965, he appeared with the Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra and toured the USSR, once again, with the « Orchestre National de Radio France » . Following the decision to disband the Paris Conservatoire Orchestra and to form the « Orchestre de Paris » , in 1967, Münch was persuaded to become the new Orchestra's 1st chief conductor. During 1968, he toured Russia with the Orchestra, but had to cancel several concerts because of ill-health ; and, in the autumn of the same year, during a further tour by the Orchestra, this time of the United States, Münch suffered a fatal heart attack.

Coming from the divided territory of Alsace, and with experience as an instrumentalist of both German and French musical cultures, Charles Münch was equally at home in the music of both countries. As a conductor, he was the complete opposite of « intellectual » musicians such as Pierre Boulez, being a wholly spontaneous artist, whose performances could capture the instinct of the moment : « literally anything could happen when he got-up onto the podium » . He was able to realise whatever he wished as he possessed an exemplary stick technique and, at recording sessions, he could adjust issues of balance, phrasing and tempo simply through his gestures without a word to the Orchestra. In his autobiography, « I am a Conductor » , Münch spoke thus of conducting :

« Your thought, your communication must radiate with such force that your Orchestra feel simultaneously the same wishes and desires as you and cannot refrain from expressing them. »

« A friend of mine, a musician in the Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, once said to me :“ When every member of the Orchestra feels that you are conducting for him alone, you are conducting well. ” »

By all accounts, a man of great kindness both on and off the podium, Münch certainly achieved the twin goals of conducting : superb technical execution combined with the spontaneity of the moment.

Münch's discography is large and is centred upon the numerous superbly engineered recordings that he made with the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the « RCA » label. Beside these may be set his earlier recordings made in Paris and London for the 78 rpm medium and his final recordings made predominantly in France. Throughout his career, Münch was a staunch advocate of contemporary music : with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, he recorded Bohuslav Martinů's Symphony No. 6 (which he commissioned) and Walter Piston's Symphony No. 6. As his autobiography clearly demonstrated, Münch was a man of considerable eloquence, who viewed conducting as a sacred trust :

« Music is an art that expresses the inexpressible. It rises far above what words can mean or the intelligence define. Its domain is the imponderable and impalpable land of the unconscious. Man's right to speak this language is for me the most precious gift that has been bestowed upon us. And we have no right to misuse it. Let no one be astonished then that I consider my work a priesthood, not a profession. It is not too strong a word. »

Charles Münch was born in Strasbourg, France, on September 26, 1891 (when the region was still under control of Germany) . From an early age, he studied violin under his organist father, Ernest Münch (1859-1928) . Charles Münch entered the Strasbourg Conservatoire from 1905 to 1912, where his father also taught. Münch, then, studied with the great violinist Carl Flesch in Berlin and with Lucien Capet at the Paris Conservatoire. During World War I, Münch was 1st conscripted into the German army but, in 1918, he became a French citizen. From 1919 to 1925, Münch taught violin at the Strasbourg Conservatoire, and was assistant Concert-Master of the Strasbourg Orchestra. Münch, then, moved to the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra as Concert-Master from 1925 to 1932, 1st under Wilhelm Furtwängler and, then, beginning in 1929, under Bruno Walter. While in Leipzig, Münch also taught violin at the Leipzig Conservatory. While in Leipzig, Charles Münch studied conducting, in part with the Czech musician Fritz Zweig (1893-1984, conductor at the « Kroll Oper » , who later ended-up in Hollywood) . Charles Münch returned to Paris and, on November 1, 1932, he made his conducting debut with the « Orchestre des Concerts Straram » . The Orchestra and the hall of the « Théâtre des Champs-Élysées » were hired by his « fiancé » , Geneviève Maury, an heiress to the Nestlé chocolate fortune. So, like Serge Koussevitzky, Münch got his start in conducting by having the fortune to hire an entire Orchestra and hall for his debut. Münch, then, conducted a series of French Orchestras : in 1933, « l'Orchestre Lamoureux » (Albert Wolff, 1884-1970, was then Music Director) ; « l'Orchestre Symphonique de Paris » (in 1934, following Pierre Monteux) ; « la Société Philharmonique de Paris » (1935-1938) , while, at the same time, teaching at « l'École Normale de Musique de Paris » . Charles Münch, then, became Music Director of « l'Orchestre de la Société des Concerts du Conservatoire » from 1938 to 1946, including through World War II. From 1946 to 1949, Charles Münch traveled widely as a guest-conductor, particularly in the United States. During the 1947-1948 season, Charles Münch was in the competition, along with Dimitri Mitropoulos and Leopold Stokowski, to become Music Director of the New York Philharmonic. Instead of New York, in 1948, Charles Münch was designated to become Serge Koussevitzky's successor as Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the 1949-1950 season.

Charles Münch remained in Boston for 13 seasons. Münch also led the Symphony in 4 major tours. In 1953, Charles Münch led the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 1st transcontinental tour of the United States. In 1952 and 1956, he led European tours. In the 1956 European tour, the Boston Symphony Orchestra was led by Charles Münch and Pierre Monteux and, under Münch, the BSO was the 1st American Orchestra to perform in the Soviet Union. In 1960, Münch lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra on an extensive (and reportedly exhausting) tour of Japan, East-Asia and Australia.

Charles Münch was regarded by many BSO musicians as a protector of their interests, and was both liked and respected. At the end of the 1961-1962 season, Charles Münch left the Boston Symphony Orchestra and passed to a guest-conducting phase of his career. He returned to France where, in 1963, he became director of « l'École Normale de Musique », where he had taught 30 years earlier. In 1967, Charles Münch was prevailed upon to become Music Director of the newly-formed « Orchestre de Paris ». In 1968, he took the Orchestra on a tour of North America, during which Charles Münch died on November 6, 1968, of a heart attack in his hotel room in Richmond, Virginia.

...

Charles Münch (geboren 26. September 1891 in Straßburg ; gestorben 6. November 1968 in Richmond, Virginia) war ein französischer Dirigent elsässischer Abstammung.

Charles Münch war der Sohn des Elsässer Organisten und Chorleiters Ernst Münch. Er studierte Geige am Konservatorium in Straßburg und 1912 bei Lucien Capet in Paris. Einer seiner Lehrer am Straßburger Konservatorium war Hans Pfitzner.

Beim Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges wurde er als Artillerie-Sergeant zum Deutschen Heer eingezogen. Bei Péronne erlitt er eine Gasvergiftung und in der Schlacht von Verdun wurde er verwundet. Nach Kriegsende kehrte er ins Elsass zurück und wurde französischer Staatsbürger.

Nach weiteren Studien bei Carl Flesch in Berlin verfolgte Charles Münch eine Solistenkarriere und lehrte Violine am Straßburger Konservatorium (1919) und dann am Leipziger Konservatorium. Seit 1926 war er Konzertmeister des Leipziger Gewandhausorchesters. Im November 1932 gab er in Paris sein Debüt als Dirigent mit dem « Orchestre Straram ». Erst seine 1933 erfolgte Heirat mit der Enkelin eines der Gründer des Nestlé-Konzerns ermöglichte ihm die Finanzierung seiner weiteren Karriere.

Von 1933 bis 1940 bildete er sich im Dirigieren bei Alfred Szendrei in Paris weiter. Von 1935 bis 1938 war er Dirigent des von Alfred Cortot gegründeten « Orchestre de la Société Philharmonique in Paris » und 1936 erhielt er eine Stelle als Lehrer an der « École Normale de Musique de Paris ». 1938 wurde er zum Direktor der « Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de Paris » ernannt und behielt diesen Posten während der deutschen Besetzung im Zweiten Weltkrieg. Da er die Zusammenarbeit mit den Nationalsozialisten ablehnte und stattdessen die « Résistance » unterstützte, erhielt er 1945 den Orden der Ehrenlegion.

Charles Münch gab sein Debüt in den USA als Gastdirigent des Boston Symphony Orchestra im Dezember 1946. 1948 folgte eine Tournee durch die USA mit dem « Orchestre de la Radio nationale de France » und 1949 wurde er zum Musikdirektor des « Boston Symphony Orchestra » ernannt, mit welchem er und Pierre Monteux 1952 eine erste Europa-Tournee unternahm. 1956 folgte eine weitere Tournee durch Europa und die Sowjetunion. 1962 zog sich

Charles Münch von seinem Posten in Boston zurück und war fortan als Gastdirigent tätig. Außerdem war er 1967 an der Gründung des « Orchestre de Paris » beteiligt. Er starb 1968 in Richmond, als er mit dem « Orchestre de Paris » auf einer Amerika-Tournee war.

Charles Münch erlangte Anerkennung als Interpret des französischen Repertoires. Seine Aufführungen zeichneten sich durch Spontaneität, Farbe und Eleganz aus. Die französische Musik des 20. Jahrhunderts nahm in seinen Programmen einen herausragenden Platz ein. Er brachte neue Werke von Albert Roussel, Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger und anderen zur Aufführung. In seiner Pariser Zeit führte er neue Werke in die Programme des Lamoureux Orchesters, der Shihon Konzerte und der Straram Konzerte ein.

Er schrieb das Werk « Je suis chef d'orchestre » (1954) .

The Southwest German Radio Symphony Orchestra (« SWR » Baden-Baden and Freiburg Symphony Orchestra ; « SWR » Symphony Orchestra ; « Sinfonieorchester des Südwestrundfunks » ; « SWR Sinfonieorchester ») is a Radio Orchestra located in the German cities of Baden-Baden and Freiburg. The 1st incarnation of the Orchestra occurred in 1946, initially with members of the discontinued « SPA » Orchestra of the city as the core of players. The revival of the « SPA » Orchestra, 2 years later, forced the re-organization of the Radio Orchestra. Subsequently, Hans Rosbaud was hired as the Orchestra's 1st chief conductor. Rosbaud was already well-known as a champion of modern music, and Heinrich Strobel, the music-director in charge of the Orchestra, shared this sympathy with contemporary music. Thus, the Orchestra had, and continues to have, as its focus performances of modern music.

Gegründet am 1. Februar 1946 in Baden-Baden unter dem Namen Philharmonisches Orchester des Südwestfunks wurde es noch im selben Jahr in Großes Orchester des Südwestfunks umbenannt. Unter dem ersten Chefdirigenten Hans Rosbaud wurde bereits 1950 mit dem ersten Auftritt bei den Donaueschinger Musiktagen für zeitgenössische Tonkunst der Grundstein für die heutige Ausrichtung des Orchesters gelegt. Seither hat das Orchester etwa 400 Werke uraufgeführt. 1966 wurde das Orchester erneut umbenannt in Sinfonieorchester des Südwestfunks.

1964-1979 : Ernest Bour dirigiert neben György Ligeti und Lontano über 100 Uraufführungen, behält aber auch das klassische Programm bei.

9, 11 (ou 12) mars 1959 : Le chef Eduard van Beinum dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1876-1878, éditée par Robert Haas (1935) , avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » . Concert donné en public (étiquette « Decca ») .

17 mars 1959 : Le chef Carl August Bunte dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Robert Haas (1944) , avec le « Berliner Symphonisches Orchester » . Un enregistrement existe.

19 mars 1959 : Le chef Hans Knappertsbusch dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Franz Schalk (1894) , éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1896) , avec le « Münchner Philharmoniker » (étiquette « Music & Arts » , CD : 1105) .

For this performance of the 5th Symphony, Hans Knappertsbusch used the 1896 Döblinger edition prepared by Franz Schalk. Bruckner's involvement with this publication has long been doubtful. Leopold Nowak discovered that Bruckner himself changed the end of the slow movement in a copyist's score*. In the revision, the final phrase ends on the dominant rather than the tonic. The same score includes several other pencil notations that indicate the composer was contemplating a revision of the work. Haas did incorporate the composer's notation of a potential cut in the Finale from bars 270-373, marked by « Vi-de » in his edition (and in Nowak's) . The Döblinger score left much of this developmental material intact, removing instead a passage from bars 325-353. The most controversial excision in this edition is the bulk of the recapitulation, bars 374-459. It is this radical shortening that, as Professor William Carragan has pointed-out, turns the 1896 Finale into the form of a vast prelude and fugue, followed by the chorale section and Coda.

* See the Preface to the 1990 reprinting of Leopold Nowak's edition of the 5th, Eulenburg No. 463.

The concert reading scores, over the 1956 « Decca » recording, in greater tempo contrasts and livelier accenting, as well as more assertive timpani and brass. The 2nd movement is broader, yet, more flexible. The Scherzo is massive but emphatic, contrasting with the rustic humor of the Trio. The Munich Finale, similar in duration to Vienna, builds far more cumulative power (despite some overload on the amateur tape) , culminating in an overwhelming rendition of the augmented chorale.

22 mai 1959 : Le chef Stanley Pope dirige la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres. Un enregistrement existe.

Stanley Pope

London-born Stanley Pope studied conducting mainly on the European continent. In the early 1950's, he made only 2 recordings : a 10 inch LP of Robert Schumann's 4th Symphony and a 45rpm disc of 4 of Edward Elgar's « Pomp and Circumstance » Marches.

December 1959 : The « Philharmonia » Orchestra of London performs Johannes Brahms' Symphony No. 1 under the baton of Stanley Pope at Royal Festival Hall.

1973 : Havergal Brian's Symphony No. 28 in C minor. « New Philharmonia » Orchestra. « Aries » , LP : 1607 (live recording) .

This pirated recording was made from an air-check of the « BBC » broadcast of the work's premiere by conductor Leopold Stokowski, in 1973. At the time, much was made of the fact that both Stokowski and Havergal Brian, were 91 years old. While the jacket notes ambiguously attribute both the Symphony's performance and that of its disc mate, Brian's Violin Concerto, to the Hamburg Philharmonic Orchestra under Horst Werner, neither deserves this legend.

Thanks to the detective work of critic David Hall writing in the May 1981 « Stereo Review », the pseudonyms of conductors and Orchestras listed on several Brian Symphony recordings were cleared-up, including that of the Stokowski performance. According to musicologist Edward Johnson, the Violin Concerto was played by Ralph Holmes with the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra, in 1969, under conductor Stanley Pope.

The British composer Havergal Brian died in 1972. He was perhaps best-known for his 1st Symphony, the « Gothic ». Scored for nearly 1,000 performers with an average running time of almost 2 hours, it holds the title of the largest Symphony ever composed, according to the Guinness Book of Records. The 1st performance of his Violin Concerto in C major was premiered 34 years after its completion. Composed in 1935, and originally titled the « Heroic », the 1st draft of this Concerto was lost after being left on a train. Ralph Holmes and the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra conducted by Stanley Pope played the work.

In 1995, the conductor Stanley Pope, who had often worked with Robert Simpson during the « BBC » years, died. He had been ill for some years with bone cancer ; as soon as one bone healed another fractured. Despite his own frailty, he frequently rang from his home in Switzerland to find-out how Simpson was progressing after his stroke. Here is the composer's tribute to his old friend :

« We have lost in Stanley Pope a conductor of exceptional gifts which were never properly appreciated, except by musicians. I remember in the old 3rd Programme days my colleague, Leonard Isaacs, asked me to come with him to the Festival Hall to hear a concert conducted by this man of whom I had heard good reports from orchestral musicians. I remember very vividly what we both agreed was, one of the most beautiful imaginable performances of Beethoven's " Pastoral " Symphony. I went to see the conductor afterwards and found him a charming, modest fellow and, afterwards, we had some correspondence about Haydn, initiated by him. We gradually got to know each other very well and became close friends.

One of his great enthusiasms was also one of mine : Anton Bruckner.

Klemperer said that Stanley Pope was the best British conductor of Bruckner and, after a glorious performance of Bruckner's 5th Symphony in the " BBC " studio, I spoke to one of the players and expressed my delight. His reply was :

“ It's the chap out in front. ”

Stanley was always polite to Orchestras, perhaps sometimes a shade too polite. With a bit more fire in his belly, he might have made a bigger name for himself. He always took great care to study Havergal Brian scores I asked him to conduct and these extremely difficult and often enigmatic works usually received somewhat tentative 1st performances, whoever was at the helm. It was always hard for orchestral players easily to make sense of music “ that was completely idiosyncratic without being avant-garde ”, but Stanley did, I think, better than most. We shall miss him greatly not only as a musician but as a kind and sympathetic person, who showed remarkable courage during his last and often painful illness. My wife and I spoke to him regularly on the telephone between the west of Ireland and Geneva and he always sounded as if there was nothing much wrong with him, although he well-knew that he hadn't much longer to live. That kind of cheerful fortitude is an example to us all. » (Robert Simpson, 24 April 1995.)

The noted German conductor, Ferdinand Leitner, studied at the Music School in his home city of Berlin under Fritz Schreker and Julius Prüwer, from 1926 to 1931, as well as receiving instruction from Artur Schnabel and Karl Muck.

After completing his studies, Ferdinand Leitner began appearing as a pianist, particularly as accompanist to Georg Kulenkampff and Ludwig Hoelscher. He made his debut in Berlin as conductor, during this period. In 1935, Fritz Busch engaged him as assistant at Glyndebourne. From 1943 to 1945, he was director of music at the Theatre on the « Nollendorfplatz » in Berlin and, from 1945 to 1946, in Hannover ; from 1946 to 1947, in Munich ; from 1947, in Stuttgart, always in the same function. He became chief musical-director in Stuttgart, in 1949, and served there until 1969. From 1947 to 1951, he was senior musical-director of the Bach Weeks, in Ansbach.

Ferdinand Leitner conducted the rehearsals for the 1st performance of Igor Stravinsky's « The Rake's Progress » in Venice, in 1951, the performance itself being conducted by the composer personally. Composer and conductor, then, alternated. He succeeded Erich Kleiber as conductor of the German Operas at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires, in 1956. Ferdinand Leitner was a pupil at the Berlin High-School for Music, from 1926 to 1931, studying composition with Franz Schreker and conducting with Julius Prüwer, who had in turn studied with Johannes Brahms and Hans Richter ; other contacts during this period were with the pianist Artur Schnabel and the conductor Karl Muck. Having begun his professional musical career as an accompanist to both singers and instrumentalists, among those with whom he worked during this period were the violinist Georg Kulenkampff and cellist Ludwig Hoelscher ; Leitner also assisted Fritz Busch at the 1935 Glyndebourne Festival. His 1st permanent engagement as a conductor was at the « Theater am Nollendorfsplatz » , in Berlin, from 1943 to 1945.

With the collapse of the 3rd « Reich » , Leitner realized that there would be numerous opportunities for aspiring conductors, and was quick to seize these. He worked as a conductor at the Hamburg State Opera, for the 1945-1946 season, and at the Munich State Opera for the following season, 1946-1947, after which, between 1947 and 1951, he held the post of senior musical director of the Bach Weeks, in Ansbach. He conducted the rehearsals for the world-premiere of Igor Stravinsky's « The Rake's Progress » in Venice, in 1951, the performance itself being conducted by the composer after which composer and conductor alternated. In 1947, Leitner moved from Munich to Stuttgart, settling there and becoming chief conductor at the Stuttgart Opera, in 1950. He remained in this post until 1969, playing a central role in establishing Stuttgart as a centre for creative Operatic direction : he conducted 13 new productions by Wieland Wagner, including the world premieres of 2 operas by Carl Orff, « Ædipus der Tyrann » (1959) and « Prometheus » (1968) , as well as Alban Berg's « Lulu » , in 1966. Leitner also worked extensively with the producer Günther Rennert. Following the death of Erich Kleiber, he took-over as conductor of the German repertoire at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires, in 1956.

In 1969, Leitner moved from Stuttgart to Zürich, where he took-up a similar post at the Zürich Opera, remaining there until 1984, and simultaneously serving as principal conductor of The Hague « Residentie » Orchestra, from 1976 to 1980. From 1988 until 1990, he was principal guest-conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of the Italian Radio (RAI) , in Turin ; he also taught at the Accademia Chigiana, in Siena. In addition to his permanent appointments, Leitner was active as a guest-conductor, appearing regularly with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » and Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestras as well as with several of the German Radio Orchestras, and as an Opera conductor in Chicago, Munich and Hamburg.

Leitner played a central role in developing the record catalogue of « Deutsche Grammophon » after World War II, and made over 300 commercial recordings, only a handful of which have retained their place in the general catalogue. As a conductor, equally at home in the Opera House and the concert-hall, he was a thoroughly dependable interpreter of a wide repertoire, and could be relied upon to deliver effective and musical, if not always wholly memorable, performances.

In conversation with Ferdinand Leitner

To say that many of my interview guests are important in the world of music is probably correct. To say that a few are among the greatest of their time is also probably correct. However, to my knowledge, I have only met one who has a bridge in a major city named for him ! Obviously, the politicians and the general public of Stuttgart felt this was an appropriate gesture.

At Lyric Opera of Chicago, we were fortunate to have the artistry of Ferdinand Leitner for 10 Operas over 9 seasons. There were 7 operas by Richard Wagner, including a one-per-season « Ring » , from 1971 to 1974, with (among many others) Birgit Nilsson and Jean Cox. He also led « Tristan und Isolde » with Janis Martin and Jon Vickers ; « Die Meistersinger » in 1977, with Karl Ridderbusch ; and « Tannhäuser » in 1988, with Richard Cassilly and Marilyn Zschau in the Peter Sellars production, which also included Ben Heppner very early in his career as Walther (!) . There were also 2 Operas of Mozart (« Don Giovanni » in 1969, with Tito Gobbi who staged it and sang the title rôle ; and « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » in 1984, with Ruth Welting and Kurt Moll) ; and « Der Rosenkavalier » also in 1973, with Christa Ludwig and Helga Dernes alternating as the Marschallin, and Hans Sotin as Ochs. « Vis-à-vis » his later comments about scheduling other works during a « Ring » , even though he was just doing the 1 Opera, the « Rosenkavalier » began after the last performance of « Siegfried » .

Between performances of « Tristan und Isolde » , in September of 1982, Leitner graciously took time to speak with me at his hotel. He spoke softly and matter-of-factly, and was like a kindly old grandfather giving advice and telling stories from his illustrious life. When we had finished, he apologized for his English. It was, naturally, sometimes a bit convoluted, but I was able to understand what he was trying to say, and I have edited it here so that it is clear and readable.

This interview was recorded at his hotel in Chicago, on September 24, 1982. Portions were transcribed and published in « Wagner News » in January, 1983. Portions were also used (with recordings) on WNIB in 1987, 1992, 1993, 1995, and 1997.

Here is the entire conversation ...

Bruce Duffie : Where is Opera going today ?

Ferdinand Leitner : This is a difficult thing because, in Europe, it's another situation than in the States, and new things, slowly, slowly in Japan, too. They would like to have a « Staatsoper » in Japan. We'll see in the next 5 years, maybe. Each year, there, I give 14 concerts with « NHK » , and they asked me what they must do, and this can be very much.

Bruce Duffie : Why do the Japanese like western music so much ? Is it new and exciting for them ?

Ferdinand Leitner : They love it, and if you ask them, « Is it for you ? » , they say, « That's our music. » There's a reason, which they told me. For maybe 250 years or so, outside music was forbidden by their « Kaiser » . If you say, « Please, show me your older music. » , then, it is very old music, attributed Japanese music. After this time, when the country was opened in the mid- 1800's, then came the outside music very, very fast to them. So, the younger generation and the older, too, say, « It's our music. » It's absolutely normal for them. When I'm conducting, it is always in a hall with 5,000 seats, and each program is done 2 or 3 times and all are sold-out. If I am doing the 9th Symphony by Beethoven, 5 evenings are sold-out ! (Both laugh) So, they are interested. If I say I will do 1 concert with only Schönberg, then maybe not, but it's possible, too, because they are interested. Unlike here and in Europe, in Japan, they buy each ticket and they come from their work directly to the concert. That's the reason that their concerts start at 6:45 in the afternoon. Then, they have so long ways home, mostly one and a half or 2 hours. So, the concert must be ending at 9 o'clock, so it's possible for them to go home.

Bruce Duffie : Do they like Wagner over there, too ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Oh yes. They like all our music. One very clever musician said to me, « We like all of this, but we have it a little bit of difficulty with Schumann. » With Schubert, not, but Schumann, they were puzzled. Bruckner and Brahms and Strauß and all this is normal for them.

Bruce Duffie : I wonder what their problem is with Schumann ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I don't know. I don't understand, and it must be a special thing. I can do from Bach to the modern things. In the last year, I have done the 6th Symphony by Karl Amadeus Hartmann. Nobody knows who it is, but this is one of the greatest composers from our Century. He has now been gone for almost 20 years, and was only 56 when he died. He's from « München » , like a great many others including Reger. He has 8 Symphonies. Last year, I conducted 5 Symphonies from the 8.

Bruce Duffie : Are they tonal ?

Ferdinand Leitner : They are between Reger and Stravinsky, but on the Bavarian side. The 6th Symphony was the 1st one I did in Japan. It takes a very big Orchestra with 12 percussion, but it is a fantastic thing. At 1st, they said to me (sadly) , « This is a half-program, at 25 minutes. Is it not too much ? » Then, it was such a success that they asked to do the Finale again. I was very happy because his widow was there at this concert and, so, she saw the success. It was the same in Rome - and Italians don't like modern music ! It was the same in Paris and other places where I am doing this. I am going now on tour with a German Broadcast Orchestra from Baden Baden. We start in Vienna, Salzburg and so on, and the program is the 6th Symphony by Hartmann and the 6th by Bruckner.

Bruce Duffie : An interesting program !

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, yes. One is 25 minutes and, the other, is 60 minutes, so it's possible. The 2 6ths, I'm doing 8 times.

Bruce Duffie : Do you conduct any Opera in Japan ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Never ... Yes, one time on tour, 7 or 8 years ago with the « Staatsoper München » , together with Sawallisch. He had 2 Operas and I had 2 Operas. I was conducting « Die Walküre » , which is very, very difficult to understand ... at least, I had that feeling, but they understood each word because they are reading. They are so interested ! I said, « How was the 2nd Act - not too long ? Wotan is alone for 25 minutes. » They said, « No, no, no. » This work brought them pleasure.

Bruce Duffie : Were these performances in concert or staged ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Concert. I'm going now for the 7th time and I'm doing the « Domestica Symphony » and the « Alpine Symphony » of Strauß. This is the 1st time for these 2 things.

Bruce Duffie : They are discovering all these new things that they've never heard before.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, but they like it very much if you bring good works. I have done an Opera by Bernd Alois Zimmermann, « Die Soldaten » . This was a good composer, a very good one. I have spoken to the audience before I start because there is a section of 8 minutes where it's 1 tone. But it is so that you're not feeling this 1 note because the instrumentation is very interesting. I showed them the instruments. There are many which are not normal instruments from an Orchestra. It was enormously successful ! You just need to tell them beforehand what to expect because they are interested. It was the same in Holland, too. It's good if you are speaking before the performance.

Bruce Duffie : Let's talk about life in the Opera House. You were the Music Director in Zürich ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, until last year. I am finished then and I am guest-conductor in Zürich for the next 5 years, but I stopped being Director. I've now done 40 years as Director of a great institute, and it's enough, I think. (Both laugh) Now, I'm free for all my other things.

Bruce Duffie : When you're running an Opera House, how much do the financial and day-to-day responsibilities dictate the artistic decisions that you have to make ?

Ferdinand Leitner : In Stuttgart, where I was over 20 years, it was very much to do all the things with money and with engagements, and so on. Not so in Zürich. When I was coming there, I said, « I don't like to sit from morning to evening in an office. » There, they ask me to do more, but they do many more things. I don't know how much a singer might get for a performance, but if I am interested they might say, « No, it's not possible because they are too expensive. » Now, I do not have to deal with that. But you 1st asked about the future of Opera. When I was a boy of 14, they asked me what I would like to do, and I said, « I would like to be director of Opera House. » They said to me, « My boy, this is the end. Opera is finished now. You are at an age where it is too late. »

Bruce Duffie : (Surprised) Opera was declared dead then ???

Ferdinand Leitner : But you see, it's not finished. After the War, it was going-up more and more and more. Now, in the moment, it is a little bit going down, but this is always the same with the arts. It's going down and up, and down and up. It was this way from the beginning. From 1810, the time of Meyerbeer, it was a great thing. Then, it was going down. Then, came Wagner. It was a scandal at 1st, but then was the great era of Mahler. So was it always, and so is it now. Naturally, it is a question of money. It must be that the State gives half, and the private gives half. Then, you can work 5 or 6 months, and give more works. We have in Zürich and in all the Opera Houses in Germany, 320 performances each year. Each day, and Sunday, very often 2 times. You see, Opera is a really popular thing.

Bruce Duffie : Here in Chicago, Ardis Krainik said that she could sell another 20 weeks of Opera, but then the deficit would be so high that she couldn't work with it.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. This is it. The answer is a question of money all the time in Opera. Not the other theater, but in Opera. They must have the Orchestra, of course, and ballet and, then, all the other things. So, in all time, it's a question of money. When the times are better, then, Opera was higher, and when it was going down, the Opera also goes down.

Bruce Duffie : So, it fluctuates with the tenor of the times ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, very much. I see how it is, how normal it is to play Opera each night. It's always sold-out. In Zürich or in German Opera Houses, always sold-out. And it's expensive now with millions going into deficit. This is the situation of the Opera, I think.

...

Bruce Duffie : Let's talk a bit about Wagner. Have you conducted all 10 major works ?

Ferdinand Leitner : All the 10, yes, but not the 11th, not « Rienzi » . I don't like it. I remember I have done all the Wagner things with Wieland Wagner as stage Master, and then came one time « Rienzi » , and I said, « Hm-mm, not with me. » I don't like Meyerbeer either, and « Rienzi » is very much this typical great Opera style.

Bruce Duffie : Sure. It's a wonderful Meyerbeer Opera ! (Both laugh)

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. Very good. But the other 10 are enough. I have done 70 times the « Ring » .

Bruce Duffie : 70 full « Rings » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, full « Rings » and separate « Walküres » and « Götterdämmerungs » , naturally.

Bruce Duffie : When you did the « Ring » , here in Chicago, it was over 4 years. Is that a cycle, or is that really just separate pieces ?

Ferdinand Leitner : This is more separate pieces. I have done the « Ring » in Buenos Aires maybe 15 or 16 years ago, and in 2 months, I was working and did it 6 times. It was one of the biggest successes in my life. I think it is better to see the 4 works together.

Bruce Duffie : What is the ideal spacing ? Monday, Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Normally, in the old time, it was Saturday, Sunday, Wednesday and Saturday. This was normal. Before the « Götterdämmerung » a little bit of time, and before « Siegfried » , too. Only « Rheingold » and « Walküre » were back-to-back, on Saturday and Sunday. A conductor has to stand there for 18 hours.

Bruce Duffie : When someone is going to see the « Ring » on Saturday, Sunday, Wednesday, Saturday, should they go to see other things in between ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, sure. For a great Opera House, a « Ring » is a normal thing.

Bruce Duffie : But I mean for the public. If I'm in the midst of the « Ring » , should I not interrupt it for another Opera ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Better only the « Ring » . But there are other people for « Bohème » and « Butterfly » . For a true Wagnerian, it's a special thing. « Tristan » is, too. I'm sure those who like « Butterfly » don't like to go to « Tristan » . For me, it is not so. I am going to the « Tosca » , too, and it is for me perfect. I can go to the works of another composer. I can hear ; I can do it.

Bruce Duffie : Would you conduct another work in the middle of a « Ring » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. It's too much because, in the morning, you have your rehearsal and, in the evening, you have your performance. That's too much. I think there was one time in my life that, in the last moment, the conductor was sick and I had to do « Carmen » in between. But this is more possible with « Carmen » . It is a Classical thing, so it was not a problem.

Bruce Duffie : Do you ever approve of cuts in the Wagner Operas ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I hate the cuts in « Meistersinger » , « Tristan » , the « Ring » and « Parsifal » . For me, they must be done without cuts. In this « Tristan » , we are doing just 1 cut. It is for the singer of Tristan, otherwise, it would be too much. In the « Meistersinger » , here a few years ago, there were none, and with the « Ring » , too.

The « Siegfried » was Jean Cox. I have done it with him in München, too, and it's hard work for the tenor. In Stuttgart, in the great time of Stuttgart's Opera House, Wolfgang Windgassen was singing the Loge, the Sigmund and the 2 Siegfrieds.

Bruce Duffie : Is that too much to do all 4 of those in a cycle ?

Ferdinand Leitner : It is very much. Yes. You must know how to sing Opera.

Bruce Duffie : Is it hard on the audience to see the same singer in different roles ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No, it's not. Mostly, it's different singers for the Loge and for the Sigmund, but I don't understand that. Wagner is a special thing. Wagner was maybe the greatest man for music theater in the last Century, and this is like Verdi. You must not only speak always of Verdi. It's not necessary. Even in the « Falstaff » , this is a great musical theater.

Bruce Duffie : It seems that musicians love « Falstaff » more than the public.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. Absolutely, but this is a fantasy. It is also like a Symphony. The man was 80 years old when he wrote it. We must be happy that we have all the older times of men who are composers and painters and all the arts.

Bruce Duffie : Is there any composer at all in the history of music that comes close to being the same level as Wagner for you ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. Ist, number 1 is Mozart. It's that way for life. If you are young, if you are old, the 1st man is always Mozart. I have now conducted « The Magic Flute » 250 times, and it is always wonderful like the 1st ! I have done more than 200 performances of « Figaro » , and so on. It is better and better. It's a wonder. For the music theater, not the Symphony, then came Wagner and Strauß on the German side and, on the other side, is for me Rossini and Verdi and Puccini. All 3. It is fantastic that we always have this ; it's a great thing. I have not conducted all of the Strauß. Strauß has 15 Operas, and I have done 9 from the 15. It's a pleasure. It's not work, it's a pleasure.

Bruce Duffie : Is there ever a case where it would be good to do something else on the evening's program with either « Salome » or « Elektra » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : How do you mean ?

Bruce Duffie : A ballet, intermission, « Salome » , or another Opera, intermission, « Salome » .

Ferdinand Leitner : Alone. Strauß told me (he was very old and I was very young) , in Buenos Aires, he conducted in the afternoon « Salome » and, then, the evening « Elektra » . This was normal for them.

Bruce Duffie : That sounds like suicide. (Laughs)

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. But 1 hour 40 minutes is enough.

Bruce Duffie : At the « Metropolitan » , in the 40's, they used to do « Gianni Schicchi » , intermission, « Salome » .

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, yes. Terrible ! I have done in San Francisco « Carmina Burana » , interval, and « Gianni Schicchi » . It was not so terrible, but I don't like this.

Bruce Duffie : Have you ever done all 3 of the « Trittico » in the evening ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No, only 2. Not « Suor Angelica » .

Bruce Duffie : So, « Il Tabarro » , interval, « Gianni Schicchi » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. It's too much. It's very long with the 3, and the « Sister Angelica » is not the best. « Gianni Schicchi » is the highest, better than the « Tabarro » , I think.

Bruce Duffie : When you do « The Flying Dutchman » , do you do it in 1 piece or 3 ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I do « The Flying Dutchman » , in Zürich, in 1. Some years, I cannot do it because I have no time, and I don't know if they do it in 3 or 1. In 1, it is too long but, in 3 Acts, it is also not the best because if you do an interval after the 2nd Act, the 3rd is too short. But if you only do it after the 1st Act, then, it's 2nd part too long. The best is in 1. It's 2 hours and 26 minutes. It's enough.

Bruce Duffie : What about « Capriccio » ? Do you do that in 1 piece or 2 ?

Ferdinand Leitner : In 2. You see, I halved Strauß. He has it written in 1 because it was the high-time in the War, and the air-raids came mostly in the evening, at 10 o'clock. So, we start at 6 o'clock and do it in 1 piece and have no interval. The people can go home and get in the cellar. This was the reason. After the War, the old Master said to the conductor Robert Hager, who was a very good friend of mine, « Please, could you do a small ending and a small new beginning ? » So, he did, and he added 16 bars to end the 1st part, and 8 bars to begin the 2nd part. This is the form, and I do it always now. They did it this way in Munich, and later elsewhere. So, I do it in 2 Acts. It's better. It's too long. It's 2 hours and 40 minutes, so, in 1, it's too much.

Bruce Duffie : Yet, we can sit through « Rheingold » which is about the same.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, but you have many things to see in « Rheingold » . In « Capriccio » , you have only the play and they speak together. Next June, I will do it in concert broadcast from Paris. « Radio Française » asked me to do it and, I week later, a concert with works only from Strauß. There, I do it with the interval and a little bit shorter with cuts, but not too much. Speaking with Strauß, he knows the cuts. He found it very good.

Bruce Duffie : Are there cuts in « Rosenkavalier » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. He didn't like cuts, there. He said to me, « One time in my life, I'd like to hear the 3rd Act without cuts. » I never, in my life, conduct without cuts because the singers don't know it.

Bruce Duffie : (With a gentle nudge) Can't you insist ?

Ferdinand Leitner : (Smiles) Yes, but you must have a fantastic, great stage Master to make sure that you're not feeling how long it is. Most people find the 3rd Act of « Rosenkavalier » starts only with the ending, with the 2 sopranos, and what comes before, this is not important.

Bruce Duffie : (Gently protesting) Oh, but it's such fun !

Ferdinand Leitner : I do the 1st and 2nd Act without cuts and, in the 3rd Act, I take something out from the beginning.

Bruce Duffie : Tell me about « Arabella » . Is this as strong a work as « Rosenkavalier » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. We have a terrible word, it is the « Sklerosenkavalier » . It means it is like « Rosenkavalier » but a little bit less.

Bruce Duffie : A little weaker ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. But I have done « Arabella » very often in the last 2 years, and it is hard. The 2nd Act is going down, but the 1st and the 3rd Act are fantastic. I like it very much. They are going to do it here, in 2 years.

Bruce Duffie : Will you conduct ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. I cannot. I was asked too late. I cannot do « The Flying Dutchman » next season, but I will see what the next possible work might be. I hope always for « Parsifal » .

Bruce Duffie : Someone once said that « Der Rosenkavalier » stands in relation to « Figaro » as « Die Frau ohne Schatten » stands to « The Magic Flute » . Do you agree with this ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No ! Never. Mozart is so a separate thing. « Rosenkavalier » is so fantastic a thing, it is separate. It stands alone. If you read or if you hear the words without music, it's fantastic, too. I love « Frau ohne Schatten » very, very much. Strauß said to me, « This is the best. » , and I said, « No, “ Salome ” and “ Elektra ” ? » He said to me, « Yes, maybe. » « They are such crazy women. » (Laughs) But « Frau ohne Schatten » was his favourite.

Bruce Duffie : Have you done « Daphne » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. This is a wonderful Opera. It is so difficult because you must have 2 1st class tenors. I remember one in Vienna, with Wunderlich and King, when they were young. It is very difficult, also, for the Daphne to sing. The words are not Hofmannsthal.

Bruce Duffie : Was Strauß more inspired by the Hofmannsthal ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Much more ! Or, if he wrote the words by himself.

Bruce Duffie : As in « Intermezzo » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, like « Intermezzo » or with Clemens Krauß, like « Capriccio » . This was a wedding. The 3 things he did with Gregor, « Daphne » , « Friedenstag » and « Liebe der Danæ » , do not have so much inspiration.

Bruce Duffie : What about the really early, « Guntram » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : This is new the Wagner. This is the 2nd « Lohengrin » . I have done parts from « Guntram » , 2 years ago, in a concert in Vienna, and I was very unhappy, I must say. I am happy that Strauß was absolutely another man later. When Strauß became the real Strauß, this absolutely began with « Salome » . Not with « Feuersnot » , but with « Salome » . This is when came the absolute new thing, a new style, and I think it's fantastic !

Bruce Duffie : Are « Guntram » and « Feuersnot » for Strauß like « Die Feen » and « Liebesverbot » for Wagner ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. It's the same. Absolutely. These are not Wagner, and the others are not Strauß. It starts with « Salome » , which was much more of a « cause célèbre » than « Sacre du Printemps » at this time. It was so modern.

Bruce Duffie : Some people hated it ...

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, or they liked it. He was very, very successful man. I remember after the War, when the American soldiers were coming in Germany, they were in Garmisch. When they came to his house, Strauß came-out and said to an officer, « I am the composer of “ Rosenkavalier ”. » He was very sympathetic and a great man for me when I was so young. It was special to listen to him and have talked with him.

...

Bruce Duffie : Let's go back to Wagner, just a little bit, and talk about a couple of the earlier ones : « Lohengrin » and « Tannhäuser » . Are these weaker works, or are they just not understood as much ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I don't know. For me, Wagner begins with « Tristan » , then « Meistersinger » , « Ring » and « Parsifal » , although I have conducted « Lohengrin » more than 100 times. It is a fantastic work. It is the last normal, Romantic Opera, but the real Wagner is from « Tristan » to « Parsifal » . In the « Tannhäuser » , if you do the Dresden version, then, it is not enough. If you do the version from Paris, then, it's too much in the beginning and, after that, it's too thin. It's a problem.

Bruce Duffie : So, when you do « Tannhäuser » , which version do you do - or, do you put the 2 together ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Together. It's never good, and Wagner knew it very well. He said in the last year of his life, « I must work on “ Tannhäuser ” again. It's not possible. » So, he knew it very well. « Holländer » , « Tannhäuser » and « Lohengrin » are the end of the German Romantic Opera like Weber ; then, begins the new style, like Strauß began a new style with « Salome » .

Bruce Duffie : Where does Heinrich Marschner fit-in ?

Ferdinand Leitner : He is a fantastic, good composer. I have done « Hans Heiling » very often, and I like « Der Vampyr » , too. His 3rd Opera, « Der Templer und die Jüdin » , which means « The Priest and the Jewish Girl » , was very popular in older times. I feel that he knows much more about the Orchestra than Weber, but Weber was more mellifluous. I always try to get these 2 Operas (« Hans Heiling » and « Vampyr ») into the repertoire of my Opera House.

Bruce Duffie : Would we enjoy them here, in America ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No, I don't know. I think it's the same with Weber - it is too much German. In Paris, they are never done. In England, more, but in France, no. They are only for one part of the people. It is like Bellini, in Italy. In Germany, with Bellini, if you have a great singer for the title roles, yes, but normally, no. I feel we must do all sides of the repertoire. The hard side is French Opera in Germany. They don't like « Pelléas et Mélisande » . I have done this Opera. They don't like Gounod ; they don't like Saint-Saëns and any typical French music, and so I think it is with Marschner, Weber and many others. These are typical German music.

Bruce Duffie : Lortzing, too ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, Lortzing is only possible to do in Germany with all the dialogue and other things. If you have dialogue in another language, I think it's not going to be popular.

Bruce Duffie : You won't do them in translations ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No, not for these. You can't. I heard « Lohengrin » in Italian at La Scala a long time ago, when I was a young man, and it was very good. The Italian sound was very good for « Lohengrin », but I was in Rome for a « Walküre » in Italian and this was not satisfactory.

Bruce Duffie : I wonder why the « Lohengrin » would work but the « Walküre » wouldn't ?

Ferdinand Leitner : This was the mature style of Wagner, and it's not possible to translate.

Bruce Duffie : I would think that the long monologue of Wotan, and other scenes like that, would work in translation.

Ferdinand Leitner : I was very young at the time, and I found it terrible. Now, they always play things in the original, in Italy.

Bruce Duffie : How much have recordings and electronics influenced the Operatic public ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I have never heard my records.

Bruce Duffie : You never listened to them at all ???

Ferdinand Leitner : No, maybe I time in my life, but they are there. I am not looking for old records, and I do not let them influence my work. I have old records by Fritz Busch, Furtwängler, Weingartner, and so on, and I play them just one time. More ? No. Never ! It is for me a bad point. I have so much music with me to work on, but I like records with great actors. I have hundreds that I like very much.

Bruce Duffie : Records of plays ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes ! But music, I have enough music.

Bruce Duffie : So, when you want to relax, you go to a play ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. I do, but not so often. At the end of the season, I say, « So now, 5 weeks and nothing with music. »

Bruce Duffie : No music at all ???

Ferdinand Leitner : No music. I am learner with my eyes - not with my ears but with eyes. I can learn my scores without music.

Bruce Duffie : You just read your scores ?

Ferdinand Leitner : At 1st, yes. Then, comes the music after this. It is very important for us to stop each year a little bit. I do this in this season. I was now 5 weeks on holiday, and I heard nothing, not one note. I only studied a score for the « Domestica » . I go in April, again, for 3 or 4 weeks, because I have before and after this so much work, and, then, came the time of the Festivals. I must have a little bit of down time. When I was young, I was never done, but later, this is better.

...

Bruce Duffie : Tell me about your relationship with Carl Orff.

Ferdinand Leitner : (Smiles, as he reminisces about many diverse aspects of his friendship with Orff) This is such a special thing. I have conducted all the stage works that he has written. I think there are 12. The friendship began in '43 and ended with his death (March 29, 1982) . He was very charming in our last conversation on the telephone, a short time before he died. He was very clever, and what we call « wach » (awake) , but toward the end, he didn't remember things so well. He called me twice many days, mornings and evenings, because he had forgotten that he called me in the morning. But, in the evening, he was very normal. He would ask, « Oh, this morning, I telephoned ? » and I would say yes because he don't know. But this was one of the greatest men in our Century. Ist with the « Schulwerk » ... you know, there is the Orff Institute in Salzburg, and many, many schools in the world including, here in the States, learn this. I found the children are better if they learn of « Schulwerk » when they make music. They may not be musicians later, but if they must do things with their hands and with feet, from nursery at 3 years, they start with this. I found the enormous advantage to this. Maybe 10 years or 12 years ago, Orff was invited to Tokyo. When he arrived, he said to his wife, « I'm sure there is a political man on our plane. Look here, at the red carpet » , but this was for him ! He came-out and, 10,000 children were singing and playing instruments for him when he was coming down from the plane. He told me, « I never had so exact, so fantastic a performance dozens of different conductors. » He said it was fantastic. It was the greatest thing in his life. I have the original manuscript of his Ist Lied. He knows that I am a collector from such things. I have that manuscript and many other manuscripts from him. Back then, he was feeling it's not possible to composer like Strauß and a little bit Wagner. This was when he was 19, 20, 21 years old, so he started with a new style with « Der Mond » . This is a fantastic thing. This may be possible to do in English, like « Die Kluge » . These are stories for the world, not only for Bavarians. They speak in original Bavarian dialogue, but it is possible for others to share the feeling of what he wrote. This can happen with the 3 things, « Mond » , « Kluge » and « Bernauerin » . These are the 3 Bavarian things, and they are possible to be done in English.

Bruce Duffie : Could all 3 of them be done on 1 evening ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, I think so.

Bruce Duffie : Or would it be better to have just 2, perhaps : « Der Mond » and « Die Kluge » ?

Ferdinand Leitner : No. I think doing them separately is for me the best. It's always a problem. They make it that way very often ; « Der Mond » and « Die Kluge » is too much. « Der Mond » , alone, is same like « Salome » , 1 hour, 45 minutes, and « Die Kluge » is 1 hour, 10. Last time, in Munich, I did « Die Kluge » with his realization of « Orfeo » by Monteverdi. He did the 3 Monteverdi realizations when he was a young man (1926, 1931 and 1941) , and I have done the 2nd version. I was the 1st conductor for « Œdipus » and for « Prometheus » .

Bruce Duffie : What about « Antigone » ? You made the recording ...

Ferdinand Leitner : No, not the 1st performance of « Antigone » .

Bruce Duffie : These are such large works, huge works as opposed to the others.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. I will do « Antigone » now, in Zürich, 9 performances. This is an enormous thing. Then, the last, the « Comœdia » . I said to him after this very difficult thing, « So, Maestro, now, you must do your “ Falstaff ”. Now is the time. » He said, « No. After “ Comœdia ”, the last is with the devil. At the end, who is an angel ? No, I think it's the end » , and it was end. I learned from him enormous amounts, not only for music but also for instrumentation. He was such a man with a ... what can you say ? Even when he was speaking old Greek and Latin, and he always speaks Bavarian dialect. He was one of the highest men in my life, and it was always fine if he was at a performance. When I was younger, very often, he would attend performances, also when I did works by Strauß and Wagner. Then, I would speak with him very, very much. He would never say to me, « Now, boy, you must do so and so. » Never. I asked him many things and he answered. He had such a humor. We laughed together very much and had nice, nice, nice time. When we were together for the 1st time, it was a love in the 1st moment. He and I were in a very difficult situation in '43. I was forbidden and he was half-forbidden. It was the year when he was coming-out with « Catulli Carmina » and they don't know what the Latin words meant. After 2 performances in Leipzig, then, they knew the words, and then it was forbidden. He came to Berlin and said, « In this moment, it's a dangerous thing. » Then, at the end of the War and after the War, after '46, then we were always together. I made my 1st performances of « Die Kluge » , « Carmina Burana » , « Catulli Carmina » , and « Triumph of Aphrodite » and « Bernauerin » in Munich, and then, I did all his works.

Bruce Duffie : You have also recorded many of these works.

Ferdinand Leitner : On recording for me, I have « Antigone » . This is from a long time ago, maybe 12 years. And yes, I have recorded the 3 : « Carmina Burana » , « Catulli Carmina » and « Trionfo dell'Afrodite » .

Bruce Duffie : Should those 3 be staged, or should they only be done in concert ?

Ferdinand Leitner : They can be concert or they can be on stage if you have a great stage Master. I have done it so often on stage, in 3 different productions. I have done it one time with Rennert. Then, it was fantastic on stage, too. But, normally, it is better as a concert.

Bruce Duffie : Did you ever do all 3 on 1 evening, or is that too much ?

Ferdinand Leitner : It is very much, but I have done it. This is with 2 intervals, 4 hours. I remember when I did « Catulli Carmina » in Paris, the 1st time, Marc Chagall and many, many other painters were there. It was a big, big success. They loved it very much. So, Orff is one of the most important composers, I'm sure. He was not like a normal composer ; rather, he was a man for the theater and a man for the young people.

Bruce Duffie : We play a recording of « Gassenhauer » quite often, and we always get calls about it. People say it's such a lovely work.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes.

Bruce Duffie : Is there anyone coming along today (any contemporary composers) that have that kind of inspiration ?

Ferdinand Leitner : We have some in Germany and in Switzerland. One is Wolfgang Rihm (born in 1952) , and his Operas and Symphonies are played very often. He has his own style. I cannot say « this is like so and so » . No, no. This is separate thing. The youngest is Detlev Müller-Siemens (born in 1957) . He is an enormous talent, especially, I think, for concert music ; not so much for stage. The 3rd is Volker David Kirchner (born in 1942) . He's a little bit older, and his Operas are very successful. Those are 3, but there are many more of them. It must be very difficult to compose in our time. I always feel Stravinsky was the end point. Strauß said to me, « I am the diminuendo of Wagner. » So, is it with Stravinsky, like a finishing point. You know, I conducted the world-premiere production of « The Rake's Progress » by Stravinsky. That was the 1st that I have done of international things. That was '51, in Venice. (Note : Stravinsky conducted the 1st performance, but Leitner led the rehearsals and subsequent performances. Leitner also conducted all the performances, a few months later at La Scala, as well as in Stuttgart and Hamburg.) If you conduct his last pieces (I have done one concert with the last 5 pieces of Stravinsky in the « Concertgebouw » , in Amsterdam) then, you feel, « This is the end of music and let it be. »

...

Bruce Duffie : Let me ask you about performers. Are singers today better or worse than singers of 20, 30, 40 years ago ?

Ferdinand Leitner : I think the voices are all the time better, but the technique and the personality on stage is now much more. It's absolutely another type of singer. I remember when I was a boy the great singer Mafalda Salvatini and also many Italian singers. Among the Wagner singers, there was Lauritz Melchior, who was Danish. This was a type from this time, and is not possible now. It is another type and I feel it is no more. Today, they have not so much voice, but they can sing more.

Bruce Duffie : So, they can overcome what they lack and still perform the heavy roles ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. Back then, all that was going on stage was the normal voice, and this was enough. That was all. During that time, the production, the stage Master, the conductor was nothing ; only the singers. Now, is it teamwork, mostly.

Bruce Duffie : How much does the production (the scenery and costumes) influence your work as a conductor ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Enormously. I don't say who it was or what it was, but in one very great town in Germany, after 3 performances I said, « I am sorry. I am supposed to conduct 10 evenings, but I can't. When I look-up there, I see absolutely something else, and then I cannot do the music. »

Bruce Duffie : So, it was a huge conflict between the stage and the pit ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, and this is not a question of modern or old. Absolutely not ! You can give your all to the production side, but it must affect the music. This was the secret of Wieland Wagner. I have done with Wieland Wagner 13 works - not only Wagner, but also « Lulu » , « Orfeo » of Gluck, « Fidelio » , and so on. He made great news, but never was the music disturbed. You have always the feeling as a conductor, yes, this is fine. What we are doing is new for me, but it's fine. I have done the « Ring » with him, and in the « Walküre » , it was Wotan who was going down and Brünnhilde said, « No, no. Come here, now. You have said what needs to happen and, now, you must do it with me. » All of this was in another angle, and it was enough. I was feeling this when I was conducting. So, it's not a question of being modern ; I must understand why, and it must never be contrary to the music. I was so happy to work very much these 2 great men : Günther Rennert and Wieland Wagner. With Günther Rennert, I have done 36 Operas. That's very much, and it was always pleasure. With Wieland Wagner, too. We worked a little bit together but, in the end, it was fantastic ! Now, in Chicago, we are doing a « Tristan » , and it may be it is a little bit in the Wieland Wagner style. Not too much, but not a moment of the music is disturbed. There are, of course, feelings from the stage Master, but they must be with the music. This is for me an issue. I found that this is an important thing. I have done with a new stage Master « Hans Heiling » of Marschner. It is difficult to do in our time, and it was fantastic. « Frau ohne Schatten » , too. We have now 2 or 3 young people who are coming along. They are modern but normal musicians. I like to work with young men.

Bruce Duffie : Who are these, or do you not want to say ?

Ferdinand Leitner : This one is Nikolaus Lehnhoff. He was in San Francisco, and this is one of the top-men. There are 2, 3 more. In our time, is the stage Master a little bit too important, I think. But this is better than not being important enough. It is important, the stage Master but, now, the European critics write only about them. There is the stage Master first, then, come all the singers together and, last, is the conductor. That's how it is in this moment in our time, but not for much longer, I think. It's changing a little bit. We are looking and not hearing.

Bruce Duffie : Are you optimistic about the future of Opera ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. We are now in this time a little bit ... (searches for word)

Bruce Duffie : In a little valley ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, but I am sure it goes up, and it's going-up in the next 100 years, too. Nobody can say why Opera is a special thing. Why can it be such a big success ? It is so. It's not a normal thing that the people are singing and not speaking. It's very special, and it is inside of us - and it was the same 200 hundred years ago. 200 years ago, was a great time of Mozart. It's a long time for an art style, so I think for the next 100 years, it's possible.

Bruce Duffie : Are the children who study the « Orff Schulwerk » better prepared to enjoy the Opera ?

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes, I think so. They develop special (better) ears for concerts. This is enormously important when they are 14 or 15 years old. They know what is with the music and not only that, but they say they know music. I find this very fine. Most are not musicians later, but they understand and like it. This is important.

Bruce Duffie : My father used to tell me that all the time, that musicians shouldn't play for other musicians. Musicians should play for ordinary people, for everyone.

Ferdinand Leitner : Yes. That is it. In Tokyo, when I am conducting and I see the people just a little bit, they are not seeing me. They are sitting and concentrating on the music, and this is wonderful ! This is wonderful.

Bruce Duffie : Thank you so very, very much for taking the time from your schedule.

Ferdinand Leitner : Thank you.

Ferdinand Leitner (geboren 4. März 1912 in Berlin ; gestorben 3. Juni 1996 in Zürich) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Leitner, der bereits mit 18 Jahren einen Chor leitete, studierte an der Musikhochschule in Berlin bei Franz Schreker und Julius Prüwer, später auch bei Artur Schnabel und Karl Muck. Er begann seine Tätigkeit zunächst als Pianist, besonders als Begleiter von Georg Kulenkampff und Ludwig Hoelscher, stieg dann durch Fritz Busch in den dreißiger Jahren auch als Dirigent auf und war, obwohl im Dritten Reich von der tonangebenden Schicht im Kulturleben hintangestellt, 1943 bis 1945 Dirigent des Theatres am Nollendorfplatz in Berlin. 1945 bis 1946 in Hamburg, 1946 bis 1947 in München, fand er ab 1947 als Generalmusikdirektor in Stuttgart eine Stelle, die er (wie das starke Interesse des Auslands an Gastspielen zeigte) überaus erfolgreich ausfüllte und in der er bis 1969 blieb, als er ans Opernhaus Zürich ging, das er erst 1984 wieder verließ. Gleichzeitig war er von 1976 bis 1980 in Den Haag tätig.

In Stuttgart ist ein Fußgänger- und Radfahrer-Steg nach ihm benannt (Ferdinand-Leitner-Steg) , der den oberen Teil des Stuttgarter Schloßgartens, bei dem sich das Staatstheater befindet, mit dem mittleren Teil des Schloßgartens verbindet, in dem sich derzeit eine Baustelle für Stuttgart 21 befindet.

Bekannt ist er vor allem als Operndirigent (Lieblingskomponisten : Richard Wagner, Richard Strauß, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart) , der sich auch der Oper des 20. Jahrhunderts annahm (Carl Orff, Othmar Schöck, Karl Amadeus Hartmann) . Als solcher wirkte er nach Erich Kleiber 1956 auch am Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires bei der Aufführung deutscher Opern. 1950 und 1980 leitete er die Uraufführung von Bühnenwerken Hermann Reutters.

Bekannt wurde Leitner auch durch seine Zusammenarbeit mit der Cappella Coloniensis, die er 1959 anlässlich des 200. Todestages von Georg Friedrich Händel zum ersten Mal dirigierte. Durch diese Zusammenarbeit etablierte sich Leitner auch als ernstzunehmender Dirigent im Bereich der Historischen Aufführungspraxis.

Seine über 300 Schallplattenaufnahmen umfassen aber auch die Sinfonien der Romantik.

26 décembre 1959 : Le chef Richard Burgin dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Franz Schalk (1894) , éditée par Ludwig Döblinger (1896) , avec le « Boston Symphony Orchestra » . Un enregistrement existe.

Richard Burgin

The Polish-American violinist Richard Burgin was born on 11 October 1892 in Warsaw and died on 29 April 1981 in Gulfport, Florida. He was a best-known as associate conductor and the concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Burgin was appointed concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in 1920, when Pierre Monteux was the principal conductor, and assistant conductor, in 1927, early in Serge Koussevitzky's tenure as principal conductor (1924-1949) . He conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 308 concerts in the United States, Australia and Japan, and was associate conductor for 7 world premieres and 25 Boston premieres. He continued as concert Master through Charles Münch's tenure as principal conductor (1949-1962) , retiring in 1962 when Münch went back to Europe to conduct until his death in 1968.

Earlier, he had been concert Master of the Leningrad Symphony, Helsinki Symphony, Oslo Philharmonic and Stockholm Concert Society. He played under renowned conductors Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch, and composers Richard Strauß and Jean Sibelius.

In 1957, Richard Burgin told the « Times Magazine » :

« I know many virtuosos and I do not envy them. They tell me what it's like to play the same few pieces over and over and know they have to go here and then be there. Not for me. I like the Orchestra. »

As a violin soloist, he played the american premiere of Sergei Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1 in D major, Opus 19, on 24 April 1925, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky. Koussevitzky had conducted the world-premiere of that Masterpiece in Paris ; a couple of years earlier in one of his Concerts, Koussevitzky, with his concert Master Darrieux playing the solo part after the otherwise great Bronisław Huberman had spurned it as not virtuosic enough for his taste.

Within a year of coming to Boston, Burgin founded his own Burgin String Quartet. He also headed the string department of the New England Conservatory, a block away from the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, « Symphony Hall » , teaching both violin and conducting and, in 1953, conducting its student orchestra. Starting in 1959, he also taught at Boston University, where he lectured and conducted its chamber orchestra ; and at the Berkshire Music Center, where he taught conducting. After moving to Florida, following his retirement from the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, he taught at Florida State University, in Tallahassee, until his final retirement in the mid- 1970's. While there, he formed the Florestan Quartet with his wife, violinist Ruth Posselt, as 2nd violin.

Richard Burgin was a chevalier officer of the French « Légion d'honneur » , and a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences.

Richard Burgin married Ruth Posselt on July 3, 1940. Their son, Richard W. Burgin, is the author of numerous short-story collections and novels. Their daughter, Diana Lewis Burgin, is an author, and Professor of Russian at the University of Massachusetts Amherst; she had published a narrative poem « Richard Burgin : A Life in Verse » , Slavica Publisher (1989) ; ISBN 0-89357-196-2, relating her father's biography.

Richard Burgin, former associate conductor and concert Master of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has died after suffering a cerebral hemorrhage. He was 88 years old.

Mister Burgin, whose death Wednesday in a nursing home marked the end of a concert violin career that spanned more than 75 years, came to the United States as Boston Symphony concert Master in 1920.

The Warsaw-born musician made his 1st public appearance at the age of 11, as a soloist with the Warsaw Philharmonic Society. He later studied in Leningrad and Stockholm, and began his American orchestral career under the French conductor Pierre Monteux.

« There is nothing like the Boston Symphony in Europe. » , he told an interviewer after coming to the United States. During his career, he led the Boston Symphony in 308 concerts in the United States, Australia and Japan, and was associate conductor at 7 world premieres and 25 Boston premieres.

Mister Burgin usually conducted without a baton and, though he always had the score before him, he seldom looked down at it. « In my youth, it was considered bad taste to perform from memory » , he said.

Within a year of coming to Boston, he organized the Burgin String Quartet. He headed the string department of the New England Conservatory at various times and joined the Boston University Faculty in 1959.

Mister Burgin retired as Boston Symphony concert Master at the end of the 1961-1962 season and moved to Florida, where, in the summer of 1965, he conducted the London Symphony Orchestra during its visit to Daytona Beach. Mister Burgin last gave a concert in June 1980 at Florida State University.

He leaves his wife, a son and a daughter. He will be buried in Gulfport, with memorial services later in Boston.

31 janvier et 1er février 1960 : Le chef Carl Schuricht dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version originale, éditée par Alfred Orel (1932) ou Leopold Nowak (1951) , avec le « NWDR-Sinfonieorchester » . Concert public enregistré à la « Musikhalle » de Hambourg (étiquette « Tahra » ; CD : TAH 689) .

7 février 1960 : Le compositeur Paul Hindemith dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York (enregistrement en monophonie sur étiquette « Urania » , LP (33 tours) ; étiquette « Memories Reverence » , CD) . Concert public radiodiffusé. Au même programme : l'Ouverture de l'Opéra-Comique « Médée » de Luigi Cherubini.

Recordings of Paul Hindemith's conducting are not plentiful, so Urania's re-issue of his rendition of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 7 in E major with the New York Philharmonic is a significant item for collectors of historic performances. Granted, this is a live recording, so there are a few audio problems, such as a fairly condensed monaural sound, occasional shifts in instrumental focus and volume, and audience noises that may turn off some listeners. But devoted Bruckner fans will appreciate Hindemith's robust presentation, and once one has acclimated to the somewhat limited reproduction, it is fairly easy to enjoy the playing, thanks to a nice clean-up of analog hiss through the digital remastering. Hindemith offers a mainstream reading that balances energy with lyricism, and finds the heart of Bruckner's emotional world without overindulging in rubato or exaggerated tempo changes. To an extent, it is a fairly Romantic interpretation, surprisingly so for Hindemith, who might have seemed too much of a modernist to approach this Symphony with sympathy. Yet, he maintains a pretty rigorous hold on the expression and never lets the work slip into bathos or bombast, as some of his older contemporaries sometimes did. Instead of playing-up the emotional aspects of the Symphony, he pays due attention to its many passages of counterpoint, a feature easily glossed over in this Symphony but essential to understanding Bruckner's music. Filling the rest of the program is Luigi Cherubini's stormy Overture to Medea, part of the same concert Hindemith conducted on February 7, 1960.

13, 15, 17, 25 février 1960 : Le chef Bruno Walter dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner, version de 1881 (1878-1880) publiée par Robert Haas en 1936, avec le « Columbia Symphony Orchestra » (étiquette « CBS » stéréo) . Les séances d'enregistrement ont lieu au « Americal Legion Hall » , à Hollywood, en Californie.

14 février 1960 : Le chef Hans Knappertsbusch dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Concert public enregistré à la « Großer-Saal » du « Musikverein » (étiquette « Altus », Japon ; CD : ALT 071)

28 février 1960 : Le compositeur Paul Hindemith dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York (enregistrement en monophonie sur étiquette « Baton » ; LP 1003) . The presentation made to Hindemith (which was part of the broadcast) is included.

The « Baton » label was short lived (only 10 releases !) but it gave us an important musical document. Hindemith championed the Bruckner 7th. He recorded the 1st movement with the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at the TV studios of WGN. That video is currently available on DVD. There is also a recording in existence of a 1955 performance with the Stuttgart Radio Symphony.

Mai 1960 : Le chef Heinz Wallberg dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre d'État de Vienne, à la « Großes Musikvereinsaal » à l'acoustique ample (étiquettes « Guilde Internationale du Disque » ; LP / « Concert Hall Society » ; LP : SMS-2489 / « Bearac re-issues », CD : BRC-3808) .

Le véritable nom de cet Orchestre est le « NÖ Symphonie-Orchester, Wien » ou le « Niederösterreichische Tonkünstler-Orchester » .

In May 1960, the 4th Symphony was recorded by the « Concert Hall Society » , with their usual very fine sound quality, in the ample acoustics of the « Großes Musikvereinsaal » . The transfer did help the sound a bit in the upper- and lower-regions of the spectrum, but very gently, so that the sound remained true to the spirit of the music and Heinz Wallberg's magisterial and very lively rendition. The Orchestra is the « Niederösterreichische Tonkünstler-Orchester » , some 4 years before Wallberg became their principal-conductor and artistic director and they evidently had, by then, acquired a completely different status of orchestral blend quite close to the best Viennese Orchestras of the time. Our source was an American pressing « Concert Hall Society » LP in very fine condition. Some inherent tape hiss has been doctored and the original cover-art was retained. It is a pity that the otherwise enterprising « Concert Hall Society » did not venture recording the remainder, still for the time, these were really pioneering recordings offered by one of the greatest exponents of Bruckner's Symphonic work.

Heinz Wallberg

Heinz Wallberg (1923-2004) was often referred to as a Bruckner specialist but he only made a few Bruckner recordings and those released on CD are now out-of-print or distributed in very limited ways. In the 1960's, Wallberg recorded with the « Vienna National Orchestra » several Bruckner Symphonies (Nos. 4, 5, 8, 9 and the « Te Deum ») for the « Concert Hall Society » (and « Guilde Internationale du Disque ») but they have never been offered on CD.

...

The German conductor Heinz Wallberg was born on 16 March 1923 in Herringen, Westphalia ; and died on 29 September 2004 in Essen, aged 81.

Wallberg studied trumpet, violin and piano. He helped to support his family with his musical training after his father became unable to work. During World War II, he was a morse-code operator, and simultaneously directed an army band and led a string quartet.

After the War, he studied at the Dortmund and Cologne Music Conservatories. He made his debut as a conductor in Münster with Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « The Marriage of Figaro » . He became principal music-director in Augsburg, in 1954, and in Bremen, in 1955, concluding in both posts in 1960. In 1957, he recorded a scene from Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » , with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in London, and singers Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Christa Ludwig, under the production of Walter Legge. He also recorded Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's Symphony No. 4 « Italian » , and his « A Midsummer Night's Dream » incidental music. He conducted Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » for the Royal Opera, Covent Garden, in 1963. In the meantime, at the Vienna and Salzburg Festivals, he premiered works such as Frank Martin's Oratorio « le Mystère de la Nativité » (1960) and Rudolf Wagner-Régeny's « The Mines at Falun » (1961) . Wallberg inaugurated the Munich Opera Festival, in 1962, with a performance of Richard Strauß's « Die schweigsame Frau » .

From 1964 to 1975, Wallberg was principal-conductor of the « Tonkünstler » Orchestra, in Vienna. He held the same post with the Munich Radio Orchestra, from 1975 to 1982, and with the Essen Philharmonic, from 1975 to 1991. He was the 1st West-German conductor allowed to conduct in East-Germany after the partition of Germany. His United States conducting debut did not occur until 1991. For the last 37 years of his life, he appeared every year with Japan's « NHK » Symphony Orchestra. He conducted the New Zealand premiere of Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , in 1990.

He was nominated for a « Grammy Award » , in 1982, for his recording of Jaromír Weinberger's Opera, « Schwanda the Bag-piper » . He gave a concert in Saint-Peter's Basilica, in Rome, for Pope John XXIII, in 1959. Heinz Wallberg was highly-regarded as a conductor of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner. Other recordings included Engelbert Humperdinck's « Königskinder » and Ruggero Leoncavallo's « La Bohème » .

Wallberg was married twice : to Maritta Ruhlmann, who died in 1967 ; and, later, to Murielle Nouget. He had a daughter with Ruhlmann and a son with Nouget.

Heinz Wallberg was a well-known conductor in Germany and Austria.

As a child, he studied trumpet, violin, and piano. He studied in the Conservatories of Dortmund and Cologne. After graduation, he was accepted as both a violinist and trumpeter in the Cologne and Darmstadt Orchestras.

Deciding to become a conductor, he made his earliest appearances in that capacity with several local and regional Orchestras, including those of Münster, Trier, and Hagen. In 1954, he became Music Director in Augsburg and, in 1955, as Principal Music Director in Bremen.

He was Principal Music Director in Wiesbaden, from 1960 to 1974. At the same time, he was the conductor of the Lower-Austrian « Tonkünstler » Orchestra, in Vienna, from 1964 to 1974. In 1975, he became the Principal conductor of the Bavarian Radio Orchestra until 1982 ; and of the Essen Philharmonic, lasting through 1991.

After 1991, he guest-conducted widely in Japan, France, Great Britain, Germany, Austria, Finland, and elsewhere, as well as in the major Festivals of Salzburg, Munich, Vienna, Florence, Barcelona, Prague and others.

He was a frequent conductor at the Vienna State Opera, where he led over 450 performances. His recording of Jaromír Weinberger's Opera, « Schwanda the Bag-piper » , was nominated for a « Grammy Award » , in 1982. He conducted the premiere, in 1976, of Werner Egk's Opera, « Die Versuchung des Heiligen Antonius » , and Rudolf Wagner-Régeny's Opera, « Das Bergwerk zu Falun » .

He accompanied the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra of Tokyo, the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, and the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra on major tours. He was a recipient of the « Grand Cross for Distinguished Service in Germany » , the « Cross of Distinction for Art and Science of Austria » (1st Class) , and the « Bruckner Medal » .

The name of the conductor Heinz Wallberg may be best-known in Great Britain to collectors of unusual recorded repertoire. Although he travelled widely as a guest-conductor in later years, it was mostly in his native Germany that he amassed a vast but selective discography, maintaining at the same time high post-War standards of tradition and innovation among regional Orchestras and Opera Houses. Those standards continue, but Wallberg's brand of self-effacing versatility is harder to find.

Born in Herringen, Westphalia, to a family of modest means, he displayed his talent for music at an early age and he soon excelled as a trumpeter, violinist and pianist ; when his father was no longer able to work, the eldest son went out to make his living in his early teens. Music remained important during the Second World War at the front, where his duties as a morse-code operator were lightened by taking charge of both an army band and a string quartet.

Wallberg, then, returned to study at the Dortmund and Cologne Music Conservatoires before playing both violin and trumpet in the Orchestras of Cologne and Darmstadt. Conducting, though, was now Wallberg's chief ambition. In 1947, he made his debut in Münster with Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's « Le Nozze Di Figaro » , an Opera he was to conduct 54 times in his heyday at the Vienna State Opera between 1959 and 1987. (Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » , another more recent pole of the core repertoire, was a close runner-up with more than 40 performances.) He had become firmly established as a key-figure on the German circuit by the time he took-up the post of Augsburg's principal music-director in 1954 ; Bremen followed 1 year later.

Slowly, his fame spread abroad. In 1957, musical « supremo » Walter Legge admired his skills in accompanying distinguished singers sufficiently to record him with London's « Philharmonia » Orchestra in a scene from Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » featuring Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Christa Ludwig ; over 30 years later, the great pianist Sviatoslav Richter registered this recording in his diary as a model of how to take the sweeping orchestral melody at the end of the scene « more humbly and more naturally » than most interpretations.

It was a mark of the new esteem in which Wallberg was held at this time, when great Mæstros such as Otto Klemperer and Herbert von Karajan or young fire-brands such as Guido Cantelli dominated the « Philharmonia » , that he also recorded with the Orchestra a scrupulously detailed, surprisingly vivacious disc of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's « Italian » Symphony and music from « A Midsummer Night's Dream » : an LP that was recycled often enough to impress a subsequent generation of listeners unaware of Wallberg's distinguished credentials.

Yet, his career did not take off in Great Britain ; and although Wallberg was told by Walter Legge, in the running for the post of director of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, that he would be his ideal choice of principal conductor, he only conducted 1 Opera there : Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » , in 1963.

Rudolf Bing, constantly trying to lure Wallberg to the Metropolitan Opera in New York, was constantly informed that the proposed dates clashed with the conductor's other engagements and gave-up. (Wallberg did not make his American conducting debut until 1991.)

There were ample compensations both in Vienna and at the Salzburg Festival, where Wallberg conducted distinguished premieres of Frank Martin's Oratorio « le Mystère de la Nativité » , in 1960, and Rudolf Wagner-Regeny's « The Mines At Falun » , the following year. Wallberg inaugurated the Munich Opera Festival, in 1962, with a performance of Richard Strauß's comic-Opera « Die Schweigsame Frau » , and among his many invaluable contributions to the Operatic discography with the Munich Radio Orchestra are the « other » Engelbert Humperdinck fairy-tale Opera, « Königskinder » , and the « other » « La Bohème » , Leoncavallo's. He was also nominated for a « Grammy Award » , in 1982, for his recording of another minor Operatic gem, Jaromír Weinberger's Opera, « Schwanda the Bag-piper » .

In the Symphonic repertoire, he was an outstanding interpreter of Anton Bruckner, conducting the 8th Symphony nearly 100 times, and he received the medal of the « International Bruckner Society » . Among other honours, his strong religious faith led him to rate most highly a concert given in Saint-Peter's, in Rome, before Pope John XXIII, in 1959. The world soon woke-up to his skills in the late-Romantic Austro-German repertoire ; high on his list of international achievements were his annual appearances, over the last 37 years, with Japan's « NHK » Symphony Orchestra and the New Zealand premiere of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , in 1990.

Yet, this quietly remarkable man carried on as before at home, conducting his last concert in Essen, on May 10th 2004. According to his long-term agent and general-manager, Haydn Rawstron, Wallberg's life in music was due to be continued with a full schedule of engagements well into his 9th decade.

Deutscher Dirigent Heinz Wallberg : geboren 16. März 1923 in Herringen (heute Hamm) ; gestorben 29. September 2004 in Essen.

Wallberg studierte Musik in Dortmund und Köln, konnte anschließend bei Orchestern in Köln und Darmstadt Praxis erwerben, und dies ist ungewöhnlich, nacheinander auf zwei Instrumenten : Als Geiger wie als Solo-Trompeter. Seine Karriere als Dirigent begann ganz traditionell mit Positionen an kleineren deutschen Theatern in Münster, Trier und Hagen.

Nach Ende des Zweiten Weltkrieges wirkte er maßgeblich am kulturellen Wiederaufbau mit. Er war von 1953 bis 1961 Generalmusikdirektor in Bremen und von 1961 bis 1974 in Wiesbaden. Er leitete parallel dazu von 1964 bis 1975 auch das Niederösterreichische Tonkünstler-Orchester in Wien. Von 1975 bis 1991 war er Chefdirigent der Essener Philharmoniker und von 1975 bis 1982 zugleich des Münchner Rundfunkorchesters.

Im Laufe seiner Karriere hat Wallberg am Pult bedeutender Opernhäuser in aller Welt gestanden, ebenso wie er als Konzertdirigent die bedeutendsten Orchester geleitet hat ; dazu gehören auch die großen Klangkörper der ehemaligen Sowjetunion in Moskau und Leningrad. Allein an der Wiener Staatsoper hat er mehr als 450 Vorstellungen und im Wiener Musikvereinssaal fast 500 Konzerte dirigiert. In den großen europäischen Festspielstädten war Heinz Wallberg ebenso ein stets gern gesehener Gastdirigent wie seit fast vier Jahrzehnten beim NHK-Sinfonieorchester in Tokio.

Wallbergs Interpretationskunst ist auf mehr als 100 Schallplatten dokumentiert, darunter 16 Opern-Gesamtaufnahmen, und in über 100 Fernseh-Produktionen. Schon 1959 leitete er die Wiener Symphoniker, den Wiener Singverein und Solisten der Wiener Staatsoper in einem Festkonzert vor Papst Johannes XXIII. im römischen Petersdom, das von 25 Fernsehsendern in alle Welt übertragen wurde.

Das Repertoire des Dirigenten umfasste nicht nur die Werke der großen Tradition ; in der zweiten Hälfte des 20. Jahrhunderts leitete er Uraufführungen von Opern von Werner Egk, Frank Martin und Rudolf Wagner-Régeny. Aus dem älteren Repertoire setzte er sich immer wieder auch für selten gespielte und zu Unrecht vergessene Werke ein wie « La Bohème » von Ruggiero Leoncavallo und Jaromír Weinbergers Schwanda, der Dudelsackpfeifer, dessen Gesamtaufnahme 1982 für den « Grammy Award » nominiert wurde.

Wallberg galt während vier Jahrzehnten als einer der erfolgreichsten Dirigenten seiner Generation. Unvergessen bleiben seine Interpretationen der Symphonien Anton Bruckners.

Josef Krips se souvient :

« Mon 1er concert à New York eut lieu en décembre 1956 à “ Carnegie Hall ”, à la tête du “ Symphony of the Air ”, l'ancien Orchestre de la NBC. À la même époque, je fis mes 1ers disques aux États-Unis avec cet Orchestre : une série de Concertos pour piano avec Arthur Rubinstein. En avril 1958, nous avons enregistré ensemble le 2e Concerto de Brahms. Immédiatement après, nous avons fait un autre enregistrement : un Concerto de Mozart et le Concerto en la mineur de Schumann. C'est en été 1958 que j'ai dirigé pour la 1re fois le “ New York Philharmonic ”, au Stade Lewisohn.

En novembre 1961, j'ai dirigé mes 1ers concerts avec le “ New York Philharmonic ” durant sa saison d'hiver régulière au “ Carnegie Hall ”. Carlos Moseley devint alors le directeur administratif de l'Orchestre. »

Josef Krips

Le chef d'orchestre et violoniste autrichien Josef (Alois) Krips est né le 8 avril 1902 à Vienne et est mort le 13 octobre 1974 à Genève. Il est le fils aîné du docteur Jacob, alias Josef Krips (1866-1927), juif d'origine converti au catholicisme, époux en 1901 de Luise Seitz (1879-1971), catholique.

À l'âge de 19 ans, le 3 septembre 1921, Josef Krips dirige l'Opéra « Un bal masqué » de Giuseppe Verdi, dans une salle de la « Maison des ouvriers », située dans l'arrondissement viennois de « Favoriten ».

Il a été élève de Eusebius Mandyczewski et de Felix Weingartner. En 1921, il devient l'assistant de Weingartner à l'Opéra populaire (« Volksoper ») de Vienne, puis dirige ensuite différents orchestres. Il est nommé « General-Musik-Direktor » à Karlsruhe, de 1926 à 1933. En 1933, il retourne à Vienne comme 1er chef au « Staatsoper » tout en étant professeur à l'Académie de Vienne.

Du fait des origines juives de son père, Krips est contraint de quitter l'Autriche après l'« Anschluß » de 1938. Il fuit à Belgrade où il travaille, pour une saison, à l'Opéra et avec des Orchestres symphoniques. De retour à Vienne, il est interdit de diriger. Il travaille alors pendant la guerre dans une usine de produits alimentaires.

Après la fin de la guerre, en 1945, Krips est autorisé de diriger à nouveau. Ses collègues qui avaient continué à travailler sous le régime nazi étaient interdits de diriger pendant 2 ans (période de dénazification). Il joue un rôle essentiel dans la reconstruction de la vie musicale à Vienne, on lui doit la légendaire renaissance mozartienne ; il a dirigé également la ré-ouverture du 1er Festival de Salzbourg de l'après-guerre (avec « Don Giovanni »). C'est le 1er chef d'orchestre autrichien à avoir fait une tournée en Union soviétique, en 1947. En 1961, il dirige à Bayreuth (« les Maîtres-chanteurs de Nuremberg »). En 1963, il est invité à Covent Garden ; en 1967, au Metropolitan Opera de New York ; en 1970, au « Deutsche Oper Berlin » ; de 1957 à 1973, au « Staatsoper » de Vienne ; et en 1974, à l'Opéra de Paris. Durant sa carrière, qui s'est étendue sur une période de plus de 50 ans, il n'est pratiquement pas de pays qu'il n'ait visité, ni de grand orchestre qu'il n'ait dirigé.

Il devient chef titulaire de l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres, de 1950 à 1954 ; de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Buffalo, de 1953 à 1963 ; de l'Orchestre symphonique de San Francisco, de 1963 à 1970 (séjour durant lequel, il est nommé citoyen d'honneur de la ville) ; et chef principal de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne, de 1970 à 1973.

Josef Krips a été l'un des chefs d'orchestre les plus admirés et les plus aimés de notre siècle, en particulier pour ses interprétations de Mozart et des autres Maîtres viennois. Il reçut de nombreuses décorations, notamment :

L'Anneau des Nations-Unies.

Les médailles des Associations Bruckner d'Europe et d'Amérique.

L'Anneau d'honneur de la Cité de Vienne.

L'Anneau Mozart décerné par les autorités autrichiennes.

Depuis son décès, la ville de Vienne entretient, à titre honorifique, sa tombe au cimetière de Neustift am Walde (Groupe 16, Rangée 4, Numéro 30) .

Josef Krips a gravé plus de 150 œuvres sur disque. La plus ancienne date de 1937 : des airs avec Richard Tauber tirés de l'Opéra « Rossini in Neapel » de Bernhard Paumgartner. Une grande partie des enregistrements de Krips est toujours appréciée, comme les Symphonies de Ludwig van Beethoven avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres, ré-éditées en CD dans les années 1990. Ses enregistrements des opéras de Mozart, tels « Don Giovanni » ou « l'Enlèvement au sérail » font référence. Ainsi que les 20 dernières symphonies de Mozart avec l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » d'Amsterdam, enregistrées par la maison « Philips » , en 1972 et 1973.

The Austrian conductor and violinist Josef (Alois) Krips was born on 8 April 1902 in Vienna and died on 13 October 1974 in Geneva.

Krips went on to become a pupil of Eusebius Mandyczewski and Felix Weingartner. From 1921 to 1924, he served as Weingartner's assistant at the Vienna « Volksoper » , and also as « répétiteur » and chorus Master. He then conducted several Orchestras, including in Karlsruhe, from 1926 to 1933. In 1933, he returned to Vienna as a resident conductor of the « Volksoper » and a regular conductor at the « Wiener Staatsoper » . He was appointed professor at the Vienna Academy of Fine-Arts, in 1935, and conducted regularly at the Salzburg Festival, between 1935 and 1938.

In 1938, the Nazi annexation of Austria (« Anschluß ») forced Krips to leave the country. (He was raised a Roman Catholic, but would have been excluded from musical activity because his father was born Jewish.) Krips moved to Belgrade, where he worked for 1 year with the Belgrade Opera and Philharmonic, until Yugoslavia also became involved in World War II. For the rest of the War, he worked in a food factory.

On his return to Austria, at the end of the war in 1945, Krips was one of the few conductors allowed to perform, since he had not worked under the Nazi regime. He was the 1st to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic and the Salzburg Festival in the post-War period.

From 1950 to 1954, Krips was principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra. Afterwards, he led the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and, from 1963 to 1970, the San Francisco Symphony. He made his Covent Garden debut, in 1947, and his Metropolitan Opera debut, in 1966, guest conducting frequently from then on. In 1970, he became conductor of the « Deutsche Oper » in Berlin. Between 1970 and 1973, he was the principal conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra.

Krips died at 72, in 1974.

His brother, Henry Krips, emigrated to Australia and was the chief conductor of the Adelaide Symphony Orchestra for a record 23 years (1949-1972) .

In 1950, Krips and the London Symphony Orchestra made a superb recording of Mozart's Symphony No. 41 (so-called the « Jupiter » Symphony) for « London » Records (LPS 86) .

In 1955, Krips made a critically acclaimed recording of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » with the Vienna State Opera featuring Cesare Siepi, Fernando Corena, Walter Berry, Suzanne Danco, Lisa Della Casa and Hilde Gueden.

In 1957, Krips conducted the « Symphony of the Air » in stereo recordings of the 5 Beethoven Piano Concertos with Arthur Rubinstein for « RCA Victor » .

In 1960, Krips recorded Ludwig van Beethoven's 9 Symphonies with the « BBC » Chorus and the London Symphony Orchestra, for « Everest » Records. In the 9th Symphony, the soloists were Donald Bell (baritone) , Jennifer Vyvyan (soprano) , Rudolf Petrak (tenor) , and Shirley Carter (mezzo soprano) - later known as Shirley Verrett. The chorus Master was Leslie Woodgate. This series of recordings was popular with music-critics and the public, and the recordings have been re-issued several times, in authorized and in bootleg editions.

During the 1970's, Krips recorded for « Philips » Mozart's late Symphonies with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Over the years, they have been re-issued on « Philips » and, latterly, on « Decca » .

Krips did not make any commercial recordings with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, although many of his concerts were broadcast in stereo by San Francisco station KKHJ.

...

Josef Krips was one of the busiest of Austrian-born conductors after World War II, an unexpected benefit to his having been forced-out of his native country following its annexation by Germany. He had a major performing and recording career on 2 continents, in Orchestral and Operatic music.

Josef Krips studied at the Vienna Academy with Felix Weingartner (later permanent conductor of the Vienna Philharmonic) and then served as Weingartner's assistant at the Vienna « Volksoper », from 1921 until 1924. He headed Orchestras in various cities and, in 1933, was appointed resident conductor at the Vienna State Opera and to a professorship at the Vienna Academy. Krips held both posts for 3 years, until the German annexation (« Anschluß »), in March 1938, when he was forced to leave the country. He emigrated to Yugoslavia and spent 1 year with the Belgrade Opera and the Belgrade Philharmonic, before the onset of the War forced Krips to halt his work in music.

Following the Allied victory, in 1945, Krips returned to Vienna, conducting the State Opera upon its re-opening, as well as the Vienna Philharmonic, and the re-opened Salzburg Festival, in 1946, with a production of Mozart's « Don Giovanni ». Krips was suddenly one of the busiest conductors in Austria, and one of the most welcomed, as his colleagues who had worked under the Nazi regime weren't all cleared for resumed public performances until 1947. He also took the State Opera and the Philharmonic on their 1st tours after World War II. Krips spent 4 years (1950-1954) as principal conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, and accepted his 1st American appointment, in 1954, as principal conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1963, the year of his debut at London's Covent Garden conducting « Don Giovanni », he became the principal conductor of the San Francisco Symphony, a post he held until 1970. Krips made his Metropolitan Opera debut, in 1966, and became a conductor at the « Deutsche Oper Berlin », in 1970.

Krips' visibility in the post-War music world made him one of the most familiar of all European conductors, both in Europe and America. His recording of the complete Beethoven Symphonies with the London Symphony Orchestra for the low-priced « Everest » Records line was a perennially popular set among music students and casual listeners buying their 1st Beethoven material - these performances were appreciated anew in the 1990's on CD as remastered by « Omega » Records. Additionally, he made several superb Opera recordings for major labels, including a « Don Giovanni » for « London », and a version of Mozart's « The Abduction From the Seraglio », with Annelese Rothenberger, Lucia Popp, Gottlob Frick, and Krips' beloved Vienna Philharmonic for « EMI », that remains one of the most charming and beguiling accounts of this Opera.

The son of a doctor, Josef Krips 1st studied the violin and, in addition, sang in the choir of the Carmelite Church in Vienna ; at a young age, he entered the Vienna Academy of Music where he was a pupil of Felix Weingartner and Eusebius Mandyczewski. He was a violinist in the Orchestra of the Vienna « Volksoper », between 1918 and 1921, when Weingartner promoted him to be a coach and chorus Master there ; and, in the same year, he made his debut as a conductor, taking over a performance of Giuseppe Verdi's « Un ballo in maschera » at short notice, and conducting without a score. Also, in 1921, he made his 1st appearance as a Symphonic conductor, at the « Redoutensaal » in Vienna. Krips served as head of the Opera department of the municipal theatre in the Czech city of Usti nad Labem, during 1924 and 1925, before moving to the post of conductor at the Dortmund Municipal Theatre for the following season (1925-1926) ; and was chief conductor at Karlsruhe, between 1926 and 1933, where he conducted both Opera and concerts, leading Festivals devoted to Anton Bruckner (1929) and to Georg Friedrich Händel (1930) .

At about this time, Krips began to appear internationally. He was appointed as a resident conductor at the Vienna State Opera, in 1933 (making his debut there with Johann Strauß' « Der Zigeunerbaron ») , made his Salzburg debut, in 1935, and taught at the Vienna Academy, from 1935 to 1938 ; but following the « Anschluß » , the annexation of Austria by National-Socialist Germany, he was forced out of these positions. Although he moved to Belgrade where he continued to conduct during 1938 and 1939, he was again compelled, as in Vienna, to give-up all professional musical activity through political pressure and spent World War II doing menial work. After the occupation of Vienna by the Allied powers, at the end of the War, the Soviet authorities gave Krips the responsibility to reconstruct musical life in the city. He brought the State Opera back to life with many memorable performances at the « Theater an der Wien » and at the « Volksoper » , conducted the Vienna Philharmonic and Vienna Symphony Orchestras at the « Musikverein » , and re-opened the Salzburg Festival, in 1946, with Mozart's « Don Giovanni » . He also conducted the Vienna State Opera on its highly-successful visit to London, in 1947, and appeared elsewhere with it and the Vienna Philharmonic on tour in Belgium, France, Italy and Switzerland.

Having been appointed chief conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, in 1950, Krips remained with the Orchestra until 1954 and did much to rebuild it after the depredations of the War. He succeeded William Steinberg as chief conductor of the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1954, and, as in London previously, continued Steinberg's work of making it into one of America's stronger ensembles. He also took on the conductorship of the Cincinnati « May » Festival, between 1954 and 1960. In 1963, Krips moved from Buffalo to the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra, remaining with this ensemble until 1970, when he was given the title of « conductor emeritus » . He had made a considerable impact with « Don Giovanni » at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1963, and conducted at the Metropolitan Opera, New York, from 1966 ; he appeared also with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra for 10 weeks during its 1964-1965 season directing a cycle of the Bruckner Symphonies. By this time, Krips was recognised as one of the most outstanding exponents of the Viennese school of conducting : he returned to Covent Garden, in 1971, to lead a beautifully moulded account of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » and, shortly before his death, followed this with equally fine readings of Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » and Beethoven's « Fidelio » .

Krips was a splendidly animated conductor : so graphic were his facial expressions and so clear his baton technique that it was impossible to misunderstand his musical intentions. Like his mentor Felix Weingartner, he was a stickler for an exact rendition of the written score, which he constantly interpreted with musicianship of the highest order. He was active in the recording studio from the end of the 1940's onwards, initially conducting Operatic accompaniments for Walter Legge and « EMI » , before being taken-up by « Decca » . He made many fine recordings during his time with the London Symphony Orchestra, and remained with « Decca » until 1960, recording for the company several of its most highly-rated early stereo recordings, such as « Don Giovanni » and Tchaïkovsky's Symphony No. 5, both with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, as well as many other successful titles. His cycle of the Beethoven Symphonies with the London Symphony Orchestra, recorded for « Everest » in London, remained in the catalogue for many years, as did his numerous accompaniments to Concerto recordings by Arthur Rubinstein.

Towards the end of his life, Krips recorded several of the later Mozart Symphonies with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra for the « Philips » label : these stand as an eloquent memorial to his great skill as a Mozart conductor, and fully demonstrate why he was such a key-figure in the development of the post-War Mozart style. He wittily said, of Mozart conducting :

« Mozart is, of all composers, the most difficult to conduct, and I can tell you why : 2 bars and you are suddenly transported to heaven. It's very hard to keep your bearings when you are there. »

Of the few live recordings of Krips in the Opera House, those made during his later years at the Vienna State Opera preserve outstanding examples of his art as a dramatic conductor. They include brilliant realisations of Richard Strauß' « Die ägyptische Helena » and « Der Rosenkavalier » ; Bedřich Smetana's « Dalibor » ; as well as, perhaps more unexpectedly but no less fine, of 2 Operas by Giuseppe Verdi : « La Traviata » and « Simon Boccanegra » .

Josef Alois Krips (geboren 8. April 1902 in Wien ; gestorben 13. Oktober 1974 in Genf) war ein österreichischer Dirigent.

Krips war ein Schüler von Eusebius Mandyczewski und Felix Weingartner. Von 1921 bis 1924 wirkte er zunächst als Korrepetitor und Weingartners Assistent, später als Chorleiter und Dirigent an der Wiener Volksoper. Nach einjährigen Engagements als Opernchef in Aussig und erster Kapellmeister in Dortmund wurde er 1926 zum Hofkapellmeister an der Badischen Hofkapelle Karlsruhe und kurze Zeit später zum damals jüngsten Generalmusikdirektor Deutschlands ernannt. Nach der Machtübergabe an die Nationalsozialisten 1933 kehrte er als Dirigent nach Wien zurück und wurde 1935 auch Professor an der Wiener Akademie.

Nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an Deutschland 1938 zog Krips nach Belgrad, wo er ein Jahr als Gastdirigent arbeitete. 1939 ging er nach Wien zurück, erhielt aber wegen der jüdischen Herkunft seines Vaters Berufsverbot. Nach einem kurzen Engagement in Budapest arbeitete er heimlich als Korrepetitor und gab Privatstunden, 1943 erhielt er durch einen Freund eine Stelle in einer Lebensmittelfirma und wurde daher nicht zur Wehrmacht eingezogen.

Nach dem Krieg war Krips der einzige österreichische Dirigent, der als unbelastet galt und sofort wieder arbeiten durfte. So wurde Krips zu einem der meistgefragten Dirigenten. Er war der Erste, der nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg die Wiener Philharmoniker leitete, und dirigierte bei den ersten Salzburger Festspielen der Nachkriegszeit. In den Jahren 1946 und 1947 leitete er das Neujahrskonzert der Wiener Philharmoniker.

Von 1950 bis 1954 war Josef Krips Chefdirigent des London Symphony Orchestra, anschließend, in gleicher Funktion, neun Jahre Leiter des Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra in New York sowie, von 1963 bis 1970, Chef des San Francisco Symphony Orchestra. Seine letzte Stelle trat er 1970 an, als er Dirigent der Deutschen Oper Berlin wurde. Von 1970 bis 1973 war er Hauptdirigent der Wiener Symphoniker. Als erster österreichischer Dirigent unternahm er eine Tournee durch die Sowjetunion. Krips' letzter großer Erfolg, Anfang 1974, war eine Neuinszenierung von Così fan tutte an der Grand Opéra Paris.

Eine große Zahl der Aufnahmen von Krips ist immer noch beliebt, beispielsweise die Sinfonien von Beethoven mit dem London Symphony Orchestra, die 1960 aufgenommen wurden und in den 1990er Jahren auf CD erschienen. Bekannt sind auch seine Interpretationen von Mozart-Opern wie Don Giovanni oder Die Entführung aus dem Serail. Mit dem Amsterdamer Concertgebouw-Orchester nahm er 1972-1974 einen acht Langspielplatten umfassenden Zyklus von Mozarts späten 20 Sinfonien auf.

Krips war drei Mal verheiratet : In erster Ehe (1925) mit Maria Heller (gestorben 1930) aus Aussig, in zweiter (1947) mit Maria(nne) (Mitzi) Weinlinger geborener Willheim (geborene 1897 ; gestorben 9. April 1969) , in dritter (9. Oktober 1969) mit Harrietta Procházka (geborene 1938) .

Josef Krips wurde auf dem Neustifter Friedhof in einem Ehrengrab bestattet (Gruppe 16, Reihe 4, Nummer 30) . 1988 wurde die Kripsgasse in Wien-Liesing nach ihm benannt.

9 janvier 1962 : Le chef William Steinberg dirige au « Sanders Theatre » de l'Université de Harvard,, la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner (dans la seconde révision) avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston (DVD « ICA ») .

Entre 1955 et 1979, la chaîne de télévision publique bostonienne WGBH diffusa plus de 150 concerts de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston. Cette série d'émissions faisait intervenir 4 directeurs musicaux de l'Orchestre : Charles Münch, Erich Leinsdorf, William Steinberg et Seiji Ozawa, ainsi qu'une douzaine de chefs invités de 1er plan.

Plus d'une centaine de ces interprétations sont conservées dans les archives de la chaîne et dans celles de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, mais comme elles se présentent sur plusieurs générations de supports différents et sont hérissées de problèmes juridiques, il était impossible aux chercheurs d'y accéder, sans même parler des mélomanes qu'elles étaient susceptibles d'intéresser. ICA met bon nombre de ces documents à la disposition du public pour la 1re fois depuis leur retransmission télévisée.

William Steinberg ne fut directeur musical de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston que pendant 3 saisons (1969-1972) , entre Erich Leinsdorf et Seiji Ozawa. Dès la 1re saison, durant laquelle il fêta ses 70 ans, sa santé commença à décliner (il mourut en 1978) , et on se rappelle ses années à Boston le plus souvent pour ses annulations de concert, autant d'occasions pour le jeune chef assistant plein de talent, Michaël Tilson Thomas, dont la carrière fut lancée à ce moment-là, de se distinguer. La 1re fois que l'on vit Thomas au pupitre, ce fut quand il remplaça Steinberg au beau milieu d'un concert.

Comme Leinsdorf, Steinberg avait fui l'Europe ravagée par Adolf Hitler. Né à Cologne, en 1899, Steinberg fait l'apprentissage du violon et du piano et prend des cours de composition et de direction d'orchestre dans sa ville natale. C'est là aussi que commence sa brillante carrière : il devient l'assistant d'Otto Klemperer. L'occasion rêvée se présente lorsque Klemperer doit renoncer au dernier moment à diriger une représentation de « la Juive » de Halévy. Steinberg le remplace au pied levé avec succès. Quand Klemperer quitte Cologne, Steinberg lui succède, puis il est directeur musical à Prague et à Francfort avant l'arrivée des lois nazies anti-juives.

Il émigre alors en Palestine où il fonde avec le violoniste Bronisław Huberman l'Orchestre qui va devenir le Philharmonique d'Israël. En 1938, il débarque aux États-Unis. Là aussi, il joue un rôle dans les 1res heures d'un Orchestre, celui de l'Orchestre symphonique de la « NBC » de Toscanini. Il commence à être invité à diriger un peu partout dans le pays et devient directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Buffalo. En 1952, il accepte de prendre la direction musicale de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Pittsburgh et demeure à ce poste jusqu'en 1976, tout en continuant à accepter des invitations d'autres Orchestres symphoniques ainsi que du Metropolitan de New York et de l'Opéra de San Francisco.

Steinberg était très admiré pour sa grande musicalité ; l'étendue de son répertoire, qui comprenait beaucoup de musique contemporaine ; la clarté et la précision de sa technique ; son humour et sa cordialité de fumeur de pipe ; et sa façon de nouer des relations respectueuses et solides avec les musiciens.

Il a gravé une quantité de beaux disques avec l'Orchestre de Pittsburgh. La plupart, ré-édités sur CD, sont disponibles aujourd'hui. Avec l'Orchestre de Boston, il n'a fait que quelques enregistrements pour « Deutsche Grammophon » , mais de choix. Parmi ceux-ci, le disque des « Planètes » de Gustav Holst créa la surprise en battant des records de vente (ce qui est d'autant plus remarquable que Steinberg avait abordé l'œuvre spécialement pour les concerts et l'enregistrement) : autant la qualité de l'interprétation que le jeu virtuose de l'Orchestre et la technique d'enregistrement dernier cri séduisirent le public. L'auteur de ces lignes se souvient également d'interprétations intenses que donna Steinberg de la Symphonie dite « Résurrection » de Gustav Mahler (interprétation qui est parue en CD chez « ICA » (ICAC 5001) , à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Cologne) et du 2e Acte de « Tristan und Isolde » de Richard Wagner.

Michaël Steinberg (sans lien avec le chef malgré son patronyme) , le critique musical du « Boston Globe » durant les saisons de William Steinberg dans la ville, fit observer un jour qu'un film muet montrant la direction minimaliste du chef ferait supposer au spectateur qu'il est en train de diriger le Scherzo du « Songe d'une nuit d'été » de Mendelssohn alors qu'il déchaîne toute la puissance de l'Orchestre dans Wagner ou Mahler.

Bien que le Boston Symphony Orchestra enregistre depuis 1917 et que sa discographie remplisse un livre de plus de 300 pages, il n'a signé que 2 disques de Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner. Erich Leinsdorf a gravé la 4e Symphonie avec l'Orchestre, en 1966, pour « RCA Victor » , et William Steinberg a enregistré la 6e pour « RCA Victor » en 1972. Steinberg a également dirigé les 7e et 8e à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, et une retransmission de la 8e de 1972 est l'un des temps forts du coffret de retransmissions historiques publié par l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston lui-même, il y a 10 ans.

Il est intéressant d'explorer l'histoire de Bruckner à l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston ; l'Orchestre n'a jamais eu la réputation d'être une formation brucknérienne, mais la musique de Bruckner joue un rôle dans sa programmation depuis plus d'un siècle. On est surpris de constater que le directeur musical qui a interprété le plus d'œuvres de Bruckner est Seiji Ozawa, qui, au fil des ans, a dirigé 7 des Symphonies (nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8 et 9) . Wilhelm Gericke arrive en 2e, avec 5 Symphonies de Bruckner au cours de ses 2 périodes distinctes de directeur musical, à la fin du XIXe siècle et au début du XXe. À cette époque, les Symphonies de Bruckner étaient encore une musique relativement nouvelle ; le compositeur n'avait pas achevé sa 9e Symphonie, à sa mort en 1896, et Gericke ne dirigea l'œuvre à Boston que 8 ans plus tard.

Serge Koussevitski ne dirigea que 3 des Symphonies, mais il en donna certaines souvent ; il programma la 8e lors de 5 saisons, entre 1929 et 1947. En revanche, le directeur musical le plus récent de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, James Levine, n'a jamais dirigé Bruckner, affirmant qu'il aime la musique mais sent qu'il n'a rien à apporter. De nombreux chefs invités ont donné des interprétations mémorables de Bruckner, dont Bernard Haitink, Claudio Abbado, Kurt Sanderling, Kurt Masur, Carlo Maria Giulini, Simon Rattle et Daniel Barenboim ; c'est une lecture de la 7e Symphonie par Klaus Tennstedt, alors peu connu, à Tanglewood en 1977, qui le propulsa vers la renommée internationale.

Steinberg était encore chef-invité, sous la direction musicale de Charles Münch, quand il dirigea la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner lors de ce concert retransmis à la télévision depuis le « Sanders Theatre » à l'Université de Harvard, le 9 janvier 1962. L'interprétation a ceci de particulier que le programme de la série affirme que Steinberg a choisi la révision de la Symphonie faite par Bruckner, en 1890, avec l'aide de son élève et protégé Josef Schalk. C'est la version que préféraient d'importants chefs de la génération de Steinberg (et avant) tels Hans Knappertsbusch, Otto Klemperer, George Szell et Bruno Walter. Sur le cinégramme original de ce concert, toutefois, la voix familière et sonore de William Pierce annonce que l'Orchestre va jouer une édition de Steinberg lui-même.

Il semble que l'Orchestre ait bien joué la version Bruckner / Schalk, mais avec des coupures supplémentaires dans l'Adagio et, surtout, le Finale, que Steinberg pourrait avoir opérées pour faire entrer l'œuvre dans les horaires inflexibles de la télévision. Dans sa retransmission en direct de cette Symphonie, enregistrée en 1972, préservée dans le coffret de retransmissions historiques de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston provenant de ses archives, Steinberg met presque 75 minutes pour interpréter cette œuvre dans une autre édition de lui-même, fondée sur l'édition de Leopold Nowak de 1955 ; en 1962, il descend à 66 minutes.

Les minutages dans Bruckner posent une question complexe, puisqu'ils sont tributaires des éditions, des coupures dans les éditions et du biorythme du chef. Les enregistrements de l'édition Bruckner/ Schalk mentionnés sur l'instructif site www.abruckner.com vont de 85 minutes (Hans Knappertsbusch) à un peu moins de 51 minutes (Serge Koussevitski, dans une version qu'on pourrait surnommer « résumé » de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner) . Une bande d'une retransmission provenant de la même série de concerts Steinberg que ce DVD montre que le chef fit des coupures dans toute la série, et pas seulement dans la version télévisée. Les critiques notèrent également les coupures, et l'un d'eux souligna qu'elles « ne parvenaient pas à défigurer le grandiose édifice » .

En dehors de telles questions, on sent que cette interprétation reste extrêmement convaincante 50 ans plus tard. Steinberg dirige par cœur, les yeux souvent fermés ; il n'est pas dans son propre monde, mais dans celui de Bruckner ; après tout, Bruckner mourut 3 ans seulement avant la naissance de Steinberg. Rien ne paraît précipité ou forcé ; Steinberg a beau avoir fait des coupures, à tous autres égards, il comprend l'espace et le temps musical de Bruckner et y réagit avec patience, soin, et même respect ; regardez la montée majestueuse, infiniment patiente, de l'anacrouse avant l'Adagio. Steinberg comprend aussi l'autre partie de l'équation : il y a un sentiment d'infini dans la musique, mais aussi un ici-et-maintenant. Si le tempo est majestueux dans l'ensemble, si les mélodies se déploient lentement, et si les éléments de la structure s'assemblent et prennent leur propre temps pour se révéler, le mouvement de l'harmonie est souvent presque fébrile. La musique de Bruckner ne comporte pas d'importants solos, mais elle offre des possibilités de s'exprimer aux pupitres individuels, et tous les musiciens se montrent à la hauteur de leur tâche ; il est merveilleux d'entendre les cors et les tubas wagnériens.

Steinberg n'est pas un chef démonstratif, chorégraphique, mais ses intentions sont parfaitement claires ; ses gestes sont rarement amples, mais subtils et précis. Son visage exprime la Maîtrise, plutôt que l'émotion franche ; bien que, dans le Finale, son bras et son visage se tordent pour communiquer la façon dont une dissonance doit grincer.

Les critiques de ce concert furent enthousiastes, et le public du « Sanders Theatre » répondit généreusement, rappelant à plusieurs reprises Steinberg, qui monta les marches raides de l'estrade encore et encore. Il y fut accueilli par un spectacle aussi inhabituel alors qu'il l'est aujourd'hui : un Orchestre tapant avec ses archets et se joignant au public pour son ovation.

Symphonies Nos. 4, 8, 9 : Josef Krips / New York Philharmonic / « Memories Reverence » CD-Set.

Josef Krips' performances of the these 3 Bruckner Symphonies was the corner-stone of the New York Philharmonic's path-breaking Bruckner cycle in the mid-1960's. These recordings have been available on several private labels, but this is the 1st time that they are being made commercially available. The recordings are in clean monaural sound.

As an abruckner.com exclusive, anyone who purchases this set through me will also receive the recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 3 ! (John F. Berky)

8 mars 1964 : Le chef Josef Krips dirige à « Carnegie Hall » la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner (dans l'édition d'Albert J. Gutmann de 1889) avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York.

30-31 mai 1964 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige, lors d'un concert public, la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam », à l'occasion du jubilé (1,200 ans !) de l'abbaye bénédictine d' « Ottobeuren », en Allemagne de l'Ouest (étiquette « Philips », LP : 835225/26 AY ; CD : 426 107, 1989) .

The Abbey of Ottobeuren in Germany celebrated its 1200th anniversary, in 1964, and, to mark the occasion, Eugen Jochum and the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra performed Bruckner's 5th Symphony there, with « Philips » sound engineers on hand, to record them. The LP-set arrived in the shops after Jochum had completed his ground breaking Bruckner cycle in the studio for « DGG » so a new release of him conducting just the 5th seemed rather surplus to requirements and probably counted against sales. As well as this, in addition to the 2 discs containing the Symphony, the box carried a 3rd disc of a recital on the abbey's organ. This might have further ruled the set-out for reasons of expense. It was certainly not available for very long. But many who heard the Bruckner remembered something significantly different from Jochum's fine Bavarian Radio Orchestra version on « DGG » . In spite of balance problems on the LP's, there was clearly greater splendour of playing by one of the great Bruckner Orchestras in something of a golden age and the thrill of « live » performance in a near « ideal » acoustic. Albeit not one ideally rendered by the engineers, I have to say. Jochum would go on to re-record all the numbered Bruckner Symphonies for « EMI » , in Dresden, years later, but this lone concert recording of the 5th was always at the back of many people's minds. History, therefore, appears to have had the last word as it looks as though this will now go down in the catalogue as 1st choice version for Jochum, in this work, in spite of another « live » recording with the « Concertgebouw » forces made for broadcast, in december 1986.

Over the years, Jochum's fundamental view of this Symphony didn't really change, so I think the collector can be confident that overall here is Jochum's Bruckner 5th in its best official recording. No organ recital this time round, of course, just the Symphony in splendid isolation and remastered sound that is superior to the way we heard it 1st on LP. Now, the brass section is more naturally contained and placed into the sound picture where, before, they rather blew everything else away at the climaxes. And whilst still benefiting from being in a church acoustic, surely the ideal setting for this of all Bruckner's works, the impression this time is that the space around the instruments is used much more discreetly. There is still effective reverberation but it never gets in the way. Maybe the woodwind sound artificially boosted, but these are such great players I don't think complaints are all that appropriate.

For all that, Jochum has the reputation of being a conductor who moulded and shaped too much in Bruckner, in this work, his guiding hand is quite benign. The 1st movement has the right rock-solid momentum and what tempo adjustments Jochum makes never seem to jar as they can in other Bruckner Symphonies under his baton. Indeed, I think we can safely assume we are in touch with a performance tradition stretching back to the composer's own time. For example, the way he broadens slightly at the top of the 1st Allegro following the great fanfares has all the aplomb of a great actor in a slightly old-fashioned production of Shakespeare. Then, in the 2nd movement, I admired the delivery of the crucial opening oboe solo. Too often, the conductor's attention is lavished more on the big string theme that comes a little later. But I know I'm not alone in believing the oboe carries as important a message here, maybe conveying Bruckner's lonely state of mind, at the time of composition. So this is a real example of a conductor's decision to take his time over a passage paying great dividends. I also think it typical of Jochum that he should cover every base like this, especially since the arrival of the big string theme itself brings such simple dignity and such dark timbre from the « Concertgebouw players ». It's a test of Jochum's gifts in Bruckner that he can maintain our interest so well throughout this movement. Maybe the recording shows its age, from time to time, but there is no denying the quality of the playing or the finesse of the hand directing it.

In the 3rd movement, Jochum is more aware than many of the need and the rewards of contrasting the Scherzo and the Trio. In the former, there is relentless energy and weight ; in the latter, lots of earthy character and Upper-Austrian colour. But it's in the Finale that any performance of this Symphony is going to be made or broken. This is Bruckner's greatest last movement with its big fugue and grand chorale and the latter benefits greatly from that church acoustic, as you would expect. Some might find Jochum's speeding-up prior to the chorale's arrival a little excessive. I think it prepares the ground admirably so that you find you are more than ready when it confronts you. From here on, Jochum's Mastery of his material carries all before him with a near-perfect blend of intelligence and excitement. Listen especially to the magnificent brass in the closing pages. Only the greatest of Orchestras can produce playing like this, at the end of an evening.

A Classic recording rightly restored to the catalogue in good sound and an example of Jochum's Bruckner at its best.

Chorkonzert erinnert an das 1200-jährige Jubiläum des Klosters Ottobeuren

Am Samstag, den 17. Mai singen und musizieren um 18 Uhr in der Kirche Klosterwald der Frankfurter Experimentalchor, der Chor 96' und die Gruppe Himmelstraum. Auf dem Programm stehen geistliche Lieder, die von der Gregorianik über Schubert und Bruckner bis hin zu beliebten Spirituals führen.

Musikpädagoge Michaël Swiatkowski wird über die hohe Bruckner-Wertschätzung von Abt Vitalis Maier OSB sprechen. Als Ehrengäste sind Romana und Veronica-Jochum von Moltke anwesend, deren Vater Eugen Jochum das große Jubiläumsjahr 1964 mit Bruckners 5. Sinfonie eröffnete. Bei den Eröffnungsfeierlichkeiten des 1200-jährigen Jubiläums erklärte der Benediktinerabt damals :

« Wir sind mit Professor Jochum der Überzeugung, daß Anton Bruckner eine Sendung hat, gerade unserer Zeit etwas zu sagen und zu schenken. Bruckners Sendung hat begonnen, schüchtern und verhalten wie der Meister war. Aber diese unaufdringliche Gewalt kann niemand mehr aufhalten. Der moderne Mensch könne keine größere Gnade erfahren, als im Nachvollzug Bruckners echte Würde und letzte Größe wiederzugewinnen und auf diesem Weg den Verlust der Mitte zu überwinden. Ottobeuren und Bruckner möchten dazu ihre Dienste anbieten. »

1965 : Le chef Heinz Wallberg dirige le « Te Deum » de Bruckner (WAB 45) avec l'Orchestre d'État de Vienne, à la « Großes Musikvereinsaal » à l'acoustique ample (étiquettes « Guilde Internationale du Disque » ; LP / « Concert Hall Society » ; LP : SMS- / « Bearac re-issues » , CD : BRC-3269) .

Studio recordings at the « Großes Musikvereinsaal » of the Symphony No. 8 in C minor and the « Te Deum » , both done with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under their « alias » (the « Vienna State Symphony Orchestra » and the « Vienna National Orchestra ») adopted, of course, for contractual reasons. Transferred from a double LP-set by the « Concert Classics » label, these are truly model renditions of both works. Wallberg was an important Brucknerian in the line of Günter Wand or Karl Böhm, and he plays the music to the manner born. His great Orchestra performs miracles of clean articulation and his choice of tempos highlights the complex strands of the partition in a way you seldom hear in a recording. I was reminded for some reason of Pierre Boulez here. But Wallberg was a South-German, born in Westphalia, and, besides his clear-sightedness, he also shows a passion absent from the French composer-conductor who is always keen to display the benefits of a distanced glance over the text. Wallberg's climaxes are huge, world-shaking explosions of power and drama. Tender moments will thrill you and bring tears to your eyes. In fact (and, especially, in the case of the terrific 8th symphony) , these are 2 treasured recordings of a very great Mæstro who has been too little-known outside the Germanic world, where he was held in the greatest esteem for his central Bruckner interpretations. An invaluable set going at reduced price, because the 2nd CD harbors only the « Te Deum » .

14 février 1965 : Le chef Josef Krips dirige à « Carnegie Hall » la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner (dans la version de Ferdinand Löwe éditée par Ludwig Döblinger) avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York.

1965 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige le Psaume 150 de Bruckner avec le Chœur du « Deutschen Oper Berlin » et l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (étiquette « DGG » , LP : DG SLPM 139137/8 ; CD : DG 423 127-2) .

1965 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1877, éditée par Leopold Nowak (1953) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Un enregistrement existe.

1965 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1878-1880, éditée par Leopold Nowak (1953) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (étiquette « DGG » , CD : 427 200-2) .

1965 : Le chef Otto Klemperer dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre « New Philharmonia » de Londres (étiquette « EMI » , CD : « Great Recordings of the Century » , 5 62621-2) .

Klemperer's reading of Bruckner's 6th Symphony has, for 50 years, been considered as one of the Classics of the gramophone and will always remain so. This new remastering brings out the glowing colours of the Kingsway Hall recording in a fantastic way making the performance all the more desirable.

Otto Klemperer's 1965 recording of Bruckner's 6th Symphony never has been surpassed, and this reissue presents it sounding better than ever. His performance is typically unsentimental and very grand, but it never drags (his slow movement actually is one of the quickest on disc) , and he reveals more instrumental detail than anyone else. The « New Philharmonia » also is on its best behavior, and while other ensembles have featured richer brass playing, even the occasional rough edges only add to the honesty and integrity of Klemperer's achievement.

1965 : Le chef Hermann Scherchen dirige la 2e Symphonie de Bruckner, dans la version originale de 1872, avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Toronto (étiquette « Disco Archivia » , CD : DA-095) . 1er enregistrement complet de cette version.

1965 : Le chef Bernard Haitink dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » (étiquette « Philips » , CD : 442 044-2) .

Wolfgang Sawallisch

Le chef d'orchestre et pianiste allemand Wolfgang Sawallisch est né le 26 août 1923 à Munich et est mort le 22 février 2013 à Grassau, en Bavière.

Il commença le piano très jeune puis étudia la composition. Il fut répétiteur au Théâtre d'Augsbourg, en 1947, et devint chef d'orchestre de la ville. C'est alors qu'il fut invité par divers Orchestres dans les années 1950. En plus de soixante ans de carrière, il s'est produit avec tous les Orchestres et dans tous les Festivals européens, notamment au Festival de Bayreuth.

De 1960 à 1963, il est directeur musical de l'Opéra de Cologne. De 1960 à 1970, il est chef en titre de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne. De 1970 à 1980, il assume le rôle de directeur artistique de l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande. Sous son impulsion, l'Orchestre étend son répertoire à Anton Bruckner et Gustav Mahler, compositeurs peu entendus jusqu'alors en Suisse romande. Il occupe le même poste à partir de 1971 au « Bayerisches Staatsorchester » , et ce jusqu'en 1992. De 1993 à 2002, il est directeur musical de l'Orchestre de Philadelphie. Il a été en outre régulièrement invité par l'Orchestre Symphonique de la « NHK » , à partir de 1967 jusqu'aux années 2000.

Wolfgang Sawallisch a un répertoire assez varié. Cependant, ses compositeurs de prédilection semblent être Franz Schubert (dont il est aussi un accompagnateur de lieder très estimé) , Richard Wagner et Richard Strauß, mais il a également enregistré des Opéras de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, les Oratorios de Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy et la création posthume de la 3e Symphonie de Wilhelm Furtwängler, ainsi que des œuvres orchestrales de Robert Schumann et de Samuel Barber.

À ses débuts, Walter Legge disait de lui que « sa battue était aussi claire et simple que celle de Hans Knappertsbusch » , qualité (et absence de métaphysique) qui ne s'est jamais démentie.

Wolfgang Sawallisch naît le 26 août 1923 à Munich et reçoit ses premières leçons de piano à l'âge de 5 ans. Élève de l'École de musique de Munich, il fait rapidement preuve de facultés à l'instrument qu'il étudie sous l'égide de 3 professeurs, Ruoff, Haas et Sachse.

En 1947, diplômé du Conservatoire, Wolfgang Sawallisch fait ses débuts professionnels en tant que répétiteur et Maître de chœur à l'Opéra d'Augsbourg. 2 ans plus tard, avec le violoniste Gerhard Seitz, il remporte le Concours international de Genève dans la catégorie duo. La même année, il commence une carrière de chef d'orchestre qui le mène à la direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, en 1953. À 21 ans, il est alors le plus jeune chef titulaire du célèbre établissement et de son pays. Nommé directeur musical à Aachen, il y reste 6 années avant d'accepter un poste à Wiesbaden, jusqu'en 1960. Les 3 années suivantes, Wolfgang Sawallisch cumule le poste de directeur de l'Orchestre de Cologne et d'enseignant au Conservatoire local.

Après avoir dirigé « Tristan und Isolde » à Bayreuth, en 1957, devenant le plus jeune chef du Festival wagnérien, Sawallisch fait ses débuts londoniens en tant que pianiste lors d'un récital d'Elisabeth Schwarzkopf puis à la direction du « Philharmonia Orchestra ». Nommé directeur de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne, en 1960, il effectue une tournée américaine en 1964 et est invité à diriger l'Orchestre de la « NHK » au Japon. Son répertoire de prédilection comprend les Opéras de Richard Wagner et de Richard Strauß. Wolfgang Sawallisch préside simultanément à l'Opéra de Munich, en 1971, et l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande, de 1972 à 1980. Son mandat à Munich prend fin en 1992. En 1983, il passe à l'Opéra de Bavière et enregistre en public sa seconde Tétralogie (1989) . Il dirige ensuite le « Philadelphia Orchestra », son dernier mandat effectué de 1993 à 2003 compte plusieurs tournées mondiales. Le temps est venu pour l'un des plus grands chefs d'orchestre d'après-guerre de prendre sa retraite après avoir exercé son art dans l'ombre du géant médiatique Herbert von Karajan. Le 22 février 2013, Wolfgang Sawallisch s'éteint à l'âge de 89 ans.

Un à un, à l'ancienne, Wolfgang Sawallisch a gravi les échelons qui l'ont placé au côté des plus importants chefs d'orchestre germaniques du 20^e siècle. Une direction claire et précise, ennemie des effets spectaculaires et des épanchements outrés, parvient, par la sobriété de son style et la Maîtrise de l'expression, au cœur même de l'émotion musicale.

Wolfgang Sawallisch naît à Munich le 26 août 1923. Dès l'âge de 5 ans, il étudie le piano à l'Académie de musique de sa ville natale, puis la théorie et la composition. Il est fait prisonnier en 1942, sur le front italien. Rendu à la vie civile, il est nommé répétiteur à l'Opéra d'Augsbourg (1947) , où il est rapidement promu 1^{er} chef d'orchestre. En 1949, il obtient au concours international de Genève, avec Gerhard Seitz, un second prix (le 1^{er} prix n'étant pas décerné) dans la catégorie « duo piano-violon » . Élève d'Igor Markevitch au Festival de Salzbourg (1951) , il devient rapidement son assistant (1952-1953) . De retentissants débuts, en 1953, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin donnent une impulsion déterminante à sa jeune carrière. Sawallisch est nommé directeur général de la musique aux Opéras d'Aix-la-Chapelle (1953-1958) , de Wiesbaden (1958-1960) , de Cologne (1960-1963) , puis de Hambourg (1960-1970) . Invité à Bayreuth, en 1957, pour y diriger « Tristan und Isolde » , il s'y produit régulièrement jusqu'en 1962. Une puissance de travail hors du commun lui permet de cumuler de nombreuses fonctions : 1er chef de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne (1960-1970) , directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Hambourg (1961-1973) , 1er chef de l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande (1970-1980) et, depuis le début des années 1960, conseiller musical à la « Deutsche Oper » de Berlin, où il dirige plusieurs ouvrages chaque saison. L'Opéra de Munich - il y règne comme directeur général de la musique (1971-1992) et comme directeur de l'Opéra (1982-1992) - devient son véritable port d'attache. Il y donne tous les Opéras de Richard Wagner, y compris les œuvres de jeunesse.

Enfant, Wolfgang Sawallisch apprend le piano avant d'étudier la direction d'orchestre (avec Hans Rosbaud) et la composition à la « Musikhochschule » de Munich. Engagé en 1947 comme répétiteur au Théâtre municipal d'Augsbourg, il y fait ses débuts de chef d'orchestre avec l'Opéra « Hänsel und Gretel » . Il remporte, en 1949, en duo avec le violoniste Gerhard Seitz, le 1er prix du concours de Genève, mais joue rarement en soliste, préférant accompagner les récitals de lieder d'Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau et Hermann Prey. Il est nommé directeur général de la musique à Aix-la-Chapelle (1953-1958) , Wiesbaden (1958-1960) et Cologne (1960-1963) , où il enseigne la direction d'orchestre. L'année 1957 voit ses débuts au Festival de Bayreuth et à Londres, où il accompagne Schwarzkopf et dirige le « Philharmonia » Orchestra.

1er chef de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne (1960-1970) , directeur musical de la Philharmonie de Hambourg (1961-1973) , il dirige, de 1970 à 1980, l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande et dirige, jusqu'en 1992, l'Opéra de Munich. Il travaille également régulièrement avec l'Orchestre radio-symphonique de la « NHK » de Tokyo, avec celui de l'Académie Sainte-Cécile de Rome et avec la Scala de Milan (à partir de 1965) . Il dirige, depuis 1993, l'Orchestre de Philadelphie. Précise et sobre, sa direction s'attache plus à la substance des œuvres qu'à leur parure expressive, parti pris qui l'a fait taxer, à tort, d'insensibilité. Car, pour le public de Bayreuth ou de l'Opéra de Munich, ses interprétations de Wagner et de Richard Strauß possèdent le frémissement même de la vie.

The German conductor and pianist Wolfgang Sawallisch was born 26 August 1923 in Munich and died on 22 February 2013 in Grassau.

At the age of 5, Sawallisch was already playing the piano and, by the time he was 10, he had decided he wanted to become a concert pianist. As a child, he was greatly influenced by Richard Strauß and Hans Knappertsbusch.

At 1st, he studied composition and pianoforte privately. During the Second World War, he served in the « Wehrmacht » , in France and Italy, and, in the closing stages of the War, was detained at a British « POW » camp. After the War, he continued his studies at the Munich « Hochschule für Musik » where he passed his final examination for conducting.

He began his career at the Opera House in Augsburg, in 1947. At 1st, he held the position of « répétiteur » and, later, became the principal conductor. In 1949, he was awarded the 1st prize at the Geneva International Music Competition where he accompanied the violinist Gerhard Seitz. In 1952-1953, he was the personal assistant to Igor Markevitch at the International Summer Academy of the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg.

He was only 30 when he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, where Herbert von Karajan was, then, the principal conductor. When he debuted at the Bayreuth « Festspielhaus » conducting « Tristan und Isolde », in 1957, he was the youngest conductor ever to appear there.

After turning down offers to join the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra and the New York Metropolitan Opera, Sawallisch became the Principal Conductor of the Vienna Symphony, in 1960, a post he held for 10 years. In 1961, he started conducting the Hamburg Symphony Orchestra and did this for 10 years as well. From 1970 to 1980, he was the Music Director of the « Orchestre de la Suisse romande », succeeding Ernest Ansermet who had died the previous year. From 1971 to 1992, he was also the Music Director of the Bavarian State Opera and, for several years, from 1983, he was concurrently its general manager.

For 30 years, he was closely associated with musical events in Munich. Here, he conducted practically all of the major Richard Strauß Operas, « Salome » being the sole exception. He also conducted 32 complete Richard Wagner « Ring des Nibelungen » cycles and is credited with nearly 1,200 Opera performances in the city alone.

In 1966, Eugene Ormandy, the music-director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, from 1936 to 1980, had invited Sawallisch to visit him. Sawallisch subsequently made several recordings there and, in 1993, he succeeded Riccardo Muti as the Music Director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, where he remained until 2003 when he had to relinquish the post for health reasons. However, he remained its Conductor Laureate, a title he held for the rest of his life. He was also Honorary Conductor Laureate of the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra, in Tokyo, and, for over 30 years, he appeared with the Orchestra annually in Tokyo. He was the recipient of a Suntory Music Award, in 1993.

After his tenure with the Philadelphia Orchestra, Sawallisch returned for guest-conducting appearances in Philadelphia and at Carnegie Hall. However, ill health related to orthostatic hypotension prevented Sawallisch from conducting in subsequent years. In an article in « The Philadelphia Inquirer », of 27 August 2006, Sawallisch himself stated his retirement from the concert podium :

« It can happen without announcement that my blood pressure is too low. This instability gives me the necessity to finish my career after 57 years of concert and Opera conducting. »

Earlier, in 1988, he had published his autobiography, « Im Interesse der Deutlichkeit » (For the Sake of Clarity) , in which he had expounded his views on the role of a conductor.

Sawallisch was an honorary member of The Robert Schumann Society. In 2003, he helped to establish a music school in Grassau, Bavaria, naming the school the « Wolfgang Sawallisch Stiftung » (Wolfgang Sawallisch Foundation) . He himself continued to live on his Estate in Grassau, in retirement.

Sawallisch and his wife Mechthild were married for 46 years until her death in 1998. Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger (later, Pope Benedict XVI) , a family friend, officiated at her « Requiem » Mass. She had a son, Jörg, from her previous marriage, whom Sawallisch had adopted. Jörg died in January 2013.

Wolfgang Sawallisch died at his home in Grassau, aged 89.

Sawallisch has been acclaimed as an interpreter of the music of Richard Strauß. As a pianist, he accompanied a number of prominent singers in lieder, including Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Dame Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and Dame Margaret Price. He has also been acclaimed for his interpretations of the Symphonies of Anton Bruckner.

Sawallisch also recorded, as piano accompanist, Franz Schubert's « Winterreise » and Robert Schumann's « Liederkreis » and other songs with Thomas Hampson. One of his most celebrated live concert appearances as a pianist was on 11 February 1994, in Philadelphia, when Sawallisch substituted for the Philadelphia Orchestra at an all-Wagner concert on the night that a severe snow storm prevented much of the Orchestra from arriving at the Academy of Music.

Born in Munich, in 1923, Wolfgang Sawallisch was a prominent representative of the German conducting tradition, known for his thoughtful and refined interpretations of the Classical repertoire. Beginning piano studies when he was 5, Sawallisch developed rapidly as a child musician. His piano teachers were Wolfgang Ruoff, Joseph Haas, and Hans Sachse. In 1947, following graduation from the Munich « Hochschule für Musik » , Sawallisch began his professional career, working 1st as a « répétiteur » and chorus Master at the Augsburg Opera Theatre. In 1949, he and his recital partner, violinist Gerhard Seitz, won the Geneva International Competition as best duo. In the same year, he began obtaining guest conducting assignments. When Sawallisch conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1953, he was the youngest person ever to have led that Orchestra. That year, he became General Music Director at Aachen, and this appointment made him the youngest music-director in Germany. He remained in Aachen, until 1958, when he moved to a similar position in Wiesbaden, staying there until 1960. From 1960 to 1963, Sawallisch was in Cologne, also teaching conducting at the Conservatory. He made his 1st Bayreuth appearance in 1957, opening the Festival with « Tristan und Isolde » . Again, he was the Festival's youngest conductor. Also, in 1957, he made 2 debuts in London : one as pianist in a lieder recital with Elisabeth Schwarzkopf and the other as a guest-conductor with the « Philharmonia » . He held concurrent appointments as principal conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, from 1960 to 1970, and the Hamburg State Philharmonic, from 1961 to 1973. He made his American debut conducting the Vienna Symphony Orchestra during a 1964 tour. Also, in 1964, he made his 1st appearance guest conducting the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra in Japan, and returned every year to conduct it. He held another pair of concurrent appointments through most of the 1970's : Artistic Director of « l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande » , from 1972 to 1980, and General Music Director of the Bavarian State Opera in Munich, beginning in 1971. Artistic director of the Bavarian State Opera, from 1976 to 1977, he became the company's director in 1982. His 1st appearance with the Philadelphia Orchestra was in 1984, part of his busy schedule as a guest-conductor. He was appointed its Music Director in 1990, effective at the start of the 1993-1994 season, and ultimately having a large effect on its personnel and sound. In 1993, Sawallisch and the Philadelphia Orchestra toured Japan, China, and Hong Kong, the 1st of several acclaimed international tours. In addition to extensive touring, Sawallisch has pursued a busy recording schedule with « EMI », programming an intriguing mix of the established Classics, major Masterworks of the 20th Century, and new music, including compositions by Druckman, Pöntinen, Rochberg, and Ullmann. He led the Philadelphia Orchestra in the 1st appearance by an American Orchestra in Vietnam, and directed the 1st live Internet performance by an American Symphony. Sawallisch regularly conducted Europe's greatest Orchestras, including the London Philharmonic Orchestra, the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, and « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Continuing his career as a pianist, Sawallisch accompanied some of the greatest performers of the 20th Century, including Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf. Among Sawallisch's numerous acclaimed recordings is the 1998 video soundtrack of Wagner's entire « Ring des Nibelungen » cycle with the Bavarian State Opera.

Sawallisch began to learn the piano at the age of 5, studying theory and composition while still at school and subsequently becoming a pupil of Wolfgang Ruoff, Joseph Haas, and Hans Sachse in Munich, prior to joining the German army, in 1942 ; following the end of World War II, he completed his musical studies at the Munich High-School for Music. He then joined the Augsburg Opera, in 1947, as a « répétiteur », and with the violinist Gerhard Seitz won the 1st prize for duo performances at the Geneva International Music Competition, in 1949. Having made his debut as a conductor with Humperdinck's Opera « Hänsel und Gretel », in 1950, at Augsburg, he shortly afterwards became 1st conductor there. He was Germany's youngest general music-director on his appointment to head the Aachen Opera, in 1953, and was later recruited to the same post at Wiesbaden, in 1958, and at Cologne, in 1960. He also taught conducting at the Cologne Conservatory. Sawallisch conducted annually at the Bayreuth Festival, from 1957 to 1961, opening the 1957 Festival with « Tristan und Isolde ». In the same year, he made his English debuts as both an accompanist, with the soprano Elisabeth Schwarzkopf, and as a conductor, with her husband Walter Legge's « Philharmonia » Orchestra. Legge also engaged him to make several important recordings, notably the 1st commercial release of Richard Strauß's final Opera, « Capriccio » .

In 1960, in addition to his appointment at Cologne, Sawallisch became chief conductor of the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and, in 1961, of the Hamburg State Philharmonic Orchestra, retaining both positions until 1970 and touring America successfully with the Vienna Symphony, in 1964. He succeeded Paul Kletzki as chief conductor of the « Orchestre de la Suisse romande », in 1972, having been appointed the previous year as chief conductor of the Bavarian State Opera. He led this company on another successful tour, to London in 1972, and remained at its head until 1992, making numerous recordings, notably of lesser-known works by Wagner and Richard Strauß.

In 1990, Sawallisch was named as the chief conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in succession to Riccardo Muti, taking-up this appointment in 1993. He relinquished the position in 2003 following the death of his wife, but continued to appear with the Orchestra as a most-welcome guest. In addition to his permanent posts, Sawallisch had an active career as a guest-conductor with the world's leading Orchestras, including the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw », London Philharmonic, Vienna Philharmonic, and the « Orchestre National de Radio France » in Paris, and conducted regularly at La Scala, Milan. He was especially popular in Japan, where he appeared regularly with the « NHK » Symphony Orchestra. Sawallisch was a conservative, « no-nonsense » conductor whose platform style was economical and clear. His interpretations were grounded firmly on a complete understanding of the Austro-German school of composers, of which he was a pre-eminent interpreter.

His discography is large and distinguished, and his recordings of Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Wagner, Bruckner, Dvořák, Richard Strauß and Hindemith may be recommended without hesitation in both studio and live incarnations.

German orchestral conductor Wolfgang Sawallisch (born in 1923) has been one of the best-known and most widely respected figures in the field of Classical music, both in his native Germany and in the United States.

Sawallisch's conducting art traced its roots back to the long traditions of German Opera. He emerged from a German Opera House environment that was directly shaped by the music and personal influence of great composers like Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß. Sawallisch kept to a fairly narrow focus over much of his career ; in an age when other conductors such as Leonard Bernstein and Herbert von Karajan became international stars and members of the jet-set, he concentrated on the music of a few composers whose music he knew inside and out, and he preferred smaller, high-quality performances to high-profile venues. Yet, Sawallisch sought-out new challenges in his later years, coming to the United States to assume the leadership of the Philadelphia Orchestra, one of America's most venerated ensembles but one that was troubled when he took the reins.

Born on August 26, 1923, in Munich, Wolfgang Sawallisch has lived in that south German city for most of his life. He was given piano lessons from the age of 5, quickly showed talent and, at 10, announced his goal of becoming a concert pianist. But a visit to the Opera in Munich changed his mind. « At 11, I heard my 1st Opera, coincidentally in the Munich Opera House where I would one day become music-director. » Sawallisch told Mike Bradley of the London « Times » . « I was so fascinated by the sounds of the Orchestra and the singers and the sight of the whole production on the stage that I decided immediately to change my mind and study to be a conductor. »

Munich was one of the centers of German musical life, at the time, and Sawallisch soaked-up influences from some of the greats of German music. He once saw the aging composer and conductor Richard Strauß conduct a Mozart Opera while accompanying it on the harpsichord and inserting little quotations from his own music, to the delight of the audience. Sawallisch's growing Mastery of Opera was interrupted, however, by the advent of World War II. The teenaged Sawallisch was drafted into the Germany army and sent to the front in Italy, where he was captured and taken prisoner by British forces. He spent 3 years as a prisoner of War, and was allowed to return home in October of 1945.

By 1947, German musical life had begun to return to normal, and Sawallisch graduated from the « Hochschule für Musik » , in Munich. He landed his 1st job that year, becoming a « répétiteur » (rehearsal conductor) , at the Opera Theatre of Augsburg. In 1953, at age 30, he made a splash when he became the youngest person ever to conduct the prestigious Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and, that year, he landed the post of music-director (a job that combines conducting duties with choice of repertoire and the larger management of a company's artistic direction) at an Opera House in Aachen. He was also the youngest person to hold the post of music-director in Germany, at the time.

Sawallisch never entirely gave-up his ambitions as a pianist and, in 1949, he and violinist Gerhard Seitz took honours as best duo at the Geneva International Competition in Switzerland. He went on to a noteworthy career as an accompanist to Classical singers, performing and recording with such stars of German vocal art as Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau and Elisabeth Schwarzkopf ; he made his debut, in London, as an accompanist to Schwarzkopf in 1955. But his career was clearly moving in the direction of conducting. From Aachen, he moved to a music directorship at the Opera House in Wiesbaden, in West Germany, in 1958, and then to the larger Cologne Opera, in 1960. There, he also became a professor at the Cologne Conservatory.

In 1957, Sawallisch achieved a major breakthrough when he was invited to conduct Wagner's Opera « Tristan und Isolde » at the Bayreuth Festival Theatre. That Opera House, located in Bayreuth in Sawallisch's home region of Bavaria, had been established by Wagner himself and functioned (and continues to function) as a kind of shrine to his music and his vision of a union of all the arts. Sawallisch's command of Wagner's sprawling, 5 hour score won critical admiration, and he remained a regular conductor at Bayreuth, until 1962. Eventually, however, he ran afoul of Bayreuth's director, Wieland Wagner, who was Richard Wagner's grandson, and decided to seek-out situations where he would have more control.

The younger Wagner was an innovator who wanted to impose his own personality on the staging of Wagner's Classics. Sawallisch, by contrast, believed in keeping his own personality in the background. In both Opera and Symphonic music, his rehearsals were devoted in large measure to drawing-out what he saw as the composer's original intention, rather than inserting a specific interpretation on top of what was already there. He studied scores in great detail, paying close attention to the composer's interpretive markings and passing those along to the Orchestra members. That placed Sawallisch in contrast to other conductors of the 1950's and 1960's, an era that marked a high-point of Classical music's popularity in the United States. Other noted conductors of that time, such as the New York Philharmonic's Leonard Bernstein and the Berlin Philharmonic's Herbert von Karajan, often gave performances and made recordings of a given work that differed sharply from those of each other and from other top conductors.

During the 1960's, Sawallisch continued to conduct Opera and also held orchestral conducting jobs : with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, from 1960 to 1970, and the Hamburg State Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1961 to 1973. In the 1970's, he achieved world class posts in both Opera and Symphony. He became principal conductor of « l'Orchestre de la Suisse romande » in Geneva, in 1970, remaining there until 1980, and the bulk of his reputation rests on the years he spent with the Bavarian State Opera company, in Munich. Beginning as music-director, in 1971, he became the company's general manager in 1982.

Many of Sawallisch's recordings as a conductor were made in Munich. His recording career began in 1957, and his catalogue grew to include most of the major Operas of Wagner and Strauß, as well as Mozart and other German and Austrian composers. Over his career, up to the point when he took-over the Philadelphia Orchestra, he conducted Wagner's 4 Opera, 20 hour « Ring » cycle an astonishing 32 times. Sawallisch rarely took-up the baton in Italian Opera, preferring to remain with repertory he felt he knew best. He was regarded as one of the top Opera conductors in the world, and he regularly received offers of guest conducting engagements from New York's Metropolitan Opera and other top companies, but he restricted his guest conducting engagements mostly to the La Scala Opera House, in Milan. As a Symphonic conductor, he was slightly better-traveled, taking on guest slots with the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra and Tokyo's « NHK » Symphony, and making a series of acclaimed Beethoven recordings with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra of Amsterdam. But, for the most part, he remained in Central Europe in the Orchestral field as well. In personality, unlike many other figures in the world of Opera, Sawallisch was described as modest and unassuming.

For the Philadelphia Orchestra, however, Sawallisch made an exception. He made his 1st appearance with the Orchestra, in 1966, at the invitation of its longtime conductor, Hungarian-born Eugene Ormandy, and that 1st appearance turned into a series of repeat engagements over the years. « I enjoyed that and other contact with the Orchestra so much that we began to develop a familiarity » , Sawallisch told Bradley. « I was impressed by their discipline, their dedication and their professionalism. » When Ormandy's successor, Riccardo Muti, stepped down in the early 1990's, Sawallisch emerged as a top candidate to replace him, and he assumed the position of music-director of the Philadelphia Orchestra, in 1993, at the age of 70. Echoing President John F. Kennedy's identification of himself as a Berliner, 30 years earlier, Sawallisch proclaimed himself a Philadelphian at a splashy outdoor ceremony where he was introduced by Philadelphia mayor Edward Rendell.

The task Sawallisch faced in Philadelphia, at an age when most other conductors had slowed their activities or retired completely, was difficult in several respects. For one thing, he spoke English poorly at the time. For another, the Orchestra's overall quality, historically marked by string tone of legendary warmth, was widely thought to have declined under Muti, who showed little interest in the extra-musical socializing usually required of a music-director in America, where Orchestras sought corporate support. (The level of governmental arts support in Europe was and still remains much higher than in the United States.) But the challenge of working under a system of patronage (contributions from wealthy individuals and organizations) rather than government support appealed to Sawallisch and, he told Bradley, his decision « to forget the past and go forwards was the right decision. It has endowed me with a new youth. » The decision was partly motivated by the death of Sawallisch's wife, in the years before he came to Philadelphia.

Living and working in America altered Sawallisch's musical perspective. Whereas he had been familiar with the works of only a few American composers while conducting in Europe, the 70 something Sawallisch emerged in Philadelphia as a champion of new American music. He was involved with programming changes that were innovative by any standard : in the year 2000, he devoted the Orchestra's entire subscription season to music of the 20th Century, resulting in ticket sales records, at a time when other American Orchestras were struggling at the box-office and, in 1997, he led the Orchestra in the 1st live Internet broadcast mounted by a major Symphony Orchestra, attracting listeners in more than 40 countries around the world.

Among Sawallisch's most important legacies was his championing of the Orchestra's new 2,500 seat Verizon Hall, replacing the durable and physically beautiful but acoustically troublesome Academy of Music. The hall was finished under Sawallisch's tenure and opened to positive reviews, completing a process that Muti, Ormandy, and Leopold Stokowski, before him, had tried without success to initiate. In 2003, before his retirement as music-director, Sawallisch made the 1st recording undertaken in Verizon Hall, a 3 disc set of music by Robert Schumann that was nominated for Grammy Awards in the categories of Best Classical Album and Best Orchestral Performance.

Wolfgang Sawallisch (geboren 26. August 1923 in München ; gestorben 22. Februar 2013 in Grassau) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Pianist.

Wolfgang Sawallisch war der Sohn von Maria und Wilhelm Sawallisch. Der Vater war in München Direktor der Hamburg-Bremer-Feuerversicherung. Wolfgang Sawallisch hatte einen fünf Jahre älteren Bruder Werner. Er bestand das Abitur 1942 am Wittelsbacher-Gymnasium in München.

In seiner musikalischen Ausbildung wurde er durch seine Familie großzügig unterstützt, besonders durch seine früh verwitwete Mutter, die seinetwegen wieder beruflich tätig wurde, und auch durch den älteren Bruder. So konnte er sich vor und nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg ohne finanzielle Sorgen auf seinen Beruf als Pianist und Dirigent vorbereiten. Die berufliche Entwicklung wurde durch den Kriegsdienst und die britische Kriegsgefangenschaft in Italien unterbrochen.

Nach seiner Heimkehr nach München studierte er bei Joseph Haas und legte 1946 nach einem Semester das Staatsexamen an der Staatlichen Musikhochschule München ab. Dirigierunterricht nahm er bei Hans Rosbaud und Igor Markevitch. Seine erste Anstellung fand er am Stadttheater Augsburg. In dieser Zeit heiratete er die Sängerin Mechthild Schmid (geborene 1921) , Tochter des Orgelbauers Magnus Schmid (1889-1964) aus Pemmering, die er bereits in seiner Jugendzeit in München kennengelernt hatte. Durch die Adoption des 1944 geborenen Sohnes seiner Frau aus erster Ehe gründete er eine eigene Familie. Mechthild Sawallisch verzichtete auf eine eigene Karriere als Sängerin zugunsten der Karriere ihres Mannes. Sie litt darunter, im Schatten des erfolgreichen Mannes zu stehen und sah dann ihre Funktion als seine Managerin. Nach 46 Ehejahren starb sie mit 77 Jahren infolge ihrer Erkrankung an Schilddrüsenkrebs.

In Grassau wurde 2003 die Wolfgang-Sawallisch-Stiftung gegründet, die eine Musikschule umfasst. Bei einem Benefiz-Konzert des Bayerischen Staatsorchesters in Grassau am 2. Februar 2013 unter Leitung von Kent Nagano war Sawallisch zum letzten Mal in der Öffentlichkeit zu sehen. Der Opernwelt gab er für die Januar-Ausgabe 2013 sein letztes Presse-Interview. Der Sohn Jörg starb im Januar 2013, nur einen Monat vor seinem Adoptivvater. Sawallisch lebte über 50 Jahre im oberbayerischen Grassau im Chiemgau, wo er auch begraben wurde.

Die Villa in Grassau, in der Wolfgang Sawallisch über Jahrzehnte gewohnt hatte, wurde von der Sawallisch-Stiftung übernommen und wird ab 2014 von der Musikschule Grassau für Konzerte genutzt.

Der Aufstieg als Dirigent orientierte sich an den Maßstäben der Kapellmeistertradition ; er war Korrepetitor und Kapellmeister am Stadttheater Augsburg 1947-1953 ; 1953-1958 Generalmusikdirektor am Theater Aachen ; 1958-1960 Generalmusikdirektor in Wiesbaden ; 1960-1964 Musikdirektor in Köln sowie ab 1961 Professor für Dirigieren an der Hochschule für Musik Köln ; 1960-1970 Chefdirigent der Wiener Symphoniker sowie 1961-1973 zugleich Chefdirigent des Philharmonischen Staatsorchesters Hamburg.

In seine Hamburger Zeit fällt auch die Widmung des französischen Komponisten André Casanova (1919-2009) für das « Notturmo pour orchestre » , Opus 13, geschrieben « In memoriam Richard Strauß » , das 1960 bei Ricordi in Paris erschienen war. Ein Exemplar der Partitur mit über 100 Seiten befindet sich in der Musikabteilung der Zentralbibliothek der Hamburger Öffentlichen Bücherhallen (HÖB) mit der persönlichen handschriftlichen Widmung an Sawallisch.

Von 1973-1980 war er Chefdirigent des Orchestre de la Suisse romande, Genf. Seit seinem internationalen Durchbruch mit den Berliner Philharmonikern beim « Edinburgh Festival » 1955 wurde Sawallisch zu Gastdirigaten nach Westeuropa eingeladen. Hinzu kamen Verpflichtungen in Bayreuth (1957-1962) , Salzburg, Florenz und an der Mailänder Scala. Seit 1964 reiste Sawallisch regelmäßig nach Japan, wo er mit dem NHK Symphony Orchestra Tokio zusammenarbeitete (seit 1967 Ehrendirigent) . Als bisher einziger Dirigent seit Bestehen des Orchesters erhielt er 1994 zusätzlich den Titel Honorary Conductor Laureate.

Vom 5. bis 8. März 1957 dirigierte Wolfgang Sawallisch erstmals im Wiener Musikverein im Rahmen der « Großen Symphonie » ein Symphonikerkonzert (mit der französischen Suite nach Rameau von Werner Egk, dem 5. Beethoven-Klavierkonzert mit Friedrich Wührer und der 8. Symphonie von Dvořák) . Der Erfolg dieses Konzerts schuf die Basis für seine Chefdirigentenzeit von 1960-1970 - erstmals seit Jahrzehnten gab es diese Position wieder, denn Herbert von Karajan war nie offiziell Chefdirigent, sondern Konzertdirektor der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde gewesen. Sawallisch fühlte sich durch den Mietstatus des Orchesters und die dadurch gegebene Abhängigkeit von den Konzertveranstaltern in seiner Entscheidungskompetenz stark eingeschränkt. Als « Kapellmeister alter Schule » vermied er es, analog zum « Karajan-Zyklus » einen « Sawallisch-Zyklus » zu veranstalten, sondern kreierte den « Symphoniker-Zyklus » und legte den Schwerpunkt auf zyklische Aufführungen der Werke einzelner Komponisten (Bruckner-Zyklus, Beethoven-Zyklus) .

Mit ihm nahm das Orchester Platten auf, die wichtigsten Ereignisse waren die erste Amerika-Tournee 1964 sowie die Weltreise Japan-Amerika 1967 mit Mammut-Repertoire, einer ungewöhnlichen Dichte an Konzerten und täglichen stundenlangen Busfahrten während der sechs Wochen dauernden Tournee. Sawallisch ging das Wagnis ein, die Wiener Symphoniker ausgerechnet mit Bruckners 3. Symphonie, einem in Amerika damals weitgehend unbekanntem Werk, in der New Yorker Carnegie Hall zu präsentieren, und erntete hymnische Kritiken. 1967 stand im Zentrum der Tournee ein UNO-Konzert mit Henryk Szeryng als Solisten.

Unstimmigkeiten führten 1970 zu Sawallischs Demission, und nach einer zehnjährigen Pause kehrte er 1980 im Rahmen einer Europa-Tournee als Gastdirigent zurück. Seitdem blieb er einer der ständigen Dirigenten - bis zum 24. Juni 2005, seinem letzten, bereits von schweren gesundheitlichen Problemen überschatteten Konzert in Bad Kissingen, mit Werken von Kodály, Haydn und Brahms.

Die Musiker schätzten Sawallisch wegen seiner musikalischen Kompetenz, klaren Schlagtechnik und werkzentrierten Interpretation, die niemals spektakulär war - dies brachte ihm bei manchen Kritikern den Ruf als bürokratischer Meister des Mittelmaßes ein. Die Wiener Symphoniker spielten 165 Produktionen mit ihm ein, wobei die Amerika-Reise mit 34 Konzerten als eine einzige Produktion zählt. Sawallisch war für das Orchester einer der prägenden Dirigenten der zweiten Hälfte des 20. Jahrhunderts.

Vom 9. Oktober bis 30. November 1964 dauerte das erste Gastspiel in Tokio mit dem NHK-Sinfonieorchester. Es entwickelte sich daraus eine lange Freundschaft. 1967 begannen Sawallischs jährliche mehrwöchige Besuche in Japan mit Konzerten. Bei seinem letzten Konzert im November 2004 dirigierte er Beethovens 7. Sinfonie. Sawallisch schrieb dem NHK Symphony Orchestra noch am 6. Januar 2013, wenige Wochen vor seinem Tod, einen Brief.

In einem Interview 1998 bei BR-alpha mit Kurt Meister sprach Sawallisch über seine besondere Beziehung zu Japan :

« Ich habe die große NHK-Halle mit über 4000 Plätzen und die Suntory-Hall eingeweiht. In der Zwischenzeit habe ich bestimmt zehn neue Konzertsäle in ganz Japan mit dem ersten Konzert des NHK-Orchesters eingeweiht. Also das japanische Leben liebe ich. Ich liebe die Japaner, ich liebe das Land und ich mag das Essen überhaupt nicht. Mit Sushi, mit diesem rohen Fischzeug, können Sie mich jagen. Das hängt sicherlich mit einem besonderen Ereignis in Japan zusammen. Aber das würde jetzt zu weit führen, darauf einzugehen. Aber das Land und die Leute und die Zusammenarbeit mit diesem hervorragenden Klangkörper sind jedesmal ein besonderes Erlebnis für mich. »

Sawallisch wurde in Japan verehrt. So bekam er vom NHK Symphony Orchestra 1967 den Titel Honorary Conductor und 1994 den Titel Honorary Conductor Laureate verliehen.

1971-1992 stand München im Zentrum seines musikalischen Wirkens. Als Generalmusikdirektor der Bayerischen Staatsoper übernahm er 1971 die Nachfolge Joseph Keilberths. 1976-1977 leitete er das Haus bis zum Amtsantritt August Everdings auch als Intendant. Die Spannungen mit Everding löste das Kultusministerium 1982 mit der Ernennung des Generalmusikdirektors zum Staatsoperndirektor und Everdings zum Generalintendanten der Bayerischen Staatstheater. Mit einer großen Abschiedsgala zu Silvester 1992 wurde er verabschiedet.

Die Arie der Königin der Nacht « Der Hölle Rache kocht in meinem Herzen » , gesungen von Edda Moser und begleitet vom Bayerischen Staatsorchester unter der Leitung von Wolfgang Sawallisch (Schallplattenaufnahme vom August 1972) , ist Teil einer « Musik-Kollektion von der Erde » aus dem Jahr 1977 für die Raumsonde Voyager 2. Im Oktober 2013 beschrieb Edda Moser anlässlich ihres 75. Geburtstags in Rundfunk-Interviews die besondere Vorgeschichte zu der Aufnahme durch die Electrola.

Sawallischs Aufführungen des Gesamtwerks von Richard Wagner (1982-1983) und Richard Strauß (1988) fanden internationale Beachtung. Sawallisch hat sich auch für die gemäßigte Moderne eingesetzt (Hindemith, Ege, Sutermeister, Henze) . Seine Skepsis gegenüber dem experimentellen Regietheater brachte ihm bei etlichen Kritikern den Ruf eines konservativen Opernchefs ein.

Nach 22 Jahren am Nationaltheater München war Sawallisch von 1993 bis 2003 Musikalischer Leiter des Philadelphia Orchestra. Mit ihm unternahm er Konzertreisen im In- und Ausland. Die amerikanische Presse rühmte sein Dirigat, seine Bedeutung für den Klang des Orchesters und auch sein Engagement für moderne amerikanische Musik.

In seinem letzten Interview vom Januar 2013 in der « Opernwelt » sagt Sawallisch zur Bedeutung der Arbeit als Chef des Philadelphia Orchestra : « Ich dachte mir : Das brauche ich noch ! Und es wurden auch die Jahre mit den persönlich größten und schönsten Aufgaben für mich. Denn das Philadelphia Orchestra besaß damals eine Klangfarbe, wie sie eben Chicago und New York nicht bieten. Das kam durch Eugene Ormandy und Leopold Stokowski. Darauf zu bauen, war genau das, was ich mir gewünscht hatte. »

Sawallisch war auch als Pianist tätig. Seit er gemeinsam mit Gerhard Seitz (Violine) 1949 beim Internationalen Musikwettbewerb in Genf im Fach Violine-Klavier einen ersten Preis gewann, konzertierte er regelmäßig auch als Kammermusiker und Liedbegleiter und andere von Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Peter Schreier und Elisabeth Schwarzkopf.

1968 : Le chef Heinz Wallberg dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre d'État de Vienne, à la « Großes Musikvereinsaal » à l'acoustique ample (étiquettes « Guilde Internationale du Disque » ; LP : 2604 / « Concert Hall Society » ; LP : SMS- / « Bearac re-issues » , CD : BRC-3269) .

Studio recordings at the « Großes Musikvereinsaal » of the Symphony No. 8 in C minor and the « Te Deum » , both done with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under their « alias » (the « Vienna State Symphony Orchestra » and the « Vienna National Orchestra ») adopted, of course, for contractual reasons. Transferred from a double LP-set by the « Concert Classics » label, these are truly model renditions of both works. Wallberg was an important Brucknerian in the line of Günter Wand or Karl Böhm, and he plays the music to the manner born. His great Orchestra performs miracles of clean articulation and his choice of tempos highlights the complex strands of the partition in a way you seldom hear in a recording. I was reminded for some reason of Pierre Boulez here. But Wallberg was a South-German, born in Westphalia, and, besides his clear-sightedness, he also shows a passion absent from the French composer-conductor who is always keen to display the benefits of a distanced glance over the text. Wallberg's climaxes are huge, world-shaking explosions of power and drama. Tender moments will thrill you and bring tears to your eyes. In fact (and, especially, in the case of the terrific 8th symphony) , these are 2 treasured recordings of a very great Mæstro who has been too little-known outside the Germanic world, where he was held in the greatest esteem for his central Bruckner interpretations. An invaluable set going at reduced price, because the 2nd CD harbors only the « Te Deum » .

1968 : Le chef Heinz Wallberg dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, dans l'édition de Leopold Nowak (1951) , avec l'Orchestre d'État de Vienne, à la « Großes Musikvereinsaal » à l'acoustique ample (étiquettes « Guilde Internationale du Disque » ; LP : 2541 / « Concert Hall Society » ; LP : SMS-2541 / « Bearac re-issues » ; CD : BRC-3087) .

Little-known outside Austria and Germany, Heinz Wallberg has been one of the foremost Brucknerians in his country. His recorded output introduced him as an accompanist either in Concertos or Opera, but the man was much more than that. Recording in their celebrated hall under an « alias » the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra gave here one of the finest Bruckner 9ths on LP. Wallberg is nothing short of great : he belongs to a very limited selection of conductors who see the D minor Symphony as a bridge linking the Classical-Romantic tradition with the forthcoming expressionism, even atonality. It's really been a long time I got shivers of excitement or a lump in the throat listening to Bruckner's 9th.

1969 : Création à Graz du Finale de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la réalisation de Ernst Märzendorfer qui en assure également la direction.

...

Ernst Märzendorfer (geboren 26. Mai 1921 in Oberndorf bei Salzburg ; gestorben 16. September 2009 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Dirigent, Komponist und Musikforscher.

Ernst Märzendorfer studierte in Graz bei Robert Wagner und bei Clemens Krauß am Mozarteum Salzburg. Seine Dirigentenkarriere begann 1940 an der Grazer Oper. In der Folge gründete er den Grazer A cappella Chor, mit dem er bedeutsame Erstaufführungen verwirklichte (Frank Martins Golgotha und ab) . Nach zwei Jahren am Teatro Colón in Buenos Aires, wo er als Assistent von Karl Böhm und als Dirigent tätig war, leitete er von 1953 bis 1958 als Chefdirigent des Mozarteumorchesters Salzburg. Als solcher förderte er auch den Bau von Wohnungen für die Familien junger Orchestermusiker in der Salzburger Siebenstädterstraße 29. Ab 1951 war er auch Professor am Salzburger Musikakademie Mozarteum, heute « Universität für Musik und Darstellende Kunst, Mozarteum » . Während seines Engagements in Berlin (von 1958 bis 1961) debütierte er 1959 an der Wiener Staatsoper mit Rigoletto und wurde als Ständiger Gastdirigent an die Wiener Staatsoper berufen. Von 1964 bis 1984 wirkte er außerdem als Ständiger Gastdirigent an der Berliner Staatsoper.

Märzendorfers umfassendes Opernrepertoire umfasste mehr als achtzig Opern (von Mozart bis Wagner, Verdi, Debussy, Křenek und Milhaud) . Darunter finden sich Erstaufführungen wie Die schweigsame Frau in Salzburg, Der Rosenkavalier und Siegfried in Rom, « Parsifal » in Berlin sowie die amerikanische Erstaufführung von Strauß' Capriccio. Zu den Premieren an der Volksoper Wien zählt Intermezzo von Richard Strauß, mit dem er persönlich bekannt war. In Graz dirigierte er über zwanzig Konzerte, darunter zwischen 1968 und 1973 einen Mahler-Zyklus, unter anderem auch die Uraufführung seiner Bearbeitung des Finales von Bruckners Neunter und Hugo Wolfs Intermezzo für Streichorchester. Seine rege internationale Tätigkeit im Opern- und Konzertbereich führte ihn unter anderem nach Frankreich, Rumänien Italien, Japan, Nord- und Südamerika ; er dirigierte bei den Salzburger und Bregenzer Festspielen und den Wiener Festwochen, konzertierte mit den Wiener und Berliner Philharmonikern, den Wiener Symphonikern und anderen bedeutenden Orchestern. Als Chefdirigent des Salzburger Hellbrunn-Festivals dirigierte er in fünfundzwanzig Jahren zwanzig verschiedene Bühnenwerke - von Offenbach bis zu Richard Strauß' letzter Oper Des Esels Schatten.

Der symphonische Schwerpunkt Märzendorfers galt den Werken Bruckners und Gustav Mahlers. Er leitete Erstaufführungen von Werken der Komponisten Hindemith (Mathis der Maler in Paris) , Dallapiccola, Orff, Bartók, Britten und Henze. Als erster Dirigent nahm er alle einhundertsieben Sinfonien von Franz-Joseph Haydn in Wien auf. Von seinen zahlreichen Platteneinspielungen sind die Gesamtaufnahmen von L'elisir d'amore, Eine Nacht in Venedig, Die Hugenotten oder Rappresentazione di Anima e di Corpo (Salzburger Festspiele 1973) sowie Werke von Johann Strauß Vater zu nennen.

Zu den Höhepunkten seiner Opernkariere zählen Aufführungen von Strauß' Die schweigsame Frau, Pfitzners Palestrina, Schnittkes Gesualdo, sowie die Weltpremieren von Henzes Tancredi und Idiot an der Wiener Staatsoper und Eröds Orpheus ex machina in Graz. 2003 dirigierte er die ungekürzte Fassung von Enescus Œdipe in Bukarest. Von 2005 an leitete er als Chefdirigent die Festspiele im Römersteinbruch von Sankt Margarethen im österreichischen Burgenland.

Märzendorfer, der selbst Klavier, Geige und Bratsche spielte, trat auch als Komponist von kammermusikalischen Werken, von Klavierkonzerten, Bühnenmusik und eines Balletts (Teufelsgarde 1944) hervor.

Hans-Hubert Schönzeler

Hans-Hubert Schönzeler was a German-born Australian-naturalised English-resident composer, conductor and musicologist who became an authority on Anton Bruckner and Antonín Dvořák. He was born on 22 June 1925 in Leipzig, an only child, and studied the violin from the age of 5. Although his family was not Jewish, he was sent to Brussels so as to avoid contact with the « Hitler Youth » . In 1939, his family emigrated to Australia where, on the outbreak of the Second World War, his father was interned as an enemy alien. Hans-Hubert went to Sydney Boys High-School but, in 1941, he and his mother were also interned for the duration of the War. During these years, he continued to study music. He also studied conducting with a former director of the Vienna Boys' Choir. He was released in 1946 and was naturalised as an Australian in 1947. He attended the New South Wales State Conservatorium, where he studied with Eugene Goossens. With assistance from Rafael Kubelik, Schönzeler settled in London, in 1950, and went to work for Eulenburg Editions. He was later a director of the company. He conducted the 20th Century Ensemble in London from 1951 to 1962. He studied at the Paris Conservatoire and the « Accademia Musicale Chigiana » in Siena, and worked as a freelance conductor in many countries as well as the United Kingdom. He conducted the concert at the Royal Albert Hall in 1964 marking the 10th anniversary of the death of Wilhelm Fürtwängler, whose biography he later wrote. In 1967, he commenced a long association with the West Australian Symphony Orchestra. Schönzeler became a noted expert on Anton Bruckner. In 1970, he wrote a book on the composer ; in 1973, he conducted the World premiere of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony ; at the 1978 Adelaide Festival, he conducted the World premiere of the authentic 1st version of the 3rd Symphony. He was honoured by the International Bruckner Society of Vienna, the Bruckner Society of America and he also won the Bruckner Medal Of Honour. He was also a keen performer of the works of Dvořák ; as well as writing a biography, he appeared at the Prague Spring Festival, in 1974, and was made an honorary member of the Antonín Dvořák Society, in 1975. He also edited Symphonies by Franz-Josef Haydn and Carl Maria von Weber. His recorded legacy includes works by Bruckner, Edmund Rubbra, Sir Arthur Bliss, Mozart and Beethoven. Hans-Hubert Schönzeler died in England on 30 April 1997.

...

The conductor and musicologist Hans-Hubert Schönzeler was born on 22 June 1925 in Leipzig and died on 30 April 1997 in London.

He was an engagingly paradoxical man and he would have been tickled by the notion that an important Bruckner exponent and scholar was specially mourned among the membership of the Savage Club, that louche but friendly fraternity of musicians, actors and artists whose company he so much enjoyed. Indeed, I was to have been his guest at a dinner there 6 days before he died.

Schönzeler, who was an only child, was born in Leipzig to parents neither of whom was a professional musician. He took-up the violin at the age of 5 and this instrument always had a prime place in his affections. Sent to Brussels by his father (who was not Jewish, but who strongly opposed the Nazi regime) so as to avoid contact with the « Hitler Youth » , he returned to Germany in 1938. 1 year later, 1st his father, then he and his mother, emigrated to Australia where, on the outbreak of the Second World War, his father was interned.

Schönzeler went to Sydney Boys High-School, but after 2 years (and quite irrationally) he and his mother were also interned. During the 4 years of his incarceration, he continued to study the violin, music theory and, with a former director of the Vienna Boys Choir, conducting.

Released in 1946, he became a naturalised Australian (and hence a British subject) , the following year. At the New South Wales State Conservatorium, he studied with Eugene Goossens, a musician for whom he retained the warmest admiration, and began to direct student orchestras and choirs. But it was clear that he needed to be in Europe and so, with the help of Rafael Kubelík, he settled in London, in 1950, securing a job with Eulenburg Edition, of which he later became a director. From 1957 to 1962, he led the 20th Century Ensemble.

Adrian Boult and Wilhelm Furtwängler (the 10th anniversary of whose death was marked by a concert which Schönzeler conducted at the Royal Albert Hall, in 1964) encouraged him and he was a successful participant in a number of important Conductor's Courses, among them the Paris Conservatoire and the Accademia Chigiana.

Schönzeler worked as a freelance all over the world and guested with a majority of the British Orchestras. His repertoire was catholic (he premiered new works in Britain, Germany and Australia) but his special strengths lay in the German Romantics, notably Anton Bruckner. For the « BBC » , he gave the world-premiere of the 1st version of the 8th Symphony (in 1973) and, for the Adelaide Festival, the world-premiere of the authentic 1st version of the 3rd Symphony (in 1978) . He had already, in 1970, published an authoritative book on the composer and he was later honoured by the Bruckner Society of America and the International Bruckner Society, Vienna.

Another of Schönzeler's specialities was the music of Dvořák ; he visited Prague, both for research and for recordings of Janáček and Martinů. In 1974, he appeared at the Prague Spring Festival and, in 1975, was made an honorary member of the Antonín Dvořák Society.

Illness curtailed Schönzeler's career but he remained passionately interested in music and musicians ; he was not above some cheerful gossip and a visit to his Chelsea home was always stimulating, occasionally bibulous. He was pugnaciously argumentative, but his sometimes outrageous dislikes were generally tempered with a beady humour. He idolised Wilhelm Furtwängler and it was hard work to persuade him to change his mind about one's own heroes. I failed lamentably where the admirable Günter Wand was concerned. But we were generally of one mind about the charlatans and show-offs.

Schönzeler was hospitable and generous, as was his devoted wife, Wilhelmina (« Helmi ») . For some years he had supported the Musicians Benevolent Fund, in various ways, donating (for auction) his own violin and the complete « Urtext » of Hugo Wolf. He was a man of impressive musical and personal integrity. German by birth, he became an estimable Englishman ; his last recording was of music by Edmund Rubbra.

1974 : Le chef Josef Krips dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version originale, éditée par Alfred Orel (1932), avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne (étiquette « Vibrato » CD : 2VLL-150) .

27 mars 1974 : Fêtes du 150e anniversaire de la naissance de Anton Bruckner.

11 juin 1974 : Ire reprise à Vienne de la Symphonie d'étude en fa mineur dite « 00 » , sous la direction du chef et musicologue autrichien Kurt Wöb.

Kurt Wöb

Le chef d'orchestre et musicologue autrichien Kurt Wöb est né le 2 mai 1914 à Linz, en Haute-Autriche, et est mort le 4 décembre 1987 à Dresde, en Allemagne. Wöb fait ses études à l'Académie de Vienne avec Robert Haas, Egon Wellesz, Alfred Orel et Robert Lach. Il est aussi l'élève privé du chef d'orchestre Felix Weingartner. Il fera ses débuts comme chef en 1936. Entre 1938 et 1948, il enseigne à l'Académie de Vienne. Kurt Wöb avait un sens inné pour la musique légère (en particulier, celle de Vienne) et le répertoire traditionnel. Sa carrière professionnelle démarre en acceptant le poste de chef principal de l'Orchestre Tonkünstler de Vienne qu'il dirigera de 1949 à 1951. Durant cette période, le tandem va produire de nombreux enregistrements pour la firme Remington, qui, grâce à des prix concurrentiels et à un vaste réseau de distribution (au niveau du roman) réalise un chiffre d'affaires impressionnant en sol américain. Cette association apportera une réputation indéniable au chef. De septembre 1951 à août 1954, Kurt Wöb deviendra le chef principal de l'Orchestre Symphonique de la NHK (l'Orchestre de la radiodiffusion niponne) . Puis, de 1956 à 1960, il se rendra en Australie pour devenir le directeur musical de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Melbourne (alors connu sous le nom de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Victoria) . Il collaborera aussi avec l'Australian Opera Company. Wöb revient en Autriche pour diriger l'orchestre de l'Opéra de Linz en 1961. Il sera également nommé chef principal de l'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz de 1968 jusqu'en 1975. Il tiendra à conserver ses liens avec le Japon en tant que directeur musical de l'Opéra Fumiwara et chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Tokyo (1974) . Wöb sera invité à diriger en Angleterre (avec le Royal Philharmonic) , en Allemagne et en Suède ainsi que dans son Autriche natale. Il va mourir durant une répétition de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique de Dresde.

Sa carrière au disque ne retrouvera jamais le succès des années de gloire avec la firme Remington alors qu'il avait couvert un large répertoire allant de Mozart, Beethoven et Schubert à Tchaïkovski, Rachmaninov et Richard Strauß. Lors des Ires heures de la stéréophonie, Wöb et l'Orchestre Symphonique de Bamberg enregistreront pour la firme « Telefunken » des œuvres populaires de Georges Bizet, Max Bruch, Alexander Glazounov, Edvard Grieg, Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovski et Carl Maria von Weber. En 1979, il réalisera à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Slovaquie, sous étiquette (slovaque) « Opus » , des Ouvertures d'Opérette de Emmerich Kálmán, de Franz Lehár, d'Oskar Nedbal, de Jacques Offenbach, de Johann Strauß II et de Franz von Suppè.

Kurt Wöb est né à Linz, en Haute-Autriche, le 2 mai 1914. Son éducation musicale se fera à l' « Académie nationale de Musique et des Arts de la scène » de Vienne auprès des professeurs universitaires Egon Joseph Wellesz (musicologue et compositeur anglo-autrichien qui fut l'élève d'Arnold Schönberg et de Guido Adler) , Robert Lach (musicologue et compositeur) , Alfred Orel (qui, comme Wellesz , étudia sous Guido Adler) et Robert (Maria) Haas (le musicologue devenu célèbre pour son édition des Symphonies de Bruckner) . L'insistance de Haas sur la musicologie et le respect des intentions du compositeur a beaucoup influencé la carrière de Wöb qui deviendra, à son tour, un ardent défenseur de la musique d'Anton Bruckner. En 1975, Kurt Wöb dirigera intégralement, au « Brucknerhaus » de Linz, l'édition Leopold Nowak de la 4e Symphonie avec le Philharmonique de Munich.

...

Kurt Wöb sera l'élève (privé) du chef d'orchestre Felix Weingartner. Il étudiera avec lui le violon et la composition. Pendant la guerre, Kurt Wöb avait enseigné à la « Musik Akademie » et à la « Musik Schule » de Vienne. Maintenant, tout était à recommencer. Il s'engagera dans la reconstruction de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Basse-Autriche (le « Niederösterreichisches Tonkünstler » ou « Niederösterreichisches Sinfonieorchester ») dont il va devenir, en 1948, le chef principal. Wöb n'était pas seulement reconnu pour sa sensibilité musicale et l'exactitude de ses interprétations, il avait aussi une mémoire remarquable si bien que la plupart (sinon la totalité) de ses concerts se déroulaient sans partition. Son répertoire était vaste et varié : de Jean-Sébastien Bach à Béla Bartók. Il sera à la tête de grands orchestres : le « Konsertforeningen » de Suède, l'Orchestre Augusteo d'Italie, l'Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, le « Tonhalle » de Zürich, l'Orchestre de la NHK, l'Orchestre Symphonique de Melbourne et le célèbre Orchestre du « Mozarteum » de Salzbourg .

...

À partir de 1938, Kurt Wöb enseigne à la « Musik Akademie » de Vienne. Afin de décrocher le poste, il doit adhérer au Parti National-Socialiste (NSDAP : « Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei ») . À quel point ce geste est-il sincère ? N'était-ce que de l'opportunisme ? L'homme de 24 ans a-t-il agi ainsi pour ne pas compromettre sa jeune carrière ? En 1945, il a dû passer par le purgatoire. Mais dès 1948, il s'impliquera auprès du « Tonkünstler-Orchester » . Il deviendra son chef attitré jusqu'en 1951. Sur certaines pochettes de disque de l'époque (comme sur étiquette « Remington ») , cette même phalange est parfois appelée : « Orchestre de la Société Symphonique de Vienne » ou « Orchestre Symphonique autrichien » . Ces noms ont été probablement utilisés à des fins publicitaires. L'original « Tonkünstler-Orchester » verra le jour en 1907 à Vienne, mais, peu après la fin de la Première Guerre mondiale, l'ensemble sera contraint de fusionner avec le « Wiener Concertverein » . Après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, l'Orchestre sera de nouveau restructuré. Le « Niederösterreichische Landesorchester » sera rebaptisé « Tonkuenstlerorchester » . Le chef Kurt Wöb ressuscitera les fameux « Concerts du dimanche après-midi » qui furent une véritable institution avant la guerre. Plusieurs chefs réputés dont Gustav Koslik, Heinz Wallberg et Walter Weller ont dirigé le « Tonkünstler-Orchester » durant le règne de Wöb alors que ce dernier se trouvait au Japon.

Les enregistrements de Kurt Wöb sur étiquette américaine « Remington » ont fait leur apparition en 1950-1951. Ils ont été réalisés par le producteur Marcel Prawy. En 1951, Kurt Wöb quitte pour le Japon, suite à sa nomination comme directeur artistique de l'Orchestre Symphonique de la NHK (Nippon Hoso Kyokai), l'ensemble le plus important du pays. Il initiera le public japonais à la musique Classique européenne bien avant la venue de Herbert von Karajan avec le Philharmonique de Berlin. Le chef programmera régulièrement des Symphonies de Bruckner au Japon et, plus tard, en Australie. (Il interprétera même des œuvres dodécaphoniques jusqu'en Tasmanie !) Après le départ de Vienne de Mæstro Wöb, les enregistrements se poursuivront avec les chefs Gustav Koslik, Wilhelm Loibner et Hine Arthur Brown. Lors du retour de Wöb à Vienne, en 1954, la firme Remington ne produisait plus de disques en Autriche ; le promoteur Don Gabor ayant signé un contrat exclusif d'enregistrement avec l'Orchestre Symphonique « RIAS » de Berlin. Après une période d'environ 2 ans, au cours de laquelle Kurt Wöb ira dirigé aux États-Unis, il accepte jusqu'en 1960 de prendre les commandes de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Victoria, à Melbourne. De 1961 à 1968, il sera directeur de l'Opéra de Linz, en plus d'être à la tête de l'Orchestre Bruckner de Linz, de 1961 à 1974. En parallèle, la docteure Margarethe Wöb (l'épouse du Mæstro) sera nommée directrice de la musique pour la ville de Linz, de 1963 à 1987. During sa carrière, Kurt Wöb sera également invité à diriger l'Orchestre du Conservatoire de Paris, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Séoul, l'Orchestre philharmonique de Bratislava, l'Orchestre municipal de Berlin et l'Orchestre philharmonique de Slovaquie. Kurt Wöb est mort à Dresde le 4 décembre 1987 alors qu'il devait diriger la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le Philharmonique.

Kurt Wöb studied musicology at the Vienna Academy with Robert Haas, Egon Wellesz, Alfred Orel and Robert Lach, and was also a private pupil of the conductor Felix Weingartner. He made his conducting debut, in 1936, and between 1938 and 1948, he taught at the Vienna Academy. His professional conducting career took-off with his appointment as chief conductor of the Vienna « Tonkünstler » Orchestra, which he led from 1949 to 1951. During this period, both he and this Orchestra made many recordings for the American label « Remington » , which through keen pricing and novel distribution achieved high sales in the United States so giving Wöb's name considerable prominence. Between 1951 and 1954, Wöb served as chief conductor of the NHK Symphony Orchestra, the principal broadcasting Orchestra of Japan, after which he moved to Australia as conductor of the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra, from 1956 to 1960 ; while in Australia, he also appeared with the Australian Opera Company. He returned to Austria to take-up the position of chief conductor of the Linz Opera, in 1961, and was named chief conductor of the Linz Bruckner Orchestra, in 1968, serving in this post until 1975. He retained his links with Japan as musical director of the Fumiwara Opera and as chief conductor of the Tokyo Philharmonic Orchestra (1974) . In addition, Wöb conducted as a guest in England (with the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra) , Germany, and Sweden as well as in his native Austria. He died while rehearsing one of the Bruckner Symphonies with the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra.

Kurt Wöb was a conductor with a fine sense of style in both lighter music, especially that of Vienna, and of the traditional concert repertoire. A noted interpreter of the music of Anton Bruckner, he conducted the 1st performances of the original (1874) version of the Symphony No. 4, in 1975, and of Gottfried von Einem's homage to this composer, Bruckner Dialog, during the previous year, and wrote a study of the performance of the Bruckner Symphonies. His recording career never regained the momentum initially afforded it through his association with the « Remington » label, for which he recorded a wide range of repertoire from Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert, through to Tchaïkovsky, Rachmaninov, and Richard Strauß. During the early days of stereophonic recording, Wöb conducted the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra in a concert of popular works by Bizet, Bruch, Glazunov, Grieg, Tchaïkovsky and Weber for « Telefunken » and, in 1979, he recorded, for the Slovakian label « Opus » , a selection of Operetta Overtures by Kálmán, Lehár, Nedbal, Offenbach, Johann Strauß II and von Suppé with the Slovak Philharmonic Orchestra. In addition, the premiere, conducted by Wöb, of the 1st version of Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 was issued as an LP by the « Bruckner Haus, Linz » .

For Austria, the Second World War ended on April 27th, 1945. In the years to come, an entire nation had to face what the 3rd « Reich » and its followers had done to Austria and Austrian culture. The atmosphere looked really grim and though many young Austrians had plans for a brighter future, many had to wait to do what they wanted. Also, the 30 year old Kurt Wöb. During the War, he had been teaching at the « Musik-Akademie » and at the « Musik-Schule » , in Vienna.

Now, after the War, he had to start all over again. He took-up the idea of re-assembling and training the « Niederösterreichisches Tonkünstler-Orchester » (« Niederösterreichisches Sinfonieorchester » : Symphony Orchestra of Lower-Austria) of which he became principal conductor in 1948.

Kurt Wöb was born in Linz, in Upper-Austria, on May 2nd, 1914. His formal musical education took place at the « State Academy of Music and the Performing Arts » , in Vienna, where he studied under the University professors Egon Joseph Wellesz (Austrian-English musicologist and composer who, himself, had studied under Arnold Schœnberg and Guido Adler) ; Robert Lach (musicologist and composer) ; Alfred Orel (who, like Wellesz, studied under Guido Adler) , and he studied with musicologist Robert (Maria) Haas (who is famous for the restoration of the Bruckner Symphonies) . Haas influenced Wöb to a great extent.

The emphasis on musicology in Wöb's studies is not without significance. It heightened his desire in giving a performance true to the composer's intentions. This education laid the foundation that made him later into a prominent advocate of and a devoted performer of the works of Anton Bruckner. In 1975, he conducted the 1st performance of the complete Novak Edition of Symphony No. 4 with the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. This event took place in the « Brucknerhaus » , in Linz.

In addition, he studied as a private student under Felix Weingartner (his subjects were violin and composition) and this is significant for the way Wöb developed his style of conducting. Wöb was not only noted for his musical perception and exactness of interpretation, he also had a remarkable memory and it is said that he conducted most (if not all) Classical works that were on his repertoire without a score. His repertory was extensive and ranged from Johann Sebastian Bach to the more contemporary Béla Bartók.

Among the many famous Orchestras which have played under his baton : the Swedish « Konsertforeningen » ; the « Augusteo » Orchestra in Italy ; « l'Orchestre de la Suisse-Romande » ; the « Zürich Tonhalle-Orchester » ; the Orchestra of the « NHK » in Japan (he was its principal-conductor from September 1951 to August 1954) ; the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra ; and the famous Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra.

(Image) A 78 RPM recording of the « Tonkünstler-Orchester » from before World War II : « Polyphon » Record number 100030 with the Fantasy from « Cavalleria Rusticana » by Mascagni. It is not sure if this acoustical recording from around 1923 was of the factual « Tonkünstler-Orchester » .

From 1938 on, Kurt Wöb was a professor at the « Musik-Akademie » , in Vienna. In order to have this post, he had become a member of the National-Socialist Party (NSDAP : « National-sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei ») . Was this step taken-out of a sincere conviction ? Or did he join for « practical » reasons because, as a 24 year old, he did not want to jeopardize his career ? In 1945, he was dismissed.

In the years after the War, he got involved with the « Tonkünstler-Orchester » and (apparently, after he had been cleared) he became its principal conductor from 1948 until 1951.

On recording covers and labels, this same Orchestra is sometimes referred to as « Orchestra of the Viennese Symphonic Society » , « Tonkünstler-Orchester » and « Austrian Symphony Orchestra » . These names were probably used for publicity reasons. The original « Tonkünstler-Orchester » was founded in 1907, in Vienna, but soon after World War I had ended (1918) , it had a difficult time and was forced to fuse with the « Wiener Konzertverein » . After the Second World War, the Orchestra was newly-organized. At the basis was the « Niederösterreichische Landesorchester » which was renamed : « Tonkünstlerorchester » . It was Kurt Wöb who re-instated the « Sunday Afternoon Concerts » (which had been an institution before the War) .

Some well-known and also famous names have swung the baton in front of the musicians of the « Tonkünstler-Orchester » during Wöb's reign, and many after he had left for Japan. Among those were Gustav Koslik who also can be found on the « Remington » label ; Heinz Wallberg ; and Walter Weller (to name a few) .

It was during 1950 and part of 1951, that the recordings with Kurt Wöb were made for release on the « Remington » label. They were produced by Marcel Prawy. In 1951, Kurt Wöb went to Japan to be principal-conductor of the Symphony Orchestra of the Japanese National Broadcasting Corporation (« NHK » : Nippon Hoso Kyokai) , which is the most important Orchestra of Japan. It was Kurt Wöb who introduced the Japanese audience to Western (European) music, even before Herbert von Karajan did. In Japan and also later in Australia, he often conducted Anton Bruckner Symphonies, he even performed 12 tone compositions in Tasmania !

During Wöb's « Remington » period, recordings were made with his Orchestra conducted by Hine Arthur Brown, Kurt Randal, Hans Wolf, etc. After Kurt Wöb had left Vienna, recordings were made under the baton of Gustav Koslik, Wilhelm Loibner, and others. By the time Wöb left Tokyo in 1954 and returned to Vienna, « Remington Records » was no longer procuring recordings made in Austria. Don Gabor had signed a contract to make recordings in Berlin with the « RIAS » Symphony Orchestra.

Following a period of about 2 years, during which Kurt Wöb conducted concerts in the United States as well, he took up the post of conductor of the Melbourne based Victorian Symphony Orchestra until 1960. From 1961 until 1968, he was director of the Opera of Linz, and he was principal conductor of the « Linz Bruckner Orchester » , from 1961 until 1974, while his wife, Doctor Margarethe Wöb, was music-director in Linz, from 1963 until 1987.

During his career, Kurt Wöb also appeared as a guest-conductor of Orchestras in other countries : « l'Orchestre du Conservatoire de Paris » ; the Seoul Philharmonic Orchestra ; the Bratislava Philharmonic Orchestra ; the Berlin Municipal Orchestra ; the Slovak Philharmonic Orchestra, and many more.

Kurt Wöb died in Dresden, on December 4th, 1987, when he was billed to conduct Bruckner's 4th Symphony.

On a « Masterseal » MSLP number 5008 from around 1957, Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 and Schubert's Symphony No. 8 can be found, whereas there exists no « Remington » disc with this coupling conducted by Kurt Wöb.

Beethoven's 5th was released on a 10 inch disc (R-149-9) with the Salzburg « Mozarteum » Orchestra conducted by Hans Wolf and Schubert's 8th was originally a recording with conductor Hine Arthur Brown (R-149-15) . The name Wöb was probably a convenient substitute, especially when Brown had fallen from grace.

As for so many artists and conductors who appear on the « Remington » label, also the performances of Kurt Wöb are « handicapped by a 2nd rate Orchestra and mostly a poor recording quality » , as Warren DeMotte wrote in « The Long Playing Record Guide » .

There must be other performances of Wöb recorded in Austria, Sweden, Australia and Japan. In recent years, more recordings of Kurt Wöb have been made available, mostly from broadcasts, and have probably been transferred to CD : Bruckner, Wagner, Mozart.

There is a technically well-recorded Telefunken « Royal Sound » Stereo LP from the early stereo days on which Wöb conducts the Bamberg Symphony Orchestra in popular pieces by Bizet, Tchaikovsky, Bruch (with violinist Henri Lewkowitz) , Glazunov, Weber and Grieg (« Telefunken » : SLE 4 450-P) .

The recording of Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony by Kurt Wöb and the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra which can be found on « Bruckner Haus Linz » LP 2/12430-315. It is of the original version composed in 1874, edited by Leopold Nowak, published in 1975. Robert McColley wrote that this version is quite different from the later versions, and especially so, in the case of the Scherzo which is an entirely different movement. The 1874 version has now been recorded several times, but the recording by Wöb was the 1st and is still regarded as one of the best.

There exists a private issue on CD, « Lucky Ball » (LB 0010 S) , of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 with Kurt Wöb conducting the Vienna « Tonkünstler » Symphony Orchestra.

On « OPUS » Stereo number 9116 0693 (from Slovakia) , Wöb conducts the Slovak Philharmonic Orchestra in « Operetta Overtures » : « Fledermaus » by Johann Strauß ; « La vie parisienne » by Offenbach ; « Die schöne Galathea » by von Suppé ; « Das Land des Lächelns » by Lehár ; an Overture by Nedbal ; and « Czardasfürstin » by Kálmán. It was recorded in the Slovak Philharmonic Concert Hall in Bratislava, in February 1979.

L'Orchestre du « Konzertverein » de Linz

Der Linzer Konzertverein ist ein Amateurorchester, das jährlich zwei Sinfoniekonzerte im Brucknerhaus Linz veranstaltet.

Der Linzer Konzertverein zählt zu den ältesten Amateurorchestern Österreichs. Er ging 1919 aus einem Hausmusikkreis unter dem Namen « Tonzunft » hervor. Sechs Jahre später anno 1925 wurde der Vereinsname auf Linzer Konzertverein geändert. Die Zahl der aktiven Musiker erhöhte sich, die Zuhörerschaft wurde immer zahlreicher.

In der Saison 1930-1931 standen gemeinsame Konzerte mit dem Theaterorchester, dem Linzer Musikerbund und dem Linzer Musikverein auf dem Programm. Berufsmusiker unterstützten uneigennützig die Orchesterarbeit des Konzertvereins. Diese Tradition hat sich bis heute gehalten.

Kriegsbedingt stellte der Verein seine Konzerttätigkeit « ruhend » und entging so der Auflösung durch die NS-Behörden. Nach dem Krieg wollten die heimgekehrten Musiker ihre Konzerttätigkeit wieder aufnehmen, stießen aber auf große Schwierigkeiten. Es fehlten Instrumente, das Aufführungslokal, das Kaufmännische Vereinshaus an der Bismarckstraße war teilweise zerbombt und die amerikanische Besatzung war auch nicht gerade hilfreich. Doch die Musiker gaben nicht auf und am 28. Juni 1947 bestritt der Linzer Konzertverein das erste Sinfoniekonzert in Linz nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg im Vereinshaus.

Ständiger Dirigent bis 1955 wurde Anton Konrath. Ihm folgte bis 1961 der Dirigent des Linzer Theaterorchesters Michael Hutterstraße. Von 1961 bis 1990 übernahm Leopold Mayer die künstlerische Leitung. Seither leiten wechselnde Gastdirigenten das Orchester.

Viele internationale Instrumentalisten waren beim Linzer Konzertverein zu Gast, so Rudolf Buchbinder, Pianist (1962 und 1968) ; Jörg Demus, Pianist (1959, 1960 und 1961) ; Ernst Kovacic, Geiger (1969 und 1973) ; Rainer Küchl, Konzertmeister der Wiener Philharmoniker (1971 und 1978) ; Hugo Rottensteiner, I. Fagottist der Wiener Symphoniker (1927 und 1957) ; Benjamin Schmid, Violine (1986) ; Wolfgang Schneiderhan, Violine (1952, 1953 und 1956) ; Wilfried Tachezi, Cellist (1984) ; Walter Weller, Wiener Philharmoniker und ehemaliger Konzertmeister des Linzer Konzertvereins (1934 und 1936) ; und Clemens Zeilinger, Pianist (1994 und 2011) .

Auch Gesangssolisten, die von Linz aus im internationalen Musikgeschäft Karriere machten, sangen, begleitet vom Linzer Konzertverein, so Pjotr Beczala, Tenor (1994) ; Donna Ellen, Sopran (1989) ; William Ingle, Tenor (1983, 1985 und 1989) ; Kathleen Kaun, Sopran (1983) ; Riccardo Lombardi, Bariton (1985 und 1992) ; und Karl Ridderbusch, Bass (1992) .

Die Verdienste des Linzer Konzertvereins blieben nicht unbedankt. So wurde ihm 1957 die « Ehrenplakette der Stadt Linz » für besondere Verdienste um das Musikleben in Linz verliehen, 1978 das « Verdienstzeichen des Landes Oberösterreich » an den damaligen Obmann Wolfram Ziegler für seine Verdienste um den Linzer Konzertverein und 1983 die « Kulturmedaille der Stadt Linz » .

Nach dem Tod von Konsulent Wolfram Ziegler, der die Geschicke des Vereins 39 Jahre lang bis zu seinem Tod 2006 leitete folgte ihm Magister Arnold Wiesberger bis 2010, der vom vormaligen Geschäftsführer Hans Lißberger abgelöst wurde.

Die Wurzeln des Linzer Konzertvereins liegen in einem Hausmusikkreis, der nach dem Ende des Ersten Weltkriegs ins Leben gerufen worden war und alsbald zu einem Salonorchester erweitert wurde.

Ende 1919 erfolgte die behördliche Registrierung der Orchestervereinigung « Tonzunft » Linz.

Damals machte der Musikerbund große Schwierigkeiten, da er eine Konkurrenz durch ein Dilettantenorchester befürchtete. Nach vier Jahren wurde aus dem Salonorchester bereits ein Großes Orchester mit fünfzig Mitgliedern, die regelmäßig unter der Leitung von Max Damberger mit Sinfoniekonzerten an die Öffentlichkeit traten, wie die Ankündigung des 2. Jahres-Vereinskonzert der Tonzunft am 7. April 1923 im Kaufmännischen Vereinshaus beweist.

Am 30. September 1925 erfolgte die Änderung des Vereinsnamens auf LINZER KONZERTVEREIN und es begann der Aufstieg.

Die Zahl der aktiven Musiker erhöhte sich, die Zuhörerschaft wurde immer zahlreicher. In der Saison 1930-1931 standen gemeinsame Konzerte mit dem Theaterorchester, dem Linzer Musikerbund und dem Linzer Musikverein auf dem Programm. Berufsmusiker unterstützten uneigennützig die Orchesterarbeit des Linzer Konzertvereins.

Am 22. April 1939 gab der Verein ein Festkonzert anlässlich seines 20jährigen Bestehens, das dann auf lange Zeit sein letztes war, denn der Krieg unterbrach die Tätigkeit des Orchesters, der Verein wurde « ruhend » gemeldet und entging so der Auflösung durch die NS-Behörden. Musiker, die aus dem Krieg zurückkamen wollten ihre kulturelle Tätigkeit wieder aufnehmen. Dies war gar nicht so einfach. Es fehlte das Aufführungslokal, denn das Kaufmännische Vereinshaus war teilweise zerstört, es fehlten Instrumente und die amerikanische Besatzung war auch nicht gerade hilfreich bei den Bemühungen den Linzer Konzertverein wieder zu etablieren.

Aber die Musiker ließen nicht locker. Bereits am 28. Juni 1947 bestritt der Linzer Konzertverein sein erstes Symphoniekonzert im Vereinshaus in Linz. Professor Anton Konrath übernahm die Stelle eines ständigen Dirigenten.

Die Qualität konnte durch stärkeres Einbinden von Berufs- und Nebenberufsmusikern wesentlich gesteigert werden. Zahlreiche, (auch international) bedeutende Solisten wurden gewonnen. Der Dirigent des Linzer Theaterorchesters Michael Hutterstraßer betreute von 1955 bis 1961 den Linzer Konzertverein, anschließend übernahm Professor Doktor Leopold Mayer die künstlerische Leitung, die er bis 1990 inne hatte. Seither leiten wechselnde Gastdirigenten das Orchester.

Es ist nicht verwunderlich, dass sich seit Bestehen der Musikervereinigung viele international renommierte Gesangs- und Instrumentalsolisten ihre ersten Sporen auf einer Linzer Bühne verdienten. Zuerst im Kaufmännischen Vereinshaus und seit 43 Jahren im Linzer Brucknerhaus.

Im 55. Vereinsjahr, am 8. Mai 1974 gestaltete der Linzer Konzertverein « Christus », ein Oratorium in drei Teilen von Franz Liszt im Großen Saal des von den Wiener Philharmonikern unter Herbert von Karajan eingeweihten Konzerthauses. Dirigiert hat Leopold Mayer, Augustinus Franz Kropfreiter spielte die neue Orgel, Helmut Heinz Ecker war der Sprecher.

Der Linzer Konzertverein trat aber auch im Marmorsaal des Stiftes Sankt Florian oder im Kulturzentrum Bad Leonfelden vor ein begeistertes Publikum.

Der Linzer Konzertverein ist seinem Auftrag, sich als Amateurorchester dem Studium und der Darbietung sinfonischer Werke und der Förderung der Jugend zu widmen alljährlich gewissenhaft nachgekommen. Viele Solisten, die inzwischen auf allen Konzertbühnen zuhause sind, haben sich zu Beginn ihrer musischen Laufbahn erste Sporen mit dem Linzer Konzertverein verdient. Man denke an Wolfgang Schneiderhan (1952) ; Jörg Demus (1959) ; Klaus Wiplinger (1963) ; Paul Badura-Skoda (1954) ; Willy Boskowsky (1948) ; Rudolf Buchbinder (1962) ; Hans Petermandl (1953) ; Rainer Küchl (1971) ; Mitsuko Uchida (1966) ; Walter Weller (1961) und einige weitere Mitglieder der Wiener Philharmoniker sowie die Gesangssolisten Karl Ridderbusch, Birgit Greiner, Cheryl Lichter, Amanda Benda, Franz Kalchmair, Riccardo Lombardi, Piotr Beczala und William Mason, um nur einige im Namen aller zu erwähnen.

Die Verdienste des Linzer Konzertvereins werden nicht nur von einem treuen Publikum, das alle Altersschichten aufweist, mit ausverkauften Konzerten belohnt. Zahlreiche Ehrungen von offizieller Seite, vom Land Oberösterreich ebenso wie von der Stadt Linz sind ein Beweis dafür, daß kontinuierliche Kulturarbeit nicht unbelohnt bleibt.

Erster Obmann war Alfred Schützenhofer (1918-1920) . Anschließend stand Josef Straub bis 1946 dem Linzer Konzertverein vor. Es folgten Hermann Furthmoser (1946-1953) ; Doktor Karl Galanda (1953-1965) ; und Karl Pointner (1965-1968) . Von 1968 bis zu seinem überraschenden Tod 2006 leitete Konsulent Wolfram Ziegler die Geschicke des Linzer Konzertvereins.

Sein Nachfolger wurde Magister Arnold Wiesberger. Er hatte diese Funktion bis März 2010 inne. In der im Mai 2010 einberufenen Generalversammlung wurde Hans Lißberger zum Obmann und in der Generalversammlung 2016 einstimmig zum neuen Präsident gewählt. Le « Brucknerhaus » de Linz

23 mars 1974 : Inauguration du « Brucknerhaus » (Maison Bruckner) de Linz : A-4020 Linz, Untere Donaulände 7 - www.brucknerhaus.at Construite de 1969 à 1973 selon les plans des architectes finlandais Kaija et Heikki Sirén, vainqueurs du concours international, le centre des congrès et des festivals de la Maison Bruckner (« Brucknerhaus ») , du 7 Donaulände, va devenir un « joyau » de la ville, au milieu du paysage fluvial. En peu de temps, ce concept avant-gardiste semi-circulaire (fait de verre et d'acier) va gagner le cœur des citoyens. À l'intérieur, les foyers spacieux dégagent une vue unique sur la rive nord du Danube. Il sera inauguré par le chef Herbert von Karajan, en 1974. Avec le Festival Bruckner et un programme unique pour la musique Classique, cette salle de concert renommée propose aux visiteurs de tous âges un aperçu des musiques les plus diverses avec des artistes illustres du monde entier. Des visites guidées de la Maison Bruckner sont également proposées.

La construction d'une grande salle de concert pour Linz était attendue depuis les années '30, plusieurs projets se sont succédé sans jamais voir le jour. Leur seul point commun a toujours été le nom de la salle du « Brucknerhaus » en hommage au plus grand compositeur de la région de Linz.

À la fin des années '50, la ville de Linz a décidé de lancer le projet grâce à un concours d'architecture qui sera gagné, en 1961, par le finlandais Heikki Sirén. Mais beaucoup d'eau coulera encore sous les ponts du Danube avant le début du chantier. Le complexe du « Brucknerhaus » sur les rives du Danube sera inauguré le 23 mars 1974 lors d'une cérémonie officielle. Les festivités atteindront un point culminant lorsque, quelques heures plus tard, le chef Herbert von Karajan dirigera 7e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne.

Le bâtiment abrite 3 salles de concert, la plus petite fait 100 places et la seconde 350. La grande salle de 1,420 places assises, très belle et chaleureuse, est entièrement habillée de bois clair. C'est une salle en éventail au sol incliné qui permet une vision très confortable de partout. L'acoustique est excellente, claire, précise, avec une très légère réverbération.

La « Brucknerhaus » , salle de spectacle construite en 1974 par les architectes finlandais Kaja et Heikki Sirén est en forme de tarte de Linz, en référence à la célèbre pâtisserie locale imitée plus ou moins fidèlement dans le monde entier. Cette salle accueille également en résidence une des meilleures formations symphoniques autrichiennes le « Bruckner Orchester » , placé actuellement sous la direction du chef américain Dennis Russel Davies.

Automne 2000 : Inauguration du buste commémoratif en bronze d'Anton Bruckner (par l'artiste Franz Strahammer) , placé sur un socle de pierre devant le « Brucknerhaus » .

Vous y trouverez aussi un restaurant avec une grande terrasse et un bar.

Le « Brucknerfest » a lieu à Linz, 1 fois par an depuis 1979. Il offre un mélange unique entre tradition et futur grâce à la venue à des musiciens de renommée internationale et un spectacle de son et lumière sur le Danube.

Depuis son inauguration, le « Brucknerhaus » propose en moyenne plus de 200 représentations par an (dont environ 120 programmes auto-produits et 80 invités) qui attirent plus de 180,000 personnes ! Mais le « Brucknerhaus » organise aussi le Festival « Musikwolke » (nuage de musique) qui déplace, a lui tout seul, plus de 100,000 personnes !

Pour une ville industrielle de 250,000 habitants, la programmation musicale du « Brucknerhaus » est vraiment très impressionnante, surtout si l'on sait que ce n'est pas la seule salle de concert de la ville !

Long before ground was even broken for the concert-hall that had been on the wish list of so many people in Linz, the matter of whom it would be named for had already been settled : of course, it would be Anton Bruckner, Upper-Austria's most important composer ...

The idea of a concert-hall for Linz was already on the table during the inter-War period, and, naturally, Upper-Austria's musical genius was under discussion as eponym right from the start. After World War II, a group of prominent Linzers (Fritz Rauch, Gerhard Schröder, Horst Stadlmayr and Hermann Kronsteiner) revived efforts to establish a « Brucknerhaus » , but it took until 1974 for them to come to fruition. In this entire realization process, the only thing that had been finalized at the very outset was the name « Bruckner » . The great composer's work also basically determined the programming of the International Brucknerfest beginning in 1974.

On March 23rd, 1974, the « Brucknerhaus » was inaugurated with a ceremony attended by « la crème de la crème » of cultural life in Austria. Arriving at this occasion had taken decades : the protracted path proceeding from the idea's proposal by private citizens included several attempts to produce an actual concept.

Devotees of Classical music had been voicing their desire for a new performance venue in Linz (a real concert facility) ever since the 1930's. In those days, musical life in the city centered around the « Kaufmännisches Vereinshaus », an auditorium that was much too small even then.

The War began at that end of the decade, yet, the big plans continued. Adolf Hitler's gigantomaniacal concept for a new Linz included a « Brucknerhalle ». The downfall of the 3rd « Reich » spared Linz from Albert Speer's architectural plans.

What remained unchanged was the wide-spread wish to be able to hear fine music in a suitable setting. The city had a Symphony Orchestra and several very active choruses (Liedertafel « Frohsinn », « David-Chor » and « Domchor »). Then, admirers of the work of Anton Bruckner took the initiative and founded a « Brucknerhausverein ». Donation drives and benefit concerts were organized - prominent conductors who lent their talents to this good cause included Herbert von Karajan and Wilhelm Furtwängler. Editorial writers in the local press issued vehement calls for a new concert-hall.

In the late 1950's, the City of Linz gave the go-ahead and issued a call for entries to a competition for the design of a concert-hall and multi-purpose facility. In 1961, Finnish architect Heikki Sirén was granted the commission. The downtown location would be an expansive park that had been created to shore-up the banks of the Danube in the wake of severe flooding in 1954.

Quite a bit of water flowed past that parcel before the ground-breaking and corner-stone ceremony took place. The big day finally arrived on May 16th, 1969 : Austrian President Franz Jonas and Linz Mayor Theodor Grill laid the corner-stone for our concert-hall, today, one of the most important in Europe.

Construction proceeded from 1969 to 1973. In Fall of 1973, trial operations commenced, and the executives and staff of the LIVA (« Linzer Veranstaltungsgesellschaft mBH ») management organization that had been set-up in 1971 occupied the premises. As mentioned above, the « Brucknerhaus »' official opening ceremony took place on March 23rd, 1974. The festivities reached their crescendo a few hour later when Herbert von Karajan conducted the « Wiener Philharmoniker » in a performance of Bruckner's 7th Symphony. The wish had finally come true.

4 décembre 1986 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige, pour la dernière fois, la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » (étiquette « Tahra » , 2 CD : 247) . Il était âgé de 84 ans. Il va mourir 3 mois plus tard, à sa résidence de Munich.

« Ce que nous vivons ici se passe de commentaire : tout est prière, tout est recueillement, tout est état de grâce. Ce concert est le testament musical du gigantesque Eugen Jochum dans une Symphonie dans laquelle il fut toujours grand. Nous sommes ici dans l'univers d'un musicien qui, au bout du chemin, a trouvé sa pierre philosophale, à la fois dans son rapport à ce sommet de la musique de Bruckner mais aussi par rapport à un Orchestre qui l'a accompagné tout au long de sa carrière » (Christophe Huss, « Répertoire » .)

« Tahra » released this recording for the 1st time, in 1997 ; it won the Cannes Classical Award at Midem, in 1999.

Eugen Jochum recorded Anton Bruckner's massive 5th Symphony 4 times : 1st, in 1938, with the Hamburg Philharmonic ; in 1958, with the Bavarian Radio Orchestra (« DGG ») ; and, in 1980, with the « Dresden Staatskapelle » (« EMI ») . A concert performance with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra was recorded on 30 and 31 May 1964 in the Abbey of the Benedictine Monks, « Ottobeuren » , in West Germany, issued in 1989 on « Philips » (426 107) . Now, we have this final recording by Jochum, taped during his penultimate concert with his beloved « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, on 4 December 1986. According to « Bruckner en het Koninklijk Concertgebouw-orkest » , this was his 21st performance of this Symphony, in Amsterdam. He was 84, at the time, and died 3 months later, at his home in Munich.

The 5th was a particular favourite of Jochum. TAHRA's notes include many detailed comments by the conductor on interpreting the entire Symphony and how he uses 11 additional brass instruments in the Finale : 4 horns, 3 trumpets, 3 trombones and 1 bass tuba, jokingly called « the 11 Apostles » (Judas, the 12th, is not among them) . Franz Schalk found when he conducted the work that when it came to the majestic last movement chorale, brass players were so tired they were unable to present this music in its full glory, so he introduced the 11 extra players in a raised position behind the Orchestra, a concept supported by Jochum except that he has the extra players mixed in with the regular brass section. From bar 583 onward, in this performance, all of the brass, regular and added, join in the chorale, producing a grandiose effect indeed. This is the most expansive of all Jochum's recordings of the work, considerably longer than his earlier Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra version (82:10 / 75:54) . In particular, both the Adagio and Finale each take about 3 minutes longer. The slower tempi surely are not detrimental ; there is a sense of purpose to this performance, a Master conductor totally at home in the repertory leading an Orchestra with which he has had a long association. There are other « Concertgebouw » recordings of this work, the 1st being a live performance of March 1959 with Eduard van Beinum conducting. His objectivity produces a powerful performance that doesn't seem rushed although playing time is only 71 min 50 sec. This has just re-issued in an inexpensive 4 CD-set that also contains commercial recordings of Nos. 7, 8 and 9. Bernard Haitink recorded the 5th for « Philips » , in September 1971, close to Beinum in performance time (72 min 53 sec) . Jochum's live recording boasts some of the finest sound from the Dutch radio engineers who have vividly captured the sound of the Orchestra playing in its famous hall.

The performance is too long to fit onto 1 CD so TAHRA has played it on 2, but the 2 are sold for the price of 1. TAHRA's notes mention that the conductor's widow, Anni Jochum, recollected :

« He was so happy with the orchestral performance that he decided to repeat once more the last movement for the public's delight ! »

I speculate how tired the brass players (regular and added) must have been after that !

...

Aged 84, Jochum was at the height of his powers when he conducted this magnificent « live » performance : it was his last appearance with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and he fulfilled only 1 more concert engagement before his death. Tahra are offering this 2 disc set (in a slimline case) for the price of a single CD and it is a valuable release, which eclipses Jochum's previous recordings of the work and is fully competitive with the best of other conductors' recordings of this Symphony.

The year before Robert Simpson died, I asked him which conductor he had been referring to when, in his book, « The Essence of Bruckner » (page 121 of the 1977 2nd Edition) , he complained about a recording of this Symphony which « halved the tempo » for the work's apotheosis (« Poor Bruckner, he has suffered as much from his friends as from his enemies. » , wrote Doctor Simpson.) . The conductor in question was Eugen Jochum, but he is not alone in his decision to change gear near the conclusion of the Finale : Bernard Haitink does so, at the same point (bar 564) , in his 1988 recording with the Vienna Philharmonic but not in his very different 1971 account with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra. Such a decision remains questionable when Herbert von Karajan's 1976 version on « DGG » with the Berlin Philharmonic demonstrates how much more impressive the final pages are when the chorale is drawn inexorably into the tempo already established. It is indicative of the jolt which the listener receives, at this point, in Jochum's previous recordings that Simpson should have recollected that the tempo was halved, as the change is actually much less than this, yet, when the tempo slows in, the Tahra release (at 22 min 24 sec) , the speed alteration causes no concern whatsoever, because it arrives as the culmination of a performance which the listener senses to have been more controlled throughout and, therefore, more compelling than Jochum's previous recordings of the work. His overall view of the 5th Symphony did not change radically over the years, but when comparing his recordings of it, it is inevitable that one notices modifications of small details in his interpretation, the cumulative effect of which makes the 1986 performance even more satisfying than its predecessors, despite the absence of any large-scale innovations.

Jochum's association with the 5th Symphony spanned many decades. Bruckner's original score (as distinct from the appalling 1893 edition, published in 1896) remained un-performed until 1935, and it was this « bona fide » edition which was used for the 1st recording of the work, made 2 years later, in Dresden, by Karl Böhm. It was Böhm's appointment in Dresden which enabled Jochum to take over Böhm's post in Hamburg, in 1934 (where relatively-liberal local political conditions allowed Jochum to hold this official post despite his refusal to join the Nazi Party) , and it was with the Hamburg Philharmonic that Jochum made his 1st recording of the Symphony, in 1938, for « Telefunken » , which Tahra intend to re-issue on CD.

In their booklet notes, for the 1986 recording with the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, Tahra pay generous tribute to Jochum's 1964 version with the same Orchestra, edited from 2 « live » performances ; this was issued originally by « Philips » and is now available on the « Belart » label but, even at budget price, it can receive only a lukewarm recommendation, as it was not recorded at the « Concertgebouw » itself but in Ottobeuren Abbey, where the engineers balanced the strings too closely, resulting in claustrophobic sound quality, despite the pleasant resonance supplied by the venue's acoustics. An earlier 1958 « DGG » recording, with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra, presents a similar interpretation in superior sound, but the 1980 recording for « EMI » with the « Staatskapelle Dresden » has still greater impact, although the difference in engineering is somewhat less than one might expect considering that 32 years separate the 2, and there is a blatant change of sound level at bar 484, in the Finale. I can summon-up even less enthusiasm for the 1980 recording than for the 1964 version, not so much because of occasional insecurity from the strings (there is an awkward moment, as early as bar 61 of the opening movement, where some of the 2nd violins are still holding the F-flat from the previous bar instead of moving to E-flat) but rather because the brass section sounds raucous : it is true that in Karajan's « DGG » version the Berlin Philharmonic's splendid brass players are even more dominant, but they are always well-balanced internally, whereas the Dresden players are not. The bass trombonist is the main culprit : he does not blend with his colleagues, being unduly prominent throughout, so much so that at the end, his contribution makes the final apotheosis, one of the supreme passages in all music, sound banal and coarse.

Jochum's greater subtlety intensifies the impact of the 1986 performance : he is prepared to allow each awesome silence (not only of the introduction but elsewhere too) a duration of either its full notated length or something very close to it (Karajan's « DGG » version is let down by his impatience in the introduction, cutting short the silences) ; the extra crescendo on timpani with which he leads to the opening movement's initial climax, at bar 49 (3 min 15 sec) , achieves more than merely a local effect, in that this mighty end to the introduction leaves the listener expectant as the main Allegro is launched. As in his previous recordings of the work, Jochum still lowers the double basses an octave, in bar 32 of the 2nd movement (2 min 57 sec) , which the composer himself might well have done had the extended low range of the instrument been available to him in the 1870's ; Jochum does likewise at bar 157 in the 1st movement (7 min 58 sec) .Whereas, in the 3rd movement, he used to double the oboe and clarinet parts, at bar 311, by the horns (4 min 46 sec, repeated at 12 min 54 sec) , here, he reverts to Bruckner's original scoring. In general, Bruckner's text is observed faithfully and when one hears an unexpected balance, such as at bar 225 in the Scherzo (3 min 25 sec, repeated at 11 min 23 sec) , where the 2nd violins are encouraged to play-out, there is always genuine musical insight behind it, not just a desire to make a novel effect. The orchestral playing is excellent, certainly preferable to the « live » performances of Symphonies Nos. 4, 6, 7 and 8, given by Jochum and this Orchestra between 1970 and 1984, and previously released by Tahra : listen to the passage marked « etwas mehr langsam » , at bar 83 in the Finale (3 min 47 sec) , to hear how sonorous the orchestral playing is.

Tahra's booklet states that this recording is of a single concert on 4 December 1986, but the back inlay of the CD suggests that this release may derive not only from that concert, but from the evening before too. Whatever the case, there are very few mistakes in the playing : when the timpanist forgets to enter at bar 525 in the Finale (21 min 21 sec) it is one of the few reminders which one receives that the Orchestra is playing without the safety net of studio conditions. The only disturbing blunder is at bar 82, in the slow movement (7 min 49 sec) , where Jochum's extremely slow tempo momentarily confuses the 1st clarinetist, who enters at too fast a speed (it is a curious coincidence that an identical problem occurs in the same bar at 7 min 29 sec, on Tahra's issue of a 1944 « live » performance of this Symphony conducted by Georg-Ludwig Jochum, Eugen's younger brother, an experienced Brucknerian himself) . This riveting account of the slow movement takes nearly 21 minutes and reaches a threatening climax at bar 194, making the hushed « ppp » coda, from bar 203 onwards, more meaningful.

The acoustics of Amsterdam's « Concertgebouw » are captured well by the engineers : there is a tangible sense of being present in the hall, with a bloom to the sound in the quieter moments and with an impressive feeling of openness in the louder passages. This is not a digital recording so, occasionally, one hears a very faint pre-echo due to magnetic « print through » on the open-reel tapes (such as before bar 137 in the Finale, at 6 min 17 sec) , a regular technical problem with analogue recordings of this work, because of the many instances in the score of fortissimo chords which follow on from complete silence. Tape hiss is minimal and the audience is attentive, with only a few coughs.

The booklet reprints detailed comments by Jochum about performing the Symphony ; during these remarks, which appeared originally in the booklet accompanying the LP issue of his « DGG » recording, Jochum explains how he arranges for extra brass players to help-out the main brass instrumentalists of the Orchestra, near the end of the Finale, because he is aware that, by this point in the score, the latter may be too tired to sustain the « fff » climax. However, there is an irony here : in a « BBC » re-issue of Jascha Horenstein's 1970 performance, one can hear someone in the audience shout-out « encore ! » at 24 min 26 sec during the concluding applause and, perhaps, something similar happened in Jochum's last Amsterdam concert, because Tahra's notes tell us that he repeated the entire 25 minute Finale for the audience, although this « encore » is not included on the CD ; so much for Jochum's concern not to overwork his brass players !

It would be simplistic to claim that any one single recording of this towering Masterpiece can be considered superior to all others, but I have no doubt that Jochum's 1986 version is amongst the most rewarding available. Despite the strong claims of several other brisker performances, the 3 most compelling versions for me are the 3 most spacious ones, none of which fit onto a single disc : the apocalyptic 1976 Karajan « DGG » version with the Berlin Philharmonic (for which his mono 1954 « live » performance with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, on the « Orfeo » label is no real competition) , which should surely win over even the many listeners who are prejudiced against this conductor ; Sergiù Celibidache's uncompromising and austere account with the Munich Philharmonic, deriving from 2 « live » concerts, in 1993, which has a unique visionary quality ; and Jochum's glorious 1986 performance, less interventionist than many of his earlier recordings of Bruckner's works, in general, the music being allowed to flow more naturally here. I would not wish my own collection to be without any of these contrasting recordings : few readers will want to buy all 3, but those who choose the 1986 Jochum concert will not be disappointed by the excitement and the generous expressivity of the music-making on offer here.

Une « Leica » en hommage à Anton Bruckner (1896-1996)

A brief history on Leica M6 PLATINUM " ANTON BRUCKNER " 1824-1896 in 200 units Special Edition (1996)

LEICA M6 PLATINUM (10454) ANTON BRUCKNER 1824-1896 (1996) .

In 1996, LEICA AG had introduced 2 almost identical Leica M6 PLATINUM models with a companion ELMAR-M 1:2.8/50mm Platinum-plated lens but each came with different issued theme. The comparing M6 Platinum Schmidt Centenary 151 units Edition has a localized theme where it was released by the active Leica distributor in the far east to commemorate the Group's 100 years of establishment in the Asia Pacific Region.

Coincidentally, the LEICA M6 PLATINUM ANTON BRUCKNER 1824-1896 200 units Special Edition featuring here was also work of another Leica distributor, Leitz-Austria Vertriebs GmbH. You can regarded one of them was an oriental version and another has a raw European nature but each carried a differing objective. But I guess side by side comparison, the Anton Bruckner M6 Platinum has a slightly more wider appeal as it uses a universal icon in music scene as compare to the Schmidt's M6 Platinum Edition which was more restricted theme as a localized version. However, it may take Classical music-lovers cum Leica photographer and/or collector to appreciate such a theme in its release.

Note : the « 1824-1896 » denoting the year of birth/death of Anton Bruckner. 1996 was to commemorate 100 years of his departure.

The basis of LEICA M6 Anton Bruckner Edition was a Leica M6 with Platinum plated body finishing. It was supplied with an ELMAR-M 1:2.8/50mm which is also Platinum plated and has special engraving. The leather work for this Leica Edition uses an usual Iguana skinned leatherette to give it such a glittering contrast with the precious metal fitted exterior appearance.

So, who is Anton Bruckner and why Leitz-Austria Vertriebs GmbH chosen him ? Simple, It has some relation. Anton Bruckner was an Austrian too and was one of the great music composer who had left the music world with series of Masterpieces. He was born in September 04, 1824, in Ansfelden, Austria, and passed away also in his native country, in Vienna, Austria, on October 11, 1896. The birth date (1824) and the year (1896) was engraved on both he M6 Platinum edition to mark his life time achievement in music arena. In 1996, it was exactly 100 years after departure of the Austrian Music Master and Leitz-Austria had found a perfect theme for the M6 Special Edition to commemorate the 100 years after death of their countryman.

The basis of LEICA M6 Anton Bruckner Edition was a Leica M6 with Platinum plated body finishing. It was supplied with an ELMAR-M 1:2.8/50mm which is also Platinum plated and has special engraving. The leather work for this Leica Edition uses an usual Iguana skinned leatherette to give it such a glittering contrast with the precious metal fitted exterior appearance.

The LEICA M6 PLATINUM Edition was probably the only high-end camera that has a string which associates directly with a Musician. But it was issued by an Austrian Company for an Austrian local musical legend that makes some sense with the issue ; if not, it may lose its flavour because, to some people, it may take some convincing job in relating Leica photography with a Music composer. One way or another, this edition reminds me of the Italian Job, the LEICA M6 Colombo '92 Edition where it can be quite muddy why uses name of a great voyage as the theme of the release - only to find-out later Christopher Colombo was an Italian. Anyway, as the entire issued quantity of most of the LEICA special releases with localized theme of issue were usually confined to few hundred units and could find its way to individual hands. In this case, other than Austrian Nationals who may be passionate or patriotic enough to think it is collectible, the creator of this edition would find affectionate Brucknerians to consume the rest. Besides, as I have pointed-out a fact, omitting the special edition for the His Majesty Brunei Darussalam Sultan Bolkiah's private edition of Platinum M6 copies in 1992 and the followed-up stunning 50th Birthday Platinum Edition w/ Diamond model in 1995, this M6 Platinum edition can be regarded as the 1st LEICA M6 Platinum variation issued after the official release of the LEICA M6 Platinum 150 Jahre Photography/ 75 Jahre Leica Photography edition. So, there are still plenty of hungry Leica collectors for such specially configured LEICA models out there.

The camera can be easily recognized by the uncommon grayish blue leatherette but more distinctively is an engraving of a portrait that locates at the top plate with « Anton Bruckner 1824-1896 » engraved. The font script used looks a mix between Old English Text and Deutsch Gothic - a lovely selection to match the corresponding years engraved !

There is another rather unusual feature in this LEICA M6 ANTON BRUCKNER Edition ; each of the 200 units has a very unique Serial Numbering system allocated. The S/N actually has a lot to do with the accompanying set of Compact Discs supplied along with this Edition.

The CD collection was featuring 10 Symphonies composed by the Artist ; and Leitz-Austrian had configured the entire quantity of 200 units within the special M6 edition with every 20 cameras dedicated to each Symphony contained in the CD. So, the S/N runs from 01 (Symphony 1) ~01 (camera production Unit No.) i.e. 01~01(20) to 10~20 to make up $10 \times 20 = 200$ units. So, for those collectors who intends to acquire a used set of this M6, technically, the CDs kit should be part of an integrated component for the LEICA M6 BRUCKNER PLATINUM Edition and should always asked to be included in the supplied kit.

Another must included item for the LEICA M6 BRUCKNER PLATINUM Edition camera is the matched Platinum-plated ELMAR-M 1:2.8/50mm lens. The lens was actually deprived from same matching optic for the LEICA M6J of 1994.

The main differences are in 2 areas. It is Platinum-plated and next, it has a special engraving of ANTON BRUCKNER 1824-1896 in Deutsch Gothic script as well as a matching Serial Number as engraved on the camera top-plate. The lens was also supplied with a metal lens cap with old Leica script logo.

Platinum-plated LEICA M6 was 1st being introduced in 1989 with the M6 150Jahre/Leica 75 Jahre Model. It is very difficult to illustrate the glittering and charming metal properties of a Platinum plated M6 body from traditional silver chrome based model except via visual of these few photos below which can help to give you a clue how it looks like. A typical silver chrome M6 is already an attraction, but Platinum coated M6 delivers the kind of elegant product characteristic which is hard to match by any other materials used.

As a pure metal, Platinum is more precious than gold as a form off raw material. It is silvery-white in appearance, lustrous, ductile, and malleable and known to be resistant to corrosion. It does not oxidize at any temperature and is insoluble even to hydro-chloric and nitric acid. Platinum's wear - and tarnish-resistance characteristics are traditionally well suited for making fine jewelry. So, basically the chosen metal for the finishing with a coated layer onto the M6 presents a very different feel and quality appearance which adds to its collectible status.

The main attraction of this LEICA M6 ANTON BRUCKNER PLATINUM EDITION simply is with its Platinum body outfit. Accompanying with a theme of musical wizardry of an Austrian music composer. The Platinum plate ELMAR collapsible 50/2.8 was a delightful touch. Combining a unique theme, elegant presentation and rarity element, the entire outfit was well-planned and structured around protecting its appreciative potential in value.

The only less appealing factor was in its core theme used for this issue as it may has restrictive boundary for certain Leica collectors. Regardless, the LEICA M6 ANTON BRUCKNER PLATINUM EDITION with its superbly crafted body and accompanying accessories within the outfit should be able to find a safe harbor in the hands of certain quarter of collectors because after all the entire issued quantity was only 300 units and should have enough users capacity to consume it all. In a current economical turmoil, collectibles seemingly has a renewed interest as a form of good tool to hedge inflation as well as preservation of value in the long run.

2003 : Malgré les acquisitions par les bibliothèques de divers manuscrits (provenant de sources privées) du Finale de la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner, encore beaucoup de pièces sont manquantes ou encore perdues. Ainsi une esquisse, datant de juin 1895, appartenant à la succession d'un critique musical munichois pourrait être récupérée.
